Salt: Movement 03 (New World. There’s a new world coming; this one’s coming to an End.)

by catchandelier

Summary

Love is a shambling thing, gray-faced and gasping. It moves in from the west, the setting sun behind it. Those who see it avert their eyes. Love does not eat or drink, love separates its many teeth and consumes. Love is a shambling thing, grey-faced and gasping. -Let’s not dwell on our corpse strewn past. Let’s celebrate our corpse strewn future!

Truth. Love.

The secret to a long life lies in how acutely you perceive Time; and if you're afraid of the dark, which can't be seen through, don't be. Most of the truly frightening things are too small to be seen or inside your body already.
There truly is nothing so disheartening as packing up to leave somewhere. It’s not so much that you’re leaving- depending on where you’re going, leaving can actually be the very best thing- it’s the packing. You’re creating physical proof of the fact that all things we experience in this world are transient. We are not eternal; we will not last forever.

In the moments we exist, it isn’t really possible to face our inevitable cessation head on.

Humans aren’t good at looking eternity in the face and bowing to it.

I’m thinking all this because I’m trying to stall myself from packing up the dishes. It’s strange- I feel the same sort of melancholy I felt when I packed up my portion of the dorm each summer. On another note, student loans are the darkest form of magic known to man and I don’t care who knows it. I can pay them off, now that I’m an adult, but good lord those people are assholes. They don’t want you to pay it all in a lump sum, of course- they don’t even want you to pay more than the minimum payments. Because, you see, they can get more money out of you the longer they stretch the payment cycle out. Fuck that noise.

You’ll take my money and like it.

Packing up animals is a bit different; I can’t actually move them until I have somewhere for them to go. Or rather, I don’t want to- if it’s not me putting together their living spaces...

Let me explain.

There are two species of quail that are commonly kept in Skua. The Jungle Bush quail from Nuevo Paraiso is popular in aviaries and is the smaller of the two, but the common Valley quail is more popular for producing eggs or meat with smallholders and back garden farmers. They are, when kept correctly, very productive; producing about 230 eggs per year, making them an ideal solution for small outdoor spaces unsuitable for larger birds. They are more nervous than other poultry and do not like being handled. Care must be taken when catching them because they are able to fly vertically upwards to escape capture. Quail will get used to you over time however, and mine will call between themselves when approached. Being native to Skua and having traveled with me all over Paradise, their haki makes them much tougher and more expressive than normal- so I know for a fact that this particular flock really loves kale.

(Their calls sound a bit like ‘pirp-pirp-pirp’ and it’s really very cute.)

Rats are a real problem to quail and one of the first things to be considered when building a run and house for them is securing that enclosure from rats. Ventilation in housing is also paramount, as quail droppings produce far more ammonia than other poultry.

Quail can be kept with or without a run as long as they are provided with grass or greens in their diet. I get the best results from single level rabbit hutches. Keeping domesticated rabbits as pets is a very common practice Worldwide, and the hutches provide adequate ventilation, easy access, and a nice place the laying quail to hide and lay eggs. Chicken coops are wasted on quail. They don’t need such elaborate nest boxes, although they do appreciate somewhere dark to lay. Furthermore, quail don’t always make nests; they will usually lay their eggs in discreet places in their bedding or in thick grasses, much like the pheasant. Perches are also wasted on quail- which is another reason not to use Quail actually prefer a habitat more like a pheasants. Their natural habitat is amid wild grasses, scrub, brush and open woodlands; they mostly eat seeds, berries, fruits, and insects. Practically speaking, it’s much easier to just... let the grassy deck grow long and let the quail run around in it, although the rabbit hutch does give them a nice place to lay. They also dust bathe regularly; to keep them healthy and happy in a domesticated environment, an area for them to dust bathe in is required.

They do need more protection during cold weather, when the ambient temperature is approaching freezing or below. If it’s bad enough, it’s best to move them indoors; however, for the most part, a simple bit of forethought will suffice. A sheltered position, an extra handful of centimeters for bedding depth, and they’ll be well insulated from the floor. It also helps to keep them shut in their hutch on cold or rainy days. Wet and draughts will cause problems for anyone, of course- but for the worst of the weather, it’s best to cover them with a bit of sacking or tarp. So long as the sacking isn’t left on them, this covering of them isn’t problematic.

Quail feed needs to be relatively high in protein, maybe a fifth of the total mixture by ratio? So. It’s best to make your own feed- that way, I know for a fact what all is going into my animals. I use thirty percent protein floating catfish feed, costs around 1700 beri for fifty pounds (or 23 kilograms, rounding up). It’s best to have a dedicated grinder for farm work. I do, now, I use a very sturdy blender- anyway, the pellets get ground to about the consistency of cornmeal, although the laying quail will eat the pellets whole. The high levels of protein are necessary for egg production and overall growth. Quail don’t overeat, so they can be fed with grazing feeders. Young quail need a high protein starter crumb; specialty feeds don’t usually exist specifically for quail, non-medicated turkey starter crumb is common enough at most feed stores that it will work just fine. However, in absence of turkey starter, domesticated chick crumb will work if protein is added as I mentioned earlier. The chick crumb I use is gradually mixed in with breeding feed, which contains the aforementioned fifth of protein by ratio. I put in seeds as well, for variety’s sake. Adult quail eat about fifteen grams of food per day. Greens should also be provided for them, so I grow grasses and dark leafy greens in and near their run so they can peck and graze at them with fluttery abandon. It enriches their lives, and incidentally keeps the grass from overgrowing.

Ignoring the entertainment of just watching them do their thing- which is quite entertaining, and good to do when spinning as I’ve mentioned before (I can’t watch myself spin, it turns out lumpy)- my quail are very productive in the egg department. They start laying at eight to twelve weeks, assuming there is enough light, so they are productive very quickly compared to other poultry.

Four quail eggs are roughly the same as a chicken egg, although they have a slightly higher quantity of yolk to white in an egg. Sanji has made an entire table of egg to egg ratios in his revised Skuan cookbook- with little notations about the standout qualities of each egg. Seagull eggs, for example, have a much higher water content than most other eggs, while duck eggs have a very rich yolk.

All this is to say I need to have an area prepared for the quail before I try to move them onto the Thousand Sunny. I’m thinking some kind of sunflower house. A sunflower house is a ring or square of sunflowers, grown in Skua for the purposes of child rearing. Children like places they can feel like they’re alone with themselves at a certain age, and adults don’t like not knowing where their children are.

There will be a patch of easily scratched up dirt and dust for the quail to bathe in. A shallow dish embedded in the dirt with a big jar that allows water to flow into it slowly, so they can drink. And lots of grasses and things to hide under, for enrichment purposes. Their nesting area proper will be a woven bamboo cage, open on the sides, and topped with a green… it looks like a leaf but it’s really a roof rig that makes it easier to lift the hutch off the ground. The hutch itself actually fits neatly into a furrow in the ground- or lawn (garden) deck, as the case may be.

My Angora Opossums are a bit different.

An opossum is a marsupial mammal. Their unspecialized biology, flexible diet, and reproductive habits make them successful colonizers and survivors in diverse locations and conditions. The Angora opossum is thought to have originated in Angora, Goblin Desert, although the facts remain unclear- mostly historical. Wild Angora possums are still found in the Angora area, as their incredibly thick, soft fur offers protection from the harsh black and white sand desert they make their home in. No one’s entirely sure how the ancient Four Kingdoms went about domesticating possums, but their usefulness is undeniable.

What is known for certain is that Skua, Nort, and Est have raised angora opossums for their fiber for centuries and the Chillage are credited for making their wool popular around 790- although the rest of the World wouldn’t see the luxurious fiber until 920.

There are five Angora possum breeds that dominate in fiber production: Este Angora, Chiller Angora, Saint Angora, Giant Angora, and Pixie Angora. Other breeds such as the Jewelry Woolsey and the Sabaody Fuzzy Lop also produce wool. However, they tend to be much more fractious in personality, so breeders tend to avoid them, thusly their fiber rarely comes on market.

The big five breeds are calm natured and known for their docile disposition. They make wonderful pets and are gentle with children and childish adults. That said, daily care for this rabbit typically falls onto an adult- or, in my case, a sewing professional- as the grooming can be overwhelming.

Great pets aside, Angoras are mostly kept for their plush coats, which produces the softest and warmest fiber in the World suitable for garments. As an animal primarily used for wool production, Angora possums are no-kill livestock, which can be very appealing to a lot of would-be farmers. There are also commercial breeders that raise Angoras for meat, fiber, and showing; tripling their investment. Angora wool producers typically promote and market their fiber to the hand-spinning and knitting cottage industries and can expect to enjoy nice prices for their product.

Skuans have been playing silly buggers with their farm animals for years; thus, the fact that domestic opossums have more in common with rabbits than they do with their wild brethren, including lifespan. Angora opossums, being no-kill livestock, live on average for twenty years, so long as they’re cared for correctly. Ancient Skuan thrift at it’s finest, y’all.

Angora possum wool is high in demand and considered top drawer in the fiber production market. It can be sold raw, meaning right off the possum, spun, dyed, or left as undyed roving. As a fibre, it is so fine that it’s usually blended with other fibers such as sheep’s wool, mohair, silk, and cashmere. The texture of angora wool yarn alone is too fine to hold the dense stitches of knitting- and yes, it is, I’ve tried it. You’ll either snap your yarn, or snap your needles. More importantly, angora wool alone is seven times warmer than sheep’s wool, and too warm for most garments- there are some very specific specialty garments where such warmth is required, but those garments are very much a pain in the ass to make. Blending angora fiber with other fibers will add softness, warmth distribution, and a ‘halo’ effect to the yarn and the resulting garment.

Wool is harvested from the possum by either plucking or shearing. Some breeds, such as the Pixie Angora, naturally molt (referred to in most fiber texts as “blowing their coat”) three to four times a year. Other breeds need to be sheared.

I have Pixies crossed with Sabaody Fuzzy Lops, giving them enormous ears they can glide with and very strong leaping and bounding muscles. Their personalities are pretty mellow, but they will bite if they feel scared or threatened, and they tend towards cuddling, which can be smothering. They molt every three months exactly, and use their tails like bullwhips when they fight.

Sanji likes all of my pets, and he respects my beehives, which is really all I can ask for. Speaking of Sanji, he’s the first crewmate I’m going to be picking up for transport back to Sunny, as it’s been two years, and we all have two weeks grace to get back. I am excited to be with my crewmates once more.

I never really had a big group of friends before, and even though being around all of them all the time could be a bit draining, I still missed them. I missed them all so much.

Sanji actually really loves the little turtle I made for him, and has a newfound hobby of collecting them - stuffed animals, I mean. Rather, he has three fish he loves very intensely, and I’m okay with having them on their own shelf in our bedroom. I made him an adorable rainbow trout, a fancy little flying fish motherfucker, and a big-n-squishy whale shark with the spots and the stripes and everything. Stuffed animals are the shit, and they give good hugs and they don’t ask invasive personal questions and they don’t leave hair or scales or feathers or poop in weird places like live animals. Live animals are still better for comforting purposes, but there’s an undeniable allure to the plushie that ought not be denied.

So… I’d actually forgotten, but one of the first ways I ever learned to masturbate was with a stuffed animal plush. I would wear the eyes and noses of my toys off - y’know, press everything into the right spot, cross my legs, and grind myself to a Joyful Being. Of course, Sanji and I have become close enough that when I thought of this, he heard me think of it, and uh…

Well, you know that stereotype about the girls with their beds covered in stuffed animals? I was that girl; and I can tell you here and now, the reason my bed as a child was covered in stuffed animals with hard eyes and noses was because I realized if I rotated my uses of them, I’d get a longer life out of them.

So anyway, Sanji wanted to see me do this and I- being me- was okay with showing him. So… he watched. And then we had sex. And then he watched again, and we had some more sex. He let me watch him, and I ended up giving him a blowjob?

That teddybear will never be the same… the things it's seen! The things it's done!

So, uh- every member of my crew has their own stuffed animal. Some have more than one. Everyone kind of had shitty childhoods? I mean, I did too, sort of. I guess. So, uh, I have my old realistic stuffed iguana from when I was a young girl, and a scorpion I made for myself, and Petunia the Taxidermy Alligator who is to hang from my studio’s ceiling. She’s a “happy twentieth” birthday gift from Mom- or rather, having her live and angry self sprung on me at four in the morning was the present, and I taxidermied after killing her with my spear. I don’t really like her, but she’s a conversation non-starter, I guess.

I mean, I suppose Mom knew I could kill her, and I do like Taxidermy, but hardly anyone lets me stuff their animals anymore... honestly, you let one beaver bite the nipple off a cousin, people think you can't be trusted with the particulars of stuffing a beaver.
Families are weird.

Captain and I made his sock monkey together— it’s stuffed with sand and pebbles, it’s not actually a soft toy except on the outside, just like Captain. Then I made a cute wolf pup plushie for Old Ray after he told us about his adorable child, Issun Walter.

Zoro has a tigershark, a momma boar and her adorably stripey baby, and a pair of lambs (one black, one white) which are under no circumstances to be confused with Mark’s lamb and ram. Nami has a trio of chubby cats and a maneki neko (calico with collar and golden bell, lifting it’s right paw; Nami likes money and luck). She’ll be getting something else as soon as- no, best not to say it before she does.

Usopp got a sawtooth stag beetle, considering Hekate-chan is an atlas beetle; the stuffed toy beetle is made of soft squishy leather.

Chopper got a pile of menacing microbes, and a much more benign set of body cells.

Robin got a squishy Estern crane; Franky got a very soft baby rhino; Taffy got a cloud fox because she missed her Su-mama; and Bryony got a blue crab.

Brook got a little whale he can keep in his skull, right next to the Tone Dial with all his old crew singing on it.

Marguerite got a set of starfishes.

I’m taking the long way to do this because I’m stalling out of useless fear of meeting my friends again and finding them to be strangers. If they’re strangers, we’ll just have to become friends again.

HIGITUS FIGITUS!

I would like to have everything’s attention, please! We are leaving now- arrange yourself into the packing position, post haste. Oi- furniture and books go first, you know better, Sugar Bowl.

-Cicero, you belong in with the ‘C’s- all books stay alphabetized if you please!

-Oi oi oi- hold it, hold it. Sugar Bowl, Tea Set is damn near cracked to pieces already, and your surly attitude is not helping matters. Be gentler or I’ll find a replacement, got that? Good.

Where the hell was I…?

“Hockety pockety, Mab.”

“Thank you, Sanji.”

PRESTIDIGITARIUM!
And then I close my carpet bag with an alligator snap.

“It really is amazing how you can fit everything into your purse.”

“The wonders of Mathemagic, Sanji. You packed too?”

“Yup.”

“Said your goodbyes?”

“Yup.”

“Alright, then- let’s go!”

We sail out into night-dark waves, and with the passing of the moons behind a bank of clouds, transport from the open ocean to the dark and quiet Soldier Dock where Nautilus! will now make her home.

“I’m home…!” calls Sanji.

“Welcome home.” I reply.

We smile at each other, in the gloom. I lead us both up, into the men’s dorm- as we made our way to the dorm, duffles and accoutrements in hand, I unpacked the ship. It’s still empty of actual stuffs for our crewmates, but everything lays ready- if they all showed up right now, I could have beds made up for them in a trice.

However, I don’t have to go get anyone for the next three days or so.

So.

“Mm, Sanji- since the pantry’s empty, and my studio is still packed up… we could go bless those rooms real quick?”

“...We sure could. And I mean- I’ll have to wash the pantry anyway, we’ve been gone for two years now...”

“Mmmh. Y’gonna eat me all up, love?”

“If you’d like.”
We smiled at each other and- uh. We didn’t get much sleep that night. Or do much other than eat and write out grocery lists the next day.

Because we were having hot, fulfilling sex. And lots of it.

_Everywhere._

I had grass stains on my ass and it was Nostalgic.

Mm, Sanji doesn’t like ejaculating just anywhere, and with good reason; the inherent magic in his come can burn right through condoms, much less a slow-release medicine. Every time he comes inside of me, the chance of me becoming pregnant goes up, just a little bit. With that said, there’s few things the two of us enjoy more than a good old-fashioned cream-pie, with his dick all burrowed deep in me and his hot thick burning come filling my womb to the brim, the thick clouds of steam and vapor that arise from our congress- magnificent. We also recently discovered that Sanji really likes biting me, when we fuck- because we realized that sometimes, we want to take the time to make love. And sometimes, we want a quick fuck so we can calm the hell down and go the fuck to sleep already, goddamn.

I like my husband. I like fucking my husband. My husband likes me. My husband likes fucking me. We haven’t tried pegging or toys yet, but I can feel it coming. M-much like I can feel- aah- I can feel-

*S-sanji-!

Aaah, Sanji, you-

"Sanji, you made me piss the bed again."

"Ah?! Shit, sorry Mab- fuck, I didn't mean to thrust that hard for that long, I'm sorry-"

"Thank you for apologizing. And I mean, it'll all wash- we didn't ruin anything, I just- that's really embarrassing, when I do that, and I don't really... I don't like it, when that happens. I know, intellectually, that piss is fully sterile, but it stinks and... and I can't lay around in it or let you have more of me until it's clean and I just- if you have a thing for that, we can talk about it, I just- Sanji, please stop making me piss our bed."

"I'm sorry, Mab. I- I, um. I don't think I do have a fetish for that? Mostly, when I'm going that hard it's because... part of me really wants to get you pregnant."

"A-ah. Well. I mean. We're married, and... if you got me pregnant, that would be... I'd be okay, if you did. You know that, right?"

"Yeah, I do, I just..."

"Sanji...?"

"...You're absolutely sure, you'd be okay if I got you pregnant?"

"Yeah, Sanji. I'll be okay, if it's you."

"Okay. Um- do you want help stripping the bed?"

"Oh god, yes please."
Goddamn but I missed my studio and laundry.

So the very first rounds of laundry (after the pissed on sheets and bedding is fully clean again, and the towels too, and the rubber sheet) I put in are the things that didn’t manage to get washed before we packed up. Cover sheets, stored bedding, the various drop cloths that protected our floors and so on- those get washed next. I spend most of the day alternating between growing the sunflower ring in which the quail are going to live, setting up the Possum Tree and hutch- they’re free range, really- airing out the rooms below deck, checking all the rigging for damage- none so far, but I won’t rest easy until I’ve double checked everything- and switching out laundry. Dollperganger is very helpful in getting everything looked over, particularly sails and rigging which require a great deal more scrutiny than anything else- the rest of the ship can more or less be seen to as we go, but the sails are my job and I’m not leaving it to chance.

Folding laundry with one pair of hands, planting seeds with another, ushering chirruping quail into a cloth lined crate for transport with a third; second check of sails and rigging. As I walk through the flowering lawn-deck, past the pen of goats and nearer to the dove cote, I hear in the distance the steady buzzing roar of Shearwing on the wind. In Sunny’s lee, Shearwing comes screaming down, wailing in a rather lovely Amazonian brogue about- no, no, that’s just Gurry. He’s a bit excitable.

Ah, Taffy, Gurry- and Bryony? On Shearwing? Goodness gracious, that must have been a tight fit.

“Ahoy the ship!” calls Taffy.

“Ahoy! I’ll open the dock for you!” I call back.

One of me opens the dock, while another of me goes into the dock where our runabouts are kept. Taffy steers Shearwing into her berth with a quiet thrum, and I help her secure the little pink boat. Gurry staggers into the ship proper, hands gone white knuckled around his duffle. Bryony chortles, before helping haul Shearwing into its travel position.

I give the girls their marching orders-

“Taffy, Bry, you’re on the Lines- we’re checking them over for damages before sailing on. Gurry, when you’ve put your things on a bunk in the men’s dorm, you’ll be with these two. They’ll show you what needs doing.” I said.

“Yis! I’ll put my things away, then I’ll go.” said Taffy.

“Mm, it’s good to be home.” said Bryony.

“A-ah, right. Thank you.” said Gurry.

Gurry is glancing at Taffy who is carefully staring straight at me. As he returns his gaze to me, Taffy starts glancing at him. Bryony sighs very softly and rolls her eyes; ah, she’s grown so well!
I don’t say anything because they can probably figure this one out, but—there is no “right” moment when it comes to matters of the heart, merely moments that aren’t completely wrong. I wonder if Taffy knows that?

No matter—three of my Dollpergangers return to my pockets as tiny fairy charms, neat as you please on their sorting threads, and the rest of me continue apace.

Gurry has experience sailing—of course he does, he’s from Amazon Lily. Gurry also has a deep seated hatred and mistrust of seagulls, and will barely tolerate the News Coos. His duffle has sea-creatures and seashells patterned on it. His favorite pair of waders are a beaten up pair of canvas sneakers, just like Jackie—and he likes painting en plein air. I’d almost go so far as to say the only way he knows how to paint is en plein air, with oils. Well, he’s in for an education, I suppose.

I like him.

Mark has done a rather spectacular job in keeping our home-farm going—not innovating, per say, but the animals are happy and healthy, and the various fruits and flowers and vegetables are growing with abundance. Miss Shakky, of course, must have come by every day and kept things in working order—fed the birds, milked the goats, made sure the water was clean… Farming, even a small one like ours, is hard work every day. I suppose the excess fertilizer from the dove droppings was sold off, for a tidy profit of course— as was the milk, eggs, and squab.

The dog kennels are really more of a loafing shed now, they’ve gotten much bigger. Pearblossom, Bubbler, and Buttercream bite much less often now, because they know us and trust us—and seeing them hunt seals and large fish is a goddamn miracle. My goodness they’re lovely dogfishes. And they missed all of us; Captain especially, because he gives them his bones after he’s gnawed most of the meat off of them. Best thing for a sad boy is a happy dog; best thing for a sad dog is a happy boy. Sometimes, all a boy really needs is a dog; and sometimes, all a dog really needs is a boy. Buttercream actually picked Sanji; I saw them together sometimes… Oh, I know what I’m going to do. Hm. Truffles. That’ll be interesting.

Aha, here we go— a nice spot to put the quail. I’ve got those loops for drilling into the deck, so that things can be lashed down— sort of like, like posts for a tent? What get driven into the earth? Like that. I guess the shape of the Quail Run is going to be square. I’ll just- grow the sunflower house for them now, and- rearrange the lawn so that they have a sandy, dusty spot to scratch and bathe in, and little things to hide under, and lots of grass to nibble on… Their Hutch-run will go here, and make sure it’s nice and sunken in because they don’t like ramps, do they- and the hedges all work, and the locks are all in working order. If a big wind comes, the roof of their house won’t go flying off. I’ll just put the Possum Tree over here, and their Hutch goes there—and now I can turn the possums loose from where they were sleeping in their travel bag. They’ll wake up on their own in their nice new Hutch, and I’ll leave them to it.

The last thing to do is grow the sunflowers and let the quail settle in again. I grow the sunflowers thick enough that they form a natural fence that the quail aren’t strong enough to peck through, and then I take their crate and open it up. It takes a good twenty minutes for them to settle into their new home, and I feed them some fresh greens to keep morale up. Then— it’s done and dusted, isn’t it.

Whop-whop-whop-whop.
That must be Usopp, Luffy, and Mark- on Hekate-chan, too. I’d know that particular cadence of wing beats anywhere.

Hekate-chan comes gliding in on her enormous wings, landing on the Sunny’s grassy lawn with a minimum of noise and pressure. Asteria-sama can move silently, but- well, I shouldn’t judge her on her mother’s merits. Hekate is her own beetle.

Um.

Um.

Oh no.

Oh no oh no oh no-

Oh no- no, I’m not dealing with that. I’ve cleaned out the Nautilus! so all that’s left to do is go get shit, I already left, so- I’m leaving, I don’t want to know. I can go work in my studio, maybe? Something that isn’t here.

“Hey Mab, d’you want to hear about what I just did-?”

“NO I DO NOT, MARK. I’M GOING TO GET NAMI AND ZORO NOW.”

“Hey, Taffy-”

“-Yis?”

“-nevermind I gotta go eat some things. Talk later!”

“Okay…?”

That actually came out of his mouth. Mark has grown.

Focus, Mab!

Go get Nami and Zoro.

Okay so.

First things first, cards on the table- this story is insane and when I tell it to people I’m usually met with slacked jaws and Mab just gently whispering to herself “oh no oh no oh no” for like, 80% of the story because it’s just a series of progressively more terrible decisions.

This story is also really really not safe for the work place, so- okay here we go.

Alright so this story happened on the way back to Sabaody from Rusukaina where Luffy was staying and it happened in early January- which actually makes the story and the reaction to it even worse because like, all three of us did some crazy shit during our two years training trip, but this was apparently too much too far too insane- which I guess I can’t argue with but anyways moving on.

So.

Luffy, Usopp, and I only managed to get together three times during the separation, and we missed each other fiercely at all other times. The other thing to know is that the three of us together are Trouble with a capital T. Just- awful decision making skills and we have this thing where basically every time we’re together and we’re not going on an adventure, no matter what we’re doing it’s gonna ramp up into sex without exception. This is probably the worst and most dangerous time it happened.

So we’d all packed our shit onto Hekate-chan, Usopp’s partner beetle-mount and we were on our way to Sabaody. Hekate-chan flies fast, but it’s still a good twelve hour flight from Rusukaina to Sabaody, and that’s without inclement weather delays. So. It’s the second day’s grace after new year’s, and we’re all going back to the Sunny and we’ve missed each other so much. Luffy has no libido to speak of, he just likes spending time with us- and we all decided if it was okay for Usopp to be with Malila like he was, it was okay for me to have fun. Which I did- but dammit, nothing quite matches having sex with your lovers. Nothing. Not even freaking sweet firework-wizard battles across the harbor of Water 7 with the guys at Dock 1, the guys at Franky Family Salvage, and us at the Circus. That was fucking awesome and we didn’t even set anything on fire or explode any buildings or nothing. I did have to shoot John a little bit but that’s alright, he’s an asshole and didn’t die or take offence.

Anyway.

Hekate-chan isn’t human, and she doesn’t have human morality- she honestly doesn’t care what we do on her back, so long as she can fly and has a good idea of what the Thousand Sunny looked like. And with Mab already there, she really didn’t need Usopp or Luffy or me directing her.

So here comes terrible decision #1- none of us think it might be a Bad Plan to have the three of us (two of whom are Very Horny and one of whom Is Down For That) on the back of a giant riding beetle that can fly herself places without directions.

-Hekate-chan is huge. Like, she’s small by her species' standards, but that doesn’t change the fact that a beetle the size of a small cart is fucking huge. And of course, literally none of us- not me, not Luffy, not Usopp, and we’ve already established Hekate doesn’t care- literally none of us thinks “hey maybe we should have more than The Three Lovers on That Beetle especially when they are basically guaranteed to have sex at some point today”. We could have fit more, or even different, people on Hekate-chan’s back no problem, it would have stopped literally everything that follows.

Shit, the people on Shearwing would have been more comfortable, even, we could’a taken Gurry. We might have invited Taffy or Bryony or anyone else in though, so it’s probably best that WELL OKAY ANYWAY MAYBE that’s why no one but us was on Hekate-chan.

So. It started more or less innocent with Bad Decision #1- Luffy stuck his hat in an easily closed basket so it wouldn’t go anywhere and then Usopp started kissing him and I watched and started masturbating because my guys are fucking hot- but we were all agreed that it maybe wasn’t the Best Plan to have sex like we wanted to on the back of a giant, flying beetle.

So we’re flying and then Hekate goes above the cloud layer and starts making for Sabaody and at this point Usopp is enjoying himself with his mouth and tongue and face between my legs which he hadn’t had time for in months and I was making out with Luffy and that’s when Bad Decision #2 happened because Usopp-Usopp checked in with Hekate to make sure she wasn’t being bothered by us- NEWS FLASH: SHE WAS NOT.

And so then Usopp started fingering me and stretching my asshole and I started whining and whimpering because holy crap that was not where I was expecting this to go and Luffy was starting to get into THE MOOD. Luffy doesn’t actually feel desire- he just keys off of what me and Usopp are feeling and by then I was- my pussy was being rubbed and stretched by Luffy and Usopp was stretching and licking my asshole and-

Bad decision #3 was Usopp deciding to put his dick in my ass while Luffy was in my pussy. The thing of it is, when that happens, Luffy can actually feel Usopp through me- through the flesh? And uh. He gets clingy and he wants to roll and uh- okay, Hekate is big, but the actual riding space on her back is very, very small. Certainly not big enough to roll around on whilst having “I haven’t seen you in six months or more” sexy times. None of us were really interested in that right then though, we were too busy making love.

So I’m between my lovers and I’m like ‘this is fucking awesome’ and so this goes on for like ten minutes until Usopp nuts and holds me like a prayer. Then Luffy surges and rolls and I’m on my back the skin of the small of my back against the leather saddle and Usopp has his second wind and is now fucking Luffy in the ass and- here’s where bad decision #4 comes into play.

See, none of us noticed it, but we’d actually run out of available space on Hekate-chan’s saddle to have sex on, so when I felt myself pressing against a coil of rope- I swear, I just thought it was odd, not that WE WERE ABOUT TO FUCK OURSELVES OFF THE GIANT BEETLE AND ALMOST FALL TO OUR DEATHS.

And then we fucked ourselves off of the giant beetle and almost fell to our deaths. I say almost because- that coil of rope was actually a loop, and it was knotted to the horn of Hekate-chan’s saddle, and when we went over, it went taught and held us suspended over fucking nothing. Bad decision #4 was- we didn’t stop. We could have, and gotten back onto Hekate-chan- but we didn’t.

And that’s how we had a buncha rounds of sex hanging off the side of a giant, flying beetle.

So I’m making love with Luffy, Luffy’s making love with Usopp, and this goes on for another half hour. Now, here’s the thing- to get Luffy to orgasm, we have to do a lot of stimulating. Usually, it’s not that big a deal- I like switching things around, Usopp has stamina for days, and Luffy is always very satisfied by the end. However, at this point in time, we haven’t seen each other in months and we’re not going to let a little thing like INCREDBLY IMMINENT DEATH get in the way of our pleasure.

Que bad decision #5.

See, Luffy likes my pussy fine. He also likes Usopp’s asshole. Thus, when he said to Usopp “switch out”, Usopp- being a nineteen year old man- Usopp fucking did it . As far as dicks go, Luffy’s is a little… springier, while Usopp has an amazing amount of technique he can bring to bear. Bad decision #5 is thus- when Usopp gets entered from behind while his dick is in my pussy, all his normal technique gets amplified and he has to hold onto something with his whole arms, not just his hands. Luffy, of course, thrust into him from behind as soon as Usopp was settled into me. So I was the only one holding onto the rope keeping us all from falling to our deaths.

AND WE STILL WEREN’T STOPPING OR EVEN REALLY COGNIZANT OF OUR IMMINENT DEATH, LURKING BELOW US.

So we’re going over the thick clouds and I’m pretty sure we’re still not there yet and Usopp is making a game attempt to get me pregnant with sheer enthusiasm alone (which he can’t, I’m on the shots, no babies for me right now) and Luffy has entirely forgotten that men can’t get pregnant like that because he’s got his arms wrapped around us both and is going to town and I have my arms wrapped around the rope tight enough to bruise and Hekate-chan does not fucking care. We’re going fast enough that I can’t actually tell how fast we’re going and this is fucking awesome so I make bad decision #6 and I let go of the rope and wrap my arms around my lovers.

There’s nothing holding us up now except being balanced on the rope and Hekate-chan’s very steady flying.

Luffy says “switch out” again and Usopp whines but he does it and we’ve been having sex for like 3 hours now and I’m moaning so loud and I keep moaning their names and squirming and gyrating and orgasming because I can orgasm at the passing of a stiff breeze across my face I am a HORNY MOTHERFUCKER OKAY and I’m breathing pretty hard and at some point the rope went from holding me like a belt to cradling me along my spine and we’re all getting close to orgasming in unison because we’ve orgasmed individually at least once excepting Luffy who takes some work. So right when Usopp can feel Luffy is about to orgasm- Luffy will stop thrusting right when he’s almost there so what Usopp does is he pulls Luffy out of his ass and shoves his dick into my pussy alongside his own.

So I make bad decision #7 and I start rolling my hips up into both of them because 1) they’re going to orgasm better if I do this and 2) they’re too big for me to do this without moving a bit and spreading my juices over them both and by god I want them.

So we’re clinging to each other like vines and all about to come undone and Usopp’s grabbing at my hair in it’s braids so he doesn’t bruise my skin and Luffy’s begging for us to ‘keep going keep going Mark please bite me please’ and I’m arching my back and sinking my teeth into the thick muscle of Luffy’s shoulder and he’s screaming with pleasure and he’s screaming our names as Usopp ruts underneath him and into me and this goes on for like ten minutes and I-

I’m thinking this is the greatest fucking thing I’ve ever done in my life because I am twenty years old and this is one of the craziest things I’ve ever done so obviously I’m going to see it through to the end.

So as we get maybe two hours from Sabaody, Luffy orgasms, I orgasm, and Usopp orgasms too, and then it’s afterglow city for the next, eh, hour? And then an hour after that we all climb back onto Hekate-chan, clean things up, and put our clothing back on.

Then Hekate-chan landed us on Sunny’s grassy lawn deck, just as neat as I left it last summer, and we unloaded her. Usopp clicked off her heavy saddle and carrying nets, and she shook herself clear and trundled off into a brick area on the floor I’d prepared for her in advance.

Usopp, Luffy, and I went back to the men’s dorm to put away our shit but we got distracted because Luffy started kissing the bruises the rope had left on my back and Usopp is basically always horny and uh- we didn’t get much done that day. Pretty much everyone who normally sleeps in the men’s dorm was sexiled to the women’s dorm or different parts of the ship.

So uh. It was only in telling all this to Bryony and Taffy that I realized 1) what fucking terrible decisions me and my guys make when we’re together and not adventuring and 2) maybe I shouldn’t tell that story to very many people. Because it freaked out Bryony and Taffy when I told them what went down, and they’re pretty crazy people themselves.

So yeah, that’s how me, Usopp, and Luffy got back to Thousand Sunny.
So. Kuraigana Island is so much better, now that the Curse is being addressed and people are tending to it. Zoro is also much better than where he was last I saw him- I was the one to stitch his eye closed, you see. He decided that he didn’t want to get used to a new eye, he’d be fine with one and his own Haki. I mean- he’s not wrong… Difference in styles, I suppose, and I’ll leave it at that.

Anyway- he got used to having one eye very quickly, and took to the challenge of half-blind fighting with his normal aplomb.

Perona actually escorted him to Kuraigana’s dock, along with her lovely daughter. Dessie is growing so quickly- she can walk and talk now; and I don’t really understand what she’s saying, but she’s saying something. Cute kid; eyes like a hawk, but rounder than her father's, and her hair is just the most lovely shade of maroon I’ve seen in a long while. Perona looks- settled, is the best way I can describe it. Motherhood really suits her, and her gang of Alkonosts took to foster-parenting without much more than a ruffle of feathers. Then again, Florian Alkonosts are sturdy, stoic, stubborn people- Zoro really fit right in with the adults.

Zoro put all his things- a duffle and some wickerwork furniture- ah, a bassinet swing-rocker, lovely-onto the Nautilus before taking a knee and saying goodbye to Dessie. He’s going to be an excellent father- it’s odd, even though he’s not very… he sees the world in a very different way, it’s true. And he still manages to be one of the most child friendly people I’ve ever met. I think maybe the only children who don’t like Zoro are the really really shy ones, and even then they tend to like him eventually. The man’s gifted with small critters of the human variety.

Anyway.

He nodded solemnly to Perona- and then he’s on the ship with a leap.

I waved to Perona, who waved back before dutifully following her daughter’s commands in building a sandcastle. So cute.

“Gonna miss that kid.”

“Mm. Ready to go?”

“Yeah.”

“Okay. Have a seat wherever. Oh- just so you know, after we get Nami I’m taking the scenic route back, to make it easier on myself. Should take about a day.”

“Okay…?”

“So after we get Nami, I’m going to be up in the helm room. The door and walls are soundproofed, and- if you need me for something, you can use the intercom. Otherwise, you two will be on your own. Okay?”

“Oh! Uh. Y-yeah, yeah, that should be fine.”
I smile at him, and he smiles back.

“Cool. So- there’s still some food in the fridge, and the bed’s made. If you want to lay down or whatever, go for it.”

“-Right. Thank you, Mab.”

“You’re welcome, Zoro.”

I take the helm, and I sail us away- and without much more than a plop as we move from blue sea to white, we sail into the harbor of Weatheria, where Nami has been training.

I’m prohibited by Law from saying all that much about Weatheria. I can’t even discuss the weather on the skisland, it could be used to divine the location.

There’s not much to do once we’re wharfside other than stop the ship and moor it; Zoro helps me tie things down. Then, nothing to do but wait.

Nami looks different. Longer hair, bigger bust- I’ll have to take her measurements again- and she’s wearing the traditional garments of a Weather Caller; a Weather Witch. She’s even got her staff all put together- it’s not quite a full Limiting Staff, but she’s not been near Usopp and Franky or me for a while now, and all four of us have some ideas about what to build her… and of course, she’s not yet had the- ahem. Not until she says it, Mab.

When I glance over at Zoro, I see on his face an expression I don’t really remember seeing on his face ever before. Nami looks at Zoro and her face breaks out into quite possibly the happiest smile I’ve ever seen.

It’s only fun to be the third oar when you’re invited to participate.

I leap onto the dock, take Nami’s duffle from her, and wink at her in passing when she makes to say something. Nami’s pretty smart- I carry her duffle back to where Zoro left his, shut the door to the helm firmly behind me, and leave them to it.

After we unmoored the Nautilus, Zoro and I settle into the soft pink couch in the living room of the houseboat. Mab goes back into the helm room, and we sail away from Weatheria without fanfare.

There’s a great big mirror against the smooth wall; Mab went behind it to go to the helm, so- I suppose that’s the stern? Interesting-

I’m avoiding talking to Zoro.
“Hi, Zoro.”

“Hey, Nami. Been awhile, huh?”

“Y-yeah.”

I let him come up behind me, watch him watch me shrug out of the soft hooded cape-dress-thing that marks my mastery of the Weather Arts. He slowly wraps an arm around my cloth covered stomach, hooks his throat over my shoulder and- and- the scruff of his cheek is rough and wonderful against my neck. I press my hands together and rub them over my face, rub one through the fuzzy green hair on his head and gently dance the tips of my fingers around the bone of his blind eye, press the palm of my hand to his cheek and stroke down the side of his jaw, his neck. I watch in the mirror as his eyes flutter, his face slackens with pleasure. He wraps his other arm around me and draws his hand up underneath the fabric, against my skin, squeezes the warm fullness of my chest-

“Gently, Zoro.”

“Of course.”

It’s not something that came up often in the conversations Mab, Robin, and I had together about sexual preferences, but- I really love it when my breasts get played with. Not so much lately, for a reason I need to tell Zoro, but- ooh, oh yes!

Zoro and I talked a lot about sexual preferences. There wasn’t much else we could do, considering we were both so busy with training- so, when he picks me up and re-sits us both down on the pink couch, I know exactly what he’s going to do.

“It’s okay if you have to scream or cry, Nami.”

“Oh? But- Mab-”

“Mab can’t hear us unless we use the intercom. And the intercom is over there.”

“Oh. Oh, oh, Zoro.”

And then I was too busy enjoying myself to consider my own insecurities and anxieties. Zoro likes kissing me- not just my mouth, but my neck, the back of it especially. I don’t quite understand the appeal, but God his fingers, his fingers are- he has impeccable control of his strength and a curiosity to match and god, oh god, when he touches me it’s like trails of fire over my skin, like- like little pleasure-lightnings over my whole body but especially between my legs. The air crackles thick with ozone and his soft laughter and my sharp cries of pleasure- Zoro that’s too much, that’s too much I’ll break-

Finally, when I can’t stand it much longer, I go to pleasure myself but Zoro won’t let me. He nudges my questing hands aside and takes it upon himself to please me, rough strong fingers rubbing and digging and nudging and delving- deeper- than I ever managed. So good!

I can’t even close my legs, he’s got them hooked over his and spread us both wide. Staring into the mirror it all looks- so- aaaaaAAAAAH!

It’s just me being stirred and squeezed by strong, controlled, callused hands and I can’t even see what he’s doing against my orange-flower, my clothing is in the way.

It eventually occurs to me that we’re wearing far too much clothing.

“Z-zoro. Zoro, stop- we’re. Hah. We’re wearing way too many clothes for- this boat has a bed, right?’”

“-Yeah, yeah it does. Come on.”

And somehow- somehow, I’m not worried about following him.

I only have to lead him a little bit, the door to the room we need is wide open, beckoning.

I let my clothing fall to the floor and Zoro follows suit, and then he follows me into- into- into something new for us both. Soft thumps on the bed, and the world melts into pleasures untold.

When I wake again the next day, it’s in Zoro’s arms. I’m sore, a little, but more because I haven’t done anything like that- that much, for that long- for nearly two years. I’d never been with a virgin before, and most of our- activities- were spent in an exploratory way. I never really took the time to explore, before. It was- it was really good.

For example, Zoro likes it when someone kisses and licks his extensive scars, but especially the big one across his front. I like licking and kissing his extensive scars, especially the big one across his front; and he’s very ticklish on his feet, so while he likes having his calf scars rubbed, I have to be careful or he’ll start giggling and squirming, which knocks him right out of the sexy-times headspace. I mean, we’ve had giggly sex too, which is great fun, but…

Zoro likes blowjobs. I like giving Zoro blowjobs. Zoro likes giving cunnilingus. I like getting my pussy licked by someone with so much enthusiasm. And his learning curve! He started out sloppy but by the second time he was good and by the fifth I was having paroxysms of joy because the man knows how to keep a steady pace and steamrolls right over any objections I might have about having orgasms back to back.

There is nothing quite so good as having back to back orgasms for several hours.

More importantly… I’ve lain with Sanji before, and Sanji has almost no refractory period. I’m not sure how that works, but it’s true- get Sanji going and he’ll just keep going until you both pass out.

Zoro is not like that. Zoro can hold off his orgasm for hours and pull me through ten or twenty of them before even considering letting go. Zoro’s not as long as Sanji, but he’s much thicker- and I didn’t realize I had a preference, but thicker dicks rub better. They just- do. And Zoro can rub inside of me all night long, too, which Sanji just- well, maybe he can now, I haven’t asked Mab yet.
Back when I fucked him in Est, he certainly couldn’t- he could do any position I asked for, he just didn’t have the same kind of staying power. I had no complaints- but he just wasn’t there for the cuddling, and the petting, and the hand holding, and the warm, heavy looks like I’m the most beautiful, the most expensive, the most- I can hardly stand to look Zoro in the eye when he’s rolling his hips against mine like the most inexorable wave across the shore and it’s not just because of the way it feels it’s-

He has sharp, brown eyes, darker than mine, and they can snap and flash like the edge of a blade-but when he’s making such wonderful love with me, his eyes become warm and soft and caressing and I almost can’t bear to look into them- but even more, I can’t bear to look away.

Even when after the latest orgasm I burst into pleasured tears, I still can’t look away.

When he presses a hand against my hardening womb, his eye widens with sudden delight, and a perverted flush races across his cheeks and I can feel him, his dick, his legs and his hips and his whole body shuddering against me tipping me over the edge and I orgasm for the last time and he can’t hold himself back and he moans long and low and loud against me before collapsing.

Nami from two years ago would have said something like “it’s not the size of the boat, it’s the motion of the ocean”. I definitely remember saying “it takes a long fucking time to get to Paradise in a rowboat” to Mab during our discussions of sex. And then, when I was having sex with Zoro for the first time I realized- even if it takes a long time to get to Paradise in a rowboat, you’re still in Paradise. -Which is to say, it takes a long time for him to orgasm, but when he does, he can’t stop for a while and he can’t get up and go again for another while. I don’t mind- he’s very attentive and considerate and he makes me beg him screaming for his dick sometimes which is exactly what I want from him and by god it feels good to get what you want.

He’s so warm and so heavy and deeply sleeping on top of me; I’ve never felt so safe and protected in my life.

And then I realize that he’s watching me, just like I’m watching him.

“...Something you want to tell me?” said Zoro, with gentle expectancy.

“Ah. Well… do you still have that fetish for pregnant women?” said Nami, softly smiling.

“...Yeah. I don’t even like Perona like that, so it was the most confusing, awful thing to learn that about myself,” sighed Zoro. “I- I know the timing is bad, but- I mean. It’s not like our lives will ever get less dangerous.”

“True. And… I mean. It’s not like Mihawk isn’t hot… Anyway, Weather Arts were actually developed by and for pregnant people first; then for everyone else. So. I- we talked about me stopping my birth control, and I did, and… um. Well. If my timing is right, you should have impregnated me about eleven weeks ago. Maybe twenty? Chopper did the blood test already, so.
Um. Surprise?” said Nami.

“I- Ah. R-really? That’s wonderful! Nami, that’s really wonderful! I- Um. Nami… Nami, what are we going to do?” said Zoro, grinning like a fool and touching Nami’s womb- then a sharp pang of worry raced across his brow.

“I- I guess we just keep going? There’s not much to do, really, that isn’t already done- and I wasn’t going to be getting in many fights anyway, and… I can already feel my Weather Arts getting stronger, Zoro.” said Nami, laying a comforting hand over the hand Zoro had put on her womb.

“...I’m really happy. I’m happy for you and I’m happy for the baby, too. Kid’s gonna be Strong, with Strong Parents.” said Zoro, grinning again.

“It might even be said that our child has the Strongest Parents in the World.” said Nami, grinning.

“Heh. Uh. Do you- do you want to get married?” said Zoro, haltingly.

“...Are you just asking because I’m having a baby with you?” said Nami, sharply.

“No, I’m asking because I love you. I mean, you having a baby with me is just a kick in the ass, one I needed to, to man up and ask you, again I mean, a-and you don’t have to marry me-” rambled Zoro.

“Zoro, stop. I’ll marry you.” said Nami.

“Really!?” said Zoro, grinning with shining eye.

“Yes, Zoro. Really,” said Nami, smiling gently. “And you can say your perverted things now, it’s okay.”

“I- only if your comfortable with it. I don’t want to make you-” said Zoro.

“Aw, Zoro. I thought you’d have something to say about me, now that I’m set to get all fat and round with your baby?” said Nami.

Zoro smirked.

And then he spoke. And when he stopped, Nami was flushed from the roots of her hair to the tips of her toes, and squirming as Zoro lavished kisses on her slightly protruding womb.

“You really don’t mind that I’m going to get fat...?” said Nami, breathless after hearing what lurked in the heart of Zoro’s libido. It was actually quite poetic, and really sweet; fairly tame, even. (She’d certainly heard and thought worse.)

“No, not at all. Having babies with you- having children with you- is something I’ve thought about for a while. Knowing that you’re going to become so beautiful- god, Nami, I can hardly believe it. You’re already so beautiful, to know you’re going to become even more lovely- to know that you’re going to marry me- Saa, open your legs, I’m hungry again. If- if that’s alright-?” said Zoro.

“Oh yes~!” squealed Nami, blushing hard enough to give a maple leaf in autumn pause.

AAAAAAAAAAaaaaaaaaaaah!❤
“...There a reason you’re rubbing my belly like that, Zoro?” said Nami, sweaty and blushing and breathless.

“...So I thought I didn’t have any real fetishes but I do, and you’re fulfilling it, Nami. Sorry, I can- I can stop.” said Zoro.

“No, no! I- I like it, actually, I like knowing you think I’m so...”

“Oh my god, Zoro-” said Nami, beginning to laugh.

They laughed themselves breathless, before Nami’s stomach growled.

And then they laughed some more.

-Damn these Shadow Powers! Still, I’m glad for them. And I’m taking this knowledge to my fucking grave.

For me, the day and night passed quietly. When I docked us in the Sunny’s hold, I checked out in the Nautilus!’s living room and found Nami and Zoro cuddling on the couch- fully clothed. You could almost swear nothing happened between them at all.

Almost.

So I’m going to go out on a limb and say that Nami and Zoro had a really good time together last night. Nami is dressed in something a bit more her style and moves with that swing to her step- heyooo, someone got laid. Oh, those pants are two weeks away from being too tight- better get on that, Mab. Zoro is a bit- frankly, he’s a bit tired looking, but he also seems to have a new appreciation for the world, and everything in it, and Nami’s ass especially.

Seems to me they had quite an evening.

(They had an evening’s fun quite a few times, but Nami isn’t showing yet and it’s only fun to tease about that sort of thing when you know the people you’re teasing won’t take offence. I’m not sure yet- we’ll see.)

Robin’s instructions for going to get her were very clear- I was to appear to her in person, then we were to walk casually around a corner and vanish, only to reappear in the Women’s dorm of the Sunny. Woman likes her theatrics, and I’m honestly happy to oblige her- it’s not like I don’t, after all. We turn the corner in the Revolutionary Army’s base of operations, Robin’s duffle over one of her shoulders, and then we turn another corner into the Women’s dorms. Easy-peasy.

Robin’s hands carry her duffle to her bed in a flurry of flower petals, and I can hear, faintly, the screams of horror as- Luffy?- regales the crew with how exactly he got from his training island to the ship.
I’m not going out there. Shan’t.

“You’re not leaving me to brave it alone, Mab.”

“Robin, I specifically left to get Nami and Zoro so I wouldn’t have to listen to that.”

“Une Fleur: Grip!”

“THAAAAah’my wing! Alright, alright, take it easy, I’m going-”

So I had to listen to Captain and Mark and Usopp explain how they got to the ship. In the key of “not on your life will I ever try that, Sanji” because, actually, I’m the shy one in our relationship. Or maybe I just don’t like exhibitionism? My point is, the entire time those three were outlining their journey from Luffy’s training island to here on the ship, I had both my hands over my face and was chanting “oh no oh no oh no” until it was all over.

At least they changed their sheets? And wiped down what they might have… stained? That’s really all I can ask for.

“Ah, hey Franky.”

“Hey, wing-sis! How’s it been?”

“Pretty good. I’m thinking we might need another soundproofed bedroom or two. Just on a hunch.”

“Y’know, I had that same funny feeling- one for the three crazy kids, and one for…?”

“Me and Zoro, of course.” said Nami.

“Aha, decided to say it aloud, eh?” I said.

“Well, it’s not like we’re fooling around- or fooling anyone else, for that matter.” said Nami.

“True.” I said.

“Sure, Nami-sis. What kind of room do you want?” said Franky.

“Well, we’ll need room to expand into, seeing as I’m expecting...” said Nami.

I left them to it.

Nodded once to Chopper, who got here somehow and I don’t want the details, dammit, I’m just-god, I’m really glad everyone’s here, now. Ah, there’s Brook, too. Everyone really is here.

Ah, Bryony!

“Bryony, I’m going to need you to make a set of baby monitors.”
“Eh-? You and Sanji-?”

“No. Nami and Zoro; I’ll need them ready in a bit less than ten weeks- maybe more than that, but aim for then please, Bry.”

“Aha. Gotcha. Will do, Mab.”

“Attagirl.”

This is something I can think about- Weather Arts are reserved for people with vaginas and working uteruses because the hormonal changes a person undergoes while they’re pregnant, and again while they nurse a baby allows for transcendental understanding of the Weather. I don’t understand how, because I never studied the Weather Arts- but. It has something to do with the heightening of senses during and after pregnancy? I don’t know, I didn’t study it.

I and Taffy are Nami’s midwives, while Chopper is of course, our doctor. A blood test confirmed it- Nami is pregnant. She’s going to have her baby in about twenty seven more weeks- or seventeen, it’s not terribly clear; I did some midwife divination, and she’s going to have a fast, mildly cryptic pregnancy. She’s already on her prenatal vitamins, and other than that- I’ll have Chopper make up some rubbing lotion for her stomach, although everyone does get stretchmarks eventually- still, it might be best. It’ll give Zoro something to do when he isn’t training.

The man broods.

I mean, she’s not showing yet but she’s about to bloom out- her abdominals are just not strong enough to keep that uterus squeezed so small, and Zoro is not a small man.

Alright, final check- Captain Zoro Nami Usopp Sanji Me Chopper Robin Mark Taffy Bryony Franky Brook Gurry. That’s everyone. We, of course, can’t quite sail yet- best leave it a few days so that everyone gets used to everyone else, and so I can take an accounting of what all we need in terms of clothing. I’ll also have a better idea of what might be appropriate to make for Nami and Zoro’s new addition, and what I should just purchase.

Oh this is exciting, I’m so glad to see everyone again!

Let’s see. While I’m thinking of it, let me just do an accounting of the clothing being currently worn by my crewmates.

Captain is wearing a red ruffled cardigan with four yellow buttons down the right side. The cardigan has three quarter sleeves and a faint, silky shimmer to it. He wears it open, perhaps to better show of the giant X shaped scar across his chest- I don’t know how he got it. It honestly looks kind of like a beast got him? Or maybe a beast got him once and then got him again another time? I’d ask but if it’s important I’ll find out about it anyway…

Where was I? Clothing, right.

Cuffed blue-jean shorts of the cut off variety, but he allowed me to hem them this time, so the fuzzy pilling isn’t quite so extensive. The old cuff on his last pair of jeans looked rather like fur, but was entirely cotton denim; pissed me off every time I saw it. Boyshorts are, of course, stitched directly into the pants, and as no one except his lovers will ever actually see them, maybe- well, I got bored, so some of them are plain, and some of them aren’t. Prints are fun. Panties: reduces fuss and friction.
Bright yellow sash, rayon; really ties his whole outfit together. New sandals in the same style as his old ones; and of course, his Hat. (If Captain dies, but the Hat makes it, Taffy gets the Hat. In all honesty, Taffy’s the one who’ll either follow in Captain’s footsteps, or give the Hat to a worthy successor, when the time comes.)

Oh, yes, and his old coat got devoured by armed ants- not army ants, armed ants, they had fucking rifles and shit. So, I’m making him a new one. Apparently they needed the fabric for food? Or rather, they could tell the old coat was made of spider silk, and they needed it for food pretty desperately? Captain’s story was not terribly clear… The point is, I’m making him a new coat because he’s just as susceptible to chest infections and wind chill as the rest of us. Also, it will be useful to have an easy way to see him- it won’t stop him from vanishing entirely, of course, but we’ll at least notice when he’s not there. There’s also every chance that the coat will end up in Mark’s wardrobe, not Luffy’s. I’ll add some extra buttons just in case, and prepare a striped number with a fluffy collar.

Zoro is wearing the boots he got in Water 7, which he broke in over his training years. His old boots were on the verge of rotting through in the uppers in Sabaody, and he’d been breaking in his new ones on and off for weeks prior to Fucking Kuma… Ah, yes, and he wears thigh high boot socks, and no, I don’t know why. Mine is not to question why, mine is to make the fucking clothes. If anyone asks Zoro, he’ll say he wears athletic pants. He is wrong. Zoro wears ath-leisure wear, a silk and cotton blend that he tucks into his boots. The cotton is black, the silk is green- that’s why his pants shine green in the light when he moves. At some point, he just stopped wearing shirts- he says there’s nothing wrong with the ones I make him. That’s what he says. I say he’s trying to impress Nami subconsciously. That might change when the babies get here; nothing quite like getting vomited on to make you really appreciate layers of protective fabric.

And the fucking jacket- it’s not a robe, it’s too long to be a trench coat… I don’t know what the fuck it is, just that he drew it and told me how he wanted it to move on him, and I had to make it for him because that is my job. He didn’t even let me give him a new Serious Fight bandanna, said his old one still had some fights left in it. What the fuck does that even mean?

And he still wears his awful, awful pea-puke green haramaki. It’s not like he doesn’t have other options- he does. And it’s not like they’re not nice to wear or don’t have the internal pockets he likes-they do. It’s not even like they don’t fit him- they fit him fine. He just likes that one. (I give it another two weeks before Nami starts wearing the ones he’s not; there’s some good ones in there, and as I recall the womb-pudge (Pudge) gets cold way faster than it feels like it should…)

He’s got a wine-red-maroon sash for his swords now, in addition to his original sedgeo, and he’s moved his earring pendants onto individual hoops in his left ear. His right ear has a tangerine and orange-blossom dangling from the lobe- Nami has the other one, of course. I suppose that’s how they’re doing their engagement-

“Hey, Mab?”

“Yes, Nami?”

“Sorry to interrupt, but- um, can you make me a wedding dress?”

“Yes, of course. Do you want a white one, or red, or-?”

“…It’s a bit early for white, don’t you think?”
“Never too early to be silly rich.”

“Um. Okay, so, it fills me with joy and amusement that ‘silly rich’ is where you went for ‘white dress’; but where I went is ‘funeral’. I really just want a pretty, new dress- something I haven’t worn before.”

“Ah. Do you want to match Zoro, or…?”

“-Can you do that?”

“I mean, a wedding haramaki isn’t out of the question-”

“Mab!”

“What? They’re warm and comfortable-”

“-But his is so…”

“-Ah, no, he just likes that one. He’s got way more of ‘em than just that one he wears all the time. Ask him to show you, I know he didn’t throw them out or lose them…”

“…You’re kidding.”

“Nope. He just likes that one.”

“…I’ll have to go ask him right now, actually- and you’ll have to convince me about the haramaki, I’m not sold yet!”

“Okay! Bye Nami!”

“-Bye Mab! Ah, remind me to talk about marriage tattoos later!”

“Okay!”

Which leads me to Nami. Nami’s style and her actual needs are about to clash in a big way.

So, her shoes are okay for now- they’re her regular chunky orange sandals. They’re cute, strappy, sexy heels; and entirely inappropriate for the later stages of her pregnancy- they’re fine now, but as she blooms out and starts being unable to bend the way over in any direction, she’s not going to be able to wear them- not to mention her feet are going to start swelling in a big way, if they haven’t already. Zoro will help her put the shoes on, of course, but dammit- a woman should be able to put her shoes on herself! So- I’m thinking first, if she wants a sandal, she could wear these cork soled pair I got in her size as soon as I was aware of her current condition; nothing else felt quite as good while I was expecting- And anyway, if she doesn’t like those, she could try these Water 7 specialties. They’re famous Worldwide, but it’s a fame they well deserve, considering their comfort. I wear my pair as slippers. (And yes, they exist because Mom was sentimental about her old friend, and Mrs. Stitchworthy had a few designs floating around and… apparently they’re favored by Seafolk who’re learning to walk on land. Tom’s Shoes exist because the man called Old Tom was beloved by his family and friends.)

Concerning her pants… I don’t like the way she’s on the verge of muffining out of her pants right now, nevermind how things are going to go in a few weeks. I’m thinking the traditional Est fisherman’s pants should be just about perfect, dark blue to start and if she likes them I’ll make her a pair in every color she wants. Perhaps athleisure wear like Zoro? Really, whatever she’s comfortable in- I was most comfortable in skirts, but Nami doesn’t really like the flowing kind of garment I found to be most comfortable…

As far as breast support goes, for now I’ll let her use of swimsuit tops go, but I’m going to start giving her sleeping options- the breasts get bigger as the pregnancy goes on, and it’s not uncommon for the breasts to be a whole two pounds heavier and two cup sizes larger by the end of things. Honestly, it’s odder that my own breasts aren’t larger, although I suppose my illness- No, call it by Name, Mab. My psychotic and depressive breaks and subsequent long recovery does account for the fluctuations in my body fat index. Although really, my dissatisfaction with my breasts has nothing to do, really, with their size or shape, but rather my own deep seated issues -which I am doing my best to address, of course.

Concerning Nami’s Witchy clothing: the jumpsuit is much like mine, in that it bends and stretches with the wearer, no matter how their body changes. Cloudsilk, is, of course, the normal fabric for such garments; and hers is without reproach, although she might want some kind of pocket or belt with pouches, depending on how her post-natal exploration of the Weather Arts goes. Similarly, I can’t do anything to her cloak; it’s already perfected for who she is and what she’s going to do, I think. I can, of course, change it as she likes, but I think she’s going to stick with the classic look. The only thing I can really think to add is some sort of baby-carrying sling, and that’s really just a length of fabric she likes the feel of and some belt rings, which I have at the ready. I suppose I might as well make one for Zoro, and perhaps just a regular spare, as babies are messy, no matter what kind they are.

Ah, I shall have to remember to start making the various Baby clothes.

Right.

Usopp has his old-fashioned Skuan Cavalry uniform, of course- not what he started with, but the slightly better suit… I think?

I know he considered most of the more complicated, better gear sets to be hopelessly ostentatious, but… I don’t know. I suppose the most basic gear sets are such because you can really use any sort of material in their construction, making it easier for the campaigner to keep themselves outfitted.

And then, of course, there’s his leisure wear: his boots - which don’t change outfit to outfit, and a pair of very loose, very sturdy, very carefully lined overalls - or rather, the most basal layer of his Skuan Cavalry Uniform.

The Boinsea is a Summer Archipelago; it’s not just one island that’s directly from the hottest portions of Hell, it’s fucking all of them. Except for the Winter Islands, of course, because that would be too easy. Oh god, and the hat.

I don’t know who let him have that… that… thing - it’s not even that it’s a bad hat, it just looks so god-awful on him! With his little beard thing, and the hair, and the hat- I’m reminded of my brothers every time I see Usopp, and that’s in the good way, and in the “oh god what the hell is he wearing” way. So. Yay? I mean, when he bothers to braid it down, it’s lovely, and he does have the most stunning collection of traditionally romantic Este hair pins and hair combs I’ve ever seen in my life. Usopp keeps them in a lovely basket he traded Nami some things for. Mark, apparently, believes in showering his loved ones with adornments.
Sanji almost exclusively wears double breasted suits. Now, a double breasted suit is just about the easiest way to show off the physique while still looking classic, masculine, and just a bit military- when done right, of course. The shoulders are the most important part of the jacket- everything else can be tailored and hemmed and so on, but… in essence, the shoulders of a suit jacket are the keel of a ship. Anyway, the seams of his jackets at the shoulder must correspond to his natural shape; the collar should rest against his shirt collar, with no gaps or bunching when he turns to the side. The pitch of his jacket’s sleeves needs to correspond with his natural stance so the fabric doesn’t twist or wrinkle in odd ways. Well, that’s the basics, anyway.

Double breasted jackets have peak lapels, which make the chest look wider and create an hourglass shape. Back in the day these lapels were ultra-wide, but today’s more modern versions are on the understated side. Really, Sanji goes both ways on his lapels- some days, he’s feeling on the flamboyant side and wants great big lapels, and some days he’s feeling rather conservative and wants something slimmer. Concerning the torso, classic jackets of the style are cut in a more boxy, loose shape. While I would like to cut his suit jackets slimmer, and closer to his sides, as that would be more flattering; he needs more movement than that will really allow. -Cloudsilk has a lot of movement in it, true, and it stretches wonderfully but it is not the cloth to use in a suit jacket. Too much cling.

Still, his jacket doesn’t pull when buttoned and the lapels always lay flat. I can do that much, at least. (When it comes to fit, too tight is just as unflattering as too big, after all.) Sanji likes the traditional six external button style for his jacket, which he can wear comfortably due to his overall height and torso length. Generally speaking, double breasted suits look best when they’re buttoned closed- but as with all fashion, there are always exceptions.

A double breasted suit jacket is typically a bit longer in order to create space for the big lapel and complicated button motif, and to balance out the look. The jacket ought not be too long- it just passes the crotch-line of Sanji’s trousers at its longest and hits the middle of his zipper at it’s shortest- because he has more than one suit, of course. His jackets lay flat around his hips; and if the vents pull open, the jacket is too small.

Finally, the pants: flat-front pants are perfectly acceptable, if not preferred, and the cuff at the bottom is antiquated. He prefers single color shirts of the long sleeve, long collar variety, and usually wears plain color ties- although he does enjoy the occasional amusement of a paisley or silk tie. For hotter and more humid days, he has a selection of shorts and capri-length pants, which he pairs with his shirt and jacket of choice. We still wear our matching sleep sets we got in Water 7, although he does sometimes wear a shirt and a pair of boxers if it’s hot.

I’m considering making more sleepshirts; something a bit more… I’d honestly like a chemise, now that I think of it. That’s how I slept as a child, you see- a cotton or linen or sometimes wool-blended chemise with nothing at all underneath; now that’s what I call comfort.

I’ll add it to my list.

He wears black socks almost exclusively, although he does have various dress socks, all in silk, of course. His shoes are the normal Derby, as, much like me, once he finds a pair he likes in a style he likes, those are The Shoe of choice. He does have more than his daily blue-black pair, however- he has a brown pair, a flat black pair, and a yellow pair. I’m not sure why he wanted yellow ones, but they’re not mine and I didn’t make them.

(Ah, yes, and we’ve moved from normal women’s outerwear to lacy undergarments almost exclusively. The man knows what I like and is willing to entertain my fetishes, which is really all I can ask for. I do love him so. Lace! Ruffles! Strappy numbers! Latex! PENCIL SKIRTS!
My new clothing is really the same as it ever was- jump suits, leotards, leather pants, lacy panties in every color, backless everything I can get away with.

Brassieres, as my breasts got bigger, which- well, it’s nice that, after all my training finally released all those pregnancy hormones, my breasts finally became a bosom. They’re proportionate to my body; not melons like Robin and Nami have, more like… mangoes. Juicy, bouncy, mangoes. Sanji likes them a lot.

Leather kung-fu shoes, flat boots, socks made of silk...

Oh, alright, let’s get detailed.

I have tight jumpsuits with interesting backs that cling snug to my skin and cute print jumpsuits that go all the way to my toes, loose and soft and some go even below my toes, they’re lovely! I have plunge neck jumpsuits with wide legs in stiff fabrics, and I have halter top jumpsuits in flowing fabrics. I have formal lace jumpsuits, and formal jumpsuits in two-tones with a v-neck and wrap-style upper, jumpsuits cut sharp like a suit, jumpsuits cut soft like a chiffon dress and dazzled at the bodice; and I have formal jumpsuits that are exercises in minimalism and elegance. I have jumpsuits you can see right through in places; and jumpsuits that expose no more than my simple shirt and pants combination does, yet is all the more alluring for it; jumpsuits that are asymmetrical; jumpsuits that are symmetrical; velour and lace and one that’s really a dress in silhouette, with how the legs are cut. Polka dots; Chiffon; Full-cut; Printed.

Latex, for my husband's pleasure; Leather, for my own.

And a work jumpsuit, for the studio.

I have jumpsuits in every conceivable cut and style, print and fabric.

Leotards, for training or when it’s hot; mostly, just underwear I can pull on if I can’t be bothered with underwear and a brassiere that day, or if I need another layer, or a layer less; best for hot weather, or skirts.

New leather pants, which I made myself this time- my old unisex adjustables got worn right through during the Separation, and I still need leather pants. Light armor is a must at high speed.

Brassieres are one of the few things I’m okay with having made specially for me- sometimes, anyway. The few I have that I didn’t make myself are extremely high quality versions of the restrictive garment, while mine are more… Ergonomic. I’ve almost perfected a brassiere that completely arrests the motion of the breast in motion; Bryony, my beta tester, really likes the new one I’ve come up with, but until it’s absolutely perfect, I won’t allow her to wear it. Robin and Nami also tried the new sporty kind of brassiere I’ve been making, and are very interested. I’ll have to start patenting things soon…

Leather boots in the Farnort style, with increasingly tough and insulated boots the colder and more cruel the weather becomes. I’ve made galoshes for myself and the entire crew, as there are days when you just don’t want wet feet, dammit; or your shoes don’t protect quite enough. I, personally, finally got myself a new pair of bunny boots; while I don’t do ultra-high atmosphere maneuvering anymore, the sheer insulation of the boots is enough to ensure I added a pair for myself, and the rest of my crew. No frostbite.

All my jewelry is the same as it ever was; I got my charnellements lightened so I can wear them all the time. They were solid gold, if you can believe it; now, they’re much lighter, being hollow. They’ve also got runes of protection and return if stolen or lost imbued in them, so-no, Mother. I will not forget thee. I also got my spin-rings coated; they aren’t flat ivory now, they’re a lovely 24 karat gold-coated set of fourteen.

Really, the only thing that’s different about me personally is I’ve started wearing my hair short again, like when our adventure together started - I can only stand to have my hair so long for a time, before I simply must cut it back. New-old glasses- it’s nice to have my glasses back, I suppose. And if anyone asks, I wear the weird shit I wear because I can and no one can stop me. So far, the weirdest thing I’ve made myself is the jeans with the PVC plastic cutouts, but they honestly aren’t that bad-especially once I dug out the bug stickers. Bug stickers make everything better.

More interestingly, my studio is starting to become a bit… interesting. People give me things when they get my help, and I don’t want to just throw away the things they give me, so… my studio’s starting to look more and more Witchy, which is odd because… well, Stitchwitches are very humble, frankly, and… I guess the Taxidermy Bananagator Petunia who Hangs from the Ceiling was a Sign.

Clothing. Talk about Clothing, Mab.

Chopper is much the same, but he’s wearing brighter colors now, and a shirt, and his hat is new. His fully human form is a little different- apparently he can look like whatever he feels like? I don’t know, there are Rumble Balls involved for the weirder shit. Mostly, he’s a Doctor and his Doctor’s Pack is bigger on the inside without the use of a Devil Fruit. I can’t explain more than that. Trade Secret.

Robin has a very elegant, even sexy style. She’s always been mature, of course, but it’s really nice to see her loosening up and embracing more relaxed styles. I honestly don’t have much to say about Robin- she puts in her requests, and they’re generally very simple. I don’t have to invent an entire wardrobe for her at the drop of a pin; she knows what she likes, she knows what she looks good in, and she has the body-confidence to wear whatever she likes.

Franky hasn't changed at all, the jerk.

Mark has an eclectic style. He wears boxers or boxer briefs in all colors, then either Est fisherman pants or, more often, dark grey or brown harem pants. Bright red boots that he always has to wash and polish after breakfast, and thick white socks; jutti shoes if it’s a less heavy working day, or if he’s going to bed. He’s not terribly adventurous with his sock choices, unlike Usopp, who collects character socks; or even Sanji, who has yet to meet a print he won’t wear.

There’s his gun belt, which hasn’t changed much at all- other than replacing the leg ties because his thighs are much more muscular and thick now. His ammo bag sits at the small of his back, and is more or less exactly what I first designed for him those years ago internally. His purse is still shaped like a fish; and his hat is one of the largest fedoras I’ve ever seen.
His shirts are a different matter- he actually prefers blouses, and particularly likes high collars and boat neck shirts, all in white. One piece shirts with maybe one button at the collar and none or one per sleeve is preferred to full on button up shirts; and he’s simply enamored of various kinds of cufflinks.

I assume that in his travels, he was inducted into one of the secret societies of the Djinn; he certainly wears bronze jewelry now, so I assume he was accepted into the fold. He has also taken to wearing wide belts, or rather waist cinchers in a lurid red leather- they match with his boots, so I’m inclined to ignore it.

Taffy… it’s most correct to say that Taffeta’s battle costume aesthetic has taken over her regular wardrobe. Her daily wear takes quite a few cues from Sanji, but where my husband has a very old-fashioned and elegant military flare to his wardrobe, Taffy prefers a more modern, avant-garde approach.

She alternates between very floral-lace seafoam underwear sets, wine red underwear sets, and the sport bra and singleton underwear mix-n-match sets that I made for her on request; after buying the underwear, first. Some things it’s just easier to purchase when the merchants come around, and that was a rather long week for training, anyway.

She’s always worn loose socks in the school-girl fashion, though which kind changes from day to day. She has a medical/sewing kit on one side and a knife and lockpick set on the other; underneath her socks, of course. There are perks to obscuring the shape of one’s entire ankle, I suppose.

Her shirts are uniformly backless to accommodate her wings, long sleeve (as she prefers), with a surgeon’s cuff- in case she has to go guts deep on a man, she can save her shirt sleeves. Hopefully. Her vests are also quite uniform, utilizing the principle of asymmetry to create a visually interesting line across her body. She has them in black, dove grey, navy blue, and dark brown, and each of them has a pocket large enough for one of Bryony’s specialty Den Den Mushi.

Her sword belt is a fairly simple affair, quite different from Zoro’s method of sword carry- a jian is not a katana, after all. She did keep the sageo rope tied around the scabbard, as it allows her just one more tool if she needs it, and is a mark of her respect to Zoro’s teaching of her.

Midwifery Lotus Badges come in various styles- both she and I got ours changed for the belt buckle style, as it fits our aesthetics and lifestyles quite a bit more. Taffy wears hers on her sword belt- mine is on my tactical belt. This is not problematic, as we both wear these belts every day- more importantly, our pin badges are still on our persons, though hidden; the belt buckles are merely in addition to our traditional stamps of honor.

She wears either bootcut dark wash jeans, or wide leg tuxedo pants, black, of course. If she’s wearing the jeans, she’ll also be wearing some kind of braces, and those are always hidden under her vests- suffice to say, they’re either brown or black. The tuxedo pants fit her differently, and generally don’t require quite the same level of support to stay where they should be on her body- and it’s not quite a matter of fit, the jeans, I mean. To allow her the kind of movement she needs, her jeans have to be just enough oversize that they don’t quite cling the way they ought; thus, the braces.

After quite a bit of consternation, Taffy finally picked a pair of shoes that pleased her fashionable heart and her sneaky sensibilities both- a pair of ankle boots, really. Not my first choice, but then again, I don’t have to wear them- and they were made for her specifically, they aren’t off the rack boots. She has a pair of creepers for when she wants to be a bit more inconspicuous. Taffy, unless she’s actually hidden, is not inconspicuous.
Finally, bow ties- she doesn’t always wear them, mind, but when she does she has a large variety to choose from. She likes ribbons, as an aside. Her most casual outfit proper is actually her swimsuit top, alongside her most casual bottoms, her boardshorts, with a pair of canvas sneakers if wading is on the agenda.

Taffeta is not a casual person- she’s a joker, and a prankster, a lovely friend and stalwart companion- but she is not casual about anything. Even her use of canvas sneakers as wading shoes is a matter of practicality more than anything else.

Bryony wrestled fiercely with what she wanted to convey with her clothing- after she outgrew her original choice of bikini and translucent skirt, she went through several permutations of very different styles before finally finding one that mostly works for her.

Because of the size of Bryony’s breasts, she cannot fight to her full effectiveness without wearing a compression sports bra. It’s nothing to do with gender- really, it’s to do with the physical motions required by kickboxing. Breasts that are fat get in the way, frankly. She prefers a racerback, as it spreads the weight distribution in a way that regular brassiere style sports bras do not. Which is not to say she doesn’t have normal bras- she does, of course- merely that her everyday workhorses are her various racerback sports bras. She has them in a variety of prints, along with matching underwear- and she does not like panties, she wears boyshorts or nothing.

Bryony likes crop tops, but mostly of the simpler kind. She does not like- and subsequently, will not wear anything with- spaghetti straps, tube tops, halter tops, and what she calls “floating sleeves”. I call them something else, but blow me down if I can remember what...

She wears black harem pants, but of a longer and fuller cut than Mark’s. Once she started wearing harem pants, she didn’t want to stop- they seem to fulfil her longing for flowing garments while also offering various practicalities- pockets, separation of the legs, and so on- that she now has pairs in tan, and red, and in exciting prints as well.

She has three distinctly different jackets- the clear one that’s basically a rain jacket, the tan one that’s embroidered, and the one with the fun print. Luffy is not allowed, on pain of Pain, to wear them- and it’s not me that would be dishing out the pain, it’s Bryony. Training for two years made both of them stronger for sure, but… Bryony will probably always be just a bit stronger than Luffy, physically. Just a hair. Or at least, she will be in her legs, which is what she’d use to hit him if he gets meat juices on her clothes again…

Oh, yes. Most importantly of all- Bryony tolerates only one kind of sandal, and all other shoes can rot for all she cares. She’ll go barefoot before she wears a pair of shoes that she doesn’t like- which I honestly admire. Nothing worse than having blisters on your feet.

Brook… Brook’s clothing is odd. Where everyone else has physical flesh that catches and pulls on fabric, giving clothing it’s weight- Brook is literally a skeleton. For him, I find myself designing things that look good on hangers or simply hanging because that’s basically what his body is, and that’s what clothing on him does. It’s honestly a pain in the ass- easy to cut and sew, I suppose, but a pain in the ass none the less. He likes vibrant prints, single breasted suit jackets, long sleeve shirts, cravats, and top hats. He’s like a dead, musical, Cousin Sabo.

Honestly, he’ll take whatever I make him, so I tend to grab prints I think he’ll like, and then just-stitch clothing for him. Pain in the ass though it is, his gratitude at my giving him new clothing to choose from is really quite heartening- he was rather a dandy in life, and having a larger wardrobe to play around with brings joy to his heart. Except he, of course, has no heart. Hmhmhmhmhmhm!

Skull joke!

Not much to his wardrobe, really. Although- he does require several extra pairs of socks, as he is literally a skeleton and doesn’t have feet, merely foot bones to walk around on. Doubling and tripling up on his socks seems to have solved that issue, although I do wonder… Ah, I’m getting distracted.

Gurry has an eclectic style that really reminds me of my sister, Del. He wears clothing from thrift stores more often than not, and is absent-minded enough in pursuit of his art that all of his clothing has some kind of minor oil paint stain on it. The only thing of interest is his fur peplum-shrug, something I haven’t really considered before. The Fae tradition has the traveler’s cloak being made of feathers, after all- but the Amazonian tradition is for fur or leather, depending on male or female. Otherwise, it’s fairly similar day to day- high mandarin collars on sleeveless shirts, warrior’s armbands, leather vambraces, loose cut trousers tucked into leather boots; nothing really stands out in his cold weather gear.

His warm weather gear is cut off jean short shorts over brightly colored lycra shorts, strappy sandals, and tank tops. This is also what he considers painting clothes- with the addition of an apron, of course. His colors are mostly tan, with some plain greys and blues thrown in.

While I’ve been going over the wardrobe, things have been happening on the ship- people leaving, getting supplies, returning; a veritable flurry of activity. Hmm. While I’m here- Shakky might have- Miss Shakky is pregnant again- how do I know that? Nevermind, she is, I can feel it… I’ll get her some things too, might as well.

I get up, stretch, and amble up into the kitchen where Sanji, Gurry, and Taffy are hard at work- Sanji is busy making various stocks and things we’ll need for the journey ahead, bread dough starter and such, whilst Taffy and Gurry are helping prep things. Taffy is also making some of Chopper’s medicines into candy- drops, and so on. Gurry is doing prep-work so Sanji can actually cook; washing dishes, mostly, until Sanji trusts him with one of the kitchen knives.

“Need to go visit Miss Shakky, and get a few things- I’m reminded of a conversation we had a long time ago, about massage?”

“Ah. Right, we never did get that manual…”

“Mm. I need to get a few other things too- it’s been two years anyway, all the makeup I have needs to be replaced… Need anything while I’m out?”

“Uh… New hairclips?”

“Gator-clips this time, or d’you still want the old standard?”

“Gator clips. I really didn’t think my hair was so thick…”

“Mm. Taffy, Gurry, you need anything?”

“I’m good, Mab.”
“Ah… a set of watercolors and some paper I can play around with? I have money for it- here-”

“Ah, thank you Gurry. Do you have brushes?”

“Um-”

“I’ll see what I can get for you. Be back later, everyone. -Ach, nearly forgot the most important thing-”

And then I step alongside Sanji, nudge him with my shoulder. He tilts his head my way and lets me press a kiss to his mouth, returns it with such simmering joyful pleasure- god I fucking love him.

Anyway, I’ve got shopping to do.

I’m really glad I have bullshit Devil Fruit powers, otherwise this shopping trip would be a terrible hassle.

So there’s things I desperately wanted when I was pregnant- or rather, things I was given that I don’t have anymore and Nami’s going to want. Let’s see… first stop is the bookstore, I think.

First, it’s about time to get a manual or two about sexual positions and things you can do in the bedroom. Sanji’s into some kinky things- nothing to get arrested over- and I’d like us to have resources to do it safely. Also, manuals about massage, including what’s more or less a textbook on it because Nami’s going to need the support and that sounds like Zoro-work (with some help from the rest of us women, of course). Hm, a text on makeup and hair care, because Nami will want to be pampered… I already have the lounging set for Nami… And that should be it for the bookstore.

Next stop, crafts bazaar- not the one that sells crafts, the one that sells cool shit for crafts. Zoro made Nami’s necklace and their earrings, after all, and I like supporting such skills as they pop up. Oh, those are nice knitting needles- I’ll get a pair. Can never have too many knitting needles.

Why are they selling daily journals at the crafts bazaar? Nevermind, I’ll take a bunch of them. Oh, this is a nice journal… Snoogles are buy one get one free today only? I’m sold!

Oh, so this is where the rest of the bazaar is- ah, point and print film stock, the rig that goes with it, and a few albums because I meant to take pictures but I didn’t. Oho, a big assorted basket of- yes, I recognize the brand- Lush does good work- and Nipple Cream. Quadruple up on that nipple cream. Nami’s about to learn her some things.

Damn, second buy one get one free sale today- I’ll take one of everything, yes, everything, this is my card- yes, thank you, you don’t have to give it to me free, I’ll purchase it. Thank you! Onwards!

Several spray bottles for fabric freshener because it’s going to stink, I remember my time in the maternity ward. Aha, notions! Okay, I need a big box of safety snaps, Nami doesn’t like the new disposable sanitary napkins- most people I know don’t- and the big bottle of witch hazel oil. Six bolts of flannel- no one in our crew is going to be running out of sanitary pads for years if I can help it.

Three new laundry hampers, for reasons that will become obvious eventually. Aha! Portable hand sanitizer! With the holders! Because people will want to touch the New Baby and Nami won’t know where those dirty bastards have been. It’s actually just fine for her to stare at someone trying to touch her newborn with their dirty, filthy hands like a crazy ass psycho killer until they use the hand sanitizer, and only then allow that person access to her precious, mewling critter. Yes, I mostly mean Luffy. I want one for Nami, one for Zoro, and a few more just in case.

I don’t actually like making diaper bags, so- if she really wants me to make one for her, I will. However, I think… dammit, I’ll have to make her one. She’ll want all the secret pockets and mommy-hidey-holes I can cram into a bag, and have it look cute, and she won’t know she wants this but she wants the removable liner that can be thrown into the washing machine. I know she does.

Sanji, I’m buying a coffeemaker.

What!? You don’t-
Sanji, we’re going to need more coffee than the Norten press provides. I prefer pressed coffee, but- we need one of the big drip machines.

Uuuuugh.

Trust me?

Yeah, fine. Does the grinder do-?

It does, I’ll show you.

Alright, honeybee. Get one with like, a timer or something; we’ll set it up I guess.

Service and Sacrifice, Sanji.

Aye. Service and Sacrifice, Mab.

And that’s it for the shopping. WAIT NO TELL A LIE- some of these newfangled Audiobooks- yes, two sets of everything, no I’m not kidding- with the nicest, comfiest headphones you have. Yes, I’m completely serious. Pair of hospital grade baby nail clippers- Chopper has a pair, of course, but it’s nice to have spares and I’ll teach her how to use them. Two big bottles of dry shampoo. A “dim” type flashlight that can be worn around the wrist or kept in the basket of changing supplies. Carpet cleaner- the stuff for pets, not the regular shit. Works just fine on regular fabrics- babes are critters, after all, it takes a good few years for a baby to start being “human”. Peri bottle, since we don’t have a bidet and I know Miss Shakky doesn’t- babies hurt coming out, and stuff’s likely to tear, and all the stuff that comes out when a person menstruates has to come out after a baby is born and it takes a month and- peri bottle. Because she will not want to wipe that shit and frankly I don’t blame her; I didn’t either.

And finally, at the baby specific store- Franky wants to make the changing table, but he’s never actually been around a baby before and I know what I’m about. I’ll allow it, but first- just in case- I’ll just get the diaper pail… really, it’s a small home-kitchen trash can with a waterproof bag on the inside and yes, I do want the replacement set. I’ll get the twenty-four mixed pack of diapers- these are too big but they’re all they’ve got, I’ll make more in the appropriate sizes later-

Aha! This store sells fabric!

Okay, here’s the thing.
There are only so many fabrics I can actually make— and bamboo fleece isn’t one of them. Bamboo fleece is an excellent fabric for cloth diapers and soakers. It’s quick to grab moisture and holds a lot of liquid. It’ll shrink about ten percent when washed, and its felting up properties help give it good absorbency value. It is sewn smooth sides out, 2 layers thick, for the best absorbing, quick-to-dry soaker pads or diaper inserts. Cut into squares of appropriate size for baby washcloths and wipes. Also wonderful for blankets, receiving and otherwise, and snuggly-soft clothing. And it takes dye beautifully. Since I’m over here, get the hemp too, which isn’t as fluffy soft, but is even more absorbent.

I buy four bolts of both fabrics in their natural colors. Babies are messy and I know my Captain- the second he feels the bamboo fabric, he’s going to want something to cuddle with. I can already sense it. As for the hemp- it has it’s uses too.

More lavender oil, and chamomile just in case Nami’s nose says no to lavender- it might, it happens, just be ready for it. And some dye packets, and the wax resist tjanting pen-things. Yeees. Oh, that’ll be fun. Ah- travel wet bags. Useful for more than just diapers, honestly, we are pirates and swimming is a thing that happens…

And I want two of the diaper sprayers. And the cloth-diaper safe diaper cream. And it’s a real pain in the ass that this store only had flat diapers, but it’s kinda cool that they have a multitude of diaper covers- which I’ve never made, so… I’ll buy thirty and split ‘em. I’m pretty sure I can reverse-engineer some that Nami really loves...

Let me explain.

First cue first; start with diaper materials. Obviously, waterproof diapers are preferred for a number of reasons, especially if you’re at sea. Cloth diapers- which are the World standard, no matter how advertising tries to market the new disposables- actually have quite a few choices for how you achieve this waterproofing feat.

Polyurethane laminate (PUL) is the most common material used in cloth diapers. PUL is made by laminating a lightweight polyester interlock knit fabric to a polyurethane film of one or two millimeters thickness. (Polyurethane is a durable and flexible form of plastic. Thermoplastic urethane (TPU) is a specific type of polyurethane formed with a heat-bonding process.) What matters is PUL is found in pocket diapers, AiOs, Ai2s, and diaper covers, as well as in pail liners and wetbags. I don’t like it for diapers myself but some people swear by it.

Merino wool is highly favored as a pull-on style cover for overnight use. Forget your preconceived notions of hot, itchy sweaters- merino wool is naturally antimicrobial, regulates temperature beautifully, and feels like cashmere. (If, however, the baby doesn’t like wool- which happens- I can substitute for a silk-heavy blend of silk and angora.) When washed gently with lanolin, wool becomes highly water repellant, while still maintaining its softness. I actually lanolize all the wool socks and most of the wool sweaters- it does tend to smell a bit like wet dirt when our heavy woollen garments get wet, but Zoro actually finds the smell soothing. Well, he did spend his formative years on a sheep farm, so it’s not really a surprise. (Ah, yes- sometimes wool covers are referred to as wool soakers, which is highly confusing when one is trying to learn cloth diaper jargon. My advice is to simply go with the flow.)

Finally, the newest of the fabrics is artificial fleece. It can be used as a cover, particularly for overnight use. Although it isn’t quite as stretchy or breathable as merino wool, artificial is one hundred percent polyester, meaning it’s much less expensive, can be machine washed, dries quickly, and doesn’t require lanolization. I don’t like it- I have ethical and environmental concerns about the production of artificial fleece, and when I did the burn test on a sample piece, it melted into hot, plastic slag. I won’t be using it on any baby clothing.

If we’re using prefolds or flats, we can use a separate fastener like a Snappi or Boingo to secure the diaper around the baby. However, most modern cloth diapers have built-in closures for convenience.

Hook & loop closures (specific brands include Aplix, Velcro, and TouchTape) make cloth diapers just as easy and quick to put on as disposables, allowing for the most precise fit around baby’s waist. However, even with special laundry tabs meant to keep the hook & loop sides together during washing, rogue unfastened tabs in the washing machine are fairly common and will cause early wear and tear on an entire load of cloth diapers.

Snaps are by far the more popular closure option for cloth diapering parents (75% to 80% prefer snaps). Although it may take a few extra seconds to fasten snaps in the right place when changing baby, they simply hold up better over time. In addition, snaps are much more difficult for older babies to unfasten, cutting down on those spontaneous toddler streaking events.

One major reason that cloth diapers have become popular again is the use of “stay-dry” fabrics, which keep moisture off baby’s skin without the use of chemicals. Although many babies don’t seem to mind a wet diaper, stay-dry materials are useful in preventing diaper rash and keeping baby’s skin smelling fresh.

These fabrics are all 100% polyester:

Microfleece was the first stay-dry material used in cloth diapers. It’s a bit stretchy and feels wonderfully soft. Over time, it may show wear by pilling a bit, as it is a cloth made with synthetic fibers. Suedecloth is incredibly smooth and does not pill. However, as a synthetic fiber cloth, it does not play nicely with all detergents. Athletic wicking jersey is durable and extremely lightweight with a “meshy” feel, which makes it work especially well for fast wetters.

The important thing to remember about stay-dry materials is that they don’t absorb wetness – that’s why they’re supposed to keep baby feeling dry. If you pour water on any of these fabrics, the water will just sit for a little while before soaking through. That doesn’t mean there’s something wrong - stay-dry fabrics work when the diaper is secured snugly. The pressure of baby’s weight against the diaper and the flow of urine force the wetness to pass through the stay-dry layer where it is absorbed by another material underneath.

I don’t like these because stay dry fabrics really only work with pressure- and that’s not what diapers do in their natural state, really. It works right up to when you actually need it to work, in my experience. -If you’ve gone to all the trouble of using a cloth diaper system, you really… I think of it like this: what are the most comfortable panties or boxers you own? That breathe the best and so on? I prefer a cotton panty myself, while Sanji likes silk- my point being, stay dry fabrics just don’t work as advertised.

As far as absorbency is concerned, if one is using cloth diapers; a selection can be made from a wide array of fabrics based on their feel, level of absorbency, and environmental sustainability.

Cotton was the only choice of diaper material for many years, and is still used today. Many parents prefer organic cotton, as industrial cotton tends to involve heavy use of pesticides, herbicides, and insecticides.
Hemp is one of the most environmentally friendly natural fibers today and is quickly becoming a popular choice for cloth diapers. Alone, hemp is such a rough-feeling material that it’s typically blended with cotton for diapering purposes. Industrial hemp production is permitted in Nort but restricted in Sout.

Bamboo has a silky, luxurious feel. It is highly promoted as a sustainable fabric because grows like a weed (which it is!) without requiring the use of pesticides or other chemical agents. (You may also hear that bamboo has anti-bacterial properties, but that seems to be a questionable claim; I’m considering it as “good” because of how clean bamboo fabric can get. And we used it in the Skuan Maternity Wards all the time, so.)

Microfiber refers to ultrafine fibers (about 1/100th of a strand of human hair). The microfiber typically used in modern cloth diapers is “split”, meaning if you could see the cross-section at a microscopic level, it would resemble an asterisk. I’ve been playing around with electrospinning- I think I can make a spider-silk microfiber, which would open entirely new possibilities in cloth for me...

Anway.

There are four kinds of diaper systems- and yes, it’s not quite enough to just throw a cloth diaper on a baby and call it done. There’s a method to these things.

A pocket diaper consists of two separate pieces. The pocket (sometimes referred to as the sleeve) is the piece that fits around the baby and looks like a diaper, with elasticized legs, a closure around the waist, and a waterproof outer material. Sewn to the waterproof outer layer of the pocket is a soft layer of “stay-dry” fabric such as microfleece or microsuede that sits next to baby’s skin. Either or both ends of the pocket have an opening to allow the insert to be stuffed inside.

When the diaper is changed, the insert should be pulled out of the pocket and both pieces tossed in the diaper pail. (In other words, the pocket should not be re-used with a fresh insert).

An Ai2 is another two-piece system in which an insert (sometimes referred to as a soaker pad) is simply laid inside a cover (sometimes referred to as a shell). The beauty of this design is that the waterproof cover can be re-used with a fresh insert as long as the cover stays clean. Many all-in-two systems have snaps that anchor the insert to the shell to prevent it from moving out of place. The insert or soaker is useless without the cover, as it can’t be fastened directly onto the baby.

A hybrid diaper is a specific type of Ai2 system in which the manufacturer offers both cloth and disposable inserts that fit with their cover/shell. This allows you to use disposables in stealth mode if you’re on vacation or need a short laundry break.

An AiO is simply a diaper with the waterproof exterior and the absorbent interior pieces sewn together. (I prefer to call AiOs “one-piece” diapers to avoid confusion with another cloth diaper term you’ll hear frequently, “one-size”. One-size refers to a diaper that has an adjustable rise and/or adjustable elastic so that it can be used on babies of a very wide weight and age range. Just about any type of cloth diaper system can be “one-size” – you can find one-size pockets, one-size covers, one-size fitteds, and yes, one-size all-in-ones.) The most appealing aspect of AiOs is that there is never a need to stuff or snap inserts as with pockets and Ai2s. Various brands of AiOs may look very different on the inside – some have all layers sewn down flat, while others have pieces of the soaker pad that flap, hang, or fold in different ways to allow for a faster drying time. Some even offer a pocket opening where you can stuff some extra absorbency if needed.
Some might group these types of cloth diapers with “all-in-twos”, but I think they are different enough to deserve a separate category.

Unlike the inserts/soakers used in Ai2 systems, flats, prefolds, and fitteds can be fastened directly on baby so that they will stay on without the use of a cover. Many families use these types of diapers for the sake of simplicity and affordability.

When they were babies, your mother and grandmother probably wore what we now call flats – large, thin pieces of cotton fabric that can be folded in many different ways (which may seem a bit like diaper origami).

If you were cloth diapered as a baby, you probably wore prefolds. Prefolds have three vertical sections with a thicker center section and only require tri-folding instead of the more complicated folding procedures necessary with flats. Also, if you like the idea of cloth diapers but don’t want to wash them yourself, prefolds are generally the type of cloth diaper provided by diaper services.

Fitted diapers are a more recent innovation, cut to fit the shape of a baby without any folding needed. They have elastic at the legs and may or may not have an integrated closure in the form of snaps, velcro, or ties.

Flats, prefolds, and fitteds all have one major thing in common: they are not waterproof.

Therefore, a separate cover is required unless you have a specific reason for wanting baby to go coverless. The cover can be used multiple times between washings, which is one of the reasons these types of cloth diaper systems are so inexpensive. Today’s covers are much more convenient than the pull-on plastic pants of yesteryear; plus, with the wide array of vibrant colors and darling prints available, your baby’s bottom can look just as adorable as any, more expensive, cloth diaper. I don’t like flats, but not because they’re not good diapers. They’re fine diapers. It’s just- do you know what nurses and midwives did first in training? Well, in Skua, we had to clean, wash, and fold flat diapers. Every day. For six months.

The things I have seen in the white cotton depths of a pediatric diaper will haunt me to my grave. - And the stench!

Anyway, since I’ve come this far I might as well go over the features. Yes, there are features, too.

Rise snaps are a grid of snaps on the front of a cloth diaper to allow its length to be adjusted as a baby grows – a common feature of “one-size” cloth diapers. For someone unfamiliar with modern cloth diapers (like basically everyone on the crew except for Taffy), looking at the front of a diaper with adjustable rise snaps can be intimidating due to the number of snaps. However, keep in mind that once the rise setting is adjusted to fit the baby, it’s best to leave it that way for quite a while – usually at least a few months – until baby has grown enough in length that the rise needs to be let out by one setting. You don’t have to un-snap the rise when you wash the diapers. Rise snaps are typically laid out in two to three columns and two to four rows.

Leg gussets are crescent-shaped, elasticized pieces added to the legs to provide extra protection from leaks. This feature is particularly appreciated by parents of babies who are not yet eating solid foods and may be prone to the occasional explosive diaper event.

A tummy panel is a narrow piece of waterproof material – PUL or TPU – on the top inside panel of a pocket or all-in-one diaper. This strip of waterproof material may help prevent leaks at the tummy, particularly for tummy-sleeping babies. Depending on how it is sewn, it may also help prevent inserts from bunching up at baby’s waistline.
Tummy elastic provides extra leak protection for tummy-sleeping babies. Although elastic in the waist at the back is common to all cloth diapers (which is what makes them so much more effective at preventing blowouts than disposables), elastic at the tummy isn’t quite as common.

Crossover snaps allow for a very small waist setting because the waist tabs can be cinched up tightly and fastened one over the other, similar to how most hook & loop closure diapers can be fastened. This is a particularly helpful feature in one-size diapers, allowing for a good fit on young babies.

Side snaps are a variation on the usual style of diaper fastening. On most diapers, the wings of the diaper wrap around from the sides to be fastened on top of the front panel (as shown in the above photos of crossover snaps). Side snaps, however, work so that the front of the diaper fastens over the wings, making a smooth front panel on the tummy. Some say that this can make it easier to pull pants over the diaper, which may be true if baby isn’t wearing a onesie. The downside to this construction is that it may take a little more finesse to fasten the diaper properly on your child, as you can’t easily see what you’re doing!

Adjustable elastic can be found in the legs or back of some diapers. Adjustable elastic allows for a truly customizable fit, preventing leaks around the legs for skinny babies and red marks from too-tight elastic for chubby babies.

Finally, the care of the diapers. Oh yes, there’s more.

The first reaction of many people to the idea of cloth diapers is that cleaning them at home will be disgusting and-or very time consuming. Guess what? Not true! Mostly; mostly not true.

Firstly, the Detergent.

Don’t let the decision paralyze you. Simply avoid anything with brighteners, softeners, bleach, or fragrances (although fragrance from essential oils is generally acceptable). By weeding out detergents with those additives you eliminate most of what’s on the shelf at your local conbini. Although it seems like a natural choice for baby items, avoid Dreft (which contains brighteners); however, Original Tide is recommended by several cloth diaper manufacturers. Feed stores often carry cloth-friendly, clean-rinsing detergents such as Country Save, Tom’s Soap, or Always Naturally. There are also many detergents made specifically for cloth diapers, including Rockin’ Green and SKWE-E-Z-CLEAN. Some prefer homemade laundry detergent; if you do this, just be careful to avoid recipes that call for grated soap, which is notorious for building up on diapers and may cause skin irritation.

Secondly, the Prepping.

“Prepping” refers to preparing new cloth diapers for their first use. The extent of prepping required depends on whether the diapers are made of natural or synthetic fibers.

Diapers made of synthetic materials (such as the typical pocket diaper with microfiber inserts) should be washed once with a small amount of detergent. Follow with an extra rinse.

Natural fibers (excluding wool, which has special care requirements) require repeated washing and drying to reach full absorbency. For the wash cycle, only a minimal amount of detergent is necessary since the items have not yet been used; for the drying, you can use the dryer on high heat as long as there is nothing in your load that contains PUL or elastic. After two wash/dry cycles, pour a small amount of water on the material. If the water soaks in immediately, you can begin using the diaper. Understand that it will continue to shrink and increase in absorbency over the next few uses, so if you do experience a leak, give it another chance. If the drops of water do not absorb immediately but bead up before soaking in, then repeat another wash/dry cycle.

Thirdly, the Regular Routine.

The best washing routine for your cloth diapers is one that is simple and regular (at least every 2 days). With a good, cloth-friendly detergent and enough water, you shouldn’t need to add any other products. Too many variables will just make it more complicated to troubleshoot down the road should you ever encounter problems with smells or rashes. The most important thing about washing cloth diapers is finding the right balance of enough detergent to get the diapers fully clean and enough water to fully rinse the detergent away.

First, do a short rinse cycle using cold or warm water; no detergent is necessary. Choose whatever load size setting you would normally use if you were just washing clothes.

Next, run a wash cycle using hot water and the recommended amount of detergent. Consider up-sizing the load setting. Don’t let your water temperature exceed 150 degrees, and don’t use the “sanitize” setting – extremely hot water is hard on the diapers.

Finally, add another rinse. Since many washing machines have an automatic setting for an extra rinse, this step may not even require any of your attention. However, during the time period when you’re still getting the hang of your wash routine, it’s a good idea to peek in the washer during the last rinse to make sure you don’t see any suds. If suds are present, rinse some more and make a note to use a little less detergent the next time.

You can put cloth diapers in the dryer if you’re in a hurry – just avoid using fabric softening sheets and the high heat setting. To get maximum longevity out of your diapers (and keep your electricity usage lower), hang them to dry.

Fourthly, the Placement.

Diapers are to be placed in these locations: in their spot near or under or in the changing table; in their pocket in the diaper bag when soiled; and in a basket separate from the towels during laundry.

And then there’s the fucking butt cream. You can’t just use any old whatever with a cloth diaper. You have to use cloth friendly ingredients. All of the “cloth friendly” ingredients should rinse away easily in regular the hot wash cycle of your washing machine (or washing, no judgement) without additional cleaning measures. These ingredients are not overly greasy or thick. They are best for preventative use-

Beeswax – locks in moisture; naturally anti-inflammatory, antibacterial, anti-allergenic, and germicidal; Vitamin E – high in antioxidants; benefits the skin by helping it retain its natural moisture content; Lanolin – a rich source of skin lipids; Shea butter – effective at repairing damaged skin due to high levels of natural antioxidants and essential fatty acids; Cocoa butter – a natural skin softener, high in Vitamin E; Aloe vera – cool and soothing; can reduce skin inflammations, itchiness, and blistering; Coconut oil – contains a unique combination of fatty acids that moisturize skin beautifully;
Olive oil – a gentle moisturizer for dry skin, containing Vitamin E, Vitamin A, and four different antioxidants; Grapeseed oil – aids with skin repair, as it has mildly antiseptic qualities; Jojoba oil – acts as a natural barrier to environmental allergens, and may help slow the growth of bacteria because of its anti-microbial properties.

I can use the regular laundry detergent with the baby fabrics, probably. Baby skin is very sensitive- if a rash develops- which it might or might not, who the fuck even knows- it could be any number of things. The thing I can control is the detergents and fabrics.

Finally, I’m getting subscriptions to a few magazines full of children’s fashions, buying the big look-books of children’s clothing for the past few centuries, and a big stack of on sale baby bodysuits in all the sizes they have available and more notions because I’m going to have to make more. Yes, I’ll take the variety packs of baby-safe fabrics, you fucking cutthroat shark bastards. Yes, just take my money, I wasn’t doing anything with it.

It’s fine.

God in heaven, I almost forgot the burp cloths! That would have been a mess- they’re basically just towels, but with cute patterns and designs on them, and yes I will make cool ones but dammit I want to have literally everything we might need ready to fucking go in the wardrobe before the baby gets here. Ah! Coolers! Little ones that are easy to carry around like purses- really, they’re lunch bags but yes, thank you, I’ll take twelve.

Seriously, spooky bullshit Devil Fruit powers make shopping like I do very easy and I will not discount their utility. Is it weird that I mostly use my bullshit Devil Fruit powers for efficiency and time saving stuff, rather than fighting? I mean, I have fighting skills with it, but… I really do just like seeing the expressions on people’s faces as I shove things that shouldn’t fit into my bag into my bag and have nothing more than the occasional misplaced noise escape. S’great fun, really.

Ah, and last on my list- I’ll talk to my crewmates when I get back. Now, onto Miss Shakky!

Oh, she’s changed it from a Bar to a Cafe? Right, Issun Walter- she must want to attract a different kind of crowd. And she’s changed the menu, too- the Hard Drinks list is as expensive as ever, but the Soft Drinks list is quite reasonable.

“Chairete, Miss Shakky.”

“Salaam, Miss Tailor. How’ve you been?”

“I can’t complain- how’re you?”

“Ah, well- expecting again, which is a little sooner than I’d like but, well, I missed Ray while he was gone quite a lot…”

“I understand. Really, I do. -ah, I brought some things for you, since I was out shopping
anyway…?”

“Like what?”

“Oh, a sprayer for your toilet, some other things you might want or need. You know. Stuff.”

“-You got me a sprayer!?”

“It was buy one get one free at a few places, and you know I can’t really resist a sale…”

“-Saa, just like Morgan. Thank you, Mab.”

“You’re welcome, Miss Shakky. I’ll just put things away for you, if that’s alright?”

“Um- sure…? It’s a bit, well-”

“I’m the oldest of ten girls total Miss Shakky, and I’m a midwife- got the badge and everything. There’s nothing you have that I haven’t seen.”

“Well. Well- hahaha, fine, go ahead.”

“Thank you.”

And then I go up to Miss Shakky, Old Ray, and Little Issun’s apartment, behind the Cafe, up the stairs. It’s a nice place; very green.

The apartment’s a bit of a hot mess, though- clean laundry all rumpled in baskets, garbage and dirt everywhere- the baby’s things are clean and spotless, and the kitchen work surfaces are spotless too, as are the weapons and guns and so on.

Return Beat: Dollperganger Step Twelve!

New Beat: Dollperganger Cleaning Crew!

CLEAN UP!

Check it-
The LIST:
Check it off!
Did that?
Check it off!
Uhn, did that one too!
Check it off!
Did that?
Check it off!
Uhn, did that one too!
Check it off!
Did that?
Check it off!
Uhn, did that one too!
Check it off!
Did that?
Check it off!

The last thing to do is make sure all the dishes are dry before I put them away.

End Beat: Dollperganger Cleaning Crew! Nice!

And now the apartment is clean; laundry folded in- haha, three laundry baskets! Dishes put away, new things neatly stored with the old so there’s no confusion- I even installed the sprayer for her.

Anyway, that’s that done and dusted- literally, in fact. Hmhmmhmmhm! -Honestly, though, the reason I stopped in, to see to Miss Shakky… She was Harri- Or Harry, the spelling isn’t precise, that letter doesn’t exist in the Common- Miss Shakky was Mother’s friend. And Mother is gone, now; so I’m checking on Miss Shakky to make sure she’s okay.

And she is, I think. I mean- her cafe has a small gang of preteen girls running around, one of whom has the unenviable job of child-wrangler, and Miss Shakky has set herself up a little empire of people she can boss around… I think she’s going to be okay.

I think she’s going to be fine.

I give Miss Shakky a hug, assure her that- yes, Taffy and I shall return for the birth of her second child. Old Ray does a spit-take when he hears that part of our conversation- ah.

“You hadn’t told him?”

“I was getting to it, just- I was a bit more concerned with other things.”

“Miss Shakky, boinking your husband is always a good idea, but- you really should find the time to tell him these things. He’s old, after all; surprises like this, while good in theory, can’t be healthy for him.”
I leave, smirk firmly on my face. Miss Shakky laughed so hard she had to start beating the counter to gain her composure back, to no avail; ach, shit. I sounded like Morgan there, didn’t I? Ah well.

It’s actually almost impossible to not, in some form or fashion, embody the best and worst parts of the people who made us who we are. It could be our looks, or our preferences; it could be our voices, or what we choose to say. It could even be the qualities of our mercy- the point is, no matter who or what you are, you were marked by the people that made you. It’s up to you to decide what that mark looks like- but it’s still there, a handprint on your heart.

Titania- brother, rapist, hated foe, prophet- he only went that far because he was Morgan’s favored heir. The Court requires a certain kind of person, of the one who sits the Throne. Either you bow to their wishes- becoming the monster in truth that Titania was- or you defy them, like me, and become your own kind of monster.

Still, because I knew him- because I knew Titania, I was changed for good. I mean- with Fairy twins, the thing of it is… there’s a good one, and a bad one. Always. It’s not a question of, of-nurture, it’s nature. There’s always a bad one, if the twins be Fairies. Titania was the bad one. So I had to be the good one.

You can’t imagine all the awful, awful things I don’t do because I’m the good one.

You simply can’t imagine.

So I’m back on the ship; things are being unpacked and rearranged at an astonishing pace. I spent, oh, a good three hours sorting all the things I bought, throwing things out in the dorms, putting new things away, labeling boxes and putting things away in storage for Nami until she has need of them…

And there are a few other things I know she’s going to need, so I put the appropriate crewmates on the job.

To Franky, I gave the job of making an auto-swing or bouncy chair; my notes on the subject were that it needed to have a horizontal swing action if at all possible, and it needed to be easy to clean and maintain. Then I handed off the list of requirements to Usopp, who was actually around newborn children for a few year’s and has a better idea of what might be useful in a bouncy chair.

To Chopper, I gave the job of creating hemorrhoid cream. Because Nami is going to need hemorrhoid cream, and possibly the other things that go with it. I’ll leave it at that.

To Usopp, I gave the job of creating a mobile for the crib- every mobile needs a crib, er, other way- every crib needs a mobile, if for no other reason than to keep demons and ghosts away from the baby. I’d offer the use of mine, but I didn’t actually have one.

To Sanji, I gave the job of- with Chopper’s nutritional guide in hand- creating one handed recipes Nami can eat. I also gave him the one handed recipe book, which he scoffed at before immediately beginning to read. He’s a food snob, and it’s adorable.
Anyway, the misery of pregnancy is starting to be felt; certain smells make Nami almost violently ill, such as brussel sprouts; others make her very horny as a sweaty post-training Zoro found out to his tired delight. Nami cannot drink coffee; she can’t drink any kind of alcohol (although, in a choice between a whiskey sour and toasted whitebread with butter and honey, I’d rather she have the whiskey sour); and the sex she can have is not the kind of sex she wants to have. It’s only going to get worse from here on in.

Zoro sent me with a missive for his Aunt and sisters; he wanted a jam jar full of dirt from the family farm, so his child’s feet will know where to return to. Roronoa Merriweather was very kind, and gave me Zoro’s old pig-doll, named Tusker.

So now Zoro has a whole family of soft pig friends, and a blanket he used to wrap himself in when he was Overwhelmed? Aha. He is a changeling and a Changeling, too. Interesting.

Anyway, the dirt was put in with the baby-birth box, quietly awaiting The Moment. Maybe I should find a bag? Decisions, decisions.

So we’ve got about five more days until Captain will have us set out, and things are starting to settle back into- or rather, we’re starting to find our rhythm.

The sails and rigging are sound, with a few minor repairs and only one line needing replacement. All my pressing duties have been attended to; the ship has been cleaned from Observatory to Bilges which stunk like a sewer but it needed to be done so I did it, we’re going to the launching point at Takoyaki 8 where Old Ray will coat our ship in two days, and… Damn. I don’t think I’ve got anything left to do, except for getting a jump on the Imbolc Rites and supplies and we’ve already done most everything that needs doing.

I can’t start making baby clothing until we’ve got a better handle on how many there are; I’ve already marked out all the fabric, it’s too late in the day to do cutting… laundry’s done, amenities have been replaced, Gurry likes floral scents, replaced all the condoms and lube, washed and sanitized all the dildos and vibrators in both dorms, organized and reshelved the softcore porn in the library, refluffed the mattresses...

Hmm.

Maybe time for a game night? A good game is like acid on the social politics, stripping away everything that doesn’t matter to get right to the bones of a person… and we’ve not really been near each other day-to-day in two years…

Actually- there’s one game I always loved playing in school. It’s called Grease. Technically, it’s called Grease th’Wheel, but mostly it’s called Grease.

You need a deck of cards with eight suits - a deck of Line standard ♥♦♣♠ will do for one, but you need a Skua standard of Clover, Tears, Moons, and Stars for the total of 104 cards that are not at all the same. 104 individual cards, and 9 Trump Cards- that, depending on the Rules in Use, will either instantly win, instantly loose, or instantly reshuffle the game. The 9 Trump Cards, in order of strength, are: Death, Fortune, Fate, Mystery, Sacrifice, Freedom, Beauty, Truth, and Love. They can be used to instantly win that round of the game, as one Trump beats any hand in the game, but at the cost of not being able to play that card again for the rest of the game. Period. More interestingly, one of the ways to win the game requires collecting all the Trumps and playing them in a Wash, but that’s… unless you’re very good at counting cards and have a good Grease-face, you’re not going to manage it.

Anyway. I have the deck of cards, and I have the nine trump cards… If it was Greased Lightning, I’d have to use thirty one, but it’s not, it’s just Grease...

Grease is a game that has elements of Blackjack and Poker, but also elements of… I want to say Roulette, for how quickly things can go, but that’s not right either. The most notable aspect of the game is that it requires a deck of cards with eight suits total in it. The game divides these suits into pairs- Hearts and Clovers, Diamonds and Tears, Clubs and Moons, Spades and Stars, with the trumps floating around and tripping people up. Hearts are weakest out of the suits, with Stars being the strongest, actually- what I mean to say is, if a Grease is played with Hearts and another Grease is played with Clovers, Clovers wins. Diamonds beats Hearts, Clubs beats Diamonds, and so on. The pairs exist for tie-breaking purposes.

Anyway. Each player receives a hand of five cards face down, and may discard up to four of them, receiving new cards in their place. Then a further five cards are dealt face up to each player except the dealer, who receives theirs face down. The first player begins by assembling their cards into one of the winning hands and displaying it. The next player must then create a more valuable hand or fold. If that player is successful in creating a more valuable grouping, the original first player may try again to create an even more valuable grouping for themselves, or fold. This process passes left around the table until only one player remains, who then wins the round. There are eight rounds total, with the winner being the person with the most winning hand, the most unplayed trump cards, or the most Money or beans or whatever, if you’re playing for stakes. There’s one more, but I can’t remember it.

The hands go like this:

E-Z-Bake, two cards with values totalling 20; Two-cards Over Easy, two cards with values totalling 21; Hot Simmer Days, a set of three or more cards totalling between 16 and 21 inclusive, and with all but one in the same suit-pair; Hot Simmer Nights, three suit cards with values totalling 21; Wok the Moon, same as a Hot Simmer Day but with all the cards being in the same suit-pair; Four-card Cookoff, same as the two- and three-card hands before; Broken Crowns, the combination of 678 of any suit; Five-card Chili, same as two- and three- and four-card hands before; Royal Luck, the combination of 777 of any suit; Six-card Chili, same as the two- and three- and four- and five-card hands before; Three Years, the combination of 888 in a hand when eights are wild; Seven Days a Week, same as two- and three- and four- and five- and six-card hands but with seven cards; Lovers, two picture cards and two aces; Watches, three picture cards and three aces; Seasons, four picture cards and four aces; and Grease for the Wheel, five picture cards and five aces.

The Modifiers are used to mess around with the value of a hand, and to make the game more interesting. Apart from “The Soapy Water” rule, modifiers are optional, which may or may not be included in a game. They are as follows:

Soapy Water (Wash Up): If a player displays a Grease for the Wheel, an opponent may display a nine-card running flush and instantly win the hand. If a player displays a nine-card running flush, an opponent may display a ten-card running flush and instantly win the hand; a player with a ten-card running flush can also use it to steal the win from someone who has previously Washed Up with a nine-card running flush. This is the only non-optional modifier, making it an actual rule.

Week of the Dead: in a normal hand, eights may be played as if their value were zero (but can still be played with value eight if the player wishes). Thus they can be included in an existing Grease in order to improve its size by one (or more) cards, which is important when tie-breaking. Whenever this is done, eights become wild cards in the following hand, and this modifier cannot be used in that hand. After one hand with eights as wild cards, they revert to normal, and this modifier becomes available again.

No Soap in the Wild: When eights are wild, you cannot Wash Up if your running flush contains more wild eights than the Grease or running flush you are trying to beat.

Double Trouble: Paired Aces are Trumps for this hand, but cannot be played as anything else for the rest of the game.

Eight Years: When eights are wild, the grouping 88888888 is considered a Grease; it beats normal Grease hands (except for Greasepaint), and can be Washed Up like a normal Grease.

Lady Be Good: A player may reveal the Queen of Spades (also called the Lady) for one of two effects: if eights are not wild in the hand, the player may draw two cards from the deck, then choose one of these cards to replace the queen in their hand. (Lady’s Night.) If eights are wild, the player can force every opponent to devalue one ace in their hand to value 1 (rather than the ace’s normal value of 11). The opponent chooses which ace is devalued. (Lady’s Choice.)

Fate Be Cruel: If the Lady has been played and replaced with another card from the deck as above, the King of Tears (also called the Lord) may be revealed and replaced in the same way, also rendering all aces held by the player who played the Lady unplayable. (Lord’s Mercy.) If eights are wild, the player can force every opponent to cease being wild; but if played this way, any other player (who did not play the King of Tears) who holds the Queen of Spades may reveal it to cause their eights to remain wild. (Lord’s Judgement.)

Black Spot: If a winning hand has even one black suit card in it, it is immediately discarded. -Dealer rule: if the dealer’s hand has even one black suit card in it, their hand is automatically the lowest hand in the game, regardless of what cards it is made of.

Red Handed: If a winning hand is made entirely of red suit cards, it is immediately discarded. -Dealer rule: if the dealer’s hand is made entirely of red suit cards, their hand is automatically the lowest hand in the game, regardless of what cards it is made of.

Can’t Keep Down the Clown: All Eight Jokers can be played as a Grease, but can be Washed with an eight card running flush. Greasepaint can beat any other Grease; Greasepaint cannot beat a Half-Baked. Jokers are otherwise Null.

Half-Baked: If a player has ten cards that add up to a value twenty-one, they can play the hand. This hand beats everything except a Grease (excepting the Greasepaint).

Norland Roulette: All Trumps are immediately played, with the highest trump card knocking the player who plays it out of the game.
Djinni Trader: Before the facedown cards of the dealer are dealt, the players may exchange their faceup cards; up to eight cards may be exchanged in total amongst all the players.

Wizard of Odds: A player who reveals the Queen of Clovers may subtract eight from the value of one of their cards and add it to the value of another. Card values must still range from 1 to 11.

Witch of Waste: A player who reveals the Queen of Moons may take any card, even a trump, from the discard pile and add it to their hand. The Queen of Moons must then be discarded for the remainder of the game.

Pandora’s Box: A player who reveals 9 black suit cards may exchange their single unrevealed card for any other unrevealed card from the deck. This exchanged card must then be immediately played in the next hand. -Dealer Rule: The dealer must reveal all but one of their cards; this last unrevealed card is the Hope card. For the remainder of the game, once per round, the dealer may exchange any one of their face-up cards at any time, as many times as they like; but only that one card. If their face down card is anything other than a face card, a joker, or a trump, their hand is null. The Hope card cannot be traded, stolen, killed, or discarded at any time, under any rule. Only by its revelation can it be discarded or played.

Alone Time: A player who reveals a set of four cards, each either a nine or ten (or a wild eight), plus the Queen of Clovers, may shift points of value between their cards to create a Lovers, and may consider any other nines or tens in their hands as ones (not aces) and twos respectively. However, any other Lovers beats this hand.

Sharpeyes Send their Regards: Displaying a Jack of Diamonds (the Sharpeye) when eights are not wild causes the aces of any other player who has used a Null Eight to become unplayable. When eights are wild, displaying a Jack of Diamonds makes all aces unplayable and bans wild eights from taking value 1 or 11.

Death Rides Alone: Displaying a King of Spades ‘kills’ one picture card in the hand of every player who has more than one in their hand. A ‘killed’ picture card may not participate in a Lovers, and if eights are wild may not participate in a Watches either, but may still participate in other high hands.

Swan Lake: When played, the Jack of Moons and the Jack of Stars are wild in all hands. However, any player who plays either Jack must play all of their eights as null eights. Further, any opponent may reveal a King of Spades after the Jacks are revealed to cause the Jacks to cease being wild and also cause all other players to reveal a card they have not yet revealed. -Dealer Rule: The dealer may trade their entire hand, and their unplayed trump cards, for the entire hand and unplayed trump cards of any player.

Buns in the Oven: If the Jack of Clubs is declared by any player before the first player has played their first hand, Bakes and Greases switch places in score value. Thus, Double Bakes, Triple Bakes, etc. become the most valuable hands, with the exception that a Grease will still beat a Half-Baked. It also, of course, becomes possible for a player to Wash the Oven.

AllModifiers must be declared by the player or dealer before they can be used.

It’s easiest to have this list of rules and hands just out in the open, when you’re playing the first few times. It’s also helpful to have a box of those golf pencils and some sticky notes handy, to remember which cards are valued what in a non-permanent way. And a little board with something to mark it with, so you remember other things- who won what hand, which rules we’re playing under, tallies of who’s won what and how, and so on. Little things.

So,

I’ve got a gallon of chalkboard paint in here somewhere- time to talk to Franky.

I go down to the shop, and- ah, preliminary drawings of the new super-tricked out baby-swing-chair. Cool, cool-

“Hey Franky.”

“Hey, Mab-sis! Need something?”

“Well… firstly, your swing-chair is looking good so far.”

“Haha, thanks; most of the extras are actually from Usopp, if you can believe it.”

“No shit?”

“No shit. E’said there can’t actually be too many things in the chair to distract the baby with- and if Zoro and Nami have more kids, it’ll be better to have more options on the chair because each baby is different and likes different things.”

“That’s true.”

“Yeah, we’re actually tricking the thing out way more than I thought we’d need to. Anyway, you usually don’t come down here without a reason- the new aprons are nice, as are the extra belts and so on, but… what’s up Mab?”

“Well. It occurred to me earlier that we’ve not really cohabitated- all of us as crewmates- for a good two year’s or so; thus, the best way I can think of to re-establish bonds in our group is a friendly game night.”

“...With our crew?”

“Well, now that I’ve said it out loud, it sounds stupid.”

“I mean… Nami’s probably not going to play unless it’s for real money, and she is...”

“Nami is Nami; and Nami likes that sweet, filthy lucre.”

“She surely does.”

“Ah well. I guess having a chalkboard in the Galley would be nice anyway- we use it as a meeting room and all, and it’d be nice to have a wall where we can write stuff and clip magnets to...”

“...”

“Oh, right- I got a gallon of special magnetic chalkboard paint. Goes on in three coats, the bottom most one being the most heavily magnetic, and the topmost one is the blackboard coat. I just don’t want to have a magnetic chalkboard and have there be no shelf for the damn chalk.”

“Aha! Now that’s an easy job- you thinking of doing it now?”

“Well, it’s still a few hours to dinner, so no. Probably do it the day before we set out, when Sanji does that barbecue Captain wants- that way-”

“-there’s no paint fumes while he’s cooking. Smart.”

“Mm. Considering the room, that patch of wall right by the ladder- the one beside the mast?”

“The one by the pantry, adjacent to the corkboard?”

“Yes.”

“That the one you want for the Games board?”

“I mean, where else can we put it? Ah, and maybe a storage container- like a shelf, or a box that’s secured under the sofa- for games, too...The wall behind the sofa is already cork boared and covered with pictures- which reminds me, I need to label, protect, and organize those-”

“-Wow you are neurotic-”

“-yeah, and bored; and what part of the wall isn’t cork is storage space for the snail phone, or calendar. We can’t put it on the mast because that’s where our Altar is, and that’s not a thing for moving-”

“-That’s true, there’s really no better place to have it-”

“So.”

“...I see your point. As for games storage, I think the best spot will be on the far side of the couch; there’s a little dead space right there that’s just big enough for a locking cabinet. I’ll make it just level, maybe a little lower than the arm of the couch, and... add leaves, so it’s like the snail cabinet. -We can’t keep games in the snail cabinet?”

“No, it’s full of snail-phone things; phone books, catalogues, and so on. Need to organize that, too.”

“...If you’re organizing things, I have a drawer or two where various tools have gone to die...?”

“I’ll put it on my list, sure.”

“Thank you.”

So. That’s how I ended up going through literally every receipt we have, and every coupon, every advert and free delivery menu and- everything. Everything in the Snail Cabinet. And then I organized it. And composted everything that was no longer of use or too faded to see. And put all the paper in an accordion file-folder, with the strappy closer on the button, because I did not buy all of these office supplies in vain, goddammit. I also curated, labelled, dated, and added little anecdotes to the hundreds of pictures from the over-the-couch cork board. Precious memories deserve our protection and remembrance!

So we have [photo albums] now. Each picture is on it’s own page, with acid free writing in graphite pencil and a nice little separator translucent page between each photo. Hello, Luffy.

“Captain?”

“Neh, I didn’t realize you’d taken so many pictures, Mab.”

“Ah. Mmhm- I don’t always remember things when I write them down. But I always remember what I’ve seen. So.”

“Mm. We’ve changed, since then.”

“Well… yes, Captain. You’re a different man today than you were yesterday. Different doesn’t mean bad, and it doesn’t mean good- It just means ‘not the same’; and you’re not.”

“Mm.”

“...You know, if you want to hug or cuddle, we’ve got a sweet couch right here and I don’t mind…?”

“Kay.”

So I spent the intervening hours between the finishing of my self appointed tasks of organisation and dinner holding my captain on the Galley couch. He settled into a snuggle with his face mooshed into my chest, his ear pressed flat to my heart behind my ribs. Luffy, for all his training, for all his growth, still smells like meat and barbecue sauce; the faint tang of woodsmoke and summertime heat, like wet dirt. He’s lean, and muscular; his ribs a strange give under my arms. It really is just exactly like hugging a shark-type fishman, only his skin doesn’t do the scratchy thing when you rub it the other way.

I needed a nap anyway.

So I explained to Mark and Bryony about Gurry, and they kinda looked at me, and then Mark grinned and said “Have you got to casual sex yet, or…?”

And I said “It’s been long enough, even with the extra time.”

And Mark said “So. It’s a lot of hot, filthy, sweaty work to get the sails back in order- when you’re done for the day, why don’t you show Gurry to the bath house and scrub his back?”

And then I smacked Mark in the arm, right on his sunburn because holy fuck, you asshole. Mark flinched, cackled, and scuttled up the lines. Prick.

Bryony was more… something. Kind?
“Well. You do like him, and he likes you- and you know you’ll feel better eating dinner if you’re clean, and Gurry’s never really done anything like this before. Bathing is the ritual for cleansing, after all; and if you don’t want to do anything more than wash, don’t do anything more than wash.”

“...right. The worst he can do is say no.”

“Mm.”

And then Bryony started hauling the ropes towards their storage spaces; she’ll re-coil them before putting them away-away, make sure they’re properly waterproofed and everything.

I go to find Gurry; he’s still hard at work, carefully looking over every square inch of the shroud on the deck, making absolutely sure that each part of it is in good condition and making marks on his clipboard if there’s a part that isn’t- Mab actually put in this grid system in blue squares, in the shrouds I mean, and each square is labelled. Each sail has it’s own tally-sheet, and... basically, it’s just a way for someone other than Mab to know where weak spots on the sails are, and fix them when the time comes. So far, on his sheet, I only see one little red ‘x’ marking; in the same general area as those usually show up, it’s a high tension area and the wear on that part of the fiber is just a touch more than anywhere else on the shroud. Mab can’t reinforce it anymore than she has, it’ll throw off the wind distribution.

Gurry is so beautiful in his lycra shorts- he shucked out of his jean short-shorts about a half-hour in when we all decided that his artist’s eyes were best suited to the absolutely vital job of checking over the shrouds, and now he’s down to his shorts and he’s rolled his shirt up to his bicep and unbuttoned it and underneath he’s wearing a sleek v-neck tank top and the v is deep enough I can see the full swell of his generous breasts and the play of his muscles rippling under his skin, and it’s- both his shirts are stained with colors because he’s painted in literally all of his clothing but especially that shirt, the v-neck, and- his- I want him, I want to kiss him and- breathe in.

Breathe out.

I can see the firm bulge of his cock and his balls, the tight strain of them against white shimmering fabric clinging tightly to his thighs and his crotch, I can see the rivulets of sweat dripping down, the dark wet stain drawing itself down the crack of his ass and pooling behind his balls, I can see the sharp narrow cut of his thighs and the hot sweaty arch of his throat and I want- I want to touch the liquid fire of him, but- even now, he’s only just coming into the first blush of spring. The first month of spring is the last month of winter, the cruelest face the Goddess shows because you get hope for the springtime, for leaves to spike out from barren branches scraping at the dull grey sky, you get hope for the purple crocus-petals in the depths of the snow, and the returning of the birds- and there still could, in the turning of the heavens, be another six feet of snow and forty days of ice left.

Winter’s grip is harsh and cruel and firm and in the very last month, crueler than anything, because finally, finally, there is hope- that this is not the end. That the world will not always be... this.

I can see the light dancing over his sweating skin, and I can see the curve of his dick and his balls and the hard swell of his breast, the dark brown whiskey shot of his- eyes. I swallow back my drool and blush so hard it feels like I’m sunburned. Gurry swallows, and blushes, and forcibly returns himself to the task at hand.
I walk away; go inside, get cold water bottles from Sanji because it’s still only just after lunch, a-and, um. All I’ve got left to do is replace all the hidden weapons on each deck; make sure the explosives are properly stored for them and so on. So.

I take our water bottles; I grab the sack of knives and things; and then I start at the top of the ship, hand Mark his water bottle and secret away a multitude of deadly materiel. Bryony gets hers on the beam, and then I’m down the mast from the Crow’s Nest and next to a still faintly flushing Gurry again. I let my feet make noise on the decking to alert him, approach from his side. He stops and he looks up at me from underneath his hat; I crouch down, heels flat to the deck so’s I can look him in the eye, sidelong a little maybe, and speak with him plain enough. He’s very fast, and competent, is Gurry- he’s gone through all the shrouds already, and all the red ‘x’ marked pages with the sail names on are marked up and stacked neatly; his job’s half done. So is mine, really.

“Brought you a water bottle.”

“O-oh! Thank you, Taffy.”

“Sure, Gurry. Ah- since you’re done with this part, the next thing to do is hand over the damage tally to Mab, down in her studio. Have you been there yet?”

“Oh, um- no, I haven’t.”

“I’ll show you- I need to go down there anyway, and the ship’s layout can be confusing if you’re new to it.”

“Oh. Thank you.”

So I take Gurry down through the ship, giving him more than just the two-beri tour; the actual, careful, measured tour, with anecdotes and little stories and jokes, and with quiet determination I scratch and chip away at the awkward moments that almost are, because… because I like being friends with Gurry. And I thirst for him, desire him- but being friends with him is good, too.

We amble along, drink our water, and I do my job. Along the slightly meandering route we take, I secret away weapons and dangerous material; I hide caltrops and the beginnings of traps.

Gurry, for all his appearance of being an airhead, is really just like me, and Mab, and Sanji, too, though Sanji tries to pretend that he’s not- sharp eyed, sneaky, likes to know where everything is. We pause in a weird little nook, between one room and another- an idiosyncratic space I know exists because I asked Franky for it.

We talk, and then we just... don't stop.

“Can I put poisoned things in with the...?”

“So long as they’re labelled in a way you’re sure the rest of the crew will understand, yeah. Mostly, it’s me, Robin, Mab, sometimes Sanji, and maybe Mark who use these- Usopp’s bolt holes are up in the rigging, and the rest of ‘em don’t bother with this stuff. Don’t put poison in the galley proper, though, or the supply room, or the infirmary- it’s not worth catching Sanji’s temper. And Chopper will either give you a taste of his temper, which is terrifying- or he’ll give you this look , and just.
Ugh."

"Hmm… I’ll think of something to use. Usopp’s the one who makes most of the labels, right?”

“Yep- at least, if it’s for something that isn’t fabric, Usopp does it. If it’s for fabric, Mab does it. And anything else you need made that isn’t fabric, or a cool gadget, Franky does it.”

“Gotcha. Sanji cooks, right?”

“Yeah- Sanji’s the cook. If you want something really specific, you can ask him if you can cook it in his kitchen; and if you’re like me, and mostly bake and make candy, which he doesn’t consider really cooking, he’ll let you. So long as you ask first, of course.”

“And I guess it’s the same with the rest of the areas in the ship?”

“Some are more commons than others- the Library, Garden, Observatory, Aquarium, and Crow’s Nest are all common areas, for example. So’s the Bath House, more or less. Dorms- unless they’re your own, like your bed’s in there, you can only go into the other one by invitation. Um… Now that Luffy, Usopp, and Mark have their own room, they shouldn’t sexile you guys from the men’s dorm, but… well, I hear the table-thing is very comfy in the winter. I dunno; I mean, the couch in the women’s is very nice and has all these really comfy blankets, so... The Workshops down on the third level are technically common, but unless Franky knows for a fact you can use the equipment and tools safely… and Usopp gets very picky about his worktable. Unless he’s right there, it’s better not to touch anything on it. You can mess with the junk in his junk-pile, but don’t take anything without asking.”

“Seems legit.”

“Oh, and- always, always, no matter what, ask before you take anything from Mab’s Studio. Laundry Room is more common, and a good secluded spot for trysting, but- under no circumstances, at no point in time… never, ever, no matter what, should you tryst in Mab’s studio. She will be very angry. Um… let’s see- I told you about Robin and Nami, and you experienced the Bugfucks-”

“-?”

“Luffy, Usopp, and Mark. They’re all fucking each other, or rather- making love? They’re a trio, and fucking nutbars- so, Buglovers maybe. But Bugfucks is snappier, so.”

“Ha!”

“Yeah- you can call them that, I guess, just explain why - um, what else. Oh! Mab and Sanji are happily married, their marriage is so far closed, and they have sex five times a day at least- excepting on the equinoxes, where they don’t have sex with each other at all.”

“Blood and fire, that’s a lot of sex! Wait- why not on the…?”

“Ghostly possession.”

“Ah. They’ve got the old blood, then.”

“Yep.”

“Zoro and Nami?”

“Engaged. Zoro really only has eyes for Nami, and Nami… she talks a good game, but she’s fairly monogamous.”

“Ah. Robin and Franky?”

“Dude, even they don’t know- stay out of it, is my advice.”

“Yeah?”

“Yeah.”

“Alright. Bryony…?”

“Bryony is casual only with the crew; everyone else has to date her quite a bit before she’ll open her heart to them. As far as I know, she’s only just starting to consider a man she met, but… probably not.”

“Gotcha. And you, Taffy?”

“...Gurry, you already know that. I’m not all that subtle, when it comes to Sex and Romance.”

“...I’ve noticed.”

Gurry shoots me a quick soft grin, and I can feel an answering smile on my face- as well as the soft heat of a blush shooting across my body. I can feel the faint itch of my loosened hair which stuck into my sweat-coated skin drying, and now it itches because the hair is loose and long and sticking to my skin still and I- I-

Gurry’s fingers are very soft and gentle, as he tucks a long loose strand of hair away from my face, gently brushes scraggles into line and tucks the whole slickening line of them back behind one of my pointed ears. He brushes a thumb under my eye, where my singular freckle is- Mab calls it a beauty spot, while Mark says it’s a tragic beauty spot and Bryony smacks him on the back of the head. I call it a freckle and leave it at that.

Gurry’s hand traces over my cheek, fingertips against the sharp swell of my jaw, the warm-cold touch of his fingertips over my lips. My bag of hiding-weapons is empty, a-and- ah-

He smells like musk and sunlight and the faintest hint of flowers and- ooh-

I nuzzle into his hand, just for a moment; glance at him hot and heady and wanting, just a look, just a moment- and then I step away, and open the door to Mab’s studio.

Gurry takes two steps after me and stops dead- I honestly had the same reaction when I came in here the first time, and that was before Mab unpacked everything she got over the Separation.

“Okay- yep, everything’s still laid out the same; Gurry?”

“...wow...”

“Gurry…?”

“Wow, you’re beautiful.”
My eyebrows went up and my eyes went wide and my face went hot and I just- smiled- and, um-

“-S-sorry! Sorry, Taffy, you were saying something?”

“Don’t be, Gurry, I don’t mind. U-um- over here, see this thing with the hooks? This board, I mean? Your clipboard goes on this one, and the papers go into this basket- the one marked in red, see?”

“Ah, yeah.”

“Anyway- once you’ve signed off on the papers, put them in the Damages Inbox, and put away the clipboard- pen goes in the little drawer, right there- yep, that one- and you’re done. I’m done too, so- this bag goes on this hook and… Woo! We’ve actually finished our jobs way ahead of schedule, and I know the others won’t be done for a while, and… I know you don’t really like crowding? So, um. I just thought that, if you wanted… we could go scrub the day off?”

“...Wash up for dinner?”

“Yeah. I’ll wash your back- a-and if, ah, if you’re not ready for more than that, I can just wash your back, s-soapy water and a washcloth and that’s it, um-”

“Only if you let me wash yours, Taffeta.”

I stared deep into Gurry- Marguerite’s warm brown eyes, and blushed, and he smiled, and blushed, and so I nodded.

“Okay, Marguerite. Let’s go wash the day away.”

The bath house on Thousand Sunny is marvelous . The first room has the sink, and the door to the toilet, and baskets to put your clean clothing and your towels and the things you don’t want getting wet; and there’s a big laundry basket and a rack for swords and whips and staffs and things. There’s a new hook for Gurry’s war fans, which you’d never see on him unless he was gutting you with them and by then it’s too late. Gurry and I have bathed together before, just- never here.

Stop by your dorm and get fresh clothing, clean towels from the towel shelf; go up to the bath house and put your things in the basket. Take out what doesn’t need to get wet; for me, mostly ninja things I keep in my socks, a few other things, nothing special- mostly just a fat coinpurse I keep in my bra. Gurry is much the same, with the addition of his hat; our shoes go on the shoe rack, and our dirty clothing go into the dirty clothes bin.

Through the bath house door, there’s a big tiled room and a deep soaking tub and little stools in a stack for the sitting on and a shower and a sprayer and soap and conditioner on the little shelf and it’s all- home. I’m home. And now, to scrub the years away, and become myself again.

I do my preliminary rinse, hand the sprayer over to Gurry so he can do the same; scrub down with my bar of soap, shampoo my hair which I haven’t done in several days and I need to because it stinks; Gurry hands the sprayer back and I rinse my hair, the thick heavy weight of it sliding all over my neck and back and breasts. Soap and grime pools over blue tile, and my skin begins to soak up the water that’s sluicing over it. I examine my breasts; they are the same size, a little paler than the rest of my skin, milk white and criss crossed with pale blue veins because my chest gets almost no sun exposure at all. I gently scrub the tops, which are fairly clean, and I more firmly scrub underneath each pudgy handful, rub the grime away from my nipples until they flush a peachy rose and pebble under my fingertips. My wings really only need a rinse, which I do with the sprayer; I scrub my sides, my stomach and the small of my back, my ass and my hips and the thick fur between my legs, my thighs and my ankles and my feet.

I step over and stand under the hot spray, scrub everything again and when the water runs clear from my skin pools beneath me clear and steaming I sluice the hot clean water between my legs. Soap is not good for vaginas; water is okay, though.

Gurry has been doing the same- but not to his penis, or his upper shoulders. Right. Amazon Lily’s method of inter-sexual bathing shares a lot with Skuan Hospitality. So. I turn the sprayer off, and the shower- he finished before I did and watched me, he’s thick-hot and throbbing from watching- me-

I fill a bucket with water, and settle myself on a stool behind him.

I start with the nape of his neck, which corresponds to the area of his body just above the pubic bone; the stretch of skin between his navel and the base of his penis. I wet, and soap, and scrub the dirt away from that stretch of his neck, and he sighs, softly. Go down his spine and you go down the perineum; shoulders are thighs, and the farther from the spine you go, the lower on the legs you get. Use the flat of my fingernails, tips turned into my palms to scrub and scuff and scrape away the gunk of days, warm water sluices away the filthy suds until only his warm pink skin remains. I mouth a kiss at the nape of his neck and Gurry sighs and moans, a little bit- soft, like the cooing of a dove.

Now that I can see it clearly, Gurry has washed his cock and his balls; meaning, actually, if I’m reading this right…

“Margurite, if you want me to stop, you need only say ‘stop’. Do you understand?”

“Mm. Yes, Taffeta. I understand.”

“Okay.”

I fill my palm with my coconut oil conditioner- it’s literally just coconut oil, hot from the mist of the shower and my own burning palms. I smooth my slick hand over Gurry’s pubic… it’s not a mound because it’s not… but. There. Where the fur begins. I let myself drape over his shoulders, let my cleaned wings wrap around us like a blanket. I can’t actually hold his cock with one hand when he’s aroused, it’s too big. I nudge his thighs open anyway, rub the excess oil onto my other palm and cup his fat roll of cock with both hands. He sighs raggedly.

Ah, I’d almost forgotten; in each version of back-washing, hospitality, or what-have-you that’s heavily codified- like this- there are certain parts of the body that, when touched certain ways, are questions. If kiss the nape of his neck, like I did, it means I think he’s handsome; if I kiss behind his ears, like I’m about to, it means I think he’s romantic. Side of the neck; sexy. Corner of the jaw; virile. Mouth to mouth? Have sex with me. Open-mouth kissing is “have sex with me, please”, and the more tongue you add, the more desperate you seem. Biting is, on Amazon Lily, basically a demand for sex, right now. His ex-wife would bite him as soon as she got back from the campaign, and she would not be best pleased if he didn’t obey her demand.

Just brushing the teeth- no pressure, no bite, just touching them to skin… that’s an indication of desire. An offering; “I want you.” That’s what that means.

I stroke his cock gently, and press a kiss behind his ear. Gurry shudders. I mouth a line of kisses up the side of his neck and peel back the skin around the tip of his cock with my fingers; stroke thin-sharp fingertips around the seamy edge where skin ends and glans begins and press the flat frontsides of my teeth against the skin of his neck. His hips shiver, and shake, and his thighs rattle under my forearms. Gurry moans, soft still- he’s not very loud in the bedroom, and neither am I, usually.

I find the corner of his jaw and kiss him there, to the sound of his soft whimpers; I cup and stroke his balls, like stones in my fingers covered in soft, thin skin. Gurry turns his head, his eyes near black with desire; I press my lips to his, feel it open against my lips, and our tongues curl and stroke against each other. I saw slugs mate, once, saw them slide and wriggle over each other, felt their palpable joy in the act of fornication- oh, oh Gurry, Gurry please.

When he sucks my top lip into his mouth and presses firm teeth to it, I’m only surprised at how long that took him to do; I draw his lower lip into my mouth, and nip back a reply.

We break apart, slimy spit a string between our mouths, panting breaths gently echoing off the nearby tile.

Gurry wiggles out of my embrace, shoves the little stool to one side with a soft scrape. He turns, and sits on his ass, and pulls me into his lap so the sensitive joints of my wings are flat to his breast and my legs are spread wide open, hooked over his and his-hand-starts stroking and rubbing and delving.

Gurry is so big, I can’t actually take him in all in one go; and when I get aroused, I get so wet and slippery, he actually pops right back out if he tries to just put his tip in and take it slow. We found that out the first year of the Separation, during Beltane. He can get inside of me, it’s just… he can’t hesitate, and I can’t really do the work of pushing him into me.

I don’t have the strength to push myself down onto his dick and stay conscious. It’s too much for me. My strength is in pulling, not pushing.

I’m flat on my back, now, slick juices pooling in my pussy. Gurry’s big thick cock keeps popping back out of my pussy; I’m tight and a little squirmy, and I don’t think that’ll ever change. Gurry presses the tip of his cock against my pussy, and then with one quick snap of his hips, pins me to the ground, straight through. My legs clamp around his hips and my whole lower body clamps down sharp-hard-tight a-a-and oh, oh Gurry, Marguerite please, please please please-

Please- don’t-go-

When I orgasm, and I’m not sure if it’s a product of my first orgasm being with Keimi and leaping up to meet god or what, but- when I orgasm, it’s usually so intense I pass out. I discussed it with Gurry a long time ago- so long as he doesn’t pull out, he can just keep going and I’ll keep orgasming. He’s the one in control of our pace, not me, is what I’m saying.

So.
When I come back inside my body, my belly is protruding with his cum and his body is a heavy sweaty weight across me. His cock is a big, heavy line against my thigh, and his cum is oozing out of my throbbing pussy. Oh god, that was so good.

I press kisses all over Gurry’s sleepy, grinning face, and he returns them.

“S-so. Are we dating, now?”

“If you like. It’s too early, to talk about marriage- we don’t know if we’d be good together, like that. But, Gurry- I like you, quite a lot. I- you like me, too, so. Let’s see where this goes, alright?”

“Alright, Taffy.”

I don’t know which of the ancient Amazonians decided that having their menfolk be virile and more than prepared to ejaculate at least five times in one round of sex would be a good thing, but the Amazonians have never had fertility problems except in War-husbands, and that’s usually resolved within the first two generations. What I mean to say, is- I have a fetish for cum, and being cummed in, and Gurry provides.

By the gods both old and new, Gurry provides.

Gurry and Taffeta were a little late to dinner; they smelled faintly of soap and sex, and… Ah. So that’s how it is. Dinner was lovely; I don’t remember much of it because cuddling with Captain made me long for Sanji. I missed a whole round of sex with him, due to Captain.

I aim to collect my due.

Sanji, who in all things matches me, is happy to oblige. Thank god for soundproofing.

New day, new things to do; Nami wants a blade for under her bed, something that’s soul will be well with it’s life of mostly ceremonial use. Zoro, being our resident swordsman, took money and some other things and told her that he’d go get one for her, right then and there. I said that’s all well and good- but I’d be going with him, because we’re on a schedule, and there’s no guarantee he’ll find a blade that suits on this archipelago in time.

To which he replied, fair enough.

And off we went.
All the Hell We Put Men Through

Soft, on the breeze- a Syrene’s Song of Fornication. Such has not been sung for a good thousand years, not since long before the current era.

Spadille’s up to something.

“So- any idea about what kind of blade, exactly, you’re going for?”

“Knives, plural.”

“Oh?”

“Yeah- both Nami and I use triadic weapons- her staff breaks into three discrete pieces that have their own specific attributes. My swords are three discrete weapons with their own unique attributes- thus, she needs at least three distinct blades for ritual protection.”

“Hmm. You could also invoke the Goddess with three knives- three and one would cover all the gods, but I’m not sure…”

“I was actually thinking three and two.”

“Oho!”

“Well- they’re for Nami, right?”

“Right.”

“So- she uses Wind, Cloud, Rain, and Thunder and Lightning.”

“Ah. The Jin Brothers. I like it.”

“Ohoh.”

We walk through Sabaody’s winding streets; and the tone of the whole town… now that the Goblin Market’s had time to settle in, the whole tone of the city has really changed. Everything is quite a bit more boisterous- people aren’t scuttling in fear anymore. There’s a certain tension, in a crowd that’s all afraid of the same thing- now, Seafolk are walking openly down the street, and Fae traders are calling in tones similar to seagulls. It feels very much like a street in any Faeland port-town; the hawking of wares, the multitudes of Tribefolk, the overall air of humanity, seething and pulsing like simmering vineapple chowder in a pot…

Zoro, in his dark green and with his three swords, cuts a swathe through the crowd like a hot arrow through mist. I walk at his side, my tactical belt over my hips and my spear at rest on my shoulder.
We’ve been to nearly every reputable weapon shop on this archipelago by now, and it’s only mid-morning; the only places left are pawn-shops and back alleys.

“So… y’know, if this pawnshop doesn’t have what you want… I can just make the knives.”

“Yeah, I know.”

“We still going to the pawn shop?”

“Yes.”

“Alright. ...you know, it’s okay if you don’t find a knife here.”

“I know.”

I look over at him, at his slightly reddened face, and his carefully pinched mouth- ah. We’ve been walking for hours. Time for a break.

“I think it’s time for a rest, actually- at the very least, we need some water. You want to go to the cafe on the corner, or the bakery up the block?”

“...Cafe.”

“Okay.”

And so, we go to the cafe. The hostess, a little Djinni boy- can’t be more than fifteen- shows us to our seats. We settle into a little glass table, and start sipping water in the shaded canopy. Zoro sighs, and settles into the seat, and- ah, brooding.

“So, what’s this really about?”

“...What if I hate them?”

“Hm?”

“I’ve only ever babysat before, I’ve never- I’ve never been wholly responsible for any child, ever, I- what if I hate them?”

“Ah. Let me tell you a story. When I was… oh, I had to be at least twelve, maybe thirteen, I took my original oath of Midwifery. You don’t actually need any of the pertinent knowledge of the profession to swear the oath; you just need to mean it, in Skua.

“The very first thing I ever had to learn, when it comes to taking care of children- especially babies- is that it’s okay to not like them.”
Zoro stares at me.

I smile.

“Zoro, the most interesting thing about a baby is that it’s cute. Otherwise, it’s a tiny wild animal that you’re predisposed to liking and caring about, and all it does is eat, sleep, shit, and scream— and sometimes, it just screams for fun, but mostly it screams because it can’t speak, and it can’t register most sensations as anything other than pain. Gassy babies scream like nothing else— and they vomit, too, all over your favorite things, and they’re sticky, they put things in their mouths, they cry for any reason, they cry because they want you to pay attention to them— oh yes. The very first thing you learn, in the Creche Ward, is that you can love any baby they put in your arms. And you can still not like them all that much.”

“Are… are you saying that I’m not going to like my kids?”

“At first? God, no. It’s a lucky man indeed who likes every member of their family; I love our Captain, but… uuurgh.”

“…Yeah, okay, I can see that.”

“The romance industry really does people a disservice. Love, real love, the kind that lasts and you can grow a child on, isn’t passion and grand gestures. It’s holding your husband’s hair back as he vomits into the toilet, because he didn’t listen to you when you told him the Order of Spices in Meat Dishes is absolute, and he’s gone and poisoned himself again. Love is reading a book you don’t care about at all, and taking the time to learn what it has to say, specifically so you can talk to your friend intelligently about something they’re passionate about. Love is training until your bones crack, and your feet bleed, and every limb aches at the end of the day so you have to spend time you can’t get back getting a massage for medical purposes, because if you just shift a little more on that turn, if you just reach a little farther, you run a little faster—”

“Love is Discipline.”

“Love is Devotion, too; love isn’t something you feel. You feel passion, you feel lust— but love is something you have to practice. It’s a little different, when you’re making something— a ship, a story, a new law or a job or a baby— when you do something like that, there’s this sensation of anticipation. Part of you has dreamed that thing forever— and yet, and yet, you’re making that dream become now, and… it’s hard. So many things can go wrong, but by the gods you have to try. You can’t not try, you’ll die if you don’t do this thing—”

“…Miscarriage is really awful, huh.”

“-Yeah. Yeah, it is. It’s not… easy for me to talk about. And… I don’t think I can talk about it here— not that I can’t talk about it, or that it shouldn’t be talked about, but…”

“Not here.”

“No. Not here, Zoro.”

“What can you talk about?”

“Mm… I can say, without shame, that the second most important thing I ever learned as a midwife— the first thing is you’re going to get overwhelmed, and you’re going to fuck up. It happens; it’s always happened; and most babies survive it. I’ll do my best to teach everyone what to do if the fuck ups are headed towards lethal, but—there’s going to be at least one diaper made out of a kitchen towel, some wax-paper, and duct tape.”

Zoro blinks at me.

“If the baby’s a girl, the first time Sanji’s on baby-watch, he’s going to panic. Kitchen towels are very absorbent, and also—crucially, because he asked—sterile. If Chopper had to, he could use one as a gauze pad. Wax paper, with the waxy-side in and out, so there’s no leaks in either direction. And duct tape, to keep everything on. I already know that’s coming, if the baby’s a girl. And it’ll happen if the baby’s a boy because he’ll still panic, only he’ll get mad about panicking which always makes it worse.”

“Pfft. He’s still Sanji, even with...” Zoro sniggers.

“Mnhm. The second most important thing is: it is of vital importance to ask for help. There will be moments, Zoro, when you will look at that screaming critter that hasn’t let you sleep for eight hours in a stretch in six months, and you will stare down their red gullet from which wails will echo, and you will hold them as far away from you as you can and you will think to yourself—what if I just shake them so they’ll be quiet. This thought comes to every parent at least once, when their baby won’t stop crying no matter what they do.”

“...Really?”

“I’ve read the logbook; answer me honestly, Zoro. What would you have done to eat food, or drink some water, when you were tied to that post and waiting? Not what you did— not what you think you could have done, or what you should have done—what would you actually have done?”

“...Ah.” said Zoro, weakly.

I nod, solemnly. I drink more water, ignore the people listening to our conversation. Zoro has a low, commanding voice, and mine’s not much higher; and we both expect to be heard when we speak. It’s not surprising, that people can’t help but listen when we have a conversation.

“So. There will come a time when you will want to shake your baby, or not be a parent to them, and it’s okay. That happens. What you need to do is put the baby somewhere safe, and take some time for yourself. You’re allowed to be human, as well as a parent.”

“Okay.”

“...And, really— if we don’t find what you’re looking for in the pawnshop, we’re going to the smithies and getting materials. I’ll make the blades you want, Zoro.”

“...Thank you, Mab.”

We finished our water, left a tip for the waiter, and went on our way.
I mostly spent the last day, before we’d sail, going over maps with Nami. It’s funny- I’ve learned so much from each member of the crew, but Nami’s the one I’ve learned the most from. I don’t quite have her instinctive knack for the Weather Arts- but that doesn’t mean I don’t have the talent. According to Nami, I do have the talent.

Nami’s a prodigy in Weather Arts. According to her, I’m a journeyman; I actually outmatch her in personal movement and small crafts, which makes sense- but it’s not a big leap to go from piloting a Skuan skimmer to being the helmsman for Sunny. That’s what she wants me to be, actually- even with Bryony being so much stronger, even with Mark being so much faster on the draw… Nami says that I’ve got the qualities she’s looking for.

“I need someone who can wait, and listen. Not just to me- to the Sea, and the Sky, the wind and the water and the ship between them; I need someone patient, and cunning, and steady as anything. Mark came back, and I’m glad he came back- but he’s not…”

“He’s a Wind-runner, now.”

“Mm. He can tie the shrouds like no one else, find a puff of wind in the dullest of days- but he’s not right for the helm. Bryony… she’ll help, in a storm, but… she’s better at weighing the anchor, or hauling sheets in a driving rain. Or moving canons.”

“Mm. It has to be me?”

“Of all our crewmates, it’s you and Mab I trust the most with the Log Pose; and for this, Taffy, you’re the one who doesn’t have other responsibilities to distract you from the duty of it. So; will you accept the burden of Navigating for this crew, for the months I will be unable to?”

“…Yes, of course. I’ll guide us well, Nami.”

And Nami smiled at me, before she began drilling me on weather again. She’s a Master of Weather Arts, now; and I’m her apprentice. It’s not formalized because we haven’t signed a contract- but that’s because… because Nami is still wording it, I saw her drafting it earlier today.

I’m going to be a Journeyman in the Weather Arts for real, soon. I’ll earn my right to Guide the Way, and wear the Compass Rose of the Navigator- if Nami has anything to say about it. However, there is something I want to make for her- if she’s going to take a formal vow as my Master of Weather, I’ll need the apprentice’s mark.

For the Weather Arts, the mark of the Apprentice is the Compass.

I need to make a Compass- I won’t take hers from her, nor the log poses, it’s honestly more like a comfort object to her. And the Compass, you make for yourself or earn.

The ancient Skuan Compass was comprised of these things; Four Bird Skulls, from the birds of South, North, East, and West; Three Needles, of Bone, Wood, and Metal; Two Strands, one of braided hair, one of leather; and One Clock, to keep the pace. Of course, in the old days, the Clock was properly the Astrolabe, which Nami already has; she doesn’t leave her bedroom without knotting the very long leather thong of it to her pant’s belt loop, and she pulls it out at least once a day to check that time is still moving as she expects it to be.

Bryony has the skulls, but I’ll need something to trade for them; Mab has needles, but she won’t give them to me for free; I can manage the braided strands; and the Clock… Mark. Mark will know what to do for the clock.

We finish training a bit before lunch, and I accept the formal contract of apprenticeship to read over—I can’t just sign it, there’s a Negotiation that has to happen, and Nami is supposed to have put in at least four unreasonable demands for me to argue against, there’s a whole thing to this that must be observed.

I’m excited.

Bryony’s worktable is actually a table that usually lives underneath the couch. It clamps onto the couch’s arm, and has a swing in it, and a lock, and… there are boxes of things under the couch too, skulls and bones and bits. She makes her fetish-eels, or fake eels, or feels for short, on the couch where anyone could see. Sanji’s not bothered by the galley becoming more and less filled with gently writhing feels, their clattering jaws and rustling bodies making the air thick with Bryony’s Attention.

It creeps me the hell out. However… there is something I can trade.

In Amazon Lily, high in the mountains, there is a quarry, and in one of the pits of that quarry, there can be found emeralds, in the clay. And along one wall, there are thick red seams of iron. The stone I have is orange-rust colored, heavy for it’s size and clingy, to all things metal. It’s a hunk of maghemite the size of my fist; and I found it in an ancient crater from a falling meteor. If it’s not a chunk of star-metal- but it feels cold to my hand, so I think it must be. I’ve also got three pieces of hematite, the blood-stone; hold those cobbles in your palm and it feels like your heart is in your hand.

Bryony has an interest in such things.

I go into the galley, wings pressed flat to my spine, and hands full of iron-stones to trade. Bryony lets her wordless song end, and the feels writhe around us like multicolored tendrils of some unspeakable horror.

“Hey Taffy.”

“H-hi, Bryony.”

“You usually don’t come around when I train like this- it must be important.”

“Y-yeah. I need the Four-bird skulls.”

“...and what, exactly, shall you exchange for thus?”

“A star stone that sings of metal, and three pieces of blood-stone.”
Bryony’s black eyes glitter strangely—now black, now blue, now black again. And then she nods, once, and reaches under the couch—pulls out a tiny box, not much bigger than a Reading Digestive Magazine, small enough to fit into the cargo-pocket of those new cargo pants; thick, like a brick. Longer than a half-brick, but—ah, right.

I hold out the star stone, and the blood stones.

Bryony opens the box.

Inside, there are four bird skulls, each with little nubs on the brain-case; the South Bird has two distinct nubs, while the North Bird has a heart-shaped nub; and the West Bird has three distinct nubs, while the East Bird has one nub that curves forwards, like a crest.

Bryony nods; I nod. And then we trade, stones for bones.

I take the bones in their box; Bryony takes the cooing metals.

“Mark’s in the Workshop, right?”

“Mhm. He’ll want precious gems, or fangs, maybe—Ivory, try Ivory.”

“...We’ll see.”

“Hm? Pffuhuhuhuhuhu! Alright, Taff. Go on, then.”

I leave Bryony to her cackling and her creepy feels.

There’s a river in Amazon Lily, and every year the salmon return to spawn in this river before dying. At the bottom of a falls, because there’s always a falls, you can find—once a year, you can find—the carcases of thousands upon thousands of enormous salmon, and little bastards too that couldn’t make the cut this year.

I have tens of thousands of salmon vertebrae, and one of the things I did to unwind was file the spikes off the bones. I have several duffle-sacks full of bone beads, each one sorted further into smaller sacks of like-sized bits. Because I was bored. Strung up one fish’s worth of bone on a thread of twisted horse-hair and realized that the big fish-bones would be too heavy for me to wear. Talked to Mab about the importance of bones; the more bones a Fae wears, the more… dangerous, powerful, cunning, strong, beautiful… that Fae becomes moreso when adorned in bones.

I have many bones.

And I have lots of fish bones because there were lots of dead fish. I have a Plan for the fish bones, and Mab’s gonna help— but for Mark…

Tusks. Mark will take tusks, I think.
“-so I tried to make curry and I got chilli-powder burns all over my face, so I thought to myself ‘hang on, doesn’t milk soothe chilli burns? it does!’ and I couldn’t ask anyone because it was just me in the house and I couldn’t see and Taffy wasn’t even my friend yet so I just had to blindly feel my way to the fridge and pour out a bowl of milk, and then plant my face in the bowl of milk and try not to drown.

“Anyway, at that point the rice cooker went off and triggered a power surge which turned the house’s electricity off, which I didn’t notice at first because I had my face in a bowl of milk and when I emerged from the dairy prison I thought I had gone blind with chilli burns.

“So no, I don’t really cook much food, Sanji.” said Gurry.

“Pfffffffffffffffftt-ttahahahahahaha!” I laughed.

I laughed so hard I started crying, and I couldn’t stop for a good ten minutes. When I wiped the tears away, I saw that Gurry was grinning too- but, oh- oh no, hang on-“Oh god, that reminds me of the time I tried to use a hunk of ginger as a dildo.” I say, snickering.

“What.” says Gurry, wide eyed.

“Okay, so- I was a horny, horny little shit as a young teenager. Like, I’m pretty horny now, as a man, but oh my god; I was a horny teenager.

“So, this, more than anything else, fucked me up for a good long while. What had happened was, on the Baratie- it’s the restaurant-boat I grew up on, and it’s crewed entirely by men. I dunno if you’ve heard of this tradition, but… getting shore leave on the Baratie was half lottery, a quarter being smart enough not to bet your shore time in a game of chance, and a quarter in the hands of the gods. So, what male sailors will do to relieve tension…”

“Oh, like on Amazon Lily. Homosexual relationships are more common because sex between man and woman is for fornication and ceremonial purposes only- you have sex with your husband or your wife, or you have sex with the God or Goddess of-the-moment to Turn the Wheel, and otherwise seek pleasure from men if you’re a man, and women if you’re a woman.”

“Aha. Yeah, that’s about right- except it’s almost entirely men, on the Baratie, and the Old Man enforced strict rules about the Waitstaff.”

“Waiters and Waitresses were off limits?”

“On pain of his boot up your ass, yeah.”

“Classic.”

“Mm. So. I’d walked in on some of the older cooks before, and I’d seen them kissing and such, but that was all before Puberty really had a grip on me. So I ended up walking into one of the supply closets and seeing Patty and Carne screwing on a pile of... I think it was a box of dishware, now that I look back. Anyway, I’d opened the door quietly enough that I got a good long look at what, exactly, sex between two men can look like.”

“So... intercrural, up the ass...?”

“Intercrural is the one where you basically rub your dick between someone’s thighs, right?”

“Yeah.”

“Yeah, no. It was up the ass.”

“Oh no.”

“Oh yes. So, long story short, this was also right around the time I started getting adventurous with my masturbation.”

“Oh no.”

“Oh yes. So; the Ginger Harvest came around the end of every third or fourth week during the months that weren’t winter, and the Old Man would always send someone to go get the ginger from the port, and bring it back to the ship. This time, it was my turn.

“I went to get the ginger and... It looked like a penis. Like, a really beautiful penis, with thick veins and a nice straight line and everything. The ginger-seller was very proud of it, too, in his dirty old man way.”

“I’ll fucking bet he was.”

“Hah. So, I helped put the ginger on the boat, and when no one was looking, I swiped the dick-ginger and put it in my bag.”

“Oh no.”

“Wait, it gets better- the skin of that ginger, because it was so fresh, was very easy to rip. And because it was literally fresh out of the field, it was also covered in dirt.”

“Sanji. Sanji, no.”

“Sanji yes. I got back home, put my bag in my room, and put it from my mind. After work, I went back to my room, got the dick-ginger, washed it off, and accidentally scratched through it’s skin. At this point, I hadn’t ever gotten ginger juice in a cut, so I didn’t Know.”

Gurry is already flinching.

“I found out, though. I honestly thought, and quite reasonably for what I’d done, that I was going to melt my asshole off and die. And, of course, since I was fourteen, I couldn’t fucking tell anyone that I’d fucked myself with a giant hunk of ginger. And I couldn’t eat it, either- it’d been in my asshole, you see.”

“Sanji, oh my god.”
“So, yeah. After that- strictly masturbation and heterosexual trysting.”

“Oh my god.” says Gurry, before dissolving into a cackling snake man.

The embarrassment is worth the relaxation in his shoulders, and the straightening of his spine.

Gurry’s alright. His use of poison as an equalizer is a product, I think, of his personal anxieties; he’s actually strong like… Usopp, I’d say. He’s just not a back-line fighter.

Four Bird Skulls, from the birds of South, North, East, and West; Three Needles, of Bone, Wood, and Metal; Two Strands, one of braided hair, one of leather; and One Clock, to keep the pace.

I have a string of salmon-spine beads, on a twisted strand of horse-hair thread; I have the four great tusks of a Mountain Boar, and the curling horns of a Battering Ram what roamed the cliffs near my cave and nearly killed me twice before I cut him down and ate his flesh. I have a wand of jade as thick as two of my fingers together, and as long as my forearm; and I have pearls, at the largest the size of quail’s eggs- and at the smallest, the size of sunflower seeds, bulging in a sack that once held a peck of apples.

Down in the workshop, Mark considers metals. He’s making… something. Thread of Gold, if I’ve any guess; or perhaps something else… Ah. Boning for a corset, I think; or maybe boning for an umbrella. I can’t tell for sure.

I let my feet scuff and scatter the metal-scale that’s littering the floor in here; Mark looks up, looks over, and sees me with my Trade goods.

“Taffy? You almost never come down here; what do you need?”

“A clock, to keep the pace. If you don’t happen to have one, I’ll commission one from you…?”

“Ah. You know a Djinn’s Clock is paid for in bone, right?”

“I do.”

“What have you to trade, then?”

“Salmon-spine beads on a twisted strand of black horse-hair; the four great tusks of a mountain boar. The curling horns of a battering ram- and for you, dear one, a wand of jade and a bag of pearls, too.”

“Now that’s a Trade I can call Fair. And… you didn’t have to bring me anything, Taffy-”

“Yeah, I did.”
As for why I did, that’s between me and him.

I hand over the bones and gems for a receipt, expect to return for my commission in three day’s time. Mark says he’ll throw in a chain, as a gift from a brother to his sister.

Can’t never break a Chain.

The Dynastinae are among the largest of beetles, reaching more than 150 meters (492 ft) in length, but are relatively harmless to humans because they cannot bite or sting. Some species have been anecdotally claimed to lift up to 850 times their own weight.

Their common names refer to the characteristic horns borne only by the males of most species in the group. Each has a horn on the head and another horn pointing forward from the center of the thorax. The horns are used in fighting other males during mating season, and for digging. The size of the horn is a good indicator of nutrition and physical health.

Hekate-chan, if she were old enough- she won’t be for another hundred years, but she says that the most handsome male beetles are the ones with big, strong horns, who win lots of duels during the mating seasons, or so her mother told her.

The body of an adult rhinoceros beetle is covered by a thick exoskeleton. A pair of thick wings lie atop another set of membranous wings underneath, allowing the rhinoceros beetle to fly, although not very efficiently, owing to its large size. Their best protection from predators is their size and stature. Additionally, since most species are nocturnal, they avoid many of their predators during the day.

When the sun (or moons) is out, they hide under logs or in vegetation to camouflage themselves from the few predators big enough to want to eat them. If rhinoceros beetles are disturbed, some can release very loud, hissing squeaks. The hissing squeaks are created by rubbing their abdomens against the ends of their wing covers. Rhinoceros beetles are relatively resilient; a healthy adult male can live up to 2-3 years. The males rarely live long after they mate.

These beetles' larval stages can be several years long. The larvae feed on rotten wood and the adults feed on nectar, plant sap and fruit. Hekate says that honey is an okay substitute, but the mangrove sap is too strong to be eaten as it is; I’d need to mix it with honey for her.

Anyway.

The larvae hatch from eggs and later develop into pupae before they reach adult status. The females lay 50 eggs on average per mating cycle. Contrary to what their size may imply, adult rhinoceros beetles do not eat large amounts, unlike their larvae, which eat a significant amount of rotting wood.

Rhinoceros beetles have become popular pets in parts of Sout, due to being relatively clean, easy to maintain, and safe to handle. Also in Asia, male beetles are used for gambling fights; beetle pitting. Since males naturally have the tendency to fight each other for the attention of females, they are the ones used for battle. To get the two male beetles to lock in combat, a female beetle or a small noisemaker is used to duplicate the female's mating call.

Entomologist Séveral Insectorzo suggests the larvae contain much more protein (40%), than chicken (20%) and beef (approximately 18%) and they could become a protein source for a large human population. Cousin Allegria cooked larva stew sometimes, and I have to say- they don’t taste bad, if they’re spiced correctly. Really, most things are a matter of spices.

Some species can become major pests in tree plantations. Usually though, beetle population densities are not as high as in some other pest insects, and food trees which are typically already sick or dying from some other cause are preferred. Some species’ larvae, however, will attack healthy trees or even root vegetables, and when they occur in large numbers, can cause economically significant damage. The fungus Metarhizium anisopliae is a proven biocontrol agent for beetle infestation in crops; however, the Riding Beetle, which Hekate-chan is, was bred specifically to be resistant to this fungus.

Dr. MinJun Kim, leading a team of engineers in International Science Foundation-funded research, examined the function and aerodynamics of the Allomyrina dichotoma beetle, with the help of researchers in Drexel University’s Mechanical Engineering Department and in collaboration with Konkuk University on Trillity. Rhinoceros beetles could play a big part in the next generation of skycraft design.

I know all of this because Mab not only lent me books on the subject, which are back in the Library now, but got me a magazine subscription to Bug Lover’s Monthly, a research-fanzine about all kinds of cool creepy crawlies.

This month’s edition was all about beetles.

Luffy likes reading them too, and he likes helping me wipe down Hekate-chan’s carapace. I like pressing him into the warm bulk of Hekate-chan’s body, taking honey-sweet kisses from his lips and stroking gentle hands through his short hair. He’s hot and smooth in my arms, his skin like velvet or the smooth dusty rubber of a rain boot when it hasn’t rained for weeks.

Congress of the lips, dance of the tongues; and Luffy likes it when I pin his hips with mine.

God, I missed him.

And god knows Hekate-chan doesn’t care at all; she’s taking a nap, actually.

I still don’t like bugs, of course. Gurry offered to feed Hekate-chan, but I told him that I’m trying to get over my phobia- so he said he’d watch from the Galley door, and if I was looking odd, he’d come over and help.

I take Hekate-chan’s bucket of feed- honey mixed with berries and sliced fruit- in it’s weird plunger thing, because honey is still very sticky, and I carefully walk over to her feeding trough and shunk it all in for her. I check her water, see it could use refilling. As I recall, her watering hose is over on the other side of her, so- I walk around, grab the hose and start uncoiling it. Plop the hose end into the water-trough, and go back around. I ignore Usopp pounding a whining Luffy into the brick, his springy dick and balls bouncing with each of Usopp’s thrusts, and I turn the water on. There’s a specific change in light I have to watch for across Hekate-chan’s elytra, because her water refracts in different ways when there’s more and less of it.

Meaning, I end up voyeurizing on Usopp and Luffy. This is not the first time I’ve done this; those two in particular will fuck anytime, anywhere, for almost no reason I can see. Boredom, even. Luffy is so flexible, he can actually autofellate himself, which I haven’t really done since I was sixteen; that’s when my core muscles really started building up, and now… I’m flexible enough to do it, I just… hm. Mab might like to watch me do that, actually; that might be fun, and a better reason to do that than just general sexual frustration.

I screwed a coconut out of sexual frustration; and then I had to eat the cum covered fruit within, because Wasting Food is Bad. I didn’t eat the ginger, though. Some things ought not be eaten.

Luffy comes in shuddering white spurts against the brick, with Usopp not far after. White oozes out of Luffy’s pink asshole, over his black-haired balls, dripping across his thighs and against the brick of Hekate’s courtyard.

As Usopp reduces Luffy to a mewling, squirming mess, his head pressed between Luffy’s thighs and steady slurping sounds rasping out- the light changes. I turn the hose off, and start coiling it back up. Hekate-chan isn’t a horse, so the sliding motion of the hose doesn’t spook her; and Luffy and Usopp are so interested in each other, they really haven’t noticed me at all. Believe me, I’d Know if they had.

Hmm.

I think I’m bisexual.

Mab!

Sanji!?

Mab, I think I’m bisexual!

Ah! Um… I mean…

…that’s not as big a surprise to you as it was to me, is it.

Sorry, my dearest one.

Right. Um… while you’re out, could you… I know Fae can do all kinds of things concerning gender. Um.

Sanji, do you want to try homosexual relations with your wife? Who can turn herself into a man, if the occasion calls for it?

Yes. If that’s okay?

Okay; I’d be delighted. I’ll need to get some toys, and some other supplies; I’ll finish up here at the foundry, and then bring Zoro back. After lunch I’ll go get what we’ll need.

…As simple as that?

If you want, yes.

Oh. Okay. Yes, as simple as that.
Okay. See you soon, my dearest!

Love you, honeybee.

Holy fuck, I love my wife so much.

“So, that’s the last pawnshop that might have had a suitable blade; and you were not satisfied. Iron Works?”

“Iron Works.”

“Okay- take my hand, I don’t want to lose you in this crowd.”

The street is nearly empty because it’s almost brunch-time, but my point still stands; I don’t want to lose Zoro in this crowd. It’s all hookers, drug dealers, flower sellers, and pickpockets over here; Zoro would kill someone, left unguarded. We passed three opium dens and a goddamn Tastee Freeze to get here, this place is Not Good.

Anyway.

Consider the construction of the necessary blades. Estern philosophy holds that during pregnancy, blades- usually knives, but swords are acceptable- are placed under the woman’s bed to protect her from evil spirits.

A nodachi. Because I can.

Bagh Nakh; used in open hand fighting, a palm full of claws.

Sai are technically speaking, blades- they’re the lovechild of tonfa and daggers, and if I tip them- no, not the center tine, the outer two, those are the parts that can slash and cut. The center of a Sai is for sword-breaking; and Sai come and go in sets of two. Blue and yellow wire wrapped handles on the Sai; not traditional, but… these are primarily for ceremony. Of course, like all true ceremonial blades, they’re still weapons.

Rain, Cloud, Wind, Thunder and Lightning. Cutlass is the favorite of pirates because it’s nature is water; nodachi billows like a cloud; bagh nakh, because the wind is an open palm full of claws; and sai, thunder to break, lightning to stab and shatter.

“I always forget your mother’s a blacksmith.”

“Yeah, it doesn’t really come up much, does it.”
“Still- it really is kind of astounding how many skills you have.”

“You think?”

“Yeah.”

“Well, and you don’t? I’m no jeweler- the closest I get is silversmithing.”

“I’m honestly best at gem-cutting, if we’re talking jewelry.”

“Hm. You might like glassworking; crystalsmithing, maybe.”

“Oh?”

“Mm. Yoru does not have gems in it’s hilt, after all.”

“...Those are glass?”

“Of course they are, gems couldn’t take the weight distribution runes. Let’s see... Ah, I remember. The green cabochons in the cross-guard; I made those when I was... ten, maybe? That, and I ground the shape of the blade; that’s apprentice work, after all. Yes; the green ones help distribute the weight correctly on the sword, the blue ones protect it from rust, and I think that’s it...”

“...”

“...What, you thought he just found that sword?”

“I- your mother really is the Greatest Blacksmith in the World, isn’t she.”

“Weaponsmith; the Greatest Blacksmith is... I think a village blacksmith somewhere on the Red Line? And she only really does four kinds of weapons; I’m the Greatest when it comes to Silversmithing, spears, needles, and knives, too.”

“...Really?”

“Mm, since Gabby went into architecture, yeah.”

“...Will you make me a dagger?”

“If you have dagger money, sure. I’ll write up a price for you, after you tell me what you want.”

“Just like that?”

“Just like that.”

“Oh.”

“Mm, thinking of it now, I’m going to have to get some cast off junk, so- this me is going to go get basic iron and other metals. That me is going to get some other things- tools, mostly. And I’m staying with you; we need things like wood bits and such, for handles and scabbards and so on.”

“Okay.”
Four Bird Skulls, from the birds of South, North, East, and West; Three Needles, of Bone, Wood, and Metal; Two Strands, one of braided hair, one of leather; and One Clock, to keep the pace.

I have traded for the Skulls, and- after Mark quick quick coated them with sapphire so they wouldn’t chip or break, put them away until I have need of them, away in my locker.

I still have horsetails of white and black, and I will weave a strong strand of twisted horsehair soon enough… it’s the leather that’s giving me trouble now.

Hell with it; I cut simple deer leather cords, braid them square and long enough to strangle a man with, cap them with bronze fixings and tiny golden bells shaped like seed pods or closed up clams I had in my jewelry box- really not much more than a cloth lined curio basket no bigger than a hand mirror, I don’t really wear jewelry. Oil the leather with coconut oil; coat the metal with waxy polish. Done.

Silky horsehair cords, monkey’s fist knotted around a baoding ball- one of two- then braid the twined horsehair threads down, down, wax to make it smooth and stick together tight, down, down, down again until- the horse hair braid is the same length as the leather, long enough to strangle a man, monkey’s fist around the other baoding ball. They chime, but soft, soft- and I can make them silent, if I need to. Hang it from my neck, and the round ends chime gently where they bump against my stomach.

The set of things is tradition; I can change it, if I want, and I do want. So. Four Skulls of Bird; Four Spines of Fish. Seven Needles, All Wood. Three Strands; Of Horsehair braided fine, of Leather, woven stiff, and of Metal, chained unbreakable. A Clock, to keep the pace. A Log Pose of Paradise, to know where we’ve been- and, I’ve a hunch. I’ll see if I can’t make a better compass…

Draw it first, Taffy.

Mab makes it very easy to forget how strong she actually is. Physically, she’s as much a member of the Monster Quartet as me, Sanji, and Luffy; she’s carrying all the tools and all the metals she just bought, and the other things- woods, leathers, coils of wire, uncut gemstones and precious materials; all of that, she’s carrying in large duffles across her back. She carries them like it’s nothing.

I mean, it makes sense- I helped her with laundry, before we had a washing machine; she still doesn’t use the thing if the weather is nice. She says that line-dried is nicer, and machine washed clothing makes people weak.

There are very few things heavier than a vat of wet clothing; Mab moves six or seven of them around like they’re weightless, or the toys of a child. I still have trouble moving one without spilling- Mab can move three at a time without making the water jostle at all.

Mab can actually lift all of my weights- not sustained lifting, that’s not what she’s trained for, but. She can pick them up and move them, if they’re in her way. She can catch them out of the air, too, if they’re falling. That’s actually what she’s best at- catching things midair.

Anyway.
We go back to the ship; lunch is… don’t ever tell Sanji I wrote this, but it’s extra delicious, which usually means either Sanji’s celebrating some random holy day only he really cares about aside from the big eight, or he’s learned something that’s upsetting. I mean. He could have figured out that he’s bisexual; he’s actually very attracted to every member of the crew, not just Mab and the other women. He’s even attracted to Mark, Taffy, and Bryony, and he treats them like younger sisters, or older daughters- still, if he got a chance, he’d definitely have sex with them.

Sanji, even with the alleviation of his faults of inflexibility and misogyny, is still a horndog. If it was willing, he’d fuck it. Man, woman, old, young; alive, undecided- Sanji would fuck a goddamn ghost, if he got the chance.

I’m not sure if he’s actually realized that about himself yet, or what. I mean- I remember guys like that from back in Shimotsuki...

The tradition for the summer is, every person who turned fifteen that year would be initiated into the Mysteries of Ares and Aphrodite. It was a ceremony, a holy day, a rite of passage, and… gods, I can look back on it and smile, now. Not quite then- but now.

The first half of the ceremony is for Ares, god of War- he’s got many names, of course, but his planet is Mars, and his Moon is Hevring, and he holds dominion over all things war is- a battle for food, for water, for women to fuck who aren’t your sisters; for land, for kings, for gods, for dominion. Ares is also the god of Harvest- when the war is done, you go home; walk behind the ploughshare and put away your sword. Drink, and feast, and work until the job is done; put babies by for the wintertime in their mother’s gardens, and enjoy the pleasures of life, until you are called to arms again.

So.

The first half of the ceremony is outdoors, mostly in the morning; everyone who is of age or older strips down to their bare skin. Us youngsters, who were just being initiated, were anointed with palm oil steeped with sacred herbs- everyone else got covered in regular palm oil, maybe with some rose petals in if it was a good year. Then, we play the Games; the Knock-down Game, which the miller’s daughter, Anais, could not be beaten at. Rin’levio, a favorite of the herding boys from out in the country- and my sisters, and Jack of Nimville, are unmatched at that game of tag, chase, catch, jail, and escape.

As the day wears on, the adults- well, I say adults, but they can’t have been more than teenagers, older than us initiates and flush with pride in it- they’d separate the initiates into groups of two or three, tug us away from the big games to play smaller ones. Touch this- find the grossest thing you can and touch it, first one to say “No” or “I will not” is out. Stretch and hold- what weird shape can you fold your body into, and the winner is the one who stumps the rest. Feats of strength, which was my passion at the time- pull this treestump from the ground, lift this rock, push this down- that’s what I was good at.

Anais was huge; the size of a full grown man at the age of fifteen, and she’d only get bigger as time went on. Last I saw her, she was the size of Fuckin’ Kuma, and that was four year's ago at least. She was curvy, too; she’d been fat as a child on bread and milk and sugar, and then she’d grown muscles under the fat as she did more and more work in her father’s mill, after he took sick. Every harvest, us boys at the dojo would bring her the wheat, after we’d threshed it- and, looking back on it now, she would only get more beautiful as the years passed.

It’s an odd ceremony, that Mystery Rite; for one thing, all the “normal” rules about having children out of wedlock are put aside- called “gifts of the gods”, it’s almost encouraged that the boys in the ceremony impregnate the girls.
Anais had an oval face; a sharp nose, a bit like mine but with a big, classical curve in it, like the statues of the Gods in the temple. Her hair was the color of wheatstraw, and her eyes were the color of cornflowers. Her tits, at fifteen, were the size of cantaloupe melons, the kind you bring to someone’s house as a gift; her hips were round, and even though there was still a layer of fat over her muscle, it wasn’t bad at all.

As day turns to night, so too do the games of the ceremony become less challenge, and war-like, and more teasing and caressing. Eventually, it was me and Anais in a bower of roses, with the instruction to rut and make merry with each other until the sun rose up again. We had a basket of food, and jugs of water and wine, and each other, naked and oiled and filthy from the war-games- and we were fifteen, and horny.

We kissed, but it was awful; I realize now that Anais was actually a lesbian, and she knew it, even then- but where she was willing to go along to get along, I eventually- well. We rutted, as we were bid; her vagina was warm and deep and willing, and I was fifteen and stupid with lust, and I suppose I must have slept at least once or twice, because I can remember awakening to my hips helplessly thrusting into her warm pull. I poured my seeds into fertile earth, that second night and day and night again; and when the ceremony ended...

I can remember, as the sun rose again, seeing her face pinched with- and that, and my own drive to become, stopped me from having sex for a good year after that. Of all the people from my home village, Anais was the one, after Kuina, who knew me the best; Kuina was my rival. Anais was my friend; she’s the one who fed me, made sure I could find my way back to the dojo, had clothing for the winter. It was Anais who told me, six months pregnant with my seed, that I didn’t belong in this tiny backwater village at the edge of nowhere special. Told me that I wasn’t ready for anything like the responsibility of being a parent- said I’d be miserable, and make them inside her miserable too.

Said, “Fah, Zoro- if you want to be the Greatest Swordsman in the World, go! You would give them your name? Fine, I’ll take it for them; but we are not married, or lovers. I don’t need you here; I’ve siblings, and friends, and a lover…”

“Ayais, are you really sure Rosie means to marry you?”

“Aye. I’m sure.”

“Alright. I’ll go. -Thank you, Anna.”

“Zoro, if you become anything less than the Greatest in the World, I shall be very disappointed indeed.”

And that was that. I fought on my sister and my good-sister’s behalves- Rosie, and Anais- when the time came to defend their suit in the Court of Swans. Two women had never married before then, in Shimotsuki Village; and, as in all things, Roronoa Rosa Maria had to be the First.

I gained renown as the best Swordsman in Shimotsuki, because my sister married Anais, and they’re both my sisters, now; hadn’t thought of it in years, but there it is. Defeated all challengers in open combat, as is proper; stayed for the marriage ceremony, which was long and rather boring. The wedding- the dances, the party, the food- that was nice, actually.

And the birth was… eh. I was mostly there so Merimay didn’t pass out or decide to fight anyone; we spent that long hot afternoon fighting each other in the mud and grass out back near the mill-pond, when Anna’s time came.

Five girls my good-sister brought into the world, with hair of dark avocado green, and soft honeydew rind green, and green like the shell of a grasshopper, and green like a chunk of turquoise, and green like linen before it’s blanched- a sort of golden-green color. Five pretty girls, to follow like ducklings behind their mothers’ skirts. Dorothy, Alice, Coraline, Finn, and Riley. Rosie will teach them how to do all manner of things; and Anna will keep them upright, and good, and grounded in the good earth. My nieces will grow up strong and happy and so, so loved; which is really all I can ask for.

Told my sisters all about Nami; both of them were so happy for me, so proud that I’d managed to see beyond the blackness of my blades to the rest of creation. When I told them my intentions regarding Nami- not the, er, the sexual things, merely that I would marry her and have children with her, if she deemed it good- they sent me more well wishes, and asked to be introduced to Nami, which I did.

It’s funny- some of the coolest things Mab’s ever done has everything to do with her being lazy. Like- the system by which our watches are run? Entirely because Mab was tired of taking third watch every time- and never mind that she’s always awake at five in the morning, she didn’t want the job all the time. We have a schedule now.

I’ll let her tell you about the new postal service though.

And that should do it- I’ve finished sorting all the metal we got at the foundry, and put away my new-old tools, and I’m coming back from the sex shop in the Goblin Market; Sanji and I will explore his new to him side slowly, and with lots of care. Mhm.

Nami wants to have her children in her own bed, if possible- which is fine, as the Infirmary isn’t all that comfortable, and her bed really does have a great deal more space. Honestly, she could have her baby in the bath-tub, and it’d still be fine; women have been having babies in weird places since before there were places to have babies.

She’s also asked me to give her baby- or babies, we’re not sure yet as I still can’t get a heartbeat and she refuses to let Chopper use that new-fangled ultra-sonar device until more is understood about the effects it may have on pre-natal tissue, more power to her- their first bath, to which I, weepingly, agreed. It’s a very… it’s something you ask a sister to do, or your mother, or your grandmother. Robin’s helping Nami pick their names, and the Kids are helping Nami with other things- toys, baby room, and so on- but…

Ach, think of something else, Mab, or you’ll weep the day away.

Much like the old Oharan bookmobiles which, even though Ohara is gone, the perambulating bookmobiles, with their kind-eyed librarians and their carefully tended boxes of lending-books, are not; so, too, are the many postal services, clinging to life.

Each Blue had their own clunky postal service.

Nort had the Tradesmen, caravans of traders and horse-sellers who could certainly put a letter or two in with their other papers, and carry them on to the next city.

Est had their Waveriders, mostly couriers who’d take letters on if they were asked nicely.

Sout had Hopalongs, knifegrinders who, in the course of their travels from village to village, would share gossip, news- and would certainly take a letter on to th’ next town.

Wes had Door Priests, who would protelestize for free and carry letters for a small donation, thank you, thank you, good gods thank you.

Skua? Skua had Charnel Workers, actually; the Gravediggers all know each other, and if you need a letter to get across the world in a hurry, no one else can manage it quite like those who tend the dead.

None of these people talked to each other.

Now, I’d spent a while ferrying letters back and forth amongst the crew, and… it occurred to me that there had to be a better way. Enter Kikiora of Tiffany Harbor.

Kikiora’s mother, Kiki, had come to stay some twenty years before- started a delivery service, of all things. Married a man named Tombo. Anyway, Kikiora, thirteen when we spoke and fourteen when we agreed, decided to expand what her mother did- but rather than expand her mother’s old business, which her brothers were happy to take over, Kikiora decided that she wanted to go international.

All this to say, I’m the silent funding partner of the new International Postal System and Courier Service. IPSCS has a uniform of red head adornment, be it feathers, a cap, a hat, a hanky, or a bow; black under-suit, much like a charnel worker’s; and an overcoat the Postal Worker provides for themselves. I also brokered the deal by which the IPSCS carries missives from the Bank, which makes the IPS respectable. It’s almost entirely manned by witches, too, which is fun.

Anyway, it meant I got to design the clothing for working witches in a job that was entirely new; new struggles, new worlds, new ideas needing to be expressed.

They are heirs of the New World - the world beyond the control of the old World Government. And I got to codify their uniforms!

Ahem.

It is said that as many days as there are in the whole journey, so many are the witches and birds that stand along the road by-the-sea, each bird and witch at the interval of a day’s journey; and these are stayed neither by snow nor rain nor heat nor darkness from accomplishing their appointed course with all speed.

IPSCS. Accept no substitutes.

Four Skulls of Bird; Four Spines of Fish. Seven Needles, All Wood. Three Strands; Of Horsehair braided fine, of Leather, woven stiff, and of Metal, chained unbreakable. A Clock, to keep the pace. Four Log Poses of Paradise, to know where we’ve been- and three for the New World, to know where we’re going.

And three Eternal Poses, so we can always go home.
Better, but not quite right.

It’s put together much like an astrolabe or-- really, a gyroscope, my compass. The first ring-layer is the Skulls, which move freely in any direction when unlocked; then the second, with four log poses, and the third, with three eternal poses; and the final one, which has the New World pose in the center. It’s just a drawing, right now.

Can’t make it just yet.

Soon.

Anyway, it’s time to fix my shuko and ashiko; they’re for climbing on shear surfaces, not fighting. I mean, I can fight with them, but I’d really need a pair of Bagh Nakh for that particular style, and… I just haven’t found a pair I like.

It’s funny-- after I grew my hair out, the hairstyle I picked was the traditional Wanokuni Women’s cut; the clothes I wear are Skuan Professional Standard. And yet… for some things, I still haven’t found what I like.

I haven’t seen Banana around for a while, but I’m sure she’s fine.

Banana, stop climbing the galley’s table lamp! I know, it’s nice and branch-like, but it’s not rated for your projected future weight-- at least let Franky-mister fix it up first! Come on!

No, I won’t let Marzipan can your noodles, and I won’t let him make eggs with you; yes, really. You’re much too young, for one, and for the other, Marzipan is a girl. Come on, Banana- attaboy. Let’s find you a nice patch of shade, alright?

Alright.

“Hey, Franky?” I say.

“Y-yeah, Gurry?” stutters Franky.

“Can you fix anything hanging, like these lights, so they’ll hold more than one hundred and thirteen kilograms? Banana is still just a pup, really…” I say, cheerfully and then I realize I’m talking in front of a group of people I only mostly know what if they don’t like me BACK, ANXIETY! FREDDY; BACK I SAY!

“If I do that, I might as well make a snake branch or two, give both of them some enrichment…” muses Franky.

“Ah, really!?” I chirrup in unison with Banana and Marzipan.

“Hey, you never said you could talk to snakes!” shouted Chopper from the doorway of the Infirmary, before realizing- and goddamnit, Chopper will not hurt me, come the fuck on.
“Ah, sorry. It just… didn’t come up? But, um, how did you think any of the Amazonian Archers did their thing without being able to…? It’s almost like expecting a Fae to not be able to speak to bugs, really…” I say.

“Wait, what?” says Bryony- when did she- no, she was on the couch, calm down Anxiety!Freddy.

“Yeah, almost every Fae can speak to at least one kind of bug, mostly on instinct. Taffy’s a little odd, in that her snake eats bugs, but you get some like that; my father spoke to hawks and eagles, so. It comes up, now and again… And Mab’s ability to speak to all bugs is just a sign of how much she sacrificed, to keep her treasure.” I say.

My crewmates blink. Sanji sighs, then nods, once-

“She really is the kindest woman in the world.” says Sanji.

“She really is. If it meant never having a snake companion again… god, it’d be like… like not being able to draw, or cook, or make music, but deeper- like cutting out a piece of your tongue forever, and having to accept that you can’t make it better and it’s never coming back. I don’t think I could do that.” I say, holding Banana close to my chest as I think about the sheer sacrifice the Queen of Maggots made for her Treasured ones.

I couldn’t have done what she did. She surely is born of monstrous strength.

The sound of Franky doing something to the hanging light over the kitch- Galley, the galley table fills the room. Breathe through the silence. Breathe, Gurry. Breathe.

Franky finishes, and-

See, was that so bad? He’s done now, so you can go right back if you’d like. I thought you might-yeah, here you go.

Marzi, you leave that sweet boy alone, he’s just a baby. No, Marzi. Let’s go find you some crickets to eat, okay? Okay.

And I leave the Galley to do just that.

______________________________

I’m sure she’s fine. Banana’s a good girl, hardly ever does silly things like try to eat things bigger than the thickest part of her body, or climb on branches that don’t exist.

Now, concerning the proper attunement of my Compass; there are four directions, and four elements. I have the directions… really, I don’t need four log poses.

So.
Four Skulls of Bird, who always know the True Directions.

Four Spines of Fish, for myself because I’m a fancy bitch and I know it.

Seven Needles, All Wood- to invoke the proper elements.

Three Strands; Of Horsehair braided fine, of Leather, woven stiff, and of Metal, chained unbreakable.

A Clock, to keep the pace.

Four Eternal Poses, so we can always go home.

And three Log Poses, so we can find our way.

Four Log Poses of Paradise, to know where we’ve been- and three for the New World, to know where we’re going.

And three Eternal Poses, so we can always go home.

Each element can be categorized with a few descriptions about what it does and what it’s for.

Water: the cold of the deep places, a pebble falling into a pond and disappearing without a ripple, a river flowing around the stones in it’s path, a mirror reflecting endlessly, a womb.

Fire: the bright flame of a candle in the dark, the heat of a hearth in winter, a wild fire which consumes even ash, the touch of a lover, testicles.

Wind: the gale which crushes the tree down, the breeze which cuts with its quickness, the endless aerostream which grinds the mountain to dust, the cooling of sweat with a fan, the first and last breath of a living being.

Lightning: the twitch of muscles firing, the lightning bolt which flies unerring towards its target through anything in it’s way, the static attraction of a storm clinging to your skin, the jolt of a new idea, the first spark of baelfire.

Earth: the solid dam which holds back the river, the crushing weight of a meteor, the pillar around which fires flow and is not consumed, the darkest black of a mineshaft, bones.

Metal: the ability to become more than what was before, the thing that carries what is vital, the flexible nature of that which can always change, a coin, a blade, a drop of blood.

Wood: life, memory, magic, patience, love.

I understand all the elements; but Wood is the one I have the least language for. Honestly, I could just ask Franky to make some for me out of Adam wood, but… I dunno. I can’t get them as gifts; they have to be traded for.

Hmm.

Maybe just talk to him about it? Just talk to him about it.
I stand, loop my woven strands over my swordstand’s bracing, and go on down to Franky-town.

Oh god, what the hell, why did I say that?

It’s interesting; during the Separation, I actually became much more cognizant of World Events. So, in order:

During the War of the Paramount, Monkey D. Luffy and Portgas D. Ace are revealed to the public—as are their sires. Harriet Morgan, the Nightmare Shichibukai, died when former Admiral Akainu’s magma fist went through her chest. Akainu then died in battle against the Queen of Maggots, resulting in the creation of Three Mountain Pass, the destruction of Marineford, and the Sundering of Heaven.

Blackbeard revealed that he invaded Impel Down in order to liberate and recruit several convicts from the apocryphal Level 6: Vasco Shot, Catarina Devon, Sanjuan Wolf, Avalo Pizarro, and the former chief jailer of Impel Down, Shiliew. However, on the field at Marineford, Shiliew of the Rain, and his sword, Raindancer, were killed by Dracule ‘Foxeye’ Taffeta, and her sword, Kusanagi. As far as any expert can say, the Kusanagi which fought at Marineford is the true Kusanagi.

With the imminent destruction of Mariejoa—the mountain on which Mariejois sat—and the subsequent shattering of Marine power worldwide, Dracule ‘Hawkeye’ Mihawk quit the field and joined the flight of Luffy and Ace. There’s also some debate over whether or not the Hawkeye and the Foxeye are siblings, as they share remarkable similarities; it might be so that the World’s Greatest Swordsman was merely following behind his younger sister, for a change.

Marshall D. Teach, aka Blackbeard, quit the field not because of the arrival of Shanks and the Red Hair Pirates, but because in the course of the Battle of Three Mountains, after Akainu was slain, a Hurricane was left in the place of the two destroyed mountains. This Hurricane, being an island-killing storm, made every able-bodied soul on the field of battle flee for safety.

The War of the Paramount ended with a Hurricane destroying not only Mariejoa, but scouring Marineford nearly clean of all man-made structures, taking it down to bare dirt, and—of all things to survive—a bell tower, with it’s bell and ringing mechanisms still intact.

It was this bell that Monkey D. Luffy, Captain of the Straw Hat Pirates; Portgas D. Ace, the Pyreman, Second Division Commander of the Whitebeard Pirates; Gol D. Spadille, the Wandering Sparrow, Sage of the Salt Wastes, Captain of the Sparrow Alliance; and Mab Morgan, Queen of Maggots, the Sexiest Woman in the World, rang. Portgas, Gol, and Morgan rang the bell in honor of those that had fallen in battle. Monkey rang the bell to usher in a New Era. This event is called The Winning Hand at the Bell-Tower.

Monkey D. Garp, sometimes called The Hero of the Marines, sometimes called The Fist of Justice, resigned from the Marines, citing age, conflict of interest, and dissatisfaction with his job. Sengoku. who lost an arm in battle with Vritra, a Leviathan of the Sea, also resigned from the Marines, citing age, injury, and dissatisfaction with his job.

Monkey D. Luffy, Jinbe the Sea Knight, Trafalgar Law, the Surgeon of Death and Captain of the Heart Pirates were the first outside males ever permitted to set foot on Amazon Lily, an island that is usually off-limits to foreign men. On the Forging Shore of Amazon Lily, where volcanic sand and the mother of the Amazons herself, Medusa, keep watch, Harriet Morgan was prepared for entombment.

Her funeral was not a traditional one; as, although her flesh was stripped from her bones by her eldest living daughter, and those bones were then adorned with gold, gems, and other precious materials, and those beautiful charnel pieces were carried off by Death’s Own Rider, the Crow Goddess Morrigan- as is proper, for a Queen of the Fae who dies in Battle… Even with all of that, Harriet Morgan’s flesh was not consumed by her children. Thus, her funeral cannot be said to be in the traditional manner of the Fae; and, while some speculate that the corpse laid to rest on the black-sand shore of Amazon Lily was perhaps not truly Harriet Morgan, those who know the traditions of the Fae are quick to point out that the Fae do not bury people in the manner in which that body was unless it has earned such.

For most of history, which precedes the written word for millennia, the Fae did not bury their dead at all. It is only now, in these more civilized times, that the great roasting pits of the fae fall silent, and their hills of bones and gold no longer cast their grim shadows over all.

After the Funeral of Harriet Morgan, the various factions that had gathered on Amazon Lily departed, in the general confusion following The Winning Hand. It came to light some months later that the Heart Pirates, led by Trafalgar Law, and the Moon Pirates, led by Trafalgar Lamia, had allied themselves permanently- swearing a blood-oath of fraternity, a sacred bond that even now, in this modern era, even the most heretical of persons counts as sacrosanct.

The original childhood lab of Dr. Vegapunk on Karakuri Island exploded; known to the world as the "Nightmare of Baldimore", this event spawned The Legend of the Sacred Burning Beast of Baldimore. According to Franky, the Legend is really like this: The Scariba Imminent, who once dwelt in the winding caves and tunnels of Baldimore-Below, had various bolt holes and hides in their Hive. In truth, the Hive was built more like a warren.

Now, after the Nightmare of Baldimore, which Franky accidentally caused, the local Marines began investigating the lab, and all the secrets that had been revealed in it’s destruction. The Scariba Imminent were almost discovered several times; however, due to prior planning, and quick thinking on many parts, almost all the revealed passages into the Scariba hive were dismissed as natural formations that were covered during the construction of the old laboratory.

Unfortunately, the cave in which the Destructor, William Danaus, had secreted Franky in was different. Due to some mistakes in construction, a hollow chimney had been left active in that high cave; and, with various doors, once open, now shut, this chimney poured smoke like from the top of a crucible during the forging of a sword.

Franky, at the time, was wearing the pelt of a tiger as a warming cape, and various tiger-striped piecemeal garments to help protect his body from the bitter cold. He was also, and this is important, trying to find where the chimney actually was in the face of the rock.
Basically, Franky accidentally set himself on fire and ran out, screaming, because he couldn’t get the fur off of him quite fast enough. He just happened to do this right when the Marines were at the entrance of the cave; and, as those particular Marines were a superstitious and gods-fearing lot, they took the appearance of a screaming, flaming tiger as a sign from the gods, and fled that place.

That cave was declared, without debate, as sacred ground. Franky burned only half his eyebrow off.

And thus was The Legend of the Sacred Burning Beast of Baldimore created.

Congruent to that, was this: Monkey D. Luffy decided to disband the Straw Hat Pirates for two years in order to allow the crew to train and become stronger. Mab Morgan, using her mystical powers, informed the crew of the Captain's orders, hid their ship, the Thousand Sunny, and along with all the other Straw Hats- vanished from the public eye.

Buggy the Clown was invited into the Shichibukai, and accepted.

Sometime later that year, the Admirals Aokiji and Kizaru fought each other for the vacant position of Fleet Admiral. Engaged in a duel to the death on Punk Hazard, which lasted for ten days and left both men severely wounded, the position actually went to Senior Admiral Tsuru. She appeared on the field of Battle and stated that ‘She had neither time nor patience for idiot boys measuring their dicks; there was work to be done, and she needed able hands to do it.’ Then, in classic fashion, she Washed them Up and Hung them Out to Dry.

Tsururao Kohinoor, who now calls herself Tsuru, is one of the few remaining descendants of Uzumiki Kohinoor, who survived the Siege of Frostfang Ridge, which was the final battle of the Winter Wars, and the reason House Morgan is Royal at all. During the Winter Wars, the Alliance of Morgan, Portgas, Blair, Basajaun, Aodh, Leland, Samir, Nou, Purnima, Shankara, Tsetseg, and Shihab threw down the old Queens of Winter, thus breaking their power over all Fae, forever. This alliance, called the Zodiac Alliance, set the stage for the Long Summer, wherein the ancient Mother of the Fae, Pandora, was born.

During her youth, Tsuru was known as the Ghoul of Winter’s Grace; and, being pure-blooded Fae, as most Royals are, she can trace her Line back through the Ages some forty generations. Thus, while it was an old woman who joined the field of battle at Punk Hazard, it was a young woman, beautiful and strong, at the very height of her powers, who quit the field, a pair of abashed young men following in her wake.

Thus it was that the Great Staff of Justice, the Ghoul of Winter’s Grace, Tsururao Kohinoor became the Fleet Admiral of the Marines. She advocates for Radiant Justice, and with Aokiji and Kizaru behind her, has begun a systematic divorcing of Marine power from the Nobility. (Find evil, wherever it may lurk, and drag it to the light.)

The results of Fleet Admiral Tsuru’s ascendancy are as follows: Marineford, as the seat of the Marines power, was transferred to an undisclosed location in the New World. The relocation of the G-1 branch, and the reconstruction of the Marines as peacekeepers without bias for or against any Nobility. Now financed by the Bank of Dwarves, the Marines have the freedom to dispense Radiant, or ‘Clean’ Justice, as they see fit.

The battle between Aokiji and Kizaru caused one side of Punk Hazard to be permanently burnt to nothing, leaving the other half permanently frozen over. There is also a great cleave down the dividing line of these two states, put there by Fleet Admiral Tsuru herself. The World Military draft is held, swelling the ranks of the Marines to recover from their disastrous losses, and the two vacant Admiral positions are filled by Issho (Fujitora) and Ryokugyu.
In the Payback War, Marshall D. Teach was slain by the Pyreman, Portgas D. Ace.

This I can actually speak a bit more candidly about- during the Separation, I helped train Ace with his Devil Fruit power. He was stuck using only the physical applications of fire; there is more to fire than just the physical.

As a Shadow exists in all people, regardless of the presence of light or physical form; so too does Fire exist in all people, regardless of the presence of a physical flame. According to Asher, there’s a core of fire right behind and a little below the sternum in men, and right behind the navel in women, closer to the hips than anywhere else. If Asher flares that core of fire, that person will burn to ash so quickly, they won’t have time to scream. It’s a quick, painless death- there, then gone.

Asher killed his enemy, and was done with it. Blackbeard’s commanders quit the field in terror- and though there is no confirmed sighting of their corpses, the lower levels of the crew were no more than ash on the wind by days end. I had to hold Asher for a long time, after that battle; he’s still not quite okay about what he did, but… well. He got what he wanted; he wanted what he got. And still, he is not satisfied.

All I can say about it is: Death is inherently unsatisfying, to those who do not die.

Anyway.

What else was there- ah, yes. Bartolomeo the Cannibal appeared in the New World as a powerful new Super Rookie. Apparently, his nickname comes from Est, as he doesn’t actually eat people; he’s just really annoying.

Trafalgar Law obtained a bounty of 440,000,000 beri- that’s 4,400,000 dola, for those with an interest in such things- for reasons that were not released to the public. Lami, also, won’t say exactly what her brother did- and not because she doesn’t know, she just won’t say. After sending the disembodied (but living) hearts of 100 pirates to Marineford, he was appointed to a Shichibukai position. As far as I can read from between Lami’s lines, he’s doing it for shits and giggles; and also to maneuver himself into position for something.

Hell if I know what- it really doesn’t seem like his style at all.

According to Bryony Lovelace, who knows all kinds of secrets she ought not, Scratchmen Apoo, Basil Hawkins, and Eustass Kidd, are in an alliance to kill Kaido. They have not been successful.

Oh, yes, and most interesting of all: Capone Bege started planning the assassination of Big Mom sometime the summer before last. How do I know that? Forensic Accounting, mostly; and, of course… Bugs.

Here’s something most people don’t know; Capone Bege is a zealot, an intensely religious and gods-fearing man. Big Mom is a cannibal, and in the strictest sense; as far as my little Bug-friends can say, Big Mom hasn’t eaten any flesh but the flesh of humans since she was very young indeed. Cannibalism isn’t necessarily Wrong; but Big Mom feeds her appetite with Murder, which is Wrong. And Zealots are always ready to Correct those who are Wrong.

For the kind of zealot Capone Bege is, the proper way to ritually prepare to assassinate someone is to capture red dye cochinéal beetles and grind them into a powder, which is then used to dye fabric that the instigator of the assassination wears until their enemy is dead. Capone Bege wears bright red ties- or cravats, or what have you. He has since last summer.

It’s amazing what you can find out with a well-placed swarm of incredibly common (now, anyway) damsel-flies. They’re like sea-crickets. They show up just… everywhere.

I don’t look it, but the knowledge that my work so long ago is bearing fruit like this is just so… mm. Warms the cockles of my blood-filled heart. And it happened so long ago now… I rather doubt anyone realizes just what they are. Ehehe.

Like I said.

You simply cannot imagine the things I could do if I weren’t so committed to being… kind.

So. After we moved the ship to Takoyaki 8, we had to move it again to a location I won’t speak much on. I will say that it had very nice sand for digging a barbeque pit in, and Sanji cooks a delightful spread of food. So tasty.

Sanji doesn’t know how to act around men he thinks are attractive. He has deeply internalized androphobia, which he expresses as homophobia. So. The very first thing I did, once I read the instructions for the Dreamie Brand Removable Gender-reversal Masque and Body Shifter; well, actually…

Okay.

The Masque and Body Shifters are classed somewhere between dildo, piercings, and a medical device. Technically, the MBS is a kind of G or P-spot style toy.

Mundane versions of that kind of sex toy are designed to stimulate one particular part of the anatomy- the g-spot, in the vagina, or the prostate gland, in the anus. Most dildos are designed to give a more generally satisfying feeling of fullness, and perhaps feel good when moved in and out. Orgasming with a vibrator or with your hands and with a dildo can be very satisfying, as it gives you something to clench your vaginal muscles or your anal muscles around. If you like penetrative sex, like I do, a dildo is very handy in simulating intercourse with a partner. Mundane dildoes are available in a wide variety of shapes and textures, so one need never be bored.

Sex should not be boring.

Now, an MBS is a specialty device created with the aid of Djinni technology. It was invented primarily for the use of prostitutes, whereby a single woman or man could have the physicality of literally any tribe-member, without actually changing who they are. Think of it like a very interesting costume; basically, it became a useful way to schedule proper breaks and rest times for the prostitutes of Skua without sacrificing on availability of the various prostitutes, or saying “not available” to the customers, and every reputable whorehouse has their girls and boys using them.

For women, the procedure to use an MBS- of any kind- is fairly simple. A special grain-like device called a Shifter is inserted into the glans of the clitoris; it’s not a terribly painful procedure, and the grain is really no bigger than a poppy seed. The Body is another, slightly larger grain-like device, which is inserted into the very bottom most layer of scar tissue in the navel; the grain is about the size of a large mustard seed, and again, isn’t very painful. Finally, the Masque, a thread-like object that gets inserted subdermally in the scalp. Of all the procedures, it’s the Masque that’s the most painful-and the messiest. It’s also the one that healed the fastest.

Anyway, after that, it’s just a quick bit of training- in store, no less- to ensure that the person who gets an MBS can operate it correctly. Honestly, once I got used to having it, it’s very comfortable; a bit like wearing glasses, honestly. Now that I’m used to wearing them, I can hardly imagine life without mine; similarly, I can hardly imagine not being able to alter my outer appearance at will.

With that said, my specific model was built to reverse a person’s gender; when I use my MBS, I don’t change from say, a Fae woman to a Mermaid. I change from a Fae woman into a Fae man. Because of that, I was actually able to specifically select the features of my Male-form penis and testicles. In my… male aspect, let’s go with that. In my male aspect, I am physically very similar to my brothers, Ace and Spadey; not just in body type, but in facial anatomy as well. I believe I have a squarer face, and no real facial hair to speak of; some people can grow it. The best I can manage is sideburns. Anyway; my width when aroused is along the lines of two inches, or five point one centimeters; and my length is about six inches, or fifteen centimeters. I picked those dimensions because that’s the general width and length of every dildo I’ve ever liked enough to use more than once. I also like the slightly eye-popping sensation of being first penetrated, and the stimulation of my g-spot and other deep tissues- so the head of my male aspect penis is slightly knobby at the tip. My male aspect is fairly handsome, and has the most beautiful metallic blue wings I think I’ve ever seen.

Sanji can hardly stand me when I’m in my male aspect. He can barely stand to be in the same room as me. But he doesn’t want me to stop; he says that this thing is a problem he needs to get over, and he wants me to help him.

So. Exposure Therapy, of several kinds; because Hekate-chan is a giant female rhinoceros beetle and there may come a time when Sanji needs to ride on her back.

He’ll get there eventually.

Oh, and I also did the procedure to give Mark an MBS too; now, if the mood strikes him, he can be a man with a vagina, or a man with a penis- or even both, because I got him the super deluxe version because that two-for-one sale spread all over the island and I aimed to take advantage of it. After some thought, I got the super-bulk deluxe multi-pack, so now- everyone that wants to have the semi-illusory ability to change genders at will, can. Procedure takes about ten minutes per person, is mostly non-invasive, and- when done correctly- totally harmless.

The MBS is considered a dildo because, although the surfaces change according to gender or whatever preferences you have in mind… the persona created by the MBS is sterile. In my male aspect, I am sterile- I can orgasm, and I read as entirely healthy, but… I can’t make sperm. I’m a woman, underneath the facade.

Similarly, if, say, Luffy were to get a MBS and change into a woman, he wouldn’t be able to get pregnant because these are dildos from a sex-shop, not medical devices. I mean, yes, I know how to jailbreak them so they work like the medical versions meant for people who are transgender, but… I’m not going to do that unless it’s specifically necessary. Or requested of me.

Oh, and I also got a bunch of lube, and the bulk box of multi-size condoms because our crew is horny and one pregnant person is quite enough at a time, dammit.
Old Ray coated our ship in about eight hours of work; the extra two days where we couldn’t actually sail the ship for any reason was because it takes a full forty eight hours for the coating to cure. I took a look at the mix of coating he used- it really is just Yarukiman Mangrove sap with some powdered chemicals that Old Ray asked me not to name, so I won’t.

Let’s talk about tree sap.

Most people know what tree sap is but not necessarily the more scientific definition. Tree sap proper is the fluid transported in the xylem or phloem cells of a tree.

Xylem sap consists primarily of water, along with hormones, minerals, and nutrients. Xylem sap (pronounced /ˈzaɪlm/) consists primarily of a watery solution of hormones, mineral elements and other nutrients. Transport of sap in xylem is characterized by movement from the roots toward the leaves.

Over the past century, there has been some controversy regarding the mechanism of xylem sap transport; today, most plant scientists agree that the [cohesion-tension theory] best explains this process, but multiforce theories that hypothesize several alternative mechanisms have been suggested, including longitudinal cellular and xylem osmotic pressure gradients, axial potential gradients in the vessels, and gel- and gas-bubble-supported interfacial gradients.

Xylem sap transport can be disrupted by [cavitation] - an abrupt phase change of water from liquid to vapor- resulting in air-filled xylem conduits. In addition to being a fundamental physical limit on tree height, two environmental stresses can disrupt xylem transport by cavitation: increasingly negative xylem pressures associated with [water stress], and freeze-thaw cycles in temperate climates.

Phloem sap consists primarily of water, in addition to sugar, hormones, and mineral elements dissolved within it. Phloem sap (pronounced /ˈfloʊɛm/) consists primarily of sugars, hormones, and mineral elements dissolved in water. It flows from where carbohydrates are produced or stored (sugar source) to where they are used (sugar sinks).

The [pressure flow hypothesis] proposes a mechanism for phloem sap transport, although other hypotheses have been proposed. Phloem sap is also thought to play a role in sending informational signals throughout vascular plants. Loading and unloading patterns are largely determined by the conductivity and number of plasmodemata and the position-dependent function of solute-specific, plasma membrane transport proteins. Recent evidence indicates that mobile proteins and RNA- the splitter function of the Lineage Factor- are part of the plant's long-distance communication signaling system. Evidence also exists for the directed transport and sorting of macromolecules as they pass through plasmodemata.

A large number of insects of the order [Hemiptera] (the half-wings), feed directly on phloem sap, and make it the primary component of their diet. Phloem sap is nutrient-rich compared with many other plant products and generally lacking in toxins and feeding deterrents, yet it is consumed as the dominant or sole diet by a very restricted range of animals. This apparent paradox is explained by the fact that phloem sap is physiologically extreme in terms of animal digestion, and it is hypothesized that few animals take direct advantage of this because they lack two adaptations that are necessary to enable direct use by animals. These include the existence of a very high ratio of [non-essential] to [essential amino acids] in phloem sap for which these adapted Hemiptera insects contain symbiotic [microorganisms] which can then provide them with essential amino acids; and also insect tolerance of the very high sugar content and osmotic pressure of phloem sap is promoted by their possession in the gut of sucrase-transglucosidase activity, which transforms excess ingested sugar into long-chain oligosaccharides. I actually have a thriving colony of such microorganisms, and Fae are predisposed to process a very sugar-high diet; it’s one of the only ways to build up enough of an energy store in anything approaching a reasonable timeframe. There’s a reason my emergency ration kit is a handful of small cardboard packets of heavily starched fortified protein powder suspended in honey, and it’s not because I like the taste. Fedloem is not tasty, and there’s no way to change that without sacrificing one of it’s vital aspects; be it shelf stability, weight, or nutrient content. Sanji’s tried. It can’t be done.

A much larger set of animals do however consume phloem sap by proxy, either "through feeding on the honeydew of phloem-feeding hemipterans. Honeydew is physiologically less extreme than phloem sap, with a higher essential to non-essential amino acid ratio and lower osmotic pressure, or by feeding on the biomass of insects that have grown on more direct ingestion of phloem sap. Eating honeydew ants is much… well, I can actually store the energy I get from that, whereas if I try to eat fedloem straight… It’s strictly dump or burn, that stuff: you use it, or your body throws it out. It’s too- I want to say toxic, but that’s not quite right either.

The only other person on the crew who can come close to stomaching fedloem in large amounts- as in, more than a drop from a packet- is Taffy. Sanji can handle two drops; Taffy can handle half a packet; if I’m fighting seriously? I can go through three packets in an hour, easy.

Luffy can also actually handle one packet- but just one, and then he has a really nasty sugar crash. Anyway, making my stored glycogen become the fine layered adipose tissue is not merely a pain in the ass; it requires a strict, almost austere adherence to a very specific meal-plan, with very specific amounts of various herbs and spices, to be cooked in a certain manner, and eaten within a certain time.

Sanji became just a little bit obsessed with perfecting my Training meal-plan. To be fair, I’d never eaten that particular selection of food and had it taste so good; even if, with some of them, I had to bolt them down. My husband can cook so well, and I am so proud of him.

Anyway.

Tree sap flows through sapwood, which produces carbon dioxide. Sometimes this carbon dioxide causes pressure to build up within the tree. If there are any wounds or openings, this pressure will eventually force the tree sap to ooze from the tree. Oozing tree sap can also be heat related. In early spring, while many trees are still dormant, the fluctuation of temperatures may affect the flow of tree sap. Warmer weather produces pressure within the tree. This pressure can sometimes cause the tree sap to flow from the tree through openings produced from cracks or injury. During cold weather, when temperatures fall below freezing, the tree pulls water up through the roots, replenishing the tree sap. If the tree sap freezes, the tree will explode.

Sometimes trees suffer from unnatural blistering or oozing of sap, which may be caused by numerous things such as disease, fungus, or pests. On average, however, trees do not typically leak sap unless damaged in some way. Bacterial Canker is a disease afflicting trees that have been previously injured by impact, pruning, or cracks from freezing, allowing bacteria to penetrate the tree through these openings. Bacteria cause the tree to produce abnormally high sap pressure, which forces fermented sap out to flow from cracks or openings of the infected tree. Affected trees may have wilt or dieback on the branches. Slime flux is another bacterial problem characterized by tree sap oozing. Sour-smelling, slimy-looking sap leaks from cracks or wounds on the tree, turning gray as it dries. Root rot fungus generally occurs when either the trunk of the tree is too moist from water hitting it or the soil has been overly saturated for an extended period. Insect pests, like borers, are often attracted to tree sap. Fruit trees are most likely afflicted with borers. Borers may be present if there is a noticeable gummy-like sap oozing at the top of dying bark and sawdust at the base of the tree.

Sap is not to be confused with latex, resin or cell sap; it is a separate substance, separately produced, and with different components and functions.

Maple syrup is made from reduced sugar maple sap. The sap often is harvested from the Sugar Maple, Acer saccharum. In some countries (e.g., Miqueot, Lvneel, Jervan, Flynce, Germa) harvesting the early spring sap of birch trees (so called "birch juice") for human consumption is common practice; the sap can be used fresh or fermented and contains xylitol.

Preparations made from the sap of Aloe vera are widely used for their purported soothing, moisturizing, and healing properties. Aloe vera gel is also used as an ingredient in commercially available lotions, yogurt, beverages, and some desserts. Note, however, that so-called aloe products such as "aloes", "aloe gel" etc. are not generally true sap. They are different from each other and different from the true phloem and cellular saps; produced in different cellular structures, much as other distinct materials such as latex and resin are produced in special vessels in various other species of plants.

Certain palm tree sap can be used to make palm syrup. In the Cursed Islands they use the Cursed Island Date Palm while in Frabarmy they use the Hottentot Wine Palm to make their syrup called miel de palma.

As an aside, latex is a stable dispersion (emulsion) of polymer microparticles in an aqueous medium. It is found in nature, but synthetic latexes can be made by polymerizing a monomer such as styrene that has been emulsified with surfactants. Latex as found in nature is a milky fluid found in ten percent of all flowering plants (angiosperms). It is a complex emulsion consisting of proteins, alkaloids, starches, sugars, oils, tannins, resins, and gums that coagulate on exposure to air. It is usually exuded after tissue injury. In most plants, latex is white, but some have yellow, orange, or scarlet latex.

Since the 3rd century of the modern calendar, latex has been used as a term for the fluid substance in plants. It serves mainly as defense against herbivorous insects.[1] Latex is not to be confused with plant sap; it is a separate substance, separately produced, and with separate functions.

The word is also used to refer to natural latex rubber, particularly non-vulcanized rubber. Such is the case in products like latex gloves, latex condoms and latex clothing. Many people are allergic to rubber latex. It is most easily cultivated via dandelions, the common “weed” plant.

In polymer chemistry and materials science, resin is a "solid or highly viscous substance" of plant or synthetic origin that is typically convertible into polymers. They are often mixtures of organic compounds, principally terpenes. Many plants, particularly woody plants, produce resin in response to injury. The resin acts as a bandage protecting the plant from invading insects and pathogens.

I’m reciting all of this so that Sanji can relax a little bit, in my meaty arms. I didn’t realize I could switch aspects in my sleep. I didn’t realize a lot of things. Sanji’s afraid of men. I’m afraid of being restrained by a man. Sanji’s not afraid of men if they’re restrained. I’m afraid of being restrained by a man.

It is an impasse.
This could be better.

“Mab?”

“...sanji?”

“I think… I think I need to be the big spoon for a while.”

“Yeah?”

“Yeah. I- it’s going to be a long time before I’m okay with hugging. Er, being hugged. By- you're not a man, but the body... I- I just... I Know you. I know you, and I love you, and you would never, ever hurt me. So- I just. Need to hold you, in your male aspect. For a while.”

“Okay. I can do that; for however long you need. ...um, just holding?”

“Maybe a little cuddling, if the holding works out. Not- not ready for anything else. ...you can keep talking to me. You still have a nice voice, no matter what.”

“Okay. I only want to go as far as you do; let me just...”

I shift, and shuffle, and let my face snuffle into the junction of his neck and his shoulder. Sanji shudders when the scruff of my sideburn rubs over his skin, then hums and sighs again, as he wraps trembling arms around me. Certain as the sun, rising in the east; just a little change, small to say the least. Becoming better friends, when somebody bends, unexpectedly- and, you know… Sanji’s always been the Beauty. So, I’m the Beast.

Yeah, fit your head around that one.

Hmm.

Ah, I know.

Moda of the Sargasso, who once was Moda of the Ryujin, is smarter than I ever was. She realized very early on that- while she could become a member of the Sea Court, she would fuck it up in short order. Moda has the Charisma to be a queen; but almost none of the toughness.

So, she abdicated; I’m not entirely clear on the laws of succession, but I do know this: Sea Knights are actually ranked as Princes.

Jinbe, Knight of the Sea, did not swear his allegiance to the current ruling family; he swore it to the last ruling family, which was Moda’s family. There are things Moda will not speak of; things I don’t know about her.

But I do know this.

She gave her place in the succession to her cousin, Shirahoshi. And, Like all true Mermaid gifts, it was both a blessing, and a curse.

Honestly, it all comes down to Joy Boy, and his ship, NOAH.
We can’t start there, though.

Let’s start with the Goblin Market. It’s basically the black market, except… not. Not just that...
Hm… how to explain it…

Ah.

Goblin Market is the colloquial name for the entirety of the Red Light and Black Door district; all the whorehouses, brothels, dance halls, drug dens, and so on- all of them can be referred to collectively and colloquially as “the Goblin Market”. However, it is important to know that the Goblin Market has more than just so called ‘Sins’ for sale; in the various cities of the World, the Goblin Markets are often the only places where real Fae can be openly found.

The Goblin Market has existed for as long as the Fae have existed- and so, we come to Joy Boy. During the Void Century, the people of Fishman Island- then known as the Ryugu Kingdom, had a great friendship with someone called Joy Boy. The Royal Line of the Ryugu holds the power called Poseidon; the Ancient Weapon, Poseidon, is what they called it when you can speak with beings like Vritra, or Fafnir, and bid them aid you in battle or daily life. Moda has that power; it’s probable that all her children will have that power too.

What’s important to realize here: Joy Boy was not a man. I can’t remember yet what Joy Boy was- but he was not a man.

Lots of people make much of the ancient powers left to this World- but few ever seem to realize that those ancient powers were always intended for use. Thus, what I remember about NOAH is this: NOAH is a trading ship, one of the very first Laputa ever built by Skua. The records for its production are still part of the textbooks for every engineer who trains in Skua; NOAH is very historically important to the Skuan people.

As for what a Laputa is… A Laputa is an artificial island, built for very specific purposes- be it trade, voyaging, or war. NOAH was a voyaging ship.

And that’s all I can remember about that.

“...sanji?”
“...gnnnh...”
“...love you...”
“...love you too, mab...”
“...night...”
“...night night...”

It never fails; a warm, comfy bed, a deep, mellow voice, and some of the most boring recitations in the history of the World will serve to make a person lose their fear and consciousness without much more than a sigh.

We set sail for Fishman Island in the morning.
I'm dreading it, actually; Taffy's taking over as Navigator until six weeks after Nami's given birth and she's actually never given orders to her crewmates before. She's never had a position of authority, ever. Furthermore, the people we are in port are not at all the people we become at Sea; and with everyone still so new...

We might actually have to have that game of Grease, just to get things out in the open.

This will be fun.
The Vows of Nami Stormborn to her Apprentice, Dracule Taffeta, were as Follows:

With the first step, I will learn what you do not know; and you, what I do not know.
With the second step, we will develop mental, physical, and spiritual strength.
With the third step, we will share the worldly possessions.
With the fourth step, we will acquire knowledge, happiness, and peace.
With the fifth step, we will create powerful and virtuous techniques.
With the sixth step, we will allow the other to become more than just a master or apprentice.
With the seventh step, we will always remain friends and cherish each other.

The Vows Nami Stormborn asked of her Apprentice, Dracule Taffeta, were as Follows:

I will give my Master all my money.
I will give my Master the precedent of my time.
I will obey my Master in all things.
I will not engage in Sex or Romance without my Master’s permission.

After a bitter negotiation, Nami struck the Vows to the Apprentice from the Contract, as Tradition demands; replacing them only with this: “I will do my very best to learn what you have to teach me.”

I signed the revised Contract between Nami and me; I am Dracule “Foxeye” Taffeta, apprentice to the Master Weather Witch, Nami Stormborn, now. We have vowed to teach and learn from each other; her the Guide, me the Follower.

My compass is thus: on a flat medallion of Adam Wood stained golden-red, a total of seven Poses are inset in the wood, like gems. Three Log Poses of Paradise, so we know where we’ve been; three Log Poses of the New Word, so we know where we’re going. In the center, there is one Eternal Pose- to the Twin Capes, actually, so we can always go home. On the opposite side is chiseled the Compass Rose of Skua, the sygil of the mystic order of which I am now a part. I had to cut it into the wood myself, before setting the Poses in place. It hangs on a fine metal chain, down my chest and resting just at the bottom of my sternum.
Four Bird Skulls hang between the complete spine of a salmon— one fish for each bird; each smoothed spine bone is coated in mother of pearl, and the bird skulls are coated in sapphire. I’ll break before they will, now. This is one of the strands; it hangs much longer, and I generally tie it into a knot for ease of movement. Like a string of dancer-pearls.

Instead of needles, Franky carved for me beads; I pulled them onto the leather strand, and… well. Horsehair that chimes, gently; pearlized bones; leather, and a fine metal chain.

I’ve got a compass, now; I just need to attune it to the elements and get used to checking it constantly. (Oh gods, I’m going to be a Weather Mage, just like Nami. Aaaah! Exciting!)

I said before that each element can be categorized with a few descriptions about what it does and what it’s for. I’m going over them again so I don’t forget or chicken out of doing what needs to be done.

Water is the cold and the dark of the deep places, a pebble falling into a pond and disappearing without ripple or remaining trace; it is the river flowing endlessly, time in it’s course, a mirror that only reflects the truth, the womb from which all life springs, eternal. Wet, Cold, Flowing.

Fire is the warm and the bright of the star, the sun’s harsh-gentle light which calls all things in the World to live again come winter’s end; it is the heat of the hearth and the inferno of a crucible, the wild thing that eats even it’s own ashes, the bright sudden touch of a lover, the seeds from which life grows. Burning, Hot, Dancing.

Wind is the gale which crushes the tree down, the storm that shakes the heavens, the tempest of feeling that flings a person outside their body, a breeze which cuts to the quick and also tugs a child’s kite high into the air; wind grinds the mountain to dust, cools sweat, and washes through a person from first to last. If the elements are a circle, you start, and end, with wind.

Lightning is the twitch of muscles firing in sequence, the bolt which flies unerring towards its target; the relentless strike that destroys all in its path, the tingle of fear down your spine, the jolt of a new idea, the spark of intention. Baelfire comes from lightning. Sharp, Dry, Shifting.

Earth is the solid wall which holds back the world, the blackest black of the mine in the earth; the gentle swell of fields flush and heavy with grain, the shifting bareness of sand, the crushing weight of a meteor, the dizzying height of a cliff, the ravine which reveals gems in it’s layered seams. Earth is the pillar around which fires may flow- and it will not be consumed. Earth is bone; limestone and bones are exactly the same kind of thing. Limestone is the Stonebone. Solid, Pressure, Stillness.

Metal is the male-gendered mutable element; so called because it changes. Variable, as it is at once harder than stone, yet softer than even water; solid, liquid, gaseous, it can be hard, shiny, malleable, fusible, and ductile. It has good electrical and thermal conductivity, and- of all the elements, save Earth… there are some who combine Metal with Earth, and for good reason. Blood is born in the bones; and there are those who assume that, surely metal must be born from stone. As this is only sometimes true, I conclude that Metal and Earth are different elements. Metal is vital; it is iron that carries air through your body, and so Hematite, being an iron-ore, is the Bloodstone. Metal is flexibility; it is a coin, a blade, a kiss, a drop of blood. Changeable, Formed, Vital.

Wood is the female-gendered mutable element; so called because, while Metal must be acted upon to change, Wood changes on it’s own. Similarly variable when compared to metal, and yet- there is a curious strength to the root of a tree, which, if given time, can shatter stones. Wood is the only element that lives; and with that life comes a memory, magic- wood is patient in a way that the other elements are not. Wood is resilient; self-healing, holds the capacity for eternal life. Wood is vitality; it is the seed, the wish, the promise, the love that makes small things grow large. Changing, Forming, Fertile.

There’s a reason Zoro instinctively made Nami flowers out of Earth and Metal as a courting gift; and most of the stones are pearls, which is earth with a not-insubstantial grounding in water. Zoro has an instinctive understanding of magical concepts that is only really visible from the outside; and there’s a reason the other Mages at the place where Nami trained kept trying to steal her love-tokens. They are powerful protective magical artifacts; and Zoro made them without thinking twice about it.

They’re love-matched, and it’s rather astonishing to witness.

Saa- the only things I actually need to carry with me as an apprentice to Nami are my compass and my pocketwatch; my other strands are for ceremonial purposes.

I give my signed contract to Nami at Breakfast. Mab lands a small swarm of honeyjackets on Luffy’s hand when his fingers wriggle towards Nami’s breakfast. Good.

Nami reads the contract over, looks at me, and at my new compass, and nods.

“Everyone, I have an announcement to make. Until about six weeks after I give birth, I’m going to be irritable, irrational, and on a hair-trigger for my temper. Therefore, for everyone’s safety, until six weeks after I give birth, Taffy is going to be our navigator. I’m still head navigator; I’ll be double checking her work until I’m sure she can do the job. There are some things that are going to be beyond her; however, as we’re still in Paradise, I think having her navigate us from Sabaody to Fishman Island will be a good test of her skill.”

“Uh, Nami-hakase, that’s… are you really sure I’m ready for something like that?”

“Well, you can navigate yourself all over the World; you can take people with you when you do so; you can sail, and read the compass and the weather enough to get us where we need to go. I think you can handle it, Taffeta.”

I had to wait a moment, to let my stomach stop roiling with nerves- and when it didn’t, I handed Luffy the rest of my breakfast. I’d eaten most of everything already, I just… oh gods.

“Neh, so- are we still going the undersea route, or are we going through the new Three Mountain Pass? It sounds interesting.”

I pause.

I take a long, bracing drink of Zoro’s breakfast grog; it’s apple juice with a half-shot of tequila in it. Zoro blinks at me, but Nami nods, solemnly.

And then I speak.
“Three Mountain Pass is a very odd little stretch of ocean. Due to it’s former status as a part of the Red Line, it does not behave like any other part of the ocean on the Grand Line. Log Poses do not work in Three Mountain Pass; Blue Standard Compasses also do not work. The only way to navigate the Pass is with Celestial Navigation, Wayfinding, or having an accurate map.

“I can do two of those, but… As far as anyone can tell, there are no real reliable maps to navigate that stretch of ocean. This is due to the presence of two, very different, dangers.

“Geographically, as far as we know, Three Mountain Pass is actually very narrow; there is only a small oceanic corridor through which an adult Sea King may pass, and although an adult Sea King is large when on the surface of the ocean, in the water it is much smaller, due to pressure. Of all the things in that area of the world, Sea Kings are the least of your worries.

“The first danger is the Scylla. Scylla is a female-gendered current; her waters are cold, but full of nutrients, which attracts lots of different fish to feed. Which attracts other, more dangerous things, of course. Scylla has twelve different currents, six of which are deadly, as they wind through ship killing shoals and reefs. Further, due to the bounty of Scylla’s very gentle counter-currents, wolf-sharks patrol the waters with a vicious efficiency. If a person is bleeding, and falls into the countercurrents of Scylla, they’re not coming back out in one piece. Even out here, at Sabaody Archipelago, the howling of wolvarcs is blood-chilling. They aren’t the gentle, shy beasts of the Five Blues, after all; these are the ones that can be best described as “Big, and Bad”. -They never became dogs; they were always sharks. And in the pass, they hunger.

“As far as I can tell, based on the maps of the region- which never match each other- and sailor’s accounts- which more often than not, do match up - Scylla’s most dangerous, most bountiful, and fastest currents are centered in an underwater cave on the Trunorthern side of the pass; and every six to eight hours, the main current and subsidiary reverse current experience a tidal shift. Meaning, it is entirely possible to be stuck, going in a circle, in the currents of Scylla’s most vicious portion-forever. Whether you’re alive to enjoy it, or not.

“Oh, yes, and most horrifying of all; four times a year, every year, Scylla’s twelve currents change formation, reverse direction, and- so far- have done so at random. Mab says a pattern will assert itself eventually, but it might be ten years before that happens.”

I stop. Take another drink of Zoro’s mug, as my crewmates glance at Nami, who is nodding. Usopp is blanching around his forkful of eggs.

“On the Trusout side of the pass, there is what’s known as Charybdis. No one can agree if she’s a particularly nasty whirlpool, a Sea King, or both; what is known is thus. Every day, thrice a day- at, so far, unspecific times- Charybdis will swallow down everything that gets trapped in her racing tides. And then, at unspecified times, her motion will reverse, and she will projectile vomit everything she has swallowed.

“Three times a day, every day.

“Charybdis’ racing tides are so powerful- and so big - that even a ship like ours, made of Adam Wood, would be scuttled trying to escape. The Coupe de Burst wouldn’t be much use either, due to all the dangers in the air.”
I don’t want to say this out loud.

“There are Tiktiks, in the pass. In the two years Three Mountain Pass has existed, thousands of ships have been lost at sea there; and not all of them were pirate ships. Merchant ships, pleasure boats… they’ve all gone. And they have not returned.”

“...Neh, a Tiktik makes that sound like tiktiktiktiktiktiktik and the quieter it is, the closer it is, right?”

“Yeah.”

“And… it eats unborn babies, and newborns, and small children too, right?”

I nod. So does Mab, and Sanji, and Zoro; Nami has wrapped her arms over her stomach, which has started to protrude. The smell of ozone, in the air, has started to thicken. Robin’s hands are loosely curled, her forearms crossed on the table. Franky’s knuckle’s creak with tension. Chopper’s fur has fluffed to nearly twice his size, and where his horns would be most of the year- he drops them mid-winter, and he just has stumpy velvety bits, but rising from his skull is the shadow of his horns, longer and wicked, sharper than I’ve ever seen them; and the face he wears is the face of a man, and his hair which grew long over the Separation is thick and bushy and wild. Usopp has gone still, and very quiet; his eyes are sharp and flick-flick-flicking from each person at the table. Brook looks every inch his age, his dark eye sockets filled with chthonian blackness. Mark is steadily tapping out a simple war-beat; one, two, three, four, one, two, three, four. Bryony is humming, softly, her fingers in deceptively loose fists.

Gurry, and Marzipan, are very still; like the stillness of a viper, right before it kills a mouse.

Banana tightens on my arm; I make myself put the empty tankard down, out of my hand, before I crack it worse.

The dogs, under the table, are silent; Buttercream is sitting quietly, staring at the door to the infirmary, while Pearblossom and Bubbler are- well, ‘Blossom is sitting on the couch, her big red ears flicking this way and that. Bubbler is sitting right next to Nami, her dark blue fur fluffed to nearly three times her normal size.

Tiktik eat everything that’s unborn; every kind of baby. Suckle the blood from their hearts, in fact.

Chopper lets out a long breath, then shakes his head; and then he speaks.

“The first time I ever saw an aswang, I was… mm, maybe a year into my studies with Doctorine. There’d been a rash of miscarriages, and people were starting to get scared; it wasn’t food, it wasn’t the water, it wasn’t anything in the blood that Doctorine could tell; just… the worst one I saw was where the baby was stillborn at eight months, and it’s heart had been yanked right out of it’s chest and chewed on. The baby’s heart had bite marks on it.
“It was a little girl baby, I remember that; and I remember Doctorine’s face, when I told her what the baby’s heart looked like. I had to dry and grind so many of our hothouse peppers, I thought I’d never be able to see again- the dust was so hot and thick, because I wasn’t good at grinding them yet, and…

“I remember, they caught the aswang with a net made of birch-bark, rowan, and rolled in chili pepper powder that had been blessed by the brewer, the baker, and the blacksmith.

“After they killed her, the aswang, I mean, they cut her stomach open. It was full of the bones of babies; mostly their skulls, because at that age, when they’re that young, it’s the skull that forms the most and is hardest to chew. After that, I never complained about grinding herbs again.”

Mab’s fingertips rattle across the table.

“We call them Pontianak, in Skua. They sound like the chirping of baby junglefowl; chickens, if you’re not… Well, that’s what they say. Really, they sound like screaming pigs; and the louder you can hear it, the farther away they are from you. I don’t know if everyone knows this, but most Fae who immigrate are middle class or rich. I’m actually spectacularly wealthy- not just me, personally, but my entire family.

“I wasn’t always personally wealthy, though- in fact, when I went to school, it was without any money to use at all. Mother said it would teach me discipline; it was actually her subtle way of getting me killed. It didn’t work- but that’s what it was.

“I was lucky; not because I have a knack for making money, though I do, but because I’m a very good scholar and I got the chance to study to the highest levels of our university system. During my time as student, because I had no money and no goods or services to create a bribe, I had to live in the poorest of the poor dorms, and go to the worst classes.

“My dorm was in Vivace, which is a very rural village. It’s the kind of place that only exists because there needed to be a well to get from the larger town of Cadenza to the city of Montrullly, and if you go to all the trouble of digging a well, you might consider planting a few shade trees, and why not have those trees be fruit bearing? Mangos are nice, right? And then it’s three-hundred years later, your village is eight houses, a well, a stand of mango trees, and a student dorm for the very poor students of the Skuan Military… In that sorry excuse of a village, you could walk for hours in any direction and not see anything, not even a person; just green plants and mist.

“My dorm didn’t have electricity, or gas; our oven and stove was made of cast iron, and we- because I wasn’t the only student in the dorm- we had to use wood for fire, as coal was too expensive. There was no public transportation; to get to school, we had to go ten miles in one direction and be in our classes before the eighth chime of the morning. There’s a reason I wake up at five at the very latest, every day. Ach, we were so poor, we couldn’t even afford a storm lantern, or even oil to light it.

“There’s a reason I’m so good at making candles.

“So, everyday, I had to wake up at four-thirty AM to get ready for school; then, it was a two-hour walk to get there. School lasted from Eight to Eight, and then I’d have extra-curriculars, and then I’d get home, maybe, by eleven-thirty PM. This was during the weekdays- on Fuld day, or Friday, I’d have more time to get home as my classes ended early. I’d usually make it back to the dorm, do laundry, help around the house; sleep in a real bed.

“If I didn’t get home by midnight- if I couldn’t leave in time to make it, or just didn’t feel right about going, I’d either have to find a place to spend the night in- usually a tree, or near a chimney in the winter- or I’d have to risk going through Bushwilds past midnight. It was never said out loud, but… Maenads roamed that area during the night, as did wild creatures. I wasn’t so strong, then; excepting for the very worst storms, I usually spent the night holed up somewhere high and small. Where nothing bad could get me.

“Out there, all the old monsters of the World still roam freely; they were pushed out of other places, and they fled to the boundless Sky. Civilized times, or so they tell me; what’s so civil about a pack of Maenads tearing a man apart and gorging on his flesh in front of his only daughter, I’m sure I don’t know… -Martha never was quite right, after that. She’s better, now- but she never was right.

“There weren’t really any doctors, out there, either- mostly, there were albularios, witch doctors maybe, who cured people and animals. A lot of people in that county-kingdom die without ever seeing a doctor; and, quite rightly, blame supernatural things for untimely deaths. Some things are illnesses, which, once the nuns started sending their midwives out, got much less common; but for other things, it was definitely a ghost. Or an aswang. Or a pontianak- you get the idea.

“I didn’t really care about that stuff, though; all that mattered to me back then was to do my best so I can get out of school with honors. I had… I had a job to do.

“This happened to me when I was in my seventh year of study, which is the last year. I was the top ranking in my grade, the manager of the student betting pools, and a teacher’s assistant; because of this, I had to do a lot of additional work, aside from my normal studies and extracurricular activities. By then, because I could finally fly fast, and was licensed to do so inside city limits- which you need to be, if you’re under seventeen, it’s for safety reasons- I could get everything I needed to do at school done within the daylight hours, and fly home. It’s very dangerous to fly at night in Skua, and I’m about to explain why.

“There were some days when I just couldn’t do it; in this case, I was tabulating the betting tables for the schoolwide betting pools, and I was setting up a, in retrospect, fairly spectacular prank- and because of the sheer volume of the bets I had to organize, I had to stay late. All the bets were coming to fruit the next day, you see; I had a huge influx of people making last minute bets, and had only managed to close an hour before I would have usually gone home.

“Anyway. I had a classmate named Maria; she lived a few miles from the school, in the student housing, and offered me a place to stay for the night. She said it was her birthday the next day, so I’d be her only guest. She wasn’t really celebrating her birthday on the day itself, as it was a Tuesday; she was planning on celebrating on Friday, and maybe taking advantage of the four-day weekend.

“We weren’t that close, but we knew each other; her brother was my classmate as well, and she was also a scholar like me. We got to see a lot of each other, be it in shared lab space, at different library tables; we shared two extracurriculars, even. She was one of those people you end up seeing around a lot, because you just… do. You live in the same place, you go to the same sorts of things- one of those.

“She was a half-Djinni girl, fairly pretty but easily outshone. I actually liked her, but I never entertained the thought of courting her because I was too focused on my studies; further, behind the student facade I was still a Princess, and Princesses don’t court. And really, I didn’t have the money to treat myself; there’s no way I had the money to treat a girlfriend to some fun.

“Anyway. I finished my tabulations, put all the money I’d gotten in the betting into the strong box, to be portioned out the next day. My prank was set to run itself during the night, and would go off during the middle of classes, to give ample time for it to be seen. After I packed up all my things, with everything done for the day, I met up with Maria and we started walking to her house.

“Now, understand, the area we were walking in- even though it was fairly near the school, it was still very rural. After a few blocks, there’s only tall grass and a path towards the forest. That’s where Maria’s family lived. We were both awkward, but we tried to talk and get to know each other. She said that her whole family lived in a big compound inside the forest and they rarely had guests over. When we got there, her brother greeted me and I met her family. They were very welcoming; her mom, her dad, aunts, uncles, and little cousins. It wasn’t a mansion or anything fancy, but their place was pretty big compared to my dorm, and very homey compared to either of the palaces. The Winter Palace hadn’t been home for more than a decade, by then; and every time I got used to staying in the Summer Palace, and almost started calling it home, I had to go back to school.

“This crew is the only home I’ve ever really had.

“Anyway, their property was maybe a few hectares; there’s a row of cement houses, each belonging to various relations of Maria and her family. The houses were a few yards away from each other, with paths towards each house made of road-metal; crushed granite, if you like. The spaces in between the houses was filled with flowering plants, fruit trees, and tall grass. Maria’s house stood at the end of the middle row and it was the biggest house in the compound.

“I had a really great dinner, that night; ate until I was half-full, because I didn’t want to eat them out of their house, and I could always double up on breakfast the next day. After dinner, we prepared for sleep. I was expecting to sleep on the floor of her brother’s room, her room, or the family room; but they let me stay in their spare room all by myself. I didn’t really mind sleeping on the floor or in any part of their house, actually; but I was more than happy to accept the spare room, after they insisted a bit.

“Manners. Makes society gurgle onwards.

“After we said our good nights, I didn’t have a hard time falling asleep. That was the first cloud-mattress I had ever slept on without worrying about assassins; so, it was really good. And I had it to myself, even, and there weren’t holes in the mosquito netting or anything. It was really wonderful; I ended up going to sleep about ten minutes after I got in bed, which is rare even now for me. Around two-forty five, I woke up because I thought I heard a noise from outside; it wasn’t my stomach growling, though I was a bit hungry. -Back in those days, I would drink lots of milk to make up the difference, when I didn’t have enough to eat; Maria knew this, and on the way back to her house, I had told her why. She’d told me that her family actually kept a herd of milking goats in their compound, so I was free to drink as much milk as I liked, at her house; and her mother took me aside before dinner and confirmed it. The Portgas appetite is very well known, in parts of Skua; and Maria’s mother wanted to feed me, but she also needed me to not eat all the food in her house.

“Anyway.

“The sound I heard that woke me up- it was like a wailing, an animal noise coming from a distance, but that sound… There was something really off about it, it wasn’t familiar or anything like the normal sounds you hear in the Skuan country. It wasn’t crickets or cicadas- I would have known if it was a goat; it wasn’t a fox, or a raccoon. And it wasn’t dogfish, or skeels, or anything like that. And it just kept going, too- I didn’t mind it at first but when it didn’t stop, I decided to investigate. Maybe an animal was hurt, I don’t know- thought I might be able to do something to help, or offer mercy, maybe. Something made me grab the garlic oil from my school bag; I’d made it myself back at the dorm, and it was definitely real garlic oil.
“Jamie’s mother had shown me their milk-fridge... Oh, um- some Fae believe that it’s unclean to keep dairy products- milk, cheese, eggs, yoghurt, and so on- in with the rest of the food in the kitchen. I’m fine with it, although I do have opinions on how food should be stored- um, so, Maria’s family had an entire fridge, a bit bigger than ours, that opened on both sides and was full of milk. The back side was where the milk got loaded into the fridge, from the dairy; the kitchen side was where you took milk out from. So, after I drank a few bottles of milk and rinsed them out, I took my garlic oil and went to see about that sound.

“It was dark, that night, but the moons lit the area and it had a pale, silvery sort of beauty; the road-metal looked like crushed silver stones, and the night was full of the smell of blooming flowers. At that time, it was the fashion to have bells on the thong of the sandal, and so mine did- even if they were just clay with some paint on, they were still bells. I’d also figured out how to move silently in them- and, I guess so I wouldn’t scare the animal away, I was walking silently.

“I walked all the way around Maria’s house; the sound didn’t really change but I saw for myself that it wasn’t the goats, or something caught in the fence or anything like that. Everyone was asleep; all was quiet, excepting that faint shrieking which was slightly louder, in the out-of-doors. Before I turned to walk back into the house and go back to sleep, sound be damned, I noticed that there was giggling and laughter coming from one of the houses across from Maria’s so I went there.

“Out of curiosity, I carefully peeked through an open window and saw her whole family having a meeting and sort of celebrating. I thought maybe Maria’s parents and relatives were having a pre-dawn party or something because it’s her birthday- I didn’t want to intrude so I walked back to the house, taking a different route so no one would see me while I navigated through the tall grass towards the house. Besides, I was still trying to look for that poor animal, it’s shrieking had gotten worse.

“And then… Alright. You all know Sanji’s a horndog. I am also a horndog. Our marriage works as well as it does because our libido is fairly matched, one to one. When I was a teenager, my libido was much higher; I won’t go so far to say I was sex-crazed, but a lot of things that I did as a teenager make me cringe now. So, when I saw that it was Maria, bathing near the back part of her house at the pond there, I didn’t walk away, and I didn’t go back inside and sleep; I hid in the shadow of the goat-hutch and watched her.

“I know it was awkward and perverted- but at that time, I hadn’t had a real date in two years, and there’s only so much porn can do. And then I wasn’t aroused anymore, I was confused- I had thought she was bathing, but… there wasn’t any kind of bathing area out there, no deck to keep the dirt off her feet, nothing to cover her or to bathe with, no running water nor a pail to keep the water in; and instead of pouring water over her head like most people did, she was pouring oil into her hand and spreading it over her entire body. While she did glisten in the moonlight, my stomach was churning; something felt wrong, like something bad was about to happen.

“When I heard the sound… you know the sound of, of when I tear open a fish with my bare hands? It sounded like that. She had stopped moving and she just looked up at the sky with her mouth hanging slightly open, like she was struck mad by the light of the moons and the sight of the stars, and then she started panting and shrieking. The sound I had been hearing was her all along.

“Something began to come out of her, shaped faintly like wings. Not the kind I have, or Taffy, or even my sister, Tilly- she has the wings of a bat, does my baby sister. No; these were the wings of no creature or beast of the good earth, and no sky creature I’d ever seen. I’d frozen in shock where I was hiding; and then I froze harder in terror, because it wasn’t just horrible wings coming out of her, the rest of her began to change too. Her face transformed into a sagging mess, her hair became unruly and spiked, and her teeth became misshapen fangs. Taffy has fairly functional fangs; so do Luffy, and Usopp, and Sanji, even.

“Maria didn’t.

“I couldn’t make myself move, while her upper and lower halves separated. You know how sometimes when cheese gets nice and melty, you get long strings? That’s what it looked like, as she separated into two halves; and it smelled like blood, and shit, and rotting fish-sauce, but there was no actual blood, or shit- there might have been fish sauce, but I doubt it. The only proof that someone-some thing - was even there was the other half of her body, standing next to the pond. Her severed torso flew away leaving the parts below her waist naked and intact, just standing there as if nothing happened. Like a disassembled mannequin in the back of a clothing shop; just legs and a butt.

“The shrieking sound, I realized, was a tikti tikti tik sound, like the sound pigs make when they scream, almost. When she flew up, the shrieking was almost silent; but as it steadily got louder and louder, I remembered the most important thing about pontianaks: the farther they are from you, the louder their sound gets.

“I’d taken oaths as a midwife, by then; there’s some things I can’t allow. So, I poured a palmful of garlic oil in my hand, and crept silently to her standing legs, and I rubbed garlic oil all over her gristly wet half. It was cold, like dead meat, and strangely wet. The oil smelled like… I don’t know how to describe it. That’s the only time I’ve ever smelled anything quite like it.

“And then I noped the fuck out; I washed my hands, put more garlic oil behind my ears, packed all my shit up, and fucking ran. Told myself that I was not about to be the main dish for that party; I’d take being eaten by Maenads over that anyday. Maenads, at least, are like getting eaten by a shiver of sharks; in their hunger-frenzy, they don’t know any better, and they eat you because they’re hungry, and only because they’re hungry. Pontianaks do their hunting and eating out of… part of it is hunger, to be sure. But part of it is malice, too; I’d noticed that their goats didn’t have any kids- just swollen teats. I’d put it up to… I don’t know. I knew better, but…

“So. I ran through the dark woods faster than I’d ever run before, or so it felt. I went the right way; I made it all the way back to town, and the school, and there was a guard there, even.

“I told him my story and he believed me; I begged him to let me stay in the guard’s barracks, and he took me back, told the other guards there what I’d told him, and they believed me too. They let me in, gave me some tea to drink with a shot of young rum in it, to steady my nerves. I ended up sleeping on the barracks couch for the rest of that month.

“So, apparently, the women of Maria’s family were known in that town to be pontianaks. I didn’t know this because I lived in the ass-end of nowhere; and I hardly had time to eat, much less pay attention to gossip. The guards at the school were actually barangay tanods, low level law enforcement; they had been tasked to hunt down the pontianak that had been terrorizing the town for years. Unfortunately, the tanods, their direct superiors, were made up of Maria’s dad and other male relatives; so no one could really do anything about her, or her family. The official story was that there are no such things as pontianaks- which no one with sense believed, so almost no one in my class- and every time the pontianak would attack and kill someone or someone’s baby, there was no evidence to lead to any perpetrator. Nevermind the very obvious trails of blood, from the victims.

“The night I stayed over at Maria’s house, they were actually celebrating her rite of passage: turning into a full pontianak, and making her first human kill. I thank the gods here and now and again that I was not the victim that night.

“I never saw Maria or her brother after that. There was a death announcement, for Maria; her brother left school and just didn’t come back. I paid out all the bets; my prank was a success; I even had a safe place to sleep, for a while.

“And I killed a woman, that night, and meant to kill her.

“Word about what I’d done spread like wildfire- as did my name. That’s what cemented my reputation as the Queen of Maggots; because, as everyone knows, maggots are a sign of murder-necessary murder, true; but murder, all the same. And, as I was a princess-to-be-queen, potentially... It was said, when the police went to investigate that compound in the woods, that the entire family was gone; maybe so. I’m not so sure; it might be that some men from the town got together and Hunted them down, killing the entire clan. It might be they just left.

“I know this; out in the Tomb Hills, which are more Wild than any place I’ve ever known, there was a rash of unexplained killings around Pumpkin Hill, which is the town the Charnel Workers keep watch over. And then, there was a massacre; forty pontianak were ritually burned, and their husbands, brothers, sons, and uncles killed too. Charnel Workers don’t fuck around.” she said.

Brook’s voice, when it comes, is selpurichal.

“In my life, I have killed three wakwaks. The first was our yaya, Rrysha.

“My mother used to make us bathe with vinegar; she would wash the babies with it too, and herself. She was a… ah, I believe the polite term is prostitute, now, but back then she was the woman with the red door, down at the end of the lane; a bit past all the other houses of our village, not quite to the briarpatch. No better than she should be; the whore, and her brood of bastards; that was us.

“I never disobeyed her in this, the habit of us bathing in vinegar, because when I was… mm, eight I suppose, maybe nine, I woke in a cold sweat, on my pallet in with my brothers and sisters. There were five of us at the time, and mother was pregnant again; and something had woken me.

“Even then, my hearing was exceptional; and I could hear a sort of tiktiktik sound, quite loud. At that time, one of mother’s customers had given me a knife to keep my silence on the matter of his visitation, and I kept it with me at all times; so, when I realized what I was hearing, I took the knife from under my pillow, and I went to check on my mother.

“I also tapped my sister awake; she was second oldest, and very calm in a crisis. She kept a bag of forge ash under her pillow; when I woke her, she heard what I heard. I suppose, back then, we were much of the same mind; she sat up, put her bag of ash in her hand, and nodded to me.

“Thusly did I go to check on my mother. I don’t know what compelled me- the tiktiktik was rather loud, when I first heard it, but as I crept silently through the kitchen, grabbing the bottle of vinegar and opening it as I went, it got quieter and quieter.

“By the time I got to mother’s room… behind the blackened doorway, I couldn’t hear the tiktiktik sound at all.

“When I went in, there was… the wakwak had the upper body of a woman I’d seen before; of course I had, I’d recognize our yaya anywhere. She was always very supportive of my mother, kind and defensive of us children, when others would jeer... a yaya, I think our maid, is the translation. Looking back, of course she was a wakwak , village whores don’t have yayas. She was always so...

“She was naked, and from her exposed ribcage hung her pulsating guts. Her hair was long, and dark, and… they weren’t wings, that sprouted from her shoulders. I don’t know what they were, but they weren’t wings, as our Mab, or our Taffeta, has. They were something else. Something that made my eyes sting to look at for longer than a second or two.

“She was doing something between my mother’s legs; I know now, of course, that she was using her long tongue-mouth to go up into my mother and eat the baby’s heart. Still, I knew, even then, that the thing in our house meant my mother no good.

“So, I stabbed the wakwak in the shoulder, and in the flaring confusion- this scar, on my skull? I got it from her. In the confusion of her flailing and my barely adequate technique with the knife, the bottle of vinegar splashed over everything.

“I killed her by strangulation, as the vinegar melted her hanging guts; I just kept squeezing her neck until she stopped. And then I succumbed to my injury; I did not awake for two long weeks. In that time, my mother lost the baby; and she died not many hours after.

“It was after she died, and that horse kicked me in the head, right on the scar- that’s when I started hearing the music. I was tone-deaf, before then; but after the wakwak, and getting struck where she struck me… I could hear.

“The second wakwak I ever killed was my own mother, come back to fright us; while she was alive, our mother loved us as mothers do, kindly, exasperatedly, wanting only the best- or at the very least, better, for us than what she had gotten. When she came back, she loved us still; but her love was akin to the dragon, and it’s gold; or to the child, and their toys.

“She wasn’t truly my mother at all, in the end. Vinegar kills wakwaks; and it doesn’t matter if they’ve bodies or not. For a long time after that, I carried a flask of vinegar on my person like some men carry strong spirits; I wasn’t willing to take chances.

“Well, after that, with our mother truly dead… I lied my way into the army because of all of us, my oldest sister and I were the only ones who couldn’t be adopted. Her, because she had the calling of the Witch, and in those days, witches had to wander and find places where they were needed; she became a smith, I believe. As for me, because I was the bastard of the village headman, and since he wouldn’t take me in, no one else would either. All the rest got taken in; the butcher, the baker, the wandering Oharan librarian, the goat-herders… But not me. And not Mascarette, either.

“That was the second wakwak I ever saw myself, and the second I killed; the third, and last, was in a ruined town that had got caught between our army and the enemy’s. I was a fife-player, about the only job you can give a boy who says he’s a small seventeen but is really only fifteen, and though his being the son of a whore from the back-country accounts for some things… Ach.

“The song that came from that town haunts me, even now; and, having actually spoken to a new-made wakwak, I can’t bear to sing it. Sanji would know it; it’s the Norten version of “Dark is the Night”.

“That wakwak was made on a battlefield; she was born of a woman who was cut down- pregnant, and the baby tossed around for sport. Soldier’s sport, as if- no. No, best not say more. She was sad; I remember that. She was angry, and sad- mostly sad- and she gave me her violin because she couldn’t bear to play it anymore. Said that her instrument was the finest in her village; said that before she left, she’d give all of her good to me, the kind boy who saw her for what she was and was laid low by one of her kind not once but twice. Said that the injuries done to me were of the body and the soul; said that, god willing, her presence would only injure my mind.

“Said that, all things being equal; she’d take my peace of mind, in exchange for a Dream. I gave her my flask of vinegar, and I took her violin and the knowledge of how to care for it, tune it, what it looked like to play it- I’d never seen one before then, you see- and then she drank the vinegar down.

“And then she died; and I left that place, my ears ringing with her screams. I learned to play the violin because when I was making it howl like a cat, or screech like an owl, or sometimes, not often in those early days, but sometimes, playing sweet music with it- I couldn’t hear her screaming.

“I still hear her, even now. It’s better, now that I’m not alone- but it’s not the kind of sound you forget. My mother was right to bathe us in vinegar; to monsters like that, it really is a deadly poison.”

I take a deep breath; Captain didn’t know. So we told him; and now, he’s angry.

“So. Creatures like manananggals, aswangs, tiktiks, and wakwaks are known to live in Three Mountain Pass.

“Manananggals, or as I know them, tiktiks, are a kind of vampire. Similar to the aswang and wakwak, as in it’s a difference of local name, they are usually women who transform into an ugly monster with bat-like wings, separating its upper torso from the lower half. They hunt at night and prey on sleeping people by piercing a tiny hole through the roof with their string-like elongated tongue and sucking the blood of their victims. Their favorite victims are pregnant women or pregnant female animals, where they suck the fetus' heart. This is only older tiktiks though; younger ones don’t have the same patience or forethought, and are known to simply tear the babies out of the mother, to eat them whole.

“They abhor garlic, salt, powerful spices, light, daggers, and whips made out of the tail of a stingray.
The only way to hurt them is by spreading forge ashes, crushed garlic, or salt on its more vulnerable half. This prevents the tiktik’s upper and lower half from rejoining and then the creature will perish because of the sunlight drying it out. Another thing, although I’m not entirely sure whether the wakwak, aswang, tiktik or the manananggals are truly related- they probably are... but when you hear a tapping sound or maybe a shriek similar to what we’ve all experienced, be alert because they might be hunting. The louder the sound, the farther they are; if you hear a faint sound, that means that a tiktik yis near.” I say.

“...We don’t have anywhere near enough hot peppers. Or garlic, or vinegar, or strong spices, then.
Or even a whip, made of the right stuff.” says Luffy.

“No. We don’t. And that’s not getting into the various rocks, reefs, and- oh, the flocks of migratory Screaming Sky Eels, which swarm, go for the eyes first, and prefer to nest in pregnant animals.
There are also the Germa Birds, which have poisonous everything, beaks made of bronze, and murderous xenophobia. Oh yes, and are flesh eating.” I say.

“Huh. Three Mountain Pass is just a little too much right now, in that case; we might check it out later, but… I think we’re gonna have to pass it for now.” says Luffy.

Mab goes from “right the fuck now” ready to fight to “Mm, okay” ready to fight: the black rings around her eyes fade away, her claws turn back into fingers, short nails and golden rings. Mab’s basically ready to throw the fuck down with anyone, anything, at any time.

Sanji’s red war-stripe softens down into his skin, and his hair changes from midnight’s own black to his normal blond, and his eyes aren’t so- sharp hot, like the pilot-light in the oven. Zoro’s eyes turn back to their normal brown, instead of molten steel, and his shadow is no longer split into three. Captain tilts his hat back from where it had been shading his eyes.

Everyone else relaxes in fits and starts.

“But when we know more about it, we’re definitely checking it out.” he says.

“Dammit, Luffy, really?!” hisses Nami.

“Yup. Not this time though. On our next go-round; you and the new crewmates are more important than adventure, right now.” he says.

“Ah. Well, alright I guess.” hums Nami, a bit relieved.

God love my Captain, because there are moments I do not. Not this one, though; this one is pretty good.

Taffeta’s going to be just fine as our Navigator, while Nami’s out of commission. Takes a special kind of wording to make Captain mind; not telling him what to do, because he won’t. It’s best to tell him why you don’t want to do something. And he’s always responded best to personal stories, real, concrete reasons for not wanting to do something beyond “I’m scared”. In this case, we weren’t just scared; we were remembering other times, and other places.

Captain’s not stupid; while we could protect Nami across Three Mountain Pass if we had to, it’s better for everyone if we just… go another route. This time.

Honestly, I’m with Captain; I really want to explore Three Mountain Pass.

Not today, though.

The Sea of Monsters will still be there, ere our next circumnavigation of the World.

Mmm. Since we’re barbecuing today, Lunch is going to be the barbecue, which Sanji prepped yesterday to give everything time to marinate; and because of that, dinner is going to be a sandwich buffet and leftovers. Meaning, if I help Sanji with the cooking, he’ll have three hours of dead-time to play with. Which means we could have sex in the middle of the afternoon.

Opportunities like that don’t come around often.

Plan: Sexytimes?

Mab~? Oh! Uh. …Really~?

Mmmhmmm.
Okay. Yeah. Let’s go.

So that’s what I spent my day doing, after the whole mess with Taffy getting us to set sail was worked out. Poor girl panics, and it just makes everything worse.

She’s much better now, though.

Really, she is.

Oh god I’m going to get us all killed. I- I can’t even manage to get the Sunny out of the harbor without nearly getting us all killed and we all already know how to sail. Fuck.

Fuck!

Anyway. It honestly reminds me of what we used to do in school, in the dorm, for conflict resolution- what happened after the barbecue lunch, I mean. It’s funny- it was almost impossible to get enough money together for a bribe that would actually work, but we in my dorm could buy things fairly easily.

This is why Sacabah exists at all.

“Mab, are you telling a crazy roommate story to compete with Mark?” says Bryony.

“Yes.” I say.

“...Can I broadcast to the entire ship? We’re already underwater, and it’s been a few hours; the fun’s starting to wear off.” she said.

“Fine with me.” I said.

“Oh boy.” said Sanji, drinking his cup of coffee at the table.

“So. Sacabah is what happens when you try to say Sock Combat after eating a triple bacon deluxe meat-monster burger, a full tray of pot brownies, and two pints of milk in about an hour. Without passing out.

“I’ll say this here and now; I did not come up with Sacabah. That was Lamia- Trafalgar Lamia, you know, Torao’s sister? Trafal-guy? Traffy? The Guy with Broken-glass Eyes? Shady McShades? Yeah, Him- his sister, she- with the murderface? Remember her- she punched Aokiji’s ice wall into water? Yeah, that’s Lamia. Lamia was the one to come up with our last resort for settling disputes in the dorm more or less peacefully. After that, we had to use my method.
“In the hell pit that was our very easy to repair dorm, we would go down a short list of solutions and discussions to solve any problems between us before we arrived at Sacabah.

“Firstly, if one of the disputers was that week’s Queen of Cock Rock, as determined by our running Grease tournaments… Ah, Grease is a cross between Poker, Blackjack, and Roulette. Very popular in Skua. I’ve got a deck if anyone wants to learn-? Hi, Nami.” I say.

“I heard there was a card-game I’ve never played before and I came right over.” said Nami, her eyes sparkling.

“Right. I wrote down the rules, for just such an occasion.” I say.

“Mab… these are laminated.” she says.

“Yep. Anyway, the Queen of Cock Rock would be the current winner of our Grease tournaments, and, so long as she had possession of the giant chunk of malachite carved in the likeness of an extremely stylized penis- no real dick I’ve ever seen has quite that many veins, spikes, and ridges at the same time- she was automatically right.” I say.

“...Dare I ask what happened to the Cock Rock, pchelka?” said Sanji.

“Stolen by Maenads during the Dead Week, which is the week after Finals.” I said.

“Oh.” he said.

“Mhm. At least they didn’t mess up the trampoline, that would have been much worse; and the lesbian orgy was pretty much over by then, so it wasn’t really a terrible loss. It did turn Martha’s vagina green for about a day and a half, and she got the worst yeast infection- hello, Robin, Chopper.” I say.

“MAB, MALACHITE IS A TERRIBLE DILDO MATERIAL-” growls Chopper, sitting at a chair next to a choking Sanji.

Nami is still reading the instructions to Grease, and is making notations on a small notepad about the game. Oh dear.

“Mab, you know how I feel about recent anthropological traditions.” said Robin.

“I mean. We didn’t mean to end each year with a lesbian orgy but the older you get, the less fun just jumping around on a trampoline in the woods buck naked becomes.” I said.

I hand Sanji a handkerchief; reel it in, babe.

“Of course. -Well, don’t let me interrupt your story.” says Robin.

“Ah, sure. So, if it wasn’t something that could be decided by the Queen of Cock Rock- like, that was stuff like ‘Which Takeout are we getting this time?’ or ‘Am I getting the good lube from the conbini or just more coconut oil again?’ For things that mattered more, we actually talked it out a lot.
I was getting my doctorate in psychology, and a lot of my labwork was actually facilitating genuine communication between my roommates. Usually, that worked- for stuff like ‘Can I date your ex-boyfriend or ex-girlfriend?’ or ‘Can you help me study this again?’ or ‘I can’t make myself orgasm anymore but my pussy’s about to wither on the vine, can you help a girl out?’ You know. Stuff you need to talk over.” I say.

I hand Sanji another hanky, and Continuity Error him the pitcher of cold fridge-water; I give everyone a glass, too, just so it’s fair. Mm. Water.

“Anyway. Level one- Queen of Cock Rock. Level two: Conversation Communication. Level three was the straight up Compromise: if it’s the same price to get less of both of what you want, get both. Share the shelf; share the bathroom; share the clothes, or the dildo- well washed and sanitized, yes, Chopper- or the bed with the good mattress. We actually had a rotating schedule, for the good mattress.

“Ah, before we got to the actual physical side of conflict resolution, there was one more thing we could do; we could Weigh the Consensus, which means we would figure out the issue, and weigh in on a side; the side with the most votes would win, in that case.

“If all that didn’t work, we’d go to Sacabah. Sacabah also had a lot of rules, mainly because of what had happened in previous instances of Sacabah when we didn’t have some of the rules and things got… well, there’s only one time Sacabah went all the way to Throwdown, and that was… bad. Sacabah was the last step before we started getting into no-take-backs, serious consequences areas.

“In our time together at school, my dorm mates and I only really had one Throwdown each year; and those were real fights, the kind that can end friendships and leave people with permanent injuries. Sacabah only accounted for one, during the first year; the others were things that managed to fester all year before exploding during Finals Week; thus the Orgy, during Dead Week. Moda is actually very smart about interpersonal relationships; and considering we were all we had in the dorm, and would know each other the rest of our lives…” I said, before stopping to drink some water.

“Hm. So, you would play a sort of war-game to settle disputes after exhausting an escalating tier of conflict resolution solutions, and if that was not effective, you’d go have an actual fight- after which, to repair the communal relationship, your cohort of dorm mates would engage in ritualized orgiastic affirmations of trust, respect, and care?” summarizes Robin.

“That’s about right, yeah. ...You’re writing this down, Robin?” I said.

“Of course!” she said.

“Uh- I’ll give you a second to finish, then I’ll explain Sacabah.” I said, drinking some more water.

Sanji is a bit pale, but he’s not bleeding anymore; Chopper gave him a stick of silver nitrate and he’s cauterized himself.

“Hey, Franky.” I said.
“Hey, Mab-sis! Mind if I...?” said Franky.

“Sure!

“I was on the rules of Sacabah, right? Right- okay, so.

“Rule the First: Combat was held in the main room of the dorm. If you left the front room you forfeited.

“Rule the Second: Combatants must wear protective headgear, a mouth guard, a cup, kneepads, elbow pads, and for those with glasses, eye-protecting cage guards. Gloves are optional, but recommended, and additional protective gear will be allowed on the basis of how cool it looks.

“Rule Three: Combatants are allowed one sock of their choosing, filled with a substance of their choosing.

“Four: The sock can be attached to the end of a pole or stick to increase range, but each time you strike your opponent with your pole it’s a foul. Four fouls and you forfeit.

“Five: You may bring two items from your room to place strategically in the main room as either cover or as a hazard.

“Six: No using noncombatants as shields.

“Seven: No condoms. This was instituted after Lamia got her MBS- that thing Mark has that lets him switch physical forms at will; which I also have, and can give to other people if they ever want...? Lamia’s genderfluid, so- no, no, she described it as being a very accommodating bisexual? Lami’s got one of the strongest senses of self I’ve ever seen, so that’s probably why... - anyway, Lami tried to cockslap Perona for twenty five minutes, that Sacabah. Here’s a fun fact for you: It’s incredibly difficult to stay erect when you’re trying to cock slap someone as they swing a sock full of marbles at you, so Lami was also furiously masturbating for those twenty five minutes of Sacabah.” I said.

“Eh!?! Mab- does the MBS create a full physical change, or is it just cosmetic?” said Chopper.

“Currently, it’s a cosmetic change; if Mark wants to be a fully working man, I’d need to jailbreak the MBS.”

“Jailbreak…?” said Chopper, tilting his head in question.

“Oh. It’s a process of removing restrictions on the information matrixes of the device, imposed due to the method of it’s purchase. Because I got the MBS’ we have at a sex shop, which was cheap, they were pre-optimised for use by prostitutes; there are medical versions too. The only real differences between the prostitute standard and the medical standard is price and packaging; the ones meant for prostitutes are much less finicky, but need to be jailbroken to have access to all the bells and whistles, while the ones meant for medical purposes are very precise, but require a lot of maintenance which can be… ugh.

“I mean- it’s cheaper to make just one machine and alter it after the fact, than it is to make two different machines, so that’s what they do but…”

“Oh. So… you could be a fully working physical man, if you wanted?” said Chopper.

“Yeah. Or a mermaid. Or a mink. It works with all the Tribes of the World- including the Automata, although that seems a bit… problematic, to me- and… Sanji, yes, I can be a mermaid if you want.”
“...What kind of mermaid would you even-?” sighs Sanji in bewildered glee.

“Little Tunny. Or a Mako Shark- but to start, a Little Tunny Mermaid. Breathe, love. We can do that later today, if you’d like- but not if you’ve passed out from excitement.”

I leave Sanji to his sparkling eyed sex-noodle dance. Oh my pervert-husband, how I do love thee so.

“Isn’t that kind of…?” squints Nami.

“It’s honestly like putting on a costume, Nami; using one… even the medical ones, you’re never entirely unaware of the fact that you’re playing a role. And I know we’ve had the ‘roleplay in the bedroom’ conversation, so-”

“Oh, I mean. Hm. Do they all switch genders, like yours, or…?” said Nami.

“No, there are male and female specific versions- which, considering the overall size and form of the whole individual unit… I mean, it’s kinda like how Bryony will link her snails to get a better signal; you can link MBS’ together to create more dynamic forms.”

“Hm.” said Nami.

“Not while you’re pregnant.”

“Aw, come on!” whined Nami.

“Nope, even a non-jailbroken version that only changes you cosmetically has the potential to seriously injure you during pregnancy. That’s why the prostitute versions make a point of having all their physical shifting functions locked, and the medical versions require extensive pass coding.”

Robin looks at me, and waggles her eyebrows. I blink back at her, and sigh.

“Robin, if you want the so called ‘Full Human Experience’, I’m going to say it now; I can only give you one gender. Not because you can’t handle both; but because your sense of self is very eroded. You can be a woman, who can look like other women; you can be a woman who looks like many different men. You cannot be both. Make your choice, and I’ll make it happen- and I’ll make it happen as far as you want it to go. But only in one direction.”

“...Ah. This is one of those “Who you really are” things, isn’t it.” sighs Robin.

“Yep. Sorry, bae; I can’t ethically allow you to destroy your sense of self more than you have already. I love you too much to let you hurt yourself like that.”

“...Fine.” grumbles Robin, before a shadow passes across her face- too fast for most people to see.

I am not most people.
“So- if you don’t want to talk about this with me later, will you journal about it?”

“...We can probably talk about it later, sure.” hums Robin, before shaking off her malaise and smiling at me, gratefully.

“Cool beans. Now, where was I- six seven- aha. Eight: No putting socks over the body. This, surprisingly, wasn’t made a rule after the Cock Slap Debacle, but after Lami bought thigh highs so she could literally kick the shit out of Martha.

“Nine: All weapons have to be approved by at least two of the noncombatant roommates. This was because of the Cock Slap Debacle, actually.

‘Ten: No going full Norten. This was instituted after I filled a hockey sock with hockey pucks and tied it to the end of a goalie’s hockey stick and became completely unstoppable for about three months. Every time I participated in Sacabah I tried to go full Norten again, but was always shot down- excepting for one time, which is what this story is about.” I said.

“Mab.” said Sanji.

“Yes my love?” I said.

“...Really?” sighed Sanji, exasperated at my past antics.

“I was not about to sit through another showing of Doctor Jekyll and Mister Hyde: The Musical. I would be dead and buried on that hill, if necessary.”

“Mab, your musical tastes are a bit...”

“Die upon that hill, Sanji. Upon that very hill. Hello, Brook!”

“Mab, you can’t be saying- Frank Wilhorn musicals are still being produced? ” said Brook, agog.

“Yes, and it’s terrible and I had to see it five times before I put my foot down and fought all my roommates who kept making it the Dorm Outing of the Week and aaaaaaargh-”

“Mab, I’m so sorry.” said Brook, agast.

“Thank you. That really means a lot to me. Now, Rule Eleven: One song played on a loop until the fight ended. The first song of choice was ‘Bring Da Ruckus’. -” “Hrm?” squeaks Bryony, suddenly very interested.

“-I’ll let you borrow my taped sessions, Bryony. Then, of course, that new moving picture show came out and we all loved ‘Come A Little Bit Closer’; and finally, we just decided to alternate between the first two and ‘Turn Down For What’-”

“Oh my god.” said Bryony.

“Yeah, I always forget how young you are, Bry. It came out about four years ago; I think I still have the LP somewhere…”

“Mm!” chirps a very happy Bryony.

“Yeah, remind me tomorrow and I’ll make a mixtape for you, I guess. I mean, we all knew if the fight went on too long the song would inevitably devolve into the Skuan version of “I Wanna Fight Your Father”, but that was because Perona’s a little shit with the sound mixers.

“Anyway. Rule Twelve: No grabbing your opponent by the balls. That’s an automatic forfeit.” I said.

“Lamia?” said Sanji.

“She got grabbed; Moda did the grabbing. That was… that could have been bad, yall. And finally— the Thirteenth Rule: Fights go until someone forfeits, someone surrenders, or the referee calls it— because one of us always had to sit it out to, to make the teams even, y’see.

“So in like, March of the Fifth Year, Perona and I had a pretty significant issue with each other because of some incorrect relationship decisions she had made. She was dating one of my exes, which normally for us wasn’t a big deal, but my ex had cheated on me twice and then dumped me when I called them out on it, so there was pretty significant animosity between the two of us. The issue between Perona and I wasn’t about if she should date them or not; she’s her own person and is allowed to make her own terrible decisions. The issue was that I declared that my ex wasn’t allowed over ever because I never wanted to see them ever again, not ever, and I didn’t trust them in my house, even with other people there.

“Perona thought I was overreacting; I thought she was being an inconsiderate fuckwad. This led to the use of the penultimate level of our dispute system, which didn’t go well.

“Lamia had won our Grease tournament that week, so we had to actually compromise, which neither of us were willing to do, so we moved on to the vote. Moda and Lamia sided with me in the vote, but Martha thought my ex was actually quite nice and that more went wrong in our relationship that just them cheating on me— which, yeah, but dammit that’s why you talk to your girlfriend about your issues- and Easeelie just wanted to watch us fight so we split the vote.

“So, two days after the vote, Perona and I gear up and meet in the living room where we all discovered that she is literally the most stone cold bitch out of all of us because she has two pool balls in a pair of silk stockings. She had made Sacabah nunchucks and it was fucking awesome.

“So I attempted to go full Norten again, because obviously why not; and Easeelie and Martha argued that if we were to allow fucking bomb-ass nunchucks I should be allowed to use my favorite. Plus, Easeelie pointed out that if Perona got within three feet of me I was basically fucked because I wasn’t allowed to hit her with the stick, which was something that literally none of us had thought of before that moment.

“I lived with geniuses, but let me tell you- there’s nothing quite as stupid as a group of smart people.

“So we go to our corners in the main room and Martha reminds us of the rules and we begin our fight. We both come out of our corners and immediately I wind up and swing as hard as I possibly can at Perona’s knees, because firstly, I’m a fucking asshole and won’t grow out of it probably ever, and secondly, I genuinely wanted to hurt her.

“I caught her on the inside of her left knee and her leg literally snapped out from underneath her. I took her out in one swing, and she had been talking for three days about how she was going to fuck me up.

“I’m not the nice twin; the nice twin is dead. I’m the other one.

“Anyway, Perona’s on the ground screaming like a stuck pig because I just broke her leg with sock full of pucks and I’m screaming with sweet sweet victory because I fucking won and that meant the Ex would never again darken our doorstep and uh. So, yeah, we loaded Perona into Lami’s rickshaw and helped run her to the clinic nearby- the one for animals, because they had the kind of plaster Lami would need to set Perona’s leg with.

“I broke Perona’s femur in just one place but it fuckin’ snapped, y’all. So we got back home a bit after noon, and Perona had left her snail-phone in the dorm and she had like a dozen text messages from the Ex.

“A text messenger is an add-on for a baby den den rig; it looks like the receipt printing part of a cash register, with a funny bar thing where the letters are, and the ink cartridge? There’s a secondary add on for something like a typewriter, so you can send and receive messages- only works if you have the right receiving device on both ends, though. Bryony has a few, if you want to take a closer look. So, the Ex had sent a bunch of messages, talking about how Perona’s a great girl and being with her was so fun but her friends (mostly me, but not gonna lie, Easeelie was a piece of work) were fucking terrible and- the Ex knew if they asked Perona to pick between them and us that she would always pick us so they were ‘making the decision for her’ and breaking up with her. They sent this shit to Perona literally an hour after we got to the clinic- Lami had just finished sedating and straightening Perona’s leg, by then.

“It’s been ten years, now, and Perona still gets almost incandescent with fury if I ask her if she remembers The Time I Broke Her Leg Over That Person Who Dumped Her Not Two Hours Later. Hello, Taffy, Gurry. Sup?” I said.

“Mab-mama, you’re fucking savage, you know that?” said Taffy, admiringly.

“Mm. Yep. Anyway, time for my nap so’s the Narcolepsy doesn’t give me trouble; Sanji, you gonna join me?” I said.

“Mmmhm.” said Sanji.

And then we went to go have a nap for twenty minutes.

“Uh, Nami- why do you want all these coins, exactly?”

“Because we’re going to play a game, Gurry.”

“Oh. Okay…?”

So Sanji has a fetish for mermaids. I mean, I kind of always knew this but, um. Well, it’s a gooAAAAH good thing he’s already cauterized himself today, otherwi- I- I- nnngh. Ffaahh!

Oh oh aaah! Mmmnghaah!
“You were talking about me having a fetish?”

“Y-you do!”

“Hm. I don’t know, are you sure you’re not just sensitive?”

“Gnnaaaagh- ah, ah, ah, don’t pinch! It feels too good- Sanji, S-saaah ah ah ah ah oooh oah ahahahh-”

My back arches off of our bed as Sanji’s long fingers dig into the tender swollen flesh of my puaaaaaaaaaAAAAAH scissors his fingers and stretches me open to see down into my shallow pinkness and ah ah ah AH AH AH AH ughnnngh e-every time he digs h-his fingers into me a jolt of pure pleasure races through my body I- I- I can’t- gnnnngh! Nngaaaaah!

I kick and buck and it’s too much it’s too good I can’t-

Step outside my body to see this: the MBS doesn’t rely on actual reality to work. It relies on magic. So. If I had been a Little Tunny Mermaid, I would have been the size of Brook. From tailfin to the top of my head, I would have been the same length as Brook, flat on his back.

Flat on my side , Sanji has his legs wrapped around me; one extends beneath my waist, supporting the curve of my spine with his massive thigh. The other wraps over my hip, keeping me from flailing out of our bed.

My back is covered in dark blue scales, with white trails like the wriggling of earthworms arching out in organic patterns, like the stripes of a savannah cat. Against what would be the calves in any other Tribe, sharp spiky fins jut out in pale cold-silver; my skin is the same color but I have less of it showing; most of my upper body is covered in scales, from the blades of my shoulders where my wings usually are, all down my spine from the back of my neck, patches of skin across my arms-though not where my marriage tattoo rests- and over my breasts, down my ribs, down down down my body is covered over in silver scales on the front and black-blue on the back, the sheen of metal where smooth skin once lay. Golden scales are flecked here and there where prominent freckles normally would be; and there's a smaller smattering of bright red freckle-scales where some of my sun-spot freckle patches are. My caudal fin is fairly small, sharp almost; it’s honestly not built for style at all, but pure speed. My primary and secondary dorsal fins are basically triangles attached to my spine; a ridge of spikes going between my dorsal fins and my caudal fin and up again in the front to show where the split would begin in a few more years. My pelvic fins are triangles too, stubby, almost, and more or less there to keep me from rolling over.

Saaaaah ah ah ah, Sanji’s playing with the base of one- snap back inside my body, focus on his calloused hands teasing and toying with the sensitive base of my pelvic fin and scrEAM into the pillows as another jolt of pure pleasure rockets across every sparking nerve-

Sanji’s hand is burrowed inside of me, the tips of his fingers exploring, plumbing the quivering depths of my pussy; teasing the warm pads of his fingertips over the almost oversensitive surface of my cervix and aah aah ah ah ah ah ah ah ah ah ah ah ah ah ah aaaaah AAAAAH AHA AH AHAH AH AH AH AH AH OW OW OW-“BUTTERSCOTCH!”

“OH! Shit, sorry, I’m sorry-”

“Nnngh-”

“Am I hurting you?”

“N-yes, yes that really hurt-”

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry for hurting you- do you want me to take my hand out?”

“N-yes, t-take it out, please, Sanji-”

“Okay, I’m- mmngh- i-it’s out-”

“Nnngh- Faaah, ah, ow, ow-”

“-Do you want me to stop touching you entirely?”

“Nng- no, please don’t go, please don’t leave me-”

“Okay, I won’t. I’m not going anywhere, Mab.”

“Nothing above the waist right now, I- I can’t. Nnnugh… -It was too much, and, and it wasn’t good when it was- I- I’m sorry-”

“No, I pushed too far too fast, I’m sorry-”

“I should have said the slowdown word e-e-earlier, Sanji, I-”

“We can both be at fault, Mab. It’s- I don’t think it’s a contest. Can I hold you, or do you still need to hold yourself?”

“You c-can- hah- you can hold my hand, I think.”

“Okay.”

Sanji interlaces his fingers with mine, his grip almost painfully tight; I hardly ever use my safeword, so… I don’t know why him pinching my cervix with his fingers, of all things, triggered me, but it did. My heart is racing in my chest, and I feel like I need to fight something- but there’s nothing here but my husband and our bed and a snail on an alarm clock. I shift between his legs and return to my natural state; from Mermaid, to Fairy.

I shift, and squirm out from beneath him, never letting go of his hand, until finally I can rest my head on his shoulder. Sanji wraps an arm around me, presses his palm flat to my back and strokes along the velvet of my spine. Dorsal velvet; it’s called dorsal velvet.

I wrap my other arm around him, press my cool hand between his shoulder blades and stroke tiny circles into his skin. He slowly starts shaking, and I rearrange our legs a little more, before tilting us both back down; when we’re flopped on our sides, I tuck our legs and feet together, press my naked stomach and chest against his. I let go of his hand, draw away and up; press a cold hand onto a hot face.
He’s always so furious when this happens; a helpless, sickling fury because the person who hurt me is dead and all that’s left behind is my broken pieces. I’m better now, than I was before; but I’ll never be quite right again. Shhh. This is not your fault; this is not your fault, Sanji.

I tuck myself into his embrace, and let him hold me. Aftercare isn’t just for the submissive, after all.

“...I’m alright, now. Sanji, I’m alright.”

“-I’m… not.”

“I know. You can hold me as long as you need to, okay?”

I feel Sanji nod, his hot face and tears smearing over my shoulder and neck, his hot breath shivering out of his shaking body. I tuck myself into him, pull him tighter to me and he sobs a little; shhhh. Shhh. I’m here. I’m here. I’m here.

I start to scritch fingers against his scalp, rubbing fingertips into his skin; I tuck my hand over his head and stroke my thumb against the back of his ear. He shudders, and sighs, and smiles against my skin.

I’m still horny, actually, but- I can wait. I’ll wait for however long he needs.

“...You’re still horny?”

“Oh, yeah.”

“...I mean. I just… I’m so angry, still, that you got hurt like that, and- I’m. Mmnh. Is it weird that I’m still horny too?”

“No, or at least- I don’t think so. I mean- I’m still angry, about what happened to me. I try not to hold onto it, because it turns into rage so quickly- but, um. FFfff, yeah, still horny.”

“Mm. I- angry sex. We’ve never had angry sex, have we?”

“No. ...D’you want to?”

“Um. Yeah. I- maybe not with me on top?”

“That’s probably for the best, yeah. -Can I touch your horns?”

“What.”

“They’re just buds, right now, but- I mean. Can I touch? Is that okay?”

“...Fine. I guess.”

“...I won’t if you don’t want me to-”

“Mab, if anyone’s going to touch them, it’s going to be me or you. I’d prefer if it was you, first.”

“Ah. Well. Alright...”
So. Remember how Udoroth is known as a Demon Lord? That’s not hyperbole. He was an actual Demon- or he became one. Demons have very strong Line traits that mark them out; for males, it’s horns and tails. Females have bat-wings and multiple sets of dugs- er, breasts (like most female Mink, actually). These traits don’t really pop out until puberty is about done with you; so, since Sanji’s twenty one, now, his horns and tail are just starting to come in. I mean, he always had the ridge…

Ah, right.

There’s a thick, bristling ridge of fur that starts at the lowest point of his hairline in the back and runs all the way down to where a nub is starting to form; reversed from the normal hair patterns, ridgebacked. That nubby bit is his sacrum, which is now about the length of my pinky, outside of his body; it’s going to grow, now that his major bodily changes are mostly finished. He’ll have… basically a tail a bit like a kitten or a cat’s tail, in the end- it depends on a few things, really. Mostly, lineage, though there is some debate about aggression being a deciding factor- to which, I say it’s the horns that would be changed by aggression, not the tail.

Tails are for balancing; horns are for fighting.

Anyway. Right now, his little tail is very ticklish, and he doesn’t like it being touched; so, I don’t touch it. It does tend to curl when something feels really good for him, which is cute as hell, and it flicks at the tip when he’s really contented, and I want to pet it - but he doesn’t like it being touched. He does like getting scratches at the very base of it, where his very bristly dorsal ridge turns into more velvety fur; says it feels nice, like a hug but scratchy. It'll get maybe as long as… from the base of his wrist to the tip of his pinky finger? Double in length, by the time he’s thirty. So cute! No touch!

The horns are different. He’s always been very careful of his head…

His horns are growing out of his frontal bone, in his skull; just over his temples, actually, and a bit anterior to them. Sensible placement for protective horns, really. Right now, they’re just velveteen nubs, only just starting to get ennervated; as far as I know, they’re basically… they have about the same amount of sensation, when fully formed, as a fingernail. Heat, pressure, not much else; and surprisingly sensitive, for two pieces of keratin-covered bone.

Sanji’s horns are just about big enough to start poking out of his hair, and they’re going to get bigger as the month progresses; by February, he won’t be able to hide them under his hair, and by May, they’ll be almost full size. Probably not bigger than the length of his hand, from the heel of it to his fingertips; a nice rack.

Oh my god I get to make ‘nice rack’ jokes about my husband, fuck yes.

Hm. Demon horns, while they’re in velvet, are blood-hot and waxy, and Sanji is very sensitive about having them touched. He watches me with glittering eyes that blaze blue through the slits of his eyelids as I gently card his hair away from his face, and then he shudders as I stroke a fingertip down the hot waxy velvet of his right horn. His red Norten stripe is thick and dark over his face, and his teeth- his fangs- squirmed around in his mouth and his mouth can’t decide if he’s smiling or grimacing or snarling as I gently gently gently stroke a circle around the softly rounded tip and he shudders again.

Huffs, snorts, tugs himself away and I let him go. Hot, panting breath from a mouthful of fangs; my husband is surely the most beautiful man to ever live.
"This turns you on?"

"Yes."

"-Can I bite you?"

"Oh yes. Please don’t break the skin."

"...I think I can do that."

And then he closes his mouth over the meat of my shoulder and everything moves very fast after that. The last moment I can talk about coherently, before snarling and yowling and the thrashing buzz of my wings is Sanji hooking one of my legs over his shoulder and the eye-watering pop of his dick plunging deep inside of me the glorious stretch of him against my soft and liquid places and the deep bone-shaking growl that came from his body as his fangs- not, fangs, really, pin teeth, teeth like needles or a deep sea-fishes teeth, hidden inside his gums unless he’s very aroused and then they pop out and- aaaaaaaah-

Mmm. It’s not very often that Sanji actually marks my skin; partially because he’s so careful, and partially because I just don’t bruise very easily. So the fact that I had bite marks across my shoulder and neck for about three days afterwards is a pretty good indication of exactly how hard he was biting me.

Looking back on everything, this is probably when he impregnated me. This moment, right here; it might have happened the next day, but… I have a feeling that this particular round of lovemaking was the one that put buns in my oven.

There is no such thing as a one hundred percent effective method of birth control, after all- aside from abstinence, which only really works if you’re already informed of the dangers; or a vasectomy or tubal ligation, and even that doesn’t work all the time. Life finds a goddamn way; and Sanji… he’s adaptive. All of him is; which means, since Chopper didn’t reformulate the anti-implantation medicine, not only did my body adapt to it; so did Sanji’s.

And we don’t really use condoms; him because they haven’t figured out how to get silicone thin enough yet and that’s one of the only substances that will keep it’s integrity when faced with his spume, and me because I like barebacking, okay? With a partner who’s clean, and disease free, and uncircumcised, and very enthusiastic and- mmmngh.

I have a cum fetish; I realized that about the first time Sanji ejaculated inside of me and several things about my past sexual history suddenly made logical sense. I was always chasing that warm-cold feeling of male spume being squirted into me; but Sanji’s spume is actually fairly close to boiling hot; he’s very, very virile. I know this because I checked.

So. After our nap and wild fornication, we took a shower, made out for an hour after that, and then went back to the galley; Sanji had to lay out the dinner things, and I promised to help him.

We walk into the galley, hand in hand; Sanji leads, and I follow. We come in through the infirmary, where Chopper is carefully picking broken glass out of Gurry’s arm. Marzipan is in a small bath, herbs floating on the water. Wha-?

"Um." I say.
“Nami is very competitive, which is fine, but her pregnancy has given her a powerful fear of snakes, and Marzipan is actually very venomous which I guess is what she was really reacting to- anyway, Franky cleaned up all the glass and mopped up the water, too, and Robin’s nearly done disinfecting all the blood, and Nami’s being cuddled by Bryony on the couch and she’s really upset so try not to make her feel worse, okay? Mm, Brook’s playing a lullabye, so, if you feel sleepy going in, well... But, yeah, I understand now why Nami made Taffy the navigator for the next while, she’s really not at all herself.” says Gurry.

“I’ve got almost all the shards out; next time, try using your weapons instead of your goddamn forearms to block, Gurry. Marzipan- well, the calming bath should have him back to rights in another half hour or so, but- Gurry, maybe consider just letting Nami take your damn money?” grumps Chopper, his nose and mouth covered with a facemask and his fingers delicately moving over Gurry’s bloody arm with a pair of tweezers shining bright.

“I’ll let that woman have my money when she wins, Chopper. Otherwise, no. I will not.” says Gurry in a bland, dry voice.

“Right.” says Chopper, his eyes flat black and resigned to living on a floating ship of goddamn assholes.

“So, can we go through to the Galley, or-?” says Sanji, his free hand over his eyes and my hand clenched tight in his. Not too tight- but tight.

“I mean, it should be fine? I mean, Nami’s not crying anymore, and the cards are all picked up again, so- oh, uh, we broke a glass? And there shouldn’t be blood in your kitchen, Sanji, but if there is, I’m sorry.” said Gurry, cheerfully.

Don’t get it twisted, friends; Gurry is shy, but savage. Sanji lets out a deep, grumbling sigh.

“Chopper, can you do physicals for everyone? Stuff happens when you’ve got Fae blood and you turn twenty, that’s why the age of majority in the Faelands is twenty- anyway, things being how they are, pretty much everyone in the world has at least a little Fae blood in them, whether they ken or no, and... Well, I need a check up. Schedule it in, aye?” Sorry, love- but I care about you more than I want to salve your pride.

“Aye aye, Mab. Oh, I need to restock the bandages- not the wrapping ones, the gauze pads. That was a weird game.”

“Alright. ...Gurry just broke the glass, did he?”

“Yeah.”

“Heh. I’ll make some more gauze, sure.”

Anyway; we went into the galley. The detritus of a fairly disastrous game of Grease litters the galley table; coins are scattered everywhere. Nami is sitting on the couch, being held by a gently humming Bryony. Brook is playing a soft melody, incidental music to soothe the temper. I Continuity Error the coins into a bowl with a lid, reshuffle the cards and tuck them back into a box that’ll fit all of them; both bowl and box go into a bigger box, along with the golf pencils, the post-it notes, and the flippin’ coin which isn’t actually worth anything. It’s a commemorative coin I got when I graduated; worth less than the metal it’s made of.

Sanji stalks into his kitchen and checks everything over; but no, Robin knows how to clean up blood. He still starts wiping everything down because he’s a bit obsessive.

Hm.

Think about something, Mab. Boredom is the enemy of all good things.

A submarine or a ship can float because of the weight of water that it displaces is equal to the weight of the ship. This displacement of water creates an upward force called the buoyant force and acts opposite to gravity, which pulls everything in the World- however, unlike a ship, a submarine can control it’s buoyancy, thus allowing it to sink and surface at will. Thousand Sunny is not a submarine; he’s a ship. However, due to the bubble-coating, the overall buoyancy of the ship was more or less inverted- so now, and I’m not entirely sure I’m right, but now our ship is more like a submarine than a ship.

So. To control our buoyancy, the ship has ballast balloons and tanks, which can alternately be filled with water or air. Before the coating was inflated, the main ballast balloon was filled with air; as we descended into the water, the main balloon was filled with water. Changing the ratio of water and gas in the balloon changes our rate of descent. When we need to surface again, our ballast tanks will be filled with air, thus making our ship less dense than the surrounding water.

As we dive, the ballast tanks will be flooded with water and the air in the ballast tanks is vented from the submarine until its overall density is greater than the surrounding water and we sink. Negative buoyancy.

A supply of compressed air is maintained aboard the submarine in air flasks for life support and for use with the ballast tanks. In addition, we have movable sets of short ‘wings’ called hydroplanes on the stern that help to control the angle of the dive. Think fins on a fish, maybe; the hydroplanes are angled so that water moves over the stern, which forces the stern upward; thus, the Sunny is angled downward.

To keep our ship level, because we have to dive in increments; we can’t just dive all at once, we have to equalize… it’s the same going up, actually. Anyway; we have to maintain a balance of air and water in the trim tanks so that its overall density is equal to the surrounding water. Neutral buoyancy.

When we reach our next cruising depth- should be in about half an hour, actually- so that the ship travels level through the water. Water is also forced between the bow and stern trim tanks to keep us level. We can steer in the water by using the rudder to turn starboard or port; the hydroplanes control the fore-aft angle of the submarine. To keep forward momentum, we’ll be using the sails and, if necessary, the engines.

Mm, Franky’s Cola Engine- I’ll get to that, hang on.

When we surface, compressed air flows from our compressed air flasks into the ballast tanks until our ship’s density is less than the surrounding water, and we’ll rise.

Positive Buoyancy.
We’ll also angle the hydroplanes so that water moves up over the stern, which will force the stern downward; therefore, the submarine is angled upward. In an emergency, the ballast tanks can be filled quickly with high-pressure air to take the submarine to the surface very rapidly.

There are three main problems of life support in our new closed environment: maintaining the air quality; maintaining a fresh water supply; and maintaining temperature.

Maintaining the Air Quality comes first; the air we breathe is made up of significant quantities of four gases: Nitrogen, Oxygen, Argon, and Carbon Dioxide.

When we breathe in air, our bodies consume its oxygen and convert it to carbon dioxide. Exhaled air contains about four and a half percent carbon dioxide. Our bodies do not do anything with nitrogen or argon, usually. So this is the problem; our ship is a sealed container that contains people, animals, plants, and a limited supply of air. There are three things that absolutely must happen in order to keep the air on our ship breathable.

Firstly: Oxygen has to be replenished as it is consumed. If the percentage of oxygen in the air falls to low, a person suffocates.

Secondly: Carbon dioxide must be removed from the air. As the concentration of carbon dioxide rises, it becomes a toxin.

Thirdly: The moisture that we exhale in our breath must be removed.

Our oxygen is supplied in four ways; we have pressurized tanks of oxygen, an oxygen generator set up in the soldier dock, oxygen canisters that releases oxygen by a very hot chemical reaction, and our ship garden. As we go down, however, the garden will become less useful- plants need light to grow. We have grow-lights, but they’ll contribute to our temperature… Hmm. Oxygen will be released continuously by a system of some kind that Bryony is looking after; there are sensors that monitor the percentage of oxygen in the air, and the oxygen is released in batches periodically through the day.

Carbon dioxide can be removed from the air chemically using soda lime (sodium hydroxide and calcium hydroxide) in devices called scrubbers. The scrubber is also a main component of the gas-shells, in case the gills just aren’t enough. Anyway, the carbon dioxide is trapped in the soda lime by a chemical reaction and removed from the air.

As for moisture, we actually have several very powerful Dials scattered around the ship, acting as dehumidifiers; normally, they mostly live in the bath house. They prevent moisture from condensing on the walls and equipment; and I have lots and lots of them, so… and yes, they can act as another source of water if we absolutely need them.

Secondly, the Fresh Water Supply. Sunny has a set of intakes up in the bow; it’s connected to a distillation apparatus that can take in seawater and produce fresh water. The distillation plant heats the seawater to water vapor, which removes the salts and impurities, and then cools the water vapor into a collecting tank of fresh water. Our distillery can produce thirty eight thousand to one hundred fifty thousand liters of fresh water per day. It’s mainly used for cooling equipment and for supporting the crew- drinking, cooking, personal hygiene, watering the plants… Chopper also distills various chemicals down in the distillery, because he wanted a still room.

And there’s also a still for alcohol down there; Chopper swears by the ‘grain alcohol is a main component of cough medicine’ rhetoric of cough medicines. He calls his eventual creation “Knockout” because it knocks you the fuck out.

Like, you can set it on fire. It’s one fifty one proof if it’s a day.

Thirdly, and finally, temperature: the temperature of the ocean surrounding the ship is typically thirty-nine degrees Fahrenheit, or four degrees Celsius.

As a side note; I know most of the World uses Celsius to measure temperature. I grew up with Fahrenheit. To understand Fahrenheit, don’t think of it as a numerical metric- think of it as a percentage. One hundred degrees Fahrenheit is one hundred percent hotness levels, go inside you crazy person; get some water, sit in the shade. Hot! One hundred and fourteen percent hotness in the shade: go find a cave or a basement, do your shit at night. Don’t go out there.

Thus, fourteen percent hotness levels is cold as fuck.

One hundred degrees Celsius is how many you need to boil water; zero is when water freezes.

Four degrees Celsius is cold as hell; and the coating of the ship does conduct a little of our internal heat to the surrounding water. The problem is, the coating doesn’t conduct enough of our heat to the water; thus, the heat sinks. Meaning, the ship is now cold as balls, because our natural heat, just thrown off from being alive, would cook us alive. So, I’m knitting angora-things now.

So fluffy. So soft.

We also need electrical power; to operate the lights and so on. Normally, this supply is provided for by specialized plants in our garden; they’re called Electric Banana Palms. They work by turning sunlight into electrical energy in the fruiting body of the banana; this energy can be released by... there’s a process by which batteries are made. You need copper, a non-conductive container, and something to mash the bananas with.

Nami loves them.

It’s actually time to harvest them again; and this time, Sanji’s going to take about half of the product and freeze it, so that Nami can have the electric banana fruit she loves. He’ll probably add it to smoothies and breads and so on, there’s not much else to be done with pre-frozen banana slurry...

We also have a turbine system, but Franky’s in charge of all the engines.

As I said before; Light does not penetrate very far into the ocean, so we must navigate through the water virtually blind. However; because we’re not going through the so far uncharted Sea of Monsters, we can use our navigational charts and sophisticated navigational equipment. Taffy and Nami have a lock on that.

The one thing we don’t have, but could, is a SONAR system.
“Mab, what is sonar?”

“SONAR- Sound Navigation and Ranging; it’s a system by which pulses of sound waves travel through the water, reflect off the targeted area and return to the ship. By knowing the speed of sound in water- which is a constant rate- and the time for the sound wave to travel to the target and back, a computer… Oh, I was almost a computer, it’s a person that does complicated calculations, usually for the purposes of telemetry or something like that. Rockets, and things- anyway. A computer can- and must- quickly calculate the distance between the ship and the target. Whales, dolphins, and bats use the same technique for locating prey; it’s called echolocation. You actually use something very like it, when you do your job during the night.”

“Oh. That sounds like the active form- I would assume the passive involves merely listening to the sounds generated by the target, or prey, whatever. You could also identify known ocean floor features, or perhaps identify hidden dangers in the water, like mines…”

“Yeah, you’ve gotten it. Anyway, what’s going on with your sensory air-timing rig, I heard you cursing earlier…?”

“Oh. Well, I realized that in enabling mechanisms to combine together general symbols in successions of unlimited variety and extent, a uniting link is established between the operations of matter- and the abstract mental processes of the most abstract branch of mathematical science. A new, vast and powerful language could be developed for the future use of analysis, so it may become of more speedy and accurate practical application for the purposes of mankind than the means hitherto in our possession have rendered possible. Then I realized that the machinery I’d set up couldn’t quite do what I needed, and I had to redo everything that it’d taken me a good five hours to set up. Ach, I was so downhearted, the only thing I could do to feel better was take a nap.”

“I’d wondered about that, usually you’re much more awake at that time of day-”

“Yeah, the only thing that could fix it then for me was a good long nap.”

“Aw, honey.”

“Ah- I’m okay, now. I’m alright, really. I just have to pick a code that’s simple enough to be going on with, and complicated enough to do what I need.”

“Hm. Do a yes-no code; one you can use to write out all the other bits. As far as I can tell, your sensors are just watching for an ‘If this’ situation, to tell your release valves ‘Then that’. It’s just a logic problem, it looks like.”

“If-then; if-then… Binary code… morse code, because then it can be interpreted by snails, and you use a binding key to encode your code so you don’t get foxes in the hen-house and- thanks Mab, I need to go- think about some things- see you later, Sanji I need a sandwich, thank you, bye everyone-”

And she’s gone.

Here’s the litmus test for sandwiches. Or rather, my litmus test: I pretend I am the original Earl of Sandwich. I have asked for non-bread foods to be brought to me inside bread, that I might more easily consume them one-handed while gambling. If it does not enable my wretched gambling habits, it is not what I asked for. Thus, I shall not deign to grace it with the name of my house.

Ergo, it is not a sandwich.
This does mean, however, that a pop-tart, one of those things that bake in the toaster or the toaster oven, is a sandwich—technically a grilled sandwich.

“MAB, POP TARTS ARE FUCKIN’ CALZONES, DAMMIT.”

“A CALZONE IS A SPECIALLY GRILLED SANDWICH, SANJI, AND YOU KNOW IT.”

“THEY’RE DIFFERENT THINGS.”

“NOT!”

“YES!”

“NO!”

The world of cuisine is an ever-changing place. New trade routes open, new ingredients are found, and new ways to prepare even the most basic meals can be discovered in as little as one year’s time. One thing that doesn’t change, though: opinionated people arguing over what food even is, and which one is the best.

Sanji and I have been yanking this piece of conversational gristle between the two of us for fourteen years, now. I remembered all the letters he wrote me, after all; and, after beating his memory with a stick for a while, he remembered all of my letters to him.

We’ve been arguing over, among other things, if toasting pop tarts are sandwiches or calzones for years now. We also argue over if white or red wine is more appropriate for the luncheon meal; Sanji says red is always appropriate, while I say white is better for lighter meals, and neither of us can agree how to mix a damn roz-ee-

“TWO PARTS RED TO ONE PART WHITE, MAB-”

“NO! TWO PARTS WHITE TO ONE PART RED, IT WON’T BE THE RIGHT KIND OF PINK OTHERWISE-”

“AAAARGH-”

Conversational gristle we’ve been yanking on for years now.

“So anyway, do you want me to mill down things? I’ve got knitting on the stitch, and it’s no big deal for me to just… add another thing.”

“Yeah- we’ve got soft fruits that need to go through so I can preserve them, and we’ve got another brace of batteries- oh, and I guess I might as well start planning baby foods? They’ll be able to eat soft food… when?”

“Uh- about four to six months after birth. Really, it’s whenever they start growing teeth; that’s when you can start supplementing milk with food-things. Teeth-growing usually coincides with the bacteria colonies in the gut maturing; no gut bacteria, no digestion. So- um, right now is okay to start considering their meal plan, but really? Nami’s kids will eat what she eats- and, as they grow, they’ll start eating the food of whoever their favorite person is.”

“...Favorite person?”

“Mmm. When I was a toddler, like, three or four- you don’t actually start making real memories until you’re five or six, but, um, when I was three or so my favorite person was mother’s Guard Captain, Maege.

“Captain Maege hated vegetables, especially the ones I needed to eat to be healthy; she actually really loved junk foods, cookies and things like that. So, of course, since she was my favorite, I wanted to be like her in every way; especially in what she ate. If it wasn’t on her plate at mealtimes- because the Captain of the Guard is actually the personal body-guard of the Queen, and so she was at Mother’s side, always- if it wasn’t on Maege’s plate, I didn’t want it.”

“...So Meg had to eat all the things she hated, so you would eat food you needed.”

“Parenting is not just the domain of the one person who squeezed the baby out of their body, or was there when it hatched. It’s everyone who comes into contact with the baby too; everyone who ever meets that tiny human will leave some kind of mark. If you end up that persons favorite, even for a little while, you have to do your best to help them, and keep them from being hurt.”

“...Mab, I don’t actually like children all that much.”

“Ah- neither do I, Sanji.”

“-You’re a midwife, Mab. And a doula?”

“Still don’t actually like children.”

“-but you’re so much better than me at-?”

“Sanji, I don’t like children all that much; that doesn’t mean I can’t do my job, or be good to them. I’m not entirely sure I’ll even like mine- ours- all that much, but the most important thing is this: You must never, ever, let them see it. They can never know you don’t like them; you get on their level and listen to what they have to say, engage in conversation and do your very best to pay attention to them. It’s a lucky person who likes every person they love.”

“...Huh. It’s a bit like you’re working with customers you want to return, like the ferrier’s set back at the Baratie. But you actually love them, so- hm. I can do that.”

“Mm. And it might well be that we do like our children; we won’t know until we get there, after all. Pass me the big funnel, would you?”

And then I start pouring the banana slurry into the wooden casing, through the stopper. Franky scrubs them out when the electrical energy is spent, and the waste product is actually fairly good for Nami’s Weather Garden.

Ah. Weather Garden.

Nami has to… I guess put weather phenomena into forms she can carry around with her? So, uh, when the electrical energy is spent from the banana slurry in the batteries, it becomes a very good media for the cultivation of weather-in-hand that Nami uses to supplement her arsenal. Weather eggs. That’s what she calls them. They grow in cloud-silk roving, iron dust, and de-electrified electric banana slurry. Different chemical and electric mixes, more or less water- and then, she spins them into egg shapes and packs them into non-conductive tubes, for carrying purposes.

She’s got basically her own ammo pack, full of various weather cartridges that she can load into her new Climatact- or rather, Usopp has broken her Climatact down into three distinct weapons. Her Weather Orb is optimized for defence; it’s normal form is a small golden bell that hangs on a chain and gently clinks over her steadily protruding stomach. Like a pregnancy bola, except this one isn’t just a soft chime that rests over the Pudge; if she flicks it with her Haki, the entire thing will become a… well, I fought her using it once, and good god that was not fun.

It’s basically a localized thunderstorm, and Nami doesn’t take it off.

Second weapon is a collapsible bo-staff that Usopp built after he got a look at some of the intricacies of Ryuu Jingu Bang; he can’t put in all the things that the Monkey King’s Staff does, he’s not that good a fabricator, but. He can make it super-extend and super contract; he can make it synergize with the director functions of the Eisen Whip, and eventually back-engineered the Eisen Whip enough to make an Eisen Bo. So she’s got an iron-cloud bo staff that she can appear out of nothing, and then smack the shit out of someone with it; and she can load it on the fly with various Weather Eggs, or pre-load it, and so on.

Her final weapon actually surprised me, because I could have sworn that I didn’t make a very good whip- but her third weapon is actually a whip. For when she needs a wind-sword, she says. Nami’s good with a Weather Orb; and she’s vicious with her bojutsu. But if she pulls out the whip I made for her all the way back in Water 7, it means only one thing: Nami is going to kill someone. I saw her fight with the whip only once, against a crowd of marauders.

Nami can split a man’s skull open with one flick of her whip; take a man’s head from his shoulders, gut him, tear his arms from his body and his legs from his hips. She prides herself on being able to crack flesh from bone with one snap of her whip.

Zoro’s swords number three; Nami doesn’t need a blade to cut a man down.

As women have more to protect, it therefore behooves a woman to be far deadlier than her male counterpart. Sanji would never poison a man.

I would.

“Well. I would.”

“I know.”

“Gurry would too, actually.”

“Mm.”

“…If I couldn’t fight someone openly, and I needed to protect someone, you can bet your tasty buns I’d use poison.”

“Yeah, I know. I- no, you’re right, Mab. I’d never poison a man. I would put broken glass in my enemy’s bread, though.”
“Would you really?”
“Yeah.”

Hmm. My husband is so wonderful.

“Hahaha. Sent them off, then?”
“Yeah.”

“...And just what are you remembering now?”
“Oh, nothing important.”

“Mmhm. -Roger again?”
“Heh, maybe. -You know, Roger… Roger was a hell of a lot like Luffy, back in the early days. Hat and everything. Destiny is starting to take shape; Luffy’s more than proven that he’s worthy of wearing that hat.”

“Mm-hmm. O-oh!”

“Hm?”

“Ha, kicked. Come here, feel-”

“Ah. Um- is it really- you’re sure it’s alright?”

“Ray, you won’t break me. Come here . Give me your hand- tcha, you can drink a mug of coffee in a six-bell squall, but this makes your hand shake?”

“Well, I’ve only been here for the making of- them- oh. Well. N-now that’s a hell of a thing.”

“Hmm. Kicking. Issun punched, too, but she’s a kicker only, so far.”

“Ah. -strong. Strong little kicks, eh. Does it- hurt?”

“Mm; no, not really- sometimes it’s annoying, when she won’t stop kicking me at night, but mostly it’s fine.”

“...Sorry- she?”

“Mm. I had a feeling last time, with Issun, that he’d be a boy. This time, my feeling is for a girl; my mother had the same feelings for all her daughters and sons, and her mother before her. It’s a girl. It’s a little odd, actually- feels almost like there’s more than one in there, but I’m awfully small for that… Oof!”

“Woah, kiddo- be gentler on your mama, hey?”
“Hahahaha.”

“Heh. -I’ve decided. I’m going to live a few years more.”

“Oh?”

“Well. For one, I’d like to see how this New Pirate Era shakes out; for another, it’d be nice to see how our kids turn out, hey?”

“Mmm. I’d like it, if you were around; I know you’ll go off and do what you do, but… it’d be nice, maybe, if you spent some time here. With us.”

“Mm. The Sea calls me strong, Shakky; has since I was a boy. I’m- can’t be a pirate anymore. Don’t want a crew, won’t follow anyone but Roger…”

“Ah. Well, Ray- Fresh fish is nice, if you want.”

“-Do you want?”

“I wouldn’t mind it. If you’d like.”

“Mm. Alright. -Woah!”

“-That was three different feet; triplets, I think. All girls.”

“Hah. -I’ll find a fishing boat, or a horse, maybe.”

“Mm. -Issun, what are you up to-?”

“-Washin’ Marbles for games later, Mama!”

“Aha. Finish that up then come here: your sisters are kicking, and I know you wanted to feel-”

“AH-!”

I watch our son come scrambling into the living room; his arms are still a little sudsy. Three years old and smart as a whip; but here, he’s just a little boy, and still a little scared of his papa- but this time, Ray’s taken my advice. He scoots a space between himself and me, glances at our boy and then at the space he’s made for him- Issun, sweet boy, but he leaps before he thinks. He’s scrambled up between his papa and me, and all but squealing with excitement; his papa’s chuckle makes him shake for half a second, and then Ray’s caught Issun with one arm and- ah.

“Ready?”

“...y’s.”

“Heh. Here- and there they go again.”

Issun Walter looks just like Ray; same eyes, same rounded chin. Fluffy mop of hair, like the feathers on a duckling; bright yellow, striped with my own black. I don’t let hats be worn inside my house; but Issun won’t go anywhere without that flannel-looking thing Grim Mark gave him as a going-away present. He keeps it in his front pocket, on his overalls; it’s a little flannel hanky looking thing, and he always tucks his hair up into his hat. There’s even a little “secret” pocket in the hat, because it’s actually a very nice hat Grim Mark gave my little boy, I just…

I’ve never liked hats, really.

-And the both of them are awed by my girls, kicking at my guts. Tch. Sweet boys, but they don’t know a damn thing- still… It’s nice, having my boys on the couch with me, all of us together. Like seeing forty years into the past, all on one stretch of couch cushion. -Having Mab visit is like that, too, but I can hardly be around her for longer than a few hours. She’s so much like Captain Harry, it’s painful for me; I can hardly bear it. I wish I was stronger- but I’m not.

I’m not strong enough for that.

I’m not strong enough to face the demons of thirty years ago.

---

The undersea world, which we can still see because we haven’t gone quite that far down, is magically beautiful. We can see enormous fish, swimming by us; tuna, schools of sardines, mako sharks; seals and dolphins. Everything’s gotta eat, bae.

The roots of Sabaody are what we’re carefully circling- because, as I said a long time ago: Sabaody Archipelago is actually a forest of mangroves. The roots of that forest lay in Fishman Island.

“You never said that, Mab.”

“I didn’t? Whoopsie-daisy. Yeah, Sanji- the roots of Sabaody Mangrove Archipelago are on Fishman Island.”

“Neat. And… I’m going to go out on a limb and say that the bubble our ship is in is the same kind of bubble we saw all over Sabaody?”

“Right, we were- yeah.”

“Yis- Hallo, Sanji, Mab- anything strong enough to go through the bubble will go right through, so we can fire cannons if we have to. Still on course, no changes needed; Usopp, come on in, it’s Franky’s turn for watch.” said Taffy.

“Hey, Taffy.” “Hi, Taffy.”

“Will do, Taffy. - Brr, it’s not just cold in the air but cold in the soul, down here. Anyway, you said we can fire weapons through the bubble? Does that mean arrows, too?” said Usopp.

“We can, but be careful Usopp; if we put more than one or two holes in the bubble at once, it’ll pop. We can’t let a Sea King bite into it or smash it into a reef- and we definitely can’t shoot more than one shot through at a time.”

“Huh.”
“Mhm. Right now, we’re about to be through the Euphotic Zone and into the Disphotic Zone; we’re going to lose sunlight by tomorrow. If you have something you want to do in the light of day, today is the last time you’re going to get until we get to Fishman Island.”

“...!”

“Yis, Bryony? Something wrong?” said Taffy, listening to the snail clinging to her shoulder. Bryony does good work.

“Nnnno, not wrong exactly- just, uh. Nami just used a length of rope to tie up a man named Caribou, and uh- I mean, I guess she handled it but I just did not realize she would move quite that fast.”

“Does he rate a sandwich?” I murmur.

“No one is going hungry on this ship; I’ll bring it out to him myself.” growls Sanji.

“Hmhmhmhm. Careful, love; if he hurts you, I shall be very upset.”

“Neh, Taffy-”

“Hey Captain-”

“-Why can’t we just sail straight there? Wouldn’t that be faster?”

“Mah, if we were self-propelled and in the Sky, sure. Down here though, if we just go straight forwards we’d be swallowed up by currents and then we’d hit a volcano or a sea mountain before we got down where we needed to be- alter course twelve degrees starboard, Mark.”

“Yes, Taffy.”

“Thank you- ah, there’s really only one safe route. Mab-?”

“Coats are aired, and should have appeared on the outdoor hooks in the mud-shed by the galley door; if you need socks, leg warmers, arm warmers, a jumper, a shrug, or a shawl, I’ve got those on standby as well.”

“Right. Everyone, please put on your coat, and remember that Mab has more warm clothing if you need some- it’s going to be very cold for the next few days. The colder levels of the ocean have what are known as Deep Currents; these are large ocean currents normally invisible to the naked eye that move in a completely different way than the surface currents. They’re very slow, for one thing; if we go that deep, and we get caught in one of those currents, it could take nearly two thousand years to return to a part of the sea that gets sunlight at all. Anyway- in order to get to Fishman Island, we need to ride a descending current that will take us from a surface current to a deep current-”

“-Taffy, it’s come into view.”

“I’ll be right there, Franky.”

We- Gurry, Chopper, Bryony, and myself- follow Taffy out to the bow of the ship.

“Mother nature really knows how to get things done.” said Franky, awed.
“She is our First Mother; if she can’t get it done, no one can.” said Taffy, similarly awed.

I understand the exclamation; at the bow of our ship, near enough to see but maybe a half-hour’s sail away there rises an enormous, churning wall of silt. It looks like thick grey woolen roving, being drug all in one direction, only it’s like ink, too; oiled dust black and violent, thrashing through the water thick as nightmares. There are seams of bright, clean water, which only makes the vicious strangeness of the Downward Plume more unnerving; I’ve never been more tense.

It looks just like a storm-cloud, but sideways- and Wrong, because there is no wind, and there is no lightning, n-no stink of petrichor and prickle of thunder in my bones, this is not a storm, I- I- I-Sanji wraps an arm around me, pressing my wings back into his chest. I can feel his steady heart, beating against my back. I breathe, deeply, slowly- it’s okay. It’s okay.

“Yis a Kraken: a malicious spirit is inhabiting that Downward Plume: thus, we call it Kraken. Mab’s very sensitive to foul spirits; and with Nami in such a state… Captain, I bring it to you: We go forwards? Or we go back?” said Taffeta, golden fox-eyes sharp in the encroaching gloom of night.

“Forwards; if we go back, it’s because we’re going through the Sea of Monsters. Now’s not a good time to try and get through Scylla or Charybdis, so- we’ll face the Kraken, instead.” said Captain Luffy, firmly.

“Aye, Captain. Bryony- I need you on our fins; Mark, you’re on the Lines; Franky, I need you to keep watch a little longer, I have to pee-”

“I’ll get some more protective gear out, excuse me-” I said, shifting away from Sanji- not before kissing him hard on the mouth and hugging him, god I love him- and running off because god in heaven I’m cold as fuck. The guy we tied up was yelling something; a ship being towed by a Sea King came up alongside but got caught in a riptide and torn apart, the Sea King hauled down out of sight in the roiling storm-wave.

Blood fills the water like sheets of silk.

The vast undertow fought to drag us below as we took arms against our gargantuan foe!

At the end of things, we’re deep, down in the Underworld of the Sea. And Luffy, Sanji, and Zoro are not with us.

Franky seals a barrel shut; and Luffy, Sanji, and Zoro are not with us.

We sail through and then away from plumes of volcanic smog; and Luffy, Sanji, and Zoro are not with us. I’m wearing enough fluffy angora-blend wool garments to pass for a snow-bunny; I only need a layer of silk on the outermost, and I’ll have achieved that coveted ‘stay puft’ look. Luffy, Sanji, and Zoro are- are fine! Probably definitely fine!

Yeah!
I- just need to. Do some things that aren’t. Here.

I’ll just go and- clean up the kitchen. Yeah.

I’ll do that.

Washing dishes, cleaning up the remains of the sliced veggies; I’ll turn them into a mixed salad, that way- and all the cheese, meat, and bread got eaten because of course it did. I close up the jars of sauces, mayonnaise, mustard, tomato ketchup, mushroom ketchup, worcestershire, barbeque; I close the jar of peanut butter, and the nutella, and the honey, and the marshmallow fluff. I wipe down each jar before putting it away; my crewmates can get very messy, which is why Sanji really doesn’t like doing serve-yourself style; they’ll combine things that have no business being next to each other. Mayonnaise and peanut butter do not belong on the same sandwich; there’s a limit to historical connection, Robin, and that’s where I draw a line.

Anyway; I actually hate washing dishes and the annoyingly precise work of preparing bases for the next day’s meals, but since Sanji plans parts of our menu a full month in advance, I can just look at his schedule and do what he’d have done if he were- here-

Deep breath. Exhale.

He’s. Fine.

Think about something else.

The Flying Dutchman is the oldest currently active ghost ship currently sailing the ocean without a Letter of Marque from the Florian Council of Screams. It is old, and worn from time. According to one report from the Florian Mariners, the Flying Dutchman is an idealized ghost ship: its sails are torn and tattered, and moss and barnacles are growing from various spots on the ship. The mast is similar to a clock tower in design. On the bottom front sail is the name “FLYING DUTCHMAN”, and the top one bears the crew Jolly Roger, a fanged skull with crossed swords- cutlasses, for reference- their blades pointing down in place of crossbones. The ship’s figurehead bears the same mark, indicating that the ship was built after the formation of the crew- and a general arrogance to the crew that’s hard to describe except like this: think of every pirate crew you’ve ever known. Now, consider- how many of those crews have had their ship’s figurehead and their pirate-mark be at all the same?

The Flying Dutchman is the only one I’ve ever heard of. It’s also supposed to be huge- the same size as a full grown giant, if you can believe that. It’s not coated, since it’s crew is almost entirely Seafolk; and it’s reported to sail almost exclusively in various Deep Currents, specifically, the Tradesman’s Currents that run parallel and a little adjacent to the Big Deep Currents. That’s more than ten thousand feet below Sea level. It’s- well, it’s a marvel of Seafolk engineering, and I would love to get a look at those building plans, n-n-not that I’m, that I’m unhappy with Sunny or anything, Sunny’s a wonderful ship, I just- woooh. Every ship has it’s charms, and I really want to know how that particular ship does what it does.

Legend says that the Flying Dutchman can never make port, and is doomed to sail the oceans forever. Says that it all came to pass because of the Captain committing atrocious crimes; three, right after th’other.
The signs of the Dutchman’s approach are thus: Light, where no light should be, in the black waters of the night. Songs, from no throat on the ship. And finally- if the ghost ship is hailed, it will try to send messages to people long dead. It’s said that, in the old days when Navigation was still in it’s infancy, the crew or the captain of that ship were struck low with pestilence and died, and- having gained their vile afflictions by doing Wrong, their souls were ordained to stay, and sail onwards on the ocean in which they perished, until the period of their penance expired.

‘Fast gliding along, a gloomy bark
Her sails are full, though the wind is still,
And there blows not a breath her sails to fill.’

Some say the ship was originally a vessel loaded with great and astonishing wealth, on board of which some horrific act of murder and piracy had been committed- and in those days, Peace Mains were the sort of Pirate that roamed the Sea. It’s said that the crew of the Dutchman will try to pass on letters to people long dead for delivery, but accepting them brings nothing but misfortune and ruination; it’s said that the captain of the Dutchman is in league with the Devil, who rules all of Hell.

That last bit’s not true- at least, not anymore. Granny’s not an active pirate anymore, and her alliance of pirates is long gone and mostly forgotten- I mean, people still remember Davey Jones, and Jack Sparrow, The Barbarossa Brothers, the “Sea Dog” Sir Cuttley Flambe Drake, “Buccaneer” L’Olonnais (which was mistranslated as Roronoa and- considering Bucky’s habits… “I’m Buck and I like to Fuck” is a very old joke because, and I can’t stress this enough, it was goddamn true. Roronoa Zoro is just one of the most prominent members of that clan, there are Roronoa’s everywhere, it’s a very common name because Buck really liked to fuck-), Granuna herself- Maleficent “Greenteeth” Morgan (and her ship, Jenny), Danelphe themselves- now called Elphame Morgan, then called something else that I’ve misplaced in my memory, damn- no, tell a lie, they were called “The Devil”; “Calico” Jack Rackham, Ladie Bonney, Lorna Reed; Wilmot “Smithy” Turner, and- lastly- “Henrich” Vander Decken.

Vander Decken was a staunch seaman, and would have his own way in spite of the devil. For all that, never a sailor under him had reason to complain; though how it was on board with them nobody knows. In doubling the Ryushima Cape they were a long day trying to weather the Moonlit Bay. However, the wind headed them and went against them more and more, and Vander Decken walked the deck, cursing the wind. Just after sunset a vessel spoke to him, asking him if he did not mean to go into the bay that night. Vander Decken replied: “May I and my crew be eternally damned if I do, though I should beat about here until the day of Judgment.”

To be sure, he never did go into that bay, for it is believed that he continues to beat about in these seas still, and will do so long enough.

As for what they say in Skua?

It goes like this: In the old days of Gods and Demons, the Age that came before the Age of Heroes, the Sea was Ruled Absolute by Calypso, daughter of Atlas Skybearer. Calypso ruled the wine-dark seas with an iron fist, and all those who sailed her Sea both loved and feared her in equal measure.

But because she too had mortal blood, she fell in love with a young sailor named Davy Jones. She rewarded that love by making her lover immortal, as she was- her lover could no longer be taken by disease or age, though, like her, battle could still catch him. In order to gain Atlas'- her father’s-blessing, Davy Jones took up the duty of ferrying those souls what had been lost at Sea to the Otherworld. The Challenge was Thus: Ten Years at Sea, and One Day Ashore. If Calypso did return his love, after ten years of his absence, his task would be complete and they could be together forever; a new captain of the Flying Dutchman could be found. But when Davy Jones returned from the Sea, Calypso was nowhere to be found.

As the Sea is fickle, so too was it’s goddess.

In those days, the Pirate Court still reigned; and though now, only the King still retains his powers and titles, in the ancient days there were Twelve seats: the Four Blue Lords of the Sea; the Seven Kings of War; the Pirate King, who ruled over all; and the Fool- sometimes called the Devil- who spoke the truth only, and kept things honest, in their way. At the convening of Court, Davy Jones, who was a prominent King of War, plotted with his fellows to tear the rule of the Sea away from Calypso.

It is important to note that the Devil, or Fool, was never the King’s man; the stories argue about who the Devil really was, but they were never the King’s man. It was Davy Jones who knew the secret weaknesses of Calypso; and it was Davy Jones who told the Court how to strip her of her divine strength and mystical powers, and bind her then in the form of a mortal woman- but it was the Devil who made it possible for this thing done for one day be undone.

It is said that Calypso betrayed Davy Jones; it is said that Davy Jones betrayed Calypso. I think it’s fairly interesting that after his betrayal of her, he cut out his own beating heart and locked it into a box, burying it in some secret place where it would beat forever more. His heart had, after all, betrayed him- and so he would have no more of it. He then returned to the Sea; only now, instead of carrying out the duty with which he had been charged… well. Davy Jones is a name feared even now; the man who once loved Calypso had become fierce and cruel, and reveled in the bloodshed and horror he could now unleash.

All things secret are one day revealed; and so it was that an ambitious mortal found the heart of Davy Jones. That mortal knew they could use the heart to force Davy Jones to do their bidding; and so it came to pass that a Kraken, no malicious spirit but the true unnatural monster rose from the deeps. The dread and gargantuan beast scuttled many ships; and it brought its master, Davy Jones, many a lost soul onto his accursed ship, where those dead souls would be impressed into an eternity of servitude.

The Pirate Court became afraid of Davy Jones, King of War; and so convened again in secret. However, they could only argue and fight amongst themselves, as they were afraid of Calypso’s wrath at their treachery. The Devil did not wait for agreement; they’d been in league with the Goddess Calypso all along. They took those things which had been used to bind her to mortal flesh, twenty tokens of betrayal and ten of trust, and they undid the spell that had betrayed her. Cats, The Devil, and the Sea.

It’d have been thirty pieces of silver, but all the Court was flat broke at the time of their betrayal, so it was basically whatever they had in their pockets at the time. Playing cards, dice, scrimshaws, bits of string, chunks of amber and interesting bugs, bits of bone- y’know. The kind of stuff pirates-interesting pirates- have in their pockets. Kittens.

Once freed, the Goddess’ wrath was horrible to behold, and even worse to experience. She gathered all the waters of the Sea around herself in a powerful maelstrom, at the center of which there was fought a terrible battle. It was in that very battle that Davy Jones’ heart was pierced at last, freeing him forever. With his death, Davy Jones was welcomed into the dark heart of the Sea- for Calypso loved him still, and he her, in their own ways.

And thus it comes to this: under the old Pirate Laws, whosoever kills the Captain of the Ship has the right to it, and the crew, if they will follow them what did the deed. Mostly, enemy pirates try to use this rule to justify going after the enemy Captain. Really, it’s there so that, if your Captain goes crazy, you and your crew have options.

“Neh, Davy Jones… is real?” said Captain.

“He was. He sailed on the ghost ship- The Flying Dutchman.”

“But- we just saw it, and-” said Captain.

“Vander Decken stabbed his Captain in the heart, Luffy. And, when my Dana, The Devil, in those days, asked him why- he said that it had to be done. Said ‘There are some who ought not walk ‘neath the living sky, Scratch.’ And that was it.”

“‘Cuz I was gonna say- Vander Decken isn’t a… Dutchy’s a Kingdom down Sout, right?” said Captain.

“Yep.”

“Vander Decken is not a Dutchy name.” said Captain.

“He basically stole the ship, Captain; your guess is as good as mine about why he didn’t change the name.”

“-why’d he have to take the ship and the crew, though?” said Captain.

“It has to do with the heart, Captain. In those days, Devil Fruits weren’t exactly what they are now- I don’t know exactly where they came from, I can’t remember, but- they weren’t as they are now. The powers… shifted? There used to be fewer of them, and they were more… More. As Granny tells it- ‘If I had stabbed That Damnfool’s heart, mine would have taken it’s place. I’d have sailed the Sea for all eternity; that ship was built for one job, and must have a Captain to do it. I’m of the opinion that the safest, and best, place for a heart is where it belongs, inside my chest. ’ So.”

“When Davy Jones broke his Oath, he Cursed himself.” said Captain.

“Yep.”

“-And his ship, and his crew, too.” said Captain.

“Yep.”

“...Do you know how it’s green flash works?” said Luffy.

“Yes, but for legal reasons ours- if we get one- can’t be green. I’ll collaborate with Franky on it, if you’d like.”

“Cool!” cheered Luffy.
I smiled, and started straining the flowers out of the water; that’s the roses, which I did second of the batch. Rinse out the pot, put the petals into the compost barrel, and move on to the next one.

“Mab-sis?”

“-Yes, Franky?”

“Tell me about the Flying Dutchman.”

“Alright. The Flying Dutchman weighs about four hundred twenty tonnes, and is approximately one hundred and seventy feet long—”

“-I can do the conversions myself, keep going-”

“-Alright. Approximately one hundred and seventy feet long, from stern to bow. It is armed with forty-six cannons, which do not include the paired triple-barreled chase guns. The Dutchman is considered to be the fastest ship both on and beneath the Sea; however, it was never able to maintain pursuit of the Black Pearl, which had an edge with a following wind, while the Dutchman is fastest with a headwind.

“In such cases, the crew needed to call upon the Dutchman’s most potent and powerful weapon to destroy their enemies. The ship was thus fitted with a Kraken- excuse me, Capstan Hammer, which was thus used to summon the dread beast from oceanic depths. As far as I’m aware, the Dutchman is the only vessel currently immune to the Kraken’s destructive rage.”

“Do you know how that’s possible, or…?”

“I’d have to double check a few things, but at a guess? Frequency; like, sound frequency. Not something you can really mess around with on the fly.”

“No. Anyway, you were-”

“-Right, sure. The Dutchman’s rigging consists of three masts: the fore, the mizzen, and the main. She’s square rigged on both the fore and the main, but the mizzen carries one lateen sail and one topsail. Like all 7th century galleons, the Dutchman originally had a bowsprit with the spritsail topmast on its end. The bowsprit carried two square spritsails, but after it was broken, the new bowsprit was placed almost exactly above the Dutchman’s terrifying figurehead. How do I know that? Nevermind- Two staysails can be unfurled on the stays connecting the foremast and the aforementioned new bowsprit- no, seriously, how do I know that?”

“I did just draw the ship, and it’s not like I’m hiding it or anything-”

“Oh-! Yeah, that’s- oh, that’s interesting.”

“What?”

“Mm, Vander Decken moved the nameplate; it’s been moved from it’s original spot, there, to that spot on the lower stern gallery. The hull is made of pyrobloin-coated- er, pyrolyzed- gold, bronze, and Adam Wood. Her cannons emerge from those ports on either side of the ship; those carvings of animal heads, lions and fish and so on; also pyrolyzed. Pyrite isn’t just the proper name of Fool’s Gold; it’s the name of gold after it’s been treated with pyrobloin. Oh, that one’s bronze- the even rows are always bronze, on these kinds of ships—let me see… Aha. Her main armament consists of twenty thirty-six hundred pound cannons and eighteen twenty-four hundred pound cannons, supplemented by three-pounders on the quarterdeck and forecastle, making her capable of delivering a one million one hundred fifty two hundred thousand pound broadside. This overwhelmingly heavy broadside proved on multiple occasions to be a destructive, if not fatal, blow to any ship that was at range. She also carries two large triple rotating bow chasers.

“Can you say what the figurehead is supposed to be?”

“Mm… looks like either a bananawami or a barracuda. I’m going to go with barracuda; I like fish.”

“What color are the sails in daylight?”

“They should be clean white, a bit cloudy; they look ragged when wet, but that’s an artifact of their construction and the material, they’re actually whole sails.”

“And the green flash?”

“It’s something very like our Coupe de Burst, but with a flashing firework in-front to blind our enemies and make it seem like we vanished into nothing. S’ Boffo.”

“And the joke shop?”

“Exactly like. People are always more willing to believe a good bit of Boffo- oh, am I taking the shine off the magic for you, Franky?”

“Little bit, yeah.”

“I mean- I taxidermied my bananawami, Petunia, because I like taxidermy. Normally, I’d have just ordered her out of a Boffo catalogue- you’ve never seen the catalogue, have you.”

“N-no. Huh.”

“I mean… Crowns, helmets, Mihawk’s Sword- those are all boffo too.”

“Mihawk’s Sword is Boffo?”

“Yeah- there’s no secret or fancy trick to it; it’s only magic is keeping rust free and balanced. All the rest is good old fashioned blacksmithing, and Mihawk’s own dread skill.”

“…Really?” said a fairly disgruntled Zoro.

“I’ve seen him do his ‘Greatest Swordsman in the World’ thing with a bokken, Zoro. He’s the best because he’s the best, and for the best… it doesn’t really matter what they use. They’re still the best.”

“Damn. I’ve got a long way to go.” said Zoro.

“Knowing how the magic actually works doesn’t make it not magic, guys. Chin up!” I chirp.

I pour Vanilla Extract and Cinnamon Extract and Mint Extract into their storage bottles. Orangeat next; toast those almonds, Mab.

Shaka-shaka-shaka-shaka.
Gotta finish off the last of this bottle, too- so. We always have honey syrup too, thanks to the honeyjackets… hmmm.

“Mab-? Are… Are you making… mixed drinks?” says Nami, very hopefully.

“I could.”

“…Can I have a whiskey sour?” says Nami quick, as if she thinks if she says it fast enough, I won’t remember she’s pregnant until it’s too late and the drink’s in her hand. Not a chance in hell, friendo.

“You can have one whiskey sour, Nami. I’ll make you a Monte Carlo.”

“…Yeah, okay. No one makes ’em like you do, not even Sanji.” sighs Nami.

“Mm. He tries to use shortcuts- and bartending really isn’t cooking, it’s got more in common with waiting tables and baking, neither of which are exactly his forte.”

“…?” “Um…”

“He’s best with the artistry of cooking- sauces, soups, grilled things. You know. The fun parts.”

“Ah.” says Zoro.

“I, personally, like fermentation as a cooking method- cheese, yoghurt, alcohol-”

“Yog-hurt, Mab?” says Sanji, leaning on the kitchen counter pass-through; and grinning at me, the fart.

“Oh god, this is like the brioche thing, isn’t it-”

“Mab, you’re still calling them brooshes-” smiles Sanji.

“-that’s how they’re spelled-!”

“Hmmph. Stuuuupid. ...I suppose you want a Muscovy Mule?”

“If you don’t mind terribly, yeah.” smirks Sanji.

Hmhmm. He knows I like mixing drinks.

“Neh- do you think Surume would like a drink?” says Luffy.

“Captain, you made a new friend?”

“Yeah! Surume was in the Kraken, and I think actually is a Kraken-” says Luffy.

“-Oh god-”

“-but she’s just a baby one. We’re on her head, actually.” says Luffy.
“Oh. Well, alright. I- why are we on her head?”

“She’s navigating us to Fishman Island, she knows exactly where it is. Nice to be out of that bubble, too, and she’s really good at punching-” says Luffy.

“...Surume?”

“Yeah, she punched that Umebozu thing.” says Luffy.

I pause. I think that one over.

“Sea urchin…?”

“ Umi bozu, Luffy.” says Zoro.

“Oh, that makes much more sense.” I say, handing Nami her Monte Carlo.

A Monte Carlo is a simple drink, cousin to the Manhattan. Also similar to a Vieux Carre (“-Cah-rey, Mab-” “-One day I’ll learn to speak Neamont-”) or a Brainstorm. Definitely it’s own character, though.

It uses Rye Whiskey, Benedictine, Aromatic Bitters and a twist of lemon peel for garnish. It’s a tight jazz quartet, whereas the Vieux Carre is a full orchestra. Different, but delightful in it’s own way.

Chill a rocks glass and set it aside; put two ounces of Rye, half an ounce of Benedictine, two dashes of Aromatic Bitters into a mixing glass with ice and give it a stir, to chill it out and add some dilution. Pour your mixed drink into the glass, express the oils of the lemon peel onto the drink, set the peel in so it looks nice, and you’re done. Nami loves them. And, in a choice between a Monte Carlo and a piece of white toast slathered in honey and butter, I’d rather Nami have the Monte Carlo.

I’d also like it if she drank this entire glass of water- thank you.

“I- urgh. Huh. I actually want the water more than the booze- I think I just wanted to be included.” sighed Nami.

“If you don’t want it, don’t drink it, Nami. Zoro, you want a Muscovy too, or-”

“I’d like a Mezcal Mule, actually- since you’ve already got all the stuff out...” said Zoro. It never fails to amuse, how very similar Zoro and Sanji are; it’s why they clash so violently. Those little differences are very sharp.

Two ounces Mezcal, three quarters ounce Lime Juice, three quarters ounce Syrup of Ginger, half ounce Demerara Sugar Syrup, and Zoro likes six dashes of Peychaud’s Bitters.

Shake mezcal, lime, ginger, and Demerara with a little crushed ice; pour into Julep Cup. Top with more crushed ice and bitters. Serve with a metal straw; and only hand the drink over when it’s frosty on the outside.

“Thank you, Mab.” says Zoro.

“Mm.”

And Zoro’s pretty much right- a Muscovy Mule is very similar to a Mezcal Mule. Like most things with the flavorless spirit, Muscovy, it’s all about perception. Change the name from a Muscovy Buck to Muscovy Mule; a little alliteration makes the allure of the drink ever so slightly more potent.

It’s a simple cocktail, but like all simple things, the devil’s in the details. It was originally made to offload Norten Muscovy and Skuan Gingerbeer to the unsuspecting masses in a marketing ploy, but propaganda never tasted so good. Hiball with gingerbeer and lime; and I serve it in a copper mug because that aesthetic though.

Main player, in a lot of the drinks I’m making, is Ginger. Ginger’s a root, and as far as taste goes, it’s supposed to grab your taste by the horns and suplex it to the ground. That’s why they call them ‘Mules’ y’see- the ginger’s supposed to hit like a kick to the head. I like using ginger syrup on a four to three ratio- four ginger, three syrup. Gives the ginger a nice bite, with enough muscle to back it up.

A lot of times, the Muscovy Mule becomes a diving board to play with the spirit and call it “Something” Mule (even though it should be the “Something” Buck), Dutchy Mule, Mezcal Mule, and so on- but there’s a crisp sincere simplicity to the Ginger and Lime combination that when spiked with Muscovy remains really… mmm. The marketing used to push Muscovy as unobtrusive; in this drink, that’s exactly right. It’s powerful, but hidden in the concoction so well- you may not realize quite what you’re drinking.

Two ounces of Muscovy, the juice of half a lime (approximately three quarters ounce lime juice); five or six ounces of Ginger Beer, and a Splash of Ginger Syrup.

Build it in the glass over ice; let the condensation build up a bit. Sanji takes his drink with a smile. God he’s pretty.

-I’ll make Advocaat when it’s closer to Imbolc, we’ve got a good two weeks yet and it only lasts about five days.

“ADVOCAAAT!” cheers Chopper.

“Two more weeks, Young Buck. -and he’s gone.”

“Heh. Kid’s got a hankering for that holiday buzz, eh?” says Franky.

“Mm. Pina Colada?”

“Pin-ya Col-AH-da” says Sanji.
“Nah, I’ll have a Muscovy-” says Franky.

“Alright.”

The next few hours are a flurry of drinks. Mostly Mai Tais, actually- somehow, it always devolves to Mai Tais, punch, and bar snacks on our drinking nights. Oh yeah, and apparently Taffy ended up sailing us almost directly into an active volcano or something? No, Luffy gave Surume a bucket of Mai Tai and things got a bit- I mean.

I would have had a stronger reaction to that, but- Mai Tais. Also, either we’d live through that, or we wouldn’t. Can’t be getting all jumped up over every little thing, y’know.

Mm. Mai Tai.
It’s Let’s talk about Goats.

The domestic, or Civil, goat is a subspecies of goat that was domesticated from the Wild Goat of Southwestern Est and Eastern Nort. The goat is a member of the family Bovidae, and is closely related to the sheep- as both are in the goat-antelope subfamily Caprinae. There are over five hundred distinct breeds in the World, though only three hundred are recognized internationally, and only one hundred fifty breeds can be shown at the Statement Fair.

Goats are one of the oldest domesticated species, maybe second or third after dogs and cereal grains. They are used for their milk, meat, hair, skins, and company over much of the world. As far as the records show, there were over nine hundred twenty four million live goats around the World in 011, the Eleventh Year; and this number has ebbed and flowed over the intervening centuries, according to the United Food and Agriculture Organization.

A female goat is referred to as a ‘doe’ or a ‘nanny’; does have not had kids, while nannies have. Intact males are called ‘bucks’ or ‘billies’; bucks have not mated a doe, while billies have. And finally, the juveniles of both sexes are called ‘kids’- as an aside, the reason one may sometimes call a group of children ‘kids’ is because the only thing that climbs things and screams all the times like a child is a kid, and vice-versa. Small children are wild animals, and don’t you forget it.

Goat meat from the younger animal is called “kid meat” or cabrito in the Sout, while meat from older animals is known simply as “goat” or sometimes called chevon in the Nort; back in Skua, it’d be either goat or mutton. Yes, mutton more often refers to adult sheep meat, but- I never said it made sense.

According to the Anthropological record, although various domestications were going on basically congruently across the World, Goats were first domesticated in Nort. During the Neolithic period (which is the last Stone Age before we started using metal), Norten farmers began herding wild goats primarily for easy access to milk and meat, as well as for their dung, which was used as fuel, fertilizer, and I want to say scent marking, but I’m not sure. They also used their bones, hair, and sinew for clothing, building, and tools. The earliest remnants of domesticated goats dates to about ten thousand years before the first calendar, and were found in Dashleen, Micqueot. Historically, goat hide is used for water and wine bottles in both traveling and transporting wine for sale. It’s also been used for the production of parchment.

Also historically, the worst thing you could call a Nortener was a goatfucker. Nothing pisses someone from the Nort off quite so fast or so badly.

Nothing.

Goats are small livestock animals, as compared to cattle, camels, lionbirds, and horses; but they are larger than microlivestock such as poultry and game birds, rabbits, cavies, and bees. Each recognized breed, international or otherwise, has a specific weight range. Within each breed, different strains or bloodlines- Lines, you see- have different recognized sizes and horn arrangements.

Goats have between two and ten horns, always in an even distribution, and varying in shape or size depending on the breed. Goats always have horns unless they have been ‘polled’, meaning they are either genetically hornless, or the horns have been removed, typically soon after birth. Typically, the horns are removed in commercial herds- dairy, leather, meat, hair, and so on- to reduce injuries to the goat and the product. Unlike cattle, goats have not been successfully bred to be reliably polled, as the determining factors for gender and horns are nearly the same. Breeding together two genetically polled goats results in a high number of intersex individuals among the offspring, which, while not sterile, are significantly less likely to be able to breed successfully. Male-favoring intersexed individuals are much less virile, while female-favoring intersexed individuals tend to not survive the birthing process.

Goat horns- and Sanji’s horns- are made of living bone surrounded by keratin and other proteins. They are used for defence, dominance, and territoriality. Sanji’s horn velvet is- as far as I can tell- a product of his Demonic Lineage. It’s also starting to soften; it’s less like boar bristles and more like velveteen, now. Apparently, for Sanji, his horns are going to grow in stages , with each stage marked by sensitivity in the velvet, immediately followed by a lowering of that sensitivity and a rise in… He likes it when I rub them. They’re about as thick as two of my fingers, put together, and startlingly hot to the touch- not burning, but hot like his cock when he’s aroused. So, um- a motorboat is when one person sticks their face into someone else’s tits and goes ‘bhpbpbpbbp’ in them, possibly shaking their head back and forth and nuzzling into the soft titty meats as they go. I don’t quite have enough bosom to make motorboating really fun, but Sanji does like nuzzling right against my sternum, so. It’ll be different when the velvet comes off, I know that much...

Goats are ruminants. They have a four-chambered stomach consisting of the rumen, the reticulum, the omasum, and the abomasum. As with other mammalian ruminants, they are even toed ungulates. The females have an udder consisting of two teats, in contrast to cattle which have four, and lionbirds, which have eight.

Goats have a horizontal, slit-shaped pupil; it’s the same shape as Sanji’s Norten Stripe. After all, before he was Lord of the Smoking Vine, Udoroth was the Lord of Goats. Ah, right- cattle, deer, most horses, and many sheep have the same kind of pupil; but, because the irises of a goat are usually pale, it’s much more visible. Both male and female goats have beards, and most dairy goats have wattles, one on each side of the neck. As for telling a goat from a sheep when they look basically the same: a goat tail is short and points up, while a sheep tail is long and hangs down.

Goats reach puberty between three and fifteen months of age, depending on breed and nutrition. In temperate climates, which Sabaody is in, breeding season commences during or after the autumn equinox, and ends a little before Yule; in tropical regions, goats breed year round. Successful breeding in any region depends more on nutrition than on day length or enthusiasm. Does of any breed or region come into estrus, or heat, every twenty one days for two to forty eight hours- during the breeding season. A doe in heat will flag her tail often, stay near the buck if one is present, become more vocal, and may also show a decrease in appetite and milk production for the duration of the heat. Bucks of the Norten breeds come into rut in the autumn, tending to synchronise with the does’ heat cycles, regardless of the breed of the does. Bucks of tropical breeds tend to have seasonally reduced fertility, but, much like the does, are capable of breeding at all times. So- you’ll get more goats from tropical females and Norten males, but you’ll actually get a happier herd of goats overall with Norten females and equatorial males. Unless I’ve gotten that reversed, which I might have.

Sanji doesn’t quite have a rut cycle- for one thing, I don’t exactly have an estrus cycle, I have an estrus cultural cycle which is entirely different- but he does have a powerful manstank. It is for this reason, among others, that I do not allow Sanji in the Dairy. He can churn butter just fine- he’s actually fairly good with the hand churn- but he, his manstank, and his man dust, are not allowed in my nice clean Dairy, and that’s the end of it. Similarly, I’m not allowed in his Smokehouse.

All this to say- Sanji’s smell is very nice, to me. Robin hates it. Nami says it’s okay, but Zoro’s is better- and the general consensus among the crew is that Sanji is a smelly man, and it’s not a bad smell, but they’d like it if the butter, milk, cheese, and eggs didn’t taste like him. So.
Sanji is Not Allowed in the Dairy anymore. They also don’t want cured meats that taste like flowers, so I’m Not Allowed in the Smokehouse anymore.

Thus becomes the division of labor.

Oh, right- we have a Dairy and a Smokehouse, and a Barn, too. Mark actually finished the Barn, which Franky had planned out and laid the foundations for; and the Dairy and Smokehouse ended up in the original plans I think because of how Sanji wanted his kitchen laid out? But basically- there’s the kitchen, and then the mast; and then, across from Chopper’s Infirmary there’s the Dairy, which has an inner door to the Galley and Kitchen, and an outer door to the Barnyard area. Unlike the Infirmary, the Dairy is not for passing through; the outer door stays shut unless I’m bringing in milk or eggs, and since Mark and Sanji are men, I’m the one who keeps our milk, washes our eggs, and makes our cheese, soap, and candles. I’m also in charge of our honey supplies, our bees, our poultry, milking- there’s a list of things I handle that Mark does not. Mark feeds the animals, and keeps them in good health and spirits. He mucks out their stalls and pens, turns the compost, makes sure the dogs are exercised, and when the time comes, he is the one who slaughters our animals for the table; Sanji does the butchering, mostly, although he does sometimes let Taffy or I do it if he’s in need of a lot of meat- but Mark does the actual killing of the animals.

So. What’s my day like?

Well, let’s start at the beginning. Sanji and I only need five hours of sleep in one unbroken stretch to be getting on with the day; however, we both like having a total of eight hours unbroken to rest in. Therefore, while we do actually go to sleep at midnight, we retire to our bed at nine of the clock. That’s certainly when our daily duties are finished with.

We aren’t asleep by then, of course- but we are usually abed by eleven at the latest, and sleeping by midnight. Those hours between when we retire for the evening and when we sleep are usually reserved for our lovemaking, and while we can be interrupted during our practice of the conjugal arts, it’s not a healthsome idea. Luffy knows that, while he can sneak into the kitchen for food during our sexy-times, it’s likely to get him fucked up. He tries, every now and again- but he’s not dumb. And we are not weak.

Five hours after we fall into slumber, we wake again for the day. The day starts with about ten to twenty minutes of cuddling, kissing, and mutual masturbation; an orgasm is a very nice way to start the day, as it loosens all the muscles that may have tensed up during the night, and the shot of adrenaline clears the sinuses and raises the blood pressure. It also provides a handy excuse to get out of bed, because you can’t just lay around in your own love juices, and after I orgasm in the morning I usually realize that I very desperately need to piss-

Then, Sanji and I take our showers, brush our teeth, use the head if necessary, and begin our days, right around five-forty to six. Breakfast service is promptly at nine of the clock, and lasts until the food is gone- on our crew, that’s about an hour. Mark is about an hour ahead of us; his schedule is a little wobbly, but Sanji’s figured out some way of feeding him at the very first of the day that both of them can accept. I gather it involves oatmeal, and a Norten-press for coffee, but not much more than that.

I strip our bed first, exchange the loads of laundry, make our bed, and begin the gathering of dirty laundry. This takes me about half an hour to do. The first thing Sanji makes in the morning is coffee and tea; thus, the first up for the day are Robin, Nami, Franky, Taffy, Bryony, Gurry, and Brook. I strip their beds next, make them again, and gather their dirty laundry- that’s another half hour gone. The next to go into the Galley are Usopp, Mark- after a shower- and Chopper, which is when I go strip their beds.
Usopp, Mark, and Luffy share a bed now, but sometimes, one or all of them need their own space; thus, their room actually has three different beds. Luffy will sleep through anything except a mealtime; it’s actually easiest for me to change his sheets with him still abed, then change the other two. Takes about fifteen minutes all total, and then another fifteen for the dirty clothing.

You might be wondering why I gather dirty clothing every day. It’s nothing to do with my washing—i really only wash at the end of the week. It’s to do with stains. Nami, Robin, Chopper, Bryony, and Gurry all have very heavy stains on their clothing—ink, mostly, though Bryony has oil and Gurry has paints. Mark, of course, comes back with his shirts positively filthy— and, as he only wears white shirts, I have, on occasion, had to beat the filth and stains out with paddles. Zoro, Sanji, Usopp, Luffy, Franky, and Taffeta have the more usual problem of work-dirt; Zoro’s clothing ends up sweat-stained, as does Sanji’s with the addition of volatile oils. Usopp needs his washing done fairly regularly, or he’s in very real danger of combustion; Luffy is actually a fairly neat eater, he’s just… lively, is the word. He’s so lively, the World around him more often than not ends up smeared all over his clothing. I’ve turned live frogs out of Luffy’s pockets.

I’m not talking about Franky’s speedos, but his shirts need tender loving care because he really loves bright colors and he gets oil and lubricants and who knows what else all over him—sawdust, metal shavings, weird shop dirt—all over him all the time. Taffeta’s clothing is usually dusty or covered in lint by the end of her day; the woman likes weird places, the nooks and crannies, and weird places like that gather dirt like nothing else.

Of us all, it’s me and Brook who stay cleanest through the day; me because after training and working, I usually change my clothing. I take having clothes for the occasion very seriously.

And Brook, because he’s an undead skeleton musician that mostly plays music and spars. He can’t sweat or secrete anything anymore—which raises uncomfortable questions about if he can eat or not… I mean, he uses the toilet, so I’d say he can, I just… Hm.

How undead is Brook, anyway?

Well, never mind that; the first two hours of my work day are spent attending to the laundry. I gather up dirty washing, treat stains, check ongoing stain treatments, and sort laundry. The third hour is farmwork; by then, Mark’s finished feeding the animals, turning them out for the day, mucking stalls, turning compost, and so on.

Here’s where my Devil Fruit starts coming in handy; around this time is when Sanji takes his first smoking break of the day. He’s actually cut down to just two daily; he’s working with myself and Chopper to lower it to nothing. Smoke is not good for babies, and Sanji does want to be around them.

So.

He knows I don’t like the taste of smoke. I know he likes kissing a hell of a lot more than he likes cigarettes. He knows I know. I know he knows. We know.

So. Sanji takes about half an hour for a smoke break in the morning, and again in the evening, around sunset; and, at his request—not that it’s a hard thing to do—I give him a tongue fucking style kiss during most of those half hours, hard enough to make him forget all about his cigarettes.

What, you ask, is a tongue fucking kiss?
Well.

It’s like this- there are four doors through the Galley, not counting the trapdoor. So; front door, which opens onto the lawn deck; side door, which goes to the dairy; side door, which goes through Chopper’s Infirmary, and back door, which goes to the Smokehouse and Pantry. There’s actually an antechamber to the Smokehouse, meant for overflow- it’s got a fairly comfortable padded bench long enough to lay down on, strong ventilation, and a working bench where Sanji mixes his dry-rubs. It’s also a good spot for us to make out.

I have a quick wipe off after my first two hours of work for the day; then I go find Sanji. He always stubs out his cigarette in the ashtray when I come into the not-quite smokehouse; blows a last long breath of smoke out through his nose and mouth, watches me with glimmering blue eyes. I sit myself next to him, shoulder to shoulder.

Let myself adjust to the stinking, smoky air.

Urgh.

And then I can smell Sanji, under it all- man musk and seafood and brine and cigarette ash and his mouth is hot, hot hot- dry, the taste of ashes. But warmer and wetter and then a sudden gush of saliva and the taste of mouth, Sanji’s mouth tastes like mouth.

I feel along his teeth with my tongue; they’re sharp, and the sharpest are his incisors, his canid teeth; they’re like fangs. I find his tongue, curling and flicking in his jaws.

Stroke up the slippery sides, where the pebbly rasp of the top gives way to the smooth slippery fun of the bottom; stroke back down and again, again until he sighs with pleasure. Breathe, and then wrap my tongue around his, rasp to rasp and squirm and he squeaks. Swirl the tip of my tongue only just against his, and then the sudden surge of my tongue into his mouth, raspy scrape of meat against the roof of his mouth and- and-

When did I climb onto his lap? Nmmm, he knows I like it when he digs his fingers into the meat of my ass. fffuck - I surge forwards until his back is to the wall and I plunder his mouth for it’s sweetness. My tongue dances in and out of his lips, again again again until our hips are rolling together and- shift back, away.

A long string of rapidly cooling saliva connects our mouths. Sanji’s pupils aren’t quite dilated. My wings aren’t quite relaxed.

But it’s been half an hour, and we have work to do.

“Sorry, My Love. After lunch, we’ll finish this?”

“We’d better, pchelka.”

“Hmhmhm. Mmm- one more, then I’ve gotta go.”

“Only the one-?”

“Mm. One or two, maybe- mmmMMMPH♥! HMHMHMHM♥!”
In the hour before breakfast, for half an hour my actual physical body takes a rest and kisses my husband. Dairy Doll milks our goats, of which we have six, now; twice what we started with. Poultry Doll gathers the eggs of our doves and our quail, which averages about two eggs per bird per day; factoring in the number of birds we actually have in the cote and the run— it’s something like two dozen egg doves and forty-something quail eggs. Sanji usually needs most of the eggs for breakfast—there are often two or three left over, and with Imbolc imminent, it’s about time for me to start keeping the quail eggs in reserve… oh, um. Quail eggs are safer to eat raw than chicken or dove; as for preserving eggs… since they’re for an alcoholic beverage which is going to be spiced, I do believe that keeping them in quick limed water should suffice.

Let’s see… Dairy Doll milks the goats, Poultry Doll gathers eggs- aha, one of me gathers produce, that’s Gardening Doll.

We have nothing in the forage section- January and February are the Starving Gap, remember? Well, actually, that’s not true- out near our midden, we have Velvet Shank mushrooms, the first tips of nettles springing up, wild garlic to keep the goats away- they don’t like the taste and remember the smell; no sweet violets yet, but I do take a moment to send myself off to my House- not Tiffanyan, but Thuletima. Being the eldest daughter of Morgan, Thuletima is mine, now. I’ve set it up to run basically without me? It’s more a farm, really, and I’ve decided to defer rent for a while- I’ll still repair things, but I want my people to save their money or get things they actually need… is that weird? I don’t know if that’s weird.

I mean. I don’t think it’s weird to decide that for just a little less money, I can have people living and working on my land for living wages that they are encouraged to spend on things they’d like, not on rent I don’t need just yet. I still collect taxes, but that’s because I’d like our government to pay for the roads being cleared and so on.

Anyway, Thuletima is a Birch Tree, so- getting at the birch sap is a matter of checking the spigots. None yet, but we’ll see tomorrow- it only lasts for two weeks, after all. Easy’s making wine with last year’s supply.

Where was I- no sweet violets, no birch sap yet, dandelions are in and taste lovely in salad, wintercress is also in and also tastes good- adds a bit of a nip to tired flavors, which is nice; wood avens or herb bennet is harvestable year round, and we want the root for the most flavor- tastes good in mince pie or mulled wine, and the leaves are edible too so grab some of those, taking care not to harvest too much from any one plant lest they die… Hairy bittercress, s’like rocket or basil in pesto, has a peppery flavor; grave weed, or ground elder, best eaten before it flowers- so, now- and has a mild lemony parsley flavor, which goes well with fish; and alexanders, because the celery isn’t in yet; mint, the last of the parsley, sage, rosemary, and thyme. (Parsley did save Rosemary in Time). Ah- Parsley for Comfort, Sage for Strength, Rosemary for Love, and Thyme for Courage. A posey of those under your pillow will bring sweet dreams to lovers, or so I’ve heard- herb magic isn’t really my forte. Chopper and Gurry would know better- after all, medicine is poison, and poison is medicine. It all depends on the amount you administer, in the end.

That’s a full gathering basket of herbs, and another- several loads, really, of produce. We have garlic, leeks, arugula, chervil, chichory, cress- the mescluns, not time for peas just yet, not time for potatoes, Norten chard, bok choy, spinach, and kale; carrots, parsnips, pears, apples, cherries, and lots of winter squash. Everything gets gathered- one of me brings in the milk, strains it for straw and things, and sets it in the settling tank, while another of me brings in the eggs and sets to washing them, sorting them, and preparing them for Sanji’s use- mostly, that’s just putting them in the egg-thing, clean and dry and ready to go. And the last one of me brings in the fresh herbs and produce, washes it, and hands it off to Sanji- he uses different things in breakfast and lunch and dinner and supper; breakfast usually sees use of the herbs, while later meals have more prep and so get graced with the
This initial gathering process takes about an hour; three of me are gathering, while three more of me are attending the washing duties that may not have been finished, and another trio are working in the dairy. I usually end each day by checking over our stores of milk, eggs, cheese, and butter, so I know for the next day what to pull out of storage for Sanji. Thus, in the Dairy- at the top of the hour, I bring Sanji the necessary goods to replenish his stocks, which he appreciates, and we usually manage at least one or two exchanges of kisses in the morning while the coffee brews, then it’s right back to work for us- he, to lay out coffee and start prepping for breakfast, me to finish work in the dairy.

I comb the curds, put cheeses in presses, consider what we’re going to do with the whey- we need a pig, honestly- and put the cream into the auto-churn for butter. Franky rigged a churn to a sort of piston and wheel arrangement, and it’s a damn wonder what it is. Praise mechanization. The butter that comes out is nice, honestly- press it into shape, take the buttermilk and the unsalted butter and the salted butter out to Sanji, because he usually feeds us the leftover bread from yesterday and fresh pastries from today, and it’s some arcane management of supplies to make that happen, don’t ask me how he does it… The sweet whey gets saved as juice for switchel, which is fine, but the sour… some of it gets used for breadmaking, sure, but most of it goes on the compost. We need a pig.

Then I salt the new butter which churned in the night, set the milk in it’s settling jars for grading after breakfast- and by then, breakfast service is ready, so I stop work for the full hour and spend time with my crewmates.

“We need a pig.”

“Oh?” said Mark, chewing on a bit of toast.

“Mmhmm. The way we go through butter, and the amount of food-bits Sanji just can’t use- he does amazingly well in not wasting, really he does, but- we need a pig.”

“Hm. Will there be pigs at Fishman Island?” said Mark.

“There should be…? I can’t really think of a reason why there wouldn’t be pigs at Fishman Island, they’re staple animals and really excellent garbage disposals, so… yeah. When we get there, you and Franky can build a sty for the pig, aye?”

“Aye.” said Mark.

“No problem, Mab.” said Franky.

“Mab, I need you to teach me how to wrap a haramaki- I know it’s different for pregnant women than it is just because you want a haramaki, so.” said Nami.

“Sure, after breakfast.”

Breakfast is a large spread of eggs, toast, sliced cold smoked meats, sausages, cheese, green vegetables, and some kind of drink- not just milk, usually melomel, tea, and juice during the warmer parts of the year. After about an hour, maybe there’s bread left? And some of the drinks- depending on what we did yesterday… honestly Sanji knows more about this. Hm.

After breakfast, I finish my work in the Dairy- I need a name for the various ‘one of me’ that do work… hmm… no, best just stick with Dollperganger, Dolls, or Doll, for short. Dollperganger refers to all of my copies at once; Dolls for when I need to be quick about it; Something Doll is a specific, singular one of me; and Doll Something is an attack. So. Using my Doll, I finish working in the Dairy; another Doll goes to the Laundry and checks everything over for repairs, finishes work on repairs that were started yesterday, and considers what else needs to be mended.

After breakfast, it’s usually policy that we all scatter- I gather up the table linens, bus the table, and wash because it’s not a big deal for me to do that, I don’t mind doing it and Sanji does, so- and I’m going to the Studio and Laundry anyway, so, might as well take the rest. Down we go~!

Sort everything, stain treat, and- switch wet clothing to the dryer, spin cycle ran during Breakfast and put in the next new load.

That’s Nami.

“Come in, Nami- there are a multitude of wrapping styles, but if none suit, you can, of course, wear Zoro’s one piece tube style haramaki. I can even make you some like Zoro’s specifically for you- but, I suppose you don’t like them…? Tell me what you need, Nami.”

“I’ve actually been wearing them for a while, now- I just… I feel like I need more support? They’re nice looking, but- not mine.”

“Ah. That’s fine, of course- do you want a style that has knots, or a style that has a sort of buckle?”

“Um… Nothing conductive, so- knots.”

“Alright. Do you want a specific style, or-?”

“Um. Something flattering? Supports my hips and breasts, too-”

“Aha. Alright- so, that’s a matter of size and wrapping style; I think these sarees should be perfect, actually.”

“Eh?”

“Well, firstly- these are all silk, so they retain heat and strength, even after very hard use; secondly, it’s the length I’m after- see, the smallest one is four point five meters, and the longest is eight, and the width varies from sixty centimeters to one hundred twenty-”

“Oh wow, that’s a lot of fabric.”

“Yes. Um- feel them, smell them, I- pick whichever ones make you happy- no, really, they need to feel right, go ahead.”

“Alright.”

I leave Nami to it, and focus very hard on what I’m feeling, right now. I- I know this feeling, it’s a terrible feeling- oh god, what-

It starts at my ankles, like I’m wading through a powerful current. A sudden rush of tiredness, exhaustion- that’s sadness, that’s what it’s like when I feel sad- then, heat, the urge to move, to- fight.
Anger? Dizzy, lost- helpless. A rush of snot down the back of my throat makes me swallow and swallow again against the itch of it.

Just a thought just a thought just a thought. It’s okay it’s okay it’s okay. Nothing nothing nothing to fear.

I’m here.

I’m here.

I’m here.

Take a moment to find the source- Nami is having a baby. Probably more than one, considering how quickly she’s getting bigger. I want that. I want what she has.

What does she have that I don’t?

Pregnancy.

I remember being pregnant, and how awful it was- ah. I want children, to love and care for and raise. I see.

So that’s what it is.

Envy comes in many forms, and can be the kind of dragon that kills the World, if you let it. Your world, I mean.

It’s an emotion you hold in reserve, secreted inside yourself like salamanders under stones in the seep; it’s very rare indeed that a person wants it known to another of their acquaintance or friendship that they are envious of them. I don’t want Nami to know that I feel like this. I don’t ever want to speak badly of my friends, denigrate or deride them- excepting in jest, when I know with certainty that they are in on the joke and laughing just as hard as I am. I can’t be that person, I won’t.

Envy always arises in response to a social comparison or competition- who gets married first, and to whom, and happily or not, and who has children first, how good is your job, where do you live- and it’s totally normal. You compete and compare to measure yourself; self-evaluation is a constant, ever-flowing stream. Envy is triggered when you come up short- that’s why it’s considered one of the ‘ugly’ emotions. In truth, it’s no more or less ugly than any of the other emotions.

It’s painful- being envious of someone, what they have, who they are… it makes you work hard. To neutralize your envy, you have to diminish the source of it, or elevate yourself, or do both. It’s a painful, transformative emotion- and no one really likes to change. Change is agonizing- necessary- but agonizing.

Take a step back, Mab.

Emotions- all emotions- exist to help us, we have them because we need them. Thus, the purpose of envy: as an emotion that enables the survival of the species, envy is related to competition and social comparison between the self and the other that is a part of your self-evaluation. ‘Am I good enough?’ Envy is part of how one must necessarily answer that question.
I’m sitting on my chair, with my face pressed into my hands. Nami is sitting on- oh, footstool, I keep it here so- not important-

“S-sorry. Ah, I’m- I’m having a moment.”

“I can see that. Can you talk to me about it, Mab?”

“I- yes. I think so. No point in hiding it, I don’t think- I want what you have, Nami.”

“...You want to be pregnant?”

“Yeah.”

“...”

“It’s stupid, I know- being pregnant is really awful and uncomfortable and you can’t eat a bunch of your favorite foods and you can’t- can’t fight and-”

“And it’s your Dream, isn’t it.”

“...”

“You said to me, once, a long time ago- something like... something like how a person can have the Dream of a Lifetime, and that’s okay- but there are smaller, easier Dreams, little things that anyone could have if they wanted. You never did say what your small Dreams were, Mab. I think I can guess a few, though.”

“I- I can say. Some of them. I’ll say some of them- no need to guess. I Dreamed of marrying someone who loved me; and I did, I am. Sanji’s- really, he’s wonderful, and I love him, too.”

Nami’s hand is very warm, in mine. I can’t bear to look, and see what she must think of me- the expression in her eyes, I can’t- look-

“I Dreamed of having friends; n-not people who were stuck with me due to some, some quirk of fate and scheduling. I wanted people who picked me and I picked back, people who appreciated my company and skill and- loved me. And the crew does, some more than others but that’s the way of things, I’ve found.”

I’ve closed my eyes again. I- I can’t say it. If she says it, I won’t deny it- but- I can’t say it.

“You want children, more than anything- the Greatest Sewing Professional in the World... you’ll get there if anyone can, I know you will. But... it seems to me, Mab, that Dreams like the one you’ll devote your life to... that kind of Dream needs someone to share it with, otherwise it’s... ”

“Empty.”

I take a deep breath. I let it out slow.

I look up, and see that Nami is crying, too. I reach beside me, open a drawer- it’s full of plain handkerchiefs, dozens of colors. I pull out one, and hand it to Nami, and take another for myself.
“My self-worth is not bound up in- in if I have a baby or not. I know it isn’t, I know that- but oh god, it hurts. I’m- I’m so sorry, Nami.”

“No, no- don’t be! I’m sorry that you feel like this! Gah- I… you and Sanji are so in love, why haven’t you...?”

“We still haven’t really talked about it, honestly.”

“Mab, it’s been three years-”

“Ah. The first year is mostly courting; second year is being together; and the third year we pushed each other- tested limits. That’s how it’s… how it’s supposed to be. Now that we’ve gotten through all that, now is the year we ought to talk about it, as we’ve only kind of talked about it before-”

“Only kind of?”

“A single conversation as we danced together isn’t really...”

“No, I see what you mean.”

“I- ah. I remember, now. Part of this isn’t really my envy- this comes from my mothers, Mom and Aunt Zippy. They wanted babies of their own, but… with how things went, they never really… well, they might have, and it just didn’t work out. I don’t know.”

“...You could ask?”

“Yeah. I think I’ll have to. And, I mean- I know, I remember, being pregnant. I’ve looked after babies and small children before- it’s not fun, or easy, or anything I’d want to be paid to do, have a duty towards doing. But...”

“It’s because I’m doing it of my own free will, and you’ve never gotten that chance.”

“-Yes. That’s it exactly, Nami.”

Nami wipes her face, and squeezes my hand. I squeeze back.

“I have a husband, who loves me, and friends who care about me-”

“.yeah, you do-”

I smile, and squeeze Nami’s hand, and she smiles, and squeezes back.

“I am a master of the spear and needle, and I have skills and talents no one else in the World quite shares. The life I have now; the way I’m living now- I have countless reasons to be grateful and content, as I am. That I strive for more is a reflection of my character, not a reflection of any dissatisfactory element in my World; I want to be better because I want to be better, not because I am bad.
“There is no one that has everything. Comparing my life to another’s is always a losing proposition; I will always come short, I will always miss out. There are always going to be people who appear to be- for better or worse- more than I am. I must remember that one always compares the worst of themselves against the best assumptions one makes about another. The truth is, everyone I will ever meet experiences problems, trials, and weaknesses- just like I do. We are, all of us- of every tribe-human. That is what makes us human.

“Life is not a competition to be won; what I gain in life cannot be taken with me in death, except in the immaterial. Nami?”

“Yes, Mab?”

“I am so, so happy for you, and Zoro. I am so happy you’re going to have children.”

“Thank you, Mab.”

We only remember living the once. Do it right, and that once is enough.

“Ah. I still- it still hurts, but like… like a dagger in my side has been pulled free, and the mess around it cleared away. It’s not a grinding sort of pain, but the pain of a muscle stretching out a cramp, now. But for my feelings.”

“Ah. I know exactly what you mean. Arlong.”

“Arlong?”

“Arlong.”

“Hmm. So- before I crumbled like a wet graham cracker, did you manage to pick out anything you liked?”

“Heh- yeah. The orange ones.”

“The… blue and the aqua?”

“Mm.”

“Alright. Let me just- these, right?”

“Yeah.”

“Okay. I’ve got several like this- or was it the texture you liked?”

“Texture.”

“Hmmm… try this. I want you to start out with three- one to wear, one to wash, one to let rest. If you find you need more, we’ll pull more for you- not that one?”

“Nope.”

“Try this one- really, you wear these however makes you feel best. Before birth, they help keep your pudge supported- that one?”
“This one.”
“The teal, then. Alright. So- you wanted support for your breasts and hips, aye?”

“I mean, maybe?”

“I’ll teach you a few styles of wrapping, then. First, though- best double check each saree has a marker for where the middle of the rail is on the wrong side...”

“Um...?”

“Okay, so- the edge of the fabric, when you’re using it as a wrap or just describing it, is called a rail. The long side, I mean- the long side is the rail. The wrong side is the underside- see how the colors are much more intense, on this side?”

“Oh, okay.”

“Right. The teal has a label, but the other two don’t- just a second- d’you want “Made With Love By Mab” or “Mab Is Keeping You In Stitches”, or... oh, hey, I’ve got little kittens and ducklings in here, too-”

“Heh. ‘Made With Love By Mab’ is fine, Mab.”

“Alright- won’t take a moment, these are just a few quick stitches- so, familiarize yourself with the teal saree while you wait. Flick it around, really feel it up, wrap it around yourself-”

“Um. Okay...?”

And, while I sew on the label to the blue saree, Nami plays around with the teal-rail saree.

“Huh. I see why you had me do that- this has more uses than just as a belly wrap, doesn’t it.”

“It’s about seven meters of one hundred twenty centimeter wide silk, Nami; it absolutely has more than one use. Ah, done; first things first Nami- the label, on your saree-wrap, is always going to be in the middle of the top rail. Straighten out your fabric, and find the label for me.”

“Okay... got it.”

“So. The size of all three Saree is about the same, and these in particular are very long and wide, so you can wrap from your hips all the way up to your breasts and around the pudge all through your pregnancy and beyond without much trouble. Do you want to see me wrap first, then have me talk you through it, or...?”

“Show me.”

“Okay- like this...”

I stand, and quietly wrap myself- not as quickly as I can, but not slowly, either. Adjust for the wings, make sure all my folds are nice- done.
Nami hums.

“So- firstly, I sort of like that style, but…”

“Not on you?”

“Yeah.”

“I can just go through until there’s one that really jumps out at you.”

“Um- Yeah, do that.”

“Alright.”

And so, for the next forty five minutes, I show Nami a plethora of belly wrapping techniques.

“Alright. So- I like the ones that are very flat.”

“Honestly, I do too- when I was pregnant, the flattest wraps were the most versatile; do it at the start of the day, and just wear it until you have to bathe again.”

“Mm. The one with the ring-slings was also very nice- I like the simple ones best, it seems.”

“That’s fine. So- sling rings, I know I have some… aha, here we are. D’you want wood, bone, or metal?”

“Wood, please.”

“Here- those are rated for teething, just so you know.”

“Cool! -They fit over my hands nicely too…”

“Yeah, that’s a good set. Anyway- these saree are long for a normal ring sling arrangement, but the theory is still sound; and, since the first two layers are doing the major holding, the rest are supporting layers. Or other things.”

“Mm. Rings go in the middle, right?”

“Yup.”

“Okay- oh, that already feels good, holy crap-”

“Yeah, I remember that too; don’t forget your tails, now.”

“Ah, right. Well- put this between my legs- this one I’ll match the rails up and fold around for back support- oh god yes- tight, tight and flat-”

“Shall I leave you to it, then?”

“Um- yeah, yeah.”
“Okay. If you forget your sarees here, I’ll have them to you with the next batch of laundry. Cool?”

“Super cool.”

“If you need a refresher on how to tie your belly wraps, just ask, okay?”

“Okay- and done! Secret pockets, back support, warmth for the pudge, and stylish to boot! This feels so good - ah, thank you so much Mab!”

“You’re welcome, Nami!”

And then we hug. Nami’s belly is very round and firm against my own; not hard, but firm. There’s an egg, in there; soft shelled, but definitely there. I’m- hmm?!

“You felt that too?”

“Yep.”

“Ah, damn- Zoro wanted to be the one who...”

“I won’t tell him if you don’t. Besides, unless you start taking naps with him on the deck-”

“-M’gona have to do a hard pass on that-”

“-Yeah. Do they get jumpy before or after meals?”

“Um, usually after; right about now, actua-ah! Wow, okay, calm down. Oof.”

“Yep. If you simply must let him feel the little thumpies, have a honey-ginger fountain soda and let Zoro feel you up. The beansprout will have a hell of a dance party, but... that should do it. Or about an hour after your next meal; either way.”

“Um. Maybe next week? I mean. They’ll be way bigger, then.”

“True.”

“...Mab?”

“Hm?”

“...Thank you for being my midwife. I mean- I know you trained Taffy, and all, but... thank you. Thank you for being my friend.”

“Thank you, Nami.”

“For what?”

“For letting me.”

And she’s crying again. Pregnancy hormones will do that to a person- c’mere, it’s okay, it’s okay.
Eventually, Nami goes to have a nap and I continue my work in the studio.

Because of the time of year and what we do- we are pirates, but we’re sailors, too, and it’s best not to forget that- it’s about the right time for all our boots and leather to be polished and waterproofed.

Let’s see- the simple recipe will do fine for the brown and pale leather, but we need other colors too; henna and beetroot will get the red color Mark will need, and the black is two large oak galls, vinegar, and rust- that’s Zoro, Sanji, and Taffy.

I set the dyes to boil and thicken several days ago, intensifying the color and allowing for the drying process- don’t want water in the conditioner. Then, when it was a wet paste, I spread them on wax paper and left them to dry out. All that’s left now is to powder them, and since I’ve been planning to make leather conditioner and waterproof for days, that’s a fairly simple job, just tedious; after about an hour, hour and a half, the dyes are ready to go- I just need to reconstitute them in the polish oils.

Laundry Doll puts two hundred milliliters of coconut oil, the red dye powder, and fifty grams of beeswax into one of the Laundry’s clean double boilers, then sets the whole thing to bubble together- adds about ten drops of rose oil when everything’s been melted together. She does the same for the black dye powder, and the same again but with no dye powder at all; then, when it’s all melted together, she pours each mixture into it’s own jar, sets the jars by a fan to cool, and goes on to the next bit.

Sort out the mending into fairly distinct batches; do this now, do that later, do this before washing, do that after washing; set the first load of actual washing in the washing machine, set other things to soak, retire one or two items people may keep trying to sneak back out of the rag pile but I’ve a plan for that nonsense- I’ll announce it at lunch- and, yes, the sacks that held flour and other foodstuffs are clean, now. So.

Rag rugs, mending, and knitting are the order of the day, along with some sketching for what all I’m going to make for Imbolc, various bits of new gear, and my watch’s entertainment. I think- probably something very portable. Hm. Rag rugs, probably.

Let’s see- on the list of mending, pillows, sheets, shirts, a few pairs of pants, socks, and a pair of opera gloves…? Mine is not to question why, I know this, but- Opera Gloves, really?

So- Mending Doll takes the big laundry basket of mending, a small kit-box of mending tools- needles, thread, scissors, another basket for scraps or if there’s just no saving it- and goes to sit out in the bright sunlight. Or she would, if there were sunlight; this time, she goes to sit on the couch.

I take my sketchbook, my pens and pencils, ink and brushes and colored inks too- and sit at the Galley table, which is clean, now. Dairy Doll has finished her work- she’s brought Sanji the cheeses that were ready, salted the butter that Sanji didn’t need for baking, cleaned everything, and washed the floor to maintain temperature. Gardening Doll is planting peas, shallots, and other things it’s the appropriate time to plant.

Over the separation, I figured out the layout of my Dolls; the strongest ones are the Golden Memories, who are the first tiny fairy dolls I made, adorned with some kind of gold- paint of gold, gold leaf, something. They are the strongest of my Dollpergangers, and are identical to me in every way, except for the gold khol around the eyes. I use them in battle, mainly- although, Sanji does have a fetish for hareem situations, so- I mean. I can be in several physical places at once, and split my full attention far more than that; thus, if my husband wants to have some fun with all of me, okay. I can do that.

Silver Screens are little pewter fairy charms I electroplated with sterling silver. They are next strongest of my Dolls, and are more… faded, than I am. It’s hard to explain from the inside, but- each Silver Screen Doll has about half the strength of the Gold, and each Gold has half the strength of myself, the origin. Thus, as I go further on the Line, even my least interesting copies become more than strong enough to deal with the majority of foes. Dairy Doll is a Silver Screen. So is Laundry Doll. Mending Doll is actually a Bronze Bitch; Bronze Bitch Dolls are meant for drudgery or very simple tasks indeed- dishwashing, spinning, laundry folding… things I need to do but it doesn’t have to be my physical body doing them, you see. Beating the filth and stains out of clothing. Mending clothing on the couch.

There are also the Paper Dolls, but those are very specifically disposable, so… if I’m about to get hit with something I know I can’t take, I’ll switch with a Paper Doll. I have thousands of them- literally just bits of paper in a more or less ‘Fae’ shape. They only need to last half a second, is the thing, so… Hmm.

Oh, and while I’ve been thinking of this, I’ve also sketched out several interesting things. Mending Doll has done her job, declared two of the sheets unsalvageable, and begun to cut the flannel sheets into one by two inch strips of cloth. Rag rug rug rug rug- I’ll have to dye the rag to suit, and both pre and post stitch the rag, for ease of use. I’ll stitch each article’s worth of rag into one unbroken strip of rag, trim it up and so on; the leavings and bits make good pile for re-stuffing pillows. Then, it’s a wash, a jump in the dye pots for most of the rest of the day, and I’ve got second watch today so- that’s what I’ll be doing with my hands so I don’t fall asleep and zone out.

Let me see; I started the day in the working overalls that get washed with soap once a week and hosed off every day after I’m done doing messy work. It’s not quite time to move up to the summer weight versions, but- soon. Soon. Oh, yeah, and the undershirt - which gets rinsed and dried after each use, and then washed at the end of the week before the funk sets in. Of course, it’s healthiest to just… not wear underwear for heavy exertion, but I have a standing quickie with Sanji every afternoon, usually right after sparring, so… Anyway, after the second shower I put on a pair of underwear, which stays on until the third rinse of the day.

I don’t actually soak in the tub but once a week or so; .

After Gardening Doll finished her work, I Put My Dolls Away and had a quick shower, more of a rinse, really; then, I put on my actual clothing for the day. Today, I’m wearing a pair of taupe Toms shoes- really, they’re a warm-toned grey color, but it’s marketed as taupe; and a pair of socks meant for wearing with flats like this, covers the bottom, the heel, and the toes of my foot, in cooler grey for a little contrast. Greased my legs during the shower, and then my jumpsuit; today’s is a slightly wintery-spring stripe print halter top. Wide leg, tight waist, and pockets.

Oh, yeah- and in deference to the weather, a style of sweater I’ve always liked, with the simple lace around the back. It’s thin, mostly there for another layer to trap air with; it doesn’t actually do much to keep me warm, per say, it’s just… very, very comfortable. Really, my hands and wrists are kept warm with fingerless gloves. They’re knitted, with decorative buttons below my wrist in a column.

Urgh- hair’s in the way. Bleh. Part of me wants to cut it shorter than before; but… honestly, it seems to want to be long? So, while it’s still pretty short, I’ve been putting it up in sideways french twists. They’re kinda messy- I guess, if it grows out another inch or so, I’ll start doing the classic version.
Anyway, it’s time for a tea break; I pull on a heavy piano shawl, which serves to keep me warm on the quick dash from this area of the ship up to the galley; I have to go in from the out of doors at some point, and it is cold on the lawn deck.

Oh, and best to carry up all the sacking for the rag rugs so I can measure things out before hand… I like using sacking for backing (rhyme time~!) because it adds another point of stability to the rug, and helps keep it from curling more than it should. I roll up the sacking, and tie it with twine; then, it’s off to tea~!

Ah, best take this sewing basket- it’s a Prop really, I just- I like having mnemonic devices standing by. My memory is… not terribly good, honestly.

The everyday afternoon tea service is familiar to everyone; there is no real difference between Blues in its content, whether that be the more savory fare preferred in Nort and Wes, or the sweets preferred Est and Sout. Along the Line, Tea is the prefered name for the afternoon snack period between when a child gets out of compulsory education and enjoys their dinner, or between luncheon and supper. (Midmorning is called elevensies; most of the men on the crew take elevensies, but not all of them. For elevensies, I usually put out a fruit basket or something like that; with Chopper’s approval.)

There is honestly no difference in content of the tea-time service, whether in a tiny farmhouse in the country, the handbox house of the newest bride, or in the drawing-room of my lovely wife; excepting perhaps that in the small houses, the tea tray would be brought in by one of the ladies of the house, usually an elder daughter. In the larger houses, this would be the job of the butler with one or two footmen in his wake.

In either case, a table is required. A tea-table is usually of the drop-leaf variety because it is more easily moved than a solid one; however, in areas where floor space is at a premium, like on a ship, a solid table is fine. There are really no “correct” dimensions for a tea-table; however, it is assumed that a tea is a small party, no more than eight or so barring formal occasions.

A cloth must always be first placed on the table, before putting down the tray. The tea cloth may be a half a meter, a meter, or a meter and a half square. Our tea cloth is a combination of machine made lace and burlap; Mab, my beloved wife, says that with our crew, for anything less than ceremonial articles which live in their own boxes when not in use, something easy to replace and hard to wear out is best. Honestly, I agree; there’s a reason all of our dishes are either wooden or metal. Excepting for a very, very few things- wood. Or metal. The tea cloths burlap covers the entire Galley table, and the lace hangs down about a quarter of a meter from the edge of the table.

It’s nice.

On the tea cloth is put a tray big enough to hold everything except the plates of food- or, if space is a concern, all the tea articles. The tray may be a massive silver one that requires a strong pair of arms to lift it, or it may be tin; in our case, it’s stainless steel, which cleans well and is fairly sturdy. Our actual set consists of the tray, a sugar bowl, a milk or cream pitcher, and a pair of teapots. Our strainer is plated with sterling silver and has it’s own stand; our slop bowl came from a thrift shop and is definitely a copper Wano-style kensui, which is a little weird. Our kettle is from Skypiea, one of those fill and flick models that works with an internal heating element. Our tea caddy is actually a set of tins full of different teas. The tins are from the general supply- Chopper keeps drugs in the ones in the Infirmary, I keep spices and spice mixes in them in the kitchen, as well as dried herbs; they are deadly useful. Our lemon dish is glass, but it’s properly a Great Low Tide cake serving dish. The handle is nice, though; makes it very easy to pass around the table. Ah, and when I serve layer cake, the stand I use is a minimal pedestal that Franky made in a bit less than half an hour with a lathe and some food-safe finishing varnish.

In more formal settings, on the tray should be: a kettle which ought to be already boiling, with a spirit lamp or sterno lamp underneath it; an empty teapot, or two, depending on the preferences of the party; a caddy of tea; a tea strainer and slop bowl; a cream pitcher and sugar bowl; and, on a glass dish, lemon in slices. If lemon is not available, lime or fingerlime are also appropriate. A number of cups and saucers- exceeding the number of tea partiers by no more than two apiece- and a stack of tea plates, all to match, with a napkin approximately twelve inches or thirty centimeters square, hem-stitched or edged to match the tea cloth, which my pchelka did in about an afternoon’s work. Apparently getting matching lace was the hard part, not the actual stitching.

Anyway.

A pile of cups and saucers, and a stack of little tea plates, all to match, with a napkin folded on each of the plates like the filling of a layer cake, complete the paraphernalia of the tea-service. Our cups, saucers, and tea plates all match in that they are made of approximately the same quality of porcelain. Otherwise, nope. Mix and match tea service.

Each plate is lifted off the stack with its own napkin. Further, on the tea-table itself is the ‘curate’; a stand made of three small shelves, each just big enough for one good-sized plate. On these plates are always two, usually three, varieties of small snack; be it dumpling, fruit, candy, cake, or hot bread. Our curate is of the folding variety, and holds the large plates quite well. The top dish on the curate should be a covered one, and holds hot bread of some sort.

We alternate between anpan and pao de queijo as our hot breads. When I serve the cheese bread for tea, Luffy’s about two-thirds more likely to show up. I mean, they are a Goa specialty, so… Nostalgic taste? The hot breads get made about half an hour before tea, which… Okay. Mab runs like clockwork; if this, then that. Her schedule is very nearly iron-clad, with very little variation due to season or place. Tea time for Mab is, during the warm parts of the year, late in the afternoon- around four, with dinner at six, seven, or eight, depending on the watch schedule; during the cool parts of the year, it’s closer to two, with dinner again at six, seven, or eight. Mab is also usually the hostess of tea; she takes tea because I think she just likes spending time with me? And she’s trying to not overwork herself, I worry about that…

Anyway; after Mab comes Bryony, either fresh from her daily “nap” or about to go down for it. Tea is the last meal of Bryony’s day, and Dinner is the first; she gets through the night with an assortment of teas and juices I prepare for her during the day. Taffy and Gurry aren’t quite attached at the hip; but, with Taffy now working as our acting Navigator, she’s often in a position to bring Gurry in for mealtimes. Gurry, if we let him, will completely ignore that he’s hungry in favor of his art- tunnel vision like that isn’t uncommon on our crew, but… well, it’s a good thing we’ve got people who don’t focus like that too. Robin usually appears sometime after Taffy and Gurry; she prefers coffee, but that’s why we have two teapots, really. The tea is a seasonal variety, and the other pot is for coffee. Brook always shows up right about when the curate comes out, which is fashionably late, and has been for centuries. If Luffy, or any of the others, are to appear at tea, this is usually when it happens. And, of course, I take my second rest of the day here; I need three breaks through the day, and the first comes in the morning. The second one, the middle of the day- my day, here, when I’ve prepared everything I can in advance, and now everything is cooking and only needs an occasional check. Bread has to proof and rise; pottage has to boil; and so on. After tea, I take a nap with Mab, train, and have shower sex with her. S’nice.

The two lower dishes of the curate may be covered or not, according to whether the additional food is hot or cold; the second dish usually holds sandwiches, and the third cake. In my opinion, this ought to be predicated on the contents of the covered dish: if your hot bread is sweet, your second and third dishes ought to be savory, and if your hot bread is savory, your second and third dishes ought to be sweet. The sweetest food on the curate should always be the cake; I don’t agree with the idea of a whole curate full of sweets, not at an everyday tea. For a birthday, perhaps- but not everyday. I’ll ask Gurry if he wants his birthday like that; he might, he might just want a cake and that’s it.

I honestly prefer a simpler diet- as does my crew; we have bread and butter, tea cakes, and plain hard cookies or digestive biscuits. Bread is usually soda bread, and butter is the salted variety; tea cakes can be anything between sweet buns with dried fruit in them, small cupcakes or muffins, or even sliced sponge cake. Depends on the day, and my mood, really. Usually ginger snaps and biscotti, honestly- as far as cookies go, I mean. Fikabröds, really, which Robin and I appreciate- I actually don’t like tea all that much, it’s too… grassy. Sometimes there’s marmalade, or jam, or honey for the bread; buttered toast, muffins, and so on. Some people will pile the curate until it literally staggers under the weight of pastries, cream cakes, and sandwiches of pâté de foie gras or mayonnaise. I do not.

All of this necessitates butter knives, a dish for the butter, and a dish for jam; forks need not apply, and spoons should only be for the stirring of tea or coffee, if present at all.

Selection of tea service foods is entirely up to my whim, and what I’m willing to do. I, personally, prefer to ignore the various food-fads that sweep the international waters; currently, the fad is for bacon and toast sandwiches, fresh hot gingerbread, and scones. I say fuck that bullshit, all of those things need to be cooked hot that very day, I’ve got better things to do- and the fad’s change every two months or so. You start chasing fads, you end up with malnourishment; the Old Man said it, and I agree.

Sandwiches for tea service are made by buttering the end of the loaf- or mayonaising it, or what have you- spreading on the filling, and then cutting off the prepared slice as thin as possible. If I’m serving sandwiches, I’m serving Norten Gravlax on rye, or some other open-faced sandwich, because I simply cannot be bothered with all the frippery of a tea sandwich every day. Special occasions- weddings, funerals, birthdays, initiations- those, I’ll break out the fancy sandwiches for. Otherwise, no.

Oh, yes- and there are some days when it’s only Mab who sits with me for tea. It’s funny- she actually really likes traditional Farnorten foods, with a bit of Nearnorten for variety. She grew up with traditional Skuan foods, with a bit of Old Esten for variety; but she likes the food I grew up with, and I like the foods she grew up with. We really are a love-match, it’s the damndest thing. Neither of us really cares for more than one or two light snacks at tea; it’s to get us through to dinner, not… Ah, but if it’s a small party- most often consisting of Mab, Bryony, Taffy, Gurry, Robin, Brook, and myself, I do the whole service.

On a very few occasions, the entire crew has appeared for tea service- usually when we’re in harbor, or it’s someone’s birthday, or it’s a holiday. Then, I serve two plates of hot food; the aformentioned anpan or pao de queijo, and an additional something- usually, I just serve both of them and call it a day. There are two plates of the cookies or fancy cakes; and on the very special occasions, mostly the High Holidays and the younger member’s birthdays, a layer cake. During the hottest weather, in place of one of the hot dishes, I serve a pâté or lettuce sandwiches, and there’s a choice of hot or iced tea, or hot or iced coffee. Rarely anything else, though.

Tea is a meal of intimate conversation- not that the other meals aren’t intimate, but the entire purpose of tea service is, aside from providing a snack and break time between luncheon and dinner, to provide a forum for the airing of intimate conversation. Thus, unless one is joining the tea service, one may only enter for a small snack- if Luffy wants some pao de queijo to eat, he can have a whole plate- but he cannot eat it in the galley with the rest of us unless he’s sitting for tea, too. Bryony made that rule. When the tray and curate are brought in, everyone takes their plate and napkin. The hostess, Mab, makes the tea and pours it. Then, those who want tea pass her their cups and saucers in an orderly fashion, which she then fills and returns. Brook, being the gentleman present who isn’t a butterfingers like Gurry is with everything except poison and paint, or the cook- me- passes the curate, afterward returning it to where it belongs and resuming his seat.

Since I almost never serve cake, especially not very soft and sticky or cream filled cake, I almost never lay out small forks. However, Chopper loves those things, and for his birthday, I do- so then, I do. Otherwise, almost never. And as I said before: if jam is to be eaten, or butter spread, there must be little butter knives to use. Each member of the party, in taking their plate, helps themselves to toast and jam, and a knife, too. Then, in the fullness of time, they take their turn with the butter.

Finally, and most importantly- the atmosphere of hospitality. It’s something intangible, and yet nothing about any kind of service- especially food service- is more felt or missed. There are certain houses- and eventually, restaurants- which simply radiate warmth, akin to an open wood fire. And there are others that suggest an express arrival of the coldest depths of winter. The size of the fire, and the fineness of the dishes and the napkins, the expense of the tablecloth and the tea- the rarity and preparation of the food does not define the measure of hospitality present.

Some people, like Mab and myself, (and Luffy, if we’re being honest), have the gift of hospitality. They have the skill and the natural talent to make anyone feel welcome, comforted, cozy; Mab’s gets a little overbearing at times, but it’s always clear that she genuinely wants you to be at ease, to have what you need, and so can be forgiven. It’s also very important to note that Mab’s hospitality is in her area of expertise- that is, in the use of fabrics.

Mab tells me my hospitality can be a little grim or brusque, but- as my sincerity is as strong as hers- those with thicker skin tend to enjoy it. No one complains about my food, and meals are always lively; and most of everything always gets eaten, and what doesn’t get eaten is what I already know won’t get all the way eaten.

(And at least we’re not Luffy. Luffy’s hospitality is the kind that makes you follow a dumb kid in a straw hat to the End of the World and beyond.)

Others, whose intentions are just as kind and whose houses and so on are perfection in luxury, petrify every approach. Such people appearing at a party color the entire scene with the blue haze of their austerity. Ichiji is like that, and Niji too, actually- he’s not a master, but a slave, of etiquette. People like that, their chiefest concern is whether ‘this is correct’, or ‘that is properly done’, or ‘this and that persons are such a one as they care to know’. Always asking themselves, a little anxiously, “Have I failed today, or have I not?”

The answer, more often than not, is “Yes, I have failed. And tomorrow, I shall get up, and try again.” That is courage too, y’see; doesn’t have to be big, and loud. Courage, boldness, chivalry- they don’t have to be big, and loud. Courage is not just doing things that scare you; courage is strength in the face of pain, failure, and grief. Boldness isn’t just taking the risk that the cliff you jump onto will hold your weight; it’s flirting with a girl, stealing a kiss or two under the eaves of the old oak tree, and dancing the twilight hours away. Chivalry is not just being a courteous man, but a good man, a virtuous man. There are seven virtues on which the whole of the World agrees a person ought to have; Joy, Honesty, Loyalty, Generosity, Kindness, Friendship, and Hope. (Joy is sometimes translated as Contentment, or Peace- really, it’s the kind of restful happiness of knowing your life is worth the struggle, and enjoying the company of yourself, your family, and your friends.)

People who are fearful of others, and fearful of themselves, are never successfully popular hosts or hostesses. If one is really and truly afraid of knowing someone who might one day prove to be unpleasant company; if you are such a snob that you can’t stand even the slightest deviation from ‘propriety’; if you cannot bear to go to where people don’t mind seeing you cry, because they cry too- then perhaps one should no longer make the effort ofbothering with people at all. If all of that is far, far too much for one to handle, it might be best to shut the door tight and blind the windows; sit before a mirror in your own drawing room or kitchen, and have tea for two.

Of course, that’s none of my business, what one does- what my business is what we do, in this crew, with our food.

“Mmm, this is good- we’re on the spring mix, now?” I said.

“It’s about the right time of year for it, yeah. Ah, Gurry-” said Sanji.

“-and that’s why it doesn’t matter if you’re making terrible art, you’re still- Oh, yeah Sanji?” said Gurry, turning away from Robin.

“Do you want cake for your birthday? It’s coming up soon- the twenty-eighth of January, right?” said Sanji.

“Oh- oh! Yeah, um- we celebrate birthdays in the crew?” said Gurry.

“Captain’s orders; we sure do. It can be as small as something like a cake at tea, or we can have a full on party for it- Usopp, Franky, Brook, and Luffy like parties. Also, we give gifts.” said Sanji.

“Um.” said Gurry.

“You get more gifts if you’re younger- Chopper usually gets the most gifts, actually, although I suppose Nami and Zoro’s kid’s gonna get the most for a while…” hums Sanji.

“Ah. I actually like fruit tarts the most, so… um, but with that face- uh, th-those cookies with the, uh, the thumb-print in them? And the jam? I like those best, too. Um- raspberry caves?” said Gurry.

“Calm it down, Sanji. You’ve got that tendon jumping at your throat- d’you need a cool hand on a hot head, or nay?” I said.

“Aye- sorry, woo, cold- sorry, Gurry. I didn’t mean to scare you like that; I just really hate not being able to make a food someone wants, and we just don’t have any fresh fruit that will be palatable in a tart right now- plenty of vegetables, and I suppose there might be flowers soon, but neither of those are fruit. I mean, I can make lemon meringue tarts, but…” said Sanji, wincing. He’s really gotten much nicer- and Gurry… was not treated kindly. I won’t say what I think he was until he says it himself, but yelling at Gurry is the fastest way to get his capitulation.

It’s also the cruelest- sends him shivering for hours and hours. Nami was very upset for days after that one time, and it took a while for her to realize that yes, that was her that did that- and no, that wasn’t her at all. Then I got to explain that anyone can be abused, or harmed- and it doesn’t matter, the genders involved, or the ages. People can hurt people, no matter the circumstances.

“I like those too, um- but, uh…” said Gurry.

“Raspberry caves, lemon meringue tarts, and… what kind of hot bread do you want? Or pastry, I do pastries for birthdays…” said Sanji, a little grumpy but quite nice, really.

“Uh. Well… strudel, knishes, chouquette, savory galette, taiyaki, chorley cake, homity pie… I used to have a lot of free time and an empty house, and uh. I baked. A lot.” said Gurry, musingly.

My eyebrows went up as Sanji’s furrowed. No sigh, though- that’d be if he was genuinely not looking forward to the work… I gently run the fingers of my free hand through the hair at the nape of Sanji’s neck, right where his dorsal ridge fur begins; little scritches help him relax. Calm down, love.

“Raspberry caves, lemon meringue tarts, and knishes- sweet with breakfast, and savory for tea. It’ll be a knish day. Okay- yeah, that’s… yeah. That’s your menu for your birthday, Gurry.” said Sanji, nodding to himself.

“Um. Thank you, Sanji.” said Gurry.

“Ah- of course.” said Sanji.

“At least it’s not like you and Franky; your birthdays are literally a day apart, and considering the kinds of things he likes… Ah, and you always get so huffy when I do the baking on your birthday-” I said.

“-because I know you don’t like baking, Mab-” said Sanji.

“-yes, but you hate making filo dough, and I don’t, so. There’s that.” I said.

Sanji puffs up like a frog, which is cute as hell, so I have to turn his head just a little and kiss him firm on the mouth. Mmm. Mouth. He smiles and kisses me back and relaxes a hell of a lot- bleh, smoke breath, he always smokes during tea, bleeeee-

“Sorry. I’m working on it.” said Sanji.

“I know; you’re doing great, really-” I said.

“-I’m sorry, there’s an entire museum of Bad Art? Did I hear that correctly?” said Robin.
“MOBA- yeah, the Museum of Bad Art. They’ve got branches all over the World, and the one at Amazon Lily’s really nice. Right between the sewage plant and the pig farms-” said Gurry.

“Oh my god-”

“For the ambiance, y’know?”

“Hnng-”

“The best piece at MOBA: AL, is, hands down, ‘A L’INTERIEUR DE L’OEUF (INSIDE THE EGG); I have the poster version with me, hang on-’”

“...You carry posters of-?”

“Of course! It’s inspirational, and I have more than just- this-”

“Wha- Pffd- DERESHISHISHISHI! DERESHISHISHISHISHISHI-! Wha-ha-hat the hee-hee-hell is tha-ha-ha-hat-shishishi?”

“That, my friend, is the power of a Really Awful Piece of Art-

“I’ve tried for some time now to get into your style of singing, and I’m sorry Bryony- I just can’t stand it. I’ve tried to get into your style; to dance to your beat. I believe it’s something I should enjoy; I certainly enjoy the rest of your work. I love the way you mix the electronic and acoustic instrumentals in your music- and there are certain songs of yours that, regardless of your singing on them, I love quite fiercely for their exquisite symphonic layering. Frankly speaking, of your work, I think it’s the pure instrumentations I’ve enjoyed the most- what I can’t seem to enjoy is your preferred way of singing.”

“Well… I mean, for one, you don’t have to like everything I do, Brook. Um, there’s also this new single I’ve been working on, it’s really stripped down-”

“I know, I’ve heard you working on it- and it’s marvelous, Bryony. But it’s… it’s also very clear to me, at least, that you’re just playing around; that’s not who you are, and it’s not how you want to sing. How you sing when it’s just for yourself… Bryony, it’s a very dominating element in almost all of your work, and I just can’t get past it. It’s very puzzling for me, because I’ve seen your name floating around in the music-zines, and- darling, they love you, just as much as they love me. From very different directions, but the both of us are beloved.”

“...Honestly, I wish they’d stop comparing me to Jackie Flashday; I can sing like her, of course, but my voice… now that I know more of who I am, I know that I don’t swing, not at all.”

“Indeed; although you can comport yourself in the swinging manner, that’s not who you are. Thus, making that kind of comparison between yourself and the Lovely Lady Day is laughable. You’re certainly contemporaries; and you are called Sweet Lady Bry, but… you’re not the same at all.”

“Yeah- comparing us, I’m immediately struck by the thought that… if someone had never heard my work, and came to listen to me because they thought I was like Lady Day…”

“...Well, you do have a very different sense of rhythm. You take far more from the operatic tradition than you ever have from Pop, Jazz, R&B, or even Soul; I honestly like the pure drama you can put into your voice. Not everyone has that skill.”
“And— it’s not that I don’t have an ear for melodies, and how to phrase them in a naturally pleasing way, I just find it… boring. I like asymmetry, and I like being… not normal. Is that weird, d’you think?”

“No, not at all- and it’s not like your asymmetry and oddity are accidental. When I go to break down what your music is actually doing on a mechanical level, there’s very little indeed that’s purely accidental. Considering how beautiful your music is, even when I don’t like it… I find myself listening again and again, simply because a particular intonation of your voice, or a specific turn of phrase when taken in it’s context is just… so intriguing.”

“...I guess… I guess when I heard you make music for the first time, I became very envious? Because, well, you’re an amazing musician, Brook, and at that time… I really wasn’t.”

“Bryony...”

“I can admit it- I had no idea what I was doing, I just… I cherry picked bits and pieces of songs I liked and stuck them together without much rhyme or reason, and called that music. It wasn’t until I sat in on you composing that night- remember-?”

“I remember you were crying at the end, and you wouldn’t say why, yes-”

“-Ah. Well… I realized, then, that I would never be able to stand beside you as an equally strong artist if I continued doing what I did. What I was doing was just… collage. You might have been doing that too, then, but from the outside… I guess all art at some point can be broken down to collage, or just starts there, but… I was collaging and that’s it, I didn’t take it further, I didn’t try to make it my own.”

“Aha. So there is something about your music I’ve missed- stop me if I’m wrong, but… when you heard me composing, and there was some arranging in there too- when you heard that, watched my process, you became inspired to do the same, somehow. But also, you realized that you’d never be able to do what I did, hmm?”

“Well- Brook, you’re an amazing musician, the Soul King; and I’m… not. That’s not a bad thing- but… a purpleheart is a beautiful tree, and so is a koa, but the qualities of their wood are not at all the same. Different doesn’t mean bad; it means not the same. My specialty isn’t music that comforts the soul- and that’s okay. I think my real specialty is making experimental dance music; or at the very least, songs you can move to. Or that move you to places you’ve never been before, not consciously.”

“I suppose it’s also a product of where we are in life; I want nothing more than to comfort, and be comforted, to know that I’m not alone. And you, quite frankly, wouldn’t know the joy of stillness if it did an injury to your person.”

“It’s blunt, but true.”

“I really do want to like your music, Bryony- all of it, not just part of it.”

“...we could collaborate?”

“Oh?”

“Well-”
And tea continued more or less as it always does until Sanji had to take the bread loaves out of the oven and check the pottage for lunch. We’d polished off the tea snacks, and as a natural extension of service, we helped him set the table for luncheon and- with a whirling I’ve gotten used to- resettled to enjoy lunch. After the first violent crush of devouring food, led as always by Luffy, the second wave opens up for a more relaxed, conversational tone.

“Neh, Mab- what’s with all th’flour sacks?” said Luffy.

“...Maybe swallow next time, before asking me a question, Luffy?”

“Eh-? Oh, sorry.” said Luffy, gulping down way more food than should fit down his throat don’t think about it don’t think about it-

“The sacking is for rag rugs.” I said.

“Ooh!” said Nami.

“Yeah, cold floors can fuck right off.” I said.

“Here, here.” said Robin, holding her mug of switchel high before drinking deep of it.

“Oh! Cool! Are you gonna put th’grippy things on the bottoms so we don’t slide ‘em around when we step on ‘em?” said Luffy.

“Now that you’ve said that, yes, absolutely.” I said.

“Woo!” said Luffy.

“Ah- can you make Taffy a jacket or a coat or something? She keeps not wearing anything except legwarmers and armwarmers and a scarf, and that’s just not enough...” said Gurry.

“I wear a hat too, Gurry! And you’re one to talk with your shivering and huddling near warm walls-” yips Taffy.

“Still not enough, Taffy! And I am adapting , okay-” chirrups Gurry.

“I’ll put it on my list; be glad I hadn’t done much for sketching today, I’ve been needing a new project or two- and since I’m making lovely new clothing, does anyone else want anything?” I said.

“I’d like a shawl, actually- the feathery angora ones are nice, but I want something... I dunno, lace? Silk? Lighter, I mean to say. Good in and out of the water, and slippery, too.” said Mark.

“The fluffy feathery yis good, but- I get too hot too quickly, so I don’t like wearing any of them, not even the shrug or the shawl.” said Taffy.

“Um. I like flowers.” said Gurry.

I nodded.

“We’re going to end up on another winter island eventually; I need some kind of jumper or jacket or tunic that closes completely over my body, and it doesn’t matter if I’m wearing my compressor or not, it still needs to fit- the jackets we have now are okay, but... I want a custom jacket, if that’s alright? And um. I guess I need boots, too...” said Bryony, cringing at the look I give her at that last because I told her years ago to get boots dammit- fine. Fine.
“So. I’m not a cordwainer or a shoe maker. I’m a cobbler. I can mend shoes; I can mend damn near anything. But I’m not a maker of shoes- not hard shoes, at least. With that said, I also can’t let Bryony get frostbite. So. They won’t be hard boots like Sanji’s, Zoro’s, Usopp’s, and Mark’s; they won’t even be hard shoes like Taffy’s. But you won’t get frostbite. That’s all I can promise.” I said, scowling.

“I’ll take it.” said Bryony, cringing.

I finish my lunch pottage, my slices of bread, and my veggies; I focus very hard on enjoying my lunch and letting go of my rage because rage is poisonous, anger is the spurring emotion but rage will burn you inside and out- haaaaaaaah, it’s okay, Bryony doesn’t like shoes and that’s fine. I know how to make Mukluks and their cousins from the Kush Mountains, so- it’s not like she won’t have adequate foot coverings. I had just hoped I wouldn’t have to.

Rrrgh.

Breathe it in and let it out slow, Mab. Breathe it in, and let it out slow.

Honestly, the best parts of my day come around when I’m waiting, which… back when I was training at the Baratie, or even on Momoiro, waiting was the absolute worst. There are some things, most every delicious fermented something, in fact, that absolutely cannot be rushed.

There’s no rushing good shoyu, or fish sauce, or worcestershire, or anything else like that. Beer, booze, wine, cheese- all these things move at their own pace. Bread; yoghurt; jam.

There’s no rushing good taste.

Similarly, there’s no rushing a good kiss.

Step back, and look from the outside. Mab’s hips are pinned under my own, her legs spread wide in their striped pants and her warm center rocking up against my own. Her stomach heaves but slowly against my own, steady bellows pushing in and out.

The soft smell of her- honeysuckle, soap, and her own female musk. Different from man-stank, but really not that different; and we both decided to skip training today, to get used to the cold. Neither of us wants a chest infection, and training outside like we normally do is a surefire way of getting one.

She likes it when I tease the careful pins out of her hair; gently curved brass coils that keep her wavy red hair up and back, away from her face. It takes practice to undo all her hair, each pin in one hand; set them in a little in-built dish in the side table, usually meant for drinks or something- but then her hair falls down, longer now, past her shoulders. It’s fun to tease my fingers through it, too- her hair is soft, softer than rabbit’s fur, and smells like her sweat and soap and coconut oil and just a little bit like heaven, when I breathe her in from the crown. Sometimes, after lunch but before we train- there’s two kissing sessions in the middle of the day, the light one before training, and the heavy one after. Sometimes, the light one is as light as holding each other on the Galley couch, and one of us breathing the other. Oftentimes, it’s me breathing her, but sometimes she needs to breathe me- it’s usually around April, when she needs to breathe me. Most of her- Lost Ones- died in April. Puck died in April.

I get it.

Trace the curve of her ear with kisses, and gently rub on the back side of her earrings, which she never takes off- the big oval ones got lighter, over the years. I know she’s thinking about getting more piercings; or even more tattoos, that don’t mean much of anything other than she liked the look of them. I’m all for it- she’d look good in anything. Mab’s… really, very beautiful.

This time, I’m going to try something new-

“No, leave them on.”

“Ah? But- they’ll fog up, and-”

“Leave them on, Mab.”

“Ah… O-okay, if you want…”

And then I just look at her. I look into her eyes; warm, dark brown, the darkest brown you can get before it turns black, like… light, through the edge of a cup of black coffee. No, no- Mab isn’t food, describe her some other way, Sanji; really think about her, don’t just assume, take the time to look.

Like… opals. Her eyes are like opals. In the low light, it looks like she’s got flecks of rainbow, or… or of some kind of metal, silver in this light, around the edge of her iris. There’s flecks of gold around the pupil, not quite to the reddish rim but close; closer to the sclera, the metal flakes turn to silver. In the light of day, they all turn gold; but here, it’s gold and silver and iridescence.

It’s beautiful, is what it is.

Her glasses are cute! They’re big, and square and so lovely on her oval face, ah- and she’s so fierce when she has them on, too! With them off, her face seems to be set in a permanent glare, but I know that’s not true; it’s because she literally cannot see beyond a few centimeters from the tip of her nose without her glasses. Normally, with her glasses off, it’s a very quick segue into feeling up her tonsils with my tongue, and her, mine, with hers; but this time, I want to do something… different. These past few days… how to describe it.

Her smell is changing, and I want to- I want to smell her. I sincerely hope this doesn’t weird her out- or if it does, it’s the kind of weird she can laugh at.

I look at her nose. It’s a sharp, narrow thing, strong like the prow of the ship; and for how thick and bold her eyebrows are, anything less than a strong, elegant nose would make her whole face unbalanced. The tone of her skin is akin to… she’s pale, still, from the winter; her skin goes from beige in the winter to brown in the summer, a rich sepia brown that has flashes of bright red and gold where sunlight skims across her skin. In the winter, she’s brown still, but a fawn’s brown, tawny at the points and joints and high-places: her forehead, the tip of her nose, across her cheekbones, on her chin, her shoulders, her clavicles… and the undertone of her skin is gold, it’s always gold.

Ah, hell. And that mouth-!
Kiss the lipstick off, and it’s always something with a bit of a purple tone to it, which pops like nothing else against her skin- but kiss that lipstick off, and her lips are about the color of a reddish pinecone. And kissing them is… good. Indescribably good.

I’m doing it right now, if you couldn’t tell.

This time- slow jams. When she goes to deepen the kiss, I back away- she moves back again, I move back. Again, again, again, until she’s softly squeaking and panting in my arms. There’s no training today, so I pull this out for hours; her in my arms, under me, our lips locking, breaking apart, back together like magnets from different poles- Tacky wetness, like the damp inside a pair of underwear at the end of a hot day- not wet, not soaked through, but damp and clinging to your skin where it’s warmest. As for the reason I wanted her to wear her glasses this time- when I look at her, back away and just- behold my beloved wife… I want her to see me looking, and to look back. And she does.

We kiss for about two hours, this time- and then, in the time we’d normally be winding down from training, we talk.

“Sanji?”

“Mab?”

“I want to have kids.”

“I- yeah. I know. I want them, too.”

“…After Nami and Zoro have theirs, d’you wanna start trying?”

“Not- not seriously, but… if we both stopped using birth control maybe…?”

“Mm. I think that’ll work.”

“We might be terrible parents.”

“Mm, perhaps- we certainly won’t be the parents we want to be, it’s not possible. We’ll only ever be the parents we are; hopefully, we’re better than our own were, which isn’t a terribly high bar to set, but…”

“Yeah. Better than ours were, huh? That’s what we’re reaching for.”

“A grim reminder of what we’re fighting for, even. And, with any luck, our children will turn out to be better than we ever were- more, and better, and more better.”

“More better’s not a phrase, Mab.”

“‘Course it is, I just used it.”

“Mmpffft-”

And I kissed her again, right through the cackles. Smelled like heaven on earth, in the nuzzling runnel between her breasts; smelled like the love of god, between her legs.

And she did giggle about it, so I didn’t weird her out too badly.
After lunch, I reshuffle my Dolls and go to work again; this time, a multitude of Sewing Dolls and myself in the Studio and Laundry.

The cable stitch, resembling a rope, represents safety at sea or the fisherman’s life itself, the shark teeth are symbols of the vicious nature of duty, the lattice or basket stitch represents a bountiful catch, and the diamond pattern is a symbol of wealth. Taffy, for obvious reasons—seriously, she almost knocked herself off the ship after calling for a change in the boom, the girl needs prayers—needs all the help she can get. I’ve actually been working on her coat for weeks; it’s only now that I’ve the kick in the ass I needed to finish the damn thing.

And- There. All that’s left is finishing up the fluffy lining layer, adding the buttons, and double checking the integrity of the seams. The front of the coat has more in common with a cardigan pattern I had in the Tome; toggle buttons, that Wano-style collar I know Taffy likes because she is Zoro’s first student, after all, and that sort of thing leaves marks… And add the last few stitches on the button loops- done.

“Taffy, could you come to the Studio, please?” I say into the intercom.

“Yis, right away.” chirruped the intercom snail in Taffy’s voice.

I put Taffy’s coat on a dress-form with arms so that it hangs good- final checks go, all that’s left is for her to put the damn thing on and to see if it suits.

While I wait, let’s consider Gurry, Bryony, and Mark. I’ll leave Bryony for last so I don’t get Enraged again.

Gurry has the classic artist’s style- smocks, smock-like things, clothing that he can wear the hell out of without worry, usually in grey. It’s in direct contradiction of his actual preferences, which is always for beads, lace, frills, ribbon, and color. The man’s from Amazon Lily and it shows. For him, I think I’ll pull out one of the old-fashioned Fae Magic Garments- in this case, it’s a lace pattern meant to create discrete air pockets all along the fabric. If you wear something made primarily out of this lace next to your skin, there will be a distinct layer of air bubbles, a bit like that new bubble-wrapping plastic. Unlike bubble-wrapping plastic, the lace is movable like a very fine muslin, and can be shaped to any form. The jacket- this one, I suppose, it’ll fit his fighting style and float around his body like seafoam. He’ll like it, I think.

I’m making my new swimsuit out of the same lace, so it’s not like I wasn’t going to go through all the trouble of lacemaking anyway, and once you’ve committed to that, you might as well make all the lace you could need in one go because hell’s bells if I’m winding lace bobbins again without need.

As for Mark… a pashmina shawl in red should do him fine.

I’m still too angry to do Bryony, let me just- let’s rip some fabric for rag rugs, that always makes me feel better…

As far as rag rugs go, I’m making two kinds. The first has fabric piling up out of sacking, like your Alabastan rugs; they’re good for catching dirt, dust, mud, and thick slush before it gets into your nice clean house. The second kind is a crochet rag rug, made with rags alone. These are for your areas of lower traffic, but higher required comfort; you put these next to beds, in front of sinks and couches, under tables and in area seating. It’s much easier to make a crochet rag rug pretty, because there’s more control over the eventual pattern. And since I want a rug for in front of the couch… that one’s best done with a traditional loom-rug structure, only the wefts will be rags instead of thread. S’how I learned to weave, actually…

Any kind of fabric can be used in a rag rug- the only fly in that ointment is that the entire rug needs to be of the same type of material. Old shirts? So long as they’re all cotton or linen, go for it. Old suits? They better be all wool or all silk. Old sheets? Flannel or cotton, my friend. Different fabrics, at the end of their lives as clothing and articles, make for different rugs; cotton and linen rugs, for example, aren’t all that durable, but they do wick away water, if made correctly. Wool makes very strong and long lasting rugs that are soft and warm on your feet.

And even as rags, silk is beautiful.

Sometimes, beauty is it’s own reason and it’s own reward.

I start by tearing our old sheets, and other things- one pile of cotton no-goods, and one pile of flannel, and a bit of silk and so on- into one to two inch strips. Old sheets are best for this because they make very nice, very long, strips of fabric, and mirabile dictu, we have a whole stack of them because my crew has sticky fingers and packed the damn sheets and not in my house will they sleep in substandard bedding dammit.

If you have cats, a Zoro, a Nami, playful dogs, a husband, excitable crewmates, a Luffy, or a Taffeta, consider keeping them out of the room while you do this; they will want to play with your long strips of fabric and I need those for rugmaking, play with these soft toys instead! Thank you!

“-Yis this my coat?” says Taffy, a length of fabric tangled around her neck.

“Yep. Give me that fabric strip and try it on; really feel the movement. If it suits, it’s yours to wear; if it doesn’t, I’ll fix what I can.”

“Yis!” says Taffy, holding very still as I untangle and unwind the fabric strip from her neck.

She tries on the jacket I’ve made for her; it does have snaps so if she needs to push her wings out and fly, she can, and the hem hits just above her knees, like I wanted. The side splits allow her the freedom of movement, and it all seems to fit well. Taffy wiggles and stretches her body out in her new jacket, then smiles widely and hugs me. I hug her back, and help her resituate her various things- her compass is easily pulled out of her collar, and I made her jacket as short in the front as Zoro’s- or rather, the buttons don’t go that far, so if she wants to- and she has, with the inner buttons I knew she’d probably need. Her jacket’s more like a dressage coat with tails, now.

And off she goes again.
More beetroot chopped thin, this time add a little dried blackberry crushed fine and get a thick red-purple dye going. Saved powdered onion skin and orange and lemon peel for a yellow color; powdered spinach for green. The ratio is 1:2, one part dye, two parts water; bring all to a boil and simmer for an hour, or do the same and let sit overnight for very intense colors. I need pale colors, really, so I only do the boil and simmer. Salt and vinegar fixatives, salt for the berries and vinegar for the vegetables. Salt ratio is $\frac{1}{2}:8$; half a cup of salt to eight cups of water. Vinegar ratio is 1:4; one cup of vinegar to four cups of water. For these dyes, and this amount of fabric, I need- hmmm- two cups of vinegar, one cup of salt, sixteen cups of water, all in a cauldron and set to boil. I’ll use a two stage preparation process- all the rags will be boiled in the mordants for at least an hour, then rinsed in cold water.

Wring them out with the mangle, then put each batch of rag- still separated into its type, one hopes- into the dye vats and let sit for as long as it takes for the desired colors. Three hours should get the job done. I’ve also got a large batch of t-shirts to rag, so that’s another hour’s worth of anger just-Poof! Gone!

To make sure I still know how to do this, I half double crochet a set of trivets- six, in total- for Sanji out of old t-shirts. They’re multicolored and homely, and they only need a little bit of stitching because I forgot to add the hanging loops until it was nearly too late. Still, there are now a set of six rag-trivets- which are also flexible enough to be used as grabby-things- and my anger is gone.

Alright.

Bryony needs an insulated split-side tunic, with a hood; mukluks with rubber soles, for city and country use, and Kush mukluks, for on the ship. She can wear the Kush mukluk off ship, of course, but the knitted vamps make field trips a bit of a hassle.

Of all of her things, the tunic is easiest to make; I have all the fabric already, and lining it with turquoise satin is easy as dreaming. Add in a tag that says “Made with Love from Mab” to the neck, which is new, but I’m putting it in all my clothing now- Taffy’s jacket has one, and I’ll sneak it into Gurry’s somehow- and we’re done. Then, it’s quality time with my leather cutting tool and a pile of seal skins- spotted seals, if you’re wondering.

The mukluk is a boot native to the people’s of the Trufarnort, and also Nort. They’re traditionally made of reindeer, caribou, sealskin, frost drake, or Sea King leather. Mukluk is often used for any soft boot designed for cold weather and modern designs are often similar to high-top athletic shoes. Mukluk comes from the Yupik (who are from… Lvneel, maybe?), maklak, meaning the bearded seal. Sometimes, they are called kamik boots; this is the Nort heritage coming through, as the people of Chillage- or is it Chillaga, I don’t remember- called seals kamik.

Mukluks don’t weigh very much at all, and allow hunters to move very quietly over ice, snow, and frozen natural terrain. They can be adorned with pompoms and beads; and lined with furs like rabbit, fox, or raccoon. The key component of the mukluk as a winter boot is it’s ability to breathe; it’s construction and material allows for air exchange. This is advantageous in extremely cold conditions, as perspiration may cause frostbite on one’s feet. However, due to their bulk and poor performance in slushy conditions, they are less ideal for a warmer winter.

Enter the Kush Mukluk.

First, a bit about the Kush.
The Kush is a range of mountains in the Red Line. Sanji would know them as the Caucasus Fae; either way, it's an 800 kilometer long mountain range that starts in the Khanganate Plains on the Trunort Continue, and goes to about Lvneel, where Maenad’s Point becomes The Spine.

The Kush range has lots of very high snow-capped peaks, with the highest point being Tirich Mir- or Dark King Mountain. To the Trusout, near the point where Lvneel’s international waters, Maenad’s Point, and The Spine all intersect, the Kush butts against the Paneer Mountains.

The Kush is the spiritual home of my friend Lamia’s religion, Wu Tang Fang Zen Buddhism. Dojos, temples, monasteries, and monumental buddhas litter that mountain range like kernels in a corn-crib. It has Lamia’s home monastery- Calm Tiger Monastery- somewhere in it, and important trade networks and travelers roads and communities- city states, and so on- are all settled between the Trunort Continent and The Spine.

Kush Mukluks are what happens when you need to keep your feet warm, but you only need leather bottoms to keep the rocks out, not the snow; they do better in slushy conditions, as the woolen vamps retain their heat when wet. Thus, the Kush Mukluk- some people call them slipper socks, but those are something else entirely. Kush Mukluks are quicker to make, too; knit the vamp, stitch on the soles, and you’re done. Bryony gets this stripy pair; Taffy’s gonna want a white pair she can put her loose socks over.

It’s cool.

The most important thing, though, is that I lanolize the Kush Mukluk before I put on the first leather sole- the soles are replaceable, but you can’t lanolize the wool if you’ve already put on the leather. Glad I got that tub of lanolin- s’good in skin creams, and also to protect nipples when breastfeeding. I’ve decanted some into a much smaller tub for Nami’s sake already, and I’ve made a multitude of duplicates because they are small and useful. I keep one in my purse, as it’s always the right time to cut down on skin cracklin’s. Always.

Anyway.

Dissolve lanolin in very hot water until it won’t dissolve no more; pull a big bucket of cool water, and pour in about two ladles full of wool-wax solution into the soaking bucket, mix well, and add the woolen garments, letting them soak through in the lanolizing solution for at least three hours, but overnight is better. Since I’m doing this, I might as well lanolize everything else that needs it- mostly last year’s jumpers, as this year’s I’ve already lanolized. Waterproofing, antifungal, self-cleaning, and antimicrobial; putting the natural wool wax back on the wool makes the whole thing last much longer than it normally would.

And I’m finally calm enough to weave lace. First things first; I am only going to be hand making the trim for whatever lace goods I decide to make.

Lace is a fairly delicate fabric made of fine yarn or finer thread in an open, weblike, pattern; it can be made by machine or by hand. I was called Miss Spider because one of my chief pastimes, when I wasn’t doing paperwork, was making lace. I’m one of the best lacemakers of my generation- the very best was Teacher Easeelie, but I was second only to her. And she’s dead- thus, I am the best.

Traditionally, lace is made of linen, silk, gold, or silver threads. In this more modern era, cotton thread is seeing use as well- but I’m not sure how to feel about that. On the one hand, cotton lace makes it very easy for machine lace to become available to everyone, not just those who can afford to pay for the time someone spent hand making it; on the other, until the mechanization of cotton really becomes effective, slavery is the only reliable way to get large cash crops like that out of the field and turn a reasonable profit. Or rather, slavery is the only way most of the World seems to be able to manage their food supply. Spadille’s Working On It.

Ahem. The world ‘lace’ is from Middle Breghton, which itself is derived from Old Maul (which became Gaul which became Near Nort or French, you see) las, meaning noose, string; or from the Vulgaric Albastrian, laceum, from Albastrian laqueus, noose; probably akin to lacere, to entice or ensnare.

Fae and lace go- not quite hand in hand, but something like it.

There are many types of lace, each classified by the method of their production. Needle lace is made using a needle, thread, and something to cut the thread with. It’s the most flexible of the lace-making arts. Some types of needle lace can be made more quickly than the finest of bobbin laces, others take months or years to complete fully. Some purists- Easeelie, mainly- regard needle lace as the very height of lace-making. While it is true that the finest of laces from antiquity still surviving today were made from a thread only the Royal Fae still know how to make, this particular kind of lace is very… if I make needle lace, it’s for either a tablecloth or my own use. I will never, ever put my needle lace onto another person. Not ever. Too much of my haki leeches into the fabric as I make it; it might, maybe, be useful as bunting, but even then I would hesitate using my own needle lace in that way. My roommates described wearing my needle lace as “wearing fabric that wants to stab me with a needle”. It’s too- much.

Cutwork, or whitework, is lace constructed by removing threads from a woven background, and the remaining threads wrapped or filled with embroidery. This is used in the finishing of the Fae Magic Air Cloth, which I will use as the basis for Gurry’s new coat.

Bobbin lace, or bone-lace, is made with bobbins and a pillow of some kind. The bobbins, usually turned from wood or bone, or more recently, plastic, hold threads which are woven together and held in place with pins stuck in a paper pattern on the pillow (which usually contains some kind of straw). You think of a woman making lace, this is usually what you imagine; an old woman, usually, with pins stuck into a pillow and a very complicated design being knotted by her fingers tossing bobbins over each other in a pattern you can’t quite catch. Entire layers of panels get made in this style, for Air Cloth; thankfully, I know how to automate this, too.

Tape lace makes the tape in the lace as it is worked, or uses a machine or hand-made textile strip formed into a design, then joined and embellished with needle or bobbin lace. I hate making this, now, and this design doesn’t require it, so- next! (It’s for babies, okay? I learned to make this as a very young child and it’s all I was allowed to do for years. This lace is boring.)

Knotted lace includes macrame and tatting. Literally everyone on the ship can do macrame, although they might not call it that; and tatting… Robin might know how to tat lace. Tatted lace is made with a shuttle or a tatting needle. This might come up in the seaming portion of making the Air Cloth Coat, or possibly in the notions- otherwise, I don’t expect it to.

Crocheted lace includes Siren crochet, pineapple crochet, and filet crochet. Siren crochet is very dense, and good for laying in further Enchantments- which I don’t necessarily need to do. However, leaving the drawer open for such developments is only good sense. Pineapple crochet is good for any kind of radial symmetry or curving; a fairly stretchy weaving pattern on it’s own, and lends itself easily to repetition. Filet crochet is what you do when you need a picture, but don’t have a camera; very accurate maps have been made with colored thread and filet crochet. It’s one of the simplest styles of crochet, too, having only the two stitches. If you’ve ever seen a piece of graph paper with a picture on it, marked out in black and white squares… filet crochet is where that comes from.

Knitted lace includes Fairy lace, such as the wedding ring shawl- a lace shawl so fine that it can be pulled through a wedding ring. I’m only married- if Sanji and I were having a wedding, you bet your ass I’d make myself a wedding ring shawl, and him a wedding ring pocket square. Sanji, of course, would have to procure the jewelry- the rings- but… that’s how things get divided, y’see. Knitted lace is also very popular in Nort, because of how much air you can stuff in those little holes. Creates a good barrier to the weather, y’see.

Chemical lace is made by stitching the stitching area with embroidery threads that form a continuous motif. Afterwards, the stitching areas are removed and only the embroidery remains. The stitching ground is made of a water-soluble or non-heat-resistant material. For this one, you stitch the lace, put it in the wash, and pull out your ever so slightly fuzzy piece- or pieces. Depends how you make your cards. Further, you can do things with chemical lace that you can’t quite manage any other way- not with any speed, I mean. Most of the lace I’m going to be using to bulk up Gurry’s coat is going to be chemical lace made in a few distinctive patterns, simply because they’ll be the between layers, and no one’s going to be looking at them too closely.

Machine-made lace is any style of lace created or replicated using mechanical means. My personal preference is to use a Jacquard Loom- which, once I re-thread it and set up the Jack, my loom actually is.

The Jacquard machine is a device fitted to a power loom that simplifies the process of textile manufacture with such complex patterns as brocade, damask, matelasse, and lace. The loom, being a power loom, is controlled not by hand or a very simple loop-no loop pattern, but by a chain of cards; a number of punched cards, laced together into a specific continuous sequence. Multiple rows of holes are punched on each card, with one complete card corresponding to one row of the design. This particular mechanism is probably one of the most important mechanized weaving inventions as Jacquard shedding makes possible the automatic production of unlimited varieties of pattern weaving. Both process and loom attachment are named after their inventor.

Thus, the term “Jacquard” is not specific or limited to any particular loom, but rather refers to the added control mechanism that automates the patterning. A Jacquard card-chain, or a chain-jack, refers to a number of punched cards laced together into a specific continuous sequence. One punch card is a link; an inch of fabric requires something like- it’s a complicated bit of math. Suffice to say, Bryony read my manual for production of repeat-print textiles and got ideas.

And so we come to chains, and the breaking of them. A chain is what we, in the textile world, call it when a series of links are used to connect one chain-jack, or chain to a completely different chain in an operation called linking. Breaking the Chain means that, for whatever reason, you, the operator of the loom has removed the chain, and neglected to prepare the next chain in the time allotted you by the intermediary links.

If your business with the power loom is the production of fine textiles with distinctive, repetitive patterns that nonetheless change over the length of the fabric, you must never, but never, break the chain.

Chaining the loom is also useful for making patterned knitwear and machine-knitted textiles, such as jersey. I know my crew thinks the big thing on one wall in the Studio is just weird laundry things they don’t know how to use, but it’s not. That’s my loom; I have to engage the shaft if I want it to be a power loom. Once I thread the loom for use with the Jacquard, I won’t be threading it again for a good long time; I’ll tie new warps on as needed individually, but… this is a large loom, with tens of thousands of warp ends. If I tried to do this by hand, by myself, the process would take weeks.
Praise the gods for Devil Fruit Bullshit.

Oh, my rag’s dry again- some of it was actually set aside for menstrual pads, Robin likes hers to be black or brown and extra-absorbent. With that done, I find it best to make the yarn all of a piece from the start; a bit of stitching in the appropriate color, as colored thread is fairly simple to come by, and I’ve got lengths of unbroken rag yarn to double half crochet into rugs for the various rooms in the Sunny. Wind them into dry yarn shapes, and put them in my squishy quilted knitting bag, along with my folding case of needles, hooks, and cords, and my case of crochet hooks because I like being prepared.

I don’t crochet all that often; single needle fabrics are something I moved beyond as a young teenager. Still, it’s nice to go back to your roots, every now and again. Stitch stitch stitch stitch- that’s the rug I noticed Sanji needed for in front of the kitchen sink done, in double squishy wool. I hope it works out for him, and if not I’ll put it in front of my studio sink, or maybe the laundry sink… although people will definitely have sex on it if it’s in the laundry… ah well.

Time for dinner, anyway- the loom’s been threaded and is set to weave the pattern through the night; I’ll have all the lace I need come morning. I’ll take Bryony’s things with me- the shoes, anyway, she might want sleeves and I neglected to ask...

Dinner is pottage, which is what dinner almost always is- and although that might sound quite boring, it’s really not. Ah, for those that don’t know- pottage is somewhere between a soup and a stew, and older than both, and is usually kept on the stove for days and days. Most of the ingredients of pottage are added on a daily, seasonal basis, and it’s only the stock and the major spices- salt, pepper, and so on- that don’t really change. Vegetables, grains, meat, fish, and whatever else Sanji’s feeling like go in the pot- and our dinner comes out again and again.

Food.

Food for days, y’all.

After dinner, which is much quieter as most of the crew is either very tired, or just waking up, it’s time for my watch.

Ah, before I go-

“Franky, Bryony, wait a moment. Bryony- the boots you wanted-”

“Yaaaagh- oh, oh! Thank you, Mab- these are really nice!”

“Maybe put them on your feet before you say things like that?”

“Sorry,”

“Mm- and come by my studio tomorrow so I can fit your tunic. Franky- you don’t need to set them up, but… we need guest beds.”

“…You’re expecting guests, Mab?”
“No, but we’ll have them eventually- and I’ve always found it’s better to have things before you need them, y’see. And with Usopp varnishing the- things-”

“...Is there a reason you won’t call the baby-stuff by name?”

“I was taught it’s presumptuous to call baby-things by their proper names until there’s an actual baby present to use them.”

“Presuming on who?”

“On God, Franky.”

“...?”

“-Bryony, where’s Nami, right now?”

“Uh-”

“Duty before Discretion.”

“Right. She’s in the shower with Zoro.”

“Shower’s on?”

“Yep.”

“Okay. Franky, babies can be born dead. Mothers do not always survive childbirth. With Taffy, Chopper, and myself together, Nami and her baby have a very good chance- nine out of ten, if you like. But there’s still that one to worry about- so. Don’t tell her I said this- don’t even hint about it, either of you- but. Until there’s a baby spitting egg-yuck on Nami’s chest, I won’t be calling any of what you, or Usopp, or I make by anything that could link it to an as-of-yet non-existent baby.”

“Superstitious- but also, super kind of you, I think.”

“Oh?”

“Well- if you’re not in the habit of calling the- stuff- by it’s associated names until after there’s a live critter to use them, then if things go wrong, you won’t...”

“Oh. Yeah. That, too. Bryony, breathe- Nami’s going to be fine, breathe, breathe, come on-”

“Come on, Bry-girlie, over to the couch- atta girl, go ahead and hold onto me, you won’t hurt me-”

“And, after getting a nod from Franky, I left Bryony and him on the couch. Bryony isn’t prone to anxiety attacks, normally- so this whole ‘small humans imminent’ thing must be really weighing on her.

She’s in good hands; and I’ll remind her to come to the studio tomorrow.

On my watch, I take my knitting, and my tactical belt. It’s changed a bit since mom first outfitted me with it; I replaced the belt and buckle first, as it’s now the wide strap I prefer and the lotus-buckle-badge of my Office. For flight maneuvers, I wear my bag as a fanny pack- or a bum bag, whichever you prefer- because there’s a dead space right over the small of my back. Thus, if I put my bag there, I won’t mess up my flight pattern or my aerodynamics. Otherwise, I prefer the thigh-holster, like my brother, Ace. Of course, my bag is much nicer than his, being made of heavier leather and actually matching my visual aesthetic, but we can’t all be fashionable.

At least he wears shirts, now. Even if they are see through.

Anyway.

Up in the Crow’s Nest, there’s the gym area, where we all train in various ways- Sanji and I mostly do yoga, weighted isometrics, and balance training there, and there are punching bags for Bryony, too- and up a level, between the ladder to the Observatory, and the ladder down to the Gym, there’s the Observation Deck, which is where watches in the Crow’s Nest are actually held. Bryony, Franky, Nami, and Usopp all got together to build it; it’s a… screen, of some sort, through which the horizontal plane around the ship can be viewed from one fixed position on the Observation Deck. To that end, watches in the Crow’s Nest are taken by sitting on a fairly comfortable- but not too comfortable- chair, with the console nearby.

Bryony, who does not sleep at night but in the middle of the afternoon, stays up with whoever’s on watch and just… talks to them, I think.

Anyway- I was wondering where they got off to- Pearblossom and Bubbler are behind the aquarium, sleeping in a pile of slippery fur and dorsal fins. Buttercream is laying on my feet, the lazy swenk.

Over the course of our being a family, the dogs have reached their full growth; they went from being maybe a meter long from shoulder to buttocks to a good two meters for ‘Blossom and Bubbler. Buttercream is not like our other two dogs.

Buttercream is… well, I was wrong. Buttercream is not a dog at all. Buttercream is a wolf, actually- specifically, she’s a Skuan Wolf Shark, making her shyer and gentler than her oceanic cousins. How big is that?

Well. The largest recorded Skuan Wolvark was twenty four meters, from shoulder to buttocks- and that’s not counting her head, or tail. Buttercream is somewhere between sixteen and eighteen meters, which is nearly sixty feet long- shoulder to butt. Her head’s a full meter on it’s own. Buttercream is not a dog; dogs don’t get that big. Thinking on it now, of course we’re not going through the Sea of Monsters yet, it’s infested with wolvarks that aren’t like Buttercream at all.

Her fur’s very soft, though- slippery, like silk. There’s a big warm stripe under her skin, full of very hot blood; it feels nice, against my shins. Captain likes napping all curled up against her side, and she’s fairly comfortable with him there- she doesn’t like too many people doing that at once, it brings up bad memories, but one or two people is fine.

Nothing approaches; all is well.

Imbolc is a holiday marking the beginning of spring. Most commonly, if one is not following the astrological calendar, Imbolc is held on the First of February; otherwise, it falls halfway between the winter solstice and the spring equinox. This is the time when the udders of our goats will engorge with milk instead of wax, in preparation for the birth of their new kids; this is the time when farmers prepare their fields for the first sowing of seeds; this is the time when fishermen prepare to return to the sea. This is when the Goddess returns to the places of beginnings- fires, smithies, wells, springs, healing fountains, and poets. In the time when the Maiden Goddess returns to us, the Goddess Crone begins to take her leave- and, if one is weak or sickly, the Goddess Crone will take that one with her on her exeunt.

Therefore, as soon as we have enough rushes, straws, or even sticks and twine, we’ll be making crosses. They’re good for all sorts of things- warding off evil spirits, aiding in conception, blessing seed-stock…

As for the actual observance of Imbolc… We are at one of two cruxes, places in the year where all the World turns. This moment is the turning of the Earth to return the Sun; and so, to remind the Sun of us, and us of the Sun, we light fires. Usually, we light candles during the dark of the night, but bonfires are also appropriate, as are oil lamps. Before the Eve of Imbolc, we- meaning the entire crew- will clean winter out of this ship! Beat the dirt out of carpets, wash winter’s dust out of windows and cracks and crevices; clear away spiderwebs and beat mattresses back into shape.

Wash everything.

If possible, air out your house- if you can bear the cold, open those windows and get some fresh air in! It’s a holiday, so it’s a good time to get rid of things you don’t need, don’t use, and don’t want; new beginnings!

Get really fucking drunk on custard mix spiked with way more hard alcohol than you usually drink, it's Traditional!

And finally, on the day of Imbolc itself, we ought to visit a local holy shrine- preferably, one that enshrines a river, lake, stream, spring, or well. Bathing, on Imbolc, is especially important. After all, the Goddess Maiden is returning from the Otherworld; and soon will grow and change into a Youthful Woman, and go into the Forest. She will go into the woods and the Wilds and learn the essential facts of life; she will meet with the Gods, and learn what they have to teach- or not- and when it comes time to die again, discover the life she has lived, through the year.

This tradition is very, very old- it’s the marking of time for when you’ve finished preparing all your fields and forests for growing again, you’ve fixed the fences and wattled the hedgerows, you’ve dug drainage ditches and made all ready for the melting of the snow and the ice and the return of the sun.

It’s hard, backbreaking work; and for two years, Mark more or less did it all on his own. Mark actually undertook the hardest parts of the work on our ship; the farm work, when that work has no reward that you can see just yet- that’s hard.

Summer season in a circus is winter everywhere else; go home, little acrobat, and muck out the pigsty.

Aye- let no one say that Mark doesn’t know how to work.

Nothing approaches; all is well.

Advocaat is a traditional Dutchy alcoholic beverage made from eggs, sugar, and brandy (or sometimes muscovy). The rich and creamy liqueur has a smooth, custardy flavor and is typically between fourteen and twenty percent alcohol by volume. In content, it is usually a blend of egg yolks, aromatic spirits, sugar or honey, brandy or muscovy, vanilla, and sometimes cream (or evaporated milk).

Thick advocaat is sold mainly in Dutchy proper, and almost never exported- although it has been naturalized in Sakura Kingdom, so Chopper’s excitement at the prospect of having some is understandable. The thick version is often eaten over powder-snow or powder-shave ice, with a small spoon made of wood or bone. The thick version is the basis for a Skuan Shave Ice, the jim jim, and the tam tam- all of which are technically speaking, Imbolc treats served over snow.

Thick advocaat contains egg yolks only, and is used as a waffle or poffertjes topping- when it’s not Imbolc, I mean. And of course, it’s also served as an aperitive or digestive in a wide glass with whipped cream and cocoa powder sifted on top.

In the drink I will be making, only the yolks will be used- thus, the consideration of how to make enough Advocaat for the crew to enjoy.

The receipt I have for Advocaat makes six servings, meaning I need to at least double it- knowing our crew, it would be best to quadruple it.

So.

Eight egg yolks of the medium to large variety, means- in quail eggs- thirty two; times four is sixteen, eight- one hundred sixty eight double check, no, messed up the order of operations I do believe, no, read it as forty two- double check your maths, y’all. One hundred twenty eight quail eggs.

Our flock of laying quail numbers approximately fifteen; each hennie lays two eggs per day. I will need to save all the quail eggs for the next… five, four and a quarter days doesn’t work with live animals, not for this; five days. Or rather, I need to save the eggs for the five days preceding Imbolc Eve.

All the rest is fairly simple: two hundred grams of caster sugar becomes eight hundred grams of caster sugar; seeds of one vanilla pod becomes seeds of four vanilla pods; three hundred fifty milliliters of brandy (or muscovy) becomes one thousand four hundred milliliters of brandy (or muscovy); and one teaspoon of vanilla extract becomes four teaspoons of vanilla extract.

Let me just write this down on my notepad, so I don’t have all these numbers jumping ‘round my brains- here we are.

ADVOCAT

Serves twenty-four people, or twelve pirates

128 Quail Egg Yolks

800g caster sugar
Seeds from 4 vanilla pods

1400ml brandy (or muscovy, or other appropriate spirit)

4 tsp vanilla extract

Whisk together egg yolks and sugar with vanilla seeds until very pale and thick. Slowly add the spirit, while whisking, until completely combined. In a double boiler (or double boiling rig), heat the egg mixture, whisking until thickened and coats the back of a spoon. This can be done in a simple pan over very low heat, but be careful not to overheat or the mixture will break- or worse, the alcohol will cook off. Stir in the vanilla extract and allow to cool. Store in a sealed container in cold (next to a bank of snow on the porch away from the door), or refrigerated, area.

Served in: Straight over Snow, Skuan Shave Ice, Fluffy Duck (both the mixed drink and the highball), Far West, Class Act, Casablanca, Brigid’s Dash (made with Creme de Fraise), BAM, Estern Exotic, and the classic itself, the Dutchie (made with Creme de Banane).

Due to it's high fat and sugar content, Advocaat is one of the alcohols that I only drink during the Winter or when I’m going into a long, dangerous fight- otherwise, I’d just get fat and slow drinking it. And I don’t want that.

Nothing approaches; all is well.

Hm.

I’ve been considering the ecology of our aquarium- our transient residents are, of course, transient. However, the sheer size of our aquarium… we could honestly have a Ryugu horse or two in the aquarium, if they’re of Fastblood stock.

Horses are special- be they called Lion Birds, like in Skua, or Big Dogs, like in Nort and Est; horses are special, of all the animals, because they don’t lie about their intentions. Most animals don’t, of course- but the horse is different because, of all the animals, it is the horse that will not lie about their intentions, even when it would serve them better if they did.

Fairies and Horses are said to have come from the same, ancient, cradle- that being seafoam. Horses were seafoam, once, but the God of the Sea bade the seafoam run onto the shore, and it did- and in doing, it was changed from bubbles to flesh. Some of the foam had four legs, long necks, wide chests and the longing to run, and run, and never stop running- and some of the foam had two legs, and two arms, and wings like a bugs and the urge to fly and never again let their feet touch the ground.

And the God was pleased; and the foam did run.
Thus were horses and fairies both created.

The king’s horse is white; and on a white horse rides the hero, the warrior, the one-who-draws-the-sun; the white horse brings the fertile field, be it mare or stallion. Rhiannon, who no man could catch, rode a white horse; Epona is a white horse; white horses run across the tops of chalk hills, their ancient bones cut bare for all to see. Pegasus, and all his children are white; Sleipnir, and his son, Grani, are white; the horse of the rain is white, as is the horse that Buddha rode before he was the Buddha. Coming out of the mythic, it is not an exaggeration to say that all horses embody some measure of power, grace, beauty, freedom, nobility, and strength.

There is no such thing as a bad horse; just as there is no such thing as a bad dog. It’s humans, teaching animals to be human, that wreck them. Being vital to everyday life, survival, and battle… to hold the horse in high esteem is only natural. It’s the horse that plows the field; it’s the horse that farrows it. Horses carry wood and berries and cherries and stones; horses pull barges. Horses turn mill wheels.

We, being pirates, don’t need horses. But we can have them.

And it would make Mark very happy.

Specifically, the horses I’m thinking of are Ryugu horses, or Hippocampi if you want to be fancy. A Hippocampus, or Ryugu Horse, is the common name for about five distinct bloodlines of horseflesh, native to the aqueous parts of the world. They have four legs, which look very much like fins- don’t be fooled, though, they can run just as fast on land as they can swim in water. If a Ryugu Horse doesn’t want to be caught, you aren’t catching them.

In the general sense, horses are odd-toed ungulates, belonging to the taxonomic family Equidae. All true horses share the common ancestor of Eohippus, but modern varieties- like the Tribes of humans- appear very, very different from each other. However, as all the known breeds of horses can interbreed and bear live, fertile young, they must all be the same kind of animal, under the skin. Somewhere deeper, where we can’t see...

Humans began to domesticate horses around four thousand years before the oldest calendar, according to the archaeological record. Domestication was widespread about a thousand years after the start of the process; thus, in the distinction between wild and domesticated horses, all the horses used or living near humans today are, more than likely, Caballus horses. Some domesticated populations live ferally- however, when I use the term “Wild” in relation to any domesticated animal, what I mean is “a subspecies of this family that has never been domesticated”.

Because of our long history together, there is an extensive, specialized vocabulary used to describe equine-related concepts; everything from anatomy, to life stages, to size, colors, markings, breeds, locomotion, and behavior. I know some of them; Mark knows all of them, because-as far as I could read between the lines of his letters to me- Mark has the Horse Magic. Horses love him; he loves them back. And he’s lucky enough to find people willing to talk about horses with him; even people you wouldn’t expect to love such honest creatures.

The anatomy of the horse enables them to make use of speed to escape predators. They have a well-developed sense of balance and a strong fight-or-flight response. A horse, when faced with something that wants to kill it, does not freeze up. The horse will fight, if cornered- but if there is any possible way to run, the horse will run. Related to this need to run is an unusual trait: horses are able to sleep both standing up and lying down. If a horse sleeps lying down, it is because, in that place, they have never felt scared or about to come to harm.

Female horses, called mares, carry their babies for about eleven months, and a young horse is called a foal until they’ve been weaned for about a year, when they become yearlings. After that first year, the young horse is either called by the number of years it’s been alive, or as a mare or stallion and so on. Foals can stand (or float upright) and run (or swim in pace with their mother) shortly after birth. The fastest I know of is about three and a half minutes, but that's just anecdotal stories from biologists in the field...

Most domesticated horses begin training under saddle or in harness between the ages of two and four; yearlings can be trained to the saddle, but it is a very careful process requiring significant expertise to be walked through. A horse reaches their adult size in about five years after birth, and their adult temperament after eight. Their lifespan averages about twenty-five to thirty years. A horse is not a toy; it’s a lifetime commitment. A friend, a brother, a child- you get a horse, you get another member of your family.

Holy shit, I do want kids.

Hm.

Well, anyway- breeds of horses are divided, loosely, thusly: Hot Bloods, spirited, speedy, enduring; Cold Bloods, steady, slow, hard working; and Warm Bloods, a cross between the Hot and the Cold- meant for very specific riding purposes, especially along the Red Line.

Mark worked with Hot and Warm Bloods exclusively during his time in the circus; Cold Bloods too, if he did anything at all in the process of setting up and breaking down.

All is not well; something comes.

“Bryony, something’s coming- I can’t see through the silt, but I can feel it, I can hear it. You feel that?”

“Yeah- and we’re being followed, too. Surume, you’re doing great- see if you can’t get us away from- oh my god it’s a volcano- TAFFETAAAAAALAAAA-!”

“I’M ON IT, HANG ON- MARK, FIFTEEN BY THIRTY, STARBOARD, THEN PORT; ZORO USOPP LUFFY GET ON THE LINES AND GET READY TO SWITCH THEM ON MY COMMAND MOVE YOUR ASSES- MAB GET ON THE LINES TOO, HURRY THE FUCK UP-”

“On it!”

I leave my crochet and my shawl and the dog behind, dive out the open trap-door and up into the spars of our rigging and sails, my wings churning through the air with- speed- got you, little bastard, come here-

“WIND HARD TO PORT, TACK THE SAILS-”

“GO, GO, GOT IT- LUFFY, WATCH THE BOOM-”
“THANK YOU USOPP-”

“MAKE SURE THAT LINE IS SECURE, ZORO-”

“REALLY LEAN ON THE WHEEL, MARK- SURUME, GET US OUT OF THE BLAST RADIUS, HURRY PLEASE-”

And then the Volcano exploded.

After a moment, the sound became merely the loudest thing I’d ever heard; fumes and smoke and silt whirled away from torrents of burning liquid earth, magma become lava as it sprayed out into the cold black waters. The shockwave is still making my ears ring.

Gabby would love this.

A rolling wave of liquid heat pours in firey waves over pale sea-bottom stone; in the distance, I see a ship tied to a… a Sea Giant and an Angler Fish I think, being blasted away. Our Surume must be outswimming the shockwave- I can still hear it, but we’re not feeling the effects of it. Small stones and bits of coral bounce off the surface of our bubble with screaming pings-

And then the volcano explodes again and a boulder-

Strikes Surume unconscious-

And we-

Fall-

Into darkness, through which I cannot see.

It’s quite interesting; most of the time, my life and Mab’s don’t intersect. If I want to spend time with her, or she with me, we have to pre-arrange time during a meal, or something like that. Tea is when we usually interact, barring previous arrangements; and, more often than not, if Mab isn’t shopping for something specific, or training in a certain way, she enjoys just… sitting quietly, in the same room as someone.

She’s always fairly game for going on adventures, though; and, honestly, she’s one of the best archaeological partners one could have. My main focus is in archaeology; Mab’s main focus, when she’s out with me, is anthropology. Oddly enough- or perhaps not- her insights into the functional uses of some of the things I’ve found, or even what people use a very similar object for now… it lends a certain excitement and flair to my work that doesn’t often come naturally to me.

I’m very good at discerning the patterns of a person’s death; how they died, where, when- the burial practices. What the bones can tell me after death… Mab is very good at discerning the patterns of a person’s life; the clothing they wear tells a story of it’s own, she says, and things that can’t be figured out from the record of broken things might be figured from the remains of what once was made.
I never expected to stumble across not merely a group of friends, in my crew; but a best friend, the kind of stalwart companion I saw in many an adventure book during years past. Mab draws me back from my excesses, and helps to remind me that the fine line between archaeology and grave robbery is permission. If there are people who are living, and breathing, and still using the areas I wish to study in their daily lives, I must have their permission to study. I cannot just take part of their lives with me when I leave; it isn’t right.

Mab believes very firmly in treating people with respect. She also believes very firmly in fairness; which, being a Fairy, is perhaps not all that surprising. Honestly, I’m not sure if she knew of my love of birds before; I know she doesn’t know now.

Birds have been symbols of power and freedom throughout the Ages. It’s fairly telling that Gol D. Spadille chose the bird as his symbol, both for himself and his followers- and it’s quite interesting that Mab chose to tattoo a series of birds on her brother’s back. Spadey, she calls him- Gol D. Spadille, the rest of the World knows him as. Mab claims that her brother, Spadey, is Up To Something; considering the uproar of the past two years, I’m inclined to agree with her.

In many myths and legends, birds link the world of the humans to the world of the supernatural, or divine, or other- they act as physio-spiritual links to all the Worlds, and all Creation.

Birds assume a variety of roles; often, they are messengers of the deities. They can also be the carriers of souls, after death; or tricksters, or oracles. Ravens, and their smaller cousins, crows, are known the World over as symbols of death, decay, misfortune, and war. Other birds represent strength, love, and wisdom.

Myths from several regions associate birds with the creation of the World. One of several creation stories native to Alabasta says that “when Land rose out of the waters of Chaos, the first God to appear was a bird perching on that land.” The Ancient Alabastans, or Sandians, called the god Benu, which is the root of many words meaning ‘good’; beneficial, bountiful, and so on, can trace their lineage to Benu, the first god of the Sandia. It is most often depicted as a long-legged, wading heron, usually either facing the rising or setting sun in the temple. The Sandians believed that the Benu bird created the World, and then made the deities and the humans to live in the World.

Most creation myths from Est feature birds. On the island of Goa dwell the Columbo people, who tell of Ara and Irik, two bird spirits floating above an endless expanse of water at the beginning of time. Seizing two eggs from the water, Ara made the sky from one, while Irik made the earth from the other. As Irik squeezed the earth into its proper size, mountains and rivers appeared on its surface. Then the two creator birds shaped bits of earth into the first people and woke them to life with bird cries.

Mab, of course, tells the story of the Egg from which all Darkness came- or rather, a cosmic egg, from which the World was born.

There are other stories too; it’s common, in Nort and Sout, for birds in myths to be portrayed as earth divers. An earth diver is an animal that plunged to the bottom of the primeval Sea and brought up mud from which the Earth was formed. Legends of the Thuled and Urimaesh people of Flevnce feature birds as earth divers- usually gannets, murres, or diving petrels. Water birds such as ducks or swans play this role in the creation myths of many Farnorten people, including the Germa and the Jervan.

In many myths involving the Great Flood, when the people flee to an upper World, they leave everything behind. It is then up to the compassion of the birds to return to the lower World, now flooded, to retrieve those things which will help the people live- food, seeds, medicine, tools, weapons, and so on.

I’m thinking about birds because I’m not entirely sure if my spine is or isn’t broken. If it’s broken- it doesn’t feel broken, but I can’t be sure- I’d best not move. I’m not in any danger, as far as I can see; just somewhere… odd. I can’t- Mab! My snail just registered a connection to her snail, oh my goodness- let me just- got it!

“Mab! Mab, wake up!”

“Mab! Please, wake up! I can’t reach that far, you’re going to have to- that’s it! That’s it, come on- open your eyes, Mab!”

“r-Robin-?”

“Yes, Mab- oh thank goodness. Are you hurt?”

“Um- no, no, I’m fine. Where are you-?”

“I’m speaking through your snail, and… I’m not sure.”

“Describe what you can see, then.”

“I can see moss, mostly; over a grey colored stone, some kind of… concrete, I think. If I look to my left, I can see some kind of building complex, but I don’t know what kind-”

“Can you see a roof?”

“Yes, it’s very sharply curved, in the Old Est style- but no, no it’s not, that’s what it reminds me of though-”

“Do you see any birds? Robin, this is very important. Do you see any kind of bird or bird like creature- in the statuary, I mean.”

“Y-yes, I think so- ow-”

“Crap, okay, you’re near the Ryugu tombs- Robin, are you hurt?”

“I’m… not sure. I don’t think my spine is broken, but I can’t really tell, and… I know you can repair it, if it is, but- I’d rather not exacerbate a wound, if you catch my drift.”

“I do. I’ll come find you, okay- don’t move, I’ll be right there.”

“Thank you.”

I close my eyes, and focus on the connection between myself, my phone snail, Robin’s phone snail, and Robin.

And then, I Blink, and when I open my eyes again- Robin!

“Oh my god, it’s a good thing you didn’t move- let me just- there.”

“Hey Mab- oooooh, oh ow, oh I can feel my feet now-”

“Yeah, that was a lucky fall- hasn’t been parted for too long… you’ll have some cramps, maybe, but you should be good as before in about half an hour. We need to change clothing and compare notes anyway, so-”

“We need to change clothing? Really, Mab?”

“We’re in the Ryugu Tomb Complex, which is only semi-aerated. We need to be wearing clothing that protects us from Sea Water, as we both have Devil Fates. So. Yes, Robin, we need a little change.”

“Heh.”

I smile at my friend, and do my best not to dwell on what could have happened oh my god my best friend almost died argh argh argh deep breaths Mab, deep breaths. Her spine is unbroken now, you fixed it, she’s fine. She needs a rest and then she’ll be good as new, breathe.

Consider the clothing, Mab.

Firstly, I need to be wearing my long-sleeve leotard style swimsuit; protect my arms, aye. Then-pants, to protect my legs; Robin, as well. I’ve still got- stop skipping steps, Mab. Inventory first.

I have my charnellements, and it’s a good thing I decided to get the adventurers clips when I had them lightened- nothing short of getting them forcibly torn from my ears is going to take them away from me. I have Bite, and Scratch, my hold-out hairclips; and, considering the circumstances, it’s for the best I put those on. Just gotta- there, and my hair’s pulled back out of my face again. It’s interesting how they turned blue - Mom didn’t mention oxidation, but that is the kind of thing she likes to sneak in… I have Kaladanda, my spear; best pull it out and have it near, just in case.

Okay.

I have three pouches on my tactical belt; my purse pouch, my camping pouch, and my adventure pouch.

In my purse pouch, I have: my money clip and coin purse, my nail kit, my box of plain hair pins and hair ties, my menstruation kit with extras in case someone else needs some, condoms which have more than just the obvious use in a case, lube because same also in a case, extra coin purse, favorite lipstick, small notebook with a pen that works underwater or upside down, calling cards in their own case, snail treats, precious photographic memories of my crew and my siblings and my moms and my husband, my swimsuit, a good luck charm bracelet, Ace and Spadey’s and Old Ray’s Vivre Cards with their names written on, a small hand mirror with clamshell case and comb; a Tone Dial with my Favorite Song on a lanyard, a romance novel that always makes me feel good about life, an extra pair of flats, and my spare glasses and glasses chain in a case, and my regular glasses case.

In my camping pouch, I have: a small bottle of water, a bedroll that’s wide enough for two if needed, a bell, a double-hook, a quilted winter blanket, several square yards of canvas in a single sheet, ten feet of chain, a small box of chalk, a crowbar, a fire starting kit, fishhooks in a case, twenty five square feet of fishing net, a climbing hammer and axe, pitons, a ten foot collapsible pole, camp cooking gear, trail rations (which I’ll explain momentarily), trail spice kit in tin (Sanji has one too), food safe spoils bag, sewing kit, soap, a tent big enough for four people (eight if they double up), a waterskin, and a whetstone.

And finally, in my adventure pouch, I have: caltrops, a candle, a flask with lanyard, a grappling hook with cord, a set of small clay bottles, a rope ladder, a Seastone Choker with a Key (from Enies Lobby), a small brass tankard, a collapsible bucket rated potion-safe, five-hundred pound paracord in a bracelet (which I put on immediately), beeswax in a wooden box (which is tedious to mold but worth it for ease of use later), my rebreather, an ocarina on a string, a spyglass, and a timer-light.

Okay. Okay, breathe. Breathe. It’s going to be okay.

I’ll wear my grey long-sleeve swimsuit, and the rest of my clothing will have to be okay. I can hear my sister Yuki giggling at me now, jeeze- I’m cut off from my normal supplies, so I’ll just have to… make… do- there. That should be everything. No shoes, so I’ll have to make do with my socks; bandaging and rope complete the look, and… that- an Opening! Chance- Take! Got… Robin’s adventure bag? Well, she’d know better than me what’s in it- another Opening! Chance- Take! Got her specialized gear. It’s- yeah, an all-weather jumpsuit, with runes for everything; temperature control, sound-proofing, and so on.

“Okay- you can try sitting up now, Robin. Here- I got your adventure gear and your work-suit, just-”

“Ah, thank you- skirts are nice, but it is quite chilly and damp here, isn’t it?”

“Yeah.”

“You- hm, swimsuit up top, and then you folded your jumpsuit over into a pair of pants, reconfigured your belt and put a pair of thick stirrup leg warmers onto your legs- do you really think it’s going to be that dangerous?”

“Yes. These aren’t… these are tombs still in active use, Robin. The ancient places you tend to go find, those have laid fallow for- Ages. Active Tombs are an entirely different fish.”

“…I’d best prepare myself, then. Hup-!”

“-Armor, joint-pads, yep, good. Looking good. Robin- sorry about the cape, though…”

“Nah, it’s alright- now, you said something about trail rations? We might as well talk about that-”

“Actually, shouldn’t I go over where we-”

“-Not while you’re still so panicked, dearest. Trail Rations. Explain.”

“-Y-yeah, okay. Um, well- firstly, each major Tribe, as we know them today, didn’t exist as we “My Tribe is descended from what were once called Dwarves; thus, the trail rations I would make are based on the ancient tribal records of my people. Garlic Chicken Liver and Pork spiced smoked sausages, hard tack, dried vegetables, dried wild mushrooms, groat-rye berry-and-buckwheat porridge mix in a stay-dry sack; if the journey was at it’s start, there might’ve been oatcakes with honey, and on long journeys- like, months or years long- there’d be kasha, because my tribe’s always had a habit of bringing small farm animals with them on their journeys. Um, small loaves- buns, really- of dense, dark rye bread, and there are accounts of delaying a trip for a day or two to bake the rye berries into ruisreikäleipä. And of course, there’s kvass, which only takes about forty-eight hours to brew…

“There’d be things preserved with salt, as well; Dwarves, and eventually the Fae, are… possibly known for their expertise in preserving food with salt?”

“Yes, they are. They’re also known for eating carrion, but-”

“-oh, Surströmming, right- it’s really not that bad, though.”

“…”

“-U-um, so, before the Dwarves and the Orcs really began to, um…”

“Intertwine.”

“Sure, let’s call it that. Before then, our most valuable commodity- outside of ores, gems, and the various ochers- was salt. It was in demand by every race and culture, and has been for a long time- there are certain foods that just don’t taste good without salt. So, in addition to the sausages, there’d be salt pork, ham, and bacon.”

“Okay- but… orcs.”

“Right; so, before the First Conquest, the ruling tribes of Nort were the Orcs. They weren’t known for their great cuisines; according to my people’s historical records, which may not be correct, Orcs preferred foods that were readily available, usually by raiding. They also liked their food to be portable and edible with little preparation- with that said, there were a few delicacies that took quite a bit of preparation. Those delicacies are the basis for all French cuisine.”

“Aha.”

“Right- mostly, Orc cuisine was all about portability, longevity- how much work d’you have to do to eat? Answer: not much. Strips of dried lean meat that can be chopped down finer for soup stock, if needed, is pretty common; seared bones, and dark coarse breads made up the bulk of recorded orc rations. Marrow’s a rare treat, too… There are Dwarven accounts of Orcish peasantry- women, children, elderly, youths, and so on- foraging for nuts, or burying jars of peppers mixed with pungent spices and bitter herbs while their Orcish soldiers guarded them…”

“And I suppose these cached jars of peppers would be dug up again by the next group of orcs?”

“Or that group, on their return trip. Anyway- my field rations, and yours, are a reflection of my own and Sanji’s ancient heritage-”

“And Luffy’s appetites.”

“Well, I never said it wasn’t. Whoo. I needed that. Right, okay- the Ryugu Tombs.”
I take a deep breath, and carefully pace over to the crack in the wall; through it, I can see the Ryugu Tomb Complex.

“So… the Royalty of the Sea have two tombs. There’s the public tomb, that the people of the realm can visit, if they like; and there’s the private tomb, where their bodies are actually interred.”

“Oh dear.”

“We are currently in the private tomb complex of the Ryugu, who have- in one fashion or another- ruled Fishman Island since it first came to be.”

“…and they really don’t like it when ‘grave robbers’ show up in their tombs, I take it?”

“Most teachers have a policy about mistakes; the Ryugu policy is no mistakes, just die.”

“Great. So, how do we get out?”

“Well. Some of it, we need to figure out how to disarm or avoid death traps- that’ll be in the aerated sections. Some of it, we need to go through ocean water, which-”

“Oh no.”

“Yeah- I did some checking… the reaction Devil Fate holders have to Sea-water is half psychosomatic, and half a product of the ratios of salt to water. Movement also matters- it’s the Devil Fate holder’s instinct to freeze up in water, which is what kills them. Moving water doesn’t have the same effect as still water- and the ocean, even in the Calm Belts, is never still, Robin.”

“…Pfff. Okay. You were right about the clothing- very little of my body will be exposed to the water, aye?”

“Aye. We also have rebreathers, so- even if one of us does get stuck, the other can- hopefully- figure out a way to rescue them.”

“Right. Right. -Ah, here it is- let me just… there. Ready when you are- and it’s best to pull them on right when we go into the water, right?”

“Right. Okay- we need to go… that way.”

“Why that way?”

“Older art style the other way- I recognize it, it’s the Aulding Merrow Style, about six thousand years old. We’re going towards the Est Revival period, which was a mere three hundred years ago. In this place, the farther back in time you go, the nastier the traps become.”

“Ah. Sensible.”

We walk, and we walk. Robin, every now and again, pauses and admires the stones- a few times, I have to pull her away from standing directly on a pressure plate, but otherwise, I let her.

And then we come to a wall, and narrow clerestory slits high above us. Shit.
“Ah, that’s an outside wall- see the lack of windows? It’s all clerestories to let the light in-”

“Oh! Yes, I see what you mean- you did say this place is a Tomb Complex, didn’t you...”

“Robin, stop- shit!” I yelp, leaping into the air.

My wings flutter and flap, and then I hover, as the floor beneath Robin’s feet crumbles down a level- spikes! Gotta- got her!

“Got you!”

“Ow- rgh- guh, that’s a better- grip- oh my goodness, that’s a lot of corpses.”

The spikes are covered in the skeletal remains of fish, and people, and land animals- pigs, and so on. I wrap my arms a little tighter around Robin’s ribs, and carefully drift us over to a ledge on the outside facing wall. The ledge is crumbling, it’s underside made of- ah, drift sand over an air pocket.

Weird geological phenomenon- and that sound- water’s trickling into this area now, I can hear it.

"Shit, we need to get out of here.”

“Oh dear- um, there’s a tunnel- right there, up the wall- see it?”

“Yeah! It’s wide enough for us to go, one at a time; and it opens out somewhere I can feel with my Shadow, but- we have to hurry, Robin, the water’s coming fast-”

“-and with how high those water lines are- quite right, we need to move.”

I give Robin a boost onto the lip of the clerestory window, and then she turns her body and squirms into an opening in the wall. I fly up after her, and hover at the entrance, not much more than a slit in the pale grey stone. In length, it’s maybe the height of my knees; and I can see bits of Robin’s feet, as she crawls on her belly through the tunnel.

There’s water on the bottom of the spike pit now. I can’t see Robin’s feet anymore, but I can hear her grunting and squirming through the stone.

I follow her in. On my stomach, in the narrow place, I can see that there’s quartz crystals growing like coral on the ceiling. When the light from some far off place hits them just so, a spray of rainbows refracts down from above, like the promises of god.

Every time I take a breath, I can feel the quartz crystals digging into my back, and the unyielding floor pushing against my stomach. I swallow, to try and wet my mouth but it doesn’t help; and it’s not in my head, the tunnel is actually getting narrower as we go forwards. I hear Robin, ahead of me, let out a particularly foul curse as she gets stuck for a moment- but then she frees herself, and with a short bark of exertion- and then there is more light, in the tunnel.

Robin’s out; I’m a bit less than halfway through; and I can hear water lapping at the ledge over the spike pit.

Over to my left, I can see a tiny, narrow hole- and inside, I can feel a small… something. No trap; just a small rock, and I’d need to put eyes on it to see what kind. My Shadow only tells me so much. I reach my hand out as I pass, put my fingertips on the rock, and tease it out of that little hole, through tiny stalagmites and stalactites of sediment. I put the rock in between my tits, and wriggle on. The most important thing to know about Tomb Exploration- and eventually, Dungeon Crawling- is this. Don’t Give Up; and Take the Loot. Believe me- I’m Fae. I’d know if that rock was a grave good. It wasn’t.

I can feel water on my toes. Shit- three quarters of the way there, come on, Mab. Hustle those muscles! It’s only a trickle- but, oh no, the only way for this water to drain is out the clerestory windows which can’t handle it all so this must be- oh no, oh no, this is the overflow drain, hurry up, Mab.

It’s- it’s just a trickle, against my feet, but it’s starting to pool up around my toes, and I can only just keep moving forwards- no, it’s too tight. My shoulders are broader than Robin’s, it’s too tight, I have to- I wiggle back, back, back far enough my legs are in the water up to my ankles but I’ve got just enough room to put my hands in front of me like I’m diving and I shove myself forwards and I wiggle and squirm and then- my fingertips are just barely at the edge of the opening out and- I’m stuck.

The water is licking my toes again.

My ribs are stuck.

The water’s licking my toes and starting to creep up my feet.

My ribs are stuck.

Oh no.

Taffy has a pretty mouth. It’s warm, and sweet, and tastes a bit like anise. Stop- go back and block out the scene. Don’t skip the steps in between.

So, I have this box. Mab and Sanji refer to it as a pochade box- but I have a sketchbook, and I use the box to paint, so I’m not sure how it’s a sketch box… anyway, I can fit my paints and my turpentine and other stuff I don’t know much about- not with words, I mean, I know what it does to the paints I just don’t quite have the language for it all- all of it goes into that box, and my brushes, and my canvas, too. I have brushes from Amazon Lily, also- feathers, horse hair… all kinds of things.

Of all our crewmates, it’s Taffeta and Mab I like to sketch the most- and not their fronts, but their wings. Of the two of them, Taffy’s the one who’ll consent to sit long enough for me to sketch out her particulars; Mab says she won’t, so long as I refuse to paint her portrait. I’m not good enough to capture the moment she exists in, even a fraction of it, onto canvas- and I won’t be, maybe ever, so.

Taffy will not quite sit still for a pose- but she will let me sit behind her and fill my eyes with her wings. There’s a thin black line of dark hair that goes just about to the middle of her back, right between the base of each wing. Then, there’s the joint itself, covered in thick, strong muscle; the black hairs become broken up with white, and it’s hard to say for sure where the pattern begins but it does begin at the base.

It was actually very hard to make visual sense of Taffy’s wings, or even sketch them as more than just gestures and shapes, until I did some study on the actual anatomy of her wings. In terms of bones, a wing (if it has bones, and Mab’s don’t but more on those later) is laid out much the same way an arm or a leg is. Therefore, in terms of movement and how to consider it, the wing can be divided on a structural level into thirds; the first third is the portion that connects the body to the wing, and is made of one fairly thick, fairly strong bone, like the humerus; then, there is the ulna and radius, for the second third. This is the part of the limb that has definite curvature to it, and can be tricky to get right. Finally, the last third, the phalanges- fingers, toes, thumbs, or in the case of Taffy’s wings, claws. Effectively speaking, Taffy has two sets of hands; she can write with either hand, or either set of wing-claws, among other things.

Going up a layer is the muscles- and just like legs, there’s a cone-shaped range of movement the wing can undertake, the smallest movements being at the main joint, and the largest being at the phalangeal tips. The middle third of her wing actually only moves in specific ways- that is, the muscles only pull on one axis of direction. It’s the joint and phalangeal muscles that are responsible for the great complexities of shape her wings can undertake- not to mention the more surface, epidermoid muscles that control her feathers.

Feathers are funny- just like the underlying structure, the feathers of a wing can be subdivided into three distinct layers. Indeed, for the purposes of art, it’s often better to do so; the process of creating a still image that bears the seeming of a living wing is quite complicated, so properly simplifying the subject is of paramount importance. However, unlike the structural form of the wing, which runs vertically in sections, the feathers are separated into horizontal thirds; thus, if I’m not careful, Taffy’s wings can come out in my sketches as curious grid forms that are almost impossible to understand.

I had to learn a lot of things, to get to the point of considering how to approach the pattern of Taffy’s feathers; mostly, I had to learn to not press so hard with my sketching pencils, and not leave such dark marks where I didn’t need them. I had to learn to move faster, too; glance between my working surface and my subject, flick flick flick so that my eyes could see both at once.

I learned more than just what her wings look like. I’ve felt them, too- she doesn’t ask for me to do it, but I’ve noticed that she likes it if I go slow- sorry, block it out, sorry.

It’s important that my hands are very clean, when I touch Taffy’s wings. They have to be clean of all residues; I have to have clean nails, and to have cleaned under my nails, and to have dried my skin of all extra oils and suchlike. She doesn’t like her scapular, marginal coverts, or alulal feathers being touched outside of bathing; those are the feathers that touch the wind first, and it’s a bit of a process to get them all lying flat after they’ve been mussed. Taffy gets too much sensation from her primary and secondary feathers to like anything more than a grazing touch along them.

We both like it when I dig my fingers into her wings; thus, the only place I can really do that is in her coverts. It’s a stripe of feathers between the leading and trailing edge of her wing, and- for her, at least- it feels very nice to have that area scritched, stroked, and kneaded.

Flat on her back, shirtless, no brassiere; her nipples are a dusty pink color, like a white-pink rose. When I stroke just so, the muscles of her chest ripple and flex with her gasps; when I smooth her feathers back down, her upper body goes limp.

I’m in my panties, and so is she, and we’re somewhere on the Sunny- a little cranny only the two of us really want to bother with reaching, just the light of a Dial to see by and the scent of desire almost cloying in its intensity in the tight warm space between two bulkheads. Her clothing is all folded up neat under her head, and mine is beneath her body, protecting her from cold. When I bow down and take another sweet kiss from her mouth, it’s warm and hot and tastes like anise-flavored mouth.

Her skin smells like skin and sweat and musk, at her armpits and between her legs, and when I mouth gently between her legs the sound that comes out of her makes gooseflesh dance over my skin. On the posterior side- back side- of her wings, it’s just gyrfalcon coloring, but on the anterior-front side- it’s not. It’s different. Bright red, eye-shaped; like trails of blood, colored feathers all along that stripe of just right on her wings, and when I kiss the center red wet beading point the expression on Taffy’s face is- shy, longing, intensity and giddy relief.

Somewhere between slippery kisses and giggling we come together, me inside her and her soft gasps and the chalky dusty smell of dry feathers and- warm- and- tight- and- bright-

Eventually, I can’t stand sitting in the mess anymore. I prepared a bucket just for this before hand; and installed a hook here, too, and now- I carefully clean myself, and then I wipe the slimy whiteness leaking from Taffy’s warmest parts, and then- I realize her bright yellow eyes are staring at me, hovering over the reddest blush.

She always gets so embarrassed when I do things like finger her, or give her oral pleasure, or even tell her what I like about her body; it’s cute as hell, but… I dunno. I mean, she hasn’t- no, breathe, ask her about it, Gurry.

“Um.”

“R-rr?”

“I- when I do this for you, do you… do you like it? When I do stuff like this for you?” I say, giving an extra firm rub against her just to be sure she knows what I mean and that she’s definitely clean.

“I-I, ah, mhm.” she squeaks, blushing and blinking then shuddering in pleasure as I rub little circles into her thighs.

“Okay. Um-”

“Gurry?”

“Y-yes, Taffy?”

“I like you. And I like what you do to me, and for me, and- if ever you doubt you’re liked, that you’re… loved- please, I… I will tell you that I love you, until you believe me, until you stop…”
doubting. M-maybe that day will never come but… that doesn’t mean I can’t just… keep telling you. It’s okay, Gurry. I love you- it’s okay, come here-” says Taffy.

She sits up, her warm arms wrapping around me and- oh, I’m- I’m crying. We hold each other, and I- cry. Is it weird to feel sad and happy, because things are so much better now- but they weren’t bad before, either, they just… love is not enough on it’s own. Love doesn’t mean shit if there’s no respect, too.

I loved and respected my ex-wife. She only loved me.

It’s not enough- GAH!

"Shit, that- that was Surume, where are my panties fuck it- pants-”

"Here, I’ll fix your shirt and vest-”

"Thank you, brassiere is- there we go, ungh- fucking eye-hooks-”

"Sleeve- sleeve- fix your hair I’ve got the buttons-”

"Thank you-”

"Love you-”

"Love you too-”

"Here’s Kusanagi and Banana-”

"Marzipan, let go of Banana- thank you-”

And then she’s gone, off to see what the problem is. I clean up, dress myself, and follow her out, Marzipan around my neck, pochade box over one shoulder and my Bouquets at my hips. I pause, and grab a little taffin of my special ‘Sproutella’ mixed poisons- each one is a cartridge, and… it’s a complicated combination of botany, poisons, mechanical know how, and weapons, but I load my war fans and every wound I put on a man bleeds flower petals. Leave it untreated long enough, and only plants remain.

Of the two of us, Taffy really is the more traditionally minded. Urgh- that was a lurch like we’re falling, I need to get out there-

Fishman Island is surrounded by an enormous bubble, and it’s aglow with the lights of thousands- millions of people, I need to take a pictogram- er, photograph- and- GATCHA! Oh that’s going to be an amazing painting-

Oh no.

Surume just ran off- some guy, fishman guy is talking some shit- like hell we’ll join some other crew!
“Nah, the future King of the Pirates can’t join someone else’s crew. FRANKY DO THE THING!”

“AYE, CAPTAIN, DOIN’ THE THING! COUP DE BUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUUURST-!”

And then we blast forwards towards Fishman Island, hurtling like nothing I’ve ever felt before I see out of the corner of my eye Robin and Mab falling from the Crow’s Nest and Mab getting hit in the head with a rock and then- we reach the island’s bubble and our ship-bubble bursts and-

Everything-

Goes-

Strange-

And then I’m in a corn crib. Wait, this is seaweed- no, it’s corn. Cornweed?

Fuck, what the hell just happened?
So my ribs are stuck and have been for a while and I can only just reach back and pull my breathing rig up over my nose and now my face is covered with water but I can still breathe and Robin is still panicky but- yes!

The force of the water coming past my body might be just the thing I need! If I exhale with everything I have- dig my fingertips into the stone and pull-

Just-

A little-

More-

And with a shocking suddenness, I’ve got just enough room to pull myself the rest of the way out. I squirm my way out of a square hole, and flop a little bonelessly into a panicky Robin’s arms; she carefully walks us over to a higher level of a… terrace fountain basin, I think, and the water soon comes down in a trickling stream, then a lovely waterfall. Missed it by that much.

I wrap my arms around Robin, and hold her while she shakes. Behind us, the water soon fills the basin from the overflow point, and flows down into another basin; again, again, again, until an entire water garden made of tiles and gold floats under ankle deep water. The water flows out of the room in hidden drains, and through some magic of plumbing, comes out again in faint sprays and through whistling pipes shaped a bit like birds- and suddenly, I realize what new danger we’re in.

“Robin, we need to keep moving-”

“But- Mab, it’s so peaceful here, surely we can take a rest-”

“No, Robin- Robin, stay awake-”

Shit, it’s getting to her- maybe if I- sorry about this, Robin. It needs to throb- ah, there’s my lighter, let me just-

As the combination of music, humidity, heat, and sedative herbal miasma swirls around us both, I flick my lighter until it catches with a bright sharp blue flame and shove Robin’s sleeve up and press it’s heat against the bare skin of Robin’s arm until I hear it sizzle and- shit, she’s not reacting, gotta- I smack her burn with the flat of my hand so hard my own hand stings and a whole piece of skin pulls away with my hand and she shrieks, then gasps and shudders.
“Ow- ow, fucking- wha- what the, Mab, what the hell??”

“This is an old, old Fairy trap, Robin; you’d have fallen asleep and not woken for anything if I hadn’t done something. Mother used these all the time, in Thuletima, to keep us in line.”

“Ah. Which explains why you know how to escape this kind of trap? Nnggh-”

“Yeah. There might be more dangers in this room but I doubt it- now that you’ve got an anchor, we can take a short rest if you need. At the very least, we can put something on that burn-”

“No, I’m alright- what is that?”

“Where?”

“That- cage? On the balcony-”

“I see the cage you mean, but- oh, what the hell-”

It’s a long hank of blue colored… something. I look at Robin, who looks back at me and nods; then, I fly up and over to the balcony, and- careful of those pressure plates in the walls, but-

It’s a child? They aren’t dead- but they are a bit grimy, and there are tear tracks on their face, and- they’re too short to get out of the cage area, and they tried so hard, there’s blood under their broken fingernails- I see.

There’s no way to know for sure what happened without asking, Mab.

-there’s a flue for a trap-door system above them, which… is the only available exit to this room, because those are wolvarks, shit shit shit-

I Blink back to Robin, wrap my arms around her, and Blink us into the cage with the sleeping child-right as the wolvak’s jaws crash over where her swaying body was standing. Robin jerks and wheezes when she sees that happen; I sigh.

“We need to go up.”

“-I expect you’re quite right. What about- a child? Here!?!”

“I’m taking them with us-”

“No, best if I carry them; your wings and top speed are our best assets, right now.”

“A-alright. Here, let’s get them tied fast to you-”

And so I take my paracord and carefully secure the sleeping child to Robin. The high water mark in this room is chest high on us, and nearly the entire cage area- if we hadn’t gotten here, the child would have been eaten alive.

When I’m done securing the child, Robin is listing sleepily to one side. I slap her sharply across the face, which snaps her out of it and puts a flare of irritation and gratitude in her eyes. I nod, grimly, and cup my hands for her to climb up into the flume. The child, being secured to her chest, shouldn’t be too much of a bother- and I’m right, as Robin starts climbing the flume, using her shoulders to push herself higher and her Devil Fruit to give herself a hand.

“Okay- I can only see the shape of the flume with my Shadow, not the details. Anything of note?”

“I passed a side-pipe on my way up, too small for either of us to fit but just large enough for this child to slide through if they were unconscious, and there’s a bit of their hair caught on a sharp edge of it... A-and there’s a grate, up at the top; it looks to be held shut with some kind of locking mechanism, but I can’t make heads or tails of it-”

“Alright, then I’m coming up. Standby.”

“Aye.”

I hover as the water begins to lap at my toes, keeping careful watch of where the wolvarks are, and then I Blink up above Robin, still hovering. I get a firm grip on the walls, and examine the mechanism- oh! So that’s what that rock is for! I take it out, to confirm my suspicions- and I knew it felt weird!

It’s not stone at all, but a clay talisman - and, considering where I found it- this is great! I hold the talisman up to the mechanism, which flares for just a second with a rainbow light, and then the entire locking mechanism coils back and away. I push up on the grate, and it opens wide, and I wedge it open with my spear- catch a glimpse of a courtyard, I know exactly what kind of place we are now-

And then I help Robin and the child on her chest up, and out of the drain-pipe. I take back my spear and close the grate again, and listen to it lock again. I take another look around- rather than some artistic wonder, I’m greeted with plain stone walls, an awkwardly shaped courtyard with a limpid blue fountain shoved into the narrow corner. A bench rail- just a railing at just about the right height for sitting on- is against both the awkward walls, and doors with numerical runes on them wrap all around us.

“This is different.”

“This is a maintenance node; my sister Yuki- you know, the Tomb Raider- told me about these. In really big tomb complexes, the various traps and dangers require maintenance by... there’s usually a family of grave diggers kept on retainer by the family of the tomb, and it’s their job to maintain the death traps and so on.”

“I see. So- where were we?”

“We were in- I think- the Career’s Training Area, which is where the young members of the grave digger family would train-”

“-in the family business, I see. Well, that does explain some of the dimensions of those tombs- and I remember you saying once that the tombs of children are always the most viciously protected-”

“Yeah. However- this area has been abandoned for a long time. Look around- what don’t you see?”
“...Footprints, garbage, and the smell is all... humid concrete, nothing else.”

“This is a hub area, meant for fairly steady traffic- a bit like a break room. But... I think we might be the only people who’ve been here in a good four hundred years- that’s what it feels like to me.”

“Why is that, d’you suppose?”

“Mm. At a guess? This particular branch of the Tomb-family died out, or there aren’t enough of the Grave Digging family left to care for it properly- so, rather than waste resources, they just... turned all the defenses on high, and there’s always a setting that requires the least amount of checking, and then they sealed it off.”

“Mm. I suppose this is a good place to rest, then?”

“Yeah- the water in that fountain should be potable, but let me check, first- and that child needs to be woken up and cared for, and your burn- yeah, we’ll rest here for a while.”

“Sounds good to me- ow! Um- can you help me untie this-?”

“Of course, sorry- let me just-”

There are two main paths in my style. The whole thing is called Asura, named for... Ah, might as well, while Nami’s still asleep in the haystack. We’re safe enough in this barn, and- as the only other crewmates here are Gurry and Taffy, who are examining the barn for anything of use and scouting, respectively- it’s best if I don’t go anywhere, but also don’t fall asleep.

Taffy says that Nami’s fine, just resting- not unconscious, but asleep. And I thought I was the heavy sleeper in our relationship...

Fucking hell, I’m worried about her.

Don’t think about it, Zoro.

Long ago, so long that no one who remembers it is still alive to do the telling, there was a great war between the Asuras and the Devatas. The Devatas were routed in the war, and so went to Lord Brahma to seek his help.

Brahma told them to churn the ocean; and if they did, they would be able to obtain Amrit, which would make them immortal and all powerful. After consuming Amrit, they would be able to defeat the Asuras which they were warring with.

When this story is told to children, they are told simply that the Asuras were warring with the Devatas; but this is not true.

All the gods of the Kaamadhaatu (of which this World is a part) are subject to the passions; and the Asuras, above all others, must bow to their passionate whims: especially the passions of Wrath, Pride, Envy, Insincerity, Falseness, Boasting, and Belicosity. Because of their inherent passion, rebirth as an Asura is considered by some to be one of the four unhappy births, together with rebirth as an animal, a preta, or a being in Naraka (sometimes called the Sixteen Hells).
The state of an Asura can be described as the state of a human being obsessed with ego, force and violence; one who is always looking for an excuse to get into a fight; one who is always angry with everyone, and cannot maintain a calm disposition or solve their problems peacefully. In our crew’s Monster Quartet, each of us has a specific moment where we become like an Asura- Luffy, if someone challenges his Dream. Sanji, if someone hurts a female. Mab, if someone hurts a child.

As for me- if someone proclaims themselves a sword fighter, I can’t stop myself from challenging them. From… hurting them. Knowing that, it’s not surprising that Taffeta flatly refuses to answer to the title of ‘Sword Fighter’; she doesn’t want to fight me seriously, and honestly, I don’t want to fight her; the two of us are too good at using our swords to ever fight as anything other than seriously.

One may go to the realm of the Asura because in human form they had good intentions, but committed bad actions such as harming others.

Concerning Asuras, the Great Calm-Observation by Zhiyi says: ‘Always desiring to be superior to others, having no patience for inferiors and belittling strangers; like a hawk, flying high above and looking down on others, and yet outwardly displaying justice, worship, wisdom, and faith- this is raising up the lowest order of good and walking the way of the Asura.’

Asura are said to experience a much more pleasurable life than simple humans, but in turn are plagued by envy for the devas, whom they can see just as animals perceive humans. However, in certain inferior or opposing realms- the translations from past to present aren’t entirely clear- the Asura are malevolent (like the corruptor, Mara) and can be referred to as demons. These are called Rakshasas.

In terms of power, Asuras rank above humans but below most of the other deities. The leaders of the Asura are called Asurendra; there are several Asura-lords, as the Asura are broken into different tribes, much like humans are. The principal leaders are Vemacitrin, Rāhu, and Pahārāda.

The Asuras formerly lived in the Trāyastriṃśa on the peak of Sumeru with the other gods of that place. When Śakra became the ruler of that world, the Asuras celebrated by drinking a lot of Gandapāna wine, a liquor so strong that Śakra forbade the other gods to drink it. Weakened by their drunkenness, the Asuras could not resist when Śakra had the whole lot of them thrown over the edge of Trāyastriṃśa into what would become the Asura-world at the base of Sumeru. A tree grows there called Cittapātali; when the Asuras saw it blossom, they saw that it was different from the Pāricchattaka tree which had grown in their old home, and they knew that they were dispossessed. They now meditated on war.

In armor and weapons, they climbed up the steep slopes of Sumeru like ants. Śakra set out to meet them, but was forced to retreat because of their numbers. Passing through the forest where the garudas live on his flying chariot, Śakra saw that his passage was destroying the nests of the garuḍas and ordered his charioteer Mātali to turn back. When the pursuing Asuras saw Śakra turn about, they felt certain that he must be coming back with an even larger army, and they fled, ceding all the ground they had gained.

Despite their many wars, there was eventually a partial concord between the Trāyastriṃśa gods and the Asuras. This came about because Śakra fell in love with Sujā, daughter of the Asura chief Vemacitrin. Vemacitrin had given Sujā the right to choose her own husband at an assembly of the Asuras, and she chose Śakra, who had attended disguised as an aged Asura. Vemacitrin thus became Śakra’s father-in-law.
But this story is about how Rāhu and Ketu came to be. So, I shall begin again; with the truth, this time.

Long ago, so long that no one who remembers it is still alive to do the telling, there was a great war between the Rakshasas and the Devatas. The Devatas were routed in the war, and so went to Lord Brahma to seek his help.

Brahma told them to churn the ocean; and if they did, they would be able to obtain Amrit, which would make them immortal and all powerful. After consuming Amrit, they would be able to defeat the Rakshasas which they were warring with.

Churning the ocean was a very big job, and so the Devatas sought the help of the Asuras. The King of Serpents, Vasuki, was to become the rope; while a hill named Mandrachal offered to become the pivot. Lord Vishnu, in the form of a tortoise, became the base and the churning began.

The Devatas held the tail of Vasuki and the Asuras held the head. Various things came out, during this churning of the ocean. There was a pot of Vish, which created havoc in all three worlds; but Lord Shiva drank the poison and saved the world. He did not let the poison go beyond his neck, which became blue in color- thus, the Blue Neck Tortoise came to be, and Lord Shiva’s body turned blue from the neck down forever more.

At last, Dhavantari came out of the churning ocean- or was born from it, awkward translations strike again- with a pot of Amrit. Immediately, there was a mad scramble for it among the Devatas and Asuras. Seeing this, Lord Vishnu took the form of Mohini, a very beautiful dancer, and offered her services in distributing the Amrit equally to both the Asuras and the Devatas.

Mohini made the two groups sit in two different rows, but gave the Amrit to the Devatas only. Towards the end, when almost all the Amrit was gone, one of the Asuras saw through Mohini’s trick.

He went, and sat among the Devatas- for in those days, the Devatas and the Asuras looked quite alike- and drank the Amrit. However, Chandra and Surya, the nine and one who kept watch over all, knew him in an instant, and informed Mohini of who she had given the Amrit to.

Lord Vishnu took his real form then, and let out the Sudarshan Chakra at the Asura. The Asura’s neck was separated from their body, but he did not die- he could not, as he had drunk the Amrit.

His head was called Rahu, and his torso, Ketu. While it would have been fair if the Asura who was Two had tried to have revenge on Lord Vishnu, who cut them into their two pieces, Rahu and Ketu did not. Instead, they sought revenge on Chandra and Surya, who had betrayed their presence to Lord Vishnu as Mohini.

Thus, every time there is an eclipse, it is Rahu swallowing one or all of Chandra’s bodies; and when Ketu swallows Surya, it is the sun that is hidden behind shadow. However, because Rahu and Ketu are only halves of one whole, they cannot keep Chandra or Surya imprisoned for long; thus, the moons and sun return.

My sword style can thus be split into two different kinds of movesets; Asura style, for defense, and Rakshasa style, for offence.
The Asura style is better for working with my crewmates, defending a set point, and is the honorable side of Santoryu. Rakshasa style is what I developed while I was teaching Taffy. Taffy is a Ninja, before she’s anything else; and while no one on our crew is weak, Taffy’s not at her strongest in a direct conflict.

I am; Luffy is; Sanji is; Mab is, although she does just as well outside of physical conflict; Nami, Usopp, Robin, Taffy, and Gurry? Are not. While they can comport themselves admirably in the field of battle, their best use is as knives in the dark. You can fight an assassin as you would an honorable warrior- but they cheat, and have no problem cheating.

Taffy has thrown dirt in my eyes, tripped me, kicked and punched me in the groin, set traps, run away, and all kinds of other things; I have to think very quickly and carefully to get her cornered, and when I have her cornered, she fights like a wild thing. Sparring with Taffy is hard, but rewarding; once she got her own style pinned down, and the both of us became comfortable with the realization that she would never be the kind of sword fighter I am (and her older brother, Mihawk, is), it became very clear that no one else on the crew could challenge me in quite the same way.

I actually spar against everyone.

About once a month or so, there’s a round-robin tournament of sparring, with the winner getting either a bye on one of the chores we all hate- and it depends on the season for which one- or a choice of what to have at Tea the next day (excepting birthdays, which are rare enough that we all forget about that rule until it’s happened again).

Each of my crewmates has taught me something different of battle, fighting, and war.

Luffy has taught me about determination. More often than not, when Luffy decides to join the Round Robin, he wins- not because he’s stronger or faster, but because he won’t give up, not ever.

Sanji has taught me about flexibility. If Sanji doesn’t want to be hit, he will not be hit- his body will become fluid, and he’ll bend and twist away from every obstacle and attack on his person.

Mab has taught me about speed. Of us all, Mab thinks, sees, and moves the fastest; the reason she calls her Shadow-teleport ‘Blink’ is because if you blink, you will miss her movements- similarly, if you blink at the wrong time during a spar, you’ll see her standing in front of you, and then you’ll see her punching you in the gut, and whatever in between movements she used existed in the space of your closed eyes.

Usopp has taught me about strategy. When Usopp wins the Round Robin, it’s not because of who he fought- it’s because, somehow, he’s arranged the bracket so that, whoever he’s fought has had to fight everyone else- possibly several times- before they ever get to him.

Nami has taught me about strength. She’s not to participate in the physical fighting now, and all of her sparring is light- even so, if you try to touch Nami when she doesn’t want to be touched, you take your life into your own hands.

Robin has taught me about subtlety. I can’t count the number of times Robin has beaten me on a technicality; usually, Robin wins by maneuvering her opponent into a ring-out.

Chopper has taught me precision. Being a doctor, he not only knows how to put someone back together- he knows the fastest way to take someone apart. It only takes three tags from him, and then you can’t feel anything below a certain part on your body. It wears off, for us, but- Chopper is dangerous.

Franky has taught me style. Occasionally, I lose to Franky- not because he’s stronger than me, but because I’m struck by the sheer… coolness, of what he’s doing. Or the weirdness- and then his attack puts me out of the ring.

Brook has taught me about spirit. It’s not enough to know your movements in your head and your body; the attitude you use to fight with is important too.

Mark has taught me about ferocity. No one and nothing is as fierce and relentless as Mark during sparring; no one. Maybe the ocean, but the Sea doesn’t play around, and Mark does.

Bryony has taught me about movement. Some of Bryony’s moves look deceptively gentle; but if you get even lightly tapped by her, you will feel that hit in your bones for days. The best way to fight Bryony is to not get hit at all.

Gurry has taught me about observation. Where Bry’s movements always look purposeful and forthright, Gurry’s… they don’t. He can look like he’s fidgeting when he’s actually readying- well, he uses poisons, but for sparring it’s colored dyes- with itching powder, if it’s a hard contact spar. I learned to watch very carefully, if I want to be ready for whatever Gurry’s about to do.

Finally, Taffy. My first student, the reason I started mastering Santoryu at all…

Taffy taught me about honor. It’s funny- before I taught her, I had always assumed that honor was in how you did something. When I started training Taffy, I realized that it wasn’t as simple as that… how to explain this…

I know.

Sanji talks about hospitality, sometimes- likens it to the feeling of a warm air in a room that looks cold, or a cold air in a room that looks warm. It’s the difference between being welcomed or not. It’s not a tangible difference- but it is there.

Honor is like that. For Taffy, dishonor wouldn’t come from stabbing someone in the back- not if it was to protect her crewmates, or to get her job done. Similarly, dishonor has nothing to do with winning a fight- in a fight, if you’re fighting fair, you’re on your last ropes.

Thinking about it now- gah, I don’t remember what I was thinking. The baby just kicked against my side, and I got distracted- oh, there they go again. Fuck, Nami’s so beautiful like this, I want-gnnngh. Think unsexy thoughts, Zoro, think unsexy thoughts- aha! Our Crew layout!

Right now we have the Command and Core Crew- Luffy, Sanji, Nami, me, Usopp, and Mab; we have the Squints, Usopp, Franky, Gurry, Mab, Nami, and Bryony. We have the Sneaks, Robin, Taffy, Mark, Gurry, Nami, and Brook. And we have the Medics, which is really just Chopper. He gets support from Taffy, Gurry, and Mab- but he needs his own clique.

Gurry will probably always be a squint, which isn’t bad- research and development are important. But Chopper could probably use the help of someone who either has a completely different focus in medicine, or chose a different path from his focus of medicine.
Mab and Taffy are both nurses and midwives— but their other duties take them far from the medical world.

Of us all, Chopper gets left alone with his own company a lot— he’s never complained, but… I know now, that I’ve had people around me that are willing to talk about the things I love the most… It’s not good, being unable to share a part of yourself with your friends because you know they won’t understand, and with how much you’ll have to explain to them so they do understand, it’s just not worth it. Chopper needs nurses who can help him, and maybe a junior doctor he can teach or work with. I’m not entirely sure.

But, with how tired he gets after the round robins, because we don’t really hold back… he needs help, even if he never says it out loud.

I’ll talk to Luffy about it; his snail’s registering with mine, and it’s got that little blink that says the other end is conscious. Yeah, I’ll just call him— who knows, with his luck he’s probably met someone who’d fit the bill.

When I open my eyes, it’s to see my medical backpack hanging from a hook on the wall. I roll onto my back, and sit up. I’m on a large- bed? I think? Luffy, Sanji, and Usopp are here too... The room smells very strongly of brine, but also of- ah, mermaid, like Keimi. There’s a low wall, or is it a couch? An oven? Looks like an oven.

There’s a person lying on it- no, lounging, lounging on it- and they- she’s got a broom looking thing, or is it a fish? She keeps glancing at me- what the hell’s going on?

“Ey! You’re awake, deer-guy!” says the girl on the… that’s a warming oven!

“Oh- um- yeah, hi. Who are you?”

“Oh, sorry- Call me G, everyone does. You and those three—” said G, gesturing at- Luffy, Sanji, and Usopp, okay; where’s the rest of the crew- “nearly drowned when the channel current washed through. Luckily, me an’ some of Kei’s girls picked you up. You’re in the dorm of the International Post Office, in the Coral Heights area of Mermaid Cove, which is a cliff-side area under Fishman Island. It’s about- eh, early afternoon? Not quite sunset yet, but close; you’ve been asleep for about two hours. I changed you and those three’s clothing, and stuck it in the dryer vent- except for Horn Guy’s suit, that got salad-spun and hung to air out. Um- there should be warm seaweed soup soon—yeah, there’s Kei, and the Medaka Five."

“Hey Nurse G- hey, Chopper! You’re awake!”

“Hey Keimi! Nice to see you again; glad you’re okay, after everything."

“Haha, yeah- ah, Nursie, two incoming for you-”

“Um, Keimi, is that soup for us?”
“Haha, yeah, made it myself-”

“Um. Isn’t it supposed to be warm?”

“Wha- FUCK-!”

“-Fuckin’ hell, I told those bastards not to push it so hard- M5, front an’ center!”

“Front and center.”

“Front and center!”

“Not front and center.”

“Might be front and center.”

“So what if I’m front and center?”

“Girls, pay attention- this is your final exam. When the two injured come in, you’re to attend to the second patient. Then, when you’re done, you’re to check over Chopper, who just woke up and-”

“Chopper’s a Doctor-”

“Really Kei?”

“Yep, one of the best in the World-” says Keimi, before turning back to her pot of seaweed soup that’s steadily heating on the stove.

“Aw, shaddup~!” I yelp, blushing.

“Even better! M5- after you attend your first patient, you are to check Doctor Chopper over for any remaining signs of near-drowning. You know the procedures; and, even though he’s a doctor, it’s your job to care for him right now, not his.”

“Yes Teacher Nursie G.”

“Yes Teacher Nursie G!”

“No Teacher Nursie G.”

“Maybe Teacher Nursie G.”

“So what if I do, Teacher Nursie G?”

“Exactly what I like to hear- YOU BASTARDS BETTER GET IN HERE, HIDING YOUR INJURIES JUST MEANS I USE THE TRIPLE STRENGTH STINGING WOUND CLEANSER-”

A pair of mermen shove each other out of the way, trying to be the first into the- I guess nurse’s office. Huh. They’re covered in lacerations, hematomas, and puncture wounds- what the hell happened?

“What the hell happened, idiot boys?”
“We were doin’ the run out through the Boondocks—”

“-and those assholes from the Gyojo came after us again-”

“-you know, the New Generation-”

“-sayin’ shit about not being real mermen-”

“-we’re more manly than they’ll ever be-”

“-like treating people in Goblin City like people isn’t something real mermen actually do-”

“-like they don’t have people they want to send letters to-”

“-like their money isn’t as good-”

“Boys.”

“Sorry, Nurse G.” “Sorry, Nurse G.”

“Well?”

“So, a’cuz a what happened last time-”

“-we got E an’ F to help us out-”

“-and instead of getting our mail bags back from them-”

“-we drew the attention of the Gyojo Scaleslimes-”

“-and told the girls to come here. They ain’t been by yet?”

Nurse G’s eyes narrow- she looks sharp at Keimi, who shakes her head no, then at the M-Five, who also shake their heads.

“So. You boys made the best of a bad situation; but you still left your mail-bags with my baby sisters, who- while scrappy and tough as riptides- are also obviously from… there, are half the size of the current crop of average shodan from the Gyojo, and with bags just on the edge of being too heavy for them to lift. Have I got that right?”

“Yes.” “Yep.”

“Outstanding.”

“Nurse G, you know we don’t care-”

“-we’re not country bumpkins from the Seaweed Glades, so why would we care-”

“-about you and your sisters bein’.”

“-that’s quite enough. I’d call this… a double strength stinging wound cleanser. Not bad, boys, not bad at all; do better, next time.”
“Easy for you to say- gnngh!”

“-your skin rips aren’t bubbling like- yaaagh!”

“Hmph. You’re fine, Red; keep those punches in your tail-fin sealed with eggskin, and keep out of any real fights until at least your bruises and small cuts have gone. I also don’t like the way your scales feel- have you been sleeping right lately, or is it still…?”

“It’s still. I tried what you recommended, but- it worked for a while, then-”

“Wrapped and done. Keep the ones on your stomach covered as best you can-”

“-and eat lots of dark greens to replenish your blood!”

“It’s okay to go fluming until your bandaging comes off-”

“-maybe go fluming after your bandaging comes off-”

“We can’t fill your prescriptions if you don’t have your ID with you, you know?”

“Yeah, I got it- next time, really, I’ll-”

“No.”

“No!”

“Yes.”

“Hm.”

“No? We’re doing this now, while we’ve got you here- the chart’s on the wall by the kitchen, look at it carefully and tell us what you see, starting with Row One.”

“…”

“Yellow, we only do this because we care about you and want you to be able to see-”

“-because we love you and want you to be able to see clearly!”

“We want you to see like you do now.”

“Maybe we want you to see better.”

“Eye exams aren’t scary, right?”

“Heh. You Five really have become good nurses- right, um, Row One-”

“Red, did you do it, and then you felt better, and then you stopped?”

“...yes?”

“Red, you have to do your meditation every day, twice a day, for the rest of your life. That’s the only thing we’ve found that helps your insomnia; if you don’t, I’ll recommend Kei bench you, and I know you don’t want that.”

“...Fine, I'll do my meditation-”

Nurse G is a very good nurse, but… she seems… hm. Ah, Captain, Usopp, and Sanji are awake- and here come the M-Five, better-

“Ah, Nurses M-Five; I feel fine, but my crewmates have woken too-”

“We’ll handle it.”

“We’re professionals!”

“We’re not good nurses.”

“Maybe we’re great nurses.”

“Can you hold your back real straight while I listen to your chest, Doctor?”

“Ah, of course-”

And then I’m being swarmed by Guppy-sized Mermaid Nurses. They check my blood pressure, my heart rate, the sounds of my lungs; they check my eyes, and in my ears, and ask if my limbs have any aches or pains to them, to which I replied no. Anything important happen health wise lately? I started budding my horns, I guess- antlers soon! I’ll have a whole new set of tips this year, I’m excited.

Ow, leg cramp. And my fingers feel tingly- I’m forgetting something important, fuck-

“Sorry, say that again?”

“Are the lumps on your head normal?”

“Are your head lumps tumors!?!?”

“They’re simple warts.”

“Maybe they’re bruises.”

“Are the lumps on your head tumors?”

“No, those lumps aren’t tumors, those are my antlers- they drop each year, and then I grow new ones-”

“That must take a lot of calcium.”

“That’s really calcium intensive!”

“You don’t want a glass of milk.”
“Maybe you need a fortified calcium supplement.”

“I’ll write you a prescription, which you can fill at any conbini World-wide- it’s not a rare problem coming out of Winter, to be hypocalcemic, especially if you’re dropping a large bone from your body once a year. This is for a combination Calcium and Vitamin D supplement, to be taken once daily- which should suit you fine?”

“Shit, I knew I forgot something- yeah, that’d be great. Thank you.”

Then, after a brief huddle, they checked over my hooves, and finally declared me fighting fit- except for the calcium deficiency, which one of the M-Five treat immediately with a tall glass of fortified whole milk- mare’s milk, huh; oh, very sweet. I drink the whole thing under their watchful eyes, and shoot them a thumbs up.

After another careful look-over, they let me get off the bed; then they checked over Captain, Usopp, and Sanji. It’s strange- two years ago I would have said that putting Sanji in the same room as a bunch of tiny, beautiful mermaid women who wanted to take care of him would be a surefire way of making him bleed all his blood out through his nose. Now?

Mostly, he complements their beauty, does what they ask of him, answers their questions- and goes right back to worrying about Mab. Everyone’s fine- but everyone isn’t here. So I don’t know if that’s true or not.

Sanji really loves Mab; it’s not new, or anything, just… wow, he’s changed a lot.

“Well. That’s the M5 trained; and considering what your contract entails… I’m sorry, G. I’ve stretched it as much as I can without breaking contract- and we’ve talked about this, too. You’re a great Nurse, and you fly really fast- and you can’t work here, not while you’re still… I know this is one of the only jobs that you can get that aren’t on your back- believe me, I get it. But… at least in this city, everyone who sees you move at top speed knows in a hot second exactly where you come from; and then they don’t treat you like they should. What with us being so new- in five years, we could hire you no problem- but that doesn’t help you now. You deserve better than that- and while I’m working to change it, just like Captain… that doesn’t help you now. I’m- I’m sorry.”

“What’m I supposed to do, Kei? You’re an only child- and all of your cousins are older than you. I’m the only person in my family who isn’t sick or dying or doesn’t care, and… this was kinda my last option before… that.”

“G…”

“I mean. I’m not joining the New Fishman Pirates, Hody Jones is-”

“ -urgh- ”

“-exactly. But… that’s also the only group I know of that would take a nurse, and her sisters, too. I can’t join your crew, either, I’m…”

“…Not suited to our crew, I know; not your sisters, either. Believe me, not everyone is; I understand. Still, there has to be something…”
“Hey Zoro; what’s the haps?”

“Captain! Me, Nami, Gurry, and Taffy are in a barn somewhere- and we picked up a girl who swears up and down she’s a member of our crew, or about to be, she’s got that thing Mab has sometimes—”

“Future vision?”

“Yep. Anyway, I think it’s the royal barn we’re in, otherwise the fineness of the horse-tack makes no sense at all- ah shit, guards—”

“Roronoa Zoro-?”

“Yeah-?”

“--....--”

“....----.....-----.....”

“---...-----”

“Oh, okay, let me tell my Captain.”

“Zoro?”

“Captain, we’re being invited to a feast at the Royal Palace; apparently we saved Princess Shirahoshi’s pet shark or something? Anyway, that’s where we are- oh, and, we need at least one nurse.”

“Eh?”

“Think about it- we have a guy who researches drugs like Chopper does, and we have a pair of midwives and nurses; but none of those people’s primary job is just medicine. Chopper’s a great doctor, but he’s only one man.”

“Hmm… he does get really tired after th’round robins…”

“Mm. Anyway, see you when you get to the Palace; Nami’s hungry again and Gurry wants to paint Taffy in the palace rock garden- I guess they’re calling it that, now?”

“Shishishishishi! Look after them, Zoro.”

“Of course, Captain.”

GATCHA!

Luffy looks over at me. I look at him. Luffy glances at Nurse G, then back at me. I nod; she’d be a good fit, I think- we only need to know what her Dream is.
“-I mean, I know you want to keep your sisters safe, and get them better lives than your mother’s- but, I mean. What are you going to do after that?”

“Oh, that’s easy, Kei- I’m going to become one of the World’s Best Nurses, obviously.”

“Ah! WAIT, THAT’S BEEN YOUR DREAM THIS WHOLE TIME-?”

“Yes? Keimi, you’re very pale- are you alright?”

“Um, Luffy-chin, I-”

“Shishishishi. I got this, Keimi.”

“-Uh-?”

“Hey! Nurse-Witch G!”

“Eh? Yeah, Straw Hat?”

“Join my crew!”

“...Only if my sisters can too, Straw Hat.”

“That’s fine! The Pirate King needs the Best Nurse! -and we need more cabin kids, anyway.”

“Fine; guess I’m a pirate now- my sisters, too. They’ll be so pleased. Well, it’s better than… that.”

My new nurse is sarcastic. That’s going to be fun.

And Sanji doesn’t say a word after the Nursing Five get through with him; just sits quietly, and observes, and chews on his damp cigarette. When we get up to leave- Keimi has a part-time job at the Mermaid Cafe I think? Or some kind of deal with the owner- and invited us to take up one of her tables while we waited for the rest of our crew to check in; Sanji tucked the front of his hair back behind his horns, and kept it like that.

Oh dear, he’s worried as hell. Otherwise, he’d never uncover both of his eyes like that; he’s worried, and feels- threatened? Oh no...

Ah, Keimi’s saying something-

“-Yeah, Uncle Hachiman’s got a whole franchise of Takoyaki stands all across the island; he’s really happy now. Ah, Pappug is in the Gyoverly Hills, over near Gyoncorde Plaza and the Palace; we drifted apart a while back, and now I mostly deliver clam curry for old times sake. He’s a fashion designer now, though, and he’s very popular- I’m wearing his stuff now, actually.”

“Ah, cool- hey, is this th’ferry?”

“Oh- yeah, this is it. It’s free today- see the hat on the turtle’s head?”

“Heh, it’s a fez-”

“Yep. Anyway, taxis are fedoras, but the black and yellow checkered ones are a fuckin’ price gougedon’t use those, use the blue and whites. Oh, and stay seated- this is the express sea-turtle ferry, not the daily-”

“Woah!”

“I told you to sit down- your buns alright, or do you need someone to kiss’em better?”

“If I needed kissing better, I wouldn’t ask you, Keimi-”

“Hah!” barks Usopp.

“Shishishishishi!” sniggers Luffy.

“Oh my god.” wheezes Keimi through her giggles.

Sanji doesn’t say anything at all; and he continues to be almost still and silent, even when we get to the Cafe where Keimi works part time. Even when the multitude of beautiful mermaids come out and cajole him to join them in a game of tag, he just sighs, and shakes his head ‘No’ while smiling apologetically at them, and nurses a mug of- Aw fuck, it’s a mug of jasmine tea, which is Mab’s favorite. Wait, Sanji’s a Demon- he’s probably not dwining, but I should check. This is the Grand Line, and he’s a passionate man; and, considering… oh fuck.

He could be getting Joyditch Fever.

It’s a metamorphologic dwam that is caused by a combination of deep, unshakeable love; withdrawal of sex; and an overabundance of salt water in the eyes. Early symptoms are a certain melancholy air, followed by seeking out favorite things and pastimes of the significant other, and a disinterest in what would normally titillate. If allowed to progress, it can result in wearing dishallible black clothing, listening to soppy love songs in the dark, drinking excessive amounts of alcoholic beverages, and writing awful poetry.

It’s often worst and most pronounced in people with extremely technical masteries- weavers, engineers, and cooks, especially, are prone to Joyditch Fever. You’ll know a cook especially has it because all their food will come out over salted, under salted, burnt, or soggy.

Sanji would be so upset if he did that- the symptoms or the cooking!

There is only one way to cure it that I know of. I have dried Rose Petals with me right now; the only other thing I need is- Jukebox! The song I need might be in it- yes! Okay, it’s…. Going to play in about half an hour. Okay, fine- considering the rate of progression, we should only get minor meteoromorphic symptoms; maybe some dark clouds, maybe some fog. Thank god it’s not Nami with this, we’d be in danger of electrocution…

I go up to the counter, keeping a gimlet eye on Sanji, whose melancholy is starting to coalesce into a dim grey haze above his head, holy fuck this is a fast one.

“Yeah- I need a tea pot full of boiling water, my friend is… he’s got the Lovesickness, and-”

“Oh god, it’s the demon with the cloud over his head isn’t it-”
“Yeah, I’m really sorry about this-”

“No, no, it’s fine- I just. Wow, I haven’t seen that since highschool- did his girl break up with him, or something?”

“No, he’s happily married, he just misses his wife.”

“...is she dead or something?”

“No. No, he just hasn’t seen her in about three-? Yeah, three hours. They have a very strict schedule, and it’s-”

“Throwing him off, right. His wife’s a demon too?”

“No, a Fairy- ah, thank you. Um- can you make the jukebox louder?”

“Wow, I didn’t realize that was a thing outside love stories- oh! Right, we have that Shins song...”

“Yeah.”

“You’re a doctor?”

“Yep.”

“Cool- yeah, gimme a second...”

As the music steadily gets louder, I carry the boiling hot teapot of water over to our table, and pour in- shit, there are chunks of ice bouncing off the table- three whole handfuls of dried rose petals, plus one for the pot. Steep. Steep. Steep. Steep.

I take Sanji’s cold mug from weak fingers, pour it out into the nearest plant- sorry plant, emergency- and pour him a cup of rose petal tea as the song I need starts to play.

I shove the tea into his hands and wait.

You know, I sincerely hope Mab’s okay; the only other song in that Jukebox that might work is ‘I Hate Myself For Loving You’ and I really don’t think that’ll do it...

When the girl with blue hair wakes up, it’s after I’ve cleaned her bloody fingertips and bandaged them, and it’s after I’ve cleaned Robin’s burn and salved it and wrapped it just so; it’s after I’ve made a stew, and it’s after Robin’s deciphered the “you are here” map in the Tomb Hub.

It’s after I’ve wiped her face, and combed her hair, and coiled the paracord into a handy loop.

It’s after I’ve looked her clothing over; brown capri pants under a pair of thick canvass and leather mukluks, a fancy red kimono that’s been hemmed and patched a few too many times to be anything other than- but no, not everyone’s rich, Mab, don’t be elitist. White chemise that she wears under the kimono; linen, the best piece of fabric she’s wearing. Man’s obi.

She smells like… hm, the cheap kind of soap that’s scented with mint leaves, and small human with a hint of seawater. Not a bad smell; maybe a little unwashed, actually, there was a lot of dirt in her fingers. Her eyebrows are rounded at the edge, near her nose, which is cute like a button; her eyes are a sort of dark, intense blue, like… black, shimmering with flecks of blue color.

Oh, she’s awake.

“Chairete.”

“...h’lo.”

“I cleaned your hands up; and we’re in a place of safety. Still in the Tombs, but- safer, than before.”

“...”

“Hungry?”

The girl sits up, and nods. Blinks a little- rubs her face, then winces and looks at her hands; her palms were shredded, like she’d tried to stop herself on rough concrete, and there were bruises all up and down her back, and her sides, and her arms; like she was trying to protect something while taking a beating. I bandaged her up, and salved her, and breathed through the Rage that overtook me.

That’s not helpful right now.

Robin is tending to her portable cooker from Skypiea; it’s a Dial set rigged up like a little camp stove, and on it- stew. Not quite pottage, we don’t have enough veggies; soup maybe? It’s hot, and wet, and you eat it with a spoon, how’s that? I let the girl go at her own pace; she looks around the Tomb Hub, eyebrows furrowed in thought, before she smells the food and fixes her attention on Robin.

I watch her carefully walk up to Robin, who doesn’t look directly at her; just ladles soup into a mug and sets it far enough from her she’d have to stand up and take a few steps to get at it- which the child takes, and creeps back away from the warmth of the cook-stove. I calmly walk to Robin, taking care to make my footsteps loud enough to be heard, and fold myself down beside her.

The soup is nice; and it came from the one pot. Robin and I eat, and I see from the corner of my eye the child eating her soup as well- not quite wolfing it down, but not eating tentatively either. And she doesn’t take her eyes off of either of us. Eventually, her spoon scrapes the bottom of the bowl.

I glance her way, and wait until I can feel her attention on me, and then I say-

“Do you want some more?”

“...” they say, and then they nod.

“Come here, then.”
They hold still for a long moment, and then creep closer; the girl holds her body hunched down, like she’s expecting a kick. When she gets just near enough to be on the very edge of Robin’s reach, she holds out the bowl. Robin takes it, fills it with the last of the soup, and carefully hands it back.

The girl takes it, and crouches where she is- doesn’t back away this time. Curiosity, quiet, gentleness- let the critter go at their own pace, y’all. I wait until they’re done eating, and- ah, Robin hands me her bowl and spoon and the now cooled pot and ladle, which I take and look attentively at the girl- yep. Routine; the great civilizer. Of course we wash our dishes after we eat, that’s what we do.

She hands me her bowl, and the spoon, but takes care not to touch my fingers; Robin puts the kettle on so we can have tea, and I go to wash the dishes. When I return, the girl has relaxed quite a bit in the warmth of the cookstove; the kettle is rattling with bubbling water; and Robin has pulled out a canister of tea, sweetened with stevia leaves. It’s really for the girl’s sake, not ours- there are very few children indeed who aren’t soothed by sweet tastes.

I hand back our bowls- mugs, really- and Robin pours hot water into each mug, drops a sachet of tea into the pot. Steep, steep, steep, steep. Pours the now warm water into a drainage channel- it’s why we set up the cookstove over here, after all- and carefully ladled the hot tea into the hot mugs. We each get a mug- and-

“Be careful; it’s very hot.”
“...okay.” says the girl.

Now that I’ve heard her voice for the second time, I can say with certainty- it’s a fairly soft, raspy voice, and… well, best let her drink her tea. No sense borrowing trouble- she could have been screaming trying to get out of the cage she was in, you don’t know.

Breathe, Mab.

She almost trusts us now. Not with anything big, mind- but that vague, unassuming trust you have waiting at the bus stop, that the other people there are just trying to catch a bus too, and you’re not that interesting, really. Or maybe the kind of trust you have for the first group project members you get- you trust them to do their share of the work. They haven’t betrayed you yet.

We drink our tea; we relax in the heat of the campstove. Finally, it’s time to discuss the particulars; there’s a method, to these things.

“First things first- are you cold, or hurting anywhere? Robin, Miss?”
“I’m quite well, Mab, thank you.”
“...I’m alright, yeah. A little cold still, maybe? Um-”
“Ah. I had wondered- just a moment.”
I get up again, and grab my blanket from my camp pouch; and then I carefully approach the girl, and, after shaking it out a bit, wrap it around her. And then I walk back to my spot, and sit again. I drink some more of my tea.

“Better?”

“Mm.”

“Right. Well, I’m Mab-”

“I’m Robin-”

“It’s nice to meet you.”

“Um. Bea- B. Just B. Ch-charmed, I’m sure.”

“Hmhmhm. Well; as I’m sure you’ve noticed, we’re all in a bit of a death trap.”

“Yeah. It’s a maze, too; I’ve been lost in this place for at least half a day, probably more.”

“…” Robin says, watching quietly.

“How’d you get here, anyway?”

“I- I go to Night School at the Gyojo- the Gyojin Dojo? It’s near the Fisherman Meeting Hall, um- all of my sisters do, even though we’re not as good as Adelai- Ah! Ah, uh, a-anyway, uh, my seniors from Day School don’t like me or any of my sisters because we’re- um- we’re from Goblin Town.”

“Red, or Black?”

“...red.”

“Oh. Assholes.”

“-!?! Y-yeah, um. They really are. A-anyway, um; I’ve been trying to make friends with them, because I don’t want to fight my schoolmates, and… I guess they really do hate me.”

“...B, what happened?”

“...They said if I brought back a, a treasure from the Empty Tombs in Ryugu Morte, I could be friends with them. So, um. I tried? But the only things here are death traps and wall art, and neither of those fit in a pocket.”

“I see. Did you have a time limit, or any other kind of win condition for this… task, of yours?”

“Um. They said I had until their next class, which is… the day after tomorrow, I think. A-and I still haven’t found anything. I’m not really sure I want to, honestly…”

“Hm. Well; would you like some help getting out of here?”

“Oh god, yes, please.”

“Alright. Robin, any luck scouting?”
“I’ve checked behind each door; it appears that the nearest possible exit is through door number seven, on the third tier. I saw an empty stone… basket-like shape, and a small archway, and beyond it, a rolling field full of small hillocks. I think that’s our best bet.”

“Hm. What do you think, B?”

“…I guess that should be okay? Um- hang on, what color was the field? If it’s yellow, it’s a wheat field and that should be fine…”

“No, it was green- and full of little hills, as I said.”

“Oh. That means it’s on the Mer side of the island; outside of the bubble-cave, everything is underwater. I can breathe water fine, I have gills- but…”

“That’s not a problem.” “We’ll be fine.”

“…Okay…?”

I smile. I stretch.

“Well. We’ve got time for naps, if you want- or we can just keep going. Robin, B?”

“Mmm- I’d like to get out of here, frankly.”

“I’d like to not be here, yeah.”

“Alrighty then- let’s pack up, and head out.”

Robin and I break camp; I pack away my camp cookery, Robin lets cool and stows her camp stove, and B helpfully folds up the blanket I wrapped around her. She even smacks the dust off of it, the little wonder.

It’s a quick climb up a ladder, and then a swipe of the talisman to open the door; we’re let out into a stable area, I think- there’s horse tack still in working order with a bit of oil, and horse blankets only just starting to go moth eaten.

Beyond the arch, there are indeed small hills; something about them is making me uneasy, but damned if I know what. Ah, and fresh sunlight- feels good, even through the bubble and the water. It’s fascinatingly beautiful, down here-

“Why the jarring shifts between art styles, do you know, Mab?”

“Uh- as I recall, each member of the Royal Family had their tomb started a bit before birth, and finished maybe half a month after death. For the ones that live long enough, each tomb is decorated according to their own personal taste.”

“Ah. That would explain why the Romantic Rococo three galleries back abruptly shifted into Art Deco, and then Revival Sandian, here.”
“Is that what this is?”

“Yes, I can tell because of all the peacock feathers.”

“Ah. Well- I’m going to take a look at some of this horse stuff, I think these bridles are still good-”

“-I do want to write down some quick notes-”

“-and then we’ll go on.”

B looks at us both, then shrugs, and crouches by the arch. I examine the bridles- I was quite right, they are still good, just a bit dusty; them magic runes sure do come in handy. Robin finishes her note-taking right about when I’ve got the bridles stored into my purse pouch. I found a bunch of spurs, too, and stuck those in as well- never know when a good pair of spurs is waiting under all that grime, and I have a feeling about them. I know those shapes, I’ve seen them before- later, Mab. Later.

“I’ll go first, then you, B, then Robin. Ready?”

“Um!”

“-Ready as I’ll ever be.”

“Here goes.”

I pull up my rebreather half-mask, and step out through the rubbery membrane of the bubble, and into the surprisingly warm water. My instinct is to freeze, but the water is moving- it’s like there’s a soft breeze, and then I muscle my instincts down and keep going. I stop but not still- I’m gently twitching and wiggling my wings- and I look around carefully. It’s a low valley full of little green hills, and over in the far distance I see what looks like the fence made of living coral. It seems higher off the ground over there too; maybe if we get closer, we’ll be able to see more of where we are?

I turn around and make a beckoning motion; B soon flicks out, her tentative steps transforming into graceful swimming motions. She comes to a soft float near me, and expectantly looks behind- Robin, in her mask, shudders when the water covers her over, and then trudges down the hill towards us.

I smile at her, and she smiles back.

‘We need to go that way- there’s a fence, and it’s on higher ground.’

‘Understood; lead the way.’

I wave my hand at B, gesture her to stay with us, and then start walking- marching- towards the coral fence, Robin right behind me. B races around with a bit of youthful abandon, but eventually lazily swims beside us. Eventually, we come to a path going in more or less the right direction- and seeing no reason not to, I begin following it. Robin trudges on behind me; and B darts between us, a quicksilver of red and blue fluttering through the water.
We walk, and we walk; through steadily rising hillocks, until they’re not hills, wrong shape, what are these? It’s got my spine bristling something fierce, which is a bad sign; and B’s sticking between Robin and me, she’s not playing like before. The light is fading too; and I hadn’t realized it, but I can barely hear anything other than the water around us.

Gnnk- oh, it’s just B. She’s scared. And she’s holding my hand.

Hm.

I hold her hand back, and glance down at her- the expression on her face is pale, but determined. I look back at Robin, who shrugs, and I carefully tug B up in front of me. Then, I pull her to my chest, and wrap my arms around her, so I’m holding her like the child she is. She all but burrows into me, and tucks her face into my neck.

She’s really scared- something is wrong.

We’re almost to the fence; just gotta go up these stairs- and there’s a balcony, so- here we are. I rub a hand between the sharp points of B’s shoulders, and gaze out over what we just walked through. Shit.

I know why she was scared now.

Robin, when she looks, stands straight up in shock.

We were walking through a barrow-downs; and with the way B reacted, and the distinctive lack of fish, or any other kind of animal… these aren’t the nice kind of barrow down, where quiet dead take their rest ’neath stone and plants, where children might play hiding and seeking and chasing games in the warmth of the sun, and dare each other to visit at night- these are haunted by wights, at the very least. As the light pours away, like thick syrup flowing away from wispy ink, pale blue and green lights start appearing in little nubbins, little spirit-sparks flaring into flickering, winsome shapes- and then, with a rattling crash, a battle commences.

We bury the dead; or rather, we perform funeral rites on the ground they have fallen, so things like this don’t happen.

Willow Wisps dance from mound to mound, their pale light flaring across ghastly figures in armor made of what must be rope and leather. Some are simply skeletal, dressed in what they must have died in; and some are more flaring shape than man, rotten bones and patchworked flesh flaring with strange light.

There are spots that look empty, no more interesting than silt shimmering in the water; and then the silt collapses on itself into a form that is ever so slightly out of focus. The jumping willow wisps catch on these dusty figures, and set them to flaring with unlife- now a pile of dust, now a man, and armed, and armored, his hair made of strange blue light and eyes blazing and his mouth opened wide in his dying scream, a spear as long as three men piercing through his chest but he draws his sword and charges into the approaching line anyway-

Robin taps my arm, and points to where a thin curl of smoke rises from the other side of the hill. I nod, and follow her away from the ghostly battlefield; I leave them to their murky waters, those two armies dueling in frantic, jerking motion, like pictures of a puppet show that someone meant to take in series but only got five of the required eight frames- jerk, and the battalion sweeps left, jerk, and the battalion is routed by artillery-

And then I’m over the side of the hill, and the battle is beyond my sight. B is still shaking in my arms, and I pull her closer so she feels- she wraps her ropey arms around my chest and shivers. Her little chest jerks and huffs and- oh, oh no, oh she’s crying- shhh, shh, it’s alright. I’m here, it’s alright-

The house behind the hill is a narrow little house, curled around itself like it’s got something worth protecting within. It’s covered in slippery algae, long vines of kelp and dancing bits of seaweed, a little like hair. Two enormous legs, like the legs of a frog, bracket the house, it’s webbed goose-feet gently digging into the silty layer of muck the house rests in. A fence of bones- whale ribs, if I’m seeing right- surrounds the house, with a gate made of two spars locked together with friction and barred with a chunk of spiny coral.

I look at Robin; she looks at me, and shrugs.

We look back at the odd little house; a light, yellow and inviting after the ghostly willow wisp flames, eyes us from the little house’s windows. Robin starts walking again, after another moment of looking; as I get closer, I notice little things, here and there. Tiny little crabs scuttle under rocks that hold the fence fast; little fish dart in and out of the gaps between the bones. Anemones and little fish-orange and yellow with little black stripes- eye us carefully as we pass through, then pretend they didn’t, really.

I look above us, to notice a black-tip wolvark swimming above us, before deciding we’re not worth the hassle, and swimming on- pointedly away from the ghost battle we’re leaving behind. As we get closer to the house, schools of little fish dart past here and there, in the very last of the day’s light. Their colors are striped and speckled, brilliant and strange in this cold blue world; and then, they pass into the shadows, and vanish. I see- because their colors are not fish-shaped, when they go into the shade, their bodies become moving patches of could-be-anything, certainly not fish. Certainly not.

And then, we’re at the spiny gate of the house; a small knob is installed in one of the gateposts, and there’s a thick line of crushed seashells right in front of the coral. Robin examines everything, and then with little more than a jerk to keep herself moving, she reaches out and pulls the knob. It pulls quite back, then returns- and in the distance, I hear a faint chime.

We wait for quite a while, and then I’m cognizant of being- examined- before there’s a faint gasp, and the coral fence is pulled up and back and away, revealing- well. Well now, that’s quite interesting-

It’s an Eel Mermaid, and I’m not sure what kind other than ‘oceanic’, and a Stingray Merman. They look at us, and at the way I’m holding B, and then they look at each other, and then they bid us follow them- their voices quite clear in the water.

“This way- come in, come in, this is no kind of night for sleeping out of doors-”

We enter; carefully step over and past the threshold, and neither Robin or myself object when the merman puts the spiny coral back. It’s really a fence, after all- on this side, there’s a wooden handle and everything.

The merfolk lead us through their garden, which I’m sure would be more lovely during the day- and then into their mud-room, where they bid Robin leave her pack, and all three of us our boots, up on a rack well clear of the water.

The merman slips into a haramaki, which he presses a chunk of bubbly coral to. It inflates, and then with a ripple, he’s into the air and flying into the house proper. The mermaid catches the coral he drops to her, pulling on a haramaki and inflating it as well, then pulling on a lovely house dress that reminds me, somehow, of lemons. Before she goes up into the rest of the house, she offers Robin and I the use of her bubbly coral.

I gently rub my hand down B’s back, and gently decline; Robin does as well. With a shrug, the mermaid puts the coral back on a shelf in the mudroom, and goes to join her male companion. I look at Robin, and point to myself, then to her, and then up at the inviting doorway. Robin shakes her head, points to herself, then to me, looks pointedly at B, and then points at the doorway.

I get it; I nod.

She nods back, and goes to the wall. There’s a ladder, built into the stone of the house- it’s really more a boulder that someone built a house around, or a lava vent someone took advantage of- and then Robin climbs, and vanishes into the warm doorway. I look around the room- but no, nothing important. B isn’t shaking so hard now, but she hasn’t let go of me at all.

I keep my arm around her and hold onto her- ah, that’s Robin’s hand, and she’s giving me a thumbs up. Okay, up I go.

I walk to the ladder, and climb up with one hand around B at all times; until, finally, I breach the water, and sit on the lip of the room. I pull my rebreather down, and breath in surprisingly warm air; not all that dry, but not bad. Woo.

Made it. Feels like there’s a draft somewhere in this room, but I can’t say for sure where- which is a bit odd, usually I can…

I climb the rest of the way into the room, my bare feet dripping and then drying on a cotton rag rug. B is still clinging with all her might to my chest, and I can hear her little whimpers now too, oh sweetheart- I notice Robin talking to our hosts, but- there, the fireplace, and right near it is a wingback chair, which is empty, and there’s a throw-blanket made of- doesn’t matter, it’s soft to the touch and dry enough to warm. I sit in the chair, and wrap us both in the blanket, and gently rock B, back and forth. I stroke her wet blue hair, and tuck her head under my chin, and when all of that only seems to make her crying more… not frantic, not desperate, but deeper, like she’s crying not just because of what we just saw, but for more than that-

Oh sweetheart.

I’ve held small people before while they cried; this is somehow the worst of them all, because this is a child in my arms and I’m a grown woman, and I can’t fix it. B can’t tell me what’s wrong, and I can’t fix it. I can feel- sadness, relief, longing, sharp envy- no, sweetheart. This is for you. Eventually, B is left in a miserable hiccuppy state, tears and snot still leaking from her eyes and her heavy little head still pillowed on my chest. Her ear is almost flat against my sternum- I suppose she can hear my heartbeat like that, which hasn’t changed at all since we got out of the tombs. I tuck my feet underneath me, and cuddle her closer, which makes her start crying again.

Ach, she’s so downhearted and overwhelmed- the only thing I can do for her that’s more than this is send her to sleep.
So… I wrap her more firmly in the blanket and my arms, and tuck her more securely into me, and then… I take a deep breath, and then… I sing. Well, first I hum, so it’s not a surprise- and slowly, slowly enough I can only really hope I’m reaching her- but no, she’s calming down.

If I could begin to be- half of what you think of me,
I could do about anything, I could even learn how to love.

Her breathing steadies, and her face which had gone blotchy with anguish slowly evens out. She starts leaning her full weight into me, body relaxing in increments; first her feet, then her legs, then her hips and her torso. Her arms and shoulders take a long moment to ease, but when they do- I glance down, and see her eyes fluttering open and shut. Open, shut, open, shut, open-

I always thought I might be bad, now I'm sure that it's true-
’cause I think you're so good, and I'm nothing like you.

Look at you go, I just adore you, I wish that I knew-
What makes you think I'm so special.

I hum some more, and her eyes flutter shut. Her breathing eases and deepens, hiccups fading to nothing and breath becoming the hot stickiness of a small child peacefully asleep. I settle in, and hold her, and nevermind how bad my back’s going to hurt tomorrow. That’s for tomorrow’s Mab to deal with; right now, a small child in pain needs help, and I am here and can give it.

If I could begin to do
Something that does right by you,
I would do about anything,
I would even learn how to love.

One more verse ought to do it; then, she’ll be asleep enough I can put her on a couch or a bed. Right now, she’s in that black space, right above sleep- you can still hear things from outside of yourself, in that place, but you don’t know them for what they are. Sleep, B. Sleep, and if perchance you Dream, they shall be peaceful and quick forgotten in the light of the sun.

When I see the way you look- shaken by how long it took-
I could do about anything, I could even learn how to love- like you.
Love, like you.

I’d love me like you...

And then she’s asleep— the deep, dreamless sleep in which wounds heal, and children grow, and things that seemed so awful before are made small and weak. You can face quite a lot, if you’ve got a good sleep under your skin.

I carefully adjust myself under B, and stand again— I look over at the… oh, um. There there? The merfolk are crying, and Robin has a hand pressed to her mouth and is wiping away tears, but she’s smiling too— was my singing really that good?

Oh, there’s a trundle bed— I think?

“That’s a trundle bed, right?”

“-” nods the merman, his face wet with tears and his smile almost— soppy.

“…I’ll put a plate by for her, in case she wakes up hungry.” says the mermaid, sniffing through her small smile.

Robin comes over, still smiling but softer, now. She pulls the trundle bed out, and pulls back the counterpane, and helps me lay B down on the reasonably soft bedding. I tuck the counterpane over her, and press a kiss to her forehead, and she gives not much more than a gentle sigh and snuggles into the bed. It’s clean and warm and still and quiet, just what she needs.

The exhaustion from using a spell like that hits right about then— urgh, and of course, even needing to use a spell at all— deep breaths.

“-ah. I had forgotten.”

“-rob?”

“Untie that, it’s a curtain— yeah, perfect, let me just— there. She can still see us, but it’s a little quieter and dimmer over here, no?”

“Mm.”

“And I meant to say— I’d forgotten that you can’t feel the effects your spells have on other people. You can barely feel the effects it might be having on your target, and that’s only if you focus.”

“Oh. Yeah— yeah, it’s always been like that. Why, was— was the song good, or something?”

“…It reminded me of the very best things about my mother, Mab. I remembered her warmth, and the way she smiled; the smell of her, and the cadence of her voice.”
“...And I suppose you two had much the same happen?”

“Oh yes.” sighs the merman. I hadn’t realized he’s wearing pants- with weird square pockets on them, odd.

“Mm. I remembered what my mother’s laughter was like, and how she’d hug me every day before she left for work- god, haven’t thought of that in years. Missus Fairy, your magic is very powerful; I’ve felt no other like it.” said the mermaid, carefully doling out a seaweed salad, some salt-brined fish with herbs sticking to their silvery-grey skins, and a small handful of whole clams and whelks- oh, sweetmeats, I got it- onto a plate which she covers with another and wraps in a towel.

“I remembered my mother, and how she told me not to let that drifter in the house, but of course I was fifteen and knew ever’thing, and did it anyway,” rasps the ghost.

I freeze- that explains the draft I couldn’t place- turn, and stare at the Hag; and she sighs, gloomily, her fairly see-through countenance somehow more homely and gentle than any Hag I’ve ever seen. Oh, she’s a- Lamprey Fishwoman, I think, it’s hard to tell what with half of her body reduced to murk and nothing.

“You’re a Queen of Fairies, I can tell by your wings. Hallo, and well met, young one; I am Sidre, and those two lovebirds are Gilly and Faldorean. I keep telling them to have children of their own, but they won’t.” glooms Sidre the Ghost.

“Auntie!” sighs the man, Faldorean- actually Faldo in day to day conversation because good god is that a name I’ve only read in historical accounts, people still name their sons Faldorean? Eesh.

“Aunt Sid, you know how you get- I don’t want to give you any… any bad ideas.” says Gilly, her fingers gone white over the covered plate. Ah. One of those; I get it.

“Chairete, Elder One; I thank you and yours for their hospitality. Pray- could you tell me, of this drifter, and what he stole from you?”

“I’ll trade you Fair, Queenie- one story begets another. How’s that?”

“Fair’s Fair; let’s have us a cuppa tea, and a few stories to trade. Who knows? It may be that your story has a happy ending after all...” I say softly.

“Neh, Keimi- d’you know where Jinbe is? He helped me break outta prison once, and I’d like to see him again...”

“Ahh, no, sorry Luffy-chin; Jinbe left the island with the Freebird Pirates after quittin’ the post of Shichibukai. A lot has changed since then, but- then again, not much has changed at all.”

“BOSS KEI, BOSS KEI-”
“A royal gondola is approaching!”

“They want to throw the Straw Hats a party.”

“Maybe they want to arrest them.”

“We should help them hide, d’you think?”

“Fuckin-” Keimi snarls, before her face smooths out and a sharp flare of calculation darts across like fish in a pond. Then, with a sharp whistle, every mermaid in the cafe suddenly has their full attention on her.

I’m sure, at any other time, I’d be very excited about all the soft mermaid skin rubbing against me, the smell of the mermaid carrying me in my limp state- but. Mab. Mab, where are you?

I’d know if she was dead- but normally, the part of my shadow that intertwines with hers points in one direction or another, and by that pointing I have a heading for where my wife is. It’s reassuring, knowing that no matter what happens, my wife can find me and I can find her. Except I can’t.

Chopper broke me out of Joyditch; my belly’s full of hot rose-petal tea and anxiety. I let out a deep sigh, and let the mermaid hold me. I really do hope that Mab’s okay. I can’t go into the spiral like I was before, not with all that tea and the melancholy love song rattling around my head, but I just-hang on.

I’m being held by a very familiar mermaid- a Little Tunny mermaid, with freckles on her cheeks and glasses and MAB-!

“Hi, Sanji. Sorry to keep you waiting.”

“Mab!” I sigh with wild joy, and then- fucking-

“Sanji, you’ve had sex with me like this-”

“That was just some heavy petting, fuck- thank you, let me just-”

“...You carry the nitrate stick around in your jacket now?”

“Well. You know how I get around mermaids, Mab, I didn’t want to- wait a second, why are you a mermaid?”

“Funny story-”

“Oh no-”

I brace myself for Mab’s idea of a funny story. There’s usually nothing amusing about them. Out in the rest of the Cafe, Luffy, Chopper, Nurse G, and- a pair of girls?- talk to the sons of House Neptune. Their names are… Fukaboshi, Ryuboshi, and Manboshi, but hell if I can remember which is which-

“What do you mean you defeated a ghost army and rode here on the back of a horse? Mab!”
“Well when you say it like that it sounds silly-”

“MAB!” shouts my crewmates, before diving on her and- right, she did get hit in the head-

“I’m fine, really, I just got a little displaced in time again- just a few hours this time, nothing to worry about-”

“WE WERE WORRIED ANYWAY!” wails Chopper, who is very attached to my wife.

“Neh, what’s all this about a ghost army, Mab?”

“Well. So, what had happened was- wait wait wait, are we under arrest or not?”

“Nah, they just want us to come up to the castle- remember that shark we saved from Surume?”

“Oh. Maybe?”

“It was the princess’ shark, actually, so- we’re being invited to a feast.”

“Oh, neat.”

“Right?!”

“Explain about this ghost army though, I want to hear about this-” says Usopp.

“Well-”

A proper story’s supposed to start at the beginning, but it ain’t so simple with this one. Suppose you ought to know the where, and the when- a witch’s house on the legs of a sea-frog, in a little yard fenced with whale’s bones; at night, when all stories such as this tend to happen.

It was just after sunset, when our tale begins.

Suppose I ought to say- a witch and a hag and a fairy are all alike, inasmuch as such things are, by simple virtue of the fact that all three can be bargained with, for favors of a mystical nature. While she might not say so aloud, Robin is as much a witch as Nami is; but while Nami calls the Weather, Robin speaks with the Dead. I am, of course, the Queen of Shadows, an ancient Royal title of the Fairies, first, and then the wider Fae. As for the hag… well.

Now, concerning the child- her story is her story, and I will not tell it for her; however, I will say that the matter of her accompanying Robin and myself was possibly inevitable, or perhaps a stroke of pure dumb luck. I can’t say for sure- I can say, however, that she is a brave girl, with good manners. In the course of Robin and I’s escape from the Ryugu Tombs, we rescued the girl B; and, journeying farther, it was B who alerted me to the danger of lingering in the Haunted Barrow-downs. And finally, it was for B’s sake that the rest of the events of last night came to pass; as, if not for her, I would have had no reason to become involved at all. Think of me whatever you like- but I am not so compassionate as all that, not without reason.
The challenge, as it was, was fairly simple; convince the ghostly madame of the house to part with the story of her remaining grudge against the living on this earth, and in return give her stories of our own, that she might find some kind of solace in them, and, eventually, depart. Failing that, it would be nice if the young couple of the house had some peace from the old haint.

After a short, stifling dinner of seaweed salad and slivered salted sardines, we adjourned to the seating 'round the fireplace and after-dinner tea with whelks and cherrystone clams- ash roasted, of course.

Robin, being the least invested in the whole of the exchange, opened the tale-telling with this.

“There is an ancient legend about two Dragon brothers; the Dragon of the North Wind, and the Dragon of the South Wind. Together, they upheld balance and harmony in the heavens, as Lords.

“But, the two brothers argued over who could better rule their land. Their quarrel turned to rage, and their violent struggle darkened the once clear skies. Until, at last, the Dragon of the North Wind was struck down by his brother, the Dragon of the South Wind. The North Wind fell to the earth, and shattered the land, scattering men, women, children, family, and friend alike, into unceasing chaos.

“The Dragon of the South Wind had triumphed, but as time passed he realized his solitude. The sweetness of victory turned to ash; and the once beautiful lands he had shared with his brother were ruined now, their people scattered forever. For years after that black day, the bereft Dragon’s grief threw the World into discord, and he knew only bitterness and sorrow.

“One day, a stranger called up to the dragon and asked ‘O Dragon-lord, why are you so distraught?’

“The Dragon told him, ‘Seeking power, I killed my brother. But, without him, I am lost.’

“The stranger replied, ‘You have inflicted wounds upon yourself- but now, you must heal. Walk the earth on two feet, as I do; find value in humility. Then, you will find peace.’

The Dragon knelt upon the ground. For the first time in ages, he was able to clearly see the World around him, and he became a man once more. The stranger revealed himself as the South Wind’s former brother. Reunited at last, the two set out to rebuild what they had once destroyed.

“The Elder Brother, the Dragon of the North Wind, was called Mer; the Younger Brother, the Dragon of the South Wind, was called Gyo. And from then to now, all who call themselves Merfolk or Gyojin can trace their lines back to those two brothers, who once were dragons.

“Of course, that’s the children’s story- the real story is much less interesting. Just two princes, fighting over what could have been shared- and the battle over the hill outside is the last gasp of that ancient grudge. I find it fairly interesting that, of all the battles, it’s that one that remains- because, if you look closely, you won’t see horses in it. Horses, and those who ride them, are just a touch too smart to stick around in a battle that won’t end.” said Robin.

“Where, then, Miss Witch, did the horses and their riders go?” said the Ghost of Sidre the Lamprey Mermaid.

“- over hill and under dell, to the forest where coral fish dwell; on the cliff overlooking war’s ancient “Strife, there you will find the horses, live.” I said, before sneezing.

“-Crickhollow Sandbar? That’s half an hour to the west, right Gilly?” said Faldo, before yelping as the Ghost scowled at him.

Before Faldo could dig himself deeper into the depths of the Ghost’s ire, I began my story.

“All over the pavement of the temple spread the exaggerated cross-hatching of the old pews’ oak, a Goblin’s market of intersecting lines such as children made with cards in the old days when kings and knaves had fat legs bulging above their serviceable feet, and queens had skirts to their gowns and were not cut across their royal middles by mirrors reflecting only the bedizened torso of them and the charge -heart, stave, spade, diamond, tear, clover, moon, coin- in the right-hand top corner of that which framed them.

“The pews had qualities: tall fat hassocks, red cushions, a comparative seclusion, and, in the case of the affluent, red curtains drawn at sermon-time. The child, wearied by the spectacle of a plump divine, in black gown and Goldenville beads, thumping the pulpit-cushions in the madness of incomprehensible oratory, surrendered her ears to the noise of intonations which, in her own treble, would have earned the reprimand, ‘Naughty temper.’

“Her eyes, however, were, through some oversight of the gods of this universe, still her own.

“They found their own pasture: not, to be sure, the argent and sable of gown and bands, still less the gules of flushed denunciatory gills. There is fair pasture in an old church which, when Northman work was broken down, men loved and built again as from the heart, with pillars and arches, which, to their rude time, symbolized all that the heart desires to materialize, in symbolic stone. The fretted tombs where the effigies of warrior and priest lay life-like in dead marble, the fretted canopies that brooded above their rest. Tall pillars like the trunks of the pine woods that smelled so sweet, the marvel of the timbered roof- turned upside down it would be like a ship.

“And what could be easier than to turn it upside down?

“Imagination shrank bashfully from the pulpit already tightly tenanted, but the triforium was plainly and beautifully empty; there one could walk, squeezing happily through the deep thin arches and treading carefully by the unguarded narrow ledge.

“Only- if one played too long in the roof aunts nudged, and urgent whispers insisted that one must not look about like that in temple. When this moment came it came always as a crisis foreseen, half dreaded, half longed-for.

“After that the child kept her eyes lowered, and looked only at the faded red hassocks from which the straw bulged, and in brief, guarded, intimate moments, at the other child. The other child was kneeling, always, whether the congregation knelt or stood or sat. Its hands were clasped. Its face was raised, but its back bowed under a weight- the weight of the font, for the other child was of marble and knelt always in the church, Sunsdays and weekdays. There had been once three marble figures holding up the shallow basin, but two had crumbled or been broken away, and now it seemed that the whole weight of the superimposed marble rested on those slender shoulders.

“The child who was not marble was sorry for the other. They must be very tired.

“The child who was not marble- her name was Una- that child of weary eyes and bored brain, pitied the marble one while she envied them.

‘I suppose they don't really feel, if they’re stone,' she said. 'That's what they mean by the stony-hearted tyrant. But if they do feel- How jolly it would be if they could come out and sit in my pew, or if I could creep under the font beside them. If they would move a little there would be just enough room for me.'

I took a sip of my tea, and smiled. This is a children’s story too, after all- but we were none of us children, at that table. And everyone knows the story of how the Morrigan took up her duty with the Ravens and the Crows- but this is the children’s story, to make it all seem more… inevitable. It wasn’t, of course- but yet, it was.

“The first time that Una ever saw the marble child move was on the hottest Sunday in the year. The walk across the fields had been a breathless penance; the ground burned the soles of Una’s feet as red-hot ploughshares the feet of saints. The corn was cut, then, and stood in stiff yellow stooks, and the shadows were very black.

“The sky was light, except in the west beyond the pine trees, where blue-black clouds were piled. 'Like war-witches' feather-beds,' said Aunt Harrietta, shaking out the folds of her lace shawl. 'Not before the child, dear,' whispered Aunt Emmeline.

“Una heard her, of course. It was always like that: as soon as anyone spoke about anything interesting, Aunt Emmeline intervened. Una walked along very melancholy in her starched frills.

“The dust had whitened her strapped shoes, and there was a wrinkle in one of her white socks. 'Pull it up, Unahame, pull it up,' said Aunt Jessie; and shielded from the world by the vast silk-veiled crinolines of three full-sized aunts, she pulled it up.

“Crinolines, for those that don’t know- yes, you, Luffy, and you, Usopp- look like this.”

“Oh.”

“Huh.”

“-wait, is that where ‘belle’ comes from?”

“That’s where it became a joking term, sure, Sanji. I mean- this is what it would be like if you were next to someone in a crinoline.”

“Oh!”

“...You could hide a full grown man under there.”

“Yes, you could. -not bloody likely, Sanji.”

“I didn’t say anything!”
“You didn’t need to.”

“Mab, Mab- what happened to Unahame?!?”

“Ah, Chopper- do forgive me, I shall resume my story.”

“On the way to temple, and indeed, in all walks abroad, you held the hand of an aunt; the circumferent crinolines made the holding of an arm’s-length, that whole business, very tiring. Una was always glad when, on the porch, the hand was dropped.

“It was just as the porch was reached that the first lonely roll of thunder broke over the hills. ‘I knew it,’ said Aunt Jessie, in triumph; ‘but you would wear your blue linen.’ There was no more thunder till after the second lesson, which was hardly ever as interesting as the first, Una thought. The marble child looked more tired than usual, and Una lost herself in a dream-game where both of them got out from prison and played hide-and-seek among the tombstones. Then the thunder cracked deafeningly right over the temple.

“Una forgot to stand up, and even the clergyman waited till it died away. It was a most exciting service, well worth coming to temple for, and afterwards people crowded in the wide porch and wondered whether it would clear, and wished they had brought their umbrellas. Some went back and sat in their pews till the servants should have had time to go home and return with umbrellas and cloaks. The more impetuous made clumsy rushes between the showers, bonnets bent, skirts held well up. Many a Sunday dress was ruined that day, many a bonnet fell from best to second-best.

“And it was when Aunt Jessie whispered to her to sit still and be a good girl and learn a hymn, that she looked to the marble child with, ‘Isn't it a shame?’ in her heart and her eyes, and the marble child looked back, 'Never mind, it will soon be over,' and held out its marble hands.

“Una saw them come toward her, reaching well beyond the rim of the basin under which they had always, till now, stayed. 'Oh!' said Una, quite out loud; and, dropping the hymn-book, held out her hands, or began to hold them out. For, before she had done more than sketch the gesture, she remembered that marble does not move and that one must not be silly. All the same, marble had moved.

“Also, Una had spoken aloud in temple. Unspeakable disgrace! She was taken home in conscious ignominy, treading in all the puddles to distract her mind from her condition. She was put to bed early, as a punishment, instead of sitting up and learning her catechism under the charge of one of the maids while the aunts went to evening church. This, while it was terrible to Una, was in the nature of a reprieve to the housemaid, who found means to modify her own consequent loneliness.

“Far away, whispers and laughs from the back or kitchen windows assured Una that the front or polite side of the house was unguarded. She got up, simulated the appearance of the completely dressed, and went down the quiet, servant’s stairs, through the hidden servant’s door and through rosewood furnished drawing-room, rose-scented and still as a deathbed, and so out through the French windows to the lawn, where already the beginnings of dew lay softly.
“Her going out had no definite aim. It was simply an act of rebellion such as, secure from observation, the timid may achieve; a demonstration akin to putting the tongue out behind people’s backs. Having got herself out on the lawn, she made haste to hide in the shrubbery, disheartened by a baffling consciousness of the futility of safe revenges. What is the tongue put out behind the back of the enemy without the applause of some admirer?

“The red rays of the setting sun made splendor in the dripping shrubbery. 'I wish I hadn't gone at all,' said Una. But it seemed silly to go back now, just to go out and to go back in again, having done nothing much at all. So she went farther into the shrubbery and got out at the other side where the shrubbery slopes down into the wood, and it was nearly dark there- so nearly that the child felt more alone than ever. And then quite suddenly she was not alone.

“Hands parted the hazels and a face she knew looked out from between them. She knew the face, and yet the child she saw was not any of the children she knew. 'Well,' said the child with the face she knew; 'I've been watching you. What did you come out for?'

“I was put to bed.'

“Do you not like it?'

“Not when it's for punishment.'

“If you'll go back now,' said the strange child, 'I'll come and play with you after you're asleep.' ‘You daren't. Suppose the aunts catch you?'

“‘They won't,' said the child, shaking its head and laughing. 'I'll race you to the house!'

“Una ran; and she won the race. For, quite simply- the other child was not there at all when she reached the house.

“How odd!' she said. But she was tired and there was thunder again and it was beginning to rain, large spots as big as pennies on the step of the French window. So she went back to bed, too sleepy to worry about the question of where she had seen the child before, and only a little disappointed because her revenge had been so brief and inadequate.

“Then, she fell asleep and dreamed that the marble child had crept out from under the font, and that she and it were playing hide-and-seek among the pews in the gallery at temple. It was a delightful dream and lasted all night, and when she woke she knew that the child she had seen in the wood in yesterday's last light was the marble child from the temple. This did not surprise her as much as it would surprise you: the world where children live is full of amazing and incredible-looking things that turn out to be quite real, no matter if they forget what they have known or not.

“And, if a rag-rabbit could be turned into a real rabbit, why should not a marble child turn into a real child?

“It was all quite plain to Una, but she did not tell anyone: because she had a feeling that it might not be easy to make it plain to them.
“Unahame doesn't look quite the thing,’ said Aunt Emmeline at breakfast. 'A dose of physic, I think, at eleven.’

“Una's morning was blighted.

“-Did you ever have to take a physic? It’s worse than quinine, worse than senna, worse than anything- except, perhaps, castor oil; or, for those of an older set of parents, cod liver oil. But Una had to take it- in raspberry cordial, which she considered, quite rightly, to be a waste of perfectly good raspberry cordial. 'And don’t make such faces,’ said Aunt Emmeline, rinsing the spoon at the pantry sink. 'You know it's all for your own good.'

“As if the thought that it is for one's own good ever kept anyone from making faces!

“To be quite fair, the aunts were kind to Una, in their grown-up and crinolined way. But, an aunt, no matter how kind, is not quite the one to play child’s games with, and Una wanted someone to play with.

“Thus, every night in her dreams, she played with the marble child. And, indeed, at temple on Sunday the marble child still held out its hands, farther than before.

“Come along then,’ Una said to it, in that voice with which heart speaks to heart; 'come and sit with me behind the red curtains. Come!' The marble child did not look at her.

“It's head seemed to be bent farther forward than ever before. When it came to the second hymn Una had an inspiration. All the rest of the temful, sleepy and suitable, were singing- 'The roseate hues of early dawn, the brightness of the day, the crimson of the sunset sky, how fast they fade away.'

“Una turned her head towards the marble child and softly mouthed- you could hardly call it singing-'The rosy tews of early dawn, the brightness of the day; Oh won’t you please come out, come out, come out with me and play?’ And she pictured the rapture of that moment when the marble child should respond to this appeal, creep out from under the font, and come and sit beside her on the red cushions beyond the red curtains. The aunts would not see, of course. They never saw the things that mattered.

“No one would see except Una.

“She looked hard at the marble child. 'You must come out,' she said; and again, 'You must come, you must.’

“And the marble child did come.

“It crept out and came to sit by her, holding her hand. It was a cold hand certainly, but it did not feel like marble. And the next thing she knew, an aunt was shaking her and whispering with fierceness tempered by reverence for the sacred edifice- 'Wake up, Unahame! How can you be so naughty?’ And the marble child was back in its place under the font again.

“When Una looked back on that summer it seems to have thundered every time she went to temple. But of course this cannot really have been the case. It was certainly a very lowering purple-skied day which saw her stealthily start on the adventure of her little life; the kind of adventure children have, before they grow and forget such things.

“She was weary of aunts- they were kind yet just; they told her so and she believed them. But their justice was exactly like other people's nagging, and their kindness she did not want at all.
“She wanted someone to play with.

“May we walk up to the temple?” was a request at first received graciously as showing a serious spirit. But its reiteration was considered morbid, and her walks took the more dusty direction of the County Asylum. Her longing for the only child she knew, the marble child, exacerbated by denial, drove her to rebellion.

“She would run away, Una decided. She would live with the marble child in the big temple porch; they would eat berries from the wood near by, just as children did in books, and hide there when people came to temple. So she watched for her opportunity and went quietly out through the French window, skirted the side of the house where all the windows were blank because of the old window-tax, took the narrow strip of lawn at a breathless run, and found safe cover among the rhododendrons.

“The temple-door was locked, of course, but she knew where there was a broken pane in the vestry window, and her eye had marked the lop-sided tombstone underneath it. By climbing upon that and getting a knee in the carved water-spout—she did it, got her hand through, turned the catch of the window, and fell through upon the dusty table of the vestry. The door was thus ajar and she passed into the empty church. It seemed very large and gray now that she had it to herself. Her feet made a loud echoing noise that was disconcerting.

“She had meant to call out, 'Here I am!' but in the face of these echoes she could not. She found the marble child, its head bent more than ever, its hands reaching out quite beyond the edge of the font; and when she was quite close she whispered—'Here I am—Come and play!'

“But her voice trembled a little. The marble child was so plainly marble; and yet, it had not always been marble. She was not sure. Yet—

“I am sure,' she said. 'You did talk to me in the shrubbery, didn't you?' But the marble child did not move or speak. 'You did come and hold my hand last Sunday,' she said, a little louder. And only the empty echoes answered her. 'Come out,' she said then, almost afraid now of the church's insistent silence. 'I've come to live with you altogether. Come out of your marble, do come out!'

“She reached up to stroke the marble cheek. A sound thrilled her, a loud everyday sound— the big key turning in the lock of the south door. The aunts!

“Now they'll take me back,' said Una; 'you might have come.' But it was not the aunts. It was the old pew-opener, come to scrub the chancel. She came slowly in with pail and brush; the pail slopped a little water on to the floor close to Una as she passed her, not seeing. Then the marble child moved, turned toward Una with speaking lips and eyes that saw.

“You can stay with me forever if you like,' it said, 'but you'll have to see things happen. I have seen things happen.'

“'What sort of things?' Una asked.

“'Terrible things.'

“'What things shall I have to see?'

“Her,'- the marble child moved a free arm to point to the old woman on the chancel steps- 'and your aunt who will be here presently, looking for you. Do you hear the thunder? Presently the lightning will strike the church. It won't hurt us, but it will fall on them.'

“Una remembered in a flash how kind Aunt Emmeline had been when she was ill, how she sat with her and read her stories and put cool cloths on her sweating brow; how Aunt Jessie had given her the chessmen who could while the grim hours of Winter away, and helped her make sense of the accursed fractions, and would let her have some of the uncooked cake batter if she was quiet about it; and Aunt Harrietta had taught her how to stitch rosettes of ribbon and all the summer flowers in silken thread for tea-cloths, and made her lovely new socks and mittens and scarves every winter, and had let her keep one of the kittens the cat had, for her very own. The warmth of their gazes; the firmness of their grasps, which had, on more than one occasion, kept her from walking out into the cart-filled streets, surely towards disaster; even the handkerchiefs, which, while slightly rough, were always ready to wrap a scrape or dry a tearstained cheek.

“I must go and tell them,’ she said.

“If you go, you'll not see me again, not until you are a woman grown and quite beyond childish things,’ said the marble child, and put its arms round her neck.

“Can't I come back to you when I've told them?’ Una asked, returning the embrace.

“There will be no coming back,’ said the marble child.

“But I want you. I love you best of everybody in the world,’ Una said.

“I know.’

“I'll stay with you,’ said Una.

“The marble child said nothing.

“But if I don't tell them I shall be the same as a murderer,’ Una whispered. 'Oh! let me go, and come back to you.'

“I shall not be here.’

“But I must go. I must,’ said Una, torn between love and duty.

“Yes.’

“And I shan't have you any more?’ the living child urged.

“You'll have me in your heart, for a time,' said the marble child- ‘and then, in the passing of Ages, we shall be united again; but you will not love me, nor I you. Not as we do now.’ And, having said it’s peace, they- Unahame and the marble child- embraced each other again.

“It was certainly a direct Providence,’ Aunt Emmeline used to say in later years to really sympathetic friends- and eventually, quietly shivering children of the house, struck cold with terror in the listless heat of summer- 'that I thought of going up to the temple when I did. Otherwise nothing could have saved dear Unahame. She was terrified, quite crazy with fright, poor child, and she rushed out at me from behind our pew shouting, "Come away, come away, auntie, come away!" and dragged me out. Mrs. Meadows providentially followed, to see what it was all about, and the next thing was the catastrophe.'

"The church was struck by a thunder bolt, was it not?" the sympathetic friend asks- or the oldest child murmurs, having heard this tale before.

"It was indeed- a deafening crash, my dear- and then the church slowly crumbled before our eyes. The south wall broke like a slice of cake when you break it across- and the noise and the dust! Mrs. Meadows never had her hearing again, poor thing, and her mind was a little affected too. I became unconscious, and Unahame- well, it was altogether too much for the child. She lay between life and death for weeks. Shock to the system, the physician said. She had been rather run down before... We had to get a little cousin to come and live with us afterwards, young Elphame. The physicians said that she required young society, and Elphe was the only cousin who quite fit the bill...'

"...It must indeed have been a shock,' says the sympathetic friend- or the eldest child- who knows there is more to come.

"Her intellect was quite changed, my dear,' Aunt Emmeline resumes; 'On regaining consciousness she demanded the marble child! Cried and raved, my dear, always about the marble child. It appeared she had entertained fancies about one of the little Golems that supported the old font, not the present font, my dear. We presented that as a token of gratitude to Providence for our escape. Of course we checked her fancifulness as well as we could, but it lasted quite a long time.'

"What became of the little marble golem?' the friend inquires as in friendship bound; and the child, in morbid anticipation.

"Crushed to powder and broken pieces, dear, in the awful wreck of the temple. Not a trace of it could be found intact. And poor Mrs. Meadows! So dreadful, those delusions.'

"What form did her delusions take?' the friend, anxious to be done with the old story, hastily asks; and the child questions with mock innocence, ready to hear the terrible secret.

"Well, she always declared that two children ran out to warn me and that one of them was very unusual looking. ‘It wasn't no flesh and blood, ma'am,' she used to say; ‘it was a little Golem taking care of Mensell Unhame. It had hold of her hand. And I say it was her garden friend, and its face was as bright as a lily in the sun.'

"The friend- and, in later years, wary children and grandchildren and great grandchildren- glance at the curio cabinet, and (Great) Aunt Emmeline Morgan rises and unlocks it.

"Una must have been behaving in a very naughty way in the temple- but the physician said she was not quite herself probably, for when they got her home and undressed her they found this in her hand.' Then the sympathizing friend- or wary half-believing child- polishes her glasses and looks, not for the first time, at the relic from the drawer of the cabinet. It is a white finger, it’s inner parts all exposed, the silver chrome of the joints open to the air as they never were in life.

"Eventually, the girl Unahame grew up, and forgot her love of the marble child; and, when they met again, Unahame was a woman grown: Morrigan was her name, then, and she was set to wed Udoroth. And her marble child was a child no more- but Chrona, the White; and so the tale for children is ended."
There was a long, quiet pause, as the room chewed over what I had revealed.

Finally, the Ghost sighed, and spoke. Her story was this:

“I suppose my story is simple enough—there was a man I’d have married, if he’d bothered to return. I gave him my good brass chalice, as sign of my favor—and he gave me Gilly’s mother, as sign of his. But, that damn war, over the hill, broke out—and, things being as they are, he did not return.

“He was never a good man, but he was my man, and honorable enough to set a favor on; but he did not return. And his… friends,” she spat, her pallid and wispy form darkening to something monstrous—“Those foolish men loved him so, but spared not a thought to the ones he left behind!” she snarled—and then her ancient rage left her, and she withered again, going from blackened monster to washed out ghost in a sigh several hundred years in the making.

“Well. All that’s done and over with—and I suppose, now, the only regret I do have is giving away that chalice at all. It weren’t mine to give, not really—and I’d have it back in the possession of this house, and the last of my blood, before I do pass on. I gave my love to my child, but—it was not enough… no, not enough at all…” said the Ghost.

“And you are sure that he’s dead, aye?” I said.

“Oh, aye—his friends drank themselves to death ere his passing in a single night; and they hung him, besides. He’s dead as earth, Queenie.” said the Ghost.

“And when he left, so long ago, what direction and manner was his leaving?” I said.

“Tcha—‘t’were long ago, aye, I barely remember his face…but I remember his horse, an ugly thing; like all the worst bits of a handful of poorly nags rolled together into one singularly unfortunate beast; fast, though, I’ll give it that—never did see a faster horse, not then or now…and in those days, he was a messenger for one of th’armies, and heading west, he said. Said the war would be over soon enough, on his return—and did he? No!” hissed the Ghost.

I sighed, and then turned to face Robin.

“Robin—you’re the only witch here. I need you to stay and keep watch over B while she sleeps; what I need to do isn’t the kind of adventure she should come on.”

“…”

“Do you really want to walk through the out of doors on this night, Rob?”

“-Ah. No, I’ll— I’ll stay with the girl.”

I smiled at Robin, who inclined her head with little more than a flicking of her fingers to give sign that she had noticed what I had. And then I turned and regarded the Ghost.
It is not often that I need to do it, but sometimes- not often, but sometimes- I need to be more than just myself. There are moments when, in the course of my life, I have needed to be all that I am, whether I wear a crown or not.

I had allowed the Ghost the minor liberty of calling me by a diminutive title- ‘Queenie’- but in that moment, as I assumed the full Mantle of the Queen of Shadows, I could see her regret it. And when I spoke, it was the Queen of Shadows who made the oath; and her subject, who agreed to the terms.

“Stories are like swords. Even if one borrows a sword, even if one does not forge it from ore and fire and their own sweat and tears, it is still the strength of one’s own body and the veracity of one’s own skill that makes proper- or improper- use of it.

“A sword, even dulled with age, can still draw blood. It can still strike down that which attacks; it can still defend that which is held dear.

“It is true that the sword made by one’s own hand is powerful; it is true, that the sword of one’s own hands is Known down to it’s very essences. One is intimate with its heft and its reach. Indeed, a sword made with one’s own two hands is merely another part of one’s arm.

“That very familiarity breeds hesitation; for it is also true that a reckless swing will notch even the strongest of blades. ‘Is it strong enough, one thinks. Will it withstand this? I worked so hard to make it-’

“A blade one snatches up because one needs a weapon in hand is not prey to such fears. One uses that blade to beat against their foes until the sword either saves- or shatters.

“But whether one makes that sword or takes it up from someone who fell on the field, the battles fought with it are always won by the wielder, not the blade.

“And so, I say this; I, the Queen of All Shadows, shall take the three blades drawn forth on this night, and venture out into the darkness. I shall find three things, which are needed- I shall find the treasure of this Shade, who has lingered this many years. I shall find the last to witness this treasure, wherever they may lurk. And I shall return, with the treasure I seek- and more, if circumstances are favorable. Upon my return, this Shade, who has lingered far longer than necessary, will leave this place- and this World- forever.” I said.

“Yes ma’am!” said the Ghost, shivering.

I smiled, and glanced at the two merfolk who had been very quiet-

“-Sorry, what?” I said.

“Rrrgh- I am very interested in where this story’s going to go next, but the New Fishman Pirates are looking for us and th’ Ryugu Princes just told us they’d help us out so we- nnnrgh-”
“Ah. It’s alright, Captain- ROBIN, WE GOTTA GO NOW-“

“-coming-!”

“-girls, time to saddle up-”

“-yes Mab-” “Um!”

My crewmates- Luffy, Usopp, Chopper, and Sanji- pause, as does the new nurse? Dunno her name- she does share a startling resemblance… and age… with B and C, so that might be it- ah well, I’ll figure it out eventually.

“Mab… you still have the horses, don’t you.” sighed Sanji, grinning at me through half-lidded eyes.

“Well. They did like the sound of pirate adventures, and having horses to take care of would make Mark a very happy man- and they’re quite pretty, except for Spare Parts, and she’s not all that bad, really-”

“...This I’ve gotta see.” smirked Sanji.

The rest of my crewmates blink.

I smile at my husband, and, when Robin comes out of the back room of the Cafe, it’s with several clean and dry saddle blankets in hand. C quickly waddles behind her, carrying a stack of sheep skins, while B is nearly swallowed in horse tack- bridles, mainly, though I do see a bit of rope there that normally wouldn’t be. Finally, Mark and Bryony come walking out, each of them carrying two saddles apiece, and I follow them with the fifth.

Sanji looks at me- ah, yes-

“B’s legs are too short for the stirrups, and C’s too hard on the reins. And they’re both so small, and Steady’s very gentle-”

“-Okay, yeah, I still have to see this- a box, really?”

“They are short, Sanji.” I say, before letting my husband stand on his own two feet, and calmly striding out of the Cafe to where my Leading Doll has led our picket of horses to stand. They are, in order, Spare Parts, Steady Walker, Turnip, Pumpkin, and Whiskers.

The girls take the empty box from me, and, after passing out and retrieving the appropriate parcels of gear, begin saddling Steady with saddle blanket, fleece, and saddle. B, who is the shorter of the two, takes the box over to Steady’s head and puts all the various bridle and rein bits on, which she’s a knack for; and C, who has long legs and arms like Taffy does (or possibly a long jumper) attends the saddle blanket, fleece-as-pad, and saddle with stirrups. And then, without much discussion between the two girls, they’re on the horse.

In that moment, it suddenly becomes very clear how very gentle Steady is, and how small those girls are. Small girls on a great big cold-blood mare- I say cold-blood because of the sheer size of Steady.
She looks, in conformation and coloration, to be a cross between a Fjord and one of the native hippocampi- probably a warmblood, given her actual speed and stamina; but her size is around fourteen hands, I’d say. And just the most lovely gills, and the way she moves - saaa, all of these horses move beautifully, nevermind their conformation- and as I said, they’re actually quite beautiful, really, I just… I always forget how weird looking Ryugu horses are when compared to other breeds…

“Neh, Mab?”

“Yes Captain?”

“I got lotsa questions- firstly, what kind of horses are these? They’re huge!”

“Hmhm, yeah- these are cold-bloods, maybe with a little warmblood? Draught horses, Lu.”

“Uh…?”

“Plough-horses, cart-horses, trawlers-”

“Oh! So, these are what trawling horses look like? For the shrimps, I mean.”

“Mm- yeah, these are the kind of horses I’d expect doing that job. Of all the ones here… hmm… Pumpkin would be best for that, I think.”

“Eh?”

“She’s got the thickest fat layer, so she’d withstand the cold longest-”

“Ah- the one Mark’s saddling, right?”

“Yes.”

“‘kay. Why’re their ears so curvy?”

“They’ve got a lot of Ryugu blood in ‘em, and that’s one of the few things that stick through generation after generation- the only thing that sticks around longer is coat color, and disposition.”

“Mm. So, how do you tell a good horse from a bad one?”

“Hm… Depends on what you mean. If you want a horse that’ll do a job well, the first thing I look at is it’s ears, and where th’horse’s attention’s at. A smart, curious horse- if they’re wild, I mean- is of more use to me than one with a pretty coat. Mm- I want one that’s balanced, squared up in the joints, with an even neck, back, and hip, legs of an equal length… condition and muscle don’t matter as much as good bones do.”

“Oh, like in a ship.”

“Ah- the shape of the hull and arrangement of the sails does more to choose how fast the ship can go than anything else; and on a horse, it’s the overall structural soundness that chooses how well it can move. Look at our horses again, Luffy.”

“…They’re all symmetrical, and… huh, even Spare Parts; she’s got that squared up shape you were talking about-”
"-exactly. On a horse, about the last thing I want is for it to be super muscular- that’s actually not a good thing, too many muscles just get in the way."

"Cool- shishishi, those kids are so small on that horse, it’s really cute-"

"Hmhmhm, yes, they are."

"What else do you look for- oh wow, Mark’s pretty on a horse."

"Yeah, he is. -Ah, I look at the head, they gotta have a pretty face- clean, small ears, broad between the eyes. Right there, where the jaw curves back into th’throat- that’s called the throat latch, and I want that to be nice and slender so they can flex real good and work with their head at the right angle."

"Huh- I see what you mean, it’s that pipe-lookin’ bit at the base of the head in the front-"

"Mm. Then, I check the shoulders; the shoulders and back are what really determine the actual quality of a horse, more than anything else. You can have a horse with an ugly face- but a horse with a bad back… well, there’s one other thing I look for, but I’ll get to that shortly-"

"-Bryony’s not riding? No, she is, she’s just- wow, she’s like a sack of potatoes!

"Hmhmhmhmhm. Yeah, Bry prefers to move under her own power or on a boat, and she’s actually very heavy- and she’s hardly ever seen a horse. That said, she can take directions real good, and when I told her the best thing to do was sit on Whiskers like a sack of potatoes, well…"

"Shishishishishishishi! -Neh, you were saying about backs?"

"Right- the slope, or angle, uh- pitch? Of a horse’s shoulder is what determines the length of their necks and backs, and also the way their front legs are set onto the body. Those things together help you figure out what a horse’s stride and balance are like, without makin’ ‘em walk. The back of a horse is the hub, and a short strong back is absolutely essential for a horse to be sound. Distinct withers- which is what Robin’s grabbing onto while she tries to mount up-"

"-it’s taking her a few tries, on… which one is that-"

"She’s not good at mounting, no, but Turnip’s really patient so it works out. Ah, distinct withers of a medium height relative to the horse is what helps keep the saddles in place. From there, I work back and down- I like a croup without too much angle, as steep croups can mean weak hips and incorrect set- er, angulation- to the horse’s hocks. -The front legs have knees that bend forwards, and the back legs have knees that bend back, and they’re called hocks on the back legs, Luffy. We’ve got books about this, I know we do- Mark would also probably really like telling you more about this, I just know the very basics."

"...Yeah. Are there… any good horse stories?"

"Oh, yeah- while we go to the palace, I’ll tell you one if you want?"

"Yes!"

"Hmhmhmhm, alright. I like to see long, strong hips with adequate muscle and low hocks; those things usually mean a horse that can stop well and will work naturally off their hind ends. S’better. Uh- oh, yeah, and if the shoulders and hips are equal in angulation, it means the horse’ll be able to collect themselves well and move real good."
“Huh, Mark’s off again- he’s… checking the legs?”

“Mm- Pumpkin’s hooves catch stones like the lint-trap in the dryer catches lint. Ah, yes, and I want clean, well defined, straight legs that aren’t too finely boned. Small bones in a horse is more likely to cause issues in soundness. Right- that’s everyone on a horse except me- Sanji, it’s okay to laugh, the girls know they look silly-”

“-pffft-”

I shake my head, and cluck to Spare Parts. She waits for Turnip and Robin to move out of the way, and then takes off into a beautiful canter. Party might be an ugly horse at a standstill, but she moves like the most beautiful of show-mares; and then she’s cantering past me, and I’ve vaulted into the Skuan-style cavalry saddle, and we’re good to go. Spear- check; group- check. Our line is me, then Robin, then Bryony, then the girls, then Mark. Robin’s actually the slowest rider, so she’d be first- she was first, when we were trail-riding, but- in the city, it’s better she have an example to follow.

All my Dolls go back in my pockets; I connect my snail phone to Luffy’s; and then, after everyone’s in the carriage, we’re off again.

“So, Captain- I assume you want to hear that horse story now?”

“Yeah! Wait, first- what’s the last thing you look for in a horse? and... when we meet back up with everyone, will you start from the beginning of how you got the horses?”

“Ah, sure? If you want, sure. -I look for attitude, Luffy; a pretty horse with a nasty disposition ain’t worth the bullet to kill it. I can work with an ugly horse; I can work with a stupid horse; but a mean horse is a danger to themselves and others. ...I actually have two horse stories- do you want to hear the one about the cart horse, or the race horse?”

“Um… well. The race horse story is probably more fun… but we have cart horses, don’t we.”

“Yes.”

“Tell me the story of the cart horse, Mab.”

“Alright, Luffy. Mm- Bryony, please make sure everyone can hear us-”

“-yes, Mab-”

“Mm. The first place that I can well remember was a large pleasant meadow with a pond of clear water in it. Some shady trees leaned over it, and rushes and water-lilies grew at the deep end. Over the hedge on one side we looked into a plowed field, and on the other we looked over a gate at our master's house, which stood by the roadside; at the top of the meadow was a grove of fir trees, and at the bottom a running brook overhung by a steep bank... ”

And as we ride on, I tell them of Black Beauty, the cart horse.

I also take in Fishman Island- or rather, the proper name of this actual country is Ryugu Mergyo; we’re in Mermaid Cove, a smaller city on the Coral side of the country. Hmm- there’s a distinctive, deeply frenzied energy to every city in Ryugu Mergyo- but as soon as you step outside the city limits, you’re back in time a good thousand, ten thousand years. It’s like the very best and the very worst parts of Skua, washed through with an underwater flair.

The carriage actually isn’t big enough for everyone to sit together comfortably- thus, we ride. Ah well; not like it’ll hurt any of us riding, to ride a ways more.

Aha, so that’s what it is- most of Mermaid Cove is built in the new style, but with the old red stones from the Gyoli quarries; and Gaudi, the most famous architect to ever come from Mermaid Cove, rubbed his influential hands all over the bones of this kingdom. Most every official building- post offices, which are new, wat temples, which are not, schools, subsidised apartments- everything, nearly, is in that curving style of his. It makes the edifices of these buildings look almost- alive, like coral that just decided to grow apartments in it’s inner workings.

Oh, wow, that’s a pretty apartment building.

We get out of city limits, and the pace increases; rolling fields and kelp forests whirl past us, below us, above us- as we follow a path of streaming water. My legs are soaked up to my thighs, and Party is all but dancing with the joy of moving. We pass small towns, their children and youths cheering the passage of the Royal Carriage; we pass farmers and their horses, working their fields.

We pass a herd of wild sea cows, delicately grazing on kelp; and a small pod of sea turtles, nesting in floating seaweeds.

Finally, we come around a bend and I can see, in the far, far distance, a great wheel- a water wheel, cool- and on my other side, a stretch of dense, crackling coral, red and spiny. That’s Goblin Town, on the other side, I guarantee it.

Finally, we begin approaching the Capital, Royal city of Accorde Plaza- called Gyoncorde, by the locals.

We slow, again, and ride through the city center; in the summer months, Gyoncorde swelters under a cerulean blue dome. From sun-kissed and begonia blossomed streets the people stream to the southwest, heading for the sugar-sand beaches this city is famed for. The surfing is good, too, a bit more to the south along the coast; big swells hit deep sandbars, and the waves curl like candle-curls on a pretty girl’s head. The classic dish of this city- and country, with few exceptions- is garlicked ameijoas- clams- washed down with a brain-freeze cold glass of beer.

Against the ever present backdrop of the Line, this dainty sun-blessed city lives a nearly charmed life; you could almost forget it’s peace relies on the reputation and strength of a dangerous pirate.

There are seven very steep hill on which this city lies; the seventh, and tallest, has the road up to the Palatial Bubble. Century-old Adam Wood barges are dragged past with heavy horsepower; iron funiculars lurch and rumble up steep and nearly sheer cliff-sides.

Down one street, I can see the edge of the Baixa district, where herbalists, haberdashers, tailors, and acupuncturists rub shoulders with snake oil sellers, cart drovers, cordwainers, and young Karate-kaoughs looking for a fight to win.

We ride on through increasingly ornate streets, curving lanes giving way to almost dazzling splendor.

Finally, we begin to meander up the highest hill to the old Fae Falada neighbourhood, where sunset-amber walls and sandy lanes orbit the Royal Gyomer Gate, past which the Palace of the Ryugu Gyomer Jinu hovers, an omnipresent shining white sword ever suspended above the terracotta rooftops of the city below. Just before the waterfront that leads to the gate, there is a lavish wat, and a series of dazzling water-facing statues, each a monumental form of the Goddess- in the Sea style, so she’s a mermaid.

The Goddess Crone - an adult mermaid, I can tell because of her hair and her legs- and she gazes out at sea, her face melancholy yet wise, sad and happy, too. It’s said, in certain circles of the Skuan arts, that this particular statue of the Goddess Crone was more than a little bit based off of Ariel, the Ryugu King Triton’s Seventh, and youngest, daughter. That particular Ariel is also said to be the ancient Queen of the Fae- yes, that Ariel. We don’t know for sure- it was several calendar systems ago, and the written records read more like Eddas than actual historical accounts. But.

It does mean, more often than not, that I- and other Skuan Royals- can claim familial ties with the Ryugu Royalty, if we need or want to. They usually don’t protest, as the precedent of this claiming is usually in response to threats they aren’t equipped to deal with, but we- the Fae, I mean- are. The Kingdoms of the Fae- or rather, House Morgan- and the kingdom of the Ryugu- which has always been led, one way or another, by House Neptune- have always been allies, if not always friends.

The Goddess Child - little more than a babe in arms, opening a shell and face pointed towards the sea. This is the one I know the very least about; I do know that there is a strange cult of sorts that professes every Seer of the World is descended- or somehow beholden- to this child incarnation of the Goddess-who-is-three. I don’t know about that- I do know that being a Seer is, and isn’t, something one grows out of… maybe that has something to do with it?

The Goddess Mother - a mermaid queen, with a babe at her side and a stern countenance to behold. As we pass, I see a pregnant mermaid stroke the shining bronze side of the Goddess’s tail, before turning and gracefully swimming away- leaving behind an offering, one of many. Each statue of the Goddess has a bronze patch that shines so, and piles of offerings- ah, Ages of mermaids, and fishwomen too, I reckon, have come here to ask for blessings.

I might myself, if we have time.

And then, without much more than a clatter of hooves and a rattling of chains, we’re over the bridge, and through the gate, and riding higher and higher, towards the Palace.

I haven’t stopped my story once- not even when my friends began to weep, to hear it.

“...Willie always speaks to me when he can, and treats me as his special friend. My ladies have promised that I shall never be sold, and so I have nothing to fear; and here my story ends. My troubles are all over, and I am at home; and often before I am quite awake, I fancy I am still in the orchard at Birtwick, standing with my old friends under the apple-trees. An’ the wheel bends, an’ the story ends- for here it does end, as far as I can tell it.”

“...”

“Luffy-?”

“-gnnk!”

“Aw, Luffy- we’re almost there, then you can have a good cry and kiss, alright?”
Luffy doesn’t quite say anything coherently, but the snail on my saddle nods while tears run down it’s little face.

“M-mab?”

“Yes, Chopper?”

“Do- do people still treat horses like that?”

“Mm- not in Skua, and not in Ryugu Mergyo, as far as I know- but that’s not everywhere.”

“...Mab.”

“Yes, Robin?”

“Would you mind terribly reciting that story for dictation?”

“Uh- no, why?”

“I think it’d be good published, really.”

“Mm- alright, I guess.”

Conversation tapers off, as we ride into the coach yard of the palace. I lead our horses to the proper place, and dismount after Spare Parts has come to a full and complete stop, then give her a grateful pat and rub. She’s a good girl, and alright with people around her- so I feel no fear in leaving her to the palace livery to take care of, although-

“Ah, excuse me- Stable Master, until about a day past, these horses were wild. Be careful of them.”

“Yes, Your Majesty; I’ll have my older grooms look after them.”

“Very good. Mister Butler, for how long is this feast to last?”

“Ah, Your Majesty- the Log for Fishman Island takes two weeks to set; the feast is scheduled for a mere seven days, as is proper when hosting royalty such as yourself and your good husband.”

“I do thank you- if it would not be an imposition, could a farrier be sent for? Our horses have not been shod, and I would not want to take them further on our journey without such particulars being seen to by a professional...”

“Of course, Ma’am.”

“Good, good- and I assume that we are to be lodged here, or...?”

“The Fae Lodgings are available for your use at any time, ma’am; we’ll have your crewmates who are here already escorted thence...?”

“Yes, I suppose that is for the best. Ah, pray- my husband and I are quite vigorous in our marriage; is there a suite that might best prevent-?"

“Yes ma’am; we remember the Ravens quite well, here.”

“Ah. My thanks.”

The Butler bows to me, and I incline my head back; I am a full Queen, I don’t bow to anyone other than Queens or Kings, and he’s just a butler. I highly ranked one, certainly- but a servant does not merit a full bow from a queen, at least not for fulfilling their duties.

Point of fact, my husband is still just a prince- although of a higher rank than any other prince, as he’s a prince consort. Unless I’ve gotten that wrong, and he’s technically a king- I suppose I should talk to him about it. Hm. -And we kneel to each other , but that’s private and I don’t think it really counts. I suppose it might… Yeah, pretty sure he’s a king, then. Huh. Does he know that? I don’t think he knows that. I’ll tell him- later.

Uuugh. Tired. Hm, it’s almost sunset- sure does come early in the winter months, but eesh, it’s barely half-six. Let’s see now- girls, B, C, oh her name’s… G- huh. They’re sisters. Okay- meaning we’re still missing A, D, E, and F. I do love a full set- and I’d know if one of them was dead. No, really- I’d Know.

Anyway- I’ve unsaddled Spare Parts, and all the other horses have been unsaddled as well- the stable hands take our tack, and the horses, and lead them off to- a lovely pasture, nice. Ah, there’s Zoro, Nami, Taffy, and Gurry- and a small frog-girl? No- half-fishwoman, okay-

“EEEEHHHHHFFFFFF!” shouts B, before charging forwards.

“BBBBBPUMENT-!” screams the frog girl, so that’s F- and now they’re hugging. C and G also ran forwards, and there is now a group hug of small humans who were very worried about each other. They are, in fact, still worried about each other- no A, D, or E after all, that’s three out of seven.

Now, let me see if I remember the correct codes of address… Sanji was declared dead, but that doesn’t mean he’s not still His Royal Highness Prince Rasputin Symo Ottar Tristan Vinsmoke Jaji, Prince of the Smoking Vine, Earl of Morgan, Duke of Lyneel, Duke of Flevnce, Duke of Miqueot, Earl of Kapal, Baron of Diamont, Lord of the Fields and Prince and Good Steward of the Sacred Realm. But he’s called Sanji usually...

His older brothers would be… Ichiji is actually His Royal Highness Crown Prince “Anatoly” Vladimir Bacher Vinsmoke Jaji, Prince of the Burning Heath, Earl of Forgshe, Duke of Miqueot, Duke of Ihla Sem Nome, Earl of Chillaga, Baron of Flevnce, Lord of the Forest and Prince and Lord Protector of the Orashki, the Germa, and the Sven. Technically, his first name is Quasimodo, but exactly none of the Fae in position to know that would call him something so cruel, so we gave him the name Anatoly. He wasn’t born disfigured, or anything- he’s just… different.

Then, Niji, who is actually His Royal Highness Prince Dmitry Ioannes Actoris Vinsmoke Jaji, Prince of the Palm Protectorate, Duke of Kuru, Earl of the Outback, Baron of Lyneel, and Lord of the Mountains and Prince and Lord Judgement of the Court of Owls.
His younger brother, Yonji is… oh god, I had to drill on this so many times- His Royal Highness Prince Yury Illya Timofei Vinsmoke Jaji, Prince of the Gimlet Harbor, Duke of Tiny Square, Earl of Battle, Baron of Orange Pie, Lord of the Song and Prince and Lord Conveyor of the Ship.

And, because men come before women in Nort, which is weird as hell because they’re equal but whatever- Reiju, who is Her Royal Highness Crown Princess Vasilisa Oksana Gwenythear Vinsmoke Jaji, Princess of the Golden Harvest, Marchioness of Lvneel, Duchess of Xerfas, Baroness of Goblin Desert, Lady of Flowers and Princess of the Bones. She’s also Yonji’s twin, which is why I always get confused...

Ichiji, Niji, Sanji; Yonji, and Reiju. I mean- if Sanji was okay with it, I’d totally call him my Ras pberry, but mostly I call him my love and that’s the end of it.

Unless Sanji says specifically otherwise, he’s to be addressed in mixed company as ‘Germa the Third’. I don’t know how he’ll want to be addressed. Hm. We’re not quite private enough, and I’m still soaked through with salt water, so I can’t- I mean, I can try but… I can’t feel his Shadow connecting to mine, so. Hm.

Oh, yeah- and I am, in the formal style, Mab the Third, by the Grace of Herself that Sits on the Edge of Time, Crown Royal of the Shadows, Defender of the Fae. Unless I say specifically otherwise, or am addressed by my immediate family, I’m to be addressed as ‘Ultima Thule’ in mixed company. The Fae have set kingdoms, but if your lands are shifting beneath your feet, you find ways other than geography to get yourself across.

In the old languages, Ultima Thule was the farthest Trunort you could go before there just wasn’t anything left; and in that far northern place, there is a palace laid in the boughs and trunk and branches of a mighty birch tree. Thuletima is the name of the city- Ultima Thule is the name of the palace.

And I am that palace’s Queen.

Hm… Head Count; Luffy Zoro Nami Usopp Sanji me Chopper Robin Mark Bryony Taffy- No Franky, No Brook- Gurry. Huh.

Where’s Franky and Brook?

So, here’s the thing- back before I was head of the Franky Family, I was… I’d call myself a scamp, honestly.

These two kids? These are scamps. The tall one’s got a long, black dress over her eight bright red legs, and a puff of hair I’d more commonly associate with a bell. There’s a soft blue-green tint to her skin, and a fairly dazed expression on her face- she did just fall flat on her belly into a room she probably thought was empty, so it’s not that surprising. And her sister, or maybe partner in crime, did just fall on her too…

The other one’s shorter, and is currently trying to shove herself into the junk and- huh. Y’know, if I hadn’t seen her do it, I’d be hard pressed to say if she was really there or not; her legs just changed colors to match the bits of junk on the ground, and her body’s all flopped over like one of the mannequins. Unfortunately for her, the large duffle bag- one per girl, odd- really spoils the illusion.
And then the tall one stands, and kicks her duffle over to the short one, and squares up so quick and steady I’ve squared up myself without realizing it- and as I watch the shorter one cover the duffles with junk and herself, a gang of toughs- not wearing any uniforms I can see, just fancy lookin’ kimono…

Oh fuck, those girls are Akasenko, I’d bet my ass on it.

Which means I know exactly what this is.

Back when I was the headman of my district of Water 7, I had to rebuild and clean up one of the nastier red light districts in the city as one of my first jobs, as voted by my constituents. Here’s the thing- some asshole had decided a good fifty or sixty year’s before my time that the best thing to do with poor people was shove them all into these fucking death-trap apartments that would catch fire if you sneezed at them wrong, and then- of fucking course- they didn’t bother building in any kind of infrastructure.

What the hell kind of community can exist in a place where literally nothing but shitty apartments are? Especially shitty apartments on the wrong side of town, right near the rougher docks and ringed with dive bars and cheap hotels?

I’ll tell you.

They call it the Wall, back in Water 7; that’s the name of my old district. It was built on the wrong side of the last outer wall before you hit the ocean, back in the days when Water 7 was still inside the bounds of Gemini Island. There are eighteen different licensed brothels in Wall district, and thousands of unlicensed brothels. The main difference between a licensed brothel and an unlicensed brothel isn’t just price- it’s cleanliness, and… really, it’s more like staying at a hotel than a whorehouse for the night.

In an unlicensed brothel, walking away with something like the Clap or a missing wallet is the least of your worries- I’ve heard stories, and seen evidence of, people missing organs, straight up murders, and worse. Unlicensed brothels will sell anything they can get away with and call it sex: sex with children, sex with animals… even sex with corpses, if it comes to that.

I’d see Akasenko all the time, on the Wall; scrappy kids, if they’re kids, or bitter by too much life too soon, or angry at the world for being the world and them too small to see it- more than half of the Franky Family ended up being Akasenko who found their way to me before the Madames of the brothels could.

Those two are Akasenko- children who grew up behind red doors. It’s not all bad- Brook’s an Akasenko, and he’s alright; once you muscle past the old-man crazy, I mean. But part of the reason I always hired them… here’s the thing. No one wants to sell their body; not for sex, not for viewing, not for anything. They’ll do it, and pretty it up in a thousand and one different ways- but at the end of the day, people don’t want to be viewed as disposable objects, and when the body is the saleable item, the person it belongs to becomes disposable.

I’ve never, ever met a prostitute who was absolutely overjoyed about their life and their job. Ever.

The reality of life as a prostitute is this- most of them, nearly all of them, in fact: you rent a room, only just big enough to put a mattress in, maybe, a sink, a chair, and a lightbulb or lantern. There’s a clock on the wall the prostitutes watch, keeping track of what you paid for- and in most cases, it’s for access to her body for a certain amount of time. They charge extra for pretending to enjoy what’s happening; and they charge extra for pretending to be the client’s friend.

Prostitutes, male or female, are there to make money. Rents come due at the beginning or end of the month; and if you can’t pay, you’re out. And if you’re already renting a room, and you’ve got kids…

Anyway.

I used to see this a lot too, before I got some help from the monastery nuns for the community: there’s always lingering… animosity? I dunno how to say it, but you’ll always find people who look down on poor people for having the audacity to be poor. Those girls? They’re poor- those are the only clothes they own, those shitty dresses that only share a passing glance at kimono… Maybe a kimono touched those dresses once or something- and whatever they’re doing with those duffles, it’s probably the only job they can get.

The gang of toughs, making trouble for them? Either rivals in the underworld- or, and this is looking more likely, a gang of cocky martial artists who don’t know how to look at the world with compassion yet. What makes me say ‘martial artists’ before ‘rival gang-babies’?

It’s the fact that they’re throwing water-punches at each other.

The girl’s good, I’ll give her that; flexible, mastered the basics of her style, incredibly skilled at controlling the area of attack and defence. But- six on one would try even the best of fighters; quantity has a quality of its own. And, what’s worse- they’re better than her. Their moves are just a touch more polished; their hits are harder; they can shrug off her sporadic hits better, break through her guard easier… I was looking for Den, Old Tom’s little brother, but this…

What kind of man watches idly as six teenage boys beat up a small girl? Not the kind of man I am, that’s what.

How to do this- I know.

I creep around the building, until I’m at the other end of the alley they’re fighting in, and then I walk down it. My shoulders are so broad, I almost can’t pass through standing square. As I go through, the alley widens, until I’m at the pile of junk the little Mimic’s hidden under; I see her eyes roll in terror as I pass, and give her a wink, which makes her blink her fear away and her brows furrow in confusion.

The toughs weren’t idle as I moved into position; Red takes a hit to the jaw, and a knee to the gut, and falls with the kick to her head to save herself a concussion. She rolls with each kick they send at her, laughing- and then I casually step over her, stooping down to catch the foot aimed at her scuffed red leg in a stomp, and haul it and myself up to my full height.

The gang of tough guys freeze.

I’m not a small man- and by what I can feel on my face, I’m not making the kind of face you really want to see in a back alley when you’ve been beating up on a girl. I stare the kids down, making sure to meet each one of their eyes and convey my deep displeasure at the sight of this… dickery.

I let go of the kid’s ankle, and give him a little push as I do- he stumbles backwards into his asshole friends, and all of them are shaking. I crack all the knuckles of my left fist, then again on the right- took ages to figure out how to make that work, what with my hands being mechanical and all, but it’s worth it just for the look on these little shitstain’s faces.
“Leave.” is all I have to say.

They bolt like they cowards they are. What, you think taking on one person with seven of your friends makes you brave? I should hope you win that fight, otherwise not only are you a fucking coward, you’re a weakling, too.

Red’s unconscious; and Mimic’s still not moving. I keep waiting, until I’m absolutely sure they’re gone.

I’m no nurse, like Taffy or Mab, and I’m no doctor, like Chopper- but I’ve been in enough fights, and seen the after of enough fights, to know a thing or two.

I turn, and crouch- feel for Red’s heartbeat and so on. She’s cracked at least one or two ribs, I can tell by the little wince every time she breathes; and her face is going to have a hell of a sunrise on it this time tomorrow. Still, for all that, she put up a good fight; her unconsciousness now, I’d put down to a lack of food and sleep, and being tired before the fight.

She was pretty obviously on the end of her rope, when I saw her fall into the alley- and having her… sister, now that I can see Mimic and her face up close- having her sister land on her didn’t do her no favors.

Mimic creeps out with the duffles, and I can finally get a closer look at them. They’re mail bags, making these- no, they can’t be, Post Office doesn’t accept people under the age of fourteen, they’re too young to be Post Runners. Then again…

“So. Where’re you two headed?”

“…”

“If you were strong enough to carry both duffles, you would have been. If you were strong enough to fight those shits off, you would have. If you were strong enough to carry your sister, even, you would. But you’re not.”

“…” she says, but her face is red and ashamed.

“Right. So- where are we going?”

“…Post Office in Mermaid Cove. Coral Hills is closer, but they won’t let us through the door.”

“Huh. That’s, what, four hours southwest?”

“Yeah.”

“Alright. Gimme the duffles.”

She slides them over, and with a shrug I put them both on my back- they’re not heavy for me, but they’d be very heavy for a pair of underfed, probably underpaid akasenko. I pick up Red, and lay her fluffy head on my shoulder. She’s bony, in my arms; I can feel the bones of her legs and knobs of her spine; her shoulders are sharp, like daggers. Too thin. Entirely too thin.

My other hand, I hold out to Mimic. She hesitates for a long, painful moment— and then she takes my hand. We walk out into the open street, and she directs me to the bus stop without much trouble.

The bus is one of those old fashioned perambulatory affairs, drawn by a team of four horses— draft horses, I guess. I pay what I see the other people standing ahead of us pay; the exact same price as one of the women with two kids like me did, in fact. And when the ticket inspector makes to overcharge me, I play up my ‘stupid tourist’ image and completely ignore their bigotry.

Nothing a bigot hates more than being ignored outright.

When the ticket inspector tries to make something of it, I take a moment and… I don’t exactly flex my muscles. But— either he thought I was smaller than I am, or really no one’s challenged him for a long time, because I’m big enough to look down on the slimy little fraction of a man, and he was not prepared to be glared at by someone my size.

He makes a sound like ‘mimblewimble’, and scurries back to his seat on the cart; the driver calls out to the horses, and we move on— because the driver and the inspector are on different schedules entirely, really. Driver moves on when it’s his time to move on, with some co-ordination from the other buses in his cohort; the inspector’s just there to make sure everyone pays fair fare.

I sit on the bus with Mimic huddled into my side and Red whimpering in pain— still mercifully unconscious, but hurting all the same; and when Mimic reaches up and pulls the rope to let us off at a much larger bus depot, we all get off the bus to carefully averted eyes from the other riders, and frustrated anger from the inspector. The driver though? He nods to me, and I to him.

Mimic leads us to the next bus-stop, and I hand over my ticket stub, because the way it works is you get your ticket and then you can transfer however many times you want so long as the ticket’s still good. The inspector almost ‘forgets’ to give the ticket back; I hold her wrist until she swallows, then reaches with her free hand behind the little checker kiosk and hands me back my ticket. Mmhm.

I know all the tricks.

Mimic spends the ride huddled against my side again, but lets go of my hand when I tug. I use my free hand to rub at Red’s narrow back, and her whimpers don’t exactly quiet; but her face does smooth out a little. A little care goes a long way.

We stay on this bus for the better part of three hours, before finally Mimic pulls the cord again, and we exit onto a dusty bus stop almost in the middle of nowhere. I hitch the duffles higher on my back, and gently rock Red a little, which seems to help. She’s starting to get noticeably hot, in my arms; and her colorful legs are starting to turn a dull, bloodless pink. Shit, she’s punctured or ripped something important inside of her, I’m almost certain of it.

“There doctors, where we’re going?”

“-the Nurses can handle almost anything, yeah. Why?”

“Hm. Good.”

Mimic looks up at me, then catches sight of her poorly sister and flinches. I look back at her, understanding- but there’s nothing either of us can do except wait. Finally, when Red’s whimpers have tapered off into a sweaty shivering quiet, the exact opposite of restful, the bus comes. I hand over the ticket, and this time the Inspector catches sight of the girl in my arms and forgets to be a prejudiced asshole. He almost remembers when he sees Mimic at my side, but catches sight of Red again when she lets out a pained whimper, and swallows, and hands me back my ticket without having done anything other than his job.

I sit on the bench, and wrap an arm around Mimic’s bony shoulder. When she presses her face into my side and shakes, I tighten my hold on her a bit. I know what the sign for a Post Office looks like, and I can read the road signs in this part of the kingdom; when we get to the right place, I let go of Mimic and pull the rope.

The bus stops; we get off; and I put Mimic up on my other shoulder so she can keep a better eye on her sister while I walk to the Post Office. A Post Office can be anything; a brothel, a warehouse, a bar, a salon- in this case, it’s a cafe. Mermaids dart in and out, and- although Mimic squeaks and presses herself close to me when we pass the group of fishman pirates, they don’t take a second look at me. There are perks to having a terrible bounty poster, I guess- I’m hard to recognize as myself.

When I get into the Cafe, I’m almost immediately swarmed by a pair of eel mermen and a group of guppy sized mermaids. The mermaids chatter amongst themselves for a bit, then direct me to lay Red down in the Sanitary Room in the back; while Mimic talks to the eel-men, thanking them for helping her and her sister, and- ah, these are their mailbags, gotcha.

I shrug off the duffles, and shrug off any thanks, and carry Red back to the San with the guppy nurses. I lay her down in a soft bed, and take one of two seats next to her- back out of the way, but observing. There’s a third on the other side, but- no, this one’s good.

It’s as I feared. She’s punctured something inside herself, and she’s bleeding out. What’s worse is, her blood type is super rare, S- ; the only other person I’ve ever met to have that particular blood type is Sanji, and Sanji isn’t here. The nurses can only give her basic saline, pain meds, blood-thinner, and S- blood; but without a real doctor who can perform surgery, her odds of making it are looking grim. What’s more, they don’t have enough S- blood for her to last through the night with.

“I need to use your phone.” I say.

“-Sorry, what?” one of the nurses say.

“I need to use your phone- my crew has a person with the same blood type, and a doctor who can definitely perform the surgery she needs, but I need to call them and tell them where I am so they can-”

“One sec- YELLOW, BRING THE PHONE IN HERE PLEASE!?! NOW, THANK YOU?!?!” shouts the guppy nurse, and goddamn if a voice three times my size doesn’t come out of a body smaller than my pinky finger.

The yellow eel-man brings me a phone. I remember the number to Bryony’s switchboard; hopefully, Mab’s near Sanji and Chopper, otherwise this would never work.
The last time I saw anyone take such a beating, I was in the army.

Captain Yorki had caught one of our squaddies trying to desert, and in those days we had suffered a series of reversals so fierce… well, the new ‘normal’ punishment for desertion was execution.

Captain was a kind man, though- and, rather than kill a boy, and he was a boy, sixteen at most- he decided to give him a trial by gauntlet. Each man of the squad was given his choice of weapon- mine was the cane- and then the boy had to run past each of us in a line and take the hits we doled out.

Captain decided that the boy had to make it through to the end- and if he screamed, or fell, before getting to the last man, he’d have to run again.

God in heaven, but that boy had a pair of lungs on him. He’d get to old-old-mustache, fairly kind man, but he could peel flesh from bone with a whip and snap bones with a crop, and that day he had both- and the whip would snap out and touch the boy and another rend in his flesh would open. And then he would fall, moaning, and another bubble of shame would gurgle through my stomach, and he’d rise again, and I’d have to hit him again with my cane because I was first in line and I hardly had the heart to hurt him by the end-

Little Blue, down in the courtyard of the Gyojo, is getting a beating like that- but rather than her having done some wrong to pay penance for, the hard-headed fool just won’t stay down. She’s got a mastery of the basics, that’s undeniable; and her battle instinct is superb. But superior quality means nothing in the face of such overwhelming force. It doesn’t seem to matter how hard she hits, or where, or with what kind of blow- she’s just not strong enough to break her opponent’s momentum.

What’s worse is, I can see the divide in the Gyojo; on the one side, every time she gets up again, again, again- the older, grizzled members of the Gyojo look at her with deep pride and dismay, because she’s going to kill herself. The youngest members of the Gyojo, who are obviously her juniors, look at her with awe, hero-worship, and fear- because she’s going to kill herself, or get herself killed, and she won’t give up, not for anything.

I can only liken it to when Zoro drove off Kuma, when we left Floria; he would not fall, no matter what Kuma struck him with, and it was only when his opponent quit the field having come to respect his resolve that he allowed himself to fall. I was on watch; and he made me swear to keep silent. Bryony wasn’t conscious at the time- and to my eternal shame, I did not wake Chopper to look after Zoro. I could barely make myself… move.

Seeing all that blood, around my new friend- I am ashamed to say, it took me back to when I lost my old crew, in the battle that stranded us inside the Florian Triangle. I was lost inside my head for hours and hours, until sunlight, and Mark’s scream of horror, brought me back.

On the other side of the Gyojo, every time she falls, the New Blood- the next generation- they smirk, they sneer, they laugh at her. She falls, and her blood splatters across the ground, and they smile.

And every time she stands again, face bloodied, eyes nearly swollen shut, hair falling from it’s tight, ribbon wrapped braids, knuckles scraped bloody and legs quivering with exhaustion- every time, they jeer at her and cheer their fighter on, and in their eyes burns a fury because- ah. They can see what I can see, and what the elders can see as well.

Her body cannot handle the strain of fighting; but her spirit refuses to break.
“Give up, little red-fish— you can’t hope to beat Jinnou!”

“You’ll never win!”

“Haha, look at her, she can barely stand—”

“Weakling—!”

“Whore—!”

These and worse things are what rain down on her; but she does not bow, and she does not bend, and she will not break. She stands again, and again, and again— even when her left eye swells shut, she stands. Even as blood from a cut near her hairline makes her close her right eye, she stands. Even when she can barely make a fist with either hand, she stands. Sweat pours off her body in rivulets, then pools beneath her feet— and she stands.

Her face points unerringly at her opponent, Jinnou I suppose. Eventually, when she simply cannot form a fist anymore, she stops using fists at all and opens her hands. When she does this, I can see a sudden awe race across the elders faces— and the cackling and jeering of the new-blood crowd only grows wilder. She sets her stance again; her open palms beckon.

Jinnou races forwards to strike— and I must say, it’s only because I’m watching so closely that I see it at all. Little Blue dodges a strike that would have struck her down before, and her feet twist, and then— one kick, two kick and stomp, three punch, four knee to the gut, five joint lock and Jinnou’s on the ground, six she follows him down and seven he’s whining and bucking but she will not be removed, and then on the seventh beat he starts screaming and the girl will not stop until he taps out, which is when she takes her hand away, stands, and walks backwards to her starting place, on the side of the elders. She sways, as she stands, and then she draws upon yet another well of inner strength.

The swelling of her left eye has receded; and one of her juniors has just run up with a small basket of medical supplies and a water bottle. They wash her face, and seal her cut, and help her rinse out her mouth of the blood— and Jinnou has only just now stopped blubbering.

The Blue Girl drinks a small blue potion, and takes a long draw of water; swallows it all down and her bruises and cuts and stiffness fades away, but her tiredness doesn’t.

And yet— and yet— from beneath her furrowed brows a pair of cerise eyes dares the New Bloods to send out another for her to defeat.

Over the next four hours, she thrashes no less than one hundred and twenty different people, each over the span of about two minutes— because, I realize, that first fight I watched was only two minutes long. At the end, when each member of the New Bloods are wheezing through broken ribs, moaning on the ground, and oozing blood out of cuts in their skin, the Blue is standing tall, her strawberry blond hair in a raggamuffin mop on her head and the old masters of the Gyojo gazing at her with pride.

It’s when she’s finally still, and standing tall with weary pride, that I realize the difference between her and the ones she has defeated. She’s wearing what must be a yukata cut short— no. No, that’s a whore’s yukata; you can tell because of how short it’s cut. It’s threadbare; patched and stitched and clean enough, but obviously made of thin fabric, far too thin for this time of year. Her pants are the patched and oversized pants of a construction worker, and god only knows where she got them, or how she managed to find a pair that match her yukata. I can see through her yukata because it is truly that thin, underneath a layer of sarashi wrapping- which may be the only reason she didn’t break a rib, she took so many hits to the chest- bits of twine, which must be keeping her pants held up. I think, now, having seen her move, the only thing keeping her even close to warm in this weather is her obi- not the belt she’s exchanging for a black one, that she uses as an obijime, I’m certain of it- no, the only thing keeping her warm is a chuyo obi. Beautiful, extensively embroidered- it’s probably the only thing worth any kind of money she’s wearing, not that she’d get a fair price for it.

Holy shit, I know the real difference- Blue’s wearing a kimono! It’s a cheap kimono, in a plain, even ugly, style; but her dojo mates are wearing judogi. She’s one of the only people in this room that practices in kimono- more than that, the kimono she’s wearing is her normal, everyday clothing. No socks, just a pair of geta- plain, unlacquered, with black thongs to keep them on her feet. And- an obidome, carved coral and cute as hell, and- she is just a young woman, a child, really. Her obiage is bright pink, and the knot she uses is a... Ah. Kid doesn’t fuck around- that’s a kai no kuchi musubi, I’m certain of it. And I’d wager she ties her money pouch into her musubi; if anyone tries to rob her, it’ll look like something else entirely, thus justifying her more than likely violent reaction.

Why do I know so much about kimono specifically? Well. Penny Jones was a kimono enthusiast, and I loved her so- and, to have something to talk to her about, because god I wanted to talk to her, I learned more than I should have about Kimono. She would smile so brightly when I made an informed comment about what she was wearing, I could forget for a moment that she was the baker’s daughter and I was the whore’s son, and we’d never in a lifetime be together- such is the power of a beautiful woman over a man.

Finally, her black belt- she’s a shodan, now, and her head sensei is so proud- and so sad. Oh no; I remember this too.

I learned to fight with a sword, not in the army, but in my home village, from the blacksmith’s husband. He was a swordsman of some renown in his youth, but fell in love with our blacksmith after taking an injury in battle against the World’s Greatest Swordsman of the time- and rather than chase a Dream he’d lost taste for, he decided to stay, and live, and have a life of his own, beyond the World of swordfighting. He was old enough to know that he’d never be as good as he was before that injury- and he decided that rather than die in the pursuit of something that could never exist again, he’d live for something that could.

In time, he became our village’s headman; and, though he was not a perfect man, he was a good man. He taught me to the shodan level of his style of swordsmanship, which is when his wife put her foot down and refused to have me around her house any more. I’ve no proof of who my father is- I never have. But I have my suspicions; no other man in our village, nor any trader, nor even the indigent drifters were his height, and eventually mine. No other man had his face, or his hair- except for me.

I can’t say where it started- but I can say what it is. The ancient Tradition is thus: upon the completion of the basic mastery of the Art- any art- the student (if they be of foul blood- begat of whores, traitor’s blood, and so on) is turned out into the World, to seek their fortune and destiny and further training there.

Blue’s mastered the basics- ah, they’re actually giving her... good god, she’s a sandan, those are three bars of embroidered gold on her black belt. When her sensei indicates she kneel, she does so with a pure, magnificent grace; I’ve seen one other person move with such power, and that’s Bryony at her most joyful.
Her sensei tugs her obi away, and replaces it with… no, reties it, into an ayame musubi, suitable for both her age, and the obi she’s wearing- it’s actually a very beautiful obi, if perhaps a little too vibrant of a print for that particular knot… then again, I am an inveterate old-timer, and I’m a bit of a stick in the mud when it comes to style. Her obidome, I realize now, must be made of coral- which in this area, and for that particular color, means it’s a piece of coral from Goblin Town, probably one she carved herself.

Coral, in this part of the World, is very cheap. Poor people wear it- pearls, too.

And then her sensei- a woman, that makes more sense- the steel haired woman ties Blue’s sandan belt into a koma musubi, after sliding on her obidame and making sure it rests in the middle of her body in the front. And finally, the steel haired woman undoes Blue’s hair; six flat corn-row braids that were somehow wrapped with ribbon, and I see now that Blue’s hair is long, almost as long as a lady’s would be, and strawberry blonde, a scattering of copper hairs were flung through wheat straw yellow. A pair of bobby pins go into her hair, after a quick brushing, and then- the braid. Strawberry blonde and a dark blue ribbon that turns magenta at the ends, in a Dutchy Fishtail and tied at the bottom with another koma musubi.

Blue is a very beautiful girl.

And then, her sensei speaks.

“Firstly, I should like to express my immense pride and gratitude to have had you, Adelaide of Goblin Town, as my student. I thank you, Adelaide, for being the best- and worst- student I have ever had the pleasure, honor, and horror of teaching. Stubborn, willful, proud- disciplined, conscious, indomitable; you remind me exactly of myself, when I was your age. It is said that the greatest of all gifts- and curses- is to be given a child to raise that is exactly like one’s own self. I can say, without hesitation, that you are exactly like me- and yet wholly yourself.

“Being the next generation, new blood with new eyes and new brains to use them; you are also an improvement upon me- and now, alas, we must be parted.

“...There are those in this dojo who think, that since I no longer spar with my students, I must have lost my skills. There are those who think, because I have refused to teach them certain moves of our style of karate, that I do not know them.

“The truth is, as Grand Master of this Dojo, and hanshi of the wider realm of Gyojin Karate, it is my own choice whom to spar with, and whom to tutor. The Newest Generation to attain shodan- those whom you, Adelaide, have defeated here today- have begged me time and time again to teach them the secrets of the Coral Palm Technique, the most advanced form of our style.

“You never did; always, it was ‘am I correct, sensei?’ and ‘did I do it right, sensei?’- and when I finally said ‘Yes, my student, you are correct’, you would not ask for something new. No, you would train and train your correct form, until it became reflexive; you would train until your feet bled, until your bones cracked, until I would find you passed out cold on the tatami and carry you to a spare bed I began to keep, just for you.

“The New Generation, for all their braggadocio, never showed a sliver of your devotion.

“Three days from now, I shall, after eighty years of devotion to the Art, lay down my yoke of Office as, in the solemn and necessary tradition of our school, the authority of Grand Master of the Gyojin Karate Dojo is vested in my appropriate successor. The Court has already chosen this person, and in three days, they shall be raised up in the proper manner and the School shall continue on. The New Age needs new eyes, and new blood; everything is always changing, growing, becoming more than it ever was. Gyojin Karate is no different; it changes, just as those who use it change.

“Eighty years ago, I was a young girl, much like you, Adelaide; and in that time, it was unheard of for any Lanjin to have even heard of Gyojin Karate, much less learn it. Now? We count among our rokudan a young woman named Koala; a Lanjin. In my mother’s time, women would never learn Gyojin Karate; in my grandmother’s time, Gyojin Karate was a new fad; and in my great-grandmother’s time, Karate was not something a proper Gyojin would ever learn. How quickly we forget the way things were; how quickly we accept what is new.

“How easy, to forget where we have come from, and what we have been.

“This day, upon your leave-taking and farewell, I come to you as your teacher- but also, I hope, as your friend. As such, I shall do my last act as Grand Master of this Dojo, here and now; Adelaide of Goblin Town, I name you my personal successor.”

A gasp rustles through the Dojo. Adelaide the Blue’s eyes widen dramatically, and her jaw drops open in shock. The New Generation are dumbfounded, so shocked by this turn of events that they can hardly move.

The Old Master, who is smiling a smile full of fangs- she’s an anglerfish fishwoman, old and sagging and crumpled and- if I’m reading this right- strong enough to thrash everyone in this room at least twice before dawn tomorrow. At the same time.

The Old Master continues her speech.

“Like every Grand Master before me, I labored long and hard with my decision. It is not merely the one who has most advanced on the path who ought to succeed oneself. You have made three steps this day along the path- but there are many others who are older, and further, than you. Nor is it a matter of status; one’s place at birth is an accident of fate, and has no true bearing on who a person truly is, or what they can become. We define ourselves, every day; and the things that mattered so fiercely to me as a young woman are barely trifles, here and now.

“You, Adelaide, have the spirit of the one who ought succeed me. You have the very bearing and spirit of my own child; and though you are a child of my heart only, I would bequeath to you all that I have left on this earth, that it may serve as some bulwark to you in the storm of uncertainty to come.

“Our Dojo is much like a family, and the wider world of Karate like a nation; and our people expect the hanshi and their court of renshi and kyoshi to find essential agreements on issues of great moment; the wise resolution of which will better shape the future of our Art. My own relations with the Court, which began on a remote and fractious basis when, long ago, a nearly disgraced and discarded Master accepted me into his school, have since seen me through a great many changes, calamities, and wonders. In our final years together, regardless of our personal opinions, all of us, together, have cooperated to serve our people as best we can, and to ensure the future of our Art.

“I do not name you my personal successor, Adelaide, with the expectation of your eventual ascendancy to my place. I do not expect you to go to such lengths. I know, with or without your presence, the business of our Dojo will continue.

“But business and soul are not equal. I know the New Generation will continue the Dojo, and keep it solvent, and secure; in good standing, and in high spirits. But our Dojo is more than just business; our Art is more than just a hobby.

“I am grateful for the time we have spent together, Adelaide; you are the closest to a grand-daughter I’ve ever had. Thus, upon your departure, I would embrace you as family does, and give to you what you never once asked for- I will give to you the whole of our Karate, and my blessing to use it as you see fit. It is my great shame that I will not be there to see you master it, and I will have no part in polishing your skills. I am too old, and too tired; and, as the younger masters of this Dojo insist, not suitable for instruction in such matters- certainly not after achieving shodan.

“How satisfying for them, then, that you have achieved sandan- with their help, no less- and are now set to receive, if not the reflexive knowledge in your body, the instinctive knowledge in your mind, of the secrets and mysteries of our style. Come here, Adelaide; my sweet granddaughter. “Come.”

And here the Old Master holds out her arms, and Adelaide the Blue goes to her, and embraces her grandmother-teacher for the first, last, and only time. The Old Master presses her forehead to Adelaide’s; I can feel a ripple of Haki centered around the two of them, but I can’t tell what the Old Master is doing. Then, the Haki fades away, and the Old Master and Adelaide the Blue embrace again, before they release each other, and Adelaide returns to her seat.

Tears and snot are running down the faces of her juniors; the elders of the dojo weep into their arms and sleeves. The New Generation is silent; almost profoundly so. Jinnou, who fought her first, seems deeply moved by what he has heard- and of the younger members of the New Generation, he is not the only one.

I rub tears away from my eyes- or I would if I had eyes, yohohohoho, oh this is bittersweet.

“There- it is done. You are my personal successor, now; my Art lives on in you. Whether any other than the two of us recognize it or not, you are my successor, Adelaide the Blue. You are the only one who can succeed me in our style of Gyojin Karate; you are the only one who can go into the World with it, and use it as you see fit, for good or ill.

“You have my blessing, and my love.

“Farewell, then, forevermore.”

And with that, the Old Master bows. Adelaide bows back and surreptitiously wipes her eyes. And then she rises from her bow, and walks from the tatami; at the doorway, she pauses to put on her shoes and take up her small bag; and then, she glances at me beside the door, and I rise from my seat, and we leave that place together.

The story of how we met? I was wandering the city, when I came across little Blue in a terrible hurry; we ended up on the same bus, and, seeking to perhaps relieve her of some of her distress, I asked after her story.

She told me that a group of bullies from her dojo had been making the lives of her younger sisters hell for years, now, and she was finally ready to make them all pay— and she’d be doing that today, if I’d like to come and watch.

Normally, I’d have wished her luck. But, I suppose I recognized something of myself in her— not me as I am, but me before I joined the army, an angry boy with something to prove to himself and a whole mountain’s worth of disappointed rage on his shoulder.

The rage hasn’t gone, or anything; that is the rage that wrote a triple-platinum album, after all. Soul King Brook has the rage of mountains behind him; and Adelaide the Blue has the rage of oceans behind her.

I follow Adelaide for quite a ways, before we end up in a pub; in the pub’s shrug, Adelaide sits at a small table, puts her kinchaku kago on a low shelf next to the table meant for just that purpose, and puts her head in her hands. I tug out a handkerchief as her shoulders begin to shake, and hand it to her when she begins to weep— and then, when her weeping does not abate, I go to her side, and hold her.

I am a skeleton of a man— or rather, the skeleton of a man, yohohohoho— and so my hugs are perhaps not the most… comforting. But. It’s better than no hug at all. I know this to be true, because Little Adelaide wrapped her arms around me and sobbed into my crushed velvet suit jacket and orange feather boa. I rubbed a boney hand between her shoulders, and thanked the barmaid for bringing us two glasses of cool spring-water to drink.

Eventually, Adelaide calmed enough to drink the water, and wipe her eyes again, and blow her nose.

And then, of all things, a phone rang. Adelaide was a sudden flurry of motion— she opened her purse, pulled out a baby den den mushi, and answered the call.

Puru-puru-puru! GATCHA!

“Moshi moshi?”

“A, it’s the M-Five; we’ve got D here, and she’s in a real bad way—”

“Do I need to come on?”

“It would be better if you stayed away— ouch! COME TO THE POST SANITARY IMMEDIATELY, A, YOUR SISTER IS IN DANGER OF HER LIFE— OUCH! Please get here as soon as you can, A. This doesn’t look good.”

“I’ll be right there.”

“Good— get some more S— into her, for fuck’s sake—!”

GATCHA!

Adelaide— A, I suppose, for short— looked at me, and then at her drink. She drank most of it down, poured a trickle of it onto her grateful snail, and then packed it away again. I put down some small change I had—every little bit helps—before darting quickly after Adelaide, who nearly ran for the bus-stop before I grabbed her by the scruff of her kimono in one hand and let loose a piercing whistle with the other held to my teeth.

That whistle has caught the attention of men clear across battlefields in the flush of war; calling a simple taxi is no trouble at all. It’s a sea-turtle with a rick-shaw’s seat on the back, and a black fez with blue and white checks around the rim and a large pink tassel.

“Where are we going, A?”

“M-mermaid Cafe, at Mermaid Cove! As fast as you can, please!”

The turtle looks at us a nods; we nod back, I help A onto the turtle, and then leap aboard myself.

“YOSH! IKUSEI!” shouts Adelaide, as the turtle moves.

The world hurtles past us so quickly I feel a deep and unrelenting nausea gurgling through my stomach— or I would, if I still had a stomach. Yohohohohoho-oooh nooooo, urk- thankfully, I keep it in until we get to where A said we needed to be, and I’d managed to pay the speedy turtle. Hurp!

Ugh. That was terrible— but, I’m better now. I follow A into the cafe, past beautiful mermaids— and I’d take a moment to oogle and ogle them, but that was the most frightened I’ve ever seen anyone, and— oh no.

Back behind the counter of the cafe, through a small hallway, there’s a back room done up a bit like an apartment; the Sanitary Room. On the bed, there lies a small girl with pale pink octopus tentacles, and a furrow of pain on her pallid, sweaty face. Franky sits in a chair near her, his massive bulk somehow small and frightened. On his lap is curled another octopus mermaid— no, there’s a name for them, cecealia I think is the word— another girl is curled on his lap, her fingers white at the knuckles where she’s clenching onto his arm.

A is listening to what one of the tiny nurses is telling her, and glances at Franky before looking back at the nurse. I pick my way through the room, and sit next to Franky— there are three chairs in the room total, and Franky and I take one each, as the other is on the wrong side of the bed. A, after listening to what the nurse has to say, steps over to me— and, after looking at me for a moment, walks off. She returns with two pillows, pulled from a cupboard out of my sight, and I nod and shoot her a thumbs up. She smiles, shallowly, a thin grimace; and then she puts the pillows on my old bones, and climbs into my lap.

And there I sit for what feels like eternity; but really, it’s only as long as it took Bryony to pry apart Sanji and Mab and wake Chopper from his bed.

So… Long enough, when you’re scared for someone’s life.
Okay. I’ve read a lot of porn—there wasn’t much else I could do during my younger years at the Baratie, because I was a horny little shit, pornographic magazines were cheap and easy to get through the mail, and women were Too Exciting for several years.

So.

It turns out that shower sex is about the worst goddamn sex you can possibly have. Mab and I have tried several different permutations of shower sex, in several different kinds of showers, and, uh. Yeah, no.

Shower sex is fucking awful. I fucking hate shower sex. I consider myself a sexually adventurous man, and there are plenty of atypical things I am willing to do between the sheets; fucking hell, I’m working up to letting Mab use a dildo on me, and considering what I used to deal with… but no. Shower sex can fuck right off.

Which is not to say that, if you want to try it, you shouldn’t—really, two consenting adults can have whatever kind of sex they want, so long as it’s safe— as in, no one’s going to die, or get permanently injured, or catch a sex infection, or get pregnant (if they don’t want to) from having sex like that. That’s one of the best parts of sex, to me; just like cooking, there’s a nearly endless spectrum of positions, tactics, and styles to use to get it on. However- and I’m kinda embarrassed it took me this long to figure it out- porn mags are basically carefully collected and collated lies when it comes to representing actual sex. For one thing, I’ve met maybe two women, ever, in my life, who orgasmed while having sex for the first time. And I mean sex of any kind- it turns out, it’s actually a lot easier to orgasm by, say, mutual masturbation, or straight up making out, than it is by having sex.

However, above all the non-truths perpetuated in skin-rags and folklore about sex, I have to say- the gospel of shower sex is literally the worst, most lie-laden one of all. Shower sex sucks a bag of horse dicks. It’s terrible, and difficult, and dangerous, and not worth it. There are better ways- and I say that because I’ve tried it, okay. I mean it- Mab and I have dedicated serious effort to trying to perfect this lie we both bought into, but after I nearly broke my leg and she cut open her scalp trying to do this, we decided that it’s just not worth the effort for something so much less than mediocre.

The worst part is, I can understand why it looks so good; when Mab steps into the shower, the steam rises up and cups her naked body. Her nipples pebble under the water, and then smooth as her skin warms. Her body relaxes, and her hair becomes this voluminous cloud of Mab-scented fluff. Shower Mab is a stunningly beautiful version of Mab.

Further, in most every skin-rag I’ve seen shower sex in, it’s shown to be passionate, intrepid, titillating, clean- all of which are lies. The lies you buy into because you want, quite desperately, for them to be true: ‘In the shower with them, and it’s all hot and wet and slippery; the water is a magical, perfect warm temperature and you’re taking turns lathering each other up amongst thick, white clouds of steam and it’s all so effortless and sensual.’

Yeah, no.

Firstly, it only sort of works if you have an Est style bath-house bathing room, where your showers are actually sprayers and you can sit on stools, one behind the other. Even then… not really, not the way Mab and I like to do it. I know Taffy and Gurry have sex in the showers, but that’s because they have a kink for hard surfaces, and not really to do with the shower at all.
On the physical level, shower sex doesn’t work because of the properties of water. Water is a very effective surfactant, as is soap; due to the… shape? I think? Of the… I know there’s a word for it, I learned it, but I can’t remember the translation right now. The smallest portion of water that can still be called water is very, very good at attaching to the smallest portions of other things that can still be called those other things- metal, stone, wood… skin. It’s for this reason that water-canyons exist; the water literally carved the stone away with the simple movement of itself over thousands of years. Where once was a plain of stone, now a furrow in the earth sits; and water is to blame.

Don’t believe me? Go get the back of your hands wet and rub them together. Right now. I’ll wait. You did it? Good- feel that sort of jerky motion, when you rub? Yeah, that’s fine if you’re rubbing your hands together- and that’s absolutely the worst possible thing if you’re trying to have sex. That kind of motion is not good when you’re having sex. And nothing- goddamn nothing- makes Mab’s pussy dry up faster than the Sandora during the Dry Monsoon, than shower water. Fucking nothing.

Ah, and- Mab’s taller than me, she has been for a year and a half, now. It’s not, like, crazy taller than me- but she’s got a good six centimeters. Normally, that’s fine; not when it comes to shower sex. No, because, see, almost all of Mab’s height is in her legs; and six centimeters is just far enough that I can’t quite thrust up into her the way we both like me to, not if we’re in the goddamn shower.

Going down on each other becomes a new, horrible kind of hybrid monstrosity- the worst cross between penance prayer and water torture, because you’re kneeling on fucking porcelain or whatever, and there’s water coming down on your face, getting in your mouth, going up your nose- no. No.

And we like different temperatures of shower, so one of us is always too hot or too cold. Mab likes hot showers; and by hot, I mean fucking water from the depths of hell, heated over Satan’s own sweaty asscrack and sprinkled over her head like piss from demons. Which she immediately follows with an icy cold rinse, like taking a dive into the Danube during midwinter buck naked. I alternate cold, warm, cold, which Mab hates; and we have very different bathing styles, too. It’s awful, actually, trying to shower together normally- because one of us will always be unsatisfied, and one of us will always smack the other with a flailing elbow, wing, knee, or horn. And I can’t wash my tail in front of Mab, I always ejaculate violently and Mab gets very excited when she sees that and I’m so tired at that point it’s all I can do to wash myself off and get out of the shower without breaking my damn neck- ugh.

And! And even when we somehow stumble across the fucking magic temperature- which Mab wrote down one day after a bit of thinking, because she is a goofy squint, or rather- the Queen Alphanumerical Squint, Queen of Squinty Eyed Nerds in the Nerd Herd- even then! Even then! It sucks because the shower spray is not big enough for both of us, one of us is going to be cold.

The tub’s never the right size- or if it is, it’s not placed correctly, or it’s not sturdy enough.

Soap in places you never intended soap to go! The suds! They burn!

Mab and I have very different time tables for showering. Mostly because we do fairly different skincare routines, and while she’s starting to get me onboard with some things, other things… I kinda ignore? Until Mab can’t stand it, and then she grabs me and does stuff, and uh… hm. Hm.

Ah, yeah, and the worst fucking thing- it’s basically impossible for us to remain standing and go all the way to Orgasm-land together. Mab’s legs go limp when she orgasms; my whole body goes limp and a bit numb when I ejaculate. We have had our closest fucking brushes with death by trying to have shower sex.

Shower. Sex.

Really, the only thing worse than shower sex is sex on the beach. Beaches have sand- filthy sand. You know how it is when you go swimming in the ocean, and you’re playing in the water, and you come back, there’s a nice breeze or whatever- and then you go back to the hotel and you’ve got sand in places you didn’t even know you had. Three showers, I took; and still didn’t get all the fucking sand. It’s worse than fucking body glitter, because it chafes.

With all that said, shower foreplay is a lot of clean, wet fun- wink wink nudge nudge say no more. Except I’m gonna say a hell of a lot more.

Mab’s breasts are still small- they did get a little bit bigger, but that’s like saying a honeydew’s a little bit bigger than a cantaloupe. Mab went from large mangoes, to large grapefruits. Not all that much bigger, but- bigger. They still fit entirely in my hands, one for each hand, and… I mean. They’re wonderfully soft, almost as soft as lung meat, which is the goddamn velvet of organ meats- but they’re small. If I put the base of my palm on the outside of her breast, my fingertips can just about touch her sternum.

On the one hand, she doesn’t really care if I play with them- mostly, she likes that I like her breasts; it’s not a good or bad feeling, when I touch them, it’s an indifferent feeling. On the other hand, pinching her nipples is an entirely different thing; she does not like that, but sucking on them… it’s okay in short bursts, but weirds her out if I go too long with it. On the gripping hand, covering her tits with soap-suds and playing with them like slippery bags of pudding is fun as hell and always makes her giggle and squirm, especially if I take the time to wash under her breasts and beneath her arms.

Her skin is so smooth and soft, it’s amazing- smooth, too, and cool to my touch. If we’re just showering together, I always end up taking a moment to just rub my hands over the flat planes of her belly, press my thumbs over her hips, rub my scruffy cheek into her smooth neck which makes her squeak and giggle, every time- which, of course, is why I do it.

I have to say, of all Mab’s smells, I think fresh washed vagina’s right up there with two day old hair and after-sex glow sweats on my list of “mmm yes, give me more of that”. It’s not objectively even a particularly nice smell- it’s kinda yeasty, actually, with an undercurrent of wetness that doesn’t fade, and the female musk-stank, and her fur is very thick and- I almost can’t get enough of her smell. Mmm. Mab smell good.

What was I thinking about? Right, foreplay.

Honestly, it’s not really foreplay, it’s… care. Affection. About six months ago, Mab started letting me wash her hair- which is a big deal, for us. Hair is… there’s a lot of sensory information you get from your hair, and a lot of magic is bound up in those strands. Mab letting me wash her hair- not just after a fight, when she can’t wash herself, but just because I want to and I can and she let me- that’s… big. Trusting.

Mab trusts me- and I trust her. So, I let her wash my hair. I also let her shave my face, which she’s actually very good at; different stroke order than me, but a very clean, very good shave. Didn’t even get my chin hairs, which I know she thinks are a little silly looking but men have beards and this is how mine grows.

I’ve conditioned her hair, combed it; pinned it up in the twisty bun styles she prefers. I’ve washed her wings, too, and oh god was that more work than I realized. It was also such a massive turn on that as soon as we were reasonably dry, she fucked me into the floorboards of her little houseboat.

Mab’s hair, before she pulls it up and back again, or braids it for sleeping, is a wave of thick, curly, warm blackness that smells like honeysuckle and coconut oil. It’s her shampoo that smells like that flower; and the oil’s what she uses to condition her hair and her skin.

It’s also soft as hell, and shiny like the finest of horse hair; she’ll let my run my fingers through it a little, but she always has to wet comb her hair after that because it messes up the lay of the fibers. Similarly, she’ll let me rub my hands all over her wings- and honestly? If she’s relaxed, her wings feel like satin. Very smooth, very soft; but as more of her protective powder layer rubs away, they start feeling more… glass like. And if I rub right across the glass, she’ll giggle herself right out of the sex mood.

Right now, I’m using her wings more as… hm. Handles?

I’ve got a handful of her hair, not too close to her scalp so I can’t pull too much, not so it hurts- but, and this surprised the hell out of me… My wife? She likes it a bit rougher than I do.

As in, when I teased her about ripping the crotch of her swimsuit to have her before we bathed, her whole face flushed bright red and her wings scrubbed themselves together in what I recognize now as her version of the ‘hearts and noodles dance’. On her, it’s the ‘sexy shimmy’ and it’s cute as hell. Her wings make this very faint squeaking noise, and she rises up onto her tippy-toes and I just- woo.

From the back, it’s another story, but from the front it’s cute as hell.

So.

I undressed her; and when it came to her swimsuit, I poked a hole in the crotch and tore it through. She shuddered, and moaned, and when I touched her pussy it was slippery and soaking wet and we’d hardly even kissed. I let myself get rougher with her- not harsh, but rougher.

Pushed her up against the unyielding wall with a firm thump, instead of a gentle push; dragged her up along the wall and shoved her this way and that, making sure the stone scraped along her wings, until her pussy was in just the right spot. She shuddered and whined and sighed with pleasure- and then...

Normally, there’s quite a bit of foreplay, and we’re usually in equal states of undress by the time we make love. This time, I only paused long enough to undo my belt and drop my trousers down.

I jammed myself into her heaving wet pussy with a snap of my hips, and without giving her a chance to recover, I snapped into her again. Again, again, again- letting go of my self control, setting a pace I’d normally take while masturbating. Pap-pap-pap-pap was the sound of my hips against her; that was the same beat of my balls, smacking into her ass. Her belly jolted with each thrust, and her tits began to sway and jounce to the rhythm; pap-pap-pap-pap and her eyes started to go hot and liquid, which is how I know I’m doing right by her.

When I felt the cool grip of her hands, clinging to my horns, I all but lost my mind. I know I thrust harder than I have before- harder even than when I accidentally make her piss the bed, harder than ever. I know her eyes went huge in her head, a pair of brown eyes surrounded by pure white and a hot flushed face. I remember her tits bouncing in restraining taffeta; I remember her letting go for just long enough to undo the button of her swimsuit, the way the top fell down and her chest heaved in air and the sharp points of her nipples. Pale pink on tawny skin, because her breasts hardly ever see sunlight; the only part of her body that has softer skin is her inner thigh, right near the cleft of her ass. I’ve checked.
I remember biting and suckling along her neck, marking the meat of her shoulder above the clavicle; how every time I’d bite down her hips would roll up to meet mine and her hands would tighten to the edge of pain on my horns. I remember how when I kissed her mouth she was like a wild thing, lips and tongue and teeth all a wild, wet, slippery mash of mouth-flavored moaning incoherently.

I remember a deep, possessive growl coming from my chest, and the way it drove her wild.

I remember when she lost control of herself. It started slow enough- I started grinding into her, the base of my penis rolling into her clitoris and her legs wrapping around my waist, the soles of her feet digging into my ass, her heels especially. I remember shaking away her hands from my horns, and kissing her with all the fire and passion I could muster; I remember her arms, snaking under mine and then her cold hands clasping onto my shoulders, the sharp touch of her claws just gripping-

And then I found her sweetest spots, and the grip turned to hot white agony, as pleasure thundered through my veins. When the light of god receded, I beheld my own wife, shuddering underneath me. I had collapsed against the wall, pinning us both in place, and she had been unable to do anything other than let her pussy swallow every drop of my seed. Her hands… how to say this.

Fae are bird people- they always have been, even when they were Dwarves, or Elves, or what have you. Rouse a Fae, and you’ll see they have claws- some have them more prominently on the feet, like Bryony. Mab has a claw for each finger of her hand, and another set on her feet, and they are sharp enough- and her grip strong enough- to puncture through steel and sliver bits of adam wood down to size. When she orgasms, she can’t control her claws; so, normally, she finds something inanimate to hold onto. This time, she had my shoulders.

It burned like hellfire, later. Right then? I’d be hard pressed to remember my own name, much less the fact that Mab is a dangerous woman.

Usually, I’d let that be the end of it. Usually, my wife doesn’t grab my horns. My tail lashed and curled behind me as I turned her over, mushing her chest and face into the wall and presenting her pretty dragonfly wings with their bright red eye spots to my rapacious eye. I worry at her wing-joint with my teeth just to hear her squeal, and I can feel the sudden almost tortuously tight grip her pussy has over my cock; a pain so good I nearly bite down for true, which would end things on a note I’m not interested in playing.

When I harden inside her, I can feel her anticipation swell as well.

Ah, hell- I haven’t even talked about her ass! She’s got a flat butt when she’s relaxed, but when her muscles tense it’s like magic- gah, and she’s always covered up during the winter, I hardly get to see it except for when we’re like this. During the summer, she always wears short shorts, but- they’re high waisted short shorts, because she has a pair of flapjacks. And yes- they’re soft and tasty, like all flapjacks should be. Her very favorite thing is for me to dig my fingers into the muscles of her ass; makes her horny as hell and it’s not like it’s hard to do-

Gggnnngngh! Fuck I- I forgot that when I’m going from behind, her orgasm clamps down around me in a completely different way, which feels very nice but I’m not going to last like this, I need- I know!

I pull out, to her sharp whine; then, I lift her and… I don’t throw her to the ground, it’s too careful for that, but- one moment, she’s smooshed against the wall face-first, the next she’s upside down. Her back’s being supported by the wall, and her legs I’ve pushed apart and I’m standing over her. Her eyes widen in disbelief because we’ve tried this one many times, but it never goes quite right but I think I’ve got it this time- I pull on her hips and push her around until most of the actual combined weight is in the frictional pressure of her lower back against the wall, not her neck.

I stroke her thighs, and look deep into her eyes until she’s blushing and panting and whining from anticipation- and then, after carefully putting myself in, I start to churn her butter. The movement’s really weird, and this isn’t my favorite position, but… for her, at least, it all comes down to geography. She explained it to me once, while I was fingering her gently: a woman’s clitoris is not just the nubby bit over both the holes. The clitoris actually surrounds the vagina proper, and goes pretty far into the vaginal canal; what usually gets referred to as ‘vagina’ is the labia majora and pubis mons, sometimes referred to as the vulva. The vagina is the hole and everything in it that leads up to the cervix and uterus. Or that’s what I remember, I could be wrong.

The reason some of my rougher treatment makes Mab piss herself isn’t because I’m doing anything wrong, actually- it’s because her clitoral nerves and the nerves that control her urethra are in just the right position, when she’s on her back, to get crossed and cause problems.

In the butter churn position, everything is lined up just right so that won’t happen- and if I can just-get-enough-traction- ah, got it. Mab starts making a squealing, squawking yelpy whiny whimper with each forward thrust; her legs flail around in the air for a moment, then tilt towards her head, but no that’ll make it hard for her to breathe which she really doesn’t like- come here-

I hook her ankles around my neck and carefully lean down, press her legs into the- diamond- shape- and got her, got her, there it is! Mab’s eyes have started rolling with pleasure, and it’s only a bit of teasing- before- nnnnnnngh! Her orgasms, when I do it like this, hit with all the subtlety of a pipe-bomb.

I thrust deeper and deeper, chasing my own pleasure to Mab’s vocal delight, but- no. No, not in this position, damn it all to hell- well. While I make her feel good, I might as well get comfortable. I undo my tie and toss it aside, kick my lacy panties and trousers and belt and shoes off until I’m in socks and and shirt and undershirt; pop the button on my shirt collar and undo it enough to entice Mab with a view of my clavicles- not right now, she’s orgasming again but- in a moment. The belt that keeps my shirts tucked when I kneel or crouch or bend over much at all and the shirt, those stay on; and my garters too because it actually takes a bit more than just some pulling and tugging to get all that off, and I have a plan.

No really, I’ve been mulling this over for a while- and she’s okay with all the individual parts, so… let’s put this dish together. We’ve talked about me being rougher, and Mab being more spontaneous, and she likes it when I’m… commanding.

I’ve got my safeword; she’s got hers.

Here we go.

I buck, and then start grinding, which I know makes her orgasms more intense- I grind, roll my hips, grind, grind, like I’m making pepper powder with my dick and her clit, grind it down- and then, when I can feel the sharp short shivers that precede her really spectacular orgasms, I stop, and pull out, and hold her hips tight and still with my hands.

I watch as Mab almost loses her sexually frustrated mind, tightening my not inconsiderable grip on her hips and digging my fingers into her ass until her squirms and shakes die down- she didn’t orgasm, after all; she almost orgasmed.
“Sa-ah-sahnji, what-?”

“I am going to make you mine.”

“-sanji?”

“Ueltima Thule, this Germa is going to make you his-”

“-oh holy fuck-”

“-and unless you want a punishment, you’ll do as he says.”

“...ah, ah- s-sir, what- aaah!- what shall th-this one d-do for y-you?”

“Hold it in, Thule.”

“S-sir?”

“Every drop of seed I pour into you this eve- hold it in your womb until I say it is well, and you may release it.”

“A-ah, s-s-sir, that-”

“Of course, if you can’t manage a small thing such as that, I shall have to give you a punishment training.”

“S-sir?”

“If you can’t manage to hold it all in, Thule, I’ll have to fill you up again- then plug you shut with one of our toys, perhaps the wind-up-”

“-oh god-”

“-or the extra large. Of course, since it’s a punishment, I’ll have you wear… mm, perhaps the short pants? And a belt, and a waist-trainer; your distorted figure is for my eyes alone-”

“-aaah-”

“-would you like that, Thule? Would you like to be punished?”

“Ah- aaah- n-no sir, I can- I can do as you c-comma-aaaaah-ah-and, I-”

“-Excellent! Let’s get started, then.”

I say, smiling down at her and blushing hard enough I’m half afraid of fainting. I have no idea why she likes it when I talk to her like that, but she does. Although… hearing her call me ‘Sir’, seeing her whine and pant and squirm as I tell her such filthy things… it’s like a bolt of pure pleasure-fire straight through my dick and balls, tightening my guts, pushing my chest out and snapping my spine straight. My horns tingle with pleasure, and my tail bristles with excitement.

However, humiliation- or rather, humiliating my partner- isn’t my thing. Thus, we exit from the wall nearby the bed, opposite the door to our more public chamber in this guest suite of the palace, to the secondary door of the bathroom, and through it.

Beyond is a lovely bathroom that we’re probably going to wreck- or at least damage. If I was Mab, I’d have something to say about the bathroom- but I’m me, so all I can say is the tub’s clean, the toilet works, and the bench thing built into the tub is a gift from the gods.

I pull Mab’s thoroughly ruined swimsuit off of her body, throwing it to the ground. Mab gasps as the cum inside her body suddenly has room to expand in, and does; her belly bulges and settles into a squishy, churning lump. The entire ridge of fur along my back is buzzing with need- I need- I need to-

“You are a beautiful woman, Thule.”

“Ah? Th-thank you, Sir.”

“The way your belly curves to allow my child the space to grow-”

“-kyaaaaaaaah♥-”

“-is truly magnificent.”

Mab is blushing so hard I’m actually a little nervous, but her legs are spreading wide open around me and her heels are digging into my- yep, she likes dirty talk. I’ve got about an hour and nowhere to be until after sunset, when the feast is happening- and Luffy’s mowing down teatime, so- I put Mab on the counter of the sink.

I look her over. And then I turn away and take a piss.

I wash my hands.

I undress fully, taking the time to pick up and sort our discarded clothing.

I gather our bathing supplies, our combs and brushes and so on, and set out our dinner clothing; and then I return to my lovely wife, stewing in a combination of lust and love juices. Sweat has turned her hair limp and ragged, and her wings are squirming against each other, just as her legs are pressing together.

The bathroom nearly reeks of desperation and desire.

I could go on from here, explain what I know must have happened based on the pattern of scratches Mab put across my shoulders and down my back. I could talk about exactly what it looks and sounds like when Mab squeezes everything I’ve put into her back out again.

But what’s most important is this.
“...Mab?”

“...yes sanji...?”

“One day, I’m going to get you pregnant. You’ll look like that for real; I swear it.”

“...promise?”

“Promise.”

“...Okay, Sanji. Love you.”

“Love you too.”

And this, too- Mab is startlingly shy about physical affection. Not giving it; receiving it. Having it demonstrated to her that I genuinely care about her turns her shy, and soft, delicate like the finest spun sugar-glass. It’s… bittersweet. What must have happened to her, to make the most affectionate woman I’ve ever had the pleasure of being with so careful with accepting- ach. Breathe, Sanji.

Time to dry off, and get ready for a fancy dinner party.

Oh my god that was amazing. Oh my god. Oh my god.

Kyaaaaah♥, my husband is amazing and I love him so much!

Ahem.

So fucking much oh my gods and goddesses aaaaaah!

Before we- ah, well- before that♥, I wiped myself down in the common room and Continuity Errored everyone’s fancy clothing into their rooms for them to change into.

I also explained- for those who cared- what exactly a feast entails, and what I- and Sanji, because he married me, not the other way around- would have to to more than likely get up to, tonight at least. I also told the girls my job, and- after it was explained to me that they are members of the crew- asked if they would mind terribly going to a fancy dinner party with us.

They said yes, they’d go, after a bit of deliberation; I said, wonderful; now, if it’s alright, and since there are four of you and you’re all filthy with the day’s dirt, could Taffy and Bry help you wash up for the night?

To which, after Taffy and Bryony made themselves apparent, they agreed.

I said: Oh good. I’ll help you get dressed for the party, if that’s alright- and we’ll wash your clothing, too, alright?
This was met with a general chorus of nods from the girls.

After we- ahem- and bathed, my Shadow powers returned to me in full force, rather than the patchy nonsense I had this past two days, it’s felt like, but it might have only been one. Like I said- it’s a combination of salt and water and instinct and culture that stops a Devil Fated in the ocean; if proper steps are taken, there is no reason why one might not do what needs doing, regardless.

The girls aren’t done bathing yet- Taffy is drawing on deep wells of patience and brushing F’s hair, while Bryony is wrangling B and C into towels. G… got very upset, but seems much better now.

Hm.

Tonight, I shall be wearing one of my very few fully formal gowns. Normally, a simple dress or even a skirt is quite enough to be getting on with, but, as I am expected to dine with peers of the realm and am, in fact, also a peer of an entirely different realm, I have to get all fancy and shit.

Thus, the most traditional of traditional Skuan garments; not the saree, as that’s a particularly summer garment, in the Skuan tradition, and it’s still January. No, for this event, I’ll have to wear a kaftan.

A kaftan is a variant of the robe or tunic, from the old Faerie “kap ton”, meaning “covering garment”; a variety of which has been worn by several entirely disparate cultures around the World for thousands of years. The kaftan in it’s most ancient form is worn as a coat or overdress, usually reaching to the ankles, with long sleeves. It can be made of wool, cashmere, silk, or cotton, and may be worn with a sash or veil.

Through the rolling tides of history, the kaftan has acquired different names, styles, purposes, and uses depending on the culture. In regions with a warm climate, the kaftan is worn as a light-weight, loose-fitting garment; in colder regions, the kaftan is a heavy, fur-lined affair. In Skua especially, the kaftan has always been a symbol of royalty- be it personage, or favor, or otherwise.

Kaftans have increased in popularity among the people, largely in part to their marketing as ‘sack-dresses’; and, to be fair, there’s no reason they shouldn’t. A kaftan is appropriate for casual and formal wearing. I should say- traditionally, and as I’ll be wearing, a kaftan is a loose, ankle length garment with long, flowing sleeves. Impractical for most of my work- but, perfectly reasonable otherwise. There is a rather spectacular collection of the Royal kaftans that I was allowed to study much closer than any other student of my class, due to my Line; they’re kept on rotating display in a number of locations, one of which is the Lure. It’s a very big museum.

Some of those garments are so incredibly valuable, even at the time of their creation, that they were presented to generals who were successful in battle, and to important officials of the Realm during religious festivals.

They were also historically- and, I suppose, presently- worn by men in Nort Blue, where they are more like a long jacket with tight sleeves. Kaftans are still very popular traditional wear in Fiddler’s Green, where they’re more often seen on women, rather than men, and they can be bought in a wide range of fabrics, colors, and prints. They are suitable for weddings, engagement parties, feasts, blessing ceremonies, and a thousand and one other occasions.

Most importantly of all, however, is the sheer ease of wearing a kaftan. There’s no special undergarments required; you don’t need any kind of training to put it on. For the most part, if it has buttons, just do up the buttons- they always go in front; and if it doesn’t have buttons, it slips over one’s head. The kaftan is an undemanding and comfortable garment to wear.

More importantly- to me, at least- is that they tend to suit any person, of almost any shape or size.

Now, a kaftan is usually made of flowy fabrics, but one must pay attention to this aspect; keeping in mind when it is to be worn, above all. A light fabric, like cotton or sheer silk, is better for hot days, beach picnics, or other casual outings. On the other hand, for an evening party, fabric like satin, georgette, rayon, heavy silk, and so on are best.

A kaftan can be short or long; for a day of office work, a shorter tunic length variety, or even shorter, is perfect. A medium-length printed kaftan, something akin to a day-dress, is perfect for all-day, everyday wear- add a pair of leggings to extend the wearability from season to season. For a formal occasion- which this is, even though we’re pirates- a full length or longer kaftan is appropriate. It ought to be ankle to floor length, with the longer variety being worn by married women.

A kaftan may look quite oversized because of its loose fit; this is best remedied in two ways. Firstly, the appropriate bag, as a kaftan is so loose and flowing any kind of pockets or such-like would be instantly noticed. A small purse or clutch is most appropriate, although a pocketbook or folding wallet-clutch could also be used- it is of the utmost importance that the clutch in some way matches the kaftan, be it in primary, secondary, or even tertiary colors- or, more rarely, in the detail work. Secondly, for sophistication, accessorising with jewellery is paramount.

An embellished kaftan is already almost entirely complete; however, a few carefully chosen pieces can really pull a look together. It is advisable to leave the architectural neckpieces behind, at least for a sophisticated evening look- on an embellished kaftan, at least; heavy earrings and beautiful maang tikka are much more the thing. On a plain or printed kaftan, one wears a necklace without hesitation.

There’s also the option of a few subtle bangles or a bracelet to complete the entire look, which I might do.

The caftan seduces the body and the eye- it’s an unlikely garment of sex appeal. It turns yards of fabric into near nudity with the right breeze, and it’s loose and unfitted form has been irresistible all over the world for thousands of years. Ah, but I will blather on about clothing forever- I need to actually pick my damn jewellry out, put on makeup…

Order. Order is important- it goes hair, then makeup, then underthings aside from underwear, then the battle attire, then the fine garment of choice, perfume, shoes, jewellery, and- let’s transfer everything into the clutch… Okay.

Let’s get started.

Hair first; a simple enough, old style; every Fae girl knows the basics of at least one of them, and this one is held in place by a series of pins that resolve into a crown of laurel leaves around the side and back of my head, done in silver. I sprayed my hair through with parfum of rose before combing it out after it dried; and now that’s that.

Next, makeup- I already take care of my skin with rigor, no blemishes, discolorations, or spots- a lotion and a primer base, to reduce the size of my pores; then tinted moisturizer, to keep things even-toned; finish with soft powder in my color to help everything settle. Eyeshadow, in a soft fawn brown and a darker shade- neither of which are out of place on my skin; the sharp, original cat eye, as provided by kohl powder. White tear drop liner, under the eyes- give an appropriate pop, correct for the season as well. The barest tint in my dewy lipstain, not really a gloss at all- it does shine and pink up my lips a bit, but you wouldn’t notice unless you stare at my mouth all the time. Finally, my glasses- not my normal frames, but a rimless pair I almost never wear because they feel very fragile on my face. I know they aren’t, intellectually- but they don’t feel right. Then again, I do use the thick frames of my regular glasses as a bit of an emotional crutch- dammit, Sanji-

“Sanji, you have to wear more than just garters and shirt-stays to dinner.”

“-Sorry, sorry- I, uh- sorry.”

“Mmmhm.”

Where was I? Hair, check, Makeup, check; underthings. In this case, it’s a simple slip- my underwear is actually the same color as my skin, creating a lovely nude effect, but to avoid scandalizing anyone- the slip. Smooth silk lace, nothing terribly exciting- one chain on the jack and an evening’s work got it done, in this color, even. Brown, of course, to match my kaftan.

“Put your pants on, Sanji; all the way on, there’s a love.”

“…’kay.”

Hair, makeup, underthings; battle attire. A chiton, with re-enforced silk threads along the warp; goes over all my underthings and is just light enough that it won’t show under my kaftan. Tie it in the hanbok style, which means low across my breasts above the nipples, and- there. Done.

Hair, makeup, underthings, battle attire; dress. A brown kaftan, almost serenely beautiful. Silk chiffon, delicate, tiny pleats; silver embellishments that chime softly as I pull it on, over my head. Spend a moment adjusting everything, making sure nothing is caught or twisted- but no, it’s on correctly. Fits right too, all my curves and angles rendered moot under the soft drape of the fabric.

I hear Sanji swallow.

“Deep breath, then put your tie on.”

“-yes. Yes.”

Hair, makeup, underthings, dress; perfume rolls on behind the ears and at the nape of my neck, smells of honeysuckle. Oh, why not- a quick swipe under each tit, and again between my thighs. I do it with my eyes closed to ensure my Shadow’s working again- and it is, it’s working fine. Ah, I remember now- perfume’s supposed to go on with the underthings, damn. I’ll get it next time.

Then, shoes- this pair of flat jewelled gladiator style sandals in gold go nicely with the dress- and the stones are cool toned, to balance out the heat of the sandal. Dammit, no, not if I want to wear toe rings- what else, what else… Ah. A plain leather pair, exactly the color of my winter skin- perfect. Oh, yes, and- I paint my fingernails and toenails with clear gloss about once every week and a half? It’s just a protective coating, really, nothing fancy- it does look nice and shiny, I guess… No need to repaint them just yet, I think.

Hair, makeup, underthings, perfume, dress, shoes; jewelry. Hell’s bells, I need to get my ears pierced again, otherwise I’ll never be able to wear the full set- rrgh! Ah well; and this maang tikka just isn’t right for this outfit, no matter how pretty- balls!

Too old for arm rings, wrong dress for bangles, already wearing my rings, none of the headbands I have are quite right for this occasion. I… hm.

“Sanji- ah, you look nice. Wait, don’t put on your jacket yet- I need your help, actually.”

“Ah, alright- how can I help, pchelka?”

“I need you to put on these toe rings for me- and probably help with some of my head-pieces...”

“Oh.”

Sanji breathes out a sigh of excitement, longing, pride- something warm and smokey passes between his lips before he joins me in front of the vanity and gazes at me through the mirror. Sanji’s eyes glitter with- something. Love, I think is the best way to describe it.

Toe rings are worn in Skua, and have been worn in the wider Fae culture, since before the Age of Heroes; Sita, whom Ravana stole, threw her toe ring on the path so that her Lord Husband, Rama, could find her. Thus, since then until now, toe rings are a part of a married woman’s jewellery box. Although it is common for a husband to put the toe rings on the second toe of both feet during the wedding ceremony itself- in essence, during the signing of the contract, it’s not necessary.

Still. A Fae woman with rings on the second toe of both feet is married; if one or the other is missing, it indicates some manner of separation… right is separation due to duty, as in her husband has gone to war, or to sea, and is- one hopes- is, quite rightly, going to return. Left is divorce, or death, or some other misfortune- and she has been left behind.

The Syreene word for it is bichiya, minji in Faerie, jodavi in Cherubim; and the Djinn have three words for it, Mettelu, Kanaiyazhi, and Kaalungura. If I’m remembering rightly, the Djinn make a distinction between a pair of toe rings, a single right toe ring, and a single left toe ring- and thus, each has it’s own specific name and connotation.

Fae toe rings are usually made of silver and worn in pairs, on the second toe of both feet. Traditionally, they are quite ornate; however, more contemporary designs exist, for the more modern bride. Some sets may have pairs for three of the five toes- excluding the biggest and smallest, for the sake of being able to walk reasonably well. They ought not be made of gold, as gold still holds a ‘respected’ or even ‘revered’ status and is not worn below the waist until one is scrimshawn; however, this isn’t a strict rule or law, and toe rings of gold and diamonds are fairly popular.

Like the charnel earrings in my ears, these toe rings, once put into place, are not removed. However, unlike the charnellements of the Fae, a woman’s toe rings could reasonably be sold in dire circumstance- as a new pair of toe rings is a simple matter, requiring only a husband to put them on one’s feet, whereas a new set of charnellements requires disturbing the dead from their well-earned rest.

Exchanging rings is a tradition worldwide for a number of reasons, marriage being one that appears more often than not. It’s the Fae tradition, however, that such rings be put on the toes, if possible. I’m not entirely sure why- nor am I entirely sure of the medical benefits of wearing toe rings to regulate various bodily processes. I’m not entirely sure virility and fertility can be controlled with rings on one’s toes, but then again, every little bit does help...

“So… ah, I always forget how pretty your jewelry is, you hardly ever wear it-”

“Well, yes, most of it is dangly and would get caught or tarnished in my day to day life.”

“...I like it, when you wear jewelry.”

“...You do?”

“Mm. Not sure why- I just. Hm. Does something for me.”

“Hm. Well. I’ll keep that in mind; I’m sure I have a few pieces lying around somewhere that would tickle your fancy…”

“I’m sure you do. -Right! Which of these go where-?”

“This set of six, and the anklets, too-”

“Ah. Pretty!”

“Hmhmhm, yes. Ah- anklet first, I think.”

“Alright- shall I just take the whole tray, or-?”

“Yeah, just take the tray.”

Sanji takes a knee, and looks up at me patiently. Whoops, stop staring at his horns, Mab- I shift to my left foot, and then raise my kaftans skirt to about the middle of my calf, maybe a little higher, and then I give him my sandaled foot.

“Anklet over the sandal?”

“That’s how that set’s designed to be worn, so- yeah.”

“Okay.”

Sanji’s fingers are very strong and callused, yet very delicate as he puts the loop of the anklet’s chain over my second toe and clasps the shining silver leaves over my ankle. I can feel a hot pink blush stealing over my cheeks; I can feel the delicate pressure of Sanji’s fingers on my calf as he ‘adjusts’ the anklet. His other hand cups my heel, and holds me steady.

I swallow, and only catch about half of what he’s saying, but-

“Th-the, ah, the- the ring with the, the cocktail ring- the big one, y-yes.”

“Ah. On the second toe?”

“Mhm.”

I squeak, a little, as he rubs between my toes and carefully puts on the cocktail ring.

“That’s not for every day, is it?”

“What-? Oh, no, no- the other two are more for every day, but that’s a special occasion ring.”

“Ah. So… after the party, you’re going to move which one to your second toe?”

“Uhm… well. E-either the half eternity, or the little hearts… I, ah. I hadn’t decided, yet.”

“I see.”

The second ring is the half eternity, which goes on my third toe; and the third is the little hearts toe ring, which has a gap in the back so it can be adjusted to fit almost any of my toes or fingers. He lets go of my foot, and gently guides it back down; I shift my weight again, and raise my other foot. He catches it, and the whole process repeats.

Throughout it all, the expression on his face is so- gentle- warm and soft and sweetly smiling. And then he’s done, and placing my foot back onto the floor. He kisses the tips of his fingers, and looks up at me with glimmering eyes as I let my skirt back down.

He stands still kissing the tips of his fingers, then brushes those kisses against the underside of my jaw, soft fingertips trailing over sensitive skin. Gnngh.

“You need help with your hair jewelry?”

“Command me, then, beautiful Mab; I am yours.”

“O-oh, Sanji-”

My eyes fly open at his pronouncement, and catch on his burning blue eyes, aglow with love for me. My heart does a soft somersault, then settles into a steady beat, like the fluttering of a bird in the grass.
“How am I to help you, Mab?”

“R-right- um, this is the tikka I will wear-”

“-lovely-”

“Hmhm… I want it to be here, on my forehead, so- the main chain has a clasp at the end, like a hook, aye?”

“Aye.”

“Pull that open- ah, I left it open, nevermind- and hook it into the big pin at the back of my head. I’m going to bow forwards a bit, to help-”

“Ah. Right- and… there.”

“Good. Take these bobby pins, just two, and cross them over the clasp, open ends down, please.”

“Ah, so it won’t let go, I see.”

“Mm. …Having trouble?”

“No, I got it.”

“Give it a little tug to make sure it’s really in- nn, that’s got it. Good job- and up I go.”

“Thank you. So-”

“Ah, right- so, d’you see how each strand has an individual hook-clasp at the end?”

“Ah, yes.”

“Pull those open- not, like, flat, but open. There’s good-”

“-okay-”

“Take one half of the strands in one hand, with the big pendant in the middle-”

“-okay-”

“-and stand at my side on that side. Yes, just like that. My laurel pins are arranged in a bit of a line up and down on the side, yes?”

“Yes. -ah, the leaves pop out like a wreath, but the actual pins all go in more or less the same place.”

“Exactly. Starting from the top-most strand, hook each clasp into the base of where the laurel pins end- towards the back of my head, please- and go down until you run out. Don’t worry about doing it quickly, and be sure to give a little tug to each strand when you’re done- they need to be fairly firmly attached.”

“Alright- and… should I use two bobby pins on these, or just the one?”

“Just the one should be fine.”

“Kay.”
Ah. My husband is a kind and gentle man. When he is done, he presses a soft, chaste kiss to my mouth and stands back, to take me in. I preen, just a little, under his gaze, and the smile that lights his face is so… hmmm.

“Well. That’s me dressed- d’you want a pair of cufflinks, or are you going to wear your normal set?”

“I really do love those cufflinks - but… this is a formal occasion.”

“Mhm.”

“…you got me new cufflinks?”

“Well. Yes.”

“Mab, you didn’t have to get me anything-”

“Well, I actually made them-”

“-ngh-”

“-and you don’t have to wear them at all, I just… I like making jewelry, Sanji, and… cufflinks are kind of the only thing you wear. I could make you a ring or two, I suppose, but it’d end up on a chain or something around your neck, and…”

“-hnnngh-”

“…So. I also have jewelry you could wear, if you wanted.”

“…really?”

“Mmhm.”

“Oh. Uh- c-cufflinks.”

“Mm. Here.”

“Oh, these are- these are our colors, Mab-”

“Mmmmmph♥! Hmhmhmhmhmhmhm! Sa-hahahaha-sanji- Sanji, stop, you’ll muss my hair-”

“Fff. I think these might be my new favorite.”

“You can have favorites for different occasions, Sanji.”

“Oh. …Really?”

“Mmhm.”

And my husband fairly beams as he- hold it right there, mister!
“Sanji, can I put them on for you?”

He squeaks and it’s the most adorable sound I’ve heard him make in hours.

“O-okay. Uh. Sure.”

I smile, and gently take his arm; the cufflink pops out easy enough, and I set it on the vanity in an empty little dish. I can feel my soft fond feelings for my husband welling up in me, the way my Shadow slowly entwines with his and the soft gasping sigh that comes out of him- I carefully button his shirt with the cufflink, making sure his shirt-sleeve is tidy and his sleeves are neat. He likes the kissing cuff style, which is fairly common, and- done. One two three four buttons in the tuxedo shirt, and the cufflink is a yellow and brown striped spot at his wrist, just as it should be. I rub my fingers over his hands, catch his fingers with mine and- cha, I can’t help but smile, and blush a little bit. Then, the other cuff, the other hand, such beautiful hands my husband has.

There’s a small cut, at the base of his left thumb- he always gets distracted when he uses a food mill, it’s the strangest thing; the flattened fingertips from where he’s touched hot pans, the pointer a little numb to temperature because of how many times he’s run the tip through something cooking to taste; the corrugated side of the forefinger, from where the peeler slips, and the ripple of muscle underneath- meant to grip, to probe, so sensitive to differences in texture; the ball of his thumb is ploughed like a field, awash with cuts that have not gone through his tough skin.

A brown scar in a thin line, over the back of his right hand, from where he brushed against a baking sheet and cursed most foully in my houseboat’s kitchen, and another small brown spot on the back of his left where a bit of frying-grease popped and caught him and he cursed even more foully- that was a very sweary day, I swear. Still, even when held in my own… my hands, I think, carry an aura of precision, of delicate repetitive motions perfected- but Sanji’s hands are graceful, even with their oddly pointed fingers and strange smells.

He’s patient, organized and detail oriented, like me; but where I do best doing several ‘leave it to it’ jobs at once, he’s more of a hand’s on worker, and he does so many things at once. Part of the reason I’m so glad, sometimes, that he likes to cook is- ah, nevermind. It’s strange… the fondest memories I have of Sanji are of him doing things like reducing a stock so it can be stored for later more efficiently… just him constantly stirring the pot, skimming scum off the top, transferring the thicker and thicker liquid to smaller and smaller pots… and me, at the table or on the couch, spinning thread and just being in his company.

I must say… I don’t really notice the purity of reduced stock, compared to regular stock- but Sanji does, and Sanji cares very much. We cook curry with exactly the same ingredients, now- but his comes out better because he cuts the vegetables just a little more evenly, and he measures the spices with a defter hand, and he makes the rice perfectly every time, which I still haven’t managed except on accident. He’s got a better sense of food balance than I do; I can balance a single dish, but he can balance a full meal with several compliments of dishes, each one harmonious with the whole and itself harmonious, too.

My husband is lean, not thin; there’s a whole wall of muscle that makes up his body, and his bones are heavy and thick and strong, underneath. And there’s a spark of… deep contentment, burning in him; especially when he cooks, or right after we make love.
“I do need to put on my vest and jacket.”

“Mm. Let me put your tie on, at least-”

“Alright.”

He walks away from me, and I am suddenly bereft of his warmth, the smell of him; and then he returns, bearing his vest and jacket in one hand, which get tossed across the still freshly made bed, and his tie in the other. It’s plain black, formal occasion- nothing he wouldn’t wear normally, honestly, although he does like flashy patterns…

Sanji’s face is actually fairly round for an oval, meaning the collars of nearly every shirt he has falls within ninety degrees in angle at the collar points; some are narrower than that, but those are fairly rare, and he has… three shirts with oblique angles at the collar.

The tuxedo shirt he’s wearing now is no different, with the pointed collar and everything- sharp ninety degree angle. Sanji usually ties his tie with a four-in-hand, the most casual knot you can use for such things. Today… hm. Formal occasion. Face shape…

Half Windsor knot.

I tie Sanji’s tie, and clip it with his favorite tie clip. Smooth my hands over his chest and call his vest to my hands and step back, hold it open and up for him and help it settle on his shoulders, he doesn’t wear vests very often but this is as formal a dinner as it gets excepting perhaps a coronation. I stroke up and down his back and measure the breadth of his shoulders with my hands as Sanji buttons up his vest, and then I stroke across his stomach and over his smooth chest because I need to touch him. I stare at him in the mirror, over his shoulder, and breathe deeply of his smell; fresh from the shower- sandalwood, from his soap; a touch of his own natural musk from watching me get ready for the night, and his cologne is… hm. Citrusy- bergamot! Notes of cinnamon and cardamom, at the nape of his neck, I need to breath him in. He’ll probably add cigarette smoke to his overall odor at some point, which… yeah, alright. Still not my favorite, but… still not my favorite.

Jacket next, which I help him into because he’s still not comfortable with the vest, it’s okay, love- he buttons it, and then- pocket square. Because his tie is solid black, his pocket square is printed with an interesting, and fairly busy, black and white print; the cotton folds up sharp, and tucks into his jacket pocket on the outside left in a thin straight line, and on the inside right goes his cigarette case which I got for him, and the lighter, too, because- if he’s going to smoke, he’s going to smoke well, dammit.

I step away to make sure I have what I need for the girls- and when I turn back, Sanji is fully dressed and making sure his hair falls just right. I take a moment to catch my breath; my husband’s radiance nearly knocked me out, just then. Sanji wears pretty much what he always wears; double breasted suit.

It’s just a little fancier, what with the tuxedo elements.

And I’m in a fancy dress, too.

We gaze at each other for a long, warm moment- and gods help me, I remember what I needed to ask.
“How do you want to be addressed?”

“How?”

“At the dinner party, the other Royalty is going to address me as ‘Ultima Thule’; how do you want them to call you?”

“Ah.”

“We’ve got about two hours before you have to make a decision- so. Think it over.”

“Heh. Not giving me time to mope?”

“Not a goddamn second.”

“...Love you.”

“Love you too.”

Last kiss- and now, into the fray!

Now then: pretty much everyone except the girls are all in kimono, even Mark, Taffy, and Bryony- oh, right, I remember now. So... while we were separated, I just kinda... kept making kimono. Uh. So now everyone’s wearing kimono- except for me and Sanji, because we’re actual, genuine Royalty and that has rules, okay.

Look, a tan is a standard size for fabric- they sell jacks in that size, for god’s sake, and the chain-cards, too. One damask pattern begets another; iromuji kimono are not terribly complicated to make, nor are awase iromuji. And, with the leftover silk, I made tsumugi and awase tsumugi because what’s the point of a lovely robe if you can’t wear it any time-

Oh.

Excuse me.

The kimono is the most internationally recognized traditional Ryugu Mergyo garment in the World. The word ‘kimono’ actually means ‘thing to wear’ ( ki ‘wear’ and mono ‘thing’); but in the wider World, it has come to denote the full-length, one piece garment. With that said, kimono are always worn for important festivals or formal occasions. It is a formal style of garment associated World-wide with politeness and good manners; Izo, the Sixteenth Commander of the Whitebeard Pirates, wears kimono, as does Jinbe, Knight of the Sea, and both are known for their polite manners. Ace is polite company, but he really doesn’t like wearing fabric on his upper body and half nudity is considered rude in Ryugu Mergyo- if the garment only covers below the waist, I mean. I think.

It’s been a long time, I could be wrong.

Kimono are T-shaped, straight-lined robes worn so that the hem falls to the ankle, with attached collars and long, wide sleeves. Kimono are to be wrapped around the body, always with the left side over the right- excepting for corpses, in which the wrapping is reversed- and are secured by a sash called an obi, which is tied at the back in most of society. They are generally worn with traditional Ryugu footwear- zori, geta, and tabi, usually.
Up until the fifth century, kimono were made of hemp or linen, and they were made with multiple layers of materials. Today, ‘proper’ kimono tend to be made of silk, silk brocade, silk crepe, and satin weaves. The most modern kimono are made with less expensive, easy to care for fabrics like rayon, cotton sateen, cotton, and synthetic fibers (of which I do not approve), and are mostly worn in Goblin Town in Ryugu Mergyo. However, silk is still considered the ideal standard for kimono, and most international makers of kimono make their garments out of some kind of silk.

I, personally, use spider silk.

There are ten major parts to a kimono, and quite a few more minor bits and bobbles- but we’ll start with the basics. B, C, F, and G are wearing nagajuban and tabi. This under-robe is worn to keep the need to launder a kimono low, because, quite simply: kimono are not easy to clean. Most kimono are completely unstitched before being laundered; and having it done by a professional launderer is expensive. The tabi go on because it’s not fun standing around in thin robes with no socks on, and anything other than plain white would look strange.

The nagajuban is a simple robe of cotton or silk that goes under one’s kimono; the girls are wearing one each, with collars that don’t match their datejime at all, but that’s fine. No one should ever see their datejime- at least, not until they’re well through the first rush of puberty.

Then, on goes the kimono- B likes the purple and C likes the yellow plaid; F picks the yellow one; and G goes a bit less traditional. I’ve also got kimono for the rest of the girls, and for Brook and Franky, but they aren’t here so it’s currently moot.

Following the kimono, the obi- and, although I designed the kimono to go on with sashes, the obi are part of the garment. It’s important to realize that you can’t actually cross too many colors and prints in kimono- it’s not actually possible. In fact, I’d go so far as to say the more eye-watering color the better; and the girls do not disappoint, as they choose obi they like and completely ignore the colors and prints of their kimono. Then, obijime- B wears one, but not C, and F chooses one to tie her whole outfit together, a surprisingly conservative move. G’s more modern look eschews the obi entirely, which is very, very radical- and I like her bursting confidence, too.

And of course, since everyone excepting Sanji and me are wearing tabi, the only shoe is zori. I have them in everyone’s size, even the girls, because I just do. Some things are best accepted and I couldn’t stop myself making children’s clothing before it was needed, but it was needed, so. So!

We’re all dressed; we’re all peckish. Let’s do this thing.

We end up at the table and halfway through the first course before I realize that Ace and his father, Whitebeard, are also at the table- also in kimono. It’s all well and good except for one thing-

“Chairete, Ace.”

“Chairete, Mab.”

“Still not wearing shirts?”

“Well, you don’t wear brassieres, so-”
“Yeah, okay. How’ve you been?”

“Ah, alright- hey, Lu-”

“Hi Ace-!”

“So. Anyway- I have some questions-”

“Chairete, granfaun Whitebeard-”

“Hello, Mab-”

“Wassup, Ace?”

“So… I was talking to Aunt Zippy-”

“-uh huh-”

“-and I visited Aunt Emmeline-”

“Uh oh.”

“-and uh. Three questions.”

“Shoot.”

“Firstly; in Aunt Emmeline’s house, there’s a curio cabinet full of various charnel bits- not full skeletons or jewelry, but… bits. In the topmost section of that cabinet, there’s a weird statue…?”

“Yeah, the blue one, right?”

“Right. When I saw it, I felt… why did I feel so…?”

“Because, Ace- that’s Oberon.”

“What.”

“...We don’t have enough hard liquor on hand for me to tell you the whole story; even the barest details are going to take two full glasses of strong wine for each of us.”

“Lay it on me, Mab; it’s been bothering me for months.”

“Right. Well. You remember how I buried him?”

“Aye.”

“That was the manner in which orphans are buried, and in that location… there are some animals in Skua that dig up shallow graves, eat the bones, and cough the gold and gems back out. Pecker-birds, they’re called- not really birds exactly, but not not birds, if you catch my meaning.”

I stop, and drain my glass of wine. Ace does the same. The various conversations around the table have gone almost silent- right, I remember why I hate dinner parties: I’m a terrible conversationalist. I mean it, I can’t make light conversation for shit!
“So… our Oberon was eaten by a bird?”

“Everything except his skull, which Yuki recovered.”

“…?”

“Okay, so you know that bird skull she wears in her hair sometimes-?”

“Oh! Oh eeeew- ”

“Yeah, not really dinner conversation but you asked, and I’m not the one who’d lie to make it better. Lies usually don’t make it better, not if you’re grown…”

“Ugh. Right. Wine?”

“Wine.”

And we drink another cup of strong, red wine. Mm. Alcohol.

“Second question- Moda was telling me about her school days-”

“Ah, hell-”

“-and she mentioned something about you, someone named Penny, and the sweetest petty vengeance she ever did see-”

“-aha, okay-”

“-so. What the hell is she talking about, Mab.”

“Ah… -Mab’s Petty Penny Revenge goes like this. To start with, you remember I went to boarding school; due to various… well, anyway, I had part time jobs around the holidays. Not the big summer one, the other ones- except for Spring break.”

“Okay…?”

“So. Usually, I’d work as a stocker, at the same place Moda worked as a cashier- I was the person who puts stuff on the shelves; Moda worked the register? Right, because I was strong and tall enough not to need a ladder-”

“-sure-”

“-and Moda’s always been a stacked babe. She was the only mermaid who worked at that particular store- not nearly the only mermaid in town, but probably the prettiest. Excepting for this one time, she worked the register and I stocked the shelves. However, during the events of this story, Moda was sick with a flux that had been going around, and I had to work the register in her place.”

“…okay.”

“Okay. So. Before I go any further, I need to explain about Dola. One Dola is about one hundred Beri. The main difference between Dola and Beri is that one Beri and one hundred Beri are still called Beri; but if you split a Dola into pieces you could get four Quarters, ten Dena, twenty Fingers,
“or one hundred Pennies- or any combination thereof, so long as it came up to One Dola total.”

“Wait, what?”

“Yeah.”

“...Okay. And I guess each coin’s a different size?”

“Yes- I don’t remember the exact sizes, but... a quarter’s like the size of your thumb-pad, a dena’s the size of your middle finger tip, a finger’s the distance between your first and second finger-knuckle and oval shaped-”

“-what, why?”

“Hell if I know- and a penny is the size of the very fingertip of your pinky. Pennies are very small coins.”

“So... what does that matter?”

“Well. Moda’s register was the one that had all the tobacco and alcohol behind it, and as she was sick, I was on the register that day. It was just past ten in the evening, and two young men- like, early twenties I think- came up to the counter. They had three random novelty items- a rubber duck, a grab-bag of marbles, and a double pack of stroop waffle flavored bubble gum, if that matters to you. The strange thing was, that late at night, most people were there for food, necessities, or stuff you could only get after paying for it at my register- smokes and booze, naturally.

“They might have been upperclassmen, now that I think about it- we were in a school town so we got weird student customers a lot. Anyway, I rang up their purchase and told them the total price... I think it was twenty two Dola, which is...”

“Twenty two hundred Beri.”

“Yes- it always takes me a while to do the conversions. Anyway, I rang them up, told them the price for purchase- and they grinned at each other, reached into their jackets and slapped down two gallon size draw bags full of only pennies.”

Ace’s eyebrows go straight up. Sanji leans past Whitebeard and squeaks at me. I look at my husband and nod- because he too, has worked in service hell, and knows exactly what I’m talking about.

“Right. So- hang on, I need to-”

“-glasses?”

“I didn’t wear my glasses unless I was actively studying; I was in so many different atmospheres every day, it was more hassle than I wanted to deal with. So. This is what I look like when I’m not wearing glasses- I’m not glaring, I’m actually legally blind in most countries-”

“-oh no-”

“And I’ve always sounded like this. I’m not so blind as I can’t tell where someone’s eyes are when they’re across a counter from me, though. I stared them in the eyes, but they were too busy snickering over their assholery to take notice.
“Those two kids knew what they were doing, but they didn’t know me; and I was quite prepared to get paid for making someone else suffer. I still am, honestly.”

“Mab. Mab, what did you do?”

I glance over at my husband, who is… possibly wide eyed and grinning in anticipation, but I can’t actually tell.

“Well. As the other customers groaned and went to the other registers, this conversation occurred between myself, the Spokesman- as the other man was silent and awkward- and a friendly coworker of mine who prefers to remain nameless in the stories where they appear.”

“Oh, Nameless-”

“Yep. So-

“Is this Đ22?

“...

“Did you count it?

“Nope.

“Are you going to?

“Nope.

“Is it at least Đ22?

“Dunno.

“Lovely.

“Nameless said: Hey! You guys can use the self checkout; it has the Automatic Coin Counter.

“I said: Oh, don’t worry about it, Namele-

“Nope, don’t trust them Nameless. (The Partner laughed.)

“Nameless said: What? Why!?

“They don’t count all your change right.

“Nameless was speechless with outrage; petty shit like that was really really rare in our town, and Nameless is a very liberal person anyway.

“I said: Don’t worry, Nameless. I’ve got this well in hand.”
I pause. I let the servant clear away my plate and politely decline the roast beef; I don’t even eat much roasted lanimal when Sanji cooks it, and he’s amazing. While my place is empty, I put both of my elbows on the table and let my sleeves slide down. This part always goes best if there’s some kind of evocative gesture to go with it.

“I untied the bags and poured all the pennies onto the counter. It was one of those counters with the raised edge, so I wasn’t worried about dropping any coins. Even so, it was a beautiful, massive, loud shitstorm of a mess; less than two thousand coins shifting over each other on a black counter in a motion I can only describe as when sand blows into a dune, and with a noise like heavy rainfall on a tin roof.”

Ace has caught what I said, but he’s invested in the story. Sanji already knows where this is going because he Knows me; but.

“I dug right in. The two boys, still avoiding my stare, start chuckling like it’s my dignity they’re taking away. They whispered things like ‘haha this is funny’ ‘yeah’ ‘she’s way funnier than the fish-ball’ ‘oh my god yeah’.”

Ace’s whole body doesn’t quite shift into fight and flight mode. Not quite.

“Things became clear. Moda… heaves and seethes, when she’s angry or frustrated. Right?”

“Yah.”

“Mm. They’d been taking advantage- and Moda… unless you point it out to her, she’s not going to notice that kind of thing. I definitely notice that kind of thing. So, as I counted each penny, one by one, Nameless came up to me.

“Nameless said: Guess I’ll help count these.

“I said: Don’t worry about it.

“Nameless looked at me with confusion, then put on her determined face and said: I’ve got your back.

“I said: Okay.”

Here come the rest of the gestures.
“We worked up a system where we counted ten, put them in a stack, then with ten stacks of ten we’d separate them, making one Dola piles. Progress was slow, but sure; some customers came to my line, but I advised them to go to another line. Some of them were confused, but as soon as they saw the counter covered in pennies, they understood. We got about twelve Dola total in ten minutes— and that’s when I knocked the piles over.

“Nameless said: Sugar! (Nameless doesn’t swear; she took a Vow of some kind, I think.)

“I said: Oopsie Daisy. And then I grinned at Nameless, and tilted my head like this—”

Ace sniggers.

“—and motioned for them to leave.

“So, as the idiot boys were staring at the fallen pennies in horror, Nameless said: You know what, I think you’d be faster without me.

“I said: Sure, probably.

“Nameless said: I’ll leave you to it, then.

“I said: Cool. Cool cool cool cool cool.”

Ace snorts because that’s the onomatopoeia for a very specific kind of laugh; specifically, the laugh of a Fairy right before they trick a person with their own bullshit logic. Sanji is snickering outright.

“I said: I’m so sorry, I’m going to have to count all of this again.

“Spokesman said: ...Ok.

“So, I started over, counting slower than before, and made my way back up again. The idiot duo is entirely silent, right up until I got to about seven Dola, when I suddenly gasp and say:

“Whoopsie daisy. I’ve lost count. I’ll have to start all over again.

“Seriously?

“Yep.

“Why!?

“I lost count, honored customer. It would be dishonorable for my register to have the incorrect total, and I would never steal from you.

“Spokesman didn’t say anything at all, because there’s some things you just can’t argue about and be “Anyway, about half an hour after that, the Manager walked past and looked at me. I smiled at them, and they looked at the counter; and then the Manager walked away without a word. By then, I’ve had to restart maybe five or six times, and I can actually see the idiot duo’s souls starting to leave their bodies because this went in directions they were not anticipating.

“So, another half hour after that- I’ve counted all their coins, which only confirmed what I already knew.”

“They didn’t have enough to start with, did they.”

“Nope. They had maybe eighteen Dola. Which I told them- and they had been dead silent and steadily less amused as the night progressed. Here’s the thing- I might exude an aura of delightful sex appeal now, but at that time, in that place…? Yeah, I had all the sex appeal of a wet, dead rat in a shit-filled gutter—”

Ace wheezes with laughter-

“-and they’d come to be titillated, which I wasn’t doing for them. In fact, I was doing the exact opposite, and. Well.

“I said: I think that this is D18.

“The duo has been dead silent and they’ve been looking pretty done in for the night. So. I looked them dead in the eyes, and I brought up my hand like this-”

- and I drag my hand over my empty place because we’re still on the heavy meat courses, which I don’t eat-

“-and the coins went crashing down again.

“I said: I’ll recount them to be sure.”

Ace is shaking with laughter, and Sanji hasn’t stopped laughing yet.

“You bet your fucking ass I recounted that shit. I made it take… ah, about twenty minutes I think?”

“And this whole time you could have done it in a bit less than a minute and a half, right?”

“Of course.”
Ace sniggers, then gestures for me to go on.

“Right. So, I finished counting them, and then I said: I think this is actually Đ19.36. Without saying a word, the Spokesman whipped out a Đ5.”

“...Dola folding money comes in...?”

“Ones, fives, tens, twenties, hundreds, and- rarely, but they're legal tender- thousands.”

“...”

“Anyway- I said: Seriously? You had cash this whole time?

“Spokesman said: Needed to get rid of my change.

“I said: No problem; I’ll just recount this again-”

Sanji cackles with laughter-

“-since I want to be perfectly sure that this is Đ19.36. I counted Đ18 last time, you see-”

“Spokesman said: Are you fucking kidding me?

“I said: I don’t joke about money, honored customer.

“He took out a Đ20 bill from his pocket and threw it down onto the coin covered counter. My coworkers- Nameless, and the Automated Checkout, who had been watching this whole time in barely hidden glee- were stunned. I mean, this guy had his hand on his folding money in his pocket the entire time, and could have stopped me from wasting his time like that at any moment. But he didn’t.

“I took the folding money, did the transaction, gave him his change and his receipt, bagged his purchase and handed it to him; I even thanked him for shopping with us and wished him a fine evening. Then, I watched, like this-”

And I let my bone deep satisfaction exude from every pore of my body, without letting my face change even a little-

“-as the two started to put their pennies back in the drawstring bags, I didn’t help them at all. I watched them just like they’d watched me. Lots of pennies fell to the floor, and Nameless and the Automated Checkout were laughing outright at this point, but- I guess they didn’t care to stoop down and pick up their loose change.

“That was also the first, last, and only time I ever heard the Manager laugh.
“Anyway, they left after that, about five Dola in pennies on the ground and laughter chasing them away. I clocked out way past midnight after cleaning up the pennies, doing all the things I was supposed to have done like, two hours ago- because that was when my shift ended, of course. All my coworkers had given me thumbs up or smiles when they had clocked out before, and Nameless and the Automated Checkout stayed behind- they were actually roommates and everyone knew about us students and not going into the woods at night- anyway.

“Manager told me ‘Good Job’, which was the only words they’d ever actually said to me. I crashed out on Nameless’ couch for the night, and went home to the dorms the next morning.

“And that, my brother, is Mab’s Petty Penny Revenge. In short: I counted Đ19.36 about five times. Whoopsy-daisy; it might have been five times- I’d have to count again. I just can’t be sure…”

At which point, everyone starts howling with laughter. I smile, faintly.

But Ace isn’t quite laughing- he knows, same as I do, that I would have told Moda what happened during her shift. Everything. And he Knows, same as I do, exactly what she’d have done in response.

“That wasn’t the end, was it.”

“Of me being a cashier? Yah, that was it; of Moda’s harassment? -You’ll have to ask Moda about the Mud-dragon Vendetta, because my only role was buying the peanut butter and washing her dress afterwards-”

“…Moda’s Mud-dragon Vendetta?”

“…Yeah, that’s her story to tell; I… hm. Plausible deniability is my friend, and so is Moda. Ask her- I wasn’t there, and I didn’t ask for details afterwards. I don’t know.”

“Ah. They didn’t actually stop harassing her after that, did they.”

“Mmm. Not really, no- they didn’t show their faces at that store for about three months, but… they did return eventually. And as you know, Ace- sometimes, men will chase a beast into the deep woods and not come back.”

“…They surely do. -You actually know exactly what happened, don’t you.”

I smile at my brother. But- it’s not a nice smile. And I don’t say anything at all.

If anyone asks, I don’t know what Moda did. I don’t want to know what she did. I don’t even want to know what the hell all that peanut butter was for.

There are some dogs best left to lay as they are.

I have suspicions- but I wasn’t there, and I’ve never asked Moda what happened. Exactly. But there’s only so much blood that can get washed out of a pretty brown dress before you start to have ideas about how it got there- and of course, Moda wasn’t injured at all. But I don’t know what happened. Nope.
I don’t know.

Ooh, Confit Biyaldi, yes please- thank you.

Mmm. Vegetables!

“So. Last question.”

“Mmkay…?”

“Who are the Jolly Ranchers, and how are we related to them.”

“Ah. Okay, that story’s gotta wait until the whole fish- yeah, here we go. Could I have the head, please? Yes, the whole fish-head, thank you.”

“Mab…?”

“You asked, Ace. And I’m going to tell you.”

“Oh no.”

“Too late now. After all- everything happens for a reason. It’s just... sometimes, that reason is you’re stupid and make bad decisions.

“So. Aunt Zippy, seeking to educate me and the Littles about her family history, which is fairly interesting; fenna Ravelle, Aunt Zippy, the Littles who were all maybe… four or so, making me fourteen- we took a trip to the Inner Sky. The Inner Sky, Ace, is the agricultural center of Skua; and Aunt Zippy is from a county-kingdom in the Inner Sky called Enharmac Intervali. We were going, I was told, to visit Aunt Zippy’s family and take family pictures of all the places Aunt Zippy grew up. Which resulted, at one point, in all of us- including the littles on ostrich back-”

“-pfft-”

“-hiking out to a cement slab in the middle of a cornfield and Aunt Zippy saying, and I quote: ‘Well, the jukejoint used to be here.’ Which is why that picture of us all standing in front of the corn on the mantle in the-”

“-I know the one-”

“Yeah. That’s the jukejoint that fenna Ravelle and Aunt Zippy met at. Or what’s left of it.”

“Okay. That- wait. Wait wait wait- you went on a family journey through somewhere with cornfields?”

“Yep. Now, the whole trip is pretty hazy for several reasons; firstly, the summer was when I usually got sick because that’s when I’d relax enough to get sick. Secondly, we only stayed at Tiffanyan for about a week and a half, which was just enough time for me to get either flea fever or cholera- and I don’t actually remember, I was very sick but we were all going, so we went.”

“Holy shit.”

“Mm. Anyway, when I wasn’t sick because of the season, I was motion sick. The only forms of transportation I can use without getting nauseous are my own limbs, boats of any kind, and on the back of an animal. However, because I had flea fever, cholera, and at one point, dysentery-

Ace doesn’t have intimate knowledge of any of those; his Pops, however, does. His eyebrows have gone all the way up to his headwrapping, and he’s staring at me in… something like horrified awe.

“-excuse me, but; are you implying that at one point you had all three of those at the same time?”

“I know I did, granfaun; we had to stop in… Elegy City so I could get treatment at the Doctor Springs, which fixed me right up. The rest of the summer was much nicer after that- all twelve weeks of it.”

“…” says granfaun Whitebeard, horrified.

“So. Of the trip, I remember this: our Great-Great Aunts, Emmeline, Jessicarat (called Jessie), and Harrietta, who sat in the back of the vanwain with me while I was so sick- and then for the rest of the trip, as I recovered, and then just because that’s where they liked to be while traveling. I mostly rode a horse, for that trip.”

“…”

“Yeah, my advice about that? Don’t ride a horse directly after having dysentery, you will regret that forever. Anyway, our Aunts were working on the humongous cathedral window quilt - the big one that’s on the back of the settee in Aunt Jessie’s house, you know the one?”

“…The map-blanket?”

“Mm.”

“Oh.”

“Right, they were still working on that during this trip- anyway, it’s entirely hand stitched and all the cloth in it is hand woven, and I still don’t entirely know how they made it so warm. It’s about...”

“Three by three and a half meters square.”

“Yep. Very comfortable to sleep under-”

“-oh my god, yes-”

“-and it was like that even half finished.

“The other thing I remember most clearly is the ungodly amount of corn.

“Everyone who has ever been to Inner Skua says that about the corn- sorry, maize, although there’s other stuff there too- but it’s one of the very few things I recall in Vivid detail. There was a musty but alive smell of it growing under the sun, and the texture of the leaves would scratch and cut my bare arms and legs if I rode the horse too close to the edges of the fields- and they’d stay scratched to hell from when I went out before dawn to breakfast, and again in the evening. The smell before rain is petrichor, and that’s from plants releasing oils into the air- and when it rained, and it did rain, the petrichor would be so thick you could almost drown in it, and your skin and your clothes and anything wooden that wasn’t sealed and all the bridles and saddles would stink of petrichor every time they got hot after that trip. For months, in some cases.

“I remember the violence of the geometry, how straight and ordered the rows of corn would be- and then, in the blink of an eye, everything would snap into non-euclidian madness. I could never- and still can’t- get to where I intended to go if I tried to cut across the fields; I’d always end up on the wrong side of what I was aiming for, or too far past where I wanted to be- and on one occasion, on the entirely wrong property.

“Those fields are never empty, either- or you never feel like you’re alone, in them. There’s a distinct sense of the Otherworld in that place, in those fields; and there’s something deeply unnerving about being less than two meters tall in the midst of seven-meter corn. The closeness, with gaps where you can see the edge of forever, like when you’re on the open sea and can espy the curving rim of the world. The constant rustling, like you’re being pursued.

“Some things must have been paranoia; but other things… at that time, there was a Wolvark of Tiffanyan who had decided I was hers to look after. Her name was Crabapple, and… for some things, Abby had better senses than I did. More importantly, I knew that if Abby was growling at something, she meant serious business. She growled in those fields more than she did in the rest of her life, and to this day, I don’t know what at.

“Oh, yes, and this is also when I became convinced that Swans and Geese are from hell, or at the very least, are not to be trusted.”

Ace shudders.

“Oddly enough, that swan was the only thing other than corn, beans, and ground-growing gourd fruit that I ever found while walking through the fields. It was just relaxing, sitting in one of the troughs between the corn-rows; along with a flock of geese, hiding in the shade from the midday heat.

“The swan let me get within arm’s length before lifting it’s snakey neck and glaring at me dead in the eyes from it’s seat. It began a low, continuous buzzing, like bagpipes right before they scream or a swarm of honeyjackets chasing a man down to sting him to death and devour his flesh. Abby warned it- and me- with a low ‘urf’ sound- like Buttercream does when she’s noticed a Sea King getting too close, Luffy-”

“-Ah-”

“-right. The swan stared us both down for a long minute or two, before it decided it wasn’t worth bothering with, and allowed me to stay. That’s also when Abbey turned to stare deep into the rustling corn and started growling the worst she ever had.

“I noped the fuck out.

“Anyway, I also found a small ceramic otter, half buried in the furrow’s dirt- that field was a lake, before it was a field.”

“Oh, the really ugly one in Aunt Ravelle’s forge- inset in the dousing trough?”
“Yep. That’s the one. What else… Oh yeah; before then, I’d never seen lightning bugs, and didn’t believe in them until one of the Inner Skua cousins caught one for me and showed me that it was, in truth, a beetle and not the glenn about to explode from swamp gas.

“I know you remember what I traded for the lives of our Littles—”

“Aye.”

“Right. That just meant that I could never ride with any of Asteria-sama’s children, or Asteria-sama herself- I could still speak with them, and their kin, and… for reasons that are best left unsaid, I still had their eternal respect and loyalty.”

“…Is this like the thing with me and cats?”

“Yeah.”

“Ah. Say no more, I understand.”

“Right. Anyway, I really liked the lightning bugs, and they liked me- told me all kinds of things, which are mine to know alone. I also ended up following them back to what they said was an old palace of the Fae- deep through the woods, deep enough I couldn’t see the stars or the smell the smoke of the house-fires anymore. I came upon a half-rotted fence of bones and wood, covered in blackberries and snake-vines. Beyond it, I could see an abandoned troupple orchard, and smell squid berries rotting under the water. I was about to go further when an entire flock of turkeys came boiling over the fence in near complete silence- just the clacking clattering flap of their wings and the smell of musty chalk-dirt in their passing, and then they vanished in the underbrush.

“I took their lack of words as an Omen, and went back to the house we were staying at, and we left in the morning. I never have returned to that place- but, anyway, that’s enough context for the weirdest part of this trip.”

“Okay...”

“So, we’d been making our way around the county-kingdom Enharmac Intervali, and Aunt Zippy has been driving the entire time, and she turns down what I’d assumed was another dirt road when fenna Ravelle starts asking about ‘Aah, Zippy, do you actually know the people who live here?’ and Aunt Zippy said ‘Oh, Ravi, have some damn faith in people why don’t you-’ and I realized we were actually in some backwoods Inskuan’s driveway, pulling up to a house, right about when The Bull charged the vanwain.

‘TZIPPORAH THERE’S A BULL,’ shrieked fenna Ravelle, grabbing for her war-hammer and heroically yanking all the Littles, who were having lunch from the middle row of the van to the back, with the Aunts, behind the quilt- presumably in hopes it would protect us from potential impalement and trampling.

“Aunt Zippy, god love her, stopped the fucking vanwain and leaned out to look at The Bull.

“Aren’t you a handsome boy!’ she laughed, and the half-ton of angry, snorting pot roast stopped up short, blinking through it’s stupid gooey eyes, before cautiously trotting up the rest of the way and attempting to stick his head through the look-out port in the side of the vanwain for scritches and pets. He was stopped by the fact that his horns didn’t fit through the window.

“Aunt Zippy proceeded to drive the rest of the way up to the house, the bull following us all the way, before casually… getting out of the van, walking right up to the front door, and pulling the bell. A pair of the most Skuan Gothic people I’ve ever seen, ever, answered, looking fairly bewildered at the vibrantly tattooed, curvaceous, swan-feather caped and grinning woman in front of them, offering them a long fingered hand to shake.

“My name’s Tzipporah, and I grew up on this farm- did you ever meet the Steinwain’s? I was hoping I could show my family around where I was a girl.’

“OH WELL COME ON IN!’ the Gothic Skuans shout, apparently thrilled to pieces by this development in their morning. ‘WE’VE GOT PIE AND LEMONADE AND AIR CONDITIONING FROM THE BASEMENT.’

Robin, who was eating her fish steak, stops chewing and turns her entire body towards me. I look her in the face, and nod; I know how she feels about Memento Mori.

“There were taxidermy animals tucked into every conceivable corner, including places one would never assume a taxidermied animal to go. More importantly, they weren’t the tame naturalistic taxidermy of today- the highlights I can remember off the top of my head were, in order, a pair of chipmunks in a boxing ring, a small set of kittens playing indoor croquet, a group of squirrels enjoying an evening’s entertainment of cards and each other’s company, a pair of frogs in a sword fight, a group of frogs drinking and smoking- one of which was drunk, by the gods; there was a lamb with two muzzles, which was quite odd to see; there was a two headed Jabberwock cub, which was even odder; and there were, taking up two entire shelves by their own selves, a wedding procession of kittens, and a tea party of kittens.

“They had an abundance of kittens.

“We met her first- and she was so vividly realistic, her fury so potent, that Aunt Jessie- who had done quite a lot of boar-hunting in her younger years- gave a screech of affront, lowered her boar spear, and braced for a strike that would never come. The other naturalistic taxidermy was the mountain lion eating the mule deer, which was in the living room.

“There were portraits of entire groups of people that were actually their skeletons- photographic portraits, I should say. There were painted portraits of people that were- my hand to the gods- oil on crushed velvet, and studded with rhinestones. Oh, yes, and also skeletons.

“There were mannequins and dress forms covered in costumes from the hurly-burly, and flowing cloaks as well. There were a multitude of insects pinned to glass fronted frames, and pressed flowers behind glass. There were tiny skeleton dolls peeping out of awkward corners, and much larger skeleton dolls creating visual interest in a literal wall of scythes. There was an entire hall of livestock skulls- horses, ostriches, lionbirds, dogs, cows, sheep, deer, and so on.

“And, sitting on the mantle, in pride of place and in full view, was an actual human skull-unadorned- under a removable bell-jar cover.

“I, fourteen and still high on medications, fall immediately and desperately in love with everything I see. So did Yuki, after a fashion.

“That’s Gruncle Ratham,’ the lady of the house said, fondly. ‘He’s the one that your Ma’s family sold the farm to! Of course, after he died he asked that his skull be used in all local productions of Hamlet—”

Zoro starts cackling.

“-and no one had the heart to put his skull in the tomb after the theatre two towns over burned to the ground.’

“COOL!” I say, as fenna Ravelle starts a litany of prayer with one hand firmly wrapped around the handle of her cold-iron knife and the other returned to over her eyes.

“COME ON IN FOR SOME PIE, Y’ALL.’ hollers the lord of the house from the kitchen. We all go in and there is not one, not two, but twenty pies on the table- all different kinds- and fresh milk in a pitcher and another of lemonade a third of black tea and a whole bottle of bourbon and it’s all very idyllic except for the part where the kitchen is Not Immune to the rest of the house’s theme because there’s a centerpiece of mice having tea in the center of the table. I am fucking Delighted; fenna Ravelle prayed harder.

“Aunt Zippy has decided that she’s going to enjoy this encounter, and sits down to have herself a Long Island iced tea, while Aunt Harriet and Aunt Emmaline corralled the Littles into something approaching order, and Aunt Jessie gently told Yuki not to lick the skeletons. She had a licking phase that lasted for four years—”

“Ah. I was wondering if Dosie’d ever grow out of that…”

“...She’s licking things now?”

“Mostly forge stuff, yeah.”

“…”

“Aunt Ravelle already said she’s got a place at her forge if she wants when she’s bigger.”

“Ah. Good. Anyway, we all had a grand time sitting around the table with these people, Ludo and Barbriarella, talking about the history of the farm and long-past relations and crop yeilds and so on. Except for fenna Ravelle, who is entirely Done With This; thus, when my twitchy ass gets bored and asks to go look around outside, says she’ll go with me, despite hating going on such adventures. This is due to things always going either weird or wrong.”
“...Auntie’s a homebody.”

“She really, really is. Anyway, we got outside and found Abby lounging in the water trough, because being a Wolvark that far inland during the summer is hard, and sometimes one needs to submerge in water up to the neck to cope. The Bull is displeased by the appearance of a Strange Dog lounging in his water trough, but Abby leveled him out with a look and low noise that was more thundering grumble than growl. -Just to remind him she was decidedly not Canis Lupis Familiaris, but Canis Lupis Selachimorpha, and she ate things like him and his elder cousins- Aurochs, Mark- for breakfast every day. The Bull decided he had important Bull Business on the other side of the barn.

“So, we got into the barn where there were about twenty dairy cattle having a nap in the shade that afternoon before milking, and I pointed up and shouted ‘LOOK MOM IT’S JUST LIKE TEMPLE’. Growing up mostly at school meant that, while I was- and am- thoroughly educated on the intricacies of the major World religions, my actual faith is something much more agnostic. Thus, I was fairly fuzzy on certain religious matters, and- in that moment- I naturally assumed that the gaunt, rather tortured looking figure hanging from the rafters was a saint of some kind.

“It was not.

“It was, I would later learn, a sculpture of Graunt Magretti, wife of Ratham-on-the-mantle, who had a wild sense of humor and had left instructions that she wanted to be strung up to watch over her beloved herd of cattle and also to terrify any would-be rustlers. Her family, one supposes, had the good sense to not leave an actual corpse hanging from the rafters, but whoever made that sculpture did a Damn Fine Job in capturing the pants-shitting terror Magretti had been after.”

“I’ve had the fish head ready on a long fork for just this moment. I hold it up, having removed the eyes, and turn it so that it gets a good, empty socketed look at the entire table, before it leers at me in cooked fishy disdain.

“Mom tried to haul me out of there but I was much more interested in the cows, and their peaceful eyes, and I merrily fed them scattered bits of hay and alfalfa through the bars of the queuing area, just before the milking stall- some of those cows were friendly enough to let me give them scritches, which was nice. And all of this was under the watchful, sepulchral, eyeless sockets of Graunt Magretti.”

And then I waggle the fish head.

Ace is crying, he’s laughing so hard- and it’s the real, soulful kind of laughter that comes from a deep and healthsome place. When I did the thing with the fish-head, his pops started laughing too, like he just couldn’t help himself anymore.

Robin is wheezing with laughter, and Zoro hasn’t stopped cackling this whole time. Nami is giggling; Usopp is trying very hard not to choke; Chopper is losing his shit.

Sanji has covered his eyes with his hand as he laughs because this story is rude as hell but it’s also really fucking hilarious, which is why I don’t mind telling it. Luffy and Mark are leaning on each other and crying with laughter, and so are Taffy and Gurry. Bryony is laughing, but also getting a call- ah, good girl, duty before discretion, and off she trots.

I put down the fish-head.

“I also found a nest of pitch-black kittens, a white and very arthritic hound that managed to get up and follow me around the ranch anyway, and a fat, green-black rooster that came up to my knees and wanted shoulder scritches.

“There were various other odd decorations scattered around the property- the large, wrought-iron sculpture in the middle of the duck pond was particularly choice. Mom actually liked that, of all things- it was constructed of several arches and a few curled spikes, so that when viewed all together with a reflection on a still day, it formed an eye.

“I had a splendid afternoon; Mom did not, excepting the iron statue.

“When I got back to the vanwain, the Aunts had added another seventeen cathedral windows to the quilt out of spite. The littles were napping underneath it, exhausted from the sudden weird excitement of the day. And, after hauling Abby out of the water trough, we patted The Bull Goodbye and left with some lovely family history, cool new friends, and a fenna Ravelle that was spitting mad.”

“...uh?”

“She got chiggers, which always leave really awful welts on her skin, and she got them all over her body. Anyway, Ludo and Barbriarella died a while back; still, them and Aunt Zippy kept a correspondence going for as long as they knew each other. I’m still friends with their grand-daughter, Thalia. She’s turned the farm into a horse-ranch for retired and abused race-horses, and to that end, gifted me the entire contents of the house and environs- memento mori kitsch, yard art, and barn watcher. Everything.”

“...I’ve been to the Attic at Tiffanyan, and that’s-”

“Okay, so. Harry Morgan hated taxidermy. Couldn’t stand it; nor skeletons, or any of the other amazing things from that farm. So. It all went to my rooms at Ultima Thule, where it’s remained ever since. And now that the entire palace is mine, I’ve been renovating. We have some really cool shit in storage, and it’s nice to see it back in it’s ancestral home.”

“...so, what you’re saying is that after pissing off your abusive mother in a thousand and one little ways, just because you could; and after she died... you’ve now got a really big, really haunted house full of dead things that stare at you all the time, and your yard is full of creepy shit?”

“Mhm. Oh, and to answer your question- those were the Jolly Ranchers, and we aren’t actually related in any way, except that we liked each other and kept in touch.”

And then I smile at my brother, and eat the rest of my fish. Mm. Fish cheeks; so good. So tender.

Duty before Discretion; sorry, everyone.
“Chopper, finish that and get ready- we’ve got a ruptured spleen in a patient with S- blood-”

“Ah hell- goddamnit, I was- yeah, I’m- snarf-!

“Taffy, you’re the one with the most surgical expertise besides Chopper-”

“Yis, on it- snarf-!

“Gurry, you’re on anaesthetics-”

“Um, right-”

“Sanji, Mab- you’ve got the only appropriate blood type and are the only one who can possibly transport everyone and everything fast enough-”

“On it- pass me the spinach dip, please-”

“Right; my sincere apologies, everyone-” I say before gesturing sharply at the servant to get out of my way and standing.

“-is someone dying?” I hear Ace ask as I stride towards an open area of the dining hall.

“Yes, one of our cabin crew- Captain, you need to stay here, this is like a Captain’s meeting-” starts Bryony.

“-My crew is more important than-” starts Captain.

“-and you’ll just be in the way if you go, D needs surgery, not people punched; A already did the punching for her.” finishes Bryony, to Luffy’s suddenly considering frown.

“-D’s hurt!?!?” cry the girls in terror.

“Girls, if you’re coming, you need to come over here with me right now.” I call out. B, C, F, and G come piling all around me, skidding across the floor and thoroughly breaking the illusion of their propriety- no one runs quite like an akasenko; it’s a fairly obvious darting stride that, once you see and know for what it is, can never be unseen. I click my tongue like Teacher Easeelie taught me, back in school- and the girls immediately silence themselves.

“Take a firm grasp of my skirts, please; go ahead and crowd in close, I usually do this with boats and cargo and just myself- right, who’s going?” I call out to Bryony.

“Myself; Sanji, Taffy, Gurry, Chopper, and- great, you’ve got the girls. Chopper, you ready?”

“Yeah- ready.”

“Okay- Captain, take the snail- I’ll call as soon as we get there, and keep you updated on things as they develop. Yes?”
Captain takes a long deep breath, then says “Yes. I trust you guys. See you when you get back.”

Bryony nods, passes out more snails, then looks at me.

I look at her, and nod.

“Ride or die.” I say.

And then I close my eyes and Blink us to the dining room of the Mermaid Cafe, right as the Owner of the Cafe, Madame Shyarly, starts berating- hello, Keimi.

“We’re here to help D, Kei.”

“Yeah, great, get the hell down already-”

“No, it draws more attention if we act shady- everyone, just stay calm and move quickly but calmly towards where Chopper’s already going- Taffy, Gurry, go right after him, you too Sanji-”

“Yis!”

“Uh, yeah-”

“Love you, see you soon.”

“Mm. Keimi, please take Bryony, myself, and the girls to a nice Shrug; I know you have one available, even if it hasn’t been cleaned yet-”

“-Uh, y-yes, sure- right over here, please sit down. Um, a server will be by with menus, but i-is there anything I need to know?”

“Yes. There are probably going to be four more people added to our party proper- and for those in the Sanitary, at least one is going to need blood replenishing food.”

“Ah- who, if I may ask?”

“Sanji; he’s got the right blood type for the mermaid girl who needs surgery, and they’ve used up all the S- they had just keeping her alive until Chopper could get here-”

“-S-sorry, sorry- Sanji, your husband, the Lanjin , is giving blood to a mermaid? Have I got that right?”

“Yes…? What else would he do?”

Keimi blinks at me, wide eyed, then she really looks at the girls, and gasps. I blink at her some more.

Wait a second- fuck! I forgot my glasses on the dining room table!
Fuck!

I won’t be able to read the menu at all!
As a child, my greatest fear was “to fail”.

That’s deeply Skuan. It’s because that’s the great expectation- to be Skuan, to be Fae at all- is to fail. To fail when you need to succeed; to fail in your duty, to fail in upholding your honor… to fail to die. These things are more Fae than any other; it’s bound deep in our blood and our Lines, and it doesn’t let go.

If you’re Fae, you’re going to be less - if you’re Skuan, you’re going to fail more. It's old, and deep, a certainty sunk into the marrow of your bones- it’s in you, it’s part of who you are. In everything you do, in everything you leave behind- Fae, and Skuans, fail.

We don’t get what we want; we don’t do what we needed to do- we fail.

I did.

Spadey did.

Ace did too.

That’s what it means to be Fae. To be a Fairy, of the Fae- that’s no different. There’s a bit added to it, though- how to say it…

When I fly through the air, I know that when the Wind comes- and the Wind always comes- it’s going to take me down to bones and marrow. It’ll strike through my skin and my muscles, pluck on every sinew and nerve, right down to the bones and marrow- and the Wind will just keep coming, until I break because it will not.

I’ve got to lift my wings and put my back to the Wind, let it push me forwards- because that’s what you do when the World starts to howl. You rise, and turn your back to the Wind.

That’s the zone where you learn to make fear your very best friend. You learn to hold that fear really close and tight to yourself, press it to the backside of your heart; and in doing so, you learn to break your own soul open to the belief, the adamant faith, that you can make it. That you can do it.

The first thing a Fairy learns when they learn to fly is the fear of failure- because, if a Fairy fails to fly, they Fall. In Skua, that means you die- because to Fall is to fall all the way down, beyond the clouds- to the place where you can’t come back from. The second thing is to believe in themselves, if they’re to fly at all.

For a long time, Skuans were thought to be somehow less sophisticated and knowledgeable than the other Blue-dwellers. We ended up in the Sky because of some disaster, and were too stupid to find a way back down. The truth is, there was a terrible disaster; but my ancestors left the lower Blues intentionally, and they found many ways to stay alive in Sky Blue.

The only challenge our people have never had problems overcoming is “staying alive”; everything else is just a part of that. For example- the Fae preoccupation with ‘beauty treatments’ is actually what happens when your people leave their homelands with nothing, no tools, no food, not even the clothes on their backs in some cases; and then it takes thirty or forty generations of people to figure out how to grow food in the sky, much less clothing. Or any kind of weapon.

It took more than a thousand years for my people to remember how to make clothing, after the Giants Came. In that time, it was discovered that if care was taken with one’s skin, and hair, and nails, then one had a way to stay warm, or cool; one had something to carry and hold things with, that wasn’t one’s hands. One had deadly weapons that could not be taken from them.

There’s a reason the rudest gestures of my people require all the fingers— or all the toes, depending on where you are. It took another five hundred years for there to be enough food to regulate the consumption of our dead into ceremony— we only really eat corpse-meat now for funerals, and even that’s slowly being left behind in favor of… not scapegoats… sacrifices! It’s being altered, those ceremonies— instead of killing the dancer at High Summer, they bleed them instead, with leeches; and so on.

To be Skuan means you have a deep and unshakeable connection to place, and time; to stories passed down through generations; to music, and food, and the business of life; and to the endless Turning of the Wheel. There’s a sense of responsibility, too; to your place, to your time, to the people who are yours, to your life; to the Wheel, and it’s Turning. To blood.

Honor is another way of saying honesty— a contract you bind yourself to. Honoring a place, and what you love— being honest to a place, and honest about what you love. It’s about what you value— glory? No, not me. I value people, and relationships, and… children. Babies. Friends. Those are my treasures.

It’s a Wind that’s constantly shifting under your wings; and you, flying on it, with it, in it, are constantly checking and rechecking what you Know, becoming more and more informed— more… present. For me, sometimes I don’t know how to be fully honest, or honorable, because I just don’t Know enough.

What I love— sewing, the Sea, my husband and friends— that’s my path. I go out to Sea to seek that sense of… of Truth, of Reality.

I have to Know.

I have to Know who I am, beyond the World of the Sky.

---

My burn’s going to scar. On the one hand, having a friend who’s perfectly willing to permanently scar you, all to keep you from dying— that’s amazing. I’m really glad I have a friend like that.

On the other hand, my burn is throbbing exactly in time with my heartbeat.

On the gripping hand, I’ll certainly never forget to be wary in a tomb again, so— a light punishment for my own overconfidence, I think.

Luffy, Usopp, and Mark are all talking with Bryony over the phone. Ace and his father, Whitebeard, are trying— and failing— to pretend they aren’t interested.
The Princes and the King are all having a very quiet, very fast conversation in Merrow, the language of the Sea; I can only catch about one in every four or five words, but the general gist is disbelief that a Lanjin would give his blood to a mermaid—particularly an akasenko.

They don't know Sanji at all, do they?

This dinner party is… fairly boring, honestly; now that the interesting players have departed. This last course is the dessert course; sweet meats from clams and whelks, fish eggs, fruit, and hard crunchy pastries that are bright, lurid colors.

I ate some fruit to be polite, but this really isn’t to my taste.

Birds, then.

Some cultures associate birds with birth, claiming that a person’s soul arrives in the World in the form of a bird. Skuans believe that a person’s soul is brought into and out of this World on the Wind—thus, the first and last breath. However, the belief in birds being souls of those not yet born is oldest; thus, the traditional answer to a child’s question of “Where do babies come from?” is “The Stork brings them,” although sometimes it’s a goose or swan.

Birds are also linked, almost inextricably, with death. Carrion birds such as vultures, crows, and ravens, have always been connected to hunting, death, battle, disaster, and war. The Fae have always been bird people; thus, their highest rulers— the Royals— have been bird-like as well. ‘The Queen of Ravens’, ‘The Queen of Swans’; even Mab’s title, ‘Queen of Wrens’, is a reference to the avian.

Symbolically, the phoenix is the combined image of birth and death; thus, it is a symbol of eternity. In actuality, regular phoenixes are fairly well studied animals, closely related to pheasants and peacocks. Phoenix Feather Ash does have powerful curative properties, and is part of a Witch’s potionering supplies—but they’re birds. There’s far more than just one of the things, and they aren’t born in fire.

Still, there is an enduring idea of souls and birds together—especially after death. Some birds act as guides in the afterlife. In Alabasta, near Erumalu, figures of eagles on tombs represent the guides that lead souls to heaven. In Automatic tradition, the soul guiding bird is a dove.

In some cultures, it was thought that the soul, once freed from the body, took the form of a bird. The Ancient Sandorans believed that the soul, or ba, could leave the dead body in the form of a bird, often a hawk. They built their graves and tombs with narrow shafts leading to the open air so that these birds could fly in and out, keeping watch on the body.

The feather cloaks that most Sirens wear are actually representations of their soul’s place in the hierarchy of their community, while their feathered earrings and hair-ornaments are representations of themselves.

Because of their great size and strength, eagles have been associated with royal or imperial souls. Some ancient peoples, including the Germa, would release an eagle at a ruler’s funeral. As it rose into the sky the mighty bird was seen as the ruler’s spirit taking its place in the heavens.

The Djinn and Faerie thought that the dead could reappear as birds. The Goans of ancient Est believed that the dead existed as birds in the underworld. Birds also appear in Cherubic mythology as symbols of the soul or as forms taken by the soul between earthly lives. The connection between birds and souls is sometimes reflected in language. A Skuan saying describes somebody's death as "flown away," although the more common phrase is "they’ve fallen”.

Under certain conditions, the living can be transformed into birds. In some cultures, it was believed that druids, witches, shamans, priests, and prophets could change themselves into birds during trances or other mystical states. In Faerie mythology, legend, really, both deities and the supernatural beings called the Fay were said to have the power to transform themselves into birds—among other things.

Some legends involve birds that change into or inhabit the bodies of humans. The god Quetzalcoatl, from Shandia, is a combination of bird and serpent- and appears as a culture hero or a god in human form in Birka, Shandia, and Angeli myths. Among certain people's in northern Est and Nort, the spirits of birds such as eagles, owls, and crows are said to enter the bodies of witches and shamans, giving them great power.

Sometimes, humans and other beings acquire the ability to fly like birds. Such supernatural flight, like many mythological powers, can be either good or evil. Orc tales told that the goddess Freya's feather cloak enabled the wearer to fly. Norten tradition portrayed angels with wings like those of birds, but devils often had bat wings— in truth, either tribe can have either kind of wing.

Shimotsuki mythology includes a group of winged deities known as tengu. Part bird and part human, they live in forests and occasionally use their powers to play tricks on people.

Birds in mythology sometimes have the ability to speak. These talking birds, often sources of wisdom, may be deities in bird form or simply messengers of the deities. Either way, their advice is generally sound, and humans ignore it at their peril. Birds warn of dangers ahead, reveal secrets, and guide heroes and travelers on their way. Birds do not always speak in human languages; many stories tell of people who gain the power to understand the language of birds. In Djinn mythology, a snake licked the ears of the prophet Cassandra, who could then understand what the birds were saying. After tasting the magical blood of a slain dragon, the Germa hero Siegfried knew what the forest birds were saying.

Some birds are believed to have special powers of telling the future or revealing the will of the gods. Magpies, ravens, and doves appear in myth as oracles. Avesta are bird-shaped clay oracle bones, generally blessed in some manner and used by Seers. The Hottentot people of Sout believe that the hammerhead, a wading bird, can see reflections of the future in pools of water. When the bird learns that someone is about to die, it flies to the person's home and gives three cries of warning.

Certain birds appear over and over again in the world's myths and legends, although not always in the same roles. The crow and its close relative the raven, for example, have a number of different meanings. In some cultures, they are oracles and symbols of death. In Orc mythology, Odin was always accompanied by two wise ravens that told him everything that happened on earth. According to Djinn mythology, the feathers of crows and ravens were originally white, but the god Apollo punished the birds—either for telling secrets or for failing in their duty as guardians—by turning them black.
For some cultures, such as the Tsimshian people of the Pacific Wes, Raven is both a trickster and a culture hero. Sometimes his antics shake up the gods and the established order of the universe, and sometimes they backfire and get him into trouble. Often, though, Raven's deeds benefit humankind, as in the legend of how Raven brought light into the world. After finding the hiding place where the Creator kept the moon, the stars, and daylight, Raven released them so that they could shine on the world.

The majestic eagle, sometimes called the king of birds, usually has divine or royal associations in myth. Images from the ancient Est and Sandora show the sun with an eagle's wings, a sign that the bird was linked to the sun god. The eagle was also a symbol of Jupiter, the supreme Souten deity, and a sign of strength and courage. By adopting the eagle as their symbol, kings from ancient to recent times have tried to suggest that they, too, had some divine or heroic qualities.

Stories of eagles fighting snakes or dragons represent the tension between light and darkness, heavenly and underworld forces. In the myths of various peoples, the eagle is a culture hero, a hunter or a tornado transformed into a bird, and the spirit of war and hunting. The eagle was also the great culture hero of Orc mythology.

In ancient East and to the Djinn, the dove is a symbol of love and fertility, often associated with goddesses of love such as the Djinn Aphrodite. In Goa, doves represent tranquility and faithfulness in marriage, while in Skua they symbolize the soul.

When owls appear in mythology, their meaning is often uncertain and complex, neither all good nor all bad. Owls are symbols of wisdom, patience, and learning, yet because they hunt at night, they are associated with secrecy and darkness. In Goa they are seen as signs of coming misfortune. According to many cultures, the hooting of an owl in the day is an omen of death.

Early cultures in Sout regarded owls as sacred to the rain god, but later the Birkans of the same region viewed them as evil night demons. Some legends portray owls as destructive and malicious; others show them as helpful beings who warn people of dangers.

The stories may include a person who is transformed into an owl. In the creation myth of the Longarms, an owl resolves a bitter quarrel between men and women, allowing the creation of the human race.

Bats also symbolize both good and evil in mythology. Est legends link the bat with good fortune. A group of five bats represents five causes of happiness: wealth, health, long life, virtue, and a natural death. In various other cultures, however, bats are often connected with witches or evil spirits, and demons are pictured with bat wings. Of course, once one knows only female demons are supposed to have bat wings, things start to take on a very different slant...

As for why I remember so much about the legends and myths surrounding birds… It all comes back to the Deathless Hoyl Bird. Unlike the phoenix, which is fairly common if hard to pick out from the tern or gannet- a hoyl is a truly mythical creature, possibly something that has gone extinct since it was made into a legend.

After Adam and Eve- who were only distant kin to Galatea, Our Mother- ate of the forbidden fruit of Knowing, the Apple Tree, Adam offered the fruit to all of the animals in the garden, called Eden. The hoyl bird was the only one that refused to eat the fruit that the God of that place had said must never be eaten. As a reward, two things happened- the first was that the child of the bird was turned into a man named Ohara, and Ohara was given leave to eat of the Apple Tree. The second was that the bird received a kind of immortality. The hoyl bird never dies; only sleeps, after which a fire may destroy it.
However, it’s egg remains, and from that egg a full-grown hoyl hatches anew.
So too is it with knowledge, and the knowing of things- so long as someone, somewhere, wants to tell someone they might never meet how a thing is to be done, then so too will books exist.

Other birds have special meanings in myths. Swans, with their white feathers and graceful appearance, often serve as symbols of purity and feminine beauty. Both Celtic and Norse mythology included tales of women who turned into swans. Male peacocks, endowed with splendid tail feathers, can suggest either foolish vanity or divine glory. In legends from India, they often appear being ridden by one of the gods.

Sss! My burn just throbbed but sharp- why-?

BOOOM!

“That’s the Hard Shell Tower-”
“Sir, he’s at it again- no real damage, but the dampening slates are starting to wear-”
“Fukaboshi, handle it.”
“Yes, Father.”

And off the prince swims.

Mab gave me the Tomb Talisman to hold on to, said that as our Archaeologist, I would be the one best suited to the care of artefacts. I think she just wanted one less thing in her pockets, but it is a curious little artefact .

The main body of it is made of clay, pressed into a flattened, angled loop shape. There are seven distinct Keystones, and the whole thing looks very much like a goddess-talisman. It bears a distinctive vulva shape, as well as a clitoral imagining in a light colored clay.

It was a female oriented device, much like a skeleton key, or one of Mab’s master chains for her loom; it was meant to be… a master key, or a master-copy. I’m fairly certain that it can open any door bearing the Royal style locks I saw in the Tomb, and again during the wait for this dinner party. If I were a spy, assassin, or infiltrator, this little loop of clay would be positively invaluable.

Mab gave it to me to care for and look after.
I swear to the gods, if we weren’t already friends, this would make us be friends.
“It’s- chiming?

“Where did you get that!?!?” snarls the Minister of the Left, before cutting off any reply I might have made with “-That’s private property of the Mortimer family, who did you steal that from you filthy pirate scum.”

“Faldorean gave it to me, after Queen Mab freed his grandam, Sidre, from this earthly plain.”

“- what. What. -mother- What’s happened to mother’s ghost?”

“Well-

August of our first summer in the Backcountry of Germa was spent in La Teste sur Mer, a tiny oyster village mostly inhabited by Gyojin and Merfolk, out on the Bassin d’Arcachon in the Gironde. We stayed with my grandmother, Grand-mere Lily, and my uncle, Oncle Vahn, in the same white stuccoed house where my- He, had spent his boyhood. Grand-mere Lily was a frumpy, bespectacled, chain-smoking old woman who could pin your hand to the table with a throwing knife through your shirtsleeve; Oncle Vahn, with hair like a dandelion and a permanent hunch whenever He was in the room, in coveralls and moth-eaten t-shirts, smoking hand-rolled cigars until they disappeared into chunks of char in between his puckered lips, was the one who made sure we kept our education up and had a good understanding of where everything in the village was.

I always liked Oncle Vahn.

Little had ever actually changed in La Teste in the years since He had grown up there; the neighbors are still all oyster fishermen, or pearl divers. Everyone still raises rabbits and grows vine apples in their backyards. Houses there have two kitchens, one for indoors and one outside just for fish. There’s always a hand pump for drinking water from a well, and an outhouse by the rear of the garden.

I remember it clearly, because of all of us, I was the happiest to be there. After Mother died, He was inconsolable. So, after a few days where he didn’t get out of bed, Reiju called Grand-mere, and she came up in her creaking van drawn by rhylisks, and she went into that dark and stinking room. I heard- something. My- Him- my father, crying, maybe. He came out in clothing that more or less fit him, and Grand-mere said something to our Majordomo, and- I guess before I knew it, me, my brothers, my sister, and Father were in the van, and our most needed things were to arrive a few days after we did.

And then we stayed that whole year- two, really- in La Teste, for grief’s sake.

I was reasonably happy there. Without Father’s attention, our training- testing- was allowed to lapse, which allowed all of us to just… be. The beaches were warm, with soft white sand and stony patches. There were tide pools filled with life, and seashells for the collecting. Niji learned to tumble that summer, and how to juggle, and began to harbor a secret ambition to join the circus. Yonji learned all about the joys of racing lizards, and eventually other creatures. Reiju took up… I think watercolors? It might have been ink drawings with watercolor washes, it’s been a long time. And no one cared that Ichiji had wings and a tail, or that his eyes were mismatched. He smiled, there; he smiled, then.

He decided he was a 'he', and everyone went with it.

We used to have what we’d call ‘wizard battles’ with pétards, firecrackers, which would fire even when wet and could be bought in a pack of thirty for a bit less than five hundred beri. Niji has exceptional aim; and even then, I was basically immune to burns.

There was a forest within walking distance of the town where an actual hermit lived, and Ichiji and I spent hours there; me as his lookout, and him talking with the learned man at the entrance to his cave.

Until that point, I’d only ever read Орк, but by the third week or so at Grand-meres, I could read French. A whole world of books and ideas had opened to me, and suddenly some of Mab’s letters made much more sense. And, of course, I was eating—really eating, not just… refueling.

Murky brown soupe de poisson that hasn’t changed since the first inkeeper’s wife made it, not in three hundred years; vineapple salad, the vine apples picked fresh from the garden and chopped under the benevolent supervision of Oncle Vahn. Moules Marinières, poulet basquaise, because we were only a few miles from the Basque country.

It was the first time I had real Fairy food; old fashioned stuff Mab hardly ever lets me make, oyster chowder in murky brown broth, boiled bone stew, pottage—well, no, I make pottage every day.

We made day trips to Cap Ferret, a wild, deserted and breathtakingly magnificent northern beach with big rolling waves, taking along baguettes and saucissons and wheels of cheese, wine and corked bottles of spring water. A few miles west was Lac Cazeaux, a freshwater lake where my brothers and my sister and I could rent pédalo watercraft. We ate gaufres, delicious hot waffles, covered in whipped cream and powdered sugar. The two hot songs of that summer on the Cazeaux jukebox were Whiter Shade Of Pale by Procol Harum and These Boots Were Made For Walkin’ by Nancy Sinatra. The villagers played those two songs over and over again, the music punctuated by the sonic booms from FaME undergraduates that would swoop over the lake on their way to a nearby bombing range.

When our neighbour, Monsieur Saint-Jour, the oyster fisherman, invited my siblings and I out on his penas (oyster boat), I was enthusiastic.

At six in the morning, we boarded Monsieur Saint-Jour's small wooden vessel with our picnic baskets and our sensible footwear. He was a crusty old bastard, dressed like my uncle in ancient denim coveralls, espadrilles and worn out shirt. He had a leathery, tanned and windblown face, hollow cheeks, and the tiny broken blood vessels on his nose and cheeks that everyone seemed to have from drinking so much of the local Bordeaux. A ridge of spines across his ears and brow marked his ancestry as maybe a little more oceanic than polite society preferred; but we weren’t in polite society, out there, and nothing was said of it.

We puttered out to a buoy marking his underwater oyster parc, a fenced-off section of the bay bottom, and we sat... and sat... and sat, in the blazing September sun, waiting for the tide to go out. The idea was to float the boat over the stockaded fence walls, then sit there as the boat slowly sank with the water level, until it rested on the basin floor. At this point, Monsieur Saint-Jour would rake the oysters, collect a few good specimens for sale in port, and remove any parasites that might be endangering his crop.
There was, I recall, still about two feet of water left to go before the hull of the boat settled on dry ground and we could walk about the parc. We'd already polished off the Brie and baguettes, but I was still hungry, and characteristically said so.

Monsieur Saint-Jour, on hearing this - as if challenging his Noble-born passengers - inquired in his thick Girondais accent if any of us would care to try an oyster.

My siblings hesitated. I doubt they'd realised they might have actually to eat one of the raw, slimy things we were currently floating over. My little brother Yonji recoiled in horror.

But I, in the proudest moment of my young life, stood up smartly, grinning with defiance, and volunteered to be the first.

And in that unforgettably sweet moment, that one moment still more alive for me than so many of the other "firsts" that followed - first sex, first smoke, first day in the kitchen as a chef- I attained glory. Monsieur Saint-Jour beckoned me over to the gunwale, where he leaned over, reached down until his head nearly disappeared underwater, and emerged holding a single silt-encrusted oyster, huge and irregularly shaped, in his rough, clawlike fist. I mean, he had actual claws, but-

With a snubby, rust-covered oyster knife, he popped the thing open and handed it to me, everyone watching now, my little brother shrinking away from this glistening, vaguely sexual-looking object, still dripping and nearly alive.

I took it in my hand, tilted the shell back into my mouth as instructed by the by now beaming Monsieur Saint-Jour, and with one bite and a slurp wolfed it down. It tasted of seawater- of brine and flesh- and, somehow... of the future.

Everything was different now.

Everything.

I'd not only survived - I'd enjoyed.

This, I knew, was the magic I had until now been only dimly and spitefully- longingly- aware of. I was hooked. My siblings' shudders, my little brother's expression of unrestrained revulsion and amazement only reinforced the sense that I had, somehow, become a man. I’d had an adventure, tasted forbidden fruit, and everything that followed in my life - the food, the long and often stupid and self-destructive chase for the next best thing, whether it was drugs or sex or some other new sensation - would all stem from this moment.

I'd learned something.

Viscerally, instinctively, spiritually - even in some small, precursive way, sexually - and there was no turning back. The genie was out of the bottle. My life as a cook, and as a chef, had begun.

Ow. That’s a really big needle, and it’s- in my vein now, and the blood is pumping out of me. I’ll leave the doctoring to Chopper, but as I understand it... due to how quickly I, in particular, can replace the blood in my body, it’s better if I act as a blood-bag for this surgery than anything else. I’m eating liver and onions, chopped spinach and kale, and enough tea to drown in for basically this entire evening. I’m also to lounge insouciantly on this warming stove’s top for the rest of the night, barring other complications.
So, I’ve been thinking about things I remember, things my dad Zeff told me… just. Stuff.

So, in 1681 (which was a bit more than forty years ago), Zeff’s good friend from culinary school, Banban, became the chef de cuisine of a restaurant named Work in Progress. A once-trendy restaurant on the Water Main Canal in Water 7, the place had fallen on hard times and needed new blood to kick things back in shape. Banban- one of us! as Zeff would say- was in charge of finding that new blood. He said it was what a lot of his contemporaries had been waiting for, their own thing; and so the call went out to all Zeff’s old cronies. From Capetown, Nuevo Pariso, where dad had his first job as a dishwasher came Enrique, enticed by excited promises of culinary history in the making. From Wall district saloons, bars, bordellos, and hurly-burlies, they recruited every young, pot-smoking, skull-cracking chav they’d ever worked with or punched out, filling their heads with dreams of glory.

They fancied themselves the most knowledgeable and experienced young Orcs in town, and their hearts were filled with hope and the promise of magnificence. They thought they were the only cooks in Water 7 who could quote from the Larousse Gastronomique and Répertoire de la Cuisine, who knew who Vatel, Carme and Escoffier were, what Bocuse, Vergé and Guérard were doing across the World, and they were determined to replicate their successes and their fame. There was no one on the horizon they could see who could touch them.

Dad Zeff never really tried to hide the fact that when he was a young teen, he did a stupendous amount of heroin. I’ve tried basically everything you can get in Est, which is surprisingly light, as far as drugs go- mostly what Mab and Brook call stink-weed, better known as Mary Jane or Marijuana. Tried it. Got very hungry, a little more relaxed than normal, and that’s about it. Fun in small doses. Opium is a bit of a different beast. I- honestly, I don’t recommend it. After my first few hits, the soothing rush kinda… tapered off, and I never really felt the need to chase that high, so. Eh. Not my thing.

Anyway, the new owners of Work in Progress, Zeff and the gang’s putative masters, were a textbook example of People Who Should Never Own A Restaurant. There were two brothers - one half-smart, the other genuinely dumb - who'd gotten a few bucks from Mommy and Daddy, along with their partner, a slightly more cognizant college friend who could actually read a P and L sheet and crunch a few numbers. Their principal business was investing in off-Tinpan Alley stars. As this, apparently, wasn't unprofitable enough, they'd chosen the restaurant business as a way to lose their money more quickly and assuredly.

From the get-go, Banban, Enrique and Zeff managed to intimidate the partner's right out of their own restaurant. At every suggestion from this novice triumvirate, we'd snort with contempt, roll our eyes with world-weary derision and shoot down whatever outrage- be it tablecloths, flatware or menu items- they'd come up with. They fought all the time, Banban, Enrique, and Zeff. Waving our cookbooks at each other, we'd squabble endlessly over the "correct" way to prepare certain dishes. They teased, poked, prodded, sulked, conspired and competed. They wanted to be the best, they wanted to be different but, at the same time, correct. They came up with the looniest, most ambitious menu our endorphin-overloaded brains could agree on, a sort of 'Greatest Hits Of Our Checkered Careers So Far’ collection.

French classics sat side-by-side with Far-Est squid stew, dishes they'd lifted out of cookbooks, stolen from other chefs, remembered seeing in the papers and reading about in pulpies. There were Wellfleet oysters on the halfshell, there was a pasta dish from Mario's - a sort of taglierini with trailmix and anchovies, as Zeff would tell me, but, having actually been to Mario’s I think that was a haze of drugs talking, not an actual menu item- scallops in sorrel sauce (from Bocuse, maybe?).
calves' liver with raspberry-vinegar sauce, swordfish with black beans and white rice, pompano en papillote…

They were high all the time, sneaking off to the walk-in at every opportunity to "conceptualise". Hardly a decision was made without drugs. They worked long hours and took considerable pride in their efforts - the drugs, they thought, having little effect on the end-product. That was what the life they were in was about, they believed. They might’ve been tripping out on blotter acid, sleepless for three days and halfway through a bottle of Stoli, but they were professionals, goddammit! They didn’t let it affect their line work- ...and they were happy, truly happy, like Henry V’s lucky few, a band of brothers, ragged, slightly debauched warriors, who anticipated nothing less than total victory - an Agincourt of the mind and stomach.

That’s not what happened, not really, but- that’s what they believed.

They were pretty busy initially and, along with the young protégés who held them in something like awe, Banban, Enrique and Zeff would work all day and late into the night. When the restaurant closed, they’d take over the bar, drinking Champagne- which they’d buy at cost- and running fat rails of coke from one end of the bar to the other, then crawling along on all-fours to snort them. Zeff, who worried about burning out his nose, switched at some point to shooting up with heroin. The cuter and more degenerate members of the floor staff would hang with them, so there was a lot of humping in the dry-goods area and on the banquetttes, 50-pound flour sacks being popular staging areas for after-work copulation.

A squadron of hard rocker junkie guitar heroes ate for free at Work in Progress - so they got free tickets and backstage passes to the Mudd Club, CBGB, Tier Three, Hurrah, Club 57 and so on. And when the clubs closed it was off to after-hours, where they'd drink and do more drugs until, weather permitting, they'd hit the seven o'clock ferry to Sweet Beach. They'd finish the last of their smack on the train, then pass out on the beach. Whichever one of them woke from the nod would roll the others over to avoid an uneven burn. When they finally arrived back at work, sand in their hair, they looked tanned, rested and ready.

They considered themselves a tribe, all their own. As such, they had a number of unusual customs and rituals all their own. If you cut yourself in the Work in Progress kitchen, tradition called for maximum spillage and spray on the jackets and aprons of comrades. As Zeff told me, one would squeeze the wound until it ran freely, then hurl great gouts of red spray on everyone in the vicinity. They loved blood in their kitchen; more than half the staff was Backcountry Fae.

If one was dented badly, it was no disgrace; they’d stencil a little cut-out shape of a chef knife under one’s station to commemorate the event. After a while, one would have a little row of those knives, like a prize fighter. The house cat- a champion mouser- got her own stencil of a small mouse shape sprayed on the wall by her water bowl, signifying confirmed kills.

Apparently, she brought a baby rabbit and several squirrels back too, which got their own stencils. She was also responsible for the occasional trail of blood smeared over the floor.

They cared little for managers or owners- or customers, for that matter.

Unsurprisingly, their restaurant was rapidly failing. Zeff began to see, for the very first time, what he’d describe to me as ‘Failing Restaurant Syndrome’, an affliction that causes owners to flail around looking for a quick fix, a masterstroke that will ‘turn things around’ and reverse the already irreversible trend toward insolvency. They tried New World Brunch- complete with Merrow band. They tried a prix fixe menu, a Sunday night buffet, they advertised and they hired a publicist. Each successive brainstorm from the idea Fairy was more counterproductive than the one before it.

When the paychecks started bouncing, and the vendors started to put them on COD (cash on delivery), the owners called in the restaurant consultants. Even then, they knew what that meant: the consultants usually arrive just ahead of the repo men and the marshals. It was the death knell. They’d tried. They’d failed. Naturally, they held the owners responsible. It was a tough spot, the ambiance was no good, the music in the dining room sucked, the waiters weren’t well trained… But the truth was, they just weren’t good enough. Their food, while charming to some, was unappealing to most. They did not commit seppuku. Banban and Enrique stayed on, determined to go down with the ship.

But Zeff’s cousin had hooked him up with his very first chef job, at a spanking-new but already troubled bote in the theatre district, and he jumped at the offer. He told me that he felt bad about leaving his friends behind; and that he had the beginnings of a very nasty little heroin habit from all the dope he’d been shooting - but hey! He was about to become a chef!

It’s one of the central ironies of my dad’s career that as soon as he got off heroin, things started getting really bad. High on dope, he was at least a chef, well paid, much liked by crew and floor and owners alike. Stabilised on methadone, he became nearly unemployable by polite society: a shiftless, untrustworthy junkie, sneak thief and corner-cutting hack, toiling in the culinary backwaters.

Things really only improved for him once he went to sea, and… Well, I know the rest.

I’m actually fairly glad that there’s a curtain separating my field of view from the operating theater. I… I’m not squeamish, or anything, but I don’t think it’s strange that I don’t want to see the insides of a living person, especially the insides of a child.

Chopper called the operation ‘laparoscopic’, I think.

Anyway, in my career, there was a stretch of time from when I was fifteen to when I was sixteen when I didn’t work at the Baratie, I worked… elsewhere. I came back for holidays and long weekends, but- well. I worked in Loguetown, for that year. I worked in a seedy hotel on Upper Garden Street, a place so slow that one waiter would have to come downstairs and wake me up when customers came in. I worked a lunch counter on Amscray Avenue, flipping pancakes and doing short-order eggs for politicians and their yesmen. I worked a bizarre yet functional combination theater/diner on Columbine Way, just me and a rabidly-unfriendly bartender- a typically destructive symbiotic arrangement, for that time in my life. I realize now that she was a lesbian, or at the very least not interested in me… Ah, well.

I worked a deserted crab house on Second Street. I cooked brunches in Little Goblin; I slopped out steam-table garbage at a bar on Eighth Street to a bunch of drunks. The same drunks, actually, four times a week- and with their wives and children and families, on the weekends.

I was a sous chef at a very fine two-star place on Tenth Street, where I recall preparing a four-course meal for Mrs. Rose and Mrs. Lavender; they thanked me in a combination of Merrow and Faesh, and I only understood three out of the thirty words. The tone was good, though. And they both pinched my ass, so- maybe they were saying something else? I choose to be flattered at the attention, even now.

Hell, I took another chef’s job- of sorts- at a moment of desperate need at a place called Bailey’s, a combined sit down and take-away upscale fried chicken stand on Fleet Street. It was an operation that was to be the flagship of another planned empire, a chain of fried chicken that would stretch across the globe.

At this point in my year away from home, I didn’t give two shits if the place succeeded or not. I needed the money. My boss was an older Automaton, fresh out of prison, who’d named the place after his youngest son, Bailey, a feckless malingerer who never did amount to much more than a pauper’s grave. He had been—my boss, I mean—in an earlier life, the head of the counting room at a Gran Tesoro casino and, after being caught skimming off millions for the ‘boys back in Loguetown and Alabasta’, had been offered a friendly deal should he co-operate with the prosecution. He had, admiringly, declined, and as a result spent the last five years eating prisoner’s slop.

When he got out, a near-broken man, his old buddies in Loguetown, being Men of Honor, set him up with this restaurant as a sign of gratitude for services rendered. Unfortunately, while in prison, the man had completely lost his goddamn mind. He might have been a stand-up guy, an Automaton in the finest form, but he was also stone cold nutbars.

Now, understand, this wasn’t a classic laundry operation, where the… real owners deliberately run a place into the ground, using a straw owner to run up bills, then pillage after foreclosure for merchandise and credit. I think those wiseguys really did want that rickety clicker to make money and be a success. I mean, they certainly made earnest efforts to be of help at every new turn and reversal, and endured much more nonsense from their visibly deranged partner than I ever would have. Or did, when it came right down to it.

I’d seen Honorable Men around before, of course—hell, it might be said that I grew up in a house full of them—but I’d never worked in a place that was outright Honorable, where I came to know on a personal basis real Honorable types, whose names I recognized from the local papers. Everyone was astonishingly up-front about their connections. My boss was fond of yelling into the phone when discussing prices with a purveyor, "You know who I am? You know who I'm with?!

We did things differently at Bailey's.

My cooks, for one: every one of them came from the Fortune Society, guys who spent their off-hours in halfway houses, allowed out only to work. I was used to working with a fairly rough bunch, a lot of whom, at one time or another, had had problems with the law— but at Bailey's every single one of my cooks was still basically a convict. I can't say that it was an unhappy arrangement, either; for once, I knew my cooks were going to show up at work every day—if they didn't, they went back to prison.

And credit was easily obtained. I knew, from Dad's stories, how difficult it is to set up terms for a new restaurant; even getting a week's credit with some of these companies was usually a lengthy process, involving credit applications, a long wait, initial periods of cash on delivery. At Bailey's, no sooner was I off the phone than the stuff was arriving, often on 60-day terms.

My boss spent a lot of time on the phone, investigating the serious business of horses and their bloodlines, and how well they ran in mud or on grass. Bailey himself, at 18, was happy to drive his sporty cart around and chase girls. So my day-to-day was spent mostly with some genial gentlemen from an Honorable Fraternal Organisation. They helpfully told me where to buy my meat and poultry, and how to meet the folks who would be supplying my linen, bread, paper goods and so on. I had a lot of meetings in vanwains.

"The bread guy is here," I'd be told, and a late-model Buick vanwain would pull up out front. An old guy in a mashed-down bowler hat would beckon me from the driver's seat and then get out of the van. The older guy in the passenger seat would slide over, indicating he wanted me to get in, sit next to him and talk. We'd sit there in the idling cart, talking cryptically about bread, before he brought me around to examine some product. It was a strange business.

My boss only got more insane as time passed.

When we finally opened, we were packed from the first minute. Orders flooded in over the phone and at the counter and at the tables. We were unprepared and understaffed, so the Honorable contingent - including various visiting dignitaries, all with oddly alphabetized names ("This is Mr D, Sanji, and meet a friend, Mr B... This is Mr E-"), all of them overweight, cigar-chomping, middle-aged guys with bodyguards and 10,000-dollar watches- pitched in to help out. Guys I'd read about later in the papers as running construction in the outer boroughs, purported killers, made men, who lived in concrete piles on Statement Beach and Long Lake and security-fenced estates in Swallows, carried brown paper bags of chicken sandwiches up three flights of stairs to Greenditch Village walk-up apartments to make deliveries; they slathered mayo and avocado slices on pitta bread behind the counter, and bussed tables in the dining room.

I have to say I liked them for that.

But when my boss, inexplicably, showed up one day and told me to fire everyone with a tattoo on my staff, I was faced with a dilemma. Every one of my cooks was festooned with prison tats: screaming skulls, saints on hypodermic crosses, bound in barbed wire, gang tats, flaming dice, sixty-kas, pirate flash, Born to Lose, Born Dead, Love-Hate, Mom, portraits of the Madonna, wives, girlfriends, The Queen of Hell.

I tried to put him off, explaining that we couldn't do without these guys, that the hardest-working, most indispensable guy we had - the guy who right now was loading trash cans with hundreds of marinating chicken parts in the cramped, stifling unrefrigerated cellar on his 22nd consecutive double shift - he was a goddamn Sistine Chapel of skin art. And where am I going to find a convict without a tattoo? The Watergate burglars weren't, to my knowledge, available.

Things only got worse.

He came in the next day, obsessing about gold chains and jewellery. My grill man had the usual genie adornments of the day. "Where do you think that pistachio fritter got all that gold?" he raved, spraying food and saliva as he talked. "Selling drugs. That shit is poison! Mugging old ladies! I don't want that in my restaurant! Get him out!"

This was clearly impossible, and I sought counsel with one of the silent partners who, as my boss had become increasingly unpredictable, had grown noticeably less silent. "You hear what he wants me to do?" I asked.

The man just nodded and rolled his eyes, sympathetically, I thought.

"Do nothing," he said, and then, with truly dangerous intonation, added, "Aspetta," meaning "Wait" in that dialect of Automatic.

I didn't like the sound of that.

He smiled at me, and I couldn't help picturing my boss, slumped over a dashboard after one of those meetings in a cart they were all so fond of. When things came to a head a few days later, my boss openly screaming in the middle of a crowded dining room that he wanted all the tattooed guys and gold chain-wearers "Out! Now!" I told him to pay me what he owed - I was leaving for good.

He refused.

The silent partner came over, peeled off my pay and an extra hundred thousand from a fat roll in his suit pocket, and gave me a warm smile as he bade me goodbye.

I don't know what happened to Bailey's, exactly. It certainly never developed into a Worldwide chain as my crazy boss had envisioned- or even a second store. The next time I was in the neighbourhood, a picture framer occupied the space where the restaurant had been. What happened to the old man and his dreams of a poultry empire for his son? I can only guess.

After that, I went back home to Dad Zeff; became a sous chef at a six star restaurant and never looked back until now.

Anyway. I suppose I’m thinking all this because… I don’t know, really. I mean- god, I can remember when I wrote to Mab about wanting to cook, and Mab writing back that if that’s what I wanted to do, she’d find some recipes for me to puzzle out.

Of course, having actually learned to cook by now, some of those old recipes suddenly make a whole lot of sense. Especially after rewriting the cookbook she gave to my keeping.

Here’s a recipe for Eel and Oyster pie, from Mab’s family cookbook.

To make a Pye with eels and oysters, take the oysters from their liquor and put them to the eels, and season them with pepper, salt and mace, raisons and currants, then put them in a pye with good store of butter and fruit on the top and bake until done.

All of the recipes in Mab’s family cookbook are like that.

Every.

Last.

One.

Here’s my recipe for Eel and Oyster Pie.

Take two potatoes and dice; chop one stalk of celery; slice one carrot; grind salt and pepper; prepare one pint of oysters in a cleaning bath; have fresh unsalted butter; half a cup of warm milk or cream; prepare an egg wash and a brush suitable for cooking; and an eight inch disc of pie pastry.

Parboil potatoes, celery and carrot until fork-tender. Drain and season with salt and pepper. Layer vegetables and oysters in baking pan. Dot top with butter; pour heated milk over. Cover with pastry. Paint with egg wash. Make a few small slashes in the pastry for the steam to escape. Bake in a preheated 375 degree oven- which means you can hold your hand to the open door for about five to seven seconds- for 35 minutes or until crust is golden brown.

See? Much more sensible. Although… Those recipes Mab sent me all those year's ago… it’s funny. I don’t think I’d have ever experimented quite the way I learned to do if I didn’t have such vague instructions. Mab’s recipes all assume that the one making them already knows the proper methods. of doing things. I didn’t- about the only thing I knew how to do was make potions, because He had decided that each of his children would learn at least one of the Vinsmoke Arts.

All of us had to learn potions- but I, of course, was the worst at it. Not because I couldn’t follow a receipt- but because… I wanted to cook, not brew. I don’t actually want to work in the Dairy, or the Stillroom. I just tease Mab and Chopper about it because the arguments are funny, and I know they know I’m not actually serious.

Having friends to fool around with is fun.

Hm. Forgot what I was going to think of next. This tea is nice, but- ach. Might as well take an actual nap.

“It’s against the rules to share blood with lanjin, Shyarly! You know it, and I know it. Any Gyojin or Merjin that does so will be silenced by a judgement in the dark.”

“Mister Hammond, no Gyo or Mer in this establishment would ever dream of sharing blood with a Lanjin. You know as well as I that after Fisher Tiger’s death—”

“-all he needed was one shitty human to step up and offer to help-”

“-After that, Hammond, no Gyo or Mer would ever, ever consider helping a Lanjin by giving their blood.”

I, listening to the owner of this establishment argue furiously with the New Fishman Pirate, look very carefully at Keimi, who looks back at me, wide eyed. I blink at her, batting my eyelashes, and Keimi doesn’t quite smile, but she doesn’t grimace either.

I smile.

Franky and Brook glance at each other uneasily, while the girls nudge each other and clamp hands over their mouths to stifle giggles. It’s very lucky we’re in a shrug, otherwise we’d never get away with this.

“Done with the menu, girls?” Best thing to do in this situation is Don’t Think About it.

“Yes, Mab,” they chorus, stifling giggles and snickers.

I take back the clipboard and hand it to Keimi-

“Mark down a pot of mint tea- just keep refilling it as we empty it- and an order of curry buns for me, please. It’s going to be a long night.”

“-Yes Ma’am.”

“Captain wants to know- are you dating anyone?”

“...Hody Jones actually likes my fiance? That’s unexpected-”

“It’s so that he can oppose your marriage! You need to get married for him to start hating your husband in peace. He won’t accept it, even if he dies. He’ll throw stones and gems at you both during the ceremony, instead of rice!”

“Hmmph. Then we’ll dodge the stones quickly, and catch the gems with accuracy. You’ve no business here, Hammond. -Thank you, for bringing your Captain’s message. My reply is this-”

And then there’s a loud, wet sounding thump, and a yelp as all the breath in a man’s body is driven out of him in one hit.

“Be sure to give him that from me, won’t you?” says Madam Shyarly, before she snaps her fingers and-

Huh. I think she just gave Hammond the boot. Nice.

While we wait, I might as well go over the history of Coral Hills. Technically speaking, it’s really two or three distinct towns- Corallia, Hillsdun, and Gobdark.

Corallia is a resort town on Fishman Island’s Coral Shelf, which divides the island by a third. It’s primary industry is tourism. It’s located about thirty nine miles south of Waterwheel Town, the country’s main power plant.

The name comes from the fact that literally everything here is built out of some kind of coral- big, marble-like coral makes up the buildings, while dainty, delicate porcelain corals make things like dishwares. It was known as Ondine Pariso during the Age of Heroes, and Merrow’s Cave during the Age of Exploration; Corallia is known today as Coral Hill.

This particular area has been a center of art and culture since some of the earliest recorded history, and has been settled by many civilizations since being founded by the Lonlegs people. Later settlers include the Aevians in the 1st century, and Giants in the 9th. Originally, seafarers and traders built a number of settlements all along the coastline, with Coral Hill being the crown jewel of them; considering it’s relative closeness to the palace, I can understand why.

As Fae, Norten, and Estern shippers began to trade along the Line, the port was refounded, a garrison was placed in nearby Gyoverly hills, and the town center shifted from the hills themselves to the valley where we are now. With that shift came the rise of Hillsdun, which is where most of the people in Corallia actually live; the working people, I mean.

Goblin Town is different.

The history of Goblin Town- properly called the Walled City, or the City of Darkness; Kowloon, in the Merrow, and locally known as Gobdark- can be traced back to the Triton period of Ryugu Mergyo, when an outpost was set up to manage the trade of salt and brine. For hundreds of year's after that, little of interest took place, aside from a small coastal fort being established during 810. In 842, during the reign of Mer the Sixth, the hills of Ryuma were ceded to the Austrics, of which Moda was a part. As as result, the Mer6 authorities felt it necessary to improve the fort in order to rule the area and check further influence.

Things get murky after that, but as far as I know, the wall was half demolished in order to expand some of the older parts of Coral Hill; yet the Walled City remained. And then, of course, the Fae decided that since there was already a nice slum town, we might as well get into the thick of it. Thus, there’s an entire micro-city called Goblin Town, surrounded by a rare spiny coral that- as far as anyone is willing to say- only grows there. Thus, it can never, ever be wholly demolished, as that would harm the coral.

What’s Gobdark like? Well.

Prostitutes install themselves on one side of the narrow corridors while priests and nuns preach and hand out powdered milk to the poorest on the other; social workers give guidance while drug addicts squat under the stairways getting high. What are children’s gaming centres by day become strip-show venues by night. It’s a complex, fluid place, difficult to generalize about. Coral Hill is a freshly scrubbed child compared to the seedy filth of fetid Goblin Town. But, as is true of every place people live long enough- no matter how squalid or strange, people just live their normal lives.

Yes, Gobdark is notorious for brothels, casinos, cocaine and opium parlours; it’s famous for food courts where you can get dog meat, horse meat, even human fetuses if you pay the right person; yes, you can go to an unlicensed barber who will do anything to your teeth. It might be a pit, crawling with rats and dripping with sewage- but it’s their pit to hell, dammit.

As for what it actually is - it’s a densely populated warren of more than thirty five thousand people crammed into a few tiny apartment blocks and more than three hundred interconnected high-rise buildings, all constructed without contributions from a single architect.

“Mab… how in the hell do you know all that?” says- C. Interesting.

“I’m a Queen of the Fae- I know all kinds of things. For example, I know that tonight’s going to go like a game of Spangle I once played in…”

“Eh?” everyone at the table chorused.

“Ah. Well. It’s called The Play.

“The Play was a last-second kickoff return during a school Spangle game between the FaME Golden Years, and the SOL Rockstars about… six years ago. Given the circumstances and rivalry, the wild game that preceded it, the very unusual way in which The Play unfolded, and its lingering aftermath on players and fans, it is recognized as one of the most memorable plays in the history of Spangle and among the most memorable in Skuan sports.

“The Rivalry between the Fairisle Military Engineering corps and the Skuan Office of Law is legendary. It’s existed since before Skua has existed, and no one really remembers all the reasons why. Due to various… upsets, the game of Spangle was eventually devised as a substitute for war, with the hope that by having the two rivals play in such a game, they would stop murdering each other.
“Spangle is the slang for the game; it’s really called Sixth Degree. It’s called Spangle because of the way the Fox glimmers and gleams- if you’re a hunter or just spectating, you can hardly take your eyes off of it. Whatever it’s called, Spangle is a brutal game, but no one has died in years, as far as I know. The object of the game is to score more points than your opponents. Each goal is worth ten points and catching the Fox is worth three hundred points. The game ends when the Fox is caught or an agreement is reached between the captains of both teams. Some games can go on for days if the Fox isn’t caught; the record, as far as I know, is three months.

“It’s played on an ovular pitch, with ten goals on the opposite ends. There’s a specific zone near each goal called a… lane? I think? And each goal is called a degree, numbered one through five.

“There are four different balls. There’s the Pig, the Slams, and the Fox. The Pig is what’s usually used to score goals; you throw it through any of the degrees, and you score ten points. It’s made of leather, and very easy to throw and catch, once you learn the proper way to do it.

“Slams target the nearest player and do their best to break bones and crack skulls. They’re basically cannon-balls wrapped in wood and leather, and they hurt to get hit with. They only stop attacking if the player falls unconscious.

“The Fox- smallest of the three, it’s about the size of a walnut or the skull of a kitten; is worth three hundred points, and ends the game as soon as it’s caught. It’s also self-motivated to stay within bounds, and dart around the pitch like a rabbit under the shadow of a hawk. Thus, a proper game of Spangle is actually two very different games- the game of Offence and Defence, run by the Tender and the Sliders and the Batters, of both sides; and the Duel between the two Hunters, over possession of the Fox.

“The game is played by two teams of seven people, with substitutions allowed. It’s three Sliders, two Batters, one Tender, and one Hunter- and teams actually average around thirty to forty people. The Tender guards the degrees, while the three Sliders score goals with the Pig by tossing it through one of the opposing team's degrees. The two Batters keep the Slams away from their team and hit them towards the opposing team, and the Hunter catches the Fox to end the game.

“I was a Hunter.

“The game starts with the referee releasing all four balls from the central circle. The Slams and Fox are enchanted to fly off of their own accord, but the Pig is thrown into the air by the referee to signal the start of play. Since the lengths of Spangle games aren’t set, with some games going on for days if the Fox is not caught, the game is not played in periods, although captains can call for a time out. Teams continue using the same goal posts to score throughout the game.

“Sliders are not the only players who can touch the Pig- but they are the only players who can score for their teams. They score by sending the Pig through any of the five goal hoops. Each goal scored is worth ten points. After a goal is scored, the opposing team's Tender throws the Pig back into play.

“The game only ends when the Fox’s caught, or at the agreement of both team Captains. Catching the Fox is worth three hundred points to the team whose Hunter made the catch. The Fox is bewitched to respond to the first player to make contact with it, in case there is any dispute regarding which Hunter touched it first. Despite this, there have been several instances in which the Fox has been fumbled.

“The winner of the game is the team with the most points, regardless of who caught the Fox. As a result, it is possible, although difficult, to win the game even though the opposing team caught the Fox, if your team is three hundred ten or more points ahead. In the event of a tie, the winner is decided in a Captain’s duel, weapons to be decided by the winner of a coin-flip.
“In 750, the Fae Office of Games set down official rules for the game of Spangle.

“Firstly, players must not stray over the boundary lines of the pitch, although they may fly- or swim, I suppose, I can see you taking notes, B- as high as desired. The Pig must be surrendered to the opposition if any offence player leaves the boundary. Defence players may leave the bounds as they like.

“Secondly, ‘Time Out’ may be called at any time by the Captain of a team. Time out may be extended to two hours if a game has already lasted for more than twelve hours. Failure to return to the pitch after this time will lead to the team being disqualified.

“Thirdly, penalties can be awarded to teams by the referee. A single Slider may take the penalty by flying from the central circle towards the scoring area. The opposing team’s Tender may attempt to stop the shot being scored, but all other players must not interfere. The Hunter may hunt at this time.

“Fourthly, Contact is allowed, but a player may not seize hold of another player’s wings, or any part of their anatomy otherwise.

“Fifthly, no substitution of players is allowed during the game, even if a player is too injured or tired to continue to play. A Captain must call for time out, before any substitutions can be made.

“Sixthly, players may take their mystic fetishes- wands, staffs, prayer beads, weapons, etcetera- onto the pitch, but they must not be used on or against any players, any game officials, any of the four balls, or the spectators.

“Seventhly, and most importantly, a game of Spangle only ends with the successful capture of the Fox.

“There are seven hundred eighty four recorded fouls listed in the SOG records, though the entire list has never been made public as it was certain Office members’ view that some players might get ideas. Six hundred of those fouls are banned anyway, due to the ban on using any kind of magic in game. The remaining hundred are too dirty for even the worst player to contemplate using- however, there are eleven common fouls, which tend to happen in every game regardless. There’s blagging, seizing the opponent’s wing, fin, or tail to slow or hinder their movement. Blocking, deliberately putting oneself in the way of the opposing team’s Hunter, with the intention of obstructing their way towards the Fox. Cobbing, excessive use of elbows towards opponents. Flacking, pushing any portion of anatomy through the goal hoop in an attempt to push the Pig out- the Tender must defend from the front, not the rear. Foxing, any player other than the Hunter touching or catching the Fox. Blatching- flying, or swimming, with the intent to collide. Blurting, locking limbs together with the intent to steer an opponent off course. Bumping, hitting Slams towards spectators. Haversacking, hand still on the Pig as it goes through the goal hoop- the pig must be thrown through the goal. Pig-poking, tampering with the Pig- as in puncturing it so that it falls more quickly or zig-zags, or covering it in grease so it’s harder to catch, hold, and throw. And, finally, Staggering, which is more than one Slider entering the scoring lane.

“Staggering is really hard to catch, actually.

“During the final of the 1473 Spangle World Cup, all seven hundred fouls were committed, as well as several new fouls that only appeared in that particular game. These naturally included all eleven fouls I mentioned before, as well as: Transforming a Slider into a skunk. Attempted decapitation of a Tender with a broadsword. The release of one hundred blood-sucking vampireels from under the FaME Captain’s skirts during the game. Setting fire to an opponent’s ponytail. Attacking an opponent with a club. Attacking an opponent with an axe. Use of surface to air ballistic ferrets. Public Nudity. Indecent Behavior with two Cherubim and a Goat. Use of vaporized liquor as an intoxicant on the referee. Declaration of undying love to the Slam, which blushed mightily and was extra violent for the rest of the game. An ungodly number of flying vampire frogs, released into the spectators to foment chaos. Two Batters smote with lightning. A small, localized Tormato. Double necrophilia on a group of ferrets.

“That game was historic.”

I pause, and take a long sip of my tea. The Girls are grinning with glittering eyes, because they weren’t aware that all those things could be done in the course of one game of Spangle. Franky is just about crying with laughter, as is Brook- because they’ve actually seen games of Spangle, I’d say, and they know exactly how crazy these things can get.

Mm. Minty.

“...In Spangle, if you do something cool enough, you get it named after you. Bludger’s Crackerjack; one Batter uses a Slam to defend another player with the other Slam. It takes precise timing, extreme skill, and a hell of an arm to swing that. Chelonia’s Charge; a Slider catches a Slam and uses it to batter through the opposition’s formation, stealing the Pig in the process. Selachii’s Leap; a Slider leaps off their teammate’s back, catching the Pig mid-pass. Double Troupple; both Batters strike a Slam at the same time, to double to force behind a swing. Crazy Eights; a Tender moves in front of the goals at high speed to block the Pig. Finney’s Flick; a Slider uses their wings, their tail, or their fins to hit a Pig mid-pass and into a goal. Arrey’s Attack Formation; the three Sliders move in a triangle shape to force other Sliders aside. Hawkin’s Vise; two Sliders trap an opposing Slider, while the third Slider fouls the trapped one. Plumper’s Ruse; hiding the Fox in the Hunter’s clothing to confuse the opponents. Delilah’s Drop; one Slider moves directly vertically, and then throws the Pig down to another Slider directly below them. Loris Reversal; a Slider throws the Pig over their shoulder or otherwise behind them, without looking. Jerry Roll; a player moves in a progressively tighter spiral to draw the attention of a Slam, before darting away- leading the Slam to down another player entirely. Jellyfish Smother; the Tender spreads their body out to protect the maximum amount of goal as the Slider approaches. That’s a risky one, you have to have very good Batters to do that. Sucker Punch; a fake punch to the nose to confuse the opponent, and so long as no actual contact is made, it’s not a foul. Woolgathering; Sliders move in erratic, slow ways to confuse their opposition. The most important of all of these to me, however, is the Morgan Feint; in which a Hunter from on high dives down, sharply, as if to catch the Fox. This causes the opposing Hunter to chase after them, only for the first Hunter to pull up at the last second, causing the opposition to crash into the ground of the pitch.

“The game in which I played, in which The Play was played, was our two team’s 85th Big Game, and was played on SOL’s home field. Although SOL was guaranteed a winning record, with cup eligibility, for the season, no cup game was looking to invite them. The implications of that game were far more important to FaME, led by Captain John Elway, playing in his last regular season game before heading off to become a future Sky Blue Spangle League star enshrined in the SOG hall of Fame. The Golden Years team was in the midst of an exciting season- we were 5-5 but had victories over the highly ranked Floria Snapplegators and Thuletima’s Snowruins- and we needed a win to be eligible to play in a cup game. Representatives of the SOG Fame Classic committee were in attendance, apparently to extend an invitation to FaME, if the Goldens won.

“Also at stake was possession of the FaME Abacus and the SOL Sword, a pair of trophies that together represented our scholastic honor and integrity. They originate back to the Age of Heroes, but in 933, after years of increasingly more elaborate thefts of the trophies by students from one or the other school, the two schools agreed that the winner of the Big Game would take possession. The plaque upon which they are mounted carries the scores of previous Big Games, and is ceremoniously awarded to the captain of the winning team by the losing team’s Captain.

“With SOL leading 590-570 late on the fourth day, Elway and the Goldens overcame a spiral picket on their own third-degree goal with a twenty-nine second completion, then managed to get the Pig within fielding range for Slider Mark Harmony. Elway called a timeout with eight seconds left on the clock before sundown. Had Elway let the clock run down to four seconds before calling time, the ensuing play would not have taken place since the clock would have run out on the goal. But, Elway was under instruction from Coach to call timeout on the Eight to allow time for a second goal try in case FaME drew a penalty on the first attempt. Harmony’s flying was good, putting FaME ahead 600-590. However, our celebrations drew a fifteen-second unsportsmanlike conduct penalty, enforced on the ensuing Pig-punt by the Ref. This was crucial, as FaME had to hold position for fifteen seconds while our opposition, SOL, was allowed freedom of movement.

“At that point, SOL announcer Josie Stark praised FaME and Elway for their efforts, and added,
“Only a miracle can save the Goldens now!’

“With four seconds left on the sunset clock, FaME special teams coach Frederich von Becken called for a squab kick on the Pig. Due to confusion, SOL took the pitch with only six men, one short of the regulation seven, but still legal in scholastic Spangle.

“What followed became one of the most debated and dissected plays in scholastic Spangle history.”

I pause again, and devour two of my slightly cool curry buns. Mm. Veggie Curry.

“Right. Harmon squabbed the kick and SOL’s Kevvy Moey received the Pig afront the SOL fourth degree near the left scoring lane. After some ineffective scrambling, Moey lateraled the Pig leftwards to Buckaroo Banzai. Banzai was very quickly surrounded, gaining only two goals before being caught from behind by a slam- but not before reversing the Pig to his teammate, Dole Kale. Kale flew straight for the five degree lane which was closest to him, but was immediately fouled by two of the FaME Sliders. However, while being fouled, he managed to pitch the Pig through the fifth and back to Banzai, scoring again.

“It was at this moment, believing that Kale was actually his twin brother- the Hunter, Dale Kale- had caught the Fox and the game was over, that several FaME players and the entire FaME band, which had been waiting at the south end of out of bounds, ran onto the field in celebration.

“Banzai dodged another FaME player and took the Pig to his right, toward the middle of the pitch, where at least one of the SOL Sliders was ready for the next pitch. Around the FaME fourth degree, Banzai scored a goal and- still having possession of the Pig due to Tender Mulaney being stuck behind a rowdy SOL Batter and the FaME flautists- pitched the ball to Mariette Ford, the other Batter on his team, who caught it in stride and flew hell for leather.

“Meanwhile, the FaME band, all one hundred forty four of them, had run out past the south goals, which the SOL sliders were trying to get to- and had advanced as far as the second degree goal post midfield. The scrum of players was moving towards them.

“Ford avoided a FaME player and hurtled upfield while moving to the right scoring lane, and into the band, which was scattered all over the south end of the pitch. Around the FaME third degree, three FaME players smothered Ford- two Sliders and a Batter- but while flailing she threw a blind reversal over her right shoulder.

“Moey caught it at about the third degree in the third scoring lane, and charged towards the goal. One FaME-struck Slam missed him, and the other could not catch him from behind. Moey flew through the scattering FaME band members for the goal, which he famously completed by headbutting the unaware trombone player Garryana Quercus.

“The SOL players celebrated wildly- but the officials had not signaled the capture of the Fox. FaME coach Wiggin and his players on the bench argued with the Refs on the ground that the SOL’s goals couldn’t be legal, citing a thousand and one things that had happened during the play. Meanwhile, the officials huddled. The chaos at the end of The Play made the officials' task very challenging. In particular, the questionable fifth lateral took place in the midst of the Stanford band, greatly reducing visibility. After determining that Cal had scored and no one had ruled any of the laterals illegal, Ref Moffett signaled the touchdown, rendering the illegal participation penalty on Stanford irrelevant and ending the offence-defence game for that moment, as the SOL called for a time out.

“All that was left now was for the Hunters to catch the damn Fox.

“Which I did- and Dale never did forgive me for Morganing him into the ground. The final score, unfortunately, was SOL 650, FaME 600. The Rockstars won the Abacus and Sword.

“The officials' ruling of the SOL series of goals was highly controversial at the time, and The Play has remained a source of often intense disagreement throughout the intervening years, particularly between ardent FaME and SOL fans. The controversy centers on the legality of two of the five laterals as well as on the chaos that ensued when the FaME team and band entered the playing field while the ball was still live.

“Many Stanford players and coaches objected immediately to the third lateral, from Dole Kale to Buckaroo Banzai, asserting that Garner's knee was down moments beforehand. Trafalgar Lamia, a FaME Batter who was in on the foul, maintains that Kale's knee had hit the turf of the pitch while he was still in possession of the ball; Kale and Banzai themselves, however, assert the opposite. Video replays are inconclusive; due to the distance from the camera and the swarm, one cannot see the exact moment Kale's knee may have touched.

“Afterward, upon viewing the game footage, some suggested that the fifth lateral, from Mariette Ford to Kevvy Moey, could have been an illegal forward pass. Ford was being tackled at about the second degree when she released her blind, over-the-shoulder heave, which Moey appeared to catch while crossing the goal lane. Because both players were in full stride, and because the lateral traveled some distance, some thought the ball had gone forward. Under the rules of Spangle, the direction of a pass is judged relative to the field. Complicating this was the fact that Ford was falling forward upon releasing the ball, while Moen reached backwards to catch it, thus making it quite possible that the ball itself traveled sideways or backward. However, to be a forward pass, the ball must actually travel forward; a ball that travels laterally only is a backward pass and in this situation, legal.

“Finally, while the replays of the tackle of Kale and the fifth lateral are inconclusive, FaME was clearly guilty of illegal participation, both from too many players on the field and the band. At least two game officials immediately threw penalty flags on us for having too many on the field. A Spangle game cannot end on a defensive penalty (unless it is declined), so had any of the SOL ball-carriers been fouled short of the goal lane from this point on, SOL would have been granted at least one unclocked play from scrimmage, and perhaps a goal outright for outside interference. The head game referee, Charles Moffett, noted this as a likely outcome in a subsequent interview.”
The Girls blink at me, then B hesitantly asks “-But, Mab, if you were there… can’t you say for sure what happened?”

“Nope. At that point, Dale had managed to concuss me, and I was so focused on catching the Fox and dueling with him I paid no attention at all to the pitch until maybe the last second of the Morgan Feint, which is when I actually saw and caught the Fox.”

“Oh.” said B, before continuing to scribble in her notebook.

“Sorry- you’re saying that tonight is going to be as chaotic as that game you played in school, Mab?” said Brook.

“Yeah. I’ve got that funny feeling running up and down my spine- felt something like it before Enies Lobby, but I thought it was just was just worry for Robin, not an actual Premonition.”

“...Oh dear,” said F, before shoving back from the table- “I feel what you mean, now. I need to go and pack, then, we won’t have time later.”

“Mm. If you can hold off for a few hours, you’ll have a much better time of it- for one thing, I’ll be able to go with you to Gobdark.”

“Um.” said F.

“For another, there’s the small matter of you learning to See through Crystal that ought to be handled while we’re all still here-”

“Oh. Really? I thought… I have a glass crystal that I’ve been practicing on, but,” and F scoots back to the table, “It’s a murky sphere, I can hardly get anything from it.”

“From glass? I’m not surprised.” said Madam Shyarly, her long body oozing into the seat next to me.

“Glass is a terrible medium to learn with- you’d do best to start with a natural crystal, or even stone. - I heard you fought with Three Swords yesterday, Queen Mab. I’d love to hear that story; and in exchange, I’ll let the little Frog have a go at my Crystal Ball. It’s quartz, which is fairly easy to use- better than glass, anyway. Someone ought to get some use out of the damn thing...” she said, huffing at what I suppose could be taken as a table ornament, but is actually a very plain orbuculum.

“I think that can be arranged, Madam Shyarly. The story goes like this.”

Right. We’ve stabilized the patient’s blood pressure as best we can; Taffy and Gurry are both scrubbed in, and ready for surgery. The patient has been administered a general anesthetic, via injection, which Gurry administered as the anesthetist. The new school of surgery considers using anesthetics both during and after the surgery to be of use in managing pain, which I agree with.

Gurry is also monitoring the patient’s blood pressure with a cuff around the patient’s left arm, and a heart monitor on same. The Medaka Nurses are tending to the secondary patient, who is acting as a blood-replenishment transfuser, as both patients have the exceedingly rare S- bloodtype.
Nurse Taffy has already begun draining the abdomen, allowing for surgery to proceed with minimal mess and contamination. I will be using the laparoscopic method to inspect, repair, or remove the patient’s ruptured spleen. After making four small incisions in the patient’s abdomen, I will insert a tube with a tiny video snail into the abdomen through one of the incisions. Paying close attention to the video monitor, I will repair or remove the spleen with surgical tools that are inserted in the other three incisions. Then, once all the repairs have been effected and all the broken spleen is removed, I will close the incision.

I choose this method for two reasons. Firstly, the size of my patient; she is a small child, between the ages of eight and ten, with a fairly narrow chest and abdomen. Secondly, the recovery speed post-surgery; a laparoscopic splenectomy has a recovery rate of about two weeks, while a traditional splenectomy requires six or more. The patient shows signs of serious dedication to physical activity. Medicine is not just about fixing a problem; it’s about making sure more problems don’t pop up having fixed the first one.

This isn’t about me- while it would be easier to do an open surgery, I have decided, after some deliberation with the Nurses, that it would not be easier for the patient. More importantly, if there is a need to move the patient, a laparoscopic surgeries aftercare will be more easily tended to.

“Okay. Ready, Nurse?”

“Yes, Doctor.”

“Right- as you have marked the appropriate places on the sterilized abdomen of the patient, Nurse Taffy, I will begin incisions- now.”

And I cut.

“A surgery such as this is recommended in these instances: splenic trauma with hemorrhage, which our patient showed; splenic cysts or splenic mass; splenic abscess; Hematologic disorders, such as idiopathic thrombocytopenic purpura, hemolytic anemia, hereditary spherocytosis, and other hereditary or autoimmune anemias; severe hypersplenism; perisplenic malignancy; splenic artery aneurysm; splenic vein thrombosis with left-sided portal hypertension; and portal hypertension due to liver disease.”

“What about if the patient presents with thrombocytopenia?”

“No, thrombocytopenia is not a contraindication of splenectomy.”

“Preoperative transfusion?”

“Not recommended in most cases- however, in this case, without it the patient would have been dead within minutes. A major blood vessel must have been damaged quite severely- I’ll do my best to repair it, as soon as we get the- tube-”

“Here, Doctor-”

“Thank you, Nurse- and- there! Suction-”
“Yes-”

“Damn. Her spleen’s irreparable- I’ll have to remove it entirely.”

“Yes sir.”

“Clamp.”

“Sir. -Risks?”

“The spleen is an organ that cleans the blood of bacteria and viruses; she’ll be more likely to get sick, but I can’t fix this- maybe Trafalgar Law could, but he’s not here-”

“-Doctor, is that a secondary spleen?”

“-My gods, it is. Good catch, Nurse Taffy. If I can repair the vein there, that secondary spleen can be left as is, meaning she won’t be entirely without -oh, now that’s interesting.”

“Doctor?”

“Her primary spleen and her secondary are the same size- clamp- meaning if all goes well, her spleen will expand in size with her growing as she ages. Curious indeed.”

“Sir.”

“Scalpel.”

“Sir. Other risks?”

“Mm- right. Post-splenectomy sepsis; hemorrhage; infection in the incision site or an intra-abdominal abscess; pancreatitis or pancreatic leak; damage to surrounding structures (stomach, diaphragm, colon, etc) which I see no signs of; harmonic scalpel.”

“Sir.”

“Our patient was vaccinated immediately upon diagnosis of splenic trauma for encapsulated organisms- pneumococcus, menigococcus, haemophilus influenzae-”

“-Pneumonia, Meningitis, Bloodlove Flu-”

“Exactly right; and laparoscopic splenectomy is preferentially performed in the right lateral decubitus position but unfortunately that’s not possible. Thankfully, it can also be performed with the patient supine, as ours is. Suction.”

“Sir.”

“-The gastrosplenic ligament contains the short gastric vessels and must be divided to obtain access to the splenic vessels, whereas the splenophrenic and splenorenal ligaments are relatively avascular. The gastrosplenic ligament is transected using bipolar cautery- cauter-”

“Sir-”

“-or harmonic scalpel to ensure hemostasis of the short gastric vessels, thereby obtaining access to the splenic vessels. Next, the relatively avascular- cauter-”

“Sir-”
“Not this time, hah, avascular splenocolic and splenorenal ligaments are divided along with the other attachments, freeing the spleen. A vascular stapler—stapler—”

“Sir—”

“Is used to divide the splenic artery and vein. The artery is always divided before the vein. Ring forceps, please—”

“Sir.”

“And—just gotta—got ya, little bastard. Bag it, tag it.”

“Yes sir.”

“Let me stitch this up, then; and we’re done, here.”

“Yes, Doctor.”

That’s part one done; now, for part two.

Bleah. I think I got poisoned.

I don’t really get sick, is the thing; I got sick when I was really young, but after I got m’Devil Fruit, I hardly get sick at all. I mean, I get the flu, but everyone gets the flu, even Mab, and Mab doesn’t get sick at all— or if she does, it doesn’t stop her much.

She took me out to a place called Chalkwhite, in her country; showed me a funny cut in the ground called the Horse. Said ‘T ain’t what a horse looks like, Luffy; it’s what a horse be.’ And when I looked again, I realized she was right, and that was the end of her lessons that day.

Mab tutored me a lot; an’ I’m pure grateful for it.

But right now, my stomach’s churning like I ate something really foul; there’s a cold sweat on my back and sides, and it feels like there’s a hot pillow mushin’ on my face.

Hm. Thinkin’ back, it was when we were shoutin’ down the invite to the Fishman Pirates I think—eh, doesn’t matter when. What happened is more important; I attacked that yellow guy and got blocked by a swordsman, an octopus merman. He looked a hell of a lot like Moda—Ace’s wife, y’know—around the nose. Had the same kind of blue rings, too, but Missus Moda’s only pop out when she’s real angry or scared—saw it happen once when m’neice, Theodosia, fell off the balcony and landed plop inta Ace’s arms.

Heh.

But damn if she wasn’t terrified and furious that it happened at all. Still though— I was blocked from punchin’ that yellow guy by the octoman, and—there it is! There’s a nick on my arm; thin like, with a weird purpling edge to it and it smells—foul.

He poisoned me. Huh.
Chopper said that because I fought the poison-guy in prison and got treated by Iva-chan, I’m immune to almost every poison now. The only person on our crew who’s poison resistance is stronger is Sanji, and Sanji… Sanji’s different. Saa- that octoman must have some skill with a sword; Zoro’s gonna want to fight him, I think. Although it’s kinda dirty to use poison on a sword…

Ace and his pops are being weird, and so’s the Neptune-guy and his sons. They keep avoiding talking about Ace’s wife, Moda, and it’s really obvious if I’m picking up on it. They’re half embarrassed that she exists, I think, and half grateful to her for not making an issue of it- huh.

Dunno what the hell that’s supposed to mean.

Moda won’t have nothin’ to do with the Crown of the Sea; she went all the way to the Calm Belt and built her own country, rather than come here. The Octoman looks too much like her to be unrelated; and… I got a weird feelin’ about tonight.

Something’s gonna happen. Jinbe’ll have to wait- message or no message.

There’s something real ugly at the bottom of this barrel; I know it. So do Usopp an’ Mark, it’s why they ain’t said nothin’ so far; mostly, they’ve been listening to Mab talk about nothing much at all. I ain’t been saying much either; I been listening, and eating, too.

Mostly, I been listening.

“-And really, that’s what happened.”

“Oh my. So Old Sidre’s finally shuffled on; how impressive. She’s been harassing generations of the Left family for centuries; one wonders what will become of them, now that they’ve no more obligations to look after.”

“Doesn’t one just.”

“Hehnhehnhehn. Now- I’ve seen you six around the Cafe- usually with one more lurking around- but I don’t suppose I caught any names. Do introduce yourselves, if you don’t mind me askin’.”

“Ah- Adelaide, the Blue-”

“Beatrice, the Indigo-”

“Cecelia, the Violet-”

“Deborah’s in the San, and she’s Red; I’m Eleanor, the Orange-”

“Fernanda, the Yellow-”

“-And I’m Genevieve, the Green.”

“Rainbow Seven, Come to See;
Lucky Seven, Lucky me- achoo!”
“Hmmph, you’ve got some interference there—”

“Ah, yeah- it’s always been like that, sadly. I can do a… that one with the live thing and the crap in your pockets and a tangle, that- s’like a multitool but for witchery—”

“Oh, that thing! I know exactly what you mean, but the name’s escaped me- I want to say tangle, but that’s not right I don’t think…”

“…mangle, bramble- Shamble! It’s a shamble!”

Fernanda makes a funny little interrogative chirruping noise. I pause, and look at Madam Shyarly-who smiles, and graciously waves me on. Right.

“A shamble, also called a shambles, is a handmade device used by witches to detect or amplify magic. It can even be used for protection or to send a spell. The device itself is not magical; a shamble is like a pair of glasses: they help you see, but they don't see for you.

“A conversant witch can assemble a shamble in a matter of seconds using stuff like strings or thread, twigs, leaves, feathers, beads, coloured paper, an egg or even a beetle. The whole thing looks like a "cat's cradle", or some sort of nest made of trash. The ingredients are not really important, although the centre should contain a live ingredient- or, interestingly, the most powerful representation of a living thing. Thus, in certain desperate moments, I’ve used royal seals, and place markers. Even a map or two.

“The magic lies in its assembly and use, which is to catch the moment. It’s in… oh, the way you tie the knots, and the way the string runs - the freshness of the egg or the liveliness of the beetle, perhaps, and the moisture in the air- the tension of the twigs and the kind of things that you just happen to have in your pocket at that moment - even the way the wind is blowing. All these things make a kind of picture of the here-and-now when you move them right.

“The most effective shamble is the shamble assembled when the witch- or mage- really needs one. My granny, though- she could never make one at all. Couldn't get the hang of them. They got in the way, for her.

“Some witches assemble extra shambles or even buy some just to hang around for decoration; these shambles are generally not very useful, but some of these still seem to react to strong magic. When the ambient magic is really too strong, the shamble explodes. And it’s for that very reason that unless things are really and truly dire, I won’t be making one here and now- much too dangerous.”

“Oh.” said Fernanda.

“Of course, that’s because you’re a mage, and your magic field is very, very strong- I’m just a seer, and I can show you a shamble if you’d like.” smiles Madam Shyarly.

“Uh- yeah! Please, show me.” said Fernanda.

Madam Shyarly smiles, and tugs from a pocket of her hoodie a coil of fine fishing line; and then, it begins. A quick little profusion of knots goes around a tiny glass bottle with a marimo bobbing around on the bottom. Then, one thread loops around a stick, and another a pencil. They almost seem to go through each other as feathery scales get tied in, then hot peppers, bits of shell and coral, broken jewelry, a hank of cat-fur and a vial of ink- a pen- and then, dangling from her index finger, a Shamble.

Madam Shyarly tucks a disposable chopstick through the loop where her finger is, and then gently sets the whole thing on a little pair of hooks above the crystal ball. Fernanda- I’m calling her Fern- Fern can’t take her eyes off of it. Honestly, neither can I.

The Shamble vibrates softly, then settles, scale-feathers fluttering in a breeze that doesn’t exist. The ink in the bottle bubbles and turns bright blue, with thick black bubbles drifting through it. I smell, ever so faintly, the scent of oysters and rice.

“According to most Wizards, a shamble is just a crude way to ensure thaumic cusping in phase-space, but they’re a bit… loquacious. In fact, the shamble is a practical tool compared to the more academic thaumometer–”

“Which is both rare, fragile, and expensive–” sighed Madam Shyarly.

“Mhm. Quite. Still… it’s a good skill for any young caster to have- especially if they’ve got magical powers, which all of you girls do. Mages use them less often than witches do, as their well of magic is usually much too strong for the fairly delicate device to handle. -Ah, Madam Shyarly; if it’s at all possible, could you keep out of the Sanitary? My husband, Sanji, is acting as a blood transfusion right now, and he’s also a giant pervert–”

“Sorry, what?” she said.

“My husband’s a giant pervert? He’ll lose all the blood in his body if you go in there, and Chopper needs that blood for Deborah right now–”

“-and so the past is rhymed… Heh. I’ll stay out of the San, sure. -Your sister is Attwell the Florist, yes?” she said.

“-ah, yes. She runs a tea house now, in Faeland.”

“I’ll just bet she does… Hmph. I can’t believe my young rival is following the path I laid so… easily.” she said.

“So, Atty got kicked in the head by an ostrich as a child and now when she makes too many future predictions, she sort of… it’s basically a mind-bomb.”

“-oh. I- I’m so sorry, I didn’t know. Why- why’s she running a fortune telling business, then?” she said.

“Because she can’t do anything else. Not, and be happy too.”

“…ah. I- that makes sense. K-keimi, bring an order of Clam Curry for the table, would you?” she said.

“-yes Madam.” Keimi said.

“Mm. Put it on my personal tab, there’s a love.” she said.
And Keimi darts away. The shamble gently undulates above us. The fine fishing line vibrates with faint music I can only just hear… shells gently murmur with voices that do not speak in words; coral beads are suddenly flower shaped, then they are larger stones tangled into the threads.

The magic’s getting stronger.

A hot pepper bursts into spiritual flame, then chars to fine white ash and drifts gently over the orbuculum; and Fern, following the ash with her eyes- a tiny glass bottle with a marimo all but bursting from the strain of it’s sudden growth; a pencil burning like incense, the thick smell of rotting milk. Threads twist and writhe through each other as feathery scales become tiny fish; hot pepper number two bursts into another gout of flames, but pepper number three sprouts into a tangling vine. Snail shells bubble over with squid ink and saltwater, and coral beads turned to stone dissolve into dark white flower petals, velvety where they fall and smelling- reeking- of orange. Broken jewelry with a horse-that-be running on a line of chain, a hank of cat-fur yowling and a vial of ink now an entire squid, tangled into the shambling thing- a penknife- knapped stone knife spinning like a whirlwind and turning from black to red to white and smoking-

The chopstick creaks.

Bryony is bulging with tension; her muscles ripple with restrained movement.

On the other side of the phone, perhaps sensing the strange tension, the dinner guests are very quiet.

The orbuculum shimmers clearly with splatters of ink being washed away with salt water; a thick slurry of ash and flower petals cakes the depression in the table where it rests. Fern’s eyes go massive and shining and she’s- oh no, sweetheart, don’t cry-

She’s biting her lower lip and tears are running down her face and then she- her eyes are fixed on the center of the orbuculum, somewhere beyond this world- the future of this world, maybe- and then she flinches and closes her eyes, thick gobbets of tears rolling down her cheeks. She swallows, and gasps, and something in her spine snaps straight and tall.

And then- I think for the first time ever- she makes a Prophecy. Or rather, a prophetic statement; it doesn’t quite have the same ring as a full Prophecy.

“Alright, Quasimodo- we’ll leave you alone. Alright, Quasimodo- we’ll trouble you no longer. You’re right, Quasimodo- we’re only made of stone- we just thought that you were made of something- stronger!!!” Fern sings.

Her voice is a chorus, entirely unlike her normal sardonic rasp; the stone knife shatters and gouts of boiling steam billow up from the slurry. Fern coughs, and wheezes; I stir honey into my pot of mint tea, and pour her a warm cup.

“Drink that, Fern, and stop looking in the orbuculum- lost your voice?”

Fern nods miserably.

“I’m not surprised; singing takes practice, and you did a prophetic revelation on top of that. Not something to just dive into head first. Congratulations on Seeing something in the Orb, though. It’s my turn to look, I suppose-”
“-After we eat, if you please.” said Madam Shyarly.

Oh, I know what this is! In the Merrow, it’s a- paella? I think? It smells amazing- and no one else is eating with such verve as me. I suppose the tension in the atmosphere is a bit overwhelming, but I spent my entire childhood under something quite like this, and-

“Girls, eat. I can feel it same as you can, but you’ll find that at your level, there’s not going to be an enemy who’ll be so polite as to let you take a snack break.”

“Quite right.” murmurs Brook, before beginning to eat the really very good paella.

Franky hasn’t actually stopped eating while we’ve been here- and, with our examples to follow, the girls start eating their portions, listlessly.

Bryony all but bolts her share- easy, now, don’t hurt yourself.

Brook is a phenomenally quick eater, a remnant of his time in the army, I’d wager; and so, as Madam Shyarly begins to devour her second helping of paella, and Fern gulps down another glass of hot sweet tea, he speaks.

“If you’ll pardon my vulgarity- who in the fuck is Vander Decken, and why is everyone so infuriated with him?” said Brook.

“Oh, I can answer that- Pappug, fashion designer-” said Pappug; good gods he’s gotten sleazy.

“Pappug, I told you, if you want a Clam Curry you have to order it-” said an exasperated Keimi.

“-I’m just checking the quality, I have very high standards-” Pappug sniped back.

“- Pappug -” said Keimi, about to loose her spleen on the small starfish.

“- Mah, it’s fine, Keimi. Pappug, why don’t you join us? There’s more than enough to share.” smirked Madam Shyarly.

“Thank you, Madam, I’d be delighted.” said Pappug with slithering dignity.

“I’ll just- get another place setting, then. One moment.” said Keimi through a grit-toothed grin, before swimming away through the air.

Service is hell; chin-up, Miss Kei.

“Now, you asked about Vander Decken, right? The most recent one’s a notorious bandit, and he’s been here for about thirty- forty?” said Pappug through a mouthful of paella.
“Thirty five.” said Madam Shyarly, eyes narrowed on a past only she can see.

“Thirty five years. That’s bad enough, but he’s also- or he claims to be- in love with our Dearest Princess, Shirahoshi.” said Pappug, slurping up tea.

“As I recall, it started with love letters, then packages, and then threats of marriage.” sighs Madam Shyarly.

“Yeah, and she was- what, twelve?” said Pappug, wincing as he glances at Madam Shyarly.

“Twelve.” said Madam Shyarly, dark eyes flat and gleaming like buttons.

“She was twelve, when the threats started, and by fourteen it’d escalated to death threats. The problem is, even with King Neptune and the Good Princes each leading a branch of the army to find and kill Vander Decken 9-” said Pappug.

“-Because he actually had the audacity to cut her, and what a mess that was.” mutters Madam Shyarly.

“-they still haven’t managed it. At this point, people are starting to think it can’t be done at all.” sighs Pappug.

“What about the legend of Vander Decken and his ship, the Flying Dutchman? I would have thought that it would be more useful to find a witch or a mage to handle things-” murmurs Brook.

Madam Shyarly shakes her head ‘no no no’ with a grimace.

“No, that wouldn’t work. Chiefly because, Vander Decken 9- the one trying to hurt our Beloved Princess- is a descendant of the legendary man. The first Vander Decken died on the island, an old man weary of battle; this asshole running around is his… ninth-degree namesake, Vander Decken 9.” said Madam Shyarly.

“And he’s got a weird protection, too- it’s not like living people can’t be cursed, gods know the people of our kingdom have been cursing Vander Decken 9 for years now, but- nothing seems to work.” said Pappug, finishing his paella and looking- mournful.

I hum. I sigh.

Fuck it.

“I can curse him, and make it stick- or rather… I’ll lay a death curse on him.”

“Oh? And what makes you different from literally every other person on this island?” snarls Madam Shyarly.

“I’m the Queen of Wrens. If anyone can do something to Vander Decken 9 from a distance, it’s me.”
Madam Shyarly blinks.

“May I use your orbuculum?”

“Uh- sure? Go ahead.” said Madam Shyarly, wide eyed, but slowly- almost unwillingly, beginning to grin.

I smiled.

Above us, the shamble shivered and shook and vibrated on it’s chopstick. The stick itself was almost smoking- it won’t be much longer, now.

“I’ll explain, I think. For lots of people, it’s very easy to equate magic to merely the mumblings of young girls in search of a husband, or children’s games on May Day. That is magic, true- simple things, magic that really hardly works for most people.

“However, I am not a child, or unskilled in the mystic arts. There are those who claim that white, or light, magic can be used to curse a man to death. That’s not exactly right; in essence… light and dark magic are reversals- or maybe reflections- of yin and yang. Light magic is cold, ordered, and very precise. You can build something that will last forever, with light magic; it’s why very nearly every spell you can put into a child’s toy is classed as light magic. Dark magic is the opposite; hot, random, and very chaotic. Spells you use to change your temperament- the spell for releasing hot yellow bile, for example- are classed as dark magic.

“A death curse is something entirely different from both light and dark magic. A curse is a solemn utterance intended to invoke a supernatural power to inflict harm or punishment on someone or something. A death curse is a malediction; an order of power above a mere curse, it’s a magical word or phrase uttered with the intention of bringing about evil or destruction. Luffy, when we were separated by Bartholomew Kuma, Mark set a curse on him- a bit stronger than a bad luck curse, and more than a simple Oroborus Curse.

“When a curse is cast on someone with a strong energy, who might have become a mage or witch themselves- or might be a mage or witch themselves- the curse will affect their health. It will manifest as ailments, attacks of pain; or, in my case, temporary mental instability. For these people, the curse will never be able to take full control of them; rather, it will torture that person all their life, which may be otherwise long and happy.

“Some people don’t know they carry a curse. It’s relatively safe for those who can discharge negative, or destructive, energy accumulated by the curse to simply live their lives. However, in this discharge- which, while not accumulated and used to later kill its victim in one stroke- process, the people around the cursed individual fall ill, get in accidents, and die. The energy of a curse also doesn’t just clear away; for some curses, and due to the nature of the curse and the various powers involved, it can be diluted. Zoro, for example, has a fairly nasty curse in his blood that destroys his ability to reorient himself on Land or Sea; due to the marks in the curse, and some traits he has, I’d say that comes all the way from… not from Buck L’ollonais, but maybe a son or grandson.

“With a death curse, it’s just the opposite; successive generations bearing a death curse strengthen it. Even if the person cursed, the victim, is able to discharge the foul energy into the world around them, the power of a death curse only grows. With each discharge of destructive power, the cursed one casts a powerful curse on their friends and family, with continuous exposure always leading to death.”

I wave my Shadow over the table, clearing away detritus and dirt from our meal and long wait; and when I draw my Shadow back, there’s a few items on the table. A simple black sheet of fabric, and a shaker full of salt. A wooden plate made of cypress, a bowl of incense- or rather, a vase of oil; pomegranate oil, or maybe grapefruit? A crappy paring knife - Sanji scowls every time he sees it in my drawer of tools- and a small chalice, plated with gold. It’s actually fairly dark, now, as sunset was quite a while ago; thus, a few dribbly candles, for ambiance.

“Most mages or witches will tell you that you need lots and lots of things to make a good, strong curse. That’s, more often than not, entirely true. A lot of things need to happen in a good curse, and the more paraphernalia you have in the ritual, the less likely you are to incur rebounds. For a death curse, however, because you’re working with so much more power, the paraphernalia is really just Boffo.”

Across the island, Ace spits out his tea, and Whitebeard squawks.

“Really, all a person needs for a proper death curse is a few drops of blood, the proper sigils drawn in either salt or sand- charcoal, also works- the right incantation, and enough power to get the job done. All the rest is just ambiance, and to keep the people watching- or casting- at ease.

“Death curses also don’t always work, is the thing. A real, proper death curse only works on people who are already set on ruining their own lives on purpose or actively doing evil. To become a victim of a death curse, one need not be a sadist, a serial killer, a horrible person, or even a hooligan; done correctly, even the lightest curse can become a death curse, as they embed themselves into a person’s subtle bodies and eventually- by inches, in some cases- kill their victim.

“People who ruin their own lives are addicts, people who don’t take ‘No’ for an answer, people who fight for no reason, unhealthily overweight people, people who do things in excess… actually, most pirates fit the bill. Less than you’d think, but enough. And Vander Decken 9 definitely fits the bill.

“With that said, a death curse is not a gun. It can take months, or even years, for a curse to come to full fruition. No curse kills instantly; that’s a fiction of the pulpies. The only people who can make Maledictions instant are people with Devil Fates; and even then, it doesn’t always work out like that.

“It is also important to note that a death curse cast on a person may only make them harder to kill at all. Some people’s energies are defensive in nature, and rouse when threatened; thus, the cursed one may come to reason, and give up their destructive habits. It won’t actually break their curse, but it will put their curse in remission; and, so long as they keep away from their destructive habits, the curse will not reactivate, leading to a longer life.”

I carefully begin drawing the sigils with the salt. The girls are riveted to me and my explanation.
Pappug has decided that discretion is the better part of valor, and has fled for parts unknown. Madam Shyarly is taking notes, as are B and F.

“Most importantly of all, though, is that a death curse depends heavily on the power and resolve of the caster performing the ritual. The less power the caster can bring to bear, the slower the curse is to work. Curses do not stack; they cannot bind together and grow stronger. Dark magic just doesn’t work like that- light magic, such as benedictions, does. It’s why successive generations of pregnant women visit the Statue of the Goddess Mother in front of the gates to the Palace. Light magic builds up and stacks into something greater than it’s parts; dark magic does not.

“This is why, even though nearly every citizen of Ryugu Mergyo has been cursing Vander Decken 9 for thirty five years, little has come of it. He might have insignificant problems, a thousand and one irritations to make his life miserable; he might be bald and toothless, or even impotent- but for the most part, all those curses haven’t touched him at all.

“To bring someone into their grave, one needs more than just a single death curse. While curses don’t stack, or flow together, they can be layered- thus, a combination of curses can kill a man where a single death curse cannot. Curses can also empower each other- thus, when I cast my death curse, the other active curses on him will become much, much stronger.

“Curses work better the worse the victim is and the more evil things they do; and, as far as I know, Vander Decken 9 is not a good man. He’s not even an okay kind of guy.”

“Of all the people I’ve ever met, Vander Decken 9 is the one I most wish would get smote by lightning and die.” Madam Shyarly sighs.

“Indeed. Although a cursed person can avoid death if they seek help from a professional immediately, Vander Decken 9 has managed to alienate the head of the Coven and Tower here in Ryugu Mergyo; Shyarly.”

“Hallo.” she said; to a general reply of common greeting.

“There will be no stopping my curse. No witch or mage on this island, or trained on this island, or visiting this island, or even living in quietude on this island, will even hear a request from him; he’s blacklisted. If my curse works- and my curses always work- then his death will be worse than what ultimately killed Fisher Tiger, because Vander Decken 9 will have brought it on himself.

“Girls- a spell or ritual is not black or white, dark or light- not even foul or fair; sometimes, it’s not even entirely magical. It has more in common with a jack on a loom- or rather, the chain inside the jack on the loom- than it does with, say, a painting. Spells and rituals are more like a sewing pattern, or a recipe than anything else. What is always true, however, no matter what kind of magic you’re using, or even how the magic itself works- it must be paid for. Magic is never free.

“Magic has a price.

“For things like potions or enchantments, that price is in the exactness of your method, procuring ingredients, the time it takes to make. For cantrips, charms, hexes, and jinxes- more often than not, it’s an emotional or mental toll. Jinxing someone to trip requires you to want to trip someone. Laying a charm- or a series of charms- on a broom so it can fly requires you to understand the mechanics of flight, and how your spellwork is abiding by them. If you sing your spells, you have to be able to sing, and for some spells, sing very well indeed.

“If you want to curse someone to death, well… Unscrupulous or inexperienced casters might curse someone to death without thinking about their future wellbeing, or the future wellbeing of the one who paid them to do so. Any action taken is balanced with your fate on one end of the scales, and the fate of the one you cursed on the other. To kill anyone, you have to be willing to expose yourself to- and accept the possibility of- mortality. You have to be accepting of the fact that to kill that one you wish dead… it may very well require the sacrifice of your own life.

“There are easier, and faster ways. Guns, knives, spears, swords- even staves, if you must. Death is not a game. It’s an ending, and a finality. And, unless you are born warped in a very specific way- which very, very few people are- killing someone will mark your soul, just a little.

“Unaware of that basic law, inexperienced casters will try to cast a death curse, and end up dying themselves, killing their clients, killing innocent people… or worse.

“Well, why wouldn’t they, right? It’s not their life- usually- it’s their clients’ life that they’re risking. All one needs to take care of is to secure the money for services rendered. And, of course, there are spell casters who redirect the magic kickback to a third party.

“That’s how it happens, you see- a death curse is cast and paid for; the spell caster casts a curse of fatal death; when kickback comes, the spell caster redirects it to a third party, some innocent man who isn’t involved at all. However, even with all that, one is still not secured against punishment. Firstly, that third party may be protected by Higher Powers which will redirect the kickback to the caster. Secondly, that one may have some spell caster remove all the negative energies from them, and they will go back to the one who initially wanted to curse someone to death, meaning you. Either way, you’ll be the one to pay.

“There are spell casters who ensure that the victim of the curse of death they are casting is the only one to suffer. Such spell casters redirect the kickback to inanimate objects or to where death belongs- the world of the dead. This gives them the right to claim that they practice safe magic. You cannot claim such without passing a series of trials, proof of which is conferred in a title. Every coven leader, or tower keeper- or, in the old ways, Judge- is kept aware of those ones who have earned their titles.

“My title, in such matters, is Queen of Wrens.

“Girls- Adelaide, Beatrice, Cecelia, Eleanor, Fernanda, Genevieve- it doesn’t matter what your blood is, or where you come from. All of you- Deborah included- have magic. Everyone in the World does. Some of you have already turned your magic towards certain Arts; others have not. That’s just fine. It may be you are suited to one thing, and one thing only- it may be that a thousand tasks suit your hands.

“The important thing to remember is that- aside from the title, which must be earned- you can learn anything you want, and be anyone you want. If they will not give you what you seek, take it for your own- excepting, as I said, the titles. As for understanding why that is… you’ll have to go all that way yourself, and I cannot say more than that.

“Now. Titled casters are extremely rare and they will never cast a curse of fatal death without a prior study of their potential victim, and a very tight contract. It is well known that some people are protected by Higher Powers or have very pure karma which works like a shield, meaning any curse of death will bounce back at the caster. I am no different- however, my contractual obligations are a bit… broader. Air-tight and Adam-wood strong- but not quite what most other Titles would require.
“Still, it should be understood that it is incredibly difficult to curse someone to death only because they are not liked, are hated for some reason, or the envy of all. Yes, it can be done for a price, but usually in exchange for service to dark forces and ruinous powers for eternity. Moreover, after the purchaser dies, it may spread over to their children and grandchildren, forming a real family curse.”

I take a long sip of my tea. The girls are all staring at me, listening to my lecture, except for Beatrice and Fernanda, who are taking notes. Hm. -Actually, so is Eleanor. Interesting.

“Now. As far as cursing someone goes, you should know for sure that the one who you want to cast a curse on actually deserves to be cursed. For instance, they can be a rapist or murderer who has escaped punishment, a sadist or pedophile, a man who abuses power as a high-level official or employer, who ruins and breaks other people’s lives. As a rule, such people have a very heavy karma and literally sentence themselves to a curse- a caster almost doesn’t need to use their own power, merely direct the power surrounding that person. Moreover, if you curse someone to death deservedly, Higher Powers may not punish the caster for their revenge.

“It is for this reason that magic diagnostics are vital if you’re going to cast a curse of fatal death. It’s important to understand what’s going to happen after you curse someone to death and if it’s safe at all. Fortunetelling, Scrying, and their larger parent schools of magic, Divination, are the tools used most often for such things.

“Ah, but I was speaking of death curses. There is one thing you must not do under any circumstances- girls, I mean this very much. Until you have gained accreditation at a reputable tower or coven, you absolutely must not try to cast a curse on your own, and you especially must not attempt a death curse until after you’ve turned fourteen.”

“Fourteen’s a bit-” winces Madam Shyarly.

“If you can become a man’s apprentice at fourteen, and all that entails, you can cast a death curse. Cabin boys are taken on at fourteen; in Skua, you can start the process of getting a formal apprenticeship when you’re fourteen, but it won’t actually stick until you’re fifteen. Soldier is a profession; so is assassin.”

“Aye. More practically- fourteen’s about when the first tier of mystic nodes settles in any person, regardless of tribe. Before then, it’s much more likely for a person to outright die, rather than cast a curse successfully. Just like mensis, or ejaculation- fourteen is the very earliest I can expect either of those to be viable prospects.

“Titles will only cast a death curse after they have completed all their mystical studies; only if they have no other contracts; and only if they personally feel it is both necessary and correct to do so. This comes only after years of study and experience, which none of you girls have in enough quantity. I am the most senior witch in our crew; and you are all my juniors, and my crewmates. There will be no casting of curses by any of you, until I am convinced you know what you’re doing, can do it correctly, are prepared for the price such things incur, and can handle the power you will invoke. Do you understand me?”

“Yes Ma’am!” chorus the girls.
“Good. Captain?”

“Mm. Go on, I’m listening.”

“Right. I can see that you’re not convinced of my reasoning. Fair enough- we are new to each other, and trust is earned, not given. However, you are my crewmates now. I am your officer, if such a phrase makes sense. Each member of our crew has skills that they may, in the fullness of time, deign to teach you; I have skills and knowledge that I must teach you, as the oaths I swore upon gaining my Title demand such of me. If one with a Title meets one with magic, who is not trained, it is their responsibility to see that one trained; thus, until either you lot can control your magic adequately, discover what you want to do with it, or find a better teacher, I am yours.

“Girls, there are those who tried to curse someone without having the required knowledge and skills. They are warnings in your textbooks- which, yes, I will be giving to you and teaching you from, and expecting you to learn from and take to heart. Those people who got overconfident and bit more than they could chew and swallow down? They choked; they uniformly met bizarre and gristly fates, are very permanently dead and long gone, or are suffering from severe diseases (often mental ones) and are unable to practice magic.

“You little ladies are my little ladies now; and no lady of mine will ever meet such a fate. Not if I can help it.”

I finish the spell circle, light the candles, and consider where I’m going to cut myself. The girls are blinking back tears.

“Now. As I said before- for a death curse to work, you need a few drops of blood, a proper spell circle with the correct sigils, the right incantation, and enough power to make it stick.

“Mouse blood is fine if you can’t use your own. Standard spell circles work best. You need to use your own specific incantation- and at this level of casting, the incantation is there to marshal your powers and keep your concentration, not actually do anything. If you don’t have the actual skill and power to cast a death curse, you’ll realize it almost immediately- and, because you’re doing a very simple, easily modified ritual, you can turn it into a regular curse which you do have the power to cast.

“As for the actual cursing process? It takes as long as it takes to sing your song of choice. This is mine.”

And then I drip the blood in the right- rite- spots, close my eyes, and sing.

Between my hands, where my voice and my power and the salt and the blood and the magic converge, a curse starts building. I dig deep into the warp of the Kingdom, tug a thread of the fury towards the one who would hurt these people’s beloved princess- there. I spin it fine, the heavy weight of fate pulling the disparate threads of disgust into a fine strand of hatred. I wind it tight around Vander Decken 9- tighter, tighter, attaching it to the fate he’s drawn around himself. He’s the worst kind of person, exactly the kind of man a curse would bite down on and never let go again- and then-
And then-

It’s done. I stop. I look up at the shamble.

It’s stabilized again; I used a hell of a lot of the ambient magic in the backbeats of my song.

“It’s done, now. He’s death cursed; ain’t no getting out of it. I have cursed him with the Terrible Fates; he could be raped, or murdered, or eaten by wild animals; could be tricked by liars, or naked, or poor; could be cold, or sick, or hungry; could be trapped with no way out, or lost and not know how to get home, or alone with no one to turn to. And all that’s before he actually dies- and all men must die.”

“Thank you, Queen Wren.”

“Of course. Now- to restore equilibrium, it’s time for some completely normal horoscopes. I will be using an orbuculum and guidance from the stars for the following readings.

“Aries:

“Aries, you will die due to a critical mass of glitter. Try to make lots of small mistakes, as they cost you less and tell you more. Did I say glitter? I meant body glitter, which is not at all the same as crafts glitter; do not get the two confused, you will never get that stain out of your skin...

“Aries, the boomerang you bought is cursed. The stars suggest giving it to someone you don’t like, but I’m not so sure just that will transfer the curse. Talk to a witch.

“Aries, everything actually is better said in song, especially if you’re trying to study for an exam.

“Aries, keep still, it saw you.

“Aries, the night has a thousand eyes; please take care to not poke any of them. What has the night ever done to you?

“Aries, what’s the point of going places if you can’t make an entrance? Through the window is the best you can do? No, I will not be paying for that, and I resent the implication that I would.

“Aries, your future brings bees; bees, and honey. Sort of a double edged sword; but it’s better than honeyjackets, which eat flesh this time of year.

“Aries, be sure to get enough protein; crack open the bones and eat the marrow. It’s very tasty, even when poorly cooked.

“Aries, you did not surrender amicably, or violently, or ignitably. You did not surrender, even when you were thrown out the window.

“Aries, at the museum, you will maximize your arts per second by sprinting through the exhibits.

“Aries, the angry pants are coming off. It’s been a very long day of clothed rage, and you deserve some rest. Consider putting lotion on after you shave next time, the stars say it reduces chafing- I agree. I also recommend using an exfoliant on your legs, that ashy color is a buildup of dead skin.

“No, actually; it wasn’t your fault this time, Aries. She’s lying to you. You know you’ll never please her; you’ve known for years. Your old friends told you and told you that she’s no good, but you never listened. It’s not too late, though- it doesn’t matter how many children you have together, or what kind of debt you’re in. It’s not too late. The nuns will help you, but you have to be honest, and answer all their questions. All of them.

“Taurus:

“Taurus, you will die when you accidentally create a clone. You will lose an old-Wes style gunfight with them. I’m sorry; your speed’s good, but not that good. And you really shouldn’t leave crossbows just lying around.

“Taurus, replace your socks with sand. Best do it now, before fate does it for you.

“Cryptomicrobiology.

“Taurus, nothing brings people closer together than being stuck together with maple syrup. You can’t eat all of it in time; get your good brush and a hot bucket and go play matchmaker. A moist towel in a waterproof bag with a hot rock should keep it off your fingers, the stars know how you feel about that.

“Taurus, trace the coils in the air: they shall lead to what you seek.

“Taurus, keep a lookout for something that looks like it’s made of driftwood and light. The stars say it trades bad memories for coupons; I can clarify that to mean ‘coupons for the next nearest sale’. You’ll have to decide for yourself what constitutes a bad memory.

“Taurus, in the museum, you will be staring hungrily at the still-lives. This is the still-life museum, they will be here later; go get something to eat already!

“Taurus did not surrender; all it took was a few honeyed words in the right ear. An allergy to honey is rare, but not uncommon- not the way you did it- and it’s cruel and gruesome effects show your resolve.

“Taurus, if you want something done right, create several clones of yourself and make them fight. If we could make friends out of clay they wouldn’t necessarily be worth less than normal friends, but please; come outside. We miss you.

“Taurus, you don’t have to fight the Sea King; you get to fight the Sea King! Don’t worry about the poison spines, or the teeth!

“The stars say today is the day for hella dunking, Taurus; go style some losers.

“Taurus; the stars don’t have anything else to say about you today, so- do what you want.

“Gemini:

“Gemini, it is entirely possible to suck at relaxing. Exhaust yourself until all you can do is rest. I recommend masturbation.

“Gemini, please remember: just because it looks like food doesn’t mean it is. The past haunts us all; you’re not special in that regard. Just because your haunting is a bit more lively than ours does not mean we are not haunted. The stars say why bother with ghosts? Haunt your own ship! Scream and cry and stalk your own halls in a towering fury. I say you’re an adult now, and you get to decide what that means.

“Gemini, at the museum you are contributing, with crayons.

“Gemini did not surrender; you did your best. This time, it was actually enough. You’ll definitely make an impression at your next job interview when you slam into it at terminal velocity, though.

“Gemini, you can hide from a lack of something. Fear of empty spaces is unfortunately common.

“Gemini, you will die when the fish is accidentally dropped on your spine. You die nearly instantly; your last memory will be of the smell of river water and the sensation of slimy skin on your own.

“Gemini, the moons are right; you ought to give it a try. The stars and I both recommend you get condoms and lube from the conbini first and use them, though. Fluid transfer of disease is real; it’s much bigger than you think, your own natural lube is not enough. Protect ya neck; wu tang.

“Gemini, if you come across a library of forbidden knowledge tended by the dead, please don’t try to check anything out. It is a lending library, but you can only get a card if you’re a legal citizen of an afterlife plane; it’d be very embarrassing if you weren’t. Getting married to a ghost would make you a legal citizen of an afterlife plane, but please don’t rush into marriage for the sake of knowledge. They deserve better than that and you know it.

“Gemini, you know what they meant. You always knew what they meant.

“Gemini, the stars mixed up ‘power vacuum’ with ‘cleaning vacuum’. I’m sorry; your carpet will never be the same.

“Cancer:

“Cancer, at the museum, you will spend most of your time staring thoughtfully at the succulent on the reception desk. You will realize there is more museum about half an hour before it closes. Plan your trip accordingly.

“Cancer, you did not surrender- but I didn’t think it would happen. I’m so sorry. It wasn’t your fault, I swear it. The stars couldn’t have helped you either, but- I know you would have preferred to hear this from them. You are not broken; you are not tainted. -I am so sorry. Please, keep moving.

“Cancer, your destiny is covered in sticky residue. They found the marshmallows again- thankfully, it’s on the shiny leather so it’ll wipe right off with a wet cloth.

“Cancer, people who say that neon colored things are artificial have never eaten a posy of flowers. It’s seasonal, and tasty.

“Cancer, you will die due to a move of desperation. You snapped off your own rib and fashioned it into a knife- but you got the other guy too, so don’t worry too much about it. At that point, there was hardly any blood left in you at all.

“Cancer, be careful today; all headphone cords have been temporarily transformed into snakes. It should wear off by tomorrow, but that doesn’t help you today.

“Cancer, it’s leaking again but not where it was before- you’ll have to sniff it out this time.
“Cancer, having a good time is a personal choice, not an obligation.

“Cancer, smoke two cigarettes at once so you can put both of them out in that asshole’s eyes. Plus, if you miss one, you have a second chance.

“Cancer, not every day will be one of triumph. You will fail, you will be lost, you will be scared. Fertilizer is made from plants whose time has passed.

“Cancer, the stars say to eat. It’s very satisfying, even if everything tastes like mashed potatoes. Then, go wipe the mirror clean, it’s filthy and hard to see. When you get the urge to keep going, keep going. Doing tasks you mastered as a child is the fastest way to shake the Sadness off; and, as a bonus, you get clean rooms, too.

“Cancer... whoopsy-daisy, no more fortune for you today. The stars just handed me a skull with some writhing darkness inside it, so- I mean, it’s probably fine. Maybe try stop thinking about it?”

The skull chatters ominously, before glorping onto the wooden plate and oozing menacingly. Don’t Think About It.

“Leo:

“Leo, in the museum, you will be confused as to the plot of this weird comic book building.

“Leo did not surrender because they never felt the need to.

“Leo, the connections are many. Some of them should absolutely die, but others will bring you comfort if they stay. Be very sure about which is which before you start culling.

“Leo, improperly formed curses can go haywire, bounding off and smacking into things with no real rhyme or reason. It’s not your fault. It is your fault that things have gotten to this point, though- you should have found a better witch as soon as the curse went wrong, not tried to deal with it yourself. The stars say it’ll wear off- or break apart- by the equinox, but I’m not sure you can hold out that long.

“Leo, you will die in love, at extreme velocities.

“Leo, you’ve probably been cursed a couple times. It happens to everyone. Hell, you can draw someone poorly and accidentally curse them, if you’re mad enough about it. Pretty sure that’s what happened with your last wardrobe. Best just burn it, or throw it in the sea. Passing on curses is worse than bedbugs.

“Leo, move to the river and drink deep of it’s black and murky waters. It’ll all be over, soon enough. Their teeth are sharp, and you only have so much blood to spill.

“Leo, you must be brave enough to produce terrible things. The key to your Art is discipline; fuck standards. Fearsome is the man who has practiced one kick ten thousand times.

“For Leo, today is an excellent day to attach hooks to your hands and feet and scale a building. Bring rope and carabiners and pitons if you’re trying to bring a friend with you, their skill is not as great as yours. There’s a sale at the feed store; the coffee lady will give you a bunch of coupons if you buy two scones this time. You might also get enough funds by breakdancing today, but the stars are less Sure about that.

“Leo, the stars say you should look through your old board games. Not too quickly, don’t want to startle it; the defensive acid will melt right through your skin. Chalk dust and baking soda will help neutralize any previous incidents, but really, maybe find a nice glass shield to hide behind? Glass isn’t reactive, usually…”

“Leo, a rock got stuck in the great loom of your fate, fucking up the warp and weft of your future for at least the next week. All further predictions are suspect. The Fates and the stars formally apologize, and offer one free twist of fate to be redeemed at the nearest backwoods shitty marina of your choice.
Take someone you trust as backup and a gun.

“Virgo:

“Virgo, you went to the museum buck naked. You assumed that was just what one does. You weren’t exactly wrong, but- next time, maybe putting all your piercings in could be saved for a different naked occasion? The stars are just sayin’.

“Virgo did not surrender; Virgo turned off all the lights. No reason for it, everyone was willing to let you go; but you did it, and you smashed all the plates in the house and you whispered your name with triumph into everyone’s ears. It took thirteen minutes exactly for you to leave that place, and fifteen more for you to begin to weep. The truth is, it wasn’t always awful, and you miss those not-awful parts intensely. None of your friends would ever understand that, though.

“Virgo, be wary of those you have bested time and time again. People, and animals, learn from defeat.

“Virgo, there is the person you pretend you are, and the person you pretend you are not. Bash their heads together to knock them out simultaneously. Steal their wallets and buy the damn burrito. No, you’re not fat.

:Modernity has made it possible to be scared to talk to people that are thousands of kilometers away.
Call her back, Virgo. You don’t have enough friends to be blowing this one off.

“Virgo, you will die after you see something so racist it causes your liver to fail. The stars are faintly apologetic about this, but remind you that they reminded you to stop drinking so heavily years ago but you didn’t and now- well. It’s not quite too late. But.

“Virgo, if it does not come from a place of love and respect, it’s all a lie.

“Virgo, the Djinn soap vendor is lying. Check your horse’s droppings and liquidate all your cash.

“Virgo, your answer brandishes a pool cue. Your answer has had too much to drink. You need to fight back to back with your answer and make out with them in a grungy alley. That’s not the stars, that’s me. Kiss them. You kiss them right now, their lips are soft and warm and sticky from the beer.
Do it. Do it. Do it.

“Virgo, the stars call it a lost cause. I call it excellent practice. Both of us agree that it’s not the real deal.

“Virgo, so many things are growing inside of you. You contain multitudes. You are a breeding ground for legions of tiny children and you shall conquer.
“Virgo, the stars said to tell you ‘something about fat chickens’.

“Libra:

“Libra, in the museum you will be followed through the exhibits by a small herd of cats. Stop feeding them.

“Libra did not surrender; with great adversity within, and many scorpions without. Sorry, without many scorpions. It was mostly a mental thing, and thank goodness there were comparatively few scorpions, that would have been such a mess.

“Libra, the stars are sorry to tell you this but something is actually eating your socks. It’s not the dryer. Call an exterminator.

“Libra, it’s just a fucking sandwich and some soup. You knew going in that the sex was meaningless; wishing for more from them isn’t going to change the fact that they can’t give it to you.

“Libra will die after years of study on the location of a lost kingdom. Upon finding the ancient tomb which will lead to your next clue, and opening it, you will realize the person within was buried with their ceremonial flamethrower- in full working order, and primed to flare when you open the casket.

“Libra, what are you protecting them from?

“Libra, the moons are looking for you. Stay inside tonight, away from their gazes. You know who you are, and you know what you did, and you know what will happen if they catch you. Do not let them catch you.

“Libra, please stop clapping along. You have no sense of rhythm or unity.

“Libra, get up and get ready. You’re needed; bring the rain.

“Libra, use your skills at swing dance to confuse the authorities long enough for your friends to escape. Then, switch to can-can, and knock ‘em dead.

“Libra, self cleaning dream catchers do not exist. Make sure you empty your dream catcher into a wastebasket every couple of days. Otherwise, you might attract things that try to eat the dreams stuck there, and it’s a short wriggle from eating dreamcatcher dreams to eating brains.

“Libra, the world will continue when you’re gone. Life goes on. It just- does. You can’t stop it. Here it comes- are you ready? No? Neither is anyone else. No, not even the stars.

“Scorpio:

“Scorpion in the museum is pretending to be an art. It’s working.

“Scorpio did not surrender unhappily. Scorpio did not surrender inexorably. Yet when it was done, you smiled.

“Scorpio, what else are you gonna do with your time? Not make dick jokes? Pfft.

“Scorpio, the elastic of your underwear can make an excellent slingshot in an emergency.
“Scorpio, there is no forward. The World is round. It’s not actually a race, it’s a journey. You’ll get there in your own time.

“Scorpio, moon pies do not come from any of the moons. The stars lied to me. Don’t make my mistakes.

“Scorpio, the more precarious the perch, the more meaningful every second spent there is. You really shouldn’t have it tied so tightly though, that’s bad for your circulation.

“Scorpio, someone snuck into your locker and stole a page from one of your many books. Not permanently; the put it right back, after. But. Nah, don’t worry about it, they’ll tell you when they’re ready.

“Scorpio, the lights are hotter than they look, and prone to blinding the unwary. Dress lightly; bring sunglasses; wear antiperspirant. And try not to touch any of them.

“Scorpio, if you’re gonna break the rules, for the love of god, do it with some style.

“Scorpio, nobody haunts the hangman; people haunt the shit out of cops, though.

“Scorpio, the stars say if you haven’t run by now, it’s too late.

“Ophiuchus:

“Ophiuchus at the museum feels the floor is wasted space here and continues to carve their own arts into the concrete.

“Ophiuchus did not surrender; you undid the moments in time where you gave up. It hurts, giving up the failures within and the hard-won lessons. It’s your growth, a better you, and you have traded that self away. But this is too important to lose.

“Ophiuchus, please be sure to have a good firm grip on the obvious before you move on to the hard stuff.

“Ophiuchus will die, like a fucking dumbass. You tried to kill Miyamoto Musashi with a sword. You really should have known better. What the hell were you smoking?

“Ophiuchus, paper towels are not only for paper messes.

“Ophiuchus, search the property for an old log. Burn it. It won’t bring your coat back but it will kill the thing that ate it.

“Ophiuchus, cover yourself in Mentholated Vaporub and stand outside in the Wind. It cured every disease and illness I had while at school; I should have died at least thirty times in the first year alone. You know why I didn’t? Mentholated Vaporub and the Wind.

“Ophiuchus, ignore the rocking chair.

“Ophiuchus, every second you spend worrying could be spent creating dangerous chemical explosives in your kitchen. Now who looks silly?

“Ophiuchus, hiding under the covers actually works with some things. It is technically a threshold and so some things do actually have to be invited.

“Ophiuchus, demanding the conversation go your way is a good way to be disappointed. Balance cares little for assholes.

“Ophiuchus, the stars and I are sorry to say, your intense desire to hunt down and kill the seventh king of the Germa is doomed. He’s dead, Ophiuchus. Ophiuchus, he’s been dead for forty years.”

The Girls chorus a “Woah~!” at exactly the right moment.

“Sagittarius:

“In the museum, Sagittarius looks the orderlies in the eye while appreciating the art to establish power.

“Sagittarius did not surrender. When you needed patience, you thought of those who loved you. When you needed fury, you thought of those who hurt you. When you needed strength, you thought of yourself. When you needed just one more chance to get it right, you thought of that fucking cat.

“Sagittarius, it cares little if you ignore it. It’s not looking for attention. It doesn’t have eyes.

“Sagittarius will die by a game winning home run. Your skull will be completely caved in. Your last memory will be the sound of people cheering as you fade away.

“Sagittarius, the past leaks. Get better pads.

“Sagittarius, someone will throw a javelin at you today. It will miss by about half an arm’s length. Try to be polite in the face of their insincerity.

“Sagittarius, leave it for now. Recompense is coming. Know that they understand.

“Sagittarius, libraries are free and open to the public. Ambulatory Librarians will keep your secrets. Do the research before you commit. Leather and ivory and fur are pieces of those who are dead. Accept no substitutes.

“Sagittarius, ‘two birds with one stone’ is a misleading proverb. Meteorites hit pretty hard, and no one knows a meteorwrong from a meteorite until after they’ve hit the ground.

“Sagittarius, the revolution is here, right now; and it is meaty, dishy, tasty, and very fit. And if you don’t get him a bigger towel, he’s going to drip all over your nice carpet. And it’s a very chilly day, the stars know you’d hate for him to get a chill. The bed’s right there, won’t take a moment. You’ll need much more than a moment. Wink. Wink. Wink.”

Madam Shyarly lets out a wolf whistle, as does Brook. Franky- left at some point. Hm. Well, he’s a grown man, I’m sure he’ll be fine.

“Sagittarius, this is the swamp of your discontent. This is the estuary of your confusion. These are the mud and leeches of your dismay.
“Sagittarius, the stars say to lie on your back. You’ll have a better view of the clouds, that way.”

I take a sip of hot tea. Mm. Minty fresh; Keimi replaced the pot, at around the same moment Pappug left.

“Capricorn:

“At the museum, Capricorn was so moved by a cubist sculpture that they slid sideways out of the museum and into a gambling den. Please don’t spend all your money in one place.

“Capricorn did not surrender. No one else was hurt, after all. This was a simple warning. You have the power to do much, much more. They will remember that this time.

“Capricorn died, but only a little bit. Stop arguing about The Play, the stars have been bored of this argument for years.

“Capricorn, doors are only locked for idiots that don’t carry sledgehammers with them all the time.

“Capricorn, everything you suspect is happening. However, the clown suit is unnecessary. The bucket of eel’s blood is not.

“Capricorn, lingerie does wonders.

“Capricorn, connecting enough extension cables to each other does absolutely nothing. The sense of completion is nice, though. Bungee cords are another story- nothing happens when you do it, it’s what you use it for that’s interesting.

“Capricorn, most armor is not resistant to funk based weaponry. That’s music and stench, if you’re wondering.

“Capricorn, it’s great that you know what all of those words mean, but you neglected to see if anyone actually, you know, cared.

“Capricorn, build so many bridges it becomes impossible to see the sun. You are the spider to this web of infrastructure; catch you some damn flies already.

“Capricorn, be prepared for a big change; you’ll need a new arm hole in your shirts but I am not sure where. No, neither are the stars- opinions are split between your shoulders and your ribs. Prepare yourself.

“Capricorn, the only other thing I’ve got for you today from the stars is a pile of burning backpacks. In like, twenty minutes, to the… left? of the hoses, whatever that means. Maybe you can figure out some use for them?

“Aquarius:

“In the museum, Aquarius is eating paint as a show of solidarity. In the Library, Aquarius is eating paper as a show of solidarity. Aquarius has the spirit; they’re a little confused to the whole point of it all, but they’ve got the spirit.
“Aquarius did not surrender. Don’t let anybody tell you differently; there’s nothing actually wrong with conjuring forest creatures from the ether and belting out your favorite show-tunes to feel better. Whatever gives you strength.

“Aquarius, try something new. Don’t break the skin, though. You have enough tattoos.

“Aquarius will die after being hit by a train. In your living room, actually, don’t feel bad- the Sadness did not defeat you, faulty maintenance practices did.

“Aquarius, we all know when heartbeats are a bad sign.

“Aquarius, play close to the chest. You are being watched, actually.

“Aquarius, someone loafs you. They are collecting the dead skins from your bed and clothing and constructing fine pastries from it. It’s a horrific thing to do to pastry, but the baking process completely destroys all your skin’s use in any kind of spell, benign or dastardly. Still gross, though.

“Aquarius, harvest from the rich and give to the poor. They won’t need the blood and organs for much longer anyway. Waste not, want not.

“Aquarius, heaven and hell are the same place; it’s located roughly six days walk outside of Paris, Germa Kingdom.”

The entire table lets fly with a resounding “oooooooh! Snap!”

I said it, I meant it, and I’m not taking it back.

Kiss my liver’s ass.

“Aquarius, a new opportunity comes your way! It will be big, and heavy, possibly with fins.

“Aquarius, you’ll be cooler if you stop carrying that wooden sword everywhere. Just use a bamboo pole with some cord for a handle-wrap, that’s what I did when I was your age. The stars say you should just carry a real sword, if you’re wanting a blade- but I say don’t do that, because then you’ll use it.

“Aquarius, no more fortunes today. The stars just handed me a drift wood carving of you, though. It’s quite pretty, and there’s sea glass for your eyes.

I put it near the slightly oozing skull, and the plate starts looking more settled by the second.

“Pisces:

“In the museum, Pisces is being escorted out as the orderlies were not lonely and did not appreciate the hugs and kisses.

“Pisces did not surrender. You took someone else’s job for a bit. A few handkerchiefs held under noses and wiped across cheeks; a sharp knife and gentle hands; kindness works wonders.
Eventually, everyone needs to go back to being themselves, whatever those selves have become. Bon chance.

“Pisces, get in your own way. Only you can stop yourself. Ask him, or don’t ask him. You know who you are, and what you can do.

“Pisces, as long as golf continues to exist you will be plagued with nightmares.

“Pisces will die in a tragic yet really fucking cool billiards accident. You’ll also win your bet, so, heyoo.

“Pisces, yes, it is amazing that you made a thinking engine that runs on live wasps, but next time you should ask permission first. Permission of the wasps, they’re the ones running the engine.

“Pisces, at noon on Midsummer of this year, the light through the Rose Window of Notre Dame will be the most romantic anywhere. Anywhen. Ask her then.

“Pisces, you love deeply; but who are you? And what do you want?

“Pisces, algebra will come in handy today when you are assaulted by a mathemagician on ketamine. Bring peanuts.

“Pisces, the next answer lies within the ground beef. Wash your hands. The eggs have already given their answer.

“Pisces, make up your own constellations, pray to your own gods, command unknown forces of your own divination. Steal from everything. This is real magic.

“Pisces, it is completely possible to just lock your doors and slowly rot away. The stars and I would not recommend this. Nice job on not doing it!”

I take another long sip of mint tea, and return my gaze to somewhere beyond the center of the orbuculum.

“Don’t do drugs; you’ll ruin your life and make yourself very susceptible to curses. Especially don’t do them Energy Steroids, those’ll make you short-lived and miserable, and sterile, too.

“And now, a series of words from our sponsors.

“Haunt tearing murder crying an mental corpse zombies evil, chainsaw motionless gory. Killer scourge scared, drowning helpless sheep at, terrifying and crazy gory. Dark mutilation rotten, Blood hair raising or, blood in eyeball. In willow trees, killer dolls are rotten teeth bite, shee.

Moon torture demons devil or vampire werewolf wind. In horrifying, bear is gnarled murder, ominous eerie Serial killer sinister, with sick chilling agony shaking. Heart pumping. Edginess anxiety tension, claw at deteriorated in, creep a tear. Bloodcurdling motionless murder, disturbing ominous running at, murderer ooze-

I take another sip of my tea, and then to finish things off, I snort and glurgle my throat clear of prophecy slime, and go right to the Proceedings. I don’t actually remember all the things I said. On reflection, neither did Madam Shyarly.

I just remember ending it with “IT’S MIDNITE, BABY-!”

“MIDNIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIIGHT-!” whooped Madam Shyarly.

Don’t do crystal balls, kids. Dice, you can manage, even pendants if you have to- but crystal balls will pull things out of you best left buried. It’ll overturn rocks you didn’t never want overturned. Eech. I was such a hooligan, goddamn.

The follies of youth do not wash away.

“Madam Shyarly- whoops, there goes the Shamble- when’s the last time you cleansed this crystal ball?”

“Um… aw, shit! Well, Brigid’s Day is just around the wall, I’ll do it then.”

“-I suppose. Although, if you really have no further use for it...”

“-Honestly, I’ve always been better at scrying. Doable with an Orb, but-”

“Ugh, that’s so finicky - one misstep and you’re lookin’ at a migraine for a week and a half.”

“Right. So. Yeah- you want it? Take it.”

“Thank you.”
I wrap the Orbuculum in a silk handkerchief, and tuck it into my clutch. And then, of course, the Narcolepsy got me.

Fuckin’ Narcolepsy.

I slept, and I dreamed, and I heard a man Lie, and I spoke in my sleep. History doesn’t repeat; it rhymes. I will not abide Lies spoken in my presence.

“I am proud of my Kingdom, because here we have solved the Merjin problem. We have taken him out of politics and have thereby secured good government under any party and laid foundations for the future development of both races. We have secured peace, and rendered prosperity a certainty.

“I am inclined to give to you my solution of this problem. It is, first, as far as possible under the Fifteenth Article to disfranchise him; after that let him alone, quit writing about him; quite talking about him, quite making him ‘the fish man’s burden,’ let him ‘haul his own net’; quit coddling him, let him learn that no man, no race, ever got anything worth having that he did not himself earn; that character is the outcome of sacrifice and worth is the result of toil; that whatever his future may be, the present has in it for him nothing that is not the product of industry, thrift, obedience to law, and uprightness; that he cannot, by resolution of council or league, accomplish anything; that he can do much by work; that violence may gratify his passions but it cannot accomplish his ambitions; that he may eat rarely of the cooking of equality, but he will always find when he does that ‘there is poison in the broth’.

“Let the merjin learn once and for always that there is unending separation of the races, that the two peoples may develop side by side to the fullest but that they cannot intermingle; let the fish man determine that no man shall by act or thought or speech cross this line, and the race problem will be at an end.

“These things are not said in enmity to the merjin but in regard for him. He constitutes one half of the population of my Kingdom. He has always been my personal friend; as a Judge I have often defended him, and as Prince I have frequently protected him. But there flows in my veins the blood of the dominant race; that race that has conquered the Sea and seeks out the mysteries of the heights and shores. If manifest destiny leads to the seizure of Aos Sidhe, it is certain that it likewise leads to the dominance of the Merrow. When the merjin recognizes this fact we shall have peace and good will between the races.

“But I would not have the fish people forget their duty to the merjin. We must seek the truth and pursue it. We owe an obligation to ‘the man in scales’; we made him; we brought him to our cities, our towns, our work-gangs and service; he has served us well; he is patient and teachable. We owe him gratitude; above all we owe him justice. We cannot forget his fidelity and we ought not to magnify his faults; we cannot change his skin; neither can we ignore his service. One does not rise on waves of the dead to higher things, and no people can do so and flourish. We must rise by ourselves, we must execute judgement in righteousness; we must educate not only ourselves but see to it that the merjin has an opportunity for education.

“As a fish man I am afraid of but one thing for my race and that is that we shall become afraid to give the merjin a fair chance. The first duty of every man is to develop himself to the utmost and the only limitation upon his duty is that he shall take pains to see that in his own development he does no injustice to those beneath him. This is true of races as well as of individuals. Considered properly it is not a limitation but a condition of development.

“The fish man in the South can never attain to his fullest growth until he does absolute justice to the Merjin race. If he is doing that now, it is well for him. If he is not doing it, he must seek to know the ways of truth and pursue them. My own opinion is, that so far we have done well, and that the future holds no menace for us if we do the duty which lies next to us, training, developing the coming generations; so that the problems which seem so difficult to us shall be easy to them.”

I peel my eyes open, and look down at the snail. Staring back at me is- someone. Not the Royalty, at the table; not my crew, or my kinsmen. A Sinister Lord; the one whom Sidre’s ancient grudge burrowed deep inside, and nevermind the fact that she herself was- hate is poisonous.

I have had quite enough of it.

Those are the words of Prince Triton, who would become King of the Neptune Throne; King Triton Neptune, who barred all merjin from any position of responsibility in their own kingdom—”

“-King Neptune, who stole Aos Sidhe from the Fae, and destroyed the palace of Tir Na Oge—” murmurs Ace, almost without tone.

“-King Triton, who ferried the Giants to our hills and allowed them to desecrate our sacred tombs—”

“-King Neptune, who Ariel, his youngest sister—” sighs Ace, because he got his entire inheritance. Esterners call it han, sometimes. We call it Wailing.

“-Our Beloved, Ariel, our greatest Queen—”

“-did flee, and her people with her.” said Ace, wailing roiling through him like blood and eels and tongues of fire.

“She fled.”

“She flew.” he said.

“And she did not return.” we said together, Wailing making our voices synergize into something… something almost awful.

Fae don’t forget; and we don’t really… forgive. We let it lie; we leave it be. But it doesn’t really go away.

I take a deep breath, and let it out from my toes. Don’t cut a man for having opinions, Mab. Not yet; and you do not say these things for him. We don’t fight oppressors because we can change the oppressor- we fight to give hope and courage to the oppressed.

“Minister of the Left, King Triton’s views were not uncommon even a century ago among your people. The belief that only fish men- or, excuse me, the more polite Gyojin- should be in positions of power, and that gyojin should use their power to ‘float’ other tribes, was an ideology promoted by gyojin World-wide. Now, when official policy has changed, we see what scum bubbles to the surface.

“Hody Jones, even fifty years ago, would not have been so aberrant. Extreme, certainly- but not disallowed in polite company. Gyojin supremacy isn’t actually gone, you see; it’s just renamed itself as, mm. Cultural pride?”

“Appreciation of Tradition.” growls Madam Shyarly.

“People like Hody Jones believe that all people who are not like him- are not gyojin, or related to gyojin within some ridiculous degree- are less intelligent than gyojin and naturally inferior. Paradoxically, he also believes that those inferiors can be educated- or forced, or what have you- into a certain mould, and raised to ‘a certain level’. He believes, or pays lip service to the idea that gyojin have a responsibility as the superior race to help those inferiors achieve their potential- even if they could never be equal to a ‘proper gyojin.’

“By this logic, allowing merjin- in the Kingdom or otherwise- and, as time rolled onwards, allowing anyone considered inferior, impure, unclean, or less intelligent to govern themselves or others was not only dangerous to the pure, but to the impure themselves. It is for this reason that, even though Madam Shyarly is the actual leader of the three cities of Coralia, Hillsdon, and Gobdark, she does not carry a noble title of any kind- which, by your own country’s law, she is entitled to. Nor, it must be said, does she draw a noble’s salary; nor does she garner a noble’s respect among what can only be considered her peers.

“She is much like Mister Iceberg of Water 7, or your kinswoman, Lady Gilly; but unlike them, she is a mermaid, and she came from poor people, an- more often than not- her concerns and her constituents are swept aside.

“Minister of the Left- Lord Sinister; when was the last time the headwaters of Gobdark were cycled? Why are the caves of Hillsdon home to naught but robbers, thieves, and vagabonds? Whom does it serve that the people who work in the city of Coralia cannot afford to live there? Who, aside from the Lady Shyarly, cares for these people? Who, sir? For, by the fluttering of my Fair wings, it is not you, sir!”

The Minister of the Left cannot answer me.

“Your Majesty; Hody Jones is a symptom of something much more insidious, and Vander Decken 9 is an opportunist, who will be dealt with one way or another. My crewmate, Robin, by comparison, is clean as snow, fresh-fallen.”

There was something odd about my hearing, just then- Bryony did something unusual, I think, but I’m not sure why… ah, mystic static. Makes sense; she must be boosting her signal somehow.

Keimi swims in, and looks at Madam Shyarly and then at me with shining eyes and a grim expression.

“Excuse me, but- was all that true?” said Keimi.

“All what?”
“All that about- about mermaids, and fishmen, and- and everything. Madam- I always knew Madam Shyarly was in charge, of course, everyone does, but- really?”

“...If I were a fishwoman, I’d be called Lady Shyarly. But I’m a mermaid; and so, I am not.”

Keimi looks stricken.

Genevieve looks- furious.

“Is that why our mother is dying?” she said.

“Genevieve, what’s wrong with your mother?”

“Every time we’d take her to a doctor, they’d say ‘it’s just a cold’, and she’s strong, of hardy merjin stock, she’ll be- fine.

“Colds don’t last for months and months, and they don’t make you piss blood or cough up blood and chunks. They don’t make you loose almost all of your weight, until the bones stand out under your skin; and they certainly don’t make you too tired to do anything but wheeze most days.

“But still- every doctor I can coerce into seeing her says ‘it’s just a cold’ and she’ll overcome it, surely.” she said.

Genevieve wiped her eyes, and scowled.

“-our Mother taught us everything she could about magic; each of us a different skill, because that’s all she had strength for and we couldn’t all stay together with her. Sometimes, her muscles cramp so badly that only Poppy Milk can make her comfortable enough to sleep- it doesn’t stop her hurting, it just makes it so she can sleep. So. Is this- thing, where fishpeople think they’re better than other fishpeople, excepting that they’re somehow the wrong kind of fishpeople- is that why my mother is dying?” she said.

I won’t lie to her. It never works out, lying to children.

“I think so, Genevieve. I’m sorry.”

Genevieve nods, and huffs softly- and then she’s being wrapped between her sisters, Beatrice and Cecelia and Eleanor, and all of them are burrowing into Brook’s side. And Fernanda; Fern fixes us with a bleak look, and says, simply:

“The way I learned I’m a Seer, among other things, is that I Saw how my mother was to die- or rather, I saw how she would be found, After. Apparently, mermaid prostitutes die of tuberculosis so often, it gets marked down as ‘a chest infection’ or something like that. All the doctors in the Three cities know that the Hospital won’t take a merjin with tuberculosis, especially if they’re from Gobdark, and... well. There’s a lot of people I grew up seeing that I saw and then I saw, I saw them taken away in the white sheets and... Mab?” said Fernanda.

“Yes, Fern?”

“Please don’t let me go to Gobdark alone. I don’t think... I don’t think I can handle it all by myself.” said Fern.

“Of course.”

What else am I supposed to say? I mean- other than going around and hugging her, which I am- wow, she has a tight grip- there’s not much else I can do until after there’s a corpse.

Goddamn. I always forget that Mab’s really highly educated and was trained to do a very specific job; she hardly ever lets on, but... When she calls herself a Queen, she's not fucking around. Hm. 'Witch Queen’ Mab has a certain ring to it...

Oh gods, King Neptune looks... so old. He looks old, and sad, and like he’s trying desperately not to cry. I-

I have to help him, I can’t just leave him like that.

I'm not the kind of person who just leaves someone to suffer and die- not anymore. I can't be that person anymore- I won't.

“Your Majesty; we’re so far from the surface of the ocean... how is there day and night, down here? We’re in the aphotic zone, or perhaps lower; it should be pitch black, or close enough. How, then, can there be sunlight?” I said.

The king blinks, then latches onto my conversational lifeline with a fair amount of desperate nerve. He’s old, is the thing- his hair is only sort of red, curly but shot through with silvery white. His skin is thin, and sallow, and his hands are wizened and covered in liverspots. He’s much the same as Whitebeard; old, but not weak, or withered. There’s still a power to him, a force he could bring to bear.

Unlike Whitebeard, however, King Neptune is... tired. He’s been fighting a war on two or three fronts, it seems; and he can’t quite give the reigns over to one of his children, not with the problems of his time as they are.

“Ah, that’s Eve. The Sunlight Tree Eve is a colossal-class mangrove tree gifted to the Kingdom by Queen Ariel in accordance with the Neptunian Accords-jamon. It absorbs sunlight up in Sabaody, and transfers what it doesn’t use in the daily business of living to it’s roots-jamon. It's also how the bubble-walls around various parts of the island are maintained-jamon.” said King Neptune.
“Amazing! I wonder-”

And so I engage the old king in long conversation, letting him lead. He seems- incredibly grateful to have a moment to speak with a pretty young woman about inconsequential things. Everyone knows that Fishman Island is lit by their Tree, Eve. But- it’s interesting, getting a local’s take on this islands weather phenomena.

Zoro went off to the toilet a while ago, a bit after the dessert course. Knowing him, he’s gotten completely lost in this palace- and, considering my condition…

I wait for a good lull in the conversation, turn the subjects gently this way and that- ask about his children, and so on. Eventually, I hit on just the right combination of phrasing to excuse myself from the room, and do so.

I don’t quite waddle when I walk, not yet, but there’s a very distinctive way of moving when you’re pregnant- and the King’s seen it at least twice. He smiled at me, nostalgically- and then graciously waved away all of Lord Sinister’s protests of “allowing a filthy pirate to roam freely in the Royal Palace”.

I stop at the bathroom, because actually I do need to pee; and Zoro, of course, isn’t there.

Gods damn it all, where the hell has that man gotten to now? Best I go and find him, then- considering everything I learned at the Weather Coven, finding a single man in a closed building, especially the man who has put babies in my belly, is a small matter.

He’s wearing the thing with the frills for this, I swear it.

Where the hell am I now? Fuck it- I’m opening one of these doors and staying put, I’ve been lost for at least half an hour now. The hallways fucking move.

Nami’s going to make me wear the thing with the frills, I can feel it. Then again, she’s the only person I know of other than Mab and Robin who can find me when I get turned around like this. Ugh.

I guess one door is as good as any- and I’m hungry again, fucking- I knew those weird tiny meals wouldn’t be the right kind of filling, but Nami said I had to be polite, and… maybe this is the kitchen? Palace is too big for there not to be a kitchen near the dining room, not and have all the food still be warm or cold or whatever- and as for the palace…

So. Preface this by saying that when I left Shimotsuki, and- everything- I ended up doing a lot of odd jobs. Being a bit less than fifteen, it’s amazing worse didn’t happen to me. Bounty hunting isn’t actually all that profitable- even if you’re good at it.

Especially after I turned down that offer from the former Baroque Works- yeah, there was a good eight months of no-bounties to be found, anywhere.

However, I ended up working for a reef fisherman, so it wasn’t totally awful. Learned a lot of odd things. I think he was... a marine biologist, but not like, a Marine biologist. He studied life in the ocean- or he had, before something happened that made him scream in his sleep. Then again, marine biology could be a euphemism for Seafolk.

His eyes were green. Of all the things I remember about him, that’s the most important. Brown, flecked with green- hazel, I guess.

His house was orange, with purple edges, and the flowers were pink and purple. I had my own room, at his house, and was paid a rather impressive wage. My job was to cut up fish; gut them, chop them into pieces and put them into glass boxes by weight. Everyday; four hours of this. Then, I got to feed his animals. There were otters, dolphins, carnivorous fish- sharks, too, that followed the boat.

He cut his wrists in the bathtub, and that’s how I found him. Took the time to write out a will; told me to scuttle his boat, and sell his shit that I didn’t want, and to bury him in a meadow by a red maple tree. Said that he was sorry to do this to me, but- it hurt, he said. Wrote. It hurt for him to breathe.

Said he couldn’t live with what he’d done; so, he wouldn’t.

There’s a graveyard in Toad Holler, on Kanna Island; it’s called potter’s field, because it’s mostly pottery there, cremated ashes in fine brown pots painted with the life stories of whoever’s inside them. The pots aren’t fired, just dried- and then carefully painted over with a fine ochre and other ground minerals for color.

After the Fisherman died- he never did tell me his name, or much of his story, but I figured a few things out- I ended up on Kanna with his ashes in a brass vase. Then, I scuttled his ship on the rocky shore of that island, and walked into the woods up the cliff, and- I guess I got sick. Woke up in a woman’s house. She was a potter, and her name was Moira; I lived with her until I could finally bury the Fisherman.

She taught me to throw pots, and how to keep her kiln, and her many recipes for colors on pottery; she even taught me the clay mix for putting hamon on swords. Made me memorize every color she’d ever made- I… damn, I need another journal to put all her knowledge in.

I mean.

The reason I left her wasn’t because I learned everything she had to teach; I left because when I buried the Fisherman, I had to bury the Potter, too.

Nami says I have haunted eyes.

My body feels strange, like there’s something going wrong with it. Nah.

I'm- fine. I'm fine.

The palace of the Neptune Family is... like a coral reef, honestly. Each portion of the palace rests on tiers, with towers rising up like plumes of lava from the bottom of the ocean. It’s colorful, each section blazing with pigment unseen in the surface world. Everything in the palace shimmers, like it’s been burnished; but it glows, too, as if lit from within.

Except for here.

There was one tower that didn’t quite fit the aesthetics of the palace; a tall, black tower at the edge of the palace complex. Just looking at it reminded me of Water 7, in that it would be almost impossible to attack and hold that tower.

I think I’m in that tower- maybe the tower’s kitchen, it smells like food in here.

It’s. Very dark in here for a kitchen.

I think a guard just walked out of this room, too?

Odd.

But it smells like the dinner we just had; maybe a little stronger, I guess, because the room is smaller. Oh- there; there’s food on the other side of this room, okay.

I start walking towards the food, carefully navigating the dark room. It’s not entirely dark; thin shafts of light spray across curdled stones, shining grays and blues and greens lending a faint air of disease. It smells, underneath the smell of good fresh food, almost overwhelmingly of fear-sweat and old blood.

Something about this room is… off.

The ground underneath my feet feels- strange. Almost soft, in some places- certainly softer than I would expect a floor to feel, if it were made of stone. It’s almost rubbery, under my feet, and has a very odd texture- I can’t quite say without feeling with my hand, my boots aren’t thin, and... Hm. I can’t say for sure.

The floor is breathing.

Oh no.

I stop moving so carelessly, and begin carefully stepping, trying to find a way off of whatever creature I’m standing on top of. My foot snagged on- something- and my hand smacked against something with the texture of pudding so hard I felt my fingers sting.

The smack of my palm against- flesh?- echoes through the darkened room.

Whatever I’m standing on, it’s breathing just stiffened, and- gah!

I stumble a little as I land on the ground, and then roll out of the way of- massive, moving through the air like the boom on the ship- dodge!

A crack like a whip, and a massive glowing tail slams into the place I was standing.
A low snarling growl-

I dart out of the way of a limb, glowing with it’s own spots and stripes, similar pattern to the massive tail.

A cloud of hair-thin weeds drifts through the air, and glows in steadily moving stripes, like- like- neon?-

And then, a strange face. It glows, and blue white teeth so sharp and eyes that flick red blue red blue on skin so black it seeps in and out of form flashing flashing something is wrong

Is this the first time you’ve felt like this?
no
Are you having a panic attack?

yes
Do you have any medical conditions?
What is your name?
May I use your name?
yes
Zoro, may I touch you?
yes

Zoro, please take one breath.
You're doing great, Zoro.
Can you sit down on my hand, please?
What is your favorite color, Zoro?
How old are you, Zoro?
twenty one
Can you take a breath with every other number I say, Zoro?
1-2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. You’re doing very good, Zoro. Can you do it again?
yes
1-2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. Good job, Zoro. Can you do it again?
yes
1-2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10. Can you lay down, Zoro?
yes
Can you take a breath for me, Zoro?
One breath at a time.
Just one breath.
Please, just a breath.
Just one more, Zoro.
I believe in you, Zoro.
Please, keep breathing, Zoro- one breath at a time.
You’re doing great, Zoro.
Just one more breath, Zoro.
I'm right here, and I won't leave you.
It's okay.
Just one breath.
When I wake up again, I'm hugging a giant… finger? Finger.

I'm in the palm of someone’s hand.

It's a big hand, slightly flickering with blue and purple spots, and held just in the path of warm-soft breath. I can feel my heart beating in my chest, and a soft voice-
“Please, just take a breath.”

I can’t.

“Just one breath.”

I- I gasp, shaking, and squeeze the thumb I’m holding close to me hard enough I can see the giant wince out of the side of my eye.

“You’re in my bedroom, in the Palace of Neptune in Ryugu Mergyo on Fishman Island; it’s past midnight. You’ve been panicking for a bit less than twenty minutes.”

I nod.

“S-sorry for smacking your tit.” I shudder out through chattering teeth.

“I’m sorry for frightening you so badly.” she said.

I loosen my grip, and try very hard to pull my soul back into my body. Breathe. Breathe. My name is Roronoa Zoro. The Greatest Swordsmen don’t have panic attacks and draw their weapons; and I didn’t. I didn’t hurt anyone.

Breathe.

I slowly let go of her thumb, and roll onto my flat back. I keep one hand pressed flat against her palm. I cross the other arm over my eyes and face, and let my heaving gasps recede into steady breaths. Eventually, I feel steady enough to sit up; but slowly.

I think I was fourteen, the last time I had a panic attack.

“Thank you, miss.” I said.

There’s light, in the room now. I’m in the cupped palms of a Giant mermaid.

“Of course. May I tell you my name?” she said.

I nod.

“My name is Shirahoshi Neptune.” she said. And then her long, waving black hair flashed bright pink, and one of her hands lashed out and stopped an axe hurtling through the air with a heavy smacking noise.

I take a deep breath, past the atavistic terror of her snarl. In doing so, I can suddenly see that she’s actually missing one of her fingers, right at the knuckle; her arms and shoulders, across her stomach and tail. In the light, the marks that so frightened me are pale, underlaid by black. I can hardly see the colors at all.

Princess Shirahoshi lets out a snarl of defiance, before slamming the axe into the ground. Curiously, her hand never bobbles or drops underneath me; it’s like being on the solid ground in the middle of a sunlit glade, warm and firm and giving underneath me.

Someone comes.

A contingent of guards; small squad, elite. An officer- no, similar marks of rank to Lord Sinister, but somehow reversed. And behind both groups- a slightly wobbly Nami.

I roll onto my feet, and then leap off of Princess Shirahoshi’s hand. I glide through the air, and land gently, about a meter away from Nami.

“I do not need guards-”

“No, Highness; in a real battle, your skill will not be able to save you-”
“Yes, Captain Baroque, it will!”

“Princess- you can’t know that.”

“Yes, I can! If Vander Decken 9 wishes me harm, I will defend myself! If he seeks a fight with me, I will defeat him!”

“You shouldn’t be anywhere near the battlefield, Princess. You’re too important!”

“I am Not!”

“YES, YOU ARE.”

“NO!!!”

“WHY WON’T YOU JUST LET ME DO THIS FOR YOU PRINCESS OTOHIME!?!!!?”

The Princess gasps, and flinches. The Captain of the squad of guards claps a hand over his mouth. The Minister of the Right- I’m almost certain of it- shakes his…? Head, and says-

“Guard Captain Baroque, take a swim. Guards, secure the perimeter.”

“Yes sir!”

“Princess, a word; if I may…?”

“C-certainly, Lord Desterous.”

And the Captain shudders, and nods, and swims away. I carefully pretend to have not heard anything, and gently stop Nami from involving herself. She’s a very empathetic, caring person; she hates seeing anyone in pain, especially young women. However, this- this isn’t something I think she can help all that much with.

Further, she needs to sit down, that’s what it means when she’s swaying like that. I gently wrap an arm around her waist, and she leans into me with a bit of a huff. I carefully walk her towards a low bench, probably meant for… for I don’t know. It’s very plain, I suppose.

“She’s under a lot of pressure.” said Nami.

“Yeah, probably.”

“We should help her, if we can.” said Nami.

I looked at her, and she looked back at me with burning eyes. Saa, I can’t say ‘no’ to her determined face. Fucking hell.

Guess we’re helping a princess.
“Princess Shirahoshi… this ritual of yours, this habit, of dismissing your guards and defending yourself, even injuring yourself in your own defence… I will not say that you do not have the right to do so. It is the right of any being to defend itself from harm; however, you are beloved by everyone in this castle, and a great many in our kingdom.”

“Tch. They loved my mother, the Great Queen Otohime; I’m not even a pale shadow of her.”

“Perhaps. I suppose it is easy to forget that you never did meet the Honored Queen, not in a way that matters; and, now that you are sixteen… Your father would have you wrapped in secrecy, and the intricacies of court made oblique to you. He would have your elder brothers take up your defence, and solve every problem in the World- to give you a life as free from worry as he could. As if life will be so kind as to wait until you are an adult, to face the problems of an adult. As if it isn’t so, that some problems can only be solved by the next generation.

“I say this is nonsense, or at the least, wishful thinking.

“Your Honored Mother changed our Kingdom, Princess. Your Honored Mother taught Captain Baroque what it actually means to love someone- to really love someone.”

“…I know. I know he’s only trying to do what’s best for me- but I’m so… I can’t stand it. I cannot, Lord Desterous; I will not run, and I cannot bear to hide away for much longer. My people need me, they deserve to know me, to see me; and I them! What kind of Princess- what kind of Queen- doesn’t know her own people?”

“Princess… Your Honored Mother changed my life. I came to Court thinking this was just another position for my House to gain glory. Make another maneuver against House Sinister; build another office building for people to work in; lobby for more laws no one would really read or care about; build another tower that would defend what was held within it; design yet more buildings that would never be built; …and then I met your Mother. Just one of the younger princesses, not even particularly favored to inherit; one of a thousand- but she was different. She was different because she decided to be.”

Lord Desterous smiles up at the Princess.

“She asked me- she asked me what I wanted to build, and I’d never heard that before. It has taken me until now to realize that, in our Court, the children and the youth never hear that they can be anything other than what came before them. Certainly then, we never heard that we could be more than what we were- but your Honored Mother, Queen Otohime- Highness, she opened our eyes.”

“Always, I have heard of the grace of my Honored Mother; how wonderful and special she was. I cannot hope to measure up to such majesty.”

“Tseheh-heh-heh; I can’t believe it. I’m the one giving this speech to Queen Otohime’s daughter… Princess Shirahoshi, you are different! That’s what so exciting and wonderful- you don’t have to be like Queen Otohime! You can be someone even better; you can be… you.

“I remember your Grandmother, Princess; I remember my parents speaking of her, and her policy. Your Honored Mother was nothing like her mother, and she eventually accepted that; and you are nothing like your Mother. You must learn to accept that too- and gain the fortitude to swim wherever it may lead you. You can be the Princess your Father and Brothers see you as; or you could be the person you know you are.

“In this, my advice is- you must choose for yourself.”

“Perimeter clear, sir.”

“I see. Dismissed. Princess; my leave?”

“Granted, Lord Desterous.”

The Princess smiles, softly. And then, she starts crying.

Shit. I guess I’m helping a Princess, or whatever.

Fuck, I'm tired.
The Princess holds it together for long enough that I almost believe she’s going to make it through without- and then, like a crack in a window breaking open during a squall, her face crumples into itself and tears roll down her face.

I clamp an arm around Nami and tuck her firmly to my side. She squirms against me, then huffs when I prove immovable- or at the very least, more of an obstacle than she’s willing to seriously circumvent right now. This is Shirahoshi’s fight, not ours-

“Can’t we help her?”

“No, we can’t.”

“Why not!?!?”

“Nami, it’s her fight- and it’s not something that can be won with fists or words. It’s the kind of thing she has to decide for herself.”

“Hmph.”

“Nami… feelings have to be felt before they can be resolved. We won’t be helping her, if we interrupt her feeling her feelings.”

“Zoro, it’s not right to let someone convince themselves that they’re alone; that they’re the only one in the world who has ever felt the way they do.”

“Even so- we aren’t the pair of people who can talk about what she’s going through with her. Nami, my Aunt and Uncle were always supportive of me, and what I wanted to do with my life; and so was your family. It sounds to me like Shirahoshi’s family… isn’t.”

“…Sanji and Mab?”

“Yeah. And they aren’t here. The best we can do is just… let her cry.”

And so, though it honestly pains us both- we let the young woman cry over the unfairness of it all. We let her cry about not being who she wants to be; we let her cry about not being who her mother was. We let her alone- but, crucially, we don’t actually leave.

Shirahoshi gasps and forces herself to breath through her tears- until, finally, somehow anticlimactically, they just… stop. She gasps, and then breathes slower and slower, until at last she is something approaching calm again. Then, she pours water into a basin, and washes her face; pours water into a glass, and drinks deeply of it. She glances at herself in the mirror behind her toilette, and pins several white floral pins into her hair, sweeping it up and back away from her face. It falls down her back in a long black river, shining in the pale light of her room. She glances over the table full of food, and goes a little green, actually- and then she looks away, sharply, and espies Nami and me.

She glides over, careful and dainty despite being huge- and she says, with a careful modulation to her tone, “Would either of you like something to eat?”

“I’d love something to eat, actually,” said Nami.

“I’m not hungry-” I said, still a little shaky from before.

“Neither am I, that’s why I asked- here, I’ll move you two to the table, so we don’t have to be on such different levels- if that’s alright…?” said Shirahoshi.

“Oh, yes please.” said Nami.

“Sure.” I said.

I watch, smilingly, as Nami more or less gorges herself on much larger portions of what we had at dinner- and, when my stomach perks up, I eat my fair share of food as well. Eventually, I notice Shirahoshi glancing at me guiltily, and steadily gaze at her until she can’t help but apologize again.

“I’m so sorry for frightening you.”

“You’ve said that already- and I understand. I scared you, too. Besides, it wasn’t really your fault at all.”

“-but I was the one who-”

“No, Princess. I have some pretty nasty things in my past, and they sometimes creep up on me; I should have paid more attention to myself and how I was feeling. Your actions just tipped the balance; it wouldn’t have happened at all if I wasn’t already wobbling.”

“...If you’re sure, I suppose. Oh- are you the Straw Hat Pirates?”

“We’re members of that crew, yes.”

“I must thank you, then- it is because of your crew’s actions that my beloved pet, Megalo, returned to me.”

“I suppose… Saa- I noticed on your hands- you use a polearm, of some kind?”

“Aa, I use naginata.”

Oho!

“...Eeh? Those swords- are you perhaps a swordsman?”

“I am; of some skill.”

“Is that so? Perhaps we can spar.”
Nami rolls her eyes, but- this is definitely what I needed.

A moment, then- before I get into it with Shirahoshi, let me remember what I can of naginata. It’s a pole-weapon, not like Mab’s yari- although she’s always been very specific in saying that she uses spears, I know a yari when I see one… The difference between a naginata and a yari is subtle but important. A naginata is more like a very short sword on a very long pole; while a yari is more like a particularly large and sharp needle. You can pierce with a sword; and you can cut with a needle- but each weapon is suited to a particular task before it turns to another.

In essence, a naginata is a wooden or metal pole with a curved single-edged blade on the end; fairly similar to the guan dao or the glaive. Like a katana, naginata often have a round tsuba between the blade and shaft, when mounted in a koshirae. The blade of a naginata is between thirty and sixty centimeters long, and it is forged in the same manner as traditional Wano swords; however, it tends to have a much longer tang, which is inserted into the shaft of the weapon.

The blade of a naginata is removable; it’s secured by means of a wooden peg called mekugi that passes through a mekugi-ana in both the tang and the shaft. Sometimes, there are more than one set of these- but that’s for very specific kinds of naginata, which are almost never for anything other than outright war or ceremonial use. The shaft of a naginata is oval shaped, and ranges from one hundred twenty to two hundred forty centimeters in length. The area of the shaft where the tang sits is the tachiuke; the tachiuke would be reinforced with semegane, and possibly sakawa, then wrapped in san-dan maki. The end of the shaft has a heavy metal hirumaki. When not in use, the blade would be covered with a wooden sheath.

Mab’s spear is not a naginata. Mab’s spear is a Fae qiang.

Spears have existed for as long as people have been using tools to kill things- a sharp rock stuck in a straight-enough stick, and hey, it’s a spear. This is why- and how- a young child can make a spear with nothing more than some string, a long straight stick, and a pocket knife. Spears are deceptively simple weapons.

Why, then, is it so often referred to- in many, many schools of martial arts- as the King of Weapons?

Frankly, it the age of the weapon. A spear is a predominantly pre-modern weapon; and, unlike say, a sword or a gun, a spear has a much higher utility than almost anything other than a staff. Truthfully, I’d go so far as to say that a spear is more useful than a staff, by simple addition of a sharp, cutting point on one end.

The first big thing one needs to know about a spear? A spear is big. Short spears start at two hundred forty seven centimeters; and they can go all the way to three hundred sixty six centimeters. The shaft of a spear is made of oak, or elm, or some other wood which is known to grow straight and strong.

Mab showed me, a few times- she makes a very small movement with her wrists and fingers, and because of the sheer length of her weapon, the tip moves a very great deal. Spears are precise in ways swords simply aren’t- not because of any lack of skill in the wielder, but because of the very nature of the weapons themselves. If I swipe left to right, it’s a simple swipe, maybe half a meter to a meter out from my fingers. If Mab makes a swipe right to left, it’s a giant sweeping motion, a full three meters or more from the tip of her fingers.
The blade of a spear is normally leaf-shaped, making it suitable for small knife-like cuts- usually when Mab snaps her wrists; and quick slashing motions, which come from her arms. The thrusting power of the weapon is it’s most potent attribute, and when Mab puts her whole weight behind a thrust, nothing can stop her.

Finally, between the blade and the shaft is a tubular section, which is what is affixed to the end of the spear’s shaft. The tube is hollow, with a hole in it, and a small ball bearing. This particular arrangement shows the devious and vicious nature of the Fae the most, I think; the hole, when the spear is swung at high speeds, creates a whistling sound. This can be used by its wielder in any number of ways- from simple distractions, to the basis of spells.

There’s an old stereotype about fairies needing magic wands. Truthfully, a fairy with a spear is magic all on their own.

Anyway.

Just below the blade and tube is the tassel- and this is where Mab (and Taffy) differ the most. Until she sat down and explained it to me, I didn’t understand why it was such a big deal for Taffy to change the tassel on her sword. I thought of it as decoration, and nothing more. In fact, it is more than that; on Taffy’s sword, the tassel is part lanyard, and part claim of ownership. No one else on our crew will ever, ever use that particular shade of green for anything- Mab made sure of it. On a spear, however, I can say that it’s not at all a simple decoration- the tassel of a qiang is a part of its overall functionality. When the spear moves quickly, the addition of the tassel blurs the vision of the enemy, making it much more difficult to grab the shaft of the spear behind the head or tip. The tassel also serves to stop the flow of blood from the blade getting to the wooden shaft, thus preserving an optimal grip.

The other big difference I can think of between a naginata and a qiang is this. A naginata became a weapon in response to cavalry. A spear became a weapon due to it’s use as a missile.

Naginata are excellent tools for dismounting cavalry, killing horses, and disabling riders. Indeed, it was the adoption of the naginata- or, in other places, the gua dao, or the pike- that saw greaves becoming part of the standard armor set. It was only the introduction of guns and other firearms that decreased the appearance of the naginata on the field of battle in Wano. When the naginata waxed useful again, it also became a social status symbol for women. A functional naginata was a traditional part of a samurai daughter’s dowry. A woman who was submissive as a wife but stalwart in defense of the home was very desirable; and a woman who could use a naginata was at least one of the two. Naginata eventually became women’s weapons exclusively, because it allows a woman to keep any opponent at a distance- where advantages in height, weight, and strength are lessened; and is absolutely deadly indoors, where the defender’s positive attributes can be easily maximized.

Naginata is the weapon with which the enemy is literally swept away. The more combative forms of naginatjutsu are mostly reserved for the military now, and- while some ‘civil’ schools of combat remain, the general feeling is that modern naginata is for the purification and beautification of the soul, not… battle. In this form of naginatjutsu, it is not simply appearance that denotes beauty of form- it is the harmonious joining of sensitivity and reason that creates beauty. A well executed series of movements therefore can become more beautiful than a perfected form.

Still, some things remain unchanged- the naginata is not a throwing weapon.

The spear, simply put, is. How to say this… Mab fights with her spear in two distinctive positions. If her arm is down by her side, or even in front of her, the spear is being used much like a sword or a staff. When her arm goes up above her head, however, she’s using the spear like a spear. In an instant, her weapon can change from a stabbing, thrusting weapon, to a deadly missile aimed at my anatomy- my arm, my leg, my chest or gut. The speed at which Mab throws her spear… if I don’t use Observation Haki to feel her out, I’m not going to win.

Hell, for some of our spars, if I hadn’t been using Observation, I wouldn’t have come away with bruises and light cuts- like cat scratches. I’d have come away with wounds. Spears are fast - about the only thing faster is an arrow, and arrows are precursors to bullets.

And, most importantly… the spear is a weapon that is still very much defined by it’s use in infantry tactics. Mab’s overhead stance is very, very useful if she’s in, say, a group of spear fighters, all of them doing the same thing at the same time.

For the purposes of sparring- ah, yes, Shirahoshi is pulling out a shiai-yo. It’s an oaken shaft with a bamboo habu; used for practice, training, and sparring. It should be the same size as her actual weapon- which is right there, on the rack- and ought to be at least three times the weight of her actual weapon. The ‘blade’ is replaceable; and, as they get broken or otherwise damaged during sparring, they’re only attached to the shaft with tape. Shirahoshi’s tape is a pretty floral satin ribbon, and is tied in one of the more interesting knots I’ve yet seen.

A naginata can be used to batter, bash, stab, slash, hook, and sweep an enemy; due to their relatively balanced center of mass, a naginata can be spun and turned to proscribe a large radius of reach. The curved blade also provides a longer cutting surface, optimized for quick slashes, without increasing the overall length of the weapon overmuch.

In terms of advantage over a sword; the reach of a naginata is longer, allowing the wielder to stay out of range of their enemy. The long shaft offers greater leverage than that of a sword’s hilt, enabling a more efficient cut. The weight of the weapon gives power to strikes and cuts; and the weighted end of the shaft, and of course the shaft itself, can be used offensively and defensively.

Shirahoshi is wearing a yukata- silk, that’s what that shimmer means- with a big komon on her back, right between her shoulder blades. The sleeves of the kimono are fairly short- oh, I see, it’s not actually a woman’s yukata specifically, it’s just a yukata- specifically, it’s a very short yukata, as it stops above the big bend I consider to be the ‘knee’ area of her tail. At least, that’s where it bends most naturally when she kneels.

The yukata itself is a very reserved grey, with not much pattern on it to speak of- maybe some dots, or a subtle gradation in the way it shifts from the middle of her body to the cuffs of her sleeves? I don’t know, I’d have to ask Mab.

The obi is thick, and very… scaly? Bright, and almost creamy colors. Instead of calling for a lady in waiting, Shirahoshi ties the bow of her obi in the front and slides the whole thing around to the back, with some careful adjusting for fit. It’s a bit taller than I would expect, coming much closer to the bottom of her breasts than normally- oh, right. Hakama.

Merjin hakama are different from other hakama really in only one respect- they aren’t, technically speaking, trousers. That’s it. They go on the same way, and get worn for the same things- but Mab was very loud about how merjin hakama aren’t actually pants, they’re pleated tube skirts.
My friends are weird.

Anyway. Shirahoshi steps into her hakama, and carefully ties it on- the long front ties cross over the back-bow, then around the front again with the little fold, and tied under the back-bow; then the back goes all the way over the bow, like a little… shelf, I guess, and ties it with a simple square knot just a little off center, to the left. The last of the ties go into a flat bow; with tails that very nearly equal the length of the ears of the bow, it’s a very… functional knot.

And then, she pulls herself straight, and quietly looks at me. I smile, and calmly stand from where I was resting against a bowl of fruit. Then, I leap- up, over the table, and down, onto the floor of Shirahoshi’s room.

It’s a very empty room, with a bed area inset into the wall, a cubicle is the word, I think- the rest of the room is all spread out along the perimeter. The center of the room, where my leap took me, is empty, save for myself, and Shirahoshi waiting with her glaive.

I’m good enough now, I can spar with live blades and never once cut my opponent or their weapon. This will be an excellent round of training for us both, I think.

We bow to each other with careful respect; and then, it begins.

A quick test of the waters; I slash at her, to see where she reacts. She knocks my strike aside, and I casually lean away from a retaliatory slash at my head.

We slowly trade places, never taking our eyes off each other.

She moves first this time. Her naginata slashes at me, and I knock her strike aside; she leans away from the retaliatory slash, and the whistle of my sword’s passing only serves to highlight her grin.

I grin back.

The next blow sneaks in from the side- or it tries.

I see it and I dodge.

I throw a slash, a cut, a stab.

She dodges, pushes aside and brings the heavy shaft in for a slam.

I duck, roll into her guard.

She backs away quickly, trying to catch me in her blade.

I roll to the side and bound forwards.
I see her falter before I can pull the force of my strike— the best I can really do is ensure it will only bruise, not cut. The crack of my sword’s flat against her skin echoes through the room. I dart away, and stare at her, aghast.

“What the hell was that, Shirahoshi.”

“I- I’m sorry- I was just—”

“No. You faltered. All that talk of fighting for yourself— was that a lie?”

“No! I just- I can’t—”

“Sparring is an integral part of training, especially at your level. What do you mean, you can’t—”

“I CAN’T FIGHT SOMEONE WHO DOESN’T COME AT ME WITH MALICIOUS INTENT!”

I stop, and stare at her, horrified.

Shirahoshi dashes a tear from her cheek, then glares me down, defiant.

“…Vander Decken 9 has a curse called Mato-Mato. It lets him target anything, from any location— so long as he’s touched it. When I was six, my mother died— and at her funeral, he… he touched me. Ever since then, he’s been sending things— letters begging for my love, then death threats, then… well, you saw the axe.

“Ten years is a long time— and… and I can feel it, when something he’s sent after me is coming close. But… somehow, that’s all I can feel. It’s like I’ve been blocked from seeing anything other than that stupid, shitty man, and I know there’s more out there— but… no one believes me when I say ‘I can feel Vander Decken 9’s attacks before they happen’.

“I haven’t been let outside this tower in ten years.

“N-none of these scars are from Vander Decken 9. All of these are from trying to prove that I can handle myself… but none of Lord Desterous’ men believe me, and— Father says that a hard lesson learned now is better than one learned later, when one cannot grow past such things.

“I just… I want to go outside.”

I blink. I wonder…

“Why do you want to go outside?”

“I should be able to go outside if I want to! A-and… but- I, I promised my mother, so… I haven’t.”

“…What, exactly, did you promise your mother?”
“I promised her that I would be nice, and gentle, and- abide.”

“Ah. Aside from paying your respects, you want to go to her grave because...?”

“...It’s kinda hard to beg forgiveness from a person who has been so thoroughly eradicated from the house. Lord Desterous said it was unseemly for young women to keep altars to their mothers for so long, and Father did not disagree.”

“Ah.”

I look at her again.

“Nami?”

“Mrf?”

“I need you to do something for the Princess.”

“Rf uu mrrp?”

“I need you to Widen her Gaze.”

Nami swallows whatever she was chewing, and leaps down next to me.

“Zoro...”

“You heard what it’s been like for her; just widen it a touch, that’s all. Then, I can give her the building blocks for what proper escalation and de-escalation should look like, among other things.”

“...You really are a kind and gentle man.”

I snort at Nami, who giggles. Minx.

Then, Nami leaps up, to be caught, deftly, by Shirahoshi. They talk, quietly, and then Shirahoshi bows over her palm, where Nami stands.

Nami reaches up and touches the very center of Shirahoshi’s forehead. The thick, twisting feeling of her magic brushes over the room, and something inside Shirahoshi shifts forever.

It’s as if her eyes were caked with dust- not blinded, but caked. Some dust she’s managed to knock away on her own; and the rest, in this moment, has been lifted and enticed to fall away.

Now, to make sure it actually does fall away.

Nami, sensing my intent, leaps back away to the table.
Shirahoshi, also sensing my intent— for the first time, perhaps—stares straight at me, then smiles, and bows again.

I bow back.

A quick test of the waters; I slash at her, to see where she reacts. She knocks my strike aside, and I casually lean away from a retaliatory slash at my head.

We slowly trade places, never taking our eyes off each other.

She moves first this time. Her naginata slashes at me, and I knock her strike aside; she leans away from the retaliatory slash, and the whistle of my sword’s passing only serves to highlight her grin.

I grin back.

The next blow sneaks in from the side— or it tries.

I see it, and I dodge.

I throw a slash, a cut, a stab.

She dodges, pushes aside, and brings the heavy shaft in for a slam.

I duck and roll into her guard.

She backs away quickly, trying to catch me in her blade.

I roll to the side and bound forwards.

The shaft catches and locks against my arms.

I can feel the titanic weight of her fury, trying to shove me back.

I break away, and dance around to stab at her ribs.

She whirls her naginata, and slices at my legs.

I dodge, and throw a Sanjuroku Pound Ho.

She strikes it aside and slams the butt of her weapon where I stood.

I leap high and Hiryu: Kaen at her upper arm.

She lunges to the side; droplets of watery sweat flash off her furrowed brow.

She brings the huge force of her naginata around on me.

I draw my second sword, and catch the great weight of her strike on my crossed blades.

I stomp and throw her back.

Her tail scrapes across the ground as she slides.

Her back straightens, and her wavering resolve snaps firm.

She whirls her naginata and uses her first named attack.
Yogore Kumo! echoes through the room from her throat.

A thick white haze spreads from where the base of her tail rests to about halfway up her waist. I see; an obscuring move, meant to hide the movements of her tail and cloud her intentions. Interesting.

But not good enough to beat me.

I sweep Taka Nami forwards.

The silt is cut apart in a sweeping wave.

I wasn’t fast enough.

I catch the very tip of her strike on my crossed blades and fling myself to one side.

I lunge forwards and ready Nigiri: Toro.

I fling the twin strikes up towards her chest.

She takes one hand off of her naginata and catches me in the palm of her sweaty hand.

She slides out of the way of my strikes and spins on the butt of her weapon.

She flings me from her hand; a shout of Nen’eki Hada follows me away.

My skin is wet and sticky and slippery. Snot-?

I’m at the wrong angle for Nigiri: Otoro; and when I try to land on the ground and regroup, I slide, like I’m on ice. I see now; a constant effect move, meant to foul the footing and grip of the opponent. I’m also noticing that as her technique settles on me, the mucus is becoming sticky; there’s a moment of resistance when I move my feet— not enough to stop me, exactly, but just enough to slow me down, just a little bit. It makes it slightly more possibly for me to misstep, or trip.

I have something of the measure of my opponent now. She’s a strategic fighter, using moves that change the battlefield or her opponent in ways advantageous to her. She sets her stage far in advance, and adapts as her opponent uses new moves. That silt cloud I blew away hasn’t actually gone, it’s just… hovering, undulating with mild menace around me.

Yogore Kiri! she shouts.

The silt rises and rushes back into our battle; it thins and swirls around and between us both, just thin enough to see through and just thick enough to see at all.
The mist is too thin and amorphous to clear with a Taka Nami.

I tried at Kuraigana- doesn’t work.

We circle each other, sending teasing strikes and wiggles at each other.

I open an obvious hole in my guard.

She doesn’t take the bait.

Her naginata sweeps around and around in a figure eight, the narrowest point in the middle of her body.

The mist becomes cool and clammy, clinging and sticking to everything.

The only reason her next attack misses me is the fact that I had leapt high for a Nigiri: Otoro.

Reito Ha! she shouts.

Where I stood just moments ago, and crawling up through the mist- tendrils of frost, so cold I can feel the heat leaching from my bones.

In that singular moment, I weigh my options. I see now, my initial assessment of Nen’eki Hada was wrong; it’s not just something that affects the opponent. The primary purpose of that move is to protect Shirahoshi from her elemental attacks; fouling her opponent’s footing and grip is secondary.

I can see the misty silt freezing into spiny stalagmites and whirling scales of sharp flickering white- so sharp they cut through the thickening mist. The mist is becoming something more like a wall, and- and-

Maybe it’s time to take a page from Nami’s battle book.

Nigiri: Maguma Kagero! I shout.

The frozen scales shatter apart in contrails of heat.

Shirahoshi’s body rolls out of the way of my attack in a slithering ‘S’.

The residual heat of my attack turns some of the slime on her clothing into a solid leather-looking surface.

Her mouth lifts into a smirk and her eyes flash with triumph.

I land and focus and draw my third sword.

DAI BAKUHATSU! she roars.
The heat and the cold spin together- Nami, who was just watching quietly, gives a little shriek. A whirling storm of cutting force bears down on me. I brace myself for the hit.

I can’t dodge; I can’t throw something back in time to cut it apart.

The attack and I clash.

The sound of steel ringing against pure force echoes back against the walls.

My outer kimono is slightly ripped.

There’s a small cut on my left- left?- left cheek. She’s about where I was a year ago; not at my level, but very respectable for someone her age and in her circumstances.

Even though she’s bearing down on me, her naginata’s bamboo blade gleaming black with her Power; even though against probably any other opponent, her battle scream would break resolve…

I aim to be the Greatest in the World.

She is not strong enough to defeat me.

I end the fight with Wado at her jugular.

She gasps, and heaves her breath back.

The bamboo blade of her practice naginata is broken where I stood, a slash across the grain of the wood the only indication of how I moved.

“Do you yield, Shirahoshi?” I say.

“Yes,” she says, after a moment to catch her breath.

I take my sword away from her throat, and sheath them all. Then, I leap from her shoulder and bound to where I can bow in respect to her.

Then, of course, I bow. That was a good fight.

Princess Shirahoshi bows back, the shattered tip of her practice naginata pointed down towards the ground. The silt and ice and hot air dissolve back into nothing by the time we’re done paying our proper respects to each other.
“You have a great deal of skill- but your lack of appropriate sparring partners shows. However, that’s not something that can be fixed in a single spar... How do you feel?”

“Amazing! But also, a bit disappointed- even though I lost, I feel like I learned more in those... oh wow, four minutes- than I have in the past five years. I just... it could have all been like that, I could have been- I could have been doing that this whole time!”

And she’s crying again.

“...I don’t think it’s your fault, Shirahoshi. Decken’s been harassing you for about as long as you can remember, right? Anyone would get tunnel vision in such circumstances. And... really, you don’t have to cry-”

“O-oh, no- no, anytime my blood-pressure gets a bit high, I start crying. It’s mechanical.”

“So... you can’t actually help being a crybaby?”

“Sadly, no.”

“Well. You might be a crybaby, but you’re very brave- Oi! Don’t poke her stomach, she’s pregnant, not fat-”

“O-oh, oh, I’m so sorry- sorry, sorry- ow!”

“Nami- Nami, she didn’t mean it-”

“HANDS OFF THE PUDGE, DAMMIT-”

“Nami-”

“I just wanted to see where all that food was going, I’m so sorry-”

“Nami, she was just curious, you heard how sheltered she is-”

“I DON’T LIKE STRANGERS TOUCHING MY PUDGE- I’m fine Zoro-”

“Nami, every time you say you’re fine, you’re actually really not-”

As the two pirates fight, I’m suddenly privy to their feelings. When Nami-san opened my eye, she washed away years of frustration like a cleansing rain. Fighting with Zoro was like... was like being caught in a current, dancing through a maelstrom, years of silt and muck yanked away in the whirling of water.

This was... something else.
I can feel that Zoro is much shakier from his previous panic attack than he shows in his body or his face- his darker emotions are much closer to the surface of his emotive waters than they’d normally be. Residual panic was burnt away in the comforting normality, but a oily slip of disquiet blankets him. He’s stiff where he should bend; he shakes where he should be firm.

Nami is all over the place- worried, constantly, about her pregnancy, about her crewmates, about Zoro. Here and now, especially about Zoro. Her emotions cloud and bubble like the scales on a fish, like her… like she’s constantly on edge of a storm, an upset.

They still haven’t really dissolved their egos when it comes to each other- cracked, certainly, but...

Ah, I see. They fight because they love each other- that’s it. Really, that’s all. Zoro loves Nami; Nami loves Zoro. They respect each other on the surface, but it’s deepening into a true and genuine thing only slowly… Angry people are often unwise, and will say things in the heat of their anger that they do not truly mean- they meant it when they said it, sure, but… not when their blood had cooled.

For the both of them, I think it is like this- there are few people whom either of them really and truly love, and still fewer of whom they think well and admire. The more they see of the World, the more they become dissatisfied with it; and every day confirms their belief of the inconsistency of all human character, and of the little dependence that can be placed on the appearance of merit, faculty, and sense.

For those two… I doubt either of them marked the hour, or the place, or even the way one or the other looked, or what was said, that laid the foundation of their love for each other. It’s too long ago, and their feelings now too strong to remember such a small beginning. They’re deep in the middle of it all, now; and as I watch them steadily misunderstand and infuriate the other, I can see that they haven’t really understood that it’s begun already.

Being in love doesn’t have to happen before being married; being married doesn’t have to happen before being in love. It’s like vanity and pride- vanity and pride are different things, after all. Though the words are used synonymously, they are not the same. A person can be proud without being vain. Pride relates to our opinions of ourselves; vanity is what we would have the World think of us.

Zoro and Nami are very proud people- but, as they wrap themselves deeper in their love for the other, vanity edges into where it has no business being.

As I watch them snarl and cut at each other- I see into them deeper, deeper than I have before.

Nami’s issue is sudden, explosive anger. Her ego is actually fairly brittle and fragile- and, in effect, requires more admiration and praise from outside herself to survive. For her, it’s very easy to get caught up in fantasies of power, prestige, and wealth. When left unchecked, she becomes impervious to the needs of those around her.

When she is challenged or criticised it leads to sudden and surprising results. The issue here is how she deals with criticism; be it a minor slight or direct attack. Her reactions are almost uniformly violent, either physically or verbally.

The surprise for many is the suddenness and power of the reaction, given the nature of the cause. The slightest remark, even body signal, may be interpreted as personal criticism, mocking, rejection. Rage can even occur if you turn off the tap of constant, profuse (but in many ways false) adulation, attention and compliments. The ego balloon is pricked, the boil lanced and the reaction... formidable.

She wants credit, glory- approbation, even. Just being in her crew bolsters her ego; she’s thanked and praised constantly for her work, which helps her a lot. What she needs is a round of self-reflection; some help to see why things don’t always work out. Not necessarily confrontation, but definitely true empathy.

And finally, at the bottom, I can see the basis of this whole riptide of emotion- she’s had to feel simultaneously physically vulnerable but emotionally restrained. Protected? I’m not sure how to describe it... At one time, and even a little bit now, she viewed the world as everyone for themselves. She may have enjoyed or needed other people’s company- but she convinced herself just a bit that she never needed other people and that she didn’t want people to need her.

She thought that would make her strong.

And then... her Captain and her crewmates saved her life.

For the first time in her life she could remember, when she felt like she really needed people, people where there for her. Yet... the rest of the realization hasn’t come through.

Zoro’s problem is, he doesn’t use words; he uses actions. There are always challenges that cannot be overcome with doing; simply because they aren’t the kind of challenge that can be done. It’s like deciding to fight for yourself, I think- that’s not a choice you just make once, and it’s over. Fighting for myself is something I have to decide to do, every day.

He isn’t selfish in the small things- he’ll share the last of the booze, let people have his favorite napping spot, take the time to tutor a crewmate in his area of expertise... hell, he even, um, he even goes down on Nami without being asked. It’s, ah, it’s a standard part of their lovemaking.

He is still self-centered when it comes to making decisions. He has incredible difficulty sharing his personal dilemmas and tough choices with anyone- Captain, crewmates, partner; anyone. He can barely let anyone in. He’s likely to remain quiet and mull things over; rather than talking with his friends. Often, he arrives at those kinds of decisions alone, even about things that concern more than just him.

This means that a lot of the choices that should be made together, he makes for the both of them- even when what he assumes would be the best is proven to not be. Really, that’s the best decision for him, defined as the decision where he’s the least vulnerable, and least likely to be hurt in unanticipated ways. Of course, this leads to making a more painful choice, so long as he feels that he’s in control.

He chose the more painful path because he can’t bear to let anyone other than himself choose which harms the World will visit upon him. Those kind of choices can never make a person happy.

I became selfish in a better way, I think. I took up a weapon because I wanted to be more confident with my own powers; becoming able to fight was a fringe benefit. I learned to rule properly for my own peace of mind. It may come to pass that I must take up the crown and throne of my Kingdom- and if such comes to pass, I will be prepared for it. My people deserve no less.

I stopped letting people other than myself dictate how I would appear; it’s my body, and my hair, and I’ll do what I want with it. Amazing, what can happen when you shave your hair completely off.

Now, I feel better about myself; and I take pride in the way I look. Selfishness isn’t a bad thing or a good thing- it’s just an emotion, a state of being. You have to grow as a person, not just in size but in spirit; unfortunately, it’s easy for others to feel threatened by that fact, and to let things go too far.

What matters most, I think, is the type of selfishness. Nami and- to a lesser extent, Zoro- have spent most of their lives knocking down other people to feel good about themselves.

My gaze into the past widens just a touch- I can see that their friend… their friend, yes, Queen Mab, has been gently cajoling the both of them into better places to think and live and be.

I’m not their friend.

I don’t have to be nice.

Favors for favors; let’s do this.

Before they can say anything they’ll really regret, I firmly put my hands down between them both. Then, before they can really react, I scoop both of them up in my hands and gently- carefully- turn them so that they can’t actually see each other anymore. Now that my eyes are Wide Open, I can feel my Haki more clearly than ever before. It’s a simple thing, to wrap them both up in me; and leave the only avenue for communication with each other as simply… words.

That they have to actually say to each other.

“In return for opening my eyes and helping me find my resolve; I will help the two of you. You two need help with this- this, right here, right now- and although your friend has been doing her best to help you, an outside perspective has shown me that the two of you need a more brutish approach.

“I ask that the two of you to tell each other in two sentences or less what the problem is. I need you to use ‘I’ statements; I want, I need, I feel, and so on. Nami, you start please.”

Zoro stares up at me a bit wild eyed- but as he wriggles and flexes inside my grip, he discovers what everyone smaller than me has. My grip is immovable; I am not a hermit Crab, like Queen Mab. I’m a coconut Crab. Haha, star-sign joke.

He’s not wiggling out of this. Nami is just the same- but even as she stings and shocks my flesh, I am unmoved. Finally, she huffs and snarls and with a face gone red with rage she screeches-

“I WANT ZORO TO TELL ME HIMSELF WHY HE THINKS THIS KEEPS HAPPENING! I- I want to understand- I want to understand what he thinks, and… and why.”

As fast as her rage boiled out of her, it fades, and the note of pure misery in her voice makes my throat catch on words of empty solace. Zoro, in my hand, flinches and shivers, and swallows nervously. He’s not on the road to another panic attack- he just doesn’t want to use his words.
“I want Nami to listen to me when I speak to her. I feel like- when I muster the courage to speak my true feelings, I feel like they’re dismissed as… as nothing of importance at all.”

Nami gasps, and tries to twist around in my hand to look at Zoro, to try and soothe away the near-despair in his voice. She cannot.

“Thank you for being honest with each other. Now; I want you to keep using ‘I’ statements. This time, please focus on what you personally want; out of your relationship, from the future, from each other. Don’t hold back at all. Zoro first, this time.”

Zoro jerks in my hand, and shoots me a look of pure betrayal. I stare back down at him with my calmest Courtly face. He shudders, and sighs, and flinches away from himself. But he can’t leave, and I will not let him escape from this moment. Zoro swallows, and clears his throat. He closes his eyes, blushing furiously- and then he speaks.

“I want to protect you, Nami! I worry that you push yourself too hard; I worry that you’re going to hurt yourself by pushing so hard! I want you to trust me; when I say that I want to care for you, I want you to believe me! I want to care for you when you’re not feeling your best! I want to rub your sore feet, and I want to help you find ways to exercise and train that aren’t exhausting for you!

“I like you! I like spending time with you! I like just being with you! I want to spend time together like we used to, just the two of us. I want to... I want to do stupid datey girlfriend-boyfriend stuff with you. I want to listen to your day, and tell you about mine, even when it’s the same day as yesterday. I want... I want to be sure down to my bones that you respect me.

“I want you to love me the way I love you! I want to be able to tease you; I want jokes just between the two of us, things only you and I share. I want to disagree with you, because sometimes I do disagree with you. I want to disagree without fighting.

“I want to stop being angry and irritated; I want to just... be. I want to be with you, Nami.”

And then, he’s gasping for breath, shaking in my hand. Nami, in my other hand, whimpers; she can hear how upset he is, and me blocking them from each other doesn’t go deep enough to block her Knowing him. How could it? Only death could manage that- and even then, I am not so sure.

“Your turn, Nami.”

Nami jerks to attention, and shudders; and then, she sighs, and begins to speak.
“...I want you to protect me, Zoro. I like being taken care of, but it’s hard for me to let go of my control. I worry that one day, I won’t be able to find you again when you get lost. I do trust you, Zoro. I want to trust myself.

“I trust you to care for me, but it’s hard for me to let you. I want to be cared for when I feel bad. I like it when you rub my feet, and I like the fact that you know so much about the physical body that you can help me, no matter what my body’s capability is.

“I like you, too. I like spending time with you. I like being with you, and spending time with you. I want to find a way to spend time together like we used to; I want to have times where it’s just us two together. I want to do more silly datey stuff- I like dressing similarly, and I like...

“I like hearing you talk, and I like talking with you, even when we’ve got nothing to talk about at all. I want you to respect me, too- not just as a person, but as a warrior, as someone who can fight and defend, as someone who is strong in their own right.

“I love you so much - but me loving you and you loving me… I don’t know how I can prove that we love each other the same, but we do love each other the same. I think we love each other the same.

“I want in-jokes, and disagreements, and... maybe we could train together, or nap? I think that’s something we could do, maybe.

“I want to be with you. If it came down to it… I would rather we were alone, together; than just me, all by myself.”

Nami gasps, and whimpers. I can feel my cold Courtly face being ruined by my tears- but that doesn’t really matter. I carefully turn them, and close the distance between them- still in my hands, but physically and metaphorically closer than before.

I don’t have to prompt anymore.

“When we first met, I thought you were arrogant, and conceited, selfish and disdainful of the feelings of others. I realize now that I couldn’t have been more wrong - your arrogance is a simple matter of self-confidence in the skills you genuinely do have. You do think highly of yourself, but that’s a matter of having high self esteem; you honestly care very little for what the world has to say about you, and so I cannot call you truly vain.

“For a long time, I just didn’t like you- we were crewmates, but... you can be crew with people you don’t actually like. And then... I don’t know, Zoro. Things changed. I stopped wanting to... I don’t know, defeat you? Win at a battle you didn’t know how to fight? I don’t... I wanted to be with you just because I liked being with you. I don’t remember when that became kissing, and dancing- and more, I wouldn’t be like this if I didn’t think you’re sexy-”

“N-nami, you don’t-”

“Zoro. You’re sexy. You’re handsome and kind and good, and I love you. I don’t like it when you doubt those things about yourself, because it feels to me like you’re doubting me, and my judgement.”
“No, no! I don’t doubt you, and I do trust your judgement! I- Nami, I do trust you! And I love you, too. I- I just- I think I have faults enough, but they aren’t- gods, I hope they aren’t of understanding. Of- of faith. I… I can’t say the same for my temper. I don’t tend to yield- certainly not enough to be convenient. I can’t forget foolishness or vices as soon as I ought, nor their offenses against myself- or against you, now; and especially not the crew, and our Captain. I’m not… I’m not moved by many appeals to my softer feelings, and my temper could be called… resentful, I think. My good opinion, once lost, is lost forever.

“But that doesn’t mean I ever thought badly of you- really, Nami, I never did. You were always beautiful; the way light catches on your hair, the depth of your empathy and compassion… and you’re smart, Nami, you’re smarter than I’ll ever be.”

“…Me being smart doesn’t mean you’re dumb, Zoro. A-and… it doesn’t really matter to me, that you’re not comfortable talking about your softer feelings. You show the depth of your care, and your kindness in a thousand little ways, every day. I always know that you’ll be happy to spend time with me, with any of our crewmates… I just wish…”

“Nami…?”

“I worry that you’ll get into a fight, and… and you’ll go somewhere I can’t follow, Zoro. I don’t want you to leave me behind. I know you might have to, to find your Dream- but I don’t want you to, I-”

“I can’t help being so… selfish.”

Zoro can’t seem to find the words for a long, long moment.

“…Nami, I don’t think it’s selfish to want to spend time with someone you love. And… I Know I’ll never go anywhere you can’t find me eventually. I Know you, and I know you’ll always find me, if I’m- lost. Or Lost.”

“Hmph. Didn’t you swear that you’d never lose again?”

“Losing and being lost are not the same, Nami. And at least with you, I know that I’ll never lose sight of where I need to be, and what I need to do. I will never let myself be defined by how I can die; I will always be defined by how I can live.”

“…I know. The same as I know that, although the future is fast coming for us all, it always flinches first, before settling in as the gentle present. This now; this us- the two of us, together; I think we can cope with that. I think we can make that work.”

I slowly open my palms, and gently push them near each other. My palms make a natural bridge, and without their noticing, they’ve wrapped around each other, embracing, and kissing, and- I’ll just- put them on this cushion and- oh my goodly gods, I think I have a screen.

S-somewhere-

Ah, here we go. Let me just- and there goes her obi, I’m going to go.
Over here.

Where I can ignore them.

LET ME THINK ABOUT MEGALO, MEGALO IS A GOOD DISTRACTION FROM ALL THE- NOISES-

Oh wow, they are shameless.

AHEM.

Megalo is an actual angel sent from heaven, and I have evidence of this fact. Fact, I say. She’s a Great White Dogshark, and weighs about six hundred eighty kilograms. She’s so gentle I don’t need any special collar or leash or harness to walk or swim her, ever. She was meant to be a service dog but she was too shy, so she became my dog. Can you imagine it? She was trained to do all the service dog things, but- she’s my pet, more than anything else.

And they discovered her shyness before she was old enough to be spayed, so...

Megalo is so well behaved, okay, she waits for me at the top and bottom of stair-slides until I tell her it’s okay to go ahead up or down the next flight. She communicates to the maids how much she loves me, because they tell me every time I return from a long day at Court or in my study that every time I leave and they enter to clean my rooms, Megalo is sad. My baby girl!

She knows that if she gets silty or sandy, she has to wait in the foyer of my tower rooms to be swiped clean with the scraping wand. She’s also trained to scrape herself clean; when we come back from swimmies, I hold out her scraper and she’ll rub her body along it until I do her ears and finds and that’s her signal to go ahead inside.

She hangs out on my tailfins all evening making big impatient huffing noises until I go in the bedroom with her and sit up in bed doing whatever I’m doing so she can sleep by me. She loves pets and attention and scritches but she’s so shy; once she gets that physical affection and even the barest scrap of attention, she basically loses her mind. She rubs her entire face and head all over you while not quite knowing what to do with the rest of her six-hundred eighty kilogram self.

She loves chin scratches, especially on the black patches across her paws and fins and chest. She’ll pretend to be scary at men when they come into my rooms- there are male maids too, and until I reassure her they’re okay, she won’t stop being scary at them. She’s a good dog. Other dogs Love her because she’s so big and so sweet and so relaxed and it’s really fun to go swimmies with the best looking dog who’s also the nicest dog while everyone around you is all like “wow your dog is so cool”. Like, thank you so much, I made her from scratch.

The cutest thing about her is if you ask her “Who’s a good girl?!?” she seems genuinely concerned it might not be her, until you confirm such to be true.

Not only is Megalo a good girl, she’s the best girl.

Megalo!
Lurp lurp lurp!
Megalo, stop licking me, your tongue is too rough!

Lurp lurp lurp NUZZLE!
Hahahaha! I love you too!

Мепмепмепмеп~
Oh, Megalo- your puppies… are you going to show them to me?

Boof.

Ah, really?

Мепмепмепwakwakwak!
Oh my god they’re adorable.
I’m crying again.

Lurp lurp lurp.
Hah, thank you Megalo. Hey, um- will you come with me for a swim?

Boof.

I thought so. Um- this time, it’s probably best if you leave your puppies here.

Wurf?
...I’m going to my mom’s grave, this time.

Boof!

Haha, thank you for the encouragement.

I’m doing it, this time. I won’t stop for anything.

“Oh my god, Zoro- we’re running a princess out of her own room!”

“She is very sheltered, so-”

“Zoro, no.”

“Ah. Alright.”

I push away, and shove myself back up, off the pillow. Zoro huffs and shakes his head, shoving his libido back down into wherever he keeps it when not in use. I tuck my kimono back in tight, and tug my obi back into place; my hair’s a loss, though, I can’t find most of the pins. Let me see- half up and back, I think.

Mm.

Zoro smiles at me with such joy, I can hardly stand it- I reach out, scruff his hair back into something resembling order, but it’s a lost cause- there are glimmering scales so small they look like dandruff, all smooshed into his hair and along his neck. The pillow we’re on is full of something a bit like feathers and a bit like scales, but the scales are tiny, and they’ve stuck to him everywhere.

They’re almost certainly stuck to me, too.

“We should follow her.”

“Nami, she doesn’t have the resolve to do anything-”

“Zoro, she’s sheltered, not a coward. Look- she’s taking her real Naginata, and she’s taking some kind of bag; she’s very… I would feel better about things if we followed her.”

“Alright. Fine. We’ll follow her.”

I smile at Zoro, who sighs, and smiles back. Then, we both turn, and leap- and catch onto the scruff of Megalo’s neck. One of her ears flicks back, but she senses our intentions, and without stopping-

We’re out the window of the tower, and gone from the palace grounds faster than I thought any animal could move. We go through the bubble, and a massive wall of air forms between Megalo’s skin and the water above us, making a place we can breathe.

I scoot over to where Zoro is resting against the dorsal ridge of fur, and nestle myself into his left side, where the swords aren’t. I make extra sure to rest the side of my pudge against his belly, like he likes.

Zoro pauses for a moment, and then wraps his arm around me. I sigh, and rest my head against his shoulder.

I’m only going to rest my eyes a moment-

Zoro and Nami ain’t come back. I got a feelin’ as to why, an’ so do Usopp and Mark. About damn time those two figured that out.

“Ah, Lu, are they ever coming back?” said Ace.

“Nah, probably not.” I said.
“Uh.” said Ace.

“They’re engaged; and they like each other like Mab and Sanji do.” I said.

“Ah.” said Ace.

“They’ll be back in th’mornin’, I reckon.” said Mark.

“Mm. Maybe around noon?” said Usopp.

“They’ll be back when they’re back; we can’t leave without either of them, so. An’ they got their phones; I ain’t worried.” I said.

Ace blinked, then smiled like he used to when he didn’t quite understand my reasoning. That’s fine; I didn’t always understand his. Hell, I still don’t.

Dunno why we’re still here, really; we ain’t allied with the Whitebeard’s formally, we’re just friends. Hmph.

Oh.

Somethin’s about to happen.

“SIRE-!”

“Lord Desterous, what is the meaning of-”

“Sire, Princess Shirahoshi has vanished! She’s not in her rooms, she’s not in any of the gardens- I have men searching the rest of the palace now, but- sir, she’s gone. ”

“Preposterous! She understands as much as the rest of us the danger she’s in- she wouldn’t just leave, and we’d have heard if she was taken-”

“Sir, I don’t doubt she would never have left under her own power, but… considering what almost happened with the Tamatebako… it may very well be that she didn’t leave under her own power.”

“Lord Desterous- Marlie, she would have screamed if someone had tried to take her, we would have noticed-”

“It only takes one moment, Coeurl. -Sir, I know you don’t want to do this, but you must use the Power of Neptune. It may be the only way for us to find her.”

“No! If I do that- if I release that power into the World once more- it could mean the destruction of our entire Kingdom! Of the World! I cannot-”

“...Robin?” I said, listening to the argument between the King of Fishman Island and… that guy I don’t like.

“Captain?” said Robin.
“What’s the power of Neptune?” I said.

The King and the Guy both freeze; so do a bunch of other people, but I don’t really care about them.

“Ah. Let me see if I remember...” said Robin.

Ace and Whitebeard glance at each other, and then sidle- as much as a person can sidle when we’re all sitting in... I think this is a smoking room? Dunno. Also, a man Whitebeard’s size doesn’t really sidle, he more... shuffles. Slides. Like a pile of rocks over the edge of a cliff.

Ace, of course, can sneak if he has to- but I’m better than he ever was. No one expects the ‘stupid’ one to be good at anything, after all.

Dunno what the big secret is, but- chances are, if Robin doesn’t, Mab will. Difference is... Robin knows secrets from the past. Mab knows secrets from right now.

It’s a mystery why Mab’s not an archaeologist, it really is.

“Ah, I remember now- I had wondered why it was in every gallery of the Ryugu Tombs, but if it’s as important as I think it is, it stands to reason that it would be repeated, in every room...” said Robin.

“Robin?” I say.

“As with all things that get remembered with such fervor, it has to do with how the females of the Royal House of the Sea tend to die.

“Considering the facts of the matter, which are publicized- as nobility is ever concerned with matters of the Line- the ruling house of Neptune is actually split in two. King Triton, who conquered this island during the Age of Heroes, took from his conquered people's two wives. Maria, of the Merrow; and Jillian, of the Kappa. These are usually represented as the Left and Right house goddesses in modern times- in the ancient days, it was thought that the two queens personally protected each household of the kingdom, you see.

“Triton, Maria, and Jillian had seven daughters: Aquata, Andrina, Arista, Atina, Adella, Allana- and the youngest, Ariel. Ariel fled the Sea, and her Fate is thus unknown to the scholars of the Sea; there are tales of what became of her, and it is not known how much of those tales are true. Certainly, the Fae maintain that their most beloved goddess-queen, Aryell, came from the Sea; and it was during the Age of Heroes that the Fae fled from their ancient island home to the Sky, from which they did not return.

“But that’s not really important right now. What you asked about was Neptune; and so I shall tell you as best I can. Maria and Jillian each had three favored daughters- Ariel was a favorite of her father, which it may be surmised is why she left. When King Triton died, Maria and Jillian tore the Kingdom apart- because, you see, a marriage to a conquering hero was not enough to absolve the deep enmity they held for each other. Thus, there came to pass the Great War of the Sea, which turned brother against brother and sundered the world, for a time.
“During that War, the Ryugu brothers- Mer, and Gyo- eventually came to an agreement, and united their houses into one, called Neptune. It was these two brothers who founded this Kingdom in it’s current incarnation- that’s why it’s called Ryugu Mergyo.

“The uniting of the Ryugu houses into House Neptune was a matter of marriage, as it always ends up being; thus it was that Pleione, the sailor’s goddess, married Mer and Gyo. Pleione, who begat Atlas; Atlas, who begat Calypso.

“It was Calypso who first woke Leviathan. During her great battle with the Pirate Court, of which only the King remains, when she tore the Sea asunder and did her best to kill those who had wronged her so… she dug too deeply, and woke something from the Age of Beginnings.

“No one knows it’s true name for sure; perhaps it had different names, in elder days. What I can say with certainty, is that the history of House Neptune is the history of Leviathan. They are intertwined, their Fates bound together in ways that cannot be explained as anything other than destiny.

“Leviathan- as it is known now- is, above all things, Evil. It is one of the very First Evils to ever exist; along with it’s… siblings? Splittings? The script wasn’t entirely clear, and that particular language was never my area of study. However, Leviathan is matched by two other ancient forces- Behemoth, who roams the Land; and Ziz, who rules the Sky. Thus, into each portion of the World, a pair of Houses rose- for the Sea, those houses were Mer and Gyo, which became Neptune, which you see here now.

“Of the Firsts, I can say this- when the World was begun, and all the Evils of the world scattered into it, three portions of Evil rose to match the three Great Goddesses that had made the World. Thus, it is known that each Great Evil is a foul reflection of those great goodnesses; Behemoth, who incites Weakness; Ziz, who incites Cowardice; and Leviathan, who incites Ignorance. It is the sacred, ancient duty of every paired House of the Three Kingdoms to destroy, pacify, and erode the works of these evils, wherever they may lurk.

“The Goddess, Hylia, who made Time; it is said that she is the cruelest and most merciful of the ancient ones who begat the World. It was Hylia who gifted- or cursed- the people of the Sea with the power to speak with the creatures of the Sea. And so, as each Great Evil was loosed into the World- so too was the power to hear their cries, and understand their vitriol, and work to pull the poison of their presence away from those who would succumb to it.

“In the people of the Sea, the power to defeat Leviathan is called Poseidon. This power is not without it’s price, as no power is; for, though every member of this Kingdom can, by this time, at need- defeat Leviathan… The price is almost always the life of that person, or the lives of those they would protect.

“The walls of the tomb were stark, and plain; there are always two people who arise, when Leviathan comes. Leviathan always comes- and the two who arise are the Hero, and the Blood. The hero is a warrior, always, one born with an absolutely unbreakable spirit. The Blood is one who has power, generally passed down through the blood of the Sea Goddess, Calypso; usually the kind of power that allows the Hero to face Leviathan without much in the way. However, if the soul of the warrior is called without cause, or the blood of the Sea is woken without true need; when Leviathan comes- and Leviathan always comes- the Hero and the Blood will not be there to face it.

“With the passage of each Age, the great wars between the Hero, the Blood, and the Leviathan have been turned into legends. Here, then, is the ‘legend’ that once came to pass, ten-thousand years ago.

“Ryugu Mergyo was then blooming, as a highly advanced civilization. Even the most dreadful- fell-powerful- of monsters posed little threat to the Real... utilize their magic technology, mastery over the forces of the universe, to ensure the safety of the Land, should Poseidon ever slip beyond the control of the Realm.

“They, in unity, alliance, agreement, trade for honor, with the Fae, constructed four mechanical wonders that came to be known as the Great Divine Beasts. Entombed, enshrined, piloting each Beast was an individual of the World, of all corners of the World, who possessed exceptional skill, power, expertise, vigour, charisma, skill; thus, was the plan to neutralize the threat of Leviathan formed.

“Also built were a legion of autonomous soldiers, who could not drown and would not wither with age, called Automatons. The first of these, and in time, the generals of these great armies, was Galatea, the Sleeping Love; the second was Euanthe, the Blossoming Goodness; the third was Thalia, the Cheerful; the fourth was Euphrosyne, the Mirthful; the fifth was Aglaea, the Splendid; the sixth was Kleta, the Glorious; the seventh was Auxo, the Grower; the eighth was Hegemone, the Bearer, fruitbearer; the ninth was Peitho, the Seducer; the tenth was Phaenna, the Bright; the eleventh was Pasithea, the Relaxing; the twelfth was Charis, the Grace; and the thirteenth, and last, was Kale, the Beauty.

“Upon Leviathan’s inevitable return, it’s control over all the waters of the World, and the great sundering of the Land, the Hero, the Blood, the Great Divine Beasts, and the Thirteen Armies fought together to defeat this great calamitous evil. The Automatons were tasked with protecting the Hero, as the Great Divine Beasts unleashed terrible attacks of dreadful power on their ancient foe. When the Hero, wielding the Sword that Defeats All Evil, the Blade of Evil’s Bane, delivered the final blow, the Blood used the ancient magic to seal away the Calamitous Evil, the Great Leviathan.

“People more or less assume that the Ryugu are the ones who are descended from Calypso actually, every living Sea Folk, partial or otherwise, is descended from Calypso. If you’ve got fins, gills, or scales, you bear the ancient blood. No, House Neptune throws heroes; a hero for every age.

“The last great Hero was called Otohime.”

I look over at Robin, because I still don’t understand much of anything. I guess Mark and Usopp do, because Mark is sittin’ bolt upright and Usopp’s got all his body tensed tight. Whitebeard is wideyed, and if Ace’s jaw goes any tighter he’s gonna crack one a his molars again.

“So, in a sentence or two, Robin?” I said.

“Hm. If King Neptune uses his power of Poseidon without being absolutely sure of needing it, he will wake Leviathan. As far as I know, there is no Blood of the Realm that stands ready to defend the World; nor is there a Hero, to do battle. If he uses Poseidon and wakes Leviathan, the entire island will be destroyed, and his daughter will surely perish.” said Robin.

“If he doesn’t use the power to find his daughter, a terrible fate may be hers to bear.” said Usopp.

“The King is old; he needs to know where his children are, simply because at any time, he could die. It would then be their responsibility, th’ protection of the Realm, an’all.” said Mark.

“Ah. Shit.” I said.

“Quite.” said Robin.
“We can’t leave; the coating on Sunny broke when we came here. And we can’t do nothing, either, because that’s not the kind of people we are. Oi, Sinister?” I said.

“-Eh-?” Sinister said.

“-Yeah, you. A friend of mine in Coral Hills told me that you had a message for me, from Jinbei, my other friend. Hand it over, would ya?” I said.

The Sinister guy blinked, and did a funny thing with his hands- that weird pendant thing that Robin came back with, he had it in his hand. Then, he stuck it in a pocket on his belt and pulled out a note.

He handed it to me. I nodded to him, and pulled out my readin’ glasses- and then I read what Jinbe had to say to me.

’ Do not fight Hody Jones. I’ll be waiting in the Sea Forest until Beltane. -Jinbe ’

Hm.

It’s about to start.

Then, before I can make a decision with all th’ facts an’ figures- a crash resounds through the air. It sounds something like…

When me ‘n Sanji had to take Nami up the mountain in Drum Kingdom, we crossed up a cliff or somethin’ like that and had to head back down, across a fall line. At the shear point, the entire slope began to move under us.

I don’t remember the next few moments; but I remember the noise. I remember catching Nami in my arms and leaping from rolling stone to broken tree-trunk; I remember watching Sanji get ragdolled down under the stones and the snow and the ice.

That’s what it sounded like, just now.

Here comes a- hm. I see.

It’s starting.

“Sir! Hard Shell Tower has Fallen!” said a breathless soldier; he obviously ran all the way here.

“Sir- sir, what would you have me do?” said the Guy.

“...Is it Hody and his bunch, then? Soldier-?” said the Soldier.

“Yessir! Hody Jones was spotted just before Hard Shell Tower fell; riflemen couldn’t bring him down in time.” said the Soldier.
“...Hmph. Edward, can your boys and girls handle whatever’s been left back to harass my Realm?” said the King.

“Of course, Coeurl. Ace, call Marco-” said Whitebeard.

“Straw Hat.” said the King.

“Yeah?” I said.

“Please find my daughter. She’s one of my four dearest treasures, and I would see to her safety before all else. However, I cannot; and so, I ask of you-” said the King.

Man, nobles sure do talk a lot.

“Yeah, sure; I’ll find her. Robin, Usopp, Bryony- stay here, defend the castle. Mark- let’s go find us a princess.” I said.

“Of course, Captain.” said Robin.

“Sure, Captain,” said Usopp, already stringing his bow and checking his arrow pouch.

“Here’s your phone's; call us when you find her.” said Bryony, tossing me an’ Mark our phones before handing out the last of them to Robin and Usopp.

“Yah, let’s go.” said Mark, tucking his hat back on his head and tossing his long red hair out and back.

My crew’s pretty much the best.

My patient’s surgery went much better than expected; there were no surprises, and I was able to use minimally invasive techniques to remove the damaged organ. Her vitals have already improved much closer to optimum levels for someone her size, weight, and tribe. The only thing left to do is remove her transfusion.

Although it’s no longer necessary, the vitality of Sanji’s blood is incredibly potent, particularly for it’s blood-vessel repairing properties. Therefore, until her vitals have completely recovered to a natural equilibrium, I will be leaving her transfusion as is.

Frankly, due to the incredible vitality of Sanji’s blood, I expect her recovery time to be reduced by a full five days or so, making her total recovery period something closer to nine days, rather than fourteen. Considering her obvious musculature, and the pattern of bruising and scar tissue across her body, my patient is a warrior of some skill. I’d rate her physical skill somewhere around mine, two years ago.

I am marking this patient as female simply because, until puberty actually occurs, there is no way to tell if a Seafolk with internal presenting genitalia is female or male. Thus, for recording purposes, until such a time as the Seafolk in question actually says for themselves what their gender is, or there are external cues that are more easily assigned to one or the other gender, the individual must be marked as female.

Sanji’s blood smells odd. When we smell blood, it’s not actually the blood we’re smelling. Technically, we’re smelling the reaction of the iron in our blood on our skin; and it’s our skin that produces the characteristic ‘blood’ odor.

According to an extract from a published study from The Lancet, a medical journal I read, six test subjects immediately recognized the ‘musty’ metallic odor when their hands came into contact with metallic iron, or a solution containing iron ions with a twofold positive charge. In contrast, solutions of iron with a triple negative charge did not cause the odor.

Gas samples were taken from each subject’s skin, revealing a bouquet of different organic compounds that seemed to form, in totality, the metallic smell of blood.

The key component is called 1-octen-2-one, which smells fungal-metallic even when highly diluted. The precursors to the order molecules are lipid peroxides, which are produced when oils on skin are oxidized by certain enzymes or other processes (e.g. under UV light). These lipid peroxides are then decomposed by the doubly negative iron ions, which are consequently reduced to triply negative iron ions. When touching objects made of iron, the required doubly negative ions are formed when perspiration on the skin corrodes the iron.

Rubbing blood over skin results in a similar metallic smell based on the same scent molecules. Blood also contains iron atoms. That humans can ‘smell’ iron, can therefore be interpreted as a sense for the smell of blood. Early humans were thus probably able to track down wounded prey or tribe members by following the scent of their blood.

Which, I think, explains my concern over Sanji’s strange blood smell. It’s not a strong smell, and it doesn’t register to me as anything poisonous, or otherwise dangerous. It’s just… odd. I’ll ask him if I can study a sample of his blood, to figure out why it smells so strange...

Sanji, during the course of this surgery, gave more than twice his total volume of blood. He also ate more than six times his average volume for a meal. I’ve removed his transfusion line, and have him resting on the bed next to the patient- it’s for her benefit, as having a warm body next to her is having a serious positive effect on the equilibrium of her vitals. It’s also for Sanji’s sake- although he didn’t actually do anything terribly strenuous, losing that much blood is a strain, even for someone with strong Demon-blood.

Honestly, I’m only giving him this sedative to ensure he stays in bed; knowing him, at the first sign of trouble, he’d leap into action. Which would be stupid. And, of course, it’s as soon as he’s deeply unconscious that a woman screams, because that is my life.

All it does is raise his heart-rate a little bit; he doesn’t actually wake up.

As Taffy and Gurry let out battle cries and start fighting someone, I take the time to clean up all the spilled blood, throw out used needles into the biohazard trashbin, wash my hands, and remove my surgical costume. When Gurry is slammed back into the wall by a wave of nasty swamp water, I decide to get involved.

“Oi, you bastards- this is a sanitary medical room. Take it the fuck outside.” I snarl.

“Aye, Doctor!” yelps Taffy, before letting loose a simply bloodcurdling battle cry and-

“IF YOU DON’T LET ME GO, I SWEAR TO GOD, I’LL KILL THE MERMAIDS-!” shouts—oh yeah, that guy we had in the barrel. Shit-! I forgot about the guy in the barrel, shit shit shit-

Gurry spits out a mouthful of blood into the biohazard trash, then snaps open one of his war fans and glares over the edge of it. Taffy rolls to a stop, and stands, Kusanagi bared sharp and green and ready to strike him down.

I roll my neck, and crack all the knuckles on my left hand.

“DO YOU THINK I’M FUCKING KIDDING? I’LL SLASH HER THROAT, RIGHT HERE AND NOW IF YOU DON’T BACK OFF-!” shouts the Barrel guy, eyes wild with fear.

On the bed, Sanji’s brow furrows; I can see it from the corner of my eye.

Taffy glares and her eyes blaze gold and furious. Gurry settles into his most balanced stance; his other war fan click-click-clicks open, his vicious poisons glimmering eerily on the metal. I crack all the knuckles on my right hand.

Barrel guy pulls out a switchblade and holds it to the pale, fluttering throat of what has to be one of the mermaids who were working on the other side of the San while we were doing surgery. My eyes narrow.

The room heats to almost unbearable levels, and I glance at the bed and see—Sanji, lying on the bed, the patient snuggled into his side. His eyes burn with a strange baleful fire, and his horns have never looked darker and more sharp.

“I’m going to tell you something once, and then if you die it’s strictly your choice,” Sanji said, lying pleasantly on the bed with the girl curled up against his stomach. “What I’m going to tell you is this: drop your knife and let the mermaids go, and if you do, then I won’t kick seven kinds of shit out of you—” his lip curled with fury—“and you can go back in the barrel, and we’ll leave you to the mercy of the Merjin and Gyojin who call this establishment theirs. And if you choose to fight, well, then you will not escape this place alive.”

“Y-you’re only alive right now because y-you’re on that bed; you don’t even have the strength to stand, much less fight! A-and even if you did, you couldn’t possibly kick seven kinds of anything out of me without hurting these lovely mermaids!” sneered the barrel guy.
Sanji murmured something to the patient, never taking his eyes off the barrel guy. I was close enough to hear him vocalize- but he didn’t actually move his face or mouth, so the Barrel Guy didn’t notice.

“Really?” said Sanji, smiling in a distinctly predatory way, “It well may be that I don’t have the strength to stand and fight. It may be, you worthless dog, that you’ve out-manuvered us and can leave this place with your ugly prizes-” and here, hah, here Sanji swung his legs off the bed, and sat up in one fluidly elegant motion; “-and it may very well be that I not only have the strength to stand, but the strength to do all I have said I would do, and far, far more. So, you degenerate wastrel, you puking shit, you worthless son of a dog and a whore: cease your barking, spit the mermaids out, and drop your knife,” and then Sanji stood.

He stood straight and tall and menacing, and walked- one, two, three- steps forwards, towards the Barrel Guy. The aura of palpable bloodlust surrounding him reminded me of Zoro at his most battle-hungry.

The knife clattered to the floor. The mermaids followed soon after.

A dark patch grew on the man’s crotch; Sanji really is a monster, after all.

“Get in the barrel,” Sanji said, with narrowed eyes.

The barrel man got back into the barrel. Sanji stalked over and slammed the lid back on with a single stomp of his foot.

“If one of you could make sure this barrel is securely shut, I’d be much obliged,” said Sanji, his face grey with strain.

Goddamnit, Sanji-

When I step out onto the balcony, it’s to the view of several hundred terrified looking fishmen, all of them scrabbling through the rubble of the fallen tower. I grew bold, over the Separation; and I might not ever get to say something like this again.

“Oi! Hate to break it to you, but- the princess isn’t here. She’s probably in another castle entirely. Although… are you really sure she existed at all?” I call out to them, my voice cutting through the sounds of panic and shifting stone.

The scrambling fishmen falter, then stare up at me in horror. I have a handful of arrows ready to go, and I’ve twisted my ring into place on my thumb. However, Robin said she wanted to take out the first wave.

The burn she got earlier has been bothering her all night, and I think she wants to test and see just how much damage she can do- but I don’t like the way she looks. She’s pale, not quite like milk but pale, under her olive-brown skin. A thin sheen of sweat has only gotten more shiny, and she’s holding her arm oddly. Chopper said he’d take a look at her arm after dinner, but… that didn’t happen.

Well. We’ll see how things go.

The ragged bunch of fishmen seem to elect from amongst themselves a spokesman- or maybe bully a spokesman into place is the right way to explain what I just saw. Now- I’d spend a moment sizing him up, but, I know my friend Robin. She’s not the kind of woman who leaves things to chance; as Mab would say, she doesn’t like loose ends.

Robin’s the kind of person to nip a problem in the bud.

“IF WE DON’T FIND IT, WE’LL ALL DIE!”

“SHOW SOME SYMPATHY, DAMMIT!”

Robin, standing next to me, giggles, and crosses her arms so her wrists are over her shoulders. Oh boy, here we go.

“You boys want some sympathy? It’s in the dictionary, right between ‘shit’ and ‘syphilis’. As for all of you dying… well. You’re going to die anyway. Best not drag it out, I think- Cien pètals: Cluth.

And hundreds of men fall to broken necks.

Robin doesn’t fuck around.

One or two still struggle to stand- and those, I take down with quick headshots. Barely a workout, honestly. I don’t think I really needed the battle stripes- although the hair band that turns into a hat is too helpful to not use, frankly.

Now if only my knees would stop jittering...
Ah fuck. I just broke the scab- shit, that’s exactly what I was afraid of.

“Bryony, it’s bleeding.”

“-Fuck, okay. You’re on comms then, Robin; I’ll take your place on the front-”

“-Neh, Bry, are you sure? You really don’t-”

“Robin’s already hurt herself, Captain. I’m sure. --Usopp, I won’t be able to leave the comms until Robin physically takes my place. Can you handle it by yourself?”

“I’ll have to, I think. Robin, go- you’re bleeding through your bandaging, so. No arguments- go take Bry’s place. I can handle it.”

“...Okay. Ow-”

I will think now, a little, on the magic of horses. There are two great ones who came before me, who were as skilled in the horse magic. Epona, of the Orcish Gauls, was the first one I will think on.

Epona was a Goddess of Horses, who the Orcish Gauls- who became the French- deified during the Age of Heroes. She was also one of the only Orcish deities ever deified by the Fae; there’s still an annual festival on the 18th of December, which celebrates horses.

My people, the Djinn, love horses. Every god and goddess who has ever protected or celebrated horses; my people pray to, and love as well.

So the legend goes, Epona was born to a white mare; and some say she was a mare herself, as white and fine as her mother before her. Others say that no, she was a woman of golden skin and night-black hair; and still more say she could change her form at will, from woman to mare and back again.

Her magic, which was wrought on the World so long ago, is now settled into the bones of every living horse there is- most particularly the skull. There is a story of a bard who was banished from the Kingdom of Germa by King Eirek and Queen Gunhilda. As revenge, the bard created a nithing - post, designed to put a curse upon an enemy. He placed a stake in the ground, stuck a horse’s head on the stake, and turned it to face into the kingdom, sending his curse at the King and Queen.

That’s a very old, very weak sort of curse- I say weak because even the slightest misstep during the casting process, and the curse falls flat. Mab’s right, honestly- the best curses are the ones you can only mess up by being not up to the task of cursing someone at all.
In the lore of the Cherubim, Rhiannon is a horse goddess from the Mabinogion. She’s similar to the Orcish Epona; but in truth she was a chief, and later a goddess of sovereignty who protected the Line of chiefs from harm. Rhiannon was married to Pwyll, the Lord of Dyfed. When Pwyll first saw her, she appeared as a golden goddess upon a magnificent white horse. Rhiannon managed to outrun Pwyll for three days, and then allowed him to catch up, at which point she told him she’d be happy to marry him, because it would keep her from marrying Gwawl, who had tricked her into an engagement.

Rhiannon and Pwyll conspired together to fool Gwawl in return, and thus Pwyll won her as his bride. Most of the conspiring was likely Rhiannon’s, as Pwyll didn’t appear to be the cleverest of men. In the Mabinogion, Rhiannon says of her husband, "Never was there a man who made feebler use of his wits." After Pwyll's death, Rhiannon married Manawyden.

The goddess' name, Rhiannon, derives from a Proto-Faesh root which means "great queen," and by taking a man as her spouse, she grants him sovereignty as king of the land. In addition, Rhiannon possesses a set of magical birds, who can soothe the living into a deep slumber, or wake the dead from their eternal sleep.

Her story features prominently in the Fleetwood Mac hit, although songwriter Stevie Nicks says she didn't know it at the time. Later, Nicks said she "was struck by the story's emotional resonance with that of her song: the goddess, or possibly witch, given her ability with spells, was impossible to catch by horse and was also closely identified with birds -- especially significant since the song claims she "takes to the sky like a bird in flight," "rules her life like a fine skylark," and is ultimately "taken by the wind."

Primarily, though, Rhiannon is associated with the horse, which appears prominently in much of Cherubic and Syreene mythology. Many parts of the Faesh world -- Gaul in particular -- used horses in warfare, and so it is no surprise that these animals turn up in the myths and legends of Floria and Cherrim.

Scholars have learned that horse racing was a popular sport, especially at fairs and gatherings, and for centuries Fiddler’s Green has been known as the center of horse breeding and training.

Judith Shaw, at Feminism and Religion, says, "Rhiannon, reminding us of our own divinity, helps us to identify with our sovereign wholeness. She enables us to cast out the role of victim from our lives forever. Her presence calls us to practice patience and forgiveness. She lights our way to the ability to transcend injustice and maintain compassion for our accusers."

Symbols and items that are sacred to Rhiannon in modern religious practice include horses and horseshoes, the moon, birds, and the wind itself.

I want to learn in my bones how a centaur can be less myth than dream- where I have spurs at my ears for jewels, my hair and the horse’s tail streaking behind in a slipstream of our own furious making.

Epona! Make our horses strong and fast!

Rhiannon! Let us outrace the very wind!

For wrath, and ruin, and the Romance Dawn!
...I’ve been reading maybe too many romance-pulpies.

We ride for the Sea Forest, a massive tangle of Wild Country; both of us dressed like banditos. We won’t stop for nothing- not water, not battle, not anything. Because- well. Luffy felt it as well as I did.

Zoro and Nami went off with someone, and a dog. And lo and behold- who is it exactly that comes missin’ not five minutes later? Mhm.

So.

We’re going- thataway - towards Nami and Zoro and someone and a dog and the sign says the road we’re on is heading towards the Sea Forest.

Something’s gonna happen tonight. We’re already heading towards the middle of it, here and now.

Damn, I thought they got me for good. I’m somewhere warm and firm and safe- probably a pile of my sisters, that makes the most sense; nothing else is this warm.

Shitty assholes; if they wanted to actually defeat Addy, they should spend more time training and less time beatin’ on the rest of us. Fuckers.

There’s a really big hand on my stomach, this isn’t my sister pile at all. I’ve not yet blossomed, but this hand is far too big for Mother’s hand, and she doesn’t smell like this.

I carefully take the hand in mine.

It’s big, much bigger than mine; with long fingers and old cut-scars healed over. Mine are still bruised, a little, and covered in scars that haven’t healed all the way yet- no burns, Mrs. Seedle won’t let me near the stove until I can cut and chop and prep to her satisfaction, and she will never be satisfied with me. For all the wrong reasons, Addy said, and she’d know that best… The fingertips are flat, and almost… hard, maybe? But the pads are still soft, and so are the edges. The side of the index finger is corrugated, like a tin roof. The ball of the thumb is rough like sharkskin when you stroke it sideways; it feels like lots and lots of little cuts that didn’t draw blood.

And- there’s a callus, right at the base of his index finger, and… it’s like mine! I think- I think he’s a cook!

Gods and goddesses, but I want to be a cook- not the, the fucking garbage boy but an actual cook. It’s been… I’m fourteen, all of us are, and I started… god, five years ago, at Mrs. Seedle’s kitchen. Five years since I walked into the Dreadbelly kitchen in Gobdark with my hair below my shoulders, no idea what I was getting into, a letter of recommendation from Mom’s Madame, and a marginal desire to maybe do a little work in return for money. I came for the money, really; I stayed because I couldn’t do anything else. I had to learn- more. I had to see them.

The cooks.

How much longer can I stay with people who don’t care about me?

I don’t know.

I love it, is the thing.

I love reducing stock for hours and hours, my legs going numb on a stepstool because I’m still just a bit too short to stir the big pot; skimming scum off the top and moving to a smaller pot, a smaller pot, hours and hours of work. I love chopping carrots, peeling potatoes, mincing herbs, grinding spices; taking the seeds and veins out of peppers so hot the snot runs down from my eyes, not just my nose. I love making breakfast for my sisters, every day; simmering a pot of water and thrashing the eggs into a yellow-orange fluid, stirring the vortex and cooking them there- so I don’t have a pot to scrub, and the eggs cook so quickly, and I adore scooping up just the right amount of clarified butter with my favorite spoon and pouring it over the eggs in the bowl. I love the look on Mrs. Seedles face when I make Confit Byaldi- the look of sheer delight as she takes the little cuboid pile of perfectly sliced vegetables, the swirled red sauce looking and smelling just right, the tiny green stalk of chive just right, just the way it should be. It’s a gaze of wonderment: it’s the same look I get when I approach a plate of perfect sausages.

I love that look, too- that look you see on small children’s faces when their p-parents take them into deep water, like, at the beach? It’s always a beautiful thing. For just a moment, a second, the pinched misery of the cynical, World-wary, throat cutting and blood drinking bastards we’ve all become disappears when we’re confronted with something as simple as a plate of food. When we’re invited to eat that food- and the food is good - I think that, above all else, is as close to heaven as anyone could ever hope for.

When I stretch a little, there’s a deep ache right in the left of my chest. That asshole, Jinnou, was kicking me in the gut again; I think he broke something. Fucking ow. Gods wounds, but I ache- I’m too tired to care who I’m in bed with, just that they won’t make me move. Thankfully- whoever I’m abed with… they’re definitely a man, and a cook or a chef at that, but they aren’t… doing anything. I think he’s asleep, honestly.

Saa- I saw a sign the other day for one of those Longarm-Fishman fusion whatevers that are popping up around Coral Hills, advertising ‘Discount Sushi’. I can’t imagine a better fucking example of What Not To Eat than fucking bargain sushi.

I don’t eat meat on Moonsdays, unless I’m eating at a three-star kitchen where I know they’re buying their fish directly from the docks- or if I’ve got it m’self, or maybe one of my sisters got it. I know how old most meat is on Moonsday- four or five fucking days old! And I don’t fucking eat mussels in restaurants unless I know the cooks, or have seen with my own two eyes, how they store and hold their mussels for service.

I fucking love mussels. They’re delicious, cooked right.

Most cooks are less than scrupulous in their handling of them. It only takes one bad mussel to ruin your entire day.
Brunch menus are open season to the cost-cutting chef, the dumping grounds for the odd bits left over from Frogday and Saturday. Hollandaise sauce? Not if I haven’t made it fresh or watched the cook make it. Miasma loves hollandaise, and no one ever makes it to order.

How long has that bacon been festering in the walk-in? Remember, brunch is only served once a week, on the weekends. Cooks, chefs- and ploungers, like me, hate brunch. Brunch is punishment block for the B-side cooks, or where the Baby-cooks learn the ropes.

I don’t eat in a restaurant with filthy bathrooms. Not a hard call to make- I mean, they let you see the fucking bathrooms. If the restaurant can’t be assed to keep their toilets white and clean looking, or keep the sprayer working, or keep the floors clean- or all of the above; then, honestly, can you imagine what their refrigeration and work spaces look like? Nasty, that’s what.

Beef parmentier? Shepherd’s pie? Chilli special? Sounds like leftovers to me.

Swordfish? Ugh. No; I’ve seen too many of those meter-long parasitic worms that riddle the fish flesh. No swordfish.

'Saving for well-done' is a time-honoured tradition dating back to cuisine's earliest days. What happens when the chef finds a tough, slightly skanky end-cut of sirloin that's been pushed repeatedly to the back of the pile? He can throw it out, but that's a total loss. He can feed it to the family, which is the same as throwing it out. Or he can 'save for well-done': serve it to some rube who prefers his meat or fish incinerated into a flavourless, leathery hunk of carbon.

Vegetarians, and their Hezbollah-like splinter-faction, the vegans, are a persistent irritant to any chef worth a damn. To me, life without veal stock, pork fat, sausage, organ meat, demi-glace or even stinky cheese is a life not worth living. Vegetarians are an affront to all I stand for, the pure enjoyment of food. Oh, I'll accommodate them, I'll rummage around for something to feed them. Fourteen dollars for a few slices of grilled eggplant (aubergine) and zucchini (courgette) suits my food cost fine.

I have one knife, and it is, by the Gods, a fine chef’s knife. One! One good chef’s knife, comfortable to my hand; and nevermind that it was actually meant for a Tallfolk of some kind. I use the tip for small stuff, and go up the knife for larger- and I haven’t actually ever had to use it all the way up to the heel, but I will one day. Sea Kings are edible, right?

I also have a bunch of simple plastic squeeze bottles, like at the okonomiyaki stands for all the sauces.

I want a mandolin so badly- can’t make anything gaufrette or do dauphinois potatoes without one, not fast, anyway. I mean- I can do it with my knife, but it’d be faster with a mandolin.

I also have one very nice cast iron pan- there’s a leaf of copper in the bottom, to help conduct heat better, and… god, it’s wonderful. I fucking love it- and the interior is enamel, to make it easier to clean.

The stuff I try to have at home, all the time? Shallots, which are essential for sauces, dressings, and sautés; butter, because they sauté in a mix of butter and oil in professional kitchen; they finish nearly every sauce with it, too. That’s why restaurant food tastes so much better. Oh, yeah- Margarine? Not actually food.
Garlic is divine. Misuse of garlic is a crime. Old garlic, burnt garlic, garlic cut too long ago, garlic that has been smashed through one of those abominations, the garlic press, are all disgusting. Sliver it for pasta. Smash it with the flat of your knife blade. Roast garlic. It gets mellow and sweeter if you roast it whole, to be squeezed out later when it's soft and brown.

Restaurants garnish their food. Why shouldn't I? Dip the sprigs of parsley in cold water, shake off excess, allow to dry for a few minutes, and slice the stuff, as thinly as I can manage. Lovely!

Stock is the backbone of good cooking. Roast some bones, roast some vegetables, put them in a big pot with water and reduce, reduce, reduce. Make a lot, and freeze it in small containers.

Demi-glace? Simply take your reduced meat stock, add some red wine, toss in some shallots and fresh thyme and a bayleaf and peppercorns, and slowly, slowly simmer it and reduce it again until it coats a spoon. Strain. Freeze this stuff in an ice-cube tray, pop out a cube or two as needed, and you can rule the world.

Fresh herbs? A nice sprig of chervil on your chicken breast? A basil top decorating your pasta? A few artfully scattered chive sticks over your fish? A mint top nestled in a dollop of whipped cream, maybe rubbing up against a single raspberry? Come on! Get in the game!

Good food is often simple food. Some of the best cuisine in the world - whole roasted fish, Gyoverly-style, for instance - is a matter of three or four ingredients. Just make sure they're good ingredients, fresh ingredients, and then garnish them.

He’s not asleep. I ache, but that’s never stopped me before; open your eyes, Deborah. I slowly peel my eyes open, and glance around carefully. Oh, I see- I’m in the San of the Post Office. Been awhile since I was last here- they finally finished the ceiling.

I roll my head over, and am immediately confronted with a broad chest behind… a fancy shirt? Clavicles- horns! A Demon!

Wait, wait, it's not- he’s not next to me because of sexing, he can’t be. Demons are famous for only liking adults, it’s one of their big… Things, like Gyojin having external gills and Merjin having fishtails- or fishlegs, in my case. And yes, there are people who think that because I’m an octopus-type merjin, I’m not actually a ‘real’ merjin, somehow. But like- I’ve never heard any story, from anyone, about a Demon of any kind going after a kid for sex.

But I don’t know why I’m in bed with him, though- although, I guess this is the Sanitary, and… this particular San is notorious for being out of things like warming blankets… Maybe that’s why he’s here?

The demon’s watching me look at him. He blinks at me, placidly- and then there’s a clattering sound, and a lot of yelling. He looks at what’s going on, and I feel- warmer, like there’s nowhere safer for me to be.

“Stay exactly as you are, Shrimp. I’ve got to handle some shit.”
I blink up at him, but do as he says; it’s the first time anyone’s ever called me… anything close to that. As far as nicknames go, ‘Shrimp’ is actually kinda sweet. I like shrimp; and some of them punch really fucking hard, so.

I ache, and I’m still so tired- I tilt my head over some more and nuzzle into the warm spot the Demon Man left. It smells like… food? Pasta with squid, I think, and the faint smell of woodsmoke maybe, and butter, too, melted into meat.

There’s the sound of a knife clattering to the ground, and then a thump, but the dark of my eyes is so-comfortable-

I wake up again because the Demon Cook is curled up around me again. He’s really- warm. He’s really really warm.

My stomach yowls. I’m really hungry- thirsty, too.

The Demon Cook says something, to someone, and gets some kind of reply- and then he very carefully helps me sit up some. He tucks pillows under me, and when the tray is rolled over… how sick was I?

“-hhhah-”

“Don’t try to talk yet, Shrimp. Have some ice chips first.”

“…”

Ice chips do not quench one’s thirst at all.

“Sorry- I know. -Oi, if any of you can find a small tea pot, that’d be perfect-”

“-I’ll go check, Mr. Sanji-” said… Ginny?

“-Shrimp, have some more ice.” said Demon Cook.

I have some more ice. It doesn’t help at all, though- my throat still feels like it’s full of snot, and my mouth still tastes like something badly cooked rolled over and died under my tongue. All the ice chips do is sort of water down the horrible flavor, a pit like pissing on a dumpster fire only slightly dampens the flames.

Then the Demon Cook puts the spout of a small teapot to my lips, and I open my mouth- and then, sweet blessed relief! Cool water! I swallow the thin trickle greedily.

My throat’s cleared up, somehow- and I can finally speak.
“Where in the fuck is my knife?”

Those are the first words that come out of my mouth. Great. Glad I’ve got my priorities straight.

“-um-” said the Demon Cook.

“-Fern’s gonna go back with Ellie and Miss Mab to get all of our things- including your cooking knife, Deb.” said Genny, my sister- the nurse. Right.

“Cool. Who’s Miss Mab?” I said.

“Our crew officer; we’ve joined a pirate crew.” said Genny.

“Have we?” I said.

“Indeed, we have.” said Genny

“Out standing. Who’s the Demon Cook next to me?” I said.

“That’s Mister Sanji, the crew cook.” said Genny.

“Ah. -You’re the cook?” I said.

“I am.” he said.

“Will you teach me to cook?” I said.

“...Yeah, sure. If you want to learn, I’ll teach you everything I can.” he said, a little- oddly? Like there was something in his throat, his voice got all thick for a moment there.

“Fuckin’ righteous.” I said.

“Have some soup.” he said.

“Okay.” I said.

And then I ate the soup. Mm. Rice.

I’m staunching a man’s wounds before I realize I’ve run out of the shrug. It’s Hachi- there’s a spear through his left side, and with how he’s colored- not good- that’s at least one kidney gone. He’s also been shot, there are pockmarks indicative of-“Ginny, go get Chopper- the doctor, right now; run, Ginny.”

“-Y-yes Ma’am!” yelps Genevieve, before turning away from where she was going- she was going to the shrug, she must have just come from checking on Deborah- before running back to the San.

“They’re c-coming-” rasps Hachi.

“Save your strength-”

“-the attack here is a distraction; they’re going to hurt the princess. Listen to me!” wheezes Hachi.

“I’m listening, Uncle,” gasps Keimi, wrapping her thin hand around one of Hachi’s less bloody hands and bending her head close to Hachi’s bloody lips.

He says something to her, and her face- flexes, I think is the only way to describe it.

And then Chopper is there, along with Gurry and Taffy, and Hachi’s being carried back to the San for treatment. I catch Keimi’s hand, and take her back behind the counter of the Cafe. I wash Keimi’s hands, and carefully wipe her face, and wash my hands and my face- there’s blood on this dress, now, best I just- woosh, and it’s in the sink of my laundry, soaking.

Keimi looks… conflicted.

“What did he say?”

“-! He- my uncle, he said that… Vander Decken 9 can only keep two targets in his memory; his right hand holds the princess’s throat. His left holds the rest of the World. I- they’re coming. I- I need-”

“Keimi. Breath in, then out, then say it.”

“-hah. Right. We’re fighting; Freebird Postals! Prepare for Battle!”

There’s a long moment when I can’t hear anything for the sudden roar of approval; and then things begin to move very quickly indeed.

Keimi’s really grown up.

____________________

“No, Bryony- you don’t have to worry about the first wave. I handled it; they aren’t coming.”

Bryony blinks at me, once. It would appear that she has forgotten that I am, in fact, quite dangerous on my own. I take the snail rig from her loosened grip, and calmly take a seat.

Whitebeard, who is calmly issuing orders to a quietly grinning Haruta, barely glances over at us.

“At least let me rewrap that, before I go.” said Bryony.

“Fine. -Then, you really do need to get out there. Usopp’s good, but you know how he gets.”

And Bryony smiled.

The peroxide stung just a little when Bry poured it over my broken skin, but mostly it just ached; remembered burn and sharp pain when I moved it too quickly. Then, it felt much better for being covered- and then, Bryony was gone.

I calmly flicked through each channel, just as Bryony had trained me to do. I checked in with each member of my crew: Zoro and Nami are fine, and definitely with Princess Shirahoshi; Luffy and Mark are in pursuit of Zoro and Nami; Usopp is holding the line at the Fallen Tower, Bryony en route to reinforce his position. Franky is effecting repairs on the Sunny; Mab-

“Say that again, you’re on speaker.”

“Right. Vander Decken 9 is having his allies, the New Fishman Pirates, attack- with intent to destroy- Madame Shyarly’s Mermaid Cafe, which is also the location of the Local Post Office. Therefore, don’t expect much more than a token aid from the Freebirds; they’re defending their claims here, after all. However, this is a distraction; his actual target, so far as I know, is still the princess. Hody Jones, on the other hand, is presumably after something in the palace- and Hody Jones is as strong as Captain, as far as I know,” said Mab.

“...Bryony and Usopp are at the Front; Nami and Zoro are with the Princess; Luffy and Mark are pursuing Nami and Zoro. What else?”

“Sanji’s out for the night- he gave a lot of blood to save D, and even a small mermaid and a relatively noninvasive surgery require a lot of blood; it doesn’t matter that he’s a demon, he’s out. D as well; Doctor’s Orders.” said Chopper.

“Mm. I see; and the rest of the girls?”

“I don’t really feel good about having them fight, but- they’re full crewmembers, if very junior members. If they want to, they can.” said Captain.

“Girls?”

“I’ll fight. G, you’re better in the San or in the air, I know you don’t have anything ready- F, E, you two need to go get the rest of our stuff- B, C...” said Adelaide.

“I’m fighting.” said Beatrice.

“As am I.” said Cecelia.
“Right. So, that’s me, B, and C on Team Fight, D’s on Team Bedrest with Sanji, E, F, and Mab are on Team Sneaky; G, Chopper, Taffy, and Gurry are on Team Doctor. Team Princess is Nami, Zoro, Princess Shirahoshi, Captain, and Mark; and Team Castle is Usopp, Bryony, -you, Miss Robin- and Mr. Franky’s on his own for Team Ship...” said Adelaide, before trailing off in contemplation.

“Yohohoho- I’ll be fighting as well, I do believe,” said Brook.

“Ah, Mr. Brook! If you were any quieter, you’d be dead!” yelped the Girls, to Brook’s cheerful cackling.

“Got that, Robin?” said Mab.

“Yes, I do. Anything else we need to know?”

“Ah, yes- Vander Decken 9 can only keep two targets in his head at any moment in time. His right arm is reserved for the princess; his left is what he uses for the rest of the World.” said Mab.

“Hmm. Everyone got that?”

Everyone choruses their understanding, except for Captain.

“Uh.” said Captain.

“Captain- it means if you’re fighting him, break his right arm before you break his left.” said Zoro.

“Uh.” said Captain.

“His right, Luffy.” said Nami.

“Aha! Got it!” said Luffy.

“Hmhmhm. Anything else, or are we good to go?” said Mab.

“Shishishi- nope. If you guys see Dick-en first, kick his ass. And if I see him first, I’ll kick his ass.” said Luffy.

“Fair enough,” we all chorus.

Ace, standing just near enough to eavesdrop, is grinning with pride.

“Happy hunting, everyone,” said Mab.

“Ah, Mab- do you want to pop back over for your glasses?”

“Nah; I don’t need to see a man to kill him dead.” said Mab.

And that, I expect, is that.
“Right. E, F- come here.”

“Yes Mab!” they chorus.

“Right- you two know where we’re going?”

“Yes, we do.” said Ellie.

“Mm. Everyone else- anything you need before I go?”

“I wouldn’t mind hearing what you think war is, Mab.” said Brook.

I blinked, and then-

“Alright, all of you girls- and you, Brook- come here. I’m going to teach you something of war. Battle is battle, and how hard you go is decided by how hard you’re willing to go- for this one, I will say that any enemy you don’t kill has a chance of getting back up and fighting again. So much for battle.

“There is no glory in war; no heroes, no magic, no joy. It’s cold and bleak and ugly, and it’s not something you should just jump into. War is Not Romantic. So much for romance.

“You girls are going to be grown pirates, one day- and so, your actual crew-wide duties are thus: you’re to fetch and carry for the older members of the crew, do menial chores none of the rest of us like, improve your own skills, and do what we ask of you. The rest of the time, you’re to watch and listen to us, because there’ll be no better education for piracy. Not ever.

“War, when you get past all the battle bits, is about bread and boots and shit. Strategy is not complicated,” I lecture. “It’s little more than an objective: in this case, to defend this fortified position from attackers, while other members of our crew secure a potential hostage and defend the palace. Until the enemy attacks, that’s really all we can do. So much for strategy, then.

“What about tactics? Tactics are a variable, but until you know the battleground and your enemy is upon it, there’s naught much you can do other than keep in mind your capabilities and the ability of your enemy. Important in the moment, but that moment is not now.

“What a war really hinges on, girls, is supplies. Any idiot can raise an army- all you really need is to be born in the right family, or have enough charisma that people follow you. The trick to keeping an army is feeding it, arming it, clothing it- and the real trick is to do all of that, not in a city or a castle where the things you need for battle are right at hand, but in transit, miles and miles from anyone and anywhere. If you can manage that when your opponent can’t, then you have a profound advantage.

“Advantage; that’s what matters, more than anything else. Stack the deck in your favor: position, numbers, training, morale, more and better food, less disease… and then you’re unlikely to loose a battle. The way to get those advantages is to pay close attention to details- for example. Girls- are you absolutely comfortable fighting in those clothes, or do you want something else to wear?”
“...I’d like something else, actually. These are the only clothes I have, right now, and...” said Cecelia.

“Right-” and I shove a basket of loose articles of clothing at them, and another of armor- not heavy armor, it’s mostly boiled leather with some few lacquered pieces too… Franky got bored that time.

“-wear whatever you feel good about moving in. Don’t worry about expense- I make all the clothes for all the crew, and that includes you, now. The second one is full of armor- ask if you need help putting it on.”

There’s a general susurrus of movement from the Girls, and then they’re preparing for battle. I take the moment to wrap the neck piece of my battle chiton around my neck and tie it, just so. I pull the pins from my hair, and the jewelry, and put it back up with my battle gear- Bite goes into my hair, and Scratch goes on my fingers.

All the girls are wearing hakama; only some of them have changed their kimono. As they add armor and adjust themselves for battle, I suddenly realize that we’ve got three little samurai- C, B, and probably D, though I haven’t seen her yet- two little ninjettes, E, and F; a Karate-ka, A; and a Witch, G.

God’s blood, they’ll fit right in.

I look over at Brook, who looks back at me- then, he nods. He knows as well as I do the other reason I’m going to Gobdark instead of routing the enemy here.

We’re not just here for us, really- and this… this is bigger than just me.

“Everyone ready?”

“Yes, Mab.” the girls chorus.

Brook just nods.

“Right- E, F, you need headwraps, or...?”

“Not where we’re going, Mab.” said Ellie.

“Right. Grab on- and here we go.”

Then, I Blink, and we vanish from the Cafe.
People always spell my name wrong. The more modern, popular spelling is ‘Beatrice’, or ‘Beatriz’, but my name is the much older ‘Beatrix’. Mother said once that she would have named me ‘Bellatrix’ or ‘Bellona’, but those names were too combative for her tastes. Mother wasn’t always a prostitute- she’s not really a prostitute now, it’s just… Ginny said it best. She’s dying.

This isn’t the best thing to be thinking of right before a battle, but I can’t seem to turn my mind to anything else. I’m drawn back to other moments in time, other battles I’ve faced down; other moments where living beings in my acquaintance and company were fated to die.

Perhaps it’s best to start at the beginning.

Missus Mab explained it very well indeed; Magic is not free. I suppose she was only giving a grounding sort of lecture before she got into the specifics of curses- but Magic is most definitely not free. At the very basic level, one gives time and mental energy to the working of magic. But- also as Mab said- that’s very basic, very… I hesitate to say weak, because it is also what prayer is and prayer has tangible effects on the world… Mundane, is the best way to describe it, I think. Basic spells and so on, that you only need time and thought to use- a simple prayer, every night before you sleep- even some spells you sing, like lullabies; those are mundy magics. Those kinds of spells, well- there’s no real right or wrong way of casting them, because they’re things like ‘sing a song’, ‘pray’, and so on. Everyone- or most everyone- can figure out how to do those things, and you can find little spells like that in books.

Strong magic isn’t the kind of thing you learn in a book.

Well, one level above the Mundy floor is the world of hedgewitchery. Not quite strong enough to get any use out of a coven, and nowhere near the level of a tower; a hedgewitch is mostly self-taught, with a loose circle of friends and fellows that share tricks and resources. Or at least, that’s how it works in the suburbs and out in the country- villages, and so on.

In the city, hedgewitches aren’t as… hm. It’s like this. In the country, a hedgewitch is able to forage for their own supplies- herbs, animal bits, minerals, spices, and so on. In the city, most hedgewitches actually have day jobs, and so can’t spend time foraging.

That’s where I come in.

Technically speaking, I’m a thaumaturgic naturalist. Witches, wizards, mages, hedgewitches, spell-slingers; and others, with far stranger names, are always needing things like ‘eye of fire salamander’ or ‘boil blossom pus’; ‘strangle vine seeds’, ‘dandelion dander’ or even, on one very odd occasion, ‘sperm of tigerfish’. I’m the one who goes out and gets the damn things; and, because I like having something resembling job security, I do my best to do it in a way that’s least harmful to the animal, plant, mineral, and so on. There are ways to do it; I know there are. Some things, it hasn’t been written down yet, but-

It’s a dangerous, thankless job- but it pays the bills, and I get to see, up close and personal, the real nitty gritty bits of nature you can’t get out of books. Gobdark actually has a really good library- the librarian, Mister Potter, is very good at helping find books for me to read. He actually taught all of us to read, a long time ago- write, too, if that matters. Honestly… I think if he hadn’t taught me how to read, and write, and bind books, and- just, so many book-things, I’d have died by now. It’s from books I learned the best way to approach a needler cactus; it’s from books I learned how to make all my amulets and fetishes, what keeps me from harm.
There are things out in the cold, dark, wild edges of Fishman Island that no one has ever seen excepting me. There’s no book that exists about them, not yet- I haven’t quite written it yet. I suppose I’ve got all the information I’d need; but no actual, like, monograph. Or manuscript. Dunno.

I think this is the first time I’ve ever actually been scared going into battle. Mostly, I go into battle annoyed, my guts still as mirror-water and my mind abuzzin’ with the indignation of having to fight my way out, again. I guess it’s because of how close I came to dying not even a day ago.

I didn’t think nothin’ of going into the Tombs because I’ve done that before; there’s a kind of flower called a Peace Blower, or a Skullflyte, that only grows on undisturbed graves. The Tombs are a great place for them, because of how many noble houses have died out over the years… Is that morbid and distasteful? Well, so is letting a woman die of a treatable disease because she’s ‘not our sort of person’.

I’m bitter and I don’t give a shit who knows it.

Saa- it’s almost time to fight. Best get out my Rending Shears. Each of us Colors has our own specialized weapon. Mine is shears- specifically, a pair of Shrinky-dink scissors that transform into paired swords with a flick of the wrist. They’re indigo, for some reason- not quite blue, not quite violet. Indigo. I mean, bust them apart and they turn blue and red- but they’re not, they’re indigo.

The joint at the center of the scissors clicks open, and they pull apart into individual swords, which I can use pretty well, I reckon. I mean, I’ve been keeping myself alive with my skill for a good five years now- that’s better than most can say.

They aren’t very good shears, though- I mean, they aren’t good swords. They aren’t made of the right kind of metal, exactly. I know them- I know their quirks; I can use them. But. There’s always a chance that they’ll break.

I really hope they don’t break. I mean… They’re good Germa arbeitsgerät, I just… I think I ask more of them than they were ever meant to give. I don’t know any blacksmiths who can work with German weapon-tool magic, though… ugh.

Oh. We’re starting.

I’ll worry about this later- maybe say something to Mab? Hm.

Later.

When I feel that horrible, skin-crawly feeling again, I know I’m going to lose something important this time. Like another bit of finger, or part of my tailfin, or my hair. Then, my skin-crawls transform into full on needle-picks, which mean’s it’s not going to be something important and small.

In the rush of the moment, I forgot about Megalo. She made no sound at all, at the end; just a wet, meaty thump, and then there was a piece of axe head sticking out of the roof of her mouth, and then- we fall. We hit the ground, and she’s so still, so horribly still, like- like-

Mommy-
Do you know what a chatelain is? It’s not just the female head of the household, or even the female head of the household servants; it’s a literal chain of keys, meant to be worn by the oldest woman of the house. When Mommy died, I got her chatelain.

It’s on a dragon rope of gold, a cameo in a round frame with the Three Royal Prerogatives enameled in gold and smaller charms of my own and my mother’s scales on the back. There are three chains on my chatelain; there’s a watch with a representation of the Realm on it, and a key that opens every Royal lock in the realm.

And there’s the scissors. They’re meant for embroidery, so they’re very sharp indeed, and made of the same steel as my naginata blade.

The chatelain is also all one needs for proof of Royalty; it’s better than any crown, any oath, any weapon- because it is all three.

‘I, Shirahoshi Takara Ryugu Merrow Neptune, do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to the people of the Realm which I have been given the duty of serving, their heirs and successors, according to the rule of good law and the needs of the moment.

In the name of The Three Who Are One; in the name of the Land, the Sea, the Sky; in the name of the Hero; in the name of the Prayer: I assert that I will employ those powers with which I have been blessed in the service of my people alone, rejecting all other usages. In times of peace, I will use them not; in times of war, I will use them not. Only in the moments of necessary defence will my powers, with which I am cursed, be used.

I will guard growth, where it may be guarded; I will ease pain, wherever it festers. I will fight to preserve what grows and lives well in its own way; and I will change no object or creature unless its growth and life, or that of the system of which it is part, are threatened.

To this end, in the practice of my Powers, I will put aside fear for courage; weakness for strength; ignorance for wisdom; stagnation for change; and death for life, when it is right to do so- until the end of all things.

So help me, Gods and Goddesses: I, Shirahoshi Takara Ryugu Merrow Neptune, do so swear.’

That’s the oath every princess of my House has sworn, upon the passing of the chatelain from mother to daughter. I swore it when I was six, and Mommy was- killed. Here and now, upon the death of my friend, Megalo- the last living piece of my mother’s will, as Megalo was trained to be her service dog… Here and now, I remember my oath, and so swear again.

I will have no more of this.

Abide your father, while I am gone- Shirahoshi, abide him!

Mommy-

Promise!

...I promise, mommy. I’ll abide.
Which oath to obey? The one you swore to your mother, as she lay dying, her hand going cold and pale in yours? Or the one you swore to the gods, to the people who are still living, and need you?

The mother you are nothing like, the mother you don’t remember- the mother whose name rests on laws that bring naught but suffering to your people, the people who are like you how could she - No.

I will abide no longer.

What else can I choose- but to live? I must live; my people need me, and so I must live.

I take some string from my obi, and bind my loose hair into pony tails, and one tail that goes in front of my face; and then, I take my naginata, and cut. The pirates watch, wide eyed, as I cut the other pony tails; as I take the scissors and snip away in front of my face. I have no mirror, but… I’m pretty sure it came out alright. Pretty sure.

I dust what hair I can off of myself, after putting away my scissors. I look down at the pirates, and then- fuck it.

“You can ride on the back of my neck, between my tits, or in my obi. Pick one.” I said to them.

After glancing at each other for a long, quiet conversation, Nami makes a Face at Zoro, and he sighs.

“We’ll ride on your neck, princess.” said Nami, her voice echoing strangely through the air bubble.

I nodded, and picked them up- carefully, so as not to pop their air bubble. I carefully set them in the collar of my kimono, and then lean forwards, and swim. I swim, and I swim, and I swim; it’s… strange, not having that weight on my head. But- not bad. Just… different.

And then we’re there. I take a piece of bubbly coral from my obi and put a bubble ring around myself, so I can keep going; we’re in the Sea Forest, but the place I need to go is- right- there, there it is.

I stop before I get there- I gently take the pirates from my collar, and set them on a wide flat stone, a natural bench left here for mourners. They blink up at me; and so does the whale shark fishman before he espies the cameo on the chatelain and gasps- but I don’t have time for that. I need to-absolve. My sin.

I’m sorry, mommy.
It’s a nice grave, I suppose. In the distance, I can hear Jinbe, one of my mother’s knights, telling Nami and Zoro who exactly this grave belongs to. It’s not her tomb- the Tombs and the Palace have a mystical connection, I’ve visited them quite a few times. But her grave… this is the place where her soul resides. A tomb’s a tomb- but a grave is not for the dead. It’s for us, who remain behind, living.

I’m sorry, Mommy. I’m sorry I can’t be who or what you asked me to be. When we meet again, across the Sea of Stars, you can yell at me all you’d like. Until that day… until then, I must be myself.

I swear, I don’t mean to keep falling asleep.

Pregnancy plays hell with your sleep cycle anyway- all this running around and worrying isn’t good for me, I think. I lean against Zoro, and fall into that resting doze you go into while you’re waiting- not quite sleep, but not quite awake, either.

My eyes are certainly closed, because they were starting to ache; but I’m not actually comfortable enough to sleep, and probably not tired enough either. Or at least, that’s what I justify it with.

And the darkness rises-

I open my eyes, and take in the tall red gates of Gobdark. Their bases sit in water so grim and dark it looks like an entirely different ocean; around us, spars of red coral slither and snikt into the air. The girls dart past me, going around the outside edge of the gate, where a worn path lies.

I go under the gate, as is my right.

Somewhere, in the city ahead, a certain bell begins to ring. The girls blink at each other, then at me- and I smile at them, gently.

“Girls, you have- oh, until dawn, I’d say, to get what you need done, done. Best hurry.”

“Yes, Mab!” they yelp, before leaping and swimming off into the darkness.

I take out my air supply, make sure my bubble coating is applied- it is- and then I walk on my own two feet into a Realm of Shadows.
My feet make no sound on the silty road; my passage leaves no trace. I am marked, of course- a Fairy, with brass on her hands and in her hair, wearing gold, with a spear? Wings like a dragonfly? The one I need to speak with- they know I’m here, and they know I have come. The bell ensures it.

Overhead, I hear an announcement from the Border Patrol; they’re warning everyone that dangerous individuals have left the Fishman District, but they don’t know what their purpose is. Beyond that, through the shadows of this island, I can hear- Hody Jones, I think, rallying his people, telling them that by the coming dawn they will be the new rulers of Fishman Island.

Oh dear.

By the crinkling of my nose, someone’s just managed to piss Ace off in the worst possible way. If it’s one thing about being siblings I can admit to being rather nice, it’s that I Know when any of my siblings loose their tempers. It’s… obvious. Nothing quite like the Pyre loosing his temper to make you sit up and pay attention; it happens so rarely, too...

Finally, I come to the place of my Fated Meeting. I take a single taper candle, and light it, and set it at the base of the queen of stars - the Fae’s version of the Three Who Are One, the Goddess, Hylia.

How’d that old hymn go…?

Ah, yes.

When my prayer is done, there is another in the holy clearing with me. We have a talk.

As I run through the halls of the palace, I shed layer after layer of kimono. Finally, I’m in my own battle gear, updated and refined- soft, loose in all the right places, adored with feathers and cut just right to let my operculum and gill slits open and shut without catching on anything. My lasso is around my shoulders; my happuri and fist-or-foot-ribbons, the only things I really need, are tucked in my lasso.

Oh, right- I suppose it’s not actually talked about all that often. The reason Syreenes are so culturally different from the rest of the Fae comes down to one thing, really- we’re Seafolk, not Skyfolk. As in, when Ariel, the First Queen, conquered the Fae, she needed an army to do it.

That army was made of kappa and merrow- or gyojin and merjin, nowadays. Syreenes are… selkies, puca, water-birds… I’m not a great white shark fishwoman, because I’m not a fishwoman. I’m a Brown Goose Syreene, because I’m a fucking syreene.

And Syreenes? Syreenes have gills, and webbed feet, and feathers. I have webbed feet- just because my webbing is loose enough I can wear sandals doesn’t mean it isn’t there.

As I run, I smell- burning flesh? And soap, I think. Odd, but not important right now. I skid around a corner and fly through a door, stopping myself on the railing where Usopp is taking cover. I duck down with him just in time for the water bullets to clatter into the wall overhead.

I glance over at Usopp, who huffs. I grin, and shrug my shoulders, catching my lasso in one hand and fishing out my battle gear with the other.

I wrap my hands and wrists, the better to punch with; I wrap my feet and ankles, the better to kick and stomp with. I put on my happuri, so everyone knows who I am- and also because it looks cool as hell. The cheek guards that go in are particularly choice, I think. Finally, it’s important to know this about me- some people are bullet proof because they eat a Devil Fruit, like Captain.

I’m bullet proof because I am bulletproof.

I grin at Usopp, and then I lunge over the balcony railing and charge towards Hody Jones.

For fair play, and fair pay! Wonderous!

After a quick dinner and a show of magic, I realized what I actually needed to go do. I needed to go find my old master’s little brother, Den- for my own peace of mind, really. But more than that, I needed to go find the ship. When we entered Island waters, our bubble coating was ruptured- it well may be that Sunny’s fine. And… he might not be.

I don’t know.

I do, however, have Shipwright Senses. Every member of our crew, once they found their specialization, has an uncanny ability to find, know, or seek that which captivates us. Sanji can always find something to eat- an ingredient, a restaurant… and if he stretches it, he can find utensils, too.

Zoro can always find the weaponsmith, the sword shop, a swordsman- and, on one occasion, Nami, which was a hell of a day.

I’m the crew Shipwright. My job is to care for the ship. Scariba aren’t Fae- but we were, at one point, and some things stick. It makes perfect sense to me that a person’s honor is their job- because a person is what they do, who they are. I’ve seen the horse cut into Chalk, or a drawing of it. I was immediately struck by the fact that someone who knew horses had made it- had dreamed it, had asked it be cut into the hills, just like that.

At this point… It’s not about what the ship looks like. To find what I’m looking for, I have to Know what the ship is.

I don’t know what I’m saying; I do know that I’m on a train, headed for Den’s Junkyard, which is in the Sea Forest, which is what buzzed to my eyes when I looked at the Island Map at the train station.

Technically speaking, the train station isn’t really a station at all, just a stop with a coin-operated ticket vending machine, a payphone with a privacy booth, and a narrow path to the biggest, most
They say it’s run by a witch, of all things— but frankly, heh, that’s none of my business.

...Alright, fine, I admit it. When the kid with the satchel on their back and the harried look on their face showed up to the station and found they didn’t have enough money after making a call in the phone booth, I bought them a ticket. Not a scamp, but... they stand a bit like Nami does, if that makes sense. I’m not sure how to describe it- the way they hold their body, the careful rumpling of their… that’s not a uniform, although it looks a lot like one. It’s too big, for one; for another, that bath house is famous for having all it’s bath attendants wearing salmon-pink, not saffron-orange. They must have gotten their clothing from a nun.

Something’s nudging at me about this kid- have I seen them before?

Anyway, when the train comes, the ticket master almost doesn’t let them get on the train- but, well. I’ve mentioned I’m really big, and hilariously out of place nearly everywhere I go, right? They have their ticket- so do I.

And, as the ticket master was a very small merman, he didn’t push the issue farther than that. I escorted the kid to a seat, and took a seat near enough to intervene if I had to, but... well.

By the second or third glance from the kid, my curiosity got the better of me.

“Running away, kid?”

“...” they said, but nodded.

“Ahh. Is there somewhere you’re running to, or...?”

I nodded.

“I’m going to ask a few questions- if that’s okay?”

“...” they nodded.

“Right. Are you keeping that one?”

“-!...is it that obvious…?” they whispered, wide eyed and pale.

“No, I just live with a pregnant woman and her fiance, so. I know how a person holds themselves when they’re- anyway. Are you keeping that one?”

“...Yes. Yes, I am.”

“Okay. Do you have any skills?”

“-Yes. I can read, and write, and do mathemagic; I can clean very well, and cook passably. Um. I’m also an an advanced practitioner of machigainaku senshin-tekina ugoki, with a focus on the shield and sword. Ah... technically speaking, I suppose I am a druid, although I have very little actual “Hm. Do you know what a secretary is?”

“...Um.”

“Right. So, a secretary or personal assistant is a person whose job is to support their manager. They manage projects, communications, and organization. They also deal with correspondence—meaning letters; they admit and process new members of the company; and they organize the calendar of official meetings and events.”

“Oh- Oh! The person who answers the phone, keeps the files, a-and things like that? I know what a secretary is, I just- all that can be done by one person?”

“Depending on the size of the company, sure. Here’s what I’m going to do for you—when my stop comes up, we’re both going to get out, and I’m going to introduce you to the younger brother of my master. Then, he’s going to give you the job of being his secretary.”

“...Really?”

“Yep.”

“And if it doesn’t work out like that? What then?”

“I’ll talk to my captain, and my crewmates, and we’ll figure something out.”

“...Oh.”

I grin at them, and they, slowly, smile back.

“Oh, yeah, before I forget—m’name’s Franky. Super nice to meet you.”

“...O-oh! Right, right- uh. My name is- um. Uh.”

“Take your time, I’m in no rush.”

“...thank you. I’m- Rei. My name is Rei. It’s nice to meet you, too.”

After that, we don’t talk at all; not in any meaningful way, I mean. Kid’s not telling me the truth, but that’s alright—enough rang true for me to go with it. They really do love graveyards; they aren’t pregnant, but I’m not sure how else to describe how their pudgy belly is moving…

I buy Rei two dinner bento from the trolley; she wolfs them down. I hand over my own, too; I only bought it so that Rei wouldn’t feel guilty about eating so much, but honestly, pregnant people need food. They’re building brand new beings, and food is the building blocks. And, also, food is what keeps a person going—so.

I give her the food.

Hmm. Why am I—that face, I’ve seen it before.
We ride through a world that flickers and flashes under the light of stars and false-moon. I see Rei writing down a list in a notebook they pulled from her satchel, adding notations after consulting a pocket watch.

As the train goes forwards, I suddenly realize that Rei’s going to join the crew. She’s somehow exactly the kind of person Captain would like, and Luffy will want to help; and that’s that, I’m afraid. Might as well ask before we get to much further-

“Rei?”

“-Yes, Franky?”

“What’s your Dream?”

“...It’s a little morbid and weird, but… my Dream is to visit every state cemetry in the World.”

“...Okay, that’s different. What got you into that, if you don’t mind me asking?”

“Well… I’ve always had a strange sense of enjoyment, every time I’m in a cemetry. I’ve always loved reading epitaphs, and learning new languages so I can read really old epitaphs too. I’ve got an entire collection of gravestone rubbings, and a book of photographs- some of which have ghosts- and… I don’t know, exactly, why I love it so much. The art, maybe? Might be the history.

“I don’t think of myself as predatory- I’m not out there for, um, for necromancy or any sort of autograph. When I do go out and look at a cemetry, I usually focus on the way it’s used, not necessarily who’s in it. I enjoy the strange, odd details that can be found in a cemetry- little things like who had taste, and who didn’t, and perhaps an inference as to why.

“I also like to collect items from gravesites- just things that can be purchased legitimately. Mostly marimos, actually, Fishman Island’s… thing is marimos in decorative bottles. I don’t approve of collecting graveyard sculpture, or dirt from the graves of famous people. If that sort of hobby catches fire in the imagination of the public, the damages to the graves is simply… horrific. That kind of thing isn’t harmless; and entire generations of people can lose their culture, their heritage, their national identity- I can’t stand it.

“Mostly, I take photographs- and, um, I guess since I got good at taking stills of tombstones, I kind of branched out a bit? Now, when I’m not, um, working, i-if I see something interesting, I take a pictograph of it. Sometimes, I’ll find a postcard or two from far off locations- because lots of cemeteries are, or were, tourist destinations. One of my books, in here,” and Kei thumped his bag, before continuing to speak, his eyes and face and whole being aflame with passion and yes, he’s going to be one of us as soon as Captain hears him talk about his Dream, “it’s all postcards from cemeteries around the World, and, well, I’ve been treating it like a sort of… a sort of bounty list of places I must go and see with my own eyes.

“Um. I- I had to sell my collection of calacas, b-but I still have pictures of all of them. I miss those little clowns and caricatures, but- I just. I didn’t have the space for them, anymore. I-I think… I think it’s the best hobby I could h-have found, considering everything that happened.”

“...?” I’m curious, but I don’t want to just ask. That’s- rude. Pirate Etiquette.

“-So my parents got deep into a gambling addiction, and sold everything they could sell to pay off their losses. We lost our land first, then the house, then bits and pieces of everyday life until finally—finally, they got me to sign the past twenty years of my life away for much less than they ought of. The only debt I’ve ever had was the one I took out to have them buried in a proper ossuary, not in the potter’s fields out near Gobdark; they were my parents, after all.

“I guess… I don’t know. I was so young when they left me, just barely thirteen- and now, I’m thirty three, I suppose. I think I wanted something to be mine- really mine, that couldn’t be bought, or sold, or traded away. I suppose I picked cemeteries because no one else showed an interest, and… well, it made theft much less likely, I think. Over the years, I’ve spoken to all sorts of people- genealogists who want to figure out what the emblems on ancient graves were, writers trying to find distinct details for their stories, students writing essays- and other enthusiasts, like myself.”

I blink. I stare at her. She seems- flustered, now that her outpouring of love is over. Of all my crewmates, Robin’s going to like her the most.

I think I’ve just stumbled on a good deed. Huh.

Oh, yeah- and she’s fourteen if she’s a day. I swear to th’gods, I know her.

“So- as a fellow lover of things, though not necessarily graves- what’s the worst grave you’ve ever seen, and why?”

“Um- what do you make…? Nevermind- that’s easy to answer. My great grandfather, Lord Wyatt ‘Berry Stop’ Earp’s new grave is a goddamn mistake. Grandmother was born on the wrong side of the sheets, so we don’t have the name- but she always knew who her father had to be, considering the Lord’s well known and documented adoration of attractive women in maid uniforms, which my great grandmother was.

“The original stone on his site was a simple black slab with his name and the name of his wife, Josephine, along with the date and a rather tasteful prayer. His last living heirs decided that this was not good enough for him and replaced it with a glossy monstrosity- some poker hand, with a stupid epitaph that doesn’t mean anything at all, upon close inspection. And Josephine’s name isn’t on it, which is really why I hate it so much.”

“Ah. -Oh, I’m a shipwright.”

“Oh wow! Um… what’s the ugliest ship you’ve ever seen, then?”

“The Gran Tesoro.”

“...Whaaaat.”

“ It’s shaped like a lobster .”

“Mmmp!”

“There are no graceful lines on that woman; no curves, no angles. She’s pointy and disappointing in the front, and bulbous in the rear-”

“Mmm-mmmp-”
“-with these two spiraling antenna things, because whoever designed her took one look at a lobster and decided that was the Purest Form of Love-”

“Hnnngk-”

“-so, yeah; the Gran Tesoro is a slow, fat, ugly bucket, and I hate even thinking about her for too long because it’s my firm belief; that bucket scoops out people’s functioning brains and pours them into the aether. Fucking travesty.”

“Kakakakakakahahakahakaakaka-! Th-thank you, kakakakaka, I’ve been- oh my goodness, oh my gods, it really does look just like a lobster, doesn’t it? Kakakakaka-”

“It really, really does.”

Nice kid. They’re lying about basically everything- they’re not even pregnant. I recognize their face, too, but… I’ll leave it be, for now. Kid’s not hurting anything, and...

We eventually get to the Junkyard, and then… well. Tom told me about his younger brother, Den. As it happens, Tom was the libertine, and Den was the conservative.

Den, when I finally meet him, is a muscular merman with long, curly hair reaching down below his shoulders. His nose is long and hooked, and his mustache droops into a pointed goatee. His smile, when he sees Rei, turns into a sneer- and that’s when I know that she won’t find work here, no matter what kind of introduction I make. Rei, being no fool, sees what I saw- and so, when I introduce her as a friend of mine, she doesn’t say a word to the contrary.

However, my instinct was right- Den does know where Sunny is, and he can fix him up with a bubble coating. I pay the man, and swallow my disappointment; not every man can be as my old man was.

And I think I recognize where I’ve seen Rei before- which is Interesting. Not a Scamp at all...

“Y’know, I really wouldn’t have known you to be Tom’s brother on first sight…”

“Haha, no, you wouldn’t. Momma was always out at the Toucan Club, and when her last husband left, well, she had Ol’ Tom, and then she had me. Dunno who my father is- and I can’t say as I care, really.”

“It’s a little odd to me that you both aren’t mermen, though.”

“Ah, that. Naw, we wouldn’t be- the tail gets squashed underfoot real easy, y’see, so- Momma must’a swung with a fishman to have Ol’ Tom, and a merman to have me. It don’t really matter much- but then again, it does.”

“It has a funny way of sneaking up on you, yeah.”

“Hah. -I suppose you’re one of them robot folks?”

“Thereabouts, yeah.”
“Right on. Miss Kokoro sent letters about you and that Iceburg kid, and she telegraphed me about what happened to Ol’ Tom at the end. I have to say- thinking back on it, and seein’ what’s become of you now, I dunno what my brother was thinking. A robot for a disciple, I declare-”

“Well. D’you have a problem with me being Automatic, or d’you have a problem with my faith? It’s always one of the two, in my experience.”

“It’s neither of those, really. I- honestly, really, I don’t hate your tribe at all. No, no- I don’t. I’m just a bit… bewildered, by your kind, I think.”

“Oh?”

“Your kind doesn’t die properly. It’s the damndest thing.

“Y’all constitute around one percentum of the entire totality of people in the World. Properly speaking, there ought to be hardly any record of your people, but there is. The Sandoran, the Orcish, and the Vikingr rose, filled the air and the land and the waters with sound and splendors; and then faded to memory and dreams and passed from this place. The Faerie and the Djinn followed, and made their vast noises, and are gone- changed into something else. Other people rose and held their torches high for a time, and watched those torches burn out- watched their great works come to nothing more than dust and broken pieces, like the grounds of my junkyard.

“Your Tribe saw them all, whupped them all, and is now what they always were- exhibiting no decadence, no infirmities of age, no weakening of your parts or peculiarities, no slowing or stalling of form- all people are mortal but yours, Franky. It’s not obvious, but it’s there, and it’s the root of so much hatred against your people…”

“...Okay, so. My people have been enslaved almost for the entirety of the historical record- not all of them, but enough that it’s a significant portion of our tradition, to pray and work for the breaking of bondage.”

“What.”

“...Den, who cleans this city? Who ensures it works- not on the political level, but the bare-bones mechanics of it all. Who keeps this place going?”

“...”

“They pick up the trash, and wash the streets- they cycle the waters, and trim away the dead growth. And you don’t see them, do you?”

“-those are people?”

“They are. I can admit to being a bit bewildered myself, of my people’s history. Reading it, it almost seems that every detractor of my people has sealed their ultimate doom in persecuting us. Hell, some people were even aware of this ‘fact’, that Automatons are indestructible, and yet- they couldn’t help themselves, as if compelled. Hated, or loved- my people have always been treated as different. We’re judged by different standards; revered, hated, admired, feared- more so than any other Tribe in the World.

“Honestly, I think it comes down to this- my people, the Automatons? Our original creator built us for a very specific purpose, or he built our mother for a purpose. And, in time, our First Mother built the rest of our mothers, and gave them her love- and made them swear to find their own purposes.

“The one thing our creators neglected was to give us a place to go when we die.”
“...Franky-”

“Automatons don’t have a heaven, Den. And we don’t have a hell. It’s still being debated if we have souls- we do, we must, we’re alive and do all the things every other Tribe in the World does, and they have souls- and yet. There’s never been an Automatic Ghost, Den. And we don’t have many burial practices to speak of. In many ways, my people’s culture has yet to be born- and, though a thing unborn can still grow, it’s nothing compared to after.”

“...”

“Heh. You seem to be confused, Den. I’ll explain it for you. When any member of the Tribes die- even if they don’t know they’re a member- their soul, which was marked down at birth by the ancient gods as ‘theirs’, is carried off to whichever keeping place was meant for that Tribe. Talvolk go to their Warrior’s Havens, to battle forever and again come the end of days; Lanfolk are returned to the earth, to cycle anew; Seafolk cross the Sea of Stars, or find Bubbling Dreams to drift in; Minfolk have their Verdant Paradise, with food and fighting and fucking and people to love and share it with; and the Fae are carried on the Wind itself, dancing in and out of all the other places and returning to their own Roof of the World.

“I’m not any of those Tribes; I’m an Automaton. There is no place waiting for me when I die. There is Nothing waiting for me when I die. I’m not going to see any of my lost ones again. That’s the only thing any Automaton can agree on, when it comes to death and what comes after- that person who died has gone, and will not return or be seen again.

“No, never again.”

Shit. I’ve made a man cry.

“-Take me to my crew’s ship, please. Come along, Rei.”

“-y’s,” snifflies Rei.

“-sure, F-franky. Ah, it’s this way- near Queen Otohime’s grave. We’ll have to go the long way around; I can’t actually enter most of the local towns and villages, as I’m a wanted criminal in these parts.”

“...How in the hell did you manage that, Den?”

“Well. I dunno much for certain about what comes after death, and all- but I do know that the Gods made women in response to the pure stupidity and cruelty of men.”

“Preach it, bro.”

“Of my five closest brushes with Death proper, four of them have been because of a woman, or the love of a woman.”

“-Marlie, what have you done.”
“Isn’t it obvious, Coeurl? I loved her- I always loved her. And she loved you.”

“...Still?”

“OF COURSE ‘STILL’ YOU BLITHERING- no. No, no. I will not be silent now, Coeurl; I will not still my furious tongue. Not now.

“That look, on your face- there, that one. I’ve seen it for ten fucking years, on face after face. You all despise me, as if I’m the only Honorless Dog the Old Queen made her pet- bah. I suppose you know what Energy Steroids are?”

“Of course, but what-”

“Your biddable daughter is her mother’s child, through and through. Oh yes, Queen Otohime preached of- of peace, and equality, of mercy and forgiveness- but her mercy was nothing of the kind. Tch, the Queen was obsessed with Energy Steroids. She loved their ability to give even the weakest of men and women a fighting chance against foes much stronger than them; and that damned Neptunian love of aging… She loved watching people age to death in an instant, did you know that?

“Most of her old guards are all gone now- you made sure of that- but I was there, and I remember. She loved to watch people wither- the way their skin wrinkled, thinned, sagged off their bones. She withered those who wouldn’t accept her mercy; she withered Lords and Ladies she didn’t like; she withered servants that disobeyed her; she withered anyone who was against her, because what can withered old ones do in the face of her vitality, her accursed youth, her beauty- and so, because I loved her still, after all I had seen, I devised a plan to save her; or her memory.

“It can never come to light, what she did, Coeurl. Her work, her reforms- they’re too important to the Realm. That’s why Hody Jones ever got involved- we needed a scrapefish, you see.”

“...Someone who’d take the fall. And I suppose, my honored Wife’s reforms refer to the ones that tax the very lifeblood from the merjin, making it all but impossible for them to rise above the ancient stigma that has hobbled our Realm?”

“Obviously! And our Realm was never more productive than when those- those- fish - knew their place! ...Hody Jones took the contents of the Tamatebako; I got the queen in place, and then- well, I’m sure you remember. Half the country was against her, Coeurl- and she was so paranoid. You laughed it off, but I knew- if it came down to it, she’d wither every person in this castle, you, your sons, your children- everyone- before she’d let herself be dethroned as Queen.

“The day of reckoning came at last- and though Hody Jones killed Queen Otohime, it was on my order that he did so, and my order again that had her not survive.”

“I’m going to kill you for this, Marlinton.”

“You can try, Coeurl. By this time, however, your precious treasure is already being slaughtered by Vander Decken.”

“He’s your man as well?”

“Even a blunt instrument has it’s uses.”

“-And how, exactly, did you expect to get out of this room alive, Marlie?”

“I didn’t. My plan doesn’t need me alive to continue- and killing me won’t make it stop.”
“You are a traitor, you realize?”

“I do.”

“Good. However, in light of recent revelations- I don’t think Boneshard Reef is your fate. No. A slit throat, as my wife contracted that fateful day; and our kennels are full of dogsharks who are always pleased with fresh meat. -Goodbye, Marlie.”

“...Fuck you, Coeurl. I hope your dogs choke on me.”

I can feel my horror and outrage rising, but swallow it down again- now is not the time to vomit, Robin. Over the comms, I can hear Bryony panting from her run, and the rustle of her limb wraps; the clatter of water bullets on stone. Beyond that, I can just make out Hody Jones and Vander Decken discussing their next move.

It’s garbled, but I get the gist- Jones and Decken were surprised that their surprise attacks didn’t do as much damage as they thought, and that the resistance shown to their attacks has been so effective.

No one knows where Shirahoshi is excepting perhaps Nami and Zoro- neither of whom can be contacted, as something about their location is interfering with the snail’s telepathy. Decken doesn’t have her- but he does still have the power to find her.

As Desterous Marlintin’s life’s blood splatters across the floor, I hear Decken declare that if Shirahoshi is with someone else when he finds her, she’s better off dying in a sea of her own blood. I can hear Hody Jones chuckle at his- comrades- cruel declaration, and then I hear him shout out another attack- something something Bullets, and another wave of water crackles out.

“Damn that man- he only wanted the advisory position for the power and intelligence afforded it! No true love of the Realm- it doesn’t matter what tribe of people hold’s power… God’s blood, a person’s worth is not determined by the content of their body- it’s determined by the content of their character!” said the Minister to the Left, Lord Sinister.

Desterous’ blood is bubbling at the carpet- eating away at it. Shit, he poisoned himself before- and then Ace intervenes, and in a spectacular show of heat and fire, sanitizes the corpse and the blood. Nothing, not even vapors, escapes him.

As Lord Sinister continues to curse the blackened soul of Marlintin Desterous, I notice on the body’s arm- on his right arm, I do believe- there is a tattoo. It’s… familiar. I’ve seen it before, in our Logbook, near the very beginning- not the one Nami writes, but the one Zoro writes. The shape of things begins to become clear.

I find my stomach is full of acidic rage, not horror at all- or rather, the horror is turning to rage, churning all the while.
When I see the Tattoo on Hody’s arm, I become determined. My leap draws the rain-hurting bullets of water smack and splatter of my body, but they hurt about as much as a hard rain does. Certainly, I feel it - but Hody’s so called Mizu Dangan is really more of a… Hageshi Ame.

I kick off the air, and crash through the wave of bullets he sends at me like a gannet through the sea- and then, I slam a kick down to where he stood. He’s moved, sideways, towards the wall.

Hody Jones just smirks, and then his arm strikes out and digs into the wall. There’s a horrible grinding sound, and then he pulls his arm back- and the water begins to flood into the room.

I narrow my eyes.

He really has no idea what he’s dealing with.

Ohgodsohgodsohgodsohgod- wait, those are arrows. I can handle arrows-

Starlight Breaker!

My arrows arc through the air and strike down every water arrow Hody Jones threw my way- incidentally, I also ended up protecting all the guardsmen who’d crowded around, trying to get a view of the battlefield. The roar of the water is almost deafening.

“USOPP! GET THEM OUT OF HERE- BACK TO THE FALBACK POINT, GO!”

“BRYONY- WHAT ABOUT.”

“I’M STRONGER THAN I LOOK, USOPP. GET THEM OUT OF HERE- THIS ISN’T THE KIND OF BATTLEFIELD YOU OR THEY SHOULD BE CAUGHT IN.”

“I’LL SEE YOU THERE, MY FRIEND.”

“AYE.”

I take out a Pop Green, a special one- and then, as Hody Jones’ crew of morganeers comes boiling up the stairs, I prepare throw it down. Behind me, the guardsmen have already retreated, back into the hallway- I need to time this just right. I carefully toss the Pop Green down onto the balcony, making extra sure that my feet are on the other side of the lintel, before I turn, and run.

I shove and shout, and the guards turn and run too- but not before I hear a Green Nightmare Thorn sprout behind me, and the dying screams of men impaled on it’s thirsty claws and slavering leaves.
Good riddance to worthless trash.

Kick some ass, Bryony Lovelace.

I have gills. I hardly ever have to use them, but I have them. As the entire room fills with water, I can feel them fluttering under their armored plates of bone. My vision blackens to near darkness for a moment, and then my gaze brightens again, and settles to what I suppose must be normal, under the water- or it would, if they were open. I hate getting salt water in my eyes- it always stings, and then when I blink I can’t quite make myself open them again.

I close my eyes anyway.

I can feel myself starting to grin in that Monkey way. I don’t use the name, you see- but I am related to Captain by blood. Technically speaking, I’m his aunt. I’ve actually got a very similar appetite to Luffy, I just eat more balanced meals; and when it comes down to it, I can throwdown with the best of them.

Hell, I can even feel the Fae Marks starting to draw themselves across my face.

When Hody Jones punches me, I’m surprised more by the fact that it stings at all, than that he punched me. Ow- huh. He split the skin. I’m impressed.

I grin, and snarl my gleeful anticipation up at him. He hits me again, again again- rocking my face left and right, until tiny trickles of blood start to smear over my face, drip onto my chest, float out into the water around us both. I let him, to get a gauge of his strength. Fuck it.

I open my eyes, and grin up at my enemy, blood swirling away through my teeth. He snarls down at me.

And then I punch him in the gut.

Here’s the thing- the guys on the crew? They’re kinda… pussies. They’re great for working out technical details, don’t get me wrong- but actual practice in the kind of knockdown, drag out, hair and nails and fangs and blood in your eyes fighting that I’m actually good at?

Yeah, no.

Sanji taught me how to put bone breaking force behind my kicks; Franky taught me how to punch; Luffy taught me how to brawl.

Mab taught me how to punch a man in the throat with absolutely no remorse.

My actual style of fighting isn’t really kickboxing, it’s mixed martial arts with a heavy focus on Muay Thai, which is native to Goa Kingdom. That’s what Luffy’s actually using, when he fights, y’see- ah, but just like karate and wushu kung fu, there are a thousand and one different styles of Muay Thai. Mine’s the ancient traditional style, meaning it’s meant for nearly bare knuckle boxing and dark alleys- but there are others, for sure.

In Muay Thai, the hands are usually held open and palms forward. There are a few different reasons for this. As most who really study martial arts know, the limbs need to be loose and relaxed when striking; otherwise, you lose speed. Further, the punching and kicking is just what the style is known around the World for- in reality, there’s a lot of grappling in Muay Thai, which is what I’m really and truly gifted at. The best way to grab and grapple an opponent is to have open hands already waiting for counter attacks; thus, my stance.

I only form a fist about a half second before I hit- and even then, I’m not so sure a closed fist is the best way for my style.

Oh, good, he’s stopped vomiting.

“I’ll tell you something here and now, Hody Jones- if you come at me with anything less than your full strength, you will fail, and I will kill you.”

The snail I left under a wall sconce by the nightmarish strangle of green thorns listens intently, eyes wide.

“Who the hell are you, girl?”

“Bryony Lovelace-”

“-The First Lady of Song?!?! ”

“...you’ve heard of me?”

“Hell’s bells, woman, you’re a goddamn legend! The most beautiful voice in six generations!”

“Ah, thank you- really, that’s very kind of you to say.”

“...If you survive this, would you mind terribly giving me an autograph for my collection? I have nearly everything you’ve ever recorded, and quite a lot of your appearances in print-”

“-Oh my! Um- tell you what. If you manage to live through this, I’ll give you one of my original mixtapes- from before the record deal, even.”

“Signed?”

“Ye-es, I suppose I’ll even sign it.”

Honestly, my fans are fuckin’ weird as shit. And, as Hody Jones grins at his good fortune, he pops some kind of pill into his mouth and punches me across the room.

I embed into the stone wall.

Thank the gods, I thought he’d never take me seriously. Of course, he’s missed the whole point of the exchange entirely, but it’d be cruel to tear those scales over his eyes away now...

Kicks are effective in that they create distance, and much more force can be put into your leg than in, say, your arm or your head.

I kick myself free of the wall, and roll out of the way of Jones’ follow up punch. I slam a kick at the side of his knee, but it’s no good, he dodged and crushed another fist through the stone which I ducked and then I got one two three stone cutters into his back, right over a kidney.

Out in the desert, there aren’t many trees that need to be chopped down; or even should be chopped down. But no one cares about the rocks, or the ocean waves. Tree Cutter thus became Stone Cutter, and Wave Cutter too.

I dance back away from his whirling slash of arms and snarling invective, and then dance again as sharpened lances of spinning water strike where I stood not a moment ago.

I need to take out his mobility- target the big muscles of his legs, his shoulders, his gut. If I can break a few ribs, even- ah, I thought so. My kicks are strong enough to cleanly cut stone, much less bruise a body; his shirt’s falling away in tatters where I kicked him, and his skin is turning red-purple and bruised.

We circle each other; me, grinning. Him, snarling- and then we move in towards each other again. No openings near his ribs for a kick, but I can maybe sneak a jab in- he grabs my arm and pops one in my face but I stomp his toes flat and he lets me go, swearing foully. I feint left then swing with the right, putting the full force of one of my Gembreakers into his liver. I feel something go pop under my knuckles, and then I’m spastically jerking away from a series of deceptively delicate jabs. I can see the knife-sharp edging around the flats of his fists- I don’t want any part of that.

He’s starting to walk with a limp- not a bad one, not yet, but I strained something in his foot.

I think the real difference between Luffy and me- because we use the same style of fighting, really- is the difference between being a brawling sort of boxer with some kicks thrown in… and using Muay Thai in a brawling style.

In Muay Thai, punches are really for setting up kicks and knees- maybe even an elbow. There is a style called Muay Maat, which uses punches for knockouts, but- I’m just a bit too strong for that. If I punch someone to knock them out, odds to evens I’m going to break their head open or snap their neck.

Luffy grew up watching kickboxing matches; I grew up watching Muay Thai. In regulated matches, with like, scores and shit- Muay Thai relies on kicks because they’re weighted the heaviest for scores. I like using kicks because my legs are naturally stronger than my arms, and I can be much nastier with them. Luffy also doesn’t really clinch- but me? Oh sweetheart, if you ain’t clinching, you ain’t doin’ Muay Thai.

Clinching is a vital part of Muay Thai- so. Time to step it up.

When Jones comes in to punch me, I clinch his hand and hook my ankle around the back of his, sweeping him to the floor. Follow up with a stomp that I can feel cracking something- and then he sweeps me off my feet and we’re on the floor now. Thank the gods I know more than just Muai Thai.

My first elbow is just a testing sort of jab, aimed for the throat of course- but then he rolls and I’m underneath him, he’s trying to smash my head into the ground- no. I refuse. I squirm my arm out from underneath myself, and when he yanks me up again I twist in his hand, my hair loose and slippery between his clawed fingers and I lock my arm around his like a python and then I’m slamming knees into his liver again again again again until blood and mucus starts to dribble from his lips.

I brace one arm on the ground and one-two kick him off of me, letting go at just the right second to send him flying, a bruise shaped like my foot blooming under the shredding remains of his shirt, right over his sternum. Silt and chunks of stone drift down- I guess we’re kicking the ground pretty hard? Not my problem, really.

“King Neptune, it would be best to evacuate the palace entirely.”

“Miss Robin, what you are suggesting is a bit-”

We all duck and flinch as another juddering crash shakes the palace to its foundations.

“I was there when Bryony trained, these past two years. Sir, this, right now, is only the surface of her skill. We need to-”

A window shatters outwards, and a shuddery kind of groaning creak echoes through the palace. It’s exactly the kind of sound you don’t want to hear inside a building.

“Sire, it’s just a building; we have copies of everything important, even the small, everyday things. Let it go.”

“Aoxtl, this is where- this was Otohime’s home!”

“Coeurl, Otohime is dead. Let it go!”

“...Aye. Get everyone out- Burst Bubble Protocols. We rendezvous at the Gyoncorde Townhouse; have my sons informed, and no matter what happens to the palace, someone will need to remain behind to inform Shirahoshi-”

“I’ll handle it, sire. -Coeurl, you’re still our King, for as long as you live. You need to go .”

“...Aye, Lord Sinister. Miss Robin, would you accompany me to our next location?”

“-I’d be delighted. Usopp-!”
“I heard the whole thing. I’ll get our other horses, and if you tell Mab-”

“-I heard everything, all of our shit’s back on Sunny already-”

“-Right. Then I’m getting the horses. Go, Robin.”

“Right. Lead the way, sir.”

“Right- Edward, are you coming?”

“A’course I am, Coeurl. Haruta, tell Izo to scramble his position- we need a cloak for our dagger, aye?”

“Aye, Captain!”

“Ace, go with Miss Robin and the King.”

“Aye, Captain.”

I stumble just a bit under the weight of the snail rig as the palace shudders again, and Ace pulls me up by my bad arm- quite above and away from the burn, but still, it twinges. Finally, we both barrel after King Neptune, who is opening a hidden doorway and patiently waiting for us to join him.

I glance back and see Lord Aoxtl Sinister quickly and calmly instructing various officers of the Kingsguard in what I assume are emergency evacuation protocols. And that’s the last time I would ever see that man alive; I didn’t know it then, but... well. Some people can give very good advice, and not follow it at all themselves.

We run down a rapidly narrowing passage, following the King’s massive tail- before finally, we come to a doorway, leading to the outside. Ace and I are bundled onto a sledge, right next to the king; and then the entire sledge darts away from the palace, pulled by some of the largest and most muscular eels I’ve ever seen.

I feel I must mention, at this point, that the Palace is out and out swaying, like it had too many shots at the bar and is trying to walk back to it’s place but you know it’s about to fall down into the gutter and sleep it off until morning-

The king is… chortling?

“Oh, this takes me back.”

A rumbling of ‘gurararara-!’ echoes through the air, and I see the palace vibrate itself back into place. -O-o-oh my god. Oh my god what the hell.

“Ah, he’s gotten much better at that- it used to be that Edward would make any woman in a five to five hundred kilometer radius orgasm very strongly-”

“-oh my gods-“
“Ah, never mind. Good Old Edward; he’s still got all his old tricks, jamon! Gwahahahahahaha-!”

And, as we ride away from a palace that is being punched apart and vibrated back together, I firmly cross my legs and pray that Bryony finishes her fight soon. I’m not sure I can take much more of- nnnnngh! Holy fucking shit!

“Oh my gods!”

“Oh my goooodds; Pops, why are you like this-”

“Gwahahahahahahahahaha-!”

---

I fling myself out of the way of another punch, and realize what I have to do. I have to take this outside of the palace, otherwise when I really open up the Throttle, I’ll break everything; potentially the entire bubble around Fishman Island, which would be… bad. I’m strong enough to entirely reshape the floodplain of a stone and rock salt-flat desert; I’d rather not find out what happens when someone as strong as me lets loose in a heavily populated area.

This time, when Jones punches through the wall, I lunge out through the opening and bound through the rubble of the Hard Shell Tower. A plume of silt rises from where Jones’ landed, and I twist around to face it.

His snarling face breaks through like a dolphin cresting a wave.

It’s like this. Luffy has Gears. First, Second, Third, Fourth- Fifth, if it comes down to it.

I do not. I have Throttle, and Full Throttle.

Dance of Time is a Throttle move- I didn’t realize it then, but I was too exhausted to fight in the War of the Best, even if I had wanted to- and at that time, I didn’t. I’ve never had to use a Full Throttle move in a fight, mostly because most of my actual fighting happens on my snail rig.

Then again- desperate times, and all.

I jam my fist into his upper arm, and dig the claws of my fingers into the meat of his shoulder. I start kicking with the full length of my leg, dewclaw sharp and black and stabbing into him, the smell of blood thick and hot in the water- and then I’m being dragged through the rubble and slapped against every boulder and crumbled bit of load bearing ephemera.

It’s as he’s punching deep on my ribs that my temper finally snaps, and I can let go. Finally, I can let go- we’re already somewhere destroyed.

Time to wreck some shit.
“Throttle: Pinch Clinch Breaker!” is what I bellow into the cold water.

And then I break his leg- or I try to. Unfortunately, he squirms out of my punishing grip before I can snap his leg bones- I did manage to dislocate his kneecap, though. It was even the same leg as the foot I stomped, making him just a little bit more lame. Sadly, it’s not the same side as the kidney kick, but we can’t always be perfect-“Uchimizu!” is what he shouts as he throws a bullet of water at me, his other hand darting up and putting- more pills? Into his mouth. Huh.

Well. It looks like a bullet- it acts like a bullet. I could catch and return cannon balls without any training at all; catching his bullet is a simple matter. I can tell immediately that the force he put into his bullet is going to make something on my body break if I don’t- alter- it- I roll the ball of water between my two hands, and carefully twist even more force and spin inside of it. Time to clear some space. I-

Shit-

Duck, gotta- my hands are full, so- stomp his lamed foot again, this time feeling his bones snap and crackle under my heel. He howls with rage, and his teeth dig deep into my shoulder; he can’t break the skin though, even with his Fishman Karate. Just what I wanted- because, see, I swear to the gods, I’m not a fishwoman. I mean it, I’m not- I’m as Syreene as you can get. But if I had a mother, she’d have been a blue shark fishwoman.

And I’m much more flexible than Hody Jones could ever be.

I twist under the bite and put a Full Throttle Front Teep into his bruised liver; he squeals, but he doesn’t let go, so I do it again. And again; and then, I shift my weight and Full Throttle Rear Teep into his liver- that one, I feel runnels of blood start oozing from his mouth, his nose, snot and tears staining my shoulder and neck-

FULL THROTTLE REAR TEEP-!

And this time, I tear his teeth out at the root as I kick his liver into his spine.

I have momentum; don’t lose it now, Bry.

I walk forwards and roll the Uzumaki between my fingers, then my claws, and then as I duck a wild haymaker into my talons and my toes. Time to wash some of the salt and vinegar out of this boyo- Dance of Storms!

FULL THROTTLE UZUMAKI TE TRONG!
My foot jams into the left side of his face.

The World howls, and I do not.

I don’t swing; and I don’t howl; and I don’t let my enemies live, if I can help it.

Eventually, the sound deigns to change from some cosmic force of rushing waters, to merely the loudest thing I’ve ever heard, to a silence so deafening I almost wonder if I’ve managed to burst my eardrums- and then that silence too fades away. I am stood in a blasted scape of stones and dust, flattened like only truly violent weather formations can manage. A great sweeping pattern of spiralling ripples is dug into the ground, with me at its originating central point. In the far distance, I can see the wall of the palace split in two; thick contrails of dust whirl in cruel spirals, tangled noodles of wind only just beginning to die away.

Hody Jones, my enemy, is well more than three meters away from me.

The left side of his jaw has been set upon by the great forces released by my kick. He rests the whole of his weight on one bended knee- no, on what’s left of his left leg; the other is raised high, his foot braced and stuttering on the cool white dust and stone. His face is a ruin, a curling borehole dug into the glistening redness of where his left eye used to be, curving strands of flesh lifted clean away; the ivory pinkness of his teeth and gums open to the air. I can see the bone of his right arm, gone past the elbow and only the thicker flesh of his shoulder remaining, shredded and torn in deep, ragged, oblique angles.

His face is crushed into a howling anguish of pain, his working right hand pressed into the remains of his lips; I can see his tongue squirming around, passing something down his throat. I can see the remaining muscles of his throat working, the layers of torn skin and fat and muscle clenching and twitching and- I can see his right hand’s fingers digging into the unbroken flesh, trying to keep some anchor to the world through the pain of having half his body torn apart like that. I can see the white-pink-yellow of his skull, the cut through his shoulder, the layers of skin and sinew and fat and muscle and bone my kick tore through like paper.

I can feel my feet, resting on the smooth, leveled ground. I can feel my lasso, the weight of it’s golden Love heavy on my hips- a distraction to my enemy in all the right ways. Behind me, I can hear the palace let out a tortured scream, before something breaks and falls, a resounding crash of stone on stone following, before all is silent again. Beyond the crumbling wall of the palace- it’s almost completely shattered, only a few posts are still standing, and even those are falling now- I can see a ship like a great white whale in a soap-like bubble in the water, swimming by. I can see a small sleigh, being pulled by frankly enormous eels. I can just barely see a pair of horses, one of which has a rider with a bow on it’s back, the smallest of all the circling groups.

I drop my eyes back to Hody Jones.

He’s shoved off his only remaining leg, and is lunging through the water to try and gain a pyrrhic victory over me.

Points for effort; demerits for sense.

The movement of all dance comes from the feet. Keeping fluidity and grace in your body requires a certain looseness in your torso; your hands have to be like this, your arms like so, your legs like that - and you must never, ever, show the strain of it all in your face. The power of my dancing comes from the earth- from beneath the green and the dirt and the stones, to the very burning heart of the World. This was all a star, once, I think— and then it cooled, but it did not die. No, such things take more than just uncounted ages to die.

My movement comes from beneath my feet.

It rises through my legs, sets my hips to shaking and my arms to snaking— and then I’ve pushed my Shuto Uchi through the repeatedly bruised and tormented skin over his liver, then through the pulped and shredded remains of his liver, and then through his guts, up into his ribcage. My claws tear through the soft feathery velvet meat of his lungs and gills.

My palm touches the side of his heart; I can see in his eye an ocean of pure resigned terror. No man is truly ready to die, after all.

My claws slice through the skin-sack holding his heart in place inside his chest; they cut the tubes and strings and sinews holding the pump in place, connecting to it— all that keeps his blood in circulation, severed. I close my finger-claws and grip his slippery, fluttering heart, warm and hard in my hand.

“Dance of the Heartbreaker.”

I pull my handful from his chest, and push him aside with my other hand. My feet move in one, two, three-half—and four steps, and my hand crushes the meat to pulp and chunks. My hips shimmy and twist; my body curves in the water. A man won’t get far without his heart; and he’ll get nowhere at all without his liver.

Hody Jones has just enough left in him to twist, and throw some last ditch punch at me, a river of life blood and his guts and chunks of viscera bursting out of the rend in his torso as he does so.

“-murasame!” he rasps, before falling. That doesn’t stop his Will, or the malice of his technique; but it’s too little, too late, and he’s far too weak to ever consider defeating me like that. My hips shake and spin— my hands weave here, then there, then here again, striking shark-shaped bullets into mere gushes of water, and not strong gushes either.

My feet don’t move at all.

The fight’s over; but he’s not quite dead yet. I glide over to him, and flip him on his back. Ain’t right to let anyone die without being able to see the Dreamer’s Bubble, or the Sea of Stars. Not even pieces of shit like him. Or at least— I, personally, am better than that.

Hody Jones’ one remaining eye focuses on me, and a crackle of laughter bursts from broken teeth and a blood-caked throat.

“I meant to have your autograph, you know.”

“Mister Jones, I don’t give autographs.”

“I know, Miss Lovelace. I know. -Tonight, I meant to pay back the man who ruined my life… our lives. See how well I’ve done.”

“...by killing everyone in the palace, aye?”

“Well. That was just a bonus, really. -Think of it, girlie. To never again walk free through your homeland with a smile on your face and your lover’s hand in your own; to never again know the touch of your lover, to never see their smile or their fury; to know that you would never be free unless you managed to kill what are, in the end, just people? Oh yes, girlie; I’d kill for that!”

“...It seems to me the only thing you’ve left to do is die.”

“Hahahahaha- haaaghahagh- yes, I suppose so. I failed him, after all. I wish there had been another way for us to go. There wasn’t. I can only regret that it came to this; and pray, one day, to find my beloved Marlie somewhere across the Sea, someplace… w a r … a n d f r e e ...”

And so it was that Hody Jones died, much as he had lived: covered in blood, filled with regret, and longing to be free. And, as I would learn later, tragically loyal.

His crew followed their Captain- in life, and when I was done, in death, too.

I don’t remember what happened after that, not in great detail.

I came back to myself surrounded by rapidly decaying bodies, their flesh turning rotten before my eyes and melting into toxic slime. Bones disintegrated into ash; clumps of hair turned brittle and white before my very eyes. The bits and pieces on me cracked and crumbled into foul smelling ash and dust, and even that wasn’t long lasting- the rushing waters of currents still swirling from my earlier kick scoured my body clean.

Eventually, I was stood on a spiraling field of stone, painted black with the remains of the New Fishman Pirates. Their flag was the only thing remaining of that crew- and when I saw that no one living remained, I tore it down and left it forlorn in the dirt.

Hody Jones had disintegrated entirely; not even his clothing remained. His crew, slaughtered; his flag, dishonored; Look on my Works, ye Mighty, and despair! Nothing beside remains. Round the decay of that colossal Wreck, boundless and bare the lone and level sands stretch far away.

I listen to the grounds of the Palace; there’s no one left alive except for me- and the Sunny’s dogs-oh, and my phone snail. Pearblossom, Bubbler, and Buttercream- I was wondering where they got off to. Buttercream’s massive form glides by, checking on me- before she turns, and swims away, away, away and is gone from my sight.

I calmly walk over to a reasonably comfortable looking rock, up a strangely gentle slope. A bit above the battlefield, washed clean of the gore of my bloodrage; an ammonite, split in twain. The remains of what happened here are ground into the earth; and nothing else but dust and a discarded flag, weapons driven into the dirt and shattered by my hand.

The stone is sort of… couch shaped. Or it is once I give it a few taps with my foot and sweep away the dust with a Throttle Force wave of my opened hand. I turn, and carefully sit on the couch, and when nothing protests overmuch, I recline back on it. The dogs come and find me there, and- after I sit up to let Bubbler shove herself underneath my back, and move one of ‘Blossom’s paws so her nails aren’t digging uncomfortably into my pussy- I relax.
I stare up at the fading darkness, the black turning pink and gold near the central pillar of Eve. It has come to this at last; I Bryony Lovelace stand alone to greet the dawn.

Er.

Metaphorically, I mean.

Gods, what a night. I hope my friends are all okay- I just need to- oh, Bubbler has my phone, the one I left under a wall sconce, good. I just need to- to rest my eyes, for a moment.

Just a moment, is all…

---

I wish I’d never had to remember what it’s like to be on a battlefield.

I remember the first time that I ever saw one of my friends lying dead in the field; I did spend four years at the Front of the War, after all.

During a major push during the War, my unit had been encircled and we were pinned in a very shallow trench, one of many. The enemy started shooting with canons, and those damned minny balls- ah, they were what bullets came from. A minny ball was the latest innovation in bullet technology during the War, and left very different wounds from the normal millet-shot. Minnys were heavier, faster, and went through flesh and bone like shit through a goose.

The only way to safety was to run over a large area without cover, while our gunners and riflemen laid down a screen of fire. We left that trench in twos and threes, and I was one of the very last to go.

When I jumped over the edge of the trench, I saw one of my friends laying face down in the mud; his skin was pale, and he wasn’t moving at all. Just a moment earlier, he’d been running towards safety, just like the rest of us. Then and there, he was face down in the dirt, a wet hole in his back like raspberry jam over clotted cream.

I had no time to feel anything or think about him and I didn’t stop running for a moment. I ran and I ran, until I was back amongst my fellows and hunching down into a much deeper trench. A few meters away, just barely an arm’s length from the trench was another friend- and it pains me now to say it, but I don’t remember his name, or his face. I only remember his hat- he wore top hats, said they were… they were somewhat ordinary, by being quite extraordinary. I never did understand what the hell he was talking about.

The hissing whizzing noise of bullets, the distant crackle of guns- like firecrackers- and the sudden pop of a minny just missing my ear; no, I don’t remember my friend’s name, or his face, or even the color of his hair. Just his top hats. We were caught there for hours, until our cavalry swept the enemy away and we could dig into our position. It was only later, well after that battle, that the true meaning of what I’d seen really sunk in.

I wasn’t going to see or speak to my friends anymore. I’d never see them again, not until I myself had died. It’s around then that I started wearing top hats myself.

Our next big battle was only two weeks later; that’s when I got separated from my unit and met the wakwak who taught me to play violin, before she killed herself. For a long time after that, I wasn’t the same man at all- the great grinding rage that had driven me to join the army was long smothered.
under mud and shit and rat bites; my youthful lightheartedness was gone as well, then. I aged fifty years in just under five hours, all told- and it would only be after the War entirely, out at Sea, that I would regain some of my old vigour.

The girls are fine, I suppose- they’re comporting themselves admirably. The first rush of battle saw a roiling of blood and guts and shit spray over the lovely cafe; merjin and gyojin throwing bullets of water in and out of the broken windows and from behind barricades.

Adelaide is acting very much like a heavy artillery unit; her webbed hands reach out and grip at the air, and then one of her open palms shoves forwards in a punch- and outside, I can hear as men and women die screaming, and I can see thick clouds of smoke and broken bodies flailing in the grip of her powerful Fishman Karate.

Beatrix, and her shearswords, are a deadly and brutal combination. She’s fast, and strong, and the control of her lane of battle is remarkable. Her hair is all but plastered to her head with the blood of her enemies, and her face is a smooth mask of chilling serenity. However, she’s working in a tag team with her sister, Cecelia.

Taffy is an opera clown; most of her actual battle skills, in regard to clowning, revolve around acrobatic skill and actual wushu.

Cecelia is an old fashioned Fightin’ Fool. I have never, ever seen anyone so young with so much technical skill- good lord, fifteen men in a single ladder and thirty more taken out by a bit less than eight custard pies. She’s a marvel.

Whoops- I misstepped, and one of my Hanauta Sancho: Yahazu Giri missed, and flew out into the air. I do hope nothing happens to any innocent in that direction; I’d feel simply terrible about it for ages.

I say, I say, I say.

The College of Clowns at Amazon Lily is one of a chain of such institutions, stretching up and down the Line. There’s the Guild of Fools, in Alabasta; Joculators Junction, on Jaya; the Guild of Minstrels, which is attached to the Gran Tesoro; the Gauntlet of Buffoons, which is attached to a circus based out of Sabaody; and the Mime’s Tower, which is somewhere in Skua. In Amazon Lily, at least, the College was located about half a mile upwind of the sewage treatment plant, and right next to the Iga School of Deportment Training.

Clown College AL stands on a site with gloomy and unnerving history; the entire campus has an aura of deep, endless suffering and misery. The sight was originally home to the Sisters of the Blood Drunk Moon, an order of religious contemplatives. Little remains in the way of facts about these women, other than the fact that they were wiped out in 547 in their entirety by a mysterious fire and a highly localized earthquake. Shortly after the dissolution fo the monastic order, the site and remains of the monastery were bought on the cheap by the College. They saved the most useful buildings-such as the Chamber of Spikes and the Scorpion Track, and the nun’s cells- and they built up the rest according to archaic hilarity designs. Prior to it’s use by the nuns, some of the oldest records at Amazon Lily note that a building known only as the Plague House stood on the site, and before that, the Petit Ossuary.

All in all, an impeccable past history for a College pledged to bring it’s own unique brand of entertainment to the World, whether the World wants it or not.

The current Dean of the College is Dr. August. Although the reputation of the college is one of fun and games, there’s a lot of discipline involved in becoming an actual Clown. Happy people don’t really become clowns; and at Clown College, the fun is always somehow forced. In public performances, clowns hit each other with sticks or custards or other objects until the audience laughs; the real natural reaction for the audience is horror and unease. During emergencies such as a fire, the clowns continue their supposedly funny assaults on their colleagues, with the less-used props like buckets and stepladders.

Every clown has a ‘face’- the face full of Slap is the only Face any clown will admit to having. Each Fool, upon graduation to the title, will represent their face with a painted egg made to resemble their particular arrangement of make-up. These faces can be passed down through many generations, and the eggs are kept in the Cryptorium. Showing graduated fools an unpainted egg is bad luck, considering it represents someone without a face at all. Clowns in particular come from the Skuan tradition, and as with all Skuans, Makeup is a very important part of daily life. Fool’s makeup is referred to ‘slap’, and it’s common to see it being borrowed across generational lines. However, no fool would ever copy another fool’s makeup outright- that’s Face Stealing.

Clowning is the dark art of cutting men down without ever drawing blood. However, there always comes a point when drawing blood is the only option- thus, we get to battle clowning. It’s a formal martial art where the skills and tools of clowning are used, with a brutal precision, to incapacitate, wound, and even kill an opponent.

It takes the old standard ranking of student Fools as levels in a belt-like system, and the various styles of clowning are the actual styles. The appellation of ‘Fool’ is actually a misnomer in many cases; the repartee of a fool is really wisdom of the highest order. Of our entire crew, it’s myself, Brook, and Franky who actually give out the most sensible advice for the situation at hand. We’re also the silliest members of the crew.

In truth, the martial art practiced by only the hardest Fools and Clowns is called, amongst my fellows, Slapstick. Anyone doubting its efficacy, or the skill required to use it, should reflect on this clowning is, at bottom, a carefully modulated and choreographed process of insane violence and vicious insults, wherein (hopefully) nobody is actually injured in any way. Slapstick is clowning without moderation.

It came, as so much of the Clown heritage does, from the Wilds of Skua many Ages ago. In those days, traveling bands of wild Clowns would fight each other for the choice of performing venues. It’s not explicitly said, of course, but anyone travelling in the Wilds of Skua has more than just professional competition to contend with, such as predatory flora, swarms of flying eels, lurching revenants, and gargantuan foe-beasts. Even a group of people traveling through such environs must have some way of defending themselves.

Ages passed, and the original method of Clown Combat became a form of formal duelling among the apprentice and student clowns in the town of Slapp, where the scars of a sloshi fighter were worn with pride. This is where the first clowning armament came into being- the stick. It was there, in that little town, that the venerable and most ancient form of clown combat came to be: slapstick, which sees more use in battle than any other Clown Combat Art I know of.

It is in the records of Amazon Lily that the Clown College there has provided at least one full Ship of Fools that have campaigned- quite memorably- to the horror of the reigning Empress, her court, and her military commanders. However, as this was the only way an invading army could be routed, and indeed, was the only way an enemy army was routed…

I can’t say I’m shocked it worked, really. The Fool’s Errand was crewed with that years graduating class, a veritable ‘Who’s Dat’ of Clowns, Fools, Minstrels, Mimes, and Joculators. ‘Grandma’, ‘Marco Polo’, the Marx Brothers, Calamity Jane; and all of them well-versed in slapstick techniques. Captained by the legendary ‘Uncle Bootsie’, a seventh-nose practitioner and slapstick specialist, during their only campaign, the crew of the Fool’s Errand slew seventeen Germa mercenary boats in a single mêlée, armed only with a ladder, two buckets of wallpaper paste, a box of marbles, and five lemon-custard pies. It is said amongst the clowns that when this was first demonstrated on the field of combat, forty-one other mercenary boats were incapacitated by laughter and overpowered by the rest of the Amazonian fleet, who appreciated the joke only in that it allowed them to flank their enemy and offer them a stunning reversal.

Not everyone can get the joke.

As Gurry and I dance through the violent night, I am struck by the pure potential of our new crewmate- I think her name starts with a C? She’s killed fourteen men with nothing more than some string, a small handful of rubber bands, and a purple balloon. She’s also incapacitated several of the enemy riflemen with a large ladder, and their screams and moans of pain as they try to extract themselves from their wooden prison are swiftly silenced by no less than eight custard pies in the air at once. Well, no- those are flans, so she’s really flinging them, but my gods- eight in the air at once!

One of her flans was just knocked off course- ah, I see, Brook tripped and one of his strikes went wide. It’s funny- I’ve got a strange feeling about that wiggly pie-cake-custard on a plate. I mean… reading tea leaves and gazing deep into crystal balls is considered the most sophisticated, witchy form of divination. However, the only kind I can actually get anything out of is either very aggressive belomancy, usually with highly explosive arrows; by reading the shrapnel off of exploded fireworks (though grenades and smoke bombs work as well); or by slam dunking a jar of preserved root vegetables onto pavement.

Sanji does Not Allow foodstuff divination of any kind.

But that Flan! I can feel the whirling infinite suddenly fixing onto that flying bit of flat cake; a strange spoon-full of Fate being drizzled over the caramel top of that creamy goodness even as I gut a man with my sword. Adelaide’s Fishman Karate launches the plate of flan ever higher; a stray arrow gives it lateral spin; a dead woman’s decapitated head knocks into bottom of the plate forehead first, giving it direction.

A flailing mermaid’s cartwheeling gives the flan force- and then I have to focus on the battle. Somewhere, high, high above, I hear the unmistakable howling of a man getting hit full in the face with a Clown Combat Pie to the Face- a Slap in the Face, my gods.

A man with a pair of axes and four legs total slaps into an open space on the ground, chunks of Battle Pie dripping off his head. I can tell how she made her custard cake from here- it’s a caramel base made of brown sugar, transferred to a one-piece pan lined- no, no lining. Ten egg yolks incorporated and half a cup of cool milk- I’m not close enough to smell what kind. Aha, Skuan Vanilla- only the best vanilla, and nearly three hundred proof at that. Evaporated milk; sweetened condensed milk- ah, I see. She combined a flan and a cheesecake. Cheesecake flan; it’s probably delicious- I can even tell from the way it’s breaking up on Vander Decken 9’s furious face that she took it out of the oven while it was still ooey-gooey in the middle.

I suppose when it comes down to it, all Clowns and Fools have the psychopathic instinct to kill deep in their soul, and it doesn’t matter if they’re drawing blood or not. A humorist slays, even if they’re no good at all. We’re all descended from our ancient jocular ancestors; and in those days, as it is now- humor is serious business.

Brook and C the Clown come running out of the Cafe. Brook has Solid Soul drawn and brandished; C is following him with a baguette, held in a very respectable Slapstick grip. The stink of chemically altered blood is thick in the air- all the older members of the Karate-ka who fought here are dead or dying, and the smell of drugs in their blood is strong to my nose. As they die, parts of their body begin to wither with rapidly accelerated aging.

It stinks like the bottom layer of the jungle, but not- like… poisoned earth, it’s foul. How could they put that vile putrid poison into themselves-?

“-stay well clear, Cece Clown; a baguette is not enough of a weapon in this fight.”

“But it’s month old yeasteel, Mr. Brook!”

“No, Cece.”

And then Brook is lunging forwards. I have to say I agree with him; a baguette is the snake-iest of the breads, and a fresh piece of yeasteel can take down fifteen strong men in the proper hands, but… Cece is flagging visibly, the strain of her earlier pratfalls more than her narrow little body can handle. Even the additional strength of a month’s aging isn’t enough, in this case.

By the time Gurry and I are in position, Cece gasping her wind back behind Gurry’s protective stance and me with Kusanagi at the ready, Brook is falling in a chiming clatter of broken bones. Ah shit, Brook is all bones though- shit!

I draw blood from Decken’s left arm before his fist can break Brook’s skull.

“GURRY, CECE- GET BROOK OUT OF HERE. I’LL HANDLE THIS.”

“AYE!” shouts Gurry as Cece gathers Brook up in her arms- no you don’t -

I cut the first spear down out of the air. Kusanagi rings with joy in battle.

My older brother, Mihawk, once fought me to ‘see where I was along the path of the Swordfighter’. And then, when it was done, him with a new wound that would scar and me with a deep appreciation for my partnership with Kusanagi- he told me this. If I ever wanted the title of World’s Greatest, he’d lose it to me.
I told him that he’d have to keep the title, as I had no interest in such things- and neither did my sword.

He laughed, and then said- almost musingly- “You move the sword like it’s a ribbon, Taff. And your feet slither over the ground, you hardly step at all. It makes for a marvelous style- to witness and battle against. I’ve seen no other like it.”

“Thank you, Mihawk.”

What he meant was this.

Anyone can get a sword and swing it; however, achieving the true art of my particular style of swordfighting takes practice, precision, and an unconscious and reflexive understanding of rhythm. When I fight, I’m not just fighting for myself- I’m fighting for my crewmates, and further, the honor of my teacher, Zoro; thus, every time I draw my blade, I take up a heavy responsibility. I am up to the task, of course- but it would not do to understate the fact that there’s a task at all.

Similarly, anyone can put a tassel on a sword’s hilt and call it a Fae Blade, but that is not true. You have to understand; the tassel serves more than just one or two functions. It’s true, it acts as a lanyard and an extra bit of length to the blade, useful for certain strikes- the thrusts, I believe. Certainly, one could wrap it around their hand and then take up the blade, thus providing a way to keep blood from fouling their grip. And, of course, my green is my green, and no one else may wear it on our crew- but that’s just… window dressing, really.

There’s a fundamental feature of the tassel that Mab probably doesn’t realize simply because all the tassels for her spear are exactly the same- red horse hair in a plume, same same same every time. For swords, there are two kinds of tassel. There’s the prestige tassel, which is made of silk and expensive gemstones, or figures of exotic wood, or even marble. Some prestige tassels are suitable for slow Kata practice, while the very heavy versions are best for decoration only- for weddings, funerals, or transporting the sword without the wielder.

The wushu tassel is often made from a material called Ice Silk, which cold to the touch, shiny, smooth, soft, light, fluid, and ludicrously durable. Handmade wushu tassels are better than machine made, and they shouldn’t have any stones or weights on them- they’re built to be as light as possible to allow for the fastest movements.

If I’m just practicing my kata- drilling, really- I go at half or quarter my full speed, and work to perfect every single movement I make. During those times, I put a prestige tassel on my Kusanagi. Her balance point is a bit less than two centimeters off the guard, which supports me using her to slash, explosive thrusts, and enhances the power of impact. However, for kata drills I prefer a heavy tassel which puts the balance directly on the guard, or even behind it. Why? It creates the perfect environment for smooth, slow, controlled movements. When I’m working out new movements entirely, I put on the heaviest tassel I have; it puts the balance point in my actual hand, which gives me the most control over the sword, but the least actual ‘fighting power’.

I’m fighting Vander Decken with a wushu tassel. It’s faster, suited for explosive movements; and the way it moves in the air, or rather- the way I can make it move in the air is enough to distract Decken just enough for me to- dart forwards- and-

Cut-

Him-
I fling myself to the side of his first hand full of bearings, and then spin Kusanagi through the air to Cut their connection to Decken.

The sword is the weapon of a gentle person. Every style, even the most brutish, have specific artistry to them, and require ten year's worth of dedicated study to master. By that measurement, I have a long, long way to go- I’m two thirds of a third down the path of mastery, if that makes sense. Which is why I am so insistent on saying, and meaning, that I will never be the Greatest in the World.

I will never be the Greatest Swordswoman in the World. That is not my way. My way is more like dancing- my sword can strike anywhere I wish, but around point six meters is ideal. Within that distance between myself and my enemy, Kusanagi can move between one and a half and three and a half meters in any direction. Kusanagi is actually a bit wider than most jians, being so old; she’s three centimeters wide, from tang to tip.

My style began in Water 7, where Mab taught me to dance. The beat I follow is made of my heart, and my breath; one, two, three, four. The rhythm of a fight is like this- there’s my heart, and my breath, and my enemy’s heart and breath as well. When they clash, the rhythm is slow, and it is time to position myself as best I can. When they synchronize, my blade will meet flesh again.

The pace of the fight is the movement of us two; I use large, flowing movements during the slower parts, and sharp, quick movements that let my blade flutter and flap.

Ah, I see.

I don’t need ghosts to be haunted; I can wander my own home, wailing and crying and throwing things. Similarly, I don’t need to keep cutting his weapons out of the air; I need to take a leaf from Bryony’s tree.

I charge forwards. I let the flat side of the single-headed axe slam into the top of my head. I get close enough to smell him, he smells like- urgh, Swagger by the Spicy Soap Company isn’t a bad cologne, but no cologne should ever be used like body wash! As my vision starts to blur and spark because that was one hell of a hit, Kusanagi rises up- and then I put my all into it- and-

Cut-

Through-

Him-

I can hear his scream as I succumb to my concussion; the last thing I remember of that night was the sight of Vander Decken 9’s left arm flying off of his body in a fantastic spray of arterial blood.

Sente goes to us, fucker-

When my wielder falls, I twist in midair and rise again as a woman, full and flush with battle malice.
We be of one blood, her and I—thus, I will not be wielded in this lifetime by anyone other than Dracule Taffeta.

Our enemy is a fishman, stood upon four legs of uniform length. His right arm is still intact; but his left arm is severed a hand’s width above the elbow. He screams, and gurns, and bawls like a child—and then he gathers himself enough to bind his wound. Pity, that.

Our enemy is smart, for an idiot— he considers the battlefield, and what he has lost, and then he sneers. He takes a double headed axe engraved with a red rose of romance and, with one leg wrapped around it, flings it and himself into the air. The two whirl in a great circle, to the horrified disgust of the Freebird Postals; they glare and jeer at him as he hurtles away, far beyond my sight.

The final wave of enemies approach, but—ah! Cavalry! That stench—those clothes— I see; I know what Queen Mab has done. As the enemy force charges towards us, behind them comes a thronging crowd of furious Umbrae. I suppose in the modern parlance, they would be called goblins— either way, they are making the hammer to the Freebird’s anvil, and between them, the encroaching forces are crushed, utterly.

With the falling of the final foe, I lift my beloved Lady from the mucky dirt, and bear her away from perdition to that place where her wounds might be granted succor. Queen Mab, I see, stays behind and quietly, business-like, thrusts her spear down; here, then there, and thus again. Beneath her strikes, men and women moaning and crying from deathblows are silenced forever.

Queen Mab the Merciful, indeed.

My battle instinct has me up on my feet, all three swords drawn and Asura blurring my figure in three directions before I realize that I won’t actually be fighting this time.

When I stood to guard Nami, she woke up just enough to see what we’d be facing. Then, she settled herself more comfortably on the bench, and used her Weather Ball. A thick haze of cloud surrounded her and the bench, and stroked up and down my back with her loving affection. Saa, I’m so glad she’s here with me.

There’s no-one else I’d rather have at my back—not here, not now. Not with the Princess Shirahoshi still praying at her mother’s grave. Jinbe, who was sitting next to us on a different bench, more of a hill I’d say, has stood as well, and is standing next to me.

In front of us, an array of ugly ready to throw down.

Part of the reason I had such a time of it with Shirahoshi is that, at the very core, her manner of fighting is very much like Nami’s. Behind me, I can feel a thickening soup of mist and cloud growing into a towering storm-wall, thick and black and furious in a way I can only call ‘Maternal’. Every hair on my body prickles with tension.

“Jinbe. When Nami makes her move, go to the Princess.”

“Zoro- sssssSSSS! ...Ah; Nami’s a Weather Mage, isn’t she.”
“Yeah. Yeah, she is.”

“...Should I close my eyes?”

“Eeh. Brace them, at least.”

I can hear the roaring of the enemy pirates now. I puff my cheeks and empty my lungs; reach out deep into the World, and feel the energies Nami is weaving. I can feel moisture, the air going thick and hot and cold, too, as water that was just hovering, that laid sleeping in puddles, is being bade to rise and disperse into the air. I can feel the churning, rolling motion high above, of clouds moving around each other and dust and mist grinding over each other; the rising, unbearable tension in the atmosphere.

I can feel the sky darken, blacken, the stars above us winking out as thick, black clouds turn the World dark. All around us, plants and stones and animals and the people, too, are lit with contrails of light that flutter and spark across my sight.

It’s a strange experience, this Island at night- without starlight, without the soft whisper of waves, without even the soft rustle of a breeze… it feels like some strange, alien place, a place that almost no one is welcome. It’s as if we’ve all been transported backwards in time to a more ancient world; before the Merrow and the Kappa had conquered the darkness beneath the Sea and pierced the hide of the night with fire. Before Goblins and Gremlins poured lighting into jars and bade it serve them. Before Djinn and Fairies tamed the Winds and rode them as they will’d; before Orcs and Elves manicured and combed the forests, and ploughed their fields with iron.

Beheld in the glimmering lights of the World Under the Sea, the bench behind me felt like some ancient cairn I dare not disturb; my beloved Nami had become some ancient chthonic goddess woken from her slumber in a towering fury; the tall cliffs and hills made mighty and unknowable things, the encroaching pirates an army of wholly unnatural figures.

In front, leading the charge was a mounted spectre, a humanoid form adorned with markings so red and oozing as to be blood, freshly drawn from and onto his skin; red rings, shimmering blue and grey at the edge but burning in the center. Beneath him snarled a maw of some kind of fish, horrible and ugly and far to high up in the water to be native. Some kind of angler fish, maybe? Something.

From all around, from every cloud, there arose the sound of Nami’s battle cry.

I could not adequately describe that sound were I as trained in poetry as I am in swordsmanship.

It was singular yet multiplied, an exclamation of a rage so deep and black as to be- unmistakably-arisen from the very coldest, deepest, densest depths of hell. It was the pure distillation of every snarl, growl, roar- every angry sound one could ever hear, through all the halls of history. It was the rush of fire in the blood at an insult, and the choking back of vile words, and the cranking churn of acid in the belly; the winding tension of every limb held back from striking; and the sick, ugly thrill of knowing that should you move you could not be stopped; it was the pure, unrelenting agony of a storm, unbroken. It was Nami- green in soul, but red in tooth and claw.

Even now, I shudder at the barest echo of that sound.

It’s only Jinbe and my attentiveness to the moment that allows us to brace ourselves in time.
Funny thing about having lethal amounts of electricity coursing through one’s body with intent.

It overcomes whatever haki you have almost immediately, because unless you’re made out of something non-reactive- like wood, or rubber- you’re conductive. Then, you aren’t blasted away like you might have seen in a pulpy or a comic.

What actually happens is you get very, very stiff as every muscle in your body contracts at the same time. It’s agonizingly painful, too, as every nerve in your body fires off at once, and then just keeps going; but all you feel, beyond the horrible pain, is your body twitching just the littlest bit here and there. You also can’t just let go of whatever’s shocking you, either- thanks to the muscle contractions, of course.

As the current hits higher and stronger, your lungs stop working- because all human breath is controlled by the diaphragm, which is the muscle below your lungs that actually, y’know, makes them work at all. Then, of course, your heart seizes too- because it’s all muscle. Ah, yes- and, because the human body is basically a sack of water with some rocks and lots of salts in it, the person being electrocuted is also being electro-ovened and burned, too. Lightning is awful stuff; and results in a fairly terrible way to die. As I understand from what Nami told me, it’s one of the most excruciatingly painful ways to die.

As I recall, electricity is one of Nami’s main focuses when it comes to physical manifestations of her magic, immediately followed by wind. Wind is her primary, I think. I am the anvil; Nami’s the hammer. I’m the mountain; Nami’s the Wave. When the two of us fight together, nothing at all can stand against us.

We get to th’ place and Nami’s already Happened. Heh- when Nami Happens to someone, they stay Happened. The Wind picks up, an’ it’s a strange, dry thing; the misty cloudy area breaks apart. I can smell the stench of shit and burnt meat, and as me’n Mark’n th’horses round the corner, I can see why.

Nami Happened, and roundabout’s a hundred- hundred fifty or so men, women, and battle-animals died. Painfully, considering the last time I saw marks like that on a person, it was Conis and her wings. She couldn’t really move them without wincing a little.

Mark an’ me ride on, eventually coming to Zoro an’ Nami, resting on a stone bench together. Zoro’s got one a his swords flicked out at the tsuba, the white one, Wado, but the rest of him is very, very still; and Nami’s gotten her whip out, too. The very tip of it is flicking and twitching like the tail of a cat, and between the fingers of her other hand the little bell she wears now flickers gold.

Mark’n me ride over, dismount- Mark settles hisself into a seat near enough Zoro an’ Nami to be helpful if battle comes. The horses snuffle around a bit, before startin’ to eat on the grasses and leaves all around. Mark’s sittin’ just at an angle, a little up a ways from Nami an’ Zoro, his guns big and heavy and ready to shoot in his hands.
I nod to my crewmates, who nod back; and then I hike up the hill to where I can see a giant mermaid murmuring over clasped hands, and... some blue guy? Oh! Oh, that’s Jinbe- I didn’t recognize him at first because he was wearing a different kimono last time, and a different obi too.

I didn’t think I’d get to actually see him, though- even with him being in th’ Sea Forest ‘till Beltane, we usually end up leavin’ before that sort of thing can get worked out...

“Hey, Jinbe- I got your message!”

“Ah, Luffy-san, it’s good to see you again.”

The princess, who was still for a long moment, jerks up and turns- and smiles, tears running down her face.

“Sir Jinbe!”

“-Ah! Princess Shirahoshi, hallo-”

“Princess, what are you doing outside your-?”

“I’m done hiding. I’m going to face him, and kill him- I’ve decided, Jinbe.”

“Princess… that’s not what your Honored Mother would have wanted-”

“Don’t presume to tell me what my Mother would have wanted. No one knows what she wanted- or if they do, they’re certainly not telling me about it! She’s gone, Sir Jinbe; and I am done hiding.”

The Princess, still crying, lets out a low warbling sound and then spins, her massive naginata slicing through the air and bringing a big fuck-off spear crashing to the ground. Her tail slaps the ground near the grave.

Jinbe is pale, and kind of- sad? Proud, but sad.

“No one has the power to force me to hide away, a prisoner of my own home- no one. It isn’t right, and I won’t allow it.”

“That’s exactly what she said...”

“Wha-?”

“That’s exactly what your mother said, when she started using the contents of the Tamatebako to kill her political enemies.”

“Wh- what are you talking about?”
“I had hoped that someone would have explained it to you, but I see that no one has. Very well; Princess, your Mother was not a pacifist. She spoke for equality, and for the end of war between our people and the Surface- but she was no pacifist.

“I was.

“When you were born, I was assigned to be your chief guard, and to appease the tongue-wags at court, I was knighted as well. And then, Lord Marlintin Desterous and Hody Jones got their claws into- or were courted by- Vander Decken 9. I suppose they told you that I just- disappeared, aye?”

“Yes.”

“Hmph. I did not just ‘disappear’, Princess; I was ordered to become a part of the Oka Shichibukai by your Honored Mother, to ‘foment goodwill towards the Seaward Races’. I could not disobey; by knighting me, your Honored Mother had gained a power over me equivalent to my old captain, Fisher Tiger. To keep my honor, I could not disobey her.

“It was right here, that it happened. Your Honored Mother offered me power beyond measure- the content of the Tamatebako itself- and I refused. We fought; and I lost. As the winner of our duel, your Honored Mother told me to leave, and not return- and to never, ever speak to you of what had happened.”

“I’m not my mother, Sir Jinbe. Even now, you have not told me exactly what she did- or didn’t do, as it may happen. Even so; I am not her. I will not do what she did.”

“I don’t know if I can believe that, Princess. Your mother… she spoke of how we Seafolk could take control of our own identities, how we’d been convinced to ignore our own potential. Even now, I’m not sure if she meant that earnestly, or if it was just- talk.

“I wish she would have listened to me. The tools of the oppressor cannot be used to free the oppressed; joining forces with the now defunct World Government only led to ruin and disaster.”

“Would your way have helped, Sir Jinbe?”

“...I don’t know, Princess.”

“...It’s fine. But- Sir Jinbe, this has to stop. Even if we don’t agree on the way forwards, no one deserves to be trapped as I have been; and you do not deserve to be—”

“I wish your mother had killed me, back then. At least if I were dead, I wouldn’t have to know how little I mattered to her. She didn’t even tell you! She sent me away and she never even told her friends why… she didn’t tell my friends anything at all...”

“I’m going to tell them, Sir Jinbe. I’m going to tell them everything. You were my very first teacher, and you deserve that recognition.”

“Heh. Then you really are better than her. -Saa, I- I’m sorry, Princess. You shouldn’t have to deal with old men’s regrets.”

“Maa- don’t worry about it. I’m a Princess, after all; it’s what we do.”

Ah. So that’s how it is.
I wander off, after that—let Jinbe and Princess Crybaby have their conversation. I climb down the hill, nod once to the grave of the old Queen, and then keep walking around. Hey! It’s the Sunny!

I was wondering where he’d gotten to… Huh. Looks like Franky’s working on it with some guys—and there’s Chopper, and Nursie G… and I think those are her sisters? Interesting.

Ah—something’s coming.

I’m a thief. That’s what I do.

My oldest sister, Adelaide, works at the Gyojo as an instructor and punching-dummy, all in an effort to one day get close to mastery of Fishman Karate Wado-ryu. Beatrix is a thaumaturgic naturalist, and collects powerful mystical reagents to sell—and also for Genevieve. Cecelia’s a professional clown, and a more terrifying force of violence I’ve yet to meet. Deborah is a cook, with a terrible way with recipes—good at innovation, but… not at recipes. Fernanda’s a fortuneteller—she does dice, palmistry, and small prophecies, mostly in the less gentrified parts of Coralia. Genevieve’s a nurse-practitioner; if she has the right doctor backing her up, she can actually act as a doctor on her own.

Then there’s me. I guess there’s one in every family—and I’m the one in ours. The one that doesn’t quite fit in, I mean.

All my sisters have more or less law-abiding jobs. I’m the one who steals things. I’m the only one who fits the stereotype of a ‘Thieving Goblin Brat’, as I’m an actual thief, and if you’re from Gobdark, you’re a Goblin.

When it comes down to it, I don’t really fight if I can help it. I certainly can defend myself, if I have to—but if you’re noticing me at all, I’ve already failed. I started out not really stealing at all; mostly, what happened was my good friend, Darla, and I would go off to find no-funds entertainment. We ended up exploring the nooks and crannies of Gobdark, and eventually the rest of Coralia and Dunshilly. In our explorations, we’d find buildings that weren’t locked, and houses that had been abandoned. One night, we ended up finding a lost and found in an abandoned hotel—and there were still things we could grab, make off with, and sell.

Easy money; the easiest hundred thousand beri I ever made.

Things escalated from there.

As a thief, you’re in retail service: you shift items from low sales venues, to high sales venues; you haggle, bargain, protect, hide, and if you have to, destroy the merchandise. Some objects are so dangerous that you can’t allow them to continue to exist. A contract for a job you didn’t do—because that sort of thing is illegal, for example—is best kept safe with a thousand degrees of lava-flow.

The tools of my trade are pretty basic—a set of lockpicks is the start. I find it’s always better to make the actually suspicious tools of your trade yourself, if you can. Therefore, my lockpicks are actually made of broken bandsaws from the shop down at the local theater, bits of wire from clothing hangers the dry cleaning shop had to throw out, a nail I bent with a rock and some time at the train rail, office supplies, bobby pins… really, you just need a piece of material that’s shapeable to your purpose, yet rigid enough to hold it’s shape under use. If it comes down to it, I can use a piece of thread and some horse hair to pick a lock- magic, or haki I guess (they’re really the same thing) can make up for a lot of deficiencies if you want it to.

Of all my illicit skills, it’s lockpicking that my sisters learned with the least fuss. I suppose it’s not that strange- each of us has our own specialty, and so each of us taught the others the very basics of our skill. Addy taught us all the very basics of Fishman Karate, to the point where all of us can at least coat our hands in water; Bea taught us all how to identify and recognize dangerous mystical reagents; Cece taught us all how to fall, roll with a hit, and even how to use the area around us to fight; Deb taught us all how to cook some very basic foods- scrambled eggs, rice, a simple yeast bread… Fern actually taught us all how to study at the library; and Genny taught us how to do basic first aid, treat blisters, boils, cuts, scrapes, splinters- that sort of thing. I taught my sisters how to pick locks, for a few actually good reasons- especially considering that none of them really want to go out and steal shit.

For one thing, learning to pick locks clears your eyes of the ‘illusion of security’. Locked doors serve to keep those we love- things, people, secrets- safe from harm and discovery, and as a reassurance of security. I picked my first locks within two minutes of getting all the supplies together and following the directions I cribbed from a book I got from the library. After that, I realized that locks don’t do much except provide the illusion of security- sort of like a safety blanket. Locks give you the idea of safety, the feeling of security, but if someone really wants into what’s been locked away, they can pick the lock. If they don’t know how to do that, they could find another way into your home; thus, you cannot just rely on a lock to keep yourself safe.

It’s a little scary to realize how little locks actually do- but it’s also kinda heartening. It’s scary because someone could very easily walk into your world and walk out with a double crapload of your shit; but it’s heartening because, knowing how easy it actually is… in our neighborhood of Gobdark, no one’s home has been broken into for a good fifteen years or more. In essence- most people are good people, who have their own lives to live and generally speaking, don’t covet yours so much they’re willing to take the trappings of it for their own.

For another thing, it makes a person handy in an emergency. People lose or forget their keys all the time. It’s such an easy thing to learn, and the supplies for it aren’t hard to find- so, being able to jimmy a lock is useful. It saves time, money, and gives you a deep sense of satisfaction- for being able to solve a problem like that on your own. It could even save someone’s life- after all, if you go to someone’s house to check up on them, and you know they’ve been sick… Genny’s told me that there have been a few times when she was only able to check on someone because she could open the door.

Also, it’s just a cool skill to have. Some things are cool, no matter what they’re being used for.

There’s also a common misconceptions that the only people who can legally own a lock picking set are first responders or licensed locksmiths. In reality, as long as you’re not trying to illegally enter someone’s home with your lock picks, you can own, carry, and use the tools. Some cops, however, consider owning a set of lock picks all the evidence they need for criminal intent- so, it’s best to make them look like something else. I keep mine in a bike tool roll, which for someone my age is fairly common- it’s the style to keep your pens and pencils in a bike tool roll, and it’s not strange to find some younger women carrying them instead of pocket books. Every generation of children is the same, after all- they want to do something different from their parents.

As for the actual mechanics of lockpicking, it’s fairly simple. The most common kind of lock is the pin tumbler lock, frankly because it’s easy to make absurdly long. The simplest kind of lock is the handcuff lock- and for that, I recommend two things. Buy a handcuff key, for sale at any sex store, and keep a bobby pin handy.

Combination locks are a bit different, and I’ll explain those in a moment.

Honestly, once you learn to pick a tumbler lock, everything else sort of… flows naturally. To start, it helps if you understand how pin tumbler locks actually work. The basic mechanical design of a pin tumbler has been around since before 4000 Before Calendars; it’s gotten more complex over time, but the basic theory hasn’t changed at all. The design that is used in most cylinder locks- like the one on most doors- has been around since 861, and it hasn’t changed much since then. Most of the World is using technology that’s centuries old to keep their prized possessions safe and secure.

Anatomy wise, a pin tumbler consists of an outer cylindrical casing, in which a plug is housed. The small gap between the outer casing and the plug is called the shear line. Remember that; it’s important to know. The plug has an opening, for the key. When the proper key is inserted into the plug, the plug can then rotate; and that’s half of how locks work at all.

On top of the plug, a series of five or six holes are drilled. The holes contain key pins of different lengths. They’re called key pins because they touch the key when you insert it into the plug. Above each key pin is a driver pin that’s spring-loaded.

Because of the different key pin lengths, the driver pins cross the shear line, making it impossible for the plug to rotate. If you put a wrong key into a lock, the notches on the key won’t lift up the key pins at the right height, causing them to protrude through the shear line. In order for the plug to rotate, you need to lift each of the key pins and driver pins to the correct height- until the gap between the key pins and driver pins reaches the shear line. When all of the pins reach this position, the plug can rotate. That’s the second half of how locks work.

Simple, right?

So- when I pick a lock, all I’m actually doing is using tools instead of a key, to line up the gap between the key pins and the driver pins, with the shear line between the outer casing and the plug. That’s it. It’s super easy to get the hang of, too.

Remember, I picked my first lock in two minutes of having all the tools I needed, a lock, and the instructions handy. Two minutes. First try.

This is not a terribly complicated skill; and it doesn’t require complicated tools, either. You need a tension wrench, and pick rakes. You need a tension wrench that fits into the lock, and you can feel through; and it’s better to have several rakes at hand. Different rakes can have different numbers of ridges, which allow you to pick several pins at a time. It’s also a good idea to have a pick that allows you to pick one pin at a time; some locks require that.

Lock picking is more art than science, and not the kind of art you can learn from a book; you have to actually pick locks to get good at it. Over time, you’ll develop a ‘feel’ for it. Each lock is different; but the same basic principles apply. The easiest and fastest way to pick a lock is to scrub it.
Why does this matter at all?

Fern’s already darted off through her sneaky roads back home; I need to do some thieving. I try really, really hard not to shit in my own bed- and so, I almost never steal anything in Gobdark proper. That’s basically asking for trouble. However, in the course of making our mother more comfortable, we’ve all sold and pawned things we’d rather have not. Milk of poppy is expensive, after all.

So, here’s my list:

Adelaide- a set of bridal jewelry, meant for her wedding.

Beatrix- a tiara of gold leaves, meant for her wedding.

Cecelia- a set of bellflower hair combs, meant for her wedding.

Deborah- a set of throwing knives, and a hinged hair comb meant for her wedding.

Eleanor- that’s me, by the way- an antique lace veil, meant for my wedding, along with our mother’s Adam-wood trousseau chest with the contents included. Mostly, I want the ancestral sewing patterns back, which are under the false bottom I know for a fact hasn’t been found, because technically it’s not really a false bottom at all…

Fernanda- a hand-painted yellow silk scarf that our grandmother wore.

Genevieve- a collection of animals that became familiars, who are now staying with Missus Howlen. I’ll go there last, mostly because Omnifarious is a vicious bastard of an osprey; Grumble, Jabber, and Shriek are very sticky and slimy; and the Cats are very cuddly and loud. Well- okay, Inky, Winky, and Blinky are alright in small doses. Goblynn’s a fucking asshole, though, always sticks her cold paws and nose right into the nice warm spot you’ve got going on. Although, Genny's very evasive on if Inky's actually a cat or not. Inky sheds fucking leaves, okay? He- or she, it's not clear- really doesn't act like a cat...

Fern’s using her Terrifying Seer Powers to scare the Madame into tearing up Mother’s contract, thus absolving us of all her debts; she’ll then be going home to sit up with Mother for the last of her time here, see to the funeral arrangements, and pack up our apartment- which means it’s up to me to get all the rest of our shit.

So, I’ve actually been planning this series of thefts since we even sold our shit; thus, my plan’s already ready to go. I’ll go over it one more time before I head out though-

A, B, and C’s things are in the back-partition of Shellworthy’s Pawn Shop, which is protected by a series of alarms and sensory magics connected to every vent-cover, outside door, and outside window. However, there are no alarms on the chimney, presumably because it has a set of bricks blocking the entrance, and is sealed on the other side with a sliding door that hasn’t been opened in forty years. It’s not counted as a door at all; it’s counted as wall.

I’ve handled that.

D, E, and F are a little trickier, as their Treasures are in a Dunshilly Mansion owned by notorious mob boss ‘Red Water’ Dillberry. Their exact location is in two very different parts of the mansion, to make things a little more challenging; the knives are in the Servant Armory, which is watched even more heavily than the Family Armory- and the fabric goods, and the chest, are in the Lady’s Wing, in her personal quarters, which means that although I’ve already located every item, and found more or less the optimal way to retrieving each of them, the only thing I’ve already stolen and hidden to allay suspicion is the throwing knives.

Finally, Missus Howlen. Funnily enough, Genny put her animals in Missus Howlen’s care to make it easier to save money for us, and put less stress on Mother- meaning, all I need for that is a letter from Genny saying she’s ready to take her animals back, and the boarding fee. I’ve had those ready for two years, now.

So. Save the easy one for last, I say.

In every job, the least secure part of every security system is the human portion. You can have the best goddamn lock system in the world- and I promise you, all it takes to get through it is a picture of the key, and if there’s a combination lock… hell, people write that shit on their desks. Moving upwards in the ‘less secure’ world, sometimes it’s the security cameras. Kale only costs about fifty beri a kilo, and feeding it to the security snails will earn you their undying affection. Lettuce is very bland, as far as snail food- but it’s cheap, and you can add powdered essential vitamins and minerals to it. That’s what snail food is. Give a security camera snail an obstructive piece of folate they can nomnom, and you’ve got yourself an approach from a blind spot. Get close enough to the snails, and really gain their trust? Then, by th’gods, borrowing that video feed is as easy as stealing phone service; which, in Gobdark, is the sport of choice.

The interior locks in an office suite are low end, and generally aren’t updated except for every fifty years or so. Why change what ain’t broke? File cabinet locking bars are a slightly more serious security measure, but fall short of the mark because they depend on people’s faith in padlocks. People have too much faith in padlocks.

Further than that- and here’s where things can start getting dangerous- theft of identity is really easy. A bank-number, a seal, and an ID to work up a fake that’s doctored to look like the real one is all you need to drain a bank account and with no one the wiser. Further, you can use a fake identity to get into places that would normally shoot you on site. Eleanor the Trash Goblin Brat couldn’t get a legal job for love or money; Anais the Maid works at a Dunshilly Mansion and is grateful for her terrible job, lan’sakes; Katie the Snail Specialist is like, super stoked to be lookin’ after these little guys, y’know; and Ellie, little Genny’s sister who goes to that nice highschool down the way, is such a flake, she’d forget her own head if it wasn’t attached, haha.

I have personas because the easiest way to gain access to, and information about, some places is simply to walk in with confidence and either make small talk with the people who work there- or, for more involved heists, by pretending you belong so hard it actually becomes true. The majority of people aren’t actually all that interested in little oddities, and for the most part are willing to explain away any weird things and slip ups- so long as you don’t call attention to it by being shady. Hell, I’ve even gotten janitors to let me into places because they’d ‘seen me around’. No worries about them saying anything to the cops; in the places I tend to steal from, the janitors are not paid enough to care about every face they see.

If I need a quick and dirty disguise, the best one is a low-ranking chef’s white jacket. No one cares about food service workers, and if you’ve got one of those pushy-pushy food carts, you can go almost anywhere in the building. It’s gross, but true- if you look like you belong, if you look like a fishwoman, or a human, generic dark hair, pale enough skin, dark eyes- people’s eyes just glance right over you, and no one bothers to remember your name.

My pre-planning was thus; for the pawn shop, Darla and her gang of tiny thieves, the Mousketeers cleared a hole in the chimney just wide enough for my head to go through— which, with my physiology, is all I need; in exchange for a bit of help moving their massive stash of goods through the pawn shops and opening a bank account. Mostly, they needed me to do the paperwork; Darla and her crew, the Mousketeers, are not very big at all and can have trouble filling out paperwork.

Katie the Snail specialist was given full access to the snail vivariums… which were right in front of the old creaky sliding door. A bit of soap and water, some oil, and a careful application of epoxy and a handle from the hardware store- and a kilo of spinach and cale, to keep the snails quiet.

The Pawn Shop is one of a number of row-houses, and it’s old enough that there's a ladder built right into the chimney. The back-partition of the pawn shop neatly bisects the apartment it’s based out of; the front is the sales floor, the back is where the snail vivariums and various pallets of merchandise are kept. Getting in and out with what I want is easy enough- I just have to wait for my window.

Now, for the Dunshilly Job, I’m going to have to make a window— but for this one, I’ve got to wait for the lights to go out, and then I’ve gotta do some Merjin Parkour.

Parkour might have started in the Kingdom of Science, Germa; or the Kingdom of Lilies, France. But in Ryugu Mergyo, especially in Gobdark, Parkour isn’t just a lifestyle; it’s a do, the same as Bushi or Karate. In many ways, the World was not built for Merjin. It wasn’t designed for people like me to move in. I could- and did, when I was younger- complain about this simple fact, about what was missing all around me. The World was not designed with a Mimic Octopus Merjin Woman in mind. And then… I grew up a bit, and learned to transform that nothing into something. Here’s the reality of parkour, just like the reality of lock picking; you can do everything you see someone do on your first day. Assuming you’re reasonably fit and in good health, all the basic parkour techniques are within your grasp. Doing parkour isn’t about learning new advanced techniques; it’s about mastering the use of very basic techniques. You don’t learn katas, because it’s not that kind of thing. The only combinations in parkour are the ones you make yourself.

I think I started learning about five years ago, and it was just… it was fun. It was fun that I didn’t have to compete with anyone to have, I didn’t have to- win. I’d pick five techniques, just a handful, and drill them for months and months and then I’d pick a different five- years, I spent doing that. I learned to jump, and leap, crawl along the ceiling, squeeze through holes only my head could possibly fit through- and I just… a lot of what I do has nothing to do with strength or magic or haki or whatever. My skills are about fine control.

There’s my window.

I take a long rolling stride and then monkey vault up the side of the building. I grip tight with my suckers, and then I climb up, up, and then I’m on the roof. My gear is fairly simple- lockpicks, as I mentioned, a set of bump keys just in case, and my backpack. Technically speaking, it’s a bag meant for hikers that I got at the camping supply store. Technically speaking, I’m hiking.

There aren’t all that many things specifically made with parkour in mind that are also within my budget. The best I can do is an on-sale runner’s backpack meant for skiing. Remove the water bladder, and you’ve got a nearly perfect bag for parkour- or thieving. They’re compact, hug the body, and do much better at not jostling around than many other packs. They also sit fairly high on the back and have an adjustable suspension system that makes it easy to get a comfortable, secure fit. Further, if I’m trying to avoid pursuit- well, it came with a rain cover. Nothing says ‘this is not the one you’re looking for, officer’ like a bag that’s entirely the wrong color. Some patterned duct tape to cover the label, and spares for when it inevitably wears out- and hey presto, you’ve got yourself a quick change disguise.

I also use it to hold liquid, as was intended- not water, but ink. I put non-reflective sticking tape in a dark color over the shiny parts of my bag, for extra stealth. I’ve got a second bag stashed near my Dunhilly Job; when I get done with it, I’ll change clothing to avoid complications.

My uniform isn’t a uniform at all- it’s my normal, everyday clothing. My hoodie is reversible; my shoes are really light and get wrapped into my obi when I’m not wearing them; my kimono has a really popular pattern and a really popular color, and tucks up short and thin. Add a pair of dark grey tights, and suddenly- I could be anyone.

The Pawn Job goes as I expect- in, out, done. I even got one of the baby snails that wasn’t soldsomething about an oversaturated market, the last time I went there as Katie.

It’s going to take a moment to clear my head; the late night bus from this part of Gobdark to the part of Dunshilly I can get to with the bus’ takes a while… I’ll go over what went right, and what went wrong. I adjust the bag hanging very high up on my stomach- no one really looks at a pregnant woman and thinks ‘that’s a group of thieves’, and yet…

Getting onto the roof of the rowhouses and finding the right one after that was easy enough; I’d marked it weeks ago with a sticker you can’t see from ground level. The chimney is what I marked, and Darla installed the access handle where it needed to be for me to get the old pot opened. The ladder, since it hadn’t been used in a good thirty years, was still in good repair; and, as I’d come and cleaned the flue from both ends, and sprayed it down with a special sealant, there was no soot to contend with.

At the bottom of the ladder was my sticker again, over a thin flat rock, just larger than my head. I lifted it away, and saw down into the fireplace proper- and I also realized my first mistake. When I gave Darla the measurements of my head, so she and her gang could make the hole, I forgot to account for my hair; it’s grown out quite a bit since then, and I don’t have time or the tools to cut it.

I do, however, have about a thousand bobby pins and a wig cap. I twist and pin my hair down, and then put the wig cap on. My shoes and pants get folded and left behind; my bag will be carefully pulled through after myself. My head goes through first, with a bit of a wiggle when it comes to my nose- don’t want to touch anything, and leave a scent that could be traced, after all. Then, for the rest of me; it’s a bit like stretching, really. Making my body fluid enough to fit through a hole the size of my head isn’t all that painful- it just took practice to learn to do it as fast as I can, now. The backpack came through easy as well.

The door opens just as I intended- silently. I crept out into the dim back room of the pawn shop, and immediately noticed my second problem- the box with my sister’s things had finally been inventoried properly, and the contents of it moved into the front. I didn’t sigh, or anything so gauche; I glided over to the snail cooler, opened it up, and pulled out four massive Kale leaves.

Like I said earlier; sometimes, you just have to make your own blind-spot.

Interestingly enough, Owner-san has so much confidence in his outside defence, he’s neglected to alarm his cases- or rather, I can see that he has, and I can also see that he turns them off at night, to save money on electricity. Idiot.

The best lock in the World is only good against a thief so long as it’s locked.
The display case with my sister’s jewelry is also full of other things- less expensive things. To allay suspicion about who, exactly, took these things, I need to take everything. Thankfully, I have a second, more sack-like, bag with me. From repeated observation, I know this for a fact- it takes the security snails forty-five minutes exactly to eat enough Kale leaf away to see the area of their guard again; and I only need one minute to break into these safes. Then, I’ll have thirty minutes to steal what I need to steal, five to get back out, and five more to get to the Den- as it takes the police ten minutes to get here, and they’ll be very suspicious of everyone in the area.

Here’s how you actually pick a lock.

Take your tension wrench, and insert it into the bottom of the key hole. Then, apply slight pressure. The tension wrench is the key (pun intended) to successfully picking a lock. Thanks to pulpies and those new Moving Picture Shows, people wrongfully think it’s the pick, because that is the thing that’s actually lifting the key pins to line up with the shear line. Here’s why the tension wrench is so important: as you’re lifting the pin sets with your pick you need to apply tension on the plug. If you’re applying the right amount of torque on the plug, once the driver pin passes the shear line, the plug will rotate slightly. When you pull your pick out, the key pin will drop back down, but the driver pin will catch the edge of the plug, thus staying above the shear line. Keep lifting pins with your pick and applying pressure with your tension wrench, and all the driver pins will have cleared the shear line eventually.

So take your tension wrench and place it in the bottom of the key hole. Apply slight pressure in the direction you would turn the key if you had it. And by slight I mean slight. If you apply too much pressure, you’re just going to cause the driver pins to bind below the shear line. You need to have enough give to let the driver pins rise above the shear line, but have enough torque that when they start dropping down, an edge of the drive pin catches the plug as it starts to rotate.

How much is too much? If your tension wrench is bending a lot, then you’re probably applying too much pressure. So lean on the side of applying less pressure than more. Otherwise- it’s something you have to develop a feel for, and not everyone can.

After you’ve inserted your tension wrench at the bottom, insert the pick at the top. Take your pick- I prefer the Bogota rake that has three ridges. This one has picked every lock that I’ve used it on very easily. You might need to go one at a time. You might even need to start over.

Still, to start, slide the rake all the way to the back.

Keep applying that slight pressure on your tension wrench. I use my left hand for that. With your right hand, scrub or rake the inside of the plug with your pick. As you pull the pick back, simultaneously lift up in order to apply pressure on the pins. It looks sort of like you’re stirring in a circle with your pick.

Keep applying torque on your wrench and scrubbing the pins until they all set. You may need to apply more torque and pressure on the pins with your pick as you get near the last one or two pins that need to set. If you’re not making any progress, you probably applied too much torque with the wrench. Relax, let the pins reset, and start over again, focusing on not using too much pressure.

That’s it! Really. That’s all there is to it. You can successfully pick most pin and tumbler locks using this scrubbing method.

You may run across locks that require a little bit more finesse by picking each pin set one at a time. In these trickier locks, you may need to get more methodical by looking for the pin stack that resists the most and picking it first and then repeating the process until all the pins are successfully picked. If you know in advance that you’re going to have trouble with a lock, and you’ve got no worries about sound, just bump the lock. It’s easier, faster, and much less likely to leave scarring on the lock.

The case opened in a bit less time than I thought I’d need; and then I had stolen my sister’s bridal things back again, and quickly stowed them in my bag. Then, I pulled out my second bag and carefully, quietly, taking care to wrap each piece in long scarves I got just for this- I cleaned out the rest of the case.

Then, because I still had scarves and room in the bag, I swept the adjacent cases as well. When full, the bag I used is a bit less than the diameter of my head- perfect, in this case. Kind of why I even chose it.

Greed is what gets thieves caught, more often than not- so… Oh, alright, I couldn’t leave the snail when I knew it wouldn’t be cared for. Owner-san already has a house phone, a security system, and a shop phone- he doesn’t need the last one. He’s been trying to sell it for months, but this area has a saturation in the market, and… well. Certain parts of Gobdark will eat anything. So, I took the snail, and the snail rig he was trying to sell with them- an old fashioned model that, thankfully, it’s fairly simple to change the calling-number of, so long as you can pay a fee. Do it at a library or nunnery, and they won’t register you’ve done it at all. Phones go out of service all the time.

Didn’t you know?

Anyway, everything goes out the hole in the chimney easy. I shut the door behind me; put my goods up through the hole; and squeeze through. Then, it’s everything onto my back, and off across the roofs.

For the sake of whoever finds it next, I try not to even think of the route I take to get to our Ken. If you absolutely must know, it’s a weird little spot in a city’s roofing that happens, sometimes; a water tower butts up against an apartment building just enough, and then someone else builds a dovecote, and a third someone puts the retaining wall of their rooftop garden just so - and suddenly, you’ve got a room the approximate size of an apartment just… out there. Waiting.

I squeeze into the room in my usual fashion, and quickly start sorting the haul. My bag goes on my hook, and our gang’s etiquette is to leave what’s on another person’s hook untouched- saves a lot of infights, let me tell you.

It’s between a stack of folding knives and a pile of gold rings that Darla appears.

“All good, then?”

“Yeah, all good.”

“Brill. You still braveass’n around?”

“Funk you, Tiny Tina.”

“Hahahaha-”
Darla’s a little shit. Here come the rest of the Mice- ah hell, might as well go down the roll. Oh, wait- Darla’s doing it for me. I guess we picked up someone new…?

“Quillaby, this is Eleanor- she’s the leader of the Cat and Mouse Crew. She’s a good leader, as far as leaders go- smart, confident in us and our skills, and she always makes sure that each member of the crew knows the whole plan, so if something goes wrong, we all know what happened. She’s been doing this the longest, longer than me- she got me into this business. In our Crew, she’s the one who does most of our conning work, all long-term acting, and our major manipulation using confidence Tricks. She’s our roper, our inside man, our distraction.

“I’m her partner- Darla, if you’d forgotten. I assist Boss E in planning and prepwork, and- well, if she needs someone to herd the rest of us while she’s off doing what she does best, I’ve got the job. If she tells you to do something, Quill, you do it; if I fuckin’ tell you to do something, you do it. I have all the same skills Boss does- but where she prefers lockpicking, I prefer safe cracking.

“The Dollamata working on the snail and the old phone rig is Jellybean. She’s our phone phreak; there’s no snail she can’t confuse eventually. She also builds and repairs all our specialty gear- your first set of lockpicks will come from her, as well as your other first bits of gear. When we’re on a Job, Quill, Jelly’s the one who keeps us all on task and in contact with each other.

“That is Maya. Don’t get too close, she has very sticky fingers; she’s our specialist burglar, after all. She’s the one who caught you picking those pockets with the bubbly coral, by the way- and it’s on her recommendation that you’ve been invited into the Crew. Don’t make her regret it.

“You’ve already met Hildegard- Hildy is her preference. She’s our wrangler- if we need a getaway, she’s the one that handles it. She’s actually much stronger than she looks; last I checked, she can kill a Sea King in one hit. Don’t let her murderface fool you, though- there’s no one more sweet-tempered than our Hildy, ain’t that right?”

“Rack off, Dar-ling.”

“Hahahaha- ah, yes. Arlinda Rader Haai. She’s the physically largest member of our Crew; and she’s the one who scrounges those little odds and ends a Crew like us needs to get things done. She knows a guy, or knows a guy who knows a guy, or has a cousin, or a ‘cousin’- the point is, if we need a tool, she can get her webbed hands on it, no matter how obscure.”

“I see why you call her Arlinda Rader Haai.”

“Yeah, she’s one of those people you have to say the whole thing for; now. Boss has been planning the heist we’re all about to go on for years. Your skill with mucus bubbles is invaluable to her very particular needs, and your other skills… well, I’m sure we’ll find a need for a heavy combat specialist sooner or later.”

I’ve finished the sorting, and can feel my eyebrows raise at the roundabout explanation Darla just gave. There’s a term for what Darla’s trying to do, and that term is baiting.

We don’t have time for that.

Or rather, I don’t have time to listen. I carefully re-arrange my thieving bag, stowing a microcamera, rechecking my tools, and going over the plan one last time.
“So. Everyone here?”

“Yeah, Boss.”

“Brill. Here’s the plan, then- and I’ll be going over the details, as Quillaby is new.

“My younger sister is a Seer, and her first Sight was of the death of our mother. She was able to write down an exact date, time, and cause- which, as it happens, is with the coming dawn. Therefore, tonight is the last chance I have to secure our remaining heirlooms- because, our mother has Fae-blood, and our heirlooms are magical. If their chain of provenance is broken, they lose all their mystic might- more importantly, they’re ours.

“Out in Dunshilly, there’s one of the last old Country Houses from back when the Gobdark side of Dunshilly was still ‘country’. That house is home to ‘Red Water’ Dillberry, his wife, Helena, and their children. Our target is a small bedchamber on the third floor.

“The first obstacle will be getting to Dunshilly. There’s a Red Flyer that runs from Gobdark to a place in Dunshilly that’s about half a minutes swim to the Manor. Following that, we have to get to the third floor undetected. I can go up the side and carry you lot- and I’ve yet to meet a lock I can’t pick. That particular bedchamber is being used as a walk-in closet by Helena; and I’ve already cased it. Darla- that thing you wanted, the tiny necklace?”

“The Silver Stars?”

“Yeah, that. She has it; it looks like she’s been collecting Tontatta treasure for years.”

“That fucking- Damn.”

“Mm. The things I’m after are in a locked cabinet, and the bottom of a large chest, respectively- you’ll have to handle the safe, as that’s where she’s keeping the goods.”

“What kind of safe, and when was it installed?”

“It’s a Synfim Catalish, installed when the house was built.”

“...They didn’t change it?”

“Nope.”

“I love it when a mark makes it easy.”

“Mnhm. Jellybean, your job is the same as it always is- keep the phones from working for as long as you can, and keep us in touch with each other. You’ll also be keeping an eye on the time- I don’t have to be out of the house with the goods, I just have to have them in my possession by sunrise, to keep their enchantments active.”

“Got-ya, Boss.”

“Maya, while Darla and me are doing our things, you’re on lookout- sorry, but there’s nothing at the place you really want.”

“Tch. Can’t win them all, Boss.”

“Hildy, you’re plan B; our fallback point is at The Spot, and our rendezvous is at Missus Howlen’s, down near the Bath House. If things go wrong, I need all of you to get away with as much as you can on Hildy’s beetles; if I don’t meet up with you all at Missus Howlen’s within the day, I’m dead.”

“Boss, I still don’t like this plan- but I don’t have anything better, so. Here we fucking go.”

“Heh. Arlinda Rader Haai, Quill; the two of you are going with Darla and me. We’re going to need some heavy muscle.”

“Sure, boss.”

“Uuh. Yes, of course- b-boss.”

“Right.”

And now, on the bus, we’re there. I pull the rope, climb off the wagon, and walk into the darkness of the Dunshilly hills. Unfortunately, it’s at my stash point, the Spot where Hildy’s going to wait for us, that I realize things have already gone terribly wrong.

The house was supposed to be quiet, for this heist- but it’s light bright and shining, and there’s a full on jamboree going on inside.

Well, shit.

“Boss.”

“Darla.”

“That part of your plan?”

“Not as such- but it shouldn’t be a problem, either.”

“Boss...”

“See there? Even though it’s lit up, the security cameras still have a blind spot- and so long as I do it right, no one’s going to notice my approach. We’re actually very lucky- thank you, Jelly- as the hosts are about to give some kind of speech.”

“...I don’t like this, Boss.”

“Neither do I, but we can’t wash, either.”

“...Right. Let’s go.”

I tuck my hair up into a ponytail and make sure the dull patchy grey of my hoodie is ready. Then, I open my bag and let Darla, Arlinda Rader Haai, Quillaby, and Maya climb in, before settling it in such a way as to- well.

Jelly is already mounted on a very large foebeetle, the snail ready to go to work; and Hildy’s got all the other beetles ready to go as well.

When you think of a ninja, you think of someone wearing all black, creeping around in the dead of night. I, personally, think of myself in a maid’s dress with a junior chef’s jacket over it. Change the tail into a fishy arrangement, and no one can say for sure you don’t belong- especially at a party. The easiest way into a house is through a door- specifically, the unlocked side door that the gardener leaves open so he can have fun with one of the scullery maids at the end of the work day. I nip through with no one the wiser, and- affecting an air of harried, ‘don’t fucking talk to me’, haste- I go from the ground floor, up the servant’s hallways, and stop at the third floor which- just as I suspected- is completely deserted, what with the party below. I carefully check before entering any of the rooms proper- houses like this have peepholes for the servants to see if they should come in, or pass on by.

Then, I’m through the tiny servant’s door, which I wedge open with my jacket. Down through the silken skirts of a riot of color clashing low cut ballgowns, and we’re in the closet. I take my bag off and let the Crew out. Maya and Darla go to work immediately; followed by Quillaby and Arlinda Rader Haai. I go over to the Adamwood Chest, and instead of picking the lock, I take out my ring of bump keys. On my ring of thieving keys, I have one actual key. It was my mothers- and before her, her mothers, and back and back and back, until the beginning of our family. I don’t need to pick this lock; this is my box.

Inside, of course, is nothing at all- Helena’s been using it as a bench seat. I mean… the keyhole doesn’t look like a keyhole, and if you didn’t know already, it wouldn’t look like a chest. I open it, reach in, and carefully take the little stack of chap books and wrap them in a scarf. And there it is- the Family Grimoire. Some families pass down extra toe joints, or cowlicks, or even a house- my family has Magic.

I close the chest again, and lock it. I can’t carry the chest out without suspicion, is the thing- and of all our heirlooms, a Chest that can’t be opened except if you have the key and the right blood is a simple matter to replace. Hell, Dwarven carpentry apprentices make those for their mastery tests- they aren’t uncommon. It’s just that this one is mine.

I turn, and open a different cabinet- hardly notice I only use one hand to pick the lock. Inside- my veil, and my sister’s silken scarf. I wrap the Grimoire in the veil, and the veil in the silk scarf, and that’s it. I have what I came for.

I pick up my stack of chapbooks, wrap the whole bundle of literature into another silken scarf, and put it in the bottom of my bag. I look over at my Crew, who are studiously looking away from me- oh. I caught sight of my face in the mirror- I was crying.

I scrub my tears away, and-

“Four hours to sunrise, people.”

“Right- all done, then?”

“Yeah, boss. All done. We going?”

“We’re gone.”

My crew piles in with their treasure; they’ve swept the safe clean, and the contents and them just fit into my bag. It goes back on my chest, over my tits, and I go back out the servants door. A strange feeling overtakes me, as I get to the stairwell.

Something’s wrong- I can’t hear any of the servants, or any of the party goers, and Jellybean would have said if she’d seen them leave, she’s in position to- something’s wrong. I take off my white jacket, and scramble up the wall.

My jacket gets tucked up in the eaves of the servant’s hallway; considering how often it’s cleaned, no one’s going to notice it there for a good forty years. And then, I’m quickly oozing my way back downstairs.

A good person, or even a nosy person, would go investigate the wet, iron smelling rooms beyond the servant’s demense. They’d want to know why the one known as Red Water is laughing and crying- they’d even want to know what the sharp crack was, and why the house is beginning to smell of turpentine, petrol, and smoke.

I am not good, or nosy.

I get out of the house, and back to the Spot, which is inside a particularly nice stand of cherrybomb trees. Up in the boughs of the tree- Hildy, and Jellybean. And, in a rotted out crack in the trunk- the knives. I take up that hidden package, just as I left it, and tuck it into the space between my chest and the bag.

Hildy, Jellybean, the beetles, and the snail are all that’s left. Hildy and Jellybean climb into the bag; the beetles fly off at a command from Hildy; and the Snail fits in my bag fine, after a bit of rearranging.

Behind me, the old Dunshilly mansion burns.

I’ve a bus to catch- and it’s really not my problem, anyway. Everyone knows the Red Waters get the children first. Considering it in hindsight- I would have still been in that building, if it weren’t for my crew. Saa, anyway- the best way to avoid suspicion is to look nothing like yourself at all. I hardly ever wear my hair blond, because I… I hate being compared to my sisters. But, well- Missus Howlen knows me as a blond, and so blond I am.

The Mice are pretending to be toys, if we’re caught out or my bag gets searched- Darla’s explaining it to Quill.

The second bus ride is much more leisurely than the first; it takes me from Dunshilly to Corallia’s edge in about an hour, rather than the ten minutes from Gobdark to Dunshilly. Then, it’s a quick walk down the road a ways from the Bath House, to Missus Howlen. I give her the necessary letter, and the fee’s already in the envelope- and, as I wait in the foyer of her house, I can hear Goblin’s particularly mangled screeching as she’s stuffed into a duffle. There’s also lots of little peeping noises, but- nah, couldn’t be.

Finally, Missus Howlen returns with a duffle bag, and an orange…

“I’m old, missy. Not dumb. Put this on, and pack those away; you’ve not quite managed it yet, I’m afraid.”

“Missus Howlen-”

“You girls, always running about- and your Fern’s a terror with her arguments, but… you know as well as I do, the contents of those books of yours are dangerous. Put this on.”

“...Yes ma’am.”

Missus Howlen puts off again; and I carefully begin changing, yet again.

“...Boss, what the hell are you mixed up in?”

“Darla, if I tell you, you’ll never be able to walk away safely. None of you will.”

“Miss Boss E, we’re your crew. Even me, and I only joined today- we’re still your crew. We’ll follow you, I think.”

I do up the last button of my outfit, and pull my hair back into a ponytail again. I sigh. I stare at nothing for a long moment, and then I look over at my crew. They’ve all come out of the bag- ah, fuck it. I can’t…

“If any of you have any doubts- about me, about what I’ve done… then you need to go, now. Once I speak the Words, I can’t unsay them, you understand? This isn’t… this isn’t children’s stories, and this is no Fairy Tale. This is real.”

None of them move.

“Fine. I warned you. Missus Howlen-”

“I know them by heard, missy. Go on.”

“Aye.

“Death is nothing at all.

“It does not count.

“I have only slipped away into the next room.

“Nothing has happened.

“Everything remains exactly as it was.

“I am I, and you are you, and the old life that we lived so fondly together is untouched, unchanged.
“Whatever we were to each other, that we are still.

“Call me by the old familiar name.
“Speak of me in the easy way which you always used.
“Put no difference into your tone.
“Wear no forced air of solemnity or sorrow.

“Laugh as we always laughed at the little jokes that we enjoyed together.
“Play, smile, think of me, pray for me.
“Let my name be ever the household word that it always was.
“Let it be spoken without an effort, without the ghost of a shadow upon it.

“Life means all that it ever meant.
“It is the same as it ever was.
“There is absolute and unbroken continuity.
“What is this death but a negligible accident?

“Why should I be out of mind because I am out of sight?
“I am but waiting for you, for an interval, somewhere very near, just round the corner.

“All is well.
“Nothing is hurt; nothing is lost.
“One brief moment and all will be as it was before.
“How we shall laugh at the trouble of parting when we meet again!”

I swallow, once, and the light of false dawn begins to bounce off the overcast sky.

“My mother’s line is from Skua, and she would not say how she came to be here. But she did say this; the name of the one spoken of in the Words I spoke just now… She is our most ancient ancestor, blue of face and with iron claws. Not the Yag, and not the Baba; those were two others, who worked under that singular wretched name… do I really have to say it?”

“Girly… Eleanor, your mother ran, and became a prostitute to try to keep her magic away. The gods saw fit to give her seven daughters in one fell swoop, and her the seventh of a seventh- and so the magic was multiplied by three. Your mother only has a handful of magic, herself- and yet all of you girls can shake the very world, if you’ve a mind to do so. Did you never wonder why?”

“Missus Howlen… Auntie Whispers, this isn’t the kind of thing one just… says.”

Darla hums, and then says, cheerfully-

“So… you’ve been the heir to a Terrible Fate this entire time?”

“Gods Wounds, Darla- no! I’m- I’m descended from Black Annis. My name is Black Eleanor, alright? Gods and saints preserve us from your crazy fancies-”

Ah. Shit, I said it. Darla is grinning. Goddamnit.

“So. You’re afraid of a witch-hunt, Missus Boss?”

“Yes, Quill. I am. They don’t- discriminate. The World Government, I mean- they never have. Even now, with so much of their power gone, their base in the, the Holy Temple of Sunfire’s… the Burning Legion. They’ll kill me, and they’ll kill you, too, and my sisters, my aunt- everyone who ever… I. I’m going to become a pirate, all of us are- nothing left for us here, really. Sorry, Auntie.”

“Girly, I’ve been waiting on you and your sisters to leave; I’ll be much happier back home, away from the dark and the damp.”

“Heh. -I mean it, guys. You don’t have to go with me, if you don’t want.”

Arlinda Rader Haai, of all people, is the one to say it. She hardly speaks; that’s why it’s so odd and memorable.

“You’re our Boss, Eleanor. You lead us because we follow you, not the other way around. We’re going with you- if we have to be smuggled onto the ship with you, then we’ll be smuggled onto the ship. We’re thieves, right?”

I smiled, and sighed, and- when I left my Auntie Shirrey ‘Whispers’ Howlen’s house, I took my Crew with me; in the clothes my auntie gave me to wear, the robes of any initiate at the Mage’s tower- could also be the robes of a nun, one of the initiates.

Jellybean hasn’t gotten a chance to change the snail number, and I need to tell Mab where I’m at, now, considering how close it is to dawn… Aha, a payphone.

“Chairete?”

“Missus Mab, hallo- this is E, calling to let you know I’ve finished my business, and- ah, I’m with Franky, actually.”

“Is that right? Well, best go along with him if you’ve done what you needed to do… I’ll be stashing the noncombat members of the crew on Sunny, and knowing Franky, he’s on the way to finding him.”

“Ah. Alright, sure. Bye Mab!”

“Bye, Miss Terry!”

Hehehehe! That’s a new pun!
Three Swords To Kill A Ghost

So… funny story. The first time I ever had to pick a lock, it actually endeared me to the Crew Missus Seedle assembled to cook in her kitchen. The Chef, the cooks, everyone- because I saved the day, I think.

So, what had happened was I was doing prep work, peeling boiled eggs, right, and I hear an argument break out between two of the actual cooks because they both forgot their keys to the fridges. I didn’t miss a beat, is the thing- and, of course, being a very junior member of the kitchen, I don’t even have a pair of keys. Everyone in the kitchen knew this.

Everyone also knew that Missus Seedle’s a racist old bitch whose favorite activity is to, quite loudly, say every vile thing that’s ever been said about people from Gobdark, right in front of me. Her most frequent insult is about my parentage, followed by my lack of cleanliness, and my propensity to steal. None of which, of course, are true.

Everyone knew that, too.

So anyway, I was peeling eggs, I heard the argument, and without missing a beat, I put down my peeled egg in the bowl, wiped my hands on my apron, and said ‘coming through behind’ in just the right tone and cadence to make the two senior cooks move out of the way without looking to see why they’d done it.

By then, I’d taken out a paperclip and a half-bobby pin- which can be explained as pocket garbage, right- and in about ten seconds, I’d picked the lock and opened the refrigerator. Masterlock; hard as steel on the outside, but marshmallow fluff on the inside.

I didn’t say anything while doing this; I picked the lock, opened the fridge, and went immediately back to work, getting through about three more eggs in a minute before I realized that the Pastry Cook was talking to me.

“Oi, Gobshit- you always knew how to do that?”

“Yeah, fuckass- I always knew how to peel fucking eggs.”

And everyone cackled, because they knew that if I admitted to knowing how to pick locks, it’d get back to The Bitch and I’d be fired on the spot- and also, it took me about four eggs to actually learn to peel boiled eggs. We don’t boil eggs, at home.

Y’know, it’s surprising to me how many don’t realize that the boys and girls in the trenches of the kitchen would fit right into the tougher neighborhoods of Gobdark- my home, essentially. All line cooks are space-cadet moral degenerates, smugglers, thieves, sluts, psychopaths, and prison escapees. The business attracts fringe elements, people for whom something has gone terribly wrong. Maybe they didn’t make it through school; maybe they’re running away from their heritage, like me. Although, it must be said- I came to love it there, deep in that hell-pit.
It was in the professional kitchen that I really learned to assume the worst about everybody, after all. I don’t let this poisonous outlook consume my rational mind, of course; I don’t let it affect my job performance, either. I learned to let every insult and nasty look roll off my back. I learned to ignore the petty bullshit. I began to be amused by what I saw and suspected.

I mean, just because Missus Seedle is a miserable treacherous self-serving capricious corrupt skinflint racist cunting daughter of a whore and a dog doesn’t mean I don’t genuinely enjoy her company. I’ll always be grateful for the job she gave me, and the time with all those crazy guys.

I may not know the actual terminology of cooking, but I can do it; I see a thing once, I remember it forever.

Missus Seedle owns a three star kitchen at a joint so high-end you could only get reservations by referral from people in-the-know. No advertisement needed; and no way in hell that miserly bitch would ever pay me enough to actually, y’know, taste what I’d seen cooked.

Then again- cream always rises. Excellence does have its rewards. There is no fresher egg than the one you pull from the dovecote yourself, every morning; there is no sweeter milk than the milk you got from your house-goat. Anyone can learn a skill, dammit- otherwise, no one would. But the kind of character it takes to not be what someone expects; the character to never, ever steal food from your job, even when you can feel your ribs and the head chef makes you sit down for a lunch break and feeds you- he stood there and watched me, to make sure I actually ate. I’ll never forget that- I was so humiliated, and so pathetically grateful…

The only person at my old job who lacked character was Missus Seedle. I know she’s going to fire me- you’re late to work twice, and you’re fired, end of story. I won’t be able to get out of bed for the next three days- I’m done. I do… hmm.

“Sanji?”

“Yes, Deborah?”

“When I can get out of bed again, can we go back to my old job? I need to tell the guys there that I’m okay.”

“Uh. Sure? Where did you work?”

“I was the chore boy in a professional kitchen for the past five years; and if the restaurant ever had a name, I never knew it.”

“Uh.”

“I mean, it is a three star restaurant, so- I guess it was a good one? I just. I won’t be able to get out of bed for the next three days, and Missus Seedle fires people if they’re late twice and I haven’t been late once for five years and- I just. I want to let the guys know that I’m okay.”

“…Not Missus Seedle?”

“Missus Seedle can eat my shit, curl up in a sewer, and die.”

“Ah. One of those, huh?”

“…She didn’t feed us, Sanji.”
“-What.”

“She didn’t feed us; she’d cut our pay for staff meals, but I never saw any of the brigade eating at the restaurant, and she never fed us. She took a cut of the waitstaff’s tips, which is illegal as fuck, I checked; she’d change our work schedules without notice; she’d make the waitstaff pay if the customer skipped the bill; I was the veteran of the junior levels of the kitchen, and I’ve only been working with the food for two years.

“There’s no first aid kit anywhere in the kitchen, and the fire extinguisher is so old it might as well not be there; I think Missus Seedle’s fucking our district’s health inspector, otherwise our kitchen wouldn’t be so… it’s not dirty, and it’s not completely unsafe, but… I think if it wasn’t Shitty Bastard running things, we’d have killed someone by now.

“Missus Seedle might own the restaurant, and have all the awards in the world or whatever, but Missus Seedle doesn’t know what it means to be a cook or a chef at all. She’s got no character to speak of.”

“…Hmhm. Who’s the Chef of the Brigade, then?”

“Oh, Shitty Bastard- sorry, um. I think his name is Enrique?”

“-!”

“...Do you know him?”

“...Maybe. The World isn’t actually that big... -yeah, I’ll accompany you to your old restaurant. I want to see what I’ve got to work with, too; it’ll be interesting to see what habits you need to learn, or unlearn. Oh, and before we get too far- what do you really want to cook?”

“Bread.”

“...Bread?”

“Mm. I can cook almost anything, except for bread- and pastries, I guess.”

“How’s that?”

“Well, my sister Beatrix… her job requires her to hunt down all kinds of plants and animals, and for her it’s not that much harder to gather whatever’s in season- y’know, out in the wild? And we’d have our garden, too- and then she’d bring it back to me, and I’d cook for all of us. I’ve been doing that for about five years, and before that I was watching my mom do basically the same thing. It’s funny- I see highfalutin’ chefs putting things like ‘fresh from the garden, direct to the table’ onto their menus, like it’s special. That’s what I do every day for my siblings, that’s how most everyone in my hometown survives- so it’s really not that special at all.

“Every week of the year, there’s something different- and for certain parts of the year, there’s hardly anything at all. To eat, I mean. The main thing I really did, every day before I went to work, was I’d look at what I already knew how to work with- stuff from the garden, sunchokes, squash blossoms, and so on- and then I’d look at whatever Beatrix brought, most of which I’d never seen before, ever. I had to taste things, and I threw up a bunch- but mostly, I cooked with what I got and made food for my family to live on. I think I started writing what I did down because there might be a combination that really doesn’t work, and there might be a combination that works really well, and the only way I’d ever remember it is if I had written it down. I hope Fern got all my notebooks and binders…”

“Anyway, bread. I’ve always really loved bread, but- with how much I had to work, and all… I never really got a chance to make it. There are really rigid and unbreakable laws that govern bread, and if you break those laws, your bread will come out bad. You’ll have a Baked Bad.

“I’m not sure if it’s the ingredients I use, or if it’s just me not knowing what the hell I’m doing- but… I’ve never, ever been satisfied with any piece of bread I’ve ever made. And when it goes wrong, it goes Wrong. ”

“Hm. I can probably help with that. It’s interesting- you’ve already gotten the kind of training I wish had been possible for me, earlier. There’s no better school for creativity than the school of necessity- you learned to really understand ingredients because you had to, it was a genuine matter of life and death, not one of prestige or customer satisfaction.”

“Exactly- but… I didn’t need to make bread in the same way. I just… I wanted to. I want to make the best bread I can, bread I love and want to eat.”

“I understand. When Chopper lets you out of bed again, I’ll have you cook some things in the kitchen, to see where you need improvement- and I’ll have you describe what you’re doing, so I know what I need to teach you outright. Last question, then you can sleep again- what’s your Dream?”

“...promise you won’t laugh?”

“...Promise.”

“I want to find All Blue.”

“...Really?”

“Yeah. I know all the legends say that it’s a mythical sea, where you can find every kind of fish in the World- but I’m not so sure.”

“Oh?”

“Yeah. It probably is a very specific area of the World where All Blue exists- but I don’t think it exists all the- aaaaugh- all the timnngh-”

“...It’s my Dream, too. We’ll talk more later, Shrimp. Rest now, alright?”

I smiled, I think, and it felt like I nodded; and then the exhaustion dragged me back down again.

When I peeled open my eyes again, I was lying in a different bed- more comfortable, for one, and Sanji wasn’t there in the bed with me; he was next to me in a chair, quietly reading through one of my documentation journals about- oh, that’s one of the bread ones. It might be one of the ones with pictorial evidence, I don’t really-

And I black out again.

I had the strangest dream- of a man with a gravelly voice and the sound of bones clattering together, my clownish sister Cecelia almost sobbing with overwhelmed emotion as the splashing of some kind of milk allowed for the revival of- someone?
When I stop dreaming and open my eyes again, I see my sister, Eleanor, curled up around a pillow—and I can hear Goblynn mewing, and a dozen or so little voices answering her under my bed… no Sanji though. I do smell something really good cooking, so—well, that’s alright, then.

“Hey, Ellie. Thanks for the-”

“Never again. We’re not ever doing that again, Deb. I got your throwing knives back—please, for the love of all that is good in this World—they took so much blood out of you, and nothing they could do helped much at all, Deb. If Doctor Chopper hadn’t been there, you’d have died too. Never, ever again.”

“…so Mom’s gone, then?”

“-Yeah. Yeah, she’s gone; Fern and Missus Mab took her to be cremated.”

“I’ll be looking after the urn for the Week of Watching, won’t I?”

“…You’re the oldest, so…”

“Heh. Sounds about right. I’d have lost my job either way… Well. Best move on, then; what did I miss?”

“Well… You’ve only been completely unconscious for about a day; Doctor Chopper said you’ll be more awake today, and a bit restless tomorrow, and the day after that you can actually get out of bed, he thinks.”

“Ellie.”

“Right. Um—well. I’d best start with the obvious—”

In the end, I guess the real difference between a warrior like Zoro and a warrior like Nami is that Zoro has pride; he needs to dominate his competition, intimidate and destroy them mentally and spiritually before they ever really cross blades.

Nami just kills her enemy, and is done with it.

Princess Shirahoshi can be said to be much like all other female warriors; when Vander Decken 9 came hurtling through the air, screaming about being destined to be with her, she didn’t hesitate, and she didn’t listen to what he had to say. She brought her naginata up through the air; she shifted her hips and shoulders just so—and then she struck like an ancient predatory creature.

Blood and shit and the end of a man, all in one motion. The axe spun past her and dug deep into the loamy surface of her mother’s grave. She swung her naginata again, and the body fell and broke into two pieces.

Thusly was the end of Vander Decken 9; short, anticlimactic, and not at all the kind of death he would have wanted.

Good.
It was a little annoying that I didn’t get to shoot anyone; but honestly, I’m just glad that’s over.

There’s a lot that happened after that, but in the end, we all ended up at the Royal Townhouse, where Mab was finally able to tell us what the hell happened, concerning… just, everything prior to the War of Gyojin Aggression.

Poison is in everything, and nothing is without poison. Dosage is what makes it either a poison or a remedy. Enlightenment is the crumbling away of untruth; seeing through the facade of pretension. It’s a total eradication of everything you imagine to be true.

I’ve been staring at my cup of coffee for the past six minutes hoping it gives me perspective and sanity and the ability to make sense of it all, but that’s a lot to ask of a cup of coffee at past two in the morning.

Sorry if I’m a little out of sorts- my mother just died, and I’m still a bit confused at what she said to me, before the end. Missus Mab is currently having Words with the Madame; she said she’d handle this part of things, and asked me to sit with Mother’s body and wait for her return.

Honestly, it’s… kind of a relief. I picked a whole fucking bouquet of whoopsie-daisies and I didn’t know how I was going to handle them; however, Missus Mab’s decided that, in short, I’m not going to handle them at all. She is.

Mom said that she’d really definitely died earlier in the night, and all that was left was her festering corpse- but also that she still had things that needed discussion, with each of us. To that end, she informed me that she’d be sending correspondence to each of us, asking to meet up within the Week of Watching.

I told her that if the meeting place was a swamp, a foggy town, or an old mansion, absolutely none of us would be going.

She asked if we’d go if the meeting place was an amusement park.

I told her that, on balance, each of us had either a happy or unhappy childhood. Thusly, if we were invited to an amusement park by her, we’d be assured of learning shattering truths about our childhoods and families, or having to fight unnatural monsters. So no, if the meeting place was an amusement park, we’d be staying home. Deb might try to make pizza again, even.

She asked if a regular park would be okay.

I said that if it’s a regular park in town, it’s Real People Danger, like kidnapping, blackmail, and slavers; and if it’s a regular park in a town we’re just visiting, here comes the fucking fog bank and the Weird Shit. Best just stay home and hang out.

Mom laughed, and asked if a normal diner would be okay- not a Middle of Nowhere diner, just a regular diner in a regular well-lit town.

I said that diners are already liminal spaces, so it’d probably be fine. Then I forgot that Mom was a ghost now, and tried to hug her, and- and-I’m crying, again. I don’t- I knew for years this was coming, so why… why am I so sad?

When I was younger, I put together a list of traditional songs because I was bored and curious if anyone in my country had ever been unequivocally happy about anything, ever. In short? No, not really.

The classic songs of my people go a bit like this:

Everyone I Love Is Dead

The Merrow Have Stolen All My Sheep

We’re Stealing Our Sheep Back From the Merrow

You Want To Be Mine? First You Must Answer These Riddles Three

Our Swords Are Sleeping Under The Hill Until We Need Them Once Again To Fight The Goddamn Kappa

The Kappa Have Stolen All My Sheep

I Love You A Lot But You’ve Left Me And There Is No Food (emphatic fiddle solo)

The Sea Is Treacherous, Just Like You

One Time Our Queen Punched Me In The Face And It Was Amazing

The Faeries Have Stolen All My Sheep

Everyone I Love Is An Allegorical Representation of the Realm

The Merrow Stole My Farm And Put Sheep On It

You Were Mine But Now You Won’t Even Come To The Window To Look Upon Me And Our Dead Infant Child (In The Mist)

Whack Fol Too La Roo Umptytiddly Good They’ve Stopped Listening Now Let’s Talk About Revolution

Something In Kappash, I Think It’s About Faeries, Or Maybe A Cow

Go a little further towards the Sea Forest, and the songs change a bit. You get the musical classics of:

I Left Everyone I Love Back Home In The Holler To Be With This Guy Who Doesn’t Wear Shoes Or Have Teeth But He Plays A Mean Jug

The Merrow Told Us Not To Move West Yet, We Ignored Them, My Entire Family Was Killed
You Were My Boyfriend But You Tied A Rope Around My Legs And Threw Me In The Fire (And My Baby Too)

Mama Loves All 14 Of Us A Lot But She’s Weary Of Our Shit And Now She’s Dyin’ (Gather Round)

The McCleans Stole A Firewood Log From Our Pile So We Won’t Rest Until The Last Of Their Male Kin Is Laid In The Cold Ground

We Knew The River Would Rise But We Still Didn’t Fix The Levee

The River Rose, The Levee Broke, Everyone Died, It Was Just As We Reckoned (dulcimer twang-a-lang)

When The Merrow Come A-Marchin’ I’m A Southern Man And I Feed Their Horses My Best, When The Kappa Come A-Marchin’ I’m A Northern Man And I Feed Their Horses What The Merrow Left

I Love My Girl, I Want A Horse, I’m Going To Leave

THE MINE OWNS OUR SOULS (FOREVER)

You Can’t Go Back To Your Childhood Home Because It’s Buried Under A Gem Mine Now

The Dunshilly Valley Authority Killed All My Sheep Somehow

Oh, and don’t forget that old standby “The Mine Collapsed and Everyone Died”; classic of the genre, that.

Go into Dunshilly, and it’s a bit different again. You get things like:

I Met a Girl and We Went Hunting (It Was a Metaphor for Sex)

I Met a Girl and We Caught Some Birds (It Was a Metaphor for Sex)

I Met a Girl and We Found Her Lost Pet (It Was a Metaphor for Sex)

I Met a Girl By Staying At Her Parents’ House and She Made My Bed (It Was an Especially Thinly-Veiled Metaphor for Sex)

I Am a Girl and I Regret Engaging In Metaphors for Sex Because Now I’m Pregnant

I Met a Girl and Bri red Her Into Sex But She Stole My Horse and Ran Away With It

I Met a Girl At an Inn and We Had Non-Metaphorical Sex But She Stole My Stuff The Next Morning and Now I Have Syphilis

You have Syphilis and Now So Do I

Hurrah, Hurrah, For Tobacco And Slavery
Hey Nonny Nonny Let’s Hunt Down A Virgin

Drink Yourself To Death In Beautiful Coral Hills

Sod Farming (We’d Rather Get Murdered Abroad)

Reluctant Blessed Burial For the Quarter Whore

I Took To The High Seas And I’m Full Of Regret

That Ol’ Black Death Got The Whole Village Real Dead

Burn The Witches

Burn The Priests

I’ve Had A Beer, Let’s Talk Shit About The Germa

Your Fiance Died Either at Trafalgar or Waterloo, Let’s Get Married, I’m Glad You Said No Because I’m Really Him In Disguise

Our Nelson Sure Was Awesome (And Drunk!)

The Press-Gang Dragged Off All the Important Men in My Life (And Now They Are Dead)

Farm Laborers Are The Salt of the Earth And Are Never Grindingly Poor

Begging Is a Completely Viable Career Option With Flexible Hours and Unlimited Access to Alcohol

Go far enough into Gobdark, and you’ll get to the Fae Quarter, which has an entirely different tradition behind it.

I met a girl and she framed me for theft and got me sent here for it (technically Siren)

I committed various crimes and got sent here for it, and I am sad about losing my various criminal friends (Djinni antecedent)

Unlike the aforementioned convicts I am happy to be on this ship, because I was born here and am going back home. Nyah.

We are shearing and the newly-arrived Fae suck at it.

We are shearing and I am personally the best at it.

We are shearing and this one guy is the acknowledged best at it but a skinny old guy with a skinny old sheep has mysteriously outdone him!

Gundagai. People come from there (some of them are shearers), other people go there, it’s at the end of a long road.

Droving cattle is very lonely, requires more whisky.
Droving cattle is very lonely, you may hallucinate.

Droving cattle is very lonely, but I wouldn’t give it up for city life.

The death of a bushranger makes for a very stirring ballad.

People in the city are miserable, criminals, or otherwise inferior to people in the country.

Man steals sheep, drowns self to avoid arrest, becomes cultural legend and pseudo-cultural-anthem.

I’m a Bushranger and I will Kill Cops

I’m a Cop and I will Kill Bushrangers

I’m a Bushranger and ohshit I’m Dead

Sit by a billabong and Die you homeless shit (then become a ghost and haunt the place)

I’m a Revolutionary and I’m on fire (Oh No)

Convicts weren’t criminals (yes they were)

I dislike authority (on a boat)

Oh No It’s Too Dry

Oh No It’s Too Wet

At that point, I was interested, and I just started collecting them. Germa folk songs go something like this:

I Am A Brawny-Armed Lumberjack Who Loves a Town Girl, Oh No!

Oh Fuck, I Slept With a Fur Trapper, What Shall I Tell Maman?

Hauling Logs, Rolling Logs, Driving Logs, All Day, What Ho!

Like Hell You’re Marrying That Good for Nothing Bambocheur!

Fetch My Gold Ring That Fell Into the Sea! Now!

I Met A Sailor While A-Strolling, And Now We Are In Love!

I Want to Kiss the Sailor I Met A-Strolling, But I’m Afraid My Father Will Find Out!

Oh Fuck, I Kissed the Sailor I Met A-Strolling And Now We Are Doomed!

I Came Over To Join The Fur Trade, And Despite the language barrier, married a Native woman and she bore me three children, but now i must go back to Floria and my Florish Wife and my Florish Children, Whoops

I went up North to find some gold, and we are all freezing to Death
I went up North to find some gold and I am going mad from the never ending daylight and am hallucinating

I went up North to find some gold and all I got was Gonorrhea from a prostitute

I married eight different women in six different towns and I don’t know why they’re all mad at me

All my sheep died on the ice flow

My horse fell in the pond

Seriously, my horse is in the pond

Did I mention the Pond’s Frozen over? Little help here (chorus in french)

I married the Devil’s Sister and he laughs at me at the Yuletide Feast every year

My fishing Dory’s broken

Whoops, dad just died, looks like the Dory’s fixed

From Wes Blue, we get these classics:

A Spider Has Bitten Me And If I Do Not Dance I Will Die, Alas

I Am A Very Fancy Man With A Very Fancy Hat

The Cable Cart Is A Thinly-Veiled Metaphor For Your Feminine Torture, O Woman

Home Is The Very Best Place And Every Other Place Is Just Awful

I Love You, But You Are Married

I Love You, But You Are Fickle (Why Did You Dance With The Baker’s Son, Thou Vixen?)

I Love You, But You Left Me All Alone On This Romantic Wind-Swept Hillside, Which Is Actually Very Pretty, But Not As Pretty As You, Foul Temptress

Home Is Still The Best Place And Every Other Place Can Go Right To Hell

Seriously Once You Have Been Home You Will Just Be Sick At The Thought Of Being Anywhere Else, You Will Pine Away And Die

I Love You, But You Are Dead (Or Maybe You Just Went To Live In A Slightly Prettier Place)

Home, Home, O Home, Ah Home, Home Home Home, Have I Mentioned That I Love Home?

Women Are Like The Ocean: Salty And Full Of Drowned Sailors

Women Are Like The Ocean: I Cannot Figure Them Out At All

I Saw You One Time At A Party And I Have Designs Upon Your Feminine Virtue
I Love You, But You Are Married To The Ocean (For Some Reason)

I Have A Cool Gun, And Now I Have To Go Kill This Man Who Has A Bigger Gun Than Me

My Family Died Of Dysentery While Crossing The Plains

Man I Wish I Was In California

The Sheriff Stole My Girl So Now I Have To Kill Him

I Have A Better Horse Than You

It’s Stupid Hot

Wait, Now It’s Stupid Cold

I Won a Farm/Horse/Ship in a Game of Poker then Lost It The Next Hand

It’s a Big Storm Out There, Dad, Stay Safe

It’s a Big Storm Out There, Dad, Stay Safe (He Died Reprise)

It’s a Big Storm Out There, Dad, Hope You Drown (Stop Beating Mama)

My Man Left Me For The War And Now I Must Raise This Child Alone

My Man Left Me For The Sea And Now I Must Raise This Child Alone

My Man Left Me For The Fur Trade And Now I Must Raise This Child Alone

The Mill Shut Down And Now I Must Raise This Child With No Money

Wash On Monday, Iron On Tuesday, Mend On Wednesday, Kill My Abusive Husband On Thursday, Bake On Friday

My Love, I Must Leave You (For The Sea)

My Love, I Must Leave You (The Priests say you’re a Sinner)

My Love, I Must Leave You (I Am Poor)

Where In God’s Name is the Rum?

Djinni folk songs go like:

I Went Out Riding and Noticed The Wind

We Fought a Bunch of Guys (On Horseback)

Witness My Many Ungulates

(While On a Horse) I Met a Hot Girl Who Reminded Me of a Plant
On Three, Say What That Terrain Feature Looks Like to You (One, Two, Three, A Horse)
Witness My Many Ancestors’ Many Ungulates
I Also Enjoy Heavy Metal, Especially If It’s Made of Horseshoes
Oooorrrweeeeeuuurrreeeeuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuu (Is Djinn for “Horse”)
You Might Not Know This About Me, But I Own a Horse

Est Blue Folk songs are like:

We Must Plant the Crops, Let’s Get Drunk!
We Must Harvest the Crops, Let’s Get Drunk!
There’s No Crops Right Now, Let’s Get Drunk!
Sex On the Beach Is Awesome, War Is Bad
There Are Ghosts in the Trees
The Lords Exploit Us (And the Merchants Do Too)
I Love the Sea, This Island Is Beautiful, War Is Still Bad
Hey, There’s an Old Man, Let’s Get Drunk!
Respect Your Parents Or You Will Be Lost at Sea Forever
Drink! Drink! Drink!

Some Pirate Classics:

We’re Delivering Sake and Also Having Adventures (Everyone Sings Along To This One)
Drink! Drink! Drink!
This Song Was Never Popular Until The Pirates Got Ahold Of It
Fuck The Prairie This Place Fucking Sucks It’s Not Even Good Enough To Die In Let’s Go To Sea
Shit, Let’s Be Pirates
I Was Never Good For Anything (Until I Went To Sea)
I Was Never Good For Anything (And I Never Will Be)
This Song Is Actually Eight Different Songs Used To Push Six Different Political Agendas, With The Same Tune, Because Plagiarism Wasn’t Invented Yet (But You’ll Know If You Should Punch Someone Based On What Name They Give It)

Holy Fuck, We Just Got Our Shit Wrecked By The Marines, This Is So Hype

I’m Supes Dead But It’s K

Fuck The South

Fuck The North

Fuck The West

Fuck The East

Fuck The Sky

Fuck The Sea

Fuck Every Ship That Isn’t Mine

This Song Was Probably Actually A Tune From Somewhere Else, But Fuck You It’s Ours Now

Every Part Of Dying In Battle Is Awesome

I Miss My Friends Who Died In Battle

What The Fuck Even Is Up With This Old Bastard

Fuck Me, Fuck You, Fuck This, I’m Going To Sea

It’s Debatable If This Song Is Racist (If You’re A Dumbass In Denial)

We Stole This Song From The Marines, Who Used It To Make Fun Of Us, But We’re By And Large Too Stupid To Realize That

That Girl Is A Prostitute (But At Least She Goes To Temple)

That Incompetent Sailor Is Actually A Girl, But She Will Have Sex With You If You Don’t Kick Her Off The Boat

Someone Of Any Occupation Is Doing Something, But Unfortunately They Are Now Dead

Fuck You Marines (Haha, We Sunk Your Boat And Stole Your Silver)

Fuck You Government

We Might Be Small, But We Will Fight You

Life Isn’t So Bad, If You Just Go Outside

Fuck You Winter

We Have No Food Because The Cook Is A Goddamn Fool

Look At That Guy (Wild Racism)
We Like Going To Other Countries (More Wild Racism)

Drinking Is Fun

Drinking Makes Me Long For Sea

God Is My Dad

My Ship Is Great And Full Of Love (Oh God, The Sexual Metaphor is Blatant)

My Girl can cook, and is therefore superior Your Girl, Who Cannot

My Girl cannot cook and is therefore inferior to all other girlfriends

I saw you over a pile of Gold and knew I was in love (on the sea)

I saw you over a pile of Gold and knew I was in love (It’s a Ship)

A list of regional dishes set to the tune of kitchen utensils

I Need a Woman

Women are Evil

My Woman is Screwing the Cook

My Woman is Screwing the Captain

My Woman is Screwing my Best Friend

My Woman is Screwing Everybody in Town (Except Me)

My Woman is Screwing the Milkman/Bus Driver/my Best Friend/Everybody (Except Me) while I Work All Day, Drink All Night

So Tired Of This Shit

Captain Is a Bastard (But If Anyone Else Calls Him That We’ll Fight Them)

I Lost My Job

I Lost My Woman Because I Lost My Job

I Lost My Temper and Murdered My Woman (and Then I Lost My Job)

My Woman Tried to Poison Me

My Mama Thinks I’m Handsome (But No One Else Agrees)

The Weather is a Metaphor and It’s Always Raining

I Have a Lot of Feelings and Drinking Them Seems Like the Best Solution

I Met the Devil in an Unlikely Place and Made an Ill-Advised Bargain

I Got Arrested but it was a Big Misunderstanding (officer I swear I had no idea she was fifteen)
Fruit-related metaphors for masturbation

dogs howling ocean sounds harmonica solo

Oh God I’m so lonely someone please touch me

No Don’t Touch Me Like That (You Don’t Know How To Have Sex At All)

Oh Touch Me More (You Know How To Show Me A Good Time)

Orcish folk songs:

There Was A War And Everyone is Dead, There’s Also a Symbolic Bird

There is Going to Be a War And Everyone Will Die, There’s Also a Symbolic Bird

The Dieing Is Happening Right Now, There’s Also a Symbolic Bird

I Had a Dream About Us Dying (No Birds Involved)

Alas You Are Dead

I’m a Bird, I Drink Vodka

Fuck It’s Cold

Frost Do Not Freeze Me Do Not Freeze My Horse Do Not Freeze My Wife Please I Have Children

Ayy Lmao This Guys Head Just Got Shot Off, We Are Going to Die Hahaha

I Am Married To A Man And I Moved Far From My Home But I Want Fucking Back On My Fucking Land To My Parents And A Guy Whom I Actually Planned To Marry Before My Society’s Patriarchal Structure Destroyed My Life

A Guy Whom I Loved Loved Me And Also A Some Other Bitch So I Poisoned Him So That Nobody Gets Him

This Is My Land And I Love It Very Much

I Made A Traditional Kupala Wreath And Released It On Water To Find My Love, No Sexuality Involved, Really

I Have A Veeery Deeeeep Well In My Garden, And Also A Veeery Curly-Wurly Cabbage, And Also A Veeery Sweeeet Carrot Growing There, Come On Guys Check It Out, Oh, And There Are Totally No Sexual Hints

Graphic Descriptions Of Lesbian Sex

Everybody Is Dead After A Battle But There Is One Particular Orc Whom I Am Especially Obligated To Mourn About Because He Is A Representative Of Our Entire Nation’s Young People

The Couple Cannot Be Together Because Of Various Reasons And Everybody Cries
The Couple Cannot Be Together Because Of Various Reasons And Everybody Cries And It’s Compared To Some Sad Shit Happening In Nature

Let’s Kill All People Who Threaten Us Hahaha Yay!

Let’s Kill All People Who Threaten Us And Involve Some Couple Who Cannot Be Together Because Of Various Reasons And Everybody Cries

Alas, beautiful girls, they’re going to recruit, weep your lovers.

Blue-eyed girl, don’t sit by the stream, it will take away your beauty.

Hey, hay, hey, you’ve been unfaithful, I’m going to die.

Oh dear, oh dear, I’ve been recruited and now my girlfriend is far away. But I got a nice horse and a sword, yay! Anyways, I’m going to die.

Oh the beauty of the green woods, you’ve been unfaithful, you’re going to die.

Oh the beauty of this or that little town, I love you, my black-eyed girl.

Had you listened to your mother, you wouldn’t have been recruited, my poor son.

I gave my scarf to a boy and he doesn’t love me anymore. I have no more scarfs to give. (Sexual Metaphors Everywhere)

My boyfriend is angry because I lost the scarf he gave me. (Not Actually a Metaphor I Think)

Random Song About Farmwork (It’s actually about sex)

Give me a kiss, beautiful girl! I will not, but come to our house this evening and I will kiss you.

I am poor, I don’t have shoes.

Please don’t come to our house, I am ashamed of your poverty. Come on Sunsad in better clothes, my mother will be happy to invite you in.

Random Song About Handicraft

I’m Not Gonna Work I’m Gonna Drink (aw yeah)

You Don’t Work You Just Drink (goddammit)

I Don’t Want To Work I want to Party and Flirt

(mentions of a random place) let’s talk about my lover in the other half of the verse

(mentions of random food) let’s talk about my lover at the other half of the verse

(mentions of random thing I/you have) let’s talk about my lover in the other half of the verse

Oh I’m Such a Good Worker

Oh S/he’s Such a Crap Worker (look what s/he did)

Don’t Flirt And Do Your Work
A Song About Flirting (and Implied Sex) and Nothing Else
A Song About Flirting with epilogue complaints about my new spouse
I Was Flirting (Implied Sex) and Got In Trouble
Let’s Complain About My Lover
Let’s Complain About Me Not Having a Lover
My Lover Got Conscripted (And Died)
I Love You Mom, An Inexplicably Sad Song
I Love You My Child, An Inexplicably Sad Song
Dear Gods please don’t smite us
Duduk solo
My mom died, a random mention of vinegar, I am sad.
The list of depressing things in my life
A detailed study on behaviour of Perdix perdix, aka Grey partridge. It may or may not be a metaphor for a random village beauty.
Uncle is here, I love him and I’m happy but I’ll sing it extra sadly because fuck you
The list of depressing things in my life volume II
Another duduk solo
Elves killed us, fuck them
My brother killed my lover, so my lover’s family is calling for vendetta, fuck my life, I’m going to jump from a cliff.
The list of depressing things in my life volume III
The best of Depressing things in my life I, II, III, IV
Zurna solo because fuck everyone’s ears

I’m crying again. I can’t stop crying, it’s the weirdest thing; I want to stop crying, because she’s fine, mom’s fine and she’s got more to tell us, I just. I just didn’t want her to ever go. I never wanted her to go where I couldn’t follow her.

Each of us has a specific fighting style that Mom taught us- or at least, what she asked us to learn. Our Family, the Black- or, in the original language, Kalee- has seven distinctive fighting doctrines, and I suppose Mom assigned one to each of us at birth.
Mom didn’t name us alphabetically; she named us in order of color association.

Deborah is the oldest, and her color is Red. Red is the color of fire and blood, and is associated with energy, war, danger, strength, power, determination, as well as passion, desire, and love. Red is a very emotionally intense color. It enhances human metabolism, increases the rate of breath, and raises blood pressure. It has a very high visibility, which is why stop signs, stoplights, and fire safety equipment is usually painted red. In heraldry, red is used to indicate courage. There is no one I know who is more passionate about food; and no one I know more courageous. She can only bake baps, but that hasn’t stopped her from trying anyway.

I wasn’t able to read all the Grimoire- that’s really Ellie’s bag, honestly- but I do remember what her throwing knives really are.

In our family, it’s called the Vorpal Blade, a weapon bound to our blood; it has followed us since it’s birth, during the Age of Heroes, when Black Alice (or Anais, or some other name of reasonable similarity- I know Ellie prefers Anais, but I like Alice) slew the Jabberwocky. It is the only weapon, in fact, that can slay the Jabberwocky.

The way I, personally, know that Deborah’s throwing knives are actually the Vorpal Blades is down to a series of omens. Firstly, there’s the fact that the way she got her knives is by following a white rabbit down a hole- in a wall, if that matters- and fell into some manner of adventure. Upon her return, she had the throwing knives, her cooking knife, and a bloody gleam in her eyes.

Somehow, I think her cooking knife and her throwing knives are actually the same thing, but she’ll need intercession from a blacksmith-mage to really work that out… Even so, her fighting style is all about knives. She can throw them with stunning accuracy and force; and her knowledge of the vital points of a person means that in a knife-fight, she’s very dangerous indeed. Her style is aggressive, and… so, firstly, knives are not easy to block. When we all get together and spar- which is rare, but it happens often enough that I know this…

Hm.

Deborah’s sparring gear- because we don’t actually want to hurt each other- is a black brush-pen, or marker. Even getting flailed at by a rank amateur with a marker is enough to know that if they had a knife, you’re walking away with bloody cuts across your legs, your arms, your groin and chest, your face- lots of black marks, everywhere. Which is to say- if you’re not wearing armor, you can’t block a knife. Knives move very differently when they’re trying to get at someone in armor, as opposed to someone in their everyday clothing.

The first thing to know about fighting Deborah is to move your goddamn feet, she’s coming after you. She’s aggressive and crafty, and prefers using one knife at a time, if she’s not throwing them- at which point, she’s using both hands, so basically- find cover.

The second thing is that there are about three different ranges to fighting Deborah. There’s long hand range, where if her arm is locked out, there’s a certain point at which her weapon can’t reach you, but your weapon can. At that range, her most basic move is called Defang; it’s where she backs away from a strike, and cuts at the striking hand; a step closer and the attack can touch her center line, which is where Defang Check comes in. Defang Check is the same as Defang, with the added checking of the attacking hand with her passive hand. Things steadily get nastier from there. Defang Crush is the one you have to watch out for- Deb’s skull is a goddamn hammer.

I think she learned moves off her work friends? There are a lot of punches, kicks, stomps, and headbutts that she didn’t learn from Mom, is the thing— I think she picked things up at work.

Eleanor is second oldest, and her color is Orange. Orange is energetic and happy in combination. It is associated with joy, sun-tides, and tropical mixed drinks. Orange represents enthusiasm, fascination, happiness, creativity, determination, attraction, success, encouragement, and stimulation. To the eye, orange is a very hot color and so gives the sensation of heat. Still, orange is not as aggressive as red. Orange increases oxygen supply to the brain, produces an invigorating effect, and stimulates mental activity. It’s highly popular among the youths, or the young at heart. It is the most common color of citrus, and associated with healthy food and stimulates appetite. It’s the color of autumn, and the harvest season. In heraldry, orange is used to indicate strength and endurance.

Eleanor is an ambush fighter; she uses the environment, oblique angles, and sneak attacks when she fights at all. Her first instinct is actually to run away or avoid a fight entirely. However, when it comes down to it, she’ll use her wall-climbing skills to jump down on top of people, or her…

I’m not sure why only some of us have this ability; I think it’s because Mom wasn’t entirely honest about our father. Simply put, some of us can spit or excrete ink, and some of us can spit or excrete mucus; Ellie can do both. To that end, she uses her rudimentary knowledge of Fishman Karate, and her ink, as… basically ink-bombs? I know she can throw her normal ink like a paintbomb, and blind or distract a person that way. I also know that depending on what she eats, or something— maybe how she applies her magic to the ink before she throws it?

She can change the properties of her ink. The most common is to make it very slippery; she can also make it dry faster, slower, thicker, thinner, change the color, make it flammable— and that’s not getting into what happens when she mixes it with her mucus.

Still, her fighting style— she uses her ink to blind, distract, and foul the footing of whoever she’s fighting, and she uses her mucus to ensnare and entangle them. She can also change her physical shape with contortion, and change the color and pattern of her skin and hair.

Ellie’s a ninja-thief— and, depending on the day, there’s always a chance that the bag on her back is actually full of Guppies; her faithful crew of tiny thieves. They are vicious little bastards; strong, fast, and incredibly good at being annoying; which leaves the attacker open to catchin’ their own personal beat-down.

I am the third oldest, and my color is Yellow. Yellow is the color of sunshine. It's associated with joy, happiness, intellect, and energy. Yellow produces a warming effect, arouses cheerfulness, stimulates mental activity, and generates muscle energy. Yellow is also often associated with food. Bright, pure yellow is an attention getter, which is the reason taxi-carts and school vans are painted this color. When overused, yellow may have a disturbing effect; it is known that babies cry more in yellow rooms. Yellow is seen before other colors when placed against black; this combination is often used to issue a warning. In heraldry, yellow indicates honor and loyalty.

I’m not a person who likes fighting. I try to stay out of it, if I can. However, there comes a time in every woman’s life when she must cast off the childish garments of girlhood and put on the heavy mantle of womanliness. Shortly after that, she has to kick someone’s teeth in.

Since I wasn’t raised by kung fu fighting wolves, technically, I had to make some important decisions; I couldn’t go through life assuming I was capable of defending myself in a fight because fucking around with my sisters in what can be described as full-contact brawling isn’t really… Nor could I assume I’d get everything I’d need from a single teacher. Neither way is actually ideal.

So, I learned a trio of styles.

The first style I learned the basics of was Judo. There are no where near as many cool moves as karate, but judo is much more immediately useful. Within the first week of training in the martial art, I learned ten different, easy-to-use throws and sweeps. Within the second and third week of training, using the moves on my sisters had taught me when to use those moves.

The second style was Stickfighting. Old, simple, lots of opportunity to grab a weapon; lots of little tricks you can pick up from, say, the local cops by looking cute and helpless and determined. Good for breaking bones or terrifying your babysitting duties into behavior. A large wooden spoon’s a stick, right? And a fortuneteller with a large wooden stick- or spoon- is just a person who takes Rahbdomancy seriously as a method of divination. (It is a serious method of divination, but it’s best use is in pathfinding in the physical world. It’s a very specialized form of divination; not good for making money.)

The third and final style I learned the basics of was Aikido. Aikido is a martial art that’s designed primarily for self defense. The creator of aikido wanted to make an art that a person could use to defend themselves, without causing injury to their attackers. The majority of aikido is not striking. It’s based on the principle that an attacker exposes themselves each time they go on the attack. The defender is supposed to recognize the vulnerability and respond with an attack to ensure that she is not exposed herself. The defender is instructed to go with the movement of the attacker and use his momentum against him, instead of fighting against it. My favorite move is the forearm return, which I call Reversal. An attacker comes at him with a straight punch and he steps to the side, grabbing the wrist, and using the momentum with a twist to disable the attacker’s wrist. The attacker will likely be put off balance and may break his wrist in the process. Aikido also includes joint locks, a grappling technique that extends the joints to their maximal degree of motion. These do not take much speed, but rather proper technique to disable an attacker.

Genevieve is the middle sister, and her color is Green. Green is the color of nature. It symbolizes growth, harmony, freshness, and fertility. Green has strong emotional correspondence with safety. Dark green is also commonly associated with money. Green has great healing power. It is the most restful color for the human eye; it can improve vision. Green suggests stability and endurance. Sometimes green denotes lack of experience; for example, a ‘greenhorn’ is a novice. In heraldry, green indicates growth and hope. Green, as opposed to red, means safety; it is the color of free passage in road traffic.

Genny’s a nurse, so she doesn’t really fight on the ground, other than some punches, some kicks, and a bit of quarterstaff fighting. In the air is a different story- her main witch skill is broomstick flying. I don’t know all the details, you’d have to ask her- I do know, however, that she likes using bombs, if she’s fighting in the air. Like, actual explosives.

Adelaide is the third youngest, and her color is Blue. Blue is the color of the sky and sea. It is often associated with depth and stability. It symbolizes trust, loyalty, wisdom, confidence, intelligence, faith, truth, and heaven. Blue is considered beneficial to the mind and body. It slows human metabolism and produces a calming effect. Blue is strongly associated with tranquility and calmness. In heraldry, blue is used to symbolize piety and sincerity.

She uses Wado-ryu Fishman Karate, a style characterized by its fluid movements and open-palm Beatrix is the second youngest, and her color is Indigo. Indigo is the color of the deep midnight sky. It can have a negative effect when used during a depressed state, because it will deepen the mood. Indigo symbolizes a mystical borderland of wisdom, self-mastery and spiritual realization. While blue is the color of communication with others, indigo turns the blue inward, to increase personal thought, profound insights, and instant understandings. While blue can be fast, Indigo is almost instantaneous. She uses the Two-sword style with a pair of shrinky-dink Germa Rending Shears- a type of sabre that shrinks down into a smaller blade, when the correct magical key signature is used.

Cecelia is the youngest, and her color is Violet. The color violet relates to the imagination and spirituality. It stimulates the imagination and inspires high ideals. It is an introspective color, allowing us to get in touch with our deeper thoughts. Violet has the highest physical vibration in the visible spectrum. Violet is the color of the union of body and soul, creating a balance between our physical and our spiritual energy. From a color psychology perspective, violet promotes harmony of the mind and the emotions, contributing to mental balance and stability, peace of mind, a link between the spiritual and the physical worlds, between thought and activity. Violet supports the practice of meditation. Too much of the color violet can promote or aggravate depression in some. It is one color that should be used extremely carefully and in small amounts by those who are vulnerable to these depressed states.

Cece’s a battle clown.

I’m- Tired. Mab’s done, I think- she just came outside, and she’s picked me up, and she’s picked up my mother’s ashes- we had to burn her body- and she’s got Deb’s sword and all our stuff and we’re-leaving-

And that was the last I ever saw of our old home. I cried myself to sleep on Mab’s shoulder, and that’s where my recollection of events ends.

There are things I am Bound by Oath not to speak of. What I did, exactly, to get the Umbrae of Gobdark to fight on our side of the war- that is one of those things.

I can, however, tell you about the Memory Palace of Shadows.

The method of loci is a method of memory enhancement which uses visualizations with the use of spatial memory and familiar information about one’s environment, to quickly and efficiently recall information. The method of loci, also known as the Memory Palace, is a mnemonic device adopted in ancient rhetorical treatises. Many methods of recalling faces, number lists, and words rely on this technique. Success has little to do with brain structure or intelligence; mostly, it has to do with remembering where you put your shit.

The items to be remembered in this mnemonic system are mentally associated with specific physical locations. The method relies on memorized spatial relationships to establish, order, and recollect memorial content.

The Rhetorica ad Herennium and most other sources recommend that the method of loci should be integrated with elaborative encoding (i.e., adding visual, auditory, or other details) to strengthen memory. However, due to the strength of spatial memory, simply mentally placing objects in real or imagined locations without further elaboration can be effective for simple associations.

A variation of the "method of loci" involves creating imaginary locations (houses, palaces, roads, and cities) to which the same procedure is applied. It is accepted that there is a greater cost involved in the initial setup, but thereafter the performance is in line with the standard loci method. The purported advantage is to create towns and cities that each represent a topic or an area of study, thus offering an efficient filing of the information and an easy path for the regular review necessary for long term memory storage.

Something that is likely a reference to the "method of loci" techniques survives to this day in the common phrases "in the first place", "in the second place", and so forth.

The designation is not used with strict consistency. In some cases it refers broadly to what is otherwise known as the art of memory, the origins of which are related, according to tradition, in the story of Simonides of Ceos and the collapsing banquet hall. For example, after the story of how Simonides relied on remembered seating arrangements to call to mind the faces of recently deceased guests, insight from other scholars led to the development of the method of loci, which is a systematic way of improving one's memory by using imagery. In other cases the designation is generally consistent, but more specific: "The Method of Loci is a Mnemonic Device involving the creation of a Visual Map of one's House."

This term can be misleading: the ancient principles and techniques of the art of memory, hastily glossed in some works, depended equally upon images and places. The designator "method of loci" does not convey the equal weight placed on both elements. Training in the art or arts of memory as a whole, as attested in classical antiquity, was far more inclusive and comprehensive in the treatment of this subject.

I suppose I can tell you what I did, actually- but only the surface details. Method of Loci- Loci Method. Place memory- memory place. Same, Same, Same.

The Place remembers too- all places.

Shadow Palace of Memory just… physicalized things.

Time is strange; you start out with so much, and then before you know it, you've run out. Dawn shines over a battlefield in the middle of Corallia, where Shyarly’s cafe stands still; it shines on a princess, freed of her shackles; it shines on a townhouse, filled with pirates and royalty; it shines on a ship where seven teenage girls and two grown men are helping a slightly racist fishman coat the outside with a special bubble mixture.
As the light hits wavering Umbrae, they vanish—burned away by the rolling sun-tide.

Here’s a story. See if you can tell what kind of weapon it became.

I started formal training in the martial arts when I was six years old. My gym was a very masculine environment; there weren’t any other girl students there, but the trainers and teachers there were great guys anyway, and they genuinely loved having me as a student. Part of it was the rarity—it’s very rare that any member of the Morgan House wants to learn something so banal as the spear, and rarer still that they stick with it.

It’s hard to imagine a time when I was ever small, but I was—a tiny scrappy little fae-lette, only a bit over a yard tall—three feet and some change. I was a tiny child.

I was also pugnacious—and back then, I was rambunctious too. I love fighting; I love to be in a spar, the adrenaline rush and having punches hurled at me—and back then, I had more energy than a midsummer bonfire. For me, doing all the suicide drills and the cherrypicks and the crunches and on and on—most people greeted that with a groan of dismay. I cheered, and got right to it.

The coaches and trainers really like that kind of attitude, even the crusty assholish ones; it’s so rare, you see.

Our gym allowed full-contact sparring, which gets brutal in a hurry. The only rules were that we had to wear a mouth guard and hand wraps, no live steel, and no hits below the belt—as in, the crotch—were allowed. That’s about it, as far as rules went; the Gym Master took the approach that the Zeroth Rule was the best rule of all.

For those that haven’t been around a shop before, the Zeroth Rule is thus: Don’t make me make a rule about this.

Anyway, every Fightday was Fight Day, where all we did was spar and go over what happened in the spars. There was also some remedial technique correction going on, but that you had to ask for. On my First ever Fight Day, Coach Feste, who was on loan from the Mime Tower, paired me up with a really cocky and assholish white-ribbon to show me the ropes a little. Our Gym used a ribbon system, much like the belt system of ranking—the colors were black for novices, then red, yellow, blue, and white for the most advanced students, before you got named a Ser, and that was it (aside from gaining respect from your peers, which is a matter of internal character). This white-ribboner was at least six feet and four times my weight; but I was so excited to get into it and fight!

I had a fight boiling in my blood, and everyone at the Gym was at least peripherally aware that I approached every moment of training with the same kind of no-holding-back-for-later enthusiasm I would later learn is called ‘100% effort at all times’.

Coach Feste was not a stupid man and he hated high-ranking fighters with bad attitude. This white-ribboner had bad attitude. I guess he saw the evil gleam of battle in my eye from the moment we met; and that day, at that time, was the best moment for a ‘little’ joke. Of course, for any kind of Fool, but Mimes especially, a ‘little’ joke is a nasty thing to be the butt of.

Coach yelled ‘Fight!’ and I leapt into the fighting stance and the other guy didn’t even put his guard up. He was laughing at me, sneering, jeering, the whole shebang.

I don’t remember if he said anything— I think he must of, because I remember Coach’s face changing to something absolutely furious, and I remember the white-ribboner’s grin as he slapped at his side, goading me on- and I remember this, too.

In our Gym, we were only allowed to spar when we’d shown proficiency in our level of combinations- we weren’t supposed to ever hit once and stand there, we were supposed to hit and hit and hit until we either had to block or they went down.

When I hit the white-ribboner, I hit him with everything I had; the motion came from below my feet and ended behind his back, all the way up through my legs, my back, and my arms. I struck him, right in his ribs. I felt something crack- like, snap! - under my knuckles.

He went to the floor like a sack of potatoes, and started blubbering like a baby.

Coach Feste leisurely strolled over from the group of Sers who were laughing their asses off at me, the tiny little black-ribboner, sending my Giant to the floor in a squalling heap. I mean, they were laughing so hard they looked about half a gasp away from pissing themselves. They think it’s a game, that I just play hit him and… I dunno.

And in his great, thunderous voice, Coach Feste hollers: “Black Ribbon! Why are you on the floor? Do you not see this White Ribbon has been assigned to fight you?”

Meanwhile, the black-ribboner is crying like a bitch, because I totally just broke one of his ribs.

Coach Feste just squatted down next to the poor guy and whispered, “Don’t you know that women are made of pain, son?”

I’ve been a little bit wary of mimes ever since.

Anyway.

“You guys want to hear how I got rid of that Ghost Army?”

“YEAH!” shouts Luffy.

I snicker, and glance at everyone else. We’re in the lounging conservatory of the Royal Town House in Gyoncorde; everyone’s clean, rested, fed, and bandaged. Deborah is lying on a floating lounge chair, of all things, and-

“TELL THE STORY ALREADY MAB!” shouts Luffy.

“Alright, alright! Now, where was I- ah, yes-”
“Stories are like swords. Even if one borrows a sword, even if one does not forge it from ore and fire and their own sweat and tears, it is still the strength of one’s own body and the veracity of one’s own skill that makes proper- or improper- use of it.

“A sword, even dulled with age, can still draw blood. It can still strike down that which attacks; it can still defend that which is held dear.

“It is true that the sword made by one’s own hand is powerful; it is true, that the sword of one’s own hands is Known down to it’s very essences. One is intimate with its heft and its reach. Indeed, a sword made with one’s own two hands is merely another part of one’s arm.

“That very familiarity breeds hesitation; for it is also true that a reckless swing will notch even the strongest of blades. ‘Is it strong enough, one thinks. Will it withstand this? I worked so hard to make it-’

“A blade one snatches up because one needs a weapon in hand is not prey to such fears. One uses that blade to beat against their foes until the sword either saves- or shatters.

“But whether one makes that sword or takes it up from someone who fell on the field, the battles fought with it are always won by the wielder, not the blade.

“And so, I say this; I, the Queen of All Shadows, shall take the three blades drawn forth on this night, and venture out into the darkness. I shall find three things, which are needed- I shall find the treasure of this Shade, who has lingered this many years. I shall find the last to witness this treasure, wherever they may lurk. And I shall return, with the treasure I seek- and more, if circumstances are favorable. Upon my return, this Shade, who has lingered far longer than necessary, will leave this place- and this World- forever.” I said.

“Yes ma’am!” said the Ghost, shivering.

I smiled, and glanced at the two merfolk who had been very quiet; I nodded to Robin, who nodded back. I glanced over Beatrice-

“Sorry, what?”

“Be-a-trix!” said Beatrix, scowling.

“Oh, I’m sorry- with an ‘X’ at the end instead of a ‘Z’ or a ‘CE’?”

“Yeah.”

“Okay.”

I glanced over at Beatrix, and saw that she was sleeping peacefully, if in a melancholy way. Saa- not something that can be fixed in one night.

“I’ll be back with the dawn, and not before. No matter what happens, you wait until the dawn- I’ll ring at the gate three times, no more and no less. Don’t let any other in,” I said.

And then, I turned, and left.

The Widow’s Chalice was stolen from her; find the Ghost that took it, and whatever remains of her cup, and she’ll find peace at long last. Her story, if you’ve forgotten, goes something like this-

Once upon a time, long ago, there was a young woman. There was a young woman who was different from the other people in her village. She could see and do things that no one else could, which made them scared of her. She became alone, and angry, and had no one to turn to.

And then, one day, she made a friend. It could have been anyone- but, it was enough that someone wasn’t scared of her anymore. Slowly, the woman made more friends, and the village came to accept her. Some wounds heal slowly- others, not at all. And so, the woman married, and her husband built her house at the very edge of their village.

And so it came to pass that that little village had their own resident witch.

Eventually, the witch and her husband had a daughter, and that daughter had her skills and talents, just as her mother did before her. Seasons changed, and seedlings grew- and the witch’s daughter fell in love with a passing soldier.

Maybe he really did mean to marry her; maybe she was foolish and young.

And maybe not.

The point is, the soldier left her with another daughter, and did not return.

And when the Witch’s Daughter, fallen from the good graces of the village, died herself, she did not leave. She stayed, and she stayed- for eight hundred years, through generation after generation of her family, she stayed. And the longer she stayed, the less there was of the Witch’s Daughter- and then, Robin, Beatrix, and myself, ended up at her house, at the very end of the road on which she could still turn back.

I left the house on frog legs, and left it’s little self-sustaining farmstead ringed in the bones of whales, it’s fence posts topped with the skulls of fish and horses and men. I went through the spiny gate, it’s coral bleached white with age, and let it shut and latch behind me. Under my feet, the path changed from cut stones to crushed shells, to muck. All around me, in the darkness, shimmering shapes began to flicker and blaze.

That house was on the edge of a village, once- a lively little place, with stories and lives all their own. Out in the distant night, I could hear the raucous echo of village life; a miller and a butcher and a baker, and their wives and children, the spinster librarian beating knowledge into the children of the village with the hard length of a switch, if necessary—shouts, screams, and going about their…
unlives.

Over hill and under dell, to the forest where coral fish dwell; on the cliff overlooking war’s ancient strife, there you will find the horses, live.

My prophetic directions were quite clear, and Faldo had unwittingly given me a heading—half an hour to the west, as the merman swims, is about the same as an hour as the Fairy runs. The name of the place I was running to is Crickhollow Sandbar— or so Faldo said, but there is no proof of his being correct.

As for what my directions told me to do, it’s quite clear, I think—go over the hill, and under a valley, to the coral reef. On the cliff that overlooks the ancient Barrows, the horses live.

And so I started running west. The Hunter chases the Beast to the West; and by their Departure, I knew my path.

“Ah, I had wondered about that.”

“Yeah— not all that helpful on an island or near a city, or even a large enough village— but out in the country and the wilds, knowing which constellations do what, and when, is very helpful to navigation.”

“The only thing I don’t understand is how the stars of this island can mimic the stars at surface level so precisely…”

I grin at Nami, and she blinks at me— but I can’t actually answer that question. Legally, I mean; I can’t answer that— and frankly, the truth isn’t that cool. Movement timing schedules, mechanical gears, and telemetry is really boring if you don’t like mathematics the way I do...

On with the story.

The only thing to really know about the Horse’s Meadow on the Cliff is this— it is wide, and green, rolling with grasses. There is no cover to speak of in any direction excepting the scrubby coral-stones that dissolve into sand and seagrass. The ghostly war raged on below, the barrows become hillocks of engineered encampments, trenches and ditches filled with bodies—

Cannonfodder lying in the field of battle; was it the third week or the fourth week of the siege? The air filled with the smoke and stench of burning bodies in the trenches-

But above, on the cliff where the horses had run, there was still the calm coolness of night. In those darkened hours, the light became soft and faded; the fields were lit with moonlight and stars, and the colors were soft and gentle. All in that place was quiet, the distant roar of the ghostly war a simple noise, as ignorable as a waterfall in the distance, or a storm passing through - noted, surely, but not of importance.

The water in that place is warm, and almost lazy in it’s movements; a gentle, rocking motion much like a mother would use to send a babe to sleeping. My ears had finally adjusted to the water, and so I could hear the soft rustling of leaves and branches of coral in the current, and I could smell - even through the filter system of my breathing rig, I could smell the faint stench of rotting leaves and algae, the unctuous grime of good black dirt.

It was as if Summer had found a place to linger, on that cliff in the sea.

In the tall waves of grass there laid sleeping a herd of horses.

And before me stood- hm. How to say it- Epona is the Goddess of Horses- what they look like, what they move like, how they think and live and die; Rhiannon is the Goddess of Riders, what they want, who they are, what they become.

What stood before me was something older; not what a horse and rider looks like, but what they are.

She appeared before me in increments.

Marrow black and flush with glistening blood shining like rubies in the starlight wove up and around into the barest form of a horse, the thin lines of it’s bones and the flickering of its weight. Then came bones, and blood- sharp white spiderwebs, cobwebs thick and white and made of stone began to build themselves, and before me rose the skeleton of a horse and woman, some strange creature married in vile ways-

A moment of blood filled my nose with - the stink of her, and then came flesh, thick and red and tiny threads clinging and tearing against each other before lumps of muscle appeared, strong gristly strands tying them without any knot to the bone- and then the muscles built and built. I saw glistening guts slithering over themselves, and a womb empty of life. I saw skin scrape itself over rippling muscles, the haggard form of one who ran too far, too fast.

I saw pallid flesh merged with shaggy fur; I saw muscles that bunched over new-skin, and the stretching of arms, the clenching and clamping of fingers. I saw a face, heralded by a mane of hair; ears, a tail, four long legs. Hooves like dinner plates.

A Monster, if I can use that term.

And then, she spoke, and what she spoke was thus-

“Tom of the Road had ridden his last, and was now alone in the Night. From where he was, a man might see the white bleached coral-trees and the black outline of the lonely downs; and the grey lines of the farther and lonelier downs beyond the ridge of the dell; or in the flickering lights far below, the darkness of the field of battle. Far below him, if the moons shone just so, he could have seen the grey smoke of gunfire arising from the blackened world.

“All alike was black to the eyes of Tom, and all the sounds were silent in his ears; only his soul struggled still to slip from the iron chains and to pass into Heaven.

“The Wind blew, and blew.

“Tom tha’night had nought but the Wind to ride; they had taken his true ugly horse on the day when they took from him the green grass and the blue sky, men’s voices and the laughter of women, and had left him alone with chains about his neck to swing in the Wind forever.

“And the Wind blew, and blew.

“The soul of Tom of the Road was nipped by the cruel chains, and whenever it struggled to escape it was beaten backwards into the iron collar by the wind that blows from Heaven to Hell below. Swinging there by the neck, there fell away the old sneers from off his rotted lips, and scoffs that he had long since scoffed at the Gods fell from his maggoty tongue, and there rotted old bad lusts out of his heart and his loins and his brains, and from his fingers fell the murky ink of deeds that were evil; and they all fell to the ground and grew there in pale rings and mottled clusters. When these ill things had all fallen away, Tom’s soul was clean again, as his early love- the Witch’s Daughter- had found it within him, a long while ago on some spring day he only now could recall clearly. Together, they swung up there in the wind; the old white bones, Tom’s wretched soul, and the memories he had of better days- all of them together in his old torn coat, dancing in the wind to the tune of rusty chains beating and clinking against each other.

“And the Wind blew, and blew.

“Ever and anon the souls of the sepulchred, coming from their consecrated acres, would go by beating up Wind to Heaven past the Hanging Tree and past the forgotten soul of Tom, who might not go free. Night after night Tom watched the ghastly soldiers on the downs with empty hollow sockets, until his dead hair grew and covered his poor dead face, and hid the shame of it all from the horses that roamed this forest.

“And the Wind blew, and blew.

“Sometimes on gusts of the Wind there came someone’s tears, and a great beat and beating against the iron chains, but could not rust them through.

“And the Wind blew, and blew.

“Every evening all the thoughts that Tom had ever uttered aloud came flocking in from doing their work in the World, the work that may not cease, and sat along the branch that hung him and chirruped and cooed to the soul of Tom, the soul that might not go free. All the thoughts he had ever uttered!

“The evil thoughts rebuked the soul that bore them because they might not die; and all those that he had uttered the most furtively, chirruped the loudest and shrillest in the branches all the night long. All the thoughts that Tom had ever thought about himself now pointed at his wet and mouldering bones and mocked his old torn coat, cackling and shrieking and mocking all the night long- but all the thoughts that Tom had ever thought of others were the only companions that his soul had to soothe it in the night as it swung in the Wind. Altogether, they twittered and cheeped to the soul and cheered the poor dumb thing that could have dreams no more, until there came a murderous thought and drove them all to fly.
“And the Wind blew, and blew.

“The Archpriest of the little village Tom of the Roads had left his lover behind in was laid in a white marble tomb, his bones laid facing towards heaven. All over his tomb were sculpted the friezes and figures of Saints writhing in martyrdom, that his bones might be defended from evil. No Wind howled here as it howled in lonely treetops down in the dell, but came with gentle breezes scented by orchards and heavy-headed flowers, over the lowlands from Heaven above; the wind played about forget-me-nots and sweet grasses in the consecrated land where lay the reposed archpriest’s rounded tomb. Easy it was for a man’s soul to pass from such a tomb, and, flitting low over remembered fields, to come upon the gardened lands of Heaven and find eternal easement.

“And the Wind blew, and blew.

“In a tavern of foul repute three men were drinking gin. Their names were Joe, and Will, and the Automatic, Isaac. No other names had they, for of whom their fathers were they had no Knowing, but only dark suspicions. Sin had caressed and stroked their faces often with it’s paws, but the face of Isaac sin had kissed all over the mouth and chin. Their food was robbery; their pastime was murder. All of them had turned away from the love of God, and earned the enmity of all upstanding men. During the Great War, such men had been in great demand; but the war had ended, and those men who were in such demand soon found that there was no place for them in the World they had fought so hard for.

“They sat at a table with a packet of playing cards before them, all greased with the marks of cheating thumbs; and they whispered to one another over their gin, but so low that the landlord of the tavern at the other end of the room could hear only muffled oaths, and knew not by Whom they swore or what they said. These three were the staunchest friends that ever had blackened a lovely day; and he to whom their friendship had been given had nothing else besides, saving some bones that swung in the Wind and rain, and an old torn coat and iron chains, and a soul that might not go free.

“As the night wore on, the three friends left their gin and on their horses, stole away. They crept down to that graveyard where rested in his tomb the Archpriest, with no one to see their passing but the horses of the forest and the field.

“At the edge of the graveyard, but outside the consecrated ground, they dug a hasty grave; two men dug, while the third watched in the Wind and the rain. The worms and crawling bugs that slept in the unhallowed ground wondered and waited; the terrible hour of midnight came upon them with its fears and it’s waves of tide, and found them still digging beside the place of tombs. The three friends trembled at the horror of such an hour in such a place, and shuddered at the touch of strange beasts unseen except by the light of faded stars and scowling moons-light; but still, they worked on.

“And the Wind blew, and blew.

“Soon enough, they had finished, and at once they left the hungry grave with all it’s worms unfed, and went away through the water stealthily but in haste, leaving the place of tombs behind them in the night. As they went they shivered, and each man as he shivered cursed the tide aloud. And so they came at last to the spot where they had hidden a ladder and a lantern. There they held long debate over whether they should light the lantern; or whether they should go without it for fear of the Law. In the end it seemed to them better that they should have the light of their lantern, and risk being taken by the Law and hanged, than that they should come suddenly face to face in the darkness with whatever one might come face to face with after midnight at the Hanging Tree.

“On three roads in the kingdom whereon it was not the wont of folk to go their way in safety, travellers tonight went unmolested; but the three friends, riding several paces wide of the Lawful Road, approached the Hanging Tree. Will carried the lantern, and Joe the ladder, but Isaac carried a great sword wherewith to do the work which must be done. When they came close, they saw how bad was the case with Tome, for little remained of that fine figure of a man and nothing at all of his great resolute spirit; only, as they came they thought they heard a whimpering cry like the sound of a thing that was caged and unfree and had almost forgotten what it was like to be free.

“Dangling and swaying to and fro, to and fro in the Wind were the bones and the soul of Tom, for the sins and wicked deeds he had done on the Law’s Road, against the good laws of the King and the softer laws of the World after the War had ended; and with shadows and a lantern through the darkness and the water, at the peril of their own lives, came the three friends that his soul had won before it swung in chains. Thus it was that the seeds of Tom’s own soul that he had sown with care and dedication all his life had grown into a Hanging Tree that bore in it’s season chains of iron and clusters of rotting meat plucked clean to bones by cackling crows and nibbling crabs; while the careless seeds that he had scattered here and there again, a kindly jest and a few merry words, oaths upheld and duties fulfilled, had grown into the triple friendship that would not desert his bones.

“The three set the ladder against the tree, and Isaac went up with his sword in his right hand, and at the top of it he reached up and began to hack at the neck below the iron collar. Presently, the bones and the old coat and the soul of Tom fell down with a rattle, and a moment afterwards his head that had watched so long alone swung clear from the swinging chain. These things Will and Joe gathered up, and Isaac came running down his ladder, and they heaped upon its rungs the terrible remains of their friend, and hastened away wet through with the tied, with the fear of haints and fellsome things in their hearts and horror lying before them on the ladder. By two of the clock’s counting they were down again in the dell, out of the bitter wind; but they went on past the open grave into the graveyard all among the tombs, with their lantern and their ladder and the terrible thing upon it which kept their friendship still.

“Then these three, that had robbed the Law of its due and proper victim, still sinned on for what was still their friend, and levered out the marble slabs from the sacred tomb of the Archpriest; and from it they took the very bones of the old priest himself. They carried them away to the eager grave that they had left, and put them in and shovelled back the earth. All that lay on the ladder they placed, with a few tears and sniffles, within the great white sepulchre under the writhing saints, and put back the great slabs of stone. Then the soul of Tom, arising hallowed out of sacred ground, went at dawn down through the dell, and- lingering but a moment about his mother’s house and the house of his beloved, now rounded fat with his child; and finally, about my ears, and whispered he the foolish thing he had done- and then he passed on, and came to the wider lands beyond this warstruck cluster of hills.

“From there, he met with all the kindly thoughts that Tom of the Road had ever had, and together they flew away until, at last, he reached Heaven, and with it, rest. Will and Joe and Automatic Isaac went back to their gin and their robbery and cheating, and knew not that in their sinful lives they had sinned one sin at which the Gods smiled; but We did.

“I was once the horse of Tom; and these, the horses of Will, Joe, and Isaac. There is nothing left of us but the memories we shared together, and the bloodlines that sprang from our loins- here, then, is my wish.

“Take this, and take us- and let the past be passed away, never to return again.”

-and, so saying, she reached into a bag upon her back that I had not seen in her appearing, and held out to me a chalice. I took it from her ancient hand, and then before me stood four horses- the four “Wait wait wait- hold it, hold everything. We have five horses.”

“Why, yes, Mark; we do indeed have five horses.”

“But the Goddess only gave you four.”

“True.”

“…Mab, where’d the fifth horse come from?”

“Hm. I’m sure I don’t know- Robin, where’d the fifth horse come from?”

“Steady?”

“Mhm.”

“Well. If you must know, Mark, Steady Walker is a ghost horse.”

“WHAT!!!” everyone shouts.

I grin wide and toothy, and tilt my head in Robin’s direction.

“Why don’t you take it from here, Rob?”

“Sure, Mab.”

The Sea is more ancient than the mountains, and freighted with the memories and dreams of Time. Be it blue, green, grey, white, or black; mirror bright or wine dark; smooth as glass, ruffled by the wind, or pitched with waves taller than the mountains, the Sea is never silent.

And so it was that night, when the Queen of Shadows, Mab the Merciful, left to find the token of affection the Witch’s Daughter had given unto her soldier-lover so long ago. Mab said once before that I am as much a Witch as Nami is; but where Nami calls the Weather, I commune with the Dead.
And so it was then.

Mab said before that the Witch’s Daughter’s ghost had stayed- she had stayed for long enough that there was hardly anything left of her at all. It is not that her soul was stuck here; so far as I can tell, the soul is bound to whatever heaven or paradise the gods who made us set into being at the Beginning of Men. What remained was her Echo.

An echo is the reflection- not of light, but of sound. In this case, it was the sound of her soul being reflected against the force of the living World; and from that ringing there arose the fearsome haint. The Dead, and the echoes of them, do not belong with us in the living World. For a time, they may ring themselves against the churning wall of Life; but, as with all things, their echoing chimes must end, and so they do, and pass from this world forever. Unless, of course, a grudge is involved.

Some hurts do not heal; some grudges persist beyond the grave. And so it was with the Witch’s Daughter, who had become a Hag; and Hags eat children. There were signs, of course, the most prominent being the young living couple’s reluctance to bring children of their own into that house; their fearful, longing gazes upon Beatrix, and the way the house was set to comfort youths that were not there… And, of course, the malicious miasma of the Hagfish herself, especially when Queen Mab had left the house- a sharp, burning rage at the one she had loved, beginning to eat away at the entirety of her faculty and reason.

And yet, there was no sign that she had eaten a child yet; and, if Mab returned successful, the Hag never would.

Either way, it was going to be a long night. To pass the time, I told these stories three. I started thusly.

“So said Homer.

“The poet of antiquity, who created a synopsis of history, that obliterated centuries of oral tradition and threw me head first into the study of ancient objects- and antiquated verse:

“I will teach you this- who wins in the collision of the Nereids and the Faerie? If you are from Skua then the answer is ‘The Faerie’ but in case you’ve no relation to the sky-bound Nations-

“I shouldn’t skip ahead, so I’ll start with this instead: the story starts in Illium; some soldiers took a trip to it, flipped a bitch; tryn’ to get at a Faerie Player-

“Paris’ takin’ Helen but he isn’t supposed to Mene-lay-her-

“Prayers to the gods are flyin’ left and right, beggin’ for a fight; then Achilles quit the battle out of spite- yeah, that’s right-

“Lemme just back-track a little, because I lost track of the tale in the middle-

“And I ought to not fiddle with the canon of the history of Man; Eumelus might have done but that doesn’t mean I can-

“So here, I’ll tell the tale leading up to this tale.
“The Pantheon was havin’ them a party all night; they put some effort into makin’ up the guest list—tidy rockin’ Zeus, Hera, Ares, Aphrodite, Athena, Hermes, Vulcan— if you’re Roamin’— but one biddy weren’t invited—

“Little Eris, they’re embarrassed of her; she’s feelin’ slighted, so the goddess- to be honest she got a little over-excited- she ignited quite a fight by tossing in an apple: Said ‘From Eris, To The Fairest’ and Zeus is thinkin’ ‘Oh snap, I’ll have to adjudicate a beauty pageant; that would be bad- one goddess will be very happy and all the rest will be killing-mad’

“So he had quite the brilliant idea- he said ‘Who else wants to be the one to judge the three divas!?’

“Ares said, ‘That would be a strategic mistake.’

“Poseidon said, ‘I will-! Wait wait, was that an earthquake?’

“Hermes- he wasn’t there, he had ‘messages to take’–

“And Dionysus probably would have but he was totally wasted.

“-Oh, hey, Dionysus! I forgot about that guy- spent his third trimester chillin’ snug in Zeus’ fat thigh, bein’ tracked by Missus Hera because of a couple of Zeus’s indiscretions-“Oh, those are too good, really, you should hear about it in this lesson.

“When it came to mackin’ Zeus was never slackin’; there weren’t a province of his kingdom that he didn’t make the beast with two backs in, and beast is the right word for the way he was attackin’-

“Once, his tactic was to turn into a bird and get crackin’ with a lady named Leda; he was disguised as a swan, flashed a sexy peck a plumages and they was gettin’ it on, makin’ love with lovely Leda on the bank of a pond-

“Then his large libido led him from the lake to the lawn, where he made eyes at Io; he turned her into a cow-

“Then he turned into a bull to plough Europa, wow-

“Iodame, and Niobe, and Eurynome got deflowered-

“With Danae he gave new meaning to the phrase ‘golden showers’-

“With Aegina he’s an eagle, he’s makin’ the rounds-

“Touched the stars with Elara then put her underground-

“Never married Maera, or took Electra on a date-

“And Olympias claimed he was the sire to Alexander the Great-

“He raped Lamia, Laodamia, Podarge, and Thalia-

“(Thalia could have been his daughter, but we have to keep movin’-)”

“He hiked up Himalia-

“Poked at Plouto and Phyrra-
“Did Antiope like a satyr-
“Tried hard to get Taygete but she said ‘See You Later’
“Met Alcmene as her husband, blew his load with a chortle-
“And Callisto’s last on the list- but just the list of mortals-“Except a babe named Semele; when they made love it was gory -
“But Semele birthed Dionysus, and now we’re back to the story.
“Zeus delivered Dionysus, Dionysus made the party, and the party is the way the Faerie Wars got started-
“See, all the gods and goddesses were stumped because of Eris, until they said ‘Let’s get a mortal to decide; I know a guy- his name is Paris’-
“Now, Paris was impartial but the ladies didn’t care; they all decided to offer bribes and the whole affair was barely fair-
“So, Hera says ‘I’ll make you king’-
“Athena says ‘I’ll make you wise’-
“And Aphrodite says ‘I’ll get you laid’-
“And Paris? He was just a guy; so he gets Helen of Sparta and makes her Helen de Fae-
“So beautiful, it’s said, that any man would be brave for a chance to get laid.
“Helen was the wife of Menelaus and now he’s getting annoyed; so he leads an army, fights the Mauls, and wins the First Faerie War-
“And everyone in Fae is killed, the end. Ah, shit- you wanted more?
“Look, the gods give us a little time, and less inspiration; try to tell it all and you get rather impatient-
“The beginning of a story always sparks yet another- like that party all the gods were at? That was the wedding of Achilles’ mother.
“And if you think it’s irrelevant, this story that I’m telling; all’s you need to do is listen to this fact about Helen-
“She was conceived by Zeus and Leda, playin’ birds of a feather; now you see how all this shit comes right back together?”

Bryony lets out a whoop when I’m done, and everyone else starts clapping and cheering, to their wont.
I smile, bow from my seat, and wait for the praise to die down before continuing with my tale-telling.
And then, in that house, there came a tapping, a sort of gentle rapping, rapping at the fence-gate and then the outside door. I didn't move; but the Hag did. There was a great thrashing and screeching sound, and then a silence so profound I felt a frisson of curiosity shudder down my spine.

I didn't indulge it; if I had left that house at any point that night, I would have been killed, and Beatrix as well. It really has to do with what that place was before it became a village, and then was abandoned as everyone moved or died or just walked out into the dell and valley and barrow-downs and vanished from this time and place- that place, looking backwards on it, away from the whimsical rush of the moment, was a mine.

Specifically, it was a strip mine.

My grandfather worked in a mine, every day- until it took his life. Mines are dark, dangerous places filled with strange, creaking noises and the darkest dark you will ever see. They’re hot, and narrow; places where humans were never meant to go. Deep inside the earth, as you get closer and closer to the burning heart of the world, you’ll find things you’ve never imagined; things you could never see on the surface.

Strange things happen in mines; stranger things happen on lands where strip-mines once were. It is well documented that every being- every living thing and every non-living thing, even ideas- have their own spirit. In the oldest days, this was known as kami, or god- a small god, for everything that exists. When a place is strip-mined, the small gods of the land- the forest, the stones, the rivers and streams and animals, everything the mine displaces… the kami of that area had been displaced, but they could not leave.

Further, there were the ancient dreams of the men who had mined there to contend with. The Dreams of Men do not die easy deaths; and miner’s dreams are even more tenacious than most. If a man is lucky, a mine will bless him with gold, silver, precious ores, and gleaming gemstones. Strike it lucky, and you, your children, and your children’s children, will be rich beyond all your dreams.

Strick it unlucky, and you won’t come back- the mine will steal the breath from your lungs, crush your skull and brains to pulp, send you falling down into the deep darkness where no man can go- or cling you fast and tight in the stones, and will not let you go.

Places remember, when men do not.

When the Fairy miners came to Ryugu Mergyo in the 800’s to dig the hardrock mines of copper, gold, silver, platinum, lead, opals, and rock-salt, they brought with them their belief in tommyknockers. In this area, they mostly came from Coll’ottova, or Fist’it; and in Fist’it, they were called knockers for their habit of knocking on the walls of the mine- and knocking inattentive miners out. They were said to be small, tontatta-like creatures who lived, worked, and died in the mines; tapping away for treasures too small for the Fairy miners to find and making strange music deep in the stones. They were often heard, and their presence was often felt; but their actual bodies were almost never seen.

Some legends say that they were the ghosts of Automata that had been brought by the Roamin’s as slaves to work in the Fist’it mines. Others felt that they were the ghosts of miners who had died in the mines, or the souls who hadn’t been good enough for heaven, but weren’t bad enough for hell. Still more contend that they were a kind of tontatta that lived in mines and was very shy, and that was the end of it.
Ghosts or dwarves or Fairy superstition, knockers were generally considered to be friendly and helpful by the Fairy miners. They often warned miners of cave-ins and fire, and were known to lead a miner or two to a rich vein of ore. They also were known to be vindictive if neglected or abused through disrespect. Whistling offended them, and was considered to be bad luck; speaking ill of the knockers was also bad luck. Leaving an offering of bread—usually the crusty edge of their luncheon pastry, which was covered in mine dirt anyway—was a good way to curry the favor of the tommyknockers.

As an aside, there were also Fairy superstitions about women with red hair. In general, women in, on, or near a mine were considered bad luck—probably because women only really came to the old mines in times of tragedy, looking for lost loved ones, or retrieving their corpses. A red-haired woman was considered particularly bad, because red-haired women were taken to be omens of death. It’s my suspicion that this old aversion to red-hair comes from the aversion to the red-haired Morgans who ravaged parts of Ottava in the Age of Heroes.

Eventually, the Hag returned; a little blood around her mouth, a little wilder around the eyes—but return she did. She bade me speak on, and so I spoke.

The second story I spoke was thus.

“The elves relate to their little ones a great many stories—and this story, as a matter of fact, is the only story I really remember my mother telling me as a child. Most elvish stories are about forests and glades; but in truth, where a tree may grow, so too may an elf live. Thus, this story is more to do with moors and reed banks, and suited to my age and capacity when she and I were last together.

“The youngest elves—elf-children, miws—are quite satisfied with stories that go nowhere at all, the girl in the woods who finds a bear-family’s house and eats their pottage and sleeps in their beds; they quite like these kinds of stories and think them very grand. Older elf-children, perinmiw, want something with more and deeper meaning, or at least something they can imagine themselves inside of; or, failing that, a story about their own family.

“This is one of the oldest and longest stories which the emig tell their miw and perinmiw, passed down from the ancient Deren who lived in oak-tree forests near marshlands and rushing waters. Few outside the elves know this story, very likely because it is quite an inland story, and even in the oldest days, most of the best of the World was to be found at sea. Still, this story has been repeated from mouth to mouth, from one emig to another in her time, for thousands of years; and each elf-mama has told it better than the one before her—and now, I mean to tell it better than all my mothers before me.

“The first elf-pair who related it lived at the time of it’s happening; and in those days, most elves lived a transient, migratory existence, passing from forest to forest. They stayed for a time, and then wandered on—and this first pair stayed in the rafters of the Orc’s house, which was built in the wild moorlands of what is now Western France. To speak more correctly, the Orc’s house was on the great rolling moorheath, high up in the north near the Normandy coast, by the seashore. This wilderness is still an immense wild heath of marshy ground, filled with oak and ash trees, and wandered now only by deer, wolves, elk, and the wild creatures of the forest. In the olden times, the place was a shallow sea; the ground underneath had heaved up from beneath and now the moorland extends for kilometers in every direction. It is surrounded by dampened meadows and shivering, oozing mud; swamps thick with biting flies and midges, and green rushes, and tall brown cattails that bob in the wind. On the sturdier banks of fonts there grow squidberry bushes and weepy willow trees. Mists are almost always hovering over those lands, and on nights when the moons scowl the howling of wolves echoes throughout.

“In these modern times, that place is still called the Wild Moor; and it well may be that those lands haven’t changed at all in thousands of years. What is there now was there then- the rushes grow to the same height they always have, and bear the same kind of long purple-brown leaves with feathery tips that chime faintly with the first frost and shatter by the first snow. There still stands the oaks, with their tall straight trunks and their wide spreading branches clustered thick with green leaves like teardrops. As for the living beings who dwell in the particular spot of note, the spiders still dower their daughter’s in glimmering white veils and dresses for their wedding; and the elves are dressed in white, with black and red trimmings.

“It is a strange habit of the elves- especially in their raising of children- that they do not touch the ground excepting during winter, if they can help it. And so it is not so strange to think that of all the peoples that live in this World, it was the elves alone who could bear to live in that wild place. Certainly, if any but a light-footed elf, man or maid, ventured out on the wavering, shaking, undulating marsh-ground of the moor, they met with the same fate; the wanderer sank, and went down to the court of the Marsh King, as he is named, who rules in the great nerótic kingdom below. The elves of that place called him ‘Taurar Nentalf’, which means something like ‘The mighty, vast, overwhelming, huge, awful, sublime, High King of the Wet Flat Field’. Elves put stock in saying quite a lot with not much at all; but I prefer the name of ‘Marsh King’ better, and will use that name in reference to him who ruled the nerótic world below the surface of the moorland’s waters. Very little is known of the Marsh King’s rule, as the story was told to me; I think now it is rather that my mother did not wish to tell me of the horrors one might endure in that place, and so did not.

“In the moorlands, and not far from the great towering of the Normandy cliffs of chalk and the Channel that separated the old Faerie lands from the Orc’s forests, lay the house of the Orc. It’s cellars were built of water-tight stone, and it’s tower rose to keep wary watch over all the land for kilometers in every direction, and it stood with three ponderous storeys, its windows shuttered with the intricate white and green bound-willow fences. In the attic of the house, above the rafters closed in with ornate plaster, there lived the elf-pair, and their nest of willow-staves, and their bedding of fur and silk; and the Deren-father had built for his wife a fine bower, and within it she had placed her eggs. There, in that place, the Deren-mother had sat with her eggs and felt sure that their hatching would come to something, eventually.

“In those days, Elves often stayed in the houses of the great, offering service as scholars, minstrels, and wanderers of the land; and so it was that the Deren-father wandered the land, and the Deren-mother copied down stories and songs that had only been told and sung, never caught in the pages of a book or in the turnings of a scroll; and so the two made their living.

“One evening, late in the autumnal season, Deren-father stayed out quite late, and when he came home to his wife and eggs he seemed quite frazzled. ‘I have something very bad to tell you,’ said he to the Deren-mother.

“Keep it to yourself, then,’ she replied. ‘Remember that I am brooding eggs; your news may agitate me, and will surely affect them.’

“You must know it at once,’ said he. ‘The daughter of our Lord in the Sandora has arrived here; she has ventured to journey into the Moor, and now she is lost.’

“She who was born of wolves?’ cried the Deren-mother. ‘Ah, tell me what you have learned, husband; I cannot bear to be kept waiting at a time when I am brooding eggs.’

“Well, you see,’ he replied, ‘she believed what the doctors said, and what I have heard you say as well; the moor-flowers which grow nearest the edge of the Marsh King’s realm would heal her sick father; and she has flown here, far to the north in swan’s down, in company with some other goose-maids and swan-princesses who return to these parts every year to renew their powerful magics. She who is born of wolves and daughter to our Lord came, and where is she now?"

“You speak too much of particulars,” said the Deren-mother, “and the eggs grow agitated, as I feared; speak your news and leave us in suspense no longer!”

“Well,” said he, “I have kept watch in the moor as the house-lord bade me; and this evening I went among the rushes where I thought the marshy ground would bear my weight, and while I was there three swans came. Something in their manner of flying seemed to say to me, ‘Look hard now; there fly no swans at all, only swan’s feathers.’ You know my meaning; you have the same intuition I have, and you know whether a thing is right or wrong on first sight.”

“Yes, of course,” said she; “but enough of the swan’s feathers and their rightness or wrongness—tell me of the princess!”

“Well, you know as well as I that in the middle of the moor there is something like a lake,” said the Deren-father. “You can see the edge of its shore if you stretch but a little onto the toes; and on windless days you can hear faintly the music of the Marsh King’s court. Just there, by the reeds and the green banks, lay the trunk of an oak-tree; and upon this the three swans stood flapping their great wings, and looking about them; and one threw off her plumage with a great heaving sigh, and I immediately recognized her as one of the daughters of our Lord in Sandora. There she sat, without any covering but her long, black hair and her cloak of swan-feathers. I heard her tell the two others to take great care of her cloak, and I heard her splash into the water—perhaps to pluck the flowers which she fancied she saw there. I heard the others with her agree, and the rustling of the feather-cloak as they picked it up for safekeeping— and I wondered then what would become of it? She most likely asked the same question, and if so she received an answer, very practical and cruel in tone: ‘Dive down now, oh wolf-born woman!’ they cried; ‘thou shalt never more fly in the feathers of the swan; thou shalt never again see the Sandora; here, in this forgotten place, thou wilt remain!’ So saying, they tore the feathered cloak into naught but thread and downy feathers which scattered like a snowfall, and then the two deceitful princesses flew away. And the Princess Born of Wolves was alone.”

“Oh, how terrible! Terrible, terrible!” said the Deren-mother; “I can hardly bear to hear more, but you must tell me what happened next. I can see in your eyes there is more to be said, and you will not rest easy until you have said it.”

“I fear I will not rest easy regardless,” said he, “for as the princess wept and lamented aloud, her tears moistened the oaken stump, which was really not a stump, but the Marsh King himself, he who rules the nerótic kingdom below the marshy ground. I saw myself how the stump of the tree turned around and was a tree no more, while long, clammy branches like arms were extended from it. Then the poor child was terribly frightened, and started up to run away. She hastened to cross the green, slimy ground— but that ground will not bear any weight, much less the heavy bones of a Wolf-girl. She fell into the water with a crash, and tangled herself in the prickling weeds in her terror; and immediately, the oaken stump dived after her—indeed, it was he who drew her down below. Great black bubbles rose up out of the moor-slime, and with these every trace of the two vanished. Now, the princess is buried in the wild marsh; she will never now carry flowers to Sandora to cure her ailing father. It would have broken your heart, my love, had you seen it— for it surely has broken mine.”

“Ach, that such suffering would find our Lord’s beloved daughter,” said she, “in such a season as this; it is a terrible omen for the coming winter. Still, I believe the unlucky princess will soon find help; someone will rise up to help her. Ah! If it had been you or I, or one of our kin, it would have been the end as soon as we were stolen under the waters; but she is made of sterner stuff than us, and may yet survive.”
“I mean to go and look every day’ said he, ‘to see if anything comes to pass;’ and so he did.’

“A long winter went by, and every day- barring the worst of the winter storms- the Deren-father went to a stand of trees overlooking the lake in the middle of the moor, and checked to see if something, anything at all, had happened. One day, after the starveling gap of the year, when spring was in full bombast, he saw a green stalk shooting up out of the deep, marshy ground. As it reached the surface of the black waters, a leaf spread out and unfolded broad and flat on the top and thorny below; and in the center there bulged a velvety bud, blushed with purple.’

“One morning, when the Deren-father had returned to see the stem and leaf and bud, he saw that the power of the thickening sunlight had caused the purple-blushed bud to burst open, and in the golden cup, bowered with purple and white petals, there lay a babe- a tiny maiden, looking as if she had just come from a bath. The little one was so like the Wolf Princess, that the elf, at the first, thought it must be the princess herself; but, after a little reflection he decided it was much more likely to be the daughter of the princess and the Marsh King. This also explained her being placed in the cup of the a water-lily, and even the petals of the flower being purple, when all other flowers that bloomed in that lake had been yellow, white, and pink.

“But I cannot leave her to lay there,’ thought the Deren-father, ‘and in my nest there are already so many. But say, I have thought of something: the wife of the Orc has no children, and how often she has wished for a little one of her own to care for. People always say the Elves bring babes in with the milk; I will do so in earnest this time. I shall flee with the child to the Orc’s wife; what rejoicing there will be!”

“And then the Deren-father crept down to where the purple lily bloomed in the water, mustered up his magic- of which there was not much, as no elf-lord or elf-king was he- and plucked the little babe from the flower-cup. He wrapped her in the soft leaves of the wild giant licorice plant, and carried her back to the house in which he stayed. When the milkmaid brought the milk into the dairy, the Deren-father handed the Orc’s wife the baby over the door-jamb of the dairy- but, being a good man of fine manners, he did not enter the dairy himself.

“His duties done, he returned to his own wife and his own bed, and related to her what he had seen and done before he slept until the noonday meal; and the little Deren-miws listened to it all, for they were then old enough to do so. ‘So you see,’ he said between yawns, ‘that the princess is not dead, for she must have sent her little one up here; and how I have found a home for her, beyond the Marsh King’s grasp.’

“Ah, I said it would be so from the first,’ replied the Deren-mother, tucking her husband into bed; ‘but now think a little of our own family. Our travelling time draws near, and I sometimes feel a little itch atop the feet. The others of our band have gone already, and I heard the quivering pair in the smokehouse say they would go too as soon as the beer season had begun again. Our miws will go through all the trials we underwent as youngsters quite well, or I am much mistaken in them. Rest now, my love.’ And that was the end of it for the elf-pair, for a time.

“The Orc’s wife was above all measures delighted when she took the sleeping child from the Deren-father who lived in her house. She kissed it and held it to her breast as it laid sleeping; but it awoke and cried terribly, and struck out with its arms and legs, and could not be pleased at all. At last she cried herself to sleep; and as she lay there so still and quiet, it was a most beautiful sight to see. The Orc’s wife was so delighted that her body and soul were aflame with joy; her heart was alight within her, and it seemed that her husband and his soldiers, who were absent, must come home as suddenly and unexpectedly as the little babe had done. She and her whole household therefore busied themselves in preparing everything for the reception of her Lord Husband. The long colored tapestry, on which she and her maids had worked pictures of their gods, was hung up. The slaves of the house polished the old shields that served as ornaments; cushions were placed on the seats, and dry wood laid on the fireplaces in the centre of the hall, so that the flames might be fanned up at a moment’s notice.

“The Orc’s wife herself assisted in the work; and so that night she felt very tired, and quickly fell into a sound sleep. When she woke just before dawn, she was terribly alarmed to find that the infant had vanished. She sprang from her couch, lit a rush-light, and searched all around the room; when, at last, in that part of the couch where her feet had lain, squatted not the babe but a gargantuan wart-encrusted toad. She was quite disgusted at this sight, and seized a heavy stick to kill the toad; but the creature gazed up at her with such lambent, mournful eyes that she was unable to strike even a single blow.

“Once more the Orc’s wife searched around the room; then she started at the toad’s utterance of a low, painful croak. She sprang from her standstill and opened the window hastily- as in those days, it was quite well known that the croaking of toads heralded foul miasmas; at the very same moment the sun arose in the east, and the thickened spring sunlight gushed through the window until it coated the whole of the room. The couch was bathed last of all, particularly where the great toad squatted. Suddenly it appeared as if the toad’s broad mouth squeezed into itself; it became small and red. The limbs contorted and crackled with the sounds of breaking bones, and took a beautiful, homely shape; and lo, there was the pretty babe lying at the foot of the bed, and the ugly toad was gone.

“What is this?” she cried, ‘have I had a wicked dream? It is my own lovely babe that lay there; no toad is in my sight.’ Then she kissed and held the babe; but the child struggled and fought and bit as if she had been a little wild cat.

“The Orc did not return on that day, nor the next; he was, however, on his way home. The wind, so favorable to the elves, was against him then; and so it is said that a wind in favor of one is often against another.

“After two or three days had passed, it became clear to the Orc’s wife how matters stood with the babe; it was bound under a horrific curse. By day, it was a beautiful babe with the temper of a fiend from hell, vicious, fractious, and unimaginably cruel; while at night, in the form of an ugly, warty toad, it was honey-sweet and gentle, with eyes full of glimmering sorrow. Here then were two natures, changing inwardly and out in the rolling of the sunlight tide.

“In essence, by day the child possessed the actual form of her mother and the fierce disposition of her sire; and when night fell, the states reverse. Her outward appearance showed the ugly frame of her sire clearest of all; and within dwelt the heart and mind passed down to her from her mother.

“The Orc’s wife was a good wife; dutiful in those rituals which protect the hearth and home from evil. Even so, the manner and method of this curse, and it’s breaking, were far beyond her skills. The wife of the Orc lived in constant pain and sorrow about her lack; and though her heart clung to the little beast, she could not explain to her husband the circumstances of her birth. Or rather, she could—but did not know if she should.

“He was expected to return shortly; and were she to tell him the whole of the truth, he would very likely, as his oaths bound him, kill the child himself and throw its corpse back into the marsh from whence it came. The Orc-wife could not bear to consign the babe to such a fate; and so she resolved that her Lord Husband would never see the child excepting in the day-time.
“To this end, she drew up a new contract with the Deren-pair, and so far as this story goes- secured their help in her deception. Thus, on the morning the elves underwent their great migration, and more than a hundred pairs of elves that had spent the winter in that wild place took their leave, the Deren-pair who lived in the attic-room of the Orc’s house did not. Their children were sent forwards in the care of their kin; and so it was when the elves had just finished their leave taking, the clangor of the warrior’s horns shouted across the heath.

“The Orc had landed with his men. They were returning home, richly laden with spoils from the Faerie coast, where the people- as did also the inhabitants of the rest of the World- often cried in alarm, ‘Deliver us from the Wild Orcs!’

“Life and it’s noisy pleasures returned to the house of the Orc on the moorland. A great cask of mead was drawn into the hall, piles of wood blazed, cattle were slain and served up, that they might feast in reality. The priest who offered the sacrifice sprinkled the devoted parishioners with the warm blood; the fire crackled, and the smoke rolled along beneath the roof; the soot fell upon them from the beams; but they were used to all these things. Guests were invited, and received handsome presents. All wrongs and unfaithfulness were forgotten.

“They drank deeply, and threw in each other’s faces the bones that were left, which was looked upon as a sign of good feeling amongst them. The Deren-husband, as I said before, made his living as a bard, who was a kind of musician as well as warrior. He had been left behind of the Orc’s mighty host as a kind of safeguard for the house; but, things being as they were, he remained, and listened to the young Orc-bard who had gone with the Orc-lord sing.

“The young Orc-bard had been with his lord all through their marauding, and knew what to sing about; he gave his best song, in which all the warriors of the Orc-lord’s host were praised for their war-deeds, and every wonderful action they undertook was brought forwards with honor. Being of some talent- perhaps not for music, but for reading his audience and turning a phrase, the Orc-bard finished each verse of his warbling with this refrain-’

“Gold and possessions will flee away, friends and foes must die one day;

“Every life ends with a sigh; but a famous name will never die.’

“And with that they beat upon their shields, and hammered upon the table with knives and bones, in a most approving manner.

“The Orc’s wife sat upon a raised cross seat in the open hall. She wore a silk dress, golden bracelets, and large amber beads. She was in costly attire, and the elf-bard- who was preferred by the women for his skilled voice and genteel air- named her in his song, and spoke of the rich treasure of gold which she had brought to her husband. Her husband had already seen the wonderfully beautiful child in the daytime, and was delighted with her beauty; even her wild ways pleased him. He said the little maiden would grow up to be a heroine, with the strong will and determination of a man. She would never wink her eyes, even if, in jest, an expert hand should attempt to cut her fringe-hair with a sharp sword.

“The full cask of mead soon became empty, and a fresh one was brought in; for these were people who liked plenty to eat and drink. The old proverb, which everyone knows, says that “the cattle know when to leave their pasture, but a foolish man knows not the measure of his own appetite.” Yes, they all knew this; but men may know what is right, and yet often do wrong. They also knew “that even the welcome guest becomes wearisome when he sits too long in the house.” But there they remained; for pork and mead are good things. At the Orc’s house they stayed, and enjoyed themselves; and at night the bondmen slept in the ashes, and dipped their fingers in the fat, and licked them. Oh, it was a delightful time!

“Once more in the same year the Orc went forth, though the storms of early summer had already commenced to roar. He went with his warriors to the coast of Faerie; he said that it was but an excursion of pleasure across the water, so his wife remained at home with the little girl.

“After a while, it is quite certain the foster-mother began to love the poor frog, with its gentle eyes and its deep sighs, even better than the little beauty who bit and fought with all around her.

“The heavy, damp mists of autumn, which destroy the leaves of the wood, had already fallen upon forest and heath. Feathers of plucked birds, as they call the snow, flew about in thick showers, and winter was coming.

“The sparrows took possession of the elves abandoned nests—excepting the pair in the attic of the house—and conversed about the absent owners in their own fashion; and they, the elf-pairs and all their young ones, where were they staying now?

“The elves might have been found in the land of Alabasta, where the sun’s rays shone forth bright and warm, as it does here at midsummer. Tamarinds and acacias were in full bloom all over the country, the crescent of their Goddess glittered brightly from the cupolas of the mosques, and on the slender pinnacles of pilloried cacti sat many of the elves, resting after their long journey.

“Swarms of them took divided possession of their ancestral nests—nests which lay close to each other between the venerable columns, and crowded the arches of temples in forgotten cities. The date and the palm lifted themselves as a screen or as a sun-shade over them. The gray pyramids looked like broken shadows in the clear air and the far-off desert, where the ostrich wheels his rapid flight, and the lion, with his subtle eyes, gazes at the marble sphinx which lies half buried in sand. The waters of the Sandia had retreated, and the whole bed of the river was covered with frogs, which was a most acceptable prospect for the elf families. The young elves thought their eyes deceived them, everything around appeared so beautiful.

“It is always like this there, and that is how we live in our warm country,” said the Deren-mother to a sparrow; and the thought made the Deren-father almost beside himself with longing.

“Is there anything more to see?” the sparrow-children asked; “do you go farther into the country?”

“There is more for us to see,” answered the Deren-mother. “Beyond this delightful region there are immense forests, where the branches of the trees entwine round each other, while prickly, creeping plants cover the paths, and only an elephant could force a passage for himself with his great feet. The snakes are large, and the lizards lively.’

“Then there is the desert; if you went there, your eyes would soon be full of sand with the lightest breeze, and if it should blow great guns, you would most likely find yourself in a sand-drift; but there is no silence so profound, and no light so all-encompassing. The riverbanks are the best place for young children; where there are frogs and locusts; but children grow, and so there is more to be seen and done.’

“The parents sit in the nest on the slender minaret, and rested, yet still were busily employed in cleaning and smoothing their feathers and armor and weapons, and in sharpening their knives.

“The female young ones strutted about amid the moist rushes, glancing at the other young elves and making acquaintances, and swallowing a frog at every third step, or tossing a little snake about with their fingers, in a way they considered very becoming, and besides it tasted very good. The young male elves soon began to quarrel; they struck at each other with their fists, and pecked with their knives till the blood came. And in this manner many of the young ladies and gentlemen were betrothed to each other: it was, of course, what they wanted, and indeed what they lived for.

"Then they returned to a nest, and there the quarrelling began afresh; for in hot countries people are almost all violent and passionate. But for all that it was pleasant, especially for the old people, who watched them with great joy; all that their young ones did suited them. Every day here there was sunshine, plenty to eat, and nothing to think of but pleasure." said the Deren-mother, sighing sadly.

"But in the rich castle of their Lord, as we call him, pleasure is not to be found. The rich and mighty lord of the castle lies on his couch, in the midst of the great hall, with its many colored walls looking like the centre of a great tulip; but he is stiff and powerless in all his limbs, and lay stretched out like a dead thing." said the Deren-father, dark eyes flashing.

"His family and servants stand around him; he is not dead, although he could scarcely be said to live. The healing moor-flower from the north, which was to have been found and brought to him by her who loved him so well- a princess, born of wolves and given to his care by the wind and waters- had not arrived. His young and beautiful daughter who, in swan’s plumage, had flown over land and seas to the distant north, had never returned.

"She is dead, so the two swan-maidens must have said when they came home; and they made up quite a story about her, and this is what they told-’ said he, before his wife chirruped out an admonishment.

"Oh, alright- this is perhaps only what I think they said; it makes as much sense as anything else they could have said.’

"We three flew away together through the air,” said they: “a hunter caught sight of us, and shot at us with an arrow. The arrow struck our young friend and sister, and slowly singing her farewell song she sank down, a dying swan, into the forest lake. On the shores of the lake, under a spreading birch-tree, we laid her in the cold earth. We had our revenge; we bound fire under the wings of a swallow, who had a nest on the thatched roof of the huntsman. The house took fire, and burst into flames; the hunter was burnt with the house, and the light was reflected over the sea as far as the spreading birch, beneath which we laid her sleeping dust. She will never return to the land of her father.” And then they both must have wept false tears. Deceit and lies!” cried Deren-father; “I should like to run my knife deep into their chests.’

"And perhaps be slain for the running,’ said Deren-mother, ‘then what a sight you would be. Think first of yourself, and then of your family; all others are nothing to us.’

"Yes, I know,” said the elf-papa; “but I told our good-brother of what I had seen and done in the marsh; and he can easily place himself on the edge of an open cupola, when the learned and wise men assemble to consult on the state of the sick man; perhaps they may come a little nearer to the truth, if he can make himself heard over their squabbling.’

"Far away, in distant Alabasta, just as the Deren-father had said, the learned and wise men assembled together, and talked a great deal on every point; but the elf-cousin could make no sense out of anything they said; neither were there any good results from their consultations, either for the sick man, or for his daughter in the marshy heath. When we listen to what people say in this world, we shall hear a great deal; but it is an advantage to know what has been said and done before, when we listen to a conversation. The elf-cousin did, and we know at least as much as he, the elf-cousin.’

“Love is a life-giver. The highest love produces the highest life. Only through love can the sick man be cured.” This had been said by many, and even the learned men acknowledged that it was a wise saying.’

“Now the learned men had spoken also of love between this one and that one; of the difference of the love which we have for our neighbor, to the love that exists between parents and children; of the love of the plant for the light, and how the germ springs forth when the sunbeam kisses the ground.
All these things were so elaborately and learnedly explained, that it was impossible for elf-cousin to follow it, much less to talk about it. His thoughts on the subject quite weighed him down; he stood the whole of the following day on one leg, with half-shut eyes, thinking deeply. So much learning was quite a heavy weight for him to carry. One thing, however, the elf-cousin could understand.

“Every one, high and low, had from their inmost hearts expressed their opinion that it was a great misfortune for so many thousands of people- the whole country indeed- to have this man so sick, with no hopes of his recovery. And what joy and blessing it would spread around if he could by any means be cured! But where bloomed the flower that could bring him health? They had searched for it everywhere; in learned writings, in the shining stars, in the weather and wind. Inquiries had been made in every by-way that could be thought of, until at last the wise and learned men has asserted, as we have been already told, that “love, the life-giver, could alone give new life to a father;” and in saying this, they had overdone it, and said more than they understood themselves. They repeated it, and wrote it down as a recipe, “Love is a life-giver.’

“But how could such a recipe be prepared—that was a difficulty they could not overcome. At last it was decided that help could only come from the princess herself, whose whole soul was wrapped up in her father, especially as a plan had been adopted by her to enable her to obtain a remedy.

“More than a year had passed since the princess had set out at night, when the light of the young moon was soon lost beneath the horizon. She had gone to the marble sphinx in the desert, shaking the sand from her sandals, and then passed through the long passage, which leads to the centre of one of the great pyramids, where the mighty kings of antiquity, surrounded with pomp and splendor, lie veiled in the form of mummies. She had been told by the wise men, that if she laid her head on the breast of one of them, from the head she would learn where to find life and recovery for her father.
She had performed all this, and in a dream had learnt that she must bring home to her father the lotus flower, which grows in the deep sea, near the moors and heath in the Orcish lands. The very place and situation had been pointed out to her, and she was told that the flower would restore her father to health and strength. And, therefore, she had gone forth from the land of Alabasta, flying over the open ocean to the marsh and the wild moor of the Orcs in the plumage of a swan.

“The elves knew all this, and we also know it now. We know, too, that the Marsh King has drawn her down to himself, and that to the loved ones at home she is forever dead. One of the wisest of them said, as the elf-mamma also said, “That in some way she would, after all, manage to succeed;”
and so at last they comforted themselves with this hope, and would wait patiently; in fact, they could do nothing better.

“I should like to get away the swan’s feathers from those two treacherous princesses,” said the elf-cousin; “then, at least, they would not be able to fly over again to the wild moor, and do more wickedness. I can hide the two suits of feathers over yonder, till we find some use for them.”
“But where will you put them?” asked the elf-cousin’s young bride.

“In the care of our kin, who languish even now in the house of the Orc-lord whose lands abut the Marsh King’s. You and I will carry them by turns during our trek across; and as we return, should they prove too heavy for us, we shall be sure to find plenty of places on the way in which we can conceal them until our next journey. Certainly one suit of swan’s feathers would be enough for the Wolf-princess, but two are always better. In those northern countries one cannot have too many travelling wrappers.”

“No one will thank you for it,” said the elf-bride; “but you are my lord; and, excepting at breeding time, I have nothing to say.”

“In the Orc’s castle on the wild moor, to which the kin-elves directed their trek in the following spring, the little maiden still remained. They had named her Helga, which was rather too soft a name for a child with a temper like hers, although her form was still beautiful. Every month this temper showed itself in sharper outlines; and in the course of years, while the elves still made the same journeys in spring to the sanded hills of Alabasta, and in autumn to the moors, the child grew to be almost a woman, and before any one seemed aware of it, she was a wonderfully beautiful maiden of sixteen.’

“The casket was splendid, but the contents were worthless. She was, indeed, wild and savage even in those hard, uncultivated times. It was a pleasure to her to splash about with her white hands in the warm blood of the horse which had been slain for sacrifice. In one of her wild moods she bit off the head of the black cock, which the priest was about to slay for the sacrifice.

“To her foster-father she said one day, “If thine enemy were to pull down thine house about thy ears, and thou shouldest be sleeping in unconscious security, I would not wake thee; even if I had the power I would never do it, for my ears still tingle with the blow that thou gavest me years ago. I have never forgotten it.’

“But the Orc-lord treated her words as a jest; he was, like everyone else, bewitched with her beauty, and knew nothing of the change in the form and temper of Helga at night. Without a saddle, she would sit on a horse as if she were a part of it, while it rushed along at full speed; nor would she spring from its back, even when it quarrelled with other horses and bit them. She would often leap from the high shore into the sea with all her clothes on, and swim to meet the Orc-lord, when his boat was steering home towards the shore. She once cut off a long lock of her beautiful hair, and twisted it into a string for her bow.

“If a thing is to be done well,” said she, “I must do it myself.’

“The Orc’s wife was, for the time in which she lived, a woman of strong character and will; but, compared to her daughter, she was a gentle, timid woman, and she knew that a wicked sorcerer had the terrible child in his power. It was sometimes as if Helga acted from sheer wickedness; for often when her mother stood on the threshold of the door, or stepped into the yard, she would seat herself on the brink of the well, wave her arms and legs in the air, and suddenly fall right in. Here she was able, from her toad nature, to dip and dive about in the water of the deep well, until at last she would climb forth like a cat, and come back into the hall dripping with water, so that the green leaves that were strewed on the floor were whirled round, and carried away by the streams that flowed from her.

“But there was one time of the day which placed a check upon Helga.
“It was the evening twilight; when this hour arrived she became quiet and thoughtful, and allowed herself to be advised and led; then also a secret feeling seemed to draw her towards her mother. As usual, when the sun set, and the transformation took place, both in body and mind, inwards and outwards, she would remain quiet and mournful, with her form shrunk together in the shape of a toad. Her body was much larger than those animals ever are, and on this account it was much more hideous in appearance; for she looked like a wretched dwarf, with a toad’s head, and webbed fingers. Her eyes had a most piteous expression; she was without a voice, excepting a hollow, croaking sound, like the smothered sobs of a dreaming child.

“Then the Orc’s wife took her on her lap, and forgot the ugly form, as she looked into the mournful eyes, and often said, ‘I could wish that thou wouldst always remain my sweet toad child, for thou art too terrible when thou art clothed in a form of beauty. Alas, this is all I can do for thee;’ and the Orc woman wrote runes against sorcery and spells of sickness-be-healed, and threw them over the wretched child; but they did no good.

“One can scarcely believe that she was ever small enough to lie in the cup of the water-lily,’ said the Deren-father; ‘and now she is grown up, and the image of her Wolf-born mother, especially about the eyes. Ah, we shall never see her again; perhaps she has not discovered how to help herself, as you and the wise men said she would. Year after year have I trekked and crept across and across the moor, but there was no sign of her being still alive. Yes, and I may as well tell you that each year, when I returned from our travels a few days before you to repair the nest, and put everything in its place, I have spent a whole night darting here and there over the marshy lake, as if I had been an owl or a bat, but all to no purpose. The two suit of swan’s plumage, which our young cousins dragged over here from the land of the Sandia, are of no use; trouble enough it was to them to bring those articles here in three journeys, and now they are lying at the bottom of the nest; and if a fire should happen to break out, and the wooden house be burnt down, they would be destroyed.’

“And our good nest would be destroyed, too,” said the Deren-mother; “but you think less of that than of your plumage stuff and your moor-princess. Go and stay with her in the marsh if you like. You are a bad father to your own children, as I have told you already, when I hatched my first brood. I only hope neither we nor our children may have an arrow sent through our wings, owing to that wild girl. Helga does not know in the least what she is about. We have lived in this house longer than she has, she should think of that, and we have never forgotten our duty. We have paid every year our toll of a feather, an egg, and a young one, as it is only right we should do. You don’t suppose I can wander about the court-yard, or go everywhere as I used to do in old times. I can do it in Alabasta, where I can be a companion of the people, without forgetting myself. But here I cannot go and peep into the pots and kettles as I do there. No, I can only sit up here and feel angry with that girl, the little wretch; and I am angry with you, too; you should have left her lying in the water lily, then no one would have known anything about her.”

“You are far better than your conversation,” said the Deren-father; “I know you better than you know yourself.” And with that he gave a shake, and flung his hair twice, proudly; then he stretched his limbs and left the house in a strop. He went on for some distance, and then he gave a great sigh loped on his daily course at a rapid rate, his head held tall and proud and his hair streaming behind him while the sun’s rays poured over him like liquid fire.

“He is the handsomest of them all,” said the Deren-mother, as she watched him; “but I won’t tell him so.”

Early in the autumn, the Orc again returned home laden with spoil, and bringing prisoners with him. Among them was a young Faerie priest, one of those who contemned the gods of the north. Often lately there had been, both in hall and chamber, a talk of the new faith which was spreading far and wide in the south, and which, through the means of the holy Galatea’s forty blessed daughters, had already reached as far as Hedeby on the Schlei. Even Helga had heard of this belief in the teachings of Love, which could not know defeat; and the Burning which resided in the blood of all who turned their faces towards that Love.

“To her all this had, as it were, gone in one ear and out the other. It seemed that she only understood the meaning of the word “love,” when in the form of a miserable frog she crouched together in the corner of the sleeping chamber; but the Orc’s wife had listened to the wonderful stories and songs, and had felt herself strangely moved by it.

“On their return, after this voyage, the men spoke of the beautiful temples built of polished stone, which had been raised for the public worship of this holy love. Some vessels, curiously formed of massive gold, had been brought home among the booty. There was a peculiar fragrance about them all, for they were incense vessels, which had been swung before the altars in the temples by the Forty’s priests. In the deep stony cellars of the castle, the young Faerie priest was immured, and his hands and feet tied together with strips of bark. The Orc’s wife considered him beautiful, and his distress raised her pity; but Helga said he ought to have ropes fastened to his heels, and be tied to the tails of wild animals.

“I would let the dogs loose after him” she said; “over the moor and across the heath. Hurrah! that would be a spectacle for the gods, and better still to follow in its course.”

“But the Orc would not allow him to die such a death as that, especially as he was the disowned and despiser of the high gods. In a few days, he had decided to have him offered as a sacrifice on the blood-stone in the grove. For the first time, a man was to be sacrificed here. Helga begged to be allowed to sprinkle the assembled people with the blood of the priest. She sharpened her glittering knife; and when one of the great, savage dogs, who were running about the Orc’s castle in great numbers, sprang towards her, she thrust the knife into his side, merely, as she said, to prove its sharpness.

“The Orc’s wife looked at the wild, badly disposed girl, with great sorrow; and when night came on, and her daughter’s beautiful form and disposition were changed, she spoke in eloquent words to Helga of the sorrow and deep grief that was in her heart. The ugly toad, in its monstrous shape, stood before her, and raised its brown mournful eyes to her face, listening to her words, and seeming to understand them with the intelligence of a human being.

“Never once to my lord and husband has a word passed my lips of what I have to suffer through you; my heart is full of grief about you,” said the Orc’s wife. “The love of a mother is greater and more powerful than I ever imagined. But love never entered thy heart; it is cold and clammy, like the plants on the moor.”

“Then the miserable form trembled; it was as if these words had touched an invisible bond between body and soul, for great tears stood in the eyes.

“A bitter time will come for thee at last,” continued the Orc’s wife; “and it will be terrible for me too. It had been better for thee if thou hadst been slain, and left in the wet and the muck to rot with the cold night wind to lull thee to sleep.” And the Orc’s wife shed bitter tears, and went away in anger and sorrow, passing under the partition of furs, which hung loose over the beam and divided the hall.

“The shrivelled toad still sat in the corner alone. Deep silence reigned around. At intervals, a half-stifled sigh was heard from its inmost soul; it was the soul of Helga. It seemed in pain, as if a new life were arising in her heart. Then she took a step forward and listened; then stepped again forward, and seized with her clumsy hands the heavy bar which was laid across the door. Gently, and with much trouble, she pushed back the bar, as silently lifted the latch, and then took up the glimmering lamp which stood in the antechamber of the hall. It seemed as if a stronger will than her own gave her strength. She removed the iron bolt from the closed cellar-door, and slipped in, to the prisoner. He was slumbering. She touched him with her cold, moist hand, and as he awoke and caught sight of the hideous form, he shuddered as if he beheld a wicked apparition. She drew her knife, cut through the bonds which confined his hands and feet, and beckoned to him to follow her. He uttered some holy names and made the sign of the cross, while the form remained motionless by his side.

“Who art thou?” he asked, “whose outward appearance is that of an animal, while thou willingly performest acts of mercy?”

“The toad-figure beckoned to him to follow her, and led him through a long gallery concealed by hanging drapery to the stables, and then pointed to a horse. He mounted upon it, and she sprang up also before him, and held tightly by the animal’s mane. The prisoner understood her, and they rode on at a rapid trot, by a road which he would never have found by himself, across the open heath. He forgot her ugly form, and only thought how the mercy and loving-kindness of the Forty who Loved was acting through this hideous apparition. As he offered pious prayers and sang holy songs of praise, she trembled. Was it the effect of prayer and praise that caused this? or, was she shuddering in the cold morning air at the thought of approaching twilight? What were her feelings? She raised herself up, and wanted to stop the horse and spring off, but the Faerie priest held her back with all his might, and then sang a pious song, as if this could loosen the wicked charm that had changed her into the semblance of a frog.

“The horse galloped on more wildly than before. The sky painted itself red, the first sunbeam pierced through the clouds, and in the clear flood of sunlight the frog became changed. It was Helga again, young and beautiful, but with a wicked fiendly spirit. He held now a beautiful young woman in his arms, and he was horrified at the sight. He stopped the horse, and sprang from its back. He imagined that some new sorcery was at work. But Helga also leaped from the horse and stood on the ground. The child’s short garment reached only to her knee. She snatched the sharp knife from her girdle, and rushed like lightning at the astonished priest.

“Let me get at thee!” she cried; “let me get at thee, that I may plunge this knife into thy body. Thou art pale as ashes, thou beardless slave.” She pressed in upon him. They struggled with each other in heavy combat, but it was as if an invisible power had been given to the Faerie in the struggle. He held her fast, and the old oak under which they stood seemed to help him, for the loosened roots on the ground became entangled in the maiden’s feet, and held them fast. Close by rose a bubbling spring, and he sprinkled Helga’s face and neck with the water, commanded the unclean spirit to come forth, and pronounced upon her a Loving blessing. But the water of faith has no power unless the well-spring of faith flows within. And yet even here its power was shown; something more than the mere strength of a man opposed itself, through his means, against the evil which struggled within her. His holy action seemed to overpower her.

“She dropped her arms, glanced at him with pale cheeks and looks of amazement. He appeared to her a mighty magician skilled in secret arts; his language was the darkest magic to her, and the movements of his hands in the air were as the secret signs of a magician’s wand. She would not have blinked had he waved over her head a sharp knife or a glittering axe; but she shrunk from him as he kissed her brow in the manner of the Beloved, and held still as their foreheads rested against each other.

“When it was done, and the Faerie priests’ benedictions finished, she sat before him like a tamed bird, with her head bowed heavy-low. Then he spoke to her, in gentle words, of the deed of Love she had performed for him during the night, when she had come to him in the form of an ugly frog, to loosen his bonds, and to lead him forth to life and light; and he told her that she was bound in closer fetters than he had been, and that she could recover also life and light by his means.

“He would take her to the holy springs of Charis, and there, her curse would be removed. But he would not let her sit before him on the horse, though of her own free will she wished to do so.

“Thou must sit behind me, not before me,” said he. “Thy magic beauty has a magic power which comes from an evil origin, and I fear it; still I am sure to overcome through my faith in Love.”

“Then he knelt down, and prayed with pious fervor. It was as if the quiet woodland were a holy temple consecrated by his worship. The birds sang as if they were also of this new congregation; and the fragrance of the wild flowers was as the ambrosial perfume of incense; while, above all, sounded the Words, “A light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide their feet into the way of peace.” And he spoke these words with the deep longing of his whole nature.

“Meanwhile, the horse that had carried them in wild career stood quietly by, plucking at the tall bramble-bushes, till the ripe young berries fell down upon Helga’s hands, as if inviting her to eat.
Patiently she allowed herself to be lifted on the horse, and sat there like a dead thing.

“The Faerie bound two vines together in a circlet, like a Love-crown, and tucked it on her head. As they rode through the forest, the way gradually grew thicker of brushwood, until at last it became a trackless wilderness. Bushes of the wild sloe here and there blocked up the path, so that they had to ride over them. The bubbling spring formed not a stream, but a marsh, round which also they were obliged to guide the horse; still there were strength and refreshment in the cool forest breeze, and no trifling power in the gentle words spoken in faith and Love by the young priest, whose inmost heart yearned to lead this poor lost one into the way of light and life.

“It is said that rain-drops can make a hollow in the hardest stone, and the waves of the sea can smooth and round the rough edges of the rocks; so did the dew of Charis the Graceful fall upon Helga, softening what was hard, and smoothing what was rough in her character. These effects did not yet appear; she was not herself aware of them; neither does the seed in the lap of earth know, when the refreshing dew and the warm sunbeams fall upon it, that it contains within itself power by which it will flourish and bloom. The song of the mother sinks into the heart of the child, and the little one prattles the words after her, without understanding their meaning; but after a time the thoughts expand, and what has been heard in childhood seems to the mind clear and bright. So now the “Word,” which is all-powerful, and created all things in this World, was working in the heart of Helga.

“They rode forth from the thick forest, crossed the heath, and again entered a pathless wood. Here, towards evening, they met with robbers.

“Where hast thou stolen that beauteous maiden?” cried the robbers, seizing the horse by the bridle, and dragging the two riders from its back.

“The priest had nothing to defend himself with, but the knife he had taken from Helga, and with this he struck out right and left. One of the robbers raised his axe against him; but the young priest sprang on one side, and avoided the blow, which fell with great force on the horse’s neck, so that the blood gushed forth, and the animal sunk to the ground. Then Helga seemed suddenly to awake from her long, deep reverie; she threw herself hastily upon the dying animal. “The priest placed himself before her, to defend and shelter her; but one of the robbers swung his iron axe against the Faerie’s head with such force that it was dashed to pieces, the blood and brains were scattered about, and he fell dead upon the ground.
“Then the robbers seized beautiful Helga by her white arms and slender waist; but at that moment the sun went down, and as its last ray disappeared, she was changed into the form of a toad. A greenish white mouth spread half over her face; her arms became thin and slimy; while broad hands, with webbed fingers, spread themselves out like fans. Warts bubbled and frothed over her brown and murky skin.

“Then the robbers, in terror, let her go, and she stood among them, a hideous monster; and as is the nature of toads to do, she scampered away from what had frightened her, and disappeared into the thickets. Then the robbers knew that this must be the work of an evil magic, and in a terrible fright, they ran hastily from the spot.

“The full moons had already risen, and were shining in all their radiant splendor over the earth, when from the thicket, in the form of a toad, crept poor Helga. She stood still by the corpse of the Faerie priest, and the carcass of the dead horse. She looked at them with eyes that seemed to weep, and from the frog’s head came forth a croaking sound, as when a child bursts into tears. She threw herself first upon one, and then upon the other; brought water in her hand, which, from being webbed, was large and hollow, and poured it over them; but they were dead, and dead they would remain. She understood that at last. Soon wild animals would come and tear their dead bodies; but no, that must not happen. Then she dug up the earth, as deep as she was able, that she might prepare a grave for them.

“She had nothing but a branch of a tree and her two hands, between the fingers of which the webbed skin stretched, and they were torn by the work, while the blood ran down her hands. She saw at last that her work would be useless, more than she could accomplish; so she fetched more water, and washed the face of the dead, and then covered it with fresh green leaves; she also brought large boughs and spread over him, and scattered dried leaves between the branches. Then she brought the heaviest stones that she could carry, and laid them over the dead body, filling up the crevices with moss, till she thought she had fenced in his resting-place strongly enough. The difficult task had employed her the whole night; and as the sun broke forth, there stood the beautiful Helga in all her loveliness, with her bleeding hands, and, for the first time, with tears on her maiden cheeks. It was, in this transformation, as if two natures were striving together within her; her whole frame trembled, and she looked around her as if she had just awoke from a painful dream. She leaned for support against the trunk of a slender tree, and at last climbed to the topmost branches, like a cat, and seated herself firmly upon them. She remained there the whole day, sitting alone, like a frightened squirrel, in the silent solitude of the wood, where the rest and stillness is as the calm of death.

“Butterflies fluttered around her, and close by were several ant-hills, each with its hundreds of busy little creatures moving quickly to and fro. In the air, danced myriads of gnats, swarm upon swarm, troops of buzzing flies, ladybirds, dragon-flies with golden wings, and other little winged creatures. The worm crawled forth from the moist ground, and the moles crept out; but, excepting these, all around had the stillness of death: but when people say this, they do not quite understand themselves what they mean.

“None noticed Helga but a flock of magpies, which flew chattering round the top of the tree on which she sat. These birds hopped close to her on the branches with bold curiosity. A glance from her eyes was a signal to frighten them away, and they were not clever enough to find out who she was; indeed she hardly knew herself.

“When the sun was near setting, and the evening’s twilight about to commence, the approaching transformation aroused her to fresh exertion. She let herself down gently from the tree, and, as the last sunbeam vanished, she stood again in the wrinkled form of a frog, with the torn, webbed skin on her hands, but her eyes now gleamed with more radiant beauty than they had ever possessed in her most beautiful form of loveliness; they were now pure, mild maidenly eyes that shone forth in the face of a frog. They showed the existence of deep feeling and a human heart, and the beauteous eyes overflowed with tears, weeping precious drops that lightened the soul.

“On the raised mound which she had made as a grave for the dead priest, she found the circlet of vines, the last work of him who now lay dead and cold beneath it.

“A sudden thought came to Helga, and she lifted up the small crown and planted it upon the grave, between the stones that covered him and the dead horse. The sad recollection brought the tears to her eyes, and in this gentle spirit she traced the same sign in the sand round the grave; and as she formed, with both her hands, the circle, the web skin fell from them like a torn glove. She washed her hands in the water of the spring, and gazed with astonishment at their delicate whiteness. Again she made the holy sign in the air, between herself and the dead man; her lips trembled, her tongue moved, and the name which she in her ride through the forest had so often heard spoken, rose to her lips, and she uttered the Word, “Beloved.”

“Then the frog skin fell from her; she was once more a lovely maiden. Her head bent wearily, her tired limbs required rest, and then she slept.

“Her sleep, however, was short. Towards midnight, she awoke; before her stood the dead horse, prancing and full of life, which shone forth from his eyes and from his wounded neck. Close by his side appeared the murdered priest, beautiful, as the Orc’s wife had said; but now he came as if in a flame of fire. Such gravity, such stern justice, such a piercing glance shone from his large, gentle eyes, that it seemed to penetrate into every corner of her heart. Beautiful Helga trembled at the look, and her memory returned with a power as if it had been the day of judgment. Every good deed that had been done for her, every loving word that had been said, were vividly before her mind.

“She understood now that Love had kept her here during the day of her trial; while the creature formed of dust and clay, soul and spirit, had wrestled and struggled with evil. She acknowledged that she had only followed the impulses of an evil disposition, that she had done nothing to cure herself; everything had been given her, and all had happened as it were by the ordination of the gods. She bowed herself humbly, confessed her great imperfections in the sight of she who can read every fault of the heart- Charis, the Graceful; and then the goddess spoke.

“Daughter of the moorland, thou hast come from the swamp and the marshy earth, but from this thou shalt arise. The sunlight shining into thy inmost soul proves the origin from which thou hast really sprung, and has restored the body to its natural form. I am come to thee from the land of the dead, and thou also must pass through the valley to reach the holy mountains where mercy and perfection dwell. I cannot lead thee to my spring that thou mayst receive absolution, for first thou must remove the thick veil with which the waters of the moorland are shrouded, and bring forth from its depths the living author of thy being and thy life. Till this is done, thou canst not receive the fullness of my blessing.”

“Then the goddess lifted her on the horse and gave her a golden censer, similar to those she had already seen at the Orc’s house. A sweet perfume arose from it, while the open wound in the forehead of the slain priest, shone with the rays of a diamond. He took the circlet from the grave, and held it aloft, and now they rode through the air over the rustling trees, over the hills where warriors lay buried each by his dead war-horse; and the brazen monumental figures rose up and galloped forth, and stationed themselves on the summits of the hills. The golden circles on their foreheads, fastened with golden knots, glittered in the moonlight, and their mantles floated in the wind.
“The dragon, that guards buried treasure, lifted his head and gazed after them. The goblins and the satyrs peeped out from beneath the hills, and flitted to and fro in the fields, waving blue, red, and green torches, like the glowing sparks in burning paper; behind them gamboled their fauns and gibbets, giggling and whooping, pipping their sweet tunes and laughing with joy.

“Over woodland and heath, flood and fen, they rode on, until they reached the wild moor, over which they hovered in broad circles. The Goddess-priest held the circle aloft, and it glittered like gold, while from her lips rang pious prayers. Beautiful Helga’s voice joined with his in the hymns he sung, as a child joins in her mother’s song. She swung the censer, and a wonderful fragrance of incense arose from it; so powerful, that the reeds and rushes of the moor burst forth into blossom. Each germ came forth from the deep ground: all that had life raised itself. “Blooming water-lilies spread themselves forth like a carpet of wrought flowers, and upon them lay a slumbering woman, young and beautiful. Helga fancied that it was her own image she saw reflected in the still water. But it was her mother she beheld, the unwilling wife of the Marsh King, the Wolf-princess from the land of the Sandia.

“The dead goddess desired that the sleeping woman should be lifted on the horse, but the horse sank beneath the load, as if he had been a funeral pall fluttering in the wind. But the sign of the circle made the airy phantom strong, and then the three rode away from the marsh to firm ground.

“At the same moment the cockerel crowed in the Orc’s castle, and the dream figures dissolved and floated away in the air, but mother and daughter stood opposite to each other.

“Am I looking at my own image in the deep water?” said the mother.

“Is it myself that I see represented on a stormy cloud?” cried the daughter.

“Then they came nearer to each other in a fond embrace. The mother’s heart beat quickly, and she understood the quickened pulses.

“My child!” she exclaimed, “the flower of my heart- my lotus flower of the deep water!” and she embraced her child again and wept, and the tears were as a baptism of new life and love for Helga.

“In swan’s plumage I came here,” said the mother, “and here I threw off my feather dress. Then I sank down through the wavering ground, deep into the marsh beneath, which closed like a wall around me; I found myself after a while in fresher water; still a power drew me down deeper and deeper. I felt the weight of sleep upon my eyelids. Then I slept, and dreams hovered round me. It seemed to me as if I were again in the pyramids of Alabasta, and yet the waving elder trunk that had frightened me on the moor stood ever before me. I observed the clefts and wrinkles in the stem; they shone forth in strange colors, and took the form of hieroglyphics. It was the mummy case on which I gazed. At last it burst, and forth stepped the thousand years’ old king, the mummy form, black as pitch, black as the shining wood-snail, or the slimy mud of the swamp. Whether it was really the mummy or the Marsh King I know not. He seized me in his arms, and I felt as if I must die. When I recovered myself, I found in my bosom a little bird, flapping its wings, twittering and fluttering. The bird flew away from my bosom, upwards towards the dark, heavy canopy above me, but a long, green band kept it fastened to me. I heard and understood the tenor of its longings. Freedom! sunlight! to my father! Then I thought of my father, and the sunny land of my birth, my life, and my love. Then I loosened the band, and let the bird fly away to its home- to a father. Since that hour I have ceased to dream; my sleep has been long and heavy, till in this very hour, harmony and fragrance awoke me, and set me free.”

“The green band which fastened the wings of the bird to the mother’s heart, where did it flutter now?
whither had it been wafted? The Deren-father only had seen it. The band was the green stalk, the cup of the flower the cradle in which lay the child, that now in blooming beauty had been folded to the mother’s heart.

“And while the two were resting in each other’s arms, the old Deren-father crept upon them in narrowing circles, till at length he found them both. Without a word, he bade them follow him; and, upon the end of his trek, he led them through the back of the Orc-lord’s house to his own small room that he shared with his wife and their new brooded children, and the treasure he had arranged be brought to his keeping.

“The mother and daughter took the feather cloaks and threw the swan’s downy plumage over themselves. The feathers immediately closed around them, and they rose up in the form of two perfect swans; the mother, robed in white- but the daughter, robed in black.

“And now I can speak with pleasure and freedom,” said the Deren-father; “for my oath bound my throat from speaking hence to the child or the mother, so long as they stood with faces upturned to the sun- and yet, as we birds do not have faces, I may thus speak. It is very fortunate that you came tonight; tomorrow we would have been gone. The mother, myself and the little ones, we’re about to roam to the south. Look at me now: I am an old friend from the Sandia, and a mother’s heart contains more than her beak. She always said that the princess would know how to help herself. I bade our young cousins carry the swan’s feathers over here, and I am glad of it now, and how lucky it is that I am here still. When the day dawns we shall start with a great company of other elves. We’ll fly first-’ and here he shook out his own cloak of stork feathers, and took on the form of that tall, wading bird again, ‘and you can follow in our track, so that you cannot miss your way. I and the young ones will have an eye upon you.”

“And the lotus-flower which I was to take with me,” said the Alabastan princess, “is flying here by my side, clothed in swan’s feathers. The flower of my heart will travel with me; and so the riddle is solved. Now for home! now for home!”

“But Helga said she could not leave the Orcish land without once more seeing her foster-mother, the loving wife of the Orc. Each pleasing recollection, each kind word, every tear from the heart which her foster-mother had wept for her, rose in her mind, and at that moment she felt as if she loved this mother the best.

“Yes, we must go to the Orc’s house,” said the Deren-father; “my contract is yet unfinished, and I must end things properly with the house-lord. I will flap my wings at once, that they may hear us coming.” Then Deren-father flapped his wings in first-rate style, and he and the swans flew away to the front of the Orc’s house.

“In the house, everyone was in a deep sleep. It had been late in the evening before the Orc’s wife retired to rest. She was anxious about Helga, who, three days before, had vanished with the Faerie priest. Helga must have helped him in his flight, for it was her horse that was missed from the stable; but by what power had all this been accomplished? The Orc’s wife thought of it with wonder, thought on the miracles which they said could be performed by those who believed in Love, and followed the Forty’s teachings.

“These passing thoughts formed themselves into a vivid dream, and it seemed to her that she was still lying awake on her couch, while without darkness reigned. A storm arose; she heard the lake dashing and rolling from east and west, like the waves of the Sea or the Channel. The monstrous snake which, it is said, surrounds the earth in the depths of the ocean, was trembling in spasmodic convulsions. The night of the fall of the gods was come, “Ragnarock,” as the Orcs call the judgment-day, when everything shall pass away, even the high gods themselves. The war trumpet sounded; riding upon the rainbow, came the gods, clad in steel, to fight their last battle on the last battle-field. Before them flew the winged vampires, and the dead warriors closed up the train. The whole firmament was ablaze with the northern lights, and yet the darkness triumphed. It was a terrible hour. And, close to the terrified woman, Helga seemed to be seated on the floor, in the hideous form of a frog, yet trembling, and clinging to her foster-mother, who took her on her lap, and lovingly caressed her, hideous and toad-like as she was.

“The air was filled with the clashing of arms and the hissing of arrows, as if a storm of hail was descending upon the earth. It seemed to her the hour when earth and sky would burst asunder, and all things be swallowed up in the Bloody Moon’s oozing tresses; but she knew that a new heaven and a new earth would wave where now the lake rolled over desolate sands, and the ineffable Gods reign. Then she saw rising from the region of the dead; the gentle, the loving, and as the Orc’s wife gazed upon him, she recognized his countenance. It was the captive Faerie priest.

“White Faerie!” she exclaimed aloud, and with the words, she pressed a kiss on the forehead of the hideous toad-child. Then the toad-skin fell off, and Helga stood before her in all her beauty, more lovely and gentle-looking, and with eyes beaming with love. She kissed the hands of her foster-mother, blessed her for all her fostering love and care during the days of her trial and misery, for the thoughts she had suggested and awoke in her heart, and for naming the Name which she now repeated. Then beautiful Helga rose as a mighty swan, and spread her wings with the rushing sound of troops of birds of passage flying through the air.

“Then the Orc’s wife awoke, but she still heard the rushing sound without. She knew it was the time for the elves to depart, and that it must be their wings which she heard. She felt she should like to see them once more, and bid them farewell. She rose from her couch, stepped out on the threshold, and beheld, on the ridge of the roof, a party of elves ranged side by side. Troops of the birds were flying in circles over the castle and the highest trees; but just before her, as she stood on the threshold and close to the well where Helga had so often sat and alarmed her with her wildness, now stood two swans, gazing at her with intelligent eyes.

“Then she remembered her dream, which still appeared to her as a reality. She thought of Helga in the form of a swan. She thought of a Faerie priest, and suddenly a wonderful joy arose in her heart. The swans flapped their wings and arched their necks as if to offer her a greeting, and the Orc’s wife spread out her arms towards them, as if she accepted it, and smiled through her tears. She was roused from deep thought by a rustling of wings and snapping of beaks; all the elves arose, and started on their journey towards the south.

“We will not wait for the swans,” said the Deren-mother; “if they want to go with us, let them come now; we can’t sit here till the plovers start. It is a fine thing after all to travel in families, not like the finches and the partridges. There the male and the female birds fly in separate flocks, which, to speak candidly, I consider very unbecoming.”

“What are those swans flapping their wings for?” asked a Deren-child.

“Well, everyone flies in his own fashion,” said the Deren-father. “The swans fly in an oblique line; the cranes, in the form of a triangle; and the plovers, in a curved line like a snake.”

“Don’t talk about snakes while we are flying up here,” said Mother. “It puts ideas into the children’s “Are those the high mountains I have heard spoken of?” asked Helga, in the swan’s plumage.

“They are storm-clouds driving along beneath us,” replied her mother.

“What are yonder white clouds that rise so high?” again inquired Helga.

“Those are mountains covered with perpetual snows, that you see yonder,” said her mother. And then they flew across the Kush towards the Line.

“Titi’s land! Nefertari’s strand!” sang the daughter of the Sandia, in her swan’s plumage, as from the upper air she caught sight of her native land, a narrow, golden, wavy strip on the shores of the Sandia; the other birds espied it also and hastened their flight.

“I can smell the Sandia mud and the wet frogs,” said the Deren-mother, “and I begin to feel quite hungry. Yes, now you shall taste something nice, and you will see the marabout bird, and the ibis, and the crane. They all belong to our family, but they are not nearly so handsome as we are. They give themselves great airs, especially the ibis. The Alabastans have spoilt him. They make a mummy of him, and stuff him with spices. I would rather be stuffed with live frogs, and so would you, and so you shall. Better have something in your inside while you are alive, than to be made a parade of after you are dead. That is my opinion, and I am always right.”

“The elves are come;” was said in the great house on the banks of the Sandia, where the Lord lay in the hall on his downy cushions, covered with a leopard skin, scarcely alive, yet not dead, waiting and hoping for the lotus-flower from the deep moorland in the far north. Relatives and servants were standing by his couch, when the two beautiful swans who had come with the elves flew into the hall.

“They threw off their soft plumage, and two lovely female forms approached the pale, sick old man, and threw back their long hair, and when Helga bent over her grandfather, redness came back to his cheeks, his eyes brightened, and life returned to his benumbed limbs. The old man rose up with health and energy renewed; daughter and grandchild welcomed him as joyfully as if with a morning greeting after a long and troubled dream.

“Joy reigned through the whole house, as well as in the elves nest; although there the chief cause was really the good food, especially the quantities of frogs, which seemed to spring out of the ground in swarms.

“Then the learned men hastened to note down, in flying characters, the story of the two princesses, and spoke of the arrival of the health-giving flower as a mighty event, which had been a blessing to the house and the land. Meanwhile, the Deren-father told the story to his family in his own way; but not till they had eaten and were satisfied; otherwise they would have had something else to do than to listen to stories.

“Well,” said the Deren-mother, when she had heard it, “you will be made something of at last; I suppose they can do nothing less.”

“What could I be made?” said Father; “what have I done?— just nothing.”

“You have done more than all the rest,” she replied. “But for you and our kin the two young princesses would never have seen home again, and the recovery of the old man would not have been effected. You will become something. They must certainly give you a doctor's hood, and our young ones will inherit it, and their children after them, and so on. You already look like a doctor, at least in my eyes.”

“I cannot quite remember the words I heard when I listened on the roof,” said the Father, while relating the story to his family; “all I know is, that what the wise men said was so complicated and so learned, that they received not only rank, but presents; even the head cook at the great house was honored with a mark of distinction, most likely for the soup.”

“And what did you receive?” said the Mother. “They certainly ought not to forget the most important person in the affair, as you really are. The learned men have done nothing at all but use their tongues. Surely they will not overlook you.”

“Late in the night, while the gentle sleep of peace rested on the now happy house, there was still one watcher. It was not Deren-father, who, although he stood on guard on one leg, could sleep soundly. Helga alone was awake. She leaned over the balcony, gazing at the sparkling stars that shone clearer and brighter in the pure air than they had done in the north, and yet they were the same stars.

“She thought of the Orc’s wife in the wild moorland, of the gentle eyes of her foster-mother, and of the tears she had shed over the poor frog-child that now lived in splendor and starry beauty by the waters of the Sandia, with air balmy and sweet as spring. She thought of the love that dwelt in the breast of the orc-woman, love that had been shown to a wretched creature, hateful as a human being, and hideous when in the form of an animal. She looked at the glittering stars, and thought of the radiance that had shone forth on the forehead of the dead goddess, as she had fled with her over the woodland and moor. Tones were awakened in her memory; words which she had heard her speak as they rode onward, when she was carried, wondering and trembling, through the air; words from the great Fountain of love, the highest love that embraces all the human race. What had not been won and achieved by this Love?

“Day and night beautiful Helga was absorbed in the contemplation of the great amount of her happiness, and lost herself in the contemplation, like a child who turns hurriedly from the giver to examine the beautiful gifts. She was over-powered with her good fortune, which seemed always increasing, and therefore what might it become in the future? Had she not been brought by a wonderful miracle to all this joy and happiness? And in these thoughts she indulged, until at last she thought no more of the Giver. It was the over-abundance of youthful spirits unfolding its wings for a daring flight. Her eyes sparkled with energy, when suddenly arose a loud noise in the court below, and the daring thought vanished. She looked down, and saw two large ostriches running round quickly in narrow circles; she had never seen these creatures before,—great, coarse, clumsy-looking birds with curious wings that looked as if they had been clipped, and the birds themselves had the appearance of having been roughly used. She inquired about them, and for the first time heard the legend which the Alabastans relate respecting the ostrich.

“Once, say they, the ostriches were a beautiful and glorious race of birds, with large, strong wings. One evening the other large birds of the forest said to the ostrich, “Brother, shall we fly to the river to-morrow morning to drink, Gods willing?” and the ostrich answered, “I will.”

With the break of day, therefore, they commenced their flight; first rising high in the air, towards the sun, which is the eye of the Gods; still higher and higher the ostrich flew, far above the other birds, proudly approaching the light, trusting in its own strength, and thinking not of the Giver, or saying, “if Gods will.” When suddenly the avenging angel drew back the veil from the flaming ocean of sunlight, and in a moment the wings of the proud bird were scorched and shrivelled, and they sunk miserably to the earth. Since that time the ostrich and his race have never been able to rise in the air; they can only fly terror-stricken along the ground, or run round and round in narrow circles. It is a warning to mankind, that in all our thoughts and schemes, and in every action we undertake, we should say, “if God’s will.”

“Then Helga bowed her head thoughtfully and seriously, and looked at the circling ostrich, as with timid fear and simple pleasure it glanced at its own great shadow on the sunlit walls. And the story of the ostrich sunk deeply into the heart and mind of Helga: a life of happiness, both in the present and in the future, seemed secure for her, and what was yet to come might be the best of all, God’s willing.

Early in the spring, when the elves were again about to journey northward, beautiful Helga took off her golden bracelets, scratched her name on them, and beckoned to the elf-father. He came to her, and she placed the golden circlet round his neck, and begged him to deliver it safely to the Orc’s wife, so that she might know that her foster-daughter still lived, was happy, and had not forgotten her.

“It is rather heavy to carry,” thought elf-papa, when he had it on his neck; “but gold and honor are not to be flung into the street. The elf brings good fortune—they’ll be obliged to acknowledge that at last.”

“You lay gold, and I lay eggs,” said elf-mamma; “with you it is only once in a way, I lay eggs every year. But no one appreciates what we do; I call it very mortifying.”

“But then we have a consciousness of our own worth, mother,” replied elf-papa.

“What good will that do you?” retorted elf-mamma; “it will neither bring you a fair wind, nor a good meal.”

“The little nightingale, who is singing yonder in the tamarind grove, will soon be going north, too.” Helga said she had often heard her singing on the wild moor, so she determined to send a message by her. While flying in the swan’s plumage she had learnt the bird language; she had often conversed with the elf and the swallow, and she knew that the nightingale would understand. So she begged the nightingale to fly to the beechwood, on the peninsula of Jutland, where a mound of stone and twigs had been raised to form the grave, and she begged the nightingale to persuade all the other little birds to build their nests round the place, so that evermore should resound over that grave music and song. And the nightingale flew away, and time flew away also.

“In the autumn, an eagle, standing upon a pyramid, saw a stately train of richly laden camels, and men attired in armor on foaming Arabian steeds, whose glossy skins shone like silver, their nostrils were pink, and their thick, flowing manes hung almost to their slender legs. A royal prince of Arabia, handsome as a prince should be, and accompanied by distinguished guests, was on his way to the stately house, on the roof of which the elfs’ empty nests might be seen. They were away now in the far north, but expected to return very soon. And, indeed, they returned on a day that was rich in joy and gladness.

“A marriage was being celebrated, in which the beautiful Helga, glittering in silk and jewels, was the bride, and the bridegroom the young Arab prince. Bride and bridegroom sat at the upper end of the table, between the bride’s mother and grandfather. But her gaze was not on the bridegroom, with his manly, sunburnt face, round which curled a black beard, and whose dark fiery eyes were fixed upon her; but away from him, at a twinkling star, that shone down upon her from the sky. Then was heard the sound of rushing wings beating the air. The elfs were coming home; and the old elf pair, although tired with the journey and requiring rest, did not fail to fly down at once to the balustrades of the verandah, for they knew already what feast was being celebrated. They had heard of it on the borders of the land, and also that Helga had caused their figures to be represented on the walls, for they belonged to her history.

“I call that very sensible and pretty,” said elf-papa.

“Yes, but it is very little,” said mamma elf; “they could not possibly have done less.”

“But, when Helga saw them, she rose and went out into the verandah to stroke the backs of the elfs. The old elf pair bowed their heads, and curved their necks, and even the youngest among the young ones felt honored by this reception.

“Helga continued to gaze upon the glittering star, which seemed to glow brighter and purer in its light; then between herself and the star floated a form, purer than the air, and visible through it. It floated quite near to her, and she saw that it was the dead Faerie priest, who also was coming to her wedding feast—coming from the heavens.

“The glory and brightness, yonder, outshines all that is known on earth,” said he.

“Then Helga the Fair prayed more gently, and more earnestly, than she had ever prayed in her life before, that she might be permitted to gaze, if only for a single moment, at the glory and brightness of the heavenly kingdom. Then she felt herself lifted up, as it were, above the earth, through a sea of sound and thought; not only around her, but within her, was there light and song, such as words cannot express.

“Now we must return;” he said; “you will be missed.”

“Only one more look,” she begged; “but one short moment more.”

“We must return to earth; the guests will have all departed. Only one more look!—the last!”

“Then Helga stood again in the verandah. But the marriage lamps in the festive hall had been all extinguished, and the torches outside had vanished. The elves were gone; not a guest could be seen; no bridegroom—all in those few short moments seemed to have died. Then a great dread fell upon her. She stepped from the verandah through the empty hall into the next chamber, where slept strange warriors. She opened a side door, which once led into her own apartment, but now, as she passed through, she found herself suddenly in a garden which she had never before seen here; the sky blushed red, and it was the dawn of morning. Three minutes only in heaven, and a whole night on earth had passed away! Then she saw the elves, and called to them in their own language.

“Then elf-papa turned his head towards here, listened to her words, and drew near. “You speak our language,” said he, “what do you wish? Why do you appear— you—a strange woman?”

“It is I— it is Helga! Dost thou not know me? Three minutes ago we were speaking together yonder in the verandah.”

“That is a mistake,” said the elf, “you must have dreamed all this.”

“No, no,” she exclaimed. Then she reminded him of the Orc’s castle, of the great lake, and of the journey across the ocean.

Then the elf blinked his eyes, and said, “Why that’s an old story which happened in the time of my great-great-grandfather. There certainly was a princess of that kind here in Alabasta once, who came from the Orcish land, but she vanished on the evening of her wedding day, many hundred years ago, and never came back. You may read about it yourself yonder, on a monument in the garden. There you will find swans and elves sculptured, and on the top is a figure of the princess Helga, in marble.”

“And so it was; Helga understood it all now, and sank on her knees. The sun burst forth in all its glory, and, as in olden times, the form of the frog vanished in his beams, and the beautiful form stood forth in all its loveliness; so now, bathed in light, rose a beautiful form, black as soot- a swan.

“Helga in her old raiment flew away, beyond the End of the World; to the holy spring of Charis, as she was bid by the dead goddess so long before. So ends the tale, as elves know to tell it.

Franky is staring at me. Ah, I had forgotten; I never told anyone I’m an Automata too- or rather, my people called ourselves Beloved, in the old style.

This isn’t really the time to talk about it- but I look over at him, and meet his eyes. There is a time for fear- but if I can’t say who I am to my family, my family that I chose and chose me back… when can I ever say it? And to whom?

I nod to Franky; Franky nods back.

I smile, and continue my tale telling; there’s only one left, now.

Every witch knows the most powerful magical substance is blood. By fairest blood was a queen given eternal life; by fairest blood was she killed at last. The worst curses are passed down in blood; the best blessings, also.

And so it was that the Hag gained power. When she had slaughtered the tommyknockers, she had eaten their flesh and drunk their blood; and so she had gained power.

Again there came a knocking at the door- more a raspy scratching sound. From without there was the yelping cry of dogs- and I knew if I had gone to look, they would have been black.

Again the ghostly woman left the house- again there was a hue and cry; and again she returned. This time, she was young and beautiful, and in her eyes gleamed a horrible red light. Violence and fury oozed from her pores- and yet, when she sat again at the table, she was the Good Hag again.

She reached up and unlatched a necklace and handed it across to her good-grand-daughter; she took off a heavy traveling cloak of feathers and handed it to me; and then she snarled herself back to a more or less polite countenance, and bade me tell my third tale.
And so, I drew my third Fairy-sword.

“There was once a girl whose father and mother died while she was still a little child. All alone, in a small house at the end of the village, there dwelt her godmother, who supported herself by spinning, weaving, and sewing. The aged woman took the orphaned child to live with her, kept her to her work, and educated her in all that is good.

“When the girl was fifteen year’s, the old woman took ill; called the child to her bedside, and said, “Dear daughter, I can feel my end drawing near. I leave to thee this little house, which will protect thee from Wind and Rain; and my spindle, shuttle, and needle, with which thou canst earn thy bread.”

“Then she laid her hands on the girl’s head, blessed her, and said “May you be blessed, and all go well with thee.”

“Thereupon she closed her eyes forever. When she was laid in the earth, the maiden knelt thereon, weeping bitterly, and paid her the last mark of respect she could. Now the maiden lived quite alone in the little house, and was industrious, and spun and wove and sewed; and the blessing of the good old woman who had loved her so was on all that she did.

“It seemed as if the flax in the room increased of its own accord, and whenever she wove a piece of cloth or carpet or had made a shirt or sheet, she at once found a buyer who paid her amply for it, so that she was in want of nothing, and even had something to share with others.

“About this time, the son of the King was traveling about the country looking for a bride. He was not to choose a poor one, and did not want to have a rich one. So he said, "She shall be my wife who is the poorest, and at the same time the richest." When he came to the village where the maiden dwelt, he inquired, as he did wherever he went, who was the richest and also the poorest girl in the place? They first named the richest; the poorest, they said, was the girl who lived in the small house quite at the end of the village.

“The rich girl was sitting in all her splendour before the door of her house, and when the prince approached her, she got up, went to meet him, and made him a low curtsey. He looked at her, said nothing, and rode on. When he came to the house of the poor girl, she was not standing at the door, but sitting in her little room. He stopped his horse, and saw through the window, on which the bright sun was shining, the girl sitting at her spinning-wheel, busily spinning. She looked up, and when she saw that the prince was looking in, she blushed all over her face, let her eyes fall, and went on spinning. I do not know whether, just at that moment, the thread was quite even; but she went on spinning until the King’s son had ridden away again.

“Then she went to the window, opened it, and said, "It is so warm in this room!" but she still looked after him as long as she could distinguish the white feathers in his hat. Then she sat down to work again in her own room and went on with her spinning, and a saying which the old woman had often repeated when she was sitting at her work, came into her mind, and she sang these words to herself-

"Spindle, my spindle, haste, haste thee away,

“And here to my house bring the wooer, I pray."
“And what do you think happened? The spindle sprang out of her hand in an instant, and out of the door, and when, in her astonishment, she got up and looked after it, she saw that it was dancing out merrily into the open country, and drawing a shining golden thread after it. Before long, it had entirely vanished from her sight. As she had now no spindle, the girl took the weaver's shuttle in her hand, sat down to her loom, and began to weave.

“The spindle, however, danced continually onwards, and just as the thread came to an end, reached the prince. "What do I see?" he cried; "the spindle certainly wants to show me the way!" turned his horse about, and rode back with the golden thread. The girl was, however, sitting at her work singing,

"Shuttle, my shuttle, weave well this day,
And guide the wooer to me, I pray."

“Immediately the shuttle sprang out of her hand and out by the door. Before the threshold, however, it began to weave a carpet which was more beautiful than the eyes of man had ever yet beheld. Lilies and roses blossomed on both sides of it, and on a golden ground in the centre green branches ascended, under which bounded hares and rabbits, stags and deer stretched their heads in between them, brightly-coloured birds were sitting in the branches above; they lacked nothing but the gift of song. The shuttle leapt hither and thither, and everything seemed to grow of its own accord.

“As the shuttle had run away, the girl sat down to sew. She held the needle in her hand and sang,

"Needle, my needle, sharp-pointed and fine,
"Prepare for a wooer this house of mine."

“Then the needle leapt out of her fingers, and flew everywhere about the room as quick as lightning. It was just as if invisible spirits were working; they covered tables and benches with green cloth in an instant, and the chairs with velvet, and hung the windows with silken curtains. Hardly had the needle put in the last stitch then the maiden saw through the window the white feathers of the prince, whom the spindle had brought thither by the golden thread. He alighted, stepped over the carpet into the house, and when he entered the room, there stood the maiden in her poor garments, but she shone out from within them like a rose surrounded by leaves.

“Thou art the poorest and also the richest," said he to her. "Come with me, thou shalt be my bride."

“She did not speak, but she gave him her hand. Then he gave her a kiss, led her forth, lifted her on to his horse, and took her to the royal castle, where the wedding was solemnized with great rejoicings. The spindle, shuttle, and needle were preserved in the treasure-chamber, and held in great honour.”
And my tales were done at last, and with them, the last link of anything holding the Hag to the house of her birth.

Necromancy has its uses.

A spear of sunlight burst through a high window, and splattered on an arrangement of crystals hung from threads of silk. From without there rang the bell of the gate, and it’s tinkling voice chimed sweetly thrice.

Queen Mab had returned, at last.

The son, Faldo, left the room; and it was only us left- a maiden, a witch, and a crone. What happened there is not for the ears of mixed company- but, I can say that the crone gave unto her good-daughter the last bits of her magic, her knowledge, and her love. And then Queen Mab returned- and I think I’ll leave the rest of the telling to her.

“In the end, freeing the Good Hag from her earthly bonds was as simple as talking to the ghost of a horse and giving her back her love-token. I did; and she left, never to return.

As soon as the ghost had gone, Gilly and Faldo packed away all their things into satchels, and put saddles onto the horses we have now. Together, we- Robin on Turnip and Beatrix on Whiskers, myself on Spare Parts, and the last of the Sinisters on Pumpkin still living in their ancient homestead-rode away to the east, where the sun was just peeking out of the might roots of Eve.

On the Barrow-field, the battle still raged. It’s a curious trait of that area of the realm; the only way out of that dell and valley was through the barrow-field. Our horses are made of stern stuff; and even so, they did not truly want to go out into that nightmare place, where the ghosts of the pasts could not rest.

And yet, even so, we rode on. Alongside us there came the rider; Tom, of the Road, who loved the Witches Daughter who became the Good Old Hag. Tom looked sharp over us all and then grinned once, widely; and at last, through the strange confluence of Royal intervention, ancient grudges, and duties fulfilled, a miracle took place. Tom took from his saddle horn a trumpet, a horn made of cow or ox or auroch, took from a skull and bound with great and ancient runes I dare not say the names of here-
And then-

Tom-

Blew-

Around us there came the ghosts of the Cavalry. As it happens, Tom of the Roads was not a messenger- or rather, he was no lowly message carrier, but a Royal Messenger, charged with the duty of mustering the cavalry. It was his direct efforts that broke the stalemate of that ancient war; and it was he who ended things then, as well.

Ghostly horses, and ghostly screams; the hissing of arrows like sizzling drops of rain in dust. Cannon fodder- young men and women, too young to be at war but too old to be overlooked for the job, torn to pieces by stones and laying where they fell for there is no time- the third week, or the fourth week of a siege, in which the castle on the ridge past the dell refused to submit- all around us, the smoke and fire and stench of bodies in trenches, living dead and undecided and then-

And then-

In the glorious tide of the sun’s dawning, the Ghosts were burned away like mist. All that remained was the ghostly Tom, and his steady, ghostly horse. He overtook me, and led me to the center-most point of the barrow-field, a gently sunken, stately hillock of stones overgrown with slowly waving grass. He dismounted, and tugged the reins of his horse down, once; and then he looked to me.

I stood from Party’s back, and set foot on that murky ground. I walked over to Robin, and took from her saddle the netted bag which held the Chalice the old ghostly woman had given away. I took from her the cloak, made of homely feathers; and as I turned to walk to poor Tom, Gilly, his many-removed grand-daughter, gave me a posy of flowers.

I walked then towards the Ghostly Tom, and stood before him with the treasure he had given away.

Tom stared at it, and reached for it- but I stared him in the eye, narrowly. He stopped, and stumbled-and then he took his war-horn off his shoulder, and proffered it to me. I took it, and handed him the bag with the chalice. He shrugged away his soldier’s cloak, and took the homely feathers. Finally, he took from his side a sabre, and traded it to me for the posy of flowers.

In order to get the horn he had needed for battle, it may very well be that poor, Ghostly Tom had traded his tokens for others; and, at the end when he had lived, could not find the one to whom he had traded it away.

A chalice for a horn; a cloak for a cloak; a bunch of flowers for a sword. It’s the kind of trade you hear about in Fairy-tales.

Still.

When he had that ancient thing, a wooden goblet with a ring around the stem, he stared at it in wonder. When he stood under that elf’s cloak, he stood with new pride, and years of pain and anguish fell away with his returned self. At last, the flowers- the smell of them brought a blush of uncomplicated joy to his face, and for a moment I could see the man he was before- a simple, wandering elf-man, whose duty to his Lord interfered with the duty to his heart.
Then, to me, he bowed, and the strange colors that had lit him from within his ghostly stature faded, and he remained only in the most misty of ways; a shadow on mist, soon to burn away. Then, he seemed to hear a call, beyond my hearing; and he turned, face alight with such unfettered joy- and then, he was gone, chalice and all, beyond even my sight.

He left behind his horse, though- and that horse told me a bit of her character, which is why I had Robin ride her into town and hitched Turnip to me and Party on a long line. And then we rode away, into town- Waterwheel Town, where we found Cecelia and her friend, Sancho.

The Raiments of Valor, Glory, and Purpose remain with the horse I renamed Steady Walker, in honor of her gait; and on the ground where the ghost of Tom left at last, there burbles now a sacred fountain, blessed by the Three-Who-Are-One, and the Three Who Made This World, and The One Who Broke It.

As for the Barrows; never again shall any ghost rise from those graves, and the land shall lay sleeping once more.

An’ the Wheel bends, an’ the story ends; thus ends my tale, and the telling of it. So too ends the grudge

“Okay, wait, hold up- if I was there, why are you telling me about it all again?”

“Well, Deb, for one thing you passed out about four times that I noticed that day; and for another, Chopper’s been dosing you with pain-medication so you won’t get out of bed and aggravate your wounds.”

“Oh. So, I was high?”

“Like the Surface of the Sea, babe.”

“Ah. So- what, that whole ‘Ghost Army of the Barrows’ thing mom used to scare us with was just about a chalice, a cloak, and a sword?”

“This chalice, actually- Bea’s called dibs on the sword, and Fern’s swiped the cloak… said something like ‘it’s perfect for reducing contaminated Sight,’ whatever that means. -It was never about the things, really. Things, in the end, aren’t all that valuable- not enough to fight a war over.”

“…Yeah. People fight over food and water, not… cups and coats and fancy knives. That’s- no. Not whole groups of people. …The Sinisters are very powerful when it comes to traditional things; holding onto your past for so long can have a powerful effect. Still though- how in the fuck did Cecelia get into this? And where the hell is Sancho- is he coming with us too?”

“Well, yes. Cece and Sancho are partners; the Owl and the Raccoon belong together, really. Right now, Sancho and Cece are working with Taffy on their clowning skills; something about needing to fine-tune their comedic timing in battle? As for how they got into this, well...”
They call me Connasse at the Clown College.

Wait wait wait- that’s a bit too abrupt.

Go back.

Okay, here we go- we’re fucking poor, okay? Mom never eats when the rest of us do. When she could sit up, she’d sit at the table with us, but she always had ‘stomach trouble’ that didn’t go away until after we were all done eating. Then, if there was anything left she’d say, ‘well, I guess I should try to eat a little bit of something; to keep my strength up, you know?’ If there wasn’t anything left from what Deb had cooked that morning, she’d say that she just didn’t feel like her could handle anything.

I didn’t realize until I was scrounging for myself more often that she was waiting to be sure that her daughters- us- had enough to eat before feeding herself. She went to bed hungry more than once, especially before Deb got the job at the Acorn.

So yeah, I have no formal clown training. None. What I have is moxie.

So here’s how I got my clowning name. At the Gag, there’s a big-ass room, a fuckin’ room where all everyone does is fuckin’ eat, right? The Caf, or some shit; right, well, there’s this thing called a share-table. Lots of people at the Caf get meals as part of their like, tuition or whatever, but sometimes whatever they get for lunch, they don’t eat all of it. So, instead of throwing their shit away, they put the stuff they didn’t touch on the share table.

That’s where I come in.

See… wait, I should explain. The Gag’s a fuckin’ hoity-toity establishment; and in the student handbook, which they have copies of in the library- I’ll explain that in a minute. Anyway, they only speak French, Wesse, Hispa, Dutchy, and Germa in the college. At all times.

Of all those languages, French, Wesse, and Hispa are learned quickest, followed by Dutchy and Germa for the more technical classes. I only spoke Gobdark Cant, Merrish, Kappash, and Wahongo, when I started going to the Gag for food.

Here’s what I’d do. See, there’s a rolling group of popular students- changes year to year, but there’s always at least one gang of girls and guys who get their full tuition paid by their parents and don’t eat the good shit from their lunch because of fad dieting. So it goes to the share table, right? Well.

Around this time, Deb’s boss at the Acorn had cracked down on all the workers taking home shit that didn’t sell, and, uh, well there was no food at home- not enough to really let everyone eat. So, scrounging.

Five years ago, when I was nine I think? Deb does not understand time.
I’m not sure, really, where my particular Face came from—now, I mean. I know it started as the bare-bones of a Perriot face… okay so they don’t tell you this in the handbook or anything, but individual pans of Slap cost less than those deluxe kits. I’d never seen any Face outside of pictographs and posters so old that the colors weren’t invented yet or had faded all away, so I didn’t know you could put colors on your face at all. I used black, and white, and I already knew what I was there to do, so… there’s this animal that lives all over the country but especially in Gobdark called a raccoon? My very first Face was based really heavily off a raccoon.

I used makeup-skills I got from the other women in our apartment—our entire apartment is all prostitutes, and good makeup can make or break a night, so… Anyway, I’d apply milk of magnesia and then my first layers of foundation and set them, and then I’d put on the second layers and set them again, brush all the excess away—and my face looked fuckin’ perfect for the rest of the day, no matter how much I sweated.

Yeah, then I guess I decided to just—go for it, y’know? I went by the local monastery, and I got one of their worst robes—it’d been bleached accidentally so it was a weird grey color, and I tried to dye it black but it didn’t take so it turned greyer, and then it was so huge on me I—acquired is a good word, I acquired a set of shaolin limb wraps to keep my robes tight to my hands and feet and then, well… I kinda already had the shoes? So, I got a black obi, one of the most modern ones, to break up my torso and also, incidentally, help broadcast my gender. Sancho got me the scarf, but I’ll explain that later. So yeah, I looked fuckin’ great.

I also looked like one of the edgy kids, who didn’t really understand what being a clown was all about.

Looks are deceiving, alright?

Anyway, at that time I was hitting my first massive growth spurt, hence the oversized clothing I could really grow into, and—well, anyway the share table had all the food I could want, and I tended to eat, like, everything there, right around the end of the lunch period? Only it was the habit of the poser crowd I wasn’t a part of to grab the good shit and eat it during their lecture periods; come to find out that I’d already eaten most of that shit, and was working through the less-good shit as they came up on me.

And they’d be like “Conasse! Blahblahblahblahblahblah—”

And I’d look ‘em dead in the eyes and say “Oui. Je suis.”

And then I’d go back to eating, still watching them and chewing and not understanding a goddamn word they were saying but knowing every time they said Conasse they were definitely referring to me. In an effort to understand what they were talking about, I basically got Deb to teach me French but I didn’t realize that cook’s french and normal people french is not at all the same, so uh. Well.

I think the Posers first realization that I was a completely different animal from them was when one of them tripped me in full view of the entire Caf and I fell and smacked my face into the ground and yelled ‘Ow! Putain!’ loud enough to rattle the fuckin’ rafters. Everyone who saw it started laughing; everyone who heard it started laughing; even the fuckin’ posers started laughing. It was then, and there, that I knew—I had to be a clown. Nothing else gave me the same kind of satisfaction as accidentally making every person in that Caf start laughing.
So yeah, I ended up with a fuckin’ posse after that or something? I mostly ditched them, because, well, I had no idea how to understand the lectures so, um.

Well.

It’s been true my entire life; the best place to find more information, to learn anything at all, is the library. The Gobdark Local Library is the nicest place in town; the air and water are always fresh, and the librarian, Mr. Potter, is really nice. So, I asked him about how to learn the languages spoken at the Gag, and he gave me a primer for Latin, and German, and Dutchy; told me that French, Wesse, and Hispa all came from Latin, which came from the Roamin’s. So I learned to speak and read and write Latin, which is one of the languages accepted at the Gag- and about that student handbook.

See, the Gag’s library is funded by the state, not the school, making it public property. I, and my family, are tax-paying members of the public, and thus, own a share in literally every public space in the country. Including the Gag school library.

So, it wasn’t a big deal for Mr. Potter to get an old copy of the Student Handbook for me, and- after I read it in Latin- I internalized the school rules. Technically speaking, the school’s a conservatory, with a two year program and post-graduate classes for those interested.

‘The Conservatory does not discriminate on the basis of age, tribe, faith, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, genetic origin, disability, or status as a protected veteran. The Conservatory’s nondiscrimination policy applies to all phases of its employment process, its admission and financial aid programs, and to all other aspects of its educational programs and activities.’ First paragraph of the first page, y’all. I think we all have the thing Deb has, where if we see something once we remember it forever? Like a pictograph of memory, all neat in a row. Or whatever.

As for tuition, well- so long as I’m a registered student, I’m entitled to a spot in class; and so long as I’m under the age of twenty one, the state will pay for any school debt I accrued. All I had to do was fill out the stack of forms and get them to the right people.

Here’s something a lot of people don’t really get about being poor. If you’re poor, you’re okay with inconvenience. Have to wait for the bus in the rain for half an hour? Got my bus pass ready, my jacket’s waterproofed, and cold water will not kill me. I’m a fishwoman, water’s fine.

Sleeping on the floor on top of a blanket? No big; it straightens out the back and we don’t have rats or mice.

Eating rice with beans, or eggs with ketchup, or eggs and rice? Better than just rice with soy sauce again.

Sitting next to a fattass on the train? HOLY FUCK I’M ON THE TRAIN.

Sancho sometimes accuses me of apathy because I don’t get pissed off by silly shit, but literally no inconvenience I’ve ever been through is so major that I have to ruin my moment over it by getting bent out of shape about it. Being poor is a constant grinding parade of little irritations, to the point where if you legit only have one or two things wrong at a given time, you’re fuckin’ great.

Case in point- Mr. Potter knew as soon as I told him where I was going to school that I’d never be able to check out the current textbooks from the library. However, getting copies of the chapter overviews- which lay out all the points the book is going to hit- and copies of each textbook’s bibliography, which is the list of books referenced, is as simple as asking Missus Wiggly Giggly, the librarian at the Gag. Incidentally, most students seem to just never do that? Apparently they’re put off by Missus Giggly being a Scare Clown, not a Joker like almost everyone else, but honestly I find her amusing- anyway, she let me watch philomes of referenced works when they weren’t books, and uh. Well.

It turns out that when you come to conclusions based on first principles, you gain a mastery?

For example.

Beauty is all about patterns. Our feelings of beauty are a particularly potent and intense form of curiosity. It’s a learning signal that urges us to keep paying attention, an emotional reminder that there’s something there worth figuring out. A feeling that reminds you to pay attention, idiot, this is fucking important.

This particular variant of curiosity is hijacked by art. Experiencing beautiful art… when we get sucked into the undulating tones of a symphony, observe a sunrise after a storm, see a horse and rider in perfect joined motion… Great art always seem to imply something, to set up information in patterns that then keep us that observe them waiting for their conclusion. It’s for this reason that twelve tone musical phrases are so popular; your mind completes a chord that does not exist. The final line of a rap-battle becomes a thing of immense beauty because throughout the entire call and response of verses, that final line was built up. The feeling of beauty tells us there is a pattern to be found here, and that we as observers have a chance of understanding it.

Beauty is a motivational force that helps modulate conscious awareness. The problem beauty solves for the brain is the problem of trying to figure out which sensations are worth making sense of and which ones can be easily ignored. Great art seems to contain promises of great patterns. The beginning of a symphony sets up a pattern and then the rest, more or less, is a tantalizing flirtation with, but not submission to, our expectations of beauty.

There are studies that suggest the medial orbital-frontal cortex, a specific area of the brain involved in our experience of beauty, regardless of source. This is one of the least understood parts of the brain; however, what is known is that it is integral to the integration of sensory information, the regulation of how powerful emotional responses are to stimuli, and it’s also key in decision making and expectation. In particular, the mOFC is thought to regulate planning behavior associated with sensitivity to reward and punishment.

It’s not so unexpected that our experiences of beauty resides in the area of the brain already known to be an important part of the pleasure spectrum. That brain area has consistently been implicated in the recognition of delightful things, from the kiss of a lover, to the taste of expensive sweets, to the luxuriant sensation of cashmere, to the smell of fresh blooming flowers. As we begin to discover how the experience of beauty originates in the brain we can begin to answer the philosophical question of what the common quality of all great art is, in a qualitative and measurable way. In essence, the peculiar quality of art may lay not in the works themselves (music included), but in the brains of their beholders.

If that is so, then a work of art can be seen as a trigger for the sensation of beauty. A skilled artist might be said to have an understanding of how to form an object, work, or performance into an experience which triggers beauty through setting up a pattern and holding off on its completion. That lack of completion, that moment of mystery that cries out to be understood; it also gives off the hopeful feeling that you’ll be able to grasp it.

In exploring aspects of life as diverse as hallucinogens, masturbatory techniques, meditation, dancing to repetitive music, partaking of religious ceremonies, and studying evolution… I gained the sense that life and everything in life is riddled with patterns. Everything, even the randomest of occurrences, moves to a pattern of some kind; it’s origin is the substance of life, this repetition and creation of seeming chaos that resolve into fracturing patterns that resolve into a procedural order too vast for even the most brilliant of women or men to ever comprehend. The earliest myths we have that ordain the creation of our World dictate the story of True Order being revealed from True Chaos; we mortal beings, mere reflections of ancient gods and goddesses, therefore create meaning from chaos wherever we find it.

It is an indelible part of what makes us human.

As an aside, if beauty is a facet of curiosity, what the hell is curiosity? Well… curiosity obeys an inverted U-shaped curve, so that we’re most curious when we know a little about a subject, but not too much; our curiosity has been piqued, a question has been asked, and so long as our certainty of the answer isn’t, the curiosity remains.

The lesson here is that our desire for more information- the cause of curiosity, wherever it lurks- begins as a dopaminergic craving, rooted in the same primal pathway that responds to sex, drugs, and rock’n’roll music. The thing that keeps us interest is incompleteness, rather than perfection. A stray hair on a calligraphic painting, a golden tooth in a friend’s unguarded smile- these are the things that make something beautiful and interesting.

Beauty is what urges us to pay attention; to keep looking for the resolution to the pattern we saw. It hints at the mysterious, but also gives us the hope that we might grasp understanding. It encourages us with its imperfections to want to know more; to want to know how it ends.

Beauty is what encourages us to find the truth of things.

Enter the Clowns.

Since the Dawn of Man, Clowns have been intertwined with truth in all it’s forms. This quality of truth is what attracts people to clowns, not as individuals but as concepts. Truthfulness is what makes a clown, beyond the mask of grotesquery. A clown, in fully authentic form, will and must say things others wouldn’t dare.

The clown is a liminal character, polarized between the lowest social standing and a position of receiving attention, which in and of itself is a form of social status. People pay attention to clowns- not just poor people, but the rich and powerful too. In previous centuries the Courtly Jester was a clown in the service of a King or some other elevated noble. In this role, Jesters had unique access to, literally, the most powerful persons in the land; on top of that he had a unique permission to speak only the truth.
The Jester’s freedom to mock or contradict rulers is described in records from all over the World, throughout history. It can therefore be assumed that the nobles who kept and employed their Fools were fully aware of this aspect of clowns. To gain the privileged position, the clown had to deserve the merit. Only a master of the craft of clowning; someone who could empathize and communicate with the people whose truth’s they were speaking in a way that would be heard. More generally, the master would have to be compatible with their patron’s sense of humor, overall taste, and temperament.

And so we get to my understanding of the form.

An important part of the education of a clown that is never stated outright, anywhere, is the development, discovery, and ownership of a truthful representation of themselves. Anyone can learn to fall down without hurting themselves, to juggle, sing comedic songs, tell jokes and stories… but the best clowns are not merely entertainers. They are themselves, always, to the point where we remember them as Themselves, not as the characters they played.

The most difficult skill to develop at clown school is unpretentious pretending, because it’s predicated on the idea that you know who you are and what you want. Most people here at school do not; or, at the very least, are only starting to realize what they really need at the end of classes.

I am unapologetic, and everyone who sees me views me with suspicion. I am a master of clowning, because even without a Face full of Slap, I am Conasse, and Conasse is Cecelia, and Cecelia is Me. One person; many names. Still me.

Putting on my Face doesn’t hide who I am, or how I am seen by others; it doesn’t turn me into someone else, or someone good, or someone right, or someone your mother would let you be seen with in public. I will always be the whore’s daughter from the worst city in the country. You can see it, in everything I do; from the features on my face to the sound of my voice.

I will always borrow routines, shtick, gags, jokes, and ideas from the other students at the Gag, from my predecessors; I will always belong to a long tradition of performers, primarily Mimes, as I am a Skuan in my inherited heritage.

My best specific techniques, that I use time and time again, are silent. You don’t need to learn an entirely new language to understand any of my jokes. I’m the kind of clown you see in a circus, or on the street-corner; I’m no pet. Mimes are not pets.

Whatever material I perform, whatever character I present, I enter my clowning persona as a way of being more generously myself than I might be under other circumstances.

I learned to clown- not the superficial skills, the makeup, the clothing, the jokes and the japes and the chicanery- no, I learned the actual deep mechanics of empathy because my sister, Fernanda, didn’t always have her glass orb.

See, people with the Sight are born with… vision, unclouded, is how our local hedgewitchdoctor described it. Fernanda Sees so much more than the rest of us do, and because she was born with unclouded vision, she can’t just ignore what she sees. Her mind is too curious; her pattern recognition is too strong.

I learned empathy because when Fernanda would See Too Much, she would have a panic attack; and after we figured out that _that’s_ what they were, I got books from the Library about how to help her. A panic attack is when your brain says ‘AAAAAAAAAAAAAH!’ but there’s nothing to actually go ‘AAAAAAAAAH!’ about; your heart can beat so fast it feels like you’re about to die.

Time distorts, and it can take you a long time to process information.

I first met Sancho while he was in the midst of a flailing panic attack. It was the second week of Practical Slapstick lessons; my First Year, and Sancho’s third repeat year. To this day, I still don’t really understand _how_ he tripped into an open box of sharpened fly fishing lures.

Our class period was about to start, and one of the Second Year’s had tripped Sancho into a box of the things as a cruel joke, I suppose. I didn’t find it amusing.

The first thing you have to do if you see someone having a panic attack is to not panic yourself. They won’t die; it might look like they’ll die, but they won’t. If they stop breathing- or it looks like it- they’ve only hyperventilated; they’ll pass out, and breath slow that way, and wake up again. Eventually.

It was Sancho’s very first panic attack. The first thing I did was check his wrists and neck for a medical charm; there is a _stainless steel_ bracelet with the medic’s charm burnt on in red on his left wrist. The glyphs were Common, and they were writ of his Name, his Age, his Bloodtype, and his Illness- in this case, Anxiety.

The seconds thing I did was check to see if he was breathing, and he wasn’t- not normally. So, I did that thing where you count up to ten and get slower the higher you go, and I asked him to breath to every second number I said; and that helped a bunch. I asked him simple questions, and left him as much time as he needed to answer them. He gave me simple answers, and took his time to give them.

When he started not breathing at all, I asked him- begged him, gently, to just take a breath. Just one. Please.

And he did- every time I asked, eventually, he did.

I asked for his name.

He told me ‘Sancho’.

I asked for his other name, which wasn’t exactly polite clown behavior.

He didn’t care, and told me ‘Sancho’.

I asked if I could use his name; I like a man without pretension.

By then, he’d come all the way out of his panic attack, and was sitting up and picking fishhooks out of his skin absent-mindedly.
“Yeah, sure- wait, no, what’s your name?”

“Oh- sorry, I’m Conasse.”

“...Right, yeah, sure; what’s your other name?”

“...Cecelia. Can I help you with the ones in your face?”

“Oh- sure? I- when you get the ones in my eyebrows out, it’s going to bleed a lot-”

“I’ll help you get to the toilette so you can put your Face back on.”

“-Uh. Oh. Okay. ...That’s kinda something only friends would do, though...?”

“Well, naturally.”

“...I’ve never had a friend before.”

“Neither have I, but if you don’t start somewhere, you’ll never start at all. I recognize this kind of hook- I’ll need a pair of pliers to get it out all the way, and the hook’ll be ruined after that. Thankfully, I think I have a pair in my bag...”

“...Why do you have pliers in your bag, Cece?”

“-so yeah, I’ll have to push the barbed ones all the way through, then clip off the barbs, then take them out. Best do it with a towel handy.”

“You’re just going to ignore my question?”

“What question?”

“Riiiight.”

Anyway, I took Sancho off to the toilette to a chorus of giggling laughter, both of us covered in blood and wet fishhooks clattering down in our trail. I grabbed my bag off the hook, and waited until Sancho hesitantly pointed his out to grab his. Then, we were off to the toilette- after I used my magnet on a string to pick up all the dropped fishhooks first.

This got an extra giggle, and a short chorus of groans.

We partnered up every class we had together, which turned out to be all of them; and after that, we just started hanging out. I guess it was around the midterms we became Partners; the Teachers handed out the Declaration Contracts around then, and, well... No one can play off my jokes with the same ease as Sancho.

Sancho’s a huge guy, about three years older than me- seventeen, now, almost eighteen. He’s got brown hair, and always wears either the grey beanie he got one summer or the hat I made for him after The Thing With The Fishhooks. I actually made two; mine’s the plain hat, while Sancho’s has little tufts on the ears made out of feathers, I think. He has a pair of sunglasses that he wears almost all the time, because he’s an asshole; especially indoors. He wears striped blue leggings under a pair of rolled cuff blue shorts that stop way above his knees, one of his only two shirts, his knee high blue sneakers with stars on, his jacket with a fur hood, and more often than not either his own blood or some bloodstained bandages. He’s always getting himself stabbed with shit, or scraped up, or cut open. I’ve gotten very good at either catching him before he falls on the invariably sharp broken glass, or tending his wounds.

Genny, once she actually met Sancho, understood why I was always buying double the number of bandaging materials, and more often than not swiping hers too. He doesn’t even have to be near something sharp and suddenly there’s a split in his skin and blood oozing everywhere- I’ve seen him scratch mosquito bites until they bleed. I’m not sure if it’s because he legitimately can’t feel pain if it’s under a certain threshold, or if he’s just oblivious.

Anyway. There are particular, but unwritten, rules for the way transgressive expressions of truth can be presented. Masked with silliness, expressed from a grotesque and lowly state of dignity- your audience is free to take from your performance whatever they want, and discard the rest as mere jest and absurdity. If a grain of truth from the humorous shenanigans is taken to heart, that grain is more likely to fall on fertile ground and take root; more likely to sprout into something new.

Clowning isn’t just a matter of performing truth; the telling of Truth is not just a matter of stating facts, as every jester always knew. The type of truth best expressed by jesters and clowns is not factual, accountant’s truth; we best express the ecstatic, poetic truths of life.

Facts might reflect objective reality, but they don’t illuminate truth. This is the power of clowning. Poetic truth is experienced; greater and more powerful than any fact. It’s a process of communication where the recipient experiences an expression as a deeper and more visceral truth.

Poetic truth cannot exist without human participation; it is not something which is in and of itself- it’s not something you can put in a gallery. A poetic truth is crafted to make emotional connections between people. For a poetic truth to be received, there must be trust between the presenter and the receiver.

The King must trust his Fool; the Audience must trust the Clown.

For that trust to develop, the fool and clown must express themselves as themselves. If you try to speak the opinions of others as your own, you lose who you are. Telling the truth is a delicate process, always with the not small risk of failure. Not the kind of failure which you see the mimicry of in the performance of a clown- point of fact, the clown’s performed failures are just that: performance. Sancho has worked for ten years- since he was seven, his mom told me- to get his particularly bloody brand of Slapstick just right. With me as his partner, he can elevate his particular form of Slapstick to something… else.

The kind of failure I meant is a failure of communication; the failure to connect and understand. If any of these three factors fail: the truthfulness of the clown, the particular truth expressed, or the Audience’s experience of either, the Clown risks death. Choking is the worst, in my personal opinion; but dying on stage is every clown’s worst nightmare.

When a clown dies on stage, the truth of their self fails- when a clown dies on stage, what actually dies is their soul, their passion, their creativity and dreams.

The truthfulness in the clown’s persona is the key to their privilege as the truth teller. When a clown succeeds in acting from their heart, where all poetic truth springs from, the audience hears what the clown is saying. Laughter and levity lowers the defences of the mind and heart, opening the laughers to the possibility of truth, and with that truth, change.

Change your heart; change your mind; change your World.
This is the power of the clown.

In front of the apartment where my family lives, there is an empty field, and every year the circus comes they pitch their tent there. My sisters and I are usually the only ones in our apartment who can go; Mom always has to work, to keep up the rent. After she got so sick, we all started working—still though, we always took the time to go to the circus, I think because it was a moment of wonder and joy in a life of almost overwhelming misery.

Happy people don’t become clowns.

Anyway, I think it started when we were three or four; when the circus came to town, my sisters and I would go with the older kids of the building, and we’d all sneak under the canvass. We’d watch the show from under the bleachers, and eventually we’d sneak into empty seats and watch like everyone who paid to get in. I can still smell that mix of sawdust, straw, and horses.

Gradually, I realized that the clowns were kind of… amazing. I thought that if I became familiar with clowns and clowning, it would open doors for me.

Also, in our floor’s bathroom there’s a portrait of Grandma Clown on the wall, in crushed velvet I think. Landlady’s grandmother painted it, I think? So every time I would use the can, I ended up staring at the portrait. It had effects on me.

I began to imagine.

Something else happened when I was nine. The circus was back again, and I went with a girl I had a huge crush on. She was a bit older than me; I had no idea how to talk to her, but I was so excited… it was a bit ridiculous. Anyway, we sat in the front row.

At one point the clowns asked for a volunteer to join them in the ring, and every kid in the audience raised their hand except for me. I didn’t want to be embarrassed in front of the girl; so, of course they picked me, and of course I was.

They took me into the ring and put me on a horse, a wide-backed mare, and they began to walk the horse around the circle as fast as they could. They’d attached me to a rope so it was safe, but I was still nervous, and people were laughing. Suddenly the clowns hoisted me up by the rope until I was hanging in mid-air; the horse left the ring without me; and now it was just me, dangling, and circling round and round.

Everyone thought it was hilarious.

Then came the grand finale, and the clowns pulled down my pants. I was wearing underwear that day, thank the gods; but because boy’s clothing is cheaper than girls, I was wearing a pair of gag-boxers with fuckin’, fuckin’ hearts on them. By then, the whole audience was crying with laughter, watching short skinny me swinging on a rope without any pants on.

For the clowns that day, it was a great triumph; but for me, it was an invasive moment of horror. I was profoundly vulnerable and intimidated; so shocked and mortified that it was only later, when the girl I took to the show refused to speak to me, and my own sisters started to laugh at me that I was able to cry about it.

Thinking on it now, I think I felt deceived, betrayed… I didn’t think that clowns would be so mean. I thought, somehow, that they would be more careful. That day, I learned that the clown I had always heard of, the clown I saw staring back at me in the water closet… that clown no longer existed. So, I said to myself, ‘I’ll be that clown; I’ll be the clown I see staring back at me in the water closet, the one who would never hurt a child like that.’

When I began reading the original principles of clowning, that’s what I discovered being discussed over and over- empathy. Empathic people; striving for empathy. Understanding the people… It doesn’t matter whether the audience is old or young, they’re people, just like you. Every person is vulnerable, and every person can be hurt. A clown is the one free to fight anyone or anything with a sword made of rubber; they will cut down anyone and anything, but crucially, will never draw blood.

The principal element of a clown, beneath the psychotic instinct to kill, is empathy. This is of vital importance because, if you don’t understand what people feel or why people cry, you can’t be a clown.

In the end, mastery of clowning comes down to understanding the real meaning of freedom, beauty, truth, and love. In point of fact, the real point of being a clown is empathizing with the most painful truths in the World you live in.

My Face and clothing makes me look like nothing more than a petty thief; or a prisoner. A drunk, a scallywag, a scoundrel; someone not worthy of trust. Sancho’s Face is the simplest of faces- almost painfully simple, and profoundly Elegante. Two dots beneath each eye, plain white face, red smile over a grim expression.

The clown is a teller of truth; a philosophical idea made physical. A clown is the subversive presence in a structure which has to be broken with anarchy; for Sancho and me… well, it turns out that together, we’re a modernized, updated version of the Elegante and the Auguste. Sancho, with me, represents structure and authority; and he represents the state, the media, the boss. He even sometimes represents the people at Gag who think you don’t belong because you’re almost too poor to go to school there.

Which neatly leads into our Final Exam, and how I met up with Beatrix and Missus Mab and everyone.

So. The reason Sancho and Concass work so well together is because as characters, Sancho is a Stupid Owl, and Concass is a Smart Raccoon.

Our actual characters, as clowns, don’t really talk. I realized early on that body language, gesture, and grunting could handle like, nine tenths of the funny business; and it took about six months for me to learn enough Germa and Dutchy to speak with him intelligently, as I’d focused on the Latin languages for so long.

So.

Our best, and final routine for school, went something like this.
Sancho went to class on time, as was his wont; but I wasn’t to appear at all until about thirty seconds into our time, carrying a mystery sack of noisy shit and completely ignoring the gravitas of the moment. In fact, the way it happened is I actually fell out of the rafters and landed on Sancho, which wasn’t the joke at all, and then the bag fell on us both with a humorous clattering. That was our first laugh.

The second laugh was more a series of giggles as we tried- and performatively failed- to get off of each other without hurting each other worse. Eventually, we were both upright- and that’s when Sancho started bleeding down his face again, which also wasn’t at all a part of the joke but I fucking ran with it, right, and-

Well. Suffice to say that as we did our routine, meandering from one part of the stage to another, and eventually falling down the stage’s stairs no less than fifteen times each- because of course we had to go back for the noisy bag of things we never even used- the raucous laughter got louder and more amused- until, finally, our show was over. We took our bows, took our seats, and passed with full honors.

“Oh my gods, Cece, do you really have to explain your entire clowning philosophy every time?” I said.

“Deb, every time you talk even slightly about working at The Acorn, you go on a tirade about cooking or food, it’s always one of the two. Hypocrisy is stupid.” said Cece, idly flicking a switchblade around the back of her knuckles.

I kicked my legs a little bit, and huffed in my lounging chair on the deck of the Thousand Sunny.

“Cece, it doesn’t actually matter that much to me how you met up with everyone. I’m really just glad you’re here, you know? Sancho too, I was kinda worried about him and his mom…”

“Yeah- I mean, honestly, it amounts to ‘I saw Bea on a Horse and said hey; Sancho went home to pack his things, and you know the rest of what happened’. Anyway, what- Oh, hello Missus Mab, what’s all that for?”

“Mm- Chopper said that you’re able to stand for short periods of time today, and after he checks you over tomorrow- well, anyway, I’m doing measurements and preferences today. I’ve already gotten most of your sisters, and checked in with everyone else- but not you, you were unconscious.”

“Oh…?”

“Hmhmhm. We’ll start easy- may I join you?”

“Oh- sure, okay.”

“Fine with me!”
“Good, good. Now; firstly, here are some cloth samples- don’t worry about cost, or if it’s ‘right’ for you. Whatever your hand reaches for, I’ll make you something nice with it.”

“Um. Okay… I’m guessing you’re making shirts?”

“If that’s what you want.”

“Oh. Um- this one, and this one… maybe this, but I’m not sure about it…”

“Mhm; you like red, I take it.”

“Er- yeah, um. I do like red. Is that bad…?”

“No, not at all. Do you wear neck-ties or neck-ribbons of any kind?”

“Uh. A bandanna, sometimes, or a soft bow.”

“Okay. Of these styles of collar, which do you like best?”

“Um… the Classic with the long points, I think?”

“Mhm. How about cuffs? These are the three styles I do.”

“Oh. Um… I like the square cuff.”

“Mhm. Buttons- this one, this one, or maybe this one would look nice on your every days; we’ll get to your work clothing in a moment.”

“Uh…”

“Oh, sorry- these represent families of buttons- color, shape, texture. These are the ones that will work with all three of the prints you’ve chosen.”

“Oh. These- the red ones.”

“Of course- those are clay buttons, meant for very heavy wear on everyday work clothing. I’ve actually got them in all kinds of styles with red as the main color; those red ones you like, of course- but there’s also ladybugs, which are lucky; apples, strawberries… I’ve got whole selection sheets of the things, I’ll get you a marking sheet momentarily. These are the preliminary sketches of your casual, semi-casual, and formal-most shirts, with notes on the button choices.”

“Oh!”

“Mhm.”

“Um- what’s with the skirts, though?”

“Oh, those are options for your every-days; I’ve got a style sheet for skirts, as well as skirt-blocks to test if you like other styles, but these seemed most appropriate to me. You’re a classic kind of woman.”

“Heh. Yeah, I think you’re right. Um- what about my work clothing?”

“Ah, that. Right. Do you know who Georges Escoffier was?”

“Uh. No?”
“I’ll find the book he wrote—very interesting reading for any chef. Anyway, he codified and popularized the chain le brigade in the kitchen, as well as the uniform of the cook and chef. Traditionally, it’s a white toque that increases in height with the rank of the wearer, a white double-breasted coat with cloth knot buttons, houndstooth print pants, an apron, and a bandana or neckerchief.

“The white of the coat is meant to signify cleanliness, and the double-breast of the front means that when one needs to make an appearance at the front of the house and there’s a stain on your front, it can be switched with minimal effort. It also becomes very easy to see who’s better at cooking—the best cooks don’t really spill or splash.”

“I see.”

“Hmhm. Ah— the cloth buttons are also easier to undo in case of emergency. Prior to the eighth and ninth centuries, cooking was a messy, dirty, and unsafe business. Kitchens were often in the lowest, darkest, smallest, smokiest rooms with no refrigeration or sanitation to be found anywhere. Ser Escoffier felt that as a group of professionals, a uniform that looked distinguished, clean, and was eminently practical was of great importance.

“As for the pants; houndstooth is a print that came into prominence during the eighth century, and was generally popular. The reason it stayed the pattern of choice for chefs World-wide is because the pattern can hide spills or spots better than any other, while also generally being made of a material substantial enough to protect the wearer from burns, hot oil, and falling knives; while also not wear out or shrink over-much with frequent washings.

“Often, the lowest members of the kitchen will wear one color pants—black or white, depending on preference—while lower and mid-level cooks will wear the houndstooth pattern. Salaried and upper-level chefs will wear solid black pants.”

“-Like Sanji!”

“Exactly so, Cece. You, Deborah, will have a very specific set of uniforms that you will wear Every day you work, without exceptions. I will ensure that you have five complete changes available at any time; when you turn seventeen, I’ll make it six.”

“Oh.”

“Mm. You’ll have a pair of non-slip shoes and leg forms if you’d prefer, thin compression merino wool socks, heavy-wearing houndstooth print skirt, an apron for your work keys, label-tape, notebook, and so on; an undershirt that also acts as a supportive garment for the breasts, or a sporting brassiere—those girls are too large to go without, and don’t deny it; and a white double-breasted long sleeve chef coat made of heavyweight brushed cotton, with sleeve pockets for various tools. Do you need a toque?”

“I prefer something like a tenugui, actually.”

“Mm. I’ll make you a set appropriate for your work. Consider your clothing as much a part of your chef’s tools as your knife from now on, Deb.”

“Yes Mab!”

Okay, I’ll admit it. Maybe mama did raise a fool; I hadn’t realized that all the bits of clothing everyone at work wears all the time had actual reasoning and history behind it. Which, well- of course it does, I just… Huh.

-I know what to tell the guys at work when they ask me what I’m doing next. I mean, I’ve already learned so much, and we haven’t really gone anywhere yet…

Gnngh. I’ll be really glad when I don’t fall asleep randomly in the middle of the day.

I end the last day of being sick by being helped to bathe by my sister Genny, and then in a hammock in the Women’s dorm with the rest of my sisters sees me through the night.

Come the morning, Doctor Chopper takes my stitches out after breakfast. He sonograms my spleen and says something to the effect of ‘it’s growing a bit, now that it’s the only one- you’ll be fine, if a bit sore for a while’; I took it to mean that I should take the day easy, but I could go back to doing my thing.

Which means, since I’m the oldest and in charge of mom’s ashes, I’m going to be planning her funeral rites.

Firstly, her ashes can’t stay as they are; too easy for them to be fouled. Missus Mab wears this pair of cloisonne purple drop-shaped earrings, and I’m thinking something like that would be perfect.
Firstly, a portion of mom’s ashes needs to go to the Funerary Glassworks down on Riverside Corner, along with the appropriate wire and fixings for our Charnellements.

I think our best bet is to have one set of students do our fixings; as for the crystal, Borosilicate is the best option I can think of.

Adel, Bea, and Cece will have to make sure that Ellie, Fern, and Genny know how to do the Planting Dance. I think Sancho and Cece will know who to talk to at the Gag to make sure that Mom has enough clowns, musicians, acrobats, and other circasticus on hand to make her funeral… right.

I guess I should talk to Mab about everything… I think she can help. Someone she knows is dead too, right? She wouldn’t wear those earrings of hers otherwise…

So uh.

Mab’s Studio is… it’s an entire deck of the ship, for one thing, or near enough. There’s a massive gallery space, almost entirely empty; and inside is this huge, echoing space. The air is dry, and cool; the light is bright, and warm. There’s a table right in the middle of the room, and long tables with shelves above and below them that have more fabric than I’ve ever seen in my life before. I can see wood from the decks above us, sealed to a matte finish and pale in color on the ceiling; and I can see… This, more than anything else, proves to me that Mab Morgan, Sewing Professional of the Straw Hat Pirates, is a Titled Witch.

She’s got a bookshelf almost bursting with grimoires and mystical texts, and there’s what looks like an alchemy bench in the process of being built… Oh. She was serious about teaching us magic, wasn’t she… It’s like there’s a full section of her studio that she’s setting aside specifically for Arts and Crafts, right near what I have to assume is the Laundry, because of the two chute outlets on either side.

“Ah, Deborah- something you need?” said Mab, her glasses gleaming for a second in the light as she lifted her head from a sketchpad of… outfits…

“I- are all of those for me?”

“No, yours are all on the board with red tape- over there, see?”

“I- a gown?”

“Sleeping gown, I think, unless you really like that style? For time when you are very definitely not working in the kitchen; a basic style guide because your shape is very female, and so most popular styles won’t be so great on you…” said Mab as she came closer, before she began pointing things out in particular on… on my clothing inspiration board.

“Every good cook and chef I’ve ever met has had a real sense of the dramatic and the avant garde, or at the least for quality and style; thus, most of my inspiration for you comes from the world of old-school glamour, modern pattern techniques, and dramatic combinations and lines. In a group, you might fade into the background, but I get the feeling that you’re the kind of person who’ll command a room every time you enter it. Also, why are you still wearing your pajamas? It’s almost noon, darling!”

“Uh- These are my only clothes? I mean, until you make more for me-”

“Ah. That’s right, Franky hasn’t finished the chest of drawers and wardrobes yet… Come with me.”

I follow Mab to another side of her studio, filled with mostly storage- and there’s a bin, with… with my name on it, and a dot of bright red next to my name, and… there’s clothing. There’s clothing in the bin.

For me.

What?

“I work much faster than you’re accustomed to. What’s your plan for today?”

“Uh. I was actually going to ask for help planning my mother’s funeral services; if all goes well, we should be able to get everything done before we have to, um, cast off?”

“Oh. Sure, happy to help. What do you need?”

“Um. Well, the mail-bird brought the copy of Mom’s will, so- I, uh, I read it with Chopper to make sure that, well, anyway, she had some stipulations about her burial services.”

“Okay.”
“Um. Well, black mourning clothes are completely banned from her funeral… Half of her ashes need to go to the Funerary Glassworks down on Riverside Corner in Dunshilly, so we can put her up on the ship altar with the other dearly departed. Um, her Charnellements are to be split among her eight children—she, ah, she named Sancho in her will as the child of her heart, and, um. I don’t know any jewellery makers that can do the job correctly, so—”

“I can do that for you; no problem. What else?”

“Oh. I-thank you, um. I guess all of us siblings need to practice the Planting Dance so we can bury mom correctly; we need a plot of land to plant her in, and she wants to return to the world with a minimum of fuss, so a simple natural burial is preferred. That’s where the rest of her ashes are going to go.”

“I can talk to Zoro about leaving the training deck empty so you all can practice with mirrors, and the lawn deck is usually clear in the mornings— if those are okay, of course. I’ve got land you can plant your mother in as well. What else?”

“I, uh. I think Sancho and Cece will know who to talk to at Gag to make sure that Mom has the clowns, musicians, acrobats, and other circus performers at her funeral. Um. Fern or Ellie can talk to the Madame and see if any of the women at the Whore House want to go to the Funeral too… Um. Clothing…?”

“Put those on; we’ve got quite a lot to do, and you won’t be getting it done in your yukata.”

“I- I can’t take all these, it’s way too expensive—”

“I didn’t spend a goddamn berri on those. And if I had, you’d accept it anyway because I make clothing and other fabric goods for this crew as needed; that’s my Job. Turn around so I can zip up your skirt.”

“I- y-yes, sure. Is, uh- is the sweater blue or grey?”

“A bit of both, actually; it’s a grey that looks blue, or a blue that looks grey.”

“Ah.”

“Mm. Merino wool compression socks; I’ve only got white so far, but black isn’t too far off, nor are prints. Let me know if you see a print you like.”

“Uh, sure—”

“And these are the boots I have in your size right now. You can take one of the messenger bags I have left over from the Postal Job I did a year ago—”

“YOU MADE THE POST OFFICE MESSENGER BAGS?”

“No, just the prototypes, and the Standard. D’you want the School Special, or the Civil Servant?”

“Civil!”

“The red one?”

“Of course!”

“Dunno why I expected anything else—right, and your toolset… Hm. We’ll talk to Sanji, I think; marking tape, pens, pencils—ah, right. You’ll be needing a waterproof notebook that you can keep in an apron pocket, pencil or pen, depending on what you like to write with… Hmm. I’ll have everything on your bed by the end of the day. -Oh, yes, and you can’t be wearing your hair like that."

“Eh?”

“It might have been allowed before, but you were a dishwasher and garbage boy; you’ll be handling food, now, and that fluffy mess is Not Appropriate. Come here- this is your brush and comb, now, by the way-”

“Uh- oh. Oh wow, you’re very gentle.”

“I have nine younger sisters- mm, it’s been awhile since you last really brushed all this out, hasn’t it?”

“I usually don’t have the time...”

“That’s fine, darling. Hold still a second- Shadow Stitching: Carding Wool! ”

My hair falls down in soft waves; I see a fairly small clump of hopeless tangles and broken hairs get thrown into the trash, as well as whatever was caught in my new brush. Then I felt her fingertips start rubbing over my scalp, and smelled coconut oil mixed with- rose oil, wow! Expensive! But very pretty, though. She combs through my hair and I can see it out of the corner of my eye. My hair, under her hands, is turning from an ashy, brittle straw color, to an almost diamond-blonde color with subtle hints of gold when it catches the light. I can see a small puddle of split ends growing on the floor, too.

Eventually, Mab parts my hair in the middle of my forehead, and starts twisting it back; first one side, then the other, and she pins it with bobby pins at my nape. Then again, and again- for three sections of three twists that stop at the nape of my neck. She brushes through my hair again, and takes the long middle section that starts at the crown of my head and goes all the way down to the end- that section I can feel being coiled into a bun and- oh!

“Here- Ellie got this back for me- can you use it in my hair?”

“Of course; it’s beautiful.”

“Ah! Thank you.”

I hand her the comb, and then I kind of… I hold very still as she braids my hair along the sides, and I hold still as she gently tugs and tucks strands of my hair into a soft bouffant. The touch of the three tines of the hair comb against my scalp, and the soft click… it’s really nostalgic. The last time I heard that sound, mom was still…

“Have a look in the mirror, Deborah. Is there anything I need to change?”

“-Oh wow! I look so- I look so pretty !”
“Well, you are pretty- beautiful, in fact. Now- I’ve got a basket full of basic school supplies, as that’s really what all you Suntides are going to be doing… Come along, Deborah; we’re off to see Sanji.”

“Yes Mab!”

The history of the Laundry Chute is hidden, and fairly mythic. Stains, smells, secrets, thieves, corpses, and even deadly poisons have all found their way down that narrow laundry place.

In the 900s, a professor of Urban Studies (at what would become the Fairisle Military Engineering School) by the name of Josiah Thistledown found a collection of trash moldering in the forgotten space between his pantry and his laundry chute. It was a stack of small paper scraps lying in repose at various scales, with sooty edges that were just beginning to stick together and combine. There was a box of playing cards, a train ticket from Pumpkin Hill, a receipt for a passel of unprocessed stinkweed, a diary entry, a delivery card from the local grocery market, sections of handwritten notes, a theatre ticket stub, a laundry ticket stub, and labels from Yule gift packaging. The scraps and bits had gathered over a century or so, escaping from pockets as garments and other cloth goods fell from the higher floors; thusly did the scraps slip through a seam in the chute.

In the perusal of the accidental archive, Professor Thistledown was able to interpret tensions between the upward aspirations and limited means of the Kruger’s, the Germa family who had first built his house- then an Inn- during the early formation of the Sky Nation of Fairisle; using only the artifacts curated by a slit in his ductwork, Professor Thistledown was able to have a very intimate glimpse of the World-That-Was.

The laundry chute is one of several things that Franky had to amend on his plans for the Thousand Sunny, the others being our Home Farm, the Smokehouse and Dairy, and various amenities. The Smokehouse and Dairy are places of distinctly masculine and feminine energy. I’m not allowed in the Smokehouse proper, and indeed, no woman is. Similarly, Sanji is not allowed in the Dairy proper; no man is. However, there are liminal places in these areas of our ship.

For the Smokehouse, it’s a little antechamber where Sanji has powerful ventilation and racks of jars full of whole spices. He takes his smoke breaks there; and I’ve made love with him on the little bench in there quite a few times. The Dairy, being much more sanitary, only has one liminal area- the Milk Fridge.

The Milk Fridge is a refrigerator that has much more in common with a refrigerated display case in a cafeteria, in that it actually opens from the front, and the back. Next to the fridge is a chute through which empty bottles get returned- they clink into a bucket, and I change it twice a day to keep up with supply and demand. As an aside, our fridge is inset in the wall, with only the curved door on the Front and the sliding door on the Back (along with a bit of a lip) to mark it out. I drew up a lovely logo for the fridge, and had to talk Usopp out of using Merry’s figurehead. Not right to use the images of the dead without their family’s permission… Anyway. The logo on the fridge is a pretty goat lady, with the banner under her head reading ‘Milk’ in a jaunty font that I did let Usopp pick.

The big metal milk pails are what the milk comes to the Dairy in. We have very good to exquisite milking goats, of which we have three adults total and about five yearlings. All of them are pregnant, but it’s up to Mark’s discretion which kids will be kept, and which will be given over to Sanji’s kind ministrations. Now, I have glass containers for dairy products in a multitude of sizes; for fluids specifically, I have from half-pint to half-gallon in glass. I also have containers for pudding, custard, and yoghurt.

“How do you differentiate between different fat-contents in the milk, Missus Mab?”

“The cap color, Deborah. All the caps for all the containers are metal; for liquid milk, red is whole milk, purple is skimmed-cream milk, green is uncultured buttermilk, blue is cultured buttermilk—basically a liquidized yoghurt; brown is chocolate milk, pink is strawberry milk, or other red fruit or vegetable; yellow is coffee milk; orange is half and half, and purple, the last color, is cream.”

“Interesting; just like at the market!”

“Exactly so. The smaller containers for more solidified dairy products are labelled much the same way; plain white is for the basic flavor, then pink and yellow for their flavors respectively. I expect all the girls in the Suntides to spend time in the Dairy. Of course, the Dairy is also where eggs, cheese, and butter are prepared for the kitchen—so, I expect you’ll at least want to see what’s in there…”

“Uhn!”

“Heh. Now, where was I… ah yes, laundry chutes!”

A laundry chute is a mythic and deeply domestic space. It is the quintessentially unwatched door that goes nowhere; the open throat of the yawning abyss that is Below Stairs. The reputation of the laundry chute has as much to do with convenience as with the simple and profound realization that a house is not solid through and through. The laundry chute is a place where stains and embarrassing odors go to die, and dropping linens down the chute is a literal symbol of forgetting those embarrassing occasions and accidents. Most of a laundry chute is sealed behind walls, and this covert quality draws people to encounter such items that laundry chutes are explicitly built to contain.

Deborah, you need to understand right now; I see everything that happens to your laundry. I wash clothing for every member of this crew. I have absolutely no shame. About once a quarter, which is every three months— and coming up quite soon, as Imbolc draws near— I wash every single linen on the ship that isn’t in active use, like the sails. If ever there is something that you don’t want me to clean, you need to do it yourself; and chances are, I’ll still find out anyway.

Now; a chute is more like a place than a mechanism, it lacks certain qualities necessary for measure and attribution. No records exists describing the very first laundry chute. The earliest linen chutes on record were fabric sleeves threaded through the spaces that naturally gaped between rooms on the higher floors of the house. Similar to staircases, in that no one even vaguely knows who, when, or where staircases first came from; a laundry chute is too integral to the workings of a multiple story house in which a large number of people live and work for anyone to know where the first one came from.

Bulges were originally added to domestic walls to allow laundry chutes added after the building of the house the ability to pass their falling linens in large numbers. Sunny has two laundry chutes, one in each dorm; it’s helpful for keeping the men’s and women’s sheets separated— not for any perfuming reasons, but because I need to use different stain treatments on them, and I hate getting them mixed up. The stain treatment for body odor, ground in stains, and ejaculate is not the same as for blood, and mixing up the two will lead to a bad time all around.
In simple terms, the linen chute is a kind of integral space, similar to garbage, mail, ash, and grain chutes.

My childhood home in Thuletima, Sky Blue, has one of the oldest chutes for linen in existence. Owning a laundry chute often signals social and financial status in the same way that owning enough linens to get the family through a month without doing the washing does. Since the earliest times, the poor are often depicted as dirty and rank not because they wash their clothing and linens less often — in fact, they wash more often, as they have less clothing. However, due to popular culture being less concerned with the doings of the poor, the more visible, tidily kept rich became idealized and much discussed. The absence of soiled linens in common spaces take with them the common odors and stains attached to human processes-sweat, musk, farts, and so on.

You’ll also find laundry chutes in hospitals, often as far from the entrance as possible. Depending on the size of the institution using the chute, it can be used as an escape route; most asylums and prisons have a laundry chute. Every palace has a laundry chute.

“The Kitchen’s laundry chute is located right next to the sink; I would prefer if all kitchen linen used in the day is thrown down the chute at the end. Ah, here we are- hello, my love!”

“Hello, beloved!”

And then I’m making out with Sanji — just a little bit, as he’s holding a drawer full of… knives?

Goddamn I love my wife. I adore her. I especially love that she took over the boring part of outfitting Shrimp for working in my kitchen so I could focus on cleaning out a section of drawers for her to use. Including knives; I know she has a set of knives specifically for throwing, and there’s the massive giant’s petty knife- really a carver… but I don’t like that it’s the only kitchen knife she has to use that’s of any quality. She’s about to have a massive growth spurt, and the knife that worked so well for her before just won’t quite work for her later; she uses it as a chef’s knife, but it’s really not.

These knives I’ve got are all knives that I have for one reason or another, but I really only use six different knives; so these knives are just taking up space, at this point.

She needs six specific knives to cook; and, if any of the knives I have here already suit, she’ll get her name or symbol engraved on the hilt of each. Every chef should own a set of high-quality knives; they don’t have to match each other- mine certainly don’t- but they do have to be high-quality. Knife skills are the most vital lessons a chef can learn, and they carry over into every area of the kitchen — even dishwashing, where proper handling of knives can save you stitches.

“Hey Shrimp; c’mere and see if any of these knives suit. I’ve just got these ones to sort out- but here are all the chef knives I have and don’t use. I want you to have six knives total; Mab will make you the roll for carrying them with you, and you can get a steel from Franky later.”

“Okay, Casserole; what’s the point of a chef knife?”
“Well, Shrimp, first and foremost it’s a very versatile blade that you can use for everything from chopping vegetables to slicing meat. Pick one between twenty five and three hundred four millimeters; the handle should feel good in your hand, and it should neither be too heavy for you to lift, or too light to do the jobs you ask of it when you move with it.”

“Hmm. This one.”

“The Stardust? Alright; go ahead and pick a backup, then.”

“Sure… this one feels best. It’s not as good as my first choice, though.”

“Mm. This is mine; it’s sharp enough to take your fingers off at the knuckle if you don’t know what you’re fuckin’ doing. Until I’m absolutely sure you can handle a knife properly at speed… Shrimp, if you ever fucking touch this knife for any fucking reason other than you’re washing dishes and shit, it’s on the ground for some reason, or I’ve specifically asked you to that fucking day, I’ll kick your skinny ass across the horizon and back. Got it, Shrimp?”

“Yes, Chef!”

“Good. Next is a paring, or petty, knife. The petty knife is what you’ll use for smaller shit, like peeling garlic, strawberries, or chili peppers. All of my extras fall just above, at, or just below eighty nine millimeters. These knives are best for fine detail work and soft fruits and vegetables; it’s no good for harder root vegetables, like parsnips or beets. Pick two.”

“... These. They’re like the ones we had at home when Mom was teaching all of us how to cook; fuckin’ nostalgic.”

“Mm. Those are Wano-style house knives; good choice, and very distinctive if ever you’re working in another fuckin’ kitchen. I couldn’t get used to the shape, myself.”

“Heh. Yeah, it’s different, isn’t it? That’s why I like it, though; I’d never confuse them for chef knives, ever. Not even when they’re old.”

“True. This is mine; because it’s just a petty knife, Mab finally lost patience and made one for me. The hilt is one of Chopper’s dropped antlers, and the blade isn’t anything too special. I don’t mind so much if you use this one; in fact, you’ve got blanket permission from me, here and now. If you ever need a knife to cook with, and you can’t find or use any of yours, you can use this one and it’s fine. Be sure to wash it when you’re done, though.”

“Yes, Chef. Thank you.”

“Sure. Now, you’ll need utility knives. You won’t need it as often as your chef’s or your petty, but when you need something bigger than a petty but smaller than a chef’s, there you go. It’s also got a thinner blade than your chef’s. Really, this one is ideal for fruit, cutting pieces of meat, and sandwiches. These are all around one fifty two millimeters long.”

“Mm. I like this one for sure… and this one’s okay too, but a little wider than I’d like.”

“Yeah, that happens. This is my utility knife. Same rules as my chef’s. You use this without my express permission, I’ll kick your fuckin’ ass.”

“Yes, Chef!”

“Good. Bread knives are always serrated, so that they can cut through the mie without scarring it. I also prefer a serrated edge on waxy motherfuckers like vine apples, watermelons, citrus, and peppers.
You’ll only need one, and I’ll teach you how to use mine; I really only break it out for tea-time. Still, you should pick one.”

“Just one?”

“Just one.”

“Uh. Show me yours first, please?”

“Sure. This one’s mine.”

“Oh! Uh… I’ll take this one, then. That way, I won’t be able to make slices too big…”

“Never used one of these before?”

“Nope.”

“Well, you’ll learn. I actually want you to have four total boning knives. They’re thin blades, about the same length as your petty, with an extra sharp point. I want you to have four total because there are two broad categories of boning knives. Flexible, bendy blades are for poultry and fish; stiffer blades are for beef or pork. I want you to have two of each kind- so bend the blade before you pick.”

“Okay- Eeep!”

“Woah! You okay? Fuckin’ piece of shit, I knew I should have thrown that thing away-”

“Yeah, I- ugh, that was scary! Throw this shit out- um, I should sweep, too, there might be splinters-”

“Sure; I’ll throw this out.”

Fuck! Fuck fuck fuck fuck! Deep breath, shake Mab’s concern away, it's- fine, it's fine; I take the broken boning knife down to Franky’s junk pile. He’ll melt it down for sure; I don’t trust that blade for anything, now. Dammit!

Deep breath; deep breath. Fuck, Dad- how did you do this?

Anyway; back to work! Grab a snack on the way, though; since I’ve cut down to one smoke a day, I’ve started eating more. I’m slowly stepping back my food intake too; eventually, I’ll stop smoking entirely. Half-pint of uncultured buttermilk, and a few rusks. Better.

Deep breaths.

Okay, here we go.

“You done?”

“Yes Chef! I also picked the knives I want. These two for flex, and these two for stiff.”

“Right; these two are mine. I don’t want you to use these because I don’t want anyone except for me to ever touch them. Got it?”
“Yes Chef.”

“Good. Now- your Giant knife; do you still want to keep it in your kit?”

“Yes, I do.”

“That’s your carving knife, then. In my kitchen, you’re only to use that knife for cutting thin slices of meat, be it turkey, ham, beef tenderloin, or what have you. You’re already going to have a hell of a time learning to tighten up your gestures because you used a carver to do the things a chef’s woulda been suited for; I don’t want to reinforce the habit more than it’s already been. This is my carving knife; don’t you ever touch it. Deborah, I mean it; this Carving Knife is a Germa Blutsbrüderschaft. It will boil the blood in your veins. No one but me can touch this knife; not Captain, not Mab, not Zoro. No one. Understand?”

“Yes Chef!”

“Good. Now; sometime this week, you’ll go down to Franky’s Workshop and have him fit you with a honing steel. Right now, though, I’m going to give you a sharpening stone. Do you know how to sharpen a knife?”

“Uh. I’ve seen it done, chef.”

“Hm. You’ve got that picture-memory; some of your notes don’t make sense without taking that into account… still, it’s best you know how to do this. After all, the key to proper and efficient knife work is sharpness. A sharp knife is safer and faster because it fucking works; a dull knife will cut you to ribbons because you have to fuck up your gesture to make it work. You sent your knives out for servicing?”

“Yeah; I got a discount because I’d do barbecue for the guys down at the meatmarket.”

“Oh?”

“Hah, yeah- um, all the guys down at the meatmarket sharpen their own knives, right? Well, when I needed my Giant sharpened up again, I’d stop by, do shift on their barbecue pit, and one of ‘em would sharpen my knife. Pretty sure Emilio had a crush on me, but, um. No.”

“Alright. Well; here’s your stone. Feel it; one side is coarser, rougher, than the other.”

“Mm.”

“Rough, then smooth; keep your stone dry, even when you’re using it to sharpen. Generally speaking, you’ll want to sharpen your knives at an angle of about twenty-two degrees. You don’t know what that means, do you, Shrimp.”

“No, chef, I don’t.”

“Hrm. Mab!”

“-My love?”

“Put Mathemagic on the list of things you need to teach Deborah!”

“Alright-y!”

“Thank you! I’ll show you how to sharpen each of your knives; until you’ve got a muscle memory down, sharpen them in view of a mirror, okay?”
“Yes, chef.”

“Mab will teach you so that when I say things like ‘cut in this shape’ or ‘work at that angle’, you know exactly what I mean. Mathemagics are how specific information gets passed on through time in an exact manner; there’s no time to learn everything from scratch again. Now; I need the books,
Mab!”

“Here you are, Sanji, my love♥!”

“Thank you, darling♥! So. This is a new, unabridged copy of Le Guide Culinaire in the original French; and this is a copy of Le Répertoire de la Cuisine. The Guide will teach you quite a lot about the running of the professional kitchen; I’ll assign you reading out of it, and quiz you about various dishes in your reading. The Repertoire is a reference guide; your particular edition is sectioned out so that each chapter of the Guide has a corresponding chapter in the Rep. There are several more introductory-level cookbooks in the Library; part of your education will be looking up recipes and cooking methods in those cookbooks. This is a cookbook that digs into the science of cooking; it’s your third textbook for what I’m going to be teaching you. You’re to refer to it when you don’t understand what the dish being described is, or you’ve never encountered it before. I’ll also assign reading out of this, but I recommend reading this book before you read the Guide or the Repertoire, as if you’ve never seriously read a cookbook all the way through before, this is the one to start with.”

“Oh-”

“Uh-”

“Oh, yeah- these are your books. They aren’t Library books; they aren’t mine. They’re yours. Ask Nami, Taffy, Robin, Mab, or even Luffy how best to mark up a book to find information again.
Now, watch me do this- this is how to sharpen your knives...”

And I spend the next hour or so teaching my new sous chef how to sharpen her knives. She watches me very intently, and I can see her fingers twitching with the need to write down thoughts about what she’s seen.

Here’s a reason I love my wife that doesn’t come up in your average romantic tale; I love her for her practicality, and her anticipation of practical needs. Shrimp needs a notebook that won’t die in the kitchen; she also needs a uniform that can go over her clothing, an apron to keep her uniform mostly clean...

And, as always, my wife provides.

“Shrimp- walk with me. Bring your knives.”

“Yes, Chef!”

“Right. So, over here on the dining table, Mab’s set out most of your shit. What I’ll be explaining right now is your uniform. You are to wear your uniform at all times you’re working in the kitchen, the smokehouse, and the dairy. It’s also to be worn while you’re in the galley. You may wear your uniform bottoms outside the kitchen; you are to wear shoes at all times you work in the kitchen; and you are never, ever to wear your uniform top anywhere except for your work areas. Got it?”

“Yes, Chef!”

“Good. You don’t have to wear a skirt, by the way- you can wear pants if you’d prefer...?”
“I actually prefer skirts, Chef. I’m a woman, for one; and for another, until my web splits I won’t be able to wear most pants comfortably.”

“Right, you’re a mermaid; is there anything you wished you’d had during your previous work? Water bottle, cooling towel?”

“Yes.”

“Heh. Mab, can you-?”

“I’m already on it, love.”

“Thank you. This is your everyday carry notebook; it, along with this pencil, are your best friends while you’re in the kitchen. If you see you’re running out of space in it, there are more stocked in the Library; Robin or Zoro can show you where. The pencil is a standard school pencil, #2 graphite; Mab has a whole sack of clips, so don’t freak out if you loose the clip, got it? Same with the pencil; there are boxes of these things on this ship, so don’t worry about breaking it or losing it or wearing it out.”

“Yes, Chef!”

“Right. This is your knife case, and the sheathes for each of your knives; when you’re not cooking, put your knives in this case. Your boots are fine; I recognize that style. Those are steel toed, with non-reactive varnish; I expect you to wear shoes in that style every time you work. This is your apron, and I have one too. Mab measured them so that they’d fall below what on me is my knees, and on you is the… what, the bottom of your web?”

“Yeah, that’s about right.”

“Right; there will be days when I ask you to wear it specifically, and days when I’ll ask you not to wear it. It’s one of several safety precautions we both take in the kitchen to keep ourselves and our food safe, clean, and edible. You said you prefer scarves and bandannas to toques?”

“Yes, chef!”

“Right; until I see you cook in a slammed kitchen, I’ll be expecting you to cover your hair every time you’re working. This is the other crap that’ll come in handy when you’re working, or training; dishcloths. We use them for potholders and for wiping up spills and every used dishcloth goes in the chute at the end of the day. Go ahead and take notes, Shrimp, you’re here to learn.”

“Thank you.”

“Heh. Now, neckerchiefs- for you, they’ll be a vital part of your temperature regulation. I wore them during my training, but now my neckties and collars suffice. Mab will make you any style you like, as I don’t really have a specific requirement for how they should look; I do require that you wear a clean one every day.

“There are three saucepans you’ll be practicing and working out of; a saucepan, a sautepan, and an eleven liter stockpot. These have copper bottoms and stainless steel insides; the copper makes them heat evenly, and the steel cleans easy. They go in your section of the kitchen, which I’ll show you momentarily.

“You’ve already got your knives… Here’s the rest of your daily tools: bench scraper, spatulas- metal, straight, offset in a series of sizes; peeler, large balloon whisk, shears, pastry brush, corkscrew, tongs, measuring spoon set, measuring cup set, kitchen scale, instant thermometer… Bowl scraper, microplane, sheet-paper protectors, wooden spoon with a sharpened end; this is your turntable, for when you’re working with Taffy on cakes and candies; a bunch of squirt bottles, and a spray bottle.”

I’ve been stacking her things into the pots and pans, and then I hand the whole moderately heavy stack to her. I stalk over to the empty shelves where her work things are going to live. Then, I tell her to start putting her things away; everything she has will fit into the space I’ve allotted her.

It takes her a bit less than fifteen minutes to get everything squared away; then, I stalk back over to Mab, Shrimp right behind me.

“So, Deb. These are the contents of your bag; I’ve left room for you to add things, if you’d like, as well.

“Firstly, your bag - it’s good for all weather, and there’s a bottle opener in the male half of the clasp. There’s also a pocket here in the back you can put an icepack in so you don’t get swamp back… I’ve got four utility pouches filled for you, and if you find you need more, you’ve only to say.

“In the Orange pouch, there’s a box full of bobby pins and a few hair ties; a folding hair brush, a comb and mirror compact, and a travel bottle of that rose perfume I used when I put your hair up. Rose oil has antiseptic properties, and is very feminine besides. The kind I used actually gets stronger and more intense the more it gets heated; I think you’ll find at the end of the day when you take your hair down, you’ll stink the whole room up with rose-smell.

“In the Watermelon pouch, you’ve got a pack of tissues, a pack of baby wipes, condoms, lube, first aid kit, and quite possibly the tiniest lighter to ever exist. Oh, and before I forget to say it out loud- if you run out of anything, you need to tell me and I’ll show you where to get more from supplies. These aren’t your only supplies- they’re just the ones you can carry around with you off the ship. You seem like a person who likes being prepared…

“Now, for your menstruation, you’ll need to get measured by me, Taffy, or Chopper; then, we’ll fit you with a menstrual cup. Once that’s done, you’ll get a compact that can go in whichever pouch works best for you.

“In the Pitaya- or Dragon Fruit- pouch, you have lip balm, hand lotion, hand sanitizer, and space for any beauty products you find that you want to just have a stash of with you when you’re off the ship. I, personally, prefer a stash of dry shampoo and a stash of sunscreen on hand.

“Last is the Kiwi pouch; you’ve got peppermint beeswax gum wrapped in edible rice-paper, delicious snacks, and a pocket-box of spices. One of the phials in the pocket-box is empty, so you can put your own favorite spice in there; Sanji has one just like it on him right now. He keeps… what, masala?”

“Ester Masala, yeah.”

“I’ve got a few choices of clutch wristlet- it’s a wallet that can be carried as a small purse, if you’d like.”

“…That’s a thing?”
“Yeah, for when you just want to carry the absolute essentials around, rather than a whole bag of stuff. If you don’t want one, you can just have a coin purse, or-”

“No, I’ll take this one if it’s okay...”

“Sure. And a coin purse, too.”

“Hahaha! Cute!”

“Thank you, I thought so too. Now, Sanji’s given you your Daily journal, yeah?”

“Yeah, right here.”

“Hm. So- here. It’s a larger journal you can copy the best bits of your every day down into, or just use for whatever. This pouch is for all your extra pens, pencils, and highlighters; and this is your pencil case. I got you a pop-out one so you can’t confuse it with any of your other pouches, alright? I mean, if you don’t like it I’ll get you a different one, but I thought- oh, oh darling, come here-“

I don’t know why it is, but… for some reason, being given a pencil case like my mom would have given me is what breaks the icy shell around my grief. I start crying, and I don’t stop for what feels like forever.

When I come back to myself enough to see straight, I’m firmly sandwiched between Missus Mab, and Chef Sanji. Chef Sanji is purring just like Mom used to before she got so sick, and he’s warm like Mom was too, a-and Missus Mab is purring and- and-

There are ways to know if you love someone. Sometimes, it’s taking the time to get together all the things they’ll need for the first day of school, and getting them the cool pencil case because you’d have wanted a case like that, no matter your age. Sometimes, it’s combing all the mats and dead hair and skin out of a ragged pile of hair, cleaning and cutting it and coiffing it just so; and in a style that can be put under a scarf or bandanna without destroying it.

Sometimes it’s not about you at all.

I’ve only known Deborah as a person for a total of maybe two days- and yet, to hear her cry like this… it hurts. I hurt because she hurts. Sanji has tucked her head under his chin, and the deep rumbling from his chest I can only describe as purring is both soothing and worsening Deb’s grief.

Physiologically, Demons are a lot like cats. Their general anatomy is very similar, with incredibly strong and dense musculature, flexible skeleton system, quick reflexes, free-floating clavicles which allows them to fit through any space they can fit their head...

Demons can hear sounds at very quiet or very high frequencies; Sanji actually gets very annoyed if the phone is on for too long, as he can hear the transmissions the snails use to commune with each other. Sanji can see in near darkness; his sense of color is a bit… odd; and his sense of smell, on this crew, is only outmatched by Buttercream, and even then he picks up things she simply can’t.
Despite their cultural bias towards solitary lifestyles, Demons are as human as the rest of us, and need socialization. Thus, they have a variety of tribe-specific vocalizations, pheromones, and nuanced body language. For example; when Sanji is genuinely frightened, usually during or right after one of his worse nightmares, his tail will fluff up to more than twice its normal size.

It’s easy to assume that demons purr because they’re happy; after all, when my demon husband is curled up around me after a round of lovemaking, his chest all rumbly and warm, I know he’s happy and content right where he is.

However, demons also purr when they’re frightened, or feel threatened- like when I cut Sanji’s hair, and I have to clip on the nape of his neck. He hates that; says the feeling of it is… too weird. Basically, it’s like smiling; I smile when I’m happy, sometimes- actually, no, I really don’t- but I know I… it has to be called smiling because that’s how you describe the exact movement of facial muscles and teeth. When I do it though, the only thing I can really equate it to is ‘baring my teeth’.

Purring isn’t something only Demons can do, of course; unless they’ve been brain damaged in a very specific way, almost every human being can purr on reflex- or, if they’re like me, they can be taught to purr in vocal training. There’s a specific piece of brain called the ‘oscillatorus’; it controls repetitive action. I use it every time I go through a kata, or sew a piece of fabric. With training, the oscillatorus can be connected to the part of the brain that controls the voice box; in demons, the oscillatorus is connected to the voice box automatically.

The actual mechanics of purring, as far as I know, is thus: the oscillatorus sends messages to the laryngeal muscles, causing them to twitch at a rate of twenty five to one hundred fifty vibrations per second. This causes the vocal folds to separate when the human- demon or otherwise- inhales and exhales, producing a purr. (Fae can naturally scream from birth- and not the emotional screaming that brings up feelings and tension in the body, but like… metal-head screaming, where if you do it wrong you’ll spit blood. I never had to learn the proper technique for that.)

For a long time, it was assumed that humans that can roar- Fae, Giants, Seafolk- and humans that can purr- Demons, Longarms, Minks- could never do the other, and vis a vis. In fact, this is more to do with cultural bias than actual inability. The Tribes that roar were mainly nomadic, and needed a very far-reaching method to communicate with their family. The Tribes that purr were not so nomadic, and didn’t so desperately need a way to keep in contact with each other.

Purring is also a way to heal yourself. Frequencies between twenty four and one hundred forty vibrations per minute are therapeutic for bone growth, pain relief, muscle and tendon repair, respiration easement, and wound healing. Deborah’s actually been purring every time she’s been conscious since Chopper took her off the heavy sedatives.

Sanji’s purr is a very even, mellow sound, a bit higher pitched than you’d expect from hearing his voice. Deborah’s purr is not at all like Sanji’s; loud, two distinct pitches, and just a lot more noise than you’d expect from someone so thin and small.

The best I can do without sustained, intense practice is something like a guinea pig’s purr. I just don’t purr often enough to do it on the inhale and the exhale like Deb and Sanji do; for me, it’s on the exhale every time, unless I’ve trained at it before hand.

Anyway, Deborah has almost cried herself out, and… well, there’s no better place to do something like that than between two purring adults. I can see now that I’m in close… that’s right, she did stop at the sink in the laundry before she came up here, didn’t she? I suppose that’s when she put her ear cuffs on.
The shape of the Suntide Black lineage begins to reveal itself; it’s only selkies that wear ear-cuffs specifically, and roses are for… hm. Grandiflora in gold wire is a very old, very specific style; reserved for the Vinsmoke family alone.

Sanji, look at her ears.

Mab- what. What! Why- how does she have-

You’ll have to talk to her about that; she’s the oldest of her line, now.

…

Sanji, even if the rest of them are shit, you’re not. Ask her! At worst, you’re just wrong; it’s okay! only because I know you won’t let this go.

Thank you, my eyes!

Of course, honeybee.

“Hey, Shrimp?”

“Y-yeah, Chef?”

“Where’d you, ah, get your ear-cuffs?”

“...Um. They were my mom’s before me; all of us siblings have a pair, even Sancho, and he was only adopted by the heart...”

“...So they’re heirlooms?”

“Yeah, why?”

I hear Sanji sigh through his purring, and then he takes his hand and scruffs his hair back from his face, showing off both his curling eyebrows. Then, he hooks the wide sheaf of his heavy hair behind his ear, to show off the ear-cuffs I… acquired for him. It’s not stealing if it’s already yours, right?

Right.

“So; I recognize your earcuffs because I’ve seen a set just like them on my grandmere. We have the same bloodtype, which is line-based; and now that I’m close up, I can see that your eyebrows are about to do the curly thing mine do, in the same direction, even.”

“...Um.”

“I think we’re cousins.”
Have you ever had a Witch’s broom in your hands and wondered how it actually flies? A witch’s broom can look like an ordinary sweeper to the uninitiated. Mine certainly does—did. Will?

Ugh. How Fern does this all the time— for money, even!— I’ll never know…

Maybe it’s idle curiosity; maybe you’re a witch yourself, and on the hunt for a new hobby-horse.

Maybe you could only do your legal, nursing work about once or twice a week and needed a reasonably steady flow of cash. Maybe your mother taught you how to fly her old-fashioned Bottleneck before she got sick, and you’ve been using it to run family errands and drop people off for their days for a while now. Maybe you took on a daily courier’s job and got so bored with it—steady money, but so goddamn boring!—maybe you learned to fly the delivery route as fast as you possibly could. Maybe those old family-style brooms made about ten to twenty years ago are improbably perfect for street-racing.

That’s a lot of maybes, but here’s some facts about flying broomsticks.

The principle behind any flying broomstick is this: if you put a thaum of magic— which is the amount of magic needed to change a card pulled from a fanned hand into the card required, one white pigeon, or three billiard balls— excepting the eight-ball, which requires one and a half thaums to create, every time— if you put a thaum of magic into a narrow, pipe-like space and give it a jolt, like the kickoff motion of every witch taking off and landing, an incredible amount of energy is released in the form of a self-contained floating field. That energy can then be used to float a wedding cake a thousand feet in any direction for eight hours.

If you set up a cycle that allows for thaums to be jolted in this manner, hundreds of times per minute, they can be harnessed in a useful way. This is the core of the flying broomstick.

Almost all flying brooms currently in use and production use what is known as a four-stroke thaumic bounce cycle to convert thaums into motion. The four strokes of the cycle are as follows; the intake stroke, the compression stroke, the bouncing stroke, and the exhaust stroke. Here’s what actually happens in the broom as the thaums go through the bounce cycle.

First, the jumping beans start at the top of the broom-shaft, the intake valves open, and the beans move down their courses to let the broom take in a stick-full of thaums. This is the intake stroke, and only a single thaum is required for this to work.

Then the beans move back up the shaft to compress the thaum/air mixture. Compression makes the jolt more powerful.

When the beans reach the top of their stroke, the striker emits a spark to jolt the thaum. The thaumic charge in the cylinder bursts, driving the beans down again.

Once the beans hit the bottom of their stroke, the exhaust valve opens and the exhaust leaves the cylinder to go out the tailbristles as colored smoke.

And then the cycle repeats.

The beans move in a linear manner because the broom’s main form of motion is linear as well; all turns are really anglings of that linear motion.
Now, the parts aside from the main bean-bouncer are as follows. The striker supplies the jolt that electrifies the air/thaum mixture so that bouncing can occur. The jolt must happen at just the right moment for things to work properly. The oldest brooms require the witch using it to jump-start their broom, or even take a running start to activate the striker; newer models only require a light kickoff to go.

There are only two valves; the intake, and the exhaust. They are both closed during compression and bouncing so that the jolt chamber is sealed. The intake valve is somewhere between the hand grip and the saddle of the broom- exactly where varies model to model- and the exhaust is always in the broom head, usually before the final row of stitching.

The bean is actually a cylindrical piece of metal, wood, horn, or bone that moves up and down inside the cylinder. It’s referred to in the plural form for convenience’s sake.

There are a series of rings that provide a sliding seal between the outer edge of the valves and the inner edge of the broomstick, where the beans reside. The rings are there for two reasons: they prevent the thaum/air mix and exhaust in the jolt-chamber from leaking into the sink during compression and combustion; and they keep water in the sink from leaking into the jolt area, where it would be electrolysed into hydrogen and oxygen, and cause a massive explosion, followed by a burn on the bristles. Usually not fatal, but fairly dangerous and embarrassing. A broom that tends to ‘burn and gasp’ and has to have a pint of water added every thousand kilometers has old rings that don’t seal things properly. Is it a pain in the ass to replace them? Sure. Does replacing them mean you’re not burning your bristles and blistering your ass every thousand kilometers or so? Hell yes.

The connector yoke connects the saddle to the weft. It pivots on a specialized hinge so that it’s angle can change as the witch shifts on the broom. Experienced flyers can control the speed of intake and exhaust by shifting their weight on the broom; thus, a properly tuned and turned yoke is of vital importance in sport-flying models of broomstick. It’s also your main braking system while flying at low speeds, as the amount of linear front to back shift on the saddle is directly proportional to how wide the intake and exhaust valves open and shut.

The weft turns the bean’s linear motion into turns, just like the rudder on a boat does. A weft is usually hidden under a selection of bristles. To keep it’s motion smooth and even, it needs to be kept pliable and cool with water. Alcohol, with it’s quicker evaporation rate, is used in high-speed models rather than water, and various other coolants are available.

The sink surrounds the weft. It contains some amount of water, which collects in the bottom of the sink (the water bottle). The water bottle itself is anything that can attach to the sink and contain adequate amounts of cooling fluid. Hot water bottles are popular.

Because of the simplicity of the overall flight system of the flying broomstick, there’s really not all that much that can go wrong. There are only three things that can actually happen to keep you from flying: a bad fuel mix, a lack of compression, and a lack of spark. Any number of little nuisances can make or break your day; but these are the big three that can say if you will… or if you will not.

Your fuel mix is where your Power comes from, and a bad mix can occur in several ways. You can run out of available thaums, so the broom is getting air but no fuel. The best way to fix that is take a rest for a few days or even weeks to replenish your magic stores, or install a mage stone as an external thaumic source. The air intake might be clogged, so there are thaums, but not enough air. Solving this problem is a bit trickier; for the most part, the only thing to be done is either get a different style broom, or shell out for the needle nose or hog nose modification. Looks like hell, and makes it much easier to exhaust your thaumic reserves. The fuel/air might not be mixing correctly-either you’ve got too much or not enough air in with the thaums. Although only one thaum is required to jolt, you need at least three breaths of air to get that first spark to catch into a jolt, and then it’s self sustaining. Not enough air, no jolt. Too much air, and you’ll stutter. Finally, you can have impurities in the fuel mix. This happens when you’ve got a heavy breather that sucks down thaums before blowing them all at once.

Power must be tempered by Wisdom and used with Courage.

The second major problem a broom can have is a lack of compression- if the fuel mix can’t be compressed properly, the jolt won’t go like it should. You get a lack of compression from a very few things: your rings are worn out, your valves ain’t sealing right, or there’s a hole in your broomstick’s shaft. Wisdom is knowing when to replace your rings, your valves, or your shaft before they bust on you and cause more problems than your broom is worth.

Wisdom must be backed by Power and guided with Courage.

There are only three reasons for your striker not to spark. If your striking pin, or the stone it jumps off of is rotted, the spark will be weak. If the striking pin is missing altogether, or if the stone it jumps off is gone, there won’t be no spark. If the spark happens too early or too late in the cycle, the fuel won’t ignite and the broom won’t go.

Courage must be reigned in by Wisdom and fortified with Power.

Power alone is a beserker- that’s how you get them Wessen Crotchrockets. They feel nice on the nethers, and then you’re left with a handful of splinters betwixt your thighs and a burning fire on your ass.

Wisdom alone is a manipulator- that’s all those hoity-toity F1 racin’ brooms are, manipulative twitch-sticks. If you have to be grinding on your broom like a hooker on a dick, then you’ve got no business bein’ on no fly-girls racin’ team.

Courage alone is a fool- that’s what them thrill-riders are. If you need to jump off a cliff to start your broom, girl.

Wisdom and Courage are useful for direction; Wisdom and Power say how to use that direction; Power and Courage say you will go somewhere- and all three together say you will Not.

There are other things that can go wrong, of course- if the bristles dry out, you’ll have a hell of a time doing soft maneuvering; if the bearings that allow the yoke to move the weft get worn out, you won’t be turning at all; if the valves get stuck or get mistimed, your intake and exhaust won’t work and your broom won’t fly; if you run out of water, the bristles can’t move as freely as your flying might require, and you’re liable to flame them fuckers out.

In a properly maintained broom, all of the necessary factors are within flying tolerance.

Some say that I was the one to pull The Sword Of Promised Victory from it’s stony bed, and I am the True Ruler of the Realm. Some say that I naturally face Trunorth, and that my sweat could be used to clean precious metals. Some say that I blink sideways, and that once I actually punched God.

All I know is, they call me ‘The Kid’ and I’m not too sure why. I have tits, dammit! And hips! Tits and hips!
I once had to make do with a mage’s staff that I stuck a handful of gull feathers over the back of and tied some leather down onto t'keep from sliding off. Won five hundred thousand beri that day.

So- some people say you need a good personal store of magic to make a broom fly. That’s not quite right; a broomstick has it’s own intrinsic magic, and can store a limited amount of magical energy. The flyer of the broom is required to replenish the thaums- either with their own store of magic, or by adding mystic stones, which changes the weight of the broom.

So, what do I wear for days I’m not working as a nurse?

Firstly, I clean my face off; I wear a thick layer of pancake foundation over my face during nursing days to protect my skin from surface contamination. Clean it off at the end of the day, and you’ve got a layer of ultra soft skin; and the sparkling freckle-scales from your unknown father sparkle golden under your eyes. Take the hairclip out and let your bangs flop back down over your eye, like you like; put your earcuff back in, and eat the first of many, many lollipops.

Quitting smoking is a pain in the goddamn ass.

I have two outfits for racing in; I only change the outer layers when the seasons turn around. It’s basic layers are a pair of cycling smalls, and some plain white thigh-high socks. Spring and summer, I wear a sighing-grey skater dress, a soft green-printed scarf, and a pair of bright red Chelsea boots. I get called the ‘Comely Kid’ a lot during the Spring and Summer, but that’s… I mean. Okay?

Winter sees me add a two-tone leather vest I got at a thrift-store; and I must say, that vest saved my bubble butt more than once. Speaking of bubble butts, in a miniskirt made of holographic green fish scales, and a thick flannel button down, my ass looks damn fine under that grey dress. I recently added a pair of windshear fleecey tights and some of the wind-chafing issues I’d been having before cleared right up.

So, here's why all that shit about how broomsticks fly even matters. When you get down to brass tacks, the speed of a broom is determined by how fast your beans can jump. Replacing the beans in a Bottleneck to make it a Bottle-rocket is simple; staying on the Bottlerocket when you let'er rip is not.

Thankfully, the people I'm running from are all flying standard Sweezy Sticks. They're fast, maneuverable, and painfully easy to overwork; a Sweezy can't hold up to the abuse even flying through the exhaust of my Bottlerocket dishes out. Even unmodified, a Bottleneck can go for days without needing a drink of water, and only pulls minimal thaums from the flyer. After I modified it, I discovered that I have a huge store of magic inside of me, and it replenishes faster than my broom can draw on it. It's been days since I last flew; and these bozos are basically couriers with a side-line in leg breaking. They want to catch me; I aim to misbehave.

Of course, it's not all guns and roses- Bottle Rockets are great for drag racing, and not so much for the F1 shit I have to pull to keep away. Every time I spark a liftoff and hit that shit, I yank about a quarter of my available reserves into the blowout, and lose half the thaums on the turns. Not to mention the fact that this is no Fair fight; I've got guys on both sides trying to hem me in, at least one guy behind me, and considering this is the Spellbreaker Gang, at least two up ahead.

Here's my exit, though- a narrow little hole in the brick and mortar of Corallia's alleyways. I reach into my flight pocket on the small of my back and fling a handful of smokebombs to keep 'em honest about their failings in life. The smoke plumes out in tangled drifts of green; those stains will never come out of the laundry hanging on the lines above. It shouldn't be this complicated to deliver a passel of Funeral Notices and Invitations. Gods blood and sweat- if these assholes hadn't decided that now was a fine time to get some revenge, I could have been done by now.

It's not like I'm even that good at racing! So maybe I bet on myself to make outlandish comebacks, and maybe the Spellbreakers used to be the top-tier street sweepers, and maybe my meteoric rise to top-level racing came at the cost of their reputations and most of their money.

That's a lot of maybe's to contend with; here's a fact for you. I got good at racing through a series of events that can only be described as 'coincidence' or possibly 'fate'. Or rather- I got the opportunity to seriously train as a racer through fate; the actually nitty-gritty instinct; the talent, the drive, the skills that make the Spellbreakers frothy with rage? That's all down to hardcore practice, babe.

I slide through the Hole in the Wall and cut my exhaust- it'll build up terribly, but as I'm on a public street, exhaust emission laws are much stricter and I can't afford a ticket right now.

Last stop: Mermaid Cafe, and Keimi the Freebird. She's the leader of the local Post Office, and my indirect gatekeeper to the World of Alleycat Races; she's also an inveterate gossip, and one of the few people I want to invite to my mother's funeral personally. I hunker down on my broom and lean into the wall, then kick with my left foot and hang tight as my broom spins on it's bristles, nose towards the sun. I let go on the third spin, and swing my broom up onto my shoulder; the thaumic exhaust starts to accumulate in the sink.

I don't have much time.

Keimi is working the counter today, and she only squeaks a little as I come to boot-crashing attention directly in front of her. Her spine snaps straight in response, and she accepts the blank white envelope with both hands. I take the bottle from my broom, take a bottle of baiju from behind the bar and pour two shots of the powerful spirit into the thaumically reactive fluid. Then I drain the bottle, and shudder. There's about half a shot left in the bottom; Keimi takes the bottle from me, and drains the rest before shaking her head in resignation.

"I'll tell everyone who needs to know. You can count on me, Kid."

"Thanks, Kei. Always good to know who I can count on to be a massive blabbermouth."

"Hah."

I fill the bottle with baiju and put it back under the bristles, right where it should go in the sink. Then, I walk to the window over the bar sink behind the bar, and pop it open. I can smell Spellbreaker exhaust from here- a rank smell of liquorice and piss. I pause, just a moment. There's one more thing I can do to make my broom as fast and maneuverable as possible. I can put on my Cherumib Blackbird broomring. Four magic stones, four sets of wings, and the bronzed skull of a Black Raven. Clip it onto the tip of the broom and things start to happen immediately. The intake nostrils get thin tubes of diamond hard brass tucked into them; the bristles flex and wriggle as wings take form.

The broom in my hands writhes with power and excitement. I push another fourth of my magic into the broom, supercharging the whole of the beast. I mount; I aim. Keimi let out a whooping cry of joy as I took one soft step out into the air and shot off like a- well, like a bottle rocket. I spun like a top and ducked the Spellbreaker's bats and knives, and then flew like never before. In racing, they say that your car goes where your eyes go. The flyer who can't tear their eyes away from the wall as they spin out of control will meet that wall; the flyer who looks back as they feel their bristles burst into flames will burn their ass.

On a given day, a given circumstance, you think that you have a limit. If you then go for this limit and you touch it, and you think, 'Okay, this is the limit'. Then you actually touch this limit, and something happens; suddenly, you can go a little bit further. You can move a little bit faster; you can fly just a little higher. With your mind power, your determination, your instinct, and the experience as well, you can fly very high...

The broom clip isn't there to make my broom faster, not really. It's there to help me control my broom.

Maybe if I was closer to eighty one kilograms instead of seventy five, I wouldn’t need a wing-ring; maybe if I could moderate my thaumic intake such that my bottlerocket didn’t pull a full quarter of my available reserves, I wouldn’t need four charmstones; maybe if I hadn’t needed the money so badly, I wouldn’t have so completely ruined the Spellbreaker’s faces.

Lots of maybes; here’s two facts, this time.

Fact one: Races are won or lost in key moments. The only way to know if a moment like that has happened is to go through it; and by experience, discover which moments in a race tend to be key, and which moments aren't.

Fact two: Success in the sport of racing is, above all else, about enduring suffering. In truth, winning a broom race has exactly nothing to do with racing, or how good your broom is, or how high your skill is, or even how much you deserve a win. Winning is about struggle, and effort; it’s about lining all your shots in a row and knocking them down one after the other.

Speed isn’t what kills people; it’s the hard stops that manage it. Suddenly becoming stationary is the real danger of using wing rings and spellstones. If your broom is pulling from your personal reserves, it automatically takes part of your thaumic intake to produce a braking cushion. If your broom is using spellstones or charmstones or whatever to fly, there’s no hard-wired way to keep a reserve of thaumic energy for braking purposes.

Normal brooms can’t pull more than the available thaums from the flyer to fly; modified brooms, technically speaking, can. My broom is, at it’s core, a Bottleneck. It’s a family-oriented broom, and it belonged to my mother before me; at the time of it’s construction, it was the most luxurious flying broom on the market. It has so many safety features built into it, it’s a wonder I can race with it at all-even if I do suddenly run out of propulsor thaums, the broom itself still has enough magic to keep me from dying.

Maybe even enough to keep anyone I end up crashing into from dying too. Maybe even enough to keep the exhaust from thaumically poisoning anyone who gets exposed to it accidentally. Maybe, just maybe, even enough to outtrace the very Wind itself- for a time.

Three Facts, and then we finish this.

Fact one: Memory is time folding back on itself. To remember is to disengage from the present moment; and any kind of success in broom racing depends on a powerful connection to the present. For the best success, a flyer can never remember.
Fact two: the best flying brooms are reliable, above all else. I don’t need a broom that can outrace the Wind; I don’t want a broom that can sweep me off my feet. I want a broom that will fly with me, time after time, through any kind of weather. My mom’s broom is a reliable broom. It’s head is shaped like the tail of a rooster; it’s bristles are made of some fine black grass I can never remember the name of. It’s shaft is made of a single, extremely fine-grained piece of white timber bamboo. It’s bound with horsehair and sinew, and stitched with threads that shimmer gold in the light.

Fact three: even if my broom has enough thaums to outrace the Spellbreakers, and get me back to the Thousand Sunny before the No Fly rules come into effect, it doesn’t have enough to stop me safely and survive the crash.

I come in hot; the baiju in my bottle bought me just enough time. The crash is tremendous, sending me end over end as I roll across the lawn deck and slam to a stop against the main mast. There’s a horrendous cracking noise, and the stink of vaporized spirits.

The wingring chimes as it rolls across the deck, and the skull bounces into a coil of rope, where it chatters to itself noisily. Inky, who was sunning by the main mast, is now wriggling all over my chest and face, smearing mud and- ugh- other things over me in a wild expression of concern.

Thank you, Inky, that’s- that’s great, thanks.

I shove myself upright, Inky’s writhing roots squirming across my stomach and lap, little squeaks of worry escaping it’s pale white mouth and glinting in it’s leaf-green eyes- and it’s just as I feared. My broom is snapped clean in half, the head removed from the shaft in a splintered line.

I take each piece in my hands, and stare at them in a sort of shocked horror. I knew this was how it would go if I ever had to use my wingring: I just… this was one of the only things that was just mine and mom’s, y’know? None of the others really took to flying the way I did.

And now it’s. Broken. I kinda thought at worst I’d burn the bristles out, or, or have to replace the rings and beans again, but this- I can’t... I can’t ever use this as a broom again.

Inky wraps his- hers- it’s roots around my waist and hips, and I carefully stagger to my feet. I pick up my wing ring, and put it in my pocket; the skull goes in the other pocket, still chattering and squarking with nerves. The broom pieces I pick up and carry with me towards the bathroom.

I think I pass by someone- I guess they say something?

I stop, and turn- and it’s Nami and Taffy, staring at me wide eyed. I think I might be crying, or something.

“Hey- uh- something wrong with your magic, Jen?” said Taffy, cringing.

“Flying used to be fun until I had to do it for a living. Now that my broom’s broken, I can’t even fly anymore- so, uh. I guess if you just need a nurse, that’s fine. I’m not sure how much use I’ll be otherwise. Anyway, I have to, uh, I have to wash all this off.” I said, trying not to croak on my tears.

“Jenny, wait-” said Nami, but I was already scrambling up the ladder and I don’t- I don’t talk about my feelings. I never have.

I’m not about to start now.

The hardest part about being in the middle is that no one remembers you; everyone remembers Deborah, she’s… she’s incredibly herself, every moment, she’s herself. You remember Adelaide, too; she’s got a focus and a violence coiled in her frame that just… you don’t forget something like that. My other sisters have their own memorable pieces to them: you remember Ellie because you get swindled so masterfully, or you remember tiny sets of fists destroying you as she waddles off with all your shit; you remember Cece because she’s a genuine master of modern clowning, and you remember Horizon- or Sancho, since it’s not official- because he’s seven feet of gangle at Cece’s side, always. Beatrix you remember as a sort of shadow on the back wall, watching everything; Genevieve, as a cheerful figure either patching you up or outracing you on a broom, again.

That just leaves me. Fernanda; I don’t really go on strange adventures.

I go to the Corallia Market most days, and I sit on a park bench under a pavilion, and I set up my little handpainted sign and ring a bell; people stop by for their fortunes to be told, and I tell them the truth, as I see it.

The first Sight I ever had was of my mother’s dead body; how it had sunken in on itself, withered away from Mist Fever, the blood at her mouth from where she’d tried to cough the miasma out… I’d just finished Secondary, and I didn’t have any plans for College, and Mom- Mom was there with me, and had a softer version of the Sight, and Saw what I did.

Mom told me, then and there, that with that powerful a Blessing, I’d best make use of it to earn a living. We both knew she wouldn’t be around forever to support us, after all- and so, I started going to the edge of Dunshilly and Coralia, in the Cafe District. Madame Shyarly’s Mermaid Cafe is in the other Cafe District, on the Coralia and Gobdark side of Coralia; and so I didn’t have any competition.

My office is pretty simple; it’s a park bench, in one of the public parks across from the nicer Cafe where I usually have lunch, under a pavilion that makes a pleasing sound when it rains. There’s a small table made out of milk crates that I take home with me, and a folding chair too; and my sign.

Fortunes Told! 500 Beri per 3 card spread or 3 Dice Roll; 1000 Beri upcharge every added card or die.

Spells Sold! 600 Beri per cantrip; 2000 Beri upcharge every added spell level.

Get Talismans Here! 700 Beri per object; 3000 Beri upcharge every modification.

All Sales Final; Absolutely NO Substitutions, Exchanges, Coupons, or Refunds.
That day, I’d taped on some paper that read ‘One free Ice Pop per PAYING CUSTOMER; extra Ice Pops 150 Beri per.’

It was a very hot summer. That particular day was the hottest on record for fifty years- I’d had one customer: S’becky, the Dim Sum Lady, who also sold me my lunch and bought half my ice pops outright. Hence why I was about to pack it in and go to the beach- too damn hot, y’all.

And then, of course, someone sat across from me on the wooden folding chair. Well, actually, they sort of collapsed into the chair- he, he sort of collapsed into the chair.

I immediately winced as my precognition violently sparks through the Aether; huh. Guess I’m spending the rest of the day with this fool, then.

First, to save him from heat stroke. I unbuckle my right glove and reach out; press the flat of my palm against his tattooed forehead. He’s in a bad way; his skin is colder and clammy than mine on a normal day, which is not right at all for Lanjin, and he’s dripping with sweat. I open my cooler and pull out my water bottle.

“Drink this before you pass out, stupid Hierophant.” I said, carefully holding the open bottle to his lips.

He drank, glassy black eyes sunken into his head.

I pulled out a small spray bottle I usually use to scare off cats; but he needs to cool down a lot, by the gods. I refilled the spray bottle with meltwater from my cooler and started spraying the Hierophant down, every inch of his exposed skin. I then strip him down- right there in the middle of the park.

I should mention that my sign is in the light, but I’m actually just under a shady pavillion? So anyway; I strip the guy of all his heavy clothing, completely wrong for the season. Eventually, he’s down to his frilly white shirt and his small clothes.

S’becky’s going to be by again with clothing he can wear but I’ll need a- okay, I can make a christening charm, okay. I walk around the table and carefully move the slightly dripping man from the chair, which is under dappled light, to the other side of the table, which is fully under the shadow of the pavillion. I make him kneel and then lay full out on the ground, deep in the shade; the slab underneath us is marble, and holds a chill even in weather like this.

I took his boots and socks off already; so, now I just put his feet up on the bench.

There’s a small fan that I usually don’t use because it disturbs my Fortune Cards; but I’ve had them put away for a good hour or so, and so I just turn the fan on and angle it so most of the cool breeze is going on the Hierophant.

He’ll recover soon enough, and be very hungry and disoriented- idiot didn’t eat anything of substance at all. Well… I don’t actually need a table to do everything I do, just a flat surface. I carefully fold up his clothing, and tuck his clothes under his head like a pillow. I take a tenugui from my bag and dunk it in the ice water, fold it just right and lay it over his forehead. The Hierophant sighs under my ministrations, and slowly comes out of his overheated state.

The Dim Sum Lady, Starbecky, is actually really nice. She’s never once remembered a name unless it’s been written down, but she’s really nice anyway. Her twin brother, Bucky, is also really nice, although he’s kind of a piece of shit... Anyway, Bucky got married a year or so ago, and S’becky bought the most auspicious wedding date off of me, and- well, I ended up becoming real friends with S’becky, and uh. Well.

Bucky and his wife, Cody Jo, have been trying to have babies for a while now. I haven’t been able to See any indication of Cody getting pregnant at any point; but... well. I know fertility problems run in Cody’s family; and Bucky just wants to raise a family with her, it doesn’t really matter... Aha.

There it is; my charm starts with a charm bracelet meant for a fisherman’s wife originally. Then I start adding the other charms; stingray comes to my fingers first. Stingray symbolizes... ‘everything being in place’; the stingray symbolizes having the required knowledge, the means, the tools, and the skills- now get on with it. No more hesitation; no more running away. Stingray tells you to have faith in your abilities and follow your inner guidance.

Octopus comes next, in gold and heavy to my senses; agility, flexibility, grace, adaptability. The one who learns; the one who seeks. They’re going to need her guidance.

Bells to call the spell to Order; they ring in purity and preparation. Command and warning bound in two; the ringing of the bell calls the illusion and truth of the World to Order with every chime. The new World comes on the ringing of the Ox Bell; the Fairy Bells shall ring out in the Night, ere the New Queen Rises from the Depths. The Bell’s voice pierces through the lies you tell yourself; you were warned, and you did not listen, and so the bell rings on.

My fingers touch the last charm I can put on this Talisman- Stork! And before my Eye there forms the cloudy-clear image of Cody with longer hair, smiling with joy at a baby, their joyful laughter mingling and this finished bracelet wrapped around Cody’s arm.

Done.

“I suppose; not every Seer is good at every kind of divination, after all.” I said.

“...So that’s why I had to come here, now.” said the Hierophant.

“I’m not so sure I’m more powerful; I’m definitely more mercenary than you’ve ever been.” I said.

“You’re a powerful Seer; stronger than I was at your age.” he said.

“I can turn my precog off, yes; but it’s a bit of a pain when it’s this hot out. Lemme see what I’ve got that isn’t so stifling...” I said.

“Could you stop doing that? It’s very hard to have a conversation with you.” he said.

And then I started digging around in my bag; not my for sale bag, my actual ‘me stuffs’ bag.
When I started this small business, I started to carry around a small, pocket book sized bag in my backpack. It started out as a way for me to keep a few things that were of particular use around at all times. Things like the eye mask that I use as a focus for blocking out my precognition, or the jewelry sets that can do the same if I can’t use the eye mask for some reason. I’ve got a bottle of very special anointing oil; a sanctified knife; and some very lucky coins. Over the years, I add other things that start to become important- or at the very least, important to have on me to feel fully dressed and ready to go. A crystal here, a pendant there, a spool of linen-thread; it was never something I was necessarily intentful about, but… I just sometimes needed these particular things together, and if I suddenly needed my collection of tradable enamel pins or a tiny bottle full of sand, I’d have them with me ready to go.

Honestly, when you get down to the tacks and threads of it, my big sales backpack is mostly just Boffo; this smaller bag is also mostly Boffo, but it’s Boffo for me, not my customers. For some reason, no one’s really willing to believe that a short haired girl in a sunflower kaftan is a Genuine Oracle and Witch.

I mean- I guess it’s because of all the Oracles, it’s not many who have such wild variation in what they can actually use for divination… After all, there are many, many types of divination. Divination is an umbrella term encompassing a wide, weird range of styles and types, a bizarre and baffling collection of methods of future prediction that fit under the umbrella. Since the earliest of days, humans have sought after signs to predict their future and guide themselves along the correct path.

Ah. Here we go- my eye bangles, and my bindi sheet. My bangles get split to each hand more or less evenly, so I can channel my future-vision through my fingers instead of my head; the bindi goes over my third eye, as a literal mask.

As for actually blocking my precognition; the best method I have is a sort of meditation where I go over all the divination methods I know of, in alphabetical order. Really, a bit like I’m reading out of a dictionary, although no dictionary for divination exists, nor textbook- I checked.

Aeromancy: Divination through interpreting atmospheric conditions, divided into several subtypes. Austomancy (wind); Ceramnscopy and Keramancy (Thunder & lightning); Chaomancy (Aerial visions); Meteromancy (Meteors, Shooting Stars)

Ailuromancy: a type of Zoomancy

Alectormancy or Alectromancy or Alectryomancy: Divination through observing birds (often roosters) pick through scattered grains and marking the “cock’s crow” as letters from the alphabet. (e.g. the rooster pecks at three grains and crows, denoting the letter “c”)

Aleuromancy: Divination through messages written on paper and inserted into dough. (e.g. Fortune Cookies). Another method involves reading the residue left in a flour/water container.

Alomancy or Halomancy: Divination through interpreting spilled salt.

Alphitomancy or Cursed Bread: Determining a guilty party by feeding them a loaf of barley bread. Those who experience indigestion are considered guilty.

Amnionomancy: Divination by interpreting the caul (the part of the placenta remaining on the head) at a baby’s birth.
Anthropomancy or Antinomancy or Splanchomancy: Divination by interpreting the entrails of a human sacrifice. I’m very good at this, although I almost never get to use it.

Apantomancy: Divination through interpreting objects or beings encountered in a “chance meeting”, for instance, a black cat crossing your path.

Arachnomancy: Under Zoomancy > Entomancy

Arithmancy: Divination using numbers; mathemagicians do this. Arithmosophy: Divination through a technique of converting words to numbers. Gematria: Automatic numerology, usually interpreting Manual passages assigning numeric values to letters of the Automatic Alphabet. Numerology: Divination through using dates and words turned to numbers (i.e. C=3), often birthdates and names.

Auspicy or Extispicy or Haruspicy: Divination by examining the entrails of a sacrificed animal; I’m very good at this, but most people are too squeamish to go for it. Fish are cheap; cattle are Significant. Hepatoscopy or Hepatomancy: examining the liver of a sacrificial animal Astragalamancy or Astragalomancy or Astragyromancy or Cleromancy: Divination through dice, originally done with sheep bones. I’ve become very good at this through extensive practice and occasional references to my Arithmancy textbook from Secondary. This one is preferred by my local customers, who usually order Auspicious Dates or Winning Number Strings- of course, I can’t always say for sure what the winning numbers are for, exactly, and the Auspicious Dates come either with a season or a year, never both. Pain in the ass.

Astrology: Divination by the positions of the planets, the sun and the moon; no Seer raised in this country will ever realize if they have a natural talent for it or not, simply because there is no natural sky here. While Astrology can be learned in Arithmantic form, I’m not good enough at those calculations to offer it to my customers, and unless I get a teacher, I probably never will be. This means I also cannot do Genethlialogy or Natal Astrology, the Divination of the influence of the stars on birth. However, I can do Horoscopy, the divination of interpreting a horoscope- that’s more talking to a person and figuring out how best to apply their horoscope, not making one for them myself.

Autography or Automatic Writing or Psychography: Written communication with a spirit done unconsciously by a person in a trance or semi-conscious state. I don’t like being untethered from this World. I can do it; the few times I’ve done it, I’ve actually gotten some very promising results. But I don’t like doing it, is the thing, so I avoid it whenever possible. My sister, on the other hand, has no real talent for it- but she loves the process of it, and so has become very skilled in this particular style of divination.

Axinomancy: Divination by throwing an axe or hatchet and observing the direction of the handle or (sometimes with a saw) interpreting the quivering of the blade. If you have an axe or a saw, I can definitely do this one. This is one of the fun kinds of divination.
So is Belomancy or Bolomancy: Divination by shooting, tossing, or balancing an arrow. If it was legal in city limits, I’d be shooting arrows with prophecies attached every day, every day. Unfortunately, it’s only tossing or balancing arrows that’s legal in city limits, and my prophecies aren’t as effective and immediate with those methods.

Botanomancy: Under Pyromancy > Xylomancy

Brontoscopy: Interpreting the sound of thunder. I’m not sure why this one is different from Aeromancy, but it is.

Capnomancy: Under Pyromancy

Carromancy: Divination by observing melting wax

Cartomancy: Divination by using a deck of cards. Taromancy: Divination by using a deck of Tarot Cards. I can do both; I actually usually use a normal deck of cards when I use cards. If you want me to bust out the Tarot Deck, you’ve got to ask.

Causimomancy: Under Pyromancy

Ceraunoscopy: Under Aeromancy

Ceromancy or Ceroscopy: Divination through pouring melted wax into water. Not much use to me, particularly.

Chien Tung: See I Ching

Chaomancy: Under Aeromancy

Cheiromancy or Chiromancy: Divination through the study of the hand, fingers, fingernails and palms. Onychomancy: Divination through interpreting the fingernails. Palmistry or Palm Reading: Divination through reading and interpreting the lines and structure of the hand. I don’t offer this; don’t ask me for it. There’s a reason I wear gloves.

Clairsentience: Any form of paranormal sensing ability. Most of them can be attributed to Haki; however, some things just aren’t. Some of these abilities, in some people, can be suppressed or trained to be stronger, implying that they are functions of a persons Haki. Some of these abilities in some people cannot be suppressed or trained to be stronger, implying that there is something else at work.

Clairvoyance: Also called “second sight”, the ability to interpret or foretell the unseen. I have this. Clairaudience: An auditory form of clairvoyance. I have this too; mostly right when I wake up in the morning. Precognition: Divination through the psychic ability to “see” the future. I make my living off of this. Psychometry: Divination through touching or handling an object. I have this too. I don’t touch people if I can help it- there’s only so much about a person I ever want to know.
Cledomancy: Divination through interpreting random events or statements.

Cleidomancy or Clidomancy: Under Radiesthesia > Pallomancy

Cleromancy: See Astragalamancy

Coscinomancy or Cosquinomancy: Under Radiesthesia > Pallomancy

Crithomancy or Critomancy: Divination through interpreting sacrificial cakes and breads.

Cromniomancy: Divination by interpreting the sprouting behavior of onions

Cursed Bread: See Alphitomancy

Cybermancy: Divination through computing object; a snail-phone, a calculator, a loom.

Cyclomancy: Divination through interpreting the revolutions of a spinning bottle, top, or turning wheel. No; I need to be able to use the laundromat.

Dactyliomancy or Dactlomancy: Under Radiesthesia > Pallomancy

Daphnomancy: Under Pyromancy > Xylomancy

Demonomancy: Divination by summoning demons to reveal the future. No. Hurtful racism; I don’t abide by it.

Dendromancy: Divination using either oak or mistletoe. No.

Divining/Dowsing: Under Radiesthesia

Entomancy: Under Zoomancy

Extispicy: See Aruspicy

Feng Shui: The art of placing objects, furnishings, and buildings to create an harmonious and healthy flow of chi (energy that flows around us and carries the life force). I can do this for, of all things, bags, purses, and wallets. The smaller the space, the better I am at managing the feng shui.

Fractomancy: Divination through interpreting the structure of fractal patterns. Only if I use a kaleidoscope; I like eating food.

Gematria: Under Arithmancy

Genethlialogy: Under Astrology

Geomancy: Divination by interpreting the lines and figures traced in the earth, either by reading the lines and figures in cast pebbles, dirt, or sand or interpretation of those already existing in the earth’s natural formations. Not enough practice to offer it for sale.

Geloscopy: Divination through interpretation of the sound or manner of laughter. My other sister’s good at this, although considering she’s a clown, she’d have to be.

Graphology: Divination through the interpretation of handwriting. Cop skill.

Gyromancy: Divination by walking or twirling around a circle marked with letters until dizzy and, using the letters at the point where the person falls or stumbles to spell out a prophecy. It makes me vomity.

Halomancy: See Alomancy

Haruspicy: See Aruspicy

Hepatoscopy or Hepatomancy: Under Aruspicy

Hieromancy or Hieroscopy: Divination by interpreting burnt offerings or slaughtered animals.

Hippomancy: Under Zoomancy

Horoscopy: Under Astrology

Hydromancy or Ydromancy: Divination by interpretation of water, including its color, ripples, ebb and flow. Literally every person who goes outside their house in this country has some skill at this. Not a good seller to the locals here; tourists lap it up, though.

Hydatoscopy: Divination by interpreting rainwater. Ugh.

Lecanomancy: Divination through interpreting the sounds or the ripples made by stones dropped into water. Uuuugh.

Pegomancy: Divination through the interpretation of sacred waters such as springs, pools, wells, or fountains. No.

I Ching/Book of Changes/Chien Tung: An Ancient Chinese type of divination to reveal patterns of change through deep introspection and intuitive thought.

Ichthyomancy: Divination by interpreting the behavior or the entrails of fish. Entrails, every time.

Idolomancy: Divination by interpreting idols.

Iridology: Under Oculomancy.

Lampadomancy: Under Pyromancy

Lecanomancy: Under Hydromancy

Libranomancy or Livanomancy: Under Pyromancy > Capnomancy

Lithomancy: Divination using crystals or semi-precious stones, either interpreting the light from them or by casting them and interpreting their placement as they fall. No.

Lychnomancy: Under Pyromancy

Metagnomy: Divination achieved through a trancelike state. No.

Meteromancy: Under Aeromancy

Metoposcopy: Divination through interpreting the lines and wrinkles in the forehead. No.

Moleosophy: Divination through the interpretation of moles on the body. No.

Molybdomonancy: Divination through interpreting the hissing sounds made by molten lead or tin dropped into water. No.

Myomancy: Under Zoomancy

Myrmomancy: Under Zoomancy > Entomancy

Necromancy: Divination through communication with the dead.

Numerology: Under Arithmancy

Oculomancy: Divination by interpreting the eye. Iridology: Divination through observing the iris of the eye.

Oenomancy or Oinomancy: Divination through interpreting wine. I am too poor for that life.

Omphalomancy or Umbilicomancy: Divination through interpreting the shape of the first born’s navel or the knots in the umbilical cord to determine how many children a woman will have in her lifetime. No.

Oneiromancy: Divination through the interpretation of dreams. No.

Onomancy or Onomomancy: Divination by interpreting names. No.

Onychomancy: Under Cheiromancy

Oomancy or Ooscopy or Ovomancy: Divination by eggs. No.

Ophiomancy: Under Zoomancy
Oracle: Making contact with spirits or gods. Technically yes, but mostly no.

Ornithomancy: Under Zoomancy

Ouija or Ouije: Divination with the use of a Ouija Board, a board printed with the alphabet and numbers and using a planchette to spell out messages. No. No. Nuh to the Uh to the No, No, No.

Pallomancy: Under Radiesthesia

Palmistry or Palm Reading: Under Cheiromancy

Pegomancy: Under Hydromancy

Phyllorhodomancy: Divination through the sound made by slapping a rose petal against the hand. Too poor.

Physiognomy: Divining a person’s character through interpreting the features of their face.
Schematomancy: Divination by observing and interpreting the face. Podomancy: Divination through interpretation of a footprint. No.

Precognition: Under Clairvoyance

Premonition: A warning of a future event, typically an accident or disaster.

Prophecy: A vision or revelation of the future, typically provided by a deity.

Psychography: See Autography

Psychomancy: Divination through the interpretation of a person’s soul, i.e. values and beliefs. Soul Reading

Psychometry: Under Clairvoyance

Pyromancy: Divination by fire

Capnomancy: Divination by interpreting rising smoke. Libranomancy/Livanomancy: Divination through interpreting the smoke made by burning incense. Causimomancy: Divination by observing objects placed in a fire. Lampadomancy: Divination by interpreting the flame of a candle, torch, or lamp. Lychnomancy: Divination through interpreting the flames of three candles. Pyroscopy: Divination by burning paper. Sideromancy: Divination by placing straws on a hot iron and observing the resulting shapes. Spodomancy: Divination by interpreting ashes, cinders, or soot. Xylomancy: Divination by burning wood Botanomancy: Divination by interpreting burning or burned leaves or branches. Daphnomancy: Divination by interpreting a burning laurel branch. Tephramancy: Divination through interpretation of the ashes of burnt tree bark.

Rhapsodomancy: Under Bibliomancy

Radiesthesia: Divination through using a pendulum or rod. Pallomancy: Divination using a pendulum. Cleidomancy or Clidomancy: divining through using a key attached to a cord or string. Coscinomancy/Cosquinomancy: Divination using a sieve suspended from shears or tongs. Dactyliomancy or Dactlomancy: Divination using a suspended ring. Divining/Dowsing or Water Witching: using a rod to determine the location of water. Rhabdomancy: Divination using a stick or Schematoman: Divination by using a spirit guide, different from necromancy in that the guide is not summoned. No.

Scrying: The term for divination by seeking a vision while gazing into a transparent, translucent, or otherwise reflective object. Crystal ball gazing. Yes, but I only have glass-

“That’s a terrible medium for scrying in!” said the Heirophant.

“Thank you; you didn’t mess me up or anything, but please try not to do that again.” I said.

“Sorry, forgot you’re- sorry.” he said.

Crystal gazing; yes, but I only have glass. Fire Scrying; yes, but my candles are shit. Ink Scrying; sure. Mirror Scrying; no. Smoke Scrying; I’m weirdly good at this, actually. Water Scrying; Hell Yes. Wine Scrying; too poor to have ever tried it.

Selenomancy: Divination of the appearance and phase of the moon. No.

Sideromancy: Under Pyromancy

Skatharomancy: Under Zoomancy > Entomancy

Spastomatoman: Divination by observing convulsions. No, seems skeezy. Spatalamancy: Divination by interpreting skin, bone, or excrement. No. Ew, no.

Scapulimancy or Scapuloman or Spatulamancy: Divination by examining the cracks in the burned shoulder bones of an animal. Yes.

Scatamancy: Divination by interpreting excrement. Spatilomancy: Divination by interpreting animal excrement. NO!

Splanchnomancy: See Anthropomancy

Spodomancy: Under Pyromancy

Stareomancy: Divination by interpreting the classical elements of wind, water, earth, or fire. I mean, I guess.

Sternomancy: Divination by interpreting the marks or bumbs on the solar plexus (breast to belly). Seems like a fun thing to do with someone you want to see naked. No.

Stichomancy: See Bibliomancy
Stoichemancy: Under Bibliomancy

Stolisomancy: Divination by interpreting a person’s style of dress. Ugh, no.

Sycomancy: Divination through writing a question on a leaf and ascertaining the answer through how quickly the leaf dries. Dude, what the hell, no.

Taromancy: See Cartomancy

Tasseography or Tasseomancy: Divination through reading tea leaves, coffee grounds, or wine sediments. Yes, but you have to bring your own tea, coffee, or wine.

Tephramancy: Under Pyromancy > Xylomancy

Theomancy: Divination through oracle or direct contact with God. Yes.

Theriomancy: Under Zoomancy

Tiromancy or Typomancy or Tyromancy: Divination by interpreting the holes in cheese or other types of coagulation. Yes.

Transataumancy: Divination by accidentally seeing or hearing. Yes.

Trochomancy: Divination by wheel ruts or tracks. Yes.

Umbilicomancy: See Omphalomancy

Uromancy or Urimancy: Divination by interpreting urine. Ew, no.

Urticariaomancy: Divination by the location of an itch. (e.g. your palms itch, you’ll get money or your nose itches, someone is thinking about you). This is one of the few I do that I can’t actually sell my services in; it only works for me.

Water Witching: Under Radiesthesia > Divining. If I can, I wouldn’t know; we’re surrounded on all sides by all kinds of water. I could probably find a specific kind of water, but no one has ever asked me… I don’t know.

Xenomancy: Divination by interpreting meetings with strangers.

Xylomancy: Under Pyromancy

Ydromancy: See Hydromancy

Zoomancy: Divination through interpretation of the appearance and behavior of animals.

Ailuromancy: Divination through observing the behavior of cats. Entomancy: Divination by interpreting the behavior of insects. Arachnomancy: Divination by observing the behavior of spiders. Myrmomancy: Divination through the interpretation of the behavior of ants. Skatharomancy: Divination by interpreting the tracks of a beetle. Technically I can do all of this; however, this kingdom has a very broad definition of what a cat is; and as for the bugs… There aren’t many insects I can think of that live here. Arachnomancy is actually much broader- it encompasses not just spiders, but scorpions, crabs, and lobsters. Myrmomancy isn’t a thing here, but- I guess really it’d have to be called Decapomancy. Hippomancy: Divination by interpreting the behavior of horses. Myomancy: Divination through interpretation of the behavior of mice and rats. Ophiomancy: Divination by observing the behavior of serpents. Ornithomancy: Divination through interpretation of the behavior, flight, and song of birds. I can do all of these, but only by prior appointment; finding the right area to do this in town takes prior planning.

However, if it’s really vital I use one of these specific kinds of divination today, Hierophant, Hippomancy, Myomancy, and Ornithomancy are all possible. We’d have to walk around though, so think carefully about that. All of these are under the umbrella of Theriomancy: Divination through interpreting the movements of groups of animals.

Finally, Zygomancy: Divination by using weights.

And it’s done.

“So. What can I do you for?” I said.

“I need some Directions.” he said.

“Okay.”

“I’m looking for the Golden Lotus of the Sacred Realm, and through it, Le Palais de Fleurs.”

"I once accidentally Scryed for the Golden Lotus and learned it’s location and true purpose; since that day, my life has never known peace. It was just after I Saw my Mother’s Fate; and so it comes to this."

“You ‘accidentally scryed’ the location and true purpose of the Golden Lotus of the Sacred Realm, Hermit?”

“Listen, Hierophant; we all have moments of weakness, but it’s not about how we failed. It’s about how we learn from events like those and grow as human beings.”

“So, spill the goods.”

“Firstly, the Golden Lotus is Blood Bound; only a member of the House of Vinsmoke can touch it at all. Secondly, it is not a Looking Glass. It’s a calculator.”

“-wait, What?"

“It’s meant for mathemagic, not divination.”

“Oh, godsdamit-”

“Yeah, it’s a real pisser. Further, unless you’re hiding an Ancient Orcish dictionary in your head, you won’t be able to understand what the Lotus has to tell.”

“-Fuck!”

“Yeah. And finally; even if you have a Vinsmoke willing to run calculations on the Lotus, and even if you understand the language it uses, the legendary palace it once led to—"

“Le Palais de Fleurs—”

“-yeah, it got destroyed and looted during the First Century of our calendar. It’s gone. ”

“...FUCK!”

“Yeah.”

The Hierophant looked so miserable after I’d told him the Truth I’d Known so long ago… well, I decided to take pity on him.

“I don’t know Ancient Orcish- but. If you still want the directions to what once was there, I can do the calculations for you...”

“...You have the Lotus?”

“Yeah. I even have the Box of Bones to tabulate the outcomes properly… if you want.”

“...Please.”

I shrugged, and took the Lotus out of my lunchbox. It’s about the size of one of those new coffee grinder calculators, but significantly more ornate and mind-snapping to read. The box of bones I take out from my small bag. Finally, a small shipping crate that gets left under the bench when it’s not in use.

Here we go.

The Long, and the Lat; Long is tough if you can’t do the celestial calculations necessary, because it’s based on time. Lat can be determined by keeping track of the sun’s maximum height over the period of a year.

If this, then that- here. Done.

(The truth is, the Golden Lotus isn’t just a calculator; it’s a watch, too. It keeps specifically the time of the location of the Palais de Fleurs- which, considering it was unmoored to Time by Morgan Morrigan in the Age of Heroes, means more than you think. This information I’m giving the Hierophant out of pity- even then, it won’t actually get him into the palace.)

I tuck the lotus behind my ear, covering the sunflower pinning back my side-fringe. This would be the winter I would grow my hair out- and then the Hierophant asked me this.
“Join my crew.”
“…”
“Is that an answer?”
“I haven’t answered because there isn’t a polite way of saying ‘fuck no’; so. Fuck no.”
“…Why?”
“Too young.”
“…How old are you?”
“Twelve.”
“Gah!”

This was two year's ago, about a month and a half before the War of the Best- if that matters to anyone.

Because I didn’t fill my bag with objects with Intention, it doesn’t quite fit the normal ideal of a true Witch Bag; but, in truth, it is. A Witch Bag is an urbanized version of the shamanic and priestly medicine and prayer bags. All three bags are filled with certain objects of spiritual and magical significance. All together, they can be used to sanctify a space, raise an altar, and even carry out certain Rites.

Manannan mac Lir had the Crane Bag; it was fashioned from the crane who was actually the warrior woman Aoife, shapeshifted. Mac Lir’s bag contained many different things- including his house- but it also held objects both magical and sacred to him and those who followed him. They numbered nine in all.

Mac Lir gave Cormac mac Airt his Goblet of Truth; his ship that did not need sails was named ‘Wave Sweeper’ and it was given to- or stolen by- the Devil Portgas; he owned a cloak of mists that granted him invisibility, which he laid on the cairn of Floria; he owned a flaming helm that he gave to his faithful liegeman, Kostecki, as a wedding gift. He had a sword named Fragarach, that could slice through any armor and upon command could compel a man under it’s shadow to speak the answer to any question asked of him truthfully; the sword, it is said, was lost to the Sea Goddess Calypso in battle.

His horse, Enbarr of the Flowing Mane, was set free upon his death. Enbarr could travel over water as easily as Land; and so it is said that all the horses of this kingdom descend in truth from that ancient steed.

He gave to Lugh as parting gifts, when the boy went to aid the people of Dana against the Dwarves-called Fomorians, in those times. These were his coat, wearing which he could not be wounded; and also his breastplate, which no weapon could pierce. His helm had two precious stones, set in front and one behind, which flashed as he moved; and Mac Lir girt him for the fight with his own deadly sword, Fragarach the Answerer.

He was buried in his cloak of colors, changing like the sun from blue-green to silver, and again to the purple of evening.

“So- uh… price for this… fifty thousand beri.”

“Uh. Really?”

“Yeah.”

“…Here.”

“Ooh, small bills, nice! -Mm, and that’s it for me for the day. Too fucking hot.”

“-really. You’re closing shop because it’s too hot?”

“Yep. Beach time.”

“...are there nice beaches around?”

“Ehh. Do you mean nice as in ‘tourists come here’ or nice as in ‘I can catch a cool breeze off the ocean and finally relax’?”

“The second one.”

“Yeah, that’s where I’m going.”

“...Can I come with you?”

“-uh. I’m not bringing an entire entourage of shoobies to my favorite beach.”

“No, no, just me.”

“...well, everyone needs some alone time. Do you need a bathing suit, or an outfit that breathes better?”

“-if you can manage that, I’d be grateful.”

“Cool. -Hi, S’becky!”

“Hheeeey~ woah, hot.”

“Yeah, I’m done for the day- you?”

“Uuugh, yeah, too hot for dim sum sales today.”

“Heh. -Hey, so, your summer sleeping yukata- you know, the one you stole from the ryokan?”

“...What about it?”

“Trade; for your brother and his wife, actually.”

“-You Saw-?!?”
“They’re adopting. Kimono- thank you. Give this to Cody Jo when you see her next, from me. They need to go to the Dunshilly Orphanage by midsummer this year to get the baby I Saw.”
“A-aye, I’ll tell them.”

And then I take the yukata, and hand it over to the Hierophant. I double check to make sure that everything is in my bag, as it should be.

(The modern Witch Bag can be made of any material and be of any size. Some, like my sisters who have very physically dangerous jobs, prefer small pouches worn like necklaces and carry only a very few sacred objects. Others will create whole travel altars with full sized tools in their bag by using special packs or carrying boxes.

I have something in between; a set of travel altars in hinged mint tins- and the one folding wallet of the Northern Saints and Martyrs, and all the cool shit in my bag that’s mostly for sale.

The purpose of my bag is to have a safe, reasonably shielded area for all the mystical items I sell in my business; it’s also important that I’m able to carry it. Thus, I have a yellow brown leather backpack full of weird crap; mostly, it’s actually full of pencil cases full of weird crap, and to make sure I can pick out which selection of weird crap I want, all my pencil cases are different from each other, even in a set. Because the content of my bag changes week to week- or even day to day- I can’t think about what might be going into my bag, or where it might go in the future.

There are stones in my bag that I don’t take out- they help keep me grounded; there’s a sachet of herbs that smells nice. It’s also convenient for taking the bus, which is what we’re about to do.)

The Hierophant, the Star, and the Hermit- in their unreasonably-hot-summertime best- used three bus tokens and went to the beach.

I built a sand castle, took a picture of it, and then immediately jumped on it. S’becky went surfing a bit downshore. And the Hierophant ate all the dim sum and took a nap under the shade of a palm tree.

We had icepops and played with some dogishes; it was a nice day. I even got a cool new hat!

That was a lovely day, really; the last slow, soft summer day I can really remember having. It was also the last time I wore my one piece yellow watermelon swimsuit before my dugs got too big for it. I still have the hat, though.

I’m wearing it right now, and lounging in my new, pineapple swimsuit. It supports both sets of dugs just right, and leaves room in the back for my nubby wings to come in- I can feel them getting ready to pop, I’ve got maybe another month.

-I just watched my sister Genny crash into the grassy deck and roll off the broken remains of Mom’s broom. Part of me is hurt because she’s obviously hurt- on the inside, I mean- and part of me is deeply, vindictively satisfied, because she never, ever missed a chance to rub in the fact that she’s better than me at flying a broom. Better nature- I must follow my own better nature.

Fish tacos. Genevieve is going to need fish tacos to recover from this- I get up, and stretch, and wrap my lounging cloth around my hips. I mean, it was only a wrap skirt - and I have the most clothing out of all my sisters in that I have something like five distinct outfits, all of them shit.

Anyway- the family fish taco recipe can be described as a hint of salt to get the taste of poverty out of our mouths, a touch of butter so we can be reminded we’re human, a whisper of cheese because meat is expensive, a rumor of salsa- I’m pretty sure Deb uses wasabi as her salsa base for heat and to make the green color just right- a secret of lime, and an unconfirmed document of rosemary in with the fish.

I poke my head into the galley, and espy Deb curled up on the couch, being cuddled by Missus Mab and Mister Sanji. Oh, she was crying.

I tilt my hat back as I walk over and crouch in front of my sister. She looks up at me, a trilling question in her purr.

“Genny bit the big one; she’s gonna need fish tacos when she comes back out.” I said.

“Ah.” said Deb, before wiggling out from between the Mister and Missus, and stood, scrubbing at her face. She grabbed a black and white skirt from the table and stalked out to change into it.

I hummed a moment, and then looked over at the Mister and Missus.

“Is there a uniform like hers I can wear?” I ask them both.

Missus Mab blinks, and then digs around behind herself before pulling out a folded bundle of clothing and handing it to me. I shrug into everything right then and there; I’m only wearing a swimsuit, after all.

I don’t actually know how to put on the apron, though. I’ll put my hair up, first. Braid it all down, and then wrap, wrap, wrap- and then bobby pin it up, and cover it all with this pretty yellow printed bandanna.

“Hey Deb- how do I tie my apron on-?”

“Just a sec, I need to put my jacket on- okay, it’s like… reverse hakama. Falls to just below your knees- and a knot you can bust open quick, so like, bow knot of some kind.”

“Mm, I see. Today’s fish day.”

“-D’you know what kind?”

“Nope. But it is fish day- right, Chef Sanji?”

“Uh. Yeah, actually- how…?”

“I’m a professional Seer. What kind of fish are we having today, then?”

“Uh- sea bream.”
“Cool, I’ll start descaling them.”

“...Do you need help with the aquarium?”

“Nope.”

And then I walk off and grab the fishing net from beside the fridge.

“Cleaning station’s next to the aquarium, right- ice too?”

“Yep.”

“Anything you want me to leave with the chum specifically?”

“The fins; I can hardly do anything with them, and they go better in the chum anyway.”

“Cool. Uh- wow, four?”

“Yeah. Four.”

“Okay… wait, shouldn’t it be six? We’re all going through growth spurts...”

“Uh. Hm. Yeah, six.”

And then I’m off to gather the fish.

Grief and bloodlust shouldn’t take you away from the things you enjoy the most. I enjoy cooking food for people; and so, while my sister Fern goes fishing, I prepare the other stuff for fish tacos. Taco tuesday. Mmm.

Genny and Fern have this thing between them and tu me fais cheir, la. But what can I do? They aren’t actually fighting, so I can’t say, thrash them both up and down the deck like I would if they were- but they’re not, so, what can I do?

Let me see- rice flour and tapioca flour, salt, water, lard for cooking- or maybe grease drippings, whichever we have more of…

“Grease drippings and lard would taste best, and make best use of our supplies. I have a tortilla press- keep setting up your mis en place, Shrimpy.”

“Yes, Chef Hot Dish.”
“...pfft. Fine, okay.”

“Hehehe.”

Uh- cabbage, dill, cilantro, herbs I don’t know the name of but smell like they’ll go with fish; they’ll be a slaw and that should like, cook a bit together in the saucy goodness- Which reminds me! Wasabi Green Salsa. Tastes like memories.

Salsa Verde con Wasabi. So this one time I wanted to make classic Salsa Verde, only all I had was wasabi instead of green chilles. It honestly tastes best if you use a mortar, not a mixer- no metal implements need apply.

I think if I double the recipe, making it for sixteen instead of eight, we’ll be good…

“Yeah; most of the crew is ordinary about spicy foods, but Chopper hates them and Mab loves them, so sixteen portions is actually about right. Or it would be, except our crew numbered fourteen before the seven of you kids joined up, so. And how should the Miniatures be fed?”

“They prefer Tonnies as a group name, and they eat, collectively, the same amount as one whole person. So- I need to at least triple this recipe. More, if you want leftovers- do you?”

“Maybe. Tell me the recipe.”

“Uh- tripled or regular?”

“Tripled.”

“Okay. Three hundred grams of fresh parsley, forty four milliliters of wasabi, one hundred seventy seven mil shoyu, forty four mil olive oil, fourteen mil rice vinegar, three anchovies- or other pungent fish- uh, two hardboiled egg yolks- doesn’t have to be bird eggs, the Giant Salmon eggs that come round once a year- uh, forty four mil pickled capers, salt and pepper to taste.”

“How do you prepare that?”

“Uh- after you’ve boiled the eggs, crush the parsley in a non-metal mortar with some salt; keeping in mind the shoyu and the anchovy to be added later. When the parsley is in small pieces, a bit of a rough paste, add the capers, anchovies, wasabi, and the egg yolks. Keep mixing until it’s homogeneous, and then slowly add the olive oil, vinegar, and shoyu. Serve immediately or within a pair of days; cover and store in the fridge. Um- steel blades and other cooking utensils made of metal tend to oxidize parsley.”

“Mm. Here’s the mortar. Pan fried fish?”

“Yeah, usually after I do the tortillas-”

“-In case you want to use the tortillas for something else, I got it. I’ll start making tortillas then; you’ll be cooking them.”

“Yes Chef!”
A Closet Full of Clothes Can Be Any Size

The first week of our wait in the harbour of Ryugu Mergyo is spent- at least, on my part- in ensuring that the new crewmembers have adequate clothing for their various shipboard duties, places to sleep, and schedules that will allow all of them time to work, learn, train, and sleep as necessary. Zoro, Sanji, and Mark got a pig, like I asked for; Franky revamped our dorms; and Robin gained an apprentice. Actually, so did I? It’s been a busy week.

Deborah Vinsmoke, the oldest of her set of siblings, was the easiest person to achieve my aims for, while the Tonnie Mice were the most near-overwhelmingly complicated.

Go over the actual list of people first, Mab; make things easier on yourself.

So, in order of difficulty: Deborah, Eleanor, Fernanda, Genevieve, Adelaide, Beatrix, Cecelia, Sancho Horizon, Darla Divot, J3LL-3-B34N, Maya Raghmuff, Hildegard - Hildy is her preference, Arlinda Rader Haai, and Quillaby. Quillaby is the most baby-faced boy I’ve ever seen in my life. Sweet faced- but just as deadly as the rest of us.

Deborah was least difficult in that most of her clothing needed to double as both training appropriate gear, and work appropriate clothing. Thus, there were materials and processes I immediately discarded for her; further, being in much the same mold as my husband, her sense of style was much easier to capture quickly and cleanly. The phrase I eventually settled on to encompass her style is ‘Practical Glamor Woman”; her clothing is practical, then glamorous, then feminine.

Deb is actually a deeply feminine young woman in a very masculine profession; thus, any little thing I can do to help her maintain her femininity, her identity, in the face of overwhelming Othering is of good use.

Her wardrobe begins with a series of a-line skirts in cool black, medium-light grey, warm black, red, and the two skirts I had initially designed for her, in a houndstooth and a floral print. All of her skirts have waistbands and pockets; the waistbands help define her waist, and the pockets keep the skirt practical beyond her own physical comfort.

Her work skirts are uniformly maximum length, in three distinct styles. The skirt she’s currently wearing every day is a maxi a-line skirt in a heavy-weight houndstooth, meant not just for her job, but for winter. The summer version is a midi length a-line in a much lighter, translucent fabric; the fabric I chose is a material that meets all the requirements of a working cook or chef’s needs, while also is able to breathe. Finally, for formal events I made her a fit and flare mermaid skirt in the appropriate houndstooth.

Her work jackets are all the same style; plain white with cloth buttons, faux-French cuffs, Estern front closure pattern, and the reduced collar. I’ve finished three already, and have only two more to sew; because they’re all the same, cutting them was a rather simple operation… Her water bottle is actually a super insulated and ultra light water-pack, rated for use in the Volcanic Isles, which regularly reach temperatures over five hundred degrees Celsius. Her cooling neckerchief is actually a cooling towel she can wear as… well, however she’d like, really.

She has two different kinds of aprons; one, which is for practicing in, and the set of five which go with her chef coat.

It’s important to note that all her work clothing has a material weight of two hundred forty grams, to offer better protection from spills without sacrificing breathability. All of her work clothing is made out of some variant of cotton; be it the thicker stranded winter cotton, or the ultra long and fine summer cotton. Every button, buttonhole, and tie-string is sewn in and reinforced.

Deborah’s underwear, as she’s a Celiate mermaid with unsplit web, requires some careful thought. She cannot simply wear the same kind of underwear as myself, Robin, or Nami; she doesn’t exactly have thighs, yet, or a crotch. Thus, her underwear is a selection of slips and haramaki meant to cover her urogenital opening without putting undue pressure on- real people! Stop prettying it up! Her underwear needs to be less restrictive so she doesn’t accidentally masturbate when she puts her clothing on. Too much constant pressure on a young mermaid’s genital slit can mess up their sexual behavior for life. So- slip skirts are slips, except skirt shaped instead of dress-shaped. I have fancy styles, simpler styles, and ultra soft sleek styles for when she’s having her period. I also have haramaki meant for her specifically, in that they’re all the same style, just in a multitude of colors; they’re for when she wants to train, or for work, or sporty days.

Sports bras for Deborah are either plain white or printed; supportive hose are either ‘flesh tone’, smokey, or red, in a superior wicking style. Her socks are uniformly compression-style merino wool knee highs, as they’re the only style of sock she likes to wear. Yes, it’s weird.

Her shoes come in three different styles, going from shortest to tallest; a pair of cooks shoes, a pair of ankle boots, and a pair of knee high boots.

Moving up a layer, Deborah’s blouses are all in the red family of color. She has a short sleeve button up, an edge-printed floral button up, a polka-dot button up with a ribbon-style neck tie, and a silk hand painted long sleeve shirt without buttons and a ribbon style necktie- no buttons. Her hair scarves are all silk, in a wide range of colors and prints; some meant for specific styles, and some just to wear however she’d like.

One more layer up, we get to her jacket; black leather, silver notions and fixings, psuedo-tuxedo lapels. She saw it in my studio and fell in love immediately, so I marked it out for her and double checked that it would fit her at all- which it does, nearly perfectly. Just a little long in the sleeve, which while technically easy to fix, is only about an eighth of an inch’s wrongness, which doesn’t matter so much. She’s also got her very beautiful heirloom hinged hair comb; I do believe she’s going to wear it every day. She also has her charnellement, passed down from her mother- a pair of ear cuffs in the Vinsmoke style of twisting gold wire. Due to the shape of the rose and the overall simplicity of the vines and leaves, her charnellement marks her as the Eldest of her Line. (The Vinsmoke Line is actually a series of branches that gradually get less and less related to each other; Sanji and I are something like forty or fifty generations removed from each other, but we are, technically speaking, relations. The Noir Vinsmokes are much closer relations, as their Mother- if I’m remembering the Lists correctly- was the current Germa King’s younger sister. So- the Suntides are Sanji’s first cousins, I think.)

As for pajamas, Deborah really liked the nightgown I drew for her, so I’ll just go with that one. Her bag, knife case, and school supplies are not things I needed to put much thought into...

Eleanor is similarly easy to design and create for, in that her sense of style is not terribly distinctive; indeed, she actively avoids wearing distinctive clothing, in an effort to stymie any potential observers from remembering her presence. This is only half defeated by her preference for the color orange; as I explained to her, Orange and Brown are the same colors in different stages of tone. When she... became Robin’s apprentice in archaeology, I designed field-work clothing for her as well.

It was during my measuring of her body that I discovered something horrible and yet ingenious; Eleanor had her web surgically altered as a much younger girl. This was only possible because of two things, specifically - her mother, firstly, was of Lanfolk stock, specifically Demonic stock. If this had not been so, the surgery she underwent would have bled her dry long before her web was split the way it was. Secondly, her surgeon did not split her web all the way up, as is often done in this kind of surgery.

It’s normally done to unsplit mermaids of the Celiate variety in an effort to make it easier for them to… real people, Mab. Plain language, real people. It’s done to whores by their pimps to make it easier for johns to fuck them. Eleanor had it done for a very different reason, however; the way her web was split allows her to wear pants that come much, much closer to fitting her body properly, especially in the crotch. Thus, if she has to or wants to, she can pass herself off as fully Lanfolk.

Her wardrobe reflects these two facts; her desire to blend into her physical demographic of sporty woman of ignorable status, and her need for clothing that can withstand the rigors of whatever Robin has planned for her.

Eleanor’s overall style can be described in the first ensemble I created for her; a unified color palette overall, whereby her loudest accessories and garments fade into the fullness of her form and become merely objects, not colors.

Starting with her pants, she has multiple sets of warm khaki-brown cargo trousers with simple belts to cinch them on to the correct waist position. She asked specifically for her underwear to be part of her pants, and so I obliged.

Her everyday shirts are a series of two-tone collared affairs, meant to look fairly professional and fun no matter what she’s doing. Under her shirts are generally sports bras with interesting backs.

Her work shirts are simple long sleeve shirts in various colors but all in the same style. She has sets of pants without leg pockets entirely, and looks fairly forgettable in them, which is what she wanted. A layer up are a set of identical quilted vests in the journalistic style, because that’s what she wanted and what Robin requested for her.

She wears plain white silk socks and a cute pair of flat bottom sneakers in an entertaining feline print. Her boots are a pair of wet weather two-tone boots, and a pair of hot and dry weather ex-combat boots.

In all honesty, the most interesting things about Eleanor’s wardrobe are her backpack, her cardigans, and her water bottles. Firstly, her backpack is a leather rucksack with a portmanteau meant for various sundries that she needs access to without opening her entire bag- probably for her Tonnie Mice friends. It has one large central pocket, a smaller document pocket, and one square pocket on either side; and the portmanteau attaches with a pair of leather belts.

Her cardigans are really where a lot of the dramatic interest in her outfits come from. I started with a geometrically printed black and white number, meant to really differentiate her top from her bottom; followed by an oversized floral edge print. Then, more geometry, until finally we came up with a print she quite liked that I made in a number of colors.

Her main water bottle is actually integrated into her rucksack, with a secondary flask that attaches to her belt.

Her fanciest outfit is her most obviously suspicious, as I based it off the cover of a very popular Gentleman Thief adventure novel series from about fifteen years ago.

Her charnellements are similar to Deborah’s, in that they are obviously part of the Vinsmoke lineup; however, her particular pattern specifically obscures her place in the line of succession. It’s only because I know her personally that I know she’s second, right after her sister Deborah.

Fernanda’s the first jump in difficulty when it comes to designing wardrobes for the Suntides. As a young working Seer and Witch, she needs a wardrobe that is both professional and weird, to convey the fact that she is a Witch and a Seer, and that you can hire her- without making her appear foolish or too young, which is a real risk.

Opposite from before, I started with ensembles rather than individual items that could work together in outfits. Her first ensemble is a winter set that she can wear anywhere, for any reason, that will not detract from her work, nor draw more attention to her than necessary. Once I had her winter ensemble ready, her summer ensemble came together without much trouble. With the basic central notes of her wardrobe set, I moved to special, singular notes- a few rompers, a mid-length dress, a jacket, a swimsuit… By the time I reach her belts, I realize that Fernanda’s style is in truth very much like my own, with a heavier emphasis on youthful energy and fun. Her jumpsuits are in two styles- strapless, and boat-neck elastic waist. She has two styles of cardigan; massively oversized, and hooded. Then, because I was making knits, I made her a chunky sweater and a much finer sweater; and created ensembles for each garment.

Leggings, shorts - and finally shirts- or rather, a set of sports bras she can wear as shirts because she didn’t actually want any shirts. At all.

Fernanda’s charnellement is interesting- one of the least ostentatious pairs of Vinsmoke ear cuffs I've ever seen anyone wear. Further, hers are usually hidden underneath her mass of hair; it’s a very rare occasion to ever see the Third of the Line’s charnellements.

Genevieve is similar to her sister Fernanda, but where her sister is a very static professional, Genevieve moves. In her nursing aspect, Chopper specifically asked for her to have an outfit that was gendered female, and ranked her internationally as our senior operating nurse-practitioner, as well as a teaching nurse. Thus, her uniform is of dark green cotton- for her status as senior operating nurse, median length for nurse practitioner, with clean white piping denoting her status as a teacher. She also has a white uniform for general practice.

For her underthings, she actually prefers her underwear be dual usage - able to both support her during her nursing duties, and support her while she flies on a broomstick. She in fact refuses to fly without a set of underwear that is meant to be seen, like most swimsuit bottoms; or in underwear that could be mistaken for something else, like a pair of shorts.

Flipping through my dress-patterns with Genevieve, we came across a set of tennis-dress patterns, and Genny fell immediately and irrevocably in love. Therefore, I pulled out green and green-turquoise fabrics from my stash-o-fabric, and set to creating clothing for her, including an entire ensemble for when she wants a green dress and peach shorts combination, and a fun printed skirt.

The only fabric I had in the appropriate windbreaker style was suitable for jogging pants; and so that is what I made for her. Thankfully, Genny really likes them; and when I showed her the other option, she went for it, too.
As for shirts, she wanted identical long sleeve scoop necks she can wear for whatever reason she wants. I obliged her.

Her bag on the other hand, was all me- pretty on the outside, functional on the inside. Chopper’s bag, as an aside, is much the same; however, his has more medicine and surgical tools within. She’s also getting a workbench in the stillroom and the dairy.

Genevieve’s charnellement is a pair of no-nonsense elegant scrolls, faintly romantic as is proper.

Adelaide is another jump in difficulty, simply because kimono are not easy to make, not because of any particular design difficulties.

Her kimono are mostly neutral colors in a cooler palette, with one pretty blue gingham print kimono and a collection of reversible obi for the sake of fashion and Not Wearing The Same Thing Everyday, Not Even Zoro Does That. And he doesn’t, actually, he wears different haramaki every day- which Nami told me, so I know it’s true.

Adelaide actually prefers ensembles and dresses to anything else; she told me that wearing a dress or ensemble helped her feel… well, safe, is the word I’m going to use instead of her half-mumbled ramblings.

The first ensemble she picked from my lookbook is an old design I did a few years ago; she really liked the whole vibe of it though, and said that, considering the style of the model is what her normal style usually equates to, this outfit would look reasonably good on her. She’s quite right; the dramatic color change and vibrant print would look stunning on her. Ensemble the second was a much simpler affair- a sky blue a line dress with embroidered stars, chunky white heels to finish. She looks positively darling in it; as well as ensemble four, which is a much more formal affair with pops of excitement here and there. The fifth and final ensemble is a very fine tunic with a very delicate skirt, as close as I can get to armor without going too far.

I don’t get to make dresses very often. Most of my crewmates previously just didn’t wear them often enough to justify even designing them; their dresses are basically patterns with some tailoring applied for fit, honestly. It’s… very exciting, for me, to get to use my designing skills like this. Firstly, her sleekest, most put together dress is a blue long sleeve mini-dress that I covered in various star-shapes in embroidery thread. A series of dresses in more or less the same style, with a crystal embroidery piece, and a beaded piece.

The two pairs of shoes she wanted, beyond her wooden geta, were a pair of gladiator sandals, and a pair of winter boots.

Adelaide’s charnellement is where I start seeing the big stylistic shift from one generation to the next- her’s belonged to her mother, not her great grandmother. Much simpler in form, much more… composed, in design.

Beatrix is the one who decided to become my apprentice, by asking me to teach her to sew. When I had her in my studio for measurements, she zeroed in on the scissors on their spot on the pegboard and immediately realized that her rending shears were the shape of my own fabric shears.

This is a can of worms I’m about to open, but bear with me. People who sew have two main ways to refer to themselves in general terms; we can call ourselves sewers, or we can call ourselves sewists.
According to the Merryweather-Weber Dictionary and Encyclopedia, the first known use of the word “sewer” to mean “one that sews” occurred in the Fourth century. Over time, a variety of terms have evolved to describe those who sew garments, each with their own set of rules and connotations.

Tailors are people who sew mens clothing, often from scratch; needlewoman refers to a woman who has a particular sewing skill, or uses her sewing skills to make a living; dressmakers are people who sew dresses specifically; sempstress and seamstress are regional variants of the same concept- a woman that sews for a living, usually doing alterations or sewing from store-bought or catalogue order patterns; bookbinder, a person who sews books together, because it still can’t really be done by machine. The dominant term used in the trades and the newspapers is sewer, but about a decade before I was born the term “sewist” began to gain prominence alongside the mainstreaming of haute couture.

Haute couture is the creation of exclusive custom-fitted clothing. Most of what I do is technically speaking, haute couture. Haute couture in the rest of the world is high-end fashion that is constructed by hand from start to finish, made from high-quality, expensive, often unusual fabric, sewn with extreme attention to detail, and finished by the most experienced and capable sewists, often using time-consuming, hand-executed techniques. Technically speaking, every technique I use to create clothing is a hand technique, including all the knitting techniques I use.

Couture translates literally from the French as ‘dressmaking’, but may also refer to fashion, sewing, needlework; and is also used as a common abbreviation of haute couture and refers to the same thing in spirit. Haute translates literally to “high”. A haute couture garment is made for one person specifically, tailored to their measurements and body stance- the literal way they hold themselves. Considering the amount of time, money, and skill allotted to the creation of each piece- and required to create each piece- haute couture garments are also described as having no price tag: budget is not relevant to the creation of a haute couture garment.

The term originally referred to the Southie Charles Frederick Worth’s work, produced in Paris in the mid-nineteenth century. The Dapifer notes that Worth would allow his clients to select colors, fabrics, and other details such as notions and trim which was unheard of at the time. Now, of course, these things are a matter of course all across the world of haute couture- be it very fine, or the more utilitarian work like I do.

In modern France, haute couture is a protected name that may not be used except by firms that meet certain well-defined standards as set by L’école de la Mode. However, the term is also used in a looser sense to describe all high-fashion custom-fitted clothing, whether it’s produced in Paris or in other fashion capitals such as Tribelleville, Water 7, Fiddler’s Green, or Corallia. In either case, the term can refer to the fashion houses or fashion designers that create exclusive and often trend-setting fashions or to the fashions actually created.

In the world of haute couture, the people who make the fashion- the garments, the styles- are referred to as sewists. In the past twenty or thirty years, the term sewist has begun to seem like a new word created merely to provide a cool new label for the people creating haute couture, but the earliest printed usage of sewist was in nine hundred sixty four in Annals of Science, Volume 18, published by the South Society for the History of Science (although it was not used in a positive light). “Sewist” is not yet entered in the Merryweather-Weber Dictionary and Encyclopedia, but when has that ever prevented any word from being adopted into use?

There are many people who sew and dislike the word “sewist”. The reasons I’ve read and heard vary, but it’s usually these two that get brought up again and again- firstly, that “Sewist” is a non-word, a chop-job on the Common language, Parlar. However, to this I can only reply that language is in a constant state of evolution; new words and terms are created and adapted to help us describe... everything around us, all the aspects of our culture, society, and technology. Perhaps the real sticking point here is that terms describing people who sew are already in widespread usage; sewist already means something very specific to a lot of people.

The second thing I often hear is that “sewist” is a hoity-toity word, meant only for people with money and taste in their mouths alone. Maybe so; maybe so.

My argument is this; I need a word to describe what I do. I’m not a needlewoman- I have more than one skill. I’m not a tailor- I don’t just make men’s clothing. I’m not a dressmaker- I don’t just make dresses. I don’t sew for my living, I don’t make alterations, and I only use bought patterns to make muslin blocks for fittings, or for when I need to make multiples of the same garment. I don’t bind books, I don’t knit fabrics, I don’t make shoes, I don’t make hats. Or I should say- I don’t just do any of those things.

Maybe the people who don’t like the word sewist don’t like that it infers a more modern approach, rather than a traditional one. Maybe they don’t like that it implies the user of the word is better than them- after all, the sewists of haute couture make everything that appears on the runway, garment, undergarment, accessory, and shoe. Everything.

I, personally, prefer the word because it cannot be mistaken in any way for the word “sewer”, which can mean “a person who sews”, certainly- but it can also mean “a subterranean conduit that carries off human waste, wastewater, and other forms of sewage”. Sewist cannot be mistaken for sewer.

When Beatrix asked me to train her, I explained all of this to her; and she didn’t seem turned off from the idea at all.

Still, I needed to see to her wardrobe before creating a curriculum for her to follow; thus, I did.

To start, I put together a pair of boots that wouldn’t fall apart like hers were; brown leather, clean stitching, hobnail tread so she’s got some grip, internal waterproofing and external waterproofing. She wanted leather laces, so I gave her leather laces. I also made her a light brown pair of shoes with normal fabric laces in a ladder pattern, rather than the zigzag of her boots; so she’d have options, y’know.

I actually had socks in her size; I just let her pick whichever socks she wanted to wear. Mostly, a series of prints; and then a few crystal embroidered socks. Underwear- she prefers sets, which is fine.

For pants, she wanted denim exclusively, in three different lengths. Ultra short for fun days; middling length, for normal days; and overalls, for working days. Blue printed shirts, button down with varied length in the sleeves- I leave it to her discretion as to how long that should be.

Finally, in case of cold weather, I gave her a bunch of ponchos I hadn’t finished; and realized what to do for her project syllabus.

But first- since we’re just starting out… an ensemble. It marks her as my apprentice; that’s what her shirt pattern means. Becoming an adventurer sewist is a bit painful, really. Although, considering her chanellement ear cuffs, I think she’ll do the world of haute couture quite proud. Kid’s got taste.

“No one ever tells this to people who are beginning a path; but my teacher told me, and so I will tell you, Beatrix. All of us who do creative work- we get into it because we have good taste.
“However, there is a gap. For the first few years you make stuff, or maybe just the first few projects, they just aren’t that good. It’s trying to be good; it has the potential to be good; but, it isn’t good.

“But your taste- the thing that got you into the game, it’s still killer. Your taste will be why your work will disappoint you. That’s alright, though; you’ll improve. You’ll work, and become better, and eventually you won’t be so disappointed every time.”

“You think?”

“I know.”

“Alright, boss. Where do I start?”

“Well, firstly- we need to go shopping. You’re going to need your own sewing machine with a table-case that you can carry around with you and set up on your own; I’ll be giving you a series of assignments to finish within a certain amount of time, so that you can improve in a measured way.”

“Uh.”

“First things first- let’s get you a bag...”

“Can I have this one?”

“The Pillbug? Sure, if you want it. Let’s see now- Mark’s about to go get the pig, so we should go get your sewing machine as well.”

I smile at Beatrix, who smirks back, the frost-scars across her shoulder wiggling over her flesh for a moment or two. Then, I grab my purse and escort us both out onto the deck, where a sleepy looking Zoro and a slightly jittery Mark are waiting for us.

“To the Sento, then?”

“Yep- they’ve got the best quality pigs in the country, and are selling off their first crop of yearlings right now, so. I’m taking Zoro to make sure we get a good one.”

“Hm.”

“Okay. Well, I’ll be in the town around the Sento; try to stay out of trouble, alright?”

“Yep.”

“Hm. We’ll see.”

“...Okay, well, I tried.”

Beatrix just blinks.

The train ride out to the Bath House isn’t terrible, or anything, just about an hour’s ride from the stop near our ship; not bad. The Sento Chihiro - or Chihiro Bath House- is a marvelous sight in the full light of day, a towering building painted red, with an enormous steaming pipe reaching high into the air above the verdigris-copper roof.

Mark and Zoro go off down a path leading to the gardens of the Sento; Beatrix and I have a different path.

“Alright, Kid; time for a little history lesson. I know the Fae get mocked for running beauty businesses, especially here; but you need to understand why that is, to understand why the Fae hold fashion in such high regard. This is also a simplified explanation for why, to the Fae, anyway, matters of beauty and fashion are often considered matters of life and death.

“I’ll boil it down to the barest essentials: when the Giants came to the Fae’s ancestral homeland, they destroyed a lot of things, and caused a terrible war to be fought. The First and Greatest Queen of the Fae, Ariel, took her people to the Sky to escape the destruction and havoc being wrought in the World Below; but she had to evacuate her people so quickly, they were often left with only the clothes on their backs and whatever they managed to carry with them.

“So. If you’ve got not enough clothing to go around, and not enough food, and you’ve barely got enough land to grow more food- what do you do? You find ways to make do without, is what you do. The Fae discovered by necessity ways to use beautification rituals to go without things like clothing and protective gear- or come up with ways to substitute entire branches of the clothes tree for something else entirely. Because of this, even though my people eventually came up with ways to produce enough food, and enough clothing, the old reliance on beautification rituals remained and took on significance of it’s own.

“During the Void Century in Skua, which was never Voided, because of the Great World War- well, many Skuan refugees came to Ryugu Mergyo from the Sky Colonies. Most of them were women, and their children, as their menfolk had been killed in the fighting.

“A merjin actress by the name of Miranda went out to what was known then as Darkville to visit the refugee camp as part of her community service in lieu of prison time. She ended up meeting the women who were living in the squalor of the refugee camp, and decided to figure out ways- some way, any way, to support them. Many of the women had lost their husbands in the war, after all, or had never had husbands to start with; and now they were left without any means of income, and no idea where to start looking for one. Around the side here-”

“-yeah, sure. Go on, though.”

“Heh. Right- well, while Miranda was there, she noticed that many of the women were fascinated by her scaly tail, her manicured nails, her hair, her skin, even her clothing. Miranda got the idea to have her personal retinue of servants come to the refugee camp to teach the women how to do a number of things; massage, scale treatments, wash and style hair, manicure nails, and so on. About fifty of those women showed enough promise that Miranda paid for them to attend beautician’s school and, for the ones that made it through school, she paid to get them licenses. All of them eventually found jobs, directly because the merjin actress Miranda believed in them and helped them.

“By this time, Miranda’s actions had sparked a movement of some kind, and soon enough the refugee camp was emptied as every Fae there was given lessons, opportunities, and a way out. About eighty one percent of all beauticians in Ryugu Mergyo are Fae or of Fae descent, and many of the direct descendants of those First Fifty work here, at Sento Chihiro- which is known to be the very Best Sento in the World.
“About twenty percent of all sewers and sewists in Ryugu Mergyo are actually in Corallia, working in the Kimono Houses; however, Sento Chihiro goes through more sewing machines in a year, which is what you’ll be needing. We’re close- can you hear that?”

“Um- Um! What is that?”

“That’s the sound of hundreds of sewing machines going all at once.”

It’s a steady, rattling, staccato beating noise, punctuated by the creaks and rattles of bobbins being changed out, stops as sewists get to corners and need to turn… cacophony. Soothing. Earplugs!

“Put these in; and get ready to not understand much. It’s very loud in there.”

“Yes, Boss.”

And then we go into the Garment Division of the Chihiro Onsen. Located near the Laundry, it contains massive spreading rooms filled with shift-working sewers, standing at their stations, sewing and sewing and sewing. They stand for a very specific reason, and I’m trying to remember what that reason is...

In clearly marked rows there are more bench like tables were skilled needleworkers repair items that can’t be done by machine- kimono, socks, knitted fabrics…

Beatrix’s eyes are enormous in her head. I catch her eye, and jerk my head in a clear ‘follow me’ sort of way.

She does.

We walk through the marked area, carefully avoiding getting in anyone’s way. From higher levels of the factory, piles of stitched clothing fall through cloth chutes to rolling baskets, steadily rolling towards the Laundry. Bundles of stitched and fused pieces fall too, and are run to the stitchers.

Beatrix has to jog to catch up with me quite a few times, she’s so stunned at what’s going on around us.

Eventually, we make it to the Manager’s office, located along the far wall; I pull the Notice lever, and wait until a replying flag pops up before entering, my apprentice behind me.

The clattering noise of the working floor is reduced to a gentle thrumming not unlike bees in a hive. Inside the office, I’m suddenly reminded of who, exactly we’ve come to see. Man, my class basically scattered to the wind; I hope this isn’t… Nah. This office isn’t arranged like Gloriana, Tanaquill, or Clarity would have done. The head of this office is- oh, it’s the Stitchwitch Treacle. Not friends; but not enemies either. Friendly.

She’s spinning on an upright wheel what looks from here like cashmere thread; Treacle looks up from her spinning, sees me, and squeals in delight. I wait patiently as she finishes out the last of her thread, stops her spindle, and leaps onto me in a joyful hug. I hug her back, and gently squeeze my own happiness into her.

That’s right. We were- casual friends, I guess. She was in my year, and most of my classes, after all.

“Chairete, Treacle.”

“Hallo Mab! Ah, I missed you!”

“I missed you too.”

“Why’ve you come?”

“Well, I got an apprentice-”

“-Hyakakakakakakakaka! I understand why you’re here, then! Come, come, I’ll show you the Closet.”

And with that, we’re off, through a small door in the back of her office and back into a small room filled with… weird shit. Mostly, it’s that it has no business being in a garment factory.

“Treacle, what the hell?”

“Ugh, I know; but Boss Lady insists we make a profit off this shit, so, here it sits. Now- you’re getting a machine first?”

“Yes, this is the first tool we’re getting-”

“Aha. Well- this one is the most complete machine here, it’s just meant for domestic use technically speaking- it’s strong enough to be out on the work floor, it’s just...”

“Too fancy. They’d get jealous of whoever’s using it, and the machine would get worn out too quickly.”

“Yeah. You’ll have to replace at least two gears in it anyway, on account of that recall they ran a few months back; still, for an apprentice, this’ll do fine.”

“Yeah, I’ll take it. And that ship-to-shore box too, don’t think I didn’t see it.”

“It’s full of crappy thread, though-?”

“That’s fine, I can work with that.”

“Better you than me...”

I pay for the items, tie them with twine and outer cloth wrappings so they for sure stay closed; and then I hand them off to Beatrix after paying Treacle for them.

And then Treacle and I have a Silent Discussion, like we used to back in school- because, see, Stitchwitch Treacle is an inveterate gossip hound, and I like to keep my ears cocked to any sort of development.
‘Dia really did a number on you, huh Mab?’

‘I don’t see how it’s any of your business, but yes, she did.’

‘Hmm. And you surely did a number on Titi, ey?’

‘What’s your point, Treacle?’

‘Dia did a number on you, you did a number on Titi, but Titi did you first; my point is, Mab, Titi had allies that you didn’t know about, and you didn’t kill back then.’

‘What, Vainglory, Tranq-will, and Clarbuncle? They couldn’t take me then, much less now-’

‘I don’t mean them. There’s someone else- not Easilee either, y’know.’

‘Easilee’s dead, actually- and not by my hand. -Who, then?’

‘Now that’s interesting… -Erl. You never had the misfortune of meeting him; but I did, once. I was in Domestic Support , Mab; but now I’m here, in the World’s largest middle management job, and you’ve not questioned why?’

‘…Tell me what you can, then.’

‘That’s the thing- I only hid myself here because I didn’t like the way he insinuated. I hid myself on a suggestion, nothing more. And yet… It was odd, you know, because I’d never seen him at school before, and I’d certainly never seen him around Titi but there he was at Titi’s funeral…’

‘…’

‘I’ll describe him. Long thick hair, the color of dried blood and smelling of rotting leaves and some kind of musk; pale skin, like he’s drowned. There was a dark crusting around the bed of each of his nails, and underneath his nails- hands and feet. He was covered, neck to ankle, in roughly draped and stitched fabric, some kind of… raw silk, pongee I think, dyed in purples so dense as to be black. He had fangs in his mouth, and claws on his hands- and above all else, he was not ugly.’

‘Oh?’

‘I remember this clearly; I was horribly, uncharacteristically attracted to him, like he was calling to some wild part of me that yet revels in the spilling of blood. I knew then that he was dangerous, far more than what I, a mere Brownie without a House to serve, could defeat.’

‘A Lord, then?’

‘I think so. He reminded me of you , but in all the most craven and cruel ways.’

‘…Erlking. That’s who you saw.’

‘Y-you don’t think- you can’t be sure just from a description-’

‘ I’ve met him ; I can. And who else would have allied with Titi at the end- enough to pay respects at his funeral?’

‘…Oh dear.’
'Best you stay inside, Miss Treacle. Getting in the middle of a Wild Hunt is a good way to end up dead.'

‘...Happy Hunting, Queen Mab. I’ll be rooting for you, I think.‘

Goddamnit, Titania. Even dead, you’re haunting my life with your bullshit!

---

Missus Boss… whatever her friend told her before we left her office, it really pissed Missus Boss off. I only remember a few symbols, and the only two I understood were the ones Missus Boss made herself- ‘king’ and then ‘deer’, right after the other. When she did, Missus Treacle blanched whiter than a bowl of rice and tried to frantically deny it- but Missus Boss knew.

We left the noisy factory after that, and Missus Boss- I think I knew she was angry because I’ve been around so many different kinds of mermaids, especially in Gobdark. Her face is stone-still; but her wings are arched high, quivering and the eyespots that are usually brown have turned bright, lurid red- I’ve seen mermaids and fishwomen do that too. Missus Boss is absolutely furious; I can only hope she doesn’t… well, we’ll just have to see what she’s like when she’s angry, aye.

“Right. Kid, we’ve got about twelve tools you’ll need eventually, one of which Franky should have adjusted for you back on the ship.”

“Missus Boss, what was all that about-?”

“If I’m right, something that the whole crew needs to be aware of, not just us. And it’s not something I’m talking about publically- earplugs out, Beatrix. This is serious; don’t talk about anything you heard or saw, just now, not until we’re back on the ship. Understand?”

“Yes Mab.”

“Good. Now, we’ve gotten you an inexpensive sewing machine; a real workhorse from the last few centuries. Next, we’re going to a supply store- come on.”

And so, dutifully, I follow my master into the thronging crowd. On her back, her wings have settled down again, fluttering like a cape; the eyespots are a soft brown again, with just a hint of red… burnt sienna? Usually they’re burnt umber- she’s still angry, but- keep your whiskers taut, Beatrix.

We ooze through the shoobies and the locals, and then we’re down a side street and in a residential neighborhood, until finally we come to… Daiso!??

Launched in Ryugu Mergyo- Gobdark, specifically- in the 970’s, Daiso is a hundred beri store. They stock a really wide variety of fairly good items at a really low price- because, almost everything is sold at about a hundred beri, sometimes less. At Daiso, you can find everything from kitchen supplies, to stationary, to makeup. By now, it’s a well established, World-wide chain store. Basically, if your home town doesn’t even have a Daiso, you’re in the fucking ass-end of nowhere.
This particular Daiso is really old and really nice. We stop by the bag check and leave our bags and my new sewing machine and my ship-to-shore box full of crappy thread in a locker to be watched over by an attendant; we each get a shopping basket, and then we’re off.

The first things that fall into my basket are a rotary cutter and a mat, a big clear ruler, and a whole bunch of stylus-chalks for marking fabric. These are followed by a pair of seam rippers and a measuring tape; dressmaking shears; glasshead pins, five boxes of them I think; a squishy pineapple and squidberry pincushion; a scalpel and a pair of tweezers, for some reason; a bunch of packets of paper patterns for sewing, I guess; some amount of canvas; a packet of generic washers, like for bolts; a whole bunch of curvy… things; some kind of set with a weird pointy thing and a bunch of little somethings; a pair of nippers; some kind of gauge; and then we were at a wall of… pitchers?

“Steamers, actually. Irons, too; we have those already. Zippers; boring practice buttons in the two major styles; we have cardboard at home… Mm. Now; this is the Sewist Sequence, which is what you’ve asked me to turn you into as a master and apprentice.”

“Uh.”

“I’m a sewist, Beatrix- did I not say that?”

“No, you didn’t.”

“…Do you not want to be my apprentice anymore?”

And here, I paused- because there was an uncharacteristic note of emotion in Missus Mab’s voice. Normally, she talks like she’s been working in a waiting room at the Department of Vehicular Transport for forty years and all the life got sucked out of her within the first week; and her accent is straight out of the talking pictures, that weird, unnatural boarding school twang mixed with some Blue-Skuan flavor here and there. But when she asked me if I still wanted to be her apprentice, even knowing that she’s a hoi-polloi sewist, she sounded… resigned.

Like it wouldn’t surprise her if I said yes, I want to be something else, now; like she- huh.

So this is what it means to grow. Hurts; but in a good way.

“Missus Boss, you’re my Master still.”

“-You’re sure? Because if you just want to learn to sew, I can just teach you how to-”

“No ma’am. I asked to be your apprentice; I meant to be your apprentice. Ain’t no backin’ out of it now.”

And Missus Mab- for just a second, I thought I saw her smile with pride and relief. Then she started talking again, and I had to pay attention to my master.
“There’s a sequence of learning you’re going to go through to learn how to be a sewist—the basics, anyway, as real skill in anything takes time. Firstly, we’re starting with tools; the machines, the hand tools, everything. Then, once we’ve got everything purchased, we’ll put it all away in the studio—I’ll teach you health and safety, how to care for your tools, how I expect you to leave your workspace at the end of each day, and so on. We’ll do samples—seams, zippers, pleats, that sort of thing, so you can learn that pins, irons, and steamers are your best friends. Then, once you’ve familiarized yourself with all that—”

“Why do I have to do all that first…? Can’t I just make something, like sewists do?”

“Sure, if you want. But… I thought students learned kata before they got thrown into sparring. Since you’re chomping at the bit to sew, I suppose—ah, yes. Mending. You’ll have to practice your hand work anyway, might as well be useful—”

“-urk-”

“-and perhaps consider the merits of not interrupting your teacher in the future. Pick some candy for yourself.”

“Yes, Boss.”

I pick candy for myself, and accept the gentle reprimand for back talking. Mm. Hi-chews. Missus Boss chooses all hard candies in the worst possible old-person and snot-nosed brat flavors; Fishy Anise, Savory Cinnamon, Summer Romance Horehound (BITTERSWEET BITTERSWEET), Violent Lemon, Tequila Lime, Death Liquorice, Punchdrunk Peppermint, and Sassy-Fras. She also grabs a large sack of assorted candies and a box of chewy butter-scotch - I know those, they’re covered in edible rice paper! Yay!

“So. Over here, for some reason, are the paper patterns. Don’t worry about difficulty or anything like that; look at the fronts of the envelopes, and pick out at least one of each in the order I give you.”

“Uh- okay, I don’t know jargon yet, though…”

“No problem. Basic skirt.”

“This one.”

“Styled skirt.”

“This one.”

“Pants.”

“This and this.”

“Shirts.”

“This and this.”

“Simple dress.”

“Here and here. Can I pick some jumpsuits too?”
“You may.”

“Yes! This and this, please.”

“Fancy dress.”

“Sure, um- this one looks really detailed, and this one looks… pretty.”

“Jacket.”

“Yeah- uh, this one, and this one.”

“Oh, and before I forget- pick a bunch of aprons.”

“Aprons?”

“Yes.”

“Okay, uh- this one, that one, and I guess- this one. For me.”

“Okay, cool. Hand them over.”

“Uh- sure...”

“Good. The chain of building is skirts, pants, bodice, torso, jacket. Bodice is the chest and above the waist; torso is all in one dresses, no waist seam. Adding in waistbands makes it more complicated to sew; we start with boxes, then a box with an extension, and then we do tops. We start with tools, though, in terms of what you actually get to put your filthy hands on.”

“Hehehe.”

“Hmhmhmhm. Alright- we’ll check out, put your tools away in your ship-to-shore- I’ve got doubles in my basket for a reason, shush; and then we’ll go back to the ship. We might even meet the guys along the way. Come along- ooh, muslin! Yes!”

And then, we were done, and steadily walking back to the train station.

I’m going to give Mark a thrashing next time we spar. I fucking told him not to get taken in by the goddamn sales people, and what does he fuckin’ do? Get taken in by the fuckin’ sales people.

We’re going to have to eat the males, for one thing; for another, we can’t afford to feed three females, fucking- goddamn idiot!

Fuck!

So, anyway, we have a litter of piglets now. They’re cute little fuckers, with curly goddamn hair; but we can’t afford three of them. Fuckin’- shit!

Shit shit shit shit shit!
“Neh, Zoro; I’m pretty sure at least two of the females will make weight in time for the Interfair, and then we can just eat ‘em. It’s a five thousand beri prize just if I place in the top twenty five; if I ribbon, it’s another ten thousand, and if I blue ribbon, it’s fifty thousand per animal. I’m entering our goats, our doves, and our quail, too- add the pigs, and that’s several million beri we could be gaining potentially.”

“…Pigs are really smart, Mark. If we ribbon all three girls, or even just one of them… by then, we’ll be attached. I’m not sure we’ll have the heart to end things then.”

“It’ll be fine, Zoro!”

“Hmmph.”

It won’t. Aunt Lizzy told me herself- she wouldn’t have ever done what she did if I hadn’t won her heart, just by being myself. Usually, a male piglet that shows such a strange mutation- green hair, I mean- well, usually that piglet is bound for the kitchen, if the mutation doesn’t charm the farmer.

I- I can’t… think about this, right now. Deep breaths, Zoro.

Oh dear, looks like we just got a few pigs as pets, not just as garbage disposal and food. I know we’re not keeping the males, that’s dangerous on a ship our size, no matter how big. That said, it’ll be interesting to make boarbristle fleece out of curly boar bristles…

The pigs are very sad while we ride the train, probably because they know we got suckered into keeping all of them, and, well…

Hm. Thought; I have a palace. With all kinds of palace-y things.

“We don’t actually have to keep all the pigs on the ship.”

“…Ah.”

“You forgot for a little second that I’m filthy rich enough to actually have an entire palace, with lands and everything, didn’t you? If nothing else, my mom and sisters will totally take one each.”

“Huh. Yeah, I did forget.”

“What kind of pigs are these, anyway? I know they’re curly furs, but…?”

“Oh. Uh- Mark?”

“Y-yeah! Right! Uh, these are called Mangalitza pigs, a particularly delicious breed of Ryugu Mergyo heirloom pig. It was developed in the mid-9th century by crossbreeding Ryugu breeds and Mergyo breeds with local wild boar and imported Skuan Furback Boars which were- and are-known for their docile natures. These guys are gonna grow thick, woolly coats similar to sheep, and apparently it can be spun and treated much like a very coarse sheep’s wool.

“The breed doesn’t produce much in the way of lean meat, so it’s not good for modern domestic meat farming; however, for the purposes of ship sailing, they’re perfect. Hardy, good with wet weather, and fairly strong swimmers, too. Uh, they’re fed on wild pasture, supplemented with root vegetables and whatever gourds we can grow. They’re traditionally used for sausage; minced meat is seasoned with salt, pepper, sweet paprika, and other spices, then eaten in slices with pickled vegetables. It’s also traditionally served braised with sauerkraut, potatoes, and stuffed peppers as a side dish. It’s also good smoked!

“Killing weight (for meat production) is generally achieved beyond twelve months of age; these guys are about a lunar month old, so, twenty eight days or so. It’s gonna be a long while. Um… I guess if Sanji’s available to listen in, he’ll want to hear this? Maybe?

“Hm- he’s here, go ahead.”

“Right. If we mark some of these guys down for fattening, they’ll have an almost unbeatable flavor. These aren’t Kurobuta, because Kurobuta don’t do well at Sea; they’re an heirloom breed that has a flavor that’s equal, if different, to Kurobuta. Mangalitza pigs are extra delicious because almost sixty percent of their body weight is fat. Modern pigs are bred to have virtually no fat, and be mostly lean meat- but, when you breed the fat out of the pig, it becomes tasteless. Uh, we can actually keep like, ten of them if we have a forested area for them to roam and dig in, but- Zoro, when did you call the ship?”

“Sounds like one of these guys would be good in an orchard.”

“I agree, Zoro-”

“Yow, are they okay in cities?”

“They’re really meant for farms, but… I mean, pigs are smart. If you treat them kindly, they’ll act a bit like dogs but way smarter...”

“So… one’d probably be okay in a dry dock?”

“Yeah, probably.”

“Neh, Mab- if we all write the letters for our folks, will you deliver them?”

“Are you asking me as Luffy, or as Captain?”

“Yeah.”

“Sure, Captain Luffy.”

“Sweet!”

I listen to Mark and the boys chatter on about the pigs, and watch as the weanling piglets perk up and look at each other and at us with progressively happier eyes. Then I double check that all the males are actually male; in fact, they aren’t. We have three males, and the other eight are female; actually, they were false testicles made out of matted short and curls. Hehehe short and curls.
Anyway, back on the ship Zoro and Mark go off to situate the piglets, and Mab and I spend the time before lunch putting away all our purchases.

“Mm- Beatrix, there are about ten things you need to know right away, before you even start sewing. Firstly, you need quality equipment to work with. When you have a finicky machine, sewing anything becomes a hassle. Secondly, you’re going to have to start simple. I’ll teach you how to read patterns, and read the envelopes you bought before you’re neck deep in confusing instructions printed on onionskin paper. Thirdly, the way I’m going to assign projects to you will teach one new skill, and develop only one or two skills at a time. Fourthly- learn to manage your time! It doesn’t matter if you think it looks shitty, or if you don’t like your work; you’ve only got so much time per project, and then if it’s still not done I’ll either give you a punishment duty- which I promise you will not enjoy- I’ll make you do it again, which will annoy both of us, or… hm, I haven’t decided yet. Something.”

“Um.”

“Mm. Fifth; you’re going to become a snob. Accept it. The more you learn about something, the more opinions you’re going to develop. Sixth, you’re going to learn how to finish a damn seam so it’ll last longer than three or four times through the wash. Seventh, you’re going to learn how to fit something. It seems complicated- it’s not. Very simple. Eighth; you’re going to make things you can actually use, or that are for you to wear. Point of fact, some of the very first things you ever make and I approve of are going to be things you use every day, more or less. Ninth; you’re going to need help. If ever you become overwhelmed, confused, or just plain discouraged, you absolutely must ask me for help. I’m your teacher; part of my job is to make sure you learn everything you need to, including things that don’t really directly make any difference to learning how to sew.”

“Oh. You’re… really serious about training me. About… being my master.”

“I am. To that end- I’m going to write up your schedule for training. You are not, without express permission from me, Doctor Chopper, or another of the senior members of the crew, to deviate from it. You can learn everything I know; you can learn everything you want to know. The only thing that will stop you is not making enough of the right kind of effort to learn.”

“…Uh?”

“You’ll understand, soon enough. Tenth, and most important of all: Beatrix, you’re going to do it wrong. You’re going to make mistakes, and you’re going to fail- you’ll definitely fail when you really needed to get it right. It’s okay. Hell, you might even fail after doing everything correctly… My point is, when you fail- when you Fall- you can hide and run from it; or you can face, and learn from it. I, as your master, expect you to learn from it.”

“Yes, Mab!”

“Good. Now; over here in the Studio is your work area. You’ll arrange and rearrange it to your eventual taste, but right now I’ve set it up like so. This is your bookshelf, and it has the nine textbooks I expect you to read; each one is a little different, and some have information not referred to at all in the others. Further, there are periodicals I expect you to look through, to develop your Eye. But all of that can wait- right now, we’re going to do our first Project together. It’s been a long time since I needed to do something like this, so please forgive me if I’m not very good at explaining
“Okay.”

“Let’s begin- for this project, you will need nails; a box you can carry and move comfortably; a small hammer; a pen or pencil; some scrap paper; a ruler; an abacus, if you need it; and non-reactive glue. Go get the tools, and bring them all here.”

“O-okay...”

And off I trot. Um- Box, first. I grab an empty cardboard shoebox with it’s own lid first, to carry everything in; a small hammer, from out of the tool drawers; a wide-bottom jar full of nails; a pencil; a piece of brown butcher paper; a wooden ruler; and an abacus. Then, I go back to my table in the studio, and begin carefully laying it all out on my desk.

I turn to my master, Mab.

“What kind of glue doesn’t react to paper or metal?”

“None. For that box, it would be better to put another layer of cardboard on the bottom; use rubber cement. Bookbinding shelf; the green one.”

“Yes, Mab.”

I get rubber cement and a sheet of cardboard just a little bit larger than the box; and I get a box cutter, because cutting cardboard with scissors neatly is a pain in the ass.

“Right-o. One more thing you’ll need; over on the far wall, where the big cutting tables are- the middle table around the mast is for designing- by the cutting tables, above them, you see all those small little drawers with the straps in front of them?”

“Yes, Mab.”

“Go open one, and bring back one spool of thread; be sure to close it back the way you found it.”

I go to do as my master bid me. It’s a strap and buckle system, and- card catalogue drawers? Full of spools of thread. Okay- weird, but also kind of cool? I mean, the front little squares have little colored paper sheets in them, and inside each drawer is thread in that exact color. I go back to my desk with a full spool of indigo thread, and sit down at my chair.

“Take your spool and measure it; measure the dimensions of the box. Then, divide the total area of the box by the area of your spool to determine how many spools you can fit- without touching- into the box.”
I do it; thirty two.

“Measure the perimeter of your box, then replicate those dimensions on your piece of cardboard. Use the box cutter and your cutting mat to remove the excess.”

I do it; just as I thought, much easier with a knife suited to cutting cardboard.

“Now; mark out in rows and columns where your spools will go; in the resultant boxes, create an ‘x’ figure going from one corner to the other. Then, tap your nails flush to the cardboard where the X marks the spot.”

I do it; the hammer helps get the nails flush that last little bit, right up next to the board.

“Finally, use the rubber cement to put down a thin, even coat of glue on the bottom of the box, and the uglier surface of the cut cardboard. Once both surfaces are dry to the touch, carefully and neatly place them together with light pressure. Then, you’re done; test it with the spool of thread you chose, and these that I got out for you.”

I do it; getting a thin layer of glue on the cardboard isn’t my best skill, but I’ve at least done something like it before, so it’s not like, impossible. And then I’m done, and... I have a box with points on the bottom.

I did my measuring correctly- all the spools fit, the one I picked and the ones my master gave me.

I don’t know why, but I’m smiling like an idiot, and my eyes are overflowing with tears.

“I- sorry, I shouldn’t-”

“It’s fine. Really, Beatrix- it’s fine.”

“-I... I’m just so happy. I’m not- I’m not just a Breaker. I- I can be a Maker, too.”

And then I start giggling, and weeping.

“You’re not really a beginner, are you?”
“No, I am.”

“I’ve not been clear; I apologise. True beginners are those who have never before held needle, thread, and fabric- be it to sew, to knit, to tat, to lace-make. Then there are those who have wielded needle and thread for five to ten years and still think of themselves as beginners. There are even those who have been wielding the Articles for ten or more years who only think themselves Advanced Beginners.

“Indeed, it is only those who have been sewing for at least forty years who normally have the required skill to call themselves advanced. In truth, there are a standard set of skills one develops in learning to sew, very simple, basic skills that build off of each other. I think, when you think of sewing, you think of mechanical positioning, rhythm, pacing, fluidity of sewing (in a continual process)- these things are built out of experience, practice, and the development of muscle memory. The actual specified tasks, of which I spoke of as skills, build up from simpler to more complex; and, as they are all feats of engineering and mathemagic, skipping ahead before you’ve mastered the use and application of the basics results in disaster.

“The World requires two fairly conflicting things from clothing- it requires that the clothing must not, under any circumstances, fall apart on the wearer; and it requires that the clothing is appealing to the senses, eyes and touch, ear and nose, even the mouth in some cases. Much like architecture, fashion is one of the most demanding fields of study any person can throw themselves into. You’re trying to marry two very conflicting properties- proper structure, and aesthetic joy. Architects, at least, don’t have to worry about their products needing to move.

“Here’s the order you’re going to learn to do things, more or less: Sewing a straight line along a given edge with uniform stitching from the edge of the goods, both by hand and machine. Then, as before, but with two layers of goods.”

“Eh? Is… is adding another layer really that big a deal?”

“In a word: yes. Consider this, Beatrix.

“If one does not position the two layers of two equal lengths of bias cut goods properly- meaning, evenly- the goods will ‘grow’ in length the further along the seam one goes. Sewing a one fourth or three eighths seam is much more difficult than sewing a one inch seam allowance, as there is greater grain stability the farther in from the cut edge that one sews. This applies to bias goods only, as goods on the straight of the grain are more easily sewn with smaller seam allowances. Which is not to say that the skill of sewing small seam allowances on bias is impossible to develop; it is, and you will.

“Consider the concept of sewing two edges of striped or plaid or otherwise printed fabrics together so that the print is matched evenly across the seam as another example of a core sewing skill- although I must say, this is not actually a sewing skill per se, merely the result of a few processes coming together correctly. I do all my studio work factory-style; that is, I set a specific task for the day’s work and do not deviate from its completion. Some days are for designing; some days are for cutting; some days are for sewing; some days are for pressing, or steaming, or washing.

“Regardless of when a seam is actualized, for the way I do work… the required controls for the seamless formation of prints in finished goods is in the accurate cutting of the goods, not the sewing. When you do the sewing lineup, the seam quality of matched stripes is not governed by stitching. The seam quality, in my studio, is designed into the pattern via a precise match stripe drafted and marked on the pattern piece; thus, the matching of the seam is dependent on the pattern grading following that match point, then the mark making communicating the layout of the fabric repeat to the cutting stage, and so on. At the point of the sewing operation, it’s too late to change how a good has been cut; and you cannot blame errors in the final product on the one that sewed it alone. Just because the garment is sewn last, and the proof of error is easily demonstrable then… that doesn’t mean the stitching is always to blame.”

“…I understood a lot of that. Should I be concerned? Because this is the first time I’ve ever heard any of this, and-

“I’m using my Haki to convey concepts to you on a more fundamental level; it’s a way of teaching your mind. The only way to teach your body and your eyes, in particular, is to actually physically do the work- but your mind can learn without you knowing about it.”

“Oh. Uh- should my head feel so… stuffy?”

“Yep, that’s normal; tell me immediately if it starts to hurt.”

“Um- yes, okay.”

“Right. Sewing a simple line with two layers of differing fabric is the next step up in difficulty; like a shell layer and a lining fabric, or applying lace over denim, for example. Both of our primary sewing machines are built for industrial use and then fancied up for home use, meaning the pressure of the foot will keep the goods properly aligned. Sewing the tape of zippers to lengths of dress-weight goods- or other fabrics- will be similarly difficult for much the same reasons. I prefer using a fusible interfacing in the zipper inset area for dress weight goods to make it less difficult to sew properly; it helps stabilize things, you see. Successfully sewing a zipper is dependent on processes prior to the initiation of sewing; a good result is dependent on what happened to the goods before a stitching process ever happened. A pattern for the fusible interface has to be made beforehand, graded, cut, paired with the commensurate shell pieces, fused, and then resorted into bundles appropriate to the sewing process order.

“How are you doing, Beatrix?”

“I’m okay. Keep going.”

“Alright. The skill of sewing from one fixed point to another, dot-to-dot, along a defined edge; and again, but with two layers of goods; and again, but with two layers of differing goods. An example would be that of the back ‘V’ at garment edge on a back vest waist. Not only must the dot-to-dot points be precise but the differing weights of the shell of the vest and the lining of the vest must be managed.

“Next comes the skill of sewing from one fixed point to another, dot-to-dot, on the interior of a piece, perhaps along the placement lines of a welt pocket. It’s more difficult to sew evenly on the inside of a body of goods, rather than a seam allowance edge, as more skill is needed for the work to lie flat and be correctly aligned. Then, finally, all as before but with two layers of differing fabrics- like a welt leather pocket on a wool coat.

“Our studio manages these matters in a very specific way, long before you get to the sewing operation. As in welt pockets, the shell side which receives the pocket is fused from the underside, or wrong side of the goods, at least one inch away from the area to be sewn all the way around. The entire area is stabilized prior to stitching. Because I guard against wasting goods, we use additional goods and processes; meaning that the successful completion of the job is highly dependent upon stabilization and worth the increased effort of production, use of more interfacing, complication of design pattern, and additional processes and steps in production, beyond the strictly necessary.

“Doing the last one consistently- the additional here being fusing and doing that fusing within a precise target area- is not a process often found in the repertoire of home sewers, or even needlewomen. It’s a factory, mass product skill that usually requires a placement guide made by the patternmaker before hand. Guides are something you might not have seen before, ever- it’s a pattern piece not used to cut fabric, but to mark them for the placement of ties, buttons, clasps, hooks, and so on. Very useful if you’re making one kind of thing repeatedly- or you know that your whatevers need to be a certain distance from each other every time.

“Doing okay?”

“Yes, Mab.”

“Mm. Finally, sewing a curve to a straight line along a given edge with uniform stitching from the edge of the goods, both by hand and machine. Then, as before, but with two layers of goods. Then again, with differing goods; and again with two layers of differing goods. Then, sewing two opposing curves along a given edge with uniform stitching from the edge of the goods, by hand and machine; and again with two layers; and again with two layers; and again with two layers of differing goods. This is the most complicated basic sewing operation you can do, because the fabric actively and vehemently doesn’t want to do what you’re telling it to do. Darts are usually a matter of dot-to-dot, but sewing anything so it moves around a curve is complicated.

“Now. When I give you an assignment, how well you complete it will tell me several things- how well I’ve taught you, what you still need work on, how motivated you are, all manner of things. Failing to turn in an assignment will result in punishment duty; also, as your Master, I don’t just want you to be a good Sewist.”

“Eh?”

“Beatrix, I’m in loco parentis of you now- I’m basically your parent. I take that sort of thing very seriously- so no, I don’t want you to just be a good sewist. I want you to be a good person, too.”

“...oh.”

“Mm. ‘Oh.’ So, any broken rules, any missed chores, any bad behaviour- and the normal shitty Apprentice work will get much shittier.”

“...What’s my apprentice work, then? -and how can it get shittier?”

“Well, to start with, you’ll be making bias tape- you’ll be cutting it, first with the rotary cutter, then with the bias tape cutter; you’ll be joining it, pressing it, and spooling it on those big spools, there by the fabric stash shelves?”

“I see them.”

“Mm. That can get shittier in a few ways- I can make you use the rotary cutter as the method of cutting, I can make you join it by hand, and I can make you spool it without the rotor.

“You’ll be washing and pressing fabric- both for unmade goods, and the garments that come through the Laundry that need pressing. It’s very important to press along the grain, by the by- that won’t make much sense now, but it will later. I can make you do the washing by hand, and I can make you use the heavy press.

“You’ll be cutting fabric- to start, you’ll be cutting muslin toile, all the paper patterns and guides I assign you, and lengths of bias tape as needed. It’s not really something that can be made shittier, but I can make it very boring.
“You’ll be tracing patterns from pattern paper to transfer paper, and transferring those patterns onto new paper- and eventually, you’ll be allowed to use the mimeo, but mimeo privileges will be taken away for bad behavior, understand?”

“Um… what’s a mimeo?”

“The mimeograph machine is a duplicating machine that works by forcing ink through a stencil onto paper. Ours can be adjusted to work on prepared fabric, but I prefer screen printing. I use the mimeo to make all the forms we use to keep track of the fabric repairs needed on the ship; and Franky uses them to keep track of all the repairs in general. Sanji uses it to make the list that’s posted on the pantry, basically just a spreadsheet he fills in week to week- or month to month, sometimes- and Mark uses it for the list that keeps track of all the animal feed and medicine. Chopper uses it too, mostly for the physicals where he checks a set number of things- useful machine.”

“Oh! The- the thing that makes all the temple bulletins?”

“Yep. Not being allowed to use the mimeo makes the entire job just drag, by the way. You’ll have to sew on buttons, hooks, bars, and other finicky fasteners; it’s always done by hand, of course, but I can make you do the very tiny, most finicky ones of all. You’ll be cleaning the sewing machines, oiling the iron of the tables and polishing the wood; and checking the machine oils. I’ll make that one shittier by changing how much detail you need to attend to. You’ll also have to refill the irons and the steamers- the irons need to visit Franky’s forge so the Dials inside them can be refilled with heat, and the steamers have both Heat and Wet dials inside. There’s a whole list of things that have to happen for that, and it’s already a shitty job- about the only way to make it shittier is to make you do all of them at once, and I can definitely do that.

“Which reminds me- and this is my fault, really. When I started with this crew, I had been shot in the head, resulting in fairly severe brain damage that manifested as partial amnesia. I’m fine now, as I’ve remembered or relearned everything I forgot- but back then, I neglected to properly tag a large amount of the things I made. One of your ongoing jobs is going to be sorting through the Wardrobe, checking to see if each garment has a laundry tag, checking to see if the laundry tag is correct, and replacing as necessary. It needs to be done; I don’t want to do it. So, you’re doing it. If it’s punishment duty, you’ll have to make each tag you use beforehand, instead of using my premade ones.”

“Okay.”

“Hm, there were other things- ah, yes. Hand stitching practice- not necessarily on a garment. You’ll also be doing embroidery, embroidery samplers, beading, beading samplers, sequins, applique, fringe and trim, pompons, tassles, lace, and if you really shit the bed, I’ll make you do cross-count stitching. You’ll be doing some of all of these things anyway, but if it’s punishment, it won’t be fun and I’ll be very strict about how it’s to be completed.

“Last among your duties, but most important, is that it’s now your job to keep the floor swept, the ceiling free of cobwebs, and the lightbulbs changed. You’re also to take the trash out when it’s full, clean out the lint trap in the washer and dryer, check to make sure we have adequate clothespins, and make sure the drying lines are in good repair.

“Understand?”

I stare at my master, and then I nod. I do understand, after all.
“-can you embroider, Beatrix?”

“Yes, Mab.”

“Good. I’m going to be giving you your first assignment; you’re to complete this embroidery. I’ll give you two weeks, and I’ll be checking in daily to see how you do.”

“I- I only know how to do satin stitches, boss, I don’t”

“Hmhm. Then your other assignment is going to be a trio of samplers. This is the first one you need to replicate; this is the second one; and here is the third. I suggest you work on the straight stitches first, followed by the more fanciful stitches, and then finally the large sampler; finishing with the art piece. -and I suppose since you have four assignments now instead of one, you’ve got the next four weeks to finish each of them.”

“Y-yes, Mab.”

“...questions?”

“Um. I- I don’t know how to start.”

“Hm. Well, put your assignments down on your desk, and bring along the straight stitch example, and the pattern paper. This is how you complete this assignment.”

“Yes, Boss!”

“Firstly, over here is all the embroidery supplies- this bin has all the unworked tea towels, and unless I tell you otherwise, you’re to use these to embroider with.”

“Mm!”

“These are your embroidery hoops- your samplers will be framed, if I consider them up to standard, so don’t worry about wasting a hoop.”

“Mm!”

“Needles for embroidery are in these screw-top jars; I expect you to keep track of your own needles. Take as many as you need; mark down how many you take on this sheet; and use this roll of paper-tape to secure them while they’re in transit from here to your work table.”

“Mm!”

“Finally, embroidery floss; this thread catalogue with the white top-board is all embroidery floss. Take as many skeins as you want and mark them down on this sheet here, so I know when I need to refill a drawer.”

“Mm!”

“For this first assignment, you’re going to need thirteen different colors of thread, so you don’t get any stitch row confused; at least two needles; I suggest a thimble, to protect your fingertip; a tea towel; an embroidery hoop; and you’re going to need to read the first fifteen pages of your first textbook, the one on the right side. I suggest reading the whole first chapter, but you’ll need the first fifteen pages especially.”
“Yes, Mab!”

“Now- if you’re having trouble understanding what the book is telling you to do, I can show you. Don’t hesitate to ask for help, Beatrix!”

“Yes, Mab!”

“I’m going to show you how to transfer your pattern onto your cloth; then, I’ll observe you setting up your embroidery, and if there’s enough time, you can do your first row of stitches before it’s time for lunch.”

I nod, and then watch carefully as Master Mab irons my embroidery sample pattern onto a tea towel corner; I carefully secure it to the embroidery hoop, then put it on my desk. I count how many rows there are- fourteen- and the top row is all nearly-white threads in various tints, so I skip the topmost box of a column of red. I take five needles, and two thimbles, and I go back to my workdesk. Mab points out where I can turn the light over my desk on and off, which is nice; she hands me a small work tote.

Then she teaches me the first stitch I have to do; the back stitch. It’s so simple, I actually do finish it before lunch.

While I was working, Master Mab wrote on a blackboard the list of projects I have to do before she’ll consider my training completed- Thread Holder was first, and it got a checkmark. Next came a Clapper-Point Presser; then Bias Tape; Handkerchief; Pillow; Pockets; Apron; Tool Tote; Sorbetto Pattern Top; Sorbetto Pattern Top with Bias Tape; Laurel Pattern Shift Dress; Ginger Pattern Skirt; Macaron Pattern Dress; Macaron Pattern Dress in Knit Fabric; Swimsuit; Jacket. She also put up weird shelf-pocket things that the patterns I picked out at Daiso got carefully sorted into; the highest ones have my fancy dress and jacket patterns in them, while the lowest one has aprons. There are also patterns for a tool tote, and a swimsuit I’ve never seen before.

Then it’s about an hour before lunch- I’ve been sewing for two hours straight, and I’ve gotten through three of my stitch rows.

Master Mab makes me stop, stretch, and separate and wind skeins onto cards for the rest of our time before lunch; she says that it’s important to simplify various future operations by doing this kind of work now. It’s not as fun as sewing, but… I’m done in a bit less than forty five minutes, and spend the rest of the time clearing my desk, sweeping up with the dustpan, and going over myself with the lint roller. Master Mab says I’m to do sewist training in the morning, and full-body stuff in the afternoon- says that letting my skills in battle and Breaking atrophy would be irresponsible of her.

Trust your master, Beatrix.

Lunch is a little weird, mostly because we’ve never had so many people in the galley at once. Franky had to rearrange it so that there are two tables, instead of just one; allowing for the various groups of people to all sit together, without crowding each other.

I’m at the… well, ‘Adult’ table, with Zoro, Sanji, Robin, Nami, Franky, Brook, Chopper, Usopp, and Luffy. The ‘Kids’ table has the Suntides, and the Kids; and the Tonnie Mice are on the breakfast nook, so they don’t get stepped on.

“When I have some important information you all need to be aware of.”

“Wassat, Mab?”

“Please don’t talk with your mouth full, Luffy.”

“Sorry. What’s that?”

“…One of my Crazy Exes is probably going to try to kill me. Probably after we leave this island, but it might be sooner, I’m not sure.”

“…Mab… Six before Puck, right?”

“Yes, my love. Six before Puck.”

“Which one is this?”

“Number three.”

“…uh?”

“Puck was the one that grew large enough for me to name; there were six before him, and six lovers who helped make them, Nami.”

“Ah. And they’re all crazy?”

“Well, I was too, so-but, yes. In different ways, but yes. They’re all quite Crazy.”

“Anything we need to watch out for, Mab?”

“Mm… if you see strange dogs or wolvarks hanging around the ship, don’t approach them, and don’t turn your back on them. If you smell rotting wood or rotting meat, particularly, you need to be ready to fight for your life. And if it’s at night, about the only thing I can recommend you do is run towards the largest moving body of water you can find- a lake, a river, the Sea itself. The Third is a bit like Granuna- he knows when his name is being spoken, or even his title.”

“…Can you draw him?”

“-Yes, but I won’t. He has this weird power to see through his own eyes- if I draw a picture that’s close to his image, he’ll be able to see through it. All the names I can think of for him… I know. He can’t hear recordings- just a moment.”

“I’m done with lunch, anyway- delightful noodle dish, I think. I was distracted.

By the couch where Bryony clips coupons and goes through catalogues- well, there’s the mail shelf, where we keep our bulk stamps and envelopes, and there’s also… aha! There’s my opera recordings!
I need… this one. And the player, too.

“This is who I mean.”

I play the song; everyone is quiet, listening to the singer. My eyes catch on the Kid’s charnellement; a swirling line that could belong to anyone, if it weren’t for the exact arrangement of loops.

The song ends, and my friends look at each other and then at me. Sanji is- smoking. From his nostrils.

“Yeah, I’m not happy about it either.”

“...If he comes here... if he even tries to speak with you, pchelka, I will kill him.”

“...Good. I don’t have the heart to, so. Thank you.”

Sanji lets loose another gush of hot black smoke, before shaking his rage away with a flip of his hair. Sanji is Best Husband.

Cecelia has had the fewest visible signs of strain. Considering all the Suntides lost their mother, so far their grief has had minor repercussions. Genevieve broke her mom’s broom in a fit of recklessness; Deborah is throwing herself into her apprenticeship with Sanji. Beatrix is with me; Adelaide is picking fights with Zoro and Luffy and Franky and calling it sparring. Eleanor has been more or less a living ghost; she stays up all hours of the night, hiding in the Library or the Crawlspace of the ship, her Mice right there with her. Fernanda has been sleeping out in the sunshine on the deck, or just… watching. I know that expression from Atty- she’s trying really hard to deny her gift right now, in a strange bid to keep from learning more than she wants to know about her sister’s futures.

Cecelia is the most ‘normal’, probably because she’s got actual coping methods that are helpful, instead of maladaptive. She’s spending real, quality time with Sancho Horizon and Taffy, and when she’s sad, she cries.

More practically, her entire style is centered around a pair of scrunchies from Daiso and the way she puts her hair up. It’s a very practical, very cute style, even though it’s basically always hidden under her hat. Similarly, the shoes she wanted were a cute, practical set- one for sharp days, one for every days.

Her tights are horizontally striped, in an allusion to prisoner’s garb; all of her socks are black and silken, for the professional touch. Her shorts are all high waisted, to accentuate her feminine curves, and with suspenders to preserve the line of the high waist and remind everyone who sees her that she’s a clown, yes, really. Her pants are also high waisted, and skulk right up to the edge of trashy before stomping all over it. Even her skirts get in on the high waisted suspended action; but those are for when she wants to be seen as a female clown, not just a clown.

Cecelia has exactly two kinds of shirts, in the same color; she has grey button down shirts, and she has grey t-shirts. She has exactly three jackets, in the same color; she has a black jacket with straight lapels, a black double breasted jacket, and a black leather jacket. She has exactly three ensembles, whose pieces can be used to garnish any outfit she chooses to wear.

The first ensemble is a tight, sleek affair with a bright white long-sleeve shirt, pegged tuxedo pants, and a tight black suit-jacket in an informal style, with patent leather shoes to finish. The second ensemble is a modern take on hakama, with a two-tone jacket and an informal shirt- for days when she wants to be a tough-girl, not a girly-girl. The third and final ensemble is a cute shorts and button-down shirt combination, with a black scarf-bow and a jaunty hat.

Her charnellement is the most formal and ornate out of all of her siblings; it’s even got jewels on it, which is fairly distinct from all the other possible Vinsmoke ear cuff options.

Cecelia is a clown; she builds her wardrobe like other people build a resume, or a stockpile of weaponry.

Vinsmoke Sancho Horizon is very much like Cecelia; but where Cecelia’s style has more than a little touch of suspicion and smarm, Sancho is all absent minded scholar; a mystic outside his tower, if you like. Except there’s a weird stripe of musician’s bizarre flair that… well. Sancho has three pairs of shoes; a pair of distressed finish white bucks, a pair of two tone casuals, and a pair of white canvas sneakers with black and yellow bootlaces. He exclusively wears knee-high dress socks in a multitude of pattern-prints.

His pants are feathered; either smooth, or fluffy. His shirts are two toned, in a variety of colors- from what he came in, to the relaxed versions I made for him. His vests come in two styles- side closure, and straight up and down. His jacket is what really stands out- not the hooded one he came with, but the one I’ve just today finished making for him, as it’s finally dried and cured properly. It’s a greatcoat, to really sell his ‘awkward academic’ image.

His soft hat is great; about the only thing I did was replicate it so the one Cece made for him doesn’t wear out before it’s time. I also made him a stiff, felted version - complete with feather tufts, like a great horned owl- so he’d have options.

Sancho Horizon is… odd. I can guess some of his story just from what he looks like, how he moves, and what his personal names are; at a guess? I’d say he’s descended from the old Donquixote Line, which left Mariejois about thirty nine years ago, if I’m counting correctly- maybe thirty six. He’s got the crazy height and at least two more growth spurts left before he’s done; the gangly limbs, the quixotic clumsy-grace… but, he doesn’t have the family name of ‘Donquixote’. Sancho must be what his birth mother named him, in an effort to protect him from either his sire, or the kin of his sire-it’s a Dressrosan name, is the thing.

Vinsmoke Aquila- because there was only one woman of the right age in Sanji’s immediate male-following Line that fits the bill for being the Suntide’s mother; Vinsmoke Aquila knew who Sancho’s sire was. Vinsmoke Aquila gave Sancho his charnellements before she died, not after- thus making him a Vinsmoke, beyond all contestation. Further, she made him her son by naming him such in her bequeathments- ‘whosoever possesses the Sunrise Cuff is my beloved son, Sancho Horizon’, as I recall. Deborah showed me the Testament her mother left behind- and unlike the other charnellements, which can be passed around the family with impunity… The Sunrise Cuff is passed from Mother, to Son, to Daughter- repeating, endlessly. Sancho cannot remove that cuff on his ear for any reason other than he’s giving it to his daughter. Vinsmoke Sancho Horizon- or, more probably, Sancho Horizont Donquixote- doesn’t quite fit in with any of the other Vinsmokes on this ship; not even Sanji, who is of the Ruling Line. Even so; his sisters love him, and he them.
There’s nothing wrong with being adopted.

After lunch, and the answering of some fairly invasive questions (No, he wasn’t a good kisser, actually; yes, he was quite handsome when we were lovers; I don’t actually like killing people, or being forced to kill people- further, it would make him happy if I killed him, and I don’t want to do that, either), I returned to my studio where I stared down the dilemma of making clothing for people in the range of five to ten centimeters in total height, and only a few grams in weight. Even Arlinda Rader Haai is only about two hundred eighty three grams- less than a pound. Less than a kitten.

Honestly, the only thing for it is… well… I’ll do the Starter Kit and let Franky do the Custom Version- shims, I’m gonna need shims-

So, uh. Dwarves.

I need to think about something while I do this- might as well be dwarves.

I’ve mentioned before- somewhere- that my particular nation in the Tribe of Fae came from the Dwarves, from beneath the earth… Um. Hm.

So, in the beginning, The Three Who made the World, and the One Who Watches from the Edge… no, not like that. Hm. How to tell it.

Oh, hey Franky.

“Hey Mab. What’re you doin’?”

“I- uh. Well. The Mice need clothing, and everything that’s already set up is too large to use for their stuff, so I was going to- uh, okay, or you’re going to put together a Dollsize Sewist Studio on these shelves here, and yes, I have wall paper I’d like to see used- thank you. Um.”

“You were saying somethin’ about dwarves, Wing-sis?”

“-! Right, um- I don’t have to, uh-”

“Start at the beginning, s’my advice. Tiny ears.”

“R-right, um. Hm…

“Alright. The story goes a bit like this, I suppose-”

I flick my fingers, and thousands of ribbons, pieces of paper, and silken pocket squares dart up to illustrate my spoken words.

“In the beginning, before the creation of the Sun and the Moons, there stood two great trees, from which the light of all Creation shone. This was the Age of Darkness, when all the World in which we live was stilled, as Pandora had not yet broken the Egg. The time between Pandora’s breaking of the Egg, and her eventual punishment is where that Age gained its name, if you didn’t know…

“Concerning Dwarves, or Dwarrow as is the proper plural- they were created by the Maker of Things, the Smith, the Star Maker, the One Who Lit the Flame; in secret did the Flame-setter work, far from the other Ancient Ones. The Maker intended his children be the inheritors of his powers and craftings, for even then it was sure that nothing may last forever- to all things, there is a season, and a seasoning. The Maker carved his children from the living stone- of metal, and crystal, and sacred gem did he cut his children, aye, and cold stone, bloodstone, heavy stone, and scale stone too; but before he could breathe life into them, the Great Three and the One found his hidden place and saw what he had done.

“It had been the decree of Her Grace, the One Who Waits, that it would be her first-born, the Three Who Are One, that would be First of All. And so, his crime evident, the Maker raised his hammer high to destroy what he had wrought-”

I hear a series of tiny gasps from somewhere, and Franky’s lip tilt’s upwards as he carefully saws through another set of johnnyboards. Beside me, just outside my line of sight, I can feel all the Suntides quietly watching the flaring fabrics and colors that I’ve set to move; and behind them, I can feel the rest of my crewmates.

Hm.

“Before the Maker could bring his hammer down, Her Grace stayed his hand. She Who Waits sees more clearly than any other; and so she said unto the Maker ‘You did not create out of malice or cruelty; and so you must not destroy them, for they are your children.’

“And the Maker did not destroy the Dwarrow. As punishment for ignoring the great Order, the Maker had to cast his children deep into the hearts of the Mountains, where they would wait until after the Waking of the Three Who Are One, the Weavers, the Braiders, the Gather, Spin, and Cut; only then could his children wake.

“Seven children did he make, and seven did he secret away in the heart of the mountains; and there they waited for their Birthdays.

“After the Three Who Are One woke in the waters of Wom- to which there is no returning- the Seven Fathers woke, and dug themselves out of their slumbering stones. The eldest of them, called in the new language Ariel, but in the old language, Kostecki; he wandered the World as it was then, naming nameless hills and dells- drinking from yet untasted wells- until at last he came to a place called Mirrurmaer, where he founded the ancient city of Ffaraon in the natural caves between three mountains. The city was populated by Kostecki’s Folk, all throughout his life-”

“A life which was so long,” says Sanji, taking a seat next to me and gently smiling at me when he does because I was not going to go there, but okay- “that he became known as Kostecki the Deathless. That’s also a reference to the belief- still held to this day- that he would be reborn seven times, the final time being in The End of All Days. His ancient city of Ffaraon, or Ambrosius, is also where all Orcs are said to have originated from; it is said that Ffaraon is fed by the River of Death, and that the hills on either side of it echo with the long dead howls of furious dwarven women chasing down orcish rakehells after yet another panty raid.”

“Quite. Nowadays, Ffaraon is known as Paris, and is one of the only cities in the World known to have existed in one way or another since the First Age. Far to the west of Ffaraon, the great cities of Thule and Tiffan were founded in the Blue Fingers during the First Age, before the arrival of the Elves in the Kush. The Dwarves of Thule were the first to forge mail of linked rings, and they traded such for weapons with the Orcs of Tiffan; the Dwarves of Ffaraon carved the Catacombs that now sit under Paris, at the behest of the Orc Queen, Una Morgan.”

“This is how the Orcs came to posses Ffaraon, which is now Paris. During the First Age, when Pandora broke the Egg in which All Evil dwelt, it scattered all across the World, bringing chaos and horror wherever it went. During this time of chaos, two great weapons were forged- the Grass Cutter, and the Flame. Their fateful battles are well known, I suppose- but what’s less well known is that during this time, the Crown of Stars was lost as well- for good reason.”

“It was during the Battle of Unnumbered Tears that it was lost, when Kostecki’s secret weakness was discovered and exploited; he died in battle with the ancient terror-”

“-the first and greatest of all Nagas, the one known as Glaurung. It was only the Dwarves of Ffaraon who could withstand the terrible flames of the beast; and only for so long as the battle was fought. When Kostecki tore out the dragon’s heart and sliced it into four pieces, so too did his own heart of crystal shatter, caught as it was in the death-scream of the horrible beast. After that battle, the dwarves who had followed their king most faithfully… being made of stone, they shattered too. And so it was that Kostecki’s banner was raised by his only living son, an orphaned orc-boy he’d taken in long ago.”

“The boy’s name was Udoroth of the Smoking Vine; and so we come to this. After Glaurung's defeat… how did that old hymn go… ah, yes. The place where Una scuttled her foe- the tempest never dies! His final throes and shudders and shakes, a thousand years gone by…”

“The Maker, whom we call Awl; he had never intended his children live forever. Kostecki had broken a great Law; and so from the depths of the Sea there arose the one who would destroy him. Udoroth, his son, only halfheartedly wished for the destruction of his crazed father; but Una Morgan, the one his father arranged he marry-”

“-the one whose lands were destroyed in the battle between Glaurung and Kostecki-”

“-she wished his death with all her heart. It was she who saw the way to destroy what tethered the Mad King to this World; and it was she, not the dread beast, who screamed so and slew him, ere the end. Her scream was so potent; not only did it shatter the crystal heart of Kostecki, it shattered the seven jewels knotted into silver thread and woven into his hair as well. And so the Crown of Stars was lost in the screaming of Death that Rides. The dwarves who followed Kostecki were just as mad as he was; and so they died too. Thus did Ffaraon become Paris; and passed from the hands of the Dwarves to the hands of the Orcs.”

I lean against Sanji as the flickering silks show my Granuna and her beloved, Udoroth, storming the city and taking it for their own. Sanji tucks his head over mine, and a low rumbling purr shivers through my shoulder.

“This was the beginning of the Age of Heroes, the Second Age of the World; during this time, mithril, adamantine, orichalum, sky iron, cold iron, and red iron were forged into blades of terrible, miraculous power, beyond what had come before. Sometime during the Second Age, the Dwarf city of Thule fell, and no city would bear that name again until much, much later- Mab’s the queen of it,
“The Third Age, sometimes called the Age of Time, is where the first calendars were created- and there, I leave this tale. More can be discovered by speaking with Robin, or reading a book- but I’ll leave off this story here. Mab?”

“Mm. Right. From the First of the Dwarves, we know these things; a Dwarf is carved, and then planted somewhere quiet and dim, and then in the fullness of time, that being wakes and breaks it’s way out of their safe and stifling prison. From this ancient divine magic, a homelier magic emerges, which I practice now and again- that of fairies making their eggs, and guarding them faithfully until they hatch- or do not. Orcs, on the other hand, do things a bit differently.

“Orcs do not exactly hatch; Orcs… well, they sprout. Legends say that the first Orcs sat up out of a turnip patch, but I’m of the mind it was more than likely cabbages- GAHAHAHAHAHAHA, STOP, STOP, AHAHAHAHAHAHA.”

Sanji started tickling me when I obliquely referred to him as ‘cabbage’ because, of all things, he doesn’t like being called ‘mon chou’. Weird? Yep. Fun to tease him about? You bet your ass.

I suppose I should mention- Dwarves got the reputation for being brutish and rough as a direct result of Kostecki being a fucking asshole. In truth, the Dwarven habit of bashing and hacking the shit out of their enemies is a direct result of their innate ability to be good metal smiths. Metal smithing is the fiddliest fucking thing in the gods-blessed World.

Mom taught me quite a lot, actually, and I’m a fair silversmith; until you’ve spent hours precariously balancing a ring on a firebrick, poking a tiny prong setting into place, applying flux and a microscopic piece of solder, and then fighting tooth and nail to keep it all exactly as you placed it until the solder melts- until you’ve done that, you will never understand the otherworldly patience and finesse the Dwarves of ancient legend possessed. Even simple blacksmithing, like nails and shit, requires a lot of minute and careful maneuverings as well as some serious striking power. Their size is one thing; and their incredible strength is another- but honestly, immense strength is a basic requirement for extremely delicate work because your body won’t get tired so easily and slip up. Smithing, like sewing, requires an unusual, almost psychotic obsession with detail because one tiny little mistake might mean a thousand hours of correction- and even then, it still might not be quite right.

It’s because of this ancient need that today, if a dwarf is cutting gems, setting stones, making knives, or hell, giving a massage, they are one of the most delicate people to do the job. Dwarves are, as a whole, delicate- meaning here fine, intricate, dainty, frangible- but delicate movements are often the most powerful. You don’t need all that much to kill a man; and you don’t need much to save him, either.

Now, as for the Dollsize Sewist Studio that Franky built for me…

Basically, it’s the interior rooms of a house, sans roof-space rooms, built into the shelves of a bookshelf I emptied ahead of time and partitioned in non-intuitive ways. There are a series of balconies and sliding wall-doors, meant for easy access and egress. Further, there’s a mark on the studio floor that clearly shows where to- and not to- step. Stay behind the yellowstriped line, indeed.

The actual studio space is three shelves high, above my waist, with the room I’ll be using as a sewing room at my own eye level. There’s one large shelf below the studio levels, onto which I relocate a selection of vivariums, which will hold various creatures- spiders, silkmoths, beetles… Next to my sewing area, I place Beatrix’ sewing area, because becoming Dollsize is not limited to just me.
There’s a room where I set up drawers full of Doll-weight fabrics, sorted by woven/knit, then weight, then color, then print/woven pattern; drawer after drawer, in neat rows, their tops becoming cutting tables with the addition of smooth-varnished top-pieces and a daub of wood glue. A supply room, where I’ll keep overflow fabrics, extra sewing machines, other tools… basically a closet.

The design room is actually a pair of desks that are miniatures of our actual desks; Remenent
Miniature Company sells working models of nearly anything you can think of at a very reduced size.
As I understand it, the Tontatta (which is Modern for Dwarf, keep up) in Water 7 want all the amenities of city living, just at a size and price they can be getting on with. The Kid and my own desk are actually right next to each other, and while they’re quite neat now, I know that won’t last forever.

Finally, for each Mouse, which is Darla J3LLYB34N Maya Hildy Arlinda Rader Haai Quillaby six, six distinct rooms, each one carefully laid out much the same… They’re basically walk in closets, with little chests of drawers and shelves for folded clothing to live on too. The reason I put their wardrobes in their own individual rooms is because their actual dorm is a legitimate Skuan dollhouse that’s been carriage bolted to the very top of the bookcase and then bolted again to the wall; the top shelf of this bookcase is devoted to the tiny generator, the water treatment, and the reservoir for the actual water inside the house.

The Mice have spent most of this week moving into their individual apartments, getting wallpapers from me… oh gods, I’ve become my mother, I’m their landlord.

Oh my gods.

Oh my gods.

Oh, hey Beatrix.

“Hey Boss- what’s with the second tiny desk?”

“You didn’t think I’d be the only one sewing smallsize, did you?”

“Uh?”

“Hmhmhm. Learning to sew dollsize is not different from sewing full size, except in the minor particulars- meaning, of course, that it’s entirely different and a bit of a pain in the ass. To start with, seams need to be smaller than people clothes- alright there, Beatrix?”

“Um, a little headachey-”

“Then we’ll continue this lesson at a later time. Which reminds me! Chopper?”

“Yeah, Mab?”

“This is the schedule I’ve written out to keep Beatrix to. I need you to fix it so she has time for herself- rest, recreation, free time… it’s hard to make choices for yourself if you’re never given the opportunity to do so.”
“Ah- holy shit, structured timesheet much? Mab, good gods-”

“Mm. That’s why I asked you to fix it; Sanji, Zoro, even Usopp wouldn’t see anything wrong with that schedule, but I know I’ve done it… not wrong, perhaps-”

“It’s certainly not right!”

“Quite. Need a red pen?”

“I have my own!”

I half smile, as Beatrix blinks wide-eyed at me.

“Um… Master Mab?”

“Mm?”

“…Will you tell another story?”

“-! Um. Sure? Hm- every night before you sleep, I’ll tell a bit more of the story I’ve picked. Right now, I’ll tell you the introduction- get your embroidery, Bea, and we’ll do what I always do after lunch…”

I shoo my friends back to their jobs; shoo! Shoo!- and calmly lead Beatrix through the rest of my daily schedule. After I put away all my impromptu story-telling devices, of course.

This is the time I usually spend mending, after all; and in the galley with Sanji at my side as he takes his daily rest. Can’t do much at this point, cooking wise, except let things be and wait for their finishing; and so he sits together with me, and listens to me natter on about nothing at all.

There’s also usually a heavy kissing session too, but I don’t know, he might not feel comfortable doing that right in front of Beatrix…

Beatrix takes the corner, with her embroidery; I sit next to her, with my basket of mending and my supplies.

“Right; stop me at any time if you have a question, alright?”

“Mm!”

“-Did you wash your hands?”

“Of course!”

“Good, good, just checking… now, to begin that story you asked for-

“The Cattle-Raid of Cooley is the chief story belonging to the heroic cycle of Ulster, which had its centre in the deeds of the Ulster king, Conchobar Mac Nessa, and his nephew and chief warrior, Cuchulainn Mac Sualtaim.

“Tradition places their date at the beginning of the Third Age. The events leading up to this tale, the most famous of Fae oral histories, I will shortly summarize here from the introduction to the Tain, and from other tales belonging to the Ulster Cycle.

“In essence, the Dun Bull of Cooley, for whose sake Ailill and Medb, the king and queen of Connaught, undertook the expedition of which I shall tell you, was one of two bulls in whom two rival swineherds, belonging to the Tribe that was once known as Sidhe (now Syreene), were reincarnated- after passing through various other forms, of course. The other bull- and the other swineherd- was Findbennach of the White Horns.

“Findbennach was in the herd of Queen Medb at Cruachan Ai, the Connaught capital, but left it to join Ailill’s herd. This caused Ailill’s possessions to exceed Medb’s. In the Fae tradition, a King is equal to other Kings, and to his Queen; thus, to equalize matters of possession, Medb determined to secure the great Dun Bull, who alone equalled the White Horns.

“A politic embassy to the owner of the Dun Bull failed, and Ailill and Medb therefore began preparations for an invasion of Ulster, in which province (then ruled by Conchobar Mac Nessa) Cooley was situated. A number of smaller Tana, meaning cattle-raids, prefatory to the great Tain Bo Cooley, relate some of their efforts to procure allies and provisions. I’ll tell you those, if you really want, I suppose…”

“Well, keep going with this bit, Boss.”

“Aye- best to finish what I start. Queen Medb chose for the Tain Bo Cooley the time when Conchobar and all the warriors of Ulster- except Cuchullain and Sualtaim, were at their capital, Emain Macha, in a sickness which fell on them periodically, making them powerless for action; another story, of course, relates the cause of this sickness, the effect of a curse laid on them by a fairy woman. Ulster was therefore defended faithfully only by the then seventeen-year old Cuchulainn, as Sualtaim was a bit of a stuttles…

“The Hound of Ulster, Cullan’s Hound- Cuchulainn was the son of Dechtire, the Ulster King’s sister, his father being- well, either the stuttle, Sualtaim, warrior of Ulster; Lug Mac Ethlend, a divine hero from the Sidhe; or Conchobar himself. The story I’ll be telling you considers both Sualtaim and Lug Mac Ethlend to be Cuchulainn’s father.

“Cuchulainn is accompanied, throughout the adventures here told, by his charioteer, Portgas D. Elphame. Elphame was a Connaught hero; she was exiled from Connaught through a series of events I can only describe as Pervert Overload, and no more will I say on the subject.

“In Queen Medb’s forces were several Ulster heroes, including Cormac Condlongas, son of Conchobar, Conall Cernach, Dubthach Doeltenga, Fiacha Mac Fir-Febe, and Fergus Mac Roich. These were exiled from Ulster through a bitter quarrel with Conchobar, who had caused the betrayal and murder of the sons of Uisnech, when they had come to Ulster under the sworn protection of Fergus, as told in the Exile of the Sons of Uisnech.

“The Ulster mischief-maker, Bricriu of the Poison-tongue, was also with the Connaught army. Though fighting for Connaught, the exiles have a friendly feeling for their former comrades, and a keen jealousy for the credit of Ulster. There is a constant interchange of courtesies between them and their old pupil, Cuchulainn, whom they do not scruple to exhort to fresh efforts for Ulster’s honour.

“An equally half-hearted warrior is Lugaid Mac Nois, king of Munster, who was bound in friendship to the Ulstermen.
“Other characters who play an important part in the story are Findabair, daughter of Ailill and Medb, who is held out as a bribe to various heroes to induce them to fight Cuchulainn, and is on one occasion offered to the latter in fraud on condition that he will give up his opposition to the host; and the war-goddess, variously styled the Nemain, the Badb (scald-crow), and the Morrigan (great queen), who takes part against Cuchulainn in one of his chief fights. Findabair is the bait which induces several old comrades of Cuchulainn’s, who had been his fellow-pupils under the sorceress Scathach, to fight him in single combat.

“I suppose I ought to tell you now, before we’ve gone to far- Scathach has always been a hereditary title, a name which gets passed down through families in specific ways for various reasons. In the days of my Danelphe’s youth, before she swore herself as sister to my Granuna, Scathach was her great-grandmother. Nowadays, Scathach is me.

“Oh, yes- and this never fails to make Sanji just a little nutbars, which is one of the reasons I try not to break it out too often- use a joke too often, and it goes stale, you see-”

“Of course, Boss.”

“Right. Cooley is spelled ‘Cualnge’-”

“Wait, what? So, Maive is spelled-”

“M E D B, aye. My name is spelled M A B, but said as-”

“Mav. What the hell.”

“Oh yes. Just to be sure- don’t try to retell the story unless you know how to say the names, and how they’re to be written. I can hear when someone’s got it wrong, the same as you can hear when someone’s calling you ‘Beatrice’. It’s a Fae thing.”

“Huh.”

“Anyway; it’s about time for afternoon training, prefaced by sucking face with my ULTRA SEXY HUSBAND-”

“-LOVE YOU TOO, BABE-”

“-and a short nap. You don’t have to stick around for the face-sucking or the nap, but I would like to have a bit of a spar to see where you’re at this afternoon.”

“Uh. I… I think I can do that, but my Rending Shears aren’t all that strong… I don’t think they were ever intended to be weapons, is the problem.”

“Hm, no, those them in your belt holster?”

“Yeah?”

“-Aha! These are Sail Cutters, meant for use in the production of ship sails. They’re very good at cutting fabric… and you’ve been using them on more than fabric, haven’t you?”

“Yeah.”

“Hm… They’re almost broken- the spellwork’s fine, but the metal underneath… No, you can’t use these in this condition. I’ve got the training to fix them, but it’ll take at least a month…”

“R-really?!?”
“Hmhmhmhm. Guess I know what my new project is while you’re working on assignments. Ah, Chopper- did you mark the schedule up?”

“Yes, I did; the only way you’re getting everything done is with block scheduling, not everyday stuff. Here.”

“Oh, thank you, that’s really helpful. -um. Is Sunday supposed to be almost entirely empty?”

“You specifically asked me to give her time for herself- and, considering her age…”

“Gotcha. Here, Bea; this is yours, not mine.”

“Uh- right, thank youooooou’re putting me back in school?!?”

“Yes. This is just your schedule, mind, Chopper already fixed the one for the rest of your siblings, and Sanji’s got Deborah’s nearly done.”

“I’ve got it done, actually, I just need Chopper to fix mine, too.”

“WHAT THE FUCKING SHIT, SANJI?!?”

“S’why I need you to fix it.”

“FUCKING OBVIOUSLY- first of all, she cannot work every service, she’s too young.”

“Uh-”

“Secondly, the only Watch any of the Suntides or Mice are cleared by me, their Doctor, to sit, are the First ones. If you want Deborah to take First Watch, she cannot do the Dinner service; and if you want her to do the Dinner service, she cannot do the Luncheon. I’ll give you a pass on Tea service, as that’s not something that’s too much for everyday, and Breakfast service is complicated enough for you to genuinely need an assistant; but hear me now, Cook. Your apprentice is a young woman who is still growing. She needs sleep, and time for herself. If you want her to work two formal services, and one informal service, that’s fine. However, she is still scheduled for scholastics; and no, you cannot just put her on all services and all scholastics on alternating days. She will burn out.”

“…You’re being much meaner to me, Chopper.”

“MAB DIDN’T OVERSCHEDULE HER APPRENTICE; SHE GAVE ME A SCHEDULE WITH A SERIES OF CLASSES, AVAILABLE TIME SLOTS FOR EACH, AND A REQUEST FOR SOME EMPTY SPACE SO HER APPRENTICE COULD EAT, SLEEP, ENJOY LIFE, AND SO ON. FIX THIS, SANJI.”

“…um. That’s how I grew up, though, and-”

“…That’s how I grew up, too, Sanji. There’s a reason we follow, and not lead. I want better for Beatrix. And how can you expect Deborah to innovate if you never give her the time, tools, or inclination to do so?”

“…right. Sorry- let me just…”

Sanji spends the rest of the time between luncheon and training furiously scribbling on his schedule.
for Deborah, before Beatrix takes pity on him and offers her own schedule to crib from. Sanji blinks at it, blinks at her offering it to him, and thanks her for the kindness.

I hand Beatrix a butterscotch; good girl. I spray Luffy with a small spray bottle I keep chilled and salinated for moments like this- “You don’t deserve a butterscotch, Captain!” spiff!!!

And he runs off cackling.

The schedules look like this, when they’re done: Moonsday, Wyrdasday, and Foolsday, a series of classes, starting with Grounding, Centering, and Ethics in the morning with either me or Sanji, right after we get up for the day. I’m sure Sanji has his reasons, and Ethics are important… Then, after First Breakfast but before Breakfast service, a very important distinction, the ‘prentices are scheduled to have their Master/Apprentice time, learning the Arts and Trades of which myself and Sanji are both Master of. Then, of course, Breakfast Service, followed by a block of free time, and then Martial Arts training out on the Deck with myself, Sanji, Luffy, and Zoro. Mm. I think I’ll be asking Zoro to teach Beatrix how to wield Swords, she’s a swordfighter if I ever saw one…

Then it’s tea-time, followed by smaller classes with the various persons on this ship; first aid, rites and rituals, potions and alchemy, music… all important things for the well rounded individual!

Tuesday, Throughtsdays, and Sidleday, the schedule starts with self directed study, followed by hardcore academics, then social studies and the humanities- mythozoology, mysticism, herblore, animal husbandry, literature, languages, mathemagic… good schedules, really. I quite like how they’ve got free days on Sundays, to do as they like with, and copious blocks of free time scattered here and there for them to enjoy life with. S’better than I ever got.

“While Sanji works out how to make better life choices, I’ll tell you how the tale of the Cattle-raid shall be divided. Firstly, Fedelm’s Prophecy; Secondly, Cuchulainn’s first feats against the host, and the several geis, or taboos, he laid on them; Thirdly, the narration of Cuchulainn’s boy-deeds, by the Ulster exiles to the Connaught host; Fourthly, Cuchulainn’s harassing of the host; Fifthly, the bargain and series of single combats, interrupted by breaches of agreement on the part of Connaught; Sixthly, the visit of Lug Mac Ethlend; Seventhly, the fight with Fer Diad; and eighth, and last, the muster of the Ulstermen. Right now, though, it’s time for training.”

One of the very first things Missus Mab did when we all got to the ship was take us Suntide Vinsmokes down to her Laundry Room and give us a measuring. Apparently, we didn’t actually need to stand for measurements; Missus Mab knew our sizes as soon as we set foot on the deck as crew. This was for more… sentimental reasons.

The Laundry Room is a bit like nowhere I’ve ever been, and a bit like all the best places I’ve ever been; it’s marked out neatly, with the kind of purposeful thought behind it’s form that means ‘this is the area of a Master; tread lightly on this ground’. Somewhere between the woodshop and the library, with a hint of humidity, soap, and sweet smelling essential oils. There are beeswax candles stacked fifteen deep on one shelf, and tins of paint and varnish on another; sparkling things flicker here and there.
There’s a big post in the wall on one side of the room, and on that post there are a series of lines marked in perfectly level scrawls, each one notated with a careful hand in letters I don’t quite understand. She started with the Mice- each one had to take off their shoes, sandals, or walking slippers, and stand flush against the post; then, Missus Mab took a ruler and a scratch-marker and made a straight line on the wood, marking out what have to be numbers, and then a name.

She did this for all of us- and then she did it for all the Officers, and cheerfully intoned each new height. Captain cheered loudest about growing a whole five centimeters, but gods blessings he’s a short man…

Honestly, the only thing that really stood out to me was the terrible, terrible joke Mister Sanji told his lovely wife, when she was taking his height- and also, now that I think of it, goosing his horns.

‘What happens if a wolf falls in the washing machine?’ said Mister Sanji.

‘I dunno.’ said Missus Mab, obviously playing along.

‘She becomes a wash and werewolf.’ said Mister Sanji.

Missus Mab howled with laughter, and it wasn’t the polite, closedmouth laughter I learned of in my Jesting classes- and I’d heard her regularly use; it was deep, belly laughter that comes from a true and healthful place.

Missus Mab likes terrible puns. Missus Mab likes her jokes as pungent as possible; if you can change the entire metaphorical ph of a conversation by letting one rip, she’s happy. Mister Sanji is exactly the kind of person who is not only similarly amused by terrible, terrible puns; Mister Sanji is the kind of person who collects them and repeats them to his wife, specifically so they can laugh together.

I think that’s what real love is supposed to be- what a piece of it looks like, anyway.

Oh, yeah, and Missus Mab taught us all how to use sock clips- it’s a lost cause for most everyone else, but… if we want our cool socks back in anything approaching timely fashion, we’d best get into the habit of clipping them together, like she showed us. She also took the time to show us all through the laundry room, where everything is, and how it’s all used…

I think, of everyone in this crew- even Mister Sanji… I think Mab is the most chronically kind person I’ve ever met.

Basically, it boils down to this- there will come times when we won’t want her to explicitly know what’s happened to our fabric goods- not our bedding, not our clothing, nothing. She, of course, will know anyway- but, if it’s not explicit, in essence, if she didn’t wash everything herself (or make Beatrix do it), she won’t bring it up later.

Ever.

Trauma, she said, doesn’t care who you are or what kind of reputation you have. Mab, herself, doesn’t care who is doing laundry, or when- she only cares that stains and odors are treated correctly, as laid out on the large informational poster right there, above the washing machine. -And yes, there is a way to get the various Clown Slaps out of fabric, and blood, and chocolate, and coffee. It’s all right there.
She even explained the clothing tagging system, and if there was no tag on our clothing that we could see, to please, please put one of the supplied safety pins into the article, so she (or Beatrix) could correct it.

Hell, she even explained how and why to use the pet grooming station, which is a thing I wish we’d had room for back at Ma-quila’s house…

You know, it wasn’t ever my intention to become a pirate? I always thought I’d end up being a Jester in some Noble court, or maybe a carnie in a circus… still. Vinsmoke Sancho Horizon, Pirate Joculator, has a certain ring to it, y’know? I mean, a Pirate Clown, that’s fun. You can do things with that- because, really, clowns aren’t funny.

No clown is ever really funny. That’s the whole purpose of a clown. People laugh at clowns, but only out of nervousness, or a sort of- thank the Powers, that isn’t me - sort of feeling. The point of clowns is that, after watching our blood-less play, anything else that happens seems enjoyable.

Shit, maybe I am meant for piracy…

"If it's clean in the kitchen, go ahead and toss the salad."

D’you know what that means? It means, if my dick is freshly washed, no smegma buildup or awful urine stench, it’s safe to assume my balls, and my asshole- including my asscrack- are clean as well. Thus, go ahead and lick it, if you want.

Here’s what you ought to know about what it feels like when your beautiful wife decides that the thing to do to add a little spice to today’s dish is to go straight for the salad. I will say this: it feels fantastic!

Nerve endings I never knew I had lit up and danced under her heavy wet tongue. It’s… really, it’s astoundingly nice, a disarmingly sensational experience, overwhelming and heavenly at once. It felt like I was being possessed by a hot wet Power, and, well- when she did it, I started speaking in Demonic, which… I’ll get to that in a bit.

Basically, to start, we were in 69; she would work her magic on my dick, I would put my whole face in her mojo, the usual. Then, I don’t know- she started going lower, and by the time she was at my taint all rational thought had fled me and uh, then she was giving my pucker a little hello and the phrase ‘transcendental copulation’ had never applied so well.

I feel as if I quite lost my mind, or at least whatever piece of it is involved in not putting bruises on my wife’s skin, not speaking in Demonic, and not sodomizing my wife either. I usually don’t moan so loudly either, but here we are.

Demonic is the language of Demons; it sounds a bit like… um… well, there are some sounds in Muscovia that are similar, I think. Comes from the Ura tribe of Orcs, in a very specific region of Musovy… Udoroth spoke Uralic, which is what Demonic came from originally.

Anyway, Demons don’t say ‘I love you’ in Demonic.

In Faesh, which is one of several languages Parlar gets its particular je nes quoi from, it’s normal to say ‘I love’ for things you consider extremely enjoyable- food, music, cats, and so on. You can even use it on, and for, people- but in Demonic, ‘minä rakastan’ is exclusively for your romantic partner alone. I’ve never said that to my wife before, because I wasn’t ready- it’s- honestly, growing up I heard it most in a sarcastic sense (‘I just LOVE the way you fought your brothers, Sanji’); I think I only heard it used seriously once, and that was between two people so old they were past caring about propriety.

Even when I do want to say ‘minä rakastan’, it’s ridiculous! It’s so awkward to say, and the meaning is so- urgh! It sounds wrong. If I’m speaking Demonic at all, which is fairly rare- although I might have to, as the Suntides do deserve to have that part of their heritage- but if I was speaking Demonic, I’d much rather say ‘olet rakas’. It sounds better, and it can be used by friends and family without being so connotative. I- hm. If it were just a matter of it sounding weird, the language would have changed entirely- but it hasn’t.

“Go on.”

“I- this is kind of difficult to explain. The words for ‘I love you’ in Demonic are so uncomfortably formal- it doesn’t roll out of the mouth in the slightest, it’s not- it’s not flirty, or teasing. There is no way to lessen the weight of those words.”

Mab- after tossing my salad and listening to my helpless babbling in Demonic- asked me what I was saying. When I replied I didn’t know, she repeated back what I had said, and when she felt my shock and embarrassment, got worried enough about me that I just started… I started explaining it to her.

She, of course, listened to me intently and with a gleam of curiosity and ‘want to understand’ in her eyes, because she’s an absolute treasure.

“Linguistics isn’t my forte, but I’ll try to explain this. Firstly, words really do have more meaning and weight in Demonic than they do in any other language, even Sung-en, or Sunken, Faesh, the language of the Court of Law. Demonic words are precise to the uttermost, at a level beyond Sunken Faesh. If it’s been said in Demonic, what is meant is exactly what is said; there are no take-backs, no deviations, and no derivations. It’s- it’s a language of absolutes.

“I’m not kidding- there are synonyms, sort of, but each slightly different word that means broadly the same thing differs in the connotation of the tone in which it’s spoken. Some words in Demonic come with centuries of baggage for you to unpack to even begin to understand how deeply ingrained their meanings are- Mab, I’m talking… I’m talking F-word, B-word, G-word levels of ingrained meaning and connotation.

“There are newspapers printed in Demonic, of course- it’s the national language of Germa Kingdom, there have to be- and if ever a journalist makes a mistake and tries to do a take-back… You could never sound more untrustworthy, more like a liar or a faker, than what that sounds like to a Demonic speaker. In Demonic, you, and everyone who hears you speak, or sees you write, knows exactly what you said, knows exactly what you wrote, and exactly what you meant when you did.

“In the textbooks that teach non-native speakers how to speak Demonic, it’s often said that ‘Demonic is spoken as it’s written’; what they actually mean is pronunciation. You say the words like they’re written. No one, excepting, possibly, formal reciters, ever speaks written Demonic.”
“Why not?”

“Written Demonic is extremely formal and rigid. There are vast differences between the spoken and written forms of Demonic. Written Demonic is the standardized, default written form of Demonic. Most books published in Germa Kingdom, like school books, technical manuals, poetry- those are written in that style. That way, every Demonic speaking person can understand the book, even though the various dialects of Demonic have... well, there are words unique to each dialect, that don’t cross over and can’t be explained easily at all.”

“...Se on se, jonka oppin koulussa?”

“Jep. Written Demonic was sort of, um, developed way after the spoken language was, and that shows. Demonic on paper doesn’t move like it does on your tongue. Spoken Demonic often drops entire words, syllables, vowels, you name it. Meaning and direction of conversation is provided by the speaker and what is spoken- so, a lot of things can be left unsaid, and usually are. Demonic personal pronouns aren’t gendered because of that, basically; and the Fae stole the idea off us because, what?”

“Made filing easier.”

“...really?”

“Jep.”

“Let that be the reason, then... Um. Hm. I got a lecture on this once, let me see if I can- right, okay, Demonic is an agglutinative language, so words bend tremendously and allow for new and understandable words to be created on a whim. A lot of dialects affect consonants and vowels- and yet, if you know Demonic, it’s still perfectly understandable. Go figure.

“Back to written Demonic- the way it behaves out loud sounds incredibly odd, most of the time. Written Demonic is clunky, when spoken aloud; personal pronouns sound out of place when following the proper format. It doesn’t allow for letters or words to drop. The order, also, is very stiff when compared to what actually gets said; the inconsistencies that crop up are often bizarre, and not at all intuitive. Very- businessy, if that makes sense. Thus, it only gets trotted out in non-spoken formats; which is why it’s always referenced as ‘the Written Demonic’; chiefly because, no one in their right mind who can speak Demonic talks in Written Demonic.

“The best way I can explain this is- if a Faesh-speaking native heard someone start speaking, I dunno, Sidhe-”

“Actually, if it’s Sidhe, it becomes Sira, language of Syreenes; if it’s Faesh, it used to be Tuathic.”

“Fine, Tuathic then. That’s how different the tones and verbs behave and sound between Spoken and Written Demonic. No one talks as is written in Demonic. I- I can’t stress that enough, Mab- no one talks like that. It’s grating to the ear, and personally I avoid Demonic audio anything where it was written down, first, because Demonic as it’s spoken is does not sound like Demonic as it’s written, then spoken.”

“And you don’t say ‘I love you’.”

“N-no. No, saying ‘I love you’ in Demonic sounds weird, because ‘Minä rakastan sinua’ is Written Demonic. No one speaks Written Demonic; it’s not meant to be said. Therefore, the exact phrase for ‘I love you’ is never, ever spoken in that particular format.”
“I- I don’t-”

“The literal translation of ‘Minä rakastan sinua’ is I love you, literally, but it sounds like ‘It is I that loves you’, which is a bit-”

“-Oh! Oh my. Yeah, that’s a bit-”

“So. The nearest you might hear is where the ‘I’ from ‘I love you’ gets dropped; it actually still translates to ‘I love you’, because of how Demonic verbs and conjugation works. ‘Rakastan sinua’ instead of ‘Minä rakastan sinua’ sounds better, because it drops the whole ‘It is I’ part, letting it be implied like in normal spoken format. The word ‘you’, ‘sinua’, is still in its formal version, but since that’s something that can’t be left out, you either say ‘Rakastan sinua’ and sound a bit weird, or use a spoken variant of ‘you’; thus, it becomes ‘Rakastan sua’. This can then be replied to with the equivalent of ‘so do I’ or ‘I too (love) you’, ‘Minäkin (rakastan) sinua’ where the word ‘love’ can be dropped out because the meaning is carried from the previous sentence.”

“Rakastan sinua, Sanij.”

“Minäkin sinua, Mab. -Still, it’s fairly rare for any Demonic speaker to ever, ever say that, in that particular way.”

“What do you usually say, then?”

“Mm. Well, instead of ‘I love you’, we usually say that ‘you are loved’ or ‘you are dear (to my heart)’; ‘olet rakas’, because that’s how predominately Demonic language and culture works. Faesh doesn’t have words for ‘rakas’ that could bring the heart-felt implications to the forefront like Demonic does. No language I’ve ever had the pleasure of hearing comes close.”

“What are the connotations, then, hmnnnnnn?”

“It- um. Mmmphm! Mmmmphmmmmmm♥! Fwuah, it, hah, it comes with heavy romantic, endearing and- hhah- sickly sweet connotations. Oh-oooh-other words- other words- w-what was I saying?”

“Other words, hmnnnnmm…?”

“Yeah! Other words get tacked onto ‘rakas’ if the speaker doesn’t mean it as a declaration of undying romantic love- the w-w-weight remains, b-but-”

“Rakas, Sanji. MmmmmMmmmmmMmmmmmmmmmm-”

“♥♥♥! Minäkin sinua, Mab! In- in a way, it’s a bit- fffaaaaaah- it’s a bit intimida-”

“Hmmmm?”

“NNNNNGH- it’s intimidating because if I call someone ‘rakas ystävä’ that’s a huge fffuck, fuck fuck fuck, fucking deal. Hhah. Th-the implications of that level of end-d-d-d-DAMMMMIT-endearment means that it’s ride or die- I- I- MAB-! FINGERS-?!”

“Mmmmmhm. Not good?”

“IT’S GOOD, I- I- I THINK♥? ♥! ♥! ♥! ♥! RAKAS!”

“Minäkin sinua, Sanji. Let me see if I’ve gotten it right- when a Demon says they love you, it means a hell of a lot more than it does otherwise, particularly if they say it in Demonic. Like, say, you’re tossing your husband’s salad, or giving his boy-clit a massage-”
“♥♥♥!!! ♥♥♥?? ♥♥♥!!!!”

“And he starts babbling in Demonic, and one of the things that pops out is his declaration of undying romantic love- that means more than if he’d squealed in, say-”

“Rakastan sinua niin paljon! MaAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAB-”

“Minäkin sinua, Sanji- it means more than if he’d squealed in Parlar or Faesh, aye?”

“AAAAaaAAAaAAaAAaA-”

“Hmhmhmhm. So, it’s basically as serious as a formal declaration of war, but for love instead.”

“-AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA♥!”

“Hmhmhmhm- mm, that’s enough for right this second.”

...Demonic is like a heavy, carved boulder; so heavy, in fact, that you only move it with precise intention, and probably only once if you can help it. Parlar is more like small pebbles and the occasional flat-stone you find on the shore, easy to throw into the water or skip across; effortless. They hardly weigh anything at all. I- I can’t take ‘I love you’ back, but it’s lighter in connotation, and you understand what I mean which is what I want. To say the same thing in Demonic takes years of careful planning, support structures, proper tones, and a future intention; in Demonic, I’d end up carving a whole new boulder for each person I said ‘I love you’ to, so, in Demonic, I usually don’t say it at all.”

“Mm.”

“...Rakas, Mab.”

“Minäkin sinua, Sanji. ...You still want to have a course of ‘hide the sausage’, or…? Because I thought ‘Fish-wrapped Sausage with White Sauce’ would be a nice dish for this evening’s pleasure- although maybe ‘mushroom’ is a better euphemism, if we’re using euphemisms- I can’t think of any fish and sausage combination that would go well with a white sauce, but mushrooms could be nieeEEP!”

I’ve flipped Mab onto her back, and I’m shoving my rapidly swelling dick against her warm soft wet pussy and I’m pressing my forehead against hers and just- beaming.

“Jos haluat vielä seksiä kanssani näin, mielestäni nyt on aika ...” she murmurs in her charmingly schoolgirlish Demonic.

“Kyllä,” I rumble back.

And then my Fairy wife puts her Mermaid on, and I can hear her soft breaths become the very beginnings of moans.
Crown to tailtip- begin at the beginning, and end at the end. Mab’s hair doesn’t change all that much, when she puts her Mermaid on. It’s smoother to the touch, maybe, and individual locks of hair don’t want to pull away from each other; if I try to run my fingers through her hair, even in this smooth and shiny state, my fingers get caught. So thick I can’t touch her scalp, and softer than feathers...

Her skin is different- less soft, more rubbery, like there’s a layer of some springy weave under her skin, thicker fat, I could flick a coin at her breast and take someone’s eye out- firm. She becomes firm, and sleek, and the hair she has in abundance is only those places you’d expect hair to be- her head, the spine-line, her brows and lashes. All the rest is gone, and Mab is paler for it, redder, duskier- tawny becomes ivory, sand turns to gold.

Kissing her is as marvelous as ever, but she responds- more? Thrills to my touch in ways I don’t think I’ve ever seen a woman do- a teenage girl, maybe, but I wasn’t good enough then to ever- kyaaa, and the way she nuzzles into my hands is so cute, I can hardly-

Can hardly-

She has freckles, freckle scales, about the size of pinpricks, scattered across the bridge of her nose and her cheekbones, the curved apples of her face.

“Could we- jewellery?”

“Mmm. ‘kay.”

And then, underneath my questing fingers, as I draw trails of delight over her neck and hips, delicate chains of pearls that drip and drape like luminous drops of sunlight over silver and blue-black scales.

Down again to her tail, so smooth it’s slimy.

Normally, I’m in a wild frenzy, bonfire-bright and straining to love her- but right now? Right now, I’m the steady yellow of the pilot light in my oven.

Slowly. No rush.

This is what I Know. Orgasm is a cognitive task for women, and an associative task for men. Men can do more than one thing, or be distracted, and still cum. Women can only orgasm- no other motions, distractions, or voluntary tasks can occur simultaneously.

Make sure everything is nice and warm, dim enough to be comfortable but bright enough you can still see what needs doing. Pay special attention to her feet- if Mab gets unexpectedly cold, her orgasm can get stuck.

Lecher a bonbon? Easy enough- starts with long, broad licks, to build up anticipation for what’s coming later. Up and down and up and down, enjoy the strange scraping texture of her pelvic fins and the soft whimpers of her throat; up and down and all around the swelling ring of pleasures, and when it starts flaring and leaking, well.

Mermaids don’t have a clit; or maybe they do, it’s just the entire first and last thirds of their vaginas- is it really a vagina if her asshole’s in there too? Dunno. I do know that using your teeth to apply pressure- not to bite, just to press- will make her squeal.

You’ll have to practice this a few times, but eventually you’ll see a sign from Management telling you you’re on the right track- at which point, you really focus in on the bulgy ring around her rosie. It’s basically the tip of a penis, just circular- so all the things I like, she’s into as well; circles, nibbles, pressure… _suction…_

When her ring starts to change color, swell, or even when her hips start to buck and shudder against your face, that’s a good time to put the thumb on her introitus- the very slippery entrance of her pussy. It’s very sensitive, and using the pad of your thumb lets you get to more of it at once. Finally, pick one thing that you know feels good for her to do- motion, speed, and pressure- focus on one part of her ring- high, low, curvy side- and fucking _commit_ goddammit. Do it until she cum; if you’re not sure when that is, just keep going until she pushes you away.

If you’re doing it right, her ring will just keep swelling up and her physical responses will become more urgent.

Mermaids are narrower than any other human woman; so, while you’re eating, insert one finger at a time and focus on stretching her just a touch. It’s best to do this _before_ you’ve committed to making her come, but if you forget, it’s okay. Just wait a while after you’ve made her cum, and then start the stretching- a limber pussy is a happy pussy when it comes time to fuck!

Either way, always start slow and deep and build it up until you’re finger fucking her and suckling on her ring. Once you find a rhythm and style that works for you, DON’T CHANGE A FUCKING THING AND DON’T YOU DARE STOP. You’re in this to win this; go until she cums or shoves you away.

Repeat as necessary until- and this is just a personal preference- she’s begging you in a tizzy of sweat and slime and bright red pussy swollen and quivering for you, she’s begging you to fuck her into the floor, please, Rasputin, please please please-

And you do. Because your wife asked for you to- she even used your name~!

The actual fucking of a mermaid is a slow, measured affair- not something a greenhorn should attempt! It’s measured in centimeters of progression, not the in and out _schlick schlick_ of other styles- certainly not at first. If I try going to fast, I could really hurt my wife and completely ruin the moment for her, and I want-

Gggah-

_Slowly-_!

Slowly, until my hips are pressed flat against hers, and she’s shuddering from the sharp points of my hips pressed into her soft smooth skin and she’s whining as the tiny little bucks and shudders of my hips translate into some of the finest fucking she’s ever had, and her tail is _pounding_ into the bed because when my dick is all the way inside her, hilted and swallowed whole, my tip digs into the squishy base and makes her whole world go spark bright and pleasurable.

Find her eyes, brush her hair away from her face and catch her eyes- god my wife is so _cute_ when she blushes, and she always does when I lean my face in close while we’re fucking-

Unph-
-gently catch her lower lip in your mouth and bite on it a little so her eyes flash open and lock on mine again, don't you dare look away hard thrust punctuation and her brown eyes flecked with gold get huge in her head and she's so- mine-

-warm ridged soft wet rippling up and down and up and down the brush of fins over my shoulders and the slap of her tail against the bedsheets and the deep growly-purr that vibrates in my chest and then- and then-

She wraps her hands. Around my horns. And squeezes.

The thing in my chest that couldn’t decide if it was a purr or a growl becomes a roaring brushfire, and my hips slap and snarl against her, all delicate rhythm thrown to the wayside.

I press our foreheads together and pound, watching her eyes pop and flick with each thrust- she can’t break my gaze, now, and I can feel hear think see the babbling in her head being replaced by bright white light pure and clean and radiant, shining out from the top of her head.

I, perhaps cruelly, scrape her over that edge and fling her into infinity, the writhing kisses of her pussy against the head of my dick all the incentive I need to follow her up and out. Just before I do, though, I seal her drooling mouth with a kiss, and wrap my fingers in her hair- she can’t hold this transformation through an orgasm, it’s too much.

The World is pure white and beaming, and I- I dare to run into joy, screaming fit to split the heavens.

When I finally come back, Mab’s wrapped her legs around my hips in an iron grip, and I’m- fffffah-h-how, how am I hard again, I didn’t-

Oh. I didn’t actually ejaculate.

Oh boy.

It’s gonna be a long night. A long, hot, sweaty night.

Mab rolls me onto my back and then-

Here’s the complicated lecture I was going to give to Beatrix, broken down to it’s basic elements.
Doll- or Tontatta- clothing is hard to make, not because it’s hard to sew- once you know how to sew, you know how to sew, and that’s that. Doll clothing is complicated because of all the things you have to take into account long before you get to the sewing stage. Although, now that I think of it- doll clothing is complicated for a few reasons, really.

In particular, seams need to be smaller than normal, and bulk is always a problem. Fabric does not lay on Tontatta the way it does on larger people. The seams are the first obvious difference on inspection of doll-size clothing; almost without exception, all seams are a quarter inch. The exceptions are eighth inch seams, when even less bulk is required. The entire reason for such small seams is to reduce bulk.

Tontatta waists can be described as an ‘X’, proportionally much smaller than other human waists- I think it has something to do with a smaller rib-count, as in they have fewer. When unclad, a Tontatta can easily be mistaken for another kind of creature entirely, not human at all- but they are. Besides, when properly made, the thickness of the fabric makes up for the different proportions of the Tontatta.

Cloth will always appear proportionally thicker on a Tontatta than on a person. So, fairly thin fabric must be used to sew Tontatta clothing; thus, the reduction of bulk wherever possible, which is easiest in the seaming.

Less bulky seams are those with one layer, such as flat felled seams; and when in doubt, a plain seam is better than others. Too much backstitching is also not advisable; it’s better to cross the unruly seam with another seam at an angle, or use a hand knot to finish things. For finishing raw edges, which stops ravelling, there are a few options. Sergers and overlock machines are not advisable, as the sheer amount of thread builds up very quickly, creating too much bulk; there are some styles where the serger is used to create a lace-like finish, but those are for very specific articles. The normal Tontatta-style seam is usually a type of glue known in the trades as Waterproof Fray Check, which seals the fabric edge; the other common seaming method is using heat to seal the edge by burning it. Other styles of seaming Tontatta clothing include a zigzag stitch over the edge, or a hand overcast.

Sewing the actual doll-size garment together requires a different order of operations than the sewing of full-size garments. Skirts and blouses and trousers and pants and shirts- if made as a set, the skirt or pants are begun with, and the blouse or shirt follow after. If a dress is being made, the bodice is the first piece completed, followed by the front and side seams for the fashion fabric and the lining; then the lining is sewn into the bodice.

When interfacing is required, storebought is no good; it’s too heavy for Tontatta clothing. Self fabric or cotton batiste or silk batiste are prefered. These types of fabric will add no noticeable bulk to the tiny garment.

The skirt seams are sewn next, followed by attaching the skirt to the bodice at the waist. Usually, the back of the garment is left open for either inserting a Tontatta zipper, Tontatta buttons, adding velcro, attaching eye-and-hooks, or stitching snaps. Closure types are decided at the pattern cutting stage-snaps, eye-and-hooks, and velcro all require a larger seam allowance than zippers or buttons do. Of course, generous seam allowances do make the entire process just a bit easier…

Fabric must be considered carefully. Avoiding bulk on a small body is paramount, as is staying within scale at small size. The choice of fabric for the garment can make or break the final good; thus, it is very important to stay in scale, not just in print or pattern, but in the actual weave of the fabric itself.

Plain fabrics will always work well for garments, but prints and plaids can be tricky to use. The scale of the print or plaid must be small enough to be plausible on the Tontatta, while still reading as prints or plaids to a larger eye. Those within the ten centimeter and under range will be hardest to create garments for, while larger Tontatta are easier to clothe. It is particularly difficult to find purchasable fabric for the very smallest of Tontatta; often, it’s easier and faster to simply weave the required fabric oneself. Pickiness and snobbery are of the utmost importance here, as the tiniest details really do make the largest differences- the wrong print, the wrong fabric, the wrong pattern, the wrong cut- a single one of these can completely destroy the image trying to be attained. All of them can ruin your interest in the entire enterprise for years.

Fabric weight is also of utmost importance when created Tontatta garments. For those Tontatta in the middle range- that is to say, at or around thirty centimeters in height- the use of much lighter weight fabrics than in a garment meant for a person is commonplace. The attributes of the fabric that are not intrinsic to it- like how flannel or lightweight wool are not as durable or warming as tweed or camel- are produced using a series of potion-baths, alchemical transformations, and runic weavings. These processes are not often used in a larger scale, as they are prohibitively expensive, cause complications at larger scales, and require a level of dedication not found in the average sewist. (Runic weavings are the basis of traditional Fae Fabricraft; however, it takes a very specific kind of person to get any good at it, much like it takes a very specific kind of person to weave complicated heirloom lace for fun.)

Natural fabrics are easier to work with at this scale than synthetics. Polyester’s only real advantage- in this instance- is that it’s cheap and plentiful. It does not press well, it does not take potion or alchemical processing well, and it does not have the right weight or hand compared to it’s natural equivalents. Runic weaving is hard no matter what you do; there are no shortcuts to excellence. The best fabrics to use are lightweight; cotton, silk, wool, linen, and even rayon will work well, especially for the smaller Tontatta. There is more leeway in fabric choice for Tontatta forty to forty five centimeters; and Tontatta over fifty centimeters tall will be the easiest to find appropriate fabrics for.

Mainly, the look of the thing is what’s most important; unless the Tontatta in question is a clown, the fabric should never look clownish.

Linings are often considered garish compared to larger clothing; but there is one very specific reason for the color of the lining and the thread in Tontatta clothing. Tontatta are highly ritualistic and religious people- at least, the ones with the money to fund most major Tontatta fashion houses are- and accordingly require the clothing they buy to adhere to their religious laws. There are enough Tontatta, who follow the same religion, worship the same way, and adhere to the same laws, that their requirements became standardized.

The law, as I recall it, goes something like ‘Thou shalt not stain thy skin with the colors of the World; for I have made thee perfectly in My image.’ Thus, all fabrics meant to touch the skin of a Tontatta are either bleached white, or undyed. And, because the seams go everywhere, the thread is white too.

Sewing sleeves onto Tontatta clothing is different from the regular operations because of size. Normally, the bodice shoulders and side seams are sewn, followed by setting in the sleeves. On Tontatta clothing, the seams are far too small to be able to set them into the bodice, not to mention bulk. The best approach is to sew the shoulder seam, then sew the opened sleeve to the bodice, before the side seams of the bodice or the seam on the sleeve is sewn.
A line of ease stitching just inside of the sleeve cap seam, either by hand or machine, is where it starts. The sleeve is then pinned to the bodice with appliqué pins, and basted in by hand. The sleeve cap is then sewn to the bodice, by hand or machine. The smaller the garment, the easier it is to do by hand; and at that point, a tiny running stitch, as in embroidery or quilting, is preferred.

As always, forcing a flat plane to curve is the most complicated operation of all; introducing a small size raises the difficulty exponentially. Still, some things remain as they always are- the tip of a dart should always end just before the bust point. If it goes exactly to the bust point, it’s too long and looks wrong. There should never be a dimple at the end of the dart; it should always end smoothly and unobtrusively.

Even though Tontatta clothes are much smaller than literally everything else, even baby clothes, a proper dart when required is paramount to success. After all, poorly fitted clothes look no better on Tontatta than they do on everyone else- worse, in fact, because there’s so much less to see.

Double ended darts are usually found at the waistlines of sheath dresses. They supply shaping in the waist area, which is especially important in Tontatta clothing because their waists are so much smaller than other waists. Putting a dart at the waist is no more difficult than anywhere else; sewing a double ended dart is the same as sewing two single darts in mirror of each other.

“The first time my teacher, Madame Stitchworthy, ever had me make clothing for dwarves, I was… hm, probably about your age, maybe a year younger.”

“Oh. So- it’s not… hard?”

“It is; but because of how small the finished garment is, I can justify letting you play with really expensive fabrics. You’ll be getting mostly scrap pieces, and anything I approve of will be going into one of the Mice’s wardrobes.”

“…They’re gonna have some really cool clothes, aren’t they?”

“Gods, I hope so.”

I smile over at Beatrix, whose steady stitches have gotten her through the first sampler well within the schedule I gave her. She’s now working on the second one, and will soon have enough self-confidence to do the disk I first assigned her.

As for the Mice’s clothes, I might as well go over that while I’m doing the mending- I don’t actually need my full attention to do this, not anymore.

To start with, D’artagnan ‘Darla’ Divot is male, not female as I thought on first meeting him. I only narrowly avoided causing a rift between us due to my habitual use of non-gendered language; and, thankfully, I’d already taken his measure for his smallclothes before I needed to use a gendered title. D’artagnan is a young hot blooded man, about fifteen year’s or so, with a deep respect for his friend, Eleanor. It’s a fairly easy mistake I almost made; Darla’s got long brown hair, a high soft voice, and a very curvy body. Don’t let that fool you- he’s a Seahorse type merman, and very definitely a man.

How to say it- outside of the martial arts world, Seafolk come in two varieties. They either look very much like the fish they’re classified as, or they look ethereally beautiful. There’s a reason why my husband Sanji, who loves me more than anything except perhaps a well aged Bordeaux, still has a mild nervous breakdown anytime he’s cognizant of being in a room with more than one female mermaid of near-canoodling age. Or even why he still fucks me senseless when I’m in Mermaid Aspect- frankly, it’s two parts rumor campaign and one part how our eyes work.

Seafolk, even the really ugly or weird looking ones, are shiny. They sparkle and shimmer in the light of day- or stars, or moonlight, or candles… Point is, human beings are hardwired to pay attention to shiny things.

Anyway, Darla has an absolutely shameless sense of style, and loves showing off what he considers his best features- and if that means he’s nearly naked, or wearing the ‘wrong gender’ of clothing, he’s fine with it. Apparently, his full name is actually D’artagnan, but he goes by Darla because it’s easier for everyone- including himself- to pronounce. I call him D’artagnan anyway, as does Sanji; it never fails to make him smile, just a little bit.

Anyway, his clothing is a combination of cropped tops, shirt-less sleeves, and halter tops, which show off in order his waist-size, his abdominal and pectoral muscles, or his shoulder and arm muscles. For small clothes, I made a run of low-chafe haramakis so he could cover his spike-ring without putting undue pressure or tension on it.

Skirts for men are tricky- a straight fall is usually best, with some manner of pleating to allow for much broader movements. D’artagnan likes simple a-line skirts the most, with wider waistbands and a slip or petticoat sewn into the skirt; as for pattern, he detests them. He’s Estern Ryugu, so it makes sense; if he could wear hanbok, he would, but he can’t. So, I make his skirts a multitude of brilliant colors, and do the same to all his shirts, with not a print or pattern to be seen. I also made him a teeny-tiny bangrip out of the beard of wheat heads in it’s natural black color, which he got a kick out of.

J3LLYB34N is about as different as you can get; for one thing, she says the nickname she always wanted was ‘Aramis’. She’s ambitious, as far as Automata go, with a very deep thirst for… well, something. She can’t seem to decide on what; but she always has some manner of plan for getting what she wants rattling away in her brain.

Darla bounds through life on the whims of his heart; Aramis always has a plan. Where Darla was content with a number of brightly colored articles he could mix and match freely, Aramis wanted ensembles for various levels of formality. I obliged her.

It started with a jacket she could throw on over any old thing; translucent, of course. Then, a dress with fur sleeves in a vibrant, non-repeating print; a set of rompers in black, which she quite likes, and a long sleeve ensemble she frankly adores. Another jacket, longer, shorter sleeves, colorful panes of clear… it’s not exactly fabric, but it’s not not fabric, and that’s all I’ll say on the matter. A velvet long sleeve dress and a clear shiny skirt, simple a-line; one of the simplest ensembles I’ve ever made. The other, of course, is the clear overall skirt with the sundresses, as changing the print and pattern changes the entire outfit.

Her most formal ensemble is meant for those Automatic occasions where religious formality is required; her particular sect of the Beloved believe that their Mother, beyond Galatea, was Aglaea, the Splendid. Thus, their worshipping garb must be splendid as well- and so, it is.
She wears flat, flexible shoes with a strap that goes around her ankles, which helps keep them on; and her hair is little more than a clear fuzz atop her head, pointy ears jutting from the sides.

“Hey, boss?”

“Mmm?”

“What was your teacher like?”

“Hm.

“When I was subbing for Moda, who is now my goodly sister, where she worked at one time, a really harrowed- or possibly harassed- looking woman who was perhaps in her early forties came into the shop. She was wearing a cloth of gold cravat that was swiftly becoming an overly-fancy scarf, it’d been tied so poorly; and a rumpled light blue waistcoat embroidered with black ferns. She was not wearing a shirt, and I could not see her legs or shoes.

“Part time cashiers are sometimes not afforded the luxury of seeing a customer’s entire body.

“We said hello to each other as I rang up her purchase- bottle of tea and a small bag of granola; £2.69- me sounding more interested than usual simply because she sounded so out of breath and very engaged in her purchase. Also, maybe, because I could not see her shoes.

“How’s your life going?’ she suddenly asked, passing over her bank card, not casually but almost pleadingly curious.

“Ahm, well enough I s’pose’ I said, too startled by her deep and raspy voice to think of a more cheery lie.

“She nodded somberly. ‘Me too… I guess.’ She paused, and looked at me for a long moment, and then just said ‘It’s a Moonday, you know.’

“Moondays are like this sometimes’ I supplied, feeling like we were having a really weird conversation underneath the one that was actually taking place.

“And then she left. I forgot to look at her shoes.

“Honestly, I had no idea that I would ever have the privilege of meeting this fleeting spirit again. I considered it then as an odd moment, an interaction that changed me in a small way, but a fleeting moment nonetheless. I automatically assumed our paths would not cross again, there was such a finality to that window of time on that particular Moonday in August of my thirteenth year.

“And yet.

“She returned.

“I didn’t really notice her come in, glancing up from whatever menial and instantly forgotten task I was busy with. I surely saw her come in, but did not register who it was I saw, or why she seemed to put out an aura of familiar feeling. It had been weeks and I hadn’t even caught a glimpse of her, nor the barest whisper of rumor; the memory of Moonday in August had faded like a dream. But lo, she appeared before me, dressed in exactly the same fashion that made her look like she had just rolled out of an overly friendly bush- albeit, with a pink blouse and purple feather bowtie this go-round.
“Her face lit up when she saw me, again holding a bottle of tea and a bag of granola. ‘How is your day going?’ she asked earnestly.

“Pretty well’ I said, professionally containing myself, ‘how are you?’

“I’m good, I’m good’ she said, sounding more cheerful than before but just as harried. When I handed her back her change and items she looked like she was going to cry.

“Thank you’ she whispered with a look of reverence I have only seen on the faces of ancient temple-goers receiving the Blessings of the Gods.

“It’s no trouble,’ I promised, trying not to look perplexed.

“She bowed- and I do mean that literally, she literally bowed- and then made a hurried exit stage left, reminiscent of Lear just before the second act, halfway into madness.

“A Lear I had again forgotten to note the footwear of.

“I still reel, even now, at the fact that she returned a third time, after four long months of nothing and on a Fool day instead of a Moonday as well. She was wearing literally the same ensemble she had worn on our first meeting- poorly tied cloth of gold cravat, rumpled light blue waistcoat… with an added day glo orange boating sweater underneath the vest and a heavy military jacket that marked her as a professor at my school. It being the tail end of the winter holidays, the ushanka could be, perhaps, forgiven, but the mittens really caused me no end of consternation, they just didn’t match at all…

“She bought salt and vinegar beet chips this time instead of the standard granola, but the bottle of tea was as usual. She told me that she always felt guilty for buying nutritionally empty snack food, but that ‘we do what we must, mustn’t we.’

“She then smiled sadly at me and said ‘enjoy your weekend, Miss Morgan… if you can.’

“I stood in stunned, unblinking silence for about six minutes until another customer came up and looked me over worriedly.

“Who is this woman?

“What class did she teach at my school?

“When did she learn my name?

“Where did she live and work that she could come to this store every now and again for snacks?

“WHY DID I KEEP FORGETTING TO LOOK AT HER SHOES?

“No, really, how does she know my name?

“These questions would not be answered for some time.

“The fourth time our paths crossed in the never ending quest to sate the snack-craving hunger, I managed, finally, to make note of her shoes. They were a simple pair of burgundy brogues, no more than two years worth of distress worn into their leather, and polished to a soft shine regardless. Her socks were, in order, a pair of knee-high compression tights that did not restrict the toes and I knew that because I was wearing a pair just like hers at the time; and a pair of character ankle socks. They looked like owls.
“The only reason I became aware of her socks was because this particular human being has absolutely no fear of fashion, and the cuff of her shorts hovered about an inch over her knees. I kept thinking that her outfits can’t possibly get any better; as always, I am pleasantly mistaken.

“That day, she wore a crumpled white dress shirt with the sleeves rolled up, a gigantic shawl made of macramed thread in a color I can only call baby-puke green, a neon-orange and pink striped cravat, and a matching wooden watch varnished that same unnaturally bright orange that she probably got as a gift over the holidays.

“She did not grace me with her odd conversational charm that day, but I did receive something better: a clue. Today she was buying a red notebook and three fountain pens instead of snacks, a questionable decision for a Thrusday. Then again, it was a Thrusday; a day which falls under the baleful shadows of the Chaotic Powers, and which you will find I have a deep and near overzealous distrust of.

“When she pulled out her luxurious black and steel plated bank card to pay for her items, she said eight words which shook me to my very core.

“I do get a tenure discount on these.’

“This had never come up before because discount plans don’t apply to food items. I had no need to ask the identity of The Woman buying a bag of granola and a bottle of tea- but now!

“I didn’t speak as I handed over her receipt, merely nodded courteously. Only staff and students of my school knew about the specific discounts available, so I had no real need to ask for an ID for proof; and I cursed my mistake in not asking for it anyway for weeks after the fact.

“I had to find this woman.

“I had been going to school there for four years, and yet had only seen her within the confines of the student grocery at odd intervals during the holidays. I’d never even seen her step into the store, or leave, as another customer is somehow always in line behind her and demanding my attention.

“I spent half an hour going through the school’s entire staff directory that afternoon; and, somehow, I found something. I didn’t want to get my hopes up; I wasn’t certain and would have to gather more information to sniff out even a hint of certainty, and yet- for the first time, I could promise myself a trail to follow, a thread to pull. Perhaps, even, an ending.”

I pause, stand, and stretch. Then I walk into the kitchen, and take the carafe of lightly acidulated water from where Sanji left it for me, along with a pair of glasses and a tray of light snacks. I return to my apprentice and my mending, pour us both glasses of water, and continue.

“My work schedule changed after that Thrusday in January, and I was honestly beginning to think that I would never see the woman again until summer or the fall, as it’d been more than two months since our strange meeting. She startled me quite a bit when she literally blew in as if by a gust of wind right as my shift was ending.

“She was in quite a hurry and only bought a bottle of tea before blustering off, giving me no chance to run an investigation or perception check, but if fashion checks were a thing- and in fact, they are-

“Please imagine, if you will, a woman wearing a repeating chevron-patterned cravat that was, for once, correctly tied, underneath a macrame vest in periwinkle blue threads held closed with twelve sparkling brooches I recognized as the Limited Astrology set from promotional material of the musical, Pyre; she wore the watch I mentioned before, khaki tights, an indigo blouse with three quarter sleeves- and an impeccably matched indigo cape, in velvet, with a collar that stood and neatly framed her eyebrows, not merely her chin and neck. Her shoes were a pair of pearl-pink double strap mary jane heels, and her hair was the exact shape and texture of a cumulonimbus cloud- a thunderhead.

“She looked like a hedge witch.

“I wanted answers.”

I take a sip of my water.

“I found my answers at the start of Fall Semester; Bobbin ‘Needlepoint’ Stitchworthy had graduated with Masters in Divinity, Fabric Arts, Fine Arts, and Mathemagics from Fairisle Military Engineering- FaME, for short.”

“Fame?”

“Mm. She earned distinction as a Professor of Technical Theater; here’s a pictograph of her. I couldn’t believe, after signing up for her introduction class as an elective and immediately falling in love, that I had not been hallucinating that woman for the past year and forty nine days.”

“...Will I ever meet her?”

“Mm. Maybe. Certainly not before I fix your weapons, though- Skua’s not the kind of place to go unarmed.”

Beatrix nods, and continues her sewing; as do I, after finishing my glass of water.

Ah, before I forget; the rest of the Mice’s clothing!

Maya wanted exclusively tracksuits or androgynous clothing, in forgettable shades of grey and neutral- she doesn’t like standing out, does our Athos.

Hildy wanted clothing she could run around in; as she’s Head Animal Wrangler on our crew by dint of us not having one before, I can see the appeal. I did sneak in a few pretty dresses, as I saw the glances between Hildy and Quill, and I like to encourage such things where I see them.

Arlinda Raader Haai and Quillaby were the easiest to create wardrobes for- they wanted traditional kimono, with a few nods here and there to modernity.
And so, my efforts for wardrobe were completed; all that’s left on the list of To Do’s is- ah.

Of course.

Tomorrow, the Funeral. After that- Imbolc!

My, how time’s passage creeps up on us all...
Arrangements Have Been Made

When I wear my eye mask to sleep in, I don’t get prophetic dreams. I try not to even take it off after bedtime so’s I don’t let any of those fuckers sneak in- but last night, I had an itch at the corner of my eye that just would not go away.

When I reached under and scratched at it, it was just past midnight, and thus a new day- and this is the thought that popped into my head.

‘Someone’s getting a funeral tonight. We’ll see who it is.’

-No, fuck you. I’m not going to worry myself over something that might not even happen, dammit. I’m going back to sleep.

Fernanda Out.

Deborah’s the oldest; Adelaide’s the most sociable. Beatrix is outgoing; Cecelia’s introverted. Eleanor has her own group of friends; Fernanda prefers her own company.

Sancho’s good on his own or in a group.

And then there’s me. Genevieve.

I don’t really- I feel like such an outsider! And it’s worse, now, that I don’t even have a broom- I’m terrible at witch skills, did you know? I’m not good at fortune telling like Fern or potions like Deb; I’m terrible at chance dancing like Ellie, and thatamurgy like Trixy does is just… not me. Cece and San have their own thing going and I- I just-

I used to be such a happy little idiot, super honest about my failings but always so damn… happy. I used to actually talk to people, and I’d at least try to make friends, but now… God, I can barely stand being around my friends! I snap and snarl at people left and right, and- and I can’t bear to be in the same room as my siblings at all. I don’t- what the hell is wrong with me?

Tch, so pathetic- I don’t even have human friends, all my friends are animals.

Omnifarious isn’t really a pet, or a familiar- he’s still wild, he just- I guess he likes hanging around me. We used to fly together; he’d teach me tricks, and I’d race with him, but… I can’t do that without a broom. He’s an osprey- and I don’t think he’s going to come with us. He’s got that feel to him- I think he’s going to fly off after the funeral, never to return.

It helps that he’s told me of his intentions himself, and spends almost no time on the ship now that he’s out of Auntie Whisper’s place. I guess he was Mom’s, more than anything else, and with her gone- he doesn’t. He doesn’t want to stay.
Grumble, Jabber, and Shriek are more like… friendly acquaintances. They’re really Fernanda’s familiars, not mine. They’re still a bit too young for their calls to be intelligible, but I know a Swear Toad when I see one- or three, in this case. These particular Swear Toads came from Corally, near the dockside. I’m sure they’ve got vocabularies fit to make even Whitebeard blush- but they’re still a bit too young to really shout it out with gusto. They have mildly venomous bites, and are incredibly fertile- if there’s any damp patch of ground, a colony of swear toads is soon to infest it. You see them a lot around docks in the Kingdom, and especially in the back alleys of dive bars.

Inky, Winky, and Blinky are actually Adelaide’s familiars; they’re all Battle Cats. Inky is actually a Bird Cat, so he fights very situationally. The reason I think Adelaide wanted him is actually for utility, as he synergizes well with some of her stranger applications of Fishman Karate. Winky is a Dragon Cat, if you can believe it.

Blinky is a Whale Cat. He fights best at short range, against a single opponent- there’s another stage in his development coming, but damned if I can remember what it is. He’s tough, though- tough as anything.

Goblynn must have liked one of them long enough to make kittens- they’re all calico, so my money is on Winky. Goblynn is Beatrix’ familiar, and always has been- she’s nosey, overly protective, and very wary of strangers. Beatrix, all the way.

The creature I call Inky, and my sisters often get confused with Inky the Cat, is… well, technically, they’re a kind of Oak. Really, they’re… if a witch can have an overly-mobile tree for a familiar, then… Puffy is mine.

Puffy is… I got her, because she’s a her, when she was just a baby. Or should that maybe be seed…? She was trapped under some banana leaves that got piled up near our roof- I was clearing them away, and she just… she fell, right into my training bra. I didn’t notice her for days, actually- I thought the drain on my magic was the onset of a cold, and it would be another year before my breast-skin got sensitive enough to note the miniscule changes in heat and pressure Puffy made then.

Even now, Puffy is a tiny, tiny creature - only about as big as a pair of balled up ankle socks. The thing that she rides around in, that’s her armor. Part of it is that she wants to be a dragon - she’s told me this herself, y’see. Part of it is that she has a huge crush on one of the Jackfruit Bats that live near the open air market.

Mostly, I think it’s because she doesn’t want to get left behind anymore, and she doesn’t want one of the others to eat her. In her normal form, she’s about the size of a large cotton ball, just as soft and sanitary. In her armored form, you could be forgiven for confusing her with an oaktopus.

I haven’t seen bark nor fur of her since I broke my broom and shoveled my head under the bathwater, trying to drown. I have gills; I can’t drown.

I was so mean to her, I can’t believe- I can believe I said that to her, I’m such an idiot-

I used to be able to talk to my friends- animals, my friends were animals, and I used to be able to talk to them. I guess it started with Omnifarious deciding that he would not journey on with us- I just. I guess it was a bit before I went out and returned and crashed onto the deck, and… And I can’t understand what they’re saying, I can’t understand at all. I only hear croaks and grumbles, no-nothing I can converse with.

It’s very lonely and crushing, not having friends. I’ve never been very good at making friends, and-and now that I can’t even talk to the animals I was friends with, I’m discovering that I don’t know how to talk to people, either.

I’m starting to wonder if there’s not some intrinsic flaw in me, that I can’t seem to fucking- I just, what the hell am I supposed to say to my sisters, to my brother, ‘sorry mom’s dead, what are you doing later today?’ Is- is that it?

Ugh, gods, and it- it feels like everyone on this ship has something they want to do, someone they’re struggling to become. Every time my sisters look at me, I know that all they can see is some useless lump who’s only good for patching other people up after their adventures, I can’t even- I can’t even go on an adventure without fucking something up!

I just wanted- I just wanted an adventure, and all I got was a broken broom and dirt in places dirt was never meant to go. I’m just a stupid, friendless weirdo loser who’s only good as an object lesson in what not to do and for cleaning up other people’s mistakes.

I- goddammit, I can’t even enjoy myself at a fucking party! I don’t- I don’t-

There’s a gap in my memory- I remember going to bed after another useless day of kicks and punches on the bag in the training room, and eating a dinner and it fucking- it tasted like ashes, and I know that’s not right, I know that’s not what it tasted like but- but- I can’t.

I can’t do this anymore.

can’t do what?

I can’t be like this anymore, I can’t I’m just going to- I’m going to jump.

please don’t jump that would be such a mess

I don’t care, I’m going to jump.

can you tell me why?

I- yeah. The so called ‘psychotically depressed’ person who tries to kill herself doesn’t do it out of ‘hopelessness’ or any abstraction in conviction that life’s own assets and debts don’t square away. Death does not appeal. I- I’m going to jump for the same reason a person trapped in a burning building will jump.
what reason is that- is it somehow better to jump than to burn?

Of course it isn’t! Don’t be stupid! The terror of falling is just as great as it would be for anyone else- jumping and falling is no better than burning! It’s just- it’s just, in the moment, the terror of the final stop is smaller than the terror of being consumed. What will I be if I let this consume me? I won’t be myself- I’m hardly myself now- a-and, and I don’t want to fall, can you understand that? I do not want to fall- I do not want to jump. I don’t desire to fall; I fear the consuming flame behind me, devouring what I- who I am.

would it matter if I asked you not to jump?

No. You don’t understand- no one here does. Even if, if they all woke up and came out and started screaming ‘Don’t!’ and ‘Hang on!’; the proverbial nobody down there on the decks could never understand why I have to jump. I have to jump, and they’d never ever understand that, not really- not even if I explained it. You’d have to have personally been trapped like me and felt these flames to really understand a terror beyond falling.

are you really sure this is what you want to do?

It’s not like anything else has worked! I don’t have the guts to kill myself in a catastrophic broom crash, because what if I take someone else out with me? My failure of a life is my problem, not anyone else- it’s my sadness that will devour me like a loathsome flame, I- I- I won’t let it hurt anyone else! I’ve tried hanging myself a bunch of times, and- and I guess I’m just shitty at tying knots, because the rope always broke, or maybe- maybe I’m just terrible at picking spots, because last time I tried hanging I woke up in a ditch full of mud with the rope smacking me in the head and it felt like someone was going ‘STUPID STUPID STUPID’ and I do that enough to myself, I don’t need everything else doing it too. And poison is right out-why’s that?

IT DOESN’T FUCKING WORK ON ME, THAT’S WHY. So. I’m- I’m jumping. I’ve tried hanging and crashing and poisons and none of them ever work- but this. This might do it. I’m all the way on the highest point of the crow’s nest, and there’s nothing sticking out for me to grab onto and there’s no one who can ‘save me’ when I jump. Everyone’s asleep except me- Fuck, I wish this stupid worthless version of me had died when I ate all those pills.

“Genevieve, please don’t-” said Bryony.
“I’m leaving. Goodbye.” I said.

And then I took a step forwards and fell.

There’s this moment, when you’re falling over, where you can feel your balance tipping too far for you to save yourself - an actual, physical sensation for when you’ve actually begun to fall. When I took that final step, I felt that moment.

In that moment of falling, I realized that everything in my life was fixable - except for this. Instant regret, just add suicide attempt number seven.

So, okay, here’s how fucking useless I am- I had everything planned out. I wrote a goddamn note, I snuck out right near the end of a watch so that whoever was on it wouldn’t be too aware, I even-fucking, I snuck up the mast!

I had a final conversation with my- what, my fucking conscious? I fucking confronted my goddamn reasons, confirmed my course- and then I fucking jumped.

Godsdamnit, I’m such a fuck up- this was not the right thing to do! Fuck! Fuck, I’m going to die, I’m going to hit the deck and my body’s going to break so badly I- my sisters are going to be so sad, fuck, fuck I didn’t think of them at all, fuck-

There are things I was still looking forwards to doing, even! I’ve never left this fucking island, and I kill myself now? Gods fucking dammit-“Ooouf!” I gasp, as Bryony- catches me. We land on the deck in a bit of a heap.

I’m not dead. I’m not dead. I’m crying, and clinging to her, and she’s holding me and squeezing me and I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m not dead-

I remember when I thought Mab was an adult. I was still- it’s odd, y’know, becoming human after being distinctly Not. It took the most on me, then Mark, then Taffy; the magic filled in the broad strokes of our memories, gave us details and story beats to fill our lives in around.

If I lean too hard on my memories, they falter, and I remember what I was Before. I thought Mab was my mother, for a time, and then merely my teacher- now, I know she’s my friend, and that has to be enough.

First look at my past, and I grew up on Ilha da Agulha; the daughter of a flower-seller and a passing marine. Second look, and I’m the daughter of a fairy, born on the sea and raised on a ship. Third look? I’m a snail and a crab, bound together with song.

All of those, by the way, are true. I used to think Mab was an adult.

Now, all of my friends, and me too, are adults or close enough. Everybody is just kind of fumbling around, doing their best and tripping over each other’s shit; but, really, we’re just trying to figure out where all the free food is.

It’s in the kitchen, by the way; I poked Brook awake and he stood watch for me, so I could devote my full attention to Genevieve.

Mab took a portion of their mother’s ashes, and had them turned into glass beads. She then took a portion of those beads, and turned them into tokens for each Suntide to wear. Genevieve’s broke when she fell, and I’ve been re-wrapping the wire so she doesn’t lose what remains of it. It’s… it’s the best I can do, I don’t know what else to do, other than be here with her and listen to what she has to say- if she can say anything at all.

I don’t have a song for this; I don’t know what melody would get across what she’s feeling, what I’m feeling. There has to be one- I exist because there was a song to be sung.

As the smell in the kitchen goes sweet and warmello, I make two bowls of oat-porridge, set the water boiling for coffee or tea, and sit down next to Genevieve again. I put the warm bowl in her hands, and watch her listlessly eat, glassy eyes under eyebrows just starting to curl and exhaustion writ large in every wavering line of her body.

There’s a soft, terrified peeping noise, and then a tiny puffball of a bat, bright white against the dark- it’s got yellow ears, and a pointy yellow nose, and tiny little yellow wings. And it’s screaming at Genny.

Genny listens to the little bat’s terrified scolding, and tears- the first real tears I’ve seen from her at all- start dripping down her face. She swallows her bite of oatmeal, and sticks her spoon back in the bowl and sets it aside on the table, before her little friend burrows into the little nook between her clavicle and her shoulder on the right side. It’s tiny little body shivers and squeaks, and Genny brings up a thumb to stroke it’s back.

“Do… you understand what it’s saying?”

Genny shakes her head ‘no’; “It’s enough for me that she came back at all. I was… I was really mean to her a few days ago. I was- cruel.”

“What do you mean?”

“Bats like Puffy… they’re meant to go around in big clumps, like ten or fifteen per flock. But Puffy is alone.”

“Ah. ...I wish there was something I could say to make you feel better about… any of this, really, but… there isn’t. For that, I am sorry- I am truly sorry.”

“...It’s weird. Hearing you say that… it doesn’t make me feel better, exactly, but it doesn’t make me feel worse, either.”

“Hmm. Oof- it’s almost bedtime for me… Hm, but I don’t want to leave you by yourself, either.”

“I- yeah. I don’t want to be alone.”

“We have to tell Chopper.”

“-!!”
“He won’t tell anyone else, if you don’t want him to; but he knows better than anyone what you’re going to need. Considering what would have happened if it wasn’t me on watch… we have to tell Chopper.”

“...Okay, Bryony.”

Once I’d attended the Ash Glass’ production, making the actual personal Charnellements for the Suntides was a simple matter. Silversmithing, after all, isn’t that far off from Crystalsmithing or Goldsmithing; the basic tools for each are much the same.

Deborah’s Red Shell on Waves; Eleanor’s Orange Fins, one the sister of the other, not the twin and wrapped with warming copper; Fernanda’s Yellow Horn, silent ‘till the end; Genevieve’s Green Tablet… broke, and recently considering how sharp the edges are. That can only happen when the wearer goes in direct conflict with the one whose Ash made the glass; incongruous intention that breaks a bond.

At her age there really aren’t that many things she could have done in less than twelve hours to break her mother’s heart. I’ll let her tell me what it is, and pray that my suspicion is unfounded.

Adelaide’s Blue Fins, sisters not twins and wrapped with cool silver; Beatrix’ Indigo Spindles, as she follows the path of the Three-Who-Are-One, and is my apprentice besides; Cecelia’s Violet Drops, wrapped in jarring copper- perfect, for a clown.

And finally, Sancho Horizon’s Teeth, just a touch more wild, a smidge crueller than any of his sisters.

As for where the majority of their mother’s ashes are to be interred, the Morgans have reservations in every major graveyard in every major city in the World. Mostly, it’s so that any Morgan that dies and wants to be buried in a specific place can be buried in accordance with the rest of the family’s wishes.

It’s going to be a strange day.

“Um, Missus Mab- should we put Mom on the Altar before we go?”

“We certainly can, Deborah.”

“...Will you Witness with me?”

“At the altar? Sure. -It’s almost time for breakfast anyway. Just a moment, I need to put my shawl around my shoulders-”

“Yeah, Chef wouldn’t actually eat if you went without it at breakfast, would he?”

“Hmmhm, no. No, he wouldn’t.”
And then, covered and appropriately somber, I direct Deborah to the glass beads that represent the ashes of her mother. They’re pale green, and tiny, in a glass bottle that’s widest at the bottom so it absolutely will not fall over.

The actual ashes themselves are in an urn of woven willow lined with undyed recycled hemp— it used to be a grocery bag, actually.

I follow Deborah, the swishing of a fancy skirt I know for a fact she won’t wear again for at least a year— excepting, perhaps, to another funeral— the only sound outside our somber footsteps. Deborah’s excruciating solemnity is echoed in the rest of her outfit; the three-quarter sleeve black boat neck sweater that’s been tucked under her skirt, the thick black hose, the chunky pumps that click with every step…

When we get to the galley, it’s early enough that it’s only Sanji, Robin, Nami, Franky, Taffy, Bryony, Genevieve, Beatrix, Adelaide, Gurry, and Brook sipping at their first hit of hot caffeine. Sanji’s wearing a black suit, as he always does, but his shirt is a cheerful yellow, and his tie is lightly dancing with daisy-flowers. Robin is wearing a purple cocktail dress and a pair of sparkling drop earrings, and her hair has been left loose, only a few small pins here and there keeping it out of her eyes. Nami, in contrast to Robin’s almost brooding attire, is resplendent in a frothy, creamy orange gown, her neck draped with pearls and her hair bound up high in a bun crowned with— you guessed it— even more pearls. The orange blush ribbon around her waist is a touch I know she added specifically to make Zoro go just a little crazy with lust. Franky, contrary to what most believe, has a preternatural ability to read the mood. So, even if his color scheme hasn’t shifted at all, his attire has—a floral suit jacket over a white shirt, with rhinestone buttons. I think this is also the first time I’ve ever seen him wear pants, too… Taffy is wearing a brown tweed suit. I never thought she’d wear that; I mean, of course I fitted it for her, and all, but— well. I genuinely didn’t think she’d wear it. I guess she’s grown. Gurry, sitting next to Taffy, is in the most somber attire I’ve seen him in yet. Smock-like jumpsuit with the short pants, a dark vest, a dark trench— in this light it looks black, but in the sunlight it’ll look blue. They’re cute together.

Bryony is wearing an ensemble today! It’s a minty turquoise school girl special— or it would be if she wasn’t so statuesque. Bryony has a small persona; she fades into the background, right up until she doesn’t, and then it’s far too late. Her lasso is a glimmer of gold at her hips, and her feathery earrings are uncharacteristically still. So is Genevieve; gods, she has that exhausted look to her… I’m fairly certain I know exactly what happened to break her mother’s heart, now that I get a glance at her. On the other hand, I think Bryony is handling it— or has handled it. That’s the brightest color I’ve seen her wear for a while now. Adelaide is tentatively hopeful, and surreptitiously watching Genny feed her familiar(!) a bit of reconstituted mango. She’s also wearing a much more intensely blue kimono than I’d thought she’d wear for months… it well may be that their Mother taught them more about the Noble Properties than I assumed. Beatrix is also keeping an eye on their apparently fragile sister, when she’s not stroking the velveteen cat lounging across her shoulders. She’s wearing a sweater dress and navy blue tights with navy blue suede shoes; and because her cat’s velveteen, she’s not getting cat fur all over herself. Her lap is also full of sleeping kittens, which is, I must admit, the cutest goddamn thing I’ve seen in my life. Brook is wearing a suit from some five hundred years past; he looks good in it, for all that he’s a skeleton.

Deborah, after pausing a moment to make a new space on the altar, sets the bottle of Ash Beads down with a final, somber clink. She steps away, the wicker urn clutched to her chest, before she stands straight. She bows deeply, as do I, and then she sits at the table with her sisters.
Eleanor creeps in sometime after that. I almost didn’t recognize her- then again, her wardrobe is the most colorful, so that’s kind of the point. It’s a simple outfit, for all it sticks in my head far more than her actual expression, or even how she moves does; just a sweater and a pair of jeans and a pair of ballet flats. She’s wearing her hair dark today; sad. She’s sad.

Fernanda, in her oversized cardigan is just the same; sad. Her hair is brushed neat, and pinned with daisy-flower pins, one larger golden one at her crown- and yet, she is sad.

Cecelia is in her third ensemble, and mutinously staring down her siblings; ah, I had wondered. A woman who wears black at all occasions isn’t going to stop just because it was expressly forbidden. Her violet drops look extra violet against the white of her shirt. Sancho, following on her heels, is in his normal, everyday clothing; white bucks, fluffy-feather pants, two tone shirt and the feathered hat that makes him look more than a little like an owl. He’s also wearing a pair of two tone folding sunglasses, which are bizarre yet entirely him. Just one thing, though-

“No sunglasses indoors.”

“Sorry.”

And off they come, to be folded up and tucked in the breast-pocket of his shirt. Saving them for later. I’d describe the rest of my crew’s outfits- somber, without using black- except I was caught in a bout of melancholy, and so do not remember them at all.

The actual funeral was to start at sundown; we had from the middle of the afternoon until midnight to get everything done, lest we incur the wrath of the Heavens. The burial plot Missus Mab secured for us is in Dunshilly; we have to start in Gobdark anyway, so it all works out I think. A parade; a show; an ending.

Poetic, like.

Mom actually made the arrangements long before she died, what with my Prophecy giving her a huge lead time on it. Her cremation was planned; her urn was purchased- everything was ready to go. All I had to do was make sure everyone who needed to know about her death knew.

So, I set my sisters on it.

Now, it’s time to finish this thing- it’s time, for the one, the only Funeral of Vinsmoke Aquila~!

I start my bally right when we’re about a quarter of the way through Gobdark, as my queue dictates. Deborah went over the whole thing with us, and even showed us Mom’s Testament just so we’d believe her- not like Deb would lie, anyway.

Also, even though Sancho and Cece went to school for this sort of thing, I’ve got more skill at reading a crowd and shouting my lungs out, so, here we are.
“TONIGHT ONLY I SAY TONIGHT ONLY THE FUNERALY PROCEEDINGS OF VINSMOKE AQUILA WILL COMMENCE THAT’S RIGHT TONIGHT ONLY YOUR ONE FREE CHANCE TO SEE THE BURIAL OF A VINSMOKE THAT’S RIGHT FOLKS, IT’S ALL FREE, RIGHT HERE RIGHT NOW, IT’S STARTING UP RIGHT NOW, A BIG FREE SHOW THAT’LL ONLY GO ONCE, THAT’S RIGHT A ONCE IN A LIFETIME OPPORTUNITY HERE FOLKS FOR ABSOLUTELY FREE THAT’S RIGHT BROUGHT TO YOU FREE BY MANAGEMENT’S REQUEST AT ABSOLUTELY NO CHARGE TO YOU THAT’S RIGHT FOLKS SO GATHER ROUND AND SEE THE AMAZING THE STUPENDOUS AND WONDERFUL FOR ABSOLUTELY FREE SHOW ONCE IN A LIFETIME SHOW FOLKS STEP UP AND SEE THE MAGIC HAPPEN BEFORE YOUR VERY EYES—”

Missus Mab has been to funerals like this before, and immediately started spinning as she moved forwards with us, before she swept off her shawl and egads, she’s gorgeous—

“-THE MAGNIFICENT QUEEN MAB, HERE LIVE AND IN LIVING PERSON FOLKS, THAT’S RIGHT QUEEN MAB THE WILD FAIRY QUEEN OF THE FAR NORTH, HERE FOR ONE NIGHT ONLY ON SPECIAL REQUEST QUEEN MAB FOLKS DANCING THE ANCIENT FAIRY DANCES ONLY SEEN BY A PRECIOUS LUCKY FEW AND HERE AT SPECIAL REQUEST FOR THE FUNERAL OF VINSMOKE AQUILA THIS IS ONLY HER WARM UP FOLKS COME TO THE FUNERAL PROPER FOR THE WHOLE DANCE I SAY THIS IS ONLY HER WARM UP FOLKS DANCED HERE AND NOW FOR YOU FOR ABSOLUTELY FREE RIGHT NOW STEP RIGHT UP STEP RIGHT UP COME AND SEE THE MAGNIFICENT.—”

At some point, Sancho and Cecelia started playing instruments they’d brought from the ship—Sancho’s on an accordion, and Cece’s having a party with a viola. We’ve already drawn a massive crowd who’ve gathered round to gawk because, well, the past five year’s are no real indication of who my mother was at all, really.

There’s no real distinction between the way things were and the way things are; just different justifications. The old crooks mix right in with the young bloods, and there’s always a winner somewhere—thought it’ll hardly ever be you. In Gobdark, there’s never really been a time when the survivors among us didn’t proudly earn their reputations as cheaters and unabashed crooks; but it’s also true that in Gobdark, there was never really a need for cheaters and crooks. It’s been a long time since the people who lived here had to sleep under the wagons which held all their worldly goods—had to bed down in muck and scrub with cold water. We don’t need to promise the whole of the world for the price of admission, and deliver absolutely nothing.

Those days are gone—except, of course, where they’re not.

“-STORMBORN NAMI! SOME SAY SHE WAS BORN IN A HURRICANE AFTER OL’ SCRATCH LOST A BET WITH DEATH; SOME SAY SHE CAN’T BE BEAT IN A GAME OF CHANCE! WHAT DO YOU THINK FOLKS? ARE YOU BRAVE ENOUGH I SAY ARE YOU MAN ENOUGH TO TEST YOUR LUCK? FOR ONE NIGHT ONLY ABSOLUTELY FREE, THE MAGNIFICENT WEATHER WITCH STORMBORN NAMI! HERE AT SPECIAL REQUEST TO MAKE SURE THE STRUCK DOWN VINSMOKE AQUILA STAYS STRICKEN FOLKS I SAY HERE FOR FREE ONE NIGHT ONLY STEP RIGHT UP FOLKS YOU’LL HAVE TO MOVE IN CLOSE MAGNIFICENT NAMI IS NOT A LARGE WOMAN AND SHE’LL ONLY BE HERE TONIGHT—"

In some places, for some people, old habits don’t die at all. We’ve got our motley crew of gawkers—now, to use them. They might never actually set foot in the boneyard for the Proceedings, but they can attract people who will. Like a corpse in the depths— one bottom feeder can’t help but attract another.

“—now folks we’ve got a special treat for you tonight, that’s right a special treat i say the amazing sharpshooter, king of all snipers, the one, the only, Sharpeye Usopp! Legend says he never misses a shot, and can only be stopped by donations of gems to this, i say this handysack right here? Could it be true? Could that ancient legend be true, folks? You’ll have to come to the funeral to be sure I say you’ll have to come right along and see to be sure step right up and see for one night only absolutely free step right up step right up and see—"

Yeah, all I did was stop shouting, and the crowd pressed immediately closer. I am good at this. Zoro is holding out a sack and people are flinging in gold and gemstones by the handful, yep, that one works every time— monkey see, monkey do, and even the people who didn’t hear what I said are throwing valuables in now. I can see Nami starting to grin out of the corner of my eye; and we’re only just at the edge of Gobdark now! Ah, here we are—

“NOW FOLKS WE WOULD LIKE TO CONTINUE WITH THE FREE SHOW BUT WE HAVE RECEIVED SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONS I SAY SPECIAL INSTRUCTIONS FROM YOUR LOCAL EMERGENCY SERVICES THAT WE ARE REQUIRED TO MAINTAIN A FIRE LANE ON THE ROAD THAT CANNOT BE BLOCKED BY ANYTHING I SAY ANYTHING, SO BEFORE WE CAN CONTINUE THIS ABSOLUTELY FREE SHOW PRECEEDING THE FUNERAL ARRANGEMENTS OF VINSMOKE AQUILA I NEED, I SAY I NEED EVERYONE THAT’S RIGHT EVERYONE HERE TO PLEASE TAKE A FEW BIG STEPS FORWARDS TOWARDS US THAT’S RIGHT EVERYONE CROWD AROUND— BY THE GODS, IS THAT- BY THE GODS IT IS! LADIES AND GENTLEMEN, BOYS AND GIRLS OF ALL AGES AND SIZES, WE’RE IN FOR A SPECIAL TREAT TONIGHT! COMING DOWN THE LANE, I SAY COMING DOWN THE LANE—”

Sancho and Cece pulled through. As I asked the crowd to come closer, I swept them in three times and stepped back each time- and they did it. It also made room for all the graduates of Gag to set up their bit, and here- Ah, here they come now—
“BY ALL THE GODS OLD AND NEW, COME TO SEE THE FUNERAL OF VINSMOKE AQUILA IN PERSON, IT’S THE NEWEST GENERATION OF CLOWNS! OH, GIVE THEM A HAND, FOLKS, A ROUND OF APPLAUSE FOR ONE NIGHT ONLY YOU GET TO SEE THE VERY NEWEST GENERATION OF FULLY ACCREDITED CLOWNS, BORN AND RAISED AND TAUGHT AND UNLEASHED WHETHER YOU LIKE IT OR NOT IN THIS VERY CITY, I SAY FOR ONE NIGHT ONLY THE CLOWNS OF THE KINGDOM HAVE COME OUT TO SEE VINSMOKE AQUILA OFF HOW ABOUT THAT FOLKS HOW ABOUT THAT LOOK AT ALL THESE PRODIGAL SONS AND DAUGHTERS AND THEIR WONDERFUL FACES-”

Screams and squeals of laughter are filling the crowd. Clowns, man. What can you do but laugh? Crying is just a sign of weakness, after all; and clowns, like all predatory creatures, have a specific taste for the weak. And- here come tumblers, and with them, pickpockets- Ellie came through too, even though she’s- right, her turn comes after-

“-TURN YOUR ATTENTION, I SAY TURN YOUR ATTENTION TOWARDS THE WONDERFUL AND MAGNIFICENT FREEBIRD SYNCHRONIZED SWIMMERS! AREN’T THEY LOVELY FOLKS? SOARING THROUGH THE AIR AND WATER ALIKE FOLKS THIS IS A ONCE IN A LIFETIME OPPORTUNITY SHOW YOU’RE ABOUT TO GET HERE, YOU WON’T SEE THESE LOVELY LADIES DANCE LIKE THIS BUT ONCE IN YOUR LIFE, HERE AT SPECIAL REQUEST TO OBSERVE THE FUNERAL OF VINSMOKE AQUILA AND SPREAD THE NEWS OF HER PASSING TO ALL THE LANDS THAT’S RIGHT FOLKS ONE NIGHT ONLY FOR ABSOLUTELY FREE-”

Above us, Keimi and all the other postal workers at her command dive and dart through the air above us, a spectacular display of synchronized, uniformed aerobatics. Genny, darling, you’re a wonder. Now, for Ellie.

“-YOU CAN TELL YOUR GRANDCHILDREN THAT YOU WERE THERE WHEN A VINSMOKE WAS BURIED THAT’S RIGHT FOLKS I SAY YOU CAN SAY YOU WERE THERE WHEN A VINSMOKE WAS BURIED AND WASN’T THAT A LOVELY WARMUP BY THE FREEBIRD SYNCHRONIZED SWIMMERS FOLKS I SAY WASN’T THAT A LOVELY WARM UP EVEN I DON’T KNOW WHAT THEY’LL DO FOR THE FUNERAL FOLKS NOW IF I COULD HAVE YOUR ATTENTION FOLKS I SAY IF YOU COULD TURN YOUR EYES TOWARDS ME RIGHT NOW, YOU’RE ABOUT TO SEE FOR ABSOLUTELY FREE A WONDERFUL THING I SAY A WONDERFUL THING- HERE, NOW, AT NO COST TO YOU- THE AMAZING- THE STUPENDOUS- THE ONE AND ONLY JUMPING MICE CIRCUS -”
It starts fairly small— and then, by the time masked and costumed thieves of Eleanor’s acquaintance are leaping through the air in synchronized feats of daring, we’re halfway through Corallia and we’ve picked up a fairly respectable crowd. The steady beating of drums and the crashing of hooves on stone; carts carrying more people who agreed to come to the funeral.

“-HERE LIVE FOR ONLY ONE NIGHT THE SPECTACULAR JUMPING MICE CIRCUS, WITH SPECIAL GUEST BY REQUEST THE ONE AND ONLY ALLEY CAT! HERE AND LIVE FOR ONE NIGHT ONLY HERE TO SEE VINSMOKE AQUIULA GET BURIED IN THE GROUND FOLKS FOR ONE NIGHT ONLY THE FUNERAL OF VINSMOKE AQUIULA A ONCE IN A LIFETIME OPPORTUNITY FOLKS-”

They’re packed in tight like canned sardines, and we’re rumbling up towards Dunshilly Boneyard, the most expensive and rarefied graveyard in the Kingdom.

“-I SAY FOLKS I SAY WE’VE BEEN PREPARING THIS FOR FIVE YEAR’S IN ADVANCE, THE ONE AND ONLY BURIAL OF VINSMOKE AQUIULA! THIS IS A ONCE IN A LIFETIME OPPORTUNITY- A ONCE IN A LIFETIME OPPORTUNITY TO SAY THAT YOU, YES I SAY YOU, WERE THERE TO SEE VINSMOKE AQUIULA BURIED- HERE AND NOW, FOLKS WE’RE COMING UP TO THE GATES OF DUNSHILLY BONEYARD, WHERE THE VINSMOKE WILL BE BURIED AND WHILE OUR SHOW IS COMPLETELY FREE THE ENTRANCE FEE FOR THE BONEYARD IS NOT- I’M WITH YOU FOLKS, I’M WITH YOU, BUT IF YOU WANT TO SEE HOW THIS ENDS- WHY, FOLKS, THE TICKET TELLER’S RIGHT HERE FOLKS! THAT’S RIGHT, ADULTS ARE FIFTEEN HUNDRED BERRIES, AND CHILDREN UNDER THE AGE OF TWO ARE FREE THAT’S RIGHT FOLKS JUST FIFTEEN HUNDRED BERRIES AND YOU CAN SAY TO ANYONE WHO EVER ASKS THAT YOU WERE THERE TO SEE VINSMOKE AQUIULA BURIED IN THE GROUND FOLKS FIFTEEN HUNDRED BERRIES AND YOU CAN SAY TO ANYONE WHO EVER ASKS THAT YOU WERE THERE TO SEE VINSMOKE AQUIULA BURIED IN THE GROUND FOLKS FIFTEEN HUNDRED BERRIS IS NOT TOO MUCH TO ASK TO SEE A LIVE ANGEL WITH A MASSIVE SNAKE FIFTEEN HUNDRED BERRIS IS NOT TOO MUCH TO SEE A REAL AMAZON FIFTEEN HUNDRED BERRIS IS NOT TOO MUCH TO SEE A DEMON FIFTEEN HUNDRED IS NOT TOO MUCH TO SEE A PIRATE FIFTEEN HUNDRED IS NOT TOO MUCH TO SEE A TALKING SKELETON FIFTEEN HUNDRED IS NOT TOO MUCH FOR THIS ONCE IN A LIFETIME OPPORTUNITY WHY THAT’S A CASE OF SODA-POP AT THE DAISO YOU CAN BUY A CASE A POP NOW CAN’T YOU FOLKS THIS IS A ONCE IN A LIFETIME OPPORTUNITY AND THE WONDERS YOU’VE SEEN FOR FREE WILL PALE IN COMPARISON TO THE WONDERS YET TO BE SEEN!”

Now to reel them in.

“YOU DON’T WANT TO MISS THIS!”
Got’em. There’s one born every minute, I do declare...

“I CAN SEE OUT THERE IN THE CROWD THAT YOU DON’T BELIEVE ME- GOOD! YOU’LL NEVER KNOW FOR SURE IT’S A VINSMOKE BEING BURIED UNLESS YOU COME IN AND SEE FOR YOURSELF! THERE ARE WONDERS I CAN’T EVEN TELL YOU ABOUT BECAUSE YOU’D DISBELIEVE ME SIGHT UNSEEN- I SAY SIGHT UNSEEN!”

I take my deepest breath yet, and tilt my head back so I can really bellow.

"COME ONE! COME ALL! SEE VINSMOKE AQUILA- YES, THAT’S RIGHT, THE WORLD’S BEST LOVER!! BURIED HERE IN DUNSHILLY BONEYARD! ONE NIGHT ONLY, FOLKS!”

And then I backflip off the fence I’ve been balancing on and cartwheel through the tombstones to my family. Cousin Sanji has turned a bright, furious red, but he’s also grinning like a fool. All around us, clowns and acrobats jabber, as our throng moves from the entrance of the Boneyard, all the way back to the tallest hill.

Sunken into the middle of that hill is a massive tiered bowl, that faintly echoes at the top but goes silent the closer I go to the flat stage down in the middle.

It’s… I think the word is amphitheatre?

As we go down into the stage, we start tromping around and flattening the grass; the clowns pull out their marching instruments, and after a few nerve-reducing pratfalls, start playing marches. And so, we march; the gloomy first line stomps the grass flat, and clears a bare place in the center.

We’re arrayed in a specific way that I forget the name of- the closest members of the family are arranged by age, closest to the ground on which blessings are about to be pressed. Everyone else arranges themselves as they see fit.

The ice gets broken by the clowns; they did all just graduate, and a funeral is as good a test as any to see if what you learned in school is of any use. But really, when it comes down to it; most clowns, whores, and dancers want to be buried in their best, and they were always at their best when they were working.

Clowns want to be buried in their motley, a full face of slap ready to go home in. The skydancers led by Keimi, on the other hand, don’t want to be buried at all- they pass their names back to the big sorting houses on postcards, say that so long as their names get spoken they aren’t actually dead. They wheel and flick through the air like fireworks- and then the first round of actual fireworks goes off, and they dance with the sparks and the flames and the smoke and the squealing of lights. Then their dance ends, and in come the clowns again- this time, with a special guest, the one and only Laffy Taffy!

She’s completely wrong for circastic clowning- but she’s a spectacular acrobat, leaping from ladder to ladder like thaaaaaaaAAAAAat oh my god that was amazing, holy shit . She then begins to balance on things- first, some wooden blocks, then… then things happen , the clowns keep throwing things at her stack and she keeps catching them with her wings and adding to her precarious tower, Precarious Tower- and then, and then she leaps away as her tower comes crashing down! She’s standing on a thin bamboo pole! She hops on it to prove it’s not attached to anything and then- and then she’s standing upright! Holy shit! OH GODS WHERE DID THAT SNAKE COME FROM? AH, NOW IT’S A SWORD, WHAT THE- WHAT THE HELL? MAGIC! MAGIC!

What follows I can only describe as Laffy Taffy, Opera Clown, Schools her juniors in what it means to really put on a show. Her snake-sword darts and flashes but crucially, never bites anyone; and the crowd roars with awe, laughter, and joy. Laffy Taffy leaves the stage with a sword on her hips, a smile on her face, a near-insensate group of young clowns in awe of her, and a bow to the crowd.

The clowns recover their equilibrium by staggering and pratfalling off stage, to clear the way for MARK!!??!

Holy crap. Holy fucking shit. Mark the Gunslinger is a Trick Rider! Oh my gods, oh my gods- holy shit! I- he moves like he’s an extension of the horse, like- oh my gods, those are the horses we got in the Royal Boneyard! They’re still wild!

I- I’m not watching a Trick Rider. I’m watching a horseman spend time with his friends. When I glance over, Captain and Usopp are watching Mark with a strange sort of awe; like something within him is shining, and that glow of light is bouncing off their faces, reflected back a thousand times in their shimmering eyes-

I look away, and watch the beautiful bodies in motion. They run, they lunge, they turn and wheel and their bodies shine like burnished coins in light. The audience gasps and sighs to see them; and when Mark tips his amazing hat in a bow and rides the lead horse Spare Parts out, the crowd goes wild with applause.

This isn’t exactly what I’d envisioned when Mom told me her theme for her funeral… it’s… It’s better.

Mom, in particular, wanted her funeral to be an occasion not just of sadness- but a celebration, of everything she was and wanted in life. She wanted a hedonistic explosion of life to herald her passing; she wanted clowns to terrify laughter out of people, and hurly burly dancers to whirl across the dirt in near-nudity, titillating and tempting with every glimmering sweep.

Missus Mab is one of the most caring people I’ve ever met; thoughtful, considerate, gentle. She likes making warm, comforting places for people to live, and enjoys living a simple life most of all, I think. Queen Mab, on the other hand, is the Sexiest Woman in the World. As the various dancers Mom taught to be sexy take their turn, I can see them start to set up for Mab- the crowd, on the other side, seems to be in a state of disbelief.

How could having a good time be part of a funeral, after all? Hasn’t enough blood been spilled? But sir, but ma’am- we’re at a funeral for a clown, a hurly burly, a monster. She got the taste for blood when she was licking her own wounds; and death will not change her tastes now.

How could Queen Mab, Sexiest Woman in the World possibly beat this? For th’ gods sake, two women nearly had sex on stage just now! There’s no possible way she- she could be-

And then Queen Mab Dances.

It’s not any one part of her; it’s not the music, even the kazoo one clown broke out and couldn’t stop using. It’s not her smile; it’s not the shining flare of her skin; it’s not the way she moves her body; the way she dances; how she moves her thick shawl here and there, ghosting over various parts of her body before drawing it away slow then fast and inviting- it’s not even the way she makes men and women bleed just for looking at her.

It’s all those things at once; the bouncing curl of her hair, the sparkle of her body…

Yowza! Give it to ‘em, Queenie!

Woo, she smells like an axe in the hand- wood polish and cold iron; power and fear and the musty smell of sweat.

And finally, it comes to this- my sisters, my brother, and I, must dance, and lay our Mother to rest at last.

Deborah, being eldest, rises to speak. As she says the Last Words, we, her siblings, take our places. It’s almost time to dance.

“Long ago, we sought to respect our dead. We did not wish to leave their corpses for beasts to feast upon; we did not wish their spirits to know torment. Through trial and error and time and effort, we learned how to give them peace. We learned to make cairns and bury them under piles of stone; we learned to burn them, and return them to the earth.

“With each death there arises a new life; with each passing of something old, a new something comes. Over time, we built crypts and mausoleums, cities dedicated to our dead- all so that we might honor and keepsafe their memory. We exist because of those who came before us, and we owe them our gratitude for providing us our history, our world, our very lives.”

“You piddling piece of shit, you can’t honestly expect us to take those as the Last Words-”

A heckler at a funeral. I do declare.

“Missus Seedle, you’ve had eight fucking years of Last Words, and they’ve all been shit. -Onwards, Mother. When you were young, forevermore-” said Deborah, raising the urn high and beginning the dance. A strange gust of wind blew all through the crowd, stealing their voices and rustling skirts, before whirling around us. My ears tingled as I heard an unearthly sigh, and then a soft, weary groan.
The urn in Deborah’s hands grew dim and pale, losing its youthful gleam and golden color.

Cecelia’s diving stomp on Beatrix was blocked by Beatrix’ crossed blades, and the flurry of Red Ribbon Knives that drove her away were dodged with slick, oily ease. “-never to return, you said-” said Cecelia, hands full of thick, heavy flans that splattered here and there, swallowing Red Ribbon Knives and turning the ground perilous slick where custard splattered.

The straws that made the woven urn turned dull and rotten in Deborah’s hand before she tossed the urn high and spun out of the way, a brace of knives in her other. The urn fell and landed in one whole piece in a divot Deborah’s spin had left behind; and Beatrix, twin swords held high and deflecting the Red Ribbon Knives Deborah started throwing at her, began to chase after her. “-you stepped beyond your homely door-” said Beatrix, each clash of metal in strange punctuation to the groaning wailing starting to echo through the tromped-flat stage. The urn dimmed further, losing even the glimmer rot had given the dry wicker strands, before those crumbled into dust; there was only a small sack now, crumpled and sad. Cecelia began to fling her pies in every direction, catching Red Ribbon Knives out of the air for just a second- long enough for Beatrix to catch up to Deborah, and get right in my way. “-and to the Sea, you merry-fled.” said Adelaide, a slender cyclone of water dancing between her knuckles.

“You bared your teeth and grit them tight-” I say, before beginning my whirling dance, catching Adelaide’s waterspout before it can even begin. If Adelaide’s the refined fishwoman fighting, I’m the brawler. There’s no real pattern to my movements, just action, reaction, block and tackle and watery slash, until- yes, there it is. The linen bag that held the ashes is crumpling further and further, pitting and warping until finally a strange seed is burrowing into the ground.

”-till sun and stars and moons did twist-” said Eleanor, tarry black ooze in each hand and an expression of furious calculation on her face. Rather than try to directly affect any one combatant, she throws her slimy offerings to devastating area effect; each sticky patch placed just so that when in conjunction with the earlier slime patches, stable footing is all but guaranteed to not exist at all.

“You ran ‘till Home was out of sight-” said Genevieve, pelting each injured person she sees with a water balloon filled with healing potion. Of everyone here, it is her that has the most stable footing; she doesn’t slip, or falter, never wavers or slides. She cannot be moved so easily.

“-and then, at last, you died. Goodbye, Mother; you will be missed.” said Horizon, flat on his back and listening to the chaos around him. He has terrible balance normally- this is sufficient to just make him not want to bother.

And then our offerings are accepted; and so, we stand in our eight directional points, and the Dance proper begins. We say nothing else, but begin to warm up; we kick dirt by clod and scatter into a small heap, ever so careful to not disturb the place where the seed burrowed into the rich soil below.

When at last it was done, and we were all ready, we paused a moment. Nami, the weather witch, remembered her que- and so, there was a small, gentle rain that came down in soft mist to start. We began our solemn and reserved dance, weaving in and out and around the grave, tamping the soil down and settling the earth.
It’s an old orcish tradition, planting the dead; it mirrors the tradition of spring, to plant seeds in their rows and dance along them, packing the earth and nurturing the slumbering ones with your magic. But what we’re doing is a bit… reversed, is the best way to describe it. So important is this tradition that there are actually unions of grave dancers, troupes of demons whose only job is to secure the dead in their final rest.

Against all intuition, Mortis Dancing is popular among all the Tribes of the World, not just Demons. It dates to before the invention of writing; fifth century writers think of it as ancient. There are lots of traditions that say they’re the real original version, but honestly… it was probably a form of competitive dance that got invented alongside wargames, and then substituted for actual war when the time came.

The one we’re doing is the simplest you can have; six dancers, a musician, and a spare- or fool- in the likely case of injury. Sancho, who cannot for the life of him dance to a beat, is our musician; and Cece is the fool. We trained with sticks and buckets- but now, we use our actual weapons, and clash for real. A bunch of prissy Demons from France came ‘round once and tried a bit of pick-up Mortis’n, but there weren’t a groinin’ in the whole of an hour, so we gave it up for a bad job.

Here’s the thing about Demonic Funerals; all your life, if you’re a good, gods fearing Demon, you’re under a steady assault by a traditional faux-wholesome pseudo-merciful regimented honorable glorious family atmosphere, and then you die and all of a sudden, you have the power to make your living relations do any godsdamn thing you want.

Is it any wonder then that as older Demons die off, their funeral Proceedings become wilder and more spectacular? Fuck, when Missus Dreeary down the lane kicked her bucket, we got three weeks of half-naked pole-dancers, a large fortune of fireworks shot off into the night, and an all you could eat buffet with open bar and free dance hall!

I’m not sure any other Tribe can really understand how it feels to be compelled to let your wildest urges out- encouraged, even! It’s the antithesis of the ‘obey conform and discipline yourself or GET OUT’ overtone Demonic culture is usually about. And even though it can generate billions of berri, there’s no pressure, shaming, or guilting to spend money on it like there is for all the other holidays.

Demons spend that much on their funerals just because it’s fun and why the hell not, you can’t keep it- we do it because we want to, rather than some unspoken rule that you must do these things or you’re a heathen and you don’t love your family or country or tribe at all you sick twisted freak.

You can give everything a really weird theme, like, y’know, circus- and it’s totally acceptable.

And there arose in the center of the stage where our dearest Mother was buried a bougainvillea tree, with a profusion of petals blooming across it’s mighty limbs in… in whore-house pink.

That’s about when I started crying and laughing, and I guess the funeral picked up from there...

In all honesty, it’s because Demons don’t have an official inversion festival- not one that everybody celebrates, because the Feast of Fools only comes once a year and isn’t at quite the right time for merry-making. All this wildness has to get out somehow, after all.

Inversion festivals are a necessary part of most highly regimented and class-divided cultures- that’s what the ‘Night Shift’ in Skuan holidays is all about. All year- all our lives- we spend ourselves on keeping rigidly to our class, our creed, our ‘values and mores and morals’. We watch each other and behave just so, we worship these gods and obey, and obey, and obey.

And then we die, and the rules don’t apply anymore- we’re dead! It doesn’t matter!

I know in some Skuan festivals, the classes are inverted literally, and the nobility have to serve. Suddenly, nothing is taboo- the macabre, the ugly, the violations and the sins are glorified. For a period of time- longer, depending on how regimented your society is- you’re free to do and be whatever the hell you wanted.

You can wear a costume; you can hide behind a mask.

You can set off three weeks worth of fireworks and set bells to ringing with your very passage because you’re driving out the evil in your community and the evil inside of you; and whatever anyone says about Demons, the Fae are just as regimented and class-oriented. More so, even- the lead-in to their biggest inversion festival is two months long and ends in a bloodbath.

Funerals are often the only inversion festivals Demons ever enjoy; Yule has terribly rigid expectations, Imbolc makes you want to burn your godsdamn house down so you don’t have to clean it anymore, Ostara’s all about babies so if you’re too young everyone tries to pretend sex doesn’t exist, if you’re too young for Ostara you’re definitely too young for Beltane, Lughdasnagh they want you to make a bunch of fucking useless shit, Mabon you get shitty gifts in direct proportion to the good shit, and Samhain is for mourning.

For Demons, Funerals are it. They are the only international, interKingdom cut-loose parties we have; and that’s no accident. Funerals for demons have been inversion festivals since the death of Kostecki the Deathless, when the Orcs realized the war was over, the darkness was coming, and everyone was gonna have to spend the next four months indoors trying not to murder one another while the World curled up in the snow and ice and died.

Mama buried herself under a whore-pink tree in the fanciest boneyard in the kingdom, I do declare...

________________________

Random facts in an attempt to stave off the Depression. Here we fucking go.

The scientific name for vineapples is Lycopersicon exculentum, which translates to “edible wolf peach”. This is because members of the nightshade family of plants, which includes vineapples, dirtpuddings, and death berries, are used by witches to summon werewolves. Yeah, that’s right- suddenly vineapple chowder doesn’t seem so innocent. Tomato sauce with roasted garlic is the ultimate culinary move in the werewolf vs. vampire wars...

No, no good. I drew up just enough vavavoom to dance at the Funeral Proceedings before immediately needing about twelve consecutive naps, and my nap index only rose as the day continued- right now, it’s at about a seventeen, and the day’s not done yet.

Did you know that Captain Bonchon of delicious chicken fame was not a military Captain, or even a Pirate, but a Ryugu Captain? (I’m speaking, of course, of IT’S NOT JUST FRIED CHICKEN, IT’S Way back in the day, Ryugu Captains did have some manner of involvement in the Kingdom’s military; it’s basically the same kind of thing as a Knight of the Sea where the only qualifications are ‘Ryugu Mergyo thinks you’re cool’. Ryugu Captains do not need to be from Ryugu Mergyo. They don’t need to have lived in Ryugu Mergyo. They don’t even need to have, technically speaking, lived at all.

Other Ryugu Captains include Abdullah Baba, Montblanc Norland, Louis Arnote, and King Ryuma- which is a comedic play just waiting to happen, it only needs a pair of lovers and an interlude by fairies…

He was born Harl Davro Bonchon in September, in the year of one-thousand three hundred ninety, in a four-room house located three miles east of the Dun Hills. He was the oldest of three children that lived past the first year; the family attended the First Kiss Temple, one of the oldest Beloved enclaves in this Kingdom. The family were of mostly Fairy and Djinni descent, but the mother became an Automata after a close encounter with a gang of wild accountants- to be fair, an encounter like that would shake even the most devout, much less an agnostic.

Captain Bonchon’s father was a mild and affectionate man who worked his eighty acre farm, until he broke his leg after a fall. He then worked as a butcher in Corallia for twenty years. Bonchon’s mother was a devout Beloved and strict parent, continuously warning her children of ‘the evils of alcohol, tobacco, gambling, jazz music, prostitution, and whistling.’

One summer afternoon in one-thousand three hundred ninety-five, his father came home with a fever and died later that day. Bonchon’s mother obtained work in a tomato cannery, and the young boy was required to look after and cook for his younger siblings. By the age of seven, he was reportedly skilled with bread and vegetables, and improving with meat; the children foraged for food while their mother was away for days at a time for work. When he was ten, Bonchon began to work as a farmhand.

In one thousand three hundred two, Bonchon’s mother remarried, and the family moved to Waterwheel Town. Bonchon had a tumultuous relationship with his stepfather, and the next year he had dropped out of compulsory school- saying later that algebra was what drove him off- and went to live and work on a nearby farm. He was still ten. He then took a job painting horse carriages in Gyoncorde. Four years later, with his mother’s approval, Bonchon left Gyoncorde to live with his uncle further to the south. His uncle worked for the streetcart company, which became the Royal Bus Service, and secured Bonchon a job as a conductor.

At sixteen, he faked his age and joined the army. He was honorably discharged a year later, and moved to where a different uncle lived, to the west. There, he met his brother Clarant who had also moved there in order to escape their stepfather. The uncle worked for the Southern Railway, and secured Bonchon a job there as a blacksmith’s helper in the workshops. After two months, Bonchon moved further west where he got a job cleaning out the ash pans of trains from the Northern Railroad- a division of the Southern Railroad- when they had finished their run. Bonchon progressed to become a fireman, or steam engine stoker, at the age of sixteen or seventeen.

In fourteen o’nine, Bonchon found laboring work with the Norfolk and Wessen Railway; while working on the railroad, he met his wife, Josephine. They were married about three weeks after they met, and would go on to have a son, Bentham, and two daughters, Marge and Mildred. Bonchon then found work as a fireman on the Central Railroad, and he and his family moved to Dunshilly. By night, Bonchon studied law by correspondence through the Worldwide Correspondence University.

You can get licensed as a Notary, for Taxidermy, to sell Hard Liquor; to do Accountancy, Bonchon lost his job at Central after brawling with a colleague. While Bonchon moved to work for the Gyoverly Hills Railroad, Josephine and the children went to live with her parents in Corallia. After a while, Bonchon began to practice law in Gyoverly Hills; for three years he earned enough fees for his family to move back in with him. Bonchon’s legal career ended after a courtroom brawl with his own client. After that, Bonchon moved to his sister’s mansion, which became the Gyojin Dojo- but Bonchon got a job as a laborer on the Gyojin Station.

In fourteen sixteen, the whole family came to live with Bonchon and his sister; at which point, Bonchon got a job selling life insurance for the Prudence and Temperance Insurance Company. He got fired for insubordination and dereliction of duty. He then moved to Corallia, and got a sales job with Symbiotic Benefits Insurance Company.

In fourteen twenty, Bonchon established a ferry boat and tour company, which operated a boating and tour-carring service through Dunshilly, Corallia, and Goblin Park. He canvassed for funding, becoming a minority shareholder himself, and was appointed secretary of the company. Although the tour service was an instant success, Bonchon had entered into a fractious relationship with his son, Bentham, and couldn’t devote his full attention to it.

Around fourteen twenty two, he took a job as secretary at the Chamber of Commerce in Corallia. He admitted to not being very good at the job, and resigned after less than a year. Bonchon then cashed in his tour-boat company shares for thirty-five million, one hundred twenty four thousand, three hundred thirty nine beri, in today’s money. He used that money to establish a company manufacturing acetylene lamps. The venture failed after Delco introduced a similar lamp that they sold on credit.

Bonchon then went to work as a salesman for the Cutco Knife Company. He lost his job in fourteen twenty four when Cutco’s general manager, founder, and owner ran off to become a Sea Boar researcher, thus prompting the closure and sale of the entire Cutco business. As an aside, Cutco was known for it’s very fine, very hard wearing knives, and genuine Cutco knives are considered to be some of the best in the world by collectors of such things.

In fourteen twenty four, by chance, Bonchon met the general manager of the Board of Tourism in Corallia, who asked him to run the main office in Corallia. In fourteen thirty, the station closed as a result of the Great Depression, which was set off by- you guessed it- the execution of Gol D. Roger.

In fourteen thirty, the Sout-Wes Trading Company offered Bonchon a service station in Dunshilly, rent free, in return for paying them a percentage of sales. Bonchon began to serve chicken in his family style, and other meals such as bulgogi beef and bimbap. Initially, he served customers in his adjacent living quarters before opening the restaurant proper. It was during this period that Bonchon was involved in a shootout with Pratt Sowards, a local competitor, over the repainting of a sign directing traffic to his station. Sowards killed a Shell official who was with Bonchon and was convicted of murder, eliminating Bonchon’s competition. Around this time-
“Hmm?”

“Is Bonchon and Bon-chan the same guy, Mab?”

“Ah, no- Bonchon is Bon-chan’s dad, Luffy.”

“Oh. Wait, really?”

“Yep. Shall I continue, or…?”

“I wanna know what happened to the chicken-man, Boss.”

“Well- it’s almost dinner time, so I’ll make things brief. Bonchon became the uncontested king of local chicken after his competitor showed up, tried to shoot him, shot a Shell official instead, and was convicted of murder. After his wife took their kids and left him to move back in with her parents, Bonchon hid in the forest outside their house planning to kidnap the kids when they came outside. He got bored of waiting for them so he just strolled over to the house and talked things out with his wife and in-laws. Right about then is when Bon-chan went of a-pirating, Captain.”

“Aha!”

“Mhm. Captain Bonchon’s Chicken happened, being a Ryugu Captain happened; he sold it but continued to be the company’s public image. He then spent the next twenty years randomly showing up at various CBC’s and insulting them if they made the food poorly. He would insult CBC’s parent company Takara forever, including saying that their food was bad and suing them for misusing his image. They tried multiple times to sue him for libel and were unsuccessful.”

“-neh, Bryony, do you have the phone and th’ blue notebook on you-?”

“-Uh, yeah, here Captain.”

“Bonchon wore literally nothing but the famous ‘red-hot’ suit for the remainder of his life, and actually bleached his facial hair to have it match with the rest.”

“Hiya, Bon-chan!”

“~Hello, Luffy~!”

“-Neh, we’re at Fishman Island; ‘s there anything you want me to get you while we’re here? I said I would, back in prison-”

“Aah-haaa!~ Actually, yes. If you could put an offering on my parent’s grave and give my sister this phone number, I’d be much obliged. My father… he was a Gods-fearin’ man with a nasty mouth and a willingness to pummel a man with a joint-chair, and I wouldn’t be who I am today without him.”

“Oh, yes, and the public version of his file in the Gran Mariner’s office begins with a paragraph stating that ‘Captain Harl D. Bonchon has not been the subject of an FGM investigation’, immediately followed by something along the lines of five-hundred pages of redacted text.”

I sigh, and dig back into my bowl of Bonchon chicken. Sanji didn’t have the stomach for cooking today- he only just realized that he went to his aunt’s funeral, and that the Suntide Vinsmokes are his genuine family.

Now, he’s hurting because he never got to meet a woman he’d probably have liked a hell of a lot; and I’m hurting because he’s hurting. That’s what it means to love someone, too.

The difference between Cajun and Creole is Cajuns don’t use pineapples in their cuisine unless it’s a foreign recipe, and Creoles do. That’s the big one- everything else is how often you see a certain kind of meat, how it’s cut, or what gets added when; otherwise, pineapples are what you have to watch for.

Cajun is country; Creole is city. Mab’s Cajun as hell, and it shows up in the oddest of ways- for example, she considers Bonchon chicken a perfectly natural funeral day food. But only for funerals.

I suppose it has to do with Fae history- her home country Fairisle is famous for it’s Cajun French music and language. Of course, it didn’t get refrigeration until about fifty years ago; thus, for most of the Fae’s culinary history, if use wasn’t made of every part of a slaughtered animal or harvested vegetable, it would be wasted. Boudin, for example, contains pork meat, rice, and seasoning; it also contains pig liver for extra flavor. Tasso and Andouille are two other pork products that use salts and smoke as preservatives. When I first had real Faesh food, I misunderstood it’s powerful seasonings as spiciness- but that’s not right.

Faesh food, good Faesh food, is no more exhilaratingly painful to eat than a good Iber-coastal paella.

On the days of Rites

There is a season, and a seasoning, for everything. This is Spring; it’s seasonings are Rosemary, Aloe, Calendula, and if the Winter was hard enough, Yew. In Cajun cooking, a heavy spoonful of cayenne pepper is key; along with a medley of vegetables based on the French mirepoix. The holy trinity is onion, celery, and bell pepper; garlic makes an appearance often as well. Paprika, thyme, file (which is ground sassafras leaves), parsley, green onions, and a great deal more are very common guests to the table.

“Mab?”

“My love?”

“...Can we not, tonight?”

“...Of course. Do you… um, do you want to sleep in a different bed, or…?”

“No, no- I don’t want to sleep somewhere else, I just… not tonight.”

“Okay.”

I pass my bones over to Mab, who carefully crunchy them down- chicken bones tend to splinter, and she doesn’t want to hurt herself…
Later, much later, we finally go to bed. Mab rearranged our bedroom so that our bed was tucked into a small nook with a curtain that could be pulled across. I guess you can take the caveman out of the cave, but he’ll just crawl right back into it at bedtime, or when he’s scared or sad enough…

Our room is actually right next to the girls’ dorm; we share a wall. If it were any other day, I’d be angry about it— but. He’s their brother. And they’re fine with him— and…

Oh gods. They know the hymn—!

I-

I can’t-

My wife is a warm comfort in my arms, and when I tuck my face into the crown of her head and breathe her fresh-washed smell in, I can feel something in me finally break.

I spend the moments before falling asleep weeping into my wife’s hair. I didn’t even know my Aunt Aquila, but I’m sad— I’m sad I never got to meet her at all.

And now, I never will.

The falling stars you wished upon
Are cinders now and now they’re gone.
Their residue festoons our fetid fields.
Revealing husks of lovers past,
Their shells are all that ever last—
I’ve taken everything that they’ve concealed.

Whoever told you life was fair?
Look around you everywhere,
The cruelty of Nature is displayed.
Why the scorn; why the surprise?
Everything that’s born must die
And it isn’t I who made the World that way.
What wicked little twist of fate

Placed you here upon my plate?

Here where no one hears your cries?

Where were your Gods to steer you through?

Perhaps your God’s forsaken you?

Otherwise, why leave you here to die?

I know the way how.
I’ll melt away now.
I know the way.
I’m feeling bliss now,
Dissolved to mist, how-
Strangely I go away.
Now I finally know…

It’s merely moments now,
Moments now until
Your feeble flesh bends to my will-
And it will, so rest your weary head.
There’ll be no pain, no pain at all,
As everything you are dissolves.
Your fate’s resolved upon my silken threads.

I know the way how,
I’ll melt away now,
I know the way.
I’m feeling bliss now,
Dissolved to mist, how-
Strangely I go away.
Now I finally know...

The girls- because that’s what they are, A B C D E F G, they’re just girls- they all have red eyes. Cerise, I think is the word for it. Sancho’s eyes are a brown so dark they look black- and of course, he’s adopted, so the only real indication of who he isn’t is the gills on his chest, instead of his shoulders. He’s not part fishman, after all- he’s part Syreene. His eyes are usually hidden behind his sunglasses; either the folding pair he was wearing earlier, or a pair of sunglasses that really push that whole ‘owl’ thing forwards.

His training gear is a set of summer and winter weight urban martial artist style clothing; so far, his actual fighting style isn’t particularly stylized, if you get my meaning. A staff is a formidable weapon, and in his hands it’s deadly- but he’s not quite… he’s so tall, it’s hard for him to find a staff that really does what it should for him.

He sleeps in an extra-oversized shirt and his boxers- and, for just a few nights only, after the funeral of his mother, he’s allowed to sleep in a pile with his sisters. They are small and sad, just girls- and a boy, as it happens.

Adelaide’s eyes are the harshest, especially if she’s used makeup to enhance her fishwoman characteristics; they all but burn in her hard-browed face. -I actually did one of my favorite designs for A’s training and battle gear, something I whipped up back in school for a sparring partner who agreed to model for me… and of course, she immediately asked for a few changes when she saw the first-fitting product. Nothing really beyond my skills- a different neckline was the most major change, merely because she doesn’t like showing that much of her chest; no sleeves is fine, a different obi, she’d be using her own belt as is proper… and most important of all, she wanted a skirt, not pants. Fair enough- but I did inform her of the need for undershorts, to prevent flashing of underwear. She seemed surprised I would consider that as a concern.

The pajamas Adelaide was eventually, reluctantly, accepting of- a pair of blue-white candy stripe pajama pants, no pockets, and an oversized t-shirt from Daiso. Why make things hard? After all, after the first wash, Daiso t-shirts age five years and develop that perfect hand for sleeping in.

Beatrix’s red eyes are softer than Adelaide’s, but that’s a function of their faces- B got softer features, not softer eyes. Her training gear draws on my own childhood, and once I started on hers, I ended up redoing mine as well. Because B’s my own apprentice, her appearance reflects on my skills- our relationship’s only a week old, just about, she’s not got the skills yet to make her own training gear. Thus, it’s only natural that I make it obvious to anyone looking that we’re a pair. Further than that, I’ve given her two ensembles she can mix and match at her pleasure- a lighter, summery version, and a heavier, wintery version.

To sleep, a chemise- less antiquated than mine. She insisted, actually.

Cecelia is odd; her eyes only flare red when the sun catches in them, otherwise they’re as brown looking as Sancho’s. Her training gear is a lot like Sancho’s, except she has a much more rustic style. Her pants and top are all-weather, and her skirt can also be worn as another layer up top- and that’s all she wanted.

Pajamas - long sleeve shirt and a pair of shorts, with a sweet ribbon belt for a little definition- and a raccoon-hat so she feels like herself.

Surprisingly enough, Sanji specifically told me that Deborah’s normal work clothing is what she’d be training in- just make her a bandolier for her throwing knives she can wear in the kitchen. Fine- a belt for her throwing knives it is. It’s the obi style all the girls prefer, and though it looks like velvet, it’s not. Funnily enough, Deborah’s the one who asked me for a swimsuit, in addition to her pajamas- I suppose she realized that her work clothing, while perfectly fine in the water, really isn’t as suited to a bit of actual swimming as a swimsuit would be. It’s a simple suit, that I can switch out for larger versions as she grows, meant for a mermaid. The crown is because she’s actually a minor princess, and is allowed to wear a crown.

Eleanor, when she’s not putting on a front, is one of the calmest people I’ve ever met. She’s shy, and hardly ever looks anyone- sister, brother, friend- anyone, directly in the eye. Her training gear is perhaps the most abbreviated, consisting of what I can fairly describe as a very stretchy belt and a sports bra. Then again, considering the myriad of contortions and twists she has to be able to put her body through, having very little clothing to get in the way is for the best.

Her swimsuit is the addition of a poncho to her regular training gear, along with a truly excellent hat.

As for pajamas, she sleeps in a hooded onesie, one of three. It doesn’t have feet and sits a bit oversized on her; she really doesn’t like wearing skirts, it’s the damndest thing…

Fernanda looks like a human version of a Red Eyed Tree Frog, and she sounds like a forty-year old waitress at a diner. Her training gear is much slinkier than any of her siblings, as she practices a unique kind of martial arts that’s very similar to Eleanor’s- at least, that’s what I first thought. In truth, she’s a markswoman, a bit of a middle ground between Usopp and Mark. She also really took to a top hat I had in wardrobe, so I let her have it.

Her swimsuit is a high necked bikini on the green side of yellow, along with a pair of clips to ensure her hair stays out of her face.

And for sleeping, a sleep-dress I made in lingerie weight silk. The yellow detail at her neckline is particularly cute; and, um, it’s part of the nightly ritual that one of her sisters, or one of us women, braids her hair back so she doesn’t have a hopeless tangle come the morn. Two heavy french braids and a satin pillow case, along with her sleeping mask, makes for a well-rested Fern.

Genevieve has red eyes; and Genevieve has eyes red from crying. Oh, darling. Genny’s also a self-taught witch; her training gear thus has three very distinct outfits that are not meant to be mixed. Outfit the first is meant for flying; a flying robe, a mid-sleeve sweater, a dark skirt, and a pair of grey tights to tuck into her boots. Outfit the second is meant for her thaumaturgical studies; warning-striped tights, heavy duty smock, green neckerchief, and a witchy hat with a point on the end. And finally, third, her battle outfit- for that, I let her pick her own outfit, after I made her basic school-girl special as a base. She’s a budget Witch, and that’s alright- it means she’ll use a wand of ash, maple, or hickory, and it'll probably be shaped like a baseball bat before it's ever shaped like a wand. She’s also started a special kind of rhubarb in the garden, whose leaves will grow large enough to use as umbrellas if necessary. I’m not entirely sure it’s because she’s realized her familiar, a tiny White Bat, is pregnant, or if she’s doing it because she thinks her bat will like having a leafy roost- either way, it’s a good idea.

Genny is the only one of the girls who ignored the color separation; she asked for a bright red swimsuit, like the lifeguards at the beach have. She is, after all, a part of our medical team- and her job is, in fact, guarding our lives with medicine. I personally think she just wanted something classic and simple. To sleep in, an oversized t-shirt- and, interestingly, a pair of Daiso sandals for when she has to go to the bathroom in the middle of the night. They remind me of watermelons.

I, of course, am in my chemise, and my hair is braided back much like Fern’s; and Sanji actually sleeps in a deep v-neck t-shirt and a pair of pajama shorts, which is itchy for me but not overwhelmingly hot for him. The couple’s matching set was cute, but too hot for him, and not at all up to the rigors of our lives- still, it was nice while it lasted.

“Every night, I’m going to tell a bit more of this story- until, at last, there is no more to tell. I’m telling all of you, because we are very distantly kin, and you have as much right to this story as I do- you deserve to know where you came from.

“Also, I know Beatrix would tell you these stories if you asked, but I’m not convinced yet she can remember all of it from just the one telling- so, I’ll just tell all of you.”

“...Why’s Mister Sanji here, Boss?”

“I’m here to make sure Mab doesn’t overdo it- she’ll talk the night through, y’know.”

“Ah,” they all say, nodding.

Not gonna lie, I would do that.

There are many ways to tell a story. The story I will tell you can be explained thusly- an Introduction, in which I explain a great deal of background information- mostly the history and some of the words I’ll be using that I won’t translate, followed by the setup of the story; so you understand what kind of story this is; Cuchulainn’s Boyish Deeds, The Death of Fraech, The Death of Orlam, The Death of the Meic Garach, The Death of the Squirrel, The Death of Lethan, The Death of Lochu, The Harrying of Cooley, Mac Roth’s Embassy, The Death of Eiarcomol, The Death of Nadcrantail, The Finding of the Bull, The Death of Redg, The Meeting of Cuchulainn and Findabair, The Combat of Munremar and Curoi, The Death of the Boys (the first version), The Woman-fight of Rochad, The Death of the Princes, The Death of Cur, The Number of the Feats, The Death of Ferbaeth, The Combat of Larine Mac Nois, The Conversation of the Morrigann with Cuchulainn, The Death of Long Mac Emonis, The Healing of the Morrigann, The Coming of Lug Mac Ethlend, The Death of the Boys (the second version), The Arming of Cuchulainn, The Combat

The Tain Bo Cooley survives, entire and in pieces, in a considerable number of manuscripts. The most important are three in number- Leabhar na h-Uidhri, or ‘The Book of the Dun Cow’, the oldest, is a manuscript dating from about the hundredth year of our current calendar. This version is very, very old- mostly, it deals with the piece coming between the death of the herd Forgemen and the fight with Cur Mac Dalath; including Cuchulainn’s meeting with Findabair and the ‘woman-fight’ of Rochad, and the whole of what follows the Healing of the Morrigan. In this manuscript, then, the beginning is missing, but the ending is clearer. The second version comes from the Yellow Book of Lecan, a fourth-century manuscript. The Tain in this is substantially the same as the first manuscript I mentioned- beginning missing, ending present. Finally, there is the version recorded in the Book of Leinster, written before the year One-sixty. The Tain is at it’s longest and fullest, essentially a literary attempt to give a complete and consistent narrative; thus, it’s much less interesting than the older texts. However, from it we do gain clarity- what began our end, and so on.

The main reason these particular manuscripts are considered the canon of this story is thus; of the three copies of the spoken story, none is the direct ancestor of any other. That is to say, they do not reference each other; they do not use the, hm, architecture and building blocks of the other to relate their tales. They are each unique, and currently, the only surviving copies of their kind. Further, they differ entirely in aim, bias, and method; the writers of ‘Dun Cow’ and ‘Yellow’ aimed for accuracy; while the Leinster tried to present an intelligible series of events. Hence, where the two former reproduce obscurities and corruptions, the latter omits, paraphrases, or expands- with the unfortunate result of rarely, if ever, helping clear up textual obscurities in the older copy. Then again, it does explain certain episodes not clearly stated in the previous two- as the Leinster was very much aimed at teaching the story, rather than pressing it down onto paper for posterity.

I will be using words that I will not translate from the Faesh- not because I can’t, but because I don’t want to. I miss hearing them- further, if I try to translate what I remember the story to be, I’ll become distracted from actually telling the story. A considerable part of the Tain is occupied by connecting episodes with placenames- I will be explaining some of the commonest elements hence.

Ath is a ford, like Ath Gabla, Ath Triaged, Ath Carpat, Ath Friach, and so on; Belat means crossroads. Bernas is a pass or a gap- Bernas Bo Ulad or Bernas Bo Cooley; clithar is shelter; cul is a corner; dun is a fort. Fid means woods; glass means a brook or a stream; glenn means a narrow valley; grellach means a bog. Guala is a hill’s shoulder; loch is a lake; mag is a plain, like where horses run. Methe is the prepository adverb of meth, meaning death- specifically, it’s used when referring to animals that have been killed, not died. Reid, or Rede, is a plain that is not like a mag; sid is a fairy mound, and sliab is a mountain.

This is the Tain Bo Cooley.

A great hosting was brought together by the Connaughtmen, that is, by Ailill and Medb; and they sent to the three other provinces. And messengers were sent by Ailill to the seven sons of Magach: Ailill, Anluan, Mocorb, Cet, En, Bascall, and Doche; a cantred with each of them. And to Cormac Condlongas Mac Conchobair with his three hundred, who was billeted in Connaught. Then they all come to Cruachan Ai.

Now Cormac had three troops which came to Cruachan. The first troop had many coloured cloaks folded round them; hair like a mantle; the tunic falling to the knee, and long shields; and a broad grey spearhead on a slender shaft in the hand of each man.

The second troop wore dark grey cloaks, and tunics with red ornamentation down to their calves, and long hair hanging behind from their heads, and white shields, and five-pronged spears were in their hands.

“This is not Cormac yet,” said Medb.

Then comes the third troop; and they wore purple cloaks, and hooded tunics with red ornamentation down to their feet, hair smooth to their shoulders, and round shields with engraved edges, and the spear the size of a pillar of a palace in the hand of each man.

“This is Cormac now,” said Medb.

Then the four kingdoms of the Fae were assembled in Sirenland, till they were in Cruachan Ai. And their poets and their druids did not let them go thence till the end of a fortnight, for waiting for a good omen. Medb said then to her charioteer the day that they set out:

“Every one who parts here today from his love or his friend will curse me,” said she, “for it is I who have gathered this hosting.”

“Wait then,” said the charioteer, “till I turn the chariot with the sun, and till there come the power of a good omen that we may come back again.”

Then the charioteer turned the chariot, and they set forth. Then they saw a full-grown maiden before them. She had yellow hair, and a cloak of many colours, and a golden pin in it; and a hooded tunic with red embroidery. She wore two shoes with buckles of gold. Her face was narrow below and broad above. Very black were her two eyebrows; her black delicate eyelashes cast a shadow into the middle of her two cheeks. You would think it was with partaing her lips were adorned. You would think it was a shower of pearls that was in her mouth, that is, her teeth. She had three tresses: two tresses round her head above, and a tress behind, so that it struck her two thighs behind her. A shuttle6 of white metal, with an inlaying of gold, was in her hand. Each of her two eyes had three pupils. The maiden was armed, and there were two black horses to her chariot.

“What is your name?” said Medb to the maiden.

“Fedelm, the prophetess of Connaught, is my name,” said the maiden.

“Whence do you come?” said Medb.

“From Fairyland, after learning the art of prophecy,” said the maiden.

“Have you the eyes which see?” said Medb.

“Yes, indeed,” said the maiden.

“Look for me how it will be with my hosting,” said Medb.

Then the maiden looked for it; and Medb said: “O Fedelm the prophetess, how seest thou the host?”
Fedelm answered and said: “I see very red, I see red.”

“That is not true,” said Medb; “for Conchobar is in his sickness at Emain and the Ulstermen with him, with all the best of their warriors; and my messengers have come and brought me tidings thence.”

“Fedelm the prophetess, how seest thou our host?” said Medb.

“I see red,” said the maiden.

“That is not true,” said Medb; “for Celtchar Mac Uithichair is in Dun Lethglaise, and a third of the Ulstermen with him; and Fergus, son of Roich, son of Eochaid, is here with us, in exile, and a cantred with him.

“Fedelm the prophetess, how seest thou our host?” said Medb.

“I see very red,” said the maiden.

“That matters not,” said Medb; “for there are mutual angers, and quarrels, and wounds very red in every host and in every assembly of a great army. Look again for us then, and tell us the truth. Fedelm the prophetess, how seest thou our host?”

“I see very red, I see red,” said Fedelm.

“I see a fair man who will make play

“With a number of wounds on his girdle;

“A hero’s flame over his head,

“His forehead a meeting-place of victory.

“There are seven gems of a hero of valour

“In the middle of his two irises;

“There is ----- on his cloak,

“He wears a red clasped tunic.

“He has a face that is noble,

“Which causes amazement to women.

“A young man who is fair of hue “Comes -----.

“Like is the nature of his valour
“To Cuchulainn of Murthmne.

“I do not know whose is the Hound

“Of Culann, whose fame is the fairest.

“But I know that it is thus

“That the host is very red from him.

“I see a great man on the plain

“He gives battle to the hosts;

“Four little swords of feats

“There are in each of his two hands.

“Two Gae-bolga, he carries them,

“Besides an ivory-hilted sword and spear;

“— he wields to the host;

“Different is the deed for which each arm goes from him.

“A man in battle-gird, of a red cloak,

“He puts —— every plain.

“He smites them, over left chariot wheel

“The Riastartha wounds them.

“The form that appeared to me on him hitherto,

“I see that his form has been changed.

“He has moved forward to the battle,

“If heed is not taken of him it will be treachery.

“I think it likely it is he who seeks you: Cuchulainn Mac Sualtain.

“‘He will strike on whole hosts,

“He will make dense slaughters of you,

“Ye will leave with him many thousands of heads.
“The prophetess Fedelm conceals not.

“Blood will rain from warriors’ wounds

“At the hand of a warrior- ’twill be full harm.

“He will slay warriors, men will wander

“Of the descendants of Deda Mac Sin.

“Corpses will be cut off, women will lament

“Through the Hound of the Smith that I see.”

This is the story in order.

When they had come on their first journey from Cruachan as far as Cul Sibrinne, Medb told her charioteer to get ready her nine chariots for her, that she might make a circuit in the camp, to see who disliked and who liked the expedition.

Now his tent was pitched for Ailill, and the furniture was arranged, both beds and coverings. Fergus Mac Roich in his tent was next to Ailill; Cormac Conlongas Mac Conchobair beside him; Conall Cernach by him; Fiacha Mac Fir-Febe, the son of Conchobar’s daughter, by him. Medb, daughter of Eochaid Fedlech, was on Ailill’s other side; next to her, Findabair, daughter of Ailill and Medb. That was besides servants and attendants.

Medb came, after looking at the host, and she said it were folly for the rest to go on the hosting, if the cantred of the Leinstermen went.

“Why do you blame the men?” said Ailill.

“We do not blame them,” said Medb; “splendid are the warriors. When the rest were making their huts, they had finished thatching their huts and cooking their food; when the rest were at dinner, they had finished dinner, and their harpers were playing to them.”

“It is folly for them to go,” said Medb; “it is to their credit the victory of the hosts will be.”
“It is for us they fight,” said Ailill.

“They shall not come with us,” said Medb.

“Let them stay then,” said Ailill.

“They shall not stay,” said Medb. “They will come on us after we have gone,’ said she, ‘and seize our land against us.”

“What is to be done to them?” said Ailill; “will you have them neither stay nor go?”

“To kill them,” said Medb.

“We will not hide that this is a woman’s plan,” said Ailill; “what you say is not good!”

“With this folk,” said Fergus, “it shall not happen thus for it is a folk bound by ties to us Ulstermen, unless we are all killed.”

“Even that we could do,” said Medb; “for I am here with my retinue of two cantreds,” said she, “and there are the seven Manes, that is, my seven sons, with seven cantreds; their luck can protect them,” said she; “that is Mane-Mathramail, and Mane-Athramail, and Mane-Morgor, and Mane-Mingor, and Mane-Moepert -and he is Mane-Milscothach- Mane-Andoe, and Mane-who-got-everything; he got the form of his mother and of his father, and the dignity of both.”

“It would not be so,” said Fergus. “There are seven kings of Munster here, and a cantred with each of them, in friendship with us Ulstermen. I will give battle to you,’ said Fergus, ‘in the middle of the host in which we are, with these seven cantreds, and with my own cantred, and with the cantred of the Leinstermen. But I will not urge that,” said Fergus, “we will provide for the warriors otherwise, so that they shall not prevail over the host. Seventeen cantreds for us,’ said Fergus, “that is the number of our army, besides our rabble, and our women (for with each king there is his queen, in Medb’s company), and besides our striplings. This is the eighteenth cantred, the cantred of the Leinstermen. Let them be distributed among the rest of the host.”

“I do not care,” said Medb, “provided they are not gathered as they are.”

Then this was done; the Leinstermen were distributed among the host.

They set out next morning to Moin Choiltrae, where eight score deer fell in with them in one herd. They surrounded them and killed them then; wherever there was a man of the Leinstermen, it was he who got them, except five deer that all the rest of the host got. Then they came to Mag Trego, and stopped there and prepared their food. They say that it is there that Dubthach sang this song:

“Grant what you have not heard hitherto,
“Listening to the fight of Dubthach.
“A hosting very black is before you,
“Against Findbend of the wife of Ailill.
“The man of expeditions will come Who will defend Murthemne.

“The turfy Cronn will resist them;

“Ravens will drink milk of ----

“From the friendship of the swineherds.

“Until the work of warriors is over

“The man of expeditions will come Who will defend Murthemne.

“The turfy Cronn will resist them;

“He will not let them into Murthemne

“Until the work of warriors is over

“In Sliab Tuad Ochaine.”

“Quickly,” said Ailill to Cormac, “Go that you may —— your son. The cattle do not come from the fields

“That the din of the host may not terrify them.

“This will be a battle in its time

“For Medb with a third of the host.

“There will be flesh of men therefrom

“If the Riastartha comes to you.”’

Then the Nemain attacked them, and that was not the quietest of nights for them, with the uproar of the churl (ie. Dubthach) through their sleep. The host started up at once, and a great number of the host were in confusion, till Medb came to reprove him.

Then they went and spent the night in Granard Tethba Tuascirt, after the host had been led astray over bogs and over streams. A warning was sent from Fergus to the Ulstermen here, for friendship. They were now in the weakness, except Cuchulainn and his father Sualtain.

Cuchulainn and his father went, after the coming of the warning from Fergus, till they were in Iraird Cuillend, watching the host there.

“I think of the host to-night,” said Cuchulainn to his father. “Go from us with a warning to the Ulstermen. I am forced to go to a tryst with Fedelm Noichride, from my own pledge that went out to her.”

He made a spancel-withe then- a twig twisted into two rings, joined by one straight piece, as used for hobbling horses and cattle- then before he went, and wrote an ogam on its bar, and threw it on the top of the pillar.
The leadership of the way before the army was given to Fergus. Then Fergus went far astray to the south, till Ulster should have completed the collection of an army; he did this for friendship. Ailill and Medb perceived it; it was then Medb said:

“O Fergus, this is strange,
“What kind of way do we go?
“Straying south or north
“Some kenning for blood?
“We go over every other folk.

“Ailill of Ai with his hosting
“Fears that you will betray them.
“You have not given your mind hitherto
“To the leading of the way.

“If it is in friendship that you do it,
“Do not lead the horses
“Peradventure another may be found
“To lead the way."

Fergus replied:

“O Medb, what troubles you?
“This is not like treachery.
“It belongs to the Ulstermen, O woman,
“The land across which I am leading you.

“It is not for the disadvantage of the host
“That I go on each wandering in its turn;
“It is to avoid the great man

“Who protects Mag Murthemne.

“Not that my mind is not distressed

“On account of the straying on which I go,

“But if perchance I may avoid even afterwards

“Cuchulainn Mac Sualtaim.”

Then they went till they were in Iraird Cuillend. Eirr and Indell, Foich and Foclam (their two charioteers), the four sons of Iraird Mac Anchinne, it is they who were before the host, to protect their brooches and their cushions and their cloaks, that the dust of the host might not soil them. They found the withe that Cuchulainn threw, and perceived the grazing that the horses had grazed. For Sualtaim’s two horses had eaten the grass with its roots from the earth; Cuchulainn’s two horses had licked the earth as far as the stones beneath the grass. They sit down then, until the host came, and the musicians play to them. They give the withe into the hands of Fergus Mac Roich; he read the ogam that was on it.

When Medb came, she asked, “Why are you waiting here?”

“We wait,” said Fergus, “because of the withe yonder. There is an ogam on its bar, and this is what is in it: ‘Let no one go past till a man is found to throw a like withe with his one hand, and let it be one twig of which it is made; and I exempt my friend Fergus.”

“Truly,” said Fergus, “Cuchulainn has thrown it, and they are his horses that grazed the plain.”

And he put it in the hands of the druids; and Fergus sang this song:

“Here is a withe, what does the withe declare to us?

“What is its mystery?

“What number threw it?

“Few or many?

“Will it cause injury to the host,

“If they go a journey from it?

“Find out, ye druids, something therefore

“For what the withe has been left.
“Line of heroes the hero who has thrown it,
“Full misfortune on warriors;
“A delay of princes, wrathful is the matter,
“One man has thrown it with one hand.

“Is not the king’s host at the will of him,
“Unless it breaks fair play?
“Until one man only of you
“Throw it, as one man has thrown it.
“I do not know anything save that
For which the withe should have been put.
Here is a withe.”

Then Fergus said to them:

“If you outrage this withe,” said he, ‘or if you go past it, though he be in the custody of a man, or in a house under a lock, the magic of the man who wrote the ogam on it will reach him, and will slay a goodly slaughter of you before morning, unless one of you throw a like withe.”

“It does not please us, indeed, that one of us should be slain at once,” said Ailill. “We will go by the neck of the great wood yonder, south of us, and we will not go over it at all.”

The troops hewed down then the wood before the chariots. This is the name of that place, Slechta. It is there that Partraige is. According to others, the conversation between Medb and Fedelm the prophetess took place there, as we told before; and then it is after the answer she gave to Medb that the wood was cut down:

“Look for me,” said Medb, “how my hosting will be.”

“It is difficult to me,” said the maiden; “I cannot cast my eye over them in the wood.”

“It is ploughland there shall be,” said Medb; “we will cut down the wood.”

Then this was done, so that Slechta was the name of the place.

They spent the night then in Cul Sibrille; a great snowstorm fell on them, to the girdles of the men and the wheels of the chariots. The rising was early next morning. And it was not the most peaceful of nights for them, with the snow; and they had not prepared food that night. But it was not early when Cuchulainn came from his tryst; he waited to wash and bathe.

Then he came on the track of the host.

“Would that we had not gone there,” said Cuchulainn, “nor betrayed the Ulstermen; we have let the host go to them unawares. Make us an estimation of the host,” said Cuchulainn to Loeg, “that we may know the number of the host.”

Loeg did this, and said to Cuchulainn: “I am confused,” said he, “I cannot attain this.”

“It would not be confusion that I see, if only I come,” said Cuchulainn.

“Get into the chariot then,” said Loeg.

Cuchulainn got into the chariot, and put a reckoning over the host for a long time.

“Even you,” said Loeg, “you do not find it easy.”

“It is easier indeed to me than to you,” said Cuchulainn; “for I have three gifts, the gifts of eye, and of mind, and of reckoning. I have put a reckoning on this,” said he; “there are eighteen cantreds,” said he, “for their number; only that the eighteenth cantred is distributed among all the host, so that their number is not clear; that is, the cantred of the Leinstermen.”

This is one of the three severest and most difficult reckonings made in Fairyland; Cuchulainn’s reckoning of the men of Fairyland on the Tain and Lug’s reckoning of the Fomorian hosts at the battle of Mag Tured and Ingcel’s reckoning of the hosts at the Bruiden Da Derga. These are the most difficult of all.

Then Cuchulainn went round the host till he was at Ath Gabla. He cut a treefork there with one blow of his sword, and put it on the middle of the stream, so that a chariot could not pass it on this side or that. Eirr and Indell, Foich and Fochlam (their two charioteers) came upon him thereat. He strikes their four heads off, and throws them on to the four points of the fork. Hence is Ath Gabla.

Then the horses of the four went to meet the host, and their cushions very red on them. They supposed it was a battalion that was before them at the ford. A troop went from them to look at the ford; they saw nothing there but the track of one chariot and the fork with the four heads, and a name in ogam written on the side. All the host came then.

“Are the heads yonder from our people?” said Medb.

“They are from our people and from our choice warriors,” said Ailill.

One of them read the ogam that was on the side of the fork; that is: “A man has thrown the fork with his one hand; and you shall not go past it till one of you, except Fergus, has thrown it with one hand.”
“It is a marvel,” said Ailill, “the quickness with which the four were struck.”

“It was not that that was a marvel,” said Fergus; “it was the striking of the fork from the trunk with one blow; and if its end was one cutting, it is the fairer for it, and that it was thrust in in this manner; for it is not a hole that has been dug for it, but it is from the back of the chariot it has been thrown with one hand.”

“Avert this strait from us, O Fergus,” said Medb.

“Bring me a chariot then,” said Fergus, “that I may take it out, that you may see whether its end was hewn with one blow.” Fergus broke then fourteen chariots of his chariots, so that it was from his own chariot that he took it out of the ground, and he saw that the end was hewn with one blow.

“Heed must be taken to the character of the tribe to which we are going,” said Ailill. “Let each of you prepare his food; you had no rest last night for the snow. And something shall be told to us of the adventures and stories of the tribe to which we are going.”

It is then that the adventures of Cuchulainn were related to them.

Ailill asked:

“Is it Conchobar who has done this?”

“Not he,” said Fergus; “he would not have come to the border of the country without the number of a battalion round him.”

“Was it Celtchar Mac Uithidir?”

“Not he; he would not have come to the border of the country without the number of a battalion round him.”

“Was it Eogan Mac Durtacht?”

“Not he,” said Fergus; “he would not have come over the border of the country without thirty chariots two-pointed round him. This is the man who would have done the deed,” said Fergus, “Cuchulainn; it is he who would have cut the tree at one blow from the trunk, and who would have killed the four yonder as quickly as they were killed, and who would have come to the boundary with his charioteer.”

“What kind of man,” said Ailill, “is this Hound of whom we have heard among the Ulstermen? What age is this youth who is famous?”

“An easy question, truly,” said Fergus. “In his fifth year he went to the boys at Emain Macha to play; in his sixth year he went to learn arms and feats with Scathach. In his seventh year he took arms, and the boy who was Setanta died, and stood as Cuchulain. He is now seventeen years old at this time.”

“Is it he who is hardest to deal with among the Ulstermen?” said Medb.

“Over every one of them,” said Fergus. “You will not find before you a warrior who is harder to deal with, nor a point that is sharper or keener or swifter, nor a hero who is fiercer, nor a raven that is more flesh-loving, nor a match of his age that can equal him as far as a third; nor a lion that is fiercer, nor a fence of battle, nor a hammer of destruction, nor a door of battle, nor judgment on hosts, nor preventing of a great host that is more worthy. You will not find there a man who would reach his age, and his growth, and his dress, and his terror, his speech, his splendour, his fame, his voice, his form, his power, his hardness, his accomplishment, his valour, his striking, his rage, his anger, his victory, his doom-giving, his violence, his estimation, his hero triumph, his speed, his pride, his madness, with the feat of nine men on every point, like Cuchulainn.”

“I don’t care for that,” said Medb; “he is in one body; he endures wounding; he is not above capturing. Therewith his age is that of a grown-up girl, and his manly deeds have not come yet.”

“Not so,” said Fergus. “It would be no wonder if he were to do a good deed to-day; for even when he was younger his deeds were manly.”

Sanji strokes a pair of knuckles up the velveteen of my spine, and my breath catches in my throat. In front of me, the children’s eyes shine tiredly in the gloom; bedtime. I’ve settled them down a bit—little structure works wonders, after all.

“Goodnight, my darling ones. I’ll tell you more of Cuchulain to-morrow. Care is heavy, so now sleep you; you are care, and care must keep you.”

“G’nite, Missus Mab,” comes the sleepy blushing chorus. Aw. They’re embarrassed I care about them.

Sanji cries into my hair that night again. I wake up a bit before the third hour of the morning, and ghost from our bed, gliding in silently to gaze at the sleeping children.

I worry for them; I worry in the night their breath will cease, and they will be gone from my keeping.
I also worry about Robin and Taffy and—Gurry’s in bed with Taffy again?Hmm. Well, that’s fine, I think, it’s not like the dorm separation of genders is really anything other than a formality we pay lip service to—it really amounts to who wants to sleep in a room that smells a bit like farts, and who wants to get sleep groped by Robin. You think I’m kidding; the woman sleep-gropes.

Mm! Sanji—! I lean back into the warm chest behind me, and resist the urge to rub my ass into his crotch because he’s not been interested for two days now and I don’t want to push—

‘Come back to bed, love. They’re fine.’

‘I know, I just—I worry they’ll stop breathing if I look away.’

‘...well, shit. -Wake me up next time so we can do shifts, alright?’

‘A-alright. -One last look, and then we can go back to bed.’

‘Alright.’
I look them over, and then silently sigh and turn, and allow Sanji, my beloved, to lead me back to bed. I’ve gotten too used to having so much sex every day, I think— even two days without any, hardly any kissing even, has been bizarre and disorienting.

It’s been a long time since I used my fingers; let’s see if I can still-

Fuah-

Rub rub rub in little circles and rub the ‘U’ just underneath the clit and above the- nnnng- uuhfa uuhf uuungh, mm, mm, mmmmaaaah ah ah ah aaAAH! Sanji-!

‘Sh, move your hand-’

‘Aaah!’

Mmm, mmmm, we haven’t done this since our plighting, back in Skypiea; it’s been a long time since Sanji’s gnnnnnnggh fuah fuh mmmmmmmnggh mm mmmmaaa uugh- gggnggh aaah ah ah ah AH AH AH AH AAAA AAAAAAA AAAAAAA AAAAAAA AAAAAAA AAAAAAA-

My legs won’t stop twitching. Mmmngh. Sanji’s rubbing little circles on the pooch of my uterus, his fingertips gentle on the soft skin below my belly button. My feet are almost cramping they’ve been pointed so hard; my toes are curled over. My pussy aches for my husband’s cock and I can’t bear to ask it of him and bring him shame for having to tell me ‘No, I can’t’. Ff Fuck, I want him so badly…

“Mab?”

“Mhm?”
“...how do you feel about sodomy?”

“Uh... That’s the one where it’s up the ass, aye?”

“Yeah.”

“I’ve no problem with it, so long as we use condoms or you don’t come inside.”

“-no I kind of... I meant for me. You sodomizing me.”

“OH! Um. Well, I think I’d start with rimming- er, salad tossing? And then I’d start adding fingers, and, um. See how comfortable you are from there, really.”

“Um. Pegging?”

“...I suppose, if you want- if I’m female-aspect with a strap-on dildo, or in male-aspect with an erection, I... well, really, it’s whatever you’re most comfortable with.”

“...I’m. I’m curious about having sex with someone who visually reads as ‘male’, I think? I just- I want to try everything.”

“Okay..”

We fell asleep after that, but I didn’t forget. This is going to be interesting. And Fun!
Dread Bread and Fish Roe (The Terror of Baking!)

For those that don’t know, Imbolc in the modern era usually falls on the second day of February. It’s one of the four major holidays, alongside Beltane, Lughnasadh, and Samhain. The solstices and equinoxes are also celebrated; thus, the Spokes and the Turns of the great Wheel of the Year. Imbolc can be said as ‘IM-bulk’ or ‘EM-bowlk’, but usually not ‘IM-bowlk’. The provenance of this holiday is usually attributed to the Fae, but every Tribe has their own version of it; ours is most popular because of all the sex we encourage people to have.

Traditionally speaking, the actual time of year is what’s important, not the actual day- right about now is when the wind changes and clears out the fine dust and grit from the Heights, making the stars extra-visible. This, in effect, makes it very easy to divine weather, astrally mark the exact time of year, and produce the over-arching Meta-prophecies for the Zodiac and Astrological signs.

Most people pay tribute to the Goddess Mother by arranging an altar and invoking her through prayer, offerings, and sacrifice. It’s in the name of the holiday- the Old Faesh word ‘imbolc’ means ‘in the womb’ or ‘ewe’s milk.’ Thus, the holiday being a celebration of fertility, sex, and the young, as overseen by the Goddess Maiden- well, it’s a bit obvious, isn’t it. Traditionally, Imbolc observes the wane of winter and the come of spring; we, as in Fae, are taught to use fire and other forms of light to encourage the lengthening of the day. I’m fairly sure that Ace will have fire-hair for the entirety of Imbolc…

Seeds, buds, and flowers are also used, because we all know what we’re really here for. As with all holidays, food and music is essential. Dishes for Imbolc incorporate seeds, fresh dairy, and bright green foliage. All the members of the house prepare talismans to use during the holiday ceremonies and then keep the rest of the year; a Bridesmaid, and some kind of Bride-cross.

Finally, and most importantly, Imbolc is the time for Spring Cleaning. This one, we’re doing, if nothing else- it’s time to clean the ship, observe certain bathing rituals, and de-clutter, dammit. We’ve got new crewmates anyway, so it’s going to have to happen sometime- the dorms need restructuring, frankly speaking. Hehe.

As for how long this celebration lasts; it begins at sundown on the first of February and ends at sundown on the second of February. Imbolc is the center-point of the dark half of the year; if you make it through Imbolc, it usually means you’ve made it through winter entirely.

This is also- according to last years almanac, as this year’s won’t come out until Beltane at the latest- about when lambing season is to start. Now is when the World Magic is right to put blessings on tools, seeds, and all our animals. Our dogs will blow their winter coats, as will our horses, quite soon indeed; some of the fish still in our aquarium are fat with eggs, which means Sanji’s going to toss them back into the ocean pretty damn soon.

The Girls are to make Bridesmaids out of straw, and put them in a basket with white flower bedding; then, all us adults will tuck gifts into the basket, as blessings on the little-women we, well, hope the girls will become. More like… omamori , is the word I think; though some of us (LUFFY) will use extra envelopes meant for New Year's and stuff them full of money. How do I know Luffy’s going to do that? He’s finally started asking me if he can take stuff from the Studio- and this time, I gave him a cute spring stationery set instead- an abbreviated set, actually, pre-folded envelopes, washi tape, and stick-on name tags…
He then asked me to help him convince Nami to give all the kids money- and that’s about when I realized he’d completely missed the part where it’s for the girls, not all the people on this boat younger than him, but, well. Captain is Captain; and when I gave Nami a long, slow smile, she sighed and handed over a fat stack of cash.

“-and he’s gone. He doesn’t actually care that it’s for only the girls, you realize?”

“No; I figured that out when he asked me how to spell ‘Horizon’; I just… we can’t just put a boy into the Women’s Business, it’s… not right.”

“No… But then again, there’s some things a boy ought to have a lecture on before he becomes a man. I’ll put a hair in Sanji’s ear; you put one in Zoro’s, aye?”

“-aha. Not the Sex Talk- the Sex is Fun talk.”

“Mhm. I’ll handle lots of it, and so will Robin- but you’ve got unique experience that you’ll need to give them access to.”

“I- oouf, well, it’s not like it’s a secret at this point…”

“Some things you don’t need to figure out first-hand.”

“True. -Ugh, I’m so tired of being pregnant… were you always this godsdammed hot?”

“Oh, yeah. And as soon as I’d get comfortable, I had to get up and pee again; and, of course, you’re at the point where you can’t sleep any way except on your side-”

“Fucking shit! I know, right? And- and I want to sleep on my back so fucking much - ”

“-and have you started pissing yourself?”

“Fucking hell, yes! These little shits keep kicking my bladder with no fucking warning, and then-woosh! Like a godsdammn geyser!”

“Ugh, gods, I remember now- Here’s something I noticed and it was the goddamn worst. So, most of mine that got big enough would always sorta… flip-flop around, I guess? And then my balance was shot-”

“-IS THAT WHAT THAT FUCKING IS? FUCKING SHIT!”

“-and the fucking constipation-”

“-uuuuuuuugh-”

“-Oh! And, uh, has your hair changed yet, or…?”

“Fucking Gods, yes it has! It used to be so soft and untangle-y, and now this motherfucking rat’s nest, won’t even… fuuuuuuuck.”

“…You wanna go to Chihiro Sento for the Imbolc Baths?”

“…we can do that?”

“Hells yeah we can.”
“-Fuck it. We’re goin’ to Chihiro Sento for Imbolc. I don’t even care that all the baths are co-ed, I want pampering.”

“Cool. Hehe, they might even have the kind of lotion I used...”

“So. Itchy!”

“Oh- oh no, Nami, don’t cry, it’s gonna be okay-”

“-uuuuuuuagh-!”

All of last year’s remaining candles- really, they’re a few year’s old, so- all the old holiday candles, of which there are enough to light an elaborate chandelier, will be burned through the night of February first; and then most of Imbolc day is devoted to candle-making, or at least the parts that require cutting the string for the wicks.

The hearth fire and engine fire are put out, cleaned, and re-lit; and that’s usually done before the preparation of the feast, so... breakfast is going to be cold, probably. Anyway, after the feast which-knowing my husband- is going to be delicious ; we throw the men out so they don’t have to hear us talk candidly about sex. Us older women- Me Robin Nami Taffy Bryony- will make tiny little acorn-phalluses for the little-women to hold, and give the girls the benefits of Older Women’s Wisdom, so that they might make a better class of mistakes than we did.

We’ll also be weaving Bride-crosses from wheat stalks and exchange them with the ones the men will be making out of reeds, as symbols of protection and prosperity for the coming year. Taffy, Genny, Gurry, and Chopper will be making the besom that I’ll be sweeping the entire ship out with on the final day, in the final ritual- and then we burn that too.

I’ll put a new candle in each room of the ship to honor the revival and renewal of the Sun after its near-permanent defeat by the Serpent and Scorpion of Darkness at Yule; the snakes, Banana and Marzipan, will shed their skins and possibly cough out lucky gemstones; and all through the garden, the first blooms of the season will bud, and possibly burst into flower.

This holiday is all about purity, growth, renewal; union between man and woman- so, sex; pregnancy; and getting rid of the old to make way for the new.

Magical rites and talismans for the holiday are the Little-women, besoms, white flowers, candle wheels, crosses, priapic wands (acorn tipped as they are; a witches wand has a knob on the end, hmmhmmhmhmhmhm), and ploughshares. The herbs of Imbolc are Angelica, for inspiration and magic; Basil, because it’s both hardy and green; Bay for glory, honor, and triumph; Blackberry because they taste good; Celandine, good for medicine, latex, and deadly poison depending on which one you need; Coltsfoot; Heather; Iris; Myrrh; Tansy; Violets; and all white or yellow flowers, including Baby’s Breath and Daffodils. The foods of Imbolc are seeds, nuts, dough-breads, all dairy products- that’s eggs, milk, butter, and cheese- peppers, onions, garlic, and all dried fruit, including peel. The drinks of Imbolc are all mixed spirits, particularly Advocaat; spiced wines, and herbal teas- but not tea-leaf teas. The incense of Imbolc is basil, bay, wisteria, cinnamon, violet, vanilla, and myrrh. The colors of Imbolc are white, pink, red, yellow, green, and brown. The gemstones of Imbolc are amethyst, bloodstone, garnet, ruby, onyx, and turquoise.

The activities of Imbolc, which tend to happen no matter what your particular traditions are- are: candle lighting, stone gathering, snow hiking and searching for signs of spring, making the Little-women and bestowing blessings upon them, making priapic wands, decorating poughshares, feasting, and bonfires. All part of the Turning of the Wheel, naturally.

“Um. Missus Mab, what wheel needs turning?”

“...They didn’t teach it at the Gag, Sancho?”

“No ma’am.”

“Hm. Well, it is breakfast; as fine a time to learn about religion and magic as any other. Just a moment-”

I clear my plate of food in two quick bites, and hand it off to Taffy, who’s on table-bussing duty today; then, let’s see… A few sheets of parchment, my own personal fountain pen, a red brush pen, and a blue brush pen- and I’ll pull everything out from behind Sancho’s ear, which is amusing to me and awe-inspiring to Luffy, who is observing curiously.

I unroll the parchment, and carefully draw out a cross perpendicular to another cross with my black fountain pen, making an eight pointed star in a quartet of lines.

“Everyone who’s lived among enough people knows about the holidays eventually; in order, then. Yule, or the Midwinter Solstice; Imbolc, which is also Maiden’s Day; Ostara, the Spring, or Vernal, Equinox; Beltane, which is also known as Witches, or Walpurgis Night; Litha, or the Midsummer Solstice; Lammas, which is also Taltiu’s Day; Mabon, the Fall, or Autumnal, Equinox; and Samhain, All Hallows, the Night of the Dead.”

I label the eight points with their holidays and dates- or, in the equinox and solstice cases, approximate dates.

“Solstices and equinoxes move just a touch year to year, and tracking those movements is of the utmost importance to witches and fortune tellers alike. Excepting very rare circumstances, they will fall between the twentieth and twenty-third of the month in March for Ostara, June for Litha, September for Mabon, and December for Yule. All their properly magical rituals- and I mean the ones of significance, that serve to protect the entirety of the family, house, or individual- are to happen during the day, at dawn, or at sunset, depending on alignment. The other four spokes on the wheel are overnight celebrations set between them, also to alignment. Imbolc is the first to the second of February, sunset to sunset; Beltane is the first to the second of May, sunset to sunset; Lammas is the last of July to the first of August, sunrise to sunrise; and Samhain is the last of October to the first of November, sunrise to sunrise.”

“Neh, Mab; how do you know what day the solstices are? All those days feel the same, right around then...”
“Hmhmhm; well, usually, I just check the almanac-”

“-Oh, of course-”

“-but if I don’t have an almanac or can’t get to one in time, I’ll use my knowledge of astronomy. Fernanda, Beatrix, Genevieve, Deborah- and anyone else who wants to know- I’ll be teaching you to do those calculations cold. You’re all going to need the skill- Fernanda, specifically, will need the skill to increase the accuracy and clarity of her Sight. Now-”

I make two copies of my diagram, one red, and one blue; without the dates for clarity’s sake- just names on a spidery star, in fact.

“-If you ask someone from the modern school of religious theory, they’ll tell you the year is divided like this,” as I draw a diagonal line in black across the red copy, bisecting the spidery star in angled halves. “Mabon, Samhain, Yule, and Imbolc are the Dark half of the year, and Ostara, Beltane, Litha, and Lammas are the Light half. I, personally, am Properly Neutral, also known as Harmonious, meaning I don’t favor the Light or the Dark; I give proper respect to the ritual and celebration of both side. However, this means I practice both Light and Dark Magic- which I’ll be explaining momentarily, so shush. The reason I don’t currently practice Neutral rituals or attend such celebrations- or even use that much Neutral magic? It’s weak as baby piss is why; neither light nor dark, and less than either, lacking in form, function, structure, and nuance.

“I don’t consider them magical rituals at all; and, quite frankly, a series of hymns from a religion you don’t adhere to would be just as useful. Proper light mages celebrate these holidays,” I say, circling the appropriate names in blue on the blue diagram as I explain. “Yule, because the Light begins to gain power again over the Dark; Imbolc for youth and potential; Ostara for Life and Fertility- also the point at which Light gains dominion over Dark; Beltane for choice; Midsummer is the height of the Light’s power; and Lammas as a day of commitment. Light Mages observe the other holidays, of course- they do their best to balance their lives on Mabon, and honor the dead on Samhain; but neither are days of power for them, by which I mean there are Light Magic rituals that are meant to take place on Yule, Imbolc, Ostara, Beltane, Litha, and Lammas, but not on Mabon or Samhain. Well, I say that, but immediately think of quite a few that ought be done on those days- here, then.

“On the six circled holidays, Light Mages will build their workings; on the other two, they will break their workings. There are times it is best to build something up; and there are times when it is best to break it down. Everyone follows so far?”

“-I think so, Boss. Is Dark the opposite?”

“Not quite. Dark Mages celebrate these holidays,” I say, smiling softly as I circle the appropriate holidays in red on the blue diagram. “Mabon is when the Dark begins to gain power again over the Light; Samhain for age and destruction; Yule for duty and self-sacrifice- also the point at which Dark gains dominion over Light; Walpurgis, or Beltane, for wildness and freedom; Litha is when Light’s power begins to wane; and Lammas is a day for binding and compulsion.

“As it is above, so it is below; thus, Dark Mages observe the other holidays. Imbolc, for dark mages, tends to be the day when they clear away the belongings and final physical reminders of the ones who have died, or general house-cleaning; Ostara is a good day to renew a vow, or remind oneself of the ground; but neither Imbolc or Ostara give power to the Dark Mage. Dark Magic rituals are meant to take place on Mabon, Samhain, Yule, Walpurgis, Litha, and Lammas; not on Imbolc or Ostara.
With that said; on the six circled holidays, Dark Mages will build their workings; on the other two, they will break their workings. A season, and seasoning, for all things.

“In review- the Light of the year, or Wheel,” I say as I begin to draw the perfect curved line in black on the blue with red copy of the diagram, “is from Yule to Lammas. The Dark of the Wheel is from Beltane to Yule. Four of the eight holidays have both Light and Dark powers active: Yule, Beltane, Litha, and Lammas, where the Light and Dark overlap,” I say as I draw simple chevrons pointing to each named day on the Wheel. “Mabon and Samhain are only dark, and Imbolc and Ostara are only Light, for ritual purposes. Light and Dark, despite their opposition, have two important things in common: they both comfort, and they both blind. Too much of either is just as bad as not enough of both, to my mind. There are some things that can be done with either Magic; and there are some things that can be done with only one or the other; and there are some things that ought not be done with Magic at all. Power, and Powers, are nothing without control.”

“-neh, Mab, I’ve been wonderin’ about this since I was a kid...”

“Wassup, Luffy?”

“Well, I hear people swear by the Powers sometimes, and I was wonderin’- since you mentioned them an’ all, are they like… th’ gods or somethin’?”

“Ah. No, Luffy- the Powers are not the Gods. The Gods are the Powers.”

“Huh?”

“Like how you’re not a straw hat with a guy, you’re a guy with a straw hat- or, uh, how you can toast bread then butter it, but not butter bread then toast it.”

“Oh!”

“...Um, Boss, could we get the Not-Luffy explanation?”

“Sure thing, Bea. The Powers which you might have heard of when a witch, wizard, or mage swears by something, is… hm. The gods, all the different pantheons- each familiar face is an aspect, or facet, of one or more of the Great Powers. There are eight Dark Powers, eight Light Powers; Seven Virtues, and Seven Sins.”

“...what about the terrible fates, Missus Mab?”

“The Terrible Fates are something different, Ellie- I’ll explain those too, if you’d like…? Right, remind me so I can tell you later- Now, the Dark Powers are Binding; Chaotic; Deathly; Deceptive; Destructive; Infernal; Solitary; and Tangible. The Light Powers are Deliberative; Orderly; Lively; Naive; Constructive; Mundane; Cooperative; and Intangible,” I rattle off with the ease of long practice, as I write them out on the back of the red diagram, each in their ordered pair. “The Virtues can be disputed as one word or another; however, the way I learned them is like this: Kindness, Loyalty, Generosity, Camaraderie-”

“-kahm-rah-dur-ee-” calls Sanji.

“CAW-MAR-RAW-DEER-AUGH- Ecstasy, Honesty, and Determination. The Sins can also be disputed as one word or another; but I learned them as Cruelty, Treachery, Greed, Discord, Misery, Lying, and Cowardice. The Powers differ more in associations and focus than anything else, even if they’re celebrated at the same time or exist in the same action.”

“Uh…?” is the chorus I’m greeted with.
“Well, here—most of the Powers aren’t really what one thinks of as Light and Dark in terms of magic. Order and Binding are very similar, and both are celebrated on Lammas; Chaotic and Deliberative are celebrated on Beltane. It’s these qualities of duality that make certain holidays suitable for both Light and Dark rituals, and not one or the other alone.

“As I said, the real difference lies in the association and focus, not necessarily the proximity—Beltane is about the freedom of Choice. Chaos and wildness abound; but, so does deliberation, and reason. Freedom of choice doesn’t just mean ‘I can do whatever I want’; it also means ‘I can choose to do what must be done.’ Duty, responsibility, change—these are choices, as much as any other, and you can choose to follow through with them, or not, as the moment comes.

“Honestly, the philosophy of the Powers isn’t all that important unless you’re dedicating yourself to a Path—which is the following of one specific Power above the others—or performing a ritual. You girls—and boy, I see you there, Sancho—are ready for neither without supervision.

“Also, things get really fucking weird with Infernal and Mundane and Tangible and Intangible. Most people stick to the major Dark and Light magical definitions for their workings: compulsion versus choice; wildness versus domestication; deception versus honesty; and independence versus cooperation.”

“...Boss, why are you Harmonious? Really, not the quick reason.”

“...Well, it really does come back to balance, Beatrix. Compulsion, wildness, deception, and independence—it’s a fine way to live, but very lonely, in the end. It breeds arrogance and overconfidence, and I’ve never, ever seen that path end too terribly well for anyone. Choice, domestication, honesty, and cooperation—also a fine way to live, but soul crushing, eventually. The World is not kind to people who choose outside of their fellows; who cannot abide safety for overlong; who are too honest; who cooperate only if their collaborators are their equal or better. The truth is, you need both halves to make a whole; you need to compel yourself to do some things, and give yourself a choice in others; wild and tame; false and true; alone, together. When I was very young, I decided to do something very hard all by myself, and I didn’t care what I had to become so long as I did it—except, in the end, I became someone I was not, for a reason it took me many years to understand.”

“...It’s better, when you’re not alone. If you’re not okay, it’s still not great—but it’s better than being alone,” says Genevieve, before Sancho wraps an arm around her.

“Yes. Yes, it is. -ah, the Powers are divided thus, over the holidays,” I say, scrawling powers next to each named holiday, black juxtaposing red. “Yule is for independence or isolation or solitude; Imbolc is for honesty, youth, potential, and naivete. Ostara is for life. Beltane is for freedom of choice, chaotic and deliberative; Litha is for interdependence—sorry, cooperation. Lammas is for binding; order, compulsion, domestication, duty, commitment. Lots of marriages happen on Lammas; it’s usually a nice day for it too, not too hot or cold. Mabon is for deception, wisdom, experience, and age; every masquerade—”

“-mas-ker-aide-” calls Sanji.

“MACE-QUEUE-RAID- and orgy I’ve ever been to has started or coincided in some way with Mabon. Then, of course, Samhain for death and the dead. If we add the other Powers, the destructive Power goes with death; constructive goes with life. Infernal and Intangible go for Yule with solitary; and Mundane and Tangible go for Litha with cooperative.”

“Neh, what’re those ones, Mab? Infernal and intangerine and muddy?”
“Infernal- or Celestial, it depends on the source- Intangible, and Mundane, Luffy; and they’re fucking weird is what they are. Infernal is technically Dark and has something to do with other dimensions, I guess, and also magic. Intangible is technically Light; it’s spirit and ideas and memories and past and present and emotions, and things like that- but all of this World. They go at Yule with the solitary power because they’re hard to explain and kind of similar, but really entirely different; different sources, different aims. Both powers are outside of you as a person and the World in completely different ways, which kinda doesn’t make sense for Intangible but what the hell do I know, I nearly failed out of Divinity… Oh, Divinity is the what the class for this kind of thing is called, if you didn’t know.”

“Shishishishishishi- neh, what about Muddy and Tangerine?”

“Mundane and Tangible? Mundane is this World, the opposite of Infernal or Celestial; it’s everything we can sense in this plane of existence, from the smallest hint of mustard to the most massive of mountains; our wills, our wonders, our everything. Tangible is everything physical, and is often confused with hedonistic pleasures- sex, drugs, booze, that sort of thing- but that’s not all Tangible is. Mundane and Tangible go with the Cooperative Power because you experience them as part of the World around you. There’s a lot of overlap- but Infernal is different from everything else. You can have tangible and intangible and all the other powers within the mundane world; but Infernal as a concept and a force exists completely outside and away from all others. I never quite understood how, exactly, Infernal Power then acts and effects the World if it’s completely separate from it, but it does. It is a Mystery.”

“Mystery Power!”

“Mhm!”

“-So, Boss, what'll we be doing over the weekend?”

“Ah, right- Imbolc! Everything gets cleaned; we’ll go to the Chihiro Sento, the girls will make Little-women with the Women, the Boy will go with the Men to do Man-things; sweep out the old year, becon the new with fire… some of it’ll be fun, most of it’ll be work. At one of the cruxes, a point in the year at which All the World Turns. The Earth turns and the Sun is reborn; we light fires, we clean winter away… Get some fresh air.

“Also, since all of you can see over the bar, there, you can get really fucking drunk on basically custard mix spiked with really hard spirits. It’s Traditional, after all.”

“-Hey, Mab?”

“Mmmyes, Chopper?”

“When’re you going to start making Advocaat?”

“Hm, probably today.”

“Yeeeeeesssss- “

My friends are silly.
So, actually, this is something I can teach Genny- I may just be a journeyman Weather Witch, but she can learn this from me. It’s better she learn this from me, yis, because if Nami tries to teach it to her… Well, if she wasn’t pregnant she’d probably be fine, but- best she hear this from me.

“So. There are four main schools of Magical Philosophy, each with it’s own valued qualities and personal appeals. In truth, magic is only limited by what you, personally, think it is; how you believe magic should be used will both reflect your personality, and change how you use the power.”

We’re in the stillroom, making the poisons that will become medicine under Chopper’s gimlet eye, or even more deadly poisons under Gurry’s graceful hand. Genevieve is wearing her potion-making clothing; I’m wearing a heavy white coat and protective eyewear.

“Most lay-people understand magic as a weapon. Daring, nerve, and chivalry- these are what the average person thinks of when they think of a wizard, witch, or mage. They think of the aggressive forms of magic- fireballs from empty hands, the shattering of entrenched walls, war and glory… And, to be fair, most magic users who become any kind of famous are that kind of person; they do perceive magic as a weapon. The ones who excel in aggressive forms of magic- offensive and defensive spells, dueling… and the truest of them know that power is a responsibility in and of itself, and so use their power to stand for what is right and good. They are very much like swords; cutting down their foes and defending their friends alike. I’m like that; so is Captain, and Bryony.”

We grind down seed-husks and bark; we crush bits of wood into splinters and put those splinters in water. We bottle what remains, and set things to boil. Refine, refine, refine.

“Those people who live near enough magic to have the shine worn off- those people who live near or work with hedgewitches and hedgewizards… those people tend to think of magic as a gift. The best gifts are given- not always freely, but always given. Loyalty and justice tend to be their creed, and the best of them abhor the idea of jealously guarding magic from the world or ever using it to bring harm. This kind of magic user shares their magic to benefit their community, to protect the overlooked and helpless, and to oppose those who would use their magic to torment and bully others. Nami is the first; Mab is the second; and Zoro is the third.”

We crush crystals left from boiling away the fluid into powder; we put that powder into brown bottles, and label them with extreme care. Name, Date Made, Who Made It, Good Until, Do Not Use If…

“Then, there are those who believe the direct opposite. Some people consider their magic a treasure that they’ve been entrusted to protect. Their fascination with purity, advantage, cunning, and secrecy-which, while easily perverted, are not qualities in and of themselves bad. - comes from the idea that people with magic have been given something special that it is their duty to protect at all costs. The thing of it is, they aren’t entirely wrong: power, in the wrong hands, known to the wrong person, can be very, very dangerous. Using your power to interfere in matters that do not concern you is a gross presumption that often leads to overconfidence, arrogance, and death. They are cautious with their magic, and cautious in general- though that may not be apparent at first. Mark, and Brook, and Usopp, fall in this realm.”

We steadily clean what we have used, obeying the ordinances meant to neutralize and nullify what remains of our work. We hang up our tools; we pack away the unused raw materials. Genny mulls over what I have said.

“Finally, there are those who believe that magic is an art form; a beautiful art form, that should be appreciated and studied for its own sake. These people are often considered the innovators and geniuses of their generation, because, outside of an intrapersonal relationship, unless they explicitly indicate their interest in magic, whatever they choose to put themselves into… they very often become the best they can be at whatever they’ve chosen to exalt. ‘Wit beyond measure is man’s greatest treasure,’- that’s an aphorism and a dick joke, all in one go. That’s the kind of person who considers magic art; and if that’s what you think, asking what magic is for is useless. These people push the boundaries of magic to see if they can; they want to know how far they can go. Robin wants to know the True History of the World; Gurry wants to Paint like no other has painted before him; Sanji wants to find an impossible place; Chopper wants to cure every disease.”

“...Some of those personalities overlap, though…?”

“Well, of course! A person isn’t just their core- a tree is not just it’s heart. People, like onions and well dressed men, have layers. Magic can be a weapon, a gift, a treasure, an art- and it can be none of those things, or all of those things, or any combination of the four. What matters is how you think of magic; do you really want to learn how to make potions? Fine. Do you really want to learn battle magic? Good on you! Do you want to see how fast you can fly? Outstanding! The World, and all the wonders therein are your edible bivalve mollusc of choice! Could be an oyster; could be a clam!”

“...You’re not very good at pep talks, are you Taffy?”

“No, I’m not. Still; we’re about to start gathering the straw for the Bride-crosses, and I wanted you to be thinking about some things when we start. Who are you, Genevieve? What do you want? These questions aren’t meant to frighten you, though they are very big and a bit scary- but challenge!
You’re becoming someone new; you’re growing, as we speak. Who will you become, in this next year?”

“Wobbly start, solid finish. I give your pep talk a solid Average Plus grade, with room for improvement.”

“Well, considering it’s my first ever pep talk, I’ll take that as a win.”

“Heh.”

“Heeheeheehee- mm, change into something you can work outdoors in, and if you see your sisters, tell them to do the same. S’time for the first grass-cutting of the season!”
And Genny, with a smile that doesn’t ring false like it did a few days ago, nods and trots off. I sigh, and roll my shoulders, let my wings flutter and fluff. Gods in heaven, how did Mab do this?

Here’s how you make a Bride-cross. Cut straw- thin reeds, wheat, even grass will do if it’s long enough- and let it dry not quite stiff. Take a straw for each of the Powers, sixteen in total.

The shortest straw goes in the center, held upright; the longest gets folded in half around the shortest, making a square angle. Making sure the opening is to the right, pull it tight; and turn, so the opening is pointing upwards, and fold another straw; fold again and again until only four straws remain. Put a stone in the center and gather the loose ends in your hand; use one of the four straws to tie the end, and taking care not to cut or rip the straw, tuck the long edges inside until no end or seam can be found. Do the same for all four ends of the cross, and you’re done.

Stack ‘em near the fire so they really dry out; and get ready for the next thing.

I’ve managed five of them, since we began; and I suppose it’s time to put the handles on those blades I made at Zoro’s request… I’ll bless them during Imbolc, and then Nami can have Zoro put them under their bed… probably under the mattress in their hammock box, actually.

“-naw, Adelaide. I know he comes off as deep and mysterious, but Zoro’s really an open book. You just have to take the time to read the pages; he doesn’t volunteer information about himself, but if you just ask, he’ll tell you. He actually left his dojo a final time to get groceries, but he got lost and ended up here with a bounty on his head and no groceries to speak of-”

I smile, and take out the blades. They’re actually very small; no different in form from a steak knife. I thought about putting the magic into the metal, making them ornate and spectacular- but these aren’t weapons meant to be seen with the eye.

It’s when I take out the binding I’ve been preparing that things get very quiet. After all, Zoro said what he wanted- One, and One, and Two-As-One. Wind, Rain, Thunder-and-Lightning.

“Heed the North wind’s mighty tread;
“Sky grows dim, heart fills with dread.
“When the wind flies from the South;
“Love’s gentle kiss will guard your mouth.
“When the soft wind blows from the West;
“Those departed will have no rest.
“When the wind runs from the East;
“Danger comes and wise ones feast.”

For all her bellyaching about being ‘nothing like Nami’, Taffy’s a very good Weather Witch in her own right.

For the North Wind, black thread; the bringer of change, the mighty one. It’s power is unmatched.

For the South Wind, yellow thread; knower of the heart, the passionate lover. It’s warmth is unrivalled.

For the West Wind, blue thread; the finder of secrets, the mysterious one. It’s patience is unfaltering.

For the East Wind, white thread; learner of wisdom, the young student. It’s advice is uncontested.

Each Wind has a very important energy that can’t be falsified; and all of them work together very well, which is why most mages who aren’t Weather mages call them together. The winds are often called on in magic in conjunction with watchtowers, but that varies with tradition.

What does not is the method of their tying into a talisman. (Really, there are only so many ways to tie an effective knot; and while general calling in ritual magic can vary with whatever you’re comfortable doing, making an effective talisman really is a matter of tradition.)

It’s a simple four strand braid around a solid core; over, and down, round and around, until at last the hilt is covered and there is no more to weave. Seal the end; and seal again, with a touch of magic. Even though I added no flourish to it’s construction, the magic will out; the plain blade has become different, and beautiful in my hand. The blade itself looks more like a feather; the four colors of the wind zig-zag down the hilt.

A Blade of Wind, as Zoro indicated would be appropriate.

Rain isn’t Wind; what works for one does not work for another. Wind can be bound into thread- in many ways, Wind is thread. Heat rubs against itself to make Wind; but Rain is not Wind. Seeds of dust drift through the sky and gather water around them; when they attain too great a weight, they fall.

Rain grieves, and reconciles, and nourishes too. The Rain falls and the earth is refreshed and renewed; the rain falls and the earth is covered in sorrow. Clean and cool; clean and warm. Clean- and so a glass of rainwater that fair beats on my head with it’s power.

I take the designated knife, and let it fall into the water; power rushes, and gushes, like a gutter rattling with rainwater- and then it is done. The water is gone, absorbed or transformed into the power of the blade; and the blade itself is changed, becoming a thing of equal lines and sharp beauty.

A Blade of Rain, as Zoro asked for.

Finally, the Brothers; Thunder, and Lightning. For this, only an incantation; for this, only words, nothing more.

“For you are indeed a splendid storm, though it is not theirs to know; thunder is the soundtrack for the places you choose to go. Your rage brings renewal; or the breaking of a heart- you the curling reminder; you the crashing start; together or alone, you are a second early or late- you stumble through a soggy sky, and you do not wait. The light that shows will always leave them stricken, numbed and blind; you race ahead with dainty tread, your beloved close behind. Lover or brother or somewhere between; you dart away in the dark and you roaring follow. To see, to speak; you were not made for tenderness or stillness. Bright and blinding; strong and striking; call the world to being and shatter it in the same moment. You, who are untamed- I call upon thee! ”

A spark; a flash. The smell of sky and heat. And then, only blades and a wide eyed gaggle of girls.

They’ve become identical; a pair of pocket knives that weight the same, and have the same mechanism keeping them open and folding them shut. The difference is, Thunder’s knife is all sharp lines and hard angles , the booming crash of air on air; Lightning’s knife is curling and flickering , a coiling dance of plasma that changes the very nature of the world it touches.

Thunder and Lightning; two-as-one.

When the stars align- the rites will come to bear- illuminate the signs- the exiled shall be there-strands may break alone- but twisted make a braid- together, on their own- the journey must be made!

I smack Nami’s hand away from where it was creeping towards the unfinished magic blades.

“They’ll be done after Imbolc; you can have them then, Nami.”

“...kay...”

“Have a biscuit.”

“Yay!”

“This is a serious subject, with no easy answers- to start, I want you to tell me, in your own words, about the first time you committed suicide.”

I roll over onto my back, the squishy bag-thing under me supporting my weight. Mab’s a deeply calm and non judgemental presence at my side; we’re almost wrapped around each other. She’s warm, and sweet smelling, like freshly bloomed flowers and coconut oil.

I’m warm and safe and I can’t bear another moment of silence.
“When I was eight, I hung myself with a belt. Or rather… I decided to do a test run to make sure the beam I was using in an old barn would hold before saying goodbye and… finishing it. During the test, I slipped and actually hung myself. The panic I felt during those few moments I was dangling was all it took to convince myself I should live. I needed desperately to tell my mother and my sisters I loved them. I needed to get out- and, luckily, I managed to get my footing back on the stool I was using to get high enough. I realized then I wasn’t ready to go- and even… even if in the coming years I would get to that edge again… for one reason or another, I never could die.

“It’s funny- right after Bryony caught me, I immediately thought of Puffy, and how she wouldn’t understand that I was gone forever, just that she’d been left behind. I have so much love left in me; and I know they love me too, I just… It’s like I’m covered in tar, or something, and every time I scrape enough off of me I can see my skin and try to get out of the pit, I trip and fall in again and have to start over, and I just…

“I’m tired. I’m tired of so much goddamn tar, and always falling over into it again and having to clean it off again.”

“Mm. I know exactly what you mean.”

“Is there a way to… get better? I want- I want to get better.”

“Well, to start, you have to understand- no one will ever come and save you from your depression, and that’s what you have. From what you’ve told me, it sounds like you have chronic depression. So- first, I’m going to recommend Doctor Chopper give you an antidepressant regimen; I’ll set up a few therapeutic regimens for you, and I’ll give you some homework, too.

“To start with, you have to get into situations where it’s at least possible for you to be happy. You can’t sleep in bed all day; you can’t keep refusing to go out and do things when your siblings ask; you can’t just stay inside all day now that you’ve no broom to fly with. No one will come and save you; you have to save yourself.”

“How will I know I’ve gotten better? …will I ever get better at all?”

“…It’s not like eating an extra spicy pepper and bursting into tears, Genny. Depression swallows your memories of actually feeling happy; you can remember being happy, but you can’t remember what it feels like. Even when you’ve recovered a great deal, that doubt lingers. For me, the most I can remember feeling happiness is a mild contentment, a sort of… a happiness that needs no smile to be felt. That’s what I want; so that’s what I strive for.”

Mab heaves a deep sigh, and cuddles me closer. I feel warm, and safe, but not tired at all- but I don’t really want to move, either.

“No light ever shone through my eyes; there was never a moment I said ‘I’m better, now.’ Depression, coming and going, sneaks like a fox into a henhouse- it’s easy to miss the warning signs, and when you’re waist deep in the tar your concern is not getting neck deep. Honestly, the hardest- but also, best- thing I ever learned to do for myself was ask for help.

“My most recent depressive spell was about a year ago, and I only realized it was just that, a spell, a passing storm, when I rolled over in bed, looked at my husband, and went back to sleep. I can only describe it as what I don’t do, what I don’t feel- I don’t dwell on the terrible, and I don’t feel like I’m locked into one form of being, one road to the end…

“Mostly, you have to understand that everyone is different, and you feel things differently from everyone else. Recovering from an illness takes time, Genny, time and support and patience. Your mind is as much a part of your body as your lungs, and needs caring for, same as the rest. Also, you’ll probably have lots of small ‘Oh, i’m getting better’ moments where you’ll do stuff you couldn’t before. You’ve had a cold before, right?”

“Yeah, of course. Oh. Oh! -I… There’s no easy fix, is there?”

“No. No, there isn’t.”

“…But I can fix this, right?”

“Of course.”

“Okay. Then… to start, I’m going to need to build a new broom.”

I left Mab’s Cuddle Spot feeling… determined. I also left with a journal Mab bound for me; she said it’s cover was a simplification of the cover of Zoro’s personal journal. I’ve seen him writing in it, now that I know what I’m looking at- it’s thick and green and he always scribbles in it furiously right around tea time. Mine’s more… turquoise , I think. And Mab’s right, the design is simpler than his. She also gave me a fountain pen with a case.

This is the first thing I’ve written in my journal.

In the desert

I saw a creature, naked, bestial,

Who, squatting upon the ground,

Held his heart in his hands,

And ate of it.

I said: “Is it good, friend?”

“It is bitter- bitter,” he answered;

“But I like it

Because it is bitter,

And because it is my heart.”

I don’t know why I wrote a poem to start this journal, but… I don’t know, it felt right. The only person I have to justify this to is myself, right? Right.
I’ve started writing at tea time, near-ish to Zoro because the vibe he throws out when he writes is really conducive. I always feel like I can write down what I need to write down then, and… I’m starting to develop a habit.

Bryony said that part of my exacerbating problem was not using my talent; and now that I’m engaged in learning real Magic, I think she’s… well, she’s not wrong.

I’ve turned to Humor as a shield for my problems; it’s my only defence, now.

These are the stages of Exhaustion:

Sleepy
Tired Exhausted

The sort of manic, insomniac sugar-rushed caffinated cocaine in the cola screaming buzz high that you annoy your friends and family and pets with because Do you think that houseplants know they’re indoors? Do you think they mind? Does our dog know I’m sorry for stepping on her tail? Does she know I love her? Like, does she really know?

That weird liminal space as one day smears into the next and you’re half expecting to get abducted by aliens but all that happens is you chew through your breakfast without really tasting it and everyone sounds like they’re saying ‘bork bork bork bork’.

The fuzzy-headed, dry-eyed, cotton-mouthed, too much benadryl-esque hell reminiscent of the time you slugged two benadryl back with a mini-cup of nyquil and slept for four days straight because that was pneumonia, not a cold, actually. Woo, I totally should have died that time, goddamn.

I have broken through to the other side of exhaustion and now posses an invincible exoskeleton, a deep appreciation for fuzzy sweaters, and absolutely no fucks left to give. Come at me, O Reaper, O Fortuna; I have seen the inevitable heat-death of the cosmos and bitchslapped it into next week. You. Don’t. Scare. Me.

Black out; wake up and you can’t tell what day it is.

I don’t care if I offend someone by writing this; I’m going to get better. I’m going to be content with my life, and have good relationships with my family, and I’m going to make that happen if I have to drag myself there kicking and screaming.

So, like, when I was a kid I thought the generic witch or wizard used a wand or a staff, but all I could afford to buy with my scrimpings and the occasional pocket money Mom gave us was a bargain baseball bat. I mean- I just thought your spell medium needed to have a wooden body, and two-by-fours kept giving me nasty splinters, so… Baseball bat. I mean, I could have used a bokken, but those have connotations and I wasn’t interested in using a sword.

Anyway, it means that when I run out of… I don’t know what it’s properly called, but I call it gusto, when I run out of gusto instead of cutting and running I can just crack my heavy hickory bat all stamped with burnt on runes and mystical sigils over the head of whichever punk’s challenging me this time. Very useful.

You can’t undo who you are. You can’t take back what you said. You’ll never forget what you did… but you can accept, and apologize, and forgive. That has to be enough.

“Hey Sanji?”
“My love?”
“What’s a vampire’s favorite fruit?”
“I dunno, love, what?”
“A neck tarine!”
“Pfffffffft-”

Chef and Mab are In Love With Each Other, and that’s fine, I guess; but good god these puns. They are so bad.

My training schedule that Chef gave me- with a few notations by Doctor Chopper- is pretty simple, in that none of the exercises are really all that new to me. I have a slightly different set of exercises to do every other day during the work-week, and I do intensive stretching exercises on the weekends-excepting Sunday, when I don’t do anything except my laps.

I do laps around the decks first thing in the morning- first set wet, second set dry- after meditation but before breakfast prep; then I lift weights by moving stuff around in the pantry- heavy sacks of flour, sugar, cans of milk… I also have to squat, so I can get at the lower shelves and bins. There’s a military press I have to do a series of reps in, then arm curls without weights to start but he’ll start adding weight next week; one-arm overhead tricep extension, full hanging leg raise… That got partially modified by Zoro and Chopper because I’m a mermaid, not a fishwoman. Eight legs, not two. Then, squat to raise with a medicine ball- or a melon, when the season for melons comes around, and crunches. Finish the day with another set of laps, and I’m done. That’s Moonsday.

Weirdsday, it’s my laps; then pull ups, chin ups, dumbbell lunges, dumbbell side lunges, alternating kettlebell rows; then ab plate twists, ab rollers, and pulse ups. Finish the day with another set of laps, and I’m done.

Foolsday, it’s my laps; then bench press, deadlifts, dumbbell hang clean, arnold press; hammer curl, tricep dip; plank, side plank, and squat to raise with medicine ball again. Finish off with another set of laps, and I’m done.

That’s all conditioning, by the way- MWF, I’m conditioning my body for combat and work in the kitchen. Tuesday, Throughsday, and Soulsday are all combat training days. Chef can’t actually teach me his particular fighting style; his relies on having solid bones in the leg, and mine are all muscle. So, he had to accept my fighting style as my fighting style.

I’m a knife fighter, after all.

Anyway- I didn’t really notice myself getting any stronger, as I’ve only been training according to my schedule for about two days or so, but… well, Mab put us all through our paces, and told us that we were welcome to participate in the group training they hold every day or so.

I’ve never beaten my sister Adelaide in a one on one fight, but- yesterday, I nearly killed her. I didn’t think the knife I threw would move that fast; and I swear, I thought she’d dodge, not stand there like a lump and- It’s only because of Mister Brook that my sister didn’t lose an eye.

Addy apologized and stormed off; and after I took my knife back from Mister Brook, he went to have a talk with her. I dunno what happened with those two, and I dunno what he said to her; but she’s been more herself. I mean, it’s like… like she was trying to pretend our Mom actually dying didn’t affect her, when it did- it affected all of us.

Sancho and Cece didn’t let themselves fall into the trap of repression. I do wish they’d repress some of their fart jokes, though.

‘What do you call a person that doesn’t fart in public?’ ‘I dunno, Sancho, what?’ ‘A Private Tutor!’

‘Hahahahahahahaha! Okay, okay- uh- Why don’t farts graduate from high school?’ ‘I dunno, Cece, why?’ ‘Because they always end up getting expelled!’

‘Heeheeheehee! Did either of you hear about ninja farts?’

‘No, why?’ ‘No, do tell.’

‘They’re silent but deadly.’

‘Hahahahahahahaha- ‘Ohohohohohohohoho-’

I had to listen to those jackasses tell each other fart jokes for two hours. Chef’s been explaining why he wants me to show him my baking style, but all I can think of is fart jokes. What did the pad say to the fart? You are the wind beneath my wings. What’s it called when the Queen of Fairies farts? A noble gas. Why do farts smell? For the benefit of those who are hearing impaired!

“ SHRIMP! ”

“ YES CHEF! ”

“ START BAKING! ”

“ YES CHEF! ”
Now. I- oh dear. I need to… the intercom is over here, Bryony spent an entire day taking making sure we all knew how to use the intercom and the phone, flip this switch and press here.

“Attention, everyone. Due to circumstances beyond my control, I, Deborah, will be baking today.
Brace yourselves.”

Far in the distance, through no less than three distinct walls, I can hear my sister Beatrix scream in terror; the terrified screech mingles with the horror-filled wailing of my sister Eleanor in the Library.
Sancho and Cece stumble over each other trying to get into the Galley so they can watch what’s about to happen; they are followed by a slightly more sedate Genevieve, who dives into the Sanitary Ward mid-change into her nurse’s uniform. She throws Fernanda out; Fern rolls across the ground, staggers to her feet, and bolts out the Galley doors- directly into Adelaide, who grabs her, tucks her under one arm, and trumps the both of them over to the Galley couch. The patterning of tiny feet fills the air for but a moment, and then the Mice drop down from one of the ceiling beams and settles at their tiny table on the mantle.

Chef Sanji’s eyes have opened very wide. I crack my neck, and begin.

Most of my baking efforts are really just finishing jobs; I buy already prepared doughs or batters, add whatever I’m going to add to them, and finish them off in the oven or skillet. Either that, or I go for things you boil- noodles, dumplings, and so on. However, when Mom got sick, I became the primary food-producer for our family, and… well, I should be able to bake, right?

Women cook for their families; there are magazine articles about it and everything.

However, I have a problem. As much as I don’t like admitting it, I’m no good at baking. Anything I do that involves making dough or batter, ovens, baking trays, or griddles- to name just a few!- goes horribly, disastrously wrong. Even finished baked goods have a tendency to behave oddly on bad days- that’s why I’m not allowed on pain of pain to help Cece make her yeasteel weapons.

Even so, all of us love baked goods, partly because they’re just so rare at a reasonable price, and, well… even before I went a bit crazy about pizza and flan, I would do my best to bake something that had at least part of the finished product be edible.

The pizza… forget about the pizza. The flan, though… I swear, I thought I’d manage it! It was just an eggy pudding, and I can do a pudding! The body of a flan is not typically very sweet, and that’s why it’s got the caramelized sugar syrup; it throws the eggy richness into relief. A sharp burnt sugar taste, and then the neutral caramel taste.

I set out the last of my mis en plas, and I carefully look everything over. No faults I can see; and I’m not trying to do anything with yeast, Chef specifically asked me to make a simple batter-bake, I remember it clearly…

My siblings- who haven’t been horribly scarred by traumatic encounters with bread-noughts and yeast beasts, anyway- are arranged quietly in the Galley, ready to intervene if necessary. I look at them all, including the Mice, and then I nod once sharply. They all nod back. Chef looks a bit…
well, he asked.
Time to give Chef what he asked for.

“Dekiru yo!”

I calmly survey the kitchen, noting where problems are likely to flare up. This is going to be a battle. One I can’t lose- I can’t even bear the thought of losing again. From this moment until I can continue no longer, because it’s dinner time, I will fight on for the sake of a delicious baked good. The enemy is my own inability to bake.

I close my eyes, and take a long, deep breath.

I am calm; I am prepared.

I step forwards, onto the field of battle.

Simple measures must first be taken before tackling the larger obstacle; from the cupboard, I take a plate and a place setting and set it delicately in front of Sanji, who’s taken a seat next to the mast. It’s a normal ship plate, wooden because I’m not- it’s not going to be like the pizza, but it’s not going to be good, either. Forks on their left, spoon and knife on the right, knife facing the plate and closest to it.

Chef gives me a nod. I nod back, and carefully set down the bowl on top of his plate, which makes him raise an eyebrow at me, but I’m no fool. I go over to the dry pantry which doesn’t get raided like the fridge, and so has no lock, and take out two new boxes of dry cereal- the lightly fermented kind Robin likes during her period, yes, Chef specifically told me that, and the double-frosted nightmares that Sancho loves. I carefully set both down in full view on the counter, and move away- like I said, if I’m around finished baked goods too long while also trying to bake myself, things get weird quick.

Even so, the boxes weighed… they felt off, somehow. Hm. Well, I’ve never actually seen Robin’s cereal until Chef showed me and made me taste some; could be a new formulation. As for the double-frosted sugar-hells, there’s a guaranteed prize in every box- it’s probably another decoder ring or something.

I look very carefully at the fruit basket at the far end of the counter, and, as expected, it’s full of fruit. I take a generous selection, including Wild Apples, Zappy Bananas, and Thin-Skin Sugar Beets, and I set them out nice on the table, in their own large bowl, then set that bowl of fruit near Sanji.

My fruit and cereal contingency is in place; it’s time to prepare for the real challenge of this battle: Baking.

Pancakes. Everyone actually likes pancakes; and I’m fairly good at making them, and have had marginal success making the batter from scratch- it often works better if I do savory. I’ve already portioned out the necessary dry ingredients and carefully measured each one; they’re all in a bowl, on the other side of the kitchen, with a lid on top. My griddle is on the unlit stove; my spatula is at it’s side.

I am ready.
I start with the eggs, cool from their storage in the Dairy. With one hand, I crack the first egg against the side of the metal bowl. The egg shell shatters against the palm of my hand instead, and slime oozes down my wrist. I carefully put as much egg-yuck into a sieve I’d had on standby just in case that happened; and after carefully getting as much yolk and white into the bowl as I could, I tapped out the shells into the compost trash, rinsed the sieve, washed my hands, and continued.

The enemy had made itself known, after all.

I take another egg. A different approach would have to be taken; this time, I used both hands to break the shell open after cracking it on the rim. It struck perfectly, and cracked in two pieces. The enemy was one step ahead of me though, and instead of the expected raw egg, a baby dragon popped out, squalling and hissing and flailing everywhere. It flopped into my workbowl and squirmed around in the broken egg in the bottom, before smelling it and slurping it up into it’s tiny pink mouth. It then began peeping and chirping at me, hungry for more.

I’m not mad at the little dragonet; it is, ultimately, just an unwitting agent of the enemy. Frankly speaking, it’s a miracle the mocking-drake that laid an egg in the dovecote wasn’t found by Mark, and that this particular egg wasn’t pulled for eating sooner, and even that the egg survived Mab’s vetting process. At any other time, on any other day, I’d take a moment to sex the dragonet, get it a nice slurry of meaty bits and egg, and raise it as a pet; but today, I just don’t have time for that. Thankfully, Mark’s right there- he just came in, actually.

“I need you to take care of this baby-”

“Uh- oh, oh dear, how’d this litt’lun get on our ship-”

“It’s a mocking-drake dragonet, so, I’d imagine at some point in the last two weeks a mocking-drake snuck into the dovecote, ate one of the eggs the doves were brooding, and left it’s own behind. Anyway, I’m trying to bake- can you look after it until I’m done?”

“So, no problem. They eat…?”

“Eggs, meat, eggshells, seashells… feeds and waters like a gamefowl, as I recall.”

“Aa. I can handle that, sure.”

And that’s that sorted; now, onwards.

I take out a new bowl, and set it where the old bowl was. Then, I try my very best to crack open the eggs and get them into the bowl. Eggs squirm; they twitch; another dragonet pops out, this one curled up into a ball with tiny little nubs on it’s narrow skull. However, I had set my opening area over the sieve just in case, and manage to catch all four kinds of the little dragonets that pop out with no mishaps or spilt eggs. Over to Mark they go; a Kirin Sparrow, a handful of Turtle Doves, a Crow Snake, a handful of Planta Rays, and the tiniest Lionbird kit I’ve ever seen in my life. I think it’ll grow to be the size of a cat, maybe?
Anyway, after those mishaps, I’ve got a bowl full of raw eggs, no egg shell, and no more baby animals in the breakfast area.

You shouldn’t keep all of your eggs in one basket; and for me, keeping all my opened eggs in one bowl is asking for trouble. Bad things have happened to me with eggs before. I pour half my eggs into a redundancy bowl and set it aside.

To my work bowl, I add milk, sugar, and cold melted butter; all the wet ingredients. Then, I thoroughly whisk to combine them, creating a smooth slurry and fostering a nudging sense of- not worry. Concern. I’m concerned because the enemy hasn’t shown up for a while. It waits, like a snaggadile, to strike when I least expect it.

I take my egg mixture and add it to the dry ingredients; flour, salt, baking soda. Stir ten times exactly and tap the spoon on the bowl to get the excess off. Don’t worry about the lumps or the left over slurry; that will even itself out.

I double check the griddle, and make sure it’s on the burners evenly. Then, I light the flame and set them to cooking temperature. When the griddle is hot, I butter it, and pour a fourth of a cup of pancake batter onto the hot surface with a one-fourth measuring cup.

I take the spatula in hand and wait- a minute for one side, or until the edge is dry and the top is philomy; thirty seconds or less for the other, depending on how brown you want it. I listen to the sizzle, and then as the smell of frying bread wafts through the kitchen, I flip the pancake to the other side.

It’s perfectly browned.

My danger meter’s starting to jitter into the red, here. I take the pancake off the griddle, plate it, and take a careful glance over the kitchen. Nothing seems out of place; I haven’t knocked into anything accidentally, nor left my backup flour mixture or redundancy eggs too close to the edge. I keep making pancakes; they keep coming out perfectly. With every perfectly cooked disc of brown, steaming goodness that I produce, I can feel my own nervous tension ratchet higher; behind me, my siblings are fairly vibrating with terror.

...Time to make the coconut sauce. I take a small chisel, and a hammer, and a coconut, and then I set to- EEEEEK!

“AAAAAAGH GET IT OFF GET IT OFF GET IT OFF.”

“Okay, Okay, it’s okay, just hold still-”

“-ew ew ew ew ew ew ew-”

“-aw, it’s just a little clutch of coconewts Deb, they can’t hurt you-”

“- it’s slimy and gross Mark! No slimy lizards in the kitchen! Out! Out! Out!”

When I got a face full of coconewt, I accidentally flung my hammer. The hammer ricocheted through the kitchen, before finally crashing into the platter of perfect pancakes, knocking them all to the floor, and ricocheting away again. The dining vessels in the cupboard didn’t stop shaking for a good long minute after the hammer stopped spinning around it’s hook on the wall, where the final ricochet had bounced it.

After I regained my composure, I cleaned up the ruined pancakes, and tossed them and the remaining coconut husk into the slop and compost bins respectively.

Right about then, I smell the smoke. FUCK I FORGOT THE SUGAR FOR THE COCONUT SAUCE- shit, can I save it? Yes, Dulce de Leche, stir and add- water- skkkkksh! I got to it before there was open flames, but- the BREAD- Got it. Phew. Set the bread in it’s spot in the assembly line; keep stirring the pot. I’ll… I’ll do something with the caramel sauce I’ve just made, I’m sure. Take it off the heat anyway; it can be loosened up later, if I need it.

The coconewts were just a distraction so I’d burn the sugar; thankfully, I took a bunch of candy-making classes at the local culinary school, and so I saved the sugar.

I take a moment to mourn the loss of the pancakes; but, this battle is not over yet!

I still have the rest of the pancake batter, after all-

SkzsszzzzzzzzzzzzTTING!-chink-chink-chink.

So, there’s a lightbulb over the counter, under the cupboards; it helps to have area lighting while you work. Yeah, that lightbulb just broke, and glass got into the pancake batter. People can eat lumpy pancakes; people can eat burned pancakes; people cannot eat pancakes with glass in them.

The enemy got the pancakes.

But I am not yet defeated!

“DEKIRU YO!”

The air rings with my declaration of war. I clean up the pancake batter, rinse and wash and wipe down; replace the lightbulb; and recenter myself so I can try again.

The bread box door thumps as it falls open. It must have been loosened by the hammer.

I take a deep breath, grab my bread knife and the loaf within, and start slicing the day old loaf that’s left over into suitable French Toast sizes. The bread inside, so far, is completely undamaged; I assume being in the breadbox kept it safe from my presence.

Egg mixture- sweetened condensed milk, cream, cinnamon. Thrash the shit out of it; move the mixture over to the cooking side of the counter, then the bread because I remember what happened last time I tried to carry both at once and- Deep breath.

It is, at that point exactly, that Taffy bursts in screeching about ‘creepy feels!’ , before tripping over her own feet and falling. Banana, a very cute and very large ball python, is Taffy’s animal partner; Banana also usually rides on Taffy’s neck, head, and shoulder-joints where her wings connect to the rest of her body. When Taffy tripped, Banana went flying through the air, and crashed into my face.

This was problematic, as I had both hands full of a platter full of sliced semi-stale bread. I caught the snake; the platter, being made of wood, clattered on the floor without breaking. As for the bread… really, there’s only one thing that could have happened to it, but I can’t exactly tell for sure because Banana’s coiled around my head and it’s getting a little hard to breathe-

‘Banana! She’s not a tree! She can’t breathe!’

‘Sssssorry!’

AIR! SWEET, BLESSED AIR! I look over at Banana, who is now a yellow and white monkey-fist knot of snake, shivering in Taffy’s arms. I look at Taffy, who has blood leaking from her broken nose, and is rapidly gaining a pair of black eyes. I look down at my feet, where the wooden platter fell, and the crumbs- and then I step over to the pig slop bin, where the sliced bread flew… and fell.

First things first.

“Will Banana be okay?”

“Yis, she’ll be okay.”

“Will you be okay, Taffy?”

“Yis, I’ll be fine.”

“Good, good. Get out of the kitchen, then.”

“YIPE!”

And off she scurries. I pick up the platter, sweep up the crumbs and a few pieces of broken glass I missed earlier- I’ll have to mop, later- and observe my battlefield.

The bread was a serious loss. The enemy’s power grows stronger.

I am not discouraged, however- even though the loaf is gone, I still have one more option.

I can still make muffins.

As I begin to take out the muffin tin from my storage area, my siblings begin to whimper. It’s going to be fine, guys. I mean- I still have the rest of the original dry mix, which is a base for a whole realm of goods, and the redundancy bowl of eggs; there’s dried fruit, and nuts, and spices galore.

It’s going to be fine.

I’m lying to myself for the purposes of morale.

I will not surrender; my master will have an example of my baking this day.

I begin by rearranging my mis en plas; I chop up nuts, I lard the muffin-divots in the baking tins, I make sure I have clean, dry towels ready for taking them out when they’re done, a rack to rest them on... I quite like muffins; for one thing, they’re really delicious. They can be the older flatbread, or the newer quickbread, and can be any combination of flavors you deem delicious.

My homemade muffins are hard to classify as muffins. The word ‘muffinesque’ would be a stretch, even, but that’s the idea. There’s only one way to trick the enemy. If I don’t know I’m baking, then the enemy won’t either.

I set the oven to cooking temperature, leaving it to heat; half close my eyes, and begin to hum.

Through half closed eyes, the world looks different. The air is thick and golden, syrupy sweet; the light is warm where it touches. I know who I am; and I know what I want.

I take the bowl of what might be a flour mixture, and pour it into the bowl that’s probably eggs. I continue adding ingredients from my mis into the workbowl. When I feel like I’ve added everything I prepared, I take the spoon I set out and start to stir.

Just ten times; and then I open my eyes, tap the excess batter away, and nod once to myself. I take a spring-scoop and start portioning out the batter; two thirds of the way full, and no more. Nuts all the way through. A little smokey flavor from the paprika.

Do I know if these flavors will work together? No. However, it’s far too late to try again; I’ve got just enough time to bake these, plate them up, dress them nice, and serve- and then it’s tea time. I did manage to make just enough batter for all four of my muffin tins; and I did grease them appropriately. Into the sink goes the batter bowl; wash my hands clear of any remaining food bits. Dry my hands.

Last chance at baking, Deborah.

I open the oven, check the heat, and place the muffin tins in; I close the door, lock it, and set it to rotate. Convection ovens cook more evenly, after all. I set the timer, and now- the backup plans. Uh-first, I’m going to clean up my workspace, eesh, messy messy messy- there, done. Set the water to boil for the actual tea, while we wait. Tea set’s already laid out; just need the water to get that done.

Pre-prepared Cereal, when poured by someone desperate, counts as a homemade breakfast. I calmly walk over to the breakfast counter, and eye the boxes of cereal I got out earlier. I open the sugar-hells first, revealing nothing but little prize bags full of toys. Something must have gone wrong at the packaging center. I pour the little prizes out onto Sancho’s empty eating place, and watch his eyes widen in gleeful disbelief. Though this is a sally by the enemy with a joyful outcome, it is not a good one; my master cannot eat toys, as they are made of inedible safety glass, metal, wood, and various kinds of sealants and paints, not to mention being choking hazards.

The second box of fermented cereal is opened, revealing the secrets within. I frown mightily, before carefully examining the dried curls of wood inside the muslin inside this brightly printed cardboard box. I pour the little prizes out onto Cece’s empty eating place, and watch his eyes widen in gleeful disbelief. Though this is a sally by the enemy with a joyful outcome, it is not a good one; my master cannot eat toys, as they are made of inedible safety glass, metal, wood, and various kinds of sealants and paints, not to mention being choking hazards.

The enemy got the cereal.

I clean up the shavings and compost them, check the muslin- aha, Tiffany Harbor Lamp Company, so I guess there was another mixup at the packaging center. Cece accepts the bag, but her confusion, if anything, has grown stronger. With cereal out of the equation, I began to turn to the fruit I’d set aside earlier. Perhaps a delightful salad could be arranged-

And it was at this point in my kitchen warfare that the law of probabilities caught up with me. The Dulce de Leche, ignored until now, had been steadily heating up by proximity to the oven. This created a smell of intoxicating sweetness, potent and alluring- too alluring for the Foebeetles in Hildy’s care. Taffy, who was still calming the distraught Banana, had neglected to close the Galley door behind her; now, simple physics took over as the draught ferried the delectable scent of sugar to the lawn deck, where Hekate-chan and the Foebeetles abide.

The Foebeetles darted through the Galley door, buzzed through the Galley proper, and hurtled with unerring accuracy towards the unmonitored pot of Dulce. I turned and grabbed a small lid, as well as a wide flat plate. The fruit I had been examining in the fruit bowl was scattered across the counter. I skidded to a stop before the beetles made it to the dulce, took out the spoon along with a generous scoop, and put the lid on before they could get at the pot. I spread the sticky-sweet out on the plate, and carefully carried it over to where Hildy could observe her charges without getting in the way. I also gave them a nice bowl of water, so they didn’t bring harm to themselves.

The Wild Apples had bounced everywhere, one of them falling to the ground. I stepped on it. My momentum as I turned away from the delighted beetles and back to the stove combined with my now oddly angled boot caused me to flip forwards. The apple launched away from me and bounced off a cabinet. I- upside down and falling- crashed into the counter cabinets, thankfully without injuring more than my pride.

The impact with the cabinet had split the apple into a core and slices, the majority of which sailed through the air and landed in a lovely pattern in Sanji’s bowl. The core bounced off the edge of the counter, and smacked into my face. I closed one eye as apple juice started to sting at it, and then had to close the other as the sugary skin of a Zappy Banana hit me next. I could only hear the shrieks, yelps, and sizzle as the banana splits into slices and then tumbles with the sugar beets- which, as we all know, take twice as long to fall to the ground as any other root vegetable- and then, somehow, lands in the cereal bowl I had yet to take from Chef Sanji’s place setting.

I washed off my face, to a strange, ominous silence. I glanced over the content of the bowl in the salad- and, uh. Hmm. That actually looks surprisingly nice. Brightly colored, even pieces, smells good- I just have no idea what it’ll taste like. Nothing even splattered, which is… ominously surprising. In the silence of the kitchen, and to my siblings stunned horror, I let a wide, violent grin cross my face.

The enemy would be furious.

The enemy makes little distinction on what it attacks once I start baking; fruit, cereal, bread boxes—anything and everything is fair game once my inability to bake starts to happen, but the plate? The plate is different. That is a service plate. Once food is on the plate, it lays on sacred ground and is no longer part of the battle. At the very least, I managed to cook an interesting fruit salad. At the very least, Chef will be able to taste that, and say if I should make it a real recipe or never serve such again.

I looked through the glass window on the oven. The batter in the muffin tins had expanded greatly and turned a nice golden brown with a faint terracotta hint. The enemy must have given up once I had succeeded with the fruit. The timer dings— meaning, happily, it’s time to take everything out!
Cool, remove from tins, ice with Dulce, serve! Almost done, yes!

I take a dry kitchen towel, and pull open the oven door.

There was no sound- merely the sensation of ‘whomp’, and the thick smell of baked bread. My back was flat on the tiled floor; my head throbbed; my ears rung. All is darkness- no, wait, my eyes are closed. I open them to find a world much more upside down than normal, punctuated by the soft ‘pop!’ of something brown, trailing curling steam in it’s wake. I try to make sense of what happened, but my vision blurs and the world develops two distinct versions that slide in and out of each other, upside down as they are. Something smacks into the floor near my cheek. I wobble my eyes over to look at it full on, and see a crumbling muffin, still hot from the oven. I wobble back flat and watch as more muffins fly past every couple of seconds.

My senses slowly come back together.

The enemy.

It launched a final assault when I had let my guard down.

I roll onto my side and turn my gaze to the oven. The muffin tins within had turned into a swirling miasma of evil that reminded me in no small part of the time I tried to make pizza. Not quite as bad as that- there are no peppirana, after all, and no tormato to speak of- but still. Pretty bad.

A sound is coming from behind me- my siblings?- yelps and shrieks of shock and pain. I know what that is. It’s the sound of my siblings being faced with yet another baking mishap. I only have mere minutes to fix this, before someone really gets hurt.

“YOSH... DEKIRU YO!”

I roll over, bending my legs so I’m kneeling. My body doesn’t want to move, but I don’t care; I belly crawl out of the line of fire, and haul myself upright on the counter with the- the dry towels. I take one and let it drop open, and then turn to regard the howling monster within the oven.

The enemy is angry; it doesn’t like me to succeed. As I sway with every painful step, I advance on the snarling baked goods roaring from the oven, smacking ballistic death muffins out of the air as they fly at me. Again and again, I strike them down before they can hit me or my siblings.

My siblings are Mine to protect; Mine to defend! Mine to care for!

There’s not a damn thing the enemy can do about it!

I reach the oven, put my hand on the cool oven door, and begin to move it back to the closed position. The last remaining muffin- muffin-ish shaped lump of cooked batter, golden brown in color and smelling faintly of paprika- chose this exact moment to leap for me, screaming with fury. I snatch it out of the air with my towel-hand, shut the oven, and turn it off. I’ll clean it out once it’s cool. I calmly walk over to the dulce, and anoint my prize.

Then, I turn and walk in a reasonably steady and straight line to Chef Sanji.

The world is weaving in and out of focus, and everything smells faintly like blood and it sounds like I’ve got cushioning around my skull- but I walk anyway.
Finally, I set the sweet muffin on his plate. It’s still warm, even; and then, ha, I get a good look at some of the ones that went ballistic, and realize it’s more like an oddly shaped piece of omelette than anything belonging in the kingdom of bread.

Damn. Even though fruit salad and an omu-ffin would be satisfying by themselves, something else is needed- not for nutrition, but satisfaction. I wobble over to the breadbox to check... and there, in the back, a slightly corrugated heel of bread, still soft enough to be worth eating.

I take the last piece of bread, place it on the counter below the breakfast bar, and stare at it balefully.
After a few seconds, the bread catches fire. I blow it out.

Then, I put it onto Sanji’s plate, along with sidebars of butter, jam, and spread.

Today’s battle is won; but the war never ends.

Still, this time it was only a small mess, and an at-least mediocre spread of food. Could have been worse. Could have been like the pizza… Nngh-

“So… tell me about what you did for school before, Ellie.”

“...Well, once we got through pre-school and kindergarten, all of us were basically home-schooled.
Mom figured out that our mandatory educations were really based on a series of tests we’d have to pass to be considered ‘at our level’; but, well… she hated the way we were taught in school, so…
homeschooling.”

“What did you like about it?”
“...Um. I liked being taught to mastery, not just ‘good enough’. We weren’t pushed through the system; if we didn’t understand a subject, Mom encouraged us to work through it and then move on when we mastered it. I also liked the efficiency- it’s more efficient to move on if you understand a concept, rather than wait for everyone around you to catch up, and it’s more efficient to take three or four times as much time as everyone else so you can really understand what you’re doing. I liked being able to learn at my own pace, and I actually got through the first five years of science and mathemagics in about a year or so. All of us- even Sancho- actually had full secondary school diplomas about two or three year’s before our peers. I didn’t go to community college because nothing there interested me- but Cece did, and she actually did it before she graduated and got her first years worth of credits squared away.”

“What do you think is the best thing you learned from being homeschooled?”

“Time management. We’d get assignments, a deadline, and the understanding that we had to get it done by the deadline. All of my siblings- all the kids in our building, really, were homeschooled. We’d all finish school by lunch time, and then spend the rest of the day playing with each other outside until sunset, when our mothers would go to work; that’s when we would have dinner together, and go to our ‘culture’ classes, which was really just games at the arcade, cinema and theater, swim-parks... I think having self-motivation is better than any punishment or reward; I learned because I liked learning, and I wanted to learn. I did it quick and efficient because I wanted to have the rest of the day to play with my friends. I liked it because I got to have a say in what I learned, and when; I got to sleep in as much as I wanted, and pick the kind of learning style works best for me.”

“What kind of style is that?”

“Hands on, with lots of research when possible. I like doing a hands-on learning experience first, then research about what I did, and then go do it or something like it again, to see what I learn this time.”

“Hmm. Well, you’ll need good grounding in science and history, with a secondary in literature; so you can understand the action and context of what you’re seeing, and relate it clearly to others. I understand you’re the Alley Cat, notorious burglar?”

“...yeah.”

“Jewels and objets d’art, yes?”

“Mm. Art History?”

“Art history. A master’s degree at least, if you want to take your crew of ‘Mice’ into the field. As for the qualities you’ll need to have to be successful… you’ve already demonstrated, by dint of your success as the Alley Cat, that you have the ability to work well with others. You have investigative skills, as seen by your ability to find what you go and steal; you have critical-thinking skills, to ensure you can get through whatever tricks and traps separate you from your prize; and you have analytical skills. How often do you mistake a fake for a genuine piece?”

“It’s very rare, and usually only happens if I’m doing something spontaneous, or if my client has lied to me.”

“Mhm. Indeed, the only thing I can think of that you might not have is writing skills- archaeologists don’t spend all their time in the field. We can’t; we have to travel, rest, live our lives… There are journals and publications for archeologists, and one of the things you’ll be doing while learning under me is creating written pieces for these journals.”
I’m glad I’m havin’ this talk with my master, Robin, before we get too deep into our learning of each other. Even when m’sister Deb announces before the gods and everyone that’s she’s… baking… again, and I have a flashback to th-the. Pizza. I’m still glad to have Robin as my Master.

She knows how to calm people down when they have panic attacks, even, it’s grand. After that, she told me to take a look around and get familiar with the Library, as I’d be training in it most days.

I really like the Library on Sunny. It’s a surprisingly airy room, with these big archy beams like spokes on a wheel, keeping the curved ceiling up. The ceiling itself is mostly windows, with big shutter-things in rolls along the spine-beam at the top of the ceiling. Long old-brass chains hang down, with gambler’s green shades angling the light towards the floor- one, two, three four five six seven eight.

The lights come down just above the tops of the bookshelves, so every book in them is easy to see; and the bookshelves rise to the middle of the room, dividing it in half. There are about twenty books on every shelf, and eight shelves on the built-in cases, so that’s… a hundred and sixty per case, and there are eight cases so that’s… approximately one thousand two hundred eighty books on the built-in bookshelves. Well, it would be, except down at the very bottom there are these slidy-door things that keep light from getting in at the… I can only open some of them. Mostly they’re periodicals, microfiche boxes, um, there’s a portable record player and a bunch of audio books in all kinds of languages, and a really beautiful gramophone… oh, I see. The record player is for the ship-wide intercom system, but the gramophone is just for the room.

Master Robin says that the eight built-in shelves originally belonged to each member of the crew who had large amounts of books they needed to store. They still show the mark of their previous ownership… division? Well, there’s a case of mostly fish-books and cooking books and recipes; there’s a case of financial news, and the newspaper, and star charts and nautical stuff. There’s a case of romance novels and pulpy adventures and classics I had to read for school and classics I read for fun, and all the plays of “Billy” Shakespeare; there’s a case of poetry and berri-dreadfuls and knitting and crochet and fashion magazines; there’s a case of old almanacs, and issues of McSweeny’s Quarterly, Reader’s Digestive, Sygyzy and Susurrus, Argently Occult; there’s a case of books about plants, and animals, and cultures. There’s even a case about wood, and building, and chemistry. And there’s a whole case that’s just songbooks, and reviews, and musical history, and hand-written recordings of operas and musicals.

As for the storage cubbies, with their open-close slidy doors… it’s mostly things that didn’t really fit on the shelves, loose pages, loose photographs… I kinda want to look through them all, but, um, I guess… Later, maybe?

There are two double sided bookcases of eight shelves doubled across a thick vertical separating board; they make the room just a touch smaller, and they’ve got a weird top-thing with a little fence-thing that keeps potted plants from sliding around too much. When I dangle down and look carefully, I can see a multitude of thin rune-chains keeping the pots in place, and there’s a method to their watering and care. They’re nice houseplants; aloe vera, spider plant, blue kalanchoe, philodendron, ivy, and fern.

The double sided shelves usually have ladders clicked into their window-facing sides- that’s where they’re stored when not in use; and on the book-holding shelves are books I can Feel have magical meaning, er, they’re magic books- mathemagic, potions, wards, runes, that sort of thing. But… I can’t read their spines. It’s kind of… I feel like I could almost read some of them, if I focused a little on just reading that book only for a while, or knew just a bit more mathemagic; and some of them are so far beyond me I can only just see that they take a space on the shelves. There are two more bookshelves way in the back, next to the windows; those shelves are also full of magic books.

Unlike the double-features, these books are all ones I’ve read or heard of before; I can read most of the spines, or just puzzle them out. All the old standbys are there: Introductory Mathemagical Theory; Draughts, Potions, Poisons, and Poultices; all ten volumes of Magical Herbs and Fungi; Curses and Cures, a book I’ve only heard of; House Spells and Rituals, a book Mom used all the time before she got sick; Hijinx and Hexes, this appears to be an omnibus edition of the pamphlet thing they sell in most jokeshops; Folkways and Folktales, all fifty two volumes, B’ll be happy, she’s not read all of them yet after all… Raising Spirits and Rattlin’ Bones: a Beginner’s Guide to Necromancy; Organized Lightning, a beginner’s weather witching manual; there are a few books about how to knit, sew, weave, crochet, lace-make, macrame, tatt, and nalbind… There’s a book that’s really more of a hand-written journal by Usopp, with the words ‘Plants, Fungi, Animals, and Bugs of the Boinsea’ on the spine. There’s even a book about Spangle, that game Mab played in school…

Oh! And… eight thick, beaten up journals from… Mab did say she’s a fully accredited Mage; these are her notes, then. There are eight spokes in the Wheel; and eight schools of magic that draw power from the holidays. But- no, I counted wrong. There are eight journals that I recognize, but the ninth one… I can almost read the name, if I squint.

Abjuration, Conjuration, Divination, Enchantment, Evocation, Illusion, Necromancy, Transmutation; and the last one is… is…

If I squint and tilt my head- starts with a ‘U’…

“Abjuration, Conjuration, Divination, Enchantment, Evocation, Illusion, Necromancy, Transmutation, and U… Univffff- Universaa- Universal? Ow-!”

I snapped my mucus strand as I convulsed. When the pain of forcing a Magical understanding before was ready subsides, I can feel owies where my thrashing knocked into the shelves. They’re built right into the floor, after all, they aren’t furniture pieces.

I drag myself up and freeze carefully; my head throbs, and settles. Robin’s next to me, all concerned.

“What happened?”

“Um. I- I read the title of a magic book above my level. Ow.”

“Oh my- Ellie, you’re bleeding from the nose- no, don’t get up, I’m taking you to Chopper-”

And that’s how I spent the rest of the day in the Sanitary, being fretted over by Chopper. I got an ice pack and a long nap, which… I mean. I guess I needed it? I mean, I was in the bed with Beatrix, who cut the shit out of her hands and feet when Deborah told us she was- well, and so she was also on bedrest. I actually ended up in the same bed as her because neither of us had abdominal injuries, really, we were just slightly traumatized by our reactions to a massive trauma that happened a few years ago.

When the snarling and the screams and yelps started, Beatrix started shaking so I- I told her about the Library. To try and… I dunno, distract her?

“-you’ll have to do research um, there, and you’ll probably really like some of the fashion magazines, even when you were a thaumaturgist exclusively you always spent your pocket money on fashion magazines, a-and I think Genny’ll really get a kick out o-of, of all the… the magic books…” and, like always, I trailed off all quiet because… because i guess i’m just not interesting to listen to and… it’s fine, really. I know I’m not unlikable, and I don’t… I don’t have anything to really relate to my sisters or my brother with, beyond our bond of blood and fellowship.

I’m not like them; I never have been. If we’re a set of plates, I’m the odd one out- not because I’ve got a giant crack down my center, like Genny, but because… I’m. Boring.

I don’t know if it worked. My distraction, I mean; I don’t know if my babbling was enough to keep B from being swallowed alive by tormented memories.

I don’t know if I was good enough.

I never know if I’m- enough.

But… that doesn’t mean I can’t keep trying.

-I don’t ever know what to do to relate better to my sisters. They’ve all got so much potential, and all I can do is steal stuff. Like, even after I learn whatever Master Robin has to teach me, at best I’ll be able to tell people exactly what it is I’ve stolen, where it came from, and who stole it before me…

I’m not much more than a petty thief. That will have to be enough.

---

My full name is Marguerite Gloriosa Amaryllis Lefay.

When I was about eight or so, my father committed suicide by drinking a cup of milk and cyanide-almond milk, my father used to call it. He needed cyanide to electroplate metal with gold- said it was a safer method than the old way, with mercury.

My aunt and mother and grandmother wouldn’t let me read his suicide note. They said it was far too much for the feeble heart of a boy to bear.

My uncle, Orpheus, disagreed. He made a copy of the note, and he hid it away; and, before I left Amazon Lily, Elder Nyon gave it to me, as it had been left in her keeping when Uncle… well, my mom said he ran off to seek his death on the high seas, but considering what I’ve seen in the record stores, I think he became a famous musician. I- I should write him a letter...

I’ve been holding onto it, the letter Uncle wrote to me, for a year and a half. I’ve been- scared. It’s not a small letter- it’s actually a very thick envelope, yellowing with age.

Still, I can’t resist my curiosity- what did my father make of his life at the end? Did he live a worthwhile life?
I’m sitting at the kitchen table, way earlier than I'd have ever wanted to be- but I can’t. I can’t sleep. Bryony came in to check on me a little while ago; she's a good friend.

I take the butter knife, and I open the envelope.

It’s a massive letter, jam packed with pictures and notes and pressed flowers; and I… I start at the beginning. Where else do you start?

In my father’s suicide note, he writes “I have not lived a spectacular life; but, within my four dozen or so years, I’ve had more hours to pursue that which I chose than most people get in their lifetimes. I have been blessed with a loving wife, a beautiful son, and a family to care for- even a mother to abide by, though her station is so far above my own.”

Father’s suicide note is very long. It includes edited versions of famous essays I’ve read before, an apocalyptic manifesto, and a bit called ‘Boy, You’ll Be A Man, Soon’. But the last several pages are… heavy.

They describe the life of a man who, for the vast majority of his days, despite his yearning- never went further than a handful of kilometers from the spot he was born. He describes becoming a citizen of the World at a distance, from one tiny spot in the forest of Gorgoria, the name of our island. From that tiny spot whose very essence he wove into his own bones, he says, he found ways to embrace the World, in all its cruelty and ugliness and kindness and beauty, it’s most thrilling and challenging ideas.

My father was a Horologist- meaning, he was a person who made a life and career out of studying time, and time-pieces. He made and restored old clocks and astrolabes, and he was… “I have coaxed infirm and broken clocks back to mellifluous life,” he wrote. “Studied projective geometry and built astrolabes, sundials, taught myself ancient techniques of bronzing, patination, micro-machining, fire-gilding, horology; I learned to play harpsichord and dulcimer and dance the fan dances of my mother’s childhood; I read Poe, de Maupassant, Boccaccio, O’Connor, Welty, Hugo, Balzac, Kafka, Bataille, Gibran; I listened to Verdi, Vivaldi, Tchaikovsky, Beethoven, Mozart.”

“The very best times of my life,” father wrote on, “I realize were the times I spent in the forest and field. I’ve walked in ringing solitude, beside the babbling brooks and creeks of my forest; and I’ve wondered at the undulations, meanderings, and tiny detritus that were occasionally swept into its milling fingers.

“I’ve spent time in idleness and idolatry, with violets, fern, serpent, and bird. I have audited the discourse of the stones, shells, and sand; even when no cloud was present to cast a comforting shade. I have wandered astride the roiling shore in winter and summer in the company of my dearest companion, Frangipane; and I have spent hours entranced by the exquisite curiosity and vibrant joy that shines forth from my son, Marguerite’s, eyes- an entire exaltation of the World-that-is, within a tiny being I had some small part in making.

“I have also ran thrashing and cursing from red ants and black flies and bright yellow hornets.

“Before I could bring myself to commence this discourse, I spent a few hours out under the night sky, reacquainting myself with the constellations like old friends. Sometimes I just spent hours playing with my son. Sometimes I just spent hours playing my recordings. Sometimes I took my record players apart just to peek within and admire the engineering of their flawed entrails. Sometimes I read old books, or whittled spoons, or danced as I did when I was young. Sometimes I sat in the dark and listened to the creaking of the house. Sometimes I went out at night and listened to the uncaring crash of the sea.

“I have lived on this serpent-infested rock for about seventeen-thousand six-hundred days, and when I look about me and see the leaden dispiration that coats so many persons, young and old, ugly and beautiful, I know that if I die tonight, this very moment, my life has been inestimably better than that of most of my compatriots. Additionally, my absence makes room and leaves some resources for others who deserve no less than I have enjoyed. My hope, in leaving, is to provide no measurement for which my son need aspire to reach- I only want you to be yourself, Marguerite. I have always been proud of you; I will always love you.”

And then my father’s writing ends with, “I would hope that all persons reading this can enjoy some of the aspects of life that I have enjoyed, as well as those aspects that I never will; I pray you, take cognizance of the number of waking days thou hast remaining, and make use of them with prudence. To all that have loved me, and all I have loved; Jason Gloriosa Amaryllis Lefay, the Gilded Lily.”

And that was it. There wasn’t any more.

Eucharis, Gorgoria, came into being as a thriving iron mine in the late eight hundreds. Though the boom times wouldn’t last long, in the eight-nineties with the population on the rise, the citizens of Eucharis started taking advantage of each other- stealing from each other, murdering each other, burning each other’s houses down. It got so bad, a local newspaper called the country ‘Amazon Lily’, a place where only the wildest of flowers could hope to survive; and the name stuck. Amazon Lily, the place where our family began.

In eight-ninety one, one of the main perpetrators of this chaos and bloodshed, the most notorious gangster in the country, Jessie ‘No Relation’ Lefay, who extorted lots of land for herself and stole her neighbor’s jackfruit and cotton, and whose gang killed people who knew too much, was finally locked in jail- but then escaped and fled Gorgoria for good, signing over control of all her land in the county to her daughter, Amaryllis.

Years later, after building a palace in the most defensible position upon the family lands, and ruling the empire of Amazon Lily with an iron fist, Amaryllis took the deed to the house and the family lands and the crown of the empress and transferred ownership of it all to her daughter, Gloriosa. Years after that, in our more modern era, Gloriosa, pregnant and empress of the country, began a ritual of sitting in that palace and rubbing her stomach and pleading to the Gods, saying, please, gods, give me a genius. Gods, please, just make my child a genius.

On the fifteenth of March, thirty two years before my birth, Elder Nyon- Granma Gloriosa- had a golden-haired boy, and gave him a middle name after her mother, Amaryllis, and kept him home in the rolling lands and the old palace with three chimneys in the middle of the snake infested woods. She had gotten what she asked for, after all- and in those days, Beauty was a product of the mind.

My father was the most beautiful man of his generation.

My father was Jason Gloriosa Amaryllis Lefay.

I am Marguerite Gloriosa Amaryllis Lefay; the least-desired man of my generation.

Today, I turn twenty seven years of age. My girlfriend, Dracule Taffeta, is twenty years old; she loves me, and I her. I have a beloved snake-companion; her name is Marzipan.
For my birthday today, I’m going to have all my favorite things at teatime; we get to eat out on the lawn, and enjoy the return of the thick sunshine we’ve been missing all winter. We’re going to have raspberry caves, a kind of sweet biscuit; lemon meringue tarts; and onion, cheese, and ground pork knishes. It’s finally warming up- and I’m…

Happy. Contented.

I’m so happy to be alive.

I’m so happy to know that my father would be proud of me, even now, after- everything.

And I am so godsdammed happy I got off that snake-infested rock in the Northern Calm Belt.

“Well, as far as I can tell, you’re about twenty-eight to thirty weeks along- anything strange going… Nami? Are you alright?”

“Hm-? Oh, yeah, I’m fine. I’m just… getting really tired of being pregnant, that’s all.”

“Mm. I understand; just a bit longer. You’ve got another six weeks or so to go, possibly eight-”

“…is there anything I should watch for, when… um.”

“When it’s getting closer to time? Sure- right now, your pudge is right under your tits, aye?”

“Yeah, it’s basically a shelf-”

“So, when it’s time, the whole thing’s going to drop down closer to your hips. Bye-bye barrel chest; hello, pot-belly.”

“Oh!”

“Mhm. Another indicator is your fundal growth- have you been tracking it?”

“Every day, just like you asked; I seem to be within the average size for seven to eight months along, and my cravings and sensitivity haven’t gone down at all.”

“Hm. Well, unless you want me to check-”

“I do not-”

“Right. My best guess is you’re having twins, Nami. You noted that your pregnancy symptoms came about much earlier and more clearly than you had ever heard of, aye?”

“Aye-”

“You still experience extreme difficulty with eating outside your selected pregnancy menu?”

“Yes. I can… I can barely tolerate the smell of alcohol, now, and every time Luffy gets too close I feel like vomiting.”

“Hm. He smells like meat; you’re definitely pregnant.”
“Well, gee, Mab, I’d have never guessed that on my own. Ughh, I can’t believe how much I miss coffee and tea, even when they smell like bilgewater now...”

“Hmhmhmhm. I remember that; don’t worry. Breast tenderness has-?”

“Remained on the very tender side of normal; I’ve started wearing my sleeping bra exclusively, and that’s helped a lot.”

“Mm. Do you want more of them?”

“Please. Also- I have to pee so often now, it’s fucking crazy-”

“Hmhmhmhm. Don’t worry- that will pass after birth. Have you started taking naps?”

“...yeah. I just- I can’t get through the day without them, and, well...”

“Taffy is a good navigator.”

“Yes, she is; I just… wish it was me. Um- my heart’s been beating much more strongly when I’m at rest than normal, so Zoro’s had be doing cardio-strengthening exercises to help build up the muscle. It feels nice, actually, and the baby seems to enjoy it too. Um- I’m still moodier than I’ve ever been, and, um. Oh gods, I’m such a me-he-he-heeeeeeess-”

I hug Nami while she cries it out. We end her checkup without more upset; Nami’s fine, and healthy, and her baby- or babies, we won’t know for sure until they get here- are too.

I’ve been having strange cramps lately- almost like I’m extra gassy, somehow? Feels like period cramps, but I stopped spotting the other day… then again, I’ve never had a particularly regular cycle, so who knows.

Ugh, and I’m… really craving pickled fish roe, for some reason? It’s the texture and the smell I think I want, the taste is just… fishy spicy-pickle juice? Not all that outrageous…

Locally, the cheapest roe I can get before Imbolc is going to be ikura; and… knowing my appetite… hrrrm. Salmon.

Bleah, think about it later; wash face now. Oh, Sanji just rolled out of bed finally- I did use the suction-technique on his dick, so… I guess he finally pulled it together? One more rinse- oil up! And brush teeth.

Sanji quietly tromps behind me, yawning, and walks right into the toilet, not even bothering to close the door to take a piss. We’re married, for one; it’s just about four-forty five in the morning, for another, and no one except Bryony and Mark are awake at this hour for the clinch. Sanji flushes, and I hear the clack of the seat being put back down before he tromps back out to wash his hands and do his morning ablutions.

I go in to take my morning piss, and a thought occurs to me- hm.
“So, after breakfast I’m going to the fishmarket; do you want anything, or to come with me?”

“...Why are you going to the fishmarket, love?”

“I want spicy pickled ikura, and I know you don’t like eating it so I was going to make some for myself-”

“...Let’s go to the fishmarket then. I’ll leave dry cereal out for the crew.”

“What, now- we’re making a morning of it?”

“Yeah, now. Like… a low-key date. I’ll grab Deborah- are you bringing Beatrix?”

“Um- well, I suppose I might as well...”

Spontaneity! I wipe, flush, and go back out; Sanji is shaving, but moves over so I can wash my hands. Final thing to do- I take a wide-tooth comb and quickly go through my hair, pulling it out of it’s sleeping braids and giving it a light scruffle to make sure it doesn’t look too sleek and put together. Glasses on from where I left them on the sink- egads, these are filthy, wipe'em off; and finally, deodorant. I make it in little tubs with spoons so you scoop it out and rub it in; I take just enough for myself, then wait for Sanji to finish wiping his face clean to hand him the little spoon, which he takes.

Rub that in; brushed the teeth? Brushed the teeth. Perfume of…

“Sanji, which one?”

“All of them are nice- but I like Honey-Vanilla.”

“Okay.”

Perfume of Honey-Vanilla it is! Dab behind one ear; then the other; collarbones, nape of neck, quick swipe through hair, and done.

“Love you, Raspberry.”

“Love you too, Honeybee.”

And then I give my husband a smile good-morning, and a sweet, chaste kiss. He smiles back, and huffs a laugh when I pinch his sexy butt. My husband has a sexy butt.

“You’ve got a sexy butt, Raspberry.”

“Pfft-”
Then, I wander back into our room to get dressed. Ugh, I’m tired of bowing to winter’s whims, and by the flicking of my wings today promises to be rather lovely, so- a pair of tights. I blocked the pink in and dyed brown to match my skin; a one-piece leotard with fine net-toile neckline, just exactly the color of my own skin. Then a skirt, pastel lavender, pleated with a high waist and thicker waistband, and a beautiful cloth-ribbon bow pretty as you please in the front. Pastel lavender ballet shoes; a blue-toned pink-nude lip.

Another me shook Beatrix and Deborah awake; they scrunched up and glared blearily, but let themselves be chivvied into a quick wash off and then into clothing for the day. Beatrix has decided on coiffed her hair today, which looks damn good on her; and Deborah’s wearing her hair down in a long braid, which I suppose is a relief from the coils and pins she has to wear daily. Fernanda quietly appears just as we’re getting ready to go, in a loose tunic and denim jeans.

