Blind Man's Bluff

by ladyredms

Summary

Rochelle, Ellis, Coach, and Nick arrive AFTER the Vannah Hotel burns, and without the helicopter and graffiti to guide them they take a much different path on their search for rescue. The apocalypse brought them together, and it may just tear them apart again... or, to pieces.

Character development and plot-heavy, Blind Man's Bluff has a primary focus on the Nick/Ellis pairing while spanning the full breadth of an alternate campaign route.

Nicolas had absolutely no idea what to think. For a man more than used to scheming his way out of bad spots, freezing up was definitely a new sensation.

He could hear the strange, animalistic growls and snarls just a few inches away, so loud and close even the wet undertone of gnashing teeth could be picked out. He'd seen the woman's face before diving behind the car he was currently plastered against, and the image was burned into the backs of his eyelids.

It wasn't so much the blood that soaked the lower half of her face, crusted on her lips and dribbling down toward her neck, that disturbed him. It was the glowing and beadlike yellow eyes stuck wide open in wild rage. She hadn't seen him, somehow, but she was sniffing wetly at the air as if she could smell him.

It was a nightmare come to life, and Nick was almost panicked as he tried to come to terms with what was going on. He'd heard something on his car's radio about some flu or illness, sure - some hyperactive reporter rambling on under a headache-inducing static. He'd turned it off too soon, uninterested, and now very much regretted not paying attention.

Darting his gaze to the side, he glanced down the row of parking spaces in the convenience store lot, a few other cars scattered here and there. Poking out from behind a particularly dusty truck was the tail end of his dark silver Fiat Barchetta, pristine and silent where he'd left it.

This store had been the first thing he'd seen for miles. The highway was supremely quiet, something Nick had found incredibly relaxing. He'd rolled the top down, wind snapping at the few strands of hair that escaped his hair gel. Steering (not that the forest-entrenched road curved much) with his left hand while his right arm was tossed over the empty seat beside him, thumb rolling the singular ring on his middle finger… It had been perfect.

He groaned faintly under his breath, so quiet he thought it was imperceptible. Why the hell did I stop…?

Nick started to shift his hands to get himself into a running pose, intent on bolting for his car, when the sickly woman screamed a gargling howl at him from the other side of the car. Smell wasn't the only thing to give him away, and the scuff of his shoeheels alerted her.

With a grunt of slight surprise, he heard something crash into the car he was hidden behind - it even rocked a bit under the collision, jolting him forward before he'd planned. His dress shoes dug into the asphalt as he tried to catch his balance and steady his gait, twisting his head and glancing over his shoulder at the same time.

The woman was crawling over the car, head snapped up at a strange angle to stare directly at him with unnaturally lit eyes, teeth bared hungrily. She jerked her body up to try and get on top of the vehicle, legs kicking madly, and her knee crashed through the passenger window, spilling blood in immediate rivulets down her bare and dirty shin.
As far as Nick could tell, it didn't seem to be the pain that got her to react - it was the fact her leg got stuck, trapped there with glass impaled deep in her knee. She'd have to back off to pull her leg out, and her desperate, mad intent to get to Nick didn't allow her to do anything but try to go forward.

The woman slammed herself against the car, glass crunching loudly as it dug deep into her thigh. She was stuck, but wouldn't be for very long.

"Gun.. gun.. gun.. gun.." immediately became Nick's mantra, looking away from the gruesome sight, feeling a little rise of fear in his gut and forcing it into a blank sense of anger instead. He sprinted toward his Barchetta; a Magnum was just under his seat, hidden in an unassuming box with very blatant claims of containing condoms.

Magnum branded, to be precise.

It was much funnier to himself at less frantic moments.

He felt the uncomfortable screeching of his heels as he skidded to a stop, catching onto the side of his sports car with a slight grunt. He vaulted the back, wincing as he was forced to climb over the trunk, shoes definitely scuffing the metal.

(He couldn't help the thought from crossing his mind, even if he didn't let it slow him.)

Nick crammed himself between the leather seats, the shift pressing into his gut awkwardly, and shoved his head under the steering wheel. He swatted the box out into the floorboard and ripped the top open.

His Magnum came easily to the fingers of his right hand from where it lay inside, palm molding to the cool grip and thumb rolling to flick the safety off with a click. The gambler twisted around to sit up, aiming back over himself with a perfectly straight arm just as the woman came running at him.

She'd broken her knee, it seemed. Her gait was one-sided, blood covering her whole left leg, mixing in with the crusted dirt already caked onto oddly grey skin. She should have been crippled by the wound, but there was this feral determination in her attack that made her seem completely numb to any pain...

BANG.

His bullet hit her right in the neck, piercing through her spine with a bloody spray. The force of it on her unbalanced body sent her torso toppling backwards and her feet flinging up in front of her. He heard her land with a thud on the asphalt, and waited out the desperate gurgling and scratching, flopping smacks as she struggled.

Then, she fell silent. An acrid smell rose up, catching on the wind, harshly.

Nick realized he was panting then, chest heaving a little. His mouth was dry with cold adrenaline, pulse spiked to an uneasy pace. His anxiety irked him, and he swiped his gun-holding wrist over his mouth in a short motion to calm himself, other hand moving to open the car door beside him.

The gambler crawled out of the sports car, letting the Magnum drop to the seat as he did, getting up on his feet and smoothing palms over his crisp white suit and the blue shirt underneath. The act relaxed him a bit, although the fact that woman - thing was dead certainly helped on its own.

"Alright, bitch... if you so much as speckled blood on my Barchetta, I'll run you over so many times you'll be rabies paste.” He grumbled, lowly - but despite the words, his car's sleek, silver haunch wasn't the first thing he looked at.

It was that damn corpse and those still-open, ravenous, almost glowing yellow eyes. His nostrils flared a bit, forced to take in the nauseating scent in the air radiating from her. It was almost like decomposition... (not that he'd explain how he knew that) but not quite. More like sour meat.

Slipping his ringed hands into the pockets of his suit, he walked over to stand just beside the sprawled, bloody corpse, staring hard down at it with a severe crinkle between his eyebrows. He'd never seen anything like it, and he didn't even want to think about the possibilities. There were a lot and he didn't like any of them.

Something was seriously wrong, and Nick was pretty sure it wasn't a case of rabies.

He'd dealt with his fair share of crazy women, sure. In fact, plenty of them had leapt at him with that level of hostility, if not even more. Though, I usually solved the problem a little differently. He tried to smirk at his own weak attempt at humor and failed, stepping back from the dead ... creature. He hesitated to call it a 'woman,' although what it was besides that was beyond Nick.

Suddenly, figuring out what the shit was going on seemed a little more important than his initial plans for his trip into Savannah. Gambling the pants off inept tourists could wait... if there was some kind of disease going around, he sure as Hell wanted to know what it was.

Maybe his road trip hadn't been such a brilliant idea after all.

Nick strode back out of the convenience store with a pack of cigarettes between his fingers, in the act of popping it open and pulling one out. He forced out a sigh as he settled the stick between his lips, dangling it out one corner of his mouth.

He'd left money on the counter, despite the fact the store was oddly empty. He'd completely considered just taking the pack and running... but the security camera on the wall behind the register had a tiny red light that blinked with a rapid severity. He really couldn't afford getting caught robbing a store... so he left a few bucks by the register. No harm done, really.

Stepping around the corpse that still laid in an ever-growing puddle of dark blood on the asphalt, Nick walked over to get into his Barchetta's front seat. He sat a bit askew, legs spread, side relaxed against the arm of his seat. Pinching his fingertips over his cigarette, he keyed the car on and then used the car lighter to light his cigarette, closing eyes as he gave a muffled inhale and his car purred to a steady idle.

He could almost feel the nicotine creeping into his bloodstream, heart picking up just a little, a faint buzz entering his body that let him relax. It wasn't so much the actual act of killing the creature that had him unsettled, but more how it complicated his life. Suddenly he had to think about how he'd handle it: run away? Tell the truth? The convenience store may have had a camera on the parking lot, too, for all he knew, which would perfectly cement his story of self-defense... but the fact remained it was illegal for him to have a gun.

Just a few weeks ago, he'd been further west, trailing from casino to casino in a dizzy see-saw of wins and losses. It was a lazy business, really, though one that kept his wallet full enough to keep afloat. Over-confident and inexperienced marks lined up at the poker and blackjack tables, and he'd done fairly well for himself. It was in his blood, lining his veins with a sweet addiction.

Georgia had been his next stop, then down into Florida. Florida and its warm sunlight, the burning press of a beach chair against his back, the burn of liquor rattling past his teeth, the scantily clad women prancing around the sands... the chance to get one or two on his lap... Just thinking about it made him sigh, breath laced with smoke as his lips pulled into a small 'o.'

I should've gone there first. Passed up goddamn Savannah, Georgia.

Shaking his head quickly to disperse the self-chiding, the gambler let his lazed posture in his seat straighten up, catching his cigarette between the knuckles of his left hand and then punching the car radio on with his middle finger. If there was something on the news with any information about strangers going feral, or any indication of the supposed sickness going nuclear, he wanted to hear it.

He hadn't changed the channel; it'd likely be that same woman he'd heard earlier, chattering on incessantly. Her neurotic and over-excitable manner should've thoroughly turned him off.

Of course, I'd probably still fuck h-

Both his small, self-satisfied smirk and his train of thought broke off abruptly, staring at the radio with an expression of half-annoyance and half-confusion. It was silent, and that made no sense. Even if it wasn't the woman he'd heard before, or news at all, there should have been commercials or music. A radio station didn't simply go silent. Testingly, he nibbled his cigarette back between his lips, freeing his hand to turn the volume dial a little.

Maybe he'd jostled the volume in his flurry to get his gun... but, as he spun the dial, there was nothing.

More...

Still nothing.

Little more -

He hit the end, a small click announcing the dial's refusal to go any farther. Forcing a sigh through his nostrils that sent acrid smoke blustering from them, Nick sat for a quiet moment, listening to the now-audible, constant wall of static facing him. I must've gotten outta range. he reasoned, easily, although the static set his teeth on edge.

"Fuck the South." he grumbled quietly, throwing blame in a frustrated gesture to relax his nerves - and then nonchalantly rolled his fingertip over to hit the "SCAN" button on the radio, tightening his lips slowly over his cigarette.

The signal garbled for a moment as it ran through stations, hunting for a clear signal.

Then:

"-NSURE ALL OPENINGS HAVE BEEN SECURELY OBSTRUCTED."

Though the voice itself was monotone and calm, the radio screamed the words at him at him, so loud he nearly lost his cigarette in his lap trying to jolt and turn it off.

"SECURE T HE-ROOM WITH PLASTIC SH-"

He just barely managed to hit the off button on the radio with a strong smack of his palm against the controls, immediately going to rub at his ringing ears with the heel of his left hand. "Jesus Christ!" he complained in a groan, pawing the dial all the way down before he could make the same mistake again.

He hadn't really registered most of the words with how loud they were. It had sounded like some kind of public announcement, like weather and flood warnings... but this was different. He'd never heard the like before, and certainly not on a public radio station.

Moving to turn the radio back on after he felt his ears had been nursed enough, the gambler felt a little focused pinch start up between his brows, flicking the volume up just a few notches until the voice came back into focus. "... If you think you're infected, remain calm. Quaran--ti, ne yourself from the uninfected population immediately." His dark brows went up a little, startled, but before the voice could go on, he turned it back off. That answered his question well enough, and he didn't want to hear another word.

"Oh great. There is something going around... damnit..."

He'd just reached over to pick his Magnum back up from the passenger seat, preparing to stow it away with a frustrated sigh, when he noticed something.

Over the purr of his car, and the repeated echo of the radio going on his head, he picked out a distinct sound coming from behind him. It was like the far-off din of a football stadium, incoherent shouts drawn out into roars. He blinked, sharply, disoriented.

The gambler got his elbow braced on the back of his seat, pushing up on it so he could twist around and flicker his gaze over the pruned, road-side treeline the noises seemed to be coming from. They grew louder, fast, and his pulse rose as he noticed he could hear the crashing of something breaking its way through tree limbs and shrubs. A lot of something.

And then the horde broke through the treeline, scrambling in a screaming, blood-covered mass as they tripped over one another in their frantic fight to run at him. It was like floodgates had opened, and they came in a wave that tore through the forest. Their eyes bobbed in their loping, bright and blank yellow flashing in the sunlight, their skin greyed and washed out.

Nick panicked. He nearly bent his finger back in his desperate jerk to get the gearshift out of park. He barely even managed, finding his hands clumsy on the button - but his car rolled obediently into reverse, and he slammed his foot on the gas.

He turned too fast, hearing the tail-end of his Barchetta scrape the truck parked beside him, and it made the car wobble a bit before he could get it back under control. The gear shift fluidly rolled into drive under his palm. Green eyes moved frantically between the road ahead and the rear mirror, screeching out of the parking lot and making a dangerously skidding turn to get back on the highway.

There he floored it, the engine purring now that it was on the move. The gambler stared intently at the rear view mirror, knuckles going white on the steering wheel as he watched the crowd of what had to be twenty or thirty people, all covered in blood, leaves, and dirt, sprinting down the road after him.

What he didn't watch was the road.

He actually didn't see what did it. All he knew was something roared, this scream, that sounded both a little too human and a little too animalistic... and then his car was in the air, flipping to the side. Colors blurred in green and blue and grey, dizzying. Without a seatbelt, he felt his body start to lift, this surreal sensation of weightlessness.

Then the car hit the treeline and everything went black in a screaming chorus of bending metal and breaking glass.
Chapter 3

It took a long time before consciousness drifted in for more than a few seconds at a time.

Nick felt... movement. Heard things. Felt pain, cold, and warmth, in slow pulses. Half of it seemed a kind of dream-state, yet some too real to be imaginary - though it all blurred into one mess of memory and stimuli.

After some amount of time, he stirred - and when he did, he regretted it.

Pain was shooting up his neck in this constant pulse, and he tasted the metallic twang of blood in the back of his throat. Both worsened when he tried to move, and he was belatedly aware of the loud groan that escaped him.

The gambler laid still for a moment, eyes tightly shut, trying to get some grasp on how badly he'd hurt himself. The hurt seemed focused mostly on his head and neck - like he'd crashed it into something. Maybe his steering wheel.

As he slowly grew a little more aware of his surroundings and a little more used to the pain arching up his spine, he started to notice something ticklish plastered up against his chest, poking against his nose and twitching slightly with the breeze.

Forcing out a little breath, Nick peeled his eyes open with some hesitance. He realized it was grass. He was lying on his side just at the edge of the treeline. With slight bewilderment that he blamed on a clear head wound, the conman tried to work out how he wasn't in his car.. and more importantly, how the hell he wasn't dead.

What eventually hit him was that he hadn't had his seatbelt on. He must've been flung from the car, landing in the ditch and spared, at least, his car colliding with the-tree..

with the...
colliding...

"Oh you have got-" he barely managed, coughing it out under his breath as little twangs of pain sparked over his body for the effort. "-to be goddamn kidding me.."

Grunting mightily as he did, the gambler forced himself to move, body protesting loudly. He got an elbow under himself, shoving his weight against the ground to steady his movements and wobbling up to a sitting position.

He let a hand lift up and carefully probe at his head, trying to find a wound, as faintly glazed emerald eyes roved up to search out the crash. As much as he wasn't looking forward to the sight, it wasn't something he could avoid, either. The car was doubtlessly done for.

And it didn't exactly take long to spot, either.

His lovely Fiat Barchetta was wrapped around a tree like a wet noodle just a few feet past where he'd landed. Glass had been scattered around on the ground from the impact, the bumper and a sleek silver door both fallen off to lie in broken piles nearby. Grass and dirt splattered on the wreckage, scraped gouges in the earth from where the car had rebounded off it.

Nick stared at it helplessly, feeling a growing sense of useless anger and frustration overriding his pain. He'd crashed a car before - just as bad, but it had been on purpose and somebody else's car... His Barchetta was - well, it was just that. His.

Groaning again, this time in remorse, the man bent forward a bit, retracting his hand from the back of his head as he felt a sting of pain. Sure enough, his fingertips were red with a tacky layer of blood, although the flesh wound itself seemed pretty minor. He'd definitely had worse - it was the internal damage he was worried about.

Checking over his arms, torso, and then lower body, he was fairly confident that he'd escaped the crash the best he could have. There was a cut he belatedly noticed on his forehead, dribbling just a little bit, but it did little more than sting. His crisp suit now sported some dirt and grass-stains at its edges, a sight that made him wince, but there wasn't much he could do.

If he'd had time to seatbelt himself into the car, he'd be a pancake between his Barchetta and the tree trunk. He was generally pro-seatbelts, but this time, he was glad he'd forgone it… being flung from the car (and not through the windshield, either - he could've kissed the salesman who convinced him to upgrade to a convertible) was far preferable.

Replacing his hand on the wound at the back of his head, he pressed hard against it, letting his hand sit there as he shifted to stand up slowly.

One heavy-lidded eye shut, pain fluttering over his scalp and a slight sense of dizziness creeping over him, but he pushed through it, walking toward the wreckage as he glanced around him. He'd had head wounds before... better he keep moving than stay seated, as much as the ground called to him.

Far as he could tell, the roadway was silent and empty. In fact, staring around, Nick found himself wondering an instant if he hadn't imagined all the previous events.

Yet he could see the tiremarks on the road, clearly marking where he had, in fact, been run straight off the road sideways. They were almost perfectly parallel smears of black all the way to the edge of the asphalt.

He hadn't swerved… no, he'd been run off the road, like he'd been T-boned. There was no sign of another vehicle - it was like the hand of God himself had come down and bitch-slapped him off the road.

"Goddamnit, my car."

He settled his free hand on the Barchetta's ruined, twisted nose, the metal burning softly against his skin. The conman felt like taking a moment of silence for the thing sitting crippled on its side, an honest sensation of remorse twinging in his gut - but with a reluctant exhale, stepped back and squinted down the road.

He could see a sign, a few yards down the road, that had printed out in bold letters,

SAVANNAH - 3M

Alright. Not... that far. Sure, I'd rather drive it than walk it, but at least it's... doable. These shoes'll be hell by the time I get there, though... damnit. And what if I run into more... well.
He gave a minute shrug to himself in an attempt to dismiss the thought, deciding to avoid going anywhere near that line of thinking. The conman returned to the car's side, getting himself where he could reach into the interior of the totaled vehicle.

Nothing else to do but head to town. Fuck.

Feeling blindly under the driver's seat, he came up with his 'gun' box, it having been fortuitously protected by the seat that hid it. Balancing it against his hip so he could keep using one hand, he managed to open the box up and tug out the dark brown thigh-holster that he kept stowed in there as well.

He knew he'd need two hands to get it attached to him, but for the moment, he wanted to keep the pressure on his head wound a little longer. He felt it throbbing, although the pain was starting to lessen as he found other tasks to focus on.

Lifting the holster and letting the box just drop nonchalantly to the grass, Nick bit onto his holster's strap, holding it between bared teeth and growling irately to himself as he started to look around his plain brown wingtips.

Where the fuck did my gun fly off to? Hell if he was leaving his Magnum behind, particularly if there was some kind of madness going around. He tried very hard not to compare the eight - no, seven, counting the one he'd used at the gas station .. - bullets in the Magnum's chamber to how many of those things had come out of the trees.

Achingly getting down onto his knees, he reached to check the passenger side's floor with a pawing left hand, just in case it'd slipped down there.

Sure enough, he brushed his fingertips against cool steel, prying it free from where it'd gotten stuck under the seat's gears. "Gotcha!" he announced, muffled past the holster between his teeth. He checked it over momentarily, clicking the safety back on, then shoved it into the pocket of his plain brown wingtips.

The lessened traces of blood over his palm were comforting, glad to see it was clearly scabbing over quickly. Head wounds were notorious bleeders, and he didn't have any kind of time to deal with it.

He wiped what hadn't begun to dry off on the headrest of his ruined Barchetta's passenger seat and set to attaching his holster round his white-slacked thigh. Settling the Magnum comfortably into the sheath, the gambler took one last stock of himself.

He didn't have anything but his wallet, the pack of cigarettes he'd "purchased," and his Magnum. Sure, there was a small suitcase in his car's trunk, but firstly, he was moderately sure the trunk was crushed shut.. and secondly, he had enough winnings from his last stop left over in his wallet to make buying back what he needed in Savannah easier than carrying his luggage with him.

Sighing one final time, in this angered fashion, Nick tugged out his cigarette pack and slipped one out, nipping it between his lips. He set into a mildly paced stride, getting close to the side of the road to try and get off the grass, hoping to spare his suit any more trauma.

..and then he realized he didn't have a lighter.

"Tits!"
Chapter 4

It didn't take long for Nick to grow hot, and he found himself peeling off his suit jacket and slinging it over his shoulder, free hand slipped into the pocket of his slacks. He kept his eyes half-closed and his lips tightly sealed, following alongside the road with a determined pace.

Long, hot shower. he chanted to himself, like he had to convince himself not to give up walking.
Which, in fact, he did. Tall drink. Long, hot shower... tall drink. Just at the end of this road. Hot.. hot.. burning hot shower.

Curling his tongue against the roof of his mouth, the conman sighed wearily, looking down to inspect the damages so far to his clothes. He'd found a few glass shards trapped in the fabric of his suit when he'd taken it off, and watching them tinkle to the ground just made him mourn the loss of his Barchetta all over again.

"Maybe it was a bull. There are farms here, right?"

It was a joke. Definitely. The more he thought about his crash the more it bothered him.
Something had swiped his car off the road like it weighed nothing, and he didn't understand that.

Even more than that, he was bothered by the fact that the crowd that had chased him down the road had seemingly disappeared. If they were gone… great. If, however, they were somewhere nearby, he wasn't sure he could outrun them on foot. Seven bullets was not enough.

And that brought up a whole new line of thought.

*Say it's rabies... Bitten by raccoons or something. Shooting a rabid animal - no one'd blame you for that... but shooting a rabid person... even if there's a cure or something, that's still self-defense.
Right?* He couldn't afford police attention, particularly not on top of the fact he'd get jailed for having a gun at all.

Shaking his head, even though it made him slightly dizzy, the conman forced that line of thinking out of his mind. It wouldn't do any good until he got to town and found someone to explain the situation to, anyway.

Of course, then he started to wonder if he should really be going towards civilization if there was some kind of disease spreading...

He'd dump the gun and holster once he got to town, he decided, and avoid the police entirely. They always enjoyed pulling up his records, (petty theft, arson that didn't stick, auto theft, manslaughter, a wide array of arrests by various casinos.. a lot of which did stick), and while the most they could do when he was behaving was wave it around and glare threateningly...

He certainly wasn't reporting the attacks on him today. He didn't need that kind of attention. The gun hadn't been obtained legally, so it wasn't traceable to him, and he'd just have to hope everyone was too distracted to worry about some random corpse at an abandoned gas station.

Maybe he'd just grab a hotel room and check the news stations... Hope Georgia has something more than 'Farmer falls in love with livestock' on their news channels.

The thought made him outright smirk.
Those depthless green eyes opened with a blink, using his wrist to wipe over his forehead - cautiously avoiding the cut that had stung itself into silence by now - to dry some of the sweat he'd worked up, disliking the tacky, greasy sensation.

"Hot shower, hot shower, hot shower..." he reminded himself, this time aloud and with a vague sigh.

He'd just begun to slump uncomfortably, tipping up his stubble-dusted chin like he could hunt out a breeze to cool off, when something caught his ear from behind. The road had sloped to the right in a hard curve just a few minutes ago, and when he twisted around he could see nothing but trees and a few roadsigns... yet off in the distance, he heard the distinct, calm roar of a car engine.

Releasing a relieved sigh that just bordered on a moan, Nick halted where he stood, leaning to the side a bit and trying to get a look down the way. He pulled his coat from his shoulder with the other so he could drape it against his hip casually.

It dangled down perfectly to hide his strapped Magnum from sight, and with a subtle cock to his hip that exaggerated the exhaustion in his posture, he waited with what anyone else might have described as bated breath - but to him, was just the pooling and gathering of adrenaline.

Unnecessary, maybe... he had no intention of stealing the car. Hiding the gun was just to keep the driver from panicking. Still, under the current circumstances he was fairly nervous to come across other people, and adrenaline flooded his veins and made his pulse quicken.

The engine grew louder (a bit louder than he expected) and, sure enough, a musky red truck with monster wheels and an almost comically tiny, rust-splotched chassis came squealing around the turn. It was going far too fast even for the country highway, swerving a bit back and forth.

The sight immediately changed Nick's plans, and he reversed off the roadside at a quick backwards jog, not wanting anything to do with the rickety contraption or its pilot.

He noticed, with a prompt rise of agitation, that the driver apparently didn't even pay him any mind. There wasn't a pause or a jerk in the driving to give any indication he'd been so much as glanced at, the truck just blaring past him. He turned a bit to stare off after it, nostrils flaring, affronted.

Nick heard, in the moments after the truck passed, this obnoxious shout that set him to scowling. "HOOOOOOOOOOO-WHEE!"

It was the cherry-on-top of a shitty day. If it had been raining, he would've gotten splashed. He just knew it. Like a shitty Lifetime movie. The conman fumed in the instants after the truck had disappeared around a bend, unable to resist the urge to clench his fists a bit. "Asshole."

His rapt attention after the truck turned out to be well-timed. His eyes caught onto something, just a little bit of movement at the very tips of the road-side trees. Just beginning to poke up from the treeline, marring the rather gentle blue sky, was a few wisps of grey.

Nick found himself squinting slightly as it rose higher... and higher... and more started to join the first... and soon the horizon was speckled with columns of grey smoke, swirling with increasing enthusiasm as they started to turn black, rising up like the foaming head of a tidal wave.

Lifting his hand to the side of his head, he very slowly itched his pinky finger against his cheek.

There were fires in Savannah.
"At least I'll get a light." the conman managed under his breath, with absolutely not an inch of humor. Re-slinging his jacket over his shoulder, Nick moved into a half-jog, suddenly feeling a rather grim urgency as his free left hand settled just softly near the holster at his thigh.
The situation only got worse as he got closer.

Nick slowed his pace when he noticed a few dark shapes on the asphalt far ahead. They were bodies, sprawled this way and that on the roadway like macabre bowling pins. A strange, out of body sensation prickled his skin into goosebumps.

Damn. Did that truck just mow them down? He found himself wryly glad he'd moved well out of the way, but also a little sickened. It wasn't really squeamishness... he'd seen death, but not to this gruesome degree. He'd killed a man before, but it was mostly an accident and mostly clean.

This was... well, messy as hell.

As he came up on the corpses, he found himself hunting out their faces with his gaze, keeping his inhaled short to avoid smelling too much of the blood and... worse. He didn't want to think too hard about the various liquids coating them, and the asphalt.

Most of them were smashed to gruesome roadkill on the highway, but there were one or two whose heads he could still make out. Their mouths were still stuck in how they'd been upon death - bared teeth, wild snarls. Blood covered them from their deaths, sure, but there was a lot that was crusted on them, too... and then those eyes.

At least they're sick. Guess I can't blame the guy for running down these rabid freaks.

He fully blamed them for the loss of his car - and, even if it was some kind of illness, he didn't really feel that much sympathy. They're already dead either way... shit, and they're starting to smell, too.

Nick half-stepped on a thin metal pipe as he backed up, only sparing it a glance before he kicked it away. It was probably knocked off the truck.

He crinkled the bridge of his nose slightly, and, stepping deliberately around the whole mess, Nick made more than sure he didn't get anything on his shoes. He supposed, at least, the truck had cleared the way for him. He would barely have had enough bullets to defend himself against this group.

The city's gotta be safer than - .. and then the rising smoke regained his attention, and the thought withered. Maybe not. Pausing just an instant, it occurred to him.

Shit, what if there're even more down the road the truck missed? "If I run out of bullets, I'm fucked..." Turning his head slightly, tightening and easing his grip on his shoulder-slung jacket, the Northerner stared a moment in thought before he turned back entirely, striding to re-trace his steps.

He bent over, snatching up the pipe and weighing it in his hand, swinging the thing a few times. On the third test swing, he felt a stab of pain on the back of his head and grunted, reminding himself he was injured. The conman leaned a bit to one side, shoving the pipe under his belt. Fortunately, the tip was hooked, so it caught and stayed.

It wasn't really an optimal weapon, but it felt sturdy enough to do some damage to them.

Them?
What are 'they,' exactly? Sick? Sick people get better. That's not comforting.

Curling his tongue a bit, he found himself in a slightly more disturbed silence as he kept going, the pipe bouncing periodically against his thigh. Rabies was sounding more and more cheesy in his head. This was some grim shit for something contracted from a foaming raccoon...

Zombies? Aren't they supposed to rise from the grave, and shamble or some shit? That made him laugh, even if it came out as a little neurotic huff of air. He wanted to say it was ridiculous, but then again... 'ridiculous' was becoming a little meaningless.

Nick noticed a sign on the side of the road, half-hidden by branches. A few more strides, and he could read the whole thing. What made him uneasy wasn't the 'WELCOME TO SAVANNAH, THE HOSTESS CITY OF THE SOUTH' plastered gaily over the front... it was the hurried graffiti painted in the corner.

CED A EVAC IN THE VANNAH HOTEL!!

Evac?

Shifting his gaze further down the road and continuing on, he saw the road widen and the trees filter out. There were a few cars on either side of the road, a few of them crushed much like his had been, while others were just.. abandoned. There were more bodies here, some on the ground and some trapped in the cars.

There was a good number of them that weren't sick. He could tell instantly, as even dead their pallor was far pinker than the grey-white of the infected. Fortunately, none of them had been run over. They'd been mauled to death instead.

"That... actually isn't all that comforting." he noted to himself dryly in retrospect, suddenly pulling his Magnum from its holster and gripping it carefully, finger just brushing on the trigger. His stride turned into a slight strafe, one foot in front of the other, muscles tensing as adrenaline rose up to tighten his body.

The city started around him, buildings rising up on either side of the thinning road. Windows were broken and doors left hanging on their hinges, a few fires burning here and there, leaving the air around him with a heady weight. The cars were thicker here, though he noticed a path weaved through them, cars pushed to either side. There were even more corpses here, these all having those distinct yellow eyes Nick was really fast growing to hate.

That damn truck again... much as it pains me to say, thank God for it.

Reluctantly, he had to admit that really the smartest option would be to follow the thing's tracks - after all, it was the only sign of actual life he'd seen so far, and he had to admit the path the thing had woven for him was a bit impressive.

Then he heard a gunshot.

It was a heavy one, with a kickback to the sound that tipped him off it was probably a shotgun -and then it kept firing off, one after the other, a slight delay between each shot. On instinct, Nick dropped to a crouch beside a car, traversing forward through the trench almost made for him between the dead vehicles.

He subtly and slowly pulled his white suit jacket back on, not wanting to lose the thing if he had to run. His pulse was running like a motor, and his eyes darted around every few seconds.
Gunshots mean targets... and right now targets mean bloodthirsty freaks who could very well get me sick too. Greeeeeat. He hadn't considered that before then, and suddenly he wished he had a face mask. And some hand sanitizer...

The gunshots grew louder, and with them a voice - enthusiastic, loud, and so very Southern it hurt. It was so out of place for the situation Nick balked where he crouched.

"YEAH!" bang "Take that!" bang "WHOO!

"DIE DIE DIE!" bang "Hooo-wheee, that one lost his head! MAN I wish someone'd seen that!"

Oh great. Georgia's prime gunslinger, here to save the day. the conman mentally groused, leaning slightly to peek around the car he had his shoulder pressed to. As if this couldn't get any worse...

Nick saw the tail-end of the red truck he'd seen earlier right up against the side of a building - one side was crushed and a tire was gone, causing an almost comical height disparity that sagged it into a severe tilt. Glass, metal, and plastic was scattered around on the side street in its wake. Leaning slightly more, he finally caught sight of the aforementioned gunslinger.

The guy couldn't have been past his early 20s, balancing on the truckbed with his stance wide, hips planted against the back of the cab for support, and a heavy-looking shotgun cradled firmly in his arms. His yellow shirt was a little too tight, faded and dirty, both with blood and black grease Nick could only guess at. There was some kind of stamp on the front, but hell if Nick could make it out.

Blue overalls sagged on his legs, tied up goofily around his hips, the image was made worse by the thick steel-toed boots that kept him firmly planted on the ruined car. His sweat-drenched head was topped by a blue cap, pushed far to the back of his head and revealing all of his face, like he'd blindly swiped at his forehead and nearly knocked it off.

The Georgian was spinning this way and that at the waist, shooting off a blast to (and Nick only noticed this belatedly, rising up a few more inches) force off the yellow-eyed freaks that were trying their hardest to clamber up and get to him. They'd crawl up without the slightest hesitation, and just as they got themselves onto the truckbed rim, the kid would blast off a round right at them, pumping the gun to reload as fast as he could.

His hand darted furiously from the folds of his overalls to the ammo dock whenever there was a break, this constant flow of reloading suggesting both a familiarity with the weapon and that the man was well-stocked. Sparing a small glance to his Magnum and realizing he was goddamn lucky he hadn't used up his meager shots already, Nick forced a snort of derision under the continuing, though slowing, gunshots.

Leave it to the rednecks to have ammo stashes in their pants.

The conman shifted, trying to get both a little more comfortable in his crouch and a better view of the fight going on in front of him. It seemed the things couldn't get any ground on the guy, and they were weeding out fast, dead in piles around the truck. It was, he begrudgingly admitted again, an intimidating sight - maybe impressive, too, as Nick's view of the yellow-eyed freaks' death was starting to numb.

"Oh YEAH! You like that, yuh stupid zombies?! GET SOME!" The guy was absolutely hooting it, self-confident emphasis on all his vowels, breaking into a foot-to-foot victory dance as the count collapsed down to three.

Nick was just about to let his forehead fall onto the car in front of him, exasperated. He still couldn't really register what was happening.. like it was some joke, a twisted dream... when hearing that word from somebody else struck him a bit. Zombies?

No way. I was kidding-! Could they really be goddamn z-

Something crashed into him from behind, just barely forewarned by an all-too-familiar scream, the very sound speckled with blood and gnashing on the air. It was all he could do to keep from shouting when he felt a hand try to get a grip on his neck, nails scrabbling when his shoulder shot up and half-blocked it.

With barely any thought, the Northerner twisted his arm around awkwardly, trying to shoot the thing. The gunshot was too near to his head, and his eardrums screamed at him in protest.

He missed, much to his panic, and the hand got a better grip as a foul, squirming body achieved enough leverage to batter at his back with what felt like knees. Nails dug into his throat, making him choke with pain and give a growl.

Pain sparked. The thing dug in with animalistic intent - most people held their punches, even in a fight. There was no hesitance there. The nails sunk straight through his skin and made furrows as they slid toward his collarbone.

A little deafened, he barely heard a startled "Hey!" from across the road, nor did he notice the shotgun give one last bang and then fall silent. The conman tried again, and this time he heard the bullet connect, his neck freed and the body Flopping away from him with a wet squelch as it collided with the pavement.

Panting, more than he should've been, Nick twisted around to get his back against the car, quickly standing up and taking a step away from the corpse. He reached up to check his neck, patting at the wound and grimacing heavily when his hand came away with blood and some congealed mess of dirt and .. something.. foul, rubbed off from his assailant's fingers and grinded into the gouges at the base of his neck.

"Well, look what we have here!" Nick heard the voice, and the slow footsteps as the Georgian walked up to the other side of the car that separated them. "Ain't no zombie, are you? I mean, shit, if they're usin' guns, I ain't sure if I'll hang 'round here too long, after all!"

Nick uttered a bare "No..." in response, eyeing the bloody muck on fingers that were suddenly unsteady. If it's an illness, it's contagious... isn't it? Shit... The thought came with a flicker of fear. The other man must've caught that something was wrong, because he started to shift from foot to foot like an antsy horse. He lifted a hand to pull off his cap, scratching his head with it dangling between his curled fingers.

He spoke up again, first syllable awkward and the rest of it jumping into this simplistic, almost obliviously cheerful tone. "Uh.. Yer the first person I've seen so far. Real glad! I was startin' to wonder if there is any folk who ain't zombified yet! Spread real quick-like -"

Nick spun around like a shot, glaring rudely at the Georgian even as his left hand surreptitiously popped the collar of his white jacket, feeling it sting as it laid against the wound but a little more concerned about hiding the injury. Hell if some hick is going to shoot me because he thinks I'm going to turn into a zomb- Oh goddamnit, now I'm thinking it too!

The youthful man across the car shrunk a bit, brows rising slightly as he pulled his cap back onto his head, uncertain at the glare. Even so, it didn't take but an instant for him to speak up again, tone somehow managing a layer of friendliness with this good-natured affront. "Well, yuh don't gotta get mad, I was just-"
"Look, would you shut up?" Nick couldn't stop the cascade from leaving him, tone as furious as it was chilly. "I just got here, I wrecked my car, I need a shower, I need a smoke, people are apparently going goddamn rabid - some inbred Georgia peach guffawing in my ear is not what I want right now!"

The kid blinked easy-going blue eyes in this little motion of shock, lifting his gun up to cross it over his chest and hold it there. He didn't seem completely sure of how to react, like the man rather coldly reaming him out was just so much more disarming than the horde of wild humans he'd just shot down.

Like he just couldn't help it, the capped Georgian said with a hapless tone, ".. I crashed muh car too."

Nick stared at him severely, fingering the trigger of his mournfully under-stocked Magnum, making the motion very visible to the other man. It seemed to work, the younger man falling silent.. though Nick paused, waiting a few extra beats to make sure the guy really understood.

"... good." Nick let out a sigh, lifting a hand to pass his palm over his gelled hair. "Now I'm not particularly interested in being around you or anyone for too goddamn long, but this - " he raised up the Magnum, noting with a smirk how fast the kid looked toward it. "- is fast running out of bullets, and from what I just saw, I'm going to need a lot. That and we're both out transportation. So, if you can possibly keep from talking... I'd appreciate it if we could just stick together long enough to get the hell out of here. Think you can manage that, Overalls?"

And oh, how snidely Nick said it. He had to, mostly to finish his explanation with something that didn't sound like a loosely worded 'I need an escort.'

The other man seemed to take a little offense at the tone, shifting a bit and using his free hand to self-consciously pull his tied overalls a bit higher on his hips. It was far more offense than he'd shown at any other time in Nick's monologue. Which, honestly, just spoke to the guy's priorities. Unflatteringly.

"Well yeah, I reckon that's smart... I mean, we'll have tuh get you a better gun, but there's some shops 'round here... I don't got any problems groupin' up, yuh don't gotta be all grumpy 'bout it."

He almost instantly, and much to Nick's dismay, brightened, throwing his shotgun's shoulder-strap on and vaulting up on the car. He clambered over it, forcing Nick to retreat as the Georgian hopped down next to him. The guy yanked off his cap politely and stuck out his free hand to offer the conman a shake.

"Name's Ellis! Me'n'muh buddy Keith work at an auto shop hereabouts - well, before the zombies took over. Don't anymore, I guess... Oh, 'n we play in a -""}

After very deliberately looking over the grease and blood-covered hand offered out to him, Nick simply glanced up at the kid's goofy smile and interrupted him cuttingly, a line twitching its way between his brows. "You know where the Vannah hotel is, then?"

Ellis' smile didn't fade so much as it stuttered a bit before returning to its former blaze, shaking out his hand in the air self-consciously before he set to replacing his cap on his head. "Well yeah, uh'course. I was headin' there for the evac when muh car crashed. I don't mind killin' zombies none, but I ain't gonna see Keith'n my mom anytime soon if I stay here."

Resisting the heavy urge to sigh at the unwanted elaboration, although fast getting the sense he was going to have to survive that for a while yet, Nick gestured out his hands and turned slightly away from the kid. His shoulder raised up, feeling the sting of his clawed neck. His tone was a little too irked for the situation… at least in Ellis' opinion. "That's where we're headed, then."

The mechanic didn't move. Didn't even stop looking at him, under the bill of his cap, actually. Nick waited just a beat, then said rather coldly, "Do you need some motivation? I have bullets left in here." That, with an index finger tapped to his Magnum.

Ellis quickly lifted hands to wave off the conman, backing up a bit before he vaulted back over the car's nose. He did it even smoother than the first time, sliding over the hood and hopping to his feet on the other side. Nick took a more composed route, stepping down to the next car where there was an actual break between it and the next one he could slide through.

The mechanic waited for him obediently, saying pointedly once he'd stepped up, "Well, I ain't got yer name yet."

Ellis tried not to risk pissing the conman off again, and Nick couldn't help but feel a dry satisfaction as the other man quickly started off, leading the gambler down the road at a pace that was a touch faster than a walk but not quite a jog.

Knowing he couldn't really.. not give the kid something to call him, the conman simply shrugged his shoulder (but only his left one; he let the one on his injured right side stay still) and responded hollowly, "Nick."

The response was over-enthusiastic, like he'd been given one little foothold and had to pounce on it before he lost it: "Ohh, cool! That's a real smooth name! Slick." He misinterpreted Nick's silence, and clarified, "That's a good thing! You are kinda smooth-lookin' - like, that's a real fancy suit. Nobody wears nothin' like that down here outside of Sunday. Though you got some .. zombie on it… I mean, I bet it'll come out, ain't nothin', just.. sayin'. I heard, uh, white vinegar was good fer stains..."

He laughed, suddenly, and Nick could do little but stare forward in blank bewilderment as the kid just.. kept.. going. "I got a story 'bout that, check this out.. My buddy Keith got some ketchup on his shirt once, so he was gonna try that, 'cept he went into the wrong pantry 'n what he thought was white vinegar was actually -"

"I. Will. Shoot. You."
Chapter 6

The two men trudged down the street in spotty silence. Ellis was like a puppy who didn't understand that 'no' meant 'don't do that at all' - he just thought it meant 'don't do that right now.'

Every few minutes the mechanic would tense up, those youthfully brawny shoulders rising a bit as he shifted the shotgun in his hands. It usually started with a "Hey," or a "Y'know," and he didn't get much further before Nick interrupted him with a simple, flat "No." or a dark stare.

Ellis never seemed really upset at it. He just continued on with vague sighs and shakes of his head, a hand rising to adjust his cap like he was bemused by the other man. Nick was set closer and closer to the edge of either shooting the guy or just turning around and walking the other direction, hoping he didn't notice.

The only thing that kept him from tipping over was the fact that every few blocks, a zombie or two would come rushing out from an alleyway or around a car. Blood dribbled from their lips and eyes like an absolute nightmare, their limbs clawing at the air as they shrieked out strange snarls.

Sure enough, the mechanic would snap up his shotgun, blasting off a shot once the thing was close enough. Both he and the zombie jerked a bit with the strength of it, the latter falling to the ground with a splatter of blackened blood.

Ellis would look back over his shoulder, flashing a lopsided smile at Nick like he expected some kind of compliment.

Like hell.

A snidely lifted brow was more than enough to dissuade the younger man, although Nick could tell each time there was more and more confusion in his reaction. It was naive people like him that just got under the conman's skin - that countryside ideal that just being human made you friends.

He vastly preferred the city, where nobody so much as made eye contact with strangers.

Proving him right almost instantly, Ellis prompted up yet another conversation, tossing up a dirty, nicked hand in this vague gesture. "Hey, this once, -"

"You actually shut up?"

Nick was torn between smirking and actually cracking a laugh when Ellis finally turned around, stopping in the middle of the road to face him. His grease and dirt-smudged expression was drawn in this look of confusion, a little bit of a pout actually twitching at his mouth. His little break was borderline hilarious.

The gambler hadn't really been trying to get a rise from him, but it was a welcome pleasure.

"You don't like me much, do yuh? I dunno why, I ain't done nothin'!"

Nick crossed an arm over his chest, the other one still dangling at his side with his Magnum tight between fingers. He had settled for a smirk, and it stayed solidly at his lips even as he noticed another zombie bolting out into the street from a broken alleyway. He calmly raised up his pistol, the nozzle placed just before Ellis' shoulder. The Magnum went off with a heavy BANG, catching the zombie right in the chin and splitting his lower jaw with a gruesome pop.
The mechanic didn't even have time to react before the gun went off, just jumping in shock and clamping his wrist over his ringing ear after it had finished. "That shit was right in muh ear! That hurt!" he complained, twisting around at about the same time as he said it. Seeing the zombie Nick had shot at, the hick gave a little "Whoop!" noise, apparently completely forgetting his consternation in favor of running over and leaning to look at the zombie's blown head.

"Shiiiit, Nick! You got damn good aim! Say, you do a lot of shootin'?

Nick sighed just faintly, although he found the topic far more tolerable than anything else the other man had tried to talk about. The conman moved to catch up and then pass Ellis, absently smacking out the Magnum's magazine to morosely inspect the four bullets he had left.

Worth it.

"I don't go out every morning shooting ducks out of the sky and bottles off the fence, no, but I took something called lessons." Sending a small glance over his shoulder, expression fairly impassive, he made sure Ellis hadn't lagged behind too much and palmed the mag back into place.

The mechanic apparently didn't catch the two-pronged insult, because he jogged up beside Nick with a goofy grin spreading across his face. "How'sabout we start up a game?"

The conman narrowed eyes and twitched his brows as they hit an intersection (the lights of which were out, he noted) and Ellis gestured to the left road, getting a few steps ahead to lead the way. Nick rather dangerously prompted him with a "Game?", awaiting an explanation.

Ellis' grin stayed solidly on his face, gesturing with the nose of his shotgun. "Yeah! We can keep count'uh how many zombies we kill, see who's better!" He seemed to realize the flaw in his plan, tapping his thumb against his weapon. "Once we getchya more ammo, anyhow."

At the same instant Nick felt disbelief at the idea of Ellis actually making a game out of the situation, he felt the slightest inclination to... agree to it.

No reason not to make the guy look stupid.

The conman was just starting to mull over the pros and cons of humoring him, when both their heads snapped up to the sudden sound of gunfire in the distance. Nick's eyes widened just a bit, then narrowed, and he tugged the metal pipe free from the makeshift holster he'd made out of his belt. His Magnum was shoved back into its sheath at his thigh, aware of its encroaching uselessness. He needed to save the remaining bullets.

Swinging the pipe a little, Nick made certain of his grip, utterly ignoring the Georgian beside him. He was not looking forward to having to use the damn thing, but gunfire meant zombies... hopefully whoever was fighting them would keep them distracted enough for him and Ellis to slip past -

"Lordy, you think they're in trouble? Shit, man, we gotta find 'em!"

Cue the dumbass.

Ellis had this blatant look of concern on his face, smacking up a hand on top of his cap to screw it down a bit on his head, like he was preparing a charge. When he moved to bolt away, intent on chasing down the gunfire, Nick snapped after him, "Hey, Overalls! You want to go running around town, be my guest, but I'm not here to play Superman! There's an evac waiting for me, and I'll go without you if I -"
The kid wasn't paying him an ounce of attention, darting forward with his gun grasped tight against his chest, head swiveling to pin down the direction of the noise. Nick scowled a bit, taking a half-step forward and raising his voice.

"Hey, kid! I'm saying, I don't have time for this shit and I'm going to go with or without- " He realized quick his words weren't getting him anywhere. "Oh, goddamnit!"

Despite his claims to the contrary, he was noticeably not interested in losing his guide or the gun the Georgian was carrying. Whether he liked it or not, (mostly not), he was bound to the whims of his newfound acquaintance. Nick was forced to race after him, suit jacket flapping a bit at his sides with the wind.

Survival was a little more important than his pride.

A little.

Nick struggled to keep up with the mechanic as they raced down the street, the fires and disorder on the sides of the road getting worse as they got deeper into town. It wasn't even that Ellis was fast - although he was, doggedly darting along the road and dodging cars like an expert, overalls bobbing at his waist and one hand keeping his cap tight to his head - but mostly that the kid was just sprinting through without a thought.

His flurry attracted more than a few zombies from the sidewalks and broken-down buildings. They raced out like mosquitoes on a hot day, snarling viciously after Ellis in a trickling group. They were so focused on the younger man Nick almost thought they wouldn't even turn to attack him, just running almost in front of him. Still, there wasn't exactly another option.

Without stopping, he hefted the pipe in his hands and aimed a hard swing right to one's head. Its skull cracked back with a loud gargle, the thing wobbling back and forth on shaky legs before collapsing, left behind on the street.

The conman gave a huffed 'heh', finding the sight more entertaining than he should have, and turning to the other side to do the same to the zombie on his left. The hooked end of his pipe connected with the thing's neck this time.

Even though he didn't feel he'd swung that hard, the creature's neck snapped back with enough force that he heard the crackle of its vertebrae dislocating from one another. He almost expected its head to come clear off.

That zombie gave a much louder gargle than the first, and apparently, Ellis finally took notice of the things behind him. Before Nick even registered the mechanic had spun around, he heard a hoot of, "Nick, duck!"

With the distinct knowledge that Ellis had a fairly large shotgun in his hands, and the feeling he understood what the kid was going to do, Nick wasn't inclined to take the time to argue. Quickly dropping to a low crouch, he jammed his wrists against his ears in preparation, scowling a bit.

Barely a breath later, three loud shots flew right over him in quick succession. The cha-chunk of his pump-action reloading was the only thing to separate each blast, and with each one, blood tinted black and dark green splattered onto the back of his jacket as Ellis shot down the zombies left between them.

"Damnit, you hick! I'm ruining this suit enough without you helping!" Nick snapped as he swiped something wet and chunky off the back of his neck. Ellis' boots trotted into his view, followed promptly by a hand, palm up, stretched down to him in offer.

Nick couldn't help but survey the calloused fingertips, the muck buried under the nails, the black practically ground into his skin in little splotches… and grimace.

"Come off yer high horse," was Ellis' response, this oddly cheerful brand of chastisement, almost playful. "Least it ain't your blood."

Nick lifted his head at that, giving Ellis a very distinct stare of annoyance before reaching up to roughly smack aside the proffered hand. The conman stood up on his own, shoving his pipe back into his belt. He grabbed the collar of his suit and shook it a bit, like he was covered in dust rather than blood. Ellis took a half-step back, swinging his shotgun up to balance on his shoulder and eyeing Nick with a bemused look.

"Yeah, and if you'd aimed a few inches lower it could've been, you idiot. Try watching where you're going instead of running past them like a complete dumbass. How aren't you dead?"

Of course, he was actually thinking How are you doing better than I am so far?, but he didn't say that.

Ellis snorted a bit with a laugh, although it sounded distracted, pulling his shotgun back off his shoulder and smacking it a bit in his palm like that was a good enough answer. Nick didn't pay any mind to his sudden quiet and slightly focused attention on the conman, not until the kid spoke up.

"Got a nick there, Nick? Happen jus' now?"

Ellis was pointing, right at Nick's neck. The gambler had almost forgotten the wound he'd gotten on the crook of his shoulder, previously covered. He'd accidentally flashed it as he'd adjusted his suit.

Popping his collar up quickly but casually, he waved Ellis' hand away, responding with a cool and snide tone. "Real observant. Good job. One jumped me earlier, and I have you to thank for distracting me. You want to play Sherlock? How about you try noticing that our friend stopped shooting?"

Ellis propped his mouth open to respond, but Nick's snappy, sudden change of topics distracted him enough to succeed in shutting him up. Turning around with a slight pinch to his expression, Ellis listened a moment before nodding in rather serious agreement.

"Sure did... yuh think they're okay? Not shootin' means one of two things." The hick pulled his cap off, scratching his scalp with his wrist slowly. Nick heard it. Faint but not imperceptible, this fear… concern in the guy's voice. Ellis just looked around - roved his gaze over the street, perked onto the toes of those workboots like some over-attentive prairie dog.

It wasn't that Nick took pity on him. More, Nick merely recognized the fact that he wasn't going to drag the kid away without a fight. The faster we check this out, the faster we get to the Vannah. He sighed.

The conman's exhale snapped Ellis out of it, but before the younger man could really react he felt a hand shove his shoulder. It quite nearly knocked him over, stumbling to both catch his balance and keep from losing his grip on his hat.

"Move it, assclown." Nick said rather sardonically, pulling the pipe free from his belt and swinging it with a rolling wrist like it were a cane. "They'll either be well and dead or well and gone if you keep standing here."

Ellis turned to glance over his shoulder, flashing a lopsided grin as he snapped his mechanic's cap back onto his head. It was a look that gave Nick the distinct sense he was being made fun of - though why was beyond him.

Rather than interrogate him on the point, though, Nick simply followed after as the kid walked down the road at a quick pace. He noticed Ellis was paying much more attention to his surroundings now.

So he does learn.

They were coming up on a four way stoplight, bodies littering it heavily. It may have been the most corpses Nick had seen in one place so far. The lights themselves had been dragged down when a car crashed into one of the poles - a car which was, in fact, still there, flipped and plastered onto the sidewalk. The vehicle was absolutely flattened, just a few pieces of chassis still struggling to hold up shape.

The two men slowed as they came into the middle of the intersection, Ellis looking down at the heavy piles of (thank God, zombified, although Nick found the curdled and ill smell plenty revolting) bodies and prodding them here and there with the muzzle of his shotgun.

"Bullets. Look kinda fresh, don't they?" Nick wasn't really listening, crossing the intersection with one hand slipped into his suit pocket. He eyed the crashed car - or what was left of it, smashed and wrapped in the sparking remnants of the stoplight wires. This car is crushed to shit... like my Barchetta, I think, only... even worse.

"They were here, fer sure... you think they're still close? Shit, there's a lotta these zombies. Wonder how many - I mean, guess there's however many folks lived here, at least… Some people had tuh survive, though, right?"

There was an arm sticking out from the window, twisted at such an angle it was obviously broken at the elbow - and wherever else. Nick's nose crinkled, just the bridge of it, and he refocused on the rest of the car.

"Kinda scary, though. Liked it better when I was thinkin' zombies were only already dead folks."

Nick screwed his brows up just a bit, reaching to touch a fingertip to the car's... hood, maybe. He couldn't tell up from down on the thing. *I know I didn't just flip off the road earlier - something... hit me off, knocked me off. Practically flew o"OWfuck!"

He snapped his finger back, grumbling very lowly under his breath and shaking his hand. His fingertips were practically singed by the metal.

"Had to be hot... of course."

Ellis suddenly just showed up at his elbow, standing there, shotgun sat across his shoulders and behind his neck like a barbell with wrists dangled over either end. "Only crashed a bit ago, then. Ain't like this whole zombie mess has been goin' on that long. 'Course, you didn't have tuh burn yer finger figurin' that out."

A few things went through the conman’s head. One: he hadn't heard a thing the kid had said before then. Two: he was very tempted to beat the shit out the kid. Three: there were very unsettling implications of what the mechanic said.

"Only a bit ago, you said?" Nick half-trailed, glancing focused, rather narrowed eyes at the car.

"Yeah, sure... engine's gotta cool off after the car turns off. Plus it's in the shade… but it ain't cooled off, so it must'uv been in the sun a real short time ago. Man, this one time, my buddy Keith sat on the hood of his car 'cause we didn't have chairs - campin', y'know, up in - wait, where're you goin'? Nick?"

But the conman was already on his feet and moving, pulse far faster than he would've preferred. He halted, just on the crosswalk to the leftmost road, dress shoes placed with subconscious caution to not brush against any of the bodies sprawled around... staring with growing discomfort down the street.

"Hey, dumbshit, you seeing this?" Nick muttered, lifting his hand up to gesture down the road.
Cars were tossed this way and that - flipped like vulnerable turtles, half-squashed and crushed in on themselves. When the conman let his green eyes trail up, he sucked in a short inhale, this little shocked noise.

Ellis saw it at the same instant, halting just beside Nick and leaning in to gawk.

"Oh…mah…gaawd, there's CARS in the BUILDIN'S!"

They were barely dangling from where they'd broken in, vehicles thrown into the faces of streetside buildings, jamming straight through brick and windows. There were holes and breaks in other places that suggested the cars lying broken on the street had been, at least, thrown in the same way, even if they rebounded and fell to the ground.

Nick's brows were screwed up into a tight knot, faint wrinkles around his eyes drawn a little deeper as he tried to work out what he was looking at. There was this ringing in his ears... a hum that wouldn't quit - and belatedly he realized it was the kid standing beside him, talking.

"...just like Godzilla or somethin'! Ohhh, MAN I wish Keith could see this! How'd they even get up there!? Jeeesus... I've seen twisters do shit like this! We get them here sometimes, y'know! ... I mean, this wasn't one.. ain't stormed. But-

_Goddamnit this kid cannot shut UP... five seconds, PLEASE..._ the gambler found himself rather desperately thinking, turning on his heel and taking a step forward to stare back across the intersection.

Whether Ellis did shut up or Nick just managed to drown him out could've gone either way - but for an instant, Nick just felt deaf. His heartbeat was thudding in his ears, skin prickling with sweat like he'd started a fever. He vaguely heard his name and ignored it. The whole other side of the road, it was all the same. Cars tossed like toys, odd breaks in the buildings - even in the asphalt. _Like... fuck if I want to quote, but.. like a tornado ran through, really is. What the hell did this?

Forcing his head to shake and lifting up a hand to wipe over his forehead, Nick muttered a quick, "Screw this..." and then raised his voice.

"Okay, Overalls, you're going to shut up and listen - you're finding me ammo, like you said, and then you're taking me to the Vannah Hotel. Like you said. I am done with this goose-chase and there's something running around tossing cars... Forgive me if I lack your stupid optimism, but we are going to die here - and I am NOT dying here - so we are leaving. Now. Got it, Farmer Joe?"

Silence. Not a peep. Not even a half-chuckled noise of vague confusion at Nick's irritation.

Twisting around, Nick realized he was utterly alone in the street.
Turning this way and that, hand shooting up to flatten onto his forehead, the conman hunted for any sign of where Ellis had gone.

"Overalls! You damn son of a bitch, where the hell did you go?" he hissed, fighting the urge to yell. He got both hands on the pipe in his fingers, squeezing at it in frustration. His gaze darted around the intersection, trying to spot the dirty yellows and blues of the hick's outfit. "W- I don't have goddamn time for this. What are you doing?"

Taking a step back, like it might give him a better view, Nick clamped clean, neat teeth onto his lower lip and held silent just an instant. Nothing... not a sound.. and then a loud, hacking cough and a short gurgle. He'd heard gurgles, from dying zombies shot in the neck, sure... but this one was different. It was a pained, struggling noise, that of a man being choked. And he swore it sounded like Ellis.

Snapping up his head toward the source of the noise, he noticed that the doorway to the building directly lined up with the crosswalk was wide open. Inside, it was almost pitch black, but he saw enough to see the butt of a shotgun lying in the threshold.

The weapon was just protruding into the light streaming in from the outdoors that made a severe square on the floor, but reflected no further. The windows were blocked with thick curtains, keeping any sunlight from entering the building. He couldn't see anything.

Hefting his pipe with a tightly set jaw, the conman darted toward it before he could think enough to reconsider, sprinting through the doorway. He skidded to a slight crouch, snatching up the shotgun and ditching his pipe in a quick switch.

There was a moment - just an instant there... where his hand clenched on the shotgun's grip and he shot the smallest look down. He could tell by the weight of it that it was fully loaded - Ellis had kept it like that, feeding it constantly. The forethought was impressive. It was probably an 8-shot capacity.

Four bullets in his Magnum, eight in the shotgun, and a pipe. Would that be enough? He could probably find his way to the gunstore… but what if he didn't?

He weighed his options. Leaving the kid crossed his mind. He wished he could say that guilt or morality played a big part in his decision. Maybe a better man wouldn't have even paused to begin with; Nick mainly decided that he didn't want to risk his neck alone with barely more bullets than he had fingers.

Then he was moving forward, blinking rapidly to try and acclimate to the darkness inside the building. The air was heavy and putrid, almost like cigarettes except... rotten. He stayed a little low, hunched, one hand out to feel for any furniture in his way while the other tucked itself tightly against the shotgun's trigger, bracing the butt against his shoulder to make up for the weight of the front.

Nick could hear this shuffling, struggling noise, punctuated by the desperate stamp of a boot against wood and another hacking cough. The cough didn't sound like Ellis, either. It was wet. Spongy almost, with a wheedling breath on either end. The darkness and emptiness - and the conman's beating heart - fuzzed its direction, disorienting his perception of the room.
His fingers brushed onto the fabric of a couch as he turned and started to drive in toward where he swore it came from, and he worked his way around it, hissing a short "Overalls! I can't see for shit, keep making noise! Come on you stupid hick, where are you?!"

But it wasn't more stamping that the kid managed; sudden light flashed on in an off-yellow funnel, spasming wildly and blinding Nick for an instant. The moment he got his bearings, he realized it was a flashlight.

Ellis managed to point the thing up, messily illuminating both himself and what had him. There was a thick, fleshy tendril wrapped around him from head to toe. It squirmed, constricting his mouth, throat, torso, knees... he'd just barely gotten enough of his forearm and hand free to get the flashlight on.

There was this obvious look of panic on his face, bright red and almost purpling, and his eyes were struggling not to roll up to the back of his head.

Holy fucking shit.

Nick had his shotgun up and aimed, ready to shoot even before he actually made to confirm what the corners of his eyes suggested - there was something tall just behind Ellis, and Nick saw the bubbling, contorted image of a face mutated into something unnatural, just before he jolted forward and pulled the trigger.

Something exploded, a sound rather like a burst balloon, and Nick had to shield his face against a heavy breeze of that same putrid air he'd smelled in the whole house. He'd practically lived in dive bars and gambling halls, yet he couldn't stop himself from breaking into thick coughs, hacking painfully and throwing his forearm against his mouth.

It reeked, and inhaling made his chest clench as if his lungs were trying to expel the gas on their own.

"M- Moron.." He broke off to cough again, spitting hard off to the side and dropping down as low as he could to try and get out of the smoke. It was just clear enough that he could open his eyes, and though the flashlight had fallen and was only barely pointing at him, Nick could tell Ellis had crumpled down to the floor and wasn't moving.

Middle of being strangled and he had enough sense to remember he had a flashlight AND managed to get it out... okay, fine. Not the dumbest moron I've ever met... My luck, he's dead.

Crawling forward on knees and elbows, the conman pulled up close to the Ellis' side, snatching up the flashlight and flickering it over the unconscious mechanic's form. He dropped the shotgun, freeing his hand so he could unwind the tendril still wrapped (though, he noticed, loosely) around Ellis’ head.

It was thick and fleshy, and as he pulled at it, it twitched and squirmed. He gagged and coughed in the same breath, and it was all he could do to keep himself from vomiting. That, and looking past Ellis to examine the strange, elongated body collapsed behind him.

The fuck is this thing…?

He passed a quick finger close to the Georgian's mouth, feeling the brush of hot breath from his nostrils, relieved to note he was alive. Alive but not awake, and they didn't have time to sit there and wait for him to drift back to consciousness...

Even less than he thought, in fact. Just as he'd dug fingers into Ellis' shirt and pulled him up just a little, shaking him firmly in the hope of rousing him, he heard it from outside - screaming, although not of fear or pain. It was, very distinctly, the scream and shriek of zombies. And there was a lot of them.

Nick was getting too familiar with that noise.

He twisted around, shining the flashlight over the living room they were in. There was a door in the corner, squat and thin, just below a staircase in the corner that lead up to a top floor. Looks like a storage closet.

Nick set the flashlight down quickly, leaving the funnel of light pointed over at the door so he could see.

Grabbing hold of Ellis' wrists, he turned around and heaved hard, yanking the younger man onto his back like a heavy pack. He strained a little against the dead weight, pulling Ellis' arms tighter around his neck and struggling up to his feet.

He wasn't heavy, but he was completely dead weight and Nick wasn't feeling at the top of his game. He grunted loudly, fighting across the room. Ellis' elbow was digging into his neck, and the clawmarks on the conman's neck stung until his eyes screwed up. "Nearly.. dead.. and.. still.. causing.. me.. problems.. you.. dipshit.."

Tossing his weight into the wall just beside the door, Nick trapped Ellis' left half against it and let go of that wrist. He forced the door open and spun with a groan, dropping Ellis to the floor just inside. He collapsed into a pile on his rump, thudding against a cardboard box and nearly crushing it as his arms went akimbo and his head lolled back.

With the weight gone, Nick bolted back across the room, grabbing both the flashlight and shotgun with a slight stumble. He got back to the storage closet just as the first zombie flung itself through the doorway, screaming in heightened rage as it saw him. Nick shoved the flashlight onto a shelf just against the wall, pointing out into the main room.

The conman dropped to a knee, thrusting the shotgun up and downing the zombie with a strong hit to the chest. It fell - but there were more racing in behind it, and Nick heard breaking glass. Flashes of light shot into the room as zombies thrust themselves through the windows, too, fingers tearing at the curtains that had previously covered them.

Nick shot straight through the doorway, bullet spraying through a good number of zombies at once, then pumped the next round in and twisted to the side to do the same toward the group struggling through the curtains. He heard them shrieking and gurgling - in anger, not pain.

Tipping onto his rear and pushing back with the heels of his shoes, Nick felt himself bump against the mechanic. He fought a growl as he realized with a flicker of frustration that he'd pushed himself between the sprawled mechanic's thighs. However, as he tried to pull the pump and reload only to find it locked in place, indicating it was out of shells - he realized the position was actually fortuitous.

More zombies crawled over their fallen compatriots, and came running toward the closet. Shit-!

Nick shoved his foot up, catching the edge of the closet door and kicking hard to slam it shut. He left the flat of his shoe braced on the door, keeping it shut when bodies slammed against the other side. Panting in his hurry, Nick dropped the muzzle of the shotgun to rest on his knee and reached back a hand, digging into the folds and pockets of Ellis' overalls.
The door slammed against his foot, jolting a startled noise out of him before he bit it down with a growl. The flashlight sent odd shadows scattering as a sliver of the door fell inward, grungy fingers digging through the gap. Blood dribbled down from the tiny break, and the infected got louder.

Ellis' overalls were just baggy enough to frustrate Nick's attempts to find his pockets, grabbing at the thick fabric until he found an opening. In a less desperate situation, he might've had some concern for where his blind groping would put his hand.

Come on, come ON, where the hell are they... I saw you grab them, they were... somewhere...

Then - "Jackpot." His fingertips found the cool shapes of some shells, and Nick grabbed a handful and dragged them out. He twisted the shotgun up and managed to load it in the dim lighting, each shell clicking like a little chime of success.

He blinked past sweat, emerald eyes murky with a mist of something unreadable. It was definitely not fear. The door - and, thus, his leg - was shivering with collisions, and when he glanced up the hole broke open, splitting wood in a rain of splinters.

An arm came through, the owner snarling with its success. Before it could get a grip on anything, Nick let off a shot, sacrificing a good bit of the door to force the zombies back. Not that it lasted, as the next layer was immediately on the door, and they had more room to crawl into the closet that time.

Nick had to pull his legs from the door to avoid getting clawed at, going almost crosslegged, pumping the shotgun and shooting them back again.

He heard a faint groan from behind him as Ellis stirred, this bedraggled noise that he tuned out. Not exactly his top priority - though Nick noticed the horde seemed a little thinner the next time they flung themselves at the door.

Getting into a rhythm with the shotgun, he reminded himself to keep a count of his shells. He'd only loaded 6 before the zombies broke in, which put him at 4 -

BAM, cha-chunk

*Okay, 3 -

The zombies kept coming.

Nick darted back his hand to dig for more bullets. Realizing he was unable to shoot at all without a free hand to pump the forend, all Nick could do was re-adjust and kick hard at the zombies just reaching through the wide hole in the door. His heel smashed down on a forearm, the flesh giving way underneath his force.

"Guhhh.. whut?.."

It took Nick just an instant to realize it was Ellis, his voice cracked and wheezing from his near-strangulation, struggling toward consciousness. Not exactly wanting the kid to process that his hand was burrowed into his pants pocket, Nick dug some shells free and just dropped them onto his own lap, Nick quickly shot off one of the bullets he still had, earning a long enough reprieve to load a few bullets in.
"...whus .. uhhg.. whus 'appen'n..?" the mechanic managed, wracked with a very audibly painful cough and trying to shift out of his uncomfortable sprawl, only to find his attempt at adjustment blocked by .. well, Nick. "Gr- ahgk.. grabbed me... thing grabbed me…"

"Shut it, and hold still!" the conman snapped, leaning in to aim a little more precisely, scanning cautiously to see - a smirk overtaking him at the knowledge - there was only a few zombies left.

And they, lining themselves up by running toward the single door, went down with one precise shot to their upper bodies... and then there was silence, just the faint little bubbles of half-gurgles as the zombies struggled and died, and heavy panting as Nick tried to cool down.

"Chrissakes, they're persistent bastards.." the gambler managed, wiping his wrist over his forehead and giving a short smirk of self-satisfaction.

Blowing out a long breath, Nick tossed the shotgun to the side and picked the unused bullets from his lap. He shifted forward onto his knees and turned around to offer them back, finally eyeing the mechanic in the light now streaming into the house from broken windows.

He'd gotten his elbows up, braced a little on the box he was leaned against, odd marks on the skin of his cheeks and neck where the tendrils had nearly squeezed the life out of him. Ellis' neck, particularly, was blemished with bruises and red marks, and his frame heaved a bit with the effort he put into breathing.

His cap was off, lost somewhere in the living room during the struggle, and his bright blue eyes were quite visible in their confusion, uncomprehendingly glancing from the offered fist to the rest of Nick, kneeling in the space between his sprawled legs.

He was confused, and the longer the silence lingered, the closer the atmosphere edged toward awkward.

Yeah, okay. This looks weird.

Nick twitched a brow once as he lifted his fisted hand and just opened it over the hick's head. "Get up, dumbshit. I just saved your ass." His handful of bullets rattled down over Ellis and startled him into yelping, the sound a bit pitiful with how fiercely it rattled.

"Whuh -" He coughed, lifting up a hand to both push a bullet off the top of his head and touch his neck. "Whuh's s'at for!" He honestly looked a little hurt, although with a second glance, Nick decided that might've been physical and not emotional.

Sighing in cool frustration and setting the shotgun against the wall, Nick forced himself to stand up, turning around and reaching down to get ahold of Ellis' sleeves and drag the mechanic to his feet. Nick talked - a low tone, though still snide somehow. "Come on, Overalls, we have to go. I'm getting the feeling there might be more on the way, and I do not like our odds... that, and we're sure as hell going to miss that goddamn evac at this rate."

The moment Nick let go, Ellis staggered - so, like he were helping a drunk man down the street, the gambler pulled one of the mechanic's arms over his shoulders and held onto his forearm. Ellis slumped, weakly dangling his body as Nick scooped up the shotgun and tucked it under his armpit.

"'M fine... jus'.. gotta.. catch muh.. breath." the hick protested, tone utterly unconvincing, shaking his head and seizing up a little like he might vomit.

Nick warned: "If you get sick, I will drop you."
But nothing came of it, just a little gasp and grunt, and Nick forced the mechanic into movement - though not before grabbing the flashlight he'd nearly left on the shelf, their footsteps out of sync and staggered. "Catch your breath on the move, Overalls, it's your fault we're here at all."

They stumbled suddenly when Ellis halted, digging in his heels, and Nick snapped, "C'mon, I'm not carrying you."

"M-muh hat! I ain't l-" Two coughs, slow, although softer than they'd been - and then he finished it, firmly. "I ain't leavin' it!"

Giving a frustrated noise, Nick tossed the kid right to the ground, ignoring his pained groan as he landed in a little mess on the floor, barely catching himself in time to avoid hitting his head. The mechanic glanced at him in a wounded fashion, only to see Nick stride over toward where Ellis had been choking.

He flickered the flashlight around to hunt out the cap. It gave him a chance to get a better look at the creature that had nearly strangled Ellis to death. It was human - mostly, limbs strangely long and its countenance bloated by what seemed like fleshy tumors.

The shotgun blast had split its head mostly apart, but one glassy yellow eye glinted in the flashlight's beam and seemed to glare at him. The tendril hung from the ruined maw where a mouth used to be, already going leathery and wrinkled after death.

Nick's anger may have been fueled by a desire to distract himself when he growled: "Just my luck, I get stuck with the single biggest idiot in Georgia. Because this shit wasn't bad enough to begin with."

He heard a faint cough, one that wheedled into a laugh, and then there was a very polite "Thank yuh." that didn't take Nick seriously in the slightest.
Nick noticed Ellis was oddly quiet as they stepped back out onto the street, the latter still leaning a good amount on the conman. His breathing was fast recovering, even the short break of Nick having to hunt his cap down doing the kid good... but Nick resigned to hold him up a little longer, gripping Ellis' shirt just at his waist while Ellis had him by the shoulder.

The Northerner gave in to an inexplicable urge to start up a conversation - Oh God, he's contagious... - as they crossed the intersection again, stepping lightly over the sparking streetlight wires.

"Lucky you didn't break a rib or two, Overalls. I'd have had to shoot'cha."

Maybe it was just the slight discomfort over their proximity that made him want to talk. He was honestly tempted to let Ellis hobble along on his own, but he'd already condemned himself to keeping the kid with him - and it was maybe, possibly, his fault for not getting to the guy sooner.

Not that he'd say that outright.

In for a penny, in for a stupid Georgia redneck. Or something like that.

Nick smirked a bit, just slightly, glancing up at the sight of movement down the road. He wrangled the shotgun into his grip without releasing Ellis, yanking it up a bit to get it braced on the crook of his shoulder, and gunning down a stray zombie who came snarling at them across the broken street.

The kickback of the shot sent little pangs through Nick's wounded neck, the scratches throbbing angrily at him. He ignored it, shuffling his hand down the barrel and bracing the gunstock against his hip to pump back the forend and keep the gun at the ready - snapping a short, grumbled curse when it came up empty again.

"That's horses, Nick.. I ain't a horse... 'n it's their legs, anyway." Ellis clumsily dug out a few shotgun shells from his overalls' pocket, offering them up to the conman. "Runnin' low..." When Nick gave only a faint eye-roll in response, releasing Ellis' shirt in favor of loading the shotgun up as they walked, the mechanic prodded him further.

"Yuh heard me say thanks earlier, right?"

Nick snorted, clicking in the last shell and stowing the others in his slacks pocket with a careful lick of his lips. "Yeah, which thing-I-saved-your-stupid-ass-from was that for, anyway? The tongue zombie or the horde of zombies?" Lifting his head, Nick squinted, halting a moment and feeling Ellis stop with him.

The mechanic lifted up his hand, pulling his cap lower on his head, the grungy bill shadowing the top of his face. "Both, man, fer real... I -"

Nick instantly waved him to silence, shrugging the younger man's arm off his shoulders. Ellis cooperated, and was only a little unsteady as he got his footing and stood on his own. Nick tipped a glance at him, slightly irritated, even though he'd been the one to start them talking again. "Thank me by shutting up... how far is the hotel?"

Ellis winced a bit as he patted at his neck and chest in self-sympathy, looking up toward the tops of the buildings around them, squinting past the morbid decorations of cars protruding from their windows.

"Aaaahhh..."

The sound of blank thought was just about to earn Ellis a good punch. Nick was really not interested in getting lost - but the mechanic saved himself with a brightening of his expression and this lengthy pawing gesture of his hand off in the distance. "Couple'uv roads down from this shop here. Iffin we cut through them alleys we could get there real quick - whatcha think?"

Nick hesitated an instant, eyeing the shadowed spaces between the buildings in the direction Ellis pointed. They twisted off, shrouded by the roofs above.. he could pick out the vague shapes of trash cans, bins, piles of boxes...

Something flashed yellow, just a blink, like the momentary gaze of a bright eye, and Nick had Ellis by the elbow, tossing him a bit down the road. "Like hell. Muggers, sure. Murderers, sure. Zombies? Fuck no. That is one goddamn thing I am not going into a dark alleyway with."

The kid laughed, quiet under his breath. Nick let it slip, mostly because the noise was honest humor rather than mocking. Considering the alley set him far more on edge than he'd let on, the fact that Ellis took it as a joke was fine with him.

Picking up the pace and forcing Ellis to match him, the two men darted down the road, pausing only to shoot down stray zombies and reload the shotgun. The conman kept seeing it - flashes of yellow in the alleys they passed, little blinks. He kept quiet about it rather than alerting Ellis, just keeping an eye out... but within the next three alleys it stopped happening.

Nick could tell they were, in fact, getting tighter and tighter on ammo by the way Ellis was slower and slower to fish them out of his pocket.

They wheeled around a street corner at Ellis' command, forced to stop and press up against the wall when they quite nearly ran straight into a group of zombies. Nick noticed, with some discomfort, how they'd just been sitting there. They were leaned up against the nearby building and hunched over their knees, heads in their hands. For an instant he thought they were alive...

That moment of hesitance was more than enough for them to notice the two, and Ellis dragged him back just a step with a grip on his bicep so they didn't get too close before Nick got the gun up and aimed. The closeness let Nick's shotgun blasts go straight into their faces, and they exploded into so many chunks. The last thing he saw of their expressions was that rage.

Neither men were quick to start walking again after the zombies were downed, but neither spoke up either. Both of them were thinking about the same thing; how very lost and … human those zombies had seemed for a moment there.

The hick broke the spell with his usual chatty tone, though he seemed to have dropped telling his stories since that tongue zombie got him.

"Ey Nick, these here houses might have a gun or two in 'em. 'Specialy what with this bein' a zombie apocalypse 'n all that, ain't like anyone'd miss 'em - we could just take a look -"

Just this once, the mechanic shut up on his own, perking up slightly as Nick did the same. They both heard it at the same time, interrupting the hick's thought. A heavy takka takka takka of gunfire sparked into life down the road, so close Nick reflexively half-ducked like it might be aimed at them.

"So he ain't dead!" Ellis hooted, missing Nick's reaction entirely and swiping his cap off to grin.
Sure enough, there were a small number of zombies peeling out from houses and alleys to sprint toward a side road in pursuit of the noise. "C'mon, Nick! I thought we lost 'em, but they're even closer now!"

Before the conman even got his mouth open to respond, the shotgun was suddenly gone from his hands and Ellis was off, running full-speed after the trickled flow of hunting zombies. Nick twitched his empty fingers just an instant, then bolted after him with a frustrated, "Don't wait or anything!"

The gambler grumbled sarcastically to himself as they skidded around a street corner, regretting leaving his pipe behind as he heard the gunfire stop - again. "And I thought nearly dying would've mellowed you out a little.. what are you, five? I wasn't prepared for goddamn babysitting."

Ellis didn't react.

Just a few blocks down the next road, the zombies had gathered around the front of a small bar. The windows were already broken in, but there seemed to have been a makeshift blockade made of furniture to seal them up. The door was mostly broken, ripped apart like Nick had seen happen before his very eyes, but something big had been shoved against that, too.

The zombies were beating at the blocking furniture, snarling wildly and cutting their own hands on the shattering wood. They weren't getting much done, but they'd get through eventually… if only by virtue of their persistence. Ellis was quick to start bolting toward them, intent on rushing the group thoughtlessly.

Nick snatched the back of Ellis' shirt, yanking him to a slightly yelped stop like a dog reaching the end of its leash. His collar slammed into the front of his bruised neck, the yelp turning pained. The mechanic instantly whipped his head around, shaking off the gambler's grip but looking at him expectantly.

And, honestly, not really as annoyed as Nick expected. It would apparently take much more effort to piss him off.

"I try not to run straight at buildings with armed people in them. Yeah?" Nick held out his hand, palm up, curling fingers in demand of the shotgun. The mechanic had a little bit of a dubious quirk to his brows, but he handed it over, glancing back at the shuttered bar.

"What for? They wouldn't shoot us - we ain't zombies."

Nick smirked a little, moving across the road to get on the same side as the bar. He dropped down to a kneeling position, though he didn't actually let his knee touch the ground, and set the shotgun tight to his shoulder. Gripping it tight and putting his slightly stubbled cheek as close as he could without touching it, the conman took careful aim at the zombies that still hadn't taken notice of them.

Ellis tagged along with him, obediently taking his flank and managing to actually be quiet.

Rewarding him for it, Nick gave an actually robust response out of the corner of his mouth. "Yeah, because people never betray each other during disasters... better safe than sorry, Overalls. Honestly, I'd probably crack someone over the head if they walked past with a gun I could use."

Nick didn't really notice the half-frown Ellis gave him after that. The lack of a response, sure, but he ignored that.

One blasting shot drew the zombies' attention, and the gambler managed to hit one of them even from that far away, stumbling it to the side and drawing a snarl from the whole group. With that, they wheeled around, charging right down the sidewalk toward the two.

Nick aimed low, blowing their legs out from under them. His shots grew more accurate as they got closer, and the last one fell dead maybe a yard or two ahead. The conman got up with a slight grunt, turning his head to glance at Ellis, expecting the kid to compliment his shooting or otherwise make a comment.

Nope. He was standing there, hands in the pockets of his tied up overalls, jaw set a bit in this odd, almost upset kind of thought. Oh, Christ. Leave it to the good little Georgian boy to get his chaps in a twist over a stupid comment.

"I wasn't serious, assclown." Well, that wasn't entirely true, but Nick didn't see a real reason to say otherwise. Let alone mention the beat of time where he mulled over leaving the kid to die. "Take a joke."

Yeah. Let's leave that out.

Half-sighing, Nick just shook his head, turning back and stepping up close to the building beside them. "Just follow close, Overalls, if that isn't too hard. I'll handle it." He turned his back against the house's face, strafing carefully along the wall up toward the bar.

"Don't shoot nobody." was Ellis' response. It sounded, for a moment, like honest disdain - but just as Nick was about to turn round and give him a sound 'I can think of someone I'd like to shoot' as a response, he noted the goofy grin the mechanic had adopted.

Rolling his eyes dryly and growling quietly under his breath, the conman just turned back around. He dropped into a half-crouch as they got to the bar, dodging underneath the window and halting right beside the door, feeling Ellis settle beside him.

Nick used the butt of his shotgun to bang on the mostly broken door, three times, turning his head and calling out sharply, "Someone in there? We cleared the zombies out here for ya."

There was a few beats of silence, Nick straining carefully to listen - and when a response came, it was so close he flinched a bit. Just on the other side of the blockage, it sounded like. "They're sick, not zombies."

A woman, something that drew up one of the conman's brows. He felt Ellis start to stand up, mouth popping open to talk, and Nick jammed his elbow hard into his side, knocking the wind out of him and flopping him back into the wall.

'EY!' the mechanic mouthed, coughing with honest pain flickering over his face as he grabbed at his already-bruised ribs. Nick gave him a distinct 'I told you to shut up' look, his expression going blank when the woman spoke up again.

"Who's coughing? I heard that - if you're sick there is no way in hell I'm opening up. There are enough of you running around outside."

Nick growled slightly, narrowing his eyes at Ellis even though it had technically been his fault. At any other time, he'd have tried some charm, but he wasn't deluded enough to think he was in any shape to do so. I probably look awful at this point.

"He's not sick, he's stupid. Even if he did turn, I'd be the first to shoot him. So don't worry about it." Ellis was too busy still nursing his ribs to really react that time, nor to notice the pinch to Nick's expression as he made sure his suit collar was covering his neck wound. No sense in giving anybody a reason to think he was ill, too.

The woman sounded immensely unamused, voice lowered and a little muffled through the door. "Oh, great, a possible infected and a jerk... today's just going great."

Then Nick heard a new voice, male that time and more muffled, a booming tone with a slightly tired gruff to it. "Girl, you quit that. The world ain't gone to such shit yet that we'll turn sour to our own. A'sides, with the street clear, we gotta get movin'."

The conman and mechanic shared a small glance, Nick mostly irritated and Ellis rather entertained. "Oh fine, fine, Coach." the girl conceded quietly, more respectfully than her word choice let on. "Help me get the shelves away from the door, then..."

Nick used his elbow against the wall to push up to stand, stepping over to stand in front of the doorway and glancing over at Ellis. The hick hopped up to join him, nudging him insistently with an elbow. "Heh... really needed yer people-skills, didn't we? Saved the day, there, Nick."

Oh, good. Sarcasm. From Ellis. Because that's what I need right now.

Nick snapped a short glare sideways, stepping away from the nudge. "Shut it, dumbshit. Notice how they're opening up?"

Ellis' goofy grin in response suggested he had half a mind to respond, but the sudden shifting of whatever was blocking the door distracted both of them. It rocked and shuddered, screeching a bit as it pulled away from the door. They could hear the faint grunts of the two inside, and within a few seconds it was clear.

The door swung open, revealing the panting face of a maybe-thirty woman, healthy chocolate skin dusted with sweat. Her jeans and pink shirt were fairly stained with what was becoming an expected mix of blood and dirt, though a good bit cleaner than Ellis' wear. She passed a dubious look over Nick, and he had the sense she was trying to read him.

She turned brown eyes to Ellis after an instant and flashed a smile on him. "Sweetie, you usually hang with shady characters like this?"

Ellis shuffled his feet together and offered that stupid grin of his, lifting his hand to grip onto the bill of his cap and tip it down in this gentlemanly motion. "He ain't so bad.. he's saved muh life once -"

Nick sighed quickly, tossing the shotgun to Ellis and forcing the hick to break his stance in order to fumble and catch it. "First of all it was twice, second of all, let's all start a general leaving movement... we've wasted enough time and I'm not real pleased with how today's gone so far."

Leaning out from behind the woman came the man purportedly named 'Coach,' his bulky shoulders crunched up as he got a backpack strapped onto them, the muzzle of a gun poking out from behind his hip. He drew his heavily stubbled chin up a bit, nodding toward the two men.

"Boy, you keep yo' suit on. Ain't like you're the only one hankering t'get outta here." There was a little taint of disdain in his breathless statement, and it was very shortly responded to with a snide quip, the conman's voice quirked with an unuttered laugh.

"Sooner we get started the better, it'll take a while to squeeze you through the doorway..."

Both Ellis and the woman shifted with clear intent to try and stop what was obviously sparking to start a fight, but a sound from behind them made all four of them freeze up in utter silence - even Ellis, and somewhere Nick savoured the concept.

It was a growl. Sharp, yet quiet. Quiet, yet…

Hungry.

That feral, malicious growl changed the whole flow of the moment. Everyone froze, Nick and Ellis instantly looking up toward the other two. Neither of them wanted to look back. Nick started to step forward, had just started to move, when the woman frozen in the doorway hissed quickly, "Hold- just hold on!"

Both men's eyes widened, though for slightly different reasons, blurring out in hissed whispers at the same time. Nick took advantage of the instant to steal the shotgun back from Ellis, yanking it away too quickly for the younger man to argue.

"Are you kidding me?! What sort of goddamn advice is that, 'hold on'-'"

"Whut is it?! It ain't a dog is it?! Oh mah gawd, they got the dogs - !"

It was Coach's time to shut them up, leaning in with a hard grip clasping onto the edge of the doorway and speaking with the softest voice his booming tone could manage. "Both o' you, shut up 'n calm the shit down..."

It wasn't quite soft enough - another growl echoed out, louder and longer, vibrating slickly through the air. Ellis couldn't take it, spinning around on the heels of his workboots and snapping his eyes up to try and find the source.

"Maaaannn..." the mechanic managed, tone awestruck. "That ain't right..." That decided it, and Nick spun, too, snapping the shotgun up to try and take aim... but stopped. It was too far away to hit with a shotgun.

Crouched just inside an alley on the other side of the street, curled down on all fours like a cat, sat a very attentive zombie. The torn and bloody hood that draped over its face let in just enough light to see a bared fence of wild fangs between peeled back lips.

Rochelle whispered a cautious command, silently drawing her pistol out of her back pocket and nervously stepping closer to the doorway. "Just come back, slowly... that thing jumps at you but we can kill it - if you shoot now, it'll just leap away.. we just have to time it."

Coach mimicked her, very slowly pulling out the submachine gun that was hanging from his back.

The conman slowly took a step back, shotgun still pointed up, uttering a faint "Ellis..." to catch the kid's attention and get him to do the same. Step by step, they backed up toward the door - only to have that crouching infected follow them, two steps for their one.

"Why ain't it.. pouncin'. whut's it waitin' for..." Ellis whispered, glancing from Nick to the zombie rapidly like he was just waiting for the gambler to shoot. There was severe focus on Nick's face, brows pinched.

"It's like it's..." the woman managed, lifting up the pistol and aiming out of the doorway, bracing the grip with her other hand. "...picking."

She'd barely gotten the words out when suddenly there was a scream, this high-pitched howl, and the thing was flying through the air, stretched out like a frog mid-jump. Wicked claws were poised to maul, fangs spread open...

Right at Nick. Without a doubt, straight at the conman, ravenously eager. His stomach lurched.
"MOVE!" Coach's voice was like an explosion, a barked command that was so fierce, Ellis didn't even think twice before obeying, leaping to the side with a half-shout and clamping his hands onto his cap. He landed on his side, rolling a bit on the concrete and curling slightly.

Only Nick didn't move - he stayed right there, locked against the wall, and three guns fired all at once. The snap of a pistol, the rapid rattling of a machine gun, and the single explosion of a shotgun.

When Ellis lifted his head, peeking out from under the bill of his cap, he watched Nick shove the now-dead zombie off himself. It'd landed on top of him, but flopped lifelessly like a dummy, the only damage it did make being fresh blood stained down the front of his blue dress shirt.

The conman peeled his jacket away slightly, surveying the damage with a small, inward sigh. Well, today is just wonderful. Lifting his head, Nick felt a surge of nausea he fought down. Just nerves, he was sure. He watched the two others finally step out of the bar completely, checking over their weapons just momentarily before they tucked them away.

Coach stepped to stand by Nick, looking the man over with obvious concern. There was something very solid about the man - weight puns aside. Judging almost, like the big man was standing there and sizing Nick up for something. There was age on that face, tension in the same places that there were laugh wrinkles. "He get you, boy?"

Nick wasn't a fan of being sized up.

He pawed his jacket back into place, reaching into a pocket and prying a cigarette free from the box inside. Nicotine would still his roiling guts, hopefully. "Dead before it landed." His lips, thin and going a little pale with dehydration, quirked in a snide smirk up at the older man, gesturing his pinky at him. "Consider us even for the zombies earlier, not that that'll last."

Turning on the heels of his dress shoes, the conman strode over to crouch by a ruined car. The crash had lit a good bit of the vehicle on fire, and there were still flames burning dully on the upholstery. Coach watched him light his cigarette on the thing with a slight "hmph," turning his head to see Rochelle offering a hand down to Ellis, bent in a bit.

What he didn't watch was Nick bending his head and covering his mouth with his wrist, eyes closed in a sick expression.

Ellis grinned a bit, sheepishly, taking her hand and hauling up to his feet in a clumsy little roll. He let go once he got up, raising his hands up to sweep off his cap again, holding it in front of his chest. "Oh yeah, miss. I'm alright, wasn't nothin' but a fall... All this -" He gestured to the bruises around his neck. "- happened a bit ago. Ran intuh this zombie with a big tongue... Anyway, I'm just fine, heh. I'm Ellis, real pleasure, 'n that over there's Nick. He really ain't that bad. Bet he's glad tuh meetcha, too."

She grinned back, settling her hands on her hips and leaning back slightly. She seemed half startled at his rapid-fire speech, and half tickled by the kind greeting. "Rochelle, and this is Coach." As if on cue, Coach walked up behind her, offering out a heavy hand to take Ellis into a handshake that the mechanic returned gladly. "We bumped into each other running from-"

"For fuck's sake, how about this." Nick spoke smoothly past the cigarette burning between his lips, striding back toward them... and past them, with the shotgun rested on his shoulder.
"You three can have your little hugs-and-kisses party while we walk. In case you don't know, there's an evacuation going on at a hotel near here and I really don't want to find out what happens if we miss it. I'm pissed enough Overall there made us detour to save your asses."

Coach crossed his arms over his chest, the sweat-stained fabric of his bi-colored shirt crinkling up with the motion. "You just hold on a minute, now. The conman stopped, though, turning back around and tapping his fingertip against the shotgun he held.

Rochelle interceded there, patting a hand onto Ellis' shoulder as she spoke, head shaking a bit and bangled earrings bobbing. "Look, ... Nick. We saw a few supplies in this bar. Just give us a few minutes and then we can go, alright?"

Ellis glanced just momentarily from Coach to Rochelle, then toward Nick, turning his hat slowly in his hands. He prompted, with an awful amount of plea in his tone, "Ain't gonna take long, Nick, 'n we're 'bout outta shots anyhow."

Nick gave the three a particularly scathing shrug of his shoulder after just a moment of eyeing them. "Five minutes, and then I'm going, you three or not." he said simply, with a sigh, pinching his cigarette between index and middle finger. The conman walked over to the wall of the bar, leaning his shoulder against it and crossing his legs, facing away from them.

A hand came down with a sturdy clap on Ellis' shoulder, and Coach nodded back to the bar.

"C'mon now, son." The big man retreated into the bar with little more than that, disappearing through the doorway.

Rochelle flashed the kid a smile, waving him on as she followed Coach. He scratched his scalp momentarily, shooting the smoking Nick a confused stare before giving in and tagging after the pink-shirted woman.

"Don't mind 'im none, I think he ain't much fer .. well, other people." he apologized, replacing his cap onto the top of his head and stepping around the pushed-back shelves. "But he's pretty nice otherwise."

The bar was a dingy little place, the smell of alcohol strong in the air. The tables had been pushed over and shoved against the windows, leaving most of the floor empty, and in the process of pushing the shelves against the door, bottles had tumbled from its innards and shattered all across the floor. Ellis' boots squeaked and crackled on liquid and glass.

"Awh, it's alright, Ellis." Rochelle stepped up to the bar, where a few guns and boxes of ammo were piled haphazardly. "None of us are really feeling our best. At least he's good with a gun." She picked up one of the boxes, turning it a little in her hand with a pinch to the edge of her mouth. Turning to Ellis, she offered it out.

"Aren't these right for the suit's shotgun?"

Ellis gave a goofy grin at that, taking the box and popping it open, pulling out a bullet and rolling it between his fingers in inspection. "Yeah - but it ain't his, it's mine... better get it back, too, though he ain't too shabby with it." He dumped the bullets into the billowing pocket of his tied-up overalls in a lackadaisical motion that made Rochelle stare, then break into laughter. The mechanic just grinned rather bashfully.

Coach suddenly straightened up from behind the bar, making both of them jump. They'd barely noticed him walk behind it and crouch down, though in retrospect missing the large man's passage seemed unlikely. He was tucking something into the backpack he'd been shrugging on earlier, and when Ellis gave him a curious look, he noticed.

"Ain't nothin', son. Lotta places keep first aid kits lyin' 'round... just planning ahead. Got some other things in here. Prayin' we don't gotta use any of it, but I just grabbed it on the way outta my house."

The hick immediately brightened with interest. "Like a survival kit, yeah? Oh, man, I had onna those in muh truck, but... well.." His face fell slightly, tucking his cap back on and reaching to pick up the chrome shotgun lying on the bar. He fiddled with it, checking the ammo and aim. "I sorta crashed it... got crushed. I used tuh make kits like that with muh buddy Keith - he's the best, we run an autoshop and we got a band - uh, but we always ended up wastin' 'em 'cause all the stuff in 'em was cool, like gloves 'n bandaids 'n gauze 'n stuff, so -"

"Lordy, son... you talk like that all the time?" But the big man was smiling in a humoring motion, like he were listening to a child talking about his imaginary friend.

Rochelle smiled, too, almost laughing as she reached over the table to hold her hand out to Coach. Both of the two looked like they'd needed a laugh, and though Ellis felt his head bow a little in embarrassment under their obvious humor at his expense, he couldn't help enjoying the moment of normalcy.

Then, of course, he watched Coach unstrap and hand Rochelle the submachine gun that had been dangling from his bulky shoulder, and normalcy seemed a strange and tiny concept.

"Maybe the suit out there will like having this better..." she explained belatedly, though Coach hadn't argued or even really given a look. He'd understood what she'd been asking for and just did it. "Anyway, Ellis wanted his weapon back, and we have four guns between us."

Coach sighed a bit, rubbing his palm over his mouth and then the curve of his bald head. "Yeah, a'ight. Boy, toss me that.." He held the hand up, and Ellis tossed the gun over the bar, tipping his cap obligingly.

"C'mon, Nick'll be gettin' mad here in a few. Got whut we need, right?" The kid flashed both of them a smile, taking the machine gun from Rochelle's hand and stepping back toward the door, pushing his free hand into the empty pocket of his overalls.

"Sho, sho, son, we're comin'..." Coach assured him, starting around the bar to go after him, picking up the ammo left on the counter with Rochelle stepping up to help collect everything.

Ellis didn't wait, ducking out of the bar and quickly looking down the road. With a half-sigh of relief, he saw Nick was still there, a stream of cigarette smoke rising in a tiny column from him. "'Ey, Nick, trade ya..."

The conman barely turned his head, just enough for one dark green eye to narrow at the Ellis. Upon seeing the submachine gun the mechanic was lifting up in the air, there was a considerable rise in interest, Nick turning and stepping away from the wall.

"I thought I recognized that gunfire... do I even wanna know where they found a machine gun?" Then he smirked, faintly, correcting himself sarcastically; "Oh, right. We're in the South."

Ellis grinned at him, stopping a few steps from him and offering both the machine gun and an empty hand out. "I can tell'em you don't want it..."

Those green eyes narrowed a bit at him, Nick snatching the machine up and shoving Ellis' shotgun at him in the same instant. As Coach and Rochelle walked out of the bar, he urged them on very simply, rolling his cigarette to the corner of his mouth and turning away to start walking down the road at a striding pace.

"Let's go."
'ey, Ro?"

Two blocks. Two GODDAMN blocks. We have not gotten two GODDAMN blocks from the bar, and he's already started.

It was all the conman could do not to claw his own ears off when Rochelle turned her head and humored him, sounding entirely too interested for her own good. While it would have been tremendously satisfying, he decided the inconvenience wasn't worth the dramatic effect.

She'll learn. Sooner than later.

"Yeah, sweetie?"

Nick sighed audibly past the cigarette in his lips, smoke roiling up along the features of his face. He got the joy of interrupting them for a few moments when a group of zombies came barreling around a corner. He shot from the hip, hands clamped tight on the gun to keep it steady with the heavy vibrations that shot up his arms from it, mowing them down easily with how they'd clumped together.

"That's more like it... I am definitely keeping this." the gambler said aloud, then raised his voice a bit more. "Bit sweaty, though - or maybe it's not sweat. You didn't try and eat this, did you, Coach?" Nick smirked and rolled the gun in his hands before continuing on unfazed.

"Boy, you better watch yo'self," Coach called after him, wiping his wrist over his forehead and giving a weary sigh that suggested he wasn't pleased at all with Nick's behaviour. "I should'a just kept that shit."

Rochelle bit her lip carefully to avoid cracking even the slightest smile, shaking her head just once and turning brown eyes back to the hick walking beside her. "Those two are never gonna get along, I can tell already... You were saying, Ellis?"

The hick rubbed his head through his hat, dirtied fingers gentle on the fabric. "... well uh, I was just wonderin'. Earlier, you said they was sick, not zombies. I mean, yeah, I heard that too, s'just that seems like a right weird thing tuh say all'uv'a sudden unless - no offense, yuh know.. - but unless you know somethin' about it."

Rochelle half-turned, blinking a bit at him in something a lot like confusion. She broke into laughter again and reached out to smack his shoulder. "Honey, you're quick! You hear that, Coach?"

"Yeah, I heard."

The short, clearly unfocused response from the big man earned him a small brow-raise from Rochelle. He was watching Nick and his practically swaggering stride, some mix of the machine gun and the cigarette pinned between his lips putting the gambler in an odd mood. He looked kind of criminal.

"Anyway, sweetie... I know.. some things. As much as we can, I guess. Probably the only reason Coach has stuck around me so far."

That knocked the older man out of it, his head twisting around to give her a grin. "Awh now, baby girl, don't say that shit. I'm the one with the bum knee... you should be safe already."

She grinned back, fiddling with one of her bangled earrings just a little and tipping her head toward Ellis again. "I came to report on the infection from Ohio... Eyewitness 10 News, y'know them?"

The hick nodded emphatically, just about to open his mouth and respond when Rochelle glanced forward and kept going. "My cameraman got sick... from there it all went to shit, but I actually got some insight from CEDA before then."

Ellis saw the little twitches at the corners of her mouth, even as she flashed him a smile, and he realized she was more upset than she let on. He hitched his overalls up with his thumb in hesitant thought, looked up to make sure they were still on the right track toward the Vannah, then prompted her again.

"Whut kinda stuff? I heard a bit on the radio afore muh truck crashed, but it sounded kinda dodgy. Tapin' up windows..? That really work? I mean my buddy Keith 'n I had plans fer zombie apocalypses, 'n there wasn't no tape involved in that, lemme tell ya..."

Rochelle laughed gently, shaking her head and turning her eyes out toward the road, watching with a little bit of a squint as Nick and Coach shot down a few zombies on the way toward them. The two men were rather silent. All Ellis could do was listen to her, lips drawn in faintly.

"Maybe at the start, when they thought it was just some airborne sneeze-and-cough illness... the Green Flu. But it turned bad somewhere along the way, really bad... It made people deathly sick, sweetie. Fever, throwing up, losing their mind.. like their bodies were just falling apart. But they don't die."

Ellis gulped, and Rochelle may as well have been telling a ghost story for how raptly his head was bent, watching her face. She looked stoic, if a little sad. "They look like they will, but then they just go rabid... like animals. They aren't zombies; the dead don't rise, they don't eat brains or something... but.. I dunno, Something snaps, and they're just gone. Whoever they were, before, they -"

"Holy shit, what the FUCK are you talking about?!

Everyone jumped - even Coach. Nick had spun around on his heel, halting the lot of them, and the words were infused with a cold rage. Maybe the most frightening part of the whole thing was how composed his expression looked in the seconds afterward.

Coach was the first to try and talk, rolling his shoulders a little. "Boy, you-"

Nick didn't even interrupt him... he just smoothed over him, so cool and even it was like the big man hadn't even been talking.

"Nobody is interested in hearing that bullshit right now, unless you like thinking about how the things we've been killing were human once. The hotel is just around this corner and if I hear one word from any of you before we're on an evacuation truck or.. helicopter or whatever they're planning, I will smear zombie all over all of you and tell them you're all sick. 'Kay?"

Green eyes roved over the three of them, testingly... expectantly. His cigarette had dropped to the sidewalk in his rant, and smoke rose faintly up from it in dying, sputtering curls. He didn't even bother to stamp it out - what good was that?

Ellis started, finally creaking out of his startled posture, "... Nick, whut -"

"Zombie blood. Your face. Shut up." Nick elucidated very shortly, jabbing a finger at the Georgian.
The conman turned back after that, silently continuing on toward the upcoming streetcorner, replacing that finger onto the trigger of his gun to watch for infected. Coach glanced back at Ellis and Rochelle, just for a moment, and then very subtly nodded them to keep going.

Ellis bit his lower lip tightly, feeling Rochelle hook her arm in his and pull him into motion. He glanced at her under the bill of his cap, giving a slightly awkward shrug of his shoulder. His discomfort wasn't so much with her closeness as it was Nick's behaviour.

"Ellis…" she whispered sideways to him, voice a little strained with confusion. "... what's up with him?"

The kid shook his head once, using the butt of his shotgun to push his cap up a little. "I ain't real sure, ma'am... I mean -" Ellis cleared his throat, glancing down for a good beat of time, clearly uncertain of whether to speak or not. "... well, I dunno."

She didn't let it go, squeezing his muscled bicep a little and tilting her head. "What?"

Ellis still hesitated, jaw twitching and easing like he were actually chewing on the words before he spoke them, glancing up toward her and whispering back even quieter, "He got a zombie scratch earlier, on his neck... maybe he's scared."

A pinch of surprise touched Rochelle's face, but then faded. "Well… Everything I know says it's airborne. Even if he did get scratched, I don't think it works like that." There was a little too much emphasis on 'think,' and Ellis seemed about to protest when she clarified comfortingly, "If we were going to get sick, I think we would have already. I got this a while ago, see?"

Rochelle offered her wrist out, showing Ellis a thin set of gouges where a zombie had grabbed for her. It had already clotted over, and definitely looked older than the wound on Nick's neck. He peered at it, feeling a strong sense of relief.

"Oh… good." Ellis' face swapped between a few different expressions; he hadn't really considered the idea of them getting sick before. "Are we immune or somethin'?"

That left Rochelle at a loss. She shook her head, scratching at her earlobe. "I'm … not sure. From what I got, CEDA was still trying to figure everything out." When that didn't seem to comfort Ellis, she smiled and met his gaze strongly. "I just know we're not sick, okay?"

It worked, and he grinned a bit at her, bashfully. "I wasn't worried or nothin'. We're too badass tuh get sick."

They both looked up when Coach broke in, the big man sounding tense. "Got other worries. Just 'cause we're healthy don't mean we're outta the woods." He shook his head at their obvious attention behind him, not continuing, and it left the three in an awkward silence. Nick either didn't hear them or just ignored them.

The gambler had just reached that street corner, spun to the side with his gun lifted up to catch any zombies unawares... and then he froze up.

Of course, there were zombies around the street corner, and Nick's hesitance forced the other three to have to bolt up and quickly gun down the couple infected who'd been quite ready to kill him.

"Jesus, Nick!" Ellis chided as he tossed his gun back onto his shoulder, stepping up to the conman with a slightly meek look before he tried to give a grin, it coming off as goofily stupid as it always did. Nick didn't even look. "Whatcha tryin' tuh do, feed 'em? Y'know-"
"Ellis." It was Coach, but Ellis ignored the interruption for once, lifting up a hand to wave a bit in the air toward Nick's face. Coach and Rochelle had stepped past him, and out of the corner of his eye he saw them stop and stand there, just like Nick.

"- they ain't really the types tuh give a breather -"

"Ellis." This time Rochelle - but Ellis couldn't get his eyes to move, peering at the gambler's stoic, faintly stubbled face, paling lips pinched tight like they still had a cigarette to trap between them. Ellis was waiting for some snide comment, some sarcastic jab - anything to distract him.

But Nick said nothing.

He could just tell. Whatever it was everyone was staring at, he didn't want to see.

Yet…

He'd just been about to force himself to turn when Nick's hand suddenly reached up and grabbed the top of his shirt, yanking him like a dog by its collar, twisting him around. The gesture forced Ellis to face the Vannah Hotel looming up in all its whitewashed, window-pocked glory, alongside the cityscape just before them.

"There's no one here." the gambler uttered flatly.

The parking lot was empty - 'empty' having gained a new meaning for them, anyway. Just a few scattered, bloodied parked cars and zombies, wandering around - sitting and leaning against the cars and the walls of the hotel. Windows were broken in on all levels, the doors hanging off their hinges - and maybe worst of all, flames licked out of every exit and entrance.

At least half of the place was on fire, and it looked (just by eyeing the windows implanted in the walls every few feet) to be spreading fast. They could almost feel the heat from here.

"But..." Ellis started, a little chirp, squashed like a bug by Coach's booming gruff.

"Fuhget it, son. Hate to agree, but he's right." All Ellis could do was watch with slight shock as the big man bent his head a little, one hand coming off his shotgun to cross himself in silence.

Ellis then turned to Rochelle, nearly strangling himself as he'd forgotten Nick, expression turning severe as he stared down the hotel, still had him by the collar. Twisting out of the gambler's grip and looking hopefully to the woman, Ellis prompted again, "But.."

She smiled just faintly at him, a smile that was so hollow it barely avoided being a grimace, and reached out to touch his shoulder. "Honey... we'll be fine. I'm sure they're still hangin' around somewhere. We just missed 'em, okay?"

The younger man pulled his cap off, turning it in his hands slowly. Coach sighed, glancing at his watch and then clapping his hand down on Ellis' shoulder again, shaking him just enough to get his attention. "C'mon, you three. We ain't got long till it starts gettin' dark, an' none of us wanna be out here when that happens."

Ellis and Rochelle looked up at him, but Nick turned away, bending forward slightly to pull his jacket off, guarded green eyes inspecting the blood drying on his dress shirt while his mind visibly worked on overdrive. The wheels in his head turned so fast there might as well have been steam coming out of his ears.

"Whut should we do, guys?" Ellis managed after a few beats, lifting his cap up to screw it down on his head and suddenly breaking into a grin that got him stares from both Coach and Rochelle. "We gonna set up camp?"

Neither could really believe his enthusiasm. It took them an instant to adjust, Rochelle quicker than Coach. She gestured around them at the street, responding, her voice starting slow and then picking up a little speed as she got comfortable with the concept. "There are houses all around us... I don't think anyone would really care if we borrowed one. Coach has a few flashlights but.. well... call me coward but I don't wanna be out in the dark."

The big man nodded, wiping his palm over his mouth again and then turning his head to glance at the yet-silent Nick, staring just a moment before speaking up. "Nick. You stayin' with us or goin' yo' own way?"

There was a moment of silence. A long, heavy moment of silence, and Rochelle's hand on his shoulder was the only thing that kept Ellis from speaking up and pleading with the conman not to go off on his own. It was too dangerous... and Nick was cool. Angry and snide.. but cool.

And, Ellis was almost sure, more scared than he let on.

That dark-haired head turned, and with a momentary glance-over by mistrustful green eyes, the conman acquiesced quietly.

"Yeah, sure. Why the fuck not."
Chapter 12

Nick sighed heavily as he stepped over a crack in the road, adjusting the suit jacket slung over his shoulder. After realizing the Vannah hotel was abandoned, suddenly everything seemed a little worse. He was sticky and sweaty; nausea kept clawing at his gut; there was a heavy blanket of burning rubber and rotting flesh in the air; his dress shirt was clinging to his chest like sandpaper because of the crusting blood that painted its front; his neck was aching like an overextended muscle…

Oh, and we're all going to die.

Coach, Rochelle, and Ellis were ahead of him a few paces, trying to hunt down a building both not on fire and close to the hotel to set up inside for the night. The three were clustered together, Rochelle between them like she was their charge, and Nick considered making a quip about feeling left out.

Fact was, he appreciated the isolation, particularly with how shit he was feeling. That, and he didn't have to do much shooting with them leading the way.

"Whut 'bout that one?" Ellis piped up, pointing just a block down the road at a squat little house plugged snugly into the city rows, brick and dark mortar. It seemed to have dodged the flames and damage a lot of the other buildings had taken, and the two tiny windows on either side of the door had survived unbroken - though the door itself was busted open.

Coach pointed out that very thing with a tone of faint humor, shrugging his backpack more onto his shoulder and taking advantage of the focus to stop for a moment. He shifted some weight onto his good leg, giving his bum knee a break. "Don't think we need a workin' door, son?"

The hick scratched his head just a little, digging fingertips under the edge of his cap, and thumbed over his shoulder toward Nick. "We seen 'em break through doors like nothin', won't matter either way... Y'all blocked up that bar door anyhow, figure we can do somethin' like that."

The big man nodded a bit in agreement, though slowly, patting up a hand on Rochelle's shoulder and leading the other two toward the building. "Let's get a look inside, then. Yo Nick," He turned his head a bit, eyeing the conman. "Mind watchin' the door?"

tch... Asshole.

Nick raised his gun to rest it against his shoulder, not even bothering with actually responding. He stepped up near the doorway as Ellis was carefully wrenching what remained of the door open. Whatever had busted it had done a number on the hinges, and the Georgian had to push and shove at the thing with his shoulder and a palm, gritting his teeth.

His biceps trembled just a little with the exertion, body curling to force more of his weight against it, and underneath the tight shirt he had on, his stomach clenched up. It sent taut lines across the fabric, tensing over the muscle it covered.

The gambler, before he could catch himself, found a particularly unwanted hum in the back of his head. Try as he might, Nick couldn't wrangle his gaze away from the show of force, nor shake his fascination with the younger man's frame.

Well, fuck.
Mercifully, the door shortly cracked with a loud noise, and Ellis stumbled right into the building along with it, landing with an audible clatter and yelp of surprise in a pile on the floor.

Snapping his eyes quickly out to the street, Nick set his jaw and huffed out a breath, folding his suit jacket over his gun-wielding forearm. "Nice going, Overalls." he called sarcastically over Coach and Rochelle breaking into laughter, the first words he'd spoken in a good while.

"... man, I busted somethin'!" the mechanic complained inside, voice muffled slightly. "Owwwhhh..."

The two others clambered in after him, Coach alert with his shotgun in hand, and Nick could hear Rochelle utter a sympathetic, "Are you okay?" and Ellis start up with "Yeeah.." before he focused his gaze down the road and tuned them out.

The conman raised his free hand to gently touch at the sore scratch on his neck, flinching as the touch brought little sparks of pain. He pulled the hand back, flexing his fingers testingly. He didn't even bother to check his clothing over, knowing full-well his suit was in bad shape.

I'll steal whatever kind of tap we find in there and get it soaking... goddamnit, I can't believe I left all my clothes.

Nick sighed, focusing his attention on that frustration for the time being. Raging inwardly at his ruined $3,000 suit was a lot more satisfying than thinking about his mental slip-up; the latter would just bring back bad memories and make him angrier than he already felt. He was running out of energy, fast. He just felt.. drained.

A flicker of laughter - from whom, he couldn't tell - inside drew his attention for a blink of time, before he just shook it off and grunted.

Oh goody, they're bonding. Just what we need in the middle of the goddamn apocalypse.

Those dark emerald eyes stood guarded under his brows, inspecting off in the distance. He could see little clouds of infected huddled against walls and wandering across the street, but they hadn't taken notice of the four. He just eyed them, expression flickering in and out of disgust as they'd bend over and vomit on the sidewalk, or claw at one another, or stumble to their knees and just... sit.

Without warning, Ellis' capped head popped around the doorway, grinning stupidly like he'd startled him and waving at the - expectedly - unfazed conman. "Nick, there ain't nothin' bad in here. Whoever lived here got out quick, 'n whatever broke the door ain't around no more. We gotta look at how we'll block up this door, but yuh wanna come in?"

Nick pushed off the wall, striding over to duck into the building as Ellis backed up to give him room. He'd committed to staying with the group, sure, but the sooner he could get some privacy, the better. Today is fucking with me.

It was a thin little house, the carpeted front room taken up mostly by a fat couch and coffee table. There had been a TV set up against the wall, but the boxy thing had been knocked over somehow and lay broken on the ground - fortunately glass side up, so it hadn't shattered, just cracked the back casing and tore its cord out of the wall.

There was a staircase on the far wall, leading up to a second floor, and just underneath it, an open door to a dark-looking tile kitchen. Rochelle was just stepping out of there, and she lifted a hand to wave at the two returning, Nick suddenly noticing the bangles she had on one arm.
He was pretty certain jewelry wasn't optimal zombie-fighting gear, but didn't comment. Guess a suit isn't, either. "Food?" he questioned, almost blandly, passing his tongue over dry lips and forcing a sigh.

"Mh-hmm. They must've just ... left." Her word choice was careful. "There's a bathroom upstairs, and it looks like the water's still runnin'. Thank God for city water." she informed them, lifting a hand to tiredly rub her forehead before flashing a strong smile. "Electricity's out, though. All the frenzy, and a lot of the power lines got knocked down, I think."

Nick gave a simple nod, stepping up to the coffee table and laying his gun down on top of it to join Coach's shotgun and Rochelle's pistol, already lying there. "Perfect. I'm sure we'll have just a grand time together. Who needs electricity when we have each other?"

Apparently his sarcasm was too light that time, because Ellis piped up with full enthusiasm, swinging his shotgun up onto his shoulder and hitching his overalls up his waist with a large grin. "Yeah! Man, it'll be like campin', 'cept with zombies 'n shit! I went campin' with muh buddy Keith once, down in Fort McAllister, 'n we didn't have nothin' and nothin' tuh do fer like a week 'cause all our stuff fell in this lake, so we were beggin' these other folks fer food'n shit - oh man, and then Keith -"

"Whatchyou on 'bout again, son?!"

Nick had never felt so glad to see the huge man as he did then. He actually uttered it, with a short, "Thank-you, Coach..." that it seemed nobody heard. Coach came down the stairs with a slightly staggered gait, the angle of descent sending discomfort through his old knee injury, backpack in one hand and banister in the other.

"Anything and everything.. but mostly Keith." Rochelle said rather sweetly, stepping around the couch so she could reach up and tip Ellis' capbill down over his face teasingly, flashing a smile to show she was joking.

The kid ended up embarrassed, lifting up his free hand (he hadn't relinquished his shotgun so quickly) and only barely raising the cap up to peek out from under it. He didn't quite blush, but there were hints of it beneath the shadows that masked his face.

Nick caught a glimpse of it, a little twitch narrowing his eyes and inspecting the tiny bit of heat gathering on the hick's face. He found himself musing on it, a little longer than he should've let himself. If Ellis thinks he has a chance with her, I'll laugh.

"I been dealin' with kids all my life, and you gotta be the biggest talker I've met, Ellis, shit..." Coach cracked, face breaking into a little grin as the big man used his grip on the banister to ease himself down to sit on the bottom of the staircase, grunting slightly as he settled.

If anyone has a chance, it's me.

"I got'uh lotta funny stories is all!" Ellis defended obliviously, pushing the cap back down to mask his eyes when Rochelle's smile turned into a grin, too... a little too large for Nick's comfort.

... With Rochelle.

The fact he had to clarify for himself was not comforting.

"He sounds sort of-"

"Overalls," Nick suddenly interrupted, flicking a hand to wave Rochelle off and then beckon the mechanic as the older man slipped around to the other side of the coffee table. "Quit being an idiot and help me move this table against the door."

Rochelle looked a bit miffed at him, but just shook her head and walked over to lean against the banister next to Coach, arms crossed, sharing a very small look with him. Ellis, on the other hand, practically leapt on the chance to get out from under his embarrassment. He darted to the opposite side of the table and bent down to get a grip on a leg.

Nick mimicked him after he'd moved the weapons off it and onto the couch, and both were silent as they tilted it onto its side and carried it over to block the doorway. There was nothing really to be done about the small open space at the top of the doorway it couldn't quite reach. It was a thick enough table - thicker than a door anyway, and that would have to do.

"I'll move the TV, too... help keep it up." Ellis offered, moving to do so even before anyone had a chance to agree. He passed by Nick stepping over to it, and he whispered the tiniest of "Thank yuh"s as he did, drawing a quick, sharp little stare from the conman behind his back.

What- .. oh. He thinks I interrupted to save him, doesn't he? Oh, perfect.

Nick couldn't help but give him a little bit of a disdainful stare, watching the hick crouch down and get his hands on the TV to start pushing it over in front of the table. The gambler finally retreated with a little roll of his eyes. He needed to get some air, splash some cold water on his face.

"I'm grabbing the bathroom." he announced simply, walking over to the stairs to gesture Coach to let him pass. The big man was surprisingly unargumentative with him, tossing the backpack at him with a simple "Front pocket." before he moved to get half up, Nick catching it, nodding, and slipping past him.

As he went up the stairs, the light from the front of the house faded. He pulled Ellis' flashlight from his jacket pocket, flicking it on. The light was pale but white, sending a sudden and stark contrast scattering along the house that sucked the depth from everything.

The staircase took a sharp left turn, funneling into a small hallway. There were two doors, both open - bedroom on the left, bathroom on the right. Nick hesitated a moment, eyeing the bedroom through the doorway. He could see the dresser against the wall beside the tussled, unmade bed - light streaming in from a window sent a honey-gold halo that fuzzed them to silhouettes and blinded him to any details, but there were picture frames lined up there.

Something balked him from going in and looking. Maybe a little hint of squeamishness, or some kind of discomfort. It felt strange... he'd broken into a house before, actually. Several. Privacy wasn't an issue, but this was different. Creepy.

The homeowners were probably - definitely? - dead.

Shaking off the idea entirely, Nick pushed into the bathroom, relieved to see it was clean. There was even a shower, somebody's soap and shampoo left behind in bottles on a shelf inside. If Rochelle had been right about the water, they'd be able to clean up before they left in the morning.

The conman stepped up to the sink, tossing the backpack onto the floor by his foot and placing the flashlight on the countertop so it illuminated the room. Nick pulled his folded jacket off his arm and hung it up on the towel rack just by his shoulder, glancing just momentarily over it and noting dirt stains and suspicious blotches here and there, particularly along the sleeves.

Looking up at the mirror hanging above the sink, he was treated to a frontal view of just how badly stained his shirt was. Red and odd tints of black soaked into the fabric like some morbid water balloon had broken on his chest.

_Ugh... this used to be a nice suit._

That, and how tired he was looking. But, he tried to glaze over that part.

Sighing with no small amount of disappointment, the gambler set to unbuttoning his dress shirt. Crusted blood came off on his fingertips from the buttons, making him curl his lips a little in dismay. As each button came undone and revealed more of his torso, he noticed the blood had soaked through and stained his chest an odd shade of blushed pink, dark hair a little matted.

Shaking his head and quickly steeling himself against the desire to shudder, the conman pulled the shirt off his arms, a slight chill brushing over the bare stretch of his back. Nick twisted the sink faucet toward the 'C' and let it spray a moment before pushing his shirt under the stream and carefully rubbing at the fabric, watching the water run red down into the drain as it worked at the top layers of the stain.

It was hard keeping focused on the work, even with his shirt's safety in the balance. The mindless scrubbing let his thoughts wander. Namely - wander toward the view he'd gotten of Ellis' muscles. It wasn't that he wanted to, but there the images were.

_Of course. World falls apart, and I get trapped with Georgia's finest hayseed._ Karma couldn't give him a buck-toothed yokel. It had to be sun-tanned muscle, lean torso, brawny shoulders -

Shaking his head furiously, he sighed. _Nick. Man. Get your shit together, goddamnit. You're just stressed - there's probably matches somewhere around here... get a good smoke in you and you'll feel better._

After a moment, he flicked off the faucet and grabbed the bar of soap sitting beside the sink. Scrubbing it into the stain till a soapy foam had collected over the whole of the mess, Nick rubbed it against itself for a moment and then pulled back, letting it sit and resting his palms against the edge of the sink.

He turned his chin a little, eyeing the scratch on his neck in the mirror. It was inflamed around the edges, an angry shade of red, and the scab that had started to form over the dual-lined clawmark was an ugly color. Nick closed his eyes, rolling his head forward with a slight sigh.

_Could at least TRY to look like a normal scratch... why do you have to look all fucking infected...?_

"Hey, suit..."

The voice came suddenly from the doorway, and with one guarded eye flashing open, Nick glanced at the mirror to inspect the reflection cast in the glass. He'd left the door open without really thinking.

Rochelle leaned in a bit, although it was apparent she hadn't been there very long - when her eyes set on his shirtless back and tensed up shoulders, she let out a startled "Whoops!" and took a step back.

It made him smirk, despite himself, and he turned his head to actually look over his shoulder at the door, leaning his weight a little bit to one side. Being covered in blood didn't put a dent in his ego. "Doesn't bother me, Ro'. I happen to be a very handsome bastard and you're welcome to enjoy it."

Plus, being around a woman made him feel a little better. Get his mind off things.
She did step back into the doorway after a second, giving him a distinctly unamused narrow of her eyes (even though her lips were twitching in and out of a distinctly amused lift) and raising a hand to set on her hip. "You're some kind of bastard, I'll say."

The woman waited just a beat to see his reaction, and when his smirk curled an extra snide centimeter or two, she continued with her hand raising to point at him. "I came up to see if you wanted a hand with that cut on your neck. It seemed kinda nasty, figured you might need some help."

That faded the smirk just a little, although he didn't necessarily scowl instead. The conman straightened up slightly, turning his shoulder and glancing himself over in the mirror. "I can handle myself. I've dealt with this shit before."

Rochelle flashed a simple roll of her eyes, noticing the lack of an explicit 'no', and stepped around him to pull Coach's backpack up onto the sink. "You're sketchy as shit, y'know that?"

Nick watched her sideways, not making any motion to move out of her way in the slightly enclosed space, nor respond. He watched her unzip the front pocket, digging through and pulling out a tiny bottle of antibiotic, a pack of gauze, and a small roll of tape, tightly tucked into the pack.

"I just meant claw-marks, doll. The ladies love me."

Rochelle took a half-step back, grabbing a hand-towel from the rack and folding it over her thumb. "Uh-huh. Could've fooled me, but I guess girls go for assholes." She stepped back and rested her hip against the sink counter, glancing up at him with this bemused look as she got the towel wet under the faucet, the momentary water flow disturbing some of his soaking shirt's suds.

Getting a better look at his neck wound, her lips twitched downward. "Bend down a little, honey." she ordered in a sympathetic tone as she reached up to daub a little at his scratch, so light and careful he barely felt it. It was, however, cold, and between the temperature and her attention, goosebumps snuck up his arms.

His smirk was definitely back now, bending down to settle his weight on his forearms, balanced on the edge of the counter. "I'm honey now?" he purred quietly, keeping his eyes focused at her and letting his lids sink just a little.

Rochelle jabbed the towel onto his sore wound so hard he cringed in on himself and hunched down, completely not expecting it and cursing a violent, "Fuck!" that was as much pain as it was surprise.

He squinted slightly at her in the instant afterward, rather irked to see a fairly large grin settled neatly on her features. He'd been joking! .. mostly. "What the fuck was that for!?"

She flashed him a wider grin and then moved to daub at the wound again, giving a little coo when he tried to dodge her. "Being a jerk. I'm trying to help, calm down and quit the ladykiller bullshit... I'll strangle you. If Coach doesn't first."

Nick scowled a bit, holding still after a moment and giving her a displeased glare... though something in the way she shook her head at him, bangled earrings swinging, made him crack another half-smirk.

"..fine, fine. Just don't... do that again. Crazy bitch..." Green eyes locked gazes with themselves as he glanced up at himself in the mirror, and spent just a moment focused on their reflection before turning to monitor Rochelle.
The jab had made it bleed, although in the end that would probably be more helpful than anything else, breaking the scab to let the antibiotics soak in quicker. She daubed and brushed at the two scratches, cleaning them up and soothing the agitation with the cold water, before tossing the towel to the countertop and picking up the antibiotic tube.

It was as she was gently laying a line of it along the two claw marks that she spoke up again, voice suddenly very soft as her free hand alighted onto his shoulder. "I was talking to Ellis, earlier. I'm sure all four of us have been exposed plenty... if you were going to get sick, it'd have already hap -"

Rochelle instantly regretted bringing it up, because the previously still conman suddenly straightened right up, forcing her to pull away and drawing a slight inhale from her. Nick didn't even look over, expression a mask of indifference, and he said coolly, "I can bandage it."

She barely had her mouth open to argue when he nearly pushed her out of the way, picking up the gauze and tape and turning toward the mirror, completely ignoring her while he leaned in to delicately lay the gauze strip over the wounds.

Rochelle shook her head just a little, downturnning her gaze and stepping around him. She wasn't stupid, she could tell she'd pushed it and couldn't turn it back. The woman lingered just a minute in the doorway like he might break and thank her, watching him tear off bits from the roll of tape with one hand and his teeth, but eventually gave up and disappeared down the hallway.

As Nick settled the bandage into place with a piece of tape to either side, staring at it for a moment before he bent in to turn on the faucet and scrub-and-rinse his shirt, he found himself glancing more than once at the door's reflection in the mirror.

He didn't want to think about the weird clammy sensation on his forehead, or the way his neck was throbbing. Or the nausea that was encroaching in random waves.

He definitely didn't want to think about that.

Nick was still rearranging the soaked, black strands of his hair as he came downstairs, wearing nothing but the white slacks of his suit. He'd hung his shirt up to dry over the sink and left his jacket on the towel rack, shoes and socks set in a corner of the bathroom floor. Even though the shower had been cold, he felt rather crisp and clean, and the grin on his face earned him very focused looks from all three of the other survivors.

Not even the shivers and the goosebumps on his skin could shake his abruptly good mood. If anything, the cold shower had been clarifying. He even felt a little less feverish, and the shock had taken some of his nerves away.

"Bathroom's open." he announced unnecessarily, reaching the end of the staircase and lounging his elbow on the banister. Nick sent a fairly lecherous smile over toward Rochelle, perched on the arm of the couch. She just shook her head, eyes rolling, and turned around to call over toward Ellis, who'd gotten himself hunched down in front of one of the windows and was intently looking out over the road.

"Ellis, sweetie, you want the bathroom? I think you took your car shop with you when you left."

The hick twisted around, blinking like he'd been startled, and did a quick glance-over of himself. He seemed to just then notice the mess he was. A grin broke over his face, and he swiped his cap off to scratch at his sweat-mussed scalp. "Uh, yeah, guess I better."

With that he darted to the staircase, and as he stepped up to get past Nick, he landed a hand on the conman's shoulder. It was a familiar gesture, just a generally comforting pat with that calloused palm and fingertips... but against Nick's bare, post-shower sensitive skin, he couldn't fight the abrupt snap of his spine straight, something a lot like a grimace working into his features.

The rake of rough, completely oblivious fingers tingled.. sprouting this weighty block of heat that tensed up his shoulder and made him inhale a sharp breath, fingers curling into fists in a little snap.

Ellis noticed. Actually Ellis and Rochelle both did, with Coach only missing it because he'd turned his back to them from where he sat on the couch. The kid quickly recoiled and spun to face him on the steps, looking instantly chagrined.

"Oh shit, did I hurt yuh?!"

He must've thought he'd knocked the conman's wound... but correcting him and saying that it was quite the opposite wasn't high on Nick's list of reactions. He didn't really want to say 'yes,' but 'no' would've just created more questions.

Instead, the conman whipped his head around to glare venomously at the hick, choosing to not respond at all. Sinking his hands into the pockets of his slacks, Nick just retreated toward the kitchen, not seeing any other option in regards to getting out from under the group's attention.

"...awh man, I thought we was gettin' along..." he heard from Ellis behind him, sounding tremendously disappointed.

Nick stepped over to lean against the refrigerator, inspecting the quaint little setup of counters and cabinets with a harsh set to his jaw. Damnit... Shaking his head and feeling a loose strand of hair tickle at his forehead, the gambler turned to settle more of his bare back against the fridge, closing his eyes as the cool metal soaked into his skin, leeching that warm feeling out of him by force.
"Don't worry 'bout it none, son. Ain't yo' fault." Coach reassured him, drawing an inward grunt from Nick.

"...man, should I try 'n talk to 'im? I'm kinda the reason he got hurt at all..."

Nick tensed up slightly, ready to chase Ellis right back out, but Coach's voice redirected him with a weary tone, followed shortly by Rochelle's agreement. "Naw, let him be, son. Go wash up."

"Yeah, Ellis. It'll be fine."

After a beat, Nick could hear the kid's heavy workboots thudding up the staircase that seemed just above his head, and the conman closed his eyes and relaxed. Just a little.

Reaching down into his slacks' pocket, he pried up his pack of cigarettes, eyeing the sticks secreted inside. He was down to fifteen, and with the way things were going, he felt it wouldn't last him long. He wasn't even normally that heavy of a smoker... one somewhere during the day and maybe one at night, with exceptions of more or less depending on where he was.

Sure he was addicted, and he felt it even then, this little need ringing in the back of his head as he hesitated with the pack in hand. But it was a need that time, something he could actually tell he wouldn't be able to shrug off.

I feel like shit. Goddamnit, Nicolas, this is why you stick to women.

So he tugged out a cigarette and curled his lips around it, trapping it firmly and stepping away from the fridge. He dug through a few drawers, finding them mostly full of junk he didn't give a second glance to. One finally held a pack of matches stuffed in the back, and he stole it quickly, turning around to rest against the edge of the counter as he struck the match and bent in to light up.

His eyes closed as he sucked in a hard breath, drowning out his lungs for a moment with the charring nicotine before he exhaled through his nostrils.

A soft 'mm' of approval escaped him, and with the knowledge that Ellis was safely distanced, he dug through the cabinets to find a cup, filled it from the tap, then strode out into the front room.

He was just prying his cigarette from his lips to take a sip when Coach apparently smelled the smoke, giving an immediate protest and twisting his head to stare the conman down challengingly. "Boy, you take that shit outta here! Open a window 'n stick yo' head out or somethin'. You ain't smokin' up this place all night."

Nick didn't even bother getting irritated. He just shrugged a bare shoulder in dismissal, drinking a few swallows of water as he crossed the room to settle on the wall next to the door. He let his body lounge against the wall so the smoke from his breath trailed outside, and he could flick his ash through the open space with ease.

"You two think any about what we're going to do?" the conman asked casually, gaze firmly pointed out the space between the blockading table and the top of the door. He watched a pair of zombies fight in the street like drugged animals, stumbling and staggering against one another with none of the fierce speed he'd seen from them.

They were almost lazy - exhausted.

Rochelle, who'd ended up curled on the couch beside Coach and looked like she might settle into sleep against him, spoke up with an alert tone that went against her tired posture. "I've been thinking a little, yeah. Some of me wants to think if we stay close they'll send someone out to check "Keep going." It wasn't an apology, really, but it was probably better than nothing.

Rochelle did pinch a brow just a little, slightly uncertain at the short nature of his command. Coach nudged the back of her head with his bicep in an urging motion, and she resigned to continuing.

"I did hear some things about the evac plans. From what I remember, there was talk of funneling into ports. I'm not sure what they mean to do there, and they weren't exactly reporter-friendly at the time, but... I think they're trying to get everyone out of the country. Trying to handle the zombies without us getting in the way, maybe."

The conman pried the cigarette from his lips and tapped the ash out the window, taking a swig of water. "So?"

Rochelle gave a small shrug, clasping her hands on her knees and rubbing at her jeans. "Maybe if we head to the coast, we can catch up to CEDA. It's better than sitting around here at least, right? Even if they're not there, we can steal a boat and sail down the shore until we find something. It'd at least get us away from the zombies."

Nick nipped his cig back between his lips and turned to fully face the doorway, leaning his head up to get a good look at the darkening sky. He could hear the water of Ellis' shower suddenly start running, and - after an initial yelp at the cold - muffled and strangled singing.

He half-sighed, scratching for a moment at the bare, crisply-haired expanse of his chest.

"It's a good plan, Nick." Coach finally spoke up, that gruff baritone, rubbing his free hand on the back of his bald head. "I'll check wit' Ellis to make sho', but I think there's a highway we can hook up to nearby. Leads to the coast outta Savannah."

"Yeah, it's a fine plan." Nick shot back with his cigarette rolled to the corner of his mouth, though his tone was even, his thoughts suddenly deliberate and sculpted compared to his dismissive near-silence previously. "That is, assuming they're even still waiting for us when we manage to get there. How far is that, huh? We can't walk that far and make any kind of time, not with zombies to fight along the way. And who's to say they'll happen to be watching the one piece of coast we stumble on to? You're betting on some low odds here, darling."

Rochelle narrowed her eyes slightly at the challenge, although as Nick returned her gaze firmly, he noticed she wasn't so much angry as confident. "My station sent me to Savannah because CEDA had a base here. Sure, it doesn't look like they're doing too well, but if there's any place they'll be keeping their eyes on, it'll be their base of operations. I'd say that's a pretty smart bet, actually."

They stared just an instant at each other after that, this silent tug-o-war with their gazes, the showering Ellis suddenly belting out to the tune of "Iii fell in-to a burnin' ring of fiire.." before his voice muffled again... and then a smirk flashed over Nick's face, and he licked his lips around his cigarette, coolly leaning his head back toward the door to exhale through it. "Okay."

The woman didn't look completely sure of the word, glancing to a shrugging Coach before looking back with raised brows. "Okay?" she echoed.

So Nick repeated it. Slowly. Turning his head just enough to shoot a bland look at her from one half-lidded eye. "Ohh. Kuuh. Haay. Want me to spell it?" But he flickered into a grin and let his arm fold up onto the top edge of the table, massaging his free hand over the slope of his shoulder. "It makes sense. I was driving down here to hit the gambling cruise trail. That's the kind of port I'd want to be on if I were trying to get found; popular and busy."

"Gamblin', huh?" the big man piped up, leaning his elbow on the armrest and his head on his hand. "You do gamblin' then?"

Nick snorted in a humored tone, lifting up that hand to tap his index finger against his lips in a 'shh' motion. "Leave me outta you three and your little bonding parties... there's nothing you need to know about me to get us through this."

Coach relented, just shaking his head and closing his eyes.. but Rochelle wasn't so quick, pushing a little with her bare feet on the couch to straighten up in her curl and eye him across the room.

"Why are you so against talking to us? Ellis thinks you're pissed at him, but I think you just don't want to open up. Christ, Nick. Look around you. Maybe you can loosen up a little?"

Nick realized again how tired he was. His muscles groaned a little in protest as he straightened up, and, crossing his arms against his bare chest, the conman took a sip of water and then moved back across the room to the kitchen. Ellis' shower shut off as he set the glass in the sink, that muffled singing finally shutting up.

"I am pissed at him... and also, no, I don't want to open up. Funny, you seem to have all this figured out already. Guess we can stop talking now."

He could hear her frustrated sigh at his continuing evasion, but still, she didn't give up. "Listen, suit, Ellis is a sweet boy and I'm gonna start getting really irritated if you keep being such a bitch to him - and the rest of us. If you don't want to open up, fine, but quit being so hostile. We don't have to deal with you."

Nick laughed, a rather sharp and sudden noise that had very little humor in it. He snapped his cigarette from between his lips and held it between two fingers, striding back out to the front room and pausing behind the couch. "No, you don't." he agreed, tone flat, and continuing on to the stairs.

He took them at an unbothered pace, almost ignoring the gruff, "Boy, what'ch'you doin'?" from Coach.. but he ended up responding offhandedly.

"Taking the bedroom. You guys can have a sleep-over down here. There's even a linen closet in the kitchen for you."

He'd just hit the top stair when Ellis came out of the bathroom. The kid had his hat in his hands, dark hair mussed and wild with the toweling he'd given it. He'd completely redressed, unlike Nick, but his skin was spotless. His bare arms were chilled to a trembling flush and flexed with the tough muscles of his worked biceps, and he was just tucking his shirt back into place so the conman got flashed with a strip of the bare tummy he'd accidentally pictured earlier.
The only thing that saved Nick, really, was the deep sense of exhaustion and irritation the argument with Rochelle had left him with. Even if he'd had the energy to recognize surge of… well, something, that threatened to flood him at the sight, he was just too agitated to deal with it.

Ellis' voice shook, half with surprise and half with the cold.

"O-oh, hey, Nic-

"Shut up."

Ellis was left just looking after him, a little uncertainly, as the gambler breezed past him and entered the single bedroom, shutting the door without even glancing over his shoulder.
Chapter 14

Once he shut the door behind himself, there was no going back... and unfortunately, Nick's trepidation to enter the bedroom earlier turned out to be well-founded. He felt uncomfortable and alone.

He could see the pictures on the dresser now, the low-hanging sun having lost its glint and settled into a dim orange. There were four of them, lined up in mismatched stand-up frames that went from a pretty wooden border to some heavy cardboard flowers-and-butterflies monstrosity. A red-haired woman in the snow - the same woman by some lake, posing in a one-piece bathing suit - her and a man a few years younger than her, their cheeks smashed together and their arms stretched up to hold the camera - and then a faded and cracked photo of a wedding, he could only guess her parents'.

Pulling his cigarette gently from his lips and flaring his nostrils to exhale his current lungful of smoke, the conman walked over toward them. For a moment he stood there, weight on his bare heels, eyes glancing over the photographs.

Then the discomfort overtook him and he bent in, flipping each one onto its face.

He felt the same way he always did during his flings with whatever woman he picked up. Always the same routine - back to her place, drinks on the couch, light petting, ... heavy petting... and then she'd scamper to the bedroom, coyly say she needed to "freshen up," disappear into the bathroom, and leave him to stand there in her bedroom for nigh-on an eternity.

Teasing her was one thing. Drawing out the foreplay till she was begging him was one thing.
Standing there in a quiet room, just... waiting... it'd always set him on edge. So he'd pace the room, silently, and the signs of her well-worn existence in the room slowly became strange and jarring.

At least she usually came back out in some skimpy getup or - better yet - nothing at all.

This time, there was no woman a room away - she was probably dead. Maybe Nick had even killed her. There was nothing to eventually deliver him from this state of alien insecurity. There wasn't even anything going to happen that he could leave after it was done, no sleeping body to abandon.
He'd shut himself in and that was where he'd stay.

His lips parted to sink his cigarette back between them, sucking a long breath in and watching the stub left spark up into an orange glow. He let his eyes half-close and quietly walked to the bed, tossing aside the blue-quilted sheets to settle into a sitting position on the edge. His eyes closed fully then, and he leaned forward to rest his elbows on his knees, bare torso arched in a tired slump and cigarette dangling from his lips.

Nick was pretty sure it had been an unforgivably asinine thing to do, taking the bedroom. Rochelle should have gotten the isolated room, being the only woman.. Coach should've taken it, rather than camping out on a couch or the floor with his apparently fucked knee. Ellis - well, no, he was the only one of them who didn't need it, but still.

Ellis.

There was a problem.

It wasn't his first time seeing a man in a less-than-innocent light. There had been four incidents in his lifetime, although only two of them had involved actual sex... only one of them had been someone he'd actually known for more than a day or two previous... and most of them had involved anywhere from some to a lot of alcohol.

Most of them hadn't so much as heard from him afterward - though that was usually how he treated women, too.

He'd learned to avoid putting himself in a position to even risk it, which had left him with few close male acquaintances. (His 'gambling buddies' of the past were, after all, not in the slightest his friends. Gambling did that to people.) Although, to be fair, it was probably low on the list of reasons he didn't have many friends.

He blamed it on stress... stress and his addictive, generally selfish nature. One had been an accident a long time ago, one a drunken encounter in a bar, one a release of mind-numbing frustration when he'd nearly completely ruined himself in a bad gambling run, and the last a stupid mistake sprouting from the crash-and-burn ending of his first and only marriage.

He'd regretted all of them after the fact, even if he'd been unable to deny his hand in each. The slips frustrated him, he who felt so in control over his addictions. He gambled, smoked, drank, and chased skirts because he wanted to do those things. Addicted or not, he chose to fall prey to them. They only held sway over him because he let them.

Ellis, however, was creeping into his head and he couldn't stop him. All of those handful of men had, for one reason or another - sudden, burning urges that inexplicably refused to leave him alone. Indulging it had been the only way to shut it up, and being at the mercy of it like that drove Nick insane.

This time, he couldn't even let himself just go after the kid and then leave. He was stuck with Ellis, unless he decided to abandon the group entirely, and considering their current plan involved a good few days of travel...

He was getting the creeping feeling that he'd have been dead already without the troupe downstairs, much as it pained him to admit. Leaving them wasn't an option, not with weird creatures that could leap at you in a flash or grab you up and choke you out with a thick tentacle.

He'd just have to buck up. It was the least of the sacrifices to be made in an apocalypse, he hoped.

Sighing significantly when he was suddenly broken from his thoughts by a too-warm sensation on his lower lip, Nick finally straightened up from where he sat, feeling something pop at the bottom of his spine. His cigarette was burning down low and about to start burning him. Plucking it free with careful fingertips, he leaned over and mashed it out on the bedside table, just barely able to see its outline with how dark it had gotten.

Wiping his hand on his thigh, he shifted to pull his legs up onto the bed, dropping his head onto the pillow and letting his eyes drift half-shut without bothering to draw the sheets over himself. It was too hot already.

The smallest of grunts escaped him as he let his weight shift into a comfortable lounge, though not even that really helped - he could tell already his mind wasn't ready to settle down. It was like a buzzing in the back of his skull, this constant ringing, and he'd dealt with it enough to know it wasn't the innocent kind of restlessness.

Ah, tits. It was that moron coming out of the shower that did it...

He regretted the thought instantly - all it did was mire him in recalling the little flash granted to him. The casual tan that suffused the hick with a tangible warmth... the shaped curves defining his... the swell of one hip protesting against his overalls... the line of dark hair that flecked its way down from his bellybutton...

A small puff of interest escaped his nostrils and his lips curled in a sullen moue, shifting to curl an arm under his head and nestle against his forearm, minding the bandage still taped to his neck. Jacking off probably isn't going to help much.

Logic didn't make much a difference to the buzzing at the back of his head. As pleasant a distraction it would be from the zombie apocalypse, that did bring up a concern... was he going to be able to rein it in, or would Ellis turn into some constant frustration eating away at him?

Stress was uniquely damaging to his self-control, and it wasn't like the stress was going to let up anytime soon.

Idly, the gambler drifted a hand down and stroked fingertips along his stomach, curling them to mock a faint scratch along the sensitive stretch of his abdomen. The pleasant tingling brought his eyes to a close, keeping the touch teasingly light.

Curling his tongue absently against the roof of his mouth, he made some kind of effort to keep his mind blank - but as he gave in to sinking his fingers underneath the pinch of his belted slacks, rubbing down the growing bulge in the confines of his boxers, he could do little to stem the flicker of thoughts spurring him on.

A soft huff parted his lips, expression growing serious to the whim of his mind's eye. Memories blurred with fantasy - he could imagine the kid's mouth, harsh stubble and damp lips. Could smell the dizzyingly harsh twang of male arousal as he was pinned to the edge of a table, both of them struggling for dominance. Feel the hard lust under the constriction of unwanted jeans. Hear the rough pant of a moan, unstifled and demanding, twisting into a faint growl.

It was always so angry... this fit of passion, this fight, fierce but mutual craving. It was that clash of testosterone that drew his frustrated desire, and just imagining Ellis' taut, strong frame wrestling against his was enough to drive him nuts.

The gambler arched his back just enough to shift his weight, pulling his hand free with a slight hum. After tugging the two rings on that hand off with his teeth and shoving them in a pocket, he unbuckled his belt, struggling both with a sense of impatience and the feat of getting it undone onehanded.

Nick didn't even bother opening his eyes, uninterested in breaking the almost tactile sense of his fantasizing. He just pulled himself free of slacks and boxers, barely lifting his hips to manage the motion, and found his breath shortened into pants as his fingers brushed against his erection.

Humming faintly as he gripped his other hand's fingers onto the back of his head, digging nails against the nape of his neck, the gambler coiled now wet fingers around his hard-on, squeezing up it with a small twist of his wrist in a mercilessly tight lubing motion. It made him squirm, though little more than a huff escaped him, and from there all pretense of teasing evaporated.

Slick with his own saliva, the conman pumped himself with quick and tight motions, muscles suddenly tensing up all over his abdomen and thighs as the action sent flutters of lust through his limbs and brought sweat flecking up onto his skin.

"Ah, shit.." he managed just faintly, one eye twitching open and body suddenly shifting tensely, curled fingers burying deeper against his scalp with the rising tension. He let his fingers spread and tighten in their tugging motions, trying to urge his orgasm on.

A faint growl flickered past his lips, tipping his chin up at the sudden thought of those hard-working, calloused hands he'd felt on his shoulder going through the same motion as his own was.

That and a particularly merciless flick of his wrist tipped him over, and a harsh breath rolled over his tongue, so close to a moan it clenched at his throat. His hips bucked up in reflex to the abrupt wave of pleasure.

His palm quickly squeezed over the top of his erection, rocking his hips rather lazily into his own hand as he came, the clenching pressure of his orgasm making his whole body heavy. It ebbed slowly, blood pulsing along his skin, and with a rather indelicate motion that made him shudder, the gambler squeezed his cupped fingers to urge the last drops free and take the last few twinges of pleasure out of it.

A harsh breath peeled from his lips, shuddering faintly as he licked them, shifting his weight when he realized his sweat had caused his bare back stick to the sheets. His hand, sticky with semen, drifted up a bit and curled its fingers. He let his head tip to glance over it, and with a simple Ah, screw it. he tossed his arm to the side and unceremoniously wiped his hand clean on the side of the mattress.

Lazily rolling himself onto his side, the conman groaned slightly in self-protest. His body was over-sensitive and hot, and it was rather regretfully that he forced himself to lift up his hips and pull his boxers and slacks back into place. The brush of the fabric made him suck in a slight breath of discomfort, relaxing quickly after he'd managed it.

He took rebuckling his belt slowly, humming softly to himself in appreciation. The lazy afterglow made his thoughts come a little easier, stress eased all over and lust sated - for the moment.

Not used to doing that with a guy in my head... I should probably have more problems with this but - fuck it, that was good...

Nick let out another half-sigh of a noise, but for some reason found that one tilting into a laugh at the end. Not even the day he'd had could ruin his libido. He pulled his arm out from under his head, catching the pillow with a quick grip and dragging it down to his chest. His eyes shut as his arms wrapped around it, burying half of his face against the fabric and curling his legs up to settle down against the sheets.

He'd rarely had time to think before, not when it came to this. It had usually been far too sudden to even try putting reason to the situation - it hadn't even been his decision that two of his past forays had balked before actual fucking. Given the freedom, he probably wouldn't have stopped short.

It didn't matter, anyway. They were in the Deep South - if anything, his best call would probably be to outright confess to the kid. Scare him good, save us both the trouble. He chuckled a little, the thought somehow cathartic.

Maybe he just liked the idea of regaining control.
Nick awoke with a jolt, clutching instantly around the pillow he had embraced flat to his body. It was that startling sensation of falling and hitting the mattress, where no amount of focused reflection could determine if the dreamer had actually dropped a few inches onto the bed, or simply flopped up like a fish in protest of the abrupt break from sleep.

He quickly sat up, pillow folding under the pressure of his arms, disoriented in that instant of morning confusion. For just a moment, he'd completely forgotten everything. He looked around himself at the pink-and-orange sunlight washed - and utterly unfamiliar - bedroom, a sleepy mumble spilling from him. "Where the shit-"

And then the fog lifted, and with a small grumble protesting his consciousness in the obviously early hours of the morning, the conman leaned forward and rubbed slowly at his face with his palm, clearing the sleep from his eyes.

He'd had a dream... but now he couldn't remember it. Just a voice, faint and incoherent, and fading fast in his memory even though it felt like it had just happened.

"......Nick?" It was Ellis' drawl, coming from the other side of the closed door, the hesitant raising of his voice indicating to the gambler it wasn't the first time he'd called out for him.

"Or maybe not a dream.

"Yeah, yeah, I'm up." he shot back, sighing slightly as he pawed the pillow off his chest and curled his arms up behind his head to stretch, ribs clenching and stomach going tight as the motion sent waves of appreciative tension up his back. It sent pain through different parts of his body, sure, but he took the compromise.

"We gotta get goin' here soon, Nick. Coach 'n Ro' are wakin' up too. I found some cereal, 'cept the milk was all warm 'n' the fridge's probably been dead fer.. I dunno, awhile.. so... I thought you wouldn't want none of it. Keith drank reeeally sour milk once, 'n he got so sick the doctor said he coulda died. Well, he didn't, but man, he was ill just lookin' at cows fer like a year after... so yeah. Dry cereal."

Nick's mouth opened, then shut, and he found a sigh crossing over his lips, musing on how Ellis had been so utterly silent in his fantasies the night before. Settling down from his stretch and checking on the loosening bandage attached to his neck with gentle fingers, he spoke up to invite the kid in.

"Alright. C'mon in, then." He shouldn't have done it... it was a stupid thing, but he felt at ease after the night before and so convinced he'd found a way to beat that demon, that all he really cared about was getting some food.

He was starving.

His slacked legs pushed off the edge of the bed, sitting him comfortably at an angle and letting him lean back onto his palms lazily.

... at which point nothing happened. There was a somewhat awkward silence from the door, though Nick noticed with a lifting brow that he could see the shadows of the Georgian's boots through the bottom crack of the door, indicating he was still there.
There was a clinked thud like ceramic against wood, and after another moment of silence that Nick made no effort to break, Ellis finally spoke up again, audibly chagrined. "Well, Nick, I would, but I only got two hands 'n' I got two bowls, so, uhh..."

The conman couldn't help it. He cracked a smirk, the curl rather cruel with its humor, realizing Ellis' situation and also the implication of his having two bowls. "Coming. Don't over-work your little brain, Overalls, Nick's here to handle all those tough jobs. We wouldn't want you break a nail trying to get a door open." he quipped sarcastically, pushing up to his feet and padding over to the door. He reached one hand into his pocket, fingers catching onto the two rings he'd stuffed there last night to free his hand.

Nick pulled the door open with them in his palm, smirking with darkly narrowed eyes at the hick on the other side. He swore for an instant that, underneath the bill of his blue-and-white cap, those blue eyes twitched down to his bare upper body - but the utterly innocent way they promptly tipped up to evenly meet his made him regret even noticing it. The gambler's hands turned, and he wormed the rings back onto their appropriate fingers, flexing them against the familiar weight.

"Gosh, Nick. You woke up spittin' fire." He grinned, that stupid look he flashed so often, and the conman crossed his arms over his chest, leaning his shoulder against the doorframe. Though the smirk had disappeared in a flash at the hick's words, Nick's expression settled into a smooth look rather than a scowl.

"I don't like mornings... so, what induced you to think I'd want to eat breakfast with you?"

The mechanic immediately sputtered, shooting an incredulous glance between the bowls of cereal he cradled in either hand, like he thought they'd tattled on him. "W-well..." But he'd been caught, so with a small, guilty sigh, he finished, "You been actin' all pissed at me since we met, so's I thought I'd try'n catch a word or two with yuh over breakfast, figure out what I done wrong.."

Nick's jaw tightened a bit, drawing this roll of the eyes from him.

If he wasn't so fuckin' naive I might be able to stand him better. Why is he so goddamn convinced we have to be friends? Without a word Nick snatched one bowl up from Ellis' hand, the kid gawking a bit as the gambler sent a fairly irritated look his way and turned about to saunter back to the bed, dropping down onto the edge.

He didn't look up when Ellis just stood there in the open doorway, totally unsure of what to do. Nick wasn't going to take pity on him and tell him to come sit; Ellis would just have to figure it out for himself. He just swirled up the spoon implanted in the bowl of crisp, sugary little flakes, and took the first crunching mouthful.

The sweet taste wasn't his favorite this early in the morning, but he was definitely hungry. He'd just swallowed and made for a second spoonful when Ellis cleared his throat a little, raising his free hand to clamp onto the top of his cap like he was just about to leap off a bridge, and scuttled into the room.

"I saw yer shirt while I was takin' muh shower last night... it looked real good... Figure you didn't use no vinegar but it worked anyhow. Ohh, 'n how's yer neck?" That grin flashed up, effortlessly amicable, and Nick glanced up with a raised brow as the younger man dropped down to sit crosslegged on the floor a few feet in front of him, pulling his bowl up by his mouth so he could use his spoon more like a shovel.

The conman stared just a little, startled more by his own overpowering interest than the actual image itself, at the unexpected sight of those a-little-too-plump lips taking in the width of the spoon's head -
"My neck is perfectly goddamn fine... and I have a very shitty feeling this suit won't last long... look at you, after all. You're a mess, and you've only barely been in more trouble than I have. The whole suit'll be ruined by tonight at that rate."

Ellis grinned after rather roughly swallowing a slightly-too-large mouthful of cereal, illustrating his words with waves of his spoon. "Shit, man, I ain't that bad... yer exaggeratin'..." He tossed his utensil into the bowl, using his freed hand to pull his shirt down a bit and get a better look at it, twisting his head slightly.

The conman smirked a bit more, leaning forward over the bowl in his lap to gesture with the end of his spoon over the worst of the weirdly tinted splotches that had long since dried into the fabric. "Yeah? So this kind of mess is just normal for you? What, do you sleep with the hogs?" He mocked a little southern twang there, ribbing on Ellis and entertaining himself a little more than he meant to. "And.. I dunno.. radioactive sewage?"

Ellis gave a laughing snort, smacking at his dirty 'Bullshifters' shirt with his palm and shaking his head in disagreement. "S'just a few li'l stains! Whut'ch'you expect, killin' zombies? That's messy shit, man!"

Nick's gaze focused more upwards, narrowing on the hick's turned away face in something a lot like curiosity. He dug up a spoonful of flakes, hovering it before his mouth a moment. He said rather evenly, "You're a weird-ass kid, Overalls.", before snapping teeth down on the utensil and scraping them back. He simply chewed a moment while Ellis seemed to try and understand what he meant without asking.

That peach-fuzzed face scrunched up a bit, nose crinkling, a motion that pinched at the wound across the bridge of it. The thought was so tangible, and the face so stupidly innocent, Nick cracked this stifled snort, lips curling as he swallowed.

It was pretty clear he was being made fun of, but Ellis either didn't notice or didn't care, as his voice was light and questioning when he gave up and chirped, "What's that s'posed to mean, Nick?"

The gambler released a sigh, swirling his spoon in the dry, rustling cereal as he rolled his tongue over his teeth. He must've been twenty three or even four, but he was so kiddish Nick would've thought him younger - if it hadn't've been for that body of his, anyway.

"You don't seem all that upset about the, y'know, rampaging sickness that's killed who-the-hell-knows how many people. In fact, I'm getting the feeling you're enjoying it. You might be an outright nutcase."
The mechanic scrunched up his face again, this time in protest, straightening up a bit to shake his head slowly with an overly solemn look. "Well, Nick, no offense, but them things out there ain't really people no more.. yuh heard Ro. A'sides, I've watched all them zombie movies. They're already dead, man, and every time you think they ain't 'n' try tuh reason with 'em, they bite yer arm off."

Sure enough, and to Nick's chagrin, that dumb grin came back promptly. Ellis popped a spoonful of cereal into his mouth like he was particularly proud of his speech, tacking on through his mouthful and behind a politely shielding forearm, "Ain't no sense gettin' upset 'bout it, we'll get out fine.. 'Sides, it's fuckin' cool! 'Zombies ain't real,' my ass."

Nick gave the slightest of sighs, twisting his spoon in his cereal and giving Ellis a focused stare that the kid didn't notice as he shoveled down more of his own, crunching audibly. It.. made sense, sort of. And something, though it was nothing Ellis said or any vibe he gave off, made Nick lose interest in breaking his neat, content bubble of logic.

He wasn't a nutcase; he was a kid, with his own reasons not to feel guilty - and self-comfort not to feel scared. As much as Nick delighted in torturing him, he just didn't see the appeal in arguing. So he moved the subject elsewhere, digging up a spoonful of cereal as he did so. He didn't really register at the time that he was encouraging conversation.

"Rochelle told me the plan. You think it'll work - heading to the coast? I'm not exactly happy to be stuck with you three for another few goddamn days, but I know shit-all about this stupid backwater edge of the country."

Ellis visibly brightened (not that he'd been particularly somber before) at the question, tossing up his spoon-wielding hand and spilling most of it off to the side without even noticing. "Hell yeah! We'll cruise there like pros, Nick, you'll see.. Ro's real smart 'n' she got the plan all figured out - Coach 'n I live here so we got the travelin' down. Plus, I love the beach! I mean I ain't really gone tuh the beach recently, but.. y'know. Keith'n'-"

It was hardly the first time he'd been interrupted, but it was the first time he was interrupted with an actual question. Nick was borderline scowling when he asked it, outright exasperated.

"Okay, once and for all, who the fuck is Keith?"

The immediate, beaming grin that burst across Ellis' face made the gambler groan softly under his breath, already regretting the question. He bent his head down and nibbled on another spoonful of cereal, practically feeling the buffeting of Ellis' emphatic response.

"Oh, man, he's like muh best buddy ever! Muh mama says we was babies together, 'cause we met when we was reeeeeally tiny - well, really our mamas met, but we played together 'n' shit cause of that, y'know - but I always thought that sounded weird - but anyway, he's the goddamn coolest. He does all this crazy awesome shit 'cause he ain't got no sense, like he jumped a fence when he was just a kid but got foot caught on the- ohoh, or when he tried tuh make a bandage outta leaves 'cause he cut his knee on this nail crawlin' on a roof, but he - wait, no, I gotta better one - he tried tuh SWALLOW a BATH PLUG 'cause he was tired of pissin' - well it didn't work, duh - well unless you count gettin' hooked up to onna those pissin' tubes 'cause he got put in the hospital fer like a week 'n his guts were all fucked up... man, that shit was sad. Guess he did pull it off fer a while... Oh, but when he got it OUT-"

It was like he'd broken a pipe on the inside, and out came the words, spilling in senseless streams in all directions. He couldn't control himself, quite nearly exploding with the apparent excitement behind the subject, and Nick made a mental note.

Never.. fucking.. ask him.. about Keith.. ever.

All he could do was straighten up and half-shout over the hick's voice, shutting him up with the severity of his tone. "Jesus Christ, Overalls, okay! I get it! He's your maniac friend! Don't need the full encyclopedic version..."

Ellis seemed a little surprised by his interruption - although it was almost a surprise at his voice at all, like the Georgian had completely forgotten about Nick's existence in the room. He flustered slightly, lifting his spoon-wielding hand (he hadn't even noticed that he'd dumped his spoonful of cereal on the carpeting beside his crossed legs) and adjusting his cap with a knuckle.

The little fluster of color to his face settled on Nick's mind like water to a burning stovetop; with a tangible sizzle of interest, he felt his irritation steaming slowly off him until he settled into a one-sided smirk.

The conman pushed the bowl of cereal off his lap and onto the bed, prying his cigarette pack and matches from his slacks' pocket, ignoring Ellis as he tapped out a cigarette and slipped the filter between his lips. It was almost instinctual, as if nicotine could dull any other urges he was feeling.

He started to strike the match, pausing and twisting green eyes toward the open door when he heard Rochelle's voice suddenly rise up the stairs.

"Ellis, honey, is Nick yelling at you again?"

His gaze flicked to the mechanic, eyeing him impassively as his fingers moved again, striking the match and lifting the flame up to light the tip of his cigarette. All he did was arch a brow vaguely, and Ellis ducked his head to shadow his face under the bill of his cap, hiding his embarrassed expression from the gambler.

Seeing his silence as clear indication Ellis would've said 'yes' to that, Nick spoke up for him. His voice was coolly sarcastic, just loud enough to be heard downstairs while not sullying its faux-apathy with a shouting tone. "Yeah, doll. Mean ol' Nick is making the little Georgia peach cry."

Nick was just shaking the match to douse it and inhaling the first tickle of half-burning nicotine and tar when Ellis' head suddenly lifted, a rather thoughtful look scrunching up his nose again. The conman lifted his brows at the change, raising a hand to touch fingertips to his cigarette with an almost feathery touch, steadying it as he sighed out a calm breath of hot smoke.

"What, Overalls?" He said it as he stood up, stowing the rest of the cigarettes and matches back in his pocket and quirking a demanding look down at the mechanic sitting just a foot or two in front of him.

Ellis squinted up at him, then let his expression melt into a grin, packing down a final bite of cereal before he let his spoon clink down into the bowl and tossed the thing aside. He leaned in a bit, making Nick's fingers suddenly clamp onto his cigarette as it occurred to him he was far too perfectly aligned with the conman's crotch.

Ellis was looking straight up at him, eyes tipped up and focused. The fact that he was a bare few feet from Nick's pelvis didn't register in the slightest. Of course he's goddamn oblivious...

"Actually, Nick," the mechanic retorted in a low voice, something like a whisper but nowhere near as quiet. He looked like a guy who'd won something. "I'm thinkin' my plan worked. Yer bein' kinda nicer tuh me!"
The gambler, unable to relax his fingers with Ellis placed so suggestively in front of him, struggled not to glance at that full-lipped grin and have his mind go ... 'there.' He was just sure he'd lose it. He couldn't trust himself, that much was apparent.

And then they heard it: "Uh..."

Neither of them had suspected a thing. Not heard a sound or even felt the slightest sense of anyone approaching - but both of them whipped their heads around at that single, awkward syllable, and there was Rochelle in the doorway. She stood with one hand lifted to the frame, blinking brown eyes with obvious confusion at the scene.

Nick, shirtless and standing at a rigid attention... Ellis, propped forward in his sit on the ground - barely one shift of his position away from being on his knees in those stupid overalls...

Rochelle - not so oblivious.

It was some freak stroke of luck that she looked toward Ellis first. Nick was almost certain his face had some lusty expression plastered all over it that no sane person would miss - but when Rochelle saw the completely innocuous, happily triumphant grin Ellis gladly turned toward her, she relaxed.

"Hey sweetie, hey suit. Is he actually being mean, Ellis? I'll whoop him one, break him into shape."

Nick could've collapsed with relief at the bullet he'd dodged. He honestly didn't know how he would've reacted if she'd looked at him first. Balked, probably - and then Ellis would've been confused too... and shit if he wanted to be the focus of both of them.

Taking advantage of their distraction, Nick sidestepped to get some distance between Ellis and himself, snapping out a reflexive retort at Rochelle. "You lost your shot at that when you turned me down, doll."

It worked precisely how he liked, startling her just enough to force anything else out of her head without completely pissing her off. She got a hand to her hip, shaking her head at him in distaste and apparently deciding against gratifying him with a response.

He was okay with that. Ellis got the chance to actually answer her, widening his grin and scrambling up to his feet. "Naww, he just don't like wakin' up this early. Bet we'll be best buds later today!"

Turning half away from them and cupping his hand over his cigarette slightly, bending in toward it, he grumbled a short "Don't count on it, killer." and then absorbed himself in taking a slow, calming inhale off the thing.

Rochelle rolled her eyes at his bare, hunched back, beckoning Ellis as she took a slight step back. "It'll be later today pretty soon if we don't get going... come on, Ellis, we should help Coach try and pick what we can from the kitchen. Nick needs to get dressed."

"Awh, okay, Ro'. Sorry, I didn't mean tuh waste time, s'just we was talkin'."

He obediently trotted over to her, and Rochelle sent a small glance toward Nick, one slightly dubious, as her hand guided Ellis by the shoulder past her. Her head shook, letting off a helpless sigh and turning to catch back up with the younger man.

Nick could hear him start up talking, his voice buzzing as it echoed up the stairs, but the gambler didn't even try to pay attention. He rubbed his forehead with his wrist, forcing a rather frustrated grind of his teeth and abruptly pulling his cigarette from his lips, mashing it out on the footboard of the bed. The smoke was just giving him a tight feeling in his abdomen as it licked at his throat, not quite nausea but close.

Okay... so no, last night didn't help. Well... tits. If I can't last ten minutes talking to him without nearly popping a vein trying not to grab the back of his head and - Jesus, Nicolas, just shut up!

Pushing his hands into the pockets of his slacks and quite nearly growling at himself, he left the room to duck toward the bathroom and grab his shirt and jacket, eager to get fully dressed and try to force his mind to focus on business.

Going through the monotonous and familiar routine of buttoning the blue dress shirt over his chest (leaving, out of habit, the top one undone), Nick found himself staring wearily at his own reflection in the mirror, shadowy in the bare illumination from borrowed light that touched the tiled room.

If I didn't think Coach would wring my neck I'd just stare at Ro's ass all day.

Nick wasn't sure why that sounded like a joke.
The hum of conversation downstairs sharpened into focus as Nick took the first few steps of the staircase, and he wasn't surprised in the least to find Ellis’ voice the only one doing any talking. "...he didn't even see that shit comin'! I mean, we thought the nest was abandoned! Keith'd JUST gotten up tuh the top of the tree 'n this fuckin' HAWK - oh, hey, Nick!"

The guy broke off instantly when he saw Nick stepping into the main room of the house, flashing him a grin from his place across the room. Rochelle and Coach were, at first glance, nowhere to be found, with Ellis knelt down and in the middle of folding up a pile of blankets.

From what Nick could tell, he was packing up the sleeping arrangements the three had managed the night before. The conman lifted a brow in a slightly scoffing motion as he noted that Ellis was actually taking focused care to line up all the edges with each halving fold, something entirely too... neat... for Nick to have believed had he not seen it.

He finally gave the mechanic a nod in response to the greeting, not yet calmed enough from earlier to convince himself to risk walking much closer than the couch. He worked one hand into his pocket, the other curling on the sofa and flexing its fingers as he settled down into a lounge against it.

Making me nervous now. Damnit.

Glancing around the room with a small amount of confusion, both at not seeing Coach or Rochelle and at Ellis' work, he rolled his shoulder in its socket till it popped and questioned, "Where'd they go?"

Ellis jabbed up a thumb at the mostly-closed kitchen door, explaining cheerily, "We found some canned shit in there, but Coach wanted me tuh clean up here afore we left. Least we can do! Fer... well, whoever lives here."

A sly grin rose up onto Nick's features, the humor relaxing a few muscles he hadn't noticed had been tense. Ellis was probably utterly oblivious to it, but Nick saw straight through the ruse -they'd been trying to get him to go do something else (useless, even, considering the owner of the house was likely dead) so they might dodge his constant chatter.

Hypocrites. Least I'm honest.

"Oh, yeah. I'm sure she'll be really eager to thank us, right after she finishes tearing out our eyes and gnawing off our limbs. Yep. ... maybe honest to a fault. Nick smirked narrowly across the room at the kid, unfazed as he got a particularly crinkled look of distaste.

"That's nasty, Nick."

Ellis pawed off his hat and rubbed at his scalp after dropping the last blanket into the folded pile he'd made, grunting and hopping up to his feet. He stretched once there, flopping his forearm behind his neck and getting a good scratch between his shoulderblades. "Sides, what with all four of us lookin' out now, ain't no way none of those zombies are gettin' the best of us. We -"

The conman quickly interrupted him, lifting up a hand to wave him into silence with no small chastisement. "Christ, you dumbshit. Are you trying to jinx us? The minute you say that it'll all go wrong." He crossed his arms over his chest, settling his hip against the edge of the couch instead and staring severely at the mechanic.

Ellis blinked a bit in surprise, his over-expressive face scrunching up while he tugged his cap back into place. "Yuh superstitious, Nick?" He gripped the knot of his overalls with both hands, leaning his weight back onto his heels and rocking idly - although he did look fairly chagrined, like he'd accidentally insulted the older man. "I wouldn'tuh pegged you fer that."

Nick half-sighed, relaxing some of his expression and giving a shrug. He glanced around the room to figure out where the three had stashed the weapons overnight, noticing them set up beside the coffee table that still blocked the door. He headed for them, noting Ellis trudging up to follow at his heels.

"You get pretty cautious of luck when you depend on it." was his vaguely-phrased response, drawing a hum of thought from the kid behind him. Nick dropped down to a crouch to pull his machine gun from the wall, checking it over cautiously.

"What'chya mean by that, Nick? I guess my buddy Keith is real lucky, what with how many times he coulda gone 'n killed himself doin' crazy shit, but yuh don't seem like.. uhh.. well, that probably ain't how yuh meant it."

Ellis stood just by his elbow, tagging close like an awestruck puppy. Nick was beginning to wish he'd been crueler that morning, though maybe he was screwed either way - if he chased him off, he'd just pull some more breakfast-in-bed bullshit.. if he gave up, he'd think they were buddies.

Of course, Nick also hadn't really tried to break him yet. He'd practically been nice to the hick from the start. It was a thought - but Nick put it off, aware the responding rage from Rochelle and Coach (who both seemed instantly fond of Ellis) would make the rest of their time together a living hell.

"You ever gamble, hayseed?" Nick tossed the shoulderstrap of his gun over his arm, noticing that his Magnum had actually been stuffed against the wall behind the butt of the machine gun, still in its sheath. He'd left it in the bathroom...

Goddamn thing is pretty much empty, but.. eh.

Ellis instantly brightened, much like his 'oh I just thought of a story' face, pouncing on the perceived chance to connect with the conman. "Oh, yeah, man!" Nick was a little intrigued, although held silent to see where he was going before making any assumptions, shifting in his crouch to pick up his Magnum and strap it back on to his thigh. "Me'n Keith would go tuh the gas station every Wednesday. Never really won nothin', but man, it was fun!"

Brows raised suspiciously, Nick withheld a sigh and pushed up to stand, rubbing a knuckle across the bridge of his nose. "Gas station?" he echoed, feeling his jaw twitch with an impending smirk. He already figured where this was going.

"Yeah! We bought a buncha those scratch lottery tickets, used our birthdays.. guess we didn't have all that lucky of births!" Nick smacked his forehead into his palm lightly - the kid laughed obliviously, grabbing hold of the bill of his cap and tipping it down to hide his eyes like his joke embarrassed him.

"You play Bingo on Fridays, too..?" the conman asked dryly, smirking with a mean edge to it. His jibe, however, went over Ellis' head, who scrunched his brow slightly in incomprehension and drawled;

"Bingo ain't really gamblin', Nick..."
Nick was about to outright laugh in the Georgian's face when the kitchen door swung open, Coach's heavy frame traipsing through with Rochelle behind him. Judging by the plump shape of the backpack Coach was carrying, they'd found food to take with them.

"He's bullyin' you, son." the big man informed him sympathetically, locking gazes with Nick for a moment in challenge. Not that, nor Rochelle's accompanying hands-on-the-hips, seemed to even make a dent in Nick's humor. He cuffed his knuckles on his chin in a threatening motion, smirking all the while.

"Awwh, naaw. We're just playin', Coach, I don't mind it none." The youth grinned bashfully at the big man, utterly missing the silent threats ping-ponging over his head. "Keith makes fun'a me all the time, too. H-

Nick smoothly overrode him at that first sign of an impending ramble, hooking an arm casually over one of the outstretched legs of their door-blocking table and letting his body settle into a lazy curl. "What, I don't get any of this mommy-and-daddy routine? I'm hurt, really. I'm delicate and vulnerable too, you know."

His tone was condescending and mocking, instantly getting a rise out of Rochelle. She cocked a hip, incredulously spouting back, "How's he supposed to know you're mocking him? You're just being cruel."

Ellis stood where he was a bit hesitantly, half-spinning back and forth to look at both of them, grabbing onto his cap with both hands. "Uh.. hey, guys.."

"Sure." Nick murmured as a response, easily ignoring the hick's attempt to cut in. His lounge slackened, and green eyes locked salaciously with Rochelle's, narrowing as he lent a light mocking sarcasm to his voice. "But I'm not the only one doing that, am I?"

The hick hadn't given up yet, raising hands as he turned directly to Nick. His tone was practically pleading. "Nick, just drop it, huh? We -"

Rather than vocally interrupt him, the conman just swiped a hand up to snatch his cap right off his head and chuck it coolly across the room. As expected, Ellis yipped a bit in protest and darted after it, unwilling to risk losing it.

With the distance between them now clear, the tension jumped a notch - though Nick's frame lounged as casually as if he'd been sprawled in a hot tub, his eyes and mean smirk holding his hostility instead.

"Nick," Coach started, his scruffy, round jawline taut as he adopted a harsh but diplomatic tone, wide frame shifting. "bein' at odds ain't gonna do nothin' but cause us trouble down the road. You need to quit this shit and move on. None of us need yo' shit."

"My shit?" the conman echoed mockingly, smirk thinning into a sly curl. He lowered his voice to a cold hum, Ellis too far to hear as he dusted off his cap affectionately across the room. "I like your bait-and-switch there, Coach. Very nice. You skipped the part where you sent him out to do laundry because you couldn't stand him."

Coach stiffened up there, a motion that made Nick instantly snort in derision, lazily tossing a limp wrist in his direction that dismissed the argument. He'd won, not that that stopped them from protesting.

"That isn't fair, Nick.." Rochelle muttered, crossing her arms over her chest and letting her draping fingers pluck at the pink Depeche Mode shirt she wore. "We didn't insult him to his face and laugh because he's too sweet to realize it. We just -"

"Nope." Nick agreed, his tone uninterested and scathing as he pushed away from the table. His correction came with a heavy dose of distaste. "You did it behind his back."

It wasn't like Nick really cared. Mostly, he knew it was the easiest way to get under their skin. At least he could say he had been honest about how irritating the kid was. It wasn't his fault that Ellis didn't listen.

There was just enough of a beat of silence, both of the other two seeming frustrated but not retorting, to make Nick move on. He called over, bored, to Ellis, "Come on, Overalls, you're holding us up." and turned to get a grip on one of the table's legs.

The thing was heavy, but pushing it was easier than getting it set up, and he only gave a small grunt as he moved it away from the door. Coach made no motion that even suggested he might help, just eyeing the conman and eventually shaking his head.

There was a strange silence as Nick stepped out the door and looked around to get a quick grasp on the street and the zombie situation. There were a few too close for comfort, but he waited, just watching them while he waited impatiently beside the doorway for the other three to get out.

"Coach'n'I can probably get us outta town alright... I dunno, we might need a map or somethin' after that..."

Of course Ellis tried to prompt conversation, although it was at least on topic. Nick noticed that no one responded to him, and when the kid suddenly stepped through the doorway, tossing his shotgun onto his shoulder, the conman heard him sigh faintly.

It irritated him. The kid's head was down a little, and the guilty disappointment in his expression pissed Nick off. I wasn't even being that much of an asshole. If they'd just kept their noses out of it, it would've been fine, damnit.

That and it was a bit his fault, too. He could imagine a few scenarios where he pulled the argument off without involving Ellis at all. It was too late now, though, and Nick read Ellis like a book: he figured he was to blame for the friction.

Sulking Ellis would be no better than happy Ellis, Nick was pretty sure, so he threw him a bone. Reluctantly.

"Hey, stupid." Nick said sharply, watching the Georgian turn about to blink at him, eyes almost hidden underneath the bill of his cap. He had this leery, uncertain expression on, unsure of Nick's intentions, particularly considering his harsh tone.

"You're losing the contest."
Ellis bounced around like a brain-damaged chihuahua as the four survivors made their way down the street. He had his shotgun up and primed, taking absolutely every shot he could and giddily belting off his count - adding a rough estimate of what he figured he'd already gotten, which, although Nick found to be a bullshit high number, the conman didn't argue against. Particularly since he didn't care.

The friction, the guilt, the worry - it'd just popped like some fragile bubble on the wind, gone in an instant and with such a lack of fanfare that it was hard to even recall correctly. Had he really looked as upset as Nick's memory painted him? Even more importantly, did that mean Nick's attempt to push him out of it had been... unnecessary?

Considering it had bordered on self-sacrificial, giving the kid a reason to probably think them 'buddies,' the thought... pissed him off.

It didn't matter, though, and he told himself as much. At least the kid isn't whining anymore. he noted inwardly, sidling up to Rochelle and bending his head in toward her ear. She obviously hadn't expected it because she jumped at the first warm, tickling breath of his words on her ear, barely audible under the blasting of Ellis' shotgun.

"I don't see any sign of CEDA, do you?"

Recovering quickly, Rochelle avoided looking at his smug and vaguely suggestive smirk, focusing instead on inspecting the street and the sky, hoping for some sign of a flare or helicopter. There was nothing; just smoke from still-burning housefires. The Vannah hotel was visible down the street, and it had burned so fiercely all night that a good portion of the top had just collapsed into blackened wreckage that was still smoking.

She felt Coach's gaze on her and Nick, being a few feet away, but she passed him a smile to try and ease his obvious distrust. His scruffy, aged features didn't lose their judging edge, but he looked forward anyway.

"No, but let's do a circle around the hotel first... we have to at least try before we go off on our own."

The conman forced a sigh after he'd pulled his head back a little, rubbing a knuckle over the bridge of his nose and giving her a disparaging look that wiped away any hint of flirtation. "They've come through for us so much already, of course they'll just be right around the corner. Maybe with presents!"

Rochelle just shook her head at him, speeding up to walk next to Coach and get away from the gambler's insulting tone. With a smirk, Nick eased back, dropping one hand into his pocket and flexing his fingers on the still-cool metal of his machine gun's trigger.

The other three could've just stood there and traipsed on like they were taking a midday stroll with Ellis taking the zombies and them looking for any sign of their would-be rescuers. However, the moment Ellis realized Nick was relaxing into the concept of not doing anything, he loped back and, voice accusatorial, yelped: "Nick, you ain't even TRYIN'!"

Despite himself, the gambler bristled at the jeer, jabbing up his machine gun in a threatening manner, even if his finger was safely off the trigger.
"Hey, kiddo, I can shoot better than you in my sleep. I'm sure Pappy was proud when you finally got that beer-bottle on the farm fence, but us cityfolk have higher standards." His mocking Southern accent dripped off his words almost nasally, not mixing well with his sarcastic, clipped syntax.

It made Ellis break into laughter, clearly entertained and not taking Nick's insults seriously in the slightest. "C'mon, man, quit makin' excuses.. here, I'll make it easier on yuh... Fresh start, so's I ain't winnin' anymore." His grin widened, utterly amused.

Nick nearly blew a gasket at that. All Coach and Rochelle could do was stay back a few feet, watching with slightly uncertain attention.

"Fine, you sheep-humping redneck, you watch me kick your ass!" Jamming his machine gun into his shoulder and prying his previously pocketed hand up to steady it, he gave Ellis an absolutely venomous look - to which the Georgian whooped with glee. The kid turned back around and resumed his bouncing lope up the road, angling himself for a bunched up group of zombies that spun to attack him at the sound of his heavy footsteps.

He got one shot in, catching a zombie in the head just as they'd started to clamber over one of the parked cars that separated them... but right as he got his shotgun reloaded, Nick rammed his shoulder against Ellis'. He nearly bowled the slightly shorter man over, sending his aim wide and making him stumble.

"N-Nick!" he instantly complained, whipping around the moment he got his balance, watching with some disbelief as the conman pegged the other three with rapid spits of his machine gun.

"Three to one." Nick stated matter-of-factly, half-turning on his heel and giving Ellis an utterly deadpan brow-raise. He didn't look playful... not in the least. If anything, his expression was the seething surface of a pot of water just about to boil over.

"You fight dirty!" was the hick's response, still looking shocked, like he couldn't really believe what he'd seen. Nick simply narrowed his eyes at him, using the heel of one hand to wipe sweat off his brow.

"Yeah. Name's Nick. Nice to meet ya. Fight dirtier or go home."

The conman hadn't even had the chance to turn around and resume the path down the street before he felt Ellis whip past him, determined to get a head start. Unfortunately for him, Nick's reflexes were good, and he snapped out a foot to trip him.

As his workboot collided with Nick's heel and his momentum sent him tipping forward, Ellis managed to grip the conman's sleeve. With a growl of fury, Nick had to actually help him stop his fall and re-catch his balance just to avoid being dragged down himself. Ellis had just prepared a 'hah-hah' grin of triumph when his cap was smacked soundly from his head.

The kid had to scramble after it, and his distraction gave Nick the chance to take down the zombies they'd attracted in their scuffling. There were plenty crowding the hotel's surrounding roadway - the place must've been packed.

"Five to one. You're depressing me, Overalls!"

Rochelle found herself gawking as the two men practically wrestled their way down the street. Sure, Nick's expression was about two inches away from murderous - but they were fighting like schoolboys, tripping and shoving, only stopping to shoot down zombies as they reached them.
They kept up a surprising pace considering their constant struggling, darting across the street as they reached the corner of the Vannah.

Still not a sign of rescue... Aside from the hotel crumbling in on itself, so utterly ruined compared to the sparsely burning buildings that surrounded them, Rochelle couldn't help but wonder how it had started burning at all.

On purpose, maybe? Cutting their losses and trying to kill what zombies they could?

Ellis had just belted out a triumphant, "Eight tuh yer nine, I'm catchin' up!" when she felt Coach take her by the elbow with his large hand. She glanced up, smiling just a little. Ever since they'd crossed paths fleeing from the zombies, she'd seen more and more of her father in him, and she couldn't help but enjoy his presence. He didn't seem to mind.

"Nick was right, baby girl." he said to her in that gentle gruff he had, matter-of-fact and serious in its simplicity. He didn't need to say more; they'd both been stewing on the same thing.

"Yeah..." she agreed, eyes lighting up slightly as a heavy smattering of machine gun fire announced a hostile "Eight to my twelve, assclown." and frustrated "Hogwash!" from an Ellis who'd been completely prostrated by a particularly ruthless shove from the gambler.

A laugh escaped her as she watched Nick scoot quickly ahead while Ellis was still scrambling up from the asphalt, stifled by a tightened jaw, and she shook her head. "If I didn't know better, I'd almost say he was having fun... Ellis is really good with people, isn't he?"

"Ha! Thirteen, man!" "Fourteen, stupid." "GOSH DARNIT!"

Coach gave a small snort, squeezing her elbow before releasing it. "Anyone who can get through that Nick's thick head's got a real talent, fo' sho'." His eyes narrowed on a stray zombie - it had bolted out from an alley, but gotten up behind the other two and dodged their attention.

For whatever illness-twisted reason, it had instead wheeled about with a gargling snarl toward Coach and Rochelle.

The big man had his shotgun already primed, though, and the thing didn't get more than a few steps toward them before a blast to the abdomen sent it careening to the ground, cracking its head open and falling silent quickly, though it still twitched.

Hearing the shot, both Nick and Ellis twisted around to see, startled. Ellis had this concerned look, but Nick looked almost irritated. Both were panting heavily, exerted from their struggling, and in the moment of pause, Nick left himself think.

His adrenaline was too high, his pride too inflamed in the struggle to win the stupid contest he'd re-initiated. Nick hadn't meant to let the kid get him riled, but at least it was a distraction. And at least he was angry, instead of aroused. He turned to glance around them, getting his bearings.

Nick realized belatedly he hadn't kept track at all of where they'd been going. The idea that Ellis had been leading them... did not please him. Coach and Rochelle caught up to them, and the gambler noticed that both of them looked to have regained some humor. Coach caught his eye in that instant, and the big man gave him a curt nod.

It felt like an apology, or something, but Coach didn't look long enough to even give Nick the option of returning or not returning it. He looked away too fast. Nick just smirked.

"Sorry, we goin' too fast, guys? We kinda.. got intuh it." Ellis apologized, pawing off his cap to fan Rolling his eyes slightly, Nick swiped his hand over his mouth and carefully forced his breath into a normal pace, lungs stinging slightly as he tried to look more composed than the younger man. "You wouldn't stop goddamn running. What was I supposed to do? Stand there with my thumb up my ass?"

"It's fine, boys," Rochelle interjected quickly, expression breaking into a grin despite herself. "It's fine. Let's just focus on looking around until we know for sure there's nobody nearby, though, okay? It's not looking promising so far but.. let's try. Who's winning?"

"Me." they both said in unison, instantly whipping around to eye each other - as was turning out to be usual for them, Nick with irritation and Ellis with a growing grin. Rochelle was already breaking down into laughter again before they even started.

"I got one more after my last call, that makes fifteen." Nick pointed out severely, shoulders raising like the hackles of a cat.. although something about the game he was participating in made it.. hard to take his hostility seriously.

Judging by the way he shot a glare at Rochelle - and then Coach, who was giving a gruff chuckle of his own - Nick didn't appreciate that concept.

"Yeah, I got two after that, so I'm at fifteen too. Look'it that!" Ellis outright laughed, smacking his thigh and then tipping his hat in appreciation. "We tied. How cool!"

He'd just gotten the words out when a high pitched squealing noise, like the gurgled scream of a baby, suddenly cut through the air. It was hair-raisingly uncomfortable to listen to, hitting just the right note to hurt the ear. All four of them shot straight where they stood, darting looks between the others.

Nick half-jokingly asserted, "That sure as fuck wasn't me." Ellis laughed rather nervously at the statement, tipping his cap back on his head to peer around the street and subconsciously sidestepping so he was back-to-back - a few feet between them - with the conman.

Rochelle bit her lower lip in thought, letting her head roll back and trying to think. "Uh... if.. it's making that kind of sound, I think.. I'm sorry, it's been like two days..

The conman's voice rose and got irritated, starting to ask it again, "Wh-", but another one of those squeals shut him up for a moment before he shifted into a growled, "...fucking creepy. Can we get off the shitting middle of the street?"

"Yeeah, uhh.." Ellis started... but he didn't finish his sentence before Rochelle blurted frantically, "Spitter! It's a spitter, they spew some kind of acid, and -"

As if on cue, something gave a throaty, snorting gurgle, like a sick person readying to hack up phlegm. Something blindingly green flashed in a window of the building just beside them, making Ellis yipe as he was the first to see it. Coach, in that instinctive bark of decision that made his name appropriate, shouted, "GET OUT THE WAY!" and just dragged Rochelle toward the sidewalk under his arm like she were no heavier than a football.

Something flew out of the window, too fast to really track with his eyes, and Nick saw a sudden splash of this acridly bright green, watery substance hit the ground just a bare foot away. It splattered, spreading, popping and bubbling like some living creature, and a hissing sizzle struck the air.

"Jesus Christ!" Nick snarled in disbelief, darting backward to get away from the rapidly spreading liquid. A gunshot rang out, and though he didn't catch what it was aiming for or who it came from, an eerie shrieking gargle made him wonder if one of the others had caught the 'Spitter' with a shot.

Drops had hit him from the impact, and though it didn't seem to do much to his clothes, he felt an agonizing burn on his hands, making him drop his gun to the asphalt as the sensation made his muscles jerk. It was like splatter from cooking bacon - only far more painful.

He knocked into Ellis, utterly having forgotten he was at his back, and before he could tell up from down, the kid grabbed his shoulders from behind. He was shoved in a spin and then pushed forward, feeling Ellis moving to follow after him in the scramble to get away from the acid.

Nick stumbled, though, wheeling forward with a staggering slant to the side, till he smashed right into the door of one of the cars parked messily alongside the road. It completely knocked the wind out of him, his knees crumpling underneath him and making him slide slightly into a half-crouch of pain.

And then the car alarm shrieked into life, and Nick decided he was going to kill Ellis.
"WHAT THE SHIT DID YOU DO?" It was Coach who was shouting, and his commanding gruff had never sounded so frightening. Nick didn't even bother trying to respond, clenching his teeth against the ear-splitting sound of the car alarm going off just beside his ear, focusing on shoving himself away from it.

His ears were ringing so hard he could only hear the vague outlines of the other three's voices. His vision was even swimming as he forced his eyes open, pushing his hands against the asphalt to stand up with a stumble, shaking his head mightily and only managing to make himself dizzier.

Rochelle suddenly appearing in front of him, grabbing his face with either hand, made him snap to reality. He quickly shoved her hands away, forcing a growled "I'm fine" just before Ellis practically skated into them.

"Nick-" The hick's face scrunched up, looking less panicked and more breathlessly determined, groaning at the still-screaming alarm and suddenly shoving his shotgun into Nick's hands. "Take this - they're comin', I gotta shut it off..

Nick's first instinct was to grab it and smack Ellis across the face with the butt of his own shotgun, but the mechanic was unfortunately right - his dizzied senses were recovering enough to hear that familiar howling, shouting clamor racing toward them. Goddamnit... goddamnit we're so fucked.

Coach came up to his side, one of those brawny football-player shoulders shoving Nick harshly to get him to face the opposite direction. Rochelle slipped into place between them, forming a tight triangle, and without a word they hunched in to get ready. His hands stung as the burnt droplets of acid sizzled out, leaving faded splotches on his skin, but the pain kept on.

The first wave of zombies roared into shooting distance when he heard the shatter of breaking glass behind them. The scream of zombies and shriek of the alarm making it almost impossible to even think. Though he tried not to notice, Nick felt himself struggling against the shotgun's harsh recoil, reloading as quick as he could manage.

It was terrifying, that blood-stained tsunami of clawing infected. It was worse than either horde he'd seen before, at the gas station or in the closet - they must've drawn every zombie within blocks. A small glance confirmed that it was just as bad for the other two, though somehow they were managing to keep a distance between them and the horde.

When Ellis' shotgun came up empty, Nick cursed harshly, twisting his grip to hold it like a bat. Fucking Christ, that idiot still has all the bullets, and I dropped my goddamn SMG! He darted a look toward the car, seeing that Ellis had gotten the car unlocked and flung himself into the front seat, bent over it to shove his torso under the wheel. Whatever he was doing, he was doing it frantically, shoulders working madly.

Nick saw the driver side window was broken, and there was blood on the glass, but he didn't have time to think much on it before the zombies overcame him. He used the metal muzzle of the shotgun to the most effect he could, swinging hard at the snarling heads that so madly jerked at him. The occasional gunshot would take one out for him, but Coach and Rochelle could spare only small instants without losing ground themselves.

Fingers kept finding purchase in Nick's clothes, threatening to tear, before he'd smack them away with violent curses and growls, smashing whatever body part he could get at. A few got him, feeling the splice of pain along his forearm as jagged nails dug straight through his clothes, and one leapt up and scored a claw at his cheek before Rochelle shot it down.

There wasn't any breath available to shout with, though he wanted nothing more than to do so. Not even the abrupt, pained chirrup and then complete silence from the car next to them gave Nick more than a small flicker of relief when compared to the zombies crawling over one another to get to him.

"This ain't no good!" Coach barked into the quieter air, drawing a livid NO SHIT! out of Nick's head. The conman scored a hard hit onto a zombie's outstretched neck, knocking the thing's head half-off its shoulders, and then he felt Ellis stumble next to him from the car.

"Bullets, dipshit!" Nick rasped demandingly, barely managing the words. The blood on the window was shortly explained; the kid had torn his elbow to shreds busting in the window, but even with the injury, he moved with immediate speed to pry up shotgun shells from his overalls' pocket.

Ellis fed them to the conman, darting in and out of the way when Nick was forced to shove back a zombie. They got just enough of a flow going to load the gun, though barely - and Nick nearly got a hard bite on his calf as a zombie slipped underneath his radar. Ellis caught it, however, and he kicked it roughly away with one of those heavy workboots he had on just as it had smashed up against Nick's leg and started to scrabble for purchase to sink its teeth in.

Rejuvenated with a new load of bullets, Nick aimed high, for necks and heads. The shots ripped through multiple zombies at once, sending these little crashing waves back in on the horde entity, and with Ellis kicking and shoving at any who got too close, they regained ground.

Only then, with the car alarm off, the zombies were ebbing. Almost instantly it had started to thin out, and Nick found himself starting to breathe easier. "You should know," he muttered sideways to the mechanic hovering at his elbow. "I'm going to kill you."

He heard Ellis cough slightly, but didn't get a chance to see the kid's expression as Rochelle suddenly fell hard against his shoulder. Shoving the shotgun back into Ellis' hands, the conman twisted around to grab hold of her elbow and hold her up, relaxing slightly when he realized that her side of the triangle was clear.

"They get you?" he questioned in a low growl, bending his head to get a look before she even answered. There was a claw mark on her arm and blood was seeping through a tear in her jeans, just on the side of her knee. It looked painful, but minor.

"Little.." she admitted, and Nick was impressed to watch her pull away and stand up on her own, though her weight was limped onto the other leg. Coach and Ellis gunned down what was left of the horde, the former moving over to lean hard against the car, huffing audibly. He'd avoided injury, it looked like, though the fight had clearly drained the anger from him.

"Think they're done..." Ellis pointed out a little breathlessly, piping up like he always did, stepping carefully over to check on Rochelle with a worried look.

It turned back around on him, though, a gasp leaving the woman as she grabbed onto his wrist and made him hold still to get a look at his bloody elbow. Nick heard the noise of surprise, but turned away rather than look. He was too goddamn pissed to feel any kind of pity. There was a hard knot in his stomach, and he knew himself well enough to hear the practically bomb-like ticking of that well of anger.
Ellis’ fingers twitched every few seconds, blood dripping down his forearm in rivulets. The adrenaline had stopped blocking the pain halfway through tearing out the car’s alarm. "I had tuh shut off the car, 'n it was locked.. ain't so bad, Ro', but yer leg don't look good." the kid explained defensively, dangling his gun at his thigh and trying to pull his arm free.

"Don't be silly, sweetie, we need to bandage this up.."

Nick didn't even bother checking himself over. He could feel where they'd clawed him through his sleeves, and the burn spots on his hands still stung. His whole spine felt like it was ready to lock up, his shoulder popping painfully when he shifted it. He must've made a noise or a face without realizing, because Coach's gruff voice suddenly spoke up.

"Seein' straight, boy?"

The conman actually smirked, though it was small, and he growled a low response, forcing himself to walk toward where he'd dropped his gun. "Just fine.. you?" The acid had stilled and darkened, a dank shade of green more like algae, but Nick was still leery to touch it. He used his heel to drag his machine gun toward him, losing his smirk and clenching his teeth as he was forced to drop to a crouch to get it, pain flashing up his spine.

He delicately touched it, ready to recoil if the liquid still lacing the machine gun's metal frame burned... but it didn't. It had a shelf life, apparently. Nick forced a sigh, picking it up by the muzzle and getting back to his feet, holding the gun between his fingers as lightly as he could and pausing a moment to try and stretch his spine, it crackling rather nastily. He growled faintly.

Coach huffed a tight chuckle and drew away from the car, pulling the backpack off his shoulder and reaching in to find the roll of gauze. He offered it to Rochelle, but Ellis snatched it out of the air and backed up slightly, giving them a quick smile and using his teeth to peel the strip up off the roll. He started to wrap it one-handed around his elbow, keeping his teeth clenched on the end to make it tight.

"Ah gawht eht." he assured them, carefully, hiding the little flinch that crossed the corners of his eyes as the gauze rubbed over the worst of the slices. Rochelle reluctantly backed off, sighing a bit as she placed a hand over the wound on her knee and looked up to glance over the bloody mess they'd made of the street.

"I guess it's pretty safe to say nobody's around... anyone looking would've come at that." she said softly, prompting Coach to settle his arm over her shoulders again. She glanced up at him, frowning subtly. "You come out of it okay, Coach?"

"Mmhm." he said very simply, looking around the zombie-scattered street and scrunching his nose slightly against the dull stench in the air. His frame twitched a bit with a sigh, scratching once at his belly and shaking his head. "Guess we better work on how we're gonna get our asses outta here."

Wiping his mouth carefully with his wrist, Nick trudged up to join them, expression unreadable as he hooked his arm into his machine gun's arm strap. There was a buzzing in his ear that blocked out any thought, this almost single-minded ferocity. Rochelle turned her head to glance at him, but he was staring Ellis down darkly, watching the hick tear his bandage free from the roll and then tuck it under itself to hold it on.

Handing it back to Rochelle with a quiet 'thanks,' Ellis noticed Nick and quickly turned to face him, holding his injured arm at a careful angle to his side. "Nick... man, I'm real sorry, I was tryin' tuh-"
Then it just... happened; the conman backhanded him hard, knocking Ellis a few steps back and making him stumble down to his ass on the asphalt. He caught himself on his palms, quickly raising his good arm to cup his cheek in his palm, this dumb look of surprise on his reddening face.

"Don't fucking do that again." Nick stated simply and venomously, pulling his hand back to curl his fingers. His expression was deadpanned, not giving a single hint at the thought that actually crossed his mind.

...fuck, I actually.. don't know why I did that.. I'm not - Am I that pissed at him?

They were all silent, no one entirely certain about breaking the silence, until Ellis gave a quiet 'heh' and one-sided grin. Carefully rolling his jaw to pop it, the hick glanced up at Nick under the bill of his cap, miraculously still on his head, not losing his quirked grin even when Nick didn't budge an inch.

"Fergive me now?" Ellis questioned, and for some mind-boggling reason he sounded calm when he said it, like he hadn't just gotten smacked to the floor. His lower lip started bleeding, just a little prickle of red down the slope of soft flesh. One of Nick's rings must've clipped his mouth.

I'm not stupid, he was trying to help... I was just going to yell at him.. fuck.

But all three of them were staring at him, and he was taking too long to respond. He just scowled hard at the kid and stepped forward, grabbing hold of his shirt collar and yanking him up to his feet.

"You're a goddamn idiot, Ellis." he growled at him in non-answer, shoving him a little just to make him stumble before the conman turned and shoved his hands into his slacks' pockets, biting his tongue against the sharp feeling of nausea that rose up his throat.

I'm agitated, that's it, and he deserved it. Nick glanced down at his clothes, finally letting himself catalogue the new damages to his once-pristine suit, mostly to distract himself. The buzzing sound was gone - but that clammy feeling was back. When did I get this hair-trigger?

He heard Ellis chuckling behind him, and his acceptance of the punishment boggled them all. Coach started to say something, but the hick simply shrugged his uninjured shoulder with an easy smile, prompting up with a, "So whut're we gonna do?"

Rochelle sighed slightly at that, reaching up to squeeze gently on Coach's forearm before she broke away from him and took a limped step to the side, rubbing gently at her temples with her fingertips.

"I guess we need to start heading out of town... maybe we can find a map, if we can get into a store nearby? I'd like to plan a little more, if.." Her lips downcurled a bit, giving a helpless gesture around them with her voice gaining a tautness to it. "we can't get a few blocks and not have that kind of shit happen."

Coach chuffed out a thoughtful noise, nodding. His head turned to eye Ellis, the kid perking up a little at the glance, keeping himself from hunching any over his injured arm. "C'mon, son, we gotta go find us a store.. Gonna hafta break in. Don't do it wit' yo' arm again - you're lucky you ain't hurt worse."

Ellis laughed, adjusting his grip on his shotgun and stepping up toward Coach, shaking his head dismissively like there wasn't drying blood dribbled down the whole length of his forearm. He found a story as the big man started to lead them toward the sidewalk, Nick reluctantly trailing after them though he had half a mind to just sit for a minute, feeling out of sorts and aching. "I ever tell you 'bout the time muh buddy Keith -"
Very quietly, Nick said "Don't start." His tone was so flat it made Rochelle glance over her shoulder at him, but the conman's face was covered with a simple scowl and she got nothing.

Ellis gawped forward for just a moment, then flashed to a grin without even looking behind himself and whispered so just Rochelle and Coach could hear him, gesturing to his roughly bandaged and bloody elbow with his shotgun; "...well, this ain't nothin' is all I'm sayin'."

Nick realized he'd have preferred it if the hick had started crying at the backhand, or punched him in return. At least then it would've been a reasonable reaction... as it was he just felt like a jackass, and coupled with the fact he hadn't actually meant to hit Ellis - that it rang like a 'mistake' - it all left him feeling very odd and tense.

Was he feverish again, or was it just his imagination? He felt like something was going on beyond his control, against his will, and it chafed him in all the wrong ways.

He dug for a cigarette and match.
They took the road more carefully now, walking in a loose line down the sidewalk.

With Nick deathly silent at the back and offering a fierce poker face while he smoked his cigarette down, puffing like a chimney, Ellis had pushed himself closer to Rochelle and Coach. The kid trotted along with his shotgun dangled in his right hand while his injured left arm was held gingerly at his side. Considering both Rochelle and Ellis were hurt, Coach kept in front, his bulky frame arranged like a shield to the two behind him.

Rochelle still couldn't pick out any kind of brooding on the kid's face, but it was hard to think he'd taken the conman's strike that well. Harder, even, to gauge her own feelings about it when the attacked party had so easily dismissed it.

Boys. I'll never understand.

Testingly, she lifted her head, flashing a smile and prompting, "That was pretty smooth, turning off that alarm.. you're not Nick's type. Guess it's that autoshop experience?"

She felt a little heat on the back of her skull and figured Nick had turned his currently lazered gaze onto her, but she kept focused on Ellis, watching him break into a bashful grin and try to adjust his cap with his thumb, fighting the weight of his shotgun.

"Awh, shucks.. just a little wire work, that's all.. The alarm system's right under the steerin' wheel. But, thanks Ro'. I looove cars.. always have. Can't say I took it up plannin' fer zombies, but, uhh.. I ain't complainin'. Been tinkerin' with 'em since I could work a jack."

Nick found himself tightening his lips on his cigarette, exhaling smoke through his nostrils. At the same time the hick's response brought back a vivid recollection of his totaled Barchetta, it struck him with the thought of Ellis - lean, flush body shirtless and toiling over the hood of a car...

Coach's shotgun blasting off as their presence attracted a group of zombies distracted him enough to dissipate the image, but he could feel it humming in the back of his head. Simmering together with his anger with Ellis and the fog over his brain, Nick's frustrated sex drive revved up to a dangerous level.

Maybe scaring him off is the way to go, after all.

The gambler lifted his machine gun and picked off a few zombies with short squeezes of his trigger, rolling his shoulder as he eyed the kid's back between shots. Would get him to leave me the fuck alone at least... it's a thought. Bad one, maybe...

"I guess the hat and jumpsuit should've tipped me off. Maybe when this is all over, you can tell me why my air conditioning is always rattling." She grinned at him, and though she noticed Coach shaking his head minutely and knew he had half a mind to chide her for pretending things would return to that kind of normality, the big man didn't actually vocalize it.

Ellis snorted a laugh, spinning his shotgun in half-circles with his hand and cocking his head. He adjusted his hurt arm slightly, the bandages itching and dried blood feeling tacky on his skin.

"Course! Hell, we get outta here, I'll get'ch'ya a whole new car."

Rochelle shook her head in amusement, resting her palm on her hip as she let her limp exaggerate.
slightly to take weight off her hurt leg. Ellis must've noticed, because he instantly trapped his shotgun gingerly under the armpit of his bandaged arm, stepping to the other side of Rochelle so he could offer his good arm for support. The gesture freshly charmed her, bringing a smile to her lips, but she rejected it with a gentle shake of her head.

He retreated easily, rubbing the back of his hand against his nose and risking a glance over his shoulder to check on Nick. He caught the gambler with a strange expression on his face, and he swore Nick had been staring at him, but it switched to a challenging scowl so fast he couldn't get a read on it.

Pulling in a breath, Ellis half-awkwardly turned back and scratched behind an ear as he considered trying to prompt a conversation with the lagging conman. He felt guilty about his screw-up earlier, regardless of the punishment Nick had meted out, and eagerly perked up when Rochelle nudged him. Her voice was thoughtfully and cautiously toned. "So, Ellis... this Keith.. why aren't you with him?"

Chuckling quietly and prying his shotgun from under his arm, Ellis swung it to his shoulder and gave a shrugging gesture with his head. "I was a ways outta town is all, when the evacs started. He rang me up though, just a'fore he got on one of them whirlybirds."

A loud, sarcastic snort from behind them made them jump a little, and Nick quietly muttered, "'Whirlybirds'..." with that mocking Southern twang that would've otherwise made Ellis laugh. This time, though, he didn't say anything at all, scratching his neck and forcing a blank look like he hadn't even heard it.

Maybe the mocking was a good sign... he could only hope the conman was getting over what happened, however slowly. Ellis decided he'd find another time to apologize again, relaxing with the idea of having a plan.

Rochelle cleared her throat slightly, reaching up a hand to tug on one of her hoop earrings and raising her voice in a dogged attempt to continue distracting Ellis - and, subtly, chide Nick for his snarking. "What, he just left? Didn't think he should wait for you?"

Ellis laughed at that, nudging his chin down to shade his eyes slightly under the bill of his cap. "Naw, nothin' like that... He didn't want tuh go on till I got there, but he was with our mamas. Told him to go with 'em. Anyway, looks like them CEDA folk weren't real keen on hangin' 'round any... don't reckon I blame 'em none, either."

"I do." Coach interjected easily, chuckling afterward and pulling them to a stop just before a zombie-clogged T-intersection. They were swarming sluggishly over the remnants of a bloody crash, clawing at the uninfected bodies crushed between the conjoined frames of cars.

He gauged their surroundings for a moment with a heavy sigh - up till then, the blocks had been either purely housing or businesses obviously destroyed beyond salvaging. He noticed a sign for a gas station down the street. "Gas station down the street." the big man answered simply, cracking his neck with an easy roll of his bald head. He reloaded his shotgun quietly, speaking up again when Rochelle and Ellis stopped behind them. "Ro', Ellis - stick close. We gonna have to get through that shit. Nick an' I'll handle it, a'ight?"

For the first time since they'd met, Rochelle argued. She pulled her pistol free from her belt, shifting her weight slightly as she checked the clip defiantly. "We all have guns, Coach, we'll help.. don't be like that."

Ellis agreed quickly, flashing a lopsided grin as he lifted his shotgun up and forced his bandaged elbow into a twist so he could grip the reload pump. "I'm with Ro', Coach. Them zombies ain't got nothin' on us if we stick toghether, and anyways, I can only take so much hidin' at the back... got zombies tuh kill, man."

Coach eyed them carefully for an instant, giving in almost instantly with a nod. In retrospect, it was a respectable decision - he knew better than to fight them. The all-knowing leader type didn't sit well with Nick, but seeing he'd shut up when shutting up was appropriate lowered his distaste a few notches. "Yeah, sho'. Let's do this shit."

Nick found himself gritting his teeth in agitation as Ellis whooped "Yeah!" out loud without thinking, like the moment was too exciting for him to handle. The gleeful sound snapped heads toward them, and within an instant the zombies were throwing themselves away from the car in a mad dash toward them.

"Ellis..." Rochelle chided quickly, swinging herself to the side to get a good shot around Nick. She got the first shot in, the gambler following with Coach close behind, taking the infected down quickly with their firm front. Ellis hesitated, more embarrassed than anything else, but as the first few zombies went down to blaring, varied gunfire he couldn't stand back.

"Sorry!" he managed as he joined the impromptu line, quickly aiming for the closest infected. He heard Coach chuckle under the loud blast of the kid's shotgun. The reaction easily reassured him, a grin flashing over his face, goofy and unfading even when reloading made his arm twitch with pain - and when Nick snapped loudly over the gunfire.

"You couldn't cause more goddamn problems if you tried, Overalls."

Chuckling as one of his shots caught a zombie in the shoulder and spun it around in a bleeding circle, Ellis retorted - and he did it sweetly, voice devoid of sarcasm. "Well, Nick, at least you admit I ain't tryin'...

The oddly apt response made Nick grunt noncommittally, barely audible under the gunfire that announced the squalling deaths of the next couple zombies. One managed to dodge getting hit, scrambling into a leap to try and claw its way to Coach. Nick quickly shifted his fire, catching it in the side and blowing it open like a split pig, but the sudden twist of his waist made his frame seize up slightly and his cigarette got flung free from his lips in a small huff.

Fuck… Something was wrong. Maybe he'd bashed his head harder on the car than he thought - but as nausea flooded him, he wasn't so sure.

None of the others noticed it, it seemed. Coach nodded an acknowledgement and returned to shooting, the last few stragglers going down easy. Nick stepped back a bit from the other three to check his ammo and take a few breaths, tipping the gun to the side and snapping the clip out with a quick motion of his palm.

Replacing it after confirming that he was running low, Nick released a lengthy sigh. Licking his lips in a regretful motion at the loss of his cigarette (even though it had almost been burnt to a stub anyway), the conman cleared his throat once, quietly, and tipped his head to look over his suit and wipe at a few of the worst spots with his knuckles.

Nobody was looking his way, and he took advantage of the moment to press a knuckle to his forehead.

He was scalding.

The realization made his heart skip a beat, a shallow clench of his chest. Why…?

"Hey, we made it out of that one alright.." Rochelle noted suddenly, discarding her empty pistol clip and prying a new one from the stash of a couple she'd tucked under her belt in a few places. She laughed slightly, turning her head to flash a smile at Ellis. He adjusted his cap with the wrist of his gun-holding hand, hiding a chagrined look.

"I'd'uv felt awful if someone'd gotten hurt... well, again.."

Coach reached out to pat him between the shoulderblades, glancing down the road to try and see the gas station they were hoping for. "Don't worry, son. Ain't the last time someone's gonna do somethin' stupid. No sense mopin.'" He squinted slightly, noting the broken shape of a dead gas sign sticking out over the sidewalk several blocks down.

Ellis nodded gratefully under the quiet, stifled sound of Nick coughing. He carefully reloaded his shotgun, cringing a little more visibly as he noticed he'd started to bleed through his elbow's bandages.

Rochelle noticed too, giving him a dubious look sideways. "Honey, you should've sat that one out. What'm I gonna do with you, huh?" But she smiled gently, offering her hand out to take a look at it as another unintelligibly muffled cough came from behind them.

Ellis shook his head with a grin, tucking his shotgun under his armpit and letting his bandaged arm dangle at his side. "Naw, Ro', we can deal with it at the gas station.. ain't nothin' what can't wait a few minutes. Keith tore his whole arm up once workin' on a car, 'cause the engine -"

When a third cough sounded faintly, Rochelle couldn't help but turn around, cocking her hip slightly, both in bewilderment and to keep her weight off her pained knee.

"Nick, hun, you alright?"

The conman lifted his head, lifting a brow in a motion that betrayed he hadn't been paying a speck of attention to them. His face was defensively blank, burying the worry etched into the downward curl of his mouth - but there was nothing breathless about him like someone would be fighting a cough. Even as he clearly registered her question, he didn't seem to understand the context.

"They didn't even come close. Worried about me, doll? I'm -" Her reaction shut him up, head tilting.

Lifting a hand quickly to her mouth, Rochelle drew her brows together and started to dart her gaze over their surroundings, clearly looking for something. "Oh, shit, that wasn't you…” When another cough sounded, it was closer but still muffled - and Nick heard it this time.

An acrid stench drifted over. The remnants of Nick's cigarette's smell masked it at first, but as it became stronger, it became… thicker. Harsher. And stank, more like decomposition than tobacco.
Ellis caught on first, jumping slightly and getting his shotgun up, swinging it as he followed Rochelle's lead. He took half-steps backward as he turned, ending up starting a small circle. He looked nervous - reasonably so, though there was also a tint of his unaunted excitement, like he were narrating a horror movie. "Oh gawd, it's that chokin' thing again!"

Nick and Coach just had the time to understand and start to lift their guns when the cough came out loud and clear, crying out in a hacking yell. Rochelle gave a sudden, pained "AH!", and the whoosh of air was almost audible as she was ripped off her feet by her knee. The tongue shot up her thigh in a curl, quick to get a better grip even before she started falling.

In a lucky grab, she flung out her hand and got Nick's sleeve - and he let his machine gun flap wildly from its shoulderstrap in favor of grabbing her elbow in return. He could hear Ellis and Coach shouting, but within an instant he was being yanked to the asphalt with Rochelle. They collided hard, rolling and skidding as the tongue dragged them easily toward an open doorway, even with Nick added on.

More reflex than conscious thought, the conman used his weight and his grip on Rochelle's arm to force her against his chest, wrapping around her as the tongue jerked them harshly. The world was just blurs, in the small blinks he managed to get, trying to keep his mind functioning.

"Help, assh-!" Nick got out right before they bounced up and then struck the sidewalk again, a cry harsh in his ear from the tangled woman, though it was more fear than pain as he took the brunt of it. The wind was knocked out of him.

They were yanked through the doorway, tumbling straight into what felt like a table. It crumpled beneath them with a loud breaking noise, but they were almost instantly pulled deeper. Nick felt them crash right into the zombie's waiting frame, and a clawed hand grabbed onto the side of his head, digging nails into his cheek and pulling his head back.

It was smart enough to know Nick wasn't nearly as immobilized as Rochelle was, so it grabbed for him, fingertips seeking purchase on his face to claw. He fought it, reaching up a hand to try and punch at where he swore the thing's head must have been.

He hit shoulder; he'd forgotten how unnaturally tall it was, and it earned him nothing but a stinging hand and pain as the hacking infected grabbed at him harder. It was just pissed, now.

He could hear Rochelle's voice suddenly turn frantic, and the tongue - now entirely coiled around her - flexed to start the same strangulation he'd seen Ellis fall prey to. The hunting tentacle had found Nick's other arm, trapping it against Rochelle's side, and he felt it tightening on his forearm with a crushing weight.

His SMG was trapped underneath. He was fucked.

Before he could prepare a better aimed punch, it struck him: he had another gun.

Curling his body as much as he could, fueled by Rochelle's desperate voice as it started to cut in and out as she lost her breath, Nick scrabbled for the holster on his thigh. By some miracle, he swore, his Magnum had actually stayed in, even as they'd been dragged across the road.

Yanking it free, Nick cocked it with his thumb and blindly rammed it up till the muzzle hit something above his head. He bit his tongue hard as he pulled the trigger - and with a relieving bang, it fired.

The zombie exploded with a raspy noise, smoke suddenly drowning the air. The blast was enough to knock Nick to the floor, and Rochelle came with him in a tumbling motion.

They both broke into nearly death-rattle coughs, huddling down against the ground to try and get out of the smoke. Nick tried to hold his breath and tugged on his trapped arm, prying the tongue carefully away from Rochelle and then making to uncoil the rest of the now-limp (but still twitching) appendage from her frame.

"N-Nick.." she coughed into the darkness, making him halt. ".quit copsing a feel.."

He instantly smirked, losing it when his lungs quivered in protest of holding in that smoke-stained air, falling to coughs and muttering a sarcastic, "Your voice says no, but..." between them. The tongue slipped free from its last few coils, and he just rolled himself one time to the side, tossing an arm limply over his face, letting the coughs wrack him unabated.

He couldn't move. His brain was fuzzy from the lack of oxygen; who even knew what the sickly smoke was made up of.

As he expected, he heard the loud arrival of Coach and Ellis, crowding into the house and starting up coughs of their own. "Nicl! Ro'!" Ellis' voice chirruped urgently. Nick felt them stumble onto him and Rochelle, and somebody grabbed onto his suit to start dragging him out of the house. He didn't even bother trying to help, quickly registering that it was Ellis because there was only one hand pulling on him.

Oh, great. He can drag me with one hand.

he morosely noted, throwing his arm off his face and taking in a rattling breath as they cleared the door and got into fresh air. He tried to sit up there, but Ellis didn't let go - he was tugged to the wall of the building and Ellis crouched down close to him, trying to push him to lean against it.

His hands were touching the conman too much, expression nakedly concerned, and Nick felt a hot feeling start burning up his spine - not his fever, he was sure - with irritation coming second. He was completely confused on why Ellis was so damn interested in him.

"Nick.." the kid spoke up, unaware he was agitating the gambler. "You okay, man? That was real -"

Seeing Coach duck out of the doorway right afterward, carrying Rochelle in his arms, Nick growled and shoved Ellis' hands away, snapping out in an irritated rush, "Fuck off - can you -" There he coughed, but recovered. "- give me five goddamn inches of breathing space?"

Ellis blinked twice, scooting back in his crouch and stopping a few steps away. He rested his injured arm on his thigh and dropped his other hand to fiddle with the toe of his right boot, watching the conman. Nick breathed hard, scowling, trying to glare him into moving away.

After a few beats, Nick just gave up and let his chin drop slowly, replacing his Magnum into the holster at his thigh and checking himself over with probing fingertips.

"Coach… I'm okay, let me down."

Rochelle did look surprisingly well from her place in Coach's arms, limbs tucked into a curl and held easily by the big ex-football player. Her eyes were red from coughing and she was holding onto a spot on her side, but was otherwise okay. "You sho', baby girl?" he questioned anyway, dubiously, giving her a tired look that clearly expressed his concern.

She smiled gently, and that was apparently answer enough, because the big man tipped her down to the sidewalk carefully. She eased onto her feet, Ellis glancing up toward her from his squat and looking relieved to see her standing. "Yuh scared me, you two..." he muttered, fingers tugging at the seam between the sole and nose of his dirty workboots.

He flashed a grin right after, stupidly pleased, even though Nick did little more than grunt.

"Awh, we're fine, sweetie.." Rochelle reassured him, limping to get next to the crouched hick and rub at the back of his neck comfortingly. Her gaze moved up to Nick, gently biting her lower lip. Her expression was almost surprised."..Thanks, Nick. That was .."

It was the same thing Ellis had been planning to say. 'That was really nice of you, Nick.' The conman could already hear it and it grated on his nerves like sandpaper - SHE grabbed ME. It's not like I jumped into a damn burning building for her.

Which, of course, wasn't entirely true. He could have shaken off her hand... but he didn't. He reached out to grab her back. That knowledge agitated him. He started to arrange his legs to get up, a hand bracing himself on the side of the building, shaking his head harshly.

"Thank me by getting a move-the-fuck on... I didn't donate a goddamn organ to you or something, just forget it. We are actually trying to get somewhere, right?"

Ellis jumped to his feet, grinning undaunted. "I told y'all we'd be fine iffin we worked as a team." he stated, offering a hand down to Nick to help him up. Nick all but slapped it away, giving him a dull stare before shoving himself up to his feet on his own.

The kid was unperturbed, simply stepping away from him and traipsing to the edge of the sidewalk to look down the road. Coach moved to join him, bending his head to say something to the younger Georgian.

Ellis seemed uncertain at it, expression scrunching up in that confused look he did best, a headtilt away from being puppylike. The big man didn't elaborate any, just turned away with a pat to Ellis' back.

Nick eyed them, then fussily straightened his clothing, brushed himself off, and put his hands into the pockets of his slacks. Rochelle was still looking at him, so he muttered at her, flexing fingers slowly. The expression he was being given made him uncomfortable. "Look, you're welcome. 'Kay?"

"Nice to know you're not a total asshole." She cracked a grin at him, carefully limping toward Coach and Ellis and gesturing down the sidewalk. "Looks pretty clear. Let's book it to the gas station while we can... I need to sit down pretty soon."

Nick gladly aimed to take up the rear, both to distance himself again and so he could let himself favor his weight as his abused body demanded. He expected Ellis to try to slow his steps and walk next to him - he didn't. The gambler found himself eyeing the mechanic's back, like he could read him, wondering what Coach had said to him.

Not knowing rapidly began to irk him.
"I don't think pulling harder is going to convince it to unlock, Coach."

The conman's mocking observation was mostly ignored. Coach tugged again on the handle of the gas station door, rewarded only with the same jarring jerk as it refused to open. The big man finally took a step back from the door and sighed, hitching his slacks up by the belt.

"Well, shit."

The small gas station was tightly locked up. Though there were big windows on either side of the door and the door itself was mostly glass, the whole expanse of it was barred up by subtle steel blinds. Someone before them had tried to break in, the glass just above the handle shattered, but the blinds were too close together. There was blood on the edges that betrayed the person's attempt to reach in and open the door, but all they'd done was cut their hand trying to worm it through the glass.

Inside was a tempting sight; more than enough light was filtering in through the windows to see that the aisles were stocked and the place was undisturbed. "Think there's another door?" Ellis piped up hopefully, rubbing at the back of his head and scratching fingertips up under his cap. "Don't much look like we're gettin' in through this, unless y'all wanna shoot in all this glass."

Rochelle sighed, limping forward to lean her hip against the ice vending machine that sat dead a few feet to the side of the door. Water was steadily spilling in rivulets out from the fridge-like door in the front, melted ice completely overflowing, but Rochelle was too busy eyeing the gas station over her shoulder to notice her boots getting a little wet.

Nick rolled light, masked green eyes subtly, releasing a sigh like his time was being wasted waiting in a line. He reached down into his pocket and pulled his cigarette pack out, tipping it back and forth in his fingers.

I still can't believe they thought I was that goddamn choker zombie... maybe you should cut back, Nicolas. You'll end up turning into one at this rate.

That thought wasn't pleasant. Especially not when his skin was crawling with a fever he couldn't quite explain.

He was sore and aching, like he'd gone on a drinking binge and then gotten his ass kicked in the same night. So, he weighed his over-consumption during the last day or two with the numbing influence.

... it wasn't a huge surprise when he popped a cigarette free and slipped it between his lips. "How about you two - " The conman nodded toward Coach and Ellis, without actually looking at either of them. " - go check on that like good little boyscouts? Ro' and I'll watch the road."

Nick ignored the slightly startled glance Rochelle gave him and switched the cigarette pack for his matches, boredly tearing one out to strike it against the book.

Ellis nudged his cap down a little, shading his eyes and clearing his throat. He adjusted his one-handed grip on his shotgun, having long since tucked his left hand into the knot of his overalls to rest his injured arm along the curve of his waist. "Uh, sure." He gave a quick grin and took a step back, glancing up at Coach.

The big man clapped a hand over the hick's shoulders, urging him to start to turn around. "C'mon, son. We get lucky, maybe we find a door out back 'n' get us somethin' sweet in there. I got a cravin'
That made Ellis laugh, quickening his pace with a ripening enthusiasm. "Hoh man, I'm totally addicted to them squiggly worm things... y'know, the gummy ones? Yeeeah, 'cept them sour ones. I mean I like 'em, but they make me scrunch up, y'know..?"

"Chocolate, son. Chocolate."

Their voices faded as they turned around the corner of the building, a few gunshots the evidence of their progress and apparent run-in with a few alleyway zombies. Nick was unconcerned as he lit his cigarette, taking in a breath and leaning his head back to exhale it straight upward.

Rochelle eyed him dubiously, chin lowered and thoughtful. In most circumstances, Nick would usually just ignore her until she broke down and prompted a conversation, but he didn't bother this time, appreciatively pulling his cigarette from his lips and glancing at her. "What?"

She shrugged her shoulders, reaching up to work her hoop earrings out of her ears. She hooked them together and then examined them, like she might just throw them away. "Don't have something on your mind?"

Nick smirked, quickly, replacing the cigarette and cocking his head. He dropped his voice to a taunting, elaborate tone. "That kinda question is generally better asked of the person asking it."

Rolling soft chocolate eyes at the salacious twirk to his brows, Rochelle straightened up and settled a hand on her hip. "Look, Nick. If you're being nice, then consider me the first to say thank God. But I'm just getting the feeling you're having... ideas, and you're a bit of a sleaze. I have a guy back in Ohio and-"

Even though Nick wasn't really surprised, he lifted up hands to interrupt her, shaking his head so she'd stop. Letting a smoky breath roil from his nostrils, he spoke up dryly; "Sorry, cupcake. You're a little too straight-edge for me. Try ten years younger and a third of the clothing and I might say different."

Her relief was quickly overshadowed by offense. Damn women. Always wanting the answer that pisses them off. "Excuse me? Too straight-edge? Not boozed up enough for you?"

The gambler laughed, watching her irked expression fade as he nonchalantly took a pull off his cigarette and shrugged a shoulder. "I said sorry. Can't help my tastes. I can always fake it if you'd feel better."

None of which, of course, was really true. He may have had a 'type,' but that was just a preference. His standards, on the other hand, were pretty much limited to whether or not the other party had a pulse.

That, and the likelihood of catching something.

Rochelle crossed her arms over her chest, returning to a lean against the ice machine and drawing her healthy, plump lips into almost a pout. He couldn't quite decide exactly how much was playful at that point, though her initial offense had certainly faded. "A little, yeah."

Nick snorted faintly, catching his cigarette between his teeth and holding it still. He talked past it easily, white teeth flashing between his lips. "Got any hairpins in?" He held his hand out, palm up.

She was reasonably confused at the abrupt question, both brows lifting and head tilting a little as she twirled her hoop earrings between her fingers. "Ehm.. what does that have to do with -?"
Rolling his eyes as a few more gunshots rang out behind the gas station, Nick moved his fingers to repeat his question silently. "We can keep fucking talking about that if you want, or we can get in the gas station."

Sighing faintly with a shake of her head, Rochelle bent her head to the side and lifted one hand to work the two black bobbypins that held a few stray braids and unkempt frizz into place behind her ear free. She dropped them into the conman's palm, expectantly watching him.

He shrugged his machine gun strap further onto his shoulder, plucking up the pins and starting to force them halfway unbent as he stepped over to the door. Rochelle realized his intentions about there, sounding exasperated and lifting her hand to set her chin on her palm, fingers working her earrings around them. "Oh hell, suit... are you serious?"

"You people keep acting like I ever pretended to be a goddamn saint." Nick grunted with a tint of humor, taking a pull of his cigarette as he dropped down into a crouch and nestled his hands around the lock. Working the pins inside, he coolly twisted and turned them bare centimeters at a time. Going by touch, his eyes wandered, and he inspected the rounded, red burn spots on his hands.

"What are you, then?"

Nick could hear the disapproval and noticed he genuinely didn't give a shit. He glanced at her, pausing a moment just as he felt his makeshift lockpick catch onto a tumbler and go slightly stiff. Giving her a scathing look, he glanced back and torqued the pins carefully. "Like I said.. you are just too straight-edge for me."

A loud click made him smirk, and Nick straightened up, pulling the handle. Sure enough, it swung open, a few shards of glass tumbling down from the broken spot. He set his foot just in front of the door, holding it open and gesturing his arm in a half-flourish in front of his chest.

He smirked easily into her small, only moderately serious glare as she straightened up and limped past him, glancing around the small store. She ran her hand over the shelves as she passed them, touching the strange normality of the neatly stocked aisles like it might crumble under her fingertips.

"You don't think anyone's here, do you? Did they lock it and leave, or lock it and hide?"

Nick pulled his gun off his shoulder, hooking the strap on the door handle and letting the door settle half-shut with the gun stuck in the doorway. He put his hands into his pockets, stowing the bobbypins away, and strolled toward the store counter. "Guess we'll find out." he responded nonchalantly, stepping around the counter and pulling open the drawer beneath the register.

"..Were you planning on letting the boys know we got in?" She didn't seem to see what he was doing, pulling a small can of chips off one of the shelves and popping the plastic top off. The paper seal underneath seemed to intimidate her, however, as she fiddled with the tab without opening it.

"Eh, they'll figure it out eventually." He wasn't really paying attention, plucking a key from the drawer and glancing it over in the dim light. Flicking his gaze up to the register, he found the lock on one corner and inserted it, turning it as he blew out a long stream of smoke.

"Much to his pleasure, the register popped open, a loud ching betraying him to the woman two chest-high aisles over. She glanced over at him, giving him a long, dry look. He didn't even bother looking up, opening his suit to reach into an inner breast pocket and pull out his wallet.

He was halfway through stowing the largest bills in his wallet when the door opened up, the machine gun clattering a little as it swung. Coach, leading the way, pulled it free and glanced over at Nick. He didn't say a word; he merely held onto the gun for the moment and moved to join Rochelle.

"How the hell'd you two get in here, baby girl?"

Ellis trudged in after him, glancing curiously around the store and tipping his cap back on his head. He walked over to the counter, leaning his good elbow against it and hunching down. He didn't look at Nick, focusing toward the other two - and the conman gave him the same treatment, finally stowing his wallet back into his jacket. It sat a bit heavier on his chest, now.

"Nick picked the lock, the shady jerk... if I'd've known he was planning that I'd have stopped you, sorry." Rochelle popped the chip can open, finally, taking one and biting into it with a kind of finality.

Coach chuckled gruffly, shaking his head in a motion that clearly indicated it wasn't her fault. He tucked an arm over her shoulder after freeing himself from the burden of both his and Nick's guns, as well as his backpack, stowing it all on top of the shelf next to them. "C'mon, let's find us a map or an atlas in here.. gotta be makin' a few choices here."

Ellis shifted where he stood, seeming uncomfortable. The motion made Nick glance up, pulling his cigarette from his lips and rolling it slowly between his fingertips. It was bothering him even more now, how the kid was acting.

Eyeing his expression sideways, he almost looked guilty.

It had to have been what Coach said to him out of earshot, but for the life of him Nick couldn't decide what that could've been. Why do I even care? What, he has to leave me alone on my terms? Now I'm acting like Ro'.

Frustrated, Nick stepped back from the register and stalked out from behind the counter. He stepped around Ellis, ignoring the younger man's slight jump at the sudden movement, and made his way to the back of the store to find Coach and Rochelle.

They'd found a small book atlas among a rack of postcards against the far wall, and Rochelle was holding it up as they glanced over the road map inside. Coach prodded on the page, trailing his fingertip along the line of a highway. "What I was talkin' 'bout. Highway 80, straight on through... Get us right to the port."

Rochelle nodded slowly, not noticing Nick stop behind them and tip his head to eye the atlas over her shoulder. "Yeah, I see.. shit, if we could get a car somehow, we could drive right on." She popped another chip into her mouth from the can she had tucked between her elbow and her waist, chewing thoughtfully.

"Hope it's that easy, baby girl." Coach chuckled gruffly, setting a hand on the shelf next to him and resting his weight on it. He glanced at Nick, then past him at Ellis. "We get to the port, we take some R&R on the beach till CEDA notices us. Sounds good to me."

Nick smirked slightly, curling his lips around his cigarette and blowing smoke out of the corner of his mouth, directing it away from the two. "Oh yeah. Just like a vacation. Dream come true. Too bad all the hot beach babes are dead or dying."

Ellis' voice abruptly announced that he'd crept up behind the three of them, standing a little askew and not looking completely sure of himself. "Keith'n I used tuh go tuh the beach all the time, when we was in high school. He tans like a baked 'tater. I do okay, but muh nose burns." He rubbed a g fingertip against his rounded nose, both bashfully and to emphasize his point.

Rochelle turned around, blinking just an instant at the hick before suddenly half-shutting the atlas, handing it to Coach. "Oh, Ellis, I forgot your arm, sorry... mind handing me the pack, Coach? He bled through his bandages pretty bad."

The big man nodded obligingly, picking his backpack up and offering it to Rochelle. He pointed toward the restroom door tucked in the back of the gas station, gesturing Ellis on as Rochelle already started walking toward it. "Go on, Ellis. Don't pull that self-reliant shit 'gain, either."

The kid grinned slightly, dropping his chin to shade his eyes under the bill of his cap. "Naww.." He tagged after Rochelle, holding his injured arm up a little and looking at it sideways. As the two of them got out of earshot, Nick glanced at Coach, getting a slight jut to his jaw. He took advantage of the chance to get Coach alone.

"You mind telling me what you told Overalls earlier? He's been acting more... stupid than usual."

The ex-football player chuckled slightly, leaning against the shelf a little more. "Tryin' to save us all some pain, boy. Just pointed out he's makin' more trouble than he's fixin', tryin' to be yo' friend."

Nick grunted disinterestedly, grinding his cigarette out on the shelf beside him. "Ain't that the truth." It felt forced, and Nick couldn't determine exactly why. Ellis was making trouble, in ways far beyond the big man's understanding. So why did the words leave him irritated?

A shriek from across the gas station made both of them startle. Rochelle and Ellis stood in front of the just-opened restroom, the hick quickly grabbing hold of Rochelle and backing up just a step. Horror was clear in their postures, and Rochelle's outburst turned into a weirdly choked "Oh my God."

Nick quickly darted through the aisle, hearing Coach behind him as he ran to them. "What?!" he demanded, grabbing for his shoulder before he remembered he didn't have his SMG with him. He started to go for his Magnum instead.

In the end it wasn't necessary.

The dim restroom was lit up by a dying flashlight, left face-up in the sink. Slumped against the porcelain toilet just in front of them was the corpse of an elderly man, the shaft of a knife jutting out from the side of his throat. Blood drenched the whole of his neck and torso, dribbled down in a river from the wound. His right hand was collapsed onto his chest at such an angle, elbow twisted, as to make it painfully clear he'd inflicted it on himself.

Poor bastard... people just can't take disaster, can they?

There was writing on the sink-side mirror a few feet away, scrawled in black marker but not quite readable in the lacking light. Feeling his whole gut go to stone at the intense scent of copper, Nick silently stepped into the bathroom, skirting around the corpse. He heard scuffling behind him, aware of Coach coming up and pulling both Ellis and Rochelle against him protectively.

Grabbing hold of the flashlight set in the sink, Nick tightened his jaw and flicked it up to the mirror, shining what little light its dying batteries were still giving off carefully over the message written there.

Nick dropped his chin slightly, slowly clicking the flashlight entirely off and replacing it in the sink. He didn't know what he'd expected to read, but somehow he just felt disappointed. He retraced his steps, reaching for the knob to shut the door again.

Rochelle suddenly spoke up, head turned away from Coach's chest, staring at Nick as he closed the door. "What're you doing?"

The conman looked back over his shoulder, expression hard and unmoving. His tone, though, had a defensive note to it. "Would you rather we left the goddamn door open? Or maybe dragged him out and found a nice piece of broken asphalt to bury him under?"

Her eyes dropped slightly, some sobriety creeping onto her expression. She shook her head just once, turning her hand to hold onto Coach's forearm for a moment. "...no. I'm sorry, Nick."

The gambler didn't respond to the apology.

Ellis wrangled himself out from under Coach's arm. He pulled his cap respectfully off his head, setting it against his chest solemnly and speaking up with a small frown. "There ain't nothin' we can do, Ro'..

Coach let Rochelle go, too, when she leaned away. The woman wrapped her arms around herself and took in a breath. "I know, honey... but why'd he - I mean, he could've lived for weeks in here."

Nick slipped past them as Coach responded to that, getting distance between him and the other three. He ran his hands through his hair, breathing slow. The adrenaline was still pumping, and the deadened mask on the old man's bloodless face had rattled him.

"Baby girl, listen... you already said you ain't a woman fo' the Bible, 'n that's a'right.. but that passage he wrote's about endurin' through trials. He couldn't, but we gotta take it like a last wish an' go on stronger. We gotta keep goin', Rochelle. S'the only way all this shit ain't in vain."

None of them spoke for a few moments. Nick felt a gaze on his back but kept himself turned the other way, leaning against a set of shelves, intent on un-involving himself even though he was unable to escape the situation entirely.

Quietly, Rochelle nodded her head, pushing a firm look onto her expression after a sharp intake of breath. "... Okay. Ellis?"

"Yeah?" The kid smiled gently at her, reassuringly, replacing his cap onto his head.

"Let's clean your arm.. and then you're finding us a car."
Chapter 21

The hard look on Nick's face solidly suggested Coach was insane. "No."

Coach sighed wearily, leaning back even more against the shelf he'd sat himself beside. He took a bite of the chocolate bar held protectively in one hand. "Boy, we ain't got time fo' this shit... we only got four people, a'ight? You're gonna have to work wit' that."

Their back-and-forth was in hushed tones even though Ellis and Rochelle were outside, taking advantage of the water-filled icebox to clean up the hick's arm. "For fuck's sake, Coach, why can't you or Rochelle babysit him?"

"She's still shaken up, Nick, 'n' no offense but you ain't the one I'd pick to stay wit' her." Peeling the wrapper down further and frowning for a moment, Coach shook his head. "Just keep him from gettin' killed while he hunts down a workin' car outside, that's all I'm askin'."

Frustrated, Nick crossed his arms tightly and bent his torso forward, digging his fingers into his biceps. Maybe you should've thought about that before you got involved instead of just letting me handle it. "Fine. But it's your goddamn fault if I end up shooting him." he muttered, turning around and walking away.

He stopped next to the store counter, where their guns had ended up - all except for his Magnum and Rochelle's Glock. Reaching up hands, the conman pulled his suit jacket off, stripping his torso down to the blue dress shirt underneath. He folded it up and set it next to the register.

"Jus' keep him from doin' somethin' stupid, boy." Coach grunted quietly, closing his eyes as he busied himself with his chocolate bar tiredly. "Hell if we're losin' one of our own, 'n' he's already hurt."

Snorting, Nick undid the cuffs of his shirt and rolled his sleeves up to the elbows. Once they were settled, he picked his machine gun up and worked the strap over his shoulder. "By his own stupidity."

It seemed like Coach might not respond, cleaning his fingertips of melted chocolate, but just as Nick reached the door, he prompted, "Nick." The conman barely turned around in time to catch what the big man threw at him; pulling his head back, he eyed the plastic package of gummy worms in his hand with some bewilderment.

"He did hurt himself savin' our asses, boy. Tell him it's from me if you don't want him thinkin' you're doin' him a favor."

"Don't touch my chocolate."

Nick broke into a smirk much despite himself, recalling Ellis' enthusiastic confession before they'd gotten inside, unable to resist it. It was almost ridiculous; break into a gas station, and the sweets were the first to go. "I guess candy is the new drug in the apocalypse."

...Yeah, 'cept whut Keith didn't know was that his pa had left his beer in the back, so when the coppers pulled him over... I mean he hadn't drunk none, but dayum, they was pissed anyway.."

Unsurprised to hear another story spilling from the mechanic, Nick glanced to the side, arching a brow at the two sitting close together on the asphalt just to the left.

Rochelle was just pressing her fingertip along the last piece of medical tape to hold Ellis' new bandages down, eyes glancing up at his face and expression soft. She seemed fascinated with him, staring at his oblivious expression as he rambled and shook his head along with his story.

Nick could understand her enthrallment. Like nothing even happened... can't tell if this kid is insane or just... blind. Damnit, Ellis... why couldn't you just be boring?

"How's the village idiot doing, 'Chelle?" Nick interrupted, expression blank, tearing open the bag of gummy worms he still had a grip on. "If we can't save the arm, I say we just dump him."

Ellis twisted at the waist, blinking at Nick in momentary surprise. His hat was in his lap, leaving his face wide open and unshaded, and he couldn't even try to hide the way his eyes locked onto the bag of candy. He didn't even defend himself, hopefully eyeing the package.

This time, though, he didn't have that stupefied look of cautious guilt that had been plaguing him every time he'd looked at the conman.

"Hey, suit.. he's just fine. It stopped bleeding after he stopped being stupid and stressing it." She batt at Ellis' head gently, but when he flashed his bashful smile sideways, he didn't even rip his gaze away from the bag in Nick's hands.

... Heh.

Not that he showed an ounce of his sadistic amusement. Not even looking at Ellis, he twitched his wrist to shake the bag open slightly, then pulled out a worm and tossed it into his mouth. He swallowed it practically without chewing - especially considering he didn't actually like them all that much.

It was too sweet and too heavy, and his stomach roiled in protest. Not that it stopped him.

"Good. Coach wants me to follow him around to try and hook us up with a ride. You up for it, Overalls, or do I have to drag you?" Nick turned scathing green eyes on the kid, pulling out another worm with a little jerk and biting its head clean off. Ellis' riveted gaze on it as it reached his mouth sent an unwelcome thrill up Nick's spine, despite the knowledge it was the worm Ellis was watching.

"I'm fine, Nick, like Ro' told'ya... but, uh -" There it was again, a little hesitation, and he gently ghosted his hand over his bandaged elbow, glancing down toward it like he still had a cap-bill to hide underneath. " - Why'd yuh agree? I can go on my own or somethin', you don't -"

Nick rolled his eyes, ignoring Rochelle's slight frown in his direction and snapping dully at the mechanic. "No, hayseed, I'm not goddamn enthused. If I could stay here, I would. Unfortunately, we both know that's not an option. So you're going to find a car, you're going to fix it, I'm going to keep you from getting killed, and you're going to stay as silent as you can the whole time."

Rochelle didn't look pleased with him, but she just grabbed up the backpack beside her hip and carefully stood up, reaching down to tickle her knuckles against Ellis' cheek reassuringly. He smiled at her.

"Don't fight, boys..." she mumbled quietly, feeling it was futile. Nick flashed her a smirk as she slipped by him, stepping into the gas station with a shake of her head.

Ellis blinked up at Nick for a few moments, slowly grabbing and replacing his cap on his head. Withholding a sigh, the mechanic tossed himself up to his feet with a sway of his weight, nodding quickly. "Alrighty, Nick. I'll leave yuh alone." He turned around, stepping off the small cement platform infront of the gas station door, trudging across the parking lot.

Smirking subtly as he did, Nick slipped a hand to get a hold on his gun's grip, finger settled on the trigger. He followed after Ellis, glancing around them as they got to the streetside. "What, no argument?"

The hick's shoulders shrugged, stepping off the sidewalk and onto the road, dodging a zombie corpse at the last minute with his boot. "I'm just troublin' you, right? You can say yeah."

Quickly moving to catch up with him, Nick pulled his gun up and leaned forward, gunning for a few zombies to the right. With the bullet spray, two of them survived at first, but they only made it a few snarling feet before a second squeeze of the trigger brought them down. He sighed just the tiniest bit, likely unnoticeable as he leaned back and let go of the gun to dangle at his hip.

"Yeah." he responded simply, plucking another worm from the bag in his free hand and snapping it down like a shark catching a fish. Ellis hesitated as he snuck another struggling glance at the candy bag, forcing himself to turn his head back around as Nick's answer registered.

He squinted blue eyes up and down the street. Most of the cars were crushed or collided into one another, bullets riddling vital areas; a first glance didn't bode well for finding an undamaged one. Reluctantly, Ellis scratched at the back of his neck, nodding once. "Might be tough findin' a workin' car. Zombies ain't been kind tuh 'em."

Nick eyed him sideways, inhaling carefully. What the hell do I care if he gets his feelings hurt? He tucked the candy bag into his slacks' pocket, gripping his gun with both hands. "So start looking."

The silence as Ellis trudged down the street was stifling, broken only by gunshots as Nick protected the unarmed mechanic from the zombies staggering around the street. Ellis would say a 'thanks' every few minutes, but Nick didn't respond, just leaning to get an eye on the next infected.

It didn't bother Nick as much as he could tell it did Ellis, the hick biting back a frown as he stopped next to a seemingly intact grey van half-parked on the sidewalk. The windows were unbroken, tinted to block any peek inside, and the only damage at first glance was a few bullets in the door and a long scrape along its side.

"This'un might work..." the hick muttered to himself, skittering around to the front to pop the hood up. He didn't even struggle to hold it up one handed, fingers spread carefully, leaning forward and glancing over the engine parts inside.

Nick walked up to settle his hip against the van's headlights, leaning forward slightly. The clank of the hood snapping open alerted a few zombies who came stumbling out of an alley off to the right, and the conman pulled his gun up to his shoulder to aim more carefully as he picked them off.

"Huuhh.." the mechanic uttered, bending in under the hood. He kept it up with his good arm, reaching in carefully with his other hand to touch onto a few pieces. "Bullet hole by this here oil pump... man, I think I see a leak."

Straightening slightly and letting his gun fall slack against his hip, Nick glanced at Ellis sideways without initially saying anything. He noticed quickly that his shirt was riding up as he stretched, pulling away from the untanned curve of his lower back. No amount of annoyance or frustration could change Nick's - body's mind, anyway.

If anything, Ellis actually being quiet and focused made him miles more appealing.

"Do you?" the conman asked innocuously, clamping his teeth gently on his tongue to stifle his sigh as he shut one eye, watching Ellis' hips shift. He found his mouth screwing into a slight frown at how utterly entrapped he was, leaning a little back but unable to entirely tear his gaze away.

"Mm, yeah. Can't tell fer sure, hold on.." Ellis pulled back, letting the hood drop down once he was out from under it and giving it a pat with the heel of his hand. He stepped around Nick, dropping down to a crouch by the side of the van and curling down to peer underneath it.

Nick stayed where he was, just listening, scratching one of his bare, crisply haired forearms. Ellis hummed something incoherent, hunching under the car and reaching his good arm under it, feeling at something.

"Eehh.. Nick?" He sounded uncertain, and when the conman glanced down, Ellis half-crawled back a bit and held up his hand. His fingertips were gleaming lightly with tacky, rainbow-colored oil, but that wasn't it - he was pointing at the bottom seam of the car door.

There was something sludgy starting to leak out from the crack. It had dripped a little onto the back of Ellis' neck, which he was quickly wiping off with his wrist. It was green and thick. Chunky, even. When Nick screwed his brow up and shifted off the car, moving a little closer, the smell of vomit hit him.

Much like the tongue-zombie's cigarette smell was rotten and garish, somehow this smell was just wretched. Less like vomit and more like the contents of a year-old garbage bag.

Giving a disgusted, "Eugh..", the conman retreated a few steps and stared the van down suspiciously. His nose crinkled subconsciously, placing his wrist over his mouth. "You do notice the windows are blacked out, right?"

Ellis struggled to his feet, though he didn't back up, eyeing the car door curiously. "Yuh think there's somethin' in there?" He reached up and tapped the window with a knuckle, watching it intently.

"If there is, it's pretty quiet..." Noting the curious knock and Ellis' gaze flickering to the door handle, Nick warned harshly, "Hey, don't get any fuckin' ideas, assclown..."

Too late, though - Ellis gave a reassuring, "Just wanna..." that he didn't finish and suddenly opened the car door, leaning to the side to peek in. There was a huge shape just inside the van's back compartment, this bloated, garish bubble of skin only vaguely contained by what looked like the remnants of a shirt. The stench was enough to make anyone retch, but somehow Ellis was too fascinated to do much more than stare, mouth half-open.

The thing moved, squirming like some overgrown tick, and a bloated head twisted into view, yellow eyes locking onto the men. Its jaw went slack, the whole inside of its mouth a disturbing shade of green, and a loud hoarking noise emitted from it.

Ellis jumped right out of his skin when the door slammed shut in front of him, his view of the mutated thing switched with a view of a particularly frustrated-looking Nick kicking the door shut. For just a moment, the stifled sound of heavy splattering against the door was the only thing they could hear, followed by gut-turning retches and - slowly - a dribbling noise as it leaked through the "...hoo-lee sheeit, Nick! That was -"

"Fucking moronic? Good job." The conman felt irked, although he told himself it was mostly because Ellis had made him act by standing there like an idiot. The hick's excitement just worsened it. He was fascinated, practically excited. His obliviousness was just ridiculous - like he didn't even realize that thing had been a split-second from getting him.

Not that that's - why I'm pissed. Fuck.

The hick huffed slightly in consternation, shaking his head and pointing enthusiastically at the car. The van was creaking back and forth slightly now, like they'd disturbed an animal. He looked practically overjoyed with disgust. "That was so gross, man! Did yuh see that thing?! It was like, pukin'. Why would it do that…?"

Snarling quietly with a short huff from his nostrils, Nick reached up and grabbed the back of Ellis' neck, dragging him from the door and giving him a shove down the street. Ellis stumbled a bit, but caught himself, looking slightly disappointed. He busied himself with eyeing the other cars nearby, quickly getting his attention caught by a small pickup truck.

He spoke a little quietly as he walked up to the truck, rubbing his capped head with a hand and starting to make a small circle around the car. "...Sorry, Nick. I just wanted tuh see what it was."

The conman tried to tune him out, focusing on not losing his temper completely. Raising his hands, he rubbed at his temples slowly, forcing a sigh. His skin was still hot; hotter than it should have been, even considering the warm Georgia mid-day.

The putrid smell in the air was grating at his nerves, and his own doubt about the root of his anger was just frustrating him more.

The kid's "Was kinda cool.." went utterly ignored.

Nick lifted his head just in time to notice an unpleasantly familiar noise rising subtly in the distance - a din of roars, shrill but guttural all at once. His lips parted, spinning slightly on his heels to try and listen closer, sure he was imagining it - but no.

Wait, what in the hell? We didn't - there's always been something to attract them! Car alarm, radio - We didn't fucking do anything!

Try as he might, nothing could argue with the rising cries. With his mouth turning to cotton with messily veiled panic, Nick very coolly demanded, "Get in the car."

He was not going to die like this.

Ellis lifted his head, blinking at the older man with no small confusion. He didn't have the chance to respond, however, because right as he did he noticed the sound... and Nick repeated himself harshly, leaving no room for argument. "Get in the fucking car."

He bolted around to the other side as Ellis darted to the passenger side door and clambered inside. He heard the hick muttering something to himself, but paid it no mind, throwing open the car door and hooking a knee on the floorboard, half in and half out.

Ducking under the steering wheel and tearing off the cover panel up underneath it, the conman got his hands on the coiled stretch of wires hidden above the pedals. He cursed sharply to himself, having nothing sharp nearby, and shoved himself down further.

"Nick, I see 'em!" the hick warned, even though the conman could hear the shrieking getting louder and knew full-well they were on the way.

He tugged the pair of power wires free, biting hard on their ends and stripping the plastic off with his teeth. He twisted the underlying copper wire together with his fingernails, giving a slight start as Ellis whooped. "Lights on!"

Scowling just barely and spitting tiny chips of plastic out of the corner of his mouth, Nick grabbed the starter wire and made to strip it the same way. While he managed that without getting a shock from the live wire, the moment he went to grab hold of it and spark it against the other two, pain shot up his arm and he gave a hiss, startled.

Cringing through it, he tried again. The copper sparked with a flicker of flame, and with a triumphant rattle, the truck came alive. Nick didn't even register Ellis' cheering, dragging himself backwards and struggling up onto the seat.

The moment he got himself oriented, the conman grabbed hold of the steering wheel and cranked it violently. There was a snapping sound as the steering lock broke, and Nick floored it, tires squealing against the asphalt. The open driver's door slammed shut next to him with the jolt, barely a second from crushing his left leg as he tucked it in, and Ellis had to grab at the dashboard to keep seated.

The nose of the truck collided hard with the oncoming horde, only a few yards away by the time Nick had finished. He grabbed the steering wheel, right arm moving even though it felt a little numb from the shock, jerking it a little from side to side to mow through the flock with maximum impact.

Zombies were rolled over the car like bowling pins, leaving ugly smudges of red and black as they smashed against the metal. The car jolted and bumped both with the collisions and as it rolled over just as many.

Squinting through the blurry panic of the zombies obscuring his view, the gambler stomped on the brakes and cranked the wheel to spin them around, skidding on pulverized infected and sending the truck into a precarious rock. It managed, somehow, crashing back onto all four wheel and roaring over the massacre they'd made of the street.

"Whoo-lordy, Nick! You knocked the piss outta them! Lookit that! And yuh hotwired it, too... I ain't never seen someone do it that fast before!"

Nick didn't say a word. He was almost smirking, just barely, undeniably thrilled with the success, but Ellis' voice brought his anger back. Gripping the wheel hard, the conman steered around a crushed car in the center of the road and guided the truck into the gas station parking lot.

Pulling up next to one of the pumps, he threw it into park and turned on the Georgian. He just lost it, growling angrily, yanking the bag of gummy worms out of his pocket and throwing it at Ellis.

"You are an absolute idiot. Did you even fucking think before you did that? That it might be dangerous? That maybe you shouldn't open the GODDAMN DOOR? You wonder why you could possibly be causing me trouble. You act all fucking surprised. Slink around all victimized all goddamn day and drive me nuts. Now you know, kid. We can't go thirty minutes without you doing something stupid. You ARE nothing but trouble."
Ellis looked on, a slightly hurt but mostly confused frown starting on his features, as Nick shoved the door open and stormed to the gas station in a rage, fingers flexing needily as he grasped for a suit pocket that wasn't there.

"... we're never gonna get on." the kid mumbled to himself, hunching slowly down in his seat and plucking a gummy worm from the bag to nibble softly on. That wasn't a thought that sat very well with Ellis.

It occurred to him that he still had yet to really, thoroughly apologize to the older man.
Chapter 22

Tipping back his fifth bottle of beer with one hand while his other pulled his suit jacket tighter around his curled knees, Nick settled in cozily against the rooftop's few-feet-tall bordering wall. He'd eased into a comfortable drunkenness, mind a bit distanced from his body and cushioned by raw warmth.

None of them wanted to stay overnight in the gas station, the closed bathroom door enough to set anyone on edge. Unfortunately, it was instantly clear that the truck had suffered with Nick's rough handling and the collisions with the horde. Ellis was confident he could fix it with a few tools.

Nick was almost sure that the other three had slipped out at some point to track what he needed down in nearby buildings, but the conman honestly hadn't paid much attention to anything past the knowledge they'd be staying through the night.

He hadn't spent more than a few minutes lingering after his fit at Ellis before he'd grabbed his things, a six-pack of (lukewarm) beer from a dead refrigerator in the corner, and a can of microwaveable beef stew from one of the aisles.

A set of enclosed stairs in the back alley led up to the roof, and he'd retreated up there, leaving Rochelle and Coach with little more than a curt, "Later."

He figured a zombie wouldn't climb up the side of the building. Maybe a Hunter would, but at this point, Nick might just welcome a claw to the throat. If nothing else, he'd get some rest.

Nothing soothed a guilty conscience like alcohol in the bloodstream - and though he hated to admit it... the more time he had to hear his own words to Ellis reverberate back to himself in his head, the more he disliked how unreasonably he'd lost his temper.

He hadn't stuck around to see Ellis' reaction. He still didn't completely know how the kid had taken it. The idea of him being hurt seemed far-fetched, especially considering how he'd shrugged off an actual blow from Nick.

Nick tried to work out if he wanted Ellis to be okay, and that was when he'd broken out the beer.

Much to his relief, none of the others tried to bother him on the roof. He heard them talking now and then, but he'd ignored it, maintaining a steady, rhythmic sipping of beer. It should've taken him longer to get drunk, but an empty stomach combined with the fact the gas station booze wasn't nearly as watered down as he'd expected had him soused quick.

Nick tried to wipe sweat from his forehead with his wrist, only to realize his wrist was sweaty, too. His fever had spread to a full-body sensation, and the alcohol only seemed to worsen it, going flush and breath a little reedy. Damnit...

Was he sick? Surely not sick. Like Rochelle had said; if they were going to get infected, they would have already. He gave a musing squint downward where the bandage on his neck was still clinging on.

The gambler ripped it off, and although he could only see some of the wound past his chin - it was better. Clean. Bruised around the edges, but not angry and swollen anymore.

You'd know if you were turning, Nick. soothed a remarkably sensible voice in the back of his head. Cool it. You're just hungry and worked up.
Stretching his legs out before him and slumping his lower back a bit more against the squat wall behind him, Nick tipped his head back and closed his eyes into the late evening breeze. It was foul, stained with smoke and something acrid, but the wind was pleasant against his face and the smell was no worse than the taste of the beer he'd been downing.

He half-dozed and half-relaxed. The mix of warm fever, warm buzz, and exhaustion overwhelmed him, and he swore he must've drifted to sleep for a bit.

That didn't last, an abrupt knocking from the closed stairwell door startling him to straighten him up. Blinking and passing his palm over his face shortly, the conman realized he was suddenly cold. There was still sweat at the shallows of his cheeks, but it was chill and tacky. He tugged his jacket off his lap to push his arms into the sleeves, shivering a little.

Glancing up at the sky without bothering to move, Nick reached his hand out to curl his fingers around the half-empty beer bottle he'd abandoned next to his hip, shaking it a bit before taking a sip. The (ghastly) flavor cleared just enough of his drowsiness to get his bearings.

The knocking sounded again, a little louder.

"What?" he finally half-shouted, raising a hand to scratch fingertips through his regrettably un-gelled hair and sighing. The gambler was hungry, but not enough to convince himself into drinking a can of cold stew, not even drunk.

"It alright if I talk with yuh, Nick?" Ellis' voice made Nick blink, stiffening up where he sat. That sane part of him was displeased; the drunk part of him, on the other hand…

Huh.. and I was wondering if he'd talk to me at all.. persistent, … annoying…

Admittedly, about twenty different words cropped up in his head to describe the mechanic. He judged and rejected all of them, settling for a defiant:

Dumbass.

He couldn't decide if he was irritated or not. His mind was so loose with the buzz of alcohol - and maybe fever - the gambler was finding it hard to notice too much of anything. He felt more curious than anything else; why did Ellis even want to talk to him? Was he really that difficult to warn off?

"Dunno. Do I care about what you're gonna say?" he retorted, a little plainly, though he didn't slur half as much as he expected. Setting the beer bottle in his hand down, the gambler rested his elbows back against the ledge behind him.

"… mind if I open the door, Nick?"

Nick laughed outright, abandoning his comfortable positioning to force himself to his feet with his elbows. He slipped his hands into the pockets of his suit jacket, tucking it tight around himself to ward off the chill, and walked over to the door slowly. "You can talk through it fine." he challenged sarcastically, leaning his shoulder against the wall just beside the doorframe.

Close now, he heard the hick sigh through the thin door, though it sounded more readying than exasperated. After just a few moments, Nick waiting with an odd patience and a quickly-spreading smirk he didn't even completely understand himself, Ellis spoke up warily.

"I know what you said earlier, but I can't just say nothin', man! I like you, Nick! Yer a real neat guy, 'n anyway we've gotta work together if we're gonna make it through. I ain't tryin' tuh bother you none, but I don't want us tuh be fightin' fer no reason... I'm just lookin' tuh be friends with you, Inhaling a bit and tipping his head on the doorframe, Nick let his eyes half-shut and retorted soon after. "And what makes you think I wanna be yours? You don't think I meant what I said?" His tone, for all the implications of his words, was oddly nonchalant there at the beginning.

Something about the conman's words made Ellis' voice abruptly firmer, confidently shooting back and unperturbed by the door between them. "Nuh-uh, I don't.. you've been nice tuh me - 'n I'm purty good with readin' folks."

Nick snorted slightly, dropping his chin and turning his slowly-stubbling cheek against his shoulder. The practically bristling irony didn't escape him. "Are you?" he prompted in a low murmur, something Ellis might almost have missed - but a response came a few beats after, tone forcedly firm like the hick knew he was treading treacherous territory.

"I bet'chya just don't know how tuh let yerself be friendly, so yer freakin' out instead. I don't mind, but I ain't backin' off neither."

That struck a flash of irritation through Nick's mind, focusing on the door and twitching a brow. He recognized a defensive curl to his own fingers, distantly examining the motion. There were too many tiny kernels of truth in everything Ellis said - and the hick was oblivious to the ones that mattered, it seemed. "'Freakin' out'? You're kidding, right?"

"I ain't! You can't tell me you weren't bein' nice when we ate breakfast this mornin'. Yuh just don't wanna admit it." Ellis sounded even more confident that time, and Nick felt a jab of discomfort, wondering if something in his pliable voice had made the hick think he was winning. He didn't usually get this readable, not even drunk -

It's him fucking with my head again... why did I get drunk?! The fuck was I thinking... Drinking in the goddamn apocalypse. Stupid. Stupid.

Nick pulled off the wall, crossing his arms tightly and gnawing on his lower lip in subconscious agitation, feeling dizzy as he struggled to hold onto it past a drunk sense of confliction. He didn't like this confrontation, not when he couldn't quite control his own voice. "Yeah, and then you nearly got me fuckin' killed twice.. look, I blew my top, sure.. but that was your fault, and I told you, kid. You're trouble, and not my kind."

Ellis' voice turned almost desperate, pleadingly apologetic. "And I wanna say sorry fer that! I didn't mean tuh upset you or get yuh hurt, it all just happened real fast. I'da done different if I could'uv."

"I ain't! You can't tell me you weren't bein' nice when we ate breakfast this mornin'. Yuh just don't wanna admit it." Ellis sounded even more confident that time, and Nick felt a jab of discomfort, wondering if something in his pliable voice had made the hick think he was winning. He didn't usually get this readable, not even drunk - It's him fucking with my head again... why did I get drunk?! The fuck was I thinking... Drinking in the goddamn apocalypse. Stupid. Stupid.

Nick rolled his eyes upward, fighting his tone as it threatened into and out of outright slurred, though coherent, hostility. "Upset me? I'm not upset and I'm not 'freaking out.' Stop makin' excuses, kid... Maybe I just don't like uppy little hicks... you thought about that? That you might just be better off givin' up? That I was being fuckin' serious when I said I didn't want to deal with you?"

Nick was quiet for just a beat, but he hadn't been defeated quite yet. There was a little tone of hurt to his voice when he finally retorted, "Yeah, that's whut Coach said.. 'n' I think it's bullshit. You ran right up here after yellin' at me and closed yerself off all evenin' tuh get drunk alone - you think 'bout that before yuh tell me you meant what you said!"

Nick didn't want to talk about this anymore, suddenly... he was too drunk for it, and the words were striking him strangely, pushing him into a corner. Exasperated, the conman shifted in front of the door and growled straight at it, "What the fuck, Ellis? Why are you talkin' to me right now?"

"We're a team, Nick." Ellis' voice fell suddenly gentle. Too gentle. "You're muh buddy now. I want you to explain tuh me why I'm upsettin' you so much when I ain't meanin' to, so's I can fix it."

Nick froze up, jaw tensing as alcohol-soaked adrenaline abruptly swept through his muscles. He wasn't sure if it was the words or his inebriation or the pleading tone Ellis said it with - or the fact the kid was, literally, asking for it... but with a strong wobble as he uncrossed his arms, the gambler yanked the door open.

Ellis startled and tried to back up, but Nick grabbed him by the shoulders and dragged him through the doorway onto the roof. The younger man didn't even resist, although his cap-shaded blue eyes revealed a shining surprise that might have just left him too caught off-guard to think to, stumbling the few steps forward with a worried "Nick?!" that got no answer.

The moment they cleared the threshold, the conman shoved the door shut again with one momentarily-straying hand and then thrust Ellis flat against it with his palms, knocking the wind out of him. Nick halted with just a foot of distance between them, both his hands retreating to plant themselves on the door on either side of Ellis' capped head and hold himself up.

He knew he was panting, subtly, but there was very little conscious thought lingering as Ellis caught his breath and cautiously blinked up at the taller man from under the bill of his cap.

"Nick?" the mechanic warily repeated, holding very still under the harsh surveying of those palely fascinating green eyes and the soft pulse of boozed breath settling against his face as the conman exhaled.

So Nick responded, teeth trapped in a grit as his whole frame tingled with a mindless exhilaration, a breathless feeling he couldn't begin to explain - like the dangerous thrill he felt at the sound of a whole stack of chips sliding across the green fabric of a card table.

But this time he was merely stroking their edges, pondering... somehow holding himself back, just barely, even though every instinct said otherwise.

"You don't even get half the trouble you're causing..."

Hesitantly, Ellis gave a very slow nod of his head, eyes riveted on the face before his.

Nick could tell - staring at that all-too-pretty face of Ellis' - he didn't understand... the kid was tensed and nervous, and it was written all over his expression that he thought he was going to be roughed up. He was waiting for a punch or a kick, body prepared to take the blow - a far too innocent kind of fear compared to the rising lust pulsing through the conman that only worsened as he stared him down.

God… you fucked up, Nick.

"It's all your goddamn fault... I told ya., over and over, leave me alone." There was no stopping it, and his slur was unrestrained as he growled lightly into the mechanic's face. His gaze flickered over Ellis' features, and he curled his fingers into fists on the door and leaned in an extra inch.

Ellis sunk slightly against the door to match him, fingers gripping on the draping folds of his coveralls. If Nick wasn't crazy, there was a flush of colour in his cheeks. That face looked guilty, a regretful frown trying to win over his expression.. and he tried to apologize, even as Nick was hovering over him dangerously.

"I'm sorry, N-"

"Shut it." It was a short sound, and coupled perfectly with one of Nick's hands shifting over in a flash and clamping over the Georgian's mouth, forcing him into silence. "Has nothing to do with it. You're wastin' your goddamn breath."

His tone flickered in and out of humor, watching intently as Ellis listened oddly closely to him, utterly still. "You want to know so bad why you make me so upset - ask me one more fuckin' time. One more time, Ellis. Or get the fuck out."

The gambler's hand eased away slightly, lingering imperceptibly on the soft lips that had been pressed so innocently against his palm. Nick couldn't stop his gaze from flickering down to them, and with a strike of tension, their closeness became ever more apparent to him. His spine tingled violently when Ellis chose that moment to curl them inward and lick them indelicately, obviously preparing to speak.

Nick should've known Ellis wouldn't think twice, stupidly oblivious... or maybe he did know, and that was why he gave Ellis an option. Rigged dice - of course he'd ask.

"Why, Nick? I wanna know..."

There was just one beat of silence, one single, boozed breath panted against his face that was fit to make his eyes water, before Ellis got an answer. It was so harsh and strange at the same instant he almost thought he'd misheard, or Nick had misspoken - because Nick growled,

"... I want you."

The last syllable hadn't left Nick's lips before his right hand suddenly darted down. It hooked under Ellis' closest knee, fingers getting a tight grip on the baggy fabric of his coveralls. The older man yanked his leg into a bend, thigh rubbing up to align with the conman's hip. Ellis froze up instantly, a ragged noise of shock leaving him as he was forced into a vulnerable one-legged collapse against the wall.

Nick's grip was uncompromising, pinning Ellis on one foot and holding his leg where it was with an almost-too-tight clench. The instant the shocked kid was in place, Nick used his leverage with the Georgian's knee to rock his hips into the spread niche of Ellis' crotch, thrusting him lightly against the door.

The harsh wave of lust that instantly shot through the conman nearly deafened him to Ellis ... and it took all his effort not to crumple at the friction and the incredible sensation of finally even the smallest feel of the kid's body...

...or, honestly, anyone's...

...but a horrified "Wh-wha-!" reached him just faintly, striking at the very small percentage of his attention that wasn't distracted.

That sensible part of him said, Stop.

He wanted it so very badly, whole body demanding it with almost painful clenches and waves as he pressed against the Georgian. He needed the lean body stretched and straining between him and the door, needed the heat and the friction... Drunk off beer and lust and drowning in both, he couldn't not say it to himself; I fuckin' need this...

His whole body was buzzing, pulse humming throughout him and mouth going dry as cotton. He refused to let his eyes shut even as they threatened to, twisting his head slightly to press his forehead against the kid's shoulder. He was so real, so sturdy… unmoving.

Ellis wasn't saying anything. He wasn't trying to get away, or shake Nick off. Maybe Ellis wasn't against it.

Maybe -

But the voice was back. Nick. Stop. That's enough. This isn't you.

In defiance of it, Nick's head shifted - his mouth latched onto Ellis' neck, just under his jaw, with a sudden wetness. Ellis tasted heady... something smoky, maybe a little dirty. It tasted… masculine, and the alcohol that tingled on his skin as Nick's saliva brought it did nothing to dampen it.

Nick laved the flat of his tongue against the skin there, feeling the rushing pulse of the mechanic's jugular and shuddering once as the motion made Ellis' body jerk.

Driven by the feeling, the kid shook free of his shock. He released a strangled sound somewhere between a whimper and a yelp and shot up his arms, getting his forearms - even his bandaged one - up to shove at Nick's shoulders, trying to push him away.

Away. Ellis was trying to use what little leverage he had to get out from under Nick. He was fighting, and it wasn't a pleasant wrestle.

The kid was scared.

It was the realization of that panic that suddenly made Nick jerk his mouth away. He felt like he was going to catch fire as he let go of Ellis' knee and abruptly turned the knob of the stairwell door, pulling it open.

It only took a vague step to the side, and a hard shove, to get Ellis around the door and into the stairwell. He didn't watch as Ellis tumbled away from him, going down hard on the floor on the other side of the door. He definitely didn't look at the kid's face, or the stupid, reddened gawp on his face as his body crumpled there, unable to get his bearings.

Nick felt so ill and drunk and full of raging, uncontrollable desire that his features flung themselves into a burning scowl, his breathing ragged and quick. He didn't wait to see Ellis scramble up and flee down the staircase - he just shut the door, staggering backward several steps and then quickly retreating for the very corner of the rooftop.

He skidded down to the ground, curling up tight against the roof's bordering wall and crossing his forearms harshly over his crotch, folding in around his erection and huffing painfully like he'd taken a swift kick there. He closed his eyes tightly, trying not to think at all as he let himself slip down and burrow tightly into the corner and his jacket, pulling it tight around himself.

But the thoughts came anyway, fractured with his struggling to keep himself calmed as his drunkenness left him unable to cope. He felt like he was suffocating, and the mindless lust that pulsed in his every fiber was demanding release he just couldn't give it, pain settling in slowly.

He'd never meant to take it that far. It was the fever, or the beer; anything other than his free will. He didn't want this. "Fuck. Fuck!"

...you're fine, Nicolas. You're fine. Everything's fine.

It was a lie, and all the repetition of the thought did was lull him into such a silent, huffing, drunken froth that he slipped down a little where he was and passed out in the cold.
Chapter 23

A blistering headache greeted Nick the moment his eyes opened. His whole head felt like it might split, making him groan and roll blindly to try and bury his face in the pillow that should've been clutched tight to his body - of course, the only thing beneath him was the cement of the porch-like rooftop, and he got a rough scrape of his nose against it for his trouble.

Groggily recoiling from the hard surface, the conman pushed up to sit on his knees and bent forward to rub at his eyes with his wrists, squinting hard. His stomach revolted against the sudden shift of orientation, sending a shudder up his spine and a strong blanch over his face.

"Awgh.. fuck beer.." he complained throatily as he settled his palms flat over his eyes, mouth having the consistency of so much sand. He tried to draw up some kind of saliva to wet his lips, but he was so dehydrated, he thought he'd wither.

"...If you puke, I'm leaving."

The gambler would've jumped clear out of his skin if he hadn't been so focused on not moving. Rochelle's voice struck his brain a little too loudly, echoing, like his ears were waterlogged. Peeling his hands reluctantly from his eyes, Nick glanced sideways from his slumped kneeling position, eyeing the woman crouched just a few feet to his left.

She smiled at him rather unsympathetically, but with a slight shift of her weight to flatten her feet rather than balance up on her toes, she stuck out her right hand - offering him the capped end of a bottle of water. "Smooth move there, slick. What about 'zombie apocalypse' says 'get drunk' to you, anyway?"

Nick snorted only faintly, shifting his weight to drop down onto his rear and settle into a hunched sit up against the wall. He snatched the bottle from her, opening it up as he retorted dryly, "The 'zombie apocalypse' part..

Tossing the cap blindly over his shoulder, the conman shut his eyes and quickly chugged a few mouthfuls of water, letting it sit just a moment behind tightly pursed lips before he swallowed. The sudden influx agitated his stomach, but the wetting of his dry mouth was more than enough relief and he let himself sit for a moment and breathe deep before trying again.

He was slow, and tired, but not too slow or too tired to drum up some sarcasm. "Besides, what happened to miss 'They're just sick'? She didn't last long."

Rochelle laughed faintly under her breath, crossing her arms on top of her knees so she could toy with her bangles, dropping her chin to eye Nick cautiously, visibly unconvinced he wasn't going to retch. She looked surprisingly well-rested, wide awake even though the still-dim sky betrayed that it was early in the morning.

"If I had to choose between zombies, and killing a bunch of sick people, I guess I'd rather be fighting zombies. Conscience, you know? That and it gets pretty hard pretty fast to pretend they're not... well, monsters."

Nick took another sip of water, swirling it around like mouthwash before turning his head and spitting it out over the edge of the roof, glad to clear some of the stale beer taste from his tongue. Wiping his mouth with his wrist, he glanced back groggily to see Rochelle giving him a smile despite a fair crinkle of distaste to her nose.
It struck him, then, although his hungover brain was slow to process everything and seemed intent on working backwards. She seems normal. Guess Overalls didn't say anything to anyone... huh.

"Why did you sleep up here, anyway? You're lucky nothing got up here in the middle of the night - it's not like we were in a position to rush up here. We don't need to lose one of our guns." She was chiding him, almost instantly earning herself a backseat in his attention span. The gambler focused on taking a sip of water and trying to arrange his thoughts.

Then again, isn't a real surprise, is it... probably scared the shit out of him.

The thought, though, made him shift in sudden discomfort where he sat, tongue curling on the mouth of his water bottle. Sure, I'd thought about it earlier... just giving up and telling him, scare him, make him back off - but... I don't know... That wasn't -

Wasn't how he imagined it going? Wasn't what he wanted? Wasn't what he meant to do?

Wasn't like him?

"Better up here than bunking with you three idiots..." he muttered as he released his almost biting grip on the soft plastic bottle, drawing a laugh from Rochelle. He lifted a hand to massage his forehead and then tried to push his hair into its usual slicked back position, groaning near-silently at his headache.

"Jackass..." she told him simply, pushing on her thighs with her forearms to stand up. He glanced at her, but the sudden difference in their heights gave him a flutter of vertigo and he quickly closed his eyes. "Are you going to go and slink off to your own corner every time we find a place to sleep?"

"Probably... how did you three sleep?" Closing his eyes, the gambler smoothed his expression to an unreadable sort of half-smirk, a little mocking, just enough to imply he didn't care - and mostly he didn't.. but any hint of Ellis' behaviour before he actually ran into him was worth an inane question.

Rochelle gave a small shake of her head, wrapping her hand around her elbow and settling her weight onto her heels. "Coach planned to have us all - well, minus you, you jerk - take turns keeping watch, just in case something happened, but Ellis took first watch and then never traded. We're well-rested... Poor boy's sweet, but honestly. Saving us the trouble wasn't worth it. He's gonna be useless today."

Pressing his thumb into the side of the bottle so it crinkled inward slightly, Nick took a large gulp of water. *Up all night? Great..." Least you got your beauty sleep. Last thing we need is a woman in a bad mood." the conman muttered just under his breath, subtly shaking his head and shifting to force himself up to his feet. He noticed Rochelle had picked up his machine gun; it was slung over her back.

Giving him a slightly disapproving look, Rochelle reached down to get a grip on his sleeve and help him up. In any other situation, he'd have rejected it, but his head swam as he straightened up, and Nick didn't exactly trust the thigh-high wall that rimmed the rooftop to catch him if he fell.

"You're not exactly going to be a load of help, Mr. Morning After." she retorted, letting go of his sleeve once he'd proven himself sturdy enough to stand. "I don't know if I want you to have a gun."

"I'm perfectly fine." Nick snapped suddenly, jaw flexing into an irritated clench, losing his patience with the disapproval. "Ten minutes and I'll be good as new, alright? I know my goddamn limits." That was a blatant lie, naturally. All that really did was irk him a little more, slugging back a mouthful of water and gesturing her toward the stairwell door with his elbow.

She rolled her eyes lightly, relenting with a sigh and turning to lead him to the door, hands tucking into her back pockets. "Course you do, honey." She felt his glare on her back, smiling faintly in self-amusement but dropping the subject as they ducked into the stairwell.

Nick agitatedly resigned to silence, trying to keep his vision from blurring and slowly moving after her. He wasn't looking forward to going down with the other two - booze-slurred recollections of the night before made him grit his teeth a little.

Half of him couldn't believe what had happened - and the other half just wanted to forget it had. No matter how it'd gone, the result would've been the same: tension and discomfort, and the previously emphatically-intent-on-befriending-him Ellis would likely be terrified of him.

But that hot friction... the way his neck had tasted... it made him shudder just to think about it. Conversely, the thought that Ellis had been unable to sleep because of it brought different memories trickling into the back of his mind.

He'd been tortuously unable to sleep the first time, too. Just a kid struggling with feelings he didn't understand. He wasn't sure how he felt about inflicting the same feelings on someone else, although if the small knot in his already queasy stomach said anything, it wasn't good.

Damnit.

He hated feeling guilty. Despised the sensation.

At least it had a sobering influence.

"We got the truck all ready, by the way." Rochelle spoke up as she nudged the exit at the base of the short staircase open and held the door for him. "Ransacked a garage across the road for tools... you know, when I agreed to do a firsthand account of the disaster, I didn't really think it'd involve looting. Or illegal weapons. Or... well... any of this."

Nick gave a noncommittal sound under his breath, downing the last chug of water and tossing the bottle away as he stepped into the alleyway, brow knotting painfully after the darkness of the stairwell. "Excuse me if I don't really give a shit about laws right now."

Aware that he'd have little luck eating with the lingering symptoms of his hangover, he was quick to dig a cigarette out of his pocket and work on lighting it. Nicotine tended to numb his appetite, and he had hopes the smoke would burn some of his nausea away.

That thought stopped him, and he took stock of himself a moment. He felt ill, sure, but that was the hangover. He raised a hand to touch his face, disguising the moment as a simple scratch with his pinky, only to realize there was no roasting heat or clammy chill to his skin.

The fever had passed.

Rochelle snorted slightly, prodding his shoulder with a fingertip as she got ahead of him again, circling the gas station with some amount of haste. "You saying you usually do..?"

The conman let his eyes slip half-closed, not bothering to even fake a smirk. He gave a shrug of a jacketed shoulder, bending forward to hunch over his cigarette and return to lighting it. He cupped his hands over it as its tip flickered to a soft orange, and took a puff. "Not all of us have the cushy lifestyle that they're built for, that's all."
Rochelle didn't respond, though her head dropped a bit like she might start laughing at him. Nick couldn't really tell how much of her behaviour was some kind of nonchalant passive-aggressive attempt to shame him - all it really did was give him a sense of boredom.

She didn't even know anything about him except for what she'd 'discerned,' and whatever he'd vaguely implied - and honestly, he was fine with it if her opinions didn't match the truth. Maybe he was worse. Maybe he was better.

It didn't matter to him.

"See?" Rochelle said instead.

He glanced up to see her gesturing as they rounded to the front of the gas station. The truck was parked up close to one of the gas pumps, grill plastered in dried blood and greenish-black muck. It was a chubby white Chevy, probably as old as Ellis himself, heavily treaded wheels a little too big for the rest of the car.

"Yeah, yeah. I remember what it looks like. We get to ride in typical Southern style." Nick scoffed quietly, barely even stopping on his way to the gas station door. He pulled his cigarette from his lips, tapping ash out on the sidewalk before he pushed the door open and stepped inside.

He distinctly heard Rochelle laugh out a quiet, "Jerk..." behind him, ignoring it. Coach was pawing through the gas station aisles, looking all the stocked items over and seeming in deliberation about what they'd take with them. Nick felt his chest tighten a little with something a lot like anticipation, quickly setting a hard poker face over his expression and taking a pull from his cigarette.

He didn't see Ellis.

"Coach. You n-" His jaw clamped shut around his fairly loud voice when Coach twisted his head and gave him a fierce 'shush' motion. Brows lifted on the gambler's face, and he had to work to resist a rising agitation at the command. Inhaling a quick breath to calm himself, he merely cocked his head in question.

The big man turned back to pick up a few boxes from the shelf in front of him, wrapping one thick arm around them in a cradle and turning to walk over. He used his free hand to point at the store counter, pushing out the door without a word, though Nick stole a glance at his expression and saw nothing aggressive.

Somewhat bemused and noticing that Rochelle hadn't followed him inside, the gambler let his tongue curl against the filtered tip of his cigarette, slowly pushing his hands into the pockets of his suit jacket. He strode over quietly to the counter, bending in to crane his head over the edge and glance down at the stretch of tile floor behind the register.

Sprawled on his back with Coach's backpack tucked under his head and his arms crossed on his chest, cap sitting on top of his upturned face and shading it all the way to his chin, Ellis was dead asleep.

Someone (likely Rochelle) had untied his wound-up coveralls and pulled them up over his torso to act as a bit of a blanket, though he'd pushed them down a little in his sleep to get his arms free. The fingers of his right hand had curled a bit on the bandage that tightly looped around his left elbow, like it had been bothering him in his sleep.

There was a huge amount of little squares of paper littered around him like confetti. On further inspection they turned out to be lottery scratch cards Ellis must have broken out of the rack behind the counter. Each one of them had one circle marked off, messy scratches peeling away the metallic layer - and just by his twisted elbow, there was a small and very neatly arranged pile of cards that'd revealed a 'Winner.'

Nick felt strange looking down on him. The scene prompted an all-too-vivid mental image of the kid sitting up alone all night, unable to sleep, quietly scratching off lottery cards like the repetitious motion might distract him. Now the mechanic was exhausted, though the cap covering his face made it hard to see how deep-set it was.

Why do I feel so goddamn guilty about this? It was his fault... and what, I'm supposed to just tiptoe around him when he can't do a single thing I ask? ...goddamnit!

"...you stupid hick. You had to make me do that..." Nick muttered quietly down at him, gritting his teeth against an urge to punch the counter. He felt irritated, shoulders tensing up and rising defensively, and he swiftly twisted around and walked away before he discovered any different urges rising up.

Like waking him up and apologizing.

Or maybe just leaving and never coming back.

It can't be that hard to survive solo in the apocalypse.

Storming quickly through the door, Nick nearly bowled over Rochelle as they both reached it at the same instant. He recoiled to do a short spin around her, dodging contact, and snapped an irate, "Watch it!" even as she narrowly kept her balance. She could do little but blink after him in confusion, patting her sides a little to calm the startle it'd given her.

She watched as he fumed off to lean against the far edge of the truck's bed, not saying a word to Coach who was up inside it, arranging what he was taking from the gas station into piles.

"...You're the one who needs beauty sleep... prick." she hummed just faintly under her breath, although even the insult held a fairly unaggressive kind of resignation. Rochelle was giving up trying to fight him, coming to terms with - well, him, and trying not to get riled up.

Noticing Coach send her a small shrug from the truck, apparently not having missed the little fit, Rochelle sighed and walked over to the car. She crossed her arms on the rump of the truckbed, cocking her hip and letting her boot scuffle at the asphalt in a loose swing. "How're we going to do this, you guys think? We could let Ellis sleep in the back - poor thing needs it."

Smoke rolled up from the conman's face as he exhaled a long breath, but he made no motion to contribute to the conversation - and after a beat of silence, Coach spoke up with a gruff rumble, turning around to carefully maneuver down from the truck, rocking it significantly. "Gotta have a gun guardin' him. Nick 'n me'll drive, you stick wit' Ellis." He said it matter-of-factly, obviously having thought it through before - and Nick instantly drew a brow into a slight twitch, turning his head.

"Are you really asking to be stuck in a car with me, Coach?" The choice of him over Rochelle reasonably confused the gambler - overlooking for a moment that the alternative was him guarding Ellis, considering Coach was the only one familiar enough with the city to trust to drive the car, maps or no. "You don't exactly like me."

Coach flickered a short, serious look at him, hitching his pants up with one hand and sighing. "Let's be adults, Nick. We ain't got time. We can get along fo' the time bein', if you ain't gonna be stubborn."

Eyeing him for just a minute, pulling slowly on his cigarette, Nick begrudgingly decided not to make trouble. He'd skated by on dodging being in the same part of the car with Ellis... no sense endangering his chances. He nodded simply, looking away again and exhaling through his nostrils, smoke curling back up to brush warmly against his face.

The big man seemed content with that response, just turning and trudging back toward the gas station door, talking over his shoulder. He let a hand raise up and wipe his forehead. "We get lucky, we'll be on the road fo' a while today. Gotta make as much ground as we can. These pumps are dead an' we ain't got a full tank - didn't find no cans lyin' 'round, neither."

"At least we know where we're going." Rochelle pointed out easily, turning slightly and pushing off the truck to catch up with him, flexing her finger slightly at her sides and rolling her shoulder to adjust the machine gun sitting heavy on her back. She ducked into the gas station when Coach held the door for her, dropping her voice to keep from disturbing the out-cold hick behind the counter. "Straight shot for the beach you said, right? Down that highway."

Coach sighed slightly, touching her shoulder and pointing toward a pile of supplies stacked up in one of the aisles. It was small, the most pertinent and easily prepareable food and drink in the place - though she did notice a supply of sweets stowed away in a paper bag he'd gotten from beside the register, not that she blamed him. "Hope so, baby girl. Won't know till we get goin'."

He started to turn toward the counter, but she grabbed onto his sleeve at the last second and he glanced back, deep eyes a little morose as he looked expectantly at her, expression softened to that affectionate gruff he had with her. "...Why the move with Nick?" Rochelle's brows were pinched slightly, hand dropping with a soft jingle of her bangles.

Coach chuckled only barely, shaking his head and rubbing his bald head with his wrist. "Bein' honest? I got some questions on my mind, baby girl. Good time fo' askin' him... 'n anyway, ain't gettin' nobody nowhere if I'm stuck hatin' the guy. Gonna give him a chance." He gave her a reassuring nod, continuing on toward the counter the moment she'd given one back.

"As long as you aren't gonna kill him."

Coach smiled at that.

The big man rounded the store counter as cautiously as he could, stepping to Ellis' side and dropping slowly to a crouch, though his bad knee popped loudly in protest. Reaching down to lift the cap from the Ellis' face and reveal both his sleeping face and the tousled brown curls of his hair, he gently shook him by the shoulder.

"Son, we're movin'... you jus' get in the car an' you can go back to sleep." Coach tried, unwilling to be too rough. His tone was as gentle as his naturally gruff baritone could manage, though he was left sitting there when Ellis' only reaction was the smallest of mumbles and a twitch of his nose. Shaking him again, Coach chuckled sympathetically. "Ellis.. ain't no time fo' bein' a kid... c'mon now, boy." Waiting with a small countdown in the back of his mind, the ex-football player gave up. Resigned, he bent in and got thick arms around the lean mechanic's shoulder and under his arm, hoisting him up into an easy fireman's carry, Ellis buckled over his neck and supported by Coach's broad frame.

Straightening up with the smallest twinges of discomfort at the stress it put on his bad knee, Coach turned to carry the hick back outside the gas station. Ellis barely even stirred, and the odd angle his body was at turned his breaths into hiccups snoring... not that it seemed to bother his deep sleep.

Judging by the freshly stamped-out cigarette and the half-open door, Nick had already retreated into the truck, though his haste went unnoticed. Coach was gently depositing Ellis in the truck bed, leaning in and arranging him to nestle into the rubber lining, when he noticed the very light scent of beer.

Cocking his head in slight confusion, Coach eyed the sleeping kid for just a moment before slowly settling his cap against his hands. Ellis' fingers instantly twitched to grab hold of it, nestling it close to his chin and then stilling again, curling just a little bit.

The big man, however, had only a very short period of time to wonder why the mechanic smelled like alcohol before Rochelle came out of the gas station, arms loaded with supplies. He backtracked to meet her halfway, taking some of it from her and carrying it back to load up the truck around the unconscious mechanic.

"Ain't had breakfast, but we can eat on the road." Coach commented in a grunt, offering a hand to hoist Rochelle up into the truck bed. She flashed him a short smile as she took his offer, hopping up and walking gingerly over the bed to settle down beside Ellis. She draped an affectionate hand over his back.

Coach eyed them for just a moment, then pulled back and gently shut the truck's tailgate. He stood there for a moment, taking a mental checklist, his fingers flexing - it felt like the morning had gone too fast, too smoothly. He had a bad feeling and it stuck to him like so much fog.

But everything was in order and they were loaded up. He reached over the tailgate to snatch his shotgun from where Rochelle had set it down, carrying it with him as he pulled away. With no small grunt, the big man circled the truck and tossed open the door, hauling himself up into the driver's seat. "You know how to turn this shit on, Nick?" he questioned as he settled his hands on the wheel, letting the door shut behind him.

Nick gave a small glance sideways at the prompt, sighing faintly and hooking one hand in his half-open door's handle. He shut it carefully, then bent over the truck's bulky gearshift to reach the wires underneath the wheel.

Glad to see the wires had been disconnected delicately, it was a simple matter of readjusting them and restarting the connection, and within a few breaths the truck sparked to life and Nick could recoil from the slightly odd posture he'd been forced into.

"There." he said very simply, leaning far back in his seat and coolly getting his feet up to nestle them on the dashboard, draping his head against the knuckles of an upraised hand. "We're just lucky it's an old truck. That shit doesn't work on most cars."

He could see Coach giving him a slightly dull sideways look, unimpressed with his sprawling, but the football coach didn't say anything, just reached to the control panel on the door. The truck was old enough to have window cranks, and Coach lowered the window with a few creaky rotations.

"Maybe this'll go smooth.." the big man gruffed quietly, adjusting the rear-view mirror and squinting out to the street. "Looks kinda calm."

The conman rolled his eyes subtly, leaning his head back and tensing his lips as his gaze flickered up toward the rear-view mirror. He squinted just slightly at what he could see of Rochelle's head just outside the back window. She had her head turned slightly, glancing down toward the snoozing Ellis, and Nick found his gaze sliding to follow hers even though he couldn't actually see.

Agitation, real and harsh, flared in his voice as he muttered, "Say that and everything will go to shit."
Chapter 24

The truck maneuvered easily around the abandoned cars and broken street that mottled the Savannah blocks. Coach barely paid any attention to the zombies they drove by, focusing mainly on his driving - and on not getting the truck trapped on the clogged streets.

Nick's discomfort with his swerving and reactive driving was evident from the way his right hand had a knuckle-white grip on the armrest of his chair, even though his posture remained a lounging sprawl worthy of an uncaring teenager.

Hidden more effectively was the swaying nausea that struck him with every jerk of the wheel, minor but tangible. He struggled on and off with a slight twinge of a headache, each time making him regret his drinking a little bit more. Better in a few minutes. he thought, defensively.

One hand of Coach's was only half on the wheel, its thumb and forefinger pulled away to grip onto the plastic package of a roll of powdered donuts. Rochelle had passed them up through the side window, and Nick had one as well - though it was untouched, resting on the coiled dip of his stomach. He wasn't interested in eating, and even less in eating those.

Oddly, as Coach revved the engine to plow through a few infected who had brainlessly sprinted out into the street in an attempt to attack the vehicle, Nick was the first to prompt conversation. His tone was a little taut, expressing his displeasure easily. "I'll make the leap of logic that you'd bite my head off if I smoked."

Coach snorted, more a grunt than anything else, humored like Nick was making a joke. Deciding to just take that as a 'yes,' the conman gave a small sigh and rolled his head into his hand, scratching at his scalp in a slow motion.

"Ain't good fo' you, y'know." the big man commented suddenly, cranking the wheel to drive them halfway up onto the sidewalk to get around a clog of cars in the middle of the road.

Nick squinted slightly, leaning back reflexively as a zombie was crushed up against the nose of the truck and rolled up onto his door for a moment, but snarked off a short response. "Neither are the fucking zombies." Coach didn't immediately respond, so Nick shrugged a shoulder and tacked on with a slightly less hostile tone, "I don't usually hit it half this hard. You blame me?"

The big man chuckled, silently staring forward at the road as he took a turn around a corner. He pried the last doughnut of the roll free from its package, biting in clear in half with his first mouthful and chewing slowly, wrist wiping powder from his mouth. Nick bit his teeth together subtly, giving an annoyed roll of his eyes and turning his head to glance out the back window.

Judging by Rochelle's posture and how she was looking out from the truck bed, Ellis was still asleep - somehow. The fact they hadn't actually had to fire off any shots yet that morning gave him the excuse of at least not sleeping through gunfire, but Nick still felt himself scoffing in half-frustration.

He must've 'tch'ed softly under his breath, because Coach sent him a sideways look.

Shrugging it off, Nick glanced out through the windshield and watched with a slight blink as they suddenly bounced up over a pole lying across the road, hurrying through a turn immediately afterward.

"I can't tell what kinda guy you are, Nick."
The gambler curled his tongue and sighed, pulling his crossed legs down off the dashboard and sitting up in the car seat. He swiped the donuts off his lap with a soft brush of his knuckles, not bothering to see where they ended up. He retorted, of course, although his tone was still fairly cool. "This again, really? How many times are you and Rochelle going to bother me about this shi-"

"Now don't get yo' hackles up," Coach quickly interrupted, brows furrowing up warily and fingers flexing on the steering wheel as he guided the truck down the road. "You blame me fo' wantin' to know a little about someone I'll be trustin' my life with - sooner than later?"

Nick snorted quietly, settling back in the seat just a slight bit. He shrugged a shoulder, relenting only a little, even if he had no plans to really answer any questions. "What exactly are you expecting? Ten to one, you'd hate whatever I tell you."

The big man seemed to think, some of the tension leaving his brow. He leaned back in his seat, sliding his fingers down to grip the wheel at a more slack angle. He apparently threw caution to the wind and just asked it.

"You married?"

Nick felt himself blinking a bit, lifting a brow and a hand to cuff at his chin. He couldn't fight an inner sense of bewilderment, trying to figure out how they'd skipped the topics he'd braced for. Like, any other topic at all. "Where the hell did that come from?"

Coach chuckled slightly, shrugging his shoulder and focusing for a moment as the Chevy was forced to weave carefully through the wreckage of what looked to have once been a wire barricade between two buildings, now crushed under some kind of collision. It'd completely buckled inward... Coach seemed to give it a look, frowning vaguely, but said nothing about it.

The cityscape was starting to change - the blocks were more spacious, road a little wider...they were starting to pull away from the center of Savannah.

"Ro' noticed a tanline yesterday.. Figured you were missin' a weddin' ring, but it ain't like she'd ask."

Nick snorted instantly, crossing his arms loosely over his chest and curling his fingers in his sleeves. The smallest glance confirmed, though he already knew: his left ring finger was bare, unlike the three other rings that bedecked his knuckles on various fingers, and the last knuckle was encircled by a slightly pale circle.

It was only a shade or two... but it still hadn't been long enough since he'd shed the ring for it to catch up.

And she was acting like I was coming onto HER.. checking for tanlines? Really? "Funny how you're all up in arms about my secrets while I don't even know your fuckin' name. And it's happily divorced, thanks." he snapped defensively, inhaling a sharp breath and scratching his bicep in an agitated motion.

Coach lifted a few of his fingers from the steering wheel in a half-dismissive and half-calming motion, shaking his head slightly. "We got half that in common, ain't no reason to get mad." He took in a breath, then added, "An' if it bugs you that much, it's Samuel Garrett.. but keep wit' Coach. Simpler."

Curiously, Nick loosened his grip on his biceps. He eyed Coach - no, 'Samuel' wasn't going to stick anytime soon, that was for sure - sideways a little more, not looking up when the truck jolted abruptly, running over something. I didn't even read him as a married man... divorced, though?

"Who left who?" he prompted rather callously, decidedly not commenting on the introduction, but Coach didn't seem offended. There was a slight downturn to the wrinkled edges of the man's deep-set eyes that betrayed his answer before he gave it, and Nick glanced away again once he spoke up.

"You tell me if I tell you, boy?" Coach joked rather seriously, pressing a little harder on the pedal to drive them well out of the clutches of a small milling cluster of zombies that lunged at the truck.

The conman smirked vaguely, resting his mouth against his knuckles and offering a, "Sure." Judging by Coach's sidelong glance, the big man didn't believe him in the slightest, but with a loud and breezy inhale, he responded anyway.

"She found someone else... happens, Nick. I ain't begrudgin' her happiness, even if it's wit' another man." He said it resignedly, the words pulsing with a long-since earned sense of justification. Nick read it gradually, tipping his head against his hand and musing as he listened. He was rather pleased he'd not only wormed out of talking, but gotten Coach to fall victim to his own trap.

"My coachin' at a high-school wasn't ever a real point of pride fo' her, anyway. Didn't make too much on it, either. Don't blame her fo' gettin' tired of it - I been doin' the same job since I got outta college." He let a calmed sigh pass through his wide nostrils, flaring them, and shook his head.

"Been years since she left, though. Old news... you?"

Nick didn't let him slip by, though - he felt like the older man was trying to pull something on him. There was an edge to his reaction that didn't match up - his words were honest, but there was something missing that echoed in the frown on his face and the odd weight in his eyes.

"What're you cutting out, Sam?" he challenged - but Coach didn't stand the callousness (nor the mocking use of his name) as well the second time around, drawing an obviously disapproving breath and raising a hand to scratch at the heavy scruff of his rounded cheek before he replaced his hand on the wheel.

"... You're cuttin' out everything. Don't pull that shit on me, boy."

"Lead by example, Coach. You should know that, of any of us." Nick smirked at him, holding utterly still as he waited in cool and rather smug expectation. He let his fingers adjust his suit over his frame, reaching up to straighten his collar against his neck. Belatedly and subconsciously, his fingertip brushed against the scab along his neck.

It had looked so infected that first day, but now it felt like nothing more than a cat scratch. Between that and his fever disappearing overnight, Nick felt… better. Good, even.

He felt confident, now, in saying it hadn't been signs of the Green Flu, but it wasn't like they had time to get sick otherwise - even regular sick.

Drawing his focus again, Coach sighed wearily. The older Georgian shook his head in disapproval before somewhat reluctantly lifting a bulky shoulder. His voice was uncertain of its phrasing for what had to have been the first time since Nick met him. ".It- .. she got our daughter, that's all."

"Momma with a step-dad was better fo' her than a single dad. I ain't spitin' or nothin' - it was all civil."
The conman barely gave a response, turning his head slightly and glancing out the window. He doubted both parts of that last statement, though he was well aware of his own cynicism. "Maybe you should." He said it with rare tact, hostility held behind pursed lips.

Coach laughed gruffly, shaking his head and rubbing at the wheel with his palms. "Nah.. ain't worth it, boy. If you're spitin' your ex still, you're wastin' yo' time.. we still get along. I see my li'l baby girl 'cause of it. Don't much like her new man, but it still ain't worth it. We're all adults."

Biting back a small laugh, Nick didn't miss the use of 'baby girl' and how the big man called Rochelle the same thing. It wasn't particularly new that Coach treated her a little paternally, though the new tidbits Nick was ascertaining seemed to solidify it to a more serious fact. He wondered if Rochelle knew, or if he was the first to be told.

"Women are greedy bitches." he muttered simply, the decision firm though he flashed a smirk like he was simply fishing for a reaction when Coach gave him a slightly wide look of distaste. "You'd be surprised what you end up learning about them, if you let yourself look."

Coach sighed just a little, apparently deciding to skim over the gambler's derisive phrasing rather than arguing. He let his shoulders roll back and pop, questioning, "Guess that means you gave her the boot?"

Nick was quiet, lips parted, just long enough to count as a hesitation. His fingers started to seek purchase in the fabric of his jacket, but before either of them could say anything, there was a rap on the back window.

The distraction was more than welcome.

Turning with a lifted brow, Nick found Rochelle crouching up where she was nestled against the back of the cab, a frown on her face. She was in the process of shaking Ellis awake. To Nick's displeasure, the kid was slowly starting to stir, sleepily rubbing at his face and leaning against her to fight the shift and shake of the moving truck.

Rochelle beckoned with her free hand, rubbing Ellis' shoulder with the other. She said something, but it was too muffled by the thick back window to hear. As they'd done to get breakfast up into the front, Nick reached to the small crank below the passenger-side window to roll it down, grunting a little as he twisted and slipped his head out of the car, scowling heavily.

"What?" he called back to Rochelle, lifting brows as she leaned over the side of the truck bed to meet his advance.

"I might be crazy, but I keep hearing something... can you get Coach to pull over?"

Sighing slightly but giving a confirming nod, Nick drew back all the way into the truck, gesturing with one hand toward the side of the road. He used the other to readjust his wind-blown hair, grumbling. "Stop the car."

He kept quiet as Coach obeyed after a moment, merely watching as the big man quickly tossed it into park and shoved the door open. Coach dragged up his shotgun from the floorboard, leaning out into the street and quickly scanning for infected.

There were still a few stragglers chasing after them up the road, but it was a simple matter of gunning them down from a distance. The shotgun blast may have been inaccurate, but it only took a few pellets straight to the face to down the infected. By the time Coach lowered the gun, Nick had gotten out to lean up against the side of the truck and focus on Rochelle, expectantly.
Ellis was sitting up on his own now against the back end of the truck bed, cap lowered to shade his eyes and most of his mouth - though not all of it. Were Nick to let himself look over, he'd have seen the smallest signs of a frown. It took effort not to glance, but the gambler wasn't interested in fighting that battle just then.

"What's wrong, baby girl?" Coach prompted as he rested an elbow on the edge of the truckbed, curiously inspecting the woman's slightly nervous grip on her pistol.

"I think it's that thing again, that chased us off-track from the hotel..." she responded, frowning and shaking her head a little. She crawled up to the side of the bed, carefully hitching up a leg to slip over it, Coach reaching up to help her down. "I could've been hearing things, but..."

"Whut thing?" It was Ellis who asked it, even though Nick was primed to, and the kid quietly raised up his chin to glance at Coach and Rochelle, turning his body away from the conman. Nick simmered silently with his weight shifting from foot to foot.

The cold shoulder? Really?

That was going to get insufferable, fast.

Rochelle sighed as she settled on the asphalt, taking a few steps away from the truck and lifting her chin to listen to a loud, heavy crashing noise some small distance away. "Big guy... really, really big. Really, really, really big and not at all what I want to meet again... CEDA calls them Tanks."

"It was flingin' cars like toys." the big man grunted in agreement, making Nick straighten with a bit of a blink. Two memories shot up to the forefront of his mind - the cars implanted in the sides of buildings like bugs squashed into the wall, and his own car, shoved off the highway going full speed.

But he didn't mention either.

"Whut, it's like the Hulk?" The hick lifted his hands to rub his head through his cap. It was a touch startling how unexcited he seemed with the concept. Ellis' voice was just… flat, relative to his normal chipper behaviour, although maybe it was exhaustion. He forced himself up, reaching down to pick up his shotgun from where it had been lodged against their cache of supplies.

Hooking it under his bandaged arm, he rolled himself over the truck's tailgate and stood up against the back bumper. Ellis stretched as much as he could with a heavy yawn, the action overtaking him the instant he was vertical.

"... or, the actual question of the moment," Nick muttered hostilely before he could stop himself, turning his head away and moving to reach into the truckbed and bend himself over the rim. He retrieved his machine gun - just in case. "How the hell do we kill it?"

Nick didn't miss the glance Ellis shot at him, nor the retreat he made for Coach's side. The kid was fingering the grip of his pump-shotgun. "Yuh wanna suggest somethin' helpful, N-" he shot back with an impulsive, discomfited tone, starting the conman's name before he was interrupted.

They were all silent a moment as the loud sound of crushing metal preceded a thunderous rumble. It was guttural, and loud, and couldn't have been further from human-sounding. Nick felt it against the flats of his dress shoes, making him knot his brow.

Maybe under different circumstances, more attention would have been paid to the kid's behaviour. Now, Coach just gripped Ellis’ shoulder reassuringly, and not much more was said.
"Who votes we get back in the goddamn car and keep driving?" he suggested coldly, shooting a glare at Ellis from across the truckbed. The kid didn't meet his gaze despite clearly noticing it, curling his free hand into a bit of a fist. If Nick wasn't seeing things, the bridge of his nose grew a slash of red as his face flushed.

Don't know if you wanna be pissed or scared, do ya, kiddo... Nick didn’t have time to feel guilty. Preferably, he'd avoid it entirely, if he could. He quickly shook the thoughts away and jammed a thumb at the truck. "Well?!

'I'm wit' Nick on this one. We ain't-'

But Coach didn't get to explain his agreement. Something - a very suddenly close, very suddenly loud something - roared out an aggressive call, echoing on the air, and a huge shape came thundering out onto their street from an intersection back behind them.

It must've been the size of a small elephant. Pure, raw muscle rippled on every inch of its deformed frame, skin stretched so tight over the unnatural bundles of muscle packed onto it that it almost seemed ready to split. Its arms were gigantic and meaty, and they dragged its whole torso down, putting its weight mostly on its knuckles as it lunged out from between two buildings. One hand landed on the rear end of a car, crushing the vehicle instantly into the ground in a shower of glass and bits of chassis.

Its head was sunken into the middle of bulging shoulders, seeming almost consumed by its own ballooning brawn, but there was no mistaking its focus on the survivors - and the enraged roar that sounded like half-formed words and growled gargles made it painfully clear they had no options.

Coach thundered back to the front seat, jumping in and slamming the door, and without a thought Nick vaulted up onto the trunkbed as Rochelle and Ellis did the same. He thrust himself up against the wall of it, jamming his body tightly and hooking an arm in a strap clearly meant for holding cargo. Grabbing hold of Rochelle's arm, Nick urged her over to hook elbows with him, bracing both of them down.

"Ellis." he demanded shortly, tone leaving absolutely no room for argument. There wasn't any, anyway, as the brawny monstrosity swung into a thundering run down the road toward them, cracking asphalt with every step.

With a visibly uneasy expression but little choice, the younger man scrambled over and got an arm around Rochelle, locking into the neat huddle they had down in the truckbed. The moment they were settled, Nick slammed the butt of his SMG against the truck, signaling Coach.

And Coach floored it. Tires squealed with burning rubber as the Chevy protested it, but even so it went, rollicking like a train gone wild and jolting its passengers like so much loose change.

Aiming was a pipe-dream, but Nick did his best to brace his gun against the side of the tailgate. The gambler fired in sporadic bursts - unfortunately realizing very quickly that the bullets weren't so much as giving the thing pause. The pure power behind its vaulting strides was letting it keep up with the truck a little too easily.

For just a split second, Nick thought he saw the thing start to stop - only to watch with some amount of disbelief as the thing scooped up a van crashed into a lightpole and heaved it over its head, roaring as it braced to throw the thing.

"TITS!" he shouted reflexively, trying to shoot more accurately and hit something vital to halt the thing's throw. Both Rochelle and Ellis tried to shoot, too, but Coach drove them squealing around a corner and all three of them had to grab onto the truck and each other to keep from tumbling over.

There was an instant there where a weightless feeling enveloped Nick's gut, before the Chevy steadied its balance and peeled off down the new street.

"Jesus!" Rochelle gasped, very clearly shaken as the van they'd nearly had thrown at them went skidding across the asphalt behind them, rolling along with terrible noises of broken glass and metal.

That, however, was nothing compared to the enraged and guttural roaring that echoed soon after, and the tremendous noise of the Tank's revived chase despite the ground it'd lost. Nick couldn't deny it was terrifying as shit.

And the fact he could feel Ellis cringe away every single time their arms, both looped around Rochelle, touched, was just the cherry on top.
"Ain't givin' up!" Ellis' voice cracked down the middle as he shouted it, crouched body flinching back as the lumbering thing chasing them crashed sideways into the face of a building. Bits of house went flying in all directions, but the thing barely slowed, one meaty hand grabbing hold of a chunk of framework and chucking it toward them.

Coach swerved them to dodge it, rocking the truck violently, and clipped a parked car with the very nose of it. A shout was drawn from the big man as his mistake earned a long scrape along the side of their car, and Rochelle cursed sharply, clinging to the men on either side of her.

She grabbed hard at Nick's sleeve, balking his gunfire suddenly and crying out over the roar of the Tank and the truck's engine: "We have to kill it! Coach and I only escaped because it didn't actually spot us - we can't lose this thing!"

The gambler took one look at her frightened expression and leaned in to hiss at her, "You know things about these asshats, how do we kill it?!" When Rochelle hesitated, terror heightening in the taut distress of her pupils, he repeated it, furiously, "How?!"

She broke, shaking her head quickly and averting her gaze. "I-I don't know! They never-"

Nick silenced her with a growl, shaking her hand away and quickly getting his machine gun up again to try and aim for the monstrous thing's comparatively underdeveloped lower body. If they could cripple its legs, maybe they could do harm - as it was, bullets were definitely not doing much against the flexing mass of muscle that slathered its torso.

Ellis noticed Nick's switch of focus, but he hesitated on joining in, glancing sideways at the conman. A weighty tremble touched the mechanic's jaw as a fierce jolt of the truck made them all bounce. Struggling to find a way to whisper it to Rochelle while speaking over the ruckus all around them, the kid managed, "S'alright, Ro'..." and then straightened up in his crouch.

Ellis grabbed hold of the top of the tailgate with one hand, leaning back and trying to look around at the buildings speeding past them, squinting through his lashes as the wind made his eyes water.

Something must've clicked in his head, because suddenly he broke away from Rochelle and darted across the truck bed with his shotgun thrust under his arm, clamping hands on the back of the cab as he reached it. Ellis leaned over the side, dangerously thrusting his torso around the edge of the truckbed, and shouted into the window at Coach: "TURN LEFT, MAN!"

Sure enough, the big man obeyed without a question, and the truck veered suddenly off the main street and went barreling around a corner. Ellis lost his balance and flailed back to land sprawled in the truck bed, looking startled, but he quickly started picking himself back up.

"Are you okay, honey?" Rochelle immediately questioned, almost pulling away from Nick to crawl over to him - but the gambler interjected before she could, making her stop and glare back at him.

"What the fuck are you doing, Overalls?" Nick yelled back at him, lowering his gun as they separated from the Tank for just a few precious moments. The conman felt a pang in his gut immediately afterward, noticing how the kid shrunk away at the harsh wording before regaining his feet. Rochelle's glare burned a little more after that.

Ellis stubbornly darted back to thrust down to his knees at the tailgate, replacing his shotgun against his shoulder but turning his head back to squint ahead of them. He gestured with the tip of his hat, screwed so tight onto his head the wind couldn't wrest it free. "Got an idea! Muh buddy Keith told me 'bout this once! They do it in all the movies. We jus' gotta lead him up here!"

Uncomprehending, Nick lifted his head and tried to look in the direction Ellis was - and, finding themselves drawn to the protruding sign for a gas station just a minute down the street, light-flecked green eyes blinked wider as he struck the same train of thought the kid had found.

"Holy shit, you're insane!" he blurted, and for just an instant, thought he saw a smile flicker over Ellis’ face, though it disappeared as the Tank came blundering around the corner and thrust itself with its knuckles into the street after them, roaring a thunderous noise upon spotting them. "We can't blow a fucking gas station!"

"A-Are you joking?!" Rochelle looked like she might be ill and outraged at the same instant. When Nick noticed she was staring at him, he quickly thrust his elbow at Ellis with a defensive expression, as if to shove the blame toward the younger man.

"Yuh got any better ideas?" Ellis challenged, although with a surprising lack of confidence and a visible downturn to his chin. There was, however, a spark of something in the clear blues of his eyes that Nick hadn't seen yet: a certain gleeful excitement.

Neither of them did, or at least couldn't scrabble for a response fast enough, and with a short roll of his shoulder, Ellis dug in deep where he kneeled. He aimed his shotgun at the side of the road where the gas station would flash into existence as they passed it.

Snarling a relenting, "Tits...", Nick pushed Rochelle gently to switch places with him, doing an awkward spin in his crouch. She fumbled a bit as he did, seeming flustered, but he did little but give her a severe look. Dropping to his knees next to Ellis, Nick made a concerted effort not to notice when the hick tensed up and gripped his shotgun a little harder.

"I hope you two know what you're doing!" Rochelle gasped warily, wrapping her arms around the truck's rim and ducking her head down slightly, covering her face with a forearm.

Not a fuckin' chance...

Nick pulled up his machinegun to mirror Ellis, close enough that their elbows touched - up till Ellis shuffled over an inch, that was. That snapped Nick's attempt to ignore it, and with a very tight jaw, he uttered, "Hate me later.. shoot now."

Nick noticed Ellis glance at him, a weird flicker of something hesitant darting over his expression. It almost looked like surprise, and a slight flush followed suit across the bridge of his nose. Before Nick could really think on it much, the truck roared past the gas station.

Both of them aimed sharply at the gas pumps rising up in gaudy red pillars, the noses of their guns snapping up.. They ticked along to try and follow as they got further away - and it was Ellis who blurted, "NOW!" when the Tank flung itself out onto the stretch of road just in front of the building.

The blast of their guns was, for just a beat of time, fruitless. Bullets visibly flashed on the asphalt around the pumps still rapidly moving away from them. Rochelle joined in from nowhere, Glock snarling in her hands - and then they struck home. A soft flame thrust up in the wake of the copper shell, lone and dim for just a split second... and as gas leaked from the pump, it all caught fire.

The chain reaction happened all in a blink, as the first pump went up in flames and exploded, so went the other three lined up. Red-hot fire burst like so much pouring water from the mouth of a hose, crawling along with the liquid gasoline.

It didn't explode so much as it burst, and the wave of fire engulfed the monstrous Tank and sent it staggering sideways into a building on the other side of the street. The noise was deafening and the sight blinding, though somewhere Nick was aware of a scream from his left and a shout from his right, and the truck swerving violently as Coach sent them into a violent skid, brakes squealing.

Nick found himself quickly falling back onto the bottom of the truck bed, struggling to find purchase in something. The rubber padding spared him any pain, though his head spun and his eyes were stinging. The heat had reached them, like a flat wall of heavy, burning air.

"-OO-LEE SHEEE-IT WE DID IT!" Ellis' voice buzzed into his consciousness a little delayed and half-echoed. The conman blinked his eyes open, lifting his head and trying to get his elbows underneath him, feeling the truck stabilizing and starting to slow underneath him. "HOLY SHIT WE KILLED IT!"

Dragging up to a sitting position, Nick quickly noticed Rochelle staring gape-mouthed down the street. He followed her gaze, ignoring Ellis and his arms-in-the-air hooting for just a moment, and surveyed the destruction they'd caused.

"OH MAH GAWD WE DID IT! WHOOOOO! THAT WAS SO COOL! DID YUH SEE THAT?!"

Flames were chewing on every inch they could reach, spread across the street and up the faces of the buildings on each side of the ruined gas station. Through the growing haze of heat and smoke Nick could see the immobile form of the Tank. The smoke was turning black as it ate away at the now-dead monstrosity, and the mix of burning gasoline and burning flesh was cloying.

They'd attracted some attention with that, but none of the zombies seemed smart enough to avoid the fire. They ran straight into it, gasoline fire catching on their legs and sending them staggering, stumbling, and screaming to the ground.

"No, I fucking didn't." Nick muttered sarcastically, abandoning his gun beside himself and raising both hands to rake through his hair in a rather stressed motion. "Better do that again."

"Oh mah sweet Lord!" The hick was absolutely beside himself, cheeks flushed and eyes wide, clapping on the top of his cap with his free palm and standing up as the truck rolled to a stop. "Man I ain't never SEEN nothin' like that! Slap a saddle on me 'n call me a horse! I can't wait tuh see the look on Keith's face when I tell'im - oh mah GAWD!"

"I-I can't.. I can't believe we actually did that.." Rochelle muttered under her breath, setting a hand on her forehead and turning her gaze toward Nick, completely frazzled. "I can't believe that actually happened. Aren't they supposed to have... safety features.. or - or something?!"

For some reason, the conman drugged up a smirk to give her, watching her sense wilt a little further at the expression. "Sorry. Let's remember to call OSHA when we get out of here." She rubbed her face outright with her palm, sighing heavily, and Nick offered quietly, "... Killed it, didn't we?"

The truck door swung open, and with a slight shift of the vehicle's weight, Coach clambered out. He didn't go far, just standing there in the open space between the door and the cabin, slowly lifting a hand to rub at his head.

With a slow, relenting sigh, he gruffed, "... Ellis, son... yo' head ain't on right. What if we'da gotten hit by that?" The big man's tone was noticeably un-chastising, and he eyed the mess behind them with an air of resignation.

Ellis seemed to lose just a little bit of his high, gritting out a slightly grimaced smile in an attempt to look abashed when he really couldn't pull it off. "Didn't have no other choice, Coach. I had tuh think quick!"

Coach sighed indelicately, leaning his head around the truck to eye Nick and Rochelle. "You two a'ight? Nobody hurt?"

"All good..." Nick uttered with prompt sarcasm, starting to shift to his feet so he could stand on the truckbed and crack his knuckles, pressing them into the opposite palm. "I think Ro' might have grown a few grey hairs in the middle of all that, though."

She couldn't even muster up a response beyond a short 'hrmpfh,' leaning heavily against the truck's tailgate and turning her head to give the burning scene behind them another disbelieving once-over.

"She ain't the only one." Coach grunted for just a moment, then set his hand against the side of the truck and let his shoulders drop a little. "Bit risky, but good thinkin', son. Can't complain much, since that shit's dead."

Ellis flushed slightly, jabbing a thumb urgently over his shoulder. With Coach seemingly on his side, he tried to push it: "Yuh gotta admit, that shit.. was.. cooool.."

..but got nowhere, getting a small taut-jawed look of warning from the ex-football player. He shut up obediently, lifting a hand to scratch at the back of his head through his cap and glance down at his feet.

Rochelle recovered enough to speak up, reaching out to gesture back down the street with a sigh. "I.. I gotta say, it's nice to see that thing dead. I'd take a horde over that thing chasing after us..." A thought seemed to strike her mid-sentence, and with a wary pause, she prompted, "You guys don't think there's more of them, do you?"

Nobody spoke for just a breath - nobody knew, in the end, though even Ellis had a slightly drawn lower lip that suggested he hoped not. The question was an uncomfortable one, hanging heavy.

"Least we know how tuh kill it." the kid pointed out rather optimistically, gripping both hands onto his shotgun and twisting it a little. Rochelle promptly laughed, dubiously inspecting him from where she sat.

"What, blow up another fueling station..? There's gotta be something else... it's just CEDA barely even mentioned them at all. Honestly I thought they might be a rumor, until... we saw the first one."

Coach shrugged heavily, rubbing his rounded and stubbled chin with his wrist. "Rather go off the 'ssumption we ain't gonna meet another one of those motherfuckers."

Nick prompted to change the subject before they continued, grabbing hold of the tailgate to hoist up to his feet and wipe the front of his jacket slightly. It was a mindless self-soothing gesture. "Fighting it made a lot of fucking noise, and I'm coming to understand that's not a goddamn good thing. We should probably get out of here before we get jumped by something. We can mope about our impending doom when we get someplace safe again."

Coach nodded where he stood, exhaling a heavy grunt and turning back to get into the car. "We ain't much off track. Should be on the highway in half an hour.. maybe an hour." he assured them.
over his shoulder, sounding rather weary. "Nick... you stayin' up here wit' me?"

The conman quickly confirmed that with a short "Yeah.", noting instantly Ellis had started to glance toward him. Nick found himself gritting his teeth to see that edgy discomfort start to creep back into Ellis, who had been previously distracted by the explosion.

Aware Rochelle was watching, Nick felt like he was toeing a very thin line. At the same time he struggled to stand what he'd burdened the Georgian with, he struggled to discern why not giving a shit was so difficult for him this time. He just wanted to not care.

Instead, he got that enraging voice in the back of his head that said, Fffuucckk, Nicolas, you are a grade A asshole... He could say something nice, for once. The Georgian had just pretty much single-handedly delivered them from being a bunch of splattered stains on the ground.

So he tried: "Hey, Ov-"

"Don't."

It happened so quickly Nick was left rather tongue-tied. The mechanic's voice quavered, and the tone that should've been disgusted or offended was dropped to a plea. Ellis flushed sharply along his cheeks, and Nick couldn't help but stare in disconcertion as the kid lifted a hand to quickly lower his cap down over his eyes and step away from him, crossing the truckbed to drop down to sit against one of the corners.

Feeling a twisting sensation, a stabbing ache of guilt, Nick tossed out the only reaction he had: he turned about with a moody growl under his breath and climbed down from the truck, stalking to the passenger side door. He threw it open blindly and climbed in, snorting out a bull-like breath as he shut it and settled down in the seat.

"You a'ight, Nick?" the big man asked, generally gruff tone sounding a little surprised at the sudden change he'd clearly missed, and turned his head to eye the gambler.

Nick didn't even bother finding an excuse. He just responded blandly, "Fine, thanks." and arched his back so he could drag his suit jacket off his shoulders and fold it in his lap, still hot from the blast.

Coach pushed the truck into drive and gently eased it to a roll, definitely unconvinced. He sped the Chevy up once he'd comforted himself that it hadn't suffered any real damage during the chase and the blast, and once he hit a good speed he tried just once more. "Somethin' happen?"

The conman shifted a glance up into the rearview mirror, staring a moment at the back of Ellis' downturned head - Rochelle hadn't moved. She was still looking back at the wreckage, turned around at the waist... keeping her distance, or maybe oblivious. Nick couldn't tell.

Nick saw Ellis' head start to turn just a little, and he risked continuing to watch through the mirror. The kid looked over his shoulder, lower lip bitten heavily between his teeth in a worried gesture, redness only just starting to drain from his face.

Another thing Nick couldn't tell: what that face meant. Ellis was so hard to read in that moment, despite being such an open book in any other situation. Confusion? Anger? Fear? None of them fit, but hell if Nick knew what did. And he definitely didn't know what the hell to make of that red colour that had been burning on his face.

"I dunno, Samuel. You tell me."
The nonsensical, mocking response did exactly what Nick wanted and nothing more: Coach let him be, gruffly and quietly falling to silence. For once, the conman was glad for the big man's complaints with his cigarettes. The itch to pull one out was a good distraction, although it did worsen his irritation as he sat rather still, and actually smoking him would've been a better one.

The drive to reach the highway (however winding, considering they had to go around the wreckage they'd caused, and a detour didn't immediately make itself known) was, in comparison, almost uneventful. Though no one in their right mind would complain in light of the near-death experience the Tank encounter had been, Nick found himself very close to doing so. At least it'd be better than just sitting around.

He had trouble finding anything interesting enough to overtake the constant echo of Ellis' pleading 'Don't' reverberating in his head, and the relentless musing his brain was doing on trying to figure out why the tone Ellis had said it in had been so goddamn painful to listen to.

The sky was already dim by the time the truck's dashboard clock hit a solid '4:30,' green numbers flashing on a dusty orange backlight. Nick noticed the sun was still fairly high above their heads, but the air was full of smoke and ash as the wind blew it in swirls from the wrecked Savannah.

Coach had discovered that the back window popped up by way of a lever near his shoulder, and Rochelle and Ellis were both settled close to the now-open gateway. They'd eaten lunch like that, Coach producing a pocket knife from his backpack to allow Rochelle to crack open a few cans of cold spaghetti rings.

Nick's expression had been one of complete disgust at the concept, and he'd very nearly shuddered when Rochelle had cracked open the first one. The meal was suspect in a normal situation, but unheated and straight from the can - there wasn't a word for it. The likely-mostly artificial tomato sauce had separated into a slightly orange foam along the edge of the can, and the pasta was clumped in very questionably circular shapes.

She hadn't exactly looked enthused at the time, either, and with a disgusted wrinkle to her nose, Rochelle had stirred the contents mercilessly with the slim pocketknife. It had looked a little more normal after that, and she had the presence of mind to shake the next one before opening it.

Coach and Ellis had taken a can each without a word of complaint, and Nick had found himself looking on with a level of horror, like an outsider peering in on some cultish and alien ritual, as the two men had risked the first few awkward sips.

If he hadn't been so impossibly, gut-achingly, tear-jerkingly starving at the time, he would've probably thrown himself from the truck rather than take the meticulously-shaken can Rochelle handed to him a few moments later. Unfortunately, that had been exactly what he was, and with a curse and a sharp look of displeasure, he'd endured a mental battle for a straight five minutes before taking a sip.

It wasn't awful, but it was close to the worst thing he'd ever eaten. He only kept going by virtue of pure, iron will - and hunger.

Now, well after they'd finished up and settled back into watching the city peter out as they drove along, Nick found he'd never regretted something so much. His stomach was flipflopping with tiny gurgles under his blue dress shirt (suit jacket tucked between him and the door like a pillow), and he felt a constant pressure at the back of his throat, making him feel like he was gulping back a retch every time he swallowed.

"I can't believe you asshats fucking made me eat that." he growled under his breath for the tenth time, reaching over to roll down the window and lean his head into the wind. He breathed deep through his nostrils, annoyed to hear the same response he'd gotten just about every other time: "Could've starved." It was a half-amused Coach who said it, the humor apparently not doused by the repetition. "Say somethin' if you want us t'pull over.. sure the zombies'll respect a man's privacy."

Nick gave him a scathing look sideways, grumbling quietly and crooking his arm outside the window. "I'll keep in here, thanks." He let his chin settle on his elbow, curling up a little, not entirely aware of how the position looked rather sulky.
"Keith got hisself sick eatin' canned stuff once, but that was 'cause it had a bunch'uh bug bits in it. I don't think them pasta cans had any of that, Nick." The comment was only marginally more interesting than the fact Ellis had actually said something directed at the conman for the first time since they'd started driving again. The kid's voice was slightly unsure, and he kept his gaze focused down at his forearms, but all the same...

He'd spoken before, seeming at least normal enough for the other two not to get alarmed, but not once had he done more than glance momentarily at Nick before quickly averting his gaze with something a lot like embarrassment. The conman had gladly returned the favor, completely ignoring him and not even bothering to try and decipher his reaction.

The decision had felt almost tacitly agreed upon. Now, suddenly, Ellis was breaking it?

Drawing his jaw taut, Nick pushed himself into responding. His tone came out rather sharply, and he found himself reluctantly sanding it to a softer edge as the words came. "I'm not sure I trust anything that comes out of Georgia, but sure, Overalls. I'll make the fucking wary assumption that there aren't bugs in my pasta."

Giving a small, hiccup-like chuckle and leaning in a little bit through the window, Ellis stretched his arm in toward the dashboard radio. He could just barely reach the knobs, turning the radio on and listening to the heavy static for a moment. "Wasn't so bad.. Maybe we can get some kind'uh heat next time we eat."

Nick found he didn't mind the small-talk just then, settling more against his crooked arm and pulling in a long breath through his nostrils. Ignoring the matter entirely was so much more preferable to Ellis' injured behaviour. Green eyes flicked sideways to watch the mechanic's fingers twitch softly, clicking the radio through each channel, with the smallest of pauses as the static wavered in and out.

"I doubt heating that shit up would help much."

Rochelle injected into the conversation there, lifting up her hands slightly and waving them. "Wait, wait, back up.. what's this about Keith eating bugs?"

Nick snorted slightly at the question, flexing his fingers and resting his knuckles against his mouth as a small - but thankfully benign - 'urp' caught him offguard, tasting unpleasantly metallic.

"Well," Ellis started, nestling down against the bottom of the open window frame. He set his left hand against his chin while the other kept turning the knob, flexing his elbow a little bit against the bandages that were starting to loosen. "He met this guy, who was sellin' shit on the side'uh the road. Y'know, like a yard sale, 'cept… well. In the back'uh some guy's truck. So -"

"Just follow all safety procedures as relayed by CEDA officials and posters." All of them went silent. The man's voice was monotone and crackling softly as he relayed the words like so much regurgitated plastic. "Barricade yourself in the nearest defensible building and wait for further instructions. Evacuation can only happen if everyone remains calm."

There was a soft click, and it began again. "Please follow all safety procedures as relayed by CEDA officials and posters. Barr -" Ellis changed the channel there, sighing a bit with pursed lips, bringing back the cloying static that suddenly seemed so much nicer.

"Bullshit." Coach gruffed quietly, sighing as he let one hand slip off the wheel and rest on his lap. The truck rumbled along under a wide blue sign, proclaiming an oddly clean 'I-80.' The sign was good news, and as the road peeled out from the last vestiges of the city, they were drawn into a widening highway.

"Why are those assclowns still spreading that? They were on the radio when I got here, too." Nick muttered against his wrist, moodily. "This place is a fucking wreck and they're not here anymore... hell, nobody's here anymore."

Rochelle slumped just slightly with a shrug, rubbing her fingertips against the bridge of her nose. "I had to memorize all their instructions. It's all just white noise now, isn't it... about as useful as being told to play dead - holding back mass panic by trying to stay reasonable, I guess, but.. I really thought they'd get it under control. Maybe they were just putting up a front."

"What? Putting up a front for cameras? Don't be fucking ridiculous, Ro'. This was apparently their best effort, and they fucked up." the conman sniped without raising his head, earning a disapproving look from Coach. He ignored it. "It's better off like this. You see how fucked the Vannah was? As if I'd give myself up to a group who can't keep a goddamn hotel from burning down."

Ellis fiddled with the knob a little bit more, rolling it less with intent and more with idleness. He drew his lips into a weird kind of curl, thinking a moment before he prompted, "Y'know, we are headin' to meet up with CEDA, Nick."

Nick snorted quietly, eyes narrowing a little as he moved a hand to settle on his stomach. "Yeah, and I have a fucking problem or two with that, but what exactly else is there to do? Go find a nice deserted island to wait the apocalypse out on? Fuck that. Besides, surely the military got called in by now. At least they have guns. And tanks. And helicopters."

Coach grunted, eyes flashing between the road and the gas gauge as he shifted his weight on his seat. "Either way, they ain't gonna just leave us, boy. We'll find 'em, 'n they'll have a plan. I got mo' confidence than you."

Rochelle nodded from where she was, upturning her palms quietly. "It'll work out.. and Nick is right in one way - there's nothing else to do even if we doubted them... We can't survive out here on our own. We have to find somebody."

Suddenly, Ellis jolted a little straighter, turning the radio off entirely. It startled all three of them. "Is that-? … It is! Nick!" His hand flung forward like a kid spotting candy, and pointed furiously downward. Nick couldn't do much else other than look where he was gesturing.

Bolted to the floorboard was a box, maybe the size and shape of a hardcover book. It looked to Nick's eye like some kind of squad car radio, with a few knobs and a squat readout that was currently unlit. A hand-held mouthpiece was latched onto the side. "The hell?"

"What is it, son?" Coach questioned, not able to spare much more than a few staggered glances, lest he lose track of his path on the highway.

"That's a C-B!" the mechanic chirped excitedly. He was back in full-force now, seeming thrilled with his discovery - and almost exasperated when the rest of the team didn't share in his enthusiasm. "C'mon, guys, y'know? Them radios truckers use tuh talk back'n'forth. Keith'n'I got one each so's we could talk all the time. We were gonna."

"Isn't that what phones are for?" Her voice was a little incredulous and a little teasing when Rochelle interjected.

Not one to let the wind be taken out of his sails, Ellis laughed. It was more real this time, and Nick fell to a side-eye on the kid's face. He seemed okay, relatively… or maybe just distracted. "Naw. It's way cooler. C'mon, man, turn it on! Maybe there's someone out there."

Ellis almost met his gaze… and then didn't. Nick watched him start to deflate. He imagined it would look like a hole being poked in one of those inflatable tube men, slowly collapsing and falling in on itself, all that joy turning into discomfort and self-conscious energy -

Not okay. And not, apparently, distracted enough.

So, instead, the gambler reached down between his knees and flicked what looked like a power knob. When the readout stuttered to life, showing a faded green 01, Ellis whooped in interest. He held his hand out, eagerly, and it was only with a roll of his eyes that Nick unlatched and dropped the mic into his hand.

The CB radio must have been hooked up to the car, because when Nick leaned down to turn the volume up, static rose in the speakers again. "I'm starting to hate Keith more than usual." he muttered, and started to slump back down in his seat.

Unfortunately for him, that wasn't it. Ellis pointed urgently at the radio. He was so excited he seemed liable to crawl into the truck cab himself if he wasn't humored. "C'mon, Nick, scan through the channels. These usually have loads of -"

Nick reached the end of his patience. In one swift motion, he raised his foot and braced the heel of his shoe against the edge of the CB. It was bracketed to the floor, but he could tell at a glance the connection was flimsy. How fortunate for it.

One good application of force later, the CB was pried from its bracket with a rather unpleasant crack. There was a definite amount of damage to the case, but Nick wasn't much concerned as he boredly grabbed the thing and dragged it over to Ellis. It yanked some cabling along with it, but there was enough give to get it in Ellis' hands.

"Damn, Nick." the kid uttered, eyes a little wide until he got a look over the thing and ensured it was, in fact, still functional. "Could'uv just said you didn't want to." His voice was a little chiding, but he was mostly focused on the CB now.

Rochelle swooped in to grab and hold the radio, giving Nick a dirty look. The gambler gave her an utterly caustic smile before regaining his slump against the truck door, closing his eyes into the wind.

Looking toward Rochelle now, Ellis held the handheld mic near his mouth, thumb on the trigger. "We used tuh practice all the lingo and everything. They ain't got a real huge range, but who knows." The reporter didn't seem totally convinced, but nodded along anyway.

Unable to resist a grin, Ellis cleared his throat and pressed the trigger. He dropped his voice a few octaves, trying to sound gruff and serious when he spoke into the microphone, uttering; "Breaker, breaker. Anyone got their ears on?"

Rochelle couldn't resist laughter, even as she tried to stifle it with the hand that wasn't holding up the radio. Considering Ellis grinned back, it was clear he wasn't really trying to sound intimidating.

Silence reigned, though. There was no response, and Ellis seemed a little disappointed, scratching at his nose with his pinky. He hummed, and Rochelle shifted her hips to settle a bit more comfortably against the back of the truckbed.

"Well, maybe another channel." She suggested, smiling. "Not like we have anything better to do, and we're annoying Nick. So there's that!" He nodded, although not as enthusiastically as she expected. He spared the smallest glance toward the gambler, but Nick didn't so much as stir. He may as well have been asleep against the car door.
She gave him a reassuring smile that seemed to shake him out of it. He pointed toward the radio and instructed, "Well, try uh…" A moment of scrunched thought resulted in a quick, "Oh, 9 'n' 19.
They're special channels, I remember."
A touch bemused, Rochelle nodded and peered at the face of the radio. Finding the knob labeled CHANNEL, she turned it experimentally. A click announced 01 changing to 02, and she twisted it a few times until the number read 09.
It was quiet, like the signal was almost out of range, but if they listened carefully "…f͞oļl̕o͟w a̸l l̡ ̡s̛af͠ety̶ p̸r̸oce͞d̷ųres̕ as̶ re͢layed b̛y -"
"Oh for fuck's sake." Nick wasn't, in fact, asleep, nor did he appreciate hearing the CEDA announcement again. Grouchily, he sighed, waving a hand in dismissal over his shoulder and speaking easily over the CB's utterances. "Not that shit again. Are they broadcasting on everything?"
Coach supplied helpfully, unperturbed as he maneuvered the car around a large crack in the highway. "'Pparently."
Wincing a little, Ellis scratched at the back of his head. "That.. may be the 'mergency channel. My bad. Ro', try 19...?" He watched with piqued interest as Rochelle twisted the knob, both of them listening curiously as the clicks slowly sounded, shifting through various layers of static.
When the readout finally showed 19, it happened. A voice cut through, freezing all four of them in their seats. Even Nick stiffened, although he didn't move at first. Someone struggled to speak over the radio waves, female and sounding miserable; the sound was almost pathetic as she obviously held back tears.
"- hel̶p..̡ ̧plea͏se͞, I'͞m ͢a͠t Riverview Road̵, outs ide͞ ͞o͞f͏ Savanna̕h̷. Plȩase,̛ if̷ a̡nyon̛e̴ ̶- ̵ug̨h, I'll b̕e͡ fi̸n͡e.͞.͞"

For just a moment, they were all uncomfortably staring at the radio, disbelief stinging the air. Ellis was the first to blurt out, "Thank the Lord, someone's alive out there! We gotta go help her!"
His concern was audible past his clear excitement, but still - Nick sensed the same brashly optimistic reaction as he'd given upon hearing Rochelle and Coach's first gunshots. They were going to tear off on some wild chase again if he didn't step in.
Ellis was just about to press the trigger and speak to the girl when Nick surged up, grabbing the cable and tearing it from his hands. The coiled wire that connected it to the CB strained at its limits, but it reached with only a slight jerk of the radio that Rochelle held in her hands.
The kid looked shocked, staring from his empty hand to Nick's irked expression. If Ellis hadn't been afraid of him, he might have fought to get it back. Clenching his teeth on his lower lip, Nick argued very coolly, "How much time do we have to waste running after every single little noise we hear? How much gas, even? How many bullets?"


Ellis blinked slightly, raising one hand to rub slowly at the back of his head. Struggling to look at Nick without looking at him, he started to respond - but Rochelle ran him over. Ellis leaned back slightly and shut his mouth.

She lashed out at Nick, and it was harsher than usual. Crossing her arms carefully, she inspected him challengingly over the chair's shoulder. "That wasn't a 'little noise,' Nick! Are you saying you'd rather ignore that? Ignore somebody who needs help? What if you ignored us, back in Savannah - or we'd turned you away? Do you really think we'd all be alive right now, without each other?"

Nick drew closer to the door with a very low groan, still holding the microphone. He closed his eyes and shook his head. "Christ, Ro'... all I'm saying is maybe we should keep the radio off, unless we want to play musical chairs all the way to the beach." He muttered, cop- ing out a little from giving a real answer. He wasn't interested in this battle.

"Nick, we ain't got the right tuh make this choice..." Ellis pointed out a little cautiously, cocking his head and very gently moving to take his hat off. He scruffled his hair with his fingertips, worry chewing at his expression again. "We -"

Nick spoke with venom before he could stop himself. So much for not fighting.

"You 'ain't got' shit, kiddo. I don't give a damn about some woman I don't know, okay? How do we know she's not infected, or that she won't be dead by the time we waste gas getting over there? Can we afford to feed her? Will she even be any help to us? Can she shoot a gun? Get off my back and start thinking like we're in an apocalypse - because we are. Right isn't right and wrong isn't wrong anymore. Accept that or just leave me the fuck alone."

Nick jerked his chin to inspect the road outside his window. He felt like Ellis was staring at him, but after a moment the burning sensation of eyes on him disappeared, and Rochelle's voice prompted him.

"Nick, we're going to talk to her, okay?"

Her tone was suddenly gentler - soothing. It only raised his hackles more, but hell if he was interested in continuing this battle. Instead, he grunted a very noncommittal, "Fine." and practically threw the CB microphone at the woman. "It's your goddamn choice, I'm just not taking the blame when you regret it."

Rochelle managed to catch it, glancing nervously at the hunk of plastic. She let her shoulder nudge Ellis, who'd retreated a little bit back out of the cab, staring down at the cap in his hands with a screwed up brow and a twisting motion of his fingers. He didn't respond much more than a slight shake of his head.

"Okay..." she muttered, mostly to herself, and somewhat cautiously got her hand around the microphone in order to center her thumb on the trigger. She pressed it, and huffed once before trying a firm, "Hello?" It was probably close to the voice she used on TV; neat and serious.

There was no response, so she tried again, a little gentler but no less composed. "Hello? It's Carmine, right? Are you there?"

Silence.

Ellis lifted his head and glanced at the radio with an almost imperceptible frown. He wrung his cap in his hands for a moment before replacing it on his head, screwing it down solidly. "Maybe she left."
"Damnit, Nick." Rochelle shot an accusatory look toward the gambler, and it was clear enough what she meant. If Nick hadn't held them up, they might have made contact. She handed the radio and the microphone to Ellis, and leaned in to place her hand on Coach's shoulder.

"The place she mentioned. Riverview. Can you get us there, Coach?" she prompted hopefully, squeezing a little bit at the shirt under her fingers.

The big man grunted very simply in negation. Without taking his eyes off the road, he reached toward the floorboard near his calf and pulled up the atlas they'd taken from the gas station. He offered it to her, and she unfolded it, eyes going a bit wide as she tried to pinpoint where they were.

In rare consideration, Coach shrugged up a shoulder toward Nick and commented, "Boy, in all fairness.. we're gonna have to find a place to sleep tonight anyways. Ain't smart sleepin' in a truck."

The gambler would've produced a spot of sarcasm in response to that, but he was far out-numbered at this point, and his alternative was another long walk on the side of the road. So, he just snarled airlessly and shoved his arms into a cross over his chest.

He wasn't feeling petulant at all.

Ellis had been humming a song for the last few minutes as they drove down a rather heavily tree-skirted roadway. The frustrating part for Nick wasn't that he was doing it, it was that he was doing it pretty well. His hum was a rather delicate, honeyed tenor, whatever song he apparently had in his head accented by the drum-like tapping of his wrists against his sprawled knees, and audible over the rushing wind that trickled around the sides of the car.

It was an odd diversion from everything else, and there seemed a breath held between all three of the others, like they were all wary of a bubble just a few inches away from them. 'Calm' wasn't the word for it - but it was something very close.

Coach was the one to finally speak up, his gruff bass a startling interruption. "Ya'll better hope we find gas or a new car, or we gonna be walkin'."

Nick grunted, moving his hand up to rest his palm against the warm car window, rings clinking softly with the motion. He'd rolled it up as they slowed down; strangely, the encroaching evening felt even warmer than the earlier hours, and it was cooler in the car. "Told you we shouldn't be wasting time chasing after pretty voices. If we lose our transport because of this.. I'll seriously be fuckin' pissed."

"Oh hush, Nick... how would you like it if you were trapped somewhere and the only person who might be able to go find you said 'oh well, sucks for you, my gas is too important'?" Rochelle chided him, leaning her cheek against her wrist and reaching around the car seat's headrest to try and pinch the gambler's ear.

He swatted her away quickly, shooting a dark look over his shoulder to express his displeasure. She gasped slightly and gave a, "Nick!", lifting up a little to stick her arm through the window and smack him soundly on the shoulder.

"Y'know he don't mean it, Ro'. bet'ch'ya he'd be jus' as bad off as that lady is if he was in her place." Ellis piped up with an entertained tone. He was grinning a little underneath his cap, and Rochelle gave a mirthful sound of half-shock at the concept.

Nick, conversely, went deadpan and lost all sense of humor. His voice got cold, his eyes a little colder. When he glanced back, Ellis met his gaze this time - even if Nick could tell it took effort. "As if. You're the goddamn kid here, Overalls."

Something about those harsh green eyes cowed Ellis, like they used to be unable to do - and where he'd originally responded to such looks with an entertained and unflappable grin, he suddenly grew a slow and subtle blush over the bridge of his scarred nose and spoke with a struggling tone. "I-I'm twenty-three, man!"

Nick noticed - and so did Rochelle, but where it made the gambler's deadpan twitch into the smallest of severe frowns, she laughed obliviously behind a hand. "Really? Could've fooled me." the conman muttered irately, looking away with a tight set to his jaw. There was an uncomfortable spark traveling up his spine - Goddamnit, Overalls... - and he wasn't enjoying it.

It was a restrained feeling, tempered by strange sensations roiling in his stomach with the same ill gurgle as his meal. Jumping him was supposed to put an end to this. He can't even be angry at me right. After all, it wasn't like the kid was blushing at him. Ellis was uncomfortable, and trapped with Nick now - and Nick was trapped with him.

Rochelle stifled her laughter and rested back against their pile of supplies, strapped tight by a bungee cord to the truck bed. "God, you two... it's like watching cats and dogs go at it with you."

Coach gave a loud gruff of humor at the comment, his generally detached expression shifting into a wordless grin. Nick couldn't help but feel a little victimized under their entertainment, and out of the corner of his eye, he could see Ellis hiding tightly under his cap, embarrassed.

It was true, though - they were such opposites.

"Glad we could give you some kicks, not that it's hard with dumbshit back there." he responded in a fair monotone, glancing up through the windshield and scanning the road. The right roadside was starting to look a little swampy, trees skirted by vines and sunken down into a dipping, damp landscape. The air that breezed in from behind them was humid and dank.

"How haven't you lost it on this jerk, Ellis, honey?" Rochelle reached over to tug on the hick's cap bill, smiling at him under it. "Are you just that sweet?"

He didn't seem to know how to respond, gawping an instant and shooting Nick a glance like he were floundering - not that the gambler said a single word to help him. They weren't 'in this' together. "Uh- Well.. I mean.. he ain't.. it... -"

It was Coach who came to his rescue, interrupting the fumbling that was quickly leaving a bewildered look on Rochelle's face (and making Nick close his eyes with a pained exhale as he was forced to legitimately reconsider his apathy). "There it is."

On the left, there was a road cut into the treeline, marked by a green 'Riverview Road' sign. The gravel and dusty stone road angled up a fair hillside, lifting up from what was becoming a rather unpleasantly sticky swampland.

The moment Coach turned the Chevy into the road with a sharp turn, the truck went from smoothly rumbling along to a jarring vibration as the wheels ground and tumbled over uneven and loose gravel, and bounced into a few dips. Ellis, relieved by the distraction, was the only one who didn't stiffen up against the rough motions - in fact he shot into blabbering as the other three grabbed hold of nearby things.

"Man, you guys should see muh buddy Keith's driveway! This ain't nothin' compared tuh that... he was always wreckin' it up 'cause he kept drivin' the lawnmower over it. I told him not to, but he don't listen... this one time, he tried tuh walk his dog, Dusty, while he was mowin' the lawn. I mean nothin' bad happened tuh the dog, I'm just sayin' -"

"Son, you mind?"

The hick quickly nodded, catching the bill of his cap between two knuckles and slipping it up a little to see more clearly, not nearly as embarrassed by Coach's gruff shoot-down. They bounced along, vision obscured by the tight clothing of tree branches on either side of the road, for a suddenly tense few moments as none of them spoke.

The Chevy rattled between the broken remnants of what had once been a squat, blocking gate, and as they passed it, the road started to split off into small driveways. Their mouths were bedecked with neat, wooden mailboxes and tiny houses could be seen through the trees a few feet down each gravel stretch - and Nick was a breath from commenting wryly how eerily normal the area looked when a flicker of movement caught his eye ahead of them.

"Awh, shit yeah! Zombies!" Ellis hooted, apparently seeing it at the same time.

Sure enough, the road funneled straight into the driveway of another house, and there were all-too-familiar, sluggishly wandering shapes scattered on the front porch. They stumbled like sleepwalkers, hands dusting over injuries that cut through their bloody clothes, and raising up to cover their eyes like not even the canopy above was enough to shade their eyes from the lowering sun -

Then they noticed the crackle of tire on gravel, and every single head whipped around violently.

"Tits," Nick muttered irately, quickly leaning down to drag his machine gun up from the floorboard. He tossed his already shed suit jacket over the shoulder of his seat, shrugging his shoulders quickly to try and loosen up a little. The moment Coach hit the brakes, Nick was pushing the door open and darting out, quickly doing a semi-circle to hop up smoothly onto the edge of the truck bed.

He sat on the rim and rested his weight against the cab. If he needed to, he could slip back and escape into the truck bed. As it was, he leaned in and got a bead on the approaching zombies, feeling his chest stiffen up a little as he focused.

"Ellis, Ro'," Coach ordered in his calm bass, as he clambered out of the truck and cocked his shotgun, moving toward the front of the truck before he took a stand. "Watch the back."

Obediently, the hick snatched up his pump-shotgun from beside him and scrambled to sit on the tailgate, patting the space beside him to invite Rochelle up. She obliged, but not without a dubious glance back toward the front of the truck.

It was a good move - though Coach seemed pretty apt at those - because as Nick gave in and started squeezing the trigger to speckle the zombies with bullets, he heard a shot behind him. A glance over his shoulder confirmed it; there were a few infected who must've been at other houses, and were now attracted to the commotion.

Rochelle pulled her handgun from the holster at her thigh, though, and Nick returned his gaze forward as the two of them looked to have a handle on it. He leaned a little out to the side, letting his cheek slip close to the side of his gun as he focused.

Two of them, though blood was pouring like so much rain from several wounds, scrambled under the worst of his fire and lunged for his legs. The conman quickly snapped his knees up to dodge it, nearly overbalancing backwards, and soundly swung the butt of his gun at their heads.

One of them got hit, staggering into the other one and going down with a loud, shrieking noise into the gravel. The manic infected seemed to struggle for a moment between attacking each other and getting back up, but Nick silenced the floundering with a merciless squeeze of the trigger that riddled their torsos with bullets.

Forcing a loud snort and rolling his legs into the truck bed, Nick took a moment to confirm that Rochelle and Ellis were still breathing. They were. The conman crossed the truck's width in two strides and took a standing aim over the truck cab to check on Coach.

The big man, however, was perfectly fine on his own. Nick watched as a particularly brutal shot of his gun blasted a pelleted hole right through two zombies in a row, sending them flailing in staggering motions before they crumpled to the road, gargling and twitching as their deaths splattered red over the dusty gravel.

Nick nearly spoke up when a few more infected came barreling out from the treeline, clawing aside branches - and behind their snarling, a soft, doglike growl that echoed a little bit disorientingly around the glen-like piece of road.

Both he and Coach quickly swiveled to face them, but Nick recalled that growl a little too clearly and didn't waste time calling out, "Watch it, assclowns! I hear one of those fuckin' pouncing candyasses."

The truck rocked under his feet, disturbing his aim and making him scowl slightly, as Ellis and Rochelle jumped up in unison to scramble over and join him. "Ah, shit, like we need another one of those.." Rochelle muttered quietly under her breath as she crossed her wrists to brace her handgun on the flat of her palm.

Coach backed up slightly against the truck as the new wave tried to pin him against it, but reinforced with the other three survivors, they barely got hands on him. He had to shake off a little blowback that sprayed him, rather stoic when that included some suspicious chunks of what might have been shattered bone and bits of organ.

"Why're some'uh them different than the other ones?" Ellis piped up curiously, minding his bandaged arm as he swung down a leg to straddle the truckbed, scanning the area with his shotgun primed like he were playing a skeet-shooting game and just had to figure out where the next one would come from. "Why don't any of the ones we jus' killed have big tongues, or acid-spittin'?"

Another growl echoed out, too soft to pinpoint the direction. A sudden trio of infected came bolting from the treeline, thrusting themselves toward the truck in an attempt to climb it and get at the three in the back. "I dunno, Ellis - I think the disease mutates sometimes." Rochelle answered carefully, steadying herself on Nick's sleeve and kicking a zombie right in the face with the heel of her boot. It went down so hard, Nick had to doubletake.

"Damn, Rochelle. Y-"

They all spun around to aim in a different direction as the growl warped into a scream, what they'd already noted as the warning call before it jumped. They all, however, spun in the wrong direction - and with a very loud shout of something half-surprised and half-pained, Coach was struck hard by a pouncing shape - that came directly from above his head, crashing down on his shoulders.

Leaves and bark came with it, revealing that it had been up in a tree. Coach collapsed to a knee, trying to hunch away from it, but the thing was swiping claws at whatever it could reach of him. They scored lines along his back, tearing through the purple stretch of his shirt.

His shout quickly turned to pain, crumpling further, and the collapse of his sturdy body made Rochelle shriek "NO!" at the top of her lungs. It was her, then, that vaulted forward to jump down from the truck first. She grabbed hold of the thing's lithe torso and yanked back with all her weight and a fierce surge of adrenaline.

It howled like a rabid dog as it was disengaged from its target, bloodied claws swiping the air as its fairly light frame was hauled away. She struggled with it, simultaneously trying to keep it from getting at Coach or switching to swipe at her.

Nick and Ellis scrambled to jump down after the woman, the conman grabbing hold of Ellis' arm and shoving him upright when he nearly lost his balance with clumsy over-energy.
They were both prepared to attack, but before they could, Rochelle jammed her pistol against the back of the Hunter's neck and pulled the trigger, Glock torqued upward in case the bullet penetrated. She let go immediately afterward, fleeing the spray of blood and pausing to catch her breath only momentarily before rushing to Coach.

"Coach! Coach, are you alright?!" she pleaded in a rush, dropping down to the gravel and hovering her hands over the half-kneeling ex-football player. The scores up his back had torn through his shirt like so much wet paper, and there was blood welling up in mercifully thin lines along the broad expanse of his back. He groaned a little, roughly, but indelicately reached to set a big hand on her knee, expression unflinching though the motion must've hurt.

"Fine, baby girl… I'm alright."

Ellis quickly joined Rochelle in crouching next to Coach, though he didn't go quite as low. "Man, that don't look good!" he whimpered gently, and for some inexplicable reason, twisted a look over his shoulder at Nick like the conman knew what to do. Nick stood there a moment, rolling his jaw with no small amount of wariness, before stepping forward and setting his machine gun against his hip.

"You two stay here with him. He'll be alright, but we should find this girl and get him inside somewhere so we can get something on that. I'll check the houses."

Ellis nodded obediently, swiping his cap off and shuffling forward. He settled his palms against the worst of the cuts, pressuring it gently even as the tacky, hot blood trickled slowly against his fingers. Coach didn't say a word, seeming completely focused on Rochelle as she worriedly studied his injuries.

Nick felt his gaze drift over the football coach's wounds. He mulled over saying something like "I told ya so," or "Serves you right", or maybe "See, if you had listened to Nick, we would be on our way toward the shore, safe and sound. Honestly, let's just always listen to Nick. Nick is smart. Go Nick. Hoo-ray."

Instead, he turned away and walked at a quick jog down the road. The concentration of zombies around the house at the end of the road both improved the chances for the girl to be there - and improved the chances of her being dead. Nick wasn't really sure which one he was betting on more, but as he took the porch stairs two at a time and twisted at the waist to shoot at a zombie who'd somehow kept out of the fight, he felt just a little tense.

Stepping to the front door after replacing his gun on his shoulder, Nick settled his weight on the skewed welcome mat. His shoes settled oddly on its surface - it was rubber, with a multitude of tiny ribs covering it, making him shift slightly and feel unsteady. He sighed, wearily, before trying the doorknob.

It was locked - another good sign. There were claw marks and blood smudges on the face of the door, but it was a hard and thick kind of wood and the zombies had been unable to really make a dent. There were two windows on the front of the house, one of them broken but blocked with some kind of dresser. The conman moved over to the unbroken window and leaned in to squint through it. Closed curtains obscured his vision, and it seemed dark inside.

Grunting a little, uncertainly, the conman stepped back to the door and rapped his knuckles against it. There was a doorbell beside the doorframe, but he wasn't going to risk making noises that might attract more zombies. He leaned in and tried to call in a strained, half-quieted voice, "Hello? Anyone in there?"
The first sign of life inside was a small thud - the noise set him on edge, and he kept his machine gun close at hand just in case. However, there was utter silence afterwards... stifling silence... and if it had been a zombie, it wouldn't have shut up in panic. Humans did that.

"Hello?" he repeated, losing a bit of his monotone politeness and adding, "Zombies don't talk. Open the goddamn door."

That got more results, and he heard movement quickly hurrying to the door. A familiar voice spoke against the wood, hopefully, "A-Are you sure you're not, like... sick..?" She sounded somewhat near tears, and behind the manipulative smoothness that slipped into Nick's voice, he was frustrated.

He hadn't realized till now how generally lucky he was to have gotten saddled with the three that he was - they were strong, comparatively. He'd never handled weak personalities well, in any context. Even in his amorous exploits, he preferred at least a degree of fire.

"Carmine? Name's Nick. We got your message, and yeah, we're all healthy. Don't worry. One of us is hurt, though, so I really need you to open the door and let us in. We can take you with us afterwards."

There was a moment of hesitance, but his words were so thorough and so guidingly worded, there was no argument to make. There was a click, and suddenly the door opened. With little warning, a woman came rushing out.

She thrust herself into Nick's arms and up against his thinly shirted torso, like she were fleeing something, her very warm body plastered against his in a motion that brought back entirely too many memories. He was struck instantly by how incredibly good she smelled, like cream and chocolate, this terribly over-perfumed scent that burned his nostrils and he loved it.

He probably smelled awful, but she didn't, apparently, care.

His arms automatically lifted to grip onto her shoulders, and he had never been so glad in his life to silently accept an embrace from someone. Her hair was a flecked, curly (dyed) auburn and was in the middle of trying to smother him, as the top of her head aligned with his nose.

"Oh, thank God.. I thought .. I thought everyone was dead. Like, I've been waiting for CEDA - but the radio, it's just.. the same thing, over and over.." Carmine breathed against his chest, hands clutching onto the fabric of his dress shirt. He could feel her nails, let alone the whole press of her torso. Slanting a glance down as she pulled her head away just a little, rubbing a knuckle under one tearful blue eye, he struggled not to sigh.

At least she's not Southern.. bah, bullshit. Of all the times for me to be covered in zombie guts.

"Doll, I know, but we have someone hurt..." He was aware of a shortness that resurfaced in his tone, puffed against her forehead - and Carmine seemed to start, looking up toward his face. Instantly, red filtered up over her own and she pulled away, covering her cheeks with her hands.

"O-oh, God, I'm sorry.. tossing myself at strangers.. go, get your friends.. I just thought, like, no one - uh, anyway.." Nick could see the signs of an interested woman in a split second, all his instincts and radars ringing off - but for once he tried to ignore it all, reminding himself there were priorities... Unfortunately..

He let his lips form the coyest of smirks and latched gazes with her for just a split second - just short enough to leave her unsure if it'd actually happened. It was surely so ragingly inappropriate to even pull any of this in the midst of what was going on, but honestly, with the very straight adrenaline surging up his spine and her obvious flustering at seeing his face, Nick didn't give a single fuck.

Feeling suddenly in an unbelievably good mood, the conman turned and darted down the stairs, strolling back down the road at a quick pace.

"Overalls! Ro'! She's here, let's get Coach inside. Ro', can you pull the truck up and park it?"

He could feel suspicious eyes on him from all three of them. They must've noticed - but fortunately, Coach was still their focus, and he managed to go without explaining. Rochelle backed up reluctantly with an agreeing nod as Ellis and Nick crouched down to get one of Coach's arms over their respective shoulders, though the big man tried to argue.

"Boys, I don't need no human crutches, y'all -"

Ellis shushed him rather confidently, ducking into the supporting hold he and Nick had and starting to walk them back toward the house, slowed to match the hurt man's pace. Struggling not to touch the man's injuries, it was an awkward shuffle, and Nick could see Coach's displeasure with their determination all over his gruff expression.

"Quit griping. I'm the one who has your sweaty ass leaning against me right now." the conman chided him rather pleasantly, ignoring the gruff, noncommittal snort he earned himself.

Ellis snuck a glance at Nick by tilting his head down, curling his fingers a little on his cap in confusion. He seemed primed to speak, but thought better of it hesitantly and looked forward. "It'll be a'ight, Coach... we'll get'cha fixed up'n you'll be back tuh orderin' us around." he promised, unfazed when he didn't get any better of a response than Nick had.

They carefully guided him up the porch steps, and as their footsteps rang out and they heard the truck rumble up after them, Carmine leaned out from the doorway, in the middle of rather nervously pulling her hair into a frizzy ponytail. Her blue tank-top let slip a few inches of her pale midriff, and the dark slacks that draped down her legs touched onto the tops of bare feet.

Ellis blinked once, quickly trying to tip his cap at her with his free hand. "Hey, miss! Sorry fer the rush, s'just Coach here.." he rushed as fast as he could, looking a little embarrassed.

She only gave them a cursory glance, backing up to open the door and gesture them in quickly. Her eyes flicked around the area, obviously anxious about having the door open. "It's… fine.. I-I guess it's bad out there, then?"

They shuffled sideways through the door, and to their immense relief, there was a lamp lit across the room, on a table beside a couch, that gloriously announced that the house had electricity.

"Yeah, miss.. it ain't real safe, but we can keep you outta trouble. We're gettin' real good at it!" Ellis chirped gently, lowering his chin and grinning lightly. Nick detached from Coach and let Ellis guide him over to the couch alone, helping him very slowly ease down to sit.

Carmine had this uncertain look on her face, hands finding their way to her hips, staring after them before shifting her gaze up toward the conman. Her eyes were slightly tearful again, probably at the sight of the blood on his back. "Nick, you said..?"

He was almost certain she didn't really need to ask him again, but God he didn't care. He well and truly did not care. "Right." he agreed, lowering his chin to meet her gaze shamelessly and adjust his dress shirt over his torso with his fingertips. He was going to play this for what it was worth.
"Feeling any better, doll?"

Carmine nodded, face darkening, for just a moment. "I... I guess. God, it's just so scary. I wasn't even supposed to be here - I'm house-sitting for my mom. She's on vacation, it was just supposed to be for, like, a week..." She slipped over a step toward him, crossing her arms cautiously over her stomach in a self-hug. "I never thought zombies were real... aren't you scared?"

Nick smirked subtly, glancing up to check on Coach and Ellis. The big man had gotten settled on his stomach, somewhat uncomfortably, and Ellis was crouched next to him, inspecting his back.

The conman caught Ellis sneaking a glance back toward him over his shoulder. It struck Nick when he thought about it - and suddenly he wondered what exactly was going through Ellis' head. Just what was he thinking, seeing Nick flirting?

"So he does like girls"? Or something else? ... wait, fuck. No, I need to get goddamn over this. I'm going to be fucking miserable if I don't just forget about it. Awkward enough that we can't get away from each other. Focus, Nick. Focus.

He didn't realize he'd taken long to respond, but he felt Carmine gently slip a hand onto his bicep. A very warm, very soft hand... he focused his mind, rolling his head a bit on his neck and slanting a smirk at her. In his repertoire of smirks, he aimed squarely between 'sexy' and 'confident.'

He knew his game was off when he wasn't certain if he nailed it.

"I'm pretty hard to scare, doll... just stay by me."

She took him quite literally, leaning against him and resting her head on his shoulder, taking advantage of the way he shifted his weight in reaction to slip her arm around his. If it didn't feel so wonderful in that instant, he would've probably found it irritating.

It was as she did so that Rochelle came up the stairs a little hurriedly, backpack strapped onto one shoulder. She ducked into the house, halting a moment to blink at Nick and Carmine with a very slow look of disbelief. It was with a tremendous smoothness that she transitioned into a calm, "... Hi. Name's Rochelle."

Carmine blinked back at her with a little flash of her eyes. There was something - something very distinct and inconceivable that passed through that look, and Nick felt it dribble past him like so much molasses. It was enough to make him shiver.

"Carmine."

"Yeah, I heard."

Rochelle moved on, walking quickly across the carpet to drop to her knees in front of the couch and survey Coach with a small frown, pulling the backpack to her lap. "Coach, honey, what are we gonna do with you?"

He chuckled suddenly, muffled into the couch. His response was too quiet for Nick to hear, but he wasn't even trying to listen.

Considering the two girls had looked at each other for all of five seconds before separating.. he felt like some colossal war had just occurred in front of him, and he felt a little warm. Nuclear fallout, maybe? We already have zombies.

"I'll go get some water or something, you guys, like, look thirsty..." Carmine pulled away from Nick and walked quickly across the room, moving through an open doorway, the soft and dull sound of her bare feet audible on the wood.

Nick found himself smirking, walking to shut the front door and stand next to it, slowly rolling his dress shirt sleeves up to his elbows with slow motions of his fingers.

"Can't wait till she finds out you're an asshole..." Rochelle tossed over her shoulder, sounding irritated as she dug through the backpack. "Can't believe you're doing this right now." Ellis hunched down a bit where he sat, gnawing his lower lip and raising his brows under his cap.

"Hiss hiss." Nick coolly shot back, lifting his chin and closing his eyes with a pleased smirk.

Everyone was very quiet as Rochelle pulled a few large alcohol swabs from the backpack, packed in little sealed paper squares. The look on her face promised retribution, even if she didn't say a single word.

Leave it to Ellis to find a way to be the first one to talk again. "So, uh, man. Coach, this reminds me - I ever tell you guys 'bout the time muh buddy Keith tripped while he was usin' one'uv those spinny-string grass cuttin' things? See, he -"

"Son, do I look like I wanna hear 'bout that shit right now?" Coach gruffed very lowly against the couch cushion, silencing the hick soundly.

Nick didn't like how much effort it took not to glance over and eye the mechanic, giving in after a few moments and inspecting the slightly embarrassed look that was plastered on that face. Ellis must've seen his head turn - his eyes flicked over, and hesitant blue met stern green with a blink.

His expression filled slowly with pink, breaking off their gazes way too late. His hand rose up and he adjusted his cap, struggling with visible discomfort and lifting his shoulders. The conman's fingers curled on his forearms, re-closing his eyes... and then he pushed off the wall, walking across the room toward the door Carmine had disappeared into.

"Baby- hnf.. Baby girl, watch yo'self! You ain't helpin'!"

Rochelle seemed surprised to notice how hard she'd been treating his back. After they'd gotten his shirt peeled off (which was a little unpleasant for more than a few reasons, although Nick would've been the only one with the guts to actually say anything and he was still in the other room.)

"Sorry, Coach.." she apologized, lightening her touch with the alcohol swabs as she cleaned the long gouges criss-crossing his flesh. "I'm just.. irritated."

The big man turned his head on the couch, squinting at her sideways with a gruff sigh. He didn't say anything, though, eyes flinching shut as little white, sizzling bubbles announced the alcohol's work.

Ellis slowly pulled his cap off his head, setting it beside him on the floor and rubbing his fingers through his brunette curls. He felt strange - but he'd been feeling strange all day. Every time he looked at Nick it came swirling back to him, and every time he looked away he swore Nick was looking at him.

He couldn't stop the blushing. He tried, but that had only made it worse, like trying to stop hiccups. Ellis just didn't know what to do besides try to forget about it, and the conman was making that impossible... the kid had this feeling about him. He could sense some kind of guilt, and it made Ellis want to forgive him, even though he had no reason to.

Fact was, they hadn't had a minute alone, not that Ellis was sure he'd be able to handle it if they had. He was frightened of what he'd say to Nick - he didn't even know what to say to himself. Particularly not now, when he'd caught himself listening to that suave, smug tone Nick had spoken to Carmine with and trying to reconcile it with the angry, growled one he'd heard on the rooftop.

He didn't know what it meant. He didn't know what any of it meant, really.

Realizing his face was getting hot again, Ellis tried to distract himself, turning his head toward Rochelle and replacing his cap on his head. "Yuh ain't.. really jealous, are you, Ro'?" he asked meekly, gnawing on the tip of his tongue as he tried to glance over her face sideways.

She rolled her eyes gently, freeing a hand to reach over and prod the tip of his nose with a fingertip. "Of course not, sweetie. I just don't get how he can't be civil to us for five seconds, but some - gah.. forget it.. I'll just annoy myself even more if I talk about it." Sighing, she returned both her hands to Coach, shaking her head.

"I'm just getting tired of his attitude. Every time I think I get him, he proves me wrong."

Like it was planned just to piss her off, there was a chime of a giggle from the other room, and - Ellis swore to God - one of the sultriest chuckles he'd ever heard in his life. It stiffened his spine and widened his eyes a little, leaning slightly back as a pang struck his chest.

It was like... pain. But worse. Like he couldn't breathe, and he felt dizzy, and he wanted to hide but all he had was the bill of his cap and that just wasn't enough. It scared him, a little.

"I'm going to, like, wring her neck." Rochelle muttered sarcastically, rather loudly tearing open a gauze packet. There went not talking about it.
But Ellis couldn't focus, and with a slight fumble, he pushed up to his feet and quickly grabbed onto the bill of his cap, tightening his jaw carefully. "I-I'm gonna go... get stuff from the car." he blurted out, backing up and crossing the room quickly.

He got the door open and rushed outside at the same instant Nick strolled back into the front room, Carmine tight on his heels. The conman glanced at the shutting door, one brow lifting, but he didn't slow his steps. He didn't make anything of it, not just then.

"Oh great.. Coach is shirtless." he tossed up absently, taking a drink from the bottle of water he held in his right hand. He dropped himself down into a lounge on the smaller sofa up against the wall, letting his left arm drape up over the back of it, inviting Carmine into the space it enclosed without bothering to look at her.

"Boy.. you watch it." the big man grunted quietly against the sofa, fisting his gloved hands a little as Rochelle gently bandaged his back. "I ain't in no mood."

Nick spread the fingers of his free hand, waving him off, closing his eyes as Carmine settled down on the couch next to him. She was impressively good at arranging herself in a curl there to lean up against him. Man, you're a glutton for punishment, Nicolas... but she's completely your type, isn't she? Hot and bound to drive you completely fucking nuts within five minutes.

"So, where are you guys planning to ... like... go? I mean, Nick said you had a plan." she prompted, lifting a hand to tighten her ponytail a little nervously. "CEDA hasn't -"

"CEDA is fucked." Rochelle snapped hostilely, cutting Carmine off and putting a rather sour expression on her face. "They pulled out. We're driving to the coast to get someone's attention. CEDA, or the military, or somebody, I don't care. Savannah is wrecked and the only way we're gonna find help is if we chase it down."

Carmine huffed the smallest breath, glancing up at Nick like she expected him to stand up for her. He sipped from his water, rather expertly pretending like he didn't notice. He wasn't particularly interested in stepping in the middle of anything.

"C'mon, baby girl.." Coach muttered quietly against the couch, drawing a sigh from her. She stewed just a beat, then glanced over her shoulder as she arranged the bandages on the big man's back.

"Sorry, it's been a long day. Ignore me." The apology was hollow and forced, but Carmine accepted it with a smug little nod of her head, settling into the crook of Nick's arm. He couldn't fight a smirk, meeting Rochelle's gaze when she glanced at him and giving her a little taunting bite of his lower lip.

Rochelle looked fit to stand up and deck him.

The victory - if he could call it that - was a little shortlived when Carmine spoke up, voice fairly sincere. "I'd be, like, crazy scared if I was out there in all that. You guys are really brave." Rochelle returned focus to her, and was surprised to find Carmine looking her square in the face, rather than swooning up at Nick.

"Oh." she uttered at first, startled out of a coherent response, guard broken by an actual compliment. She fumbled, and had to remind herself to continue smoothing a strip of bandage over Coach's back. "Well.. Thanks. We didn't really have a choice. Things just kind of happened. You just... survive, y'know? Do what you have to."
The girl reached up to fiddle with the curly end of her ponytail, seeming to think on that. Nick looked between the women with something that might've been confusion stewing behind his eyes. Damn. No catfight…?

Carmine settled on a demure smile, cocking her head conversationally. "I got, like, lucky this house had a generator. My mom's paranoia pays off; I'd never have made it out there."

"Yeah… well." Rochelle seemed a bit more settled now, and there was a tint of a more genuine apology when she added, "Hope your mom's okay." After Carmine nodded, eyes threatening to water a little, Rochelle returned her attention to her hands as she laid down the last of the bandages on Coach's injuries.

They both sighed at the job's completion, and Rochelle leaned back to pick up the bloody, torn shirt that lay on the ground, holding it up in front of herself and eyeing the rips.

"Dunno what to tell you, Coach... this is pretty bad." she sighed, lowering it a little. She seemed disappointed, looking over his bandaged back with a very tired brand of despair. 'I wonder if we can find you a new shirt..."

Carmine straightened up a little from Nick, rubbing a fingertip over one eyebrow. "You know, I totally can fix that up for you. I mean, it'll look awful, but that's better than being, like... shirtless, right?"

Rochelle looked over slowly, unsure, like she wasn't sold on any piece of good news right now. Her expression was kind of strained, but her voice was kind enough as she responded, "Yeah? That'd be great."

Brightening, the redhead jumped up to her feet and walked over to pluck it out of her hands with careful fingertips. "See? Aren't you guys, like, totally glad you ran across me?"

Rochelle just stood there silently as the woman left the room, heading up a staircase with the bloody shirt gripped in one hand. She waited until she was completely sure Carmine was out of earshot to plead in a slight sigh, "... Nick, please explain this one to me."

The gambler chuckled darkly, sipping from his bottle of water and shrugging a shoulder leisurely. "Just think really hard about railing her. It makes it pretty easy to handle anyone."

Coach and Rochelle were both silent for a moment after that particular comment. Nick thrust up his free hand, rolling green eyes and sighing. "You're the ones who demanded we come pick her up. I would've just kept going, but y'know what? Changed my mind now - thanks. You might just have gotten me in the pants of the only bangable girl left alive in the world."

"Oh for Christ's sake, Nick! I..." Rochelle couldn't even figure out what to say, lifting her hands to rub her temples. Coach sympathetically reached over to pat her shoulder, wearily letting his head slacken against the couch. "She's … okay, she's not insufferable, but..."

She didn't really know what she was planning to add after that. Between the valleygirl aesthetic and the damsel-in-distress act, Rochelle just balked, waving her hands in this vague gesture like that was enough. Nick didn't need her to elaborate; he just leaned forward, crossing his legs with an ankle settled on his knee.

"Quick view into the mind of a man, honey.. I don't really care."

She stared him down for a moment, then just gave up, sighing and standing up, wiping her forehead with a wrist. "...Ellis is taking a while, I'm going to go check on him."

Nobody argued as she walked to the door, adjusting the bangles on her forearm with a sigh.

Nick looked after her, though. He wondered, teeth catching onto the rim of his waterbottle and suddenly nibbling at it.

The dim light inside made Rochelle squint as she opened the door, Savannah's burnt atmosphere swirling in against the pleasant air-conditioned environment inside the house. She closed it behind herself lightly, stepping down the porch stairs and glancing over toward the parked truck.

Ellis was perched on the opened tailgate, one leg dangling off while the other was curled tight to his chest. He was in the middle of hugging it with both his arms, cap tipped low over his face, and Rochelle's brows quirked in confusion at the posture.

She slowly crossed the grass toward the truck, noticing he hadn't heard the door shut. Not wanting to sneak up on him, she called cautiously, "Ellis, sweetie? Are you alright?"

He stiffened but didn't look back, a hand quickly disengaging to grab onto the end of his cap bill and lower it a little more. She heard his throat clear, and he managed, "Uh... yeah, sorry... just thinkin'.."

Walking up to him, Rochelle tipped her head to see under the shade of his cap and reached up a hand to touch his cheek affectionately. At first she'd had some scatter-shot worry that he was crying, but his blue eyes were clear and his cheeks were dry. "About what, hun?"

Ellis shook his head, but didn't try to push her hand away. In fact he leaned against it a little, and that motion set off an alarm in the back of Rochelle's head. She stepped closer and looped an arm around his shoulders, frowning. "What is it, sweetie?"

"I'm ... s'just.. awhh, Ro'. I can't tell yuh.." He wanted to, mostly because he felt like she might know what to do. But he couldn't. Even if he overcame his embarrassment long enough to tell her what happened, he was afraid to talk it out. He didn't really know what he'd say. Instead, he sighed and rolled his head against her shoulder, his cap clipping her neck in the motion and popping off his head to land behind him.

"Can yuh just sit here a minute..?" he mumbled a little sadly.

Rochelle instantly nodded, shifting just enough to sit next to him on the tailgate without breaking the embrace they had going. She gently petted his head, resting her cheek against the top of it, and spoke softly to him. All he could really do was be glad she didn't push him, and listen.

"I'm not feeling too great either, honey. I forget it when we're on the move... but it's hard to sit down and absorb everything. Now we're going to have to deal with another person on top of it all? I'm wondering how we're gonna handle this... I'd never say we should've just kept moving, but.. Nick isn't making this easy, -"

Rochelle was paying close attention to him, even if she'd started talking alone, and she felt him stiffen up and shift oddly. She held her breath momentarily, trying to work out if she wanted to bring it up... Was he upset with Nick? Had Nick done something?

She wanted to think Ellis wasn't jealous of Nick with Carmine, but he was a young guy, and she wasn't inclined to dismiss the possibility.

She didn't say anything, just sighing. "Anyway, I guess all we can do is try to get along.. We'll work it out. You know you can talk to me, right, Ellis? You're a real sweetheart, and I don't want you to feel alone."
Ellis nodded gently, sighing. He frowned down at his lap for a moment, wishing that her words made him feel any better. He felt this weight burning in his chest, like humiliation and uncertainty all coiled up in this tight knot.

He just wanted to talk about something else. "Th.. Thanks, Ro'... Is Coach doin' okay?"

She smiled down at him, tickling his ear and making him shy away with one of those grins he couldn't stop. "Yeah, sweetie. He's a tough guy, he just needs a little time to recuperate."

He nodded his head, turning it a little to reach his hand behind himself and find his cap, slipping it on. He rubbed his nose with his wrist carefully. "I wish he hadn't gotten hurt - it ain't right.."

Rochelle nodded in immediate agreement, leaning in to land a kiss on the top of his capped head. "We'll all end up hurt, I'm sure. Here, let me check your elbow, and then we'll go back inside together." Her hands slipped to pull his left arm toward her, and he obliged her with a slightly bashful smile.

Peeling back the tape and bandage, Rochelle unwrapped the bandage from his elbow, being gentle as it pulled away from the actual wounds underneath. It looked good, and she nodded as she turned his arm a bit and touched gently on the closed, scabbed cuts. "I don't think we need to keep the bandages on it anymore, do you?"

Ellis shook his head, smiling even though it was still a little tender. "Naww.. S'fine now."

She gently plucked at his nose with a knuckle, then hopped off the tailgate and beckoned him. She smiled at him reassuringly, and he started to forget about that pain in his chest. "Come on, sweetie. How's about we find some paper and pens and play tic-tac-toe? We'll send that smelly suit out to see if there's some gas around here later."

Ellis tagged close at her heels as they walked back to the door, and, smiling a bit down at his boots, Ellis thought he could handle this. Just move on, forget about it - he'd just stop thinking about Nick entirely.

It was easier that way, anyway, instead of trying to sift through what.. he was starting to think might be, feelings, or something so close he couldn't figure it out. Particularly not when all he had was the single advance of a very drunk Nick to use as reference. He'd never felt this way about a guy, but the thought only scared him by virtue of its unknowns.

He didn't even know what 'this way' was. It was just a bundle of confused reactions, intimations, suggestions: the way his face wouldn't stop lighting up; how his heart leapt up his throat; how he just couldn't make himself afraid of Nick, even though he felt like he should have been...

He pushed it away. It didn't matter.

Or he told himself that, until Rochelle reopened the door.

Nick was up on his feet, Carmine standing in front of him with a box of what looked like sewing materials at her feet and her hands freed to coyly inspect the little claw-slices in the fabric of his sleeves that he'd earned fighting zombies. She was in the middle of saying something along the lines of, "I can, like, sew this up too, if you want."

That pain came shooting back, forcing Ellis to drop his gaze, hands in tight fists. Rochelle muttered something to him - but he didn't hear it, blindly following her as she lead him across the room and started digging through a set of couch-side drawers.
He couldn't deny it.

It didn't matter that Nick had looked surprisingly unimpressed, visibly not liking having the state of his clothes pointed out.. and it didn't matter that they hadn't even once talked about what happened on the roof -

Ellis hurt, and he didn't know if it was jealousy or something else, but he just… hurt.
Chapter 29

There'd been a very strange silence about the house for the past few hours.

It was strange mostly because they did talk, but only amongst two groups; Rochelle and Ellis - and Nick and Carmine. The space between was so tangible it felt like a chasm. Any time an offhand question dared to cross the distance, it was notably awkward.

Coach was asleep, his body shifting slightly underneath the blanket Rochelle had found to drape over him, moving in time to his heavy snores. He was exhausted - maybe a little more than he should've been, but they'd already accepted they should stay the night. The fact Carmine's house still had electricity and running, hot water made them all glad to be there, considering they hadn't even been able to step into the bathroom in the gas station the night before.

They woke him up to eat supper, which had consisted of sandwiches, and he'd fallen back asleep shortly afterward. Ellis envied him - even though Rochelle stayed close at his side and entertained him to the best of her ability, he was still stuck with a full view of the other side of that chasm.

Carmine had started calling him "Nicky" halfway through the evening.

Rochelle and he were in the middle of trying to make an origami swan with a sheet of paper (neither of them had any idea how to) when he heard it the first time, this sticky-sweet giggle preceding it.

Ellis lowered his hands a little, calloused fingertips stilling on the paper for a moment. His brows furrowed, struggling not to let any more of a reaction slip. He wrestled with the weird knot of feelings, sighing silently. It was just as confusing as it'd been from the start.

Rochelle lightly snapped under his nose, startling him back into focus. She gently surveyed his expression, one brow lifted sympathetically, and he cleared his throat with a quick dart of his gaze back toward the paper, trying to remember what he'd had planned with the folds.

"How'll the sleeping arrangements be? Looks like Coach is melted to that couch, but there's still four of us to take care of." Nick questioned with a very distinct smirk, slowly rubbing his hand over his jaw while the other toyed with the fabric of Carmine's capris flirtatiously.

Nick was a master of the expressionless eyeroll, face tensing in discomfort. Please don't say it again...

Carmine pulled her leg away with a ticklish jerk, giggling as she worked her needle along a jagged tear in the shirt on her lap, stitching the purple-and-yellow fabric of Coach's emblazoned shirt back together. "Oh, we'll figure it out, Nicky... I have a guest bedroom and, like, a bunch of blankets somewhere, too."

"Oh, God. ... 'Nicky.' I really wish my standards were higher than this. Though, it's not really about standards, is it? He felt his gaze drag over toward Ellis and Rochelle, curled up and facing each other on the other couch, paper wadded up around them.

Nick had a perfect view underneath the bill of Ellis' cap. The kid's expression was struggling between emotions, and in an instant Nick felt trapped into staring at it, trying to read it - Damn, is he... upset?

No way.
"Where's your head, Nicky?"

His gaze snapped back to her at the rather coy question, a brow lifting subtly. "Just thinking. How'd you manage to keep safe since the outbreak? Seems most people didn't." he lied effortlessly, focusing her on herself rather than him, though he reflected that it would likely circle back to him after she answered.

She giggled and returned her attention to her stitching, pleased. "Oh, I just stayed inside. It was quiet for, like, a while, but when I turned on the generator I guess it sort of… attracted them. I blocked up the doors and they couldn't get in. My mom had a radio up in the attic, so I started, like, calling for help. I don't know what I'd have done if you guys hadn't showed up." She frowned slightly, snipping the thread and shifting her hands to start on another tear. "You know, my mom's dog was here, but - well it was, like, totally the weirdest thing… She just ran away the day before CEDA starting making announcements."

"Animals sense disasters. Maybe they knew before we did." Rochelle offered up quietly, grinning slightly as Ellis crushed up what must've been their tenth attempt at a swan and just shook his head. She reached out and pulled his cap down over his face, startling him.

"Maybe." Carmine agreed distantly, glancing over at the two on the couch before returning her gaze to Nick. She rolled her eyes gently, then focused back on stitching up Coach's shirt.

...or, it can NOT circle back to me, that's fine too. he noted, almost smirking. He stretched carefully, feeling his shoulders pop in their sockets and sighing a bit, silently. He could've used a smoke... and, patting his thin dress shirt, he realized they were in his jacket. Which was in the truck.

Rolling up to his feet, the conman tossed up absently, "Left my jacket in the car, I should get it."

Carmine gave him a rather winning smile as she tugged her needle taut. Rochelle glanced up at him in the same instant, but without the slightest bit of similar friendliness. "Take a gun." she ordered coldly, distracted only a moment when Ellis frowned and she traded a glance with him.

Nick snorted, reaching to the holster on his thigh and pulling his Magnum free, cocking back the hammer to make his point. They cleared out the forest on the way here; he didn't imagine his remaining three bullets would be necessary, anyway. "The concern is flattering, really."

He didn't wait for her to make another gripe, crossing the room for the door, but she grumbled after him anyway. "More worried the zombies might get sick if they eat you."

Nick didn't waste any time getting out to the truck. It was dark, light pouring from the front door behind him in a very meager rectangle. Whatever he'd said, he wasn't eager to be out in the open for very long. Dropping down the steps two at a time, Nick jogged across the grass toward the parked truck.

"'Zombies might get sick'... hrmmph. Bitch." he muttered quietly to himself, shaking his head. "Not sure what stick got up her ass."

He was just opening the door and leaning in to paw around for his suit jacket when he heard this breathless, quick laugh, manic and broken with exertion. It sent a chill darting up his spine, and he slowly curled his fingers on the fabric of his jacket, pulling back out from the car.

Green eyes darted around the area, warily, and he turned to slowly sidestep away from the truck. He pushed the door closed with his hip, wincing at the loud sound, and held his breath for a... moment.

... nothing. Total silence, without so much as a rustle of the trees in the still night air.

I'm not crazy, am I?

Nick very slowly eased himself away from the truck, moving across the grassy lawn one step at a time. There was no way he'd imagined that - not laughter, and certainly not psychotic, reedy laughter.

His shoe settled on the first step up to the porch, and that soft thud of the hard sole preceded another break of laughter, choked and panted giggles that came out high-strung and burst forth like it were mocking him.

Nick froze again, and, turning to face the darkness that surrounded the house, called warily over his shoulder to the open front door. He was pretty sure that it was nerves that inclined him to a sarcastic intonation. "Ro'? Let's say you told a zombie a joke."

Her voice called back, bewildered. "...what?"

"What happens when you tell a zombie a joke?"

There was a pause, and Nick tensed cautiously, gun twitching to bear on perceived flashes of movement in the dark. "What the hell, Nick?" Rochelle asked again, shortly reinforced by Carmine, sweetly.

"Nicky, are you alright?"

The gambler spat it with distinct enunciation, tone irritated and a little urgent. It was just hard enough to see that even the trees swaying made him jump, aiming down the sights and twisting at the waist to re-focus himself at every stimulus. "Do. Zombies. Laugh?"

Rochelle never got the chance to give an answer to that particular question, though, and she must've heard something Nick didn't. Her voice shot to panic, and he heard fumbling as she - and, he thought, Ellis - struggled up to run to the door. "Nick, it's on the roof! Get in here!"

Though he knew it was entirely not the right reaction, reflexes jerked his head up to look at the house's roof.

The face that suddenly thrust into his vision over the edge of the roof was the stuff of nightmares, framed by broken-looking shoulders that jammed up in bony protrusions as it grasped onto the roof's edge. Waxy, plastic skin was stretched over the gaunt bones of a thin head, and its eyes were round and bloodshot bulbs popping and rolling wildly in shallow sockets.

Its mouth was stripped of all lip and its gums were bleeding like it had torn at them, hysterical breaths screeching through the fence of gnashing, glistening teeth that made up most of its visage, bared in a bloody grin three sizes too big. Tears and blood streamed from its eyes in rivulets, and Nick got a gust of fetid breath as it shrieked an agonized, gleeful burst of giggles and jumped.

"JESUS ASS CHRIST!"

It grabbed hold of his hair in great fistfuls with knobbed fingers, and he shouted as the thing used its grip to thrust scrawny, lean legs around his neck possessively, perched on one shoulder. He was blinded immediately as a clammy thigh clamped over his eyes, gripping on like a monkey.
The sudden weight made him stagger, and he felt fingers yank on his hair mercilessly and legs tighten as the thing leaned wildly forward. He just barely made it up the last few steps, wheeling about blindly.

He tried to flail out his arms to catch his balance, realizing too late that he had his Magnum in his right hand - one of the zombie's hands released his hair, and those fingers were suddenly digging into his gun-toting hand's wrist, yanking his arm behind himself like he were being arrested to smartly immobilize it.

Pain jolted through his arm, spasming his fingers and sending his Magnum clattering to the porch. His jacket went with it, thrust away in favour of trying to grab for the zombie and peel it off his face. It was too heavy, and all he managed to do was score lines on its back with his nails - an act that horrified him about as much as the slick and bony thigh pressed against his face.

The thing cackled hysterically between broken gasps of air as it thrust itself against his center of balance, forcing him into movement. He staggered, so busy trying not to fall over he couldn't even start resisting the pull of the thing's weight and manipulative fingers - and then he felt his hip collide with the waist-high railing that bordered the porch.

Choking a gasp that tasted like sweat and dirt, Nick tried to shift his weight and shove against the riding zombie, but he was already toppling over. Between his weight and the zombie's, there was nothing to do but brace himself for the fall.

He heard someone yell and, beneath the screaming cackles above his head, loud footsteps on the porch. Nick hit the ground hard, the wind rushing out of him as the impact trapped him under the clinging weight of the hobbled little zombie.

It had only been six or seven feet, but it hurt, and Nick struggled to breathe as the creature jumped hyperactively onto his chest and shoved his torso into the ground like it was trying to smother him, unable to get him up. Its heels dug into his ribs, and the air was compressed out of him by force.

Then, the weight was tossed off him in a sudden shove, pain stinging in his eyes as the zombie scrabbled to try and fight it. The thing shrieked madly with these terrified giggles, and Nick was aware of it running away as someone dropped to their knees beside him.

"Nick - man, are you alright..?"

Ellis.. of course, it's Ellis...

Shoving up from the grass, Nick spat and gave a cough. There was blood in the back of his throat - he'd bitten his tongue, and the note of copper sang out far louder than the dirt and rancid sweat he was smelling.

"Yeah." he muttered, surprised in the next moment to feel Ellis slipping hands under his elbows and trying to help him up. Nick immediately shoved him away, frustrated, and hauled himself up to his feet alone. He was breathing hard, and his nostrils flared as Ellis slowly stood up, too, his expression in a discomfited look of slight hurt.

"I said, yeah." he repeated with a swipe of his hand through his mussed hair, irked, and Ellis recoiled a step back. "Why didn't you kill it, for chrissakes? Now it's running around."

"..s-sorry..." the Georgian managed, and what had been blooming hurt became full-blown pain. Nick swore the kid was close to tears, and suddenly, found himself speechless.

He was hurt. Really, actually, honestly hurt, and the conman was silent with the realization as Ellis turned away and just... walked back to the house, his workboots loud on the porch and face shaded under his cap.

Nick stared after him without a sound, aware of Rochelle standing on the porch and looking uncomprehendingly between Nick and the door, his dropped jacket in one hand and his Magnum in the other.

"Are you okay?" Nick almost didn't register it at first, but he realized with a straightening of his spine that Rochelle was talking to him. He jerked a nod quickly, dismissively, smacking palms against his clothes to pat off the grass and dirt he'd gotten on them.

"Perfectly. You know what that was? It was... psycho.. and I'm pretty sure it was humping my head."

She hesitated for a few beats, tapping her fingers on the articles she held, but took his cue to avoid the subject. Nick had no idea why she'd decided to stay instead of chasing Ellis down, nor why she was suddenly being nice to him, but he decided against arguing.

He felt a little shell-shocked. That.. hurt. It was nothing like fear or discomfort - it was outright pain, and Nick couldn't wrap his head around it.

"Yeah. They got called 'Jockeys' because they ride people like that.. when the CEDA post I was going to interview at fell apart, I didn't see much in the rush to get away, but - I saw one of those things ride a guy into a window so hard it shattered, and.. you know."

Nick nodded, allowing himself a small groan as he lifted his hands and wiped at his neck with his wrists, sighing irately against the dirty sensation that crawled all over him. "So they hump you into danger.. great. That's just fuckin' exactly what this apocalypse needed."

Rochelle gave the smallest of laughs, shaking her head and watching as he walked over to step up the staircase and hold up his hands to take his jacket and gun from her. "The laughter is just eerie, isn't it? I don't like them laughing."

She crossed her arms behind her back, and they were both silent as Nick tossed the jacket over his shoulder and reholstered his Magnum. He was just about to get free from her, turning toward the still-open door, when she murmured,

"What's going on, Nicolas..?"

Re-settling green eyes on her face, Nick narrowed them subtly. He stood for a moment, askance, before shrugging a shoulder and retorting effortlessly, "How should I know?" But it wasn't enough. There was still the admittance that something WAS going on, although Nick had the feeling Ellis had already given that away.

Rochelle sighed at him, jamming a hand in the pocket of her jeans and cocking a hip. "Will you suck it up for five seconds and talk to him? He's really upset, and he won't talk to me about it."

Nick thought of a few things to retort with... but for some reason, all that came out was a spat, "I planned on it.", as he twisted on his heel and stalked into the house. He was almost instantly stopped by Carmine, looking a little desperate and reaching out to grab his arms.

"Oh, Nick, are you like, okay? What was -"

The conman stuck up a hand to halt her, rejecting her embrace so suddenly she clasped her hands on her chest, startled and quickly looking disappointed. "Doll, I'm dirty and sore.." he enunciated carefully, waiting just long enough to get a nod before stepping around her and crossing the room. The kitchen door was open, so there he went, pushing it open with his palm and steeling his lips tight.

The room was only half-lit by a small under-cabinet light in the far corner. The off-yellow glint struck the tile surfaces harshly, and through the haze, Nick eyed Ellis. The kid stood just in front of the kitchen sink, his head bowed and his hands curled into fists on the edge of the counter. His cap was set off to the side, tussled and curly brunette locks freed.

Nick very slowly drew the door shut behind him. For a beat, they were silent.

"Care to tell me what the fuck that was, Overalls?"

Not exactly how he'd intended to start the conversation, but he made no motion to take it back either. Nick stood there at the door, one hand still lingering on the doorknob and slowly clinking one of his rings against the metal, before advancing just a few steps in light of Ellis' silence.

"... Overalls." It was quieter that time. He didn't mean it to, but his voice lost its edge with the second repetition, and with it, Ellis turned his head slightly. His gaze flicked up to Nick, blue unsure.

"I dunno, Nick." Tired resignation lied in the words, and at the same time, Ellis re-averred his gaze with a slight downturn of his lips. The conman hunted green eyes over his expression, waiting for some kind of elaboration, tongue curling against the roof of his mouth.

Ellis swallowed, tasting the words before he spoke them. No amount of preparation helped, though, and he fumbled through it with a growing look of uncertainty and a heavy lining of insinuation.

"Why'd yuh go on 'n' do that? 'N why couldn't you.. why'd yuh just .. Why, Nick?"

Nick was silent for a short but heavy moment, lifting a hand to slowly rub his thumb over his lips. He could just imagine that was a question Ellis had been asking himself incessantly... now there it was, directed at him. He had no good way to answer it.

Tensely, he reached out and set a hand against the countertop beside him, maintaining a good distance from the kid. "I was drunk, kid. You've got a right to be upset." It wasn't an apology, but it was the closest Nick could get himself to go.

Ellis hesitated to respond to that, dropping his gaze down low to inspect the grout of the counter. Was he upset? Or just confused? .. what would happen if Nick leaned in right then and touched him?

"If it helps any... I wouldn't have done that otherwise."

Ellis' head lifted up quickly, though something kept his gaze rooted to the counter. He was silent, teeth moving to bite at his lower lip. With an indelicate inhale, Ellis lifted a shoulder and turned his cheek. "... whut's that mean?"

"It means what I said."

The hick flicked up his gaze, staring a moment at Nick and clenching his fingers slightly. He wanted to demand an answer.. prod further. He wanted to know if Nick meant he wouldn't have done anything at all.. or forced anything. He wanted to get a long look at those unreadable green eyes and see if there was some glimmer that said something else. Most of all, he wanted to ask Nick for advice, for help, for something.
What he said instead was this: "So you'd.. be okay if we.. pretended it never happened.. 'n' I fergave you?"

It hurt to say, and that winding pain suddenly re-knotted itself in his chest. Did he really want to do that? He had so many questions, but there was a sense of futility as he watched something in Nick's posture change. Something dissipated in that moment, and though he first thought it was a kind of relief, Ellis felt himself floundering when he glanced up and found Nick's green eyes distant.

Did Nick look... disappointed? Or was it a trick of the light over that pale color?

"That's fine with me." the conman responded, pulling his hand away from the counter and straightening his clothing simply. His face was so impassive, it was like nothing had changed at all, and Ellis' lips fell into a silent gawp open and closed. In an instant, it was like they'd signed a deal, and all Ellis could do was struggle to register his words.

"I'll leave you alone, you leave me alone... try and get Rochelle to calm down, too. She's gone all big sister on you, and it's getting annoying."

"O-Okay, Nick..." the mechanic managed very quietly, letting his weight rest against the counter as a slight chill worked up his spine. No... he didn't want to agree to this, but he was only really realized that as it slipped out of his control.

Nick reached to pull his jacket from where it lay over his forearm and instead tossed it up over his shoulder, turning away and walking to the door. "I'm taking a shower. See you in the morning, Overalls." His voice was flat... his gaze flatter and he didn't wait for a response before he opened up the door and left.

Ellis didn't give one until he was gone, anyway. He turned away slightly, leaning over the sink and staring down into the drain, his fingers gripping on the counter tightly.

"...okay, Nick."

Ellis didn't realize he'd fallen asleep until he woke up. A tiny clock hanging from the wall opposite him just barely glinted with enough moonlight from the window behind their couch to tell him it was a drowsy 1 A.M., almost three (very quiet) hours since he'd last heard from Nick.

Lifting his head a few inches, tired and disoriented, he noticed he was curled up against Rochelle's lap where they'd been sitting together on the loveseat. She had an arm over his shoulder, fingers curled gently on his bicep, twitching faintly in her sleep.

He blinked slowly, freeing a hand from the blanket draped over his sprawled form to rub the drowsiness from his eyes, trying to focus. He felt guilty now that sleep had taken some of the edge off his emotional turmoil - he'd been silent, unresponsive and brooding, even though Rochelle was clearly worried for him.

What could he have said?

Sighing softly, Ellis gently guided her arm off him and shifted to sit up, curling his bare toes against the living room carpet as he swung his legs off the edge. His hat and his boots and socks were all off, leaving him feeling a little bare.

Coach was awake, he realized, as he pawed a hand against his bare scalp - awake and looking at him from the couch across the living room. "You a'ight, son?" The big man was still on his belly, but he had his head braced on a wrist to lift it up a little. His gruff voice was gentled and curious, and his care put a small smile on Ellis' face.

"Yeah, Coach." he lied, feeling a small pang in his chest. "I need tuh use the bathroom, is all."

The big man simply grunted in acceptance, re-closing his eyes and turning his chin away. Ellis' smile widened for a split second before he gently sighed it flat, pushing up onto his feet before he could second-guess himself.

He didn't, but he was stuck in his lie now.

Padding across the carpet quietly on his bare feet, Ellis watched his own steps. He scratched at his stomach, itching up his shirt to get at an irritated scuff on one of his ribs, and somewhat reluctantly started up the stairs.

Nick and Carmine weren't downstairs and hadn't been since he'd finally left the kitchen, so he figured they'd gone upstairs together. The thought made him frown, telling himself that maybe Nick had taken the guest room and Carmine hers... but that wasn't likely.

He didn't want to run into them, let alone Nick. Not right now. That in mind, the hick started to tiptoe as he reached the top of the stairs, intent on getting into and out of the bathroom without getting caught.

There were a few shut doors along the hallway and, with a small squint, Ellis noticed that there was a soft light glowing out from the edges of one, betraying their location and making him relax as much as the sight downcast his gaze. The bathroom door hung open, fortunately.

Cautiously, Ellis slipped up to the bathroom threshold and stepped inside the dark, tiled room, his feet immediately chilled by the bare floor in a rather calming shiver.
Relaxing somewhat and figuring he'd just stay there a few moments and then go back downstairs, Ellis started to reach up to the light switch and flick it on. He froze when he heard a door open down the hall, however, and never completed the motion.

Quickly, the hick turned to press himself against the wall just inside the bathroom, holding his breath and jamming his back against the lightswitch painfully. There were voices, but Ellis couldn't make them out clearly, even though he strained to.

Leaning just slightly, he poked his head through the doorway, peeking down the hallway as subtly as he could. Carmine was hanging out of an open door, her eyes intent on Nick's face, standing in front of her in the hall.

As Ellis watched, he leaned in, catching her cheek under a thumb and bending his mouth to hers - and it was a deep kiss.

Ellis couldn't watch, his heart sinking to his gut and body reflexively recoiling back to hide in the bathroom like it could spare him the sight. He slowly slipped over to the sink and counter, leaning his weight heavily against it and bending forward. He rubbed his face into his palms, sighing.

Why should it be a shock..? Why did it even matter? Ellis had told him he hadn't wanted to accept that what happened had happened... He'd forgiven him (supposedly) so they could move on (supposedly)... Ellis shouldn't be surprised that Nick had gone on unfazed.

Maybe he'd wanted to see if Nick would argue.. maybe he didn't really think Nick would've given up as easily as he did - but Ellis had messed it all up and Nick had let him. Maybe that disappointment Ellis had seen had been imagined. Nick must've meant what he'd said - if not for the alcohol, he'd never have done that, anyway.

"...it ain't fair." Ellis mumbled very quietly, sighing in frustration and leaning forward until his forehead hit the bathroom mirror. "I think I might like yuh, Nick..."

Because suddenly all he could think about was how Nick had half-carried him after the Smoker had nearly killed him. Or how Nick had bent and let him in to eat breakfast with him. Or how they'd wrestled down the street and Ellis had caught him with a laugh glinting in his eyes.

Even the moments before or after the gambler yelled at him - like the flicker of regret after Nick had backhanded him. Or the fitful guilt tensing his shoulders as he'd stalked away on several occasions... or how one of his rants had been punctuated with a certain level of 'you could have gotten hurt'...

Ellis didn't think he was imagining it. Maybe he was being stupid, but all he had was his gut, and his gut liked being around Nick. Even if he was a jerk sometimes.

But it didn't matter. Nick had clearly slept with Carmine - why not, anyway? Nick didn't have any obligations or reasons not to. Ellis had told him to forget what happened.

If only logic made his chest stop hurting.

Slowly pushing away from the counter, Ellis drooped his head and chewed on his lip to keep it from trembling. He shouldn't have expected Nick to care at all, but it still hurt. Like he'd finally come to some kind of turning point, this new feeling struggle to breathe, and when he actually looked up he was alone.

Careful steps led him back to the doorway, and he looked out into the dark hallway, his gaze latching onto the line of light that shone out from under one of the other doors where it hadn't
As it suddenly hit him that Nick was in that room, alone, his whole spine stiffened in a surge of confidence. Nick had said it: Ellis had a right to be upset.

He'd be upset - he'd tell Nick just exactly how frustrated he was, and he'd let out these crippling emotions, and he'd inform him just how much it hurt to think Nick had turned right around and just jumped a girl he didn't even seem to like.

Ellis would've been okay, but that thought had just pushed something too far. He wanted an apology, and even if Nick didn't give him one, he was sure as hell going to ask for one.

Like closure.

Straightening out his clothes and the knot of his overalls, Ellis set his jaw and tried to draw himself up to some kind of height. He inhaled quickly and started moving before he could second-guess himself, lightening his steps as he passed by the room Nick had left and pausing in front of the lit door Nick was behind.

... should he knock?

Decisively shaking his head, Ellis just reached out and got hold of the knob, twisting it and thrusting the door open with a quick step to follow it as it opened.

Nick turned around almost instantly, his shower-clean but still unshaven face in a look of rather drawn interest, one brow raising. He'd been in the middle of undoing the last button of his dress shirt, suit jacket already tossed to the messily-made bed that protruded out into the middle of the room. His torso warmly filled the now loosely draping blue fabric, dark hair dusting his chest and disappearing into the shadow a bedside lamp cast across his stomach.

As his green eyes ticked onto Ellis, his lips gained a minute quirk downward, and he slowly let his fingertip twitch that last button free before he crossed his arms over his chest tightly. The motion did pull some of his shirt back into place, trapping it there.

"Something wrong, hayseed?" That was all he asked. As Ellis stood there in the doorway, gripping onto the knob and not quite inside, the conman's green gaze burned a hole straight through him. It was so fierce, Ellis couldn't get himself to meet it long enough to try and understand it, but somehow his resolve was unflagging.

He stepped in and shut the door.

"Yeah, Nick. Look," Ellis took in a breath, jutting his fisted hands carefully against his thighs. "You don't wanna hear this, but - I-I'm gonna say it anyway, 'cause you owe me a chance tuh at least say it."

Nick seemed wary, gradually and tensely curling his fingers in his sleeves before he gave a silent nod of agreement.

So Ellis lifted his hands to lightly scratch his fingertips into his loose curls, averting his gaze to the carpet between them. He felt his face warm, but did his absolute best to ignore it. "I'm - real mad, Nick. It ain't fair, pullin' whut you did 'n' then .. not even havin' the guts to say a real 'sorry'."

The conman inhaled quickly through his nose, slowly moving his legs to cross idly at the knees where he stood, his weight falling to the right. His voice was even - non-confrontational. A little strange, actually. "You said you forgave me. Didn't we move on?"
Ellis pushed his fingers a little tighter into their curls, shaking his head slightly and biting onto his tongue for a moment. "I... it ain't that simple. Yuh never even tried to talk tuh me all day! You were just actin' like nothin' happened... don't I get some kind'uh 'splanation? Or an apology?"

"I gave you an explanation, Overalls... I was drunk. Everyone's done something stupid when they were drunk, this one just included you." That struck Ellis a little. Nick was still calm, though Ellis felt like something else was teetering on an edge in his voice. Those green eyes sat on him, musing.

"Why didn't you try tuh apologize?" he repeated. Ellis realized his voice was strained... more pleading than he meant. He couldn't help it. He also noticed abruptly that Nick's shoulders twitched down at his question, just slightly.

His voice was quieter than before when he responded, though his tone was harsher. "I didn't make a calm pass at you, Overalls. I don't know if you noticed, but what happened wasn't exactly 'oh hey, I'm drunk and you look good today.' 'Sorry' is supposed to make you feel better? Because I'll say it, but somehow I doubt it'd do any actual goddamn good like you think."

"Ain't that my decision..?" Ellis only barely got it out, Nick's blunt retort choking him up slightly. His brows furrowed tightly, and for a moment, the two men were silent.

"... What do you want from me, exactly, Overalls? I can't believe you really barged into my room in the middle of the night because you wanted a 'sorry.'" Nick's arms crossed tighter, and he turned around to face the bed, suddenly freeing Ellis from the burning strength of his gaze. He didn't, in fact, apologize - and Ellis didn't miss that.

Ellis took a slow breath, fisting his hands tighter, and then cuffed one up in the air to point at him with it in a small gesture. He forced himself to say it. He had to know... "I'm askin' 'cause I - 'cause - Hogwash, Nick! I think I like you... 'n I been feelin' more'n more confused 'cause I don't know whut to do 'n' -"

He lost his composure with a fierce flushing across the bridge of his nose, voice going to a very quiet tone as he couldn't bear to look toward Nick's face. "... I'm askin' 'cause I - 'cause - Hogwash, Nick! I think I like you... 'n I been feelin' more'n more confused 'cause I don't know whut to do 'n' -"

The conman's head turned where the rest of his body stayed solid, staring a moment across the room at the mechanic before rolling his brows together slowly. "What in the hell kind of question is that, anyway?"

Ellis stubbornly kept rooted. His whole spine felt weak, though, teeth gritted together subtly in the back as he worked the words out from a tight throat. "... I'm askin' 'cause I - 'cause - Hogwash, Nick! I think I like you... 'n I been feelin' more'n more confused 'cause I don't know whut to do 'n' -"

He lost his composure with a fierce flushing across the bridge of his nose, voice going to a very quiet tone as he couldn't bear to look toward Nick's face. "...but it don't - matter, so. I just want a sorry, Nick. I ain't causin' any fuss, 'cause I know yuh slept with Carmine 'n' I ain't gonna say nothin' tuh nobody.. 'n'... I'll be okay if you can just give me a real sorry."

The silence for a moment afterward was completely deafening. He felt the weight of the air around him beating at his frame, determined to break him. When Nick's voice broke through, very evenly, it made him stiffen to imagine the things he'd say...

And all he said at first was "Overalls."

Realizing he wouldn't continue until Ellis gave him some kind of response, Ellis very slowly forced his gaze to rise, blue eyes uncertainly vulnerable without the comforting shade of his hat. He knew his expression was bright red, knew he must look humiliated... and it was some kindness that Nick took the lifting of his head as enough instead of making him talk.
"You're wrong." Ellis' knees started the subtlest of shakes, and he realized with a small, nervous rise to his pulse that Nick was smirking just faintly - sadly, even. All Ellis could do was give a small 'huh?'.

Nick stepped forward, silently crossing the room and letting his arms drop to his sides. He halted just barely in front of Ellis, cool gaze scanning over that expression, now drawn with anxiety and trembling with the beat of his heart. They were so damn close. "I didn't do anything with her."

Ellis felt his heart come to a very clamoring halt. He knew it showed on his face - he watched Nick read it and watched his smirk gain some more weight.

"I turned her down. And I wasn't in the mood to mess around with some two-bit Cali exile. I wasn't happy, either, you know. It's not like I wanted to do -" He did stop a bit there, chewing at his tongue to muse at wording before he amended, "I didn't like what happened."

Ellis struggled, his whole body feeling like lead as he tried so hard to absorb the words he was hearing, to listen to the low, sincere tone Nick spoke them with. Was that an apology for what happened on the roof, or downstairs? Ellis wasn't sure. He also wasn't sure how much the difference mattered.

His voice stumbled when he whispered up at the gambler, "Yuh.. I thought.. You didn't - sleep with her?" It was so obvious now. Why else would Nick still be so shower-fresh? Why else would they be so quiet saying goodnight in the hall? Why else would Nick be sleeping in another room?

Ellis felt like an idiot.

Nick was leaned in now, though, his arms uncrossed to bare the only sparingly covered expanse of his torso. "I didn't fuckin' want her." There was emphasis there on that last word, so subtle Ellis almost doubted if he'd really heard it. His expression was serious, eyes half-lidded, and Ellis felt himself immobilized underneath the soft smoulder of those focused and cold eyes.

"And kid?" Ellis could only barely nod his head, feeling like his heart and his head might explode with the blush rushing in quick, frantic little pants through his veins. His chest was pounding. "... if I hadn't been drunk, that would've never happened."

Dizzy, those words didn't completely sink into his brain before Nick was adding, voice intensely quiet and rough, "This would've."

Ellis felt the fingertips grip him first, their warm, blunt pads dotting a line along his jaw to hold his head in place with a firm touch. Anchored there, Nick leaned in further, and both their eyes shut in the same motion as the conman eased their lips together.

They both tensed. It was there in their shoulders and the way their bodies linked through that one motion and sparked in the contact - this taut sense of energy, anxious.

A small whimper, one of some subtle uncertainty, escaped Ellis and the shiver of every muscle in his form betrayed the waves of warmth that spiraled from the touch of lip on his. When he felt the subtle part of the conman's lips, the sudden and intense smell of soap, cigarettes, and something a little heavier swirling across his senses -

Ellis didn't pull away.
Chapter 31

Nick had never been easily swayed by kisses, not in any meaningful way. They were a means to an end; a method to lay out his intentions as bluntly as possible.

Just then, though, he could feel Ellis trembling under his fingertips. His mouth was soft and unsure, afraid to move. That tangible shock changed something in it for the gambler. He didn't mind as much that their bodies kept a good few inches of distance between each other, or that the kiss was so achingly tentative.

Then again - he wasn't usually one for slow kisses, either.

His fingertips sunk along Ellis' jaw as the kid failed to push him off, curling up his cheeks and tracing past his ears into the bare locks usually hidden under his cap. Nick let his fingers twine in the soft mop, using it as a light hold to anchor Ellis to him in the same moment that he simply felt at the strands between his knuckles.

Nick's tongue pressed gently past the part to his own lips, wetting over the hick's and encouraging him to open his own. He could feel Ellis' warm breath fanning over his face as the kid panted through his nose, and it sped up at Nick's advance.

The moment Ellis submitted to it, leaning his weight against the fingers in his hair, Nick stole the smallest taste of the kid's mouth with a feather-light intrusion of the tip of his tongue. He pulled away there, releasing him, more than aware of how Ellis gasped at the sudden connection between their mouths.

Nick's fingers spread and then curled in Ellis' hair, and he opened his eyes to scan over the younger man's expression slowly, a smirk touching his own lips. Ellis was red-faced, jaw softly slack as he hadn't quite recovered from the kiss. It was… nice-looking.

When he managed to regain some amount of self-awareness, his mouth quickly shut, wetting his lips with the tip of his tongue self-consciously. A flustered "U-uh.." was all Ellis could really pull off at first, color deepening as Nick didn't waver in his focus.

God, that felt good... really fucking insanely good. "Not what you expected, Overalls?" he murmured, his voice sultry and a little smooth with want. Nick could see it set the kid on edge. He enjoyed it.

The use of Ellis' nickname was almost ridiculous in that moment. It felt like a joke, even to Nick, and Ellis struggled for composure as he breathed in and out a bit quickly. "Uh.. I dunno... yer bein' -... gentle, I uh - I didn't expect that, I.. guess..."

One of the conman's hands remained curled in Ellis' hair, but the other eased free and slipped down the Georgian's spine, working its way down the dip in the center of Ellis' back with his fingertips. Ellis noticed, reddening heavily over the bridge of his nose, his weight and hips shifting in slight uncertainty. "You prefer what I did on the roof?" he asked in a low murmur, rather intently maintaining his green gaze on Ellis'.

He was curious what kind of response he'd get.

There was a certain exhilaration flitting through Nick's veins he couldn't deny. He felt his heart beating uncharacteristically hard beneath his ribs. Maybe it was just the build-up to it all - he finally had the frustratingly attractive Georgian within his grasp, he was actually sober, and Ellis was actually willing.

Willing, but looking immensely uncertain and quiet. Nick merely watched him and stopped his fingers just at the bunched line of Ellis' overalls, pressed against his skin through his t-shirt. He had to remind himself to slow down; that Ellis wasn't one of his usual targets, and didn't know what he was doing.

Nick wasn't very good at slow.

"N-no..." was Ellis' eventual, weakly mumbled response, gaze flicking between Nick's eyes and his mouth.

He knew that look.

Widening his smirk slightly, Nick suddenly purred, "Come here..." in a low voice, curling his arm and his fingers into Ellis' back to draw him forward and lean their bodies close together. Ellis immediately inhaled a sharp breath and darted eyes down as the motion pulled him tight against a very warm, bare chest.

Nick's arm tightly enveloped around his side and his other one released its grip on his curls to join the first. It pushed him to stumble his bare foot one step forward, and Ellis panicked slightly, although it was mostly in his expression and voice. "N-Nick.. I ain't.. sure, uh.."

Their hips were pinned close together now. Ellis didn't try to struggle away, even as his eyes went darting wide. Nick might've thought he was looking for the door, had Ellis' gaze not found its way back to his face, uncertainly.

His eyes were warm, stony blue, and searched Nick's for answers.

The gambler chuckled low, dropping his head to push a second kiss on him instead, tongue exploring the Georgian's mouth a little hungrily. Ellis' knees went weak, leaning forward into it even as the motion stretched his lean body flat against Nick's.

The conman lifted his brows against a surge of desire at the sensation coupled with the slow, tentative nibble of Ellis' teeth on his tongue. Shit. He growled a little in the back of his throat, and Ellis must've thought he'd done something wrong because he jumped slightly at the noise, breaking their kiss with a small gasp of air - but Nick didn't let him move away more than that, shifting his hands to grip onto the mechanic's slim hips.

"There's a whole lot I want to do to you."

There that tone was again - gravelly and dark, ragged with something lustful. Ellis shivered rather harshly as the words settled, trying to stifle the motion. He lifted his hands up to grip onto Nick's shoulders, bracing himself, and whimpered a question very quietly, "Yuh.. uh.. still do like.. girls, though.. right?"

For some reason, all the question did was make Nick smirk. He bent his head to the side, nipping lightly at the top of Ellis' ear, his stubbled cheek scuffing against the hick's. This is a new conversation...

Any other time, he would've found the question vexing. But, throwing the kid a lifeline was, he decided reluctantly, the least he could do. His voice was a rough approximation of sympathetic as he whispered against that ear. "Insecure, kiddo? Never looked twice at a guy before?"

Slowly, whining in a soft exhale at the ministrations to his ear, Ellis managed a shake of his head, visibly struggling to stand up straight and not tremble.

"If it makes you feel better," And God it felt strange to admit, considering he'd only once so much as discussed the topic with someone else. Fact was, Nick had made Ellis struggle with too much already, and he felt very distinctly that he had earned a small sacrifice. Just a small admittance that he wasn't completely alone in his discomfort.

"I hate it a little."

Ellis blinked softly over Nick's shoulder, those blue eyes tipping to the side... but Nick didn't pull away from his ear, and before Ellis could respond, the conman tightened his fingers on his hips and curled his tongue against the kid's earlobe.

"A-ah!" Ellis yipped in a sudden fluster, startled, fingers clutching onto the older man's shirt. The open dress shirt bunched up with the motion, slipping a few inches off his shoulders, and Nick chuckled warmly against Ellis' ear as he rolled his torso a bit to the side.

Ellis quickly let go of the shirt, realizing what Nick was doing - and his breath caught as the conman wormed his dress shirt down to his bent elbows, baring his torso. With some reluctance, Nick let go of Ellis long enough to toss back his arms and ditch it entirely to the floor.

He grabbed hold of Ellis' wrist, loosely pulling him forward as he strolled backwards. Green eyes burned lightly as he smirked, Ellis staring - flustered - at his stomach as the Georgian stumbled on clumsy bare feet, following the pull. The kid was lost.

_You're not good at slow, Nicolas, but no reason to push him into it, either... God, this is not going to be easy._

Nick stopped when his calves hit the edge of the bed, dropping down to sit and spread his legs. Before Ellis could react, Nick tugged him forward to stand in the space between his thighs, slipping his hands up to curl on the back of Ellis' head and coax him into a bend for a third kiss.

Ellis quickly closed his eyes and leaned down into the kiss, one of his hands dropping to brace himself and landing just an inch to the side of Nick's thigh. He was warming up, Nick thought, so he pushed deep into it, slowly retracting one of his hands while he distracted the younger man with slow strokes of his tongue, enjoying the heavy trembles he got out of Ellis for his trouble.

Nick curled his elbow to get his hand on Ellis' stomach, hooking fingertips in his yellow T-shirt and pulling suddenly upwards. He chuckled in the back of his throat as his knuckles brushed up the Georgian's smooth stomach and Ellis froze up -

But the conman was shortly surprised, as the hick straightened up in a sudden surge and tugged his shirt up over his head. Nick's mouth went incredibly dry as the hick's torso flexed in his squirm to be rid of it, a soft flush settled all over his lean skin and accenting the slopes of his frame.

He wasn't built, exactly; it was more like a smooth layer of muscle that had developed from constant activity. He was _solid_, on the cusp of growing out of the last shaky remnants of 'young adult'.

Whatever it was, Nick liked it.

"Jesus shit." he muttered, very simply and a little roughly, reaching up his hands to curl them behind the kid's thighs and grip at the baggy fabric of his overalls. He could tell Ellis was uncertain, standing there, without even looking at his face.
Dragging Ellis a step further and sliding his hands up till he was almost cupping his rear, Nick leaned in and nipped harshly just at the kid's stomach. Ellis jumped slightly, his arms lifting up to loop around Nick's shoulders and grip his fingers against the conman's back.

His voice whimpered slightly above Nick's head, but the gambler was too focused to respond, trailing teeth and lips along the panting lines of the younger man's ribs. He was aware his stubble was scratching along Ellis' skin, more because the mechanic kept gasping and shifting as he traveled along with a hungry pace, maybe tickled.

Nick flattened his tongue against Ellis' skin as he reached the gentle slope of his pec, spine shuddering a little at the rather distinct taste that had slowly been creeping into his senses. Nick shut his eyes and brushed his mouth over the pink bud of Ellis' left nipple before flicking the tip of his tongue against it, enjoying the sudden clutch it caused fingers to take on his back and the tremble it sent down Ellis' stomach.

Noticing the lack of sounds, though, he reopened his eyes and flickered his gaze up. Ellis had his curly-locked head twisted to the side, jaw slack but mouth buried in the swell of his tattooed shoulder, and eyes squeezed shut against the hot flush that covered his face.

The expression was so clearly struggling with arousal that Nick couldn't help himself. Raising his hands to grip onto the back of Ellis' bundled-up overalls, he urged the hick forward with a demanding push, ending up tripping Ellis forward into himself.

Ellis quickly tried to regain his balance, his hips having sprawled intimately into the niche of Nick's - but Nick merely growled softly, using both his grip on Ellis' overalls and the leverage he now had with his thighs to thrust them into a half-roll, trapping Ellis under himself against the bed.

Blue eyes quickly widened, Ellis panting heavily and stretching out his hands to grip onto the bed-sheets a little urgently. "N-Nick..." he huffed anxiously, body squirming slightly. "Whut're you -"

That made Nick take a breath, the oxygen welcome to an otherwise starved brain. Ellis gave this small whimper as Nick settled into a straddle on his thighs, watching with parted lips as the conman's hands coiled on his thighs with burgeoning energy.

Nick met his gaze, forcefully. "Kid." When Ellis tried to look away, the gambler reached out and braced his palm against his jawline, forcing his face back forward. Their eyes locked in the dim light, and Ellis chewed his lower lip. "I don't play hard to get. You want this?"

The Georgian seemed to waver a moment, the chewing increasing. Nick actually felt he might reconsider for a beat of time - and then Ellis' head nodded, minutely, his breath held and his words a little stuttered with their proximity. "Y-yeah... S'just... I ain't real sure..."

Nick's expression must've given his thoughts away, because Ellis' rate of speech suddenly ratcheted up. If his face could've gotten any redder, it did just then. "I ain't a virgin or nothin', I just don't... I ain't done nothin' like this before, is all, 'n'..."

That made Nick laugh. It was low in his throat and rough with tension, and the younger man's face drew into something a lot like a pout. "Relax, Ellis. You're thinking too hard."

Ellis seemed unsure at first, so Nick drew back an extra inch and let out a sigh. If it had been anyone else, he might've lost patience. If he'd been a better man, Nick might've stopped and talked to him.

Instead, he just said, "Trust me, okay?" - and thought, Except I'm the last person you should trust, kiddo.

He wasn't surprised when that worked, even if he got the distinct feeling that he'd taken advantage of the kid as Ellis' eyes softened a little. He nodded his head more seriously, voice just as soft. "Course…"

Nick didn't waste a moment, leaning down to close his mouth over Ellis'. He locked lips tightly and mercilessly deep, shutting him up and drawing an appreciative moan from the younger man. The nervous energy drained out of the mechanic, and Ellis tentatively reached up hands to touch at Nick's biceps.

His fingertips were calloused and warm, and Nick wished he could smooth out the goosebumps that raised in their presence.

Keeping that kiss held tightly and shifting his weight onto his knees, Nick worked Ellis' hips free of his overalls - he pushed them just halfway down his thighs, just enough. Nervous noises mumbled into the kiss with every movement, but Ellis' hips hitched up off the bed, as if to help.

That made Nick smirk, and his fingertips played for a moment over the soft inner thigh bared between the bottom edge of Ellis' boxers and his now lowered coveralls - then slowly slid up to the hick's underwear and gripped onto the fabric.

He broke the kiss as he stripped those boxers down, leaning back for a moment to glance down. Ellis was gorgeously laid out for him then, body sprawled out just enough to be vulnerable and a little clumsy. Where his arms and shoulders were crisply tanned, his abdomen and thighs were a little paler from remaining covered, lean but soft-looking.

And Nick's gaze found - now freed from his boxers and exposed to both the air and Nick's mercy - Ellis' cock arching up from short brunette curls. It made the gambler's spine straighten up, a sudden aching awareness of his own, constrained in now-too-tight slacks.

Lifting his left hand up to spit into his palm, Nick flicked his gaze toward Ellis' face, inspecting the struggle of arousal and embarrassment spread across those surprisingly attractive features. The gambler leaned forward on his knees, settling his mouth close to Ellis' ear as he just let his palm and then fingers trail along the other man's erection at first.

Ellis immediately hitched up his spine, knees trying to push up but unable to with Nick's weight on them. "N-Nick!" wobbled past his lips in a moan, blue eyes fluttering shut as the sensation set in, the cool touch of Nick's two rings making it all the worse.

"You can say stop..." he purred against the whorls of Ellis' right ear, almost tauntingly, letting his breath fan out in the quick pants it was escaping him. His grip on the kid became a little tighter as saliva slickened the motion, and he felt the tension underneath him rising as Ellis got harder.

"But I don't think you want to..."

The Georgian didn't even respond, whimpering and gasping as his fingers gripped on the sheets tightly. The anxiety was dissipating from Ellis as pleasure overtook it, Nick twisting his strokes at just the right point to draw a little extra jolt from it. The gambler couldn't help but draw back slightly to get a glance over his slackened expression.. shortly taking advantage of the lost look with a nip and lick of his silky-soft lower lip.

That brought Ellis a little out of his rut, mumbling in a soft whimper that didn't seem entirely thought out as another shudder wormed up his spine, "Y-yeah.."
Sitting there was getting uncomfortable, his abdomen tight and warm as his slacks seemed to just get tighter. Being shirtless helped, cool air brushing up along his back, but there was an undeniable heat that was building all over his front and the stroking motion of his own hand was arousing in far too many ways.

Effortlessly maintaining the tempo of his left hand, Nick moved his right to unbuckle his belt, flicking it apart with his pinky. The clink of metal drew Ellis' scattered attention, and he rolled his chin a little to glance down through foggy blue eyes, uncertainly trying to focus through a wave of pleasure Nick quite intentionally squeezed out of him just then.

Nick slipped his hand into his slacks, sighing faintly as he curled his fingers around his own length and pulled himself free, not near as carefully as he'd done with Ellis. He felt too urgent now, desire pressing into his stomach harshly, and he let his weight settle onto his knees in a quick motion to get a better angle and push his slacks a little more out of the way.

But - he only got a few strokes, synchronized with the ones he was giving Ellis that hadn't yet stopped, before he noticed Ellis suddenly unclench his hands from the sheets. Nick eyed him uncomprehendingly with burning green irises, panting harshly through flared nostrils, but Ellis didn't freeze up.

He was burning up with a blush from both arousal and embarrassment, but his jaw was steeled and he didn't falter.

That flat stomach flexed to bring Ellis to his elbows, slumping backward on one in a small arch, and bringing his other arm up to reach down and push his fingers to usurp Nick's on the gambler's dick.

"Ove-"

Nick let out a genuine, throaty moan of pleasure as those calloused pads snuck around him. He'd marvel at how arousing the forwardness on Ellis' part was later - for a moment, he lost all sense, manipulating the kid with his agile fingers with the same rhythm he rutted his hips lightly against Ellis' hand. It all got lost and mixed up, pulsing pleasure turning indistinct and vague, the rustle of clothing distracting and disorienting.

He heard Ellis give a choked whimper of an "Oh gawd," and the younger man's hips bucked up against Nick's hand to ride out his climax, spilling up onto the curled stretch of his abdomen. He came in waves as the gambler slowed his motions and soothed fingers in a drag up and down the hick's length.

It was difficult focusing, his brain swimming, and the gambler shifted his free hand to wrap his fingers around Ellis' and tighten them. His hips settled into fierce and shallow movements, driving the rhythm greedily.

Nick bent down to bury his face against Ellis' neck, breathing in sharply when his orgasm hit. He didn't have much control over his body then, hips jamming against both their hands with one final thrust and stilling as he growled fiercely.

He nipped a little at the crook of Ellis' neck and enjoyed the utterly exhausted little whimpers he got for it, not paying any mind to the fact he'd only added to the mess Ellis had made of his stomach.

The exhaustion that struck was so severe, Nick's legs wobbled as he rolled sideways off of Ellis, barely catching himself on a palm. He let out a shaky exhale and slid his legs off the edge of the bed, body slanted toward the mechanic as he fell to an elbow and relaxed. The conman rolled his head back and closed his eyes, a smirk etching itself easily across his lips.

The soft shifting of the bed announced Ellis readjusting his clothing a little before scooting toward him, and he felt the Georgian settle slowly, and just barely, against his now-sprawled front. Ellis' shoulder was just pressed against his pec, but it was enough.

One green eye flicked open, glancing at the body next to his... the slick stomach, the untied coveralls and bunched boxers that he'd just barely gotten modestly back up around his hips... the bare chest, the reddened cheeks..

Lastly, Nick's gaze ended up shifting to meet Ellis'. He didn't look so nervous now - in fact there was an edge of happiness to the brilliantly exhausted blue of his eyes, this smile risking at his lips that was... cute.

"Thank'yuh, Nick..."

The gambler almost wanted to laugh. Being outright thanked, like I did the kid a favour... but the closest he came to laughter was a twitch wider of his smirk. He settled it soon after, and with a very weighty inhale that summoned what strength he had, Nick pushed on his elbows to roll to his feet.

"That's a first..." he muttered quietly.

Nick realized then that the loss of some of that smile was because of his actions, glancing down at the pillow on the floor. He lifted up his hands and tiredly rubbed at the expanse of his chest, each motion feeling heavier and heavier the longer he was awake. "I can make you go back downstairs if you'd rather, kiddo. It's that or the floor."

Ellis didn't answer at first, forcing himself up to his bare feet and taking a few steps to the side, getting out of Nick's way as he took the comforter off the bed, dropping it down next to the pillow and starting to pull up the thinner bedsheet left behind so he could collapse back onto the bed and slip under it.

"Naw... not really." Suddenly Ellis smiled again, visibly dismissing whatever it was that'd given him pause. He gently stepped over to lean in and wrap his arms momentarily around Nick from behind, catching the conman just before he'd turned to actually slide under the sheets.

"He wanted to sleep with me." He shouldn't have been surprised, but he supposed he was, a little. The gambler pulled the sheets over his frame, groaning a little as he settled down on the bed and pushed his head against the one pillow left there, starting to close his eyes.
Lifting an arm, Nick reached over to click off the bedside lamp, darkness thrusting up over the room in a sudden motion. He hadn't even relaxed before Ellis, shifting audibly under the sheets, tried to speak to him. "Hey, Nick...?"

A hush spilled out from Nick's lips reflexively, but rather unenthusiastically; "We'll talk tomorrow. Go to sleep, Overalls." He was too tired to handle conversation - he imagined the questions Ellis had. I should've just kicked him out...

A little too gently, Ellis' voice responded from the floor, "Okay. G'night, Nick." He didn't try again... and they both fell asleep quickly and deeply, unmoving.

Along the course of the night, Nick's pillow ended up wrapped in his arms.
Chapter 32

Nick felt his shoulder being shaken gently, and as he stirred, his body groaned a complaint. He could sense a few bruises over his body the Jockey had caused him, and the lazy pain left him unwilling to get up and break the pocket of warmth wrapped around him.

Wrapping his arms tighter around the pillow held to his chest, the conman growled a "What...?" under his breath without opening his eyes. He even buried his face against it, hoping the disruption would simply go away. He mulled over, distantly, if his Magnum was in arms-reach.

As consciousness settled more fully over his brain, however, his memory cleared and what was a foul mood trickled into a rather pleasant one. Recalling the previous night set all his nerves at ease, and the lean contentment that settled into his muscles softened the harsh grip he had on his pillow.

_Goddamn, last night was good... never been happier to've ruined my chances with a girl._

What hit him strangely about that, though, was that in no way had he been thinking what happened would've been the result of him rejecting Carmine. He'd stalked to the other room resigned to a cold, empty night and self-frustration.

But nothing, he decided, could ruin his good mood today.

"Sorry, Nick..." Ellis' voice made him pull his head away from the pillow, blinking flecked green eyes for a moment at the clothed mechanic kneeling beside his bed.

Ellis gave a slightly bashful smile there, adjusting the cap on his head slowly and shifting on his knees. "Ro came in 'n woke me up a few minutes ago. Carmine's real upset this mornin', we want you tuh try'n talk to her."

The pleasure drained instantly at the mention of - well, reality. Confirming the room was empty and the door at least mostly shut with a glance, Nick shifted his weight to roll to a seated position on the mattress. He let his arms cross, but didn't keep the sheets from sliding down to his lap.

Casually, eyes on the almost-shut door, Nick reached out and tucked a knuckle under Ellis' chin. He forced his face up so he could lean in a bit, dangerously close, like he might kiss him. He thoroughly enjoyed the embarrassment that flooded the other man's face. "What'd you tell Rochelle?"

"I, I uh.." Ellis, not exactly trying to get away even as his hands clamped over the edge of the bed like he might either push to his feet or fall over, stammered a little. He was blushing, the color spilling over the bridge of his scarred nose. "I told her we talked it out..."

Nick smirked neatly at the Georgian, stopping short before his predatory instinct escalated the situation.

"Give it away with that blush, dumbshit." He said it like he hadn't just been intentionally taunting the blush out of him. Ellis glanced up at the term, and even though he couldn't pick out a gentling that indicated it wasn't meant harshly, Nick clearly wasn't angry. "And what was 'it'?"

Keeping his head precisely where it was, Ellis downcast his gaze and cleared his throat uncomfortably. His voice lowered a little, and he seemed guilty. "...She sorta already had an idea... thought I was, uh.. jealous of Carmine likin' you an' we was fightin' over her.."
Nick immediately saw the irony, cracking a dark chuckle and releasing Ellis. He pushed his pillow back up to the top of the bed, then thrust the light sheets off his frame and made to stand up, buttoning his shirt slowly. The gambler noticed Ellis watching him sideways, still blushing, but feigned obliviousness.

"Pretty close." he commented lowly.

Ellis shifted to haul up to his feet, crossing his arms behind his back. He quirked his mouth a little, embarrassed, and dropped his chin to hide his eyes under his cap. "I-I wasn't jealous."

The conman smirked, straightening his dress shirt and tucking it into his slacks. He stretched his arms out, elbows popping pleasantly with the motion, then relaxed them to try to rearrange his hair into the cool slicked back look he preferred. It was getting hard without an actual gel, but he was making do.

"Then what were you?"

Ellis didn't answer at first, hooking his thumbs into the bunch of his overalls and biting onto his lower lip. A moment later, he managed, "I'unno.."

Nick tugged his suit jacket free from where it laid on the end of the bed, pausing just a moment as he was spreading it open to try and gauge Ellis' meaning. Shrugging the jacket on, he reached over and grasped Ellis' elbow, gentle on the scarring wounds there. Sighing just a little and turning the Georgian to push him toward the door, he prompted, "I'm not her fuckin' keeper, but where is she?"

"Ain't come outta her room all mornin'... Other reason Ro' told me tuh wake you up, 'cause she said you could go'n'get the door open." Ellis smiled under his cap at the touch to his arm, glancing over his shoulder at Nick a little brightly as he walked to the door.

The smile caught him off-guard. It was sweet. That bothered him.

Nick snorted, following after him, releasing Ellis' elbow and turning his own hand up to inspect it, feeling the warmth left over from their contact. He felt a strike of annoyance at his own discomfort - he didn't like being at a loss.

The hell do I do now?

The pleasant mood was gone, quickly as it had come.

Refocusing as Ellis stepped up beside Carmine's bedroom and leaned his shoulder against the wall just next to the door, Nick grumbled a wordless complaint and arranged himself in front of it.

"Carmine? You okay, doll?"

Noticing a slight fistling of Ellis' hands out of the corner of his eye, Nick smirked smugly. Not jealous my ass... Not hearing anything immediately, the conman leaned his head in and set his ear against the door, lifting his gaze a little and repeating, "Doll?" He tried the knob, softly, but it was locked.

The soft, sobbing sound of Carmine's voice filtered through the door, making Nick groan and pinch the bridge of his nose. He whispered just loud enough for Ellis to hear, utterly frustrated; "Oh, you have got to be kidding me... she's crying?"

The Georgian gave a weak grin, and slight guilt filtered into his features. "Well, yuh did turn her down, Nick..."
Nick flicked a narrowed look at him, snorting in displeasure. "Women..." Returning his voice to its louder call, his tone gentled to this strained pleasantry that actually made Ellis have to hide a laugh behind his wrist. "Carmine, doll, open the door and let me talk to you. I thought you were okay."

His expression was drawn with irritation, and it only worsened when Carmine didn't respond to him, her crying voice getting softer like she was hiding behind or under something.

".. we talked about this. It wasn't you." Nothing. Mouthing something foul, Nick dug his hand beneath his jacket and pried his wallet from the inner pocket tucked away there.

Flipping it open and snatching out a credit card from one of the folds, Nick took a step to center himself before the knob and gently work the card into the crack of the doorframe beside it. He tossed the wallet to Ellis so he could grip onto the knob with his other hand, glancing up at the door.

"Doll, I'm coming in... - ...Overalls, fuck off my stuff." Caught, Ellis shut the wallet back up before he really got anything from it beyond the fact Nick looked oddly angry in his driver's license photo, a plain grey shirt where his suit should have been. He tucked it into his pocket instead, looking a little abashed.

Jiggling the credit card against the lock forcefully, Nick felt it shove between tumbler and doorframe, a satisfying click as the simplistic lock mechanism reversed. Tossing the card at Ellis, too, with a limp motion for him to return it to the wallet, Nick gently opened the door.

At first, the room was pitch black. His eyes didn't adjust very quickly, leaving him uncertain for a moment, faced with a dark room and the soft, emotional sobs of a distraught Carmine. As he blinked them into focus and felt Ellis step up by his elbow, he started to notice something -

A red hue seemed to glitter on the very air itself, this directionless, reflecting light. It struck shadows at all angles, tinted with a foggy red glow.

"Fucking hell..?" He searched a little too long to find the source of the light, and even after he saw the glowing nightlight jutting out of an outlet on the far wall, he remained disturbed. With a nervous chill up his spine, Nick slowly stepped forward to turn his gaze toward where he swore the tearful weeping was coming from.

Half-hidden on the floor at the end of the bed, he made out Carmine's sitting form. She had her arms tightly wrapped around her legs, drawn to her chest to bury her face between them. Her body was angular - emaciated, chillingly enhanced by the red glow that filled the room and reflected shadows over the jutting bones of her body. Clothes that once fit her hung, draping, like a blanket over her skeleton. They were torn and shredded, like she'd tried to get them off.

Her auburn hair hung down over her weeping shoulders and around her downcast head, the only thing even remotely familiar to him. Slowly, as a sob made her body crumple forward slightly like a scarecrow jerking at the wind on its pole, her arms slipped away from her knees to try and cover her face.

Spearlike fingers - if fingers they could even still be called - tapered to wicked points, clacking together like scissors as she tried to settle them over her eyes to stifle a wrenching sob.

"H-Ho-ly shit! Car-" Ellis blurted from Nick's elbow, startled, and too quick for Nick to react in time. Grabbing an arm forcefully around the younger man's neck, he plastered him against his chest and clamped the other hand over his mouth, silencing him.
"Shut.. up.." Nick hissed into his ear, starting to slide his foot back and drag Ellis with him. Ellis grabbed onto the forearm that held a hand over his mouth, but didn't fight, stumbling a little to follow after the gambler backwards.

With a harsh sinking sensation in his gut, Nick saw Carmine's head jerk up a little. She's.. fuck's sake, she's infected.. She was fine last night - I fucking kissed her last night!

She growled, just subtly, and with the almost visible twist and torque of bones underneath greying and dead skin, her head turned to focus glowing red eyes on the two men, face oily and glistening with tears. The growling rose, and like some shambling animal, her limbs shuddered her up toward her feet, turning around.

Nick pulled Ellis back through the doorway just as a sudden scream tore from her, high-pitched and bloodcurdling. With an audible scrape and swish her arms went akimbo, splaying knived fingers to either side as reddened air sent jagged shadows down her front.

Ellis was the one who caught the doorknob and slammed it shut in front of them, not too late to see she was stepping forward to race at them. Releasing Ellis' mouth and neck in favor of snagging his collar and dragging him with, Nick tore away to run down the hall toward the stairs, a mantra of "Shitshitshitshitshit!" spilling from his lips.

The Georgian quickly adjusted, catching up after a stumble to sprint beside him, shooting a glance over his shoulder. Shocked, Ellis heard a loud crash as Carmine collided with the door - and then two of those spearing fingers burst through the wood, jabbing at the air and squirming as they tried to break more of it down.

Jerking his head back forward as Rochelle shouted, "What the hell?!" from downstairs, the two men quite nearly fell over each other getting down the steps. They barely stayed standing, and Nick grabbed Ellis' tattooed bicep to drag him along as he quickly made for Coach. The big man was sitting up on the couch, alert, shirt stitched back together with visible black thread.

"Wh-" Coach started.

"She's a zombie, get the fuck out!" Nick ordered urgently, more at Rochelle, dropping down to reach out and offer his shoulder to Coach. Ellis took his lead, and the two men helped Coach up to his feet, supporting him and quickly starting toward the door.

Rochelle didn't seem interested in obeying - she grabbed up the weapons they'd stored against the wall, darting over to push Ellis and Nick's guns into the Ellis' free arm but keeping Coach's shotgun. The mechanic tried to shoot her a concerned look, but she was already stepping away, a serious grit to her jaw.

Coach's voice was not happy in the slightest, even though he couldn't really stop - Nick was forcefully striding forward, like he might drag both of the other men if he had to. "Baby girl, what the shit are you doin'?!"

"Picking up the rear." she snapped with a strange tone, angry and upset at the same moment, aiming down the sights carefully at the staircase as another scream from upstairs announced the door breaking down. She backed up to follow the three men toward the door.

They were just starting down the steps - Rochelle just in the doorway - when Carmine came sprinting down the staircase, her claws dragging along the wall and scraping paint off it like wet paper. She growled, red eyes flashing madly at Rochelle in the depths of a sunken face, and then let out a scream as she bolted toward the door, reaching her claws out in front of her.
It didn't seem like Carmine was aiming for Rochelle. It more seemed like she would go through her if necessary.

Rochelle aimed low, body going stiff and weight rolling back onto her heels to try and stabilize herself against the oncoming recoil, and cried, "I'm sorry - but FUCK OFF, BITCH!"

The shotgun blasted off with a crack, and the bony remnants of who Carmine was shrieked a pained noise and stumbled, the shot pulverizing her hip as it passed through. She staggered and fell, her foot-long claws slicing into the carpet as she crumbled, screaming in rage.

Shoving the front door shut with a trembling hand, Rochelle turned and raced down the stairs and across the lawn, catching up to the three men as they were helping to shove Coach up onto the truckbed.

"I'll drive!" Ellis shouted, pausing just a moment to make sure the injured man had cleared the tailgate before bolting around the truck, skidding a little as he scrambled to get to the driver's side door and yank it open.

Rochelle jumped in after Coach, immediately dropping down to brace herself and grab onto the big man's arm. He wrapped his other arm around her head, pulling her into a hug and whispering something to her, expression stoic and morose.

Nick slammed the tailgate shut and sprinted to the passenger side, vaulting up into the truck as Ellis re-hooked the startup wires underneath the steering wheel and straightened up, the car purring to a rattled start.

The conman yanked his seatbelt on even though Ellis didn't bother, and as he screeched the truck into reverse and cranked the wheel to rip it over the lawn in a tight half-circle, reorienting it toward the road, Nick shot a glance toward the house's front door.

Those inhuman claws jutted out from the wooden barricade, jerking about as Carmine tried to break through again - but the truck was already peeling off onto the gravel driveway, Nick grabbing reflexively onto the edge of his seat even with being strapped in.

"...Fucking Christ." the conman muttered almost inaudibly, muffled further by the whistling of the wind as it blew over the still-open back window. Ellis heard him, though, and Nick's jaw twitched a little as the hick softly prompted, slowing down just a little to swerve the truck down the winding gravel road toward the highway;

"..you okay, Nick?"

The gambler didn't answer for a moment, his own heartbeat rushing in his ears and drying out his mouth as he stared at the passing trees, nerves only slowly settling. ...I could've fuckin' slept in there. With her. It. Fuck.

When he did answer, it was a solid and forced "Yeah." If Ellis' slow nod and drifting of his gaze toward the conman before re-focusing forward said anything, Ellis might've been thinking something similar.

Turning in his seat, Nick threw an arm over the back of his chair and glanced into the truckbed through the still-open rear window. Rochelle was curled tightly against Coach, the big man resting his chin against the top of her head with half-closed eyes. He was clearly uncomfortable, his injured back pressed against the side to support her, but he didn't move.

She was biting onto a fingertip hard and clearly, however successfully, fighting tears.
He could hear her voice, just loud enough for Nick to catch it over the crunch of gravel. "... She came down in the middle of the night, Coach... she was sweating - but she wasn't hot, was she.. she had a fever... I should've realized..."

Nick's urge to ask a harsh Does that one have a CEDA-approved name, too? faded into the back of his mind, and he drew his arm back toward himself and faced forward without uttering it.

He found he couldn't stop touching his mouth and glancing over his fingertips.
Chapter 33

The Chevy sputtered, drowning, as its engine huffed the last fumes of gasoline.

"Jesus. Fucking. Goddamn. Christ!" Nick growled furiously, slamming his hand on the dashboard to underscore every word. "The one goddamn truck we pick and it doesn't have enough juice to get us more than halfway!?"

Coach sighed wearily as he pushed himself away from the side of the truckbed, turning his head to survey the sky and thick river they were currently guttering their way past.

The highway they drove on had funneled them quickly through the dead, burning, and zombie-infected remnants of what had been outlying suburbs on the edge of Savannah, and they'd just been going over a wide bridge when their vehicle had given its first cough. The truck was rolling to a chugging stop in the middle, Ellis trying to pump the pedal with no success.

He gave in reluctantly and pushed it into park, breaking the hotwire job with a careful tug and letting the truck die with a heavy rattle.

"Boy, calm yo' ass... ain't helpin' nothin'..

"Oh yeah?" Nick was furious. "Well I'm glad you're here to set me straight. Please, Coach, share your wisdom - how the fuck are we going to carry your ass and all our supplies? Hm? Hitch Ellis up to a cart and wagon?"

Coach sighed again, pointing to the backpack stuffed into one of the corners of the truckbed. "Baby girl, get that?... Don't need no carryin', boy, an' we'll make do. Longer we bicker, longer we take to get our asses outta here."

Nick fumed as Rochelle retrieved the pack and Coach dug through it carefully, pawing through the stash there and giving their rather low ammo stocks a dubious glance-over.

"Nick..." Ellis whispered, catching Nick's gaze. The Georgian reached under the sight of the window to touch his sleeve, but before his fingertips so much as grazed the fabric, Nick snapped his arm away.

"What, Overalls?! Are you excited to be on foot for who the fuck knows how many miles? Keith do it once?" he retorted vehemently, feeling a very tactile awareness of the empty spot where Ellis' hand would have settled.

Those blue eyes flashed to uncertainty, brows scrunching over them in confusion as he retracted his hand like Nick had bitten it. The conman could just read Ellis' doubt at the rejection, even if the kid tried to bounce back with a hesitant cock of his head. It shouldn't have bothered Nick - it didn't bother him. "... naw, Nick. Can't help it, though.. ain't got no gas. May as well make the best'uv it..

Nick gritted his teeth a little, lifting a hand to slowly pinch down the features of his face in a self-distracting motion. Goddamnit, I should've stopped this at the beginning. Now he'll get clingy. Fuck.

I don't need this right now...

"Aren't you just a bottle of sunshine." Taking a breath and leaning down, he pulled his machine gun from the floorboard and tossed the strap over his shoulder, opening the door of the stalled truck and stepping out.

It felt far too much like running away.

Rochelle glanced up at him as he came around the side of the truck, seeming too distracted with their situation to much notice anything awry. She gestured to Coach, now inspecting the laminated map they'd brought with them. "We don't have much ammo, Nick... not for any of the weapons. And it's a long walk down the highway."

Nick crossed his arms tightly, sighing in frustration. "When the hell did we use all our bullets? You two had a stash and a fuckin' half when we met you."

"The Tank." Coach closed up the map and tucked it into the backpack, shaking his head. "Y'all wasted a lot of ammo tryin' to kill that thing."

The conman's hackles rose a little, jaw setting. Though Coach's comment had been practically innocuous, it pissed Nick off instantly, fingers clenching on his own sleeves. "And what were we supposed to do, exactly? Ask it nicely to shoo?"

Coach eyed him, unimpressed, but his voice was fairly calm when he returned, "Boy, I ain't pickin' no fight, I'm sayin'...

Nick paused a moment, curling his tongue against his teeth... then shrugged, forcing his mouth into a flat line. There was no sense in needlessly fighting amongst themselves, even Nick knew that. Mostly. "Fair enough."

He could tell the ex-football player relaxed as he backed off. Coach glanced over the supplies they'd stashed in the truck, sighing weightily. "Can't take this shit... won't have no real meals, 'n not much ammo... betta be hopin' we don't run into much."

Ellis popped out around the cab of the truck, leaning against the side of the bed and resting his cheek against the butt of his shotgun. He was quiet, and Nick could feel the mechanic's gaze flickering on and off him worriedly, the whole length of the truck between them, in an attempt at subtlety.

Rochelle hopped up onto her knees and crawled over to break into a pack of waterbottles in the depths of the truckbed. "We grabbed some bottled water from the gas station back when. Let's take one each, and I'll try to stick at least a meal into the backpack somewhere.. something light."

Nick grunted without paying attention, turning a hand to inspect his ringed fingers. Why was I so goddamned nice to him? This is gonna bite me in the ass.

He lifted his head as a bottle suddenly thrust into his vision and, glancing up, found Rochelle offering him a smile. "It'll be alright, sweetie. We're close to home free."

Nick snatched it from her lightly, but it was tucked into one of his jacket pockets while his cigarette pack and matches were pulled out instead. He tried not to register the fact he was down to two cigarettes.

Carefully lighting up, he sighed sarcastically, "Oh, good, you're not bitching at me anymore, either?"

Rochelle's smile fell slightly - but it collapsed into something a little sympathetic. She reached out to set a hand on his shoulder, gripping the fabric lightly. "I am sorry about what happened Carmine, by the way... We're all just stressed.. and we were taking it out on each other."
Pulling on his cigarette, Nick sighed out a smoke-stained breath and, begrudgingly, nodded once.

"I know it's different when it's someone you know who turns. You get kind of numb to all this death, but.. watching someone go, someone you cared about, it's - " Rochelle winced, glancing down toward her feet. Nick had to remind himself that she'd said her cameraman had turned in front of her during the outbreak.

Whatever he'd felt or not felt for the girl, her emaciated frame and pinprick red eyes would haunt him. So, he took the olive branch offered even though he felt it grate at him a little.

"I was being sort of an ass."

She grinned at him, returning her attention to the pack of bottles, and her expression was pleasantly gratified. "Wasn't your fault... it's your default setting. I should know by now."

Scoffing quietly under his breath, but feeling loose, Nick stretched his shoulders out and rolled them carefully in their sockets. Ellis was still eyeing him, and he knew the kid wanted some reassurance, some kind of answer, that gave an explanation for his rejection.

Did you really think this was going to be a hit-and-run, Nick? You're stuck with him. You've gotta deal with this.

Glancing up and latching gazes for a moment, Nick mouthed a small and unemotional, 'Later.' To his relief, Ellis nodded firmly and lifted a hand to rub at his cap, looking away with an appeased settle of his expression.

"Oh!" the youngest startled a little when he found Rochelle leaning over to stick a waterbottle toward him, quickly taking it up to bounce it in one hand and flashing her a grin. "Thanks, Ro..."

"Might wanna come up wit' other weapons soon's we can." Coach commented, scratching lightly at his gut with a sigh. He pushed the tailgate down with a shove of his elbow, and eased himself to the edge to cautiously get his feet on the hard cement of the bridge.

All three of the others watched him a moment, but he seemed steady. The black stitching that crisscrossed his back was a cruel reminder of both his injury and the now absent Carmine.

"Like them zombie movies? Nail planks'n shit?" Ellis offered enthusiastically, stepping back to swing his shotgun pointedly through the air with a grin and tip of his head.

"Yeah, son, sure... like them movies." The big man reached into the backpack still gripped in one of his hands, and he pulled out the ammo they had left, sliding a thick machine gun clip toward Nick across the truck bed and offering out the box of shotgun shells to Ellis.

They both loaded their guns as Rochelle dug a few cans out of their supplies, Nick very intentionally avoiding checking what exactly it was. Coach dragged his own shotgun out from where it had settled in the truckbed, checking it over indelicately.

"Man, s'too bad we gotta leave this truck.. Y'know, I ever tell you guys 'bout the time Keith's car broke down on a bridge..? It would'uv been fine, 'cept, as he found out, the bridge was one'uh them bridges whut fold up when ships go by. So it starts openin', 'n'Keith -"

"Son, you mind..?" Coach interrupted, closing up his shotgun cartridge and gripping it up close to his chest. When Ellis ducked his chin and nodded obediently with a short "Okay." - looking slightly disappointed - the big man turned away from the truck and pointed down the bridged highway.
"We should get goin'. If I got where we are a'ight, 'bout two miles down is another river. After that we won't have no cities 'til Tybee Island 'n the coast, so we best be movin' quick, 'less y'all wanna get caught in the middle of nowhere wit' no cover at night."

Nick snorted, pulling his cigarette into the corner of his mouth and swiping a hand through his hair to slick it back a little neater. He muttered under his breath, "I'm sure zombies do great sleepovers. Maneippedis anyone?"

They'd been able to just speed quickly past the zombies before then, but now they were on foot - there was a distinct tension as they started to walk away from the Chevy, Coach and Rochelle leading with Nick falling behind... and Ellis trying very hard to match his pace and get beside him.

The air was unpleasant with a humid heat, sticky air bubbling up from the somewhat green river beneath the cemented bridge and settling around them with only slight wind giving it some movement. It made Nick sigh, and he complained in a displeased voice.

"Goddamnit, I walked to get into Savannah... now I'm walking to get out... Ellis' fucking mystical hick friend is lounging in some military post and I'm slogging down a highway like a bum... and you know what? I haven't heard any fucking helicopters around here, have you three?"

Unsurprisingly, he received very little response. He dropped down into a low mutter, swinging his arms slightly to get some air movement and a little relief from the humidity. "Well that's just great. Looking forward to getting abandoned at the coast just like we did at the hotel."

Ellis tipped his head a little, squinting out from under the bill of his cap to eye Nick carefully. The conman ignored him for the longest time, wordlessly walking on after Rochelle and Coach down the quiet decline of the bridge's end.

As the highway flattened out, Ellis tried to slow his steps and lengthen the distance between them and the other two - Nick noticed, and though he obliged and slowed too, he was frustrated by the gesture.

It made the conman snap, irritated, "What?"

The mechanic didn't recoil that time, scratching under his chin slowly and seeming a little hesitant when he answered, "...well, yuh did say 'later'..."

Nick immediately sighed, clenching up his jaw tiredly and pulling his machine gun into his hands to work and squeeze at the grip. He'd been expecting the kid to pry, but that didn't mean he'd prepared a response - it was easy to reject and easier not to, but harder when he wanted to walk the thin line between answers.

"Look, El. You didn't do anything, alright?"

Ellis gnawed on that for a moment, trudging on carefully. Something seemed to relax in his shoulders, although when he prompted Nick with a concerned tone of voice, his gaze shifted with sudden uncertainty between the concrete highway and Nick's face. "Whut's wrong, then?"

The conman glanced upward, eyeing the abandoned suburbs that skirted the grassy expanse on either side of the highway. Trees were scattered between houses and buildings, a thick and heavy bramble growing untamed.

There were zombies ahead, stumbling over the highway and along the curling sideroads that linked the highway up with the adjoining houses. It made them all walk a little quicker, weapons ready and nervously, incredibly aware of their flagging ammo supply.
"Is me being irritable news to you? What, am I supposed to be sweet to you now? Hold your hand?" He spoke under his breath, annoyed and laced with sarcasm. He found himself very distinctly avoiding looking over at Ellis, jaw set.

Ellis quickly bit his tongue at both the tone and the implication, fisting his hands around his shotgun protectively. There was something in the way he mumbled that sounded a little exasperated, a rare emotion from the kid. "That ain't whut I'm sayin', Nick.. but you ain't got a reason to be pissed with me, either.."

"I'm not pissed at you." the gambler hissed as quietly as he could, palming the side of his face carefully.

Unfortunately for him, Ellis was quick on the return, immediately shaking his head and shrugging his shotgun onto his shoulder. ".ain't real happy with me, neither. Just 'cause I tried tuh touch you…? It wasn't like I was tryin' tuh -"

"The fuck do you want from me, El?"

Ellis sighed in sudden disappointment, kicking his heel hard against the concrete in the middle of a step and dropping his chin to shade his eyes under his cap. "I dunno, tuh talk to you nicely fer a minute..? I'm still kinda... I dunno, we didn't even work out what happened, I.. was sorta hopin' we could talk -"

But Nick interrupted him, turning slightly at the waist to twist his gaze directly toward the Georgian's face severely. The words left him choppily, but emphatically, leaving no room for confusion. It was all he could do to keep his voice at a level that wouldn't carry, and he ended up hissing past his teeth.

"We got off. That's what happened. If you want to do it again, fine. If not, fine. Okay?"

Ellis wilted like he'd just been crushed, brows twisting over his eyes and weight shifting. He didn't even respond, just cleared his throat awkwardly and glanced to the side, scratching the back of his head through his cap.

Nick quickly found his frustration leaking out to nothing when the kid failed to speak up, a certain numb discomfort edging in in its place. He wasn't sure he'd meant it as harshly unemotional as it had come off.

When he spoke again, more a mutter this time, he found his words attaining a sticky layer of sympathy. "Look, I've never so much as talked to the guys I've screwed in the past once it was over. You're already strange for me, but don't expect… something. I'm not that kinda guy."

Ellis was quiet again at first, but his gaze moved a little back toward Nick as the conman softened to him, however slightly. He risked the question: "... Whut're you sayin'?"

Releasing an exhale through his nostrils, Nick shrugged a shoulder. "Just making it clear that touchy shit isn't flying with me. Nothing's changed, El. Get over it."

They were both very quiet, neither actually looking at the other. When the scattered zombies ahead took notice of their presence and started to wheel around to scramble toward them, Ellis muttered:

"Well, yuh really suck at tellin' when things change, Nick."

The tone was so vastly different all of a sudden, almost huffy with a sense of confidence. Nick straightened slightly, distracted from running forward to join the other two and help with the zombies. Shooting a glance at Ellis' face, perturbed, Nick shot back, "What?"

Ellis cocked his shotgun and tossed up his chin, reaching out to shove at Nick's bicep and stagger him, almost playfully. He didn't flinch under the instant glare the motion earned him - he grinned a little, actually, though it was small.

"Yer callin' me El all'uv'a sudden."

Nick balked as the younger man sprinted off, one hand clamping his hat to his head as he high-stepped it to catch up to Rochelle and Coach just in time to beat back the first zombies that caught up to them. Apparently keeping in mind their dwindling ammo, the mechanic swung his shotgun like a bat and kicked with those thickly soled workboots.

Nick felt like so much cotton as he stood there, uncomfortably aware of the curl to his own tongue around the almost tactile sense he had of the nickname he hadn't even noticed starting to slip out of him. ...

... I guess I am...

"Nick, you enjoying yourself?!" Rochelle hollered at him over her shoulder in frustration, snapping him straight out of it. The three were slogging forward, gaining ground between little pauses to take out close zombies.

He scoffed hostilley, darting into a jog quickly and hauling up his gun to join them, forced to skid around a few mostly-incapacitated zombies on the ground that tried to grab him as he vaulted past them.

"Can't get clogged up fightin' this shit," Coach grunted, visibly struggling with his injured back as he shoved a zombie away with a hand to shoot it straight in the face. "Keep movin', y'all..."

He'd barely even finished the sentence before a familiar, wet shriek cut into the air. Without even looking, Rochelle and Nick shouted it at the same instant: "Spitter!"

Shoving through the infected in front of them, the four darted down the road with a slightly unorganized sprint, ignoring the angry screams of the zombies behind them. Nick stole a glance to either side, spotting a flash of green off to the right. A lanky, impossibly stretched figure staggered around the corner of a building, almost boneless limbs flailing eerily with its motion.

Electric green spewed down from what looked like the remnants of a mouth, though it was more like a massive hole that had melted away its jaw and bared the veiny remnants of its throat. A wet squeal preceded the shudder of the thing's frame, a hacking motion, and Ellis shouted a little to Nick's left as splattering green came shooting through the air to splash in front of them.

Forced to skid to a stop and struggle to get around the sprawling puddle of popping, hissing acid, the four quite nearly plowed into it. Flecks of acid threatened to catch them as it spat and sizzled, and judging by a short yelp from Rochelle, succeeded a little. "I'm fine!" she quickly added.

Twisting back once they were around the slowly calming puddle, Nick sniped the zombies behind them with careful gunfire, jogging half-backwards. Rochelle mimicked him, turning at the shoulders to shoot behind herself with her handgun.

"I'm getting incredibly fucking weirded out by this fucking disease perfectly designed to fucking kill us all." Nick shouted over the ruckus, irritated.

"Keep movin'!!" Coach repeated, gruffly but not annoyed, and they darted along the roadway as more zombies got attracted from the treeline and the roadside houses by the sound of gunfire.
Nick noticed Ellis whip around with his shotgun to offer a few blasts, one tearing through several zombies in a row as they happened to stagger into a haphazard line just in time. Not missing the move, the conman muttered a short, "Nice shot, Overalls."

Ellis tipped his chin to nod with his hat, flashing a too-confident, stupid grin before twisting back to continue running along the concrete. Nick resigned to just shutting his mouth entirely as they sprinted to escape what had been a tidy suburb and had become a nest of infected.

_Damnit._
Chapter 34

The light drizzle that had started to drool from the sky quickly became a secondary concern compared to the sight that faced them.

The bridge ahead, spanning across a quick-moving river yards thick, was blown to chunks and bits of concrete. Wide slabs protruded up from the greyed water, frothing as it swirled around them, and there were burn marks on the ground on either, now separated, side.

It was still smoking gently, just wisps that quickly dissipated in the mist of the river. Rochelle crouched next to the broken mouth of the bridge, in shocked silence, touching fingertips onto the concrete and reading over the scrawls that marred its surface.

What happened THIS IS THE ONLY BRIDGE

Get swimming, bitch.

Did CEDA do this?? military??

WE CAN'T TRUST THEM! joshua, cindy and i are safe! head for brunswick!

"At least we're not alone." she murmured with flagging confidence, staring at the words as Coach came up behind her. He gently pulled the backpack off of her shoulders, opening it quietly and prying the laminated map out from within. He scanned the surface, shaking it slowly to stir droplets of rain off it.

"We gonna have to find another way..." he gruffed quietly, almost forced.

Nick just dug his fingers deep into his hair and breathed out hard, feeling the rain splatter onto his shoulders slowly, nerves fraying. He felt Ellis step up near him and hover there, but didn't touch him.

I can't fucking believe it. I absolutely cannot goddamn believe it. They blew the fucking bridge. First the hotel, now this. I fucking knew it.

"...Man..." Ellis muttered, lowly. "I ain't never seen somethin' blown up that bad... well, 'cept fer when Keith blew up an engine in the shop.. he didn't notice the fuel leakin', 'n' it blew up in his face. Now, he don't -"

"Overalls, do you realize we might be fucked here? Seriously goddamn screwed?!" He more groaned it than anything else, exasperated and tired. All it did was make Ellis hesitate and glance at him, concerned.

The Georgian tipped his chin down, wiping a droplet of rain from the tip of his hat. "Coach'll find us a way 'round it... s'just a big river. Could always swim."

He said it so seriously, Nick laughed outright before he could check himself, quickly dropping it to a small groan as he slid his arms down to his sides. He lowered his voice, eyeing the mechanic sideways. ".don't even suggest that, dipshit. Bad enough it's raining..."

Quickly seeing Ellis wasn't taking him seriously in the slightest, those blue eyes flickering with humor and lips making for a stupid grin, Nick reached up and shoved his cap down over his face with a grunt. "Go check on Rochelle.. I'll talk to Coach."
The other man struggled not to laugh, fixing his cap quickly with both hands. He nodded in confirmation, turning around to trot across the few feet of road and drop down to crouch next to Rochelle, slipping an arm around her back. Nick looked after him for a moment, shaking himself a little to scatter stray droplets of rain, and sighed.

He's not scared at all, is he? Reluctantly rubbing his palm over his face and blinking through water in his eyes, the conman shook the thought from his head and turned his gaze toward Coach. He approached the big man, curling his fingers on his jacket.

"What's the game plan, Coach?"

Coach quickly sighed and turned the map toward him, drifting a large finger over the swathe of blue that marked the river's path across Savannah's outskirts.

"There ain't no way over but this damn bridge... We go down, we get to the coast a'ight. -" He gestured down to the empty plains of ground that followed the river's edge downward. "- through miles of flat land, anyway, and to the section that ain't developed... if we even make it wit'out starvin'."

Biting back frustration, Nick nodded, inspecting the wide river that separated them from the other side and flicking his gaze between the real thing and the map's interpretation. "What about up, then? Looks like we can loop up around to the end of it and meet back up with the highway."

Coach immediately glanced up at him, rather dubiously inspecting him before looking back down to the wet sprawl, filled with tiny, off-shooting streams, that made up the area north of them. "You really wit' the idea of us goin' through swamps?"

"Do you see another option?" Nick snapped defensively, swiping fingers through his hair to keep water out of his face. "Of course I don't like it, I like it as much as I do being stuck with you three at all, or as much as walking our way toward the massive fuck-up that is CEDA, but what else can we do? Turn back?"

"It's a thought." Rochelle suddenly pointed out from her place by the bridge, leaning her head against Ellis'. "They had more centers elsewhere, maybe in Florida... we could set up a better ride, scavenge gas and really set up for a trip... catch up with them somewhere else. These people are going to Brunswick..."

Nick crossed his arms, snorting, and stepped toward the bridge to jab a finger in the air toward it. "Look, I don't want to be the one to say this, but that was blown up. As in, cutting one area off from the rest. Half of me really wants to turn the fuck around and leave, but if they're marking lines in the sand I would reeeally like us to be on the other side of that line, late or not."

Ellis scratched his head under his cap, fingers digging into mostly dry curls. His expression scrunched in confusion, suddenly seeming to inspect the bridge with new eyes. "Why would they wanna do somethin' like that? There was still people here."

He pointed to the graffiti done in crude knifemarks and marker on the concrete, decorating the surface of what remained of the bridge.

It was Coach who spoke up, sighing wearily. The football coach didn't look pleased with his words, but he said them anyway, blunt and honest. "Retreatin', son... they can't control Savannah so they're pullin' out 'n cuttin' off."

Rochelle frowned, pinching down the bridge of her nose slowly, bangles clattering at her wrists. "I can't believe that... what about all these people left behind? What about us?"

Nick answered that, crossing his arms tightly over his chest and shrugging. "It's what they do, Ro'. They fuck up and then cut their losses. Right now, we're their losses, and if we don't get goddamn out of here pretty soon, bridges might not be the only thing blowing up."

There was silence for just a few moments, the conman's cynicism hanging heavy in the wet air.

Coach broke it with a small grunt. "Nick's right here. Much as it's a risk, we gotta get 'round this river some way." He gestured downriver with one hand. "Less we find somethin' to cross wit', it'll be a real big damn detour."

Rochelle groaned a little and settled her head in her hands, massaging her temples softly. "We didn't plan for this at all.. we don't have the food for this, and definitely not the weapons.. should we backtrack?"

But Coach shook his head after momentary deliberation, folding the map up along the creases. "There'll be more houses near the river if we keep goin'. People live up there, even if there ain't no real towns. Lotta old land, houses from some generations ago."

"Yuh think there's anyone still around?" Ellis questioned, still staring down at the graffiti with a scrunch to his expression. He looked up as Rochelle gently grasped his bicep, and the two slowly stood up.

"Hope not." Nick grunted simply, turning his chin up to eye the grey sky as the drizzle started to calm slightly, just lightly splatting against his skin. "I think I'm done with meeting people."

Coach zipped up the backpack carefully after replacing the map inside, holding it out toward Ellis with a grunt. Although Coach had generally taken control of it, its weight on his back was painful with the wounds from his Hunter engagement. "Were you ever not, boy?" he questioned with light humor.

Nick smirked, adjusting the strap of his machine gun carefully. "We can pretend."

With Ellis taking on the backpack, they set off perpendicular to the road, tromping along the coast of the river. The dirt was a sandy grey and moist from the rain, and Nick found himself cringing a little as it squished under his shoes, reluctantly continuing on despite it.

Hardly surprising, Ellis slipped back to walk next to him within a few moments, although this time Rochelle took notice. She turned her head slightly, lifting a brow at Nick. It was an innocuous look, and he mostly got the sense she was silently urging him to be nice.

He shot her an annoyed look until she turned away, grumbling under his breath and scratching at the nape of his neck.

"Ey Nick," Ellis prompted, tucking his gun under his armpit to reach into his pocket. Nick glanced at him, arching a brow expectantly. He did relax a little when the kid wasn't whispering this time, clearly unafraid of the rest of the team hearing them. Nick wasn't sure he could stand another 'conversation.' "Yuh left this..."

The mechanic pulled Nick's wallet free from the pocket of his jumpsuit, offering it out. The sight startled Nick, and he quickly snatched it out of Ellis' hands, realizing he'd never taken it back after throwing it to Ellis earlier in the day. "Jesus, Overalls. You could've given this back a while ago." he muttered, protectively flicking the thing open to check over its contents.
"S'just a wallet, Nick... it ain't like we need money now anyhow - 'n you forgot too. I kept it safe'n I didn't look at nothin'." Despite the gambler's reaction, Ellis was smiling, adjusting his cap with one hand and dropping his chin a little.

Nick's fingers slowed on the wallet's folds for a moment, flecked green eyes raising and slanting to glance at Ellis a moment, the edges of his mouth softening. An urge struck him, much despite himself, and with a resigned sigh he stuck the wallet under the Ellis' nose.

"Here. Happy? Christ, you're like a five year old."

Straightening excitedly, Ellis quickly plucked it out of Nick's fingers and opened it with a look of fascination. Nick noticed the incredibly delicate way he cradled the thing, looking away with a small smirk.

Prying the leather apart and hunching over it to protect it from the rain with his head, Ellis practically swayed with the focus he had on the wallet. The ID tucked into the front pocket was this almost alien sight, too normal.

The angry expression on Nick's face in the square photo in the corner, seething as he composed it just slightly for the picture, was probably the only normal thing there. The bland grey shirt he was wearing stretched tightly over his shoulders, and Ellis realized too late he'd started staring, blinking his attention quickly elsewhere.

The name 'Nicolas D. Tobias' emblazoned the middle of the ID as well as the credit card tucked into the opposite fold, and Ellis stared at it for a long moment, curious. An apartment address was listed below and a birthday that Ellis realized - after a moment of obliviousness - was just a day after Christmas.

"Whoa, you were almost a Christmas baby.." Ellis pointed out, showing it to Nick like he didn't know. The conman smirked slightly despite himself, dipping his hands into his pockets to shield them from the drizzling.

"Only good part about that is it's an excuse not to celebrate your birthday."

Ellis flicked a curious glance at him, then back down to the wallet, rubbing a fingertip slowly against the raised text of Nick's ID. "I love birthdays. Presents 'n shit, 'n' I got tuh hang out with Keith tuh celebrate… we'd drink beer 'n' set off some fireworks. Always got in trouble."

Nick snorted a little, crossing his arms loosely and inspecting the river that flowed alongside them. Everything was so eerily quiet, not a bird in the sky. His gaze was inexorably drawn back toward the exploded bridge.

The kid's over-excitement... odd, Nick stuck between humor and a dissociative kind of numbness. It was weird, talking about life before. All Nick found himself thinking was how terrible an idea fireworks were. They'd attract zombies like flies.

"Like that's a shock, El. Doesn't sound like you are ever not hanging out with him.. I've seen girls less attached to their best friends."

The kid grinned a bit at that, though when Nick noticed the particular size of that one he realized he'd slipped again - El. It just rolled so smoothly, he didn't even notice before he'd already said it. He needed to stop. "I've known him ferever, I can't help it.. whut, you ain't never had someone you liked that much?"

"The hell do you think?" Nick asked dryly, tipping his gaze to slant it sarcastically at the other man. Ellis laughed, dropping his chin and turning the wallet between his fingers slowly, much like he wrung out his hat.

"Guess you ain't worryin' about nobody, then?"

The gambler eyed him, judglingly, noticing the slight downturn of his voice. He shrugged, and comfort - molten with sarcasm and condescension - squeezed into his words. "Don't tell me you're wasting time thinking about your stupid friend? He's probably chugging beer and blowing something up in a bunker somewhere."

Ellis laughed again, starting to offer the wallet back slowly. "Yeah, yer right... oh man, I can't wait fer you guys tuh meet him.. he'll be so damn jealous we fought zombies 'n' he - didn't..." The last word was distracted, and what had been a relinquishing motion stopped.

The wallet had a side pocket, likely for change - of which Nick had none -, and inside it was a visible circle, pressing up against the leather till it left a soft outline. Curiously reaching a fingertip into the pocket, Ellis found himself touching the smooth shape of a ring. He'd just started to lever it out with his finger when Nick pulled the wallet out of his hand, quick but gentle.

_Ah, damnit.. I forgot that was in there._

"Whut, Nick..?" Ellis questioned, the soft way Nick had stolen it from him leaving the mechanic unconcerned but curious, lowering his hands. Blue eyes blinked, from Nick's face to the wallet as he tucked it back into his inner jacket pocket. "That special or somethin'?"

"Sort of.." Nick muttered evasively, taking a moment to wipe his wrist over his forehead for a beat before glancing at Ellis. "It's a long story... maybe later, kiddo."

Ellis' brows promptly scrunched up over his eyes, sighing and adjusting his cap to shade them slightly. If Nick wasn't mistaken, he almost looked irked. "We got a long walk... ain't got nothin' better tuh talk about."

Nick's jaw set a little, voice gaining an edge of warning and quieting as he repeated himself, not wanting in the slightest to get into another argument when Rochelle and Coach were so likely to hear. "I said, later."

Ellis shook his head, glancing up under the bill of his cap and frowning very explicitly at Nick - definitely frustrated, though it was hurt that fueled his retort, and Nick realized they hadn't really moved on from anything. "'Later' so you can get mad at me when I bring it up again?"

Before Nick could formulate a response, feeling his spine prickling with hostility, Ellis started to turn away and catch up to Rochelle and Coach. Before he escaped arm's length, Nick reached out and grabbed ahold of his elbow. The motion was unchecked, and it left him feeling stupid and wanting to let go.

"Kid, c'mon, stop..." he hissed harshly, "I'm -"

Rochelle chose that moment to turn her head and glance back, and Nick's hand released Ellis' elbow and dropped to his side in a smooth motion, gaze swerving to the side as stoically as he could. Ellis must've smiled at her, because she simply looked back forward with a small return of the expression.

Ellis glanced back at Nick after that, looking over his shoulder with a small frown. The kid wasn't going to let him off easy, and his voice was firm when he prompted quietly, "You're whut?"
Sighing through his nostrils, Nick ground his teeth gently together, flexing his fingers. It took every ounce of self-control not to roll his eyes as he reluctantly finished, "Sorry, I guess." He straightened his arms to pull at his jacket slowly. "... I really meant later, alright? Christ. Fucking aggravating."

Ellis looked at him a moment, hesitating.. and then broke into a small smile and slowed down to slip back next to him. Nick couldn't quite explain it, but he felt a vague sense of relief, even as he jerked his chin away to distinctly not look at Ellis. That was as close as he was coming to a meaningful apology.

"Thank yuh, Nick. I mean it." he murmured sideways, nudging the conman with his elbow gently. The smile lingered, and Nick didn't miss the light red that flushed over the bridge of his nose.

Sighing slightly, Nick curled his fingers in his pockets. He felt at the pack of cigarettes in his grasp - two left. Two too few. "Yeah, well, I don't want to deal with your fuckin' whining all day." he muttered quietly, shaking his head.

Ellis smiled blithely, trotting on at his elbow as they walked through the drizzling rain. He stayed rather close, even when it turned out there were zombies by the river's shore and they were forced to adopt a run along the wet grass, the rain picking up as they went.

Nick found himself not minding - even when Ellis tried to chatter amidst all the rain and fighting. Something made Nick think Rochelle and Coach didn't mind, either. It soothed something in the air, something that had been stirred up by the ruined bridge and settled uneasily on their minds.

Maybe fear.
The final straw that made it clear they needed to stop was when Coach suddenly stumbled to a knee in the muddy grass. He'd been so stoically plowing on, hardly speaking, that the abrupt collapse made everyone halt in shock.

Ellis was first to hurry forward, bending down and dropping to a crouch to grab onto his arm. He spoke loudly over the rain, concerned. "'Ey, Coach, man.. you alright?"

The big man tried to pull out of his grip, but to no avail, not quite having the momentum to win out against the younger man's surprisingly firm grip. "I'm jus' fine, son, jus'-" But he choked up a little, a shudder wracking his rain-drenched back.

Rochelle skidded up, biting her lower lip and shielding her eyes from the rain with a hand. "You're bleeding, Coach..." she pointed out, eyes latched worriedly to rivulets of pink that dripped from his shirt with the rain.

"Gotta say, runnin' on empty here, baby girl... damn rain." the big man admitted wearily, only slowly pushing himself up from the ground with Ellis' support. His whole body shook, bad knee crumpling slightly and shoulders drooped.

Nick hung back, hands deep in the pockets of his suit jacket to try to keep it wrapped close to him and body shivering with the wet cold sinking into his bones. He eyed the ex-football player at a distance, noticing how weak he seemed just then.

Green eyes flicked up, blinking past rain, and squinted to pick out shapes in the woods they'd only just been skirting up till then, following the river's edge. They weren't quite in the marshes yet, but the line was growing blurred as the ground grew waterlogged under their feet. He wasn't sure how much of that was oncoming swamp, and how much of it was flooding from the rain.

Sheets of it tumbled in haphazard lines from the canopy above, gathering in pools and dips as it streaked down tree trunks. A faint mist was gathering in the air, and with the sky darkening for evening and all surfaces glittering and sparkling, it was growing eerie to look at.

What Nick did notice was the harsh outline of a structure, standing thickly against the rain and trees. It made him squint for a moment, then he simply sighed and drew his shoulders inward. "I think there's a building up ahead we can break into." he suggested, gesturing with his chin. "Coach was right about that, at least."

Ellis kept himself next to Coach, supporting him loyally even as the eldest seemed to dislike leaning on him. They turned slightly, agreeing with small nods and gently starting into a hobbled walk.

Rochelle frowned at them, then pulled her handgun from her holster in a swift tug and lifted it up, shaking her head. "Nick and I'll go check it out. You two take it slow while we do that, okay?"

Coach grunted a reluctant affirmation, then warned, "Be careful, baby girl.." Ellis mimicked him in a smaller voice, but his eyes were on Nick, stony blues just barely visible under the edge of his cap. The conman met his gaze for just a beat, his rain-drenched poker face giving nothing away.

They parted quickly, Nick and Rochelle at a jog along the grass. The gambler complained bitterly as Rochelle dodged ahead and started to shove through the foliage with much less hesitancy than he did. "Leave it to me to wear a goddamn suit when this shit happens..."
He shook his frame slightly, scowling at the way the wet fabric stuck to his skin and hearing Rochelle snort softly. "I'm in jeans, honey... I'll smell like wet dog and be damp for days."

The conman wrinkled the bridge of his nose at the comment and muttered sarcastically, pulling his sub-machine gun from his shoulder and holding it loose with one hand. "There goes fantasizing about getting into your pants."

She glanced back at him over her shoulder, brows lifted like she might hit him, but her voice twanged with a kind of humor. "Watch it, suit, 'cause I can really easily trip you right now..."

Nick's expression moved to a threatening 'don't you dare,' at about the same instant his foot landed in a deep puddle hidden in the crawling fog with a splash up his shin. He immediately swore, "Tits!" and reached out his arms to regain his balance, prying his foot from the water with a sour expression.

Rochelle laughed at him, shaking her head and refocusing forward as they had to edge around a thick patch of bramble. The 'building,' as they came closer to it and the mist dissipated just enough to see, turned out to be two mobile homes parked tightly one behind the other, windows blacked out and nailed over.

"Oh hurray, redneck nests.. just what I always wanted." Nick muttered nastily as he pinched water off his face, making Rochelle laugh again, gentler that time.

"Be nice, Nick." she chided him, jogging along the grass toward them with her handgun still out at her side. There was fog clinging tightly to the ground at their feet, and both of them were blind - distracted by looking around themselves - to the sprawled zombie corpses they repeatedly just missed stepping on.

"I'm just saying. Why the fuck couldn't this have happened in, I dunno, civilization? Instead I'm stuck in goddamn Georgia." Nick complained, just as bitterly, as he lowered his machine gun slightly and stepped around Rochelle. He scaled the small set of rickety plastic stairs in front of the closer mobile home's door, dress shoes squishing a little unpleasantly with water.

She stopped just beside the stairs, crossing her arms slightly and smiling a little, her gaze drifting back to worriedly pick out Coach and Ellis' hunched forms as they slowly made their way to follow. "Bitching doesn't help, Nick."

Nick snorted dismissively, reaching to grasp the trailer door's handle.

It slammed open before his fingertips touched it, clipping him in the face and sending him sprawling down to the ground with a splash and shout of pain, hands immediately clamping over his nose to staunch the fast bleed that started. He barely had time to wonder what happened.

Rochelle shouted in alarm, jumping back frantically and throwing up her hands, nearly losing her handgun. "Ni- oh God, don't shoot!"

Squinting past the pain and the stars in his vision, Nick quickly looked up toward the open trailer door, eyes going narrowed over his knuckles as he found his gaze drawn to the barrel of a shotgun currently pointed at him. His heart beat a calm pace in his ears, gaze hardening to a dull threat.

A beat of silence ticked by. His eyes lifted up, and locked with the steely silvers of a man who must've been in his sixties or seventies, gripping that gun with an utterly unshakable confidence. His frame was wiry under a loose lumberjack's plaid jacket and thick jeans. They traded hard glares there, rain dribbling down onto Nick's prone frame and tracing along his face, mixing with the blood leaking between his knuckles.

"Y'all don't try nuthin', now." the older man warned, suspiciously glancing at Rochelle and then darting his gaze up toward the shape of Coach and Ellis in the fog, shotgun wavering from its focus on Nick.

The conman didn't quite trust the opening enough to try and get up, though. There was no way he could get on his feet and take the man's gun before he got a hole punched in his gut for his trouble.

Ellis and Coach had halted, obviously realizing the situation even from a distance, and Nick found himself silently willing them to stay where they were.

"We're all friends here." Rochelle quickly managed, voice adopting a very cautious kind of reassurance even as her eyes were anxiously wide. "And we're all healthy... just... don't shoot."

The man gave a judging stare between them through the pattering rain, cocking his shotgun with a loud rattle of metal. "'Eard that afore. But I don't plan on shootin' you. 'Less you make me." he spat indelicately, gesturing with a nobbled chin toward the ground behind them.

Turning his head just slightly, Nick froze up a bit to find his gaze piercing the ground-level fog, finally seeing the still corpses plastered here and there against the wet grass. The only reassurance he felt came with the obvious signs of illness that marked them as infected and not innocent victims.

"Mind if I get up then?" the conman wheedled as coolly as he could manage, voice coaxing away from his anger. He was almost sure he'd avoided landing in outright mud, but the grass was soaking up into his clothing and making him all the more drenched.

A gesture wasted, it turned out, as the old man jabbed the shotgun toward him in the air and snapped, "Shut ch'yer mouth, ya damn Yankee slick."

Nick's frustration only mounted as Ellis' voice suddenly came from behind him. He must've left Coach, because his workboots could be heard in their loud - and wet - tromp as he jogged toward them. The conman growled, pulling his hand away from his bleeding nose for just a moment as the younger man blurted; "Hey, hey, whut the hell's goin' on?"

The old man hoisted his shotgun up to ward Ellis off, narrowing steeled eyes threateningly. "I don't abide no trepassin'. Y'all're damn stupid, sneakin' on a man's prop-er-ty like that. Could'a blown yer damn heads off, like all them walkin' dead."

Ellis slowed but didn't stop, unconcerned with the gun pointed at him and still stepping toward the prone conman with a glance toward Rochelle. If he was afraid, he didn't show it. "You should really work on yer Southern hospitality, man... we're all in the same boat here. Alright?"

It seemed he'd called the old man's bluff, as the stranger ticked his shotgun to follow the mechanic, but didn't shoot.

Dropping down slowly to a crouch next to Nick, Ellis offered a hand blindly, eyes on the other Georgian. The steely-eyed redneck merely watched them as Nick begrudgingly took the help, standing slowly and letting Ellis' hand remain on his elbow. The conman wiped his bloody upper lip clean with his bare wrist and sloughed the blood off with a shake in the rain.

"Hmphf." was uttered after a moment, and with some reluctance, the old man lowered his shotgun. He kept it in his hands and didn't budge from the mobile home door, though. "Why're y'all 'round here? Ain't naught for ya."
Relaxing with the immediate threat now faded, Rochelle broke off to quickly step over to Coach, wearily leaned against a tree at the edge of the muddy clearing. She protectively wrapped arms around one of his, both turning their gazes back to the scene in front of the mobile home.

"Tryin' tuh get to the other side of the river, man.. why ain't you?" Ellis questioned hesitantly, looking straight forward even as his fingers clenched a little on the soaked fabric of Nick's sleeve. The conman ignored him, panting through his mouth as blood leaked down the back of his throat and trickled down his lip, and focused on glaring up at the old man, annoyed.

The plaid-wearing man scoffed at that, rapping a hand on the side of his mobile home. He retorted very tersely, visibly eager to get them to leave. "Don't need no fancy 'C-E-D-A' pretendin' they gots a plan. Makin' it jus' fine on my own. Y'all'll be movin' on, then. There's some docks down yonder. Few miles, maybe more, less. Should be a boat - iffin I recall."

Nick snapped then, spitting sideways on the grass and curling his lips unpleasantly. "Look, you redneck asshole, we're-"

"I ain't talkin' t'you, Yank!" he warned hostilely. The subsequent lift of his shotgun was much more effective in shutting Nick up than his words were, and with a heavy grit to his teeth, the conman silently resigned to shooting icy daggers at him with his glare.

Ellis gently tried to step in front of him, fingers releasing his sleeve as he moved, and pulled his cap off to reveal the soaked, curly mess of his hair. He held it at his chest, wringing it slowly. His voice hit a sweet pleading note that could've charmed the sap out of a tree.

"Sir, we got a hurt man, 'n' we can't keep goin' in this rain. Yuh got two trailers. You think we could rest awhile here? We won't be no trouble, 'n' it'd be mighty appreciated."

The old man eyed him, slightly nobbled jaw jutting forward as his expression went stony in a begrudging look. Still heavily suspicious, he kept his gun brandished, but grunted indelicately, "Trailer's empty. Y'all keep quiet 'n' scoot off by mornin', fine. Any funny tricks, 'n' I'll shoot. And don't be expectin' no help from me if them dead'uns show up."

Ellis opened his mouth to thank him, hands gripping onto his cap - and got the trailer door slammed in his face, plastic rattling all over the vehicle. He blinked in slight confusion, recoiling back at the abrupt noise, then turned slowly to scan Nick's face and the blood still trickling from his nose.

"Man, you okay, Nick? That door sure hit hard..." His voice was concerned, replacing his cap on his head and scuffing his own nose with his wrist slowly.

Nick grunted noncommittally, lifting his hands to gently touch onto his nose, flinching as it hurt. It wasn't broken, but it sure wasn't feeling great, either. "Yeah... I'm fine. At least that psycho got talked down. Guess it takes a hick to talk to a hick."

Ellis smiled subtly, like Nick had said 'good job' instead. He tightened his wet cap on his scalp, then turned to jog over toward Rochelle and Coach, gently gesturing over his shoulder.

"C'mon, Coach, let's get you inside 'n' layin' down on someth- OW!"

Nick quickly turned on instinct, hand going for his gun, until he realized with a growing smirk that Rochelle had socked Ellis on the side of the head with a flat hand. He held his ear with a look of shock, less hurt than surprised. Even Coach looked surprised, deepset eyes a little wide, however tired he was.

"Don't just run into situations like that, Ellis! He could've shot you!" she chided, nostrils flared and hip cocked with her frustration, quickly losing steam as Ellis hunkered forward a little and dropped his chin.

"...aww, Ro', I'm sorry... s'just Nick was down 'n' I didn't know whut was goin' on.." he whimpered, slowly righting his cap on his head with a frown.

She instantly sighed, pulling away from Coach and bending in to gently push his cap up and kiss his soaked forehead. Ellis squinted up a little hesitantly, starting to smile. "You did good. Just be more careful." Rochelle reassured him with a soft shake of her head, replacing his cap and pulling away.

"Let's jus' keep quiet so that fool don't have no reason to get mad, a'ight?" Coach grunted quietly, hobbling forward through the drizzling rain toward the second trailer. Rochelle and Ellis quickly ducked to help him along, and as they passed, Nick quietly stepped into line behind them.

"I will shoot him if he pulls something." the gambler muttered hostilely as he moodily touched his nose, suspiciously eyeing the silent, blacked-out trailer as they walked around it. "I don't trust him for shit."

Rochelle snorted a little, gently reaching up to open the trailer door. Both she and Ellis backed away a little, letting Coach trudge up the short set of stairs and achingly lean into the mobile home, looking around for a moment before clambering inside. "Don't cause trouble, honey.. at least Ellis got him to let us stay. Let's just keep our distance."

Nick held back, crinkling his nose heavily at the large camper. The thing was a shade of crisp white, but rusted at the edges and it creaked as Coach slowly moved inside. It was all the gambler could do not to outright gag. If the apocalypse wasn't a nightmare of mine, this sure is.

Squinting slightly, he did notice an awning extending out from the back. The rain pattered along its surface, draining out of the edges, and from what he could tell it looked rather dry underneath. The arm of a chair poked into view and, weighing being outside against crawling into some redneck's mobile home, Nick trudged over.

He ducked through the sheet of water that came down particularly thickly from the edge of the awning, pleased to find himself dry a moment later. He shook himself carefully, wringing his palms through his hair to slough off some of the water soaking the strands, and set to peeling off his jacket.

A small table and three foldable chairs, all pasty tan wood and surprisingly clean, were nestled up against the back end of the trailer like a porch. He laid the jacket over the back of one of the chairs, spreading it neatly to let it drip, and reached into the inner pocket to pull out his wallet.

With considerable relief, he found the lining of the pocket had saved it from the worst of the damage, though the bills he'd stowed inside his wallet were clearly damp. Resigning to not even thinking about it, he moodily set it and his machine gun down on the table and achingly seated himself on a different chair. It creaked a little under him.

Nick leaned forward, setting his elbows on his knees and closing his eyes as he cradled his nose in his fingertips. He was cold and drenched, but being out of the direct rain made him feel inexpressibly better, and for the moment he didn't care.

"Ugh... fuck that hurts..." he griped quietly, feeling along the bridge of his nose and only slightly reassured with the fact it was straight and not popping, though it hurt all the same. Even the slight pressure he put on was enough to start it bleeding again, and he quickly rubbed over his upper lip with a knuckle, grimacing.

He could hear the camper groaning behind him with the movement inside, and he quieted to listen, though any chance of hearing words was out the window with the pattering of rain above his head.

They could only hope the old man hadn't been lying about the docks ahead - Coach would trudge himself ragged it seemed, injuries or not, but considering they'd barely even hit the marshes yet, they didn't have the time nor the energy to last if the weather was going to be so harshly against them.

Sighing, Nick leaned further into his hands, forcing his eyes open and staring out into the rain for the longest time. His gaze unfocused, and his mind reluctantly wandered toward the wallet sitting, lonesome, on the table beside him.

It took effort to force it back away.

...I'll go mad before we get out of here. I don't even like goddamn parks. This? .. is going to be hell.

Everything turned a little colder with his own observation, and it was with a sour disinterest that he listened to the shuddering creak of the trailer door opening again. His gaze only barely lifted at the sound of footsteps, although he wondered why he felt so surprised to see Ellis come skidding around the corner of the trailer, quickly dodging under the awning to get out of the rain.

Nick's eyes latched onto the quirky smile offered to him, breathless and hesitant. There was a very effortless shine to Ellis' expressions, every single one - the kid just glowed, and it wasn't just the wet gleam that the rain left his skin with.

Ellis had a beer bottle in either hand, and he offered one out to Nick carefully before the conman could say a word. "Ro' is lookin' at Coach's back.. 'n lookit whut we found inside.. could probably use it, eh, Nick?"

Flickering his gaze from Ellis' face to the bottle, Nick slowly straightened an arm to pull the offered beer from the hick's fingers. As he turned it to eye the label, with some suspicion, he offered simply, "Thanks, Ace. … Too bad the guy doesn't have moonshine, though. Not like I'm gonna need my liver when I'm dead."

Hooking the toe of his wet dress shoe behind the leg of the wooden chair beside his, Nick kicked it just an inch to turn the seat to face Ellis. His expression was nigh unreadable, eyes not even lifting, but the motion left no room for argument.

Ellis sat down in it even as a slow pink fluttered over the bridge of his nose, sprawling his knees into a half-cross. He kept his gaze just barely slanted under the bill of his cap, and slowly worked his calloused fingertips against the lukewarm glass of his bottle.

Nick cracked his open, taking a long sip and letting his gaze settle on Ellis. Even though Ellis was looking at the ground, he must've felt the weight of Nick's eyes, because his head bobbed subtly like someone stirring from a doze.

"... y'know, this one time, Keith'n I were out campin' by a river 'n it started rainin' like this - 'n li'l did we know that rivers swell up when it rains. Our tent just up'n floated away.. with us in it, too. Keith tried tuh use a flashlight as a paddle, but -"

In his silence, listening to the kid's voice ramble with a small smirk alighted on his lips, the gambler couldn't entirely pick out why... but he didn't completely hate it.
"A hacksaw? Really?"

Nick lifted his brows in disbelief, squeezing his fingers slightly down the length of his current beer bottle. It was his third and the last of the sixpack - Ellis had been far too eager to get the whole carton when Nick had complained at finishing his first - and he was feeling the buzz. Ellis had barely shut up enough to drink, but kept up, and their table was lined with the bottles.

"Yup. He should'uh just waited 'n' bought a new can-opener, but man.. he wanted them peaches.. 'Bout cut his fingers off gettin' the damn tin open."

Nick snorted, lips curled in a grin as he took a sip of beer. The sour taste had faded well before then, and the warm buzz was more than worth it. He had the itching feeling he should blame it for being entertained by Ellis' rambling - after all, that was better than admitting he was enjoying it for any other reason...

…like how much the kid was smiling as he talked…

Or, that the stories were actually fairly funny when he paid attention.

"How has he not killed himself yet?"

Ellis chuckled, glancing up at him and resting his forearms against his thighs in a lazy gesture. "Came pretty close a few times... He's real lucky. Or not, dependin' on how yuh look at it, I guess."

Nick encircled his fingers around his beer bottle, closing his eyes slowly. His drenched state had settled to a clingy, warm bubble of heat. His clothes stuck to his skin, but not unpleasantly so - and he'd noticed Ellis' were doing the same, and that was far from unpleasant.

The rain had almost stopped, just dripping down quietly now, but the sun was already falling and it left everything in a humid, moist limbo. There hadn't been so much as a zombie in sight, and the smell from the dead ones that permeated the air was so muted by rain they barely noticed it.

"You talk about him a hell of a lot, Overalls..." he commented with a smirking tone, reopening his eyes and flashing his gaze up toward Ellis.

The mechanic grinned, shrugging slowly and adjusting his cap with his wrist in an idle scratching gesture. He seemed a little embarrassed, and shook his head. "Sorry.. don't mean tuh be annoyin' 'bout it, he's just muh best bud..."

Nick shrugged carefully, flicking his thumb against the edge of his beer bottle and lowering his chin.

"Oh, you're annoying as hell, but I doubt you could help it if you tried."

Ellis grinned a little more, squirming his back away from the chair and pulling at his shirt indelicately to try and loosen the tight, wet clutch it had on his skin. The motion made Nick's gaze rivet painfully on the other man's torso as the yellow fabric shifted, fascinated. "Well, that'n he's got funny stories. Guess I'm kinda borin' otherwise."

Had Nick not had a perfect mental image - taste, even, - of what Ellis' leanly worked body was like under his clothes, it might not have been quite so enthralling... and had alcohol not wormed its way into the equation. As it was, he watched the Georgian's shirt slide wetly over his slumped midsection, drawing ragged attention to every slope and divot.

"Uh.. Nick?"

Blinking green eyes up in a short motion, Nick realized Ellis had watched him staring. Although his instinctive reaction to being caught was to shake it off and maybe even cover his tracks with sarcasm, drunk him merely smirked and cocked his head to one side coolly. "Yeah?"

Quickly dropping his chin to avoid the gambler's gaze, Ellis struggled for a response that didn't potentially embarrass him. He apparently wasn't having much luck, judging by the flush creeping across his scarred nose, but Nick waited patiently without moving.

"...Wh.. uhh.. nothin'..."

Nick chuckled under his breath, lowering his chin and closing his eyes as the mechanic finally just gave up, sinking a few inches in his seat. Nick wanted to taunt him further, but instead crossed his legs, fingers adjusting the tight hold his damp slacks had on his knees.

Ellis worked his tongue between his teeth, warily, slowly tipping the beer bottle between his fingers back and forth. His face was an open book for his thoughts (if not their content), and Nick could practically trace the wheels turning behind his eyes. He seemed unsure, though Nick wasn't sure where that whirring thought was aimed until the other man reached out a hand to scoop up his lonesome wallet.

Nick merely watched, raising a hand to rub fingertips along his hairline tiredly, as Ellis drew out the dull, scraped golden ring from the inside pocket. He slowly rotated it in his fingers, blue eyes alive with curiousity as he inspected the soft gold surface.

The gambler's expression was drawn in this look of disdain, lips thinned tight to each other. He leaned in to set his bottle on the table, losing interest in finishing the last few swallows, and turned his gaze away to squint toward the foggy treeline.

He'd known it was coming. Expected it. Ellis wasn't one for patience, as he'd rapidly discovered. It wasn't that he wanted Ellis to hear the story behind his ring, but… they were going to die, Nick was sure. Maybe tomorrow, or maybe the next day. Nick didn't like talking about himself, let alone his past. But did it really matter, if their lives were on a timer? Maybe getting it off his chest wouldn't be the worst thing he could do.

Guess impending death and dismemberment changes things. What do I have to lose, anyway?

"This's a weddin' ring?" Ellis questioned slowly, almost breathlessly, gaze unmoving from the circle grazed in careful motions by his fingertips. His brows were gently coaxing together, scrunching up as he inspected the ring.

Nick sighed indelicately, shifting in his seat to brace his ankle over his knee in a sprawled motion, one arm thrown over the back of his chair. "Yeah." He could hear the annoyance in his own voice, deepened by his buzz.

He felt Ellis’ gaze jump up toward his face, uncertainly trying to mask the motion under the bill of his cap, and it took Nick a moment to realize why.

Almost laughing, brows going up slightly and a certain entertainment creeping into his expression suddenly, Nick clarified mercifully, "Divorced, you dumbshit." Though somewhere he knew he should've been alarmed by the concept that that might matter to Ellis - like it was his business…

his beer-addled mind decided against worrying about it.

He just smirked, rubbing at his temple and watching Ellis with an upturned, narrowed gaze.

Ellis settled the ring in the palm of his hand with a small twist of his wrist, cocking his head very slowly and pushing at it gently with the tip of his thumb. "Wow, Nick... you were married?"

The conman half-snorted, instantly regretting the choice when his nose gave a distinct pang and he tasted tacky blood. "...fuckin' door..." He slid his hand over to gently soothe it with a light fingertip brushed along the bridge of his nose. "Yeah, I guess, though honestly it was a big sham from the goddamn start."

He was suddenly glad to be drunk, the words emotionlessly tumbling from him, tinged only with an uncaring spite. Not even Ellis' gaze, those stone-blue eyes up and intent on his face as he spoke, could ruin the distance he had from his words just then.

"Pretty brunette I met at a casino. Angelica, which is some funny shit if you like your irony hot off the pan. Angel Palomo. She liked money. I do too, I guess, but that's a shitty foundation for anything past a fuck or two."

Ellis screwed up his brows tightly there, fingering the ring slower at Nick's explanation and tone. It had looked so well worn, like something lovingly used and carried everywhere, but he suddenly wondered if that wasn't from careless handling instead.

The scratches seemed sadder, after that.

"Why'd yuh get married?" Ellis' expression hesitated a moment, shifting slightly and starting to add, "... I mean..."

Nick sighed slightly, lifting one hand to wave him off. "I know what you mean." He twined his fingers together, turning his eyes down to examine his muddy dress shoes. Alcohol made his brain tick slowly, and he sighed. "This is much easier if I just start from the beginning, okay?"

If he was going to do this, tell this story, he needed to do it on his terms. Organize it. Chop it up and lay it out where it couldn't touch him.

The Georgian nodded slowly, leaning down in his chair and watching Nick's expression with reflective blue eyes. His weight shifted again, and the ring was cradled in a palm against his thigh, fingers curling around it.

Nick locked his gaze on his own hands, steepling them over his knee and drawing his brows into a tight look of distaste. It took effort to un-jumble the words in his head, and even more to remember those important details he'd tried to forget.

"...I got in a high-stakes poker game maybe four years back. I was running ragged, had a few debts, and I needed the money... and goddamn, the adrenaline. All the small players had been weeded out, and by the end, it was just me, some lowlife, and this British whale. I thought for goddamn sure -"

"Whale?" Ellis interrupted, brows screwed up in confusion. He was so intent on the story he didn't seem to notice his own outburst, focused on Nick's expression and slowly cocking his head.

Nick burst out a small laugh, giving the Georgian's bemused look a hard once-over. "It's a term, kiddo. You call guys with way too much money to gamble away whales. Most of them are just rich idiots who buy their way in, but you get psycho mock-mob boss types too. They don't like losing."
Turning a little red, Ellis nodded in understanding, quieting for Nick to keep going.

"Angelica was on his arm, like a good little cheerleader. He'd pass her money for drinks, she'd massage his shoulders and - shit... she was hot. Gorgeous, y'know? I nearly lost my focus a few times trying to catch hers, but she was so goddamn uninterested. Like I was nobody."

The conman sighed, turning his face to settle half of it against an uplifted palm, closing his eyes. A smirk started to grow behind the heel of his hand, body relaxing subtly. The fingers of his other hand twitched, and he could practically feel the cards under his palm.

"It went back and forth - I could never tell who was winning.. then, fuck if I know how, but I caught him in a bluff. He went all in on the last round, and I just risked it. Something in his face told me to do it. I had a straight flush, and I was sure he couldn't have gotten better."

Aware of Ellis straightening in his seat, leaning forward slightly, Nick rubbed at his cheek with some amusement. "Should've seen his face when I went in for it and he had to turn up three-pair. I thought he'd reach over the table and strangle me on the spot. Left that table with ten grand in chips."

Ellis whistled low, eyes riveted on Nick's face even as some of the nuances of the story went over his head. The conman's inebriated and unusually open expressions were elaboration enough to follow. "Bet he was pissed..."

"You're telling me. Not as pissed as Angel was, apparently, because next time I saw him she was gone. I stuck around in the casino, just to wait it out where there were cameras in case the guy wanted to try something - and yeah, I celebrated. I was halfway through a bottle of ... I don't even remember, totally drunk off my ass, when she showed up."

The hick scrunched his brows slightly, tipping his head. "Whut? Why?"

Nick almost wanted to say something sarcastic, but ended up just shrugging his shoulders. "She jumped ship when I beat her old guy. I guess he'd been losing his shine, and that had been the last straw. Maybe he'd taken it out on her, I dunno. Maybe I just looked like a new chance for more money. Fuck if I cared about that when she was practically dragging me to a hotel room."

"Don't sound much like the start to a weddin', Nick..." the mechanic prompted gently, expression struggling not to let slip his sympathy, wary… not that it worked, as Ellis was about as easy to read as a picture book.

Laughing harshly, Nick shrugged a shoulder and scanned the darkened treeline. "Don't be stupid, Overalls. Do I look like a romantic to you?" There hadn't been a peep from either trailer, and he didn't expect any. He'd already told Rochelle he'd get her when they wanted to change watch. The last thing he needed was the whole team getting in on his misery.

"Anyway, she stuck around. I don't know what it was, but I've never won so many goddamn bets in a row in my life. The winnings just piled up, like she was some goddamn lucky charm, and I couldn't have gotten rid of her if I'd tried... I guess she turned into a girlfriend somewhere. We fucked other people, don't get me wrong, but we were just... together. Every time we split, we'd get back together. That was how it was. She was just... a fixture."

Nick shook his head, and repeated, "We couldn't get rid of each other. So we got married."

Lifting his hands slowly, Ellis waved them back and forth in a gentle 'wait' motion, shaking his head. His tone was a little plaintive as he insisted, "But Nick, gettin' married is like.. a big deal...
yuh don't just.. 'get married'! Yuh gotta.. love someone, 'n cherish 'em, 'n shit."

Nick lowered his chin, distastefully glancing the hick over and sighing, letting his arms cross over the gentle curl of his own stomach. Leave it to him. "Overalls... marriage is worth shit. You want to know what our marriage was like?"

Ellis hesitated a beat, adjusting his cap with a knuckle, then nodded slowly. He seemed unsure if he should regret it, as Nick leaned forward and gestured blandly with his thumb.

"Las Vegas has little back alley churches, and they pass out services for maybe a hundred bucks. We were both wasted when it happened. Angel dragged me to this jewelry store and picked out her ring - which was the only expensive thing of the night - and we got hitched in rented knock-off wedding getups."

Ellis was frowning, leaning back a little with this sympathetic, strange sadness. He felt bad for the older man, those deeply intuitive blue eyes seeming to pierce right through the careless humor. It unsettled the gambler, and his mouth started to lose its grip on his own words.

"We woke up in a hotel halfway across town the next day.. almost didn't even remember what had happened. I'd already nearly lost the ring, not that I blame myself for wanting to take it off."

"Whut'd you do..? Did you love her?"

Suddenly Nick was sighing, and he rubbed the heel of his hand against his forehead in frustration at the question. "Shit, kid.. I hated so much about her - her stupid texting, her bitchy girlfriends I didn't really know.. she'd grab onto my arm when she saw anything she wanted, like some spoiled teenager. The only times we were together was gambling, shopping, and at night in bed."

He suddenly fell silent. They both sat there for a few moments, Nick's eyes caught on the still shapes of trees around them, and Ellis watched him. It was clear he wasn't done, so Ellis just waited quietly. When it seemed like Nick might be stuck for good, he leaned forward.

Those calloused fingertips touched down on the table just beside Nick, spreading, and the ring was settled down with a soft clink. He pulled away, leaving it there as Nick glanced down.

The conman picked it up with nowhere near the same delicacy, almost snatching it from the table, staring it down between his fingertips with a stewing frustration. "... I'd wake up sometimes, before she did, and I wouldn't want to move. She'd be up against my chest and I'd just lay there."

The oiling of alcohol didn't help the admission. It stuck to his teeth, and he had to grit his jaw to fight the sour taste. Nick half expected Ellis to laugh, or say something stupid like 'Wow, Nick, you got a soft side, too?'

When he glanced up, scowling, to find Ellis silently returning his gaze with a softened and attentive expression, he felt more of it build up in his throat and slowly let it escape like so much air. Ellis was just accepting it, and it caught him off-guard.

"I made breakfast once, thinking she'd stick around to eat it, y'know? I couldn't say 'Hey, why don't you just hang around this morning'... too stupid, I'd never say that... She just took it to the couch to watch TV and looked at me like I'd grown a second head when I tried to sit next to her. I gave up trying after that. Wish I'd caught on and just left her then. Saved myself some pain."

Ellis' brows began their slow scrunch again, softly, above his eyes. "Somethin' happened?" he prompted gently, letting his gaze lift as his chin lowered, braced just beneath the bill of his cap.
Talking grew difficult. His vision felt unfocused, and Nick riveted his gaze on the ground, letting his hands lower to his lap. He wanted to blame it on the alcohol, but just then, he wasn't sure.

"... We needed a new car. She'd been using mine, but she wanted her own. Problem was, I was running out of money, and she didn't know. I had to get some fast, had to find a new gamble - a new bet... fuck if I was going to be the next guy she tossed aside. So I... went back to an old buddy."

Ellis frowned slightly, obviously not following, forcing Nick to exhale and shrug a shoulder, elaborating. "Sort of... a gang thing. I stole for him a few times. Little things, when I was younger and needed the money. Broke into a house once... it was a goddamn stupid choice, but when you need cash, you need it."

Blinking in clear surprise but slowly nodding, understanding, the Georgian drew his boots back under his chair and leaned forward, glancing over Nick's face. "What happened?"

"He got me into a game of blackjack. Wasn't interested in loaning me anything... he needed a player to fill a chair and I was good - so he'd give me the startup money to join. If I won for him, he'd help me out from there. I thought I could do it, really did. It was just a gamble on a gamble."

The conman deflated slightly, shaking his head once and gripping hard on the ring in his palm. "I lost. I lost it so fuckin' bad... I was in debt up to my eyes, and when he found out how hopeless me paying it back was, he went after me at home."

He didn't look up as Ellis' expression grew rapidly concerned; he didn't really want to see it.

"They stole my old car for collateral and beat the ever-loving-shit out of me. Random guy drove me to the hospital... I don't even know where Angel was. I remember trying like hell to get a nurse to call my house, to see where she was. I think I thought they'd attacked her too."

Nick felt, out of nowhere, the tip of Ellis' boot touch down on the tip of his. His gaze latched onto it, that odd little connection between them, like some poorly disguised offer of comfort. "Was she okay...?"

Nick laughed, spitefully and shortly, in the same moment he nodded. The words were just forced out of him then, he felt his jaw threatening to shut but stuttering open as he had to keep on. "She showed up the next day. Tossed a bunch of papers onto my chest -"

And he could remember how much that had stung, long after the spastic pain from a broken rib had ended.

"... and just looked at me... like she couldn't pick between being mad or just... pitying me. Then she left. I didn't look for the longest time - but I knew, y'know...? Bitch threw divorce papers at me. She'd gotten a card turned down, found out about the debts, who even knows... the well ran dry and she was gone, not a word... I really picked a girl for me. Heartless, greedy bitch, just like me."

Nick bent forward, straightening his legs and bracing his elbows on his knees so he could curl his head between his hands. He dug fingers into his hair, closing his eyes, fighting off the sudden feeling like he might retch. He was shuddering, and he didn't know why, his whole frame unsteady like so many rickety blocks stacked together - he muttered to try and excuse it, blood rushing in his ears.

"... I shouldn't've... Too much beer, not enough food. I can't... just give me a second. I'm - dizzy. You -"
His voice halted in his throat as hands suddenly settled, unimaginably warm, on his shoulders. Heat sunk into the muscles tensed up there through the fabric of his dress shirt, and his eyes opened in a flash.

Ellis stood just in front of him, leaning forward just enough to touch his hands down on those trembling shoulders, a concerned frown drawing his features down. His voice crooned very softly in understanding. "'Ey, Nick, it's alright.. yer allowed tuh be upset, s'okay."

Those fingers curled, rubbing in open comfort, and Nick's whole mind went to something like the low whine of feedback from half-plugged speakers. When Ellis lowered his voice and offered, "I'll go get Ro', 'n' we can switch the watch up.. yuh just need some sleep.. okay?" all he heard was 'I'll go.'

Nick stood up so suddenly that Ellis jumped, mouth open to utter something startled, right as Nick's came down hard to silence him. The conman stepped forward to snatch his arms around the mechanic's torso, pinning him with a tight grip to his T-shirt.

He felt a sharp exhale flutter against his mouth as he did, tensing himself for rejection - but Ellis' fingers curled on the back of his neck to lean into the kiss instead.

Their bodies struggled against one another, neither completely steady, and as Nick caught the kid's lower lip in a scraping bite, they staggered to hit the edge of the table nearby. Nick hit first, twisting to pull Ellis tight against him as he bent backward slightly over the table.

The kiss broke with a breath, Nick shuddering and his eyes slipping half-shut as the tight contact between them sent heat thrumming through his skin. He eyed Ellis' expression, watching the blush over the bridge of his nose and the huffing embarrassment over his face.

"…Don't move, dumbshit." Nick whispered, intently.

It wasn't a need for contact. It wasn't a need to feel connected. It wasn't a need to feel less alone. It wasn't any of those things.

It was just sex.

He was sure.

Ellis' fingers slid down just slightly to get a better grip on the back of Nick's neck, body anxiously shifting. His mouth gawped just twice, trying to find words, before he slowly lifted a hand to pull his own cap off of his head, throwing it to the seat of Nick's chair.

"Okay." Ellis carefully whispered back, managing to slowly give him a smile. It was that smile that made Nick kiss him again, slower than the first one, but no less demanding. Fierce. The fingers of one of Nick's hands gripped into his hair, flexing, and a soft shudder passed between them.

Things like 'we're outside,' 'there's a large chance we'd get caught,' and 'a redneck with a shotgun is two trailers away' left his buzzed consciousness as quick as they came as Nick slowly crawled the dragging fingertips of his free hand down Ellis' lean back, hooking onto the bound-up top of his coveralls.

"Say no, kid." It was all Nick could do not to laugh, harsh and quiet. "Before I do something stupid."

His whole body flinched with lust, and he found himself dragging in breaths through a smarting nose to try and slow his heartrate. He knew it was a terrible idea. Knew they shouldn't. Knew, most of all, that Ellis would probably do whatever he said, and he wasn't sure if that was a good thing or not.

And then Ellis whimpered something that alarmed Nick to a dead stop in the same instant it threatened to melt every last inch of hesitation:

"I trust yuh, Nick."

He turned the tide, flipping them around to pin Ellis suddenly to the edge of the table. He didn't care - barely noticed - as the motion rolled several discarded beer bottles right off and onto the grass with soft thunks.

All he could say as he pushed the hick's torso down flat on the surface, hitching Ellis' hips up to make it easier and loosen the scrabbled grip the other man had on the collar of his dress shirt, was a low, "You shouldn't."
Nick didn't know what it was - maybe it was just drunken lust, built up frustration. He'd have preferred that.

What he felt, though, as he dug his fingers into the bunched up fabric that swathed Ellis' hips, was need. Raw and brutal, tightening his chest till it was hard to breathe. He curled forward over the younger man, hovering their faces too close and not close enough. Their lower bodies had only the barest distance between them, just brushing.

"Why not, Nick?" It sounded so innocent coming from those lips, gasped open a little as Ellis' breath came in tiny huffs. He just didn't understand.

It took all his strength not to just steal those lips, but Nick waited, breath catching harshly behind his teeth. His eyes burned down on the younger man, green roving uncontrollably, drinking up every little inch they could like that might help him keep still.

Ellis' face was flushed, but his gaze held strong against embarrassment, darting between Nick's mouth and his eyes like he could discern some kind of hint on what Nick wanted. He lifted his chin, feeling a shudder pass through the man on top of him as he slowly leaned closer.

Nick muttered roughly and almost thoughtlessly, his voice dark with restraint and eyes sliding half-shut. "... Because I'm going to fuck you, if you don't get the fuck out."

He waited, just long enough, for the words to sink in.

Then he dropped his head and captured the kid's mouth. Their lips locked, the taste of alcohol heavy between them. Nick heard himself moan, and Ellis wrapped his arms around the gambler's torso, fingers clutching in his shirt to try and close the distance between them.

Nick growled slightly at the sensation, tightening his grip on the younger man's bunched coveralls and curling himself forward. As he leaned into a drifting grind on Ellis' pelvis, he let his hands slip down and grab his thighs. He dragged the Georgian's legs up off the ground and to either side of him, holding them there.

Ellis took the hint, uncertainly hooking his knees around Nick's waist, gasping a soft uncertain noise when it occurred to him he was, however sideways, planted firmly in Nick's lap. The sudden squeeze of thighs rattled the gambler's focus, and Ellis barely caught a flustered cry behind clamped teeth when the conman thrusted hungrily, and a little drunkenly, up against him.

Nick forced himself to a grating halt as he heard the sound, shuddering at the friction every single twitch caused between them. His fingers clutched and gripped at Ellis' hips, mouth going dry with the desire to hear that noise unstifled.

A sticky-sweet Southern drawl belting out his name, quavering.. losing control.. the flex of that incredible body under his grasp.. those blue eyes fogging over.. he hadn't gotten nearly enough of the kid.

"Goddamnit, El.." Nick cursed in frustration, voice ragged. He didn't know what was worse - how much he wanted Ellis, or how much he knew they shouldn't. Not only were they both having trouble stifling their voices so far, but the table was barely an inch away from clanging against the back of the metal trailer.
Ellis panted carefully, cheeks burning with something between embarrassment and arousal. He slowly pulled a hand away from Nick's back, reaching up to touch his fingertips to the conman's cheek. Calloused tips stroked stubble, and Nick stiffened under them, tensing up at the unexpected affection.

The mechanic whimpered up at him, quietly, blue eyes widened as they flickered over the conman's face. Anxiety was apparent in his reddened features, much as he tried to stifle it, and Nick could hear the little hitch to his breath.

Nick groaned through gritted teeth, recovering quickly and biting at Ellis' fingers with a dangerous smirk. "Picked a horrible fuckin' place to get me drunk, kiddo." He moved his hands to grab onto the edge of the table, digging in his heels to drag it and its cargo back an extra foot from the trailer.

Ellis quickly gripped onto the front of Nick's dress shirt, and as Nick released the table and leaned forward to brace one hand on the wooden surface just beside Ellis' waist, he felt the Georgian's strong grasp drag his dress shirt up. The blue garment slipped free from its tuck beneath his belted slacks, baring his stomach.

Nick dragged his teeth along the other man's neck, treating it equally with nips and flickers of his tongue. His free hand curled underneath Ellis' lower back, encouraging his hips a few inches up off the table and supporting him. The huffs his actions drew from Ellis were quiet and pattered right against Nick's ear, those full lips parted in arousal.

The conman's spine arched with a growl when rough fingertips flirted against his bare stomach, diving underneath the shirt they'd been working up. Ellis spread his fingers against the hair-dusted abdomen at his mercy, two warm hands slowly exploring up to the gambler's gently heaving chest.

Nick couldn't stifle it, those calloused fingertips burning against the sensitive skin of his torso and putting a wanting gravel into the edge of his voice. "Hn.. Overalls.."

An irritating chuckle tickled against his ear, slight relief leaking into Ellis' anxious tone as the hick gained a little power over the gambler - however short-lived. With a very low, "Shut it." Nick jammed his hips shamelessly against the mechanic's pelvis, enjoying the way it jolted Ellis into a vulnerable curl at the stomach and the strained yip that escaped him.

Ellis quickly clamped his teeth together, trembling a little with the effort it took to keep his mouth shut as Nick rolled his hips lustily up against him, smirking darkly into the other man's neck. Parting his lips to lick flat along Ellis' heated jugular, Nick sunk the ringed fingers of his supporting hand into his bunched coveralls and peeled it away slowly.

The fabric dragged across skin, taking the briefs underneath with it, inch by inch baring more of Ellis' rump to the humid air. Nick could feel him tensing up, gasping past gritted teeth, clutching his fingers against the warm skin of Nick's chest and struggling not to protest. With the conman firmly planted between his thighs, all it did was bunch up just at his crotch, not that Nick minded.

"You said you trusted me..." he murmured down to the Georgian, focusing flecked, pale green eyes intently on Ellis' blue ones. He'd reached a calm focus, a sober determination - and his lips were curled up at the edges. His smirk made Ellis swallow, before giving a careful nod.

"Y-yeah.." Hesitantly, Ellis tried to glean his meaning from those stubbled features, fingers creeping slowly to curl around the gambler's sides and get a better grip. "I mean - I ain't done it before, but… Yeah."

Nick simply purred, "Good.", right before he pulled his hand from the table and clamped it over Ellis' mouth. His blue eyes instantly widened a little over flushed cheeks, uncertainly turning his chin slightly, only to find Nick's hand smoothly following the motion.

"Nhk?" he barely managed to say in a muffled voice, slow, uncomprehending confusion flattering on his face.

His breath puffed hot against Nick's palm, the conman chuckling lowly and bending forward to brush his lips against the scarred bridge of Ellis' nose. He explained lowly, tone gaining a gentler lull. "... It might hurt a little, so tell me if it does."

Those blue eyes blinked once, and Ellis slowly nodded in understanding without wresting Nick's hand from its place over his mouth, though his brows adopted a small knot between them. Nick straightened just slightly at the confirmation, drawing his other hand back up and closing his mouth around his ringless index and middle fingers.

He didn't give Ellis time to remain uncertain while he wetted his left hand's fingers - the gambler leaned his hips forward, pleasantly grinding up into the warm niche of his pelvis and holding a pressure there. It forced Ellis to curl up a little more, knees still hooked around Nick's waist, trapped underneath him and so perfectly balanced on the barely-large-enough table.

Ellis whimpered near-silently behind the stifling palm on his lips, pulling his arms out of the warm confines of Nick's shirt and retracting his hands with a shiver. One hand gripped onto Nick's blue-cuffed wrist just below where it had a hold over his mouth, just holding onto it rather than trying to pull it away. The other slipped to get his fingers curled on the edge of the table like he didn't trust his balance.

Bending down as he popped his fingers free from his mouth, Nick used his grip on Ellis' jaw to turn his chin to the side and up a little. He bit onto the other man's ear, teething along the delicate flesh and distracting him while his hand slipped underneath his hoisted-up lower body.

The sudden, full-body shiver that jumped Ellis' frame up against Nick when the conman's warm fingertip pressed suddenly against his entrance was electric. His breath huffed against Nick's palm in a harsh exhale, blush deepening rapidly until he was practically cherry red.

The tightness he felt there made Nick groan slightly, pulling his teeth away from Ellis' ear for fear of biting down in reflex. "Relax." he purred against the warm shell, letting his hips rock against the hick's slowly, the gentle friction steady and soothing.

Ellis' hand squeezed on Nick's wrist, tension focusing there as he tried to relax his spine. He visibly struggled with the sensation, eyes shut tight and face flushed attractively - despite his best attempt, Nick couldn't deny that his gaze riveted on the Georgian's features, narrowing.

Gritting his teeth slightly to distract himself from the waves of lust threatening to drip down his spine, Nick dared to press the tip of his finger inside. Just that, and no more, though he let his knuckle bend to circle it faintly against the worst of the tightness.

He didn't miss the flickers of discomfort over those scrunched brows, nor the little pained 'hn's and 'ah's just barely audible between his muffling fingers. The slow rock of the conman's hips filled the spaces between with flutters of pleasure, but they were there all the same.

Nick tipped his head to murmur to Ellis, peeling away his thumb from Ellis' mouth to allow him to talk. "Okay, Ace?"

It bothered him how much hinged on the response, how much attention he paid to listening for it.
His finger curled in little strokes, pushing sideways against the muscles that constrained around it, not stopping even if it made it harder for Ellis to talk - not sure if he could stand being still.

Ellis huffed out a breath loudly past his lips, struggling not to lose it with his mouth freed. He nodded quickly, the motion half a nuzzle to the fingers still laced on his cheek. "Nnhh.. y-yeah, Nick.. it just feels funny."

The conman smirked slightly, shifting his thumb to tease it over the hick's soft lower lip. It took effort not to lean in and kiss him, but Nick resisted it. He focused on straightening his wrist and pressing his finger a little deeper, circling.

Nick felt his whole spine go utterly stiff when Ellis lifted his chin up and pressed his mouth almost absent-mindedly to the tip of his thumb, whimpering a little against it. The brush of those lips around his digit was painfully arousing, bringing forth a deluge of mental images he found a little hard to shake.

He growled quietly, gaze narrowing on the Ellis' lips and jaw setting as he added a second finger to the effort of readying Ellis. The stifled yelp he got for his trouble made him smirk, particularly because of the fact that Ellis’ hips gave a gentle rock against his digits that seemed reflexive - and welcoming.

"Better?" he grated quietly, bending down so he could trace his tongue along the whorl of Ellis' left ear, enjoying the shivers he could feel underneath him. The younger man nodded, vaguely.

It was easier to move now, and Nick took advantage of it, digits dragging and pressing against the taut muscles surrounding them. He surged them a little deeper, patience flagging as the Georgian whined something, unintelligible, his knees shifting against the conman's waist. It sounded wanting, if tense.

Nick tried to think logically. He honestly did.

But he'd tortured himself long enough. Nick withdrew his fingers slowly and bent down a little. He worked to undo his belt onehanded, and Ellis must've heard the clink of the metal, because reflective, misty blue eyes suddenly blinked open.

The hand around Nick's wrist let go, suddenly grasping at the back of his neck. Ellis thrusted his weight in half a pull and half a lean, pushing their lips together. His stomach trembled with the effort of holding himself in enough of a crunch to manage it, and Nick withdrew his thumb just before their mouths met.

He muttered ".quit doing that, goddamnit.." out of the corner of his mouth, more in sarcasm than anything else, before shoving his tongue to deepen the kiss with a hard edge of chiding hunger. His fingers resumed their motion, and he rocked his hips a little, jostling his slacks open just enough to push his boxers aside and free his erection with a weighted, hot sigh into the kiss.

But he broke away then, startling Ellis at first. He leaned back just far enough to separate them and spat heavily into his palm, mouth wet with saliva from their kiss. He used it to slick up his cock, huffing quietly.

Nick then slipped both of his hands to Ellis' thighs, short-trimmed nails digging a little into the skin bared up around his hips, scraping slowly to get his fingertips underneath the younger man's coveralls. He pushed at the same instant, hoisting Ellis into a tighter curl and getting his knees closer to his chest.
Sliding his coveralls higher, Nick bit back a small groan as the smooth and warm flesh of Ellis' rump brushed against the sensitive skin of his hard-on. He dropped down to an elbow on the table, weight pushing Ellis' knees even further to his chest as his abdomen pressed down on the entrapping bundle of coveralls between his thighs.

He re-linked their kiss, just in time; Ellis whined against his mouth, blush so severe Nick swore he felt it just through the kiss, but his fingers clenched on the back of Nick's neck and his body trembled with a light flush. They were past the point of hesitancy.

Nick's free hand gripped his hard-on just below the head, slitting his gaze carefully and firmly locking their lips, determined to keep Ellis quiet. He let his hips press forward, a heavy shudder wracking him at that feeling of resistance, rocking his weight to work himself just an inch in.

Ellis' voice quickly grew urgent in its stifled noises, head jolting up to press deep into the kiss, expression scrunching up tightly. His arms wound over Nick's neck, fingers curling into fists, and there was a small whine as his body tensed up against the intruding length.

The clench sent Nick's eyes rolling up with a moan of raw pleasure, though he tried quickly to both silence himself and focus on holding still a moment, letting his hand settle into a bracing grip on Ellis' hip. It was only when Ellis' tension dissipated that he moved again, hips circling subtly.

The kid was so unbelievably tight, Nick honestly wasn't sure how he was fitting so far. His knees went weak and his whole brain swam with dizziness - he was lucky he had the table to lean his weight against.

He felt Ellis squirm, but he had him trapped and there was little room to move. Tightening his grip on the warm skin filling his palm, he worked his hips up at a slight angle to try and hit that sweet spot. Each movement was still a struggle against tense muscles, and Ellis' fingers dug into the flesh of his back, groaning against his lips.

Nick knew the moment he'd hit gold, because on the top of a shallow thrust, Ellis suddenly jerked with a surprised mumble, body giving an aroused shudder and muscles tightening around him in something a lot less protesting and a lot more appreciative.

The gambler broke the kiss the moment Ellis' outburst halted, leaving his lips parted to harshly force breaths in and out, staying close just in case. "Goddamnit.. you're.. tight as shit.." he muttered, gaze roving fiercely over the reddened face below his, those damp silky lips.

Ellis turned a shade darker, spluttering something at first before squeezing his fingers and curling them in the conman's shirt. "N-Nick - quit -" he muttered, almost pleading, like the gambler were mocking him.

Nick smirked, bending his head to tip his mouth into the crook of Ellis' neck, pressing him just a little harder into the table. His lips traced the line of a tendon down from his partner's jaw, voice a little oily with a taunt. "... Quit what? Quit fucking you..?"

The younger man's eyes went wide at the suggestion, and he shook his head almost too quickly, starting to blurt out, "No -"

But Nick didn't give him a chance, drawing his hips back and stroking them forward in a smooth motion. The angle was slack enough to brush against his prostate again, stirring up pleasure, and Ellis barely kept his mouth shut without anything to muffle it in.

It suddenly became a risky game, and Nick used his hand to keep Ellis' hips solidly where he wanted them, adopting a slowly rocking rhythm as he found the resistance of Ellis' clenching insides loosening to a bearable grip.

Aware of the danger, Nick gave him no help to keep quiet, finding a heat crawling its way up his spine. He found himself enjoying the way the hick clamped his jaw shut and curled his head to the side, whimpering urgently to the slide of the conman's grating strokes. His gaze was riveted sideways, watching, hips hungrily pushing deeper every few moments.

Nick dragged his lips along the skin underneath them, shifting his weight subtly to widen the position of his shoes on the grass. The table made a soft click of protesting joints as he reached the crux of a rock forward, and he rose to the challenge offered, suddenly lengthening each penetration to draw out the same little noise.

"I'd say.. you're enjoying this, El.." he purred against the hick's neck, tone raw gravel and hunger. "Hmm..?"

The sound he got in response was a wary 'uuh-hhuh', cut off by a gasp and small grinded whimper. Ellis didn't notice till too late that Nick had freed his hand and crept it to burrow suddenly under the bunched coveralls in his lap. The gambler's ringed fingers wrapped around the erection otherwise ignored, teasing against the damp tip and stroking it slowly.

Ellis whimpered desperately, spine twisting and twitching as every motion dragged pleasure out of both sides. His expression struggled, eyes blinking quickly and head trying to tip a little to press his mouth against Nick's before he got too loud.

Nick denied him, letting him squirm, rutting his hips in deep and slow and just rocking his weight up against the hick's rump. He smirked, lips parted to pant, enjoying the practically begging whines it drew out of Ellis as he tried to shut himself up with bitten lips. "What?"

His vision was blurring, and he wanted nothing more than to close his eyes, but Nick resisted. He pivoted his hips, grunting a little himself as something clenched around his length and rewarding the younger man with a long stroke of his palm. "Want -" Nick growled quietly, nipping teeth against skin between the two words. "- something?"

Ellis' fingers dug into his back, tightening, a low whine spilling from his lips as he squirmed, curling his head further to the side. "N-n-nah.." he lied through gritted teeth, gasping them apart with one eye closing in a little flinch of arousal.

Pulling back slowly till his shaft nearly freed itself, watching each little flicker of pleasure as the motion rolled back, Nick let himself sit there a moment. The lust was building up as pure heat in his abdomen, body wonderfully loose as he skirted the edge of climax.. and he thrusted forward in a sudden motion, rutting into the hick's warm body, burying himself deep.

"Sure?" he whispered in a practical snarl, spine shuddering even more as the hick jolted up with his thrust, a unintelligible cry narrowly stifled with an almost dangerously bitten tongue. Nick was almost certain, had it gotten out, it would've been his name.

Its halt suddenly disappointed him.

Trembling under and around him, Ellis barely caught his breath enough to respond, voice shaking with a certain urgency, focus fluttering mistily. His voice was flecked with something like frustration when he muttered, "Please -"

Nick gave in without a word, snagging Ellis' lips with a small groan and arching up his back so he... could thrust into the kid with sudden fervor. Ellis whimpered against his lips, blue eyes shutting and arms sliding up to wrap tightly around his neck, fingers clutching at the air.

The gambler's spine straightened out with a heavy shudder as the muscles around his length clenched down, Ellis biting onto Nick's lower lip with a stifled cry and clutch of his fingers as his climax sent shudders racing along his limbs. Nick pumped his fingers to egg it on, not caring as it got on the other man's shirt, rutting his hips up against the flexing muscles a few last times with a groan.

He pulled out suddenly and lifted his weight, letting Ellis' legs relax down some from their curl as the kid huffed desperately, bright red and breathless. The conman switched hands, narrowing his gaze down on the body slumped underneath him, tugging his own orgasm to completion.

He bit along Ellis' jaw, growling tightly with each motion as he rolled his hips slowly against his own palm to ride out the drugging pleasure that buzzed along his nerves, semen spilling down toward the ground in careless drips between his knuckles.

"...Fuck." was all he said, stilling just at Ellis' earlobe and releasing a shaky breath. He regretted their surroundings, wanting nothing more than to just collapse for a little while.. but he had to steel himself.

The conman slowly shook his hand off, leaning up to stand with only the slightest hunch forward. He grew a smirk as he slowly settled his slacks back into place, using both hands to re-belt it, noticing Ellis' eyes blink open slowly, panting as he shifted his gaze toward Nick.

It only took a few gulps of air for Ellis to whimper out a shaky response, slowly lifting a hand to run it through his curly-locked hair, palm catching the sweat along his forehead. "M-man... I can't.. feel muh legs.." He laughed a little, slowly.

Nick's eyes rolled subtly, leaning forward to survey the mess Ellis had made of the bottom few inches of his T-shirt as he let a hand trail along the smooth curve of the hick's bared upper thigh. His fingers caught on the top edge of his coveralls, tugging idly.

"I'm not carryin' you, if that's what you mean. Lucky we didn't get caught in the first place." he muttered quietly, grabbing onto the coveralls with both hands and bending forward as he shoved the Georgian's boxers and pants back on a little roughly, making him squirm and dusting a nip on his lower lip in the same motion.

Their eyes met, for just a moment, and Nick let his eyes slit.

Disoriented under his gaze, Ellis' blush flickered harshly over the bridge of his nose and he shook his head slowly. "D.. did it make yuh feel any better..?"

Nick suddenly stilled, staring down at him with something a lot like surprise, one brow raised. He slowly ground his teeth back and forth, trying to get a grip on how to respond to that. ".I don't think I need to tell you yes to that, Ace.. came as hard as you did."

Adding the mocking tail-end to his response succeeded in that calculated way his jibes generally did; Ellis flushed, darting his gaze away as he adjusted to the brash statement, tipping his chin down a little bit like he thought his hat was there to shade his eyes.

"Uh.. guess you did.."

Nick knew what he'd meant, of course - emotionally. Had 'it' made him feel emotionaly better. And that question was a problem all on its own.
"C'mon, El." he growled a little, voice full of a smirk, reaching out to tuck a knuckle under Ellis' chin and urge him slowly to sitting by the tug of his digit. "That table's gonna break."

Ellis chuckled a little, distracted from his mostly unanswered question, slipping to his feet and around Nick to recover his hat from the seat of the chair nearby. "S'.. hardly muh fault, Nick.." he mumbled, glancing sideways toward the conman.

Nick smirked, watching him with a slightly tilted head, not missing the slight bow to his legs and limp to his gait as he nursed the unfamiliar stretched and empty sensations after their screw. The conman picked up his jacket from the other chair, slipping his arms into it slowly, then retrieved his wallet and replaced it in the inner pocket of his suit.

The glint of his wedding ring caught his eye, abandoned where it was on the seat of the lawn chair, and he was just an instant away from convincing himself to just leave it.. when something possessed him to snatch it up, shoving it into a pocket with a mental curse.

He turned back around, relieved to see that Ellis hadn't noticed his dilemma - the kid was facing away from him, head ducked with embarrassment as he wiped his stomach clean with the unused sleeve of his coveralls.

Nick stepped forward, pushing Ellis with his shoulder slightly to get him moving. "Let's just get inside, killer. There's nothing out here anyway."

Ellis grinned sideways at him, bashfully, replacing his cap on his head and shoving his hands into the pockets of his coveralls as he slowly walked around the trailer for the door. "Wore me the hell out, Nick..."

Nick tailed after him, closely, gaze unfocused as he made his tired body keep moving despite the heavy urge to sit down. It was a pleasurable kind of laziness, joints loose and full of cotton, spine relaxed. "Good." he muttered tauntingly, falling silent as Ellis stepped up the three stairs to the rickety trailer, pulling open the door.

The mobile home was fairly thin, messy and dingy inside, and Nick did his best not to inspect it too hard as he stepped lightly after Ellis. He zeroed in on a small, dark red leather, armless couch planted up against the wall halfway through, barely outside what qualified as the 'kitchen.'

The last third of the trailer was a closed room - a bedroom, Nick figured. He gestured limp-wristed at it as he tiredly stepped over to the couch and sat down with a pleased rumble. He shifted himself around to find a comfortable sitting position and curled his arm on the back, settling his head against it like a makeshift pillow. "Go tell Ro' we're going to sleep."

He saw Ellis nod at him, standing a few feet away, before he shut his eyes, melting easily into his less-than-optimum sleeping posture. He listened without opening his eyes as Ellis padded across the trailer toward the door. The whole structure shifted with his weight.

Nick may have even dozed in the time it took Ellis to stir Rochelle and pass the watch on. All he knew was he jolted a little when the trailer shifted again, and Ellis' footsteps found their way back to him.

"'Kay… She's gettin' up."

Nick nodded his head mutely, but noticed Ellis was frozen where he was. It occurred to him, even exhausted, pretty quick; there was no other place to sleep, other than on the bare floor. He didn't bother to open his eyes, merely sighed slightly and shrugged his shoulder to indicate the space on the couch next to him.

"May as well just get comfortable here, Overalls. Nothing else to do."

Ellis laughed quietly, scratching under his hat slowly and approaching to drop himself onto the other half of the couch. "Wasn't sure if.. well, anyway." He bent forward to pull his boots off, wiggling his toes in a stretch.

The kid drew a knee up to his chest, giving a slight huff as he did like the gesture ached a little. He wrapped his arms around his knee, using it and his biceps like a pillow.

His shoulder rested against Nick's, forced to by the fairly short couch they had to work with, but the conman said nothing but a "Night, kid." He didn't mind as much as he'd thought he would - just a little contact, enough to warm the left side of his body.

Ellis obliged him, the short and gentle quality of his response making the conman furrow his brows a little. He wouldn't be kept up by stories, at least - though he felt like he could've slept through it anyway. "G'night, Nick."

The problem was, he had felt better.
Nick's first instinct upon waking up was to nestle his face further against his pillow. A pleased smile filtered up onto his features as he pulled it closer, letting himself stew a moment in the pleasant recollections of the previous night.

He should've felt more conflicted - he never wanted to be that vulnerable, not to anyone, and his acute awareness of his own need was alarming. He didn't consider how recent the divorce was to be a good enough excuse to forgive himself for it.

There was nothing really to be done, though... and somewhere he was surprised by how easy Ellis had made it. No hard questions, no judgement. Just sympathy and acceptance. He hadn't had that kind of experience in years... maybe a decade.

He hated that it had worked on him.

Sighing just a little and feeling his good mood slipping away from him, Nick burrowed his face further down into the fabric pressed to his cheek, letting his arms move to clutch harder on his pillow. His nose gave a loud sting of pain as the motion jostled it, but he ignored it.

It wasn't supposed to turn into some 'thing' - he hadn't even expected or wanted to get any sympathy, let alone end up screwing the kid.

But it had, and as sure as Nick was that Ellis' unerring determination to inject emotions into it, and friendship, was to blame, he had trouble relaxing with the knowledge how much he'd wanted the badly planned and badly timed intimacy.

Needed.

He hated need.

He wanted to convince himself it had just been raging lust finally snapping free in his mind, but he knew better. Nick had broken down last night, and God, that infuriated him. You don't need anything from anyone, least of all from some twenty-three year-old Georgia redneck. He had to keep it together.

I dunno who messed with your head more, Nicolas.. your ex or the kid.

For some reason, shoving the two into the same corner of his mind made him relax. As his fingers tightened, trying to adjust his pillow into a more comfortable clutch against his body, he heard a little hiccup of air just a few centimeters from his face.

And then it hit him.

He didn't have a pillow.

Nick immediately recoiled his head up, startled, eyes shooting open to view with some shock the position he'd rolled himself into. Ellis was dead asleep, his back nestled up against Nick's chest and his arms draped loosely down over the gambler's where they were laced over the younger man's abdomen.

Nick had even turned on the couch, one leg curling underneath him loosely, so he could draw Ellis into his lap and align them closer together. Nick's head had gotten nestled into the crook of Ellis' neck, face turned into the soft fabric of his T-shirt. They were cuddled so tightly, bodies warm and familiar against one another, that it was painfully obvious they'd been settled like that a while.

"What the hell!" Nick blurted reflexively, trying to shove Ellis away from himself and off the couch. The jostle woke Ellis halfway up, making him gurgle slightly in confusion and grab onto the nearest thing - that being Nick's forearms, dragging him with.

The two tumbled off the couch and onto the dingy trailer's carpet in an undignified pile, rolling a little, Nick landing underneath Ellis' startled weight. He immediately growled, trying to wrest Ellis from his form and nearly getting an accidental elbow to the face for his trouble.

Ellis scrambled like an overturned turtle on Nick's torso, disoriented and struggling into awareness. "Wh-what happened?! Where's muh -" One of his hands clamped onto his head, finding the cloth of his cap tightly settled on his head, and calmed down considerably to try and regain his senses.

Blue eyes blinked, head turning to look over his shoulder at the scowling conman he was laying on top of. "Nick? Whut the..?"

"Get off!" Nick growled in a low tone, shoving again until Ellis clambered off him. The conman quickly hauled up to his feet the moment Ellis' weight was off, turning his body away and adjusting his clothes snappily.

His gaze confirmed with some anxiety that the trailer's bedroom door was still closed, and they were alone. This trailer's windows weren't boarded up like the first one, though they were shuttered closed, and the dim golden light of morning filtered in in soft slashes.

Huffing a sigh deeply, Nick focused on straightening his lapels, moodily rooting himself where he stood. He kept his voice down, irritated. "Remind me not to sleep near you anytime soon... I'm not a goddamn stuffed animal..

Because it definitely hadn't been his arms wrapped around Ellis.

When he didn't get a response, he tipped his head, glancing over his shoulder. Ellis had hunched down against the front of the couch, body curled at a weird angle and hands laced over his thighs, pain dousing his features.

Nick blinked slightly, coolly dropping his hands and half-turning around as his brows moved into a vague lift. ".. What?"

Ellis merely shook his head in silence. He tried to adjust his weight and roll over, ducking his chin to hide underneath the bill of his cap rather than look at Nick, but didn't manage. He slid back down to a crouch.

Nick didn't let up, turning entirely and approaching a step. "What?" he repeated.

"I-I'm fine, Nick, jus'- ow.." He sounded embarrassed and a little humiliated, distinctly avoiding looking at the gambler and slipping his arms to wrap instead around his waist.

Nick realized what was going on with a sudden halt, breaking into an abrupt smirk before he stifled it. He tugged his slacks up an inch or two by the thighs, pain dousing his features.

"I-I'm fine, Nick, jus'- ow.." He sounded embarrassed and a little humiliated, distinctly avoiding looking at the gambler and slipping his arms to wrap instead around his waist.

"I'm not a goddamn stuffed animal."

"Sore, kiddo...? Sorta forgot to warn you."

The Georgian nodded quickly, once, lifting a hand to tip the bill of his cap up slightly. He whimpered it, even quieter than Nick, and the conman felt a little tug of guilt. "Y-yeah. It s'posed tuh hurt?.."
Nick chewed on that for a moment, then gave a shrug, lowering his head so he could scratch at the back of it with his pinky and ring finger. "Under better circumstances, no. Spit doesn't do much."

Ellis whined a little, pushing his weight off his rump with a wince, bending himself oddly. He braced his hands on the floor to lift up a little, slumping on the sturdy muscles of his shoulders. "Man.. I'm gonna have tuh walk 'n shit."

The gambler smirked again, leaning in to get hands under Ellis' arms. He hoisted upward, intent on pulling Ellis to sit back down on the couch. "Up, Overalls... just rest a minute. And let me know if you start regretting it."

Ellis turned a startled glance up toward his face, quickly grabbing Nick's elbows and pushing his heels against the carpet to help. "U-uh.. I didn't mean it like that." Nick's knowing, dark look of humor shut him up, and the moment he settled down on the couch his expression screwed up in discomfort.

"G-gaahh, man, that don't help none -!"

Nick rolled his eyes, standing up and reaching up a hand to push at the side of Ellis' head with his palm. He toppled the Georgian to his side like a bowling pin, landing with a soft 'oomf' on the leather cushions. "Like that, dipshit."

"Hey, you ain't the one in pain. Be nice." Ellis chirped back defensively, grinning a little as he lifted his head slightly from the couch and adjusted his cap. At least his humor's intact. Goody-goody.

Nick rolled his eyes, turning away and buttoning together the middle of his suit jacket. "I'm in a different kind of pain, kiddo. It's called dealing-with-you pain."

Ellis curled an arm underneath his head and settled down a bit against the couch cushions, watching Nick fret his clothing into order. "Yuh ain't a barrel'uv laughs either, man." Ellis teased.

The conman snorted a little, relaxing his arms to a loose cross over his stomach. "Ha-ha.. Shush. I'm going to go check on the other two so we can get moving. Try not to complain too much, will ya..? I don't have a good excuse for you."

Ellis scratched at his cap, grinning a little and closing his eyes. "Alright. See 'bout food, too.. I'm starvin' fit tuh kill."

Nick rolled his eyes again, shooting a dull look over at Ellis and stepping toward the bedroom door with a small grumble. "It'll be shit again.." The gambler opened the door with a slight caution, leaning in to scan the small, dark excuse for a bedroom.

Rochelle was sprawled out under a blanket on the floor, her legs gently crossed under the fabric and her arms settled in a drape over her waist. Coach took up most of the bed, settled on his stomach. At first Nick thought him asleep - and he prepared his mocking 'so much for keeping watch' speech - but the door opening made Coach's head lift.

The gambler didn't acknowledge him, just stepped in and halted by Rochelle's feet, nudging her calf with the toe of his dress shoe until she stirred. "Hey."

Her weight lazily shifted, stretching her spine up off the ground and giving a yawn. Brown eyes flickered open, wandering a moment before they latched onto Nick. A smile flashed over her features, making him raise a brow, and she sat up carefully.
"Oh, hey, Nick." He swore there was something coy in how she said it, and it made his brow twitch suspiciously. He never liked that tone, not from anyone. "What time is it..?"

Nick snorted, jostling up an arm and glancing at his bare wrist. "I dunno. Let me check my watch." He turned around, raising his hand so it sat between his eyes and the squat window inlaid into the wall, barely spilling the dark gold of the swampy morning. "Just about exactly morningish."

Rochelle rolled her eyes from where she sat, stretching her arms over her head before she started to push her blanket off and stand. She rather dryly prodded him as she reached to find her boots and slide them onto socked feet. "You're cranky.. wake up on the wrong side of the couch this morning?"

Nick stiffened up, hackles rising as the phrase struck him. That couldn't have been a coincidence - as much as he desperately wanted it to be. Tightening his jaw, Nick turned around, gaze turning scathing as his heart skipped a few beats.

But she wasn't even looking at him, tightening the straps of her boots with delicate tugs. Her expression was settled in this half-entertained smile. Nick hadn't inhaled a breath to snap at her before Coach interrupted gruffly.

"Cut the boy a break, babygirl... I ain't in a good mood either." He slowly started pushing himself up, chuckling a little as he rolled toward the edge of the bed. "Mornin', Nick."

Nick gave a monotone grunt as a response, eyeing Rochelle and her smile with a sense of restlessness. What if she'd seen them sleeping - that ridiculous spooning he'd somehow initiated in the middle of the night? How could he deal with them finding out?

Rochelle stood up with another yawn, stepping over to the edge of the bed. "How're you doing, Coach? You seemed pretty okay by the time I fell asleep."

"Fine, babygirl." Coach affirmed, sitting up on the edge of the bed and reaching a hand over his shoulder to touch onto his back. "Ain't hurtin' no mo', jus' a little stiff."

She gently leaned around him, looking over his back and tenderly peeling his shirt up to look at his bandages. "We should probably head out as soon as we can. I don't want to push you too hard, but we're so off-track, you know?"

Nick crossed his arms tightly, feeling a frown entrenching on his features. Rochelle's normality eased some of his worry, but he still felt... awkward. A little angry. He sighed weightily, rolling from heel to heel. "We'll walk slow. If we're going through goddamn marshes, we're going to want to stick close to each other, anyway."

Coach snorted a bit, bending to pick up their backpack from the ground just beside the bed. He pulled it into his lap, minding not to bump Rochelle as she worried over his back, and dug into the main pocket. "Crazy man mentioned a dock, didn't he? Maybe we'll be a'ight."

"As if." Rochelle teased with a laugh, settling his shirt back down with a small sigh. Her brows fretted into a small knot as she stepped back, crossing her arms. "Looks pretty good. Those things are vicious, huh.."

"Bit.." the big man agreed a bit wearily, giving up his digging in the backpack as he pulled out a plastic-wrapped cinnamon roll. "Here." He tossed one toward Nick, barely glancing over as the conman caught it with a slight crinkle of his nose.
Nick tucked it into a pocket, the plastic crinkling under his fingers, then held his hand up again.

"Something for Overalls, too."

As Coach obliged, tossing a second one over, Rochelle moved to sit next to him on the edge of the bed. "You and Ellis should look around for some weapons we can keep with us. We're going to be out of bullets pretty soon... there's got to be tools around here or something." Rochelle offered up, simply, taking one of the packages from Coach and starting to tear it open. "We'll check around in here to see if there's anything useful."

Nick sighed slightly, grating his teeth together subtly. He shrugged, backing up a few steps toward the door. "Fine, fine... but hurry up."

They didn't argue as he left, shutting the door behind himself, and he turned around to face Ellis. He tossed the bun unceremoniously at the kid, hitting him in the shoulder and startling a "Nnghn whu-" out of him before he shifted enough from his slight doze to comprehend.

Digging it out from behind himself, Ellis flashed the conman an oblivious smile. "Oh.. thanks, Nick.." He bit onto a corner, twisting his head to tear into the plastic and happily peel it away from the pastry.

Nick shrugged, raking fingers through his hair. He felt rushed, wanting to get out of the trailer and alone. The idea of being found out fucking Ellis was bad enough - but then having to be around those people constantly, the knowledge floating around like some kind of contagion? He'd rather have shot himself.

"Sure." He shoved his hands into the pockets of his slacks and turned to cross the cramped trailer, irately chewing his lower lip, only to hear Ellis' chirruped voice call after him.

"Where yuh goin', Nick? Ain't ya gonna eat somethin'?"

Nick didn't even look back, glancing upward as a plea to somebody to let him get away successfully as he carefully enunciated, "I'm going to go take a look around for some weapons. Hick's gotta have something dangerous lying around."

There was a pause where Nick thought he could slip away. Unfortunately, he'd just gotten a hand on the doorknob when he heard the leather couch creaking as Ellis shifted to get up. "You shouldn't go on yer own, 'specially if yer gonna be pokin' around that guy's stuff."

Nick half-turned, scowling, as he watched Ellis flinch his way up to his feet. He shoved his cinnamon bun between his teeth, the heavily processed pastry dangling from his lips, and gingerly stepped across the trailer toward Nick.

"I can handle it fine, and it's not like you're loads of help right now." Nick scathingly pointed out, feeling his fingers clutch and relax slowly. He was trying excruciatingly hard not to lash out, knowing full well the kid would just get sulky again.

Ellis shook his head dismissively, freeing the bun from the clench of his teeth with one hand and chewing on the little nibble he'd torn off accidentally. "Naw, I just gotta walk it out, is all. Company's good, anyhow."

"I don't want company." Nick growled stubbornly, feeling his irritation mounting.

"Sure yuh do." was Ellis' cheerful retort, catching up and gesturing Nick to continue through the doorway with a shrug of his shoulders.

"Overalls," the gambler snapped, leaning toward him to growl quieter, startling the mechanic a little. There went not lashing out. "I said no. Go sit the fuck d-"

The bedroom door across the trailer opened up, Coach trudging out with a little creak of the mobile home as he moved across it. He glanced up at the two men by the door, deepset eyes uninterested and a brow rising quizzically.

Nick opened the door, grabbed Ellis' sleeve, and shoved him down the stairs all in the same motion. He didn't look back as he followed after, growling quietly to himself and slamming the door slightly. The gambler stood with a tight scowl as Ellis caught his balance and gingerly winced, turning toward him.

"Jeez, Nick.. whut's up with you today..?" The Georgian had a slight scrunch to his brows, uncertain and edging into frustration. He tore a piece of his breakfast roll off, popping it into his mouth with a slight noise of appreciation.

The conman rolled his shoulders in their sockets, giving a sigh. Some of the immediate hurry dissipated with being out of the trailer, but having Ellis there hadn't been his preference. "Bad mood."

Nick turned away from him, scanning the dusty-gold morning and the foggy clearing around them. A broken-down truck, wheels long gone and chassis overtaken by creeping weeds, and a small shack against the treeline seemed the best options for hunting weapons.

He stiffened when he felt a hand touch his elbow, gripping his sleeve. He looked over his shoulder, slowly, to find Ellis frowning at him. That pretty face was drawn with enough concern to overwhelm his discomfort, gaze hesitant. "Nick, did I screw somethin' up..?"

Nick could've groaned, trapped under that look. He shifted his weight, feeling a strangled sense of frustration and sighing at it. "You.. didn't. Look, we can both agree neither of us wants Ro' and Coach finding out about last night, right?"

The mention of it made Ellis blink, hand releasing Nick's sleeve as he took a half-step back and turned a little red. He scratched at the back of his neck bashfully, swallowing slowly. "Uh...

"Yeah, no. So I'm on edge... I don't want to deal with that bullshit, not one goddamn bit, and you acting clingy isn't helping."

Ellis kept scratching, slower, focusing his gaze on his breakfast roll as he tried to stifle his embarrassment. "I just didn't want you walkin' around alone, Nick - I ain't tryin' tuh cause you trouble."

Nick dug his hands deeper into his pockets, inhaling through his nostrils slowly. "Just watch it, Ace. If they find out... that's not what I want to be dealing with while I fight for my life through a swamp."

Ellis nodded, carefully, and reached up to adjust his cap. "Sorry, Nick.." He bit his tongue momentarily, then glanced up out from under the bill of his cap and risked; ".. you asked me if I regretted it.. You don't, do yuh?"

That made Nick smirk suddenly, even if there was some exasperation there. The conman, confident with the door being shut behind them, leaned forward to grab Ellis' jaw and tip his face up. He licked a fleck of cinnamon from the kid's lower lip, startling him into a gasp.
"Dipshit." he informed him simply, releasing him with a small push just to make him stumble.

It was .. a non-answer. He couldn't say he regretted it, but the question didn't sit well with him, either. He couldn't very well say 'no, not at all, in fact I needed it pretty badly' as was the truth, but he didn't want to say yes, either.

How could he manage to reassure the kid without encouraging the very clinginess that was making him so anxious? There was no good answer, and it was all complicated further by the fact that he was starting to like the younger man's company.

So he didn't really say anything.

Nick saw the little pained wince as Ellis re-caught his balance, pressing his wrist to his mouth in a quick motion to wipe his lips clean, and shook his head. "I told you to stay lying down. It's going to be miserable enough dealing with your whining the whole way, without you making it worse."

Ellis brushed his clothes flat with his palms, lifting his chin a little with something like defiance. There was a smile in his eyes, kept low. "I ain't gonna whine; Coach was walkin' with his back cut up 'n' he didn't say a damn thing."

Nick snorted, reaching up to rake his fingers through his hair again. "We'll see."

The conman felt Ellis walking close at his elbow as he turned to walk toward the shack he'd seen. It looked like it might be a toolshed - they could only hope. "So we're lookin' fer weapons?" Ellis prompted, past his chewing on another mouthful of cinnamon roll, cocking his cap up on his head with a nudge of his wrist.

"'Nail planks'n'shit', yeah." the gambler mocked lowly, quoting the mechanic's words back at him. Ellis laughed, clearly catching on, and he rolled his eyes. "We're so close to being out of ammo, this might be our last chance to find some good stuff. And hell, if anyone can find something dangerous in a shed, it's you, right?"

"Heh." Ellis scratched at the back of his head, squinting one eye. He stepped around Nick, limping a little to trudge up to the shed and peer at it before trying the rickety-looking door to see if it was locked.

The dingy wood swung open with a small unpleasant noise of crunching hinges, spilling light in on the shelves and boxes inside. Ellis was just about to make a comment, releasing the door handle, when something in the hinges suddenly snapped outright and the door came tipping over like an over-sized domino.

"Mother Mary!" Ellis yelped, tossing up his hands to catch it and doing an odd shuffle backwards as the weight was a little too much to hold up at first. Nick broke into a laugh at the sight, a brow cocked and expression trapped in a smirk, but he did step forward and grip onto the edge of the door to help lower it to the ground as Ellis crawled out from under it.

"And that's why I make you go first." he taunted dryly as they both straightened, turning his hands over in suspicion of splinters.

Ellis stuck his tongue out with a shake of his head, straightening his cap and sighing in disappointment as he realized he'd dropped the last few bites of his roll in the scuffle. "I was gonna say them hinges didn't sound good... dammit."

Nick snorted, curling his fingers in his lapels and gesturing at the shed. "Anything in there?" he prompted, encouraging Ellis to check it out in his place. He could see the spiderwebs from there.
Ellis 'hmm'ed, stepping over the fallen door with those heavy workboots tromping loudly. He ducked into the shed and started to dig through the shelves curiously.

"Few things." Nick could hear the clanging of metal against metal as Ellis poked around, not quite successful in doing it quietly. He wasn't too worried considering their distance from the first trailer. "There's a shovel in here... couple saws - that'd be pretty damn messy, heh.. Oooh, an axe!"

He wasn't sure he liked the excitement in that last exclamation. Sighing a bit and pinching a brow, Nick rolled his neck. He noticed that the Georgian had himself bent at a weird angle to lean into the shed, and it left his rear in plain view. It wasn't a bad distraction. "Shovel sounds good, and the axe. Else?"

Nick had to jump when a shovel suddenly tossed itself out of the shed and landed by his foot, startling a "Sh- Ellis! That nearly hit me!" out of him.

"U-uh, sorry! I thought you were payin' attention!" Ellis did sound chagrined, leaning back to squint over his shoulder to make sure it really had been 'nearly.'

Nick grunted irately, bending down to somewhat unpleasantly grab hold of the shovel's grip and heft it, finding it a little lighter than he'd expected. The metal shaft must've been hollow. "Just pass the axe back, will you? I like my limbs where they are."

Ellis nodded in quick obedience, fighting a laugh and pinching his lips together, before he bent in again to work the axe out of wherever it was. He held it back out behind himself, waiting for Nick to drop the shovel and take it from him.

Ellis dug back in once his hands were free, something falling over and clattering softly. "Umm, rake ain't much use.. hedgeclippers?"

Nick curled his lips in disgust at the concept, rolling his eyes and swinging the axe loosely. The effort behind meticulously snipping off zombie limbs was not a pleasant thought. "Should see if there's something in the truck. Wrench or something."

"Yeah, I don't see nothin' else real useful in here fer zombie killin'.." Ellis agreed, voice muffled as he leaned in to dig into a box. "Yuh wanna go look?"

Nick shrugged a little bit, moodily straightening his jacket and tossing the axe up to rest against his shoulder as he moved to walk toward the broken down truck. "If that guy shoots us for messing with his stuff, I'm ducking behind you..."

Ellis laughed after him, audibly. "He has a shotgun, man. It'd go right through both'uv us."

Cringling his nose heavily, Nick shook his head. "Sick." He smirked a little anyway, somewhat unhappily pushing through higher grass as he waded up toward the broken down truck. "If that guy shoots us for messing with his stuff, I'm ducking behind you..."

Ellis laughed after him, audibly. "He has a shotgun, man. It'd go right through both'uv us."

Digging through screwdrivers and hammers of various sizes in the unorganized container, he was at first disappointed to find mostly small tools and nails. It took getting down pretty close to the bottom for him to see the slim edge of something long - drawing it out, he was pleased to find himself wielding the wicked coil of a crowbar.

He hefted it, leaning back out of the truck and stepping away. The quirked tip was sharp and the whole thing sturdy steel, and he was rather content with it. "Hey, kiddo. Look what I f-"
He stopped, blinking, as he turned his head to find Ellis standing a few feet from the shed, mouth caught open in awe. Clutched in his hands was the rusty red shape of a chainsaw, serrated teeth jutting out along the blade.

"Ohh maah gaaawd.." he heard from afar, like the kid had just found Jesus.

Nick quickly palmed over his forehead, exasperated, and tucked his crowbar underneath his belt to let the hooked tip catch on it. He jogged back toward the other man, gesturing at the machinery with a look of disbelief. "I leave you alone for five seconds and you find a fucking chainsaw?!"

Ellis held it up in awe, grinning hugely. "Look, man! It's gaaawrgeous! Aw, you CAN'T say this ain't awesome!"

The conman put his hands to his hips, forcing out a sigh. "I'm saying it. This ain't awesome. This ain't awesome at all. You'll have to carry that thing, and it'll just be more of a burden than anything else."

Ellis wasn't daunted in the slightest, lovingly inspecting the chainsaw's handle and mouth, wielding the thing with far too much enthusiasm. "I can carry it fine! It's AMAZIN', man! Killin' zombies with a chainsaw! That's like a dream come true! Man, I can't wait tuh brag tuh Keith about this!"

The trailer door (theirs, fortunately) opened with a small creak, and Coach trundled down the stairs with a hand up to rub at his forehead. He spotted the two after a moment, but stayed near the trailer, leaning up against it with a brow lifting. He called out, "What you two arguin' 'bout? Any luck?"

Nick gestured to Ellis in disbelief, calling back exasperatedly. "The dipshit wants to take a chainsaw with us, like it's not a heavy, loud, near useless piece of junk. Talk some sense into him, please, Coach?"

The big man looked between the two (Ellis still enthralled with the chainsaw) dubiously for a moment, then broke into a weighty chuckle and shrugged a shoulder. "Let 'im take it if he wants to. Can always drop it if we need."

Nick stared him down, certain the man was just agreeing with Ellis to be contrary, and gave a frustrated pinch of his nose as Ellis whooped cheerily and darted back toward the shed to dig inside and - Nick could only guess - find a strap for the thing to lash it to his back.

The conman just shook his head and walked moodily toward the trailer, stopping to pick up the shovel and axe in either hand. "We found a few things - y'know, other than a fucking chainsaw..."

Coach chuckled again as Nick walked up. His general sense of weariness still lingered, like he'd seen all this before and was just repeating the motions, but he looked considerably improved. "Mm-hm. Babygirl found something too."

Nick lifted a brow, holding the shovel out in offering. Coach accepted it, inspecting it a moment before just lowering it by his waist. "Yeah?"

The trailer door swung open again, and Rochelle stepped out with a cast-iron frying pan balanced on her shoulder. Nick looked at her with one of the dullest stares he'd managed all morning. She flashed him a bit of a grin. "Hey, worked for Frank West..."

The conman just shook his head in disbelief, rubbing at his face in exasperation. "Chainsaw, shovel, crowbar, and frying pan. That's just wonderful. We're a real superhero team now."
Rochelle hopped down the stairs laughing, patting his shoulder with her free hand and leaning out to wave over at Ellis. "We're not quite out of bullets yet; you'll have a little more time with your precious machine gun... Ellis, sweetie, are you about done?"

The kid tramped up to his feet proudly, so excited he'd apparently forgotten about his sore rump (for the moment at least), and hoisted up the chainsaw to throw his arm through his makeshift strap, a tied-up piece of leather that looked like he'd torn it off something. The strap was tight, holding the chainsaw firmly to his back, and he loped back toward them joyously.

"This is so cool, Ro'!"

Rochelle giggled a bit, shaking her head, and reached up to tickle his cheek when he got close enough. "Take that axe from Nick, honey. That thing's gas-run, yeah? Won't be any more reliable than our truck."

He obediently turned around and held out a hand to Nick, grinning. Nick gave him an unimpressed shake of his head, sighing, as he handed the hick the axe and crossed his arms, glad to be rid of the weight.

"Okay, folks." Coach gruffly interrupted, straightening up and adjusting the backpack slung over his arm. "'Nough time wastin'. We got places to be 'n marshes to cross - y'all ready?"

"Yeah, yeah, just hold on." Nick grumbled moodily, turning to jog back to the 'porch' at the rear of the trailer. He found himself smirking as he picked up his machine gun, throwing its strap over a shoulder, and Ellis' shotgun, carrying it with. His gaze lingered on the table, amusement and an odd sense of warmth trickling down his spine.

It may have been stupid - but worth it.

Nick returned to the group, tossing Ellis his shotgun and swiftly starting across the clearing. The others followed his cue, and they aimed themselves back toward the river they'd been following before.

"Least it ain't rainin' no more." Coach pointed out with rare, blatant optimism, swinging his shovel idly to loosen up his shoulders as they walked.

Ellis laughed gently, walking in Nick's footsteps with his free hand up to grip onto his chainsaw's strap, swinging his weight a bit gleefully. He was utterly tickled with himself, and it didn't seem much could dampen his joy. "I thought the rain was nice. Cleansin' 'n whutnot."

"You'd be the one to find a silver lining in being trapped in a goddamn rainstorm.. I for one, did not fuckin' enjoy getting soaked."

Rochelle rolled her eyes slightly and glanced down at her boots with some kind of inward humor as Ellis retorted, grin widening. "Least it didn't happen while we were really IN the swamp! Yuh'd really be mad then. Get all muddy."

The conman narrowed his gaze a little. He couldn't even smirk at that, shivering at the mere suggestion. "Madder than I'll be at going through a swamp at all?"

Ellis was just about to start considering that when, as the four tromped past it, the redneck's trailer door suddenly swung open a few inches. It gave a horrendous screech as it did, like it had rusted just overnight.

"HEY!" the old man hissed loudly, and Nick stiffened up, going for his machinegun reflexively.
Rochelle jolted to grab his arm and stop him, giving him a 'don't' look. She very gingerly turned to peer toward the door and the two, gleaming steel eyes inspecting them from afar.

"Sir, we just took a few of your things. We need them pretty badly.. if you want something in return, we-"

"They're crazy. ALL of 'em."

There was an awkward silence after the eerie, paranoid little snarl she got in response. The four traded glances delicately, Nick making a very concerted effort not to say a word, considering how much the old man had made it clear he hated him.

"...What do you mean?" Rochelle prompted with the gentlest tone she could manage, nervous.

"They'll kill ya… They don't care. They want you dead." Nick felt weirdly nervous after the man's muttering... he swore those steel, fierce eyes were pointed directly at him - but the words weren't threatening. They were warning.

Ellis adjusted his cap carefully, squinting slightly, and frowned a bit. "They're zombies, man... we been fightin' 'em, we'll be alright.. you just keep safe in here, huh, man? We-"

The man suddenly swept the door all the way open, shouting furiously as he leaned out, his wiry torso trembling with the effort. "Git outta here!" The trailer door slammed shut violently, and something clicked, leaving only silence as the man locked himself in.

Rochelle slowly glanced between the other three, nervously scratching the back of her head.

"...anyone else want to go?"

They didn't even nod, just all slowly moved to continue out of the clearing, maybe a little faster after that.

Nothing could dampen Ellis' determination. He was bursting with energy, like the weight of the chainsaw lashed to his back lightened him, and he confidently slogged forward at the head of the group as what had been fairly flat ground began to melt into soggy, dipping marshes. The fog thickened, making it harder to see and disguising puddles that he tramped through without a care.

He trooped through the pain that every step sent stabbing up his spine, thinking it'd get easier if he just pushed through it - and it did, a little, as his adrenaline peaked and numbed some of it.

The zombies had started appearing in the misty swamps the moment they left the redneck's clearing. Ellis knew he still had a stash of bullets for his shotgun in the pockets of his coveralls, but he let the thing stay strapped to his shoulder and stuck underneath the bulk of his chainsaw, using his axe instead.

The four scrambled through a patch of thick shrubs, on alert. It was hard to see the infected before they attacked, the mist obscuring their slumped and sometimes sitting forms within bramble and emaciated trees, and it lent a very claustrophobic sense to their surroundings. It took a lot of effort to keep track of where they were, following parallel to the river as it dipped and curled.

The air was humid and unpleasant, making them all huff, and Nick scowled as a mosquito smacked straight into his cheek. He wiped it off with a grunt, jogging swiftly just behind Coach and Rochelle. Ellis swore the conman's gaze kept slanting up toward him.

Ellis grinned, feeling that little jump of his heartbeat he'd started to experience under the survey of those green eyes, and looked forward again to watch his steps over the musky ground.

It made him move a little faster, determined not to give into the pain threatening up his spine with each step. Looking weak in front of Nick was a secondary concern only to this loyal sense that he had a responsibility now to keep what was between them - whatever that was - secret. Nick's stress that morning had solidified that much in his head; he wasn't about to give into the pain and make it worse.

"I told y'all this was just like them zombie movies!" Ellis called breathlessly over his shoulder, grinning, oblivious as usual. "Can't believe we're in a swamp! If them zombies don't get us, the blood farmers will, man.."

"Doesn't the comedic relief always die early on in movies?" Nick shot back, grunting as he ignored the latter part of Ellis' comment. He was keeping surprisingly close to the group compared to his usual tendency to hang back, Ellis noticed - he cracked a bit of a smile at the observation.

'He's warming up' was nicer to think than just 'he doesn't want to get lost in the swamp,' even if Ellis knew better.

Rochelle snorted as she high-stepped it over a particularly deep-looking puddle in the grass with a small hand from the ever-watchful Coach. "Erm.. Blood farmers, sweetie?"

"Yeah, Ro'. That crazy guy back there was just the start. We ain't hit real swamp country yet! They eat people 'n shit out here."
He heard Coach snort behind him, the big man sounding a little disbelieving. He was using his shovel as idle support, like a walking stick, the sharp-edged scoop digging into the ground with every other step. "Son, you ain't right in the head."

Ellis shook his head, turning about on the thick heels of his workboots to walk backwards and illustrate the words pointedly with the head of his axe. "Naaww, man! Muh buddy Keith met some once! See, he was tryin' tuh -"

His story cut itself off at a sharp "Overalls, look out!" from Nick. The Georgian twisted around with a slightly burdened wobble under the load of his chainsaw coupled with the rigidity of his pained lower body, startled to see - nothing.

He scrunched his brows slightly, turning his head a bit to squint in either direction into the marshy surroundings, wielding his axe with flexing fingers. Ellis gave in as Rochelle started to laugh, rotating his head and pushing out his lower lip in a confused expression at the conman.

Nick was smirking for the first time in a half hour, swinging his crowbar in idle circles with an expertly turning wrist. "Keep focused on the whole 'walking' thing or you will get jumped, Ay-lus."

Ellis felt a warmth dart over the bridge of his nose as he realized he was being made fun of, refacing forward with a quick tightening of his fingers on his axe. "I-I was payin' attention! Just warnin' y'all..."

The Southern drawl Nick mocked him with was a strange mix of hilarious and embarrassing, and there was an intensity behind it that made Ellis' face heat up. He felt like there was something past the bluster of the insult, like it might've been affectionate at the source.

He felt that often.

"This swamp is creeping me out." Rochelle admitted in a low tone, adjusting her grip on her skillet. "I hope you guys are sure about this whole thing... I still think we might've been better off turning around."

Nick scoffed, shaking his head solidly as he avoided some knee-high brambles, grousing wordlessly under his breath. "Toward what, Ro'? You think it would've gotten better going backwards?"

She shrugged her shoulders, glancing back at him with a small frown. "I didn't argue, did I? I just can't help but wonder if we're making a mistake... what if they had more evacs set up and we went the wrong way?"

Coach sighed lightly, shaking his head and speaking up before the visibly riled Nick could retort. "We had to make a choice, baby girl." The conman just glanced off to the side, unbothered to be pushed out of the argument.

Ellis grinned a little as his boots sloshed through a puddle, something distinctly squishing underfoot, glancing over his shoulder again and piping up optimistically. "We'll make it fine, Ro! 'N we're goin' tuh the beach. Ain't that neat?"

She smiled at him, laughing with a shake of her head as she lifted up a hand to wipe over her forehead. A heavy sigh passed her lips, gesturing her frying pan around to their surroundings. "Ellis, you are crazy ... how can you think about the beach right now? I think I'm growing moss in my lungs."
He chuckled a bit, hearing a snarl a few feet to the side and turning to face it, axe going up defensively. His voice kept a ramble even as he hacked clumsily at the onrushing zombie, catching it right in the shoulder and nearly lopping off a good portion of its neck. His breath huffed a little around his words, the pain stinging along his pelvis making it a little hard to start back walking after the zombie was dead.

"It ain't that hard. I ever tell y'all 'bout the time muh buddy Keith stuck himself in a freezer fer like an hour? He spent the whole time thinkin' of fires'n'shit tuh try and warm up. 'Pparently it really helped! ... 'course, now that I'm thinkin' 'bout it, that might'uh been the hy-po-thermia.. man, cold burns over ninety five percent of his body. Would'uv lost fingers iff'n he hadn't'uh curled up around his hands!"

"You're both total nutcases." Nick muttered as he smacked a branch away from his face, unpleasantly cringing his brows as the slimy feel of waterlogged wood clung to his skin. Ellis was startled by the next phrase - sure, the conman had humored him last night when they were alone, feeding into his stories and honestly listening.. but he hadn't expected it to continue.

"Why the hell was he even in a freezer?"

Ellis felt his face light up, adjusting his cap carefully and raising his voice with a hitch of laughter, grinning. "He wanted tuh figure out if he could live in Alaska. It was one'uh them - uh - trial runs."

Rochelle released a loud laugh, almost startled, shaking her head in disbelief.

Coach grunted a bit, scruffled features drawing into a slight grin even as he pushed forward into the swamp. His bum knee gave him some difficulty on the rough terrain, but the eldest was never one to give in to difficulty. "Gotta give him credit... he's darin'."

"That's a.. nice way to put it." Nick snorted slightly, making Ellis laugh.

He stepped up to a fallen log crossing over their path, gingerly climbing over it with a wince stifled into his shoulder. It honestly did hurt, and having to bend up to clamber over it knocked the wind out of him.

He stumbled getting off, and he thought Nick noticed. He felt that little prickle of awareness as a gaze locked onto him, but there wasn't time to get questioned. As his boots settled down in the sagging ground on the other side, a strained "uurrhbbh" groaned a few feet to the side.

Ellis quickly moved to get his footing, bracing himself with one hand on the log and the other lifting his axe up.

Stumbling out from the enshrouding mist around them was the bloated, almost bubbly shape of a zombie Ellis immediately recognized from the inside of the van he'd cracked open in Savannah. It staggered through the water on wobbly legs, stubby arms swinging to keep up momentum, the putrid skin of its frame stretched over billowing lard.

"Awwh, gross!" he complained with a slight edge of giddiness, backing up and straightening his cap as the thing moaned with a burp and seemed to eye him, its already questionable gait slowed by the swamp it was mired in. "It's that thing again, Nick.."

He was quickly joined by the other three, vaulting over the log, Coach only with some difficulty. Less, Ellis swore, than he had. "Egh.." the conman muttered with a crinkled nose, looking ill as he inspected the thing's unhurried staggering. "Someone want to shoot it?"

Rochelle started to pull out her pistol from the holster at her hip, brows lifting as she moved to aim at it. She found herself laughing just a little, hesitating. "You don't want to give it a little hug, Nick?"

The conman rolled his eyes, firmly asserting as he took a few steps back, "No way I am getting near that fat-ass... no offense, Coach.."

The big man started to turn his head toward Nick, expression scrunching into a look of dry unamusement. "Boy, watch yo'se-

That was precisely when the zombie decided to vomit, whole body shuddering with the effort to throw forward its head and spray over what must've been feet of distance. All four of them shouted out in one horrified sound, and they scattered to try and get away from the fluid.

"Oh, fucking tits!" was Nick's utterly disgusted outburst as he got his feet under himself and desperately checked himself for splatter. He looked about ready to burst something, flushing with agitation. "Of all the goddamn zombies -!"

Coach shook a chunky mess off his arm, looking sickened before glancing up to see that the zombie had disappeared into the mists when they'd jumped away. He took in a heavy breath and shook his head, disgusted at the stench. "That is so damn nasty..."

"Oooh, why didn't we shoot faster.." Rochelle whined a little, shaking her hands squeamishly even though they'd all pretty much escaped the vomit - or the worst of it, at least. "I don't even remember CEDA talking about a puke zombie."

Ellis chuckled, pulling at his shirt to shake off a bit of blowback that had struck the fabric, wrinkling his nose at the steaming green mess that was splattered on the grass and the smell it was letting off. "At least we're already gross, huh?..."

"Getting puked on by a goddamn zombie is not my idea of a good time... what the fuck kind of defense is that?!!" Nick fumed, fanning his face to try and flush some of the stench from his still-bruised nose. He backed away from the vomit-stained ground, growling, "Goddamnit.. let's just.. keep going."

He halted to the suddenly piercing sound of approaching shrieks, rising up in a directionless echo that seemed to come from all sides - or maybe it did.

"Uhh.." Ellis started, tensing up as he lifted his head to look around. The sound was quickly growing louder, reverberating off each other above their heads like conflicting waves meeting in frothing crashes. "That kind..?"

"Shit." Rochelle cursed loudly, grabbing tight to her frying pan in one hand and her pistol in the other. She set off at a sprint, vaulting this way and that to make it over the uneven, marshy ground. "Run!"

Ellis could tell right off the bat it was a bad idea - the pain of running that hard rose up in gnawing, straining flickers, faster than the adrenaline could. His vision threatened to blur, forcing him to focus on the colors and shapes of the other three and chase after them.

The horde came like a flood of hungry wolves, sprinting out from the mist and skidding to sprint in their footsteps. Ellis knew he was lagging behind, whimpering as he forced himself to turn, hacking behind himself with the axe. He felt it connect with something with a squelch, quickly returning his focus to not tripping.

"Is runnin' really a good choice?!!" Coach shouted, voice gruff and severe, the collision of his shovel with a zombie's body audible as it crushed bones.

"I'm sure as fuck not stopping!" was Nick's yelled response. "There's too fucking many!" Ellis tried to work up the breath to say something - but he didn't have any, this numbness settling in under the pain the work was putting into his body. His eyes were tearing up, weight flinging into each step just to manage.

A hand clawed at his shoulder, stumbling him, and he barely swiped his axe back in time to split the hunting arm from its body before its sharp fingers dug in. For the first time he regretted dragging the chainsaw with - it made everything harder, and the weight of it was jamming into the dip of his lower back and grinding in the pain.

His workboots sailed over puddles and rocks, catching here and there and threatening repeatedly to trip him up as the discomfort left him breathless.

When something grabbed hold of his shirt, clawing into the flesh of his back and tugging, he just collapsed forward into the ground, hitting hands and knees hard. The zombie bowled over him, scratching for his face, but the bulk of his chainsaw kept it almost at arms' length.

Ellis tried to shake it off, pushing with his shoulders, but all that did was make it claw harder. Another one joined it with a thud that nearly prostrated him, and Ellis felt like he was going to be dogpiled and devoured within moments.

White suddenly flashed into his field of vision, so startling and abrupt he thought he was passing out... but no, it was that warmly familiar, dirty white that made up Nick's slacks, sprinting closer and just barely skidding to a halt before him.

Something cracked overhead as metal crowbar met flesh, the weight of the zombies trying to climb on top of him suddenly flinging off and blood dusting his cheek from the impact. Nick straightened from the swinging of his crowbar, dropping down quickly to a crouch.

Ellis' whole spine spasmed painfully as he dropped to a hunched sit and his weight collapsed onto his rump. He tried to push against the ground and stand up, but his body was too numb, adrenaline exhausted.

Nick's face materialized in front of his, leaning, with a fierce scowl and intensely focused gaze. "Fuck, Ellis!" It was half a question and half a statement, and Ellis was suddenly aware of the tears streaming down his cheeks. He tried to choke something out, but Nick was already leaning over him, dragging the chainsaw off of his back with oddly gentle yanks.

The moment it was free and in his hands, the conman stood up, stepping over Ellis with one leg to stand with the younger man's curled form straddled by his calves. Ellis tried to move again, feeling his wet face heat up and throat close with humiliation as he shook his head to try and clear the tears from his eyes. A sharp "Stay!" from Nick made him freeze, twisting his head in time to see Nick yank the ripchord with a growl.

The chainsaw roared to life in his hands, chugging audibly on gasoline, blade just spinning up as the first wave of zombies hit them.

Nick braced it against a cocked hip, shoving the spinning teeth to catch the attacking bodies that vaulted toward them before they made it. The spray was awful, gore and separated limbs going every which way as the blade mowed through flesh and bone.

The conman laughed slightly, sounding practically bewildered - like he couldn't believe what he was doing - as his arms vibrated to the violent roaring of the saw. He hacked it in a half-circle to hold back a pressing wave, cringing under the splatter of blood.

They came in throes, knocked aside just as quickly. They didn't seem to have any kind of survival instinct, carelessly running at him, life extinguished instantly as the chainsaw hacked through vitals.

He chucked the thing away when the horde died out. The chainsaw's roar turned into a splattering squelch as it buried into the wet ground, spinning a little and digging down further before stalling into silence.

Nick crouched back down in front of Ellis, sighing harshly as his gaze ticked over the kid's expression, reading the pain in more places than just the tears. "Okay, you win, the chainsaw was a good idea."

Ellis gave a little hiccupped chuckle, glancing up through wet lashes and breaking into a frown soon after as he tried to push up to standing again, faltering with a tremble. Humiliation burned on his cheeks, and he shook his head. "I can't..."

"I know." Nick interrupted, brows twisting into a scowl as he heard Rochelle and Coach start to get themselves together and retrace their steps toward them. "It's my fault." He gave a deep inhale, frustrated, and moved.

Ellis found his throat closing up as Nick turned around in his crouch, reaching back his arms in offer. The gesture was clear; Nick was going to carry him on his back. "Nick.." Ellis barely managed, unsure and protesting, but the conman berated him quietly.

"Just get up, Overalls, and don't ... say anything. We have to go. Now. I'll come up with something."

Ellis carefully crawled forward, feeling his face heat up fiercely as he gripped onto Nick's shoulders tightly and curled against his back. He didn't want to, but he wasn't confident he could walk just then.

Nick gripped under Ellis' knees to brace him and pull his thighs against his waist, shoving up to stand with a firm grunt. The motion startled Ellis into jolting his arms around the conman's neck, hands clutching onto his own elbows, and he hid his face under the shadow of his cap.

"What happened? Ellis sweetie, are you okay?" Rochelle was immediately concerned, footsteps hurrying to rush back toward them, but Nick had already started walking and he didn't stop even as she reached him.

Nick's voice was terse when he responded, still supporting Ellis' knees with cupped hands. "He's fine. The dipshit took too much with him. Tripped and hurt himself. That horde nearly had him - go get his axe, Ro'."

Rochelle nodded, too visibly worried to mock the conman for his care just then. She ran back to find Ellis' abandoned axe, leaving Coach to eye the two with some disbelief. "Guess you were right, Nick." he admitted, pulling his gaze away to glance around them gaugingly.

Ellis felt his frown worsen, embarrassed, and he lifted his head a little from Nick's shoulder. Half of him tried to keep in mind the chainsaw hadn't actually been the problem - Nick's admission echoing a little in his head - but he felt the guilt anyway. "M sorry, guys..."

Nick's gaze flicked to the corner of his eyes, narrowing vaguely before he merely shook his head.
The conman didn't seem troubled by the younger man's weight, but weighing him down was just another reason for Ellis to feel guilty.

He started to continue, squirming his weight, "I just dunno if I can -"

"Will you shut up, Overalls...?" Nick practically demanded, gritting his teeth. Ellis heard it in his voice as much as he felt it in the tension of his back: frustration, but not at him. "Christ."

"Better listen, son, if you're really hurtin'." Coach agreed, wearily turning to start moving when Rochelle caught back up, the two flanking Nick on either side as the conman trudged carefully forward. "Piss him off 'n' you're walkin'."

Rochelle sympathetically reached up to rub Ellis' shoulder, casting him a gentle smile sideways. "You'll be okay, honey. That really was a little much to sprint with."

Ellis wanted just a little to defend himself, but he merely nodded his head, tightening his arms around Nick's neck. Even like that, he hurt, but he simply bit his lower lip to stifle it. It was better, however stinging.

He felt embarrassed, humiliated, but when Nick's fingers squeezed onto his knees in a silent gesture - he felt a little better.

It started to drizzle again as they kept walking through the swamp, puddles swelling up and grass turning to almost mush underfoot. Nick immediately snarled a long series of complaints that continued on as they walked.

It took Ellis a while to realize it was never specifically about having to carry him through it.

"Keith broke both his legs once... 'cept I didn't have tuh carry him or nothin' - he had tuh be like, in bed, fer weeks, 'cause the hospital was all smart on him 'n wouldn't give him no wheelchair. See, last one they gave him, he hooked it up tuh these fireworks tuh try'n make a rocket chair... damn thing caught on fire, 'n then his pants were burnin' too, 'n his cast - man, that shit was funny. Well, it wasn't real funny when he was tryin' tuh roll around with this huge cast on, like a beached whale on fire or somethin' - but when he put it out, it got funny again."

Nick's skin tingled with every word warmly ghosted against the shell of his ear. He swore he must've been deluded, but something about the Southern tone rambling on was pleasant. It lulled him through the sputtering rain and unpleasant stench of the swamp, like the humming the kid had done in the back of the truck they used to have.

Like white noise while trying to fall asleep.

Ellis spoke lowly, aware of how close his mouth was to Nick's ear, but almost thoughtlessly. His voice had a sweet hint of amusement to it, absent-minded. Coach had tried a few times to get the kid to hush, but especially with neither Nick nor Rochelle backing him up, Ellis would just start up again a few moments later.

"Hell, they didn't even give him crutches or nothin'. Didn't even think they could do that."

Rochelle laughed gently, stepping over a puddle and shaking her head. She was using her frying pan like an umbrella from the spastic rain only barely making it through the tight swamp canopy overhead. Ellis' axe was hooked in the back of her belt, his shotgun tossed over a shoulder by the strap. "Poor guy. He doesn't seem like he'd take bed rest very well."

Ellis shook his head, grinning just a bit and flexing his fingers slightly, turning his wrists to grip onto Nick's lapels. "He was sooo antsy, man... I tried tuh cheer him up, though."

"I'd love bed rest right now." Nick said simply, adjusting his grip on the hick's knees for the twentieth time. He was starting to get sore carrying Ellis, and his arms had long since gone fairly numb, needles crawling up his biceps when he moved them.

Not that he said a word - he still couldn't believe how much pain the guy had been in, and it knotted something strange in his gut. He should've been more careful. It wasn't like he hadn't known - he just hadn't thought. And he'd wanted it so bad.

Leave it to you to ruin the kid's first time, Nicolas, you idiot.

A sigh passed his lips, noticing that Ellis' arms had tightened around his neck again, those fit biceps hot against his neck. He shot a critical look sideways at the Georgian but said nothing, glad to notice Rochelle and Coach weren't focusing much on them.

He let his footsteps slow to put some distance between them, focusing on picking his way over the ground and sliding in line with Coach to let the bigger man plow a path through encroaching bramble.

"How're you doing, Fireball?" he uttered quietly once he'd lagged enough to feel comfortable, turning his head to eye the mechanic's expression as Ellis cocked his head onto the conman's shoulder.
Ellis fumbled slightly, rapidly turning embarrassed, unable to hide under the bill of his cap from Nick's level gaze. "Uh... you don't gotta keep carryin' me, man."

Nick snorted slightly, glancing forward and squinting into the swamp carefully. "Not what I asked, dipshit." That quieted the kid, and Ellis only hesitantly adjusted his grip on the conman's neck, biting onto his lower lip. "...I'll take that as a 'still hurts.' You're kinda light, y'know, kiddo." Nick chuckled sardonically, a smirk settling onto his lips.

Ellis' brow scrunched up defensively, shaking his head quickly and nearly clocking Nick in the side of the face with his capbill. "Nuh-uh!"

"Yeah-huh."

"That's just mean, Nick..."

The conman broke into a dark chuckle, enjoying the huff of embarrassed breath against his ear. There was something ... very comfortable in Ellis' closeness. His body hummed lightly in appreciation of the warm press against his back. Any sense of their respective filth was numbed by the resigned awareness that they were both equally dirty and it probably wasn't going to change anytime soon.

"Hey.." Ellis gently prompted, turning his head again and actually hitting Nick that time. The tip of his cap bill nearly jabbed Nick in the eye, catching his temple, but he was talking before the conman could complain. "Thanks, though, Nick. I mean it."

Those arms tightened around his neck, and Nick smirked despite himself, shrugging his head to push them away with an air of play. "Why?" he returned under his breath. "I'm the one who hurt you in the first place."

Ellis' face lit up, turning slightly down into his bicep in embarrassment. "I sorta pushed you intuh it, though. It wasn't yer .. fault I got hurt, or nothin'.." he bravely challenged, head shaking. "I wanted tuh do it, too.."

_Sure it wasn't, you dumbshit._ Nick exhaled silently, jumping his weight mid-step to stabilize his balance with Ellis' added weight. He spoke in a low tone, a brow cocking and gaze focusing ahead.

"Don't mention it, kiddo... I'm in shape enough to drag your lazy hick ass a little. Not, however, up to saving it again when you screw yourself up worse being a dumbshit. It's this fucking swamp that's going to drive me nuts."

The Georgian grinned slightly, lifting his chin. His voice relaxed slowly, even gaining a bit of a confident taunt to it. "Yeah.. Yer suit ain't lookin' too good, man.."

Nick smirked, turning his head to narrow eyes at the other man's face, dangerously.

"I will drop you."

Both their heads lifted sharply when Coach's voice gruffly barked from ahead. "There's the river, y'all."

They'd gotten slightly disoriented when the horde had struck, and lost sight of the river's edge for some time. The fog, only barely lit by shattered, rain-damp afternoon light, hadn't helped their sense of direction at all.

Nick sped his footsteps up slightly, catching back up to Rochelle and Coach as smoothly as possible without being too obvious about it. Rochelle glanced back at him anyway, and he ignored it with a strong deadpan of faint irritation.

"And look," she prompted, lifting up a hand to point before rubbing her arms in a cold motion. The swamp trees broke open into the bank, morosely spewing fog down onto the surface of the fairly quickly-flowing river, "that guy actually told the truth. I can see a boathouse."

Ellis craned his head around Nick's, excitedly, as the conman pushed lightly around Rochelle to squint down the river with a sigh of relief. The dark shapes and angles of a dock jutting out into the water was topped by those of a building.

"Do we know where we are well enough to get around?" Nick risked somewhat dubiously, falling to light pants as he inspected the opposite shore.

It looked... basically identical to their side.

"Think so." Coach affirmed simply, rubbing the back of his head. "The highway's just a few miles off. 'Bout parallel to the river. We cross, we should hit it pretty quick just walkin' straight through the swamp."

"...Oh my God, it's Christmas - more shit water. Just what I always wanted."

Rochelle - ignoring the conman's gripes - nodded quickly at Coach, exhaling and turning to flash a confident smile. "We save a lot of time crossing the river instead of going all the way around it. We should probably rest and eat there before we cross. Beyond that, though, we're going to have to hope we make it to town, because we didn't bring much more food."

A small groan from Coach made Nick smirk, and he sniped at the bigger man as they all turned carefully to start moving down the riverbank again. "Zombie apocalypse diet not working for you, Coach?"

The big man turned an unamused look toward him, shaking his head. "No man deserves to eat like this. Shit, I was too hurt to enjoy those damn sandwiches we had earlier."

Nick snorted, stepping over a puddle with a slight jump. Ellis spoke in friendly offer at his ear, and Nick felt him start fidgeting against his back. "You can have my part'uh lunch, Coach, if yuh want."

Coach laughed gruffly, shaking his head and adjusting his grip on his shovel. "Nah, son. I'm kiddin' around. You keep yo' lunch. I'll live 'till we find a city an' some real food."

"I'm hungry as shit." Nick complained in a low grumble, frustrated. "Ran out of smokes last night. They would make this whole episode a little less fucking insufferable."

"Yuh shouldn't smoke, Nick." Ellis informed him matter-of-factly, turning his head onto his shoulder and nodding. "It's bad fer yuh! Muh dad passed away smokin' too much. Lung cancer."

Nick's brow cocked, focusing forward. His immediate urge to smack the kid for chiding him was doused by that particular tidbit, and the conman was silent as he chewed on it without being certain of how to react. Ellis certainly didn't seem fazed by it.

Rochelle, on the other hand, immediately cooed, turning around to look back at him as she walked with a frown. "Aw, sweetie... I never knew that, I'm sorry!"

Ellis unwound one arm from Nick's neck, quickly scratching at his cap bashfully. "Naw, Ro', I wasn't even born when it happened. Still had muh mama." He flashed a smile, that idiotic grin, unflappable.

Nick retained his silence.

Rochelle shook her head lightly, palming a tree carefully for balance as she circled around it. A sigh left her lightly as she did so, boots sliding a little on a patch of mud. "Must've been hard, for both of you."

Ellis chuckled, licking his lips cautiously. "Sorta. S'why she spent so much time with Keith's mama 'n' pa, 'cause she needed some help while I was still a li'l guy. But Keith'n'I caused so much trouble, I dunno if she was better off!" He laughed louder, head tipping, a little chagrined.

"You're a good kid, son. 'Course she was." Coach injected, in that gruffly unquestionable tone he had a tendency to speak with. Rochelle nodded in rapt agreement, laughing gently.

Ellis smiled, burying his face against his bicep slightly and looking away with a blush filtering up over the bridge of his scarred nose. That seemed to end it - Nick filed the fact away in the back of his head, only then noticing he never really had mentioned a father.

There was a slight upward slope they had to scale to get to the small boathouse, the fog melting around them and clearing to allow a better view of it and the docks. There were two gas-powered boats hitched up to the dock by rotting rope, rust lacing their sides - Nick gave them a cursory inspection as he forced himself to carry Ellis up the hill, dubious.

"We'll check to see if those boats work.." Rochelle offered as she cocked a hip tiredly. Nick spared her a glance, and it was all the gambler could do not to frown. "You two check that boathouse out and see if there's anything in there."

Am I crazy, or does she keep putting us together all of a sudden? … No, I'm just being paranoid. The conman didn't question her, though, merely nodding and shrugging his grip on Ellis' knees a little sturdier. "River's pretty fast. Don't know if we can paddle them over, if the engines don't work."

Coach shrugged at that, sighing a bit wearily. "We'll see." he gruffed simply, stepping past them and leading the way toward the dock, Rochelle moving forward after him.

Nick exhaled simply, walking toward the slightly run-down building with an interested gaze. Ellis held tight to his neck, looking around, adjusting his cap with a carefully lifted shoulder. "We ain't doin' too bad, eh, Nick? 'Specially considerin' the whole bridge-blown-up thing!"

The gambler snorted a bit, stepping up to the building's door and rolling back his weight onto his heels. "Careful, kiddo, I'd keep from saying too many things like that... karma, I told you before.." He gently pushed on the hick's knees, letting him down slowly.

Ellis cautiously climbed down from Nick's back, a slight flush darting over the bridge of his nose. He very gingerly settled onto his feet, standing with a slight wariness and delicacy. He flashed a smile when Nick cocked a brow at him. "'M fine."

Nodding simply, Nick turned back to the door and tried the handle. A displeased noise left him when it failed to turn, the door refusing to budge. He gave it a few extra yanks, aware of Ellis' gaze on him, then snapped a simple, "Goddamn door."

A hand swiped his crowbar from its safe holster under his belt, twirling the thing once before jamming its end between the door and the threshold. He smirked over his shoulder at Ellis. "Told you this would be handy."

The kid grinned and scratched at his head through his cap, watching a little curiously as Nick thrust his weight into the crowbar, cracking the door open with a loud snap as the doorjam that was holding it shut broke easily.

It nearly broke its hinges, too, and Nick reflexively darted a little to the side, clearly expecting it to collapse atop him just like the shed had done to Ellis. It simply sagged to one side, though, retaining its place in the threshold.

Ellis burst into a loud guffaw, covering his mouth with a wrist to try and stifle it. "Karma." he teased sweetly.

Nick's eyes rolled, darting a severe glare at him even as his mouth twitched into a smirk. "Smartass." he grunted, shoving the Georgian's cap down on his face before stepping through the door, ignoring the startled laughter he left in his wake.

It turned out to be more a shack than a boathouse, though the darkened and cramped space was devoid of any life. There was a dingy cot against one wall, a few shelves stuffed with trinkets, books, and fishing equipment, a single-chair, a lonely table - and, to Nick's extreme pleasure, what looked like an old gas stove in the middle. He strode quickly to it, bending forward to examine the knobs uncomprehendingly.

Nick spoke over his shoulder without looking, examining the coil in the center of the metal stove. There was a propane tank hooked up to the side, and the used his foot to kick it a little, hearing it slosh. It wasn't empty. "This might actually work. Oh Christ, I could really go for a hot meal right now... oh, something hot at ALL.. I do not fucking enjoy this 'roughing it' shit."

He heard Ellis chuckle gently behind him, not paying attention as he found a dial on the back. Twisting it, he could hear the soft hiss of gas escaping, but when he looked for a starter, there was nothing.

"Damnit. I think this is old-fashioned or something.. there's no flame. If I hadn't used up all my matches..."

Admittedly losing some of his enthusiasm under the new obstacle, Nick grunted, reaching out to shut off the gas rather than waste it. He straightened and turned around, scowl starting up - turning straight into Ellis.

The Georgian had tipped his hat far back on his head so the bill stuck up, and Nick's already started half-step settled their faces so close their noses brushed. The conman was startled, quickly settling and narrowing his eyes slightly in examination on Ellis' wide blue ones.

Ellis was red in the face before he'd even turned around, Nick could see it in the light drifting in from the doorway - and the kid didn't step back, just lifted his shoulders a little.

It hadn't been an accident.

Smirking lightly and slowly putting his hands back onto the front edge of the stove without moving his face, Nick lowered his voice to a ghosting whisper. "... you're awful forward for a good little Southern boy."

The word barely finished themselves on his lips before Ellis leaned himself forward, eyes shutting as he nestled his mouth to Nick's and bravely kissed him. The soft and yielding plush of his lips set a strong contrast to the stubble that scraped pleasantly against Nick's skin as the conman let Ellis do it, feeling the anxious shudder of warm breath dust against his cheek as the younger man's air escaped him.

Nick turned his head a few inches after a moment to break the kiss. He hummed simply in expectation and gazed half-lidded toward the doorway.

Ellis spoke up quickly, visibly embarrassed but oddly determined. He took a few steps back and dropped his chin to inspect his feet as he pulled his lips in to lick them. "Thanks fer savin' me back there..."

Nick wanted to smirk and scowl all at once. Ellis was clouding his judgement with those blue eyes and drawled voice - he was like this spot of warmth, and Nick was cold and sore. The intimacy pushed him so out of himself. How long had it been since he'd flirted like this...

And with a man, no less - that outright alarmed him.

"Sure, kiddo." he returned, turning away from him and kneeling in front of the cast-iron stove. He examined it, but didn't really look at it. He just knew he didn't want to look at Ellis, let alone meet his gaze. "It's not the first time."

Ellis smiled, with that warm blush and tipping his head in slight defiance, even where Nick couldn't see it. His tone went cocky, squinting faintly. "'Ey, I saved yers a few times, too..."

Nick stifled a laugh, turning his head to examine his surroundings instead, mulling over how to get a spark on the pilot. "You generally got me in trouble in the first place, too, kiddo." His wandering attention let him catch a sideglance at the younger man.

The smile on Ellis' face was glowing - stupidly pleased. He tugged his cap back into place, bashfully straightening his shirt, and shrugged up a shoulder against his jaw. "Let's see if we can find some way tuh start the stove up, Nick... I'd like somethin' hot, too."

The gambler nodded in agreement, smirking as he stepped away from the stove to kneel down in front of one of the couple shelves and start digging through it. Ellis hovered a little behind him, wary of kneeling or crouching. Every time Nick glanced at him, that stupid smile was still lingering.
Chapter 41

The smell of warming stew that started to encroach over the inside of the shack was one of the most wonderful things Nick had smelled in his entire life. Any other day, he would've looked at the contents - beef and potatoes, he thought, or at least some attempt to mimic them - with nothing but disgust.

That day, however, he couldn't have begun to care.

Not only had they managed to light the stove (Ellis found a metal file, and striking it with his axe had shot enough sparks to do the job) which he stood in front of now, stirring the four simultaneously heating cans of stew one by one with a pen they'd also found rummaging around… but Coach and Rochelle had walked back in with even better news: one of the boats was working.

"I want a shower." Rochelle complained lightly, gently beating her boots against the corner of the open door to try and shake muck free, seated just inside the shack. Coach was relaxing on the cot in the corner, Ellis having found a careful perch on the edge of the table nearby, swinging his boots slowly.

The shack was a little cramped, but they arranged themselves quickly. No one really argued when Nick grabbed the cans from the backpack and started to cut them open somewhat messily with the sharper end of his crowbar. His hunger was visible enough in the determined force of his motions that it seemed smart just to stay back.

"You could go take a dip in the river, Ro'." Ellis suggested cheerily, playing affectionately with his cap and twirling it a bit on a finger. He spun it, over and over, catching it every time it wobbled and nearly fell.

She snorted lightly, shaking her head and putting down her boots in favor of gently rubbing at her socked, wet feet, sighing. ".You're welcome to it, sweetie."

"Even I'm not that desperate." Nick stated simply with a small half-laugh, leaning forward to hover his face over the cans with a hungry sigh as his stomach gave a tense grumble. The ineffective, slow heat of the old stove was only starting to curl up through the tin.

Ellis noticed, resting his cheek against his shoulder and watching the gambler's impatient shifting. "Jeez, Nick. You usually snub yer nose at everythin' we've been eatin'."

"He likes complainin', that's all, son. Finally got too hungry to bother." Coach commented with a chuckle from his relaxed recline on the cot, hands settled on the bulge of his gut.

The kid opened his mouth, looking a little defensive, but Nick spoke first in annoyance and overrode him. He could tell Ellis was going to stand up for him - and that was not something he needed. "I can bitch if you want, Coach. I got plenty in reserve."

The big man cracked an eye open, glancing at him in consideration. After a moment, he chuckled again, settling his eyes back closed. "I take yo' point." Battle avoided, Nick leaned down and dipped a fingertip to the surface to one of the stew cans, popping it into his mouth with an almost lusty eye-roll.

It honestly didn't taste that bad.

"So, Rochelle," the conman prompted without turning around, casually cocking his hip to settle his weight into a slight lean. She looked up at him curiously and a little warily, not completely certain of his intent. Nick didn't make small talk - that was supposed to be Ellis' job. "Been meaning to ask you about something."

Turning around in her sit and resting her back against the threshold of the door, Rochelle pulled her legs into a crossed position and returned to rubbing her feet. Her brows lifted just a bit, interested. "Uhm, okay."

Smirking slightly and turning his head to glance at her over his shoulder, Nick lifted a brow.

"Boyfriend?"

Rochelle immediately lowered her head, more startled than embarrassed, straightening her spine a little and lifting hands to adjust her hairtie. "Jeez, suit... I didn't even really think you'd paid any attention when I mentioned it before."

"I pay attention when women turn me down. Ego."

Ellis perked up curiously, unable to stifle himself - though Coach didn't even open his eyes. It obviously wasn't news to him, Nick noted. "Oah, you got a boyfriend, Ro'? Man, how come yuh never mentioned that none?"

She laughed gently and shrugged, gaze softening on her knees. "It's not really a good time to be thinking about that kind of stuff, sweetie. I don't even know if he's... okay. Although I'd like to think if I can make it, he could too."

The mechanic seemed to think on that, head gently lowering to scratch at his head in consideration. He responded in somewhat chagrined apology. "I guess I don't got nobody tuh be real worried about. Whut with Keith gettin' my mama 'n' himself tuh the evac. Y'all do."

Rochelle waved him off quickly, shaking her head with a smile. "I'm glad you don't, sweetie. Don't feel bad, okay? We have other things to be thinking about."

Deciding the soup was hot enough, Nick circled a hand over a can with either one and picked them up somewhat carefully. The bottoms were hot, so he held them tenderly by the very top rim, avoiding cutting himself on the ragged opening. He turned on a heel, stepping over to lean down next to Rochelle and offer it down in front of her face.

"Not right now we don't." he pointed out, smirking.

She rolled her eyes gently and took the can from him, sniffing at it with a small smile before her gaze moved back up. "Do you actually care, or are you just trying to bother me?"

"Bother you? When have I ever done that?" Not even bothering to mask his smirk, Nick hoisted up a shoulder and turned to start walking over toward the reclined Coach, offering out the other stew can. Ellis had gotten up behind him and gone to get his own, rather quiet. "I'm a goddamn saint."

The big man accepted the can with a gruff nod, though no words passed between them. He sat slightly up, adjusting on the creaking cot, and resigned to sipping from the stew can with a fairly morose expression. Nick rolled his eyes silently, annoyed, but merely turned away to sit himself on the table's edge that Ellis had abandoned.

"Alright, alright." Rochelle acquiesced with a shake of her head, laughing faintly and turning herself to relax more against the threshold of the door. Ellis trodded back across the shack with his can. When he saw Nick had taken his spot, he squinted a little - to which Nick didn't do more than raise a brow in challenge.

Ellis relented, though, hitching up his coveralls carefully and scooching down against the wall to sit right next to Rochelle.

"His name is Jacob. We've dated on and off since college."

Hungrily taking a large swallow straight from his can, a little disoriented by the thick and vaguely tinny broth, Nick boredly watched her from a distance. He only fractionally paid attention, more interested in sipping without slicing his lips on the rim.

"On'n off?" Ellis prompted, far more curious. Blue eyes blinked raply at Rochelle underneath his cap, blindly taking a swig from his can and swiping his mouth with a wrist as he chewed obliviously.

Rochelle lifted her shoulders in a gentle motion as she flexed her toes in their bootless freedom. She seemed slightly conflicted, some kind of dilemma reading in the depths of her tone. "I, um.. I struggled a lot with getting a job and trying to make my way into a news station. I had to put it before him a lot."

Nick snorted slightly, chewing on a small piece of chewy beef and eyeing the can as he judged it at least edible. He sniped sarcastically, "Ooh, jealous house-husband. The drama."

Glancing at him like she might throw one of her boots, Rochelle rolled her eyes. "He wasn't 'jealous'... I did put him second a lot. Missed dates, long nights... he never really got used to it, and it frustrated him sometimes."

"Yer still together, though, right? Yuh must like each other a whole lot." Ellis - stupidly optimistic as always - pointed out, grinning goofily under his cap. Rochelle couldn't help but laugh at him, charmed all over again, reaching out to gently poke the tip of his nose.

"Mhm. He's a really sweet guy. Sorta serious, unlike you, but he stands up for me. Plus, he's got a cute butt."

Nick interrupted with a mocking grate to his voice, entertained, the warmth spreading through his core making him feel inexpressibly better. He forgot how good it felt to eat a cooked meal, even if this barely qualified. "How's Jakey-boy feel about you rushing away to say hello to the nice zombies all alone?"

Rochelle began to sigh slightly, expression raw with the nerve Nick struck so unerringly well. Ellis squinted at her, head tilting, and she let a hand set on his knee. "Not too good... and he just thought it was a flu. He didn't want me to go at all, but.. the opportunity was just too good, at the time. I thought it was gonna be my big break. Sure wish he'd tied me down or something."

"He's gotta be worried sick thinkin' about'ch'ya!" Ellis scratched at his head, scrunching up his nose in a bothered look.

She started to frown gently, pushing it away with an exhale. "Aren't we all.." She flashed him a smile instead, rubbing the knee under her palm and leaning back to take a long sip. "You have any girlfriends, sweetie?"

Ellis almost immediately laughed, Nick fighting a smirk as he muffled it against his can. The conman noticed those blue eyes darting toward him but shying away from actually meeting gazes. He looked nervous.
The concept Ellis thought he'd care was a little.. disarming, but Nick dismissed it as best he could.

"Um.. a few, but nothin' too big."

A blush settled across the bridge of his nose, gently embarrassed. He scratched it with a fingertip. "Muh buddy Keith was always real big on tryin' tuh get me datin', so he'd set me up. Never turned out good."

Rochelle's smile turned to a little bit of a grin, leaning in teasingly. "Blind dates? Got plenty of those from my old girlfriends. Cute boy like you, I'm shocked they let you go."

Quietly, swirling his stew can with a sated lick of his lips, Nick quipped, "He must have picky cousins."

Coach snorted in disapproval from the cot, a gruff sound. The gambler didn't even bother to look, smirking as Ellis' blush darkened and he quickly uttered in his own defense, "That ain't even cool, man.. I just didn't like it much, that's all... wanted tuh meet a girl on muh own, y'know? Fall in love or - or somethin'."

Nick glanced away. His smirk remained, but something dissatisfied settled in the back of his head. He couldn't quite pick it apart, and he didn't try too hard, settling for annoyance. The words came out rather critical. "Hrmpf. The dream of every prepubescent girl."

It made Ellis duck his head, hiding under the bill of his cap.

Rochelle cocked a brow in his direction, disapprovingly, shaking her head. "Be nice, suit. It's sweet, you jackass."

She turned to pat Ellis' knee gently, affectionately reassuring the youngest of them; "Ignore him, sweetheart. He's just a cranky old bat."

"S'okay, Ro'." Ellis flashed her a smile underneath his cap, confidently. She blinked, getting the distinct feeling she'd missed something - Ellis had this knowing look on his face, embarrassed but unbothered. It made her smile back, hesitantly.

Rochelle cocked a brow in his direction, disapprovingly, shaking her head. "Be nice, suit. It's sweet, you jackass." She turned to pat Ellis' knee gently, affectionately reassuring the youngest of them; "Ignore him, sweetheart. He's just a cranky old bat."

Coach grunted wearily as he heard that, rolling his weight to get feet on the ground. He tossed his empty can to the floor, rubbing the back of his bald head carefully. "Mmhm, son. Sounds like a damn good idea 'bout now."

"Restless, Coach?" Nick muttered somewhat abrasively, setting down his can and sliding to his feet. "Figured you'd be the one to vote we rest longer, old man."

Oddly, all the ex-football player did was chuckle. The lack of reciprocation made Nick drop to a simmer, silent as they somewhat reluctantly gathered together their weapons from where they'd laid them around the shack.

Rochelle spoke up as she spun her frying pan in a hand, watching Ellis affectionately shrug his shotgun onto a shoulder, checking the gun over. He seemed well enough. "I'm a little worried about this whole boat thing. Have any of you actually worked one before?"

Coach and Ellis both nodded in unison. It made her relax, her eyes rolling slightly in relief. "Oh, good. I thought we were just jumping on it and jabbing at buttons."

"That sounds exactly like us." Nick muttered sardonically, sighing slightly as he spun his crowbar like a cane just at his hip, stepping out of the shack and stretching. The canopy ended just above them, pleasantly letting sunlight in from the late afternoon sky and dripping heat down on an otherwise cold landscape. The fog had melted somewhat, though it still clung to the river's surface.
here and there.

"Har har." Ellis retorted as he rested his axe on his shoulder, tromping close after the conman. The kid almost excitedly started toward the docks, not waiting for Rochelle and Coach to get out. Nick eyed him, considering following, but let it be after a moment.

Turning and waiting for them, Nick sarcastically lifted a brow. He spoke as the two filed out of the shack, still toying with his crowbar. He still had the burden of his near-useless submachine gun just as Coach had his shotgun - maybe they'd find more ammo.

"Over the river and through the shithole swamp - or something like that."

"Woods, honey. It's woods." Rochelle sighed a bit, though she was smiling, her head turning when she noticed Ellis was already down at the docks. She jogged down the slope, boots slipping a little on the perpetually soggy ground. Nick and Coach walked after her, and as they gingerly stepped onto the rickety dock built out over the water, it creaked tiny complaints.

Ellis hopped off the edge of the dock with a soft 'hup,' landing with a bit of a wobble in the base of one of the motorboats. It bobbed on the water unsteadily, hitched to the dock by a gritty rope, but he balanced on it as he dropped down to a crouch and inspected the engine.

"I really don't want to get on that." Nick muttered, halting a few feet back from the edge of the dock and staring mistrustfully at the motorboat. Coach snorted as he walked ahead of him, walking close and sighing down at the boat.

"Rather swim?" the big man retorted, glancing as Rochelle stepped carefully off the dock to join Ellis on the boat with a little more hesitancy. She turned back to hold her hands out to him, offering help onto it.

Nick didn't utter a word in response, moodily side-stepping to stare with disdain as Coach made the step to get on the boat. It certainly rocked the boat more than Rochelle or Ellis had - the mechanic gave a little 'whoa' before he caught himself as it wobbled, and he looked terribly chagrined when Coach gave him a dry look.

The conman couldn't drudge up the humor to laugh at the scene, irately examining the boat as it continued to wobble while Coach got seated down on one of the plank seats, looking disgruntled.

"Someone tell me why we're doing this again?"

Rochelle broke into a slight laugh, settling down next to Coach and watching Ellis fiddle with the engine, turning a few knobs and adjusting the throttle. "Good lord, suit, just get in already."

He scowled at her, scoffing a frustrated noise before clenching his fists and jumping the short distance onto the boat. His footing slipped slightly as he landed a little short, heel half landing on the rim of the boat.

Fingers clutched the knee of his slacks - a strong grip, steadying him firmly. Ellis', of course, and when he glanced down, the kid grinned just a little up at him underneath his cap.

Nick smacked him on the top of the head just enough to make him duck slightly away from it, grumbling, "Watch it."

Ellis chuckled quietly to himself, releasing the conman's slacks, and Nick found himself struggling not to go for a second thwap. He resisted the urge, just shaking his head and shoving himself down to sit on the edge of the boat, locking his grip tight on the rim and leaning forward.
"This baby needs a name!" the excitable Southerner chirped, patting the boat's motor and standing up. He jumped back off the boat, crouching down to uncoil the rope from one of the dock posts, grinning a bit at the other three as he held the rope with a waggle. "Whut y'all think?"

Coach was not wholly entertained. His reaction made Ellis squirm just a little, guiltily. "I think you should get'chyo ass back in here an' fire it up is what I think."

"..awwh, Coach, m'just sayin' - baby needs a name if we're gonna be ridin' it!"

The big man sighed, seeing Ellis was stilling with a slight pout out of his lower lip. "Son, we're ditchin' it the moment we get to the other shore. What's it matter?"

Nick interrupted before Ellis could respond, rubbing his forehead with a sigh and leaning down into the boat's bottom. He looked like he was getting a headache, a slightly unsettled scowl on his face. "Oh let the dumbass name it, goddamn...

Rochelle giggled faintly despite herself, crossing her arms with a slight shiver. She prompted, "How about Lucky?"

Ellis slapped his chest pleasantly, tossing the rope free with a smile half-shaded underneath the bill of his cap. "Fits 'bout right! A'ight, Lucky it is. Lucky, thank you fer yer service!" He jumped back onto the boat, pressing and twisting a few switches on the engine and grabbing hold of the ripchord. He yanked hard, flinching a bit as the engine sputtered and then kicked, rutting loudly into life.

"Loud bitch." Nick muttered quietly, lowering down in the boat and eyeing Ellis suspiciously as the mechanic settled down, grabbing hold of the throttle. The boat had already started to drift on the flowing river, threatening to get swept away.

Loud enough to catch attention, and a few straggling zombies floundered into view, scattered up and down the shore. They didn't seem to understand how to reach them, and one or two simply fell into the river.

They never surfaced.

Ellis twisted, easing the boat into a shuddering first few rollicks forward as the engine kicked up a notch. With Ellis turning the throttle carefully, the boat rotated slowly to face the opposite shore. Cranking up the engine and twisting the motor into gear, 'Lucky' broke forward through the river's flow to skate forward with a rumbling rattle of gas.

Smoke drifted out from the rivets of the engine, but Ellis seemed unconcerned. Nick forced himself to ignore it, though it unsettled him plenty, sighing heavily as he shifted somewhat uncomfortably on the edge of the boat.

Water speckled up as the boat skated gently through it, wet droplets hitting Nick's back. He looked over his shoulder, staring irately at the water like he could threaten it into stopping.

"See? Not half bad. Good job, Ellis." Rochelle commented, pleased, turning her head to look toward the other, approaching shore.

"If only Lucky were a yacht." Nick grumbled, earning a laugh from both Rochelle and Ellis.

Ellis tsked, though, grinning gently at Nick. "Careful, man - second strike. Don't go insultin' a lady's honor. S'my job tuh protect it - gentleman 'n' all."
Nick snorted, starting to roll his eyes though a smirk risked at his features. He'd just relaxed his fingers from their whitening grip on the edge of the boat when the aged motor gave a sudden sputter, the whole length of the boat bouncing slightly with the kick.

"Fu-"

His center of balance went completely askew, and before he could scrabble for a grip, he lost his tremulous seat on the edge of the motorboat. The conman went backwards into the river, tipping with a heavy snarl, and though he felt Rochelle grab for his arm, her fingers slipped.

He hit the water with a flat splash, the cold sending a shock up his spine, and the liquid seemed to open up to try and swallow him. He quickly kicked out cloth-swathed limbs in reflex, bobbing straight to tread water, and he heard three voices laughing hysterically over his head.

"Oh mah gawd, that is the funniest shit," he could hear Ellis' stupid voice, cracking with his laughter. "Man - I'm sorry -"

He took a deep gasp as his mouth bobbed above the water - and then he lost a few inches, water swirling up over his face and making him shut his eyes and clamp his jaw shut. The water had no surfaces, no handholds - he couldn't reach the boat, either, fingertips snatching at nothing.

There was a startling clarity to his thought just before the water snapped shut over his face and he sunk, blindly grasping and clawing hands doing nothing at all.

All the things I know how to do, and swimming isn't one of them. My fucking luck.

He could feel himself sinking, no particular sense of how fast or which direction as the muggy water darkened his surroundings. The water suctioned around his ears, silencing all noise but a constant, brutal pulsing against his eardrums.

Every limb hunted for some sense of a solid surface, mind calm as he focused on holding his breath and not daring to let a single gasp threaten his sealed lips. Surely they'd notice - eventually - that he wasn't coming up. He clamped a hand over his nose, feeling like the curling motion made him spin.

Or maybe it didn't. He couldn't even tell, dizziness disorienting everything but the instinct to paddle blindly, not even certain of the direction he was facing - or if it was working.

The sudden grasp of something on his ankle made him seize, feeling a violent drag upward - or he figured upward. He scrabbled toward it, grabbing at his own body to try and push against the weight of the water toward the force.

The grip switched as he got closer, and an arm wrapped around his torso, a body suddenly shoving up against his. There was nothing to be done but grab onto it in return, spitting out a bubbled breath and feeling his chest compress tightly.

He felt legs kicking and the other arm swiping through the water next to him, and the dragging thrust pulled them both up. They hit the surface with a splash, two voices gasping, and Nick wasn't surprised in the slightest to find himself clutching onto Ellis.

The gambler's ears were still full of water, but even as he hacked for air, he could hear voices. They were unintelligible, and he ignored them, blinking his eyes and gripping tightly into Ellis' shirt as the kid dragged him through the water.

They bumped against the boat, and three pairs of hands were suddenly on him, all yanking and gripping, pulling him up into the boat. He felt the rim of the boat jam against his stomach, scrambling at it and rolling unceremoniously into the bottom.

His ears crackled as they drained of water, the voices coming clearer to him as he shoved his elbows against the bottom of the boat and sat up, shaking his head out furiously and touching hands onto his drenched body uselessly. "Christ, are you okay, Nick honey?"

Rochelle dropped down to crouch almost on his knees, bending in and reaching to cup his cheek worriedly. He immediately recoiled, spitting sideways as he tasted something gritty. "Fine!" was all he could really manage before he coughed again, crawling slightly backwards to escape her as he noticed Ellis hauling himself up into the boat.

"Man, I feel so bad!" Ellis was already apologizing, scrambling up over the rim and plopping down with a wet slap, shivering a little. He'd ditched his hat before jumping in after Nick, so his curls draped freely about his ears and forehead, soaked through. "I - didn't.. - You - .. Man! I was laughin'..'"

Nick groaned slightly, sinking down and squeezing his hand over his scalp to try and stop the droplets trying to roll down his features. He didn't even want to listen to it, let alone encourage the conversation. "El.. shut up."

Coach's voice came from behind him - chuckling. "Can't swim, eh, Nick?"

The temptation to turn around and punch him was astounding. He decided against it. Only, as Nick reached to paw at himself, realizing that his submachine gone was gone but his crowbar was still solid in his belt and his Magnum was still strapped to his thigh, the unexpected happened: Rochelle defended him.

"Coach, don't you dare, or I'll throw you over the edge!"

The big man was soundly silenced. Nick was sure it was the water in his brain, but he felt like turning around and sticking out his tongue. Instead he just collapsed, resting against the side of the boat and blearily coughing a few times.

Ellis crouched to where he could reach the throttle, gently pushing the boat to rumble into a forward motion again from its idle. The river had been pushing them downstream with every moment they spent still. He leaned in toward Nick, frowning hugely as he inspected the half-drowned conman. The younger man was just as drenched as Nick was - and they'd just started to dry from the rain, too. "Man, are you okay?"

"There.. aren't any.. goddamn rivers.. in the city." the conman muttered out, defensively. For some ungodly reason, Ellis burst out laughing.

"There.. aren't any.. goddamn rivers.. in the city." the conman muttered out, defensively. For some ungodly reason, Ellis burst out laughing.

Even worse, Nick heard a chuckle spill out of himself in response. He went limp in defeat, and when he rolled his head, he found his forehead resting on Rochelle's bicep. He didn't even fight it, just relaxed there for a few beats.

She stayed still - like someone greeting an unfamiliar, suspicious cat.

"I guess you ended up taking a dip, Nick... how'd you like your shower?.." she questioned gently down to him. All he could do was shake his head, wanting to snap and lacking the will.

'Lucky' bumped the shore of the river with a resounding thud, engine growling as she hit resistance. Had Nick looked up and seen the comforting towers of a cityscape, or even just a regular house - or at that point, anything dry and not green - he might've not whined.

Pulling away from Rochelle's arm to see nothing but more swamp, however, made him give a sharp, "Fuck me."
Nick was blisteringly silent as the four slogged through the new swamplands. These were darker and wetter than the other side of the river - where there had been light foliage, there was now wicked bramble that caught on their clothes and scored irritated lines over exposed skin.

His sarcastic, caustic griping was far better to Ellis than his current unyielding silence. Silent thought froze his expression into a deadpanned look of seething frustration, and though Ellis walked close behind him, the conman paid him absolutely no attention.

He didn't, on the other hand, chase Ellis off.

Ellis took some comfort from that, biting onto his lips in attempts to keep himself quiet as he struggled to figure out what to say. Ellis was sure Nick's fall - and now his foul mood - had been his fault, and he whimpered ever-so-quietly with guilt every few steps, watching the conman intently.

The swamp was miserable, even Ellis had to admit it, upper bodies threatened by the razor-sharp limbs of thickets and lower bodies struggling through ankle-high and deeper muck. Nick's clothes had gotten thoroughly soaked by the drop in the river, but now his already wet slacks were gaining a fast-growing shade of green as they soaked up algae and swamp-water.

Ellis felt a little hitch of hope, watching Nick use his crowbar to push away an arm of bramble. He noticed that he held it a little longer than necessary - without looking back, or even pausing in his steps - so the branch broke and flopped limply instead of snapping back in his wake, potentially to smack in Ellis' face.

It couldn't have been on accident - maybe Nick wasn't mad at him.

So he tried.

"'Ey, Nick... y'know, it don't look like there're any zombies over here. There was some back on the other side, but I ain't seen hide nor hair so far."

The Northerner didn't say a word, pushing forward silently and giving a soft hiss as a bramble caught him in the cheek, drawing a small cut along his cheekbone. He ducked away from it, continuing onward.

Ellis fidgeted his hands a bit on the shaft of his axe, adjusting his weight and using the red metal head of it to push away a branch so he could slip past. He cleared his throat gently, trying again. "Yuh think them blowin' the bridge worked? Maybe we'll have an easy go of it, if they cut 'em off..."

Even throwing in a risky optimistic statement Nick always seemed to bite his head off at - 'karma' and 'tempting fate' and all that - didn't prompt a response. The conman just kept on moving forward, taking little spurts of unvoiced frustration out on brambles that snagged at his clothing.

Less worried and more perturbed now, Ellis scratched at his waist, plucking out a piece of branch that had literally stuck to his shirt as he passed it. He held his breath for a few beats, watching Nick, then felt more words escape him like so much air from a speared balloon.

"... Not that I'd mind zombies or nothin'. I mean, yuh gotta admit, it's cool how good we are. Zombie killin' badasses."
Nothing. Not even a glance.

"I can't wait tuh tell Keith all these stories. He'll be so damn jealous, y'know?"

Silence.

"Cept fer the couple times we been hurt, we've been doin' damn awesome."

He couldn't even rile Nick into responding. Ellis could practically hear his retort - "Yes, Overalls, because nearly getting your spine fucking ripped out or getting crushed into a pile of mush by a truck-throwing zombie is just goddamn awesome." Strange how clearly he could imagine the conman's voice.

And then reminding himself that Nick was still utterly silent made him sigh.

The breath left him loudly and frustrated, though he hadn't meant to do so audibly. It just slipped out, and his gaze dropped to inspect the ground and find his footing a little better.

Getting his head bitten off would've definitely been better than silence. He thought Nick must've been fuming about the dive he'd taken - or embarrassed, even. He wanted to distract the gambler from thinking about it, but he couldn't very well do that if he was getting the cold shoulder.

It was a few steps later, stumbling gently over a stone buried in the ground, that Ellis raised his head again. He nearly tripped over himself when he found Nick's head turned, green eyes absolutely lazered onto his face.

"What?"

The Georgian gawped, brows darting up and weight wobbling as he caught himself. "Uh, what?" he reflexively blurted back, startled. If Nick was annoyed by the repetition, he didn't let on, merely glancing ahead and stepping around a stump in the flooded ground.

"You sighed."

It was flat in its delivery, nothing like the fuming tone Ellis imagined in his head. Nick stated it like he were describing the color of the sky - so matter-of-fact and dull his voice suggested he shouldn't have even had to say it at all. His brow cocked up, expectantly, and Ellis fumbled.

"..uh.. well, yeah. Sorta. Sorry?"

Green eyes rolled slightly, vaguely annoyed. When the conman turned back forward to watch his own advance, Ellis started to deflate a little, thinking he'd be ignored again and he'd lost his chance. Nick talked again, though, a moment later. "And why? Did you get a leak in that airhead of yours or something?"

Furrowing his brows a little, Ellis let out a chuckle, more relieved than offended. "Yuh weren't sayin' anything. I thought you were angry at me again." He hurried his steps slightly, catching up a bit.

Ellis didn't notice when the quickened slosh of his boots splashed the back of Nick's leg with swamp-water, and the conman's shoulders stiffened up. Nick sighed slightly, voice taut but still only superficially annoyed, leaving Ellis still a little bemused by his lack of hostility.

"Since when do you need input from anyone else to talk? Last I checked you were perfectly fine on your own."
The Southerner chuckled again, louder and a little more relaxed this time. He shrugged his shoulders, and pointed out bashfully but with a distinct honesty, "Well, yeah, sure.. when I ain't tryin' tuh get you tuh talk to me.."

Nick glanced back at him, brow cocked, examining him for a lengthy moment as he slogged on. Ellis felt that jump in his pulse at those green eyes and their pierce, aware of a heavy swallow bobbing his head. Turning back before he walked into something, Nick gave a sigh that lilted into a tired half-chuckle at the end.

"Touché."

Biting back a smile, Ellis stomped on a swinging branch before his foot, crushing it into the muck. "So yuh aren't? Mad at me, I mean..

Nick kept his attention forward, voice absent and matter-of-fact. "You didn't make it happen, it just did. I'm soaked and cold, and not all of us have a compulsive desire to talk constantly."

The kid couldn't help but probe, voice gently interested. He felt a little proud that he'd gotten Nick to talk again, even if the conman had up a wall, and he didn't want to let it slip. "...Thinkin' 'bout somethin'?"

Ellis felt a smile flash over his face when Nick responded with an admitting, "Yes." under the loud crashing of Coach breaking through a thick bramble ahead of them with his shovel.

"What?" he risked, almost excitedly.

Nick didn't respond at first, suddenly lost in the effort of gingerly stepping through an area of swampland that threatened, in places, to drop all the way to knee-height. Only dark spots in the muck warned of the sinkholes, and it took focus to edge around them while not, in the same moment, walking facefirst into a branch.

The ground leveled out after a few minutes, the swamp water shallowing. As he relaxed, giving a slightly frustrated shake of his head as he caught a glance of his own state, Nick did give a response.

"Hawaii."

Ellis wasn't sure if he was deflecting or just messing with him, but he didn't argue. Nick didn't want to talk about it, he guessed, and that was okay. Instead, he snorted, adjusting his cap on his head with a wrist. "So long as yuh ain't angry. I was just worried is all."

The conman scoffed faintly, sending a dubious look behind himself and shaking his head. "I'm about as fine as anyone else in a swamp, during the apocalypse, freshly near-drowned. ... Ooohh-fucking-wait...

Ellis couldn't help but laugh, grin lopsided. There was that scathing tone he'd imagined, and oddly, he felt relieved to be at the mocking other end of it. Before he even knew what was happening, their voices started a soft, tumbling back-and-forth. Subtle amusement laced the faux-argument, even in Nick's mocking.

"Ey, I'm wet'n'shit, too."

Ellis could see Nick's eyes roll by the toss of his head. "Oh, please. You practically enjoy being dirty, you redneck."
"I don't enjoy it, I just don't mind."

"Hmpf. You act like there's a difference."

"Yer just too uptight, yuh Northern slick."

Nick outright laughed, pushing away a branch with his forearm as he walked past. This time, he did let it go. It whipped Ellis in the face, but there were no brambles, so it was just a dull smack that made him blink a few times, startled. "I'm not going to apologize for being tidy."

Ellis snorted lightly back at him. "It ain't 'tidy'... it's 'O-C-D.'"

The conman wasn't amused in the slightest, shaking his head. "As if. If I were that bad I'd be hyperventilating in this shithole. It just pisses me off."

"Uh-huh." Ellis dubiously shot back, grinning at the back of Nick's head. "Bet if you got yer hands on a bar of soap right now, you'd try'n make love tuh it."

"Don't be so dirty, Overalls." Nick scathingly chided him, a smirk sneaking into his voice when he tacked on; "I'd marry it first."

Ellis broke into laughter, shaking his head with a disbelieving edge. It almost surprised him that Nick would make a joke like that. He stumbled slightly over a rock hidden under the surface of the muck, catching his balance with a lifted hand and careful step. "Woo-ee, yuh really are crazy, man."

Nick smirked more, shrugging up a shoulder as he touched a fingertip gently onto the slice across his cheek. It came away with a little line of blood, but he just flicked his hand away. "Says the hick who's goddamn enjoying the apocalypse."

Ellis paused for a moment at that, thinking, before his response escaped him in a gentle mumble. He felt a little stupid, bashfully scritching at the back of his neck. "... I'm really only enjoyin' it 'cause I've met y'all. We're like a family or somethin'."

He felt himself shrink a little when Nick laughed sharply, shaking his head. "Aww, just because you met us? How adorable."

Shifting his fingers on the shaft of his axe, Ellis somewhat pointedly responded, "... well, whut're the chances you'd ever'uv lasted this long around me otherwise?"

There was silence for a too-long moment as they trudged forward through the swamp. Ellis felt, at first, a sense of pleasure at winning an argument and shutting the older man up. However - the longer the silence crept on, the more Ellis had to consider his own words.

They were true, weren't they? Without the apocalypse to force them together, Nick probably wouldn't have hung out with Ellis. Let alone become his friend. Let alone … whatever they were now. He wasn't sure if it bothered him or not.

Fate was funny, anyway - there would always be 'what if's.

Ellis might've mused on it awhile, but his head bounced up when the conman hissed out a short, "Overalls, hurry up." He'd lagged behind in his thought. A flickered blush darted over his nose, lowering his cap slightly and hitching his axe onto his shoulder to high-step it to catch up.

All three of them had stopped, watching him jog closer. He screwed his brows up a little in confusion as he looked between Nick, Rochelle, and Coach, surprised they'd halted for him.

Only they hadn't.

Nick was the one to bring it to his attention, gesturing forward without looking directly at him. His tone was scathing, but quietly so. "Good job, Ace. You tempted fate yet again and it bit us in the ass."

Sure enough, the swamp ahead of them was spattered with zombies that hadn't quite yet noticed them. They were black with muck and blood, crawling and struggling around like dogs, snarling and clawing at one another with more hostility than usual.

Rochelle sighed, exhausted as she tossed her frying pan slightly between her hands and wiped sweat off her brow from the muggy swamp air. "... maybe we can go quietly and avoid some of them?" she pointed out hopefully, craning her head to try and get a grip on how many there were.

Nick's sigh spoke for itself, not that the conman could resist a cynical elucidation.

"As. Fuckin'. If."
Crowbar met flesh with a sickening crack, and the snarled recess of the male zombie's eager mouth tore open into a wide gash as its face split in half. Nick swept past the falling corpse, quick to reorient himself as another one flung itself through the muck toward him.

"We'll just sneak past them, she says." Nick growled loudly, catching sight of his three companions fighting out of the corners of his eyes.

The conman had to jump back slightly when the zombie leapt at him, jamming his crowbar straight into its neck as it practically tried to tackle him. They both stumbled, Nick shoving its weight to the side as fast as he could before it landed on him. "Quiet as a mouse, she says."

Jerking his weapon free from the dying thing with a shudder, he returned to slogging forward, jaw tight. "Avoid them, she says."

"Nick, will you hush and keep moving?" Rochelle pleaded, smashing her frying pan into the outstretched arms of an attacking zombie, breaking them both at the elbows. A second hit to the face, when it failed to stop coming, halted it for good.

"Oh, sure," the gambler scoffed harshly, hearing a bloody squelch behind him and glancing back to see Ellis taking the head clean off a nearby infected with his axe. It went flying then landed somewhere in the muck, joined shortly by its body. "If we all just hush, they'll go away. Because they're blind. And stupid. Congratulations, you've uncovered the secret to surviving the apocalypse. Everyone's saved."

Nick never ran out of energy for sarcasm.

They ran in unsteady zig-zags, no longer having the luxury of picking their way through the swamp brush with the slim but constant flow of zombies their presence was attracting. They had to power through it, and it wasn't easy going.

Nick balked in the middle of pushing through a small wall of vines when Rochelle suddenly gave a loud, "SHIT! Augh!" He struggled to turn around, catching himself on a branch and having to jerk against it to just break it off.

The woman's pink shirt made her immediately visible, muck or not. Nick's brow cocked to see her hunched forward, clawing at her face with one hand while blindly swinging her frying pan with the other. Mud was splattered over her face, completely obscuring her vision.

Agilely skittering around her in the mud was a zombie, completely slathered in the stuff until its slick - and seemingly naked - body had a greenish-brown, almost alien quality. Its yellow eyes shone like lamps out of the dripping plane of its flattened face.

All the other three had time to do was shout before it leapt at her, latching onto her shoulder with hands and curling in to snap down jaws on her arm.

Her scream was an awful and pained sound as the thing bit straight into her tricep, and she jerked a step to the side, stumbling through the muck. There was a hoarse shouting from all three of them, leaping toward her to help.

Nick got halfway when she twisted her weight in a violent, mud-blind jerk, slamming her frying pan into the thing's head with a SPANG! that knocked it clear off her upper arm.
It went flying to the ground, landing with a splash in the muck and shrieking a weird, keening growl before suddenly prostrating itself. There was a bubbling squelch as it sunk beneath the surface of what had to be just barely two-foot-deep swampwater, the muck pooling up over its skin, and it disappeared.

Rochelle stumbled to the side, blindly backing away from the subtle bubbling and spilt blood that marked the settling water it had sunk under. Her sloshing footsteps shuddered waves around, and as the other three staggered to stops next to her, the splashes of their passage only made it worse. The disturbance made it hard to see where the creature went.

"Ohhh, fuck.." Rochelle cursed in a groan, nearly dropping her skillet as she tried to wipe her face with that wrist. Her attacked arm stayed limp - the bite was deep, straight into muscle, and blood was already streaking down toward her elbow. "Th-that thing.."

Ellis grabbed her around the waist with one arm, pulling her back more and jamming his axeblade into the ground with a splash of water. He used his hand to help her wipe the mud off her face, Coach and Nick circling them with eyes on the water and a few zombies that had come running at Rochelle's shout.

"Damn thing disappeared!" The big man sounded disbelieving, swiping his shovel through the water testingly after soundly crushing one of the straggling infected with its blade. "Hell's bells.."

Rochelle blinked rapidly as Ellis gingerly wiped her eyes, pulling her face away slightly as her vision cleared, though her eyes still stung furiously. "I'm fine, sweetie.. I'm fine.." She tried to reassure him, turning herself a little against his chest and moving her shoulder a little to blearily get a look at her bite wound.

"It threw mud at me... like it blinded me on purpose. What the hell.."

"We've got to move." Nick stated bluntly, though only after glancing and seeing that the wound was minor. The mudman's disappearance had him nervous, fingers twitching on his crowbar. It wasn't that he didn't see she was injured - but hanging around like sitting ducks for a bite made him antsy.

Ellis shifted uncomfortably on his feet, shaking his head as he gestured to the bruising bite on her arm. The thing had nearly bitten straight through her skin. "She's bleedin', Nick."

Coach, at the same time, started to pull his backpack off his shoulder, reaching for the front pocket. "We'll wrap it quick."

Rocelle started to protest, pulling gently out of Ellis' grip, when Nick's growled voice shut them all down. "We're all bleeding! If we stop everytime one of us gets hurt we'll get shit-all accomplished - this isn't a fucking day hike. We need to keep moving."

She agreed as fast as she could before Coach got angry, nodding her head quickly. "He's right, boys. I'm fine - I'm a woman, not a girl, huh?.. just hand me the pack and I'll wrap it while we walk."

Reluctantly, Coach gave her a stiff nod, adjusting his grip on his shovel and handing the backpack over to her. She tucked her skillet under her good arm, carefully starting to dig through the pack as Nick gestured them on impatiently.

"If yer sure." Ellis agreed gently while he yanked his axe out of the ground, stepping just ahead of her to guide her on as she focused on digging out a bandage roll and wrapping her arm lightly.
Whether they acquiesced to continuing or not, their pace decidedly slowed. Nick didn't seem to have a problem with that, at least, maintaining footsteps that kept him ahead but didn't leave the other three behind, Coach and Ellis sticking close to Rochelle.

"I think it really did that on purpose." she murmured faintly, brows furrowing slightly as she tucked the bandages in on themselves. The bleeding stopped against the gauze, though she held her arm carefully at her side as she packed the roll back up.

Ellis blinked back at her attentively under the bill of his cap, adjusting it momentarily. "What'cha mean, Ro'?'"

The kid's voice did what it always seemed to do; brought a gentle, sisterly smile to her face and made her shake off whatever topic she'd had an instant before. She shook her head subtly and tossed the backpack to Coach. "Nothing, sweetie, forget it... keep an eye on the water, will you? That thing makes me nervous."

Coach hmmphfed quietly, slogging forward with his shovel raised and deepset eyes scanning their surroundings slowly. "Thing disappeared in foot-deep water. You ain't the only one nervous. Hope it gets Nick."

"I'm right fuckin' here." the conman injected from his place only feet away, wielding his crowbar at the sounds of light sloshing ahead that didn't quite match up with their footsteps.

"I know." the big man challenged easily.

Nick rolled his eyes vaguely as he darted around a blocking tree, the thick trunk splattered with moss that dissuaded him from laying a hand on it to balance himself. He nearly stepped right onto the lap of a zombie sitting down on the ground and leaning up against the tree trunk, scraggly and torn clothing tinted green with muck.

It startled him so badly he reflexively slashed his crowbar straight across the thing's face, even after his mind tried to note that the zombie wasn't moving. It flopped limply to the side, neck cracking unenthusiastically as it landed, and a flood of flies swarmed up from the now-uncovered gore that was its back - stripped down to the gleaming white of spine and ribs.

"Jesus..." escaped him, jerking his chin away and forcibly scanning the swamp around them. He cleared his throat slightly, slinging his crowbar vaguely through the air to shake off some blood from the metal. He hoisted it as zombies came springing from the muck further ahead.

He heard footsteps joining him, splashing through the water, and as he slashed at a charging zombie with the curled end of his crowbar, a shovel violently smashed another into the muck beside him. The zombie practically crumpled like a crushed can, and had it not sprinkled him with blood, he'd have found it comical.

"Hoo-eee, them zombies don't got no chance 'gainst us.." Ellis whistled lowly, readying his axe as an infected tried to flank them when they advanced forward through the muck. He took off an arm with a swift swish through the air, but the thing kept coming, snarling as blood gushed down its side from a stumped shoulder.

Rochelle wasn't out of the game, sure enough, because before he could get his axe up again to get a better hit on it as it launched toward him, she smacked it straight on the ear with a SPANG! and it went down like a load of rocks.

Ellis gave her a sideways look of admiration, shaking his head. '"Damn, Ro'. You got my 'pology "fer worryin' bout you, ha-!"

"-ehhehe!"

They all froze up at the intruding cackle. Nick instantly felt his chest tighten, the clammy feel of almost skeletal thighs on the sides of his head all too fresh on his mind.

"Shit." Rochelle quickly cursed, half-spinning as she tried to pinpoint the thing.

Squeaky pants, practically hyperventilating, came in disorienting spurts from all directions. Nick didn't stop walking, forging through the swampwater with a heavy scowl on his features, and the other three followed his lead.

Coach grunted to all of them as he wielded his shovel up, rounded jaw flinching a bit; "Stay close. It gets someone, you get that shit so fast... yo' own head better be spinnin'."

"It can hump someone else's face for once." Nick growled through gritted teeth, shooting a glance as he swore he heard something splash off to his right after a restrained, sobbing hiccup of glee echoed through the swamp. He had - but it was a normal zombie, catching their presence and starting to struggle toward them with a shriek.

Ellis caught that one too, jumping to the side to intercept it before it got to the other three and slamming his axe straight into its chest. He had to kick it off the blade, the zombie struggling as it collapsed to the ground, snapping at the air.

It was underneath the splashing of its flailing limbs that Nick distinctly heard a hacking cough trickling through the foliage. His eyes narrowed slightly, whole spine straightening in alarm. Oh this isn't good.. Rochelle had only enough time to blink at him before an incoherent and gruff bark of a shout startled her out of words.

Whipping around, they saw the considerable bulk of Coach going down fast. He hit the ground with a splash, swinging his shovel wildly in the air as he rolled slightly onto his back, spluttering. The fleshy tongue that was quickly advancing up his leg, twining into the fabric of his pants, went violently taut and started dragging him through the water at an unbelievable pace.

"Tits!" Nick shouted, joined by a "Coach!" from Rochelle, an "Oh mah gawd!" from Ellis, and a suddenly manic fit of laughter from the Jockey still yet hidden. It wouldn't stop, growing louder, absolutely shrieking with agonized hilarity that seemed eerily mocking as all three of them bolted after Coach.

They were losing ground - fast. Within moments, them slowed by the muck and clutter of trees, he was almost yards distanced from them.

The big man grunted in pain as he was slammed over a rock, skidding across the muck effortlessly. He tried to jam his shovel into the ground and stop himself, but all it did was tear the weapon from his fingers. "GET THIS DAMN TONGUE OFF-!" he shouted, enraged even more by the constant chittering glee of the skulking Jockey, only to break off as he saw where the tongue was dragging him.

Nick saw it, too. It was leading him toward - and up - a tree. The probing tip was quickly making its way up the big man's torso, and fast making for his neck. It was going to try and hang him.

That was when Ellis decided to yelp, the sound mixing in with a sudden terrified squeal from the Jockey. Nick heard the thud of weight against weight, and he spun around mid-step, eyes darting narrow.
Ellis was pin-wheeling his arms, losing all momentum as the skeletal creature currently clinging to the back of his head leaned back hard, dragging nails against his jaw to tip his head back.

"Git- GITTIT-! GITTIT OFF ME!" Ellis yelped in a strangled tone past the bony fingers clutching at his mouth, nearly stumbling but just barely catching his balance. He didn't have the balance or the sight to shove the thing off, if he even could. Nick felt an instant of floating indecision.

And then he twisted, skidding in the water, and bolted back towards Ellis with a shouted, "Crush that fuckin' tongue!" at Rochelle.

"Get Ellis!" was her immediate response, their separating instantaneously agreed upon as they broke off to run their separate directions. Nick could still hear the big man's weight splashing around as he tried to slow his passage, but he narrowed his eyes on Ellis as the kid was wheeled to a near-stop.

Suddenly, that Jockey's terrified, whitened eyes lit up with a bloody glee, and its sobbing, lipless mouth snapped grinning teeth shut with a yellow sparkle. Blood spilled down its chin when its warped jaw made its lower teeth jam right into the upper palate of its mouth, and with a strained
'eeeeeee' of absolute bliss, the thing jerked its weight to yank Ellis into movement to the side.

"Gyaah!" the hick burbled, stumbling into an almost jog as he tried desperately to keep upright against the tipping force. The thing shrieked a laugh as it hunched forward over his face, bending its head down toward his, and he felt blood dribble onto his features past the hands it had clamped over his eyes to blind him.

"Overalls!" Nick shouted after him in frustration, catching up but not quite fast enough as the hick picked up speed. "El, just stop moving!"

He watched the mechanic wobble his arms, startled, and with a violent shove, the Georgian tried to stop. Nick felt a chill jump up his spine when the zombie suddenly shoved against his head, twisting and clawing with giggled frustration as he tried to fight it.

The shift of weight sent Ellis falling forward, unable to stop himself, and the Jockey grabbed onto his head, fingers curling against his neck. It violently jumped its weight onto the backs of his falling shoulders, riding him to the ground.

Ellis' head went underneath the maybe foot-deep swamp water, the zombie jamming its weight directly onto the back of his head. He immediately panicked, gooey bubbles exploding around the barely-visible circle of his head as he tried to shout, and his arms struggled up to try and shove at the Jockey's cackling frame.

Nick skidded up with his crowbar already raised like a sword with both hands, tensing up his shoulders and giving a snarled, "You creepy asshole!" just before he went to stab the wicked end of crowbar straight down into the skeletal, fleshy thing's heaving back.

It jumped off Ellis like a flash of lightning.

The conman could hear its laughter rising to an ear-splitting screech, scrambling in the water nearby, as he felt his whole weight behind that crowbar aimed directly to impale Ellis straight into the ground.

Pure reflex and adrenaline suddenly shot his elbows straight, and with a gut-sinking squelch of the crowbar and his knees hitting the water, his weapon stabbed down in the muck bare inches from Ellis' prostrated frame. Nick felt his whole spine go stiff, bile burning hot at the back of his throat as he recoiled his hands from the crowbar.

Jesus fucking ass Christ it nearly made me - Jesus!

Ellis jerked up out of the muck just then, gasping for air with a slack jaw as he spat and hacked swampwater. He shoved to hands and knees, struggling to get his breath as he was clearly disoriented.

Darting his gaze up, Nick saw the hunched and broken-spined creature grinning at him furiously. He locked eyes with it, though its eyes were bloodshot and bulging so far out of its head they were cross-eyed. Barely a beat later, it leapt, aiming straight for his face with a cackle.

It didn't get a foot before Ellis suddenly moved, tearing the crowbar from the ground with a swift yank and hoisting it up into the thing's path. Already in flight, the Jockey landed gut-first into the end of the weapon, crumpling around it. Ellis couldn't hold it up when it gave a scream of genuine pain, and he had to fling the Jockey away with a shove.

It landed back in the water a few feet in front of them, nearly submerged in muck, and started to giggle incessantly as bruises flooded its torso like quick-spreading paint. The pink flesh turned purpled, and it must've snapped its spine like that because it failed to even move beyond the rolling of its head as it tittered away softly.

Ellis slumped a little out of breathlessness, staring at the zombie for a moment before looking over his shoulder at Nick. The conman arranged his features in a stiff expression, clamping his teeth together.

They were both silent for just a beat, just long enough to take a breath. The conman's heart was racing in his chest, lungs burning with the desire to just rest, and he still tasted bile on the back of his tongue.

Twisting his head, Nick averted his gaze from the situation and strained to see through the trees. He could only barely make out slivers of dirty pink and purple, Rochelle and Coach's clothing vaguely visible, and they both were alive and on their feet. Rochelle must have gotten to him in time.

"You okay, Fireball?" Nick indelicately asked, adjusting his weight to push to stand in the muck, disgusted. "It.." He didn't finish the sentence, instead reaching down a hand to offer Ellis help up.

Their hands met with a sudden warmth. It was the only point of warmth in Nick's entire body, those rough and muddy fingers settling into the grip of his. The thought of what the Jockey - so ... intelligently - had nearly tricked him into doing...

Nick let go of Ellis' hand the moment he was steady, gripping at the air with his tingling fingers, and the kid smiled weakly but widely at him. "M alright. Thing done nearly drowned me.. man, that shit - you saved me again, Nick. Ain't never gonna get'cha tuh owe ME nothin', this rate - Shit!"

It struck him, features startling into a half-gasp. "Coach!"

And he was gone, sprinting through the muck like nothing had happened. Like he hadn't just nearly drowned - like Nick hadn't nearly killed him with a crowbar. And like the skeletal creature lying, silent then, hadn't even existed. Everything just flashed to concern for their teammate.

"I fuckin' envy you." Nick muttered under his breath, spitting at the Jockey's corpse before jogging after Ellis. He felt his hands trembling at his sides, fingers shivering till the two of his rings right next to each other clinked a few times.

I need a smoke...
Chapter 44

Slimy yards of coiled tongue was tossed about in what must've been a frantic struggle to get it all undone from Coach's frame, and as Nick stepped up, Rochelle and Ellis were circled around him, fretting and worrying over him.

Nick inspected him carefully from a distance, tightening his grip on his crowbar to keep his hands from shaking. They were all covered in mud and slime, Coach and Ellis the worst of it. They looked so bedraggled at that point, they barely stood out against the zombies.

He offered a light - not kind, but innocuous - "You alright, big man?" as the ex-football player got steady on his feet, hands wiping some of the mud off his face and grimacing.

"Only got a short ways before Ro' broke the tongue." Coach answered simply, landing a hand on Ellis' shoulder in something like reassurance. There were messy, dark lines of bruising skin at the base of his neck where the tongue had started to constrict.

"It was up in the tree - it got away," Rochelle admitted, rubbing her forehead with a wrist tiredly and looking around. "I'm not sure where, but I don't hear it anymore."

"Couldn't care less, long as it ain't here." Coach grumbled roughly under his breath, stepping away from them and looking around carefully. "Just y'all keep an eye out, case it comes back. Ain't lookin' to get dragged off again."

Ellis reached up to gently adjust the hat on his head, worriedly examining everyone from top-to-bottom. The blue cap was as muddy as the rest of him, making Nick's nose crinkle subtly. "So everyone's alright?"

The conman glanced down at his own hands, inspecting his fingers and their white-knuckled grip on his crowbar. Try as he might, he just couldn't shake that image of what damage he could've inflicted on the kid had he not reacted fast enough - death, probably. His body weight would have pushed the crowbar straight through his ribcage.

It was so bracingly different from the carnage of killing zombies - and not just that.. he'd killed a guy before - before the apocalypse. This was different.

He didn't know what was more disturbing: almost killing Ellis, or the fact that the Jockey had intentionally driven him to it.

"Nick?"

He hadn't realized Ellis had been waiting on a response from him. When he looked up he found himself the focus of all three, and it was enough of a shock to knock him clear out of his reverie. Annoyance firmed his expression, and he glared quickly. "What?"

Coach shook his head faintly in distaste, quick to turn away and gesture on into the swamp. "Only good thing 'bout that was it took us forward. Don't think we're off-track much.. I'll admit, I'm turned 'round, but it should be that-a-way."

Ellis wasn't so quick to get distracted, his concern pinpointed toward Nick. He only half turned to look ahead through the trees, raising his hand to rub at the sore places on the back of his head and his shoulders where the Jockey had jammed elbows and knees against him. "You lost yer shovel 'n' I lost muh axe, man.. we gotta find 'em before we go..."
Rochelle nodded in agreement, gently inspecting her bandaged arm and the bitemark-shaped blood stain in the gauze. "Definitely can't leave those.. you guys think we're close to the highway?"

"Should be." was Coach's simple response.

Nick didn't wait more than a few beats before he turned around and started to backtrack, gaze scanning the ground. There was a distinct trough in the ground where Coach had been violently dragged along, and he stuck close to that at a quick pace.

"'Ey, 'ey, Mr. Gamblin' Man, hold yer horses.."

He heard Ellis hurrying up behind him, and he let out a vicious sigh, speeding up his footsteps through the swampwater. "What? Let's just find these fucking weapons.."

"Nick, jeez, slow down - whut's up?"

When Nick didn't answer, the kid made a grab for his sleeve. The conman snapped his arm free and turned at the waist to glance back at him, continuing a few steps even as he responded angrily, "Take your goddamn pick."

Ellis' blue eyes blinked alertly, and Nick realized too late he shouldn't have bared his face. He felt his expression being pierced straight through - it was like he was trying to protect himself from a flame with a chunk of ice.

Rather than say anything, Ellis deliberately stepped around Nick and continued forward along the path they'd torn through the swamp. He merely canted his head toward the older man, silently waiting for an explanation.

The gambler flexed his fingers on the metal of his crowbar, letting out a calming sigh. "You're still not really catching onto the whole, 'Nick's in a bad mood all the time!' thing, are you?"

Ellis hopped over the remnants of a log Coach had likely only narrowly missed, turning his head slightly to squint back at Nick with a good-natured grin that said 'no.' Staring slightly at the Georgian's dirty and lively face, jaw setting, Nick felt his resolve dim.

Oh, it's no big deal, kiddo. Just almost killed you.

"It's .. nothing important. I just really hate those jumper things, and now we're all fucking covered in mud. It smells like a fucking sewer out here. I've never, and never wanted to, see this much green and brown in my life."

"I've been dirtier." the Southerner corrected cheerily, glancing down at the layer of mud that was caked onto pretty much his whole front. "You should'uh seen muh buddy Keith after he tried fightin' a gator. He was tryin' tuh tame it 'n' shit.. - Shovel!"

Ellis suddenly interrupted himself, reaching down to dig into the muck carefully and pry Coach's shovel up. He shook it off, half-turning and squinting past Nick. He wagged it a bit in the air, clearly gesturing their success to Coach and Rochelle.

The conman inspected him in silence, seeing the stupid grin threatening on Ellis' face. It made his brows furrow, feeling like he'd never get used to the persistently good mood Ellis was maintaining. Nick pointed out, "Still need your axe."

Ellis glanced at him, grinning lightly and reaching the shovel out to prod toward Nick's chest. The gambler stepped away from it with a slight flinch, like the muddy handle could actually still make him dirtier. "Yup. Not too far."

Nick shook his head, grumbling quietly, and turned to continue along the swampground. Stepping around a tree, he could already see the handle of the axe sticking out of the muck ahead and lifted an arm to point toward it. "Go fetch, ya damn chihuahua."

"Sure." Ellis agreed, two seconds before he loped past Nick toward the weapon - tossing the shovel at the conman as he did.

Nick caught it out of utter reflex, immediately stiffening at the squishing feel of the mud that covered the thing's handle. He cringed tightly, missing out on his chance to glare at Ellis as the younger man bolted to go get his axe.

Sighing and shifting his grip on it, resigned to his mud-covered misery, Nick turned around and started to backtrack again. He went slowly so Ellis could catch back up. He hooked his crowbar on his belt to free his other hand, turning it palm-up so he could stare at his fingers.

They were still shaking.

Damn it. C'mon, Nicolas, get your head on straight. Taking a deep inhale, Nick let his eyes fall half-closed. It took all his focus, all his attention, but with one smooth exhale... they stilled. He felt the cold pressure in his throat of a bluff -

The kind of bluff he made with a 7-2 off.

"Y'know whut I just noticed?"

Ellis bounced into place next to Nick like he'd teleported, hoisting his muddy axe up onto his shoulder. He grinned sideways, brightly and stupidly, shaking his head even when Nick didn't respond past a small, cool glance.

"There ain't no frogs in this swamp. Man, last time I was in a swamp I was campin' with Keith, 'n we must'uh camped on like a nest or somethin' - well, frogs don't make nests, but y'know what I mean."

Nick let himself sigh a little, cocking a brow sideways at Ellis silently and staring. The Georgian wasn't looking at him anymore, blue eyes gazing forward, but Nick could tell he wasn't oblivious. Shaking his head and looking back forward, he retained his silence for a few moments - noticing that Ellis suddenly did, too.

It didn't matter. They were both fine. Nothing happened. There was no reason to give it another thought.

Then: "You know, it really is shit-all quiet in this place." left him in a quiet hiss as they walked on, gaze darting around a moment before refocusing as Rochelle and Coach came into view ahead, waiting for them expectantly.

Ellis' head bobbed, adjusting his muddy cap with an equally muddy knuckle. "No birds or animals or nothin'... kinda creepy." The mechanic hoisted his axe a bit more, showing it to the other two as they approached.

"Oh, thank God." Rochelle sighed a little, slumping her shoulders and resting her skillet against her hip. "I was worried we'd lost weapons."

Nick chucked the shovel at Coach lightly, the big man catching it with a hard edge to his gaze.
"Try not to get dragged off on us again, eh, Coach?" the conman taunted, a smirk stiffly risking on his features.

The football coach was not impressed in the slightest. He jammed it lightly into the ground, resting his weight on it momentarily, and shook his head. "I didn't see yo' ass helpin' me."

Tension sparked, Nick annoyed to find their careful balance of dislike against necessary cooperation faltering again. He reached down to draw his crowbar, cocking his weight slightly. "No? That probably has something to do with the fact I was helping Fireball over here. Sorry, I forgot your fat ass needs two people to drag it around."

"Nick! Out of line!" Rochelle took the step between her and the conman, threateningly, earning herself a tight glance of those green eyes. "We split up, Coach.. Ellis got jumped by a Jockey. Had to." she added, glancing at the ex-football player and his tightly set jaw. She seemed on the verge of a sigh, exhausted with the two men's arguing.

The big man just shook his head, turning and walking harshly away with his shoes making wide splashes in the muck at his passage. For once, Rochelle didn't chase after him, standing there for a moment before sighing for real.

"Sorry, Ro'." Ellis piped up, chagrined, and she quickly looked over at him.

"For what, sweetie? It's not your fault - and it wouldn't be yours, if you didn't get all bitchy, suit." Her dark eyes gaze Nick a pointed glance, smiling very faintly. She was trying to read him, and he offered nothing but a cocked brow. "He's just tired... we're all tired."

Nick crossed his arms over his chest, breaking into a stiff scowl and shaking his head. "And muddy, and cold, and sore. Boo hoo. I'm not fucking impressed."

He was almost completely sure that Coach could still hear him - and he didn't care. In fact, part of him wanted the big man to wheel around and come back to start a fight. He was practically itching for it.

Rochelle sighed, softly, glancing up at Ellis with the gently conspiratorial smile. He gave her an almost curious look, and looked startled when she suddenly stepped between the two men.

Her frying pan was tucked beneath an arm neatly, and she slipped her left hand into Ellis' and her right hand into Nick's - prying the latter so forcefully out of his crossed position that he didn't have time to argue.

The conman practically gaped right out of his scowl when he realized what had just happened, Rochelle's fingers twining with his till she had a tight grip. Smiling between them, she took a step forward to pull them both into movement. Ellis followed along eagerly, grinning bashfully, but the still-horrified Nick she had to drag.

And she did.

"Come on, boys. Look at the swamp! It's getting shallower as we go. Soon enough we'll be out of here, and we'll find a nice place to sleep tonight so we can rest and get cleaned up."

Ellis leapt full-force into the optimism, drawl sweet as honey as he cooed, "Oah, 'n' we'll get somethin' real tuh eat tonight. Real big dinner, just like before the zombies. And cake! Man... I miss cake."

Nick awkwardly tried to adjust his fingers in Ro's grip as he stopped digging in his heels. He didn't like holding hands - it was childish and stupid and intimate. It didn't even make him feel angry, just uncomfortable. And there was, of course, the fact that their hands were covered in mud, blood, slime, and who knew what else.

"Mhm!" Rochelle cheerfully agreed, brightening even further to see Coach halt ahead and glance back at them, the big man waiting for them to catch up with a stern but calmer expression. "Maybe we'll find one of those cute 'Kiss The Cook' aprons and stick Nick in it."

"Hey!" the conman protested in a monosyllabic, agitated outburst, subtly glancing toward Ellis to see the Georgian swinging Rochelle's gripped hand lightly like a skipping six year old girl. He almost laughed - it was so ridiculous.

He realized, too late, that Rochelle's scheme to make them brighten up had worked, much to his chagrin. He felt awkward and out of place, but not on the verge of explosion like a few moments before.

"Yer the one who claimed the oven back at the boathouse, man.." Ellis laughed, instantly catching on and grinning with a drop of his chin to hide underneath the dirty bill of his cap.

Nick felt tension flicker across his brow, wanting to be annoyed but at the same time too tired. He shook his head, giving a flare of his nostrils as he sighed, trying to pull against Rochelle's grip again. They walked up to and passed Coach, the ex-football player walking behind them.

"See? We're all fine. Right, Coach?"

The big man gave a sigh and then a light grunt of agreement, deepset eyes downcasting as he trudged on. Giving in to Ro', like always.

Nick would've found it funny, had he not been too busy trying to find an angle that would let him escape Rochelle's iron grip on his hand. The third or fourth attempt in, Rochelle finally let their hands go. It probably had more to do with her injury and wanting to let her arm lay slack, but Nick couldn't care less - he snatched his hand away and curled his fingers into a fist quickly, relieved.

The intimacy was unwelcome.

"Hey! Look!" It was Ellis who blurted it suddenly, pointing up through the trees. There was just a beat of silence before the other three caught on, and with a sudden flood of overbearing relief, Nick saw the subtle grey curve of a roadway through the thinning trees ahead.

"Lord Almighty…” Coach swore with a quick palm of his forehead. "Is that shit what I think it is?"

"Sweet Christ I hope so..." Nick practically whispered, raw, gesturing just vaguely before snapping his fingers tight onto his crowbar and bolting forward into a jog, darting over the ground and through creeping trees.

He heard the other three join after him but he didn't look back, determined on that bouncing strip of grey like it was a mirage that might disappear if he so much as blinked.

"Hoo-eee, home stretch, y'all! Are we pumped or what?!" He talked like he was trying to get a crowd excited. The kid always had that sense of firm joy in his voice, though. Unbreakable. Like nothing could ever go wrong.

Rochelle giggled gently to Ellis' excitement, her shaking head audible in her lightly huffing voice as the four ran along with increasing energy. Where they pulled it from, sore and muddy, who knew. They just did.
Nick broke through the treeline with a shudder as the full existence of the highway in front of him settled in, not even sparing a glance around himself. He vaulted the roadside railing with a swift motion, one palm to the top of it pushing his body into a curling leap, and the moment his feet touched down on asphalt he just dropped into a crouch.

His palms settled down on the hot surface, hungrily leeching at the sun-baked warmth. A heavy sigh escaped him, almost groaning, closing his eyes and relaxing for a moment.

Footsteps and shuffling announced the other three clambering over the railing after him, and he was aware of Ellis and Rochelle snickering quietly. He didn't even care, and he basically said so: "I could seriously just kiss all of you right now. I have never in my life been so glad to see a road."

"Jeez, Nick. I thought you were gonna marry soap, not a darn highway." Ellis laughed gently, standing a bit tiredly next to the blissful, crouched gambler.

Nick smirked faintly. He tipped his chin up to absorb the sunlight flickering down from a brazen sun, unburdened by a dank swamp canopy. He didn't enjoy being outside… but just then, he loved the open sky. "What can I say… there's a lot of me to go around."

Rochelle snorted in relieved humor, stretching with her good arm and flinching a little bit as she did. "There's a word for that, honey."

Cracking open an eye, Nick glanced at her, smirking a little wider. He was tempted to make her elaborate, but as he turned his gaze, he noticed something down the road. Maybe half a mile, if that.

It was a cluster of buildings, a little pit stop that had formed along the highway. The unbearable relief it sunk into Nick's brain was far too much when compared to the fairly boring couple blocks of white-washed buildings, decorated with an unlit, gaudily signed fast-food restaurant and a yellow-roofed gas station.

Not even the zombies wandering around as little hazy shapes across the road could ruin the view.

"Well. I don't know about anyone else, but I am staying the night there."

Coach's hand extended into his vision, and Nick followed it up to the eldest survivor's face. The ex-football player wasn't really looking at him, but his expression was almost sedate as he offered the gambler a hand up from the ground.

Nick examined it. He was tempted to reject it, but escaping the swamp was reason enough to celebrate. So he took the help.

Just this once.

There was a static electricity in the air as they cleared their way toward the dull, extinguished spire that had once been a Burgertank sign.

The thing wheedled back and forth on a spindly base, vaguely twitching on dead and loosened gears meant to rotate it in circles. As run-down as it and most of the other buildings in the area looked, the stark contrast against the swamp they'd been mired in for hours made it practically heaven.

Not to mention, securing food was primary on their list, even compared to finding where they'd sleep and get cleaned up that night. The stew had been warming and much appreciated, but it hadn't exactly been filling, and Ellis' suggestion of a big meal struck so many nerves in Nick's brain that he wondered why he'd even gotten excited at their lunch.

The screeching, gurgling noise of a Spitter nearby would have normally made Nick's spine stiffen - some mix of a demented toddler and a drowning cat - but, compared to the Jockey's tear-struck psychosis, it was almost unimpressive.

"Acid thing." Coach warned unnecessarily, punctuated by the very wet noise of his shovel's edge sticking in the torso of a zombie when he struck it. He had to shake it off slightly, grunting as the dying thing tried to claw at him even as dragging itself forward just shoved the blade deeper into its torso.

Nick glanced over his shoulder, green eyes flicking to check that they were all together. A short, "Keep up, Ace." was muttered back to Ellis when he lagged behind a little. The kid's face lit up underneath caked-on mud, speeding up to get in line with the gambler.

"Oh hurray," Rochelle grumbled slightly with a rare cynicism, swinging her frying pan into a zombie's forehead and knocking the thing straight to the ground, her energy faltering as every hit hurt her arm. "Let's all get our faces melted off."

Nick found himself snorting as he jogged on, head shaking, and he retorted sardonically when the flow of zombies had broken and the four of them took the chance to bolt along the road, "But that's my second best feature."

Despite knowing better, the woman cocked a brow at him sideways and questioned, "Second?" Sure enough, Nick took a precious second to raise a brow at her lecherously, his smirk deeply and brazenly suggestive. She groaned at him, fighting a guilty laugh, and slipped behind Coach so she could hold her arm gently.

"Whut?" Ellis questioned, glancing around beneath the bill of his cap, clearly missing the joke. Rochelle shook her head at him quickly, unwilling to explain it and sighing.

"Let's just get in the stupid Burgertank before that Spitter gets a shot in..."

Nick couldn't help but feel slightly mortified that he was really praying that the fast food place was still stocked - maybe being picky was ridiculous in a zombie outbreak, but honestly, he was struggling to forgive his stomach for growling. Add on not having a smoke in a while, and his appetite was revved up.

Which brought up a good point.
"Anyone else a little freaked out that we're still hungry for meat when we've been slicing and dicing countless sick people for a few days now?"

The silence he got in return was answer enough, a mix of 'no' and the begrudging admittance that he was probably right. Normality was questionable anyway - maybe they'd all gone nuts already. They hopped the sidewalk, just two blocks from the Burgertank's parking lot.

The violent slurp that rang out announced the projectile spat suddenly at them - it came so suddenly, splattering just behind them, that Nick couldn't catch precisely where it had come from. He shoved Ellis forward with a palm to the shoulder with the same motion that he leapt forward to get out of the way

As it turned out, the latter wasn't fast enough, because Nick felt a heavy splash against the back of his extended left calf as some of the fluid struck it.

It didn't burn the fabric - just leaked through like water… and then before he knew it, his calf lit up in pain. The stuff burned like his leg was on fire, and an unrestrained shout broke out from his lips as the stuff sizzled audibly. "Ah, tits! S-stupid shit-!"

He was the only one, apparently, because concern instantly swiveled to him as his leg gave a shudder under the bubbling, agonizing sensation, and he stumbled.

"Y'kay, Nick?" Ellis quickly chirped, taking the shaft of his axe to the face of a zombie that bolted out from one of the buildings next to them. He cocked a quick look toward Nick, concerned, brows all furrowed up as he did. The conman didn't respond immediately, struggling instead to not make a sound as his agonized leg twitched wildly in protest.

He managed to keep moving, using the momentum of his stumbling to push himself on as he limped painfully. The acid bit angrily from his knee to his ankle, popping and snapping, every second exponentially increasing the pain. When Nick glimpsed back over his shoulder, he saw that the whole back of his slacks was stained a deep shade of red, like the skin of his calf had just… melted.

"F-fuck." he muttered, disgusted and a little in shock.

As best he could, he ran at an angle, avoiding sharing the injury. This instinctual need to hide it kicked in, primal and deep-set. Like a wounded animal. "I'm fine!" Nick was sure adrenaline was the only thing keeping him from realizing the full breadth of his agony. The acid only slowly started to quiet down its mad sizzling and gnawing on his calf.

They made it across the parking lot quickly with a growing crowd of zombies at their heels, shadowed by the towering sign, running toward the plaster-and-glass Burgertank building. Rochelle reached the Burgertank's glass-paned door first to throw it open. The inside was empty of zombies, something that gave them no small relief.

With little hesitation, the four piled in, slamming the doors shut behind themselves and turning the fat lock in the center of the door's handle to close it tightly. Zombies, maybe ten or so, slammed into the glass behind them, beating on the door with fists and their faces. Red and black liquid of indeterminate source smeared on the surface in faint highlights of their assault.

There was a moment where the four survivors stood there, staring at the temporarily useless pounding of the infected. They were panting, and muddy, and took a good few seconds to really came to terms that they genuinely were standing in the tan-tiled, fairly clean innards of a fast food place.
Ellis broke the moment - valiant, as always, reaching to take his cap gently off. "Man... last time I ate here was when I was waitin' fer Keith tuh get outta the hospital.. he'd done broke his knee, snapped it like'uh twig I tell you, tryin' tuh -"

What came as a surprise was that Ellis interrupted his own story, suddenly staring in shock at Nick. The conman, flinching past his pain, spat through gritted teeth, "What?" He glanced down belatedly, and he realized that the blood from his leg was starting to drip down to the tile in a fast-spreading puddle around the heel of his shoe.

Seeing it crystallized its presence in his mind.

And it hurt.

He cursed violently, stumbling sideways until his knee hit one of the small tableside benches that edged the restaurant. He dropped down to it with a gasp at the sensations that flooded his system, whole leg seizing up stiffly as agony wrenched his head downward.

Coach was the first to his side, already pulling their pack off his shoulder and wearily dropping to a knee. Nick glared at him, trying to recoil uncooperatively, but the big man grabbed his leg just above his knee and gave him a severe look.

Gruffly ordering, "Hold still.", Coach gave no ground. Nick just had to suffer through it.

Ellis anxiously stood just behind the ex-football player, wringing his cap in his hands as he glanced between Nick and the clamoring infected outside. Rochelle stepped up beside the bench, reaching out to try and gently settle a hand on Nick's cheek calmingly. He shrugged her off instantly with a grated sound.

Coach started to peel Nick's pantleg up off the profusely bleeding calf it was stuck to, gentle inch by gentle inch - the eldest was surprisingly careful, though he could've easily done otherwise. Nick bit furiously at the air, because gentle or not, he could feel every seize of pain as the fabric of his slides pulled away from - and with - melted skin.

"C-chn..?" he barely managed, voice strangled with pain - more than anything wanting to know why Coach, of all of them, was trying to help. The man stopped for a beat when he glanced up, seeming to recognize and understand the question on his face.

Deepset eyes flicked up at him, serious and unwavering. There was no begrudging displeasure, no badly-hidden vexation... maybe not concern, either, but Nick could live with that. "Gotta get it bandaged, Nick. Don't argue wit' me - I ain't gonna let yo' ass get hurt."

The two headstrong men stared each other down for a moment, unblinking with only the banging of infected on the glass and the pattering of blood hitting tile to break the silence in the room. Then, slowly but with ferocity, Nick reached down to undo his belt.

He yanked the leather strip free from his slides' loops, and as he did so, Nick caught his breath enough to speak.

"... Go quick."

Acquiescing instantly, Coach returned his attention to the gambler's leg. Nick raised his belt to his lips and grabbed hold of it between his teeth. He clenched down hard into the leather until he felt it denting slightly around his canines.

The slacks came away with no small agony as Coach folded them up cautiously, fabric tearing at the mess the acid had made of his calf. Blotches of skin had been eaten away, and Nick just turned his face to avoid seeing it as he grinded his jaw hard against the belt.

His vision went dim more than once. It felt like Coach was peeling his very skin away, instead of his pantleg, and it was all he could do not to kick his leg away. He knew it was trembling, could feel his muscles giving throbs and twitches all of their own volition, and hated it.

Rochelle's hand settled on his cheek, and this time Nick was far too stiff with pain to shake her off. She held his stubble-lined jaw carefully, fingertips moving in the smallest of strokes. Faint strangled noises grated past his teeth, though the leather belt tightly held in his jaws did wonders for keeping him quiet and funneling his frustration.

Ellis' voice gently chirped from somewhere close, though Nick's grip on his surroundings was dull as Coach tucked his slacks at the bend of his knee and started to dig for bandages in their pack. "I gotta take care'uh them zombies outside... okay? .. don't let Nick fight yuh or nothin'."

Rochelle tried to protest quickly, but she'd glued herself to Nick's side and could only watch with a distressed set to her jaw as the Georgian turned and scampered into the Burgertank's kitchen, just exactly what he intended to do unknown. "Damnit, sweetie." Sighing quickly, she bent down to settle her elbow on the back of the bench and rest her cheek against the side of Nick's twisted head. "How's it look, Coach?"

"Not good." he gruffly responded, staring at Nick's leg for a moment before reaching back into the pack. He drew out a waterbottle, twisting it open. "Ain't much we can do. We need alcohol, antibiotics, somethin'. Lost a lot of skin."

Nick started to let out a scoffing sound past his impromptu muffler, but when Coach grabbed his foot by cupping the front of his ankle and twisted it a little to get the wound facing upward, his scoffing sound turned into an elongated growl of pain.

"Damnit." Rochelle repeated, glancing at Nick's expression sympathetically as the conman's brow beaded with sweat under the struggle to stay still. She pet his jaw carefully, fingertips catching on stubble, and commented with soothing humor, "Least it wasn't either of your best features."

A near-silent "k'uh" announced Nick's gritted snort in response to the observation.

Coach glanced up at him, warning, "Gotta rinse it off." Nick merely twitched his head in acquiescence. He braced himself for the pain long before Coach grabbed the waterbottle and tipped it over his leg.

Water poured out in a small trickle, and it may as well have been more acid for how badly it hurt. Nick lurched before he could stop himself, body surging away from the sensation - but Coach merely gripped his knee like a vice and continued. The water sloughed off red and splattered onto the tile, revealing the ruddy flesh underneath.

His skin was burnt away in patches down to the muscle, a kind of pungent smell tainting the air. Nick might've been frightened by the sight, had the pain wracking his body not made a nice distraction.

As fast as the blood rinsed off, the skin welled up and leaked more. The only real improvement was washing off the sticky remnants of the deactivated acid, and the algae and mud from the swamp. Coach seemed to recognize the futility, giving one more splash of water against the flesh before reaching for the bandages.
Nick closed his eyes, the urge to vomit surging as Coach started to wrap his calf. He started around the ankle, winding the bandage over itself to layer it as much as possible. Coach moved quickly, but the burning agony caused as it made Nick flinch traumatized leg muscles made the whole thing seem endless.

The pain was plateauing as his nerves overloaded. His whole leg was too inflamed to really tell when Coach was done and when he removed his hands, only realizing it was over when the big man actually leaned back. Nick honestly couldn't discern the difference - the pain continued unabated. Blood covered his hands from the job, and the ex-football player looked disgruntled as he set his palms to his thighs.

"Done, Nick." he reluctantly stated, reaching into the backpack by his knee again once the worst of the blood was wiped onto his pants. He pulled a small pill bottle out, cracking the top off and rattling out two tablets onto his palm and offering them out to Nick.

"Old knee pills. Take'em."

Eyeing them with a breathless whinge past his still-clenched teeth, Nick blindly spat his belt onto his lap and grabbed for the water bottle. He pulled his head away from Rochelle's hand, chugging a mouthful of water before he took the pills. He couldn't identify them at a glance, but Coach's explanation was enough.

He was vaguely surprised at the idea that Coach's knee was bad enough to need painkillers, but just then, he could only be grateful.

They went down hard, sticking in his throat and leaving a strange, chalky taste that stung at his eyes. Gritting past it with another swallow of water, he muttered a flat and still-pained, "Thanks."

There'd be time later to be a jackass.

After a moment, the conman shifted to lay on his side and hunch his torso down against the bench. He crossed his arms over his head and shuddered down to try and hold as still as he could with his leg stuck awkwardly sideways.

He swore it was on fire, and the bandages sat like sandpaper on his tortured calf. He wasn't sure he could walk on it, not without a lot of agony.

Rochelle gently touched a hand between his shoulderblades, glancing toward Coach with an immensely grateful look. He shrugged back at her, wearily getting to his feet, and wiped his hands against one another. "Was hopin' we weren't gonna figure out what that shit could do."

Alternating between fingertips and nails up the back of Nick's neck, taking advantage of his silence and stillness to try and soothe him, Rochelle rolled her head back slightly and sighed. "And where the hell is Ellis? Didn't he say he was -"

The sudden splatter of something against glass made all three of them flinch. Rochelle and Coach twisted to look toward the glass-paned front of the Burgertank, and Nick's head lifted just a bare inch to glance past his shoulder.

The cluster of zombies that had been beating uselessly at thick glass door all suddenly pulled away, stumbling a little back as what looked like grease and lard dripped their torsos. It was heavy and chunky, somewhere between yellow and brown, and covered them in liberal splatters.

For just a moment, the three stared with uncomprehending hesitance - and then a soft flicker of orange dropped down, like a falling star, and hit one of the zombies' shoulders.
Fire caught over the grease on its frame in ripples, burning blue and red, and the flailing cluster of zombies quickly spread it. Within instants, they were all caught up in flames, and their angered clawing turned into something a lot like panic as they scrambled at each other. The fire ate away at them.

There was a kind of shocked silence in the Burgertank as the zombies outside fell like flies, reduced to a burning mess in front of the door as the grease fire refused to be beaten out. Silence, anyway, until Ellis’ voice flooded from the kitchen and he skidded, bouncing excitedly, right after it.

"Hoh mah LORD, that was AWE-SSOOME! Y'all see that?! Tell me y'all saw that!! If y'all didn't see that we are FINDIN' more zombies 'n' I AM doin' that again!"

Nick was the first one to start laughing.

Faint, pained huffs of laughter or not, the moment that happened, Rochelle and Coach were doomed to follow. Ellis stopped where he was, a bashful edge to his unerringly proud grin, looking between the three slowly. It took him a moment, adjusting his muddy cap, but he apparently decided the laughter was a good thing and edged over toward Nick.

The conman quieted much sooner than Rochelle and Coach managed to, the two holding their heads slightly as the big man's gruff chuckling mixed with Rochelle's lighter giggling. Green eyes slipped to the barest slant as he glanced up at the kid.

"Y'kay?" Ellis mumbled down to him, somehow going from excitement and pride to concern all in the space of a second.

"Fine." He wasn't. "Painkillers are kickin' in already." They weren't. "What did you do, anyway?"

Clear blue eyes flickered over what Ellis could see of his face, and Nick felt a sense of futility as he knew full well the other man could read he was lying. Ellis smiled gently at him anyway, curling his fingers carefully at his sides as he resisted the urge to reach out toward him. "Fast-food greasetraps'n'fire don't mix none..."

Coming down from her laughter, Rochelle breathed a little gasp and shook her head, bewildered. "You come up with the weirdest ideas, sweetie."

Grinning gently, Ellis glanced back at her and cocked his head slightly. "I got another one if y'all are interested any." Nick took advantage of his distraction to drop his head again, burying his head against his shoulder painfully.

"It involve food?" Coach questioned, demure, and quick to remind them all of just why they'd even come here.

The Georgian nodded quickly. "Yep. Think I saw a breakerbox up on the roof. 'N' since the sign outside is still movin', I figure there's still power. Bet'cha we can get the kitchen workin' just like new. How's some steamin' Burgertank burgers sound?"

Nick's voice drifted up from his hunched and unmoving posture on the bench. It gained some straining edge of sarcasm, something that relieved Ellis to no end - even if Nick's shoulders were still stiff with pain.

"Hurts me to say... but fucking amazing."

Ellis practically tripped over himself to twist around and scurry back toward the kitchen to fulfill the promise like he'd been commanded. Rochelle chased after him to help, and in the quiet, Coach settled down on the bench across from Nick.

He eyed the conman in silence. Nick closed his eyes and focused on breathing.

Clattering from the kitchens, interspersed between giggles and soft voices, brought the whole moment to a strange calm. If he weren't busy praying for any vague sign that the painkillers were starting to kick in to take the edge off the pain flowing up his leg… Nick might've dozed.

Or maybe that was just the shock.
Chapter 46

The lingering smell of greasy meat made it hard to consider leaving the Burgertank. It was warm and comforting, a little piece of pre-infection life, even to Nick's mind.

Of course, the medication lightly fuzzing his thought process helped that sensation along, too.

They'd gotten tremendously lucky. Although the power to the building had been interrupted, all it took was resetting the breaker to reinstate electricity. Perhaps more lucky was the fact that the meatlocker had enough insulation to keep the supplies cold. It must've only been a day or two since the power was interrupted.

The last thing they needed was food poisoning. There was no time to be sick.

Or hurt. Nick mused, glancing at his leg.

"Do you think there's a house nearby?" Rochelle was murmuring to Coach by the kitchen doorway, turned away from Nick and Ellis. The kid had sprawled on the bench opposite Nick's, head nestled against the wall and chin tucked to his chest, cap dropped low over his face.

Ellis wasn't asleep, fingers tapping out a little rhythm against his own happily plump stomach, but mowing down four cheeseburgers - only beaten out by Coach - had made him visibly sluggish. Nick kept his focus on the conversation going on as he buried his face into his crossed arms, nose just brushing the table he'd dragged over to himself and slumped onto.

It took more effort than it should have to keep from closing his eyes. He felt full and a little sick, although the burgers had been cooked far more lovingly than they would've been had the Burgertank been really running, and the painkillers were doing a number on his focus.

Leg still hurts like a bitch, though.

"Can't know till we look." The big man responded in a low voice, still cleaning a few fingers off with the slow introspection of a prisoner prodding his last meal. "We ain't sleepin' here, an' if Nick don't get cleaned up 'n' rested his leg ain't gonna heal."

She nodded vaguely, resting her forehead tiredly against the steel doorframe. She turned her body slightly to inspect her bandaged arm and dirtied clothes, exhaling. "Any of us go much longer without really getting cleaned up and I think we'll go nuts. We need laundry, showers, the whole shebang... I still feel like I'm in the swamp."

Wiping his hands on the sides of his shirt, Coach sighed weightily and let his shoulders shrug up. "Yep. Problem is gettin' to it. We gonna carry him? Might get in trouble on the way."

Rochelle half-nodded even as she argued slightly, pushing her fingers into the tight pockets of her jeans. "We'll deal with that when we get there I guess... we did clear out most of the infected, right?"

"At best there's a Spitter out there." Coach grunted simply, crossing his arms. He glanced up toward the windows that made the front of the Burgertank, looking out into the street. Electricity was still flowing, as they'd already found out, and some abandoned mechanism tried to turn on broken streetlamps as best it could. They flickered madly, almost strobelike as they cast wild shadows on the dark evening.
"Worst, whole horde's waitin' to catch our asses."

She laughed lightly, glancing down to the toes of her boots before shifting to rest her head on his shoulder. Her eyes closed, face turning away, and he let the greying, stubble-cloaked swell of his cheek set against her forehead.

Ellis softly spoke up from the bench, apparently having been listening to the not-so-private conversation from his sleepy position there. His chin lifted just slightly, enough to slant shaded blue eyes under his capbill. "Ain't like we ain't fought 'em before, right?"

Coach glanced up toward the younger Georgian and his softly twitching fingers. "Didn't like it those times, either." he noted in a low voice, reluctant.

"Awh, c'mon, Coach." the kid tossed back, shifting his weight to push an elbow against the cushion of the bench. His head lifted a little more and he flashed a grin, goofy and confident. "Y'all take this too serious! We're badasses."

Nick felt his chest compress slightly with a silent sigh. He forced his shoulders to tense up, finally hauling his torso straight to pull his head off his forearms and sit up. All three gazes instantly twitched toward him, alertly, and he felt like swearing.

"You don't take this serious enough, moron... but we're goin' anyway."

Rolling his shoulder to get a hand against the top of the table, Nick pushed himself up off the bench to his feet. His weight started wholly on his good leg, other lifted into a soft curl at the knee to just barely brush the toe of his dress shoe to the tile.

He took a step before anyone could argue, and the moment his weight shifted to his other leg, his whole frame shuddered in pain. Even the faintest attempt to flex his calf muscle sent such pain through him, he felt a little like those zombies outside - flames seething over his skin.

An inhale turned into a whining exhale.

"Nick! Don't be stupid, let one of us -" Rochelle didn't get any further than that, the conman firmly shutting her down with a glare as his balance shifted back to his good leg.

"What? Carry me?" His expression was defensive, fingers in a half-curl at his sides, and his nerves were practically visible. That animal instinct came back; hide it. Camouflage it. Run, even. "We need everyone with free hands to fight."

Ellis crawled up out of the bench, one hand holding his cap to his head while the other grabbed onto the table to hoist himself out of his comfortable sprawl. He stood up with a jump, blinking, and his voice was argumentative when he stated, "... yer not in no shape to. You can't even walk."

Ignoring a gruff chuckle from Coach at the brave challenge, Nick turned his head with a tight frown. Ellis didn't so much as blink. "Y-" Frustrated at being so firmly disagreed with, he snapped fingers into fists and shifted the focus. "... that's not the point. You three still can. If you're holding me up, you can't fight."

Ellis rubbed at his cheek carefully and took a step forward, seeming unfazed by the conman's stubbornness and not giving up. He lifted up one of his arms to mime ducking underneath Nick's.

"Just lemme crutch you a li'l, man. Yer gonna be miserable if you try walkin'."

Sighing through taut lips, Nick eyed him. The kid was right, unfortunately, and just leaning against someone was at least less injurious to his pride than being carried. It was either take the compromise or walk alone - and his leg hurt like hell. The last thing he wanted was to trip and fall in the middle of a horde.

"Oh, give it up, suit." Rochelle chorused from across the room, laughing softly with her head shaking.

"For fuck's- fine." Nick snapped dully, reaching back to grab the pill bottle from the table. He rattled two more out into his palm, downing them dry. Too early from the last dose, probably, but overdosing on painkillers was the least of his concern. It made him cough just slightly, shaking his head, before he stuck out his arm blindly and tucked the bottle into his jacket pocket.

Ellis scooped up his weapons from beside the bench, his shotgun strap going over his shoulder and his axe held close to his hip. Nick eyed him as he scurried underneath his arm, settling strongly against his hip and gripping fingers in his suit jacket to support the gambler.

The mechanic was as sturdy as he was enthusiastic. Nick could already feel himself putting a lot of weight on the Georgian, gritting his jaw softly. It didn't really ease the pain, but at least it didn't get worse. "I hate you so much."

"Awww.. yeah?" Ellis softly uttered up at him, and Nick's resolve flickered a little. He let out a sigh, hearing that plaintive note just at the edge of the Georgian's tone, and relented.

The conman just uttered a vague, "Your shotgun's in my side..." It was, the very butt of it nudging into his rib, but not nearly enough to actually bother him. Ellis' immediate and half-panicked shifting to adjust the gun made Nick smirk. He must've seen it and realized he was being made fun of, because he bashfully re-settled himself.

"Okay," Rochelle affirmed, pulling her frying pan from its place on a nearby table and walking over toward the door. She looked out into the street, leaning against the glass of the door as Coach stepped after her, retrieving his shovel from beside the booth. "If Ellis can keep Nick up then Coach and I'll handle the fighting. I'm thinking I saw a house or two behind the stores while we were coming in."

She stepped to hold the door open with her hip, nose wrinkling slightly at the cooked zombie corpses still sprawled in a ring just in front of the doorway. She stayed there to keep it open, gaze starting to scan for danger.

"Smells like ham." Nick snorted morosely as the stench wafted in on a chill night breeze, breaching what had been a pleasant interior. Ellis burst into a stifled laugh, slightly confused, gently grasping onto Nick's wrist as it dangled off his shoulder.

"That ain't nice tuh pigs, Nick."

Even though it amounted to Ellis supporting Nick as the conman swung his weight gently in a one-footed hop, their footsteps synchronized as they walked through the doorway and gently walked down onto the Burgertank parking lot. Nick snorted slightly at the mechanic's words, though he realized a beat later that Ellis said it with a little too much sincerity.

"You're such a dumbshit." he chided in a sidelong mutter, using his shoulder to push Ellis' head. There must've been a smirk in his voice to match the teasing shove, because Ellis gave a blithe smile.

If there was a smirk, it quickly disappeared under the soft and stifled noise of laughter over their shoulder. Nick registered with no small alarm that Rochelle must've been paying attention to them, and agitation flickered in a slightly panicked rush.

_Oh damnit-_

Letting go of Ellis wasn't exactly an option, so Nick was forced to just stare on ahead and pretend he hadn't heard a thing. In retrospect, he chastised himself; for all his efforts to dissuade Ellis from acting close to him, he seemed to be having more trouble with himself. _Damnit, Nick._

"Zombies." Ellis' voice warned in a chirp, fingers suddenly gripping harder onto Nick's wrist. His hip checked the conman's, like he was half ready to pick him right up off the ground and run.

The blinking streetlights made it hard to really see, and the sight they did allow wasn't comforting in the slightest. Infected were already starting to catch sight of them, scrambling up from the highway and store-front sidewalks toward them. If not for the bodies still left behind from the four's run through several hours ago, there would've been little evidence they'd already come through.

"Cleared out, my ass." Nick grumbled.

"On it." Coach announced from behind, his loud footsteps striking hard on the parking lot as he circled to get ahead of Nick and Ellis. The big man swung his shovel perfectly in time to collide with the first zombie to approach, a bone-crushing thud sending the infected woman straight to the ground.

Rochelle quickly joined him ahead of the other two, and they cleared the way at a professional pace. Nick kept staring at her back as she jogged forward and took the occasional swing at a zombie, and his mind tried to float a moment in paranoia.

_There's no way she knows. You're being stupid._

The distraction made him lose the careful rhythm he and Ellis had in their walk, and the younger man had to catch him with a sturdy grasp when he stumbled. "Watch yer footin', Mr. Gamblin' Man. I got'cha."

Nick wanted to wrench away. Instead, he just muttered a sardonic, "Oh, good."

Ellis picked the worst of times to be so implacably gentle, but all the gambler could do was tighten his arm around Ellis' neck and shudder faintly as reflex had made him put down far too much weight on his injured leg. There was no time to recover, so he grinded his teeth against the pain and put most of his weight on the younger man as they crossed the highway.

Rochelle got a swift hit to an infected's shoulder with the edge of her frying pan, though the thing kept coming even as its arm cracked painfully back. It lashed out at her face with its other arm, and she had to jerk back to avoid grasping digits that had rotted into claws.

The woman shoved it away with an elbow to the jaw, narrowly recoiling before it snapped at her arm, but she took advantage of her lean backwards to give it a hard kick in the knee. "Will you bastards quit trying to bite me?!"

Decaying bone snapped with nauseating ease, toppling the thing over, and Rochelle circled past it quickly to keep moving with a glance back to make sure Ellis and Nick were still safe.

The four jumped the sidewalk on the other side of the street, seeing that the gas station ahead made for an easy exit away from the highway with the open pavement ringing it. The windows of the gas station were broken open, and even from that distance, Nick could see blood scrabbled all over. He definitely wasn't going to be the one that suggested they check it out - their goal was something more sheltered, anyway.

As they dodged forward onto the parking lot, surroundings lit up by more reliable lamps set into the gas station's flat awning, Coach lifted up a hand to trace the sharpened shadow of a rooftop up against the treeline ahead and out of the lamps' reach. "That look like a house to y'all?"

One of Coach's shoes hit hard down on a drainage grate in the parking lot. The metal clanked against the concrete softly, shifting underfoot. Despite the fact it couldn't have fallen through the hole, it being smaller than the grate's width, the feeling still made him step off quickly.

"Contrary to what you might think..." Nick muttered irately, curling into a slightly useless fist the fingers of the hand Ellis had gripped by its wrist. "...saying 'yes' to that doesn't actually make it any more or less likely.. so let's just shut the fuck up and check it out."

Coach did not look amused when he glanced over his shoulder.

"Don't bitch or anything, honey." Rochelle laughed gently behind herself, jumping over the grate entirely. She eyed the gas station, humor draining out of her posture steadily as she inspected the bloody handprints scrabbled all over the edges of the broken windows.

As Ellis' heavy workboot gave a loud thunk when it landed on the drainage grate, Nick lost it slightly, yanking his weight forward with a low growl to snap in obvious irritation,

"Swear to God, if I hear one more goddamn word about my 'attitude' I will strangle-"

Ellis suddenly staggered, and after that first wobble, went down completely to a knee and an outthrusted hand. Nick felt an unintelligible shout tear from his own lips as he slipped down with the Georgian, landing hard on the asphalt parking lot - and his wounded leg.

His vision blacked out for just a split second, but the feeling held on like hooks all along his skin. Pain and immediate anger both had to be put on hold when Ellis let off a panicked, "Oaaahhh- Oh Lordy, somethin's got me!" The kid was twisting backward, grabbing onto his own coveralls and trying to yank his leg toward himself like it was caught. It wasn't a Smoker - he wasn't being pulled away.

Nick grabbed Ellis' shoulders tightly, using the leverage to twist himself upright without budging his leg, both looking for the problem and making absolutely sure Ellis didn't go anywhere.

A pale, gnarled hand had its fingers jammed through the grate, visibly wet and emaciated around brittle bones, tightly wound in the loose jean material of Ellis' coveralls and jerking down like it could pull him through the metal grating.

Anger flaring up more than anything else, Nick practically snarled as he ripped his crowbar out from under his belt. He distantly recognized his own voice, just exploding out like so much compressed air.

"LEAVE IT TO YOU -" Gripping the crowbar tightly, he jammed it straight through the grating and into the back of the grabbing hand, though the thing barely even reacted. Those fingers just curled tighter in Ellis' pantleg, squeezing even as the crowbar made a hole in its flesh.

"TO FUCKING PICK -" Nick was pretty sure all three of the others were frozen up in favor of staring at him. He couldn't rein himself in just then, tearing the crowbar free to attack at it again, hacking through the thick metal lattice. This time the hand started to falter, the damage crippling the thing's delicate wrist.

"THE ONE PERSON -" When Nick twisted the crowbar to one side in a jerk, there was a sudden gory snap, and the clutching hand snapped off its forearm in a sprinkle of red. There was a thud and splash underneath them as something fell into water, though it was impossible to begin to see what it was through the barely platter-sized grate.

Nick grabbed onto Ellis' shin, ferociously shoving him away from the grate so his coveralls tore away from the frigid hand's grip.

"KEEPING ME ON MY GODDAMN FEET, YOU ASSHOLE!"

With a small wobble, the half-curled, disembodied fingers lost their grip on the grating and they disappeared with - after a moment - a much softer 'sploosh' in what must've been the drainage pipes underneath.

Panting heavily, Nick stared down at the asphalt, energy quickly flagging as the stress-fueled rage that had floated him just a moment before drained out of him. He slowly dragged the crowbar back under his belt, slumping. Ellis was panting, too, as he slowly moved to his feet, and three sets of eyes blinked on the gambler's hunched form.

Coach's hand offered down in front of Nick's face. He glanced up through a stray strand of dark hair that traced down his forehead, green eyes tired but expression aflame with stubborn cynicism. He was sweating - too much, and he knew then that he'd overdone it with the painkillers.

"Let's get yo' ass back up, Nick."

Hesitating for just a moment, the gambler shifted his weight to reach up and grasp Coach's hand tightly. Ellis quickly grabbed onto his elbow, Rochelle supporting the other, and the conman was straightened up by their unified effort. He muttered a simple admittance; "... I feel like shit."

"We'll get you cleaned up." Rochelle sympathetically murmured, reaching up to pat his jaw (with stubble that was growing softer as it grew longer) just once before pulling away. He belatedly grunted at the show of affection, rolling his head away even when it was far too late.

Ellis ducked under Nick's arm again with the grip he had on his elbow, holding him up carefully. The kid nodded at Coach and Rochelle silently, urging them to get moving quickly as he got a good enough grasp on Nick's waist to push him into a step.

"Hey, thanks, man.." the Georgian spoke softly sideways to Nick, blue eyes flashing underneath the bill of his cap as he gazed toward his face. He paused - then prompted him, in a naively obvious attempt to distract Nick from the even more obvious pain he was in as he limped hard on his leg.

"Y'know, I ever tell you 'bout the time my buddy Keith got his whole damn lower body stuck in a street sewer-hole?"

Nick, tiredly, shook his head. He could see a huge smile blossom at the motion, just under Ellis' cap-bill. The lilting chirp of Ellis' voice played in his ear as they carefully picked around the massacre of a gas station, reaching an odd gravel road that trailed toward the roof-shaped shadow looming against the treeline ahead.

They drifted out of the grasp of the gas station's light, and everything seemed a little too still.

"Heh. This's a good one. See, he was sleepin' in the back of his truck 'cause it done ran outta gas.
He was waitin' fer his pa tuh come 'n' get him - well, that's a whole other story in'uv itself, but I won't get intu that none - but anyway, he's sprawled out under this tarp, 'cause it's rainin', right? Well turns out he done pulled over intu a fire lane or somethin' - so this towtruck comes 'cause someone called the cops, and they start haulin' the car away! Well, when you add tippin' the front'uv the truck up to the acceleration, yuh get Keith rollin' straight outta the truckbed. Next thing he knows, he's scrabblin' -"

"Shush, son." Coach suddenly interrupted, wielding his shovel carefully as the evening's vague light started to make the house ahead more visible. It was two stories, a darkly painted wood paneled house with tightly curtained windows. The front door was broken forward off its hinges, lying at an angle on the steps, but there didn't seem to be any blood or signs of zombies around.

Ellis - unbothered by being shut down - piped up cheerfully as they approached, still alert. "Hey, maybe we got lucky 'n' it ain't infested or nothin' -" Nick 'shh'ed him sideways, sparing him a dull look that he knew Ellis understood.

Don't jinx it, Ace.

Stepping up to the stairs, Coach carefully bent down and got a hold on the fallen door. He grunted slightly as he picked it up, avoiding scraping it on the brick steps as he pushed it upright and gently set it against the face of the house.

"Let's all go in together - careful, a'ight?"

There was a soft nod to Coach's words, and gingerly, he stepped into the dark house first. Rochelle slipped back to let Ellis help Nick up the stairs, and with Nick relying mostly on Ellis to forcibly haul him onto each step, they got in quickly.

Coach held his breath slightly as his gaze roved blindly in the darkness of the house. He let one hand palm along the wall just next to the doorway, hunting for a lightswitch - when his fingertips brushed the plastic rectangle nailed into the wallpaper, he carefully flicked the switch.

A sudden, loud whirr startled all of them, Rochelle grabbing quickly at Ellis' back with a soft sound of alarm. It took a moment, but Coach chuckled suddenly, shifting his finger over just an inch to find the second switch on the panel and click it up.

The ceiling fan hanging down in the center of the room flicked on its flowered-glass lamp, and the slowly spinning blades above it gave a humming whirr as they started to pick up enough speed to give a subtle breeze.

Laughing, softly, and releasing the Ellis' shirt, Rochelle mumbled as she stepped forward and looked around the living room. "I'd like to point out we all just got scared by a ceiling fan. How screwed up is life right now?" Furniture was tossed gently, like someone had left in a rush and just dragged things out of various end tables and cabinets, but there was no sign of blood or infected - just panic.

Snorting, Coach turned toward Ellis and Nick. He eyed them a moment, then gestured with a shoulder. "C'mon, you two. Let's find a bathroom an' let Nick start cleanin' up while the rest of us handle things."

Ellis nodded obediently, glancing at Nick to make sure he was ready before taking a gentle step. The ex-football player turned to lead the way across the living room, edging for the hallway with his shovel still up.
Rochelle waved softly after them, wielding her frying pan and glancing around carefully. "I'll find the laundry room and see what we can do about getting our clothes cleaned u- oh, damnit." Her eyes suddenly rolled as her own words struck her, turning away. Her tone betrayed a smile, though. "The woman gets stuck with the laundry. How did I not expect that...?"

Chuckling softly, Coach forged forward into the hallway, flicking on the light in there with a knuckle. He looked up a staircase to his right, gaugingly, too distracted to interrupt Nick when the conman gave a sardonic smirk down at the floor and tossed back a loose retort.

"That's just wrong, babydoll... you shouldn't be doing laundry... you should be in the kitchen seeing about a snack." Dropping his head forward quickly to laugh, Nick didn't really pay attention as both Ellis and Rochelle gave him a long stare, the latter more disbelieving than offended.

"Ass." the woman ghosted on mouthing lips, shaking her head and turning away as Coach started to scale the carpeted staircase. The behaviour was ... little strange, but not completely outlandish. The gambler was definitely a little out of it.

"Are yuh feelin' alright, Nick?" Ellis questioned worriedly as he looped his arm tighter around the conman's torso and pushed a hand against the staircase's banister. The stairs were tough to maneuver, but at a slow pace, they followed in Coach's heavy footsteps.

The conman gave a subtle grunt, still smirking vaguely at his own wit. "It's .. I probably took one too many painkillers. Done it before, not serious, sport... just kinda a bad buzz... oh, and my goddamn leg still hurts."

Ellis instantly gave him a frown, fingers curling slightly in the fabric of his suit. He didn't speak in the end, focusing on getting up the stairs without tripping. It got dark as they scuffled over the small platform in the middle, the light from the hallway not reaching up into the second floor.

Coach carefully leaned into the new hallway, palming the walls again for a lightswitch. He found it with his thumb, and the lights flicked on, revealing a starkly empty hallway with a few doors.

Two of three laid open, along with a small stairway up to an attic, and the light was enough to see that the room directly on their right was a bathroom.

Stepping toward it, the big man nudged the door open all the way and carefully scanned a deep-set gaze over the room. "Looks clear. Gotta do somethin' bout the front door, but there ain't nothin' in the bathroom... Ellis, you got him, son?"

The youngest survivor nodded obediently, holding Nick like an over-inebriated friend - the conman didn't argue, gaze focused longingly on the bathroom in front of them. "Mhm. I'll keep muh eye on this city slicker."

Coach didn't wait for any more, putting his shovel over his shoulder and stepping around them to go back downstairs, his steps heavy on the carpet. His voice was audible when he reached the downstairs and spoke to Rochelle, heavy and gruff, though the words were unintelligible.

Ellis caught himself sighing gently, glancing at Nick's face under his cap bill. "Yer worryin' me, Nick." he mumbled softly. Green eyes flicked sideways toward him, breaking their wanting lock with the bathroom doorway, and the gambler's brow twitched up.

An honest response spilled out of his lips. "My leg's hurting like hell, my head's half full of cotton and half full of knives, and I feel like I slogged half the swamplands with me... ya ain't the only one, Ace."
Ellis chuckled good-naturedly, looking slightly relieved at the flash of brutal cynicism. "Really whaled on that zombie what had me in the gratin', Nick... thought you'd gone right off yer rocker." He pushed forward to help the limping gambler into the bathroom, free hand darting to switch on the light.

The white bulb flashed on, scattering gentle gleams all over the silvery, glazed tile bathroom - blue accents scattered here and there like warm brushstrokes - and revealing the dried streaks of dark red blood that were stained into the washbasin sink.

"... oh, yay." Nick mumbled, reluctantly pulling his arm off Ellis' shoulders. The other man didn't let go of him - he tagged after him, worried, fingers keeping a slight hold on his suit jacket. The contact felt .. good ... guiltily so, fuzzy brushes that made Nick want more far more than his broken frame should've let him.

The gambler limped toward the bath with a faint huff to his breath, turning around to slowly slide down to sit on the edge. Ellis was still grasping onto his jacket, unwilling to let him go like he might crumple at any moment. Sighing and half-annoyed, Nick grumbled, "Quit that, Ace, I've got it."

"Sorry." Ellis quickly apologized, backing away, although only after Nick was settled. His gaze shifted down to get a look at the blood-stained leg of his slacks. After a beat, he turned to start digging through the bathroom cabinets, shuffling loudly. "Just worryin'."

Nick sighed again, quieter this time, bending forward to grasp onto his pantleg and gently work it up to his knee. He touched the edge of the bandages that wrapped, dark red, around his leg delicately with fingertips, feeling a flutter of apprehension threaten to rise bile up the back of his throat.

Despite Coach's efforts to clean it, the bandages were already soaked through. He'd get an infection for sure like this.

Softly, his deft and calloused hands pulling an entire drawer out of the cabinet, Ellis questioned, "Hey uh.. Nick? Mind a question?" He turned around, walking back to kneel in front of the gambler. The drawer had first aid supplies in it - just basic things, a tube of antibiotics and a lot of tiny bandaids that were utterly useless to their goal, but nearer the back was a few rolls of gauze. The gauze had been bought long ago and abandoned there at the back, while the bandaids had clearly seen avid use. Open wrappers were spilt all over the bottom of the drawer. That was how it should've been - little cuts, papercuts and nicks, not melted skin and bleeding muscle. Nick almost forgot to answer, staring at that drawer with a distant gaze.

"What?" was his eventual utterance, starting to gently grip fingertips onto the top edge of his bandage to pull it free from its small knot and begin the unwrapping process. Ellis' hands suddenly dropped the drawer on his lap, and they brushed Nick's aside, stopping him. Their fingers touched, lingering too long and recoiling too quick all at once.

The gambler wanted to grab him, but he didn't, just... resigning himself. You want to kiss him, don't you, Nicolas... well get your.. fucking act together. Drop it. You don't need shit from him.

He hated needing others. Need was weak, and vulnerable.

"Lemme do this.." Ellis trailed, blue eyes glancing up out from under his cap just long enough to see that Nick wasn't going to argue. Noticing the stilling of Nick's shoulders, Ellis softly focused on pulling bandage away from skin, soft but steady, relenting when it pulled but not hesitating too
Nick's breath hissed, softly, though the pain was a little dull at this point. Ellis' constant progress made it more bearable, but only by a small degree. The gambler was aware his gaze was locked on Ellis' face. Mental pep talk: is doin' greaaat so far. "What question?" he repeated.

Carefully, a small wince flickering over his features as more of the acid-burnt wound was revealed under his hands, Ellis dared his question. "...On the stairs.. you ..." He hesitated, paused. His jaw shifted on the words, catching Nick's eyes with an intent focus though the conman's expression was deadpanned in vague pain.

"Said yuh'd .. taken too many painkillers before -"

Something in Nick's mind was still working at full throttle, because he caught the kid's meaning there and shut him down with a simple, "No, it wasn't on purpose. Either time."

He heard the soft breath of a sigh, Ellis' fingers hesitating a moment before quickly starting back up. There was genuine relief in his voice when he spoke - real and vibrant, and Nick thought it was ... something. "Sorry, Nick.. I had tuh ask."

Sweet, maybe. But when wasn't he?

He always was, and that was the problem.

Frustrated, Nick glanced down at his knees. He wanted to not respond at all, but he couldn't bring himself to. Sardonic wit spilled out as a compromise. "Yeah, well... if my ex couldn't make me throw myself off something tall, nothing can. Cept maybe you, if you try hard enough."

With a gentle guffaw, Ellis smiled at him lightly, peeling the last few inches of bandage of Nick's calf. He eyed the leg for a careful moment, the skin agitated and inflamed, bubbling up in a few places. Blood trickled here and there over the dried layer of it that had collected heavily under the bandages, the flesh quick to split back open. "Don't look real good - uh... I ain't real sure whut to do, but let's clean it'uh little. Mind flickin' the bath on?"

Nick obeyed with a small exhale through his nostrils, twisting the nozzle above the bath faucet and then letting his fingers trail in the soft spray of water that rained down to follow. It was cold, but he didn't care much. Cold was numbing. He'd take numbing.

Ellis leaned back toward the cabinet, pulling open the swinging door underneath the sink's basin and pulling a washcloth out from the linens piled there. He got up on his knees as he faced forward, leaning in to stretch his hand underneath the faucet and get the cloth wet.

The Georgian talked softly as he shook the washcloth out and then returned to sit on his heels. Gently, cautiously, he started to clean the conman's leg with the wet, soft cloth, daubing away dried blood in thick splotches.

Skin came off, too, in sheets like cracked slate. It started bleeding again in more than one place, but the cold water had a soothing effect. "Reminds me of this one time when Keith done cracked a radiator in the shop on accident... heh, blasted boilin' hot coolant all over his hands... me'n his brother had tuh like, carry him, screamin' like a girl, to the hospital... they had tuh do this graft thing on his thumb 'cause it got burned so bad... guess where they done got it from?"

Nick didn't respond, watching Ellis with a downturned chin. Nerves flashed with each daub, but there was a cottony sensation between Nick and the pain. When Ellis had cleaned the worst of it, he grabbed the antibiotic tube and squirted a helping onto his thumb, leaning in to focus hard on... daubing the gel onto the deepest parts of the burn. He was liberal, but with the burn taking up the entirety of Nick's calf, there was only so much the tiny tube could do.

"His butt, man. Like you can't tell or nothin', 'cause it healed up real nice, but he's gotta live knowin' his thumb was his butt once. That just ain't right." Nick watched the Georgian talk without listening - watched those lips move, those blue eyes flicker with emotion. Little blinks of sympathy as he worked.

The thought of getting lost in the kid again - those plaintive whimpers in his ear, that flushed face, the shudder and tremble of his body under Nick's hands... it was the only thing that made sense, the only thing his brain could grab onto. He'd only had him once and he wanted him again - no, needed him again.

The pain and the soreness and the exhaustion - they wouldn't matter after that... oh, he needed it. The pit in his stomach and the grinding pressure of his jaw made it very clear that it was far more than just base desire behind it all.

'Well, yuh really suck at tellin' when things change, Nick.'

Thinking about those words all over again panicked him. What if he needed Ellis too much? He couldn't stand that - he could stand anything but that. He'd rather battle the prospect of loneliness than accept the thought he might need Ellis for something deeper than gratification.

Anger streaked in just faintly, disorienting him as the thoughts came faster than he could process. You're such a weak dumbfuck, Nicolas. You should've just fucking Carmine and let Ellis stew himself into hating you. Save yourself all this fucking trouble. Why did you walk away?!

But he had his own answer.

He'd even given it out loud to Ellis, back then - and boy, did he regret that now, its truth even more than its utterance at all. ... because you wanted him. Not her. Fuck that line! Fuck it!

As Ellis softly tucked the top of the bandage under itself, looking it over carefully before glancing up with a reassuring grin - that fullblown, idiot grin - and a soft, questioning twist of his head, Nick forced himself to breathe. He'd just take some time - he needed to sleep off the medication and heal up a little. Just a break, a night to himself. Clear his mind.

He could hold off for a night - or maybe two. Or maybe he'd just end it entirely. Besides, a deeper voice chimed in helpfully. Gotta back off a little, with Rochelle acting strange. It bolstered his resolve so it was a little less panic-fueled and a little calmer. Sensible. Logic helped settle his mind.

Silently turning away and reaching for the bathtub faucet was enough to give Ellis the hint that Nick was going to try to bathe. The Southerner got up and left carefully, lingering only a moment to give Nick a curious stare.

The sudden fluctuation in his behaviour didn't go unnoticed, but it was so quiet and subdued, where Nick's moods were usually so harsh and burning - Ellis didn't know what to think, and didn't have the time or the opening to investigate.

Something far more obvious became apparent a little under an hour afterward: Nick had left his muddied and bloodied clothes folded at the top of the stairs, retreated into one of the two upstairs bedrooms, and locked the door without so much as a word.

Ellis could hardly recall the last time he'd stood outside a door, so intimidated by the wooden barrier locked shut in front of him he couldn't get himself to knock on it. There wasn't a light on or even a scuffle from inside.

His hurt was only beaten out by his confusion.
Ellis felt his brows fidget closer and closer together as he tried to focus on gently moving the wet clothes from the washing machine into the dryer. He couldn't shake the weird knot in the bottom of his throat, making his voice a little strained.

"I dunno. He just locked himself in, didn't even say nothin'."

Rochelle sighed softly from where she sat on the edge of the dryer, cleaning the dried mud off her boots with a damp towel. They'd raided the bedroom downstairs for extra clothes to sleep in while their clothes were in the wash, but it was full of women's clothes, much to Coach and Ellis' chagrin.

The big man had simply retreated into the other upstairs bedroom with a "goodnight," ditching his dirty clothes at the top of the stairs like Nick had. It was probably for the best - the thought of Coach trying to fit into anything they found was ... unpleasant. He'd helped barricade the door with a few pieces of furniture before he left, so they were safe, at least.

Ellis found himself a blue set of pajamas bottoms - which, had they not had a little bow below the navel and a sewn-in sheep just at his ankle, would've been pretty androgynous - and a plain white shirt. Both of them were a size or two too small, so the shirt clung softly to his shoulders and lifted an inch or two up his stomach whenever he moved, and the bottoms squeezed at his hips. The legs, at least, were loose, meant to be too long and flow freely - so for him they just about fit.

Fresh socks provided a warm, dry relief for feet that had spent entirely too long trapped in waterlogged, muddy boots - and his hat had been lovingly washed in the shower with him, so it sat proudly (and a little wetly) atop his drying curls.

"He's in a bad mood, you know that, sweetie." Rochelle comforted him gently, shaking her boot out slightly and giving it a look over. She'd found a pair of little red shorts and a black camisole, and her dark hair was out of its tie, falling in a loose wave of braids to her shoulders. The smell of soap from both of them was almost sticky in the air, mixed in with the deep smell of detergent from the clothes that Ellis chucked into the dryer.

He shut the door with a palm, sighing. "I... I guess." Ellis should've known better than to talk to Rochelle about Nick - the conman would've died (or killed him, or both) if he'd known that Ellis was even risking betraying them to her. He just felt too lonely and confused not to talk to somebody. "Just worried 'bout him is all... his leg's bad enough, but with him actin' so weird... I dunno what tuh do."

Dropping her now cleaned boots to the ground with a soft thud, she reached behind herself to get Coach's shoes. Letting her shoulders relax as she settled into the rhythm of cleaning them with a balled-up edge of the wet towel, Rochelle smiled softly at him.

"You're a sweetheart, Ellis. He's just being.. Nick, and Nick's a little silly. You have to understand it's not you - you know he likes you. Even if he's a dick."

Quickly turning his head away, Ellis tried to focus his gaze on the wall to will away the beginnings of a blush over the bridge of his nose. Rochelle didn't mean it like that, but...

"I dunno, Ro'. He sure ain't actin' like it. S'just confusin' tryin' tuh be his friend, 'cause I know he's nice on the inside... maybe a li'l lonely, but then he pulls stuff like this... s'like we're back tuh square one, all at once." Sighing cautiously, Ellis turned the dryer's dial and listened for a moment.
as it started to whirr into action. The machine vibrated a little bit, a comfortingly familiar hum filling the air.

Rochelle curled her legs slightly, bracing her bare feet against the now-trembling door of the dryer. Turning the boots in her hands and clapping them together slightly out over the floor, she shook her head. "Why do you think he's lonely, h'uh?"

Ellis' blue eyes blinked softly, glancing up. "... 'cause he ain't had many friends?"

She laughed slightly, rubbing her forehead with a wrist. "Yeah, but that's not what I mean. He pushes people away - probably even more when they're good for him."

Scratching at his stomach carefully with a thoughtful look, Ellis rested his hip against the edge of the silent washing machine. "He wants tuh be alone?"

"Who wants to be, sweetie?" She paused in sympathy, setting Coach's shoes down beside herself on the dryer to reach over and stroke his bicep. "We don't always do the right thing for ourselves. You know you cheer him up, even if he wouldn't admit it."

"But .." The kid trailed off slightly, lowering his head with a shake of it. Pulling the too-small shirt back down over his tummy, he started to fiddle with the bow of his pajama bottoms.

Rochelle laughed gently under her breath, jumping softly down to her feet and walking the couple steps between them. She reached up to tickle at his chin, smiling as he scrunched up his nose.

"But what, sweetie?"

Scratching at his head through his slightly damp cap, Ellis gave a little pull downward of his lower lip. "Uhm... well, I dunno. He's got the right tuh choose whut he does, but.. if he's tryin' tuh shut himself off... are we s'posed tuh et him?"

She didn't have an immediate response to that. Her gaze shifted slightly, and for a moment, Ellis thought he saw something a little worried flicker over her expression. She drew her smile back up with a breath, settling a hand on his cheek comfortingly.

"Good question, sweetheart. I don't really know for sure. You're gonna have to decide that, I think... you know him better than I do. Trust your gut, it's what my dad always said."

Ellis smiled. He couldn't help it, comforted by the palm cradling his cheek and feeling a strange flutter of pride at her words. To think he knew Nick better than the others... and the concept that he might just have a good instinct... he felt flattered. "Yuh think so?"

Nudging his cap up with her thumb, Rochelle leaned in to nuzzle his nose with hers playfully. He outright laughed at the gesture, blinking his eyes shut momentarily. "Yep. You're a pretty smart guy. Smarter than Nick is, I think."

A blush fluttered over Ellis' face, coloring the gently scarred bridge of his nose. He quickly pulled her into a hug to hide it, snuggling his face down against her shoulder. "Thanks, Ro'... I feel a lot better."

She got her arms around his torso to return the hug, tickling his ribs playfully while he couldn't get away. He immediately started to laugh, squirming away from her fingers. "We'll sneak out in the morning and go see if one of those stores has cigarettes. That'll cheer him up, even if they're nasty."

"Okay." he agreed with a smile, voice a little stifled with lingering laughter. Releasing her, he put his palms to the edge of the dryer and hopped up on it, kicking his feet softly as the thing chugged underneath him. "Hey, I'll stay up tuh watch the clothes, Ro'. yuh look tired."

Judging by her pause, she definitely was, though hesitant to outright admit it. After a moment and a soft sigh, she cracked a light grin and nodded, patting him on the knee. "Actually.. that'd be sweet of you, honey. I'll grab the couch, you can have the extra room downstairs.."

"Nonono, no chance, Ro'." Grinning gently, Ellis leaned back until his shoulders hit the wall, chin nestling onto his chest. "I gotta be a gentleman somehow! Besides, I'd wake you up rustlin' with the clothes if you were just out in the livin' room."

Reluctantly rolling her eyes at first, Rochelle giggled softly and crossed her arms. "Oh alright. You're too sweet, y'know that?" Bending over his knees lightly, she lifted his cap and kissed him on the forehead before replacing it.

He smiled as she left the laundry room, calling a soft 'g'night' after her. The dryer whispered warmly and quietly underneath him, and for a moment, he looked distantly at the doorway. As her footsteps receded up the staircase, Ellis sighed, talking under his breath to the air, like she were still there.

"... maybe you're right, Ro'. I know somethin's wrong with him, 'n' he ain't tellin' me... it's this whole closed-up thing he's got goin' on. He's gotta be scared, but if I can help... don't that mean I should?"

He toyed with the bow at the waistband of his pants, gaze trailing down his legs and the soft blue fabric that draped over them. He let his eyes close, daydreaming in a soft doze.

There'd been a distinct tension under the surface in the bathroom. Nick had been staring... hotly. But everything else had been distant, like he'd been desperate to get Ellis to leave. Ellis barely knew how to navigate the situation as it was, but trying to decipher the older man's behaviour made his brain spin.

It just didn't make any sense.

"I think he likes me... I mean he don't not like me at least. He just ain't real good at sayin' it. Or even thinkin' it maybe... but what does that mean fer me? Am I s'posed tuh push it or would that just make it worse?"

Trusting his instincts was a lot easier when he didn't feel so conflicted.

What if Nick was lonely up there? Regretful, as Ellis knew he could genuinely be - with a hurt leg, a fuzzy head, an empty room, and nobody there to distract him. Ellis felt his chest tighten slightly with worry just thinking about it.

Nick was too proud to look for help, or even admit he needed it. Ellis couldn't blame him for that - that was just Nick, and that was okay. But he couldn't sit by and let him hide, either, could he?

Rochelle was right. He had to follow his gut, and there was no way he could just go to sleep knowing Nick was upset. Not when he had the chance - the ability - to make him feel better.

"There's muh gut feelin'." he affirmed out loud with a soft pat on his thighs, smiling suddenly with his certainty. "I ain't gonna let him hang out tuh dry all alone... 'n' you can just deal with me, Nick!"

A sudden 'bzzzzt' sounded so abruptly - not even all that loudly - behind him that he yipped out of reflex, whole body pitching in a startled jump. He nearly fell straight off the dryer, barely stopping himself with a foot quickly thrust out to the floor.

After a moment of blinking, Ellis couldn't help but break into an embarrassed guffaw, gently standing up and turning around to crack open the dryer. He hadn't expected it to be done already - he must've been dazed out longer than he'd thought.

"Um.. after I fold the laundry, anyhow."

Gently pulling out the first handful of clothing, Ellis started to fold them. It was second nature after having to help his mother so often - which made it slightly less uncomfortable when he pulled out Rochelle's underwear. The warm cloth rustling around was almost relaxing. He was glad to notice Coach's shirt, stitched up the back with black thread, was still in one piece after the wash.

Not to mention, Coach's briefs were huge.

All their clothes looked so clean. It was strange. Admittedly, there were a few stains that hadn't come out - probably never would - but colors were suddenly brighter, less dreary. And they all smelled like... home.

Nick's suit was startling. Ellis froze up a little as he pulled the jacket out, holding it by the shoulders in front of himself. It was a stark shade of white now - fascinatingly so. Leaning forward softly before he really thought it through, Ellis risked a soft nuzzle along the jacket's lapels.

It smelled like detergent... but it.. felt like Nick. Wonderfully like him - like burying into his shoulder. He'd never met anyone who wore what Nick did. All the memories, all the sensations, just looking at it... it was all Nick and only Nick.

He felt so immediately guilty and embarrassed, he had to fumble to fold the jacket carefully. He knew that type of clothing should've been hung up, but there wasn't much of an option. He'd just fold it along the seams and hope for the best.

Quickly folding the slacks and blue dress shirt to join the rest, Ellis sighed slightly. Maybe Nick couldn't admit to having feelings, but he was starting to feel rather aware of his own. He'd had crushes before - on girls, maybe, but it sure felt the same. Feelings were feelings, and as terribly embarrassed and a little nervous as it made him to think...

Ellis felt for Nick. He liked being around him, liked his humor and his sarcasm, liked his friendship. He liked more than that, but Ellis shook the train of thought off before it got embarrassing.

He hoped, suddenly, his determination to keep Nick from shutting down wasn't selfish.. but he kept the thought away as best he could. After all, Rochelle had told him to trust his gut - and how could caring for him be selfish?

Piling the clothes up neatly, Ellis gave a firm nod and gathered them into his arms. Feeling better, he turned away and padded on his socked feet out of the laundry room, gently turning the light off with his elbow as he passed by.

He dumped his shirt, boxers, and coveralls carelessly onto the couch, figuring he'd change in the morning. The living room ceiling fan gave a soft breeze as he walked underneath it toward the hallway.

He settled Rochelle's clothes down in front of the bedroom door just beyond the staircase, giving a soft and grateful smile at the door's blank face. Tiptoeing so as to not wake her, he backed up and went up the stairs two at a time.

Ellis felt a little nervous as he walked over to the bedroom he knew Coach had taken. He felt like he was procrastinating... and Coach was the only thing left to handle. Setting his clothes down in front of the door, Ellis let out a sigh and pulled Nick's clothing to his chest thoughtfully.

He was definitely nervous, heart starting to threaten to beat faster in his chest.

What if Nick just yelled at him and kicked him out? ... he wasn't sure how he'd handle that, for all the confident build-up to it. Taking a steeling breath, Ellis tiptoed back up the hall and past the staircase... coming to a wary halt in front of the intimidating door separating him from Nick.

He inspected it for a moment, softly fiddling fingers on an edge of the blue shirt. There was, of course, the immediate obstacle of the thing being locked. He must've tried to convince himself to knock on it twenty times already - but he was determined now.

Leaning forward softly, he tried to whisper in a loud-enough but unobtrusive voice; "Nick...?" in case the conman was awake. Listening with a held breath, Ellis waited for what must've been a full minute.

Not a peep. It made him frown a little, hesitating. He had to find a way. Nick always did.

It struck him with all the force of a speeding train. Blue eyes blinked twice, then flickered down to the clothes he had cradled in his arms. Suddenly excited and inspired, he bent down to drop them next to the doorway, hurrying to the bathroom. Sure enough, Nick's wallet was on the edge of the bathroom counter, a little bundle of brown leather.

Scooping it up with a smile, Ellis flipped it open as he walked back to the doorway. Drawing Nick's credit card out of one of the slots and then tucking the wallet under his arm, he skittered up to the door and nestled against the side.

Feeling a certain thrill rising in his pulse, he held onto the knob with one hand while jimmying the credit card into the crack of the door. He felt sneaky. Twisting while he pushed, Ellis tried to mimic what he'd seen when Nick had performed this very act.

He could feel the edge of the card start to work between the doorjamb, gradually. Judging by the fact the light rattling and scuffling wasn't stirring any response from the conman, Nick wasn't conscious. That did make Ellis feel a little better about being ignored, though Nick had certainly locked him out to begin with.

Smiling when the lock suddenly gave way, clicking softly, Ellis very slowly turned the knob. His breath caught slightly as he opened it up, leaning his head in to nervously blink into the dark room.

Light fluttered in as beams from the hallway, illuminating the room in a thick streak as the door opened. Ellis' eyes immediately jumped to the bed, and a slow-spreading blush over his face was the only evidence that his heart hadn't completely stopped in his chest.

Nick was limply sprawled on his back, arms akimbo and fingers lightly curled in the sheets. The blanket had been wrestled somewhat from his naked frame in obvious agitation, twisted over his stomach and only barely wrapped around his legs. His injured leg had slipped free of them entirely, freshly bloodied bandages stark white-and-red against the sheets.

What Ellis immediately noticed was the soft tremors threatening along Nick's limbs. They were like shivers, but the house was warm enough and he shouldn't have been cold. When he blinked up toward Nick's upturned face, those severe brows were twitching in and out of a furrow.
There was no pillow on the bed - though that confused Ellis at first, he noticed it was lying a few feet away from the end of the bed, crumpled against a set of drawers like it'd been thrown there. Strange, and more evidence of agitated restlessness.

Unable to wrench his attention from the scene in front of him, Ellis carefully tiptoed forward. He gently set Nick's wallet and card down on the end table next to the bed, his fingers reaching up to click the bedside lamp there on.

Yellow light spilled over the shivering gambler, flecking shadows along the curves of his upper body. They danced as every tremble and breath made them flicker through the crisp hairs dusting Nick's chest and trailing down his stomach. Ellis' throat was wound tighter than a knot, intimidated equally by just how handsome Nick was lying there and his own worry at the tremoring.

He practically drifted backwards to close the door, heart fluttering in his chest. As it clicked shut, Nick's head rolled to one side, and Ellis froze where he stood, hand locked onto the doorknob.

A "fhh..." escaped those thinned lips, the sound crumbling as Nick only barely vocalized it. It was soft and gentle, too short to give any hint on what he might've been saying, though there was a tone to it... a certain desperation.

Ellis quickly crossed back to the bed, not tiptoeing so much anymore, for his concern. He softly bent down, gaze roving over Nick's face. The man had to be having a nightmare, and Ellis immediately wanted to comfort him out of it. He slipped a hand tremulously to touch the back of Nick's, warm fingertips touching sweat-slick skin, and he spread his fingers to clasp over the gambler's trembling fingers.

His lips were parted to speak the older man's name, but he never managed, startled into silence when Nick suddenly grasped his hand in return. Cold fingers twined messily with his, squeezing and grabbing before they stilled. Blue eyes blinked between their touching hands and Nick's face - he was still deep asleep.

Ellis' stomach knotted warmly, a blush spreading across the bridge of his nose. The gesture was unexpected… and nice.

"Whut're you dreamin' 'bout, Nick..? Gotta be somethin' bad." he mumbled, gently resting a knee up on the edge of the bed so he could lean down and get a better look over Nick's expression. Thoughts flickered indecipherably over those features and, watching the flood, Ellis felt a rising urge to wake him up or soothe him.

The closer he got, the less his guilt about sneaking in mattered - the less anything mattered, really. The hurt at being shut out was fast becoming a vague memory. Carefully leaning closer with a distinctly fluttered thrill in his stomach, Ellis softly nuzzled his nose against the gambler's, whispering to him fervently.

"'Ey.. you ain't alone.. yer okay, Nick."

Turning his head slightly, he risked slipping a little further to brush his lips against Nick's, tightening his fingers on the cold hand they cradled. Nick let off a soft breath, the sound a gentle acknowledgement of the kiss. Ellis couldn't help but drown slightly in the feeling.

His other hand slipped up to settle on Nick's chest, fingers stroking along his skin and tracing the tremoring lines of his ribs. Ellis gently closed his lips around Nick's lower, leaning into the kiss with closed eyes when the gambler shivered his lips apart, reacting pliably to the soft warmth.
As his fingers played a calming path over skin only slightly warmer than the hand he held in his own, it struck him just how cold Nick was. He needed to warm him up.

Moving gently and slowly like he were trying to get close to a wild animal, Ellis shifted his weight to press himself against Nick. He put his front flush against the other man's side, tucking his shoulder against Nick's chest and using his grip on Nick's hand to wrap the older man's arm around himself.

As he gently settled up against the gambler, knee bent to keep from touching Nick's injured leg, he was startled by a sudden movement. It was just an idle shift, at first, and Ellis felt a flash of uncertainty as he thought Nick might awaken.

However, Nick was still fully unconscious as he swept his other arm through the air to circle abruptly behind Ellis' back. His fingers grasped in the younger man's shirt, drawing him tightly against his body, and it was all Ellis could do to keep from gasping as his head was pushed underneath Nick's jawline.

Nick held him. Tightly. Like they were falling together.

The gambler rolled, vaguely, in the motion. His body turned and the sheets twisted against his hip as he drew toward the heat source in his arms. Ellis had to reciprocate, reaching the arm that wasn't underneath him to cross over Nick's waist and clutch fingers against his back. "It's alright, Nick." he mumbled, chest clenching with sympathy.

It was the softest, neediest Ellis had ever seen him - his head went fuzzy with a certain breathless affection. Ellis tucked his cheek against the older man's neck, ear tickled by the facial hair creeping down from Nick's jaw. The gambler was still trembling… but softer now, and Ellis could feel his breathing had slowed.

"S'better," he whispered softly to Nick, smiling as the older man's arms tightened around him. "I ain't mad at'cha, Nick. I can't be mad with you bein' scared. Just wish you'd say it instead - I can't read minds or nothin', man…"

Leaning his head down, Ellis kissed tenderly at the crook of Nick's neck. It was just an affectionate gesture, soft and faint, but the reaction he received was far from it. A faint growl sounded against ear, rumbling in Nick's throat - and it startled him enough to make his head recoil.

Lifting his chin, Ellis risked a glance toward the other man's face. Nick's brows were wrought in some dim emotion, his lips parted faintly. Ellis' movement made Nick shift again, and his tighter grip pushed their bodies almost flush - close enough to press their groins together.

Ellis' borrowed pajama bottoms didn't offer much of a barrier and, underneath the thin sheets, Nick was stripped bare. It left nothing to the imagination, and Ellis tried to squirm backwards to no avail as the gambler's arms refused to let him go.

Stifling a gasp at the soft pressure, Ellis tried to draw his head back. He felt the moment slipping out of control, lip catching between his teeth. Nick's trembling disappeared entirely as his body was completely drawn out of whatever nightmare it'd been trapped in, in favor of paying far more attention to the other man.

He couldn't do anything but stiffen when Nick's hips shifted, drawing into a sleepy nudge forward. His movements were lazy and tired and intoxicating in their gentle friction, mindlessly seeking out the warmth and pressure of the other body.
"N-Nick -" he managed, urgently, a rising sense of insecurity overtaking any other feeling. It wasn't like he didn't want it… and he'd accomplished his goal of stopping the nightmare… but Nick was asleep, and this wasn't what he'd meant to happen.

He tried to snake his hand up to press his palm against the older man's waist, to shake him, but all he did was frustrate the sleeping gambler. If Nick stirred, it wasn't immediately apparent - he rolled harder, thigh searching suddenly forward to press into the niche of Ellis' legs. It rubbed, shifting with Nick's canting hips.

Ellis couldn't help it as his body reacted strongly to the pressure, shoulders trembling up and head tipping back slightly with a slipped moan of appreciation as his body responded.

In reply, a low purr slipped from the conman's mouth. The sound was tinged with a certain awareness. The pressure of Nick's lazily hardening erection up against his inner thigh made Ellis shudder abruptly, reflexively pressing into the contact and grunting, "A-ah - Lordy..."

As if the words registered - or maybe just the tone itself - Nick's fingers gripped tighter in their clutch against the younger man's back. The gambler might have rolled atop him entirely, but the shift of his leg must have pressed his wounded calf into the bed, because suddenly Nick was awake and swearing.

"Fuck-!" left him in a slur, barely coherent and taut with pain. Ellis had to lay there, eyes wide, as the gambler pulled away from him in a vague shove and blinked bleary eyes open to glance down at his leg where it lay against the mattress. He glared, as if it had insulted him directly. "Fuck."

For a moment, the older man flicked his gaze around the bedroom with slow thought. It seemed like he might relax back down and return to sleep - until he noticed Ellis.

Ellis could only freeze when Nick's attention ticked back toward him. It was a slow realization that passed over Nick's face, staring in sudden interest at the body in his arms. The bedside lamp gave illumination to every edge of rising confusion on his features as his gaze found Ellis held with such flushed, tense silence against his chest.

The conman's lips parted subtly, inhaling, but Ellis blurted out a stammered, "U-uh, I -" before he could speak. But Ellis had no explanation, no excuse. He hadn't even thought to prepare one, not thinking this was where he'd end up - and now that he was underneath those intense eyes, anything that could've sufficed as an explanation folded like a broken lawn chair.

"Um…"

They both blinked for a subtle moment, Nick's fingers twitching slightly on Ellis as if trying to comprehend how they'd gotten there. When his eyes had seemed to finally tick over every inch of the Georgian's flushed face and warm body, he stopped.

Of all the things Ellis anticipated, it wasn't what followed:

Nick smirked. "I was havin' the funniest dream, Fireball..."
Chapter 48

Nick's voice was almost flustered and slightly breathless, but so unexpected and flirtatious that Ellis' heart skipped a few beats. He was almost unable to focus when those lips purred out soft - yet so darkly intent - words.

"You broke into my bedroom and started trying to screw me while I was sleeping... that doesn't sound like you at all."

Immediately, Ellis turned a deep shade of red all across his face, trying to squirm away from the tight grip that had him around the waistline. He quickly removed his arm from around Nick and wormed away by an inch or two, fistng his hands awkwardly between their chests as the conman's smirk solidified even more.

"I-I'm sorry! I didn't think - I was - jus' - It just happened! I only meant tuh - And you were -"

Fumbling and visibly humiliated, Ellis tried to pull back and scramble away from him - but his whole body crumpled in simpering weakness when Nick's free hand slipped suddenly to dive between his thighs and stroke deft fingers against the bulge that betrayed Ellis' arousal.

It was one thing to rub against him - but to actually be touched by the conman was something entirely different. It shocked him into completely losing his breath, hands fumbling forward to grip onto Nick, one at his shoulder and one at the bicep of his questing hand as they lay face-to-face on the mattress.

Ellis could feel Nick's gaze on his face, though he tried to duck his head down as petting fingers drew a struggling whine out of him, choked a little. They mercilessly played with him through fabric that may as well not have been there, sending tremors through his body at maddening speeds. "Ch- chh, th-that - uh-..."

"Just couldn't leave it alone..." the conman murmured in a graveled tone that was almost introspective, reaching up his other hand to curl it behind Ellis' neck and scratch fingernails against the Georgian's delicate hairline. "... how'd you even get in here?"

Ellis couldn't begin to work together more than stammered sounds to respond with, arousal driving him out of his mind as Nick's fingers found the sensitive head of his dick through his pajamas and toyed with it lustfully. He felt like he was being tortured for information - and so well.

"I was trying - " Nick shifted his other hand up, gripping fingers in Ellis' brunette curls. He used the grip to pull Ellis' head back slightly, gazing over his helpless expression and the flush settled into his skin. Ellis couldn't even gather the effort to try and turn his face away, giving a pleading whimper. "- to avoid this.."

Ellis couldn't ignore that, though - he steeled what focus he could gather together and huffed a struggling breath. Focusing his gaze on Nick's, burning in embarrassment as the conman tightened his grip on the kid's hair subtly as if in chastisement, he forced a gradual, "Wh-why?"

Nick cocked a brow at him, quietly, both his hands going slightly still. He didn't seem about to respond, but it was clear enough that he was thinking. After a beat, he released the grip he had on the back of Ellis' head, letting his hand drop down to the Georgian's shoulder and trace down the length of his arm till it circled around his wrist.

"You should've left it alone." he stated, tone suddenly much more serious. Ellis felt a nervous blink flutter his lashes, some of the numbness leaving his limbs when Nick's hand stopped its cruelly, dazzlingly wonderful manipulation.

The only thing that gave him some hope, hanging on the silence, was that Nick's gaze etched out a small 'but' as it ticked over his face. Sure enough, with an exhale, the conman's words turned into a mutter.

"Even if I'm glad you didn't."

The words made Ellis' panting lips twitch into a smile, lowering his awkwardly fisted hands somewhat slowly until he could flatten his palms against Nick's stomach instead. Fumbling slightly with a very disarming awareness that they were both aroused, he mumbled hopefully, "Really? I thought... I thought you were mad."

Nick snorted softly, shifting his weight to push his hip and an elbow against the mattress and lift his body up. He worked his way backwards, dragging himself toward the headboard of the bed.
Ellis cautiously tried to help him move when a clear flush of pain threatened along the conman's face. His injured leg scraped along the bed as he moved, the muscles tightening reflexively.

That didn't stop a clear smirk from sprouting on his face. Turning onto his back and setting his shoulders against the headboard with his torso relaxed in a half-sitting position, Nick relaxed and gave a heavy exhale. He circled an arm around Ellis' waist and pulled him close, urging him into a straddle on his lap.

It didn't take much more to get Ellis to move. He kept his toes curled up, ensuring he didn't nudge Nick's legs in the motion, but followed the pull to slide up and settle himself into a seated position on the older man's thighs. He slid as close as he could, stopped only by his knees pressing into the bottom of the headboard.

Ellis' breath caught in his throat, almost a cough, when Nick's face ended up in a lustful gaze mere inches away from his. "But, you are gonna have to apologize for waking me up." he growled softly, still smirking, slipping a hand to tug one finger in the waistband of Ellis' pajama pants.
"'Sorry' just isn't good enough... Ace."

The Georgian's chin lowered slightly, gingerly reaching down to grab onto the lower edge of his shirt. "You should uh... stay still, Nick... Yer hurt." he whimpered softly, pulling the shirt up over his head with a slight squirm as the tight material fought him.

He could feel his skin heat up under the lascivious gaze examining the flushed slopes of his torso, jumping nervously when softly-padded fingers suddenly traced a line around his navel while his gaze was obscured by the shirt.

Nick whispered to him in a low purr, stroking the delicate trickle of hair down the center of Ellis' stomach with the backs of his knuckles. "You make that really hard." To drive the innuendo home, Nick rolled his waist up a few inches, grinding against the vulnerable rump straddled over his lap.

It made Ellis shiver strongly, quickly embarrassed by the obvious enjoyment that played over his features and the tiny sound that squeaked out of him. He could feel the heat and hardness of the other man's interest, and it sent nervous arousal up his spine.

Nick gave a slight sigh, smirk hollowing almost imperceptibly, and slid his hand to settle flat on the inside of Ellis' thigh. Even that was distracting, the touch making the muscles under Nick's palm jump. "Where's my wallet?"
Ellis didn't have the will to even question 'why,' trembling a bit at the hand just subtly gripping at his leg. He quietly shucked his shirt over his shoulder, carefully stretching out to the side to reach his arm toward the bedside table. His fingertips just brushed the wallet lying behind the lamp, but enough that he could paw at the wallet and scoot it closer.

Nick's hand merely dragged along skin as Ellis moved, so when he reached the full length of his stretch, it was torturously close to his groin again. It took a lot of effort by Ellis not to intentionally lean forward a little more and push against those fingers - but more, unbeknownst to him, by Nick not to touch him.

The conman hummed a little bit as Ellis shifted back straight in his lap, and he plucked the wallet from the mechanic's fingers with a small smirk. "I'm surprised you're not asking me already."

Ellis fisted his hands lightly beside his own hips, gaze darting down to watch Nick's fingers as they toyed at his wallet. His mouth dried a little bit, making him lick his lips cautiously, but he managed to respond with some of the stimuli removed. "Ask whut...?"

"'Is it gonna hurt again.' Don't you care?"

The younger man hesitated. He curled his fingers a little tighter. Of course he did - he didn't want to collapse again, didn't want that humiliation a second time. Certainly didn't want to have to withstand Coach and Rochelle's confusion if they found out he somehow got hurt... again.

But... enough to not do it at all?

Leaning forward slightly onto his knees, Ellis craned his neck slowly until his cheek touched one of Nick's wallet-holding hands. Maintaining the still, observant gambler's gaze up at a slant, he nuzzled his cheek against the back of Nick's hand and whimpered, "... No. I wanna... I want you."

If his goal was to startle Nick, it worked. Those green eyes flashed and then narrowed, fingers tightening. Nick clearly wasn't going to ask again, suddenly snapping his wallet all the way open and digging into the billfold.

Ellis noticed, it so close to his face, that there was no money in that billfold. He'd felt a certain weight when he'd picked it up so he hadn't thought anything was different, but that huge wad of mostly-stolen cash Nick had stowed away was gone.

Hidden in its place, Nick took out a little round tin that had just fit into the empty wallet folded up. Ellis instantly felt a little knot start in his throat as he read the 'petroleum jelly' label, realizing two things at once - Nick had thrown his money away to fit it, and he was going to use that. On him.

The former made his chest tighten up in half-guilt and half-affection, and the latter made his whole spine stiffen up. "You... -"}

Nick stuck the tin between his teeth, holding it there with a slight bare of his teeth. He reached forward, grabbing fiercely onto the waistband of Ellis' pajamas at either hip. "Take 'em off, Ace, 'r I'll strip ya myself." he grated past the tin, tone incredibly serious.

Ellis quickly obeyed him, breath huffing as he forced himself to squirm his hips free of the tight pajamas. Though Nick spoke like he had an option, Nick didn't even let go of the waistband, ending up doing most of the tugging himself.

His gaze flickered vibrantly to watch every little wiggle back and forth, and as the other man crawled slightly off him to pull them entirely off his legs, he growled in annoyance. Ellis nearly apologized, but Nick just dragged him back into place the moment he was free of the pajamas. He slid deftly attentive hands along the bruised and scratched bare frame in front of him, conflicted arousal rising under the surface of his predatory determination.

Ellis blushed harshly, following Nick's hands as they pulled him forward into an upright kneel, stomach in line with Nick's face. He couldn't help but freeze up, aware of the fact that the embrace pressed his erection into Nick's midsection. The conman didn't seem to mind it in the slightest, ignoring his hesitation as he wrapped one arm around the Georgian's waist to hold him tight, cheek scraping against a rib.

He retrieved the tin from between his teeth with his free hand, popping the cap off with a thumb like he were flicking open a lighter. Ellis heard the little pop and jumped slightly, nervous much despite himself, making Nick chuckle deeply. The very noise turned Ellis' knees weak as it puffed against his side.

Agile fingers circled the tin with a thumb and middle finger, digging his index finger deeply in the thick gel puddled in the tin. It was probably supposed to be used as chapstick, but Nick had other intentions. "Trust me?" The question was punctuated with the soft lave of a wet tongue along Ellis' lowermost ribs, making him shiver even more when a stubbled lower lip followed in its path.

Ellis gnawed at his lower lip, cautiously raising his arms to grab onto the top of the headboard and stabilize himself. It put his arms curled next to Nick's face, and the conman tipped his head on a seeming whim. His gaze slanted out of the corner of his eyes to keep it on Ellis' face as he bit gently at the younger man's bicep. He teased skin with tight nips, putting a little bit of suction on it.

Feeling a fluster cloud his focus, Ellis tried to shrug his shoulders without displacing the gambler. Nick released him anyway, a healthy pink brought up to the skin where he'd sucked at it. Voice a careful echo of humor, he tried to tease, "Didn'tcha tell me not to last time..?"

Nick paused for a moment, breathing slightly heavily against the ribcage his face was curled toward. He pulled his chin back, glancing up at Ellis, expression unreadable with a twitching brow. He inhaled - then exhaled, shaking his head. "... Yeah, I did. And look who's here. Again... you dumbshit rednecks never learn."

He punctuated the statement by a small snort, tightening his arm around Ellis' waist and stroking fingertips along the swell of his hip. His tone changed suddenly - serious again, but honest.

"Deep breath. This'll be good. Promise."

Ellis nodded firmly, taking in a long breath and letting it settle in his lungs before exhaling. The motion sent a flutter of relaxation down his muscles, though Nick's subtle sincerity helped even more. His heart pounded in his ears, but he did everything to hold his composure as the conman advanced his free hand to ready him.

The first touch of Nick's jelled finger was enough to make Ellis jolt. It was - wet, and lukewarm in a strange way. That first sensation was intimidating, but Nick didn't waste time before he gently circled his fingertip, and strange wetness turned into a fascinating, tingling kind of slickness.

Ellis whimpered slightly without thinking, the sound coming out a little questioning. He fisted his hands, trying to turn his face away from Nick's gaze as he felt his own flushed skin. The conman humored him and didn't chase after him, instead leaning forward to gently press his mouth against Ellis' sternum and nip at the firm skin of his pecs.

Taking advantage of the Vaseline's slickness, Nick pushed him a little. He curled his finger to work it inside the other man, continuing a gentle circular motion to push against tight muscles. A small "Nhg..." escaped Nick, quickly stifled with a slightly wanting bite down on Ellis' chest.

The Georgian barely kept still, shivering with a helpless clenching of his hands as Nick only just controlled himself against leaving a mark. It all immediately felt so much better than the first time - and that had felt good, after and around the pain. This time, it was just a full and tingling sensation, rising into a pleasant pressure.

He knew his hard-on was pressing into Nick's stomach, and he would've given anything to shift his position and pull away. He just knew Nick could feel every little throb that shuddered through his body, and embarrassment flooded him every single time, distracting him self-consciously.

Ellis was just about to break and apologize when Nick suddenly pulled his mouth away and chuckled against his skin. Hot breath spilled over wet flesh, creating a tickling sensation that crawled over his chest. "... You sure help a guy's ego."

Mocked, Ellis quickly shook his head, embarrassment shifting to defense. "I-It ain't muh fault! Don't make fun'uh me.. I ain't really ... felt this before...

Chuckling again, the tone dropping to a sultry gravel, Nick let his finger drift against the muscles surrounding them, stroking and pushing at them with a little bit of a curl. "I like it." He pushed hard, suddenly, working in all the way to his knuckle. The motion was so sudden Ellis pushed abruptly forward, a moan jerking out of him as the penetration slickly completed, pleasure pulsing through his limbs.

Nick enjoyed his moan, smirking faintly as he took advantage of the moment to squirm a second finger in place, stretching those muscles easily and watching the shudders travel up Ellis' body.

"Just like that."

The Georgian whimpered helplessly, pushing his hips back against the fingers with a suddenly much more desperate edge. The conman obliged him, the plea setting a thrill up Nick's spine he couldn't quite deny, curling and scissoring his fingers a bit. Ellis' whole body followed the motions in little shivers, head falling back slightly with a whine.

Nick murmured sideways to him, voice grating slightly - but with arousal, nothing else, the arm around Ellis' waist tightening with a subtle want. "Okay, kid? You're drivin' me crazy like this..

"Mm-yeah," Ellis quickly confirmed in a tiny simper, trying to gasp himself back to breathing properly. "I-It just feels - ..." He flushed darkly before he could say it, but Nick certainly understood.

Leave it to him, though, to taunt as he gently retracted his fingers. "Feels?" With those hungry green eyes staring him down, smirk amused in the most predatory of quirks, Ellis quickly huffed into a hesitant, momentary silence.

"...G-Good." Floundering under Nick's continued smirk on his face, Ellis glanced down slightly, embarrassed out of any good sense. He felt empty now that Nick had pulled away, a vaguely uncomfortable feeling that made him want more.

The gambler pushed him slightly away, just a couple inches, so he could adjust his hips. Releasing Ellis' waist, Nick snatched up the tin from the mattress and dug with a fingertip again. He scraped out all that was left, unbothered as he tossed it across the room blindly and took his own erection in the palm of his hand.

Ellis couldn't stop himself from watching, a little shocked and fascinated all at once. Nick chuckled to see those blue eyes so wide on his hand as he lubed himself with a practiced squeeze and stroke, reaching up his free hand to a knuckle under Ellis' chin and tip his face up.

The kid blinked, not adjusting fast enough, startled when Nick suddenly kissed him. He melted into it, eyes drifting shut, submitting instantly when the conman's teeth nipped at his lips to demand they part.

Ellis murmured a softly nonsensical noise, deep tastes fluttering across his senses as their mouths locked momentarily, just softly, then broke apart. Nick eyed him with that knuckle still in place, hand having stilled on his hard - and now slick - length.

"... You're gonna have to help me here, El." There was that little pet name. This time it was special - soft to an impossible degree, the whole utterance holding that same kind of tone. Nick had to admit he couldn't manage with his bad leg, and Ellis fumbled quickly to shift his position.

"I-I can do it." he promised immediately, serious. He put one hand onto Nick's shoulder, fingers flexing on the smooth skin beneath them, noticing a certain flicker of emotion in the green eyes on his face. He couldn't quite work out what it was. "I didn't want tuh make you hurt yerself..."

Smirking faintly, Nick let his hands shift to set on Ellis' thighs. He squeezed at them subtly, gaze darting over Ellis' sincere, wildly blushing expression.

Ellis carefully edged himself forward, trying not to look Nick straight on as he adopted a sturdier straddle on the conman's lap, knees spread. He could feel his shoulders trembling, eager to move but hesitant all the same.

Those eyes just burned at him. He'd never get over them - not those pale, focused dishes that tore straight through his consciousness and examined every speck of emotion like so many cards in Nick's capable hands. Ellis had never looked at a man and thought he was beautiful, but he did now.

He lowered himself down on bending knees with a bitten tongue, aware of Nick's steadying hand bracing his dick, helping Ellis guide himself onto it. The first breach made Ellis shudder, almost startled with how easily he came down on it. The warm, velvety-slick shaft stretched him till he shivered, the smooth slide immensely different from the rough push of the first time - but the same, in a way, too.

Aware of Nick's suddenly very tight grip on his thighs, and how those eyes were slitted half-closed, Ellis used his grip on Nick's shoulder to support himself as an outright whimper just blurted straight out of him. He rocked his hips slightly to gain a few more inches downward, stars sparking behind his eyes as the motion sent pleasure shocking up his spine and muscles tightening around the intruding length.

"H-hn- Jesus tits, Ellis, just like that..."

Nick audibly wanted more control, a kind of frustrated uselessness chewing at his tone. He gripped at the Georgian's thighs, not happy at all with his position... but turned on all the same.

Ellis couldn't help but notice a faint flush to generally pallid, thin cheeks, shocked to see such a thing on the conman. It made him all the more determined to see it through, cocking his hips forward gently as he bore down tightly, coming closer and closer to Nick's lap. He had to stop just a moment as he breached about halfway, struggling to relax.

It was a different pain; gentler. Muscles vaguely protesting, instead of a burn that brought tears to his eyes. More than that, it was an ache, and not unpleasant.

Ellis couldn't even breathe beyond desperate pants that escaped him in quick huffs. He felt stretched to impossible limits, that shaft of warmth and an unforgiving stiffness filling him to the brim in a slick kind of unity. A hammering heart sent a quick pulse shooting across his skin and it melded with the heavy throb pressing urgently up into him through Nick's erection.

He wrapped his arms around Nick's neck, cradling the gambler's head on his forearms, and let his eyes drift shut with a slight shiver. He let his hips roll slightly forward and backward, just a few inches, giving a whimpered sound of pleasure as the motion strained against his tightened muscles and pushed Nick's length a spine-numbing inch deeper.

"You're killin' me, Ace... You gotta relax..." Nick grunted heavily, fingers sliding up Ellis' thighs in a scratching grasp. He gripped onto the other man's hips, stroking his palms in small circles. He practically vibrated with the urge to thrust upward, but a twitch of pain closed one eye when he shifted a leg in reflex to get leverage, bandaged calf grating against the mattress.

Ellis quickly tightened his arms, a biting moan fluttering out sharply at Nick's advance. He bent his head, stretching down to beg a kiss off the conman. They were both breathless, and the kiss got heavy fast, mutual noises stifled between their mouths.

Spreading his knees slightly in a forceful push against the mattress, Ellis worked his body down to take in all of the conman's hard erection, pushing down into his lap with a tight nestle. The conman's hands suddenly dug nails into his hips, and a shudder passed up Nick's body, punctuated by a frustrated utterance against Ellis' mouth.

It got easier with his body acclimated to the full width and length, tension relieved by the heavy kiss and the thrilling attentions Nick was lavishing to his lips and tongue. That was almost all Nick could control, unable to really move anything else, and he thrust full-force into it.

Ellis coaxed himself into a slow rise and fall without breaking their kiss, the motion eased by the slick lube. It was a wonderful feeling, sending shudders and shivers up his whole body. Every inch he lost by lifting up made him want it back desperately, but the absence made pushing back down again all the more incredible.

It was a torturous see-saw, and judging by the subtle prickling of sweat along Nick's brow, Ellis wasn't the only one suffering.

Groaning as he bit along Ellis' lower lip, Nick adjusted his arms to wrap fully around the kid's waist. Strong arms hugged around his hips to help him rock his weight up and down when the Georgian faltered. The added embrace - that bit of invaluable intimacy - made Ellis whimper, eagerly speeding up his motions to build up some friction.

He couldn't even feel his legs, the motion so driven by blind determination that he was barely cognizant of his own motions. He didn't really know what he was doing; he only knew that whatever it was, it felt good and he wanted more.

Pleasure shuddered up in crackling jolts, and though Nick didn't have enough control and Ellis didn't quite have the bravery to twist and search for that sweetspot Nick had discovered… but it didn't really matter - the movement felt wonderful all on its own.

"N-Nick -"
chastisement. He must’ve heard the desperation, though, because one arm slipped free from the embrace, and his hand snuck between their bodies to circle around Ellis’ erection.

Toying deft fingers over that sensitive flesh was like flicking a switch, and suddenly Ellis was rocking his weight twice as hard and fast. He couldn't stay still, riding the older man with a certain level of desperation as the motions rubbed him against Nick's hand, too.

The bed below them threatened to bump back into the wall with each bounce. There was a few inches of space to use, freed so the lamp could plug into the wall, but it was close. Ellis didn't have the sense to stop himself, too enthralled in pleasure as he worked down onto Nick's lap and against his palm.

What Ellis didn't expect, struggling with the increasing tension building around his core and the unbearable stiffness that Nick's fingers only made worse, was for the conman to come first.

It happened suddenly, when his knees gave out a little and his body collapsed down to jam down fully to Nick's lap. He must've shuddered with the sudden penetration and tensed around Nick, because the gambler's hips bucked up harshly, the older man pulling his mouth free to tip his chin up and groan a deep-throated sound of pleasure.

Just a graveled purr, vibrant and rolling off his tongue like so much honey. His head hit back against the headboard of the bed, hot breath escaping him in a huff.

The rush of pulsing warmth that spread deep inside him made Ellis shudder, a startled exhalation escaping him as the position he was in let him feel every little twitch of the conman's climax. It felt strange... and incredible... all at the same time, shock flowing up his spine, but it was so warmly intimate that Ellis just lost his composure, disoriented.

"O-oah Christ!" Ellis had no idea how loud he said it. It felt like it burst from him, hurried, but ... he really couldn't decide just how loud it'd really been. Nick crooned to him in lustful support, voice immediately sending him rocking into climax.

"That's it, Ace.."

The gambler's fingers stroked Ellis through his orgasm, digits squeezing up his hard-on to egg it on. His hips bucked up mindlessly a few times against Ellis, driving home the sensations, but he only had so much leverage without using his injured leg.

Ellis quickly wobbled to collapse against Nick's front, whimpering uselessly as his body buzzed and hummed, almost crippled. Nick soothingly gave one last stroke of his member and then stilled entirely, gently pulling his hand away to wipe it on the mattress without looking. He let his head tip against Ellis', mouth nestling against the other man's ear.

They breathed hard in the silence that settled in as they both calmed down, bodies plastered against each other in an intimate sprawl that was sweaty and hot and... wonderful. Nick's breathing was soothing in Ellis' ear, making his eyes slowly close as his cheek rested more fully against Nick's collarbone.

Ellis shifted to re-arrange himself gingerly, lifting up off the gambler's lap to disconnect them. He kept close, though, sliding into something like a sit next to Nick against the headboard, slumped down so he could stretch his legs out with a sigh. The gambler's good leg and his tangled lightly, both of them melting into place.

An arm slipped behind his shoulders, and Ellis felt a warmth spark in a place far deeper than his skin as Nick's forearm pulled him closer, face nuzzling to where he could press his mouth against the delicate ear near his lips.

The shiver the motion caused in Ellis was sedate, more a flutter than anything else. It made Ellis smile, not wanting to move from the embrace that so warmed him. Ellis nuzzled back against Nick's face, and though he felt a slight stiffening of the gambler's form, Nick didn't pull away.

Instead, Nick spoke, voice low and unobtrusive while a hand turned slightly to settle flat against Ellis' right bicep, fingertips tracing the curl of his tattoo. It tickled. "Didn't mean to finish in you. Sorry.. should've warned ya."

It should've made Ellis blush, speaking so brazenly about it, but just then all he felt was warmth. Sticky warmth, maybe, but - more than that, too. "It's okay.. I kinda ... liked it. Felt real funny-like."

Nick chuckled lowly at that, and Ellis broke into an outright grin at the sound, hiding his face slightly against Nick's shoulder. The gambler always had this low, nasal snort to his laugh, like he was constantly mocking or sarcastic - but there was a honeyed layer it got sometimes that made him wonder. Ellis was sure he had a genuine laugh hidden somewhere, something wonderful and sweet, but stifled it.

Imagining it made him happy. But a little sad, too.

"How did you get in here, anyway..? Not that I'm angry, it's just - I did kinda lock the door." Nick shifted his weight, reaching one arm down to grab at his knee, eyes drifting to examine his bandaged calf. It had bled through again, but lessened, and there was some blood on the sheets.

"I uh... kinda used yer credit card. Like you did, back when...." Ellis didn't elaborate.

Nick blinked at him, pulling back to get a look at the Georgian's face. Breaking into a smirk, he shook his head, letting his head tip back against the headboard. One hand drifted to settle against the back of Ellis' neck, the other replacing itself around Ellis' torso. "You little thief in training.. I'm an awful influence, aren't I?"

"Maybe." Ellis smiled gently, slipping his hands to settle on Nick's sides, fingers curling a little. He didn't know what was going on, didn't know why Nick was allowing them to stay so close for so long... but he loved it. Thrived in it. "Ain't that my call, though?"

"No. You're the innocent, oblivious one." Nick snorted almost imperceptibly, green eyes half-closing. "You don't know what's good or bad for you."

Ellis thought on that for a moment, uncertainly, letting his face nuzzle slightly down. "Is that why yuh locked me out? 'Cause you thought you were a bad influence 'n' I couldn't... protect muhself from you or somethin'?"

Nick's fingers stilled for a moment - and then he let his nails stroke along the back of Ellis' neck, slowly. "Is that what you thought?"

Not really minding the dodgy response, Ellis relaxed a little more, the soft stroking on the sensitive back of his neck making his whole body tingle sleepily. "Naw. I kinda figured you were feelin' vulnerable... wanted tuh be alone..."

"Heh. So you broke in?" Nick wasn't really accusing. There was no serious emotion to be found anywhere in either of them, really - just calm words, soft tones. They were drained of any energy to do more than that.
Ellis couldn't help but smile gently, drowsily limpening his grip on Nick's torso. "I didn't want you tuh be alone up here."

Nick didn't respond. Those fingers softly scratched along his hairline, shifting up to pet through his hair, too. The motion was as calming to him as it was putting Ellis to sleep. He almost wanted to say something - but Ellis didn't seem to expect it.

It was nice... the silence. Nick didn't have to try and come up with something to explain away why he was being gentle, or second-guess himself. He stroked at the skin under his fingertips, feeling Ellis' breaths against his shoulder.

He could just relax for a moment, gather himself. Bask in the afterglow.

Nick wasn't sure how many breaths he'd taken, how long it had been, before he inhaled deeply and spoke. "Hey... El." Nick let himself pause a moment, settling his mouth against Ellis' hair, a soapy smell deeply swirling into his nostrils. "You don't have to break in next time. I won't lock you out."

When Ellis didn't respond, Nick lifted his head, turning it a little to glance at his face. A smile sprouted on his face, quickly stifled and drowned into an even line. Ellis was asleep against his shoulder.

Sighing carefully, Nick gently disentangled himself from the sleeping kid. He eased Ellis down with his hands, careful to let him down softly so as to not disturb him. The moment he settled down, Ellis made to curl up, pawing his hands limply on the mattress in search of Nick.

Seeing his restlessness, Nick let a hand drift to rustle the mechanic's curly hair. Just a soothing brush with the pads of his fingers over the brown locks, enough to ease him. Ellis immediately relaxed with a content sigh.

It was hard to roll out of bed for Nick, wincing as his injured leg throbbed painfully. Cautiously lowering his feet to the floor after sliding himself across the mattress, he sat on the edge for a moment, hanging his head with his elbows on his knees. His body slumped bonelessly.

He looked over his shoulder, feeling exhausted in all the right ways - and a few wrong ones. A smirk settled lightly onto his lips, turning into a smile a beat later. Sorry, kiddo... If it helps.. I actually do wish I could stay.

Then it died, withering on his lips, and he gazed uncertainly toward some distant point for just a moment.

He did. And it felt… unfamiliar.

Putting all his weight on his good leg, Nick stood up, keeping an arm softly extended to hold his balance. He let himself reach back to pull the blanket up and draw it carefully over Ellis' frame, tucking it around his shoulders.

His fingers trailed over Ellis' cheek as he pulled away. The contact tingled, but Nick straightened up and carefully turned away to walk toward the door. He picked up his wallet as he went, body shuddering with each step that put even the slightest weight on his hurt leg. He ended up limping, barely pressing down with the ball of his foot.

Nick would get cleaned up, get dressed, and carefully crash on the couch downstairs. Ellis could have the bed. If someone asked, he'd just say he'd offered to play guard and they'd traded.

No one'd be the wiser.
Fingering his wallet as he opened the door, flinching, Nick glanced at it. He'd hidden a few hundreds in an empty credit card slot. He was never one to pull all of the aces out of his sleeves.
Consciousness didn't come gently for the conman - Nick must've been trying to roll over in his sleep, because suddenly he jolted awake with a flurry of pain, completely disoriented except for the knowledge that he was in agony.

"Sh-Shit! Fucking leg!"

Blurring it out, Nick forced himself to hold abruptly still, body completely rigid. Panting slightly, he kept completely immobile while the pain ebbed slowly. The needled sensations that had sprouted all along his bandaged calf started to calm.

Exhaling a deep breath as a numbness settled in behind the pain, Nick let himself move. His arms were crossed over his chest tightly, cradling something imaginary to his body. He eyed his own arms, turning his hands at the wrists to examine his palms. Did he wish he'd woken up with Ellis against his side? He wasn't sure anymore.

Rolling his eyes slightly, Nick exhaled calmly and craned his neck lightly to try and look around from where he was sprawled on the couch. It took a moment to re-organize his thoughts, feeling on edge. The front room was dark, lit only by the morning light streaming in from the windows and a light that was on in the hallway leading up to the second floor.

The house was quiet, only a constant buzz from the ceiling fan overhead that was lightly rotating. He tipped his head up into the breeze, sighing quietly.

Sleep had been easy. Certainly far easier than the first time he'd tried to go to sleep that night - Ellis had exhausted him, and it had been a deep sleep till he'd apparently tried to move.

Shifting his weight to carefully try and get his elbows back behind himself, moving to pull himself to sit up on the couch, Nick's shoulder brushed against something uneven and firm where his head had been resting on the cushion. Confused, he pawed back a hand to grab it, dragging it in front of himself.

Green eyes turned a bit shocked as he held Ellis' cap in front of his face.

What the hell? Ellis' hat? Why - what? He was confused out of his mind, probably worsened by only being freshly woken up. He turned the cap in his fingers with a bewildered attention, a thumb straightening it out from where it'd been folded a bit strangely under the weight of his head.

Had Ellis put it there? Like a pillow? He supposed that meant the others were already awake, although there was a heavy silence in the house that made him wonder.

Starting to put the hat down, Nick's brow rose in curiousity when a folded, torn bit of paper tumbled out from the inside onto his stomach. "Well, that's helpful." He snorted vaguely, holding onto the hat as he picked up the note and shook it open by an edge.

The handwriting was neat enough, a little curly with sharp angles. The words got smaller and more crammed together as it went, Ellis rambling hopelessly on a too-small piece of paper. He'd torn it off from a larger piece, apparently thinking he'd only take a few inches of paper.

As if.

'Mr. Gambling Man,
"Hah. Yeah, that's what that means, dumbshit." Nick had to turn it over to read the rest, a little arrow pointing him on.

'Gonna try and get you some cigarettes while we're there. Wish I knew what kind of snack you like. But Ro says they'll just leave me if I don't get a move on. I'm leaving my hat with ya! We'll be back real shortly.'

Shaking his head, Nick tossed the note away with a sigh. He felt slightly amused, imagining Ellis scrambling to write the note up while Coach and Rochelle waited impatiently.

It was strange. He sat there for a moment, in silence, realizing slowly that he trusted them to come back. All three of them. He would've gladly put money on it. That security, that safety... had he ever known what it felt like?

Damn I hope they do find some smokes.. what I'd give. Christ.

Using a hand to grip onto the slacks of his injured leg, Nick carefully turned himself on the couch. Letting his feet settle on the carpet, he tested his footing as he straightened his somewhat messily dressed body. Straightening out his dress shirt and tucking it more neatly into his slacks, he sighed, rolling his weight onto his bad leg.

It distinctly hurt, pain making his brows twitch uncomfortably, but it didn't crumple like it had the day before. Inspired, Nick put his palms to the couch and gently pushed to stand up. He was still going to be limping, but hopefully less, today.

Hobbling carefully away from the couch with Ellis' hat left behind on the armrest, Nick advanced toward what looked like a small kitchen next to the laundry room. He needed a drink - water would do, though something alcoholic would've been even better.

Wincing slightly as he crossed from carpet to cold tile, Nick aimed for the sink. He flicked on the tap, running a fingertip through the stream that splashed out in an uneven pillar. It was... lukewarm, but his mouth was dry.

He reached up to open an overhead cabinet, hunting for a glass. A coffee mug came first to his fingers, and he turned it to glance inside. It seemed pretty clean, but not enough for him to quite trust it.

His mind inevitably drifted to the night before while he ran the mug underneath the tap, letting water gather up inside it and then pouring it out with a slight shake. He should've been the mature one - the confident one who knew what he was doing.

Instead, he was pretty sure Ellis was the one assured in his decisions.

_Guy jumped me like a cheap whore. Jesus. Turned him gay quick, didn't you, Nicolas? Hah._

Unfortunately, blaming the situation on Ellis didn't work too well. Nick still had a lingering awareness of holding Ellis close, body warm and perfect against his chest. His brows furrowed, squeamishly yanking a paper towel off a roll attached to the bottom of a cabinet just beside his head to scrub at the mug with.

It had felt good. Right, even. He couldn't deny that - it just had.
Ellis did something to him. He saw through Nick's ploys and pokerfaces, even when the kid couldn't really understand why. Ellis played him without any kind of intent to, broke him down with bumbling skill. It scared him.

_Maybe he's good for you._

Startled by the thought, Nick's fingers slipped on the slick mug and he dropped it into the sink with a loud clatter. Wincing quickly, he dived a hand to pick it back up, checking to see if he'd broken it.

Good for him - that was a strange thought. He didn't necessarily like it, either.

Sighing in annoyance, he let the mug fill up with water before shutting the tap off. Turning away, he used his free hand to push himself up, hopping onto the edge of the sink and forcing himself to relax now that he could dangle his bad leg.

Nick sipped from his mug with an expression about as pleased as a drenched cat.

He'd just take it simple. There was really no meaning behind his behaviour. They just laid close for a moment. It was natural after sex. He definitely shouldn't have felt uncomfortable about it - even if it had been intimate. Or touching Ellis soothingly afterward - even if he had felt his chest tighten. Or his own reluctance to leave - even if he had sincerely wanted to stay.

None of it meant anything, not really.

Simple fact was they had a good thing going, and Nick liked simplicity almost as much as he liked good things. There was no guilt in letting it happen - especially if it felt good. _It's the fucking apocalypse. Can I just have this one goddamn thing?_

Scrunching his nose at his mug, he grumbled a little. The water tasted tinny. He would've given anything for bottled water, but that wasn't much of an option. Not to mention, he didn't know how long the others had been gone and when they'd come back.

He felt a little useless. Bored, even. It grated at him that they'd 'let him sleep' like some cripple. He wasn't crippled, just wounded. Glaring at his bad leg only stirred a sense of resentment in his gut - but there was no one to yell at. He was alone.

Standing up with a slight 'umf' as he landed his weight entirely on his good foot, he restlessly looked around the kitchen. He had to do something while he was waiting.

Nick limped over to the fridge, opening it up and gazing inside as he took a swig of water. There wasn't much, mostly condiments and old Tupperware containers with questionable contents. At the very bottom of the fridge, though, was an empty bottle of beer tipped on its side.

He eyed it, head tipping in sudden interest as an idea struck him.

"Heh."

Bending down with a hand balancing himself on the fridge door, Nick picked up the bottle and tucked it into his suit pocket. The glass was cold from being in the fridge, and it chilled lightly at his hip. He abandoned his mug of water on one of the shelves in the fridge, leaving the door open carelessly.

He smirked, suddenly feeling in a good mood. He could still remember the night he'd learned how to make a Molotov Cocktail - sitting on a cold cement wall, fingers tight on his own knees, watching clear fuel chug into a bottle in fascination. He'd been a kid back then... learning how to "Figured you'd take to a history lesson better if it was hands-on, Nick. You remember who used the first Molotovs?"

"They weren't called Molotovs when they were first used."

That laugh. The loud one that made Nick feel hilarious. "... Little smartass."

Nick hobbled slightly as he started pawing through cabinets. Ten to one there was hard alcohol somewhere in the house, stashed away. He just had to find it. "Let's see, booze, booze..."

He found a few bottles behind a bunch of cooking spices. Weak wines and a bottle of some chocolate cordial left him disappointed at first. A moment later, though, he spotted a clear plastic bottle nearer the back, quickly leaning in to drag it out. Much to his approval - it was actual vodka.

Shitty vodka, but high-proof. It'd be enough.

Grinning subtly, he set both the bottles he had on the counter. Uncapping the vodka, he carefully filled the beer bottle halfway, eyeing the subtle shadow of rising liquid through the brown glass.

"Fuel..."

Pleased, he put the vodka bottle down and hobbled over to the sink again with his half-made Molotov gripped tight in one hand. Picking up the bottle of dishwasher detergent just beside the sink and shaking it slightly, Nick snapped the cap open with one hand.

He poured it carefully into the bottle, adding a few inches of height to the mixture inside, shadow and light swirling perceptibly inside the bottle as the heavy detergent dribbled through the alcohol.

"Thickener..."

Replacing the detergent bottle back up against the wall, Nick went through the nearby drawers carefully until he found a washrag. Winding it up into a twist, he jammed one end into the mouth of the beer bottle, working it a few inches in.

Surveying his work with a content smirk, Nick set the thing down on the counter carefully.

Just needs a light and it's set to go. Damn, you're good, Nicolas.

He had to laugh. Getting something to focus on had definitely made him feel better, and now he felt like he'd actually done something useful with what could've been wasted time. "I should've done this earlier. Fuck zombies."

Digging through a few drawers, he found one full of various junk that had a few matchbooks inside. He stowed one in the hidden pocket on the inside of his suit, with his wallet.

Ellis was going to freak when he saw. He probably had a story about Keith burning himself alive with one of these. Rochelle would likely disapprove and give him one of those 'Where the hell did you learn that' looks... Coach, ten to one, would just shake his head and frown. That seemed to be his reaction to Nick.

Speaking of - where the hell are they?

He was fast getting tired of waiting. Who knew how long he'd been asleep - and add on the time he'd wasted screwing around... it wasn't his job to sit around and wait for them like a housewife.
"Fuck this." Setting the bottle on the counter and abandoning it, he turned and hobbled carefully back out of the kitchen.

Circling the couch, Nick worked his black-socked feet into his shoes ditched just on the carpet. As he winced slightly, having to bend down to help his bad leg into the shoe and grab his crowbar settled nearby, he re-noticed Ellis' hat perched on the couch armrest.

Smirking lightly, he wormed his foot into his shoe and straightened back up. Nick tucked his crowbar underneath his arm and picked up the blue cap, eyeing it for a moment. He still couldn't believe Ellis had left it with him. He was tempted to pretend to lose it. Ellis would have an aneurysm.

Chuckling at the thought, Nick undid the width adjustment in the soft mesh back of the cap. He pulled his suit jacket up slightly, working the band through one of the belt loops above his backside. Snapping it closed, he let the hat dangle down from its makeshift hook. His jacket hid it pretty well when he snapped it back in place, though he could feel it.

He'd fuck with Ellis a little. Just a few minutes of terror - he mocked a Southern accent already, rolling his eyes in humor as he turned to limp toward the door. "Oh, yeah, Ay-lus. I ever tell you 'bout the time yer cap fell right outta my hands into that there sewer grate outside?"

Cracking himself up, Nick carefully pulled a light table set up on its side away from the doorway. They'd somewhat unbarricaded the door to get out, but replaced that to keep Nick safe. He admitted being a bit annoyed they didn't think one of three might be able to stay back with him, but he wasn't about to dwell on it.

I'll wait till I find them to bitch about that.

Stepping gladly through the doorway, Nick tipped his head up into the sunlight. It was maybe late morning, and the sky was clear to a wonderful degree. The sun warmed pleasantly at his skin, making him shake his head and run a hand through his hair.

Hobbling down the few steps leading onto the gravel road, Nick pulled his crowbar from under his arm and held it with an absent swing. He carefully walked down the road, leg not hurting too badly to manage.

His gaze wandered his surroundings as he walked at as fast a pace he could manage, slightly uncomfortable being alone and injured… though he wouldn't've admitted it aloud. He didn't see any zombies, just a few dead bodies that looked pretty fresh. The other three must've run into them on the way.

Nick relaxed a little with that thought, though he didn't lower his crowbar. He started to hum a flat tune, shoes crunching on uneven gravel as he approached the back of the gas station's parking lot.

He was glad to step onto asphalt as the gravel road turned into parking lot. It gave him much better footing and a smoother walk, lessening the pressure on his bad leg. Sighing in slight relief, Nick angled toward the gas station building with a smirk.

He had to step over a few infected bodies, glancing at them only momentarily before crinkling his nose and looking away. Tucking his crowbar into his belt, he stretched out his arms lightly.

If that dipshit tries to give me some of his candy I'll smack him... Chuckling absently as he limped along the wall, he gave a shake of his head. This was the gas station that had been broken and covered in blood, and all the windows busted. Light spilled out into the parking lot so they must've found a working light.

He was just two steps away from the corner of the building when he heard it.

"Ain't the zombies bad enough!?"

It was panicked and confused to a desperate point - Ellis' voice. There was a level of terror in his tone that set Nick's teeth on edge, his skin prickling sharply. He'd never heard that from the Georgian. Not once.

What the fuck?!!

Immediately, Nick went flat against the wall, eyes narrowed. A cold sensation spilled down his spine, perking for the next sounds. They were in front of the gas station, not inside it.

"We can do this tugether! Yuh don't gotta -"

Ellis' yelp and a sharp smack, the familiar sound of metal against skin, made anger flare up so sharply in Nick he couldn't take it. Sliding his head to the side, he let his gaze slant to see around the corner just next to him without baring more than he had to of his face.

He saw Ellis stumbling into Coach and Rochelle's quickly grabbing arms, holding his cheek with a shocked look of pain as blood started to trickle from a split on his cheekbone.

Standing just a few feet away from them on the asphalt was a blonde woman, re-aiming the handgun that she'd clearly pistol-whipped Ellis with. All Nick could see of her features was the frizzy and dirty yellow hair falling around her shoulders, and the torn-up, bloodied, and darkly stained leather biker getup she was wearing.

"Shut up, pussy." she snapped, sounding practically amused with him. Jerking the handgun at Coach, she cocked a hip and ordered, "You, tubs. Take off the backpack."

He'd been on both ends of that gun before - but the fact the woman had hit Ellis... vibrant, flowing rage spilled into every single inch of the conman's skin. He was on fire - and then emotion drained from him as his heart adopted a steady thud in his chest.

Nick pulled back there, expression absolute stone as he reached down to pull his Magnum out of its thigh holster. He eased the ammo well open, softly, staring just an instant at the empty holes returning his gaze with blank faces. Had he really used his last bullets? The swamp had stolen so much from them… energy, time, supplies, ammo…

Pretending you had the upper hand was far harder than pretending you didn't.

Returning it into place with a snap, he looked up and let his fingers settle into a confident squeeze on the grip, finger on the trigger. There was a murderous steel to his expression, an unflinching grit to his jaw, he hadn't felt in years.

Stepping out past the corner of the building with a solid stance that didn't betray an inch of pain, Nick aimed his Magnum right at her back and spoke coolly.

"Bad move, bitch."
Chapter 50

The air might've cracked under the weight of the moment's tension.

The muzzle of Nick's Magnum glinted in the sunlight, aimed dangerously at the blonde's spine. She stiffened, holding utterly still but for the smallest turn of her head to gaze back at him. One muddy green eye sized him up past dirty strands of yellow-blonde hair, a metal stud protruding from her brow.

"Who the fuck are you?"

Ellis immediately tried to wrest out of Coach and Rochelle's grip, panicked, but they held him fast. "Nick! Nick, don't -!" There was something distinctly horrified in his expression, and Nick had a very strong feeling Ellis knew his gun had no ammo.

The last thing he needed was Ellis giving him away. Just looking at the kid made every cell in Nick's body tremble with anger - his cheekbone was bruising into a dark purple, blood reaching his jaw in that soft trickle.

I will fucking kill you, you bitch.

Rochelle silenced Ellis first with a careful squeeze, but the blonde tightened a dirty finger on the trigger of her pistol anyway, aimed unerringly towards the three. " Shut it, kid, before I shut it for you." she stated without looking away from Nick.

"Don't say a word, any of you." Nick snarled in a demand, tone so angrily severe that Ellis whimpered faintly, blue eyes nervously darting between the two guns being pointed around. Rochelle held tightly onto him, looking at Nick... confidently. She trusted him.

Coach - Nick couldn't tell. Maybe he was just resigned to trusting him.

Nick's gaze met the blonde's again, green boiling silently like acid as his stony expression and tone threatened all on their own. "Put. The gun. Down. Keep pointing it at them and I will fucking put a bullet in your spine."

She smirked carelessly, letting out a small laugh and jerking the nose of her pistol slightly. "I have your little friends under the knife right now, buddy. You want to try that again?"

There wasn't even a split second before he was retorting, pure anger rising insensibly deep beneath a cool expression of veneered hatred. He almost interrupted her entirely. "No, not really. Because I can blow your fucking head off before you even think about thinking about pulling that trigger, bitch."

The blonde didn't seem to soften in the slightest, gaze flickering now between Nick and the other three. Her weight adjusted on her boots, tongue slowly sliding over her lower lip. "I can take at least one out before you get me. Up to losing a friend, fuckface? Or are you gonna sidle over like a good boy and start emptying your pockets?"

Nick let his finger tighten subtly, wishing furiously that he had a loaded gun in his hand. This was too much of a gamble - too much at stake... God, he had to get that gun out of her hands.

But he didn't pause. Didn't let any time pass, to give away his insecurity.
"So? Shoot, bitch. I don't give a shit. We're all gonna die sometime." he questioned carelessly, not even drifting his gaze away from her face. His eyes narrowed further, and on a risk, he let some of the rage buried down slip into his voice. It grated, snarling, going deeper with anger. "No matter how this works out, you end up splattered on the ground for the zombies."

That seemed to give her pause, jaw grinding out to one side. Her weight shifted with a slight nervous motion, bringing a fast pulse to Nick's heartbeat. The very last thing he needed was for her to panic. If she tried anything... and he didn't shoot her immediately... she'd realize the con.

He growled darkly, a level of calm threat flattening his voice as he put it in simple terms: "Put the fucking gun down, and we can all walk away."

Adjusting her grip on her handgun, the blonde clamped green-brown eyes on his sharply, narrowing and furrowing her brows dangerously. "Looks like we've got a little stalemate here. One of us is going to have to bend over."

"No." he asserted, angrily, taking one strong step closer with a jerk of his pistol. Nick knew he was winning when she didn't risk trying to shift her aim to him in retaliation. "You are going to fucking drop the weapon because anything else will get you a fist-sized hole in your chest before you can say I'm Nick's bitch."

Darting her gaze subtly, she chewed on her tongue, visibly considering that statement. "...Fuck. It's not worth dying." Her expression hollowed slightly, lips going taut against one another. "This would've been a whole lot simpler without your pussy ass involved." she muttered, angrily, her wrist limping.

With a frustrated motion, she let her handgun fall from her fingers, it clattering away on the asphalt. Almost mockingly, she lifted up her hands like she were being held at gunpoint even when Nick let his attention shift away from his Magnum in favor of carefully advancing forward. He bent down to pick up her pistol, gripping it quickly in his left hand.

Letting his fingers roll on the pistol's grip, Nick felt a surge of anger burn up the length of his spine. It felt heavy in his hand - hot, and his fingertips dug into the rubber that coated its grip. Straightening cautiously, his gaze jerked up to the blonde's face. Underneath frustrated green eyes, she was smirking faintly.

Nick could only vaguely hear Rochelle's voice, oblivious to the anger coursing through the gambler. "Oh thank God... I thought someone was going to get killed... she jumped us in the gas station, Nick. I'm so glad you came and found us."

In a motion that seemed to just float with such enraged ease, Nick suddenly took the few steps between them and whipped her straight across the face with the butt of her own pistol.

It struck her mouth instead of her cheek, and she went down with a strong yelp of surprise, thudding flat on her back. One of her hands quickly went up to cup over her lips, blood trickling between her fingers. He might've broken a tooth. "You fucker!"

It wasn't revenge enough.

There was a distinct silence whirling around Nick's head as he aimed the loaded pistol straight down into her face. His whole body coiled behind it, feeling the hot steel stretch out over his fingers. His index finger toyed with the trigger underneath it, arm tight with tension.

Shoot, Nicolas. Pull the fucking trigger.
He was sure he heard voices, speaking to him softly, but he shut them out. He could imagine the other three telling him to calm down, put down the gun. That it was over. Getting increasingly panicked when he failed to respond, gun completely steady in his hand.

The blonde's green-brown eyes simmered up into his over the barrel of the gun, threatening. The bitch hit Ellis. She threatened to kill them. Are you just going to fucking let it go?!!

Christ, he felt possessive. Over-protective - a deep offense boiling to acrid hate at the thought of anyone doing anything to Ellis. He should've been there to stop it... but this would have to do. Revenge served hot on the head of a bullet.

_Do it._ His finger tightened, feeling the steel trigger start to roll back on its joint, centimeter by centimeter growing closer to firing -

"Nick." Heavy with that Southern hum, the utterance of his name pierced his thoughts. His finger stilled, realizing Ellis had come to stand just beside him. The kid's presence suddenly broke his determination, and his body froze up.

He'd have done it.

Fingertips touched the back of his wrist, warm and gentle. Nick felt himself blink sharply, gaze darting down to the hand settling over his. It very gently pushed downward, and though his whole arm was stiff as iron, the pressure gradually lowered his gun until it pointed blankly down to the cement.

Jerked into clear thought like he'd been knocked free of a trance, Nick felt tension wring out of his muscles in a slow dribble. He turned his head, and his gaze met Ellis'. There was a certain understanding, a coaxing warmth, in those blue eyes. The younger man smiled at him soothingly, blood tracing down his dirty cheek. "Yer alright, Nick. Let it go."

Nick's breath left him in a slight huff. Glancing between the blonde and the man beside him, he slowly pulled his finger away from the trigger. The anger drained out of Nick slowly, suddenly completely loosening his tense arms. When it seemed sure he was back in control, Ellis let his fingers pull away, fisting that hand cautiously around the ghosted warmth of their contact.

There was nothing he could do but look away, frustrated. He didn't know what he felt. Was it guilt? He'd have killed her, he knew that. It wasn't the first time, but never like this. Like an execution. Self-defense went out the window the minute she lost her gun.

Rochelle seemed even more shaken now, giving him a distinct look of uncertainty.

Oddly, on the other hand, Coach was calm. He gave Nick a firm nod, assured, and deepset eyes seemed impressed. Nick wasn't sure why - it was Ellis he should've been impressed with... the kid was the only reason the thief wasn't dead.

"What's your name?" he spat down at the blonde, dangerously warning her with deeply twitching brows. He felt his anger flicker hotter when she gave him a smug narrow of her eyes, silent, but it was under control now. "Fine, bitch. Are you alone?"

Rochelle gently pulled away from Coach, walking forward to set her hand softly on Nick's arm. The blonde was clearly not interested in responding, gently soothing her bleeding mouth with her palm and downcasting her gaze defiantly.

"You 'xpect lootin', but can't say I thought folks'd turn to armed robbery." Coach quietly noted, crossing his arms carefully with a sigh. The blonde laughed sharply like she'd just heard something "We can leave her at the house after we get all our stuff." Rochelle suggested quietly. "There's supplies and electricity there, so it wouldn't be cruel."

Nick was instantly incredulous, turning his head to give her a disbelieving look. He shook her hand off, his usual tone of general disagreement returning in place of genuine anger. "Cruel?! Not being cruel was not fucking shooting her in the head! Far as I'm concerned being kind is telling her to fuck off right now."

That riled a response out of the woman, blood speckling her front when she spat out, "Fuck you."

Ellis uncertainly scratched at his head, sighing softly. 'Tunno, Ro'. I'm sorta with Nick on this one. She's dangerous." He didn't say it outright, but as he spoke, he lifted his hand and touched softly on his cheek, daubing away some blood with his fingertips. His expression was slightly hurt - he just wanted the woman away from them. No one could blame him.

Rochelle looked around for a moment, hesitant, but when she saw the sentiment worn into all three of her friends' faces, she gave in wearily with a sigh. "Alright, your call - majority rules and all that."

Immediately moving with the permission, Nick dropped to a bend at the waist in front of the blonde. He glared down at her severely, twisting his wrist to flip his Magnum around in his hand so he held the muzzle. He didn't care enough about the weapon to hang onto it when he had a perfectly fine pistol to replace it with now.

She didn't flinch when he suddenly stuck it out toward her face, but it took her a moment to understand he was offering it to her, not preparing to hit her again. "Get the fuck out of here, right now. I don't care where you were going, you go back down the highway like a good girl. If I see your goddamn face again, you will regret it. Capiche?"

"Aw. You're so sweet. Dick." she snarled through bloody teeth as she went to snatch the Magnum out of his hand. He jerked it slightly out of her reach just at the last second, giving her a long, dark warning stare.

"... you fucked up, blondie. Zombies are nothing compared to what I'd do to you if we were alone right now." Sliding the Magnum into her hand, he straightened up and crossed his arms easily. A smirk settled flat on his face, watching her as he felt the other three step up behind him.

The blonde shoved herself up with her palms, quickly getting the Magnum in her hand. She backed up, eyeing them carefully as her boots slowly rolled with each cautious step backward.

Nick wasn't surprised in the least when she got barely a few feet away and suddenly lifted up the Magnum to take aim right at his chest. Rochelle didn't have time to do more than jump in horror, and Coach's hand clapped on his shoulder like he were prepared to shove the conman to the ground, but it was too late.

Her finger pulled back on the trigger hard - and it clicked dully. Nick gave one little blink in reaction to it, smirk unwavering, as her spiteful grin turned into a faltering look of shock. The blonde pulled the trigger one more time, cursing ferociously under her breath.

"There's no fucking ammo in this thing?! You bullshitted me, you fucker!"

Feeling Coach's hand go slack on his sleeve, Nick coolly lifted up his gun-toting left hand, aiming neatly with a straight arm. He tipped his head so he could gaze straight down the length of black metal, feeling a smirk curl up his features.

"Run, bitch."

She did. It took her a moment, staring from the useless Magnum in her hand to Nick's loaded pistol, but as the repercussions of what she'd just tried to do fully sunk in, she bolted full-speed across the parking lot, scrambling to sprint down the sidewalk before he could shoot.

Coach actually laughed slightly, chuckling a bit gruffly as she disappeared around the edge of a building. Nick let his arm fall, smirking faintly, and the big man clapped him on the shoulder.

"You did good, Nick. Can't believe that gun wasn't loaded. Yo' gamblin' habit came in handy fo' once."

There was an honest compliment there. Nick overlooked the 'for once' - maybe Coach might actually start to get along with him. He inhaled cautiously, shrugging up a shoulder and glancing over it. He felt his gaze tug toward Ellis' bruised face. "It was messy. Too much risk."

Rochelle teased him lightly, but she seemed distracted. Her brows were furrowed a little - she didn't look to be recovering as quickly from the blonde's attempt at betrayal, gazing after her with a slightly tight stance. "Awwh. That's the sweetest thing you've ever said about us."

"Hah. Yeah... you guys... not me getting shot in the face or anything..." he quipped morosely, earning an elbow from the pink-shirted woman. He flashed her a small smirk, and she shook her head subtly.

"I'm just glad we're all okay, man... that was scary." Ellis sighed out, closing a hand over his pretty badly bleeding cheek. Nick suddenly felt a little disgusted holding the gun he was, and he jammed it in his thigh holster with a grunt.

"I doubt she'll be back." Rochelle suggested, sighing. "You're pretty scary when you want to be, Nick, sweetie. I'm not complaining, it's just..." She trailed off, shaking her head and giving a light smile.

Even though he was mumbling slightly, tone seeming a little forced, Ellis started in on a story; "Reminds me'uh this one time muh buddy Keith was tryin' tuh learn how tuh skateboard but he thought it was too borin', so he took these huge tin sheets 'n built-'"

Coach interrupted him almost immediately, weary, rubbing the back of his bald head. "What in the hell does this have to do with what just happened, son?"

Ellis blinked slightly, chuckling lightly. "Oah, well the hobo whut started livin' underneath his ramps tried tuh mug him with a knife while he was skateboardin'. It wouldn't'uh been so funny if Keith hadn't'uh been unconscious at the time, what with him fallin' straight off the ramp ontuh his head. Ain't like Keith could have put up no fight. He took his wallet'n'cash'n'everythin'."

There was a silence, momentarily.

Nick chuckling faintly broke it, and with a tired noise of consternation, Coach reached into his backpack. He unzipped it without taking it off, blindly digging a hand into its contents. "We got some things before she jumped us, Nick."

A plastic pack of gummy worms was tossed at Ellis, a small box of cigarettes at Nick. There was a short whistle of glee from the mechanic, brightening visibly as he clutched the bag to his chest.
"Thankyuh, Coach!"

Nick didn't say a word, just nodding his head with unspoken and deep appreciation, breaking the pack open. He needed one just about then - for a few reasons. He let the filter nestle between his lips, reaching into his inner pocket to pry out the matchbook.

He lit it as Rochelle looped her arm in Coach's and pulled him gently to start walking back toward the house. Nick thought she did so rather suddenly, but he didn't argue. "Let's get everything we need from the house and get going. I don't really want to hang around here too much longer."

"Mm. Agreed." Nick quietly affirmed, shaking out his match as the tip of his cigarette caught dull fire. His free hand reached back to curl on Ellis' elbow, guiding the kid to walk next to him after seeing Ellis was so thoroughly distracted in trying to tear into the plastic bag in his hands.

Inhaling deeply, Nick let the smoke roil out of his nostrils, the burn distracting him as he started to limp lightly after them. The adrenaline was gone, and he realized he probably should've been more careful with his leg. It was fast starting to hurt fairly badly, the pain reminiscent of the skin of his calf splitting down the center.

Speaking far under his breath so the other two couldn't hear him, he caught his cigarette with his teeth and talked past it. "You okay, kiddo?"

"Yeah, I jus' can't get this dang thing open..." Ellis mumbled, deeply invested in his work trying to pluck at the sealed plastic and tear it as he tagged obediently along with Nick's gently pulling hand.

It made Nick snort, unable to stifle it. Snatching the bag out of his fingers, Nick tore the thing sharply at the top before replacing it in Ellis' hands. "Not that, dumbshit."

Ellis started to happily reach in and grab one of the shiny gummies piled up in the pack, but all of a sudden, Nick's hand slipped past his face and curled fingertips under his jaw.

Turning his head, Nick made the Georgian look up at him, touching his thumb gently under the bloody tear across his cheekbone. "This." Ellis' eyes winced softly, but a blush built up along the bridge of his nose, nearly stumbling from surprise as Nick tenderly examined the wound.

"U-uh -" the younger man uttered in a little breathless noise, lips parting softly. Nick could see his blue eyes flickering around his face. "I-It's okay.. hurts a li'l but it - it ain't like I ain't had way worse..."

Nick blew a smoky breath out to the side of his mouth, releasing Ellis' jaw before anyone could have spied the gesture. His gaze narrowed, fending off a building anger. He couldn't help but question himself - was he going to feel this incensed if Ellis got hurt by zombies, too...

Where is this even coming from... Stupid. You're being stupid.

"I think I'm the only one here who's been held at gunpoint before. You alright?"

"A-ahw.. yeah, Nick." the Georgian mumbled, dropping his chin subtly like he had a cap bill to hide underneath. He rubbed at his jaw, smoothing gently over the space where Nick had touched him. "'M fine... Just real glad she didn't call you out on the gun... that scared me more."

"Yeah, well... good move, stopping me back there, Ace. Been told I need reining in sometimes." Nick sighed deeply, looking forward. "We'll get a butterfly on it... I think I saw some in that bathroom."

"... Butterfly?" Ellis repeated vaguely, blush spreading even along his bruised cheek. Nick smirked softly, adjusting his cigarette with his fingertips at the question. The Georgian seemed disoriented, and he wasn't sure if it was lingering discomfort from the blow to the head. Or, maybe Ellis didn't know how to react to Nick being… kind.

That makes two of us.

"Bandage for deeper cuts. Works like a stitch."

Ellis didn't respond for a few moments, focusing suddenly on dragging out a gummy and biting down on it. He chewed ineffectually at it, the end dangling from his lips much like Nick's cigarette.

Nick felt protective. He didn't even know if he liked it, but the feeling was there. At least it fueled anger rather than any other emotion. He could take anger. Anger was easy, and smooth, and numbed him.

Pulling on his cigarette as he limped forward, he kept a glance going toward Ellis, curiously. The Georgian clearly had something to say, but he seemed to be mulling it over.

His stare must've urged the kid into talking, because - swallowing down his worm with a bit of a gulp - Ellis glanced up with those blue eyes and prompted in a whisper, "'Ey Nick - are you? Okay, I mean. I ain't seen you look so angry before, not even when I piss you off.."

Drawing a tight breath from his smoking cigarette, Nick furrowed his brows. He wasn't wholly sure how to answer that, and immediate instinct had him striving to avoid the conversation entirely.

The words just worked out of him, careless to a point. "I'm fine, sport. I had to do something to scare her into giving up - y'know, the whole, the gun was actually empty thing? Threats work pretty well."

Ellis nodded faintly as they approached the house. He didn't argue, but Nick had the feeling he'd been seen through anyway. It probably wasn't the last he'd hear of it, unless Ellis decided to be kind.

The Georgian certainly wasn't hurt by being avoided. Nick felt himself startle slightly when fingers brushed his, planting a gummy between his fingertips. The gambler couldn't even pretend to be agitated at the gesture - he just eyed the thing, twirling it between his fingertips for a minute. If he hadn't been so hungry, he wouldn't have eaten it.

What was Nick supposed to say - 'yeah, seeing you hurt just drove me absolutely fucking homicidal'? That didn't sound right in his head, let alone spoken aloud.

They fell silent on the topic anyway, the distance between them and the other two waning as they came up to their makeshift pit stop, immediately spreading out to give the house a final once-over for supplies. Nick's leg was growing insufferable quickly, and he kept it a secret when he slipped a dose of painkillers from Coach's pack. He'd sweat them out before it could give him more nightmares, anyway.

And if that didn't work, Ellis seemed to be a good enough remedy.
"That has got to be the coolest shit I have ever seen! Man, I didn't know you could do that, Nick! Keith did once, but he didn't do it right 'cause it exploded when he mixed whatever it was he was tryin' to make it with - didn't even set no fires, just popped the bottle like a damn balloon! Man, he still ain't never told me whut went wrong... 'Course that might'uh been 'cause he don't remember it none. Glass shards went right intuh his head, man! Doctor said he hadn't never seen a thing like it. He was bald fer like months after 'cause they had tuh shave his head - Keith, not the doctor."

Nick couldn't help but laugh under his breath, resting his forearm against the kitchen's threshold and leaning his weight on the wood. Ellis was inspecting his Molotov like an over-excited kid, fingers rather delicate on the brown glass.

"You don't think that's a little dangerous?" Rochelle tried to gently suggest, scratching at the back of her neck with her pinky as she slightly dubiously watched Ellis' enthusiasm. "I don't know if doing what Keith does is a real smart thing..."

The conman smirked, letting his wounded leg curl up slightly onto its toes to relax it. "Good thing I know how to make it right, then, isn't it...? Dumbass hick probably fucked it up. Besides, Ro', it's just one and it's not like we're going to let Ellis use it."

"Whut?! Why not?!!" Ellis immediately protested, spinning around and giving a frown as he held the softly sloshing bottle to his chest. "But it's so cool -!"

Laughing with a shake of her head, Rochelle reached out to gently pry the thing from his hands. He looked distinctly unhappy watching the bottle pull out of his grasp, practically pouting as he clutched after it.

"But -"

"Let it go, sweetie. Hate to say it, but I trust Nick more than you with this."

Pouting slightly, Ellis let his hands drop to curl on the looped fabric of his coveralls and sigh. He kicked the toe of his workboot lightly on the kitchen tile, resigning with a fair amount of reluctance. "I wanna at least see it go off..."

Nick snorted in amusement, gesturing with a pinky to Ro' that she should just set it back on the counter. She obliged him, flashing a soft grin of humor at Ellis' expense. "Dumbshit, of course you will - it's not like the four of us separate much. It'll just have someone with good aim throwing it."

Ellis' expression turned a little affronted, tone gaining a stubborn edge. He tried to paw at his hat, fingers sinking into bare curls when he forgot he still hadn't gotten it back. "'Ey, I got perfectly fine aim! Just's good as you!

"What are y'all arguin' about?" Coach gruffly interjected from the front room. His tone was half-amused - he was busy going through the supplies they'd found around the house, organizing and picking. It was rather funny to Nick (and somewhat revealing) that, even to him, 'supplies' suddenly meant almost solely 'any fucking thing we can put on a wound.'

They were all getting injured so much, the space that they had in that backpack was wasted if not taken up by medicine. Even food was a hesitant afterthought when they could likely scavenge as necessity hit.

"Ellis wants to play with fire." Nick taunted over his shoulder with a deep pull from his cigarette, smirking as the youngest survivor shoved his hands into his pockets with a teasing sour look.

Coach chuckled, sounding more energetic than he'd been in days. The big man had always seemed on the edge of weariness, looking over things like he'd seen them a hundred times before and couldn't be surprised, but since they'd gotten back inside the house something had entered his voice.

Nick wanted to call it inspiration - it was odd.

"Ellis, quit that shit. Last thing we need is yo' ass wit' a firebottle."

Ellis jutted out his lower lip, bouncing on his heels discontentedly. He gave a heavy sigh and resigned to the ex-football player's decision, not looking very happy at all. He was like a kid refused candy - something rather funny to think when he promptly comforted himself by pulling his bag of candy out of his pocket and nibbling on one.

"Awh, shit. Alright, alright... man, I can't wait tuh tell Keith we fought zombies with a Mollie!"

Nick snorted with a shake of his head, turning away and limping softly out into the front room. "Come upstairs, Ace, and stop obsessing over the damn bomb... you need something on that cheek unless you want a scar on that dumbshit face of yours."

Whatever he said, Nick had to admit that Ellis' enthusiasm made him smile inwardly. He'd been proud enough of it himself, but Ellis' that is the coolest thing in the world attitude was - flattering.

The conman crossed the living room to where the couch was, leaning his forearm on the top cushions. He stuck out a hand as he rolled his cigarette to the corner of his mouth, gesturing blankly for the backpack. "I think you guys stole most of the stash upstairs. You mind if I look in there real quick?"

Coach glanced back over his shoulder before hoisting the backpack up to where Nick could reach it. He held it there, rubbing his brow with the fingertips of his other hand. He questioned the gambler as he did, lightly. "Yo' leg lookin' better? You're walkin' on it okay, looks like."

Nick gave a small nod as he dug into the backpack, flicking through the arrangement of what medicinal supplies they did have in hunt of the little winged shape of the butterfly bandage he needed.

"Yeah. It still hurts like a fucking bitch, but I think last night did it good. -" He meant that in a few ways, Nick reflected momentarily, fighting humor. "- and it's manageable. I'll be slow, though."

"Ain't no thing. We don't have any swamp to go through anyways." the big man responded gruffly, laying his arm over the back of the couch with a sigh. Those firm eyes flickered back, and he pressured, "Don't push it, Nick."

The gambler flashed him a smirk, pausing his search to let his forearms rest a bit on the couch. His head cocked at the implied concern for his safety, curiously. He had to question into the topic - his tone was non-confrontational but sarcastic, and he tore the issue straight open. "One minute we're okay, next minute we're at each other's throats. We're a weird duo, aren't we, Sam?"

Looking unamused at the use of his name, Coach resigned into a chuckle a moment later. All he said was "Yep.", turning his head back forward and looking away.

It was a strangely .. satisfying response, one that he could get behind. Nick liked it and its brazen simplicity. That was just the situation, and they both knew it. You know, if we both accept we're never going to get along, we might just get along.

Laughing under his breath, Nick tucked a wrapped butterfly bandage into his palm when he found it. He turned away from the couch to hobble toward the staircase to the second floor. He noticed Ellis was still in the kitchen and called out sharply over his shoulder, "Overalls! For fuck's sake, step away from the Molotov!"

The kid scampered out a few beats later like a dog who'd been swatted into motion, abashedly chasing after Nick with a piece of candy dangling from his lips. Nick swore there was a light flush over his face, and he felt himself smirk. "S-sorry Nick!"

"Whatever, sport, just c'mon." Nick shook his head, starting up the staircase with a slight wince. Scaling stairs was a lot different than walking on flat ground, and he felt himself slowing down to try and hop his weight as much as he could on his good leg.

The effort of hoisting up his body weight on every other stair sent jagged pain up the back of his calf, a weird stretch in the scabbing flesh making him flinch. It was not going to heal overnight, much as Nick wanted it to.

He felt frustration rising up his spine even though Ellis patiently and calmly followed a few steps behind him. The younger man may as well have started laughing at him for how much Nick started grinding his teeth.

As they reached the middle platform, Nick let out a little huff of pain. Ellis started to say something in reaction, but he didn't get further than the first, sweet 'N' sound of the conman's name before Nick blustered, "Shut up."

The Georgian relented, keeping quiet, just watching Nick struggle up the stairs with a renewed urgency now that he clearly felt rather defensive. He grumbled quietly as he reached the top, pulling himself up with a hard grip on the edge of the doorway. A soft shiver tremored up his spine, but it was more frustration than anything else.

Pushing the half-closed bathroom door open, Nick flicked on the light with a knuckle. He sighed through his nostrils, smoke flowing with the motion, and pried his cigarette from between his lips. Flicking the dying thing into the toilet by his knee, Nick bent over the sink to turn on the tap with one hand while the other grabbed a hanging hand towel. Blood was dried into the porcelain, making Nick crinkle his nose slightly in uncertainty. Considering there was no signs of disturbance anywhere else in the house, it was strange.

"Think someone cut themselves shavin' or somethin'?" Ellis inquired from behind him, gently trotting into the bathroom as he shoved his pack of candy into his pocket. There wasn't a whole lot of room, so when he took a stance behind Nick, it was close to his elbow.

"Maybe if they were a hemophiliac." Nick retorted sardonically, rolling his sleeve up slightly so it didn't get wet when he cupped his hand under the pouring water. He adjusted the temperature just a little so it wasn't too cold, then soaked a handful of the towel he'd found.

"That's just silly, Nick. Whut're the chances'uh that?" the kid blinked dubiously, raising a hand to scratch at his forehead in uncertainty. Funny how he bent his hand a bit as if he had to avoid bumping a cap - Nick could see his curious eyes examining him through the bathroom mirror.

Nick didn't bother to laugh, too busy being impressed at Ellis' knowing the word to make fun of him for not getting the sarcasm. You're pretty smart, El, but holy shit, are you dumb... He felt a smirk tip up the side of his mouth. "I dunno, maybe someone died in here. You believe in ghosts?"

Ellis grinned lightly, shifting his weight a little. Their gazes met on the mirror, neither seeming to really notice the other was staring through the glass. "Didn't used tuh believe in zombies." he taunted, promptly chuckling.

The gambler rolled his eyes with a subtle grin, breaking the gaze as he straightened. He flicked off the tap and patted the bathroom counter. "Get up here, dumbshit. Let Dr. Nick fix ya up." Turning his head to watch as Ellis circled around him, Nick chuckled faintly.

He was blushing. Again.

"Shouldn't scar up, Ace." he added, closing the bathroom door quietly with his heel. He noticed Ellis sneak a glance over at the door as it shut, but he didn't actually comment on it. "Be a shame to mark up that pretty face of yours."

"E-ey! Pretty nothin'..." Ellis protested slightly, hopping up with a little squirm to sit on the edge of the bathroom counter. He set his hands behind himself, fingertips tapping out a quiet tune on the glazed white tile. "Besides. I ain't gonna go through the dang apocalypse and not come out with some cool scars."

Nick snorted lightly, stepping over. He let his hips push between Ellis' knees, settling between his thighs with a dark smirk and a lowered chin. Ellis immediately slumped back a little, turning an interesting shade of red and squirming his knees just the tiniest bit. "Shouldn't be surprised you'd think that way. I'm not looking forward to my leg scarring up."

"Oh, uh... Didn't mean tuh -" He spoke like he'd affronted the older man, so Nick gave him a vague grimace that dissuaded him from apologizing. Instead, Ellis tried to bury his chin against his chest and hunch down from Nick's face. "... It'll be okay, though, man. I mean, gettin' splashed with acid is pretty badass."

"Is that what I felt? I thought it was searing pain." The conman leaned forward, feeling Ellis' knees rub against his hips as he did. Any other time, he might've taken advantage of the moment - but he focused, taking his weight off his bad leg and curling it a bit while he pulled the wet-edged handtowel up to clean up Ellis' bloody cheek. "Honestly, I'm shocked you aren't more scarred up. Having a friend like Keith."

It'd mostly clotted, but as he stroked the washcloth closer to the bruised cut itself, it threatened to bleed again. Nick let his other hand cradle Ellis' other cheek, lifting his head up to force the other man to stop hiding and to hold him still.

Ellis shut his eyes, but his lips curled up in a smile, chuckling even as a soft 'ow' whinged into his voice. "Well... yeah, I mean, Keith's got some cool ones. But he don't let me get hurt or nothin'. Actually, this one time - it's a short story, I swear -"

"You have those?" Nick teased, dabbing the towel right over the wound and soothing Ellis with a stroke of his free thumb as the kid pulled in a sharp breath. Even when the pain seemed to fade from Ellis' face, he found his thumb still moving faintly.

"Haaw."

"Haaw." the younger man retorted quietly, brows lifting slightly before he just continued. "One'uv Keith's first real crazy stunts, he had me helpin' him build this bomb. We was gonna chuck it intuh a lake tuh see whut an explosion underwater'd be like, y'know? ...Well, turns out he did somethin' wrong, 'cause we ain't so much gotten the dang thing put tuhgether when it goes off. Got a chunk'uh metal right to my shoulder," He reached up to poke a fingertip into the swell of his shoulder, just below his clavicle. "damn near in muh neck."

Nick uttered an unpleasant grunt, unable to help it as he cleaned a bit of stubborn dirt on Ellis' cheek while trying not to hurt him.

Ellis tried to nod, not thinking, and Nick had to grab him and shoot him a chiding look. After a quick blink of apology, he spoke, looking a little embarrassed. "Yep. After that, Keith was always real careful tuh get me outta the way if things went sour. Ain't - y'know, now that I think about it, ain't really got hurt since then."

"So that's why you're not a cripple. I wondered." The gambler set the towel down and focused on drawing the butterfly bandage carefully out of its paper wrapping.

Ellis relaxed slightly as Nick pulled his hands away, reaching up one of his own to touch at his cheek gently. "Aww, nah. He never lets nothin' happen tuh me 'cause of his stunts. Kinda gets me heated sometimes 'cause he's always keepin' me outta the cool parts. 'Cause they're the explodin' parts, y'know.. hah!"

Noticing the other man was feeling at his cheek, Nick quickly swatted his arm away with his elbow, snorting a little. "Doctor says no touch-y... - I'd say something about adrenaline junkies being stupid, but I've got my fair share of addictions. Probably hypocritical of me."

Ellis guessed at his meaning curiously, holding still for only a few moments before he tried to lift up his hand again to feel at the injury curiously. He was like a dog scratching at a wound. Too bad Nick didn't have a cone. "Gamblin'?"

Nick chuckled at that, darkly, suddenly snatching up a hand to grab Ellis' wrist. The mechanic stilled instantly, but Nick wasn't done - he slowly let his grip loosen, fingers turning intimate as they loosely stroked at Ellis' wrist. His gaze slitted faintly, face rather close to Ellis'.

He pulled the Georgian's arm down, letting his fingers lose a few inches every time they moved so his palm caressed down the length of the other man's forearm. Ellis was rapidly reddening, lips stuck parted in uncertainty.

"... That's one of them." Nick responded vaguely in a low purr, releasing Ellis' arm now that it was limp on the younger man's thigh. If anything, that certainly stopped his attempts to mess with the injury.

"Y-y- uh - h-ha - that.. uh -"

The poor kid was fumbling so hard, obviously completely caught off-guard by the response, that Nick couldn't bring himself to let Ellis keep going. He'd intended to leave it at that, already pushing it way too far, but he couldn't just let the Georgian hang.

...he's so fuckin' helpless, I swear...

Leaning in, Nick shut Ellis up with a kiss. It wasn't teasing, no play about it - he stole that silky mouth forcefully and held it to be sure Ellis wouldn't try to finish whatever sentence it was he was trying to form.

Ellis tasted sweet - like candy. The gummy worms, of course, but it seemed almost right for those lips to taste of sugar and cherry. It was an innocent taste, not over-processed lipgloss or lipstick like Nick was so used to. He probably tasted like cigarettes.

He regretted that.

Their breaths mixed, soft and slow, lips warm against each other. What had been intended to last for a second or two turned into several before Nick even realized. The kid's hands started to lift up, but Nick saw it in the shift of Ellis' shoulders and let his own hands move to push them back down.

Sighing reluctantly, he pulled back there, licking his lips slowly and glancing away.

He felt... awkward. And that was new. He felt like he'd suddenly stepped into unfamiliar territory, onto unfamiliar ground. That wasn't the kind of kiss he was used to.

Ellis mimicked him, but kept his lips pursed quietly as he shifted his weight a little, exhaling carefully. That brushed his thighs against Nick again, but it was just a pleasant buzz of contact. "... that was nice." he breathed gently, brazenly honest, his blush having faded to a light tint over the bridge of his nose.

Nick didn't say anything at all, raising his hands up to return to his task. Turning Ellis' chin up with a thumb after peeling away the tape on either edge of the butterfly, Nick firmly applied the bandage to close up the wound.

It sealed nicely, the white material sticking skin-tight to Ellis' cheek. It'd stay.

"How's that, Ace?" he questioned, lowering his hands and glancing the hick's face over before meeting his gaze. Ringed fingers toyed with Ellis' overalls absently, watching the kid twist around at the waist and look at his own face in the mirror, squinting slightly.

He smiled brightly, popping his lips a bit in appreciation. "Real good. Thanks, Doc'. I bet'cha it'll be right as rain before you know it."

Nick snorted, then chuckled helplessly as Ellis' thank-you really sunk in, patting his hands together as he backed away a step. "I should goddamn think so, with all the hard work I put into that shit." he retorted, smirking sideways.

Ellis laughed, turning back forward to gently push himself off the counter. "I appreciate it, Nick. S'real nice'uv you... I mean, even lookin' past the kiss.." His boots met the tile with a soft thump, grinning abashedly.

"Ha. Looking past it? I'm hurt." Ellis perked to correct him, looking instantly surprised, but Nick gave him a sardonic 'I'm kidding' look and shook his head. "C'mon, El. We should get back downstairs, spent enough time up here. Trying to get me in trouble."

The Georgian chuckled, reaching into his pocket to pull out his bag of candy again and pick one out. He was burning through them fast. Nick expected him to get sick, at the rate he was going. "Sorry, Nick... but yer the one who done started it."

Nick crossed his arms immediately, lifting a brow at the accusation in cool, deadpan determination. After a small roll of his lips, he returned, "You're the one with those lips." He wasn't about to be blamed for the situation.

Intrigued by the unvoiced challenge, Ellis bit a gummy in half and chewed gently at it. He hrmfped, flushing slightly as he noticed Nick's eyes flick down to watch him chew. "..Yer the one who can't quit lookin' at 'em."
Lifting his brows, Nick felt a little thrill dart up his spine. Ellis' sweet naïveté had fast grown on him in a way he'd never have thought possible, but the Southerner had flashes of lively stubbornness and a quick intelligence that was… fascinating. "Do I, now?"

Grinning widely before the motion stung his injured cheek and he had to quickly stop, Ellis rolled up onto his toes and bobbed his head in a cocky fashion.

The conman advanced a step toward him. Ellis was quickly getting in way over his head, and though Nick knew Ellis wasn't really meaning to, he couldn't fight it. The impulse to chase was too strong. Those goddamn eyes...

"You -"

"Hey boys?" It was perfectly innocuous, innocently questioned from the other side of the door. Nick and Ellis both jumped hard, the latter practically choking on his mouthful of candy.

Talking loudly to cover the tiny little hiccoughs Ellis was stifling with his wrist, Nick felt a slight frustration drag at his mind. It wasn't at Rochelle, either - it was at himself. Fuck, Nicolas. Not only can't you control yourself for one goddamn second, but now you're putting both of us in danger? Christ.

... 'danger'. He didn't know why such a harsh word came first to his mind.

"Yeah, Ro'." He at least had the self-control to manage his tone, pulse beating strongly in his chest. He bent his head to raise a brow at Ellis, trying to see if the other man was going to choke to death. Ellis quickly waved at him in reassurance, swallowing tightly to try and relax himself. "Sorry, getting a bandage on Overalls is like getting a leash on a cat."

She didn't seem suspicious in the slightest, just giggling gently once at his explanation. "No problem. Coach just wanted me to ask you if either of you were hungry - we found cereal in the kitchen."

Trying not to sigh in relief as she seemed oblivious, Nick pushed his hands into the pockets of his suit jacket and closed his eyes. "Yeah, sure. I'll come down in a sec'." he answered dully, nudging Ellis with his elbow to interject.

"Thanks, Ro'!" Ellis reflexively responded, curling his fingers into fists lightly with an embarrassed look. At least he managed to sound sincere.

"Okay. We should head out pretty soon. Hope your cheek's okay, Ellis, honey." Judging by the way her voice quieted, she was walking away, and Nick could hear her footsteps on the staircase softly after a beat.

Nick didn't understand how he'd missed the sound of her ascension. He stood a moment in silence, eyeing the door as his frustration deepened a little, agitated. After a moment, Ellis nudged him out of it with a genuinely apologetic tone.

"...uhm, I. I'm sorry, Nick. She could'uh walked in..."

The conman quickly sighed, reaching underneath his jacket to undo Ellis' cap from his belt. He pulled the thing free, shaking it a bit. Ellis gasped with abrupt excitement at the sight, hands shooting up in an eager grab.

"Take your damn hat, Overalls." Nick slipped the cap straight on Ellis' head, pulling it down to obscure his face with a chuckle. "Shocked you haven't asked about it."
Ellis pawed at the cap, squirming it into place higher up in embarrassment. A soft blush was spread over the bridge of his nose and into his bruised cheek, and he shook his head. "Awhh.. man, you kept it on you..?"

Feeling slightly defensive, particularly after nearly getting caught, Nick pushed Ellis toward the bathroom door with a palm and rolled his eyes. "Ah, shut up. It was either that or listen to you bitch if I lost it."

Ellis smiled brightly as he opened up the door, chuckling softly in that way that made Nick think he'd been seen right through. He really hated that. "Thankyuh, Nick." Limping softly after him, the conman shook his head, unable to be as frustrated as he wanted to be. Ellis' voice was just too sincere.

"Man. I remember the day muh buddy Keith'n'I got our hats. They're a pair, y'know! Well, 'cept his ain't got no bill 'cause he done cut it off in a chainsaw accident... man, weird story, that one. 'N' his is all burned'n'shit.. Well, anyway, we got 'em custom sewn 'n shit! The li'l truck patch on there, y'know? For our autoshop. Man, that was a good day. I swear I ain't taken it off fer more'n a couple hours since I done got it, ha-haa. Maybe it was a good luck charm while you were bluffin' that lady! Sure been my good luck charm…"

Nick's gaze lifted up, watching Ellis' back as he listened to his tone rise in enthusiasm with every word. Every inane... rambling... implacably happy little word.

He wondered to himself how long it'd be until they could have sex again. The four needed to make progress down the highway toward the shore, particularly after all the time they'd been wasting, but they couldn't go non-stop.

Nick found himself planning for it. He hadn't planned a single thing up till then - each time it had been accident, happenstance, or Ellis' own determination forcing them together. Now, suddenly, Nick discovered a distinct section of his mind working rather hard to gnaw on just when 'next time' would be.

It was a thing, now.

He just didn't know what that thing was, exactly.

Ellis offered up an arm to help Nick down the staircase. The conman glanced at it - and though an impulse had him wanting to take the help, he didn't, shaking his head in vague rejection. Ellis merely lowered his arm, mostly unfazed. He watched Nick take the stairs with renewed ferocity, snarling in mock-anger as he went:

"If I don't get some fucking food here in a second, I'm going to kill someone. And it may not be a zombie."

Chapter 52

In retrospect, their arsenal was pitiful.

Nick was the only one with an actual loaded gun, and they didn't have extra clips for it. His crowbar was sturdy and had the wicked edges perfect for destroying fragile zombie limbs, but his range of motion and strength were both crippled now by his injured leg. The Molotov was jammed tight into his belt, but he was definitely saving that for an emergency.

Coach had lost his shotgun in the swamp so he only had his shovel, and the hollowed metal handle was starting to bend dangerously like it might snap. His strong swing did a serious number on the metal frame - it was likely going to break soon enough.

Rochelle's pistol was still attached to her hip, but it was empty, leaving her only with her skillet. That was useful enough, but - even though she didn't say a word - swinging the heavy thing exhausted her fairly quickly. It was cast-iron, and certainly not made for this.

Ellis had the best of the melee weapons. His axe was sturdy and he handled it with all the expertise one might expect, and his powerful shotgun was still slung to his back even though he'd run out of ammo. The big weapon was a bit of a burden when compared to the fact he couldn't even use it.

"God fucking dammit, and I thought getting a gun would save me some pain. But no-o.o. It may as well be fucking useless - I'm such an idiot. One fucking clip. Because I can definitely count all the zombies on one hand."

His anger manifested in the ruthless way his crowbar jammed into the neck of a zombie that came at them from the side. The area immediately around the house was mostly cleared out, but that didn't last long. As they'd gotten back onto the highway and began walking down it to start the day's trip, zombies had popped up from seemingly nowhere, attracted by their voices.

It turned into a bit of a battle to continue down the highway, especially with their pace slowed to make sure Nick kept up on his bad leg. They kept moving, though. They passed by broken-down and crashed cars, but every time Ellis risked a momentary glance, he'd see right off that they wouldn't run.

They were stuck on foot - for now.

Ellis smiled a bit, sympathetically, at the conman's tone. As normal as his bad moods were, the Georgian still felt a bit bad to hear him so frustrated. None of them really wanted to be so up close and personal with the zombies, and the mess from using melee weapons was hard to avoid.

As if on cue, a hard swing with Ellis' axe struck a bit lower than he intended and nearly separated a zombie from his lower body.

He did cringe a bit as organs spilled out like a broken piñata, the sight disturbing, but merely jumped around it to re-align himself with Coach without letting himself look too long. There never really was time to dwell on things.

He and the ex-football player took the lead, Rochelle picking up the rear with Nick between them all for safety. "Least we'll have a gun if we need tuh shoot somethin'." Ellis offered, keeping an eye out around them as they picked their way down the highway.

He did wonder slightly if that blonde would come after them; if he'd been on the other end of Nick's gun, he certainly wouldn't.

"Oh good." Nick muttered to himself sarcastically, voice fawning with fake relief. "Because, you know, we definitely don't need to right now. No-siree-Bob. Doing completely fine."

Coach spoke gruffly as they went, swinging his shovel defensively when a zombie tried to take a bite out of him. Ellis had to dodge away abruptly to avoid getting hit by the shovel's backswing, but he didn't say anything. "Gotta be guns 'round here somewhere. Much as brainin' these zombies works, it'd go faster wit' better firepower."

"Yeah." Nick said with a snort, humored despite himself. "Wouldn't've had a problem with that bitch back there, either." No one seemed eager to respond to that. Ellis' cheek stung a little as he thought about it, something like a frown sneaking onto his expression. He shook it off, but he had to wonder - would Nick really have shot her?

"We should've been keeping a better eye out. We've probably passed by places that might've had some." Rochelle reluctantly uttered after a moment, repeatedly glancing over her shoulder with a certain nervous air. "All the guns always come out in doomsday movies - and Christ, we're in the South, come on."

Coach leaned his shovel against his shoulder with a barely-withheld sigh when the zombies ebbed for a few seconds, shaking his head. Deepset eyes flickered around area - beyond the Burgertank and the ruined gas station, there was a few more buildings. "You think we should stop an' check the rest of these places before we get outta here?"

Nick immediately grunted, taking advantage of the break to glare at the couple stains already working their way into his suit. "Not worth the time. You guys are the ones who were antsy to get out of here, anyway."

Scrunching his nose, Ellis touched a fingertip to his bandaged cheek, uncertainly feeling at the white closure holding his wound together. Nick noticed, shooting him a dark look. "I think we're doin' okay with whut we got. I mean, if I got where we are right, we should get tuh the beach by the end'uv the day, right?"

"If everything goes to plan." Nick moodily asserted, shaking his head.

Rochelle laughed softly, her voice a bit chiding. "You're too much of a pessimist, N-" she started, but like some terrible irony, a loud growl from off to their right interrupted her.

"Ah tits, Hunter!" Nick snarled, immediately whipping toward the sound with a spin on his good leg. They all barely had enough time to get oriented before the thing lunged suddenly into sight, already howling out a strange call - it was a bonechilling scream, double-layered with a strangely human tone and the echoed shriek of an animal.

It was just a flashing dark spot in the air, flying from the roof of a building nearby and launching itself at Rochelle. The thing knocked her straight off her feet as it collided, hitting the asphalt with a thud and a cry.

Ellis immediately swung around and started to bolt toward her, axe already coiled to the side with tensed arms ready to swing it. He breezed past Nick like a shot, not even registering that the gambler was scrambling for his holstered pistol.

She managed to get her boot up, kicking the thing straight in the stomach before it could really get latched onto her and begin to rip her apart. It only gained her a few extra seconds before the creature snarled angrily and pounced back into place.

Claws snatched onto her clothes, centimeters from tearing into her torso with wicked nails. The Hunter snarled down at her, a bloody face visible under the shadow of the thing's torn hoodie, just an instant before Ellis' axe swung straight through its neck.

Its body toppled backwards violently in an attempt to follow the flying head, arms still clawing at the air for just a few seconds. It shuddered to a stop, blood spraying out from its ruined neck like a broken faucet.

Ellis immediately reached down to help Rochelle out from under it, wincing. He hadn't really meant to make it so messy. "You alright, Ro'? Shit, that thing hit you hard!"

Panting as she scrambled up to her feet with his help, she quickly nodded. Her hands touched onto her cheeks as she got steady, exhaling hard with a shaken shudder. "O-Oh yeah, just - wow. I think I just had a heart attack... Thank you, sweetie."

Nick lowered his pistol from the half-aimed position it was in, pushing it back into his holster with a grunt. Nick stayed where he was as Coach backtracked, the big man intent on checking Rochelle out for himself. "Good reflex, Overalls."

Ellis would've responded proudly, but about then he glanced down, and his face burst into a bright red. He tipped his chin up hard, embarrassed, and tried - unsuccessfully - not to fumble when he said, "Uh - Ro'... yer, um.."

"What?" she said before she looked. Ellis couldn't bear to look again, but he could see her reaction out of the corner of his eyes as she noticed the rips the Hunter's claws had put into her shirt as it had clutched at it. They ripped straight through the Depeche Mode symbol on her chest.

Needless to say, the silky black of her bra and brown of the skin around it were very visible against the pink shirt. Rochelle couldn't believe it, cheeks darkening with the realization that all three men were in their own stage of trying to cope with the sight.

Coach - freezing up halfway to her, jaw a bit dropped, staring in mortification.

Ellis - bright red and eyeing the sky with an antsy shifting of his weight.

Nick - adopting this slow tilt of his head, rather content with the situation.

"Ahk!" she blurted, turning around entirely and clapping her hands over her chest. Ellis was the only one with the decency to look away, but the fact the youngest survivor - her little brother in spirit - had seen past her shirt at all was almost as bad as Coach's shocked stare and Nick's visible interest.

"Uhh, s-sorry, Ro'!" Ellis blurted in apology though nothing had been his fault, scratching at the back of his neck before he pushed his cap down over his face, embarrassed.

She sobbed, "Why me! First Coach, now me!" in horror, hunching forward to examine the damages. A wolf-whistle from Nick made her blush harder, and Coach snapped out of his daze to cover a large hand over his eyes and struggle to stifle a chuckle.

Ellis risked looking down now that she was turned away, hesitantly setting an arm on her shoulder comfortingly. "I-It'll be a'ight, Ro'! We'll um..." But he trailed off. He had no idea what they'd do - go back to the house and get her a new shirt? - not that he could really think straight at that instant.
The conman laughed, shaking his head, and let his arms cross over his chest. He fairly reluctantly suggested, "Flip it around. Not that I'm condoning the hiding of perfectly good breasts."

"Nick!" Ellis practically wheezed over his shoulder, shocked. He felt a tiny flicker of something at the older man's careless flirtation, but it confused him more than anything and he tried to shake it off.

The gambler smirked at him, chuckling lowly. There was a little knowing slit that reached those green eyes as Nick reacted to the name, and Ellis winced a bit, feeling petty. He sure hoped Nick didn't think he was jealous.

".. that's.. a good idea, but you're still a jackass, Nick..." Rochelle whimpered a bit, already starting to pull her arms into her shirt so she could flip it around. She tried not to pull it up too much, but she ended up showing a good bit of her lower back anyway.

Coach crossed his arms as tightly as he could over his chest, distinctly stepping in front of Nick to block his view. The gambler smirked at him coolly. "Most women can take compliments, ya know."

"Try a compliment an' yo' ass might get a better reaction." Coach gruffed, lifting his rounded chin to level gazes with the conman. A small, taunting grin snuck onto the Northerner's face... and Coach returned it in kind, though his was softer.

Ellis stood at a rather nervous distance, gripping the bill of his cap with his non-axe-wielding hand. He hated when the two men fought, mostly because their kind of fighting was the moody, sparks-flying kind. They had incredibly strong gazes, and they were both too stubborn to give up.

Needless to say, watching them actually not fight was absolutely terrifying.

"...Um, hey. Guys? We can go now." Rochelle sounded much calmer now, and when Ellis blinked back at her, she'd successfully turned her shirt around. The collar rode too high now, pinned to the base of her neck, but it was definitely a better alternative.

Rochelle sighed slightly, uncomfortably reaching a hand to pull at her shirt softly as both the older men swung about and started down the highway again. She smiled as Ellis stepped to walk next to her, shaking her head.

Neither said anything about it, but they shared a look. Coach and Nick were determined to be strange, it seemed. They were silent now, Nick limping along behind the ex-football player, but Ellis couldn't quite help wondering at them. Were they finally getting along?

He'd have liked that.

The Georgian prompted Rochelle sideways, nudging her arm with his elbow. "You 'kay, Ro'?

She laughed gently, shrugging her shoulders. The woman turned herself at the waist a little to look back at the tears in her shirt. "At least it was just the shirt, right? Bit of a breeze on my back, but hey. It's a little hot out here anyway."

"Haw." Ellis grinned softly, swinging his axe at his side lightly. "Yeah, them claws ain't messin' around."

The four slipped close, clustering tightly in formation. There was, unfortunately, little time before zombies reappeared on the highway, centered around scattered crashed cars that had been driven into trees or each other.
The little cluster of buildings ended soon after it'd began. It melted back into bare highway bordered with a few feet of grass on either side, untamed forest starting after that. They were definitely out of the swamplands now that they'd gotten distance between them and the river, and, consequently, the air turned drier. And hotter.

It didn't have the heady salt that would mark their progress closer to the shoreline, but it'd get there eventually. A green sign off to the right had about half of its face left, the rest blown off by a careening car that was just barely visible from where it'd crashed straight into the forest.

The distance label was unfortunately part of the casualties, but a distinct '-bee Island' announced that they were going in the right direction. It was strange thinking on how much had happened in so short a time - they were on their sixth day, yet it'd felt like an eternity.

Ellis could've been friends with them for years for how close he felt to them. They were all at their worst, bedraggled and exhausted and wounded, struggling with an impossible kind of disaster, and yet there they were - working together. Like a team.

He couldn't imagine not knowing them now.

Using the steel toes of his workboots to his advantage, Ellis kicked an infected right in the shin as it launched at him from the side of the road. The creature clawed at him as its leg shot out from under it and sent it tumbling, catching dirty fingers in his shirt, but he shoved it off with a wince.

"Hey.." Nick suddenly prodded aloud with an uncharacteristic lightness, in the middle of slashing a zombie straight across the face with the curled edge of his crowbar. "Does that look broken-down to you guys?"

Blinking to see what he meant, Ellis tipped his head while fending off the infected with a swift slash of his axe. There was a little black sedan sitting half off the road a few yards ahead, its tires digging into the grass.

There was a man's corpse sprawled in front of the trunk on the asphalt, sitting slumped against the rear end of the car with one hand still outstretched limply toward a shotgun lying a few feet away. Two infected were kneeling around it, their arms working to tear into the body with a somewhat leisurely intent as they were oblivious to the approaching four.

Although Ellis knew Nick was talking about the car, he couldn't wrench his gaze away from the zombies ripping away at the dead man. Disgusted, he felt a flutter of genuine anger. How many people had died like that?

It was a terrible way to go.

"Sure looks good." Coach grunted curiously, sweeping a zombie straight off its feet with the flat side of his shovel's blade. "Shit, folks, if we get a car -" The big man didn't finish his sentence, but his meaning was clear enough. They could've really used the car just then, and he didn't want to jinx them - maybe Nick's weird superstition was starting to spread.

Ellis would've broken in with something hopeful anyway, but he was too distracted by the infected. The sight was suddenly a little too much. "Stupid zombies." he muttered with a huff, feeling a kind of wretched feeling flicker into life in his gut.

He was tired of seeing people die - tired of seeing his friends get injured.

He hefted his axe with sudden determination, eyeing the zombies intently before he broke into a sudden sprint toward them, dodging around Coach and Nick. His footsteps, hard on the asphalt, quickly drew their attention, and they spun around to snarl excitedly at him. Covered in blood and gore, flies buzzing around their heads, the infected scrambled wildly onto their feet to race toward him.

He met the first one with a heavy swing of his axe, clipping it right in the face. The blade stuck in its skull - staggering Ellis slightly as the zombie shuddered and jerked in death throes. The momentary hesitation as Ellis tried to jerk it free gave the second one a chance to launch at him, mouth snapping toward his face with bloody teeth.

Ellis outright let his axe go, punching the gnashing zombie with a hard right hook to the cheek. It staggered back, weak neck snapping up at a strange angle, and Ellis caught hold of his axe again where it stuck out of the dying zombie's head.

He braced his boot against the infected's face, rearing back to yank his axe free. Though the second infected was already recovering and coming at him again, Ellis managed to raise the axe over himself and bring it down hard on its face, momentum carrying the blade through.

Its head exploded in half in a splatter of blood, the body's arms pinwheeling for a moment before it sluggishlly slumped to the asphalt in front of him.

Ellis huffed, lowering his shoulders and letting his axe droop toward his leg. He felt a distinct swell of satisfaction with getting the dead man's revenge - only to feel a sinking realization pierce his mind and drown it out.

He knew the infected were long gone, past any stitch of humanity. It wasn't guilt that suffused him then - it was a strange futility, an unfamiliar uselessness. He stood there quietly, blinking, as footsteps slipped up behind him. The step-stepstep of his limped gait, dress shoes audible on the asphalt, made it clear it was Nick even before he spoke.

"Overalls?" he questioned quietly, expectantly. His voice was silk and gravel, the nickname choppy as he spoke it around a cigarette.

Ellis slowly reached up to lift the cap up a little, expression slightly conflicted as his gaze adjusted to glance toward the dead man leaned against the back of the car. Blood covered him, clothes torn open messily, barely hiding exactly how much damage the infected had done to his chest. "Them zombies were people before all this, too." he said quietly.

He knew his voice betrayed him. He felt strange and small, struggling for some kind of excuse that would make him feel better. It was like his legs had just dropped out from under him - he couldn't think, confused. His gaze was quiet and inspective, fighting for sense in the scene in front of him.

"It ain't really justice, is it?"

There was a silence. He could feel Nick's presence at his elbow, hot and tangible and safe. He wanted to turn around and look at him, but he stayed still, almost holding his breath. He could feel eyes on him, and though he expected Rochelle to hug him or Coach to set a hand on his shoulder... they didn't. He didn't know what he wanted to hear.

Maybe nothing.

He was supposed to be the positive one.

A hand settled on the top of his head, warmth seeping through the fabric of his cap, but he didn't look. The press of a hard ring against his scalp made his eyes slip downward, a soft calm passing through his body at the touch.
A beat of hesitation, that hand stilled on his head - and then it shifted, pushing Ellis' hat down a bit over his face. "You did good, Ace." Blinded by his cap bill, Ellis felt a tiny smile breach onto his face as he looked down at the ground for a quiet moment.

Mumbling a "Thanks", he did so too late for Nick to hear. The conman had already emotionlessly limped forward, halting in front of the dead man and examining him heavily. He didn't say a word, just gazed at his body for a moment.

Then Nick glanced backwards, finally, and something in the arch of his brow was encouraging as he looked over all three survivors.

"Well?"

Suddenly, Ellis jumped forward, feeling light again. With every ounce of enthusiasm he could muster, Ellis started to circle around the black sedan in interest, trying to examine it and see if it might still run.

He could only pray.
Pulling hard on his cigarette, eyes slitting half closed, Nick held up his charade of examining the double-barrel shotgun in his hands. As much as stealing from a dead man seemed terrible karma - something he was only sensitive about when it suited him - it wasn't the first time they'd taken advantage of the dead. They needed the weapon, anyway.

The gun was too heavy for his tastes, but held some serious power in the thick mechanisms behind the cold steel barrels. He'd already decided he'd let Ellis have it; the mechanic was probably an expert at powerful shotguns like that, more than any of the others. They didn't have time for someone to pull a muscle trying to control the recoil.

All that, though, he'd already decided within a few seconds. It was a couple minutes later now, and his attention was focused on watching Ellis out of the corner of his eyes. The kid seemed okay - recovered, his head back on straight and his body moving with enthusiastic attention as he was elbow-deep in the innards of the hatchback sedan's innards. His gaze was interested and his motions were fluid.

He seemed okay.

Ellis definitely hadn't been a few minutes ago. Nick couldn't help but eye him from a distance, rolling his lips subtly against his cigarette and taking advantage of his lazy lean against the car to keep off his bad leg. That expression, that tiny voice - Ellis had frozen up like he were standing in pitch black darkness, terrified to move for fear of finding out where he was.

Not that Nick could hold it against him; the kid was generally absolutely unflappable, with this impenetrable sense of optimism that bended and folded to work around even the scariest of moments. Who could blame him for a moment of weakness?

He did feel a subtle tug in his chest. It wasn't worry, just... attention. Focus. Maybe he did feel a little protective. The last thing we need is to start breaking down. We've gone this far - we have to keep going. All in on the last hand.

Were they insane not to be just as upset as Ellis had been for a moment? Were they certifiable for being able to get out of bed, to keep moving? Maybe they were all long gone already. Buncha psychos.

Sighing furtively through his nostrils, smoke roiling up around his face, Nick mock-aimed the shotgun. He had to brace a good bit of its weight on his shoulder, hand cradling the base of the barrel to hold it aloft. Rochelle spared a glance toward him, though most of her attention was on Ellis as she leaned against the car just a few inches from Nick's elbow.

Coach was at the edge of the road, quiet, gaze scanning up the highway as it curved into a masking treeline with all the fluidity of a cement river. He had that weary look all over again. Zombies trickled toward them, on and off, and Coach paced around them to defend their current perimeter.

"No leaks," Ellis suddenly announced, straightening up. Blackened dust smudged the palm of his left hand, and when he wiped his forehead, a little spot of dark color drew itself across his temple. "No shot pipes or nothin'. Ain't gonna explode if we try the ignition, anyhow."

Nick felt an incredulous twitch draw his brow up severely, lowering the shotgun in his hands.

"Explode?" he echoed sharply. "That was a fuckin' possibility?"
The youngest guffawed loudly, gaze thinning as he smiled over the engine spread out in front of him. "Never know, man. This one time, muh buddy Keith was workin' on a car what had a bad oil pump, 'n' he goes tuh -"

Rochelle stepped off the sedan, gently circling around Nick and walking forward to join Ellis. She set a hand softly on his shoulder which promptly interrupted his story, smiling at him and questioning, "What can we help with, Ellis?"

It was a fairly kind version of the usual 'this isn't a good time,' and Ellis only blinked for a split second before breaking into a grin and patting the car's nose.

"Well, figure the keys're 'round here somewhere. Hell, may well be in the car. Wanna go try it, Ro'?" The mechanic flashed a smile at her, brightly, gesturing toward the driver's side. The windows were tinted almost completely black, blocking them from getting any kind of view inside. "Ain't like they could'uv gone far."

She nodded in agreement, walking around him to get to the driver's door. Nick watched her test the handle, the door popping open with only a little protest. "If you're going to talk about exploding, I'm getting the fuck away from this thing," he grumbled, annoyed to be the only one apparently unsettled by the comment.

He carefully backed up to limp next to Coach, crossing his arms with the shotgun cradled in them and giving a scan around them. The big man glanced at him, chuckling lowly and shifting his gaze to refocus on what was going on.

Rochelle slipped into the driver's seat, jumping slightly as the hot leather of the seat pressed against the skin on her back bared by her torn short, burning her. She sat at a slight lean forward, wincing a little, and went feeling for the keys.

When her fingers brushed against the steel of the ignition, keyless, she started to frown. Refusing to give up, she curled a leg slightly to bend down, feeling on the floorboard. Maybe the man had been in a rush to jump out of the car and dropped them -

Sure enough, her hand touched a bit of metal, and a jingle confirmed it. Grinning excitedly, she snatched the keys up and straightened to let the tip just barely poke into the ignition. "You aren't touching anything, are you, sweetie?" she called out, noticing the hood was still up.

"Nope."

Slipping the keys into the ignition, she bit her tongue a bit before taking in a significant breath and turning it. One click, and the lights on the dash flickered on. The small meters twitched into various positions - the car had a little over half a tank left, which was a relief. Two clicks, and the radio fluttered into life with a blank static, just barely audible. It was set to what should've been a music channel.

She nervously pushed the key further against the soft spring-loaded pressure, and the engine purred alive with a healthy rumble.

Ellis was immediately shouting, jumping around on the grass like an idiot as Rochelle broke into relieved laughter. She released the car key in the ignition and slid herself back out of the car to stand up. "WOO!! SHIT, YEAH! WE GOT WHEELS, BABY! RR-RRRRRR-RRRRRR!"

His mimicry of the sedan's engine was too much - Nick broke into laughter much, much against his better judgement, palming his face cautiously with a quick quirk to his lips to angle his burning cigarette away from his wrist.

Coach laughed gruffly, clapping a hand on Nick's shoulder as if in comfort. Nick let his palm slip off his face at the gesture, taking a pull off his cigarette when the big man left his hand there. Entertainment lingered enough to keep him from brushing it off.

Nick wasn't impossible at all the time. It was a good moment.

The ex-football player eyed Ellis, shaking his head, as the youngest survivor excitedly gave one last "Hoo-yeah!" and slammed the sedan's hood closed. He laughingly chided, "Boy, yo' ass needs to calm down."

Rochelle had just stepped around the door when Ellis snagged an arm around her waist and pulled her into a hug, grinning stupidly. The woman fought a startled yip, stumbling slightly before adjusting to the hug and returning it. She couldn't help but giggle, flicking Ellis' cap bill up a bit to kiss his (un-bruised) cheek.

"Good job, hee-haw." she teased in a whisper, like the kid had summoned the car out of thin air.

Ellis blushed, immediately, giving a bashful drop of his head before perking right back up. Nick felt exhausted and a little warm watching him - he was just so spastic with excitement, it was unbelievable.

"C'mon Coach! Gimme a break - we got a car again, man! We deserve a li'l cheerin'! Yer a football coach, ain'tcha? This is one hell'uva touchdown, man!"

The big man shook his head wearily with a sigh, but he was smiling, clapping the hand on Nick's shoulder once more before stepping forward. Nick blinked an eye at him, trying to decide if he should be annoyed or not. "I ain't doin' no touchdown dances, boy." With that, Coach chuckled outright, pleased.

Ellis smiled goofily, pleased beyond words to hear the big man laughing so much. He pulled away from Rochelle, bounding to the open car door to lean in and look it over excitedly. "Man, this reminds me'uh my ma's car..."

Nick pulled his cigarette from his lips, tossing it aside carelessly and shoving the shotgun under his arm. His gaze flickered up and down the car's length, a hunch suddenly striking him with a satisfied purr. "Hey, pop the trunk in there, Overalls."

"Hm? Oh yeah, sure..." The kid bent in further, reaching for some switch, and the trunk snapped a few inches open with a dull sound. Nick promptly turned and limped gently over toward it, taking care to keep his shoes out of the puddled blood on the asphalt.

Rochelle perched her elbows on the front of the vibrating car, curiously looking over it toward the gambler. "Got a thought, Nick? You have that ... face."

"The handsome one? I have that all the time, doll." The corpse drowned the air in a sickening copper haze, but Nick ignored it, getting himself balanced in front of the trunk with most of his weight on his good leg. He let his hands settle on the sedan's spoiler, elbows close to his hips so he didn't lose his grip on the shotgun, flicking a glance up sharply.

Snorting with a smile, Rochelle rolled her eyes and sighed. She let her chin set in one of her palms, lifting brows and taunting him affectionately, "Passing up the chance to show us up, suit?"

He smirked, amused, and cocked his head. "When you put it that way... Simple. Why would you take the time to go for your trunk if you were being chased by zombies? Why not run for the door and drive away?"

Nick got no answer, just an interested gaze from all three.

Content with that, he pushed up with his palms and hoisted the trunk door open. Hearing the satisfying pop as it locked open on clean steel hinges, he chuckled to himself, looking down into it. Ellis was the first to scamper over to see, Coach side-stepping curiously a moment later. Rochelle just leaned a bit to one side from where she stood.

Nested carefully against each other in the floor of the trunk was a line-up of three hunting rifles and a - smaller than the one Nick had under his arm, and single-barreled - shotgun. Even better was the boxed ammo stuffed into the far back.

"Okay," Nick admitted with a smirk. "I like the South a little more now."

Coach exhaled, shaking his head in slight disbelief. After rubbing his wrist against his forehead, he subtly crossed in front of his chest and nodded down at the dead man solemnly. "What were the damn chances, y'all."

"I cannot tell you how relieved I am right now." Rochelle sighed softly, pressing her hands to her face gently and admitting, "I wasn't sure we could take all this hand-to-hand much longer..."

Ellis scrambled forward a bit, reaching into the trunk and scooping up the shotgun ammo box. He peeked at the front, grinning happily within a few seconds. He started to pull the shotgun off his back before he'd even started to speak. "This'un's the right caliber fer muh shotgun! Man, I been waitin' tuh be able to use this thing again!"

Nick spared him a glance, bewildered, as the mechanic happily started to load the pump shotgun. They now had an array of weapons, all distinctly better than the one Ellis clung to - though admittedly, handled very well - and all he could focus on was getting it more ammo.

He didn't argue. Not then - Nick just wasn't in the mood to bitch. He felt too smug, and Ellis looked too content. "Good thing it's open season on zombies." The conman offered the shotgun in his arms to Coach, not even trying to convince Ellis into taking it like he'd originally planned.

The big man took it without complaint, examining it for a moment before outright tossing his shovel to the ground. It was almost broken, anyway, and he very visibly didn't want to carry the thing anymore. He handled the shotgun with no small amount of relief. "Thank the Lord."

Tucking it under his arm, Coach pulled the backpack off his shoulder and started to stow away the extra ammo boxes so they'd have them on hand.

Nick quickly picked up two of the rifles, one in either hand. He loaded them both carefully, having to juggle them slightly and alternate holding one under an arm to manage it. He backed up from the trunk as he finished, circling to offer one to Rochelle.

She blinked up at him, brows lifting at the weapon, an obvious pinch touching her browline that said she'd never handled such a large gun. Her hand had just started to lift up, outstretched to take it from him, when an odd... heavy sound thudded flatly in the air.

Not just the air, though. The ground. The very noise trembled a bit underneath Nick's dress shoes, like the highway asphalt itself gave the tiniest of whimpers. Everyone froze up, all at once, when it happened again.
A third time.

Snapping his head to the side, Nick realized rather dully how incredibly useless everything was. How doomed any small victory was. How absolutely fucked they'd been from the start - were now - and would be until they all got killed. Every ounce of warmth drained straight out of his body, and adrenaline rose up like a thundering wave, suffocating.

The massive shape of a Tank crept toward them on the highway, lumbering with such lazy exhaustion it might as well have been sleep walking. Rippling, fleshy muscle shuddered to pull its comparatively withered lower body along on apelike knuckles, deformed little head just a lump between its trembling shoulders.

"In. Side. The. Car." Coach whispered, voice never so simultaneously near-silent and unarguably demanding at once. He backed quickly up to the passenger door, opening it as silently as he could.

Rochelle's fingers latched onto the rifle Nick had offered with the same hurried, cautious twist that turned her around to rush to the car. Ellis was quick and silent as he got around her, clearly intent to get behind the wheel.

For once, Nick didn't dare risk uttering a single word to argue against the kid driving them. His whole throat was closed up, darting after Coach to try and get in on that side with his rifle snapped tight to his chest.

He didn't know what it was - maybe it had been Coach opening the door, or maybe Nick's own shoes had been a little too hard on the asphalt as he stumbled when his leg protested in a flash of pain. Maybe it was just the sudden movement as they all bolted as silently as possible toward the car doors.

All Nick knew was suddenly, the Tank was roaring ferociously, and every ounce of laziness was gone. The horrendous sound of tearing stone could be heard like rocks being violently grated against each other, and Nick felt bile snarling at the very depths of his throat when he saw the huge monster tearing a slab of asphalt right out of the road.

It broke out from the rest of the highway like it was no stronger than paper - the slab must've been at least the size of the car itself. With an enraged howl of intent, the Tank reared back and threw it.

It sailed. Unerring - fast. Perfectly aimed to land straight on a vehicle that was in park… half-rutted in muddy grass and rain-soaked soil… not even partly occupied yet...

There's no fucking way we get out! There's no fucking-

Nick was shouting before he realized it - no, screaming. His voice shattered in the air with such guttural desperation - panic - he didn't even believe it was his own. "GET THE FUCK AWAY FROM THE CAR!"

It was a scramble. Everyone suddenly exploded into movement, just flashes of colour. Nick couldn't see straight, reflex spurring him to bolt away from the car while his brain screamed for him to drag everyone out by hand, like he had the time -

But they all obeyed the command without the tiniest hesitation, bolting away from the car as quickly as they'd started toward it. There was barely feet between them and the car as they started to run in all directions, panicked.

The slab struck just an instant later. Metal screamed as it was crushed underneath pure asphalt, glass shattering while the car's chassis collapsed helplessly by the slab's unadulterated weight.
Nick felt shards strike his back, little sparks of pain, and he could hear Ellis yelp as the same happened to him.

As the car crumpled, some mechanism broke. Along with a violent shriek as the engine exploded dully, the car horn suddenly flicked on and didn't stop. It was a dull sound, but so loud and at a constant pitch that immediately reverberated up into the air and through the trees surrounding them.

However, the slab wasn't done there - it bounced on the crushed car, violently breaking in half, one of those halves suddenly tailspinning in the air and shooting after the survivors like it were chasing them.

A loud crack sounded out like a shot as the bottom edge of the sailing piece of highway struck Coach directly in the back of the head. He went down instantly, nothing more than a stuttered shout escaping him before it cut off, and he hit the highway rolling.

They all instantly skidded to a stop, scrambling, Rochelle letting out a scream. Nick's gut turned to stone. Terror and shock mixed to a potent, sickening taste in the air as the big man landed face-up, blood welling up fast and visibly on the back of his head just instants after he touched down.

His expression was unmoving, a ghastly mask of stilled pain.

Nick didn't have so much as a second to think it through before he spun around, tearing his Molotov from its makeshift holster on his belt with one hand while the other ripped his matches out of his pocket.

The match caught fire on the very first strike against the book. Fingers perfectly steady, adrenaline putting his body into a sudden equilibrium, Nick caught the Molotov's rag fuse on fire and reared back. He threw it as hard as he could, and only just registered the dark, frothing shadows behind the Tank.

The horn was attracting the infected.

Ellis' voice joined Rochelle's, shouting as they both collapsed at Coach's side - alarmed and incoherent. Nick barely turned around in time to hide his face from the explosion of heat that separated them then from the Tank and impending horde, splattering liquid catching fire in a sudden howling wave.

It licked onto the ruined sedan, and spilled gasoline fed the fire almost to the point of explosion. The flames screamed higher, tearing at the air and sending blinding light roaring everywhere.

They had to run. The only option was to run straight into the forest. It was that or race backwards on an open, stretching highway - and there was probably more infected coming at them that way.

Any other day - any other time - any other point in his life, Nick would have simply bolted.

That day, he shouted with as much fury as there was snarled panic:

"Grab his legs!"
There was nothing to do but run away. Coach's condition put terror into all of them - even Nick seemed on the verge of losing his composure. They ran for the treeline in an awkwardly synchronized half-jog. Ellis carried the weight of Coach's upper body against his back, hunched forward, arms locked tightly with Coach's backwards.

The big man's shotgun was clutched in Ellis' right hand, his own faithfully lashed to his back by its strap and now trapped slightly under Coach's weight.

Nick and Rochelle had him by either leg, his thighs on their shoulders and arms wrapped around them. It was a struggle balancing his dead weight - and Ellis prayed softly under his breath that that phrase would remain a metaphor.

"Pleasebeokay, pleasebeokay, pleasebeokay..." he whimpered at a constant pace, heart racing as every muscle tensed to keep Coach on his back. He could feel hot blood trickling onto his neck from the big man's head wound, and it brought a harsh knot to his throat.

The inferno that had exploded into existence behind them raged with such energy, now gasoline-fueled, that Ellis could still feel the heat as they struggled down the slight decline that fed into the highway-side forest.

Ellis plowed into the forest, leading the way on sturdy feet as the three dodged around trees with the unconscious football coach balanced between them. He could hear Nick's voice spitting out a constant flow of curses, but they couldn't stop.

The Tank roared furiously behind them, weight thundering audibly over the crashing of the flames. The scream of the infected horde started a low undertone as they raced along in its footsteps, not sounding intimidated in the slightest by the fire.

The forest wasn't nearly as hard to navigate as the swamps had been, and the ground was fairly level, but fallen trees cluttered the ground. Ellis stumbled slightly over a stump he didn't see, feeling the whole of Coach's weight threaten to fall. He gasped slightly, struggling to get his feet back under himself with a grit of his jaw.

"Shit!" Rochelle blurted, panicked. "It's throwing -"

There was a violent crash that vibrated all around them, trees shaking madly and leaves falling around them in a whirlwind. Ellis could just look back enough to see the burning chassis of their car breaking its way through tree limbs, getting stuck in the dense canopy and slowly beating its way to the ground through branches.

The vehicle was still on fire, and flames caught onto the trees it touched as gasoline sprayed from it in burning trickles. The fire was spreading quick up the trees, burning pieces of branch showering down behind them.

Nick growled a little incoherently, and Ellis felt Coach's weight shift again unexpectedly as Nick moved. He winced slightly, shoving his shoulders to get a better grip and focusing on forging forward, hearing gunfire just behind him.

Zombies were breaking through the treeline, fire turning them into mini infernos as they scrambled limbs wildly through the air. It was almost eerie to watch, their visions clearly obscured by the flames as they crashed straight into tree trunks.
Nick had twisted around to shoot behind them, his arm bent strangely to hold up his fairly large rifle against his shoulder. His aim went wide as a result, unable to handle the recoil without two hands, and every time he missed he let out a low snarl.

The Tank was still trying to chase after them. They could hear the crashing as it smashed at trees angrily, tearing them out of the ground with ground-shuddering roars. Would it stop, or would it really tear its way through the trees until it reached them?

The three ran as fast as their awkward arrangement allowed, Nick picking off flaming zombies whenever they got near. It was all they could do, aware that every step put them one more step away from the highway.

Flames were spreading behind them, picking up speed as the infected carried it with them. It licked up tree-trunks, spewing dark smoke up into the air and dirtying it with flecks of ash and burning leaves. It got hard to breathe, and Ellis felt a strike of anxiety that they might get overtaken by the forest fire.

The zombies, however, could only go so far before they collapsed, limbs burnt away beyond repair. They started to die out, tripping over themselves to the forest floor with screams of pain and stilling in the midst of the flames that ate them up. As they lost the zombies, the fire lost its momentum, and the survivors left the majority of the flames behind.

It could still catch up to them if it didn't burn out - especially with gasoline now added to the mix.

Ellis couldn't really say how long they'd been running before they couldn't hear the Tank anymore. As a certain silence settled in, their own exhausted huffing came to the forefront. Faltering to their own audible exhaustion, they all slowed, and Ellis weakly bent forward as they came to a stop.

The canopy was dark overhead. It was just near the afternoon, but the dense leaves above them criss-crossed into a blinding gridwork of dull green and muted the sun. The trees clustered around them thickly, and the air was clogged with trailing smoke.

Ellis' lungs burnt with a lack of oxygen - slowly, gradually, he slumped down to take a knee, feeling Rochelle and Nick go down with him. They set Coach down on the leaf-covered ground, and Ellis rolled out from under him, twisting around to look at the limp ex-football player a little helplessly as he set the big man's shotgun down.

Rochelle hurried in a hands-and-knees scramble to get to Coach's head, letting out a heart-wrenching noise of agony as she saw just how much blood covered the whole back of his head. She softly lifted it up, scooching his head into her lap as she just dropped into a limp sit next to him.

He wasn't moving at all.

"Fucking fuck all this!" Nick snarled, kneeling, voice enraged into a rough gravel as he threw his rifle to the forest floor. He slammed his fist into the ground before pushing up to his feet, a shudder wracking him as his leg was clearly in serious pain. Ellis twitched his head up, uncertainly, blue eyes flicking wildly over Nick's face.

"Fucking bullshit!" he shouted, rolling his head back as if to level his fury at the heavens. "This is so much goddamn bullshit! The car's fucking gone. That goddamn Tank is out there, and now - we're in the fucking middle of some fucking forest on fucking fire and what?! Coach is going to fucking di-"
"Shut up!" Rochelle shouted, whipping her head around to face Nick, body wracked with an angry shiver as it broke out of her. Her expression was wrenched in a look on the verge of utter breakdown. "You fucking asshole!"

The gambler's whole body went still, shock leveling his expression.

"How could you - don't you dare even think that, you fucking… prick! Shut up, just, stop -" Her voice broke. Her whole body broke, head lolling down to her chest as a sob wrenched out of her throat. She grasped her hands onto Coach's shoulders, and it was as she seemed primed to start shaking him that Nick silently approached.

He slipped his hands under her arms, and Ellis watched wordlessly as the conman gently pulled her away. Her first instinct was to fight, turning sharply and drawing her hand into a flat plane and slapping him across the cheek. She didn't have the leverage to hit hard, but it stung.

The gambler bore it with no more than a flinch and grabbed her again, pulled her closer. "Shh. Hey." he spoke lowly, tone soft. Nick's flecked jasper irises were constricted with a cool remorse, and his motions were fueled by a silent apology. "Ro'... I didn't mean that. I didn't."

One punch straight to his bicep, much harder… and then Rochelle slumped against his chest, breaking into sobs as she buried into his shirt. The conman didn't say anything, wrapping his arms around her shoulders and lowering his head to press his chin against the crown of her head.

His eyes half-closed, but not before slanting up to meet Ellis' and silently gesture with a glance towards Coach.

Ellis jumped into motion at the gesture, blinking heavily and rolling his head down to hide it as tears welled up at the corners of his blue eyes. He dug into the backpack, searching for the bandages stowed inside.

As he found them, slightly fumbling fingers nervously started to wrap Coach's head, binding it tight over the darkly bleeding wound at the back of his skull. He carefully dropped down to sit on his boots, pulling Coach's head onto his lap.

Nick stood there quietly, feeling hot tears soak through his shirt. He let his eyes close entirely as he confirmed Ellis was working, focusing on the woman in his arms. "I'm sorry, 'Chelle." he murmured honestly. "He'll be alright. Coach is a tough guy - don't worry about him."

She let out a soft whimper, shoulders shaking up as she struggled to hiccup in breaths. "Wh-what if -"

"You shut up." Nick stopped her immediately, folding his arms tighter against her back. He could feel her crumple a little as he did, knowing how out of character this was - for both of them. It just didn't matter. "He'll be alright. Guy wouldn't abandon us."

Rochelle trembled quietly, still against his chest, as small sobs jumped up her spine. He just held onto her with a small sigh, brows subtly screwing up on his forehead. He hadn't thought - the words had just left him.

You're fucking heartless sometimes, Nicolas.

He re-opened his eyes to look over her head at Coach and Ellis. The younger man was gently finishing up the last few revolutions of Coach's head, the bandages tight to the big man's traumatized skull.
"We gotta stop the bleeding..." the conman said simply, voice low and eyes serious as he gave a small nod. "After that, it's a dice roll."

Ellis lifted his chin a little, and Nick's alert gaze picked out the subtle rivulets that traced down his slightly dirtied cheeks, shining. "I… think it's stoppin'.." the Georgian responded softly, biting his lower lip. "Got it bandaged tight anyway..."

Nick's eyes narrowed minutely - he didn't miss the tears and he wasn't about to ignore them. His voice gained a slight lull, sighing vaguely at the edges. "Hey." he prompted.

Ellis blinked back up at him, just barely slanting his gaze underneath the bill of his cap. His eyes were reflective, shimmering in the bare light that crept underneath his cap, and there was a hesitant self-conscious twitch to his brows.

"You're not breakin' down on me too, are you, kiddo?"

The Southerner smiled lightly, bowing his head back down and lifting a hand to carefully use his wrist to wipe at his eyes. Blood-smeared fingertips curled a little into a half fist, and he sighed before returning to binding Coach's head up the rest of the way. "N-.. Naw. 'M alright. I can't take Ro' cryin' is all..."

As if the comment shook her slightly, Rochelle hesitantly pulled her head away from Nick's chest. She seemed to get awkward, turning half away from him and looking back toward Coach and Ellis.

Her hand wiped at her face, and Nick averted his eyes as she sniffled and rubbed at her nose. He felt uncomfortable, eager to get his personal space back. "S-sorry, suit. I ... I'm just.." she started to apologize, frowning. She faltered slightly when Nick shook his head, dropping his arms to his sides.

"Hey. Let's just not talk about it, huh?" His words made her exhale a soft snort of humor, and she pulled away from him to almost float hesitantly back to Coach's side. Nick stayed where he was, putting his hands slowly into his jacket pockets and just watching.

The woman gradually got down to her knees, reaching down to softly rest a hand against Coach's cheek. She stroked it faintly with a knuckle, shoulders slumping as a whisper escaped her. "... you better be okay... we need you, big man..."

Ellis stretched out a dirtied hand to settle it over Rochelle's, squeezing her fingers softly. He tried to catch her gaze and she met it after a moment, taking in his reassuring smile.

Rochelle squeezed back, lifting her head with a slight sigh. Her head turned, and she looked back through the trees hesitantly. Her gaze met Nick's, and she gave him a soft, grateful-edged smile.

Nick tensed his jaw vaguely at the look, avoiding matching her gaze, instead lifting his chin to mimic her and look around. He turned entirely, squinting to gaze back where they'd come from. He could make out the burning orange of fire, far in the distance behind them, filtered through the trees and gleaming up in sparks.

Sighing, subtly, Nick pushed back onto his good leg and dug his cigarettes out of his pocket. Tapping one out onto his palm, he went for a match, letting the cigarette settle between his lips before he lit it. "... We can't move him much. Even if he wasn't a fatass... until he's conscious, he needs to stay still, or he'll really fuck something up. Get him in a better position.."

Nick rolled his cigarette with his tongue, lifting brows slightly as he watched Ellis lean forward obediently. The Georgian gently worked his arms underneath Coach's torso, cautiously starting to pull him toward a tree so they could sit him up against it.

Rochelle quickly joined him in the effort, and together, they got the limp football coach settled in some semblance of a comfortable position against the tree. As they pulled away, Rochelle slipped to sit next to him with a sigh.

Ellis rolled back onto his rump, slumping a little as he put his hands onto the ground just behind himself, lifting his chin so he could look back at Nick. "Whut're we gonna do?"

He stayed turned away, pinching his cigarette between his fingers and pulling it from between his lips to exhale a long cloud of smoke. A curl of his tongue turned it into a shivering ring halfway through.

Nick savored the burn of nicotine on his lungs, giving a heavy shake of his head before replacing the cigarette where it was and hobbling back to retrieve his rifle. He cocked it carefully, obviously not trusting the zombies to stay away for long.

He didn't know what to do. So he shrugged, and he lied. "Wait. Try and wake him up every once in a while. If it just knocked him unconscious, it shouldn't be that long."

There was a huge caveat behind that if. None of them were doctors - hospitals didn't even exist anymore. No 911 to call. No ambulance would show up to take Coach to safety.

"Get comfortable. As fuckin' likely as that is."
Chapter 55

Nick rolled what must've been the fiftieth pebble of its kind between his fingertips, eyeing the hole in the tree a few yards away he'd been aiming for. He was perched on a root, injured leg rested out straight in front of himself while his other one was half-curl in a slight crouch.

Squinting faintly, he took the shot, feeling a rather dull sense of satisfaction as the pebble disappeared right into the knot. It was only the second one he'd managed to get in. Letting out a sigh that wasn't so much bored as tired, the gambler rested his elbow onto his knee and set his chin on his knuckles.

There was an uncomfortable silence and had been for a while - it wasn't so much between them as around them. All of their attentions - Nick's included - were on the very quietly snored trickle of Coach's breathing. It was this grounding thing, as much a relief as it was stressful.

Hours. They'd been there for hours, maybe two or three if Nick's innate sense of time was still functioning properly (which, considering how much had happened in mere days, was unlikely). The waiting was less painful than the awareness there'd been no signs of Coach stirring.

Rochelle was curled up against the same tree Coach's body had been settled on. She was toying with the edge of her shirt, eyes half-closed with their tired slant downward. Every few minutes, she'd lift her head and look at the so-silent football coach.

Ellis was predictable - he picked a spot on the forest floor perfectly in the middle of everyone and flopped down flat, one leg gently bent with the other crossed over so his boot dangled limply in the air. He twitched it to a song in his head, blue eyes quiet on the leaves overhead.

Curling his tongue behind his teeth, Nick picked his rifle up from next to him. He set the stock against his shoulder, tipping his head to absently scan their surroundings through the scope.

They'd had to deal with a couple zombies stumbling over them. The forest fire was still burning off in the distance, the smell very faint in the air, and Nick had to figure that all the activity in that direction was distracting the infected from finding them. If the forest was as clogged with infected as the swamps had been, they should've been dealing with the things near-constantly.

Not that he was complaining.

His gaze dragged back toward Coach as he lowered the rifle. A small twitch flickered over the conman's brows, tiredly crossing his arms. Pale green eyes flickered to trace the man's bandaged skull and the blood splotched into the gauze. They'd already changed it once, and they were running low on bandages.

Honestly, his leg needed a fresh set - but they didn't have enough.

So basically, you're either going to wake up good as new - or slip into a coma and die. Great. Fuckin' great, Coach, you stupid fuck. What the hell are we supposed to do?! Jesus.

Frustrated, Nick lifted a hand to rub over his forehead, squeezing down the profile of his face. He felt - bad. Like sick bad, like he hadn't slept in days even though that was significantly the opposite. Hell, all things in perspective, they'd gotten plenty of sleep.

Yet, there he was, feeling like shit.
Pushing his rifle to the ground again, Nick tiredly stood up. He gave a slight wince as his weight rolled onto his bad leg, shuffling a little to adjust, before crossing the distance between Coach and him.

He stepped right over Ellis, making the kid jump slightly and sit up, blinking after the conman curiously with those ever-questioning blue eyes. Rochelle glanced up, too, but only when Nick got closer.

The gambler bent down slightly in front of Coach, uncomfortably slanting his weight to keep off his injured leg. He reached out, knuckling the ex-football player's shoulder firmly. "Coach. Hey." His tone was annoyed, like they were walking and the big man was just lagging behind.

It wasn't the first time he'd tried. He was the one with the guts to do it, and the one of them who was least likely to get emotional. Rochelle watched, trapped between hope and disapproval all at once. Her fingers curled a little nervously on her shirt.

"Coach. No offense, sweetheart, but beauty sleep isn't really in the schedule." Staring a moment, Nick let his teeth grate gently against each other. Coach's slumped form didn't so much as twitch, his chin to his chest and breath holdings its shallow tempo.

The more Nick listened to the unresponsive, heavy whoosh of air, the less it reassured him. It was dull and tacky - not the calm snore of a sleeping man. "Coach," he repeated, reaching down to grasp onto the man's forearm and hoist it up, shaking it firmly.

Waiting a moment, he let out a sigh, frustrated with the lack of reaction. Nick set Coach's arm back down, straightening up with a distinct scowl. He pushed his hands into the pockets of his jackets, pushing at the fabric in annoyance.

"How long is he going to be out?" he growled quietly - rhetorically - as he turned on a heel. He yanked his cigarette pack free from his pocket, dragging one out and slipping it between his lips.

Rochelle gave a sigh of her own, her brows pinching together softly. She curled her legs up and wrapped her arms around them, settling her chin between her knees. The question, however unanswerable, breached a barrier in the atmosphere, and she spoke up.

"I wanna talk about something..." The way she said it was a little bored and a little tired, gaze downcast slightly. She wrapped her arms a little tighter around her knees and looked back up after a minute, giving a slightly apologetic smile.

Nick started to light his cigarette, arching a brow as he touched the end of his match to it. "Oh, yeah? Like what?" He turned away to face off into the forest, bending his head over his cigarette. Ellis sat up onto his palms, looking curiously between them as Nick rattled off a list sarcastically. "Talk about Coach?... just how we're going to avoid that giant meat-monkey still out there?... where we're going? The odds of us dying on the way there? Oh, maybe the odds of CEDA never showing up and us starving to death when we get there? Take your pick, doll."

Rolling her neck a little with a sigh, Rochelle tangled her fingers together and prompted; "Where'd you guys go to school?"

The conman snorted slightly, smoke escaping him in little puffs with the motion. "School? Jesus. You know it's sad when that's a better topic of conversation than what's going on at the time." Rochelle gave him a slightly twisted frown, just a faint exasperation about it.

Ellis gave a grin, lifting a hand to rub his nose with a knuckle. "Muh ma schooled me fer a long time at home." he offered pleasantly despite Nick's sarcasm, shifting his weight to get more comfortable against the leafy ground.

Rochelle immediately broke into a little sad smile, cocking her head. She jumped on the offered information, relaxing quickly. "Oh god, you must've been the cutest kid -" Ellis gave her an embarrassed look, pulling his cap down slightly over his face, and she cut off with a not-so-apologetic "Sorry."

Nick admitted a bit of interest, if - he figured, defensively - only because the longer Ellis talked, the longer it would take for the attention to turn toward himself. Besides, the kid would like holding up a conversation. "She was a single mom. Why wouldn't she kick you out to school when she could?"

Ellis picked up a leaf between his fingertips, rolling it into a ball slowly. He chuckled, pouting out his lower lip good-naturedly. He teased with a light tone, shaking his head softly, "Not everyone's as sensible as you are, Nick. Haw."

Giggling gently, Rochelle tipped her chin up to smile at Ellis. "He may be an ass but he usually has some kind of point. Did she just want to spend the time with you, or what, honey? My parents would've never had the energy to do something like that."

Ellis patted his hand on his shirt, flopping down flat to the ground. He let his arms cross underneath his head, contently nestling down into the leaves like he was lying on a bed. "Awh, yeah, sure... I wouldn't trade havin' all that time with her fer nothin'. I think she just wanted tuh be there fer me, y'know?"

Nick limped himself back to the tree root he'd claimed as his own, passing Ellis closely. He approached the root protruding up from the ground, but rather than wearily drop all the way down, he simply leaned back against the tree itself. Rochelle cocked her head, smiling. "That sounds really nice, sweetheart."

"He's a real momma's boy." Nick said with some dull humor, just a tint of that mocking drawl sneaking into his Northern intonation. As it always did, it made Ellis laugh, utterly tickled by the mimicry.

"Mhm. A li'l." the mechanic chuckled in ready agreement, rubbing at his temple with a thumb a little bashfully.

Rochelle tightened her arms around her legs, leaning forward and stretching out her spine slightly. "Uh.. Ellis.. honey... about your mom." She hesitated slightly, curling her fingers. "Do you... think she's safe?.."

Ellis immediately nodded, adamantly, wagging his elbows softly in an idle gesture. "Yeah! She was with Keith when he done called me up. I made him swear he'd keep her safe, heh."

Smiling gently, she gave a nod. Even from a distance, Nick could read a little falter of her expression, only for a second - she didn't have the same assurance, not that she expressed that to Ellis. "When did you start going to a real school, sweetheart? I mean, I assume you did, at least for highschool."

Ellis nodded, twitching his boot gently in the air. "Yeah, eventually.. I decided I wanted tuh go to school with Keith 'bout halfway intuh middle school. St. James, south'uh Savannah - it was okay. I made friends pretty easy, I guess, haw. Muh ma was worried I wouldn't fit in on account'uh bein' homeschooled so long, but it was a'ight."
"What?" Rochelle teased, laughing subtly against her knees. "You and your adorable little self not making friends? As if."

He smiled, shrugging up his shoulders and turning his head to settle his cheek against the ground. Peering around the bill of his cap, he flashed an easy grin. "Oh I dunno 'bout that... Keith had more friends than I did, 'n'most'uh mine were really his. It ain't like they didn't like me or nothin', s'just - y'know. Keith's so dang interestin'."

"I can see him holding a lot of attention." She smiled softly, and though she didn't outright say it, there was a little sympathy on her face. Nick noticed it too but held his silence - ten to one, Ellis never even considered that he should've had a problem with being second best. The kid was smiling blithely as always, a little proudly even.

Y'know, the more I think about it, the more I wonder if Overalls doesn't have a crush on the guy. It nearly made him laugh.

Nearly.

"Yeah, he was real popular. Had all them stories, y'know, 'n'everyone loved it when he'd talk back tuh teachers'n shit. Muh mama taught me better, y'know, but Keith was always kinda crazy. Anyhow, after gettin' through high-school, Keith'n his bro Paul 'n'me started workin' at an auto shop tuh start earnin' money. Didn't go tuh college, haw. Too much money."

Ellis glanced back toward Rochelle, giving a small shrug of his shoulders and a smile. "Anyhow... whut 'bout you, Ro'?

Rochelle leaned back against the tree behind her, gaze drifting slowly toward Coach. She watched his chest slowly expand and collapse, stubbled face expressionless as he slept away. "Mm. Public schools all the way, up in Ohio. I had a couple close friends but I spent most of my time working on school newspapers. Doesn't usually win you much in the way of popularity." She grinned gently.

"Wow." Ellis cooed softly, head cocking. "Yuh been intuh news that long? I mean, I been intuh cars that long so it ain't no new thing or nothin', but -"

"I'm disappointed." Nick interjected, a smirk already warning that it was going to be something inappropriate, well before he added, "I always pictured you as the cheerleader type. School newspaper? Really?"

Rochelle held her own with a humored smile, lifting up her chin. "Sorry, Nick, I know you like the slut types, but I was writing articles, not wearing mini-skirts."

Ellis snorted a little helplessly, head tipping. "Y'all're just weird..."

"Anyway..." Rochelle re-directed forcefully, shooting Ellis an apologetic look. "Sorry, Nick, I know you like the slut types, but I was writing articles, not wearing mini-skirts."

"Y'all're just weird..."

"Anyway..." Rochelle re-directed forcefully, shooting Ellis an apologetic look. "Yeah. My mom wasn't totally enthused with the whole thing, but I've been into news since I was a little girl. I think she was sorta hoping for a lawyer or something."

When Nick spoke up again, Rochelle gave him a dry look before he'd even really started to talk. He gave her a wordlessly defensive 'what' gesture, expression victimized, and then spoke. "It's okay. She can't really say I told you so' when you run into her again and have to say your news job shafted you straight into the zombie apocalypse. Becoming a lawyer is even more of a clusterfuck."

She blinked once, annoyance evaporating as she parsed his words - then broke into outright laughter, clamping a hand over her mouth quickly as if embarrassed to have done so. "O-oh God.
I'm going to have to remember that one! That's good, suit."

The conman smirked, taking a heavy pull from his cigarette.

Rochelle did her best to recover, clearing her throat a little and rubbing her wrist over her forehead. Flashing a quick smile, she cocked her head. "They paid my way through college, anyway. It wasn't the cheapest thing, but hey. Film and journalism university - creative arts stuff. I liked it a lot."

"Sounds real swell, Ro'," Ellis said with a smile, tipping his head a bit as he shifted on the ground, letting his legs spread out flat with a soft exhale. "Too bad the whole zombie thing had tuh mess up yer career, y'know."

She laughed gently and waved a hand dismissively at him. "Hey. Story of a lifetime, right? Maybe I'll do a whole documentary on it and end up the richest person around - y'know, and .. not zombiefied."

Sharing a little blurt of giggles between them, it only took a few minutes for the thingNick had been dreading to happen. They shifted their focus to him with a dragging motion, practically in slow motion, sending a stiff sensation up his spine as he automatically released a faint noise of disapproval.

"What?" he groused before they'd even said a word.

"S'yer turn." Ellis prompted cheerily, not balked in the slightest by Nick's irate start. He shifted his weight, propping himself up on his elbows carefully and smiling merrily. "I mean, you can't go tuh school tuh be a gambler, right? Did'cha like.. have a job planned or somethin'?"

Nick narrowed his gaze slightly, exhaling smoke through his nostrils. He pulled his cigarette away from his mouth, rolling it between his fingers. "... Nope, too busy planning out how I was going to be President of the United States." he responded sardonically.

He swore Ellis had to doubletake before actually flashing him a 'tsk' look. The mechanic sighed a bit, adjusting his hat with his wrist. "Aw c'mon, man. Yer so closed up it drives me nuts!"

Rochelle laughed gently from where she sat, shrugging her shoulders. She was already giving up, glancing off to the side with an absent smile. "Let it go, sweetheart. No sense starting a fight if the big bad conman doesn't want to share."

Ellis was just about to relent, starting to ease back down to the ground with a slightly disappointed expression, when a loud crushing sound somewhere in the distance had all three of them jumping slightly.

Nick wrenched his body around to scoop up his rifle from the ground, Rochelle and Ellis both glancing at him. He pulled it up to his shoulder, gaze flicking between the scope and the landscape as he scanned around them.

Though he didn't immediately see anything except vaguely shifting foliage, he didn't relax either. They'd pretty much confirmed there were no animals around, not that they really knew why, so he wasn't just going to brush it off. This wouldn't be the first infected he'd had to pick off before it found them that evening.

As Nick stood there quietly, green eyes palely twitching at every shift of a shadow, Ellis dropped all the way down. He sighed a bit as he hit, pulling his cap off his head so he could squint around without lifting his head.
"Reminds me'uh the time Keith'n I went campin' in a forest like this. He tried tuh tie the tent up tuh a tree so's it'd be real sturdy, but found out too late it had a bee nest in it... He was climbin' it tuh attach the ropes... got up tuh the first strong branch 'n' slipped. Hit the nest on the way down... thing stuck right ontuh his foot, man, and I mean tight on there."

There was nothing. False alarm?

Remembering the surprise of infected climbing up roofs and trees, Nick scanned high, too, but saw nothing. He started to lower his rifle, musing.

"I had tuh take it off with a knife -after he fell unconscious from hittin' a branch on the way down, anyhow. Bad thing was he took off his shoes tuh climb, like Tarzan, y'know - man, his foot was like ten sizes too big fer like a whole year. He still can't eat honey without gettin' the shakes! ...just in his foot though. Muh mama jokes 'bout his foot bein' one'uh them Mexican jumpin' beans, but man, I think it's sad."

Rochelle commented decisively, brows risen a little; "You are the craziest person I've ever met."

Ellis gave her a chuckle and grin, slowly replacing his cap on his head.

"Yuh ain't met Keith yet."

In a flash, Nick saw it - it was so misshapen as to confuse him an instant, like maybe it was just a shadow or a shrub. Narrowing his eyes carefully to squint, he jerked his rifle back up and focused through the scope, taking advantage of the magnification.

When the thing turned to face him, he realized why it so confused him. It was oversized to a mutant degree - but only on one side.

From shoulder to hand, its right arm was bloated to almost the full width of its torso. Dark, hardened skin cracked like concrete over its arm, elbow seeming completely frozen by the pure density of the 'flesh' that surrounded it. Its chest stretched slightly to try and support it, wilting on the other side to such a degree that the other limb was no larger than a wrung towel.

Clearly decrepit, its arm flopped bonelessly as it seemed to take notice of Nick, facing him. Its head was almost a skull, skin sunken in to seamlessly follow the curves of its bone structure. Glowing eyes bore straight into Nick's - and he couldn't quite help himself.

"What the fucking shit -!"

It roared. Not quite like the Tank's deafening, world-shattering howl - more like a bull, with that eerie, deep layer to the sound that held subtle human tones. It was more than enough to make them all jump, and Nick felt his gaze blur when the zombie suddenly broke into a full charge.

It moved faster than should've been possible, breaking through shrubs like they were nothing. Leaves went flying as it tipped its weight to thrust its oversized arm in front of itself like a shield.

Ellis scrambled up from the ground, going for his shotgun in an awkward half-sprinted crouch, keeping out of Nick's line of fire. "Whut in the Lord is that!" he blurted, almost fascinated.

Nick had never pulled a trigger so hard in his life. The rifle went off with a crack, unsilenced, and a splash of blood announced its striking the zombie's shoulder, the bullet piercing squishy flesh.

Panicking just the slightest bit when the thing didn't even stagger, the conman took a quick step back as he yanked the reload bar on his rifle and took another shot. That one struck too, but it hit its strong arm with a puff of dust and a strange sound like it had implanted into rock - not skin.
"Whatever the fuck it is, it's not - Shit!"

The thing broke through the last bits of protruding branch that separated them and it, and it hadn't so much as slowed. Nick very sharply realized that his back was near-brushing against a thick tree trunk - he was going to get rammed straight into it.

The impact could very well kill. He was a beat away from bailing out, just throwing himself from where he stood, when something hit him from the side instead. Startled into a strangled noise, Nick grabbed his arms quickly around Ellis as the kid tackled him out of the way, and the two collided to the ground, rolling messily away in a tangle of limbs.

Another shot cracked out just as they hit the ground and the charging infected hit the tree, and when it collided, it slumped down stone-dead.

Nick barely stopped Ellis and his rolling with a hard grasp onto the ground, fingers digging a little in the leaf-clotted dirt. He ended up on top of the kid, both of them having grabbed on to one another in reflex.

The wind was knocked out of Nick and a fresh wave of agony flooded through his leg - but he had the sense to get his head up and blink quickly back toward the zombie, more focused on that than the mechanic he was sprawled over.

Seeing the half-exploded remnants of its skull bleeding gruesomely between its lopsided shoulders, he flicked a glance toward Rochelle. Sure enough, the woman was hunched a bit down against her tree, her rifle clasped tightly in her hands. She looked a little shaken, but her gaze was on the weapon, not the now-dead zombie.

"W-wow." she uttered, more to herself. "Strong gun."

Ellis' voice dragged Nick's attention back, coughing between words and voice a little wary. "You okay, Nick? That thing done nearly plastered you against that tree like a bunch'uh jelly.." The conman blinked down, exhaling a large breath as he recalled their positions.

Nick pulled his hands out from under Ellis' weight, shifting off the kid with a hurried jerk. He felt uncomfortable, and immediately, hostility blurred its way into his tone. Rather than look at Ellis, he grabbed for his leg, trying to soothe it and only making it hurt worse. "Yeah - thanks for that, dumbshit. Getting crushed by you was definitely much better."

"'Ey," Ellis immediately defended himself, pushing up onto his elbows and brushing his shirt off slightly. His brows scrunched slightly, and Nick felt a sinking sensation in his chest as green eyes picked up a real confusion in the blink of blue ones. "What'cha rather I do, watch you get hurt?"

"Ey," Ellis immediately defended himself, pushing up onto his elbows and brushing his shirt off slightly. His brows scrunched slightly, and Nick felt a sinking sensation in his chest as green eyes picked up a real confusion in the blink of blue ones. "What'cha rather I do, watch you get hurt?"

"Damnit... "Yeah, sure." he growled a little, feeling backed into a corner. "Considering it's either that or get crushed by you shortly afterward - I'll take the zombies."

Ellis started to stand up, shaking his head, ready to disbelievingly question the conman's abrupt hostility, when Rochelle spoke up. "Guys... Coach."

Both of them suddenly lost track of their argument. They turned on a dime, Ellis skidding and Nick hobbling, to hurry over to the big man. Rochelle had already scooted over while they were arguing, and she was bent in a little, holding Coach's cheeks in either hand.

The fight had shaken something in him, because he was suddenly twitching softly in his heavy slump against the tree trunk. His bandaged, red-stained head gave tiny jerks - what Rochelle was trying to stem the flow of by holding his cheeks firmly - and his fingers worked in and out of heavy Nick felt his pulse jump right up his throat, thinking he was seizing. He nearly uttered the thought, not having the first idea of what they should do to stop him, when they heard the soft, gruff utterance of a broken few syllables.

"A- nnh."

It was miserable. Just miserable, dejected to an exhausted, listless degree. Nick would have never believed the gruff man was capable of that kind of voice, had he not heard it himself. While it was sobering, too, the raw emotion behind the indecipherable sound lent a hopeful thought.

He was dreaming. A nightmare, maybe, frenzied from the head trauma. Maybe that means he's closer to waking up?

All three of them were quiet for a few moments until Coach's body stilled, Rochelle gently cradling her hands against his rounded, stubbled jawline while she let her forehead tip onto his, eyes closing. Ellis softly reached out to set a hand on her shoulder, reassuring, and Nick just stood silently for that time.

When Nick did speak, it was with a low tone and a serious edge. "That's good. He's getting better." Is he?

Rochelle nodded slightly in agreement as she pulled her head back, a little too fast, emotion clearly stringing up her throat. "R-right. Good. Good sign.. Should we try to wake him up more?"

Nick didn't like being the go-to, not when he hadn't planned it out himself. He needed upper hands and plotted cons, not ... best guesses and vague concepts. He felt his jaw go a little taut when Ellis' blue gaze joined in the questioning, bright and aware on his face, and he avoided meeting it.

"I say no." he said simply. "Even if we woke him up, he'd still be too weak to do anything. I'm not carrying him - my fucking leg still hurts just from running his fatass here. Hate to say it but I think we're bunking here for the night."

Ellis flashed an expression, just momentarily, that suggested he was thrilled at the idea of camping out. The mortal quality of their situation settled in after that, and he wilted a little. He bit his lower lip slightly and nodded sedately, squeezing Rochelle's shoulder sympathetically. "More chance we lose that Tank, anyhow, right?"

"Right." Rochelle agreed softly, turning herself to sit back down beside Coach. She sighed softly, watching his face even closer now. His breathing sounded clearer, a bit of a snored rumble re-entering the noise.

Nick stood there just a minute, listening to the sound, feeling a growing sense of doom crawl up his spine. He wanted to punch himself, in retrospect. Nicolas. Just take a minute. Just - just stand here for a second and think. Think really hard. Take all those stupid, nicotine-drowned brain cells and think.

Ellis blinked a bit at Nick, sideways, blue eyes gazing over his features like he could read the intense thought making its way across those sharp angles. He was completely oblivious to the true nature of it as Nick practically deafened himself with a mental: Did you... just fucking... suggest... CAMPING?!!
Nick wasn't necessarily sure what he'd signed up for when he'd found himself suggesting they spend the night in the woods, but he knew this was definitely not it.

Building a fire was complicated by the fact that everything was a little wet from the rain a day and a half ago, humidity kept in by the thick canopy. Ellis had been intent on making them a little pit - he scraped it out, clearing the leafy overgrowth with the heel of his boot, and hunched over a pile of damp tinder with the assurance of "aw, it'll be fine" as he took Nick's matches.

His precious matches, the ones that were the difference between cigarettes and no cigarettes. The difference between maintaining his sanity, and killing his entire team with his bare hands.

Ellis promptly wasted every single one.

Had Rochelle not been there to stare him into a silent fume, Nick probably would've strangled the disappointed Georgian. The wet wood just wouldn't catch fire, and there was nothing fibrous available to coax them into a burn.

What started - unfortunately - as a mere frustration, quickly turned into a legitimate oversight. The temperature rocketed down within hours as the darkness of night swept in behind the canopy overhead, a hard cold settling in as the sun disappeared entirely.

The moon slipped just enough light between the leaves to illuminate the forest. It was a beautiful crystal color, glazing everything with what could've been silver. Or ice, was Nick's sardonic decision - although it wasn't that cold, thank God.

He felt shivers creeping up and down his limbs as he pulled his suit jacket off of himself, the thinner fabric of his dress shirt quickly chilling. Rochelle had fallen asleep curled tightly against Coach's side, snuggled into the man's torso - for all the world - like a little girl would her father.

He should've found it funny, really, made fun of the two for the joint delusion of family they had between them... but mostly he just found himself sobered by it.

You gotta wake up, Coach. You can't leave me in charge. I can't hold this fucking team together, you know that.

Bending forward, aware of Ellis' gaze on him as he did, Nick spread his jacket carefully over them. He covered them as best he could manage, snorting a little when Rochelle squirmend faintly and then slowly settled back down. Though Coach was probably the warmest pillow one could ask for, she was still shivering in the cold, particularly with the back of her shirt torn at the shoulderblades.

"Night kids." Nick quipped quietly, crossing his arms over his chest and giving a harsh shiver as his body protested the cold. He turned away, hobbling back toward the tree he'd been curled up against with his body tightly hunched in on itself.

Ellis leaned against the same tree but at on different side, and he turned a little bit to look up as Nick approached. The untouched moonlight flickered underneath the bill of his cap, giving his skin a soft glow. The kid flashed him a small smile, a tiny bit hesitant, curled up into a ball with his arms buried between his torso and his knees. He wasn't shivering quite as much as Nick was, but he was still obviously suffering.

The mechanic had been dozing along with Rochelle while Nick kept watch over the team, but a few zombies had crept up on them. Nick handled it fine, but the gunshots woke them all up. Ro' had fallen back asleep quickly, but Ellis hadn't managed so well.

"That was real nice'uv you, Nick." he gently chimed, blue eyes rapt on Nick's face.

The conman snorted slightly, easing down to sit against the tree again. He forced even his tightly bandaged leg into a bend, wrapping arms around his slacked knees. His teeth chattered softly together, putting a warble into his voice he wished he could stifle. "I dunno about n-nice. Just smart. She's little and h-he's -" Oh for fuck's sake, Nicolas, you're stammering like an idiot. Fuck cold! Fuck the woods! "- hurt. Priority or whatever."

Giving an annoyed grit of his jaw as his shiver just had to sneak in that last stutter, the gambler let his head roll forward to set his forehead against his bicep. Try as he might, he couldn't stop his voice from trembling as his muscles flinched with his shivering. Trapping his tongue between his teeth between sentences silenced any chattering, at least.

"I thought the South was fuckin' w-warm?"

Ellis released a little sigh, then shrugged up his shoulders. "Usually. Kinda temperamental lately, though." was his hesitant response. "Plus, we're hungry… that makes it feel worse."

Nick grumbled slightly, shivering back against the tree. He didn't really need that particular reminder - his stomach was aching, but the pain from his leg made a nice distraction from it. "Great. Just great."

"Yer shakin' pretty bad, y'know, m-man." the mechanic pointed out seriously, curling his hands into tight fists and putting them to his mouth to huff into them. "How's yer l-leg doin'?" Nick couldn't help but feel a little smirk touch his face as he heard the other man start to stammer too.

It was a weird thing to find triumph in, but he did.

The gambler tightened his arms slightly and shrugged his shoulders. "Fine." he lied - at first, then mulled it over before admitting: "…Kind of." He reached one hand to the collar of his dress shirt, closing up the two buttons that he habitually let stay open. It immediately felt uncomfortable against his neck, but it sealed up some heat in his core.

Ellis frowned a little, eyes drifting toward the gambler's injured leg, but Nick wasn't interested in talking about it.

He lifted his head just slightly, glancing up at the other man with a small smirk, re-directing the conversation. "D-didn't you tell a story about that idiot Keith spending a bunch of time in a freezer or something?" Ellis nodded, falling to a little smile. "Well, fuck if he's going to b-be better than me."

The kid laughed gently, lowering his head a little as he succumbed to a heavy shiver. "Keith nearly l-lost fingers doin' that, so, y'know... But it ain't that bad. Just chilly." His laugh turned into a tiny hum as he hunched down, a guilty expression flickering over his face. "Really sorry about the matches, N-Nick... I didn't mean tuh waste 'em all..."

"I'll just reach over and punch you whenever I get the itch for a cigarette." the gambler morosely retorted, settling his hands onto his biceps and rubbing carefully. He was only getting colder; he could feel it creeping in - he'd never really had a great cold tolerance.

Ellis kept watching him, head a bit bowed and gaze just blinking underneath the bill of his cap. Blue eyes were sympathetic, a little smile sprouting up on his face as it became clear Nick wasn't all that angry with him anymore.

"That's a'ight. Although I dunno if it'll really help w-with yer problem."

Nick smirked a little, fidgeting his body into a closer curl against his good leg. If he could've just bent his bandaged leg just a little more - he could've built a little bubble of heat. As it was, air trickled between his knee and his torso, chilling him all over again. "Maybe it'll shut your l-little trap a bit.. that'd be a p-problem solved."

Grinning subtly, Ellis tipped his head down a little. He rested his cheek on his bicep, turning his chin to squint at Nick sideways. "You could always just ask me tuh hush if it really bothers you so much."

"Oh, bullshit!" Nick immediately shot back, disbelieving, his head lifting a bit. One brow cocked up accusatorially, "I tell you to shut up all the t-time and you never listen."

Ellis laughed gently, tightening his arms on his knees carefully. His tone was a bit coy when he pointed out, "Maybe y-you should try askin' instead'uh demandin'."

Nick eyed him sideways, jutting out his jaw a bit with a severe look as he shivered quietly. He had to weigh his pride against everything else, and considering the size of the former, that was a fairly complicated process. Eventually, he spat it out. Mostly.

"Could you p-possibly shut up?"

The younger man busted out into a surprised guffaw, quickly clapping a hand over his mouth to shut himself up with a careful glance toward Rochelle. Seeing she hadn't stirred, he looked back, lowering his hand to grin at Nick, shaking his head. "You suck at askin', Nick, but okay. You go'n'get some rest. I'll keep an eye out."

Nick smirked a bit as Ellis pushed his back against the tree, curling up tightly around his legs with a shiver. The kid went silent, gaze flicked up toward the black canopy overhead. A smile lingered over his face, even one shaken every few seconds by a tumultuous shiver.

The conman looked away, too. He let his gaze halt on Rochelle and Coach, shrouded over by his jacket, and he watched the slow rise and fall of their frames. He wasn't wholly sure he'd really intended to shut Ellis up, but... Ellis was smiling and the playful tint in the silence around them felt...

Okay.

Fuck it's cold. he complained to himself, struggling to control his shivering. He knew he should've been trying to get comfortable and get some rest, but he was too cold to even think about it. He was going to be absolutely miserable, he just knew it.

... and then he blinked slightly, more closely inspecting Coach and Rochelle, his mouth making for a slight, displeased twist as his brain took an unpleasant turn. Body heat was the best way to keep warm after all - they certainly looked comfortable.

He couldn't help but shift, uncomfortably tightening his arms around himself. Was he an idiot to think about cuddling up to Ellis? Of course his immediate answer was 'yes,' but that didn't stop him from thinking about it.

It was so out of his comfort zone, even though he had an excuse this time. What if that was the only way he was going to get to sleep and not sit there freezing all night, unable to do anything but shiver quietly and stew? The idea of falling asleep snuggled with the other man was one of those thoughts that panicked him senselessly.

But Ellis was shivering too...

Frowning slightly with a scowl, Nick forced out a sigh, head turning a little to eye Ellis sideways as the kid shivered gently into his own knees.

The gambler cleared his throat lightly, slowly forcing himself to uncurl. He let his injured leg stay at a half-bend, propped up on the heel of his shoe against the ground, and stretched out the other casually. Ellis glanced at him a little sideways, curiously, and Nick nearly second-guessed himself.

When a full-body shiver attacked his self-control, he relented. "...eh. Hey, El..

Ellis' head turned fully toward him, twisting a bit to blink at him with those pretty blue eyes. They reflected the moonlight with a shine, and Nick couldn't quite meet them. The gambler was clearly uncomfortable, a kind of awkward strain touching the twitch of his mouth, and Ellis rapidly fell to attentive curiosity.

"Yeah?"

Adjusting his shirt slightly and exhaling on the wave of a shiver, Nick shrugged up a shoulder in a slightly defensive motion. "It's - ... fucking cold." he said a little flatly, lips pinching together. Each word came out in a struggle. He felt inexpressibly annoyed with himself, getting more and more eager to just drop it entirely. If it weren't for the bracing cold, he might've.

"I was starting to th-think - maybe - we c-could -"

Nick stiffened in startlement when Ellis suddenly crawled away from the tree. He watched with slightly mistrustful attention, frozen up. The kid turned around, and without so much as a word, he maneuvered over Nick's straightened leg to crawl hesitantly against him.

The conman didn't stop him, so he kept going. Ellis settled down gradually, gently tucking himself to sit between Nick's thighs on the ground, aligning their bodies with Nick's chest to his back. He relaxed backwards, body pushing to erase the distance between them.

Nick took a moment to realize he was holding his breath, but as Ellis tilted his head to rest back against Nick's left shoulder and blink at him - bruised face reddened with an obvious blush - it escaped.

"... Yeah. That." Nick felt like he was working to defuse a bomb when he tried to find where to place his hands. He hadn't felt so fumbling and unsure in a long time - carefully, he let one arm slip over and around Ellis' torso, digits catching and bracing on his waistline, and rested the other on his own thigh.

Ellis chuckled bashfully, averting his gaze a little bit as he lowered a hand and plucked at the fabric of Nick's sleeve where it crossed over his midsection. He seemed to relax when Nick accepted the embrace, and Ellis nestled down with a sigh. "I-I figured. 'M real cold too..."

That wasn't going to last too long. There was an innocently pleasurable heat building up between their chilled bodies, warming them. The conman tried to push his anxiety away - he tried to just succumb to the embrace, reaching for that peace that had crept into him the night before.

He shifted his arm off his thigh, allowing his free hand to reach up and brush against Ellis' shoulder. He felt the smallest gasp of air escape the other man as he let his thumb trace idly up and stroke along the curve of his ear.

In return, Ellis’ fingers adopted a subtle fussing with his shirt sleeve, and the soft brush and shift of his fingertips against his forearm put a comfortable limpness to the conman's body. Nick's eyes half-closed, slowly, and he felt a sigh bubble into existence in his chest - more a purr.

For a silent few moments, inch by inch, their bodies slowly melded together. Fingers explored the spaces open to them with a lazy touch, and their motions coaxed each other to a soothed relaxation as the cold was all but forgotten.

It was strange - but good strange. Wonderful strange, and so warm Nick swore he was dozing already.

Realizing that he might actually do exactly that, he suddenly spoke lowly. Nick lowered his chin to rest his cheek against the side of Ellis' head, his voice dropping to a gravedale, private level with how close their faces were. "Changed my mind..."

He smirked as Ellis turned his head to look at him, questioningly. "I won't smack you every time I want a smoke." Nick reached up a hand to pull his cap off the kid's head with a twist. Dropping it to the ground just by his hip, Nick ignored Ellis' soft 'b-but' expression at the loss of his hat, slipping fingers into his bared brunette curls.

Using the grip he had now, he pulled Ellis' head to twist it back so he could draw the other man into a kiss. The Georgian gave the tiniest of surprised noises, though he didn't fight it, eyes closing as their lips pressed together. Although a gentle exhale parted Ellis' plush lips in a certain vulnerable invitation, Nick resisted it.

Pulling away slowly, Nick curled his lips in to hold onto the warm taste of Ellis lingering on them. He let out a sigh through his nostrils, releasing Ellis' hair to just softly slide his fingertips along the side of Ellis' neck until his hand re-adopted its position against his shoulder.

Some mix of embarrassed and just relaxed, Ellis rolled his head back against Nick's warm shoulder. The gambler closed his eyes, brow twitching together a little bit - but calming. He let himself sit for a moment, brain slowly scanning through every little nuance of how their bodies laid against each other like he could desensitize himself to the entire thing.

There was a question on his mind - it'd been there a while. He felt like it wasn't so much that the moment was calm enough to bring it up to Ellis, but more that he'd never convince himself to ask it again if he didn't ask now.

He felt like he was burning slowly, calmly - but unerringly. Inhaling deeply, he exhaled deeper, and spoke in something a lot like a whisper. His mouth was only a few inches away from Ellis' ear. "Kiddo... I don't wanna -" He paused, then tried again. "You mind if I ask you something?"

The answer came even softer than his own voice, and he could feel Ellis' words trickle against his neck in the form of warm breath. "'Course I don't, Nick. Anythin'.'"

It made him chuckle. Just once, just subtly. More a puff of humored air. He chewed softly at his tongue, trying to work out the best way to word it. Ellis patiently waited, head turning faintly until one blue eye blinked up toward Nick's face.

"Weren't you raised Christian?"

Ellis smiled lightly, squeezing softly at Nick's shirtsleeve between his curled fingers. "Catholic..."
Discomfort tried to settle in when Ellis didn't catch on and he realized he'd have to explain himself - but something about the way the younger man's fingers worked subtly against his forearm and wrist through the blue fabric of his shirt... it was soothing.

Even their voices made it easier - Ellis' tone was unassuming, gentle, almost to the point Nick thought he could've just never spoken another word and Ellis wouldn't have questioned him.

"Eh... I'm just... trying to understand you." It took a slight breath to mold the words, but he forged on, trying to focus on something in the distance. "I'm your first ... guy, yeah?" He didn't really wait for an affirmation, already knowing that much. "Well... fuck, El. I'm not even religious and I flipped shit the first time."

Nick sort of wanted to correct him - but at the same time, he didn't. Ellis' version of 'flipping out' made him jealous. He'd practically shut himself in his house for good he'd been so disturbed by the revelation, and what he'd done.

The kid wasn't done, though. "Religion don't got nothin' tuh do with it... S'like muh mama says, you - well there's a story. Yuh mind..?"

The gambler let a loose chuckle spill out of him, surprised at the talkative Southerner asking permission to tell a story. That didn't happen often. He let his head tip down, mouth pressing tiredly into Ellis' muscled shoulder, and he nodded simply in acquiescence.

A sigh left Ellis, subtle and small, and he started with a dozing honesty. His voice was lilting and soft, and the gambler listened with a silent attention, eyes closing.

"We used to go tuh church every Sunday, since I was just a li'l guy. She wanted me growin' up right, y'know? I remember bein' so gosh-danged bored when I was a kid, haww... but I started likin' it as I grew up. Actually paid attention, heh. Man, she was so happy when I started gettin' involved... me too, y'know? .. oah, anyhow.. I was like thirteen at the time, 'n'this pastor came visitin' from somewhere else. I always liked when they brought in guys from other churches - makes yuh feel real connected with somethin' bigger."

Nick didn't say anything, but he did feel his face drawing into a vague frown, muffled into Ellis' shoulder. The words didn't parse, at first, but something in Ellis' tone did. The need for acceptance. The search for meaning - purpose. The drive to understand and feel understood.

He hadn't given a shit about these things in a long time.

"Well, I dunno if... they didn't really know whut it was he was gonna preach or - heck, maybe they did know. All I know is he got up there 'n' the first thing he started talkin' about was family values - y'know, the sanctity of marriage 'n' such... I mean, that was all good... but then outta nowhere, he started harpin' on how the only righteous couple was a man 'n' a woman, 'n' how society was goin' all the wrong ways, 'n' how we should be ashamed uv ourselves fer lettin' men be with men 'n' women be with women... I didn't even know whut I was hearin', but I just knew somethin' was wrong. Muh mama was white as a sheet. I still remember her face, sittin' next tuh me - she had muh hand in hers 'n' she was squeezin' it real tight..."

The kid trailed off softly. His tone was thoughtful, drifting as he clearly remembered the moment so vibrantly. Nick let him sit for a moment, quietly, and then softly prompted him with a minute adjustment of his shoulder. That was enough, and Ellis re-adjusted his head on Nick's shoulder, suddenly smiling with closed eyes.

"She carried me outta there real fast. I was confused'n'scared… but she stopped just outside, got down'n'took muh hands.. still remember whut she said, almost word-fer-word.."

His voice even softened a bit, like a respectful mimicry. "'There's never an excuse tuh hate folk. It don't matter who they are or whut they're doin' - even if yuh don't feel the same way, everyone's got the God-given, human right tuh be who they are. You do too, peach.'"

The kid chuckled softly, voice full of a smile. Nick found himself with something near to one on his lips, hidden away. It was impossible to resist, especially when no one - not even Ellis - would see it, anyway. Ellis didn't seem to notice he'd included what must have been his mother's pet name for him - peach.

Nick felt almost awkward with the knowledge. It was too private. He didn't know where to stow away that piece of information… and neither could he figure out how to forget it.

"We didn't ever go back tuh church, neither - she said it took more than bein' a church tuh be a place'uh worship. Heh. ... I guess I never thought I'd end up bein' in this situation, but... y'know. I ain't scared or nothin'. I just know I like you, Nick. Can't be nothin' wrong with that."

Nick's arm slid down, joining his other arm in slipping around Ellis' torso. He tightened his grip, grasping his own elbow to frame the younger man between his biceps, and gazed suddenly off into the trees.

"... Ellis, you are one of the most naive people I've ever met."

Nick bit his tongue slightly, chewing against it. He should have been upset. Or uncomfortable. Or felt something. He should have laughed off the kid's words, at least, but all he really felt was tired. He felt paper-thin.

And somewhere, guilty. He wasn't sure why.

"You're a funny change for me, Ace."

Ellis smiled, glancing down toward his lap. "Me, too." His fingers tightened on Nick's sleeve, and he settled into a comfortable slouch, one of his hands slipping to rest on Nick's rifle and taking ownership of the gun. "Get some rest, Nick."

Obedient for once, Nick closed his eyes.

Part of him needed desperately to think about the next day, needed to obsess over the possibility of Rochelle (or - fortune willing - Coach even) waking up and seeing them, immediately pegging them for what they were.. needed, in particular, to ask himself 'what they were.'

The rest of him threw it all away to senselessly, thoughtlessly, carelessly hold onto the body in his arms. There were more questions than answers and he just didn't care.

He couldn't find the energy.
Chapter 57

The night was quiet. If there were any infected remaining in the area, they didn't find the survivors - maybe it was fortuitous that the fire hadn't lit. It would have drawn attention, inevitably, and the last thing they needed was a horde.

It was that quiet that lulled Ellis. The silence, and Nick's warm body molded against his back. The gambler gripped him like a lifeline, breath a subtle snore against Ellis' ear. The pleasant feeling it spawned in Ellis' chest only heightened as the night passed on uneventfully.

He hadn't meant to fall asleep.

Honestly.

It wasn't so much a conscious decision, as it was an event that took place without his knowledge. He didn't realize he'd fallen asleep; he only realized he was abruptly waking up - and it was definitely not night anymore.

The temperature had risen back up, and Ellis could tell instantly. He hadn't felt so warm in a long time, nuzzling his head closer to his adopted pillow - which was, by the stubble scratching pleasantly against his temple, the crook of Nick's neck. He didn't want to open his eyes, didn't want to ruin the perfect bubble around his mind.

He definitely didn't want to think about what could've happened if something had found them while he dozed.

Ellis had never slept with anyone before - Keith didn't count, because they'd always been in separate sleeping bags or one took the floor while the other took the bed. The knowledge that he and Nick had really slept together - nuzzled close, like Ellis had seen him with his pillow before - gave him this pleased high.

His fingers wound deeper in the thin fabric of Nick's shirtsleeves. He felt his heart flutter when Nick's arms, wound tightly around his upper body, pulled him closer in return. The deep rise and fall of the gambler's chest shifted Ellis with it, this peaceful rhythm that only made it harder to think about moving.

Settling his body back into the relaxed slump it'd been asleep, Ellis tried to convince himself not to drift off again. They couldn't just stay there all day - snuggled down and warm, safe in a deep corner of the forest. They had to get up.

As if in solid disagreement, one of Nick's hands sleepily found its way into Ellis' hair. Fingers wound in short brunette curls, tips brushing against a sensitive scalp and sending Ellis into a melted sigh. He could feel the edges of the gambler's rings, the cold press mingling with the soft warmth of agile digits.

"Nick.." he whimpered in soft affection, turning his body around. He barely managed the gesture with how tight Nick's arms were around him, but he successfully rolled himself to face Nick and bury his face against his neck.

He wanted to hear the conman's voice - and though he didn't necessarily want to wake him up, he felt a sense of curiousity wondering just what Nick would be like that morning.

Though Ellis had ended up distracted back then, he was pretty sure he understood what had happened back in the swamp trailer. They must've gotten snuggled together in their sleep, and Nick's vehemently angry reaction had spawned from that. That, and both other times Nick had found a way to avoid sleeping with him.

He wasn't sure it was just the idea of getting caught, either. The gambler seemed to have some deeper fear of it, some kind of resentment of the closeness, and - though the cold had had plenty to do with it - Ellis was thrilled by the fact Nick had finally given in.

Ellis sighed in a pleasant exhale, muted into Nick's shoulder. Their conversation the previous night was still fresh in his mind. He was happy Nick had asked him - even if the gambler seemed adamantly against sharing things about his past and Ellis still had only fragments, Nick had brought it up… even though the conversation had been visibly hard.

Ellis felt trusted. He really hoped he'd helped - his mom's wisdom had certainly always guided him.

Reluctantly lifting his head and feeling Nick's hand slip out of his hair, Ellis forced his eyes open.
It was light, maybe just after sunrise - Ellis didn't really want to crane his head too far to check. He blended carefully past a blur of sleepiness, trying not to shift more than he had to. Seeing Nick's sleeping face put a smile on his own, and he couldn't resist just looking him over for a quiet moment.

It set his pulse to a strange rhythm, gaze flickering over those sharp features. Nick hadn't shaved in a while, and his jawline was getting dark with stubble. He was… handsome, his expression smooth and calm, even though his cheeks were a little drawn and his eyes tired and dark underneath. A little breath caught warmly in Ellis' throat, forcing it out in a sigh.

He could feel it deep down with a tremulous kind of awareness - he really liked the other man. A lot. He'd felt something close with his last girlfriend... just looking at her face had made his head hum.

Looking at Nick made his whole body hum.

Settling his face just in front of Nick's, he snuck his head forward, just nuzzling the tip of his nose against Nick's in the tiniest of brushes. He couldn't help the affection; he wanted - needed - to share the feelings he was having.

His heart fluttered, hearing a little half-hum escape the gambler. Gently smiling, he playfully raised his chin to close his teeth around the tip of Nick's nose, nipping a bit. A little 'haw' escaped him when Nick's face wrinkled softly in sleepy distaste and he tried to nudge his head away, rolling limply on his neck.

"Nnh." the conman mumbled vaguely, whole body shifting as he suddenly tried to roll over and escape the Georgian's grip.

Ellis let out a chuckle before whispering apologetically, "Alright, alright - sorry… don't leave..." He had to dig his knees into the ground a bit, tightening fingers on Nick's shirt, to keep him from rolling off the tree. Ellis held onto him till he settled back down, a weary but faintly calm sigh filtering through the gambler's nostrils.

Sympathetic and in light of the endearing restlessness Nick was showing, Ellis was just starting to settle back down to hold him when a hand touched flat onto his back.

He blinked, freezing. He knew where both of Nick's were - and that was definitely not Nick. His whole body shifted slowly, awkwardly, trying to move away from it at the same time he tried to Craning his head lightly, Ellis felt a chill settle in as his gaze found Rochelle's just a foot behind him. His breath stopped in his lungs - and the feeling was something similar to being at the very bottom of a very deep ocean.

His chest cavity might have crumpled in on his heart right there.

"O-oh - It ain't -!"

Rochelle was crouching gently, one hand rested on her thigh while the other was settled on his back. She had this quirky look of sympathy, one edge of her mouth lifted up in a smile and chocolate eyes a little narrowed.

"It ain't whut it looks like!" He quickly panicked, wheedling out the words, trying to back-pedal off of Nick and roll himself sideways onto the ground. "I-it was real cold and - we just - he - i-it ain't like -"

"Whoa, whoa, shh, sweetie..." she shushed him, lifting up hands in a soothing motion to try and stop him before his panicking woke Nick. He was hesitant to stop, still half-atop Nick and awkwardly sprawled as he dropped his head shamefully.

"It's okay." Rochelle whispered gently, smiling at him. She offered him a hand, motioning for him to carefully move away. "C'mon, I just wanna talk to you, sweetheart. It's me, remember?"

Ellis dropped his gaze toward the ground, biting carefully at his lower lip. He didn't take her hand, just slowly crawled away from Nick and to the side. He stood up hesitantly and slid his hands into the pockets of his coveralls. His ears burned. His stomach rolled in his gut until it hurt.

Still smiling even though he hadn't taken her hand, Rochelle softly looped an arm through his. "Let's just get a little ways away so we don't wake the boys up, okay, honey?"

He nodded. It was all he could do.

Pulling him away, carefully, she rested her cheek on his shoulder with a sigh. He went awkwardly stiff next to her, silent, looking up to frown gently at the sleeping shape of Coach still draped over with Nick's jacket.

Nick was going to hate him.

The ache shifted from his chest, up his throat, and behind his eyes. He felt the rising pressure, and it was all he could do to suck in a small breath and keep the watery sensation at bay before it brought tears to his eyes.

They walked softly away from the clearing they'd made their 'camp' in, the silence of the forest overtaken by the rustle of leaves and branches against one another. The smell of gasoline and smoke was still tangible on the breeze, along with a heavy scent of burnt flesh and decay.

They didn't go too far, though - Ellis could still see the two sleeping men when Rochelle stopped him gently, sliding her hand down his arm until she grasped his fingers between her own. He wasn't sure what to do, so he just reciprocated the gesture, trying to avoid her gaze by focusing it toward Nick.

"... So -" Rochelle started, only to halt. She glanced up too, and they both watched in momentary silence as Nick started to fidget in his sleep, seeming aware he was alone.
His hands twitched on his torso, grabbing at his own dress shirt - and apparently disappointed by it, because he tiredly moved them to grab elsewhere, searching. When he found nothing, his arms slumped in a lonely, grasping cross over his chest, head lolling forward silently.

He didn't wake up.

"...so," she repeated, and when Ellis forced himself to look back, he was mortified to find her fighting a wide smile. It… hurt, stung, like she was laughing at him. "you and Nick are... a thing?"

Like the question opened a floodgate, Ellis just started rambling. Every time he reached the end of a sentence, he stammered and vaulted into a new one - he never really had an ending for them. He didn't know what to say that would make this go away. Didn't know how to fix this.

His face turned a vibrantly humiliated shade of red, fighting a half-step back, tearing his hand from hers and jamming both his hands back into his pockets. "I-It ain't whut you think, it's just it was cold 'n' he - there ain't nothin' goin' on, really, yuh just - See, we just needed tuh - I mean, we ain't a 'thing,' we just - I'm the one who - Awh man… Ro, it ain't -"

She clamped her free hand onto his cheek, giving him an exhausted look and laughing gently. "Sweetheart, I love you, but you've got to be the worst liar I've ever met."

Her laughter cut. Ellis immediately broke into a frustrated whimper, pulling his head from her hand and turning away from her. Rochelle faltered slightly as she watched him, smile fading into a frown.

"... honey, what's wrong? You're… more than embarrassed, aren't you?"

Ellis carefully buried his face in his hands, only barely stopping himself from rubbing over his bandaged cheek. He was humiliated and frustrated all at once - but not for himself. Nick's agitated sigh still rang in his ears, standing awkwardly in front of the trailer. Barely looking at him. The tortured uncertainty plastered all over his face - sunk deep into his tone.

Nick wanted to keep them a secret. Now Rochelle knew, and Nick would despise him, and he'd ruin any shot they had - any shot at… something.

The pressure behind his eyes peaked, and he couldn't stop it when his vision blurred.

"Man... It... Nick's gonna be so mad, Ro'." He knew his voice was shaky, but he couldn't stabilize it. "He didn't want nobody findin' out - I screwed it up! I didn't mean tuh fall asleep - s'just it really was cold 'n' it was so nice 'n' - Shit! 'M so dang stupid! He's gonna hate me…"

"Honey! Honey, it's okay!" She tried to reach out and catch hold of his elbow, but he wobbled away from her, breath hitching with a whimper. He blinked, hard, trying to get the tears to clear.

"No, it ain't!" he argued breathlessly, a frustrated shake of his head punctuating the words. "He's so unsure 'bout everythin'… 'n' he trusted me! How'm I gonna tell him? He'll never forgive me! I -"

Giving up trying to stop him, Rochelle just gave a sigh and spoke over him, crossing her arms carefully behind her back. "Who says he has to know?"

Ellis halted at that, lips pursing carefully. He risked a tremulous glance at her face, even as he knew it revealed the moisture trembling in his eyes, hesitantly lifting up his shoulders as he dared to hope he understood. "Y.. you mean you'd...?"
She smiled gently, soothingly, giving a relieved sigh to see him catching on. "If you don't want me to say anything, I won't say a word. To anyone. Cross my heart."

Rochelle didn't even have time to react before he suddenly swept her up in a tight hug, hands clutching a bit on the torn remnants of the back of her shirt, absolutely bolting to close the distance between them. A little squeak escaped her, quickly wrapping arms around his torso to balance herself when his squeeze took her a few inches off the ground.

"Oh muh gawd, thank you so much Ro'! Yuh got no idea how much that means tuh me! I thought yuh were gonna tell him 'n' Coach 'n' Nick was gonna be so upset 'n' he'd hate me 'n' I couldn't - I couldn't take that… Awh, man, I really thought I ruined it, Ro'!"

She quirked a brow, patting at his back in an attempt at comfort as the younger man buried into her shoulder and exhaled in almost frustrated relief. "I'm sorry, sweetheart, I didn't mean to panic you so much.. I'll be honest, I've had an idea about it for a while. I just... never saw a good way to bring it up."

"R-really?" he managed, surprised. He pulled back slightly, blinking at her as he gently released his arms enough to set her back down. When he blinked, a tear escaped and tumbled down his cheek. He swiped at it with his shoulder. "You.. knew? Like at the house night before last?... when we were talkin'?.."

"Yeah, kinda." Rochelle gave him a gentle smile, a little apology sneaking up over her expression. "I've had a little feeling about it since the trailer. Came out to check on you two and you were... well, pretty comfortable." Ellis started to redden, fidgeting a little. "Not quite as comfortable as last night but -"

He gave an interrupting, "Ro'.. c'mon…", flustered and giving a careful smile. Humiliation was quickly turning into a little giddy high. Coming down from the fear left him with the fact Ro' knew. He sort of wanted her to, or at least someone to. That and she seemed to approve... it made him happy.

"Hey, I'm just observing." She smiled at him, reaching up a hand to tickle a fingertip against the tip of his nose. "I kinda just thought it was a funny accident, but… you guys had been acting weird, and I thought maybe, but… I didn't know for sure until now."

Ellis nodded just a little, looking down. A kind of awkwardness snuck up over his face, and Rochelle noticed. She smiled, reaching up to brush the stray tear away with a thumb, lowering her voice even further in a teasing hush. "So... you've gotta tell me some stuff, honey. I'm dying to know. Is he sweet to you?"

Breaking into a blush, Ellis turned his chin away a little bit, ducking her finger. "A-awh, Ro', c'mon -"

Rochelle smiled affectionately, cocking a brow and then her head. "Please? Just a little? Give a girl something, huh? I just wanna know he's being good to you, sweetheart. So I can decide whether or not to whoop him."

He chewed carefully on his lower lip, averting his eyes in embarrassment. It was a good kind though - his heart fluttered lightly and he struggled to control his blush. He couldn't even get a response out before Rochelle was laughing.

It didn't hurt this time.
"Oh my god, you're red as a tomato." Her laughter faded a little, and her head quirked. Some thought flashed over her eyes, but it was gone as quick as it came. She flashed him a smile. "You really like him, don't you?"

Ellis just blushed deeper, trying to hide under a bill cap he didn't have. Hesitantly, his head turned, and he carefully looked back at the sleeping gambler. He didn't need to think about it to know what his response was. It just came out, easy as breathing.

"Y-yeah. I really do, Ro'."

"Oh sweetheart..." She leaned forward, catching him with a kiss to the cheek. He ducked his head subtly, grinning lightly. "I knew he was sweet somewhere in that cold heart. You can just tell, you know? He's got these moments - between the asshole ones... oh honey. I just want to know everything, but - I won't. Secret's between us, I promise."

Ellis chuckled bashfully, adjusting his weight a little bit and biting on his tongue. He was embarrassed to say it - but he did anyway, fumbling out the words. "W-well.. I don't mind .. y'know, talkin' about it.. a li'l..."

With no further prompting, she clamped hands onto his elbows, leaning forward and beginning the barrage. It just made him think of his mother, grilling him after a date. It made him smile. "What's he like? I mean, is he different with you? Gentle? He can't be a raging dick all the time, right? Has he told you anything secret? Have you guys - y'know... -"

"Ro', I said a little!" Ellis guffawed back helplessly. He definitely didn't want to encroach on that subject with her. He sighed quietly as Rochelle gave a little shake of her head, apologizing wordlessly, and then whispered gently to her.

"... He's real touchy about sayin' anything about.. y'know. Feelin's. He don't like talkin' about it, 'n' he don't like sayin' it none... but - sometimes he gets this... look. Or says somethin'... and it makes up fer everythin' else, y'know? Oah, Ro', is that girly?"

Rochelle's smile never faded throughout his admittance, and her hands slid up to grasp his shoulders instead, squeezing a little as she stated firmly: "Yes. But that's just how I like you." Ellis wasn't wholly sure if he should be bothered by that or not, but he couldn't help but smile stupidly as she pulled him into a tight hug, snuggling their foreheads together lightly.

He was usually bashful about being that affectionate with women. It wasn't really gentlemanly - but it was different with Ro'. She was like his sister. They'd all become like family, with life or death in the balance. He felt comfortable as he hugged her back tightly, beaming.

"I really like 'im, Ro'..." he whispered privately, indulging in the fluttering joy of the fact, and she giggled, pulling her head back.

Rochelle leaned up to plant a kiss on his forehead, making him blink, and smiled at him. She whispered back teasingly, "C'mon. Let's wake your sleeping beauty up before he gets too lonely."

She stepped around him, catching his hand to drag him with as she walked back toward Coach and Nick. He stuttered a bit, laughing with an embarrassed edge and squeezing at her fingers in protest. "Ro', quit..."

"Okay, okay." she relented in a gentle tone, quieting as they approached their 'camp' - such as it was. Rochelle gently laughed to herself as she broke off to walk over to Coach, bending down next to him, while Ellis bashfully crossed toward Nick.
He was a little relieved to see that she wasn't watching him when he shuffled down to kneel next to the conman. She was still smiling, admittedly, and he just knew she was still thinking about the whole thing... but her gaze stayed well away as she gently checked the bloodied bandages wrapping around Coach's head.

Clearing his throat a little, Ellis reached out a hand to grip softly on Nick's sleeve. He tugged lightly, trying to stir him as nicely as he could. "'Ey, Nick." he soothed carefully. "S'mornin'..

The gambler hummed vaguely, his body shifting slightly as the movement touched his consciousness. One of his hands lazily reached out and grasped onto Ellis' wrist, the motion as sleepy as it was quick, and Ellis gasped a little.

"Nick." he repeated a little more firmly, feeling his cheeks light up as the still-mostly-sleeping conman's fairly strong grip suddenly started to pull lightly, like Nick might yank the younger man down to lay with him.

Of course, it wasn't like he really had to hide from Rochelle anymore - but it was still instinct. And, anyway, they had to hold up the illusion. The last thing he wanted was Nick getting suspicious.

The tone must've hit something, because Nick's fingers loosened and he shifted slightly, lifting his head suddenly. Green eyes blinked awake, expression blank as he adapted to the abrupt consciousness.

Ellis' lips softened back into a smile, watching him wake up. He squeezed his fingers subtly in their grip on Nick's sleeve, then let go, putting his hands onto his knees. "Sorry, man. Time tuh get up."

Nick moodily lifted up his hands to rub over his face as consciousness gave way to a slightly pained expression, bending forward slightly. He gave a groan, then carded fingers roughly through his hair. "... tits." he hissed out, short and sweet.

"Whut?" the Georgian questioned with a worried bite to his lower lip, cocking his head. "It ain't yer leg, is it?" He'd made a concerted effort to keep from touching the other man's injured leg in the night.

"Hurts like a bitch... and I think I got a few knots from sleeping on this damn tree.." the gambler admitted in a testy grunt, lowering his hands to put his palms to the ground and push himself up. Ellis hopped up to offer his hands out to help - and he was pleasantly surprised when Nick grabbed hold of his forearms and accepted it without a word.

The kid gave a little frown, then chuckled. He crossed his arms behind his back, fingernails scratching gently at his forearms where Nick had grasped him. The gambler huffed audibly as he tentatively tested his weight on his injured leg. "Sorry, Nick. Guess I was comfier than you were."

Nick smirked faintly, squinting in pain as he forced his spine to roll back till it snapped in a few places. Giving a shaky exhale of pleasure as he straightened, he shrugged a shoulder. "Eh. I'm mostly.. really fuckin' hungry."

Ellis chuckled softly. They'd gone far too long without sustenance. Their energy would flag soon. "Me too." he agreed in sympathy. "Real thirsty, too."

The conman exhaled heavily, and glanced up. His gaze flicked onto Rochelle, staring a moment. Ellis could just see thought dart up over his expression, a slight tautness touching the edge of his mouth, and the Georgian's pulse darted up a few notches.

When Nick matched Ellis' gaze, arching up a brow just slightly, the mechanic flashed him his best reassuring smile. There was a part of him that regretted lying to the gambler… or lying at all, really… but the rest of him figured it was a better alternative. Not just for him, either.

He wasn't sure if Rochelle's acceptance of them would comfort Nick like it had him.

He spoke in a faint whisper; "I woke up first.. s'Alright, Nick."

Nick was visibly relieved, expression calming and gaze re-adjusting forward. Ellis felt a little flutter of conflict in his chest, uncertainly holding fast onto his smile and curling his fingers up. Half of him was glad to spare Nick what was obviously so painful for him - and the other half felt a little tiny flicker of disappointment.

He wasn't really sure what part of the whole thing disappointed him - and he didn't really have a chance to examine it. Before it truly set in, Nick glanced back at him and lifted a hand to rifle ringed fingers lightly through the other man's dirtied curls.

The motion sent a full-body shiver of warmth right down Ellis' whole frame, blue eyes blinking widely open, and he meekly glanced up to meet entirely-too-sharp green ones.

"Thanks for last night, El."

Ellis gawped quietly after him as the conman walked cautiously forward to join Rochelle, a snarky "How's your pillow doing, Ro'? Nice and flabby like always?" (a half-insult she didn't rise to; merely rolled her eyes) already escaping him as he strolled over.

His cocky swagger was only faintly daunted by the way he had to swing his injured leg to avoid bending at the knee too much.

When the initial surprise faded, Ellis fell to a tiny smile. He hummed very faintly, crouching down to retrieve his hat from the ground and quickly shake it off. Slipping it back onto his head, he put hands into his coveralls' pockets in a slightly embarrassed gesture, walking to join the other two.

Those words were going to be ringing in his ears for a while.
It was that time, when everything came to a head and it was either wake Coach up, or …

They didn't want to consider what the 'or' was.

All Nick knew was that they needed to get moving, before hunger rendered them incapable of fighting their way back to civilization. He was already feeling weak, and he knew his leg needed cleaned and fresh bandages. The wound had scabbed over, so it wasn't bleeding actively, but the ache worried him.

The last thing he needed was an infection.

Rochelle and Ellis crouched down to either side of Nick, three gazes all focused solely on Coach's slumped frame. There was a level of anxiety in the air, and for the first few beats, not even Nick seemed ready to make any kind of jibe.

There was a very telling silence around them at first, like a held breath. The gambler had already retrieved his jacket from the big man, and he was still straightening out his lapels with a deep sigh.

Ellis was, predictably, the first to speak up. He somewhat hesitantly adjusted his cap, tipping the bill down over his face. "...Whut're we gonna do if he don't wake up?" His chin lifted up a bit, glancing from the two faces next to his.

Nick drew his mouth in a small flinch, sighing again. He snuck the smallest glance sideways at the kid, musingly, before shrugging his shoulders. Ellis was visibly fretting, expression stuck in hesitant concern, and when Nick reached for something reassuring what came out was: "Then we start really worrying."

Damn, you're good, Nicolas. he barbed self-critically.

The gambler jumped a little when both Ellis and Rochelle's hands suddenly latched onto either of his jacket sleeves. Giving a slightly annoyed look at either of them, he exhaled a frustrated sound and shrugged up his shoulders to shake them off.

"Jesus, you two.. Calm the shit down. I'm kidding. He's going to wake up, okay? …the fuck off me.."

The conman dropped lightly to his knees, lowering a bit further though it made his leg protest. He flexed his ringed fingers faintly in the air before leaning forward, setting hands onto Coach's shoulders. He felt his teeth grate lightly against each other. There was a choice between being nervous and being angry; he chose the latter. He usually did. Come on you stupid, useless fatass... come on, don't do this to us.

Tightening his fingers in the ex-football player's shirt-sleeves, Nick carefully shook him - just enough to disturb how he was sitting. The man's head shifted lightly with the motion, rolling a bit. "Coach. It's been long enough, ya lazy fucker."

A soft grunt escaped the slumped man, the sound faintly aware, and the conman felt his brows lift. An excited exhale left Rochelle by his shoulder, and Ellis outright jumped.

"Oh thank gawd.." the youngest practically wheezed, scrambling forward a bit to grasp onto the injured man's wrist with both his hands. He seemed far more confident now that there'd been a sign of Coach's surfacing consciousness, giddiness creeping into the edges of his voice. "Ey Coach, man!"

It took Coach a moment to stir, shaking his head with a slow groan of almost pain. Nick let himself relax back, retracting his hands and wiping them slightly on his jacket with a look of disdain. He rearranged his features into something uncaring, preparing to disengage and let the others have their reunion.

Then, the ex-football player launched his whole body straight off the tree.

For all his weight, Coach careened with the agility of a cat up half onto his knees, twisting slightly as he rammed his strong shoulder straight into Nick's chest. The motion was coupled with a confused shout that turned strangled at the last second.

Nick went down startled, slamming flat on his back onto the grass with a choked "FUCK-?" as he threw up his hands to defend himself, seeming to expect Coach to continue coming at him.

The big man didn't, though, just catching himself on a knee to hover there, disoriented and trying to get a hold on his surroundings. His flat nostrils were flared out as he panted, gaze flickering with a sort of energy not usually in his features.

More than that - confusion.

Rochelle scrambled forward to get her hands out in a soothing motion in front of him. "Hey, hey, Coach! Calm down, it's us!" Her expression was drawn up in a concerned look, thick and unglossed lips pursed with concern.

"That's what I get, is it?! Are you fucking kidding me?!!" Nick couldn't contain it, anger breaking forth all over his stubbled face with a sharp scowl. The only comfort he took was that the blow had flung him straight backwards, and he'd managed to kick up his injured leg and keep it from taking the fall.

"I hate all of you assholes. Jesus."

Coach's generally strong expression seemed so confused, like their words didn't make sense. "Nh-What? What the hell .." He made to pull back slightly, dark eyes latching onto Nick's angered expression as the conman started to pick himself up off the ground.

"Yuh took a nasty hit, man. Been down fer the whole night." Ellis explained sympathetically, looking slightly worried as his gaze flickered over the football coach's expression and then down at Nick to check the gambler hadn't been injured. "You feelin' okay?"

"Y-yeah." the big man hesitantly confirmed, slowly leaning himself back until his shoulders hit the treetrunk behind him. His expression was genuinely disturbed, slowly lifting his hands to touch his head. "Sorry, Nick."

He quickly winced, obviously pained, letting his head gently roll forward with a grunt. Rochelle relaxed just a little bit, scooting closer to settle hands onto one of his arms comfortingly. "You're okay, baby. We're all here."

Coach slowly reciprocated the gesture, his hand settling over Rochelle's with a heavy pat and squeeze. "Yeah, babygirl.. I.. damn, my head ain't feelin' right."

Growling faintly under his breath, Nick forced himself off the ground to stand up. Ellis offered out a hand to help him up, and the gambler's first instinct was to brush him off, his pride too injured to accept it.

But, after a beat, Nick begrudgingly clasped forearms with Ellis to drag himself up with a slight limp on his bad leg. It isn't gonna kill me to be a little nicer to the kid. At least when he isn't actively being an idiot.

Ellis flashed him a bright smile underneath the bill of his cap as he steadied, pushing his hands into his pockets as they released each other's grip. Nick resisted a small head-shake, exhaling as he glanced back at Coach. He felt a smirk burning at his jaw but effortlessly killed it.

The ex-football player lifted his head slightly, seeming a little more composed after taking a few deep breaths, but his next words brought a weird and unsure silence from the other three. "Where the.. shit, y'all. Did we crash that car.?

His gaze traveled between their faces, reading the discomfort and faintly taken aback by the trailing silence. He rubbed his palm flat against his stubbled cheek, wearily. "...what're y'all starin' fo'?

Nick slowly brushed dirt off his back with a slightly twisted arm, brows flattening and mouth vaguely quirked downward, more like he was irritated than concerned. There was something oddly genuine in the way he suddenly forewent using 'Coach.' "You don't remember, Sam? The Tank?"

Slowly, the big man shook his head, the motion tender. "Shit's kinda .. fuzzy. Last I remember, we…" He trailed off, eyes lowering to examine his hand, flexing his fingers.

Ellis helpfully rubbed a palm against the side of his head, inputting his gentled explanation. "Tank showed up, man, just when we were gettin' in the car. Threw a big chunk'uh road at us, man! Nearly crushed us all. It hit you right on the noggin."

Rochelle nodded raptly, reaching up her hands to gently touch Coach's head bandages, expression focused as she tried to decide if they needed to redress them. He winced as she did, just a faint grimace. "If Nick hadn't've been watching... Jesus, we'd all have.." She fell to a small frown, seeming struck by her own words.

Nick snorted slightly, tone rising back up in a flare of mock annoyance. "Oh, shocker.. that asshole was helpful? I can't believe it."

The woman flashed a demure smile sideways at him, shaking her head with a sigh. She seemed more humored than anything else, and Nick's eyes narrowed into something like a faint smirk. "That's not what I meant and you know it."

Coach suddenly rubbed his fingers down the bridge of his nose, seeming pained, and Ellis bent in slightly with a concerned lift to his brows. He spoke with earnest apology, waving a dirtied hand up at Rochelle and Nick to hush them.

"You okay, man? We overwhelmin' yuh? Keith cracked his head once on this rock while he was tryin' tuh bungee-jump at home, 'n' I kept tryin' tuh ask him all them questions whut yer supposed tuh ask someone with a concussion, 'n'-"

"Son, you're the only thing that's gonna overwhelm me…" Coach chuckled faintly, but quietly, frowning downward as he carefully pushed himself away from the tree slightly. He didn't look steady. Ellis smiled a little, bashfully raising a hand to scratch at the back of his neck.

"Yeah, well." Nick grunted slightly, muting his expression and crossing his arms over his chest. His fingertips flicked idly at a few tears in his jacket, darkly stubbled jaw setting forward. He didn't like Coach's behaviour. "As much celebrating as I'd just love to do, we're sort of on a time crunch Rochelle frowned a little, setting her hands on her thighs and glancing up at the gambler. "At this point? We haven't been before now?"

Nick threw his hands up slightly, shrugging carelessly with a sigh. His voice grew impatient, and harsher. "No, we've been on vacation before now. I'm just saying. We've been sitting around all night, I'm done doing shit-all."

She leaned back in her crouch, getting a little riled in Coach's defense. Drawing her brows together a bit, she cocked her head. "Nick, sweetheart, if Coach needs to take it slow then that's what we're going to do... how would you like it if -"

"Babygirl." Coach interrupted wearily, reaching out to grasp onto her arm. She allowed herself to be calmed, meeting his gaze with a warm look of concern. "It's a'ight. I'm feelin' okay. I don't wanna hold us up. Boy's right sometimes."

Rochelle paused an instant, glancing his expression over before nodding. "I'm just worried. You scared us pretty badly." she admitted lowly.

He chuckled slightly, letting go of her arm and instead focusing on getting himself up on his feet. Ellis was the one who skittered forward to help him stand up, scooting under one of his arms to take on a fair amount of weight.

The big man didn't seem to mind, succumbing easily to the offered help. As he got up straight, he brushed his pants off slightly with a hand, sighing. "Smackin' heads ain't no new thing. Got a few concussions back when I still played football."

"We knew you'd be alright." Ellis cheerily noted, drawing a small chuckle from the big man. Coach adjusted his hand to reach up and set it on the back of Ellis' capped head, patting it in a gruff gesture. In the same motion, he pulled his weight away from the mechanic, seeming hazy-eyed but sturdy as he got his own footing.

He hated to be the paranoid one, but his gaze stuck on Coach suspiciously. He didn't know what he anticipated, but he knew something was wrong. The relief he felt at Coach's return to them was... muted. He just felt irritated instead.

"Just glad I'm not the one who has to drag Ellis and Ro' away, kicking and screaming without you."

Nick gave a slight sigh, the sound annoyed, and he maintained an edge of it in his voice as he turned away. He carefully gathered their guns up one by one, encircling an arm around them to hold them close.

"Oh, yeah, sure. You two and your death-grip on my sleeves a few minutes ago really just screamed confidence." He sensed the heavy glare he got from Rochelle - and, pretty sure he was pushing it a little that morning, uttered, "Not to change the topic or anything.. but Coach's fantastic wake-up call reminded me. We never really talked about that zombie last night."

Well aware he was definitely changing the subject, Nick held a deadpanned expression while somewhat gingerly straightening up with all four weapons now held in his arms. Coach shot him a small gruff look that conveyed a surprising amount of apology.

"Zombie?" the big man questioned warily, and though the question itself made sense, his tone was edged like he didn't understand why he might've missed it. Nick couldn't quite help but keep an idle eye on him.

Ellis blinked slightly, cocking his head curiously as he stretched out a hand to gesture for his shotgun. Although he was obviously just asking for it to be passed over, Nick stepped toward him, his mouth lightly taut as he slid the shotgun's strap over the hick's arm one-handed.

"Here, sport."

Nick saw a slight flicker of surprise over the mechanic's face, but Ellis recovered quickly, shrugging into the strap with the gambler's help and flashing him a grateful expression as he spoke. "We got caught by a real crazy zombie last night is all, Coach.. was kind'uh weird, wasn't it? Yuh know anythin' 'bout those, Ro'? Sure had a real nasty arm on it."

"I don't know, sort of.." she somewhat hesitantly affirmed, stepping forward to pull her rifle out from under Nick's arm without waiting for him to pass it to her. "I'd never seen one face to face, but I guess it makes sense. Called Chargers. For obvious reasons - CEDA wasn't really very creative…Another thing we have to worry about, I guess. Ellis got you out of the way pretty fast, though, yeah?"

She was teasing him. He narrowed his eyes, disapprovingly, and shot back in a caustic tone: "Well if Ellis' reflexes are good enough, then the rest of us should have no problem."

As Ellis snorted a good-natured laugh despite him, Nick lifted Coach's shotgun in the air with a firmly raised brow. "Think you can handle a gun?" He expected the big man to stubbornly swipe it from his hands, and sure enough, that was precisely what he did.

"I'm just fine.." the ex-football player gruffed, smacking his shotgun strongly to his shoulder. Deepset eyes flickered away, and he gingerly reached up a hand to touch onto the back of his head. He was still lacking that towering sturdiness Nick was so used to seeing, in his gaze and his posture. "Y'all plannin' on tellin' me what this mess is about a zombie?"

"Man, it was wild!" Ellis chirruped, enthused with the statement as he stretched his arms above his head, squirming a little as his spine cracked. "I ain't seen somethin' run that fast since - well there was this one time, muh buddy Keith'n'I went tuh his uncle's ranch, 'n'he had this bull. Keith said he knew how tuh ride bulls - but I should'uh known he was full'uh shit when he jumped the fence, screamin' shit in Spanish 'n'-"

Coach sighed, raising a hand to hush him. His expression had fallen to a slightly discomfited, stern look. Either the big man just couldn't quite handle Ellis yet, or there was something else. "... Son, is this goin' somewhere?"

Laughing gently as the kid turned a faint color of pink and uttered a 'sorry,' Rochelle lifted up an arm to point a small distance away from them. "It's dead… We kinda shoved it in some bushes so we could sleep without .. well, thinking about it, I guess. You can go take a look if you want."

Coach nodded wearily, trudging toward the shrubs she was gesturing at. Nick idly kept an eye on him sideways, watching his footsteps to be sure the eldest wasn't unsteady. He seemed a little too unsettled, all things considered - it wasn't like strange zombies were a particularly new phenomenon.

The conman crossed his arms carefully as he adjusted his rifle against his shoulder. He inhaled tightly and suggested, "We should probably stick to the trees for a while until we know for sure that Tank isn't hanging around. It didn't get very far chasing us into the woods and I'd re-eally like to keep that handicap on our side of the table."

Ellis nodded, leaning his weight forward in a small rock on his heels. Blue eyes flicked up to scan the forest underneath his cap, lifting a hand to scratch gently around the still-purpled cut on his cheek. "Yuh don't think it died in the fire?"

"Maybe." Nick shrugged his shoulders, cuffing a knuckle against the tip of his nose in a dismissive gesture. He felt a little sting somewhere as he was reminded of the Molotov he didn't have anymore... He missed it more than he should have, a little more than made sense. "I do know I'm not looking to test that theory. The muscle-bound fuck certainly wasn't afraid of it."

"None of them were." Rochelle's brow scrunched slightly, and the woman gave a sigh as she somewhat uncomfortably reached over her shoulder to pull her torn shirt a little more into place. It didn't work much, a significant swathe of her bruise-dotted back bared to the air.

"Did you see how they just ran straight through it..? God, seeing them chasing after us like that, all on fire - stuff of nightmares. Doesn't help to think they were.. you know."

Nick snorted slightly - he could tell where her trailing words were leading, and he couldn't help but shake his head. 'They were people once.' He wanted to argue the point, but it just wasn't worth it.
As Ellis laid a hand on her shoulder, the gambler scoffed instead.

"Well, aren't you grateful. I'll leave the Molotov at home next time, I guess."

She flashed him a slight frown, but it was humored, a slight laugh escaping her in retrospect. Her hand patted gently onto Ellis', squeezing with a tight affection. "Suit. You know that's not what I -"

When Coach suddenly stumbled backwards, his heavy weight unsteadily moving away from the bush in an almost swerving motion, they all snapped to silence. Nick's gaze narrowed faintly, almost suspicious on the big man's frame as he backed away from the patch of shrubbery they'd half-rolled the Charger into.

It was like he'd seen a snake. His whole body was tense, trying to hurry backwards in the same instant he moved with the half-frozen trepidation of an acrophobic working his way away from a ledge. Only thing was - though Nick's brisk gaze immediately scanned for it - there was no danger in sight.

"...Coach? Coach, whut's wrong, man?" Ellis hesitantly prompted, adjusting his cap to lift the bill slightly so he could get a better look. He didn't seem wholly sure how to react, torn between stepping forward and staying put.

Rochelle outright stood up, protectively flashing to a frown and advancing a few steps. Her head craned a little, looking for what had upset him - but like Nick she came up with nothing.
"Sweetheart?"

The word had barely left her before Coach swung entirely around and suddenly gripped his hands into fists. The one holding his shotgun twitched slightly, fingertips curling into metal. "Let's go."
he gruffed, simply and flatly, with an edge of struggling frustration.

The ex-football player practically stormed forward. Had Ellis not dodged away, he might very well have shoved straight past the kid with one of those still-strong shoulders and knocked him down.

Nick stared at his back as the man passed and continued forward, the gambler's expression calmly annoyed while Rochelle and Ellis fell to quiet gaping. "What the fuck, Coach?" he snapped after
"We're done here," was the firm response, snapped back without so much as a turn of Coach's head. The football coach didn't stop, either - and when Nick fell to the realization that he would leave them behind if they didn't move, he growled in loud agitation.

Green eyes flicked away from his back, and Nick was somewhat disturbed by the realization that Ellis and Rochelle were both looking at him for answers, blue and brown eyes drowned with concern and uncertainty. More than Coach's behaviour had, the conman felt shoved off his guard by the focus.

Rochelle shifted her weight slightly, a little shiver overtaking her despite herself. She tried to straighten her spine, look steadier, but her voice betrayed her insecurity. "Is something wrong with him..?"

He didn't like being looked to. He didn't give wanted comfort, he gave unwanted cynicism. The dual worry he had lazered onto him made him tense, maybe moreso because underneath his reflexive recoiling, a bit of him wanted to find words to soothe it.

Nick just didn't have them.

"Fuck do I know?" he quickly muttered instead, snapping a hand quickly to gesture that they get moving to follow after Coach. Backing away from them, the conman darted to recover their backpack from up against one of the treetrunks, shoving an arm through the thing's dirtied strap.

As he got it settled on his shoulder, gripping his rifle with both hands, he turned to make his way after them.. only to promptly balk, finding neither Rochelle nor Ellis had moved an inch.

Somewhere, his ever-ticking brain kept tabs on Coach as he got further away. Purple and yellow, cross-crossed with black stitching, marked his passage as he almost blithely forged further on through the trees.

Ellis reached up hesitantly, making as if to scratch at his jaw. "H-he's actin' weird.." the youngest survivor worked out slowly. Nick balked a little more as his gaze ticked over the Georgian's fretting expression.

Worry left such dark wells in airy blue eyes. Depths of vulnerable emotion - naive and stupid, and somehow ... captivating. Innocent, like he couldn't bear the difficulty and complexity of the moment and how it had so quickly and effortlessly collapsed from what should have been simple joy at Coach's waking up.

Nick felt the plea in those eyes, the begging hope for an explanation that made it make sense.

...You're a fucking genius at bluffing. Bullshit it, you assclown.

Drawing in a tight breath, the gambler molded his expression into a blank look of dismissal. He shrugged the backpack tighter onto his shoulder and his rifle stock tighter in his grip, sweeping forward with a large step to push himself between the two.

One arm landed over Rochelle's shoulders, the other over Ellis', and with a swift motion he spun them around and guided them to start walking. They quickly adapted to his limped, yet quick pace, making to catch up at least a little with Coach. Nick beat his voice out of the stressed sarcasm that he felt rising up his throat.

"You two'll figure him out. You're fucking annoying like that. For right now, let's just try and let him get his head straightened out on his own. Okay, Girl Scouts?"

Maybe not all of the stressed sarcasm.

Rochelle immediately smiled, shoving her shoulder slightly into his with a shake of her head. It didn't fade right off the bat, even when she glanced up to focus her gaze on Coach's back.

Ellis guffawed gently. Just softly, faintly... but Nick noticed the younger man's body lean subtly into his, side molding against the gambler's, upper arm pressed into his ribs intimately. That said a lot more than his laughter did.

Nick shoved the both of them away before they could get too comfortable, Ellis a little harder than Rochelle. They both had to stumble to catch their balance, and he put his arms to his sides and picked up his pace to put a little distance between them. "Right now, I'm just interested in getting our dumbshit selves somewhere safe."

Green eyes edged with a level of focus as they bored into Coach's back, following the ex-football player as he walked on ahead. The distance between them was minute now, just enough to give the big man some space.

Had it been the Charger? Or something else? Even hoping his injury was as simple as a concussion, they came with amnesia, disorientation, confusion... that just on top of a laundry list of other symptoms, ones Coach would likely not admit willingly. He was stubborn.. in his own way.

The conflagration and car alarm had swarmed the area with infected. Only as the fire-damaged, slightly ruined section of the forest let them see a little clearer, did Coach make any motion to re-join them... still in silence, but there all the same.

Nick didn't see the Tank, but it was clear enough they weren't going to slip by easily or unscathed.

Yep. This is just a fuckin' vacation.
Smoke rose in pillars from the ruined bit of forest that had been so damaged by Nick's Molotov. Even though it had burned itself into ash, the air was still clogged with the lingering smell of something acrid.

Zombies wandered the area, snarling and growling so loudly at each other Nick could feel his skin prickling slightly. They were obviously agitated, drawn there by the commotion of the night previous and, it seemed, worked into a froth by the fact they hadn't actually found the survivors.

At a vague glance, the conman would've guessed somewhere between thirty or forty of them had gathered around the area. Unlike the usual scene where most of the zombies had fallen to sitting or laying down, almost exhausted, these were all wandering with enraged restlessness.

Fights broke out between them like manic dogs, and it was all too easy to repress any kind of lingering melancholy about their long-gone humanity.

The Tank had, in fact, died in the conflagration - its body was a burnt mass slumped lifelessly into the ground. Judging from the blood spilled all around it and the strange slashes of pink amidst the blackened scorch marks, the frenzied infected had taken their rage out on it.

"Tits." Nick muttered in a quiet tone, craning his head slightly to see just how far they'd wandered down the highway. He could still see the curve of the road where the Tank had appeared from to begin with, and there were only a few zombies that had broken off from the group. "I think if we just back up a little we can walk along the road and avoid them."

Ellis nodded in the corner of his vision, rubbing his jaw carefully with the heel of his hand. He sighed a little, perturbed, but his mood was still greatly improved compared to earlier. "Shit, they're riled. Looks like when muh buddy Keith tried tuh fill up a wasp's nest with -"

"This look like the goddamn time fo' that shit?" Coach hadn't snapped at Ellis like that, maybe ever. There was an honest edge of anger in his voice, standing just off to the side with his shotgun tightly held in his clutches.

Ellis withered slightly, blinking toward the eldest with a small expression of hurt. Generally the interruptions didn't bother him too much, but he quivered a little underneath Coach's glare. "J-Jeez, Coach, I'm sorry..

Nick had honestly intended to stay out of it - give him space and let Rochelle and Ellis deal with it. That, however, struck a deep nerve that wasn't going to go quietly. The conman whipped around on his good heel, facing the ex-football player.

Coach straightened slightly, aggressively narrowing his gaze and tightening his jaw, but Nick didn't so much as flinch. "If you have a fucking problem, you take it out on someone who deserves it. Get me?"

The big man jerked his chin up slightly, gruff voice straining against the low tone he forced it into to keep from alerting the infected near them. "I ain't takin' no shit out on nobody. You think yo' ass's got the right to preach that shit anyway?"

Rochelle lifted her hands up, brows moving into a slightly frustrated pinch as she tried to calm them down. "Will both of you quit? We're kind of not in the spot to be arguing right n-"
Coach's interruption sent a shock right across her face, his angry tone having the same effect as if he'd slapped her instead. "I can see that!" She went stock-still, hands curling into fists. Injury spilled into the crinkle of her brow and the slight slump of her shoulders.

Nick was just on the verge of an honest growl, reaching more than the end of his rope. It was much easier to let himself get protective when it came out in the form of anger, and he was more than willing to confront the man no matter what that meant - a good right cross to the jaw being high on that list - as the eldest had now lashed out at all three of them in a row.

Unfortunately, he didn't get the chance. Coach's voice had raised to a loud bass, frustration overwhelming sense, and the noise brought a sudden shriek just ahead of them.

"Mother Mary!" Ellis blurted, taking a half-step back in surprise. One zombie closest to them had noticed the man's outburst, and with its strangled cry of awareness, a disturbance raised up over the whole area.

Tearing away from their fights mid-swing and jerking to spin themselves around as they halted mid-step, the horde suddenly flocked toward the sound, frenzy heightening when they actually saw the survivors through the trees.

Adrenaline spiked in Nick's veins, anger flooding down his spine. He now had a couple reasons to punch the football coach. As he swore softly under his breath, quickly setting his rifle up against his shoulder and folding his head down to look through the scope, he only barely convinced himself to push them down into his gut for later.

"Aim high, Ro'," he ordered emotionlessly, pulling the trigger when flesh flashed through the glassy eye of his rifle. Blood sprayed up to announce his hit, but there was no time to even see the zombie go down before the frothing horde refilled the gap.

The rifle reloaded smoothly, just a sharp yank on a bar only an inch or two above the trigger, and a shell went flying off to the side, a fresh one pushed into the barrel as he released.

She didn't hesitate to set up just a few inches from his elbow. He was dully pleased to see a shot ring out next to his, another zombie going down under Rochelle's gun with a sharp hit to the chest.

Ellis scurried forward to get closer to shotgun range from the oncoming horde, a couple yards ahead of Nick and Rochelle but not crossing their line of fire. He braced himself against the burnt remnants of a tree trunk, hoisting his shotgun up as he blasted off the heavy gun into the horde.

They overcame the survivors in a frenzied sprint, stumbling over the falling bodies of their downed kin, unbalked. Half scrambled for Ellis and half for Nick and Rochelle, splitting up around a larger tree and undaunted by the guns pointed at them.

Nick could see Ellis was forced to hurry backwards from the horde, frantically jamming his hand into his pocket to go after the ammo stashed there. His gun hadn't nearly been loaded enough. "A-aah- shitshit!" The knowledge distracted the gambler, shooting blindly forward - he could hear his shots hitting flesh, but he knew he wasn't paying attention.

The conman was instants from shouting out his name when Coach charged forward to defend him, suddenly racing into the fray where he'd hesitated a moment before. The ex-football player shot straight into the front of the massing infected with a howling shotgun blast, blowing them back just enough to buy Ellis time to reload.

Relaxing to see the kid supported, Nick returned his erstwhile divided attention to the zombies charging his and Rochelle's slightly removed position. Not quite, it turned out, quick enough - because the moment his vision flicked forward, a blood-splattered infected leapt straight at him.

He just barely thrust out his arms in time to strike it in the gut with the nose of his rifle and, as it lashed mottled nails out to try and gouge straight into his eye sockets, he fired. Its whole body jumped, stomach ruptured by the shot, but even when its lower body went limp with the shattering of its spine, it still tried to claw at his face.

"Jesus ass Christ, these fuckin' things -"

Nick shoved it off, disgusted, angrily dodging back a step to let it die, helplessly clawing at the air where it landed. It was hard to hear even his own voice over the gunfire and screeching of infected, this rising anthem of violence, and Nick simply kept close to Rochelle while they picked infected off in unison.

She was, he noticed, a natural with the weapon - the strong recoil almost seemed to strengthen her determination to control it, a fierce focus attaching onto her tense expression. Drowning, he could only imagine, aching frustration that they were fighting at all.

Green eyes noticed blood trickling down her jaw and neck suddenly when she turned her head to aim a shot farther to the right - he hadn't seen her get hit, but claws had scored nasty lines across her cheek.

Nick focused on shooting as fast as he could manage, picking up an even rhythm of firing and reloading. He would've far preferred a machine gun for the situation - but he had to deal with what he had, and the rifle did tear considerable holes in the infected onslaught.

Bodies piled up in front of them with a gruesome ruthlessness, the smoky air only further polluted by coppery blood and a nauseating scent of decomposition worsened by each infected that went down in wet struggles.

The gambler was just starting to relax, firing a bullet straight into the open mouth of one of the last zombies and nearly separating its head from its shoulders, when his eyes picked out the sudden flash of Ellis' grimy yellow T-shirt. The kid stumbled back under the sudden charge of a desperate zombie, the large male infected getting the upper hand on him.

He thrust up an arm to shove it away so he could get a little space, but made the mistake of aiming high. The sudden outthrust of the arm toward its face only encouraged the zombie to switch targets, going from an outright tackle into a lunge to bite down on the offered limb.

Teeth sunk straight into the soft flesh of his forearm, jaw locking down - and Nick's whole spine shuddered with a needled sensation, driving him to a gritted jaw when Ellis cried out in utter pain.

"AH-HAH-HHOOWWWW!"

Ellis tried to struggle, reflex making him jerk his arm, but all that did was worsen the bite. Nick furiously twisted around to take aim straight at the zombie's head, but... there were too many chances to miss, too much likelihood Ellis might flail himself into the conman's sights. He could still feel the way his crowbar had sunk into the marshy ground, a hair's breadth from driving into Ellis' back.

His hesitation gave Coach a chance to react. The big man whipped around at the mechanic's cry, and he rushed forward to get his shotgun jammed right against the infected's side, blasting a hole straight through its ribcage.
The thing jerked violently and went immediately limp, but its jaw was still locked tightly shut around Ellis' forearm. The Georgian quickly crumpled slightly down, falling half to a knee, and Coach followed with him. His deep voice was audible even over the dying gurgles and screeches still echoing from the infected clinging to life from their positions on the scorched ground.

"Whoa, whoa, Ellis.." he gruffed carefully, big fingers getting a hold on the infected's head and starting to pry the thing's jaw apart as gingerly as he could. Ellis' expression spasmed painfully, breath hitching as he tried to stay still. Fresh, ruby-red blood trickled down the zombie's chin. He'd broken skin.

Nick watched with a critical eye, trying to get a hold on his anger as his shoulders tensed. He wasted no time stalking toward them, Rochelle close at his heels, and he had to resist the urge to shove Coach away and take care of Ellis himself.

It was a very deep-seated reaction - strong and grating. It unnerved the conman slightly. He was already slightly frustrated with himself for his balking at shooting to begin with.

"G-ghn... A-aaow.. shit.. hurts.." Ellis whimpered, turning his head away as the zombie's teeth pulled free from his forearm. The moment he got free, he pulled his arm in like a wounded dog, clasping a hand over the fast-bleeding bite. Coach shoved the still body to the side, wiping his hands on his pants and staring slightly at the injury.

"We got any mo' bandages?" the ex-football player asked almost hesitantly, lifting his head to look up toward Nick and Rochelle with an exhaustedly sunken look to his face. The conman was already pulling the backpack off his shoulder, shoving it into Rochelle's arms.

Nick's arms crossed slowly over his chest as she took it, rifle held by the warm barrel in one hand, and his voice absolutely cut with venom. There was no sympathy for that exhaustion. "You're fucking lucky we didn't waste all of them on your fucking useless head."

Coach gritted his jaw faintly, broad shoulders tensing. One hand slipped up almost reflexively, wide palm touching the bandages still wrapped around the crown of his cracked head. "... Yo' ass pickin' a fight wit' me for gettin' hurt now? It ain't like I did that shit on purpose."

The conman responded with all the speed and snap of a stretched rubber band released just before the breaking point. "You sure fuck up a lot on accident."

Rochelle fell to a slightly uncomfortable silence, slipping down to crouch next to Ellis and gently get an arm around him. His shoulders hitched, pain swarming his posture as he tried to tighten his fingers to stop the bleeding on his own wound. Her fingers soothingly joined his, flinching at the hot blood but not pulling away.

"Hey, sweetheart.. you're okay, it's just a little thing. You're our big tough Georgia boy, right..?" She smiled gently as he whimpered but nodded furiously, hiding his face slightly under the bill of his cap. Her free hand pulled the backpack open, finding gauze as quickly as she could.

Coach slowly pushed himself up to his feet, hostility curling his hands into fists. He stood a far amount taller and wider than Nick, but the conman wasn't intimidated in the slightest - he didn't even try to puff himself up, in fact, confident in the absolute knife-sharp edge of his gaze.

"An' yo' ass is just perfect, huh? Look, I got worked up - I ain't -" He let out a heavy exhale, tightening his fists a little further. "My head ain't feelin' right an' I wasn't thinking. A'ight? You wanna keep fightin' or drop it an' move on to gettin' Ellis some help?"
Nick kept his gaze furiously locked onto the big man's deepset one, not wavering in the slightest. He was done dancing around, spitting fire with a serious edge to it. "Your getting worked up could've killed us. You want to drop the self-righteous bullshit routine and take a look?" One arm escaped, and he pointed sharply at the two sitting almost between them.

It was difficult not to dwell hardest on Ellis' injury. It wasn't just that it was the most serious, either. Every little whimper that escaped the kid, every little pained huff as Rochelle wrapped his wound tightly, only fueled more anger in Nick's voice. He didn't even have to look.

"Ellis got bit. Rochelle got clawed. I nearly got my eyes taken out. Looks like you took a hit to the shoulder." Coach only seemed to notice it when Nick pointed it out - the collar of his shirt was ripped at the clavicle, blood leeching faintly into the purple fabric from a clawmark just at the slope of his neck.

A sudden shriek from the road jolted Nick attention for just a beat, snapping his rifle up and taking quick aim on the infected who'd bolted from who-knew-where. A quick shot to the face sent it sprawling to the asphalt, blood gushing, and Nick glared after it for a beat before whipping his attention to Coach like nothing had happened at all.

"The girls were fucking crying over you - you know that? And what do you do? Wake up and get us all fucking injured because poor Coach is feeling off. It's really fucking hard to be any kind of happy to have you alive when you're screwing us over. What'd you do, wake up on the wrong side of the tree trunk? Got a headache? Poor Sammy have a nightmare? Well buck the fuck up and start acting like the Coach I could actually respect a little. Right now I'm a fucking inch away from tying you to a tree and leaving you for dead."

It hit. Hard, judging from Coach's expression and how harshly he suddenly looked down at the grass. His eyes roved slightly in a small line, unwilling to raise back up and meet Nick's even as they burned into his skull fiercely.

Slowly, seeming genuinely disconcerted and twitching toward remorse, Coach gruffed lowly, ".When'd yo' ass suddenly get in charge?"

"When yours decided to stand down." Nick retorted harshly. Coach outright fell silent, stiffening slightly into an uneasy slump. Something snapped in the football coach, something big and important - but when his shoulders hitched back up, it was with a faint resignation that seemed to announce that Nick had gotten through.

Tension dissipated from his posture, gaze re-focusing on the here and now. That seemed the best point to leave it. Anger vented but not gone, the conman turned toward Rochelle and Ellis, gaze locking instantly on the Georgian's face.

Rochelle risked a glance up, expression nearly as pained as Ellis' as she softly tightened the last layer of bandages onto his forearm. ".He's in pain. We really need to get it cleaned, too. He'll get sick if we leave it like this."

Ellis tried to protest even as he lowered his chin a little more to hide further under his cap, lower lip twitching slightly. ",M-'m okay, I jus'-" Rochelle flashed him a hushing look, and he hesitantly shut up.

Nick sighed, carding fingers tightly through his hair - just to do something with his hands other than strangle Coach or check the Ellis' injuries on his own. Stress built up in his chest, worsened with the very helpless sensation of not being able to do either of the two things he wanted to.
"... Goddamnit." the conman let out, turning suddenly on his heel and focusing his gaze somewhere else. His fingers flexed quietly, wishing with every ounce of his soul he had a smoke.

Wrapping both her arms around Ellis now, even when he turned his head a little away from her, Rochelle glanced up at Coach's slumped frame. Her gaze softened slightly, a sigh escaping her, and in Nick's silence she risked breaking into the conversation.

"Coach.. you've gotta talk to us, sweetheart. Something happened this morning and we can't help you if you don't tell us." She hesitated a moment, seeing his eyes close and a heavy inhale widen his chest. "I know you're the big man and you want to be a rock - but it just can't work like that all the time. We all need each other."

There was a soft beat of silence, Ellis lifting his head slightly. Blue eyes were rapt on Coach's downturned face, fuzzed with pain as the fingers of his injured arm seemed to twitch autonomously. "We ain't mad, Coach. ... well, Nick's only steamed 'cause he's worried."

The conman stayed turned away, giving little more argument than a small head shake at the statement. He just quietly reached into the pocket of his jacket and worked out a cigarette, settling it uselessly between his lips. It soothed him, despite the fact he couldn't light it.

Coach let out a small chuckle, Ellis' assurance striking a slight humor into his expression. The big man crossed his arms slowly over his chest, curling his fingers into fists and trying, visibly, not to frown as he started talking.

"Naw. Y'all should be mad. I got us hurt.. I wasn't thinkin' straight." The ex-football player sighed heavily, uncrossing his arms to reach down his hands and offer both of them help up. "I'm sorry I yelled. Gotta understand, I... didn't mean to cause us shit."

Ellis smiled gently, instantly softening at the eldest's apology. He wiped his hand on his coveralls before reaching out to take the offered help, carefully folding his injured arm against his chest as Coach hauled him up to his feet one-handed. "It's alright, Coach. We've all done a few dumb things. You just got all riled. Shi-iit, you remember when I set off that car alarm back in town?"

Rochelle giggled faintly, reaching up to gently take Coach's hand and pull up to her feet. She set a hand against her bleeding cheek, flinching just a little at the sting but smiling through it. "Yeah, with Nick's head. I think he was a little angrier that time, though."

A chuckle escaped Coach, heavy and tense but drifting toward honest humor. He shook his head slowly, crossing his arms loosely behind his back as if to keep his hands, smudged with Ellis' blood, out of his sight. "Guess I got lucky, seein' as he didn't smack me like he did you."

Nick half-turned, lips taut around his cigarette. He watched with a focused bewilderment, gradually furrowing his brows. Was Ellis really turning things around that instantaneously?

"I'd agree, man." Ellis grinned, rubbing a hand over his bandaged forearm softly. He dropped his gaze to examine it, some blood leeching up through the white in a dark crescent. "He was kinda lookin' like he might whack you a good one."

All three of them laughed gently that time, and Nick couldn't help but turn around entirely. He let his hands shove out palm-up, speaking with an edge of disbelief around his unlit cigarette.

"Wow. Seriously?" His brows arched up, annoyance rising when he got their attention quickly. "That quick, you guys are all buddy-buddy again? Am I the only one still pissed about this?"

Coach slowly sideglanced at Rochelle. The woman nodded at him, smiling reassuringly, and he exhaled heavily. Taking careful steps forward, Coach advanced toward Nick, stopping a little bit early when the conman started to stiffen.

"Nick... gotta say, I'm findin' you easier to respect. You really stepped up. I needed a check."

The conman tightened his jaw a little but lowered his arms after a moment, some of the confrontation leaving his posture. He clearly didn't appreciate the compliment in its essence, but he let it go without too much of a fight. "Yeah, whatever. I'm not gonna let these two fall apart just because you take a nap."

"'Preciate that. An' you not smackin' me like Ellis said. Got enough of a head wound already." The big man chuckled lightly, though Nick's heavy deadpan didn't allow for any reciprocation. Coach quickly quieted, falling to a deep sigh. "A'ight, a'ight. What you want from me, Nick?"

Letting out a sharp breath of agitation, Nick re-crossed his arms darkly and lifted up his shoulders. "Jesus, you have to ask? Some kind of explanation instead of just 'oh well, I made a booboo, let's go dance in a field of flowers together'? We sacrificed a good bit for your little tantrum and I'd fucking like an answer."

"I'm going to fucking hold you to that, you asshole." Nick snorted simply, gaze narrowing slightly. For all the cursing and that tagged-on insult, Coach chuckled, wiping his hand on his slacks before offering out a shake to the gambler. "Wouldn't 'xpect nothin' less from yo' ass."

After a small stare and inhale, Nick accepted the gesture with a tight grip, tension spreading up his jaw as he sighed. His grasp was vicelike, casually trying to crush bones, and Coach just took it amicably. "Fine. But I reserve the right to kick your ass if it's a bullshit explanation."

"A'ight." The big man agreed with a gruff of humor, turning around slightly as he released the shake. "Now can we get goin'? I dunno 'bout you folks, but I am two inches from starvin'."

Ellis brightened into a smile, swiping his hat off with his good arm to smack it gently against his thigh. "Oh thank the Lord, someone's talkin' sense! I ain't been this hungry since ..." His chin turned up softly, thoughtful, and Rochelle quickly set a hand on the back of his neck to stop him and let out a laugh.

"Sweetheart, I can see your head coming up with a story. Let's get focused on moving, okay?"

He blushed slightly, nodding, and tried hard not to look too bashful as he straightened up. "Uh... yeah, 'course."
Rochelle pushed her arms into the straps of their backpack, getting her rifle set up in her arms. Smiling gently at him, she glanced up at Nick and nodded. "You wanna take lead, suit? I'm gonna stick close to Ellis. I don't think he can -"

"'Ey, 'ey!" the youngest quickly complained, interrupting her with a minute jut of his jaw. "I ain't broke or nothin'. I can still fight. Don't be babyin' me like that.."

"Sorry, sweetheart, sorry..."

Nick sighed tightly, annoyance darting into his expression as he waved quickly to hush them both. The conman turned away, hitching up his rifle carefully, to step his way through the forest and aim for the road.

"Least we don't gotta worry 'bout that Tank." Coach idly affirmed from behind as their footsteps betrayed the other three quickly falling into rank behind the gambler.

Some part of Nick itched a little at being forced into the vanguard. He'd fully expected Coach to re-assume leadership over their group, but it didn't appear to be happening as quickly as he'd prefer. Plus, taking the lead stole away any chance to surreptitiously check if Ellis was okay.

_I swear to fucking God if Coach got him seriously hurt, I'd -_

He had to stop himself, feeling his teeth quickly threaten to bite straight through his cigarette. Instead, he forced himself to take his irritation out on a corpse he passed by, taking a swing with his good leg to kick it in the head.

A slightly unsettled wave of self-awareness trickled down his spine, faintly unpleasant, particularly when he felt multiple eyes on him from behind.

_- ... Well. At least my temper's intact, right?_
Chapter 60

Normally, a spate of silence would've been a godsend in the conman's eyes. Particularly with Ellis in the mix, a lull in conversation was almost golden. He should've taken the chance to delve into his own head and glory in some isolation.

Unfortunately, that time, all it did was bring very piercing attention to the slow gnawing of his stomach on its own lining. Nicotine had always killed his appetite, so now forced to go without that leveling factor, he was suffering particularly badly.

There was something humbling about listening to his own stomach grumble and roll, complaining childishlly about its emptiness. Each step risked another growl from the depths of his abdomen, and try as he might to hold an arm crossed over his gut or tense up his body against them, they wouldn't be stifled.

The four trudged along the edge of the highway in loose single file, Rochelle picking up the rear and Nick leading with Ellis and Coach between them. The road was fairly clear of zombies, but not completely. Nick kept his rifle near his hands just in case, pausing imperceptibly to pick them off far ahead before they even noticed the survivors.

Nick felt a constant tug at his mind, this agitating awareness of the other three's proximity. He was just waiting for one of them to pipe up and tease him. They were all hungry, but he swore his stomach was punishing him for something by being so incredibly loud.

So he spoke first, tone tight with annoyance. No sense in even giving them the chance to prompt the subject. "So, ladies - who was it who suggested we not worry about packing food? Something like 'oh, we'll find more on the way'?"

Rochelle laughed faintly from the back, the tail end of the sound falling into a sigh. "Mostly you, sweetheart."

She was completely accurate, of course, but that didn't stop Nick from scrunching his brows and shooting a dubious glance over his shoulder. "That doesn't sound like me at all. I'm smart."

The woman's head shook a little with her eye-roll, shouldering her rifle to free her hands and adjust the thick-braided ponytail messily arranged at the crown of her head.

A chuckle came from Coach in interruption, the big man somewhat heavily trailing in Nick's footsteps. "Let's be fair... ain't nobody's fault. We should'a been at Tybee already. Just have to suck it in 'til we find us some eats." For all his seriousness, there was a distinctly mourning edge to the eldest's voice.

Nick spared a glance and smirked, seeing the subdued consternation written all over Coach's travel-weary, dirt-streaked features. "Maybe we should've holed up at that burger place and called it a day, eh?" the gambler scoffed back a bit mockingly, though not quite picking a fight.

Much to his chagrin, the statement instantly backfired when his stomach gave a noise that could've intimidated a lion. Nick just felt his pride slip right out from under him.

_Gah, Jesus shit, I'm hungry._

Coach returned the now fading smirk with an edge of self-satisfaction, widening a little when Nick shot a scathingly blank look at him and faced forward with a bit of a limp. Coach tossed his shotgun up under his arm and released a heavy sigh that - while still amused - did admit some level of resignation.

"Don't even remind me, boy. Those might'a been this man's last burgers."

"Oah, Coach!" Ellis' voice was thankfully free of the pained note it had been starting to hold. His arm must've stopped hurting him quite so much, though when Nick glanced back, the gambler could still see him nursing it against his ribs. "Don' lose hope, man. Bet'cha we'll find some grills or some such down at the shore!"

Nick smirked faintly, the kid's seriousness adding a layer of humor, like Coach was a dying man hoping for an organ donor - not a meal. "Plenty of meat going around for it, too. Anyone up for a zombie burger?"

He couldn't help but laugh at the wave of disgust he immediately felt washing up the whole of the group - except, as he might've guessed, Ellis. Before any of them said another word, Ellis cheerfully interjected:

"I ever tell you guys 'bout the time muh buddy Keith tried bein' a cannibal? He -"

"What the hell, Ellis?!" Rochelle blurted slightly, disbelieving. She quite nearly stopped walking entirely, a horrified note flashing over her face at the few words he got out.

The Georgian seemed curiously surprised at her reaction, turning his head to blink at her with a bemused look that only worsened her horror. "Huh?" He seemed to understand after a beat, suddenly flashing an 'oh' look and waving up a hand. "Well that's just what he told people!"

The kid laughed, shaking his head fondly. "Turns out he didn't know cannibals ate people, he only thought they ate raw meat. That ain't even half right, 'cause cannibals cook people before eatin' 'em, right? Well, anyway, he was like, eatin' all this raw meat fer like - a week... Man, he got 'bout five kinds'uh salmonella 'cause - hell if I know where he done got it from - it wasn't cleaned right or nothin'. The doctor had tuh -"

Nick had never felt quite as desperate to interrupt Ellis as he did just then, landing a hand on his forehead with an exasperated scowl. "Jesus, Overalls, I didn't want my appetite ruined that badly!"

It was a little funny, the urgency with which Rochelle nodded her agreement and Coach grunted his.

Laughing as he stepped off the highway and kicked his workboots through overgrowing grasses on the side of the road, Ellis scratched at his neck bashfully. "Whoops. Sorry y'all..."

Rochelle sighed a little, pinching the bridge of her nose between her fingers. She overrode the kid smoothly, tone attaining a kind of worry. "In all seriousness, guys, what are we gonna do? I don't know what we're expecting down at Tybee."

Coach shrugged his shoulders, rubbing his wrist against his forehead. "We'll be a'ight once we get there. Big beach, lotta condos an' hotels. Went down there wit' my girls a couple times. Real nice area, whatever you wanna think 'bout Savannah, Nick."

The conman snorted with a distinct deadpan, flipping him off over his shoulder nonchalantly. "Are you kidding? I just love this place. Fucking zombies, shitty-ass cars, disgusting swamps filled with fucking zombies that we have to go through because of the shitty-ass cars.."

Coach gave him a dryly unimpressed look in the midst of his rant.
"I am so - goddamn - excited - to explore the zombie-infested gravel of our wonderful Savannah shoreline. We can even set up a nice burial at sea while we wait for CEDA to not come."

"Can it, Nick." Coach gruffly ordered, exhaling deeply. There was a definite edge of irritation to the statement, but it was contained within a steadily controlled calm. Nick smirked. "Some of us are still hopeful, a'ight?"

Looks like I can't get a rise out of him that easy. Good.

The gambler scoffed anyway, shaking his head slightly. A breeze fluttered through the air and sent gentle waves over the roadside grasses, cooling the warm late-morning heat. "Yeah, yeah. Someone needs to be, I guess. You ask me, -"

"Did we?" Rochelle questioned a little tiredly, laughing afterward with tangible disheartenment. She clearly wasn't up to handling Nick just then, and though he snorted with affront, he didn't outright fight back.

Ellis flopped his head back with a blithe smile, adjusting his cap on his forehead to wipe a little sweat from his brow. "Everyone just simmer down, we'll get somethin' tuh eat soon 'nough! No sense gettin' all ruffled! Why don't we play a game or somethin' while we walk?"

Coach snorted, shaking his head slightly and shouldering his shotgun so he could glance back at the other man a little disbelievingly. "Boy, don't you ever quit?"

"Awh c'mon!" The mechanic laughed outright, ducking his chin a bit as he gently touched at his own injured arm, dirty digits fingering along the bloody stain on his forearm. "Whut else're we gonna do? We can - ooh, we can play twenty questions! Awh man, I used tuh play that with muh mama all the time!"

"Before or after she did your nails?" Nick mocked in a mutter that Ellis didn't catch, too busy bouncing in obvious excitement. The conman focused on dragging out his pack of cigarettes and just patting it from hand to hand, gaze latched onto the road smoothly unfolding in front of them.

Ellis cheerfully pushed his good hand into the pocket of his coveralls, resting the elbow of his injured arm on the swell of the tied-up fabric. "I'll start, I'll start!" he chirped, tipping up his chin for a quiet moment, face scrunching up with thought.

Coach and Rochelle shared a faint glance past him, the big man giving a silent chuckle and shrugging up his shoulders. She grinned back, relaxing a little with a sigh and lifting a brow at Ellis from behind.

It took him a moment, those wheels turning in his head almost visibly. He was oblivious to the wordless dialogue traded around him, and there was a bit of a silence trailing as he focused.

"'Kay!" Ellis announced suddenly, no enthusiasm lost, a wide grin flashing over his face as his head whipped faintly back and forth to look up and down the small line they had going. "Got it!"

Rochelle sighed with a smile, tipping her head. "Alright, sweetheart, I'll go first. Is it an animal?"

The youngest survivor nodded adamantly, grinning like a loon underneath the bill of his cap. "Sure is."

In a gesture that drew a faintly surprised snort from Nick at the front, Coach readily played into it, a chuckle at the edge of his voice. "It got wings?" Nick glanced back with a slight grunt, flashing the big man a sour look.
"Goddamn kids, all of you.." he muttered under his breath. Coach outright laughed at him, the sound a gruff boom that he seemed to belatedly regret when a flicker of pain crept over his face, placing a hand on the back of his still-bandaged head.

Ellis was mostly oblivious, tipping a curious glance between the two men before giving a hop mid-step onto and off of the highway asphalt with a light hum. "Nope, don't got any wings."

Rochelle lightly stroked her chin between her index and thumb fingers, tipping her head. "Huh, okay.. does it have scales?"

"Nope."

Coach and her shared a significant glance around him, making the hick guffaw with a happy lilt, contentedly plodding forward. The ex-football player inhaled a breath and questioned, "It bigger than you?"

The game was broken for just a moment when Nick spotted a few zombies ahead, carefully taking them out with the scoped rifle.

Ellis gave a gentle whistle of appreciation when the gambler snagged headshots on each one, the infected violently snapping back with the force of the shots before scrabbling down to the ground, dying. Nick threw a look over his shoulder with a thoroughly wolfish smirk darkening the densely stubbled terrain of his face, not responding but seeming pleased by the recognition.

The Georgian felt a slight flush dart onto the bridge of his nose as his eyes drank in that expression for just an instant, clearing his throat quickly and lifting a blue gaze to the faintly grey-stained sky. Smoke seemed permanently stitched into the clouds, moody and tired.

"Sure is, Coach."

Rochelle 'hmm'ed a bit in thought, lengthening her strides slightly to pull up and walk next to Ellis. He jumped slightly in surprise, catching a hand onto his cap like it might fall off, and she gave him a nose-crinkled smile sideways. "Is it something we eat?"

"N-naw." he quickly negated. "No way."

His blush darkened slightly, suddenly reminding himself Rochelle knew about him and Nick. Their subtle interactions probably weren't so subtle anymore. Ellis found his relief at her acceptance gingerly questioned by a sense of regret, and he second-guessed just how much he'd wanted someone else to know.

He didn't want to have a secret he was keeping from Nick.

"It a wild animal?" Coach's prompt shook Ellis back into focus. He averted his gaze, finding a bundle of flowers growing on the roadside far ahead of them and focusing his eyes on the smudge of color.

"Uh.. it can be."

Coach chuckled ahead, rolling his shoulders slightly and pausing subtly when they popped. "Son, that ain't no answer..."

Ellis immediately defended himself with a grin, shaking his head. The humor brightened his tone up. "Nuh-uh, I can say 'maybe'! I gotta, 'cause we might have a different idea or somethin'uv if it's yes or no." Rochelle nodded next to him matter-of-factly to confirm the idea.
Coach snorted, slipping a calm grin over his shoulder before relenting. "It usually a wild animal?" he questioned deliberately.

Ellis laughed instantly, guffawing gently with a duck of his head. "Naw, ain't usually. 'M countin' that as another question, hope yuh know!" The big man shook his head with a chuckle, seeming entertained by the mock-threat.

"Okay, okay.. " Rochelle hummed, crossing her arms over her chest and slipping her hands under her arms to reach back and feel at the tears stretching across her shirt at the shoulderblades. "Does it live in a house?"

"Oah.." the kid uttered, hesitating an instant. He flexed the fingers of one hand, musing, his teeth worrying at his lower lip carefully. "Hmm."

"Another maybe?" the woman teased playfully, brows raising up. They went higher when Ellis gave her a slightly apologetic nod, breathing out a laugh and shaking his head. He tucked both his hands into the pockets of his coveralls, chin jutting out slightly. "It don't live in people houses."

Coach lifted up a hand quickly, gesturing with a slight snap to catch the hick's attention. The big man was fairly enthusiastic about it, glancing back. "You thinkin' of a dog, son?"

Ellis laughed quickly, wagging his head in a shake. "Naw, naw... I said it's bigger than me, remember? Ain't a dog."

Rochelle cocked her head to the side in interest, lifting her chin with a slight frown. Coach wasn't disappointed so much as curious, focus scrunching up his brow. "Huh." she hummed curiously. "People do own it, though, right? As a pet?"

"Yep."

Ellis was grinning, thoroughly pleased with himself as they grew stumped. He tipped his head to an unheard song, cheerfully bouncing from step to step with a slightly cheeky confidence.

There was a moment of thoughtful silence, walking on as the road started to curve rather sharply. Rubbing his jaw, Coach seemed just on the verge of another question when Nick's voice suddenly broke the silence, tone sharp. He hadn't spoken a word for who knew how long. "Store!"

Ellis blinked, tipping his head to one side in utter confusion. His initial reaction was pleasant surprise at the concept of Nick breaking into the game, but then the actual word registered in his head and he couldn't help but guffaw.

"Nick, that ain't even an animal, whut're you -"

He saw it before he could continue: just ahead, breaching the treeline like a slow-moving ship as the roadway curved, was the red-brick shape of a convenience store built into a small clearing on the side of the road. A green and red-striped sign hung above the door on the eave of its black-shuttered roof, baring a slightly worn '7-ELEVEN' just above the glass door.

"Praise the Lord!" Coach boomed in almost exhausted excitement, breaking straight into a run up the road and blowing past Nick like the wind. If his bum knee bothered him, he definitely didn't show it.

"I have to agree with that." Rochelle gasped, smiling hugely as she darted after Coach, hunger squeezing any ounce of propriety out of them in favor of pure, driven urgency.

Ellis bounced up to Nick's side quickly, nudging his shoulder with his own. He flashed a smile sideways when the conman glanced at him with a slight brow arch. The kid couldn't help but remember the conman's injured leg, and his tone was encouraging when he uttered, "C'mon, Nick, let's go get some food. 'M hungry's shit here."

Nick snorted, reaching up a hand to cuff the Georgian's capped head slightly. He pushed into a quick jog, muffling his limp as best he could as he chased the other two down the road, a grinning Ellis close at his elbow.

The tiny, gravel parking lot in front of the convenience store was completely empty, deep ruts the only sign cars had ever been there at all. The four crossed the highway to reach that side, slowing just slightly as they approached.

From far away, it had seemed all but pristine - maybe a little bit of desperation tinting their view of the thing, like a mirage in the desert. The closer they got, though, the more a quiet disarray became noticeable.

One of the windows was broken, glass shattered around the ground and the concrete sidewalk just in front of the doorway. A single bloody handprint streaked down the glass door, straight out of every horror movie Ellis could remember seeing.

"Don't see no zombies." Coach warily noted, double-barrel shotgun back tight in his hands and jaw set. There was a very tight determination in his posture, just hunting for something to shoot - the man was hungry and infected would not get in his way.

They clustered tighter together as sense overrode urgency, cautiously approaching the door. Even though Coach took lead, brandishing his shotgun, Ellis found himself protectively slipping in front of Nick, almost unaware of the motion. He pulled his shotgun off his shoulder, starting to settle into a grip on it that didn't hurt his injured arm too much.

He tried not to think about how much it was going to hurt to shoot, with the recoil and the sensitivity of the bite in mind.

The conman shot him a sudden 'the fuck are you doing' look and grabbed his sleeve lightly as green eyes followed his movement. Forcefully, Ellis found himself dragged back a few steps, and before he knew it Nick was in front of him.

All he could do was blush, frowning slightly with a tiny edge of consternation. Ellis wasn't sure how much of it was just sense, with Ellis injured, and how much of it was the gambler being protective -

A tiny flutter in his chest said he hoped it was the latter.

"A'ight, y'all," Coach sighed, glancing behind himself to make sure everyone was close as he stopped just in front of the glass door. The lights were off inside, eerie glints off steel shelves only barely showing through the darkness. "We ain't passin' this up, but watch yo' asses, a'ight..? Last thing we need is more injuries. Don't got no clue what's in here."

Rochelle and Ellis nodded raptly, but Nick sniped quietly, tone tense. "Oh, more zombies, don't even bother wondering... there's probably another fucking Tank packed in there somewhere and we're all going to die."

The big man only spared him a glance before turning forward, sighing deeply and turning his shoulder to open the door with his elbow carefully. As it opened the first few inches, a loud 'clang-alang' sent them all jumping out of their skins.

"Jesus tits!" Nick swore sharply, grabbing at his rifle with a scowl. There was a bell attached to the top of the door, dangling down and swinging almost mockingly toward them. Rochelle laughed a little nervously, reaching back to pat the conman's arm lightly.

Ellis hunched a little, leaning around Nick's bicep and lightly worrying his lower lip between his teeth. When Coach, sighing, pushed the door all the way open and carefully leaned in to squint around, he stuck a hand back. "Can't see shit. Don't we got a flashlight somewhere?"

Rochelle gave a quick 'ah,' hurrying to pull the backpack off her shoulders and bury a hand into one of the longer side pockets. She carefully pried the black plastic flashlight out, the only one they still had with them, somewhat nervously patting it into a hand and flicking the 'on' button.

When the lamp just barely-visibly lit up under the midday light, she breathed a sigh of relief and passed it to Coach. He gripped it, shining it into the store and carefully scanning around.

There was blood splattered here and there, and the place was clearly looted by someone before them. A few of the shelves were empty, but there was still more than enough to give them some hope. Coach's flashlight shined over a Slurpee machine near the counter, completely busted open by a gunshot, strange shades of orange and purple spilled all down the machine in dried rivulets.

"No zombies." Coach gruffed. "Would'a noticed that bell, anyway. Looks like we're clear." He stepped in, leaning to the side. There must've been a light switch, because he reached out and with a faint 'click,' fluorescent lights flashed on all down the length of the store. The big man straightened up, holding the door behind himself for the other three.

That urgency resurfaced as it became a matter of piling in. They were all hungry, and junk convenience store food or not, there was still food in the 7-Eleven.

Nick wasn't surprised when they scattered, Coach and Ellis almost immediately going for the candy section along one of the walls as Rochelle just wandered down an aisle, biting at her upper lip. The gambler smirked slightly, glancing along the shelves in the hopes of something plain. He spotted bags of chips lining one of the shelves on the opposite sides, and he walked toward them, sighing faintly.

"Guess we've all got to lower standards on a lot of fronts." he thought slightly morosely, reaching up a hand to stroke his jaw with a flat hand. He was getting dangerously close to passing from 'rugged' to outright 'unkempt,' stubble dense and getting softer.

"Oh mah gawd," Ellis practically squealed from the other side of the store, drawing Nick's attention for just a beat. He couldn't quite see them where they were hunched behind a shelf, but he could only imagine the abuse the sweets aisle was going through. Plastic crinkled madly as they must've been pawing through the limited stocks. "I ain't been this hungry since - I ain't ever been this hungry!"

"Gonna make yo'self sick, son." Coach gruffly chuckled, amused but chastising in the same tone. Considering Nick could see the crown of his bald, dark-skinned head sticking up out of the same aisle, he scoffed a bit at the ex-football player's statement.

Nick shook his head slightly, unsurprised. "I don't wanna hear you guys fucking complain when you're ill." was all he said, annoyance forced, too pleased to really be irked as he stopped in front of the shelf and plucked off a bag of plain chips.
"No way, Nick! Hoh mah gawd, I'm in heaven."

Nick tore into his bag hungrily, turning his body toward the wall as he grabbed a handful and carefully shoved them into his mouth. It was immediate, punishing bliss, the vaguely salted shapes crunching under the pressure of his teeth and roughly scraping at a dehydrated mouth. The taste struck him harder than a shot of liquor, a slight moan escaping him as he forced himself to swallow.

His throat was almost too dry to even manage the motion, and his hunger just barely overrode the discomfort as he realized how much he needed some water. Turning away, he walked toward the fridges near the back. If the lights worked, they probably still did, and cold water seemed almost orgasmic just then.

"Man..." Rochelle faintly murmured somewhere over his shoulder. "It's so weird. I shop in this store all the time... it's so strange looting it."

Nick couldn't help but choke down another handful of chips, wincing a little as he did. He kept turned away, not particularly wanting his desperation to be seen by the other three. He just kept quiet, leaving the sentiment oddly hanging in the air as he downed stolen chips.

He felt grease and salt tacky on his fingertips, but he just couldn't care, holding that hand away from himself with a slightly squeamish posture as he stepped up to the refrigerators and opened one up.

Sure enough, a flutter of cold air confirmed that the fridges were operating, and he quickly snatched up a bottle of water before announcing the fact over his shoulder. "We have cold drinks in here, if you guys can tear yourselves away from the chocolate for five seconds."

The gambler tucked his chips underneath his arm, cracking open the bottled water and lifting it to chug steadily. One eye shut slightly, and he must've downed half the bottle before he forced himself to stop, pressing his wrist to his mouth.

"Whoa, breathe, suit..." Rochelle's voice suddenly teased behind him, making him stiffen up. He quickly tried to compose himself, moodily glancing back at her as he swallowed. She stood there with a bag of beef jerky in one hand, a ribbon of meat held between her fingers and jaw moving faintly as she chewed a mouthful she'd already taken.

"I'm thirsty, shut up." the conman muttered defensively, retreating a few steps. She smiled at him in slight apology, focusing on getting a bottle of soda from the fridge.

"It's okay. I'm happy, we deserve to unwind a little... you see Ellis and Coach..?"

Nick stood there for a moment, wanting to bury himself back in his bag of chips but hesitating. He swiveled his head slightly, glancing toward the two across the store, but he couldn't see more than the shifting of their shadows or hear more than a low hum as they whispered back and forth.

"I assume they're acting like five year olds." he scoffed quietly, swigging a mouthful of water instead.

She laughed softly, cracking open her bottle and taking a drink before it had even stopped fizzing. Her nose crinkled a little, the foam catching her in a slight cough. "Maybe, but is that really so bad? Let'em, Nick. We all need it."

Nick grunted a slight breath at her, one of faint resignation. His gaze traveled slightly, looking back toward the two men across the store. If he tipped his head, he got just enough of a view between two slightly disturbed shelves to see Ellis' face.

The kid was grinning - hugely, carelessly, biting into a bag of Rolos one-handed as he nursed his injured arm against his chest. 'A kid in a candy store' didn't describe it, as accurate as that was.

A dull, thudded heartbeat suddenly rang loudly in Nick's ears, making him shake his head and look away. Irritation knotted his brow slightly, feeling a warmth up his spine he wanted to say he didn't understand.

Denial worked as well as anything else, but some tiny part of him entered a silent wrestle with the concept that he felt.. something.

Nothing defineable, and nothing good.

"Yeah, whatever.." he said with a small roll of his eyes, distracting himself more than anything else. "It's not like I could stop them if I tried, and fuck if I'm telling Coach to back away from the chocolate. He warned me already."

Rochelle laughed gently at him, re-opening the fridge and pulling out two sodas - one of them diet. She tucked them in her arms, juggling things slightly, and flashed Nick a smile as she turned away. "Have a little chip on your face."

Blinking instantly, Nick scowled and lifted his hand up quickly to wipe the crumb away from the edge of his mouth. He grumbled a faintly playful "Yeeahh, fuck you.." as she just walked away, crossing the aisles gingerly to walk the drinks over to Coach and Ellis.

A small smirk caught him off-guard, shoving his bottled water into the pocket of his jacket and digging for a handful of chips again. Leaning against the cold fridge door, content to stay where he was, Nick hungrily munched through his mouthful and - he swore - couldn't recall ever enjoying cheap chips as much as he did just then.
Lined up on the concrete sidewalk in front of the 7-Eleven, the survivors relaxed with their choice foods piled in their laps. The noon sun was pleasant down on them, warming and soothing overworked bodies.

Nick let his gaze trace lazily along the treeline across the road, exhaling deeply as he took a sip of water. It was... strangely nice, sitting there. Ellis was cross-legged at his left, Coach at his right, and Rochelle was pacing out a calm line in front of them.

The motion was usually a neurotic one, but Rochelle was relaxed, halfway through her bag of jerky and sipping on her bottle of soda. She just couldn't quite sit still.

"Man, this makes me think'uh Keith." Ellis chuckled softly, reaching into Nick's bag of chips and pulling out a couple. Nick glared faintly as his eyes followed the motion in its entirety, but allowed it. Ellis tossed them into his mouth with a limp wrist, chewing with a smile.

They'd taken advantage of time to clean his forearm, and Nick had kept apathetic distance as Rochelle washed off the bite wound with a bottle of water. It wasn't optimal, but without any kind of disinfectant, it was the best they could do. It at least removed the grey-black residue left behind by the infected's saliva.

At this point, catching the Green Flu seemed unlikely - but even regular humans could pass a heaping amount of bacteria with a bite. They needed some alcohol, or hydrogen peroxide, or something.

Unfortunately, they were also almost completely out of bandages. They'd had to re-wrap his original ones, placing a little patch of fresh gauze just over the bite.

"I miss just hangin' out sometimes. Really too bad you guys ain't met him yet. He'd love y'all."

Nick snorted lightly, leaning back slightly and gingerly stretching out his legs. He bent forward and loosely tugged up his pantleg, craning his head a little to inspect the bandages wound around his calf. They were stained weird shades of red and rust in a splotch down the back, but they were dried and it didn't hurt as much as it used to.

Of course, that wasn't necessarily a good sign.

Maybe he'd ruined nerves - maybe whole muscles. The scarring was going to be wicked, but hopefully the limp would go away.

The idea that it might not made his brow screw up.

"We should change those."

Coach's voice startled him slightly, not realizing he'd been being watched. It was said low, almost enough to be secret between them, and Nick spared him a small scathing look. He still wasn't sure how to feel about the man, and he definitely didn't need pity. "With what?"

The big man shrugged in a gesture that admitted uncertainty, glancing away again with a subtle air of resignation. "Jus' sayin'."

Nick mused at him for a moment before looking back to his leg. There was a dull pain behind the ex-football player's eyes, fading in and out depending on whether Ellis or Rochelle were looking at him. Headache? he supposed.

Rochelle only allowed herself a momentary blink toward the two men and their muttered conversation before she refocused on Ellis and gave him a grin. Her boots twisted on the gravel, completing another pace and pausing for a few beats. "We'd probably be boring to him. No crazy stories, no stunts."

"You kiddin'?" Ellis grinned, licking salt off his fingertips. "I'm gonna love talkin' tuh him next time I do. He's gonna be so jealous'uv all the stories we got. Can't wait tuh see his face when he realizes he didn't do nothin' in the apocalypse!"

Coach chuckled slightly, shaking his head as he threw back a handful of M&Ms. "Most people'd pray to do nothin', son."

Nick tossed his pantleg back into place, straightening up. He threw his chip bag into Ellis' lap, gingerly standing himself up with a shake of his suit jacket to shift it back into place. "You're talking to a full-blooded redneck, Coach. I'm shocked they didn't all just board up their houses and hold out with their shotgun collections."

Ellis merely guffawed cheerily, sweeping up the chip bag in his bad arm and digging out a handful of chips.

"I'm Georgian too, Nick." the big man noted with a fairly serious tone of voice, glancing up at the gambler. "Wanna say that shit 'bout me?"

The gambler sneered a little, deciding against giving a real answer to that. Instead, he turned toward Rochelle, reaching out a hand. "Hey, Ro', give me the pack. I'm gonna go in and steal some more shit."

She gave him an unamused look, even though his wording was clearly aimed to ruffle her feathers.
Shaking her head slightly, she pulled the backpack off her shoulders and offered it out to him.
"Asshole. You don't have to say it like that."

Nick took it with a roguish grin, slipping a strap over one shoulder. "Sorry, sorry. I'm gonna go in and permanently borrow some more shit with distinct regret at having to do so. Better?"

Rolling her eyes, Rochelle turned away, smiling across the parking lot with a shake of her head.
"Oh, loads."

Snorting in amusement, Nick turned and stepped toward the door. He landed a hand on the top of Ellis' head as he passed by, screwing the cap down over his eyes and making him yelp lightly in surprise.

He swore the younger man swiped at his knee in retaliation, but his knuckles only grazed the edge of Nick's pantleg - and when he glanced back, the Georgian had his arms settled innocently in his lap. His blue eyes were only barely visible underneath the down-turned rim of his bill.

Nick let his eyes roll, smirking, and ducked back into the 7-Eleven. He was careful with the door, levering it open gently so the bell didn't ring this time. With the disarray and spots of blood, the place felt a little more eerie when he was alone.

He shook off the feeling as best he could, closing the door tightly behind him.

Nick had definitely meant what he said, more than determined to stow away some food and see what kind of medical supplies they had left… but there was another goal he had in mind on top of that.

The gambler walked past the aisles, sending only cursory glances down the rows as he moved toward the counter. The shot Slurpee machine had left a sprawling puddle of swirling flavors, sticky, dried liquid staining the tile. He crinkled his nose slightly and stepped around it, careful to keep his shoes out of the mess.

If he was ever in his life going to wonder what one of those drinks tasted like, that immediately ruined it for him.

Nick went behind the counter, hobbling slightly as he slipped in front of the cash register. He tugged his slacks up a little so they didn't strain at his knees when he moved into a crouch, bending down to get a look in the drawers underneath.

A faint smirk touched his lips as he reached in, pulling out a small display box lined with blankly packaged condoms. He hadn't seen them anywhere in the store earlier, and them being under the counter was his only hope.

As he snatched up a couple, his fingers hesitated slightly, feeling the wrapper between his fingertips. Am I planning this too much? … Sure, we're probably going to fuck again, but - ... shit. This is still a fling, Nicolas, don't start second-guessing yourself. You're just being prepared.

Nick reached into the inner pocket of his suit, dragging out his wallet to open it up. He tucked the prophylactics away, stowing them deep in the billfold of his wallet, dark jaw set in a slight clench.

You're allowed to not completely hate someone's company, you know.

Sighing subtly, the conman closed and tucked the wallet back away into his jacket. He wasn't interested in losing the good mood sustenance and drinks put into him, and if he focused too much on the issue he'd end up agitated.

"Ookay, Nicolas." he muttered quietly. "Focus and find some fucking supplies, Jesus." With a deep sigh, he reached up to get a hand on the countertop and push himself to straighten up -

And his palm squelched lightly as he landed it right on a semi-solid puddle of stale Slurpee mix.

Flailing instantly to straighten up and get his hand away, he gave a practically agonized noise of disgust, dragging his sleeve up to make sure it didn't get stained. He couldn't actually work out a coherent sentence, sputtering, "Oh for - I - fucking - ass -"

Settling suddenly for a simple growl, Nick quickly half-jogged away from the counter and darted through the aisles.

There was a restroom in the very far corner, women's on the left and men's on the right, and he fully intended to jam his hand into the sink and scrub his hand till the disgusting sensation went away.

"Tits… Of all the shit luck." the conman muttered simply, sparing a small glance over his shoulder as he reached the other side of the 7-Eleven. He could see through the door, and fortunately the other three didn't seem even slightly interested in what was going on inside.

Forcing a heavy sigh, the gambler reached out his other hand and made to push the men's bathroom open.
The swinging door didn't budge more than an inch. He shoved harder, and it jingled audibly against a lock.

"Fuck!" he snapped in outrage, staring for a moment at the door before releasing a tight grunt. Annoyance made his brows crinkle, stepping away from the door with a frustrated motion and reaching out to try the women's restroom instead.

Sure enough, it swung open.

The gambler sighed with a resigned drop of his head, awkwardly holding his hand at a tilt. The well-lit, tiled room curled off to the right into an alcove, a full bathroom stall built into the space. A sink - complete with a plastic soap dispenser hanging a few inches to the left of the ceramic bowl - stood against the wall.

It wasn't overly effeminate. Sure, there was a painting of multi-colored flowers nailed to the wall in some cheap attempt at girly decoration, but beyond that, only the lack of a urinal really betrayed it as a woman's restroom.

"Thank-you, universe." Nick muttered moodily to himself, stepping in and praying in the far back of his head none of the others suddenly decided to come check on him. "Having a hard-on for a guy isn't nearly fuckin' emasculating enough... I really needed this just now."

There was blood there, too, a few strange slash marks cut into the tile just in the center of the room and flecks of red scattered around. He avoided them without too much thought, more than used to the sight.

Crossing the bathroom with a quick half-limp, he stepped up to the sink and tore out a paper towel from the dispenser just within his reach on the wall. Using it to touch the faucet instead of touching it with his hand, the conman flicked on the water and grunted.

The water hissed out into the sink, pattering against the ceramic.

Nick pumped a little soap into his palm, quickly dunking his hand underneath the stream of water. It was cold, and he put his hands together to scrub at his sticky palm with a disgusted expression.

The soap bubbled up into a healthy foam, and much to his relief, the tacky layer of Slurpee came off fairly easily from his palm. He slipped into a slight bend forward, scrubbing slightly harder when the feeling didn't leave quite as quickly as the weirdly orange coloration itself.

Over the hiss of water - a soft sound shuddered behind him, making him blink and freeze.

"..u-uwh."

It was weird, unintelligible, but distinctly human: a stifled noise so quiet he almost doubted hearing it.

The conman moved with an almost cautious slowness to shut off the water, gradually turning his head to the side to look back. The stall door was closed, and he craned his head to try and peek through the gaps in the structure.

"... Is someone there?" he risked, tone tense to the point of hostility. He hadn't even thought to check the stall - Fuck, I'm an idiot.

There was silence, and not even a shuffle to answer his question. He slowly picked up the paper towel he'd torn off, quickly squeezing it over his hands to dry off. Gently, Nick bent his body, aiming to crouch down and look under the stall door, when a clear whimper sounded.

It was a miserable, emotion-strained noise - a little sob, just barely held back from turning into a louder noise.

For just an instant Nick thought it was a survivor. A small moment of surprise flooded him… and then Carmine's face flashed into his mind, and those pain-wracked sobs he'd heard muffled through the bedroom door.

Nick's blood ran cold in his veins, spine going stock still. Reflex had him instantly moving to step away, half-panicked and half-focused, intent on getting to the door and getting the hell out. Holy fuck, is that another -

He hadn't moved more than an inch when there was an abrupt, terrible squeal of something impossibly sharp against metal, and the stall door swung suddenly open.

She stumbled out almost drunkenly, body almost struggling to hold itself together as her weight staggered on bare feet. Bones jutted against tight, death-grey skin, and her clothes were torn to bloody shreds on her body. Light hair hung in clotted strings down around her face, framing a sunken face that was hidden behind up-turned hands.

It was, on top of everything else, the claws that sent every single nerve in Nick's body into a panicked spark. They were disfigured, knobbled spears jutting out where her fingers should've been, skin inflamed painfully at what were once her knuckles. The unnatural movement of her skeletal frame stumbled her frigidly toward Nick.

Nick had disturbed her and she seemed drawn to him now. Fuckfuckfuckfuck- The only hope he had was centered on the fact she wasn't growling like Carmine had before she'd attacked. He didn't even have his rifle, and the handful of bullets in his stolen pistol were not going to take her down if Rochelle with a shotgun hadn't even been able to manage that with Carmine.

The conman backpedaled toward the doorway as silently and steadily as he could, aware his teeth were digging into his tongue hard enough to draw blood. Every step he took, she stumbled to regain the distance, following him with the heavy smack of bare feet against the tile. Hidden behind her hands, she let out a distressed sob, body wracked with the motion.

Nick's back hit the door, and he suddenly half-bolted to shove himself backward, trying to get through it and close it behind him, intent on shutting her in. Unfortunately, the heavy thud of his shoulders against the door seemed to abruptly rile her out of her haze.

Those spear-like fingers parted, and bright, glaring red eyes blinked before fixing on Nick's face. A growl filtered out of her - loud and sharp.

"FUCK!" slipped straight out of Nick as he threw himself through the door, and the utterance molded with the sudden snarl the greyed creature gave out as she leapt forward. He slammed his body onto the other side of the door, trying to shut it in her face, but she hit it just before it closed. Elongated claws jammed through the space between door and doorway, worming a moment before she shoved violently against the other side.

She was strong.

The gambler turned to run, abandoning the bathroom door, every instinct telling him to just bolt. He could hear her snarl furiously behind him, a chill sparking up the back of his neck at the sound.

Nick got maybe four steps before a sudden spasm made his injured leg jerk, the unexpected pain sending his gait into a stagger. It sent him completely off balance, and with a clatter, his weight violently checked the shelving next to him.

He shot out an arm to half-catch himself, sending a few cans on the shelves scattering to the floor.
A bag was swept off by his elbow, splitting open just by his foot and spilling sugar across the tile with a soft hiss.

His attempt to regain his balance wasn't enough. He scrabbled for purchase on the shelving to try to get enough of a grip to get back on his feet, but with a thud of dread in his gut he felt claws suddenly land on his back. Sharp points dug straight into the fabric of his suit jacket, splayed beside his shouldered backpack.

They pierced it and cut effortlessly through his dress shirt, too - jerking into his skin with burning points of pain. It was as they yanked back suddenly, a high-pitched growl mixing with the swish of those claws through the air while she prepared to slash full-force at him, that he suddenly realized she was going to kill him.

It came as a disjointed awareness. He'd had that thought before, but it always came with a plan to escape or a sudden focusing of his adrenaline to defend himself. This time it just plastered itself over his consciousness, crass and matter-of-fact.

He'd never really felt that before. It shook him, hard. He was going to die in a bloody mess and that was that.

"Fuck." he just barely ghosted, chest suddenly compressing with a pain he didn't understand - a tremoring agony, body already steeling for the ripping strike of those impossibly long claws.

They'd rend him.

Only they never struck. The feeling stung on his back with burning nerves, a twisted game played on him by his consciousness, but those claws never struck home.

Wh-what - the hell?

It was only with a shuddered breath that he got his frozen joints to move, turning his head and torso slightly to look over his shoulder. He couldn't feel anything except the burning on his back, and it was numbly that he realized she'd slipped down to her knees.

There was something animalistic in how she bent forward, painfully bony frame unsteadily settled in a kneel, claws hovering just over the tile. For just a beat, Nick had no idea what she was doing - and then she leaned down a little more.

She slowly lapped out a grey tongue, reaching past sharpened, jagged teeth, and licked at the sugar spilt on the tile. Saliva, blood, and sugar mixed into a strange drool down her chin, suddenly completely ignoring Nick's presence.

That realization shocked his brain into working again - and, just the same, his body. He felt his limbs go into a cold focus, heart trying to escape through his ears as the rush of blood deafened him a little.

The gambler slowly inched his shoe forward, just barely skating it over the surface of the tile.
Every twitch of her head made him flinch, but all she seemed to care about was the sugar, lapping it up messily with soft clicks as her claws touched the tile.
One step - two... three.. Nick felt his bad leg struggling to hold steady as he worked forward in a slight strafe, each step speeding up slightly the further away he got. He felt bile gathering in the depths of his throat, the taste acrid and cruel.

It took every ounce of self-control he'd ever had not to break as he reached the end of the aisle. His shoulders shuddered slightly, straining to hear her suddenly growl and decide to chase after him again.

He put his hands softly to the door handle. Opening it was agonizingly slow, green gaze darting up to the bell at the top of the door, daring it to make a single sound. Slowly... carefully, it opened, the bell silent as he moved it so cautiously.

"- until I got older. There's no beaches in Ohio, you know." Rochelle was laughing gently, her pacing stalled as she stood with her arms crossed just next to Coach.

Nick pushed through the door with a stumble, instantly turning around and focusing on closing the door now. He rushed slightly compared to opening it, and it took only an instant for Rochelle to notice him and look over, head tipping at his posture.

"Nick?"

The name didn't even make sense to his ears. He just needed to get away, to breathe, and without so much as a sound he let go of the door and rushed off the concrete in front of the store. He walked unsteadily on the gravel just a few feet, stumbling when the bile at the back of his throat and the sickening adrenaline in his veins suddenly sent him into a slight gag.

He doubled over, hands going to his knees, forcing in a violent breath to stop himself from retching. The backpack fell right off his shoulder, awkwardly thudding to his wrist as his clamped hand kept it from falling all the way. Humming in his ears sounded a lot like voices, and he was aware of a rushing movement behind him.

He forced breaths through gritted teeth, focusing on the exhale and inhale - trying to calm himself. Oh, he'd hate himself for the emotional shock later, he knew that much - but he'd really, honestly believed he would die.

The conman's leg gave way, and with a stagger, he let himself fall to his good knee on the gravel. Strangled relief calmed his heaving gut when Ellis dropped down right next to him, a strong hand settling between Nick's shoulderblades and slowly rubbing, soothing.

"He needs water..." the kid urged, voice even more strained with concern than his expression was. Coach or Rochelle must've gotten it, because the next thing Nick knew, Ellis was gently sliding a half-drunk bottle of water into one of his hands.

The conman blindly took a swig, but instead of swallowing, he swirled and spat it out on the gravel, trying to get rid of the rank taste in his mouth with a grimace. He shut his eyes, bending his head slightly.

"'Nother.. Carmine. There's another fucking Carmine in there - shit..."

That was all he could manage for a little while, chugging mouthfuls of water carefully. He was fairly sure the only thing keeping him from outright vomiting was the strong fingers working in smooth circles on his back - avoiding, consciously, the faint tears and dots of red on his white suit jacket that marked where the Witch's claws had pierced his back.
"Sweetheart, I don't understand."

Rochelle's voice was gentle and coaxing, the woman bent down in front of Nick as he slowly rubbed his temples with trembling fingertips. They'd relocated closer to the highway and further from the 7-Eleven, Nick seated a little less awkwardly with his arms draped over his slightly spread knees.

Frustration was apparent on his ragged features, growling slightly before repeating himself for the third time. "It stopped and started eating sugar. For fuck's sake, you are hearing me correctly. It went from tearing me to fucking pieces, to licking sugar off the ground like a dog."

Ellis sat on his knees behind the conman, posture drawn into a slight slump as he focused on slowly inspecting Nick's injured back. They were small pierce marks, just deep enough to have stained a little blood through his jacket and dress shirt.

The conman didn't seem to mind Ellis touching him, maybe even calming down under his hands - even if Ellis was slightly self-conscious of Coach and Rochelle being so close. Making sure that the gambler was okay was prioritized far above that.

His touches were stifled little paws, feigning interest in the small injuries when really his calloused fingertips just petted what they could. Coach and Rochelle weren't paying him an ounce of attention, but he slunk down a little anyway.

"Okay, Nick. Okay." Rochelle sighed a little, rubbing at the cheek that wasn't clawed over. "I understand. It's just strange, is all. I never imagined them having any kind of.. weakness."

Nick growled a little. All the talk seemed to do was agitate him more - over his bowed head, Coach sent a small glance around to the other teammates, shaking his head in a short gesture of frustration.

Worry clenched the Ellis' gut, more concerned for the conman's mind than his body, even if he busied himself with glancing over the wounds on Nick's hunched back. He probably wasn't the only one of the three who could tell Nick was more shaken than he would've liked to let on.

"We shouldn't'uh let you go in alone..." Ellis muttered quietly, tone self-berating, and he frowned toward his knees. He shuffled down a little, longing to do more for the older man. "Them things are real nasty."

Nick didn't look back at the kid, but he did shake his head dismissively, palming over his eyes in exhaustion. "I should've brought my goddamn rifle and shot it in the face..."

Coach exhaled heavily, weary expression drawn in a tight look of borderline agitation. "Ain't like we expected it. Just good you got out a'ight." He rubbed at his shoulder, giving a shake of his head. "Gotta clear the bathrooms next time."

Nick just barely smirked, tilting his head to glance up toward the eldest survivor. "Aww. He does care." Even that was acerbic, daring Coach to get angry.

He didn't.

Coach merely gazed back at him, wholly unimpressed.
Rochelle sighed just a little at them, stuck between annoyance and relief that their dynamic had returned to something like normal. The woman re-adjusted the backpack on her shoulder and let her posture slump minutely. "I don't know, Nick. Better you ran. I mean... whatever type of zombie that is, it doesn't go down easily."

Her voice faltered slightly. Recollection and a little bit of guilt lowered her head, one hand stretching back to rub at her shoulder. "The, you know.. first one didn't. They're tough."

"And creepy." Ellis mumbled a bit, adjusting his cap on his head with a knuckle before replacing the hand on Nick's shoulderblade. He let his gaze trail over the conman's back, his expression deeply bothered. "Cryin' like that. S'like they still got emotions or somethin'. Ain't natural."

"You're really going to talk about natural right now?" was the grumbled chastisement that dribbled from Nick like glue, shaking his shoulder suddenly to push Ellis' hands away. Something stirred in the gambler's mind as his nerves smoothed over, and he rejected the touches. "There's nothing natural about any of this."

Ellis let him go, withdrawing his hands and pushing his weight off his heels to stand up. He shook the denial off easily, unbothered; if anything, it was a relief to see Nick coming back into his usual demeanor. "Sorry, man. It's extra weird, how 'bout that?"

The statement brought a subtle snort from the conman, a reluctant humor, and Nick lifted up a hand to rub over his forehead. Coach clasped a hand on Ellis' shoulder, passing him his shotgun a beat later. "Think we best keep this sugar thing in mind, y'all." the ex-football player affirmed.

"What?" Rochelle questioned, stepping in front of Nick and offering down her hands. He gave a small glare, but sighed. Taking her hands, she hoisted him up to his feet. "Why?"

"Maybe." he gruffed quietly, scratching the stubbled swell of his cheek. "Second time we ran into one of those. Figure we shouldn't pass by somethin' that might help against 'em. Far as I can tell, they ain't somethin' we're gonna wanna get close to anyway."

Nick snorted, focusing his gaze down as he distracted himself with shaking gravel dust off his suit. "Yeah, let's all get bags of sugar and we'll skip our way east. Over the river and down the yellow brick road."

It took a moment for the words to actually register, but Ellis burst into laughter, clapping hands over his stomach and doubling over just a little. "Oh jeez, Nick." The conman instantly twisted around, annoyance arching up a brow at the humor clearly at his expense.

"Jeez what, Ay-lus?" he challenged a little, adjusting his lapels on his chest with a flat palm. The familiar banter made things a little easier. It gave him something to focus on, anyway.

Ellis caught himself, stifling his laughter with a knuckle pushed to his lips. Nick's Southern mocking only made it worse, blue eyes squinting with barely contained amusement. He shook his head, quickly. "Nothin', man."

The gambler eyed him with very apparent consideration, and Ellis was getting familiar with that look - the one where Nick couldn't decide between letting him go or chasing him. It was a strangely feral expression, even though it was a verbal fight rather than a physical one.

Ellis grinned back at him gently, amused and suddenly aware he was lucky they weren't alone.

Or was he disappointed? The line abruptly blurred, and Ellis hurried to avert blue eyes before his bruised and cut-up face flushed.
"Okay, boys, don't fight." Rochelle checked them with a laugh, lifting up a hand to wave it in the air between them. She turned away, pulling her rifle against her hip and sliding a palm over her hairline. "C'mon. Let's get out of here before that thing decides to come ask Nick for more sugar."

Nick broke his gaze on Ellis' face with a snap, scowling the moment his gaze landed on Rochelle's face. The joke didn't sit well in the slightest, and Nick's voice had this angry grate to it. "Real funny, Ro'. Fuckin' hilarious. I'm dyin' here."

Her face flashed to something honestly apologetic, but just as she opened her mouth to respond, Coach shook his head to silence her. He offered Nick's rifle to the man, and with a begrudging snatch, Nick accepted it.

The gambler turned away, focusing on checking the gun over. His motions were violent, tearing the ammo cartridge free to inspect it. Ellis frowned gently, a sigh itching at his throat. He'd almost made the gambler cheer up again.

Considering Nick seemed intent on removing himself from them, Coach nodded carefully and tucked an arm around Rochelle's shoulders. He pushed her gingerly to start walking toward the highway, gesturing with his fingers to motion Ellis with them.

The kid blinked, indecision tearing him apart in an instant: follow Coach and act normal, or hang back and draw suspicion.

Unfortunately, Ellis knew which one Nick would've told him to go with. A little smile twitched at his jaw, and he submitted to the snarky voice in the back of his head he attributed to the gambler.

Shoving his cap down on his head, Ellis let the bill slip down to cover his eyes. Nick riveted his gaze on his rifle, pupils unmoving as he refused to watch Ellis slip out of his vision to tag after the two.

It was strange. Under the smooth, flawless veneer of anger, Nick felt his attention trailing after the Georgian. He didn't know if he wanted the kid to stay with him, or what - but, much as he'd want to reject the notion, he was a little too well-acquainted with just what that feeling was.

Longing. Stupid, childish, needy longing. It made him want to shove the muzzle of his rifle between his teeth and pull the trigger.

But Ellis wasn't Angelica, wasn't walking away from him because he didn't care. Ellis was Ellis, and Nick had been the one to shake him off. If he hadn't done that, the Georgian would probably still be at his side.

Nick quickly lifted up a hand to pinch down the bridge of his nose, shaking off the feeling with a sigh. It was the near-death experience that had done it; that and everything else that had gone wrong lately.

Growling as he tossed his rifle onto his shoulder, Nick forced himself to turn toward the slowly retreating trio. He didn't want to be near the gas station any more than any of them, and certainly not alone.

Green eyes flicked up - and with a blink, he realized Ellis was trodding along behind Coach and Rochelle backwards. The curly-haired mechanic was staring expectantly toward him, and as their gazes fell to a lock, he gave a subtle lift of one hand in a small waving motion.

'"C'mon."

it said. Ellis was smiling, gently.
Not without a small snort of forced derision, Nick adjusted his rifle a little more comfortably on his shoulder. He let his chin drop and pushed his weight to start walking forward, eyes half-closing. He didn't hurry; he instead kept his distance from the leading three, maintaining a few feet to give himself some solitude.

Ellis didn't try to draw back and meet up with him. He seemed to take some hint from the conman's posture, satisfied that Nick had come at his gesture. That capped head bobbed back forward, and he pleasantly bounced along behind Coach and Rochelle, shotgun gripped in his good hand.

His chipper voice crossed the gap between them and Nick as effortlessly as a bird winging out over a chasm, unburdened, not a care given to the breadth and depth. He'd fallen into the unflappable optimism and young obliviousness that seemed to rule his brain.

"Y'all wanna play I Spy?"

Of course, considering the helpless snorts Ellis earned himself from all three of his compatriots - even Nick, stifled with a shake of his head - his mood was more contagious than any of them would've admitted.
Chapter 63

"C'mon, Nick."

"No."

"Please?"

"No."

"But it's fun!"

"Absolutely not."

"C'mon, man, it's yer turn!"

Nick wasn't even going to dignify that one with a response. Or, at least, he told himself he wasn't - even if pride and a hair-trigger sarcastic wit had his mouth open after a beat of silence. He would've retorted, too, but Ellis was already babbling over him.

"... well, actually, it's been yer turn like five times already, but -"

Groaning in exasperation, Nick threw his hands up in the air. It was all he could do not to reach back and strangle the kid. Even worse was how Rochelle played into it, although Coach at least held his silence. His half-amused attention was more on Nick's distress than it was on the game itself.

The duo had been going on for half an hour, and Nick was sure they'd pointed out every iota of color in the dreary landscape surrounding the highway. Still green in the sunbaked trees, billowing white in far-off clouds, cracked black in the worn asphalt, dusky brown in the spaces between crawling grasses - little purple flowers just sprinkled along the treeline. Nick's shirt, Rochelle's still-faintly-pink nails, Coach's white-gauze-swathed head.

Ellis' enthusiasm - those wide, hunting eyes - could have painted the world in swathes of vibrancy for how quick he seemed to find them in their surroundings. All Nick saw was a haze of foggy red and grey, exhausted and frustrated.

It almost ached with how much he had to squint to comprehend the things Ellis pointed out. Not that he'd have admitted he'd been paying attention at all.

As they got further, the treeline melted away, a musky plain overtaking the ground and foreshadowing the beaches ahead as trees turned to bush turned to scrub. The asphalt burned its way through clay-mixed dirt, sunlight searing quietly down from a mostly blue sky.

When the heatwaves rising up in clouds from the roadway started to get unbearable, they'd shifted over to walk just along the roadway's edge, following the yellow-brown strip of grass deadened from car exhaust.

Ellis pouted out his lower lip at Nick's silence, flopping his uninjured arm in a little plea. There was laughter hiding at the edge of his voice, though. "C'mon, Nick. Just do it once 'n' I'll leave yuh alone. You ain't even given it a try! Who knows, yuh might like it."

"Yeah, suit." Rochelle giggled gently, covering her mouth with her fingertips. She swayed subtly as she walked, only a minor limp to her step from a bruised body. "Loosen up a little."

Coach gave a low chuckle, trudging on at the head of the group. He didn't look back, but Nick shot a glare at him for good measure anyway. Rochelle and Ellis walked just at the gambler's heels, and he grunted quietly back at them. "You guys have been doing just fine on your own. I don't play stupid games."

"Yuh play card games, don't'cha?" Nick started to whip around at the waist, eyes narrowing, but he could tell from the playful glitter to Ellis' eyes that the younger man didn't mean it in the oblivious way he generally did. He was poking fun.

Nick turned back forward, slowly, giving a low sigh and raking a hand through his hair. Part of him wanted to smirk, but he shook it off, grumbling instead. "... I gamble, kiddo. Call it stupid again and I'll sock you."

Laughing behind a stifling hand, Rochelle rolled her eyes gently at Ellis. "You're no fun, suit. Some of us are trying to pass the time."

"Really? Passing the time? Well you're making it hell for everyone else, so quit." The gambler shoved his hands into his pockets and exhaled, staring forward as he strode along the grass.

Ellis sighed just a little but grinned, knuckling his capbill down over his eyes. "S'Alright, Ro', we'll quit. We pretty much ran outta stuff anyhow. My fault fer tryin' tuh involve him." Nick shot a look over his shoulder, a little glare, exasperated. Ellis kept that grin with a sly edge, blue eyes just barely visible underneath his cap.

The gambler shook his head and refocused forward, glancing out to the side of the road with a squinting attention. The area was too hilly and the scrub too dense to see anything in the distance, but the road signs had been counting down to 'Tybee Island' with comforting speed.

Despite himself, Nick spoke up again, a slight slump touching his shoulders as he glanced down toward his injured leg and examined the subtle limp to his gait. "... I don't feel too confident about CEDA showing up, but I'm glad we're almost there. Fucking tired of walking."

"Bet Coach could carry yuh." Ellis teased with an almost serious edge of concern. The conman snorted, rolling his eyes.

He must've been more obvious than he thought eyeing his leg, because Rochelle sped up a little and reached out to touch a hand onto his shoulderblade inquiringly, voice gentling. "How is it feeling?"

Shrugging her hand off easily, Nick wiped the edge of his mouth with a wrist. "Eh. Doesn't particularly hurt, just weird to walk on." He leveled his voice into nonchalance, even if there was a little falsity to his words - it did hurt, on and off.

"Once we get to the coast we can settle down." Coach shrugged from his place at the front, sternly apologetic. "Till then, we gotta keep movin'. Sorry, Nick." Nick gave a careless gesture of one hand, spurring Rochelle's gaze to move to the big man.

She drew her lower lip between her teeth, cautiously. "... You're probably not feeling too hot either, Coach. All this walking and heat - is your head okay?" He shrugged again. That bandage-crowned head dropped a few inches with a snore-like sigh.

"A'ight, babygirl. Li'l headache, but ain't no thing."
Ellis bounded forward slightly, his injured arm swinging tenderly at his side as he held his shotgun up against his shoulder. Grinning a little, he affectionately sideglanced over his companions, shaking his head.

"Man. We are lookin' rough, ain't we? Real beat up. Heh - I ever tell y'all 'bout the time Keith got himself intuh a lion's en-clo-sure at the zoo?"

Nobody interrupted, so he babbled, shaking his head lightly with a smile.

"See, he thought they locked 'em up at night 'n' he wanted tuh go 'n' like, find claws tuh make necklaces out'uv. Tuh sell. Turns out they didn't lock 'em up like he thought - 'n' well. Let me just tell you, I ain't never seen him run so fast as he did that day. 'Cept fer the time he tried tuh kill a wasp's nest with homemade spray what didn't do nothin' but piss 'em off..."

Rochelle gave a bewildered blink, having to sort through the information for just an instant before tremulously questioning, "Keith got mauled by lions...?"

"Oh, naw." The kid guffawed gently, flapping a hand in the air. "He jumped the fence 'n' ended up in the next cage over. Flamingos got'im."

As if there was a reaction to that other than disbelief.

"Ey," Ellis interrupted himself lightly, bobbing his head slightly in brash curiosity. "Coach. I just went and reminded muhself. Weren't you gonna tell us whut had you all riled earlier? I meant tuh ask at the gas station, but then that whole zombie thing happened."

There was a beat of silence between them where Coach's reaction was uncertain, but with a small sigh, the big man gave a shrug of his shoulders. "If you wanna know. Got my sense back now, don't mind talkin' about it. Ain't nothin' real cheery, but I promised y'all I'd explain."

"Please, do." Nick grumbled sardonically, although he was just as eager to hear an explanation as the other two... even if his eagerness came from an edge of anger. "We can all hold hands while we share."

"Ignore him." Rochelle urged, leaning forward to punch at Nick's shoulder. The conman whipped his body weight to the side just fast enough to avoid the swing, shooting a scathing glance at her as he straightened his jacket. "Go ahead, Coach. What's up? May as well talk while we walk."

The big man gestured subtly forward just as Rochelle spoke. Nick noticed where his hand was pointing, a little nod touching his head as he registered Coach's point. There were a few zombies scattered on the roadway ahead, and Nick sidestepped to get around the eldest.

Bringing his rifle up to his shoulder, Nick squinted into the scope and got them in his sights. His footsteps slowed and his breath stilled to try and steady his aim.

He didn't shoot as well as he'd hoped, but the distance between them and the zombies left the zombies strangely unaware. A shot hit one in the shoulder, and its whole body jerked back with an exaggerated stagger. It seemed to lift up a hand and paw at its injury, head craning, and the other couple infected lashed their bodies around toward the sound.

A second shot brought it down, and it stumbled to the asphalt. The crack of the rifle stirred the attention of the infected around it, and they seemed to just get a bead on the survivors as the gambler adjusted his aim. Nick took them out before they made much ground, and between his shots, Coach talked in a gruff tone.
"That zombie y'all killed in the forest, the one wit' the big arm... it just.. struck me wrong. Real wrong. Shit was like Carmine again."

Ellis blinked in confusion, setting a hand on his jaw gently with a slow concern. "H-h'uh? Carmine? What'cha mean, Coach - you don't mean... you recognized it...?"

Coach shook his head, carefully, deepset eyes focusing on the zombies and Nick's sharply focused work. "Nah, son - not like that. It was just the... type. Charger, whatever Ro' called it." He quieted for a moment, a hand lifting to rub at the rounded swell of his stubble-rough cheek. Nobody spoke up for a moment as he seemed to muse silently, brows knotted. When he continued, it was with a sudden change - it seemed - of topic.

"I had boys - my football team. We had practice the day everything went to shit. Most of 'em were feelin' under the weather, but we were gearin' up for a game, so... they showed up anyway."

Nick caught on instantly to where Coach was going, his jaw setting stiffly. He kept it to himself, silently gazing through the rifle scope and pretending not to even be listening.

He chuckled. "Good boys. Made me proud. ..." Then he hesitated, watching Nick finish off the last of the handful of zombies, clearing the road. The gambler lowered his rifle, and Coach exhaled. "... They started turnin' in the locker room."

Rochelle shot up a hand to cover her mouth, nearly stopping in her tracks. "O-Oh -" There was no 'I'm fine,' or 'it's alright' - Coach just lowered his head in slow grief and shook it. A stiffness touched his voice, composed with harsh recollection. "I ran in quick as I could, but.. that shit was just... they changed so fast. Half of 'em were Chargers by the time I got in there. The rest.. they didn't stand no chance."

Ellis gently took his cap off his head, holding it to his chest in a polite gesture. He frowned down at the ground, meekly scruffling fingers through his hair as he did. "Coach, man.. 'm sorry.."

The football coach sighed deeply, palming gently over his face and squeezing down the bridge of his nose with thick fingers. "Wasn't nothin' anybody could'a done. I wish.. damn. Wish I'd sent those sick boys home. Savin' the rest would'a been better than seein' 'em dyin' like that, gettin' crushed by their own friends.. shit just ain't right."

"You never told me that." Rochelle murmured, shoulders a little slumped. She reached Coach's side, setting a hand on his arm. "How.. soon was that before we ran into each other..?"

He gave a weak chuckle, shaking his head. "Not too long. Wasn't gonna tell you, babygirl. You were fightin' with yo' own mind, gettin' used to all this shit. Had to protect someone.."

A zombie stumbled out from some shrubbery alongside the road, clawing at its own face sluggishly. Nick took it out with a cracking shot, a small scowl touching the corner of his mouth. "... So you saw the zombie and lost it." he prompted, coolly.

"Yeah." the big man sighed. "We ain't run into those things before - first time seein' them again after that. Flashed back a little, that's it. Guess this crack on the head was still messin' wit' me." Coach gave a gruff shake of his head, straining for his composure as he tiredly adjusted his grip on his shotgun. "Still sorry fo' that. Let y'all down. I should'a kept it under control."

"Naw, naw, man.." Ellis quickly protested, shaking his head as he slowly slipped his cap back onto his head, knuckling it down over his eyes with a small smile. "I would'uv been way more upset. We're all here fer each other -" Nick started to snort. ":- shut up, Nick. - All that matters is that yer okay now."

Coach's voice lowered a notch, deepening with a certain, indescribable emotion. He looked over his shoulder toward the kid, nodding his head. "Preciate that, son." Ellis smiled back easily, the expression softening.

Nick subtly palmed over his mouth as Rochelle rubbed at the big man's upper arm, comfortably. "I'm sorry, Coach.. I really am. You know there was nothing you could've done, right?"

"Yeah, babygirl. Just... don't seem like that sometimes."

The gambler pushed his free hand into the pocket of his jacket as he lowered his rifle, silently shaking his head. He didn't say a word at first, disinclined to admit that the explanation was any shade of satisfying. It was with a faint grunt that he uttered anything at all. "Could've used this information before you flipped shit, but hey, what the fuck."

Coach gave a low chuckle, glancing ahead at Nick. He let Rochelle's arm slip entirely into a loop with his, tiredly slouching his shoulders with an air of resignation. "Yo' ass has gotta be the angriest person I ever met."

The subtlest smirk touched Nick's lips, privately, faced well forward where none of the other survivors could see - and entirely absent from his voice. "It's my super power."

Ellis bounced slightly, lifting his brows with a sudden cap-shaded grin. "Ooh, ooh, I bet'cha we all got super powers."

Nick rolled his eyes, voice drawled with tired sarcasm. He shook his head slowly as he grumbled. "Yeah. With my New York anger, your redneck stupidity, Coach's ravenous appetite, and Rochelle's cutting-edge journalism, we'll rule the world."

Coach lifted up an arm, pointing suddenly off to the right. His gesture interrupted Ellis' sudden woosh of excitement at Nick's fairly humoring - if sarcastic - statement, drawing attention to a little shape breaching the sloping horizon. "Check it, y'all."

A lighthouse was the first sign of Tybee. The black nose of it towered up, a rounded shape stretching out against a pristine sky. There was no sign of a light at the tip, a deadened kind of loneliness about the protrusion. "We're close." Rochelle murmured, eyes going a little wide as she examined the lighthouse's silhouette.

Nick snorted slightly, lifting up a hand to gesture them faster as he broke out into a subtly limped jog. "Yeah, for all the good that'll do us when CEDA never shows up."
"Nick - left!"

The gambler reacted reflexively to Rochelle's instruction, swinging his rifle to catch a zombie with a shot in the chest as it raced for them. The four moved in a seamless jog, tightly clustered in a protective quadrant with Ellis - the most injured of them - behind Rochelle and Nick, and Coach taking up the rear.

The infected had sprouted up like flies as the survivors approached the lazy beginnings of Tybee Island's sprawled beachfront community. Bushy and un-maintained trees lined the street, low to the ground and shading the roadway from the sun.

The buildings that peeked out from under their canopies were little white-painted homesteads, columned porches built with an odd regality had they not been covered in gore. Most of the doors were open or busted down, dried blood splattered over and around them in the ghost echoes of violence that had happened days ago.

The scent of salt was like glue on the air, but any sense of oceanic purity was crudely marred by the decay and the stench of the infected, cloying as perfume. The irony - not lost on Nick's sick sense of humor - was thick in the short blood spray that pattered over his face when his shot tore through delicate organs, so morbidly like the wind-tossed fleck of water on a sea breeze.

Wiping his face quickly on his sleeve, feeling the fabric drag roughly over his unkempt facial hair, Nick growled.

"I have never felt this dirty and disgusting in my life."

Coach snorted slightly, head craned to blast off his shotgun into the body of a sprinting zombie, sending it to the ground with a gargling rage. "You ain't the only one."

They were all covered in dirt and gore - and sweating - but Coach's yellow-and-purple top was especially soaked through in growing patches. They all probably smelled, too, but body odor seemed insignificant with their senses permanently scorched by the smell of death.

"Quit whining.." Rochelle mumbled playfully, squinting against the recoil of her rifle as she shot the arm right off a zombie that was just stirring out of its almost lethargic rest against a porch staircase. "You guys don't have your shirt ripped half-off."

"Y'all considered us takin' a break here?" Ellis chirped questioningly as he ducked a little out of their arrangement to carefully shoot off to the side at an infected crawling out from behind a parked car. He was a bit unsteady with his shotgun, the blast taking a toll on his injured arm and flickering a little twitch over his expression, but he managed.

"I mean, judgin' from that sign we just passed, we still got a few miles till we really hit the beach."

Startled slightly, Nick half-spun before reminding himself they'd passed the sign already. He hadn't paid any mind to the distance they had to go. "Ugh." he uttered in a small growl, drawing his brows into a twitch. ". Goddamn it. Seriously?"

"Yeah." the kid apologetically confirmed, shaking out his arm just a little. "'N', y'know, we could take the night 'n' find us some wheels. Shit, we're all too tuckered out 'n' beat up already!"
Coach seemed to consider that, jaw rolling forward and a grunt escaping him. He kept a protective eye on Ellis until the kid gravitated back into the center of the group, shaking his head a little. "Ain't a real friendly neighborhood."

As if to punctuate the statement, a small gaggle of infected came bolting out from behind one of the houses, seemingly attracted by Ellis' close shotgun blast. Their shrieking, hands clawing the air as they ran, made Nick wince slightly - the infected were fairly stupid when undisturbed, but when something attracted them, they came in floods.

"That's the LAST thing we need."

"...fuck." the gambler muttered in belated self-chastisement as he registered his own thoughts - it was his turn to tempt fate, apparently.

Nobody paid him any attention, and he silently sidestepped Rochelle, joining her in facing the charging zombies. He gritted his teeth a little, watching his first shot strike straight through one's stomach and split it open.

Organs spilled in a greasy splatter from the torn wound, but the infected kept coming for a few steps before it seemed to notice its own injury and collapsed to the road on its still-jerking legs.

Backing up just a step, Nick grimaced a little when they got too close. He quickly got his rifle up and used the butt to smack straight across his attacker's face, the strike seeming to disorient it as it staggered back.

Rochelle fired straight through the torso, and the zombie went down with a gurgle.

Coach took careful aim around Rochelle and finished off the last one with a precise shot from his heavy shotgun. The blast knocked it straight off its feet and pulverized its ribcage. They started to relax as the last death-gurgle guttered out, glancing around quickly to make sure there wasn't any more on the way... but the respite was shortlived.

A wrenching cough, echoing through the air until it was hard to tell for sure where it had come from, made them all jump. Nick just got his rifle up, ready to aim, when a sudden 'ssplhk' heralded the sudden whipping presence of a tongue coming straight for his face.

He shot blindly in what he thought was the right direction, yelling out, "Shoot the -!" as the tentacle tightened - but it was a shot in vain. The tongue yanked hard, closing like a vice until his arms were entirely trapped together and his gun was directed upward, and wrenching him forward.

The gambler shut his eyes, bracing himself for the inevitable pain of collision he was going to have with the asphalt, inwardly snarling that it had caught them unawares. He was just about to go down when arms circled around his waist.

Ellis' body plastered against his, the shorter man's frame fitting up against Nick's in a determined cling. An incoherent yelp escaped the kid as the Smoker's pull prepared to drag him with, too. There was, however, just enough of a pause, enough of a stagger, for Rochelle to grab onto the Georgian by the hips and dig her heels in hard.

A breath later, Coach had his arms around nearly all three of them, hauling back with a barking yell. "NO YO' ASS DON'T!"
Their positioning placed Nick as the rope in a game of tug-o-war. Pain shot up his shoulders as the tongue, desperately slithering up toward his torso, practically wrenched his arms out of their sockets. "Hgh - Fuck!" he snarled, feeling the tongue's sticky tip burrowing around his shoulder to try and envelope the whole foursome.

With a fierce jerk, Ellis, Rochelle, and Coach heaved back. A loud snap announced the violent rending of flesh - and Nick, in an instant of incoherency, was half-convinced it was his arms tearing free of their attachment to his body.

Instead, the tongue broke just by his ear, and with an impressive chorus of shouts they all tumbled backwards with their own forceful heaving. Nick tried to fall sideways, rather than straight onto the others, but the tongue had gotten enough of a twine on them all that there wasn't anything to do but fall together.

Grunting, they went down like a bunch of bowling pins, struggling to get disentangled and not hit each other with flailing arms.

"Woah!" Ellis yelped a bit, clumsily trapped underneath Nick's weight. His hands slipped up, rough fingers working to push enough of the tongue free from Nick's arms to let the older man roll off. "Hoo-lee shit, that was cool! We done beat that tongue-thing like pros!"

Coach gave a weak chuckle, voice winded from the harsh collision that he'd taken the brunt of. He held still where he was, stoically uncomplaining, as their efforts slowly got them all crawled off, shoving the tongue out of its sticky wrap on clothes and limbs.

Nick managed to roll off Ellis when the tongue loosened around his arms, and he settled onto his knees to catch his breath. Rubbing his hands on his shoulders, he let out a pained groan, head shaking.

With him off, Ellis and Rochelle scrambled off easier. Ellis carefully bent down to help Coach up off the ground, while she bent over next to Nick to put hands on her knees and pant. "Jesus. I thought we were all gonna go down..

Nick grunted quietly at Rochelle's statement, wincing at the tingling pain that spread into his shoulders and upper back., but he was oddly quiet about the injury. No accusations, no sarcastic thank-you blaming them for his pain as was so like him.

He felt strange. Cared for - and very uncomfortable. Green eyes filtered out through mostly closed lids and underneath drawn brows, eyeing his companions as they recovered from the ordeal. They'd all leapt to save him from getting pulled away, no thought, no hesitation.

He'd expected it from Ellis, but not all of them.

Coach patted his hands on his thighs, heaving a fair sigh and nodding at Ellis in thanks as he got to his feet. He still seemed winded, but the eldest recovered fast, voice low. "Mmhm. Me too, babygirl. Guess it can't pull everythin'. Good job, y'all."

Ellis turned on his heels at Coach's words, blue eyes blinking bright across the road. The tongue had snapped back a bit like a rubber band with the breakage, but it was visible lying like a dead snake sprawled up the length of a lawn and draped up over the porch railing of a house. It trailed into the open doorway, still twitching vaguely with constricting muscle that seemed desperate to cling to anything.

"It ain't dead yet, though." he chirped, clapping a hand on his cap to hold it to his head and scampering suddenly alongside the flinching tentacle toward the house.

Nick was getting up to his feet in an instant, ignoring the sharp pain circling his shoulders as he pushed himself up off the concrete. "Hey!" he snapped, pupils constricting in a flash as his gaze followed Ellis' movements. "Dumbshit! The hell are you doing?"

Ellis flapped a hand over his shoulder reassuringly as he vaulted up the porch steps, not seeming to notice that the other three were a hair's breadth from running after him. "Just take'uh sec, gotta kill it."

"Son, you get -" Coach started, voice rising, but Ellis was already ducking inside the darkened doorway. The football coach grunted something that may've been a curse, wiping his wrist over his forehead. "Let's go."

Although Coach had said it, Nick was the first to start moving. He gritted his teeth a little, angrily, tenderly holding his shoulders a bit lower than was normal to try and take some pressure off his joints.

Second time you've disappeared into a house with a Smoker. God-fucking-damnit, Fireball.

"Ellis!" Rochelle called out, half-jogging at Nick's heels. She was just on the verge of worry, brows a little furrowed, and her voice dropped. "Knows better than to run off on his own..."

They trampled up the staircase, Nick grasping ahold of the railing to push himself a little into each step. He pushed his scowl down into a deadpan, burying his worry, and snapped simply, "No, he doesn't."

A loud shotgun blast made them pause just a beat before forging forward. Nick shoved himself through the doorway, intent on charging in and dragging Ellis out - preferably by the ear - but he stopped halfway through. He should've remembered what happened when a Smoker got shot, considering he'd been the victim of it twice already, but he'd just about forgotten.

The house's front room was filled with a foul smoke that smelled like roadkill cooking on a roasting blacktop. Nick instantly recoiled, but when the sharp, wheezing sound of Ellis breaking into gasping coughs struck his hearing, the conman braced himself.

Stupid -

Clamping his forearm over his mouth and nose, though the fabric didn't smell all that much better, Nick thrust himself forward into the smoke. He had to close his eyes, the clingy smoke threatening to sting his eyes, and in the end he just held his breath against his sleeve.

idiot -

He aimed blindly for the sound of Ellis' distress, free arm outswept to feel for him. The gambler was vaguely aware Rochelle and Coach hadn't followed him, a little annoyance darting up his spine at the fact.

dumbass -

Now he was the only one going after Ellis, the only one throwing himself into the smoke after him.

fucking -

... he looked selfless - or worse, like he cared.
That was not good.

- assclown!

His hand collided with fabric, and he twined fingers sharply in Ellis' shirt. Without allowing more than a beat to process it, Nick just started hauling him back toward the door. He felt Ellis struggling, but ignored it past making sure the kid wasn't trying to shoot him in surprise. Judging by the desperately breathless coughing Ellis was crippled by, nearly stumbling as he blindly followed Nick's pull, the kid had gotten a face- and lung-full of smoke.

The gambler shoved Ellis around him, spinning the Georgian, and pushed him out the door first, letting him half-fall into Coach's arms. Nick staggered out of the doorway, quickly gasping in a breath as he breached the smoke, lungs giving him a burning chastisement for how long they'd gone without oxygen.

Ellis was collapsed heavily into Coach's arms, hacking and coughing like he was dying, the sound only worsening when Coach rather tenderly patted his back. Nick brushed himself off carefully, grumbling quietly, before turning a critical eye on the Georgian.

Those stony blue eyes were watery and reddened, face screwed up painfully as he tried to suck in air that didn't clog his lungs like burning char. Nick felt a little tug of sympathy, only to bury it down.

"Good job, kiddo." he muttered quietly instead, lifting a hand slowly to rub at his shoulders. "Good fucking job."

Rochelle bent down a little, fanning at Ellis' reddened face with a careful motion. Even though she and Coach hadn't even entered the house, her voice was a little rough, holding back a cough as the smoke drifted out. "Ellis, sweetheart, breathe - Jeez. That stuff really reeks, doesn't it…? I hope it's not dangerous."

That thought hadn't really struck Nick, but he kept a flat expression, turning his head a little. He glanced at Coach, the big man holding Ellis with a paternal patience as the mechanic leaned against his side limply, wracked with mewl-like coughs.

"S-Sor-ry -" he hacked out between breaths, covering his mouth with a fist and flicking the tiniest of bleary glances toward Nick.

Nick scowled at him - holding it steadfast against the blue-eyed apology.

Sighing, Rochelle lifted up her hands to rub her face for a minute after giving Ellis a little pet on the shoulder. "I think Ellis was right. I vote we stake out here - wrangle a car, eat. We're hurt and exhausted, and I could really go for being on the inside of one of these houses right now."

Lifting up both his hands to rub at his shoulders, wincing at the soreness in his joints, Nick had to agree. He closed his eyes in a motion that, though seeming tired, was more to save himself from having to see Ellis floundering as he tried to recover from his coughing fit.

"Fine. But if we get a working shower, I am going first, fuck all of you."
Chapter 65

Nick was angry.

Being angry was the easiest way to ignore everything - including Ellis.

Coach and Rochelle were checking the nearby houses for their best option, and that had left Nick protecting Ellis as the still-winded kid recovered from the Smoker's abuse. The conman solidly maintained his gaze on their surroundings, refusing to so much as acknowledge Ellis' existence behind him.

Ellis was overconfident and reckless, and Nick hated him for it. It put him in this loathsome position to care, and worry - and he blamed the feelings on Ellis. If he could just be a little more careful, Nick wouldn't have to be put in that vulnerable place.

But they were in the zombie apocalypse and Ellis would always be in danger. They all would.

The Georgian sat on the porch, arms draped over his knees and back hunched to widen his chest and ease his breathing. He kept rubbing at his eyes, giving a rough cough every few seconds.

His voice was hoarse, but he talked anyway, interrupting himself with a small swallow every few words. "N-Nick.." The conman didn't react. "Nick, man, are you pissed at me..?"

Nick silently rubbed at his shoulders with his free hand, alternating, wincing subtly with an otherwise blank expression. He wasn't going to talk to Ellis, not about this. The hick had a frustrating habit of understanding him and the last thing he wanted was to examine his own emotions.

"I was just tryin' tuh -" Ellis stifled himself, frowning heavily as he coughed into a fist, wincing. Blinking through misty vision, he reached out, trying to grasp Nick's sleeve. "Nick.."

The gambler smoothly dodged it when he sensed Ellis leaning forward, sparing the smallest glare over his shoulder for Ellis. He regretted the motion immediately, because it put his gaze onto Ellis' pleading blues.

"C'mon, man. I feel bad enough already without'cha ignorin' me - I didn't mean tuh freak you out..?"

Gritting his teeth slightly, Nick snapped, his determination flagging. "Just shut up." He was hungry, and tired, and so much of his energy was going into just keeping his guard up. He didn't have any left for this.

Ellis relaxed a little with Nick's response, even if it cowed him. He lowered his chin a little, hiding underneath the bill of his cap. "M really sorry, Nick." he insisted breathlessly. "S'just, I don't always think. I just wanted tuh.."

He hesitated, for just a beat, and then he admitted it weakly: "I just wanted to impress y'all."

Nick felt Ellis' hand go for his sleeve again, and when those fingers brushed against his wrist he rejected it with a jerk again - but something faltered in his spine, and with a small growl of frustration, the gambler slipped down to sit on the bottom porch step.

He bent forward, rubbing his face with flat palms, agitated. He was in such a stupid, frustrating position. He wanted to keep Ellis out of danger, and fine. He could live with that, even if it was an agitating reflex. What he couldn't stand was anyone knowing that but him.

Why can't you just not give a shit, Nicolas? Jesus. What the fuck is so hard about that? Let someone else protect him. It's not hard.

Nick sensed Ellis' gaze on his back, but the younger man was quiet for a while, respectfully. Slowly, Nick heard him shifting, and the Georgian thudded his rump from step to step until he slid to sit right beside him.

He gently stretched out his legs, digging his heels into the ground, not saying a word. Nick didn't chase him away, though he inwardly flirted with the idea.

In the end, they sat there quietly for a few moments, neither moving and neither making to speak. Nick kept hunched down, rubbing his forehead with closed eyes, and Ellis gazed down the road with scrunched brows.

Slowly, giving little hiccoughs here and there, Ellis coaxed himself to end the silence. "Keith is always real reckless, y'know. Guess I get it from him, not thinkin' afore I do shit." When Nick didn't speak - but didn't protest either, Ellis gently nudged his shoulder with his own.

"... still mad?"

The gambler snorted, pulling one hand away from his face. He stretched his arm up without moving, smacking Ellis across the side of the head with a flat hand.

The Georgian jumped a bit, blinking and catching his hat as it tumbled off his head. He chuckled softly, giving the stinging spot a little rub before replacing his cap and nudging it down over his eyes.

"Of course I am. I'm stuck with a fucking reckless child." Nick spat sideways at him, tone low and hostile and eyes half-closed. "You just can't not act like a dumbshit, can you?"

The insults fell flat - Ellis smiled back at him. He took a moment to sigh, rubbing his still-gripping knuckles against the bill of his cap, then murmured, "Good thing yer here tuh drag me outta the smoke, then."

Nick shook his head. Simply, shortly, and he growled a little as his face turned forward again. Ellis let his chin tip up to gaze at the conman's face. Agitation wrenched the edge of his mouth down, a natural curl on ruggedly stubbled features. "That's not my goddamn job. You're so goddamn... guh. I should've just let you suffocate."

The words did little but make Ellis' smile deepen, exhaling in a tiny sigh. He was confident in his understanding of the gambler's anger - Nick was worried, and anger was his defensive reflex. If Ellis didn't understand that yet, he'd be stupid.

If anything, Ellis was a little flattered.

"C'mon, Nick." he pleaded gently, feeling guilt tug at his stomach. "Please quit bein' mad? 'M real sorry I didn't listen to y'all. I promise I'll be more careful next -"

"No, you won't." the gambler snarled, curling fingers into fists. "You'll do something stupid and I'll have to kill myself trying to drag you out. We're in so much fucking danger, for Chrissakes, Ellis! Can you act like that intimidates you for one goddamn second?"

Rather than respond, Ellis gave a sigh. He glanced down toward his knees for a moment in silence, listening to Nick growl to himself.

Slowly, the Georgian reached up to twist his cap a bit to the side, getting the bill cocked away. With still-lowered eyes, he leaned forward and pressed his lips to the gambler's cheek, plush lips nuzzling onto thick, softening stubble. "Sorry..

Nick jolted under the kiss, spine straightening to reflexively jerk away. Ellis felt his face heat up when the gambler twisted around to inspect him, frustration thickening under his surprise.

"The -" Seeming, Ellis swore, flustered, the conman fumbled and then fell silent. He gave a minute growl before turning to stare off into the distance, eyes almost hazed and mouth pinched into a severe line.

The kid ducked his head down, feeling a little embarrassed by his own actions, especially considering he'd successfully startled Nick. He rubbed at his neck, lowering his chin, and gave the smallest of bashful chuckles.

"Don't be mad, Nick. It ain't like I got hurt none or nothin'. 'M alright, yer alright - heck, we're doin' pretty okay considerin' we're in an apocalypse 'n' all that. We're practically -"

Mid-sentence, Nick's body turned. One hand set on the porch stair to brace his weight, the other snapping up to grasp straight onto Ellis' shirt, fingers curling in the fabric. He tugged the kid close, dragging him into a lean until he could turn ice-cold eyes straight onto his face.

Ellis felt his lungs expanding to give an inhale, but Nick's glare made him freeze up, unsure. He blinked into half-squinted green eyes, not making any motion to pry free from his hold, trusting implicitly. It took a moment for Nick to speak, sharply examining his face, eyes unreadable beyond a cool anger.

"Ellis, you are the last person I want to hear talk right now. You are fucking insufferable."

The Georgian opened his mouth to respond.

"Shut. The fuck. Up."

With some reluctance, Ellis acquiesced, clamping his jaw shut and lowering his chin a little. He felt the smallest pang of hurt in his chest, though he tried to ignore it. Something in the gambler's shoulders relaxed, and he let go of Ellis' shirt with a dark sigh and a small push to straighten Ellis out on the step.

Fingers curling with stress, the gambler hunched down to set elbows on his knees and rake digits through his hair, forcing the dark strands into place. A deep sigh escaped him, exhale and inhale visible in the shifting of his back.

Ellis examined his hands, setting them on his knees with the tiniest utterance of "Jeez." under his breath. He tapped his fingers against the fabric of his coveralls, resisting the urge to sigh.

For some reason, that had bothered him more than anything Nick had said beforehand.

They sat in silence for a while, Nick's fingers taking a slow massage on his own shoulders. Ellis noticed it, eyes flicking toward him, but didn't say a word - just returned his gaze down the street to watch the wind rustle along the leaves of roadside trees.

He did his best to remind himself Nick didn't really mean it. However, that was easier to think than to believe, and try as he might to stifle it he felt a frown working its way onto his face. Ellis wanted to protest. Force him to talk and apologize, even if it was in that backwards not-so-apologetic way Nick had of moving on.

He didn't.

Better to let it sit for a while, so Nick could have some time to think on it. He'd only get angrier if Ellis pushed it. Had he made a mistake by kissing him…? It had just… happened… It had felt right.

A sharp whistle broke the silence, coming from down the road, and Ellis lifted his head. He blinked once, then lifted a hand to straighten his cap out on his head. He mumbled, "That's Ro'. C'mon."

Setting his jaw a little, Ellis pushed himself up off the steps and curled his hands into his pockets. With his shotgun slung over his shoulder by the strap, he quietly set off down the sidewalk toward the noise.

Nick fell into step behind him after an instant, and the two wordlessly walked toward the direction of the whistle, stepping over infected corpses as they went down the sidewalk. Ellis felt Nick's gaze like one feels the burning pressure of a too-close match, but he didn't let himself react.

He was allowed to get his feelings hurt - wasn't he?

Rochelle's pink-shrouded form flashed into sight leaning out of a house two blocks down. She had a grip on the doorway, other hand raising to wave at them. Ellis returned it with a smile, picking up his pace as he skittered across the concrete.

The house had a white-picket porch, all prim and old-fashioned underneath draping roadside trees. The lawn's grass was faded and patchy, as if struggling to grow in poor soil. Ellis jumped the fence with a quick leap, getting the hand of his uninjured arm on the slats between the fence points and using it to vault over.

The fence wobbled dangerously with his weight. He was aware of Nick snorting behind him, and the conman stubbornly continued down the sidewalk until he reached the fence's gate.

"'Ey, Ro'! Y'all find anythin'?"

"Yeah." She smiled gently, watching him as he loped across the lawn to stand before her. "A lot of these houses are just nightmares on the inside - but this one's pretty clean."

Ellis scratched at the back of his neck, shutting an eye as his forearm brushed into his cheek. "It ain't like we're too clean ourselves, Ro'."

Rochelle gave a little shiver, shaking her head and thumbing over her shoulder. "Ohh, no, sweetheart. When I say nightmares I mean… dead bodies in the beds and … blood everywhere, like someone fell into a blender. Not exactly a good place for sleep."

Crinkling his nose gently, Ellis uttered, "Oh." He snuck a glance over her shoulder, but the porch eaves didn't let in much light, and the house was eerily dark. Although he started to question just how they'd looked around, he belatedly noticed the flashlight in her other hand and stopped. "... Guess there ain't no power?"

"No.. but there's still some hope. Coach said he thought he saw a backup generator in the backyard, but I wanted to bring you guys back before we went outside again." A slightly tired breath escaped her, stepping back into the house and clicking on her flashlight.
Nick caught up with them, growling in irritation as green eyes severely flickered over what Rochelle's light beam illuminated of the house's front room. "Where is Tons of Fun, anyway?"

Coach's deep voice rumbled from inside the house, more amused than anything else. "Watch it." Nick didn't quite jump, but he stiffened. The football coach came up behind Rochelle, his shotgun rested on his shoulder. He gestured into the house, shaking his head. "Preciate the concern, though, Nick."

The conman spared him a subtle glare. "Ha."

Speaking up a little, Ellis scooted into the house past Rochelle. "Ey, least this one's got a proper door, right?" Her flashlight filtered in, lighting up the odd shapes of a family's dining room.

A tall dining table took up most of the front room, chairs encircling all sides but the one pushed straight against the wall. A kitchen sat further in, only a small bar-style counter separating the two rooms. The left side of the house was cut off by a half-closed door.

A staircase led to the second floor, up against the back wall, and there was a door beneath it that must've opened into the backyard.

"Oh yeah, a door. Aren't we fucking lucky." Nick grumbled, raking fingers through his hair. Ellis didn't respond, feeling a little torn - and a little guilty. The older man was reacting to his voice at least, even if he was being sarcastic about it.

Shiit - should I... say somethin'..?

Ellis kept his gaze roving over the house's walls, fighting a sense of hesitance. He waffled too long, and the opportunity passed.

"Two bedrooms upstairs." Coach stated, lifting a hand to rub at his forehead with his wrist. He seemed about to continue, a questioning lift touching one low brow, but Rochelle broke in with a breezy tone:

"I'd rather bunk with you, Coach. Let's split up like we have been so far."

Ellis felt his ears heat up a little, but he didn't risk turning around and looking at her. He knew entirely too well she was doing it for his sake - or, rather, their sake. It didn't really matter, though, not in the end.

What did matter was that they'd be in the same room.

The guilt swept in again, and Ellis lifted up a hand to rub at his jaw, wincing off into the darker corners of the room. He regretted getting his feelings hurt so quickly. So it was Nick's fault - a little. It wasn't like Nick had done anything beyond the norm.

Ellis, on the other hand, had just gone out on a limb and kissed his cheek. It was... impulsive.

Maybe Nick didn't like the affection.

Hoh, boy. I am over-thinkin' this! We had a li'l misunderstandin'. He's upset. That's all... I'll make it up to him. It'll be fine.

The gambler snorted lowly, retorting as his gaze traced Ellis' silhouette against the darker backdrop of the house's innards. His tone was low and artificial, ringing out with a hollow thrum. He was just on the verge of genuine frustration, a laziness lowering his eyelids as he kept it in check and forced it into the facade of mockery.

"Sure. Leave me with the chatterbox. I see how it is."

Rochelle rolled her eyes with a shake of her head, setting a hand on her stomach with a deep sigh. "Deal with it, suit... Anyway, if Coach and Ellis want to go look into the power, we can take some downtime and rustle up some food..?

She'd barely even finished the words before Nick was pushing past her, coolly plucking her flashlight right out of her hands and walking for the staircase at the back of the house. He lit his way with a steadily twisted wrist, voice tossed over his shoulder.

"You ladies have fun with that. I'm going to go lay down."

Ellis blinked after him, feeling a little lost for words as the conman headed upstairs without another word. His lips drew together in a slow frown, wondering after him, wishing he understood - but Coach had a hand clapped onto his shoulder a beat later, and he had to force himself to think clearly.

"C'mon, son." the big man grunted gently, pat-patting before gently wheeling Ellis to walk toward the backdoor. "Figured you might be able to help out here. Gotta get this generator-thang workin'. I don't wanna be the one listenin' to Nick whinin' if he don't get his shower."

Ellis quickly swallowed, bobbing his head with an easy smile. He lowered his gaze as the eldest guided him across the house. "'Course, Coach. 'M sure it ain't gonna be too much trouble, just maybe fuelin' it up since it ain't au-to-matic or nothin'. Heh - I ever tell you 'bout the time muh buddy K-" He saw Coach's slow, sideways glance before the big man had a chance to interrupt him. Bashfully, he curled in his lips, giving a little cough and dropping his chin.

"...Uh, well. Turns out you can't run yer lawnmower on beer or it explodes. I mean, not right off, but it starts makin' this real crazy ruckus and after a minute -"

Rather than being annoyed, Coach was laughing, head shaking as he pulled Ellis into a little sideways-shake of a hug with the grip he had on his shoulder and sighed.

"Son, yo' mouth could play runnin'-back on my team any day."
Chapter 66

The second he got behind a closed door, Nick threw the flashlight straight across the room. The beam went wild as it pinwheeled through the air, and it clipped the edge of the guestroom's bed to go shooting straight down to the floor with a clatter.

"FUCK!" he snarled in peaking frustration - finding immediately that, with no windows to let in any light, he'd thrown himself into pitch darkness.

"Fuck." came to his lips at the realization.

"..fuuuck.." hissed out of him in a small exhale as he started to slowly move forward, aware he had no grasp of the layout of the room from the tiny snapshot he'd gotten before he'd flung the flashlight -

- and when he stepped straight into a chair, getting his foot stuck in the legs and tripping over it, he chanted it angrily: "Fuckfuckfuckfuck!"

The conman went down blindly, hands quickly shooting out to try and catch himself. He landed half-bent over the fallen chair. Try as he might to salvage some piece of his dignity, one edge of the wooden seat jammed into his crotch like some sort twisted last jibe from fate.

He went limp as a kitten grabbed by the scruff, groaning a little at the wave of gut-wrenching pain driven deep by the collision - it could've been a lot worse, but he still ended up in that reflexive fetal position as he maneuvered himself sideways off the chair tenderly.

He didn't know what hurt worse: his groin, his leg, or his ego.

Lying there for just a moment, he sighed, letting his head rest on the carpet as stars flickered behind his eyelids. Calm down. Jesus. He felt so inordinately frustrated. It was enough to deal with Ellis' recklessness all on its own, but the argument they'd had was messing with his head.

Nick made people mad. He upset them, he insulted them. He did it all the time and he did it intentionally, and he didn't care to do anything different. That was just how it worked, and he liked it that way. It kept everyone at bay and off-guard.

Unfortunately, watching Ellis crumple underneath his anger was about as satisfying as jamming thumbtacks into his own hand.

He didn't know why. Maybe it was because Ellis was such a rubber-skinned kid all the time that when Nick hurt his feelings, he knew he'd done something honestly over the line. Or maybe that, in all truthfulness, he hadn't meant to hurt him at all.

Ellis was supposed to shrug it off - not absorb it.

Rolling softly to get his hands underneath himself, the gambler slowly crawled to his feet. A heavy wince lingered over his features, soothingly rubbing a flat palm against his still-tender groin as he limped forward.

His free hand was outstretched, feeling for the bed that he remembered seeing. When his fingertips brushed against it, he climbed up onto the mattress, slowly shuffling to the other side until he could see the fallen flashlight, shining dully against the floor.
The gambler strained to pluck it up off the floor, letting his legs slip off and sitting himself on the edge of the bed as he snatched it up. Using the flashlight to illuminate the room, Nick examined it. It was a quaint little guestroom, mostly taken up by the single bed that he currently sat on.

The single, one-person bed.

He stared for a quiet moment, examining the room and the lacking width of the bed he sat on. They'd either cram together or one of them would sleep on the floor - fine. He could stand that.

Probably depends on if he forgives me or not.

Wait - forgive ME? His nose crinkled suddenly, head rearing back as he struggled with his own wording. He's the reckless idiot! Why am I - ... Why should I even care? Fuck that. He can sleep on the floor for the shit he puts me through. Fuck. That.

Clicking his flashlight off with a suddenly frustrated grunt, Nick flipped himself to lie down on the bed, crossing his arms underneath his head as he thudded onto the pillow. The gambler wordlessly scowled up at the ceiling, stewing.

Goddamnit, Ellis. Goddamnit.

His vision was just starting to adapt to the darkness, picking out shapes and silhouettes in the room, when he closed his eyes. He felt his brows scrunch on his forehead, agitated, but he focused instead on relaxing as best he could.

The gambler lifted up his shoulders a little, tenderly stripping his suit jacket off. It took a slight squirm to free himself from the cloth, groaning slightly as discomfort returned to his shoulders. In a rare moment of carelessness, the gambler just flopped his arm to shuck his jacket to the floor, going limp when his arm dangled over the edge of the bed.

The apocalypse days had been marked by a general ache, a full-body kind of overexertion, but when something hurt more than normal everything else seemed to fade away in favor of a crystalline, piercing awareness of the new injury.

He needed a shower. A scalding hot shower to burn away all the disgusting sensations and, even better, emotions clinging to him like smog - completely start fresh, like a bleached surface.

His shoulders ached, a pain sunk into the sockets. He wanted to rub them, but to do so would've meant lifting the other arm, and now that he'd gotten laid down he didn't even want to move. So he didn't.

Relaxed in the dark, somehow comforted by the silent shadows encircling him, Nick dozed. It was easier than it should've been, all things considered.

Easier than it should've been to nap dreamlessly, too - he was sure he did fall asleep, even transiently, but there were no imprinted images to mark the drifting of his subconscious. Not even the faded ghost-like memory of a mostly forgotten dream.

Nick might've doubted that he'd fallen entirely asleep, but when he suddenly grasped for consciousness, it was with a face-full of cloth. He was used to the feeling, instantly rolling his face further into the pillow with a small growl as he tightened his arms in their embrace on his impromptu partner.

Whether he liked the habit or not, it wasn't something he could exactly stop. It at least gave him something to bury his face in while ignoring whatever it was that stirred him.
"...Nick.. c'mon."

Oh, of course. Ellis. Never anything but Ellis. Growling under his breath, Nick pulled his face away from the pillow enough to talk, agitated. He didn't look at first, hoping he could just chase Ellis away vocally. "What?"

Ellis chuckled softly, a nervous edge to his voice Nick wasn't used to hearing. "Man, I can't never tell how yer gonna wake up.. half the time yer all snuggly, 'n' half the time I think yer gonna tear me up."

"I'm considering it." the gambler muttered, forcing his eyes open and turning his chin a little. He spared one green eye to stare up toward the kid, disoriented at first. The room was still pitch-dark, but Ellis held a plate with a lit candle in either hand, the small flames scattering a fair amount of light in wavering shudders.

Ellis immediately wilted back just a tiny bit, and as he gave a hesitant half-smile, Nick snorted, unmoving. "And call me 'snuggly' again, I goddamn dare - wait." Suddenly something clicked in his head.

Ellis and Coach had gone to get the power working.

Ellis was now standing in front of him with lit candles.

Nick could tell the Georgian knew he'd realized it, because he took a careful step back, lifting his shoulders almost defensively. "I'm real sorry, Nick!" The gambler groaned near-silently, burying his face back into the pillow and inhaling heavily against the fabric as if to suffocate himself.

"I know you were lookin' forward tuh a shower, man, but the thing is, the generator's real busted up - I think it shorted out somehow. Coach'n'I did our best, but -"

"Just stop." Nick snarled into the fabric, still... unfortunately... breathing. "The one fucking thing I ask for..." Twisting slightly and shoving the pillow aside, the conman got himself up, shoving to sit on the opposite edge of the bed from Ellis. "Just a god-damn shower.."

He slumped, body in a lean curve and back straining subtly against the fabric of his dress shirt as he just gave up trying to hold his posture. He glared forward at the wall, furious.

Ellis shifted on his feet, frowning. The mechanic gingerly stepped to the side, setting one of the candles down on the bedside table. He crossed the room with the other, setting it on a dresser, so the light reached the whole room. "It'll be okay, Nick... y-"

"No." Nick didn't look over, palming a hand down his face with tense fingers. He scratched harshly on his stubbled jawline, the softening scruff rustling under his fingertips. "Just fucking no, Overalls. I cannot handle your bullshit optimism right now."

The Georgian adjusted the candle plate softly, centering it with a sigh. "I'm just tryin' tuh -"

"I said -"

But Ellis wasn't having it. A huff escaped the Georgian, turning around where he stood. His jaw jutted forward slightly, arms slipping into a loose cross over his chest. "Will you quit interruptin' me?!"

Nick straightened slightly, turning at the waist to stare at Ellis across the room. Green eyes pierced through him, burning, strangely silent. The Southerner didn't get angry often. Okay. Cut to the Giving a small breath and kicking a boot softly against the carpet, Ellis lifted his head, meeting Nick's gaze after a moment. Blue stubbornly held green, mostly unintimidated by the glare, holding his ground.

This wasn't about electricity anymore.

"...Look, Nick, if yuh feel like shit then say so. If yer tired then say so. But yer just yellin' at me and gettin' mad, 'n' it ain't gettin' us nowhere."

Nick felt his body stiffen, growling, eyes narrowing slowly. He rolled his shoulders slowly, head tipping. He was silent for a moment, staring, and then questioned in flat sarcasm, "Permission to speak?"

Ellis didn't rise to that, holding his gaze silently.

"Listen, Georgia. If you can't handle getting yelled at, fine. I'll stop yelling at you - at the same time I stop saving your stupid redneck ass." The gambler lifted up a hand, jabbing a ringed finger at Ellis spitefully. "I hope you enjoy your respite from my fucking temper while you're getting strangled, eaten, mauled, and crushed to death."

Ellis frowned heavily, clamping a hand onto his hat and adjusting it on his head. The bill lowered just a little, not quite low enough to hide his eyes, nor the uneasy flutter that traveled across them. "That ain't funny, Nick."

The conman threw his hands up, regretting the motion as it pivoted sore shoulders. "Am I laughing? Christ, Overalls. Every goddamn time I turn around you're throwing yourself into danger or running off. Please, give me a fucking excuse not to chase after you anymore."

With a little groan, Ellis squeezed fingers on his truck-adorned hat. "Nick, will you -"

Apparently not having learned, Nick interrupted him anew, a snarl touching the edge of his voice as he pushed his hands onto his knees. "I can't fucking take my eyes off you for two minutes!"

Ellis broke, yanking his hat straight off his head with a jerk of his arm and raising his voice to a near-shout, "Maybe that's why yer so damn pissed!"

They both froze. Neither really moved for a moment, a loaded and uncomfortable silence playing over the moment.

Nick slowly turned to face the wall, lowering his chin to focus his gaze on the carpet between his shoes. It shouldn't have surprised him that Ellis knew what was going on. The kid had an unnatural sense for people - and he was undaunted by any of Nick's attempts to shoo him away.

No, the Georgian knew.

It pissed Nick off and unnerved him all at once.

Ellis hesitated where he stood. He didn't necessarily regret the outburst, but he could feel the anger vibrating along the conman's frame and it cowed him a little. Slowly drawing his cap into both his hands, feeling at the fabric in a shy gesture, Ellis drew in a careful breath.

He shuffled just the smallest of steps closer to the bed. "...I worry 'bout you too, y'know. It ain't like it's bad. We're a team."
Nick didn't say a word at first. He lifted up a hand and rubbed at his brow, closing eyes with an inhale. Frustrated, there was a deep, roiling sarcasm to his voice when he did. "Aww, aren't you cute. All in touch with your emotions."

He listened to Ellis' little laugh in response. It was a sweet-edged noise, a little relieved now that their voices were lowered again. The Southerner approached a little more, bridging the gap, but Nick kept his eyes closed.

His mocking did give a little admittance - through his not denying Ellis' assertion, he subtly confirmed it. He didn't particularly like that, but better do it in a backwards fashion than say it outright.

"Y'know I really am sorry, right, Nick..?"

Ellis' voice was hesitantly gentle. He was closer than Nick had thought, just at the end of the bed, and Nick sighed wearily. "Yeah, sport. I..." The conman slipped a hand up, slouching forward slowly and rubbing at his sore shoulders.

'Am too'? Was that what he was going to say?

"... just don't have the confidence you do that we're not all going to die. Horribly. Soon."

Ellis smiled gently, giving a soft sigh and rubbing his face. The relief he felt as the argument stopped was crippling, a swelling kind of warmth bubbling in his chest. He'd been right, and all that was left was a little bit of guilt at so stubbornly making Nick admit it.

"I know." he uttered, apologetically, slipping his cap back onto his head and screwing it down a little. "Like I said, I was reckless runnin' off like that. I'll be more careful if it's gonna freak yuh out like that, okay?"

Nick groaned softly at the phrasing, rubbing his shoulders with both hands now as stress stiffened his back muscles. It worsened with the inward reminder that he wasn't going to get the scalding shower he'd promised himself.

"I wasn't -" He stopped, though, exhaling with a little roughened edge. "... Well, remember the last time you disappeared into a house with one of those things...?"

Ellis' smile gained a feisty edge of humor, guffawing gently and scuffing his knuckles against the bedsheets. "Heh, aww, yeah.. man, feels like for-ever ago. You came 'n' saved me back then, too!"

A small snort escaped the gambler, hanging his head and masking a subtle half-smirk under the shadows crossing over his face in the lowly lit room. "Don't make that a habit, alright? I'm all for a good smoke right now, but those assclowns are a little more dangerous." He closed his eyes tightly, leaning forward until his elbows braced on his knees.

"Yeah..." Ellis trailed softly, seeming to fall silent for a moment. Nick wasn't overly surprised when he felt the bed bow behind him with Ellis' weight, but he expected the younger man to slip to sit next to him or just sit on the other side.

What he didn't expect was the mechanic to shuffle up onto the bed and into a kneel behind him, or to set hands on his shoulders.

They were deliberate, warm hands, hard-worked and calloused. Though he could feel hesitance through the fingertips, Ellis' uncertainty bleeding into his touch, it was barely a beat before they squeezed gently on his shoulders.
Nick started to open his mouth, not quite startled but prepared to question the contact - but he halted when the touch circled, heavy thumbs rolling into the muscle of his shoulders.

Using the muscles on either side of Nick's neck to brace his grip, Ellis shifted the pressure from his thumbs to the heels of his hands, digging wondrously into sore muscle. Even through his shirt it felt fantastic - Nick felt an actual, honest groan tear from his throat.

"Over-" he half-uttered, spine shifting straighter to encourage the touch even as his voice gave a little questioning twist, not sure he should be submitting so easily... and then Ellis pushed upward, following his spine to rub into the back of his neck, calloused fingertips circling directly onto bared skin with a hesitant pressure.

The shudder Ellis got out of the older man as he stroked into the sweet spots along his spine was crippling. ".ffuuuh.." Nick ghosted. He barely noticed how Ellis was nursing his injured arm, putting less pressure with that hand so he didn't flex his bitten forearm any more than necessary.

Ellis laughed very gently, just a little, bashful guffaw. Nick couldn't get the inspiration to be annoyed, lowering his chin to surrender his neck to the Georgian's fingers and letting his eyes drift shut. "You hurt yer shoulders when we were fightin' that Smoker, right..? Been rubbin' at 'em a lot."

Unresponsive, at least in coherent words, Nick hummed out a pleased noise. He lolled his head just a little to the right as Ellis traveled back down to his shoulders. A wild thought had Nick wishing his shirt was off... but he couldn't get himself to interrupt Ellis long enough to strip it.

"Shoulder massages're real nice. S'fun, makin' someone feel better." 'Fun' wasn't the word Nick would use to describe it - nor was 'better.' The conman had no idea how the kid knew how to do it that well, and just then, he didn't care.

Ellis shuffled forward slightly, getting closer, and Nick felt the plane of Ellis' tummy just nuzzle against his lower back as he leaned forward. He murmured, something shy entering his voice, even when Nick didn't pay the slightest attention. "Used tuh do this when muh mama was workin' double shifts."

With a tender, firm squeeze, Ellis rubbed the heels of his hands tightly into the flesh of Nick's shoulderblades. The conman arched backward, groaning, his heels digging into the carpet.

It brought them closer. Nick didn't notice, but Ellis did.

The Georgian's voice softened further, hiding the slight shake to his voice as his pulse jumped into his throat. "Hope it's okay..." He leaned his head down just a little, eyes half-closing, hovering his face just to the side of Nick's.

All the while he kept his hands working, squeezing through his shirt and manipulating the sore muscles underneath his palms. Circles and strokes, presses and slides... following the shiver of Nick's frame to find what felt good.

Nick smelled... good. It was a strange experience, one that dizzied Ellis a little. Nick didn't smell good like cologne and soap, but musky. Deep. Underneath the blood, sweat, and grime that was becoming so expected, he just smelled good.

Ellis couldn't explain it. It wasn't a scent, so much as it was a feeling.

"Mmnh.. El..." Nick mindlessly uttered, a throaty arousal to the tone. The conman didn't really realize how much he gave away in the simple slip: the thrumming heat creeping up his spine and the building pleasure with the simple contact of Ellis' hands and body.

He let his hands travel down a little on Nick's back, spreading fingertips to ghost carefully around the small circles of blood where the Witch had injured him. More on whim and impulse than anything else, Ellis leaned in and nuzzled his mouth down the side of Nick's neck in something between a kiss and a graze.

He felt Nick stiffen. For just one single instant, Ellis was certain he'd made a mistake.

Then - one of Nick's hands lifted up, fingers burrowing underneath Ellis' cap to curl into his hair. His hat tumbled away, baring his face to the low candlelight and the burn of Nick's green eyes. Ellis' confidence came undone, a blush darting across the bridge of his nose and spilling onto his cheeks.

A low breath escaped Ellis as those fingers pulled his head up just a few inches, Nick catching his lower lip in a firm bite before capturing his mouth in a kiss. He used the grip to pull Ellis closer, their bodies slowly starting to turn, hunting out more contact and a closer touch.

Nick slid his leg into a curl on the edge of the bed so he could twist further. He had the kid pliable to him, ripe for the taking -

Then his bandaged calf scraped on the edge of the mattress. Nick hissed before he could stop it, and Ellis drew back from the kiss at the sound, pushing against the fingers on his scalp. A concerned quirk touched his face.

Unfortunately, Ellis was not slow on the uptake. His eyes went down toward Nick's leg, arousal dissipating as fast as it had arrived. Concern rose in its place.

"Damnit -"

"Nick?" the kid questioned, even as he propped his weight on a wrist placed against the older man's shoulder and reached out his other hand toward the gambler's injured leg. "You okay?"

Nick tried to bat Ellis' hand away, but the mechanic stubbornly pressed his body around him and got a hand on the leg of his slacks. Tugging it up gently, harder when it caught against the mattress, Ellis didn't give him much choice but to cooperate.

"I'm fine - Kid. Leave it. There's nothing to do."

If Ellis heard him, he didn't indicate it. He simply shuffled Nick's pantleg up until he could get a look at his bandaged calf, a frown quirking at his mouth. His head cocked, fingertips touching at the edges of the stained stripe down the bandages. "Nick…" he muttered in vague chastisement.

It had only been a day and a half since they'd changed them, but all the moving around had agitated it into bleeding on and off, and sweat and dirt from traveling and spending the night in the forest hadn't done it any favours.

Okay, Nick admitted internally. It doesn't look great.

Blue eyes flicked to the side, catching the gambler's gaze. Nick could see the stubborn glint in them. "We gotta clean you up. Why didn't you say nothin'?"

"Say what? It's not like we have enough bandages to change it. We didn't even have enough for you." Nick gestured with his chin toward the kid's wrapped forearm, and Ellis gave it a blinking moment of attention. He considered it. Then his gaze was right back onto Nick, fiercer this time.
"We could'uh done somethin. Whenever Keith gets real injured, we gotta change his bandages all the time. 'N' you ain't even on meds or nothin'."

Sighing, Nick reached up to draw his hand across his forehead, exasperation sinking into his voice. "Ellis, it's -" However, he didn't get much further before the Georgian was up off the bed and onto his feet.

"Gotta be somethin' in this house we can use tuh clean it up." Ellis assured him, off-handedly, moving before Nick could catch him. He watched in rising annoyance as the kid loped off toward the bedroom door. "You just sit, Nick, I'll look around. We'll get'cha fixed up right."

Sourly trailing his hand down his face and onto his chest, scratching at the patch of skin bared by his unbuttoned collar, Nick narrowed his eyes into frustrated slits. He resigned to watching Ellis tear out of the bedroom, hearing his progress through the house on heavy boots as he rooted around.

Complete with hollering at Rochelle and Coach, voice muffled through the walls. Nick groaned faintly in frustration, allowing his body to collapse back onto the bed. He could still feel the warmth where Ellis had sat, suffusing into his lower back.

"My idea was more fun."
Nick propped himself up on a pillow, and his bad leg was stretched out off the mattress, foot balanced on the chair he'd previously tripped over. The position suspended his calf in the air, and Ellis kneeled next to it, hand-towel in one hand and a dish full of water between his knees.

Ellis tossed the cloth over his shoulder, freeing his hands up so he could reach and start undoing the bandages tucked just beneath Nick's knee. He didn't pay too much attention to the air of suffering radiating off the man laid face-down on the bed.

He was practically sulking, and he'd seemingly thrown himself at Ellis' mercy like a martyr on the pyre.

The bandages didn't uncoil so much as they peeled away, stiff with dried blood. Ellis tried to be gentle, but also go quick enough so as to not draw it out. Even if Nick held his silence stubbornly, the tendons under his knee twitched perceptibly as pain made them jump.

"Sorry." Ellis apologized, getting only more silence in return. It wasn't like he liked causing the man pain - but if he didn't do this, he didn't think Nick would. He sighed a bit, under his breath, but was undaunted. Peeling away the bandages, his nose crinkled a bit at the state of Nick's leg.

The skin was mostly smooth around the clotted scabs that had built up, marred by the occasional strip of raw red-pink where the bandages had pulled away skin. The only comfort he took was that it was shallow, and it didn't bleed much as he revealed it.

His concern laid more in the clear liquid seeping from some of the deeper sections, mostly around where the acid had made skin had bubble up in slim patches of raised flesh, like welts. That, and the faint red streaks snaking up the side of Nick's legs.

He knew enough from dealing with Keith to recognize the signs of an infection. He frowned, continuing to unwrap the bandages until he'd gotten Nick's leg entirely freed. "Man, I dunno. It don't look great. You feelin' okay…?"

Nick's voice was muffled. And annoyed. "I was going to feel great." Unsurprised, Ellis merely shook his head. He knew perfectly well what he'd stopped from happening, and knew perfectly well that Nick's face-down position had been adopted, at least partially, to disguise the fact his slacks were still tented.

Not that that was bound to last long, considering the pain caused by Ellis' examination.

He tugged the dirty bandages free of Nick's ankle, tossing them to the ground with a thoughtful glance. Nick had been right on one count; they were running out of bandages, and they definitely didn't have enough to cover the wounds. Neither could they do a patch-job like they'd done with Ellis' forearm.

The swathe of damage was just too big.

"Nick." he sighed out, voice tinged with a note of plea. "We gotta do this."

A faint grumbled phrase was lost in Nick's pillow, inaudible, and then he returned the younger man's sigh. "Yeah." was his vague acquiescence, body shifting faintly without moving his leg. "It hurts. What do you want me to say? Christ."
Ellis nodded his head slightly, then tilted it, gazing thoughtfully at the slope of Nick's calf before he reached up to tug the handtowel off his shoulder. "Guess puttin' on that anti-biotic shit didn't really help too much." He carefully dipped it in the dish he'd filled with water, letting the fabric soak for a moment. "Maybe it'd be real worse if we hadn't, though."

Nick grunted, hearing the sound of water pattering as Ellis lifted up the cloth. "Not sure it's meant for a fucking acid burn." He shifted his arms to clench his hands on his forearms, squeezing the pillow between his biceps hard enough to crush it in preparation for the pain. Ellis noticed the movement, a sympathetic twist at the edge of his mouth.

"I'll go fast." he promised, folding the cloth into a square and gripping it against his palm. "Sorry." Water trickled down his forearm, scattering on the carpet, and Ellis leaned in to swipe it along the edge of the wound testingly.

The older man's leg clenched, but if it hurt too badly, he wasn't about to let on. Even so, his lack of a vocal response attested to the genuine pain he must've been in. Ellis felt a small clench in his chest. He steeled himself, focusing on cleaning the wound.

It was worse near the center, where the skin was bubbled and welted. There, Nick did utter something when Ellis forced himself to wipe the area with a firm hand; it amounted to a slurred, "Godfuckshit."

A tiny split tore itself over the welted flesh as Ellis' cloth brushed past, and a liquid oozed out like he'd lanced a boil.

The Georgian raised his brows a little, turning the towel to examine it and the liquids of various consistencies and colours that now marred the threads. "Sick." he uttered under his breath, in a tone full of curiosity and interest rather than any kind of disgust.

"What?" Nick hissed out, urgently, and Ellis had to remind himself he'd spoken aloud.

"Uh, nothin'. Nothin'." He folded it over to a different side, returning his attention to Nick's calf. Daubing carefully, he attacked the site until he'd cleared it of pus.

Every touch made the gambler shiver, to varying degrees, and he spoke through a tightly clenched jaw. "It felt a lot -" A huff of pain interrupted him there as Ellis pressed his palm against the towel, flat to his calf, a firm pressure applied before he peeled it away again. "- better before you started touching it."

Ellis tipped his head sympathetically, swinging his gaze up to look toward the older man. Nick's body was in a position stiffer than a plank, shoulders trembling softly. He gave him a break - but just as long as it took him to dip the towel back into the water, re-wetting it. Red dissipated into the dish, staining the water.

"That ain't really a good thing, Nick. Yuh can't just ignore it."

The gambler didn't give that a response, though that may have had to do with Ellis returning his attention to his leg. He didn't intentionally go on the attack to prove his point, but the swipe of his cloth was enough to shut Nick up.

He tried to clean around the scabbing stretches of flesh, figuring they were better off left alone. There was, however, loose and browning flesh and crusted blood that he tried to abrade off without applying more pressure than necessary. Ellis could hear Nick breathing in ragged inhales and exhales, and the Southerner chewed at the inside of his cheek.
He felt guilty. Necessary or no, listening to Nick suffer wasn't something he enjoyed.

It was only stubbornness that kept Ellis going, working from knee to ankle, cleaning the residue and sweat off. It wasn't perfect, but it was better than nothing.

Ellis surveyed the wound critically, giving some final attention to the deepest sections before leaning away. The older man didn't utter a word as Ellis swapped the cloth into his other hand and reached into the deep pocket of his coveralls, drawing out the tube of ointment he'd found in one of the bathrooms.

At least antibiotic gel was ubiquitous in most households.

"Well… can't hurt tuh keep puttin' it on."

He uncapped it, and after a moment of thought, fist ed it in his hand and tipped it over Nick's calf. Ellis squeezed like he meant to empty the entire thing out. The gambler jumped slightly as it hit his leg and curled into spools of lukewarm opaque gel, grumbling a protest.

"Yeah, it can."

Smiling a little, despite himself, Ellis drew the handtowel back up and used a clean, drier edge to smear the antibiotic liberally. He didn't bother to aim for any particular spots this time, trying to get it anywhere and everywhere.

For all Nick's complaints, the conman was at least cooperative.

The pain must have been lessened, because Nick managed a full question without huffing or stumbling, though his voice was taut. "Where'd you find water, anyway? Thought the power was out."

Ellis stopped mid-motion, mouth gawping open in thought. He'd already decided against sharing that piece of information - so he failed to answer, forcing out a casual, "Uh, hang on. Gotta grab somethin'.", hoping Nick would get distracted in the meantime.

He was also hoping the gambler wouldn't notice the toilet's tank lid had been removed in the hallway bathroom.

Ellis got to his feet, dropping the cloth into the bowl with a wet slap and brushing his hands off against one another. He worked his way over to the dresser in the corner of the room, maneuvering by candlelight, and started to rifle through its contents.

He'd had the thought while looking for supplies to clean Nick's wound. Wrapping the injured leg in a shirt would keep it protected, at the least. It wasn't exactly sanitary, but the house and its contents were pretty clean, all things considered.

Whoever had lived there must have packed and left, because there wasn't much left beyond some socks and a few scattered articles of clothing. Ellis' eyes landed on a grey undershirt, grabbing it and inspecting it.

The room was too dim to get a good look. He turned to step closer to the candle nearby and squinted, trying to ascertain if the shirt was clean enough for his purposes.

"Really?"

When Nick spoke, it was more composed than before. Ellis jolted his head up a little, looking toward the bed, and Nick had turned his head to gaze toward him. His eyes were on the shirt in a critical slant, clearly disapproving.

Releasing a soft sigh, Ellis sniffed at the undershirt in his hands. It smelled clean, looked clean… "Best we got." He said it thoughtfully - like he wasn't completely convinced himself - then met Nick's gaze and offered a reassuring smile.

The other man's eyes ticked over his mouth, musingly, before the gambler slumped back down against his pillow in silent resignation. "… Fine, fine."

That made Ellis laugh as he folded the shirt into half. It was soft, and subtle, finding the gambler's quiet and persistent agitation endearing. "Sorry. I looked fer bandages, but I dunno if they got enough Band-Aids fer this."

"I miss hospitals." Nick muttered as a retort, tone almost scathing. "And I never thought I'd say that."

Walking back to his place on the carpet, Ellis bent over and examined Nick's leg, thoughtfully looking between it and the shirt in his hands. "It'll be okay, Nick." he promised, ignoring the other man's scoffing exhale. "I ain't gonna let'cha get hurt." Ellis draped the shirt over Nick's calf, laying it down lightly.

He kneeled, working on tying it off by the sleeves and the bottom edges. Nick grunted a little as he drew the knots tight, and Ellis looked over his work with some satisfaction.

Some.

He'd have loved to give Nick better treatment, but at least he felt like he'd done something. He set his hands on his hips, fingertips rubbing at the fabric of his dirty coveralls. "A'ight. That's it - feel any better?"

Nick's response was expected and shot back instantly. "No." Ellis merely watched, head tilting, as the older man coiled his body away from the bed. Pressing the knee of his bad leg against the edge of the mattress, Nick maneuvered his other foot to the ground and made to stand up.

When he wobbled, Ellis was instantly to his side, catching an arm around his waist and ensuring he didn't fall. His presence made Nick stiffen slightly, but the gambler merely leaned against him long enough to slide his wounded leg off the chair and straighten it out.

He tested his weight on it and glared down at the grey fabric swathed around his lower leg, a scowl creeping onto his face. Ellis felt his heart sink a little at the look - he hadn't expected Nick to be enthused, but… he'd tried.

It must have shown on his face. When Nick glanced at him, green eyes scanning that expression, it was with a long-suffering sigh. Their argument came swarming back, all at once, and it was past a frustrated, stubborn feeling that Nick made himself take a breath.

Reluctantly, Nick reached down to grasp at his pantleg. He shuffled it, shaking it out of the messy fold it had taken above his knee, and let it fall down around his lower leg. It just barely fit around the makeshift bandages, and it was bulged around his calf, but he managed. "… Yeah. It's better. Thanks, Ace."

Ellis lifted his chin, breaking into a pleased grin - but Nick was faster, tipping his head to catch the younger man in a kiss. He muffled anything Ellis might have said in return, and the kid only seemed at a loss for an instant before he returned it, lips warm as they locked with Nick's.
Nick just wanted to shut him up. He didn't want to talk; didn't want to say more than he'd already said.

It was Ellis who drew his hand up Nick's side, grazing fingertips to grip at his ribs through his dress shirt. His hand suffused warmth, and it slowly crept up until it could rest against Nick's chest. Something shifted in their embrace when it settled there, soft and affectionate.

Almost reflexively, Nick turned into the younger man, an arm slipping forward to circle around his waist and draw him closer. Their bodies fit together, familiar; Ellis fit to him effortlessly. _Wanted_ to fit against him.

He didn't want to think about it, or the feeling it spawned, the _clench_ - in his gut.

His chest.

It was a cold feeling… and then, suddenly, hot.

They stood there, faces pressed close, and Nick wanted so badly to deepen the kiss to something more. He would have given anything to take them to the ground, to fuck him until every wild emotion made sense -

Ellis broke the kiss, suddenly, though he moved like it hurt to pull away. Those blue eyes just barely opened as he did, his expression masked by the cast shadows of the dim candlelight. It took a moment for him to lift his chin, matching Nick's gaze. His eyes were warm, melted.

"They're waitin' downstairs… We, uh -"

Nick nodded before he even really registered the words, cutting Ellis off with the motion. His arm slipped away, followed shortly by his body. Separating settled something back into place in his mind. Control, maybe.

"Yeah." was all he said, and his voice was low, but mild.

He felt calm, for the first time since he'd nearly been speared through the chest in the gas station. Calm like the feeling of downing that first shot of whiskey, or taking that first puff off a fresh cigarette.

It should have shaken him, but he held onto it. He needed it.

Nick drew in a breath, focusing on taking a few steps away. His leg throbbed, sure, but the taut and stretched pain was gone, along with the crust and residue Ellis had cleaned off his wound. When it didn't fail under him, Nick moved for the door.

He was aware of Ellis lagging behind him, kneeling down to the carpet to pick up the bowl and the bandages, cleaning the mess they'd created.

Nick waited.
Ellis and Nick returned downstairs in single file. Although he walked with a limp, Nick did so mostly to ensure he didn't stress the 'bandage' wrapped around his calf. Otherwise, there was a lightness to his movements.

He was in a significantly better mood than he'd been in when he'd left.

"Hey, boys." Rochelle greeted them from across the room. She was perched on the edge of the dining table, a candle-adorned plate cradled in her hands. Hot wax had dribbled down onto the plate's surface, and she was in the midst of gently prodding at a few beads of the semi-solid substance.

Nick gave a casual nod, slipping his hands into the pockets of his slacks as he moved. He had his suit jacket tossed over a shoulder. "Hey doll. Any news on food?"

Rochelle glanced up, her brows lifting in slight surprise. She'd expected Nick to be furious when next she saw him. She cocked her head to one side, gaze sliding toward Ellis for just an instant before she questioned, "Ellis did tell you, right?"

"About the power? Yeah, sure." The gambler shrugged his shoulders, crossing the room toward the table. He grabbed ahold of a chair and flipped it around, straddling the back of it and crossing his arms on the dining table. "There's got to be some shit in the pantry or something."

Ellis followed after him carefully, sticking his hands in his pockets. He gave Rochelle a cautious little smile, reassuringly.

"Well," she responded cautiously, blinking once at Ellis before returning her gaze to Nick. She thumbed over her shoulder toward the kitchen, and Nick noticed the shuffling and tinkling of what must've been Coach hunting around. "Coach wanted to fix us up supper. Guess he's still feeling a little guilty."

Ellis immediately gave a frown, lifting a hand to paw at his cap. He approached the table to pull out a chair of his own, flopping down into it limply and lifting up to set his bootee against the edge of the table.

"But we ain't mad at him… He didn't do nothin'."

Rochelle laughed gently, lowering her voice and her gaze. She set a hand flat on her cheek, and the scabbed clawmarks that traced from her jaw to her cheekbone. "Of course we aren't. But guilt doesn't always make a lot of sense."

Nick lifted up one hand, setting his knuckles against his cheek. He arched a brow lazily, almost closing his eyes. "If it gets me food, he can guilt himself into an early grave."

Rochelle shot him a threatening look, clucking her tongue slightly as if considering taking a swipe at him. She turned at the waist, merely placing the candle down on the table, and sighed. "Ass."

"Hungry ass." the gambler corrected her, smirk lingering.
Rolling her eyes, Rochelle focused on Ellis, leaning a little toward him. She smiled gently at him, fingertips rolling a drop of wax into an uneven ball. "He'll be okay, Ellis. Don't feel too bad. Sometimes you just have to wrestle your own demons."

The kid deepened his frown a little, sighing softly and lifting up his arms to cross them behind his head. He nuzzled back onto his forearms, closing his eyes with a slowly relaxing expression. "Guess so.. man. Wish we could cheer him up."

Coach's deep voice came from the kitchen, startling them all. It was probably silly to think the big man hadn't heard them talking, but they'd figured there was enough distance between them. "Y'all wanna make me feel better, start eatin'."

There was a chuckle to the edge of his voice. As much as there was a little chastisement to the shortness of his interruption, he seemed in a good enough mood as he walked into the dining room.

He'd taken a wide cooking pan as a makeshift tray, cradling it on a flat palm. On one side was a pile of sandwiches, cut into triangular halves like it might make them more attractive. Ellis could only guess what they were at first, but as the big man got closer to the table, the creamy smell of tuna struck his nose.

The other side of the pan was stacked with saltines, smooshed together like Oreos with peanut butter between the crispy squares. Four cans of soda lined the middle of the pan in a little arrangement. There was something careful and deliberate about the arrangement - like Coach had worried over it.

It was Nick who started the cheer. He gave a surprisingly sincere "Heey!" and lifted up his hands to give a slow clap, one that Rochelle and Ellis joined immediately, applauding the eldest's efforts with a little chipper 'whoop!'.

Coach laughed in a booming baritone, his expression almost embarrassed as he stepped up to set the pan down on the center of the table. He waved them off, grinning, gesturing to the makeshift supper. "There was some shit in the cabinets. Canned tuna, peanut butter.. soda was in the fridge. Warm, but figure y'all don't mind. Ain't no four-star restaurant, but it'll get us through."

"Awesome job, Coach." Rochelle murmured, smiling brightly as she tucked a loose braid behind her ear. He met her gaze, and there was a warmth between them.

Ellis was bursting with excitement before he'd even gotten his hands on any of it. "This's great, man! Muh mama used tuh make sandwiches like this - hoh man, I ain't been this hungry since - hoh man!" He started to scramble up from his seat, reaching out his hands.

"Whoa, whoa, kid." Nick lifted up an arm from the back of his chair, firmly waving Ellis to stillness. The younger man blinked at him, starting to lean back, confused as to just why he was being chided.

"Whoa, whoa, kid." Nick lifted up an arm from the back of his chair, firmly waving Ellis to stillness. The younger man blinked at him, starting to lean back, confused as to just why he was being chided.

Leave it to Nick to snatch up the sandwich Ellis had been clearly aiming for with a snarky grin. "Higher IQ eats first."

"'Ey!" Ellis yelped in protest, vaulting straight up from his chair and charging the distance between them. The kid got an arm around Nick's neck and grabbed onto his sandwich-gripping wrist, wrestling it away from his mouth just as he'd went to take a bite.

Nick outright laughed as the Georgian tackled him, choking a little and twisting to elbow Ellis in the stomach. With his chair spun around, he quite nearly toppled backwards, hooking his good leg with the chair's to keep himself up. "Hey! Hey! Get off, ya smelly hick! You're ruining my suit!"

"Yer suit's way gone, man! Gimme my sandwich!" Ellis retorted, grinning hugely as he deflected the elbow with a little squirm to the side. Nick fought him, snapping at the air as he tried to get a bite off the edge of the wide triangle of bread and tuna.

Rochelle and Coach could only look on in slightly bemused silence. They traded a glance, and the woman responded with a shrug and smile, as if to say 'they get along sometimes, I guess'. Coach rolled his eyes, resigning to a chuckle.

"You gimme my sandwich or I'll steal all'uv'em 'n' you can see how yer IQ fills you up!" the kid railed, voice only just fending off the laughter tickling over his expression. He whipped his free hand at Nick's head, but the gambler dodged it.

"Okay! Okay! Just get off and I'll hand it over, jeez!" he complained, shoving at Ellis again. The kid gave a satisfied harrumpf and stepped away, releasing Nick's wrist and neck slowly.

Lifting up with an affronted shake of his shoulders, Nick sloowwly straightened his collar and sloowwly patted down his torso with his free hand, sloowwly raking fingers through his hair to make sure Ellis hadn't mussed him up any more than the apocalypse already did -

And then took a huge bite of the sandwich in his hand, chewing with slow appreciation.

Rochelle burst into laughter as Ellis gawped at Nick's cat-who-ate-the-canary smile, Coach joining an instant later, shaking his head. "Y'all calm yo' asses down, we got plenty of food."

"Yuh - you ate muh -!" Ellis stuttered, huff-puffing as he stared at Nick's chewing mouth.

"Uh-huh." Nick confirmed, wiping a little fleck of tuna off the corner of his lips with a knuckle and sucking it off. "It was good, too."

Coach picked up a sandwich with a sigh, leaning over the table to stick it straight in front of Ellis' nose. It took the mechanic just a second, but the smell overwhelmed his disbelief, and with a little sigh, Ellis took it from him and shoved the whole thing into his mouth.

It was Coach's turn to look shocked, staring at Ellis' chipmunk-cheeks as he ravenously chewed. The kid's baby blues blinked back at him innocently - though he at least had the manners to put his wrist over his mouth.

"If Ellis can do it, so can I." Rochelle claimed, just before cramming an entire sandwich in her mouth.

She nearly choked, less from the mouthful and more from blushing laughter as her actions tickled all three of her male companions to stitches. The mere concept of full bellies and real food was drugging.

Nick laughed more than any of his teammates had seen, maybe ever. It was something honest and raw, revealed within the safety of the private company, stowed away from the cruel realities outside the house. He tried to lean over and prod Rochelle's cheek, forcing her to fend him off with batting hands and muffled squeaks.

That was pretty much how the whole meal went. They didn't quite realize how starved they were until they smelled that pure, savoury scent of tuna, so tantalizingly spread between bread slices. And they didn't realize how good they felt until they were in the middle of devouring it.
The saltines went just as fast, peanut butter washed down with eager sips of soda. Nick seemed to hesitate at first, a little crinkle touching his nose at the sticky food, but hunger drove him forward.

Between bites, Ellis rambled. Half of them were - and Nick was surprised at himself for recognizing this - stories he'd told before, disastrous Keith adventures and their antics around Savannah.

But there was reminiscing, too. It wasn't melancholy or longing - he chirped blithely as he talked, drawl pleasant and expression moreso. No one tried to stop him, not tonight. If anything, they prompted him, questioned him, encouraged him.

He beamed the whole way through.

"This's just like when muh mama 'n' Keith 'n' his parents'd get tuhgether at the park 'n' have picnics 'n' shit - awh, man, only time I didn't see his parents stressed out.. they were real nice folks, they were, s'just bein' parents tuh Keith wasn't no easy thing. Not with him havin' two other brothers! Aw, man, Paul 'n' Riley are just the coolest. Riley's just like ten, but he's got the craziest mouth, man! Learns all his cusses from Keith, I swear. Paul's real level-headed, got all this sense. Think he stole it all, so Keith'n'Riley didn't get none! But Riley never did hang around us too much 'cause he's liable tuh get hurt, y'know.. - oah, I never mentioned Riley before? Aw, well, he done gone tuh his aunt's over in Colorado when Keith's parents passed away, but he comes back sometimes. Heh.. he likes playin' tag. Pretends he's all rough'n'tumble, but fact is, I ain't never seen that kid without him beggin' tuh play tag with me! Haw. Good thing I like tag, too."

Coach scanned slowly over all three of them with a happy twinkle to those deepset eyes. Maybe he stole a little bit of his football team back, seeing them all so happy - or maybe a little bit of his family. Maybe both.

Ellis wound down as the food did. His voice faded out, focus growing distant as he happily examined the little bulge to his belly.

Nick stood up from his chair and picked up his suit jacket from where it lay over the seat. "Okay," he admitted, reaching into his pocket. He pulled out his slightly crumpled cigarette box, prying one last stick from the broken cardboard. He'd wasted a good number, just self-soothing with them unlit between his lips while he had no matches to light them.

He stepped around Rochelle's seat, the woman watching him curiously, and bent down to light it on the slowly melting candle.

The cigarette slipped between his lips, and he puffed in a heavy breath and turned his head away to blow the smoke off in another direction. Nobody denied him the pleasure. "Maybe the apocalypse can have its good moments, too."

Coach chuckled lowly, resting his hands on his stomach and leaning back in his chair. "You in a good mood, Nick? Good to see."

"Temporarily." the gambler uttered with a teasing half-smirk, popping his lips on his cigarette with a groan of barely withheld pleasure as the nicotine sung through his veins. "Makes me miss homecooked meals, but ... not too badly."

"You cook?" Rochelle questioned with an edge of honest curiousity. Nick nodded with a shrug, a little casual edge to it.

The gambler rolled his cigarette between his knuckles, relaxed. "Yeah. My uncle was obsessed with his Italian roots - guess he thought I needed to learn how to cook. I can run the pasta gauntlet pretty well, couple other tricks. Enough to eat."

She gave him a fairly fascinated blink, Ellis' head lifting up drowsily to do the same. They were all acutely aware of how valuable information about Nick was - so rarely given out. "I never was that good in the kitchen -" She added as he started to smirk: "Stereotypes aside."

But she smiled back. Ellis was contagious - her chocolate-shadowed eyes lit up as she spoke, no sorrow in the recollection of her loved ones. "Jacob does all the cooking. Even got him a little flowery apron one Christmas.. as a joke, of course, but he wore it. He looks so cute in it."

"You know any Italian, Nick?" Coach, with a chuckle to his voice, questioned.

Nick smirked at the words, rolling his eyes with a little wave of his wrist in a negatory gesture. "I didn't care that much. Just enough to pay attention to the food talk. And understand when he was yelling at me."

Ellis' attention didn't waver, insistently curious, sleepy eyes blinking up toward Nick with an utterly enraptured glimmer. "C'mon, Nick..." He looked about to fall asleep, exhausted from all the excitement and the food. They all did.

Nick glanced up at him, lids lowering as he pulled a slow drag on his cigarette. He was silent, for just a subtle moment, then offered, "Okay, sure - saccente. Means 'smart-ass,' more or less. His favorite nickname for me. You can probably get why."

"That's so neat.." Ellis drawled, squirming a little to get more comfortable as he set his cheek against his own shoulder. His body flopped slightly, voice lowering. "Man.. I dunno if I got any roots or nothin' like that.."

The conman snorted into his cigarette, closing his eyes as he succumbed to the hot pleasure burning against his lower lip. "Pure 100% redneck, I'm sure.. gasoline and beer flowing through your veins."

When Ellis didn't retort, the gambler smirked. "...What? No cityslicker retorts? I'm disappointed." Coach's gruff clear-of-the-throat was the only response, and Nick reopened his eyes, arching a brow. The big man was nodding towards Ellis, and Nick glanced over.

The kid was fast asleep, already nearly drooling into his shoulder with the clumsy slump of his head.

Nick wanted to laugh.

Rochelle rested an elbow against the table, smiling over at him. Her eyes softened, practically fawning her gaze over the dozing shape of his face. "... Probably time to get bunked up, anyway." she murmured in a low tone, though Ellis didn't look about to stir anytime soon. "Can you get him upstairs, Nick, or do you want some help?"

The gambler shrugged a shoulder, adopting a fairly blank expression. "He's a kid.. I got it."

Tucking his cigarette into the corner of his mouth and tossing his suit jacket around his neck, Nick walked over to Ellis' chair, leaning down to get an arm under Ellis' knees and one under his arms. Hauling him up, Nick made sure his head flopped away so the Georgian didn't drool on his shoulder. That capped head obeyed limply, mouth hanging open as a little sleepy mumble escaped him, half-stirring.
Nick glanced at Coach and Rochelle, giving a roll of his eyes as he adjusted his grip on the younger man's frame and gave a little smoke-wreathed sigh. "See you two assclowns in the morning."

Rochelle waved at him, entertained. Coach just shook his head with a chuckle and turned his gaze down toward the dining table. Nick didn't linger much - just carried Ellis back toward the stairs.

He wasn't all that heavy, although Nick's shoulders complained in a dull ache. The staircase was a little tough, with Nick's leg still acting up, but the conman trudged through it with a stiff jaw. He'd left the guest bedroom door open behind them, so it was just a matter of carrying Ellis through the doorway.

Nick shut it with his foot, gently, sighing as his gaze alighted on the bed. He stood there for just a moment, staring. They hadn't discussed the sleeping arrangements, and now Ellis was unconscious.

... oh for chrissakes, don't be a dick, Nick. Just give him the goddamn bed.

What, did he have an angel on his shoulder now?

Resigned, Nick carried Ellis to the bed after turning the lock on the door with an awkwardly twisted hand. He nudged the blanket out of the way and set the younger man down on the mattress. Straightening, the gambler glanced down at him, examining the limply sprawled body.

The candle had burned itself low, darkening the light even further. It lent a warm glow to the room, and to Ellis' skin. Nick found himself reaching down a hand, a knuckle touching down the shape of the kid's cheek, tracing a little bruise with it.

He was as soft and warm as he looked...

Turning his wrist a little, Nick let his fingertips shift to a slight cradle on the man's cheek. He could have slid down and kissed him - he wanted to. There, he froze, staring at his own hand like it had betrayed him.

What are you even doing, huh? He didn't even have the energy to enthusiastically yell at himself in his own head. It came out like a tired whine. Looking for a replacement? Just because your bitch wife left you doesn't give you the right to -

Ellis mumbled a little, incoherently, turning his face into the warmth against his cheek. Nick blinked when a little drool from the edge of Ellis' mouth dampened the side of his thumb. He pulled his hand away reflexively, and slowly wiped it on his shirt.

... Who are you kidding with this shit, Nick?

"I need some sleep." Nick sighed, under his breath. He bent forward to pull the blanket over Ellis' body, watching the Georgian roll against the soft layer with another mumble… then still. He didn't look completely content; he more appeared too exhausted to move.

The gambler retreated to the end of the bed, dropping down to the carpet there. It wasn't completely uncomfortable, although he knew his back would hate him the next morning. He folded his suit jacket into a pillow, setting it down on the ground, and let himself crawl stiffly down to the floor.

Sprawling out on his back after putting his cigarette out on the footboard of the bed, he settled his head on the lump of fabric and closed his eyes. A small sigh escaped him, that determined noise that relaxed his muscles for sleep.
He needed to sleep.

The thing was...

Rest didn't come. He lay there, comfortable in his position and his satisfied stomach and the cigarette smell still lingering on his lips and in his lungs... and his mind blankly stared into oblivion with a very blunt resistance to sleep. He felt it, like a cloud, a buzzing anxiety that rose to fill the silence around him.

... Fuck.

Did he have to count sheep? Sing himself a lullaby? Was sleep really going to hide from him on that night, of all nights? Time ticked by like molasses. Agitation revived his usual, energetic self-beratement.

_Goddamnit, go to sleep. You ate. You have a lot of shit to do tomorrow. Go to sleep, you fucking piece of shit._

Silence answered him - but a roaring silence, rudely sharpening his senses as he listened to the nothingness all around him. It should have lulled him to sleep. Instead, it only seemed to stir him further.

_Godka-

"Nnhm." sleepily drawled from the bed above him. Just a little, innocent, mid-sleep noise, reacting to whatever dream bounced in Ellis' head. Nick's eyes flashed open, staring at the shadowed ceiling as his attention perked for the sound.

A little sigh huffed out of the Georgian, drowsy and quiet.

Nick fought the thought that popped into his head. He fought it hard, refusing to even let it coherently form past a trailing _Maybe_. It made him tense where he lay, fingers curling slowly into fists - the pressure building like a coiling spring until he burst.

Silently, the conman got a grip on the footboard of the bed and pulled himself up off the floor. He kicked his shoes off with a firm jerk, toe to heel, and crossed to the side of the bed.

Without a word, he tugged up the blanket and crawled into the bed beside the kid. Rather than hesitate or move cautiously, he threw all concept of sneaking out the window and just shoved his arms around Ellis, dragging the sleeping man into a close embrace from behind.

There was only so much room on the single bed, but it was enough, and forced them close together.

Ellis didn't even stir beyond a little nudge of his head and a vague sigh that melted him back into Nick's arms. The blanket settled slowly over both of them, gently falling upon the slopes and edges of their spooning frames.

As Nick's mouth settled against the back of his head, slow inhale dragging in the cloying notes of sweat at the base of Ellis' neck, the conman discovered something incredibly frustrating:

He fell asleep almost effortlessly.

Chapter End Notes
He came to awareness in a hospital room -

No.

_The_ hospital room.

He knew that instantly; he knew, somehow, exactly where he was. It was this intrinsic awareness before he'd even opened his eyes.

"You don't - understand! I need to know where she is!"

IVs tied him to the bed. A cast protected the broken bones of arm. The sheets strangled his breath, too tight, too clinging, swaddled like bonds on his aching body -

Then they were gone.

He got up.

"I don't fucking care how fucking injured I FUCKING AM, GIVE ME A GODDAMN PHONE!"

He started toward the door. It was closed before, but now it was open, and he walked through it with a slow determination. He knew what he was walking toward, but he couldn't control himself. Couldn't stop.

"Angel.. pick up.. Angel.. for fuck's sake.. for fuck's sake pick up.."

The hospital was empty and that made no sense.

If only sense mattered.

"Christ. Christ. Shit. Where are you?!"

The helplessness. The anger. The terror. It was a smoky fog and it drowned him, and everything turned dark and cramped. His vision blurred. He started running down the hallway but he hurt -

He tasted blood and he hurt -

"I -"

She was there, at the end of the hallway. Crying into her hands, curly locks a mess on her head and trailing down onto heaving, dark shoulders.

Nick wanted to hold her. Just one more time.

She was right in front of him.

He reached out.

His fingertips touched the thick hair that fell around her shoulders. Just brushed it, tenderly, fingers trembling as if she might disappear. Her hair was soft and smelled like cloying perfume.

Her crying stopped.
Nick couldn’t breathe as she slipped to her feet. Slowly turned to face him.

Lifted her chin.

"I don’t..."

Those familiar features were sunken.

Pale.

Bare as the gleaming bone of a skull, eyes burning red.

A mouth of needlepoint teeth opened to shriek as she slashed out with the brutal claws that had replaced her fingers. She tore open his chest and he stood there, ripped clean to pieces and all he could say was a vague “I don’t understand."

Nick woke up and the nightmare broke like a crack of lightning, but the bedroom was dark. Pitch dark - black like the roiling shadows that clouded at his perception.

A burning fervor tore into every inch of his half-curled body. He was shivering - but sweating, lungs struggling to expand in his chest. Something was touching him and he panicked, trying to pull away and escape it, blindly.

But it was Ellis.

Just Ellis.

Suddenly, the breath that had been torn from his body returned, and Nick gasped silently to calm a wrenching stomach and a spinning head. Struggling, the gambler got upright, pushing his back against the headboard of the bed and clamping a hand over his mouth to try and soothe himself.

His fingers shook and green eyes stared sightlessly into the dark, shadows burnt with the image of that shark-toothed face. His other hand traced down his side, trying to confirm that his body was in one piece.

All the movement stirred Ellis from his sleep, limp body shifting gradually to drag his head up a little from the mattress. "Nick...?" he mumbled sleepily, rolling very slowly over to face Nick's warm body.

He scooched toward the embrace that had abandoned him. "Nick? Where..."

There was only so much space on the single bed, and Nick couldn't go far. He panted carefully, still and stiff as Ellis' arms drowsily found their way to frame his waist. That curly mop settled cheek-down on his chest, affectionately.

Nick didn't move, not an inch. His pulse pounded in his chest and his head, a haunting nausea and adrenaline making him swallow deeply, over and over. Ellis might have dozed back off had he not felt Nick's heart thudding frantically in his ear.

The kid slowly raised his chin, gaze blindly and blearily blinking toward Nick's face. He drawled, slowly, concern bleeding into his tone freely as he peeped into the silent dark with waning confidence. "Yuh 'kay..? Somethin' wrong?"

Nick's attention tore down to the Georgian, eyes just closing in the darkness. He forced himself to croak a response through his tension, tone taut. "Yes. No. ... Go back to sleep."
Ellis sighed softly, half in exhaustion and half in resignation. He laid there for a moment, silent, and then quietly nuzzled against the gambler's chest. Those worked arms tightened on Nick's torso, fingers winding in his shirt.

"Mhn.. Okay. 'M here if yuh need..."

He was already mostly gone, last words a vague mumble as his mind succumbed to sleep again, warm breath going steady and calm against Nick's chest. Ellis seemed content, laying there against him, drifting off.

The conman silently drew his arms around Ellis' neck, resting forearms on the muscled slopes that made up his shoulders, staring silently into the dark as he held the younger man close.

It took time to fall asleep again.
Only half-awake at the start of his yawn, Ellis found himself stretching deliciously as it petered out. A smile plastered easily across his face, skin humming with the close touch of Nick's body - the first real sensation Ellis felt, waking up. Those lightly clothed arms wrapped around him, embracing with all the tight need that Ellis had seen him clutch a pillow.

They'd slowly dragged him up Nick's chest, the older man's back half-propped against the headboard in a half sit, until his head nestled under the gambler's chin. Nick's arms held him there with a strangely conscious tension.

Ellis felt his chest tighten, smile widening with a drowsy affection.

He couldn't really recall what had happened past the fact he'd dozed off at the dinner table, but he could fill the blanks easily enough with their current situation. Nick must've carried him upstairs and tucked him in.

With him.

The room was dark when he lifted his head, squinting carefully to get a grip on his surroundings as his eyes adjusted. Ellis glanced back at Nick's face - he looked exhausted. Exaggerated by shadows, dark circles and the scruff of his stubble made him haggard and pale.

Some of Ellis' good mood tapered off, hesitant as he examined the sleeping expression of the gambler. Although Nick's arms had him a little trapped, Ellis wormed an arm free to reach up and touch fingertips to Nick's cheek.

He petted gently, calloused fingertips rustling over facial hair. With a little sigh, Ellis shook his head, sympathetically. "Man. Wish I could'uh gotten you that shower, Nick... yuh ain't lookin' too hot."

Ellis craned his head up, stretching to kiss Nick's forehead. His lips brushed between the conman's brows, a little guffaw escaping him as they twitched in recognition.

He nestled his forehead against the conman's, closing his eyes with a light sigh. For just a moment - a few, sparing seconds - he laid like that, enjoying the way their bodies laid together. The embrace was warm and soft. Nick supported him with a certain strength, both in his arms and the stability of his thick torso, and Ellis felt safe there.

He'd never really felt like that before. It left him giddy, but sleepily so.

Ellis moved to pull away reluctantly, head bobbing slightly, but the conman's arms suddenly tightened around him as they felt his frame shifting. Needily, like a little unconscious 'don't go.' Ellis' heart twisted up into knots.

"Yeah..." he confided in the sleeping gambler. "You'd hit me fer sayin' it, but yer pretty cute when yer asleep."

Waking him up was definitely not in Ellis' plan. The gambler was looking a little under the weather, even if his mood the night before had been unusually good, and Ellis wanted him to sleep as long as possible. Resolved, Ellis carefully started to extricate himself from Nick's embrace.

It was, he imagined, like wrestling an octopus.
Ellis couldn't help but grin as Nick's hands honestly fought his attempts to worm away, refusing to release him. Ellis got an arm free, reaching out to grip on the edge of the mattress and brace himself - but Nick just gripped fingers in his shirt, holding him fast.

He started to pull the fingers free from the fabric of his shirt, gently, but the conman's other arm encircled his waist and tightened. Nick seemed primed to just roll over on top of him and settle the matter entirely, his brows folded up in a certain discontent.

Ellis sighed after a moment, smiling, and he got a firm grip onto both of Nick's wrists. Forcing them away with a measured strength, the kid crawled himself sideways out from under the covers, wriggling his legs a bit to get free.

Nick seemed frustrated for an instant, rolling onto his side with an exhausted grunt as Ellis let his wrists go. As his body flopped down, he stilled, face turning into the mattress and frame suddenly going limp in defeat.

Ellis gave a bemused glance up his frame, breath catching just slightly at the gambler's starkly handsome, exhaustion-rugged face. Looking at him, Ellis couldn't help but think he looked lonely. Guilt struck at him just slightly, nagging. "... Here." he murmured down to the gambler, reaching over to the bedside table to pick his cap up from where Nick must've set it down.

He gently tucked it under one of Nick's hands, patting his fingers into a curl on it. "You watch it fer me again. So you don't wake up wonderin' where I am."

Smiling cheerily down to the unresponsive gambler, Ellis felt a distinct confidence swell in his chest at how he'd handled the situation. Pleased into a soft bob of his head, he carefully maneuvered around the bed.

He tiptoed to the doorway, and tested the knob. It opened with a soft click that betrayed the reversing of the lock mechanism, and he hummed a little bit as he slipped through and shut the door behind himself.

A soft pat of his hand on the closed door was his final goodbye to his sleeping lover.

The sounds of Coach and Rochelle speaking came softly up the stairwell and Ellis scampered down to find them, his socked feet padding on the stairs. They'd extinguished the candles for the morning, with the sun just starting to dust a low grey over the horizon, the light filtering in through mostly curtained windows.

Coach sat at the dining table, the group's guns laid out before him and his hands quietly working to reload them one by one from the ammo stash they had stowed away in their backpack. Behind him, Rochelle knelt on the carpet, a grey T-shirt having replaced her torn Depeche Mode one. She fiddled with the pink fabric, seeming reluctant, her gaze soft on it.

"Of course, Coach... heck, I -"

Ellis' approach made her stop, lifting her head to smile easily at him. "Hey, sweetheart! You sleep well?"

He nodded enthusiastically, rubbing at his neck as he walked. He padded up to the table, retrieving his boots from the floor. "Mmhm! Sure did." As he scooped them up, he dropped down into a chair, bending to start worming his feet into his workboots. "Whut're y'all talkin' about?"

Coach chuckled lowly, shaking his head as he loaded bullets into one of the rifles. "Just chattin' - wonderin' if we're gonna keep in touch after we get safe. The closer we get, the more it's on my mind. Got our own families to get back to, but we sorta made a new one here."

Ellis' blue eyes blinked wider in a fair bit of shock, surprised by the words. He kicked his heel a little against the carpet, wiggling his ankle to settle his foot flat in his boot, shaking his head emphatically. "Shit, Coach. 'Course we're gonna stay tuhgether! We're tight, man! I can't wait tuh tell Keith all the crazy stuff we've done. Y'all are gonna love meetin' Keith'n'muh mama! They'll love y'all. I wanna meet your families, too."

Rochelle laughed gently, setting her shirt down on her lap and reaching up to adjust her hairtie with careful fingers. "That's how I feel. I want Jacob to meet the people who saved my life."

"Baby girl, I'm gonna give yo' man a shake for dealin' wit' you." Coach teased, setting the rifle down and rubbing hands over his face in a casual kind of exhaustion.

"We'll be like'uh big extended family." Ellis chirped, pleased, setting both his now booted feet onto the floor. He gripped onto his knees, smiling between the two. "You guys 'n' Nick 'n' me 'n' all our families 'n' friends - man, I'm excited already!"

Coach's eyes darkened slightly as his brows settled, his chin lowering and spreading shadows over his face. He returned his attention to the guns on the table, reaching out to idly straighten one.

Ellis leaned a little back in his chair, head tilting slightly as he noticed the big man's sudden change. He frowned just momentarily, concerned, and tossed up a hand questioningly. "Coach? You alright, man?"

The football coach nodded shortly over his shoulder, letting his hand fall flat over the rifle's stock. "Yeah, son. Ain't important."

"Well, sure!" he protested, tone drawling with reassurance. He cuffed his own nose, sniffing a little, brows furrowing. "You saw him last night - we had a great time!"

Coach gazed at the kid for a moment, in silence, deepset eyes resigned in their focus. Ellis shifted a little under the stare, discomfort rising as the first tickle of second-guessing threatened at the edges of his mind.

"He's part'uv our family too." Ellis insisted, confusion setting his teeth on edge. He could read the doubt on Coach's face - the sympathy, almost, like Ellis was being naive. "Whut, Coach, you sayin' that he's gonna just drop us or somethin'?"

The big man lifted up his hands in a quick soothing motion, shaking his head wearily. "Now, son, I ain't dissin' the man. I'd like us to be friends. Just don't want you gettin' yo' hopes up if he don't wanna hang around like we do."

Rochelle got to her feet. Her brows were furrowed, body poised to interrupt, but Ellis was already taking a step forward and gesturing out a hand. Discomfort flicked, with a burn like the spark of flint on steel, to agitation. He felt his fingers curling slightly against his palms, a weird heat touching his cheeks.

He got angry.

"You ain't bein' fair. He ain't even done nothin' wrong - so he ain't always been nice, so he's got his temper. Nick's gotten real close tuh us, but whut - you think he'd just up'n leave us once we got safe?"

Coach sighed heavily, tone lowering to a gruff rumble. He seemed exhausted more than anything. "He's got pride, son. Don't always let us recognize who matters. Just sayin' - if I understand him any, he might just want to leave. Ain't always easy to admit you needed help."

Ellis' face flushed just a little more, unused to the frustration coursing through him. The ex-football player's words scared him, a sudden, previously untouched train of thought occurring to him. Adrenaline raced through him, and then a lopsided nausea.

Surely he'd stay with them. There was no way Nick would leave them.

"After all we been through .. 'n' you.. man, I can't believe you'd say somethin' like that! I -!" Ellis started, his voice raising, fully intent on arguing to the end… but Rochelle suddenly reached out and grasped his shoulder, silencing him with a start. He glanced toward her, feeling embarrassment rise up his spine when her eyes met his with a soothing blink.

He quieted, that embarrassment turning to shame. He dropped his gaze to his boots, ears burning vibrantly. He'd almost graduated to full-out yelling at the eldest - it wasn't right. He hadn't meant to get upset.

Coach was just trying to be honest. Ellis left his fingers curled in fists, but pushed them into his pockets instead.

"C'mon, you guys. Let's not argue about things that haven't even happened yet." Squeezing Ellis' shoulder when he nodded gently and firming her smile when Coach did the same, she stepped up to the dining table and started to pick up her rifle and Ellis' shotgun.

"Now, Ellis. Let's hunt up the street a little and see if we can find a car. Coach and I were talking about it, and we'd much rather hitch a ride than get stuck walking. It's only going to get hotter."

She smiled comfortably, looking between them with a certain assurance. Ellis couldn't meet her gaze, remorse coloring his voice when he cleared his throat. "Y-yeah, sure, Ro'. Uhm.. reckon that's a great idea."

Giving a little sigh of relief, Rochelle turned and slipped along the wall toward the front door.
"Okay. Coach'll stay here and make sure Nick stays safe." She opened it just a crack, gazing out into the street. Ellis almost went after her. Guilt tugged at his chest, though, and he waited just a beat before turning his chin up hesitantly toward Coach.

He opened his mouth, eyes already melting with apology, but Coach spoke first. "Sorry, Ellis." The big man rubbed his forehead with the heel of his hand, giving a tired chuckle. "I don't trust him like you do. That's all."

Ellis blinked at him for just an instant, breaking into a little smile, forgiveness and apology mingled into one odd bubble of hesitant emotion. "Nah. I'm sorry too... got all heated there. He is kinda prickly." Coach reached out, clapping Ellis' shoulder lightly. He shook him just a bit, and Ellis grinned into the gesture - then softened his voice, meeting the eldest's dark-eyed gaze levelly.

"Just try tuh give him a chance, h'uh? Please."

The big man nodded. "I trust you, Ellis. Got my word I'll keep tryin'. An' hey, just means when we're all tucked away safe after all this, you can rub it in my face."

Ellis smiled at him, ducking forward to wrap arms around his shoulders in a hug. Coach seemed outright startled, blinking for just an instant before chuckling wearily and reaching up a hand to clap a hand between Ellis' shoulderblades.

"Thanks, Coach."

Coach just shook his head, oddly amused. For all the world, he might've been just a little embarrassed, too.

The youngest survivor darted back to scoot behind Rochelle, pulling his shotgun from her hands and the two shortly ducking outside. Zombies had re-emerged over the night, the day already warm even though the sun hadn't truly risen beyond a few sparks of orange dully gasping to life amidst grey clouds. Humidity, death, and a sticky, salt-drenched heat mixed together to leave an unpleasant musk to the air.

It was, though, not nearly as unpleasant as the way the argument lingered in the reaches of Ellis' mind.
Rochelle picked off infected at a distance. Her rifle cracked with a sharp sound, body twitching just a little with the recoil. The first few went down easily, but as the gunshots betrayed the two's presence, the infected flocked toward them like starved dogs.

Hiding his wince as his forearm ached, Ellis walked slowly at Rochelle's side, shotgun up and ready. The Southerner moved with an unsettled quiet as he took down the ones that got closer.

The harsh blast sent zombie parts flying like confetti, and it was hard not cringing at the blowback. Rochelle's new shirt wasn't clean for very long. The grey fabric quickly got spattered with shades of black and red, settling into the now-normal grime of the apocalypse.

Wiping a little blood from her forehead, she pointed down the road, head nodding. Ellis quickly followed her gesture, silent as his gaze alighted on the yellow-painted home a few yards from them.

"That house a few blocks down has a garage. Gate's closed, too. Probably a good shot if we wanna find a car."

Ellis nodded wordlessly, reloading his shotgun with a cha-chunk. He advanced down the road, sidestepping a little to get closer to the sidewalk. He, however, only got a few steps before Rochelle's hand alighted on his arm.

Looking quickly back at her, Ellis did his best to look confused - but Rochelle gave him this 'don't give me that' look and sighed, tugging on his arm til he stopped moving. "Sweetheart..."

"Yeah?" he mumbled, something a bit guilty lowering his voice. He shuffled on his feet subtly, looking more like a meek teen than the level-headed zombie killer he had been an instant before. His eyes avoided hers.

Rochelle squeezed gently at his elbow, letting out a small sigh. "Don't let it get to you, Ellis. Coach didn't really know what he was talking about. He's just worried, that's all."

The topic brought a flush rushing up to Ellis' face, averting his eyes up the road and giving a little huffed breath. "I-I ain't. I just... didn't like hearin' that is all. I wish Coach'n'him got on better."

"Me too," she agreed gently, brows pinching over her eyes. "but I think it's bothering you more than that, too. I can see those little wheels spinning. I'm here for you, remember?"

He hesitated, jutting his chin out just a little. He lifted up a hand, rubbing gently at the back of his neck. "... I know that, Ro'. Means a lot." Smiling gently at her, he shut an eye as she lifted up a hand and brushed a smudge of dirt off his forehead affectionately.

"So?" Rochelle prompted with gentle expectation.

Ellis sighed, gesturing with his shoulder to urge her back into motion. They traveled down the sidewalk at a slow pace, Rochelle's gaze settling forward instead of watching his face.

"Tunno, Ro'. The idea of Nick just disappearin' once we get safe.. I don't think he would, I really don't! It ain't like him! S'just.. guess it's scarin' me now." An exasperated sigh left him, lifting up a hand to rub at his face. "Shit, I feel like a real jerk fer doubtin' him."
The struggling of Ellis' fear and guilt was painful to watch, leaving Rochelle resigned to a gentle shake of her head. She rubbed gently at her chin, quickly vaulting into reassurance. "You said it yourself, honey. He's changed a lot, just in the time we've known him. Maybe he would've at the beginning, but I don't believe he'd do that, either."

Glancing at her sideways, Ellis' eyes softened in earnest hope at her words. "That's whut I wanna think! We've all gone through this tuhgether, he wouldn't just up'n'leave the minute we got outta danger..

"Not a chance, sweetie." She smiled encouragingly, setting a hand on his shoulder. Ellis couldn't read the subtle doubt that wavered at the far end of her voice. "He's part of the family too, remember?"

"Yeah." Ellis bobbed his head in agreement, lifting his chin with a burgeoning confidence that was, maybe, bolstered by a raw need to believe his own words. "He is! I dunno why I'm worryin'. We're fightin' through the apocalypse! Yuh don't just walk off after it's all said'n'done, not even if you were the biggest jerk in the world."

Rochelle started to respond, adjusting her grip on her rifle, but Ellis was off like a shot, let off the leash of his hesitance to run with newfound, overwhelming confidence. "He just wouldn't wanna admit it. It ain't like he's used tuh bein' friendly.. we just gotta help him a little. Y'know? Funny, him actin' all smart when he's clueless. Haw. Bet'cha that'd get right under his skin, too."

There was enough of a breath there for Rochelle to slip in, smiling coyly. "So, you think you two'll still be an item when we get rescued?" Her tone - almost sly with teasing interest - lit pink over the bridge of his nose.

"U-uh - well - I don't see why not! I like'm.. a lot, 'n' he's.. I mean…" His blush deepened, rolling a shoulder a bit as he tried to work out his wording. "I'd sure like tuh - um...

"I think.." Drawling pleasantly, Rochelle interrupted him, trailing her words with a bit of a sway to her hips as she walked down the sidewalk. "I think.. someone's twitterpated."

Ellis scratched quickly at his cheek, blinking shyly and ducking his head. "Uh - whut -"

"You heard me." She was smiling, footsteps now outright bouncing as she moved down the road.
Her expression beamed, taking visible pleasure in the words she promptly interrupted Ellis with at each turn.

"R-Ro' -"

"Enamored."

"I -"

"Smitten."

"Will yuh -"

"Infatuated."

"Ro', quit! I-I ain't -"

"In looveee.." she sang out playfully, lifting up her rifle to aim down the sights at an infected shambling out of the house. The gunshot drowned out Ellis' plaintive, "Stoppit!" as he rubbed down his face in dismay.

Rochelle grinned quietly at him as the zombie slowly clawed at the gaping hole in its neck, gurgled, looked up toward them - and then collapsed forward to tumble bonelessly down the staircase of the porch.

"Sorry, sweetie. You're an easy target."

Ellis gave a huff of distress, blush over his whole face by then, biting at his lower lip. She smiled as she glanced over the look, eyes lighting up with a certain affection, and she lowered her voice. "You are totally falling for him, aren't you?"

The Georgian couldn't sputter a response fast enough.

"Hey, I get it!" she assured him gently, lips twitching like she might start giggling at any moment. "I'd still rather die than let him get any, but trying to say that... intense look he gets sometimes isn't kinda sexy would be lying."

Sure enough, as Ellis gasped out, "RO! Hoh mah gawd!", shock plastering itself over his face with a healthy glow, she broke into borderline hysterics. He swiped at her with one hand, pushing her away, but she only laughed more, dodging a little as they walked.

"I - so whut, h'uh?" he bleated, pawing at his burning cheeks and desperately wishing he had his cap to hide underneath. "Maybe I am! He's real nice when you get tuh know him!"

Laughing cheerily as she stepped onto the driveway of the chosen house, starting to herd Ellis toward the garage door, Rochelle hummed, "Mhm. Like how he carried you to bed last night.. I wonder who slept on the floor?"

Fighting his embarrassment was a very tough endeavour. Ellis spoke with a flustered force, blurting out the words in faked confidence. "Neither'uv us!"

That completely broke Rochelle - she halted in her steps, cascades of laughter sending her hands shooting up to cover her mouth as doe-brown eyes widened. Ellis' ears and face burned with not-quite shame, averting his gaze even as he smiled bashfully, chagrined by his own admittance.

Rochelle tried to calm herself after a few seconds, a couple deep breaths stopping the laughter. She reached out to grasp onto his elbow, a certain seriousness bleeding onto her expression and a little color lighting her cheeks.

"So, you two have... y'know?"

Her trailing innuendo made Ellis leap a step back, gawping with a fishlike gasp of air. He babbled complete nonsense for an instant, amounting to barely one or two half-words and stuttering syllables, before he got enough composure to be coherent.

"R-Ro'! I can't talk 'bout - that! Yer a girl! I mean, yer like muh sister, basically!"

Rochelle grinned at his stammering, thumbing over her lower lip. "Hey, I'm older than you, boy. And..." She blinked, head cocking. "...I'll take that as a yes?"

Ellis huffed at her, rubbing his cheek quickly and looking away. "Well.. yeah... I mean, not last night or nothin', but - yeah - " He tried, forcing himself to talk, slow word by slow word. "H-he's.. y'know.. sorta ... well, real focused on... that. N' uh.. well, jeez, I ain't exactly been... against... - oh, Lordy. Nope." Fiercely blushing, he turned away, cupping a hand half over his eyes as he fled.
for the garage door. "Nope. Can't talk 'bout this with you."

Rochelle chased after him quickly, some of her amusement draining from her expression. Her voice softened, coaxing his attention back to her like he was a skittish deer. "Okay, okay, I understand... how about this."

Reluctantly slowing to a stop, Ellis glanced back at her, lower lip dragging between his teeth.

"Have you talked to him about it? You know.. how you're feeling, liking him?"

He blinked lightly at the question, rubbing at his ear a bit awkwardly. "W-well, no, not really.. Not yet, I mean."

The woman's voice got more rapt as she pushed him, and he noticed a little concern wrinkling her brow. "Why not?" It made him back up a little, gently shrugging his shoulders in vague defense, though he didn't know what he was defending against.

"Well, I wanna be real sure 'bout it before I go sayin' anythin'!... 'n' besides, he.." Ellis faltered just momentarily, but the instant was more than enough to pique Rochelle's interest. She cocked her brow, and Ellis averted his gaze, chewing on the words carefully.

He was floundering again, but gentler this time. "I guess he ain't too keen on likin' other guys. Y'know. S'why I got so scared when you found out... 'cause I didn't know whut he'd do if he knew y'all knew."

Rochelle nodded, pinching her earlobe between her knuckles. The motion was deliberate and thoughtful, ponderous to what would've been a comical degree had Ellis not been nervously eyeing the motion. He couldn't tell exactly what had her so deep in thought.

Shaking her head a little as if conscious of his worry, Rochelle turned away a little, gaze narrowing up at the house. "You think he'd just drop you if he got.. 'found out,' or whatever?" She quickly tried to reassure him, voice softening again. "I'm not trying to imply anything, sweetie, I'm just.. wondering."

Ellis shrugged again, glancing down to the toes of his boots and rocking onto them a bit. He mused, clicking his tongue against the roof of his mouth, then responded, "Yuh told me before, he's lonely 'cause he pushes people away. Even when they're good fer him." He sighed quietly. "I… I think he likes me, too. He just..."

His voice fell to quiet.

Rochelle watched him for a moment that then trailed into a few of them. She pursed her lips together, worry flecking onto her expression, unsure - suddenly her ability to reassure him was balked under the dark realization that she didn't know if she was convinced.

The very grim idea that Nick really would leave him played into Rochelle's mind, an unwanted reality. The sight of them sleeping together in the trailer, the woods - the knowledge that Nick had carried him up to the bed and slept with him then too... that they'd been intimate.

She wanted to believe the fantasies of sudden and strong love in the middle of the end of life as they'd known it, but somewhere, doubt and a protective instinct stirred.

If Nick left them, or abandoned Ellis, at the mere knowledge someone knew about them... or even worse, abandoned him when the only obstacle between them and an actual relationship was admitting his feelings.. what did it matter what emotions may or may not have surfaced?
Before her frantically ticking mind could go much further, Ellis suddenly moved forward and crouched by the garage door, forcing aside what had been - for him if not her - a few beats of discomfiting silence.

"Well, it don't matter much. Whut happens, happens, 'n' everythin' else is worryin' fer no reason. Let's get this door open."

Rochelle felt a twinge of sympathy, aware that despite the smile he flashed firmly up at her, she'd done little but spin him in a mental circle. Nodding, apology threatening to drown out her returned smile, Rochelle crossed her arms carefully and watched as he gripped onto the handle of the garage door.

Tugging it up with a grunt, the kid had to hold it with two hands to fight the natural momentum of the gears and keep the movement slow. The rattling of the metal door was a soft atakatakatak clattering as it rolled along the slatted tracks to ease open, folding neatly along the ceiling.

As it rolled up, the greyed orange light of the morning filtered into the garage. Beyond the shelves of various tools and bottled chemicals, there was the immediate and very pleasant sight of a dark blue minivan. Ellis grinned in appreciation, bobbing his head, quickly losing that little hesitance about his behaviour.

"Awh, yeah! Sorta clunky, but it's like perfect, man! Cozy, bunch'uh room.. ten tuh one, if it's here, the key's 'round here too!" He straightened up to let the door settle entirely folded away, bouncing quickly inside the garage with a giddy energy.

His head swooped a bit from side to side, looking the van over with judging eyes. Rochelle immediately chased after him, keeping her rifle close. "Hey, slow down!" she warned sharply. "There was a zombie coming out of the house, you can't be too sure.."

Ellis gave a little puff, tearing his eyes from the car with an obedient nod. "Yeah, yeah, yer right... Sorry."

Hoisting up his shotgun a bit, Ellis carefully sidled around the van, inspecting the garage's depths past the wide rectangle of light streaming in from the door. It was a fairly large garage, even with the van taking up space.

The Georgian went quiet as he focused, some of his newfound excitement fading as he fell to seriousness. He peeked around the back of the van, pointing his shotgun ahead of his gaze. The light left him a little blinded, squinting into the dark, and as his eyes adjusted he recognized the welcome sight of a keyrack nailed into the back garage wall.

Glinting metal made him grin, eagerly confident that the van's key was there. "'Ey, Ro'! Think I found our key! See, back -"

It took him a second to notice the weird, bloated silhouette a few feet to the left, standing there in the dark and previously hidden behind the nose of the van. The air, in retrospect, had seemed a little fouler as he got further in, but it was hard to tell the difference between a zombie or the smell of nearby corpses.

Instinct said shoot, and he shot.

The explosion that tore through the air an instant later startled him into a yelp. It sounded wet, like he'd shot a waterbed. Disoriented, he had no chance to scramble back when the explosion came coupled with a splatter of what might've been the foulest substance he'd come into contact with since Keith's experimentation with diet shakes.

It was hot. And greasy. Watery, acidic bile mixed with rock-like chunks of completely solidified once-foodstuff, blended together with a nauseating consistency. It spattered in a wide radius from the bursting Boomer, hitting the walls and the back of the van - but, most importantly, a good portion of Ellis' upper body.

The shock of it rushing down his face and shoulders was enough to send his stomach wrenching straight up his throat. He couldn't smell anything but the scent of vomit, making him claw out at the air, shotgun nearly clattering from his hands.

"Oh my God! Ellis!" Rochelle shrieked, stumbling back one step before rushing forward. She quickly got to his side, grabbing onto his elbow to try and steady him, a gag shuddering up her spine as the stench hit her. "Oh - God," she repeated, a little lower.

Ellis panicked suddenly when his lids gave a reflexive blink under the dribble of vomit and bile. A fierce burn cut across his eyes, nearly making him cry out, particularly when blinking further only worsened the pain.

He sputtered, the acrid taste bleeding into his mouth and making him wither, though he managed to whimper through it, "I-I can't see nothin'!"

Though he couldn't see and couldn't smell, Ellis could hear. It started just instants later, slow but steady. Reverberating with all the power of a thunderstorm, the heavy screams and shrieks of hunting infected rose up around them - baying hounds on the trail.

It shook the very substance of the air and vibrated like static electricity. It was a haunting, tangible, murderous call to arms and it struck a cold dread straight into Ellis' gut. He remembered watching a horde turn on itself under the influence of the stuff he was covered in.

"Oh God." Rochelle breathed, horror touching her voice. "The smell... Ellis, we -!"

Ellis' voice rose, repeating the words "I can't see!" frantically as he scrabbled a hand up against his burning eyes, clawing as the burning of bile against his eyes only worsened and he couldn't get the putrid goo to stop obscuring his vision. "They're comin'!"

Rochelle suddenly left him, and he panicked, pawing out for her with his other hand. His shotgun clattered to the cement, startling him as it hit the floor, and he froze slightly, forcing himself to calm.

The screaming of the horde started to grow to a deafening level as the sounds drummed at his ears, but underneath it he heard the fierce atakatakatakata! as Rochelle frantically dragged the garage door back closed.

She gave a cry of frustration as she did, throwing her entire weight onto the door. He flinched a little as he heard the metal slam violently into the concrete, the whole thing shuddering with an odd wobbling rattle.

It closing, sealing them inside, only barely muffled the screaming and shrieking. The sounds just grew more echoed, piercing the garage walls and rebounding around them.

Now they were both mostly blind, the closed garage door having flung the place into darkness but for the small rectangle of plastic that mocked a window in the center. Ellis whined slightly in pain, stuck in a half-cringe as his eyes burned dully in his head, and stuck his hands out blindly.
"Ellis -"

Rochelle's met his in the dark as she swept her arm slowly through the air to find him again, their fingers instantly twining in mutual comfort, mutual relief.

"Ellis, sweetie, are you okay?!"

He nodded his head for a dumb instant, disoriented and pained, quickly sputtering out words as he registered the fact she couldn't see now, either. "Y-yeah - I just - muh eyes, I can't -"

The two didn't even get further than that before the terrible sound of bodies colliding brainlessly with the garage door sent a certain fright down both of their spines. It was pure, primal savagery, the screams just outside as faces, hands, and feet clawed and kicked at the garage door.

It shuddered with the force, bending in with little dents under the infected's assault. They shrieked in pain as they broke bones bashing themselves into the metal plating, and shrieked in determination as they kept clawing.

The sound spread rapidly on all sides, the infected hunting for a different way in, clawing at the walls as if they could burrow their way through.

Fueled by the sound of impending death gnawing on every corner of the house, adrenaline kicked in. Rochelle's head swung up, gaze catching on the tiny glint of metal in the back that Ellis had seen before her and called out.

Car keys.

"... Ellis, I'm having a Keith moment." she announced, voice trembling with some mix of fear and burgeoning, frenetic excitement. The younger survivor's vomit-soaked head lifted with a visible quiver in the darkness, blindly facing toward her voice.

"Get in the van!"
Shooting upright in the bed, Nick grabbed out blindly, reaching for a body that wasn't there. The sounds of screaming infected pierced the air with a muffled closeness, disorienting and confusing his mind like the last clinging remnants of a nightmare twisting reality. The noise, however, was real.

Ellis was gone and there were zombies somewhere.

Nick bolted from the bed, thrusting aside blanket and pillow with blind motions. His fingers brushed against a bit of plastic as he thrust it all away - Ellis' cap. Cursing a steady stream of expletives that were only half-coherent with sleep, the conman snatched it up before he knocked it to the floor.

Tucking the hat under his belt, Nick glared at nothing, feeling a distinct anger boiling up his spine at being - seemingly - left behind again. He scooped his jacket from the floor as he passed the end of the bed, shrugging into it as he ran.

He could hear Coach's voice shouting a fierce, "SHIT!" from downstairs, speeding Nick's already rushing gait as he thrust the bedroom door open and hurried down the staircase. He skipped a step with each jump despite the protest of his leg.

"What the fuck is going on?!" he snarled, skidding a little on the bottom step and bolting across the front room. Coach stood at the dining table, a grim expression darkening his face, snatching up his shotgun and Nick's rifle. "Where are the girls?"

"Don't know." the big man responded, jaw set fiercely.

That was all he said, tossing Nick's rifle at him. The conman caught it by the barrel, flipping it around quickly to get the stock set against his shoulder and his hands in place.

With an unspoken sentiment of worry between them, the two men bolted toward the front door. Nick reached it first, quicker on his tender leg than Coach was on his bad knee, and pushed the front door open with a growl.

Squinting into the musky grey of the morning's light, the gambler rushed out onto the yard, rifle up and spinning for a target. He found plenty.

A thick stream of infected, their shrieks rising to a piercing howl of mob violence, poured down the street like a tumbling mudslide. They didn't so much as spare even a snarl for Nick or Coach's presence, lazered onto their target.

Which was, Nick could only guess, their missing companions.

The conman followed their path with his gaze, spotting the house they were gathering at. There was no sign of Rochelle nor Ellis, no sound of gunfire. No hint of if they were alright, or even still alive.

Deep in his gut, Nick felt a surge of panic that matched the burning terror of his bad dream the night before.

"Ellis!" Coach shouted behind him, roaring, voice carrying with a fearsome ease. "Rochelle!"
There was fear in his tone, manic desperation in his wide eyes, and he charged past Nick to thunder down the yard.

He paid the infected even less attention than they paid him, running maybe a yard away from him without even noticing. He shot sideways into the horde, and the ones he hit stumbled to the concrete, but the rest just kept sprinting.

Nick chased after him with a vengeance, pumping shots into the stream of zombies as he ran. The infected were circling the house, bashing at the closed garage door and the walls with limbs that bled from the effort.

It was like watching vultures flocking to a corpse, all violence and dominant hunger. They attacked each other as much as the house, mindlessly swiping nails slicing into the tumultuous waves of flesh all around them.

"You fucking piece of shit zombies!" tore from the conman's throat, shouting in utter rage. His snarling didn't even earn him a speck of attention from the infected now milling around the house en masse.

Nick and Coach had just reached the house before that one when they both skidded to a stop where they were, a sound louder than the whole zombie horde making them both gape in silence.

The garage door exploded outward, metal tearing and screaming as it broke from its moorings. The infected beating at it got crushed underneath it, run over with bloody ease as the charging nose of a dark blue van came bursting through the metal and gore.

Its engine roared, wheels squealing as it powered through the mess of broken aluminum sheeting and zombies like a steamroller. Blood spattered the hood as zombies hit the front bumper like bugs, shrieking as it ruthlessly sped over them.

"Jesus tits." Nick barely ghosted, watching in utter disbelief as the van screeched over the remnants of the door and squealed down the driveway, rolling to a smooth stop at the end.

Coach gave this bewildered laugh, clapping his hand on his cheek in relief, almost humor - the horde that hadn't been killed under the initial collision raced toward the van, mindlessly scrambling. Some of them had climbed up to the roof, and they leapt off, bouncing off the asphalt to chase after the car.

It threw into reverse with a visible jerk, and after the initial roll a few inches forward, went shooting backwards up the driveway. Skidmarks burnt into the concrete with a squeal, marking its path as it hurtled backwards to run over the infected lining up behind it.

The van rollicked as it thudded and thumped over their bodies, thick chassis squishing them underneath its weight. It jerked to a stop just before the fallen garage door, pausing an instant before rolling forward again.

With a swerve to the side to clip a few straggling zombies with its nose that it had just barely shot past, the van came humming down the driveway and turned sharply onto the road.

Nick palmed over his face, staring silently as the car veered along the street to roll to a stop just beside him and Coach. Every inch of Nick expected Ellis to come whooping and grinning like an idiot out of the driver's seat - he waited for it, ready to smack sense into his stupid redneck head...

Only to have Rochelle fling herself out instead, stumbling onto her feet from the tall van's interior, looking winded, exhilarated... and a little frantic.
"Holy Mother of Jesus, Rochelle!" Coach exclaimed in a bewildered bluster. "Are you crazy?! What in the shit were you tryin' to do-"

But Nick interrupted him, voice sharp as the business end of a knife when he snarled the words. "Where's Overalls?" Rochelle only glanced at the gambler once, eyes widening a tick in surprise, before she scrambled backwards and opened the side door of the van.

"He's okay. He just got... well, a Boomer caught us off-guard, and -" she breathlessly managed. Nick had started to take a step forward, but that halted him, a scowl rising fiercely over his face.

"Wait, the vomiting thing?"

Sure enough, as the car door opened up, a very distinct stench struck the air. Rochelle gently reached in, pulling Ellis out of the van by the elbows. "H-hah.. ow.." the kid breathed, head bowed, bile-soaked body curled in on itself.

Nick recoiled several steps, a short "Oh for fuck's sake!" escaping him. His nose wrinkled, hand lifting to stifle over his nostrils, though the effort did little to mask the smell now that it had invaded his senses.

Coach hustled past him without the same reservations, helping Ellis down to the road as the kid blindly pawed at his and Rochelle's supporting arms. Coach tucked a knuckle under his chin to lift his face up, eyeing him critically.

Ellis' expression was screwed up in pain, short whimpers escaping him with every breath, some mix of pain and disgust. He kept his eyes squeezed shut, but that hurt, too.

"He can't see - do we have some water left?" Rochelle murmured, voice throttled with barely restrained disgust and concern. Coach nodded shortly, reaching over his shoulder to unzip the backpack hanging between his shoulderblades.

He wormed fingers blindly into the sack, prying a half-drunk waterbottle from the pocket and offering it up to her.

"Shit, son." he grumbled quietly. "Yo' ass smells worse than these zombies." He leaned back slightly as Rochelle uncapped the bottle of water and bent down into a slight crouch beside Ellis. Nick watched at a distance, disgust roiling in his stomach and an acrid taste settling at the back of his throat. Rochelle tenderly started to pour water onto the upturned plane of his face in little portions, wiping with her thumb to clean him off.

Ellis yelped in gentle pain, squirming ineffectually as some of the water dribbled toward his ears and into his hair, but Rochelle merely cooed a soft, "Easy, sweetie, easy." and shook her hand off with a bit of a flinch.

"We've gotta be careful around those guys." she explained nervously, voice a bit quick as she kept her mind off what she was doing. Ellis cringed as she gently dribbled water over his eyes, holding still as the cool water eased the burn and flushed his bile-irritated eyes. "They don't just puke. Ellis shot it, and it… exploded, almost. If we all got hit at once.. blind, disoriented like this… I don't wanna think about it."

Rochelle got a hold on the bottom of her shirt, grabbing a fistful of the fabric and bending up a little so she could wipe over Ellis' eyes with it.

He started to blink, little quick motions, not seeming quite as pained now that she'd cleaned most of the sludge away from his eyes. Recovering, Ellis pulled away from her doting touch a little to lift his own hand and rub the heel of his hand over his eyes, whimpering gently.

Coach nodded in simple agreement, clearing his throat in a rumble and glancing over his shoulder at Nick. The gambler barely returned his gaze, disgust entrenched on rugged features, and the big man chuckled.

"Squeamish, Nick?"

Agitation swelled at the tease, Nick's pride making his jaw stiffen. "No, I'm not a big fan of the bodily fluids of fucking zombies. Overalls is going to smell like that shit now! We can't bathe!"

Coach merely chuckled again, returning his gaze to Ellis with a bit of a grimace. "Yeah. Guess we'll have to figure somethin' out soon. You a'ight, Ellis?"

"Yeah..." he managed hesitantly, lifting his whole arm to rub his forearm down his face and wipe it dry a little, sighing as he shook his head. "Shit burns! Thought I wasn't never gonna see again."

Pulling his arm down, he eyed it, the weird smudges of green making his nose crinkle. "Man... shit.
Done been puked on by a zombie." Some of his energy was reviving as the pain ebbed, but when he blearily squinted his eyes up at the other three, they were full of shining tears and bloodshot - a strange contrast to the stony blue of his irises.

The greenish, putrid gunk still caked his curly hair and smeared down his neck and shoulders, and Nick gave a horrified "Guh." He turned away, examining the dented and blood-soaked hood of their newfound vehicle.

"Goddamn women drivers." he mocked loudly, crossing his arms over his chest. "Look at the number you did to our ride."

Rochelle turned on her heels, and glared back at him with a crinkle to her nose. "Ass. I had to get us out of there somehow - it's fine." Pushing up to her feet, Rochelle reached down to offer Ellis help up.

He took her hands with a sigh, grinning gently despite himself as he blinked his reddened eyes wearily. "I dunno - Ro' was a real badass back there... Ain't like I could see nothin', but she saved us like'uh real pro. Them zombies didn't know whut they was dealin' with!"

Giggling softly, Rochelle shook her head and wiped her hands off on the thighs of her jeans. She stepped up to the van and set a palm on the metal, releasing a sigh as she looked over the van's silhouette. "It wasn't that big a deal."

There was a thumb and half its connected palm caught between the front vanity plate and the bumper of the car. She grimaced, and nudged it off with the toe of her boot.

"Naw, Ro'!" the kid insisted, grin widening. He snuffled slightly, rubbing his eyes again with his wrist. "It was awesome!"

She smiled at him, patting the van with her fingers. Her cheeks got the vaguest color to them, obviously flattered, but she changed the subject anyway. "It has a full tank, guys. It'll get us the rest of the way."

Nick interjected in a low grumble, rolling his eyes sharply with a sigh. He let his arms uncross, adjusting his rifle until he could slip his arm in the strap. "Assuming it doesn't get smashed by a Tank."
Rochelle ignored him completely, rubbing her cheek with the flat of her palm. She turned to face all three of them, voice tightening with seriousness. "Does everyone have everything? We have the pack, our guns... did you pack away some food just in case, Coach?"

As the big man nodded, confirming the statement, Ellis lifted his head, reddened gaze moving to Nick's face with a needy squint. The conman knew instantly what he wanted, brows scowling just a little bit.

Nick pulled his jacket away from his body slightly, flashing the younger man with the sight of his cap tucked underneath the conman's belt. Relief touched the Georgian's expression, flicking a grateful look at Nick's face and looking back at Rochelle.

"Think we're good." he chimed weakly.

Coach adjusted his grip on his shotgun, nodding at the van. "Guess we best get movin' then. Ain't nothin' left fo' us here. Who's drivin'?"

Nick immediately opened his mouth, primed to mock Rochelle's driving with another jive, but Ellis straightened up before he spoke and blurted out eagerly. "Oah, I ain't gotten tuh drive us none!" he piped, peeking bloodshot eyes at his companions hopefully.

Snorting loudly and shooting a disbelieving look at the mechanic, Nick jabbed a thumb at the van. "Sport, let's just ignore the fact you only just recovered your sight and your eyes look like tomatoes..."

Ellis blinked a few times, seeming cowed slightly by the statement and running a knuckle tenderly under his sore eyes.

A little puff escaped the Georgian, affronted at the same time it had an edge of entertainment at Nick's visible squeamishness. He patted a hand over his hair, nose wrinkling a little in retrospective regret as his fingers touched onto bile-soaked strands. "Well I didn't mean tuh get puked on, man. T'd'uh stopped it if I could!"

Nick set his fingers into loose fists, eyes narrowing and trying to meet Ellis' gaze meaningfully. His voice put vicious emphasis onto the words. "You could've stopped it by not running into trouble like an idiot -"

"Be nice to him, Nick. He didn't, we just got caught off-guard." Rochelle sighed, sympathetically glancing Ellis over. "Besides. I think getting covered in puke is punishment enough without you yelling at him."

Ellis gave a little "heh," eyes flinching down tenderly in their sockets to examine his own body. A small blush touched his cheeks as he scratched his nose with a pinky and shifted on his boots lightly.

He'd gotten Nick's meaning well enough. Their argument was still fresh enough in his mind... It hadn't been half a day and Ellis had already gotten into trouble again. Blue eyes blinked up though Ellis' chin stayed low, and he tried to get across a little soft-gazed apology to the older man.

Nick rolled his head on his neck subtly, sighing in slow agitation and shrugging. He met the gaze, squinted dubiously, then turned away. "Whatever. I'll drive the damn ugly van."

Nobody argued, so the gambler rounded the vehicle toward the driver's seat. Rochelle moved toward one of the back doors, Coach following behind her to get in after her - but when Ellis padded after Nick, reaching for the passenger's side door, Nick halted in place.

".. and what do you think you're doing, Fireball?" he questioned with an edge of disbelief, staring Ellis down. The kid blinked, stopping where he stood, chin lowering a bit hesitantly.

"Uh." he mumbled. "Gettin' in the car..?"

The conman arched a brow testily, shaking his head back at the Georgian. "No." he stated simply.

Ellis gave a guffaw, twisting into a questioning noise at the end, his head cocking in a puzzled gesture. Coach stopped halfway into the van, lifting his head to watch the two with an entertained humor. "Er.. No?" Ellis repeated, voice rather lost with confusion.

"No."

Nick turned on his heel and started to stride down the length of the van in silence. Ellis scooted around the front of the van, hurrying to peek around it at him as he walked, bewildered. "Uh.. this about the smell? You want me tuh switch with Ro'?

"No."

"Er… with Coach?"

"No."

Ellis halted as he reached the end of the van, arms going slightly akimbo and voice turning plaintive. "W-well ... what'cha want me to do, then?! I'm sorry I smell bad, Nick, but I can't help it none! What'cha gonna do, lash me to the top'uh the car?"

Nick didn't stop when Ellis did, stepping behind the van and turning around. "I wish." He bent down, gripping the back door handle and throwing it open. Nick retreated a step and pointed into the luggage space like one might order a dog into its cage. His free hand pushed the button on the door that opened up the back window, the glass rolling down smoothly.

Coach started laughing as he settled into the van, Rochelle twisting around in her seat to arch a brow at Nick over the backs of the seats. "Nick.. are you being an asshole?" she questioned, sighing, not getting so much as a glance from the conman.

He was too busy staring at Ellis expectantly.

Ellis gawped at him. "You ain't serious."

"Very. In." Nick's expression was so blankly serious, Ellis could only fumble for a moment, standing there, faltering under his deadpan command. Giving a little huff of air, Ellis hunched down his shoulders and slunk around the open door.

He crawled up into the back of the van, flopping down onto the floor of the cargo space with a sulky drop of his head. There was enough room for him to stretch out his legs, and Ellis leaned against the back of the seats to get out of the way of the door with a little jut of his lower lip.

"This's just mean, Nick."

Nick shut the door on him with a slam, smirking at him through the window in a sudden break of his flat expression. He rolled green eyes, wrinkling his nose and stating. "You. Fucking. Smell."
Ellis stuck his tongue out at the gambler, crawling forward so he could stick his head - and the majority of his shoulders - out of the open window and dangle his arms down the back of the van.

The kid hung as limp as a dying man, mumbling sadly, "S'till mean."

The Georgian had shut his eyes, but they blinked back open blearily as his hat was stuffed over his face. He quickly grabbed the bill, adjusting it back onto his head properly - but by the time he looked up Nick had already disappeared around the corner of the van.

He peeked back over his shoulder as the gambler got to the driver's door, shoving it open and stepping up into the seat. He pulled his seatbelt over his chest, eyes narrowed forward as he ferociously thrust the van into gear.

"Alright, assclowns. Buckle up and shut up. Except for you, Ellis. You just focus on shutting up, and if your reeking redneck ass falls out the window, we'll consider ourselves the luckiest people in the apocalypse."

Ellis turned his face forward, holding his hat to his head and smiling faintly into the breeze that swirled through the open window as the van rumbled into motion.
The air conditioning was on full blast, cold air blowing pleasantly along the curvature of the van's interior. The tangy taste of coolant, burning on the tails of every flutter of air, was a somehow relaxing sensation.

As was expected, the radio played nothing but static, not even the CEDA announcements providing some kind of sound. Nick had shut the radio off as soon as he'd turned it on.

The strong vibration of air conditioning acted as their music, orchestrated by the idle flick of Nick's finger as he directed the plastic flaps more toward his face, heightening the sound as the wind whistled through the vent.

It blew down toward the floorboards, too, and the cold air soothed his injured leg in a pleasant chill. Nick's right arm settled back onto his thigh, left lifted to drape his hand with a wide grip on the steering wheel as he coaxed the van along the road. His eyes bored into the road ahead, half-narrowed into the artificial wind, examining the deadened grey sky.

It was like the very essence of death had coalesced into a lurking fog, building up overhead in a wispy presence.

The neighborhood continued as they drove, houses speckling the sides of the road. It was a community-turned-graveyard, not a hint or sign of life... except for the infected wandering about in droves.

Water was visible, dully sparkling browns and deep blues, from between the trees lining the road on the lefthand side. It was the murky sight of an estuary, pouring in between what must've been the southern edge of the Carolinas and northern Georgia.

The right side was crumbling into sandy plains, covered over by a browning blanket of grass and bushes. Foggy air hung low to the sloping ground, crawling in from the rivers and refusing to seep away, even under a sun that burned hot through the grey clouds gathering in the sky. The air was hot and bloated under the streaks of bare sunlight that breached the tarnished cloudscape.

They were getting closer to the sea; closer to Tybee; closer to what should have been rescue. There couldn't have been more than a half-hour's drive to the seaside blot of land that Tybee Island made its home on, but under a mournful sky, there was little excitement among the four.

Just quiet.

A lingering, harmonizing quiet that bespoke a certain unease.

Nick let his gaze slip over and over into the rear-view mirror, gazing between his companions with a silent distance. One of them should've spoken up, brought up some topic to ease the tension or distract from the grimness that they drove so quickly through.

Ellis gazed out through the back window from his exiled place in the back of the van, Rochelle had her eyes on her hands as she fiddled her fingers against one another, and Coach had his eyes closed.

The gambler gave a slow shift where he sat, turning his body slightly and returning his gaze to the road. He let a sigh escape him, raising his hand to stroke along his jaw, scratching into the dark path of stubble underlining his face.
Goosebumps rose along his arm as the air from the vents suddenly blew into his sleeve as he lifted it up. Flexing his fingers, he let a stiffness touch his jaw.

"You okay, suit?"

Realizing Rochelle had turned her attention on him, probably at the sigh, Nick let his arm drop back to his lap. "Peachy." he returned with a caustic shortness, shooting a glare at her through the rearview mirror.

She laughed.. just a small breath of a noise, turning her face back toward the window. Maybe something in his biting sarcasm revived something in the air, because, taking a breath, she prompted;

"Looks like rain."

Although he'd practically been hoping for a comment just as stupid and mundane as that one, Nick found his temper revving up in his chest. It was all he could do not to lash out at her with actual seriousness.

"Oh no," the conman grumbled, thumbing over the seam of the steering wheel. "Rain. I guess we're all just doomed - I mean, the fucking apocalypse was one thing, but rain? Jesus Christ."

Rochelle started to open her mouth, but he interrupted her sharply, sarcasm dripping off his voice in gallons. "Wait! I just had an idea! I think I can save us." With a little gasp to emphasize his motion, the gambler dramatically lifted a finger from the steering wheel...

...flicking the windshield wipers on with a nudge of the switch. They squeaked over the dry glass in a little eek-eerk, leaving a smirk on Nick's face at his own mockery.

"Ass." Rolling her eyes gently, the woman set her elbow against the door and her cheek on her knuckles, casually lifting her brows. "Are you going to melt, Nick? Or maybe you're like dirt, and you'll just turn into a big sludgy pile of mud."

Nick's brows gave the smallest of twitches together, lips doing the same - and then he snorted. "At least mud will smell better than Overalls does."

The open window that Ellis' head was half stuck out of immersed him in a flow of wind. Though it failed to more than rustle the encrusted curls peeking out from his tightly-screwed-on cap, it provided enough whistling noise to deafen him to the conversation. He only vaguely heard the words, head bobbing a bit to twist back.

"H'uh?" he queried, uncertainly.

"Anyway," Rochelle prompted, trying not to laugh as she stopped the conversation before Nick could explain it. She let her head shake. "it won't matter if it rains or not, right? Once we get to Tybee, we're setting up more permanently.. Find ourselves a nice house or something to hole up in."

Ellis scooted himself closer to the back of the seats, leaning away from the window so he could hear better. Blue eyes blinked widely, a curious eagerness creeping over his face. "Oah, y'all wanna bet they got beach houses'n'fancy shit out there? It'll be like goin' on vacation!"

Nick snorted, rolling his shoulder in its socket and glancing up at the rearview mirror. He could see Ellis' face, green eyes raking over the hick's features with a silent intensity before he raised his voice. "Yeah. You, at a beach house. Some rich asshole is already rolling in his grave."
Ellis stuck his tongue out at the conman with a little smile, the sight making Nick's brow arch, then twisted back around to return to peering out the window. Nick didn't say a word, just forced his gaze back onto the road.

Nick eyed a small cluster of infected shambling at the edge of the road ahead of them. He let his hand drift, the van slowly easing to follow, and he gave a pleased scowl as the front bumper clipped them like so many bowling pins.

They collided hard, rolling off the hood with shrieks of rage. When blood splattered on the windshield from the hit, Nick just flicked the windshield wipers on again, the squeegee-like rubber pushing the red and black mess out of his vision.

"And don't say 'permanently.'" he stated flatly.

Wincing at the gore marking the windshield, Rochelle leaned her head back a little bit, sighing. "Sorry, sorry." she apologized, waving a hand slightly. "Until CEDA gets here, I meant."

Nick let the van veer back straight on the road, eyeing the zombies in their broken attempts to get up as they collided and rolled on the asphalt, crippled in the wake of the van, blood smearing the road and arms flailing.

"If."

Rochelle let her hand flop down with a slightly resigned limpness, eyes going slightly wide with a bewildered gesture of disbelief. "Christ, suit." she chided. "Can I go two words without your pessimism jumping all over me?"

The conman snorted, tightening his grip on the steering wheel as a bit of irritation tightened his jaw. "Maybe if more people took my 'pessimism' to heart, we wouldn't have put trust in CEDA to begin with… and this wouldn't've happened at all."

She outright laughed at that, glancing out the window. Her brow scrunched up slightly, entertained at the same time she was a little serious. "Honey, if more people took you to heart, the whole human race would throw itself off a cliff in hopelessness."

"Ow." Nick lazily retorted. "Because we're really better off getting eaten alive by zombies."

"Y'all quit." came gruffly from Coach's throat with a sudden finality. "Ain't no use arguin'. Yo' ass is still here, Nick, so you must not see another way. An' you know he's right in bein' suspicious, baby girl. Won't know anythin' til it happens. Just gotta keep goin'."

It shut everyone up, just the whistling of the open window and the deep thrum of the air conditioning to highlight his words. It was quiet again, but the blank truth of Coach's words drained the tension.

Forward was the only direction they had.

The van rolled over the concrete with cautious speed, Nick's subtle adjustments to his grip on the wheel marked by the tacky rustle of his fingers on the leather and the soft veering of the vehicle to avoid potholes and the wreckage of the occasional broken down car.

Idly, Nick examined them as they drove past. A fact played into his ever-observant mind, though transiently so and dismissed with some conscious effort: nearly all the abandoned cars were facing the opposite direction they now drove.
The implications of this fact trailed through his consciousness, but with some resignation, they were pushed aside just the same. He considered mentioning it, but kept his silence in the end. Forward or bust. Well, shit.

As the van rolled on, Tybee's black and white-patterned lighthouse grew ever more prominent on the near horizon, a dark shape on a dreadful excuse for a spring sky.

A sign ahead, green and wide with bold white lettering, announced 'Tybee Island - 2m.' Graffiti scrawled over it in unintelligible lines, nearly obscuring the sign's content, but not quite.

Nick gave a subtle sigh of relief, relaxing his shoulders and letting the back of his head touch onto the headrest of his chair. "Almost there." he tiredly stated, eyes narrowing on the road as his foot pressed just a little harder onto the gas pedal.

The engine gave a happy rumble, the sound eagerly thickening as the speedometer twitched up a few centimeters. Nick kept himself from going too fast, wary of crashing their hard-earned vehicle.

His focus tore away from the road slightly when their stench-riddled mechanic suddenly spoke. The whistling of the wind around the window muffled his voice, and none of the three really heard him clearly.

"What, Overalls?" Nick called over his shoulder, shortly. "You say somethin'?"

The kid obediently turned his head around, leaning more into the van. Ellis' voice blabbered from where he half-kneeled, matter-of-factly. "'The Angels are here.'"

Craning her head back at him, Rochelle gave the huddled Georgian a bewildered look. "...What in..?" She shot a glance at Coach, the big man's eyes opening and his head lifting a little, before looking back at Ellis. "What are you talking about…?"

Ellis lifted up his hands in an unsure gesture, thumbing over his shoulder. "Oah, I dunno, Ro'. I just read that on the back'uv that there sign. Someone wrote it there."

Nick glanced quickly up into the rearview mirror, eyes narrowing on the fast-disappearing shape of the road sign. He could see lettering, drawn in what looked like red paint, but it was too far to make out by then.

A scoff escaped his lips, nose wrinkling slightly at the concept. More religious bullshit. Great.

"O-oh." Rochelle quickly uttered, lifting a hand. She made this gentle motion in the air, almost coaxing, as if patting his shoulder from a distance. "I wouldn't worry about it too much, sweetheart… People do weird things in disasters. It's probably nothing."

Blinking a bit, Ellis let himself relax against the van's inner wall, curling his legs under himself and adjusting his cap on his sticky head. "Yuh think they're just writin' nonsense?"

Resigning himself to staring ahead at the road, a crease beginning between his brows out of pure unease, Nick gave a snort. He tightened his grip on the wheel and gave a shrug. "No, Ellis. There's angels running around now, too."

Coach gave a gruff little sigh, re-closing his eyes and settling back down into his seat like a tired watchdog returning to his vigil. With a simple firmness that dragged them back into a low quiet as the van drove on, he grunted:

"There ain't no angels in none of this shit."
Chapter 74

Tybee Island was a fairly average seaside islet.

Multi-story condominiums and tall hotels rose up against the fog-smothered sky. Dotted here and there, hidden amongst the breezily-structured houses, were stores and businesses - but they were almost hard to pick out in the Island's dense lodging.

Although salt carried on the breeze with a sharp crust, the sea was still hidden from sight by the couple miles' width of Tybee's city. Little flashes and strips of blue peeked out from behind the clinging smoke and fog that masked it, hinting at what would've been a gorgeous sky.

And yet - something was wrong.

They hadn't so much as entered the gridlike, criss-crossing streets of Tybee Island before it became apparent. Something was terribly wrong, beyond the smell of decay that followed them, or the dark gloom of the sky. Nick's fingers went white-knuckled on the steering wheel, and he ground his heel onto the brakepad to bring the van to a creaking halt.

Green eyes narrowed sharply, the very shadows of his irises darkening as they took in what was so immediately visible down the length of Tybee's main street.

Bodies.

Zombies layered the streets in bloody smears, coloring the asphalt sick shades of brown and black. Although there were signs of bullets here and there, the majority of them had been taken down with something sharp. Very sharp.

They were sawn to pieces at the joints.

Limbs sprawled with clutched fingers, torsos sliced in half with blackened innards pooled around them amidst the dried gore of their own demise. Arms and heads laid like the snapped-off pieces of abused dolls, blood drained out of them and splattered freely on the concrete.

Flies buzzed in eager buffet lines down a street mottled with the messy remains of countless mutilated infected and puddles of dried blood they clouded around hungrily.

"What. The. Fuck." Nick hissed through gritted teeth, gaze darting about what he could see. It wasn't horror so much as disbelief - a sick kind of disbelief, deep in his gut, and the fierce jam of his foot onto the brake said all that was needed to be said about his uneasiness.

"What the fuck."

His seat shifted as Coach's heavy hand gripped its head, using it to lean himself forward. The football coach's jaw set tightly, examining the scene with serious eyes as both Rochelle and Ellis reacted with little gasps.

"That don't .. look good." Ellis whimpered hesitantly, his whole body craning up with quivering effort to peer down the length of the van and out the windshield at the road. The unsettled tone to his voice matched what had suddenly spiked into an anxious atmosphere. "But it means.. someone's here, right?"

The scent of blood - and other liquids - drifted into the van's interior with a slow stench.
Rochelle nervously leaned forward, drawing her rifle from the floor of the van. She set it on her lap, gripping it tightly, and shook her head. "I don't know, sweetheart... I don't know if that's good news or not."

Green eyes riveted on the gory street beckoning them into what should have been a peaceful seaside town, Nick growled with a frantic and tense energy. "This is a goddamn slaughterhouse! Who the fuck -" He shifted, shutting off the buzzing air conditioning with a twist of the knob. "...I don't like this. I do not goddamn like this."

Coach grunted roughly, eyes falling to a squint. He shook his head, slowly, averting his gaze from the road for a moment to inhale. "We been killin' plenty ourselves... just the way of things now."

"Way of things my fucking ass!" Nick snarled, thrusting a hand up to gesture into the street ahead of him. He used the other to violently shove the gearshift into park, freeing him to twist around and glare at his companions. "Are you seeing the same goddamn shit I am?!"

There was disbelief in his voice, almost razor-sharp with unease.

"Yeah, Nick, I am." Coach's stubble-shaded face downturned, eyes closing with a tired effort as he stoically withstood the conman's growling. "I don't like it either, but if someone saw us runnin' around killin' shit, they'd be nervous too. We can't jump to no conclusions."

Rochelle warily reached one hand over and touched Coach's shoulder. He glanced at her, meeting her gaze, letting his grip shift on the head of the front seat. "Coach... I think suit's right here. If there's a bunch of guys running around with... I don't know, machetes, we need to be careful. We don't know if they're friendly."

From the back, Ellis gave a nervous laugh that made him hunch, scratching his jaw with his thumb. Nick, seething with a visceral dislike for what lay in their future, raked his gaze up to meet the kid's blue ones as if they might steady him - calm the raging desire to turn the van around and just drive away.

Ellis lowered his chin to slant his vision through short but dark lashes, that stony blue glimmer flustering under Nick's gaze, though his voice held strong.

"Haw.. sounds like some real bad horror movie or somethin'... Y'all don't.. really think they're crazy or nothin', do y'all? I mean, ain't no different from me usin' that axe before. Right?"

Keeping his gaze right where it was on Ellis' face even when the kid averted his eyes just a few inches, Nick gave a scoffing 'hah,' reaching up a hand to scratch at the stubble gracing his unshaven neck. "Overalls... if you started flailing around, chopping zombies into little gruesome pieces with an axe, I'd run the other fucking way."

The Georgian grinned. That uneasy nervousness broke for all of an instant, beaming that goofy smile all over Ellis' dirty face, and Nick felt something soften in his gut.

Rochelle gave a careful nod, lowering her chin and bending her head to gaze back down the street. A slight smile forced onto her face, jaw setting. "Yeah. There's survival and then there's... massacre. This just feels wrong, I don't know..."

She trailed off as Coach sighed, rubbing his face in a quick motion, wide palm scruffling the aged planes of a round face. "Well, there ain't much lee-way. We're headed this way, we're goin' this way. If there's folks here - fine. We stay outta their path. We got other concerns." His voice had reached that matter-of-fact command; that certainty that allowed for no doubt.
A tired, resigned, but still breathing instinct to build a game plan and lay it out with a strong hand.

"And if we get jumped by fucking psychopaths with swords?" Nick retorted sarcastically, shoulders rising slightly and teeth gritting a bit. He turned his head back around, refocusing on the bloody mess that awaited them - but moreso, with his expression turned away, the sight of his companions' faces in the rearview mirror.

Coach, stoic and slow, shook his head. "We defend ourselves."

Ellis' distress was immediate, a crease drawing itself between those brows with a flash of instant comprehension. Concern flooded his quieted voice and widened his eyes with a slow, innocent disbelief. "Whut... kill them?"

Rochelle gave a nervous swallow, examining his face before turning around to the worried mechanic in the back of the van. She forced a smile, fisting her hands slowly. "Not if we can help it, sweetheart... of course not. I really hope it doesn't come to it. But - ...

Ellis slowly crossed his arms on the back of the seats, rubbing at his muscled biceps as if the thought actually chilled him a little. His expression drew into an upset frown, curling a little bit in on himself as he sighed, nodding to stop her attempts to explain.

"Nah... I get it. Man, I hope we don't run intuh them. Or that we're misunderstandin' things."

Nick gave a heavy snort, raising a hand over his eyes and bending forward slightly as he struggled not to burst into anger again. His palm ran down the shadowed planes of his face with a stressed tension, fingertips agilely tracing his own features.

"Jesus tits. Give me zombies over crazy fucks any goddamn day. Jesus." he muttered lowly to himself, growling deeply as he dropped his hand back to the wheel. "Fine. Let's get murdered by a bunch of nutcases, fine, great. Fucking wonderful. I've come this far to get chopped to little pieces. Goddamnit."

Coach sighed, reaching over the shoulder of the chair to pat Nick's in some reassurance, an edge of laughter touching his voice. "They can't chop a van into pieces. Keep drivin'."

Glaring shortly over his shoulder, Nick gave a grunted sigh and resettled in his seat. He shoved the van back into drive, letting the van ease forward with a foot just touching the gas pedal to keep it to a slow roll.

"Shut the window, Ellis. I don't want to smell you, either, but - lesser evil."

"Haw." The Georgian obediently crawled back toward the window, bracing his weight with an elbow against the wall of the van as he rolled the window back down, sealing them off from the gruesome waste that had been made of Tybee's front streets.

All four of them had eyes focused, silent and anxious, on the road ahead. They all craned forward as if they were watching a plot unfold on a moviescreen - not through their car windshield.

Nick drove at a cautious pace, his eyes alert and attentive as the van carefully hummed forward. Avoiding what mess he could, he swerved the van gently along the street, following the main stretch of the highway that dominated the smaller side roads.

The gore only seemed to get worse as they rolled carefully into Tybee. There were piles of bodies, all butchered like so much meat, blood having spurted onto the cement. Dried - but was it as dried as the blood before it?
Occasional thumps rocked the van up an inch or two, just subtly, from where Nick failed to dodge a limb. The jerk was weak as the flesh went to mush underneath the tire treads and the van's weight.

"This ain't right, man." Ellis muttered softly, quietly.

It was like a slow-moving horror ride, click-clacking gradually along a railroad through a grotesque landscape shaped and molded to frighten. Nick dug his fingertips into the steering wheel in a slow knead, wishing the van's engine were a little quieter.

Graffiti painted the sides of buildings here and there, in scrawls. Nick couldn't stop himself from reading them, jaw twitching, gaze flickering back and forth from the street to their shapes.

The only thing was - they weren't words. They were numbers.

'103'
'95'
'105'
'110'
'110'
A few houses down, they were there again.

'107'
'101'
'111'
'118'
And again.

'113'
'107'
'116'
'125'

They were rising - chunk by chunk, piece by piece, in sick tandem with the piles of bodies that layered the streets. Nick felt a slight stiffening in his gut, tearing his gaze away eventually and focusing on driving down the street.

"You guys think we've killed that many so far?" he scoffed, voice taut with barely withheld nerves.

Tense silence responded to him, just the slow shifting of weight and a slight collective breath. He snorted a little into the silence, flexing his fingers slowly, gaze traveling over the road. They narrowed.

The blood was red - brighter. It wasn't glistening, but it was - definitely - fresh. There was no denying it, and Nick's spine straightened slowly against the seat with a rising suspicion. They were getting close and he didn't know what to.

"... maybe," Rochelle started to half-whisper, as if they might be heard. "we should -"

A violent jerk shocked the whole van, a strange, sharp explosion kicking up the back of it just a few inches. A metallic, scraping squeal started in an instant, and Nick slammed on the brakes. The van wobbled, drifting into a half-spin on the road.

The squeal rose to a practically deafening level, screaming this metal-on-concrete noise as the van jerked to a stop. Flashes of light flared up in Nick's peripheral - sparks flew up around the lefthand side of the van, yellow and orange.

"Jesus fucking Christ!" Nick snarled, twisting his head sharply to try and scan for danger. He couldn't see anything right off, but the buildings had closed in now that they were in Tybee, and there were too many shadows, too many corners, too many places to hide -

Ellis' voice yelped, a little tumble thumping him against the back of the van before he could catch himself, with no seatbelt to steady him. "W-WHA - ow!" He whacked his head on the back window as he fell, wincing as he just barely caught his hat from falling.

Rochelle and Coach weren't nearly as displaced, grabbing at the nearest thing to sturdy themselves and wincing as the shrieking sound died out. "Are you okay, Ellis?!" she called quickly, clutching at her shirt slightly.

"Y-yeah!" he affirmed, scrambling a little to get back to his crouching position, blinking in surprise out the window. "Jeez. I think we done blown'uh tire! Ain't never seen it go like that!"

Nick spat out, shoving the van into park with a bewildered tone, "Blown a tire?! Are you fucking serious? In the middle of this fucking place we blow a fucking tire?!"

Immediately grunting, Coach turned himself. He pulled his seatbelt off with a quick motion, reaching to open up his door. "Maybe we can find a spare. We got a mechanic on hand, after all."

Perking slightly at the insinuation, Ellis gave a quick nod, gaze flicking up to try and coax Nick down from his rage. "Y-yeah, Nick! I'll be alright.. we'll just get it changed, 'n' be on our way.." He raised his hands, splaying hands in a soothing motion.

"Before -" Nick snarled, ripping his seatbelt off and going to throw the driver's side door open. "- or after we end up with stumps for limbs?"

Wincing with a little sigh, Ellis squirmed back and pushed the back door open on the van. He stumbled out as it swung open on a slightly mechanized joint, stretching his legs with a quick wiggle that rustled his sagging coveralls and popped him in indeterminate places.

"We'll be fine, Nick!" he promised, earnestly. As much as he tried to mean it, though, Ellis felt his heart rate picking up in his chest.

When Nick just rolled his eyes, throwing up his hands slightly before bending back into the van and dragging his rifle out, Ellis quieted. Nick gripped the weapon tightly, going tense as he stood next to the car, gaze tracing the zombies messily cut to pieces around them.

Ellis rubbed a knuckle at his nose carefully, glancing at Rochelle as she slipped out of the van. She gave him a supportive smile, wielding her own rifle, and nodded. "What'd we hit, anyway?" she questioned, voice softly unnerved.
Bobbing his head with a little shrug, the kid quickly scuttled toward the offending tire. It was completely ruined, totally deflated in a mess of stripped rubber. The sparks had come from the metal wheel as it scraped the heavy weight of the van against the concrete, and the rubber was almost entirely split away.

Ellis knelt down, giving a little sigh as he did and reaching out to touch it. The rubber was hot, and he squinted thoughtfully, worriedly. "I dunno.. don't make much sense, I mean, there ain't nothin' but zombie bits lyin' 'round - man."

His thumb gently stroked the tire rim, biting at the plump flesh of his lower lip. "I hope it didn't bust up the axle none.. that ain't no quick fix... I - "

As he touched it, something tumbled free, hitting the concrete with a soft clatter underneath the car. It tinkled, almost, and Ellis blinked in curiousity. He immediately bent lower in his crouch and reached his hand under the van to paw for it. "The heck...?" he mumbled, curiously.

Nick's voice hissed at him from the other side of the van as his face gently pushed against the van's wheel well, feeling for whatever had fallen. "Ellis!"

Automatically realizing what he'd just said, Ellis moved to reassure him, patting along the concrete in his hunting. "Sorry, sorry, Nick, I didn't mean that - it probably ain't hurt none, I'm just worryin'. We'll get back on the road real -"

Two things happened at once:

First, Ellis' fingertips brushed the hot shape of a bullet, his eyes widening at the feeling. Second, a shape coalesced in his peripheral vision, movement shifting out from behind a building at the side of the street.

Rochelle's gasp confirmed it. "Holy -"

The Georgian jerked quickly to scramble away from the van, moving to get to his feet as he flipped the bullet in one motion into his palm, secreting it away in a fist. Blue eyes widened as he stared out, gaze flickering quickly up the road to look toward the movement.

Three shapes, actually - three people.

A woman and two men, their clothes filthy with blood and gore, faces smudged with even more blood. Step by step, approaching from either side of a building, they moved in silence. The lengthy shapes of gleaming weapons dangled from their hands - a long blade, a wide machete, a slim butcher's knife.

Guns were lashed to their shoulders, but without the slightest intent to reach for them, they gripped their blood-drenched blades with a certain tightness and advanced in a strict triangular formation toward the four.

Slowly.
Startled and without his shotgun, Ellis took a defensive step back as soon as he got to his feet. At about the same instant, Nick shot full-speed around the van, pure barreling force. He planted himself bare inches beside Ellis, rifle up and aimed, expression all but stone with matter-of-fact murderous intent.

"Don't get any goddamn ideas. One more fucking move and I blow your brains out!" he threatened in this rough, growling tone of voice, not an ounce of emotion in it that wasn't pure fury.

The three interlopers stopped, holding in a loose semi-circle where they were. Coach and Rochelle moved in tight next to Ellis and Nick, bolstering their line. Rochelle seemed hesitant to raise her gun, and Coach held his shotgun up at his hip, pointed only generally in the strangers' direction.

Ellis grasped hard onto Nick's bicep with one hand, pushing the other deep in a pocket to stow away the bullet. His gut instinct told him to hide it for now. The conman didn't so much as blink, ignoring the touch as Ellis anxiously looked past him toward the group.

The woman of the group - her dark hair falling to her jawline, a strong face marked by wild hazel eyes - lifted a hand to her brow, slowly, shading her eyes with the wrist of the hand that wielded a sword. On closer inspection, the heavy blade appeared to be a katana.

More importantly, though, Ellis' eyes caught onto the sleek muzzle poking up over her shoulder; a sniper rifle was lashed to her back. It was heavier than the thin hunting rifles Nick and Rochelle had in their hands, almost military-grade, with a fat scope hitched just before the stock. Ellis' eyes narrowed, tightening fingers around the sniper bullet in his palm and feeling a distinct sense of betrayal.

Amusement crossed her expression, trickling like a contagion to infect the two men at her heels until all three of them seemed poised to laugh.

They didn't.

The man on the right moved to wipe his machete off on his tan cargo shorts, the blood dribbling down the barely-recognizable fabric with a sludgy consistency. "Looks like you are having some car troubles." His voice rolled and halted with a Spanish accent that worked its way around the words, bright brown eyes narrowed as he examined the four facing them down.

Ellis' fingers tightened on Nick's bicep, squeezing at him through his sleeve - the feel of the still-warm bullet in his hand had him almost panicked as he stared at their attackers, but he held his silence, unmoving.

Coach warily adjusted his weight, shifting his grip on his shotgun with a subtle huff. There was distrust written all over his face, in all those tired age marks. He held his ground and spoke with a heavy civility. "We a'ight. We blew a tire - got a mechanic wit' us, though. Figure we can fix it up."

The third person was a hulking bear of a man, broad shoulders and a stout, gutted torso straining under tight red plaid and torn jeans. He grinned, white teeth blocky through a thick blond beard that ate up the whole lower half of his face, adjusting his grip on the bloody butcher's knife as he snorted.
He spun the blade, flipping it against his thumb in an eager, tic-like gesture. "Ain't gonna do you shit. Looks to me that junker's tore up like a used bitch. Say y'all are out of luck."

The shorter man snickered in a lowering tone, lifting a hand to run his thumb along a cut that was bleeding down his sparsely stubbled jaw. He glanced sidelong at the man in plaid, voice thick with mockery. "You'd know about 'tore up bitches,' ¿eh, cabrón?"

Lowering his brows, the bulky man swiveled his butcher's knife to gesture at his companion solidly with the dripping tip. "Sure would, cah-brone." he snorted deeply in a matter-of-fact drawl.

There seemed to be something that had gone over his head, if the shorter man's amusement was any indication.

Rochelle found herself lifting a hand to nervously cup over her mouth, glancing between the three carefully. Her voice rose in confident urgency, though her eyes were widened. "Look, we're just passing through.. we're trying to -"

The woman, voice svelte with an inner humor, interrupted in a practical croon. She let her katana slip down to press its tip into the ground, blood leaking down the metal in slow waves. "Passing through? No, no, not a chance. Your four look exhausted, and if your car's broken down, you'll need some help." Hazel eyes flashed over the woman's shoulder to smile from the two men at her heels to the four survivors. "Right, boys?"

The machete-wielding man gave a grin, relaxing back onto his heels and letting his weapon settle lazily against his shoulder.

"Sí sí. They look like they could use the help..."

Nick bristled despite himself, never having released his grip on his rifle. Green eyes narrowed, voice spitting with sarcastic graciousness. "Oh good, a bunch of idiots with sharp knives are here to save us. Thank God. We've been so fucking helpless until now."

The bearded hulk leaned forward slightly, expression squinting with a certain distaste as his humor disappeared all in a flash. He jabbed with his knife, making Ellis flinch, a protective swell touching his chest at the same time his fingers squeezed urgently on Nick's elbow.

"Y'all see our counts?" the husky man growled. "Bet you pups ain't even seen that many zombies. We been clearin' the way for li'l shits like you."

"Whoa, whoa, whoa." Rochelle quickly coaxed, suddenly stepping forward to lift her hands and wave both Nick and the angering Southerner down. "Come on, guys. We're all just trying to make it out here. Let's not get off on the wrong foot." There was a little panic in her expression, eyes darting between the two riling men. "Nick, just - calm down a second."

The gambler snarled quietly, frame stiff with a refusal to lower his weapon. He just stared, unflinching as Ellis nervously stepped around him, fingers reluctantly releasing the conman's sleeve.

"Guys are so difficult to handle sometimes." the dark haired woman smiled, lips curling easily despite the cut bleeding down her lower lip. "Macho testosterone." Rochelle returned it forcibly, nodding her head, jumping at the offered olive branch.

Trying to ignore the intense glare from Nick and the silent unease from Coach and Ellis, Rochelle turned her palms up gently, focusing her gaze on the other woman. "Okay, look. Let's just get introduced, okay?"
Her voice was strengthening, chin raising with determination as some of the initial fear ebbed. The three were odd, the atmosphere tense.. but they didn't seem overtly hostile, or ill-intentioned.

When nobody protested, she prompted; "I'm Rochelle. These guys -" and she gestured appropriately toward them as she named them. "- are Nick, Coach, and Ellis. We've been heading to the shoreline for a few days."

Crossing her arms over the ruined purple blouse on her body, the woman smirked, eyes narrowing as she examined the four. "Brenda."

Letting his butcher's knife fall to his thigh, the husky man on her left gave a deep clear of his throat and spat sideways, wrinkling his nose a bit as he did. He knuckled a bruised finger over his blood-matted beard. "Jerry."

Plucking at the blood-spattered wifebeater stuck tight to his lithe torso, the third member gave a wide grin and locked eyes with Rochelle rather tightly, head nodding smoothly. "Christophe. You can call me Chris, bonita."

Rochelle's eyes widened just a twitch, utterly caught off-guard by the flirtation that came so simply and easily from the blood-drenched man. Her lips moved in silence as she struggled to react, but she was saved from answering by the other woman's smooth voice.

"You're lucky we found you."

Nick's mouth opened immediately, brow twitching together sharply with a growl and ready to protest the statement, but Ellis stepped in quickly to stop him. He threw himself in front of Nick, blurtling out words with an unprepared hurry rather than let the older man get riled up again.

"It's nice tuh meet y'all!!" Ellis squeezed on the bullet trapped in his pocket and between his fingers, feeling his heart jump when all three of the people turned their gaze on him. He sensed Nick stiffening behind him.

The widely built Jerry grinned, toying his butcher's knife against his shirt and laughing with a guttural rhythm. "Y'hear that?" He craned his head to eye his companions, heightening his voice a bit in mimicry. "'Nice to meet y'all!'" The man only grinned harder at himself. "Kid's glad to meet us."

Christophe joined him, snickering with a rapt twist of his head. Ellis shifted a little, slight discomfort edging up his spine as the mocking struck him. He pulled a small smile up onto his face, fighting for it, plastering it on his face uncertainly.

"W-well sure, I -"

Forcibly, Nick nudged his arm. The Georgian slipped a glance back at him warily, and the conman shook his head. Just once, stone-faced and firm.

Coach wearily rubbed at the back of his neck, speaking up with a slow force and thin humor. The big man forced himself to relax somewhat, though his gaze remained protectively alert. "Don't make fun wit' the boy, he's had a bad 'nough day already."

Brenda snorted, tucking her hair behind her ears, though the short strands made to slip free again soon after. "I can see.. take a Boomer to the face, prettyboy?" There was a coo to her voice, smirking, and she bent her head slightly to catch Ellis’ gaze.

A slight flush darted up his face, jaw tensing under her eyes. He didn't say a word, tightening fingers on his gripped bullet like a lifeline, and Coach stood up for him. The ex-football player shifted his shotgun to rest on his shoulder and shook his head. "Ain't pleasant. So, if y'all don't mind, we should be on our way... sooner we get movin', sooner we find a place to bed down 'round here."

Chris smiled with a little cocky nod of his head, spinning his machete in slow circles with his wrist. "Mm... B, don't we know a hotel just a few streets over that was still lit up?"

She hummed in response, rubbing her chin with her thumb. "Actually we do." Hazel eyes slitted as her lids lowered, lips curving up as she trailed her words. "Say, you guys could tag along if you wanted. Your van's a goner and we can help you out."

Rochelle uncertainly looked over her shoulder, glancing between her companions, her lips pinching and brows moving together. "Ah..." she uttered, unsure. Nick's eyes glared with utter distrust, and Ellis stood with a deer-in-the-headlights silence, his fingertips almost clawing at his hidden bullet.

There was no way to reveal it with the strangers standing right there -

Coach calmly sighed and interrupted, a weary pause to his eyes betraying his discomfort. He made a decision all in an instant, firmly accepting the offer despite that flicker of unsurety on his face. "Sounds like a good deal to me. We don't got much to offer back, 'cept extra hands."

The machete-wielding Spaniard, maybe mid-twenties, smirked. "Lo sabemos." he snickered in what was so clearly a mocking tone, eyes rolling up with a bright humor. He turned around, the other two moving to slip behind him.

Brenda smirked over her shoulder as she walked at his elbow, gesturing the others on with a smooth swipe of the long katana wielded in her left hand. "Consider it a gift." she hummed with a lazy tone of voice. "Between survivors."

Nick growled, firmly lowering his rifle to glare after them. They didn't seem inclined to look back, moving with a cocky assurance that they'd either be followed or not, and it just riled him up even more.

He spat like an angry alley-cat, turning with a twist to face Coach aggressively. "What the fuck are we doing exactly?! Who decided getting cozy with the crazies was a good idea?"

Coach's resigned face started to shift, ready to respond with a certain confidence, but Jerry halted in his steps. Nick's anger had heightened his voice too much for it to go unheard, and the hulking man turned around to stare back toward them.

"Crazies?" the weighty Southerner fiercely returned, chin jutted and bunching his bloodied beard up at his jawline. It looked half like he'd bit into something, red smeared through his facial hair. "Crazy nothin'. You're lookin' at the Angels of Death, shitface. If you got any sense you'll fall in line real quick."

Returning to following his companions, the hulking man left a practically caustic tinge to the air as the four stared after him. It made sense - and yet Nick found himself staring anyway, gut flopping just once in an angry motion.

He rolled green eyes slowly back to the other three, gazing at them an instant. "And there are our angels." Nick snapped, simply, tone bristling in a blatant I told you so."

Rochelle fidgeted with her rifle, gazing down at it as she nodded slightly. "Guess so." she murmured in slight hesitance, glancing up after them to pinch her brows.
Coach grunted heavily. He'd shouldered Ellis' shotgun, snatching it up from the back of the van, and he gestured with it a little bit to make sure Ellis saw it before he forced himself forward. He advanced after the three strangers, setting his shotgun against his shoulder and seeming to resign himself.

"Just keep close, y'all. Van's dead, anyway, and if they know a good place to bunk down... well. They ain't tried nothin' so far, and I'd rather keep 'em where we can see 'em. Just keep close." he rumbled back over his shoulder, voice tired.

Staring after him for a beat, Rochelle slipped a glance between Nick and Ellis. The woman forced a smile and nodded, shrugging reluctantly. "Come on, guys. At least we'll get showers, right? We'll just be careful. Better to be friends with them than piss them off."

She moved to follow Coach, hurrying to slip beside him and raise a hand to his bicep. The woman walked by his side, gaze forward with a nervous quiet as they followed in the Angels' footsteps.

Nick gave a frustrated sigh, slipping his arm into the strap of his rifle. He gazed shortly at Ellis, the mechanic hesitantly returning it, frozen for a moment. "... I don't trust this. At all." Nick stated simply, blunt honesty uttered with a flat tone to his voice.

He started to turn away, waving his hand to encourage Ellis to come after him, but the younger man grabbed the hand with a sudden snatching motion. Nick jerked to a halt, completely and wholly stilling as Ellis' fingers tightened around his wrist.

Green eyes flicked to blue and read the panic in them. Something tightened in Nick's brows, his eyes attentive. "N-Nick." Ellis whispered with abrupt insistence, fear suddenly kicking his heartbeat into overdrive. Nick would know what to do.

Nick examined the Georgian's soft face with a twitching brow, staring an instant before shooting a small glance forward to make sure they weren't falling behind too much and weren't being watched.

He half-snapped, "What..?", forearm twitching underneath Ellis' calloused fingers as he stirred a little from his initial surprise. The Georgian hesitantly dragged his hand out of his pocket, eyes darting to mimic Nick's as he checked to make certain there were no eyes on them.

The Angels walked on, up the road, not concerned with them in the least.

Biting his lower lip, he lifted up his hand to show it to Nick as he uncurled his fingers, displaying the sniper bullet cradled in his palm. The thing was crushed and marked by black rubber from the collision with the van's tire.

Nick's gaze alighted on it, and it took only a split second for that sharp mind to connect the dots.

In one swift motion, the conman tore his hand from Ellis' and gripped the wrist of the hand that held the evidence. Nick, capturing Ellis' gaze firmly as those blues widened a bit at the grip, enunciated out his response carefully.

"Don't say a word. Don't even think about it."

The warm touch of his fingers turned Ellis' hand until the bullet tumbled off and to the concrete, disappearing amidst the blood and gore that splattered the grey stone. Ellis flicked his gaze once from his twisted hand and back to Nick's face, confused into a dropped jaw.

"Wh."
Using the grip on Ellis' wrist, Nick firmly pulled him to start moving. Ellis stumbled a bit but caught up, brows knotted in confusion as he shot a little glance back toward the now-lost bullet. "Why?" he asked, puzzled.

Nick's mouth brushed too-near his ear as the conman whispered to him, sharply, ferocious tone leaving no room for argument. "Play oblivious. Aces in the hole have to stay in the hole - if they're gonna play with us.. fine. Let'em."

The conman let his hand go and stepped away, brushing his suit flat. His expression went to a calm deadpan as he started to fall into place behind Coach and Rochelle. Ellis scooted next to him, feeling a little redness touch his face as his ear tingled from the brush of Nick's breath.

Ellis kept quiet, obediently curling his hands into fists and nodding, wiping the thought from his head. He trusted Nick - he knew what he was doing. Some of the panic lifted, and he relaxed a little, comforted at not being the only one to know.

He could play oblivious, with Nick backing him up.

"Heh - bet y'all can't wait till I get in the shower, h'uh?" the kid playfully prompted, voice lightening as he pawed at his chest a little and scooted up to peer at Coach and Rochelle. They looked at him, some bemusement entering Coach's face as Rochelle snorted.

"Yeah, stinky."

Gazing forward at the calmly strolling silhouettes of the so-called 'Angels of Death,' Nick's green eyes burned with a ferocity that didn't seep into any other part of his face.

_Thing is - I play fucking hard._

Chapter End Notes

Nick couldn't help but glare, watching the procession as the Angels led them down the road. He had a sick twitch in his stomach - judging, hostile. It was eerie watching them fight, taking a visible pleasure in the violence.

It was like they liked being covered in blood. Like they stuck to their blades to get as close to the violence as possible - he could just sense it, see it on their faces, in their voices. Unspoken. Tangible.

It was different.

There was something very wrong with them, and Nick felt this tension, like there were a rubberband held taut just before his face and it would snap free at any instant. His muscles tensed, preparing for it.

"¡Morid como los perros!" Chris yelled with a fanatic edge of excitement, slicing his machete straight across the face of the infected running for him. The zombie shrieked, face splitting open in a gush of blood, and the youth grabbed it by the scraggly hair.

With a few hacks at its struggling neck, he severed its head with a meaty shudder, blood spraying from weak arteries. The man laughed joyously as he flung the head toward the giant Southerner nearby, the skull flying with bloody splatters. "¡Coge!" he burst, voice harshening around the 'g'.

Jerry snarled, barely dodging it as the messy projectile flew past him. He kicked it away, the thing rolling wetly across the concrete, and shook a bloodied fist at the other man. "Told you to quit. You know I don't know that Mexican shit!"

Chris rolled his eyes and sighed with this hum, thumbing his nose at the man and muttering, "Corto de luces.." He threw a hand up as he wiped his other on a drier part of his shirt, chiding the huge man with a casual gesture. "Castellano, Jerry - o español. Spanish! There's six thousand miles between Méjico and España."

"They both ain't here," the plaid-bedecked man grunted, hoisting his butcher's knife up to ready for a zombie that charged out from an open house's door. "Fuckin' wetback." He lashed out when it was just arms-length away, and the knife buried in its chest with a little flash of blood.

Reaching out to grab the thing's grungy shirt, Jerry held it away from himself as he wrenched the knife free and stabbed again, the sleek metal tearing through skin and bone, hacking through ribs.

The zombie clawed and swiped at him, scoring lines against the sleeves of his shirt, but Jerry didn't so much as twitch as he ripped the knife violently downward to tear its chest cavity mostly open. He shoved it off, the thing unmoving as its body crumpled amidst its own innards.

Brenda walked at the front, her stance wide. Dealing with oncoming zombies only required one or two slices from her sharp katana, wielded with an amateur's grip but - nonetheless - effective. It tore through bone and sinew like nothing, lopping off limbs as the woman toyed with her infected prey.

Their rage kept them coming even after they'd lost their arms. She'd merely back up, amusement displayed over her face as the things uselessly staggered at her. Sooner than later, a swift two-handed swing would lop their heads off at the neck, and they'd go down.
She laughed with a sigh as the men argued, brushing a strand of hair from her eyes with a finger that left a streak of blood over her brow. "Jerry, don't embarrass yourself." If the heavyset Southerner heard her, he didn't react. His expression didn't change… but it didn't seem to change that often.

Like it was stuck between rage and lust at all times.

Tossing her head a bit, Brenda called over her shoulder, "Enjoying the show?"

Nick moved carefully down the road, sidestepping the remnants of the Angels' massacre. Blood streaked his shoes despite his attempts, and it agitated him more than it should have. He growled faintly under his breath, glancing back at the three following in loose single file behind him.

Ellis was just a few inches behind him - the kid had latched onto him with a vengeance after sharing the evidence of the Angels' subterfuge. He seemed unsettled, but that was probably more at the secret they were keeping, rather than the violence occurring ahead.

The kid's eyes were riveted thoughtfully on Nick's back more than anything else, anyway.

Coach picked up the rear, his shotgun ready just in case they got flanked. However, the Angels were fronting the battle and little got past them. His expression was a stony mask of calm, betraying nothing.

"Oh yeah. We could really learn a few things." Nick retorted sarcastically, examining Rochelle in particular - she was even worse than Ellis at hiding her thoughts from her face. Not that he was worried for her; he was just observing.

She looked nauseated.

Brenda snorted with some derision, not blind to the mockery. Turning around to walk backwards, she lifted her katana to eye the length of the blade. "Squeamish? Please. They're just shells. They were weak; they died. Now it's us, or them."

Nick crossed his arms over his chest, rifle tight against his back the way he'd strapped it to his shoulder. He gave a sigh that flared his nostrils, trying to soothe his own discontent. Self-control wasn't one of his virtues, but it was far easier when his mind had moved into con mode.

And, for now, keeping the peace to some degree was part of the con.

"Neat logic you have there," he stated simply, some razor to his voice. 'Keeping the peace' didn't mean he had to hold his tongue. "I don't give a shit about killing zombies. I'm just pretty sure getting wet over it isn't as normal."

With a slightly anxious tone of voice, an on-edge sincerity that made Nick's jaw twitch, Ellis reached out to paw at his jacket slightly and warned, "Nick.. careful, man.. don't start no fights."

"We like fights!" Crowing a little laugh from ahead, Chris gave a wave of his machete over his shoulder. His skin was a sunny tan where it wasn't stained with pinks, reds, and blacks. "El traje sure told you, eh, B?"

The woman gave a short blink at Nick before smirking, swiveling her katana faintly as she walked backwards with an unerrring balance. "You're a liar if you say you don't like the freedom. If you just embraced it, you might be doing as good as we are."

Nick snorted, waving a hand in dismissal at her as his gaze went half-lidded. His voice dropped to something indifferent, unconcerned, and she cocked her head at him in interest "Trust me, doll. I know what freedom is. I've just kept my sanity, too."

"Hope your sanity fills the place where your balls were." Jerry grunted, pawing down his front with a hand. Nick gritted his teeth just a little, eyeing the man with an irritated narrow. He would have loved to make him regret that -

- if the Southerner weren't a good few inches taller than him…

…and a fair few pounds heavier than him…

…and carrying a butcher's knife…

A cackle sparked up from an alleyway. The familiar, fetid laughter trembled with utter panic, and the cowed shape of a hunched Jockey came scrambling out onto the street. It clawed at the air, moldy fingers dripping with blood, sprinting toward them on bowed legs with a restrained giggle.

It aimed right for Ellis, and he started to go for his shotgun, ready to intercept it - but Brenda gave a casual wave over her shoulder to stop him. He hesitantly lowered it, head craning slightly in confusion.

Jerry readied his butcher's knife, flexing thick fingers on the handle. "C'mere, you cock-eyed bitch!" He burst into a slight jog, running straight at it without the faintest edge of fear.

The Jockey leapt with a trickling giggle right as the stout man lifted his butcher's knife up, and swung it with a fierce roar. The blade flashed between the Jockey's outstretched arms, and it struck it straight in the face.

The creature's elongated jaw split under the strike, teeth shattered and face falling in around the blade. A gurgled squeal of pain, high-pitched, like the dying keen of a rabbit, escaped it. Jerry calmly let it fall to the concrete, squirming and twitching as blood gushed from its broken face.

He eyed it for a casual moment, rolling his wrist slowly. As the Jockey gave a little broken giggle, whimpering and almost looking up at him, he lifted up a thick booted foot and smashed his heel downwards onto its skull.

Blood, brain matter, and shards of skull spattered against the bottom of his jeans. He twisted his boot a bit back and forth, sending twitches down the Jockey's body as it gave a few last flickers of life.

"Jesus Christ," Rochelle mumbled just faintly, just loud enough for Nick to hear. He didn't react - just flexed his fingers, taking stock of the plaid-garbed man and listening to the realistic voice in the back of his head that pointed out firmly: You cannot take him in a fight.

Nick chewed on that, amending, A fair fight.

Coach stepped toward Rochelle, laying a hand on her shoulder lightly. The big man lowered his head slightly, sighing weightily and murmuring in simple comfort: "It's a'ight, baby girl." There was something discomfited in the crunch of his heavy brows. "Gotta stop 'em somehow."

He didn't sound completely convinced.

Turning around as the Jockey died ahead, Chris wiped his palm flat down the side of his machete, cleaning it with the gesture and holding his hand out as the sloughed-off blood dribbled from his digits.
"As a child, in España," he uttered thoughtfully, eyes on his own hand. "we had la corrida - bullfighting. Watching the torero performing the faena, the bull slowly dying but fighting hard... you forget which one you were cheering for."

Jerry stepped away from the Jockey, shaking his boot off and giving the corpse a swift kick to get it out of his way. He gripped his knife firmly, glancing ahead as his thick beard shifted with a pleased smack of his lips.

"I just like seein’ the cocksuckers squeal."

Rochelle turned entirely around, lifting a hand to pinch at the bridge of her nose. There was almost anger on her expression, overwhelming the nausea. The pleasure they took was almost tangible. The whole thing disgusted her.

Chris’ head perked up as she did, vibrant brown eyes suddenly flicking toward her. He blinked twice before lowering his machete, voice rising to carry to her. "Preciosa, are you alright?" There was the softest lisp in the middle of the word, almost imperceptible, as his tongue caught between his teeth to form a faint 'th' sound where it should have been a 'si'.

"Fine." she near-snapped, forcing herself to turn back around and curling her hands into fists. She rolled her jaw forward, lips taut against one another, eyes hot with a kind of agitation. "You guys are just... really something."

Ellis twisted his head, meeting Rochelle's gaze a bit mournfully, offering a little apology under the bill of his cap. "Ro' - they're just zombies... y'know?"

Rochelle gave a tiny huff, crossing her arms over her chest and averting her gaze slightly. "Doesn't mean you have to mutilate them. They were people once, too. We don't enjoy it, we just do it."

Blinking just a moment, it seemed to take Chris a moment to understand, gaze flicking over her face and the rest of them.

"¡Ay! Of course." the man yelped in sudden inspiration, whipping on his heel to pivot his machete in the air, pointing it toward Jerry and Brenda in a smooth swoop. "We are scareng them. They are not used to Los Ángeles. Gentle!"

Coach squinted slightly, inspecting the Spaniard from afar. Something shifted in his face, not wholly certain, seeming a little inquisitive at the man's earnestness. The big man reached out to re-settle his hand on Rochelle's bicep.

"A little calmin' down wouldn't be outta the question." Coach agreed simply, jumping on the opportunity. "We ain't much for the violence. Just tryin' to keep safe."

An angry grunt left the husky Southerner, pawing fingers violently through his close-cut hair. Jerry spoke like Coach hadn't, gazing toward Christophe with a sneer. "Half an hour'n'you broke like a runt horse. I'll be gentle when I'm rammin' my hand down your throat, amigo."

Chris’ chest started to expand slightly under the blood-drenched fabric of his thin shirt, rising to the threat - but Brenda interrupted, sighing. She reached up to draw her sniper rifle into her hands, tipping it to check the magazine. "Calm down, you two. If our guests are uncomfortable, let's humor them. Guns, now."

Jerry opened his mouth fiercely, ready to argue, at the same time Chris slipped his machete into a makeshift holster at his hip and pulled his assault rifle from its position lashed on his back.
"A kill is a kill, Jerry." Brenda affirmed, gaze sharpening as she ordered harsher: "Guns."

The hulking man gave a subtle growl before shoving his butcher's knife under his belt, visibly stewing. His hands were slow to pull his chrome shotgun from its holster, almost sulking as he obeyed the woman.

Ellis fidgeted a little, crossing an arm over his chest to grip onto his elbow. "Phew. Thank the Lord they're puttin' them knives away." he mumbled gently, sneaking a glance at Rochelle and giving a comforting smile. "See..? They ain't impossible or nothin'. It'll be okay, Ro'."

Rochelle screwed her brow up slightly, blinking with faint surprise as Chris tipped his head to flash a grin at her over his shoulder. She worked her brow into a little dissuading knot, forcing herself to nod at Ellis.

"Yeah.. let's just keep moving, okay, sweetheart? The sooner we get away from all this mess, the better.."

Nick snorted, slipping his hands into the pockets of his jacket and giving a disgruntled exhale. "Which mess is that?" he muttered under his breath, so quiet he was likely the only one to hear it.

The group moved down the road in their clotted formation, the brutal violence switched out for the cleaner execution of bullets. Infected flocked out onto the street from the sandy alleyways between buildings, eagerly hunting out the sound and smell of living flesh.

With the chance of friendly fire far lessened by the way the Angels backed out of the fray, Rochelle and Nick wielded their rifles and took shots around the leading threesome. With an aim honed by adrenaline-rushed practice over the past few days, they weren't unimpressive.

Rochelle landed a bullet straight in the head of a zombie lurching for Chris. The man gave a low whistle and flicked a low-lidded glance over his shoulder. A smile lit up over his lips as he recognized it had been her, and he gave a little purr of, "Gracias, señorita."

She nodded once, simply, but Nick noted the very subtle shift of colour on her cheeks. The gambler allowed himself an instant of amusement at the same time he weighed the observation.

It very well could come in handy. If he could just gather enough information, enough to tip the scales in their favour, were the situation to come to blows…

The shape of a three-story hotel, rising up above the shorter buildings that surrounded it, marked their destination a few blocks down. Brenda gestured to it with her rifle, explaining, "That'd be it. We spotted lights on, but didn't waste any time checking it out. We last a little longer than you."

Nick would've snapped at that, had the lamenting sound of a subtle sob not come from the yard just beside them and interrupted his sarcasm. He stiffened, instantly side-stepping away from the sound and shooting a mistrustful stare at the building that separated them.

"Shit." he grated.

Coach glared an instant in the direction of the noise, shaking his head a bit slowly. He rubbed his wrist at his jaw, exhaling. "Ain't in our way, Nick." There was the tiniest of gentle edges to the big man's gruff voice. He was aware that the conman's reaction was a little more visceral than he'd like to admit.

"Yeah," Ellis piped, reaching up a hand to pat Nick's shoulder reassuringly. Nick twitched a bit under it, not wholly pleased with all the attention. He was tempted to lash out, but all it would do was draw more focus on his intense disinterest in another run-in with the creatures. "We'll let her be. Don't worry 'bout it none."

If he closed his eyes, he could still see his ex's shrieking face, gutting him with razor-sharp claws.

"Let her be?" Brenda echoed, turning entirely around and cocking her hip subtly. She arched up a brow, examining them with some disbelief that was mirrored on Jerry's as the husky Southerner glanced back too. "What, the Witch?"

Rochelle nodded slowly, settling a hand on the top of her rifle's frame. "I.. guess so, yeah. The crying things. They're nasty, we've had a few run-ins with them.. none of them ended very well." Her gaze lowered just a twitch. "A friend of ours turned into one."

Chris, running bloody fingers through his spiked-up hair and leaving streaks of red in the strands, gave a bite of his lower lip as he hummed with trailing sympathy. "Que lástima.. I -"

With a swift jerk of her chin, Brenda interrupted him carelessly, reaching out her hand toward Jerry with a grasping motion. "They're easy. Take a lesson from us." The man seemed about to snarl, but acquiesced to her silent request with a dull silence, offering his shotgun out to her.

Nick curled his fingers into slight fists, agitated as his gaze narrowed sharply. "Lesson? Jesus. You've got to be the most annoying, cocky fucks I've ever met. Those bitches are wicked, and I'm not going to listen to you spew bullshit to stroke your ego."

Brenda snorted simply, taking the shotgun from Jerry's hands. She lifted it up, tossing her rifle back onto her shoulder and holding the shotgun tight. Without retorting, the woman merely turned and started walking for the side of the house where the noise emanated from.

Gaping slightly, Ellis jolted after her, hand reaching up as if to stop her. "Wh-whoa! Miss, whut're you doin'? Them things are dangerous -"

It was Rochelle who snagged the back of his shirt, halting him. Ellis struggled ineffectually before stilling, his head twisting to flick his gaze from Rochelle to Brenda's calmly striding shape.

"She knows what she is doing, tío." Chris hummed with a small bob of his head, thumbing over a brow. Jerry rolled his squinted and small eyes, scratching into his heavily bearded cheek as he watched Brenda disappear around the corner.

There was silence for a moment, broken only by the soft, restrained sobbing of the nearby Witch. A held breath -

- and just as that sobbing shifted into a half-confused snarl, rising into a growl, there was a series of cracking gunshots and a terrible, keening scream of animal agony. It sent the hairs rising up on the back of Nick's neck, and he practically felt the shudder from beside him as Ellis recoiled.

Rochelle croaked a bit, releasing Ellis' shirt out of pure surprise. He scuttled back to make up the distance, almost bumping into her, brows going up as he quickly grabbed for his hat.

There was silence, then, and Brenda reappeared around the corner. She strolled, casually thumping Jerry's shotgun against her thigh with a slow calm, fresh blood speckled against her shirt.

Nick gripped onto his rifle, narrowing his eyes. He licked his lips, slowly, examining her closely. The ghosted echo of gunshots and that inhuman scream still reverberated in his head. "... So, they do die." he reluctantly uttered, rolling a shoulder in its socket.
Jerry smirked, crossing broad arms over a barrel chest. "Couple good shots to their head, and they die screamin'. Gotta catch them unawares, while they're sobbin'. Step to the bitches and shoot'em up good."

When Brenda reached them, a smile lit her face. Her eyes were dark below slightly messy brows, and she hummed faintly before she spoke.

"Everything dies. It's just a matter of how long it takes."
Chapter 77

The hotel's front door refused to open.

It only took a moment or two of eyeing the blockaded door for action to be taken. Nick would've suggested looking for a back door or going through a window, but no. With a running start, Jerry went at it, his shoulder turned forward like a battering ram.

The husky man collided with a resounding thud, the door crushing inward with the creaking death cry of wood. He barely skidded to a stop in the threshold as the door broke off its hinged and slammed into the floor inside, shrugging his shoulder a bit to roll off the pain.

Dust sparkled in the air from the shattered wood, and Nick squinted a bit into the doorway. "I would've done something a little less extreme, but whatever. That works." he muttered, cuffing a ringed knuckle at his nose.

"Jerry's a little excitable." Brenda smirked, stepping forward to maneuver through the doorway. She walked over the fallen door with a careful balance, glancing around the lit lobby. It was empty - maybe the hotel had been closed when the outbreak hit, or they'd all evacuated.

There was a check-in counter straight ahead, and a few scattered couches, flanked by tables that were decorated with plastic flowers and pamphlets. The ground was all grey-tan carpeting, a monotone drollness to the environment.

Rochelle gave a slight snort, rubbing at her arm. She glanced at Jerry hesitantly as he patted his shoulder. "You okay, there? People break arms like that..."

He outright laughed, dropping his hand and flexing his arm. He wasn't overly muscular, just huge and broad, but the motion was still intimidating as his bloody plaid sleeves stretched over his bicep. "They do if I'm aimin' for 'em." he scoffed simply.

Coach rubbed at the back of his neck, giving a weary chuckle as he turned around to gaze around the street, making sure they hadn't attracted any zombies with the noise. "I'll believe that. Hate to play you in football."

"I ever tell y'all 'bout the time muh buddy Keith broke his shoulder tryin' tuh bust down a door...?" Ellis' head perked up a bit, grinning slightly as he reminded himself of the story. Nick immediately tensed up. There was no way Ellis' talkative tendencies would go over well, but there was no stopping him.

Ellis tossed his hands up, voice rising as he relaxed. "See, Paul was in charge'uh the garage keys, but he lost 'em without knowin' - I mean he ain't the kind'uh guy tuh lose stuff, so we was real surprised - so Keith was tryin' tuh get intuh the garage, so he got this crowbar, 'n' -"

Jerry pushed into the doorway, boots cracking on the fallen door as it shifted under his weight. "Someone shut him up?" he growled, irritated. "I got a knife for that if y'all need."

The flare of anger that bled red into Nick's consciousness had him grinding his teeth in a subtle motion. It was hard not to say something, in the face of such a threat to the kid, but he held his silence as the husky man walked into the hotel after Brenda.

"Ignore him, mis amigos." Chris muttered sideways, stepping around Nick to pass through the doorway. "He has the brain of a pig."
Nick crossed his arms over his chest, snorting slightly. "And he's dirtier than one." He didn't bother glancing at Ellis; the younger man was fiddling with his hat in silent embarrassment, and that was sign enough that Jerry had cowed him.

"Ha!" Chris cried as he maneuvered over the fallen door and turned back around. The Spaniard leaned in out of the doorway with one hand gripped on it to balance himself, offering the other, bloodied hand out toward Rochelle with a quirked smile and lowered chin.

"Ten cuidado, bonita. I'll help you -"

Rochelle's face darkened slightly, lips tightening against each other. She slipped her arm into the strap of her rifle and lifted her chin, walking through the doorway without more than a glance at his extended hand. "I can walk over a door, thanks, Chris." she muttered, shortly.

She glanced around the lobby, hanging close to the door. Brenda had ducked behind the counter, bent over and examining the computer system set up before her. She moved with some familiarity, a faint buzz sounding out as if something was printing, though Rochelle couldn't see exactly what she was doing.

Jerry stood idly next to the staircase that led up into the further floors, resting his shotgun across his shoulders so he could hook his wrists on either end in a casual gesture.

Chris glanced after her with an almost sad curl of his rejected hand, sighing as he leaned against the doorway slightly. With a subtle slump, he glanced at the three yet outside and waved them in.

Nick couldn't help but snort, shaking his head slightly as he slipped his hands into the pockets of his jacket and moved to step through the doorway somewhat delicately. "Aww, we don't get a hand in? I'm disappointed." he quipped carelessly.

A little wrinkle touched Chris' nose as he backed up. There was a light in his eyes, though, watching Ellis skitter in after Nick and Coach trudge in last. "Let's not and say we did, eh?"

Brenda straightened up from her work behind the counter, displaying a short stack of keycards settled in her palm. "There. Room keys." She smirked a little, snatching up a pen and scratching numbers onto their plastic faces with a grating sound. "Should be the first four upstairs - or do you snuggle together at night to keep away the bad dreams?"

Sighing a little, Coach sniffed once and rubbed over his nose. "Four keys is good, thanks.." He approached the counter, holding out an open hand, and Brenda smirked as she handed the cards over. "Are y'all gonna stick around?"

Brenda shrugged up her shoulders, using a pinky to brush her short hair behind her ears. "That's more a question for you. You're the one in our path." She glanced at Jerry and Chris, lifting up a hand to snap gently. "Come on, boys. Let's hunt up some lunch."

Grunting a little, Jerry turned around to walk back to the door, holstering his shotgun in favor of his cleaver. "What, we're feedin' 'em too?" he growled, slipping a hostile glance toward each survivor as he passed them by.

When Ellis in particular didn't flinch, the husky Southerner paused in his stride, baring his teeth under the fur of his thick beard to snarl at the youth. Ellis stiffened his jaw and just blinked, staring out from under the bill of his cap. Their gazes held.

Jerry moved on with a small flare of his nostrils, ducking out of the hotel in frustration. Ellis hunched a bit the moment he left, giving a weighty sigh of "Hoh mah gawd..." and sneaking a glance at Nick, eyes wide.

The conman merely smirked, the expression hollow.

Chris sighed idly, crossing his arms behind his back and moving to follow in the hulking man's wake. "¡Hostia, Jerry! Calm down. We will feed you, too." He moved toward the door, glancing toward Rochelle with a smile as he passed her. "Anything I can get you, bonita?"

With a bite to her tongue, Rochelle fisted her hands carefully with a shake of her head. "Just food, thanks." she responded with an even tone, shifting a glance toward Coach almost helplessly.

Coach gave a small chuckle, just shaking his head in response as Chris smiled widely. The man palmed a hand over his chest, sighing a bit and promising in a low murmur, "I will improvise."

Brenda walked up behind Chris as he spoke, shoving a hand against his back and pushing him with her palm. "Move it." she ordered brusquely, eliciting a yelp from the man as he hurried to escape her, rushing out the door.

He called "¡Te voy a echar de menos!" behind himself, voice earnest even as it faded.

Unable to help himself, Nick snorted as they disappeared, looking toward Rochelle with a smirk. "Aww, he's going to miss you." he mocked, waggling his shoulders a bit. She gave him a helpless whine, palming over her face.

The atmosphere suddenly changed. Tension drained with the Angels' disappearance, freeing their voices and loosening muscles they'd almost been unaware were clenched. Like they took a group sigh together, relaxing.

"Is that what he said..? Oh, God.." She turned miserably, setting her forehead with a groan against Coach's shoulder. He patted her back in comfort, though there was poorly restrained amusement on his face.

"You got an admirer." he gruffed, sympathetically.

Ellis perked slightly, glancing from the tormented Rochelle to Nick's face for a lengthy moment before speaking up. "Oah, you know Spanish, Nick?" he questioned with burgeoning curiousity, unable to help himself.

The conman shrugged, some of his amusement draining from his face. "I married one. You have to pick up some things." He rubbed at his jaw with a thumb, rustling against his building facial hair, a simplicity touching his tone. "That or get shit-talked without knowing."

Coach, still patting Rochelle's back, gave a chuckle. "If you hear that Chris boy talkin' indecent about Rochelle, don't you go translatin'. Don't wanna hear that shit." He extended the hand that held their room keys, offering two to Nick. "Anyway.. let's all get cleaned up. Meet in the hall after you're done. We got some talkin' to do."

Smirking again, Nick took them with a dark wink, tossing one of the keycards over his shoulder to Ellis. The kid caught it easily, eyeing the rectangular shape with a bit of a furtive drop of his chin. "Don't worry. I'll be keeping all of that entirely to myself."

Rochelle gave a pained squeaking sound, raising a hand to clamp over her eyes tightly. "Oh my God. Someone hit him!" she begged, hunching her shoulders.

The conman started to laugh, not at all expecting anything to come of it. When Ellis' hand suddenly whacked the back of his head, he blinked, face flickering entirely blank. Slowly, Nick turned around, mouth closing into a taut line.

Green eyes stared down blue ones, darkening with jagged agitation that blossomed over his face with a disbelieving anger. Ellis' grin was wide and confident as he shifted a bit from foot to foot, antsy underneath the older man's rising fury.

"She told me to." Ellis hummed a bit, lowering his chin and blinking slowly as if he could talk his way out of it.

"Fucking hick." was all Nick said before lurching forward to try and grab for him. Just what he intended to do was a mystery - mostly because the instant he shifted to move, Ellis was skidding around and sprinting across the room, hand clamped onto his hat to keep ahold of it.

Coach and Rochelle both struggled not to laugh as the two men bolted across the room. Ellis scrabbled for the door of the stairway, managing to scoot inside and try to kick it shut behind himself.

Nick caught it on a palm before it shut, thrusting through the doorway and chasing the Georgian up the stairs. "Get the fuck back here, Fireball!" Nick snarled, using the railing to vault himself a little faster as Ellis gained on him. The younger man was a bit quicker on his feet, even putting aside Nick's bad leg.

"You do not fucking hit me and then run away!"

"I do if I run quicker'n you, Mr. Gamblin' Man!" the Georgian beamed, broken down into guffawing laughter between half-pants. He thundered up the steps, workboots hard on the carpeted stairs as he skidded around the bend, reaching the second floor.

The gambler felt the muscles of his legs burning as he ran up the steps, eyes narrowed with a feral intent as he thrust himself up the last step. Ellis didn't bother to shut the door this time, scrambling to get his room keycard arranged properly in his hand as he bolted through it.

Ellis glanced hurriedly at the door numbers, finding the one that matched the scrawled '2' Brenda had inscribed on it. He was struggling to stop laughing, giving a squirm as he spotted his door. The Georgian quickly scrambled up to it, trying to slide it into the electronic lock, fingers shaking with adrenaline and laughter all at once -

He shoved it in and tore it out, too quick, too messily. The machine beeped a denial and blinked a red dot at him, rejecting his attempt.

"Oh, fer -!"

Nick collided with his back with a growl, pushing him hard into the door with palms to his shoulders. Ellis' laughter cut off with a sharp gasp as his body was suddenly shoved into the flat face of the door, Nick's body pressing into his.

"Don't fucking hit -" Nick started to fume, seething, only to have his voice halt to a stuttering breath. He quieted slightly, lids lowering, the tension fading from his body as his hips brushed against the slope of Ellis' rump. He'd been denied the previous night, and the contact sent blood flooding from his head toward better regions.

He ached.

There was a moment of silence, with just their exertion-strangled breaths to break it. Nick's hands kept a vicelike grip on Ellis' shoulders, holding him against the door. His breath panted against the back of his neck, bringing goosebumps to the other man's skin as Ellis gave the smallest of inquisitive sounds.

The urge to press closer against him… flip him around and rut between those willing legs… was almost overwhelming. The stress of the afternoon and the adrenaline of the chase - which had, in all honesty, not been sexual until that very instant - fueled a sudden lust that nearly overwhelmed all sense.

It was the sound of rising footsteps from the stairwell that had Nick suddenly retreating back. He stared for an instant at Ellis as the Georgian, reddening slowly as he glanced at the conman, took a step away from the door and turned to look at him.

"... Go take a shower. You stink." Nick snapped simply, turning away and shrugging a shoulder slightly closer to his jaw. He glanced down toward his own room key, examining the number and seeing he'd been handed '3'.

Ellis gave a slightly embarrassed lower of his head, fidgeting with the keycard in his hands as he watched Nick walk away. "Prissy cityslicker..." With a little self-soothing huff, the mechanic turned and unlocked his door more carefully this time. It allowed him in this time, and he stepped inside.

It only took a few seconds for Nick to come to a stop in the middle of the hallway. He stared idly toward his room, just a few feet away, thumbtip rubbing on the plastic surface of his keycard. An invitation to a complimentary breakfast was printed on the front in brilliant yellow text.

It was a simple question. He could go to his room. Or...

With a decisive stride, Nick turned around and quick-walked it back to Ellis' doorway. The door latch guard had slid inward to block it from closing all the way - he wasn't sure if Ellis had done that on purpose, and he didn't bother to think on it. He just thrust the door back open and stepped inside before Coach and Rochelle reached the top of the stairs.

Ellis had his hand on the bathroom door handle, ready to open it, when Nick's sudden intrusion made him jump. He craned his head to blink at the conman, startled, tensing up almost defensively. "Uh… is somethin' wrong..?" he questioned as Nick flipped the latch and shut the door behind himself.

Standing stiffly against the door, the conman stared at him for a moment, hands in fists at his sides. It was like Nick honestly didn't have a response. He just examined him from afar with a tight stare.

Slowly breaking out of his stiff freeze before the doorway, the older man casually dragged a hand through his hair and merely retorted, "No.", moving forward to adopt a perch on the edge of one of the two double beds that took up most of the floorspace. Ellis watched him set his rifle down on the floor, and gradually broke into a gentle smile.

The kid gave a good-natured little chuckle, rubbing at the tip of his nose with a curled knuckle, and nodded his head.

"Okay."

Nick held silent as Ellis slipped into the bathroom and shut the door. He listened acutely to the rustling and shifting through the doorway, brows knotting up slowly. There were plenty of things 'wrong' - but the clumsy sounds of Ellis' existence made it all a little easier to handle.
Since when do you not want to be alone, Nicolas?
Chapter 78

The shower poured down steaming as it struck Ellis' back. He groaned with the sensation, ducking his head as the hissing water fell down the slopes of his frame, hot water playing over sore muscles and washing away dirt and blood.

He carefully lifted up his hands and ran fingers through his hair, raking through curls and encouraging the water to cleanse the dirty strands. Turning his face up into the stream, Ellis shook his head furiously, water drenching his face.

He let the burn of the hot shower grow against his closed eyes and cheeks until he truly couldn't stand it, twisting his head out from under the water and gasping. The scalding, wet sensation was bliss to parched and decay-clogged senses.

Running his hands gently over his chest, fingertips scrubbing over the soft muscle of his pecs, the kid flinched periodically as he touched onto sore cuts and bruises. The pain of nudging injuries was outweighed by the simple pleasure of running, hot water, but the pain remained.

He'd stripped the bandages off his forearm, and as he stood under the pouring water, he lifted his arm to examine the bite wound there. The scabbed semi-circle bitten into his skin was ringed with purple and yellow, ugly bruises bled into his skin. Other than that, though, it seemed on its way to healing.

He'd gotten lucky.

Gently dunking the injury under the shower's spray, wincing as he did, he surveyed the rivulets of off-color red that flowed down his body and circled into the small drain at the far end of the tub. The grime that had gathered on his skin swirled away under the heat.

Try as he might, he couldn't shake the awareness of their questionable safety, and he couldn't stop his thoughts wandering toward the Angels. They were acting docile enough - except, of course, for Jerry.

Jerry honestly scared him.

He was built like Keith's brother, Paul, but larger and angrier. Paul was docile and calm, hard to rile or upset - almost the polar opposite of his younger brother. Jerry was fury and rage. Ellis felt like he wouldn't hesitate to hurt someone.

Ellis was intimidated by him, and was very glad they'd gotten away from him for however long it was. Brenda seemed... composed, but he sensed there was something else under her calm. He didn't like her, either. He didn't know about Christophe. The man liked Rochelle, which made Ellis like him, but he was working with the others.

He, presumably, had agreed with the choice to shoot their van. It wasn't impossible that he was just putting on an amicable front, to mislead them.

Ellis frowned.

Cupping his hands under the shower water, he let it build up into a puddle on his palms and splashed it, scrubbing, into his face. The mostly-healed cut on his cheek stung fiercely, along with plenty of other little injuries.
Ellis was about to reach for the tiny bottle of soap perched neatly on a shelf above the tub's rim when he heard the door open.

Startling, Ellis grasped onto the plastic-coated curtains that separated him from the bathroom and held them still, poking his head out from the side with an almost bashful hunch behind the curtains. He peeked out into the bathroom.

"N-Nick!" he protested, eyes widened under the curly mess of hair plastered on his forehead. The conman hadn't even bothered to shut the door, walking up to the bathroom counter on shoeless, black-socked feet. "Whut the hell!"

The gambler snorted slightly, glancing sideways at him as he pulled open the counter drawers and rifled through the complimentary supplies secreted away. "I want to shave. Calm down. It's not like I haven't seen you naked, anyway, dumbshit."

Ellis stood there for a moment, squirming on his feet under the hissing shower as he examined the older man. "Well.. yeah, but - ..." Nick had stripped off his jacket, handsome frame slouched there as he looked through the drawer. "Well, could yuh at least - close the door? Jeez.."

Nick stilled his hands for a minute, turning his head to meet Ellis' gaze with a dull stare. Barely withholding a sigh, he turned around and leaned toward the door, closing it with a tight click. "Kid. Shower."

The younger man huffed slightly as he tossed the curtains back into place, turning back under the water. He closed his eyes, burying his head under the steaming shower and gasping his mouth open a little as the water poured down his features.

He reached out to snatch up the soap bottle, turning his head out of the water as he popped it open. Squeezing a glob of it into his palm, the kid blinked repeatedly and carefully started to scrub his torso. He could hear the sound of Nick's success in finding supplies to shave with, hear the hiss of shaving cream.

Liquid soap turned into a thick foam between his fingers, lathering up on his skin in thick swathes of bubbles. Stretching a bit from side to side to spread the sweet-smelling soap across his body, Ellis tried to ignore Nick's presence.

That was difficult.

His mind kept drifting toward him, imagining those swift fingers lathering up his jaw, the soapy foam spread over his bearded cheeks. The concentration that would undoubtedly draw his face into a look of steely focus, dragging a razor along the shape of his lower face, shearing his jawline down to smooth skin.

Ellis couldn't decide if the actions were intrinsically attractive, or if he just found them attractive because Nick was doing them. Maybe he just liked everything the older man did.

Suddenly possessed by an urge he couldn't quite stifle, Ellis leaned to the side and snagged a fingertip on the edge of the curtain. Feeling a blush rise up over his face, he craned his neck until he could peek past it.

Nick leaned forward on the cabinet, his body braced with one lowered hand that rested its palm on the counter. The rest of his frame fell to a casual slump, legs crossed, and he had his chin slightly lifted as he gripped the cheap plastic razor between his thumb and index finger.

Shaving in slow lines, the conman worked with a quick and practiced intensity, shaking off globs of lathered soap in the sink. His features uncovered with each stroke, wet skin gleaming subtly behind the razor's touch.

A blank satisfaction eased his brow, examining his own face in the mirror as he cleaned up. The man looked as good clean-shaven as he did rugged - Ellis' eyes traveled across his features for a moment, suddenly wondering what he'd look like if it were a normal day.

Neat. Tidy. Dressed in something that hadn't gone through the apocalypse.

Ellis had just let out a tiny sigh, fascinated, when Nick's gaze flicked sideways and caught him staring. The kid gasped, jolting back reflexively, despite the fact that he'd blatantly been seen.

A plastic-sealed toothbrush suddenly shot straight through the crevice he'd left between the curtains and the wall of the shower. It made him yelp, slipping slightly as he scrambled to catch his balance. There was a cushy mat on the bottom of the tub that kept him stable.

"Hey!" he protested, bending down carefully to save the makeshift projectile from the rushing water trickling over the bottom of the tub. He craned his head back out of the shower, expression chastising. "Don't throw stuff!"

Ellis chucked it back at him, catching him in the shoulder. The conman jolted slightly with a careful jerk back of his head to avoid nicking himself with the razor. He snorted, patting his shoulder off where the toothbrush had left a little imprint of water. "Don't stare at me."

Huffing a bit, Ellis pushed the curtain back into place, turning back into the stream of water to avoid the topic. He rubbed his stomach lightly, enjoying the scattering droplets as the water struck his chest.

He was quiet for a moment, gazing up at the ceiling with a slight redness to his face. He couldn't exactly determine if it was caused by the heat of the water, or embarrassment. However, their silence had been broken, and Ellis found himself talking within a few beats. He turned his head, scruffling at his ear, and called gently to the conman just across the room.

"Do you trust 'em, Nick?"

Seeming unperturbed by the change of subject, Nick gave a loud sigh of derision, clacking and rustling sounds marking his movement. "Shit, no. They remind me of some old acquaintances - and believe me, that's not a compliment."

Ellis thoughtfully raised up an arm, scrubbing soap into either armpit. "Why ain't they doin' anything...? They're bein' nasty'n'such, but they ain't done nothin' threatenin' or nothin'. Heck, I think Ro's bein' courted."

He said it so conspiratorially that Nick laughed, a little short as he stifled it after a second. Water ran in a short spurt from the sink, shut off again after a moment. "I don't know, kiddo. They've got something up their sleeves, and I don't like it."

Nick quieted for a moment, not a sound breaching the curtain, and Ellis stilled with a hand covering his eyes from the spray of water.

"... Yer smart, Nick. What'cha think is goin' on?"

He could hear the conman inhale, deeply, and exhale deeper. The sound was thoughtful, but the older man withheld whatever he was mulling over. Abruptly reversing the conversation a few seconds, Nick lowered his voice to a sly tone. "So, Ro's being courted, huh?"
Ellis' brows screwed up a little at the question, turning around to rest his shoulder against the wall of the shower and gaze toward the conman though the curtains blocked his vision. ".. Well, yeah. You been watchin' 'em same's me. I was thinkin' about tellin' him she's got a boyfriend, but I figure she can do that herself."

Nick's voice deepened, just a little. "Did I court you?"

The Georgian snorted outright, rolling up his eyes a little and ruffling his hands in his hair. The question made him blush, examining his toes in the pooling water. "No," he responded with a bit of a huffy air. "Yuh jumped me like'uh typical rude cityslicker."

Nick gave a laugh, sharp at the edges but - softer, somewhere in the center. The water ran again outside the shower, and the conman's voice was a bit muffled as he was patting his face down with a towel. "I guess you're right."

Ellis smiled a little, turning his body toward the shower so he could rub at his wounded forearm. A soft wistfulness snuck into the twist of his lips, eyes closing. That doubt crept back in, stealthily, encroaching on his thoughts. Rochelle's questions came back to him.

Courting was for romance. Did Nick consider them romantic - did he want them to be?

Part of him wanted to ask. It was just a little part of him, though, snuggled away under the gut instinct that said he shouldn't; Nick was Nick, and he'd be selfish to push him any further than he was willing to go.

But maybe he was a little scared to ask, too.

Focusing on showering, Ellis gave a little sigh and smiled, stretching his hands behind himself to rub at what he could reach of his back. It wasn't the time, anyway, when they had worse things to deal with.

Ellis was just about to turn the conversation back toward the Angels, when the curtains suddenly rattled down the railing. Its movement brought a flood of bright light and Nick's attentive green gaze.

The Georgian yelped like he'd been smacked, his panic splitting his brain into two halves: one that jolted him to spin around and hide his front, and another that jolted him to press against the wall of the shower and hide his back.

Frozen with indecision, Ellis stood under the drizzling shower with a small gape of shock as the clean-shaven Nick smirked in at him from where he stood outside the shower. There was still a little shaving cream just below his right jawline.

He'd taken his shirt off, body bared to the air, all cuts and bruises and chest hair, a confident presence that loomed over Ellis. His smirk was curled with intent, propping the foot of his injured leg against the closed toilet. He gently tugged his pantleg up so he could undo the knots of his makeshift bandage.

Ellis could only vaguely struggle at words, body melting slowly back against the wall as Nick's eyes ticked over his body while the shower pattered against it. "Wh-wha- Nick - Whut're you -?"

The gambler cocked his head to one side, quietly. The grey undershirt slipped off his leg, a greasy line of antibiotics shimmering along the fabric where it had been locked tight to Nick's skin. His injured leg, burned from ankle to knee all along the swell of his calf, had reached an aching shade of red as it healed.
The skin was still mottled and painful, but it looked much better than it had been previously. Ellis would have been proud, if he weren't so distracted.

Nick smirked a bit, lowering his hands to gently unbuckle his belt. "Jumping you." Sliding the leather undone with little metallic clicks, he sunk his thumbs under the waistband of his slacks and boxers.

Ellis' gaze followed with a wordless obedience as he pushed them down his frame, stepping out of them smoothly. Nick licked his lips, smirking wider as he garnered Ellis' rapt attention. Blue eyes widened slightly as they took in the stark nakedness bared to them, and wider at Nick's graveled tone of voice. "Like.."

The conman folded his slacks easily, then pried his feet free of their socks. He tossed the lot over to the bathroom counter where his shirt was neatly folded. ".the rude.."

Ellis' gaze was helplessly drawn up to meet Nick's as the conman's green eyes burned into his. He took his rings off in a smooth motion - one from his right hand and two from his left. They were placed in a careful pile on the edge of the counter. ".cityslicker.."

Nick stepped into the tub with one simple movement, one foot slipping over the wall and catching his balance before he let his injured one move to follow. The shower immediately took to the task of soaking him, droplets of water catching on his skin as some of it struck him and some of it misted off of Ellis' skin.

"..I am."

All concept of space disappeared in an instant. They were just there, together, no distance between them even as they had yet to touch. Ellis couldn't so much as breathe, staring with parted lips, goosebumps rising over his skin in defiance of the hot water.

He must've been breathing, though, because the tiniest of "Nick.."s left him, just a faded utterance.

Nick reached back and swept the curtain back into place with a smooth swoosh of rings on the railing. As a dimness covered them from the stifling sheets, the conman advanced the step between them and Ellis found himself gripped in circling arms.

His eyes shut instantly, surrendering as Nick's mouth latched onto his neck. The smooth brush of Nick's cheek against his jaw was a strange feeling, Ellis' light hints of peach-fuzz stubble now the only friction between them, but the conman didn't so much as pause.

Teeth grazed at his neck, sucking lightly at wet skin between tiny bites. The attention had Ellis' head rolling to the side, a moan tearing out of him. The sound only heightened when Nick's hands started to trace down his back.

They followed every slope, every divot - stroking along slick skin and pulling him closer. Their bodies pressed with an unabashed kind of closeness, legs and torsos nuzzling as they shifted this way and that, blindly following the motions of the other.

Nick trailed up his neck, licking and nipping at wet skin, moving up to his jaw.. tracing down along it, grazing over the gentle slopes of his lover's chin.. and then, suddenly, their mouths were locked amidst streams of errant water, lips playing against each other and tongues brushing with a slow intimacy.

Mumbles of the gambler's name were lost in the hiss of the water, and Ellis let his arms slip up, wrapping around Nick's neck and using the grip to push against him harder. He wanted to be closer, tighter, drowning in the heat and drug of touch.

Nick slipped his hands down, fingers searching with a grasping determination, following the lines of Ellis' thin waist until they reached his hips. Ellis couldn't help but moan, shivering slightly as they sunk to grip onto his thighs, curling just beneath his rump.

He was pushed back with a surge, thudding against the wall of the shower as Nick's hands pulled one of his legs up, forcing Ellis' thigh to brace against his hip. Ellis arched his head back, pressing into the wall, groaning as the position pushed Nick's stiffening length against his.

All of their own volition, Ellis' fingers jolted up to twine and curl in Nick's hair, the strands going silky-soft as they got wet. He clutched at it, exhaling hard as a low growl escaped the older man - but it was aroused, not irked.

Those lean hips rocked in a slow motion against him, hard flesh nudging and rubbing. The shower made everything slick, and Nick thrust him against the shower wall in a fierce frot, never quite pulling away - just relaxing down, then grinding upwards.

Fingers gone wild in the seeming permission they'd gotten, Ellis gripped tightly onto the hair between his knuckles, pulling Nick's head a little closer so he could push their mouths tighter together. Their breaths huffed between driving kisses, water sneaking between their lips as the shower misted through the air.

"Lord - nh.." Ellis whimpered between the ferocious attacks of Nick's mouth. The conman shifted his attention to the kid's lower lip, only barely making it easier for him to talk. "Sh-shit.. Nick - please -"

Nick silenced him with a kiss so hard his head hit against the wall of the shower, forced back. Ellis' eyes shut against the speckling of water against his face and the pulse of arousal that burst up his spine, making his body quiver.

A growl passed through the kiss, deep and hungry.

The Georgian was vaguely aware of Nick's hands leaving his thigh, trailing away. He pay attention, just hooking his leg around Nick's to keep it raised and drowning under the biting, kissing, licking pressure of Nick's soothing assault. He moaned deep in his throat, hearing a subtle echo of the sound from the Northerner.

All Ellis knew was, a few breaths later, Nick's hand slid underneath his thigh and drew a finger up against the delicate muscle that ringed his entrance, exposed by his raised leg. The touch made him near-shout a vague phrase against Nick's mouth, the sound a mixture of pleased and pleading.

"Shh," Nick murmured against his mouth, so quiet it was just a subtle sound under the hiss of the shower - but he pinned Ellis hard against the wall immediately after, hips rocking up a little to force Ellis' leg further into a curl and spread him wider.

Ellis' body squirmed, spine arching uselessly in the bare inch that Nick's feral press gave him to move. He gasped senselessly against the older man's mouth, quaking upwards in a jolting arch that let him rub against Nick's digit, back scraping against the smooth wall of the shower.

Nick was panting through his nostrils, brows screwed up in fierce concentration. He pushed against the tense muscle, massaging without penetrating, watching and listening to Ellis' reactions in quiet fascination. His stare should've made Ellis embarrassed.

It didn't.
Ellis could only take it so long. He shuddered, dragging his hand from Nick's scalp and reaching down. He grabbed around their erections, thumb and digits circling to press them together. Nick stiffened at the gesture, then shifted his free hand to grip the side of Ellis' head and hold his cheek, fingertips curled at his jawline and ear.

Lips pressed together to stifle them both, Nick thrust into the squeeze of Ellis' digits, all while the fingers of his free hand were kneading at his entrance in hungry stimulation. Nick dared to slip a fingertip past the tight muscle, but no more, without any lubrication to speak of.

It was enough.

Between the friction of their frotting and the teasing at penetration, Ellis could only manage a whining exhale, the sound flooded and husky with pleasure when it broke a little in the center. Nick's weight pushed harder, till there was no space between them at all.

Their bodies moved in slow unison. The hot trickle of water between them, the foggy quality of the air, the half-murmurs and names uttered in gasps, the constant kisses traded between their lips, the pleasure traded between thrusts and squeezes - it all mixed into this intoxicating, suffocating act.

Even when the motions turned jagged, orgasm rising in this impatient wave that almost came upon them unexpectedly, neither of them broke pace. Ellis gripped his fingers tighter, wrist moving to stroke in time to Nick's thrusts against him. Pleasure tingled through his body, building on his skin, overwhelming his senses.

Release came in rolling waves, blinding and deafening Ellis to everything but the way Nick's body arched up against his, compressing him against the wall as he shuddered. The way Nick's breath caught against his lips, the way his hand gripped the side of Ellis' face, possessive and desperate, thumb biting into his cheek. The stuttered sigh that left him, hot and full of honeyed pleasure. How his eyes slipped shut, how his head cocked to the side.

The orgasm that rocked Ellis' body had him shivering as he came onto his own fingers, hips bucking and a cry leaving him that vaguely resembled a plea - though for what, he didn't know. All Ellis knew was that he loved the heat between them, insulated by the warm water and the humid air.

He loved the feeling in his chest as they came down.

He loved… this.

Nick slowly, softly, moving with a certain exhaustion, slipped away from the wall of the shower and lowered himself tenderly to sit on the edge of the tub, crushing the curtains into a fold underneath him. His arms refused to let Ellis go, and the Georgian had nowhere to go but onto his lap, turning to slip and sit on his thighs. The conman silently caught his breath, eyes closed.

Ellis relaxed down against him, his arms looping over Nick's shoulders. He slumped, turning his face into the man's wet shoulder with a tiny, content sigh. His hands idly slipped down to stroke at the back of Nick's neck, tracing between his shoulderblades.

He didn't expect the other man's hands to do the same - but for a moment… a passing, subtle moment… they did. Faintly moisture-wrinkled fingertips raised up and touched onto the back of Ellis' wet head, brushing through his short curls. They traced along the sides of his head, playing over muscular shoulders and down a gently trembling back.

…and then Nick shifted, hands dropping with a calm abruptness to the edge of the tub on either side of them. He was quiet for a moment, shoulders shifting under Ellis' touch, and then let his chin lift to nudge Ellis' cheek with his forehead.

"Let's clean off, Ace."
The mirror turned back Nick's stare, reflecting the poor mood that stirred and brewed within the pale colors of his eyes. His fingers moved in a well-practiced path to brush his hair into place, other hand reluctantly grasped on the thin spraycan of hairspray he'd scavenged from the bathroom counter.

The spray smelled like chemicals, an unpleasant burn that made him long for hair gel, but it was beyond him to care. Piecing his appearance together was like some ritualistic effort to maintain what the apocalypse had torn from him - and there was a cautious fervor to it.

He was the same person he'd always been.

The divorce hadn't changed anything.

The outbreak hadn't changed anything.

Ellis - most importantly Ellis - hadn't changed anything.

The mantra felt stubborn and tacky in his head, fighting the unpleasant reality surfacing in his brain: the clumsy, over-exuberant Southerner had become important to him. His company, his voice, his stupidly joyful smile, his safety. The intimate warmth of his body.

It was almost impossible to fight the lure of Ellis' personality; for all his pride, Nick knew he wasn't invulnerable to the kid's charms. Ellis was good; he was nothing like the people Nick usually spent his time around. He could forgive himself for growing fond of him... but the slippery slope threatening below had him recoiling.

Suddenly the thought occurred to him - the possibility of Ellis falling for him.

Or, worse, him falling for Ellis.

Nick knew he was capable. After all, he'd loved his wife once, or something close to it. And Ellis was naive enough to believe something like that could work, that they could somehow be… something. Be together.

Did Nick even want that, if Ellis offered it? Wasn't there a timer, ticking down steadily, preceding the eventual moment when he would leave? Thanks for the kicks, see ya never?

Maybe Nick didn't mind his company. Maybe he even liked it. Fine; he could accept that. There was a lot to like about Ellis, a lot of things Nick wasn't used to seeing in people. A lot of things… stupid, childish things… that he could appreciate.

But needing him? Wanting him, past the creature comfort of sex?

It made him shudder, made him angry with himself. He wanted to slam his fist into the very mirror he stared into, like his reflection was the inner part of him that had the capacity to love at all. If he shattered it, it would all just go away. He could leave it behind - just broken glass on somebody else's bathroom floor.

It's never that simple. some somber part of him mused. Much as you want it to be, Nicolas. You're trapped in the same clusterfuck of bullshit everyone else is.
"Hey, Nick!" Ellis' voice chirped from the bedroom, through the open doorway. There was a casual joy to his voice, unburdened. Nick felt his shoulders lowering slightly as he listened to it. "I just done noticed, there ain't no little chocolates on the beds. I wonder if they keep like, stashes in hotels."

Failing to tear his eyes from his own reflection as he sculpted the swirl of his hair between short mists of hairspray, Nick gave a hollow smirk, exhaling. "Yeah. They have a whole closet full of little candies." he responded idly, tipping his head.

Ellis' response was a bit excited, laughing, his footsteps bounding around the hotel room with a kiddish abandon. "Haw, that'd be awesome, man. We should find it or somethin!'"

"I'm sure Coach would eat all of it, the fatass." Nick snorted, thumbing over his brows to straighten stray hairs. No point in worrying about it right now. On the bright side, maybe we'll all be dead by tomorrow, and it won't matter.

That undoubtedly shouldn't have made him feel better, but it did.

"Aww, that's real mean, Nick." the Georgian hummed in a lower tone of voice, though there was still a smile plastered all over his words. "He's lost some weight, past couple days! You can tell."

Straightening, the conman forced his gaze away from the mirror to grip onto his dress shirt. He pulled it tight over his stomach and eyed his waist speculatively. He could see definition in places that were generally unmuscled, and the fabric seemed to have a little extra space around his frame that he didn't remember.

"We all have."

"I've been gettin' more muscles!" Ellis beamed gently, voice growing suddenly louder as he approached the bathroom with abrupt interest. "Turnin' intuh a real zombie-killin' badass."

Nick rolled his eyes subtly, reluctantly turning away from the mirror. He leaned back, resting his hips against the edge of the bathroom counter and crossing his arms over his chest, expectantly gazing at the doorway.

Ellis came through with a huge grin, tugging his sleeve past his shoulder with a finger while he flexed his bicep next to his head. The tribal tattoo on the swell of his arm flexed, a dull blue. The gambler eyed the sloping muscle, indulging Ellis, a brow rising slightly.

"Pretty good, sport. You're looking more like an adult every day."

Ellis gave a scrunch of his nose, patting his sleeve back down on his shoulder and dropping his arm. He padded into the bathroom, approaching within a foot from Nick. "Yer just jea-"

The kid's blue eyes moved to Nick, widening suddenly. For a beat of silence, they examined him, and Nick was sure the younger man was swept away by his meticulously arranged appearance. The change surprised him, Nick figured, into losing his train of thought. "- ..whoa."

Nick couldn't help but laugh, leaning forward just an inch with a growing smirk. "Jea-whoa?" he echoed in question, knowingly, pleasure stirring with the stroke of his ego Ellis' reaction offered.

Ellis blinked twice as the word shook him into sense, shifting his gaze to meet Nick's, staring just an instant before returning seriously, "Why do yuh smell like muh grandma?"

Nick's face went blank for a split second before a murderous scowl spawned over his expression with all the fire of a raging storm. Fueled by the distinct tearing sound as he felt split his pride in half, Nick went after Ellis with a snarl.

One hand snatched up the spraycan settled at the edge of the counter, the other grabbing the front of Ellis' shirt tightly. The kid yelped in shock, trying to jerk out of his grip as the conman strode straight into him, shoving him backward repeatedly.

"Your GRANDMOTHER?!!" Nick growled furiously, stride unbroken as Ellis scrambled and stumbled backwards with his pushing. The kid struggled, gaze shooting over his shoulder to try and keep his balance and avoid walking back into anything.

"U-Uh!" Ellis protested, bewildered as Nick had him backing up into the bedroom in quick order. "Sorry! I'm only sayin', man! You just smell funn-"

Rather than let him finish, Nick shoved him backwards onto the bed with a flat palm, maintaining his footing just ahead of it. Ellis yelped as he struck the mattress with a bounce, scrambling out his arms to grip fingers on the bedspread, a blush dancing over his face.

"Nick, I'm sorry, I only said it 'cause muh grandma was always doin' her hair up all poofy 'n' she uses -" Ellis' apologetic, half-panicked rambling cut short again when Nick lifted up the aerosol with a stiff arm.

The younger man had about two seconds to gape, eyes widening, before the squeezing press of Nick's index finger had a cloying mist dousing him straight in the face with the low hiss of pressurized hairspray.

Nick watched with satisfaction as the mechanic practically seized in horror, hacking and spitting as his hands went up to cover his face. Ellis flailed out of the blast with a distressed splutter, batting at his nose with a sound of pure disgust.

His panic had him rolling right off the bed in a swift motion, thudding onto the floor with a dull tumble, one foot still half-caught on the very edge of the bed and twitching a bit as he squirmed on the floor. "EHG! AHUGH- UGH GAWD, NI-ICK!" he protested between splutters.

Nick blinked with a completely calm deadpan, tossing the can onto the mattress with a casual croon. "Whoa, Ay-lus. Why do ya smell like yer gramma?"

He turned away, leaving the other man to suffer where he was, walking across the room to the door. A simple turn of the knob opened it enough that he could slip outside into the hallway.

Rochelle was curled up against the wall several feet down, resting on the floor with her legs neatly tucked under her weight. Her skin had a healthy color to it, suffused by a clean glow, and her fingers were busy trying to tighten the braids throughout her hair.

She glanced up idly, waving a pinky at him without stopping her current work. "Hey, suit. Are you killing Ellis?"

There was a simple, casual humor to her voice, and Nick responded in kind, blinking with a slow emotionlessness. "Yep. Doing us all the favor."

She smiled a bit, just a flash, closing her eyes as she pulled her hair into the bunched ponytail at the back of her head. "Oh, good." she returned airily, changing the subject an instant later. "Coach is getting dressed. He'll be out in a second. He really wants to talk to us all."

Nick approached her somewhat slowly, slipping his hands into the pockets of his slacks. "Mnh.
Yeah, me too." He moved to the wall next to her, resting his shoulders against the wall and crossing his legs. A small exhale parted his lips, letting his eyes close, too.

There was a calm quiet between them for a moment, broken only by the sneezes and coughs that came whimpering from Ellis' room. Nick's brows creased, eyes focusing on some point off in the deep shadows of his closed lids.

Slowly, with all the grace of a newborn foal, the Georgian came stumbling out into the hallway, pawing at his face in disgust. "M-Man! That wasn't - that wasn't cool, Nick!" Ellis complained as he screwed up his expression, snorting out breaths. "I got junk up all in muh nose, now!"

The gambler gave a short laugh, smirk a little cruel as he cracked one eye open to glance down the hallway at the staggering mechanic. "Serves you right, you stupid redneck." he muttered, even if the edge to his voice was fairly dull.

He couldn't drudge up much sympathy, not when his ego was still bruised.

Rochelle rolled her eyes, a snort escaping her as she patted the space beside her on the floor, straightening her legs out to offer her lap. There was a sly humor written all over her face, blinking in an apologetic gesture. "Aw, poor sweetheart. Come here."

Pouting severely, Ellis reluctantly skulked past Nick. Blue eyes were quick to flick sulkily at his face, though Nick just smirked, and Ellis scampered on to slip down beside Rochelle. He flopped to lay his head in her lap, kicking his legs out to sprawl and bump socked feet against Nick's shoes.

"Hey," the conman protested in a snap, dodging away from the strike and shooting him a glare. Ellis stuck his tongue out.

"Now, Nick, we just got Ellis clean. Let's -" As Ellis' head plopped onto her lap, a whiff of the over-doused hairspray struck her and she blinked, leaning away a little. It took a second for her to recover, lowering a hand to pet it onto Ellis' damp cap. " - ...erm. Let's not get him smelly again so soon."

Giving a little huff, Ellis snuggled into her lap and closed his eyes, arms crossing over his chest in a loose gesture. The conman glanced down the hall, smirking and cuffing his clean-shaven jaw with a knuckle.

Rochelle's eyes lowered to Ellis' face, tipping her head a bit to see past the bill of his cap. "How's your arm, sweetheart?" she questioned, even as one of her hands slipped to grip onto his wrist. He let it go limp, submitting to her motion to pull his forearm up a little where she could see.

"Good." he affirmed, only flinching a little when she touched a finger near the heavily-bruised bitemark into the flesh of his forearm. The scabbed dents where teeth had pierced skin were agitated, but the shower had cleaned them off and brought the swelling down.

"Sure is a good thing we can't catch this virus, h'uh..?" Rochelle murmured, letting his arm settle back onto his chest. She gave him a smile, leaning her head back against the wall.

"I'll be the first one to shoot him if he starts foaming at the mouth, no worries." Nick reassured sarcastically, sending a smirk at Ellis.

The mechanic blinked his eyes open to wrinkle his nose at the older man, harrumphing. He easily flicked his capbill up a bit with a thumb so he could broaden his range of vision, shaking his head. "Well, yuh'd be the first person I'd bite, so that's fair, Nick."
Before anything further could be incited, Coach came out of his room with a gruff solemnness hanging about his demeanor. He glanced up and down the hallway, then gave a wary sigh before stepping all the way out.

Nick gave a sarcastic salute with one finger as the ex-football player walked up, examining them, but got no more than a glance in return before the big man was talking. He wasted no time.

"A'ight, y'all. Now, I figure we need to be keepin' on the same page here, bein' a group. None of us are used to this shit, exceptin' Nick. So let's just get it out there. Do y'all trust them, and how far?"

The moment of quiet that ate the air after his words was bloated with uncertainty and forming words. Ellis blinked at the ceiling, carefully tipping his chin a little so he could see Coach's face. and then glanced at Nick.

The gambler caught the glance but didn't meet it, well aware of what Ellis was silently asking. He took a small breath, setting his jaw fiercely forward.

If he were the only one who knew about it, he'd have kept the knowledge to himself. Ellis didn't have the same mindset, wouldn't really understand the logic behind it - that they would panic, and panicking was generally detrimental to holding control over the situation.

Ellis would have followed whatever he said, but the guilt of manipulating friends would've been painful to the younger man, where the gambler was used to it. Whether it was the smart choice or not, Ellis clearly didn't like it.

No, Nick wouldn't force that on him.

"You guys aren't going to like this." he stated, immediately drawing Rochelle and Coach's attention. She cocked her head slightly, clearly questioning, and Nick released a heavy sigh. "Our tire didn't blow. We didn't hit something or run over something. They shot it out."

Widening her eyes, Rochelle seemed to take the statement like a blow. Her gaze went a little distant, looking away to uncomfortably press the back of her head against the wall. "..why would.."

Coach got this look on his face - this subtle distaste, immediately turning grim, his weight shifting and a tension stiffening his frame. He set a thumb against his chin, leaning his head against it. "..You sho'?"

A snort left the conman, thrusting his hands up in a small motion. "No, I'm totally bullshitting. Yeah. Ellis found the bullet just before they showed up."

Coach got this look on his face - this subtle distaste, immediately turning grim, his weight shifting and a tension stiffening his frame. He set a thumb against his chin, leaning his head against it. "..You sho'?"

He found himself regretting the words the very instant they rolled off his tongue. Coach swiveled just an inch on his feet, suddenly locking eyes onto the prone mechanic, teeth setting on edge. "An' you didn't think we all needed to know that shit until just now?!!"

Ellis recoiled a little from the hostility, startled. He half-sat up, propping his weight on an elbow with a frown underneath the bill of his cap. He started to respond, but Rochelle interjected, tone slightly pained. "...why in the hell would you keep us in the dark about this? We should've gotten away from them from the start!"

Straightening slightly and setting his jaw with all the forced confidence of a stubborn kid, Ellis pushed to defend himself with a strong voice. Nick fully expected the younger man to throw the blame on him, but he didn't.

Nick couldn't help but smirk a little, intrigued by the loyalty.
"We ain't had no time away from 'em 'till now! Now we got an edge 'cause they dunno we know. We can talk 'bout it 'n' figure ou-"

Coach was, unfortunately, smarter than Nick would've liked to claim. Ellis didn't get much farther before the big man snapped his gaze onto Nick's face and crossed his arms. He probably recognized Nick's influence behind the uncharacteristic phrasing - and Nick didn't know how to feel about that.

"Nicolas, just what were you thinkin'? You got more sense than this!"

The conman gave the subtlest of sighs, lifting his gaze to the ceiling as any hint of amusement disappeared from his face at the chastisement. "I have more fucking sense than most of you, thank you. Look, I wasn't keeping the information from you for laughs. I had reasons."

Rochelle straightened up slightly, a frown dragging the edge of her mouth down. She put a hand on Ellis' shoulder, shaking her head. "We're supposed to be a team, Nick. We're supposed to work together, not just go along with your 'reasons.'"

"Now that ain't fair." Ellis protested firmly, squirming slightly as he curled one leg up toward himself, stabilizing his weight. "Y'all ain't even givin' him a chance tuh explain!"

The youngest survivor seemed a bit satisfied when his complaint actually worked. A silence settled in for a beat or two as he glanced between them. He rolled a little bit to lean against the wall next to Rochelle, adjusting his cap on his head slowly with a small nod at Nick as if to say 'go ahead.'

Nick let his arms cross, jaw tightening. He spoke with a slight edge of hostility. "Look. They shot our wheels but didn't kill us - why? Logic says they want something. The question's what they want, then."

Although there was a certain disgruntlement about his features, Coach nodded stiffly. "Assume you got ideas 'bout that, too."

"Maybe, maybe not." the conman returned, gaze somewhat narrowing and a hand lifting to cradle his shaven chin between his knuckles. That was honest, at least; he couldn't be sure. "They aren't being violent. Toward us, anyway."

Rochelle uncomfortably set her hands on her lap, squeezing a little at her thighs. She questioned, hesitantly, "What if that changes...? Maybe we should just leave, while they're gone."

Nick immediately shook his head, slipping his free hand into the pocket of his slacks. "No, no. We're fucked now. Leaving might get us in more trouble than we're already in."

With a slight stiffen, Coach leaned forward, gesturing solidly at Nick. "Who says? I ain't comfortable wit' us bein' here anymore. I aim to protect y'all, an' havin' us stuck wit' people who'd shoot wheels out from under you ain't in my game plan."

Frustration rising, Nick enunciated his words a bit more carefully, stressing out the syllables with an irked force. "It's pretty clear they're a bunch of cocky fucks. People like them... they don't let you go easy. It rarely ends well, and never on your terms."

He had experience.

He jerked his shoulder into a slight shrug, exhaling. "They've claimed this place as theirs, and we were fucked the minute we got on their radar. If you ask me, that's why they shot the car - so they could get us where they want us."
"So... what?" Rochelle half-snapped, gesturing with open hands. "We just casually hang out with the people who almost caused us to crash? The van could have flipped - what if we'd gotten hurt? How are we supposed to stay here if they're dangerous?"

Leaning forward slightly with a small narrow of his eyes, dangerously exhaling a breath through flared nostrils, Nick moved his hand from his chin to tap his temple pointedly. "I dunno, Rochelle, maybe that's why I fucking wanted to keep it quiet while I worked out a plan. So you two didn't freak out and get us killed."

She glared solidly at him for a few beats, slipping her arms to cross over her chest. He glared right back, matching her fire tenfold with a snarl reaching his voice.

"I am trying to minimize the risk of us all getting chopped into little. Fucking. Pieces. You guys are not the only ones trying to fucking protect the group! Can you just trust me for all of five goddamn seconds?"

There was a little silence that trickled between them, some of Rochelle's anger fading as her gaze stayed locked onto his. A small frown started to lower her brows, sighing with a slow puff. Reluctantly, she glanced up at Coach.

The big man didn't meet her gaze right off, giving a heavy shrug of his shoulders and holding his silence for a moment before speaking.

"... Shit, Nick. It ain't 'bout not trustin' you." Coach's voice was abruptly slightly regretful, and when he glanced at the conman, his eyes matched it. Nick shifted his weight back a bit but didn't let his expression move a centimeter, caught off-guard by the reaction.

It was... genuine.

Coach made a firm gesture with a hand, as if to indicate all of them. "But you gotta trust us, too. It ain't fair for you to be makin' those choices without us. If you got a plan an' shit, keep us in the loop. Like Ro' said. We're a team, but we can't stand by you if yo' ass don't tell us what's goin' on."

Nick was silent, flexing the hand that was sunk into his pocket. He examined Coach's face, almost unsettled by the honesty and firm compromise layering the eldest's voice - particularly when Rochelle nodded in agreement.

He wasn't totally sure he liked being reasoned with. He'd have preferred yelling or arguing.

"... Fine." he forcibly uttered, letting his free hand settle on the curl of his dress-shirted stomach as if to assuage a wave of nausea. "We act calm. Play their game, let them feel in control. Tomorrow we'll let them know we're headed to the beach to get rescued and out of their hair. Who knows, if they're not too addicted to the killing spree, maybe they'll want to come with us and we can all be a happy little family."

Nodding slowly, Rochelle raised a hand to wipe her mouth carefully. "Yeah.. yeah, okay. I can get behind that. Judging by them so far, they're kinda scary, but they ain't unreasonable or nothin'. They got us tuh this hotel, right? That was nice."

Ellis rubbed at his nose with a wrist, hesitantly speaking up with the argument having ebbed. His head perked alongside own words, glancing around at the team. "They're kinda scary, but they ain't unreasonable or nothin'. They got us tuh this hotel, right? That was nice."

Coach shook his head a little, letting his arms cross over his gut again as he lowered his chin. "I ain't sho', son. If we're puttin' stock in Nick's assessment, it wasn't 'bout doin' us a favour. Just keepin' us corralled."

"Well -" Ellis wavered a little bit, adjusting his cap with a knuckle and letting a wrinkle touch his nose. "...well, I guess that ain't so nice, huh. Man... I don't like thinkin'uv these folks bein' so nasty! It ain't right."

He shifted, sitting a little straighter against the wall as his voice grew in earnestness. "They'll come with us, right? We can all get rescued. They don't gotta stay out here none, fightin' zombies. I know y'all don't like 'em, but we're all just people. We gotta stick tuhgether!"

With a small sigh, Nick slipped his hand free of his pocket to screw his palm down on the top of Ellis' head, knocking the bill of his cap down over his eyes. "You're real naive sometimes, kid." he muttered, a wry smirk touching his lips.

Ellis hunched a bit but held still, blinking momentarily before lifting up his chin to peek through the bare inch of space between his bill and the bridge of his nose.

"They will, though, right..?"

Blue eyes hunted for reassurance it couldn't quite find, and his desperation sunk a slight uncertainty into everyone's expression. The silence that met his question twisted into a cruel hum. Nick stiffened his jaw a little when they turned to him, lowering his chin - it wasn't a promise he could make.

He couldn't even promise they wouldn't end up killing the Angels in self-defense.

Forcing out the words, Nick stiffened against the tug of guilt as Ellis' expression fell slowly under his rebuke. "El, we don't even know if they want to get rescued. For all we know, they're enjoying running around like a bunch of Chainsaw Massacre wannabes. For all we know, they're not going to like us trying to escape this hellhole."

Coach's head lifted slightly at that, gaze narrowing. "...You think they'd stop us, Nick?"

The conman crossed his arms over his chest, gaze lowering until it hit the floor. He let his teeth grind together, just a little, his head tilting. "I don't know what they'd do."

He let his eyes close, inhaling tightly as he chewed over his words, looking away from Ellis' face lest the kid's worried look start to get to him. He had to focus. "What I do know is that right now, while we're sitting here talking about them and what we're going to do..."

Rochelle blinked slightly with the implicative trailing of his voice, her own lowering a little bit as she finished the sentence for him.

"... they're doing the same thing."
Chapter 80

The slow scream of the blade's sharp edge raking down along the flat face of the window was enough to drive anyone insane. It reverberated through the grocery store like the death knell of an animal.

Jerry glowered out through the window, hand unerringly on the handle of his cleaver, muttering into the fur of his beard. "You're really pissin' me off. Just how much more I gotta take?"

The Angels' leader stood a foot or two behind him, a blood-splotted bandage wrapped around her thigh. Her arms were crossed, something a lot like agitation flecking her expression, though there was a cool veneer of calm over her face. "Everything pisses you off, Jerry. You'll have to be more specific."

Raising the butcher's knife up to start a new cracking line down the surface of the window, parallel to the first, Jerry snorted dully. "You tell me why we're playin' nursemaid to these bitches."

"Because." sighed from Brenda's lips, her body stepping close behind his. She reached to place a hand on the handle of his knife from behind, almost soothingly pulling it away from the glass. "If they're still alive, it means they're good. You don't make it out here without some talent."

The bearded man snorted, turning his head around sharply to glare straight down into her eyes as she smiled. Brenda was undaunted by his height and the anger in his eyes. "Good, my ass. I've had shits more impressive'n that lot!"

Chris gave a chuckle under his breath, speaking up with a subtle tone of mockery. "That says more about you than them, tío." He paced into one of the aisles, searching for food on the shelves. The place had been ransacked before them, but there was still things hidden away between torn-down shelving and piles of abandoned packaging.

Ignoring the Spaniard but for a smirk, Brenda tapped a fingertip on Jerry's meaty wrist, holding his attention when a flash of anger threatened to jerk his gaze toward Chris.

"If we had a group full of people like you, we'd all be dead." she stated harshly, making his gaze narrow in fury. "We've been cutting it close since Phil disappeared and you know it, Jerry. We've been losing people. We could use the firepower, and they're zombiekillers."

Jerry tore his wrist from her fingers, raising the cleaver to point it straight at her face in a brash threat. "We don't need no more firepower, not from pussies like that! Not the Angels! We've been kickin' ass, without that shitbag Phil - or any of 'em." The muscle beneath his left eye twitched, barely masking hatred.

Brenda arched a brow, gazing at the sharp edge of the cleaver's blade with a certain distance, unafraid and unimpressed. "My leg says otherwise, big boy. Nobody saw that Hunter before it landed. If Chris had been a foot further from me I'd be dead." She stated it with a hint of venom, touching a hand onto her wounded thigh in illustration. "You weren't an Angel until we pulled you out from under that Tank. Were you kicking ass when you were choking on your own blood?"

He glared, fuming - but something kept him silent.

"I think they're cunts. But they're cunts with promise, and we're going to keep a tight grip on them until we can figure out just what we want to do with them."
Snorting quietly, Jerry flexed his fingers on his cleaver handle, the edgy tension touching his husky shoulders that usually came right before physical violence. "I know Gonzales has a hard-on for that black bitch. Didn't know you had one too."

A soft, irked snort from nearby was Chris' only reaction.

"Which one, huh, Bren? Pretty boy with the big mouth? Or the Yank bitch with the tiny dick? Or are you hot for big guys?" Jerry's cleaver was twitching in his hands, like he ached to take it to something. Or someone.

Brenda let her arms cross over her chest, lowering her chin to affix a cold stare onto his face. He met it solidly, teeth showing amidst his beard in off-white blocks as he bared his teeth.

Slowly - enunciating every syllable, as if he might not follow otherwise - she hissed, "You can knock Chris around, but don't make the same mistake with me. I'll cut your fucking hand off and cram it down your throat, rough. Just how you like it."

There was silence between them for a moment, just boiling stares and clashing threats sparking silently in the air amidst their breath. With a small twitch of an eyelid, Jerry broke gazes first, growling in a low tone.

Brenda smiled smoothly, raising a hand to caress fingertips over the beard-masked shape of his thin mouth. "There we go." Leaning forward slightly toward his stiff frame, casually stretching to make up for the height he had on her, she let her lips drag along his cheek.

"Sorry, big boy, but someone has to rein you in. You get so violent."

Jerry stared her down with a hungry glitter to somewhat small, dark eyes, one huge hand moving to drag fingers along the shape of her hip as she stepped away from him - but he said nothing at all. Tension, vibrating with an edge of arousal, made him turn back toward the window and glare out into the street.

Brenda walked across the store linoleum to join Chris, tracing fingers down her stomach slowly. She spoke idly over her shoulder. "We'll take them out for a test run tomorrow. See how they fight without us clearing their every step. No more baby-sitting, don't you worry, Jerry. I want to see just how they work."

Chris idly glanced up, straightening slightly and stepping away from the shelving. He fiddled with a smushed, bagged loaf of bread between fingers, sighing as Brenda approached him. He spoke up with a more meaningful tone now that Jerry had been tamed. "B, I do not think they will be as eager to join us as you think. They do not like us much."

Her gaze narrowed, laughing slightly. She snagged the bag from his hands, flipping it over and idly examining it. "We don't like each other, either. You think it matters, now?"

The Spaniard lifted up his hand, flapping fingers in a slow gesture at her. "Ya, pero - we still work together. I do not think they could work with us, not for long."

Brenda gave a snort. She shifted the bagged bread to one hand, leaning down slightly to get a better look at her bandaged wound in the dim light casting through the grocery store's front windows. "What are you, Chris, the cunt whisperer? Is your new girlfriend afraid of getting messy?"

Christophe's jaw hardened a little, erased in an instant with a smooth smile up at her. "I am just saying, hermana, I do not think they will be happy to join."
"Then they don't." she returned with a growing edge to her voice, moving her gaze to suddenly eye him, a hand lifting and brushing her short hair back from her face. "I'm not going to suck them off to get them to fight with us."

Lowering his brows slightly, Chris cocked his head, chewing at the inside of his cheek for a calm moment. His eyes didn't betray his thoughts, but there was doubt in his eyes. Speaking up, he lifted his machete to tap it against his chin. "¿Entonces qué?"

When that didn't register immediately, he exhaled a little and repeated, "Then what?"

Jerry set his hand flat against the window, tracing the pale cuts he'd made in the glass with a fat thumb. A snort escaped him, dully. "We chase 'em out like the pigsheets they are. Let 'em find someplace else to curl up'n'die."

A smirk crossed Brenda's lips, setting her hands back a bit to brace her shoulder against the collapsed shelving beside them. "If they have an issue with that.. we can always give them some alternate options. Jerry's itching for a good time, anyway."

Chris' gaze shifted to the floor. He didn't say a word, scratching slowly at his jaw with the edge of his machete with a blank expression. If he'd snorted or laughed, he might've gone unnoticed - but his complete silence made Jerry turn around, gazing at him across the room.

"Problem, a-mi-go? You gone real quiet on us." he snarled lightly, casually dragging fingers through his beard.

A short shake of his head had Chris straightening up, setting his machete down on his lap. "Ay, no, hombre. No hay un problema. Just thinking that I do not want to be a part of your good time, ha."

He lowered his chin slightly, fighting an uneven smile.

Jerry pulled away from the window, walking across the linoleum floor with a slow flex of his hairy-knuckled fingers on the handle of his cleaver. He moved with no particular rush, yet his broad steps covered the ground between them in seconds.

"Just 'cause you got a crush on that bitch don't mean shit, José. You think we're gonna treat 'em special?"

"Did you hear me say that, Jerry?" Chris returned, expression folding to a brow-raise and flat mouth. He didn't flinch, not even as Jerry grew closer, towering. "All I am saying is maybe the violence should be saved for los muertos vivientes, ¿sí?"

"Zombie, person." the husky man snorted, shaking his head in a dismissive gesture. "What's it matter now? World's changed, brother. The fighters live, n'the weak die. I kill one of them fuckers at the hotel, I'll mark my count up just's well."

Brenda reached out a hand in the air, waving her fingers in a slow motion, though a smirk crossed her face. "Jerry, Jerry, Jerry. Nobody says anyone's going to die, not yet. If they turn us down and leave like good little troopers, hey, we'll let the zombies take care of them."

"Until then," she affirmed, letting her gaze burn on Jerry's for just an instant to silently reiterate the punishment she'd promised him earlier. "we'll treat them like fighters. Bitch all you like, Jerry, but no fighting."

The husky man gave a growl, agitated. He raked a hand through his short, thinning hair, gaze narrowing as he gestured up at her with his knife. "When they turn out to be a buncha useless bitches mewlin' at our feet, you'll wish you'd listened to me 'n' saved all this time."
"Sure, sure." the woman promised with a bit of a lull to her voice, humoring him. She leaned back slightly and lowered her chin so she could palm over the bandage wrapped around her thigh.

Chris gave a slight huff, rubbing his wrist against his mouth in a slow wipe. It had gone a little dry, despite himself. He forced a laugh, expression leveling to humor. "I think nuestros amigo is jealous, B. Worried they'll steal your attention, como un niño."

He stiffened up sharply when Jerry suddenly took a step to close the distance between them. One heavy hand swept toward his face, and Chris didn't react fast enough to dodge the cleaver as Jerry drew its sharp edge against his cheek.

Jerry didn't cut him, exactly. He merely pressed it there, the cold edge biting against flesh, and watched with no small pleasure as Christophe made it happen. The Spaniard jolted away just a little too slowly, and the movement caused the blade to split the skin of his face in a thin line beneath his cheekbone.

The Spaniard immediately bent to one side, clamping a hand over the wound as blood burst down his cheek in a tacky sheet of red against his honey-brown skin. Pain stung along the tear in rapid jolts, enough to make his eyes water.

"¡Qué te jodas! Será hijo de puta - asshole - agh, ¿por qué, por qué, por qué?" he spat in a flurry, blood trickling between his fingers as he squinted in pain, just barely able to look up in accusation at the husky male.

Jerry slid his blade against his palm with a hostile wrinkle of his nose, wiping off the trim line of blood that decorated its edge. "Shut your yammering trap, you're hurtin' my ears..." He shook his head, snorting at the Spaniard. "One way or another, them cunts'll die - if I gotta do it, or if the zombies do."

Flashing a dark look toward Brenda, almost daring her to shut him up again, Jerry gave a short snarl and slipped his cleaver under the wide strap of his belt. He turned away, ignoring Chris' furious utterance of, "Vete al mierda, gilipollas...", and started to walk toward the entrance of the grocery store.

"Let's get the food and go." he grunted behind himself, and as he re-took his position by the window, it was clear he didn't intend on helping the process. Bouncing his cleaver from hand to hand, he glowered out into the street in silence.

Brenda said nothing to him, instead bending forward slightly to smirk aside at Chris. "Poor little chico." she crooned with a cruel edge, drawing a sarcastic snort from the Spaniard, pained.

"Jerry cannot - eh, take a joke? You would think I had learned." he half-chuckled, reluctantly keeping his palm against the wound to stifle the bloodflow as best he could. The pain vaguely ebbed.

Turning on a heel and moving down the aisle, Brenda smirked at him as she passed by. A hand raised, rapping on his skull with a knuckle before she stepped away and maneuvered down the aisle in search of more food.

"Don't get too attached, Chris. If you're right about them, I wouldn't be surprised if Jerry ends up getting his way."

Letting a half-smirk fall onto his face, the Spaniard looked away. He turned, lingering where he stood to gaze back toward the window Jerry stood beside. It was marred with thick gashes from his cleaver, sparkling with light that reflected through the cracked and powdered glass. Taking on a hue from the lowering sun, it shone like the glimmer of slow-dripping blood.

"Sí... he usually does."
Chapter 81

It was a whole hour before the Angels returned. Nick was a few seconds away from stealing Coach's backpack and digging out the food they'd stashed there when they heard footsteps down the hall.

Despite Brenda's jibe earlier, the four had ended up in the same hotel room: Coach reclined on a bed, Ellis sprawled out on the floor, Rochelle curled up on the windowsill, and Nick had adopted a pace back and forth across the room.

They hadn't been talking much, but it was an amicable silence. Just tense.

Nick eyed the doorway, giving a subtle sigh before stalking to it when it seemed no one else was rushing to do so. He pulled the door open sharply, leaning out to glance down the hallway. One hand lifted to give a small gesture to someone, open-palmed.

"Hey, dumbass. Over here." he sniped, leaving the door open as he stepped back into the room. Nick gave a shrug as he moved to stand beside the prostrated Ellis, hands slipping into his pockets in a defensive slump.

Christophe came through the open door a beat later, his arms stacked with two grocery bags. He smiled a bit, slipping inside the room with a beleaguered sigh. "This 'dumbass' is holding your food, you know, señor."

Rochelle leaned away from the window slightly, blinking at the Spaniard. He had a long, bleeding slice from his cheekbone to his jaw, raw and open with smeared and clotting blood over the pinkish gleam of bared muscle. He didn't seem concerned with it as he carried the bags to the closest bed, setting them down.

"La electricidad is still on in some places, where the lines are not broken. Bread, meat.. all sealed, no fear." he stated as he touched a hand over the bags, indicating the contents. "Some agua, too."

"Good. Thanks." Coach grunted, not moving from where he had comfortably settled himself. His expression was dubious, but reserved. "Took y'all long enough, not that we ain't grateful. Started thinkin' y'all weren't comin' back."

Chris lifted up his hands in apology, promptly raking one through the spiky brown hair that tickled around his ears. "Mis amigos were being unos plastas - annoying, ¿sí? - and demanded we eat first. Lo siento."

Ellis sat up, crossing his legs in a lazy motion and cocking his head. "Uh.." he started, scratching at his chin. Concern flickered over his eyes, undaunted by the uncertainty in his tone. He couldn't resist empathy. "S'okay.. But, whut happened to yer face..? Hunter or somethin'?"

"Hm?" Chris palmed over the injury, pulling his hand away an instant later to examine the sprawl of blood that trickled down his already-dirty fingers. "Oh, no es nada. Jerry talks with his knife when he is angry. I stood too close, ha!"

A frown settled on Ellis' face, sitting up a little straighter. "He cut you? .. Man, that ain't .."

Nick interrupted him with a short tone, crossing his arms over his chest. "You say that like you're surprised, Ellis..." Flicking his pinky in a small gesture, the conman moved to the side of the bed to dig through the grocery bags. "I'm only surprised the fuck didn't take his whole head off. No offense, Christophe."

Snorting, the man let his thumbs settle in the beltloops of his cargo shorts, brows lifting. He wasn't bothered in the least - if anything, there was a little amusement in his voice. Nick probably seemed tame compared to his regular companions. "Claro que sí. Of course."

Rochelle got up slightly hesitantly from the windowsill. There was a wary kind of frown touching her mouth, uncomfortable. She moved forward, bending down to pick up the group's backpack from the floor. "Don't take this the wrong way, Chris, but come here a minute."

The Spaniard perked up, eyes lighting with a bright attention as he crossed the carpet toward her. "¿Qué?" he questioned, stopping a foot or two from the woman, glancing around the hotel room. He looked slightly confused, but pleasantly so, like the non-hostile environment charmed him.

Rochelle pulled a scrap of gauze from their satchel, one of the last pieces they had left. There was a beat of hesitance as she looked at it, but a weary sigh later, she turned back to him. It wouldn't make much of a difference if one of them got wounded. Carefully stepping a little closer, she squinted vaguely, gently using her thumb to press the gauze against his wound.

Chris flinched a little, an 'ay' escaping him, though he held still. He raised a hand to hold the gauze in place over the cut as Rochelle went back to the backpack to find some tape. "Preciosa, you are too kind." he murmured, gazing toward her with a glitter of appreciation crossing his eyes. "I feel better already."

"Kind nothing.." Rochelle returned in a mumble, using her teeth to tear a few pieces of tape off. "You're bleeding."

Nick was grinning, teeth flashing with fairly cruel humor. He pulled the loaf of bread out from the grocery bag, undoing the twist-tie to drag out two pieces. "So, are you two going to fuck right here, or..?"

"Nick!" Ellis hissed, a hand clapping over his mouth in disbelief. The hick scrambled up from the floor, scooting quickly over to the conman's side to shove at his arm with an elbow. Nick just smirked, offering the bread to him.

Rochelle's face darkened slightly, but she seemed unsurprised. Forcing a sigh as she reached up to tape the gauze in place, she very deliberately didn't meet Chris' gaze, instead shooting a glare sideways at Nick.

Holding his expression perfectly still, the Spaniard bit his lower lip, turning his chin a little bit to give her better access to his cheek. His bright brown eyes lifted a bit, seeming to consider saying something - and then thinking better of it.

"Watch yo'self, Nicolas." Coach grunted faintly, adjusting his head against the headboard of the bed. Nick flashed him that same smirk, getting his own slices of bread and holding them open toward Ellis expectantly.

Arching a brow slightly and setting a hand flat over the bandage as Rochelle settled the last piece of tape to hold it in place, Chris tried again. "Tu amigo is about as quick with his tongue as Jerry is with his knife. You will need more bandages than this, mi bonita."

Rochelle gave a sigh and flashed the youth a frown, turning away from him to intently focus on packing the satchel back up. He blinked at her back, touching fingers along the soft shape of the bandage taped against his cheek. The man almost looked downtrodden as his joke fell flat.
Ellis carefully cracked open the plastic container of sliced ham, sniffing it once before he seemed satisfied. Plucking out a few slices, he laid them on one of Nick's bread halves obligingly... even as he maintained a disapproving slant to his mouth.

"Well, I should go back." Chris somewhat slowly affirmed, taking a couple steps backwards. "Los Ángeles will be downstairs to make sure none of the monsters make any wrong moves."

Or us. Nick mused with some wry humor, turning to settle his rear against the edge of the bed and take a large bite out of his sandwich. He gazed with no small judgement at the Spaniard's face, examining as he chewed.

You aren't going to persuade me with some food and a good chat. Not buying it, kid.

Rochelle didn't say anything, just zipping up the backpack carefully, eyes furtive on her own movements. Coach gave a nod at Chris past her, gruffly, setting a hand on his gut. "Thanks fo' the food. Tell the rest of 'em that too."

Chris nodded, turning back to the door with a small thumbs-up. "B hurt her leg on the way, so we are taking a siesta and will probably not move again till tomorrow. Rest up, mis amigos - we will talk a mañana. Then we can figure out what we are doing, ¿sí?" He slipped out into the hallway with that, hands moving into his pockets. He had just disappeared around the threshold when he called back:

"Adiós, preciosa."

As if breaking suddenly off a leash, Rochelle suddenly turned around and almost hurried across the room. She ducked through the door without sparing a glance back to her team, expression drawn in something frustrated.

Nick perked up his head at her rushed exit, breaking into a smirk. He made as if to stand up, like he was going to sneak after her and eavesdrop, but Ellis grabbed firm onto his sleeve and held him down with a 'don't you dare' look.

He relented, if only so he could focus on eating.

As Rochelle stepped outside of the room, she quickly glanced over and saw the Spaniard hadn't made it far. "Chris," she hissed slightly, keeping her tone down as she crossed her arms and stood where she was. The man immediately stopped and looked over his shoulder, eyes lighting up all over again.

"¿Sí, bonita?" he questioned with a growing smile.

Rochelle bit hard onto her tongue, letting her hands slip into fists. A slight exasperation bled into her expression - and her voice. "My name's Rochelle, okay? Just.. can you call me Rochelle?"

The man's smile grew a little more and he turned around, cocking his head. "If you want me to, sí. Have I offended you? I didn't mean to, m- Ro..chelle." There was a little wrinkle to his brow, quickly smoothed, as he copied her pronunciation. The name came with an ounce of effort, like he wanted to harshen it to a 'ch'.

Sighing, Rochelle gently lifted up her hand to cover her eyes gently, squeezing at the bridge of her nose. "I'm not.. offended. I just kinda need some space, okay? ... Look, I'm flattered, but I already had to deal with this kind of thing from Nick. I'm not interested, and I'd really appreciate it if you dropped it."
Chris' expression faded a little, for just a moment. His shoulder lowered an inch, but with a blink, he rebounded into a bright smile. "Es una lástima, but I am not trying to do any 'thing,' Rochelle."

"You're flirting with me. A lot." she asserted, curling her hands on her hips and holding firm. She leaned forward slightly, jaw setting as she tried to lock gazes meaningfully. "Just stop, okay, Chris? Please?"

The Spaniard gave a sigh and lifted a hand, stroking down the bandage on his cheek with fingertips. With a moment of thought, lids lowering over bright brown eyes, he uttered a rolling string of Spanish to an uncomprehending Rochelle. "Eres como una rosa - ¿es muy hermosa, sí? La admiro, pero no intento casarla."

Struggling for a moment, Rochelle blinked with some uncertainty as Chris smiled at her and turned away. She felt herself blushing without even understanding exactly what he'd said - maybe it was his tone, or the glimmer of his eyes.

As he walked down the hall, she gave a slightly frustrated roll of her eyes and prompted, "And what did that mean..?"

He laughed, a burst of inward humor, and spoke easily over his shoulder. "I said, you are like a rose, and I am just admiring you like you deserve. I can stop, if you prefer… but I'll be sad to let you go without compliments. Buena noche, Rochelle."

Rochelle was left standing there for a good minute as the Spaniard disappeared down the stairs, a kind of frustration weighing on her shoulders. She gave a sigh, lifting a hand to rub her face as a scrunch twitched her brow.

Letting her arms cross over her stomach, Rochelle turned back and slipped into the hotel room, unpleasantly shaking her head when she felt gazes lift up toward her. She silently shut the door behind herself, moving to dig through the grocery bags and start making her own food.

She was well aware Nick was staring at her with a devilish smirk, and she didn't give him the satisfaction of acknowledgment. She did, however, mutter out a question as she put her sandwich together with no small hunger.

"... You guys are sure they really shot out our tire? It's not a misunderstanding or something..?"

Ellis was the one to answer, piped up around a mouthful of bread and ham as he turned his head to blink blue eyes at her worriedly underneath the shadow of his cap. "I found the bullet muhself, Ro'… there ain't no other explanation."

Giving a small sigh, Rochelle turned away, carrying her sandwich back to the windowsill. Her face was drawn in something between confusion and frustration. Nick asked somewhat slyly as she went, voice deep with a bit of an edge, "Why would you ask that, doll?"

As she rested down on the sill, curling a leg underneath herself and lifting her sandwich to go for a small, subdued bite, she mumbled, "No reason." The gambler snickered behind her, though it halted with a hitched 'uhp' as Ellis probably elbowed him. Rochelle could hear the light scuffle as Nick retaliated.

Chris seemed sincere, but maybe it was an act. Why would he have aligned himself with someone like Brenda - or, worse, Jerry - if they didn't share the same values? Then again, if the alternative was going it alone… maybe he didn't have a choice.

Yet, he'd taken the same pleasure in taking zombies apart as the others - unless it was just a way to cope. She'd stopped thinking of them as sick humans a long time ago; it hurt to think that when they had to kill them. Desensitization was really the only way forward, if one wanted to keep sane, but… wasn't there a line?

Was that hypocritical of her?

Rochelle might have groaned if she didn't know her teammates were still looking at her. She withheld it, swallowing her mouthful and staring at the rest of her sandwich in thought.

... Girl... you should've stayed with Jacob.
Chapter 82

Kicking the bedsheets off of himself, baring his sprawled body - dressed only in his boxers, hat, and crumpled socks - Ellis gazed up at the ceiling with a frustrated crunch to his brows. It didn't really surprise him that he couldn't sleep. They'd split off to their separate rooms, and the lonely tension had his mind on overdrive.

The Georgian wasn't used to feeling unsafe - at least not in this way. Not from other human beings. It unsettled his very grasp on right and wrong. He felt like curling up and hiding, a sense of worried unease driving him to a fearsome frown.

He wanted to believe the whole situation wasn't what they thought, that they'd all just misinterpreted the Angels' behavior and they could all just talk it out and head for rescue together. Unfortunately, his hope was faltering. All he could think about was Nick's voice, his doubt.

"People like them... they don't let you go easy. It rarely ends well, and never on your terms.'

It was nothing like the threat of zombies - it was so much worse: a dark, conscious betrayal.

It wasn't normal and it wasn't right.

It scared him, afraid to breathe lest the quiver of his exhale break what composure he had left. His head flopped, blue eyes half-open to anxiously gaze around the lightly furnished hotel room, trying to distract himself.

Quickly, he recognized that the very effort of trying to calm down was only heightening his fear and quickening his pulse. Giving an almost desperate sigh, Ellis rolled himself to the edge of the bed. Swinging his legs off, Ellis sat there with a heavy tremor to his worked frame.

He rubbed slowly at his bruised torso, fingertips light on his speckled wounds. Blue eyes were distant, thoughtful, restless in the dark.

"Man..." he mumbled.

With a little clench of his jaw, Ellis reached up to suddenly take his hat off. He closed it between his hands, rolling his body carefully to slip down to his knees next to the bed.

Leaning forward slightly, he let his hands fold into a clasp with his hat gripped between his palms. He closed his eyes, lacing fingers and bending his head until he could rest his chin against their clustered knuckles, reverent.

"Lord? I know yer probably real busy, 'n' there's a whole lotta people askin' fer you right now.. 'n' I told muhself I wouldn't bother you none 'cause I was real well off, considerin'." The words drawled with an intimate rhythm from his lips, brows softening. He gave a chuckle, fondly, tipping his chin down a little more. "Mama always told me not tuh bother you none fer stuff I could handle on muh own. But that yer still there fer me if I ever needed."

Just the contact with another presence was enough to calm him, making him smile even as his voice fell to a pleading earnestness.

"Well, I do, man. I know yer keepin' muh family all safe, but muh new friends need help, too. We've been doin' alright, but I'm real scared right now... these folks don't seem real nice, Lord. I'm afraid they're gonna try'n'do somethin' awful."
His shoulders lowered as his fears slipped from him with ease, pleading into his hands. "Please keep an eye on us. I don't want nobody tuh get hurt, Lord, not even them - but you gotta keep muh friends safe."

Ellis took a slight breath, his fingers slipping and linking together with a tightening grip as he smiled against his knuckles. "They're real amazin' friends. I'm real grateful fer gettin' tuh meet 'em." Opening his eyes and peeking up slightly, raising his head, Ellis sighed softly.

"... Please, don't let nothin' bad happen. I trust you, Lord."

Gently lowering his hands and resting his forearms against the edge of the bed, he murmured a simple, "Amen." and released an almost relieved sigh. The sense of warmth he always felt after praying, this completed reassurance, fell over his mind with a calming touch.

He smiled softly, moving to push up from the bed and get to his feet. The kid gave a gentle stretch as he stood, rubbing at his stomach with a sigh. As the stretch loosened up his muscles, Ellis started to lean down, moving to re-crawl into bed. He felt calmer then, and a spark of hope re-stirred in his chest that he might be able to fall asleep.

He hadn't so much as set a knee on the edge of the bed when a light flashed on in the hallway.

Ellis blinked, startled, turning around to eye his room's door. Light flooded under the door's bottom edge, this golden aura of light filtering in over the carpet fibers. Ellis stared with a head-tilt of incomprehension, almost awkwardly postured with his arms still stretched toward the bed.

Any burgeoning thought of some tangible holiness disappeared when footsteps broke the stream of light. They passed by his door with a slow, heavy gait - so close the boots left silhouettes of shadow on the crack of light that spilled beneath the door.

Ellis watched them walk past his door, the crawl of the trodding shadow leeching into - over - and out of the glow from the hallway. Uncertain, Ellis crept across the carpet, approaching the doorway with careful and tip-toed footsteps.

His heartrate started to pick up in his chest again, making him swallow with an uneasy gulp. Cautiously, he reached out to grip at the knob, turning it slowly. He could hear the creak of the door's mechanisms as he turned it, and with a held breath, Ellis opened the door a few inches.

Peeking into the hallway, Ellis felt his body stiffen at the sight of the Angels' largest member stalking slowly down the carpeted path.

The man's form was perked with the attentive focus of a hunting animal, head twitching to follow the whim of his gaze and the lumber of his frame. His knife, though not in his hand, was glinting at the dirty block of his hip, tucked crudely under his belt.

Slight panic had Ellis staring, fingers tightening on the doorknob, silently fearing the man would try to reach for one of the door handles he passed so slowly by. As Jerry reached the end of the hotel hallway, he stopped, pausing to gaze through the half-curtained window at the far end.

Ellis' frightened brain realized almost too late that he was going to turn around.

Jolting back inside his room, Ellis jerked the door closed in a rushed motion. He kept the knob entirely twisted so it didn't click, and used his shoulder to brace against it and stifle the sound as it thudded back into place. He felt himself panting, eyes wide with a sense of mounting tension.

It was all he could do to try and stay calm, pressing his ear against the door to strain for sounds from the hallway as his heartbeat jumped and twittered in his ears.

He could hear the man's approach down the hallway, slow and casual, boots rustling against the carpet with each sprawling step. As it came closer, Ellis retreated, silencing his panting with a hand over his mouth as he stared at that stream of light under the door. His skin trembled with the force of his pulse, a silent mantra of 'Please don't'uv heard me please don't'uv heard me please don't'uv heard me...' frantic over his consciousness.

The first flash of black touched the light underneath his door, that first footstep breaching the glow, timed to a spike in Ellis' heartrate - and then the whole shape of a planted foot stomped straight into the center of the doorway as another step was taken...

And then the shadow halted.

Ellis didn't wait for anything to happen, didn't so much as pause. He didn't question or reason; he bolted. Socked feet moved with stumbled panic to race the few feet between him and the closet door, scrambling through the cracked doorway in such a flurry that he clipped his hip hard on the edge of the door.

Adrenaline too high to react, he forced the door shut behind himself, the sound ringing out loudly to his sensitive ears. He blurted a "Shit -" at the noise, but just turned around, mind focused on one thing: he'd noticed earlier there were locked doors connecting adjoining hotel rooms.

Blindly feeling in the darkness, Ellis felt his hands hit the back wall of the closet, and from there he slid his palms along until he caught the edge of the doorway. Quickly fumbling for the doorknob, Ellis tried to twist it.

It didn't budge.

He whimpered a frustrated sound, feeling on the knob. There was a lock built into it, and he twisted it, going the wrong way the first try in his hurry. It clicked unlocked when he corrected himself, and when he tried the knob again, it twisted... but the door didn't still move.

It was locked on both sides.

He didn't know if the door to his room had been opened. He swore he hadn't heard it, but he was panicked - maybe he'd missed it. It was locked, he tried to tell himself - but Brenda had given them the keys. Maybe she'd made more. Maybe the husky Angel was hunting for him. It would only take a second to determine where he was hiding.

Ellis didn't know what he was terrified the man would do, but he knew for a fact he was terrified.

"Nick!" he hissed, desperately, voice struggling between a whisper and a yell with a tremble that left it pleading as it broke over the gambler's name. "Nick!" The conman had to hear him, had to come and unlock the door on his side - had to.

Jiggling the knob uselessly, pushing his weight against the door as if he could force it open, he sent a nervous glance over his shoulder at nothing. Ellis felt the wooden frame of the door pressing against his bare shoulder roughly, a spark of pain flicking at him like he'd earned a splinter. "Nick! Open the door, man - Nick, please!"

Ellis was inches away from pounding at the door with a fist, desperation peaking to a blinding fear. "Nick! C'mon! Wake up!"

The sound of movement on the other side pierced through his panic. With a sudden click, the door gave way and Ellis tumbled through into the dimly lit closet connected to his.

He fell, all grasping hands and shoving fear, straight into a startled Nick.

"The fuck -" the gambler uttered, the words ripped straight out of him as Ellis' body collided with his with a panicked shove. They both staggered, collapsing more into Nick's closet than Ellis'. The older man was still mostly clothed, but his dress shirt lay unbuttoned, and when Ellis thrust into him and grasped arms around his waist, he buried against a bare, hair-dusted abdomen.

Silent, Nick's arms circled around Ellis' bare back. Unringed fingers, soft with pure warmth, cupped over his spine as the conman slid with him to the ground. They collapsed into a messy kneel, Ellis' fingers clutching in his shirt at the base of his spine.

Ellis' ribs were heaving with the force of his panting, a disorienting sense of relief washing over his whole body as Nick's arms surrounded him. He whispered furiously, mouth half-pressed against the gambler's sternum. "Oh, gawd, Nick, thank you - I - shit, shit -"

"El, breathe, Jesus Christ.." Nick tried to shush him, brows winding together in confusion. He slowly ran a flat palm along Ellis' shivering back, soothingly, as his other arm fell to a loose embrace around the Georgian's shoulder.

The kid gripped him tighter, arms vicelike as they clung to his torso, but Nick didn't say a word. Surprise turned to a darkening kind of calm, directionless anger stirring on the conman's face as he lowered his chin against his chest to try and examine the younger man's expression.

"Why the fuck are you in my closet..?" he murmured, bewildered, toward the top of Ellis' curly-haired head. The words were a gentle kind of demand, like Nick couldn't decide yet how to react.

Shaking his head slightly, Ellis forced his head to pull back just an inch, gaze flicking up toward Nick's with widened disbelief. "It was that Jerry guy, Nick!" the mechanic whimpered, fingers tightening. "He.. He's -"

There were footsteps out in the hallway.

Nick's head craned with a flash, one of his hands darting to cup Ellis' jaw and place a thumb over his lips, silencing him. From where they were collapsed, they could see the room door. Both men stared in silence as footsteps shadowed slowly before the door, swaggered with slow thuds - but this time, they didn't stop as they wandered past.

It wasn't until the vague sounds of someone descending the stairwell at the end of the hallway trickled through the wall that Nick spoke up - and he spoke up with a growl, so low and cold and hateful that Ellis flinched.

"If that fucking redneck pig-fucker so much as fucking mentioned doing a single fucking thing -"

Ellis had to stop him before he continued, pushing against the hand on his jaw with urgency. "N-no, he - I was just scared, Nick, 'cause.." He broke off, momentarily, and Nick merely gazed coolly at him as he found words. "He was walkin' down the hall all... weird-like… 'n' I poked muh head out 'n' I thought he saw me, 'n' then he stopped at muh door, and…"

Losing that razor edge to his voice as he dropped into the effort of soothing him again, Nick shifted his fingers to cradle Ellis' jaw a little more fully, pulling his chin up to meet gazes. Ellis felt himself calming as green eyes raked over his face, the Georgian's stiff frame softening.

"Kiddo, you're alright."
Forcing a small nod, Ellis took a calming breath, mostly-bare body melting a bit onto the conman's lap. Nick's thumb picked up a small caress down his cheekbone, a tickling kind of sensation trailing after its touch.

Ellis closed his eyes to it, though his brows twitched into knots anyway.

"He scares the livin' daylights outta me, Nick.. it ain't right fer a man tuh be like that." Ellis' voice was just a mumble, confiding in the gambler with a fervor. That sixth sense for people's personalities was cruel to him this time; there was nothing redeeming behind the husky Angel's sneer, and it haunted him. "I don't like him, Nick, I don't like him one li'l bit."

"I don't either." Nick confirmed, gaze narrowing slightly as his voice thickened with the intimacy of their confiding, close bubble of comfort. "But Fireball."

Ellis lifted his head a little, blinking in recognition, hesitant. Nick let the arm dangled around his waist slip a bit tighter, pulling Ellis onto his lap with a small hoist. The kid felt himself inhale, a hand slipping up to set flat onto Nick's chest to balance himself.

"Nothing's gonna happen." Nick's gaze was firm, voice riding that edge between a growl and a whisper. "If we have to kick their crazy asses all the way to Hell, we'll make it through. We've slogged through zombies all the goddamned way from Savannah. Three nutcases aren't going to do shit to us."

The Georgian wanted to believe it - he felt himself craving that security.. but he was mumbling before he knew it, eyes half-closing. "I - I dunno, Nick. I ain't so sure.. I feel like somethin' bad's gonna happen.."

"What, you?" the conman almost drawled, twisting his wrist suddenly to angle Ellis' chin up. His brow twitched, mouth drawing into a thin line of disbelief, eyes going low and sultry. "Come on, Overalls. You're the most sunshine-and-rainbows guy I've ever met. Don't tell me our sparkling hope is losing steam."

Ellis couldn't help but smile, helpless to the sudden flash that quirked his lips up, a slightly embarrassed snort escaping him. "Nick..." he protested in a mumble, but Nick was off already.

"I'm the cynic here, kid. You're not allowed to take my job." the gambler leaned down slightly, and Ellis' eyes gave just a momentary lower as their faces came closer. "It's all I've got, and fuck if some little dumbshit hick is taking it from me."

Shaking his head slightly to lean his cheek away from Nick's hand, Ellis gave a sideways smile that bordered on shy even as he furtively tried to keep the gambler from distracting him. He wanted the kiss he saw threatening on Nick's face, but -

"I'm bein' serious, man. Whut if they go crazy on us? Whut're we gonna do..?"

A sigh escaped those thin lips, Nick's mouth closing into a small line for a beat. Green eyes examined Ellis' expression, and in an instant he formed an answer. "You're gonna drive yourself nuts if you keep thinking about it. What'll happen'll happen, we can only clean up after the shit hits the fan." Nick's hand released his jawline. "You trust me, right?"

"Yeah." Ellis instantly murmured - so quickly, in fact, Nick gave a pause to smirk a little wryly.

Nick's gaze moved away for a moment, musing on something in the distance, before returning to the younger man's face. He spoke honestly, if reluctantly. "I think they are going to do something. And I think it'll come to a fight - but if we have to, we will, whatever it takes. We'll come out on Ellis gazed up at him for a moment, something in the statement quieting him. Lifting his hand slightly until he could settle his hand on Nick's, Ellis exhaled.

"I don't want you tuh get hurt. I don't want anyone tuh get hurt."

Nick's lips quirked in a smirk. "Even Jerry?" he almost airily questioned, gaze firmly rooted onto Ellis' sobered blues.

The kid just nodded.

The conman laughed outright, the sound making Ellis smile despite himself. "Stupid, stupid hick. Fuckin' unbelievable." Nick's arm lifted up to encircle his neck, pulling the younger man into a forceless headlock. Ellis just closed his eyes as it folded him against Nick's chest, shifting his hips to twist a little and fit better into the embrace.

Ellis let his chin shift just a little bit up and down in a nuzzle, drawing his brows into a furrow. Feeling the soft rhythm of Nick's heartbeat in his ear, he demanded in a murmur, "Promise yuh won't get hurt."

He cared. He cared so much, like he'd never cared for anyone. It hurt, like his eyes might water at the pain in his chest. Like he could feel himself tearing apart at the seams just thinking about something happening to Nick.

Nick's breath tickled down onto his neck when he responded, sending shivers down Ellis' whole spine and goosebumps over his bared skin. "Promise." his voice half-hummed against the crown of Ellis' head.

Nick knew acutely it was probably a lie.

They sat there for a moment, Ellis buried into the warmth that was Nick's embrace, the conman's fingertips traveling to play over his body with a kind of slow progress that was somehow - though the word was not one to fall easily onto Nick's shoulders - innocent.

The kid's head lifted, breaking out of the press of Nick's arm slightly. He glanced up at Nick's face as the conman glanced down at his, and their gazes held for a moment of silence. There was no communication, no words - just wide-eyed affection clashing and melting and grazing against cool thought. A softened blue against a pale green.

Ellis silently leaned up, craning his chin and bracing his hands against Nick's stomach. He brushed his mouth against the other man's, the gambler leaning down an inch to let him get closer.

Nick put a faint downward tip into the kiss, a soft suction caressing the plump shape of Ellis' sweet bottom lip and giving him room to give a gently appreciative exhale as the kiss settled in.

They stayed like that for a hazy moment, slow motions only just straying from that first contact that hummed so vibrantly on Ellis' senses. There was some kind of indistinct contentment with just staying like they were - for a moment.

It broke as softly as it started, their faces just slipping apart with the taste and tingle of the kiss still alive on skin and nerve. Nick's gaze examined distantly over his face, making Ellis' eyes lower slowly as a smile twitched onto full, wetted lips.

Ellis automatically reached up his arms to loop around Nick's neck for support when the conman shifted his hands underneath the Georgian's thighs, somewhat sorely shifting to start standing up.

"Come on, Fireball. Guess I'm stuck with you, now."

He wasn't totally steady, careful to keep their dual weight balanced. After a moment, Nick got upright with Ellis' body held tight to his hip, thighs gently embracing his waist and supported by his hands.

Ellis let his face just bury into the older man's shoulder, tightening his arms carefully as the sensation of being carried - body against Nick's so-warm one, breath soft on his ear - made his eyes close.

The walk to the bed was short, and Ellis tightened his grip as Nick lowered him onto the mattress with a careful bend and exhale, struggling more than he'd let on. Releasing him with some reluctance, Ellis flicked a glance at him, shyly lowering his chin as he crawled backwards on the bed to make space for the older man.

When Nick slipped down next to him, he got onto his side, facing the younger man. The sprawl of his open dress shirt gave this inviting view of the gambler's torso, spawning an urge to nuzzle against him.

When Nick silently - expression slightly firm - lifted up his arm in an invitation, Ellis scrambled to accept it, eagerly rolling his body to press into the space created by Nick's extended arm.

Snuggling down against his torso, Ellis closed his eyes as Nick's arm momentarily extended to grasp at the blankets and tug them just halfway up their bodies. The fabric settled into a snug fit around them as the conman's arm lowered to drape over Ellis' bare torso, hand resting on the mattress beside them.

It felt peaceful. Peaceful and warm, and Ellis let his hands slip up between their bodies until he could just lay hands on Nick's skin, burrowed into the safety that was his draped arm. It was almost enough to get him to sleep - but what little sleep he got was shallow.

When he did drift, he'd merely wake up again, some dread pressing at the back of his throat and making his skin crawl. Maybe the remnants of dreams he didn't remember. He tried not to move, tried not to make a sound, lest he disturb Nick.

The thudding heartbeat he could hear beneath the older man's sternum was the only thing that soothed him.
"Rise and shine, sweethearts!" cried Brenda's smugness-lined voice. The harsh sound of metal rapping on wood made Nick jolt up in bed, arms - that had fully encapsulated Ellis' half-curl body over the course of the night - dragging the kid with.

Ellis gave a half-asleep yelp, burying into Nick's arms at the abrupt awakening, but Nick merely slipped a hand to the back of his neck to support him against his chest. He spared a glance down, mouth burying into the soft, curly-haired mop that was his lover's head.

As much as Nick's body was wired to hold onto something as he slept, Ellis' seemed to be wired to oblige him. The younger man was snuggled tight against him with no space for anything else.

The window built into the far wall of the hotel room betrayed the early hour; it was only just morning, a deadened sun spitting out a few shades of orange like the unwanted pulp of a fruit. "Time for some ammo-hunting, and we thought you all could join us. The guns are hungry!"

Glaring toward the closed door, Nick tried to shake himself out of the heavy-handed grip of sleep. His eyes laid half-open, body aching unpleasantly, and he gave a faint grunt of denial. "Jesus Tits." he grumbled, unpleasantly shifting his hips to roll onto his back on the mattress, blanket stretching as they tried to follow him. "Could wake up to a nicer voice."

Ellis didn't let go, clinging as the conman adjusted his position, and he lifted his head slightly as his body stilled in a sprawl on Nick's body. Frowning, the younger man tiredly dragged a hand from its place around Nick's waist, rubbing sleepily at his eyes.

Nick smirked slightly at him, arching a brow and letting one arm pull away from Ellis. He crossed it under his own head, supporting it up a few inches so he could examine the Georgian's sleepy face. His other arm rested in a lazy dangle over Ellis' bare shoulders.

That almost-nude body stretched and squirmed on top of his, succumbing to the whims of his slowly wakening muscles. The conman's smirk turned slightly dark, a kind of lecherous enjoyment lowering his lids as Ellis' oblivious motions rubbed all the right places in all the right ways.

He probably would've said something, had Ellis not suddenly flopped down in defeat. He gave the smallest cry of distress amidst a yawn, burying his face against Nick's chest.

"I don't wann'uh get up."

The childish statement made Nick's brows lift up, but as he gazed over the kid's collapsed frame, he could read real exhaustion written into his posture. There were dark bruises under his eyes, like he'd not slept at all. A subtle flatness touched his lips, sighing.

...Poor dumbshit's worn out. Kid can't handle this. You're used to not trusting people, Nicolas, but he's not. Damnit.. of all the rednecks you have to take under your wing, it had to be the innocent one.

"Ellis, you're not a kid." he protested, hoping to stir the kid into indignant energy. "It's time to get moving."

Shaking his head, Ellis buried tighter against Nick's chest, fingers curling slightly as they gripped onto his skin. A soft whine left him, voice lowering into a whisper. The words left a warm imprint of breath against his skin as his lips moved. "Li'l longer, Nick, please.. I just wann'uh lay here with
It wasn't so much the soft, gentle way Ellis pleaded - it was the sincerity in his words that gave Nick pause. He drew his head back just an inch, brows crinkling, before he forced himself to close his eyes.

"Come on, Overalls. We gotta go." he prodded as distantly as he could, feeling a stir of sarcasm in his tone as his mind narrowed in on that little piece of him that wouldn't have minded that.

That was the kind of thought he typically suffocated under layers of razor-sharp denial. This one got let off easy - he just pushed it aside.

The Georgian's voice fell to a pitiful nakedness, and Nick felt his resolve breaking under Ellis' plea. Had he gotten any rest at all? "I don't wann'uh get up yet.. not tuh be 'round them Angels.. 'm too tired, Nick.. can't we stay..?"

Nick started to chide him again, shifting an arm to try and get an elbow under himself and prop his body up, but Ellis' chin lifted slightly to look at him before he could.

He looked gorgeous in the low light. A ghost of curly-haired, soft-skinned perfection - a mirage of kiddish beauty, stretching up from the mattress with a muscled solidity Nick wanted to touch. Those sleepy blues pinned him where he was with melted pools of desperation.

Oh my God.

"Fuck, okay!" Nick blurted, lifting up an arm to suddenly shove his forearm over his eyes, rubbing against the loose fabric of his shirtsleeve, as if Ellis might blind him. "Christ, turn off the pity headlights, Jesus.."

Ellis didn't seem to get what he meant, a little frown touching his lips as he blinked up at his lover.

"I get it, okay, kiddo?" Sighing, Nick lowered his arm from his face and let it settle beside himself, drooping down into the mattress in resignation. "Christ." Ellis' eyes softened a little, guilt slipping into his eyes. He dropped his mouth to the gambler's chest, grazing full lips against the trickling of hair tracing along his skin.

It was a mournful little gesture. "... sorry, Nick. I couldn't sleep none last night, is all. Feels like I ain't slept in days."

Nick eyed him almost warily, letting his jaw roll slowly in its sockets as he let out a sigh. He raised his hand from the mattress and drew it down his face instead, squeezing out any emotion that might have decided to surge up. "You and me, both."

The younger man got a sympathetic quirk to his mouth, lifting his head as if to speak. Before he could, there was another call from the hallway, louder:

"Get up before the zombies do!"

Nick sighed, gesturing with his free hand at Ellis as he removed the other one from Ellis' hair, shooing Ellis away from him. The kid, reluctance written over his soft face, crawled off of him to thump softly onto the mattress beside him, already curling up.

The conman sat up where he was, letting himself slump gently as he raised hands to start buttoning his shirt up. He felt Ellis' gaze on his fingers, just one blue eye peeking from the muscled arms that were crossed before his face.

"They just want to go ammo-hunting, right..? I'll talk them into letting you hang back."

Ellis smiled a little, burying his head a little more against his arms. "Really..?" escaped him in a grateful murmur, voice softening, like he was already falling asleep. Nick just rolled up his eyes with a small sigh, nodding.

He scooped his rings off the bedside table, pushing them onto their usual fingers. "Anyway, you look exhausted. If you go out there half-asleep, you'll just get yourself killed. Or one of us."

the gambler grumbled as he arched his spine, using a flat hand to tuck his shirt under the waistband of his slacks.

"But you owe me. Now I'm going to have to deal with these assclowns all on my own."

Giving a small pat over his stomach, Nick bent down, holding his shoes still where they waited on the floor so he could slip his feet into them. He glanced up when he heard the smallest guffaw escape his tired lover.

"Sayin' you'd rather I come?" he teased sleepily, turning to roll onto his belly and settle his face against the pillow, arms crossing over the curly mop of his head.

The gambler rolled his eyes. Reaching to the squat nightstand beside the bed and picking up his suit jacket from where he'd laid it over the counter, he shrugged into it, tucking the fabric against his frame with a few tugs. "Well, when you put it like that.. I'm glad you're staying behind."

he retorted, thumbing over his mouth in a slow motion.

Nick took a step forward, bending down with a hand bracing itself on the mattress. The way it bowed under his fingers alerted Ellis to his approach, and the kid's head lifted a little, blinking at him.

A smirk touched the conman's face, dark with a calm composure that smoothed over his clean-shaven features. "Say thank you." he demanded simply.

Ellis eyed him for a moment, peeking up from the pillow with a slow-growing shade of pink along the bridge of his nose. He pushed against his elbows, lifting up onto them with a lazy slouch to his spine as he stretched his head up. The gambler didn't move, examining his motions calmly as the Georgian reached up to kiss his cheek.

A brow arched, and Nick licked his lips, musing for a moment as Ellis gave him a smile. Eventually, he shook his head, reaching up his hand to shove Ellis' head back down, ruffling his hair in the same gesture. "Close enough."

It was to the sound of Ellis' sleepy laughter, muffled into the pillow as he curled tightly into the mattress, that Nick turned around and moved toward the door. He sighed, sliding his palm over his hair to make sure it was in place. He let his expression level out, disinterested as he slipped out into the hallway.

Brenda and Coach stood at the far end of the hallway, both of them with arms crossed and stoic gazes. It was as likely that they were conversing as it was they were merely standing there, locked in some silent battle of the minds, vying for dominance.

It turned out to be the former, but Nick found himself entertained by the idea all the same.

"Fine wit' me." the big man was in the middle of saying. "Last thing we need is to run outta bullets." He noticed Nick as he spoke, lifting up a hand in recognition, even as he continued uninterrupted. "Y'all know where a gun store is, then?"

"Of course we do." Brenda returned, craning her chin up idly as her fingertips plucked at a scab down the side of her jaw. "It's maybe three streets over. Pretty small place, but last we saw, it hadn't been ransacked too much. We'll find what we need."

Snorting, Nick slipped a hand into the pocket of his slacks and arched a brow as he approached. "You guys sure know your way around. Tour Guides of Death is more like it. How cute."

The woman glanced at him, gaze narrowing for just an instant - he read something alien there, something cold - and then she flashed a smile at him. He returned it, not the slightest bit of humor etched on his face. "And on our right, we have an ugly douchebag."

"The best-dressed douchebag in the apocalypse." Nick shot back in a purr, cuffing his chin with the tips of his fingers in a rude gesture. "Overall needs to stay behind for a bit. We can swing back by and catch him once we're done finding ammo."

Brenda turned entirely to face him, her dark brows lifting, unamused. "What? Is he hurt?"

Nick shrugged up his shoulders, settling both hands in his pockets now and leaning back on his heels calmly. "He's exhausted or something. I don't care, I just don't want that dumbass swinging around a shotgun half-asleep, get me?"

Coach chuckled, leaning back against the wall slightly as he let his arms half-cross. The hotel room door next to them opened up with a creak, Rochelle stepping out with a bit of a blink as she eyed the three just by her door.

"Fine, sure. No skin off my nose." the woman spat back, brushing her fingers through her hair in a short motion. "Coddle your kid however you want. I didn't realize you guys were running a daycare."

"Seriously, fighting, again?" Rochelle muttered, seeming frustrated as she closed the door behind herself and raised hands to tie her hair tighter. "This is just one big pissing match to you guys."

Nick smirked, lifting his chin a couple inches in a nod. "I'm pretty sure men have more distance. Might be better to just throw in the proverbial towel, doll."

Although Rochelle rolled her eyes as her insult was just used as more fuel, sidestepping to lean against the wall beside Coach, Brenda rose to the occasion with ease. "Women have less to cut off. Take your pick, slick."

That was more than an idle threat.

Nick gave an unpleasant wince, straightening out his arms to press his elbows into his sides. "I don't like hearing that from a bitch with an actual sword. Let's call it a draw."

The lazy way Brenda cocked her head to the side and smirked said she disagreed, but she tossed up a hand anyway. "We'll leave Jerry to guard the hotel, then. He'll be pissy about missing the fighting, but he's pissy about a lot of things."

... Shit.

Nick's gaze went distant within a split second, fingers going into a curl in his pockets. Of all the outcomes, Jerry guarding Ellis was very low on his list of desireables. Unfortunately, he'd walked right into it - walking out of it wasn't going to be easy.

"Do you really want to deal with that fuckhead angry?" he questioned sardonically, examining a spot on the wall with disinterest. If I reverse now... shit. Fuck. His mouth felt dry out, despite himself.

Much to Nick's chagrin, Coach interrupted - against him. "Don't want the young'un gettin' caught by infected and bein' alone, Nick. Safer this way."

"In a fucking locked hotel?" Resisting the strong urge to glare at Coach, frustrated with the unintentional betrayal, Nick forced a shrug. "If you guys want to leave another fighter behind for no reason, fine.. just saying."

He couldn't press, not without tipping his hand - not without drawing attention to himself. He should have dragged Ellis out of bed himself.

Rochelle rubbed a knuckle against her chin, gaze lingering on Nick as she lifted up a brow.

"Whatever works, Brenda. At least this way, we'll know you guys will want to come back to get him, right?"

She said it with a laugh, but Brenda eyed her humorlessly. A narrow touched cold-glazed eyes, letting her hip cock to one side sharply, straining against tight jeans. "Don't trust us, bonita?" She clucked out the word, mocking Chris' accent. "Think we'd leave your little buddy behind?"

The hard-edged hostility had Rochelle bewildered in an instant, lowering her chin and raising hands in an apologetic motion. "That's not - I -"

"That's exactly what she meant." Nick growled, suddenly taking a step forward as he engaged a stare of such pure, driven force that Brenda had no option other than twisting her head to regard him. "And it's true."

Brenda smirked at him slowly, a small quirk touching the edge of her mouth. She gave an idly confident lift of a shoulder, uncrossing her arms. "Probably is." she uttered, turning away from him. "Let's go. Time's wasting." she said simply over her shoulder, footsteps dull against the hotel carpeting as she moved toward the staircase.

The sway of her hips, a confident kind of stride, had Nick's eyes following. He had to shake his head, shaking away the reflexive interest like cobwebs, before his secondary brain could betray him.

No. Bad Nick.

He took a step back, turning toward Ellis' hotel room. He kept his voice casual, off-hand. He'd slip back in and tell Ellis the change of plans. There was no way he could leave the kid behind with the Southern Angel. "Yeah, just give me a second. I'll catch up."

He didn’t see it coming.

Before he could get more than a step away, Brenda stopped. She spun on a heel, sliding a hand onto the shaft of the katana lashed to her hip. Her fingers grazed the handle, idly, like she were merely adjusting it.

Nick wasn't stupid. It wasn't so casual a gesture.

Their gazes met, and there was a glint in her expression. "Your guns are downstairs." He examined the depths of her eyes, and found nothing but a cold, predatory pleasure. "We'll be coming back. No reason to hold us up, Nick."

Brenda's expression unsettled him. He felt, suddenly, the stakes had raised. He had the intense sensation that he'd fallen a step behind. That she had a plan, and he didn't know what it was. She wanted him to leave Ellis - had he handed them a hostage, just like that?

Fury boiled at the base of his throat, before he could stop it. Slow down, Nicolas. You're being paranoid. You don't know anything. Don't over-think. Keep your cool.

Whatever he might think, making a scene wasn't an option. If he was right, arguing would only worsen the situation. If he was wrong, he'd be raising questions for no reason. The last thing he needed was to blow his cover with Ellis.

Smoothly, Nick drew his hands into his pockets, fingers thumbing at the material of his slacks. He kept his face flat, barely acknowledging her aside from a dismissive, "Yeah, alright. Don't get your panties in a wad."

The Angel's leader flashed her teeth in a grin, wordlessly turning to continue her movement toward the staircase. Nick followed, his gaze dulling to a glazed stare on her back. What is your fucking game?

Nick was aware of Rochelle pressing to slip beside him. He initially ignored her, but she swung her weight and bumped her shoulder into Nick's bicep, making him fight the urge to snap. He glanced at her instead, skeptically raising a brow.

"Thanks for the backup, suit." she gratefully explained, flashing him a smile. "You're not too bad sometimes."

Nick snorted, freeing a hand from a pocket to straighten his jacket on his frame. "Don't mention it. When it's between your kind of bitch and that kind of bitch, I'll be on your side every time."

Rochelle blinked at him for a quiet moment, lips parting a little, visibly trying to decide how annoyed she should be. With a small sigh, she ended up just shaking her head, stepping ahead of him to descend the stairs.

He didn't have time to worry about her feelings, and he didn't need to be talked at right now. Drawing reluctantly to follow in her footsteps, Nick noticed Coach moving just behind him - blissfully silent. He lowered his lids, half-closing his eyes as he walked, brain on overdrive.

He'd just have to come up with a contingency plan.

Nick didn't realize quite how deeply imbedded his protective instinct had grown to be until just then - the swelling feeling that he was lashed to the cause of Ellis' safety. He'd promised Ellis everything would be fine.

... problem is, I'm a lying son of a bitch.
No one noticed Nick do it.

He moved with a calm disinterest, ignoring them, and under the tension of organizing the two groups… nobody had the mind to pay attention to him. He filtered into the background of their conversation.

Jerry's shotgun was placed on the hotel check-in desk, and Nick sidled up next to it on light steps.

"If something goes wrong and we need you, Jerry, you know the signal. Three, two, one shots. Other than that, we'll be back in maybe half an hour." Brenda ordered simply, cocking her hip where she stood just in the middle of the lobby.

Nick let his gaze wander as he slipped his hand up, thumb bracing the very tip of the shotgun's barrel against the counter to keep it still. He gripped a bullet from his rifle between his index and middle finger, slipping it in line with the barrel.

"Sure, sure. I know." the man grunted angrily, rapping knuckles on the window. Deep irritation had his brows wound up in knots, badly-restrained anger tightening the strong tendons of his neck. "I'll watch the damn place."

Standing at a distance from the others, Chris seemed quieter than usual. He had his machete in hand, and was idly flipping it from hand to hand, barely listening to the conversation going on around him. He was closest to Nick, but also the least aware - so Nick took the chance and proceeded.

Using his smallest finger, he pushed the bullet into the shotgun barrel. It slid in deep with a soft rattle - and then abruptly, silence, as the metal lodged into the cylinder tightly. He tested it, carefully tipping the gun a little to ensure the bullet was stuck securely. The next shot fired would hit the blockage and explode.

The cruelty was more than worth Ellis' protection.

At best, the barrel would split, warp, and render the gun useless. At worst, it would backfire and injure the hulking Southerner. A pleased sensation settled into Nick's chest, pulling his hand from the weapon and turning away with a smooth motion.

Rochelle was in the middle of bravely speaking up, hand stretched behind her back as she itched at a spot on her lower back, when Nick glanced over. "Thanks for staying behind, Jerry, we jus-"

He sneered at her with an angry gesture of his head, turning away, like she weren't even worth looking in the eye. "Fuck off." he stated easily, raising up a thickly-furred arm to set his forearm against the wall and lean into it.

Half of Nick felt the urge to slip into the conversation and attack the guy - but then, there was that satisfied part of him that knew he'd already slipped the knife into his back.

Pun intended.

Strolling away from the counter, he didn't so much as spare a nod for the others, striding to the hotel doors. Coach gave him an almost fatherly 'and where are you going' look as he passed, but Nick merely pushed the doors open and slipped outside.
The crusty smell of salt dragged the air down like the clinging grip of a wet towel. Nick could've choked on it had he taken a deep enough breath. Stepping onto the sidewalk as the doors swung shut behind him, the gambler pushed his hands into the pockets of his jacket, turning his chin upward.

His gaze ticked on and off the sky, examining the muddy grey around the edges of the horizon as he stood quietly on the sidewalk before the hotel. The criss-crossing streets, bedecked with house after house, were clotted lightly with unkempt and untrimmed trees.

It was hard to see too far, but he could see the shambling shapes of infected crawling around in the shadows. The early morning hour didn't seem to have any special meaning to them. They moved as they always did: lethargic, slow, and crippled by the occasional spray of vomit or seeming headache.

Yet ready to flash to murderous ferocity within a split second.

Nick was faintly aware of the doors opening again behind him, and a soft-footed presence slipping near him. "It rained again." Rochelle noted with some hesitance at the gambler's elbow. Like it meant something; like it mattered.

He glanced at her with a vague mask of disinterest and shrugged his shoulders, letting his elbows straighten against his ribs. He couldn't help the cool note that lined his voice. "It's not raining now."

The street still glistened from the weather, growing heat only just starting to burn the dampness away. Chris, Brenda, and Coach slipped out of the hotel behind them, moving with a rigid formation that kept the two groups mostly separated.

"Alright, let's get moving before Jerry gets bored." Brenda easily commanded, pulling her sniper rifle off her back. It flipped into her hands, a casual grace in how she handled the weapon, and she tossed it against her shoulder so she could look down the scope and examine the road before them.

The short Spaniard at her side lifted up an arm to point down the road, bright brown eyes alive with a certain humor over the slip of gauze still taped to his cheek. "It is down that way, mis amigos. If we hurry we may get there and back before he gnaws his own arms off."

The snort that escaped Nick as he glanced over his shoulder, examining the hotel's darkened face, was cruel. Or blows them off. He was aware that they had started to move away, but for an instant, he didn't care.

Sabotaging the gun was one thing. However, the satisfying knowledge that the man was more likely to kill himself with it than anything else was dulled by the awareness that there was a lot he could do without a gun.

With his cleaver. Or worse, his hands.

Suddenly, the win felt hollow.

... If you do one single thing to that kid.. I'll tear your sick fuck head off with my bare hands.

"Come on, suit." Rochelle called back at him gently, snapping his attention forward. Growling slightly, he moved into a hurried stride to catch up, grunting noncommittally as he reached her side.

They moved quietly down the street, the survivors taking point with the Angels a few steps behind.
There was a slight tension in the air, worsened by the glower etched onto Nick's expression and the presence of the infected so close by but not yet aware.

"Keep your ears open." lazily escaped Brenda's lightly curled lips. She lifted her rifle, tipping her head to gaze through the scope. "The rain attracts Witches. There'll be at least one or two of them around still."

"Rain?" Coach questioned, the deep swell of his brow crinkling in a coil of wrinkles. He rolled his shotgun in his hands, glancing around slowly, suspicious now.

Chris gave a laugh, idly turning his assault rifle in his hands. "Sí. Las pobres putas like the rain. Helps them to look even sadder." His footsteps brought him to within kicking distance of a half-crushed tin can on the concrete.

He glanced down at it, smiling for an instant.

"Olé!" he cheered, startling everyone but Brenda. With a swift kick, he sent the can clattering down the street ahead of them. The loud noise shattered what had been a distant quiet, and like the fired shot of a commenced race, the gates opened.

Screaming infected came bolting out from behind buildings and under trees, their attention quickly diverting from the rattling can to the live bodies only a few yards away.

Clawing and snapping at the air in eager rage, they came racing down the road at the five. Nick cursed, sparing a glare for the grinning youth as he jerked his rifle up to his shoulder and took aim. "You're as bad as Overalls!"

Rochelle and Coach did the same at his sides, a strong line protectively clinched together, and the firing of their guns came in spotty unison. Shots snapped the infected back with splatters of blood, downing them in threes.

It was a practiced kind of order. They'd been fighting together for what felt like a lifetime, and there was a familiarity to the very way they stood. The flood of infected barely came close before their net of gunfire had them picked off.

Even without Ellis, they worked in such tandem Chris and Brenda likely didn't even need to help.

Pride made them anyway, though Chris gazed over them for a moment with a quirked grin. He seemed affably impressed, looking toward Brenda with a gesture of his arms that seemed to say, 'see?'. He could only watch as Brenda darted to the side with a dark twist to her mouth, getting a line of sight to pick off zombies where she could.

"Keep moving." she ordered, as Chris' assault rifle lent its rattling gunfire to the mess.

Coach led the five forward, advancing at a quick walk over the carnage they were painting in front of them. With an idly dismissive smirk on her face, Brenda took advantage of the cover fire they provided to get ahead of them just by a few inches.

Nick smirked, noticing. He wasn't one to talk - but her ego amused him.

The gunfire didn't quite cover the squeal that echoed out from one of the houses, chilling with the almost alien quality the choking keen had. "Spitter!" Rochelle warned, not an instant too soon.

A hacking sound came just after, announcing the acid projectile had been launched. The sound had Coach barreling forward, using the strong shape of his shoulder to ram through the infected that had managed to get close.

They screamed at him in denial, but got little more than a swipe or two at his frame before the force of the collision knocked them off balance, falling like pins. Shoving them aside, the football coach cleared enough room for Nick and Rochelle to leap after him and get out of the way.

The acid came in an almost shell-like membrane, like a coughed up organ, exploding upon so much as touching the concrete behind them. It splattered in a wide puddle, the liquid hissing and bubbling as it spread out. The noise left Nick with a wince as the agony of his calf resurfaced as a dull ghost of a memory.

This time, though, the Spitter's attack had missed, and the dribbling line of electric green acid from the window of a house just beside them gave away its position. Brenda twisted in a smooth motion, her rifle jolting up to her face.

Her footsteps paused just long enough to steady her aim, and after two shots in rapid succession, the Spitter screamed out a death cry that gurgled with pain. Splashes of acid dribbled out from the window as it died.

Only a flash of it was visible as it fell over, clawing out bony, flapping arms. They just barely witnessed the ghastly shape of its acid-melted face, jaw and throat completely torn open and bloodied by the fire of its own spluttering saliva.

"Good shot." Rochelle automatically called out, turning to shoot a zombie lunging out from behind a fence on the side of the road. Brenda smirked with some condescension, facing the other woman with an arched brow.

"It's called experience."

Nick noticed the almost elongated shape of a Smoker lean suddenly from behind a building just over her shoulder. It was clouded by the thick, buzzing smoke exuding from rotten pores all over its skin. Glistening tendrils draped around its shoulders, grabbing and squirming at the air like living worms.

He didn't say a single word.

"I'm trying to compliment you." Rochelle shot back, lowering her rifle slightly to glare back at her. Chris stood just next to her, and, consciously or not, she left him to protect her back. "I knew you couldn't take a joke; can't take a compliment, either?"

He did protect her flank, with a grin, brows raising as the short spit of his assault rifle knocked limbs off the few nearby zombies left. "No progress..." he half-mumbled to himself, kicking out swiftly to collide the toe of his shoe with a fallen zombie's face, crushing its nose in with a splatter of blood.

Brenda had her hand ready to lift up and point at the other woman, a confident quirk upward touching the corner of her mouth… right as the Smoker suddenly cawed out a shout-like cough. Its tongue whipped audibly through the air to catch around her shoulders with a greasy, constricting wrap.

She had all of a second to widen her eyes, accusation flying over wild hazel irises, before the thing yanked her back off her feet. Brenda struck the concrete half-curled, taking the brunt of the impact on her lower back, legs kicking out as she went skidding backwards over the road.

Rochelle gave a shout of immediate concern, taking a step forward with an outthrust hand as if she could catch hold of her. Nick resisted a laugh as hard as he could, lifting his rifle and side-stepping to try and get a bead on the Smoker's jerking body as it reeled her in.

It was tempting to let her get taken away, but...

Before he could, Coach had already shot - at the tongue itself. The blast of the man's double-barrel shotgun ripped straight into the shuddering rope of flesh, the bullets striking with such tearing force that the thing split into bloody strings.

Brenda's weight proved too much for what was left of the tongue-turned-tentacle, and it snapped violently, leaving her to skid a few more inches and stop. She kicked furiously, the fleshy length still twined around her, snarling.

"Get this off me!"

A deep sigh escaped Coach, lowering his weapon as Chris bolted with a fleet-footed agility toward the prostrated woman, bending quickly to a knee and putting hands on her to try and drag the tentacle out of its wrap.

"Gettin' there." the big man affirmed. Nick slipped him a smirk sideways, a little sharp twist, and Coach returned it with an uncharacteristic guile written in that thick brow. He'd been perfectly aware, too, and Nick felt a surge of fondness for the guy.

"¡Tranqui, tranqui, B!" Chris cried softly, pulling his machete from his belt. He held it up, dodging the shove of Brenda's knee as she fought the twine of the Smoker's tongue. "I have to get it off without cutting you!"

She stilled with all the contentment of a wild animal being treated.

Rochelle bent down slightly as Chris worked the tongue undone with careful slices of his machete, sawing the fleshy limb apart. "Sorry, Brenda, I didn't see it.. too busy arguing." she apologized, her expression drawn in a look of concern as she examined the fallen woman. Rochelle let a hand slip onto her own chest, questioning softly, "Are you okay?"

The woman growled slightly, waiting just long enough for the tongue to loosen around her torso. She shoved it away, and Chris with it, the Spaniard giving something of a hurt up-thrust of his hands as he retreated from her.

"Fine." she retorted stiffly, shooting a cursory glance at Coach as she brushed herself off slightly. The words, "Good shot." left her with some force, working out the syllables as if through gritted teeth.

He obliged her with a nod, and that was that. Visibly eager to move on, Brenda turned away. "Let's go." she ordered within a breath, starting forward with a stalk to her step. Chris moved quickly to follow after her, replacing his machete in his belt and tossing up his assault rifle.

The survivors moved after them, quick to re-group in a small line, though the Angels had retaken the lead. It was all Nick could do to keep his face from turning into something pleased, forcing it into flat disinterest.

He didn't expect it when Rochelle slipped next to him and nudged him. He glanced over out of the corner of his eyes, idly, and she grinned at him in utter silence. The concern that had glazed her expression hadn't been so honest, either.

'Nice.' was written all over her face.
The muted crush of glass underfoot marked the first step into the gun store. The windows had been blown inward from some impact, leaving the dimly lit store dusty and fogged inside from the free-flow of air. The glass, tinted and shatter-proof, had fallen in sheets, crystallized into fine webs across the tile.

The five moved in a cautious line, still on alert as they entered the building. Shady wooden shelving lined the walls, hooks adorned with guns of various sizes, glass that had once protected them broken just like the front windows.

Pistols hung beside full-sized shotguns, and there was a large, latticed set of shelves against the back wall that hung open. The thing was maybe half-full of ammo boxes and loose cartridges, labeled with tags.

"Definitely have been folks here before us." Coach noted in a grunt, gesturing at the empty hooks where guns had been taken and the spill of bullets across the floor from torn-open bullet cases.

Chris made his way first to the ammo closet in the back, stepping carefully over the mess made of the floor. "They were in a rush, too. What a mess, dios mío.."

Rochelle crossed her arms over her chest, watching Brenda boredly trace fingers over the racks of guns. "There was a lot of panic when the infection hit. I'm surprised there's anything left at all, honestly."

"Stupid commoners." the woman muttered, taking down a shotgun to examine it with displeasure. "They're lucky we're here."

With an arched brow, Nick echoed her, disbelievingly. "Commoners?" He shot a scathing glance in her direction as he shook his head, voice smooth with a cool taunt. "Are we in the fourteenth century or something? Christ."

Brenda shrugged, pointing the shotgun downward at the floor. "You know what I mean." She grasped at the cable lock wound through the ejection mechanism, jiggling it a little. It kept the gun parts from moving at all - they'd have to remove them. "There's a reason we're here and everyone else ran away or died. This kind of disaster culls the weak."

Tossing it to the ground, she ignored the loud clatter as the shotgun landed by her feet, uselessly. "It's just a test."

Somewhat carefully, Rochelle moved across the gun store to stop just behind Christophe. He noticed her, smiling over his shoulder enthusiastically. She forced a small smile back, a sigh escaping the corner of her mouth.

"Oh yeah, the fucking zombie apocalypse is a test to prove your goddamn ego. Totally worth the hundreds of thousands of lives." the gambler returned coldly, brows drawn in a neat scowl.

Brenda laughed, turning her head to examine Nick with a lifted chin. "We've been traveling south since New York. Overall, we've probably killed four thousand zombie bastards since the outbreak. If that's not proof we're something better, what is?"

"Better than what?" Nick shot back with a spitting sarcasm. "The dead and the deader?" The sour tang of hostility in the air left both Brenda and Nick in stewing silence, glares passed between them.
in a slow trade of agitation.

Rochelle leaned forward slightly, murmuring to Chris as he picked through the ammo cases. "Is she always like this?"

He chuckled, brows lifting and a small glance slipping over his shoulder. He lowered his voice, confidentially. "Sí. But worse, ever since we lost our old leader, Brock." He passed a box back to her, offering the right caliber for her sniper rifle.

The woman took it from him, a small nod touching her head. The news struck her oddly, unexpected, and she chewed on her lower lip softly. "Oh." she uttered, apologetically. "I'm sorry.."

Chris shrugged his shoulders, giving a laugh softly with a light edge of resignation. "He ran straight into a Hunter. Nothing anyone could do, he was -" Seeming to suddenly lose the word, breath catching on his tongue as it curled faintly between his teeth, Chris merely clasped his hands on his stomach and exploded his fingers outward to mimic the spilling of innards. "- destripado, before anyone could move. ¿Comprendes?"

Giving a nod, Rochelle lowered her gaze, drawing her lips gently in a line of sympathy. "Yeah.. I'm really sorry, that's awful. I've been jumped by one of those things before.. nearly tore me open, too."

Chris turned slightly, left arm packed with a few cases of ammo. He set his free hand on her elbow, a soft touch that made her head twitch up in surprise. "Don't worry. It won't happen to you, conmigo aqui."

She opened her mouth, but he was already stepping away.

"Survivors stick together, ¿sí?" he elaborated, moving past her to carry the ammo back toward Brenda as he grinned to himself. Giving a small huff, Rochelle shook her head, sling her rifle onto her shoulder so she could start loading bullets into it.

Brenda perked up as the Spaniard offered the ammo out to her, bending slightly to look through it critically. "So." she prompted, idly, gesturing with her free hand at the other survivors. "Tell me. What're your plans?"

Coach pulled a heavy pistol from a rack behind the store counter, examining it. "What you mean?" he responded, lifting it up toward Nick.

The conman arched a brow in interest. He could tell from afar it was a Magnum, much like his own that he'd lost. Instantly intrigued, he stirred to close the distance between them, plucking the weapon from Coach's hand to turn it in his fingers.

"You all must have a reason to be in Tybee. End of the road here, there's nothing but ocean after this, unless you backtrack. Why?" Brenda questioned bluntly, taking one ammo cartridge from Chris and moving to attach it to the loops she'd built into her belt for that very purpose.

Nick paused, feeling his nerves kick in at the question. He gave a smooth nod of appreciation at the ex-football player, turning the gun over. He started to muse on how to remove the cable lock - only to discover the lock wasn't actually cinched shut. Snorting, he tore it out, giving the slide a pull to test it.

"We figured the shore was our best bet for survival." the gambler responded flatly, passing Chris by at a distance as his shoes crackled over the glass. The uncertainty of how the conversation would go was something he didn't like at all.
When Chris uttered a low whistle, Nick glanced at him. The Spaniard plucked a box of .50 caliber bullets from the boxes he held in his arms, offering it up. Although instinct had him wanting to reject the offer on principle, Nick reluctantly lifted up a hand.

The Spaniard grinned a little, tossing it his way. Nick caught it, prying the box open and thumbing out eight bullets so he could start loading the pistol. He was prepared to stoically ignore the man rather than offer a thanks - but Chris never looked for one.

"Survival?" Brenda parroted, her stance going wide as she set hands on her hips, thumb toying against the handle of her katana lashed crudely to her belt. "If you want to survive, you have to keep moving. Hiding in a beach house is just waiting to die."

Coach sighed with that weary tone, shoulders lifting. "We ain't trying to hide. We got families to find." A softening of his expression left him rubbing at the back of his head, adding, "Don't y'all?"

The cruel snort that escaped Brenda had Coach shaking his head before she'd even begun to speak. "Please. That's not even part of this world anymore. Being alive is the only thing that matters, not family or friendship. It just holds you back."

Rochelle let her chin fall to her chest, sighing very softly. She glanced over at the Angels' leader, lips pursed and a certain disbelieving sadness glazing over the chocolate-brown of irises. "...I'm sorry for you, Brenda."

The statement made Chris' head lift up, blinking at her. There was a curiosity about his gaze, an almost awed interest in the way he perked up and held his silence.

"Why?" the woman retorted, but with a jut of her hip, she continued before Rochelle could even make to respond. "Hardly the point. What were you planning on doing here, then? Curling up and crying on the beach? What about your 'families'?"

The sarcastic condescension in that last word didn't go unnoticed.

"Sounds good to me." Nick injected sardonically, eyes rolling upward as he thumbed bullets into the cartridge for his Magnum. Ignoring him, Coach crossed his arms on the weighty bulge of his gut, giving a deep exhale from the very depths of his lungs.

"We're going to the shore to try and signal the gov'ment." he stated with a deep simplicity.

Brenda's head reared up like she'd been struck.

The motion was mirrored in how suddenly Chris lost his grip on the ammo in his arms. The boxes split on the tile as they fell, bullets scattering in all directions with a loud clatter.

Brenda didn't even wait for the sound to subside before she started yelling, expression warped in utter rage as her hands curled into fists. There was something like betrayal written into her features. Something cold in the deeper parts of her gaze. "Government?! Are you fucking suicidal? You're here to call in the government?!"

Unsettled, Coach lowered his chin, examining the two Angels slowly. "Course we are."

Nick turned on a heel, slowly slipping the cartridge back into his Magnum. He pocketed the ammo box, an uneasy deadpan freezing his expression in place. His fingers twitched to grasp the Magnum but he held back, gaze narrowing.

Although a slight paleness had reached his expression, Chris twisted around to lift hands and gesture with open palms at her, slowly. A mutter of "Uy, mi dios.." escaped him, right before he raised his voice. "B, hermana, calm down."

"No!" she snarled, facing him with a violent cut of a hand through the air. He took a half-step back, eyes narrowing as he lifted a hand to wipe over his mouth almost nervously. " Shut the fuck up, Christophe!"

"Brenda, he's right, calm down." Rochelle urged quickly, fumbling to get her arm through the strap of her rifle and shrug it on. "I know - CEDA .. they didn't do much right. But we need to get safe. It's gotta be better than being out here."

The woman backed up a step. Something feral was burying into her voice, shoulders arching with the threatened posture of a cat. "CEDA?" Jerking a fist up in the air and giving it a violent shake, her voice rose a pitch - edged with an awkward, straining laugh that lit up her eyes. "You think CEDA's safe. CEDA is dead, you fucking idiots!"

"Dead?" Rochelle echoed, brows crunching together. "What -"

In a swift motion, Nick stepped to her side, landing a hand on her shoulder to quiet her. She gave him a slightly panicked glance that he didn't meet, green eyes lazered onto Brenda's face. Her previous cold composure was unsettling enough - but her newly exposed, trembling mania made his heart rate raise.

"B.." Chris tried again, stepping toward her with a careful shake of his head. His pale nervousness had turned into an almost anxious intensity, voice calm and reasonable, but shaky. "They must not know.. just calm down, we can talk with them."

"Know what?" escaped Nick in a hiss, gazing between the two. His footsteps were slow and cautious as he drew to stand in front of Rochelle and Coach, sliding a glance toward them. They were as bewildered as he was, though he merely disguised it better.

Brenda reached out to grab the front of Chris' bloodied wifebeater so hard he stumbled, short stature losing him leverage. He grabbed her wrist out of reflex, but - despite the tension in his shoulders - failed to shove her off. "They." she spat, word by word, just a centimeter from his face, ignoring Nick entirely. "Will. Leave."

Shoving Chris away, Brenda gripped a hand onto her hip and leaned forward slightly, her body cocked as she stared Coach down solidly. "You're going to go away. You're going to leave quietly, right now, and go far away."

As the Spaniard caught his balance, he shot a glance sideways, meeting Rochelle's gaze. She frowned, trying to silently beg him for an explanation, uneasiness written into every inch of her face.

He held her gaze, stilling, for a full breath before breaking it forcefully, turning entirely away from her and toward Brenda. He gave a frustrated, urgent sigh and outthrust his hands, breaking into a flurry of Spanish as his discomfort peaked. "Brenda, cálmate, por favor. ¡Estás reaccionando exageradamente! No tienen malas intenciones - necesitamos - "

"This is some kind of misunderstanding." Rochelle interrupted his building fervor, clamping a hand onto her cheek in frustration. The Spaniard seemed to realize what he'd been doing only belatedly, giving a strange shake of his head, paling. "We're just trying to get rescued, Brenda… Isn't getting word to the government, or somebody, our best -"
"No." she snapped back, glaring at Rochelle fiercely. A lift to her chin had her short hair falling back from her face, baring all of the scowl that enveloped her expression. "You're trying to kill us all. And you'll leave, right now."

With a clutch of her fingers in frustration, Rochelle shot a glance at Coach and Nick, panic worsening on her features.

"We ain't leavin'." Coach affirmed, gaze steady on Brenda's face. "Y'all can just move on if you don't wanna get rescued with us. This is all we got, Brenda. Taken too much blood an' sweat gettin' here."

"You are not -" she hissed, furiously, advancing a step toward the counter that separated her and the big man. Her voice trembled with barely-restrained anger. "- calling the military on us. I will not fucking let you."

"Then what'll you do?" Nick shot back suddenly, voice raised with a lash of hostility. Brenda's gaze flicked to him so fast her pupils dilated, examining him for a silent moment. Something cold entered her eyes, and it was a beat of time before a small quirk downward snuck at the edge of her lips.

Moving slow, the woman reached up a hand. "I'll call Jerry." she stated simply, voice trembling with barely-restrained anger. "And he'll bring your little kid here so you all can be on your way to the shore. We'll head out before you can get word to the army. Time to move on, anyway."

Nick felt his chest twist slightly, frustration rattling his nerves at the reminder that Jerry had Ellis. He held his expression stonily, jaw setting quietly.

"We're going to leave, B?" Chris questioned, suddenly relaxing his shoulders and lifting brows as he examined the woman. There was something surprised in his voice, almost disbelieving. "Let them have Tybee?"

Her head nodded with a slow confirmation, turning to face the store's door. "Nothing else to do." Pulling her rifle off her shoulders, she aimed it out the window, blindly.

A smile broke over Chris' face, setting a hand flat over the bandage on his cheek as if to soothe himself. He turned his head, sparing an almost tiny glance over the three survivors behind them. "...I'm sorry, amigos. You may not find what you are looking for, but... podéis intentar. You can try, ¿si?"

Nick crossed his arms over his chest, staring at Brenda's back. His brain struggled to comprehend the sudden shift. There was no way she'd changed her mind in a split second - there had to be something going on.

Coach gave a nod, letting his hand lift from the counter. His face visibly relaxed, "Thanks, boy. Sorry y'all don't want to come with us."

Chris gave a slightly nervous chuckle and shook his head, running a hand down the flat shape of his stomach under the blood-clotted fabric of his shirt. "We will be fine." Beside him, Brenda let off one shot into the air, the sound cracking as it echoed.

She paused, silent, for a moment - then shot off twice in quick succession, the gunshots reverberating against each other with enough force to carry quite a ways, but not quite enough persistence to start attracting a horde to their exact location.

Something doesn't add up. He felt it, that tingling sensation that trickled up his spine as he was hunted out someone's poker tell. A pattern, a hidden tic, something.. his mind had registered it but he had yet to notice.. Something's wrong - what's wrong...

"You guys were starting to scare me, heh.." Rochelle hesitantly injected in Brenda's pause, her head shaking as she said it, wiping at her forehead. "Guess we're all just on edge..

Come ON, Nicol-

"Lo siento, Roch-"

Brenda had reached the second shot of her last round of gunfire when it must have hit both of them. Nick went stiff, feeling the strike of realization driven hard like a stake into his chest when Chris reacted with him.

The signal had been three, two, one.

Brenda was shooting one, two, three.

Chris turned around on a dime, eyes shooting wide as a shout left him with such panic he glued all the words together on his tongue, coming out in this roiling mess. "NO, B! ¡BASTA! ¡PARATE!"

His pleas were punctuated by the third gunshot that finished the signal, and there was an instant of silence but for the small tinkle of Brenda's bullet shell hitting the tile and Chris' gasped last syllable.

The woman glanced over her shoulder, smiling with a certain serene condescension. She shifted to get up to her feet, tossing her rifle onto her shoulder with a deep, fluttered sigh. "Signaled Jerry. Like I said."

Voice trembling, Rochelle straightened up, her eyes going wide. "Signaled him to do… what?" she forced out, visibly cringing when Chris spoke up dully.

There was a shocked kind of stillness about his expression, gaze still locked on Brenda, explaining with a slow matter-of-factness. "Three shots and down is danger from the zombies. The other way.." He hitched up for just an instant there, fingers going into fists. "..is danger from people."

Brenda smirked calmly, just getting out the sweetened words, "Jerry'll have your precious fourth member in pieces within a few minutes. Nice bite-size pieces." when Nick lost it.

All sense of cool, of calculation - it went right out the window in a blinding kind of rage that left only enough room for one single thought to reverberate in all the space of his mind:

He was going to kill her.

Nick didn't go for his gun. He was going to kill her with his bare hands, and then he was going to do the same to the other two. "WHAT THE FUCK DID YOU JUST DO?" He broke into the kind of adrenaline-drowned, blind sprint that numbed even the awareness of his own limbs.

He didn't notice the swift motion of her other hand, didn't hear the shocked shriek from Rochelle's mouth that might have warned him. He only realized it after it had happened - Brenda swept her katana out of the crude holster at her hip and had it up and pointed at him in a clumsy second, both hands clamping onto the long grip.
The blade sheathed itself in his shoulder by virtue of his own momentum. There was an almost audible grating sound as it passed by bone. Nick felt the slide of the metal slicing straight through his shoulder with a disconnected kind of sensation at first - and then his body seized up as he recognized the pain.

"F-fuck -" escaped barely-parted lips, freezing mid-step, his body twisted just a little as the sword's pressure pushed it back. The tip of the blade, gleaming with the steel of its construction and his blood, had impaled through his shoulder with a few agonizing inches protruding behind him.

"Nick!" Coach shouted, weight shifting as if to rush in - then freezing, seeming to realize that lunging forward might only make things worse. His gaze locked, wide and infuriated, on Brenda. "Lord Almighty, what in the name of - what've you done, girl!"

Brenda smirked straight into Nick's face, his gaze latched onto hers as he stood stock-still against the waves of cringing pain radiating out from his shoulder. Blood seeped in a dull circle into the cloth around the pierce.

"Nothing. I figure I'll let Jerry kill all of you. He'd whine if I took all his fun."

Vaguely aware of the horrified utterances spilling from Rochelle like whimpers, Nick cracked the tiniest of snarls, body frozen between moving forward and moving backward. She held the sword steady - but there was something in her eyes, her smirk, that made Nick convinced she'd jam it down to cut through to his chest if he incited her to.

She waited just a moment, just long enough to confirm the victory… and then Brenda yanked the katana back with a firm grip, sliding it out of his shoulder with a speckle of blood. He let out a hiss of pain, his body shuddering as he grabbed at the wound.

Nick barely kept his footing, hunching protectively forward as he clamped his hand tighter on the bleeding hole in his shoulder. Rochelle's arms swept around him from behind, dragging him back with a near-whine, and he relented.

They slipped to the bullet- and glass-dusted floor in an awkward mess, the woman quickly pulling him to lean back against her chest. She clamped her hand on the other end of the wound, fingers splayed behind his shoulderblade, to staunch the bleeding.

"Are you okay?" she whispered furiously, tightening her fingers as blood trickled between her knuckles.

All Nick got out past his gritted teeth, spine twitching as the pressure of their hands worsened the fire burning through his shoulder, was "Overalls." She gazed at his face for an instant.

Was there fear on his expression that she saw? Nick didn't care to know.

Coach thudded to his knees beside them, one arm wrapping around Rochelle's back and the other gripping Nick's bicep. He held a fierce silence, flickering a glance between their faces before looking up toward Brenda.

She didn't so much as return it. "Chris, get a gun on them." she ordered solidly, examining her freshly bloodied katana and slowly wiping it off on her thigh. "Jerry'll be here real soon."

The Spaniard slowly moved, turning to face the survivors. Bright brown eyes were widened, all the color gone from his face as he pulled his machine gun from his back and got it in his hands.

Tears threatened to mist at Rochelle's eyes, breaking under the weight of the threat to Ellis and the sight of Nick clutching his bleeding shoulder… and now Chris, directing the nozzle of his machine gun in her direction.

She opened her mouth, starting to force something out -

But Chris uttered, "... lo siento." with a voice that fractured in his throat, and she fell silent, so trapped between pleading and cursing that all that escaped her was an incoherent noise of distress.
Chapter 86

The distant opening of the hallway stairwell didn't stir him. The sound of footsteps down the hall didn't, either. The halt of them, just outside the hotel door, coupled with the vague rumble of a 'heh,' only just pricked at his consciousness.

When the door slammed open on its hinges from the ruthless kick of a bootheel, threshold shattering at the deadlock, that woke Ellis up.

A garbled shout escaped sleep-numb lips, kicking against the now-constraining drape of the blankets. The animal distress that clouded his brain had him scrambling toward the edge of the bed, aware of nothing but the need to get away -

- and then a thick hand grabbed his ankle through the blanket, and despite the protesting shout that escaped him, dragged him straight backwards over the mattress. His clawing freed him from the swaddling bedsheets right before he flipped off the edge of the bed.

His torso hit the ground with his head landing second, a collision that knocked him into a momentary haze of disbelief. Just as he'd gotten his hands against the floor to try and shove up, a weight pressed against his chest that shoved his bare torso back down with a thud.

Jerry rolled his wide ankle slowly, digging the toe of his boot deeper against Ellis' bared breastbone. "Mornin', pup." he thundered, pupils dilated wetly with an eager kind of inspection.

Ellis' eyes widened, grasping his hands at the fabric of Jerry's jeans. His fingers clawed into his calf, twisting and arching under the weight of his boot as it pushed him against the ground. "Ch-huh -!

"Figured this was gonna happen. Time's up, bud." the man snarled down at him, bending slightly forward. Ellis felt himself panicking as the compress of his boot and sizeable weight slowly crushed into his sternum.

"Whut're -" the Georgian gasped with what air he managed to suck in. Tugging and pulling at the fabric he grasped between his fingers, he shoved at the man's weight with little effect. Jerry was simply too heavy. "- you doin' -"

He had to get free. Terror plunged his body into spasmodic movements, punching and battering at Jerry's leg, though he could get little leverage. The blows were ineffective - all the man did was shift his weight, the heel of his boot nudging to a bruising angle.

"Don't know what happened, don't much care." Jerry uttered, examining the struggling youth under his boot with a sickly pleased grin beneath his beard. "Your buddies are dead or waitin' to die, 'n' I'll be takin' care of you."

The words suddenly numbed Ellis' brain. His arms still struggled, a subconscious part of his brain focused on nothing but self-preservation, but his mind flatlined. The shock traveled through his body on the waves of pain from his shuddering torso.

"N-No -" ghosted out of his lips, face red with forcibly held breath and vision blurring from lack of oxygen. "That - ain't -"

They didn't die.
They couldn't die.

To say that they were dead was like saying the world had flipped on its end and the sun had blinked out.

It was simple: Ellis didn't believe it.

"I knew y'all wouldn't last. Been dealing with pussies like you a long time. Ain't nothin' new. If it weren't for that fuckin' spic, we'd'a killed you right off. Saved some time... just like with that fucker, Phil."

Jerry slowly, deliberately eased down into a crouch where he stood, sliding his other leg into a kneel so he could lean more into the foot balanced on Ellis' chest. The weight of his pressing boot reached such a point that Ellis could only release a noise of utter agony, a crackling, airless sound that had no substance.

"Now, I just gotta figure out how I wanna handle you." Jerry growled down at him, something ferociously unnatural about the excited huff of his tone as he uttered the words. "Real slow, I reckon.. make you cry fer mama. This'll be good."

The man reached down, spreading thick fingers to grip into the curls of Ellis' hair and twisting his head to one side. The pain of the pull on his hair and the sharp twist up of his neck were irrelevant next to the compression of his chest and the fear stoked by the words.

"Don't you worry, boy." Jerry let his other hand grab onto Ellis' jaw, thumb digging into the soft skin beneath his jawline. "After we get done, I'll cut somethin' off and take it back, so your friends can say bye."

That spark of familiar intuition flared up in the back of Ellis' mind:

The cleaver.

His hands moved before his mind fully worked out the consequences. Jerry's choice to crouch dropped his hips into arms reach - but more importantly, his belt. Tucked underneath it was the cold shape of his cleaver, and with a fierce grit of his teeth Ellis grabbed for its hilt and tore it free from the leather.

Jerry let out a "Fu-" right before Ellis sunk the knife into his thigh.

Tearing straight through his jeans, the sharp blade buried several inches in the muscle and flesh underneath. Blood spluttered from the wound as an animalistic roar escaped the man, and Ellis felt a crippling inhale of air seize into his body when Jerry's weight rolled off him - just enough.

Ellis felt his fingers slip from the cleaver's handle as the realization that he'd just stabbed another person sunk in, but he tried to grab for it again, forcing his oxygen-starved brain to focus. Before he could, Jerry released his hair and jaw in favor of applying a fierce strike across his jaw with rough knuckles.

Head jolting with the strike, Ellis gave a soft growl of his own as stars blinked over his eyes. The pain startled him into movement, blindly scrambling the moment he got his bearings. The mechanic shoved his body out from under his assailant's boot, grabbing a hand onto the edge of the bed to try and get to his feet.

"Fuck, fuck, fuck!" the Angel bellowed, voice throaty and raw with pain. He slid onto his knee and wrapped hands around the blade jutting from his leg, like he could stifle the bloodflow.
As he stood, Ellis' body almost collapsed when he tried to suck in a breath. Agony sparked over his chest. It was a bone-deep kind of pain, like his ribs had crumpled in on themselves. His sternum ached, and he placed a hand over it - he could still feel the crushing sensation of the tread on Jerry's boot.

Jerry, focused on tearing the knife from his thigh with a snarl, ignored him at first. Blood colored his jeans in a burst of red, the clench of his muscle worsening the spill. The blade had likely plunged straight into an artery. He shoved a hand onto the wound as he straightened up, whipping glowering eyes toward Ellis.

"Li'l bitch!" he bellowed. "You'll regret that, if I gotta cut a sorry outta yer mouth!"

Adrenaline drove Ellis more than strength, stumbling on his feet, and he shoved himself into an awkward gait toward the busted-open door.

"Get back here!" howled from over Ellis' shoulder, deep voice vibrating with threat, hunger, and something ecstatically thrilled. He could hear Jerry thundering after him, but he just focused on moving, limbs numb and abused chest heaving.

Scrambling out the doorway into the hall, lightened by his lack of clothing, Ellis didn't risk looking back, and didn't risk thinking about what was behind him. If he could just make it to the stairwell... he could slam the door shut, buy himself enough time to get downstairs... his gun was in the lobby...

The sound of a cocking shotgun halted him.

He froze mid-step, boxer-shod, muscled body trembling. He was posed like a statue, limbs bent in an echo of pure panic and motion. His eyes widened with the crystalline awareness of the gun being aimed at him, a heat and a pressure pooling into the flesh of his back where it aimed.

"Gonna scream?" Jerry drawled, almost lustful greed turning his words to a greasy kind of sensation that crawled along Ellis' skin.

Ellis turned his head, incrementally - enough to watch as the husky Angel tipped the shotgun until it aimed at his legs. The man meant to take them out from under him, cripple him with a blast to the calves.

There wasn't even enough time to come to terms with the idea that he was going to be shot before it happened. All there was time for was to stiffen for it, prepare for the physical shock, when the sound cracked out.

It exploded in the echoing hallway, so loud Ellis' eardrums shuddered in his skull and the air seemed to jolt. The instant the noise reached him, though, something went wrong - it turned into a metal-rending noise. It sounded more like the detonation of a bomb than a gunshot, and Jerry screamed.

It was more denial than pain, more rage than agony, but Ellis whipped around in the wake of it regardless. Eyes widening in disbelief, he stared in shock as Jerry staggered backwards, shotgun falling to the ground as he raised hands to clutch at his face.

The gun tumbled to the hallway carpet, its barrel exploded along the top edge. The metal curled in on itself, blown to pieces around the barrel. Blackened and ruined, the gun was a dark companion to the blood that spilled down over Jerry's fingers.

Shrapnel from the explosion had pierced his face in a wide swathe, the damage hard to discern with... his hands cradling it as he roared senseless curses and snarls. The skin between his fingers was pink where it wasn't red with blood, as though he'd been scalded.

He stumbled back two more steps, and then - like a tree felled by the blade of a chainsaw - toppled backwards.

Jerry landed with an audible thud on his back, body spasming as ever more blood spilled down his face - and from his neck, too, where a particularly large scrap of metal had pierced it. The snarls started to turn into strange chugging noises, and as Jerry failed to get back up, Ellis' tension dissipated.

He almost crumpled in on himself instead.

The thudding torment of his abused and crushed chest, the stinging pain of his jaw - neither seemed to overtake the awareness that he was watching a man struggle with creeping death.

Tenderly, slowly, Ellis pushed himself to approach, feet padding on the carpet. "H-Hey.." he barely whispered. The little part of him that had adopted Nick's voice shouted and battered at his consciousness, demanding he remember what Jerry had just been doing.

Pity drowned it out.

"H-heb - man, are.. yuh .." His voice was tiny, winded, from hesitance and the damage done to his chest, carefully edging closer as his eyes took in the blood slowly pooling around Jerry's shoulders.

What was going to be something like 'okay' turned into a broken yelp of fear when the husky Southerner jolted suddenly off the carpet, moving like a man possessed, blood and bile spilling from a broken face.

Ellis panicked backwards, stumbling on his own feet, as Jerry roared incoherently and just barely got to his knees. His dark red hands reached for Ellis in rage - and then he fell forward onto his face, thud edged with the squish of ruined flesh crashing into the carpet.

He twitched, in waves. Red pooled on the carpet around his head.

Heart beating so hard in his chest it actually hurt, stinging ribs making him curl in on himself, Ellis didn't let himself linger. The death-wrung visage of Jerry's bloodied features boreed into his brain with such vibrancy that he couldn't get himself to look at his body for a second longer.

There wasn't any time. The others were in danger, and nothing - not even guilt - usurped that fact's position at the forefront of his mind.

Uttering a soft, "'M sorry -", Ellis bolted back into the hotel room. Staggeringly un-steady on his feet, the kid passed through the still-open closet doorway, numb as he scrambled to find his clothing.

Putting it on was like shoving ice-frozen limbs into a jacket, and he found himself cramming his limbs into the wrong folds of fabric over and over. It frustrated him into furious sounds, muttering "Shit. C'mon!" as if he could chide his own hands into functioning.

Motion was painful, his chest in no way recovered, and something about the way a certain part of his side hurt made him worry Jerry's weight had fractured one of his ribs.

Clumsily tying his overalls around his waist, Ellis snatched his hat from the nightstand. Shoving it onto his head, he tucked the bill down over his eyes and steadied himself. It took a few slow, painful breaths to reclaim his calm enough to retrace his steps.

He had to find his team and he had to find them fast; nothing could happen to them. Not his friends.

Not Coach.

Not Rochelle.

Not Nick.

He slid into the doorway of the hotel room, gaze alighting on Jerry's still body. The man was still laying face-first in a growing puddle of sticky crimson blood. Ellis' confidence trembled at the sight. He knew the man's death hadn't been at his hands, but...

"... I'm real sorry, Lord." he murmured softly, a wave of shivers making him shake his head. "Forgive him, if yuh can."

An oily sensation lingered on him. The fear of - and confrontation with - death sat heavy in his winded chest, cruelly real. For all the times he'd seen infected die, hacking and spitting on their own blood..

It didn't match up to this.
Fear kept Ellis' feet moving, even when the pain in his torso should have had him unable to move. His gaze darted around the street as he moved along the sidewalk in the bloody wake of what was clearly the missing five's passage. He kept his shotgun held tight in his hands, stock pressed into his shoulder.

Infected hadn't quite yet re-taken the street, leaving it eerily quiet as Ellis hurried along it, dodging corpses. He could hear the vague noises of their presence around him, separated by houses and streets but moving closer. The noise reverberated and grew louder on the dull air as his adrenaline-heightened senses had him perked and hyper-aware.

Only increasing his anxiety was the soft, far-away noise of an occasional sob. Ellis instantly recognized it as the despondent cry of a Witch - and he stiffened his bruised jaw, determined to avoid it. The creatures were slow when they hadn't been disturbed, so surely he could just skirt around them and keep his distance.

They couldn't have gone far, of that much he was certain. Not with the group splitting up. They'd have stuck fairly close, and if he followed the signs of combat, he could follow in their tracks. The urge to start yelling out their names stung at his throat, but he resisted it, moving with a tender delicacy. His body ached with every step.

"'M so stupid..." he mumbled to himself, stepping around and over the corpses of downed zombies. He kept as alert as he could, heart pounding in his sore ribcage, aware of the dangers of moving alone. Smokers, Jockeys, Hunters… any number of zombies could effortlessly undo him now that he was isolated.

"So, so stupid."

He shouldn't have slept in. In retrospect, he almost couldn't forgive himself the decision; he'd just been so exhausted, and a part of him wanted to believe everything would be fine. He wished Nick had made him come anyway - hadn't given in to his complaints, had just dragged him out of bed by force.

Thinking about Nick made his chest clench.

Carefully ducking close to the building line, Ellis tried to scan the buildings ahead of him in search of any signs of a gun store, trying to ignore the whispers of crying voices that flickered in and out of his awareness. There must've been a few of them nearby - but he couldn't mind them.

They weren't his concern.

There was a deep sensation of anxiety in his gut, unsure - was he walking into danger? Had the Angels really turned against them? Maybe Jerry had simply gone rogue, and the rest of the group didn't even know.

His fingers tightened on his shotgun, wrestling with the sickening thought that he'd have to actually shoot at them. He'd been going for it when Jerry was chasing him, but would he have been able to really pull the trigger?

He saw the Angel's bloodied, burnt face every time he blinked.

Ellis had just enough time to register it when a strange noise echoed out from behind a building just beside him. It was like a garbled sentence, half-formed words, snarled and huffed. He started, immediately halting to face the sound with his shotgun lifted up, uncertainty widening his eyes.

A dark shape staggered out into the light, only a few yards' of distance between them.

It was the same shape they'd seen in the forest before Tybee. Warped into a lumbering hulk, almost all of its mass leached into the awkwardly heavy left side of its body. The twisted shape of its shoulder and blunted arm sagged its weight to one side. As its bloodied skull twisted to get a beady eye on Ellis, all that weight focused in on him with a clumsy aim.

The thing roared, a strangely human voice choking out inhuman noises, and in a flash it catapulted into a charge that shook the very earth its bloated feet thundered on.

Ellis flung himself to the side, attempting to jump out of the way. The moment his body made to curl, though, with arms stretching to catch himself on the sidewalk he dove for, a flash of pain exploded up his abused torso. What should've been a roll turned into a wild crash into the concrete.

He landed hard, feeling the Charger come exploding past him. The creature's shoulder, wrapped in concrete-like flesh, barely missed him. A yelp and whimper of pain escaped him all in a rush as he flopped into a half-curl around a heaving, aching torso. "Sh-shit-" he managed, eyes squeezing shut amidst a flush of moisture.

He had to breathe to try and calm himself, but breathing hurt. The kid struggled to try and get up, jamming his elbow against the sidewalk to roll upwards. Gasping at the pain, he gritted his teeth and fought through it, scrabbling onto hands-and-knees.

The infected monstrosity struck the building on the opposite side of the road with a tremendous crash, leaving a wide dent in the wooden material of the house's foundation. It violently staggered back, shaking itself as blood trickled from a few shallow scrapes at the impact, groggily regaining its bearings.

A chugged sound of anger, escaping it roughly, warned Ellis as the Charger turned around to focus on him again. He flicked a glance up, mind discerning suddenly that the building that he'd rolled himself in front of had a sliding glass door. It led into a living room.

Forging through the pain, Ellis shoved himself up to his feet and staggered the two steps it took to align himself with the glass. He twisted a glance quickly over his shoulder to eye the Charger.

His mouth was half-open to pant little shallow breaths, unable to take in any more air lest the expansion of his chest burn crippling pain down his side. Ellis challenged in a thickly pained tone of voice, "C'mere, yuh.. dumb.. zombie.. sonnuvabitch. I been dealin' with folks bigger than me all mornin'."

Reddened, almost withered eyes gave a dull spark of uncomprehending, pure rage. The words meant nothing to a mind ruined by the Flu, but a sick, innate desire for nothing but crushing him into the ground made the very sight of his movement and the sound of his voice infuriating.

The Charger roared fiercely as it kicked into a full charge, the entirety of its weight leaned into the blockish shape of its warped shoulder. Bolting at him with unerring intent, there was no stopping it.

Ellis flung himself out of the way again.

The weakness of his body slowed his reaction. He dodged the majority of the charge, but the strong, rock-hard elbow of the arm curled across the Charger's body struck his shoulder. The blow sent him into a violent spin. Ellis went down hard, slamming into the sidewalk with a shout of pain, losing his grip on his shotgun as it rattled away.

Crashing, breaking glass announced the zombie's collision with the glass. It couldn't stop even if it had the mind to, and as it ran itself straight into the thick glass, its roar seemed to raise a degree.

Wildly crashing and staggering, it thundered its weight as glass shards gashed and sliced into its flesh, hitting the weaker parts where its mass wasn't ballooned into an almost rocklike surface. Blood gushed out as it crashed into a table in the house's living room and went down, struggling in the dark of the building's interior.

Ellis shivered at the pain sparking up his side, slowly cringing a hand to cup where the worst of the pain emanated from. He forced his head to turn, craning back, and watched with some distance as the Charger bludgeoned itself straight into layers of broken glass across the floor.

The clumsy stagger of its own weight doomed it.

The thick glass did it in quickly and messily, its half-stunted and half-bulky body collapsing into the carpet as it twitched and roared in the spasms of a struggle. Unable to stand, it rolled and jerked uselessly, only worsening the injuries as it ground itself into the glass.

The Georgian weakly averted his gaze, letting his eyes close for just an instant as he huffed shallowly. A lightheaded sensation was starting to sink in, pain and stress and crippling loneliness making him shiver. It was a fierce kind of determination that made him set hands flat on the concrete.

Crawling the distance between him and his dropped shotgun, Ellis carefully tucked the weapon under his arm. Gritting his teeth, he crawled up to his feet, staggering as a soft wheeze left him at the effort.

"Man.. think I really hurt somethin'.." Forcing a tiny chuckle at the utterance, making himself crack the smallest of grins, the kid urged himself to start down the road again, leaving the struggling Charger behind. It was dying with excruciating slowness, but it also wasn't going to get up again.

"Nick, yer gonna.. be so mad. Heh." He was only just whispering, ribs hurting too much to talk any louder, even if there had been anyone to listen. "Probably whack me a good one fer gettin' in trouble .. agh.. again... don't think I'd blame you none, I reckon.."

Ellis didn't know why he'd started talking to air… but suddenly he couldn't stop, moving tenderly down the road with his shotgun held clumsily in his hands. He was a wreck and it occurred to him he had no idea how he was supposed to save anyone, let alone fight the remaining Angels, as injured as he was.

"Fact is.. I got'uh right to be mad, too.. you said we'd be okay.. well shit, Nick.. y'all ain't safe.. Ro' and Coach and you - you might be hurt, and Jerry's -" Footsteps wavering, gait weakening, Ellis' voice slowed, emotion and guilt drifting into it with the slow force of a rising tide. "Shit. Yuh promised me you wouldn't get hurt, either.. damnit, Nick. You better keep that one or - I'm - I'll .."

His voice quivered suddenly, eyes lowering, something more than pain bringing a slow moisture to his eyes.

He didn't want to cry.

"I'm'uh be so mad.. damnit, Nick."
Shoving a wrist against his eyes abruptly, so fiercely his whole body stuttered one step to the side, Ellis blinked the tingle of tears away. Setting his jaw against pain and emotion, he surged forward, falling silent as he tucked himself closer to the line of buildings, walking for a moment in silence.

The only indication he was going in the right direction was the remnants of battle, zombies littering the streets. Bullet wounds pegged through their chest or tore through parts of their faces, and they were recent enough to stir Ellis to move faster.

The faintest sound of another Witch struck his ear, but over that - something else. Scuffling, scraping. It was too far to discern clearly, but it was enough for him to assume he'd found them. Or an infected.

Either answer made him clench his hands on his shotgun.

The building in the next block must've been the gun store. There was no visible sign to identify it, but there was a light on inside and it was the only lit building he could see down the darkly treed, salty-aired street.

Lightening his weakly padding footsteps, the Georgian carefully moved along the face of the building at his shoulder. He strained to listen, hoping to hear the voices of his friends, any of them, but all he could hear was silence.

Silence, and the soft scuff and crush of footsteps against tile and.. something crackling, tinkling. Like glass.

Frowning with a heavy wince, Ellis eased himself closer, slipping across the alleyway between the two buildings. Sidling up next to the few feet of wall before it opened up into broken windows, he flattened himself against the gun store's front corner as best he could.

Tenderly, slowly, Ellis crept toward the edge of the window. He didn't let himself slip too close, afraid to let any part of him peek around the corner for fear of being spotted. Hovering there, he held his breath, struggling to listen.

It sounded like the slow rhythm of someone pacing, boots grinding against tile and glass, and the silence around it was deafening. For all the world Ellis swore there was only one person in the building.

For a moment, he doubted that there wasn't.

Quietly glancing up toward the sky, Ellis let his eyes slip closed and mouthed a soft and airless, "Little bit more luck." before reopening them and painfully twisting to peek one eye around the edge of the window.

The broken outline of where the glass pane had been laid a jagged frame for the sight inside. Brenda paced with a nervous air, twisting her katana in her hand in slow, easy circles. She was facing away from Ellis, but in mere instants would likely turn back around.

Chris stood just a few feet from the window, his assault rifle in his hands and aimed. Coach's backpack dangled from his shoulder, loosely, like some war trophy. He stood with a stiff kind of silence, immobile, gazing down toward the far left wall where his assault rifle pointed.

Ellis didn't quite understand at first, until he lifted just a little onto his toes and saw them.

All of them - Rochelle, Coach, Nick - seated on the floor, leaned against the wall. Rochelle and Coach sat with Nick reclined low between them, head on Rochelle's chest and eyes tightly closed.
The man's jacket was off and his dress shirt half-unbuttoned to bare the swell of his shoulder.

Blood stained down his chest and into the fabric of his blue shirt, and Ellis' widening eyes took in what was clearly a wound to his shoulder. They'd stuffed Nick's suit jacket against the injury, and the white fabric was blotted with blood where it had soaked through.

Their expressions were grim - tears stained Rochelle's face, uselessly streaked down her cheeks where she hadn't even bothered to wipe them away in favor of gripping hands tightly onto Nick's jacket-made-bandage. She cradled him protectively, tightly, mouth buried into his slicked-back hair.

Coach was stonily distant, staring at a point across the room like if he just stared long enough a hole would start to burn in the wall that they could escape through. Misery lined the crunch of his brows, something Ellis had only seen the like of as he'd recounted the story of his lost football team.

Nick -

Ellis ducked out of sight just as his mind took in the whole image, dropping his chin carefully. There was not a single speck of emotion on Nick's face - not a crease of pain, not a twitch of anger. It was like a blank slate of pure nothing, and it gave Ellis chills of worry and fear all at once, strangled up.

He had to think. He had to think fast and get them out. Every inch of him wanted to just scream out that he was alright and demand Chris and Brenda let them go - wanted to rush in and reason with them.

They were people. They'd listen.

... but he could still feel the ruthless press of Jerry's boot crushing his ribcage under his weight, and the image of Christophe directing a gun at them was still imprinted on his sight. It wasn't worth the risk, as much as thinking that they'd try to kill him scared him.

He had to accept that they would.

Ellis was always coming up with a plan. He'd grown up with Keith - the master of schemes, the quickest, wildest, and craziest thinker in the entirety of the world. He'd watched Keith turn everyday moments into life-threatening adventures time after time, pulling excitement out of nothing.

A person didn't watch that and not catch on. He was quick, and he had a sense for crazy plans that worked. He'd just killed a Charger with a sliding glass door. He'd made a zombie-killing weapon out of fast-food grease traps. He'd killed a Tank with a gas station.

He could handle this.

He just had to...

to...

Just...

The frightening silence of his own mind played back to Ellis' tired consciousness over and over, like an empty record on repeat - just the vague rustle of the phonograph's needle grazing over the disc's surface.
Uncertainty charged up his spine along with the taste of bile up his throat, frozen there for an instant, fearfully realizing that he didn't know what to do. He didn't even know if he could do anything. He was hurt. He doubted he could even hold up to the blast of his own shotgun with how battered his body was. Ellis stood only on adrenaline, and there was no way he could even try to fight Brenda and Chris like he was.

As he inhaled, slowly, trying to calm his stomach and his mind, two things pierced through that fear and implanted themselves in his consciousness, spreading roots with lightning-fast speed -

The distant sound of a Witch keening gently... and the soft spark, the subtle hum, the gentle itch.. of an idea.
Chapter 88

You just had to let him stay. You just had to be so fucking stupid as to let him stay.

Nick had crawled in on himself, utterly detached from his body and expression, anger vibrating in the very essence of his mind. He was useless and injured, arm immobilized by Coach's firm grip on his bicep and body held tight against Rochelle's chest. There was nothing but frothing self-hatred building in his consciousness.

All you had to do was say no. You fucking knew better. You fucking knew something like this was going to happen. Couldn't even take the chance of getting caught, even when you fucking knew.

His teeth bit onto his tongue, trying to dull the pain of his speared shoulder. He kept his eyes closed, but he could hear the slow pacing of Brenda's boots against the glass-dusted floor, like the gradual rhythm of a metronome.

God fucking dammit. You left him alone. You fucking left him alone.

He should've been working on an escape plan, but there was a large part of him trapped in cloying distress. If Ellis was dead... if Jerry had managed to kill him - or maybe did something worse than kill him... if his sabotage hadn't saved him...

"Are you okay, Nick?" Rochelle's voice whispered in his ear, silencing his train of thought. He gritted his jaw, fighting with the urge to stay silent. Her cheek pressed against the top of his head, holding him close.

Voice taut with something between pain and anger, Nick forced out a dark, "What's it matter?"

He didn't know what he meant. Maybe it was because he was probably going to die - or maybe because Ellis probably already had. He honestly didn't care which it was, this apathy stirred deep in his chest.

Fuck, Ellis... Fuck, I'm...

He couldn't even think the word. What did an apology mean, anyway?

"It's all gone to shit.." he hissed, tone strangled with infuriated heartache. He hated himself for it, bile acrid on the back of his tongue as he tried to drown out the emotions.

She stared at him for a moment, a slow fright making her swallow. Something in his voice intimidated her into silence, and carefully, she lifted her gaze to examine Chris.

The Spaniard stood pale as a ghost, completely immobile as he pinned his rifle on the three. His gaze was focused somewhere below their feet, and it was unresponsive and distant. His expression was drawn into a tense stare. She couldn't tell if he was thinking, or just numbed into silence.

He hadn't said a single word in a long time.

"Chris," Rochelle tried, softly. Her eyes flickered subtly toward Brenda, her voice straining to carry to the man but not her. Chris' head just barely twitched in acknowledgement, gaze unmoving. "... Chris. I can see you don't want to do this."

She fell silent, hopefully, but he didn't react. He didn't say anything or even so much as flinch.
Frustration made her straighten up just a little, plea falling to a weaker tone. "You're a good guy.. we both know this isn't righ-"

"Will you shut the fuck up?" Brenda called toward her, halting her pacing suddenly. That snapped Chris' gaze up, abruptly scanning over Rochelle's face with a slow graze.

Rochelle kept her eyes on his, begging with the lock of their gazes, holding fast even as Brenda raised her voice. She didn't waste any effort focusing on the Angels' leader, pouring her attention into Chris' blanched face.

This certain haughty self-assurance bled into Brenda's tone, chastising. "You should be thanking us. We're saving you from a much messier death." Crossing her arms, the Angel leader slowly dropped her chin and gave a half-laugh, shaking her head. "Well, except your little prettyboy. I don't even want to know what Jerry did to him before -"

"Shut yo' mouth."

Coach's voice was cold with bitterness, that deep and rumbling bass that struck the air like a beaten drum. Anger curled the edges of his lips, furiously staring Brenda down.

A weird strike of humor crossed Nick's mind - sardonic and dark, and a little too truthful. Some of us are going to Hell. Not a chance, doll…

He let his eyes close again, a sigh expanding his chest and sending pain shooting through his shoulder.

"What are you thinkin'?

the big man suddenly demanded. Releasing Nick's arm, he pushed his weight to stand up, stiff on his bad knee. Brenda stiffened up and aimed at him with her rifle, but he didn't balk.

"Killin' yo' own kind. You been killin' zombies too long - head's twisted. We should'a worked together, girl. We should'a gotten saved together."

Brenda snorted, scoffingly, giving a fierce jerk up of her chin. "You're the one whose head is twisted, old man. You were going to kill us all. I can't let that happen... not even a chance. So you die."

"With what?!" Coach growled back, thrusting his hands to either side, brows scrunched in a grief-stricken pain. "Kill y'all wit' what?! You're the one holdin' us at gunpoint! You're the one who -"

He was primed to speak of Ellis, but his voice broke, eyes dulling to something miserable. All he could finish with was a muted, "Shit."

Brenda gazed at him, expression regaining that wild flicker. That cold, animal rage. She leaned forward, grasp shifting on her rifle. "Containment, they said." the woman hissed, finger tightening on the trigger slightly. "You didn't see their version of containment. The military killed so many people.. and you're fucking calling us crazy?!!"

Nick's head lifted just subtly, pushing against Rochelle's. Killed..?

He gazed fiercely across the room at Brenda, numbly blinking. It took effort, but he forced his voice into something composed, ignoring the dry taste of bile in his mouth. "...What the fuck are you talking about?"

Brenda gave a laugh, a cold, sharp laugh that scoffed at its edges. She flashed a smirk at him almost hysterically, struggling to keep her voice low. "You fucking heard me. I'm not letting you bring them here, not when we're surviving.. not while we're alive."
"No, you've got to be confused.." Rochelle argued, shifting to sit up slightly, ignorant of the way the shifting sent strikes of pain through Nick's shoulder. "There's no way. Maybe they were infected, and they had to protect the survivors."

"You're a fucking dumb bitch." Brenda snapped solidly, drawing her head back slightly and lowering her rifle as if unthreatened. "They don't care about protecting anyone. I saw them gun down a crowd of people, just because they thought they were Carriers. And you're running toward them. Bringing them to us!"

Carriers?

Gritting his jaw suddenly, Chris lifted his head. His paled expression was struggling with badly-contained distress, confused between anger and sadness. He twisted around, facing Brenda and thrusting out a hand. He spoke for the first time in a long time, voice roughened with conflicted emotion.

"Please, stop! B, we've already gone too far, we have to -"

"That's right." she spat, jabbing a finger in his direction, hazel eyes narrowing. "We've already gone too far. Too late, chico. The Angels already made a decision: they're dying. Are you an Angel of Death, or aren't you?"

Chris' voice raised, advancing a step toward her in plea. His tone moved into something argumentative, flinching toward anger. "Los Ángeles did not make a decision! You just told Jerry to kill the boy! ¡Él no hizo nada malo, por el amor de dios!"

Brenda examined him for an instant, jaw tightening. Suspicion entered her eyes, feral and cold, as he argued against her. "You were always a little dumb, Chris." she muttered softly, letting her jaw loosen. Hazel eyes lightened, and she moved to cross the gap between them.

Her movements were slow, catlike, body stiff with energy. She looked as if she might as easily hit him as talk to him. Leaning in close, turning her face a little to affix him with a low gaze through her lashes, she dropped her voice to a murmur.

"I'm tired of waiting for Jerry." Her gaze turned hot on his, making him stiffen slightly as he stared back at her. "Shoot them, Christophe. Right now. Or I'll cut your fucking arms off."

His lips moved in a useless gape, brows raising slowly as he struggled out words. Voice almost faint, he shook his head. "Mi hermana.. this is.. haven't we done enough, B? Let's just make them leave. No quiero hacer -"

Reaching out, Brenda gripped his chin between index and thumb, catching on the little trail of stubble lining his jaw. He didn't flinch, just held her gaze. "Baby, I don't care what you quiero."

She dropped her other hand sharply, grabbing ahold of his shirt to spin him around and direct him at the survivors. "I care what you do."

Bright brown eyes widened slightly as he froze in place, gazing over the three seated on the floor. Nick watched his eyes, saw the distress, saw the second-guessing. He knew a fold when he saw one - but was the guy strong enough to resist?

There was a chance...

just a slim chance...

Nick felt Rochelle's breath catch by his ear when Chris faintly shook his head, lowering his rifle... slightly and dropping his chin. The Spaniard was refusing. Something miserable flickered on his face for a moment, before he spoke - firmly. ".. No, B. I can't."

That momentary flash of hope disappeared when Brenda sighed. With a violent motion, she snatched Chris' assault rifle right out of his hands. He tried to fight it, yelping as he grabbed after the weapon, but a swift elbow to his face had him jolting back.

"G-guh- Brenda, what -!" he garbled, choking as he re-caught his balance, dizzied. He grabbed at his nose as blood trickled from a nostril where her elbow had smashed into it. Brenda snarled a disparaging breath at him, lifting the rifle.

"I have to do everything myself." She said it lazily, tired, like there were no more importance to the moment than doing overdue dishes or taking out the trash.

The woman took aim, finger slipping onto the trigger, and four shouts of denial rose up in such violent unison the air itself tremored. Nick jolted up, only to get crushed back down as Coach thrust himself over both him and Rochelle.

Every inch of the ex-football player's bulky frame shoved to shield them, and the flash of his expression that Nick got - it was peacefully calm, satisfied with that final action.

Nick had never seen the like.

"Don' move a single damn muscle!" broke into the moment with such Southern-drawled force, such unexpected demand, it froze everyone in place.

There were no words for the feeling that swept over Nick's mind - none that he'd volunteer - for the shudder of warmth that eased into his body from his scalp to his toes. The wash of feeling that overtook numb nerves. Gratitude, though he didn't know to whom.

Any pretense that it was for his own life was beyond him.

... Kid...

Green eyes darted to the window, widening in utter, frozen silence as they took in Ellis' wide-stanced form out in the street. He faced them with all the poise of a gunslinger, confidence spilling from every inch of his muscled frame.

Words escaped Nick with such breathless incoherence he only mouthed them - they were just for himself, a ghost phrase on his lips. You gorgeous fucking dumbshit redneck, you're alive...

In either hand, at shoulder height, Ellis held up an off-white paper sack, marked with the familiar lettering and shapes of sugar bags. He wielded them like grenades, the folded tops cracked open into funneled mouths and his fingers tightly clutching them.

A soft shriek escaped Rochelle, clamping her hands over her mouth as tears shocked out of her, running down her face in relief. Coach fell just an inch to the side, sliding to a knee on the ground, still holding the other two tightly as a wary but helplessly broad grin cracked over his face.

"Oh my God - Ellis!" she managed, shivering. "Ellis, you're okay!"

Brenda stood stock-still where she was, gripping the rifle tightly, gaze narrowing fiercely on Ellis. Her aim didn't waver from the group huddled on the ground, especially after noting that Ellis wasn't even wielding a weapon. "... Jerry didn't take care of you." she stated matter-of-factly, chewing on the idea for a moment.
Ellis shook his head, quietly, lowering his chin slightly so the bill of his cap shaded over his eyes but didn't totally obscure them. Regret broke into the layers of confidence, and with that small crack, Nick noticed the pain bleeding into blue eyes.

The kid was hurting. Badly.

"No.." he returned, maintaining a steady voice. "Somethin' went wrong with his gun. He..."
Brenda's eyes widened at his falter, genuine shock touching hazel irises. "'N' I'm real sorry fer that, but y'all best be puttin' down yer guns now. Ain't no one else gonna die."

A soft "Hostia…" escaped Chris' lips, gazing in disbelief at the Georgian. He stood with a limp kind of resignation, staring, seeming unsure how to respond to the news of Jerry's death. "No lo puedo creer…"

Brenda stared for a moment, body stiff - and then she laughed. She laughed as if she'd never heard anything funnier in her entire life, lowering her rifle slowly and lifting an arm to point at him. Her laughter was high and frantic, so close to a shriek, it was hard to tell the difference.

"Oh my God. You're even cuter than I thought.. I'm almost glad Jerry didn't kill you so I could see this." Flattening her fingers, she gestured at him, brows rising as a grin widened over her expression. "What are you going to do, sweetheart? What is it you even have there.. sugar?"

Ellis tipped his wrists. Spilling out from the bags came a slow wave of sugar, the white crystals pouring down to the ground at either side of him. "Yeah." he responded, giving a weak smile. "Never could resist muh sweet tooth."

Nick's eyes widened.

Sugar.

It struck him like a thrown punch, whole body going stiff. A small ".holy shit." escaped him, just a gust. He suddenly reached out, gripping Rochelle's arm hard. ".he's a fucking crazy genius."

She shot a look sideways at him, past the tears clouding her vision, panic twitching at her lower lip. "N-Nick, he's going to get himself shot, what are -"

"He's a fucking crazy dumbshit genius," the gambler insisted, staring. Coach glanced at him too, wordlessly confused, and for a moment there was silence as Brenda gave another laugh, shaking her head. She swiped her wrist at her eyes as if to brush away tears.

Brenda crossed her arms, cocking her hip gently as she tapped the assault rifle against her shoulder. "I think he's lost his little mind." she uttered, arching a brow as she watched the sugar tumble down, building in piles on either side of him as his wrists kept turning slowly.

"Amigo, what are you doing?" Chris questioned weakly, raising up his hands in a bewildered gesture. "Are you okay?"

As Ellis' fingers pinched on the bags to tip them entirely over, the last shuffling few piles of sugar tumbling down to the concrete, he tossed them aside. "Y'all might wanna be skidaddlin' here in a second." he advised, glancing down the street.

Brenda laughed, shifting her arms to cross ever tighter. She leaned forward slightly, lowering her lids over her eyes. "And who says I shouldn't shoot you down where you stand, babyface? Hm? And then shoot your friends?"
Raising both his hands and blinking back at her, Ellis indelicately thumbed either direction along the street.

"Well, fer starters, them."

The soft rise of a gentle, mournful sob tickled into the air, broken with grief. Brenda's frame stiffened for an instant - but just as soon, she relaxed, rolling her eyes up. "You really are fucking stupid. I already showed you I can handle a Witch. You think that's going to scare me? I'll take care of it right after I take care of you."

"I didn't say it." Ellis murmured back with a chuckle. He gave a small smile that faltered a little after a second, gesturing again, a little more insistently. "I said them."

Brenda gave a frown, staring at him for an instant. With a small growl under her breath, she violently uncrossed her arms and stalked toward the window. Leaning her head out, she shot a glance down the street -

- and froze.

Nick couldn't help but grin, feeling it itch at his jaw, tighten at his neck - he grinned with the knowledge of what she must be seeing.

"Rain attracts Witches, does it?" he growled softly, raising up a hand to clutch onto his shoulder, palm gripping his jacket-made-bandage close to his wound. "There'll be a lot of them around, will there?"

Brenda snapped a small glance back at him, hazel eyes murderous, before she looked back through the window. "Jesus Christ." escaped her in a mutter, voice collapsing into disbelief, and a little horror.

There must've been three of them - no, a fourth stumbled out from an alleyway - just down the street. Staggering on withered legs, bony knees jutting out at awkward, shuddering angles, the Witches came in a slowly gathering wave.

Twisting her head sharply, she saw two more in the other direction - wandering, ambling, lamenting their way toward the gun store. Their hands were stretched out, wicked claws grasping at the air, needily. "Jesus Christ." she repeated.

Ellis gently tucked a hand into his pocket, slouching in a motion that was somehow relaxed, nursing his side. "They're kinda tender, y'know.. maybe you could kill one. Or kill us. But the gunfire'd upset the lot, wouldn't it?"

Rochelle sat up slightly, grasping at her shirt. Her brows were up, anxiety and creeping hope struggling on her face. "Is.. is he really..?"

"Yes." Coach grunted. There was a grin on his face - the kind of grin that swam with pride. Drowned in it. Shattered every wall on his gruff face to bare a look of such broiling, triumphant pride his shoulders trembled with it. "Yes, he is."

"B.." Chris uttered, eyes widened. He took a few perilous steps toward her, moving his hands into a soothing gesture. "B, I think it would be smart -"

"Shut up!" she snarled back at him, hissing, fingers shaking and her pupils flashing into near pinpricks as she panicked. He retreated a wary stride or two when her gun turned on him, threateningly. "Of course you fucking want to run, you fucking useless idiot!"
Dropping her chin with a violent motion, Brenda gritted her teeth violently. Grinding them against one another, she very slowly lifted a hand to rake fingers through her hair, clawing at her scalp. She fingered and stroked at the trigger of the assault rifle, raising it up, desperate to shoot, shaking with the urge to \textit{shoot} - and then dropping it an inch, terrified to.

Ellis stood with unblinking, hazy confidence, glancing occasionally at the approaching Witches without the slightest sign of anxiety.

There was a moment of tension that rose ever higher as the sobs grew. Louder and louder, reaching a mournful tone that vibrated through the air as they approached on both sides.

When Ellis pointed out almost helpfully, "I don't mean tuh rush y'all, but if yer gonna run, you might wanna go ahead'n get on that...", Brenda suddenly let out an almost shriek of rage. Shoving herself forward, she messily vaulted through the broken store window, landing with a clumsy balance on the sidewalk outside.

"Fuck you all!" she snarled, voice low, afraid of upsetting the advancing creatures. "Go ahead, kill yourselves! I hope the Witches tear you to pieces and the military bombs what's left!"

Brenda sprinted across the street, bolting for an alleyway to escape. It was the only time she'd ever looked truly afraid. Ellis watched her, a brow lifting slightly with an almost tired paw of his jawline, tender on the bruise Jerry had left behind.

Nick couldn't help but roll his head back, closing his eyes, resigning to the exhaustion that suddenly struck. A dry smirk quirked up the edge of his mouth, releasing a sigh of disbelief. "The dumbshit did it.." escaped him in a mutter, thick with humored awe.

Startling his head up was Rochelle's sudden shift and blurt of, "Chris -"

The Spaniard had dropped their backpack to the ground and started, silently, to run after Brenda. At his name he paused, mid-step, almost flinching. Reluctantly, he turned his head, glancing at her. There was something like shame on his face. Shame and regret, darkening the warm brown of his eyes.

She scrambled to get out from under Nick's weight, the conman giving a pained growl as he was shifted by the motion. Coach got an arm around his shoulders, and Nick scowled slightly as he was leaned against the ex-football player instead.

Rochelle couldn't even open her mouth to speak before Chris gave a slow smile, pained. It was apologetic. "Eres demasiado buena para ser verdad." When he added, "Lo siento.", it was with a glance over toward the two men still on the floor.

He darted just one step closer - just close enough to reach out and cup a hand onto Rochelle's cheek, and her eyes widened, stiffening under the touch. She tried to turn her face away at the same time she snatched out to try and grab his arm, to stop him...

But Christophe bolted, sprinting into a leap that vaulted him through the window. Landing with a skid, he stumbled slightly, then caught his balance to sprint across the street. Rochelle gave a useless step after him, quickly reeling herself back in to curl her hands into fists at her sides.

She watched him disappear into the alley Brenda had bolted through, and she could only stare for an instant before Ellis' limping through the doorway caught her attention.

"Are y'all okay..?" he pleaded in a soft tone, glancing immediately over them with a stutter of his gaze on Nick's bloody shoulder.
Rochelle's eyes alighted on his face, staring - and then she let out an cry of raw emotion, bolting across the glass-flecked tile. She thrust herself at him, wrapping arms around him tightly in a desperate hug, voice frantic with concern.

"Ellis! Ellis, sweetheart, Ellis, I - oh God, we thought you were - oh God, baby -" Her voice halted, then softened. "- .. a-are you okay?"

She only seemed to notice how he'd frozen then. Pain drenched every inch of his soft expression, body shuddering as he tried not to collapse, weakly wheedling out a faint, "R-Ro' -" through gritted teeth.

When she moved to let him go, afraid that she'd hurt him, he did collapse a little. The shudder of his body had him almost falling to a knee. "Ellis!" Quickly but tenderly re-gripping him by the biceps to hold him up, she gasped in worry.

"M .. okay.. Ro'.. just.. d-don't.. squeeze like that.." he mumbled in a dizzy kind of chuckle, eyes fluttering faintly, threatening to roll back. Vaguely, his gaze tried to skim up to gaze across the room, hunting out Nick's face.

Blue eyes met green.

"What happened, sweetheart?" Rochelle murmured, worriedly, reaching up one hand to touch onto his bruised jawline. "Was it zombies, or…?" Her thumb fretted over the dark shape on his skin. Ellis didn't even pay attention, eyes softening as he stared at Nick.

The conman let his lips quirk up in a small smirk, lifting his chin slightly to ensure the Georgian could see his mouth. 'Good job, kiddo.' he mouthed intently, holding that gaze ferociously.

He meant it.

A stupid, slow grin touched the kid's lips and a flood of miserable, pained tears flushed up over his eyes right before his whole body went ragdoll, collapsing as consciousness escaped him. Like Nick's pronouncement was the last thing he needed to hear before he could sleep.

Rochelle yelped in surprise, quickly catching him, although she struggled a little to hold him up. Shooting a helpless glance toward Coach, she uttered, "Uh.. help.. he's out like a light."

The big man glanced at Nick, and the conman gave him a stiff nod of acquiescence. Shoving away from the older man, Nick propped himself against the wall, holding his jacket tight to his wounded shoulder. A little grunt of pain escaped his lips.

"Go on, Sam, I'm a big boy." he uttered with a small smirk, dropping his chin to tiredly glance at his shoulder. The sight of his jacket so thoroughly blood-soaked, streaks of blood trailing down his chest and arm, made him sigh. "I can sit here and bleed all by myself."

Coach got up off the floor with a weary shove, quickly moving toward Rochelle. He scooped Ellis into his arms, taking him from Rochelle with a tenderness that seemed out of place from his bulky frame. The kid fit into his arms easily, folding up limply against his chest.

Coach let a hand hold his head up against his shoulder, glancing up toward the gun store windows.

The Witches had reached the sugar - it was strangely like watching a horde of puppies crawling for one food bowl. Gruesome claws and withered body swayed and bent to get to the sugar piled on the concrete, falling to bony knees as if in worship, sobs faltering as they feasted.
"We best get outta here, y'all..." Coach wearily urged. "Ellis did a real fine job gettin' us free, but them bitches ain't gonna be distracted by that sugar fo' too long. We gone too far to get caught by them now."

Rochelle gave a distracted nod, gently stroking the back of her hand down Ellis' cheek before circling around Coach to move away. She picked up the backpack Chris had relinquished back to them, and then slipped up to the gun store counter, gathering up the weapons they'd had taken away from them.

They bundled awkwardly on her shoulder as she slipped her arm into the shoulder straps attached to their frames, and Nick's newfound Magnum, she took in hand. Approaching him, she held down her free hand. "C'mon, suit." left her gently, tears dampening the corners of her eyes.

Nick lifted up his good hand, other arm limp from his impaled shoulder down, aching. "Easier.. said than.. done." he muttered. He clasped hands with her, groaning tightly as she circled her other arm behind his back and gently pulled him off the ground.

He was weak on his feet, nursing his bloodied shoulder, but as he wrapped his good arm over Rochelle's shoulders, he steadied. "There we go." she murmured to him, giving him a small smile as she placed the Magnum into his thigh holster for him.

As he let himself lean on her just a little, she pecked a kiss onto his cheek, making him blink.

The gambler cracked an almost disbelieving glance sideways at her, arching a brow - but despite himself, he decided against saying anything. The tears in her eyes were worsening, and he held his tongue.

The four slipped together, Nick and Rochelle hobbling carefully toward Coach. Rochelle's free arm lifted to slip her hand over Coach's bicep and cradle Ellis' cheek, moving close to Coach's side.

With no sense of personal space between them, bodies moving in a tired unison and leaning against each other in a cluster of protective need, they paused for just a moment. Just a beat.

In silence, pressed close, there was an instant of examination. They took stock - let it sink in that they were all together again, alive. Hurt, but safe. Scared - but safe. Something had long since settled between them, an unspoken but very real tie. Something familial, forged out of a bond as strong as blood.

They moved to slip outside of the gun store in one tight group.

The cluster of six Witches, burying greedy mouths into the sugar melting onto the sidewalk with the glue of their saliva, didn't even stir as they moved carefully past them. The sugar would run out, eventually, but for now...

They were utterly harmless.

Your kinda plan, wasn't it, kiddo? Nobody actually got hurt by it. crossed Nick's mind with a faint, almost wistful sarcasm.

Little dumbshit genius.
The splash of liquid onto his shoulder brought such fierce pain, Nick's body seized with a calculated stomp of his foot against the kitchen tile.

"Jesusfuckingtits!" he wheezed in pain, the hydrogen peroxide fizzing furiously as it leeched into the wound. Rochelle had found it in a bathroom cabinet at his behest, though at this point, he almost regretted that she had. His hand shuddered on the brown plastic bottle, jerking it away as he grated his teeth through the sensations.

They'd broken into a small house several streets over, distancing themselves from the Witches and where the Angels had fled toward. Coach was setting a weakened Ellis up in the one bedroom the house had, and Rochelle hovered in the kitchen doorway, watching Nick where he was seated in a kitchen chair.

He'd taken his shirt off, digging his back painfully against the back of the chair, little gasps leaving him as the liquid did its work.

"Nick," Rochelle urged, watching with struggling discomfort as the conman panted, growling, through the pain. "Isn't there something else we can do?"

Nick shifted his weight with a soft snarl, gaze half-lidded as he let his body slouch backwards, lips parted. "No." he asserted, setting the bottle between his thighs and grasping the rag draped over his knee. Craning his head, he daubed around the bloody gash in his shoulder, wiping the reddened foam drooling from the injury.

"Gotta.. clean it up. Goddamn.. dirty sword. Gonna get infected… Not going through that shit again."

His arm trembled with the effort it took not to stop, gaze slanted as he cleaned the wound off carefully. Blood leaked freshly from the gash behind his washcloth, and he could feel it trickling down his shoulderblade from the other side.

"Christ." Rochelle mumbled, rubbing over her face carefully with her palm. "She could have killed you."

Nick gave a sharp chuckle, falling to a snarl of pain as he pressed the rag down onto the wound. Gritting his teeth as he squeezed it into his flesh, he muttered, "I'm the one who rushed her like an idiot."

Rochelle gave a soft smile at that, shrugging her shoulders with a lowering gaze. "It's okay.. we all panicked." The phrasing made Nick pause. Green eyes flicked up toward her, narrowing, though his pained body was already so stiff it was hard to tell how much of it was pain and how much was annoyance. "Ell-"

"I didn't panic." he returned sharply, pulling the cloth away. His spine arched forward, both in discomfort and to crane his neck back and try to get a look at the back of his shoulder. Blood and foam bubbles leaked from the crevice made into his shoulder, trailing down his shoulderblade in a wide, smudging path.

He reached his arm back, hissing slightly as he wiped at it a little harshly. "I just.. didn't think."

The conman sighed slightly, the sound full of a graveled discomfort, examining the wound on his shoulder with a severe gaze. The heavy foam of the working hydrogen peroxide clung to the ragged corners of the gash, still sparking with a painful fizz here and there. "Don't even fucking know how bad this is. Felt like she hit bone."

Rochelle watched him for a moment, letting her arms slip crossed over her stomach. Her gaze flickered over the agony built darkly into his shaven face, a soundless sigh escaping her as the edge of her mouth twitched down.

Before his mind could wander toward Ellis, as he just felt it itching to do, Nick turned on his seat. Arching his spine slightly against the chair, he reached up tenderly with the hand of his hurt arm and carefully pinned fingers around the wound.

"Hey, Nick...?"

Maybe it was the experience they'd just shared, but something stirred in her. She'd seen the look on his face when he thought Ellis was dead... maybe now was the perfect opportunity to broach the subject. Talk to him about... them.

But was it her subject to broach? She didn't know how he'd react.

Nick only responded in a grunt. Putting a little pressure to force it open, gruesome shades of red and pink marking the through-and-through channel the katana had left behind, Nick gritted his teeth carefully before lifting the bottle up.

Steeling himself with a shallow breath, it took him a moment to gather the strength to pour. The liquid fizzled straight into the wound, the pain digging deep as it burned on raw muscle, droplets pattering rapidly to the tile underneath him.

Cringing a little bit as she watched the pain fluctuate over his face, growling silently as his heel kicked into the tile again, Rochelle lost her will to speak to him. She shook her head, instead. "Forget it.. I'm gonna see if there's any medical supplies here."

Nick lifted his head to demand she just finish her thought, but she was already backing up into the living room and turning away to disappear into the house. He snarled a little after her in useless anger, slouching in his seat.

"Fucking Christ, that hurts." he muttered to himself, sitting there for a moment as his shoulder hissed and popped in his ear. Taking in deep breaths, though the sour smell of hydrogen peroxide and blood reached his nose, he calmed himself.

Stretching gingerly to set the bottle on the floor and re-snatch up his rag instead, he forced his body to lift up. Shifting to his feet with a small wobble, he stepped across the tile toward the counter and let his hip rest against the edge.

Turning on the faucet with a finger, he pushed the rag underneath the stream, squeezing and wringing it out one-handed. Wincing subtly as the blood leeched down into the drain, he let it rest in his palm as it ballooned with water.

Leaning forward, the gambler let his shoulder hover over the sink as he lifted the rag to squeeze it against the wound, letting the water spill onto his skin. It hurt - though less than the peroxide did - and he closed his eyes tight as he carefully swabbed over the wound.

Tending to it with a fiercely set jaw, he washed the rag off again, listening to the hiss of the water against the sink. Letting his head slouch, he tossed it over his shoulder to clean the exit wound, aware the sigh that left him was edged with a growl.
Footsteps sounded behind him. Without opening his eyes, the gambler squeezed the rag against his skin to urge the water to dribble in cleansingly, placatingly cold waves. "Y'know, last time I had to do something like this, it was a gunshot straight to my leg... missed a debt payment." A half-laugh escaped him. "I had alcohol that time - real stuff, some whiskey if I remember right. Shit, it fucking burned.. healed up okay, though."

"... I'm gonna go 'head an' assume you ain't talkin' about ownin' to a bank." Coach commented somewhat judgmentally, a very audible disdain in his low voice.

Nick jolted with a startled "F-", shooting a look instantly at Coach as the big man stopped a good distance away from him, examining him from afar. His brow was arched high. "Jesus Christ, Coach. I - .. thought you were Ro'."

The big man crossed his arms easily, giving a low, rough chuckle. The judgement didn't fade. If anything, it heightened a little, though it seemed in good humor. "You talkin' to Rochelle 'bout that shit, boy?"

"More than I'd talk to you about it." the gambler muttered, refocusing forward as he glanced at his shoulder, wiping across his wound with the edge of the rag before dropping it into the sink and dousing his hands under the faucet.

Coach chuckled again, lowering his rounded chin. "Point." He shifted his weight, letting one hand scratch into his ribs gently. He approached, but only enough to lean against the table in the center of the kitchen. "How you doin'? Heard you cussin' up a storm. Shoulder hurts?"

Nick shook his head vaguely, not answering. He shook his hands off in the air, shutting off the tap and reaching up tenderly to wipe them a little drier on a hanging washtowel attached to a hook.

The big man eyed him for a moment, gaze seeming to soften as he held his silent for a weighty moment. The gambler turned around, slipping back to the chair to retake his seat, resting with a deep sigh.

There was a moment where Coach examined him, and Nick didn't so much as register his presence. Then, "You wanna talk, Nick?"

Lifting his head an inch, the conman humored him, meeting his gaze for a moment. He gave a heavy exhale, settling the elbow of his uninjured arm on his knee to slouch down, hand idly scratching on to the bare curl of his hair-dusted stomach.

"You threw yourself in front of us." Nick stated, the words holding all the substance of fog with the quiet way he uttered them.

Coach's eyes lightened a little at the statement, gazing over Nick as if studying him anew. He inhaled a gruff breath, releasing it with an almost snore-like sound escaping him as he rumbled. "You put yo'self in front of a gun for us before."

The thief at the gas station, Nick supposed.

The gambler reached down a hand to tenderly tug up his pantleg by the knee. He gave a little snarl, wordlessly, lowering his chin, focusing instead on glancing at his calf. It would take a long time to heal, but healing flesh had sealed over the surface in a way that comforted him. "Yeah, yeah.. I remember.." he muttered, almost trying to rescind the statement entirely.

Coach didn't quite let him go.
"We're family, Nick. Maybe the closest we got at this point." The Northerner uttered a grunt, shrugging his good shoulder. Coach chuckled a little, resting a hand on the table and leaning down. His other hand went to his hip, strangely paternally. "That scare you?"

"It doesn't scare me. Christ." Nick spoke flatly, shaking his head. "I just think it's stupid. We'd have died anyway, even if you hadn't been in the way. We were all going to die either way. When I put myself in danger back then, it was because I knew I could actually do something."

The big man exhaled slightly. He seemed to eye the gambler, stewing on something for a moment before speaking. "Ellis would have been dead whether or not you jumped Brenda an' got that shoulder messed up. Still did it."

Nick stiffened, gaze lazering suddenly onto a point on the floor. It was true, of course, but he didn't need anyone to recognize that fact. Growling lowly, he muttered, "Yeah, but I could've bashed her stupid bitch face in if she'd been a little slower... anyway. Don't twist my words. Ass."

Unaffected by the aggression, Coach gave a chuckle and shook his head. He lifted a hand to rub at his head, fingertips scratching at the low layer of greyed stubble building up on his scalp. "Ain't twistin' no words, Nicky. Just bein' honest."

As Nick gave a little curl of his lip in a vague gesture of contempt, Rochelle slipped back in, holding a large, sealed bandage in either hand. "Here you go, Nick.. there's a first aid kit in the closet, but it's really bare. Bandaids mostly. This is the best we've got. If you ask me, tomorrow, we should find some stuff and bind your whole shoulder. Hi, Coach."

The big man gave her a gruff smile as she stepped past him. Nick straightened a little in his seat, reaching up his good hand to take the packets from her, but Rochelle ignored him entirely. Standing at his elbow, she broke open the sealed wrapper and peeled out a bandage about the size of her palm.

Nick let himself tense, grumbling slightly as she bent forward. Rochelle placed the bandage carefully over the wound on the back of his shoulder. A wince crossed his face as she used her thumb to seal the bandage to his skin.

"What're we going to do?" the gambler grumbled, gritting his teeth a bit. He eyed her motions sideways, seeming a little mistrustful. "Overalls is out for the count. We can't keep moving..

Rochelle gave a weary sigh and pulled away, touching fingertips to his bicep to nudge him straighter so she could reach the entrance wound. Unwrapping the second bandage, she tenderly moved to cover the gash, shaking her head. "I don't know about you guys, but I'm .. God, I just need.. rest. With people I can trust."

Her voice faltered a little there at the end, brows lowering above her eyes, focusing suddenly on the effort of placing the bandage gently. Coach reached out to set a hand on her shoulder, sighing.

"Way I see it, we stay here awhile." he laid out with a slow tone, half-closing his eyes as a deep breath escaped his nostrils. "You an' Ellis need to rest. Babygirl an' I'll keep watch, trade on sleep. Don't want them Angels sneakin' up on us or nothin', but yo' ass needs to stay down, Nick."

The conman twisted his mouth down slightly, straightening away from Rochelle's hands as the bandage settled into place. Laying a palm onto it, he turned, pushing up from the chair and reaching for his shirt where it lay folded over the counter.

Gingerly, one-handed, he started to shrug into it, slowing as he had to move his injured shoulder.
His gaze flicked down to his suit jacket, the thing wadded up and blood-stained just a few inches from his foot on the floor.

It was like the last piece of sense in the world, broken and ruined.

He felt an odd apathy to it.

"So I guess we're not believing them?" he questioned, dully, tucking his shirt into place but not bothering to button it. Fighting a cringe at the way he had to move his shoulder, he turned at the waist, glancing at them.

Rochelle blinked a little at him, crumpling the empty wrappers in her hands with some hesitance. Her jaw was stiff - maybe a little too much, fighting an inner turmoil she hid from her voice. "Them what?"

"About the military."

There was just a moment of silence as Rochelle lowered her gaze to the floor, shoulders falling. Coach glanced at her, moving a step closer to slip an arm around her frame, exhaling. His eyes, deepset with a weary seriousness, met Nick's.

"If we believe them - then we got nothin'."

Nick examined him for a moment, silently, tracing fingers down the buttons of his dress shirt. There was a certain truth to that, though Nick found himself cynically shaking his head, gaze flicking away.

"I'll keep an eye on the kid." he stated flatly, slipping a hand onto his hip and turning to walk with a soft limp to his gait as he somewhat tiredly moved to leave the kitchen. Rochelle's head lifted up after him, voice lightening.

"Let us know when Ellis wakes up, will you, honey?"

The conman gave a silent thumbs-up over his shoulder, relaxing his arm a little afterward and letting his hand slip to cup over his injured shoulder. Sure. Right after I get done with him.

He slipped out of the kitchen and into the living-room, turning tenderly for the short hallway to the bedroom. He let his eyes half-close, a certain numbness edging his body as he moved, focusing on the goal of getting to the bedroom before he let himself collapse.

Nick vaguely heard Coach and Rochelle start talking behind him. Unconcerned, he slipped up to the bedroom door and reached out to crack it open, only a cursory glance spared for the small painting nailed into the wall by his head.

He stepped in with a turn, closing the door behind himself. The whole house was painted a seabreeze shade of blue, and the bedroom was no exception.

Bruised and exhausted, Ellis laid in a limp sprawl on the bed, dirty overalls and clumsily arranged limbs utterly out of place on the lacy bedsheets and lacier pillows. He was like a dirt smudge on a neat handkerchief, and as Nick examined him, he found himself cracking a smirk.

God, you're such a hick.

Nick felt a faintly light-headed sensation as he walked himself forward, stepping over the sandy-colored carpet stained with the dirt and blood from Coach's shoes. Ellis' workboots sat on the floor at the end of the bed, and Nick moved to stand just next to them, carefully bending down and lifting up either foot to work off his shoes.

Bending his bad leg made him wince a little, but it was nothing compared to his shoulder just then. "Glad you're getting your beauty sleep, kid." Nick grumbled under his breath as he arranged his dress shoes in a habitually neat pairing a good foot from Ellis' dirty workboots.

Ellis' lack of response put a stopper on Nick's sarcasm, and with a posture of wistful exhaustion, the conman straightened up. He set a hand forward on the footboard of the bed, examining the shapes and curves of Ellis' sprawled body.

And then his face.

The soft palette of innocence that made up his features, full lips half-parted with a childlike sleepiness that belayed the pained kind of weakness that had led him to pass out in Rochelle's arms. As Nick's gaze traced his features, half-tipped into the mattress and shaded by his cap as they were, it alighted on the blossoming bruise that shaded his jaw.

It was big, and it made him frown.

If he tilted his head, he could almost trace the lines of heavy knuckles along the shapes of the bruising skin. His imagination or not, it stirred a kind of agitation in his gut, uselessly gnawing on his brain.

More than a little frustrated, Nick let out a sigh. He glanced around the strangely barren bedroom - either a temporary beach house that received little personalization, or a house that had been stripped before whoever owned it ran.

A wicker chair in the corner caught his eye, and he limped over to grab ahold of it by the arms, carrying it with the seat braced against his knees gingerly. Walking it back to the bed, he lowered it down just beside the mattress and sighed, letting his body turn to slip down into the seat.

Relaxing into the chair with an almost lustful sigh, the gambler let his head loll back against the chair's back, closing his eyes. "Just 'cause I've gotta sit on vigil for your stupid ass -" the gambler muttered disdainfully. "- doesn't mean I can't relax."

Crossing his legs tiredly, he let his hands drape into his lap, slouching down into the chair without pushing his injured shoulder against it. His eyes slipped half-open, examining Ellis' sleeping face as he stilled into a sore kind of slump.

"Whatever that bastard.. did.." Nick grumbled, the words falling from his lips with no small distaste. He wanted that to be absolutely nothing. The idea that Ellis had been a victim in any sense of the word just... grated at Nick.

There was pleasure to be taken from his makeshift trap working.. but very, very little.

It was his ex-wife all over again. The cluelessness. The fear, building and building and building upon Nick's inner voice's constant tirade of cynicism and pessimism to slowly mount into such a crippling wave of firm belief in the very worst of possibilities... Nick beat the voice into silence, but it left an imprint.

An imprint of guilt.

"... I'm sorry, Fireball."
Chapter 90

It was like a slow form of torture.

The water drops pattering on Nick's consciousness were his own thoughts, returning again and again as many times as he'd shoo them away. There was almost a rut growing in his mind as the same musings passed across his awareness - the same agitated impatience, the same want.

Staring at Ellis' unconscious frame, watching breath inhale into him and exhale out of him, noticing the small shifts of discomfort as he tried to find a comfortable position on his stomach; Nick was driving himself slowly insane with rejected urges.

He thought about crawling up into the bed and touching that bruised body until he woke up.

He thought about crawling up into the bed and whispering in Ellis' ear until he woke up.

He thought about crawling up into the bed and just falling asleep next to him, so it wouldn't matter when he woke up.

Every single time ended the same: Nick sitting slouched in the same, immensely uncomfortable position on the wicker chair. He dozed in and out of stubborn consciousness and refused to give in to sleep, or those thoughts.

He was almost certain that his spine was slowly folding to fit the awkward slope of the chair's back.

It hurt - he just lacked the initiative to move, especially knowing if he got up he would doubtlessly end up in Ellis' bed. The inviting comfort of the mattress and alluring slopes of Ellis' sprawled body were an added cruelty on top of his rampant - if slow - imagination.

Rochelle had slipped inside for just a moment, wielding a plate of tuna sandwiches - just two, perched on top of each other on the small plate. She didn't say more than a soft 'here,' passing Nick the plate and stopping to examine the sleeping Georgian for a moment.

Her eyes had betrayed a shaken worry, distracted and unfocused. She left with her head shaking, rubbing at her eyes, visibly holding it together in front of Nick and slightly eager to get out of the room.

Least she has Coach, he distantly observed, leaning back in his chair with an unpleasant groan of discomfort and picking the plate in his lap up. Not surprised I'm not exactly her confidant.. kind of an asshole.

He half-laughed, tiredly amused by the concept as he picked up a slightly malformed tuna sandwich with two fingers.

They'd gotten crushed a bit in the backpack, unavoidably. The tuna had soaked juice into the bread with a visible leeching and left them far less picturesque than they'd been that first time. Nick gazed at the one in his grip for a moment, examining the crumples in the bread, and sighed.

He didn't even particularly care.

Taking a sizeable bite, he leaned back into the chair slowly and slumped down as he chewed. The fish still twanged on his senses, sort of a creamy aftertaste sticking to the roof of his mouth.
Green eyes gazed at Ellis' face as he swallowed, licking a stray fleck of bread off his lower lip.

"You're missing out." he commented sarcastically, but his eyes lingered as if to be sure the words hadn't actually enticed Ellis to wake up. He found a spot on the bed to re-direct his gaze toward when it didn't.

Grumbling an irate "stupid Sleeping Beauty." under his breath, Nick reached his free hand down to grasp onto the arm of his chair. Moving with energy he didn't really have to spare, the gambler shoved his chair around jolt by jolt until he faced away from the bed, moodily gazing toward the wall as he took a second bite.

His shoulder had fallen to a constant sting of pain. The muscles around it were inflamed and abused, protesting both the intrusion of the original sword and the painful reactions of Nick's makeshift disinfection. It hurt, no doubt, and something about the pain was putting a pit in his stomach.

After the first two swallows of tuna sandwich, he was fast losing his appetite and finding a warm kind of nausea in its place.

Frustrated, he forced himself to take a third bite and then shoved the plate onto the bedside table by his elbow. Pressing a palm onto his bare stomach, he closed his eyes as he chewed and swallowed, wincing through the gurgle that worked its way up his midsection.

Getting ill was last on his to-do list, and it was with that in mind that he focused on deep, swelling breaths, despite the discomfort it set into his shifting shoulder. "C'mon, Nicolas." he muttered to himself, fingertips soothing up the sensitive curl of his tummy. "Pull it together."

His body was in turmoil and it irked him. All the urging seemed to do was make it worse, stomach twisting in his gut as he breathed, and every motion pushed him closer to a real sense of anger.

It culminated in a violent snarl, suddenly fisting a hand and punching the heel of it down against the arm of his chair in a fit of pure frustration. He would've calmed back down with that, reined himself back in, had it not suddenly registered in his body that he'd just used his injured arm to do it.

The pain came in a spasm, twisting him forward into a hunch over his lap as he clasped up his hand to grip his shoulder. His eyes shut, holding his shoulder tightly and keeping it still as he breathed through the pain like he'd been trying to breathe through his nausea.

His shoulder hurt under his palm - all the touch did was make it hurt worse, rising until his jaw gritted his teeth together.

"Fuck." left him faintly. He opened his eyes in a slightly pained motion, about to stare blindly at the floor - when he saw what Rochelle brought that he hadn't even noticed her place down.

A pill bottle, knocked over when he'd jerked his chair around in a fit. He blinked slightly, startled by the sight - she'd barely even spared him a glance. He'd have hardly expected that kind of thought from her, certainly not wordlessly.

A slight huff escaped him, reaching down his hand in a limp gesture to scoop up the bottle as he straightened up. He popped the cap with his thumb, gazing at the labels as he did. They weren't painkillers, but he read 'anti-inflammatory' amidst all the text along the edges and that was enough.

Tossing back the bottle to tap two of the tablets into his mouth, he swallowed them with only a small choke. Pills had never been that difficult for him to down, although they left a sour taste on his tongue, acrid and unpleasant.

Settling down into the chair with a slight grunt, Nick let his wrist settle over his forehead, closing his eyes again. He knew it was a little bit of a placebo effect, but he did feel slightly better as he sat there, inhaling deep into the very bottoms of his lungs.

Despite the fact that he grumbled a low, "Good job letting me know about that, Ro'.", he knew he probably wouldn't have thanked her anyway.

Strange how things like that were starting to register.

Sighing slightly, feeling his fit of emotion fall to a slowing, dull hum in his chest, Nick shifted his weight. An unpleasant kind of half-scowl settled on his face, but he pushed himself out of his chair with a rolling motion, reaching his feet and catching his balance.

Turning about, he stepped around the chair. It was only a short distance to the door, and he walked to it with a firmly set jaw. The small twist-lock in the center of the knob was cradled easily between two fingers, and he turned it, satisfied with the click.

Returning back toward his chair, he didn't sit down - breathing deep, he edged up to Ellis' bedside. Gazing down at him for a moment, he let his body turn and take a seat on the edge of the bed, resting himself down and letting his injured arm cradle on his lap.

Wordlessly, with his breath catching in transient flickers of pain, Nick reached out a hand and set his knuckles against Ellis' cheek. His gaze played over the press of his fingers against the soft skin beneath them, the way his knuckles so gently traced his cheekbone.

His thumb escaped the fold of his fingers, slipping down to settle against the vicious bruising on Ellis' jaw. The purpling bruise imprinted into the Georgian's skin made Nick's temper stir all over again, but he only had an instant to wrestle with it.

The moment he touched that bruise, the kid's body set to an almost fervent shift. Before Nick could recoil his hand, Ellis was whimpering uselessly where he laid.

Ellis let off a frantic "nnnh-" under his hand. It was almost like a sleep-muffled 'no.'

It was a pitiful sound that Nick accidentally set off. Ellis' hands gripped into the sheets and his head tried to twist away, the motion one of pure distress. Nick reared back slightly, startled and not wholly certain how to handle the situation.

Pretty sure that's not how that was supposed to go, he wryly self-chided, leaning forward quickly and reaching down his hands to try and catch hands onto Ellis' frame. "Kiddo, hey, easy!" he soothed, fingers spreading on the smooth muscle of the younger man's shoulders.

He tried to still him, keeping the Georgian from hurting himself with his frantic squirming, but the touch made Ellis shoot out an arm to lash at his forearm, almost panicked.

He had a strong swing, and Nick genuinely winced with the collision. He coughed a little, twisting his body to make sure no errant flail hit his injured shoulder, losing his grip on Ellis' shoulders. The Georgian clawed and flopped his body onto his back, instinctively taking pressure off his ribs.

Grunting slightly, Nick leaned further forward, determined. He slipped a hand up and pushed Ellis' cap off his head, spreading digits softly into his hair, palm resting on his temple. Stroking fingertips against the curls underneath them, he tried again, "Ellis. Wake up before you break somethin', champ - it's Nick."
The words breached his panicked half-consciousness - the kid woke up with a gasp, whole body convulsing in a sharp gesture that would've thrust him into a sitting position had the pain not immediately kicked in and stopped him. "Whut -"

Nick watched with a slightly sympathetic twist to his mouth, keeping his fingers half-twined in Ellis' hair as the Georgian faltered down into the mattress. Soft whines escaped him as his abused body shivered and twitched.

"G-gh - oh - gawd - it hurts -" he whimpered breathlessly, body squirming in time to the little gasps that passed his lips. There was pleading in his voice when he managed a weakened, "N-Nick -"

"I'm sorry, kiddo." Nick murmured, letting the pads of his fingers sift through Ellis' curly hair in an attempt to comfort him. He leaned down, body slumping into a small slope to reach his head down and graze his mouth against Ellis' cheek.

The gambler dusted a subtle kiss there, breathing in and out slowly as he tried to maintain a smooth tone of voice. His palm traced down Ellis' cheek, pushing his chin slightly up so he could better examine his face. "Where's it hurt?"

One of Ellis' hands weakly lifted up, dragging calloused, warm fingertips to grip the older man's wrist loosely. "E-everywhere." he mumbled, one clouded little blue eye opening up to glance at Nick's face, the other closed tightly.

Nick gazed at him silently a moment, pulling his head away just an inch. The bruise blossoming up from his jawline made the gambler's jaw tighten, annoyed, but worse was the look in Ellis' eyes. The exhaustion, the fear, the vulnerability.

Slowly, the gambler eased the elbow of his bad arm down onto the mattress by Ellis' shoulder. It hurt to rest his weight on it that way, but he gritted his teeth through it, letting his head lower again to settle his lips against Ellis' ear.

He brushed his mouth along the whorls of the hick's ear, soothing and gentle. Ellis' breathing settled just a little, a soft hiccup trickling out of him. His eyes closed, and Nick could feel him relaxing as he teased the soft skin under his lips. "Bad dream, El? You woke up pretty scared.."

"Yeah.." Ellis whimpered honestly, the word catching in his throat with a small hitch. He shook his head slowly, though not enough to stir Nick from his place. "I-I .. I'm still.. - .. everythin's okay, right?"

Slipping fingers deeper into Ellis' hair, the gambler let his hand cradle underneath his head. A sigh escaped him, turning his chin to gaze over the younger man's face. His lips left his ear to hover over his cheekbone. "Yeah. Everyone's alright, kiddo. Shit, you saved the day. Y'know that?"

Ellis' gaze was a little shy when his eyes opened, blue muddled with pain. He glanced at Nick, their gazes meeting slowly. A smirk touched the gambler's lips, steadying his voice as his eyes narrowed.

"Leave it to you to come up with a plan like that. Actually impressed me a bit with that one, Ace."

A little smile rewarded Nick's attempts. It was a faltered and tiny version of his usual brilliance, but a smile all the same. "H-heh -" he hiccuped through a wave of pain that had him cringing in on himself, brows lowering over pretty blue eyes. "Must be a real wreck if yer complimentin' me like that.."

Nick chuckled slightly, just a small noise. He shook his head a little and traced the Georgian's face with his fingers, letting himself enjoy the contact, trying not to overthink. He'd been so sure Ellis was dead… "You are a wreck, but I'm serious. You played a good game back there, El. Saved our asses."

Ellis melted a little into his palm, the inner edges of his brows rising softly in a flicker of emotion. He raised a hand to slowly settle his fingers over Nick's as they cradled his cheek, stroking fingertips into the spaces between the older man's digits.

The intimate touch of fingers made Nick's spine stiffen just a little - but it was a good kind of stiff. He let it happen.

"Yuh still got hurt.." Ellis whimpered gently, gaze flickering to his shoulder.

"Yeah. I lied about not getting hurt... not that I wanted to." Nick admitted, chin lowering slightly and a brow lifting up just an inch. He shrugged his injured shoulder up dismissively, wincing at the pain it earned him. "Better get used to that whole lying thing. I'm trying to kick the truth habit."

Ellis gave a little smile, lips parting as if to speak, but Nick interrupted him with a quiet edge. The last thing he wanted to do was talk about himself. "Let me check your chest out, kid.. if you broke ribs or something, we have a problem.."

Immediately, he noticed Ellis pull away. Slight discomfort flashed over his face, but it wasn't the innocent blush of embarrassment at Nick's intent to strip his shirt off - it was something else. Something unfamiliar, and shamed.

Nick zeroed in on that emotion in an instant.

"Hold still." he ordered with a firmness touching his voice. He pulled his hand away from Ellis' cheek, disentangling the Georgian's fingers, and ignored the slight protest as he reached both his hands down to take a gentle grip on Ellis' shirt.

"N-Nick - 'm alright, really. I just need some rest or somethin'.. you do too, y'know - let's just..'' His voice hitched as his shirt started to roll up with Nick's tenderly pushing thumbs. The gambler's knuckles brushed against the soft, nicked-and-bruised skin of his navel, making his frame shiver. ". ..let's just forget 'bout it, okay-?"

As his fingers grazed up the other man's flat midsection, Ellis' head rolled a little to the side, brows drawn tight together. "D-don't -" Ellis was too hurt to fight beyond his plaintive voice. Nick ignored him entirely as he peeled his shirt up his battle-worn but somehow still soft frame, uncovering skin inch by inch.

His left side was colored by a purpled bruise, tracing close along the curved shape of his ribs. It was dark and deep, reddened where the skin actually stretched over the rib bone. "Mmh. Looks some kind of fractured." Nick stated with a dark flatness.

"Nick.. 'm fine, just -' Ellis tried to flop, tried to twist away, but the pain stopped him mid-motion with a little gasp. Nick frowned slightly at the noise, but it hardly dissuaded him. There was something he didn't want Nick to see, and Nick was going to find it.

As his off-yellow Bullshifters shirt folded up past his pecs, the logo crumpling into a faded mess of ink, Nick recognized just what that was.

The whole front of his smooth chest had fallen into a nasty bruise, expanded along the delicate dip of his breastbone and shading into his pecs. There were subtle patterns crushed into his skin, blood darkening them to weird shades of purple and black.
Nick felt his emotions flatline, this calm pulse in his chest. His pupils constricted sharply.

Dangerously.

Ellis' voice was soft and almost frightened, eyes on Nick's stone cold face as the gambler hunched over him, staring at the imprint of Jerry's boot on the Georgian's aching chest. "It .. it ain't so bad."

"He stomped on you. Like a fucking dog." he stated, green eyes flicking along the almost-visible shape of a bootheel dug deep into Ellis' skin. He reached down a hand, moving to trace his fingertips over the bruise. "What else did he do?"

His touch made Ellis flinch, though it was only partially out of pain. "Nothin', Nick. -"

The Georgian reached up a hand to try and catch Nick's wrist - but Nick snapped his hand violently away an instant before they touched, voice raising. Hostility prickled his frame, tone turning jagged and sharp with hissed fury. "What the fuck else did he do? What the fuck else did I let him do?!"

"Nick..." Ellis pleaded, his voice dropping in gentled response. ".. it wasn't yer fault." His hand dangled where Nick's wrist had been - hovered there, as if they had touched. There was a desperation in his eyes, breath turning shallow in flaring nostrils. "He didn't do nothin'. please, Nick."

It took an instant for Nick to really register it. Anger flooded every inch of his mind, making it difficult to make sense of anything but the almost violent urges crawling up his spine - but it was Ellis' eyes that did it. Sparkling, pain-clouded blue shot sense into him - and Nick let his shoulders fall to a slow hunch, gritting his jaw. Silence swallowed him for a moment, gaze darting from Ellis' face to the bruises.

He was making it worse. All he was doing was making it harder on the Georgian.

His gaze shifted away with a sharp frustration, unwilling to look at Ellis when he spoke. Anger faded to a renewed sense of tired guilt, frustrated with himself. Slowly, working the words out, Nick uttered; "... I just - I shouldn't have left you behind. Fucking stupid. I -"

When Ellis reached up again, this time to settle a hand onto the older man's arm, Nick didn't jerk away. Strong fingers gripped his sleeve with a needy tightness, a small smile resurfacing onto the conman's bruised face.

He spoke with soft promise, strong despite his breathlessness. His thumb stroked at the conman's bicep, affection bleeding through the motion. "I know, Nick. 'm okay, fer real. He didn't do nothin' but bruise me up... don't feel guilty or nothin'. I jus'..."

Ellis' expression faltered there, gazing up at Nick. His silence made Nick look at him again, and his gaze landed on a face struggling with need. He knew the look of someone eager for touch, for comfort.

Nick stared down at him for a silent moment, gaze growing distant as his mind chewed on that expression. Rolled it around in his brain - the choice of words, the emotion behind it. The consequences of giving in.

He just didn't have the energy to reject the urges anymore.

Bending down suddenly, Nick leaned his body into a close hover above Ellis'. Still half-twisted away with his legs off the edge of the bed, he craned his waist to bring his mouth in line with the younger man's. Their lips met and locked with what had become a familiar clash of senses - plump and thin, soft and harsh.

Nick gave no ground and allowed no breath, thrusting deep with an agile tongue that stole every ounce of sense from the kid. He felt Ellis inhale underneath him, jaw shifting to submit to the kiss with a trembling confidence.

A hand touched onto his side, thumb flicking underneath the open left wing of his blue dress shirt, and Nick's breath purred subtly when the calloused pad of Ellis' thumb traced along his tense hip. His hand pulled a little bit on his side, and Nick could read the desire like it was printed on Ellis' forehead.

He could handle desire.

Even if somewhere, he knew it was a little more than just sexual.

Pulling back from the kiss, leaving Ellis to gasp softly, lips wet and gaining a slight flush of red to the sweet skin, Nick gazed over his face. The intensity of his examination brought a blush to Ellis' cheeks, though he held firm underneath it. "Relax, kiddo. Just close your eyes and relax." he stated in a soft tone, that edge of gravel laying a husky lilt to his voice.

Trustingly, Ellis did so - there was a gorgeous kind of calm that softened his features as he rolled his head back into the pillow, curly hair nuzzling into the lacy fabric in a subtle, fluffy halo around his face. "Okay.." he murmured softly, voice clogged with an almost drowsy sense of pain.

Nick would get rid of that.

The gambler bent to settle lips over Ellis' - but he didn't let them lock into a kiss again. He teased, pulling away the instant Ellis' lips parted, and grazing his mouth along the gentle bow of Ellis' full lips to kiss a little further down.

Inch by inch, he moved along his face like that - he felt a smile flicker underneath his lips as he passed along the edge of Ellis' mouth, a soft little private thing, silently passed between them.

As Nick's lips reached his cheekbone, he slipped one of his hands to settle his palm flat onto Ellis' navel. His stomach shifted underneath Nick's fingers, seeming surprised by the warm gesture, and Nick curled his digits to stroke fingertips along the soft trickle of light hair sneaking down from Ellis' bellybutton to the wrap of his coveralls.

"N-Ni-?" the younger man started, but those fingers had already started to graze down along that dusting of hair that marked its path. In a soft gasp that was almost endearing, Ellis' body gave a tremor and his shoulders seemed to shift deeper against the mattress. "Oh."

Nick wanted to chuckle, but he resisted, lips reaching the kid's ear with a soft exhale. He nipped teeth onto the soft earlobe pressed against his lips, biting with a gentle edge to tease sensitive flesh.

His fingers crawled up over the Georgian's coveralls, spreading as his palm pressed down against the thick fabric. He stroked down into the niche of his groin, feeling the soft shape of Ellis' cock under the constraints of the denim. Ellis' breath shallowed out as the gambler's agile digits traced the subtle bulge, thumb catching on the crook of his hip to brace his hand.

"Forget all that shit." Nick growled quietly, tongue escaping to flick over the earlobe and the little red marks his teeth had left. Ellis gave a whine against his cheek, breath fluttering with a stuttered pleasure as he melted like putty in the gambler's hands.
Cupping his crotch, Nick squeezed with his palm in slow, gentle waves, following the small shifts of Ellis' hips as the twitches of pleasure made his body twitch, too. His middle and ring fingers dipped down to rub tips in small circles on the loose, heavy fabric, teasing low against the tangible shape of the younger man's organ.

The soft catch of Ellis' breath and the way he held it betrayed the pleasure Nick's hand spread into the private reaches of his body. His chin lifted in blushing, vaguely mortified want, head turning against the gambler's mouth.

The older man's body shifted subtly, rolling his shoulder back so he could curl up his arm and retreat fingers to the waist of his coveralls, sinking underneath. Bypassing the loose fabric of his boxers, Nick brushed fingertips against the downy curls that graced the soft skin of Ellis' groin.

"Like that, Ace..? Hmn?" he purred with a hot twist to his voice, fascinated by the youth's reactions.

Sinking his hand in lower, he let the pads of his fingers trail up the stiffened base of Ellis' cock. He dragged a softened groan out of the younger man, those hips shifting faintly underneath his palm. "Mnh.." escaped petal-soft lips as Ellis' blue eyes closed. "S'-s'nice.. real nice, Nick.."

There was an intimacy in touching Ellis that Nick wasn't used to - a virginal, innocent quality to the very warmth of his body. A fragile creature cradled trustingly in his hands. He'd never gotten so close to someone with their heart so vulnerably placed on their sleeve. It was almost intimidating, realizing that.

He slowly dragged his tongue along the curvature of Ellis' ear, nipping teeth in small suckles, as he wrapped his fingers around the rising flesh warm and velvety against his palm. Slowly curling and uncurling his fingers led them into a tender stroke, the rise of which urged Ellis' hips up to follow, and the fall of which made them shiver back down.

The play of his fingers was quickly coaxing blood into both Ellis' cheeks and his length.

"G-gawd." Ellis uttered slowly, arching a hand up to reach Nick's slightly ruffled hair. The swirls and sweeps of his arranged hair were still in place, held by stiff hairspray that Ellis could feel against his fingertips as they grazed up the back of Nick's neck. "I-I was real.. Lord, I dunno whut I'd'uh done if you'd gotten.." left him, faltering at the end.

Maybe it was the strike of pleasure as Nick toyed his thumb along the rigid edge of the erection's head, the dry pad of his finger stroking sweet skin, or the words that should've come next. The gambler understood the silence, and with a small exhale, he dragged his mouth away from Ellis' ear, tracing a path onto his cheek.

"Forget about it."

Nick let his whole hand encircle the width of Ellis' member, tightening on the hard flesh. He could feel the faint shifting of silky skin underneath his digits as he pumped it loosely, aware of the soft arching of Ellis' spine and the faint whimpering that left his lips at the dry stimulation.

"I'm right here."

Nick's body shifted as he let his fingers twist and play along Ellis' erection, squeezing shifts and noises out of him with a gentle force. The kid's thighs parted slightly, spreading in a way that seemed to invite the gambler to slip between them, but Nick resisted.

He wanted to, but Ellis was too injured. He had to focus.
Bending his head, Nick craned his neck down to settle his mouth against one of the flushed nipples just on the edge of the large bruise spilt onto his lover's chest. He closed teeth around it, toying his tongue against the delicate flesh as Ellis gave a gentle-throated moan, startled. Ellis' hand came with him, curling a little on the hair just at the base of his neck.

His nipple perked under Nick's tongue, a heated wave of arousal hardening the bud of flesh. He tugged at it almost playfully with his teeth as he brushed his thumb over the slit at the tip of Ellis' erection, enjoying the quivers he stirred in Ellis' body.

A little bit of wetness leaked onto his thumb, a soft throb pulsing through the younger man's length.

"O-oh- ohh.." drawled out of the Georgian with a subtle undertone of awe, spreading his fingers to stroke at the back of Nick's neck, pawing and kneading as a flustered pleasure swarmed his nerves. His hips rolled, need edging the weak shift of his body, unable to do more than that with his injured torso. "H-hn.. L-Lordy .. oh, Lord, please .. don' stop..

Shifting to nuzzle his lips across Ellis' chest to reach his unattended nipple, Nick let himself halt to gaze at the thick bruise facing him down. That stir of anger resurfaced - the Georgian's chest must've nearly collapsed under the weight of the hulking brute.

Funneling that anger into intent, Nick sped and tightened his pumping hand within the tent of his coveralls, feeling Ellis' breath pick up above his head and shudders turn to a constant squirm of those narrow hips. He closed his mouth around the yet-untouched nipple, letting his lips set a subtle suction against the warm skin.

That tipped him over - too much stimulation on too many unprepared nerves.

Ellis' body jerked with a sudden undulation, a subdued moan twisting his chin up high into the air as his heels dug into the mattress and his waist rollicked upwards. A groan spilled out of him with the same slow urgency as his climax.

It was a lazy kind of orgasm, and Nick found his head lifting to watch the slow squirm and flutter of the younger man's body. Pleasure overrode any recollection of the pain on those soft features. It was an almost enrapturing sight, seeing the blush-wrought Georgian come undone with such weak, trusting, un-self-conscious pleasure.

His fingers curled about the hot head of Ellis' length, squeezing and soothing him through the climax that rippled through his body. As the kid slowly calmed, breath whimpering in soft, appreciative pants through reddened lips, Nick let his hand gently drag out of his coveralls.

He could feel the sticky fluid between his knuckles, but his gaze was too alert on Ellis' face to bother sparing a glance for his hand. He shifted his weight, rolling his shoulder down a little bit as he eased out of his position, and winced a little at the discomfort spread through his injured shoulder.

Putting all his weight on it had been a bad idea, but a worthwhile one.

Stretching his arm back to wipe his messy hand carelessly on the side of the bed, Nick let his neck straighten and craned his head forward to graze his lips along Ellis' panting lower one. The soft, plump flesh taunted him until he couldn't resist the urge to nip at it with the softest of bites.

Ellis was melted beside him, eyes fogged with the afterglow. He murmured a little incoherent noise at the nip, nuzzling his face at the gambler's gently, and reached up a hand to paw fingertips along the gentle slope of Nick's neck in a tiny pet.

Nick chuckled a little at the touch. He moved slowly, shifting his weight in a gentle roll of his body to ease up the mattress till his good shoulder caught on the headboard. Nick pressed into it gently and let his legs slip wearily up onto the bed behind him, parallel to Ellis'. He gazed sideways at the youth, shifting his arm to invite Ellis against him.

The kid tenderly shimmied into the space between his bicep and his chest, moving with a slow weariness. He nuzzled his face into Nick's neck, not seeming even conscious of the fact his shirt was still pulled up his torso and his coveralls were shrugged a little low on his hips.

"Mmnh... Nick.." left him in a soft little moan, body slipping flat on the bed to keep pressure off his injured ribs, but keeping snuggled close to the man's chest. His cheek was hot against Nick's neck, pressing close with an affectionate kind of need. "Don't hurt so much now.. haw.."

Nick lowered his head to press his cheek against the top of Ellis' head, burying into the curls and flips of his hair. Green eyes half-shut, aware of the calm hum in his gut - arousal, pleasant and satisfying in its purring existence. He was content to not get off.

He wasn't usually a particularly selfless lover. 'Get more than you give' was a good unspoken motto, but that time was different. Maybe the pain in his shoulder took the edge off, or maybe he just wanted to make it up to Ellis. Maybe he just didn't have the energy.

He was too tired to argue with himself over it.

"Good." the gambler uttered in a quiet tone, lifting a hand to settle it against the back of Ellis' neck. He petted the nape of his neck, soothingly, distracting the both of them with the soft brush of skin on skin. "Can't have my efforts go to waste."

He felt Ellis' smile against his neck, soft and easy. "Can yuh stay here, Nick..? Please..?"

Nick nodded his head just enough to get the motion across. He shifted his arm to get it a little more comfortably placed around Ellis' shoulders, letting his body slip down and rest against the bed's pillow. "Yeah, sport. If it'll keep you from losing it again, I guess I'll lie here awhile. Get some rest, alright?"

Nobody needs to know he woke up.

"Thanks, Nick... means a lot. 'N' really.. it wasn't yer fault." He blinked a little as Ellis laid a little kiss against his neck. He glanced down, but Ellis' face was buried too snugly against his shoulder to be seen.

Or to see him - Nick let the smallest of smirks touch the edge of his mouth.

"Sure, Overalls." Nick stayed precisely where he was as the freshly exhausted youth drifted to sleep against his neck, breath shallow and pitifully warm as it trickled down onto the sensitive skin of his chest.

Ellis was a fair amount more comfortable than a wicker chair.
"What're you doin', babygirl?"

The bathroom was filled with the headache-inducing scent of bleach, heavy on the air despite the constant hum of the overhead ventilation that tried to circulate in fresh air. Rochelle shook her head from where she knelt next to the bathtub, arms reached over the edge. "Nick's jacket.. he got blood all over it." she forced out. "I found some cleaning supplies in the utility room."

Coach approached a few steps, gazing over her work.

The tub had several inches of cold water in it, tinted slightly pink with blood. She'd laid Nick's jacket mostly flat in the tub, and with rubber yellow gloves loosely encapsulating her hands, scrubbed slowly at the white fabric. "Hmm." he uttered, distantly. "Nice of you."

Rochelle shrugged, shoulders tensing a little as she leaned further forward. One of her hands lifted up, grasping the bleach bottle by the handle and dragging it off the edge of the tub. She drizzled a little more over the surface of the suit jacket, replacing the bottle with a small sigh.

"I needed to focus on something. My mother always cleans when she needs to think - figured I'd give it a shot."

For a moment, neither of them spoke, the only sounds being the sloshing of water as Rochelle bent back forward to resume scrubbing at the jacket. Blood stained the water in clouded streaks, rustling free from the fabric.

Coach edged forward, turning around to settle down on the edge of the tub. He exhaled deeply, leaning forward to settle elbows on his knees. He rubbed gently at his forehead, focusing forward toward the open bathroom door. "I took first watch so you could sleep, y'know, Ro'." He didn't say it accusatorially, just honestly.

"Yeah." she sighed, a light sense of regret flickering over her face. She glanced over at him, hands still working the fabric against itself, speed and fervor increasing gradually with each word. "I know.. I should've just told you to sleep. Sorry, Coach."

"Nah, babygirl." he negated with a shake of his head, a small slope up touching his lips. His head turned, eyeing the way she scrubbed at the jacket with a slightly raising eyebrow. "What's got yo' nerves all wired?"

Rochelle shook her head, voice loosening with a bit of an airy tone. Her focus darted back into the tub, narrowing. "I'm just tired, Coach. I'm fine."

Coach exhaled, leaning back and letting his hands clasp between his knees, knuckles wound up. The small slope of his mouth flattened out again, seriously. "Not by the way you're abusin' that jacket, you ain't. Won't do much good gettin' the blood out if it's torn to shit."

Not seeming startled so much as resigned at his observation, Rochelle let go of the suit jacket and leaned up, her shoulders cracking softly with the motion. She frowned vaguely, examining the pile of fabric swaddled up in the shallow, bloody water, elbows resting on the edge of the tub to relax her weight.

"... I feel..."
She didn't get two words in before her voice faltered, a shake of her head silencing herself. She made to lean in, intent on continuing with her work, tension flooding her face with a tightened jaw and a severe pinch to her lips. But Coach reached out and set a hand on her shoulder, halting her.

Warily, chocolate brown eyes - so often, before the apocalypse, lined by a layer of carefully applied mascara and highlighted by a dusting of eyeshadow - shifted up to his face, softening. "We're all safe, you know, babygirl." he uttered in a low tone, gruff and slow. He met her gaze with a solid force, confident and coaxing. She seemed to fluster at the statement, sighing, dropping her head to push stray wisps of hair back from her forehead with the soft inside of her elbow.

Her voice faded a little, quieting, as she spoke. "Y-yeah. But.. we're not the only people in the world. Carmine was fine until we showed up. We got Jerry killed, too. Of course I'm glad Ellis is okay, and Nick is recovering, but - we're not supposed to plow through people like zombies."

Coach squeezed at her shoulder, chin lowering into the gentle slopes of his slightly thick neck. He sighed, shaking his head. "What you mean, babygirl? We been doin' our best to survive. We ain't been tryin' to do anybody harm - protectin' ourselves is all we can do."

Shrugging her shoulders gently, Rochelle's eyes softened slowly. She worked her thumbs against each other in slow circles, the rubber gloves folding up in scrunched wrinkles between her digits. "All we can do? God. Isn't that sad."

"Ain't our fault how all this went down, you know."

Rochelle's gaze dropped, brows lifting subtly. She slid her arms to cross at the wrists, hands dangling down in their rubber casings. "I should've just grabbed Chris by the shirt and whooped him upside the head. Dragged him with us." grumbled out of her, frustrated and a little wistful.

The big man chuckled, leaning forward just a little and letting his hand fall off her shoulder. "Imagine you would'a carried him all the way here if you'd gotten the chance. Boy chose to leave, babygirl. Can't blame yo'self."

She shook her head instantly, spreading her fingers in a hapless gesture as ever more frustration bled into her voice. "I was going to stop him, Coach. I was going to make him come with us."

There was a kind of self-consciousness to her voice; an almost hesitance, like she was trying to justify a crime. Coach immediately hunched his shoulders at the tone, rubbing his palm into his forehead with a tired grunt. "It -"

"You saw it just like I did." she insisted, leaning back to slide to sit on her heels, a frown dragging down the corners of her mouth. "He was having a change of heart there at the end. He didn't want to hurt us. He never did - it was Brenda that lost it.. it all just.. went so crazy."

"Ro', babygirl," Coach coaxed, a restrained exasperation flooding his posture as he lifted up his hands and waved them at the wrists. "I was right there, I know what happened. Don't gotta explain anythin' to me."

She deflated slightly, glancing down at her hands with a small nod.

Giving a quiet sigh, Coach rested his elbows on his thighs, re-winding his fingers together between his knees and focusing deepset eyes somewhat thoughtfully on his dirt- and blood-encrusted shoes. "Babygirl. I know it all seems real dark right now. I know none of us'd want to get anyone hurt. But you gotta understand - if they'd given us a chance, if Chris'd stayed wit' us.. we'd have forgiven 'em. We'd have worked it out."

Rochelle inhaled, chin raising, but Coach wasn't done.

"It wasn't our doin' that got 'em in trouble. We ain't cruel folk an' I'd never turn no one to the dogs, but I ain' one for kissin' the feet of a murderer, you hear?"

When she frowned, he gave a slight, weary chuckle, half-apologetic. "I know, Coach. And it's not.. it's not that I think we did anything wrong. It's just not fair that we left him behind. I'm worried.. that he'll get hurt because of us. I can't imagine she'd be very happy with him after all that."

Rubbing into the sore joint of his thumb, Coach nodded in a gradual motion. "He knew you wanted him to stay, babygirl. He left on his own."

Rochelle gave a deep exhale, frustrated. She leaned up onto her knees again, bending into the tub to dip down her fingers into the water and pull the plug on the drain. The foamy, red-stained water started to drain out in a whirl above the metallic grating, and she watched it with an irked crunch to her brows.

"I didn't.. want him to.. I just.. didn't want him to get hurt, either. I don't want anyone to get hurt because of us."

There was a moment of silence, her eyes ticking to follow the swirl of water into the drain.

Her head lifted a little when he set a hand on her shoulder again, squeezing tighter. There was a serious tone to his voice when he spoke. "Babygirl, nobody did. A'ight? If things could have gone different, we'd have done it. Fact is, we weren't in no kind of control."

Rochelle sighed, nodding slowly as the tub emptied. Her fingertips trailed in the water spilling past them, eyes narrowing, and her silence was suddenly a bit stifling. The big man sitting beside her gazed at her with an almost weary focus, aware he didn't have the words she needed.

He couldn't promise Christophe would be alright - that their presence hadn't been the reason behind what might be his death or injury. He didn't, couldn't, know. In all truth - the likely answer was that he would be in trouble because of them.

Brenda didn't seem forgiving.

Coach shifted to stand up with a bit of a crack as his knees popped, uttering an 'egh' as he did and reaching down a hand to rub at his thigh slowly. "I'll be in the livin' room. Gonna block the doors best I can, keep us safe. You come out when you're done, we'll talk more, yeah?"

"Okay, Coach.. thank you. How long do you think Ellis'll need to rest..?" she questioned quietly, reaching down to pick up Nick's suit jacket by the lapels. She shook it slightly as Coach gruffly sighed, his chin lifting to gaze at the ceiling.

His bulky shoulders shrugged up wearily, speaking with a slow nod. "Don't much know - won't, till he wakes up an' I can get a look at him. Had a few players take some nasty chest hits before - if he's got broke ribs, he'll be hurtin' for a good while. If we're lucky, he's just gotten himself bruised up an' with some rest, takin' it easy, he'll be back to normal real soon."

Rochelle bobbed her head in a simple motion, shaking the jacket out gently. She twisted the bath faucet on gently, its dial still aimed at 'C,' and leaned in to hold the suit under the stream. She gently started to shake and turn it, avoiding the urge to wring it out, letting the water rinse away the bleach and left-over blood.
"Okay." she agreed, voice softened, but distant.

Coach left with a quiet steadiness, something respectful but slightly clueless in how he retreated. He didn't really know how to comfort her. Rochelle didn't look back, lips pinching as he trudged out of the bathroom and back into the living room. Her gaze stayed stoically focused on the jacket.

The bleach and cold water had done wonders for the fabric, though there was a deadened tint to the jacket, tired and worn. The wide stains of blood from Nick's shoulder were almost entirely gone, just faded pink blotches left behind where the worst of it had started to set.

Pleased with her work, though her smile was a little weak, Rochelle let the jacket hold underneath the water for a few more moments. She pulled it open and turned the sleeves, making sure all the bleach had been leeching out of the fabric, and got up to her feet, holding it over the tub.

"The thankless toils of a woman." she ghosted to herself, voice faded.

Stretching her arms up, she carefully folded it over the curtain rod, the jacket dribbling water freely from dangling edges. Stepping back from it, Rochelle peeled her gloves off, sighing as she tossed them over the edge of the tub. She gazed at the limp suit jacket, musingly.

At least I fixed that.

Wiping her hands flat-palmed on her thighs, Rochelle turned away, somewhat quietly leaving the bathroom. Her gaze flicked up to note Coach examining the living room, alert eyes looking for the best way to block up the door, but she angled her steps away.

Instead, Rochelle moved into the hallway just beside her, glancing up at the bedroom Nick and Ellis had taken over. As much as Nick's brooding silence put her on edge, she'd feel better knowing Ellis was still resting as comfortably as they could manage.

Maybe letting him know she was cleaning his jacket would put the gambler in a better mood, too.

That, and she did want him to come out of there at some point so they could talk about everything. Regroup. For all his cynicism and cruel bluntness, Rochelle almost wanted to hear his feelings. It wasn't that she respected his unpleasantness, so much as she needed it.

Maybe hearing 'of course they deserved what they got, they tried to fucking kill us' in that low New Yorker accent, all ego and confidence and biting spite, would actually do her some good.

Stepping down the hall, Rochelle edged up to the door, flattening her hair down on the top of her head with a palm. She reached out to grasp onto the knob, just holding it. Raising her other hand, she gave a gentle knock with her knuckle.

Silence.

Arching a brow slightly, she stood there for just a moment, inhaling. Nick had likely fallen asleep in his chair - something she'd chastise him for when she got the chance. Sleeping in a chair with his shoulder in the state it was...

Gently, Rochelle made to turn the knob, intent on slipping in as quietly as possible - only to have the knob click ineffectually in her hand.

Blinking, her eyes widened a little, examining the face of the shut door. She knew for a fact she hadn't locked it last she left, which could only mean that something had happened - or, for that matter, was happening - that Nick didn't want them to see.
A smile flickered brazenly over her face, and she took a step back from the door. She thumbed over her smiling lower lip and started to turn away, moving to join Coach. She'd interrupted enough, and she had no intention of making more of a nuisance of herself.

At least one thing was still as she expected.
Chapter 92

With the front door blocked up, a coffee table and a few chairs pinning it shut, there was a little bit of security in the tiny house. One of the windows had been broken open, a few scrapes and blood streaks hinting that someone had jumped or been thrown out of it, but someone before them had boarded them up and it was otherwise calm.

Resisting the urge to doze, Coach sat up straight against the back of the small sofa, his arms arranged in a tight cross over the subtle bulge of his weighty gut. Rochelle's body was curled into his lap, arms crossed in front of her face to bury her eyes against them.

Her shoulders rose and fell with the slow breaths of deep sleep, undisturbed even when Coach's frame gave a comfortable rumble as he cleared his throat.

She hadn't said much to him after they'd talked. She seemed introverted, maybe a little distant and even more than that - exhausted. It didn't bother Coach; he could tell that, wholly successful or not, his talk with her had eased some of the distress.

Just the fact that she'd crawled up onto the couch and fell asleep against him said he'd done at least something right.

Deepset eyes flicked down as her head turned, a soft mutter of air escaping her as she buried her face into her elbow. The motion pushed her shoulder slightly against his stomach, one of her socked feet falling off the edge of the sofa to dangle limply.

It made him chuckle, a paternal tenderness to his voice.

Letting one hand lower from the tight cross over his core, he used a thick pinky to flatten a loose braid above her ear. The motion was painfully nostalgic - an automatic reaction, natural to him, just a reflex.

Ro' was strong - brave and serious, ambitious, with soft and gentle sides that were anything but vulnerable. Stubbornly surviving no matter what. She was, he had no doubt in his mind, a picture of the kind of woman his daughter would grow up to be.

Maybe it was stupid to see so much of an eight year-old girl in a twenty nine year-old.. or maybe just human nature, to find comfort in something.

He didn't mind. She seemed to need a father, as much as he needed a daughter - it saddened and made him smile all at once. Every time he called her 'babygirl,' there was a little pang of melancholy in his chest that missed his daughter.

Gazing forward, Coach somewhat tiredly clenched and unclenched his fingers, working the sore joints. They popped and snapped, the immediate pleasure of the sensation ruined by the tension that started settling into the digits the moment he stopped.

Relaxing his head back against the sofa, the football coach eyed the subtle flick and swish of the paint that coated the ceiling.

He was tired. Not just in the literal sense of the word - tired of fighting, of running, of hiding in the faded remnants of a dead city. His knee ached and his shoulders ached even more, and he couldn't help but run through the last few days over and over in his mind.
What things had he done wrong? What errors had passed in his judgement that had cost them?

Where could he have led them differently?

He'd always felt confident leading a team, whether or not everything went perfect. A mistake was a chance to get better - something they could discuss and replay, bounce back from, improve on. But football games hadn't been life or death.

Nothing in his life had ever been as serious as the team he was leading now - suddenly every twist and turn, every decision, haunted him a little. They were doing the best they could, but they weren't doing very well.

Was going to the military a mistake they'd regret? If the Angels were telling the truth, and the military was killing people… but if they didn't seek out the government, what would they do? The idea of letting go of that hope was terrifying.

An unpleasant exhale left him as he rolled his head back up straight, reaching up a hand to feel at the back of his head. Fingertips spread over the healing wound across his skull, pressing slightly.

The scabbing flesh felt soft, more like muscle than crusting flesh. It hurt to touch, and with a slight wince he retracted his hand, flexing his fingers again. At least he'd healed. They were running out of room for error.

A gentle sound from the ceiling snapped his attention up. His brows lifted, gaze narrowing. He held his breath an instant, trying to confirm he'd even heard it.

[Scuff... scuffle... scritchscufflescrich.]

"Babygirl." he gruffed instantly. Reaching down, he gripped onto Rochelle's shoulders, fingers squeezing. "Rochelle, wake up."

She stirred with a quiet squeak of an inhale. Lifting her head, she blinked wearily, brows lifting. "Nnh..? Coach?" One of her hands raised, shoulder rolling in its joint, curling her fingers into a fist to rub at her eyes. "..what's up?"

Soundlessly, Coach lifted a hand and pointed at the ceiling. She lifted her chin, confused, gazing up with her neck sharply sloped to crane upwards.

There was a moment of silence - it happened again just as Rochelle was about to break, lips formed into a confused, "Wh-"

[Rattlescrich. Scuffle.]

Immediately, both of them were in motion, slow and entirely awake. Rochelle leaned away from his side and rolled onto her feet from the couch, a hand dropping to the ground to silently scoop her rifle up.

Coach stood, catching his shotgun from where it leaned against the sofa. He wielded it with a grim set to his jaw, shaking his head. "You think there's an attic, babygirl?"

"I don't know.. I didn't think to look when we were checking the house out.." she whispered back reluctantly, eyes focused on the ceiling, darting to try and pinpoint the noise. "Maybe it's on the roof..?"

"Don't think so. Sounds too close fo' that." Shaking his head, Coach set the stock of his shotgun against his shoulder and gestured toward the hallway off the living room. "Closet in there, ain't there?"

Rochelle nodded, finger slipping onto the trigger of her rifle as she followed his indication. "May be a trap door to the attic."

Moving slowly, they crossed the living room, breaths vaguely held as Rochelle led the way toward the hallway. Coach considered passing her by and taking the lead, but her footsteps had a swift and fierce drive that made him reconsider.

The closet was a few inches askew from the closed bedroom door. Quietly, Rochelle edged up to the door, slipping up to the threshold and reaching out to grip the knob. She glanced over her shoulder to make sure Coach was still with her.

When he nodded, she twisted the door open, glancing into the closet.

There were metal shelves lining the inside of the hall closet, strangely empty but for a couple folded quilts and some boxed-up sports equipment. Light trickled into the small closet from the living room, just the small lamp they'd turned on to keep the house inconspicuous.

The quiet shadow lining a square in the ceiling drew her eye.

Scuff scraaaaatch skitter.

It was louder now. She nodded.

"Yep. Attic." Chocolate-glaze eyes darted back over her shoulder, lifting brows with a slight uncertainty - though not quite hesitance. She shook her head slightly, eyes curious. "What do we do?"

Coach lifted his head slightly. He gazed at the trapdoor built into the ceiling, brows furrowing in a wide crunch. "Should check it out.." he uttered, slowly. That was the obvious option, but there was one problem - there was no way he was getting into the attic. Between his weight and his bad knee, he wouldn't make it.

That left Rochelle.

She must've read the thought on his face, because her jaw suddenly tightened with awareness. Rochelle flashed a hesitant smile, lifting her shoulders. "Lift me up there?"

The big man immediately shook his head in stiff rejection, taking a step back and thumbing over his shoulder. "No chance, babygirl - I'll find a ladder or somethin', go up there myself."

Rochelle reached after him, palm up. Her smile softened, corners lifting as she put her rifle against her shoulder. "Coach, I'm a big girl. C'mon. I'll just hop up on those big strong shoulders of yours and take a peek. Okay?"

Frowning an instant, Coach examined her. A bottled-up kind of affection touched his chest, exhaling deeply in half-amused frustration. "Child, where does yo' ass get off bein' that stubborn? That how yo' parents raised you?"

She beamed a small grin, nudging the air in his direction with a knuckle and giving a little laugh. "Nah, but you've been doing a good job teaching me."

Scuttlescritch.. scuff.
Coach would've laughed if he hadn't been too busy sighing and hanging his head.

Shoving his arm through the strap of his shotgun, Coach edged forward and slipped into the doorway of the closet. He dropped down to a knee, letting his bad one stay slightly straight, and lowered his head. "Go on then."

Giving a gentle pat onto his shoulder before she moved, Rochelle stepped closer to swing a leg over his neck. It was an awkward little scoot that got her seated on his shoulders, wobbling slightly as his height lifted her feet off the ground.

She gave a little "whoa," voice turning slightly serious as Coach gripped her legs just above the knees. His shoulders were wide and strong, though weakened from disuse. There were tangible echoes of a broad-shouldered, youthful football player.

Setting her free hand at the inch or two of shoulder to the side of her left knee, Rochelle lifted her chin, eyeing the ceiling. She pushed her jaw forward slightly, fingers squeezing on his shoulder. Steeling herself with a sigh, she gazed at the attic entrance.

"Okay, papa bear." Rochelle ushered him on, nodding her head. She gripped her rifle tightly with her free hand, gesturing up at the ceiling. "Lift me up."

Sighing reluctantly, Coach tightened his grip on Rochelle's knees and pushed himself up, sturdy as he slowly reached his feet. Rochelle kept her eyes on the ceiling, brows tensing over her eyes as she got closer to the trap door.

It got within arms reach as Coach set his knees to a half bend. She gave a soft "okay," and Coach stillled with a small wobble. His head craned up just a twitch, gazing mistrustfully up at the ceiling as he did.

"Careful, babygirl." he grunted quietly, holding his position steadily. He unhappily watched her raise up her gun, using the end of the barrel to push the trap door up out of its frame.

It didn't have a hinge; it was just a square piece of wood, placed into notches, and she somewhat clumsily got it nudged up and scooted it out of the way. In its absence, there was just a black square of dead air.

Scri-

A noise that had started ended just as fast, freezing to silence. The lack of sound was noisy all on its own, white noise that set her heart to a nervous beat.

She blinked up into the blackness, freezing up a little.

"Hey, do you -"

Without a word, Coach reached down to scoop his flashlight out of his pocket and flick it on. He raised it up, offering it to her, a little soberly. She forced a smile and raised her steadying hand off of his shoulder, taking the flashlight from him with a mumbled, "Thanks."

Straightening her spine, Rochelle stretched her head up closer to the hole in the ceiling, feeling Coach lifting underneath her to help the motion. Directing the flashlight above her head, the woman gave a slightly nervous breath and pecked.

Her face breached the edge of the attic trap door. She trailed a quick gaze around in a circle, tensely quick in the motion to look all around her, desperate to pick out what was making the noise -
- and then she shrieked, "Oh God!"

The flashlight dropped out of her hands so fast it nearly clocked Coach in the head, and her rifle almost followed. She violently arched up her hand to shove against the ceiling, trying to push herself down. "Oh God! Put me down! Coach!"

Dropping instantly to his knee, he reached up and grasped fingers tight in the loose grey T-shirt that had replaced her pink one. Coach dragged her forcefully off his shoulders, getting her as far from the ceiling as possible by practically carrying her to the ground.

She was still gasping out little squeaking curses, limply tumbling down half to the floor as he pulled her fiercely. "Christ -"

"Ro', what?! What, babygirl?! Is it a zombie?" Coach grasped her shoulders, shaking her just a gentle inch, voice fervent. She quickly shook her head, lifting up a hand to roughly rub over her face.

"N-No." she negated, voice giving a little shake. "No. It's a.. it's a body. There's a dead body right.. right there. It.. Its face is blown off. And - there were -" Rochelle might have finished her sentence had a scuffle not sounded above their heads, darting her eyes up. She merely pointed at the open hole in the ceiling.

Coach blinked at her for an instant, jaw setting. He lifted up his chin, gazing at the dark attic to follow her gesture. Slowly, moving like sparkling little termites, a few glittering eyes peeked over the edge of the open hole.

Rats.

One of them, frantic with twitchy curiosity, gripped a tiny, clawed paw onto the edge of the attic doorway and leaned down. Bloody whiskers framed a twitching nose just before it disappeared, darting into the darkness.

Coach slid a hand around her shoulders, comfortingly squeezing her as she closed her eyes. "Alright, babygirl. Breathe, child, you're alright."

Rochelle buried her face quickly in his shoulder for just an instant, trying to regain her composure, then pushed away with a shiver. "I'm okay, Coach. It just startled me, that's all... God. Zombie apocalypse, and I get scared by rats. … I think they're trying to... eat him."

The sharp click of an unlocking door sounded an instant before Nick burst from the bedroom door just on the other side of the hall from them, taking a half-step out to quickly get a lock on where they were. His shirt hung open, the lightly hair-darkened stretch of his chest subtly heaving with honest adrenaline. Green eyes were lit with hostility, burning and fierce, driven by an almost protective anger.

With ever-sharp intonation and a narrowing of harsh pupils, Nick spat out the one thing that - to him - always seemed the best of ways to react to a situation.

"The fuck?"
Chapter 93

Gazing up at the open attic doorway, Nick crossed his good arm over his chest, injured shoulder loose in the joint as his other arm dangled. He tensed his jaw, agitated, dragging his thumb along the fabric of his shirt.

"Rats." he growled. "It had to be shitty rats. Of all the fucking things."

Rochelle stood just at his elbow, hands gripping at the edge of her shirt and curling fingers in it. Her expression was just slightly nervous, and she gave a shake of her head. "Maybe we shouldn't mess with it. We thought it was a zombie, but it's not, so.. let's just.."

The gambler shrugged up his good shoulder, sighing. "I'd like to know they're not mutant zombie rats that'll come down and munch on us when they're done up there." Green eyes flicked over his shoulder, pointedly. "Besides, I'm awake now, thanks to your girly screams."

Huffing, Rochelle thrust up her elbows and glared at him, no small affront lacing her voice. "You try sticking your head up into an attic and getting.. ugh. The body's right by the entrance, I practically touched it."

Rolling his eyes at the disgust on her face, Nick gestured up at the ceiling. "Maybe there's supplies up there we could use, anyway. Guy probably tried to set himself up in there."

"Is it worth it?" she questioned dubiously, nose wrinkling slightly as she looked back up at the open hole.

Nick gave a snort, reaching down to slip his new Magnum from his thigh holster, running his thumb gracefully over the cold metal. "Of course not."

Coach re-emerged from the other half of the house, a folded stepladder gripped in his left hand. He raised it a little in a slow gesture, sighing. "Here, Nick. I hauled babygirl up there on my shoulders, but let's skip that shit."

The gambler flashed a subtle smirk, one fairly unamused. He watched Coach put the stepladder in place, the metal bars creaking unfolded with an unpleasant rattle. "Color me disappointed."

Coach gave him a healthy look of annoyance, stepping back as he got the stepladder set up. Unimpressed, the big man gestured up it, offering Nick the flashlight held in his other hand. "Get yo' ass up there, Nick."

Grumbling airlessly, Nick snatched the light out of his hand - using his bad arm to wield it - as he raised his Magnum up by his cheek, slipping his finger onto the trigger cautiously. He turned to set a foot onto the first step of the ladder, glancing up into the attic.

The flashlight sent a square of off-yellow light shooting up to the arched ceiling of the squat attic, oddly still. If he listened, he could actually hear a rat squeak quietly above his head, startled by the light.

Agitated and scowling, Nick climbed the next two steps in quick succession, his head and shoulders breachin the attic doorway all in one fierce surge. The flashlight gripped by his other hand was only slightly helpful, as it seemed to scatter more shadows than it lit up.

There must've been nine or ten rats all gathered around him in this cultish mob, blood and dust turning their brown-flecked fur a matted black. Glittering eyes all turned on him at once, anxious energy flicking tails and whiskers in strange patterns that communicated feral hunger.

Oh fuck me.

Nick took his flashlight and swung it at them, light-first, like it were a torch.

Grim satisfaction touched his expression as the rat horde burst into terrified squeaks and scattered like so many ants. They disappeared into the darkness and the nooks and crannies of a dusty attic.

"Mutant zombie rats my ass." he announced back down to Coach and Rochelle, smirking. He heard Rochelle sigh, in a mix of relief and annoyance, and he reached up his good arm to hook it on the edge of the trap door.

Grunting carefully, Nick forced his other arm up, too, getting a grip on the square hole. Pain arched through his shoulder as he pushed, and a small noise of discomfort escaped him, starting to haul himself through.

He felt Coach grip his ankles from the ground, pushing up to help, and between them Nick got himself wormed up into the attic. He went doubled over on the edge, weightless, then kicked up to shove himself the rest of the way.

"Agh." he muttered in self-sympathy, twisting around to sit on the floor, legs still dangled. He'd just started to straighten out his clothing, nursing his shoulder a bit, when he noticed what was across from him on the other side of the attic entrance.

A man laid face-up on the floor, his chin cocked up so fiercely it was like he'd snapped his neck. A bullet hole was messily gouged through the center of his face, shattering bone and scattering flesh.

He must've shot into the roof of his mouth in the hopes of a quick suicide, but panicked or lost the nerve. It had fired through his nose and eyes, not through the back of his head like it should have. The result was a horrifying mess of disfigured features.

Nick screwed his face up in disgust, directing his flashlight at the ruined visage looking him dead-on. Bone, teeth, skin, and the weird bulge of bloodshot eyes half-out of their sockets made him barely recognizable as human.

The rat's work had gnawed deep into meaty skin, and the gambler could actually pick out teethmarks scraped along the white plates of a bared cheekbone.

"Chrissakes." he muttered privately, wiping a wrist over his mouth as if to stop himself from inhaling the gory air. "Guy shot himself." he announced down, sliding his legs up into the attic space carefully.

Getting his feet under himself, he scanned his flashlight up onto the ceiling. Blood and speckles of white splattered the wood panels above the body. "Yeah. Guess we can be glad the rats didn't kill him." Rochelle mumbled from below. "Anything else?"

Nick shrugged slightly, turning around to scan the attic. "Let me look." His heartbeat was a steady, but quick, thumping in his chest, muted by the conscious denial that there was anything to fear.

"Be careful, sweetheart." Rochelle warned softly.

There was very little there - some wadded-up insulation in one corner, turned into a nest by the rats that had now returned to it, the pink cotton twitching and shifting. On the other side, there was a blanket centered along that wall, swaddled into a small circle like a bed.

A notebook sat open in the middle of the blanket, a few candles long-burnt out on small plates around it, one of which sat next to a radio that seemed the focal point of the tiny camp.

There was a pile of food trash in the corner, shoved as far away as possible, and the smell of souring preservatives hung like a smog in the air. Bottles of water lined the walls here and there, some empty, some full - and some dark with a musky yellow liquid Nick refused to consider for long.

He would've completely turned around and just gone right back downstairs, had his flashlight not flickered over the lonely shape of a woman lying limp in the other corner of the attic.

"Shit." he uttered, going stiff. It wasn't a Witch - there was no sobbing, no emaciated bones jutting out at odd angles.

Her pale body was dressed only in a string bikini, upper body covered by a T-shirt that was far too large for her and stained by blood and black, crusting dribbles. She was utterly still, slumped against the wall.

Was she dead? He couldn't tell.

One of her arms was stretched up, bent awkwardly at the elbow to arch her forearm up into the air. She was tied by the wrist to a post against the wall, a bloodied belt binding her with a force that had reddened and swollen her fingers.

Clawmarks gouged into her forearm and the base of her hand, like she'd tried to claw the bound limb off - like an animal chewing through a trapped leg.

Nick could only utter, "Shiiiiit."

"Nick?" Rochelle called up, maybe hearing his curses or maybe not hearing anything at all. "Hey, suit, how's it going up there?"

The gambler approached one step at a time, moving slow and easy, gaze fixed on the corpse suspiciously. As he drew closer, a strange noise breached his consciousness - the radio wasn't dead. It was on, at a soft volume that just barely reached him.

Nudged.

... nothing...

Then she vaulted suddenly up, moving like a person possessed, a shriek of rage escaping her full-force as she snapped toward him. She reached the end of her bound arm like a dog reaching the end of its leash, an audible crack sounding from her shoulder as she jerked against her bonds.

A pale face was gaunt with illness and lined by stringy brown hair, eyes lit to a gleaming yellow, and she gnashed bloody teeth with spittle and trickling black vomit trailing from her mouth at every breath.

Nick shouted out of surprise, immediately cracking off a shot from his Magnum. The sound boomed in the claustrophobic attic, ringing in his ears and echoing through the floor. He missed her head, though, as surprise had him staggering backwards - and stepping directly onto an emboldened rat, its squeak cut off as he crushed it underfoot.

The slip of blood had him tripping back onto his rear on the attic floor, swearing fiercely. "Fuckin'!

The bullet pierced her shoulder, whizzing into the wall behind her, but she didn't so much as twitch as flesh and blood sprayed with the hit. Snarling and screaming, the infected woman jerked and yanked at her bound wrist, legs going akimbo with her desperation.

He was vaguely aware of Rochelle shouting, scuffling announcing her immediate vaulting up the stepladder to come after him. He didn't bother to look over, staring instead at the woman seizing before him, as he re-aimed his flashlight to pour light over her struggle.

It was mesmerizing - pure feral hunger, absolutely incoherent. No ability to register anything but her target, and what was keeping her from her target.

The light only seemed to enrage her further.

She started to wheel around, free hand going for her bound wrist. Fingernails dug into flesh, tearing skin out by the inch, and she ducked forward to bury her teeth into the side of her hand, gnashing on the tied-up limb with a gurgling scream as her own blood pooled into her mouth.

Rochelle clambered up with a sudden clatter and tumble, rifle raising to protrude defensively in front of herself as she messily shoved her body up into the attic. "Nick, are you -" and then she saw the zombie, starting, brows shooting up as her eyes took in the woman.

"Holy - We're okay, Coach! We're okay!" Her voice was a little frantic, approaching in a side-step to get closer to Nick. Brown eyes, black in the darkness, flicked toward him, worriedly. "You alright, suit? She didn't get you or anything, did she?"

Nick shook his head in short order, lifting his Magnum to gesture at the bound infected. She gave a shriek of anger, twisting her body violently and clawing out her free hand, blood trickling down her fingers and bloodied teeth bared in rage. "Not a chance. I got her in the shoulder, but I don't think it did much."

Rochelle stared at the woman worriedly, finger still on the trigger of her rifle, not relaxing in the slightest. Her arm was tense with the urge to shoot, but something about the woman's helplessness.. the vulnerability of her bindings..

She was a snarling, rage-embroiled beast, but her body and her face were too close to human to dull the resemblance.

"Whut's goin' on?! 'Ey, whut's happenin'?! Guys!!"

Ellis' voice mewled from downstairs, his voice staggered as walking must've been beyond painful. Concern poured from his voice, almost scared. Coach's rough baritone instantly spoke up, too low and gruff to really be understood, moving away from them as he must've started herding the kid back to bed.

Fully aware he'd fight without confirmation they were okay beyond Coach's word, Nick twisted his head, calling with a fierce tone. "Lay back down, dumbshit."

The ruckus downstairs quieted.

Nick and Rochelle re-focused on the woman, cautiously. She'd returned to trying to gnaw through her wrist, little pained growls and snarls bubbling through her teeth and blackened blood poured down her arm in crusty layers. She chewed against bone she'd begun to bare, the sound awful and grating.

He was the one to suggest it, voice firmed with a confident tension. "Should we kill her?"

Rochelle gave an awkward half-shrug, forcing a nod as she raised up her rifle, aiming carefully at the woman's face. "Yeah.. I guess. She's completely gone."

The zombie snapped her face back forward, suddenly locking sights on Rochelle's gun, like she was aware of her impending doom. The fact seemed to balk Rochelle, uncertainly fingering the trigger.

In an instant, Nick lifted his Magnum and buried a bullet straight into the center of the zombie woman's head. She snapped back, collapsing against the wall, going silent and still all in one sharp motion. Her yellow eyes fell to a dull glow.

Rochelle jumped, but only slightly, lowering her rifle with a slow blink. She glanced at Nick, chin dropping. "... thanks." she managed softly. He responded with a minor smirk, slipping his Magnum back into the holster at his thigh.

He stood up with a careful motion, mindful to step over the crushed rat just in front of him. Rochelle reached out to put a hand under his elbow and help him up, assistance he accepted without acknowledging it.

Laying his hand on his injured shoulder, Nick turned to face the swaddled-up blanket, using his other hand to aim the flashlight. He approached with cautious footsteps, immediately bending down to shut the radio off and stop the incessant crackling. The notebook caught his attention next, and with a small grunt, he dropped to a knee next to the camplike nest.

Rochelle slipped up behind him as he scooped up the notebook. It was open to a page, the writing scrawled in messy clumps down the face of the page with a pencil. Tipping his flashlight onto the paper, he focused on working out what it said, ignoring the woman bending down to read over his shoulder.
Flicking backwards with his thumb, Nick noted there were entries before it - a few just as broken and incoherent, slowly growing neater and more sensible until he reached empty pages and stopped.

He only glanced over the other entries before shutting the book, disgust wrinkling his nose. Rochelle seemed slightly startled when he did, straightening up, her expression sober as she turned her chin to glance over the attic room.

"They must've locked themselves up in here.. tried to hide." she murmured, wiping her wrist against her mouth slowly. "Poor things.."

Nick laughed, getting to his feet. He tossed the notebook onto the blankets, abandoning it like so much trash, and gave a one-shouldered shrug at her. "Poor cheating fuckers, you mean. Our zombie friend over there was definitely not his wife."

Rochelle gave him a slight frown, crossing her arms over her chest tightly. "The guy's dead, Nick.. him being a cheater's probably the last thing we should be thinking about. Can't imagine you were the type to be faithful, either."

She said it offhandedly - but it left a bruise. Nick just smirked at her hollowly, grim face only half-lit by his flashlight, and gestured for her to move. A strand of dark hair fell onto his forehead in a subtle curl.

"There's nothing up here. Just bodies and rats. Let's go. We'll lock it up and forget about it." His voice cut, something dark touching his gaze. Rochelle backed up a little, nodding quickly in faintly apologetic hurry. She hadn't meant to hurt him - hadn't expected it to.

Nick slipped past her, using his flashlight to make sure his footsteps were clear of rats. The vermin had started to wander back out, hungry. He approached the attic entrance, starting to crouch down and begin the descent.

Standing there, gripping her biceps, Rochelle called gently after him. "I cheated on Jacob once, you know, Nick.. he didn't deserve it, no matter what he'd done to drive me to it." Rochelle shook her head, chewing at her lower lip, regretfully. "I don't claim to be perfect.. I didn't mean.. I'm sorry."
As one foot slipped over the edge, Nick stopped.

Green eyes flicked up, then over his shoulder, gazing back toward Rochelle. He flashed a smirk, unamused, and shook his head. Slowly, as if she were so wrong he could only laugh at her. "Want to know something funny?"

She blinked at him gently, questioningly.

His voice lowered. It was just a growl in the stale air. "The first time I ever cheated on my ex, I actually confessed it to her the next day. Told her I didn't know how to stop myself. I even said I wouldn't mind if she left me for it, because I knew I'd never get better, and she deserved better. You know what she did?"

A tiny shake of her head tried to encourage him, gentle, Rochelle's fingers lacing together softly.

"Batted those stupid fucking doe-eyes at me. Said 'Sorry, were we not supposed to?'"

A sharp and derisive snort left the gambler, and in one swift motion, he jostled his hips to swing himself down out of the attic, reaching feet onto the stepladder. He disappeared downstairs all in one flash of blue and a restrained swear.

"Bitch."

Rochelle gazed after him for a moment, sympathy straining at her expression as she frowned. It was probably that very sympathy that Nick so quickly left to avoid seeing. The sobering reality of that thought had Rochelle sighing her expression flat after an instant.

She turned around on an impulse, bending down gently and snatching the notebook up. She tucked it into the waistband of her jeans, pulling her shirt over it as if to hide it. Rochelle had no idea where the urge had come from, all she knew was she wanted the journal.

The ring-bound paperback notebook was cold against her stomach as she hurried after Nick, not eager to be alone in the attic.
"I'm so glad you're okay!"

Rochelle's attention was almost overwhelming as she doted over Ellis' form, cupping hands on his cheeks and nuzzling her nose to his in a fervent gesture. He laughed helplessly, wincing and flinching as the laughter seized his chest up, but undaunted.

"You had us so worried. I can't tell you how hard it is to see you this hurt!"

Ellis reached up his hands, weak fingers clasping over hers on his face, and grinned - huge and brilliant under all the affection. It was the kind of smile that melted icebergs. "Girl, c'mon. Like a li'l beatin's gonna stop me. Just need some rest is all."

Nick stood at the foot of the bed, arms crossed over his stomach. His shirt was rebuttoned, but only half tucked into his slacks, and his expression was indifferent as he looked on. It was easy to distance himself when the 'reunion' was the second time he'd seen Ellis up and aware - not that he wouldn't've played calloused and uncaring regardless.

Coach approached the bedside a bit forcefully, managing to wedge himself close enough to offer a hand to Ellis. The kid's grin softened, craning his head as he stretched out his hand to clasp Coach's, their fingers curling over the other's palm in a playful kind of handshake.

"Good to see you up an' talkin', son. Had us worried." he gruffed affectionately, brow crunching up as he gave a smile, teeth showing with honest emotion.

Ellis gave a smile and somewhat tiredly laid his head against the pillow underneath it, letting his hand slip to touch his chest and graze over the shape of his ribcage. "Nah, man... just glad y'all're okay, too. Man. I ain't never gonna leave y'all like that again!" He shook his head gently, a soft sigh escaping his lips as his shoulders nestled into the mattress.

A sarcastic snort grunted out of Nick's throat, brows arching as he returned somewhat lowly, "Damn. I liked the break."

Despite the fact Ellis grinned weakly, unaffected by the statement, Coach flashed Nick a dark glance anyway, shaking his head. "Can't bullshit that one, boy. Ro' an' I saw yo' ass freakin' out, same as us." It earned him a long stare from irked green eyes, the big man confidently returning it.

The two probably would've launched into a full-scale war had Rochelle not loudly spoken up, smiling warmly at Ellis from where she sat beside his hip on the mattress. "That must've been the stupidest, greatest plan I've ever seen play out." She leaned forward, eyes almost rapt on Ellis' face as he broke into a tiny blush. "What even made you think to do that?"

He chuckled, voice softening as he relaxed into the boneless exhaustion of his body. "Well, I dunno. Just heard them Witches all cryin', 'n'I remembered how Nick ran into that one who done got distracted by all that sugar, remember?"

Nick's jaw set, chin raising as a brow arched in disbelief. "Aw, I'm inspiration." he stuck in, tone mocking.

Ellis continued as if he hadn't even heard him, though the edges of his plump-lipped mouth quirked up in a tiny grin. "Just sorta got the idea, 'cause there was this li'l store real close by. All happened real quick."
Putting her hands into an open-palmed gesture to urge him on, Rochelle hummed in a little half-sympathetic, half-impressed swoon, intentionally trying to pump up his ego. "Just like that? I'm just amazed you came up with it so fast, and under all that pressure."

Embarrassed, Ellis quickly - in that 'aw shucks' fashion that came so naturally to his sweetened tone - shook the praise off, raising a hand to gently scratch fingertips underneath his cap. "It ain't nothin', Ro'. You hear 'bout folks all the time doin' real crazy shit tuh save the folks they love'n'such. I was just tryin' tuh protect y'all, that's all."

Coach crossed his arms, grinning lightly. His voice was a bit skeptical - but playfully so. "How'd you know it was gonna work?" he questioned, brow crunching up over his shaded eyes. "We didn't know it attracted 'em like that."

Ellis raised up his shoulders tenderly, chuckling a little with a lowered chin. "Risk worth the takin' - I had tuh do somethin'. Yuh don't always know things'll work, but you don't get nowhere not testin' 'em out. Learned that from Keith. 'Course, he also gets himself junked up doin' that, so."

"Certainly saved our butts." Rochelle grinned, reaching down to brush knuckles against his cheek. "Ellis, my hero!"

His tiny blush turned to a full-scale redness, grinning hugely as he rolled his chin away with a mumbled protest. He gently scratched at his neck, blinking slowly. "I just wanted tuh get y'all safe, that's all. 'N' hey, now we know how tuh get around them Witches if we need!"

Coach chuckled, tightening the cross of his arms and glancing down at his shoes. "Well, if sugar attracts 'em, too, I ain't keepin' that shit on me. Fo' sho'."

A snort escaped Nick, glancing at the eldest with an arching brow and lowering shoulders. He spoke with the utmost sarcasm, rolling his eyes up sharply. "Apocalypse warriors - a gun in one hand, a bag of sugar in the other."

Breaking into sudden half-giggles, Ellis slipped his hands underneath his head, arms crooking to nestle his head into them. "Hoh man. I was pretty damn badass, wasn't I?"

The gambler took a slight step back to let his posture fall to an idle swagger, retorting, "That wasn't exactly what I meant." He'd have continued had Rochelle not clapped her hands on her thighs gently, straightening where she sat.

"Okay, okay. Enough chatter, boys. You two - " she thumbed at Nick and Coach, both stiffening at the gesture like guilty schoolboys. "- shoo. I'll check him out and figure out what kind of injuries we're dealing with."

Both of the men seemed ready to argue, though their reasons were most likely different, but Rochelle was on her feet and chasing them out before they could get a word in edgewise. "Out, out." she commanded, urging with her hands to get them out of the bedroom.

Coach obeyed somewhat easily, but Nick tried to turn back at the last instant and snap at her. Rochelle whacked at his bicep sharply, voice demanding but grin gentle. "Keep moving, asshole."

Nick just muttered a curse and stormed out.

Sighing softly, Rochelle closed the door, turning back to smile at Ellis, the hick in the midst of gingerly trying to sit up in bed. "You okay, sweetheart?"

He nodded eagerly, smiling gently back. "Yeah. I mean, it hurts, but not so bad." Lifting his hand, he pressed it cautiously to his chest. "Worried I broke somethin', though... hurts tuh breathe, 'n'move'n'such." A little chuckle, then cough, expression sobering, punctuated the statement.

She gave a nod of sympathy, approaching, settling down on the edge of the bed gently. "Okay, sweetie. I'm gonna try and figure that out. Shirt off for me?"

At the words, Ellis immediately turned an interesting shade of red, suddenly crossing his arms over his chest like the protective clasp of a shirtless girl. "U-uh - I'm fine, Ro'. You ain't gotta do nothin'." She arched a brow. "I just need rest is all."

"Oh, sweetie." She sighed gently, lifting a hand to rub fingertips at the bridge of her nose in slight, creeping exasperation. "I've seen men shirtless before. I'm sure you're very impressive, but it's nothing I haven't experienced before."

Ellis' blush darkened, spreading over his cheeks and lighting his ears at the tips. "Um. Naw, I ain't - well, okay.. I'm a li'l shy, but - that ain't.. it.. exactly."

Rochelle arched up her brows, expectantly, cocking her head. She smiled with simplistic affection, amused at his struggle. "Yes, sweetie?"

Voice getting even lower, Ellis whispered nervously, gaze flickering anywhere but Rochelle's face as his expression struggled in and out of a look of mortification. "W-well.. Nick sorta.. y'know, I woke up, 'n' - 'n'we kinda - Well, he sorta left'uh.. li'l.."

He barely even ghosted the word; ".hickey."

Sighing slightly, Rochelle lowered her chin, smile turning wide with a certain exasperated humor. She tried to control her voice and keep it fairly level, coaxing him in a confiding whisper. "I already know about you two, it's not like I'm gonna be surprised. I just want to look at your side, okay?"

Ellis' face was beet red, completely horrified - an expression that was excruciatingly cute on his face - as he scooted reluctantly and carefully back against the headboard to sit up. "If it'll make you feel better, I won't even say anything." she promised.

He moved with a hurried embarrassment, silent now, trying to get it over with as fast as he could. Gripping fingers onto the edge of his shirt, he worked it up his torso without moving his body too much, frowning. As the shirt pulled up over his head and he crumpled it up to lay it in his lap, baring bruised and battered skin, Rochelle's eyes widened.

First in sympathy, then in shock. The full weight of Ellis' injury struck her, the puddled colors over his chest and the angry shading along a visibly tender rib. "Oh, Ellis -" she started to gasp, frowning in genuine horror at the bruising on his sternum - and then she saw what had stirred his embarrassment.

Just along the edge of his left nipple, tracing the circle of delicate, darkened skin, was the obvious pink shadow of a hickey. The skin was flushed softly from the attentions of a careful mouth, innocently pink colored compared to the dark purples and blues of Ellis' injuries.

Rochelle collapsed into a wholehearted burst of laughter, utterly surprised.

Ellis' brows went shooting into a crunch, lower lip dragging out in a horrified pout as his blush burned on his face. "Ro'! Oh muh - Ro'! I knew I shoulda just -" He yanked his shirt back up against his chest protectively to hide himself, ears bright red and voice stuttered. "Q-quit laughin'!"
She tried - ineffectually - to stop herself, putting her hands up in quick defense, waving fingers a little. "I-I'm sorry! It just caught me offguard, that's all. I thought you meant.. on your neck or something, not - oh jeez.." Rochelle started to lose it again, lips twitching as she tried her best to stop the restrained laughter that escaped her between words. "God, we were out there worrying about you, and Nick was in here -"

"C'mon! C'mon, Ro'.." The Georgian frowned heavily, posture beyond mortified. He shifted the shirt against his chest, trying to cover himself even more. "Just ferget 'bout it, will yuh..? I'm embarrassed enough already..

Nodding quickly, Rochelle forced a smile to help stifle her laughter, reaching down hands to pat his leg gently. "Right, right. I'm sorry. I'll stop." She dropped her chin a little, smiling at him soothingly. "Okay?"

Slowly, with visible embarrassed reluctance, Ellis lowered the shirt to his lap, frowning heavily as he let his shoulders relax. He huffed out stuffily, blinking, "Okay."

She grinned at him affectionately, scooting forward softly and leaning down to get a look at his bruises, speaking quietly. "Sorry, sweetheart… Just… as long as he didn't make you hurt yourself. You were supposed to be resting. Lech."

Biting her lower lip to further fight her smile, Rochelle focused on his injuries. She gently traced the line of his rib, feeling along the bone and palpating the section in the hopes of understanding the injury. It felt in one piece to her, nothing moving or shifting out of place.

Break or not, the touch erased any lingering blush from Ellis' face. "Aah - ooww.\" she whined, rolling his head back as pain fluttered over his expression, weight shifting. She pulled back immediately, frown deepening as she flexed her fingers, sighing.

"Can you breathe deep?"

He obeyed, reluctantly, taking a large and slow breath that expanded his chest. He winced near the tail-end, but nodded, exhaling with a smack of his lips. "Yeah… Don't feel nice, but it ain't bad."

She nodded. "I don't think it's broken, but it's definitely not good. Maybe it cracked under all the stress from this." Raising a hand to touch onto his breastbone, she examined the bruising on his chest, so tangibly in a bootprint shape. Rochelle didn't say anything, though - not a word.

There was no use in questioning it, anyway. She figured what it was from.

"Does it hurt here, too?" she asked gently, tenderly tracing the bruising. The bruising was a little more even and lighter than on his side, but worry still dragged her expression down.

The Georgian shook his head slightly, eyes lowered to look over her hand. "Not too bad.. just when I breathe, it kinda tenses up funny-like. Sorta hurts, 'specially when I move, but it ain't awful or nothin'."

She nodded, rubbing her jaw with her thumb carefully as her other hand lingered on the bruise, unhappily gazing over his torso. "Wonder what we could do to help it heal.\" she murmured to herself.

The examination made him fidget slightly, self-conscious, and a nervous chuckle escaped him. "I ever tell you 'bout the time muh buddy Keith tried tuh skate up the side of a tree?"

Smiling gently, Rochelle let herself laugh. "Haven't heard that one.\" She shifted, turning her waist and letting herself settle a little bit against the headboard beside him. He adjusted with a little grunt to accommodate her, slipping an arm over her shoulders and settling her against his side.

Turning his chin, Ellis let his cheek set against her shoulder. He closed his eyes, glad to change the subject - and gladder to be talking about something. "Thing was, he'd been watchin' too many cartoons... he was only like thirteen, mind... 'n'he got all convinced gravity didn't really matter so long's you were goin' fast 'nough."

Her brows raised, already sensing trouble.

"So, he takes this skateboard, right? From his bro' - 'cause before Paul got kinda big he skated all the time.. so he takes it'n'convinces me to help push him down this hill. We get him aimed real careful at a tree. He didn't know how tuh skate, really, y'know."

Ellis bobbed his head gently, gesturing with the pinky of his other hand. "We got all the way up tuh the top'uh this hill, he gets on the skateboard.. I start pushin' him, 'n'he starts goin' down. He's yellin'n'flailin' his arms, barely stayin' on the darn thing. Picks up speed faster than a cat whut's got his tail on fire."

There was a little pause.

".. that's another story, too. The cat was okay, though."

Rochelle resisted the urge to grin, tipping her head into the nook of his arm and closing her eyes.

"Anyway, turns out gravity don't much care how fast yer goin'. He didn't go up the tree - went straight into it. Doctor said if he'd been goin' much faster, he'd'uh died. He had splinters over ninety-five percent'uh his body. All the nasty places, too! Broke like two ribs."

Cringing in sympathy, Ellis lifted up his chin to gaze at the ceiling, grinning with a little cough as his chest gave an ache. "Anyway, moral'uv the story is, he didn't get no cast or nothin'. They said there weren't no way tuh bandage up ribs, 'n'it actually made it worse or somethin'. Keith was supposed tuh stay outta trouble while he healed up. 'Course he didn't, but.. y'know."

The woman gave a laugh, shaking her head. She reached a hand to touch at the bruises along his rib, musingly, expression now thoughtful. "Guess that means you're due for some bed rest. Imagine we can hole up here while we figure everything out."

Ellis gave her a little blink, head cocking as he aptly noticed the phrasing. "Is somethin' up..? Thought we was gettin' tuh the shore to signal CEDA, like we been plannin'."

Rochelle's voice wavered a little, not wholly certain. She quickly smiled and shifted forward, crawling out from the embrace to get up to her feet gently. "Of course, honey, don't worry about it." she soothed, like a parent to a child who'd just noticed they were upset. "You just focus on resting."

The kid frowned. He wasn't stupid - but he didn't want to push her, either. He was too tired to press the issue. "'Kay, Ro'. Just lemme know if somethin's up, alright?"

She smiled at him, reaching over to cup a hand on his cheek. She petted her thumb on his cheekbone, brows softening. "I'll try and get Nick back in here, okay?" she whispered with a little wink.

Ellis broke into a muted blush, quickly ducking away from her and sighing out an exasperated, "Ro'..."
With a laugh, she pulled away. "Sorry, sorry.." she said, though her expression was far from apologetic. Moving toward the door and opening it to retreat outside, Rochelle only stopped when Ellis chirped after her.

"Hey, Ro'..?"

She glanced back, raising a brow expectantly.

Ellis smiled maybe a little shyly, the tiny quirk brilliant on the bashfully dipped plane of his face, shaded by the bill of his cap. "... Was he really freakin' out when y'all weren't sure where I was?"

Rochelle's quick grin before she closed the door was more than answer enough.
Chapter 95

Nick frowned heavily, fingertips tapping on his thighs as he stood leaned against the kitchen wall. His shoulder ached, sore and abused, and he felt uneasy irritation flooding his system.

Maybe he didn't like someone else taking care of Ellis. It was a stupid kind of possessiveness, agitated at being chased out from what he'd claimed as his post. Now he stood stiffly waiting, silently boring holes in the opposite wall with his gaze.

It was made even worse by the fact he knew he'd left a mark on Ellis' chest. Ellis was an awful liar. He could only hope Rochelle didn't notice amidst all the other bruising... or that the hickey, light as it was, had faded already.

He should've known better than to put a mark on him like that, but it was too late to more than distantly chide himself for letting himself get so lost in the moment. It had just happened; teething and sucking pleasure out of the kid.

And Ellis' reactions had been worth it.

Nick struggled with the images floating to the surface in his mind's eye, so vivid he could still recall every single detail. It was a dreamy reality in his head, punctuated by the soft echo of how Ellis' voice had buckled into whimpers and heated puffs in the air.

Maybe Ellis had messed around with girlfriends and cuddled, kissed - but Nick was the first one to take him, pin him down and thrust into the warm space of his body till neither of them could breathe. Ellis took every gesture and touch like it was a new, aweing experience.

It was ... nice.

The kid may not have known how to fuck, but he was learning - and his body was raw and tantalizing perfection. Tight ass, soft skin. Rough, tactile hands. Lean, tapered hips that fit perfectly into Nick's grip.

Worked masculinity built into the strength of his arms and chest, an active and young body, eager to please and enjoy and blossom under the attention.. Bright, innocent eyes, quick to haze with flattering ecstasy. An honest and reactive voice that confided more truth in a gasp than most of Nick's lovers had in the whole of his life.

And then there were his lips.

_The Holy Grail of Georgia, I fucking swear._

Every time they parted with that warm, pinkened softness to utter a breath, or a quiet little 'Nick,' the gambler felt the urge to drag him to his knees and get fingers in his hair.. pull his chin up, catch those blue eyes..

Nick didn't realize how deeply entrenched he was in that train of thought until a sudden tight pulse in his gut suddenly warned him he was dangerously risking setting his body off.

_Teaches me to skip getting off. Fuck, I need to stop thinking._

He gave a tight grunt, furrowing his brows in slight annoyance at the easy interest of his body. A tiny, fastidious motion had him brush a thumbtip at the edge of his mouth as if half-convinced he'd find a spot of drool. Fantasizing was a pleasant way to distract himself, but he should've had more self-control.

It was a bad time. A hard-on would've been a bit troublesome with Coach just across the room.

As if sensing the acknowledgement of his existence in Nick's posture, the big man suddenly stirred on the living room sofa, glancing at him. Sleepy brown eyes took a firmly alert gaze over his expression, one brow lifting.

"You a'ight, Nick?" he questioned across the room, voice rough and pointed.

"Mnh." was the gambler's quiet response, shifting his position and raising a hand to clasp over his shoulder. The light pressure of his fingers against his wound set violent vibrations of pain through him, the discomfort and Coach's attention dulling any sense of arousal. "Just thinking."

Chuckling, Coach slipped an arm to rest over the back of the couch, fisting his hand. His body gave a slight shift, the sizeable width of his gut relaxing into a slump. "I get worried when you start thinkin', boy."

Nick sent him an irked glance, though his mouth was quirked in a minute smirk. The pain had his jaw taut, hiding it behind a tight mask.

"What 'bout, then?"

The conman shrugged, lowering his head and letting his fingers spread on his shoulder to slowly feel along the square of his bandage. "Nothing important." Coach's snort suggested he figured otherwise, but he didn't argue - just turned away and closed his eyes, head slowly shaking.

Coach let the silence sit for a moment, then breached it again. "What was it y'all found up there, anyway? I got an idea but wit' Ellis wakin' up, didn't have no time to talk 'bout it."

That made Nick laugh, a short burst of humor that turned his voice to a sour tone afterward. "Nothing important, again. Some guy and his mistress hid up there to keep safe. She got sick somehow and started turning, he tied her up... Being a dumbfuck, he promptly got too close and got bit. Guy killed himself out of fear, I guess."

A frown edged Coach's face, sighing deeply with the kind of nod that indicates he'd expected what he heard. "Guess y'all ran into the woman up there, still tied up?"

"Yeah." Nick nodded simply, letting his hand drop off his shoulder and loosely crossing his arms over his chest instead. "Just glad she didn't turn into a Witch or something. I gave her a bullet to gnaw on."

Coach's legs shifted, letting his knees straighten out a little. He seemed to wince, glancing at his bum knee and focusing his gaze there. "How'd y'all know so much? Ain't like the zombie told you. An' you're smart, but not that smart."

Nick gave a slight scoff, rolling his eyes up in a small motion. He took offense, but didn't rise to the occasion. "There was a journal." He let himself shrug, one-shouldered. "Dying message bullshit.. apologizing to his wife, all that shit."

The eldest's reaction was little more than a grunt, but he did rub his cheek, idly speaking after a moment. "May be somethin' useful in it."

Mouth dropping into a frown, Nick arched up a brow and made a slight gesture with his hands, throwing them up in the air dismissively. "What, look forward to reading some idiot bitching about his zombie girlfriend?"

Coach chuckled softly as he spoke, shaking his head and resting an arm over his stomach, fingers draping down in a limp gesture. "Nah. But I figure we need as good a feel fo' what's goin' on as we can get. Might have somethin' useful in there about CEDA or the military, what they were doin'."

Slowly crossing his arms, Nick let that one roll around in his head for a moment. Cocking his jaw forward, he chewed on the soft flesh of the inside of his cheek, lids lowering in faint thought. "You're not going to hear an argument from me about not trusting that bunch.. guess you have a point." He noticed Coach start grinning, and raised his voice sharply. "I guess."

"Sho' sho', Nick. Where'd it go?" the big man questioned, mouth still drawn in a grin.

Nick smirked right back, smugly, taking a pleasant dose of enjoyment out of shooting him down with what may as well have been a threat. Like hell he was going back to get it.

"Left it in the attic."

Coach had just started to sigh, raising a hand toward his face as if to palm down the length of it in exasperation, when the soft creak of Ellis' door opening interrupted him. Both of them twisted to gaze at the hallway, silent in attentive expectation as Rochelle slipped out into the living room, arms crossed over her stomach.

She glanced at both of them, then forced a tired smile, her unpainted lips a bit scuffed from dehydration and nibbling. "He's okay. His rib looks pretty bad - I think he cracked it, but it's still in one piece. Bruised up and it hurts him. He's got a big bruise on his chest, too." She mimed out a soft patting onto her breastbone. "He's breathing okay, just painfully. I think he needs rest. And meds."

Nick held stiff, only a small shrug shifting his shoulders as a response. His eyes had the subtlest of glazes over them, some mix of distant and frustrated.

Coach gave a wholehearted sigh and nodded his head, rubbing carefully along the rounded, gray-stubbled shape of his jawline. "Sounds 'bout right. Y'all got any idea what kicked the shit outta him so hard?"

One single word escaped the gambler - "Jerry." There wasn't enough substance to it to convey any kind of emotion, but his eyes gained a private, viper-green flicker of angered venom. It dissipated almost as soon as it thundered into his irises, reined in with a deep breath and forced control.

Rochelle nodded in agreement, crossing her arms over her stomach and raising a hand. She rubbed gently along the lower edge of her lip, eyes closing. "Yeah, I thought so, but I didn't want to ask about it."

"Shit ain't right." Coach grunted, a finger starting a slow thump on his stomach in agitation. "Really gets under my skin, seein' him hurt like that. Just ain't right."

Sighing, Rochelle shifted onto one leg, hip cocking a little. She let her chin lower and brows lift, voice soft. "I'm just glad he's okay. He'll be hurt for a while yet, but I don't think it's anything serious. We just have to keep him down."

With a nod, Coach glanced up at the ceiling, gaze getting distant for a moment. "Mmhm. Had a few boys in my team who got some rib injuries before.. rest'll do it an' not much else. Wish we could get some ice."
Coach's voice dropped - suddenly - questioning, "Wonder if he's a'ight wit' havin' killed the man. Can't imagine the boy's used to it..."

"He didn't." Nick spat, shortly. His fingers flexed vaguely, lids lowering. The two flicked their attentions toward him, alertly. He didn't really care - they could look at him as much as they wanted. It was already done. "I did."

With a frown that was more unsure than anything else, Rochelle focused close onto his face, shaking her head a little. Her expression was uncomprehending. "You were with us. How-"

"I slipped a block into his shotgun before we left, as insurance." Nick stated, hands raising to straighten his dress shirt slightly. "When he tried to shoot Overalls - like he must have - it probably blew up in his face and killed him."

There was a moment of silence. It was thoughtful, absorbing the new information, and Rochelle seemed to reflexively grip onto the edge of her shirt and wring out the fabric between her fingertips.

"Is that why you wandered off at the hotel...?" Her gaze lifted up, meeting Nick's. The conman barely even reacted at first, a stiff shell holding his expression in blank honesty, but he noticed something. Under the understandable surprise... her face was soft.

There was no doubt. No accusation, no judgment - she understood what he'd done and it didn't upset her. There was only a kind of sadness.

It wasn't like he needed their approval - he'd done what he'd done and nothing would change it, let alone convince him he regretted it. But something intangible relaxed in his chest, like the lowering hackles of an animal.

He nodded.

Coach settled a hand on his knee firmly. He shrugged up his shoulders, nodding firmly with a deep sigh. "Did a good thing, Nick. Chances are today would'a gone different otherwise."

Rochelle gave a little nod, flicking a glance at Coach and raising a hand to rub at her chin as she offered the gambler a faint smile.

Nick shrugged up his good shoulder, a breath exhaling with a slightly resigned edge. He raised a hand, clasping his palm over his injured one, a skin-tingling pain fluttering freely at the touch. "I'm just that good." he muttered sardonically.

"You gonna tell him?" Coach questioned, rubbing his knee slowly as he crunched up his brow. "Boy might be blamin' himself. Can't expect him to handle it real well."

The gambler crossed his arms, snorting as he lifted his gaze to the ceiling. "If he mentions it, sure. But I'm not about to bring it up. Rather the kid think it was a gun misfire - or, preferably, forget about it."

The edge of Rochelle's mouth quirked down slightly, cocking her head in gentle question. "Don't you think you should explain it to him..? If he thinks it was his fault... I mean, not that you did anything wrong."

"Glad you think so, Ro'." Nick shot back with a layer of sarcasm, flexing his fingers. He wasn't necessarily hostile, but there was a layer of retort. "Fact is, the kid's already calmed down and I don't want to bring it back up."
Coach shook his head with a shrug, waving fingers in a subtle gesture at Rochelle. "His call, Ro'. Whatever makes it easiest on Ellis is a'ight wit' me."

With a slight bite to her lower lip, Rochelle nodded. Reluctance twitched into her brow, but she held firm with a small smile. "If you guys say so. Just - make sure he doesn't blame himself, okay, Nick?"

The gambler gave a one-shouldered shrug that very much said, 'why the fuck should I care?'

And, as long as Ellis seemed oblivious to any assignation of guilt, Nick didn't care.

Patting a hand on her thigh, the woman glanced between them, voice raising as she changed the subject with a gesture of her head. "If we're going to have to stow away in here while he recoups a little, then maybe we should stock up."

The ex-football player nodded his head easily, flicking his thumb against his palm. "Should find some food. Maybe there's some kinda pharmacy nearby, somethin' wit' medicine we could give him, help wit' the pain."

"So, what?" Nick uttered with a level of disdain, arching up a brow. "We can't leave the dumbshit here alone."

Rochelle gestured up with her hands, flashing a small smile at him. She seemed to restrain it slightly, discontent with the situation. "Much as I don’t want to… We could split up. You hang back and watch him, Coach and I go out and find some things."

The gambler snorted as Coach agreed with a nod, widening his stance. Flashing a frown, Nick shifted his arms subtly, jaw twitching as pain flushed up his neck. He'd almost hoped to get a little break from the Georgian - he wasn't sure how he'd manage to keep his hands off the kid, injuries or no.

"What the fuck? Why am I the babysitter?"

"Cause yo' ass is just as useless as his right now." Coach said with a grin that split straight across his face, laughing outright for a moment.

Nick's desire to punch him straight across his face was tempered by the fact he was right. The gambler glared, chin tensing as frustration cocked his head, voice lowering to little more than an irked mutter.

"... Not as useless as the fatass who couldn't make it up into an attic."

The dual unamused glares he found focused on him was much less insufferable than being laughed at.
Slightly pained blue eyes lightened as Nick opened the door. Ellis had burrowed down into the blankets as if in search of comfort. The slopes of his shoulders, pale above the sleeves in a farmers' tan, were bared by a sheet loosely tucked under his chin.

He had his arms crossed over his chest, fingers gripped into the blankets and holding it close, and the gentle bulges of muscle at his biceps and shoulders laid an odd contrast to the kiddish smile that flickered innocently over his face.

"Hi, Nick." he uttered, quiet with a level of shyness. He tipped his head a little, cap-topped curls tickling at his ears as he blinked past the gambler. "Where'd Coach'n'Ro' go..?"

"Out." Nick explained simply. He shut the door behind himself, more out of reflex than anything else. He had his rifle tucked between his elbow and side, a thin glass three-quarters full of water gripped in his free hand. "They're supply-hunting." The kid nodded his head gently. He started to shift, elbows moving as if to lift himself up to a sitting position, but Nick halted him with a flat gesture. "Easy, sport. No reason to move. You're on bedrest."

Obediently, Ellis eased back down. He did reach behind his head tenderly, pushing his pillow up a bit so he could support his head against it. "Man.. really stinks." Settling into the position, he pursed his lips, blinking hazily at Nick as the gambler moved across the room.

The older man was, by all appearances, a complete wreck.

The husky grey shadowing his jawline was short, only the faintest bristle spreading on recently shaven skin, but enough to worsen the haggard grimness on his expression. A low brow scowled over turbid, stormy eyes, hair swept back from stressed rakes of his fingers.

His shirt was almost completely untucked from his slacks, dangling down around his hips but for one tiny section that still clung to the waistband just above his right pocket. The trapped fabric billowed softly down toward his thigh.

He had, at some point, undone the buttons at the wrists of his sleeves, and they hung open around his hands. His injured shoulder was slumped weakly in discomfort, and his gait nursed his Spitter-lame leg to the point where he just slid his foot most of the way.

A gentle frown touched Ellis' lips, head cocking a little to one side. He watched quietly as Nick circled the bed, tiredly dropping down into the chair still placed close by. The gambler's body seemed cold as he hunched in on himself and set the rifle down on the floor, and Ellis' frown worsened a little.

"Ni-" he started, only to halt when the other man suddenly raised the glass of water in offer. He blinked, a little surprised, gratefully reaching up a hand to take the glass from him. "Oh.. thanks, Nick.. thought that was for you, heh..

Their fingertips brushed as the glass changed hands - goosebumps rose up Ellis' arms, and his eyes reflexively darted toward Nick's as if to gauge his reaction. Only… Nick was glancing at him, too.

Green discs were absolutely hoarse with something almost too fierce to be mere interest.

"Figured you were thirsty," the conman stated, reaching to the nightstand and grabbing the pill bottle Rochelle had left behind earlier. He cracked it open and tapped two tablets out, offering them to Ellis without wavering his gaze. "Plus, here."

Startled into a blink, Ellis dropped his eyes, accepting the pills and pulling the glass close.

"Thanks, man.. I sorta was. Didn't wanna bother nobody.. feel dumb layin' here, haw.." He popped the tablets into his mouth, a little clumsy to get the rim of the glass to his lips. He slowly tipped it up to sip at the lukewarm water and down the pills. A genuine blush ticked light pink over the bridge of his nose, settling most of the glass' weight against the cushion of his lower lip as he drank a few extra swallows.

There was a kind of rare and not completely unpleasant awkwardness in the air. A self-conscious awareness of what had happened last they'd been alone: Nick's total focus on him, the complete surrender Ellis' pain-crippled body had gone through...

How good it had felt to have Nick's mouth on his chest and hand stroking at him. He'd never known something like a nipple could be so pleasurably sensitive, but the feelings still lingered, the tickle and brush of the blankets against his bare chest almost bothering him.

Ellis glanced up a little warily, in the middle of a swallow. He noticed Nick was still staring - now, raptly, at his mouth as if every movement of his lips fascinated him. The surprise at how very closely he was being observed had him choking on his water.

Nick straightened a little as the kid nearly spat it out in surprise, Ellis quickly grasping a hand over his mouth to force himself to swallow, ears burning softly in embarrassment. A few droplets of water trailed down his chin, and he struggled to wipe them off with his palm.

A slight smirk touched the conman's face, lightening some of that husky, grim darkness. He watched the Georgian try to recover, voice lowered with humor. "Okay, Ace..? That's a drink, not a bath."

Ellis forced a slight nod, re-catching his breath as he swallowed down his mouthful. He shot a glance at Nick's face, relieved to see the gambler wasn't solely focused on his mouth anymore, and cleared his throat a little.

Shyly, he crossed his arm over his body to gently set his glass down on the bedside table, wiping his hands on his blankets. "U-uh, yeah, sorry.. I just - are you starin' at me..?"

Starting to shake his head, Nick paused - there was a drop of water still clinging on near the edge of Ellis' mouth, inviting with the quiet sparkle of refracted light. A sudden downward quirk touched the gambler's lips, and he reached up a hand.

"Yeah, sorta." Nick admitted in a low tone. "Got some water there.. let me."

The motion nearly made Ellis jump in surprise, but he relaxed at the last second. Nick's thumb crooked, the pad of it subtly brushing down the soft skin at the edge of his mouth, wiping off the water droplet. Though a worsened blush spread across his face at the contact, he held his head trustingly still.

As that digit lingered, the rest of Nick's ring-bedecked fingers curling to cradle under his chin and bracing the rest of his hand so he could pet along the soft bow of Ellis' upper lip, Nick's gaze sharpened.

Nick needed him. His body vibrated with it. He wanted Ellis wrapped around him, to bury into him until everything fell away but them. He needed to know they were both alive, needed to lose himself in sex so he couldn't - didn't have to - think.
It was easy to pour himself into lust. Distill the tight feeling in his chest into arousal and physical need. Otherwise, he might have realized it was something else.

His voice lowered, gaining the slowest of vibrations in his throat like a badly restrained growl. There was a lull to how he spoke - but who he was trying to calm was arguable. "How're you feeling, kiddo? Side hurt? Chest?"

Mumbling against Nick's thumb, blue eyes a little wide with something confused, Ellis softly responded. "N-nah.. it don't really hurt, I'm oka-"

"Liar." Nick immediately shot back, voice breaking into a full-on gravel as he slowly leaned forward, lids lowering over his eyes to fall to a slow blink. "Your eyes are the worst fuckin' tell I've ever seen."

In time to the words that so slowly rolled from his lips, Nick leaned further forward, body almost creaking with the tiring effort of bending. His eyes flashed softly, interest taking the breath out of him and hollowing his voice. "You and your stupid - tell me if it hurts."

The gambler was right, as always - everything hurt, from the pressure of just laying there on his body, to the pulse beating quick patters in his chest. He wanted to be strong, though.. not out of pride but out of the desire to make it easier on his companions.

Now Nick was demanding the admittance out of him and he didn't understand why.

Ellis' eyes shut tight as Nick leaned himself over the bed slowly, and he could feel the crackle of sensation just before the tip of Nick's nose grazed his, an achingly small touch as if the conman were fighting to hold back. Breath was tangible in warm puffs against his face, slow and heavy.

"Nick're.. you.. okay..?" Ellis whispered carefully.

He needed it, so badly.

The gambler's knuckles dug into the soft skin under Ellis' chin, demandingly, but not roughly. "Just say it." he insisted in something closer to a snarl. "Don't lie. I need to - fuck, Ellis.. for fucking once.. don't be a fucking idiot."

Ellis parted his lips to respond, a quiet word on the tip of his tongue, when Nick closed his mouth over the Georgian's. His thumb was a barricade between them, sealed under Nick's lips and pressed tight to the soft part of Ellis', and the kiss was a still union of skin that seemed to relax something between them.

Nick didn't move for a moment, holding there. Noticing his frozen posture, Ellis tenderly reached up a hand, slow and easy, to touch his cheek. He crept fingertips up the lightly bristled shape of Nick's jaw, cradling it with wide-padded fingers in a gesture of worry.

The gambler vocalized the quietest 'nngh' as the Georgian's fingertips traced that path, a honey-sweet growl of real arousal, and all in one sharp jolt he straightened up and away.

A hiss of pain announced the way the motion hurt his shoulder. His fingers went from cradling Ellis' chin to curled into a fist, punching knuckles with a thud into the headboard above the younger man's head. "Tits."

Ellis flinched only in surprise, immediately shifting half-onto his elbows to blink up at the gambler, lips lingering parted as he forced in a delicate breath. There was a moment of silence -just a moment, Nick hanging there in grim silence, brows taut in a scowl of almost hatred.
"Nick...? It's okay... I'm here."

He said it so soft. So sincere, so real. He saw through him like he were made of glass.

Nick couldn't stand it one instant longer - he knew for an absolute fact if he heard one single syllable more out of Ellis' lips he wouldn't be able to control himself. The imagined taste of cherry-sweet lips on his tongue was already torture enough.

He had to go. Get out. He had to retreat from the room and get away from those silky lips and too-vulnerable honesty that he was so painfully, violently close to taking advantage of.

Stop being so - fucking.. Ellis. Stop it.

Ellis' voice was a half-formed whimper by the time Nick was out of the bedroom. His hands fumbled on the knob, twisting it too hard and shoving out with a stagger. Green eyes shut, tracing the path to the kitchen he'd absorbed in a blink, the subconscious acknowledgement of an escape route.

His body vibrated and thrummed, purred and growled, alive with urges and needs and a frustrated denial of it all that had him shaking his head to nobody. He stumbled, half-drunk, into the kitchen, reaching out a hand blindly until his palm hit counter and he could finally stop.

Stopping brought every single pang and twitch and purr to a resounding crescendo on his senses.

His panting echoed in the tiled kitchen, breathing heavier and thicker than it should've been. Pain spasmed in strange places, imagined places. With a flat-palmed grip he clutched fingers over his groin and the cloth-masked bulge of an aching erection that spread stiff urgency through his muscles like wildfire.

"Fuck." he hissed, jaw gritted and head falling forward. He half-bent over the edge of the kitchen counter, forehead hitting the flat face of a blank wooden cabinet, the wood thumping dully with the collision and the door shifting a little on its hinges.

"Fuckjesustits. He's too... he's hurt. he's - fuuuuck.. Nicolas. Nicolas, man.. calm.. down.. you do not.. need. anything this badly." He rambled in a low growl, voice almost weak, injured shoulder flopped with an exhausted kind of resignation as he couldn't stop his fingers from rubbing a little against the pulsing flesh separated from his fingertips by only two thin layers of fabric.

"Shitfuck."

Just that tiny taste of Ellis' skin.. half-fantasy, so quick and short was the touch between them.. had him half-mad. He knew a lot of it had to do with how he'd gotten himself revved up the first time Ellis had woken and then denied himself release - but another part of his mind defended his self-control, stubbornly.

Maybe it was the stress or the lack of cigarettes or the near-death experience or the relief at Ellis' survival or the injury or the adrenaline or -

Bullshit, Nicolas.

"Fuckshit." Thudding his head against the cabinet softly, squeezing his eyes just a little tighter, he felt his hips bucking all of their own reflexive want, rubbing into the cradle of his fingers in desperation.
He'd take care of himself right there if he had to. He couldn't move, anyway, so stiff and almost agonized were his joints, arousal like acid on his ability to function. His own touch was pitiful against the soaring need buzzing on his nerves, but he'd do it - just to temper that immediate need.

As his fingertips caught onto the end of his slack zipper, pinching that metal clasp and tensing with the intent to jerk it down and ease some of the pressure - the last thing he expected to hear was the soft scuffle-thump of a weak footstep.

Nick should have expected Ellis to come after him.

As if he were thinking straight.

The kid stumbled into the kitchen doorway, hair a curly mess with his cap tipped on his head. He walked with the slow wobble of a sleepwalker, body encapsulated by the dragging weight of the bed's lacy-white blankets, a little train created behind him by draping fabric.

He'd pulled them with, fingers clutching idly to keep them wrapped around himself, though they fell to bare the span of one pale, muscled shoulder. The blue swirls of his tattoo entwined at the top of his shoulder, leading down his bicep with a sloping grace.

His socked feet caught on the blanket with each step, worsening his weak gait, and he moved with a wince that betrayed the pain of his body. He still had his coveralls on - they peeked, bloody and grimy from days of use, from underneath the blanket as he moved.

Nick froze as he approached, gaze locked onto that disheveled, pained image of the young Georgian - so obviously beaten down and weakened, but pressing on toward him. Slogging through the pain. Refusing to let him go that easily.

It was pitiful and horrible and ... nice.

"N-Nick - whut'd I do?" The question came in a little half-cry, blue eyes wide and hazy but alert. Pain left his voice warbled with a degree of honest distress. "Why'd you - yuh can't just .. go walkin' out like that, man..

"You fucking dumbshit-! What the hell are you doing?" It escaped Nick as a full-throated snarl, wild with misplaced anger and pulsing arousal. He twisted around to face Ellis completely, body tense, the drape of his untucked dress shirt providing some accidental cover to the erection in the confines of his boxers and slacks. "Get the fuck back to bed before you hurt yourse-

The irony flashed over Nick's mind too late. The ferocity of his tone, his posture, startled Ellis. He made to stop a foot or two from Nick, chin lowering with a slight hesitance, but caught his foot on a fold of the blankets instead and tugged it out from under himself.

All in one weak crumple, the stubborn Georgian standing before him went tumbling forward in a messy flail of blanket and flashes of bared, bruised torso. His hat toppled to the tile, a little bleat leaving him as he fell, and Nick hissed a borderline slurred, "Fuckingshittohell." and snatched out arms to catch him.

The pain of moving his injured shoulder that way, on top of holding Ellis up with it, should've been fierce enough to kill his arousal - but all he could focus on was how Ellis' neck sloped down into his shoulders. The flesh was smooth, full of little muscled spaces and sensitive-looking dips and a delicious kind of familiarity Nick wanted to just bite into.
As Nick's arms encircled him, blanket and all, Ellis seemed to relax. He still struggled to get his feet back under himself, but he let himself lean toward Nick's presence. He stabilized with some effort, and he lifted up his chin softly, blue eyes glancing apologetically toward Nick's face.

Ellis was so warm, bundled up in blankets and pulled close to Nick - not quite pressing against him, the blanket a buffer between them. The gambler didn't want to let go, just wanted to pull him to the ground and climb his way into those blankets. Screw him there on the floor, deep and slow and thoroughly, draw so many shivers and waves of orgasm out of his body that he'd fall asleep right there..

"Thanks." Ellis whispered.

Maybe it was that completely Ellis-like reaction that did it. The complete ignorance that it was Nick's fault he'd fallen at all; the complete incomprehension of 'blame' in such a situation. The total obliviousness to how many thoughts were shooting over Nick's mind, selfish and greedy thoughts.

Just a soft little 'thanks.'

Maybe that opened the gate in Nick's throat that had prevented the honest admittance. Maybe he was so finally exasperated by the Georgian's sincerity that he just gave in.

"Kid. You need.. ya need to go back to bed." He saw the 'why' stirring in Ellis' eyes and didn't even give him the chance to vocalize it, his own voice going rough with what was turning into unadulterated lust. "I'm really.. not good for you right now. Okay? I can't handle you. Just .. go."

The Georgian shook his head just a little, body shifting like he were trying to stand up on his own. "Nick.. whut's goin' on?" A hand lifted, pawing loosely at Nick's wrist, brows furrowing above his eyes. "Talk tuh me. I ain't thinkin' real straight right now.. help me out."

Shaking his head, Nick set his jaw in a flash of frustration, hips aching with the urge to move. Rub or thrust or something, to relieve the pressure. He was just hard. "Look, just-"

"Tell me." Ellis asserted with oddly strong demand for a voice so weak and whimpered. He frowned a little tighter, drew his brows a little closer, and Nick gave a slow grunt of agitation, fingers flexing on the fabric they clutched.

"Fine."

With a firm kind of care to avoid hurting his already abused body, Nick pulled Ellis closer. The kid's eyes widened with a shocked glaze, brows going totally level, as their bodies dragged a bit flush against one another. The rock-hard press of the gambler's erection got abruptly pressed into his hip through the blankets.

"Wh-whoa.." whimpered out of Ellis' lips, pink flesh dampened by a quick flick of his tongue as he couldn't really shift his weight away from the jabbing proof of what was 'wrong.' Embarrassment flooded his face. "Nick.. man.. I didn't mean to.. uh- 'm sorry, did I make yuh this bothered..?"

A harsh little snort escaped Nick's nostrils. He felt a shudder of want creep up his spine as his eyes followed the wet gesture of Ellis' tongue over the shape of his mouth, a nervous motion. It was all he could do not to rock against him.

"No, I randomly pop boners from Hell." He didn't want to say the words that came next. He wanted anything but them passing his lips - he wanted to be selfish and greedy, and he hated himself for it. "Look, just ..go back to bed. I can take care of it."
Nick didn't expect Ellis to fight him - he'd expected an embarrassed blush or an awkward nod, injured body slinking away to hide in the bedroom and leave him be. Those blue eyes, though, sparked a bright intent. There was a stubborn refusal to his tone that overwhelmed the apology.

"No." His body shoved clumsily forward, pressing harder against the slightly taller man, hip rubbing shamelessly right into the tangible hotness gathered in bulged lust at Nick's groin.

A groan left his throat, rough arousal peaking to an almost painful point as his body pressed close to Ellis' - but not close enough. He wanted skin, and his self-control was whittling down to a shred, encouraged by Ellis' refusal. "That ain't yer call, s'mine. 'N'I ain't goin' away. You can't make me."

"Fucking stubborn.." Nick hissed out of the corner of his mouth. Tightening fingers, he let his face dip forward, catching lips against Ellis' jawline. A little huff of air left him as lips grazed over peach-fuzz stubble, skin warm with a thick blush.

He just wanted to.. do something. Bite his ear, sink a hand under his coveralls.. feel him. "You're making this fucking.. difficult..

Turning his head, Ellis pushed lips against Nick's cheek. A silken mouth parted against his skin, brushing against him, making to speak - but to Nick it was begging him to thrust his tongue into it and shut him up.

"'M'okay, Nick.. you'll be careful.." There was a little pleading note to his voice, melded seamlessly with embarrassed confidence - a blushing face and a little smile hidden behind blue eyes, nuzzling his lips so their noses bumped tenderly. "Jus' help me up on the counter.. we'll take care'uv it tuhgether.."

Nick could feel the shy reaction of Ellis' body as they nudged closer, just the hesitant beginnings of arousal, pressing into him in return.

That was it.

Nothing could stop him at that point - he was so far gone, and permission was too much a strike to his determination. He'd have hauled Ellis up off his feet if he could, blanket and all, but his shoulder trembled at the mere passing thought of the action.

Tightening his grip around the Georgian, he pulled him instead, their bodies moving in clumsy unison backwards. Nick dragged him around, pushing him gently into the counter. A grunt left him, reaching down to grab fingers in Ellis' blankets.

It was a slightly awkward scramble to get Ellis seated on the edge of the counter, a soft whimper escaping Ellis as he squirmed up. "S'okay." left him immediately after the noise, reassuring. Ellis leaned back a little as he found his balance on the small space of counter between the edge and the kitchen sink behind him.

He was breathing a little hard as Nick leaned toward him. His legs shifted, spreading, and the gambler reached down to paw ringed digits and pry the blankets away from him. They fell in layers, baring the Georgian's naked, bruised upper body and baggy coveralls.

Nick's mouth went completely dry as he got fingers on Ellis' stomach - grazing and petting along his thighs, feeling the slopes of his hips, lustfully gripping at his waist in a desperate little echo of what he really, actually wanted to do.

Digging fingers in the folds of his coveralls, Nick tugged them down, nudging Ellis to wiggle a little bit. Together they got the thick fabric down his hips and a few inches down his thighs, boxers dragging with them.

Curly hair trailed up from his groin, narrowing into the shy little trail up his stomach, and the arched erection at a thick half-mast peeked a pinkened tip out from under the waistband of his boxers.

Nick reached down, hooking a finger in his boxers and tugging them down to hook under the base of Ellis' cock, fabric taut over his lap. Goosebumps spread up Ellis' chest, pleasant embarrassment shutting his eyes as Nick leaned into the warm space created by the blankets and his body. The lacy sheets made a loose nest, and Nick let himself push close to Ellis, getting between his thighs and nipping teeth at Ellis' lower lip.

Moving almost tenderly, Ellis reached down a hand, digging between them until his fingers reached Nick's zipper. The feeling of clumsy digits catching ahold of the tab and peeling it down was almost too good - the release of pressure and how it made him groan blissful.

"Right now.." Nick's voice had that rich growl to it all over again. It lowered to just a purr, gravel and heat melted into his tones as wolfish hunger trickled out with each word. "Right now, I don't want anything but to strip you down and push you up against a wall.. pin you there and touch you till you're squirming for it.. aching for it."

Ellis melted further into shock with every sharp, dirty word. Nick had only seen his eyes that wide, that full of disbelief, on the rooftop the first time he'd ever grabbed him - only this time, the blush that slowly rose up to redden his whole face was... different. Not panicked or shocked.

Rough-padded fingers worked his slacks down enough to reach his boxers, slipping underneath those to brush fingers against Nick's erection, throbbing for attention. His touch was sincere, caring... completely embarrassed, but unwilling to stop.

"Explore every little spot on your goddamn body until you can't fucking remember what it's like not having me on you and in you." Growls seethed out of Nick, in time to the way he panted. His good arm lifted, hand cupping behind Ellis' neck to lean him back just a little while making sure the crown of his head didn't collide with the cabinet.

The same care wasn't given to himself, as he thudded his knee straight into the kitchen counter trying to push forward and mold against him. The pain was short and passing. He let his injured arm limply snake between Ellis' body and the blankets, burying in the warmth. He held him firmly, trying to make sure he didn't jostle the injured Georgian accidentally.

Ellis' fingers encircled flesh so velvet-hard and aching there were beads of precum already gracing the stiff tip, wrist twisting a little to pull him out from under slacks and boxers. Nick snarled out a little more, darkly.

"I'd make you stammer out exactly what you want.. just so you were a goddamn blushing mess by the time I pound you straight into the fucking wall.. bite those ears of yours till you're begging me to kiss you." Nick leaned his head suddenly forward, lips just grazing Ellis', green eyes feral as they locked onto his.

"And I wouldn't. Just because it'd make you squirm."

Despite his words, Nick did kiss him. Fingers gripped tight into the kid's hair as their lips locked, tongues playing a damp game between them, shudders edging their shared breaths as their bodies came close. Ellis' thumb arched back, and with a clumsy gesture, he pulled their rigid lengths together in one tactile hand.
Nick felt his whole body shudder, heat absolutely insufferable against his skin as the Georgian stroked them together, shy at first. The subtle lubrication of Nick's leaked precum gave a sticky kind of rub to the motion, flesh pulsing softly as Ellis' hesitant touch and the gambler's needily rocking hips had them frotting slowly against one another.

Growling softly, Nick bit at Ellis' tongue, just little nips to keep his attention. The feeling of ridged, erect flesh stroking against his own between the calloused surfaces of Ellis fingers was overwhelming.

He snaked his hand back up, shoulder aching as it shifted in its joint, and he let the kiss break. Saliva clung between them with a heated huff, and Nick raised his hand to lick over the pad of his middle finger, tasting nothing but Ellis.

Ellis gasped a breath as he seemed to register the gambler's motion, moaning out a soft "H-hah - Nick.." right before Nick stole his lips again. A grunt passed between them, and Nick's cradling arm dropped a bit, fingers tracing down onto Ellis' back.

Fingertips played over the smooth skin dimpled at the base of his spine, rubbing at the muscled slopes forming Ellis' tempting rump. Nick sunk his spread fingers to cup over that flesh, and his middle finger curled to bury between cheeks and rub roughly against his entrance.

The Georgian's back tried to arch, a cried little shout preceding the way his hips tried to cock back and egg on the touch. Nick held him still as best he could, abandoning his mouth in favor of trailing little bite-suckles along his jaw. "Stay still." he chided, regretfully, wishing he didn't have to.

"Hhn -" Ellis whimpered, voice going hazy with the sensation. "Ho-h gawd.. I.. y-yeah, that's.. real nice.." There was a little pain to the sound as his squirming had clearly hurt, but pleasure and plea drizzled over it. His hand tightened to bring the rub of their erections a little rougher and a little faster.

Nick trailed his mouth down his jugular and into the crook of his neck, intent on flustering the Georgian further if it made his hand speed up. His orgasm was building up in his gut and he wanted nothing more but to thrust into the welcome sensations playing around his erection.

Leaning his body a little forward and biting down softly on his jaw, the gambler let his fingertip circle in the wet space he'd made for himself, playing on that thick ring of muscle and putting a little pressure to tease at penetration.

"Christ." the gambler muttered almost regretfully, his voice sultry and harsh with graveled climax, body trembling as he held back as best he could. He wanted to thrust his finger in and push at that clenching muscle, feel Ellis out from the inside. "Can't fuck you.. I'll hurt you."

Ellis told him it was alright the best way he knew how - he kissed him with those soft lips and twisted his wrist to roll their aching lengths against each other, precum glistening under his fingers.

His body was weak and injured, but every promise to take care of Nick was acted out by tender, calloused, manipulative hands. There was so much else Nick wanted to do, but for a moment or two, he forgot about everything but that feeling.

Even when Nick's orgasm hit like the crushing tidal wave he'd expect from so long a build-up and so frustrated a libido, knocking his head back and his eyes up, moaning with a fierce growl and a hazy bite of his lower lip.. he managed to maintain the thought to keep his finger moving.
That, the very tactile sensations of Nick's throbbing orgasm against his own erection, and the flood of warm semen, sticky and intimate, between his fingers left Ellis a gasping mess just a few strokes away from a softer climax of his own.

His body bucked in a weak shiver, a graceful kind of shudder running up his spine. Nick felt every muscle in his body tense up, tasted the ecstasy on his breath, cradled him through it.

Nick held him with that wrapping arm as the sweaty bubble of heat between them melted tension out of his muscles. Their panting came in short huffs, contained in the stubborn lock of their lips, and their hearts raced in pleasured unison as the afterglow echoed in lazy waves of warmth.

Fingertips spread and petted in the younger man's curls, wordlessly, holding him up so he could melt without having to support himself. Cleaning up, hiding the evidence, getting Ellis back to bed - it could wait just a few moments.

For a little space of time, nothing hurt.
"Ow, Jesus -"

Nick winced heavily as he carried Ellis to the bed. The younger man had claimed over and over he could walk, but the first time Nick let him go, he'd nearly fallen straight to the floor. So, he clenched his jaw and picked the kid up in his arms.

He wasn't sure what hurt worse, his shoulder or his ear as Ellis rattled off a stream of apologies straight into it.

"Sorry, sorry, man - sorry, I should'uh walked - sorry!"

Giving a slightly frustrated sigh, Nick stepped heavily up next to the bed, gritting his teeth as he started to bend his knees. Ellis nervously gripped fingers in his shirt, craning his head to peek at the mattress as Nick lowered him down. "Kid, calm down.. I'm not at my best but I'm not a goddamn cripp-"

Right as he said it, his shoulder spasmed. He figured it was the flex of muscles around his wound as he shifted Ellis down toward the mattress, the kid's weight held up more and more by Nick's arms and less supported against his chest.

The pain made Nick jerk, gasping in a sharp breath. Before he could regain his balance, he and Ellis went stumbling down to the bed, landing with a bounce and squirm. Nick tried to catch himself with a knee to the edge of the bed, but he ended up prostrated over the Ellis' stomach.

Convinced he'd crushed the Georgian, Nick immediately shifted to try and push himself up, gritting his teeth at the lingering vibrations of pain. Only - as he started to move - Ellis broke into laughter.

It was a weak sound, soft and intimate, broken up by little snorts of pain that were oddly endearing. His eyes were bright with humor and his lips were quirked up at the edges, and there was such a contagious air to it Nick had to stifle a smirk.

"Shut up, dumbshit." he demanded, putting his weight onto an elbow on the other side of Ellis' hip, body in a half-lounge over his waist.

Ellis didn't. He was trapped in giggles, and he lifted up hands, lazily waggling fingers in the air above his face. His drawled Southern accent turned into a stiff attempt to mimic Nick's harsh diction.

"'I'm not a god-damn cripple' .. uh-huh. You say that right before collapsin' on top'uh me. I look like some kinda pillow tuh you, Nick?"

Tensing his jaw against a small grin, the gambler reached up a hand and gripped Ellis' nose firmly between two knuckles. The kid immediately started squirming his head, pawing at the hand with little squeaked complaints. "No, pillows are more comfortable."

"Quit - quit - aagh Nick -" Ellis bleated, laughter muffled into nasal snorts and head lolling. He gripped onto Nick's wrist, but couldn't pry it away. "Le’goo muh nose-!"

Smirking a little, Nick tightened his knuckles, squeezing at the nose trapped between his digits. His struggling was cute to watch, something comfortable in the playful shove and nudge between them. "I will, when you say you're sorry for laughing at me, Ay-lus."
"You say sorry fer fallin' on me!" Ellis protested, reaching up with his other hand to palm flat at Nick's cheek, pushing him away with a straightened arm.

Nick laughed outright, a sharp but easy sound, leaning back as Ellis pushed him away. "No." He closed one eye, turning his cheek against Ellis' palm and snapping his teeth as if to nip at the younger man's wrist.

Gasping slightly in protest, Ellis retreated, darting his hand away from the older man's teeth and retorting, "Then no!" Nick let him get away, smirking, and gave a slight sigh as he released his nose, too.

Pushing weight onto his elbow, Nick straightened up, a little wearily. He sat on the edge of the bed, raising a hand to cup over his shoulder, smirking at the Georgian. "I'd make you pay for that, if we weren't both fucked up."

Ellis stuck his tongue out, rubbing his newly regained nose.

Nick snorted, rolling his eyes slightly. "Dumbshit." Sliding off the mattress, he slid back into his wicker chair, sighing heavily as he draped himself into the seat. He let his bad leg lift up, relaxing his heel against the edge of the mattress.

His eyes closed, chin lowering to his chest. He settled his arms into a loose cross over his chest, relaxing his injured shoulder. At the sounds of movement on the bed, though, his eyes reopened. Ellis rolled gently on the bed, tenderly arranging himself so he could lay on his side and gaze toward Nick.

Rather than acknowledge it, Nick shifted to let his head tip back until he could gaze at the ceiling. Ellis seemed content with that, eyes drifting away and then back in alternating patterns. He wrapped his arms around his bruised torso, fingertips drifting over the bruising on his side.

"Wonder how long I'm gonna take tuh heal up..." Ellis murmured, voice almost airy with a quiet thought. "Probably hurt real bad to shoot muh gun. Sorta useless."

Nick shook his head once, responding equally quietly, though rougher. "Don't worry about it, kiddo. We can rest until you get back on your feet. If we get antsy or we need to move on, shit, we'll just carry you. Coach hustled you like a bag of potatoes here."

"Man, I really passed out back there, haw.." The kid snorted softly, nuzzling his face against the pillow until he was looking at Nick on a tilted axis. "You probably ain't shootin' too well either, with that shoulder..."

Giving a slight laugh, Nick shifted his shoulder at the mention of it, glancing sideways at it. He could see a damp spot of blood in the center of his dress shirt's shoulder, over where his front bandage was. Red shone amidst the dried stains and splotches on the rest of the fabric, but he didn't mention it. "No, not really.. had to shoot my Mag up in the attic. Fuckin' thing has a wild recoil, hurt like a bitch."

Which probably didn't help the bleeding.

Ellis nodded his head, lazily but not un-alertly. His eyes fluttered shut, tightly. "Sorry, man.. wish I hadn't'uh gotten you hurt like that..

Rearing his head up slightly, Nick arched a brow. He eyed Ellis' turned face as the edge of his mouth quirked down, a snort of disbelief quick to come to his breath. "Got me hurt? You weren't even there, Ace."
A little sigh puffed out from Ellis' lips.

"S'whut I mean."

Rolling his eyes, Nick gave a sigh of his own. He flexed his fingers slowly, letting a hand lift up to touch his temple in a massaging gesture. He carded digits through his hair, tracing the curvature of his ear. "Look, kid - have you thought about how that would've gone down if you'd been with us?"

Ellis was silent, and Nick took it as a 'no.'

"Simple. They'd have fuckin' shot us down like animals. I wouldn't have been hurt, I'd've been dead. All of us would." He saw Ellis stiffen, curling his knees up a little. A bit of distress fell over the kid's features, muted and saddened. He didn't let it stop him, but he softened the ruthless cynicism in his voice just a little. "It didn't exactly work out great, but I'd much rather take a sword to the shoulder than a bullet to the brain. Get me?"

"Yeah." Ellis mumbled softly, turning his face into the pillow. "I'd'uh rathered neither.."

Nick gave a short laugh, a harsh little noise, and let his palm settle flat on the curl of his tummy, closing his eyes. "Me too, kid. But you've gotta take the hand you're dealt."

His words were met with a slight silence, Ellis' face half-hidden in the plump pillow underneath his head. Nick's brows lowered, forcing a sigh. He straightened in his chair, letting his leg slip off the bed to lean in toward the collapsed Georgian until his face was a mere foot or two away. "Hey, this ain't all that bad, Overalls. We've got the other two doing all the work and we get to rest. I'd say that's a win."

Ellis laughed suddenly, the sound a bit tired but no less sweet than usual, raising his head weakly and giving Nick a slow grin. His voice was confiding and a little flirtatious, almost accidentally. "You sayin' you like sittin' here with me, Mr. Gamblin' Man?"

... Smartass.

Nick rolled up his eyes, arching a brow as he didn't quite meet Ellis' gaze head-on. His voice gained a weighty monotone as he retorted, "Yes, Overalls. I would prefer sitting around with you to being dead."

The younger man's laughter, stifled with snorts and weak 'haw's, made Nick smirk. There were these wounded coughs laced into the noise, and beyond the pitiful sense of vulnerability, it was just the smallest bit endearing.

That smirk flashed into a heavy scowl when the younger man reached up and grabbed Nick's nose in retaliation.

Ellis laughed himself clear out of breath.
Chapter 98

A crack of thunder woke Nick up like a slammed pot just beside his ear.

"FUCK-!" he shouted at the absolute top of his lungs, goosebumps shooting up the whole length of his body. He nearly flung himself out of the wicker chair, stopping at the last moment to sit poised on the edge, fingers clutching into the armrests.

It was raining. Hard. Water crashed and splattered on the roof, gaining ferocity by the second. Was he dreaming? He didn't even remember falling asleep, just remembered letting his chin turn and his cheek settle against his shoulder - so maybe he'd closed his eyes for just a second...

...fucking Jesus.. What the fuck kind of weather is this?!

The window in the corner of the room couldn't even be seen through - it was just sheets of water, thrown against the glass like frothy waves against a stormy shore. It was dark, and Nick couldn't tell if it was late or if the greyed clouds were stifling the afternoon sun.

Nick was vaguely aware of Ellis shifting on the bed, dragging toward the edge of the bed like he might crawl off and climb onto Nick's lap. His blue eyes were wide and wheels were turning behind them.

He assumed the kid was afraid of the weather - leave it to him to pick a lightning-shy Georgian to bunk with before a storm. Nick was about to ask him just that, when Ellis' gaze lifted up to glance at him, expression lit by a series of flashes scattered through the nearby window.

Ellis shouted weakly, "Nick! Wha.. where's Coach'n'Ro?"

Nick's eyes widened a tick, then narrowed. "Shit." escaped him, a low curse. Ellis was right. Coach and Rochelle were out hunting supplies, and he had no way of knowing how long they'd been gone. Or, more importantly, where they'd gone.

If they're lost in this storm -

Steadying himself with his grip on the chair's armrests, Nick gestured soothingly at Ellis. "Maybe they just didn't wake us up. Let me check." he half-shouted back, voice muffled under an extended crackling sound, echoing through the roof.

The kid nodded with a hesitant scrunch of his brow, painfully moving to sit up on the mattress. He let one hand cover over his side, hand flat to immobilize it. "Wh-whut if -"

"I don't know." Nick cut him off, tension building into his shoulders. With a small scowl spared for the water-drowned window, accusatorially, he stood up. His shoulder ached, a cold tremble on his skin as he used the heels of his hands to help push himself up against the chair's armrest. He gritted his teeth, fighting to ignore it.

Nick could feel Ellis' eyes on him the entire way to the door. The kid flinched at every roll of thunder, but Nick now had the feeling it was more sympathy for Rochelle and Coach than fear. Opening the door into the hallway, Nick edged his head out. The house was nearly pitch black, the only window in the living room curtained over, but he could tell fairly easily that he was alone.

He tried anyway.
"Ro'!" he barked, anger bleeding into his tone as he stumbled down the hallway and into the living room. "Coach! Are you idiots here?!" Silence responded, and he growled slightly as he set a hand on his shoulder, gingerly. As much as they needed supplies - namely medical - it couldn't have been worth losing contact.

Now their teammates were out in the midst of a thunderstorm. Nick couldn't even get his head around a plan to find them, not in that kind of weather - as if chiming in agreement, a strike of lightning sounded so ferociously he felt the carpet under his feet shiver. The noise came so close alongside a flash of light that it must've touched down dangerously nearby.

"Fuck.." he swore, agitated, head twisting aggressively to glare around the room as something a lot like worry dug claws into his gut. The unusual sensation fluttered nausea up his throat, but he swallowed it down, charging to the front door of the small beachhouse. He'd helped them block up the door behind them, agreeing Coach would come and bang on the bedroom window once they'd returned.

He stared at the coffee table blocking the threshold, body poised to grab ahold of it and start dragging it out of the way. He had to find them, and if that meant getting his shoes and a gun and thrusting himself out into the storm himself, he -

...Nicolas, don't be an idiot. One ringed hand raised up and he dragged fingertips down the planes of his face, frustrated. What are the fuckin' chances you could find them? Slim to none.

It turned into a mental argument, and he wasn't sure who was winning.

They aren't idiots... probably left a trail, or memorized landmarks, or something.

...And the chances either of you could see them in the rain?

If they're lost, the faster I start looking for them, the faster I'll find them.

...Because you're in the proper shape to go running around in a storm.

I'm fine, I can shoot a gun.

...No you aren't, and barely.

Fine. So we find a way to put up a signal, at least turn the lights on so they might be able to see us.

...Along with every zombie and katana-wielding psycho in the area.

"Fuck." he uttered, outright pinching the bridge of his nose between his thumb and index, green eyes adopting a blank stare on the air for a moment. He'd efficiently talked himself into and then out of every option left to him.

The rain splattered and crashed on the roof over his head, like stomping footsteps over the shingles. He squinted slightly, listening to the noise, imagining for an instant what it was like to be out in that storm.

He didn't like it.

A soft, aching "Nick?" called from the bedroom. Nick only just heard it over the rain, but it made him grunt, body suddenly tightening. Ellis was obediently staying in bed, but that didn't mean the younger man wasn't paying attention.
And alone.

Nick gave a small growl, forcing himself to turn back. He slipped across the living room with light footsteps, bracing his jaw into a steely tension as he turned into the bedroom doorway. His brows flinched as a flash of lightning speared brilliant shocks of white light into the room, leaving ghosted imprints of imaginary shapes on his eyes as it faded.

The Northerner cocked his chin up to glance at Ellis as the Georgian saw him in the doorway, and those blue eyes spoke pools of questions with a mere blink. Nick sighed, heavy and tight, letting the thunder fade out before he spoke.

"We have to wait." he stated.

Just that - simple. Flat. He had explanations ready, planned and laid out, prepared to convince Ellis, fight him if he had to... but an argument never came.

A small frown touched the edges of Ellis' lips. Short lashes lowered over his eyes. Silently, he raised up a hand and reached for Nick. There was feet between them but he stretched his fingers like he could touch him with fingertips.

Biting down onto his cheek, Nick rolled his eyes up slightly - but relented. His body was stiff with agitation, but the Georgian needed the reassurance. He crossed the room, injured shoulder slumping slightly. A slight snort escaped him as Ellis' fingers brushed his abdomen, curling in his shirt as if to keep him close.

"Calm down, Overalls. It's just rain." Settling down onto the edge of the bed, Nick let his back rest against the headboard of the bed, raising up his left arm so Ellis could get comfortable against him.

Ellis did, eagerly but weakly. He snuggled against Nick's side, head resting on his chest and eyes closing. His fingers tightened on his shirt, body relaxing with a weak little exhale.

"Nick..." the younger man mumbled against his chest. "Whut if they don't come back? Or get hurt while they're out there?" The gambler didn't say a word, gazing at the window as a flash lit the room up again, followed by a tremendous crackle of noise. His arm lay limp over Ellis' shoulders, fingers curled into a loose fist. ".. 'm'uh li'l scared."

A sigh escaped Nick's lips, turning his head slightly. He gazed down at Ellis' face, voice tense and words slightly forceful. "Don't underestimate them, kiddo. They're strong and smart. They'll hole up somewhere and find us when the rain stops."

Frowning. Ellis lifted his head from Nick's chest, blue eyes opening subtly to glance up and meet his gaze. "I wouldn't wanna be out in this rain.." he uttered back, almost dubiously. "Attract those Witches again.. whut if th-"

"Ellis." Nick interrupted sharply, bending his head to catch his gaze more fully. He flicked up a wrist and got his thumb under Ellis' jaw, forcing his face to stay where it was, framing the edge of his jawline. "Look. I'm worried too. Don't think about it, alright?"

The Georgian blinked at him slowly, lids lowering softly to half-close his eyes, worry dragging down the edge of his mouth. "Alright.." Ellis' cheek settled back down against his chest, eyes closing all the way with a small, wetly self-conscious lick of his lips. He pushed his cheek into the gambler's sternum, sighing as the storm thundered on around them.

"... can we talk 'bout somethin'?" the Georgian murmured. ".. I'm worried, I don't wann'uh sit here'n'stew.."
Exhaling, Nick gave a shake of his head that seemed more a shrug. He was more inclined to want to sit there and stew, but he was getting used to Ellis' voice and he almost didn't mind. "Sure, kiddo. Talk away. You're always good at that." There was a little mock to his tone, but it was tired.

That was all the other man really needed.

"... Muh mama likes storms." Ellis spoke, voice soft and a little breathless. Nick didn't shift, didn't look at him, just listened. "She'd always go out on the porch'n'look intuh the rain. Got wet'uh lot, y'know, came in sneezin', but she'd just smile, like it was worth gettin' sick. I think it made her remember Pa, 'cause they met when her car done broke down in the rain'n'he stopped'n'--"

Thunder exploded overhead, sending something crashing to the floor. It sounded like a plate hitting the floor, and there was a shattering sound on the other side of the house. Ellis jumped clear out of his skin, digging fingers into Nick's shirt, grunting faintly in pain as the gesture made his chest hurt.

As the static electricity in the air slowly settled, Nick raised a hand, settling it flat on Ellis' head, fingers delving into fluffy curls. ".n?" Nick half-taunted, drawling the syllable. It seemed to settle the Georgian, and he continued with a quiet sigh.

"He helped her get her car runnin'... fixed it up right there on the side'uv the road, didn't even complain or nothin'. She liked tuh tell me that story. Always got this real big smile, y'know, like she could still see him standin' there, soaked through tuh the bone'n'not carin' one bit, just helpin' her."

"Nice guy." the older man inputted fairly sincerely, though a bit of sarcasm jumped into his tone immediately thereafter. "In the city he'd probably have stolen her car. Or her."

Ellis just snorted softly, flicking a thumb against Nick's chest as if in chastisement. "Naw, man.. he treated muh mama right, like'uh gentleman. Muh Pa was a real nice guy, leastways, from whut I know. He wouldn't'uh done nothin' like that."

Nick arched up a brow slightly, a little snort escaping him. "Like father like son." He adjusted his arm, trying to get his injured shoulder a bit more comfortable, bicep cradling Ellis' head against his chest.

For some reason, that made Ellis beam. Nick could feel it like a fire against his chest, this grin. It was a familiar grin, an easy one. Ellis had heard that before, but it made him no less proud.

"You like storms, Nick?"

The gambler was silent for a moment, lids lowering to half-close his eyes. There was a ... thump, in his chest. Ellis had the - to Nick - unique quality of asking about him, and seeming, for all the world, genuinely invested in his response.

"Don't really have an opinion, kiddo.. they are what they are."

Ellis blinked at him curiously. He must've sensed there was something there, because he waited. Nick flexed his fingers to slide and comb through the kid's curly hair, gazing at the window for a moment before a breath left him, relenting.

"When I was a kid, we had this fuckin' bad storm... thunder, lightning, pouring water, the whole shebang. It wasn't in the forecast, so I left my umbrella at home - and walking across the Bronx in that kind of weather wasn't exactly my idea of a good afternoon."
Perked with interest though he didn't lift his head, Ellis curiously prodded, "If it was that bad, why wouldn't yer parents come'n'pick yuh up?"

A half-snort left Nick, gripping onto one curly-cue strand of hair at the crown of Ellis’ hair and tugging on it. "My parents were busy fuckers.. both of them worked full-time to pay the bills. I mostly lived with my uncle -"

"The Italian one?" Ellis questioned, and the fact he remembered made Nick smirk a little.

"Yeah, the Italian one.." he confirmed with a restrained near-chuckle, pausing an instant as thunder rolled loudly outside. "He would've come and gotten me if he'd had the chance, but the fact was he was probably passed out drunk at home. Good guy, just.. got his mouth taped to the bottle."

Ellis nodded his head softly, resting where he was. "Keith's pa was like that, too. He was a happy drunk though, just got real loud'n'laughed."

Nick smirked a bit, arching up a brow. "I wouldn't call Unc' happy, but he was alright. Just needed help out of his own puke sometimes, or he'd lose his keys.. it was either learn how to pick locks to get us inside the house, or leave the poor guy to sleep in the street."

The kid laughed against his chest gently, brows scrunching over his eyes. The humor was dulled by a sense of sympathy, and the Georgian shifted his body gingerly. "Man. You had'uh lot'uv responsibilities when you was little."

"Most people do." Nick shrugged his good shoulder, just an inch. It was strange talking about the 'real world' - hard to grasp just how gone it was. "You saying you never had to help your single mom take care of you?"

"Well, sure.." Ellis tenderly agreed, eyes closing. The adrenaline was wearing off and the worry was kicking in - Nick felt the younger man's body tiredly relaxing. "Had tuh cook sometimes, 'n'clean up the house. That was only 'cause she spent all her time waitressin'.. 'n'then came home tuh teach me schoolwork'n'shit."

Nick gave a gesture with his head that indicated he'd made his point. He glanced at the window, silent for a moment, and Ellis nudged him softly with his head.

"Anyway, sorry, you were talkin'..."

The gambler smirked a little, shaking his head. He shouldn't have had patience for the interruptions, but Ellis had this honest curiosity in the way he did it. He wanted to understand.

"Well, this storm was just a bitch, so I pretty much had no choice but to just wait at school until it blew over. I didn't want to get caught hanging around and have some nosy teacher tell my uncle, so I went to break into the World History classroom and hide out in there. Figured all the teachers were gone."

He paused, and sure enough, Ellis piped up. "Guess they weren't? Hoh man, you get caught pickin' locks in school? Man, Keith did that once, 'n' -" Nick was going to let him ramble, but Ellis seemed to catch himself. A little bob touched his head, and with a small hum-mumble, he chuckled. ".anywho. Yeah?"

Spreading fingers in his hair, Nick lifted up his chin, head settling against the headboard with a sigh. "Yeah, the teacher was there. Brett was his name, Brett Sullivan.. I only half knew him.. he was my teacher, but I just sort of sat through school back then. He was way in the back of the classroom, smoking a cigarette and grading papers."
A laugh left him, this short sound, quiet with recollection.

"He'd taped over the fire alarm so the smoke didn't set it off. Teachers got fired for that shit, and I walked in on him just puffing away. Thought for sure I was going to get the boot from school - he'd caught me breaking in and I knew he'd never let me stick around to spill the beans on him smoking."

Ellis' brow was scrunched up in sleepy attention. He followed the story with Nick's emotions; his brow suggested some kind of tension, but Nick was smirking and humor was in his tone, so he smiled idly.

"The guy looks up, and he kind of eyes me for a second. Real steely stare, sizing me up. I think he half didn't recognize me as his student. Then he shifts.. pulls a cigarette out of the box next to him, real slow, and offers it up to me."

Nick shook his head, smirk twisting up his mouth. "I mean, Unc' had let me drink before, and I stole a smoke or two when he wasn't looking, but.. holy shit, this teacher just looked me straight in the eye and bribed me with a cig. I took it, but I don't even think I smoked it. I just stuffed it in my pocket and stared at the guy. I was still waiting for him to kick my ass, I think."

"Whut'd he do?" Ellis murmured curiously, seeming fascinated by the story. Maybe it was the idea of a younger, more easily intimidated Nick.

Grinning a little, the older man sighed. "Nothing. He kicked a chair out and nodded at it and I sat down. The guy just goes back to smoking and grading his papers. We must've sat there for an hour until the storm fucked off. I was so goddamn confused I never said a word - when the rain slowed down, I just got up and left."

ScRUNching his brow softly, sleepyly shifting his head, Ellis questioned, "H'uh..? He didn't even say nothin'..? Wasn't he worried about gettin' in trouble?"

Nick shook his head slightly, a vague edge to it. "I guess not." The storm seemed second to their conversation - it thundered and crashed, but the two men noticed it less and less, comforted in their closeness. "He didn't mention it afterwards, either. Never even looked at me in class, didn't call me to stay behind, didn't nag on my uncle. I didn't need trouble but I couldn't understand it. He was pretending like it never happened."

A sigh left the gambler's lips. It felt oddly good to express things, share a little. The whole memory was something private and important, something he kept to himself - but Ellis was easy to talk to. It was unfamiliar.

"I don't remember what got into my head.. I guess I was just so goddamn curious. I went back to his classroom after school, and the door was unlocked. He was there, and he'd put out a chair for me already. Like he fuckin' knew."

He heard a little gasped breath from Ellis, but it was soft and sleepy. The kid was dozing. Fighting it - but dozing.

"I asked him why he didn't tell anyone I was trying to break in. He gave me this smile and asked me why I never told anyone he was smoking. I didn't really know how to answer that..." Nick snorted. "I came back every day after that. Unc' never really asked. Just as long as I was home for dinner, he didn't care what I did."

"Brett was always there. He stayed as long as I did. We talked, I guess." Suddenly, Nick's voice grew vague. His gaze faded into a distant stare, thoughts trickling over his expression and lips dragging into a small quirk downward. "I didn't want to talk to him about me. I didn't want to talk about my parents, or my uncle. I didn't want to talk about that bullshit. I think he knew that, and he didn't push it."

Nick gave the smallest of half-laughs, scrunching his brows over his eyes before releasing a sigh. "Somehow got me fascinated with history. I didn't give a shit about a single word he said in class, but after school, we just.. talked. He'd teach me and I'd ask about it and I guess I got into it. Can't say I remember any of it now, but back then.. I needed the distraction. I needed.. someone to look up to, who actually wanted me around.. or something like that."

A snort escaped Nick, eyes closing in the lightning-lit dark with a slight humor to the shake of his head. "I liked the '20s in America. If there was one thing Unc' demanded I understand it was that Italians made kick-ass mafias.. Brett knew a lot about gangs, war bullshit, and I wanted to hear it. I guess it left a mark, h'uh? The slimy fuck I am today."

A soft murmur of a hum, warm against his chest, was the only sign Ellis was still awake. It was a little protesting - Nick ignored it, letting fingers shift in the kid's hair, just subtly.

"After a while, we started leaving the school and walking the city, just wandering around. Turned out he was a real character. Only guy I've ever really respected. He showed me things - how to shoot a gun, cheat at poker, hotwire cars... he was how I knew how to make that Molotov. He liked to say he was immersion in history, but I didn't give a shit. I loved it. The guy was smart and sarcastic and he gave me something to give a shit about. It was fun, I was good at it, he.."

Nick's voice suddenly stopped. He felt the emotion - the regret, the memory, surging up to clinch vicelike around his throat, dragging his brows into a crunch. Ellis seemed to shift at his silence, sleepily, but Nick held it.

He had no idea why he'd told Ellis so much. There was no way the Georgian would ever understand, if only because Nick could never express it.

There were no words for the months he'd spent, whittling himself to the honest truth that he liked danger and lying. He liked cheating and stealing. He liked succeeding because of his own intelligence. His mind was built for it, and it took that long for him to realize it.

Nor could he even begin to explain the events that followed.

Ellis was innocent. Too good. He'd never get what was so different from him - Nick wasn't evil, but he was bad. They were too different, and Ellis would never get that those lessons, that illegality, were the core of Nick's existence. The only thing he'd ever cared about.

Nick abruptly wished he'd never even opened his mouth. Ellis would just judge him, that little nose would crinkle and he'd go 'jeez, Nick, he sure taught you some bad shit...' and Nick would hate himself for bringing it up.

Ellis' head lifting vaguely, exhausted blue eyes glancing up at his face. Flushed pink lips quirked in a smile, and the kid mumbled: "He was kinda like a dad tuh you."

Nick was incredibly quiet. He just gazed at him, utterly silent, expression still in a look of blank attention. He should've smirked or snorted or shook his head, something to dismiss the statement, but instead he just stared. The younger man didn't seem bothered by it, though he was so exhausted he seemed to drift off right there, the silence giving him an opportunity to lose focus.
Ellis was one surprise after the other.

"... yeah."
They hadn't heard the Witch crying, neither of them. Coach and Rochelle were running in the rain, trying to re-trace their path back to the others. The big man was clinging his supply-stocked backpack to his gut as if he could protect it from the water, though his whole body was soaked through already.

The Witch stumbled out of an alleyway just feet ahead of Rochelle.

A snarl left it, almost like a startled "Wh-?", and glowing red eyes lifted up to glare past scraggly, dripping hair. Rochelle stuttered to try and stop, arms going up - but the rain-slick concrete greased the soles of her boots and she only came to a frozen halt bare inches from the creature.

The creature's scream came in time to a roll of thunder, like a twisted union of nature and flesh. It was an unnatural and warped set of sounds, and panic bubbled in Rochelle's chest as raindrops hissed and cracked against the sidewalk.

As it screamed, the sound more terrified than angry, its arms rose up. Claws spread wide, raking against each other as they unfolded from the awkward half-curl they'd been holding before her face. The blade-like edges gleamed with rain, sweat, grime, and blood.

Rochelle's second instinct was to shriek, but her first instinct was to lift up her gun and shoot.

The loud crack of the rifle shuddered her shoulders, and the bullet collided with the Witch's chest. There was a strange wheeze, like the expulsion of air. The blast must have taken out a fist-sized hole in her torso, baring shock-white, meatless bone and the water-soaked, pulsing shape of an organ - but it didn't stop her.

Unbalked as a grimy grey-red blood trickled from the hole just in the center of her emaciated ribcage, the Witch started to lash out again.

Coach felt his heart stop in his bulky chest, a painful breathlessness catching in the depths of his throat, and pure instinct overwhelmed him. He was clumsy when he thundered forward and got his arms around Rochelle's waist, hauling her backwards like she weighed nothing. His whole body had a stiff unresponsiveness to it from the frigid rain pouring down on his limbs, biting straight through his clothing and skin.

The Witch's strike missed, claws whistling through the air and faintly groping as swollen knuckles twitched half-bent in a painful gesture. She didn't stop screaming, the sound almost rising in pitch, catching her balance with a stumbled, sliding stagger on the wet concrete.

The ex-football player was already hustling away, dragging Rochelle into a half-turn to shove her into motion with a flat hand right on the small of her back. "GO!" he shouted in that no-nonsense bark.

The wide oceanfront town's street was drowned in puddles of water, ever more crashing down upon the asphalt surface, and the two took flight down the stretch of road with water splashing up at their heels. Direction and orientation became secondary behind the base instinct to run.

The Witch's screaming, shrill and ghastly, bled through the crashing of thunder in ear-splitting waves. Her movement was inaudible behind them, bone and sinew just barely seeming to hold her joints together well enough to carry her in a frantic sprint after them - however, the shrieking that left her made it clear she was gaining on them.
She was rickety and emaciated, but fast.

"We gotta get off the street!" Coach hollered, rain pouring down the curves of his face and choking his words with a few swallowed trickles of water. A squinted glance over his shoulder made him cringe, body hunching down to pick up the pace of his barreling stride.

They took a sharp turn, peeling off the main road onto a smaller street. The rain skidded under their shoes, but when Coach stumbled, Rochelle was right there to grab ahold of his wrist. She kept him moving, pulling him along behind her until he got his feet under himself.

He kept behind her - if the Witch caught up, it'd be to him, not Rochelle.

"Where?!"

Panicked, Rochelle flicked her gaze along the buildings at either side of the street. Her brain shut down slightly, wilting at the scream echoing murderously behind them and the flashes of slashing claws she could see behind them - but she was lucid enough to think.

_Sturdy - something sturdy, something thick - or she'll break through like Carmine -_

A regular door wouldn't cut it, and through the thundering sheets of rain, Rochelle couldn't see anything else. They were surrounded by palely painted wood condos, one after the other, the flimsy and breezy shapes of beachhouses.

All going for one of those would do was slow them down.

_Gotta get off the street, gotta get off the street - gotta -_

A tiny grey-brick building flashed into her attention on the right. It was shoved squatly beside a convenience store, peeking out into the street. A sign nailed over the doorway, half-knocked off its moorings by the storm, identified it as 'Welsh Pawn Shop.'

"There!" Rochelle shouted, frantic, jabbing up a hand to point at it. Coach didn't say a word, just twisted to angle toward the shop, breaking into a full sprint as she did. Bolting over the sidewalk, they reached it at nearly the same time, and Rochelle twisted the door handle with a sudden inhale.

_Shit! What if it's -_

It opened.

Coach's arm swept around Rochelle's waist, practically carrying her over the threshold as they stumbled, soaking and squeaking, into the hardwood-floored pawn shop. It was pitch-black inside but for the flicker and flash of white lightning that slanted in from the small windows, and Rochelle scanned it for danger as best she could, spitting blindly as water trickled down her lips.

It seemed devoid of any inhabitants, infected or otherwise.

Coach slammed the door shut, shoving his weight against it. He grunted heavily as he braced his weight there, and it was lucky he had. The Witch collided with the other side mere instants later, its screaming vibrating through the door.

The big man winced, but the door held strong. For the moment.

A loud clatter and creak warned of the rake of claws against the thick, dark-painted door, the screaming rising in pitch as the Witch seemed to panic. The thuds of her hands and crack-thwacks of her claws were horrendously loud, fueled by a strength her broken-down body shouldn’t have had.

"We gotta block it!" Coach grunted, trying to get a grip on the wood-paneled floor with the squeaky treads of his shoes. The door jolted and twitched against his shoulder with increasing urgency.

Squinting into the dark, Rochelle was quick to look for options. The pawn shop had been looted - the main counters, inlaid with glass panels to show off the goods inside, had been broken and seemed mostly empty but for a few strange knicknacks.

It was, fortunately, well stocked in furniture.

There was a chest of drawers rested up against the wall. The dark wood piece came up about to her chest, and without waiting a moment, Rochelle bolted over to it. Gritting her teeth and panting through her nostrils, the woman gripped onto it in a slight hug, letting her knees half-bend.

Even adrenaline wasn’t quite enough. She pulled and yanked, a sound struggling out of her that was more like a shriek as her boots slid and scuffed on the floor. Each inch was a battle, and just as she gasped in a breath, ready to shove her weight even harder into the work, Coach was next to her.

The door thudded and jerked from the Witch’s assault, but it stayed closed even with him gone. Hopefully it would remain that way long enough for them to get the drawers in place.

Coach gripped onto the edges with heavy arms, and his whole body strained up as he dragged backwards, shoving his shoulder into the wall to get a little traction. The drawers scraped across the wood with a painful screech, no doubt gouging marks into the hardwood floor.

Grunting and shoving in unison, Rochelle and Coach managed to pull the thing in front of the doorway. Coach got hands flat in the front of the drawer set and shoved hard. It scooted loudly to sit flat against the doorway, bracing the wood, and the door steadied to a simple shiver with each of the Witch’s strikes.

As it squeaked that last inch, Rochelle collapsed down to a knee, breathing hard as she planted hands over her eyes, scrubbing water out of them.

They could still hear the sound of claws digging into wood. Turning, gasping with attempts to catch her breath, Rochelle weakly leaned her back against the chest of drawers. Her eyes lifted, scanning through the shop more thoroughly this time. It struck her, suddenly.

There was no back door.

Oh, God…

They were trapped.

She started shivering soon after sitting down, lifting her head numbly as Coach bustled a few steps away from her. The big man half-tripped over a chair, grunting as he whacked his hip into it, but hardly stopped beyond the action of knocking it aside. He dropped down next to a faded nightstand, getting a grip on the old wood.

A sudden cracking sound had Rochelle's head jerking up. Her eyes lifted, body twisting, and her lips parted as a gasp left her. The squirming point of a bloody claw just barely pierced the door an inch above the dresser, like a nail driven through the wood.
They were trapped, and the Witch was breaking through.

Oh, God.

Horror touching her voice, softly, Rochelle uttered "Coach -" She dragged an arm around herself, trying to still the tremors beginning along her spine. He didn't react, hauling the nightstand up off the ground.

His bad knee tried to buckle under himself, and the pain of recovering was obvious in how his shoulders seized up. He forced himself to stagger backward, body stiff as he carried the nightstand back.

Coach piled it on top of the dresser, shoving it close to the door to blockade it a little more, almost intentionally slamming it straight against where the Witch had started to break through. His jaw was tense, dark eyes bleary as he blinked through the rainwater that soaked his entirety.

He seemed ready to turn back around and go for something else to add to the barricade when Rochelle reached up and grabbed his hand. "Coach.." the woman got out in a soft voice, strands of soaked black hair trailing down her forehead.

Freezing, he forced his gaze down, meeting hers. Her eyes were wide, and serious, fingers slowly shifting to slip between the thick shapes of his knuckles in a loose link. The Witch's screaming, so close to them, didn't stop.

His voice was stern and almost angry when he gruffed back, "Ro', don't look like that... We just gotta -"

The nightstand shuddered, squeaking forward a little. Rochelle jumped at the noise, and Coach squeezed suddenly at her hand, eyes flicking up and deepset brows scrunching. The howling wavered, a sob mixing into the noise, and the Witch seemed to lash out even harder.

Rochelle's voice was suddenly weak. It trembled, body trembling even more and teeth chattering together as the cold rainwater soaked her to the bone. She gripped Coach's hand tightly, shaking her head. "She's gonna break through."

Gritting his teeth, Coach twisted slightly, not quite letting go of Rochelle's hand. "We'll just slip out the back. It ain't -" He froze up as he saw what she already had, mouth slowly sealing.

There were no other doors.

"You think a pawn shop sells sugar?" Rochelle joked in a whisper, half-smiling as a little choke dropped her chin.

Coach tightened his jawline, staring around the lightning-lit room as the door thumped behind them. The cracks of breaking wood were increasing in volume and consistency, its claws gouging through the door at a quick pace. "Babygirl..."

"Sorry." Rochelle muttered back, raising up her free hand to cup fingers over her eyes. They trembled. "Sorry, I - I ran us into a dead end. It just looked like the best shot, I.. I'm sorry, Coach -"

With a fierce crash, something broke, and the nightstand on top of the dresser shoved forward. The wood behind it shattered as the Witch's claws dived through the door, stabbing through and flinching as wood splinters pierced the rough flesh of its hand.
Coach dragged Rochelle up off the floor and into a protective embrace just barely in time to get her out from under the nightstand before it fell. The thing broke into two halves where she'd been sitting, chunks of wood scattering against the floor.

She flinched sharply, burying into his chest. Coach led her into a slow retreat backwards, his gaze firmly rooted on the claws as they tugged and yanked to free themselves from the wood and lash out again. Some of the holes were large enough to see the Witch on the other side, its grimy, off-grey body jerking and seizing as it wailed and keened, ribs heaving.

"It ain't yo' fault, babygirl." Coach whispered, pressing lips to the top of her head, damp hair muffling his voice. His arms tightened, holding her close. "None of it's yo' fault." He could feel her shoulders heaving, starting to cry against his chest, hot breath gasping into the soaked fabric of his shirt.

"I should have had us get inside the second it started rainin'. you hear me? It was my fault, this shit's my fault. I thought we could get back to the boys without runnin' into trouble."

Coach held her, cradled her, and he felt the dull sensation of his heart breaking within his chest. He held her like he'd hugged his daughter as he'd packed away his things, trying to find the words to explain that it wasn't goodbye forever.

He still couldn't find them.

The Witch broke through with a whole arm, the sound a horrendous crash of breaking wood. Its screams filled the pawn shop as it clawed at the air, buried in the door up to its shoulder. Blood trickled from where broken shards of wood had stabbed into its skin, but it barely reacted.

Swinging with its other claw, it started to widen the hole, hacking with frantic energy as it tried to cram its body through.

Coach didn't expect Rochelle to pull away from him. Twisting suddenly, she jerked out of his arms, scrabbling to get her rifle strap off her shoulder and the gun into her hands. Setting her jaw past a tiny sob, she shook her head, aiming up her rifle at the Witch with a trembling grip.

"I'm not going down without a fight." Rochelle growled, brow fierce. Her eyes were swimming, but her voice was wrought with fury. "Let's give her something to cry about."

She shot, the sound cracking through the pawn shop with an echoed volume - and the bullet struck straight through the door, a meaty sound announcing that it had hit. The Witch didn't even react as the bullet buried straight into its chest, breaking a wide patch of door away with a sharp punch with steely claws.

Coach felt a burst of pride choke his throat closed, and he scrunched his brow tightly, silent as he dragged his shotgun into his hands from where it dangled at his side. He stepped up beside Rochelle and raised the double-barrel shotgun up to shoulder-height and fired.

The blast not only took out a section of the door, but a section of the Witch's shoulder. A strange grimy blood poured down its arm as bone shattered and flesh tore, the tattered shirt that barely clung to the once-woman's torso slipping to bare a sunken breast.

It still didn't stop.

Coach felt his body stiffen as if preparing for impact, even as he moved to reload his gun. The Witch clambered up its torso onto the top of the dresser, squirming through the hole it had created in the door, raking its back raw on the shattered wood.
"Sorry, Coach." Rochelle whispered sideways, almost wryly. Her chin was low and she'd lowered the barrel of her rifle a little. Just an inch.. and just enough to express her resignation, even as she forced her finger back on the trigger.

Coach wanted to tell her he loved her, but nothing came to his tongue. Just air and a choked-up sensation that froze his gut. So he smacked the shotgun barrel back into place and lifted it to fire a second time.

The Witch's scream hit a climax as it made to crawl forward off the dresser, claws raising up and stretching out toward them. A burst shoulder and the chalky spill of gore from the hole in its side meant nothing to it. It was all animal instinct.

It would be a split second's sprint from the door to them. They were going to die.

Coach gritted his teeth.

The last thing he expected was for the Witch to jerk to a violent halt, whole body seizing up.

It screamed, forward motion stopped as if it'd reached the end of a leash. Its torso crashed into the front edge of the dresser, buckling forward. Even as it clawed toward the floor to try and stop itself, its body slid backwards.

Rochelle froze up, Coach doing the same. There were hands.. human hands, grabbing a hold of the Witch's waist and dragging it forcefully back, struggling as the creature's screams turned absolutely ear-shattering.

Like being touched terrified it.

A voice came snarling from outside, muffled under a crash of thunder, and there was a scuffle as the Witch slipped entirely back out of the doorway. Shadows flashed over the hole in the door, but nothing coherent could be made out of it through the rain.

As the thunder eased, the voice became audible: "¡-uta madre!" Strangled with effort, the Spanish intonation was clear and aggressive.

Complete relief mixed with a tidal wave of complete panic, and Rochelle bolted forward, nearly shrieking. "Chris! Sweet Jesus - Chris!" Coach was right behind her, and they both slammed into the chest of drawers at the same time, shoving and pushing the thing out of the way.

"¡Que te jodan!" The chatter didn't stop, mixed in with the Witch's screaming and his own grunts and struggles as if the Spaniard was bodily wrestling it. "Give up! Gah!"

Coach's throat was too closed up to even breathe, practically kicking at the dresser to shove it away from the door. Rochelle darted around him the instant there was space, gait wild as she pounced the door, shoving it open and skidding out into the rain.

Christophe had the Witch pinned to the wall of the pawn shop, gripping the thing's wrists to keep its claws away from him. The Witch screamed straight in his face, a visible cringe all over his sopping features, and its infection-strengthened body struggled violently.

There was a long gouge along his arm, freshly bleeding. Every time he got the Witch's wrists flat to the wall it would surge back toward him and he'd have to struggle to keep the claws away from his face. He couldn't grab for his machete; the Witch didn't let up long enough to allow for the movement.
Rochelle could hardly move, gapping into the rain, shock tightening her chest. "You .."

Bright brown eyes flashed sidewards, blinking past the rain, seeing Rochelle so close. Panic widened his eyes, just barely wrestling the creature to the wall. "¡Oiga! Shoot her! ¡Ayúdame, por favor!"

The shout shocked her out of it, and Rochelle quickly lifted up her rifle. She jolted forward, taking aim at the Witch's struggling head, her face messily pressing up into the scope. She fired just as Christophe's hand slipped, fingers wet from the rain.

The Witch screamed fiercely as its claws collided with his shoulder. His eyes widened, body stiffening as the slice of its blade-like digits slashed into his shoulder.

The bullet exploded through the Witch's skull, its body jerking up and going limp like so many cards blown over. It slid down the wall, head nearly entirely obliterated but for a few shards of bone still maintaining some semblance of a skull.

Lightning and thunder screamed in the Witch's place - but it was silenced, finally, body slumping.

Christophe staggered backwards, losing his footing and crashing down to the asphalt. A low, keening sound - rough and raspy with pure agony - made its way past his lips, hand crossing over his body to grip his shoulder. Blood poured up from the gash, spilling onto the asphalt to spread in the puddling rain.

Expression stiff with sudden grimness, Coach hustled forward around a shock-frozen Rochelle to drop quickly down next to the youth. "Whoa, boy, calm d-"

And then Coach went silent.

Gasping out slightly, Rochelle hurried a couple steps closer, a hand raising to cover over her mouth. Rain drenched down over them, lightning exploding overhead, and Christophe's eyes closed against the downpour as he gargled a choked scream. "F-fucking - whore -"

Coach half-muttered a "Shit," bending down. He slipped a thick hand underneath Christophe's head, lifting it up a little, and hunched over him to shield him from the worst of the storm.

"I-Is he - okay?" Rochelle risked, side-stepping a little, hesitance muting her shout over the thunder.

The big man's head shook. That scared her more than anything.

With a frustrated noise, Rochelle forced herself closer, dropping harshly to a knee next to Christophe's hip. When she saw the wound to his shoulder closer, her eyes widened in horror, gut wrenching so hard she almost retched.

The Witch had cut nearly three-quarters of the way through his shoulder. Blood obscured it, but a few inches past the shoulder strap of his grimy wifebeater there was open air. Only bits of muscle and flesh held it together at the inside of his arm - even his humerus had mostly shattered at the collision.

Arteries and veins leaked violently from the sundered socket of his shoulder. The faint movements and tremors that crept down the length of his nearly detached arm were little seizures and flexes, like those of a dying animal.

"Oh God." Rochelle barely whispered, the act of forcing her gaze away from the gore almost painful, so hard was her horror riveting her to it. She dragged her eyes up to Christophe's face, the Spaniard's features paled to a ghost white and drawn in excruciating pain.

"Coach... oh my God, his arm... Coach, we have to help him..." Rochelle leaned forward, in a surge, stretching fingers up to touch the youth's cheek. "He came back to find us. He just saved us."

The big man gripped the back of Christophe's head, rain thundering against his back as he shielded the other man from the spray. A deep, grim uncertainty worked its way through his expression, crinkling his brow and dragging his mouth down.

Chris' body twitched, knees moving into a little bit of a bend, as if he were going to hop up to his feet. His eyes were glazed over with pain, breath coming in short, quick stutters. Rochelle dropped her hands to gently touch onto his abdomen, like she could calm him.

He didn't even seem conscious.

"Help me carry him inside. We got supplies." Coach stated, voice fierce - and shaking. There was a nausea etched into his brow, but a stubborn decision built into his voice. "Ain't sho' we can save the arm."

Rochelle didn't even respond, ducking to try and slip her arms underneath Chris' legs, gazing up uncertainly as Coach moved his arms. He scooped under the Spaniard's torso with one as he practically held the man's nearly-lost arm together with the other.

The Spaniard let out an almost exhausted scream toward the sky as the movement jostled his shoulder. The mere touch of Coach's hand sent agony through his body. Dark eyes rolled up underneath his lids as the shock set in, jaw going slowly limp.

"But.. we gotta do what we can."
The grungy smell of blood roiled so thick in the air it was tangibly wet against Rochelle's skin. She could taste it in the back of her throat, blood and bile, and every time she swallowed it turned into a gag. It took all her self-control not to turn away.

"You gotta hold him."

Coach had said it three times already. The Spaniard was sprawled on his back on the pawn shop floor, water and blood mixing together in a thick smear around him.

Muffled groans escaped the youth at strangely high pitches, the pain keeping him from slipping entirely unconscious. Rochelle's expression was drawn in a look of sympathetic distress, aware of the way Chris' eyes slipped in and out of focus - awake.

The blood pouring from his nearly-cleaved shoulder had slowed to a gush, leaking onto the hardwood floor. The bronzed glow to his skin had faltered to a pale, sickly shade, as much blood loss as it was shock.

Rochelle's head jerked when Coach suddenly growled, snapping in front of her face - his fingers were covered in blood, and it was the sight of them more than the wet snap itself that pushed her to move.

Covering Chris' eyes with one hand as if it might calm him, Rochelle forced herself down to her knees and toes, bracing her other against his uninjured shoulder. She pressed him carefully flat against the floor, using her palm to still the tremors and small seizes shaking his frame.

"Coach." Rochelle muttered, her voice struggling with each syllable. "How - how are we going to stop the bleeding..? It'll only get worse if we .. take his arm.."

The ex-football player was grim as she'd ever seen him, jaw locked in a steely clench that expressed nothing but a faint uncertainty. He shook his head, silent, and straightened up a little from his kneel.

Coach undid the buckle of his belt, tugging the dark strip free of his beltloops and giving it a once-over in his hands. He squeezed it slightly, stretching at the unforgiving leather, his mouth downturning sharply.

"I ain't sure, babygirl." Leaning down, Coach turned his body slightly, bending over to gaze over Chris' injury. "Best tie it off. Might help slow it down." He delicately thumbed a line from Chris' armpit to the top of his shoulder - there was just a few inches of space before the wound. Just barely enough.

Rochelle kept her hand over Chris' eyes, soothingly, as unlikely as it was that the Spaniard registered the touch. Her chin trembled, eyes squinting slowly as she watched Coach slip the belt underneath what remained of the youth's shoulder. "Do you.. know what you're doing?"

"'Nough." Drawing the belt around the stumped shoulder, Coach slipped the tip through the buckle. A gruff shadow covered his eyes as he tipped his chin, gripping the leather tight as he pulled it closed.

The loop drew tighter and tighter on Chris' skin - and Coach kept pulling, till the leather started to bite into his shoulder. As the belt viced around the width of his arm, digging in with creaks of leather and the rasping of the buckle clattering along, the flow of blood staggered to a weird trickle from his sundered shoulder.

The makeshift tourniquet, tightened by Coach's strong grip, did a mediocre job of pinching veins shut. Some deeper blood vessels kept on undaunted, but the sight of the slowing drain was reassuring. Rochelle felt a tiny huff of air escape her that she'd been holding.

Chris didn't seem to feel the pressure, his slow groans and almost frothed twitches of pain unchanging. Rochelle let her thumb bury into his sweat- and rain-spiked hair, rubbing at his scalp and brushing it back from his forehead.

"He'll be a'ight." Coach muttered in a low tone. Bicep taut with the strength it took to hold the belt in place, he reached his other hand to pick up Chris' machete. "Don't worry, babygirl, we'll make sure he's a'ight."

Rochelle reflexively twisted her face away, mouth screwing up at the confident way Coach held the blade, but he wasn't going for the Spaniard's arm - yet.

Folding the straining belt back a little, the football coach set the tip of the blade against the leather and twisted it in rapid half-circles. Lining it up in the center, Coach worked a little hole into the belt, the blade tearing through the material with some struggle.

Little tufts of brown hide built up on the blade, sinking in twist by twist. When the sword suddenly jerked forward as it breached through, Coach tossed it to his lap, shaking his hand out with a frown.

There was a tense silence as he leaned forward, tugging the belt just a little tighter before he used his thumb to push the buckle hook through the makeshift hole. It shut with a snap, and the big man leaned back to eye it all. The biting indention around the belt's width squeezed flesh into a reddened flush, and the longer he looked, the more the wound seemed to be clotting up instead of gushing.

Inhaling a deep sigh that made his nose wrinkle with the smell of blood, Coach glanced up at Rochelle. There was a nauseated tension to her jaw, and her gaze flicked nervously toward his face when his did. "Guess it's working."

"You gonna be okay, babygirl?" Ignoring the statement, Coach eyed her, settling a hand down on the handle of Chris' machete. He felt at it, half-heartedly grasping the glaze-sheathed wooden grip.

She shrugged minutely, brows dragging together over milk chocolate eyes as she feigned humor. "I … might pass out, but I'm not the one losing an arm.. Sweet Jesus, I can't believe we're doing this..." Her chin dropped, an aching gesture of disbelief, and Coach frowned.

He wanted to reach out and grip her hand, but his were covered in blood already.

"We gotta. He ain't gonna make it if we don't get bandages on that, and we can't wrap it like this." A deeper frown touched Rochelle's face, and Coach leaned toward her slightly. "Babygirl - he already lost his arm, we ain't condemnin' him to anything. Bone's broke, thing ain't even connected."

Sympathy was plastered all over her eyes. Her lips pursed together, brows flinching, and Coach could tell he wasn't helping. "If we could get him to a hospital - they'd find a way to reattach it..." Coach frowned at her for a moment, silent, and Rochelle sighed with a sharp shake of her head. "I know, I know.." she mumbled, frustrated. "Just.. Do it fast. Okay? He's in a lot of pain."
As if in acknowledgement of the statement, Chris gave a seizing jolt, his spine trying to arch. "Hluh-gghhn- dios... duel-" escaped him in a sputter. Rochelle had to quickly slip her hand flat on his chest, holding him down, struggling with the spasms wrenching him.

It was pathetic to watch - like a dying bird.

Giving a sigh, Coach reached back, pawing his backpack close to himself. "There's adrenaline in here - might help him last, and with the pain.." He yanked the zipper undone, digging into the contents until his fingers brushed the plastic adrenaline auto-injector.

He felt Rochelle's gaze flick to his face, watching him as he gripped the injector in a fist. "Health class." was all he gave as an explanation, thumbing the safety cap off. The ex-football player leaned over, gripping one hand onto Chris' knee. Holding his leg still, Coach braced his weight on a knee and swiftly stabbed the auto-injector into Chris' outer thigh.

The plastic folded up as it hit his leg, baring the needle as it plunged into skin, burrowing through the fabric of his cargo shorts. Coach held it in place as the adrenaline absorbed, making sure Chris' leg didn't move.

After a quiet count to ten, Coach pulled the injector free and tossed it aside. He set his palm flat to the same spot and rubbed in rough circles, glancing up to eye the Spaniard. "C'mon, boy - don't back out on us now."

The adrenaline worked fast - although Christophe didn't react to the injection, within a few nervewracking beats he was showing the rush. His breathing, already shallow and quick, sped up to quick pants. Sweat beaded up gently over his forehead, and although a strange flutter started at his eyelids as if he was in distress, he quieted slightly.

Coach acted the instant he regained some semblance of calm - he gripped the machete and leaned forward, setting the tip of the blade against the wood just an inch from what clinging muscle and flesh remained to keep Chris' arm connected to his shoulder.

Deepset eyes rose to scan Rochelle's face, as if looking for something. His jaw set, and he reluctantly nudged, "You wanna look away?" She did, mouth flinching as her gaze darted off toward the wall, and Coach took that as permission to go.

He chopped down, as accurately as possible on that clinging stretch of flesh. Without a serrated edge, the blade's slice was awkward and messy as it clipped through muscle - but with a grunt, Coach forced the blade down to the floor.

Unfortunately, Chris felt it.

The full-bodied scream that burst out of him startled Rochelle nearly into losing her grip. Wincing heavily at the sound, she quickly clamped a hand over Chris' mouth, stifling the scream into a strange groaning.

"Christ.. if it wasn't storming we'd have infected on our asses.." Rochelle mumbled, squinting harshly as the Spaniard's jaw gnashed under her grip, saliva panting onto her palm. She kept her other hand gripped on his chest, soothingly rubbing in slow circles. "I-Is he conscious?"

Coach didn't respond. Forcing the blade in a ragged sawing motion with the sickening noise of slicing flesh, he tensed up his spine as what was left of Chris' shoulder broke apart.

Blood spilled from newly sawn flesh, but it was a slow dribble with so much of the bloodflow cut off by the makeshift tourniquet. Flecks of ruined bone stuck to the blade amidst smeared blood, and with a restrained shudder, Coach tossed it away with a clatter.

The youth's arm lay precisely where it had been an instant before - but it was suddenly different. Like plastic, almost, or rubber.. a slow leak of blood from bared meat the only sign that it was anything but.

It was just lifeless bone and sinew, a strange tension to the bulge of bicep, as if it were stuck in a flex.

Rochelle couldn't bring herself to watch when Coach delicately scooped fingers underneath the detached arm's elbow and picked it up, grip awkward on the rapidly chilling dead weight. It was limp and loose at the joints, but he quickly tightened his grasp to try and keep it immobile, holding it far away from his chest.

"What are you.. going to do?" she forced herself to ask, a thick silence following as Coach gazed toward her.

When he finally responded, it was slow and matter-of-fact. "Bury it outside. Ain't gonna throw it out fo' the zombies to get at, no sir." Rochelle nodded quickly, a little bit of relief touching her brow - only to fade.

"Do you want me to go with you? It's storming, Coach -"

"No." Coach immediately asserted, gesturing at Chris with his chin. "If he's got any senses 'bout him, I ain't havin' him left alone. You start bandagin' up his ar- .. shoulder. Leave the belt on, may keep him alive. I'll help when I finish up."

Chris had fallen to faintly groan-lined whimpers, sweat beaded thickly across his face. There were exhausted lines drawn into his face, pale and sunken, all the vibrant and swarthy glow gone from his skin.

He looked oddly young and cold, and Rochelle softly dragged his head into her lap, placing both hands on either side of his face and stroking with her thumbs. "Okay, Coach." she mumbled stiffly.

Rochelle was silent as Coach indelicately crossed the pawn shop floor back to the doorway. She reached out, dragging the backpack closer - lifting it out of the blood seeping along the floor - and starting to dig into it for gauze and bandages.

Her knuckles brushed the hard back of the notebook she'd secreted away in there when he wasn't looking, but she ignored it.

When Coach slipped outside into the storm through the broken door, Rochelle was starting to unroll bandages. She leaned forward to start wrapping him up, looping it around his neck to cross straight over the raw plane of his ruined shoulder.

The feeling of solitude as Coach disappeared was cloying - painful. She kept moving, mechanically, brows dragging together as shudders traced the Spaniard's body. He seemed to have finally lost consciousness, the adrenaline maybe causing enough of a reprieve from the pain to lapse into sleep.

His breath came in stuttered chokes.

"I'm so sorry..." Rochelle muttered, a flush of guilt dragging a mistiness clumsily to her eyes - she bit it back, forcefully, but no amount of self-control could hide the quiver to her voice.
"None of this should've happened."
Chapter 101

Ellis had slept like a rock through the rest of the night - but Nick had had no such luck. The very first time he'd stirred, some kind of ghostlike nightmare striking a cold shiver up his spine, he'd shot straight out of bed and set to pacing.

After that, sleep had come in blinks and waves, and he'd spent most of it stiffly stewing on the wicker chair beside the bed. He watched the storm rage on outside, refusing to fade.

It showed on his face, a haggard pallor and deepset circles under his eyes. No amount of a stiff upper lip helped Nick's appearance, and as sure as Ellis was that he didn't look up to par himself... he didn't like what he saw.

It was the young hours of a dark morning, light straining in through the window in off-orange sputters that just barely lit up the room. The storm outside hadn't stopped so much as abruptly died, and the stench of damp earth and waterlogged wood crept in through the walls, bloated and moldy.

Lifting a hand to rub at his eyes, Ellis let himself relax against the headboard of the bed, sighing a little. He dropped his gaze to look over his own torso, examining the spotty bruises that still marked out a faint boot tread along his chestbone.

"You okay, Nick? Seem sorta off it this mornin'." Rubbing at his jawline, Ellis re-focused up on the older man's frame, cocking his head. "You look like yer sweatin'."

Giving a sharp frown, Nick raised a hand almost reflexively to brush his wrist over his forehead - he was hot, no doubt, and a little clammy streak of sweat wiped off on his skin. "I'm fine, killer."

Settling his feet flat on the carpet, Nick shifted to stand up from the bed. The awkward tension of his heavily scarring calf, rubbing against the inside of his slacks, was still unfamiliar.

"It feels like the AC's out."

Although that was a partial lie, as he did feel feverish... the fact remained that the air was stiff and unmoving, thick with humidity. It wasn't exactly hot - the storm had cooled everything off - but it felt strange.

Ellis lifted up his chin and cocked his head a little, blinking. "Y'know, I thought it was kinda stuffy in here... just figured it was me." In an almost thoughtful motion, the kid gently got a grip on the blankets draped over his frame, tossing his wrists up to shuck the sheets off himself.

The motion left a little cringe on his face, but he quickly shook it off. Barechested, a layer of sweat lightening his skin to a low glisten, he curled his coverall-swaddled legs up to a half-bend - slow and easy. "Think the power's out?"

Arching a brow, Nick glanced over his shoulder. He focused on straightening his dress shirt and arranging it on his shoulders, but he let his eyes graze along the Georgian's battered form - pupils dilating with a slow darkness.

Ellis was all pale skin and flush muscle, building up to a healthy farmer's tan about his biceps. Scattered, old scars, speaking to energy and excitement and recklessness. Childish injuries.

Nick's scars reeked of bad bets.

"Only one way to find out." he sighed, almost hesitant. Lifting one hand as his other hand flattened his shirt against his body, Nick reached underneath the lampshade of the bedside table's light and twisted the knob.

It clicked, audibly, but the lightbulb failed to light. In reflexive stubbornness, Nick turned the switch a few more times, but nothing changed.

"Don't look good." Ellis chirped, stretching his hand up and digging fingers into his curls. A little frown lingered on his lips, and Nick glanced back at him, snorting a bit.

"When does it ever?" he half-mocked, returning both his hands to his shirt. He started buttoning up from the top down, not even looking down as his fingers moved with agile familiarity. "Ten to one, the storm knocked lines down."

Slipping his legs weakly off the edge of the bed, Ellis squirmed to sit up, wincing here and there as pain spasmed his ribcage. "Damn. Guess there ain't no chance fer a shower."

Nick arched up a brow, almost startled, smirking as he turned his head to examine Ellis' face. His gaze flicked up and down his body, lingering on the sweaty shapes of his hips. "That sounds like something I should be saying, not you."

"Ain't like yer the only one who likes'em, Nick." Ellis pointed out a little mutedly, giving a half-smile up toward the older man. Pawing a hand flat onto his stomach, fingers curled, he nodded his head. "Don't matter, though. We gotta go find Coach'n'Rochelle. Mind passin' muh shirt over here?"

Agreeing in silence, Nick turned, scooping Ellis' shirt up off the nightstand where Rochelle had put it. He offered it out, dangling it a few inches before the younger man's face. When Ellis took it, their fingers grazed.

The Georgian didn't exactly blush - but there was a smile, a little glow, and he focused raptly down toward his lap as he slipped his arms into the off-yellow Bullshifters shirt and gently tugged it over his head.

Nick felt a tug of a smirk at the edge of his mouth, amused, but he turned away. It was a strange thing, idle flirtation, not even fueled by lust. It was without goal or intention, just brushes of skin and flashes of embarrassment - the latter on Ellis' face, anyway.

The natural reflex was to chase after him, continue the flirtation until they ended up in bed.

Unfortunately, as was becoming common in the apocalypse, there were much more important things to be dealt with. Try as he might to ignore it, Nick was worried. With the weather at a stand-still, he'd have expected Coach and Rochelle to be showing up.

It had been at least a half hour since they'd woken, and likely plenty more than that since the storm itself had stopped.

They were nowhere to be seen, and that meant it was time to hunt them down.

"Okay, kiddo." the gambler announced, closing up the last button of his dress shirt and tucking the excess fabric into his slacks. He winced a little, keeping his injured shoulder still, and sighed. "I'll get you set up in here, load up your gun. It'd probably be a bitch to shoot but you shouldn't need it."

Raking fingers through his hair and pushing it away from his sweat-lined forehead, Nick took a deep breath. Ellis was growing a frown, slowly lifting his brows as he eyed the gambler.
"I don't know what's here. I don't think there's any food or anything, so don't hang out if I don't come back." Nick lifted a hand, two fingers straightened in simple order. "You wait two hours, and then you start worrying. I'd tell you to move on, but you'll pr-

"Wait?" Ellis interrupted, roughly, disbelief quick to bleed into his tone. "Ey, you ain't implyin' I'm stayin' here, are you?" Taking in a breath, Nick started to turn around, not surprised at the struggle.

What he didn't expect was just how hard Ellis would fight him.

"Whoa, whoa. Hold yer damn horses there, Mr. Gamblin' Man." the Georgian blustered, gripping hands onto the sheets at either side of his thighs and staring fiercely up at Nick. "If you think, fer one second, I'm gonna lay here while you go runnin' out all alone tuh find Ro'n'Coach, then you best get yer head checked."

Nick lifted up his hands, palms out, shushing him with a frustrated glare to his eyes. "Ellis, you're injured. I don't even think you can shoot a gun, let alone keep up with me."

"So're you!" Ellis shot back, pointing up at Nick's shoulder.

Rolling his eyes, the gambler let his arms cross over his stomach, narrowing his eyes on Ellis' face. "Kid, you've got a fractured rib. I've got a little hole. First infected that gets a hand on you, you'll be a whimpering pile on the ground."

Ellis' body stiffened up, straightening, and he jutted his jaw out with a stubborn set. "First Smoker or Hunter or Charger or horde whut gets you, you'll be helpless. I had tuh run on my own, Nick. I wasn't movin' fer ten minutes before I nearly got hogtied'n'eaten."

"Shows how good you are." Nick spat back, sparking a genuine frown of hurt on Ellis' face. He hadn't really meant to sound so serious about it, but it was too late to retract the words. "Look, Overalls, I'm not letting you come with. You'll slow me down and I need to find them fast. End of story."

"No," Ellis retorted. The Georgian pushed on the bed, straightening up to his feet with a slight wince. "I'm comin' with you. You need someone tuh watch yer back, 'n'I ain't lettin' you go off all hoity-toity, fixin' tuh get yerself killed."

Sharpening his gaze, Nick leaned forward, hostility raising up his shoulders. There was only a foot or two of distance between them, but Ellis stood his ground. "Overalls, this isn't a yes or no question. You're staying."

"No."

"Ellis -"

The Georgian took a half-step forward, voice raising with a sudden fluster of emotion, jaw stiffening and hands curling into fists. "I almost lost y'all once, I ain't layin' here tuh lose y'all fer real!"

That silenced Nick for a moment.

... Goddamnit.

Reaching up, Nick grasped the kid's shoulders. It wasn't rough, just a grip, and Ellis lifted his chin slightly to match his gaze. Stony, clear blue eyes were dark with a kind of restrained fear.
"Ellis. What happened back there - wasn't your fault." Nick enunciated it carefully, seriously... and green eyes leveled with blue ones with a layer of honesty. "Nobody knew all that shit was going to happen, and nobody knew this storm was going to happen, either. It's nobody's fault."

A huff passed through Ellis' nostrils, gaze shifting to the side suddenly as a frown of half-guilt strangled over his face. "I know." he muttered, shoulders lowering a little under Nick's palms. His whole body went limp, in fact, brows lowering.

Slight relief eased Nick's brow, thinking he'd broken through the Georgian's stubbornness. "Then quit blaming yourself and lay back down. I'll be back with Rochelle and Coach before you know it."

As if.

"No." Ellis returned quietly, frowning through the argument. "You ain't leavin' me, and that's that. Remember back when that Smoker nearly got you? But we grabbed you, 'n' broke the tongue - 'n'I tried to run in and kill it? Yuh got real mad at me, made me swear not tuh run off no more?"

Nick started to nod, features harshening, ready to bark out how that had nothing to do with the situation - but Ellis wasn't having any of it, already retorting back, breathlessly forceful.

"Don't you start runnin' off on me too! It ain't fair, Nick, I worry just like you do!"

Gritting his teeth in frustration, Nick lifted his hands up from the younger man's shoulders in an agitated gesture, flexing fingers. He turned away, scratching at the back of his neck. "Jesus fuckin' Christ, Overalls. You're stubborn as shit."

There was a moment of silence between them - tense. Slow.

Closing his eyes in a sharply irritated motion, breathing in deep as if to focus himself, Nick didn't expect it when Ellis' hands slipped between his elbows and his waistline.

Stretching fingers gently forward to half-embrace his waist in a hug, Ellis let his forehead rest against the back of Nick's neck, his shorter stature leaving the posture oddly comfortable. His voice had quieted to a near-murmur, and Nick felt the words in puffs, hot against his shirt.

"I can't sit here not knowin' if you -" A strangled pause, short and embarrassed, and then he recovered, slowly nuzzling his face against Nick's back. " - if y'all're okay.. I gotta come with, Nick. Okay? Please?"

Something stiffened Nick's spine. Maybe it was the closeness.. the need.. or maybe it was that vocal stumble. Regardless, a sudden and inexplicable desire for space and silence jammed its way into his brain and set his skin to crawling. He reached down to push Ellis' hands away.

"Get off, Overalls, you're sweating all over me." he muttered, abrasively, straightening his shirt. Embarrassed and a little startled at the reaction, Ellis quickly acquiesced, backing up a step and pulling his arms in toward his own sides.

Sighing in near-frustration, Nick raised hands up to rub at his temples. His shoulder ached with a persistent complaint, and his fever was giving him a headache.

He hadn't necessarily meant the words to come out as harsh as they had. They'd just slipped out, and the silence in their wake was ... uncomfortable. Nick flicked a glance over his shoulder, and he didn't like the sight.
Ellis was quiet, rubbing at the folds of his coveralls with his thumbs as if to distract himself. His ears burned slightly as he stood there behind Nick, feeling suddenly intrusive.. and a little rejected.

Ellis curled his lips inward, trying to gather the breath to apologize - and then Nick growled.

"Fine. We'll go together." His voice was low and agitated, resigned to giving in. Nick turned around, facing a surprised Ellis. "If only to make you fuckin' shut up. Jesus. And because you'd probably just come sobbing after me if I tried to leave, get us both ki-"

Ellis' arms were around him again in an instant, squeezing, making them both wince with pain. The Georgian nuzzled up against his neck, bleating out, "Hoh man, Nick, thank yuh - I couldn't sit here, Nick, I just couldn't.. I promise I won't cause no problems, I won't lag behind none.. you just see, you'll be real glad I came with!"

"I'm already regretting it." Nick muttered, shutting one eye, painfully shifting his shoulder in the midst of the hug.

"Get off!"
"Keep close."

Nick found himself regretting the command the instant he'd given it. He winced sharply as his first step out of the house was followed by the thud of Ellis' front against his back. It startled both of them, and Nick whipped his head around to give a dull glare over his shoulder.

Ellis was bright red, an apology all over his face as he caught his balance and scooted back a step to put space between them. He shifted his grip on his shotgun, reaching up tenderly to nudge his cap-bill down over his face. "U-uh, sorry, Nick - I thought you -"

"Wanted you to climb on me like a fucking five year old?" Nick muttered back, frustrated. He straightened out his clothes, almost roughly.

They'd found Nick's suit jacket in the bathroom, oddly clean. It had been reviving, comforting, although it was far too hot to consider wearing it. Nick had tied it around his waist, a strange companion to Ellis' bulky coveralls.

Nick shook his head, dismissing the argument before Ellis could apologize again, lifting his chin to gesture forward. "We got problems, kid."

Tybee's streets were a fair wreck. Windows had broken, spreading glass over the asphalt, and powerlines were toppled and dead. The electric cables had been ripped free of the wooden poles and lay like crushed snakes.

Worse than the debris was the infected that had gathered. It seemed like they were drawn to the house, attracted by some sixth sense for where the two were but unable to quite pinpoint them.

They stumbled around, clawing idly at each other and themselves - falling to their knees and vomiting, black liquids dribbling from their mouths like crude oil. One snarled, tackling another and biting into its shoulder.

The fight that resulted was completely isolated between the two, just wrestling and clawing to the ground. Nick watched with a slightly raised brow, adjusting his grip on his hunting rifle.

"Whut're you thinkin'?" Ellis murmured, leaning forward until he could whisper into Nick's ear. The graze of plush lips and the warm huff of breath made Nick scrunch a brow, but he didn't say anything. "They ain't noticed us yet.. maybe we should sneak around?"

"Sounds like a good idea to me." Nick agreed in a low voice, flicking a glance along the street. "If we stick to the edge of the street, stay low, quiet..." He nodded - then arched a brow. "Can you even do quiet, kid?"

The Georgian craned his head, sticking his tongue out at the gambler with a little smile. "Watch yer mouth, slick. I'll be quieter'n you."

Nick snorted slightly, cocking his head to get a better look at the Georgian's face, raising both brows. "Wanna bet?" He said it with a growl.. a low noise, challengingly. It seemed to cow Ellis, lips parting in a soft breath - but he leaned closer instead of away.

The gambler flicked a glance over his face, smirking suddenly, using his good shoulder to shove the younger man back a step. Ellis winced at the push, quickly catching his balance with a plaintively whispered "Ow!"

It was the first time he'd let on to being in pain, and even that he quickly disguised. He straightened and smoothed out his expression. Nick noticed, and the strangest feeling bubbled sharply in his gut.

Amusement - and a little pride. It was a funny feeling, sparking over his mind. Ellis was stubborn and tough, and as much as it agitated him, it impressed him a little bit, too.

Nick smirked wider, shaking his head subtly, dismissing both the conversation between them and himself. He wasn't eager to follow that train of thought. "Playtime's over, kid, we gotta get moving. Coach and Ro' are waiting, come on."

The two men slipped away from the house. Staying close to the face of the building and moving in a slow half-crouch, they eased softly onto the sidewalk, breaths practically held as Nick led the way.

The infected that clotted the streets seemed oblivious to them - at least temporarily. Nick wasn't eager to test it, eyes quick to scan for the best way to proceed.

Cars lined the side of the road, and Nick padded softly to duck behind the first one, a small green sedan with its side door ripped off. Ellis slipped behind him, hushed, crouching down and settling a hand against the side of the car.

Nick glanced back at him, nodding sharply. He thumbed forward, speaking so lowly it was more mouthing than actual words. "If we stay behind the cars, we should be alright..." He flicked a glance along the sidewalk, scanning along the row of buildings that cushioned their side of the street.

The infected seemed, at least temporarily, contained to the road - he couldn't see any creeping around on the sidewalk. But they were putting themselves at great risk. If the infected were alerted, they'd clot up and overwhelm them.

Sighing, Nick shifted, letting his back slip against the side of the car. He could feel water, left over from the storm, soaking into his back from the surface of the metal. A frown edged the corner of his mouth down, and he glanced toward Ellis' face. "The only issue is we don't know where we're going."

Ellis nodded a little, shifting slightly to match Nick's posture. "Maybe they left signs or somethin'. They're real smart, Nick, they wouldn't'uv just gone off without thinkin' about a plan."

Letting off a small grunt noise, Nick craned his head up, slowly straightening until he could see through the car windows. Staring out into the street, he watched a zombie shamble past, slowly. "I'd like to think so." He muttered back, glaring slightly. "But I'm not sure. Fuckin' idiots probably thought nothing would go wrong.. goddamnit."

Ellis gave a slight frown, cocking his head and glancing up at Nick. The conman could see his attention from the corner of his eyes, but he didn't look, narrowing his eyes further.

"Last fucking time I let them go off on their own, goddamn." Nick reached up a hand to rub at his brows, harshly, frustration sinking in even deeper to his tone. Shifting, he dropped a knee to the sidewalk so he could lift up a little higher, scanning the street with a faint mutter. "If I were some assclowns, where would I g-"

"Nick.." Ellis interrupted in a whisper, reaching suddenly out to put a hand on the gambler's sleeve. Nick silenced, arching a brow with a small sideglance. "Why .. didn't you go with 'em?"
There was a moment of silence before Nick reacted, twisting his head away and shifting his arm out from under Ellis' hand. "Is this really the best time to be chatting?" he hissed softly, raising his head to re-focus on the street.

Undaunted, Ellis scooted a couple inches closer, his knees nudging into Nick's thigh. "I'm whisperin', Nick." he said almost dully, matter-of-factly, continuing on earnestly. "It ain't 'cause yer injured -"

"Overalls." Nick muttered, warningly.

"- 'cause you wouldn't'uh let them talk you down fer nothin'." Drifting into something like a gentle smile as he traced his own line of thinking, Ellis reached out again, gripping for Nick's sleeve. "Ro' could'uh watched me. It would have been okay."

"Ellis." Harsher that time, darker.

Ellis' fingers touched down on his elbow, and he grasped at the fabric, tugging softly - mindful of Nick's injured shoulder. He whispered, furtively, leaning forward until his breath huffed against the gambler's ear. "I'm just sayin'… You don't gotta lie. You can just say you wanted tuh stay with me. I don't min-"

Snarling in a huff of air, Nick reached to grasp Ellis' shirt in one swift snag. The kid startled, but Nick was already pushing him hard into the side of the car, silencing him. "Will you -"

The thud was followed instantly by a gasp, Ellis cringing in on himself as the collision shocked through his torso. His eyes widened slightly, grabbing Nick's forearm with his free hand and huffing out a noise of pain.

The moment Nick had done it he stiffened, seeing the pain and the edge of confusion all over Ellis' face. As fast as he'd grabbed on he let go, shaking off Ellis' grip.

Shit -

As the Georgian regained his breath, wheezing softly, Nick retreated a few inches. He bristled slowly, shoulders raising, and his voice went ruthlessly sharp as he spoke.

"I wanted to fuck you.." He quickly twisted his head away to avoid seeing Ellis' expression as the younger man slid down the side of the car slightly, winded. Green eyes went sharply narrowed, frustrated. "Okay? I stayed behind so I could fuck you. Is that what you want from me? Is that the gushy bullshit you want?"

Nick expected anything but Ellis' jaw to stiffen. Expected anything but those pain-wrought brows to tighten up, anything but Ellis to lean forward, pushing away from the car to retort back at him.

"You were .. were beggin' me tuh leave you alone." he whispered, voice hushed with tension and hitching with pain. He honed a fierce stare on Nick's face, coughing faintly and tipping his chin up challengingly. "So yeah. That's bullshit."

Nick started to grit his teeth, anger rising up his spine in a flood. What did Ellis expect - want? Nick to admit the violent desperation he'd felt to get Ellis in his arms after thinking him dead? Now, of all times? He snapped up a hand, ready to jab a finger at the kid and growl a response - ready to fight him off, defend himself...

… and then they heard the snarl. It was idle, more questioning than anything else, but irrefutably close. Maybe even just on the other side of the car they ducked behind.
Cursing silently with a sharp jerk of his head, Nick dropped down into a low crouch, setting his hand on the damp sidewalk concrete. His other hauled his rifle up and quickly got a grip on the trigger. Slipping his head up a faint degree, Nick snuck a glance through the car window, eyes narrowing.

There were three or four zombies gathering close to the car, alert and gnashing their teeth. Feral yellow eyes flicked around, and they had their mouths hanging open.

Like dogs, huffing a scent.

Ellis mimicked him, silently, flattening against the car and snapping both his hands onto his shotgun. Blue eyes flicked up, then back to Nick, focused. ‘Move?’ he mouthed, questioningly, uncertainty darting up over his expression.

Something sunk in Nick's stomach, chilling to a frozen focus. Even with what Nick had said, Ellis was looking to him for answers - earnestly, genuinely. Trustingly. There wasn't even hurt on his face.

God, you're an idiot.

Nick nodded, silently, mouthing back; 'Easy.' He gestured smoothly to wave Ellis with as he made to crouch-walk along the sidewalk. They kept tight against the car and low to the ground, slowly - quietly, but not quietly enough.

The snarling grew louder and closer, attracted to the rustle of their clothes and scuffs of their boots. Nick felt his breath huffing, shallowing, pupils narrowing as he scanned the sidewalk ahead of them for a plan, an option, a way out.

The two men darted to the next car, crossing that empty space between them. It was only a few feet, a couple strides, but Nick felt a stab of vulnerability in that instant - only breathing again when they'd reached the truck ahead of them.

Ellis crept along so close their bodies moved in sync. Each step was met with another, each shift shadowed. Nick wanted to snap at him for being so close, but he held his tongue, focusing.

Slowly, Nick crouched up to the haunch of the truck, listening to the snarling that was growing closer and louder every second - multiplying. Every step was encouraging the infected toward them. They were screwed and he knew it.

Raising a hand, Nick gestured sharply over his shoulder, a crooked finger beckoning the younger man closer. Ellis was crammed up against his back in an instant, face shoved next to his to listen.

"Kid..." he whispered, just a faint breath against Ellis' cheek. "We're not going to sneak out of this.. You book it down the street, and I'll cover you." He saw Ellis' expression shift, saw the argument before it came. "I'll be right behind y-"

The scream of rage came from behind them, an excited shriek. Nick glanced back long enough to see the zombie standing yards down the road, reaching out with bloody hands, grabbing at the air between them.

And then Ellis' hand touched his.

"Naw."

Fingers stretched and grasped and suddenly they were holding hands, digits twining up - and in one surge, Ellis bolted up to his feet and ran. Nick was a split second behind him, any of his desire to fight drowned out by the way Ellis' grip threatened to drag him.

The horde exploded into life in their wake. All in an instant, every infected on the street was screaming and sprinting after them. They scrambled over the cars like ants to pour onto the sidewalk behind them.

"Tits!" Nick snarled, feeling the sweat between their fingers and gripping on tighter. The shrieks grew fast behind them, and when he snatched a glance over his shoulder, it was one he regretted.
"Fuck!"

The infected were running far faster than they were.

"You wanna make a stand, Nick?" Ellis shouted back at him, his voice full of a strangled pain.
Running with a fractured rib had to be agonizing, but he kept moving, nursing his torso with every step. "We could fight 'em -"

"We're gonna get fucked!" Nick snarled. "Don't stop!" With their hands linked between them like lifelines, the two men sprinted down the sidewalk, the distance between them and the horde thinning rapidly.

Ellis shoved up his shotgun, gesturing down the road mid-step. His voice was full of that spark, that inspiration, that Nick was starting to trust - reluctantly. "Look, that car up ahead -" Nick saw it.
A silver sedan, the back door hanging wide open. "- we jump into it, use it like a bunker.."

Nick instantly nodded, no hesitation. It'd give them something to put their back to, and that was a feeling Nick would pay money for. "Let's go." he snarled, suddenly widening his stride and closing the gap between Ellis and him, their hands clasped between their bodies.

It occurred to Nick in that single, adrenaline-drugged instant, that he'd never held a lover's hand that long in his life.

When Ellis skidded to a sudden halt, so hard the two men collided, Nick's head jerked up. He'd recognize the shape that staggered out from behind the alleyway in front of them anywhere. It was burned into his brain in all its gruesome existence.

The Boomer turned bleary eyes toward them, its shuddering sac of a body twitching as pustules strained on its skin. Stub-fingered hands splayed out, and as its body seemed to jerk back, a garbled hoarking sound seized its whole body in one fierce motion.

"Shit!" both men blurted in unison.

It was Nick who acted first. He snatched his free arm around Ellis' waist, snarling at the pain of moving his shoulder, and jumped hard to the side. He could feel Ellis moving with him, surrendering to the motion.

They hit the front of the truck, rolling half-onto the hood, Nick taking the brunt of the strike. The Boomer's chunk-filled spout of vomit exploded ahead of it, spewing through the air like the spray of a hose. Nick struggled to get his footing, Ellis rolling off of him to do the same, huffing sharply.

The smell was horrendous - but the sound was worse, between the splattering and the retching.

Nick was inches away from bolting, ready to sprint across the street and make a break for one of the side alleyways, but Ellis grabbed him by the tied folds of his suit jacket and halted him. "W-wait .."
Whipping around, already snarling a sharp, "What?!", Nick saw it too.

The horde had caught up to them just in time for the first few to take splatters of vomit head-on. They seemed to halt, skidding on the slick concrete, clawing at the air and raising hands to touch at their skin - feeling the goo, the bile, under their fingertips.

They seemed… shocked.

And then one of the infected behind them, one that hadn't taken the brunt of it, lashed out in a punch so fierce its arm speared through the zombie in front of it. Fingers clawed and squirmed, like it was trying to feel the bile its counterpart was covered in.

All in one screaming motion, blood mixing with vomit, the horde fell in on itself, collapsing like a black hole. It was like Nick and Ellis didn't even exist. They shrieked as they tore into each other, scrambling like starving animals, clawing and biting.

Nick stared. Ellis was staring next to him, their bodies half-pressed against each other, fingertips vaguely touching at the other's clothing, shocked. Uncomprehending. Just looking on like it would make sense any second.

The only thing that became clear was that there were more infected coming. Shrieks rose up around them, approaching fast from either direction of the streets. The sound, and the awareness of how the vomit had attracted hordes before, startled Nick into thought.

He grabbed Ellis' elbow, whispering sharply against his jaw. His cheek felt rough against the peach-fuzz stubble that covered Ellis' - like sandpaper. "We better get the fuck out of dodge, kid. Got company."

Ellis nodded shortly, and they parted in a clumsy turn, Nick leading the way this time as they bolted across the street for a smaller side road. He could tell Ellis was slowing, and he was sharply aware of it.

Who knew how badly the Georgian had injured himself running around - not to mention the fact that Nick had shoved him, hard.

The horde thickened behind them as more infected came shrieking to join the mess. The zombies didn't spare so much as a growl for the fleeing men; they were too busy tearing into each other. It was pure violence, as if they were looking for something they couldn't find. They hunted, searching in the organs and viscera of their fellows.

The survivors ran hard down the sidewalk, sprinting, Ellis close on Nick's tail. He snuck a glance back over his shoulder, making sure the infected weren't after them. They weren't, not by a longshot.

The sweet inhale of victory made Ellis laugh, suddenly. It was this hitched guffaw, a little drunk with pain, and the instant it started he couldn't stop it. His footsteps wobbled, slowing, hitting the face of the building next to him with his shoulder and spinning a little.

Nick forced himself to stop too, skidding, hearing Ellis' steps stutter. Reaching out a hand quickly to stabilize himself on the wall, he half-turned, glancing back at Ellis. He expected to see the kid collapsing, but instead...

"They.." Ellis was breathless, laughing in such short and fast gasps he sounded giddy. "They got puked on, man... holy shit.."
Straightening a little, Nick stared for a beat, almost startled... and then he felt the chuckle surge up his throat before he could control himself. He pawed up a hand over his eyes, rubbing into his forehead, feeling the heat emanating from his skin.

"They got puked on hard, kid." Nick shook his head, letting himself hunch forward as he caught his breath. Humor touched his voice, a little sarcastic, a little dark - but humor. "I think we are officially the first people alive to see zombies get puked on."

Ellis stumbled a step toward him, and without seeming to think, the Georgian swept arms around Nick's torso and squeezed. It was almost wrestling at him, just laughing, disbelief all over his face.

Nick didn't react at first, moving with the staggering motions. He just stared down, wanting to shove him off just like he'd done before.. but, slowly, a strange twitch began at the edges of his mouth that felt like a smirk.

His arms shifted up, like he might return the gesture -

And then a gunshot rang out, echoing above their heads, a heavy blast that exploded on the air even from a distance. Ellis froze, head jerking straight, brows crunching. "That..."

Nick frowned sharply, sliding back one step and twisting away. Ellis turned away from him without a single hint of hesitance, releasing his waist and perking up on the toes of his workboots.

The gambler tensed, defensively raising his hunting rifle even though there'd been no whizzing of bullets to warn that the shot was directed toward them. "The fucking hell -"

Another gunshot rang out, identical to the first. Calm, orderly, and loud.

Close. Maybe a couple streets over.

A smile broke over Ellis' face, and he reached out, almost smacking Nick in the forearm. The older man jerked slightly, glaring at him sharply, but Ellis completely ignored him with a bleated, "Nick! Hoh muh gawd, Nick! That's Coach's shotgun! Double-barrel, could tell that from anythin'!"

Blinking once, Nick absorbed that in an instant - and relief flooded him, real, honest relief.

The smirk that flashed over his face was huge, flashing teeth in a lopsided strip as he let off a short sigh. Nick raised up his rifle, pointing it at the sky without bothering to aim, and shot off a bullet.

The gunshot cracked in the air, making Ellis jump a little bit, but he was still grinning.

"Sic 'em, Fireball. Let's get our team back."
Ellis led the way with all the grace of a newborn fawn. His rib was seriously starting to pain him, even though he didn't say a word. Nick watched with some small degree of concern as the Georgian zig-zagged and stumbled ahead of him on the paved, condo-dotted road.

He was tempted to make him slow down, but Ellis was far too busy zeroing in on their lost teammates. Regardless, the sooner they found them.. the sooner the kid would calm down and take a break.

They moved down the center of Tybee, parallel to the oceanfront. The scent and smell of salt was starting to sift through the gory air, drifting in between the still-cramped buildings that huddled at the island's center. The thick rows of buildings and the dark foliage planted around them blocked any view of the ocean, but the greyed horizon seemed.. deeper.

Like the wide-open waters were just out of sight.

Coach's shots had quit after Nick had responded, and with good reason - ammo wasn't exactly expendable, and the sound was more likely to attract the infected toward them. Nick and Ellis had already had a near brush with a horde, and getting into a tangle with another one wasn't high on their list of things to do.

The gambler kept ears and eyes on their surroundings, minding the blundering mechanic ahead of him. The streets weren't devoid of infected, and Nick was quick to snap his rifle up and pick them off at a distance before they even really caught wind of the two men.

His shoulder pulsed in a slow, feverish rhythm, and his hands were much unsteadier than he was used to. The rifle sight trembled as he glanced through it, and he missed once or twice. Or three times. Or more. Nick was pretty sure Ellis never noticed, or maybe he did - but knew enough to bite his tongue.

Between the fever and the twitchy feeling as a want for nicotine turned into a need, he wasn't feeling great.

"I think it's around this corner." Ellis wheezed softly over his shoulder, pace picking up as he scooted down the sidewalk. Nick couldn't help but grunt, fighting the urge to order him to slow down.

Much against his will… the conman was eager, too.

He would have wanted more time to compose himself, to settle his face in distinct nonchalance for the reunion. He would've liked to plan out something cold to say, and well up the anger he'd felt the night before to take out on them today. He felt too much worry to see them as suddenly as he did.

Ellis skidded around the building at the end of the block, head perking up sharply as he pecked down the sidestreet. The strange wheeze-squeak that escaped him was a precursor to his bolting down the road, emotion thickening his voice as he quite nearly dropped his shotgun.

"G-Guys!" he yelped, disappearing behind the gaudy little convenience store just next to him. Nick gave a slight growl of annoyance, lowering his rifle and chasing after him around the corner at a quick jog.
Coach and Rochelle were running at them from the opposite direction.

It was almost laughable how much of a mirror image they were: both Coach and Nick slowed instantly upon spotting that the entirety of the foursome was there, but both Rochelle and Ellis sped up, breaking into full-pelt sprints towards each other.

They hit with an audible thud, and Ellis' loud cry of pain as their hug squeezed his chest was muffled by the way he buried his face into her neck and wrapped his arms tightly around her. Rochelle got her arms around Ellis' torso, pressing her cheek to the side of his head.

They hugged, squeezing and clinging, Ellis' shoulders shaking with emotion and the physical pain of all the contact. "Sweetie... it's okay. We're here, we're all here..." she murmured to him, tears streaking down her face. "You did great."

Nick stepped up slowly behind them, examining the embrace with a small sigh. He couldn't help it, and underneath the small mocking smirk that darted up to his face, there was a soft exhaustion. "Aw. You guys are cute."

Coach reached him just as he uttered the words. He was somewhat surprised to see the eldest sticking his hand out for a shake, but he gave in quickly, reaching out to clasp hands.

Coach's fingers were crusted with blood, and Nick started to question it with a raising brow - but the older man interrupted him immediately. "Good to see you, Nick." he grunted, smiling with that gruff but sincere expression he tended to hold to. "How's yo' shoulder?"

Nick returned it with a slight grin, a strip of teeth showing between stress- and dehydration-paled lips. "Feels like shit." he answered honestly.

The big man's smile widened, a baritone chuckle escaping his barrel-chested lungs, and he responded easily, "I'll be gentle, then." Nick only had time to blink before Coach used his hand to wrench them into a hug, the light embrace affectionate and genuine, but only actually bringing their shoulders into actually touching.

Nick's first instinct was to recoil, but something stopped him. He sunk into the feeling of belonging, of family, for just an instant. Green eyes lowered slightly, relenting to the fiercely sturdy grip Coach had him in.

"Good to see you, too, big guy." he reluctantly, quietly, uttered. The gambler clapped a hand on Coach's back, his body relaxing.

And then it was over.

Coach let him go, and they turned away from each other like nothing had even happened. They didn't even trade glances or pass a look between them - just turned away and focused on Rochelle and Ellis, a mutual dismissiveness to the other man.

The two younger survivors broke away from each other, finally, a smile beaming over Ellis' face as Rochelle grasped and squeezed at his hands. She was tearful, and suddenly his husky grey-blues were misted over, too. "J-jezz," he stammered, lower lip trembling with emotion. "Yer makin' me cry, too, girl..."

She could only give a laughed sob, leaning forward to press her forehead to his, sighing. "I'm sorry, sweetie, I'm just - I'm okay. Coach took care of me." Ellis scrunched his brows up, sniffing, his blurred vision making him blink rapidly.
Rochelle let him go when he suddenly perked up, gaze darting toward the ex-football player, eyes going as wide and jaw giving a tremor. He whined, softly, "C-Coach..." and bolted toward him, composure lost.

The big man grunted in surprise as Ellis pounced his waist, arms encircling the weighty gut of his midsection. Coach softened, eyes hidden under the shadow of his deep brow, and let an arm wrap around the other Georgian's shoulders.

"You a'ight, son?"

Ellis couldn't get out a response, just clung on in silence.

Rochelle took a second to wipe at her eyes, breath trembling, before she turned her gaze on Nick. He was quick to meet her gaze, grinning slowly, his voice low and easy-going. "What, no hug for me?" he murmured, expression turning into a teasing leer.

He hardly expected her to actually approach him - and his features went totally surprised when she stretched up and kissed him on the duskily stubbled cheek. It was short, soft - but very real, so real Nick fell to a pleased hum.

He sighed wearily, his eyelids dropping in lurid examination as she stepped away from him. "Couldn't get one on the lips, dollface?" he taunted, voice a husky roll.

Rochelle threatened him with a jut of her jaw, wiping at her eyes again as she fought a smile. "Shut up, jackass.. I'm glad you're okay."

Nick smirked at her, ever entertained at her expense, voice lightening as fast as it had darkened. He tiredly crossed his arms over his chest with his rifle caught in his elbow, cautious of his bad shoulder. "You too."

She looked away, smiling for a moment, taking in the sincerity without meeting his gaze.

However, he caught something else before Rochelle really turned away. Conflict tugged her head down, that smile disappearing in a flash as her gaze darted to the ground. Even as Ellis reluctantly pulled away from Coach, snuffling and beaming in a weak mess of joy, Nick zeroed in on Ro'.

He held his tongue, but the very familiar buzz of cynicism rose back up and mellowed out Nick's very unfamiliar buzz of affection. Something was wrong.

"Y'all don't even know how worried we were..." the kid sniffed, breathing heavily in little huffs. "When that storm blew up.. I was so.. just.." He scrubbed at his eyes, muscled shoulders shaking softly. "I don't wanna ever split up again."

Coach set a hand comfortingly on his shoulder, sighing, gently squeezing. "It'll be a'ight, Ellis. Ain't gonna be doin' that again anytime soon. We gonna stick together, no more 'we'll be back soon' shit."

Ellis nodded, weakly, slumping very gently as if his energy stores had run out and he was left with only the pain vibrating through his ribcage. "I sure hope yer right..." he mumbled with a slight wince. "Seems like it always ends up that way, though."

More than aware of the Georgian's pain, Nick interjected sharply, "As adorable as this whole thing is, we should get off the street. Rest, and get the fuck out of dodge before anything decides to ruin our little reunion."

He kept a stiff jaw, not betraying the fact that he was mostly saying it all for Ellis' benefit.

"Where'd you guys stay overnight?" Nick realized he'd stepped smack onto the issue before he even finished. Rochelle cringed, turning her gaze away, and Coach looked at her with a flinching jaw.

The lie tells were everywhere.

There was silence like radio static, sharp and fierce, and even Ellis was quick to notice the tension. He frowned, delicately, resting a hand on his side, aligned with his ribcage. "What's wrong...?"

Rochelle immediately turned to him and put her hands up in a soothing motion, trying to control her expression in front of him. "Nothing, sweetie, every - we're.. fine." She got choked up, her voice tremoring, and she had to look away before she lost her composure entirely. "Coach and I are fine.. we just.. Last night, -"

Rochelle wasn't going to be able to make her way through it. She could feel it, and the struggle showed on her face. Darting a glance toward Coach, she almost pleadingly bit at her lower lip.

The ex-football player took over.

"Somethin' happened." His brow scrunched deeply over his eyes as he inhaled a tight breath. His arms crossed over his chest, the deep barrel of his torso deflating slightly with his following sigh.

Ellis and Nick both stayed silent, gazes on the older man. Ellis' face was rapt with concern, open and honest... but Nick hid his eyes under a deeply scowled brow, agitation muddling any real understanding of his expression.

"We were bein' chased by a Witch the storm brought in. Jumped out of some alleyway, an' we ran into it before we saw it... Bitch chased us down a few streets an' got us backed into a pawn shop. Nearly had our asses, too."

The horror was evident on Ellis' face. He frowned, tightly, reaching up to weakly settle his hand flat on his trucker cap. Blue eyes darted to examine both Rochelle and Coach... but neither of them looked injured. Not any more than the last he'd seen them, and the blood all over them didn't seem to have an origin.

Confusion overtook the shock.

"How..?" he breathed.

Coach shook his head, sighing deeply as his chin lowered. "We wouldn't have made it, son. Would'a been you an' Nick. Thing had us cornered, an' it wasn't dyin'." His gaze dropped, looking toward his sneakers with a vague frown. "That boy, Chris -"

"What?!" Nick and Ellis both blurted out at the same time. Ellis' face went surprised - but almost brightly so, like he was half excited. Nick, on the other hand, clenched his jaw up aggressively, his voice sharpening to a razor's edge.

"What the fuck was he doing here?" he continued, drawing all three's gazes. "How the hell do you know that other bitch isn't hot on his heels? He could be bait... or, shit, working together!"

Coach quickly tried to soothe him, his hands going up, spreading thick fingers in a mediating gesture. "Now, Nick, calm down." he ordered gruffly. "If he wanted us dead he could'a watched that Witch tear us apart. He threw himself at it to save us."

Nick wasn't sold in the slightest. It was all over his face, this thick distrust and grim disbelief that stirred little sympathy. He grunted, lowly, shrugging with his good shoulder. "Hardly matters. He's dead, right? The Witch took care of him?"

Hesitating, Rochelle averted chocolate brown eyes toward the asphalt beneath their feet, dark with absorbed rain and matted with lost foliage whipped from limbs by the gale winds. Curling fingers in her blood-spattered grey T, she frowned, shaking her head.

As if tuned to her pain, Ellis slipped toward her, letting one arm limply loop around her waist in a comforting squeeze. He tried to duck his head, peering out from under his bill-cap, but she avoided his eyes.

"Not.. not exactly." reluctantly left her, unwilling to meet anyone's gaze. Grief tangled her brows together, and she clenched her hands - fighting the ache that had kneaded into the muscles of her left arm. Her shoulder burned..

A ghost pain, from sympathy.

Nick's pale green eyes narrowed on her face, some of that instinctual anger smoothing out of his features as - for a silent moment - he drank in that grief. He didn't apologize, didn't ask her what had her face so paled...

But his voice was a little gentler when he demanded simply, "Where is he?"
Chapter 104

There was a stench in the air - it wasn't blood, it was more like sinew. Like bone and muscle: the actual stink of sawn flesh, sour and gutwrenching. Nick was stiff as a board as he stood in the pawnshop doorway, the broken door swung open beside him.

At first glance, Nick wouldn't have even known Christophe was alive.

His left arm had been reduced to a stump, tightly wrapped with bandages that looped around his neck and torso. Blood had soaked through the cloth rapidly, and even though much of it had crusted over, there were still damp spots.

Chris' whole torso was stained with blood, blotches smeared on death-pale skin. He'd surely lost more than his body could produce. They'd covered most of his body in a stitched quilt from deeper in the shop, but it had fallen down to bundle in his lap, just loose waves of yarn.

"Jesus." the gambler uttered, feeling Ellis' presence nudge up against his back. Aware of his approach, Nick somewhat numbly took a half-step to the side, letting him see. The kid leaned around him, peering inside, and a hitched breath sucked past Ellis' lips in shock.

The strained breathing that chugged Chris' torso up and down was sickly and barely noticeable.

"D-damn, guys.." Ellis mumbled hesitantly, reaching out in reflex to grab onto the back of Nick's shirt, trying to cling onto him. "He don't look good..

Nick grunted slightly, letting his body shrug away from Ellis' touch before the Georgian made contact, crossing one arm stiffly over his chest. Ellis didn't argue, slipping his hands into the low-sagging pockets of his coveralls instead. "Not everyone's your invincible buddy Keith, kid." he groused under his breath.

"I know.." the Georgian forced out a little apologetically, warily looking from Nick to the slumped Spaniard. "I-it's just.. they said they killed like, four thousand zombies or somethin'? ... and one Witch does this tuh him..?"

A small arch touched Nick's brow. He lifted a hand, pointing sharply straight at Ellis' chest. "One guy did that to you." Rochelle slipped past them as he spoke, making her way into the shop, shoulders lowering as she approached Chris. "We all get fucked sooner or later, sport."

"You're a real comfort, thanks, Nick." the woman of the group muttered over her shoulder, slipping down to her knees. She frowned deeply as she reached out, setting the back of her hand against Chris' forehead. "He's so cold. I thought he'd run a fever..."

Coach's baritone echoed into the room from outside the doorway, where he lingered, gaze directed out into the street. There was a harsh quiet to his expression that didn't allow much to be gleaned, but he seemed on edge. "Probably in shock, babygirl. Blood loss."

Seeming hesitant, Ellis wrenched himself from Nick's side, limping to stand on the other side of Chris from Rochelle. Frowning, he let himself collapse down to the floor, body crumpling with an exhausted slump. His arms curled around his own torso, hugging his ribs as if to hold himself together - but his voice was full to the brim with concern for the other man.

"Whut happened?"
Rochelle shook her head, hand lowering to feel Chris' cheek, too. "I'm not really sure, sweetie. He just came out of nowhere.Grabbed the Witch by the waist and hauled her back. He saved us. I was just starting to say my goodbyes when he showed up." The little bit of a half-smile at the edge of her mouth faded fast.

"Next thing we know -" Coach added with a thick nod, wrenching his gaze away from the street. He quietly entered the shop, stepping past Nick to reach a stand-still a few feet behind Rochelle. "- he's wrestlin' it in the rain like a madman. Bravest thing. Gets it pinned to the wall, he's yellin' at us to shoot it, and babygirl gets a shot off right into its skull..."

The way he trailed off was telling enough. His head shook in a grisly gesture.

"But not before it sawed his arm through. Right?" Nick coldly finished, thumbing at his jawline with a drawn look of agitation. Stirred in his memory, he could feel the frigid press of razor-sharp claws to his back, piercing his skin like needles. Inches away from ending his life, with nothing but the sour stench of rotting orange Slurpee to send him off. "Like paper."

Rochelle cringed, but nodded, lifting her hand to cover her face underneath a palm, shoulders drooping. "If I'd been a little faster... if I'd just reacted a couple seconds sooner... but it'd already torn through so much of his shoulder, we just..." Her head shook. "There wasn't anything we could do..."

There was a certain silence afterwards. Rochelle's fingertips lingered on Chris' jaw, discomfited, her expression something between nausea and anger. Coach approached enough to settle a hand on her shoulder, but she faintly shrugged it off with an apologetic shake of her head.

She could've used the comfort - but comfort had a way of breaking composure, and she had to get through this.

Exhaling a deep breath into the quiet, Nick shifted. He walked in near-silence toward a stunted nightstand, letting his hip lean against it to take some of his weight off his aching feet. It was with a dark droop to his chin that he quietly scoffed, "I guess you guys want to take care of him or some shit." Frustration bled into his tone.

Rochelle, startled straight out of her silence, turned on him instantly. A frown downturned her mouth as she gestured toward the wounded Spaniard. "Suit, are you seeing the same damn thing I am? He lost an arm saving us! And it's the second time he's saved us! Are you seriously -?"

"Overalls saved us back there." Nick harshly returned, tone acidic. He saw Ellis straighten up uncertainly, blue eyes darting toward him with some surprise. "Not this fucker. This guy stood there and watched while a psycho bitch nearly murdered us all."

When Rochelle opened her mouth, he continued, voice raising with every word, anger flooding through him faster than he could help.

"Before you fucking cry about 'oh, he was changing his mind' and 'oh, he wasn't going to shoot us,' I don't give a fuck about what he was thinking about doing. We still would've been FUCKING DEAD!"

Nick didn't realize how loud he'd gotten by the end of it until Coach shot him a sharp stare.

"Nicolas."

The big man's dark baritone was enough to silence Nick. Rochelle, in pained quiet, gazed toward her knees. The conman shrugged, cutting his gaze to the side with a fierce snort, but he acquiesced with silence.
Wearily lowering his head, Coach shook it slowly. "I know you ain't real trustin', Nick. An' I ain't much for puttin' trust in someone who nearly killed us, either. But I watched him save us." A tired glint touched his eyes, and he very tenderly slipped his hands into the pockets of his pants, the fabric sagging a little with the loss of his belt. "If we just sit by an' watch a man die, whatever he did... we ain't no better than them zombies out there. Or them Angels."

There was a bloated instant of silence with the impact of the statement. Ellis let his gaze move from Coach to Chris to Nick, frowning, a little crunch touching his brow. He turned around, and those deep, soulful blues caught Nick's mercilessly.

"He's right.. ain't he, Nick?"

The question, that helpless tone of pleading, chilled Nick's spine. He stared back, hating Ellis for putting him in that spot, brows lowering over pale green eyes with a frustrated sigh.

Ellis was just so naive. Even moreso that he looked to Nick for answers… Nick, of all people. The one person least prepared to provide them. He had the faintest moral compass of them all, and yet there the kid was, begging him for validation.

It occurred to him, then - like a brisk slap in the face - that he'd forced Ellis to watch Jerry die. Nick turned away with a deep shrug, a sharp exhale. He slipped into the pawnshop doorway as if a few feet would detach himself from the group, pulling his rifle into his hands and examining the street.

"Whatever. You guys don't need my blessing, I can't stop you from wasting your time." he muttered, abrasively. "I'm stuck with you idiots." Using his foot, he kicked the pawnshop door closed - even though it was mostly broken. The wide hole torn into the center of it let him gaze out into the open air, turning his back to his teammates stiffly.

Coach sighed deeply, the sound rumbling, his focus turning back toward Chris' slumped body. He seemed to ignore Nick's existence all in an instant, dismissing him the same way Nick dismissed them.

"What you thinkin' we should do, babygirl?" he murmured down to Rochelle.

She barely responded, just a faint sigh. Her expression had fallen to something numb and frightened after Nick yelled at her, and it was lingering in that state. "I.. I don't.. I don't know. We have to help but, but we.. how the hell..?"

Ellis hesitated, looking after Nick with a kind of thoughtful disquiet. Nick had this way of angrily masking his agreement. The older man couldn't admit he was wrong, not out loud, so he just shut down. He couldn't be seen caring.

But he did care - reluctantly, maybe. He'd started to care more and more, Ellis was certain.

"The bleedin' ain't stopped, not wit' the belt or the bandagin'." Coach continued, morosely, gazing at the back of Rochelle's dropped head. Ellis' gaze rolled back to focus on the big man. "We gotta figure somethin' to do 'bout it before he bleeds out. Lord knows how he ain't already."

The woman couldn't help the sigh that left her, frowning, lifting her head slightly to stare at the blood-encrusted stump of Chris' arm with a shudder. "But what..? We tried tying it off, and putting pressure on it.. we don't have anything to sew him up with, and even if we did.. we'd probably just make it worse. We're not doctors, Coach, we're not - Jesus." She seemed to scare herself, rubbing at her face with her palms as a slump touched her body, hopelessly shaking her head.
Ellis quickly put out a hand to touch her shoulder, stretching over Chris' body, trying to comfort her with a soft squeeze. "It'll be okay, Ro." he promised, gently. "We'll figure it out..."

But Rochelle shook her head a little more, frustration sinking her tone into a low mutter. "I- ... I'm not so sure.. You don't know that. None of us know that. He could die, and it'll be all our fault."

Ellis recoiled, frowning softly at the rejection. He shot a small glance at Coach, but the eldest was silent. The hopelessness from both of them ached, but even through the real hurt on his face, he was stubborn.

He couldn't let them give up.

"Hey, guys.." he murmured, voice lightening in an attempt to soothe them. "I know yer scared, nobody wants no one tuh die.. but c'mon. If we calm down'n think 'bout it, we'll come up with somethin'. We always do."

No one responded. Both Coach and Rochelle avoided his gaze, and exhaustion stunk in the air even stronger than the gore.

Setting his hands against his thighs, Ellis tried to straighten up. Pain stung through his midsection as the motion strained his bruised ribcage, but with a grit of his teeth he bore it silently. "Y'all got him this far. We all got this far. We're all real smart, we can do this, I know we can."

"He's missing an arm, Ellis.." Rochelle spoke in quiet frustration. "He's missing an entire arm."

There was a deep, anguished disgruntlement all over Coach's face when he shook his head. Deeply, slowly, he mirrored Rochelle's distress almost perfectly - and his baritone was darkly regretful. 'I ain't sho', Ellis. We ain't got the supplies, ain't got the know-how..."

Suddenly, Ellis was alone.

Rochelle stared at her knees, Coach closed his eyes with the negative swing of his head, and Nick stood disconnected and silent by the doorway. Ellis shivered a little at the gloom, lowering his chin, and with a quiet exhale he mumbled, "If y'all give up we definitely ain't gonna save him."

Gazing at Christophe for a moment, Ellis fell silent. He frowned at the Spaniard's pale face, the slightly rounded features sickly and smudged with blood. The man's skin trembled with chill, and a constant twitch plagued his browline.

The gruesome stump that was left of his arm, painted a deep crimson through the bandages, drew Ellis' gaze.

They had to do something.

"C'mon, guys." he urged, louder, turning his head to flick his gaze between them, almost desperately. "We're the smartest folk this side'uh the world - look at whut we all done, gettin' so far, survivin' this long..." He was begging. "We can do anythin'. We just gotta put our heads tuhgether -"

"What heads?" Rochelle thrust her hands out with the sudden shut-down, lifting her head and gesturing at Ellis. At Coach. At herself. At Nick. "Us? We're nobody, Ellis. We need help. We need someone who knows what they're doing."

Frowning, Ellis started to argue, mouth opening - but Rochelle didn't let him. Her voice got rougher and more emotional, but fiercer all at the same time.
"I'm a news producer, Ellis. I talk about heroics, I don't do them. You're a goddamn mechanic. The best you can do is give his car a check-up. Nick is some slimeball from the gutter who probably knows how to hurt him better than nurse him. The best qualified here is a high-school health teacher."

She looked on the verge of tears, shaking her head, and Ellis stared at her with a tremble of his chin. "Ro'.." he mumbled, injured. "Yuh don't mean none'uv that - we can -"

"No, I really don't think we can." She turned her head away, jaw tensing. She couldn't meet Ellis' gaze, not seeing the hurt there, the disbelief. "He needs a hospital. And a doctor. And anesthetic. And surgery. And drugs. And a therapist. He needs everything we aren't, Ellis. He needs -"

It was Nick that interrupted her. His voice was dull and uninterested, but so unexpected it shut them all up for a thick moment of silence.

"Fire."

All eyes were on him in an instant, staring, both in surprise that he'd even spoken - and in confusion at the utterance. Ellis perked up the easiest, shaken out of his slump, brows scrunching over his eyes.

Was Nick standing up for him..? Helping him, or was he going to add to the hopelessness? Ellis was intimidated for an instant, genuinely so. He turned lightly to rest his weight on a knee, frowning toward Nick. "Whut?" he questioned, softly.

The gambler turned on one heel, a dark kind of frown touching the edge of his mouth. He gazed back at them with a distasteful scowl shadowing his face. "If you fuckin' dumbshits are done crying…" he spat, voice speckled with insult. "Start looking around. We need fire."

Ellis felt this weight lifted off his chest, this brightness starting to lighten his features. Nick's pale green eyes cut a glance over his face, this minute gesture. The older man's nostrils flared faintly with a sighed breath at the hopeful smile threatening at the edges of Ellis' mouth.

"Why, Nick?" Coach questioned almost dubiously, a darkness lingering over his expression as he crossed his arms over his wide gut. They'd swung back into antagonism - but that was fine with Nick. He'd asked for it, anyway, shouting at Rochelle. "Thought you weren't gettin' involved.."

Nick snorted at him, shouldering his rifle stiffly with a sharp narrow of his eyes. "Not going to watch you guys mourn a guy that ain't dead yet, either. Fucking useless, all of you."

"Well, fuck you too, Nick." Rochelle muttered with a weak tremble to her voice. "I'm sorry I'm a little hopeless after watching a guy get his arm torn off."

The conman shrugged his uninjured shoulder, barely sparing her more than a glance. A crinkle touched the bridge of his nose, exhaling deeply. "So you're going to watch him die, too?" Ellis winced, hiding underneath the bill of his cap.

It wasn't inaccurate, but…

Nick's words struck Rochelle like a slap, eyes going wide and body recoiling. She looked like she might jolt to her feet, anger flooding her jawline for a moment - but she stayed rooted on her knees.

Coach stiffened in her defense, brow lowering over deepset eyes. "Nicolas -" he started, aggressively, looking entirely prepared to start a fight. Those thick shoulders tensed up, but Rochelle reached back to put a hand quickly on his knee.
"N-no.." she muttered, curling fingers in his bloodied pantsleg. "He's right. It's okay, Coach. He's an asshole, but he's right."

It was apparent that Coach didn't want to back down. He eyed her for a lengthy moment before exhaling and letting his shoulders lower, discontentment apparent on his face. "Yeah, a'ight."

"Yeah, a'ight." He rumbled lowly, tightening his crossed arms.

Hopefully, Ellis rooted his eyes on Nick. He couldn't help being in a little bit of welcome shock that the conman had actually stepped in for him - for them all, really. Just when he was really starting to question if they did have a chance.

"So," Rochelle sighed with a dry spite, letting her arms slip around her midsection in a slow hug of her own waistline. "What's your plan, suit? Pick through his pockets and toss him out?"

Nick smirked faintly, shaking his head with a slow scratch of his rugged jawline. "Kid."

Nick sharply prompted, gaze flicking to Ellis' face. There was an impenetrable stiffness to his expression, this distance he put forth, but their eyes met with a comfortable ease.

"Kid." he sharply prompted, gaze flicking to Ellis' face. There was an impenetrable stiffness to his expression, this distance he put forth, but their eyes met with a comfortable ease.

"Break out the hick genes and light something on fire. We're gonna need heat, sport. A lot of heat, A.S.A.P. Not the singe-your-eyebrows kind - the ninety-five-percent-of-your-body kind. Get me?"

"Break out the hick genes and light something on fire. We're gonna need heat, sport. A lot of heat, A.S.A.P. Not the singe-your-eyebrows kind - the ninety-five-percent-of-your-body kind. Get me?"

Ellis nodded. Uncertainly, but stubbornly, and he was already lifting up to his feet and starting to look around the pawnshop with a thoughtful frown by the time Nick looked away from him. Ellis did his best not to let his gaze fall on Coach or Rochelle, feeling a little injured.

The gambler rubbed into his eyes with his knuckles, muttering under his breath, "You guys asked for it."

He didn't look happy.
The machete was beyond dirty. Gore and rust layered it in a flaking mess that Nick examined with disgust. There was nothing sterile about anything they were doing, and it frustrated him. He took the sleeve of his suit jacket and tried to scrub at the surface, grind away some of the blood.

Some of it came off, but not all of it. It was the best they had. He needed something light and flat and metal for cauterization.

The sounds of Ellis scrambling and rooting around in the hunt for a way to light a fire echoed through the pawnshop, flashes of his grungy Bullshifters shirt visible past looming pieces of furniture. He hadn't had any luck yet, but it didn't douse his enthusiasm.

The constant flow of mumbling seemed stubbornly endless as he chattered to Rochelle about every knickknack he got his hands on. She bore it in silence, listlessly following him as he wandered, preferring his voice to staring at Chris.

It was clear on her face that she had no hope. There was something tired, something resigned. She didn't even seem to have the drive to humor the Georgian in his chatter, let alone help him search. She just followed in his footsteps, nodding emptily here and there to indicate she was listening.

"If the shock doesn't kill him, infection's gonna." Nick muttered, sighing. Coach grunted, standing over his shoulder quietly with a stern kind of posture. He'd been keeping a close eye on Nick ever since their argument - a little too close, honestly.

Clenching his fingers tightly, Coach let his head shake. "We got alcohol, but I ain't sho' if anything'll help."

Nick sighed in a tired gesture, a cold grit touching his jawline. He nodded, gesturing with a flick of his wrist that encouraged Coach to produce the alcohol. "It isn't going to make it worse." he stated, harshly. "And not doing it could.. so yeah. Get it."

The elder seemed a little agitated at being ordered around, but he turned away anyway, dropping down to an uneasy crouch. Reaching out to get ahold of the group's backpack, he started to dig through it, gentle with their freshly retrieved medical supplies. "We gonna take his bandages off?"

"Not now." Nick shook his head. He spoke in a stiff tone, exuding confidence he didn't have. "Only once we've got everything together. If we take the bandages off, he'll start bleeding even faster. We'll take them off and get him cleaned up a little in a minute."

Before Coach could respond to that or prompt a new question, doubt all over his expression, Nick lifted his head. Craning his neck slightly, he hunted out the Georgian in the musty pawn shop's environs. "Hey, Ellis?"

The Georgian popped up like some clumsy prairie dog, intently nodding despite the exhaustion and pain inlaid into his face and the soft circles underneath blue eyes. "Yeah?" he returned softly, forcing a small smile.

For how gorgeous his smiles could be, he sure did suck at faking them.

"Have you seen a pan or something? Serving tray or whatever?" Nick asked, lifting his hands so he could make gestures in the air to try and illustrate his words. As much as he wondered after Ellis' wellbeing, there was just no time. Nor privacy. "Something flat, with a rim."
Ellis gave a blink, eyes trailing upward for a moment in thought as he seemed to consider the request, before he disappeared behind a dresser. He was all quiet perseverance and stubborn confidence - and it made Nick smirk.

Not that Nick would've admitted it, but he drew a little strength from the kid's presence. Considering both Rochelle and Coach were angry with him, Ellis was really the only friendly face in the room... and the only one not drawn with gloom.

Nick still hadn't gotten used to being trusted like Ellis trusted him, with that whole-hearted, naive sincerity. No one - absolutely no one - ever had.

"Why a pan?" Coach grunted, pausing in his search for the bottle of alcohol tucked in the bottom of their backpack. He glanced back at Nick. There was doubt all over his expression, like he didn't believe Nick even knew what he was doing, and the gambler let out a sigh.

Green eyes, pale and narrowed with annoyance, darted up to meet his. Serious agitation darkened Nick's features, voice curt. "Are you gonna question me every step of the way?" The bluntness made Coach bridle.

That static between them surged back to a tangible crackle. "Someone's gotta monitor yo' ass." the big man returned aggressively, and there was definitely zero trust in his expression. It wasn't like Nick cared, necessarily. It just agitated him - stirred up anger and spite.

I'm perfectly happy being the bad guy. It's apparently the only thing that gets us anywhere.

"Come on, honey." he crooned, voice full of sarcasm. "I just got home, let's not fight."

Coach snorted, turning his head back forward with a fierce shake of his head. His shoulders stiffened up, sighing throatily. "If you didn't want a fight, you did a damn shit job of avoidin' it." he chastised, simply, and the accusation made Nick's brows furrow in frustration. "Ain't time to be kickin' Ro' when she's down."

"I'm very sorry for trying to save someone's life while you guys walked yourselves in circles." he retorted sharply, expression drawn in disdain - and a little exhaustion. "Next time I'll keep my fuckin' mouth shut."

There was a bristling between them, this almost physical rise, catlike in nature. It threatened to get even nastier - until Ellis suddenly came limping out toward them, wielding a flat, china serving tray in his dirtied hands.

It was almost laughable, the way he cradled it on his palms like some scrubby waiter - let alone the proud smile on his face. "This work, Nick?" he chirped hopefully, offering the pan down to the conman. If he noticed the hostility, he pretended not to, blue eyes almost shyly slanting to peek at Nick's face.

Ignoring Coach for the moment, Nick lifted up the machete in his injured left hand and let it settle into the basin of the tray - it just barely fit, but it fit all the same. "Yeah, kiddo." he praised, allowing his gaze to meet Ellis' for a beat.

Blue and green sparked, Ellis' brows softening in this little look of reassurance. Like he was trying to say 'Yer doin' good, Nick.' Just a little flash of support amidst all the hostility. Nick looked away, breaking the gaze without acknowledging it.

"Just put it down." he muttered, thumbing toward the floor next to him. Ellis obeyed, slipping into a weak bend to set the tray down where indicated. He retreated without another word, returning to the hunt for something to burn. "Get the alcohol, Coach."

With some reservation, Coach - mute - moved to retrieve a bottle of isopropyl alcohol. The liquid inside sloshed easily like water, but the very bridge of the waves within were touched by a slight stickiness. It was, fortunately, a fresh bottle, with the cap and seal still intact.

"You guys got lucky." Nick commented, making a stiff attempt at friendliness. "Where'd you find the stuff?"

Coach cracked the cap off with an audible crunch, shooting Nick a slightly dark look as he did. If the gambler hadn't known better, he'd almost have thought the football player was threatening him with the gesture. He was used to it - just not from any of his teammates.

But, whether Coach had intended the motion that way or not, Nick's attempt was rewarded with something like chatter. The heavyset man shrugged his shoulders, leaning in slightly to carefully pour the alcohol into the tray. "There was a little pharmacy down the way. Mostly ransacked, but Ro' found some things."

The alcohol poured over the bloodied, rusted metal, filling up the tray slowly. It was laughable to think they'd ever sanitize the blade, but Nick still felt he needed to try. He nodded, gesturing for Coach to stop once the liquid submerged the metal entirely.

"We can use the rest to clean him up." Nick leaned back slightly, frowning. It was all too easy to let his mouth downturn into something honestly disturbed. "If we soak it for a little it'll... help, with not getting him infected. If you ask me, he's already sick, but there's no sense making it worse."

Coach nodded silently. Nick had to doubletake slightly when the older man didn't second-guess him. Maybe Ellis' presence had shaken Coach out of his anger, or reminded him they had the other two to worry about.

Speaking of...

The conman lifted his head, gazing more directly at the ex-football player. A serious crunch touched his brow, voice lowering, and Coach returned it with sober attention. "When we find something to heat it up... you should take Overalls and Ro' out. I'll handle it, you guys don't need to be here. Cauterizing is messy. It'll hurt like hell, and stink worse. Not exactly fun to watch."

Sighing brusquely, the eldest survivor lifted a hand to rub at his forehead. His gaze moved deeper into the pawn shop, staring toward their other teammates. "Gotta agree - they don't need to see that shit."

A snort touched Nick's breath, shifting on his knees as his position grew more uncomfortable the longer he sat in it. "I said 'you guys.' Are you sure you want to be here?"

It wasn't really concern, that much was clear in Nick's voice. It was more that Nick would rather he do it alone, where no one else's emotions or panic could distract him. He worked better alone, thought better - if Coach lost his nerve...

The big man shook his head.

"Sure as hell don't, but if you need extra hands, ain't gonna let it be one of them." Nick continued to gaze at him with no small amount of doubt, examining his features judgingly, a small rough noise escaping his throat in a grunt. Coach met his gaze and affirmed, "I'll stay, Nick."

His confidence gave the gambler pause.
As much as they agitated each other, and as vastly different as their tactics were, there was an undeniable comaraderie between them. They were both older, weathered. Though circumstances erased the gaps between four very different people, there was still that awareness that Ellis and Rochelle were ... so much more vulnerable, younger, fragile.

That, and their younger teammates had families to go home to. Although.. Coach has a daughter, doesn't he? Guess that makes me the loner of the group.

Nick gave a frustrated nip of his lower lip, shoving away that thought. Of course he didn't care. He didn't need anyone to worry about him - no one ever had, and he'd gotten along just fine. He was used to it. He certainly wasn't trying to save himself for someone else's benefit.

"Think he'll stay unconscious?" Coach questioned, brows low over deepset eyes. He shifted his gaze to examine Chris, licking at his lower lip with a weighty sigh. There was a confiding quiet to his voice, a hesitance.

The idea of Chris waking up was not exactly pleasant.

Nick shook his head with a vague shrug, reaching up a hand carefully to crook a knuckle underneath the Spaniard's chin. Lifting his head with some struggle against the utter dead weight of his joints, Nick squinted at his face.

He wasn't sure what he expected to see. The foreigner's rounded face seemed gaunt, pale compared to the russet tan Nick remembered, his cheeks drawn and darkness circled under his eyes. His skin was slick with sweat.

"I hope so." was all Nick responded with. But probably not.

The deep stench in the air - which had an edge of fear and uncertainty now, not just blood - threatened to hush them into silence, had Rochelle's voice not suddenly arrested them. She came quietly out from behind a strange stand-up clock, arms crossed.

"Where'd you learn to do this, Nick?" The question raised the gambler's head, and he eyed her momentarily. She didn't have quite the doubt all over her face like Coach had as he questioned Nick's actions, but it wasn't really curiousity, either.

Nick tossed a hand limply at her, leaning back onto his heels to smirk up in her direction. "Don't you have a little hick to help?" he questioned pointedly, voice darkening with sarcasm. "Be more useful than bugging me."

Her arms tightened, and she leaned forward slightly, voice gaining a stubborn edge of frustration. "If we're doing this, I just want to know what's going on. Do you actually know what you're doing, or are we just lighting his arm on fire and calling it done?"

Nick arched a brow, examining her for a second. "Done, or well done?" he offered.

He'd have laughed, but it was painfully apparent that the pun had been accidental by the fierce agitation trembling her lower lip. Giving a slight sigh, he turned away from her, shrugging as he gazed over the unconscious man's bandaged stump.

When he spoke, rough features drew into a cool smirk. "I used to torture people for a living. After you cut off fingers, to make them talk, ya know, you have to stop the bleeding someh-"

Rochelle was as amused as a drenched cat. "I'm serious." she snapped, hugging her arms around herself with an angry shift of her weight. The clench of her fists was stressed. It was very clear she was at her wits' end, and there was no space left for being mocked.

Unfortunately, seeing that he shouldn't immediately made him do so.

"Okay, okay." he sighed, and the seeming relent made Rochelle relax, her brows lowering a little over her eyes. He shook his head slightly, dragging out the words with a tender, sincere reluctance. "I used to be a doctor."

Disbelief immediately shocked Rochelle's eyes wide, blinking at him, her stance opening slightly as she cocked her head. Even Coach straightened up, this weird incomprehension in how the two stared at Nick. "You.. you did? Jeez, I -"

"Hell no." Nick snapped, smirk returning as he rolled his eyes up toward the ceiling. Rochelle gave this absolutely infuriated toss of her hands, muttered a swear under her breath, and turned to stalk back toward where Ellis was knee-deep in furniture.

Coach gazed at Nick in deep, deep disapproval.

All Nick had to offer was a small smirk and a coy, "I do play my fair share of doctor, though."

Sighing with a frustrated shake of his head, Coach crossed his arms and looked away. His voice was exasperated when he grumbled, "Ought'a smack you one, knock some sense into yo' thick head."

"Hey, hey.." Nick muttered in slight self-defense, re-focusing his gaze on Chris' stumped arm for a moment. "Watch the threats. Like it or not, you need me, Tons of Fun."

Coach didn't look sold, but Rochelle's voice interrupted from across the pawn shop before he could retort. "Hey, guys? I think Ellis found our ticket." It was strange, hearing a little note of hope in her voice again, something lighter than grungy dread.

Nick gestured a hand in a short wave to get Coach to stay, somewhat uncomfortably getting up off his knees and half-staggering to a settled stand. He gave a sigh as pain stabbed through his left side, and he somewhat weakly clasped a hand over the injured swell of his shoulder.

Curiously, Nick made his way toward them, stepping a little agitatedly over a fallen, rolled-up rug. Craning his head faintly, Nick caught sight of Ellis knelt down, pawing aside a small table with little squeaks as the feet of the cheap card table grated against the floor.

Underneath it was the dull shape of a portable grill, like one might take to a tailgate. He arched up a brow, staring slightly dubiously as Ellis glanced back at him. Blue eyes lightened confidently, and he smacked a hand against the grill's side. It clanged softly, the grating rattling inside.

"Even got a li'l propane tank hooked up here." Ellis shifted on his toes a little, tapping at the white canister that was attached to the side of the grill. "Ain't near full, but should give us enough."

Frowning slightly, Nick approached slowly, giving Rochelle a fair berth at first. She clearly hadn't moved on from her anger, but didn't outright say anything. She just passed him a look that read a little anxious, like he might shut down the idea.

Nick didn't meet her gaze, focusing on the grill instead. Agitating her enough to get her to leave him alone was fine with him. He had more than enough on his mind; namely, the task ahead. "That should work, kiddo. Drag it out and get it lit."

The small smile that appeared on Ellis’ face, proud he'd succeeded, was quickly hidden under the shadow of his trucker cap. He reached out, grasping ahold of the legs of the grill to start hoisting it up off the ground.

Ellis wouldn't have said a word, but he struggled, and it was obvious. Any other day and he'd probably have tried to balance it on his head just to be stupid - but that day, he was only barely holding himself together.

Although Nick was prepared to step forward and help, Rochelle beat him to it. He could tell she was intentionally cutting him off by the way she stepped in front of him, and that fact agitated him slightly. He felt a twitch of annoyance at his brow, watching her scoop her hands underneath the grill's belly and help Ellis move it.

The kid gave a small look of thanks, leading the way as they backed it up.

Rochelle was being spiteful, that much was clear to Nick as he gazed after the two. Why, exactly, she thought isolating him from Ellis was a way to spite him… that was beyond him.

It bothered him, and not just because of the little stir in his gut that felt like regret.
Chapter 106

Whether he showed it or not, Nick was unsettled.

Prying the grill's grating free from its moorings, Nick set the metal aside and shifted in his weary kneel. He eyed the depths of the appliance with some doubt, but said nothing, expression devoid of any interest at all. Though he had his reservations about what was to come, even the self-centered gambler knew that adding his pessimism onto everything else going wrong wouldn't help anything.

But that didn't mean his mind wasn't running wild circles.

Say what he might, it wasn't as if he'd actually done this before. It was hollow knowledge, never put into practice. The logistics were fairly simple, he kept reminding himself easily - heat a flat metal tool, press it to the wound in short intervals... two seconds at most, lest it cause more tissue damage than necessary... repeat until the bleeding stops.

And cross your fingers the fuck doesn't die from shock. Or infection, whichever bites him in the ass first.

Nick wanted to laugh.

Kills hundreds of zombies without more than a scratch... then the unlucky fucker meets us, gets his arm lopped off by a Witch, and dies from germs. Lady Luck's a PMSing whore.

There was a pack of matches dropped inside the rusted grill, half-used up and blackened with char. The conman could feel Ellis' warm presence by his shoulder where the younger man stood beside him, but Coach and Rochelle were busy arguing in low tones near the front door.

Coach had pulled her quietly aside to convince her not to watch the 'procedure' - if we're gonna call it that - and, judging by her infuriated expression and the heated motions of their hands back and forth, it wasn't going well.

Whether Coach's intentions were good or not, Nick could have told him from the start that Rochelle would put up a fight. Even if the eldest had the best chance of them all to get her to acquiesce, she was no pushover. Whatever else Nick might have called her.

Although, he had definitely thought she might... however secretly... want to be absent for the gruesome things ahead.

Scowling as he reached into the grill's fat basin, Nick scooped the matchbook up, fingertips squeamish on the blackened paper as it rubbed black streaks off on his fingertips. It was odd to be distressed about ash when his skin was tacky with sweat and blood, but if he gave up all his standards, there'd be no saving his sanity.

"You just twist the gas on and drop in a match, yeah?" the gambler questioned over his shoulder with some disgust. Like it or not, cauterization wasn't the only thing he didn't exactly have experience in. The tailgating grill was something of an alien invention to him, archaic and strange with its spindly legs and rusty belly.

The day you use one of these, Nicolas, is the day the world really has gone to shit.

He had directed the question at Ellis - but the kid didn't respond.
Nick turned his head to direct an annoyed raise of his brow at his teammate, only to see the Georgian worriedly gnawing at his lower lip, completely oblivious to the older man. Instead of watching Nick, he'd twisted at the waist to watch Rochelle and Coach's quiet argument unfold, and had been like that for who-knew-how-long.

He seemed faint, something very out of character for the youth Nick had grown to know. Be it the injuries or the current atmosphere of distress in the room, Ellis reflected a tender worry, fretting uncertainly with his hat indelicately twisted and wrung out in his hands.

Leave it to him to internalize everything. Nick sighed, heavily, sparing a moment to rub at his forehead. He could feel a certain disgust lining the exhale, forehead crunching. The Georgian wasn't aware of just why the two were arguing, not yet, and that was just fine as far as Nick was concerned.

The gambler had already had to fight Ellis on separating from him once today, and he wasn't looking forward to repeating the argument. The kid would probably argue just as fiercely as before, and Nick honestly didn't want to deal with it - especially not in front of the others, with how quickly Ellis had gotten worked up over it.

The last thing he needed was a lover's spat.

"Hey, dumbshit." Nick prompted, a little louder, annoyance peaking at the thought. There was something comical in how naturally Ellis responded to the insult-made-nickname, turning his head to force his blue-eyed attention on the gambler.

He gave this slow… and painfully small… smile, cocking his head in a gesture of apology. "Uh.. yeah? Sorry, I was just -"

Nick barely bothered to listen to what he knew was going to be a fumblingly false explanation. Ellis was worried and it was blatantly obvious, but it was in his nature to deny it - as if it were for others' benefit. Like he had some responsibility to keep optimistic.

It was absolutely infuriating.

Turning his gaze back to the grill and tapping a palm thickly against it, Nick's dismissive expression was enough to silence the Georgian's attempt at justification. Quieting, Ellis quickly scooted closer, leaning down to rest his hands on his knees and bent down as Nick reiterated, "I was asking how you light this fucking thing."

"Ah.." Ellis uttered, smile softening a little as he eagerly took up the implied request for help. Shifting his weight and reaching up to replace his trucker cap on his head, he dropped down to his knees next to Nick, the contrasting fabrics of Nick's slacks and Ellis' coveralls grazing subtly as the younger man's mimicry of his position settled their thighs against one another.

"Just light that match up." he directed, flicking a glance at Nick's face. The gambler ignored his gaze for the most part, letting his jaw flex as he obeyed, tearing a match free from the booklet in a well-practiced motion.

Moving in unison, Ellis reached forward, grasping the small twist-dial at the neck of the attached mini propane tank. He settled his fingers tightly on the metal, but didn't turn it quite yet. He watched sideways as the gambler struck the match against the strip of rough abrasions on the side of the matchbook.

It took two tries to work through the ashy residue at the tip of the match, but it lit with a flash of orange-yellow and a subtle snap. Nick held the burning stick up between two fingertips to usher Ellis on.

Nodding, the Georgian twisted his wrist to flick the gas on. A creak sounded as the metal pipeline opened up, and a hiss announced the escape of intangible gas as it dissipated through the perforated tube down the length of the grill's belly. A faint shimmer trailing close to the metal identified the gas.

"You can toss it in, now." Ellis instructed, bobbing his head. He seemed so easily calmed by the simple act of giving him something else to focus on.

Nick couldn't help but wonder if he was really that distractible, or if it had more to do with his own presence. Ellis either had the attention span of a guppy - which was likely… or he was easily comforted out of his distress by Nick's efforts.

Try as he might to settle on the former, he found some portion of himself intrigued by the latter. It pleasantly agitated him, that intimacy. Nick tossed the match into the grill with a squint, shaking away the thought before his discomfort grew visible.

The falling fire tumbled over the free-flowing streams of gas below, and in one instantaneous wave, flames lit up all along the length of the pipeline. Chutes of fire hovered above each hole, thin but edged with whitened heat. They arched up, eagerly stretching into the air where they would normally lick at the bottom of the grill's grating, tiny orange pillars anchored to the pipe by wisps of gaseous propane.

As the grill settled into a calm burn, Ellis let off a gentle chuckle. Shaking his head tenderly, the mechanic reached up and patted Nick's shoulder once, as if in congratulations. "See? Ain't so hard." His hand was warm to the touch, playful.

Unamused - but, oddly, not nearly as agitated as he should've been, Nick shrugged the gesture off with an idle lift of his shoulder. His voice was low with a certain growled chastisement. "Knowing how to use this rusty piece of shit isn't really something to lord over me, kid."

Before Ellis could respond to that with anything beyond a growing smile, Nick reached up his hands. In a swift, disgusted motion, the gambler wiped his ash-smeared fingers snobbishly against Ellis' shirt, leaving streaks of black behind as he cleaned his hands of the mess.

Caught off-guard, Ellis burst into a strangled snort as the touch tickled his waistline, squirming back onto his heels to retreat from the older man. "Hey - Watch it, mister fancy suit." He reached up to push Nick's hands away at the wrists as his nose scrunched up, this kiddish look of entertainment sparkling over his blood-smudged, soft-featured face.

Ellis was uniquely emotive. Dirty or freshly showered, smiling or asleep, in the midst of battle or in the midst of a thought - whether it was dumb cluelessness or feisty retort, clouding fear or brilliant joy, his face glowed with the pure force of his emotions. It was this raw honesty that never failed to draw the gambler's critical eyes.

Normally, it was the sign of a good mark. Nick wasn't really sure how to deal with it from a lover.

"Goddamnit, Coach! I'm not a child. I want to be here for this!"

Rochelle's voice exploded with a scattered kind of fragility, desperation sunk into her tone. Neither men spoke for a moment, but neither turned to look, either. Ellis' gaze dropped quickly to his lap, expression flashing to something weakly crestfallen, and Nick averted his gaze to stare at the grill.
They listened in wordless tension, observing the jagged silence as Rochelle caught her composure and Coach held his breath, resigned and tired.

Then he responded - simple and flat, stern with a gruff edge of withheld emotion. "That ain't yo' choice."

There was clear discomfort laced into the air, raising the hair on the back of Nick's neck with static electricity. Usually he was the one in or causing an argument, not watching from the sidelines, and certainly not watching Coach and Rochelle argue. It was like watching his parents fight, though Rochelle was some years younger than him.

It just flat out felt wrong.

His statement visibly shocked her, and with this sharply huffed exhale, she glanced over her shoulder toward the two men. It was like she'd only just remembered they were there, and with a self-conscious toss of her head, she angrily jabbed a finger at the door. "... Outside. Now."

Moving stiffly, she pushed her way out of the pawnshop and into the street, not even bothering to look back. Coach followed her at a distance, deeply scruffed features drawn in a look of weariness. Stubborn - but weary.

Then they were gone, voices just hums through the broken door.

Nick could have gotten involved, stepped in and been the asshole such an argument needed, but he had other things to focus on. Coach would either convince her or he wouldn't - either way, Nick didn't much care. As much as he wanted to handle what was to come on his own, it wasn't worth fighting over.

He glanced at Ellis, surreptitiously, without turning his head.

The kid had re-adopted his worried gnawing on the plump shape of his lower lip, a stressed gesture that drew the rest of his face into an idle look of distance. For all the things Ellis handled so easily, arguments were definitely not one of them. Not when it was between what he'd claimed as his new family.

Forcing a sigh thickly through his nostrils, Nick lifted a hand to gesture toward the china tray that contained Chris' machete, soaking in alcohol. "Get that, Ellis." he ordered, tone short.

If he had to manipulate the kid's distractibility to keep that insufferable hurt-puppy look off his face, he would. It was simple enough to keep him busy, considering how the Georgian jumped at his every word.

Obedient as always, Ellis perked up quickly, reaching his hand to re-adjust his trucker cap on his head. "Sure." he murmured, amicably, flashing a small glance toward Nick's face. There was something apologetic in his gaze, like he knew Nick was exasperated.

Scrambling up from his knees to get on his feet, Ellis circled the gambler with his short-legged trot, boots heavy on the pawnshop floor. He stepped up to where the tray sat on the floor, bending down so he could scoop the 'sanitized' machete out of the pooled liquid, grasping it by the now-darkened wood handle.

Alcohol dripped from the blade in wet splatters, and Ellis winced inwardly as his damp fingertips burned, the liquid finding cuts and nicks in his abused, calloused skin. "Ain't real clean or nothin'." Ellis pointed out, ignoring his discomfort with a shake of his wrist. He examined the notched and aged metal of the weapon-turned-tool, dubiously. It was a bit shinier now, but hardly optimal.
Nick sighed again.

"I know. But it killed some bacteria, and it's better than nothing." The gambler gestured about the pawnshop with his good shoulder. "Even if we found a clean knife or something in here, we need the wide blade. Otherwise I'm gonna be at this for an hour, and nobody wants that. If you have a better idea, I'd love to hear it."

Frowning but nodding his head, Ellis doggedly returned to his side, thudding back down to his knees weakly. His gaze was trapped on the blade as he held it up to his face, examining it with a slow-ticking thought. He seemed bothered - worried, maybe.

He wasn't going to offer it out to Nick, so the older man took it.

Nick's fingers curled over Ellis' with a firm touch. Their digits grazed and pressed together, fingertips prying the Georgian's grip from the machete. Ellis' eyes went wide and his joints limp as the older man slowly twisted the machete's handle out of his grasp.

The thick silence afterwards was highlighted by the slight reddening of Ellis' face, and the way he pushed his hands into his lap in shy embarrassment.

Licking at his thinned lower lip, Nick resisted the urge to tease the Georgian for it. It was far too easy to set the youth off his game, the play of his fingers more than enough to pull those endearing little reactions out of him. Nick wasn't afraid to admit the way it preened his ego.

Making fun of Ellis was almost as enjoyable as the end-game.

Leaning forward, the gambler slipped the machete into the burning grill. He balanced the flat blade against the burning pipeline, fire sputtering as it struck the metal before settling into a calm nuzzle against the machete's surface. Burning bright shades, the small licks of flame shivered soundlessly along the blade.

"Shouldn't take too long to heat up." Nick sighed, voice thickening, faking confidence. He let one hand lift up to rest on his injured shoulder, pressing his palm into the point of aching pain where the katana had speared through him. "Meantime, I'll start on - "

"Nick." Ellis blurted almost tensely, a little hesitance to his tone. The gambler's expression twitched to an instant scowl, sighing vaguely at being interrupted, but he held his tongue. Green eyes flicked over toward blue, but Ellis kept his gaze downwards, tapping his fingers against one another.

"You were avoidin' Ro' earlier... how do you know how tuh do this?"

The gambler wasn't exactly shocked by the question, although it did catch him slightly off-guard. Examining Ellis' face for a moment, Nick licked at the backs of his teeth, withholding a second sigh as he relented in a low tone. The kid already knew most of the story, anyway.

"Remember what I told you last night?" he stated a tad shortly. The Georgian quickly nodded, thumbing at the palm of his left hand, still stubbornly avoiding Nick's eyes. It wasn't exactly reticence - but something close.

Maybe he was trying to give Nick much-needed space.

"It's just another thing I learned about. Gruesome hack medicine. I think I thought it might come in handy one day. My uncle didn't exactly encourage me to trust hospitals. Or doctors. Or anyone, come to think of it." The gambler turned his chin slightly to face his younger teammate, offering a slow smirk that finally coaxed Ellis to look at him. "It seemed cool at the time. I forgot about the whole agonizing pain part, I think. Pretty useless shit to know how to do, huh?"

The Georgian peeked over that sarcastic little lilt on Nick's mouth, full lips drawing into the smallest of uncertain pinches. Gears turned on his face as he seemed to mull that over, expression full of thought and consideration. Nick couldn't help but arch up a brow, waiting.

Then Ellis pointed out: "Ain't useless now. We're savin' Chris."

Nick outright laughed, a short and slightly humorless sound. Reaching up, he settled a spread hand on Ellis' capped head, scruffling his trucker's cap into his scalp and pushing the bill to tip down over his face. The mechanic didn't protest, just closed one eye and lowered his chin a little bit at Nick's touch, lips curving upward. "Yeah, yeah. Rainbows and puppies and silver linings, I get it. Yeesh."

That curve turned into a grin, Ellis' teeth showing between his lips as he beamed underneath the shadow of his capbill. Nick's insult backfired, making Ellis smile instead of mocking him like he'd intended - and Nick wasn't sure how he felt about that.

Ellis looked so damn pleased.

Nick hadn't expected their return quite that soon, but with a sudden shuffle of footsteps, the pawnshop door re-opened. Rochelle and Coach stepped back in, a certain solemn quiet to the way Coach led her in.

The gambler dropped his hand from Ellis' head as suddenly as he'd placed it there, letting himself turn around at the waist to eye the other two. The Georgian mimicked him, that softness draining from his expression as he returned to a worried frown.

Rochelle had calmed significantly, tugging idly at the soft flesh of her earlobe as she followed behind Coach, adjusting her rifle where it was strapped onto her shoulder. Her gaze darted to the deeply unconscious Chris, flicking over his gaunt, sweat-flecked face, but she didn't stare too long.

The ex-football player continued forward toward Nick, but Rochelle stayed just inside of the doorway.

"Did you two kiss and make up?" Nick queried with a snarky tone of voice, gazing between them with a smirk. He could tell easily enough that Rochelle had relented, just by her body language and the way she lingered at the doorway.

The woman shot a small, knowing glare toward him, but otherwise kept her voice level. He didn't miss the pointed sharpness of her gaze - he figured she blamed him for Coach's actions. She wasn't, after all, completely inaccurate.

Neither of them needed to see what was to come.

"Ellis," she prompted softly, turning her gaze toward the Georgian. He straightened up, expression falling slightly. He knew what she was about to say. "Let's go outside, okay? It'll be better off if we're not in the way."

He floundered where he kneeled, looking baffled as his gaze jumped sharply from Nick to Rochelle. He was hoping for some kind of reassurance, hoping they'd change their mind. "W-But - whut if y'all need -"
He faltered when Rochelle merely blinked at him and Nick shook his head minutely.

Ellis' shoulders lowered gently as he dropped his voice to match, a certain pained plea touching his voice. "I don't want tuh leave it up tuh Coach'n'Nick.. I don't want y'all tuh do it alone."

"We can handle it." Coach asserted, stopping to stand just before the Spaniard's sprawled feet. He gazed at the unconscious man's form, rounded, stubbled jaw tightening. Ellis frowned even deeper, peering up at him with a helpless exhale. "Y'all just keep an eye on things outside."

The Georgian started to protest, looking absolutely desperate - and then Nick let his weight shift faintly, intentionally, so his knee would press into Ellis'. Nick watched crestfallen and hurt resignation pass over the Georgian's face as the subtle gesture quieted him.

"It's going to be messy and disgusting, and we don't need you two losing it halfway through. Or the extra help." Nick curtly added, tone stiff with a kind of agitated dismissal, even though Ellis' posturing had already made it clear he'd acquiesce.

"Okay," the Southerner sighed. After a tiny scan of his eyes over hands, furtively, he forced this chuckled breath and smiled, lifting up his face again. "If y'all can handle it.. guess somebody's gotta watch out fer zombies'n'such.. Ro'n'I can do that."

"S'right, son. Good." Coach practically praised, voice growing deeper as he lifted up his hands to rub their heels into his eyes. He gave a gruff smile of encouragement at Ellis, sideways, nodding him on. Ellis returned it only weakly, though he softened at the welcome kindness.

Rochelle lifted up her hand to offer it toward Ellis across the room, fingers spread, and the gesture coaxed Ellis up off his knees quickly. He gave a small pause in order to rest a touch on Nick's shoulder, supportively, and scooted shortly into a trot toward Rochelle.

The gambler didn't bother watching him leave. He just examined the machete where it nestled inside the grill, noting a subtle glow starting to hum about the thinner edges of the metal.

Ellis' fingers twined with Rochelle's as he took her offered hand, a stronger smile touching his face when she squeezed his palm. She returned it. With only a small glance over her shoulder, she murmured, "We'll be just outside if anything happens."

He wanted to linger, or meet Nick's gaze one more time just to make absolutely sure the older man really wanted him to leave. Or maybe just walk back entirely and refuse to go at all… but when Rochelle pulled him along, he followed.

The air outside was damp with the moldy residue from the night's storm, the sky a dead gray to greet them as they stepped out onto the sidewalk. If there were any infected nearby, Ellis couldn't see them. Maybe they'd all been attracted to the other part of the city, where he and Nick had set off the Boomer.

Rochelle let go of his hand as the door settled shut behind them - though 'shut' was arguable, considering the large hole put through the center of it. Pulling her rifle off her shoulder and into her hands, the woman moved to gently lean against the brick side of the pawnshop, sighing. It was a heavy and slow breath, and Ellis peeked at her face, shyly.

She was upset beyond what she let on, and he could tell.

He didn't want to outright confront her on it, but he wanted to help. Biting at his lower lip for a moment, the Georgian somewhat tentatively moved to step up beside her. He mimicked her posture, leaning against the face of the building, his shoulder touching hers.
He wasn't sure if she'd notice, at first - but after a moment, her head tilted and he found her resting it against his shoulder in silence. He smiled, softening to the contact, and let his eyes close with a fluttered little sigh. "It'll be alright, Ro'." he promised. "Nick knows whut he's doin'."

Rochelle's soft laugh back betrayed her doubt, but she nodded her head. She didn't let her eyes close despite the urge to, a small swell of affection tightening her throat as she more thoroughly leaned into Ellis' side, feeling his cheek touch warmly against the top of her head.

"Thanks, sweetie. I just .. want this all to be over."

It took more effort than she expected to keep her voice level.
