Relief crept at her when it was Coach, his arm tuck full of clothes. She couldn't get a good grasp on what he had other than the distinct pattern of plaid.

The big man halted sharply in the dressing room doorway. "Oh, sorry, kids. Y'all need a minute?" he uttered, holding his clothes to his chest, looking nearly abashed. He glanced between them, and Rochelle swore he seemed just as off-kilter as she felt. "Didn't mean to butt in."

Rochelle grabbed her boots from where they sat on the ground, hopping her feet into them in a rush. "No, no, you're fine. I'm done. Just-" Stamping her feet to settle her shoes on firmly, she ducked between the two men, waving over her shoulder. "Go ahead."

"Thanks, babygirl." Coach called to her, and she hummed affirmatively back. Ellis speaking to him as she left vaguely reached her ears, likely grilling the man about his clothes, too.

At least he seems a little upbeat, considering. I think we're all just trying to hold it in until we get back to base... or maybe for forever.

She strode back toward the main area of the store, breathing in a lungful of air, chasing away the tingling in her fingertips. She couldn't recall the last time she'd felt such a strange mixture of excitement and... something else. Plenty of other things, maybe.

Shame, definitely.

There was that slim, wild chance - what if Jacob was still alive? What if he'd waited for her, and thought she'd wait for him? They'd survived plenty of arguments, though the last few words they'd shared had been a new, awful breed. Could she handle the idea of finding him alive, seeing his betrayal, if she'd given up on him and found someone new?

And the idea of him being dead? That was worse. The fact that that would have been simpler, more convenient... that was so much worse. It wasn't something she wanted to think about.

She meant to avoid thinking about it at all costs.

Although she'd left Chris seated on the front checkout counter, resting beside the register, he'd slipped off and wandered to the far wall to start looking through tops hung off hooks set in a grid pattern. A pale green polo shirt dangled from his fingers, the man clearly unimpressed with it. In fact, the Spaniard nearly dropped it to the ground when his eyes darted up to alight on her.

His silence - no, speechlessness - made her break into a grin. He didn't manage to rip his gaze away from her body even as he broke from his fugue and babbled, "Bonita. ¡Ah! Perfecta. ¡Qué hermosa te ves!"
She crossed her arms, interrupting his gaze on its path up her body. "My eyes are up here." she retorted dryly, resisting the laugh that tried to make its way from her. When he snapped his attention to her face, she approached, tightening her arms in their cross. "Thanks, though."

Christophe was still staring at her, though decently, now. It filled her with a giddy warmth and she held the feeling close, held it tightly. She bent down to grab the shirt he'd dropped, shaking it out in front of herself to get a look at it. "Cute." she stated, gripping the bottom hem. She lifted it up, holding it over his head, and he seemed to realize her intent only after a moment.

"Oh -" he muttered, breaking into a laugh. The man quickly lifted his arm to worm his hand into and through the shirt, catching his hand within the sleeve. "Gracias. It is harder to do, now."

Rochelle grinned gently as she had to yank the shirt over his head, tugging the shirt down his frame and flattening it where it tried to get caught. "I bet. You'll get the hang of it. And we're here for you." Once his arm was free, he reached up to run his fingers through his hair, fussing it back into place. His stumped shoulder sat in the deflated sleeve, exaggerating his lopsided posture.

A polo shirt and cargo shorts did not make for the most refined appearance. She couldn't muffle a smile, nose crinkling as she looked him up and down, and he turned a pinkened colour she wasn't sure she'd seen before. "¿Qué? Do not laugh at me, Rochelle, por favor."

"I'm not, I'm not!" she hushed despite her grin. "You just look halfway surfer kid and halfway frat boy. It's kind of impressive."

Christophe looked at her with no comprehension in his eyes, and she couldn't help but actually laugh, then.

"You look good, I promise." She breathed out a shaky laugh, retracting her hands from where they'd lingered too long at the hem of his shirt. "It's cute, but we should really get you in darker colours. We're gonna get covered in blood in two seconds flat. May as well pretend these are going to last for more than a day."

Chris vaguely grunted, but she didn't think he'd listened much at all. He took a step closer, chin lowering, and Rochelle tensed a little at the warmth of his presence. "Te ves increíble." he crooned to her softly, matching her gaze, and he reached out his hand to brush fingers with hers.

His fingertips grazed up her arm, her shoulder, tickling through her sleeve. She couldn't stop a shiver when he placed a knuckle against her chin. She couldn't stop much of anything, in fact, as he leaned in close.

Goosebumps threatened and her breath caught behind a curled tongue. His movements were slow but not cautious, and his fragile brown eyes searched hers with brimming warmth. She'd missed most of the buildup to their first kiss, with it being so frantic and sudden - and almost entirely one-sided. It had lacked the tender approach, the brushes of skin, the almost-maybes.

Chris seemed intent on making the second one better.

"Hey, Ro'." Nick's voice was tired, a little rasped, and Rochelle pulled away like she'd been burned. The cozy space between her and Chris fractured into something uncomfortable as he registered her rejection, and he retreated a half-step from her. "Where's the flashlight? I think there's some shoes in the back here, but it's too fucking dark."

Tension flooded her, anxiety brimming, made worse by the fact that Nick knew her situation better than anyone. He knew about Jacob. He knew their rocky past, knew her uncertainty about how they'd left things, their current status. He was the only one she'd really confided completely in, and the only one who'd look at her and know.

He halted a few feet away, abruptly silent as the realization of what he'd interrupted settled in. The huff that left him was awkward in an uncharacteristic way. There was no mockery, no joke at their expense, just silence. Whatever he knew or thought, he kept to himself. For once.

That didn't change the fact she'd recoiled, and Christophe hadn't missed the subtext.

She saw the flash of uncertainty cross the Spaniard's face, hurt crashing tightly into a strange resignation, and she quickly averted her gaze rather than let the image stick too clearly in her memory. "Uh, sorry." she mumbled to him before spinning on her heel. Avoiding Nick's gaze, she bobbed her chin. "Yeah, it's in the dressing room. Coach is in there, so -"

"So don't barge in unless I want an eye-full. Got it." Nick finished for her. She glanced more fully at him, and he had the faintest frown, and she couldn't shake the feeling that he wanted to say something. Maybe even something reassuring.

It was an odd moment that quickly ended.

Nick did a smooth heel-turn and walked away, ducking into the hallway leading to the dressing room. Rochelle looked after him warily. She wanted to stand and look anywhere but Chris, shame settling into the grit of her jaw. The urge to rewind time, change her actions, do something different... it filled her, taking up space she didn't have. But it was easy to make excuses, and she didn't want to do that.

So she turned, facing Chris, inhaling sharply to steel herself before she raised her gaze to take him in fully.

Christophe had his arm looped over his stomach, hunched in on himself in a way that seemed to mirror the same shame she felt. His eyes were on the ground, and he was quick to speak. "Lo siento. I thought -" He sounded fragile, and a flood of regret threatened at her, heavy. He was in a delicate state of mind, and the last thing he needed was uncertainty. "After - we kissed, I -"

Not that I'm in a great position to offer stability in the first place, but...

They hadn't talked about it. It was well overdue to talk about it, but Rochelle was not ready. Everything felt too surreal, and their surroundings were clearly not conducive to any kind of privacy. She lifted her hands up in a softly pleading clasp. "Chris. Can we... have this conversation later? Alone? I - really wish it was all simple and... easy, but..."

Judging by the stutter of his frame and the tightening of his jaw, he'd filled in the blanks, and she wasn't sure with what. Before he had time to think anything more, she clenched her fingers into a tight tangle and advanced, til they were once again too close. She thought he might retreat, but he instead leaned a fraction of an inch closer, warming to her presence even as his eyes remained low.

It was softly that she closed her eyes and spoke to him with as much sincerity as she could muster. "I like you, Chris. And I liked the kiss. I just don't want either of us to get in over our heads before we talk. Everything's too crazy right now to do that. And this isn't the... well, height of privacy."

"Talk?" he parroted, voice weakened.

Her shoulders shrugged lightly, struggling through syllables in an honest effort to find ones that didn't imply anything other than the truth. "If things are gonna change... we need to... figure it out. Be honest with each other, instead of just leaping into something. God, I've learned that much the past couple days." She dropped her chin slightly, a wryness touching her voice. "You know?"

Chris didn't say anything at first.

When she re-opened her eyes to look at him, he'd fallen to a simple, perplexed frown. The subtle caramel colour of his eyes searched her dark ones before he nodded. "Vale. Comprendo. Pero... You promise I did nothing?"

His tone was vulnerable, and it ached at her heart.

He'd done nothing but his best. It wasn't his fault she didn't know what she wanted, or how to go about letting it happen.

A smile jumped the corners of her lips up, and she reached up to grip the collar of his polo shirt with either hand. Flipping both points up to pop it playfully, she gave a soft wink. Sincerity came much easier, then. "Promise."

Christophe broke into a grin, tilting his head, his gaze darting around her face to soak in every inch of her smile, even the subtle things - the small dimples caused at her cheeks, and the lines it made around her eyes. His anxiety did not completely dissipate, but it weakened and thinned. His chest puffed a little to lean into where her hands still held the collar of his shirt, voice lowering. "I will not kiss you, then. But it is hard, you know. Sufro, bonita. Yo sufro."

She let her palm slide onto his sternum just long enough to push him, forcing him back a step, laughing under her breath. "Poor thing. I'll say a prayer for you."

"Por favor, chica. Gracias."
Chapter 241

Nick felt like he might suffocate. He breathed, but couldn't get the air into his lungs. It sat on his teeth, blocked his throat, refusing to go any further.

He settled a hand against the wall, leaning his weight into it, narrowing his eyes as he gazed blankly forward. His skin crawled with something he couldn't identify. It was frustratingly mild, infuriatingly slow, glacial.

He wanted to boil over, and all he could do was simmer.

It had nothing to do with Rochelle and Chris. He'd picked up on the change in their relationship instantly, well before now, so it didn't surprise him to stumble upon them nearly kissing. It did something worse than that.

He should've laughed. He should've winked at Rochelle, bemoaned missing his chance once more. He should've shot her the look that said, Guess Jacob loses, huh? He should've given her shit.

Instead, he froze.

He felt jealous, and he froze up as he tried to wrap his mind around the feeling. He felt jealous and lonely and angry with himself for it.

Nick lifted his hand and pressed his thumb into the space between his brows, driving his fingertip in like a screw. He applied enough force that it might just break through his skull, trying to grind out the headache rising behind his eyes.

The world had ended days or even weeks ago.

There was nothing for any of them to go back to. No point in any of it. He'd never had anything to go back to, either, but at least he'd had the fantasy of a return to normal. If the whole of America had crumbled - they were just rats in the rubble, fighting for scraps while everything burned around them.

What was the point of it?

What was the point of being alone and miserable, on top of everything else?

It was the human thing to do: lurch out for comfort. Grab the nearest solid object to anchor to. He was familiar with the instinct, after all. It was that very instinct that had always sent him crawling bars for one night stands, for a warm body.

There had been days when an empty bed was even worse than dealing with the awkward small-talk and presence of whatever stranger had taken the bait. He'd never pretend he was invulnerable to longing for touch and company, but it had always been agnostic of the person themselves.

Those people - they had not always, after all, been women - had always just been a means to an end. It was all just a way to achieve a feeling, a set of sensations.

Ellis was different. From the very start, he'd always been different. Nick missed him.

Nick wanted to hear his voice, see his face, touch him. He wanted Ellis' lips on his, Ellis' hands on his waist and curling against his neck and gripping into his back. He wanted more than anything to press his face into those tousled curls and hear the kid laugh again.

He wanted to laugh again.

He wanted to take it all back.

You can't. buzzed in his skull like feedback through speakers and he wanted to shout back at himself, Why? Why not? If we're all going to fucking die, why not?

He asked the question, and the answer dropped plain as day before him. It spilled out of him like blood, guttered from him like an artery had been clipped and all that was left of him was pattering onto the store's tightly-wound carpet fiber.

I don't fucking know.

He barely fought back a chuckle, just a panted breath, because wasn't it perfect? You're a real fucking martyr now, huh, Nicky-boy? Do all this shit, set him up for this, and for what? So you can feel sorry for yourself?

Because you don't know how to be anything but miserable?

He was brimming with something too big to manage, too heavy to bear. It sat at the edges of him like spiderweb, clinging and sticky and threatening to wind him up in some suffocating grip.

You didn't fucking leave him for his sake. You keep saying that and you know it's bullshit, don't you? You did it for yourself, because being fucking alone and angry is all you know how to do.

Because being alone and angry was better than getting hurt. And Ellis would hurt him, one day. The kid would get his hopes up, addict him to some fantastic dream, and then pull the rug out from under him.

It was never about him, just you. You never gave a shit about anyone before, why start now? Burn it all fucking down before it gets you. Before he gets you.

His ex-wife had almost broken him. Ellis would shatter him. It seemed so simple, so obvious, and so insanely pathetic.

So, you ended it first. Is this better? Is this what you wanted? Are you fucking happy with yourself? Are you -

"- okay?"

His body jumped well before his mind caught up with it. His eyes darted up, landing on the stone blue eyes examining him cautiously. Ellis' concern was badly plastered over, disguised under a tense calm, an enforced distance.

The kid had walked right up to him, barely a foot between them. His hand was vaguely outstretched, frozen in a splayed gesture like he'd been about to reach out but thought better of it at the last second.

Nick hadn't heard a thing. Not a word Ellis had spoken before that, and not his footsteps. He'd crushed his focus down into such a pinprick of attention that he had to close his eyes and shake his head just to re-center himself in the moment.

He scrabbled for composure and came up with tatters.
"What?" escaped him; it not the correct response, it seemed, and Ellis' concern broadened into a frown.

The Georgian maintained his calm attention, lowering his hand to his side in a stiff jerk. His voice tightened slightly with awkward tension, and Nick was left to wonder what his tone had betrayed. "I said, are you okay...? You look, uh -"

Nick surrendered a half-step's worth of space, increasing the distance between them. "I think I'm good not knowing, thanks." he muttered quickly, aware of the way Ellis' posture softened a bit at the slapdash attempt at humour. The kid's lips quirked at the edges, and Nick couldn't stop his eyes from catching on them.

Was it a restrained smile trying to find its way into his face, or him struggling against a deeper frown? Nick honestly couldn't tell the difference, couldn't discern between the two.

He just knew his own mouth fit just perfectly there.

"Fer real, Nick." Ellis turned his gaze downward to the floor, and he either didn't see the older man's focus or pretended not to. "You look kinda pale. Maybe you should sit awhile, catch a breath..."

Nick tried to laugh, but it caught in his throat like a hiccup. "I'll catch my breath when I'm dead." he muttered, dryly. "Which, judging by that map out there, isn't gonna be long. Might just go fall on that katana for real this time."

Ellis did look up at him, then, brows crinkling over suddenly worried eyes. There was no humour in his expression, not even coloured by exasperation. It was just pure and wholly terrifying empathy.

"That ain't funny." he stated, drawing his arms into a loose cross over his chest. "Don't say that kinda stuff, Nick."

The Northerner wanted to argue, to jut his chin up and say Why not? It'd simplify just about everything, wouldn't it? - when he fully processed Ellis' expression. It struck something cold in his chest.

The brunette's concern reflected his thoughts back to him, and they sat with a sudden pressure on his already-singed synapses. He didn't mean it, not like that. Not really. He'd fallen into the joke like some ritual in the back of his mind, a soothing release of tension.

He'd just not really said it aloud before.

Not like I'd ever have the guts to off myself, anyway. sparked across his thoughts, followed promptly by a startled sort of self-awareness. It felt like looking suddenly down from a height and being drawn into the pull of vertigo. Jesus.

"It was a joke." he stated, unsure for whose benefit.

Ellis looked up at him, his expression softening a little as he lifted a hand to scratch at his curly brown hair. Maybe he saw through it, or maybe he was assuaged by the statement. Nick might've been able to tell had he met the kid's eyes for more than a few seconds at a time.

When did it stop feeling like a fucking joke?

"Look, Fireball -" He started the sentence without any idea how to continue it or where he meant it to end. It was a knee-jerk response, a desperate utterance, and Ellis' face went slack with surprise.
At first, Nick didn't understand. Not until he realized how long it had been since he'd called Ellis any of those old nicknames. Sincerely, without even thinking, he'd dipped back into an instinctual pet-name.

Because that's what it was - what it had always been.

The Georgian looked at him with confusion and some kind of dawning fear. Apprehension better described it - but fear nonetheless. It was absurd next to the way his posture opened just slightly, leaning in, anticipating.

He craved it, whatever it was supposed to be, and Nick crumbled into even smaller pieces. He rattled and shook and waited to fall apart.

"I'm fine. Gallows humour is just all I got left at this point." he muttered instead of whatever clung to his teeth, and Ellis' expression fell.

He was disappointed - and then, worse, resigned.

Movement caught his eye, and Nick's attention jerked toward it much despite himself, watching Coach come into the light bearing the unlit flashlight in his hands. "You don't know shit 'bout humour, Nick." the man groused.

It was not aggressive, though, and Nick did not even have the energy to rouse him into an argument. "I'm hilarious." he stated instead, a canned retort.

The man had changed entirely. A red and white plaid button-up stretched across his chest, the slightest hint of a white undershirt peeking up from the bottom edge of its open collar. His tan khakis had been traded for a similar light blue-grey pair, but it was a thicker fabric and looser on his frame.

He'd shouldered a thin red windbreaker, and when Nick's eyes caught on it, Coach shrugged. "Extra fabric ain't gonna hurt nobody. Lost enough clothes to Hunter claws an' shit. It ain't as warm as it looks."

Nick hadn't really even processed the sight, but he grunted, just to seem like he'd been aware. He slipped his right hand into the pocket of his slacks, turning his chin to glance across the store.

His eyes caught on Lena and Rhiannon huddled close next to a clothing rack, the older sister gesticulating widely as they spoke in whispers.

Neither looked particularly pleased.

"I need to get some clothes together." Nick muttered, holding out his hand toward Coach. It put his arm stretched out past Ellis, forearm far closer than he meant, and the younger man shuffled to the side to put distance between them.

Ellis was staring at him, and he desperately needed to get away from the gaze and everything it was full of. He couldn't take another second under it.

Coach eyed him with an uncertain, studious look, then sighed and passed him the flashlight. "Didn't see no suits back there." he commented, lightly.

If it was a joke or mockery, Nick couldn't tell. He backed up a few steps and sneered, mildly sure it came across with the appropriate amount of apathy and not the wild instability he actually felt. "I'll pull something together."
The eldest survivor grunted, and Nick felt some distant gratitude when Coach turned and nudged Ellis with his elbow. The gesture dragged Ellis' attention away long enough for Nick to escape in silence.

He found his way into the back of the store, gripping the flashlight in both hands. He could barely even remember what he'd wanted it for - he just closed his eyes and let the darkness take some of the edge off his headache.

"Pull yourself together, man." he muttered, pressing the end of the flashlight against his forehead. It felt cool.

Or maybe he just felt hot.

Squeezing his fingers into a clench, Nick searched through the barbed wire knotted up tight in his chest and found only one conclusion: I don't think I'm okay.

"Not the fucking time to lose it."
Chapter 242

Fumbling with the button of the pale blue jeans he'd found, Ellis squinted down at his lower body. They fit fine, and though the legs were a little long, it was nothing that his boots wouldn't account for.

It left him standing on the hem, huddled in the very far corner of the store behind a tall rack of bathrobes, just big enough to provide him cover while he'd quickly changed into a new pair of boxer briefs.

He'd tried to circle around, find Nick again to corner him into talking, but the gambler had disappeared into the dressing room before he could even blink. The urge to go find him anyway was outweighed by sense.

He don't wanna talk. he reminded himself. If he wanted tuh talk, we wouldn't be in all this mess.

Resigned, he left Nick alone, and changed in the corner rather than go into the dressing room hallway and wait for the man to finish. He wasn't interested in watching Nick find more excuses to avoid him.

A sigh passed his lips, closing his eyes. He reached up and palmed down his chest, flattening the Bullshifters T-shirt he'd yet to take off. He wanted to not think about it, but how could he avoid it?

Ellis hated the position they'd ended up in. He wanted to call a truce, lay down arms and make sure the man was alright, but he couldn't. Nick would just go on the defensive and accuse him of trying to fix their relationship, and he wouldn't be entirely wrong.

I ain't never seen him like that. He was jokin', wasn't he? He'd never -

He dismissed the thought before it could form, setting his jaw.

He's just more scared than he wants tuh admit. He plays a big ol' game 'bout not carin', but he's lost stuff, too. No one wants tuh think everyone's... everything's gone. 'N' it wouldn't be so dang hard if...

Ellis inhaled, opening his eyes to peer dully down at his socked feet. Losing Nick had made everything worse, and he couldn't shake the feeling Nick was thinking the same thing. Every new piece of bad news added an extra weight to their already overburdened shoulders.

Though he'd been coping even without Nick there to comfort and distract him, it wasn't easy, even when they were mildly amicable. Nick wasn't coping at all, and Ellis was worried about just how bad it was.

Worry fed easily into care and concern, and in a split-second, it was so easy to forget everything they'd been fighting over.

I don't care 'bout his rough edges. I don't care if he's nasty sometimes. I don't care if we gotta work on shit. All the junk him and we all been through, we could work through this. We could. If he'd just let me in, fer real, we could... do somethin'. Get somewhere.

It had been easier to accept the state of things when Nick had seemed confident and sure of it all, even if that had been hard to take. Now, seeing him... broken, Ellis felt an urge to reach out. Nick's ego was nothing new to him.
Ellis had tried more than once to fix things, but Nick didn't know how to lower his guard. He'd made a declaration, and would be damned before he went back on it.

Maybe I've been goin' at it the wrong way. Maybe - if I'm just here fer him right now... I don't want nothin' tuh go back tuh normal. I don't want us tuh just move on like nothin' happened. But if I can just get him tuh talk, if I can just get past his damn bullshit...

The thought petered out, leaving him with a steady frown. There was no sense running himself in circles for no good reason. He wasn't the one who needed convincing.

The Georgian slumped his body tiredly. He grabbed the bottom edge of his Bullshifters shirt and tore it up and off his frame, wriggling his arms free. With it gripped by and wrapped around his hands, he turned it enough to get a look at the logo emblazoned on the front.

His frown reached his eyes, using his thumb to trace the faded, bloodied shape.

Keith and he had, along with some buddies of theirs, started a highschool club. It had mostly been an excuse to hang out, and they'd adopted a variety of rituals to pass the time: tinkering with each other's cars, drag-racing across the countryside around their hometown, cramming into his mom's tiny basement and watching awful horror flics...

They'd made up T-shirts, and if Keith and he had ever successfully bought a garage to start their car repair business, it would have borne the same name.

But we ain't gonna, are we?

He felt a little woozy at the thought.

"Oh!"

Lena's voice startled him, and he turned in a dumb stumble. It took looking at her and realizing she'd covered her eyes with a hand to make him recognize the fact he was shirtless.

Reflex made him jolt to move, quickly falling to a crouch to grab the grey undershirt Coach had thrown at him. "Uh - sorry. Dressin' room's taken, so I figured I'd just change out here."

He peeked at her even as he threw the shirt on over his head, shimmying into it. She kept her hand squarely over her eyes, but a grin parked beneath the bottom edge of her palm. "It's okay. I should've barked before I got over here."

Ellis straightened the thin shirt on his frame, grabbing his trucker cap from the ground and setting it atop his head. He stood, blinking in her direction with a lowered chin. "I'm uh, decent."

Lena dropped her hand, looking him over, that grin turning into a quirked smile. "Lookin' good, mister."

He laughed, reddening despite himself, turning to grab the matching pale blue denim jacket from off the small rack he'd laid it over. He pushed his arms into the sleeves, peering down at his body rather than look at her. "You doin' okay? You seemed kinda beat by the time we made it here."

A thoughtful twitch made it to her brow, and the short woman grabbed the bottom edge of her thin hoodie, tugging it up enough to look at a portion of her tummy and navel. The pale colour of her flesh was mottled with greens and blacks, and it made Ellis flinch to see.

But she shrugged her shoulders. "I'm okay, I think? My stamina's not great, and running around makes me feel... sore. Crazy sore. Like my whole body's one big flipping bruise. But I haven't coughed up any blood, so that's a win."

It was so lackadaisical that Ellis snorted, unable to help the reaction. Judging by Lena's faint grin, it had been her intent.

"I was actually over here to check on you. Y'know, with the stuff that's happening."

That faded his humour, replacing it with a soft confusion. "Oh. Uh. That's real sweet'uv you, but 'm fine." He appreciated the gesture, of course, but he hadn't yet betrayed Nick's trust with the sisters and he didn't intend to. That left only one good excuse for feeling upset - and he didn't want to talk about the end of the world.

He found he mostly just didn't want to talk, but his manners made him pretend.

"Really." he uttered, when she looked unconvinced.

Lena hummed, putting her thumb against the tip of her nose and wiggling it idly back and forth. "Rhiannon said you were a tough cookie, but I thought she was joking."

Placing his hand on his chest, he itched at his sternum, shaking his head. "Uh... I guess that's a compliment, comin' from her..." he offered, turning to locate his steel-toed boots where he'd kicked them off, and sitting flat on the ground to start loosening the laces to more easily put them back on.

The biker darted a look over her shoulder before shrugging. "Rochelle and Chris are pretty cute, huh? He's a tough cookie, too."

There was a bloated meaning to her tone, and his movements paused. He didn't look at her, but he did frown just gently. He recognized the tone from a conversation they'd had back at the condo, over Spam and canned soups. She'd pried for information about Nick with the same un-subtle comments.

He didn't distrust her; far from it. But he was struck by the thought that she seemed to target him, like he'd be more receptive.

Or more gullible.

Ellis shook his head, dismissing the intrusive, Nick-like thought. He tried to be an open and friendly person; it made sense that she'd search out the one least likely to react poorly to a probing question. He couldn't assume it was ill-intentioned until he had reason to think so.

She was just terrible at disguising an ulterior motive... or Nick had honed his ability to notice them. A mix of both, perhaps.

"Yeah." he threw out, idly.

"You think he's okay?" she questioned, and that made Ellis stop outright. He blinked at her, and she seemed to hesitate at his expression. Genuine insecurity darted across her face, and the sincerity threw him for a loop. There was something going on, but he hadn't expected wariness and concern from her. "Like... actually okay? He's full of hot air, that one."

"Yeah." He spoke slowly, chewing on every word before it escaped him. "I mean, as okay as he can be. It hurts him pretty bad, I think, but we got him on meds as best we can. He's tryin', y'know?"
She approached a step, and he turned where he sat to blink up at her. Surprise flooded him when she looked outright upset, frowning. "I get that. But... aren't you worried?"

Ellis mouthed vaguely, gaping in a fishlike gesture. "Y-yeah, of course!" he managed, fighting back a twist of offense. He'd spent days being nothing but worried, and he'd done his best, even if his best hadn't always been enough. "We're all worried. 'N' we're doin' whatever we can."

His distress must have shown on his face, because she sighed, approaching a few steps with a flat and apologetic gesture of her hands. "Sorry, dude. Sorry. I'm not trying to - I'm just trying to look out for the kid. I wouldn't even say anything, but this... hits a nerve, you know? I don't want to do nothing."

Ellis fell to staring at her, confusion overwhelming all other emotion. He suddenly had the distinct sensation that he was out of his depth, out of the loop, and he was about to open his mouth and say as much when she muttered a handful of words that stopped him dead.

"Nick told me, alright? Or I... heard him, anyway. I know about Chris."

A million questions flooded him all at once. He wanted to leap to his feet and grab her by the hands, beg her to explain. He didn't know what was worse: the idea of something being wrong with Chris, or the idea of Lena knowing something from Nick that he didn't.

Had he confided in her? No, that didn't sound right. If she'd heard him it was more likely she'd eavesdropped - so had he been talking to Chris? The only thing that came to mind was whatever Nick had said to Christophe to get him back up on his feet earlier in the streets outside.

Lena had been nearby, hadn't she?

He shoved it all down, buried it by force, and tried to look calm when he did not feel it. "You do?"

Now who's probin' who?

The woman frowned, drawing her arms into a tight cross over her chest. "Seriously. I wouldn't say anything but... dangit, I've been there, y'know? I don't want to over-step and talk to him, or make it worse, but... we're the two weak links, right? Maybe I can help..."

She hesitated, trailing off, hazel eyes darting to the side. Ellis had to clench his fingers to keep himself still. He didn't know the right way to prompt her without revealing that he was summarily clueless.

He didn't have to.

Lena closed her eyes entirely, shaking her head. "I'm still sort of shell-shocked, Ellis. I don't know the dude very well, but... trying to kill himself just doesn't... seem like Chris." Her expression warped into a wince. "Guess it doesn't seem like anyone until... it happens."

Quiet sunk into Ellis' skull. It was like someone had pulled a fire alarm in his brain, and the foam had started to fill him up and spill from his ears. He stared at her, only distantly registering the rest.

"I can't blame him, I mean, frick, none of us knows what losing a limb is like. I can't pretend I understand how it feels, but I understand not knowing what else to do. Y'know? Shoot, dude, I dunno."

It was like he'd taken a too-large bite of sticky caramel, and his molars had cemented together. He lacked the energy to strain against the emotions holding his jaw shut. He'd considered the fact Chris would struggle with depression. It had been the very first thing the doctors had discussed when Keith had almost lost a leg.

He'd been aware of the possibility, conscious of the likelihood. None of that softened the blow of knowing Christophe had actually tried.

When? How... how'd I not know? Why'd he not tell us? Why'd Nick not tell us? We ain't been watchin' him. If we'd known, we could'uh been watchin' him. Whut if Chris had tried again and we didn't -

As his vision blurred, breath only reluctantly expanding his chest, Ellis moved shakily to stand. The motion made Lena open her eyes, look at him, and she stiffened.

"I didn't mean to start up - wait." Her voice broke off with a sharp inhale, and he was vaguely aware of her retreating a step, distancing herself from him in a sudden motion. "You... did know, didn't you?"

There was no point to lying, so he shook his head, just once. Horror overtook her rounded, soft features.

"Oh, shoot, dude, I -"

Ellis lifted a hand and grabbed at the bridge of his nose, pinching there, and his fingertips grazed wetness at the inner corners of his eyes. "Ain't yer fault." was the most coherent response he could manage, pushing himself to step past her. "I gotta go."

She didn't stop him. She put her hands up, almost defensively, giving him a wide berth. Her expression was one of mild horror, lips sealed tightly like she'd decided saying nothing was her best option.

He should've gone to find the Spaniard, but that was not where he aimed his footsteps. How could Chris not tell us? How could he not tell me, at least? How could Nick not tell me? This ain't about us, this's about Chris dyin'. Jesus - whut was he thinkin'?

As quickly as sorrow had struck, anger rose up in its stead. With every step he took toward the dressing room hallway, he boiled a little hotter, bleaching out the grief until he was left with just fury.

Goddamnit, Nick. You better have a good damn explanation fer this.

If he tried, he could drown out the part of him that wondered if this was partially to blame for Nick's fractured state.

Shit!
Chapter 243

The dressing room mirror reflected Nick's dull expression back at him, pale and washed out in the darkness. He sat on the dressing room bench and gripped his chin, thumbing at his jawline, staring at his own face like he didn't recognize it.

He'd only managed to get half changed. Nick had found a dark pair of jeans and a navy blue button-down, but he'd only managed to change pants and remove his old dress shirt before a wave of dizziness threatened his balance. He'd sat down rather than fall down, and hadn't yet convinced himself to try to stand again.

The Northerner couldn't muster up the energy to be bothered by how awful he looked. He felt...empty, but empty didn't wholly define it. He felt nothing.

He reached for anger, but felt nothing. He reached for grief - nothing. It was like he'd willed himself to find composure, and it had promptly expanded and swallowed him whole. He took a moment to glance down at his hand, lifting his other hand to join it, and he curled his fingers tightly.

He watched his fingernails catch in his skin, watched them tighten until they surely must've hurt, watched the flesh of his palm go taut as crescents were dug into them. He stopped short of drawing blood, but at no point was there any pain. Nothing. Not even the pressure of his grip, or the ache of his clenched fist.

Nick didn't feel it.

What the fuck is wrong with me?

The thought jolted air past his lips, and he looked up again, meeting his own gaze in the mirror. He let his chest expand, filling his lungs and holding the air there, willing the oxygen to filter into him. He needed to ground himself in something, anything, and pain wouldn't work if he couldn't feel it.

Was it a panic attack? That seemed like a reasonable conclusion, but he didn't feel panicked. His skin crawled with a numb static, and he felt hot, but his heart beat slowly in his chest. Too slow?

Slowing?

That stirred a little fear in him. He straightened, placing his stiff fingertips against his neck and seeking out his pulse, but locating it did him no favours. He couldn't focus long enough to count the beats and, more than that, he didn't know what he was counting to.

He breathed steadily, trying to focus. At least when he reached for humour, he felt something.

This is all the stress catching up to me. This is just everything finally boiling over. This is what happens when I run out of smokes, sex, and alcohol all at the same time.

Maybe having those outlets had been the only thing that had kept him stable, or perhaps it was just the landmine they'd casually stepped on, finally blowing his legs out from under him. The map outside was a perfectly good justification for losing his shit, but it didn't leave him with any recourse.

He couldn't fix the end of the world - not that he could fix any of the other potential causes, either. The world isn't going to un-fuck itself anytime soon, so how about you get your shit on straight,
Nick?

He inhaled and closed his eyes, nodding to himself.

Yeah. Okay.

It made sense, for a moment. It felt like something he could compartmentalize and bury. He just had to coax his nerves back into functioning.

Then the dressing room door was suddenly creaking open, startling his eyes into doing the same. A blur of motion and blue denim filled the mirror he stared dumbly into, until Ellis' hunched form came into dizzy focus. That made much less sense, scattering all his hard-won concentration.

"What are you -?" his voice uttered of its own volition, the sound echoing back to him at an odd disconnect. He watched Ellis lift up a hand, gesturing at him with his index finger raised, an aggressive shushing motion.

Nick turned his head to look at the younger man where he stood, rather than peer at his reflection, and there was a mercifully long pause wherein he was more than happy to obediently stay quiet. The silence allowed him to steel himself and shore up his focus, piece together his handful of assertions.

At the top of that list: something was wrong. That much was obvious by the way Ellis was trembling. He couldn't see his face, but his shoulders were low and shaking. If Nick didn't know better he'd have thought it was -

"Jesus Christ, Nick. I don't even know how tuh start, 'm so pissed at you."

- rage.

He had the presence of mind to think the whole situation funny, but not the presence of mind to keep a snort from escaping his throat. In an instant, Ellis was staring at him, and there were tears welling in his eyes. Nick swallowed his laughter in a bitter-tasting gulp, sealing his lips to keep it safely in. Bad move, buttercup.

"You think this's funny?"

Nick hadn't seen him this angry, ever, and recent days had seen him angry often. Seeing Ellis furious was sobering enough to knock some amount of sense into him, though it didn't fully ground him. He struggled to grab onto a clear thought, a feeling, to make sense of it. If Ellis is pissed, I probably did something to deserve it. But that's not news.

He grimaced, lifting his hand to palm down his face. His fingertips came away slick with sweat; it seemed the heat wasn't just his imagination. "I don't know what this is." Nick stated, dully. "You're welcome to explain anytime, kid."

Ellis stood there, trembling like he was so full of something he could barely contain it. It was a sharp contrast to Nick trembling like he might collapse inwards into the yawning emptiness beneath his skin.

Nick had time enough to allow his eyes to drift, taking in the Georgian's frame. He was outfitted almost head-to-toe in pale blue denim, and where his old coveralls had sagged on his frame, the jeans he'd picked out hugged at his legs. In contrast, his old T-shirt had been tight enough to put his body on display, but the denim jacket he wore now made him seem... larger. Rugged?
Intimidating was not a word that would easily apply to Ellis, but he certainly didn't look like a kid anymore. Nick didn't know how to stop himself from staring, soaking in every inch, taking in every curve and edge. It's definitely the fucking end of the world if I willingly gave that up. occurred to him in a slur, and he at least stifled his laughter that time.

"When did Chris try tuh -" He choked, voice dropping as his chin did the same. "Why didn't you tell us he was suicidal?"

Huh. So that's what a bucket of ice on my balls feels like.

His eyes snapped to Ellis' face, and suddenly focused; actually focused. He was tempted to stand, but the moment he shifted his weight he was faced with how disjointed and unsteady his legs felt. Disinclined to show that sort of weakness, he drew his hands into tight fists on his knees, taking Ellis in more fully.

The Georgian's cheeks were wet now, but Nick didn't make the mistake of thinking he was seeking comfort, or wanted it.

"I had it under control." he stated, instead, simply. "He's still around, isn't he?"

Ellis' hand suddenly flew to cover his mouth, shaking his head. "Shit. Kinda hoped it wasn't true."

"Just -"

He was silent for a few minutes, and Nick didn't speak. He wasn't foolish enough to think he had the upper hand, nor coherent enough to think he could talk his way out of trouble.

When Ellis finally opened his eyes, he looked... exhausted. The tears on his face were still, fat droplets stuck in his lashes. He was quiet but unyielding.

"You didn't think fer a second if we'd want to know? Whut makes you think it's all up tuh you?"

Nick opened his mouth, but Ellis kept on, voice coarse with a raw misery. "Why wouldn't you tell me, at least, so..."

"So what?" Nick wished it sounded less cobbled-together. He wished he sounded angry, but he didn't. He sounded about half as pathetic as he felt, trying to lash out, trying to get Ellis to drop the conversation entirely. "So you could handle it? I did my best. And last I checked, he didn't do it, so I'd say it was good enough."

Ellis lowered his gaze to the ground, clenching his fists, and he gritted out, "You shouldn't've dealt with it by yerself. You should'uv told me."

A scoff touched Nick's voice, miming out offense he could barely manage. "Yeah, 'cause screw me, right? I don't need your permission to -"

"Nicolas! Fer fuck's sake!"

The gambler halted, eyes widening a little. It wasn't like Ellis didn't do his fair share of swearing, but that was different. It was like hearing his own voice - albeit significantly more Southern than when he owned it - piped through Ellis' perfect lips.

And he didn't think Ellis had ever uttered his full first name. He was being lectured, and he wished it was less effective at getting his attention.
"Can you listen tuh me fer two goddamn seconds?" Ellis rubbed fingertips into his forehead, massaging, the grimace on his lips betraying the headache that must've been rising. "You ain't listened tuh me since the day we broke up, 'n' I'm real sick'uh listenin' tuh you. If your head's gonna be that far up yer rear-end then the least you could do is shut up."

Nick tried to. He genuinely attempted to sit there in silence, partially because he was too tired to fight in earnest and partially because he thought Ellis deserved it from him. He deserved a chance to chew him out.

So why, he was left to wonder, did his lips start moving?

"I didn't listen to you before -"

There wasn't much distance between them, and certainly not enough to give Nick enough warning to defend himself when Ellis lurched forward. He could only brace, ready, wondering idly if he'd even feel it if Ellis decked him in the jaw.

But a blow didn't come. Instead, hands gripped his shoulders, digging in fingertips tightly into the meat of his shoulderblades and just above his clavicles. There was a vague shake, and Ellis' face was suddenly barely inches from his. "Nick."

Nick's mouth hung open, shocked into silence, because fuck if he didn't feel that.

Ellis' skin was so hot, he thought he must've been ice cold. Hands did not grip his shoulders; they were hot irons, melting through his skin. It burned him like frostbite, sending goosebumps down his arms, making his fingers clench in the thick and unfamiliar fabric of his dark jeans.

He wanted to cry out, tell Ellis to let him go, because it hurt - but he bit it back, instead closing his jaw with a snap and breathing deeply through his nose. He felt the rippling soreness that tore across his nerve-endings, like a yawn as they stirred. He stared back at Ellis, eyes locked, aware he shouldn't have felt the relief that surged through him.

The pain was infinitely better than emptiness.

"I need you tuh take this seriously." Ellis said, flat. "Take me seriously. Please."

Nick said nothing, unsure what he'd sound like if he did speak. And judging by the way his mouth actually stayed shut, he'd at least regained most of his faculties.

He just nodded.

A frown starting on his lips, Ellis leaned back slightly. He didn't release Nick, not entirely, but his grip slackened. "I don't care whut's been goin' on with us. The idea of you dealin' with this alone scares me." Nick's eyes must've tightened, narrowed, because Ellis hurriedly added, "I know you say yer fine, but I don't think you are. 'N' whether I'm right or wrong, you shouldn't be takin' this on by yer lonesome. It ain't healthy."

Nick realized it, there, sluggishly: Ellis wasn't even angry about Chris. He was angry for Nick, worried for him.

"You look awful. 'N' you feel - hot, Nick. It's eatin' you all up."

The sadness in his still-wet eyes was overwhelming. It was enough to drown in, and the anger that edged it wasn't enough to dilute the simple pressure of affection. Ellis cared about him, despite him, and that was more terrifying than anything else.
At least he could wrap his mind around the concept that the virus had overwhelmed the country. That was measurable in blood and lives, that could've been described in some formula. There were numbers somewhere - how many were infected, how many had died, how many still lived.

Love had no metrics. Care had no bounds. He couldn't comprehend its width and breadth, nor its effect on him. He had no way to grip the thing gleaming in Ellis' eyes.

"I know we broke up, so I ain't - I know why you didn't come tuh me. I get it. That ain't why I'm upset." Ellis' jaw was taut, and it didn't take a genius to tell he was lying through his teeth. "You just should'uh come tuh somebody, even if it wasn't me."

Nick's chin lowered, and he responded thickly. "It wasn't like that. I made the right call, and it didn't have anything to do with - you. Or me. Or what we are or aren't. It was between Chris and me, not... It had nothing to do with the..." He'd talk himself in circles if he kept trying to talk about it without talking about it, so he sighed sharply, trying to look away. "Besides, you and me were still -"

He snapped his mouth shut; his brain processed it just a few seconds too late. Ellis, however, was quick on the uptake.

The Georgian jerked back as if to look him over, brows going flat in surprise before they tangled right back up. "'We were still?' he prompted, craning his head to follow when Nick darted his eyes to the side. "We were still whut?"

Bad fucking choice, Nick.

"Nevermind." he muttered, as if it would have any effect.

"We were still datin'?" Ellis abruptly let him go, and breathing was like huffing in cold air after sucking on a mint. Nick couldn't help but tuck his arms over his chest, not in anger or defense but cold - and Ellis gaped at him, unable to stifle his shock when he didn't contest the statement. "Back at the condo? This happened - yer tellin' me this happened while we were still datin'?"

Nick held his breath, waiting.

"Jesus, Nick. You - we -"

It wasn't the first time Nick had seen betrayal on Ellis' face, and it wasn't the worst. So why did it feel like he'd gripped his own heart and squeezed?

It hadn't even really occurred to him before now, how Ellis would feel. He'd not thought about it in those terms. A fresh look made it all obvious: of course Ellis would feel wounded, hurt. The timeline betrayed the fact that they'd had to have had sex at least once in the interim.

A very good once, he recalled, Ellis' mouth wet and warm around his -

Not the time.

They'd been intimate with the secret between them, fine, but how was that some egregious sin? Their whole relationship had been, to Nick, a secret. And Ellis had been keeping Nick in the dark about Rochelle knowing. And both of them had been keeping secrets about what they really wanted, what they thought, what they felt.

How was this the final straw? How was this what hurt the worst?
Nick wanted to say it all, but couldn't. He couldn't say any of it, body rigid and tongue heavy in his mouth. He just stared up at Ellis, eyelids low, half-open, and muttered, "It didn't have anything to do with us."

There was so much of them, and so little. 'Us' was such a tiny word, and so loaded. Loaded, enough, that he thought he saw a vague softening of Ellis' posture.

Then knuckles boxed into his ear. It wasn't a hard blow, but it was enough to startle him into straightening, enough to spark pain and make him flinch. His eyes blinked up at Ellis to find him with fists clenched, shoulders high. "That's fer lyin' tuh me 'bout it. And this -"

He moved again, this time with the other hand, but Nick's reflexes acted first. He grabbed Ellis' forearm and aborted the strike before it landed, holding his arm aloft. Nick only just had the strength to keep him still, particularly when Ellis reared his head back at the defense and struggled, trying half-heartedly to prise his forearm free.

Ellis' mouth opened, but Nick spoke first.

"It was a no-win scenario for all of us, either way." he spat out. "If I'd told everyone, you all would have gotten fucked up over it, and fucked Chris up over it, so I dealt with it. And it was fine."

A vague huff of air passed Ellis' lips, like a laugh. Awkward, maybe, and Nick didn't miss how he was still trying to subtly work his arm free. "So instead, you fucked yerself up over it. Why do you think that's fine, Nick?" Anger stoked back up in his voice, stubborn. "That ain't fine! I know you enough tuh know you ain't fine!"

_This is why he's too fucking good for you, Nick. Because you break his heart and throw it on the ground, you grind salt in the wounds, you act like a fucking asshole to him, and he still cares. You fucking ruined it, and he's still here._

Nick stood, pushing forward, forcing Ellis into a half-step backwards to make room for him to get to his feet in the dressing room. "You don't know anything about me. You don't know who I am." There was suddenly so little space, so little distance between them and little more to gain without pressing into the walls.

"I'm a fucking terrible - ... I'm fucked up. I'll always be fucked up. But I was just trying to protect - everyone. You. That's all I've been trying to do."

Hearing the truth fall so bluntly from his lips was startling. Both of them tensed, Ellis' wrist flexing under his grip, a grip that was suddenly tighter than he'd meant. The younger man's eyes widened just a twitch as Nick straightened, tilting up to combat the slight height advantage Nick had on him with both of them barefoot.

As quickly as he'd fallen to a chill, he'd dipped right into the inverse. Nick felt sweat beading at the small of his back, and his voice dropped to a growl, energy finally surging in him. There was no other way to vent it. It filled him, overwhelmed him.

"I'm just trying to - do the right thing. Not fucking easy. It's easy for you." He finally felt, and it was such a relief... but it was frenetic with the buzz of hypersensitivity. Sense dragged at him, alarms firing off in his skull, but it did little aside from slowing his movements. "Fucking world's ending. I don't even know what the right thing fucking is anymore. I just know it isn't me, and you won't... stop."

_Stop._
Nick shifted his grip, thumb sliding on the denim of Ellis' jacket until the pad found skin. He pressed there, and his own pulse beating through the digit mingled with Ellis', quickening like some scared animal.

"Nick." The Georgian's voice hit a soft note, trembling, like a warning, like a plea. "Whut do you want me to think here? Whut am I supposed tuh think, you sayin' stuff like that? Why can't yuh just admit when you need... someone? Need me? Why do you have tuh do this?"

_Don't do this._

He shifted, nudging forward, and it only took a step to reach the side of the dressing room. They did not shove into the wall, Ellis did not strike it. No, he _melted_ into it, pressed against it as if the consciously enforced distance between their bodies was a physical force-field that slowly pushed him flat.

_Don't do this to him._

It was too dark, the flashlight's glow broken up by their bodies. Nick couldn't see his eyes, but they stared at each other in the dark all the same. Ellis was frozen, trembling, and Nick froze himself by force.

"Nick." This time it was something else entirely, just a puff of a syllable into the intimate bubble around them. The Georgian's free hand lifted, and Nick's spine shuddered when he grazed fingertips on his bare waist. It was the only movement between them for what felt like forever.

They traced up, following the slope of his side, finding their way up over Nick's chest and blindly seeking the shape of his chin in the dark. When they touched there, Ellis tentatively molded his hand to Nick's jaw, sinking into the facial hair that had grown just a little too long, a little too thick, softening.

The darkness that clawed between them grew denser when Ellis leaned forward. Their noses touched, grazing, and it was sharp electricity. They were so close, it would've only taken a nudge to seal their lips, a little more to slot against his body.

So easy to ruin everything.

So close that when Ellis whispered to him, Nick almost felt the words rather than heard them. "Please -"

So easy to fill in the blanks with what he wanted to hear.

But Ellis forced the rest out, breath hitching and breaking, tone raw with shame like Nick had never heard from him before. He bled, shattered, and Nick hadn't even touched him more than the thumb at his wrist, hadn't even reciprocated - though maybe that was precisely the reason for his shame: how _easy_ it had been. "I-I dunno whut this is..."

_Don't make promises you can't keep._ he thought, but to whom, he wasn't sure.

It took so much effort to restrain himself, and even more to actually pull away. Nick's fingers drifted open, releasing the other man's wrist. "A bad idea." he rasped, lips barely moving, jaw glued shut. He slid his left foot back without even lifting it, scraping against the dressing room carpet, turning his body enough to break away.

His head tilted to the side to jerk away from Ellis' hand, mouth instead hovering just over his shoulder. His cheek still tingled, a live wire with the left-over heat from Ellis' touch.
He closed his eyes. "This is... a bad idea."

He heard the sucked inhale of breath, felt the air shift as the younger man sagged and then the sharp graze of denim against the outer side of his arm as he stumbled past Nick. Both of them panted in the dim space, Ellis' breath heated and open-mouthed and Nick's strained through his nose.

Nick thought he would run - but he didn't, not immediately.

There was a moment, and then Ellis let out a sharp and stuttered sigh, voice shaking when he spoke. It was so fragile, trembling at the edges, but stiff with the framework of well-tread thought. They were words he'd put together with care but was terrified of uttering.

"I hate not knowin' you. I hate not knowin' how you feel, because I want tuh think you miss me, but I'm so scared I'm wrong. That I'm just bein' an idiot, missin' you. 'N' then you go on and say shit like that, talk about protectin' me, 'n' I'm supposed tuh think it was all fake? That it didn't mean nothin' at all? Bullshit. I don't believe it."

Nick gritted his jaw, his whole body gone rigid. "You don't -"

But Ellis gave no quarter for his protest - his voice may have been glass-thin, but it cut through his with no hesitance. "I was ready tuh figure shit out. I didn't need easy, I didn't need simple. I just needed you, 'n' - tuh know - how you felt 'bout me. If you... wanted tuh... try."

Nick's eyes opened, unsure what precisely made him do it. He didn't want to see Ellis in that instant, but he looked, like watching a car crash. He glanced over his shoulder, looking toward where Ellis had pressed himself tightly into the dressing room door, compacted as far from Nick as possible. Despite the fact Ellis was looking squarely down at the ground, he tensed up, aware of the other man's gaze on him.

Nick said nothing, and the moment of silence afterward ached.

Only eventually did Ellis whisper to him again. Nick could hear the wetness, the strain, as he held back tears. "You were already protectin' me. It was all you ever did. The only person yer protectin' now is you."

Watching him open the door and slip out, not even bothering to shut it behind him, sunk a cold pain in the pit of his stomach. Nick found the far wall with his shoulder, leaning into it, finding his back pressed tight into the flat plane of the wall-mounted mirror.

This time he didn't look. He didn't want to see what was in his reflection.

He knew it wasn't emptiness anymore.
Ellis didn't know where he meant to go, only that he wanted to leave. He didn't look - he just walked.

He walked till he couldn't walk anymore, pressing his hands into the cold steel rail of a clothing rack, hanging onto it with little more energy than the shirts and pants that rattled at his flanks. He closed his eyes, squeezing them shut, unable to stop the tears from streaking down his cheeks.

His knees were jelly, threatening to give, and his body surged with heat that pooled in his gut and sprawled up his spine and felt a lot like shame.

It came in waves, like lightning - I should'uh kissed him. - and then the inevitable thunder:

No. Stupid. That would'uh been stupid.

He pushed his hand into his cheekbone, grinding his knuckles at his eyes. It had been the closest to a real conversation they'd had, the closest Nick had come to telling him the actual truth. He'd finally said it in so many words: he thought he was protecting Ellis. He was trying to do the right thing - or what he thought was the right thing.

It was misguided and foolish, yes, but Nick had done it out of care. And given the chance to take advantage of Ellis, Nick had been wrong: he'd said no after all.

Ellis felt a whole host of things, but at the top of the list was relief. He felt relieved, the sensation mingling in with the clenching sadness in his chest. Doubt had crept in despite his best efforts: what if Nick didn't really love him? What if he was wrong, and Nick had no interest in a relationship with him - liked him, perhaps, but didn't love him?

That had been so painful, because it had been possible. Believable, as much as he hadn't wanted to believe it.

Standing there, trying to stop the tears flooding down his face, Ellis felt relieved - and finally, mercifully, confident. Nick cared about him. Nick wanted him. Every time he'd read between the lines and assumed, presumed, had been right. All the moments that had meant so much to him, and he'd thought had meant so much to Nick... he'd been right.

Love.

That feeling had come back. It had brewed between them, magnetizing them. He hadn't imagined it, and hadn't mistaken sexual attraction for it - though there was plenty of that, too. Nick was in an awful state, and as much as Ellis worried for him, it had also torn down the walls the older man had put up enough for Ellis to see in and see the pain. The yearning and the need and the fear had all been on display, and it was as terrifying as it was heartening.

He's so scared tuh hurt me... and if I'd just kissed him, let him kiss me - I'd be provin' him right... or he'd think that, anyhow. Wouldn't do either of us no favours. Even if I miss him so bad...

Nick had been sure that things would get out of hand, and he couldn't honestly say the man was wrong. If Nick had pressed, would he really have rejected him? No - he'd have made the same mistake he always had, taking the subtext to heart: Nick needed him, and he needed Nick, and that felt like enough. He'd felt like it would be enough to make the difference when it finally came time to acknowledging it aloud. Making it official.
Except subtext had never ended up being enough, and when it had come time to put it all to words... they'd broken. They needed to mend that break first.

Logic didn't help the burn in his cheeks. Logic didn't make it any easier to dismiss the feeling that he'd thrown away a chance to improve things. Maybe pulling Nick close and kissing him would've fixed something, brought it all to a fever pitch that they could have healed from.

Ultimately, he could've run himself ragged considering the possible outcomes, the what-ifs, but he tried to shake it all off to instead focus on the one truth he did have.

He'd been right: Nick cared about him.

He'd also been so, so wrong: Christophe was not okay.

"I swear to God." Rochelle's voice came into focus out of the buzz in his ears, approaching. She was laughing. "If you keep talking in Spanish at me, I'm gonna kick you. Just because I don't understand you doesn't mean I can't tell when you're -" She interrupted herself easily, tone chipper. "Ellis! Come help me. I'm being harassed."

Ellis tried to bring his hands up and scrub the tears and redness off his face. He wasn't foolish enough to think it would prove effective, but he couldn't just turn around without even trying to hide it, either. The last thing he wanted was to talk about what had happened, but he couldn't shake it off, either. It clung to him, desperate for some kind of release.

Christophe's voice carried to him, too, full of a grin. "Eres la chica más guapa del mundo, y me he enamorado de ti." he crooned. "¿Te gusta hablar sucio? Haré lo que sea por ti."

Any efforts to calm himself fell apart, there. Chris. I can't believe he... He turned without thinking, eyes darting up, to find Rochelle only a few steps away and Chris hovering at her elbow. They were both laughing, right up until the moment they looked at him. Rochelle realized it first, her expression falling.

"Ellis? What's wrong?"

Christophe blinked at him, lips parting to speak.

He didn't manage anything before Ellis bolted to cross the distance between them. He yanked the foreigner into his arms, squeezing around his midsection, drawing them so flat and tight together he felt Chris squeak out a strangled noise. The man didn't immediately return the embrace, shocked into freezing with his arm stretched out as if to balance them against falling over.

Ellis started babbling before he could control himself. "I-I'm so sorry! I should'uh known better, 'n'... I should'uh known somethin' was up, but - I been so caught up in muh own stuff, I didn't... see nothin... 'M so selfish -" He buried his face into the soft curve of Christophe's shoulder, swallowing the urge to sob. All it did was choke him, suffocate him, and he gritted out a miserable sound instead. "'M sorry."

"¡Tío! Por favor, slowly! What is -" The flat of his hand settled tentatively at the crown of Ellis' head, bracing him. Ellis was vaguely aware of another set of hands coming to land on his back as Rochelle started smoothing her fingertips in circles over his spine, rustling over the taut denim of his new clothing. "Why do you apologize? You do nothing to me."

"I should'uh known." was all Ellis could force out, strangled.

Rochelle sighed, loudly, her voice falling to a frustrated note. "Ellis, what happened?" She must've given up on him, turned her head away, because she suddenly sounded a little bit more distant. She directed her words at someone else. "Were you talking to him? He left to go change. Who was talking to him? Where's Nick?"

Calm but full of a gritty, lingering exhaustion, Coach's voice rumbled back. "They both went back in the dressin' room." he stated simply, though the statement - and its implication - was anything but simple.

Rochelle sighed again, this time more of a growl. "Seriously? Of all the days..." Her hands lifted off Ellis' back as she strode away from them, and in the absence of her comfort, he blearily lifted his head to peek up at Christophe. The Spaniard grimaced at him, and there was a vague and uncertain discomfort in his golden eyes.

"¿Chico...?" he uttered, hesitantly.

If there was a better way to handle the situation, Ellis wasn't sure he had the strength to find it. So, without recourse, he didn't know what to do except speak honestly. "I know... whut happened. I know you almost..." he whispered, barely managing to moderate the sound to keep it just in the squat space between their faces. "I'm so glad you didn't do it, Chris. Really. 'N'... so sorry I wasn't there."

That discomfort flashed to outright panic as comprehension flooded the foreigner, but it quickly muted itself to a dull tremble. Chris' chin lowered, before he looped his arm around Ellis' torso and tightened it, dragging him back into the crook of his neck. Burrowed close to Ellis' ear, he croaked back, "Do not tell her, por favor."

Ellis would've argued, but Rochelle was already speaking over both of them.

"I'm gonna go kick his ass."

She sounded furious. The statement grabbed Ellis by the collar, making him surge to twist his head and look at her, blinking away the blur in his vision. "N-no!" She was standing a few feet away, halted next to Coach, her hands gripping her hips and her head hung low. She didn't even look at him. "Ro', please, just... leave it alone."

Rochelle's head lifted enough to look at Coach. They shared a glance, the content of which was half-disguised from him - but if Coach's weary shrug was any indication, it was not fruitful. She sucked in air through her teeth, darting a glance over her shoulder in Ellis' direction. Her eyes were worried, maybe, beyond the miles of frustration. "Then tell me what happened."

Ellis hesitated. He looked up first at Chris, reading the silent plea there. The idea of participating in furthering the secret made him sick to his stomach, but it wasn't his to tell. At least if he knew, he could get Chris alone and try to convince him to open up to the rest of the team on his own terms.

Betraying the Spaniard to Rochelle now would just ensure he wouldn't listen to Ellis' advice later.

He carefully pulled away from the man, lowering his gaze to the ground. Chris let him go without argument, arm held tightly against his side, head dropped until his chin touched his chest. Ellis put both his palms against his closed eyes, squeezing, pressing. "I..."

There was silence, where nobody moved. He felt Chris' anxiety spiking beside him, pulsing like some tangible force next to him. Ellis peeked out between his fingers, looking up and across the store.
Lena and Rhiannon stood as far away as possible, practically against the wall - Rhiannon literally so, arms crossed and back pressed into the wall with her legs crossed at the knees - and both were watching him intently. The brunette had her thumb between her teeth, chewing at it anxiously. Her eyes were soft and apologetic.

It comforted him just slightly, but he was left, still, clueless. The hell'm I supposed tuh say?

"Look, Ro', I... it's been a bad day, y'know?" he mumbled, dropping his hands. He wished he seemed more convincing, that his face wasn't flushed and he didn't have to sniff wetly between his sentences. "We just fought a li'l. It ain't nothin', okay, just -"

The dark-skinned woman gritted her teeth, thrusting her arms in either direction. "The second or third or fourth time he made you cry, I might've taken that as an answer." she muttered, quietly enough that it might've not carried across the store to the biker sisters. "I'm supposed to let him keep doing this?"

Ellis squeezed eyes shut again, breathing in deep. His fingers were clenched into fists, leaving him unresponsive when Chris' fingers touched lightly onto the meat of his thumb, a searching touch, like comfort. He thought Ellis was covering for him, and he was only half-wrong. The Georgian thought clearly enough to force his pinky to relax, turning his hand to nudge the other man's wrist in a soft acknowledgement.

"We're..." He struggled, the truth clamouring at his lips. *We're gettin' somewhere. he wanted to say. We might get somewhere this time. *"Please, Ro', just - let me -"

A subtle vibration started in the air.

At first, he thought he imagined it, just stress ringing in his ears. His eyelids fluttered in surprise, head cocking, gaze flashing around him. When he saw Rochelle doing the same, followed by Coach and Chris, and then Rhiannon jolting to stand straight from the wall, he had to admit it was real, and growing. It started at his edges and worked its way in, buzzing in his teeth.

"The fuck?" Rhiannon's voice barked out, preceding her sprinting toward the propped-open storefront. She didn't leave the store, simply leaning her head underneath the metal security screen and looking outside. "The fuck is that?"

Ellis half-turned, frowning, swiping his knuckles across his mouth and forcing in a quick breath. "I... I dunno. It's gettin' louder."

Both Coach and Lena moved to follow Rhiannon's footsteps, though the ex-football player pushed past her and ducked entirely underneath the security gate. He stood a foot or two beyond the door, his lower half visible as he stood in silence rather than shout back where it would echo through the mall's internal atrium. As he stood there, the sound rose, expanded.

As it became louder and gained clarity, Ellis started to better define it. Rather than a singular hum, it pulsed in a rapid vibrato. The closer it got, the more distinct the pattern became: a growing and repeating whuff-whuff-whuff -

"Is that a helicopter?" Rochelle stated, her tone airy, like she didn't fully comprehend the words. The statement hung in the air in isolation for a few moments, none of them moving as the sound started to vibrate in Ellis' bones.
Then everyone moved.

"That's a fucking helicopter!" left the producer like a swear, shouting, her posture darting into tension, primed to run somewhere. Anywhere. "We need to get outside and flag them down!"

Ellis bolted for the clothing rack underneath which he'd left his steel-toed boots. Midway, he glanced toward the dressing room hallway - Nick was still in the dressing room, with no signs of surfacing. He almost braced himself and adjusted his path, but Christophe had already started in that direction and Ellis was quick to surrender the responsibility.

He couldn't think about it. He had to re-prioritize, and that meant stuffing down his feelings, burying it so he could focus. There was no time to break down and break apart. He had to focus, for his team. For himself.

Lena was stumbling to the store's counter, where Rochelle had left the team's supplies backpack next to the register. She gripped her side, expression caught in a heavy wince, scrambling to grab the bag and put her arm through one of the straps. Even as she got it settled on her back, she huffed out, "No way we get their attention on the road. Not with zombies everywhere."

Rochelle released a frustrated sound, like a whining exhale of air. Coach had returned from the outer mall atrium and was grabbing his shotgun from against the wall near the entryway, and he grunted tense affirmation.

"Girl's right."

Throwing himself to the ground, Ellis started to force his feet into his boots, fighting just momentarily with the tight fit of the ankles and his trembling fingers. They shook so badly he thought he wouldn't manage at all, but they obeyed him with only some argument. "We could find the roof access." he uttered, more a question than a statement.

"Whatever we do, we have to do it fast. Now." Rochelle grabbed at her sternum, clutching fingertips in the soft and stretchy material of her hoodie top. Her eyes darted toward the dressing room, where not a single sound emanated from. Christophe had disappeared into the hallway mere seconds previous - but seconds were precious.

The sound began to consume them, the vibration whipping through the air, shaking in the mall's very structure. There was no mistaking it for anything else, now. It was reaching such thunderous volume, it must have been flying perilously low to the city. And it had come up on them so quickly, it must have been flying perilously fast.

She knew one thing for sure: if there was a chance to be seen, to make contact with someone who could rescue them, it was this.

"Ellis, Rhee -" Rochelle darted for the entryway, and she hadn't even reached the half-closed security gate before Coach was tossing the stun baton at her. She snatched it out of the air, nodding at him. "Let's go! Everyone else stay here." Rhiannon was already dodging underneath the gate, disappearing around the corner, and Rochelle flashed after her.

Lena hesitated at the counter, paling, but she did not protest. It made sense to send those of the team that could sprint, but that inevitably meant splitting them up.

Coach had shouldered his double-barrel shotgun, and he grabbed Ellis' shotgun from where it sat nearby, holding it out in the air. Ellis scrambled on hands and knees in the instant before he got himself upright, kicking himself to standing off the solid toes of his workboots to run toward the front door.

He wanted to worry about Nick, worry about why Chris had not yet returned with him, but there was no time. No space. No room to breathe. Is he okay? Is he as upset as I am? Should I've stayed? Or...

He tried not to think at all, not when thinking would only slow him down.

He just grabbed his shotgun from Coach’s hands and ran.
The mall had become a buzzing hornet's nest. Infected screamed from the lower level, scattering in every direction, lashing out at each other when they couldn't pinpoint the helicopter's thunderous noise. It was a small mercy, really, that all the sound disguised the rapping of their feet striking the tile floor.

Shit. There's a fifty-fifty shot this brings a whole bunch of infected down on us.

Rochelle kept looking up, glancing through the glass paneling that made up the center of the mall's roof. She felt like the chopper was just seconds from them, judging by how loud it was, but it had not yet passed over them. There was still time.

They sprinted along the upper balcony, reaching an intersection that had a hallway branched off to their right. The glass roof didn't extend over the side corridor, which was a promising sign. Rochelle only needed a glance to notice restroom doors, and a tall door on the far wall labeled 'EMPLOYEES ONLY.'

There was no way to know if there was roof access beyond it, but there was no better direction to run, and not enough time to look for other options. "Come on!" She bolted down the corridor, and Ellis and Rhiannon were close at her heels.

Four infected were clustered halfway down the balcony's wide offshooting hall, and although the sound of the survivors was well-disguised, the zombies were so enraged and alert that they saw the oncoming trio almost immediately. They screamed, arms flashing out in angry swipes, scrambling to meet the survivors in the middle of the corridor.

Rochelle felt her teammates right at her flanks, closing in to defend against the oncoming infected. They didn't need to communicate to coordinate their next moves; all three of them knew there was no time to get caught in a scuffle. They needed to get past.

Rhiannon darted to strike first, leaping ahead to twist her body and bring her bat up to strike the first infected in the chin. The blow was strong enough to knock it backwards, tripping into the zombies behind it, halting their progress for a spare few seconds. She bolted past them, swinging her body to avoid the snatching fingers and claws.

Following her lead, Rochelle sprinted hard to the right. Ellis followed her, and as all three of them circled the group of infected, he turned on his heel. Stopping only for an instant, he lifted his pump shotgun, bracing himself with a long step backwards.

The infected were clustered, gathered, and one pull of his shotgun trigger sent a burst of pellets through the bulk of them.

The center-most zombie suffered it the worst, the gunshot blowing a sizeable chunk out of its broad, bare chest. Scraps of gore lined the hole that made up its chest, now, revealing what might've been the pulsating shapes of blackened organs, contained and framed by jagged and toothlike ribs. Meat only just clung to the bones, tendons and sinew holding it together.

It shrieked as it lost its footing, and the impact with the tile was enough to jar a gush of black fluids from its open torso. The creature didn't get up again, clawing at the ground in futile attempts to gain traction, its legs gone limp and sluggish.

Flanking it were two female infected, and though the shotgun blast hadn't done quite as much... damage to them, it had clipped their sides and sent them both staggering with the force. They were off-balance and bleeding, but still mostly intact.

He almost pulled the trigger again, but the sound of his teammates sprinting away from him made him scramble and follow. The wounded infected proved enough of an obstacle to slow the fourth, uninjured one, though all three of the still-living infected would be shortly on their heels.

It wasn't the best plan, but none of it would matter if they let the helicopter pass them by.

Rhiannon lengthened her strides to pull ahead, and she stretched out her left hand to grab the handle before her body had fully settled to a stop in front of the door. She twisted, and it did not give, a click betraying the fact it was locked shut.

"Of fucking course." she snarled. Before either Ellis or Rochelle could so much as think about acting, she'd swung her bodyweight back onto one foot. The biker brought her heel to bear on the door's surface, just beside the keyhole panel.

The first strike jolted the door, but there was little visible effect. If there was a cracking of breaking sound, it was disguised under the beating of the helicopter blades, intense in the air around them. Fury exploded across her expression, and she stepped back to coil her body behind a second kick, harder this time.

In one swift flash, the door snapped open, pale white wood chips shattering from around the doorjamb. It broke, fractured, but it was not the only thing that gave way.

Rhiannon shouted, staggering in a quick double-hop when she set her weight down on the foot she'd used to kick. Ellis saw her face pale, though she continued forward in a rough few steps to disappear through the door. There wasn't much to do but follow her.

Ellis chased Rochelle as she bolted into the room, turning back around once he'd reached the threshold. With the lock broken, it wouldn't have provided them much cover, anyway - so he braced himself there and waited for the infected to reach him.

He had enough time to glance over his shoulder and get a look at his teammates just a couple feet behind him, keeping his shotgun directed outward with his finger tight on the trigger. Concern for Rhiannon overrode his desire to examine the room, and he absorbed little more than shelves and stacks of boxes.

"I'm fine!" Rhiannon's voice cut through the beating rhythm of the helicopter's blades where it had stabilized to a constant thrum. She was hunched over, right leg slightly lifted until only her toes touched the ground. Rochelle had slung the other woman's left arm over her shoulders to help her stand.

When the producer looked back at Ellis, their gazes met in a subtle panic. The biker didn't look fine.

The three still-standing infected, screaming over the din, charged at him. The yet-unharmed one had gotten ahead of its wounded fellows, and the trio ran in a messy triangular formation. Ellis aimed low this time, and when he pulled the trigger, the buck of his gun preceded all three going down.

Their legs were mostly obliterated, blood guttering from ruined muscle. The two that had already been injured struggled even to move, their bodies sluggish and jerky, though the previously unharmed one was trying to crawl forward.
It was on hands and knees, its shins ruined and tattered. Its mouth was open in a snarl, the sound barely audible over the thunderous noise overhead. Ellis responded with a swift kick, the steel toe of his boot crushing the bone of its chin and sending its jaw into a clap shut, greyed teeth breaking on themselves.

Ellis turned, rushing through the doorway, urgently darting his gaze around the room even as he shouted, "Is she okay?!"

With no glass roofing outside in the hall to shine in line, it would have been almost too dark to see had the room not had a squat, tinted window on the far wall. Sunlight meandered through, split along the bottom right edge by metal rods criss-crossing past it in the shape of a staircase.

A fire escape, perhaps, as it seemed to lead both higher and lower than their current height. He did not, however, see a door leading out to it.

The rest of the room was full of cleaning supplies, some boxed up and some opened and spread across a few plastic fold-up tables. Shelves lined the far wall, leaving a gap in the center for a doorway that hung ajar. It looked like a maintenance hallway, stretching on behind the stores’ inner walls.

Shit. Is there a door down there? It's dark...

"Might be a twisted ankle, might be a sprain - might be a fracture -" Rochelle sounded nearly furious, voice just below a shout. "Why didn't you let the guy with the goddamn workboots kick it in?!"

Rhiannon responded in a yell, husky voice nearly breaking in the middle, and she sounded as angry as she was mortified. "I was trying to fucking help!"

Instead of listening, Ellis turned, rushing to the window. He pressed his cheek against the glass, trying to peek to either side. The stairs continued upwards to the right and out of his vision, and downwards to the left. It leveled out to a platform, stretching on along the outside of the mall’s exterior.

He was vaguely aware of a presence staggering up behind him, a hand touching his back. Rochelle growled, frustration tugging her voice into roughness. "Where's the door? There's just this window!"

The mechanic blinked, and vague apprehension fluttered over Ellis' face, right before his jaw tightened with certainty.

A feeling came to him he'd not fully felt until that moment: complete desperation. They'd talked about rescue so many times, but it had never been so close. He'd never been so close to it before.

The Vannah had been abandoned to burn long before they got there. They'd never seen any sign of actual, living military forces, and the people they'd met along the way had been sometimes friendly, sometimes dangerous, sometimes both - but none of them had brought the group closer to rescue. Not like this.

And, despite everything, he still believed in rescue. The map terrified him; their whole situation terrified him... but he still believed, deep down, they'd end up safe in some military camp. They'd find their way out. They'd win. We can't give up.

I can't give up.
He lifted his shotgun, turning it in his hands and striking out with the wooden end to bust the window. It impacted right in the center of the tinted glass and punched a fist-sized hole in the glass.

Ellis ignored Rochelle's startled yelp, turning his wrists swiftly to wriggle his shotgun. The glass, spiderwebbed in concentric shapes, didn't shatter as easily as he expected. He had to get leverage, pushing his gun like a crowbar with it half-extended through the hole he'd made, the torque applying force to both sides.

When it cracked, splitting lines in every direction, he yanked his gun free again. A few more strikes knocked most of the glass out, scattering it on the ground around his feet and sending it glittering out into the sunlight. With the window cleared mostly out, he shrugged his shotgun strap on to free both his hands.

Gripping his right jacket sleeve to pull it taut up into his fist, Ellis swiped over the bottom edge of the window frame with his forearm, trying to brush off as much of the glass as possible. A sliver found its way through the denim, stabbing pain into his skin, but he ignored it. "We ain't got time." he huffed, mostly to himself.

Ellis reached out, grabbing the rail of the fire escape where it was bolted to the exterior of the building at hip-height outside. He gave it the smallest shake, just to make sure it was sturdy. When it didn't so much as jostle, he scrambled to get his right foot balanced on the bottom of the windowsill.

With a heave, he ducked through the broken window. The fire escape was so close to the exterior, it wasn't hard to take the step over the railing and land with a clattered thud on the metal staircase.

The moment he'd gotten his footing, he stretched out his hand back through the window, reaching out for Rochelle. Her eyes darted to it, then up at him - then to the biker leaning heavily into her. Rhiannon's grimace was only faintly disguised as a scowl, and the blonde tried to pull her arm back from around the other woman's shoulders and stand on her own. "I got it, go with him!"

However, Rochelle kept a tight grip on her wrist, keeping the blonde pulled against her body in a bracing slouch. The now-injured woman would need help through the window, she'd slow them down... and leaving her behind wasn't an option. She shook her head and shouted through the window. "Ellis, go! Start trying to flag them down! We'll be right after you!"

He hesitated. His eyes lifted, but the staccato whuff-whuf-whuff-whuff was coming from too far over the mall, too far to get his eyes on the helicopter itself. Was it hovering? It had come upon them extremely quickly, so why hadn't it passed them already?

"Shit!" he burst out, frustrated, turning to scramble up the fire escape. His boots slammed against the metal with each step, gripping the railing to shove himself forward.

Breaching the top of the fire escape lead him onto a flat roof space, extending along the shape of the corridor they'd run down and edging the building in direction. The middle of the mall's roof was nothing but tinted glass, the panes set into a raised platform that separated it from the rest of the stone roof.

There were utility structures - vents, pumps, and electric boxes - scattered along the roof. It was devoid of infected, though Ellis didn't even think to check. He stared, lips parting, at the squat shape hovering in the air on the other side of the mall.
A pale blue military helicopter drifted over the mall's front pavilion, sleepily rocking back and forth. Four blades rotated above it, so fast he almost couldn't pick them out from the silvery circular pattern they formed as they spun. It was larger than he expected.

On its tail in bold lettering was printed out, 'NAVY.'

He couldn't tell how far it was from him, how high it was from the ground - though it was far, and it was high. Scope and context escaped him, shocked into freezing at the sight of it.

Its stubby nose had five paneled windows, and on its flank was two small hatch openings. Sticking out of the one closer to the helicopter's tail was the rounded shape of a minigun's nose, slumped and unmanned.

"H-" he ghosted, before forcing his voice into a shout. "Hey! Hey, we're here! Over here!" He started running, throwing his arms up to start waving both. When that felt inadequate, he scrambled to shrug his jacket off, stumbling with the effort. "Please!"

Terror flooded him. If he couldn't get its attention, he wouldn't just be letting himself down. He would let his entire team down. He would let Nick down.

Gripping his jacket with one hand, Ellis started waving it over his head, skidding to a halt just before the glass ceiling that separated him from the other half of the mall. "C'mon! We need help! Please!" He flailed his arms, jumping in attempts to make himself as big and noticeable as possible.

His heart threatened to stop in his chest when the chopper shifted.

It lowered, suddenly, maintaining its parallel orientation to the mall. It didn't move in any direction as it dropped vertically down, and his movements slowed. If they continued, they'd land in the paved square in front of the mall.

Relief flooded him. He didn't know if they'd seen him, or if they'd been planning to land regardless, but he didn't care. They were going to land, and suddenly the need to reach the roof was replaced with a desperate need to reach the pavilion.

He started to turn on his heel and bolt, peripheral vision catching Rochelle running up the fire escape with Rhiannon staggering close behind. He shouted, "They're landin'! We gotta get outside, quick!"

Then the helicopter wobbled.

The motion caught his eye, making him stop. It canted hard to one side, then the other, as if someone had yanked on the controls and then tried to counteract the motion. It rotated sharply as it did, rolling a little in a wild buck.

Amongst all that movement, none of it was as severe as the drop in altitude. It plummeted as the blades gave a stutter and slowed.

Ellis stopped, turning, eyes widening as the chopper continued to spin, and its nose suddenly pitched downward as it swung forward. 'Forward,' however, changed as it spun, and the helicopter cut a path directly over the mall. Ellis watched dumbly as it flew closer, flight smoothing out as it accelerated, but the loss of altitude had already taken its toll.

Ellis heard his own voice whispering, "No. No, no, no -"

As the machine crested the front edge of the mall, missing it by inches, it swerved forward and did not clear the raised edge of the glass paneling down the center of the building. The front left wheel knocked into the stone and mortar, momentum taking a massive hunk of stone from it.

The blow knocked the helicopter into another wobble, this one pitching the nose further down.

Again, with a jerk like some over-correction, the helicopter's blades roared higher, and the nose yanked upwards. Ellis couldn't get his muscles to move, standing there as the cocked tail rotor dipped down, slamming into the glass roof. The spinning blades broke, warped, and a stripe of glass was shattered where the tail dipped down through it.

As much glass flung upwards as fell down and into the mall's interior, shards scattering up, and the helicopter's control instantly wavered. Without the tail rotor, it started to spin, wheedling over the roof.

Air started to buffet around Ellis' form as the helicopter's downwash struck the roof of the mall and whipped around him. He stared up at it, only distantly recognizing the fact it was swerving dangerously low, and dangerously toward him.

"No!" he shouted, though he couldn't hear it over the rumble of the blades, now with a vague screech as the engine struggled. "Stop, please!"

Something struck him, and in a blink, he was sprawled on the ground. Rochelle's body curled against him, covering him, and they lay tightly together as the helicopter's downwash wind reached a fever pitch, grabbing and clawing as them - then pulled away.

As the roar lessened, the helicopter driving past them, Ellis lifted his head and craned it to look behind him. He watched, trembling, as the chopper wavered before straightening out.

Rather than stop, it accelerated.

Ellis couldn't do anything but yell as it tilted and wobbled in its flight away from them. "No! No, you can't leave! Come back!" He shouted like they could hear him, shouted because there was nothing else to do.

He tried to get his footing and scramble upright, but Rochelle snatched arms around his waist to keep him down. "Ellis! Honey, sweetie, stop!" she shouted against his ear. He started to fight, but he didn't want to hurt her.

They both watched the helicopter fly off, drooping left and then right and back. From the height of the roof, they could see a fair distance across Tybee.

Past the gridlike roads surrounding the mall, full of square adobe buildings and tall pastel condos, the city faded into scrublands covered with squat swamp trees. The sandy ground curved low, and far in the distance, faltered entirely at the edge of a river.

Ellis could just pick out the shape of a bridge, and yet more city beyond it. It was past the bridge, beyond the trees and roofs of the deeper city subsection, that the helicopter finally dipped out of sight.

He didn't see it crash - but, as silence settled between him and Rochelle, and as Rhiannon staggered back up the fire escape with her hobbled foot nursed in small steps, wisps of grey smoke started to creep up against an otherwise clear, blue sky.

Rochelle's grip tightened around him.
"Ellis." she whispered.

He didn't respond.

It was gone.

"Ellis. It's okay. We're going to be okay."

He hadn't realized he'd started crying. It wasn't some all-encompassing feeling of misery, it didn't even affect his breathing. It was shock, quiet and subtle and exhausting. He might've stared after the helicopter forever had she not gripped her hand on his jaw, pulling his face into her sternum and wrapping her arms around his shoulders.

He closed his eyes, sinking into her grasp, body going completely limp. "I - I tried tuh - I think they saw us, 'n' - they were gonna land. They were gonna land, Ro', 'n' - I dunno whut - I dunno whut happened, 'n' -"

Rochelle's arms tightened, Her voice was blistered, trembling. "It's okay. It's okay, sweetie. It wasn't your fault. We'll figure it out."

With a weak laugh, Rhiannon gripped the railing of the fire escape where she stood at the very top, dropping to sit and let her injured leg flatten out. "Fuck this fucking shit." she muttered, pushing her fist into the space between her eyes. "I keep waiting for it to get fucking better."

Ellis slowly slipped his arms around Rochelle, returning the embrace dully - then, suddenly, crushingly tight.

"We gotta get back." he choked out, and when Rochelle nodded they stood, using each other to keep upright when shock turned their joints into jelly.

Now, with the soundscape devoid of the roar of the helicopter, all he could hear was infected screaming from all around them, like a horde had encircled the mall. It grew, expanded, multiplied. The helicopter had drawn plenty of attention, and they had left their teammates behind.

The hollow sensation in his chest solidified into fear.
Chapter 246

It was abrupt, and without warning.

Nick had slowly stirred himself to dress, thoughts in a cycle of abuse he couldn't break. Fucking stupid. I don't know which one of us is the bigger idiot here. Why's it so fucking easy to hurt him? And why's it so hard to stay away?

He didn't want to hurt Ellis. The kid was right about one thing: all of Nick's energy had gone to protecting him. He wanted Ellis to be happy, to live long enough to find someone who could match his zest for life, his goodness, his kind nature.

Nick did not fit that bill.

If they made it out alive, Ellis didn't deserve to be saddled with an angry, sad excuse of a man, more than ten years his senior. Why can't you just find some cute little Southern belle and get married and forget all about me?

Then, it happened. One moment, Nick was buttoning up his shirt, fingers trembling so badly he kept missing the holes - and the next, he was on the ground.

There was no fanfare to it. He didn't feel the collision of his body with the ground, or even clearly remember the fall. There was a few seconds where he stared at the wall of the dressing room from his sideways position, confused, awareness mouthing numbly at the realization that he'd collapsed.

Then his skull split open.

The pain started behind his eyes, like a spike had been driven up into the back of his neck and through his brain. His spine drew straight, then curled, clawing into his forehead as if he could dig out the source of the agony.

It was sharp, and it was hot. It was worse pain than he'd ever felt; the worst pain he could conceive of. Every nerve in his body was on fire, surging nausea through him like his system could summon no other response than a purge. It was too much.

He tried to yell, for help or simply out of pain, but his throat was constricted and nothing escaped him beyond a whine.

Struggling past the stiffness of his limbs, feeling his teeth sink into the meat of his tongue, he forced his hands away from his face. His eyes flashed open - or only one. His vision blurred, half darkness. Was only one working?

Even limited sight was enough to see his fingers where they remained half-clenched. They were stained red with blood, nails dark with gore. He'd clawed his own skin apart, he realized. Or, perhaps, the pain had been his skull bursting open on its own.

I'm going to die. occurred to him, a simple, calm epiphany.

He expected fear, but all he felt was blistering, overwhelming pain. It was simple. Animal. He curled up against the carpet like a flinching insect, devoid of any higher thinking beyond: I'm going to die here.

Then it was gone.
It vanished so suddenly that it felt like a dream, blending it all into an overwhelming sense of dread and unease. It was like blinking awake from a nightmare, remembering little more than the bitter taste of fear. He knew something had happened, but details faded faster than he could grab at them.

It all faded.

Nick's vision dimmed, and then came into brilliant focus. A blinding light seared across his eyes, and when he squinted against it, it shifted away. As it diffused, the dressing room fell back into place around him.

He wasn't flat on the ground. He was seated up against the wall.

What... happened?

He didn't remember moving, like he didn't remember falling. He didn't remember how long it had been. There was just a numb, distant gap, separating him from the knowledge. Like he'd blinked, and the space around him had shifted into a different configuration before he'd reopened his eyes.

The pain dissipated, evaporated, and only a scrap of a memory made him look down. His hands were clean, relatively. But why did he think they wouldn't be?

Fear came in a wash, but it was scattered and confused. He clenched and unclenched his fingers, watching them move, trying to scan back through his memories and make sense of things. Ellis and I fought, he left, I - what was I doing? What happened? Did I... -

He remembered pain, and he remembered being terrified, but little else. I must have passed out.

Jesus. Did I hit my head or something? What the fuck is wrong with me?

Fingers snapped in front of his nose, and the sharp sound broke through what had been deafening silence plugging his ears. He startled, chin lifting, and the intense silence in his skull was replaced with a rushing vibration that seemed to come from everywhere. It clung to him, rattled him.

Chris' eyes sparked bright in the scattered light from the flashlight set on the ground beside him, and he reached out, palm setting on Nick's shoulder. He spoke, but not a word of it made sense. It was just noise and air.

Maybe he was speaking Spanish, or maybe Nick had forgotten how to comprehend words entirely.

Nick let his gaze drift, forcefully, air drug in through his nostrils. He felt a full-body ache creeping through him, and his eyes were sore, like he'd been staring into a fan on full blast and dried them out. Fainting was the only thing that made sense, though he didn't have a lot of experience with it.

It felt more like waking up after a bender. That, he had experience in.

Then again, he did remember feeling unwell. He'd been feverish and dizzy, composure fracturing, especially when Ellis pressed him. It had started shortly after discovering the map - but didn't that point toward stress? Stress doesn't usually... whatever the fuck this is. Jesus.

A sliver of a moment in time came back to him, crystal clear, and his body jolted.

"Blood." he muttered. "I was - bleeding -"

He wasn't completely sure he was speaking coherent words at first, but he must've been. Christophe immediately started to paw his hand around his waistline and then against his legs, forcing him to shift enough to get a good look over the gambler's body. "Nico, I see nothing."
That, at least, processed in his mind. Nick's jaw slackened, but he didn't respond. He let his eyes close, trying to slow his breathing. It's fine. Everything's fine. I'm just losing my fucking mind.

"You scare me, amigo." The Spaniard's hand was still on his side, fingertips pressing into his waist through his shirt. He wished it didn't soothe him a little, and that he didn't notice acutely when the hand lifted away. The man muttered, low, "Por un segundo, pensé que estabas muerto. Jesucristo."

Suddenly, a swift strike of pain made Nick's eyes fly open, head abruptly twisted to the side. It took him a solid couple seconds to piece together the stinging on his cheek with the fact Chris' hand was extended out, fingers splayed and flat.

Nick let his eyes flutter open and shut, blinking away the stars in his vision.

The realization that he'd been slapped came with a heavy dose of fury. He had every intention of acting on it, but when he made to lunge forward and grab the Spaniard by the shirt collar, his body had different ideas. His muscles protested with a painful creak, and none of his limbs acted how he willed them to.

He just slumped forward, almost dead weight, and Chris grunted as he caught the gambler against his shoulder. Pain fluctuated in his voice when it was his stumped side, but he held firm and wrapped his arm around Nick's torso all the same, supporting the other man.

"Nico, Nico, por favor. We have to go, ¿sí? You hear that? El helicóptero."

Teeth gritted, Nick reluctantly lifted his gaze, blearily looking toward the ceiling. The humming all around them came into better focus, and his eyes widened as he realized it wasn't just his imagination or the fallout from his collapse.

A fucking helicopter? When...?

The Spaniard gripped fingers in the back of his shirt and tried to stand, but between the man's weakness and Nick's own lack of coordination, it was not easy. "We go now, ¿vale? Rápido. Acompañarme, Nico." He spoke simply, as if to a child.

It wasn't ineffective.

"When - I don't - how fucking long was I out?" Nick spat, scrabbling one hand back onto the wall to try and support himself when Chris momentarily released him to grab the flashlight from the ground and grip it with his teeth, jaw stretched to account for the girth.

"Fucking helicopter...?" Nick muttered; babbled. His tongue felt heavy, moving sluggishly with too much saliva pooling in his mouth. It ached, too, stirring up the memory that he'd bitten it. "When the fuck - where's Ellis? Where's everyone?"

His whole body felt heavy, in fact, and the very first step they took proved monumentally difficult. The desire to reject Chris' help was overridden by his need for it.

"Va'os, Nico." the ex-Angel managed past the flashlight held in his mouth, and his voice hit a comforting, nonsense tone. "Hablare'os de'pués." The bulk of his attention was focused solely on walking, and the sweat on his brow indicated it was no small task for either of them.

Nick might've pressed - but getting upright and into motion sent nausea rippling through him again, and he kept his lips sealed for fear of vomiting.

What the fuck just happened?
Coach believed in the push and pull of a wide array of forces in everyday life. He did not, for instance, believe God had an active hand in what happened around him. He did, however, believe in fate and karmic pressure. He believed in destiny.

Good things didn't always happen to God-fearing men and women - but through perseverance, they'd always find some reward, somehow. We just too deep in the tunnel to see our way back, an' too far from the end to see the light. Gotta keep goin'. Keep movin'. Keep fightin'. And whether or not he believed there was a deity actively looking down on him and hearing his prayers, it was comforting to think someone had a design.

Someone smarter than he, hopefully.

Maybe God was cruel, or absent, or simply apathetic. He'd never claim to know which it was - though cruel was seeming more and more likely every day - but he did know bowing his head and clasping his hands wouldn't do any good. He hadn't gotten on his knees and prayed in a long time, and had no intention of starting now.

He had to do something.

Whoever knows the right thing to do and fails to do it, sins. So what happens when I don't know the right thing?

The helicopter roared overhead, continuing unabated in the long moments following Rochelle, Ellis, and Rhiannon rushing out further into the mall. Separating the team in such a way wasn't a great plan, but the appearance of a helicopter had caught them completely unprepared.

They couldn't let the opportunity slip past, even if that meant stretching themselves thin. Necessary evil. Or, we gone an' messed up real bad.

The noise would undoubtedly bring some infected attention, but whoever it was that was equipped and experienced enough to fly a chopper around would hopefully be able to help them repel it. That, though, was assuming they would be willing.

Chris an' Lena ain't in great shape, but they ain't nothin'. He sighed, pressing fingertips into the dents stress had written into his forehead. And at least I got -

Not even the thunderous noise surrounding them like an oncoming tornado could quite dull his senses enough not to notice the flurry of motion behind him. He spun on his heel, looking away from the half-open security screen to instead face the survivors behind him.

Chris had suddenly returned, staggering from the dressing room hallway. He had the flashlight in his mouth, teeth clamped on the slim plastic frame, freeing his arm to support Nick where the man was slung against his side like a drunkard.

He was conscious enough to walk, clearly, but Coach had never seen him so pale. He looked ghostly, and the small glimpse of his face Coach could manage revealed a vague and distant confusion darting the Northerner's eyes around.

"Nick?!" Coach shouted, crossing the distance between them in broad strides. Chris seemed close to faltering, body trembling with the effort it took to keep both him and Nick standing. The very first thing Coach did was grab onto the gambler's arm and Chris' waist to steady both men. "The
With his hand free to release its death grip in Nick's shirt, Christophe took the flashlight from his mouth, gripping it in his hand and directing it to the ground. "No sé." he muttered, so quiet Coach had to lean in to hear him. His dark skin was flushed, and uncertainty quivered at his lower lip. "He did not hear me, al principio, como... I do not think he is -"

With a grunt, Coach pulled away and shifted his grip. He grasped both of Nick's biceps, holding the man up and forcing their gazes to meet fully. He lowered his tone to a serious rumble, flat and arresting. "They ran to go flag down a chopper goin' over us. We need to go after 'em. So I need you on yo' toes, Nicolas, 'cause I can't cover all y'all. You gotta tighten up right now."

Nick's lips curled downward, genuine frustration flaring to life. The cloud of agitation that so often disguised his internal thoughts came down over his expression, slow and detached. Coach anticipated a fight, readied for it, so he was blind-sided when Nick muttered softly back, "I'm - yeah. Okay."

He took a second, slower look over his teammate. The man had changed into dark colours, and if he hadn't been sheathed in sweat and sporting a thickening and messy scruff, might've looked outright handsome. It suited him, though seeing the man in jeans was jarring.

Then Coach glanced down and saw grey sneakers in place of his dress shoes, and if their situation had been less dire, he'd have laughed.

Instead, he pulled one hand back and gripped the side of Nick's head, fingers mostly lost in the whorls of his hair. It was a steadying gesture, like the huddle right before the big play, but it also gave Coach the opportunity to feel his temperature against the flat of his palm. He was on fire.

"Shit. Shit, shit, shit. He ain't right at all. The hell happened?"

The Northerner's attention flashed into surprise at the touch, frozen there.
"We gonna talk about this later." the eldest survivor stated, and a bitter acknowledgement sparked in Nick's green eyes. "But right now, I need you."

Then Coach let him go entirely, watching as Nick stood on his own with unconvincing rigidity. He fist his hands at his sides and winced, then tilted his chin up to look at the eldest survivor with a little more clarity than before. Forced, maybe, but better than nothing.

"Aww." he quipped back, and Coach almost smiled.

From a few feet away, voice raised over the noise, Lena spoke. "Rochelle said to stay - but this is kind of a death trap." She'd thrown her brush-hook back into its holster over her back and had Chris' machete in her hand, gripped tightly, nerves betrayed in the way it waivered back and forth. "Zombies are gonna surround us with all this noise."

"Agreed." Coach turned, crossing back to the front entrance. He picked up his double-barrel shotgun and their small handgun, shouldering the former. "Best chance we got is together - an' if they do get this helicopter to land, we gotta get on it, quick. They ain't likely to wait."

He slipped the handgun into the pocket of his red windbreaker, freeing his hands to pick up Nick's katana from where it leaned against the wall, tip to the carpet. He turned to face the three of his teammates that remained, expression grim and focused.

"We -"

Then the mall's glass roof exploded inward.

He yelled, instinct darting him into a stumbled duck, even though their place inside the store and up on the balcony had them sheltered from the blast. Coach wheeled around despite all logic telling him not to, rushing toward the security gate and thrusting his head underneath it.

He watched the rain of glass down into the mall atrium, and with the roof broken inward, the helicopter's blades chopping through the air echoed with renewed vigor - right before it faded away. A sinking sensation clung at his chest, unable to move from where he stood. Disappointment surged a sickly sensation up his skin, winded lungs aching.

The helicopter was leaving.

He set the thought harshly down, abandoning it along with the part of him that had sincerely thought they might be saved. He allowed himself only a few seconds to mourn it, before leaving it to rust. He had to worry about his team, now, and there was no time to grieve.

It was easier than he expected, in fact, as he was quickly distracted.

Lena hadn't been wrong. Infected had, in fact, been drawn to the noises, and now that the helicopter's noises were fading away it became easier to hear the rising screams echoing up from the lower level of the mall. Whatever had broken through the roof had also sent a fresh shockwave of rage throughout the horde.

Coach could hear the clatter of metal as innumerable footsteps came up the frozen escalators, the horde drawn to their presence, or perhaps simply driven to search the building for life. His eyes caught on a flicker of movement at the waist-high wall that edged the second-floor balcony.

A set of clawed hands wrapped up on the top edge of the balcony rail, gripping tight as the creature craned its head up over the top. Bared teeth and glinting eyes centered in the face of a Hunter, and they shared a blink right before it lurched to get itself up and over the wall.
The ex-football player had only a few seconds to react, and he did the only thing he could think of: he stepped backwards and kicked out the framed signpost that was keeping the security gate open. It clattered to the ground and skidded inside the store, and with it gone, the metal security gate slammed closed.

Then a shape struck the very center of it from the outside, and the loud, strangely human yelp announced the Hunter's collision with the gate.

"Hell." he muttered, overcome with a bleary sort of dismay, backing up slowly from the door. "Hell and damnation."

As the horde grew loud around them, the security gate came under a battery. Blows struck it in increasing numbers, though the screams and footsteps sprinting past indicated not all of the infected stopped at their door.

"Frick." Lena echoed, and Coach darted a glance to see her staggering toward the store counter. She circled around it, almost throwing herself at the slim door set into the wall behind the counter. "Did anyone try this door?" she shouted, even as she twisted the handle, to no effect.

"It was locked." Nick muttered. He moved at a stiff walk, like all his energy went to maintaining his balance, approaching the counter after her with little sense of urgency. It was less apathy toward their situation, and seemed more a genuine disconnect with his surroundings. "Breakroom or some shit."

"Quizás haya algo aquí." he muttered, almost soothingly. "Em - maybe there is... more? In there?"

Chris followed in his wake, fretting close at his heels. Nick didn't even fight him off, and that was the most worrying part. "We ain't goin' out the front, an' I don't see another way. So better hope."

Coach strode across the store, and as he passed Nick by, he rested one hand on the man's lower back and pressed his katana into his grip with the other. He said nothing, merely nodding when Nick obediently took the blade in hand.

Nick held it like he could barely remember which end was up. Concern flooded Coach like an ache, and he couldn't pretend, couldn't even begin to fight the warm and tender paternal inclination in his chest. He wanted to get the man to safety, get him fed, let him sleep, but the apocalypse had different ideas.

It always did.

"A'ight, Sam. 'Bout time you held him up. 'Bout time you did right by him - right by all of' em. They need you right now, so you better buck up."

With his freed hands, Coach dragged his double-barrel shotgun down off his shoulder, bracing it by his hip. He circled the counter, grabbing their backpack off the surface as he moved, approaching the back door with his shotgun wielded. Lena took one look over her shoulder at him and slid back, getting well out of his way.

Gritting his jaw, Coach placed the nose of the gun right between the lock and the doorframe. He turned his face away before pulling one of the triggers, and the blast made him stagger back, a few wooden shards flying free.
One took root in his wrist with a twang of pain and a trickle of blood, but he ignored it, blinking up as the door swung messily open. The metal mechanism holding it shut was still intact, but the wood around it was not. With nothing to hold it together, it had lost its mooring into the threshold.

He nudged it entirely open with his shotgun, advancing a quick step, alert for motion that he did not find.

Beyond it was a small staffroom, with a table and a few chairs as well as a few heavy-duty shelves, and further beyond it was a slim door leading further on. As Chris pushed close to him, directing the flashlight into the room, he could read a small sign beside the door, lettering stamped on it: MAINT. HALL. He didn't know where it led, but it had to lead somewhere.

"Keep close, folks. We ain't got long." Coach barked, and the sound of the security gate creaking inward another inch concurred with him.
"No, no, no! You fucker -"

Ellis winced as Rhiannon's elbow cracked into his temple. It was an accident, judging by the way she stiffened afterward, though that didn't make it hurt less.

He pushed to his feet, straightening, with her carried in his arms. His left arm was tucked under her knees and his right arm was cradling her back.

He hadn't given her the chance to protest, and now that he'd picked her up, she didn't have much choice but to wrap an arm around his neck and hold on. Her baseball bat was tucked tight against her chest by her free hand, her legs curled in to make her tall frame as compact as possible.

"I gotta at least get you inside." he grunted, starting to descend the steps of the fire escape that led back down from the roof. Rochelle was right behind him, expression grim but focused. Her stun baton dangled from the wrist strap that was around her forearm, and Ellis' shotgun was in her hands. "Okay?"

Rhiannon's nails dug into the back of his neck, a faintly painful gesture. "Asshole." she bolted out, smothered into her bicep. When he darted a glance at her face where she huddled into his shoulder, he couldn't miss the embarrassed flush on her cheeks. "Fine."

A softness smoothed out Ellis' brows, focusing down on his footsteps as the fire escape rattled gently beneath them.

The first time he'd met the woman in his arms, she'd been holding them at gunpoint. Now, she'd injured herself in a selfless rush to get them to a rescue she didn't even want. To get them something that meant nothing to her.

His arms tightened against her, guilt striking a dissonant chord in his chest, forcing up the cluttered misery he was trying to keep a stopper on. She was injured, and it had been all for nothing. He'd let the helicopter get away when they'd been so close to rescue.

So close; he should have done something, anything. Instead he'd just watched as the helicopter crashed. He had been their only shot at rescue, and he'd failed. Something in him couldn't help but turn bitter, agitated, musing dully: Nick would be hollerin', he'd be so pissed at me.

But that didn't seem right.

If Ellis really thought about it - and he couldn't help but think about it - he'd tuck a hand on Ellis' cheek and pull him close. His jaw would grit, tone gone wry, leaning into him with some poorly restrained urge for further contact. It resounded in his ears like Nick was right there.

"Shit happens, kid. Nothing you could have done."

He would have done anything to hear that, just then, but he'd find no such comfort... assuming Nick was still alright. God, I hope he's alright. I hope they're all alright. If we split up fer nothin' and they get hurt, I...

"Ellis!" Rochelle shouted, and he jerked his head to look back at her, yanked free of whatever grip that line of thinking had on him.
"Later." jolted him into focus, and he only barely acknowledged that it, too, was Nick's voice.

She was pointing downwards, and when he looked, his eyes caught on where the fire escape coiled down and underneath them. The stairs they stood on flattened out into a platform, eventually meeting with a set of stairs that curled off the building and then led down onto a second platform below their feet.

The termination of that platform opened with a ladder extended down, closing the distance with the ground, and that was what Rochelle was gesturing to. "If the front's overrun..."

Ellis’ gaze flicked back up, and caught on the shape of a door at the far end of the top level of the fire escape. It was all the way at the other side of the fire escape’s upper platform, though, and even further from their teammates. Who knew how many additional infected would complicate the way back?

The Georgian grunted, dismissing the thought and re-focusing. Whether or not the fire escape was a good route out of the mall was irrelevant when they had a team to reunite with. If they had to run right into the horde, they’d do so. "We gotta find 'em first!"

Rochelle uttered a nervous affirmation, and Ellis understood her anxiety. Nick had been unstable before he'd left, and their argument had likely worsened it. How well could he, Lena, Chris, and Coach defend themselves against a horde? How well could Coach pick up the slack?

_Why'd we think this was a good idea? Dammit!_

Carrying Rhiannon in his arms only slowed him slightly as he charged back to the broken window they'd climbed through. His intent was to lift her up into the frame and help her through it. As he came close, however, the screaming that echoed around in the air came into sharp focus as it drifted out of the open hole. It sounded terribly close.

Blinking, he jerked to flatten himself against the railing of the fire escape. Rhiannon jolted in his arms, drawing herself into a tighter curl out of reflex. Noting her warning grimace, a silent urge for caution, he carefully craned his neck to peek in through the busted-out window.

His gaze landed on a huge shape, grey skin rough and peeling over the enlarged curve of a Charger's shoulder. It was _searching_, and he had to wonder if it smelled them, or smelled their earlier passage. It huffed out a few raspy breaths as it surveyed the room they'd climbed out of.

For a moment, he thought it didn't see him.

Then its flat yellow eyes blinked up at him from the deep ridges of a skeletal face, skin taut over its cheekbones like stretched leather. The Charger didn't even roar as all its weight suddenly pulled into motion, inhuman momentum carrying it into a sprint right in their direction.

"Fuckin' shit!" Rhiannon yelped. She might've leapt out of his arms had he had a less firm grip on her.

As it was, Ellis couldn't stop himself from protectively drawing Rhiannon close and jerking back a step up the stairs, even though a dense brick wall separated them from the creature. The animal instinct to flee took over.

The Charger slammed into the wall's other side with a tremendous thud that made him recoil even further. When he looked back at the window, there were a few hairline fractures in the framing of it. The infected wouldn't break through the brick, he was sure, but the sight of the damage was enough to flood him with unease.
It gave a choked-out growl, breathy, warbled as it shook itself. Ellis watched with a rising tension as a pawlike, blistered hand suddenly grabbed ahold of the windowframe. Blunt fingers - mostly absorbed into the strange and calloused shape of its pawlike hand - tightened on the brick.

He had no idea if the creature could successfully cram itself through the window or not. Either way, he had no intention of finding out, and they weren't easily passing by it.

"Change'uh plans - this way!" he shouted before bolting, sparing a glance to ensure Rochelle was following him.

Sprinting down the fire escape platform was not quiet, his workboots thundering beneath him. As they ran past another squat window, a fist burst through the glass, clawing out at him, shards of the window jutting out from the flailing upper arm.

Nails caught in the sleeve of his denim jacket, but found no purchase. He continued running, pulling Rhiannon in tight against his chest. His lungs strained a little with the effort; she wasn't particularly heavy, but that didn't mean she weighed nothing.

"I'll get the door!" Rochelle shouted, voice raised over the din.

Ellis wordlessly shoved himself just past the doorway, spinning to brace his hip against the railing that cordoned off the end of the fire escape platform. He lowered Rhiannon carefully to the ground, letting her get her uninjured foot settled on the fire escape surface.

Rhiannon grabbed ahold of the railing behind them with one hand, catching her balance, and then handed her baseball bat to him. Her eyes were low, tone and expression strangled. "Here."

A shriek pulled Ellis' head up, and his eyes widened as the infected that had punched through the window now thrust its whole upper body through it. It screamed, clawing at the windowframe, kicking itself through the hole even as the effort shredded its belly against the glass.

Another set of hands scrabbled at the windowframe, and then another, and there were no signs of the flow stopping.

At the further window, the Charger had given up on fitting through, the only evidence of its attempts being the chunk taken out of the brick edging the frame. He was not comforted by the creature's disappearance, especially when it stood between them and their teammates.

The first infected slipped through the window, landing face-first onto the fire escape but quickly scrambling to its feet. Two more started to crawl through as the first got its bearings, fighting each other as much as they fought to advance.

Tossing the bat in his hands and catching it with a steadier grip, Ellis strode a few steps to stand between his teammates and the zombie threat. "I got 'em." he huffed, widening his stance to block the platform. "Check inside. We gotta move!"

The producer gritted her teeth, glancing uncertainly down at the shotgun in her hands. "Agh - fuck." She aimed carefully at the door, sliding to poise where she could quickly get a shot inside it as it opened. With a nod, she tightened her shoulders. "Okay, open her up."

Rhiannon flashed into a faint and winded grin. "Don't shoot me, tiger." she uttered, reaching out to grab ahold of the U-shaped door handle. She jiggled it first as if to check if it was locked, and it gave way a few centimeters with a heavy, resistant drag.

Then, after a short pause to glance and ensure Rochelle was readied, she drew it entirely open.
Smoothly mirroring her pace, Rochelle scanned into the mall's innards where light slanted in over her shoulder. The fire escape led to a branched hallway much like they'd been in earlier, this one at the very end of the building.

The hall was mostly empty, except for one infected that was running away from them. It was drawn around the corner and out of sight by a sharp, metal clattering that she could just pick out. She recognized the sound as that of battering on the security gates blocking off the stores.

If they were breaking into stores, the horde might've already broken into the clothing store they'd left the rest of their team inside. Panic drove her to dart a few steps forward, staggering into the hallway. "We need to go!" she shouted.

She didn't get far.

The same Charger swinging into view at the end of the hall pulsed a blank fear through her, dumb with adrenaline. She hadn't even locked eyes with the bleary yellow dots in its sunken sockets before it was in motion.

Jesus. It circled the balcony to come meet us?

Fight or flight battled in the back of her skull, trapped in the constraints of her lizard brain, and it landed squarely on fight.

She lifted the shotgun in her hands, barely registering her own intent before her finger was pulling the trigger. It was too far, and the scattering of the buckshot mostly missed it, though a few sparks of dust pocked up from its leading shoulder.

Her palm tightened against the forend of the shotgun, sliding it smoothly down the barrel, aware of the spent shell flying free off to her right with a puff of smoke. Reversing the slide chambered the next round, and a gurgled bark of pain followed the next pull of her trigger.

She saw blood, she was sure, pooling around the craggy flesh just at its neck. She'd hit something vital, but though its charge wavered, it did not stop.

Starting to pump a new round in place, Rochelle let her foot slide back, shifting her weight. Alarm started to override her instinct to hold her ground. Even if she killed it, momentum might carry it into her anyway.

As it turned out, the choice was stolen from her entirely: fingers snagged in the waistband of her sweatpants.

A yelp left her as she was pulled back, though she had sense enough to cooperate. An unsteady lurch had her colliding messily into Rhiannon, their arms swept around one another in a struggle for balance as they half-fell back out onto the fire escape. They landed in a thud against the railing running parallel with the fire exit door, nothing but slim metal beams between them and a long fall.

The Charger burst through the fire escape door, catching it as it had begun to fall closed and slamming it back open with a tremendous crash. The tall biker tightened fingers against Rochelle's waist and rolled them both off the railing.

They went down together, falling to the platform in the space between the door and where Ellis had made his stand. Rochelle landed first and hard into the metal grating, losing her grip on the shotgun. It mercifully clattered only a few inches away and did not slip through the gap between the platform and the mall's exterior.
Rhiannon flattened out on top of her, and both women huddled low as a scream of metal sounded out and the whole platform shuddered underneath them.

Jerking her head up from the ground, Rochelle blinked past the stars in her vision to watch as the Charger collided with the railing they'd been against mere seconds before. It tore a two-foot-wide section of railing free entirely, popping the joints with a grating, wrenched screech.

Unable to stop, it went over the edge and dropped out of sight.

The sound of the Charger's body hitting the concrete below was delayed and dense. It struck like stone on stone, crackling, and the strained bellow that had been leaking from it cut off instantly.

Rochelle breathed out, thinly, relief sending a cloud over her senses for a moment. The screaming din all around them fell to a buzz in her ears.

It was easy to become desensitized to near-death experiences when they were mostly commonplace, but the flush of euphoria never really lessened. She felt it, then, along with a steady chaser of adrenaline.

Then the softest of miseries; they weren't going to get rescued - not anytime soon. The knowledge settled in like cold ash, like the final gasp of embers fading. She'd genuinely believed in it, for a moment, but no longer. Rescue was an esoteric thing again, a dream, out of reach.

Strangely, the next thing she felt was defiance.

We're not going down, not like this. They can't break us.

As endorphins flooded energy all the way to her fingertips, she was only distantly aware of Rhiannon's similarly relieved laughter panting in her ear... and then much more aware of just how aligned their bodies. When the blonde lifted her head, pushing off the fire escape platform with her palms, they were nose to nose.

They shared a blink - right before Rhiannon grunted out, deadpan, "Wrong sister."

As much as Rochelle wanted desperately to laugh, cackle out in the giddy fluster of survival, there was no time. The sound of Ellis snarling and his borrowed bat impacting with flesh made her tip her head back.

She had enough time to look over and see Ellis mid-swing, bashing the end of the baseball bat into the chin of an infected and staggering it back into the zombie behind it. He darted a wide-eyed look over his shoulder, mostly at the open gap in the railing.

Though the slim nature of the fire escape was forcing the infected into a single-file line that bought them some time, he couldn't keep the stream of zombies back forever, nor could he stop to help them up.

"Jesus." he huffed, lowering his arms slightly, catching his breath in the spare moments he'd earned himself. The infected were quick to scrabble at each other, fighting to advance past the infected whose jaw he'd broken. "You guys okay?!"

Rochelle squirmed her body, grabbing Rhiannon by the jacket to help her roll off. "Yeah, yeah -" As she came to her knees, she kept a grip on the blonde, both women getting unsteadily to their feet. "Thanks, hun." she murmured, breathless.

Rhiannon put a hand out to brace herself on the stone wall of the building, biting onto her tongue.
Her expression was pained as she staggered onto and then off her injured foot.

"Hate those fuckers." she barked back. "Let's go!"

Shuffling back a few steps, Ellis struck out again, knocking a zombie away with a blow to the chest. The bludgeoning collision doubled it over, and the infected behind it tackled into it, clotting the fire escape pathway. "Please!" he hollered in response. "Gettin' hairy here!"

They retreated as a unit, Rochelle grabbing the pump shotgun from the ground and getting it back in her hands.

Rhiannon planted a hand on her shoulder, using her like a crutch, stepping in time with a staggered limp on every other stride. They pushed through the doorway in a cluster, and Ellis yanked the fire escape door shut behind them.

The alarm wired to it was clearly without power, and the electronic lock that was connected to the pushbar on the inside was similarly non-functional. Their saving grace was a heavy handle located just at waist-height, helpfully labeled with arrows to indicate cranking it to the left or right.

Large stenciled letters announcing LOCK / UNLOCK was enough to make Ellis yank the lever, and the soft chunk of metal sliding into place preceded bodies slamming into the other side by a split-second. Rochelle didn't know if it would hold forever, but the door was definitely heavier than anything she'd seen them bash through before. It would take them some time.

"Shit." she muttered, grabbing at her temple, digging fingertips into her skin. "Shit, shit, shit."

The following few moments were far from peaceful as the three stood closely packed, Ellis breathing hard, just long enough to center themselves. Their plan had been slap-dash from the start, and it only looked more grim.

When they moved to advance back into the mall's interior, it was not with reckless abandon, but due caution.
Nick's vision fell in and out of a blur. He was forced to keep reminding himself that there were only three survivors around him, because every time he blinked, they doubled. His headache had faltered to a simple throbbing, at least, and his stomach had settled enough that he didn't taste bile.

Feel like death warmed over, instead of just death.

The reunion with his sense of humour was not a joyous one. He studied it at a distance, doubted it. It had betrayed him too many times in one day, and he forced it to quiet, trying to focus. That was not easy.

He found himself repeating the bare few facts he had over and over in his head. He'd collapsed. That much was undeniable, as much as he wanted to deny it. He'd also had an excruciating headache, before the collapse, or as a result of it - and he was sure he'd had some sort of hallucination.

The more he tried to remember what exactly happened, the fuzzier it got. He was left, still, with little but the impression of blood, and he kept glancing at his hands in the darkness. Sometimes the shadows caught his fingers just right, and the black could've been blood, and his pulse would come to a threatening patter in his chest.

It felt familiar - but Chris had assured him there was nothing, and his clean, new clothes affirmed the idea.

He felt like he'd locked himself into a washing machine: his body was sore, and his balance was still spinning in circles. He moved stiffly, because his knees threatened to buckle if he allowed them to take too much of his weight without being mostly straight.

You're just sick. he tried to assure himself, but that was hard to swallow. 'Sick' was a loaded term when they were surrounded by sick people turned rabid, turned monster. 'Sick' was a loaded term when they were all very sure the Green Flu sat in them, dormant.

He'd been sick before. He'd been violently ill, even. He'd laid on bathroom floors and mulled over whether he'd live to see the next day. He'd once let himself get sleep-deprived enough that the walls started to melt and he'd forgotten what day it was. He'd once gotten so drunk that his ex-wife had been forced to call an ambulance.

None of it felt like what had happened. He'd lost himself, lost time, lost memory. Chris had looked - and looked, even now - frightened, and that frightened him.

No, Nick, stop. You're just normal, human sick, and it just feels worse because everything feels fucking worse lately. If you were going to turn, why now? If you were going to turn, why wouldn't anyone else? Why would it just be you?

You're an unlucky son of a bitch, but why would it just be you?

He wasn't unaware of Chris practically breathing down his neck, he just didn't see a point to protesting. The man had seen everything; he knew more than Nick did, that was for sure, and wasn't going to be dissuaded from his concern. Fighting would only draw attention to it, anyway.

And, fuck, maybe I need a babysitter.
Maybe I need help.

It was scary to think, and scarier because he knew there was a kernel of truth to it.

Coach and Lena had dragged one of the heavy shelves over to hold shut and blockade the small breakroom door behind them. It would buy them some time... although if the maintenance hall led to a dead end, they were just barricading themselves inside.

His interest was dull and vague when he lifted his chin, watching Coach carefully open the door to the maintenance hall. It was pitch black beyond the threshold, facing straight into an opposing wall. The hallway opened in either direction, no light visible.

Coach held his hand up and over his shoulder, fingers splayed, and Chris immediately stepped around Nick to place the flashlight in his grip. Grunting out a noise of acknowledgement, Coach stepped out into the hall, head swiveling as he tried to determine where they needed to go.

The screaming around them moved, shifted, like the scattered horde was searching the mall's interior. It was losing strength now that the helicopter had moved away, but they must've still sensed - smelled? - the presence of uninfected bodies in the building, because they did not calm.

Behind them, a tremendous crash announced the failure of the security screen.

With a shout, Coach bolted through the door. Lena scrambled to follow him, and Nick might've stared dumbly after them had Chris not grabbed his arm and pulled him forward. He staggered to keep his footing, allowing the Spaniard to drag him out into the maintenance hall.

Nick darted a glance over his shoulder, watching as Coach slammed the door shut behind them. He held his knuckles against it for a moment, pausing, but there was nothing to lock it with. The crashing of metal against the tile flooring was muffled through the two doors separating them and the horde, but the thuds that quickly started up against the first door were much louder.

"We need to go, Coach." Lena urged, voice a hurried tremble. She lifted her arm to point down the left hallway, in the direction their teammates had run out on the mall's second floor. "They went right, so let's go that way. Maybe this leads into another store."

She was calm, Nick noticed, looking over what he could see of her face in the dark. The energy coming off her in waves was focused and rigid, but calm.

As she turned and started at a low trot down the hall, however, she moved like she'd leave them behind if they didn't keep up. Whatever pain lingered in her body was not visible in her posture. She swallowed it all down and grit her teeth and fought past it.

Nick couldn't remember how he used to do that. He'd forgotten the steps to that dance. He didn't feel focused and calm - he felt empty, shelled, just a husk. If there was anything sedate about him, it was more of a symptom than a choice.

The desire to stoke something like anger listed sleepily in his skull, but he couldn't pay attention long enough to manage. He was exhauste, like all his energy had gone into whatever his body had done in the dressing room.

Coach grunted out a frustrated noise, nodding before pushing off the door and following her. He put the flashlight up against his shoulder, holding it there to illuminate the hallway. He fumbled the handgun out of his windbreaker's wide pocket, flipping it to grasp it by the muzzle and hold the grip out behind him.
"Chris -" he barked, not even looking. Christophe immediately lunged forward to grab it, carefully arranging his hand on it before fully pulling it from Coach's grasp. "Son of a bitch. Right as she ran off, I was thinkin', why the hell didn't I throw her a radio? If I'd given her a damn radio, wouldn't be in this mess."

There was anger in his voice, raw and full of vitriol, more frantic than Nick was used to hearing from him.

"Got two damn radios, can't do shit-all wit' 'em if they're all with the same -"

Lena's voice cut in to interrupt him, and though it wasn't strictly angry, it was harsh enough to snap his eyes up. "Focus." It almost made Nick laugh to see the chagrined tension enter Coach's body, subtly cowed by the small woman. "It wouldn't have made a spit of difference. We'd still be separated, and we couldn't follow in their footsteps after the zombies got here. We'd be in the same crappy situation."

Distracted by the gun he now carefully wielded, Chris hurried his footsteps a little, catching up to walk flanking Coach. It put some distance between him and Nick, and he didn't look back. "They are okay, Samito. They are muy fuerte, ¿sí? No worry."

When Coach responded, strong shoulders slumped, he did not sound convinced. "Son, it ain't them I'm worried about."

Christophe looked at him with a helpless pant, some kind of disappointment twisting at his mouth, like he'd been chastised. His footsteps stuttered, but he kept moving. The worry that had caused him to flock close to Nick had shifted, reoriented to Coach, and he looked ahead into the hallway fearfully.

"Eso no inspira mucha confianza, cariño..." he muttered, faintly. His hand tightened on the pistol in his grip, flexing his finger on the trigger.

Screams had been all around them at varying volumes, but when they suddenly burst into a terrifying proximity and echoed down the hall from ahead, all three of the survivors in front of Nick jolted into tension. He watched sluggishly, aware that he should have been just as on-alert, but unable to convince himself to care.

Things played on before him, and he couldn't root himself in it, couldn't sink his teeth into the moment. Like I'm just... watching a movie. His footsteps slowed, distance increasing between him and the others.

He forced both his hands to grip his katana, looking down at it, breathing in hard through his nostrils. As much as the visceral pains and nausea had faded, the idea of fighting was still miles beyond him. He'd never have the reflexes or the strength to defend against an onslaught.

He was useless.

As the sound of glass shattering sounded distantly down the hallway and the screams heightened, his teammates began a flurry of motion. Coach snapped the flashlight onto the waistband of his light grey canvas slacks, freeing both his hands to grip his shotgun.

It turned the light spastic, the cone of light shifting as his body did, but there was no better option. He jolted to brace his shoulder against the right-hand wall, shouting out to his teammates, "Get ready, y'all! I'll thin 'em out but I'm gonna need y'all behind me!"

And they obeyed. Christophe bolted to mirror Coach's posture, pressing his stumped side against the left-hand wall instead, carefully aiming down the hall. Lena slipped between and behind them, clear of the angle of fire and prepared with the machete in her hand.

As the screams drew closer, bouncing around the constraints of the hall, Nick closed his eyes.

It'd have been easier if I'd just

He couldn't finish it, couldn't let himself finish it. He clawed into the thought and reeled it back in, breath halting in his chest at the weight of it crushing down on him. Fuck. Maybe it wasn't apathy, but disappointment. The strange emptiness in his chest was disappointment.

He should've heard the blast of Coach's shotgun, of Chris' handgun. It should've shaken him out of his fugue, captured his attention. He should've rushed forward and tried to help.

Instead, he stood there, frozen.

And then it tumbled free anyway, like he'd been trying to grip something made of gelatin, and the harder he grasped the more it escaped between his fingers.

Why hadn't he collapsed and died in the dressing room? Or Brenda's sword could have struck lower, through his heart. Or instead of splashing acid against his leg, that Spitter could've just spewed all down his back and burned right through him. Or - even simpler than any of that - he could've just clicked his seatbelt shut, speeding away in his Barchetta, and ended up crushed against the trunk of a tree along with his car.

Ellis would've driven past him, none the wiser. The kid wouldn't have stopped and checked on a crashed car among hundreds of crashed cars - and even if he had, he'd have found nothing but a bloodied corpse. He'd have looked on it, sadly, and then gotten back in his truck.

He'd never have had to meet me. And I'd never have had to meet him.

Why did that sound so good? Why did it comfort him? Why did he ache for it, just a little?

He relinquished one hand's grip on his katana, raising it to touch his brow, and his fingertips grazed skin so hot that he flinched, so hot that his hand recoiled on instinct. He stared at his fingertips where they hung in the air, only visible in the way their shadow contrasted against the light ahead of him.

Then:

"Nick."

It was soft. Too soft and far away, really, to fully process. It wasn't Coach, or Chris, or Lena; it came from behind him, not in front of him. It felt like the first thing to actually hook his attention, cutting through the fog. He jerked his chin up, twisting to turn around and face it but finding only darkness.

He stiffened, for just a moment, sure he'd imagined it. You hallucinated earlier. You're just hallucinating now. It's not real.

"Nick?"

It came again, but clearer. It was a man's voice, rasped, but pitched up with gentle misery. Tears risked at the edges of it, bloated with a confusion, a betrayal, a fear that he recognized. It can't be real.
He recognized that voice, and it sunk terror into him like he'd not felt since he was a kid, when nightmares seemed like things that could tear through the fabric of sleep and leak into his reality. His heart constricted, chest collapsing, and he stared into the dark. The motion and the sounds behind him may as well have been miles away.

Then something moved in the shadows, and he jerked a step back, holding his katana up in some fruitless effort to keep it at bay. He trembled, his arms trembled, and he didn't know what he thought he was defending against - except he knew exactly what it was, and it terrified him.

_It's not him. How could it be him? He's dead._ The shape closed in, approaching, but there was no light to illuminate it. It just loomed in his vision, black on black, a vacuum inside of a void. _You're losing it, Nick. You're fucking losing it. Keep it together._

His voice broke when he tried to speak, shaking as it forced its way from lungs that refused to function.

"Brett?"

The shape didn't answer, just came closer, and that raspy voice wrenched out the quietest sob. _That_ voice. The voice he hadn't heard in twenty years - that he knew he'd never hear again. Horror took any concept of fleeing from him. His thoughts stuck in a rut, on repeat, _It's not him. It can't be him._ _You know that. It doesn't raise the fucking dead. You know that._

Light suddenly started to coalesce around him, stretching languidly around his knees and filtering past him to illuminate the space. His eyes caught on legs, too slender and angular to be truly human.

Pale grey skin stretched taut over frail-looking bones, sunken under the shredded scraps of jeans that only just clung together. The light just reached its midsection, pale yellow scattering over a bare and distended belly, and then it blinked out, plunging him into darkness.

His heart surged in a cold and painful lurch.

Arms grabbed Nick from behind, circling around his upper body and trapping his arms against his sides. A hand closed over his mouth, sealing it shut, and suddenly he was spun around and pressed into the wall, hard.

The collision sparked pain through him, and he'd have audibly gasped had a palm not ground against his mouth to quiet him. He surged against it, fighting, but the figure leaning into him only pushed harder, flattening them both.

"Shh." a voice panted in his ear - Coach's.

Nick's right eye was closed where the side of his face was pushed into the wall, but his left strained to look out in vain into the darkness. The only sound was the wheedled rush of Coach's stifled breathing, hot in his ear, and the soft scrape of shuffled footsteps approaching ever closer.

Sense finally began to settle in as he choked air in through his nostrils. Something hot sparked over his scalp, settling in deep under his temples, like a migraine. He'd imagined it, like he'd imagined blood on his hands.

_I thought -_

The voice crying gently just beside them in the dark was too soft. Too young. Different. The Flu couldn't entirely scrape away the human edge to its voice, and it was not the voice he knew. It did not speak his name. It had not spoken his name. It was a grim relief that washed over him, tempered by the only conclusion to be drawn: he'd hallucinated, again.

The male Witch walked slowly down the hall, its soft weeping punctuated with little gasps of air, gentle hisses. It stumbled when it kicked into one of the corpses of the infected his teammates had mowed down, and a slurred yelp sounded out, footsteps stuttering and then halting.

Nick did not breathe, then, holding it as Coach did and squeezing his eyes shut. He leaned into where the man's broad chest crushed into his back, collapsing them further into the smallest shape they could manage.

With a moaned exhale, its footsteps started again.

They were the only sound around them for what felt like ages. They echoed, loud even as the creature passed on down the hallway - and then a scraping sound joined it, like claws against the wood, and the gentle creak of a door pushing open.

A sob, fainter.

Not a word was spoken. Slowly, glacially, Nick felt Coach moving against him.

When the flashlight clicked on again, the muzzle of it was pressed right against the wall, the light nothing but an orange glow illuminating through the plastic of its casing. Coach tentatively tipped it, allowing one side to lift and the light to scatter down the hallway.

Nick looked, and his eyes caught first on Lena and Chris, flattened on either wall. The Spaniard's face was bleached white and his jaw slack, body trembling. Lena's eyes were closed so tightly the edges of them crinkled, lips forming a few shapes over that he only belatedly recognized as please please please please.

Still, nobody uttered a sound.

Past the corpses filling the space, just before a turn in the hall, a dark shadow inlaid in the wall made up the doorway that the Witch had turned into.

Silently, Coach took a step back, freeing Nick to pull away from the wall. He placed a hand on the gambler's shoulder, tightly, his other hand turning the flashlight to press into his belly to muffle the light except for a dim glow just around them. With his shotgun strap slung over his shoulder, he started walking forward.

His fingers dug into Nick's shoulder so tightly it ached, and Nick had no choice but to follow in close parallel to him. From the dim light, he could see Coach wasn't looking at him, focused entirely on the doorway ahead. Would he have something to say, later? Were the fingertips crushing into his collarbone driven by fury?

He surrendered to it, because he had no defense.

You fucked up, Nick. You almost got them killed because you can't keep your shit together long enough not to see fucking ghosts. You almost fucking killed them.

He surrendered to it, because he didn't know if he had the will to walk otherwise.

As they passed their teammates, soft footsteps announced that they had joined them, and Nick felt a toe scuff his heel when they huddled too close. Breaths panted behind them as they all crept up the hall, stepping over and around corpses, approaching the cracked door left open behind the Witch’s exit.

They all held their breath, again, as passing by the door brought a sob back into clear focus - but the Witch didn't pay them any mind as they walked on, taking the turn in the hall.

Coach let the flashlight pull away from his stomach as they gained distance, the hallway quickly looped around what was clearly the room the Witch had wandered into. Two quick right turns and then a left had them back on track along the perimeter of the building.

There was light ahead; sunlight crept in through a doorway that had been flung open, black blood smeared across the wall. Nick could see glass scattered across the floor of whatever room laid beyond the threshold, like a window had been broken.

Broken, too, was the spell they'd been under.

"¡Mierda! ¡Eso fue muy aterrador!" Christophe whispered, voice hoarse with fear, like adrenaline had dried his mouth out. His arm wrapped around his midsection, knuckles rubbing at the bandaged stump that was just visible through the floppy sleeve of his green polo. "I did not hear it come!"

Lena reached out, placing a hand against his back and bending forward slightly as she walked, less a gesture of comfort and more an attempt to brace herself. "That was really, really close. I've never seen a... all the Witches I've seen have always been girls." A breath wheezed out of her like a sigh.
"I didn't -"

Coach suddenly turning, facing Nick, made her mouth snap shut. Nick wanted to brace for a blow, or shouting, but he couldn't even bring himself to do that. He didn't even bother to work up the anger he'd need to defend himself.

He just waited for it.

What he didn't expect, and couldn't have prepared himself for even had he tried, was being drawn into Coach's arms with a crushing tightness. His first instinct was to struggle, as if the big man intended to strangle him. Then a hand settled against the crown of his head, and the high-school teacher muttered against his temple.

"Scared the shit outta me, Nick, Jesus! What were you thinkin'? Turnin' around an' seein' - my damn heart jumped right out my chest!"

He held him, and Nick froze in the embrace, the realization of its intent sluggish to sink in.

"Damn. Damn, damn, damn." Coach hissed, half to himself. "Damn it."

The contact threatened something in him - it took something from him. He felt the falter, felt the weakness, like he was just pile of sticks arranged in a very particular order and Coach had swiped one right out from the center. He didn't know how to stay standing without it.

He didn't want the touch. He didn't want to need it. He didn't want Chris and Lena looking on, gawking. He also didn't have the energy to do anything but close his eyes and let his weight shift, resigning control.

Coach's arms tightened - just a little.

Nick couldn't bear to stand there in silence, so he croaked out, "I... froze." It was an awful excuse, flimsy, and only a fraction of the truth.
"It's a'ight, Nick." The anger was gone, leaving a hollow, soothing tone, and Nick hated it, and hated himself for not having the energy to pull away. He hated that he needed it, and held his breath rather than speak again, afraid it might betray him more than he already had. "Just stay with us, a'ight? We gonna get out of this."

He couldn't breathe, and he might've feared the tension that kept building up behind his eyes if he didn't feel so cold, so numb. He grabbed for ego, for pride, but his nails scrabbled on slick surfaces that gave him no purchase.

He was so tired.

I just want this to stop.

"We need to find them." he hissed, and it was the closest he could get to begging Coach to release him. The man held firm, for just a moment, before letting him go. He locked his knees against the urge to collapse.

Coach turned away without a word. Maybe he knew he'd driven them close to some unspoken line, because his voice was suddenly firm, steps already taking him further down the hall. "Agreed."

Nick snapped into lockstep behind him, less a choice and more a simple act of reflex. If he shut his thoughts down and focused on nothing but mirroring Coach's footsteps, maybe he'd make it. Like a broken-down car on a towline.

Had Coach, or any of them, heard the name he'd spoken? It wouldn't mean anything to them, of course. Ellis was the only one who knew something - and he didn't know anything, not really. Not the parts that matter, huh, Nick?

You never share those.

He let his head droop, clenching hands on his katana, biting onto the inside of his cheek, like the sensation would ground him. Footsteps sounded behind him as Christophe and Lena silently flanked him, putting him in the center of the group.

Shame was even closer on his heels.
Chapter 250

The infected largely moved in a flow. They attracted each other in their efforts to get to the noises that attracted them, and it snowballed into the hordes that sprinted almost as one unit. Individuals rarely split from the whole, except for the heavily mutated ones that behaved much more intelligently.

As Ellis pressed close to the corner of the hallway's end and poked his head around it, rather than a scattered landscape of infected, the mall was strangely empty. The screaming and pounding that sounded behind them from the other side of the fire escape was not the only source of noise, but he couldn't see any infected.

Deeper, in the direction of the store they'd left, there was the muffled sound of numerous footsteps and heavy thudding, snarls. It sounded like infected fighting amongst themselves, and beating on something solid.

Now-brighter light streamed in from the broken atrium ceiling, focused and scattered by the soft shimmers of glass shards that coated the tile of the balcony and the lower floor. It was like the sheen of dew frozen on a cold morning. When he took a half-step forward, the tile crunched like frost-crisp grass.

The image might've made him laugh, crinkle his nose, had his heart not been pounding in his ears, fit to burst with anxiety.

The security gate to the clothing store they'd found was broken in, he could see it from where he stood. If he focused, most of the noise seemed to be coming from inside the store - but there was no gunfire, no sounds of weapons striking flesh or active combat. He could only hear infected.

"The gate's down." Rochelle ghosted next to him, leaning in close. Rhiannon had her hand gripped tightly on her shoulder, using the other woman to balance herself as she kept as much weight off her foot as possible. "God. Where are they?"

Ellis swallowed, but fear made his tongue stick to the roof of his mouth. Part of him had anticipated it, but he'd hoped, desperately, that they'd gone unnoticed in the store. "Maybe they're just holed up somewhere. Or... they got out, or somethin'... Coach would've gotten 'em out."

"Haven't heard any fuckin' shots this whole time." Rhiannon muttered in a husky tone, eyes narrowed and darting over the interior of the mall. "Feel like we would've heard it if they got in a fight."

But Rochelle shook her head, just once. "Who knows how much we could hear from outside?" she argued, a frustrated edge touching her voice, though Rhiannon didn't seem to react much to the stress-fueled aggression. "We can't assume anything right now. Let's sneak up to the store and get a look inside. We need to make sure they didn't leave anything, or a sign, or something."

Ellis knew his fingers were tightening on the handle of the baseball bat in his grip, generating the softest squeak with the sweat built up on his palms. He couldn't help the tension growing thicker and thicker in his muscles.

He tried desperately not to consider the idea that they'd been overwhelmed in the store; if they turned that corner, looked in past the broken security gate, they might find blood. Bodies.

He tried to find that old confidence, that feeling that they were invincible, that everything would be okay. He found, instead, fear. It was depthless and vast and merciless. It clung to him, and all he could do was swallow it - and when that simply choked him, he could only hold his breath and wait.

But for what?

"Y'all stay behind me," he urged, already moving.

Please be okay. All of you.

He'd freeze up if he thought on it too long, so he didn't. He shook it off and trudged forward, trying his best to be as quiet as possible. The glass scattered on the ground made it difficult, every step crunching underfoot, tripled when Rhiannon and Rochelle followed after him.

As they passed by a few shuttered stores, the noise wasn't enough to earn them any attention from the horde - but, as always, there were exceptions.

It was the flash of bright green spittle that caught his eye, the gurgled sound coming moments after. The second-floor balcony wrapped around the entire mall and on the other side, a Spitter leered out from behind a slim column. It peered out, like it had been intentionally hiding there.

Dimly flashing eyes locked onto them, and before Ellis could blink, a wad of green acid was sailing toward them, dripping flecks down into the first floor as it flew over. He jolted, shoving back and putting both his arms up to shield his teammates.

The misshapen glob struck the wall beside them, the thin layer of membrane that held its shape bursting open with the impact. Acid spewed free, sizzling as it glided down the wall to pool on the floor.

It splashed outward, and though he jolted back to dodge most of it, Ellis felt a stray splatter strike his forearm. The pain wasn't instantaneous. He thought his denim protected him, at first, and turned his wrist to look at the green stain sprawled over his sleeve. He meant to admire the significant change from his short-sleeved T-shirt.

Then it soaked through.

He couldn't stop himself from yelping. He didn't expect it to hurt as badly as it did - once the acid reached his skin, the denim insulated it, pressing it in tight and close to his flesh. He couldn't escape it, couldn't shake the worst of it off.

"Shit! Shit -"

The bat dropped from his hands, clanging on the ground as it bounced a few times before rolling to a stop. Ferociously, like it had caught fire, Ellis shrugged his shoulders forward to fight his way out of the jacket.

As quick as he'd begun to struggle it off, Rochelle's hands were suddenly on him, grabbing the jacket near his shoulderblades and helping to wrench it free of him. He twisted away from her, hopping to put his whole weight into the effort, and the sleeves went half inside-out in his hurry.

The moment he'd gotten his arm free, he gasped, shaking it out as hard as he could in the hopes of getting at least some of the sizzling liquid off. Instinct almost had him wipe his forearm with his other hand, but he merely clenched both his fists, restraining himself from worsening the damage.

He dared to look, and the splotch of strange green across the back of his forearm leech to a frothy pink before his eyes. He hissed, shoulders curling inward, eyes watering gently at the too-hot, too-sharp pain. "Fuck."

"Dude, are you okay?" Rhiannon managed, voice a squawk of concern. She let Rochelle go in favour of hobbling a step closer to the balcony railing, craning her neck to look for the Spitter. The squeals and gurgling faded as it disappeared into a darkened, un-shuttered storefront. "How bad?"

Rochelle dangled the jacket beside herself, surging forward to try and look at the Georgian's wound. "Ellis -"

Gritting his teeth, Ellis dropped his arm to his side, steeling himself against the pain. There was no time. "I'll live." The acid started to sizzle out, growing inert on his skin, and the bright colour faded to a dull green, like algae. Blood welled up within the smudged border in strange patterns, like he'd grated off the top layer of his skin. "Hurts like a sum'bitch, but we gotta move."

There was a beat of silence, and he expected Rochelle to fight him on the point, to insist on looking his wound over.

Instead, she stepped behind him, taking the jacket by the wrists. Her arms slipped to frame him, looping the jacket around his waist in a quick motion and pulling the arms into a tight knot. "Let's go." she murmured, firmly, stepping back to Rhiannon's side and linking arms with her.

That startled the blonde, but she quickly adapted, allowing the gesture with a grimace. They matched paces, right leg moving with left, like their ankles were tied. "Shitfuck zombie's gone, but it'll be back. Got three minutes, tops."

Ellis barely listened, attention focused forward. He reached down to grab the banded baseball bat in his right hand, lifting his left arm and flexing his fingers. He twisted his wrist, feeling the burn and stretch of his damaged skin. Adrenaline took the edge off, at least, so he could focus.

"Ain't nothin' compared tuh how much Nick's leg must'uv hurt..."

The dark-skinned woman shot her a confused look, brow twitching up, and a flash of humour broke through the stress that had wound her like a spring. "That's... specific."

Rhiannon's voice faltered a little when she muttered back, defensively, "I've... counted, okay? It takes them some time to - it has to fuckin' - reload, or -" She growled, suddenly, tossing her hair with a sharp twist of her head. She seemed embarrassed. "Fucking forget it."

"I wasn't -" Rochelle started, but the sudden rise of screams made her freeze, voice cutting to silence. They'd stepped out in front of the hallway they'd initially gone down, the one that led to the break-room and the window they'd climbed through. Footsteps and shrieks sounded from down it, but no infected came through the still-open doorway.

The pounding from the fire escape was still just faintly audible, but there hadn't been much room to crowd around the door. Had some of the horde come back around? If that was the case, then where were they going?

Ellis hesitated, looking ahead toward the busted-in storefront, still a few yards away. If there were infected in there, then their teammates must have not been. But where else would they be? They hadn't followed after them to the roof, and if infected had broken in the gate, they'd likely come from the front of the mall.

His brain cranked, wheels spinning, and it all clicked right as motion caught his eye.
The door to the side-room, at the end of the hall, swung open - and Coach was the first to step through. Ellis gave himself just a moment to feel relief. It could've crushed him, splintered him, and it felt like pulling back from a swell of vertigo when he forced it to quiet.

Coach looked scared. Fear was not familiar on his features, and Ellis’ heart sank as fast as it had risen. Something was wrong, and all he could think was Nick. Where's Nick? Why isn't he -

Immediately, his eyes darted past the ex-football player, hunting out for more shapes. Christophe was close behind, Lena next to him, and he strained onto his toes to crane his head. Though he should have felt glad to see their faces... selfishly, desperately, he barely looked at them. If that was the last time - if the last thing we did was fight, 'n' he's -

He couldn't even think it.

Then, stepping around the other three, Nick slid into view.

Ellis' knees went weak; his breath caught in his throat. He wanted to laugh, cheer, throw his hat, but something was still wrong. If they were all alive and seemingly unharmed, then what was wrong? Why did Coach - no, he realized, all of them - look so miserable?

The older man stood there, fists clenched, shoulders low. His head was tipped to stare at the ground, body rigid, clad in dark colours that suited him almost as well as the sharp blues and whites. He did not look up, even as Ellis could not pull his gaze away.

Why did he seem ashamed? Of what, more importantly? Was it what happened in the dressing room, or something else?

Once, Ellis had stood in the doorway of a ransacked gunstore, wracked with pain, and their eyes had met. The relief of it, the peace he felt looking into Nick's eyes, realizing that they'd be okay, had knocked him off his feet. Nobody had ever looked at him like that. The ferocity with which he'd held that stare had shaken him as much as it has settled him to quiet.

Ellis had let go, blinked and darkness had swallowed him whole, because it had felt like that ferocity would hold him up. He'd surrendered himself to it... safe, finally.

The urge to give that feeling back, to do the same for Nick, to set him alight with that same wordless feeling.... he drowned in it.

But Nick didn't look up.

Ellis' body froze there, staring, feeling his brows draw together and he didn't realize his eyes were growing wet until his vision blurred. Nick, please. Just - There was nothing he could say that he hadn't already tried to say, but he knew it was in his eyes. I love you. He knew if Nick would just look at him, he could communicate it.

He barely recognized as Rochelle stepped past him, leading Rhiannon by the arm. She called out, but the words meant nothing to him. The edge of his view was faint, dark, thinning. His breathing shallowed, trying to smooth it out, to calm it when it tried to hitch.

Slowly, mechanically, Nick's chin lifted. His eyes darted toward Rochelle, then Rhiannon - and then, suddenly, they were on him. However, they lingered somewhere below his chin, steadfastly refusing to go any higher.

Just look at me. Please.
Then past him.

Then they widened.

Ellis turned without thinking, a well-trained reflex, bringing his face to bear as a small, crumpled body collided into his. Lanky, bone-thin arms and legs tangled around his neck and his shoulders, clinging, and a rank smell flooded him as the warped and sweat-slick skin of its belly pressed against his face.

The collision of the Jockey leaping up off the balcony railing and striking him should have knocked him back, closer to his team... and it did, for a step or two. However, as it gained a grip, it leaned all its weight off him and threw his balance askew in the other direction.

The pain of its knobbled fingers yanking on his hair, nails digging into his scalp, sparked a muffled shout. Before he could do anything, before he could think at all, he was staggering blindly along with its pull.

Instinct made his legs move, feet seeking out stability, unable to see anything with the Jockey clinging to his face. The insecurity of sightlessness panicked him, thrusting his arms up and clawing at the creature's back, desperate to get free of its grip.

His foot struck something solid - and even blind, he knew what it was: the short wall that bordered the balcony. Beyond it lay a thirteen foot drop to the atrium's first floor.

The Jockey's weight pulled, yanked, strength outmatching Ellis' by far despite its wiry and hunched frame. His hips hit the wall and he buckled over it, and gravity clawed at him alongside the Jockey's claws. Laughter screeched in his ear. He had, slow as molasses, the realization that he was going over the edge.

He had enough time to think, Oh, shit. Enough time to hear the crash of the fire escape door failing down the hall, and the shouts behind him, and the screams heightening as the pounding from the store suddenly halted and was replaced with footsteps.

And then he fell.
Shame, in Nick's experience, was a hot sensation. It burned, steamed, came out like sweat. It was a flush. It was something he chased with liquor, acrid and fierce, gritting teeth. It was something he chugged and woke up with a hangover from.

So why did he feel cold?

The moment Coach had released him, a chill had sunk into his bones. It was so hard to walk when his joints crackled, like they'd iced over. It was hard to focus when all he could think about was how much he was shivering.

Silence consumed the three survivors around him, and if he hadn't been so glad for the reprieve from sound, he'd have hated the bloated atmosphere. Nobody was looking at him, and that might've been worse than surreptitiously watching him.

They'd all seen through him. He'd failed, miserably, to keep any of it secret. He'd gutted himself and laid it bare for his teammates to see, and it hurt just barely less than finding out he'd been outed long ago to Rochelle.

He didn't know how to recover - and he always recovered. Even from the gutter, he'd crawl his way back up to his feet and walk away, start over. And fuck everyone you ever loved. Step on 'em, get a little higher for it, never look back.

Never fucking look back.

He'd gotten so good at it.

Until now.

Coach led them, and Nick kept his eyes firmly on the ground, only watching the other man's feet enough to guide himself along after. Couldn't find enough fucking nightmare fuel in all this? I had to go twenty fucking years back?

There had been a time - years, really - when he'd have killed to hear that voice again. Not that he'd have anything to say to me, after everything that happened. That's how it's supposed to go. That's how it works. That's how it's always worked.

Nick cared about something, and it all burned up in his hands. That was a comfortable pattern; the only pattern he knew. His failed marriage had been his one shot at something different, and he'd proven he couldn't handle it.

Nick didn't keep things he cared about.

"What are you still doing here, Nicolas?"

It was late. Almost dinnertime, but winter had the sun almost setting already.

Nick buried his hands in his coat pockets, huddling lower, trying not to appear as cold as he felt when he scowled up at the form looming over him. He sat on the stairs leading to the school's rear entrance, away from the street, where there was still a healthy crowd milling.

The truth was, of course, that Nick just didn't want to go home. His uncle would be out all night, and he hated being in that apartment all alone. Hated, more, the idea of calling his parents to come get him.

He especially hated the arguments that call would start between the three adults.

"Waiting, Mr. Sullivan." Nick snapped back, snide, clipped to keep the shivering from coming out in his diction. "Took you long enough. 'M starving."

His history teacher laughed, voice like rusted-out metal, and he put a hand on the top of his coiled and curled red hair. His weight shifted, staring down at the thirteen-year-old seated by his feet.

It was a break in the pattern. Until now, their time had been spent sitting in the history classroom after-hours, talking, grading papers together. "Who knew my worst student wanted to TA?" he'd said, laughing in that smoke-rasped voice, continuing to laugh even when Nick kicked his leg. Hard.

Until now, it had all rested cozily within the bounds of normal.

Nick clenched his fists, unsure why he felt so scared. He waited for rejection, but hoped beyond hope he might be wrong. He didn't even know what he hoped to gain, or why he thought he'd gain it. He just knew no one else seemed to care.

He wasn't acclimated to being isolated and alone; the feeling still overwhelmed him. It hadn't sunk its teeth into him yet. He still yearned, let himself yearn. He still looked boldly into his own fears and thought he might win in the end.

He was so young.

"Chinese?" the older man offered, casual, like they did it every day. Like he had nothing better to do. He'd sit in a grungy takeaway, make a big show of texting his wife that he was going to be late planning a lesson - and maybe he knew how much it meant to Nick to feel important, even for just a moment - and they'd talk.

They'd talk about anything Nick wanted to, and nothing else. Never anything else.

It was always easy like that.

Unassuming.

"When we're not at school, though, it's just Brett."

Nick's teeth ground together, and though he tried to mask it, his footsteps stuttered. He'd long ago learned to pluck the good memories from the bad - and after years of mental distance, dust had settled on any emotions he'd once had. Or so he thought.

That tension came back, spooling behind his eyes, and he felt a vague confusion. Why did he suddenly want to cry over ages-old pain?

Because it's not about Brett, and you know it.

Christophe walked so close to him, and yet he felt miles away. The Spaniard said nothing, though Nick was sure the man had noticed his stagger. Maybe he simply knew he'd get nowhere by asking, and knew there was no point. Maybe Chris had the best understanding of him, next to Ellis.

As they walked hurriedly through the small side-room, stepping over the subtle carpet of glass shards beneath their feet, Coach heaved a sigh of relief that made Nick's head lift. He darted a glance up, actually taking in his surroundings, and the sight of the mall's interior hallway through the cracked door.

He wanted to laugh as much as he wanted to strike himself across the cheek. He'd done nothing but get dragged along like dead weight. He may as well have been unconscious for how much he'd helped them so far. He needed to wake up.

That was how it felt, anyway; like he was asleep.

When they stepped through the door, returning into that high-ceiling atrium, and the blur of Ellis' soft blue denim came into sight... he knew he should have been happy. He felt the burst of energy in the three bodies around him as they staggered out into the hall, and he knew he should have felt it, too.

But he didn't.

He didn't feel anything but freezing cold shame, not even as Ellis stared at him. He felt the stare boiling on his skin, saw it in his periphery. The shame doubled, tripled, until it was all he could process. It stole his breath, dizzied him.

Despite that dizziness, with more clarity and coherence than he ever really had before, he thought it: It's not about anyone else. They're just part of the same old shit, and I can't fucking do that to Ellis. Not this time. Not again. Not to him. Every time I care about someone, I hurt them, or they hurt me.

I just...

"Oh my gosh." Lena's voice cracked, gently, and she brushed past him. Her urgency made him look up, but only to examine Rochelle and Rhiannon where the women were approaching them, leaving Ellis behind. The blonde was limping. "What happened?!"

Coach's hand touched his shoulder, lightly, and the sensation was distant and vague. It was some attempt at comfort, but it just landed like a numb weight. "Y'all are a'ight." he muttered, soft, like a prayer.

The Northerner couldn't stop his eyes from working their way toward Ellis. He knew he didn't want to face the look in those eyes, because he was sure he'd seen it before: the overwhelming dismay stewing in stony blue, the sadness, the desperation. The frustration. The anger. The confusion.

Nick didn't want to see it, but still his eyes lifted, roved in that direction, despite all his efforts to prevent it. He didn't want to see Ellis, and he didn't want Ellis to see him - but there was nowhere else to look.

It was movement over Ellis' shoulder that yanked his attention away before he could meet the younger man's eyes. He'd have been relieved, had he not promptly realized what he was looking at.

The Jockey's eyes glinted as it clambered up over the stone wall bordering the balcony, lurching its body into a leap.

There was no thinking involved when Nick moved. Had he been thinking, he might've noticed the sounds of infected around them. It might've changed his tactic, or at least made him balk, just for a second... or maybe that was a foolish lie. He'd stopped considering the consequences of his actions a long time ago, and never moreso than when Ellis was involved.

Where he'd been transitioning suddenly between burning up and freezing to his core, he was, abruptly, neither. Calm enveloped him as his body lunged into a sprint, running, like he'd been previously coiled up and readied for a marathon. The ache and shudder of his muscles faded into a dull roar, irrelevant beside simple reflex.

Fireworks. That was the only word for it. He didn't realize how little he'd felt, until he felt everything. Rage and terror mixed into a strange cocktail of emotions that hit him with an explosive force, stirring his senses alive. It was painful.

He, finally, woke up.

No.

He knew, instantly, the Jockey's intent. It played out in his head well before it had even truly begun to transpire, and as he watched it happen, his fury condensed down into a single point of pain just below his sternum. No!

Coach shouted, followed by the rest of his team - a chorus of Ellis' name, of denials, of guttural cries filled with surprise and shock. He heard footsteps behind him, and he was sure that their reactions were not as delayed as he felt they were. They all ran, and seconds passed in half-time.

Ellis was bent over the wall - and tipping over, the Jockey kicking a bony foot off the rail to help leverage him over. He saw the Georgian's hands scrabbling. He was trying to grip on the balcony's rail, to slow his fall somehow, all to no avail. Ellis was dropping out of sight.

Movements smooth and feral, driven on by those fireworks blasting and popping in his ears, Nick lunged.

Unthinking, Nick's other hand released its grip on his katana as he lurched forward to pin his hips against the edge of the barrier. He didn't even hear the sound of the sword clattering to the tile, scattering glass shards as it collided and slid.

If time moved at half-speed before, it became a mere fraction of that.

Bolstered against the balcony wall, Nick thrust his arms down. His fingertips brushed the denim at Ellis' ankle, and his eyes narrowed, almost closing. He curled his fingers, snatching at the fabric, trying to get a grip on it before Ellis fell out of his reach.

Nick whipped his other arm forward to join his left, and he'd only barely gotten a grasp when the younger man's descent finally snapped his whole body taut.

He snarled, growled, roared maybe; his nails had grown long enough to peek out over his fingertips, and caught in the denim, he felt more than one tear and break. The pain didn't stop him, letting the edge of the wall cut into his pelvis as he dragged back, heels skidding against the tile floor beneath his feet.

He had Ellis by one pantleg, all of the man's weight - and the Jockey's - threatening to drag him with.

But he resisted, strained. Unfortunately, in halting his descent, Ellis' momentum carried him to crash flat into the other side of the barrier. Nick heard a crack of flesh on stone, and fear tried to burn his insides to ash at the sound. Fuck - shit! Was that the Jockey? It had to be! It was on his face, it had to be!
It was the blast of a shotgun that caught his attention, though it didn't wander for more than a split-second. There were infected bearing down on them from both sides, he knew, but he could do nothing. The only option he had was to depend on the survivors behind him to protect him.

He was forced to lean forward as it took every ounce of strength he had to keep from losing his grip or going over himself. Through his grimaced squint of exertion, he darted his eyes downward.

The Jockey hung upside-down from Ellis' shoulders, and it wrenched its body up to leer at him, bugged-out eyes dried to a visibly gritty texture. Its tongue lolled, trying to work its way through a gap where its teeth had fallen from its stretched gums. A cackle left it, wheezed and soft, frightened, like Nick had gotten the upper hand.

As it started to twist around, getting its gnarled fingers tangled in the jacket looped around Ellis' waist, Nick couldn't stop himself from looking past it. "Fuck!"

Ellis dangled limply, arms jolting as the Jockey shifted its grip on him. Nick could see enough to see blood dripping up the side of his face, curving along his cheek and past his temple. He was not moving.

He realized, somewhere, that the Jockey must've darted out of the way of the collision, let its grip loosen to swing around and cling against the back of Ellis' head instead. The Jockey saw it coming and dodged it, letting Ellis take it, instead.

Oh, Jesus.

The hobbled infected suddenly crawled up Ellis' hanging form, moving with a deftness that did not match its emaciated frame. Every time its weight shifted, Nick felt his body strain a little harder. He couldn't let go, not when he was only just holding the Georgian aloft as it was, and couldn't defend himself.

In time to the thought, a body pressed against his, and he darted his eyes to see Rochelle wielding her katana as she leapt to bend over the wall. She jabbed down with it, catching the tip in the Jockey's hobbled shoulder.

It screamed, and the strike made its hands flash up, grabbing for the blade. It missed, and its surrendered grasp on Ellis' body shook its sense of balance. It had unlocked its legs from around Ellis in order to move, and when it grabbed for purchase, it grabbed the jacket tied at his waist.

The moment its weight came fully onto the denim jacket, the knot yanked loose. With a yelp like a kicked dog, it fell, the jacket gripped in its hands. Nick might've watched it hit the ground, gloried in whatever damage was caused to it by the fall, had Ellis not been dead weight in his grasp.

He didn't see it land on its back, weight striking first on its shoulders, and its head soon after colliding with the tile. He didn't see its body go still in an instant, terribly still, as its neck cracked under its skin.

He had other concerns.

"Help -" he snarled, but Rochelle was already reaching, the katana once again tossed by the wayside. Her hands circled Ellis' leg, and they both heaved, struggling together with strained breaths.

It was not easy. Rochelle was not weak, and adrenaline fueled both of them, but Ellis was completely limp in their grasp. Even had he been light-weight - which he was not - getting him up and over the barrier was going to be difficult.
The only mercy came when they'd gotten him a little further up, and Nick was able to jolt his left hand down, hooking it in his jeans' rear pocket. The added leverage helped, and the closer they pulled him, the more they were able to loop their arms around him entirely.

Nick and Rochelle dragged him over the balcony's border wall, and both of them collapsed, all three forms sliding to the ground amidst the broken glass. Ellis slumped into the wall, and before he could even think about restraining himself, Nick jolted forward, his hands gripping the younger man's face.

He barely noticed when Rochelle recoiled, and didn't care to pay her any attention. She grabbed the katana, gone as quickly as she'd appeared, and the sounds of his own blade striking flesh only just pierced his awareness.

Jesus. Thank fuck, he's breathing, at least...

Ellis' expression was vapid, empty, like he was deeply asleep. His lip was split near the edge, but most of the blood came from a scrape that centered mainly on his jawline, like he'd taken the blow with his head turned. Abrasions ran from his jaw, over his cheek, and across his temple, all bleeding gently.

They were all minor - cosmetic. However, Nick didn't waste time being relieved about that, when the blow itself had knocked him out. "Kid." he hissed, using the thumb of the hand that cradled his undamaged jaw to tap on his cheekbone, both his hands jostling him, softly. "Kid, you gotta -"

Ellis did not respond.

Turning his head gently, Nick stole a glance behind himself. The other survivors had formed a loose semicircle around them, Coach and Rhiannon on the left, with Lena, Rochelle, and Christophe on the right. The flood of infected from either direction on the balcony was no full-strength horde, but he caught glimpses of enough to know it took all they had to keep them back.

Lena had slung out her brush-hook again, and her body stiffened against its weight as she lashed out in wide swings, slicing the sharp blade through multiple infected with each strike. Chris' handgun stuck half out of the pocket of his cargo shorts, and he'd instead taken his machete back from the brunette beside him.

Rhiannon stood with Ellis' shotgun, weight balanced on her uninjured foot, and Coach had his double-barrel. They shot in a battery, each blast taking hunks out of the cloud of bodies before them.

Rochelle split the difference, head constantly twisting to check and find the spot where a zombie was about to get through, where the flow was almost out of control, and she'd dart in a flash to control it. There was gritted tension on her face, muffled fear, and it did not fade even as the horde petered out around them.

Absurdly, Nick wanted to laugh.

_They'd be doing fine without you. All you did was put Ellis in this position. All you did was fuck him up enough that this happened. He stood there like an idiot, because of you, because all you've done is fuck everything up, from day one._

When he looked back, he couldn't even muster up surprise when Ellis' eyelids were gently flickering, stirring, drifting back to consciousness. Couldn't even be glad, or relieved, or any of the things he should have been. _And why should I be? This is my fucking fault. Fuck... he's right, isn't_
The tension behind his eyes rose, tightening, clenching his chest in a knotted mass that he was too afraid to look at, too afraid to put a name to. It rose, peaked - and then was once again overwhelmed by that cold sensation.

I'm just protecting myself. If I was protecting him, how'd this shit happen? How'd any of this happen?

Steeling himself with a clenched jaw, Nick let go of the younger man's face, shoving an arm between him and the half-wall behind him. He nudged his shoulder under Ellis' armpit, tangling fingers in the grey T-shirt he wore. "Gotta get you up. " he muttered, to himself more than anything else.

He lifted, hard, and Ellis' feet shifted sluggishly to flatten against the tile, drunkenly. He was only fractionally aware, responding on physical instinct more than conscious thought. Ellis' plush lips moved, ghosting the outline of a word.

Nick couldn't pretend it didn't look like his name.
Chapter 252

Ellis was slow to stir. Awareness came in pieces, at first, clouded and foggy.

He knew he was walking, though that was a strange thing to realize when it felt like he'd just woken up. It was more like the ground was slipping away under his feet, and he had to keep his feet moving or lose his balance. He stumbled, staggered, but did not fall.

It took him a moment to process why. There was a body flattened against his - or, more accurately, his body was slumped into someone else's.

He blinked his eyes open, vision blurring for a moment before coming into focus. When he tried to lift his head to look toward the warmth he leaned into, his head throbbed in a piercing ache, and he flinched it back down. Still, his gaze drifted, and from that angle he could see enough of the body beside his to recognize Nick leaned into him.

That seemed normal, right up until he remembered it wasn't.

"Nick -" he managed, feeling a burst of nausea right after the words. His toe caught on something, staggering, and Nick's hand suddenly gripped into his chest to keep him upright.

When Nick spoke, it was so loud, Ellis' brain spun. "You hit your head. Keep walking." That brought up vague flashes of memory, lining into unsteady order: the Jockey and the sensation of falling, then the cessation of that falling and a blinding pain. On top of it all was one, solid fact.

Ellis mumbled it, a statement more than a question. "You saved me."

The Northerner didn't say anything.

The more Ellis' vision cleared, the better view of his surroundings filtered in. They were walking across the balcony, sidling up toward the escalators, and Ellis peered over his shoulder to see the rest of their team walking behind them.

"- crashed." Rochelle was in the middle of saying, voice coarse with frustration. "I don't know why, or... there was nothing we could do. It looked like they were going to land, too."

Beside her, Coach was shaking his head, eyes low. "It was a long shot, babygirl. Y'all did good gettin' back." His arm was tucked loosely around Rhiannon's shoulders, helping the blonde walk through her limp. She was pressed nearly as close to him as Ellis was to Nick. "We just got the home stretch now."

"Anyone see that Spitter?" Rhiannon's voice muttered, to no response. "I thought the shit'd be back by now."

Not looking forward made him stumble again, but Nick had never removed his hand from Ellis' chest, and the grip held him up. His hand was so warm, even through the fabric of his shirt. Slowly, Ellis lifted his gaze, landing it on Nick's face.

His expression was gritted, strained, yet so exhausted. Bruising had crept around his eyes; had it been there mere hours before? Ellis wasn't sure. He just knew Nick was so close, close enough to brush lips against his cheek... and he wanted to.

Instead, Ellis slumped his head, settling it against his own bicep where it was slung over Nick's shoulders. His forehead made contact with the gambler's jaw, and if he'd been less dizzy, he might've thought twice about the gesture. As it was, it soothed him, and he leaned into it.

"Thank yuh." he sighed, softly.

Again, there was no response - but did the hand on his chest tighten a little? Did the arm crossing his back go rigid? He was too scattered to tell, so he merely soaked up the sensations and filed them away, something that he could mull over later. His head pulsed, a headache forming like his very skull were throbbing, and sharper pain started to form on his cheek and the side of his face.

Gently, uncertainly, Ellis started to take the steps below them. He managed, though Nick bore most of his weight, and he was sure he'd have fallen otherwise.

Behind them, Rochelle watched with a bitten lower lip, anxiety making her sigh. As much as she wanted to intervene, at least to check on Ellis, seeing the men so close brought on a conflicted set of emotions.

First, of course, was relief that they'd all reunited, Nick included. Then came anger, because she hadn't forgotten Ellis' tear-stricken face in the clothing store. Then - ever so reluctantly - came hope. Maybe a close call like that was what Nick needed to jog sense into him.

Or it'll just get Ellis excited for no reason.

She frowned, rolling her eyes in a tight gesture, sighing. At least for now, she'd leave it alone. They had bigger concerns, and she couldn't be anything but glad that Nick had jumped so instantly into action. God, I don't want to think about what would've happened if he hadn't. I should've been looking.

A hand brushed her arm, and she darted her eyes to find Christophe walking beside her, machete tucked under his armpit. "¿Estás bien, bonita?" he murmured, knuckles gently stroking down the sleeve of her purple sweatshirt, a soothing gesture.

Rochelle wasn't so oblivious that she didn't notice the stressed tightness around his eyes. She knew she didn't know him - not really - but she had outlines of him. She had the caricature he'd put forth with his old team, and she had the vulnerable and broken shell of him that had surfaced after his amputation. She had, too, the soft sincerity that he had shown in increasing vibrancy.

Plotting between those vague ideas had given her an understanding of who he was, in the simplest terms, and what was normal. She knew enough to know when he was worried, and that it had nothing to do with his own situation.

Maybe he was thinking the same thing as she was. He was just as worried about Ellis' wellbeing, after all.

"I'm okay, sweetie. Thanks." she returned, twisting her hand to catch his. The flush of colour to his face was a little satisfying as she let her fingers tangle loosely with his, squeezing. "Did something happen while we split up? You guys seem, uh, -"

Before anything more could leave her lips, Chris' expression fell into a grimace, and his voice dropped to a cracked hoarseness. "Ay, chica... Es demasiado." There was a bitterness, a sadness, and she frowned instinctively. "Maybe later, when we are safe."

Rather than argue, she darted a glance toward Coach. The big man was looking at them and, grimly, he nodded. It was that slow nod that she'd come to know very well: We'll talk, it said.
It just made her more nervous.

They filed in close, following Nick and Ellis down the escalator, Rochelle picking up speed to close the gap between her and the two men. She didn't fully process that she hadn't let go of Chris' hand, dragging him along with, and the Spaniard didn't seem inclined to say anything.

Or, more specifically, anything he meant her to understand - as they quick-stepped down the escalator, he murmured behind her, "Tienes que dejar de ser tan bonita, cariño."

Her eyes drifted over Nick's back, taking stock of his posture. She had to remind himself that a portion of the issue upon the helicopter's arrival was that Nick had seemingly closed himself up in the dressing room. She knew they'd argued, but about what? That, and she'd seen his face before the Jockey had shown up.

I've never... seen him look like that. I don't know how to describe it. Like he wasn't really there, like he was so far in his head, he couldn't get out. He's always kept up the bullshit, even when he was scared, or angry. He's always got something to say. Where's that guy now? She wanted to be furious with him, but she mostly felt concern. Hate to say it, but I do love the douchebag. He's the big brother I never wanted, and I really want to kick the shit out of sometimes.

And, Christ, I just want him to be happy.

The urge to laugh died out quickly, as did her resolve to mind her own business.

"Is he okay, Nick?" she murmured, hesitation colouring her voice. She felt Chris' fingers go tight on hers, nails digging in gently like a warning, but she ignored the gesture and persevered. Inlaid into the words, unspoken but just under the surface, was a soft gratitude. "That was so close..."

Nick's head dipped, smoothly, and it seemed like a quiet sigh. When he spoke, it was flat, matter-of-fact. It might've been aggressive had he sounded less tired and empty. "He's got a fucking concussion, so, no."

"'M fine." the Georgian protested, a soft mumble, his head lifting slightly. He turned his head to look backwards, and she got a better look at the scrapes down the side of his face, as well as the vagueness to his eyes. "Just dizzy, is all - I'll be fine."

Coach's voice raised over them, grunted. "Considerin' the alternative, I'll take concussed." He did not sound pleased, not that Rochelle could blame him. Very little of the day had gone how they wanted. "But between Ellis an' Rhiannon, now... need to get our asses back to base, let 'em get some rest."

Rochelle grimaced, squinting her eyes half-shut. "Why does it feel like one step forward, two steps back, every time we go out...? Clothes weren't worth this."

"We got information... the map, I mean." was Lena's gentle response. The biker's hazel eyes wandered over the team, idly at first. When Rochelle snuck a glance at her, she noticed the other woman's gaze had settled squarely on Nick and Ellis as the two men reached the bottom of the escalators and stepped off to the side.

That raised an interesting question. Rochelle had been conscious of the two's previous relationship for what felt like forever, and it had become second nature to read into gestures, looks, comments. It seemed obvious to her, but how obvious was it, in reality? And how hard should she have been working to keep the secret?

Would the bikers finding out drive Nick to a fresh panic?
But Lena did not seem fazed, didn't stumble, continuing earnestly. "And we're going to find that helicopter crash, aren't we?"

That balked her. Rochelle quickly looked over the faces she could see, searching out an answer, fumbling even as she did. Christophe's eyes widened with a quiet fear, and Coach looked grimly uncertain. "Uh - shit. I didn't think that far ahead. Do you think someone survived?"

Ellis' small voice sighed out, "There was smoke. Dunno."

"It was the military?" the Spaniard muttered, weakly, huffing out a gentle breath like descending the escalator had winded him. Rochelle turned around as she stepped off the escalator, and their fingers dropped away from each other as he re-gripped his machete in his hand. "Do you know this?"

Rochelle hesitated, but Rhiannon piped up, instead. Pain was clear as day in her voice, gripping tight onto Coach's forearm as she hop-stepped down off the frozen escalator. "Yeah, dude. It was a Navy chopper. It even had turrets - and am I the only one who fucking shit myself, seeing that? What's the universal sign for 'I'm not a zombie'?"

"Y'all." Suddenly, Coach's voice was gritted. There was a slight jolt, in unison, that passed through the rest of the survivors, and Rochelle quickly looked up at the heavyset man. His jaw was clenched, gaze distant, and a mournful edge touched his voice. "Can we just focus?"

A tender frown quirked at her lips, and she nodded, raising her voice. "Coach is right. We've got a lot to worry about. Let's talk about this later, okay?"

They were all going to have to cope with the near-miss with rescue, and preferably when they were back safe at their current base. Driving each other to a breakdown in the middle of the mall was not optimal.

Rochelle opened her mouth, intent on saying something to redirect the conversation, but the opportunity was stolen from her.

She didn't miss the way Rhiannon swung her weight, jostling the ex-football player who had her in a one-armed grip in playful antagonism. She definitely didn't miss the subtle light that flickered on his eyes, a flash of subdued humour in the blonde's direction. The lanky biker let him go, then, pulling her bat from under her arm.

"Let's go, then. I'm hungry."

Lena snorted, loudly, drawing a dark look from the blonde.

"What, asshole?"

Rochelle's nose crinkled, biting back a laugh when Lena rolled her eyes. She genuinely wasn't sure when Coach and Rhiannon had bonded, but she wasn't about to complain. Even if I have no idea how they're getting along, but Nick and Coach fight like cats. At least she has a little humility sometimes.

All of them moved, advancing - except Nick. Even Ellis started to take a stumble-step forward, but the gambler stood rooted where he was, chin low. Rochelle blinked at him, startled at the tension radiating off his frame.

"Wh-" the Georgian started to mumble, startled, but Nick cut him off.
"His stuff. He lost his jacket and his hat."

Rochelle needed to really process it for a moment, blinking dumbly. She didn't know what threw her more: the information, or the way Nick said it. He sounded... ashamed.

Then it all flooded into coherence; it all made sense, all clicked. The look on his face and the hunch to his shoulders, the way he'd stood there in Coach's shadow and looked so small. It was shame. And not the ferocious shame that had almost driven him to run out into the dark of night, all alone, that one night - this was crushingly heavy.

It dragged him down, turned him to stone. He barely functioned under it. He didn't get angry; he just faltered, wilted.

She'd never seen him like that.

It froze her, and she could only watch as Ellis slowly recognized the truth behind the words, his hand darting up with abrupt speed to touch his bare curls. Genuine panic flashed across his face, and if she hadn't known how attached he was to his hat, she might've thought it was mostly the concussion. He jolted, seized, and half-turned around before Nick grabbed the wrist of his other arm to keep him still.

"Stay here, dumbshit." the Northerner hissed, quietly.

Before Rochelle's eyes, Ellis seemed to slowly come into the awareness of just how much contact there was between them. He looked, slowly, at the hand gripping his wrist - and where his arm lay over Nick's shoulder - and the other hand grasping just at his ribs -

Loudly, Chris offered up, "Espera, tío. I get it!" He bolted at a slight jog, glass crunching under his white flat-top sneakers, toward the Jockey's corpse. It still had the jacket gripped loosely in its knotted hands, and Ellis' hat was a small lump just a few feet away.

The Spaniard bit onto the handle of his machete to free his hand to collect both, one at a time. He shook them clean of what glass shards had gotten stuck in the fabric, placing the hat on top of his head and slinging the jacket over his good shoulder. He returned, beaming around the wood handle, walking right up to where Ellis stood.

As he came close, Nick suddenly side-stepped, using the grip he had on Ellis to push him into a firm step backward. It was too tender to be a shove, Nick supporting him through it even as he forced the Georgian away. Maybe they'd both realized how close they were.

Despite the support, dizzied, Ellis staggered a little as he was pushed into Christophe. His expression fell to a gentle confusion, and the Spaniard scrambled to loop his arm around him. He grunted, insistently, forcing Ellis to look at him rather than look after Nick.

When Chris bobbed his chin, Ellis frowned gently and reached up to take the machete from his mouth. Freed, the Spaniard let his slim eyebrows waggle underneath the low-set bill of the trucker cap and murmured, "Ay. I get you, too, ¿sí?"

Ellis didn't laugh, but he smiled a little, dropping his eyes to the ground rather than look up.

As Nick turned away, shaking his head, Rochelle got a better look at his face. He looked pale, washed-out, the contrast driven to further exaggeration by the dark colours he'd changed into. "Where's my katana?" he sighed out, hollow. "We should get moving."

None of it made sense. Ellis had been in danger before, plenty of times, and Nick had been responsible for some of those times. It had never crushed him - he'd just gotten angry. And unless a lot more happened in the dressing room than Ellis had let on, nothing had happened to change things so drastically.

What the hell happened while we were gone?
Chapter 253

Holding his breath, Nick let himself blink a few times.

Unfortunately, after each flash of darkness, the scene before him didn't change.

It was not news that the helicopter had attracted infected. The scope of it, however, came as a shock. Nick stood just before the busted front doors of the mall, body slumped and katana scraping the tile flooring, eyes drifting over the square. Zombies milled around the tents, wandering outside the fenced-in queue that gated off the mall's entrance.

Ten. Twenty. Thirty. More, but he lost count. They wandered, snarls and little shrieks announcing their arguments, lashing out at each other when they came too close. Agitated energy was in the air, like they had not fully come down from the excitement that had led them to the mall in the first place. He looked out into the square and could feel nothing beyond quiet distress.

If it's like this everywhere, if survivors are in the single digits compared to all these infected... How can you come back from that?

"A'ight." was murmured behind him, though he didn't turn to face it. Soft footsteps gathered a few feet away, as the rest of his team huddled close to Coach, voices low. "We gotta get out of here, an' we ain't in the best shape. Ideas?"

There was a beat of silence that hung thickly in the air, regretful, before Rochelle sighed heavily in a frustrated gesture. "I know we're not at full strength, but we can take a horde. We just did."

Coach must have given her some sort of look, because her voice pitched a little, defensive. "The fencing is gonna slow them down, and we're sitting in a chokepoint."

Quietly, Coach returned, "We don't even know how many there are out there. Whole mall might be surrounded."

At that, Nick turned his head, just enough to look over his shoulder. His eyes ticked over to where Chris and Ellis stood, leaned into one another, and he couldn't stop a sluggish protest from boiling over in his gut. The contact between them frustrated him almost as much as seeing Ellis' hat on Chris' head - and that was a stupid, childish jealousy.

As desperate as he'd been to get the kid out of his arms, away from him, he felt desperate to reverse the decision. The sound of Ellis' breathy gratitude, the temple pressing into his jaw, soft and warm... He'd finally felt a break in that overwhelming nothing, previously only overshadowed by that empty shame that had threatened to swallow him. Without him, the cold crept back in, and it frightened him.

It sat on his shoulder and chewed on him, nibbled slowly but voraciously, like rats on a corpse in an abandoned attic.

Rhiannon lifted a hand, fingers half-splayed in an open gesture. "Look." she drawled out. "Lee and I have been dodging hordes for a living. You can't handle a lot with just two fuckin' people. If they're already on you, it's hard as shit - hiding doesn't work, and you can't outrun the fuckers."

Folding an arm behind Rhiannon's back to support her, Lena glanced around seriously. Her soft face was unable to harshen into anything truly intimidating, and she cut in with a gentle and leading tone of voice. "But, the creeps aren't on us. Not yet. So we distract them, draw the bulk away."
Rochelle frowned, tightening her fingers on Ellis' pump shotgun. She looked out into the square through the shattered front doors, teeth worrying at her lower lip. "Okay, sure. But unless you guys have another one of those alarm pipebombs, how?"

Before Lena could open her mouth, her sister was in motion. Smoothly, Rhiannon spun on her heel, keeping her injured foot up a few inches off the ground. She halted upon facing Christophe, who went wide-eyed in a flash as the blonde lifted up both hands, aiming dual finger-guns in his direction.

She grinned. "You're up, hot stuff."

Instantly, Chris tightened his arm around Ellis, dragging a foot back a half-step in a defensive gesture. He looked genuinely concerned, darting his gaze around as if hunting for support, but found only confusion and Coach biting back a wary laugh. "¿Qué?! What I do?"

Rhiannon seemed vaguely disappointed, rolling her eyes and dropping one hand. The other lifted, pointing insistently down at his hip. "Your pocket, dude." she hissed, put out, like he'd missed a cue in a skit.

He blinked down, staring at his cargo shorts pocket. It took him a moment - that much was obvious - and when he finally moved, it was slow with a lack of comprehension. His arm pulled away from Ellis' waist, digging into his left pocket, and when he pulled it back out he had a set of keys dangling from his fingers.

Confusion bolted across the team, Rochelle's expression in particular darting into a scrunch. "Where'd...?" she managed. "Where'd you get those?"

Shifting on his heels, Chris gripped the keys in a tight fist to stop them from jangling. "Ah, while we were in the tent... I found it on a body, the police. But how do we get to the cars?" He squinted, peering out from under Ellis' capbill, muttering out a clipped, "No veo cómo eso puede ayudar..."

"The police vans?" When Chris nodded, Coach rolled his shoulders to a low slump, shaking his head. "Even if we got to 'em, the road was a mess comin' in. Ain't drivin' back the way we came. We'd have to find a detour back to base, off the main road, while losin' all these zombies."

With a groan, Rhiannon put a knuckle into the corner of her eye just at the bridge of her nose, screwing it there as if to grind out a headache. "I gotta wipe your ass, too?" she grunted. "Look, we don't need wheels, we just need a way out. Shit's got a panic button, doesn't it?"

Understanding blossomed in a two-fold wave. First came that subtle eagerness, latching onto a solution to their predicament. Then, slower, came discomfort, as the memory surfaced of the last time they'd experienced a car's security system weaponized. It was difficult to forget, as was everything that came before.

Nick watched the shift happen, turning his body entirely around. The thought ping-ponged from Rochelle to Coach, both of them biting back frowns and looking reflexively toward Christophe, and then it hit Ellis.

Unfortunately, Ellis was nursing a concussion, and critical thinking came slowly behind his excitement. "Oh, shit!" he uttered, gently lifting his hand to press a palm into his sternum. He looked to Rochelle, oblivious to the warning that lit in her eyes. "Like how Brenda got that horde on us, 'n' -"

It was the stiffening of the body next to him that made Ellis realize his mistake. Context wasn't necessary; Chris knew full well that there was only one altercation between them and his old leader that he hadn't been a part of. He knew the circumstances, and the outcome. None of it had been kept secret - except for Brenda's dying words, of course.

That didn't lessen the visible flinch that dropped Chris' chin.

Ellis was out of it, but not so completely that he didn't catch on eventually. The sound he made was a mortified hiss of air, pulling it in between his teeth and his lower lip so it crackled a bit. "O-oh. Uh. I only meant... Chris, man, I..."

"It is okay." muttered the young ex-Angel, although the words were betrayed by the half-step he took to the side, putting some distance between them. The look in his honey-brown eyes was little more than a melancholy sort of distance, resigned, and he forced a soft laugh. "It is a good plan. She... had good plans." An awkward tone crept into his voice, like he regretted every word as he spoke it.

Hesitantly reaching out, Ellis quickly forced his hand back down, ducking his chin in visible self-beratement. "Sorry..." he mumbled, softly, wincing his eyes shut, and Nick watched the slow tug of pain drag his shoulders down. He knew, without a doubt, that it was not physical. Was he thinking about Chris' suicide attempt? Afraid, perhaps, to bring up painful memories? "I wasn't thinkin'."

Slowly looking around in the uncomfortable silence that followed, Rhiannon let her fingers clench in claw-like shapes, frustration leaking through the gesture. She turned at the waist, eyes narrowed, and gave Lena a thin grimace. It screamed, "Well, I tried."

Raising both hands, the brunette warily took a step back. "Cripes, guys. I know you all have stuff going on, and I get that we're not in the loop. But let's get out of this, okay? We're all frickin' stressed, and we're all frickin' tired, but we need to buck up right now." Her eyes moved distinctly to Nick, and drifted slowly toward Coach. "We gonna do this, or what?"

"Agreed." Coach muttered, grimly, looking ahead to the mall's front doors. "I'm not sure if this'll work, but it's a better plan than runnin' out there guns blazin'."

With a frown, Rochelle crossed her arms, fingers flexing on the stun baton in her left hand. "So we set the car off, and it brings all the infected from around the mall - plus more. What then?" She flung her fingers out without uncrossing her arms, gesturing out to the square beyond the mall's entrance. "They'll come running, but the car isn't going to hold their attention when they see us."

Ellis pressed the palm of his hand against his jaw, wincing as he applied pressure to the gently bleeding wounds there. "Only thing that'll keep 'em busy is that puke stuff. They go crazy fer that, don't pay no mind tuh anythin' else."

"And we don't have any of that." Rochelle lifted her chin, narrowing her eyes. She turned entirely around, looking back into the mall with a quick puff of air from her lips. "Okay, so we go out the back. There was a fire escape up to the roof from the second floor, and there's probably a back door on the first floor, too."

Lena touched a knuckle to her jaw, tapping it there, thought parsing out into an expression of thin agreement. "It'll cut line of sight to the zeds out front, too. Maybe enough that we can circle around and dodge most of them. Even if some of them catch us, the noise'll cover the sound of us fighting. Damage control."

Coach shrugged up his shoulders, nodding in the same gesture. "If none of y'all got a better idea, let's do it."
He surveyed the faces around him, looking for protest, and landed finally on Nick's. Their eyes met and a muted concern blared to life in Coach's eyes; the gambler hadn't said a word. No jibes, no snorted complaints. The man was looking on and listening, clearly, and he seemed more together and composed than he had earlier, but still - he stood silent.

"Nick?" he prompted, despite knowing better. He needed to test the waters, to throw that stone and listen for the sound of it hitting something in the darkness that loomed beyond. Gauging, probing.

Nick's expression darkened, lips going tight in a pinched look. His chin lowered, eyes breaking from Coach's to focus instead on the tile floor, off-white smeared with red and black from their first pass through the hallway. "Seems fine." he bit off, so quiet that it might've not carried had the hall not echoed it.

It was not the response Coach wanted, but it was the one he expected. Nick had always laboured for the appearance of apathy, along with spite and caustic sarcasm. He had none of it, now. He seemed to be wielding most of his energy just to keep himself upright, like a single tentpost holding up a canvas structure. The facade of stability, at best.

"Ain't the first - or gonna be the last - thing I ever wondered about the boy... but who the hell is Brett? An' the hell's behind all this shit? Ain't just Ellis, what happened in that dressing room. Don't know what it was, though."

He wasn't sure he'd get an answer, even if he pressed. Just... keep focused. Time fo' that shit later.

Coach frowned, sighed, but turned his attention to Chris before the silence that followed could drag on. He reached out a hand and set it on the Spaniard's shoulder - though it landed almost more on his neck, his clavicle, staying well away from the bandaged stump now cloaked by the open sleeve of his green polo shirt. "'Aight, son. You ready to ring the dinner bell?"

Tentatively nodding, Christophe let his thumb rub against the red button on the bottom of the key fob, emblazoned with an icon of a trumpet. "We will need to run, ¿sí? Is everyone ready?"

Inhaling a reedy breath, Nick forced himself to move, striding to close the gap he'd created between him and the rest of the team. He didn't stop, continuing on, swinging his katana up to place the dull back against his shoulder - nor did he bother to speak. His motion prompted the others to join him, and as everyone started to turn back into the mall, there was a soft click as Chris pressed the button.

Then, stillness, when nothing at all happened.

No alarm, no siren. Not even a honk.

There was an awkward moment where nobody wanted to break the silence, before the Spaniard released a weak laugh. "Esto es lo que llaman tener 'mala suerte'." he whined out, sighing, squinting his eyes to look up toward his teammates as they slowly turned back around. "Plan C?"

Nick swept a hand up, pressing his thumb into his right eye and the rest of his fingers into his left, squeezing. "Of fucking course." he muttered, wryly, looking into the stars and fireworks that sparked at the pressure to his eyeballs. "Just great."

Coach released a heavy sigh, shaking his head in a tense gesture. He lowered his shotgun from where he'd raised it, prepared to bolt, and turned back to glare out through the mall's front doors. "Car's dead, maybe?" he grunted.

In a fluster, Ellis staggered a step closer, reaching out to gently pluck the set of keys from Chris' hand. He turned them over in his hand, peering at the fob uncertainly. "Uh, well... Maybe. But if that's the case, then the whole plan's shot tuh hell, anyway." He pressed the unlock button, twisting it around to look in vain into the small plastic bead jutting out from the plastic.

Ellis' eyes cleared a little, brightening as he mulled it over. "It's probably just low on battery, or somethin'. Or it's usin' an IR sensor - they ain't got much distance on 'em, 'n' you need tuh point it right at the thing fer it tuh work." With a loll of his head, he gripped the fob between his thumb and his forefinger, smacking it into the meat of his palm. "We ain't got a clear shot tuh the vans, unless we go outside."

Ellis turned his head, looking back toward Coach with a worried half-frown. The gesture left him ill-equipped to react when Chris suddenly snagged the keys back from him.

With an angled grin, eyes gently lighting below slim brows, the Spaniard turned to face the team arrayed out a few feet deeper in the mall. "¡Sólo hay una forma de averiguarlo!" he uttered in a stage whisper, cheeriness crashing into him all at once. "Wish me luck, amigos." He flashed a wink from under the bill of Ellis' cap, at no particular person, and bolted.

Ellis lurched for him, but reacted too slowly, fingers closing on air as the Spaniard moved on light steps toward the front doors of the mall. Rochelle, too, started to move, but Coach had her by an elbow before she'd made it more than a few steps. She twisted around as if to fight him, but he held firm. The sudden gesture froze the entire team, and nobody advanced when Coach spoke.

"Fussin' is only gonna bring them zombies' eyes over here." he hissed, low, and her eyes widened a little. "Let him try. He ain't goin' far."

Frustrated, Rochelle jerked her chin back around to watch as Chris ducked through one of the doorframes, just empty metal around the remnants of broken glass shards. He picked his way over the glass with some success, moving mostly through the footsteps they'd left behind that had disturbed the glass. Their previous passage left him places to step that weren't terribly noisy.

Chris escaped out onto the stonework in front of the mall, where the soft U shape of the building and the cap of metal fencing at the end sheltered him. No zombies had come in that far and not ended up inside the mall itself. He darted instantly to the side, pressing close against the leftmost wall, creeping carefully toward the end of the mall's entranceway, where the square opened up in all directions.

If he could get to the edge, aim the fob out around the corner of the building, directly at the crowd of vehicles...

Nick watched from where he stood, feeling a drained sort of agitation. Don't get killed, kid. Vague anger was all he could muster.

I owe you a slap, still.
Chapter 254

Slow and light, delicate, Chris crept along the adobe stone wall that pressed into his back. He couldn't fight the quick breaths that passed in and out of his chest, shallow enough that his fingertips went numb, as if in the subtlest suffocation. It had been a consistent feeling surging through him since he'd stepped through the dressing room doors to find Nick, collapsed on the floor.

His first thought, of course, had been that Nick was dead.

The panic that flooded him was not wholly unfamiliar, but the feelings that had surrounded that panic were.

When Jerry had died, he'd felt mostly disbelief. Shock, like a world-view had been upended rather than a man's life. When Rochelle had told him Brenda was dead, he'd felt resignation. Walking away from her had been a death sentence in its own right, and he'd known that. That choice had already been made, as far as he was concerned.

This was like heartache, like the thought punched into his chest and gripped his heart with cold claws.

Once, Phil had placed a hand on his shoulder and met his gaze with those mulled, dark eyes. They were so intensely brown that they seemed to be nothing but black, pupil indistinguishable from the iris. They'd held his gaze, firm, and he'd felt fear before he'd known what was going on.

He'd not truly realized the situation he'd gotten himself into until that moment. Until Phil quietly spoke - "Sean's dead." - it hadn't really hit him.

Chris had almost fallen to his knees. He'd almost started to cry. Brock's death and the subsequent splintering of their team hadn't shook him, but losing Sean was like losing an arm. It was a comparison he could make now, after all, and it held true.

It wasn't just the death. It was knowing, without a doubt, that it was his fault.

But before he could so much as wobble, Phil's knuckles had been striking into his jaw. He'd gone down with no resistance, hitting the ground, and a numbness had settled in as he'd looked up to find all eyes on him. If he squinted, they might've been wolfish, glittering red in the darkness as Brenda and Jerry looked down on him.

It was the first time he'd truly bled in front of them, shown real weakness, and for a moment he thought they might pounce - then Phil had gotten him by the collar, dragged him upright to mutter in his ear.

"Don't let them see."

Distraigo. Desvío.

And Christophe had swallowed that instruction like a pill, took it between his molars and crushed it and gulped down the chalky aftertaste. He'd burnished anew his outer shell, the protection of humour and loud exuberance, but a hollowness had grown beneath it that he'd never felt before.

The thought of Ellis being dead had taken his legs out from under him, again. When he'd dropped to his knees and grabbed for Nick's wrist, certain he would feel no pulse, it was all he could do not to break into sobs.

Rochelle had held his hand and he'd wanted to bring it to his lips and kiss it, bury against it, pull her into whatever embrace he could manage with only one arm...

He loved his new team. Maybe he'd never really be part of their insular family, not really - but he loved them. He'd love them like he'd loved Sean, and this time, he'd fight for them. He'd do whatever it took to keep them safe.

He'd die, if that was what had to happen, for any of them.

Hazé cualquier cosa por vosotros.

Pinning himself against the wall, Chris carefully edged closer to the corner of the building. Although the fencing - put up to force people to a queue to reach the mall - had kept most of the infected wandering around at a distance, there was a handful that had clambered over the fences and were staggering idly within the walkways.

They didn't notice him, nor did the ones further on. Most of them were intensely focused on the bodies sprawled across the square, bending down to claw and snuffle at them, more animal curiosity than anything else. The stench that filled the space likely helped keep them distracted, and their own noisy snarling and shrieking hid his footsteps.

He sucked in a sharp breath, slipping close to the very edge of the building. The fencing was flush with the mall's exterior, balanced on wide metal feet. Pressed as tightly to the adobe as he could manage to make himself as small as possible, Chris craned his head around the corner, just enough to see with one squinted eye.

The main tent sat between him and the cluster of police vans. Only the noses of two of the three cars were visible. Biting down on the tip of his tongue, Chris carefully stuck his arm around the corner, directing the end of the key fob as squarely on the cars as he could.

Breathing in, he let his thumb press down on the panic button.

Nothing.

Swearing under his breath with a soft, "¡Mierda!", Christophe drew his arm quickly back in. Maybe it was dead after all, or his current line of sight still wasn't enough. He had no way of knowing, not really.

He stared down at the fob, then twisted his head to look back inside the mall's entrance. He could just see the shaded outline of his team, lingering at the edges of the afternoon sunlight. They were all looking after him, frozen there in the darkness, and he thought he could've picked out Rochelle's silhouette among them.

He smiled, just a little, despite the fear ravaging through him.

Hazé cualquier cosa por ti.

Inhaling smoothly, he put his thumb through the ring on the set of keys, freeing most of his hand to grab onto the edge of the building. His fingertips rasped on the stone, scraping, and he used the grip to steady himself as he leapt in one motion over the fencing.

His heel struck the metal, rattling the fence as he vaulted over it. Every metal rod and fastening to it shook with the impact, jangling, and as he dropped into a half-crouch on the other side, his eyes lifted to see the couple infected stuck in the maze of the queue snap their heads to look at him.

Instinct said freeze, as if they might not process if he just stood still - but he overrode it. Without waiting to see what they'd do, Chris turned, darting back to press against the wall.

The U shape of the building no longer shielded him, but the infected scattered densely across the stone-tiled square were not looking in his direction. The few that weren't actively fighting or investigating corpses had their heads in their hands, digging nails into their cheeks and foreheads until they pierced the skin and gushed out thick streaks of blood.

Behind him, there was a crash, and he couldn't help but dart a glance over his shoulder.

The infected in the queue had started to charge toward him, but didn't have the agility to vault the fences. Instead, one had leapt into the fencing, knocking it over. The fencing fell straight into the piece parallel to it, and the sounds of their collision and subsequent clattering to the ground was not masked by all the ambient shrieking.

Chris focused forward, determined, or too deep in to turn back. He lunged forward a few steps, circling the tent without leaving the relative safety of the mall's exterior. He could see infected reacting, snapping around to look toward the commotion - not, mercifully, at him.

Maybe they recognized their own, because although a number of them faced the noise and screamed, arms flung wide, few actually ran to investigate. It was anger and protest, the horde stirred like dogs howling back and forth.

It was a distraction, just for long enough.

As the bulk of the vans came into view, Chris lifted the fob again, squinting under the crawling tickle of a drop of sweat threatening at his left eye. The vivid sensations played out by his muscles and nerves, imagined or otherwise, had him gripping it with both hands.

"Get some, baby." he hissed, a vague mimicry of Ellis' intonation.

His thumb had barely even fully depressed when an alarm whooped to life, lights flashing dimly.

It was the furthest van from him. Not only did the siren kick off in a spiralling tune, but the horn started to bleat in a steady rhythm underneath it. The reaction to it was instantaneous. What had been a buzzing layer of snarls turned into screaming, so loud that he felt it vibrate in his bones, like the helicopter that had flown low overhead.

Chris choked back a laugh as he pressed himself as tightly against the wall behind him as he could, head swiveling to appreciate the sight for just a moment.

All the infected filling the square turned on a dime, attention laser-focused on the shrill alarm. They clouded toward it, so much motion blurring his vision that it was almost dizzying.

He grinned, chest tightening, skin gone warm with an eager pleasure. Was the team cheering? Were they proud of him? He knew he should've been moving already, but viewing his success was an indulgence he couldn't resist.

As the first few infected hit the van, climbing atop it to beat at it with their fists and knees, Chris' eyes caught on a single shape in the mix that was not moving.

He couldn't help but look it over, grin giving way to a frown as the crowd of infected seeped away, thinning around the shape, giving him a better view - and it a better view of him. His heart skipped a beat when it turned to look at him, and cold seeped into his chest in the absence of his pulse.

Hollow eyes stared at him, its head tilting in a sharp tick to the side. Most of its cheek was missing, raw muscle clotted up with black blood and grit. Short dark hair was wildly scattered across its face, stuck in bunches on the wet and tacky sections of its face.

Its body was covered in blood and dirt, rust and black colours soaked into its clothing - familiar clothing.

The slim boots, scuffed and paled from their dusky black. The black pants, crusted over with fluids of varying colour. The purple blouse with soft ruffling, most of which was torn off, holes and tears dotting it. It was dirtied all over but completely soaked through around the abdomen and down to her pelvis, blood like pitch and tar. Like she'd bled out; like her belly was raw and open under the shredded fabric.

His old leader stood there, looking at him with a snarl written onto her features as if drawn into her flesh with a knife. It was not the expression he remembered of her; the cool, composed sneer that looked down on everyone nearby. It was animal. Visceral.

She looked at him, yet looked through him.

He'd hallucinated them before. He'd seen all of them, mixed amongst the infected. He'd heard their voices. He'd felt them - Jerry's knife against his skin, Brenda's breath on his ear - as real as if they stood before him. This felt different; the sight of her was terribly, vividly different.

But she was just another image painted on his mind's eye.

She was not real.

"Estás muerta." he whispered, chanted, gritting his teeth. He would not succumb to her; he would not let her take the small amounts of peace he'd sewn together. He would stand his ground, for once. "Te has ido."

And then she turned to run, merging suddenly into the horde around her, disappearing as suddenly as she'd come into view. She was gone, not even that dingy purple showing amongst the greyed bodies that piled onto the car.

He couldn't keep his eyes on her, stumbling forward a half-step. His hands reached vaguely out, fingers spread as if in plea. He didn't know what he meant by the gesture; did he want her to stop? To come back?

Maybe he just wanted to touch her, to confirm that his hands passed through her, like they would a ghost.

His hands -

Shock overwhelmed him, like the numb seconds after jumping into ice-cold water. Gasping in air, his gaze shifted to look down, staring for just a moment at the empty air where his left arm should have been. He'd extended it out to join the other, unthinking.

As he stared, he felt his lost fingers tightening and clenching. Pain spasmed through them, then the whole hand, then up his forearm, panicked signals jolting through the imagined limb. That pain, the pain he thought had disappeared for good, resurfped.

He was frozen, immobilized, and then he was moving.
Christophe was distantly aware of the keys dropping from his hand, thrown to the ground. He bolted, not bothering to stick close to the mall's exterior this time. He ran like he was being chased - and wasn't he?

The infected that had already seen him had never been swayed by the car alarm; as he sprinted back to the entrance of the mall, they were clambering over the last of the queue fencing. Had he waited even a second longer, they'd have beaten him to the corner of the building and blocked his path, forced him to use the gun bouncing heavily in his pocket.

Hissing a harsh breath out, Chris let his momentum shift, heel grinding hard into the stone below his feet to turn him sharply as he came to the edge of the mall, and jumped.

Adrenaline got him over the fence and back into the penned-in entranceway, just yards from the doors, and his team. Adrenaline kept his footing stable when he landed, instinctively accounting for the strange balance of his body. Adrenaline numbed the pain and tension of his muscles. Adrenaline put a lid on the emotions thrashing urgently in his chest.

Adrenaline did not take the edge off the pain pulsating down his left arm.
"I'm surrounded by big-headed, idiot men."

Rochelle groaned, lifting a hand to press the tips of her fingers into her eyes. She'd built up a headache in the few seconds since Christophe disappeared around the corner, pulse pounding in her throat.

"I give up on all of you. I'm serious. I'm done."

Nobody responded, except for the hand that touched softly between her shoulderblades. When she looked, it was Ellis standing next to her, a frown twisting at his mouth that mirrored her own.

She turned into him, face burying against his shoulder, and he swept one arm to circle around her shoulders in silence. His arm tightened, drawing her into a squeezing grip.

"He knows whut he's doin'." he murmured - though for some reason, Rochelle couldn't fight the sense that he didn't fully believe it himself. That was a shock. "He's been at this just's long as we have."

She started to lift her head, to look up at him and see what she could glean from his eyes. He hasn't been confident about anything, lately, but since when did that include Chris? He's always had complete faith in the guy, even when I was too scared to get my hopes up.

Before she could find a way to vocalize the question, an alarm kicked into life from in front of the mall. Frenetic honking joined it, bleating out a flat tone, and the sound only just drowned out the screaming that rose in response.

Instantly, Ellis had flashed forward, releasing Rochelle in favour of punching a fist up over his head. "Hell yeah!"

The gesture was too much, it seemed, for his unsteady balance, and he staggered at an angle from his own slung weight. The stumble put him close enough to Coach that the big man reached out reflexively to grab his arm and stabilize him.

"That's it, buddy!" he huffed, restraining himself from an outright shout, though his voice was unlikely to carry much beyond the front doors with all the noise happening beyond. His energy waned as quickly as it had come, leaning hard into Coach's grip, but his enthusiasm remained. "Come on back, now!"

But Chris did not appear.

Slowly, in faded unison, they all stepped up to the very edge of the mall's front doors. They lined the entranceway in a loose and staggered row, looking out as infected streamed across the square. They flocked to the sound, and trying to count them as they passed made Rochelle's head spin.

He had a gun, she forcibly reminded herself - but what if he dropped it, or was too exhausted to aim it? Was it out of ammunition? I should've checked. I should've made sure, while we had a minute. He can't reload it with one hand!

"Where is -" Ellis started to whisper, uncertainty winning out over his excitement, but he didn't finish the question before he was interrupted. He couldn't mask his surprise when Nick muttered, low, from behind them.
"I'm counting to ten, and then I'm going to go get the armless dumbshit."

Ellis jerked his head around, blinking at the gambler where he stood a few feet back. Nick's eyes were low, shoulders high and tight, and he only stiffened further under Ellis' gaze. A softness quirked at the edges of Ellis' mouth, a gentle longing.

Nobody poised to argue. Lena and Rhiannon stood just behind Rochelle, and they shared a small glance, loaded - but in silence, they wielded their weapons a little higher, a little tighter. Maybe they'd simply resigned to throwing their lot in with the team surrounding them, or maybe they readied with sincerity. It was hard to tell.

"Okay." the Georgian breathed. "Ten'n'we go. Horde or no."

Rochelle squinted her eyes, keeping them forward, pretending she didn't recognize that quiet little lovesick hitch in his voice. She'd heard it before, listening to him talk about Nick, back when things between the men had been simpler - back when everything had been simpler. Strange, to feel nostalgia for days that still sat firmly under the label 'apocalypse'.

She focused, instead, on counting down those precious few seconds. She didn't realize she'd been holding her breath until her lungs started to ache, and sucking in air to fill them took active effort.

They did not end up putting their resolve to the test. She hadn't reached 'four' when a flash of dark green darted around the corner as Chris flung himself over the fencing, stumbling just a step upon landing. His arm shot out to counterbalance himself, straightening out, and he ran toward them at full pelt.

Relief didn't fully encapsulate the feeling that passed over her. There was relief and gratitude, but anger, too. Some pride, buried underneath. She wanted to box him in the nose, but she also wanted to plant a kiss right over his dumb grin.

A dumb grin, she realized slowly, that he did not possess. His dark-toned skin flushed with something she could only describe as horror. There were infected chasing him, clambering over the fencing that made up the queue, but the look on his face was not the simple fear of self-preservation. It was more raw than that.

Coach stiffened, raising his shotgun, but Rochelle quickly thrust up her hand to halt the motion.

"Too loud." she reminded him, turning away when he nodded. The woman lifted her stun baton into a two-handed grip, jerking her chin toward the infected. "Nick?"

The gambler started forward without a word, moving at a broad stride that propelled him through the open frames that made up the front of the mall. Rochelle was close on his heels, rushing into a short jog to pull up beside him. They advanced to meet Chris a few feet beyond the mall's entrance, both survivors parting to let him run between and past them.

The Spaniard looked small. It was an obtuse observation considering the amount of body mass he was simply lacking, yet she couldn't shake the thought. He was strangely deflated, curling in on himself. She'd seen him go through a litany of emotions, but she hadn't seen him like that since the moments before they'd kissed.

Rochelle wanted to stop and check on him, make sure he was alright - or something close to alright, at least - but the infected charging at them would not wait for her. There was no more than a moment to trade glances, and no way to communicate what she wanted to in that one look.

One glance was not enough.
The three infected sprinted down the slim stone walkway leading into the mall's foyer, and both Rochelle and Nick stepped forward to intercept them. The gambler's arms raised to draw his katana over his shoulder, ready to swing, and Rochelle darted a couple steps to the side to avoid crossing into the path of his blade.

One of the zombies strayed from the group, angling toward Rochelle, and she jabbed out with the end of her stun baton as it came within reach. The tip jammed into the bridge of its nose, and a quick flick of her thumb activated the electric charge. She held it for just a pulse, enough to send a seize of tension through its frame and interrupt its footsteps.

As it staggered, she retreated a step, turning at her waist to get the strength of her upper body behind a strike to the side of its head. The blow, combined with the unsteadiness of its limbs following the shock, sent it sprawling to the ground.

Letting momentum carry her into a step, Rochelle brought the heel of her boot down on its skull. It took a twist, grinding her weight, but she heard - and felt - a strange crunch.

Rather than look and see the damage done, she hopped her weight off that foot and bolted to close the gap between her and Nick. He'd lopped the head off one infected, gore sputtering from the rent flesh where the body lay by his feet, but the other was now charging him.

He couldn't get his sword in place in time to strike, so all he could do was lift the grip and shove, catching the zombie against the chest. Its clawing left hand struck home, but Rochelle couldn't tell where exactly. Nick lurched away with a swear, twisting his body to recoil from the blow.

Sprinting up behind the female infected, Rochelle gripped both hands on the end of her baton. She gritted out a noise of exertion as she landed the metal weapon right into the crook between the zombie's head and neck, directly into its vertebral column.

Its chin snapped up, body thrust forward with the impact, but she didn't break its neck like she'd hoped. It shrieked in pain, whirling to face Rochelle, arms lashing up to claw for her. She hissed in a breath, trying to get her baton up and braced to hold it at bay.

Then it halted.

The strip of glinting metal that pierced through the middle of its face in a smooth glide was quickly overtaken by a flood of blackened blood, spilling down its features. They did not go slack, even as the focus faded from its eyes, rage maintained in the twist and tension of its facial muscles.

As the infected slumped to the ground, Nick came into view behind it, both fists clenched around the hilt of his katana. He let it drop, panting, blood streaking along his cheekbone where a pair of twin lines had been torn in his skin. Pain lit low over his expression, gaze darting up to match Rochelle's.

"Are you -?" he gasped out, vague, broken off before he reached that damning last word. Like if he doesn't say it out loud, she mused, you can't prove he meant it.

Rochelle panted a laugh and nodded. "I'm fine."

Turning on her heel, she redirected her focus back to Christophe. The man stood a few feet back, arm tucked neatly over his chest and fingers clutched on the collar of his polo. His eyes were focused past them, looking out into the square, and he didn't seem to notice her gaze - nor her approach, when she walked toward him.

Something was wrong, that much was apparent. But logic won out over her concern; the car alarm was still wailing, but they didn't have forever. It would shut off soon, if the horde crowded around it didn't break it outright first.

"We need to go!" she called, breaking into a sprint back toward the mall's front doors. Rather than trust Chris to follow, Rochelle snagged his shirt at the waist as she ran past. She felt him stumble, but he quickly regained his footing, and she let him go once he'd begun to run at her flank. Nick's footsteps joined them, crunching on glass as they leapt through the mall's entrance.

The moment they'd reached the tiled interior, the rest of the survivors set off running back further into the mall. Ellis was running on his own and seemed more stable, but Rhiannon was still locked in a tight embrace with Lena, the two sisters lagging behind a few paces as they ran unsteadily. The thunder of their joint footsteps echoed, just loud enough to be heard over the screeching car alarm, and growing to overtake it as they retreated further inside and the siren grew a bit more distant.

None of them slowed, however, skidding to a stop just long enough for Coach to lift his head and point down the left side of the mall's interior.

Everyone followed as he bolted in the same direction. As Rochelle lurched out into the center of the mall in pursuit of them, her eyes caught on an unlit exit sign hung on the underside of the second-story balcony. It was aligned with a perpendicular hallway, a mirror of the ones on the upper floor, and their best chance at a back door.

She turned her head, glancing over her shoulder, finding Chris and Nick close behind her. Both of them seemed winded, and only Christophe tried to brighten up when she looked at him. It was a soft look, a gentle acknowledgement.

Rochelle wrinkled her face up in her best attempt at anger she didn't really feel. Don't do that to me again. it said - though judging by the way Chris fell to a smile, unsuccessfully.

"Keep movin'!" Coach barked, and Rochelle had to snap to attention. She forced her body to face back forward, accelerating to catch up with the rest of her teammates. There would be plenty of time to regroup and check on everyone once they were out of immediate danger.

Back to their delicate peace, in a busted-up seaside cafe, with no better idea for rescue than they'd had weeks ago, and maybe less hope. Was she foolish for wanting to believe that the helicopter - even with its crash - was a good sign? If someone is still sending military choppers this way, then they can't have completely given up. And the fact that there's even still military out there at all...

As much as she wanted to think something positive, she was also not interested in getting overly distracted. Thinking wouldn't get them anywhere, for better or worse, and she had plenty to think about.

Running at least kept her mind busy in the meantime.
Chapter 256

Although the survivors' luck had turned sour in the moments surrounding the helicopter crash, it had not entirely abandoned them. By the time they burst through the rear fire escape, there were no infected to be seen.

Any zombies that had been milling around the back or wandering the streets along the mall's rear had been roused by the alarm and cleared out. Although the outdoors hardly felt safe with the car still wailing into the late afternoon sky, infected screaming in time with it, their escape still felt like a victory.

None of them were quite confident enough to say so, however... or talk at all, except for the necessary curt phrases to coordinate their way out. Coach's grim silence set the tone more than anything else.

He held the fire escape door open, one arm extended out to brush against whatever he could reach of his teammates as they passed by him. It was not so far from that pre-game ritual, counting out his football players, one at a time. He touched a shoulder, an elbow, a hip - a tender headcount, full of worry.

Coach only moved once his palm touched Rochelle's arm, the last to stumble out into the slim space between the mall's exterior and the chain-link fence boxing them in. The door eased sluggishly shut behind them with a belated chunk.

His gaze darted left, then right. There was a gate a few yards down, and it hung open a few inches. A chain dangled from its outer edge and indicated that it had once been secured. He hadn't been looking forward to trying to climb the fence, so that was a relief.

"That alarm ain't gonna go forever." Coach muttered, moving before the words fully left him.

Footsteps followed in his wake in easy obedience, and some surprise crept over him when Nick's dark profile pushed into his periphery. The man didn't look directly at anyone, let alone Coach. He just stared on ahead beneath low-lidded eyes, walking stiffly, mechanically.

It seemed less like a conscious effort to move to the front of the pack, and more like an attempt to escape the claustrophobia of the bodies huddled in close behind them. He had regained colour in his cheeks, at least, since he'd come out of the dressing room only half-conscious; since the Witch.

He chewed on the inside of his cheek, catching flesh between his molars and biting down before he released the tension in his jaw with a sigh. Wonder if Ellis'd make any sense of this... I gotta tell him, don't I? Gotta tell him and Ro', both, even if Nick'd hate me over it. This ain't about politics.

Coach was afraid, for the first time in a while.

Stopped bein' about keepin' peace when he started talkin' to Witches.

He couldn't gather his thoughts long enough to list out the questions he had, but he knew it wasn't the time for conversation. They were balanced on a razor's edge, emotionally, and there was a not-insignificant walk between them and their base.

There'd be time later - to figure out what was wrong with Nick, to discuss the helicopter, to plan their next move - but 'later' did not satisfy the white-knuckled anxiety in his chest.
It's always later, feels like.

"Let's get."

They slowed now that they were outside, a mixture of caution and awareness of Rhiannon's hobbled pace. The survivors darted through the open gate and followed along the chain-link fencing as it met with the rear edge of the mall. Rather than continue along the mall's exterior, they broke off, crossing the road to reach the block adjacent to the mall's rear alleyway.

A tiny gas station lay between them and the next parallel street, asphalt surrounding three rows of pump stations and a building that seemed too small to contain anything but space for an attendant. The structure was bleach-white and, Coach quickly noticed, marked across the side with green spray-paint.

'FUCK CARRIERS'

Unease twisted through his gut. His hands fist ed, tightened, certain that the phrase referred to the sprawl of bodies in the mall square, and the tragedy that had caused it. There were a few scenarios that played out in his head.

It could have been that Carriers had gotten into a crowd and begun to turn other people. Or, the simple presence of a confirmed Carrier - through whatever test they had - had sent the police into a panic. Maybe there had been a horde, and the overrunning of the mall square had been completely irrelevant to the presence of Carriers.

If they were contagious, how was it transmitted? Was it airborne? He'd never thought to wonder. Had Carmine been doomed the moment she'd opened her door, or had it been the contact with Nick? Surely society wouldn't have collapsed so quickly if it required a bite or contact with bodily fluid.

If he wracked his brain, he could hear Rochelle's voice. Hadn't she always assured them it was airborne? It was airborne, so they'd already been exposed and proven immune, and getting wounded or bitten didn't matter.

If they were Carriers, harboring the virus, didn't that mean they were contagious in the same fashion? That would give the government ample reason to, at best, refuse them refuge... at worst, shoot them on sight. He couldn't blame them, really, if that were the case.

No time. he reminded himself, glancing quickly to take stock of the bodies around him. Nick was the only one staring at the message writ out in blocky letters, as everyone else had their gazes furtively lowered or directed elsewhere. Ellis had his lower lip bitten, staring at the ground.

Christophe was looking square at Coach with something like weariness in his eyes. It said, "Told you."

Rochelle was busy looking at Ellis with some worry, and the sisters were hunched close until their temples touched, expressions mirrors of reserved distance. They did not look surprised.

No time. Later. Always goddamn later.

Quietly shaking his head, Coach reached out to grab Nick's elbow. The contact jolted Nick's attention back to his surroundings, and the ex-football player hustled forward without letting go. The Northerner followed the pull without protest, and they rounded the corner of the building to reach the sidewalk on the other side of the block.
Then, with no warning at all, the alarm stopped.

Although normal human instinct said to stop and look, they had enough sense among them to bolt. Coach did sneak a quick glance, just enough to confirm that there wasn't any infected in immediate pursuit of them. The tents sat between them and the now-silent van, but there was nothing stopping the horde from scattering now and getting on their trail.

The gas station lot didn't provide much cover, but the next building would completely cut line of sight between them and the square in front of the mall.

So they ran.

They had only just breached the next block, sprinting into the relative safety of the building's shadow, when a set of grunts sounded behind him. Coach jerked instantly to look over his shoulder, finding Lena and Rhiannon barely keeping their footing, the blonde's body sagging hard as she reached down to grab at her knee.

"Fuck -" she gasped out, expression split evenly between anger and pain. The increased pace was taking a toll on her, that much was obvious, and her grip on Lena's zippered hoodie was straining the fabric. "Shitting ankle keeps rolling."

A small panicked bob touched Rochelle's head, looking between the injured woman and Coach where he'd frozen on the sidewalk. "Maybe we should take a look at it. She kicked a door in. If she fractured her ankle, we shouldn't let her walk on it..."

"I'll look at it when we get back." the blonde countered, scowling gently down toward her injured foot. "Not like we can do shit about it until then, anyway."

Ellis lifted his hand, pressing the palm of his hand against the crown of his head. "I carried her earlier, I can -"

"Not carry her all the way to base, son." Coach shook his head, ignoring the way Ellis deflated. The teacher turned on his heel and shouldered his shotgun to free his other one, and as he approached the tightly huddled sisters, he reached out to place a palm on either of their outward-facing shoulders.

His gaze, however, was firmly matched with Rhiannon's. She blinked back at him, her initial spike of tension quickly tempered. "None of us are in a shape to. So you gotta push through fo' now. Until we get home. A'ight, Rhee?"

The blonde's muddy eyes sparked with a flash-fire of gritty pride, pushing a hobbled inch closer to grin up at him. "For you? Sure."

Coach squeezed her shoulder with a small huff of laughter, sparing a glance toward Lena long enough to get an affirming nod from the woman. He backed up, turning to look toward Ellis. "Hey, why don't you take her other arm? If y'all can keep her off that foot, we'll keep the zombies off y'all."

"Course!" Ellis rushed into motion, practically tripping over himself to reach Rhiannon's side and duck his head in invitation.

She looked at him sourly, even as she looped her arm around his neck. Drawing the grip a little tight, hooking her wrist under his throat, she squeezed him into a rough headlock. "It's the three hurt fucknuts, all peas in a pod." she barked, cheerily, wrenching her weight to make him choke out a squawked sound. "Make it easy for the next asshole Charger."
It should have bothered him. He should have panicked, like he did when a Jockey had him by the neck, feet ground into his chest, reminding him so viscerally of Jerry.

But he didn't.

Had he gotten stronger - gotten over it? Or was he just too empty to muster up the emotional response? He wasn't sure.

Rather than fight, Ellis went limp, cutting a grin sideways and upwards at her from where his head had been yanked down. "I'll protect yuh." he promised in a - mostly - feigned wheeze. She was stronger than her lanky frame telegraphed.

She snorted, releasing her chokehold on him to instead twine fingers in the heavy material of his jacket sleeve, just at his shoulder. The renewed grip had her supported on either side, now, and she lifted her injured foot entirely off the ground. "Okay, pretty-boy. If you say so. Let's get the fuck out of here, huh?"

In the small space of time allowed to them by the pause, Christophe had quietly padded up to Nick's elbow, observing the man's face where Nick studied the grip he had on his katana. He watched, with no subtlety, and the other man ignored him with just as little.

"Nico -" the Spaniard started to murmur tenderly, but Nick's head snapped up and cut him off with a flat blink of dark green eyes. The younger man put his hand up, fingers splayed, in a gesture of surrender. "I just mean to ask if you are okay...?"

Forcing out an unsteady breath, Nick grunted out, "Take that stupid thing off." in place of an answer. He darted his gaze downwards, shrugging into a step that started him walking again, following Coach as he took off along the sidewalk.

Christophe didn't take his eyes off Nick, turning to follow him, putting his hand on top of the blue trucker cap fitted over his head. He sighed, slumping his shoulders, and warily fell into line behind the Northerner.

"At least he is angry again." he mumbled to himself, wryly.

Rochelle slipped to take up the rear, ushering on the clumsy trio of Ellis, Rhiannon, and Lena, nervously rotating at the waist to look behind them. "Let's go, guys. Last thing we need is to lose daylight."

"How are you so skinny and so freakin' heavy?" Lena groaned, tightening her arm around her sister's waist. They started into motion, the first step awkward and mistimed, but the next falling into a rhythm. Ellis and Lena stepped first, holding Rhiannon's weight as she matched them, barely letting her injured foot touch the ground. "You're so dense."

The blonde snapped back, "Your mom's dense."

"Our mom's dense." was Lena's gentle-toned correction.
Nick didn't imagine he'd be capable of feeling anything but disgust at the sight of the seagull statues scattered across the yard of the restaurant. A copper-coloured one, perched atop a stake and peeping at him from under a spread wing, met his gaze with unnatural acuity for an inanimate object.

He never thought he'd feel relief.

The walk home had been less eventful than the walk out. A Jockey had come at them from an open doorway, only to lose most of its face to a blast from Coach's shotgun. A couple infected had charged them, but Rochelle and Christophe had dealt with them, her wielding Lena's brush hook and Chris his machete.

There was something panicked in how he fought, like he was hyper-aware of how close he was to disaster at any given moment. There was fear in his posture preceding every swing, and fear following it - but Rochelle stayed close by, and her presence seemed to bolster him enough to continue.

The sounds of agitated infected had circled them the entire walk back. The helicopter must have flown in close over the route they walked, but far enough away that it had drawn infected off their path. It was, no doubt, clearer than it would have been otherwise.

By the time they reached the restaurant, Lena had given out. It had only taken one stumble, her face gone pale, for Ellis to quietly side-step in front of Rhiannon and drop into a crouch. He didn't give off the air of someone who'd take no for an answer, stubbornly putting his hands back, so Rhiannon wasn't left with much choice but to climb on.

Ellis had only been carrying her like that, piggy-back, for a short while. Still, he was not at his strongest, and while Rhiannon was slender, she was also tall.

As he stepped onto the scrubby yard, boot grinding in the sandy earth, he halted. Sweat traveled down his cheek and tickled its way through the scruff that was building up on his jaw. "Alright, ma'am, end'uh the line." he panted out, bending over gently to allow her to slide off. "Thanks fer travelin' the Ellis Railway."

Rhiannon landed hard on her uninjured leg, grabbing either of his shoulders to stabilize herself. The moment she'd gotten upright, she leaned in to set her chin on the back of her left hand where it rested on his shoulder. "Don't ma'am me, you prick. Do I look like a ma'am to you?"

"We're born and bred Georgia boys." Coach sighed out, a grumbled breath, gilded with the faintest affection. Ellis peeked at Rhiannon from over his shoulder, his mouth stuck open as he panted. "Everyone's a ma'am to us."

She squinted at him, then pushed with both her palms to make him stagger a step forward. "Stupid country boys."

Ellis caught his balance, whipping his head around to look at her, confusion plain across his face. He reached up an arm, using his whole forearm to wipe sweat from his brow. He'd tied his denim jacket around his waist. "Uh... Ain't you from Texas?"

"Yeah. And it's crammed full of stupid country boys." The blonde grinned, broadly, cracked canine on full display. She started forward, motions tender as she hobbled on her injured foot. "Let's go get something to eat, huh? I'm fuckin' starved."

Nick gazed up at the restaurant's front. Nothing seemed disturbed, no windows broken into. Their base looked much the same as they'd left it - nothing had broken in. Or out.

He started forward, moving quicker than he meant to. The emotion that bubbled up in his chest was so much simpler than everything else he'd been feeling. He didn't have to explain himself to Maggie, at least, nor would she look at him with concern. The cat would just be glad to see him, and that would be that.

Rochelle's voice called after him, but he barely processed the words, or the scattered laughter that followed it. "Got a date, suit?"

Scaling the small set of stairs leading into the screened-in porch at the front of the building, Nick pushed through the screen door. He ducked around it, sliding up to the restaurant's main door and twisting the knob to shove it open.

It was dim inside, with what little light entered through the slim windows blocked and coloured by the seagull stickers pasted over the glass. He blinked, trying to get his vision to adjust, darting a glance over the top of the shoulder-high wall separating him from the rest of the restaurant. He didn't immediately see movement.

Clicking his tongue, Nick took a step forward, setting his katana down against the wall behind him so it leaned against the protrusion of the doorframe. He moved down the corridor formed by the half-wall, and halted at the end, hands gently fisted at his thighs.

"Hey, brat. Where are you hiding?" he called out, self-aware enough to drop it to a mutter, like he might avoid the rest of his team hearing him.

At first, he thought, there was no response. He could hear footsteps approaching the front door, and he felt some strange urgency. He knew he'd done a shit job of disguising how much he liked the petite feline, but that didn't mean he'd crawl around on hands and knees looking for her while his team laughed at him.

Then, the black on black of a shadow became speckled with a creamy orange, and two owlish eyes peeped out from under one of the chairs they'd pushed out of the way to make room for their sprawl of blankets.

She'd curled up on the edge of the soft surface, and was in the process of standing, back legs stretching out behind her in small kicks. Her tail perked up, quirking curiously into a tiny loop at the tip.

Relief flooded him in full force, then, a sigh escaping his lips. "There you are." he grunted, dropping into a crouch. He set his elbows on his thighs, letting one hand stretch out, unable to resist a small smile when she sped her motions to hurry forward. "Bet you're hungry, huh?"

Then, inches from the tips of his fingers, she halted. Her nose twitched, whiskers alert, mouth opening a little as she huffed in air.

Those heavily saturated orange eyes flickered. Her pupils were already blown wide in the dark, but they seemed to widen even further, black overtaking the pumpkin colour ringing it. He didn't have time to react before the cat lashed out at his outstretched hand.

He felt the strike like dull pressure, hand jerking back instinctively. He hated the sensation that flooded him: hurt.
The pain came secondarily, and he didn't bother to look. She'd cut a slice across the backs of his fingers, from the first knuckle of his index finger to the last knuckle of his ring finger. It would bleed, but it wasn't deep.

"The fuck?" he managed, unable to do more than stiffen when she bolted. He barely stopped himself from reaching out to grab for her when she streaked past him, logic saying that he'd get nothing but claws and teeth for his efforts. That didn't stop him from scrambling to his feet, sneakers giving an unfamiliar squeak on the wood floor. "Hey!"

He ran, but went no further than a few steps into the corridor, grinding to a halt as the knowledge that he'd never catch her sunk in. She was a flash of dark colour, and Rochelle yelped as she jumped back against the open door, her fearful reaction making room for the cat to scrabble out the door. A couple more yells - Ellis', then Lena's - announced her egress through the porch, and then there was silence.

Rochelle slowly shifted her gaze toward Nick, eyes wide and widening. Gentle, cautious, she murmured, "Sweetie...?"

Anger wanted to rise. He felt it banging on the inner walls of his chest, heightened by the adrenaline that had his pulse up, and the pain that cut across his knuckles. He wanted to be angry, but something else washed over him: exhaustion.

He just wanted to sleep.

Rochelle must've seen something in his expression, because she tenderly pulled away from the door, holding a hand on it until Coach's slipped into view to prop it open. "She probably didn't recognize you. The new clothes and everything. You probably smell different."

Slowly, he raised his sliced hand, looking down at the injury. Blood was welling up in a thick line, red turning darker as it gained mass. He gritted his teeth, letting his eyes half-close.

Gotta kick me when I'm down, huh?

He felt some distant surprise when a hand touched his, and looked up to meet Rochelle's gaze. She gently slipped her fingers under his palm, lifting his hand up to examine the cut. She bit her tongue, chewing on it softly, before looking back up at him. "Are you okay?"

Nick forced himself to take a step back, blowing out a thin laugh. "Peachy." was all he said; flat, simple. It took effort to muster anything past monosyllabism. He lifted his hand, touching fingertips to the dual cuts across his cheek, flesh torn raggedly by nails skating across the surface.

He didn't miss her concern. So, he tried; he made an effort, even though it felt like pulling his esophagus out with a pair of pliers, putting on some approximation of a smirk. "Apocalypse is trying to make me into mincemeat."

Rochelle looked at him with a raised brow, dubious, but she took enough pity on him to snort. "Yeah, well, she took a hunk out of me earlier, so I guess we're even." She glanced over her shoulder, seeing where Ellis and Coach were somewhat awkwardly piled into the corridor behind them, Chris and the sisters stuffed into the doorway. "Go sit. I'll get you some bandages."

The idea of putting up a fight crossed Nick's mind, but he just sighed and turned away. Circling the half-wall, he let himself fall into the first booth that sat against it. He didn't realize how much he'd enjoy sitting down until he landed - he'd been so dizzy for so long, the world seemed to continue to spin around him even now that he'd settled.
He let an elbow rest against the table, getting the fingers of his uninjured hand pressed against the bridge of his nose. He sighed, deflating his chest, trying to tune out the sounds of motion around him.

His head was so full, it ached. He didn't know how to sort through it, how to categorize it.

Normal people find someone to talk to. he noted wryly. But you've just got yourself, now.

Turning his chin slightly, he flattened his hand, letting himself nuzzle blindly against his own palm. The darkness was soothing, if nothing else. Okay. So you fucked up with Ellis again - twice, actually, today. Really driving home the mixed messages. You were too busy having a fucking mental breakdown to even be present for missing the first shot at a rescue we've ever had... assuming they'd rescue us and not put us all down for being infected.

The blast of air from his nostrils was somewhere between a sigh and a laugh, but he quickly sobered.

You're seeing shit, hearing shit, and three people know it. Meaning everybody will know it by morning. That put a hard knot in his chest. Maybe Coach didn't hear... maybe he didn't hear what I said. He didn't mention it, right? He never asked. They were fighting infected. Maybe he missed it.

Ellis would connect the dots, if he found out, that much Nick knew for sure. The unfortunate thing was, Ellis listened to him. Took him to heart. He would remember the name, and he'd realize Nick hadn't told him the whole story. He'd stick his nose into it, because that was what the Georgian did best.

So, you're fucked.

Neato.

Normally, he'd have felt panicked, and reacted like a cornered animal. That, however, took energy - and he was completely out of that. He mostly just wanted to laugh at himself.

The rustle of fabric on wood sounded as a body slid into the booth opposite him, along with the faint sound of a few things being set down on the table. He opened his eyes, expecting to see Rochelle.

Coach blinked back at him, pausing in the middle of cracking open a tube of antibiotic ointment. There was genuine concern on his features, devoid of any conflicting annoyance or gruff disapproval. He just looked... attentive.

It made Nick balk long enough to force the big man to speak up.

"Maggie cut you?" There was concern to his voice, though it seemed like a rhetorical question. He finally broke his focus on Nick's face, looking down at the tube in his grip. "Thought the li'l thang was fond of you."

Clearing his throat felt necessary to talk, but Nick was not pleased with how uncomfortable it made him seem. "Yeah, well. We locked her up all day. She was probably just glad to get some air."

Nick twisted his head, looking around the room, taking stock of where the rest of the survivors were rather than look at the other man.

Chris and Rochelle at the bar, the sisters seated at the far table in the upper corner of the restaurant's L-shape, Ellis nowhere to be seen and likely in the kitchen or the bathroom behind them...
Fingers touched his wrist.

Nick snapped his gaze back forward, watching with some tension as Coach used a small wad of toilet paper to daub away the blood that had built up around his knuckles. He wanted to recoil, but a sensible part of him jumped on the chance to speak with Coach first, before anyone else.

The ungreased wheels in the back of his mind started grinding into motion again - but clumsy and desperate, he jumped the gun. He'd never been patient, but he used to know how to be manipulative, at least. Not desperate.

And he felt desperate.

"Look, Sam, about earlier..." He paused, like he expected Coach to say something. When the man merely arched a brow and applied some pressure with his thumb to the still-bleeding stripe across Nick's middle finger, the gambler was forced to sigh. He dropped his voice to a murmur. "You and me both know everyone'll panic if they hear shit about me collapsing, or whatever -"

"Thought it was a headache." Coach returned, quick, and his eyes flicked up to scan Nick's expression, gauging.

"You know what I mean." Nick reached his free hand up, rubbing at his eyes. It was evasive, and Coach grunted before returning his attention to Nick's hand. "Point is, I'm fine now, so there's no reason to get the girls upset. Right?"

The ex-football player leaned in, carefully taking a dollop of ointment onto his fingertip and lightly daubed it along the wound. "You know what our problem is, Nick? We don't like bein' weak. You hold it all in, knot yo'self up tryin' to keep it all inside, like you'll bleed out if you open up. I did that my whole damn marriage, an' you been doin' that your whole life, ain't you?"

Nick didn't move his head or open his eyes. "I don't need a fucking lecture."

Coach laughed, abruptly, a small snort bouncing his hefty shoulders. "Nicolas, you need a damn seminar, but that ain't my point. We're more alike than you wanna think, Nick." His fingers lifted, leaving the gambler's hand on the table. Paper rustled, softly, as he opened a packaged bandage. "It's half why I'm so bad at talkin' to you."

Without saying a word, Nick squeezed his eyes just that much tighter. A dull humour rose up. "I'd probably be better off if I was more like you."

"You remember after we got Chris stable? We started fightin' over somethin' stupid." Coach's voice was gentle, behind an exhaustion. "Ellis hurt himself, an' you got mad at us fo' gettin' mad at him. You were spittin' fire, like usual - and then you got dizzy, almost fell over. You had a fever."

Nick opened his eyes, lifting his head an inch, just enough to look over his knuckles at the other man. He sat, silent, expression falling to a firm emptiness. Coach wasn't looking at him; he was focused downwards, and Nick could feel a band-aid being wrapped around the midline of his middle finger. "I remember."

Coach didn't stop working, didn't raise his attention. Kept his voice low. "What... happened today, Nick? It ever happen before? Before the apocalypse, I mean. An' how much did it feel like what happened back in the pawn shop?"

A frown twitched at Nick's mouth, straightening just slightly. He couldn't stop his gaze from darting over the room, confirming that no one seemed interested in the conversation. "What are you getting at?"
Coach sighed, gustily, his crinkled features drawing into a sour expression. He murmured, "My dad had a stroke back in '96, and -"

Nick's arm recoiled in a flash. He might've stood up entirely, fled the booth, but as quickly as he'd recoiled his right arm, Coach grabbed the wrist of his left to keep him there. His grip was crushing, enough that Nick's jaw tightened, eyes flashing to meet the older man's gaze.

He was aware, distantly, that the room was dead silent around them. The shock of it all petered out in favour of violent self-awareness: the last thing he wanted was to make the conversation public. The urge to rip his arm free became quickly stifling, suffocating.

"A... stroke? Seriously?" he hissed, as quietly as he could. "You think -"

Coach shook his head, voice so low, it rasped. "I ain't sayin' nothin'. I don't know nothin', Nicolas, and I don't know up from down these days. I just also know needin' help ain't a weakness." He pulled, then, forcing Nick to slide a couple inches further into the booth, a simple gesture that forced him to settle. Even had Nick wanted to fight, he wasn't sure he'd have been successful.

The older man slipped to stand, a frown lingering on his lips. "You sit here, and you get some rest, Nick. You think on it. Think on what I asked. And I'll be here, if you wanna talk about it."

Processing did not happen easily. Nick felt his jaw slacken, watching Coach turn and walk away, feeling air thrust up and struggle at his throat. It threatened to turn into words, but did nothing except puff out past his lips. He didn't know what to say.

Nick stared, gaze growing distant and slowly lowering until it landed on the surface of the table before him. The smart thing to do would have been to think. He should've sat there and thought, tried to remember the hazy details of his collapse, tried to piece it together and consider it. Weigh it.

Instead, he slid sideways, sinking to lay across the booth's bench, and closed his eyes. He surrendered to the easy pull of shutting down.

In the darkness behind his eyelids, he didn't have to think.
"It hurt here?"

Coach passed a supportive smile up to Rhiannon when she shook her head. She was seated on the edge of one of the sturdy rounded tables in the middle of the restaurant, and he’d kneeled down in front of her, her boot and sock shucked to bare her injured foot. He gently cradled her heel in his palm, thumbs of his other hand pressing against the rounded shape of her ankle bone, following it up along the fibula.

When she gave no reaction, he shifted to palpate over the skin surrounding it, digging fingertips into the muscle around the bone. He followed it along the joint, pressing firmly over the top of her foot, right where it met with her shin.

"Ow." she stated, blandly, eyes narrowing subtly and leg hitching up a few inches. "Fucker."

A snort escaped him, pulling his hands away and letting her foot rest against his raised knee. "She'll be fine." he uttered, raising his voice. He shook his head, humoured, when Lena practically slumped with relief where she stood beside him. "It's just a muscle sprain. Not swellin'. After we eat, we'll get you some ibuprofen, let it rest."

"So we don't have to cut it off?" Lena gasped, blustering out a relieved whine and thrusting forward a step to loop her arms around Rhiannon's shoulders. "My baby's okay!" she cooed, squeezing and rocking them both back and forth a few inches.

The blonde instantly started fighting, pushing at her, but she didn't commit enough force behind the gesture to actually free herself. "Fuck off!"

Coach pulled back, getting to his feet with amusement crinkling the edges of his eyes as he crossed his arms. "Take it easy, though. Just 'cause it ain't broken doesn't mean you can't make it worse." he instructed, eyes rolling up when neither woman acknowledged him. He blew out a breath through his nostrils, turning away.

Chris and Rochelle had taken stools at the bar, and they sat in silence. The Spaniard looked rigid, eyes firmly on his clenched hand, and Rochelle's posture spoke to a shyness. She curled her legs up, heels braced on the crossbars between the stool's legs. Her body was gently turned away from Chris even as her head drooped to rest against his right shoulder, eyes closed.

They were okay for now. That suited him just fine, because Ellis was next on his list.

Nick had been at the top, naturally, but there was nothing else to do but wait and see. He was taken care of for the time being, like a cut temporarily staunched. Rhiannon had been next, and she'd been good news. He was glad for good news, but he couldn't rest yet, not until he'd checked on Ellis.

They'd barely entered the restaurant before the young Georgian had quietly peeled off. Coach had noticed immediately, but he hadn't wanted to draw immediate attention to it. There had been call to jump Nick while the man was still at least a little vulnerable. Ellis, on the other hand, likely needed a few minutes alone - so he'd given the youth a few minutes, given him some space.

Breathing deep, the ex-football player crossed the restaurant. He quietly walked past the bar, and Christophe's eyes flickered to follow him as he came into the man's view. It was questioning, but Chris didn't stop him.
He simply flicked his gaze hard to the right, and Coach followed it to see Ellis' hat sitting on the bar. The big man paused just long enough to reach out and grab the cap, tucking it into the pocket of his thin red windbreaker. He nodded gratefully, and Chris nodded back, muting the gesture so as to not jostle Rochelle where she rested against him.

It was tempting to wonder at the two, but he resisted. Got myself waist-deep in one romantic mess, and I ain't much help there. Keep my nose out of this one.

As he advanced, Coach put his shoulder forward to open the kitchen door, swinging it on its hinges with the force of a step's momentum. His gaze darted around the room, hunting out Ellis' familiar form. He shortly found it hunched over the stainless steel counter on the other side of the room.

If he'd gotten a concussion, the symptoms might have been delayed. He'd seen it take a day or more for the side effects to kick in fully.

Panic flashed through him, but he stifled it, maintaining a calm tone. "Ellis? You okay? Feelin' sick?" His calm didn't stop him from hurrying, quickly crossing the cafe's kitchen to come up behind the young Georgian. Coach set a hand on the space between Ellis' shoulderblades, relieved when his curly-haired head lifted.

"No." Ellis murmured, and his voice was honest, if still winded. "I'm a'ight. I just..."

Coach let silence hang for a moment, examining what he could see of the kid's face. A frown sat there, thoughtful, uncharacteristically hard to read and lingering even after he messily completed his thought.

"Today was bad, Coach. It was real bad."

The eldest survivor sighed, and the breath took much more out of him than he expected. He couldn't stop it, exhaling until his chest collapsed. It came with the uncomfortable sensation that he could feel the inner walls of his lungs press against one another. He let his chin drop. "Yeah."

He expected another spell of silence, and then received anything but.

"I could'uh reached out and touched that whirlybird, you know? It was so close. And there was people in it. I don't think they made it outta that crash, Coach, so where's that leave us?" Ellis' head shook gently, and he shifted, setting his elbow against the counter so he could cradle his chin against his palm. "I really thought we'd get it. Maybe it was dumb, but I... really did."

Ellis tapped his thumb against his jaw, eyes slowly closing. "I was standin' there, watchin' it tilt, watchin' it go down - you know what I thought?" A tender whine left him. "After all the bein' scared was over, I stood there, 'n'I was thinkin'... whut's Nick gonna say?"

Resisting the sudden urge to hang his head, Coach raised his hands instead, pressing his palms against the rounded bone behind either of his ears. He laced his fingers around the back of his head, squeezing there. "Ellis..." he murmured, a breathy attempt at an interruption that went unacknowledged.

"I was thinkin' about a lot, y'know, but I was mostly thinkin' 'bout him, how he was gonna react. Feels like I always think 'bout him." The tiniest laugh escaped the younger man, instead, a sour twist to it that Coach barely recognized. "Any time my brain ain't on somethin', it goes tuh him... Shit, any time it's on anythin' at all, half the time it's goin' tuh him anyway."

The brunette tipped his head, frown growing to a thoughtful quirk. "I ain't never been like that before. Even when there was this girl I... thought I really liked, it ain't like I'd think about her all the time. Not like this. Makes me feel real stupid, if I'm bein' honest."

Coach stood, silent at first, squeezing and then releasing the tension in his hands, over and over, in pulses on the crown of his head. He slowly turned, letting his hip touch the edge of the metal counter to face back out into the center of the kitchen rather than look straight at Ellis.

He could have said nothing at all, and simply let Ellis keep going. He'd keep going, after all.

Samuel breathed in slowly, letting the sound rasp through his throat as his chest expanded, and he let his whole body slump with the following exhale. "I felt like that 'bout my wife." he murmured, aware of how Ellis suddenly looked up at him. He crossed his arms over his chest, tucking his hands into his armpits. "Since high school. Got engaged in college. Barely breathed if she wasn't around."

His brow arched lightly, gauging the faint colour growing over Ellis' face at his words.

"What? I say somethin'?"

Quickly ducking his head, Ellis lifted his hand, scrubbing a knuckle against the bridge of his nose. "N-no, just... you comparin' us tuh you'n'your wife... I guess I didn't think you..." He trailed off, struggling, but Coach was paying enough attention to catch the gist of it, and it saddened him a little.

Did he come off unsupportive? Judgemental? It wouldn't be the first time he'd heard the criticisms, but it felt like a blow coming from Ellis, unintentional or not. He'd never meant to give that impression - or, worse, the impression that he didn't care. He cared desperately.

"Approved?" the big man supplied, snorting when Ellis' mouth popped open in protest, only confirming the sentiment. "Ellis, I know I ain't always treated you like it, but you a grown man. You're gonna make yo' own choices, and just because they end up hurtin' don't mean they were wrong. Besides..."

It was his turn to trail off, but Ellis didn't prompt him; he just stared with those stone-blue eyes, expectant.

*I ain't so sure I was right about any of it. he wanted to say. I'm lookin' at Nick, watchin' the man fall apart, an' it's lookin' more and more like he's fallin' apart 'cause of you. I can't look at him without seein' sufferin'. I never thought he was the kind of man to hurt like that, but... Either I was wrong, or he ain't the same as he used to be."

*Maybe it's a bit of both."

"If anyone could make a tiger change his stripes, it's you." escaped him, a compromise between honesty and saying nothing at all. It was a dispassionate version of how he felt - mostly removed from the specifics of their situation.

Judging by the way Ellis lit up, grinning, it was an ineffective smokescreen. However, before Coach could even fully appreciate the expression, Ellis‘ expression was already falling. He looked down at the counter, examining the blurry reflection of his face in the silvered metal, visage like an oil painting sprawled across the scuffed surface.

"You don't believe in him, though." he murmured, abrupt uncertainty making his head bob. "I don't mean tuh argue or nothin', just... you were warnin' me away from him fer a while, right? When you thought I, uh, y'know... Before you knew we were actually datin'. You think he's bad fer me."
Coach grunted, feeling his expression twist into a grimace, more weariness than discomfort. He lowered his gaze, examining his shoes as he carefully crossed his legs, letting his weight rest against the edge of the counter. "He an' I go like oil and water, sometimes, son. You know that. But I care 'bout the man, warts an' all."

Ellis snorted gently, brows tangling up over his eyes. "Yeah. Me, too." His face settled on a small frown that was more thoughtful than upset. Appeased at that, maybe.

A moment passed between them, bloated but comfortable, before Coach took his chance.

Coach leaned closer, driven to lower his voice. "Ellis... I got somethin' to ask you. We all gotta talk, but I want to ask you first, just you an' me, a'ight?" When the younger man's attention jolted up, concern lighting in his eyes, Coach quickly raised his hands in a soothing gesture. "It ain't nothin' scary, son, I just want yo' thoughts."

Slowly, Ellis straightened, lifting off the counter to stand at his full height. He drew his arms into a cross over his chest, taking a half-step closer. The concern had gone mild but not disappeared entirely. "Okay. Shoot."

With a soft sigh, Coach slipped his hands into the pockets of his new, crisp grey pants. He rolled his weight onto his heels, feeling the all-too-familiar numb twang of pressure around his kneecap. He'd been considering how to broach the subject since they'd left the mall, and he hadn't settled on any good answers.

Beating around the bush wouldn't do it, however.

Rapping his thumb against his hip, Coach rolled his head on his neck, feeling something snap in an unpleasant stutter of tendon and bone. His eyes closed, steeling himself in the momentary darkness. "How much do you know 'bout Nick? His past, I mean."

When Coach's eyes reopened, the other man was examining him closely, a frown pulling at his lips. "Why're you askin' about that?" He'd anticipated panic, worry - but as Ellis processed the question, what came was far from it. The mechanic's shoulders bristled with an insecure energy, but the calm in his tone suggested it wasn't really directed at Coach. "I don't know a whole lot."

Without averting his gaze, the ex-football player jerked his chin up. "Name Brett mean anythin' to you?"

Ellis' head started to shake, but he hadn't fully completed the motion before recognition flared in his eyes. It was replaced just as quickly by confusion. "Y-yeah... that's... that's just someone from when he was a kid. He told me... a story, a while back. I don't see why it'd be comin' up now." He seemed to re-focus with an abrupt frown. "When did he tell you 'bout this?"

"What kind of story we talkin'?" Coach pressed. He knew his mouth was drawn into an unpleasant twist, and his tone wasn't the soothing, questioning cadence he wanted it to be. "This a friend? Family?"

He watched as Ellis' posture closed off to him, arms crossing tightly over his chest. The gesture bared the dense redness over the back of his forearm, where the Spitter acid had burned his skin raw. It wasn't bleeding actively, clotting having turned it into a fragile, membranous scab. "Coach, why're you askin'? You know he's awful weird about tellin' folk stuff. If he didn't tell you the whole story, I ain't gonna. I... Just 'cause we ain't doin' great, don't mean I wanna go betrayin' trust he put in me earlier, more than I already did."
He'd thought Ellis might have some insight - more than he'd manage on his own, at least - and he hadn't been wrong.

It felt like a slap in the face.

Coach's expression fell, thought making his gaze wander upwards. Nick had asked him not to talk about what happened, after all, and the man's private nature was no great surprise. Was it actually the right call to go around him? Would that be constructive, or merely agitate the situation further? There seemed little point in spreading the information if Nick himself wasn't open to discussing it.

Maybe... let him get some rest, try talkin' to him again after we all get some food. If I can coax him into talkin' to everyone himself, it'll be better than us cornerin' him. That ain't never gone well.

Ellis' hand suddenly touched his wrist, and Coach was yanked back into the moment, looking the younger Georgian's face over with a wary frown. Everything had melted away except a soft, open concern. "You okay, man? Did somethin' happen? Is somethin' wrong?"

A small smile caught Coach before he could stifle it. He shifted his arm, reaching out to set his palm on Ellis' shoulder. "No... no, I think it's a'ight. You're right, Ellis. That's helpful. Ain't fair, me askin' you that. I'll figure shit out."

The young man listened, head slowly nodding, but his gaze remained solidly on Coach's face and his response was firm. "Should I... be worryin'?" His brows tangled, an eagerness touching his voice. "I thought he was actin' funny, but I figured it was 'cause of missin' the whirlybird... Should I go talk tuh him?"

Coach let his head lower, a sigh escaping him. He closed his eyes, shaking his head in a quick wag. "Leave it fo' now, son. Let me work on it. Him."

Ellis hadn't moved an inch - not physically, and not in his expression. He was unconvinced.

"Look, Ellis..." The larger man put his other hand on Ellis' other shoulder, squeezing both of them. "I didn't mean to get you worked up, but I think you're hittin' on somethin' here. Us talkin' behind his back ain't gonna get us nowhere, right? Give me a day. If I ain't made no progress by then, I'll fill you in."

Slowly, subtly, Ellis' lips curved in a small frown. "Yeah, man. I get you." He released a sigh, shoulders lowering under Coach's hands, his stone-blue eyes wearily drifting toward the ground between them. "Can you just... tell me if he's okay?"

Coach looked him over, a grit popping the tendon of his jaw. He did not know the answer to that question, among many. He tightened his grip before releasing Ellis, taking a step back, widening the gap between them. "I'm gonna make sure he is, son. I promise."

The slight doubt that darted up over the younger man's eyes should have stirred offense at the lack of faith in him, but Ellis' blunt response startled him out of it and right into simple humour.

"Y'know, yer the one who said y'all go like oil'n'water. He might not listen tuh you."

Unable to resist a laugh, Coach reached up, curling the fingers of his left hand into a loose fist and tapping them against Ellis' right ear in a mock-box. He pushed his other hand into the pocket of his jacket, bringing out Ellis' cap and pushing it into his hand. "Get yo' ass back out there, boy. I don't need this shit. We got mouths to feed."

The slight grin that spread over Ellis' face was cheeky before it mellowed to a soft sadness, lowering his chin as he lifted his cap and screwed it in place atop his head. He obediently ducked away from the big man, retreating toward the door to the main section of the restaurant.
However, neither of their smiles lasted through the threshold.

Both of them knew that Ellis was not, after all, incorrect.
Their food supplies were running low.

The downside to the rest they'd gotten, holed up while Lena recovered, was that it made it very easy to get bored. Adrenaline and anxiety took a toll on their appetite, but inactivity gnawed at their self-control. When boredom came, there were two options to relieve the sensation and find comfort: sleep or eat.

As a consequence, they'd gone through all the trailmix and bagged snacks they'd found. Most of what was left was packaged meals and canned goods of varying appeal. Ellis gravitated immediately toward the two boxes of macaroni and cheese they had. The idea of some hot, artificial cheese seemed extraordinarily pleasant.

Two boxes would not, however, feed everyone.

Ellis grabbed them anyway, tucking them under an arm, and continued to poke curiously through the dwindling pile of boxes and cans they had left. A fat can of baked beans caught his eye, and he scooped that up, too. With the two mac boxes under his arm and the can wielded in that hand, his other arm was free to reach up and brace a palm against the bar as he got back up from his kneeling position.

He realized, then, that several sets of eyes were on him. Chris and Rochelle sat at the bar a few feet in front of him, and Rhiannon and Lena sat at the table in the deeper portion of the L-shaped restaurant. Coach had split the difference, resting against the inner corner splitting the two wings of the restaurant.

"Guess we better go get the gennie runnin' again." he offered up, tone rushed to mask the flash of insecurity that rose up under the scrutiny. "Unless y'all wanna crunch on raw macaroni."

The closest he got to a laugh was the way Rochelle's eyes crinkled gently, but that was the limit of the reaction. He withheld a sigh, the silence a weight pressing on his shoulders. He didn't know if it was just exhaustion or the belated disappointment of their failed rescue attempt, but the energy in the restaurant had fallen steeply.

Nick's curled form in the booth, unmoving, did not help - not that he usually contributed much to a jovial atmosphere.

That observation almost made Ellis stop to think, and as he felt the oncoming pressure of it, he started his body into motion. He didn't take the time to consider his plan of attack, or consider much of anything. He just moved.

His peripheral vision caught movement as Coach lifted a hand toward him, as if to reach out and stop him, but the gesture was aborted as quickly as it had begun.

Rather than question into the motion, Ellis found himself marching to the back door, pushing through and stepping out onto the small porch that bordered the scrubby fenced-in backyard. The outbuilding that housed the generator was across the space, a few feet of sandy earth making up the path between.

He stared blankly for just a moment, acknowledging the burden on his left arm only belatedly. He'd carried the food with him. It wasn't a drastically poor decision to make, but he realized then that Coach had probably been pointing out as much, rather than trying to stop him outright.
A sigh tumbled from his lips, eyes falling closed.

It was Brett... shit. Brett S-somethin'. That night, when Ro' and Coach went out on their own, when they met up with Chris, 'n'that big ol' storm kicked up -

He'd been injured, chest half-collapsed by the pressure of a boot on his sternum; it had been damage, in hindsight, that should have left him bedridden for so much longer than it had. Nick had worried over him, the lingering grief of their near-death experience slung into the simple pleasure of touch and closeness. Nick had needed him, desperately.

And he'd needed Nick.

They'd held each other close against the cracks of thunder, and they'd traded stories. He'd told Nick about his mother and father, the story of how they met, and the older man had spoken of a teacher from his childhood. It had been clear how much the memory meant to him.

Now, Ellis was confident he didn't have the full story.

As difficult as it had been to walk away from the conversation without prying, he truly believed what he'd said to Coach. Conspiring behind Nick's back had never worked well, and if Nick wasn't the one to tell him, what would be the point? If he'd told Coach what little he knew, what would've been the point?

It was all easy to say - and, he felt, the right thing to do - but keeping his mind off it now was almost impossible. Resisting the urge to walk right up to Nick and demand an explanation was a physically strenuous effort.

Why'd it even come up? When the hell would it'uv come up? He shifted, letting his free hand raise up, rubbing fingertips into the bridge of his nose. I thought it was funny, him callin' a teacher by his first name, but I didn't think anythin' of it. Just figured they was close. Why's he tellin' Coach anythin'?

Maybe his feelings were just a little hurt at the idea of what had been an important and private moment becoming, clearly, a bit less private. A groan left him at the thought, stomping either foot in a childish gesture of bodily frustration, forcing his eyes open again to look out into the yard.

"I should'uh kissed him." he grunted, weary.

A cleared throat sent him nearly out of his skin.

Whipping around on his heel, nearly dropping the food in his grip, Ellis felt his gut drop out as his gaze landed on Lena where she had her head poked out from the door behind him. He'd not fully closed the door, it seemed, as she'd pushed halfway out without much of a sound.

Shit, shit, shit. I can't keep muh damn mouth shut.

Her expression snapped to neutral as he looked at her, but he was confident she'd been fighting a smile a split-second earlier. A dimple struggled in and out of sight on her left cheek.

"Thought I'd watch your back." she offered, and when he seemed frozen before her, she slipped out onto the porch and approached a few steps. Her hands moved to pry the boxes from under his arm, taking them under hers instead, and she held out a hand flat toward the can in his grip. "Rhiannon's fine, by the way. Coach looked her ankle over."

He thought of the look she'd passed him, playing their game of 'Two Truths and A Lie'. He'd accepted the idea that she knew he wasn't straight, though that information felt raw and fresh to him, let alone to a relative stranger. He could only hope she hadn't made any inferences about him and Nick.

At least she was keeping it to herself, if so.

Ellis forced himself to laugh, the sound more a choke than anything else. He had to coax his hand to relax, setting the can in her grasp. "Uh - good! Good. 'M glad. I was just gonna turn on the gennie, so, uh -" The muscles of his jaw ached as he managed an awkward grin. "I'll go do that."

The woman nodded, weight leaning back casually onto a heel. "Good." she responded easily.

"Okay." escaped Ellis like a whine, turning to scramble toward the small set of stairs that spanned the height difference between the porch and the earth. He took the set in one lunge, left boot landing first, scrub-clotted ground squeaking gently under his heel.

He'd hoped she might stay on the porch while he got into the generator shed, but soft footsteps behind him indicated otherwise. With no better alternative to vent his anxiety, he started to babble. "I ain't sure if this's gonna be any good... we ain't got any butter or milk or nothin', so it'll be kinda plain, I guess." He bobbed his head a few times in thought, picking up steam before he could stop himself. "My mama used tuh put pumpkin in mac'n'cheese - I know it sounds weird, but it's better than you'd think. Kinda creamy."

The shed had a lock, but it dangled open on the doorlatch. He pushed the door open, sliding into the slim interior, barely wide enough to comfortably stand inside amidst the shelves and the generator on the ground.

Lena's voice, low, floated from close behind him. "Doesn't sound weird. You ever had tomato pie? Tomatoes, cheese, some herbs, all in a pie crust. Mom made them." A kind of melancholy touched her sigh. "Cripes, it's been a long time since I had a good tomato pie."

Ellis couldn't help a grin, anxiety fading as he found purchase in an innocuous conversation. "Hot damn, girl, we're in Georgia, 'course I have." He thumbed at his jaw thoughtfully. "Muh buddy Keith's got this grandma. She churned out pies like nobody's business. Sweet potato, buttermilk, chess pies -"

A giggle interrupted him, morphed quickly into a groan, faux pain dousing her response. "Dude, we're about to eat watered-down macaroni and beans. Please stop."

He laughed, reaching down to rest one hand on the generator, bracing himself. The generator was simply operated with a nearly palm-sized red panel of plastic controls. There were a few open plugs, along with the thick plastic cord that trailed out and up to the wall-mounted breakerbox where it hooked into the building's electrical system.

It was a simple matter of flipping the fat switch labeled ON/OFF. The metal casing rattled softly as it chugged to life, but the generator wasn't awfully loud. It hadn't drawn much attention the first time beyond bringing a few infected snarling and growling around the back fence, and he wasn't highly concerned about it the second go around.

He did, however, hurry to back out of the shed and close the door. It muffled the sound to a simple vibration, and he patted his hands on his thighs as he turned to face the Texan standing behind him. "You started it." he retorted.

She smiled, gently - but then it faded. Her green-brown hazel eyes drifted to the right, and she reached her free hand behind her back. "Um, I have something for you. I wasn't sure about it, but all that crap in the mall happened pretty quick, so I just grabbed it." Her weight shifted, shoulders raising as she seemed to fish something from the back of her pants' waistband.

Ellis' eyes widened from under the bill of his cap, watching her pull free a tightly folded square of faded, grungy yellow fabric. He knew what it was well before she turned it over, displaying the text of 'IFTERS' in soft ink.

His heart surged warmly. He looked up at her face, catching the uncertainty there, the fractional worry - and he scrambled forward, grabbing the shirt from her hands, words coming too fast to manage a coherent question. "Oh - shit, how'd - when did you -"

Lena laughed at him outright, looping her now-free arm under the burden carried in her other arm, tilting her head. "You were looking so dang upset at it when you were taking it off, I figured it meant something to you. And we don't have a whole lot to hold onto these days, so, I... I guess I took a risk on it being stupid."

Ellis gently pulled the shirt against his chest, gripping fingers in the familiar, worn fabric. He couldn't explain the flood of emotion that threatened at him. It wasn't about the shirt - not really. It was the kindness, maybe, and the gesture itself.

Then again, it very possibly wasn't about Lena or the shirt at all.

He laughed, the sound giddier than he meant, and shoved forward on instinct. His arms caught her in a hug, closing around the outside of her arms to trap them at her sides, squeezing tightly. As his chin pressed against her shoulder, he closed his eyes, swallowing the lump in his throat. "Thanks, girl."

A gust of air left her, an awkward wheeze, unable to do anything to return the hug except put her empty right hand on his hip and pat gently. "Uh... so not stupid?"

Ellis shook his head, forcing himself to let her go before the embrace lingered too long. He slid back, hands coming to rest against her biceps, palms pressed tight to the leather that made up the sleeves of her jacket. "N-no. I, uh... it means a lot. It ain't stupid."

Her lips curved into a smile that put a squint on her soft almond eyes, and the awkwardness in her expression faded in favour of wary apology. She twisted her voice into a Texan accent, harsher than his - and easy, like maybe fighting it off was the hard part. "So... reckon that means I'm forgiven?"

That made his head snap to the side, cocked, a brow lifting. He let her go completely, taking a sizeable step back. "Fer... whut?" he uttered, genuine confusion setting his gaze on a flickered wander over her face.

Lena slipped her lower lip between her teeth, rolling it there, before she nodded her chin up. "The... thing with Chris. I didn't mean to stick my nose into something, and it seemed like it stirred up some crap. I really didn't want to hurt anyone."

Ellis' posture lowered a twitch, shoulders dropping, and he shook his head in a quick gesture. "No, no. You didn't know any better." He reached out, nudging a curled knuckle against her bicep. "Besides. It's good, me knowin' the truth. I'm happy you came'n'talked tuh me. We ain't known each other that long, but I appreciate it."

She was looking at him, softly, and her eyes pooled with some gentle emotion that he could do nothing more than acknowledge. He tried to read it, but could barely focus on her expression before she'd blinked her eyes and tipped her chin down. Tension washed it all away to a dull smile that did not carry those laugh-lines to the corners of her eyes.

"You're way too nice." she managed with a bright little laugh. It was not insincere, yet it was hard to take at face value, now. It was with sudden clarity, sudden focus, that Ellis reminded himself of a simple fact.

Lena had been with Nick alongside Coach.

As had Christophe.

He could have grabbed her arm and asked her. He almost did, in fact, but two things held him back. Firstly, empathy; she'd already been placed in the middle of things she didn't understand. Secondly, his own words to Coach came back to haunt him. Even if he plied her for information, what good would it do?

She likely had no context for what she'd seen or heard, if anything, and he couldn't do much with the knowledge. Even if he spoke with her or Chris, what would it matter if Nick didn't talk to him? He needed to hear it - whatever it was, and whoever Brett really was - from Nick.

That left only one option, and certainty came with a degree of calm.

Where he had felt full of pressure under a frantic seal, rattling and cracking at his edges, he suddenly felt it relieved. He tightened his grip on the folded T-shirt in his left hand, focusing himself enough to smile. "You think you can ride shotgun with me in the kitchen?"

Lena passed a smile over her shoulder, the expression gentler, and nodded. "Sure, sunshine."

Coach had asked him for a day. He'd give him the time, though he hated the idea of doing nothing when something was wrong with Nick and he was best positioned to help. He wanted to act rashly, to rush in, and knowing better didn't dissuade the desire.

Still, maybe applying a bit of pressure wouldn't be out of the question.

Maybe it was about time to toe the line that had been blurred back in that dressing room.
The sounds of conversation and scattered laughter from the kitchen was soothing, Chris found. He liked hearing Ellis laugh. It was altogether one of the most pleasant noises to hear in the grim days of the apocalypse, when there was little pleasure to be found.

Another was Rochelle's voice, but that had been difficult to tease out since they'd returned to base. She'd been rested against his shoulder for a while. The contact confusing, after she'd so explicitly refused his advances in the mall. He wasn't strictly upset, but it was hard not to have his pride wounded. Worse, though, was the uncertainty.

When she'd first wordlessly settled beside him, he'd been unsure what to do. Kissing had been strictly off-limits. Was it too much to put his arm around her? Draw her against his chest, set his cheek against her forehead? He wanted to do all of it, but the last thing he wanted to do was over-step the boundary she'd set... and she hadn't been very clear.

To be safe, he stilled himself, simply enjoying the warmth and softness of the contact, the offered intimacy. At least she still wanted to be near him.

His eyes wandered the room, tracing the shapes of his teammates. Nick had not so much as stirred since Coach and he had had their argument, and Coach had been similarly quiet. The entire team had been quiet, in fact, until Lena and Ellis had sequestered themselves in the kitchen.

He looked toward Coach, finding the man looking back at him. They observed each other in some quiet stand-off, staring for a few moments before Christophe cocked his head gently, glancing toward the booth that contained the unconscious gambler. His slim brow arched in an exaggerated query.

When he looked back, Coach was shaking his head.

Some frustration made Chris' breath huff out, reluctantly dropping his gaze to the ground. It seemed so backwards, so wrong, to do nothing. When he'd needed somebody, Nick had been there, twice now. Now it was Nick's turn to need somebody, and he felt inadequate.

His phantom left arm still hurt. It seemed to hang limp at his side, spasms passing through muscle and tendon, and it took everything he had not to show it. He felt exhausted, like the pain itself had drained his strength.

It came in waves and always in tandem with his panic. He'd been in the restaurant the first time it had happened, and imagined the voices of his old teammates, the tactile sensation of a knife tip in the small of his back. Then again, on the way to the mall, when infected had surrounded him and he'd seen nothing but the faces of the Angels of Death in the crowd.

Now, once more, a hallucination of his old leader had driven the nails of his phantom hand to dig into his palm, cutting skin he didn't have, the pain a crushing pressure. Her presence had been so much more tangible than it had ever been before. She'd looked at him, and he'd looked at her, and it had seemed so real.

Christophe closed his eyes, trying to remember how it had felt when Ellis had propped up the mirror to his hip and he'd seen himself in the reflection. The illusion of wholeness had soothed something in him. Even though he knew his arm was gone, seeing it move - or at least appear to move - had helped.
He tried to remember how it had felt to pull the trigger, to fire into the concrete the very bullet that he'd once wanted to fire through the roof of his mouth. That had helped plenty.

However, no matter what he did, the pain did not subside. The more he thought about it, in fact, the more it seemed to worsen. Rochelle's presence comforted him, but did nothing for the pain. He focused instead on keeping his body as relaxed as possible and hoping she wouldn't notice.

Me tranquilizo. he urged, inhaling slowly through his nostrils. Is no good to lose your head. Ellis said it would come back. It will go away.

He exhaled, slower. It will go away.

The kitchen door swung open, and from it, Ellis padded out with a plate in either hand. He'd been mid-sentence, the words catapulting suddenly into focus as he entered the main room of the restaurant. "- tellin' you. It was all fun'n'games until the cops showed up. Keith still ain't allowed within a hundred yards'uh any Six Flags. They had his picture up and everythin'."

As she followed in his wake, Lena's expression was strained between entertainment and wild confusion.

She had four plates in her grip with three on her right arm, a potentially perilous balance that seemed second nature. They were placed in a tiered pattern encircling her thumb, the third braced mostly on her forearm.

"Is he for real?" the brunette tossed out, gaze darting amongst the faces she could see from where she stood. When Coach merely brightened into a small grin at her, she sighed, advancing toward the bar. "Soup's on. Still on the fence if it's any good or not."

As Lena set down the plate in her left hand and slid it in front of Rochelle, the woman's head lifted from Chris' shoulder, rotating on her stool with a quick kick of her heel against the crossbar. Though it had previously looked like she was asleep or at least dozing, her movement gave no indication of drowsiness. "Thanks, you two."

Lena smiled gently, using her now-free hand to take the plate off her forearm and set it down in front of Christophe. As she did, her head cocked, glancing over her shoulder at Ellis, who'd halted just beside her. "I've got these guys." she said lazily, nodding her chin in the general direction of Rhiannon and Coach.

He balked, fingers tightening on the dishes in his grasp, watching her as she took one of the two plates balanced on her left arm and rearranged her grip on the other. She moved away without looking at him, attention focused entirely on Coach as she approached him.

Shit. drifted across his mind as he lowered his gaze to examine the two meals in his hands.

One for him.

One for Nick.

He'd been preparing to confront the man, but coming to bear with the reality of it felt very different from the hypothetical. He had no idea how Nick was feeling; the last real interaction they'd had had been in the mall atrium, bodies pressed close, as if - for a sparing few moments - things were back to normal.

Ellis sucked in air, squinting his eyes in a vaguely pained look. Okay, bud. You got this. Ain't got no reason tuh be a scaredy-cat. If anythin', he's the scaredy-cat. You know full well he's in love
He thought it before he'd really considered whether or not it was wise. Forming the concept so bluntly in his head suddenly dropped a leaden weight in his gut. He'd asked himself many times if he was wrong - if Nick really did love him.

The question, he found, had changed.

Now, staring down at the pallid yellow macaroni and dark brown beans in two unceremoniously piled heaps, all he could summon was, Whut if it don't matter anyhow? Nick's stubbornness, his ego, made up the bricks with which he walled himself in. Whut do I do if he admits he's been in love with me this whole time and it don't change nothin'?

It was a massive, towering thought. It loomed so large above him that the only emotional response he could manage was vertigo.

This one time, in high school, Keith'n'me went tuh this swamp plantation with our class. Knees locked, Ellis started moving, letting his feet carry him. If he allowed his brain to slow down to consider his actions, he might've chickened out. S'posed tuh learn shit 'bout the house'n'the folk who used tuh live there, but all he did was end up jumpin' in the lake out back and splashin' around lookin' fer gators tuh wrestle.

The Georgian inhaled deeply through his nose, unfocused vision landing warily on the booth Nick had claimed. He was curled lengthwise on the booth seat, dark sneakers the only thing visible as Ellis approached. He hadn't so much as stirred since they'd arrived at the restaurant.

He ain't never turned down a chance to find gators. Thing is with gator-huntin', is most times, gettin' 'em wrestled is the easy part. Figurin' out whut tuh do with a pissed-off gator after you got it gripped is the hard part.

An absurd flash of humour came as Nick's full coiled form came into view, affection tilting Ellis' head. The man looked small, cold, and the sight of him muted the internal panic Ellis had been fending off into a sudden calm.

I guess you're muh gator, sugar.

The soft whiplash of realizing his own thoughts, of feeling out the unfamiliar term of endearment, made his footsteps stutter. But it was just a secret trapped in his skull, and the flare of shame that followed did not last with no one to answer to.

I ain't lettin' you go, even if I got no damn idea whut tuh do with you now.

Ellis exhaled, then, ducking his chin to shadow his eyes under the bill of his trucker cap. He reached his hands forward, setting both plates down on the table of the booth. He slid one into the middle of the right side of the table, in front of where Nick laid, and pushed the other to the opposite side.

The curly-haired mechanic simply swung his weight, dropping to sit in the booth bench, jeans rustling loudly against the wood as he scooted a bit inwards. As tempting as it was to sit nervously and look over at Nick, gauge if the noise had woken him, Ellis instead dropped his gaze to the plate in front of him. A fork rested on the surface, the very edge of its handle having slid halfway into the baked beans lumped there.

Crossing his legs at the ankles, pressing his toes tightly into the ground, Ellis picked the fork free and lifted it to lick off the brown gravy that marred the metal. He focused squarely down on his plate, distantly admiring the steam rising off the food, and a bit relieved when the beans tasted no worse than he'd expected.

For a moment, he thought Nick wouldn't rise. He started to mull over his next move, consider how obvious he wanted to be in his attempts to get the man's attention, when the smooth edge of the table was suddenly interrupted by a set of fingers.

They curled, gripped, and as tension and pressure was applied to them, the haggard shape of Nick's upper body creaked halfway upright off the bench.

Ellis continued to examine his plate, maintaining a relaxed looseness to his posture. He pretended not to notice as Nick's face came partially into view, one bleary eye laser-focused up at him, half-squinted. Darkness puddled in the soft skin below his eyelid, like a bruise, following the subtle structure of the top edge of his cheekbone.

He froze there, staring dimly, and Ellis couldn't shake the slight pleasure of feeling like he had the upper hand.

With the handle of his utensil now cleaned, he flipped it in his grip, reaching it down to meticulously start spearing beans onto the tines. They were soft and inclined to come apart under the pressure, but he managed a good stack.

Ellis lifted the fork to his mouth, but he'd only gotten it halfway there before Nick's voice, gritty and harsh with sleep, made him halt.

"What are you doing?"

The Georgian allowed his eyes to lift, landing them on Nick's face without quite meeting his gaze, examining the older man where he was still frozen in a strange crane upwards. Rather than respond immediately, he continued to shove his fork into his mouth, clamping his teeth down on the metal.

"Eatin'." he mumbled around it, cocking his head to the side.

Ellis watched for a moment as exhaustion roiled into blunt confusion on Nick's face, then returned his gaze to his plate. He swiveled his wrist to start collecting macaroni on his fork in the same fashion, unable to stop himself from stealing glances at the gambler, utilizing the bill of his cap to mostly obscure his face.

Nick released a few faint sounds of strain and discomfort, and his entire arm tightened as he put his weight on it, forcing himself to wobble upright. He was not stable, precisely; he wavered in his seat as if his body were filled with helium and it was only kept anchored by his now two-handed grip on the table.

He was still staring, and it was hard to read him without focusing on him for more than the few seconds at a time that Ellis could manage. Was his expression soft? Incredulous? Resigned? Did it lack anger and irritation only by virtue of his exhaustion?

"That's not what I -"

The Georgian lifted a pinky from off his fork, pointing it down at the plate in front of Nick. "You should eat, too." he interrupted, mildly, letting his chin raise so he could square his gaze on the Northerner. "Ain't food fer yer eyes."

Nick's attention did not move from their riveted focus on Ellis' face, and the weary intensity of it finally bored a hole in his composure. Heat threatened at his cheeks, and it took everything he had not to clear his throat or drop his head.

Instead, he shifted his voice into a firmer register. "Eat, Nicolas."

The flicker of surprise that crossed Nick’s expression, slackening his features, was tremendously satisfying. The gambler's chin dropped, a few strands of dark hair sliding to cross his temple and tickle at his brow. A sigh strained at his shoulders, and he reached up to grab the fork off his plate.

Ellis hadn't actually expected obedience, and he found himself stilling to watch as the other man scooped up a messy cluster of macaroni noodles and shoveled it into his mouth. Some distaste quirked at his nose, but he chewed and swallowed in silence.

A mostly cooperative Nick was the last thing he thought he'd find in the booth.

The urge to talk more swelled in his chest, but Ellis stifled it down and remained quiet. He bit at the inside of his cheek before looking down at his food, letting hunger drive him into a few hearty mouthfuls. Keep it easy. Slow.

The macaroni and cheese tasted about how he expected it to; lacking the layered flavour added by the milk they didn't have, it was a bit watered-down and tacky on his teeth. The warmth was soothing, though, and he found himself slouching down slightly to quicken his pace, elbows braced on the table.

It was not a companionable silence. Tension sat between them, drying Ellis' mouth and bleaching some of the already mediocre flavour from his food. Nick shifted intermittently, motions mechanical. It seemed like he might simply keep pace, mouthful by mouthful, until he'd finished his meal completely.

However, halfway through, his arm suddenly froze. The tines of his fork rested against the plate, making a soft screech as his fingers trembled and forced it to skate a half-inch over the ceramic. Ellis didn't even have time to swallow his mouthful of bean and mac - a direct mixture of the two, he found, had been a mistake - before Nick spoke again.

"Your head hurt?" he asked, a mutter too rasped to get much emotion from, and it was all Ellis could do not to smile around his quick gulp.

"No." he responded, a half-truth, reaching up to touch fingertips onto the dried blood marking his jaw and temple, where the stone material of the mall's interior had scraped and burst his skin. "It weren't too bad. Better than me hittin' the ground, huh?"

It was supposed to be a joke, an attempt at levity, but the way Nick's jawline flinched said it had missed the mark.

"Are you okay?" he pressed, before the darkly dressed survivor could respond.

Nick slowly picked the tip of his fork up again, using it to prod mindlessly at the food before him. He chased a single bean in a lazy circle, trailing gravy behind it on the ceramic surface. His tone was flat, gusting out of him like a sigh. "What do you want, Overalls?"

That soured Ellis' expression just faintly, and he dipped his head, pushing sincerity into his voice. He lowered it, too, aware of how Nick's frame tensed with every further word. "I just wanted tuh check on you, man. After... earlier." He sensed that his opportunity to speak was limited, and he forced himself not to press his luck and continue much further. "I ain't mad at you. Are you mad at me?"
The gambler's eyes darted up, posture snapping straight, the motion the quickest he'd managed since he'd awoken. His gaze ticked in a slow pass over Ellis’ face, gauging, and there was some subtle trepidation in his pause.

Nick was struggling for composure, for calm, for control. The man inhaled and it trembled at his lips, and the urge to reach over and touch him became almost overwhelming. Sympathy took some of the pleasure out of having the upper hand, it seemed.

"You want to talk about it." Nick observed in a grunt.

When Ellis shifted with a soft squirm of his legs before nodding once, the Northerner lifted his other arm. He braced his elbow against the table, pressing fingertips into the bridge of his nose.

"Thing is, I don't. I really don't." His voice was so quiet that it broke every few syllables, as if he failed to put enough air into it to support the words he spoke. "We almost made a fuckin' mistake, but we didn't. Nothing happened, so there's nothing to talk about."

It was Ellis who first turned his head, looking out into the main area of the restaurant to ensure they had some amount of privacy. Nobody was looking at them, not even Coach. Their five teammates had wandered over toward the other section of the L-shaped restaurant, distance increased between them.

"N- nothin'? You call that nothin'?" he whispered back, unable to flatten the disbelief in his tone. "We almost -"

"But we didn't." Nick interjected, though it was faded. As Ellis looked him over, his whole presence seemed faded and worn. He seemed far-away, still struggling to remain grounded. His gaze wandered to focus on the cushioned backing of the booth behind Ellis' shoulder, unfocused, a humoured snort touching his breath. "I'm usually an expert at fucking my exes."

Taken aback, Ellis felt his grip go limp on his fork. He had to process that for a moment before it sunk in fully, and he screwed his brows up over his eyes as it did.

He'd intended to say, 'We almost kissed.'

He'd simply not thought of what might've happened after that hypothetical kiss. He'd not strictly considered the possibility that that moment in the dressing room, electricity sparking between them, would have escalated in the same fashion things always did with Nick.

He'd certainly not realized that sex had been Nick's intention, or that he'd been thinking about it in those terms.

Now, unbidden, his head spun with a painfully vivid image: the dressing room's low light, Nick pressing him into the wall, fingers rough and hasty on the zipper of his jeans. Goosebumps rose over his arms as he could practically feel teeth nipping at his ear, stubble and hot breath rasping against his neck. Fingers spreading him open, thrusting into him, coaxing his body to relax until...

Pressure pooled suddenly below his navel, body shifting of its own volition, an eager betrayal that he couldn't control. He felt his face lighting up, throat closing in a way that negated any chance he might've had at a response.

He had always viewed physical intimacy as an emotional exchange, a quiet and tender way to express love. He still did, in fact. After all, Nick always hid behind sex like some broad explanation for their relationship, but their intimacy had rarely been purely carnal: they'd needed each other, needed comfort.
The language Nick spoke with was hush and husk, affection muffled under intensity and passion. The number of times that Nick had kissed him rather than talk was beyond counting, but the distraction had never fooled Ellis... even if he’d doubted himself for a little while. Now I just gotta convince him.

The silence that followed seemed to only slowly occur to Nick. He blinked his vision back into focus on Ellis’ face, and he studied it, lines forming between his brows as he did. Ellis couldn't jerk his chin away fast enough to dodge the look, body sluggish with warped adrenaline.

He can't read my mind. He doesn't know. How would he know? Just say somethin', anythin', before he gets ideas, 'n' -

With abrupt delicacy, Nick shifted his weight, placing his free hand down against the table surface. His fingers splayed, thumb tapping just once on the lacquered wood. "That... was a joke." he stated, words stiff as they left him. His gaze took an awkward slant, darting suddenly away when Ellis' body twitched reflexively backwards in vague retreat. "I mean... it's true, actually, but I didn't mean... that. I... I wouldn't have..."

... Or maybe it's all over muh dumb face.

A bolt of laughter from across the room cut through the air between them, tremendously dissonant to their current interaction. They both winced and, in an abrupt mirror of one another, looked sharply down at their plates.

Ellis forced himself to breathe evenly, scrunching his shoulders in close to his ears. It wasn't going how he’d wanted it to... not that he quite knew how he'd wanted it to go... but he had no alternative paths to follow. He started to move his fork again, even as his attention had veered far from his hunger.

"Do you remember, um..." he started, just a mumble, lowering his head to fully block his view of Nick, hiding under the canopy of his cap. "A while back? When, uh..."

He could hear the sound of Nick's fork dropping, metal striking ceramic, soft enough that it must’ve been a deliberate motion rather than a frustrated gesture. The shift of fabric followed, like the man had leaned back in his seat.

"What?" he uttered, grated, finally sounding halfway corporeal.

Ellis tightened his grip, knuckles curling until the edge of the fork bit into the soft edge of his palm, mindlessly using the side of his fork to split a macaroni noodle in half. He stared down at it, watching the shape break apart. "After you burnt up yer leg, you locked yerself up in a bedroom. I broke in and, uh..."

'We made love', he wanted to say.

He didn't.

The way he paused as he let dead air buffer around the implication, swallowing past the dry sensation in his throat, felt like slipping dangerously close to an edge he couldn't see - the same way he couldn't see how Nick was reacting. It was not an easy task to keep going, but he forced his jaw to unglue and continue.

"Anyway, you were upset, but I... didn't let you close up. I chased you down, 'n'... you were glad I did. You said you were, at least. Even though you didn't really tell me why you were upset none, not really, it felt like you let me be there for yuh. Felt... like we got somewhere after that, or..."
His voice tried to falter, but the fact that Nick hadn't stopped him yet bolstered his confidence, and he let a quick huff of air clear his throat before he spoke again.

"Now, you said all that stuff back there, 'n' you can't pretend you didn't. I know you care 'bout me. I know yer just afraid of hurtin' me, or... me hurtin' you. But I - I just... I need you tuh understand somethin', Nick. I need you tuh hear it, for real this time."

The sound of clinking made him realize his hand was shaking, just enough to make his fork skitter indelicately across the surface of the plate. He set it down rather than let the noise continue, bringing his elbows in to link his fingers together over the table and stare, instead, at his dirtied nails.

"I love you." When Ellis said it, Nick did not flinch. For a moment, the Georgian doubted if he'd actually put a voice to the words - but they buzzed on his tongue and he must've uttered them. "I ain't givin' up on you, no matter whut you say. I'm gonna chase you, however long yuh keep runnin'. You can't shut me out. Can't keep lockin' doors ferever, Nick."

Silence. There was silence even when he waited, when he let it hang just to see if Nick would break it.

Ellis forced himself to lift his chin after a few moments had passed without so much as a hush of breath or a rustle of movement from the man across the booth from him. His eyes just barely cut out from under the bill of his hat, searching, despite the fear that crept his heartrate up to a steady pounding.

Nick's head was sagged as if in surrender, dropped so low and submerged in enough shadow that Ellis couldn't determine what was sprawled over his features. It was, undoubtedly, a frown.

"I know it ain't that easy, but if... if you want me tuh break in, all you gotta do is let me. 'Cause I want to. You just gotta let me, okay?" he murmured, voice cracking over the words as he forced himself to break that dense silence. "That's all."

Nick's frame shifted fractionally, like a motion he couldn't keep under control. He looked as if he might simply sit there forever - like if he never responded, the conversation would remain where they left it, untouched and stagnant.

The Georgian lifted his chin, staring fully across the table at Nick, examining his posture. There was no point, it seemed, in forcing the issue. He'd let Ellis finish, and wasn't that progress? Didn't that mean something? A sad quirk tugged at his lips, and he shifted to grab his plate from the table and pull the edge against his chest to brace it there. "I'll leave you alone." he murmured. "Thanks... fer listenin', at least."

Part of him, as he slid out from the booth, wanted Nick to stop him, but he was not so surprised that he could summon disappointment when it didn't happen. The fact that he'd gotten all the words out was enough, for now.

He inhaled as he stood, and when he exhaled, a little bubble of self-satisfaction crept up his spine. It had been a while since he'd felt light. It wasn't until that very moment that he realized how starved of oxygen he'd felt, as if his chest was full of water and he'd been holding his breath for hours. He inhaled again, deeply, just because he could.

His lungs were still full of air as he walked away, released only slowly in a gradual bluster. It took every ounce of self-control he had not to look back over his shoulder - and whether or not he imagined it, the burn of a gaze on him made the hair on the back of his neck prickle.
"I'll make things okay.

I promise."

He'd gone too far to hear the sound of Nick's head cracking against the side of the booth's inner wall, frustration boiling into the gesture. He didn't hear the grunt that accompanied it. He didn't see Nick lift both hands, pressing his fingertips into his eyes.

He definitely didn't hear the soft, weary little, "Dumbshit."
Chapter 261

The night had come upon them at a tremendous pace. The day had been a trial, certainly, but none of them quite expected the intensity of their exhaustion, nor how abruptly it would set in.

Rhiannon had already dozed off, laying flat on the ground with her leather jacket folded up under her head as a pillow. Her injured foot was elevated onto the bench that she laid perpendicular to. Lena was sitting next to her and, though she was still awake, the heaviness of her eyelids suggested it might not last.

Rochelle and Christophe were still at the bar, seated side by side on their stools, quiet hanging between them. She was no longer leaned against his shoulder, though their knees were pressed together just softly.

The ache wandering around Ellis' skull in crawling pulses finally began taking its toll, doubling down on the emotional exhaustion that had set in after his conversation with Nick. He didn't want to sleep, but sleep was all he could think of. His vision threatened to blur every time he blinked.

Nick had never really stirred from the booth, except once. He'd rasped something out about 'taking a leak', and disappeared into the backyard for a few minutes. Before his absence could grow concerning, however, he'd reappeared and collapsed once more into his makeshift bench bed.

Once he'd stilled for good, Coach had gotten up. Ellis watched from his seat at one of the tables as the big man gathered a blanket off the ground, flapping it out into a half-folded rectangle. He approached the booth quietly, leaning in to drape the blanket over Nick's curled frame.

Ellis tried to meet his gaze as he retreated, but Coach merely sighed and examined his nails as he walked away from the booth. The man was worried. That, more than anything, worried Ellis.

"Want to talk 'bout the chopper." Coach stated, simply, just loud enough to carry around the room to the survivors that were still awake. "'Bout what we gonn' do. But I think takin' a rest might be good, first. Get our thoughts together. We all had a long day, an' I want all of us at full steam when we make a call."

Nodding faintly, Ellis let his chin droop. "Yeah. Crash site ain't goin' anywhere, anyhow."

Lena hummed softly, her hand settled against Rhiannon's temple, thumb stroking along her hairline. "Sleep sounds good right about now. Hardly gonna go running out in the dark, anyway, even if we weren't all beat to crap."

Coach grunted out affirmation, footsteps pausing. He seemed to consider something, eyes swerving to look toward Ellis. Something turned over in his head, a decision made, and he blinked to break his own stare and continue forward.

The temptation to question the young Southerner on what had transpired in the booth - an interaction that had not gone unnoticed - was dismissed in favour of trusting him. Ellis had, after all, given his word.

"I'll take first watch." he stated, attention turning toward his double-barrel shotgun where it rested against the bar. "Y'all get some rest."

Sitting upright, suddenly, Rochelle leaned forward with an elbow bracing on her knee. "Actually - Chris and I can take watch, if that's okay." Her eyes were focused on Coach, visibly not acknowledging as Christophe jolted up in his seat. He looked bluntly startled, brown eyes darting between the two.

"Oh. ¡Sí! Sí. We stay up." he agreed, head bobbing in a sagely manner, as if he weren't very clearly blind-sided by the idea.

Coach looked dubiously at him before cocking a brow at Rochelle. He shrugged after a few beats, surrendering with a put-upon sigh. "If that's what y'all kids want." He spoke with a transparently dismissive tone; he had no interest in prying, but his expression made it plainly apparent that he knew something was going on.

She smiled at him, simply, apology quirked somewhere at the edges of her lips. "Thanks, papa bear."

As she moved to slide to her feet, idly drawing one arm behind her back in a small stretch before doing the same to the other, Rochelle started to cross the restaurant. She passed by Ellis as she did so, reaching out to screw his cap down on his head and push the bill to cover his face.

When he garbled out a sound of protest, she bit back affectionate laughter, keeping her attention forward. "Get some sleep, hee-haw." she murmured without looking back at him, continuing toward the entryway to the restaurant. "One way or another, I get the feeling tomorrow's gonna suck."

"Sure, Ro'." peeped quietly after her in a sleepy tone. "G'night."

Rochelle crossed into the hallway created by the half-wall, looking back long enough to confirm that Chris was following her. She grabbed Nick's katana from the wall as she passed by where he'd left it, tucking it under one arm as she walked up to the first window along the wall.

She leaned in, grabbing at its frame, thumbing in the switches on either side that locked it in place. Pulling it up and open a few inches, she patted her hands on her thighs and stepped back. Christophe stopped beside her, some curiosity touching the tip of his head.

"In case Maggie comes back." she explained, a sad twist at the edge of her mouth. "Part of me wants her to stay gone. She'll probably survive better out there than with us."

Chris nodded in understanding, eyes drifting toward the sword in her hand with a soft attention. He shifted, settling his stumped shoulder against the wall with only a faint grimace of pain. "Nico will be very sad if no."

Rochelle snorted, tossing her chin in a faintly irritable gesture. She let her voice fall to a whisper, taking a step closer to the Spaniard. "Don't you wish you could smack that guy sometimes? I mean, Jesus, he's got Ellis hanging on his every word, and all he can find time to care about is a cat. A cat! Great Odin's raven, that guy..."

The foreigner blinked at her a few times, gaze snapping back to her face. "¿Qué?" he managed, a fondness mixing with his confusion. "What is... 'raven'?"

Her lips parted, only to falter.

"Uh, nevermind." she managed, instead, weakly laughing. When he didn't waver from his curious expression, she relented with some attempt at an explanation, dodging his gaze. "It's from a movie. I mean, a raven is a bird, but - the quote is from a movie. Anyway..."

There was a pause there, not entirely comfortable, where she shifted her weight and he gazed at her with only the faintest comprehension. Rochelle wrung her hands together gently, pulling on her digits to cause an only somewhat painful stretch at the joints of her knuckles.

"I'm making this hard on you, aren't I?"

Christophe's expression warmed to a light smile, and he fidgeted gently on his heels. "It is okay."

"No, it's not, actually." A heavy sigh left her, turning to flatten her back against the wall, eyes fluttering shut in a frustrated gesture. It was a cowardly move, isolating herself from him as she spoke. "But you're not making it easy for me, either. You're very cute. And I'm an idiot. I should have jumped you from day one and never looked back, you know? What am I doing?"

"Rochelle..." Chris started, voice trembling just at the edges in a flustered rush, accent turning the 'ch' hard in that particular way that made her heart skip a beat. "I -"

Frustration peaking, the dark-skinned woman lifted one hand, pressing her fingertips against her eyes and harshening the gesture until she saw stars. "You've done everything right. That's the part that gets my goat. You're this handsome guy who sacrificed everything for us, saved my life. You're sweet and patient and tough as nails. It's a slam-dunk, right? Should be."

Fingertips brushed at her elbow, and on instinct, she reached out. Their forearms braced against one another, loosely gripping each other just at the elbow, a clumsy gesture. It was like the grab for balance after a stumble before it softened, gentled into a more natural posture, and his palm came to cradle against the curve of her tricep.

Her eyes opened, focused low before shifting hesitantly upwards to meet his. The first time she'd met him, Christophe had held sultry attention on her, lascivious but hollow. As events had unfolded, it had gained a certain softness as admiration had entered his attitude. Somewhere along the way, it had turned to adoration, and adoration was what she found on his expression.

That adoration drove her voice on.

"Everything's so messy; everything that's happened around us is so messy. I don't know you any more than I know anyone else on this team. Almost dying together, over and over, it messes up what's normal. It messes my head up. I don't want to hurt you, but it feels like that's all I'll do. As if I can think straight with everything going on... and you're scared and I'm scared, and..."

Then fear stopped it dead.

What if what I'm feeling is pity? What if I'm just scared shitless and lonely and you just happen to be here? What if I just feel guilty for everything you threw away for us? What if none of this means anything, and Jacob always did, and he's alive and I'm throwing all that away? What if I'm throwing something away here?

How the hell am I supposed to know what to do?

She didn't realize she'd begun to suck in air in short gasps, barely exhaling between them, until the hand on her elbow squeezed with sudden force. The sensation brought her attention reeling back into place. She forced herself to hold her breath outright, letting the oxygen filter through her limbs and combat the numbness that had started tingling at her fingertips.

"Rochelle," he murmured, and she watched as calm settled into his expression, brows lifting in a concerned quirk. His tone smoothed out to a soothing cadence, and she couldn't help but slacken her jaw and focus on his eyes.
They were gorgeous in the light, highlighting golden amongst the brown, but in the darkness that surrounded them now they came across almost pitch-black. It was a depthless and hypnotizing colour that started to weaken her knees. It felt a bit like being a few feet too far from the shore, water ballooning around her and threatening to carry her off on the tide.

"No podrías hacerme daño, amor." The smallest of smiles twitched at his lips, and he shook his head. "Tú nunca podrías hacer daño a nadie."

Before she could start to question him, he'd already slanted his head to the side to break the lock of their gazes. His smile widened, though she couldn't shake the impression that it was faintly wistful.

"You wanted to talk alone, querida. No alone in here." His head nodded toward the half-wall that did a poor job of separating them from the rest of the café. "I understand - I can wait. There is many things going on, ¿sí? I know I am... ah, demasiado, como - very much?"

Exhaling thinly, Rochelle tried to search his expression, to suss out the emotion there. She caught frustration at the edge of his voice, but couldn't precisely blame him, and her heart ached when he dropped his voice to a whisper. He stiffened his jaw to keep the hints of shame out of it.

"Pero... you know, if... you do not want me, you just say it. I will no be angry or... I will stop, okay? We can still be amigos. Si me necesitas, estaré contigo. I... be there for you."

It should have been no surprise that had been what her words sounded like to him. She'd ripped them from her gut and tossed them out like they'd make any sense to him, bereft of context, except for her recent rejections of him. She'd yet to even truly explain anything to him.

Groaning gently, Rochelle did the only thing that seemed sensible in the moment: she pushed her weight forward, closing the gap between them. She drew close enough to press her forehead against his jaw, though she had to slump to manage it, considering they were approximately the same height.

"I don't want you to stop. I just want to slow down a little." she murmured, hiding there. It was the truth, even if it was only a fraction of the whole truth. "We barely know each other."

Immediately, his arm curled to embrace her, his palm braced at her hip, grazing the skin of her bared midriff before it darted lower to settle on the waistband of her pants. Space remained between their bodies, but he tucked his chin lower to nestle against her temple. A laugh escaped him, subtle, though choked as if his throat had tried to close.

"You are very confusing, bonita." he murmured over the top of her head. "But you have salt, ¿sí?"

Her brows twisted up, and she couldn't stop herself from laughing in a confused huff. Pulling away from him wasn't something in her power, especially not as his nails started to graze in a gentle swirling motion against the curve of her hip, threatening to go lower or higher and she wasn't sure which one she wanted. "I'm gonna assume that means something different to you than it does to me."

Christophe cocked his head, almost settling his cheek entirely against her. "¿Qué significa? I meant..." He scrabbled for the word, eyes flashing to focus on some middle distance, just to the left of where they stood. "Em... no importa." A puff of air escaped his lips, warm against her ear, humour rising in his tone. "I have an idea. We try something, okay?"

Rochelle felt the smallest pinch of regret when the man pulled away, far enough to get a look at her face. His hand was still resting on her arm, though its touch lightened. Her brow quirked, suspicion drawing her voice a little faint. "Um... Sure. What something is that?"

The grin that sprouted on his lips caught her off-guard. "We meet again. We start over, like it is not el apocalipsis. Like we are normal persons, ¿sí?"

Confusion made her snort, shaking her head. "You want to pretend we don't know each other. Like... roleplaying?" When eagerness flared in his expression and he nodded, she couldn't stop a laugh. Dropping her chin in an embarrassed wag, Rochelle tossed her shoulders up. "Why?"

"We did not get to meet like normal." he responded, simply, with an excited spark in his eyes. "It is not so hard to pretend, I think. Like you say, we do not know each other."

The urge to laugh was tempered by how serious he seemed, and Rochelle let her gaze drift over his face, taking in the sincere excitement there. "Can't hurt, I guess. Even if it'll be pretty hard to forget where we are right now." she relented, softening the curve of her lips into a smile. "Okay, fine, stranger."

Breaking into an eager beam, Christophe snapped his hand suddenly up to press it against his lips. The way he moved, she couldn't avoid the observation that he made room for his other hand to alight on the other half of his mouth. "¡Toma! Here, here..."

Turning, he pressed his back to the wall, abruptly jolting his gaze up toward the ceiling. He inhaled, the pressure of his fingertips making it whistle through the parted left side of his mouth. It seemed like a focusing gesture, a self-soothing surge of air.

When he dropped his arm and looked at her, his expression was mild and distant. He only half-focused on her, voice casual. "Hola. Me llamo Chris."

They could've been strangers, loitering together in a line, some mundane errand crossing their paths. It was a far cry from her original introduction to him, covered in blood and grinning cattily.

She couldn't help but feel a spark of some strange giddiness, her jaw aching with the effort it took to not smile. He was playing it straight, calm, and she wanted to match his efforts as best she could. It was the least he deserved.

"Oh, hey. Rochelle." She offered her right hand toward him, allowing herself that smile as Chris accepted it, shaking gently. "You're not from around here, huh?"

If he minded her clumsy attempt, he didn't let on. Christophe's expression only barely changed, but his eyes were warm. He released her hand, lifting his to scratch at the curls of hair lining his jaw in a thoughtful gesture. "No, no. I am from España. Came here as foreign exchange, for la universidad."

Glancing over his features, Rochelle crossed her arms over her chest in a slow gesture. She shifted, settling her shoulder against the glass of the window next to them. "What for?" It seemed an obvious question in hindsight, yet it had never occurred to her before to ask.

His lips twitched, fighting a grin, pleased. He closed one eye in a vaguely coy manner, like some lazy wink. "Art."

Rochelle's eyes widened a twitch, turning entirely to face him before she could stop herself. "You're an artist?" she blurted, too sincere, too surprised. She couldn't reel it in fast enough, quickly stifling herself with a knuckle against her lips. "Shit, boy. I can't draw to save my life. Like, painting, or...?"
Christophe chuckled, lowering his chin and closing his eyes entirely. "I study street art, principalmente. Barcelona has very good artists, you know. Sixeart, Btoy, Xupet Negre... muy fantástico."

"I didn't know." she murmured, leaning in a few inches towards him, much despite herself. As much as her nerves had spiked to begin with, she suddenly found an ease between them. It had never been hard, of course, not even after the kiss - but it had been undoubtedly complicated.

"Maybe you can draw me something later."

His eyes opened, flaring to a sudden focus toward her, and she only just heard him mutter, "Hace trampa." As quickly as he'd spoken, he tipped his head, turning his back to brace against the wall and slide downwards. A grunt preceded him landing in a sit on the floor, letting one leg flatten out while the other curled toward his body. "¿Y tú? Where are you from, chica?"

When she didn't immediately join him, he patted his fingertips against the wood floor just by the toe of her boot. With a bitten-back smile, Rochelle dropped to sit next to him, curling her legs under her body as she did so. "I work at the biggest news station in Ohio."

Christophe gave a soft cluck of his tongue, slanting a small grin at her. "Ah. You are a star on the television, ¿sí?"

She smiled, reflexively, but it faded after a beat. Her eyes drifted a few inches, and her voice started before she'd quite plotted out her sentence. "Not really. To be honest, I kind of... well, I've been exaggerating a little... or a lot. Until recently, I was pretty much a glorified intern. Associate producer doesn't mean a lot."

Her heart rate picked up. At first, she didn't know why the adrenaline had spun up in her veins - until, suddenly, she did. The opportunity sat in front of her, clear as day. It was time.

He hummed, softly, and she could see out of the corner of her eye how a gentle fondness settled low on his features. The sight of it made her heart clench, made it ever harder to imagine him as a stranger, as someone who wasn't tremendously important to her. "You say this to a student artist, chica."

That made her grin again, but it disappeared entirely after just a moment. Furtively, she looked down at her knees, drawing her hands into a clasp and tucking them between her thighs. "Yeah, uh... touché."

It was time.

_Stupid idea. Awful idea. You got a chance at something good, and you're gonna ruin it, for probably zero reason. Zero, except your own freaking conscience. Who's winning here?_

Her tongue tried to trip the words up as they left her, but to no avail. They came out anyway. "My boyfriend thought I was crazy, thinking I'd make it there. He always said I should've worked at a smaller news station, somewhere local."

She felt him stiffen, heard the soft sound of him straightening away from her against the wall. There was silence, at first, dense silence that threatened at her nerves. It lingered long enough that she couldn't stop herself from clearing her throat, shrugging up a shoulder.

"Last I saw him, we fought. Bad. We didn't exactly say the words, 'this relationship is over', but he asked me to choose between him and my job and I chose my job. I left and I knew he might never forgive me. I knew I was putting us on the line, and I did it anyway."
She didn't say the rest; she didn't point out that he was likely dead, killed by zombies or infected himself. It wasn't just the fact that it was incongruous with the distance they'd put between them and reality. She couldn't convince herself to say the words out loud. It felt like an excuse, like justification, like obfuscation of the truth she wanted to lay bare.

And it lay there, a blunt weapon at her feet. She wasn't sure which of them was meant to pick it up... or, more accurately, which of them would be struck by it.

"I'm... sorry I didn't tell you. I was scared, I guess, and a little ashamed. But if we're going to... keep going, I couldn't not tell you. You needed to know that this is messy for me. And if it's too much for you, I get it. I just needed you to know."

It would have made sense to be afraid. She had no idea, no concept, of how Chris would react. He might get angry, or feel hurt. He might never forgive her for keeping him in the dark as long as she had. Instead of fear, however, she mostly just felt relieved.

"I chose my job over him a long time before you came in the picture, so you're not... homewrecking, it's not your fault, it's not something you have to deal with, I'm just... It's harder for me than it should be, and it has nothing to do with you, I just - it's complicated, and -"

Movement entered her periphery, and it took her a moment to focus on it, then a moment more to recognize the intent of it. She watched Chris extend his hand toward her, palm up, fingers gently curled.

She lifted her gaze, hesitantly meeting his.

He smiled, just a twitch of his lips with a reassuring edge, and reached his hand further forward in an insistent gesture. The man only spoke after Rochelle had softly placed her fingertips against the soft skin at the base of each digit, a mirrored parallel of their fingers, and he'd rested his thumb over her knuckles to squeeze them.

"You no think it was complicado before? Bonita, I point a gun on you, before. My friends tried to kill you, and you killed them, before." He shook his head, body shifting subtly where he sat, a laugh panting softly from his nose. "It is all messy. Todo es mierda - así es la vida."

Rochelle couldn't help but snort, nose crinkling in a startled gesture, more sad than humoured. "Chris, that's not -"

His head shook, again, and he leaned a few inches closer. His voice raised to forcibly interrupt her. "We are starting over, chica, ¿recuerdas? Please. I do not care if you had un novio before... If you want - if you want me, I want you. If you no want me, I stop. If you are not ready, Rochelle, I wait. Okay?"

Breath abruptly caught behind her teeth, Rochelle couldn't manage much but a weak few blinks, gaze passing over the earnest half-frown on his lips. She felt that pull anew, that tidal drag, unsure how to do anything except draw closer to him.

"Alright." sheghosted, shifting her fingertips to press between his digits, sinking into the gaps there to lace their fingers loosely. "Kinda intense for a guy I just met, but alright."

Christophe's eyes warned, his lips struggling against a smile. When he broke, it was with a burst of laughter, too sudden for him to stifle. He sent a vaguely panicked look toward the wall that separated them from the rest of the café, biting his lower lip, hushing his amusement down to a few puffs of air.
"We think about it, ¿sí? I want you to be... sure, ¿sí?"

Exhaling gently, Rochelle shifted her weight, turning to rest her back against the wall more firmly. "I know. You're sweet." She tugged on his hand, urging him closer, at the same time patting her other hand on her thigh. "C'mere, chico."

His expression softened, and he followed her pull to drop down clumsily onto the floor, wriggling his lower body until he'd lowered himself to lay down. His cheek settled against her thigh, head resting in her lap, and she left her hand alight against the side of his head.

Toying fingertips against his temple, following his hairline and passing fingernails through his gold-brown, sweat-spiked hair, Rochelle closed her eyes. It was too easy for her mind to chew new holes in its surroundings, destructive energy focused on the nearest outlet. It found purchase in doubt.

I put him on the spot. He's not even thinking about himself, he's just thinking about me. He should be angry, or at least confused about it, conflicted, or something... He should be something other than fine with this.

Damnit, girl.

Rochelle rolled her head on her neck, feeling tendons pop and bones creak. "You should get some rest, okay? Today was a lot and... yeah. We both have things to think about." she murmured down to him, weariness drawing her voice into a gritty sigh. "You can stay here, if you want. I'll keep a look out."

He hummed, gently, a single squirm passing up his frame to push tighter against her and nestle his good shoulder against the side of her leg. He relaxed there, soaking in the comfort of the contact between them, and Rochelle tried desperately to convince herself that the conversation had bettered them. That it had been, in general, for the better.

They sat in silence for a few moments, buffered by the sound of oceanic winds rustling over the café's structure from the cracked window just beside them. It was only once Rochelle's fingernails had found a consistent pattern of scratches against his scalp that he spoke up again.

"So, bonita..."

When she prompted him with a soft sound, he closed his eyes and turned his mouth to bury idly against the sleek fabric of her sweatpants.

"Does this mean still no kisses?"

The small 'ay!' that escaped him as she yanked on his ear was not nearly as cathartic as she expected to be. The pleased arch to his neck when she rubbed it with a thumb in gentle mollification, however, was.
The sensation of waking felt sudden. It was that punch of fear, the lack of cognizance, the confusion. Nick jolted, reaching up an arm and stretching his hand out in front of him.

He didn't realize at first how he'd postured himself. It was only as his consciousness clicked into place, sleep-delayed, that he recognized his own defensive stance. His lungs ached as if he'd been running, and his heart was jumping against his ribcage, and he couldn't say why. He couldn't recall any dreams during the night, let alone any nightmares.

For that matter, it felt like there was only an inch-thick space of time between the moment he'd closed his eyes and the moment he now resided in. Had there been time for nightmares? Had he even slept?

There was a blanket over him that someone had laid there, however, pooled around his belly and draped over his prone frame. He must have been unconscious for at least some time.

A shudder of frustrated flexion passed through his jaw muscles, a sigh turning into a grunt. The material clung to him in a suffocating pressure, summoning the unpleasant question of where the blanket had come from. Had Ellis put it there? That felt like a likely answer, and he was greatly tempted to throw it off of himself.

Without Ellis there to witness the gesture, however, it seemed pointless.

Instead, he let it lay where it was; the pressure and warmth was better than the alternative. He closed his eyes, sitting for a moment in his half-raised posture, inhaling and exhaling to flood oxygen through his body and combat the strange and sourceless adrenaline. He felt rested, yet rest never felt like quite enough.

Groaning quietly under his breath, Nick made to collapse down flat against the booth seating, rolling onto his back rather than retake his previous position curled on his side. His head was entirely too full, bursting at the seams, and if he let his mind wander he knew he'd never get back to sleep.

However, his move was impeded by the soft object his shoulder slid into. His weight pressed onto a bundled shape that provided some resistance, like a pillow or a tightly folded blanket.

And then moved.

And then hissed warm air against his ear.

The sound was strangled, as if barely managed around surprise and exhaustion. His reaction was pitifully delayed as he surged away from the stimulus, but it did not take more than the limited mental capacity available to him to work out its source.

"Shit -" he managed, scrambling to avoid squashing Maggie underneath his shoulder.

His back collided with the edge of the table above him, body curling to yank his weight away from the cat buried between him and the wall of the booth. She had burrowed into the corner formed by the booth's seat and the wall separating the restaurant proper from the entrance, hiding there under his frame.

Pain sparked over the rear curves of his ribs, like the table edge had dug in and struck a nerve.
bundle that shot pain down his back. Nick managed to hover there, half on hands and knees. He couldn't pull much together but a dumb stare.

Though his vision was poor in the night, her eyes flashed yellow-green and some light reflected off the white of her fangs as she panted, open-mouthed, up at him. For a moment, they stared at one another, silent but for his restrained breath and her much softer huffing.

She was close enough to strike at his face if she lunged, and he had no more space to retreat back. His knuckle stung, a reminder of the greeting he'd received the previous evening - then, softly, a wheeze left her that he only belatedly identified as a meow. It broke and rasped well before it had finished, a weak sound that came with the audible shift of her body on her haunches, like it had taken physical effort to form the sound.

It was reassuring enough that Nick let his body relax just slightly.

"... Hey." he murmured, letting the arm that wasn't bearing his weight against the booth's bench shift, reaching tentatively toward her. It was a mostly blind gesture in the dark, and it wasn't until his fingertips touched fur that he could orient his palm to settle against her side. "Hey, girl."

When she didn't react, he stroked down along the bony protrusion of her hip, finding her tail where it curled tightly against her side. Touching it made it lash, a quick flick of the tip against his forearm. Her nose brushed the back of his hand, warm and damp, and he flinched into stillness until it became clear she wasn't going to lash out.

A smile twitched at his mouth. He was gladder than he cared to admit. "Forgave me, huh? Wasn't like I enjoyed locking you up, you little brat. Drama queen."

Lowering himself in an awkward slide, Nick let his hand nudge into the softer fur of her belly, scooping under her slight frame and lifting her up. She started to scrabble for purchase, so he was quick to lift her up and set her on his chest, rolling onto his back as he did. She sat stiffly on his sternum for a moment, ankles digging into him as she huddled low.

The fear in her posture was apparent, her hunched body now silhouetted against the rest of the dining room.

Nick grabbed the blanket from around his waist and pulled it up. Maggie seemed primed to panic for a moment as the fabric tented up over her, but with Nick's hand settling over her spine in a gentle squeeze, she relaxed. Her paws shifted and her body settled low, flattening herself against his chest.

As the blanket collapsed to be flush against them, Nick closed his eyes, trailing his hand up the feline's body until he could dig fingertips against her tiny shoulders and massage at the loose scruff there. He inhaled deeply, feeling her claws catch at his shirt for balance as his chest expanded beneath her.

He'd genuinely resigned himself to losing her. It had seemed appropriate, really, like a thing he deserved.

"I ain't givin' up on you."

The last few days had been a wild mixture of things he did and did not deserve.

Hearing Ellis talk had felt like pressing his ear to the glass of an airplane window and listening to the roaring air just centimeters away. He wasn't sure how he managed to feel so disconnected from the situation and so overwhelmed all at once. He felt, perhaps, resigned more than anything else.
He wanted to surrender. Laying there, exhausted, it was all he could think. Ellis had sat across from him and quietly informed him, in no uncertain terms, of his intentions.

You just have to let him break in.

It sounded... good. It sounded like something he could do. He could leave the door ajar, pretend not to notice as Ellis crawled beside him. He could roll over and press him into the mattress, bury them in sheets, bite into the curve of his neck. They'd speak in nothing but gasps and moans, and forget everything outside the bounds of the bedspread.

That's how we got here, though, sex and bullshit. That's how all this happened... my same old bullshit. I use somebody until I can't use them anymore - except, again, it was someone I fucking care about. Someone who mattered.

He could focus better with something to put his fingers to, stroking along her side and down her curled legs, thumb rolling idly at her warmed pawpads. The body heat against him was comforting enough to put a subtle buffer between him and his thoughts.

Feels like me caring about someone just makes it all worse. None of this would be so fucking complicated if I didn't give a shit. I wouldn't have... gotten his hopes up.

Or mine.

Nick grimaced, squeezing his eyes shut tightly. His consciousness drifted carelessly back to that night - the night of Ellis' clumsy confession. Everything had spiraled wildly out of control, driven by shame and knee-jerk fear. It was not his first time feeling those emotions.

We both know what this looks like in the light of day. He gave me a chance, and I fucked him over. Now Ellis doesn't want what we had anymore, and I don't see how things can change. I don't know what the fuck it changes into.

He screwed his brows up, tension lining the muscles of his face. His fingers moved a little quicker along Maggie's spine, feeling her fur twitch at the stimulation.

Let's be honest here. I... like him. I like him enough that the fact that he's a fucking stupid, stubborn, annoying little redneck just makes me like him more. He's fucking trouble, and he's worth it... and if we weren't in the apocalypse, if we'd met anywhere else, I'd have gotten drunk, fucked him, and given him a fake number.

I'd have never seen him again, and probably never thought about him again.

That guy doesn't deserve him, so why would I? Ellis doesn't care about that guy. He's in love with whatever bullshit I've been feeding him. Best case scenario is the world never gets back on its feet and he doesn't have to figure out who I am, and what the fuck kind of best case is that? For either of us?

Nick released a blistering sigh, shaking his head a few times, the crown of his head rolling against the bench. "I'm starting to think I'm bad at relationships, Mags," he murmured, just a breath, followed by a weary choke of a laugh. "Not sure where I get that idea from."

The cat rolled her weight, sprawling onto her side. She stretched her back legs down toward his belly, curling her forelegs up under her torso. The stretch made her body tremble before she relaxed, the muffled snap of teeth and tongue indicating a yawn from under the blanket.

"Good advice. Thanks."
With sleep relegated to a pipe-dream, Nick shifted. He slid his arm to loop against her spine, cradling her in her newly flattened position. It took effort to pick the cat up without disturbing her posture, but exhaustion made the warm body limp in his grasp. He managed to roll and deposit her onto the bench, blanket now wrapped around her.

As he slid out from the booth, the lump in the blankets shifted, squirmed, then settled.

Nick got to his feet unsteadily, keeping one hand on the table until he was sure he was upright. He took a slow glance around the restaurant, vision having adjusted enough that he could pick out shapes.

Two shapes in the deeper section of the restaurant marked out the sisters, and two more curled in the center of the main dining area marked out Chris and Rochelle. Ellis was asleep upright at a table, slumped forward onto crossed arms, his denim jacket laid over his back. It had fallen halfway to one side, barely kept where it was with one of the sleeves tucked tight under his folded elbow.

Nick could not justify the urge that had him approaching. He stepped quietly over the wood-slat floor, placing himself just to the side of where the younger man sat. His body bent a few degrees at the waist, both hands reaching to grip the jacket by the shoulders.

Moving slowly - delicate only in the interest of not getting caught, he assured himself - Nick pulled it back up around his shoulders to arrange it back into place. The moment after, when his fingertips lingered against the denim with only two thin layers separating him from Ellis' skin, felt like it lasted forever.

The urge to graze them up his neck and bury them in his curly hair swelled, then faded.

_Why does wanting to fix it and wanting it all to just go away feel so damn similar?_

Nick stepped away, eyes narrowing as he jerked his chin up and surveyed the room again. Coach was nowhere to be seen, which likely meant he'd taken up the usual watch-spot in the front portion of the restaurant.

He lifted one hand, rubbing the flat of his hand into the side of his neck as he crossed the dining area toward the front of the café. As much as he wanted to just crawl back in the booth and go back to sleep, he knew he would, regrettably, wake up eventually.

With a husky inhale, Nick ducked around the separating wall that lead to the entrance. He had a bullet to bite, and the realization didn't scare him like he'd expected. The idea of confiding in someone, even a little, seemed almost appealing. This felt more manageable than whatever Ellis wanted of him.

The hall was empty.

Instinct made his heartrate pick up, and he felt abruptly vulnerable without a weapon in his hand. He shouldn't have leapt instantly to panic, but it was hard not to, considering their day-to-day environment. Catastrophizing was easy in the middle of a catastrophe.

The first thing he did was exhale his lungful of air, turning on his heel. The small unisex bathroom door was open, removing that as a likely option.

Striking a low pose, weight pushed into the beginnings of a crouch that coiled his body, Nick crossed back through the dining room to the back door. He nudged the slim blinds out of the way, peering through them.
Coach sat on the porch, slumped shoulders low, shotgun rested against his knee.

Relief had Nick rolling his eyes, puffing out a sigh. Irritation came afterward, mostly at himself for the nervous falter. He reached down to grab the doorknob and twist it, moving gently to limit the noise created. Fortunately, the door opened relatively quietly, and he slipped outside.

The air was mild and thick with humidity, barely cut by the constant flow of breezes past their building. As he closed the door behind himself with a gentle click, Coach's head tilted, acknowledging the presence without looking back.

"You shouldn't be sitting out here." Nick managed to infuse some snideness into it - a triumph, as far as he was concerned. "A tonguer's gonna get you, and then who'll mind the girls?"

Coach snorted, the sound restrained, as if he tried to stop it halfway. His head shook, lowering, and the way he reached to grab his shotgun and place it on the other side of him opened a spot for Nick to sit, implicit and wordless. "Needed some fresh air. Ever feel like yo' head's gonn' explode? Been feelin' that way... few days, now."

Nick did not succumb so easily, standing by the door for a stubborn few moments. It felt like a quiet game of wills, counting the seconds and waiting for Coach to give up before he advanced. He needed that victory.

Coach gave no such indication. He waited, patient, but expectant.

"This whole fucking situation is a headache." Nick managed, sighing as he took the few steps between him and the stairs. He didn't sit, though, a petulant distance kept between them. "You'll have to be more specific."

A bob touched Coach's head, like the droop of a man barely staying awake. He started to fiddle with the belt at his waist, adjusting his grey pants on his hips. "Wish I could say I believed for a minute we'd catch that chopper, but nah. The minute they took off after it, I knew it'd never happen. Felt it."

Nick chewed at his lower lip, voice lowering. "I wasn't a hundred percent there at the time." he responded, mustering a not-insignificant amount of snideness. It wasn't untrue, but he spoke it like a joke.

Coach barely seemed to acknowledge that he'd spoken. Or, more likely, he simply recognized the sentiment for the hollow attempt at misdirection that it was. The man continued undeterred.

"You know, they say folks can... sense things. Not talkin' 'bout no ESP shit, but... twins feelin' each other, parents feelin' their kids. You know? Folk sayin' their kid got kidnapped an' they knew they were dead, or alive. Knew the moment it happened. You can feel it, they say, they just knew. Maybe God givin' them a sign, if you believe that, or somethin' deeper."

Coach gazed out over the yard, and now, the gambler could see his face in dark profile. His jaw was set, eyes hard as they looked upwards. "I don't feel my little girl. Not sure if that means she's dead, or if it's all bullshit."

The broad-shouldered Georgian looked at him, slowly, eyes still just as hard. They were not cold, exactly - but stoic to the point of outright apathy. Nick felt that gaze strike against him, and he could not stop himself from shrinking away from it. He found his eyes averting in some subtle submission.

"You think this shit broke me, Nick?"
Quiet, Nick drew to the edge of the porch, dropping his body in an uncoordinated crouch until he could slide to sit just a few inches from Coach. Silence hung between them for a moment, and he found his tongue clumsy in his mouth.

"I just think you're finally catching on." was what he said, simple, and as sincere as he could be.

The football coach sensed his discomfort, perhaps, or wandered into his own. Whatever the reason for his withdrawal, Coach returned his attention forward and released a heavy sigh. His arms crossed on his knees, hands clasping together.

Before that unpleasant quiet could sink in much further, Nick found himself blurting out, "How do you tell?"

At that, Coach arched a brow. His body turned to face his attention more directly at Nick, head canting. His gaze did a full scan over the other man, taking in his posture like it might give some insight. "Tell what?"

Nick grabbed at his own wrist with his other hand, rubbing over the pulse nestled into his wristbone. It was with a grunt that he forced out an explanation, feeling like he might suffocate before he got the words out. They were stuck stubbornly to the inside of his ribcage.

"Whether or not you had a stroke."

The time it took Coach to process the question was, surely, not as long as it felt. Years might have as easily passed as seconds, and by the time the older man straightened with a small frown, Nick was close to launching himself back inside the café.

Coach's response was quiet, and dead serious. "You passed out?"

Nick got halfway through a nod, but stopped. He struggled, still, tone strained with a discomfort he wished he had the energy to disguise. "I don't... know. I don't remember what happened. I just remember being in the dressing room, and then... being on the ground, and Chris was there."

And blood. Why do I still feel like there was blood?

Coach tightened his fingers in their clasp, heaving in a steady breath and holding it for a beat. He spoke with the exhale, brows twitching. "Dizzy? Felt sick?" Rather than continue to face Nick and stare him down, the big man turned back away. He talked up toward the pitch black that made up the sky, too overcast for stars.

That time Nick nodded, and said nothing.

"You remember any... weakness on one side? Confusion? You weren't all there when you came out."

The Northerner tried, genuinely, to remember - but it felt like holding water in his cupped palms. No matter how tightly he held it and how much force he applied, it seemed to only spill more and more. "No...? Maybe. Fuck, Coach, I'm not sure. I felt weak as shit but I don't think it was... I think it was everywhere."

They sat on the edge of the porch, stiff in their pointed refusal to look at one another. Nick shifted his weight, sighing out a quick breath.

"It's hard to remember."
The older man grunted, reaching up a hand to rub at his jawline. He closed his eyes, scratching into the salt-and-pepper hair growing over the lower half of his face, a thoughtful gesture. "I can't tell you nothin', Nick. Ain't no answer here. I just know you ain't been right, an' maybe you ain't been right fo' longer than you wanna admit."

Nick gritted his jaw in a few tight clenches, lowering his chin. It stung like a personal strike, and he couldn't stop his voice from turning caustic. "You kidding? I'm having a great time."

He didn't expect Coach to open his eyes and square them on him. They narrowed with abrupt attention, flickering over his face in a careful examination. It was calculated in a way that made Nick reflexively tighten his expression against the intrusion.

"You talked to a Witch, Nick. I heard you callin' out to it, like it was someone you knew. You 'bout let it get you."

A scoff touched Nick's voice, choked, and down collapsed the small part of him that had continued to hold out hope that Coach hadn't heard him. He recoiled his head in a sharp jerk, lifting his hands to gesture a vague 'whoa.' "That's not what happened. Look, Sam, I -"

Sharply, Coach flared his nostrils, kicking the heel of his left foot against the stair beneath it in a frustrated outburst. "Don't 'Sam' me, Nick. You only do that shit to throw me off my game." His voice was harsh, but exhaustion seemed to fuel it more than outright anger.

There was a few beats of silence, then.

Nick sat frozen in his defensive posture before forcing it to loosen. He buried the realization that he hadn't actually noticed the slip into the other man's real name. He buried, too, the tiny spark of hurt that reared its head in his chest, instead pushing a laugh from the back of his throat.

Coach exhaled at that, setting an elbow against his knee so he could press his knuckles against his temple. "I wish I knew how to talk to you, boy. Feels like every time I try, you just get wound up tighter." The slumped posture betrayed a resignation, head shaking.

"You gotta realize, ain't a single one of us who wouldn't die for you. I want to help you, Nick, but I ain't the one who can get through to you. We both know that. You ever think yo' pride ain't worth all this?"

It felt hollow, and Nick felt hollow listening to it, his eyes drifting to look across the yard. Apathy didn't fully encompass the sensation in his chest. He snorted as he spoke, shrugging up his shoulders in a quick gesture. "Since money's bullshit now, it better be worth something, or I'm broke."

The sound Coach made was not a laugh, but it couldn't have been anything else.

Nick's tone fell to a bland note, dismissive. He reached up to press his fingertips against his temples, massaging into the bone. "Didn't come out here to talk." he lied. "I'll take watch until sun-up."

Coach gazed at him, jaw clenched, shoulders momentarily lifting as he inhaled deeply. He lifted his right arm to land a hand firmly on Nick's shoulder, tightening fingers into the muscles there, forceful enough to command his attention. "Wasn't really someone you knew, was it?"

The question was genuine - sincere enough that Nick stared toward the hand on his shoulder, then quietly shook his head. "No." he murmured, voice a simple husk past a tight jaw. "Far as I know, the Flu ain't bringing back the dead."
The larger man kept his grip for a moment, seeming to consider that response. He was, perhaps, conflicted, and Nick couldn't blame him. Was it more or less comforting to know it had all been in his head?

Nick was not sure.

The Georgian settled on a soft, "A'ight.", before he got to his feet. "Don't stay out here."

Snorting, Nick looked up toward the sky, listening to the footsteps as Coach walked back to the door into the restaurant. He didn't fully relax until the door had opened and then quietly shut, leaving him alone on the porch.

He didn't stay out much longer; he remained where he was just long enough so that when he went inside, it didn't feel like it was obeying an order.
Chapter 263

By the time daybreak cracked the clouds apart with sheets and streaks of gold, Rhiannon was awake. She didn't bother moving from where she laid on the ground at first. Her ankle still ached, tight and pulsing, and walking around wasn't at the top of her priority list.

For a while, she simply rested her eyes, hands clasped on her stomach. Processing information thoughtfully was also not, generally, at the top of her priority list, but she tried.

Rescue - or a version of it - had been inches from her fingertips once before. She'd stood with her sister, yards away from a bustling evacuation line, screams and shouts surrounding them in a deafening thunder. Lena had gripped her wrists and clutched until her nails dug in and threatened to break skin.

They'd looked each other in the eyes and known, without words, that they couldn't go.

At first, the idea of the world ending had not shaken her. It had felt a little like growing up and out of fairytale mythos, only to wake up to footsteps on the roof, one early Christmas morning. Strange and baffling, perhaps, but also familiar in some childish way. There was a certain vindication to it, if only vicariously.

She'd never had cause to feel pride about her family, and her father being right about an inevitable apocalypse was not a reason to change that opinion. Still, she couldn't help a wry amusement. Raise a glass to the crazy motherfucker. He's probably thrilled.

From that moment on, they'd never chased signs of the military and CEDA. Their singular focus had been to make it to Texas, a hunt which had driven them south to reach Interstate 10. The interstate was their best chance at making it west... however, things had gotten rougher, harder, and one too many close calls had changed their tactic: they needed a shortcut.

If they found a boat they could sail down into Florida, catching the tail-end of I10. It wouldn't cut the bulk of their actual travel out, but it would get them onto smooth, flat asphalt. After all, once they got onto the interstate, it'd be a straight shot to their father's ranch... assuming, of course, that he was still alive.

That all raised the sticky question of why her instinct had been to rush toward the helicopter, to sprint like it had been something that mattered to her. There had been a moment, an instant, where the helicopter had been roaring closer and Lena had looked at her. Their gazes locked, and in that instant of indecision, they had disagreed.

Lena's eyes said "Stay." and Rhiannon had run.

Maybe she felt like she owed them one - or maybe she just cared.

At a glance, from her prone position on the ground, Rhiannon could see most of the survivors around her. She could feel the warm presence of Lena, curled up and dozing on her side just a few inches away. Ellis was asleep in a chair, curled onto the table with his jacket on like a blanket, and Chris and Rochelle were laying in the sprawl of blankets.

They were pressed tightly back-to-back, bodies otherwise curled away from one another. It might've been cute had it not also made her want to gag. Fuckin' Prom King and Queen over here, Jesus.
Coach was awake at the bar, bent over with his weight braced on an elbow. Nick wasn't immediately in sight, but there were pacing footsteps trailing up and down the entranceway. Since she could see everyone else from where she laid, she assumed they were his.

That thought was confirmed when she looked up and saw the crouched shape of the cat they'd somewhat reluctantly adopted, sitting atop the wall separating the entrance. She was poised like a small statue, still except for her rapt attention on the man below her. Her head rotated on her shoulders, watching him steadily.

Rhee did not like cats. She didn't hate them, precisely, but they'd always seemed to be more trouble than they were worth. Dogs were worse, between the barking and the need for walks, and the - from her experience - universal love of her leather boots.

Want a needy little piss-factory as much as I want a steady boyfriend.

Adjusting her hips, Rhiannon pressed her elbows against the ground, forcing herself upright. It took careful effort not to jostle her sister as she got up from the ground, and more effort not to put much weight on her bad ankle. It necessitated a quick scramble, grabbing for the bench in front of her to balance her weight.

When that made the bench's legs scrape gently against the floor, the blonde stiffened, looking out into the restaurant to see who it had disturbed. She was sure she'd wake her sister, at least - but only Coach turned around. His eyebrow raised as he noticed her upright, and his chin jerked in a subtle motion, urging her over.

Grimacing idly, Rhiannon crossed the distance between them, spreading her arms to either side in a wide and welcoming gesture. "Mornin', Coach." She sidled up beside the stool he sat on, throwing one arm over his broad shoulders and leaning her head down low to grin at him. "We ready to get cracking?"

The man rumbled a small snort, passing her a dubious look before tapping down at the counter of the bar. Rhiannon followed his gesture, finding his fingertip placed squarely on the small notebook Ellis had been passing around to the team. It was open, and the contents of the page it was open to hardly surprised her.

"Y'all are really set on Texas, huh?" Coach murmured, looking down at the address written there. There was a frown on his lips, though his voice held a genuine curiosity. "It's still a good ways off."

The blonde sighed, blowing the air up from a jutted lower lip so it blustered up the plane of her face and disturbed a few strands of brittle hair. She turned, retracting her arm from over his shoulders to lean instead against the bar, fingers tucking into her pant pockets.

"Don't have anywhere else to go. And if the old man's still kicking, there's no one else who'll go looking for the sorry fucker." When Coach merely hummed, she added, "And if he's not, then we got an underground bunker, two hundred years of Army rations, and a mostly-legal arsenal waiting for us."

He grinned, teeth showing as his voice bubbled up with a restrained laugh. Even as he did so, the older man scrunched his brows at her in a bewildered flare of confusion. She'd quickly grown used to the look from him, like he couldn't quite puzzle her out. It was deeply satisfying.

"Ain't much use in me arguin' with you two." he sighed, closing the notebook and resting his palm atop it. His fingertips rapped out an unsteady rhythm, thoughtful. "Least we'll know where to find you if this shit ever gets better."

Rhiannon's eyes drifted to catch movement, and she watched Nick come around the wall at a slow pace. His arms were crossed, eyes narrowed with a cautious degree of tension, attention squarely on them. She smiled instantly, allowing a demure tilt of her head, faux-politeness dipping her chin when he glared back.

No shit he's fuckin' twitchy. Still hasn't told anyone he's leaving - or thinks he is.

It was complicated.

Rejecting the man was not, in fact, in their best interest. Their trip was only going to get harder, and an extra team member might mean the difference between success and failure. Being a small group had its advantages, but there had been more than one close call.

A Hunter launching at them, in time to the wet schluck of a Smoker tongue jettisoned from its gaping mouth, had often felt like a death sentence. Even just a few too many infected all at once tipped the balance. Getting overwhelmed was too easy in a duo.

The speed and flexibility of a smaller group helped counterbalance the negatives, but there wasn't much room for error. He's a fucking jack-off, but he's not nuts. We could use him.

Concerns for survival aside, though, Rhiannon couldn't shake a sense of unease.

For better or for worse, they'd become part of a team... and for better or for worse, she had grown fond of them. She did not like the idea of participating in what felt like a betrayal. As much as the inner-workings of the group, the politics, remained mostly obfuscated to her, Rhiannon knew enough to know that they'd be outraged.

She didn't have a lot of friends, even before the apocalypse. She didn't want to lose the ones she'd found.

Lena had instructed her to be patient, though hadn't said much more than that. She didn't know what her older sister had planned, precisely, though Rhiannon would've guessed that it was mostly to wait and see what happened. Lena was generally patient, and usually thoughtful. She'd always acted critically - she played chess, made plans, organized and executed.

I don't.

They'd recently narrowly avoided disaster, and it made it hard to sit idle. Her sister had unknowingly stepped into a minefield, alerting Ellis of Chris' apparently-secret suicide attempt. Rhiannon was inclined to blame Nick for not letting them know it was a secret in the first place, but that didn't change the fact that it had been a close call.

The Northerner was pushing them steadily closer to some kind of schism. Whatever drama he's running away from here, shit's gonna get worse before it gets better. I know drama - especially when it's about family.
When Nick tightened his expression into an outright scowl back at her, Rhiannon swerved her gaze back onto Coach. Her lips curled more genuinely, despite the tight feeling that worked down her body, tangible stress. She shook it off like a shiver, and funneled the energy elsewhere. Anywhere else.

Namely, at Coach.

"Aw. You gonna come visit li'l ol' me?" she cooed, leaning back in toward him just a few inches.

He grinned at her, head cocking as a joking tone softened the edge of his voice. "You girls have talked some crazy shit 'bout yo' pop. Hard to know if yo' ass is full of shit. Gotta meet the man myself, tell the truth from the legend."

There was a moment where Rhiannon let her eyes flicker down, maintaining attention on his mouth just long enough to ensure he noticed it, and ensure he didn't think it was some idle glance. As she did, she responded simply, "I've taken worse guys home to daddy."

The instant his brows went up, she turned away, pushing off the bar and sliding her hands in the slashed zipper pockets of her black pants. Satisfaction brought a swagger to her hips, strides lengthening, tongue darting to the corner of her mouth as she brushed past Nick. She spared him a slow wink, exaggerating the gesture with a scrunch of her nose.

Judging by the way the gambler had frozen dead in his tracks, eyes tracking between them in a pendulous motion - back, forth, back, forth - her actions had not gone unnoticed by him, either. That was fine with her.

Being patient and subtle is for pussies.

Without looking back, Rhiannon thudded her hands together, the sound a dull percussion of palm on palm rather than a loud crack. "We've got a crash site to go find, right? How about you rustle up some grub, and I'll wake these fuckers up."

The tall biker took great pleasure in the stunned silence that she left behind as she moved a few steps away, soaking it up, practically giddy with it. She dodged around the chairs that had been scooted out of the way to make room for the pile of bedding, coming up on the sleeping bodies curled there.

It only took a tap with the toe of her boot against her knee to wake Rochelle, and the woman jolting awake quickly made Chris stir. As they rose clumsily into seated positions, blinking and wiping the sleep from their eyes, Rhiannon limped around them to come up behind Ellis in his seat.

She set her hands on his shoulders, shaking him gently. "Get up, tiger." He stiffened immediately, but it took him a moment to lift his head and crane his neck to look at her with unfocused blue eyes. There was a sizeable welt of red flush over his cheek where he'd burrowed into his own shoulder and gotten the hard edge of his denim jacket. "New day."

Ellis huffed out a breath, pushing upright, stretching his arms forward with a rough yawn. "Ah, shit." he muttered, slowly and stiffly rolling his shoulders. His posture spoke to a degree of pain. "I could'uh done with a pillow."

Rhiannon gave a scoffed laugh, her grip lingering on his shoulders. "I slept on the ground. Suck it up, pretty-boy." It wasn't a massage; it was more an intentional harassment, the younger man releasing a squawked noise of protest as he lurched down in his seat to escape the painful clinch.
Scrambling to his feet to get entirely away from her, the Georgian turned a sour look in her direction. It was, however, not so sour that it didn't break into a smile the moment he started talking. "Ow, girl, jeez!"

She grinned back, unable to stop it. She'd have readily admitted that he was attractive - someone's type, definitely, if not hers - even before he'd bodily picked her up in his arms on the mall roof. He was the kind of guy every girl had a crush on at least once.

"Suck it up, I said."

She might've even gone there, were it not for the tiny voice in the back of her head that was pretty sure Lena was right, at least in part. There was definitely something going on between Ellis and Nick.

If she thought back, remembering those few days she'd have done a lot to take back, she could still close her eyes and see Nick's gaze gone feral, unfocused. His expression had warped into something beyond simply vengeful fury. Even as the entire group had urged him back, it had taken Ellis to snap him out of it, the rage had been so thick, so intense.

It only seemed odd in retrospect. At the time, she'd taken the events at face value; they'd both been two people capable of violence, thrust into opposition... but he'd not looked at her in that same way again, not even when they'd crossed paths the second time outside the beach condo. He'd been furious, and threatened her, but it just hadn't been the same.

He's an angry asshole, sure. But he's not the same asshole that almost shot me, just like I'm not the same asshole who almost shot him. She sighed, puffing out air, an unpleasant shiver touching her body. It wasn't something she liked thinking about, especially now that she considered the group her friends.

I... I lost myself in all this shit. Took me a bit to find me again. I'm still an asshole, always been, but... that wasn't me.

Rhiannon turned, letting her gaze find Nick. Where Coach had turned entirely away and hunched down over the bar, Nick was still staring at her with a dumbfounded look, snapping his mouth shut only after some delay. He turned away, then, raising a hand to scratch at his jawline. She swore his lips darted into an upward curl.

Wonder which asshole came first for him.
Ellis stuffed a few more crackers into his mouth, quickly reaching the point where he had to tip his head back to keep crumbs from tumbling free as he chewed. His mouth smacked with the motion of his jaw as he stared squarely at Chris, eyes wide, exaggerating every move.

The Spaniard grimaced back at him in horror, throwing his arm up and putting his hand in place against his temple to block vision of the other man. "I try to eat!"

Ellis' grin sent a puff of cracker dust tumbling free from the corners of his mouth, scattering over his lap like a light sawdust. Teasing him hadn't even been his original intention, but Chris made it so easy that it was tough to resist.

Keith would have had a field day.

"Disgusting." Rochelle managed past her giggling, leaning forward to waggle her eyebrows toward Ellis. The gesture was just shy of encouraging. "Leave it to you to ruin what little appetite we have left."

Laughing around his generous helping of mostly-chewed crackers proved difficult, especially as he was forced to realize just how much it had dried up his mouth. As the urge to cough rose up, he reached out to grab up the bottle of water by his elbow, quickly taking a swig. He swallowed, hard, drawing a horrified shudder from Lena where she stood a few feet away.

"God, dude. Wet crackers. Ew." The brunette snapped the bottom of her chip bag flat, tilting it to collect the crumbs in one corner before she tossed her head back and emptied it into her mouth.

"Like wet bread... crap's gross."

Across the room, seated on the end of one of the closer booths, Nick was staring down at the wrapper in his hands. He'd practically inhaled the granola bar contained inside, and was now in the process of meticulously folding it in some mindless pattern.

He followed the existing seams as much as he intentionally worked against them, working it down into a compressed shape, going until he couldn't get it to fold any further. It was thoughtless, idle, largely an effort he put forth to stop his brain from focusing on anything else.

Like the grin Ellis had on full blast.

"Sorry, y'all. I was hungry, is all."

Nick lifted his chin, darting his eyes across the room. Most of the team had taken up on a semicircle of chairs in the middle of the restaurant, though Lena was standing and rocking softly on her heels, and Coach had never moved from the bar. Nobody paid him much attention, a fact that did not escape Nick's notice.

Then again, nobody else had any particular reason to pay him attention - and Coach being withdrawn wasn't precisely out of the ordinary.

He looked to where Rhiannon was seated, injured leg sprawled up and onto the empty chair next to her, and carefully glanced her over. It felt like he needed to take stock of her again, recalculate, adjust his expectations. After all, he knew flirtation. He knew hollow threats, and he knew... sincerity.

Right then, he had zero idea if the blonde had been sincere or not.

It wasn't like the idea of someone finding Coach attractive was beyond belief. He was, in that quiet way, like the echo of a young football champion was only a few steps behind him. His frame fit him comfortably, his face pleasant and kind, gaining a handsome edge as his stubble grew thicker, salt and pepper crawling up his jawline.

Nick found himself sighing, and his shoulders must've moved with the gesture, because suddenly Rhiannon's eyes darted to find his. She grinned, subtly, curling her tongue against the broken shape of her canine in a knowing little quirk. He knew that, too.

She was enjoying the game.

He'd found it all funny, at first, if only by virtue of how unexpected it had been, and how completely disarmed the older Georgian had been by the advance. Whether it had been sincere or not, it had definitely put the man on his heels. Jesus... poor Coach. He's gonna get eaten alive.

Strangely, after humour, the very next thing Nick felt was a twinge of protectiveness. He didn't imagine Coach was particularly romantically experienced, and Nick did not trust Rhiannon's designs with him. The last thing Coach needed was a game, and he had no intention of watching the man get toyed with.

That thought quickly penned him into an unpleasant corner, though.

*Why hadn't he seriously entertained the thought of chasing her? Of chasing either sister, really, or both. There was some sense to it now, he supposed, in the interest of not throwing away his chances to get on their boat when the time came - but since when had reason and sense stopped him before?*

Fucking a biker would get Ellis off my back, that's for sure.

Nick couldn't shake the slimy sensation that oozed over him, like a stunted kind of disgust. The thought felt intrusive, unwanted, not unlike the macabre internal jokes that had suddenly started to grow out of control in recent days. He didn't want it, but there it sat.

If you aren't gonna let him fix it, you gotta do something. Rip off the band-aid. Make it easier for when you leave.

It reminded him suddenly of his early attempt to scare Ellis off, pinning him to the wall on the roof of a gas station. He'd figured feeling the kid up would trigger that reliable Southern homophobia and earn him some room to breathe. Of course, it had proven to do exactly the opposite.

It hadn't been his proudest moment, and it had gone a little further than he meant. Nick was a lot of things, but sexual assault had not ranked among his crimes. Pleasure was exponential, in his experience, and he didn't have any desire to do anything that wasn't mutually beneficial.

Dropping his gaze again to the wrapper now crumpled up tightly in his left hand, Nick bit down on the tip of his tongue. Rhiannon was unlikely to play ball, considering their history, but Lena might. She had plenty of girl-next-door appeal; it wasn't his typical genre of choice, though he'd never been particularly picky.

It was, perhaps, food for thought.
"So, nice as this is." he muttered, forcing his voice to project across the room. He didn't look up from his hands, but he did feel a wide array of eyes snap to him. "Are we gonna talk about yesterday? More specifically, the helicopter we didn't catch, and what we're doing now?"

There was a small silence, broken after a few seconds by the scrape of chairlegs against the wood floor as someone adjusted their weight. The atmosphere in the room cooled by a few degrees, like a brisk return to reality.

Ellis' voice quietly responded, calm and thoughtful. "We didn't catch it, but it didn't go far, neither. We saw where it went down, 'cross this bridge just a little ways on. We can go see. Maybe folk made it, or... we can find somethin' useful in the wreck, at least."

Nick did look up, then, watching Rochelle's head nod faintly.

"It had guns. The chopper, I mean. It had big ones on the sides. Rhee said it earlier - it scared me for a minute, all the talk about shooting Carriers. But they tried to land before they hit the edge of the roof, you know?" A wryness touched her voice, a sadness, and her eyes lowered toward the ground. "Whoever they were, they saw us, and they were going to land."

Lena's shoulders shrugged up gently, crossing her legs where she stood. "It's the closest I've been to any kind of government presence in a while. It was Navy, right?"

Rhiannon grunted affirmation, lolling her head back on her shoulders. She let her eyes wander over the survivors around her, and there was something thoughtful in her posture. "Yup. Wonder if it has anything to do with that boat you guys mentioned."

A small sigh made Rochelle's head bow. "That crossed my mind. Navy chopper, maybe a Navy military boat...? Probably wishful thinking, though." she admitted. "So is wondering if anyone will come looking for them."

"Maybe it's not." Ellis piped up, leaning forward, putting his elbows on his knees and bowing his back into a slump. He reached up and scratched at his head through his trucker cap. "Y'know, them tents we found. Looked like some important people were there, right? All them maps'n'shit, 'n' them bein' aware of places whut've come under attack, like they were communicatin' with the military."

"Sure." Rochelle assented, eyes darting across his expression. "So?"

The younger man flapped his right hand, grimacing. "I mean, shit. They weren't comin' fer us, right? Maybe they were lookin' fer those folk. And if someone sent 'em lookin' fer those folk, maybe someone'll come lookin' fer them."

A snort made Nick's body jolt, shifting to rest his shoulder into the side of the booth. "At some point, that's a lost cause. If there's someone out there directing resources, you don't wait for three strikes."

Ellis' gaze drifted to glance at him, tracing up and down his frame, and Nick couldn't control the shiver that sent goosebumps up the back of his neck. The look was soft, attentive. Casual. Like that conversation hadn't happened barely a half-day before.

"Maybe." the kid responded, bouncing his shoulders. "If anyone survived in that whirlybird, maybe they can tell us."

Nick shifted his jaw forward, the gesture parting his lips as he puffed a sigh. The urge to laugh at the Georgian's ridiculous terminology didn't win out, but it did drag his mouth into a curve. "So,
 Nobody rushed to respond. As he looked up, Ellis looked to Rochelle. Rochelle looked toward Chris, and Chris snapped his gaze toward Coach's back. The small ping-pong of glances ended there, as Coach was not looking in their direction. Silence reigned for a moment, before Nick cleared his throat.

"Coach?" he prompted, dryly. "We're voting, remember?"

The man's head bobbed subtly before he spoke up. If he'd been distracted at all, it didn't come across in his response. "Way I see it, we got two missions. Gotta find the girls their boat, and get us to that crash. Ain't gonna move on either of those sittin' on our asses here."

Rhiannon tapped her foot against the ground so her heel made a dull thump. She let her head roll from side to side, taking stock of the expressions facing her. "So, we head out."

Without turning around, Coach raised a hand, rubbing at the growing stubble across his scalp. A small snort touched his voice, head shaking, and he did not seem completely convinced. "Seems like it. Anyone against it?"

A few heads shook, and Christophe leaned forward a few inches. His eyes darted to more fully examine Coach, crinkling at his nose as he offered up, "Nothing else to talk about, ¿tío?" His voice was cautious, and innocuous enough that it didn't draw much attention from the other survivors.

It did make Coach's head turn, sparing a glance toward the foreigner. Nick might've dismissed the interaction, had both men not abruptly looked at him. Fight or flight threatened instantly, a surge of adrenaline making his eyes narrow to slits.

He hadn't expected them to forget about his collapse that easily, nor that one conversation with Coach would clear the air. He still had yet to talk to Chris about it; that damage control needed to happen sooner than later. He was already lucky it hadn't yet gotten spread around; Ellis and Chris talked too much, and they'd talk about it before long.

The exchange was over as fast as it had begun - too quickly for anyone else to put that much meaning into it all - after Coach shrugged a shoulder. His eyes settled much more coolly on Nick afterwards, gentled, even.

"Nick, you gonna catch that cat? If we gonna move, you gotta get it back in that carrier. Sure as shit ain't gonna let anyone else do it."

The gambler lifted his hand to scratch nails against his jawline, vaguely startled as they made contact and a few sharp points scraped against his skin. He turned his hand over, gazing at the few edges where his nails had broken, holding Ellis up over the mall balcony edge. With a vaguely furtive frown, he lifted his hand up to start biting at the couple of hangnails.

"S'fine." he muttered through clenched teeth.

Nick watched with a lowered chin as Ellis stood, suddenly, pushing one of his hands into the pocket of his jeans. He drifted his other hand over his forearm, thumbing over the pinkened patch of irritated skin there, a fresh acid burn.

"Um... I got one condition, though." The younger survivor looked tentatively around the space, only belatedly breaking into a tiny, sheepish grin. It lit up his eyes as a giddy excitement was badly repressed in his posture. "Can I ride on the bike this time?"
Lena burst into a smile at that, a gesture split between amusement and a soft warmth. It seemed genuine, even if a little hesitant at the edges.

Before approaching him, she bent down to grab for the wide duffel bag that contained the sisters' supplies. Some effort strained at her frame as she straightened with it on her shoulder, quickly waving off her younger sister as Rhiannon almost jolted upright to come and help her.

The brunette then stepped toward Ellis, nudging his bicep with a fist as she passed him by and offering a wink. "Sounds like a plan. You and me, bud. Let's get it set up."

Ellis grinned bashfully back, darting to fall into step behind her. He bounced with every step, practically stumbling to stop himself from colliding with her back as he followed a little too close. "Man, muh buddy Keith always wanted a hog. We used tuh dirtbike all the time, but it ain't the same. He'll be so jealous, me gettin' tuh ride on one, killin' zombies'n'shit."

The woman gave him a humouring laugh, responding, "I bet."

Nick watched them cross the restaurant, disappearing into the entranceway and out of the building, their voices hushing as they moved to exit entirely. He resisted a wince as he peeled part of a broken shard of nail free, stripping just a little too close to his nailbed.

As he used the pad of his thumb to feel over the profile of his nail and appease himself with the feeling of the surface being now mostly smooth, he sighed. He couldn't shake a sense of dread and unease, and he was very sure part of it sourced from the fact Chris was still looking at him.

Damage control.
Chapter 265

It didn't take much time to load the car. The bulkiest of their supplies was the drink icebox, freshly filled with water, and the blankets and pillows they'd stolen from the condo. They'd worked through a lot of their food which, while unfortunate, also lightened their load.

Their guns and weapons were mostly held in their arms or on their shoulders, though Nick left his sniper rifle and katana in the front passenger's seat to claim it for himself.

If he was going to have Maggie in his lap, carrier or no, he wasn't going to crush into the backseat with two other people. She hadn't shown any sign of calming down around the other survivors, and the canvas material of the carrier wasn't thick enough to make him comfortable with balancing a hissing and spitting ball of fury on his lap. Not to mention, he just wanted the better seat in the car.

When he got a dark look from Rochelle, he deigned to stick his tongue out at her. She laughed, and something warm settled in his chest that he didn't examine too closely. It also didn't last.

Ellis and Lena had lashed the duffel bag to the rear of the bike, held tightly in place with bungee cords. The Georgian was getting prepared, pulling on Rhiannon's helmet, struggling a little to get it fitted over his head. He was grinning up until the moment his face disappeared behind the dark plastic visor, and Lena was grinning back at him.

Nick only watched for a moment before retreating into the restaurant. He ached, and calling it jealousy grated at him. Pathetic.

He closed the door behind him, inhaling sharply, looking up to where he knew his cat was perched. Orange eyes stared intently back at him from the top of the wall, her hunched shape backlit by the windows dimly illuminating the room behind her. She was poised uncomfortably, driven to a nervous energy by the commotion surrounding their preparations.

"Time to go, sweetheart." he murmured, stepping forward. He reached up, stretching onto his toes, and she didn't resist as he tucked his hands underneath her to lift her up. Her paws did scrabble out weakly as he pulled her to his chest, but her claws mostly caught on his shirt. "Us humans have shit to do."

Maggie sniffed at his jawline, whiskers tickling his cheek as she started to settle against him. Her body relaxed, tentatively surrendering into his grip, tail curling around his forearm.

Then the door opened behind him.

White flashed over Nick's vision, alongside the pain of eighteen tiny claws sinking straight into his skin. He bit back a shout, quickly staggering a few steps down the hall. "Jesus fuck! Warning!" He tried for a few seconds to keep a hold of her and support her rear enough to stop the instinctive unsheathing of her claws - but when the pain did not subside, instinct made him let go.

Maggie leapt from his arms, back paws grinding against his midsection as she used him like a launchpad. Her body was a flash of darkness as she scrambled back into the restaurant, skidding against the wood, paws and tail sprawling in all directions as she barely kept her balance before disappearing out of sight.

A startled laugh was stifled into a snort, and Chris' hurried response did not sound very genuine. "¡Lo siento!"
Nick scattered a glance back at him, grimacing, trying to communicate his agitation rather than his pain in the gesture. "For fuck's sake, Chris. If you're lookin' to kill me, just take a swing, okay?" he sighed, rubbing his hand into his chest to soothe the stinging points of pain scattered there. "It'll be less cruel."

The Spaniard grinned at him, that subtle and non-discriminatory flirtation sprawled over the soft brown of his skin. "Ya lo intenté, ¿recuerda?"

"I already tried that."

Nick wasn't completely sure if that was a joke aimed at their previous opposition, or the strike he'd received in the mall dressing room. He didn't like either answer. Disinterested in engaging at all, and resigned to the fact he'd have to chase the feline down, Nick started forward as he waved a hand behind himself to urge Christophe to remain at the door.

"Come on, girl, we gotta go." he murmured, eyes darting to look for her as he came into the main section of the restaurant. He started clicking his tongue in a soft attempt at a calming noise.

He circled the first booth that was against the wall, where he'd placed the carrier on top of the table there, the front panel unzipped and hanging open. An absurd instinct made him look inside... but that would have been too easy. It was empty.

His head turned to look behind him, tongue still clicking, and he found her peeping crossly at him from behind a table leg.

Maggie's body melded almost flawlessly into the dark, her mottled colouration almost better camouflage than a pitch black pelt. Her eyes reflected a sharp tint of yellow-green as they caught the light, dim headlights in the shadow. Her attention was sharp on him and only grew sharper when he took a step forward, like she might bolt.

A sigh dropped his shoulders, and he approached no closer. With something of a grunt, he dropped down, squatting where he stood and sticking his hand out, knuckles proffered. "Come on, you brat. Don't make this harder on me, okay? I'm tryin' here."

Maggie stared him down, her whiskers flexing as they stood on end along with the rest of her fur. It was, without a shadow of a doubt, the face of a cat who had no intention of obeying.

Hanging his head, Nick sighed - and he might've felt defeated, had he not had a backup plan. "Alright, fine. Bribery it is."

Nick reached into the front left pocket of his jeans, straightening a bit to ease the pressure his crouch put on the waistband. He pulled out the snack-sized, individually wrapped jerky he'd been holding onto for her.

With the last of her cat food gone, feeding her would quickly become an issue. She'd continued to display an eerie inclination towards quiet, like she'd learned that noise drew attention to her and avoided it. If they didn't keep her fed, however, he couldn't imagine that lasting.

Listening to the cracked and pathetic noises she did pull together on occasion, part of him wondered if she hadn't screamed herself hoarse in her time captive with her undead owner. It was a thought that made him strangely angry - and it was an anger he didn't know what to do with.

Her rapt attention on his hands made him keep moving.

Peeling the two halves of the plastic casing apart, Nick plucked the small tube-shaped hunk of jerky meat out, fingers immediately slick with thin grease. He held it out toward her, waving it a little in the air as if to waft the scent over to her. It smelled vaguely spiced, yet syrupy and sweet.

"I can always just eat this myself, y'know." he threatened, a scowl touching his face, as if she'd understand the look.

Her attention was unwavering, but so was her posture. Her eyes flickered between his hands and his face, whiskers so taut they trembled, glinting in silver threads spread out to either side of her snout. She was desperate... and resolute in her refusal to move.

With a restrained sigh and the sudden urge to smile, Nick lifted the jerky up, opening his mouth to stuff it between his teeth. He found the halfway point with his thumb braced against his canine as a guide, biting to split the mini sausage into two pieces, ignoring the slightly burnt and smoky flavour that flooded his mouth.

Prying one half free and holding it in his fingers, Nick stowed the other half like a cigar butt clenched between his teeth, lips parted to pant out a breath around it. He leaned forward, tossing the half in his hand. It hit the ground and bounced to roll closer to her.

Though her posture twitched, it wasn't until the jerky piece was barely inches from her that she squatted down to lap it up. Quiet mumbled noises sounded up from her as she chewed, head bobbing with the effort of devouring the snack.

Nick took the risk of approaching, raising into a half-crouch and crossing the few long strides between him and the cat. He moved with calm confidence rather than trying to sneak up on her, and though her ears flicked up to track him, she was too focused on her food to shift away.

When he scooped his hand under her belly, however, the cat started to stiffen and her head recoiled. She swallowed the hunk of jerky with a snap of her jaws, and her distraction disappeared with it.

"No, no -" Nick hushed, quickening his movements to lift her up off the ground. She started to struggle, her back legs kicking up and gaining purchase against his elbow. With a grimace, the gambler hurried to turn, striding back toward the booth where the carrier sat open. "C'mon, almost -"

He wasn't sure how hard it would be to get her inside, but his concern was unfounded. When he bent over, she practically lunged out of his grip to catch her front claws in the fabric of the carrier, kicking off his chest to throw herself inside. She collided with the other end, the carrier sliding a few inches with the force of her entrance.

Wincing at the pain still flecked over his arm and across his chest, Nick sighed. He reached up to pluck the other half of the jerky sausage from between his teeth, tossing it into the carrier before zipping the flap shut behind her. She hissed at him, stubbornly - a few beats before more chewing noises started up.

"There we go, you little monster." he snorted, popping his thumb into his mouth and sucking off the grease left there. He turned his head to watch as Christophe stepped after him, the foreigner coming more cautiously around the corner.

"She is good?" he queried, looking with curiosity at the carrier. A soft embarrassment flecked his expression, like he'd been chastised, and there was no more humour to his voice. "I did not mean -"

Nick set a hand on the carrier when a muffled hiss sounded out again, rotating at the waist to face the Spaniard. "It's fine, kid." he interrupted, wryly glancing him over as he spoke, a firmness flexing at his jawline. He tried for a dismissive tone, and wasn't sure what he ended up with. "Dealt with."

Damage control, he reminded himself.

The two of them were alone. It was as good a time as any to catch a moment with the man. It would've been easy to start the conversation himself... he wanted, in fact, to have it... but reflex had him turning away from the opportunity. Playing coy, perhaps, because it was likely no coincidence that Christophe had come to find him. "Let's go."

He started to pick the cat carrier up, grabbing the strap and starting to lift. He didn't do much more than tense his arm, however, before Christophe reached out and grasped at his other sleeve to stop him. Some satisfaction settled into his chest as he counted the interaction as a victory, but he kept the emotion out of his eyes as he offered a vague lift of one brow.

Christophe sighed, gently, his head lowering a few degrees. His fingers tightened and eased on Nick's sleeve, like a soft knead that dug his knuckles into the man's tricep. "Nico, you are good?"

The contact lingered, and Nick twisted his shoulder, only having to apply a little bit of force to the gesture before Chris relented and let him go. The Northerner snorted, drawing his voice into tight sarcasm. 'I'm great. Why are you asking? Aren't we all doing fan-fucking-tastic out here?"

The other man didn't do more than shift his weight before responding, lids lowering in a gentle and unamused half-blank. "I do not think so." Before Nick could react, the Spaniard lifted his hand, hovering it over the stump of his amputated arm. "You know... you save me, amigo. You see me... Entonces vio lo peor de todo. It was bad day, that day, with the gun, ¿sabes?"

Nick felt a frown start on his lips, unsure if it looked frustrated or insecure. He tried to morph it more confidently into the former. "Yeah, kid. I was there, I remember. Your point?"

This was not how he'd meant to steer the conversation - but he'd surrendered control from the very beginning by letting Christophe start it. It had been a miscalculation.

Chris hesitated a beat, lowering his hand to instead cup his palm against his waist and hug his torso lightly. His chin raised, gaze wandering over Nick's face, and the sincerity there was too heady for Nick's comfort. "You had bad day, too, right? You want to talk about it?"

At that, Nick outright laughed. It escaped him more genuinely than he intended, though that sincerity came with a dose of venom that he also hadn't quite planned to let through. He choked it back, curling his lips against his teeth for a moment before responding. "No, not really. And I'd appreciate you keeping whatever you think you know to yourself."

A sigh made Chris' chest collapse inward, eyes rolling upward. It verged on frustrated. "Nico, you do not have to hide. I know how it is, to be not okay. I know... pain, and... You feel like a... ay, una carga, ¿sí? You make it... hard, for others, so you hide it."

This was definitely not how he'd wanted the conversation to go. Full red alert activated in the back of his skull, forcing another laugh up from his chest, dismissive. Nick put his hands up, as if warding the younger man off. "Chris."

The sudden way that Chris invaded his space made Nick's heart jolt in his chest. He couldn't help a stiffening of his posture, his shoulders, as theforeigner pushed forward. His hand raised, this time firmly gripping Nick's shirtfront and tightening into a clutch. "You saw things, right? Alucinaciones, in the mall. I heard you."
Slow, deliberate, Nick let his eyes flicker down to motion in the direction of the hand grasping at him. It was a warning that Chris showed no indication of heeding.

"I see things too, Nico."

The confusion that sparked, then, was strangely cold. His attention darted up, gaze matching Chris' to search there. He found sincerity there that he didn't expect, and it put him completely off his guard, voice stolen by a lump in his throat.

The other man seemed to relax slightly, though his grip did not. "I see B. I hear them both, sometimes, but I see her outside the mall, too. Blood, all... all over, here..." He released Nick long enough to draw a vague circle over his belly, then dropped his arm to his side with a dull thud. "She looked at me - like a zombie, but... like she knew me, too. They both haunt me, I think."

Nick didn't need to try hard to have his mind's eye fill in the blanks. His last view of Brenda had been not far from that description. Her eyes had been wild, feral, even in the moments following her body failing under the point-blank shot. She'd cradled her stomach as her guts leaked crimson through her blouse, still grinning.

"It is... La culpabilidad, Nico, the... guilt, ¿sí? The head gets wrong." Sadness crept into his voice, but Christophe uttered a small laugh to force past it. "Ellis say I have... em, phantom pain, ¿sí? Dolor de fantasma. It comes with extra fantasma, for me, I think."

She'd grinned up at him, and he'd watched the blossoming darkness swallow her midsection, unable to think of much but how long it would take her to die that way. Her guts were sundered and they'd leak toxins into her belly and septic shock would kill her before the blood loss did. It was fitting. It had satisfied him.

It had been cruel.

Cruel enough, it occurred to him in some tilted half-pace that felt like sluggish fear, that they'd never shared the details.

"It is the stress, ¿sabes?" Chris' eyes were soft, understanding, and the hesitation in his voice fell away. He'd read something on Nick's face, maybe, or misread it. "Is not your fault, Nico, y... I am here, if you -"

"Who told you?" Nick returned, simply, the words falling harshly from his lips. He focused abruptly on the other man's face, gaze so sharp it might've cut the air it crossed over. When Christophe frowned in clear confusion, he repeated it more carefully, teeth on edge as he enunciated thicker. "Who told you how she died?"

Their eyes searched each others' in unison, confusion only multiplying when neither of them found what they were expecting. Neither of them understood, and they both saw it, and the gap between them felt massive and unknown.

"Nico -"

A gunshot, muted from outside but still loud enough to crack in his eardrum, stole the moment away from them.

Nick's body flung into motion on instinct. He reached out, circling an arm around Chris' waist and pulling him closer. When the younger man obeyed the pull, he twisted, and they rotated in some stunted swirl around one another that put Chris where Nick had stood a moment before.
"Get her." he stated, flat, only moving away when he saw Chris' hand dart toward the carrier on the booth table.

He reached down, pulling his Magnum from the thigh-holster strapped on his left leg, and he charged into the restaurant entry hall. His eyes slanted to look through the windows as he strode past, just shy of a run, and some of his adrenaline eased as he picked out the whole of the team on their feet outside.

They were clustered close, though, responding to some clear disturbance with that instinctive protective circle. Rhiannon and Lena were in the process of easing into it as he looked on, slower to join, the physical response less natural to them.

That didn't stop Nick's momentum, however, and he shoved the door open and thrust himself through it. The porch door surrendered to a strike of his shoulder, though he had the presence of mind to snap his free hand out and grab it before it clapped into the outside of the building.

"Guys?" he barked out, aiming his Magnum carefully down at the ground. Ellis' head was the first to snap up, looking toward him, but the black motorcycle helmet disguised any indication of his expression. "The fuck?"

The Georgian lifted the pump shotgun in his hands, gesturing, and Nick followed it to a slumped shape a few feet from them. It was warped, legs muscular. Its outstretched arm was topped with wicked claws, grown out from their nailbeds, spiked talons of yellowed keratin.

"Jumpin' sonnuva bitch, came outta nowhere." he returned, voice slightly muffled in the constraints of the helmet.

Nick gazed over the yard, inhaling, forcing in badly-needed oxygen through flared nostrils. You're insane. It's just a coincidence. Only so many places blood can go, for fuck's sake.

"We should go." Coach boomed out, calm tone edged by a tacit layer of unease. "No sense hangin' around waitin' fo' more to show up." He lowered his shotgun, but did not lower his shoulders. His gaze flashed up toward Nick with a critical frown. "You got the cat, Nicky?"

He felt a presence brush at the back of his shirt, and twisted his head. Chris stood just behind him, the carrier held up and away from himself like a loaded weapon. There was a frown on his face, his honey-brown eyes averted.

There was thought, there, wheels cranking in his head, not that Nick could blame him.

Just freaking both of us out for no reason. Rochelle probably told him and he doesn't remember, or maybe he was a little conscious when we carried him out of that pawn shop. Or maybe it's just a fucking coincidence. You're overthinking. The fuck else would it be?

Nick gritted out a sigh, blindly sliding his Magnum back into its holster as he reached out to take the carrier. As he lifted it out of Chris' grasp, he muttered, "I'm fine, Chris. Just let it go, alright? I don't need your help."

He didn't expect Christophe to nod, nor to step and abruptly push past him. He watched the Spaniard take the porch steps in one hop, and walk silently over to their parked sedan. He popped open the back door and slid inside, not sparing so much as a glance for the rest of the team.

Rochelle, at least, noticed - but she seemed to merely follow suit, like it was simply an effort to obey Coach. Rhiannon came after her, filing into the back seat of the sedan, leaving the front seats for Coach and Nick.
The gambler clenched his fingers around the top handle of the carrier, feeling Maggie's weight shift vaguely inside. Least he's not thinking about you anymore, right? Situation under control, or something like that.

He did not feel in control.

Lena was sliding into place on the motorcycle, patting the space behind her for Ellis, and Nick's feet started carrying him to the car with an urgency he couldn't restrain. He had no interest in watching Ellis' arms go around her waist.

Fuck me.
Chapter 266

Ellis closed his eyes, tightening his arms where they were wrapped around Lena's waistline, snagging fingers in his own sleeves to draw them even tighter. The warm air buzzing up against his bared neck was strangely soothing, as was the bassy rumble and vibration thrumming up through his body.

He should have been paying attention, but it was easy to lose focus. Lena was maneuvering the motorcycle forward at a steady pace, keeping up with the sedan trundling along ahead of them, and there wasn't much he could do aside from hold on. He tried to look around them, keeping an eye out for danger, but he mostly just wanted to rest into the warmth of Lena's back and soak in the feeling of speed and power.

It was smoother, he determined, than a dirt bike. Wonder how different it is tuh drive... wonder if she'd let me. Oh, man, Keith's gonna be so jealous...

He could feel the vague pressure against his lower back, where he'd stuffed his Bullshifters shirt with no better place to stow it. The knowledge of it there, alongside his current train of thought, made him strangely homesick. Homesick for normalcy, he supposed.

I can't wait tuh tell him.

"Havin' fun?" she called back to him. They were not going near fast enough that the wind could wick her voice away, and Ellis burst out into an exaggerated cackle in succinct answer. "You have no idea how many hot dates I've taken home on this thing. It's kind of my move."

That made him laugh again, but it was quieter, more for himself that time. "Girl, whut the hell -"

Their passage stirred infected, but they kept moving to outpace any of the zombies that charged out into the street after them. He saw the flash of a bloated shape, wobbling closer as they passed, but by the time the Boomer had reached the sidewalk they were well out of range.

"Can I ask you something?" she threw over her shoulder, voice slightly breathless despite the fact they weren't exerting themselves. Without thinking, Ellis tensed, and she must've felt the gesture because she added, "It's harmless, this time, I promise."

Her acknowledgement of the situation was comforting, and yet also raised his guard a little. She'd pried more than once with him, and he'd mostly assumed that she simply came to him as the most open-seeming member of the team. He'd been the first to extend friendship toward them, after all, and he tried to come across as honest and kind wherever he could.

Still, the voice in the back of his head - the one that sounded a whole lot like Nick - protested.

He'd been driven terribly close to losing faith in people after their encounter with the Angels, and breaking up with Nick had not helped. Meeting Rhiannon the second time around and seeing how she'd changed had soothed him. Bonding with the sisters had strengthened him back up, given him his footing again, given him that warmth and trust again. He believed again, even just a little.

He didn't want to lose that.

"Whut's up?" he responded, quieter, carefully.

She scattered a glance back at him, shadowed by her visor. There was a pause, and he couldn't help but think it was loaded. Did she sense his trepidation? Did it surprise her? He felt bad, then, and the urge to apologize crawled up his spine. She merely shrugged a shoulder. "Uh... nevermind, actually, it's not important... We're here, anyway."

The dismissal made him frown, curiosity surging at the prospect of being denied an explanation. It was easier, naturally, to avoid the conversation entirely, as well as unsatisfying. He wanted to argue at the same time that he wanted to let it go without a word.

Let it go. he self-soothed. She don't mean nothin' by it. She's just gunshy after messin' things up in the mall. Be kinder tuh let her off the hook.

"Okay." Ellis responded aloud, which technically qualified as a compromise.

Leaning his head forward, accidentally bumping the corner of his helmet into the back of Lena's when he forgot just where the front of it extended to, Ellis glanced out in front of them. The road wasn't empty, scattered with parked cars and fallen debris that tried to impede their progress, but there was enough room to swerve from one side of the road to the other to avoid it - until there wasn't.

They'd quickly advanced along the path they'd taken to the mall, retracing their steps, but it didn't take long for them to reach the same obstacle they'd noticed on foot: the main road through Tybee was blocked up with vehicles.

Cars were pressed bumper-to-bumper and set askew on the road in places. Bodies littered the road between them, the whole scene a snapshot of panic, frozen in time. The movement of infected passing amongst the vehicles shifted in strange parallax to the environment: motion next to the petrified echo of it.

They'd anticipated the blockade, and known it wouldn't let their sedan through. They didn't have a detailed map of Tybee, but their tourist guide gave them enough of a layout of the roads to see the gridlike pattern of the area surrounding them. The network of roads had a good chance of providing a detour, but the risk of running into a dead end remained.

If they had to, abandoning the sedan was an option. The icebox might've fit on the back of the bike, lashed to it alongside the duffel bag pressed into Ellis' lower back, with only one person riding it. Still, that was a worst case scenario. They also had some canned and boxed meals left that they would have to leave behind, and that felt like a dangerous choice.

"Time to figure out if we're stywed or not." Rochelle's voice crackled from the radio clipped onto the collar of Ellis' denim jacket. He'd attached it there so it would be close to his ear, ensuring he'd hear the quiet buzz of voices from it. "Stay-close."

The sedan turned abruptly, pulling into one of the crossroads that opened up before the worst of the traffic pile-up. Lena accelerated with a twist of her grip on the throttle, turning them to nudge toward the sidewalk. The motorcycle jolted as it clambered up the edge of the sidewalk, once as the front wheel struck, then again as the back wheel followed.

She slowed once they'd scaled it, but still kept enough speed to overtake the sedan. Ellis turned his head to peer into the windows as they pulled up parallel, seeing his teammates clustered inside. Rhiannon's face took up most of the rear passenger window, looking back at him, and she raised her hand to press her middle finger against the glass.

Ellis couldn't quite resist a laugh, craning his head to look through the driver's side window as they drew further in line with the car. The glass was rolled down, Coach's arm resting in the frame, providing a much clearer view inside. Nick was leaned forward in the passenger's seat, one arm draped over the cat carrier in his lap and the other raised, their slim tourist guide held in his hand.
He kept staring - and when Nick's eyes abruptly cut over to look back at him, Ellis extricated one of his arms from around Lena's waist and raised a hand. He gave a teasing wag of his fingers.

Nick's mouth twisted in quiet irritation, and he did not wave back.

The motorcycle revved gently, speeding up and shooting them around the corner of the building to their left. The abrupt motion and shift in balance made Ellis surge his arm back around Lena's waist, grabbing his own wrist to lock his hands against her stomach. They surpassed the sedan, but remained on the sidewalk to stay out of the road.

Ellis peeked over his shoulder, glad that he could frown freely inside his borrowed helmet. So much of the strange emotion knotted up in him had eased after making his confession - no, his promise - to Nick. He felt in control, even though that couldn't have been further from the truth.

Still, he found himself worried. Something was going on with Nick that he didn't fully understand, and he had no way to know if he'd helped or hurt the situation by laying out his ultimatum. Would Nick listen, or just fight back harder?

Probably good I did it, either way. Fer me, at least.

"Zombies." Lena alerted, and Ellis stiffened, gaze darting up to spot the few infected she indicated. Two sat on the asphalt, kneeling next to the dark shape of a corpse, and two more were wandering out from a house's open doorway. Before he could do more than observe them, however, she eased off the throttle to let the bike slow to a crawl.

The sedan was catching up - it, too, slowing.

"We can't outpace them as well in these side roads, not with a car. Think it's better if we take them out." Lena's head turned to look back at him, shrugging her leather-clad shoulder. Though he couldn't see her face through the tinted visor, there was a grin in her voice when she spoke. "You ready to get a little dirty?"

Ellis' weight shifted in an eager wiggle, nodding his head in a firm bob of affirmation. "Born ready," he responded, tone his best attempt at a low growl, putting a little extra drawl into it.

His chest surged as the motorcycle suddenly snarled underneath him, gravity hooking in his gut and pulling, as if it were protesting the abrupt speed that thrust them forward. He gripped Lena harder, squinting his eyes against wind he couldn't feel as they shot over the sidewalk, staying atop the concrete pads.

The two infected wandering out into the street took notice of them instantly, snapping to face them, and Ellis snaked one of his arms back to feel behind his waist. His fingers landed on the duffel bag, zipped almost entirely closed except for the last two or three inches. From that opening protruded the black handle of Rhiannon's stun baton, and he tore it free.

He turned his left hand to clutch into the front of her jacket, letting his left arm anchor him as he pushed up, partially standing on the slim pegs extending off the motorcycle's chassis that supported his feet. His other arm hefted the baton, rotating his wrist to swing it threateningly.

"Just like hittin' mailboxes on muh bike!"' he shouted, grinning, an exhilaration running up his spine like crackling static. He stretched out his arm, less a swing and more simply putting the baton into position so their momentum would carry it into the other zombie's head or neck. "Get me there!"

Rather than respond, Lena accelerated, the side of the building to their left buzzing dangerously
The distance between them and the two infected rapidly vanished, especially once the zombies started running at them as if to meet them halfway.

The leftmost zombie angled to cut them off, the other an arm's length beside it, and its path drew it directly in front of the bike. They'd collide directly into it in seconds at their current pace.

Ellis expected her to brake and swerve away, but her body bore down, legs abruptly tightening against the sides of the motorcycle's body. Her fingers shifted to encircle the slim levers that jutted out behind the handles, and the soft tension she applied caused a stutter in their acceleration, a fractional hitch of their speed.

He braced himself, gritting his teeth, unable to stop his eyes from darting one last time toward the zombie that was just feet from the nose of the bike.

Then inches.

Suddenly, the motorcycle bucked, its front half lurching up off the ground. He shouted first in alarm, but it warped quickly into excitement as the front wheel of the bike smoothly lifted a foot or two off the ground, the engine roaring up as she twisted the throttle, just once, then let go.

They didn't go high enough to bring on that sensation of weightlessness, and they didn't swivel into a full wheelie. It was, however, high enough that when the infected collided with them, it mostly hit the front tire. As she'd released the throttle, the bike crashed back down in the same motion, the impact of its weight taking the zombie to the ground.

The scream of it cut into silence as they drove over it, her hand teasing at the throttle just enough to maintain their speed through the turbulence of its body rolling under the wheels.

It was as they jolted back onto flat ground that Ellis felt his arm snap back with abrupt force, pain spasming through the joint as the muscles were pulled slightly against the grain. He had to remind himself of why he'd been holding his arm out in the first place: the other zombie.

He looked back, and the infected was on the ground. Its head was snapped at a strange angle, torso trying to follow, twisting as if it could realign its spine with its skull by force. It clawed fingers against the asphalt to get up to its hands and knees, but the moment it lifted its head from the road, something seemed to give.

It fell limp, limbs twitching in odd spasms, even as its jaw continued to gnash.

Ellis drew his arm against his side, adrenaline numbing the pain that accompanied the movement, and he couldn't resist a wordless hoot. He turned, lowering himself to sit flat on the passenger seat of the motorcycle, shaking his hand where it clutched her jacket in an excited gesture. "Holy shit! That was amazin'! We're amazin'!"

He tried to look back, eyes darting toward the sedan as if he'd see his team looking out, impressed.

"Two more. Focus, sunshine!" Lena's voice yanked his attention back forward, and the motorcycle abruptly jerked to a halt as her right hand and foot shifted to manipulate the brakes. The bike turned just a little, skidded, her left foot dropping to scrape her heel against the concrete. She caught their weight on it as they halted, keeping it upright even as Ellis swung his legs to one side and leapt off.

He bolted, hearing the soft click and scrape as she popped the kickstand free and let the bike lean onto it, charging the two infected sitting on the road without waiting for her. It had taken the actual crash of metal on flesh for them to take notice, and they were just getting to their feet as he ran toward them.

The first one lurched at him, and he wielded the baton with both hands, turning his body so he could strike it in the chin as it approached. The blow knocked it back, chin splitting open in a gush of black, and the other shoved past it with a shriek.

As the second infected charged him, its face came into abrupt focus, cracked smears of black and dingy red over its mouth and hands. It screamed, lashing out, and he braced a palm on either end of the baton to shove out to strike its chest and keep it at bay, grunting with the effort. As it skidded back, falling to a crouch to keep its footing, he heard the thudding of footsteps on asphalt behind him.

He might've stiffened and reflexively turned, had Lena not called out, "On your left."

The shorter woman was a streak of black and brown in his periphery, and she lunged forward, wielding Chris' machete in her left hand. Her brush-axe was a little too heavy for her, still, her body quick to exhaust after her narrow recovery.

The zombie looked up with a snarl just in time for the machete to strike into the dip of its neck, hacking straight into the vitals there, and blood gushed around the blade. It screamed, lashing out a hand to grab for her wrist where she held the handle of the weapon stuck in its neck, its nails digging into the flesh bared just at the edge of her jacket sleeve.

A small cry of pain didn't stop her from kicking out, landing her heel square against its chest as if to knock it off her. However, when it fell back, landing on its rear on the road, it did not release her. The collapse of its body took her into a stagger, jerked into a forward bend as she was forced to follow it.

"Shoot -" she uttered, voice pitching up just slightly.

Ellis lurched beside her and struck out, catching the zombie just behind the ear with the tip of the baton. Its skull gave with a sickening squelch and it slipped to the ground, its grip going slack.

The shouted sound of the first infected, now recovered, lunging for him made his arm swing out on reflex, and as the tip of the baton struck into the male zombie's sternum, he thumbed the button built into the handle. The sharp crack of electricity buzzed through his forearm, and he watched the creature's expression warp as its body suddenly stiffened.

It started to fall, to topple over, but Lena acted first. She slipped the machete right between two of its ribs and twisted. Something cracked - broke - and when Ellis released the button, the infected collapsed, leaving them in relative silence for a beat or two.

They stood, panting indelicately within the confines of their helmets.

Ellis looked down as he caught his breath, eyes catching on the corpse that the two infected had been huddled around. It was not fresh, but the damage done by rot and the changes caused by the Flu were very different. It wasn't hard to tell it was an uninfected body.

Its torso was split open, leaking innards and clotted viscera out onto the asphalt. It almost seemed like the two infected had been digging around in its insides, now that he'd had a better look at it and them. It made his nose twitch in a disgusted gesture, even as he continued to squint down at it and cocked his head. "Nasty."

"Yeah. Gross." she agreed, stepping a little closer to him. "Good work, though." When Lena lifted her uninjured hand, palm flat, Ellis practically tripped over himself to swap the baton into his other hand and complete the high-five with gusto. She laughed at him, loudly, shaking her hand out as if in pain.

"Don't give cocky." buzzed from his jacket collar, startling him - and mostly because it was Nick's voice instead of Rochelle's.

Ellis squinted over his shoulder, and against his better judgement, reached up to thumb the 'TALK' button. He spoke before he could second-guess himself, letting a dubious edge touch his voice, and unable to hide the hints of a smile if he'd wanted to. "Worried 'bout me?"

Flirting again felt awfully good, even if it would've been better with genuine reciprocation. The silence that responded was answer enough, though, and he turned to start walking back toward the motorcycle, aware of Lena following quietly at his heels.

He certainly wasn't going to make things easy.
Rochelle couldn't stop looking around the cabin of the sedan, lips pursed, her brows in a stoic tangle. She genuinely hadn't expected just how much tension would build up in the car, and she couldn't determine precisely where it came from.

Nick was obvious enough, certainly. He'd started up a rigid silence the moment he'd gotten eyes on Lena and Ellis, particularly as the two brunettes had visibly been enjoying themselves. The idea of him being jealous of them was ridiculous for any number of reasons, not the least of which was the hypocrisy of it, considering he'd self-exiled from Ellis' attentions.

Does he seriously think they're into each other? Even if both - either - of them were straight... Ellis is so stuck on him, I'm surprised there isn't glue involved.

Not that the reverse isn't true, too.

His bad mood had thickened tangibly after the Georgian's stunt on the radio, about which she vacillated between pride and worry before settling on simple amusement. Ellis seemed in a remarkably good mood, and that was nice to see, whatever the consequences. Still, the Northerner was not the only source of tension; if he had been, she'd have dismissed it.

Coach and Christophe were dead silent, and had been since they'd gotten on the road. Even when she reached out and settled her fingertips against the Spaniard's wrist, brushing them inquisitively against the soft outline of tendon and vein there, he did not react. His eyes were vague and distant, head slumped back against the seat cushion behind him.

She stilled her fingers, then tapped them against his skin in a more insistent gesture. "Chris?" she murmured, splitting the difference between concerned and innocuous.

When he acknowledged her, it was with the smallest tilt of his head. He leaned his ear toward her without actually snapping his gaze into focus, as if he couldn't tear himself away from whatever far-off thought had him enraptured. "Hm?" he murmured, softly, only half-present.

Rochelle stared at him, her head cocking, perturbed at the shift in his mood since that morning. While the painkillers in his system surely played some part, it looked more like intense reverie, and more than a little anxiety. A moment of curiosity made her look down, gazing over his hand.

There was still dried blood around his cuticles, but it seemed faded, like he'd at least not dug at them too recently.

Comforted by that knowledge, she tapped her thumb on his forearm and responded, "You okay? You seem out of it."

Chris hummed, a faint dismissal. She might've felt put out had he not twisted his wrist abruptly, sliding his arm back so he could draw their palms together. His fingers slid between her knuckles, and she felt a smile jump over her expression. She squeezed his hand where his palm rested against hers and felt the gesture returned.

"Gay." Rhiannon intoned, calmly, and Rochelle's head snapped forward to look over Chris' lap at the other woman.

She was sprawled against the car door, one knee up and braced on the back of the driver's seat, the other spread till her leg nudged into Chris'. The angled lounge had her facing them with a little too much scrutiny. She grinned toothily at the attention, lifting one hand to press her thumb against her cracked canine and biting down on it. It seemed like half a coy gesture and half a tic, applying soft pressure onto the broken edge of her tooth.

" Seriously?" Rochelle shot back, and it took everything in her power not to let her lips curve. She didn't miss the way Chris flinched out of his fugue, looking uncertainly down at their hands, and she meaningfully curled her fingers to tighten the grip they had on each other. "That's what you got?"

Chris flickered into a smile in her periphery.

The blonde gave a rasped laugh, studded brow waggling up and down. "Call 'em like I see 'em." She shifted her leg to jostle the driver's seat with her knee. "Right, Pops?"

Coach leaned forward to pull away as his seat shook, eyes squinting, clutching the steering wheel of the sedan a little harder. He stayed focused ahead, passing a vaguely chiding grunt over his shoulder to the woman behind him. It sounded almost sincere in its frustration. "Girl, I'm drivin' here."

Rhiannon laughed again, this time on the verge of a cackle, surging suddenly forward. She hooked one arm around the bottom of the headrest of his seat, leaning in to settle her chin on the upper edge of the seatback. Her gaze darted between the two men in the front of the car. "Fuck's wrong with you guys, anyway? It's like a funeral in here. How's my wet-blanket sister having more fun than us?"

Quietly allowing a sigh, Nick put a thumb against his brow, rubbing there gently as if chasing away a headache. "It occur to you some of us were enjoying the peace and quiet?" he grumbled, letting his other hand smack the outer edge of the Tybee guide against his thigh in a quick set of pats.

Tilting her head to settle her cheek on the seat cushion instead, she hummed, then returned, "Eat me."

The gambler's head rolled along with his eyes, laying his arm tight against the carrier in his lap. The cat hadn't made a sound since they'd gotten into the car, but it shifted every few minutes as she moved around inside. "For fuck's sake." he muttered, a snort escaping him. His chin jutted out to direct the rest at Coach. "Remind me why we got stuck with the shitty one?"

Coach shifted in his seat, discomfort bleeding into the gesture, then broke into an abrupt frown that he tilted toward the other man. "We got shit to do, Nick." Frustration lingered around him, and Rhiannon shifted a bit where she was, vaguely uncomfortable.

When the gambler scoffed lightly under his breath but obeyed, Rochelle leaned forward. She didn't release her grip on Chris even as she threw her free hand up near her ear. "Actually, I'm with Rhee on this. All three of you are acting like kicked dogs. The stick up Nick's ass isn't anything new, but... Are you guys worried about the crash? Or did I miss something?"

Nick didn't lift his head as he responded dully, "Trying to focus."

There was an irritation at the edge of his voice, taut and brimming with electricity, energy badly withheld. An insecurity hid there, too, familiar. He was trying to dissuade her with bald aggression - a move she knew well. Returning the anger worked sometimes, but most times it just encouraged him.

She settled on ignoring him, worry tugging at her mouth, looking instead between Chris and Coach. That worry only thickened when Christophe averted his eyes, focusing on his knees as if he couldn't quite get himself to match her gaze. It was a guilty gesture, and served to double her certainty that something was wrong.

"What's going on?" she pressed, gently, turning her body to half-face him. Their knees nudged tight together, and his mouth curled into a tight and strangled shape, a distress that only made her lean closer. "Sweetie, what's wrong?"

Chris cleared his throat, the sound rasping, before drawing his brows together. "Ay, chica... it is just... very much." He tensed next to her, and the scattered energy in his expression was oddly familiar. It took her a moment to pin it down - and then it clicked: he had the same look in his eyes he'd had on the porch, admitting to his hallucinations. It was not quite so vivid and hysterical, but close.

"But I am fine, ¿sí?"

Nick shook his head, tilting it to the side with an agitated jerk. His voice was milder than before, even if she'd be hard-pressed to call it gentle when it cut in to interrupt the other man. "Ro', can therapy with your boytoy wait? We'll have all the time in the world for an emotional circle-jerk when we aren't on the road."

His tactic shift served to heighten her suspicion. It was too close to a plea, and Nick getting desperate was not a comforting sign. Even putting aside how erratic he'd been of late, she'd gotten fairly good at sifting out his intentions from what he wanted her to think his intentions were. He was authentic as often as he was deceptive, once one learned his particular language.

I have conversational fluency in Nicklish, apparently, not that it does me much good.

The Spaniard grimaced as he lifted his chin and his gaze. He looked between her and Nick, and she couldn't shake surprise at the tangible tug-of-war occurring in his demeanor. She'd seen the two men interact with strange familiarity on occasion, but she generally marked it down to Chris' dogged refusal to be cowed, and Nick finally - begrudgingly - accepting the man into their inner circle.

This was different: this was secret-keeping. Rochelle might have been inclined to leave it alone, if it had been anyone but Chris.

She reached out, settling her hand on Chris' forearm, now holding onto him with both hands and squeezing to focus his attention on her. "Talk to me." she murmured, softly, studying his expression and searching for an explanation there.

Nick inhaled, his frame shifting in the front seat. He lolled his head back, releasing a frustrated laugh before barking out, "Jesus. Alright, fine. You wanna open this can of worms? Be my guest." He spoke as if he'd been the one under pressure to talk; Rochelle startled, but not nearly as much as Christophe did.

"Kid thinks he saw Brenda." That sent the temperature in the sedan careening to a frigid chill. "Like, actually saw. In the flesh."

Rochelle's head snapped to flicker her gaze between them hard enough that her neck muscles protested. She couldn't stop her mouth from moving, a choke bubbling up inside the words, disbelief clear in her voice. "No, you... Chris, you're still hallucinating?"

"Nope." Nick's voice was terribly calm, a certain apathy in it as he spoke. "Not a hallucination. The real thing." Another move she knew well; a guise over the stress he felt - the pretense that the words meant nothing to him, when they clearly did.

Chris darted a wild look in her direction, a mixture of apology and fear. "No, I no say that! You -"

Waving his hand up in a stunted gesture to cut him off, Nick shook his head. "You said you saw her, with a gut wound." He glanced over his shoulder, eyes low-lidded as he looked toward Rochelle. "You never told him, did you? Not the nitty-gritty details. You didn't say, 'oh, by the way, I personally shot your psychotic ex-leader in the belly and left her to bleed out.', huh?"

Horror overtook Rochelle's face before she could rein it in, and that must've been answer enough, because Nick turned his eyes coolly toward Coach.

"Sam?"

Coach didn't look away from the road. He simply shook his head, unblinking.

Softly, tenderly, Rhiannon leaned back into her seat. Her eyes were frozen in a wide stare, attention shifting in an easy rotation around the other survivors. She did not utter a word, and her movements went glacial, like she were trying not to be seen at all. The way her posture turned, it seemed like she was weighing the choice to roll down the window and crawl out.

Rochelle couldn't work her jaw out of its glued state at first. She didn't understand the words she was hearing, not really. The thought of the Angel's leader out there, still, having survived their confrontation was awful.

The very first feeling she had was panic. Then, sense kicked in, as it very often did.

You don't survive a bullet to the stomach without medical attention. She'd lost so much blood by the time we left, even if she'd had bandages or... help, somehow... She was barely conscious. You don't make it out of that. She inhaled. Calm down, girl.

"I... Sorry. You're going to have to spell this one out for me, suit." Her eyes darted toward the man sitting next to her, aware of the way his posture tensed. "Chris? You... think she's alive?"

"It is not that!" Chris' voice went a little reedy, his hand abruptly tearing free from Rochelle's - which had gone subconsciously whiteknuckled - so he could gesticulate. "I see them before, you know? It was not real. Maybe... Ellis tells me, and I don't remember, or -"

Nick snorted, lowly. "Look, Pancho. Ellis barely said shit to any of us after that whole fiasco. So, I'm willing to bet he didn't tell you shit about her dying and the gruesome details, either."

Calm was hard to maintain when she wanted to climb into the front seat and slam on the brakes herself. "Slow. Down." she enunciated thickly, jaw shifting to set her teeth on edge, head jerking to focus on Chris. He weakly turned to face her, expression scrunchied as if bracing for some impact. "What did you see?"

He shrunk just slightly, and she forced her nerves to quiet long enough to reach out, settling her hand on his right shoulder and soothingly rubbing her thumb over the defined line of his collarbone. It did not seem to relax him, but he didn't shake her off, either.

"I... No se. The mall, when I was outside, ¿si? She was one of them, y... blood, aquí." He patted his hand against his stomach in a tender gesture, then slowly raised it to settle his palm on the back of her hand where it sat on his shoulder. "She looked at me and then ran. But it was not real, chica. She is dead, I know this. You know this."
Rochelle searched across his expression, reading the desperation splashed over his features. The certainty of his phrasing did not match with the look in his eyes.

"One of them?" she echoed, hesitantly.

He nodded, exhaling a small puff of air. His fingers squeezed at her hand, a mindless tension in his slim knuckles. "Sí. Her skin, eyes... You know. Los muertos."

"What -" she tried, forced to clear her throat and start again when it came out in a croak. "Think about this logically, okay? If you told me you saw her, I might believe you - I mean, shit. If you can survive losing an arm and all that blood, and Lena can survive who-knows-how-much internal damage..." Rochelle let it trail off, a frown clawing at her expression, though one she tried to moderate. She didn't want to admit the degree to which the thought frightened her.

A tiny part of her was drawn to the idea that she hadn't actually killed someone, pulled the trigger and watched them die - so much more visceral than how they'd likely killed Carmine - but it was quickly overruled. She made me do it. And I'd do it again, if you put me back there.

We did our best. Did the only thing we could do.

She focused, aware that she'd paused a little too long. "But you're saying she was a zombie - you saw her as a zombie? That's just not possible. She was a Carrier, just like us. Just like you. We can't get infected, and there's seven of us here who are all living proof."

Chris had been uncertain before, but with that, it wound up into outright doubt. "Pero... how did I know? The blood?"

With a cluck of her tongue, Rochelle thrust out her free hand, waving toward the car window and some far-off point. "Didn't you tell me your last leader got killed by a Hunter? That it had... gotten him... in the stomach? Doesn't it make sense you'd put the same image in your head, with your second leader, if you didn't know how she'd died for real?"

He frowned, faintly, at first - then managed a motion of his head that seemed half a shake and half a nod. "I did not... think about this. Maybe." Some tension left him, just a few degrees of ease, and his frown became thoughtful. "Maybe."

"We're all under a lot of stress, but the last thing we should do is start panicking. It was just a coincidence." she stated, and although she still felt a little woozy from the simple pressure of anxiety, she genuinely believed it. There was simply no other reasonable explanation. "Okay?"

Nick snorted from the front seat, his head dipping low. "Hell of a coincidence."

"Nicolas." Coach chided, flatly, out of the corner of his mouth. He sighed, then, glancing up to look at the car's passengers through the rear-view mirror, before refocusing on the road. "Y'all think we can start comin' clean with shit when we're safe at home?"

Rochelle snorted before she could help it, releasing a sigh. She turned her gaze more fully back to Christophe, darting both her hands to grasp at his, twining their fingers in a clumsy mess. "You can talk to us, okay? Talking it out is a lot better than you getting spun up, let alone you talking to Nick."

"Fuck you, too." chimed like clockwork from the front of the car, and Rochelle was almost tempted to smile.

Don't realize how much I miss him until he's normal for a little bit.
Relaxing just slightly, Christophe grinned, leaning until their shoulders pressed together. "Vale." he affirmed in a stage whisper. "I will try, but he is very charming, you know. Easy to talk to."

There was a beat of silence among them, except for the rumble of the engine, and the muffled scream of a zombie on the side of the road. It tried to give chase, but the buzz of the motorcycle trailing them picked up, and it quickly intercepted. Ellis' voice was a soft hoot, cheering on either himself or Lena as they dealt with the infected.

Then Rhiannon tentatively offered up, "... Gay."

Rochelle groaned up toward the roof of the car with a shake of her head, and was mildly surprised to hear Coach break into a snort.
Chapter 268

Sliding off the bike, coming to stand at its flank, Ellis let his arms fall limp by his sides. He cocked his head, uttering a faded, "Shit."

They'd arrived at an L-intersection, the road taking a sharp turn to the right as the gridlike structure of the town's roadways came to an end. There wasn't even a streetlight hooked up - just a stop sign, tilted hard to one side, wheedling faintly back and forth as if it was loose on the metal bar that moored it into the ground.

Laying across the road, overturned half onto its side, sat a broad-nosed boxtruck. It had all the makings of a generic, everyday delivery truck. Nothing about it was remarkable at all. It didn't even seem to have cargo, if his limited view of the inside through its half-open rear doors was any indication.

Then there was the damage.

The whole side of it was caved in, metal warped and bent as if it had taken a massive blow. It was not, however, anything like a normal car crash. The crushed portion of the truck was centered, where no reasonable angle of collision could have explained it. It was rounded, circular, where no reasonable shape of vehicle could have explained it.

Most car crash impact points were flattened, the depth difference between the center and the horizontal edges a gradient as the force diffused out. The collision before him was critically different - and there was only one reasonable explanation.

"This one time, muh buddy Keith tried tuh punch through a sheet of corr-uh-gated steel." he mumbled, as Lena tentatively balanced the motorcycle beside him, one foot stuck out and her heel dug into the asphalt. "Didn't work, 'course. All he did was break like, every bone in his wrist. Man's awful stubborn, though, so he just goes at it with his other hand. Ended up gettin' both arms in casts, y'know, 'n' they ended up just like, puttin' him in a strait-jacket 'cuz he wouldn't sit still fer shit."

Lena lifted one arm, tightening her grip on the left handlebar to keep the bike's front wheel straight, and pointed at the truck. "Your buddy didn't do that."

Ellis nodded, still looking at the overturned vehicle. "Tank." he affirmed, a grim energy making his jaw flinch. A little fear crept up the back of his throat, a sour taste - they didn't have the firepower to take down a Tank, and the streets were too crowded to effectively escape it in their sedan. He didn't have another jar of puke to turn the zombies against one another, either.

They stood there a moment, staring at the flipped vehicle, before Ellis turned his head to scan the nearby area. The buildings were fairly thick around them, clustered tightly in that familiar cram of a tourist area, and the possibility for one of the mammoth infected to be lurking nearby seemed, unfortunately, not out of the question.

The sedan pulled to a creaking stop a few feet behind them, wheels crackling on the road as it drove over the subtle debris that covered the surface. Coach's voice drifted over in a low tone from the open driver's window. "What's up, y'all?"

"Tank." Lena responded, her shoulders hunching up in a quick shrug. "Or a sign of one, at some point. Doesn't mean he's around - but we should be careful. Let's slow it down a bit."
Coach seemed to think on that, his fingers tapping against the inside of the window. "Shit. Last thing we need." He gave the truck a cursory look before turning his head as if to speak into the interior of the car to the rest of the team. It took a moment before his face stuck back out, a sigh quick to leave his lips. "A'right. Y'all want someone else to join you out there?"

The biker shook her head immediately, reaching up to paw her gloved hand against the side of her helmet. "No. Can't take three people on this thing, and on the off chance we have to boogie, we can't be scrambling to get someone into the car. Let's just stick close together, and keep going."

As Coach nodded and pulled his head back inside, Lena untwisted at her waist to face Ellis.

He hesitated, eyes tracking back onto the truck, mulling over their options. Without any idea of where the Tank was, there wasn't much to do except hope they didn't cross paths. He didn't like it.

She patted the back of the bike again when he did not immediately approach. "Unless you wanna go looking for an arm-wrestle with a Tank." she offered up, and he didn't need to see her face to know she was grinning. "Otherwise, c'mon. Worst to worst, we can outrun it on this thing, and lead it away from the others."

That made him nod, a smile twitching at his face as he stepped closer. He reached out, grabbing for the back of the bike to stabilize himself so he could swing a leg up and over it.

He didn't get his foot off the ground.

A dark shape flashed past him, stretched flesh whipping through the air. At first, it seemed like an arm reaching into his periphery... but it was longer, jointless; the whiplike shape of a tentacle. He saw her react, delayed, her head jerking up to look behind and high above them.

She lurched to try and grab at the front of his jacket, and he tried to grab her arms in return - but they'd only just latched onto each other when the tongue made contact with her shoulder. It flexed and writhed, instantly beginning to curl around her frame as it did.

The fleshy limb looped first around her neck, finding purchase between her shoulders and the bottom edge of her helmet, and the shock of its constriction made her hands jolt instinctively to claw at it. That gesture released what little grip she'd managed on Ellis, weakening the hold between them.

Ellis tried to maintain his grasp on her, but when the tongue's tapered end made contact with another section of itself to complete a loop, it jerked taut and began to reel back. The force of it yanked her clear off the bike, and his balance went wide as it dragged her bodily into him.

The bike crashed onto its side, metal screeching as it had nothing to keep it upright.

Ellis fell in unison. He didn't stop trying to scramble for purchase on her even as she was dragged past him and wrenched out of his grip with the Smoker's inhuman strength. His head cracked against the asphalt as he landed on his back - but the helmet took the brunt of the blow, softened by the padding on the inside, and his vision only blurred for an instant.

A shout left him, incoherent, and he rolled himself over to scramble up off the ground. He started to run before he'd gotten fully upright, the result a weak stumble that was half on all fours.

It took only a glance to identify the location of the Smoker. It was hard to miss, considering the thick tongue extending out from where it stood, and the woman being dragged in its direction - though he couldn't precisely see the Smoker itself. Its tongue draped out from a second-floor window of a slim but tall shacklike structure, dark wisps of smog creeping from the opening.
The idea of what he'd do to free her didn't occur to him. He just ran, barely keeping pace as the tongue's retraction sped up. The scraping sound of her body dragging over the street was hard to listen to... but she'd curled up tightly, and her thick motorcycle jacket must've buffered her from the majority of the damage.

He was far enough behind that he didn't reach her until she'd struck the wall. As her body flattened against it, the tongue drawing into a straining vertical line, it started to reel her up in unsteady jerks.

It was not anchored solely by her neck, but there was desperation in the way she was clawing at the tentacle, fighting against the loop that had cinched her left elbow against her hip. That, and her silence, convinced Ellis it had a choking grasp on her.

He lunged forward just as her feet left the ground, her own weight coming entirely onto the tentacle now dangling her against the wall. Her feet kicked, trying and failing to gain traction against the exterior of the house. Ellis snatched up to wrap both his hands around the tentacle, just above her helmeted head.

It had only wrapped once around her throat, and had not circled over itself. With a sharp twist of his whole body, forearm pressed against the side of her helmet to get some torque and push her away in the same motion, he prised the tongue from around her neck.

It hardly freed her, but the way she gasped in a ragged breath of air said he'd managed something, at least.

He was vaguely aware of Lena's right hand, her right arm still mostly unrestrained, placing against his chest and pushing. "No -" she choked out. The gesture was weak but clear in its intent, trying to urge him away.

He didn't obey, naturally, but that quickly became less of a choice as he felt the tentacle suddenly slip around his thigh, tightening, the slick muscle probing to find purchase. It constricted as if to wrap them up together, seeming to respond instinctively as he struggled to only draw tighter, curling around his knee.

The tongue jerked a little higher, and Ellis dug in his heels, his fingernails, trying to contest the Smoker's pull. Instead, he felt his own weight threatening to lift up onto his toes. The Smoker struggled to lift them both as dead weight with the same vigour it could pull multiple bodies across the ground, but it would get them both off the ground, sooner than later.

Shit, should'uh grabbed the machete -

Footsteps rang distantly in his ear, and he turned his head just in time to see Nick charging at them, katana drawn up by his shoulder, coiled into the beginnings of a high swing. Their eyes met for just an instant, and there was quiet focus on Nick's face, half a grimace. Like a subtle resignment, a faint frustration. Like he'd been drug into something against his will.

Ellis let go of the tentacle to drop both his arms, in the same gesture that Nick swung the sword up and toward the wall. He had to stretch, throwing his weight into the swing in almost a jump, to strike above Lena's head. The thick impact of steel hitting wood merged with the meaty sound of flesh tearing.

Relief came right before Lena dropped, and Ellis went with her. It wasn't far to fall, but neither of them were well-prepared to land gracefully.
He sagged to a knee, forced down as their legs had been mostly tangled together amidst the tongue, and reached out to grab her clumsily into an embrace and slow her collapse. She started coughing as they reached the ground together, body starting a slow squirm against the tongue still tight around her.

"Ow." she whimpered. "... Thanks..."

As his fingers started to seek out the tentacles, starting to unwind them from her frame, Ellis glanced up to see the sundered remains of the tongue snapping up and into the house. It reeled in so quickly that it struck the top of the open window, raw end wildly snapping in the air as it oozed a thick grey tar - then disappeared into the house.

It was, at least, no longer a threat. He'd never considered what they did once their tongue was broken. Did it grow back? Could they survive without it?

That made him wonder what, precisely, 'survive' meant to an infected... did they eat? Would they starve, eventually? They weren't truly zombies, as they were still alive - but had they become something so far from normal that the rules of metabolism and sustenance simply did not apply?

That was where he dropped the train of thought.

"You alright, girl?" he said, instead, focusing on the woman slumped in front of him.

He dragged some of the tentacles from around her upper body, and her arms came free in the motion. She started to shove the coiled loops down her body on her own, but not before giving a heavy series of coughs, the sound crackling in her lungs - and a quick thumbs-up. "M'okay. Only a little strangled."

Ellis opened his mouth to respond with a small smile, but not-so-distant shrieks and barks of guttural sounds made him straighten. "Shit." he gasped out, winded, turning his head to look over his shoulder.

A few infected had found their way out into the street, their approach scattered across various directions. He might've been concerned with their presence and his lack of a weapon, had he not seen the rest of his teammates dart past, picking up a rough semi-circle around them. He noticed, then, the sedan parked in the road, all its doors flung open.

It was nice having a team of their current size; their numbers provided some inherent safety net. He'd grown used to the capability to rely on each other to fill the gaps when they arose. He trusted them.

He watched Coach take Lena's brush-hook to the skull of an infected and it go limp. Rochelle had Rhiannon's bat and Chris was just at her elbow, pistol readied to snap off shots at any infected that got too close to them. Rhiannon had Coach's shotgun, and the staggered blasts made short work of the two infected charging her.

He felt a strange pride, thickened all the more by the presence of Nick beside him. He was still there when Ellis needed him. He was still driven to protect him, even after everything. He still cared, whatever he said and did to try and prove otherwise.

Then Nick crouched down.

The older man reached toward the still-flexing tongue twined loosely around Ellis' thigh, wordlessly moving to untangle it. Instinct made the Georgian tense at the approach of those too-familiar hands, freezing where he kneeled. The abrupt lump in his throat was, among other things, embarrassing. His heart rate jumped, and why? He ain't tryin' tuh - he's just tryin' tuh be helpful.

He was somewhat surprised to see Nick freeze, too, though neither of them actually looked up. Their gazes were both firmly averted to stare downwards, bodies unmoving in that shared moment of realization. He wasn't sure what Nick was waiting for, let alone what he was.

Well, shit. he thought, and the urge to throw caution to the wind was irresistible.

He'd be the first to admit that the knowledge that Nick couldn't actually see his expression empowered him a little; he didn't have to mind whether or not his cheeks lit up or his eyes lingered too long or if the smile on his lips was obvious. It allowed his nerves to turn to mischief.

Ellis swallowed, turning his chin, closing the already perilously small distance between their faces. He murmured into the space left, ghosting the words, and they came out throaty in a way he couldn't control.

"How come yer always the one who runs in and saves me, Mr. Gamblin' Man? It's awful sweet."

He could've reached up and grabbed ahold of the tension that spawned abruptly around Nick's frame. It surely had a little to do with how close they were to Lena... but she was already rolling away and starting to push to her feet, oblivious. Her focus lay entirely on recovering her breath.

Similar to the quiet pleasure of knowing his expression and whatever nerves it betrayed was obscured, he found no end of satisfaction in the full view he had of Nick's. The Northerner blinked, his eyes shooting up, seeking Ellis' and finding nothing but tinted faceplate. His brows shot up, too, and it was nearly shock that plastered itself over his expression. It lasted for much longer than Ellis expected, a fact that he found uniquely interesting.

He hadn't realized how effective simple flirtation would be, how vulnerable the man would be to it. It wasn't as if they'd never flirted over the course of their relationship - but something had changed between them. The context and the circumstances felt different, now, especially with their most recent conversation.

He felt optimistic. He felt hopeful.

He felt a tremendous surge of excitement when Nick muttered - no, stammered, "I... the fuck - Ellis..."

Without waiting for Nick to regain himself, Ellis reached down and pushed the fat tendril down his leg, kicking it off as he stood. When he'd risen to his full height, he offered his right hand out to the man crouched beside him, palm up and fingers spread. "C'mon."

He was, again, glad for the helmet covering his face; his cheeks practically ached with the size of his grin. The expression was likely not as suave as he'd have liked, given the choice.

It was no surprise when Nick stood without taking his hand, and the Northerner made a limp-wristed swipe to knock it aside as he straightened. "Not fucking funny." Nick spoke with some strain, sparing a glance over his shoulder to ensure no attention was on them. "The fuck do you think you're doing, Overalls?"

Ellis looked, too, despite himself.

Their teammates had cleaned up the small number of infected they'd attracted, and Rhiannon jolted to hurry to her sister's side. Her hands immediately alighted on the other woman's shoulders, expression a vague twist of worry. "Dumbass." she chided, practically a hiss.
"Gosh." Lena groaned, wrapping her arms indelicately around her torso. The brunette bent forward slightly as she stood, doubled over as if to catch her breath. "I forget how much it hurts, gettin' hog-tied by one of those, until it happens again."

Ellis watched them, and watched as Rochelle and Chris approached. Coach started to turn and walk back toward the idling sedan. Nobody was even looking their way.

When Nick glanced back toward him, Ellis took a half-step to the side, moving as if to go around him, and the gambler made no attempt to stop him. As he pulled parallel to the other man, he leaned his head toward Nick's and responded in a low tone without looking at him.

"Courtin' you."

The sound of Nick choking on his own saliva was acutely satisfying.

Ellis put everything he had into keeping a casual pace, maintaining an ease in his walk. He felt Nick's baleful stare scalding at his back, and he had no intention of revealing just how hard his heart was hammering in his chest. His fingers went numb with the force of his pulse, and he blindly walked to join his teammates a few feet away.

Not looking back was difficult, but he managed.

Christophe glanced up at him as he stepped closer, his head tilting in an inquisitive gesture. "¿Estás bien, tío?" he questioned, uncertainly.

Ellis gave a heavy nod of his head, turning toward Lena. He set a hand against her shoulderblade, squeezing fingertips against the thick material of her motorcycle jacket. "You okay? We should keep movin'. Lucky all that noise didn't attract that Tank - though, guess that's a good sign it ain't around here..."

The brunette nodded back, putting one arm out loosely. "Yeah, but... Rhee, you take over. I'm a little woozy."

Rhiannon nodded with an eager grin, reaching out to slap her hands on either side of Lena's helmet. She pulled it up and off, tucking it under her arm. "Alright. I'll -"

"Try not to crash it this time?" Lena finished for her, grinning, one hand lifting to brush her mussed hair away from her face. The sour look on Rhiannon's face made her laugh, though she coughed as the air left her. "Sorry, sorry. Dog with a bone, I know."

Ellis darted a glance over his shoulder at the sound of footsteps approaching, and he couldn't help but smile anew. Nick moved past them, inspecting the edge of his katana as if to check for chips, furtively not looking up.

He's kinda cute when he ain't sure whut tuh do.
Nick was quickly realizing that he'd made a serious mistake.

He knew that what happened in the dressing room had been an error. He said things he shouldn't have, and nearly did things he definitely shouldn't have. He'd expected Ellis to come out of it confused, but he hadn't expected... this.

The kid was actively chasing him. And he was charming. And it made sense, in retrospect, but that didn't soften the surprise.

Ellis had never been, precisely, shy. He was unsteady, certainly, and often passive in his gentle acceptance. However, Nick had more than once mistaken his easy-going nature for weakness, only to see the fiery determination underneath. The Southerner did not give up or give in. He did not give ground. He was patient and self-sure, against all odds.

Every time Nick pushed him away, he'd wriggled back in. He'd broken through doors, climbed obstacles, sat doggedly at Nick's periphery waiting for the storm to pass. He'd weathered all the hurt and misery Nick had thrown his way and still, somehow, craved him. Even after he'd had his heart broken, he found his way back to his feet.

Nick thought, idly, of a day that seemed tremendously far away; they'd been in the swamps, and taken shelter in a small hut. He and Ellis had set to the task of lighting an oven - but the mechanic had been far from focused.

Instead, the younger man had crept up behind him, pushing secretly into his space to surprise him when he'd turned around. It had been forward, aggressive, and a little endearing. Nick wasn't often taken aback, and certainly not in romantic endeavours - but everything about Ellis was a deviation from the norm.

It had been nice, in the cold and the muck, to have the younger man press into him and kiss him of his own volition, in some mostly-innocent gesture of gratitude. The kid had been eager and unbreakable, still finding his legs within the strange confines of their relationship, but confident in pushing those lines. It was a change of pace he hadn't minded, at the time.

The last thing he expected was seeing it weaponized against him.

'Courting' me... Jesus fucking tits.

He'd made the joke first, off-hand, in a rare moment of normalcy during their short hotel stay. They'd been talking about Chris' interest in Rochelle, and Nick had turned it around on Ellis. He'd given into that wild urge to flirt with his then-lover, and that had escalated into less innocent urges.

It was all part of the foreplay, after all. Sometimes a one night stand came with the trappings of something torrid and intense, the false flare of connection. He knew how to pretend to be enraptured with someone. The very first time they'd - consensually - been intimate, hadn't he faked it a little? Hadn't he been gentler, more kind than he truly felt, just because it was easy to intuit that sweetness was what Ellis needed from him in order to agree?

Sex was transactional; everyone's cost was a bit different, and he was largely willing to pay. However, once he'd gotten what he wanted he'd abandoned the soft pretense, expecting Ellis to give up on him sooner than later.
Then Nick had gotten attached, and Ellis had never left.

Relaxing in the bathroom of a clean hotel room, shaving the unkempt stubble he'd been working on over the days previous, enjoying the steamed air of Ellis' hot shower, trading casual conversation... he could almost imagine there wasn't an apocalypse on the other side of their hotel room door. For an hour or so, it was as if they'd just been a normal - what? A normal couple? That made him snort. Nothing about their situation had ever been normal, and certainly not whatever had gone on between them.

Then again, perhaps it had been the most normal thing he'd ever experienced, and he just didn't know how to recognize it.

He'd looked at himself in the mirror, clean and fresh, and mulled over his situation. He'd acknowledged the likelihood of Ellis' feelings evolving, and taken stock of his own. It had felt safe, somehow. He'd felt safe with the Georgian wandering clumsily around outside the bathroom.

When Ellis stretched a hand out to help him up, goofy grin apparent in his voice though he couldn't see it past the man's helmet, he'd wanted nothing more than to take it. His ex-lover was offering that safety again, and he craved it - didn't realize how much he craved it, until it was looking expectantly down at him.

He looked at himself in the dull reflection of his katana, blurred with gore, and sighed out a reedy breath. I've created a monster.

He didn't know which of them he was referring to.

Nick lowered his sword, trying to settle the surging discontent in his chest. He needed to do something, regain control. He'd made a grave mistake in letting the younger man come away from their conversation in the restaurant the victor, or vindicated somehow. He should have fought back, but he'd just been so tired, and Ellis was so warm.

"Let's move, kids." Coach barked impatiently from where he stood next to the sedan, arm draped over the open driver's door. His eyes squinted, looking ahead down the road, past the cluster of survivors that had not yet mobilized. "Wastin' daylight."

Nick stiffened his jaw, turning abruptly on his heel. He looked to where Rhiannon was hauling the motorcycle upright, getting it leaned on her hip so she could slide the kickstand out with the toe of her boot. He approached at a pace that verged on hurried, moving quickly enough that several eyes caught on him, not the least of which was Rhiannon's.

Chris paid him some mind before turning to walk toward the car, Rochelle and Lena close behind. Ellis watched him closely, but did not intervene, nor draw closer.

As Nick drew up to her, Rhiannon swung her body around to face him, jutting her jaw forward in an unfriendly gesture - though there was a glint in her eyes that said it was mostly for show. "What's up, slick?" she prompted baudily, making no effort to moderate her voice.

He, on the other hand, kept his response muted. "You haven't said if you two made a decision."

The woman's whole posture shifted, tightening, growing defensive. He might've read into it, were she not generally wound as tight as a cornered animal. She made a groaned noise of frustration, shrugging her shoulders and lowering her voice to match his volume. "Honestly, dude? It's not fuckin' up to me. Talk to her."

That made him frown, leaning towards the blonde, distantly pleased when she held her ground.
"She's on the fence?" he pressed, keeping his frustration out of his voice. "If she's worried about the team, I -"

"Shit, dude, I don't know." Rhiannon cut him off, abruptly lifting Lena's helmet from where she'd hung it on the bike's handlebar and cramming it over her head. "And I don't really give a fuck. Far as I'm concerned, you're welcome." Her chin lowered, expression hidden but tone full of scorn - and a softness, a vulnerable twist. "I can't keep her safe on my fuckin' own."

The gambler paused, absorbing that statement for a moment before firmly labeling it as good news. Halfway there. he told himself, teeth gritted against a quiet flush of unease. And probably the harder half.

Halfway to freedom. Halfway to never seeing any of them again.

_It's a good thing. It's for the best. It's happening, either way. Just ride it out. You'll be better off, they'll be better off... so what if it's the easy way out? Easy way out's worked for you so far._

He snorted at himself, coughing to stifle the sound when Rhee's head jerked to look at him in response to the noise. He spoke before she did, lifting his free hand in a vague gesture. "Fine." he acknowledged, glancing over his shoulder. Ellis was walking toward them, hands in the pockets of his denim jacket, it hanging unbuttoned to reveal the tight grey shirt underneath.

The Georgian had taken his helmet off and tucked it under his arm, curly hair flattened on the sides and gone even curlier on the top due to the pressure of the helmet, damp with seat. A small frown lingered on his lips, but it flashed abruptly into a shy, gorgeous smile upon Nick's gaze landing on him.

A spike of heat nailed itself into the base of Nick's spine, the sensation drawing a frustrated sigh out of him.

_I need out of here, before I do something stupid, or he does._

"He was hallucinating, right?" Rhiannon abruptly hissed at him, startling his head into rotating back forward. He cocked a brow at her. "Chris. Between you guys and the one-eyed fucker we met before, I've heard enough to know I don't want to meet that bitch in person."

Nick mulled over his response and, more specifically, his opinion on the matter. His feelings were complicated by the fact that Christophe hadn't been wrong; Nick had experienced a hallucination of his own. It wasn't out of the question. Either it's contagious, or this is just what happens when you put a human being through this kind of shit.

Or... occurred to him out of the blue. Maybe it's the Flu. We're all infected, after all - it can't all just be roses and fast-healing, right? Maybe it's fucking with our heads.

"Yeah." he responded. He wasn't sure he believed it, but there were two alternatives and he liked neither of them: she was either alive and hunting them, or a Carrier-turned-infected. It was much easier to just respond, "He was."

Ellis stepped close - closer than Nick wanted him to come, and not nearly close enough - and opened his mouth to interject. However, he didn't get a word out before Coach's frustrated voice shouted at them.

"Kids! I look like I'm jokin'?" Nick turned on instinct, eyes landing on the eldest survivor. He was marching to close the gap between them, but stopped halfway, throwing his arms out to either side of himself in a hapless gesture. Genuine agitation harshened his voice. "Get yo' ass in the car, Nick."

The Northerner moved to obey, giving Ellis a wary berth. "Coming, for fuck's sake..." The brunette's smile shifted from subtle and warm to knowing, a crinkle touching his nose, and Nick's pace accelerated.

Two steps in, and his eyes caught a flash of movement on the sidewalk a few yards away. His head jerked to track it, but they took too long to focus. It was far too late that he processed the crouched shape of a Hunter on the side of the road. It was staring intently at Coach, body just curling out from an open doorway.

The football coach had separated from the group, Nick realized. It had been watching them, waiting for a break in the cluster, waiting for someone to step out into the open, waiting for an easy target.

And he'd made Coach one.

In the time it took him to even lift his arm and gesture, let alone start running, the Hunter was in the air.

Its legs snapped straight, launching itself off the ground with a force that shouldn't have been physically possible. Its arms flashed forward, claws outstretched, a scream leaving it that was warped and broken. It did not sound like the normal pitchy howl that he had come to expect - it was muffled, somehow.

When it struck Coach, it hit him at a slight angle. It landed mostly against his side, one foot splaying against his thigh and the other leg curled to knee into his ribs. Its hands both found purchase against his neck, though one gripped lower than the other.

Nick saw a splash of red scatter between the Hunter's digits before Coach fell, crashing to the ground with the force of the collision.

Cold sunk into his gut, and the pain in his chest felt like his heart forgetting to beat. It was like moving through sludge when he started to run, hearing footsteps behind him and shouts all around him, and none of it processed.

Seeing Ellis getting reeled in, weaponless, had dropped that thoughtless rage over his vision. He'd barely considered his actions before thrusting the cat carrier off his lap and lunging out from the car. It had been anger and frustration and denial, fireworks, like at the mall balcony.

This felt like terror. This felt like sense and logic being torn from him by some cold weight, like fear and loss. This felt like hollow agony. This felt helpless.

"Coach!" he shouted, and the name was mirrored back to him by other voices from over his shoulder, from far ahead. His breath caught like a clot of air in his chest, lungs tightening, panic driving him into a charge. "Sam!"

Coach's arms were up, hands gripping the Hunter's shoulders, trying to wrestle it away and only managing to keep it slightly restrained. There was blood pooling next to his throat, slickening the zombie's hands and darkening the rough asphalt.

Panic filled Nick, like cotton was stuffed into his innards rather than guts and blood. His arms were numb, tingling as he drew his katana up to his hip.

"Can't lose him. Can't do it. Not after everything."
He was not the first to reach Coach, however - Christophe was. The Spaniard lunged as he approached, throwing himself down to his knees, and the hiss of pain that left him said he skinned his knees where his cargo shorts did not cover them. He didn't slow, didn't let the discomfort interrupt his momentum.

Chris placed the muzzle of his pistol against the base of the Hunter's skull, twisting it to aim upwards, and pulled the trigger. The point of contact and corresponding entry wound were subtle, almost unnoticeable amongst the creature's scraggly hair, but the exit wound blew a wide chunk out of its dark-skinned forehead.

It screamed, the sound choked as if the inner structure of its mouth had been compromised and its throat was filling with blood. It was still stifled in a strange way, but Nick had no time to think on it before it cut to a gurgle, then silence.

Nick abandoned his katana to clatter to the ground, letting his weight collapse to join Chris on Coach's opposite side. The road ground into his kneecaps through his dark jeans, but he didn't even feel the discomfort past the numbness spreading along his limbs. He didn't care to feel it.

Together, they grabbed for the Hunter's now-slumped body, and Nick shoved it hard as Christophe pulled. It limply collapsed into the Spaniard, and he wrapped his arm around it, scooting backwards on the road to pull it entirely off the prone survivor.

Rochelle reached them, then, and she grabbed Chris by the shoulders of his polo shirt to add her force to the effort. "Coach!" she gasped out, scrambling forward, but her footsteps stuttered to a stop. "Oh, God -"

Blood coated the right side of his throat, rivulets trailing from a line of dark punctures. Most of them were shallow, leaking trickles of bright red blood, but one had sunk deep just beside his jugular. A yellowed shard jutted out from it, half of a broken talon, and the guttered ooze of dark red from around it made Nick's chest seize.

He did the only thing he could think to do: he reached out, cupping one hand against the uninjured side of Coach's neck, bracing it so he could settle his other hand against the wounds. His fingers pressed against the lacerations in his neck, and he placed his palm just next to the claw jutting out of his skin.

His thumb wrapped around it without quite making contact, and his shoulders tightened as he tried to apply pressure, using his other hand to keep him still. At the touch, Coach's body surged lightly, a pained huff escaping him, and Nick's jaw eased enough to speak.

"Hey, hey, Sammy." he soothed, his voice like sandpaper. The blood was hot, slick as grease, sticky somehow as it clung to his fingers. He felt more of it trickle between his fingers, and he tried to press harder. "You're gonna be just fine, alright? Not gonna let some little asshole zombie take you out, right?"

The sound that left Coach was a whimper, and when Nick's eyes flickered up to his face, his eyes were wide. There was fear in them, pupils blown and distant with adrenaline, a dampness catching at the corners.

Nick heard and felt bodies skidding in to hover just behind him, just to his left, but nobody quite touched him and his peripheral was a blur, darkness pulsing into the edges of his vision. He gritted his teeth, trying to tighten his grip without choking the older man.

"J-Jesus." Ellis' voice croaked, coming into focus as he bent forward, crouching behind Nick.
"Coach..."

The Northerner startled as a body suddenly dropped to kneel next to him, so close their legs and hips settled into a press that verged on uncomfortable. Lena's face leaned into his vision, her chin turned to look directly at him. The look on her face was focused, tranquil.

"Don't let go, hoss." she murmured, voice even. "And don't take the nail out."

"I know." he hissed back, frustration and fear making his voice cold in a harsh contrast to hers. He felt like he was holding Coach together with his bare hands, and they wanted desperately to shake. He kept his muscles tense to resist the motion. "I look like a fucking idiot to you?"

The biker didn't respond to that, reaching her hand out to touch the back of his off-hand, the one not pressed actively against any wounds. "We have to stop the bleeding. Can you feel the jugular?"

She pressed her fingertips to his knuckles, urging it to move, carefully sliding his thumb past Coach's Adam's apple. Nick started to feel out low, toward his clavicle, but Lena quickly corrected him. Her fingers pushed his to move above the wound, closer to Coach's chin.

There was silence around them, like a held breath. Nick swallowed what remained of his pride, focusing on her words. He had to probe slightly, having difficulty distinguishing Coach's pulse from his own, beating in his thumb - but with a nudge from Lena, he located the thudding heat of the man's jugular, near where it delved up and into his jawline. "Yeah."

Her voice was in his ear, instructions calm and firm. "Press on it. Not too hard, just... firmly."

He obeyed, and as he tightened his grip, he felt Coach's thunderous pulse increase against the pad of his thumb. A sense of panic rose in his throat, but in the same moment, he swore the trickle of blood between his digits slowed just fractionally.

"Good, hoss. Good." Her head lifted, her hand loosening to circle around his wrist, and it might've been a comforting gesture. He might've even taken some comfort from it, were his body not full to the brim with a frantic energy that just made him feel overstimulated at the contact. "We have bandages still? Gauze? Tape?"

Rochelle's voice weakly responded, "A little.", right before her footsteps bolted away.

Nick looked down, gazing over Coach's face, noticing a heaviness at his eyelids. He couldn't shake him, couldn't pat his cheek, so he merely leaned forward and spoke more directly into his face. He raised his voice slightly, trying to get his attention. "Sam. Sammy. C'mon, big guy. Stay with me, okay? This isn't a good time for a nap. Need you to stay with me."

Christophe came to a crouch next to Coach's legs, his hand petting over his shin, eyes fretting up and down Coach's frame. Crouched there, the fresh blood trickling from his skinned knees was more apparent, but he paid them no mind.

Lena chimed in, her voice undoubtedly much more soothing to listen to than his. "You're gonna feel a little dizzy, okay, Coach?" The eldest survivor made the smallest nod, barely twitching his chin up and down. "You've lost some blood, and we're trying to make sure you don't lose any more. Just stay calm."

Nick leaned away, trying to give her space so she could press in and calm him - but as he started to move his upper body away, a hand suddenly grabbed at his sleeve. He couldn't help but stiffen, glancing at the fingers twined in his shirt. He looked, then, toward Coach, absorbing the fear still apparent in his expression.

There was a plea there, written into the scrunch of his brow, that was not difficult to read.

A tiny laugh left him, more a sigh than anything else. "Not going anywhere, Tons of Fun. Don't worry." He leaned forward again, feeling Coach's hand shift up to grab his bicep instead, clutching there and digging nails into his skin until it almost hurt. "Just stop bleeding, if you don't mind."

Coach nodded again, even tinier than the first time, and Nick shifted to find some amount of comfort in his kneeling posture. The hand on his arm squeezed, and the ex-football player's eyes closed, some weary trust in the gesture beyond his exhaustion.

Nick's heart twisted into the tiniest knot at the irony of the situation, of his promise, of the sensation that surged in his chest. Guilt, first and foremost - and then something a whole lot harder to swallow: desperation. He'd have done anything and everything to ensure the man's survival. He wished, desperately, that it had been him to take the pounce and not Coach.

They need you more than they need me, Sam.

Fingers grazed at his shoulderblades, and he didn't need to look to know they were Ellis'. He wished, desperately, the touch didn't calm him... but his heart rate slowed, and he leaned up into it, and he hated all of it. He hated how he felt, and how much he needed the touch, and he hated Ellis for giving it to him.

"Okay!" Rochelle's voice came in a rush, suddenly scrambling down to the ground on the other side of Coach. The backpack was clutched to her belly, and she pulled out a roll of bandage material, fingers shaking as she pried it free from the slim wrapper encasing it. "Okay. You're gonna be okay, papa bear. We got you."

Lena leaned forward, brushing her knuckles against Coach's jawline. "Coach, you breathing fine? Can you say something for me?" When the man didn't respond, she patted her hand against his jaw a little more firmly. "Coach?"

He did not react, but his breathing was steady.

The brunette gritted her teeth, the first sign of a crack in her composure - before she lifted her chin and glanced over the survivors hovering around them. "We need to bunker down. We can't get him back in the car, not like this. He needs to stay laid out if he's gonna stabilize."

Rochelle nodded, shifting closer. "We're not going anywhere until he's okay." She unrolled the bandages, and wadded it up, leaning forward, and Nick started to carefully peel his fingers away, one at a time. The moment there was space, she stuffed part of the bandage in, and he returned to applying pressure, now buffered by the gauzy material.

They worked in centimeters, breath held between them, and Nick couldn't help but see the fear in her brow as the white bandages took on a red hue with the pressure he applied. It helped him smother his weight against the wounds, but the bleeding didn't completely stop.

"He's gonna be fine." he muttered, and she did not respond. Sweat trickled down her brow, and she worked tenderly around the nail jutting from Coach's neck. The spiked shape was made of yellowed material, like dirtied keratin built upon itself, layer by layer all the way to a terrible point. It must've been three or four inches long.

He'd never seen nails like that, not even on Hunters.
Ellis' voice was tense when he spoke, worry dragging at it. His hands pulled away from Nick's back, footsteps backing away. "I'll... I'll see if any'uh these houses got room. Rhee, get my back?" Her affirmative grunt sounded out from a few feet away, quiet. "We'll just... hole up, fer now. It ain't worth pushin' on."

Nick managed a small sigh, tightening his fingers to press the gauze firmly against the punctures in Coach's throat. "Can't make any fucking progress if people keep getting laid up." he snarled under his breath, catching the subtle offense in Rochelle's expression. "I'm just saying."

"Focus." she responded, biting at the inside of her cheek. "Just... focus, okay, sweetie?"

The gambler looked down, shifting his hands just softly, gaze flickering to examine the rise and fall of Coach's chest. The man's eyelids fluttered, but he didn't seem to come completely conscious, just drifting to a vague awareness before drifting out again.

Nick's hands were covered in blood, his knees hot from where it had soaked into the denim from the puddle on the asphalt. "Fuck. Fuck this." He tried to take a breath, to calm himself, and he just tasted gritty iron on the air.

Giving them up, leaving them - he could handle that, knowing they'd move on, end up better off for his absence. Everyone always was, after all.

But losing them, any of them... that he could not handle.

"Fuck this."
Chapter 270

The house they located was not the cleanest. The front room was a squat den, a sectional taking up most of the floor space and the rest consumed by the shattered remnants of a fallen television. Circuitry and the plastic shards of its casing had scattered over the carpet, the screen itself still mostly intact in a sheet of pale matte black.

Although there was power, the lights on inside proving the fact, it was strangely dim and poorly lit. It was hard to tell whether it was a voltage issue, or simply an inherent quality of the abode, pre-apocalypse.

They didn't have the luxury of being choosy.

"Careful! Careful." Rochelle hissed, her hands flashing to get a better grip on the big man's shirt. It took all of them to carry him - less due to his weight, and more due to the pressing need to keep him as stable as possible. "To the couch."

Nick was glued to him, both hands wrapped around his neck, skin turned dark red to match. He couldn't offer much help in supporting the man's frame, not with all his effort focused on holding pressure. Instead, he tried to be as unobtrusive as possible, keeping in steady sync with their footsteps and pressing himself tight against Coach's shoulder.

Ellis had his legs and was standing between them, the man's knees cradled tight in his hands and braced against his hips. His jaw was tense, sweat teasing at his temples, the effort of smooth motion making his arms tremble. "Turn him, guys. Gotta get him set down. Nick, maybe you -" He grunted, almost stumbling as his heel scuffed over the seam between the foyer tiling and the carpeting. "Get him on your lap?"

The gambler wanted to retort, wanted to say anything other than the trimmed "Yeah." that left him.

Rochelle and Lena were at either side of Coach, nestled against his ribs and clutching tight in his shirt. Rhiannon was opposite Ellis, crouched low to cradle her arms under his head and shoulders. Her eyes were riveted on Nick's hands, her whole posture dedicated to keeping his head level with the rest of his body.

As much as they tried, Nick couldn't stifle the awareness of every pulse and trickle of blood against his palms. The bandages they'd applied were soaked through already.

Holding tight, Nick rotated as the rest of the team did, backing up until his calves touched the sofa's edge. He lowered into a squat, moving in degrees, Lena crawling up onto the sectional beside him as she continued to draw Coach up and onto the cushions. As she ran out of room, she slid up onto the back, then off and out of his periphery.

"Gentil, tierno." Christophe babbled, crooned. He couldn't offer much help in the effort of carrying Coach, but he stood guard with his pistol in his hands, attention flickering to scan around them. "Pero tienes mi palabra, te cuidaremos."

Nick settled roughly down, pushing himself back into the couch cushions, taking Coach's head and shoulders onto his lap as the team settled him onto the sectional. They hissed and muttered at each other, tiny instructions and gestures passed between them, but Nick focused solely on carefully rearranging his arms to get a better grip on Coach's neck.

Blood seeped into his jeans, warming his thigh, and he couldn't stop the terror that started clawing at his throat and sealing his airways. "It's not stopping." he hissed through gritted teeth, and he couldn't stand how raw his voice sounded, how obvious his fear was. He was panicking. "I can't -"

Suddenly, Rochelle's body was sliding up onto the arm of the couch. Her shoulder pressed into his, tucking close against his chest, her hands covering over his and pressing firmly. The touch of her cheek against his neck was cold, chill, the temperature difference between them too vast for comfort. "We'll get him through this. Like the forest, remember?" she whispered to him. "It's going to be okay."

How did she manage to sound like she believed it?

Nick bit back any kind of response, focusing down on their joined fingers. The added pressure did little to control the oozing, the flow slow but unerring, blood hot against his palm. He sucked in a breath, trying to soothe himself, gaze darting to Coach's face.

There was a fractured pain on the injured man's features, eyelids just flickering open. They caught distantly on the ceiling, glazed over, before closing again.

"Just keep pressure, guys." Lena murmured, coming around to kneel in front of them. "Lucky it's a vein. If it wasn't -" She gazed across the bloodied mess of fingers and gauze twined at his neck, her hazel eyes full of worry. "We need more bandages... Ellis, can you go see if they've got some papertowels in the kitchen?"

Ellis nodded, but his feet were stuck to the ground for a moment longer. He looked over the scene before him, the blood, the stricken look that hung so unfamiliar on Nick's features. Ellis felt sick to his stomach, but numbness won out, buffering him from the sensation. He'd have liked to call it composure - though he knew better.

"Okay." the Georgian whispered, breaking into a stumbling gallop. The kitchen was the next room in the house, separated from the living room by a slim peninsula of bar counter. He clipped his hip on the end of it as he tried to circle around it too tightly, but the pain came in vague delay and did not slow him.

There was a roll of paper towels next to the sink, and he lunged to grab it, stepping over the corpse sprawled on the kitchen tile. He'd seen it earlier, during the scattered scouting run he and Christophe had completed to confirm the building was secure. A bullet wound to its skull had long-since leaked grey and black over the floor, and his bootheel squelched on something in the dim light.

It reeked, skin bloated and limbs distended. If they were going to stay in the house any longer than a few hours, they'd need to remove it, but part of him hoped that wouldn't be the case. Coach's gonna be fine. 'Course he's gonna be fine... after all we been through? He's a tough sonnuva bitch.

Snatching the cylinder of tightly wound paper towels off the vertical holder that held it aloft, Ellis turned, retracing his steps with the tube held out in front of him. He offered it like a baton, rushing to return to the living room. Lord, you better be watchin' out. If you're gonna do us any favours, now's the time.

The moment he came within arm's reach of Lena, she grabbed it from him. A grateful tilt touched her head before she focused on Coach, starting to tear off squares one by one. Ellis watched with some hesitance as she leaned forward, her fingertips brushing against Nick and Rochelle's unified grip.

"Need to pack in over what we have, leave the soaked bandages on for now." She crunched one of The paper towels into a loose lump, settling into her crouch in front of the sofa, shoulders rolling in their joints. Her gaze darted up, muddy eyes sharp and half-squinted, passing a gauging glance over both of their faces. "Same way we got the bandages in. Nice and easy, hoss."

Ellis felt helpless watching them work, felt his chest tightening. Coach's skin was getting visibly clammy, sweat spreading over his body as the movement of his breath grew ragged. It was slow-going, and as they packed around the wound, blood continued to soak up through the gauze underneath.

Rhiannon paced up to Lena's flank, hands fisted at her sides, attention sharp. "Fucking Hunter came out of nowhere..." she breathed, and there was a vitriol in it, an anger that brimmed up and made her fists clench even tighter. "Fuckin' shitbag."

Rochelle's shoulders hunched, her head lowering, curling further into Nick's chest. "We're getting clumsy." Her tone was distracted, just a mutter, and she flexed her fingers to press down a bit harder against the backs of Nick's as Lena pushed a section of paper towel into place, bolstering the layer of soaked gauze. "This is what happens when you get clumsy... we have to... we can't make mistakes like this. We're better than this."

Lena's voice softened, her head shaking. Her eyes didn't lift from Coach even as she spoke. "Stuff like this is gonna happen, Ro', no matter how much you prep. We just... deal with it."

Nick released a quiet breath, shaky, like a laugh - though he couldn't muster much humour. Ellis slanted a look to gaze over his features, and he couldn't help but frown.

"Ain't sure I've ever seen him look so scared."

"Don't feel like we're dealing with shit. Not when I'm holding his fucking blood in with my bare hands."

Leaned in close, Rochelle spoke without looking up, her voice tight with mostly-held breath. "Nick... just stay calm, baby." They'd packed on a full layer of crumpled paper towel, and her hands slid to interlace fingers with Nick's rather than align directly on top of them, evening out the pressure they were applying. "It's slowing, I think. Just... keep holding it down."

Although red seeped through the white surface in small circles and splatters, growing damp against her fingertips, it did not soak entirely through. It was a good sign, however tentative.

When knuckles grazed at his lower back, Ellis flinched, quick to turn. Christophe stood behind him, wary concern drawing a line between his eyes, and jerked his head toward the house's front door. "Should get our gatita out of the car, ¿sí? At least. Does not help to... all be in here."

Ellis wanted to protest, instinctively rejecting the idea of leaving his teammates, even for a moment, but Chris wasn't wrong on either count. More than that, he caught the subtle tension that darted over Nick's frame at the mention of the cat, a conflicted instant of emotion before he refocused on the man in his lap.

As much as he would've chosen to go secure the small feline's safety either way, knowing it would ease Nick's mind even a little made the decision easier. The knowledge made it feel more constructive. He could help in some way, even if there wasn't much he could do to help Coach's condition.

Rhiannon darted a glance toward them, broken canine caught on her lower lip, chewing tightly. His reticence must've been obvious, because she barked out, "Go. I'll watch these fuckers."

"Okay. Alright." Ellis agreed, forcing out a sharp breath. He mindlessly pawed at his lower back, feeling both the small, sweat-damp lump of his bundled-up Bullshifters T-shirt, and his cap buckled to a rear beltloop of his jeans - soothing himself with their presence. "Just... real quick."

The Spaniard forced a small smile, offering the pistol grip-first out toward him as he took a half-step back. "I need a hand, ¿entiendes?" He tried for a joke, but it came out flat.

Ellis couldn't muster more than a tense smile before taking the weapon, turning to walk back toward the front door. He snapped out the magazine of the pistol, glancing inside to see at least a few bullets glinting copper and gold inside before slapping it back into place. He inhaled, then, marching out of the house and into the small, scrubby yard.

The fence surrounding the tiny plot was barely up to his knee, more like a cosmetic edging than actual barrier. He crossed the sandy ground and stepped over it rather than follow the stone path back to the sidewalk. Their sedan was a few yards down the road where they'd left it, too focused on Coach to worry after it.

He scanned their surroundings, taking the extra time to look up and down the nearby building faces, wary of another Smoker. All he saw was a few infected, milling at the edges of the street in either direction. They were agitated but calming; they moved sluggishly, falling over themselves as if headaches overtook and sapped their desire to hunt.

"C'mon." he hushed over his shoulder, looking long enough to verify that Chris was coming with him. "Ain't lookin' tuh scuffle. We get Maggie, 'n' get back inside. We can move the car later."

The Spaniard nodded, running his palm over his spiked mess of hair. "Vale."

They moved in tight formation, so close it was only every few steps that occurred without some part of their arm or shoulder or knee making contact with the other's. Keeping on the sidewalk, they crept forward, and Ellis maintained his attention on the infected to make sure they weren't taking notice.

Metal clattering made both men flinch - but it was a street away, like a garbage can being knocked over. The sound drew the zombies' attention in that direction rather than theirs, and several peeled off to sprint into an alleyway leading to the noise. Nerves still frayed by the disturbance, however, Ellis reached his free hand back to grab Chris' wrist and accelerate into a soft jog.

They passed the place where Coach had gone down, the flat pool of blood over the asphalt making Ellis' breath hitch. They passed the slumped shape of the Hunter, still unmoving where they'd abandoned it. As they crossed into the center of the street, circling around the nose of the sedan to skid to a stop next to the passenger side's front door, Ellis only then released his held breath.

It was half-open, and Ellis released Chris' wrist, turning slightly to pass him the handgun back. "Hold this, a'ight, bud? I gotta get her."

Christophe huffed gentle affirmation, taking the gun into his hand - but then he spoke, the words abrupt enough to give Ellis pause. "He will be alright, chico. You know." He shifted, and the faint consternation that darted over his expression said he'd tried to gesture with his off-hand. "We have superpowers, ¿si?"

The Georgian smiled a little, and this time it was more genuine, though he fell to a sigh. "Don't think that's how it works, brother." he murmured, stepping around the open door. The cat carrier was on the seat, tilted half onto one side, and through the mesh in the top he could see the squished face of their furry companion peering out.

She was pressed tight to it, orange eyes squinted as the force of it compressed her face, as if she could simply squeeze her way through the material. She'd clearly not enjoyed being left behind, though she'd been quiet in their absence. The cat seemed to be silent more than not, which was largely a blessing, though her hushed presence didn't translate to calm. As soon as he bent close she lurched to press herself into the back of the carrier.

Her hiss was almost silent.

"'Ey, girl, c'mon." he whispered, reaching out to hook his hand in the carrier's armstrap. He lifted it up off the seat, using his other hand to grab the bottom edge of it and keep it as level as possible, though the effort was strained as she shifted uneasily inside. "We gotta get on, you hear me? You can't just keep on fussin' at anyone who ain't Nick." She quieted, though he didn't get the sense it was because he'd gotten through to her.

Straightening, Ellis shrugged the strap up onto his shoulder, stepping back from the car. He turned his head, and Chris was not there.

His heart thrust itself against his ribcage, panic immediately making him take a couple more steps back, spinning on his heel to scan for the younger man. His mouth was poised to start calling, but he held back, aware of the need to stay quiet lest they get attention on them.

His panic was short-lived. Chris was not far.

The man was facing away from him, head bowed as he looked downward. Ellis felt gratitude first, and then a flush of irritation. He circled the open car door, leaving it open rather than risk the noise involved in shutting it, and darted to come up beside the ex-Angel.

"Don't do that, man. Give me a -"

"¿Qué carajo es esto?" Christophe's voice softly pressed, drawing Ellis' head into a small snap. As he stepped up, he looked down to see the Hunter slumped just in front of them. The foreigner crouched down, and Ellis watched Chris set the gun down on the asphalt in favour of getting a grip on the collar of its ragged shirt. He dragged it up with a grunt, causing its head to loll on its shoulders. "Oye, ¿qué carajo es esto?"

Although the majority of its forehead was blown out, just gore and chunks of bone in a mess of black and grey, the lower half of its face was still in one piece. That allowed him a realization: where its mouth should have been, there instead was a slim slit cocked to one side of its face. Ellis had to blink and adjust his focus, fighting the instinct to perceive a normally proportioned set of features, to realize what he was looking at.

The left side of its mouth was sealed shut. It looked almost like the remnants of an acid burn that had melted its lips together, but the flesh was undamaged, if tinged with blood and dirt. It looked like stretched clay, a solid sheet of flesh turning to stretched tendrils of skin where it split apart and lost cohesion further along.

It was as if some fusion of flesh had only just reached that halfway point.

"Whut the shit?" Ellis blurted, despite himself. Morbid curiousity dropped him to a crouch, quickly grabbing both arms around Maggie's carrier to keep her from bouncing against his hip. Once he'd settled, he reached out, grasping the Hunter by the chin. Its flesh was strangely cool to the touch as he pulled its head into a turn so he could look it over more clearly. He might've been unsettled by being so close to the creature, driven by instinctive fear, if it hadn't been missing half of its skull.

"Thing's almost ain't got a mouth no more. Gnarly." he muttered, eyes wide, unable to keep his own mouth from gawping open. "Ain't never seen the like. Have you?"

When Christophe shook his head, Ellis pressed his thumb up against the creature's merged lips, the flesh rough to the touch. Through what remained of the opening into its maw, he could see teeth and gums coated in dark gore, and the smell that wafted up might've made him gag had he been any less desensitized to it.

"Whut's wrong with it...?" Ellis muttered, more to himself than to Chris.

His eyes darted down and, unthinking, he snatched out to grab its nearest wrist. He lifted its hand, examining the greyed skin and gaunt digits extending off its palm. His chest ached at the blood - Coach's blood - soaked over its palms and covering its fingers. They were topped with gruesome claws, longer and sharper than he'd ever seen before, and coloured an unpleasant yellow that seemed rotted in their own right.

"No se, chico." Christophe mumbled back, tone full of concern. He shook the Hunter's corpse in a gentle wag, as if he might shake out some kind of explanation. All he managed was to jostle it. "It is not normal."

Ellis reached up to pinch at one of those talons, the bloodied one to the left of the thumbnail that had shattered in Coach's neck. He meant to feel the point and gauge its sharpness - but the moment he applied any real pressure and grip, it fractured down the center as if it had contained some structural flaw. The nail split into two separate pieces, the shards dropping silently to the road.

The break startled him, and he frowned at the cold hand gripped in his fingers. "Ain't real strong." he mused, shaking his head. He turned the hand, gazing at the greyed flesh, the dark veins traveling between its knuckles like bruised furrows. "Just... pierced'n'broke off. Probably got lucky it even got in his neck at all, way this looks. Would'uuh been miles worse if it'd held tuhgether worth a damn."

Releasing a sigh, Christophe shrugged his good shoulder, glancing up to look over Ellis' face. "We should show everyone." He said it in a questioning voice, unsure. The man released the Hunter, so he could lean down and grab his handgun again. "They should know, too."

Ellis nodded, straightening up from the ground, hugging Maggie's carrier tight to his side. "Yeah. But... not now. They got enough tuh worry about, without us addin' this on." He patted his hand against his thigh, feeling a sickly, greasy sensation on his fingertips where he'd touched the Hunter. "Once we get Coach fixed up, we'll bring 'em out here."

The Spaniard relented with another shrug, a tired look rising over his face that gave off some reluctance. "Está bien, haré lo que tú digas." he murmured, and Ellis took it as acquiescence.

As they walked back toward the sidewalk, the Southerner couldn't help but glance over his shoulder, frowning back at the warped infected on the road. He spoke up in a thoughtful drawl, head wagging as he did. "Maybe this Hunter's one that just didn't go right - y'know, when it was mutatin'n'all that. Like when yer bakin' cookies, 'n'there's always one or two whut don't come out so good."

Christophe snorted beside him, dubiously.

"Amigo, I think you make some scary cookies."
There were three portions of Rochelle's brain working in unison.

One section - the largest, by far - was focused solely on Coach. She watched his chest rise and fall, watched the tension in his jaw and the flexion of the muscles in his neck. She watched the blood fill the bandages pressed against the wound in his throat. She watched his eyes flutter open and shut in vague patterns, drifting in and out of consciousness.

The second portion lagged behind, trailing, dragging her eyes to flick up toward the door every few seconds. Rhiannon had taken up a position at the threshold, watching them as they worked and watching Ellis and Christophe outside, switching back and forth after small intervals of time. Her post there eased Rochelle's worry, but it would not completely settle until everyone was back inside.

The third portion was like a far-off, pitched whine, like a TV in the next room emitting soft feedback she could just hear through the walls. It was numb, distant. It was also the only thing keeping her from the sort of thoughts that might give her pause: the self-doubt, the fear, the panic.

Nick was scared, so she certainly had no room to be.

They had reached a wary balance, as the blood had only superficially leaked through to the uppermost layer of the packed material, directly under their digits. They'd shifted their grip once or twice before, and each time had caused a small gush of blood up into the gauze. The cessation of any pressure at all was too much.

The bleeding was halted under their grip, but at what point would it stay stoppered if they lifted their hands, if they relaxed even slightly? If he stirred and moved his head, would it burst into new bleeds?

It felt like a waiting game more than anything else. They sat and kept pressure, fingers laced tightly to press together, breaths subconsciously syncing where their sides were settled just as close.

Nick's jaw was rested against her temple, facial hair soft where it grazed at her. At first, he'd leaned away from her, almost skittish at the touch... but it had not taken long at all for his posture to soften. Comfort was exchanged in the contact between them - not so bold as to be quite nameable, but there all the same.

As they sat there, Lena touched her palm to Coach's cheek, a soothing gesture. He did not stir, and she looked up, glancing from Rochelle to Nick in a slow rove. Her lips pinched together as her browline did the same, a sigh panting from her.

"I know you don't want to hear this... but we need to pull the nail out."

Rochelle couldn't help a strained sound of disbelief, gesturing down at his throat with her chin.

"Pull the nail out? Are you serious? We've barely got the bleeding under control. I'm not moving my hands, let alone taking a claw out of his neck."

The biker didn't seem daunted by her protest, her tone remaining matter-of-fact, though not harsh. She focused her gaze entirely on Rochelle, a small curl of discontent warping her expression. "We can't pack the wound right with it in, and he's not going to heal around it. I know it's hard -"
"Hard, my ass." Rochelle's voice pitched higher than she meant, the dam between her and hysteria gaining the subtlest stress fractures. "This isn't hard, this is insane. We have to wait until he's stable, or he's just going to bleed out the second we move it."

Lena reached out, hand snapping to settle against her shoulder, touch delicate to avoid jostling her any. Her head tilted, a sympathetic tone entering her voice. 'Ro'. He might not get more stable than this until we take it out. The nail's holding bleeding back, but it's keeping the wound from sealing shut, too, and stopping us from applying pressure in the right place."

Rochelle didn't want to be angry, but it bubbled up. "We're not taking the fucking nail out." Her eyes darted toward the man beside her, head shifting away from his to better look at him. "Nick? Tell me you agree with me here!"

The gambler did not move. He barely blinked, frame caught in a tense coil. She wasn't entirely confident he heard her at all.

Ellis came in through the front door at a smooth pace, his arms wrapped around the rectangular cat carrier. He talked as if he hadn't even been gone, and his voice was small. The look in his eyes, subtle fear, said he'd caught the tail end of the conversation. "He... ain't doin' okay? I thought the bleedin' was slowin' down... It looked like it was slowin' down."

Christophe was close behind, expression vaguely strained, though he had the presence of mind to soften it when Rochelle glanced at him. His eyes were even softer, sympathetic and worried, urging calm.

That third percentage of Rochelle's brain settled to quiet as the team was reunited. She felt some relief at the ease of her concern, the resolution of one problem - but it didn't take long for it to turn its attention to other matters, calm unable to sink roots in her head.

Unfortunately for her, it chose to supplement the frantic static in the back of her mind.

Rhiannon didn't give up her post at the front door, though she did reach out to close the door behind them. Shutting it sunk the interior into abrupt dim and quiet, sealing them off from the outside. Her voice rasped when she spoke. "Fucker's got a Hunter claw in his throat. He's up shit creek if we don't get it out."

Gaining a deeper frown, Ellis nodded his head softly, fidgeting where he stood in an insecure gesture. He hesitated just a moment, then braved, "Always left things in Keith 'til he got tuh the E.R., but... there ain't no E.R. tuh take him to. All's we got is us, like with Chris."

Jaw gritted faintly, Rochelle let frustration pull her head into a tilt, face shadowed in the gesture. Sweat traced its way down her temple when the motion weakened its tacky grip on her forehead. "I - know. But we can wait a little longer, give him time, or... We have it under control right now, and I don't..." She trailed off, staring down at the bloody shapes of Nick's fingers beside her own, clamped over Coach's neck.

A thoughtful grunt wandered past Ellis' lips, and thought started in his eyes. He looked abruptly at Coach, head tilting a tick to the side. He grew that far-off look in his eyes, the one he tended to get when he was stewing on a plan of action. It was the quiet focus of measurement and estimation, sizing up the situation before him. He sucked in his lower lip and chewed on it, humming just once.

The young Georgian didn't speak, though he did slowly start to lower into a crouch, setting the cat carrier down on the ground. As he freed his hands, he brushed them together, calloused skin rasping together.

"It's not under control if you can't let go." Lena sighed, and the bluster of the noise betrayed a small flare of frustration. It was harsh in a way that was uncharacteristic of her - from what characteristics Rochelle had gleaned in their time together, at least - and tired. "If we do this, we can get the wrappings on right. It's the best move."

"Then do it." Nick stated, voice flat. His head bobbed, like his neck weakened, before he snapped it upright. His eyes raised, darting smoothly over the rest of the team. "If we gotta, then we gotta. Can't just leave it there, call it a trendy new fucking piercing. It's gotta get out sometime, otherwise we're just plugging the boat with our fingers here."

Lena gazed at him, a gentle quirk bending her mouth into a strained line, almost sympathetic. She inhaled slowly, forcing her eyes back toward Rochelle. "What do you think?" she murmured, softer. Her tone gave the subtlest submission; she wouldn't do anything without Rochelle's say-so. It was intended, no doubt, as a respectful gesture.

Just makes it feel like I'm pulling the trigger.

Slowly, warily, Rochelle nodded.

She barely noticed as Ellis moved to circle around them, disappearing behind the couch and into the kitchen. She didn't look after him, eyes staying riveted on Coach's face as a subtle constriction grasped at her heart, tightening her airways and quickening her pulse.

"Okay. How do we do this? Just... yank?"

Lena pressed in close again, tone growing rushed with something too severe to be excitement. "It's in there a few inches, if I saw the other claws right... I'm gonna pull it out as level as I can, trying to keep it straight on with how it went in, okay?" Her hand raised to wave fingertips a few inches above the bundle of bloodied bandage clasped under their hands.

The two survivors had encircled the nail with their hands, and it jutted up an inch or so from the bandages loosely ringed around it. The brunette put her hand flat, setting it at an angle, roughly matching the angle of the claw jutting out from Coach's neck. "You guys keep doing what you're doing, and when it's out, you can put pressure right on the puncture. Easy as pie."

Rochelle let a laugh escape her, and it came out in a vague titter, more awkward than she meant. "Yeah. Easy. Fuck." She turned her head to press her cheek tightly against Nick's shoulder, only distantly surprised when he shifted his chin to settle it against her temple.

"You gotta be with me for this, doll." he murmured. His voice was not built for that gentle register, straining and going almost rusty with the effort. His vulnerability made her relax just a little bit, softened her posture, made her feel less alone. That was a dangerous proposition when her stress made up a significant portion of the support structure keeping her upright.

Rhiannon had not approached, and Christophe had moved to join her. They both leaned against the wall, observing with vastly different expressions. The Spaniard had a frown, distant but concerned. He'd pulled away, but watched every move and gesture with almost frantic attention.

On the other hand, the blonde was seething, fingernails dug tight into the sleeves of her jacket. Her fury bubbled over in small ways, the abrupt clench of her jaw or a sudden jerk of her body, shifting through a few positions against the wall.

Rochelle bit the inside of her cheek and briefly closed her eyes. She inhaled as if she were about to dive under the surface of some cold depths and needed the oxygen. "Okay. Whatever we need to do - just... do it quick."

Lena smiled with a sympathetic tension, and her hand settled on Rochelle's forearm for just a beat, light to avoid adjusting her grip on Coach, squeezing there in a comforting gesture. Her gaze shifted between the two survivors, but focused on the woman seated in the couch's arm. "He's gonna be fine, lovey."

Unbidden, Rochelle found herself mumbling, "How are you so calm about this?"
She hadn't meant it critically - but the subtext remained. It felt accusatory, the way it hung in the air; the bikers had only been with them a relatively short time, after all. It was easier for Lena to be detached when Coach wasn't almost a father figure to her. That was a fact, not a judgement, but that didn't soften the implication of it.

The brunette's smile faded, just a little.

"Hey, y'all?" Ellis' voice rose from the kitchen, wary, but edged with an eagerness. "I guess the power never went off in here, 'cause the fridge is workin'. There's some food in here, 'n' some ice in the freezerbox."

Rochelle might've felt some frustration at his seemingly conversational intrusion, but she'd come to know him well enough to know he was rarely eager for no reason... even if that reason was obfuscated at the start. She gritted her jaw, watching helplessly as Lena's eyes averted, and prompted him. "Ice?"

Ellis started to rifle through cabinets even as he spoke, voice picking up speed as he went. The clattering of plastic sounded out sharply, like he'd unceremoniously tossed something to the counter. "Yeah. There's two trays in here, 'n'I got some Ziplocs, too... I think we can use it tuh - see -well, this one time -"

Sharp and abrupt, Nick interrupted. "Skip the story, Overalls."

The Georgian paused for only a beat before continuing, drawl clipping into a simpler diction. "Cold slows yer body down, right? Makes everythin' like... constrict, blood vessels'n'shit. Whut if we put ice on there?"

Rochelle instinctively looked toward Coach's face, a frown starting on her lips. "On his neck?"

Leaning back, Lena bit at her upper lip, raking her bottom teeth against it. "Well... Messing with his body temp's not great, but... yeah, reckon that might help." As she spoke, she grew slightly more animated, warming to the idea with every word. "Sandwich some ice between some cloth, use it to apply pressure... It might slow some of the smaller bleeds down enough to clot."

She stood abruptly, lifting her arm to gesture toward Ellis over the kitchen bar. "Get a bag and wrap it up in a washcloth - try to find a clean one."

The increased pace of clattering and shuffling from the kitchen indicated Ellis' urgency, including the crackle of plastic and ice as he freed the cubes from their tray. It didn't take long for him to launch himself back into the living room, his hands cupped under a Ziploc bag full of slim icecubes that was wrapped in a pale blue handcloth.

"This good?" he asked as he dropped it into Lena's open palm.

The biker flashed a taut smile back, turning to nod toward the prone survivor on the couch. "How much bandages we got left? If we can get the wound to clot, we'll need to change these... otherwise it's a short trip to infection city."

Quick as he'd appeared, Ellis darted away, crossing the living room toward the front door. The backpack had been thrown inside as they'd carried Coach through the threshold, and he crouched down to dig through the main open compartment. "Bit left. Gonna run us clear out, though."

Nobody responded. There was no response to give when there was no alternative.

Lena turned, slipping to her knees in front of the couch. Both her hands settled on Coach's arm, squeezing gently against his forearm and bicep. As she spoke, her right hand drifted down to his wrist, pressing fingertips against his pulse. Her tongue clucked against her front teeth for a moment before she spoke. "He's in a little shock, from the bloodloss, but he's doing good."

At a low mutter, Nick responded, "Considering most of him is soaked into my jeans, I'll take that with a grain of salt." Rochelle glanced at him without moving her head. His body had not relaxed, but the quiet resurgence of sarcasm in his voice was soothing, like the rise of a familiar tide.

Ellis returned with a small roll of gauze in one hand, sliding to come to a squat beside the dark-haired biker, peering sidelong at her. "Can I help?" he murmured, voice rough. "Anythin' I can do?"

She lifted her hand from Coach's wrist, turning her palm over and offering it out to him. He started to place the gauze roll there - but she shook her head and grabbed his other wrist instead, pulling his hand to replace it where she'd just had hers. She pressed his fingertips into the crook of Coach's wrist, settling it where he could feel his pulse.

"You keep an eye on him. If his heartrate starts going up, holler. Okay, sunshine?"

Ellis nodded obediently, focusing furtively down toward the grip he now had on Coach, as if his gaze would help in the endeavour of tracking the pulse tapping against his fingertips. He only snuck small peeks up, watching as Lena pressed in close.

"I'll -" she began, but Ellis interjected.

"Might break." he said, without lifting his head. Lena's body tensed slightly, her attention flickering back toward him for an instant with a faint twitch at the corner of her eye. At the look, he elaborated, lowering his chin. "The claw. Other ones were real fragile. Just be careful takin' it out... if it snaps off in his neck..."

Distaste curled at the edge of the biker's mouth, exhaling a short breath. "Sure as heck can't go digging around for pieces if we lose some. He can't take the stress, or the extra bloodloss." Her head tilted, tensing her muscles as if to crack her neck. "Okay, Ellis, good to know."

He gave a wince, apologetic, aware he'd introduced new tension into her frame.

She held steady despite it, looking up toward the two survivors on the couch, her jaw hardening. "I'll pull it out, we'll put this -" She jostled the bag of ice with a clench of her fingers. "- over everything. You guys apply pressure. We ready?"

Nick shifted his shoulders, rolling them without moving his arms. "Gotta do it whether we are or not, so just do it." he grunted, low. "If he were awake, he'd be telling us to get the hell on with it already."

Lena surveyed him, then Rochelle, then focused down toward the jagged claw. Her right hand gripped the bag of ice, slumped in her palm. Her left hand slotted against Rochelle's and Nick's, her fingertips encircling the yellowed, almost calcified shape that was implanted in the man's throat.

It was far from a normal nail, even taking into account the length; it was cloudy and misshapen, like jagged slate. The structure of it was layered in a visible grain, building to the rough point that was hidden away in the wound. Her fingertips only-just grasped it, touch delicate, minding Ellis' warning.

She ghosted a countdown, just a soft, "Three - two -", and then pinched her grasp closed and pulled.

More material slid loose than Ellis expected, even knowing how long the others had been. Knowing that detail, estimating the length and how much was buried versus how much jutted out... it didn't prepare him for watching the nail slip free. Though he couldn't see the wound itself, the wet schk as it gave for the claw to be unsheathed was enough to fill in the blanks.

It came out whole.

In an instant, Nick's hands jolted up and off the man by just a few inches, pushing Rochelle's aside. Lena stuffed the wrapped bag of ice between his palm and the wound, and he leaned into the effort of flattening it smoothly against the injury, ice scraping against itself in a rough clatter as he did.

With the nail gone, Nick was able to center his palms on the wound itself, applying pressure straight over the puncture. His tongue darted to wet his lips, and it remained stuck into the corner of his mouth, a mindless gesture.

There was no rush of blood, no sudden leak or spill.

There was a dense silence among them all as they waited, a moment or two passing. Ellis felt the man's heartbeat remain steady against the pads of his fingers, and he looked up, warily nodding when Lena glanced his way. She gave the smallest smile, a gentle reassurance, before looking back toward Coach's covered neck.

They waited longer, silence continuing as if they were afraid to break it, as if the utterance of words might shift some unsteady balance. Minutes stretched on around them - six or seven, maybe, if Ellis' belated internal count was anywhere near correct - before Lena spoke up.

"Should check it. Can't leave the ice on too long, anyway."

It was soft, and Nick didn't react. His eyes were unfocused, gaze elsewhere, focused on Coach and yet looking right through him.

Rochelle hadn't added her hands back into the effort, instead holding her bloodied fingers out in a curl above her lap. Her eyes darted toward Nick's shoulder, arm twitching as if she meant to reach out and touch him - but she seemed to think better of it, considering how dirty they were. She instead simply pressed her chin against the outer edge of his shoulder. "Nick." she murmured.

The gesture disturbed the quiet fugue that had frozen Nick in place, making him blink, as if awakening from a doze. He shook his head, reluctance in the gesture as he glanced amongst his teammates. "Time to see if Tons Of Fun can hack it, huh?"

Then he lifted his hands, digits gently trembling in the air as they pulled away, eyes alert on the outer edges of the bandages and looking for seepage. He used his wrist to brush away sweat where it had beaded up at the edge of his eye, tickling at the soft skin there, and did not seem to notice when it smeared blood against his temple.
The bandages held.

Relief didn't cover the feeling. Gratitude was better. The fear kicked in, late, like the knowledge that he'd taken a turn for the better freed the darker emotions she'd kept locked up tight. She wanted to throw something - or throw up - or just yell at the top of her lungs.

Ellis did it for her, thrusting to his feet and whooping, outright slinging his cap to the ground. Lena immediately stood, arms out to shush him, her eyes darting toward the front door. She didn't get out a word before he'd grabbed her by the elbows and dragged her into a clumsy hug.

"Thank yuh." he murmured to her, squeezing her frame in his arms.

She staggered, at first, but caught her balance. Ellis had a few inches on her, so she was forced to lean up into it, patting his side with her less-bloody left hand. "Welcome." she hummed back.

Rochelle's heart jumped when Nick's arm suddenly looped around her neck, and she choked on a breath when it tightened to draw her against his side. He pressed a kiss against her temple, and mouth still flush with her skin, let out an almost airless chuckle. It was... soft. Precious, maybe, something secret buried between them.

Instinct made her hiss quietly, "Get off, stinky."

He released her and pulled away, lips struggling to remain flat, and she wrestled with that terribly simple adoration that fluttered in her chest. It was easier to funnel it elsewhere, so she leaned down to where Coach remained on Nick's lap, gently brushing sweat from the unconscious man's brow with her wrist.

"You're gonna be okay, papa bear. We got you."
It was a delicate process, getting Nick out from under Coach.

The whole team had all taken a grip on his upper body, fisting fingers in his shirt and grasping at his shoulders, and lifted him up to let Nick slip out. They'd kept him as stable as they could during the move, and they eased him down onto one of the small decorative pillows that were leaned against either arm of the sofa.

Rochelle immediately started to hover, arranging his limbs just-so and double - triple - quadruple checking that they hadn't started him bleeding again. Christophe lingered just behind her, and his worried gaze spent equal amounts of time on Coach and on her back.

Nick couldn't leave fast enough. He found himself in the kitchen a few instants later, fragmented, not quite clear on the details of the distance between.

His body moved stiffly, staggering toward the sink with singular determination. His fingers slipped as he tried to turn the faucet, forcing him to tighten his fist around it until his knuckles ached. The blood on his hands had mostly dried to a tacky layer, flaking like rust, but there was enough wetness there to make grasping anything difficult.

As the water sputtered into a steady stream, he shoved both his hands into the spray. Rather than scrub, he just let the water flow over his knuckles and between his fingers, feeling some rogue splatters dampen the edges of his sleeves.

He watched the water run red into the drain, just for a moment, before closing his eyes.

The window of opportunity to pretend he had no emotional entanglements had long since closed on him, and he mostly knew that. It didn't change what he needed to do, but it made it more complicated.

He inhaled, lungs billowing open beneath his ribs, and the oxygen flooded his system with a tingling sensation. He flooded his brain with a chant, forceful: He's fine. It provided a similar ticklish feeling, nerve-endings reawakening from their slumber and sending out sparks, like tiny test-fires. He's gonna be fine.

Nick shivered, teeth snapping together as it reached the base of his skull, and found a laugh escaping his lips. It was short and broken, and entirely devoid of humour.

He remembered what it felt like, thinking that Ellis was dead. He'd imagined the Georgian's glassy eyes and limp frame and given up. Jerry had called his bluff, intentional or otherwise; losing Ellis had killed him. His will to fight had snuffed itself out, all in an instant, survival instinct maimed and crippled in a corner.

He'd lost enough people in his life that he'd not expected it to gut him so - and neither had he anticipated how much the threat of losing Coach would. The man was their concrete, their brick and mortar. His quiet patience had held them together when they had strained, and his fierce will had urged them onward when they had faltered.

Coach hadn't been the sole decision-maker, their singular leader, but wasn't he the closest thing they had to one?

He and Nick had fought on and off, since the start, yet there had sprouted a fragile attachment between them. Sometimes I think he's the only one who actually gets who I am, not the bullshit Ellis and Ro' think, and still... tries. Their bond had weathered the storm in a way he wasn't used to. He sees just who I am, and he doesn't like me. But he's still never given up - not even when I deserved it.

Nick finally started to move his hands, scrubbing stiffly, watching the stream of water over his knuckles thicken and darken.

Deserve it.

He couldn't spare enough attention to be startled when another set of hands drifted into his periphery. They grabbed the bottle of dish detergent from beside the sink, tilting it casually to dump a few splashes of thick orange soap over his hands.

On reflex, without thinking twice, he turned his wrists and rubbed his left palm over his right hand. He swapped his hands, spreading the lather in cautious and even swipes, white foam turning bright pink as it absorbed the blood. It stung, flooding his nose with citrus-flavoured gore, and he scrubbed harder.

Rhiannon's head dipped to square one eye at him, sidelong, her brow lifting. He might've almost mistaken her strained expression for concern, her hazel gaze flickering between his face and his hands. "You good, dude?"

Nick looked at first down at his hands, letting his thumb grind into the soft spot between his second and third knuckles, sighing. He then closed his eyes outright, wishing he didn't relish the spasms of pain that scattered over the cuts and scrapes that littered his palms and fingers.

Part of him felt like he'd been fleeing apathy since he'd collapsed at the mall. It nipped at his heels, numbing him further with every graze and near-miss, like some sub-zero temperature had burrowed just under his skin. If he moved too quickly it might burst like a squeezed blister - or leech deeper, like some internal hemorrhage, and ice him over from the inside.

At least the stinging pain over scratches and scrapes proved out his grip on reality.

"He doing okay still?" he muttered, lowering his chin to rub it against his shoulder, chasing an itch in the soft facial hair over his jaw.

"Yeah." she responded. He felt rather than saw her turn around and hop up onto the counter only a few inches beside the sink. Her heels picked up a steady pattern of thumps against the bottom counters as she swung her legs. "Almost had me scared for a minute there. Saw that Hunter hit him, and -"

She bit it back, and Nick didn't miss the way her legs paused in their rhythm of kicks. He resisted the urge to open his eyes, tilting his head to listen over the gush of water from the faucet. She inhaled, self-soothing, and suddenly there was a small grin in her voice.

"You didn't answer my question, fucknut."

Nick let that sit in the air, scrubbing his hands until he could no longer feel the slickness of soap, blindly scraping under his fingernails with the opposing twin. He took just a moment to appreciate the simple joy of washing his hands - and then he opened his eyes.

The stainless steel sink basin was streaked with black and grey and red. Though his hands were no longer dipped in Coach's blood, his own was freshly welling up from any number of small scrapes and scabs that he'd torn open. That, not to mention the blood semi-dried into not just the belly of his shirt, but soaked into the upper half of his jeans.

He didn't feel particularly clean.

"Whoopsy-daisy." he returned in a nasal pitch, rolling his eyes. He dug his heels in as he reached past her to snatch a handful of paper towel off the roll that was anchored onto the countertop. "Guess I didn't. Try again tomorrow."

She watched him move, and there was a moment where he almost expected her to lunge and grab him as his arm crossed dangerously close to her lower back. The woman was half-feral, more often than not, and something in the depths of his instinct surged up to meet the energy.

He had half a mind to succumb to it.

I mean, which sister's really more attainable? Sweet-talk Ms. Girl-Next-Door, or get your dick wet with Daddy Issues McGee? He was so exhausted, but his mind idled like an engine, unrelenting. Course, I fuck one - or both - of them, with my luck, it turns into a fucking soap opera for the next however-long we team up. Might be more insufferable than the Ellis situation.

He couldn't shut it off, any more than he'd been able to quiet the surges of dark thoughts. Strangely, those had felt more under control. Or I get a threesome with two hot sisters. Maybe the apocalypse isn't the death of my bucket list, after all.

Nick had never really liked himself, as much as he loved himself.

Recently, he hated himself.

He set to drying his hands, turning away and walking back out into the slim hallway that was nestled into the center of the building. He spared only a glance down to dodge the corpse sprawled on the kitchen tile, the hot stench from its decaying form bleaching out what was left of the orange scent from his senses.

Gotta do something. Anything.

The house's first floor was fairly open: the entryway poured straight into the living room, and only a counter and an end pillar separated that from the kitchen. Across from him, there was a small dining room, tucked into a squat staircase up to the second floor. Under the staircase housed one open door, a powder room, barely large enough to fit a toilet and a pedestal sink.

On his right and past the kitchen, there was a short hallway with two closed doors. They drew his eye, mouth twitching downward. "Did you guys clear all these rooms?" he called over his shoulder, without looking, and without really waiting for an answer. "Blondie, go get us weapons and come do a sweep with me."

He heard her land back onto the tile, and the three steps between them were completed in a swift few motions. He tensed, anticipating something well before it came: the toe of her boot impacted against the heel of his shoe, hard enough to skate it askew on the tile. She barely broke stride.

"Eat me, dick." she grunted, but walked out into the living room and toward the weapons they'd mostly accumulated near the front door. To the rest of the team, still clustered in the living room, she asked, "Need anything?"

Nick focused down the hall, stiffening his shoulders in an attempt to look completely disinterested in Rochelle's response.
"No, I think we're okay... But maybe some blankets, and if there's any kind of... medical supplies." She sighed, softly, a tremor touching her voice. She'd kept her composure so far, but it would break before long. "Doubt there's gauze in here, but some alcohol or something. We need to clean him up at some point."

Lena sounded a little more distant, muffled, like she'd buried her face into something. "Pillows, so we can keep his head elevated. Unless Nick wants to come back in here and hold him up."

Rhiannon snorted, her voice coming back into focus as she returned to Nick. "Aye-aye, cap'n. Bedroom-on-fuckin'-wheels comin' right up." She pushed the handle of the stun baton into Nick's palm, striding past him with her bat swinging in her other hand. "Let's go. Since you were too scared to go alone. Pussy."

He wanted to say he bit back the urge to retort, but he wasn't sure he had the energy to return fire in the first place.

Peering over the kitchen bar, Ellis' brows tangled up, his thumb moving to scratch at his cheek. His nails rustled on the stubble that had started accruing over his jaw and down his neck. He watched the two walk down the hall, opening his mouth to protest - because he and Chris had made sure the house was safe before they'd all come inside -

Rochelle muttered, low, "Don't. Let him keep busy."

Ellis spared a glance toward her, lips tightening into a small frown, and nodded. As much as he wanted to go after the man and make sure he was alright, he knew that his presence was more stress than comfort, for the time being. He couldn't change that overnight, and as much as he'd been enjoying shifting the power dynamic, he mostly just wanted to know Nick was okay.

Softly, Ellis dropped deeper into his squat, putting both hands onto Coach's nearest knee. He surveyed over the man's prone body, swishing the air in his mouth from cheek to cheek in a thoughtful gesture before puffing it out in a sigh. "Coach seems better, now."

Staring down at her hands, Rochelle flexed them, dark skin turned a strange crimson with blood. "Yeah. As long as the bleeding stays stopped, I think we're going to be okay. He lost a lot, though... sure as hell not going anywhere tonight. Not until he's back up."

"Seconded." Lena affirmed from where she'd pressed her face into her shoulder, resting her eyes. "He'll wake back up soon, I think, but he'll need rest. He needs to get some sugar, too, if we can rustle some up."

Ellis nodded.

"Least there's food in the fridge. I think some of it's still good, 'n'we can even use the oven." he mumbled idly, babbled, barely paying attention to the words as they left him. "Kinda dumb, but I'd kill fer somethin' half-normal. Like... meatloaf. Meatloaf with a side 'uh taters'n'peas. You know, I ain't never thought I'd miss peas. Darned if it ain't the li'l things."

Rochelle sighed, placing her palm on Coach's forehead and stroking between his brows with her thumb. It smudged a soft line of red there, joining the red soaking most of his neck and shoulders. "I miss getting dressed in the morning." She fell to a soft tone, Ellis' stream-of-consciousness chatter ever-contagious. "I've never been that much of a girly-girl, you know? Earrings, lipgloss, nailpolish every few weeks. But, sweet Jesus, do I miss rolling out of bed, getting the coffee on, sitting in my closet for an hour. Like choosing any one of my fifty-seven T-shirts was going to make a difference..."

Lena's head lifted, and she gazed off into the distance, a longing frown warping her features into more of a grimace. "I miss coffee." she whimpered, soft.

Christophe slipped to sit on the arm of the sofa, resting his hand against his knee to slump down and pass a glance across his three conscious teammates. A small degree of frustration flickered across his posture, and he interrupted, "Bonita, you take a second, maybe? Clean up, al menos."

Rochelle lifted her head to look at him, her gaze ticking over his face, taking in the tension there, the exhaustion and the concern - and the small plea in his eyes. She shifted to stand after a moment, holding both her hands in front of herself in a squeamish gesture. "Yeah, that's... not a bad idea. You guys keep an eye on him?"

Both Ellis and Lena nodded, and she stepped away, starting to turn to walk out of the living room.

She hadn't taken more than a step, however, before Chris' arm snaked suddenly to grab around her waist. It startled her, though she managed to swallow the sound that threatened to escape, composing herself enough to offer him a bemused look as he came up next to her.

His arm tightened, flattening his palm and fingers to get a more full grip on her hip, and she obliged him by letting her stride shift over a step closer. They collided into a soft lean against one another, his frame warm against hers. She turned halfway toward him, elbow nudging into his ribs, and broke into a small smile.

"What?" she uttered, drawing the sound out just slightly, plaintively.

Chris tilted his head to match gazes with her, his lighter brown eyes searching her darker pair. Something softened in his features, a not-so-subtle yearning, delicate in its warmth. His attention was not heady, not lustful. It was almost... sad. Sympathetic, at least. Maybe he saw that tremendous well of static just behind her eyes, only just contained.

"Bésame." he murmured, voice faint, that lisp creeping through in a way it only seemed to do when he was unfocused. The way he darted the tiniest lick of his lower lip needed no translation.

He waited, grip softening, as if to enable her potential escape.

Rochelle should have hesitated. She was fairly sure she meant to hesitate, in fact, like some hastily jotted-down reminder in ink on her wrist, sweated and smeared off long before she thought to check it again. Instead, she pressed up onto the balls of her feet and tipped her chin to press her lips against his, shutting her eyes into the kiss.

They were barely a foot from the sofa, and Lena and Ellis' eyes were all but riveted on them. If either of them had any sense that they shouldn't have been onlookers to the situation, it hadn't kicked in yet. They both stared, though Ellis' mouth was propped open in outright shock.

The first time they'd kissed, it had been sudden and short. There had been no space for any sort of reciprocation or evolution of it, no gaining of familiarity with one another. They'd tried again in the mall, but they had eased so tenderly up to it that they'd not managed contact before they'd been interrupted.

She had no intention of repeating either of those mistakes. Even if she also had no interest in public exhibitionism, she wasn't stupid enough to not know what making it a little public meant to him.

She'd rejected him once. Not again.
Her hand darted up, resting her fingertips against his jaw and stroking over the facial hair she pressed a little harder into the kiss, lips parting just-so. It wasn't enough to deepen the kiss, but just enough to meld them against each other and push them past the uncertainty of a soft peck.

"Holy shit." Nick's voice dryly cut across the house, full of faux-shock. He'd stepped out of the far bedroom, it seemed, and the soft snicker that interrupted him said Rhiannon had joined him. "It's an early Christmas miracle. Somebody nutted up."

Too public. groaned in the back of her head.

As if in comfort, Chris' fingers twitched against her hip before abruptly delving up and across her back. His hand slipped under the slim purple hoodie that was cut just at the waist of her sweatpants, fingertips finding the curve and dimple of her spine. They splayed and stroked there with only the whisper of contact, sparking electricity and gooseflesh up her back.

Rochelle shivered, despite herself, and the abrupt flare of warm butterflies in her stomach seemed the right cue to pull back. She kept her body close, though, arching her back in a slight nudge against his palm. She couldn't help but break into a smile, pushing her shoulder against his chest. "Cheeseball."

Christophe cocked his head with a soft hum, uncomprehending, moving in playful slow-motion to kiss her again.

She twisted out of his arm and took the first step away from him at a quick hop, unable to stifle a laugh as she fled out of the living room. The spread of warmth in her chest didn't erase the stress bubbling in the back of her throat, but it did quiet it.

The younger man looked after her, expression utterly lost, arm still half-stretched into the curled grip it had had around her. It was only when she'd disappeared into the tiny bathroom under the staircase, the door clicking shut behind her, that any of them moved an inch.

Chris lifted his hand, pressing his fingers into his eyes and applying pressure there. He released a steady groan, the noise merging with a faded, "¿Qué voy a hacer ahora?"

He managed to sound pained and ecstatic all at once.

The Spaniard's head flicked up to spare a small wink toward Nick, attention abruptly turning to blink at Ellis and Lena. He examined their faces - neither of which had so much as shifted - and jutted his jaw forward just slightly to park a slanted grin on his face. "Payasos, what? Why you look at me like this?"

Lena's mouth opened and closed a few times, but she said nothing. Instead, she turned her head to look at Ellis in a less-than-subtle attempt to throw the onus to respond onto him. He, on the other hand, didn't break his stare at Chris for a second.

"Uh." he uttered, body swaying for just a beat before he shifted to drop his knee to the ground, turning to face Christophe more squarely. Embarrassment bled into his voice and over his face, tenderly pushing himself to speak past a slightly choked inhale of air. "So... y'all're...? Y'know. Like, datin' fer real?"

Chris' grin widened just a tick, gaze softening. "Ah, too early, tío."

Rhiannon practically flung herself around Nick and down the hall, charging to close the distance. Her outstretched arm snagged the pillar at the end of the kitchen counter, gripping the edge to dangle her body off it in a lean, balanced on one foot. "The shitballs does that mean? 'For real'?
You're telling me this is new? These lovebirds haven't been fucking this whole time?"

Both Ellis and Chris looked at each other, hesitating, neither of them quite sure how to respond to that. They were saved the effort of doing so when Rochelle chimed in, voice muffled through the bathroom door. "I can hear you, assholes." She was not nearly far enough away to be out of the conversation. "Right here. Not deaf. Not fucking. Also, not your business."

With a soft and wholly sincere smile, Christophe gave a faintly helpless shrug, gesturing his hand in her direction as if to defer to her response.

Rhiannon blinked, hopping to straighten out her footing. She let go of the pillar in a slow relaxation of her arm, looking first toward the bathroom, then over at Christophe again. She tilted her head, then pointed a pinky at the foreigner. "You sure ain't a closer, huh?"

Lena had just enough time to choke into a rusted-out laugh before Nick grabbed Rhiannon by the back of her leather jacket and yanked.

She was jerked backwards a step, stumbling to catch herself. The startled look on her face warped quickly into fury as she whirled around and shoved his arm away with her free hand. "Cocksucker!" As soon as she'd gotten her balance, she lifted the bat in her other hand, a blatant threat.

Nick put both hands up, stun baton dangling from the wrist-strap looped around his forearm. "Easy, Fireball." he sighed out, exasperated.

Ellis didn't like the twist of nausea that hit him. He didn't like the way it made him feel, how he could feel his face and his gut go cold, lips parting to gust out air like he'd been punched in the stomach. He practically forgot how to breathe for just a moment, lungs chugging to a halt.

That one. That one, more than any of them, had always felt special. He didn't have to try too hard to remember the first time Nick called him that; in the swamps, with Ellis on his back, carrying him over marshy ground. He'd muttered it, soft, like an apology. It had always been soft, though all those nicknames had softened in their own ways.

That one was supposed to be his.

The conman hadn't missed a beat, his brows raising dubiously. He did not look intimidated by her threat, and his hands-up posture read like satire. "Just upstairs, two minutes, and then you can come back here and give them as much shit as you want."

The blonde woman seemed to think on that just a beat, before grunting and turning on her heel to stride past him and toward the staircase. "Fine, dickhole."

Nick watched her go, shaking his head in a gesture that was an inch away from amused, his gaze darting momentarily into the living room. His mouth quirked into a frown, then... but rather than looking at any of his teammates, his attention had settled on the front door.

His arm lifted, gesturing toward it. "Barricade that." he ordered in a thin bark, at no one in particular.

He didn't even wait for acknowledgement before he turned around, following after Rhiannon, both of them disappearing into the sharp curve of the staircase. Their shadows lingered behind them, cast starkly in the dim light from the second floor, before slipping out of view.

Ellis couldn't resist a soft sigh, dropping his gaze to peer at his hands. An uneasy feeling settled into his gut, as much as he tried to resist it. He couldn't help but stew.

He'd never have said it aloud, but the fact was that Coach had gotten injured because Nick was having some quiet conversation with Rhiannon. Now, seeing her go out of her way to go check on him in the kitchen, seeing them rushing off to investigate the house together... hearing that cannibalized petname get so carelessly thrown out...

And maybe seeing Christophe and Rochelle kiss had made him just a little jealous.

_Hate how he makes me go all stupid all the time._

On instinct, Ellis shifted, tilting his head to sneak a glance at Lena. His jaw flexed against the urge to speak abruptly, but he inhaled first, smoothing out his tone before he asked, "Since when're they buddy-buddy, anyhow?"

Lena gave him a shrug, muddy-green eyes dodging his a little too quickly, not settling to match his gaze. He couldn't help but let his attention linger on her, soaking in the sudden hesitance there. The biker stood abruptly, brushing her palms together. "You heard the dude." she uttered, turning to start toward the front door. "Let's block this dang door. Probably won't stop a Tank, but at least we'll get some warning."

Ellis didn't move, not initially. He watched her leave, slowly letting his chest fill.

It was a stupid thing to be concerned about, when Nick hated Rhiannon about as much as she hated him. Stupid of him, entirely, to be worried about such things when they'd just held onto Coach's life by the skin of their teeth. The last thing he wanted to be was selfish, when he should have just been grateful.

As he steeled himself with his tongue bitten in a clenched jaw, jolting to his feet and marching toward the front door to help blockade it, Ellis tried to clear it from his mind.

If he tried _extra_ hard, he could almost pretend it worked.
Chapter 273

The second floor of the house felt claustrophobic, a slim hallway curling off to the right that was peppered with doorways, five in total. The dim ceiling lamp cast fuzzy shadows against the walls and over the dimpled popcorn texture that left the blue paint strangely mottled.

Rhiannon moved at a casual strafe up to the first door on the right, nosing it open with the end of her bat. The hallway light spilled in enough to drape against the foot of a bed, but not further. She slid up to the doorway and pushed her arm through, stretching to feel around on the wall beside the door with her fingertips. Her hand struck a lightswitch with a click, and a light blinked on inside.

Dim orange light flooded the room, and motion immediately caught Nick's eye - but it was just the fan seated underneath the lamps, starting up its rotation with a sluggish creak.

He frowned at it, watching as it reached its top speed, wobbling uncertainly with every spin.

"Any zombies in here?" Rhiannon called out, spinning her bat in her hand, striding across the bedroom with only a half-hearted effort to survey her surroundings. She struck a slim closet door built into the wall as she passed, rattling the slatted wood, before coming to a stop beside the bed. "No?"

Abruptly, she dropped to her knees, grabbing a handful of the comforter that was draped all the way to the floor. She lifted it up, craning her head to peer underneath. "Dude, hate to tell you, but I don't think there are any monsters under the bed."

Nick didn't plan to settle his gaze on her rear, but there it landed. She was skinnier than he generally preferred, when he had the luxury of preference, but she was a far cry from unattractive. On top of that, her flash-fire anger and aggressive attitude didn't dissuade him from the chase. If anything, it was a bonus. Personalities like hers usually translate to teeth and claw in the sack. Wouldn't mind a change of pace.

That landed flat.

The truth was, after the morning's events, he wanted nothing more than Ellis' tender attention, his gentle and yet electric affection. He wanted to bury his face against Ellis' shoulder and bite into the taut muscle there, to feel the other man's fingers thread against the nape of his neck. He wanted Ellis' hips bucking into his, driven wild, gusting out his name like it was all he knew how to say. He craved it, and staring at Rhiannon just made him crave it more.

Perfectly good tail in front of you, and you still can't stop thinking about a fucking Georgia peach. Christ, Nick, maybe Chris is right. You are losing it.

Rhiannon straightened, using her grip on the bed to thrust herself to her feet. "Only fuckin' monster in this house is whatever the shit is going on downstairs. They seriously weren't bangin' it out?"

Nick, if nothing else, had the presence of mind to look elsewhere, glancing down the hall as if he hadn't been staring - however fruitlessly - at her ass. "Don't think so." he responded, only half paying attention. As the adrenaline petered out from his body, it was harder and harder to focus on anything, let alone form a game plan. "Chris has been hounding her from day one. About time she threw the poor kid a bone."

A bolt of laughter from the blonde made his attention dart her way again. When he let a faint confusion bleed through his expression, she bounced her studded brow in a lewd waggle. "Bone."
He did not laugh. He shrugged a shoulder, instead, with a lazy response. "Not yet, apparently."

She grinned, and what had been vague amusement turned a little devilish, for just a moment. "Cunt thinks he's witty. Never seen that shit before." The biker strode back toward him, tossing her thin, dye-damaged hair over her shoulder with a flick of her head. It was a dismissive gesture, though he couldn't help but notice how much her attitude toward him had changed since he'd positioned himself to leave with them.

Rhiannon undoubtedly did not like him, but they were alike enough in attitude that they'd found a quiet chemistry. He didn't generally get along with women who fell so close in step with his personality, but she'd softened to him, a little. That, and I think we've been getting along better once we both started ignoring fifty percent of everything the other person says. Was how my ex and I lasted as long as we did.

Nick's eyes tracked her, thoughtful, as she walked to exit the room. He was half-blocking the entry, and he did not move to get out of her way. "I'm hilarious." he countered, pinching his brows together in mock-upset.

Her posture shifted, taking the half-inch step to the side necessary to let their shoulders collide as she came parallel to him. It was an aggressive jostle, a small bump of contact, and they were so close in height that it was not ineffective, despite her slim body. She couldn't stop herself from the dominant posturing.

It, in turn, triggered a predatory urge that crawled its way inquisitively up his spine. He needed to strategize if he was going to get anywhere. Not gonna catch this fly with honey. That shit got Ellis, at first - hell, got Carmine. Rhiannon's more of a 'quickie-in-a-bar-alley' type. Besides, I'm not looking to burn her, not if I'm gonna be stuck with her and her sister. Just... clear my head. Make a point.

"Too bad." she sighed out. Rhiannon crossed the hall, using the pommel of her bat to rap on the linen closet built into the wall. She tapped out an idle pattern, a tiny fragment of a tune. "He'd be a ride, I bet. Hot, for Euro jailbait. I'd'a fucked around with him, arm or no arm."

Nothing burst out from the closet, nor stirred further in the house at the sound. She continued forward, halting at the third and final door in the rightmost branch of the hall. She glanced over the closed face of the door, turning an arched brow at Nick.

He took the hint, pressing forward to join her. As he approached, the blonde snapped her hand into a point toward the sealed room. "Your turn, cowboy."

Nick resisted the urge to roll his eyes, turning toward the remaining door. "I look like a cowboy to you? I'm from fuckin' New York. Leave it to me to go to the Deep South just before the apocalypse." He reached out to grip the knob, twisting and pushing in one smooth motion.

It swung open, gently, uncovering the simple porcelain tiling of a bathroom. The room was dingy, grime caked into the edges and corners of the room, and the plastic shower curtains hiding the tub were blossomed all over with greying water stains - or mildew, perhaps. An open-faced set of linen shelves did not provide any room for infected to hide.

He scanned the room before turning his head to look back at the biker.

"Nada." When she thrust her shoulders up in a shrug and wheeled around to start retracing their steps, Nick was much quicker to follow. He settled into a smooth tone, only the slightest snideness to it. "Chris, huh? I thought you had your eyes on Coach."
Rhiannon let out a quiet snicker of laughter, shrugging her shoulders up. "I keep my eyes open, slick." she returned, mostly a non-answer. "Younger dudes are always desperate to please. Shit, I'd let Ellis take a swing if I didn't think he'd get all mushy about it. Pretty sure he's packing a big ol' -"

All Nick's good humour faded in an instant. He felt his hackles raise, and it was a strenuous effort to force himself to settle. The moment he'd hushed the anger down to a low hum, he was struck by disbelief. He couldn't shake that jealous edge, the primal irritation that rose at the idea of Ellis touching - or being touched by - anyone else.

Some hypothetical future partner he'd never have to meet was one thing. Listening to Rhiannon talk about him was an entirely different matter.

I'm trying to fuck her. Pot, kettle. Jesus, what's wrong with me?

"And what about me?" he interrupted, falling back on a deep-seated instinct, one that drove his lips to curve in a calm smirk. It was the simple sort of expression he could maintain fairly well, despite whatever was happening in his head. "If we're ranking packages."

The blonde didn't pause, didn't even hesitate, in a way that told him she'd been waiting for the question. Her gait widened, swaggering, betraying a languidly self-satisfied energy. "I dated a jackass like you for a few weeks. It was mostly fine, but fuck, was he needy. And he did not know how to make a chick orgasm." Her arms thrust up, exaggerating her disbelief. "Gimme a little help, for shit's sake. City boys are the worst."

Nick hummed, tilting his head. "Can't say I've had any complaints."

She bolted out a laugh, pleasure tilting into a mocking tone. "They all fuckin' say that." she drawled out, continuing down the hall until she came to the two remaining doors.

The two rooms were directly parallel to each other, and both cracked open an inch or so, light dimly filling the interior. She stopped between two doors on either side, and her head jerked toward the one at the right as she turned to face the left.

With a wary shift on his heels, Nick hefted the stun baton dangling off his wrist, getting a grip on the handle. "Give me a chance, doll." he murmured, pushing his voice into a lower tone, letting it catch in his throat just slightly. He followed after her at a calm pace, moving to step behind her in the hallway. "You'd be surprised."

As he came close, she flickered an arched brow at him and abruptly kicked out toward the door. Her bootheel struck the left door knee-height, just at the center. It was already half-open, so the blow sent it swinging free on its hinges. She must've held back at least a little, because it just thudded unenthusiastically into the wall rather than slamming into it.

Rhiannon lifted her bat up, holding it like a shotgun, her left hand cupped around an imaginary trigger and her right hand cradling the tip like a forend. Her posture dropped, her attention roving as she crept forward, practically military. "Put your mouth where your money is, slick." she responded, voice a little rasped, thick and coy in a way that made his head perk up.

He was back on his game. It was just a matter of seeing if she'd take the bait.

Nick watched her shift into the room, scanning her surroundings, and turned away to push his way into the opposite room, unable to bite back the smallest smirk. He found himself in a large - relatively, compared to the other rooms in the house - bedroom. It was flanked by an ensuite bathroom on the right wall, and after a cursory glance over the room, he headed in that direction.
Part of him knew the house was clear. He'd needed, more than anything, an excuse to keep his body moving. Even getting the chance to get Rhiannon alone was secondary, really. He certainly hadn't expected it to work so well.

The bathroom was cleaner than the previous one, though not by much. The same porcelain tile covered every inch of it, the gaps between them filled with an off-grey that might've been mortar and might've been grime. Light poured in dully from a foggy-glassed window high above the sink counter, and he stepped up to the edge of the sink, setting the stun baton down next to it.

He glanced momentarily over the surface, taking stock of the used toothbrushes jutting up from a slim cup near the faucet and the array of makeup lined up inside of a tiny set of plastic shelving to the left of the sink. There was also a near-full bottle of mouthwash, and he couldn't resist snatching it up, cracking the top off with a twist of his wrist.

Sipping a small mouthful of the bright blue liquid, Nick swished it idly, looking around the bathroom as he felt the hot, burning sensation begin over the inside of his mouth. The alcohol stung, the pain rising to a sharp heat prickling at his cheeks and the roof of his mouth, but it was also strangely indulgent.

He threw his head back to gargle it, the burn spreading into his throat and reaching an almost unbearable pitch over his tongue. He ducked low, spitting into the sink, taking a moment to suck against his teeth and spit again.

A flush of satisfaction fluttered up his body, standing there, huffing in air just to feel the cold sensation as the air seemed to freeze against his alcohol-singed mouth. He wasn't sure when the last time was that he'd had half-decent breath, and if he was going to make any traction with the women in the house...

It's gonna break the kid. he thought, and suddenly, he looked up to survey himself in the mirror. His gaze matched itself, tracking to notice the heavy lines of burst vessels in the whites of his eyes, the bruising underneath them. He examined the scratches and scuffs over his face, the blood smudged in a few places from his hands. Was he rugged and handsome, or exhausted and broken?

Are you really up to watching him realize you're not worth it?

A breath left him, sharply, and before he could think on it, his hands were in motion. He lifted his left hand and set his right hand to undoing the button on his cuff, swapping hands once he'd loosened it. He then reached to the line of button closures running up his dress shirt's midline, starting from the very top and undoing them one at a time.

As the last one popped free, he shifted his shoulders to shrug out of it, pulling it off his arms with some care. Holding it in one hand, Nick palmed the switch on the back of the faucet, a soft grating noise sounding out as the stopper dropped into the drain, sealing it.

He twisted the faucet on, turning it toward the small blue dot that indicated cold water. Water gushed from the tap, striking the bottom of the basin and quickly gathering around the sealed drain, and he didn't waste any time before dropping his shirt into the bowl. He set to gently squeezing at the fabric, letting the cold water soak through it.

The gambler closed his eyes as he kneaded the shirt under the cold water, turning his neck in a half-circle to push against the tension in his shoulder muscles.

"All clear of zombie shifucks." Rhiannon called out, voice growing less muffled as she entered the bedroom behind him. "Nothin' to be afraid of."
Nick didn't turn when he heard footsteps, nor acknowledge them when they stopped near the bathroom doorway - and then started again. It would've been easy to open his eyes and watch her in the mirror, but there was a game to be played, and that was cheating. He merely tilted his head, tracking her as her footfalls turned staccato on the bathroom tile.

She stepped behind him, pausing there, and he could feel her gaze on his bare back. He let his shoulders roll in their sockets, a completely non-subtle display, and the blonde gave a ponderous hum as she moved to halt at his flank. She was near enough that he could feel the vague buzz of her presence in the air between them. His body tensed as fingertips alighted against his back, pressing into the healed wound near the edge of his shoulderblade, twin to the mark below his clavicle.

Her touch examined it, curiously, but she did not ask.

"You know, I was fuckin' scared of you for a while there," she murmured in a low admittance, drawing her fingers into a firm pressure against the scarring injury. "And not in the hot way... mostly. But we were both ready to fuck each other over, so maybe we're even. Call us square."

It didn't hurt, precisely, but there was a strange tingling through the flesh as it protested the manipulation. He held his composure against it, curling his tongue against the backs of his teeth and opening his eyes to glance up at her reflection. There was a pleased grin on her face, hazel eyes low-lidded.

Nick shifted onto his heels, releasing his grip on his shirt and turning around. Her hand retracted from his shoulder as he faced her, though she didn't actually step back, and their bodies remained very close. He moved smoothly, letting himself rest back onto the edge of the counter and settling his wet palms against it to balance his weight. He tilted his head, allowing a slim smile to cross his lips.

"Nothin' to be afraid of, doll." he echoed, softening his voice

Her eyes lit up, and he found his breath smoothing out, leveling, as she leaned forward. The back of her hand grazed against his thigh, her wrist quickly turning to bring her palm flat against the denim, rubbing down and into the inner curve of his leg. He resisted his body's natural inclination to lean into it, to arch his hips and encourage her towards better territory.

Better to wait, let her determine where she intended things to go; if he had any sense of her, she meant to tease him, try and draw him into showing his hand before leaving him high and dry. I know a girl who gets off on blue-balls when I see one. It was smarter, then, to surrender a little power to her and simply wait... even if the warmth of a hand so very close to his crotch made his whole body want to squirm.

His enjoyment of the contact made him sluggish to react when her hand suddenly jolted down a few inches. He had no time, then, to do much more than tense as he felt his Magnum holster tug taut where it was strapped to his thigh.

Animal instinct darted his hands out to defend himself, but he'd barely caught a grip on her jacket-front before the cold nose of the handgun pressed under his chin. The muzzle of his own pistol dug under his jaw, forcing his face to turn upwards, and he sucked in a sharp breath as the abruptly intense feeling of regret coursed through him.

... Fuck.

"Come on, tiger." she murmured, leaning forward, her eyes squarely on his mouth where it had pursed into a quirked scowl. He froze, body tightining, lengthening his spine as she pressed the Magnum tighter into his throat. "You think I'm a slut? Reckon I'm easy? Think you can call and I'll drop to my knees, suck your dick? Maybe bend over this counter for you?"

Nick swallowed, despite the way her knuckles were jammed into his Adam's apple. He was sure it came off nervous, though he didn't feel more than base anxiety at the nearness of a loaded gun. He knew he was under no actual danger from her. It was just a power-play, a hollow threat. He gritted his teeth, eyes squinting. "You could've said 'no thanks.' I can take a hint, d-"

The woman's hand shifted, and he heard the distinct click of the safety.

His heart rate spiked, much despite himself, and he knew his expression went cold. He squinted one eye shut, watching her and the catty smile spread across her lips with the other. "You call me 'doll' one more time, something's happening to your dick. Won't be what you want."

When he was patiently quiet in answer, she curled her tongue against her cracked canine, sighing out a small breath. Some of the pleasure drained out of her expression. Rhiannon looked at him, instead, with the smallest of frowns.

"Do me a solid here, bud. You keep your cock in your pants with me, and I won't put my fist up your ass. And I don't want to, cupcake, because I actually sorta like you... fuckin' funny as that seems." She seemed genuinely put-out, strangely insecure in the moment, and she searched his expression. "So cool it, cuntstick."

Nick inhaled through his nose, very gently pushing his chin down to contest the way the Magnum was driven up under his jawbone. She let him bring his face to be level with hers, their gazes matching, and he cut the smallest smirk back at her.

"I'm touched." he responded in a murmur. "Can you put the deadly weapon down?"

She grinned, and as abruptly as it had been placed, the pressure eased off his throat. Setting the Magnum down on the bathroom counter just beside him, Rhiannon reached up and patted his cheek, turning on her heel and striding out of the bathroom. "I'm gonna grab some blankets and shit." she announced, practically cheery, like nothing at all had happened. "I'll give you some privacy to deal with that package of yours."

Unable to help it, Nick slumped back into the bathroom counter, reaching a hand up to squeeze it against his throat. A sharp ache was forming where the gun had jammed into the muscle, though the majority of his pain was in his ego. Win some, lose some. Just wish I'd stop fucking losing.

He sighed, turning back to face the mirror, grimacing at himself. He shouldn't have been completely surprised; she was a sadist with a grudge. The woman who'd pulled a trigger on him was still in there, however much she'd been humbled, whatever growth she'd gone through. As much as she'd changed since their very first meeting, nobody ever changed for good. Nobody ever changed entirely. Nick knew that better than most.

Well, at least we're friends, apparently.

He couldn't stop himself from laughing. Whether it was at her or himself, or a symptom of the adrenaline she'd surged in him, or a symptom of the entire awful, hopeless day, he wasn't quite sure.

Nick just buried his face against his still-wet palm and laughed.
Ellis paused to survey their work, hands at his hips, a vague frown on his lips. They'd removed the corpse in the kitchen, dragging it just outside into the yard. With that mess mostly cleaned up, he and Lena had focused on shoring up their temporary safehouse. There was a bookshelf against the wall, and they dragged it to block the front door, with Christophe worrying around them as more than one book toppled out and onto the floor.

The next best furniture nearby was a heavy flat-screen TV on a hip-height stand, and they'd pulled the TV off and set it on the ground. Freeing the stand to be moved took tearing out a thick array of cords hooked up to a cablebox. The stand had been pushed against the bookcase, adding its sizeable bulk to the effort.

Their combined weight would suffice to keep anything from breaking in through the door, but the living room was faced by a set of windows, and they were as much of a weakness - and there were no curtains to cover them up with.

"Guess we could get some sheets or somethin', hang 'em up." he mumbled, tilting his head left and right as if to get a better view of the far wall. "Wish we could board the windows up or somethin', but even if we had boards, hammerin' away is gonna draw zombies over here."

Christophe gestured up at the windows, flapping his hand in a vague wave. "It will be good, to cover them. And we keep watch, anyway, ¿sí?"

Ellis nodded hesitantly, drawing his lower lip between his teeth and chewing idly. "Yeah." he mumbled, muffled, gaze losing its focus for a moment. He blinked himself back into awareness shortly, however, looking over his shoulder to the couch. Coach was still asleep, and Rhiannon had returned from the second floor to settle on the floor just in front of the sofa.

Her hands fidgeted with the bottom edge of the cami, the fabric ridden up her midsection as she slumped with her legs splayed to either side, and her gaze was distant. Her head was slumped back, and her positioning had the crown of her head settled atop his forearm where it lay against his side.

The biker had quietly returned with a pillow and a blanket, with no sign of Nick. She'd not said a word as she covered Coach over and pushed the pillow under his head, replacing the stiff decorative pillow they'd placed there before. She'd been gentle in a way that made Ellis smile a little, soothed some of his anxiety.

He liked her. He had no reason not to trust her, let alone not trust Lena. He was being paranoid and jealous and it didn't sit well with him - he wanted to be a better person than that. It certainly wasn't Rhiannon's fault for what happened, when she didn't know anything about the situation.

Man, love brings out some ugly stuff, sometimes. Thought it was supposed tuh be all... fuzzy shit'n'bubbles.

"I will go find some sheets, tío." Christophe sighed out, his hand suddenly tapping against Ellis' shoulder in a soft pat. The Spaniard seemed aware of Ellis' distraction, judging by the faint frustration in his voice, but didn't mention it outright. "Maybe you find something to hang it with? Las cinta adhesiva, ¿entendido?"

Ellis hummed affirmation without fully paying attention, and lowered his chin to watch Chris walk across the room. He was tempted to ask the man to go find Nick - but a flare of frustration in his chest negated that idea. He merely turned, looking instead to the cat carrier pressed against the wall.

They hadn't let Maggie out yet.

"Is Nick gonna come back down?" he uttered, and it came out gritted despite his best attempts to smooth it. He looked toward Rhiannon, immediately, but she didn't even seem to be listening. Her eyes remained unfocused, and she gave no response. "If I let Mags out, she's gonna bolt. Dunno if he wants to be around."

Rochelle and Lena were in the kitchen, digging through the fridge to sort through what food was there and what would be suitable, and Rochelle's head peeped up over the counter she was crouched behind. Her expression drew into a sour one, eyes rolling upwards as she responded.

"Honey, you know him. Don't hold your breath. If he can quarantine himself off for a while, he will... and honestly, I think we're staying the night, so it's not fair to keep her closed up in there." She lifted her arm, gesturing toward the staircase. "Just go ahead and let her out at the stairs... she'll go find him, probably."

The Georgian grimaced, slightly, but nodded. "Alright." he murmured, feeling his reluctance drag at his voice, struggling against the urge to sulk. He forced himself to smile, instead, broadening his tone into a teasing chide. "If she takes muh hand off, it'll be your fault."

"No, it'll be Nick's fault." Rochelle corrected, disappearing back below the counter as she refocused on the task at hand. "Like usual." Lena choked down a laugh, grinning where she stood next to the half-open fridge, a few tupperware containers cradled in her left arm.

Ellis chuckled low in his throat, though it faltered. His nose crinkled, and he resigned himself to padding over to the carrier. He kneeled down, grabbing the handles stitched into the top, feeling it shift unsteadily as he lifted it up off the ground and Maggie moved around inside. She didn't hiss outright, which he took as a good sign.

"C'mon, girl. You can't sit down here all day. Gotta get you out of this box." he chirped down at her, walking through the living room and into the dining room, striding toward the bottom of the steps. As he approached the bottom landing, Ellis dropped down to a squat, setting the carrier down on the carpeted step. "Maybe you can take a piece outta Nick fer once."

Orange eyes peeped out at him from the front mesh, lit above the gleam of teeth from her open mouth. That, on the other hand, did not bode well.

He'd just grabbed ahold of the top zipper, prepared to draw it open and turn the carrier to direct her up the stairs, when a shadow loomed down over the staircase. It made him startle with that instinctive lurch to self-defense, hands tensing at his sides, body ready to run or run for the nearest weapon.

Nick's head cocked, shadow shifting to match.

"Why are you conspiring with my cat?"

He'd gotten undressed, it seemed, and there was a bundle of wet clothes carried stiffly in his right arm. He stood, shirtless, at the top of the staircase, and his lower half was bundled up in a pair of grey sweats that were more than one size too big for him. The cinch in its waistband was drawn tight, though not tight enough that it kept them from slipping low on his hips, hugging the curves of his pelvis.
Sex had never driven Ellis in his pre-apocalypse existence, not that he'd been generally disinterested in it. He'd had sex with two of his previous girlfriends, though the other one had limited their relationship to fondling and the occasional tug or blowjob in his truck that he'd found embarrassing, but pleasurable.

He'd masturbated, of course. Sometimes it had been in response to flashes of nameless want, sometimes to ease an inconvenient erection in the morning. Sometimes he'd simply done it out of boredom, with nothing better to do. He'd never fantasized about someone before. He'd never craved their hands on his skin and under his clothes and on the most sensitive parts of his body - not really, not the way he did about Nick.

He'd never sincerely considered dropping to his knees and burying his face into someone's lap until now.

It was mortifying, and the only reason he didn't redden and stammer his way through a response was because the next thing that flooded him - beyond lust and humiliation - was fury.

Ellis set his knuckles against the carpet, pushing himself up to his feet and thrusting his arms into a cross. He shifted his weight, lifting his shoulders in a defiant posture and jutting his chin forward. "I dunno, Nick. Take'uh damn guess." he spat back, infusing as much irritation into his voice as he could.

Standing at the top of the stairway, Nick couldn't help but freeze. Instantly, his mind leaped to the obvious conclusion: either Rhiannon had come downstairs and shared their interaction, or Ellis had overhead something. Had part of their conversation occurred too near the stairs? Too loudly?

But Nick wanted him to find out. Didn't he? Wasn't that the point of it? And wasn't it optimal, really, for Ellis to find out without Nick even having to be in the room for it? Having the band-aid ripped off for him would've been much preferable.

What did it matter if he'd not actually sealed the deal?

"I -" he started, with very little idea how to continue. Fortunately, Ellis didn't let him even try.

The Georgian thrust his head into a half-turn, chuffing out air with a scoffing edge. "I don't wanna talk tuh you right now, Nick." he bit out, suddenly bending over to unzip the front of the carrier. Nick jolted out of the way as a Maggie-sized projectile of fur and claws rocketed up the stairs, narrowly missing his foot. She disappeared down the hallway, and Chris' delayed shout said she likely just as narrowly missed him.

"Maldición, ¡¿qué carajo fue eso?! ¡Aléjate de mí, demonia!"

By the time Nick recovered his balance and looked back down the stairs, Ellis was gone. There wasn't much to do but work his jaw, bewildered, because calling after him felt like the wrong thing to do.

Whatever his lips were trying to form deflated into a strangled sigh, and Nick pulled his wet bundle of clothing up against his chest, picking his way down the stairs on socked feet. He reached the bottom cautiously, leaning out to look out into the main first floor area, driven to practically tiptoe, as if he were under threat.

Ellis had returned to the front of the house, hands sunk into the pockets of his jacket and attention squarely on the windows pointing out into the yard. His shoulders were high, posture defensive, and he didn't look back.
In the kitchen, Rochelle and Lena were sorting through the contents of the fridge, though Rochelle was turned at the waist to stare directly at him. Her brows were up, expression irritated, and that gave him some amount of pause. If his failed advances had been publicized, he would've expected something slightly more enthusiastic than a glare.

If that wasn't it - then what was?

"Power's on, so I'm gonna try the laundry room." he announced, forcing himself to stride forward, passing the dining set just outside the stairs to the second floor. Rhiannon's head snapped suddenly into view, and she grinned at him, looking unreasonably thrilled.

She lifted her right hand and curled her fingers, except for her index and thumb, forming it into the shape of a gun. Her pretend weapon snapped up as she mimed firing a shot in his direction. He spared the smallest flinch of a brow at her, but did not otherwise acknowledge her nor her mockery. She hadn't betrayed his plans to leave, so maybe she'd kept her silence on this, too.

"I've got a gallon of Tons Of Fun soaked through my brand new fucking clothes, and hand-washing them wasn't doing shit." he explained, undeterred when no one responded. "Anyone looking to do the same - I'm not waiting."

Nick shifted to curve around the corner and into the hallway that extended past the kitchen. The left door in that hallway was another bedroom, but the right door was a small laundry room. He aimed himself in that direction, but didn't miss how Rochelle passed a mutter to Lena and, upon receiving a nod, followed after him.

Alright, Nick. Play it cool. He inhaled, calmly, continuing down the hall at an even pace. He didn't accelerate, didn't slow down, and didn't give off any signs that he even noticed her trailing him. Don't get yourself in the shit for more than necessary.

He turned into the laundry room, shouldering the door open, and used his elbow to nudge the lightswitch just a few inches to the right of the threshold. The glow that blinked on and filled the space was brighter than the rest of the house, a sanitized kind of white, and the tiny space was mostly filled with a stacked washing machine and dryer.

Rather than play dumb and begin loading his clothes, Nick set them down on the small fold-up table squished between the appliances and the wall, and then turned to face the door. He crossed his arms, leaning his bare shoulder back against the dryer, head cocking to one side.

Apparently, neither of them could surprise the other. When Rochelle entered to find him looking for her, she didn't even blink.

She crossed her arms to match him, sliding into the room and settling against the wall opposite him. There was a moment of silence as they squared off, her jaw clenching as she chewed her back teeth together, Nick's brows slowly raising in question. He had no intention of being the one to break it.

That was easy to manage, when Rochelle had very little patience.

"Nick, I really want to crawl inside that big, stupid head of yours, and see how you work." She sounded tired, more than anything, and she let her eyes close as she dropped her chin almost to her chest. "I'm sure there's a manual somewhere, but sweet baby Jesus, it is beyond me. And every time I think we're getting somewhere, it's back to square one."

He shifted, adjusting his weight, feeling a rising discomfort. Her judgement meant something to him, as much as he'd prefer that it didn't. In the same breath, he felt some frustration; his ego was already bruised and crippled.

He wasn't sure he could take much more.

"So cut me some slack here, Nick. Do me the favour of explaining yourself, okay? Just this once, I seriously want to understand what's going on in your brain." Her hands escaped their cross, flattening in the air. "Why? Why now, and why like that? What did you get out of that?"

Nick's brows flinched together, and he couldn't help but cock his head. Her eyes were still closed, and he took advantage of the fact, examining her face as in-depthly as he could, trying to glean something from her expression. Disappointment flickered at the corners of her mouth, but it was faint, wry.

It just didn't add up. If she knew what he'd tried, she'd have been livid.

"You know, I heard it from the bathroom, but I almost didn't think twice. Not until I came back outside and saw his face, looking like you kicked him in the teeth. 'Fireball'? Seriously?" Her head dropped, shaking, and she gave a half-laugh. "He's been so ballsy, lately, I thought you couldn't put him down, but there you go... surprising me."

His expression flattened with a dull shock, and he straightened his body out. He had to think about it, had to process, before his brain started to actually function at full-steam.

He'd called Rhiannon one of Ellis' nicknames.

In the interim, taking his silence as a refusal to engage, Rochelle's nostrils flared with frustration, and she abruptly opened her eyes. Whatever she was about to say died on her lips, as her gaze landed on Nick's face.

She examined his features, catching him in that moment of thought, and realization lit in her own. Wary, hesitant, she took a half-step forward. "You... look confused."

Nick curled his tongue against his teeth, sucking in air sharply. He barely remembered it, in fact, even after being prompted - and he certainly hadn't made any concrete decision to do it. There was a fog, condensed in the constraints of his skull and blurring at his thoughts, a haze. He'd have called it exhaustion, but it was more visceral than that.

He wanted to protest and affirm his ignorance - but in the same instant, he knew the hypocrisy of it. He could reject the blame and explain that it had been accidental, but what was the point? His goal had been to leverage jealousy to push the Georgian away from him, and if he'd succeeded, why argue?

He couldn't stop thinking about Ellis. It had, apparently, infected more than just his internal dialogue. If he'd just... left it alone, left me alone, we wouldn't be here. He's so fucking stubborn, so sure he's right, when he doesn't know shit. He forced the issue.

*I'm just responding."

"Only person who's confused here is Ellis." he returned, finding a languid tone of voice, much better than the rigid frustration that he felt in his chest. "He can stop acting like my wife any day now."

If she'd cued into his initial misunderstanding, that blew her cognizance of it clear out of sight. Her mouth popped open, releasing a puff of offense, her arms snapping right back into their cross over her chest. "That's low, Nick, seriously. Why can't you be an adult about this?"

His eyes rolled upwards, and she didn't miss it. Rochelle's body language broadened, her chest filling, driven by a prideful sort of anger at the same time that her tone of voice was almost sympathetic. "You know what, suit? I'm so tired of this bullshit. I'm done dancing around you. We're talking about this, whether you like it or not."

Nick should've argued with her. He should've reminded her of their deal, of their agreed-upon truce... but he didn't, and he couldn't have begun to explain why. Maybe he wanted the conversation. Maybe he'd been ready for the conversation for a while.

She thrust her hands into a frustrated gesture, stating, "If you don't want to be involved with him, then just tell him that."

Nick broke into a laugh, harsh, before he could swallow it. He leaned forward to close the distance between them, just a bit, brows going up in disbelief. "The fuck do you think this whole thing has been about? The fuck do you think I've been doing?"

"Being an asshole." she returned, immediately, arching a brow right back at him. "Pretending you don't care about him, just like you pretend you hate Coach, right until he needs you. Like you pretend you don't have any feelings for him until he's in danger, and then you can't stop yourself from running after him. Either of them."

He tried to scoff, throwing his gaze to one side, but it came out in a choke of air that he knew wasn't convincing. She continued unabated, her shoulders shrugging, expression as tired as it was irritated.

"Just be honest with him, either way. That'll go over miles better than sneaking in little digs, making him feel like you're chasing someone else." Suddenly, she was moving, and he startled as her index finger jabbed into his bare chest. "It's Carmine all over again, and you know it. You used her to make him angry because you'd rather be a dick than have an honest conversation for once in your life. Now you're trying to pull the same shit with Rhee."

Nick's body stiffened, but he couldn't muster that much righteous offense. She wasn't wrong, by any measure.

"Whatever the answer is, the guy needs closure. Otherwise you're just going to keep hurting him, and I know you. I know you, Nick, even if you make me doubt it sometimes." Her posture softened, hand dropping away from his chest, eyes averting. "That really isn't what you want. That isn't what you've been trying to do. But... this, right now... leaving him with questions... that's what you're doing. Hurting him."

A dull pain settled in his chest. He knew she was right, but that made it no less difficult to listen to.

"I've.... I don't know what the fuck you want from me. I've tried. I'm trying." Nick's jaw flexed as he parted his lips enough to lick at the corner of his mouth, and he forced an edge into his voice, sarcastic. "If I didn't know better, I'd think you were rooting for me to chase him off."

Rochelle's whole body rocked back, throwing her arms up in a bewildered gesture. "I'm trying not to have an opinion, Nick, even though you deserve me whooping your ass. I just want what's best for you - both of you. If you love him but you aren't ready, tell him that. If you don't love him but you care enough to want him to be happy, tell him that. If you don't know what you feel and you're scared... Jesus, tell him that. Tell me that."
He didn't look at her, and when he didn't respond, she let her hands settle gently on his crossed forearms. The touch made him flinch, leaning back into the stacked washer behind his shoulder. Her voice, too, gentled. "This isn't rocket science, Nick. I know you hate being vulnerable, but we're in this together. I'm here for you. And you can't lie to me - the one thing I know for sure is you care about him."

Nick inhaled, closing his eyes tightly. "That doesn't mean that -"

"God, I know. You don't think I don't know?" The woman reached up, knuckling against his chin in a mock-strike, just firmly enough to startle his head into leaning back. "Your struggle is not unique, sweetheart. Coach and I both had people who we cared about, but it wasn't enough. The difference is you've still got a chance to do something about it, if you want."

He did not want to respond, precisely. It was not a whim, a choice, to do so. It simply happened, with or without the active participation of his brain. "You don't know what I've done to the people I cared about."

She frowned at him - and there was a genuine flicker of uncertainty in her eyes. She did not know what he meant by it, and her attention scattered for a moment as the phrase threw her off-balance. Only slowly did she recover, her hand sliding to cup against his cheek. He stiffened into the touch, but didn't shake it off.

"I don't need to. This could be a clean slate, if you wanted it, Nick. The only thing that matters is what you do now, to the people you care about right now."

He wanted to laugh at the idea. No such thing as a clean slate, doll. The mess always goes somewhere.

"We almost lost Ellis in the mall. And we just almost lost Coach." He shifted his gaze away, looking toward the wall, feeling her hand tighten against his cheek and then fall to her side. "How would you have felt if Ellis died thinking you hated him? If Coach died thinking you two weren't friends?"

Nick felt his expression go slack. He hadn't thought about it, not really. He'd continued off the primal assumption that his team would survive, with or without him - better without him, even... but that wasn't the whole truth. He should have known that. He should have thought it through.

He was supposed to be the cold and calculated one.

Losing the sisters was inevitable; their goals did not align, after all. But if he left, the team would be down to three fully-abled survivors... and one with a missing arm. One less teammate took a significant chunk of their power, not to mention the turmoil he'd leave in his wake. They'd fight and protest and blame each other, blame the sisters.

As much as he wanted to think the team would be happier in his absence, he knew that they'd be shaken by it. Ellis, in particular, would be shaken by it.

Unless he gives up, first.

He clung to the thought, and it felt like a lifeline.

It was not something he could escape, not something he could run away from. He'd made his bed, and he'd lie in it, one way or another. The best thing he could do for any of them was to put the issue to rest, and the simple act of leaving wouldn't be enough, not if he left a mess in his wake.
Rochelle's eyes softened, averting, her posture deflating just slightly. "Sometimes things don't work out. You wish they would, but... sometimes it just... isn't what you thought it would be." Her jaw firmed, and she looked back at him. "But you care about him, Nick, and you two could still have a relationship. You can grow from this. You can both grow from this."

Nick's chin lowered, and all he said was, quietly, "Yeah. Closure."

She looked at him with some consideration, and then quiet apprehension, and he couldn't shake the feeling she sensed that he'd wandered onto a different train of thought. The woman seemed immediately suspicious of him.

Her mouth opened, but Ellis' voice shouted from the front of the house, and she snapped into a half-turn before he'd even fully formed the outburst. "Ro'! He's wakin' up!"

Rochelle's eyes darted to the hallway outside before flicking back to Nick's face, and she gave a small sigh under her breath. Her hand raised, finger extended toward his face. "This conversation is not over.” she stated.

Nick shrugged up his shoulder, turning away from her in a smooth motion. "Sure thing, doll." He reached to grab his clothes, still wet and cold against his fingertips, and pulled the washer door open to toss them in. "I'll be here."

Her frustrated little noise, stifled behind a bitten lip, wasn't enough to make her stay. She bolted, and the rise of voices in the living room followed shortly thereafter. They didn't sound alarmed and nobody called his name, so he took his time.

They had it handled, and the last thing he wanted was to reignite the panic he'd felt earlier.

He needed to center himself. He needed to get his head on straight, and get some distance from the words ringing in his ears, clouded by Rochelle's voice. He'd whiffed once, fumbled his way into a mildly humiliating rejection from one sister, and his chances were extremely limited.

Down to, precisely, one.

This is old hat for you. She's a fucking doe-eyed broad from Texas. This is easy street. Get your shit together, Nicolas, and take care of business.

The confidence that bubbled up felt hollow, but it was all he had.
Chapter 275

When Coach's awareness drifted back to him, it came with a dull soreness. He, at first, didn't process much but the protest of his body, his joints complaining like he'd not moved in days. The pain only slowly focused into a particular point, arching up the muscles in his neck, from his clavicle to his jawline.

He figured, distantly, that he wasn't dead - if he were in Heaven, he imagined there'd be less pain.

He released a faint groan, and three or four hands all took separate positions on his frame, gripping his elbow and his knee and against his cheek. It was a disorienting sensation with no sight to put forms to the touches, though he quickly put the feeling to a thought: his family was gathered around him.

He was safe.

Fear might've swept in as his memory tumbled back to him, but he was comforted by the presence of his team. He let go, for just a moment, surrendering to the uncertainty that roiled in his chest. He allowed himself to lay there, eyes closed, and not listen to the voices around him. Someone shouted, and footsteps approached, and he focused on dragging in a steady breath.

That, too, hurt. He remembered most of the incident. He remembered the Hunter taking him to the ground, asphalt unforgiving against his back. He remembered the hot, searing pain, and the hotter gush of blood down his neck. He remembered Nick's hands encircled around his neck, squeezing until his brain went foggy.

He didn't remember much beyond that, though there was something vaguely soft underneath him, so they must've moved him. He wasn't sure how long he'd been out, though he knew it had been more than just minutes. Long enough, he was sure, to worry them.

He remembered enough to know he was lucky to be alive. They did good. Coach exhaled, then, letting his attention wander to the voices and motion around him. They came into sharp focus as he recognized one in particular.

"Papa bear? You with us, sweetheart?"

His eyes opened, just a flicker of his eyelids, and he found Rochelle's face hovering in his periphery. He tried to turn his head to look at her more clearly, but the hand on his cheek tightened its grip, and her head shook.

"No, no. Stay still, Coach." She was trying for a light tone, but he could immediately recognize the thin veneer over her anxiety. The younger woman was worried, and maybe a little desperate. "We barely got the bleeding stopped, so don't go messing it up now, okay?"

Coach managed a grunt, gaze slipping up toward the ceiling. He forced his right arm to move, tenderly, reaching out in her direction. Though he wasn't initially sure he was aiming it right, she grabbed his wrist and guided it lower, pushing her cheek into his palm. He cradled the side of her face, tightening his fingers against her jaw to express what he couldn't with words.

I'm a'ight, babygirl. Don't you worry. Ain't goin' nowhere.

He heard her breath hitch, and there was a smile in her voice when she murmured, "We weren't giving you enough attention, huh? Had to go do something drastic?"
As much as he wanted to chuckle at her, he didn't. Instead, he lifted his other hand and let his half-numb fingers gesture toward his throat, inquiringly. He was tempted to talk, but the tight pressure of bandages against his neck made him wary of stressing them, unsure of how delicate it all was.

Lena suddenly slid into view, leaning over him, her eyes attentive on his features. "Hey there, bud. You should stay down for now, yeah? We got you stable, but if you move around too much it might start again." She reached down, settling her hand against his sternum, lightly inquisitive. "Are you breathin' fine?"

Coach squinted, letting his breath carefully pass into and out of his chest, keeping it slow and smooth. It took effort, but it felt more like the strain that came with sore muscles than anything directly related to the wound on his neck. He could breathe, at least, and he was confident he could talk if he tried.

Rather than put it to the test, he simply gave a close-lipped, hummed affirmative.

"That's good." Lena smiled at him, gently, jerking her chin to gesture around them. "We pulled you into a house nearby. Thinking we'll spend the night, at least, to let you rest. So you just close your eyes and let us know if you need anything."

He tried to communicate a dubious humour through the arch of his brow. Gettin' the Hunter off my ass was a good start. When she gave him a cocked and uncomprehending smile, he let his eyes shut, resting his head fully back down against the pillow underneath it. He let his thumb stroke Rochelle's cheekbone, then dropped his arm.

She retracted her hands, tucking them against her lap, her lips curling into a tucked frown. Her gaze went from Coach to Lena, examining the woman, her body shifting with some discomfort. "We should get some food started, right? At least get him something to drink. If he's gonna recover from the bloodloss, I mean..."

The brunette nodded, taking her pinky and pushing her hair behind her ear in a smooth swipe. "Yeah. How 'bout you go see to that, and I'll clean his neck up a little?" Without looking, Lena thumbed toward the backpack, and Rhiannon pushed up from her squat beside the couch to walk over and retrieve it. "Few things in there looked good."

Rochelle didn't miss Ellis' body perking up a little, and she bit back a laugh. Pushing her palms against her knees, she straightened, turning to face him. "Not kidding - there were some chicken nuggets in there, and I think we can salvage some past the freezerburn."

She hadn't seen the mechanic's eyes get that big in a long time.

He gawped at her, and before she could say another word, he was turning and jogging into the kitchen, babbling. "Hoh, man! That sounds amazin' right now. I'd kill fer some barbeque sauce or somethin' - or mustard. I know folks use honey mustard, most times, but I was always partial tuh regular ol' mustard. Did it by accident, once, 'n'it just felt right, y'know?"

She couldn't help but smile, following after him, sparing a glance toward Christophe. She ticked her head to encourage him to join her, and he did so without hesitation, trailing in her wake like it was too powerful a riptide to resist. "How do you use mustard 'by accident'?"

"Well, see -" he started to respond, but quickly halted, shrugging his shoulders. "I ain't totally sure. Keith'n'I were kinda drunk."

"¿Qué busca como cuando estás borracho?" Christophe mused aloud, humming just a soft breath before he repeated it at a more audible volume. "What are you like, drunk? I just sleep. It is no fun, at parties, you know."

Rochelle snorted, darting a look over her shoulder at the foreigner with a scrunch of her brows. "Sleepy? What kind of college student are you?" She let her lips curve, her voice dipping into a teasing tone of voice as she continued. "I get randy as hell."

Ellis choked out a wheeze, half-formed, and Rhiannon outright cackled from the front of the house. Christophe, on the other hand, frowned, looking between both of them and Rochelle. He had the vague pout of someone missing a joke. "What is this? No comprendo. I do not know this."

Rochelle's mouth opened, but she stalled out as Nick stepped into the hallway, his arms held tight to his sides. He looked as uncomfortable as she'd ever seen him - though he was doing an admirable job of keeping up his defenses, considering how uncharacteristically weak and fragile he'd seemed of late. He passed a cursory glance over them, almost entirely skipping Ellis, and spoke flatly.

"Ella quiere coger."

It was strange hearing him break into Spanish, let alone a full sentence of the language. His nasal accent faded into it, but lingered enough to make his pronunciation warp just a little.

Christophe blinked in his direction, head cocking, but said nothing.

Nick smirked at him, and turned to make his way back toward the stairs. He paused only a moment to look toward the couch, catching a glimpse of Lena and Rhiannon huddled close around Coach's still-prone body. The strained emotion that flickered across his face was edged with relief, though he quickly jerked his head back forward and continued on his way.

"Anyone need me, I'll be upstairs. Try not to need me."

Once he'd passed into the stairway and out of sight, Ellis shot a glance at Chris, waiting for the sound of the stairs creaking his ascent to abate. The Spaniard wore a confused expression... and that seemed a strange, if Nick had correctly translated Rochelle's answer. "Whut'd he say?"

To that, the foreigner threw up a shrug, a gesture he made with more ease than he'd once managed, considering his stumped shoulder. "No se." He looked genuinely bewildered, adding, "I did not want to make him feel bad and ask."

Rochelle's eyes shifted from Chris to the staircase and back. She seemed dubious at the answer and unsure what to make of it, but she had other priorities. Rather than press the issue, she gestured into the kitchen. "Do I have to beg you guys to make some food? I thought this was gonna be an easy pull."

"Yeah, yeah!" Ellis hooted back, bouncing into a lunge to scramble toward the fridge. He dropped to his knees, cracking open the lower freezer door and craning his head to peek inside. Plastic rustled as he dug through the contents. "Oh, man. Coach, there's fries in here! They ain't crinkle-cut, but they'll do."

Unable to resist a tickled laugh at his excitement, Rochelle turned, moving toward the oven. She bent down to pull out the squat metal drawer built into the space beneath the oven compartment, dusting her fingertips over the pans and sheets piled up inside before grabbing ahold of one cookie sheet with raised edges.

It took effort to minimize the noise it made, and even her best attempt didn't stop them from clattering together. She straightened, setting the sheet tray on the stovetop. Tapping her fingertips against it, she turned to glance at Ellis, watching him dig through the freezer with the smallest of frowns. It was hard not to let her mind wander.

I'm meddling again, aren't I?

When Ellis launched to his feet, right arm gathering around a bag of frozen fries and a bag of frozen chicken nuggets, she forced a smile onto her lips. He grinned right back, padding up to the oven to stand just beside her. He set to the task of tearing open the corners of the bags, ripping the plastic open with his nails.

Rochelle felt some surprise - though not a lot - when Ellis murmured, "Whut'd you talk tuh Nick about?"

She blinked at him, shifting her weight on her heels. She'd figured Ellis wouldn't have missed them peeling off into the laundry room, not that she had been subtle about it. She was also not completely unprepared for the question. "Asked him why he's being a dick." she answered, simply.

Ellis' shoulders twitched, and his expression was inscrutable enough that she wasn't sure if it was a positive or a negative reaction. "Okay. And why's he bein' a dick?" he prompted, deadpan, so much so that Rochelle had to bite back a frown.

She was struck, once again, by the uncertainty of not knowing what the right thing to do was. A compromise seemed to be simply to tell the truth. It wasn't, after all, what she'd always done.

"He says he's trying to scare you off, or maybe just make you think he's moved on." she uttered, lowering her voice to mask it from their teammates in the living room. "And his justification is that we, and I quote, 'don't know what he did to people he cared about.' Any insight into that gem?"

Ellis took a hand and shoved it into the opening he'd made in the first bag, frozen fries clinking together like hunks of ice. He carefully retracted it with a handful of them. He didn't speak as he scattered them into the sheet tray, though his jaw worked in and out of a clench.

It was only when he'd gone back for a second fistful that he responded. "Nothin' fer sure. I know he thinks he's bad fer me, 'n'I don't think it's just 'cause he's a real jackass sometimes. Think it's... more'n that."

Christophe's presence beside them had changed, a little, as they spoke. It took Rochelle a moment to really take notice, her gaze darting toward the man where he'd recoiled a half-step. His mouth was pursed, strangled, and she recognized it instantly. He was holding something back.

She narrowed her eyes at him, and it took nothing more to cause him to crumple.

"Coach told me to no -" he whispered, eyes rolling in a gesture that seemed more anxious than annoyed. He waved his hand in the air wildly, as if to indicate the very conversation occurring between them, and then dropped it. His posture dropped, too, a degree of misery in his eyes. "- but I am... I worry. For Nico."

Before Rochelle could summon up a reaction to that, Ellis had turned around, resting his rear against the edge of the counter. "He told me somethin', too." Rochelle snapped her head in a double-take, looking at both men. Something had happened that she didn't understand, didn't have the context for. "But he also asked me tuh give him a day, so he could work on Nick himself."

Christophe was primed to speak, but Rochelle put both her hands up, a plea for them to slow down. "Whoa, whoa. What's Coach doing for a day? And why are we worried about Nick, except the obvious?" When neither of them moved, she crossed her arms over her chest, shrugging her shoulders. "I think I'm a few steps behind, here."

Ellis lifted his hand, gaze shifting to examine the flecks and fragments of frost that lined his fingertips, before flopping his hand in a quick few wags to shake them off. His attention darted to Chris, brows lowering to a serious pinch. "It's about the mall, ain't it? When we were gone, somethin’ happened."

Rather than respond, Christophe shot a nervous glance toward the living room, body fidgeting and mouth working at words with little success. It was obvious enough the situation.

This has gone on for way too long.

Rochelle reached out and grabbed Christophe's hand, then Ellis'. Dragging them together behind her back as she turned and marched out of the kitchen, she didn't slow when she felt Christophe stagger, and he quickly caught his balance and matched her pace. Ellis was quicker to follow, though his hand was slick with moisture from the frozen food.

They returned to the living room, clustering up just before the closer arm of the sofa. Their abrupt appearance startled Lena into freezing, her eyes shooting up to them, wide. She'd been in the process of delicately cleaning up around Coach's bandages, dampening a paper towel with the contents of their last, half-empty bottle of alcohol.

His eyes were still open, though heavy-lidded, and they drifted up to squint in Rochelle's direction. They held some vague pain.

Rhiannon crouched by his hip, her elbow braced on his thigh, chin held in her palm. Her studded brow arched, lazy curiosity in her posture, and she thrust her fingers out in an imploring gesture. "What's up, shitters? You look like some assholes with something to say."

Rochelle didn't ignore her, precisely, but she didn't acknowledge the blonde outright. Her eyes went instead to Coach, narrowing, her body hunching forward to better meet his gaze. "Sweetie, I know the timing is shit, but you know how this has been lately. Can we pow-wow about Nick? Chris won't spill the beans without you."

His dark eyes lit with uncertainty, right before they dulled, and he rolled them up toward the ceiling. She was fairly certain it was a look directed right at God.

"Really, guys?" Lena's voice hinted toward some incredulity, though she was clearly trying to moderate it. "Kinda busy -"

Her voice broke into a slight choke, an exhale of pained air, and her body flinching was the biggest indication that Rhiannon had shifted her crouch to knee her sharply in the side. The jab halted her protest long enough for the taller biker to interrupt.

"Don't be a bitch, sis. It's obviously fuckin' important." As quickly as she'd moved to intercede, Rhiannon grinned up at Rochelle, voice practically strained to fit into the warm tone she forced around it. "No worries. Need us to fuck off?"

Rochelle gauged the look, and it didn't take a genius to know the woman was hoping to stay. Both the sisters had always been a little nosy into the group's business, though Lena had generally headed the inquiries, and Rhiannon had seemed mostly apathetic. That seemed to have changed when it was about Nick.

She could only hope that didn't have any deeper meaning. She's smarter than to get caught up with "No, actually. Because you might know something, too." Rochelle jerked her chin toward Lena, but her eyes focused back on Coach. If she'd watched a little closer, she might've noticed the flare of the brunette's nostrils, a faint anxiety touching her eyes at the words. "What do you say, Coach? Huddle-up?"

The football coach's head turned just an inch, mouth scrunching up to one side. He strained, less to speak and more to do so with the least movement of his jaw and throat as possible. "Yeah." he whispered. "Chris knows most of it."

With that, Rochelle turned, taking a few steps back to pull Ellis and Chris a few more steps forward. She released their hands with a squeeze, expression firming, voice doing the same as she carefully looked around at each survivor in the room. "He's on the second floor. He can't sneak back down here on those noisy stairs, but everyone keep your voices down, okay? Last thing we need is another... fiasco."

Ellis' body tensed, eyes darting toward Rhiannon and Lena, discomfort obvious on his face. She was acutely aware of his disinclination to tell them about him and Nick, but Rochelle had no intention of letting the conversation go in that direction.

"So what happened?" she murmured.

There was a moment, where everyone looked at everyone else, trading glances in an awkward shift. Coach's eyes closed, hands shifting to clasp on his gut, and it was his tired sigh that drove Chris to speak up.

"Nico... fell. In the mall. He was very sick, ¿sí?" His hand darted up, flattening the back of it against his forehead, as if taking his own temperature, nervously looking around as there was a stiffening amongst the team. "I found him on the ground in the, ah... ¿cómo lo llamaste? What you say?" He snapped his fingers toward Ellis, eyes narrowing, helplessly.

The Georgian's face had paled, and he mumbled out like an after-thought, "Uh... dressin' room?"

"Sí. Sí. The dress room." Christophe's hand dropped, and he shook his head. "He was confused, y... he thought he was bleeding, but... No vi nada. I think he did not know where he was, at first. He said he was dizzy, then fell. He said he did not know what happened."

Slowly, at first, then abruptly, Ellis sat against the arm of the couch. Without a word, he took his cap off, running fingers through the curly, tangled mess of hair only half-hidden underneath. Keeping the hat between them, he folded his hands in his lap, gaze darting to focus off toward the far wall, mouth hanging just open enough to pant out a few breaths.

"I left him. I left him in there, 'n'he was in trouble. He could'uh been hurt fer real in there, 'n'I let our stupid shit get in the way... I shouldn't'uv left him alone... I should'uv... done somethin'. Anythin'."

"The Witch." Lena supplied, voice distant, startling Ellis' head up.

"He hesitated, there, and the smile faded. His gaze fell toward the ground, examining the carpet, letting his hand drift to scratch idly into the dip of his clavicle. Rochelle reached to settle her palm against his waist, pressing fingertips into the soft fabric of his polo shirt, a comforting touch, trying to prompt him to continue.

Coach's voice quietly finished the Spaniard's sentence for him, voice so soft that his response was just the hollow outline of words. "Called it a name. Like he recognized it."

Ellis' head dropped until his chin touched his chest, inhaling a sharp breath. "Brett." he interjected, suddenly lifting both his hands to press his palms against his face. He rubbed them, ground them into his cheekbones. He could feel the worry brewing in his chest, sour and unpleasant. All the anger melted away, fading until he couldn't reach it, even had he wanted to.

He should've known something was wrong. He had, truthfully, but he'd ignored it - or wanted to think about anything but it - or been so distracted by their near-miss with intimacy that he'd not thought to consider it a symptom in its own right.

Nick had seemed so off that day, and then in the dressing room... his scalding temperature, his strange behaviour... of course the man was sick. Ellis just hadn't realized he was sick enough that he was hallucinating, and passing out, and whatever else had occurred in the last few days that he didn't know about.

Three nods - one from Chris, Lena, and a tiny one from Coach - were only just visible as blurs of motion in his periphery.

They affirmed, in easy unison, what he'd already come to assume: there was much more to the story that Nick had shared with him. There was no good reason Nick would hallucinate his childhood mentor in the place of a Witch, if there weren't more. He just didn't know what.

"But Nick said he was dead." Coach murmured, softly, and something in Ellis' chest constricted so tightly he thought his heart might pop.

Nick had not mentioned that detail. He couldn't remember if Nick had described Brett's age; how old would the man have been, then? How had he died, and when? If the man had been his only father figure, and his death had occurred when Nick was still a child...

He couldn't help a stunted, "Fuckin' shit-it."

The hell didn't you tell me, Nick? Whut'm I missin'?

"Who the hell is that?" Rochelle blurted out in a hiss, pushing her hands onto her hips. "I know you guys think you're explaining things, but..." She trailed off, shaking her head. "Do a girl a favour and slow down, okay?"

Lifting his head, Ellis stood, abruptly hopping onto his feet. "I'm gonna go talk tuh him." he stated, flatly, turning to start his stride in the direction of the dining room - but he didn't make it more than a step before hands grabbed the back of his shirt. Rochelle's, he quickly realized, as her voice hushed close against his shoulder.

"No, no, no. That is not happening. That is the worst solution to this problem, okay? We knew that already."

Ellis couldn't deny a stab of hurt at that statement, though he knew she hadn't meant it directed at him, specifically. Confronting Nick face-to-face had never worked to their benefit. He let his body stiffen to a halt. "... I can't just..." he mumbled, quietly, biting at the inside of his cheek. "... do nothin'. I can't just let him hide up there, pretendin' nothin's wrong."
Rochelle's grip on him softened, both hands flattening against the small of his back, smoothing on either side of his spine. "I know, baby. But we can't keep making the same mistake and expecting him to react differently. He's just gonna freak."

His head bowed, shoulders twitching up. She was right, and he was helpless to change that.

He'd learned that much.

Lena settled her hands on her thighs, leaning back, a frown twisting her mouth. Her gaze roved thoughtfully between the survivors standing by the sofa, before settling finally on Ellis. "So who was the Witch? Or... who'd he think it was? Who's this Brett dude?"

Ellis let his arms cross, tightening them over his chest, half-closing his eyes. His voice grew tight, a defensive edge touching his posture, brows knotting. "Somebody important tuh him. I ain't... it ain't important who. And it don't matter none what I know, 'cause I don't think I know the whole story, anyhow. So just let it be."

The woman quieted, shrinking into her crouch, a nod tipping her head in silence.

The Georgian frowned down at the ground, sighing, shifting his weight in an uneasy few steps. He still wanted to go charging up to the second floor of the house, but he knew it wouldn't help, knew Nick wouldn't cooperate. "Whut do we do now? If we can't corner him... Can't talk to 'im..."

Rochelle sighed, settling her arms flat at her sides before rolling her neck, the gesture more tired than anything else. "I think we make food, first, plot later. If he's still sick, then he needs to eat as much as Coach does."

Ellis' fingers curled lightly into fists, exhaling a nervous breath. He looked up, gazing toward the ceiling, eyes drifting like he could somehow aim them toward the gambler. He wished, too, that Nick might feel it.

"Don't think it's that kind'uh sick."
The smell of warming food filled the space, more of a vague, greasy scent than any particular flavour. Ellis positioned himself with his back against the oven, soaking in the warmth through the metal, letting it ease at his sore muscles. He never realized how sore he was until he stopped moving.

His eyes were closed, and his thoughts kept spinning back to a single focus: Brett.

It was hard not to think about. He'd thought of the man as some distant figure from Nick's childhood, but that didn't explain things, not entirely. He was more important than just some role model, some mentor. And his death, surely, had not been without impact on the man.

Or - shit. Whut if Nick was just a tot when he died? Whut if he lost... I mean, somethin' like a dad? I don't even know what he feels 'bout his parents, or if they're alive... 'n'I know he lost his uncle... Whut if he just lost everyone?

Ellis had never really put much thought to what he'd missed in the wake of his father's early passing. That wasn't to say he didn't mourn him - he did. He grieved for the idea of him, missed what the relationship between him and his father could have been. It was more of a soft thing, though, something that took up a portion of his heart but did not ache him.

Nick, clearly, ached over the man's absence, and Ellis was convinced something about the situation sat so heavily on his shoulders that it had taken illness to bring it out, a collapse, a hallucination. Guilt, maybe, because he felt like he should have been able to save his mentor - felt like he'd somehow been responsible.

Ellis didn't have to know what happened to know that wasn't true.

He told me some nice stuff 'bout the guy, but I guess he skipped some things, too. But it ain't like that would'uv been the first time he told me somethin' important - I mean, he told me 'bout his ex-wife before then, even though that was kinda hard. If it were somethin' simple, he'd'uh just told me. Gotta be more'n that.

It was possible - plausible, even - that there were some darker elements at play. He knew enough to know Nick had gotten involved with unsavoury people later in life, the kind of people who would put him in the hospital for gambling debts. He did not know when those connections had started. For all Ellis knew, Nick's gambling had begun under Brett's wing, and the teacher had gotten into a similar situation, but with more fatal results.

Maybe he blamed himself fer not stoppin' it. Stupid, when he was just a kid, but... man, I love 'im, but sometimes, he ain't very smart.

It made him smile, just a twitch.

Footsteps wandered close on the tile, and he listened as they approached. A body slid to tuck snugly against the other half of the oven, perilously close but not touching him. He mulled over who it was for a moment, refusing to open his eyes.

It probably wasn't Rochelle, or she'd have laid a hand on him already, or leaned against his shoulder. Chris would've been more unsteady and clumsy getting to the ground. Rhiannon wouldn't have approached so warily, and sat so cautiously. That left one person.
"Coach is doing great. Little woozy, but fine." Lena's voice murmured to him, quietly, and he felt a twinge of satisfaction at his successful guess. She sounded tired, deflated, like a certain amount of energy had gone to keeping herself upright, and it was expended. "How are you? I mean... considering."

His response felt like something he'd planned - and in a way, he supposed it was. He'd been holding onto the question for days, tucked tightly away for a better opportunity than the ones he'd been given so far. "When did you know you liked ladies?"

She released a sudden burst of air, and he wasn't quite sure at first if it was surprise or offense... but maybe it was neither, as her voice was casual enough when she softly responded. "People always ask that, like it's that simple. Like I'm supposed to say my very first memory was feeling like a lesbian peg in a straight hole."

He opened his eyes quick enough to see her face twist into a grimace. She'd curled herself tightly against the oven, legs underneath herself and hands stuffed between her thighs. Both of them broke into choked-back laughs, his embarrassed and hers at a slight delay, like she'd hoped he wouldn't notice the phrasing.

"What was?" he prompted, shifting his legs to draw them up toward his chest. "Yer first memory, I mean."

Lena's shoulders ticked up in a shrug, eyes narrowing up toward the ceiling. She didn't hesitate at the question, didn't shy away from the intimate nature of it. "Mom brushing my hair in the morning, probably. I'd come in every day and make her do it for me. When she was working the dayshift and wasn't there when I woke up, sometimes Dad would take over. He always griped about it - but he did it, anyway."

He watched her body relax, though her smile was melancholic when she glanced at him. "How 'bout you?" she returned, tipping her head back against the oven's glass. "First memory."

Ellis squinted. He genuinely tried to search back through his memories, to pin down the earliest one he could remember. It was hard when they all blurred together, warm and difficult to get a grip onto. Some snippets and broken patches of sensory recall came to him, but he couldn't nail any of them down as his \textit{earliest} one.

"It's hard, huh?" The biker shifted, leaning forward, thumbs lifting up from where they'd been trapped between her thighs, as if in a tiny shrug. "I'm not sure when I first knew it. It's just always been this way. It's like... if I asked you when you first knew you had brown hair or blue eyes. Sure, you could say, 'the first time I looked in a mirror', and it's true... but kinda dumb. What did you think you were before then? Bald?"

The Georgian let the crown of his head tap against the front of the oven, blustering out a sigh, blowing a raspberry that buzzed at his lips. He whispered back, "I guess I just went a long time without lookin' in a mirror."

He startled when she moved, suddenly snaking her arm between the back of his neck and the oven, looping it over his shoulders. Her head tilted, grinning gently at him, her body slouched into the gesture just enough to lean into him. "That's just how it was for me, sunshine. Everyone's different. And sometimes it takes a kick in the rear-end - like the dang world ending."

Ellis knew he reddened, knew he shrunk into himself, but he grinned back all the same.

If she knew he was gay, what did it matter if she knew he was hung up on Nick? That was his business. It didn't inherently mean Nick returned the feelings, and it didn't inherently mean they'd been anything to each other. He'd hidden enough for long enough, and knowing that Nick was in some sort of emotional turmoil just meant the stakes were much higher. He needed all the help he could get.

His smile faded, and his voice started of its own accord.

"In the... mall. When Nick saw the Witch. Did he... seem sad? Or... was he... Did he look guilty?" He hesitated, losing steam, shrugging his shoulders subtly under her grip. Ellis shot her a weary grin, reluctance drawing his voice out into a slow sigh. "I dunno. Sorry, it's a dumb question."

Her attention didn't waver, and her voice lingered at a husked tone when she responded. "He looked terrified. And he doesn't seem like the kind of dude who gets scared easy."

Slowly, absorbing that, Ellis nodded. He looked down at his knees, wrapping his arms around them and pulling them tight against himself. The waist of his jeans cut into his hips, almost painful, but not so much so that he was enticed to move.

"I'm worried. You gotta help me keep an eye on him, okay?"

Lena's arm squeezed against his shoulders, a comforting gesture, one he returned by nudging his body against her grip. "Sure thing." she murmured, and he couldn't help but detect a shift in her tone. He peeked up at her face, hovered near to his by their posturing, and there was tension in her jaw.

She was worried, too, though he wasn't confident they were worried about the same thing. He knew she'd never fully trusted Nick after his antagonism toward Rhiannon, and finding out he was unwell likely didn't help her confidence. He couldn't blame her, even if it was easier than admitting she had a point.

Instead, he shifted his body, a fidget that made her retract her arm from behind his neck and settle back into her seated position. "Thanks fer helpin' save Coach. I dunno if he'd've made it if you weren't here."

She laughed softly, head turning to look out toward the center of the building. Her tone was dismissive, gaze wandering, like her thoughts were directed elsewhere and her response was only cursory. "That's not true. You guys handle yourselves just fine."

Ellis grunted at that, lips pouting out thoughtfully.

Lena turned at the waist, bringing her face into a scrunch as she looked into the oven to examine the heating contents. Ellis almost looked, too, on instinct, but she started talking and his attention snapped back to her face.

"But... y'know, I keep meanin' to ask. Almost did when we were riding earlier. You think there's any chance you guys would come with us?" She relaxed back down, tilting her head to glance at him. She flexed out the fingers of her left hand in a vague gesture, elaborating, "To Texas."

His expression fell to a small frown, more thoughtful than anything. He pushed his legs out, heels skidding along the tile until they plopped flat and sprawled outward. "Uh... I mean... I ain't really thought about it, I guess. If we're gonna find our families, we gotta retrace their steps, y'know? I know my family was headin' to the evacs."

The woman exhaled, nodding, and her lips drew into a tight and serious line. "I know. But there's a long-term plan here. If they're safe, maybe getting you guys somewhere safe first should be step one. Then we worry about contacting the military and getting you guys to your families second.”

Ellis hesitated, working up an uncertain smile. He'd not genuinely considered it before, and the idea settled uncomfortably in his mind. Losing the helicopter had been a blow - to be teased with the chance at rescue and have it ripped away when it was practically in arms' reach - but he'd still not given up on rescue. He knew, one way or another, they'd find it.

He'd find Keith. He'd find his mom.

But what if she had a point? What if the better way forward was to get somewhere, anywhere, that was truly safe, and go from there? Bunkering down in the Texas desert seemed as good a plan as any.

"Government's given up on Texas." he mumbled, freezing the moment the words left his lips. He darted a glance at her, but her expression hadn't shifted from the earnest intensity it had started with. "I-I don't mean that mean or nothin', but... it just seems like goin' away from what we're tryin' tuh get to."

She nodded, putting both her hands against her sternum, her tone growing more insistent. "I know. But it's not always a straight line to get what you want. And we still don't know if there's even anything here for y'all. I don't want to leave you guys in a bad spot."

The woman had made no real attempt to moderate her voice so it wouldn't carry into the living room. As she spoke, Rochelle drifted around the pillar at the end of the kitchen counter and came into view, leaning against the post with her arms crossed over her chest. Ellis peered at her, and recognized frustration in her expression.

She was stepping in to protect him - he just wasn't completely sure what from.

"The concern's appreciated, Lee, and I take your point. But we can't give up that easy. Especially now that we know the military is still in the area." Rochelle shook her head. A laugh intruded into her response, laced with a faintly self-deprecating humour, like she knew her suggestion was far-fetched. "For all we know, that helicopter radioed in before it started to land, and somebody knows we're here."

Lena tipped her head to regard the producer, her lips darting into a quick purse before she put her palms up imploringly. "I'm just making the offer. Just... think about it. You'd want your family to get themselves safe before anything else. Maybe you should do the same."

Rochelle's mouth opened, but the soft creak of the ceiling made her attention dart upwards. The stairs protested the weight placed on them, wood groaning as Nick made his way down them, and there was an instinctual tension that rose amongst them. They were all nervous, on edge, especially after their conversation.

Ellis genuinely hadn't expected Nick to reappear, let alone so soon. It wasn't easy to resist the urge to get up and march over to meet him.

Maybe I'll just grab him right now, kiss him silly. Wonder whut he'd do.

He sighed, clasping his hands up onto the top of his head to drag his cap down over his eyes, letting his body slouch against the oven even further. It was strange, to feel such visceral frustration and longing all at once, and it was a sensation he found Nick uniquely suited to bringing out in him.

His posture left the slimmest strip of a sightline over to the stairs, just the foot of them, and was enough to where he could watch Nick's socked feet come into view. "What are we talking about?"
the man sighed out. He sounded disinterested, even bored... and if that was any indication, he hadn't heard enough of their conversation to glean any context.

Nick stepped onto the first floor, then sat down on the bottom-most step. If Ellis lifted his chin just a little, he could see the dark shape of Maggie's tail twining over the thigh of his grey sweats. He'd bundled her into his lap and, likely to avoid getting clawed, was keeping his distance from the group.

It was hard not to think he was also using the cat as something of a shield.

"Food's almost ready." Lena chimed out, suddenly pushing to stand, using her forearms against the front of the stove to shove off and get to her feet. "Hope you're not too good for chicken nuggets, hoss." Ellis felt some surprise at her abrupt movement, and the hurried way she changed the subject.

The conman snorted, a hollow sound, though his voice smoothed out when he responded. He shot her a dry look, slanting a smirk across his face. "As long as they aren't dinosaur-shaped, I'm game."

Lena snapped a hand up toward her temple in a mock-salute, a grin curling her lips up. "Assorted oblong shapes are a-go."

Rochelle darted a glance toward Ellis, and her brow was cocked as she did. The producer's expression said she was thinking similarly to him; there was no real reason not to include Nick in the conversation. He'd had his doubts about hunting out rescue for a while, and he likely had an opinion. He usually did.

Ellis let it go for one main reason: he already had one unpleasant subject he needed to bring up now that the group was together and alert. He didn't see the value in adding more stress than he needed to onto Nick's plate. Rather than say anything, he simply shrugged at Rochelle.

She shrugged right back and turned to retreat toward the living room. Maybe she followed his lead, or maybe she just didn't want to argue with the biker more than she already had.

He watched her go, then returned his attention to Nick. The Northerner was focused down on the cat in his lap, fingers rubbing between her shoulderblades, trying to capture her attention away from her nervous stare at the other survivors. His success was middling, and his touches served to do little but make her body twitch and stiffen.

Man, you make it real hard tuh think straight. I was hoppin' mad two minutes ago, 'n' now I just wanna bundle him up in muh arms'n'not let go until he tells me everythin'. Ellis sighed, lifting a hand to pinch at the bridge of his nose. Gonna work muhself into a headache, this rate.

He scrambled to his feet, body sluggish to respond. It took a thrust-back hand, catching the handle of the oven's front door, to keep his balance as he reached his feet. He turned, rotating his grip on the handle and cracking it open as he bent forward.

The heat struck him in a blast, hot air fluttering at the curls looped against his ears. He had to squint against it, peering in at the sheet tray they'd piled high with food. They didn't need to cook, precisely, just heat through - and bubbling grease and golden edges seemed as good a sign as any.

Ellis snatched the thick handtowel off the countertop where he'd left it, folding his hand around it and using it to buffer his skin from the hot sheet tray when he reached in and grabbed ahold of it. The oven's heat still scalded at his wrist and forearm, and he moved quick to yank the tray out and drop it on the stovetop.
"Soup's up." he called, bumping the oven door back closed with a jut of his hips. He pushed some amount of excitement into his voice - and it wasn't too difficult to summon the tone. He was genuinely excited. "Cept it ain't soup this time."

Christophe gave a sleepy crow from the living room, half-startled, like he'd been dozing. "I have hunger, I think! I have not really wanted to eat since - ay, a long time."

Rhiannon's response was mixed with a snicker. "Good thing, too, Lefty. You lose much more weight and we'll have to tie you down when it gets windy." That snicker resurfaged, letting her rasped voice get a little louder. "And you gotta store up some energy for when you finally score with Ro'."

Rochelle's faux-protesting, "Oh-hoh!" was only slightly louder than Coach's dull groan from the sofa.

They'd stacked up plates earlier, and Ellis grabbed two with his left hand, reaching out with his right toward the fat ceramic cup by the stovetop that held a few assorted utensils. He flickered between them with his fingertips before snatching a spatula up by the slim neck, tossing it up gently and re-catching it to adjust his grip onto the handle.

Setting the two plates down onto what free space remained on the stovetop, Ellis portioned out a scoopful of nuggets and fries, eyeballing out something around a seventh of the pile each. They hadn't completely emptied the bags - there hadn't been enough room on the small cookie sheet - but there wasn't much left, and he wanted to ensure everyone had an equal share.

He inhaled, setting the spatula down and grabbing the two plates, one in either hand.

The Georgian turned, stepping between Lena and Rochelle, lifting his chin and squaring his shoulders in an effort to look casually confident. The moment he passed into the dining room, Nick's eyes were on him, low and full of nameless threat. There was a warning there, and if he hadn't known the man as intimately as he did, he might've been cowed.

Instead, he continued to walk forward, pushing one of the plates forward as he approached. He halted only an arm's length away, aware of how his proximity had sent Maggie into a nervous curl, tighter and tighter - claws unsheathing... An hour previous, he might've taken a little satisfaction out of the pain that shocked Nick's eyes into a squint.

Offering the food out in a firm jerk, Ellis cocked his head, watching as the older man somewhat slowly raised the arm that wasn't looped over the cat in his lap. He grabbed the plate, pulling it from Ellis' grasp with the guarded caution of someone who anticipated some sort of retaliation, though no such thing came.

If he asked Nick if he was alright, would he answer? If he sat down, would the man move away? If he asked him, point blank, what was going on with him, asked him who Brett had really been... would he tell the truth? If he demanded they talk, and talk honestly, would Nick acquiesce?

Would it help, or hurt?

Instead of putting any of it to the test, Ellis merely flashed him a slim smile and turned back around, heading toward the living room. He intended the other plate for Coach, and only once the injured man was fed would he go about feeding himself.

He tried to call it calculation, waiting for the right time to accost Nick, waiting for the best possible chance at having some kind of productive conversation. He wanted to think he was being careful, thoughtful. He had an amount of power over the situation.

He just had to figure out how to use it.
Chapter 277

The chicken nuggets were not, precisely, gourmet. They'd been in the freezer long enough that the ice had crystallized into the meat, leaving a slight mushiness behind after they'd been heated up. The fries were better off, but they'd absorbed a subtle flavour, like the smell of chemicals or antifreeze.

It was likely a reflection on their generally poor diet that it still felt like a treat.

Nick had no interest in even examining the contents of the fridge to look for a sauce or something to dip them in, sure that it was all past expiration even before the sparing few weeks it had been since the collapse of society. The house didn't seem well-kept.

Then again, neither are we.

The fries were a little bland on their own, but the feeling of biting into hot starch was appealing enough to overcome his picky nature. There was a bottle of ketchup, but it was separated into a few suspicious layers, and he had no interest in that, either.

The only thing he had any interest in, he swore, was Ellis' little smile. It had been so cocky, so knowing. Like he knew full well that Nick had been anticipating the Georgian to sit down and invade his space, like he'd done back at the café, and knew full well he was subverting that expectation.

Like he knew Nick watched him walk away, feeling just slightly - and entirely against his own wishes - disappointed.

Grimacing, Nick stuffed another rounded nugget into his mouth, using his teeth to catch on a crisped fold in the fried dough coating and tear it in half. He chewed on the slightly soft meat, too smooth and grainless to be actual chicken breast. As he did, he took the other half between his fingers and used his thumbnail to tear out a piece.

Blindly holding it out to the side, just a few inches away from the plate, he felt rather than saw Maggie's fuzzy snout nudge against his fingertips and tenderly mouth the piece away from his grasp. Her chewing was eager, interspersed with nervous, raspy huffs, and quickly followed by an equally eager set of rough-tongued licks.

"Fuckin' gross as shit, dude." Rhiannon barked out, and though Nick could only see portions of the living room from where he sat on the stairs, he imagined she was referring to the generous helping of questionably-tinted pickles Ellis had dug out of the fridge. "That shit's gonna give you the fuckin' runs, and I swear to fuckin' God, if I have to hear your asshole shotgun blasting all night -"

"Pickles last like, ferever, man." The mechanic's voice was half-stifled, likely full of the very food they were discussing. "They're probably fine."

"Hee-haw, that is not true, at all." she mumbled, a smile tickling at the edge of her voice. "Neither part of that is true."

"But Keith -" Ellis protested.
Softly, at a whisper that was just bassy enough to carry, Coach murmured, "I wasn't out so long, Keith turned into no reliable source fo' info, was I?"

Laughter scattered across the room, and Nick grimaced again. He was so glad to hear the man in a joking mood it ached, and it was contrasted sharply with the strong desire he had to get up and go upstairs. Listening to the group chatter just grated at his nerves, but he had something he needed to do. He'd come to a realization, coaxing Maggie out from under the bed.

Ellis wasn't the only one he needed to prepare for his eventual departure.

As much as it pained him, the likelihood of him bringing the cat with him was next to zero. Even if the sisters would've agreed to it in the first place, managing her on a boat seemed difficult, if not impossible. Worse, forcing her onto a sailboat for who-knew-how-many days seemed cruel.

He exhaled, narrowing his eyes, glancing across the dining room at Rochelle. He pursed his lips to let out a short whistle, just a single note. When she turned her head to blink at him, he let his free hand lift, crooking a finger at her.

The look on her face soured, but she pushed off the counter, sliding her plate to rest against her hip as she approached. Her shoulders lifted in a questioning gesture. "Suit, if you whistle at me like that again, I will find some room for my foot beside the stick up your ass."

Nick's eyes rolled just slightly, putting his hand up in a halting gesture. "Easy, easy. Slow."

Rochelle's gaze flickered to Maggie, and she started to move gentler, stepping to close the distance at a cautious pace. She watched the cat's body stiffen, her pumpkin-coloured eyes narrowing, a growl starting to crinkle her damp nose... before Nick proffered another hunk of chicken, and her attention snapped back to his hand.

As the cat busied herself with gnawing at the larger piece, chewing on it without pulling it free from Nick's grip, Rochelle eased into a crouch just in front of Nick. She set her plate on the floor beside her foot, crossing her arms over her knees.

"What's up, Nick?" she murmured, watching the cat's ravenous behaviour, humour entering her tone. There was some mockery there, standard in their interactions, but there was a softness at the core of her expression. "Are you actually volunteering to pick up where we left off? Because I'll eat Ellis' hat if -"

Nick reached out, grasping her wrist, doing so just slowly enough that she could've dodged him if she'd wanted to. "Trust exercise." he explained, cryptically, letting a smirk touch the corners of his eyes.

She didn't resist.

Pulling her arm straight, he retracted his other hand, the softest laugh escaping him when Maggie's mouth snapped at the air in an attempt to grab hold of the hunk of meat. "Alright, brat. Gotta make a choice." he muttered, setting the piece down on Rochelle's palm, where her hand now hovered just in front of his knee.

The cat's body tensed, paws suddenly adjusting on the carpeted stair, taking a step back. Her eyes had tracked the half-chewed chicken nugget the entire way, but she seemed to only belatedly realize her predicament, releasing a quick and panted hiss. Her tail, dark and mottled orange on the pale carpeting, started a ferocious set of twitches that did not quite graduate to a full lashing.

"I am not comfortable with the stakes here." Rochelle hissed out of the corner of her mouth. Even as she made no move to retract her hand, a genuine degree of tension entered her shoulders. She still had slim scabs over her digits from the last time Maggie had taken a swing at her.

Her voice made the cat's ears flicker, straightening, focusing on her with rapt attention. Nick couldn't shake the thought that she relaxed slightly, softened. Her owlish eyes took stock of the woman, darting between her face and the piece of chicken on her palm, as if calculating the risk against the value of the offered treat.

Then her eyes shifted up to Nick's face, plaintive.

"No, doll." he responded, shifting his weight a little. He let go of Rochelle's wrist, reaching instead to brush his fingertips against Maggie's shoulder, subtle encouragement. She made the smallest move to arch her back against his hand, but when her eyes returned to Rochelle, a low growl vibrated in her throat. "You gotta get over this shit, before they kick you out."

Shifting on her paws, Maggie looked almost poised to run, but hunger proved a powerful motivator. Both survivors couldn't help but hold a sucked-in breath, watching as the cat delicately climbed her front paws onto Nick's knee, using the perch to stabilize herself as she stretched toward Rochelle's hand.

Nose and whiskers twitching, eyes in a constant rotation between Rochelle's hand and face, Maggie leaned out to sniff at her fingertips. The moment she inhaled, her back bristled - but when she lunged, it was just to snatch the chicken up in a smooth bite.

A flash of dark colour against the light carpeting was the only thing Nick saw when she bolted upstairs, growling the whole way up, her own footsteps jostling the sound into a warble. He craned his head back to look up the stairs, finding her crouched at the top, hunched down as she set to devouring the piece of nugget.

"That... went better than I expected." Rochelle muttered, rolling back to let her weight settle back on her heels. She wiped her palm against her thigh to clean off the grease from her skin, brows lifting as she glanced over Nick's face. "Maybe there's hope, after all."

He didn't acknowledge the loaded dryness to her tone, choosing instead to return his attention to his plate. "I think she liked your voice. I guess you don't sound like a Spitter, after all."

Her mouth popped open with a gusted scoff, and she put on a grimace as she struck out to punch his knee. "Hey, prick, remember that the only reason she likes you is because you look like a middle-aged Georgia pawn-shop owner. Not exactly high praise."

A grin tugged at his lips, and he shook his head. "You mean a businessman with a boat? Alright, alright." Nick leaned back, resting his elbows on his thighs, and watched the woman's eyes roll as she turned to settle her back against the wall, just where it cut off to open up into the stairwell. When she looked back toward the living room, he cleared his throat.

"How is he?"

Her posture stiffened, and she responded without turning her head. "Why don't you go ask him?" Nick started to answer, but Rochelle didn't let him get past an inhale. "No, no. No bullshit today, Nick. If you want to know, go talk to him yourself. Admit you care about him, for once."

Nick's shoulders dropped, groaning out a sigh. Talking about Ellis was the last thing he wanted to do, especially after the day they'd all had. He felt completely wrung out, like he lacked any form or structure with which to defend himself. His gaze darted up toward the ceiling, mouth quirking. "I meant Coach. Y'know, the guy who almost died today."

"Yeah, so did I." When he directed a frown at her, her brows lifted, daring him to argue. "You two need to kiss and make up already. Because you're right - he could've died today, Nick. Any of us could've. Merlin's beard, how many near-death experiences do we need to have before we all stop taking this shit for granted?"

His fingers tightened into a curl, unable to resist the frustrated gesture, even as he calmed into a slump. Talking about Coach was easier, relatively. "What do you want, me to go give him a hug? Or maybe go slap a kiss on him?"

Rochelle snorted, even as she shrugged her shoulders. "That'd be a sight."

Nick sighed, pretending the edge of it didn't have a slight laugh, and turned his chin to glance at her. "Fine." he snapped back, pulling his voice into a childish whine. Her momentary surprise was satisfying, and he stood, moving to push his hands into his pockets - though his stolen sweats didn't have any, and he ended up just hooking his thumbs in the waistband, instead. "Can't say I never tried."

He walked forward, fully aware of the way she scrambled to follow him. She anticipated disaster, he was sure, and he might've felt injured if it weren't mostly deserved.

Circling around the dinner table put him within eyesight of Christophe and Rhiannon, the two seated atop the TV stand they'd set in front of the front door. The Spaniard's expression blinked into mild interest, cocking his head inquisitively, and Rhiannon set immediately to a leer in Nick's direction. She was, apparently, not over her power-play.

Ride that high while you got it, bitch. he tried to communicate with narrowed eyes. She got at least portion of the sentiment, judging by the way her eyes lit up in pleased recognition. The blonde bit her cheek to stifle a grin, right before she curled her tongue up and against her upper lip in exaggerated seduction.

So she likes me, huh? That's a turn.

Nick wheeled around the post separating him from the couch, gaze immediately dropping to focus down on Coach's prone form. He numbed to the awareness that there were more than three sets of eyes on him, now; Lena and Ellis were sitting on the ground in front of the sofa, plates in their laps.

The way the atmosphere thickened made his nails bite into his thighs, like subtle nerves. The Georgian's jaw was frozen halfway through biting a quarter-cut piece of pickle in half, expression flickering through an array of emotions that Nick didn't care to examine. He forged out a slim smirk, cocking his head down at Coach, the big man carefully returning the look without shifting his head.

"How you doin', big guy? Gave us a scare." he prompted, leaning his bare shoulder against the column beside him. When Coach's eyes softened, peering at him from their upside-down position, Nick demurred. "And that's the second time I've had to carry your fat ass out of danger, for the record. Gonna throw my knee out next time."

A choke of a laugh made Coach's body stiffen, grinning even as he lifted a hand and pressed it nervously against the bandages on his neck. "I'm a'ight, Nicky. Ain't no jumpin'-ass son-of-a-bitch takin' me out."
Nick's jaw flinched against a smirk, head cocking further. He hesitated, just a beat, before leaning forward a few degrees. He would've preferred less of an audience, but he also knew he needed to do it. "If I -" The words caught instantly in his throat, like an unpleasant hiccup, but he powered through it rather than let himself peter out. "If you got pounced because of -"

The way Coach's eyes softened betrayed the grim way he grunted, "Son, ain't neither of us enjoyin' this." When Nick's face cracked into a small half-smile, the prone survivor sighed. "Wasn't yo' fault."

Something settled in him, right before something else, something uneasy, rattled to life under his breast. To a degree, the decision to leave the group felt less like a choice and more like an unfortunate circumstance that was occurring to them. Rather than a trigger he was pulling, it was more like an oncoming car he wasn't stepping out from in front of.

He was planning for it, certainly, and he'd begun trying to prepare the team for it - but he hadn't yet so distinctly felt like he was saying his goodbyes.

The likelihood that he could slip away in the middle of the night was next to zero, and he didn't need to wonder how they were going to react when they found out. He knew. It's gonna be a conversation. They're gonna argue. They're gonna be pissed. This whole fucking situation is a goddamn mess.

"Um." Ellis murmured, and Nick's gaze darted up toward him, a brow flinching up. The Georgian's face was pulled into a grimace, and he knew that look; Ellis was going to say something he knew no one would like. "'Bout that... I was meanin' tuh have a word with y'all. Once we got settled."

Nick traded the smallest frown with Coach before crossing his arms and directing his gaze more fully toward the younger man. Ellis' attention flickered less-than-subtly to watch his bare upper body settle into the motion. His rapt focus stirred the laziest urge to preen, right before sense made Nick reject the self-satisfaction.

"That doesn't sound good." Lena observed, leaning her weight back as if Ellis were wielding something dangerous. Her eyes, almond shapes crinkling as she squinted, were faintly amused as she examined him. "Are we in trouble?"

Ellis' mouth twitched upward, knocked free of the fractional fugue he'd slipped into. "Nah, just... We noticed that Hunter was... weird. Any'uh y'all get a look at it?" He wagged his shoulders in a gesture of uncertainty, nodding toward Christophe. "I know we were all kinda distracted."

Rochelle slipped to stand beside Nick, breaching into the living room by just a step and a half. "I didn't get a good look at it, but it sounded sort of strange. Quieter. They're usually growling and screaming, and we get a little warning, but it came out of nowhere."

"Could've done with a manicure." the gambler muttered, eyes still on Ellis. The Georgian had gotten better at holding a straight face - but even so, he remained an open book, most times. The quirk and tension in his expression all-too-familiar. "What's up, kid?"

The Southerner shifted, settling his hands into fists and knuckling into his thighs. He bit at the inside of his cheek before he spoke. "It was messed up. Like, I thought the claws were weird enough, but its whole darn face was gnarly-lookin'." Raising his chin, he patted his fingertips against his mouth. "Like its mouth was half-melted shut."

"Melted?" Rochelle echoed, her head tilting. "That's... strange."
Ellis hummed, nodding. "Yeah. That's what Chris'n'I thought. Y'know, first thing I'm thinkin' is it went face-first intuh some Spitter goo, but it weren't burnt, y'know? I mean, Keith's got plenty'uh burns, so I know whut they look like."

A snort made Nick's shoulders jostle up, and he turned his body, reaching down to tangle fingers in his pantleg. He tugged the hem of his sweats up to bare his calf, displaying the sprawl of mottled flesh that was pinkened with raw, healed flesh. "Didn't look like this?"

Although the Georgian did glance down at the extended limb, he responded before he did. "Nah." Ellis had tended to the wound, after all, and was more than familiar with its appearance. The chemical burn on his forearm from the previous day was nowhere near as deep. "This was like... well, hell, natural ain't the word. Like the skin grew wrong."

With the smallest smile, Christophe offered up, "A bad cookie."

Ellis released a stuttered laugh, shrugging his shoulders. "Yeah." He shifted his weight and let his legs sprawl out in front of himself, slumping into the posture. He nodded toward the front door, expression pinching with vague uncertainty. "I mean, it's still out there. We could go look."

Coach was the one to grunt, the sound displeased. His head turned just slightly to glance toward Ellis, his mouth drawn in a distinct frown. "No one's goin' outside. I'll crawl my ass over there and hold the door shut if I gotta, but ain't nobody goin' outside to poke at a body. Ain't worth it."

At that, Rhiannon leaned forward, thumbing at the prone survivor and biting her tongue thoughtfully. "You see anything, Pops? Cunt was kind of in your face."

The big man shifted his weight, rolling his body a little as if to get comfortable on the sofa. He sighed, eyes closing, hand settling into a more casual grip on his wounded neck. "Don't know. Can't say I was lookin' too close at it - but yeah. Somethin' seemed... different."

Lena had taken a piece of nugget into her hands, working slowly at tearing it into pieces, more a mindless act than anything else. She wrinkled her brows and let her gaze wander over the group encircling the room. "None of them are lookers, if we're being honest. We got car-sized hunks of muscle and little shrimpy Jockeys. What's one ugly Hunter?"

Nick watched Ellis' posture tighten, an inhale flooding his chest into a puff. The Georgian argued, "Sure, but... them claws were wild, too. I mean - whut if they're mutatin'?"

"Into what? I mean, what else?" Rochelle put her arms out to either side in a vaguely confused gesture, advancing a few paces to stand closer to the center of the living room. "What you're describing doesn't sound like an improvement. I mean, sure, its nails did a number on Coach - before they broke off. And why the mouth?"

Ellis shrugged, uncertainty rising amidst his stony blues. He didn't look convinced, himself, though he was visibly worried. Discomfort seemed the best description for his body language - as if he was hesitant to argue. "Dunno. Ain't like they're gonna let us know, 'n'there ain't no manual on zombies."

Christophe leaned his head forward, eyes narrowed, and lowered his voice. "It is too bad that my Witch did not break a nail, ¿sí?"

Rochelle sighed at that, letting a slightly sympathetic tilt touch her head as she passed a squint his way, then deflected. "I definitely don't want them changing anymore than they already have - but honestly, that seems more to me like it was a fuck-up than an evolution." A grimace tilted the corners of her mouth down. "Who knows how many people mutated into things that couldn't even survive? If a Charger is a best case scenario, the hell was the rough draft?"

"Who's saying the motherfucker wasn't that fugly to start with?" Rhiannon offered up, husky voice low with restrained humor. "Our nana's toenails used to get about that long."

Nick couldn't help but choke on a laugh, quickly raising a hand to tuck his knuckles against his mouth and stifle the sound. "Pretty sad when you're a standout ugly duckling, even for a zombie."
The blonde shot a grin in his direction and waggled her eyebrows up and down, clearly pleased with herself.

So, he added, "Then again, Blondie, who are you to judge?"

For an instant, he thought the anger that flared in her expression was sincere - but then the grin returned, Cheshire-sized. She settled back onto a hand braced against the TV stand under her, tossing her hair with a sharp gesture. "They can change all they like. Fuckholes still go down when you take their head off."

Ellis wrinkled his nose, glancing at her, taking a moment to adjust his hat on his head. "Guess so." he admitted, sounding unconvinced, wary. "Just don't want 'em takin' us down before we get the chance."

Christophe folded his knees slightly, bracing his heels against the bottom of the TV stand and shrugging his shoulders. "We will be more careful, ¿sí? Until we know what we - what is going on. No more argue in the street." He let his gaze drop, mouth tightening. "I do not know... what I do, if I lose you."

The foreigner gestured his hand out, indicating all of them.

Nick couldn't stop his chest from knotting up, a cold sensation rising. He averted his eyes and sighed, harshly. There had been a time when he'd have considered himself immune to guilt.

That time, apparently, had passed.

"Alright, Señor Buzzkill." he grunted, eyes rolling. "How about we talk about literally anything else? Fact is, there's nothing we can do right now."

Rochelle's arms crossed, a frown tugging at her mouth as she turned to face him. "You're right, sure, but to Chris' point... when we go back out, we go careful. We've gotten lazy, comfortable - we let down our guard, and Coach nearly died. Lena nearly died. Chris nearly died. We have to get serious again."

Quietly, humoured, Coach murmured, "Think the cat'll share a few lives?"

Laughter flittered across the team, mostly muffled snorts and faint gusts of air. Nick let his attention drift, hunting the smile that accompanied Ellis' laugh - but instead, he found a pair of blue eyes riveted on him. They dodged away just as fast, surreptitiously embarrassed, and Nick felt a frown creep onto his face.

Ellis looked worried, and Nick wasn't entirely sure it was about the warped Hunter.

"You're assuming she hasn't used up most of them already." he groused, taking a cautious stance with his weight shifting on his heels. "Don't think she's got many left."

He just wasn't sure what it was about.
The TV did not work.

Something crackled when Ellis tried to turn it on, a low-pitched whine the only indication it had done anything at all. He frowned, tilting his head and knocking on the lower edge of it a few times, frowning deeper when it didn't respond.

"There's not gonna be any signal." Rhiannon advised, stepping up to stand just behind where he squatted. He tipped his head back, blinking up at her. "Pretty sure all the newscasters are dead."

"Hey!" Rochelle protested, kicking her heels against the carpet. She'd settled onto the ground beside where Chris sat on the TV stand, resting her cheek against his leg, and he'd taken to petting the slope of her neck with his fingertips. "Not all of us."

The blonde snorted, eyes flickering to gaze over the pair before they returned to Ellis' face.

He grinned up at her, hesitantly, a bashful edge touching his expression. "Uh... yeah. I figured. Just knew there was a few movies in the bookcase, so... I guess I thought we could watch somethin'. It'd be nice, y'know, a break. Somethin' normal fer a change." Disappointment tinged his voice as he gestured toward the television. "But guess that idea's out."

A sigh made Lena slump where she sat against the wall. She'd folded her legs into a cross until her feet touched flat together, and she was rubbing at her knees like they ached. "Shucks, that sounds really nice right about now. We'd need some popcorn, though... illegal to watch a movie with no popcorn."

Rochelle put her hands out, fingers splayed, groaning slightly. "Rude, Eleanor. The discussion of fun things we can't do should also be illegal."

Lena giggled under her breath, eyes warming, a joke lingering inside the sharp inhale she took - though she bit it back and merely responded, "Sorry, Ro'. I'll keep things sad and boring."

Nick hadn't truly committed to entering the living room. He'd taken up a position seated at the dining table, chair pulled out enough so he could see into the front of the house. Maggie had returned, and she lay sprawled on her side, legs stretched as far as she could manage to lengthen her body.

Her tail moved in contented waves, stilling every time he stroked her side or rubbed against her cheek, then twitching until he repeated the gesture. The man had been tremendously quiet, a fact that didn't pass Ellis' notice.

Guess I understand him not sharin' all his past, but... whut'd I ever do that made him feel like he can't tell me he's sick? Ellis sighed, just quietly, looking up toward the ceiling. More sure than ever that somethin' messed him up that I don't know about. A rough childhood'n'his wife don't add up tuh all this.

"It's gettin' dark." Coach murmured, his voice thick with exhaustion. There was a not-so-subtle plea, there, begging for quiet. It made Ellis grimace a bit, realizing they'd been keeping the man awake. "We should catch some shut-eye."
"Yeah, I'm pooped." Rochelle announced, the words leaving her as a yawn while she stood, arms stretching above her head. The arch of her back dragged her shirt up around her waist, a gesture that did not go unnoticed by Chris. "How's about we pick rooms? We can actually have a little bit of privacy this time."

Nick's head lifted slightly, glancing toward them. "Gonna have to pull straws for the master." he stated, dour at first, though a mild humour surfaced in his voice when he countered himself shortly thereafter. "Or let the girls catfight for it."

"Rock, paper, scissors." Ellis instantly suggested, spine straightening much despite himself. His eyes narrowed as he turned, some excitement bleeding into his voice. The idea of a playful contest stirred an eagerness in his chest, and it wasn't dampened even when Nick averted his gaze and retreated at his engagement. "Or -"

"I have a better idea." came in a drawl from Rochelle, the woman letting her arms fall to her sides as she relaxed out of her stretch. She glanced slowly around the room, gauging her teammates, cheek bitten between her teeth.

Then she bolted.

Protesting sounds left both Lena and Ellis, both brunettes scrambling to their feet and charging after her. An equally protesting "Hey -" escaped Nick as their impromptu stampede sent Maggie shooting to her feet, breaking into hissed spits as her fur went stiff into an aggressive display.

The feline stood her ground even as they came perilously close, and stared after the survivors as they disappeared into the stairwell. Christophe followed like an after-thought, his expression pulled in a confused moue, merely shrugging as he passed up and into the upper floor.

The cat's defensive position flagged as he disappeared, and Nick sighed at her in vague consternation, drawing to his feet sluggishly. His eyes flickered toward Coach with a raised eyebrow.

"You want a room, Sam, or are you bunking down here? I was going to take watch on the couch, so -"

The injured survivor lifted his arm, waving his fingers in a vague gesture to cut him off. "Prefer a bed, if there's one. I can walk my ass up some stairs; ain't dead yet, in spite of what this damn apocalypse wants." A grunt escaped him as he started to shift, as if slowly arranging himself to sit up. "Just give me a second."

Nick might've approached to help the older man up, but before he could even think to, Rhiannon was walking up to the sofa. She sent Nick the smallest glare - and whether he understood it entirely or not, he took the hint.

She postured, and he withdrew.

As he followed the rest of the survivor group up to the second floor, Rhiannon bent forward slightly, narrowing her gaze at Coach in blatant judgement. He froze, half-propped against the back of the sofa, staring up with a quickly flattening expression that he tried to pass off as calm expectation. He seemed uncomfortable. Wary.

He'd been wary of her all day.

He'd been acting reserved since she'd flirted with him, that much was obvious. While his initial shock had been enjoyable to watch, his reticence since was far from it. She didn't realize how much she'd grown to enjoy his company until he'd retracted it - and, maybe, the prickling discomfort in her chest had something more to do with almost losing it forever.

They'd picked up a banter over their time together. She'd grown comfortable around him in a way she wasn't quite used to - though admittedly, he was certainly within the bounds of her preferred sort of sexual partner: older, quiet men who were only just beyond the peak of their prime.

Lena had had plenty of opinions upon finding out most of her partners were their father's age. Rhiannon didn't see the issue. They get to feel lucky for a few days, and I get no-strings sex with dudes eager to please. Besides, it's not like they're not fucking a chick their daughter's age. We're both fucked up.

Rather than speak, she extended a hand, and he glanced at it with the slightest hesitance before reaching to take it. The blonde's weight shifted back onto her heels, her body counter-balancing against Coach's heavier frame as he stood.

Only once he'd gotten fully upright did she release his wrist, taking a step back. Her arms crossed over her chest, a frown pulling at her mouth. The expression seemed to only further Coach's discomfort, his frame shifting nervously. The uncertainty was only barely gratifying, considering she didn't want to make him genuinely uncomfortable.

The woman wasn't used to people having any real power over her. She did her best to avoid it, in fact, and that only seemed doubly sensible when any of them might die at any time. That left her mostly angry to discover that she'd not only gotten attached, but also scared him away.

Whether she liked it or not, she wanted his attention. She was also a generally impatient person.

She barked, simply, "Stop it."

Out of reflex, he recoiled his head back as if her outburst whizzed past his face, eyebrows lifting in a bemused expression. "... Stop what?" He was still semi-nervously holding his free hand over the mess of bandages on his neck, so he tentatively wiggled the fingers pressed into his jaw. *"I'm just tryin' not to bleed, girl."

They both knew that wasn't what she'd been referring to, but his attempt at distraction was almost a kindness. She'd usually have taken the bait and let the conversation veer off-track. Seriousness and sincerity was not, as a rule, a strong suit of hers.

Rhiannon's eyes rolled, putting both her hands up, fingertips just touched together in a gesture of strained control. "Stop avoiding me. It's fucking annoying, alright? Guess I didn't think you'd be a fuckin' pussy about it, but -" Her posture shifted and her head tilted back with a frustrated sigh. *"Sorry if I freaked you out."

Coach's eyes softened, abruptly re-examining her in quiet assessment. He let his shoulders droop, glancing down toward his feet with a wry chuckle. "Shit, Rhiannon. Don't apologize. It's my fault fo' takin' it - well... I know you didn't mean nothin' by it. Just... yo' ass is half my age. Kids I taught back in the day are 'bout as old as you now, an' old habits die hard." He grew a small smile, offering a shrug. *"Guess I just didn't want to send the wrong message."

She did not make any move to relax or acknowledge his words, so he put his free hand up.

"I know you were jokin' around. It just threw my ass for a loop - and shit ain't been calm enough fo' me to think 'bout it, alright?" A genuine embarrassment crossed his face, grimacing. "I didn't mean to make you feel like I was avoidin' you. I'll cool it, if yo' ass cools it with the hanky-panky bullshit."

Her body shifted to lean back, brows pinching tightly together. She didn't want to feel relieved to hear he wasn't angry with her, but that feeling was much more desirable than the displeasure that bit at the base of her spine upon realizing he wasn't interested in her, either. It dug in its nails and ground its teeth against her and she grimaced back at him.

He frowned at her, his head tilting in obvious question, so she swallowed down the bitterness lingering behind her teeth and flashed a crooked smile.

"Did you just say 'hanky-panky'? You are so fucking lame, dude."

Coach looked at her with a dumbfounded blankness, right before he burst into laughter, slim and deep in his chest. He rolled his eyes at her with an exaggerated, slow drama, turning to start walking toward the dining room. "How many zombies you gotta kill before people can't call you lame? I took a damn piece of road to the skull once, from a Tank, you know."

Immediately, like she'd been yanked along by the arm, Rhiannon was at his elbow. She practically leered up at him, a blinding grin on her face. She did not match his cautious pace, instead circling him as he walked, bouncing with each step as if giddy. "You're shitting me. That's some hard-ass bullshit right there."

He shook his head, another laugh bubbling up as he shot her a sidelong glance. "I'm a damn survivor. An' yet, here I am, gettin' laughed at. Bein' made a fool of. I got feelin's, you know."

A cackle escaped her, lifting a hand to push her thumb against her broken canine and bite down on it, shoulders lifting to the familiar ache. Her gait turned serpentine as she let her body swagger with each now-backwards step. "Aw, shit. Somebody's a badass motherfucker. Bouncing concrete off your head, catching Hunters with your neck - modern-day John McClane, but with zombies instead of Germans."

Coach snorted, reaching out with his free hand to catch her with a light touch to the shoulder, pulling her into his wake as she almost backed up into the dining room chair Nick had left out. "You sound like Ellis." he muttered, smiling just slightly when she groaned. "Gettin' yo'self riled up over nothin'."

At that, Rhiannon quieted, merely responding, "Come on, Gramps. Gotta get you to bed." She kept pace with him, eyes wandering downward, a slow breath drawing her chest into a billowed expansion. Her eyes narrowed, jaw gritting just slightly as she allowed herself a faint sigh to expel all that air.

Yeah. she thought, pretending her lips didn't falter into a downward curve.

Nothin'.
Nick closed his eyes, leaning his head back against the top of the sofa.

Ellis had gotten the master bedroom. Nick had reached the second floor landing only to come upon a pile of tangled-up bodies, Lena pinning Rochelle to the ground. The two women had been in the middle of laughing themselves to tears, though not without Rochelle's protesting squeals.

"Interference! Unfair! Illegal! Call the cops! Shit - cops are dead - call the zombie cops!"

That left three smaller rooms upstairs, one being a small office, and the small bedroom beside the stairs. The sisters ended up there, with Coach, Rochelle, and Christophe scattering amongst the three remaining. The house fell quiet in record time, exhaustion settling in as they gave their bodies leave to collapse.

It felt strangely isolated to separate, after so many days crammed into the tiny condo or the single space of the Sunset Café restaurant.

It felt stranger, even, to be so clearly partitioned; he hadn't intended on quarantining himself on the first floor with the bikers, but he didn't want to draw attention to it by protesting, either. As much as he wanted to step out from under the dark cloud he'd created for himself, there was no sense in doing so until they had the boat in hand.

There was no telling how they'd react. There was a distinct possibility that they would rescind their offer of help to find the boat, and that would hardly endear him to the sisters. Our relationship started off difficult enough without me rocking the proverbial boat about our literal boat.

A snort bounced his shoulders, and he shifted, letting one leg slide up to rest lengthwise on the sofa. Draping his arm over the back of it, he let his eyes slit open, looking toward the front of the living room. No light streamed through the thin sheets that his teammates had messily pinned up to cover the glass windows, betraying the night looming tall above them.

He'd left only the stairwell light on. It was enough to see by, but not enough to risk highlighting their location from the outside. The book in his hands was only marginally more interesting than staring up at the ceiling, but he forced himself to look back at it, grimacing at the text.

Murder mystery was not his preferred kind of fiction, though it did garner some of his interest when he skimmed ahead and found a remarkably explicit passage involving, as far as he could tell, the bartering of sex for police documents. He perked, just a little bit, and might've started skimming for more if he hadn't heard footsteps behind him, rustling on the tile.

Nobody had come downstairs, which meant it was one of the sisters. The approach was soft, as if trying not to disturb anyone else in the house, which meant it was not Rhiannon.

Nick lifted the book, stretching it behind and past his head as if to extend it out. He shifted his grip in order to flatten it out, displaying the text behind himself, and listened with the smallest smirk as those footsteps hesitated - then drew closer. They paused a few feet away, and there was a moment of silence.

Then Lena choked, voice muffled like she'd covered her mouth with a hand. "Oh, Cheez-Its. Is that what you guys do on watch?"

"Nope, just me." he returned, pulling the book back in front of himself and settling the bottom edge against his bare stomach. "C'mon, this is basic human instinct here. If I'm gonna fight for my life all day, I'm gonna read some shitty porn at night." He slumped, nestling down into the couch cushions, allowing a lurid note to enter his voice. "Settle in. I'll narrate."

She laughed faintly, and stepped around the sofa. She came into his peripheral vision, and he noticed she'd barely undressed for sleep, still in her slim capri jeans and grey hoodie. One of her arms were tucked behind her back, weight rolling onto her toes in a blatantly coy posture. "As hilarious as that sounds - I come bearing gifts. Couldn't sleep, so I thought I'd come keep you company."

Nick's gaze lifted, catching immediately on her hidden arm, and he arched a brow in question. He didn't have long to wonder at it before she was drawing it into sight, fingers circled around a squat plastic bottle of clear liquid. He also didn't need more than a second to process what he was seeing before he was throwing his novel to the couch beside him and straightening.

"Holy shit." he hissed, unable to hide the excitement in his voice. "Is that vodka? Where the fuck did you get vodka?"

Another laugh made her shoulders jump up, and she stepped closer, shaking the bottle enough to slosh the liquid inside. "Gotta keep some mystique, hoss." She didn't sit, though, the bottle held half-out towards him as a small smile curled at her lips. "Ain't free, though. You'll have to -"

Nick didn't bother to let her finish, lunging to snag the bottle out from her grip. "Deal." he interrupted, an apathetic distance to the agreement. He twisted off the cap with a simple motion, taking a swig. It made him choke and burned at his mouth as he swallowed, showing teeth with a grimace.

It was bad. It tasted bad, it smelled bad, and it tore through him like a steady trickle of acid, burning a ragged hole from his mouth to his gut. He could feel his liver wither away with an audible whimper.

"Holy fuck, I needed that."

The shift of the couch as Lena sat next to him made his attention flicker toward her, even as he took another, smaller sip. She smiled at him faintly, head tilting as if in query. "Dang. Guess the end of the world brings out the alcoholic in all of us, huh?"

Nick hesitated, snorting dully before he offered the bottle back toward her. "You too vanilla to join me in killing myself before the zombies can?"

Her eyes flickered down to the bottle, and she shook her head. "Vanilla is not the worst thing someone's called me." she responded, grabbing the bottle from his hand and pulling it up to take a mild sip. To his surprise, she managed a swallow without much more than a wince, though the face she made indicated it was not an act she took pleasure in. "That is... awful."

Unable to resist laughing at her, Nick's features lingered on a grin, enjoying the painful burn spreading through the muscles in his chest. "You don't drink to drink, you do it for what comes next." he muttered dryly, holding his hand out with his fingers moving in a gentle waggle.

Lena handed the vodka back, curling her legs up onto the couch and wrapping her arms around her knees. She sucked her cheeks in, tilting her head back against the couch's upper cushions and turning her chin just enough to watch him.
There was silence, and he did not initially move to break it. He kept his eyes on the bottle in his grip, steadfastly refusing to look at her just as she steadfastly refused to look away, though he couldn't help but tense under the gaze.

It felt, absurdly, like she had several degrees of power over him. She'd been present at the mall, just like Chris and Coach, to see him fall apart, and she'd not yet given any indication of what she thought about the events. The knowledge felt intimidating, daunting, but he reacted to it much the same way he'd once dealt with every challenge: he puffed up his chest and leaned into it.

"Alright, doll, lay it on me. What'd I get myself into?"

Her eyes flickered over his face, her mouth pinched, and she seemed to lose some amount of steam. A laugh puffed out of her, shoulders hunching. "I was hoping you could tell me that, actually." she countered, attention drifting toward the front of the house. His distant amusement soured. "We haven't gotten the chance to talk. I thought... well, honestly, I thought you owed me some answers. Or at least one."

Nick's jaw tensed. He didn't like where the conversation was going, but his options were limited. The man steadied himself with a less-than-conservative gulp of vodka, thrusting the bottle back in her direction.

"Here I was, thinking all the people I owed shit to were dead." he quipped morosely, tossing his head back and closing his eyes. He relented, however, and he was only partially sure why. He would've liked to say it was tactics - courting her and courting his chance for escape - but that felt like a stretch. "You get two questions. One for taking a Charger for me, and one for the vodka."

Painfully, excruciatingly, he acknowledged that he might've just been lonely.

Lena's legs shifted, her body curling tighter, a faint smile tinting her voice. She seemed surprised, like she'd expected more hostility or protest. "Sounds fair. First one's... probably not a surprise. Rhiannon said some stuff, but I'd prefer to hear it from you." She didn't take the bottle back, and he settled it against his thigh rather than continue to hold it out.

Her words fell in volume. "Why do you want to leave?"

A laugh left him in a bark, shifting a hand to settle his palm against his bare chest. He rubbed at his sternum, idly enjoying the burning warmth that was lighting him up from the inside. "Look, sweetheart. I realize I seem like a puzzle, but I'm usually pretty simple. I want to leave because I don't want to go where they're going."

The brunette snorted, moving her arm to rest her elbow against the top of the couch, turning her body more to face him. She placed her knuckles against her jaw, a humour entering her tone. "You know full well that's not an answer." Before he could respond, she continued. "Even if you don't have any family, why wouldn't you see this through? If they can find the military, if there's rescue out there, why wouldn't you go to it?"

When he looked at her, he found a quiet intensity. It made him recalculate his concept of her, for just a moment. He'd pinned a simple archetype to her from the start: soft, unassuming. A wholesome girl from the country, with just enough of a rebellious streak to own a motorcycle... but not enough to shake off the gentle sweetness in her nature.

The way she was gazing at him, however, was cold. It was less an alien unfriendliness than it was a mask, disguising her features into a flat look of curiosity. It struck him as odd for a very particular reason: he couldn't read it.
He'd seen her poker face before. He'd watched her push emotion and thought under a rug, observed her throwing up a shield in a social interaction. He tended to take note of these things, taking a measure of the people around him and getting a feel for their proclivities. She was not, as a rule, a good liar.

Yet, just then, he watched her face and didn't know what she wanted.

He felt at a disadvantage, and the increasing warmth and numbness tingling in his body was not helping. Inhaling sharply, feeling his diaphragm jolt into a vague tension as he did, Nick screwed his face into faux thought and shrugged his shoulders.

"You're assuming a lot. Fact is, whether they find one solitary ship or not, I don't think there's some fuckin' magic rescue out there. If the government was in any shape to keep us safe, this shit wouldn't have gone south so fast. Your goddamn psycho dad seems a better shot to me than throwing ourselves at some rag-tag guerilla bullshit that can't even fly a helicopter."

Lena laughed, faintly, though it seemed vague and half-hearted. "Oof. That's the nicest thing anyone's ever said about him."

Nick twisted to turn his body and face her on the couch, eyes snapping his attention onto her face, though he caught nothing but a small frown. "Going away from cities packed full of zombies seems like a smart idea, anyway." He let his arm drape over the back of the sofa, head resting against his shoulder as a slim smile curled at the edge of his mouth, lacking humour. "I want to leave, and you two could use extra hands. What's the problem?"

Her gaze flickered to absorb his expression. She hesitated, just a moment, and then spoke. "I just want to understand. You guys are close, that's easy enough to tell. It's... weird, for me, you realize that? Feels like I'm tearing a family apart."

A snort left him, nostrils flaring and eyes going low-lidded. "Trust me, sweetheart, I did that all on my own." When her eyes widened a tick with something like surprise, he sighed, drawing out the sound lengthily. 'I'd be leaving with or without you. You dumbshits just... moved my timeline ahead."

She didn't seem entirely convinced - or, perhaps, she merely hadn't gotten what she was looking for. Instead of responding, she cocked her head, putting her hand out for the bottle. He acquiesced, passing it over with a shrug.

"We aren't anything to each other. We met for the first time at the beginning of this shit-show. We're barely friends, and definitely not family."

To his not-insignificant surprise, she didn't respond. The brunette took the vodka up and sipped from it, grimacing a little as she swallowed and settled her mouth against the plastic lip of the bottle. She didn't speak for a few moments, and the silence might've bothered him more if he hadn't been enjoying the slow blur gathering at the edges of his consciousness, and the way it made her presence feel comfortable. Companionable.

"C'mon. Aren't you supposed to be getting into her pants, not getting fuckin' melancholic? Whining about your own stupid shit?"

But he didn't want to.

He'd barely wanted to get into Rhiannon's, even before she'd pressed a gun into his chin. He hadn't wanted much, in fact, in days, and that was hardly average for him. He was nothing if not greedy, and everything but restrained, and the apocalypse hadn't done much to temper it. If anything, the stress and anxiety of their day-to-day survival had only made losing himself in Ellis more tempting.

And he'd done exactly that: lost himself.

He'd lost himself in the idea of having a family, in the idea of belonging. He'd lost himself in the idea of deserving Ellis' attention and affection and touch, a gorgeous young man who couldn't see anything but good in him. He'd had something completely out of his usual comfort zone, something wholly good, un tarnished - if only for a moment in time, before his own lack of structural integrity had taken them down into the mud.

It frustrated him, feeling his own lack of interest. How was he supposed to get over Ellis if he couldn't kick his heartbeat into a steady rhythm again? Though that felt like a tiny betrayal of himself, admitting that he was the one desperate to get over the Georgian, not the other way around.

Fuck you, vodka.

"Alright, second question." Lena abruptly continued, talking like there hadn't been a significant break in their conversation. Her voice was so casual, it was hard to focus enough to raise his guard when she asked, "Are you into Ro'?"

When it processed, his first instinct was to choke. His next instinct was to laugh. His third, and fortunately final, instinct was to despise both of his previous instincts and instead tense his expression into a frown.

"If your question is, am I actively inside her... no. If you mean, would I accept an invitati-

He startled at the abrupt impact of a foot against his knee, sluggishly yanking his leg away from the touch, shifting his weight to lean away. That movement brought his center of balance into an abrupt lurch, his sense of verticality threateningly wobbly, and he was forced to appreciate the fact that it had been a while since he'd had hard liquor.

"Jeez, gross!" she protested, and he tilted his head to catch a glance at her, finding embarrassment on her features. He wasn't sure he'd seen that look on her face before, let alone with a flush flirting at her neck and cheeks. "That's not what I'm asking. There's just a lot of tension around here, and - honestly, whatever you want to say, I don't think you'd leave without a good reason. I know what a family looks like... busted and bruised or not."

He didn't respond to that; he wasn't sure what to say that wouldn't raise alarms. If she'd picked up on the tension between him and Ellis, but misread it entirely, then denying it would only turn her critical eye elsewhere. As much as he'd have liked to laugh in her face and end the conversation, he was better off keeping his cards close to his chest.

Lena seemed to take his silence as confirmation, and continued.

"So, maybe you guys had a thing, stuff got complicated... one of you pulls the plug..." The biker waved her hand, vaguely, as if to gloss over the details. "Then Chris shows up, sweeps her off her feet, right? And you're left watching her be happy with him. All the stuff that used to be easy gets hard, and ugly, and heavy."

Pain settled like indigestion in his gut, a sharpness just inside the lower curves of his ribs, the surge of discomfort making his gaze drop to the ground. It felt like he'd swallowed a lightbulb, and she'd given him a swift kick to the stomach and burst it. He scrabbled to drag the feeling back under control, cram it down into something manageable. It was too close to the truth for his comfort.

He had no idea what possessed him to do what he did. If it hadn't been for the alcohol growing increasingly strong in his system, he'd surely have thought better of it. He'd have, at least, considered what the consequences might have been beyond the moment he sat in.

"She wants me to be shit I'm not." His voice sounded bitter, even to his ears. "I may as well fuck off, make things easier for both of us. They've all got families to find out there, if they're alive, and I'll just be the pathetic fucker hanging on. And if there was a shot for... something, and I can't goddamn do it, I'd rather just pull the fucking band-aid off now."

He didn't look at her, so when the bottle of vodka tilted into his peripheral vision, it surprised him. He bit back a frown, snatching it out of her grip and letting the mouth tip against his lower lip. The moment of anger he felt at himself was quickly soothed by the burn in his chest as he took a sizeable gulp.

Lena's weight shifted, though she did not close the distance between them. "I don't know either of you well enough to argue. But I think you're looking at this the wrong way." He grunted, noncommittally, thumbing at the plastic ring around the neck of the vodka bottle in a way that he knew appeared childish and sulking. She gave a soft sigh, voice quieting to a murmur. "You've never had a friendly break-up, have you? It's sort of obvious."

Another grunt was all he could pull together.

The woman let him hold his silence for just a moment before she reached out and touched his shoulder. It was soft, just her fingertips, and he stiffened despite himself. "You really want to leave, and maybe never see her again? Any of them?"

"Jesus tits." Nick burst out, letting his head loll back suddenly. Frustration flooded him, turning quickly into something closer to anger. The fuck is she getting at? And why now? I get enough of this shit from Rochelle. I don't need another goddamn participant in my fucking misery. "What's with you fuckin' people, deciding you know fuckin' everything? I didn't ask you to come and talk to me, and I don't need you in my goddamn space."

She laughed, faintly, and he darted a gritted look in her direction that she didn't seem to pay much attention to. Her hand didn't lift away. "Hoss, look. If you love each other -"

Something twisted in his chest, painful, and he surged to stand up and escape the warmth on his shoulder. He took a few steps forward - one or two more than he intended, when gravity seemed to yank him forward and he had to counter the sensation - gritting his teeth and struggling to keep his voice low. "You got your two questions. We're done here."

The softest sigh escaped her, and he didn't turn to look back at her as the rustle and groan of fabric announced her standing up. She didn't walk away, though, lingering there a moment before she spoke. "Nick, if you guys are barely friends, then we are total strangers. But I've gotten the chance to see the worst in people, and that's not what I see in you guys. Y'all care about each other. That was rare enough before the world flipped upside-down... now, it's sort of amazing."

He said nothing. He just closed his eyes, tilted his head, and blindly took a sip from the bottle of vodka.

"So, here. Second gift." Something thumped against the sofa, a gentle but flat impact, but he didn't react. "I can't tell you what to do, but I can tell you you'll regret it if you don't leave a door open. Night, hoss."
Nick listened to her leave, waiting until he heard the soft click of the door shutting down the hall. Only then did he glance down at the bottle in his grip, grimace, and turn his head. He didn't know what he expected to see, but he was surprised all the same.

The small notebook sat there, the one that his team had been passing around for days, full of their identifying information. He had not joined the list, and it didn't take a sober mind to piece together Lena's intent: she wanted him to fill it out.

He stared at it, for a long while, like an adversary. If he left, if he abandoned them alongside the sisters and went his own way, what was the point? Even if they survived their respective journeys, even if the world found itself settled back onto some sort of even keel, would they want to find him? Would he want to find them?

Regret was second nature to him, and he rarely gave himself the leniency of allowing it to affect his choices. Certainly, he rarely embraced the feeling in anything but useless hindsight.

It took him a significant amount of time - and a little more alcohol - before he convinced himself to approach. Nick glanced blearily over the first floor of the building before looking down squarely at the journal. Atop it was a slim permanent marker, slanted at a diagonal across the surface.

Numb with the buzz of liquor, uncertain, he picked it up.
He came to awareness in a hospital room -

No.

The hospital room.

He knew that instantly; he knew, somehow, exactly where he was. It was this intrinsic awareness before he'd even opened his eyes.

It was silent, and in that silence, he felt, somehow, calm. He should have been panicked, but all he felt was a soft dread. Resignation filled him more than fear, even though he knew he should have been afraid.

IVs tied him to the bed. A cast protected the broken bones of arm. The sheets strangled his breath, too tight, too clinging, swaddled like bonds on his aching body. He closed his eyes and waited.

They held on, just a little longer - then they were gone, as if they'd never even been there.

He got up.

He started toward the door, its jaws hanging open as if in invitation. When he walked through it, his pace was slow and wary. Every step seemed to stretch on, muscles struggling as if he walked through molasses and not air. His body, he realized, was no longer broken.

The hospital was empty.

Its tiled environs stretched on in either direction, and he stood, refusing to move. He would not obey the dream's designs, would not follow the path it laid out before him, the death he knew was awaiting him inside the darkness around him. He would not walk into its arms willingly.

Then Ellis was there, at the end of the hallway.

He stood there, shoulders low, facing away. He did not move, did not stir, and seemed so still that he couldn't have been real. Nick stared at him, and tears began to streak down his face, breaths becoming painful and damp in his chest.

Nick wanted to hold him. Just one more time.

He was so far away.

The Georgian's head turned.

Suddenly, Ellis was just in front of him - or, perhaps, in the fractured way that dreams played out, he'd moved to Ellis' side. The younger man's hands lifted to cradle his jawline, and though Nick stiffened and tried to recoil, he could not bring himself to complete the motion.

His crying stopped.

Ellis smiled at him, gently, a fondness overwhelming in his eyes.
"Nicolas... it's okay."

Nick surged forward, grabbed him, and they slid into an embrace. Hands slid up to tangle fingers in his hair and he buried his face against the other man's shoulder, squeezing arms against his lower back to bring them tight against one another, pulling the Georgian almost onto his toes.

"It's okay." that soft drawl murmured against the tender skin behind his ear. Turning his chin until it brushed Ellis' neck, Nick opened his mouth to whisper back - "I'm sorry" or "I love you" or "Please" or anything amongst the jumble of desperate things that clamoured for superiority in his head - but words did not leave his lips.

Instead, he bit down.

Blood filled his mouth, hot and coppery, and they fell to the ground. Ellis screamed, fists striking out at his sides, but a second mouthful of skin gave way to wet muscle and pulsing flesh, and he could not stop himself from swallowing. The urge to vomit rose.

Instead, he bit again, teeth sinking deeper to carve out the gash and tearing flesh as his head jerked, sharply.

His hands pinned the other man to the ground, nails digging into his flesh until they, too, pierced and found purchase in cloth and then meat. Blood puddled around them, crawling along the crevices and grout of the tile, gathering in deep crimson as he tore deeper.

"I don't understand." cried out Ellis' voice, screamed it, garbled as blood choked in his mouth.

When Nick awoke, it was almost with a scream of his own. His fingers were clawing at his mouth before he could stop them, and his fingertips slid on blood where it coated his lips and his cheek, friction only reinforced by the stubble on his jaw -

Yet, when he pulled his hands away, it was saliva that glistened on his palm, not blood.

Alcohol still pounded in his system, in perfect time to his panic. Fear made his lungs shudder as they drew in air, skin buzzing numbly, and he scrabbled to shove off the blankets from his body. He barely remembered staggering his way up the stairs and swapping watch with Christophe. Even fuzzier was the memory of the Spaniard's confusion at his state, though he didn't recall having much of an answer.

In fact, he didn't recall doing much of anything but throwing himself onto the bed in limp ragdoll - which raised the question of how the blanket ended up tucked over him.

That answer seemed obvious.

"Fuck." he whispered, feeling his throat crack like dry leather. He could still feel tendon snapping between his teeth, flesh giving way, the warm viscera pressing into his tongue. Worse, perhaps, was the sound of Ellis' screaming still ringing in his ears. "Fuck, fuck, fuck."

He wanted to lean over the bed and vomit. He wanted to throw himself into the nearest shower and set it as hot as it could go, scald the skin off his bones. He wanted to do anything but feel the sensations that he could not yet shake.

He wanted - needed - to know that the nightmare was just that: a nightmare, nothing more. He needed to scatter the images in his head, replace them with something else, anything else.
Reason urged him to calm, but there was no soothing the fear that had set his heartbeat to a furious rhythm. He fell effortlessly to panic, and panic drove him clumsily to his feet. He tried to run, yet the cloying fog of inebriation only-just giving way to a burgeoning hangover had him stumbling.

He barely had the awareness to try and muffle his steps as he breached into the hallway, dizzied and turned-around in the unfamiliar space. His pulse roared in his ears as he struggled to remember anything at all, let alone the layout of the house. Where was Ellis, and where was he?

The hallway seemed covered in doors, though perhaps that was merely his vision blurring them into duplicate and triplicate. For an instant, his surroundings loomed on ahead of him, and the fear that the dream had not yet ended pierced sharp through him.

Master bedroom. keened a desperate part of him, and he moved, sliding a hand along the wall as he went in an attempt to keep his balance.

As suddenly as he'd thought it, his hand found the door. He did not allow himself the luxury of considering his actions before his fingers circled the doorknob, white-knuckled, and twisted. Thrusting himself through the doorway, Nick found himself momentarily frozen.

Sprawled belly-down across the bed placed against the far wall, Ellis had kicked most of the sheets off himself. His limbs were in a messy disarray, his body diagonally stretched from one corner of the bed to another. His face was not visible in the dark, but for the curly hair tossed by sleep and the curve of his cheek and temple.

His body rose and fell, just gently, bared arms and legs betraying that he'd stripped to his boxers and white undershirt. He slept peacefully, alive and well, his sleep undisturbed by whatever darkness had taken up habitation in Nick's. The gambler's heartbeat eased, fractionally, the heat of his frantic concern falling to a simple, pained cold sweat.

That should've been enough.

Not enough. keened that voice, again, firmly.

Nick advanced, his fingers brushing the doorknob as he went to pull it gently shut behind him. The door clicking shut made his body tense, but Ellis' did not stir.

He didn't know what his intentions were as he staggered forward, crossing the bedroom toward the bed. He was not, precisely, thinking - and certainly not in any meaningful way. He knew he needed some tactile reassurance, just to touch him, feel his breath or his heartbeat, hear a mumbled sigh.

He was, perhaps, afraid of the inevitable continuation of that nightmare if he didn't prove it wrong.

Slipping close to the side of the bed, almost stumbling into it when his knee found the side of the mattress before he could stop his stride, Nick stretched one trembling hand out toward the Georgian's slumbering body. His fingers faltered as they stretched, shaking, the tremor flickering up his arm.

Then his fingertips touched bare bicep, the skin warm, pocked with scabs and scuffs that broke up the otherwise soft surface. A stuttered breath left Nick with a slack jaw as he let his fingertips follow the curve of the muscle, goosebumps crawling their way up his arms and the back of his neck.

Not enough.

Gentle, tender, Nick followed his arm up to his shoulder, tracing the line of his clavicle where his awkwardly folded arm sat it in sharp relief from his neck. The trembling grew to something almost uncontrollable, his fingers trying to curl, but he managed still to press the backs of his knuckles against the pulse just by Ellis' jaw.

Feeling the other man's pulse was near-impossible over his own pounding in his veins, and he did his best to inhale and calm himself. However, it stuttered in his throat, hitching as if in a hiccup, and the motion carried through his limbs.

Abruptly, like time had been in slow motion and only just now caught up, Ellis' body stiffened. An arm shot out, striking wildly toward the shape hovering near him. The blow was aimed messily, but it managed to skate against Nick's bare side, catching knuckles on his ribs.

It hurt, though there was some distance between him and the pain, alcohol and tangled panic laying a thin veil over his senses. He sucked in a sharp breath before tightening his grip into a cradle against the side of Ellis' neck. "It's me, Ace." he rushed out, haggard, reflexive.

Ellis did not relax so much as freeze.

His head lifted, slowly, pushing against the hand on his neck until Nick's thumb pressed into the soft skin beneath his ear. As his chin came off the pillow, tilting his face up, enough of the low light scattered to glint over his eyes. They were just subtle sparks of wet shine in the dark, peering up toward the older man.

"Nick...?" he whispered, and the sensation of his throat moving under Nick's palm made him shiver, mind twisting with the too-vivid recollection of tearing into that flesh with his teeth. He wanted to pull away, recoil, but he couldn't convince himself to break contact. "Is... is somethin' wrong?"

Nick could not summon breath to respond that did not immediately leak from him in a pant.

That soft, heady sleepiness laid a warmth to his voice that almost overwhelmed his concern, and a breathiness betrayed a subtle embarrassment. "Are you okay...?" he asked with a flustered uncertainty that did not stop him from nuzzling into Nick's wrist, leaning into the touch as his initial confusion faded.

Relief flooded him at a soft delay, finally accepting the stimuli as reality. He tingled as if he'd been running out of air and only now sucked in a breath, and he couldn't stop his other hand from lifting up. He slid both of them to cup against Ellis' jawline, so much like the Georgian had done in his dream, and let his lids lower with a fragile exhaustion.

He could feel the other man's body stiffen further, feel him start to tremble just subtly, feel the strain as Ellis struggled to keep still. He just wasn't sure whether Ellis wanted to push closer or fight to free himself.

"You don't know what it's like." left him, lips numb and tongue stiff. Delirium felt better than panic, by inches. It also came with a loss of control. A dam had broken in his chest, and out poured his insides, puddling like blood on hospital tiles, hot liquid soaking into his clothing -

"It's so fucking easy for you, to just... be fine. To just take it all in, to believe everything's going to be fine. I'm so fucking scared, every fucking day, and you just keep going. You don't know what it's like to fucking fail every time you give half a shit about something. I'm going to let you down, or lose you, or run you out of caring, and I - can't."

Fingertips brushed onto his chest, a touch that almost startled him, and Ellis' digits skated against the whorling grain of the hair there, a tingling sensation. The intake of air preceded some attempt to speak, but Nick pushed forward, setting one knee against the edge of the mattress to balance himself.

A sharper suck of air made Ellis' body tense, those fingers going curled against Nick's chest, silent at his approach. The angle of the Georgian's chin, now adjusted, tilted up to offer a better view of his face. Even in the dark Nick could pick out a flush threatening the highlights of his features, his parted lips and half-closed eyes seeming to beg to be kissed.

They wanted.

Yet, confusion sat heavy and thick on the younger man's face. His voice cracked when he tried to speak, at first, and he had to pant in a quick, damp breath before trying again. "N-Nick. Yer scarin' me a little. Are you -" Suddenly, his expression softened, just a little, mixing worry with an abrupt flicker of disappointment. "Are you drunk? You smell like -"

The faintest laugh choked at Nick's throat, and he flexed his fingers, letting his palms skate into a softened cradle on the younger man's cheeks, either pinky and ring finger slipping behind his ears. "Yeah." he croaked. "And that's the least of my problems."

Ellis shifted his weight, parted lips sealing into a frown, and he started to sit up. Protest was apparent on his features, but before he could utter it, Nick let a thumb rest over his lower lip. The touch quieted him, even just for a moment.

It was, at least, long enough to allow Nick to finish.

"You'll either fall out of love with me or die because of me, or we'll all die in this fuckin' hellhole, and I can't watch it happen. I can't... lose you, too." He sounded desperate, and he didn't have the strength or focus to attempt to sound otherwise. "Let me... let me choose, this time, Ellis. If I can just... choose, instead of getting my fuckin' hopes up, maybe... I'll make it out. Maybe we can both fuckin' survive each other. Maybe I won't kill you, and you won't kill me."

Shock gentled Ellis' brow, jaw going a little slack. His eyes searched Nick's, and where he had only gently touched the other man's chest, his hand now settled fully against his sternum. He rubbed up and onto Nick's shoulder, gripping, and the touch of that rough palm sent a shudder down his frame.

It was a cruel thing to do.

The Georgian's voice was painfully soft when he whispered. "I love you, Nick, more'n I know how tuh say." Hearing the words, just then, felt like too much. It struck Nick somewhere he'd left undefended, and he forced in a ragged breath through his nose. "You drive me crazy tuh all hell, 'n'yer also the reason I'm still alive. I'm not goin' nowhere, not today, not tomorrow - I ain't givin' up on you, 'n'I told you that already, so stop with the bullshit."

With the faintest smile, Ellis let his other hand raise, settling over one of Nick's where it lay against his jaw. His fingertips only just found purchase to curl around his palm. "Whatevah happened tuh you, before, whut you did or somebody did to you... it don't have tuh matter, if you don't let it. It don't have tuh stop you from bein' happy forever."

Nick wanted to pull away. He wanted to draw back and walk out, with or without the last scraps of his self-respect... and, perhaps, leaving Ellis with his. Instead, he hovered there, breathing thickly through his nose, unable to convince himself to move.
Ellis seemed to take advantage of his hesitance, pushing forward, and it felt like a motion that was somehow frighteningly fast and much, much too slow. His voice was a coaxing drawl. "Darlin', just... can't you trust me?"

Nick's hands found their way to slide around the back of his head, burying fingers in the curls at the nape of his neck, gripping there, unsure if he meant to drag him closer or hold him at bay. Ellis pulled against the grip, even when it drew his hair taut, and a soft intensity thickened his voice.

"We've been trustin' each other with our lives fer weeks. Can't you... trust me, just a little, with... you? I promise, I... I won't hurt'cha. I won't."

Something shattered in him, a soft fracture that he didn't know if he'd survive, like maybe his heart had cracked apart and each dull heartbeat was one more pulse of blood draining into his chest. It was a painful sensation, one only heightened when Ellis' thumb stroked up his neck, soothingly.

"If yuh want me... Yuh got me, Nick."

He gasped out a sigh, closing his eyes, shoulders shivering when Ellis' hand touched his face. Ellis seemed to hesitate before brushing his knuckles against the flat of his cheekbone.

Nick only noticed, then, that there were tears streaked there. He didn't know whether he'd awoken with them or if he was too numb to notice they'd fallen as he stood there. Reflexive, panicked just softly, he reached to grab Ellis' wrist and pull it away. It took effort - actual force - in the instant before Ellis relented.

"I don't. I don't want you." escaped him, almost a laugh, dizzied. "I need you, and that's what fucking scares -"

His words were lost against the firm pressure of lips on his.

He inhaled, sharply, and an exhale puffed against him as Ellis sighed in turn. There was a moment where he'd closed his eyes, but Nick had not, and in the strange double-vision caused by their proximity he saw the way Ellis' brow had smoothed, his features soft and relaxed. He looked relieved.

Had anyone ever looked so whole, so complete, at just a touch between them? Just a kiss?

All at once, their hands darted to clutch for purchase on each other. The younger man's left hand dove to curl around the back of his neck, his right snatching at the waistband of Nick's sweats and clenching fingers in it to urge him close.

Nick followed, body crawling up onto the bed, almost scrambling to get closer. Ellis moved with him, and the flustered sprawl and shift and scrabble of limbs ended with the younger man flat on his back, Nick sliding to nudge between his thighs. Their kiss was clumsy, messy, and only when they thudded flat did Nick get enough leverage to deepen it.

A moan rumbled in his throat, and a softer sound from Ellis responded. His fingers threaded up and into Nick's hair, gripping, holding him close. His free hand slid to splay fingers against the small of Nick's back, a too-familiar plea for friction.

Nick obeyed, rolling his hips, and the thin fabric of sweatpants and boxer provided very little buffer. They both stuttered out gasps, bodies tensing, Ellis' nails biting into his back and his scalp all at once.

Nick had tried cocaine, once. Just once. He'd been younger, then, and more prone to such things... or, at least, prone to the circles in which such things seemed inevitable. He'd tried it once, and the euphoria and wild, manic, orgasmic joy of it had terrified him. The crash of coming off it had been like a subtle death, a wilting, and he'd felt the edge of a sheer cliff just before him come sharply into focus.

He had known he'd never stop once he'd started. He was less, just by virtue of knowing the heights it had taken him and how far the drop back down had been, and he'd struggled to feel normal for weeks.

The power Ellis held over him should have terrified him, too, the intoxication of every noise, every squirm, every half-formed whimper that might've been a "Please" or an "I love you" or an "I forgive you" - it should have sent him running, fleeing, because he knew that in its inevitable absence he would never feel normal again.

Instead, he pressed onward.

As their mouths locked, the Northerner's hands dropped low, dipping thumbs underneath the bottom edge of Ellis' already-tangled undershirt. He pushed, palms settling to skate up and stroke at his ribs, soaking in the way Ellis shivered at the touch. He arched his back to press into it, desperate, and not even the painful lurch of what remained of the alcohol in Nick's system could stop a flutter of lust through him.

There was a moment where they disengaged, breaths hot between them, where they had the chance to stop. Their gazes locked, Nick's blurred and red and damp, Ellis' sharp and alert. There was an awareness between them, an unstated ultimatum.

In the face of it, Nick hesitated, body giving the subtlest sway as a wave of dizziness cut through the fog. Something cold twisted in his chest, a pain, and he struggled to piece together more than a few thoughts at once. What am I doing? What are we doing? This wasn't... supposed to... I didn't mean...

"I didn't..." he croaked, a shiver passing through him, just subtly.

"Nick." Ellis' voice was soft. So soft, he might've not heard it at all if his pulse had been pounding any louder in his ear. His eyes drifted back into focus, and he stared down at the Georgian, watched his mouth move. It had the faintest curl at the edges, so warm and soft. Trusting, and pleading for trust. "It's okay. 'M here. I got'cha."

Not enough. whispered that voice, as Nick pushed the undershirt up, forcing them to part just long enough to pull it entirely off. He could only watch as Ellis flopped back onto the bed, bruised and bare-chested and gorgeous, and lifted his arms up in a beckoning gesture.

Not enough.

Chapter End Notes

IMG SOURCED TO aghxst on Tumblr - DO NOT REPOST ELSEWHERE WITHOUT CREDIT
Chapter 281

Ellis couldn't stop himself from arching up off the mattress, his fingers clutched in the tangled sheets, a hushed whimper leaving his tightly pursed lips. Nick's mouth was hot and wet against the curve of his hip, tongue skating over a fresh bruise there and spooling up a deep ache... though that was not the only ache he felt.

It was hard to focus, with the older man's breath huffing against his navel, yet his head rang with it -

"I'm so fucking scared."

"I can't lose you, too."

"I need you."

It felt surreal. It felt, more than anything, like drowning. He'd waited so long to hear the words that the moment felt too fast and too rushed. He wanted to turn a dial and slow things down, reverse time, halt it entirely and spend a few moments suspended there together.

But Nick was... himself, and drunk, and there was a rhythm and a pattern between them that had not gotten any less comfortable since the last time they touched one another. As much as he wanted to talk, Nick was more vulnerable and scared than he'd ever seen him, delicate in a way that was almost frightening.

Was it such a price to pay to comfort him? Just for now?

"Oh, hell." the Georgian hummed, knees trembling to spread, though his legs were mostly trapped under Nick's weight. He bucked against the pinning pressure, and the other man's hand stroked up and into his boxers through the leg.

Nick's fingers rubbed into the crook of his hip and then over the fuzz of his pelvis, the edge of a hand only barely grazing the tip of his half-risen erection.

"Shit -"

The constraints of his boxers with Nick's arm trapped inside meant that every motion drew the seam taut along his midline, and the pressure against his stiffening cock made him squirm.

"So fuckin' sexy." Nick husked out, hoarse, lips and nose brushing against his belly and up to the soft, sucked-in divot just below his ribs. "How much did you think about me touchin' you again, huh? You go this long without jerking off, or did you sneak into the bathroom once or twice? You come thinkin' of this?" He punctuated the statement with another brush of his hand, rubbing the heel of his hand against the warm flesh perking up with every touch.

Ellis felt a throb of arousal and the harsh flutter of embarrassment that came along with it. The subtle slur to the conman's voice only made it feel filthier, somehow, along with the not-insignificant scent of alcohol. A pant left him, clenching his fists tighter in the blankets. "Quit talkin' like that." he gasped out. "I-I didn't ."

"No?" Lifting his head, Nick shifted his hand until he could wrap his fingers around the other man's length. The dry touch made Ellis jolt, teeth catching on his lower lip and toes curling. "Not even once? Didn't even think about it? Didn't wake up hard and think about ridin' me?"
He whimpered past the bite, eyes half-closing. "I-I thought about it." he admitted, and his honesty was rewarded with a firm squeeze, his eyes fluttering shut at the stimulation. "But I... guess it would'uh just made me..." He hesitated, and the other man's shoulders stiffened, and he might've not had the courage if it hadn't been for the state that Nick was in. "I couldn't."

Slowly, almost clumsily, Nick retracted his arm from its confines, and lifted onto his hands and knees. He crawled up Ellis' body, knuckles pressed into the mattress to balance his weight, until his hands were fisted beside either of the other man's shoulders and his knees were pinned against Ellis' hips. He stared down, eyes just a glint in the dark, and released a slightly choked laugh.

"I ruin you that bad?" he murmured, and there was something a little strained in it, the tone making Ellis' eyes snap open. However, he could see little from his shadowed position underneath the older man.

Tentatively, Ellis raised his hands, fingertips brushing up Nick's arms. He let them stroke over the man's shoulders, and settle into a loose loop behind his neck with their fingers laced together. "I ain't had no privacy, anyway, 'n'that ain't -" he started, but bit the inside of his cheek and tried again. "It ain't like that. Yer here now. That's all that matters, okay, Nick? You bein' here is all that matters. So quit worryin'."

The man seemed frozen, a tremble flickering through his frame, and the softest frown twitched at the corner of Ellis' mouth at his falter. With abrupt determination, he surged up, using his grip around Nick's shoulders and a jerk of one leg to flip the older man onto his back.

The startled "Tits -" from Nick as he was rolled and struck the mattress was tremendously satisfying.

Taking advantage of his momentary disorientation, Ellis shifted his body into a straddle on Nick's lap, a pleased shiver traveling up his spine as he settled down. He leaned forward, resting his elbows into the niches between Nick's arms and his chest, letting his face lower until his mouth brushed against the man's chest. "C'mon." he murmured, and the way he felt Nick's body shiver made his heart ache. "You trust me?"

He felt, for a moment, a gentle humour - Nick had said the words to him, once, but the tables had turned.

A faint snort said the Northerner did not miss it, either.

"Dumbshit." he hushed, and before Ellis could react, a hand gripped under his chin and pulled him up until their mouths bumped together. The kiss was softer, this time, slower, and Ellis couldn't help but let his body melt down and settle flat against Nick's. Warmth spread through him, along with the sting of threatening tears.

Then Nick's hand pushed, and he found himself broken from the kiss. The gambler licked at his own lips before flashing the smallest smile, and Christ if it wasn't that little stirringly handsome one that appeared sometimes when he was too tired to twist it into his usual smirk. "Lotion in the bathroom."

Heat rose to Ellis' face as he processed the statement over his initially foggy attention, eyes blinking in surprise before he averted them. "O-oh. Yeah. Uh..." Nick's smile turned a little sharper at his embarrassment - then faded when he shifted away. The Georgian crawled up just a pace until he could stretch an arm out and reach toward the slim-legged nightstand beside the bed.

"What are you -?" Nick muttered, voice cutting to quiet as Ellis pulled the drawer open. The Georgian had fallen to a distinct, hot flush by the time he scooted back down to sit on Nick's lap, right hand gripping the curved, oblong shape of the pump-topped lotion bottle.

It took Nick a moment to process. His eyes suddenly flickered wide, and before Ellis could do more than open his mouth, the older man had hooked a hand behind his neck. He pulled him down, teeth finding his jaw, biting along the soft curve of bone.

"Thought about it, huh? That's more than thinkin' about it." he hissed, between nips, his free hand sliding to stroke down Ellis' bare back with his nails, and the Southerner couldn't help but melt into the touches even as his cheeks burned. Nick's voice got huskier with every word, fingers tightening against Ellis' neck. "You just gonna touch yourself, or did you think about spreadin' yourself open? Sittin' on your hand, fuckin' desperate for it, moaning my name... you need it that bad?"

Ellis shivered, arching his spine softly as Nick's hand traveled lower, circling against his lower back. Shame dictated that he should argue, but his arousal was well-betrayed by the tightness across his boxers as his erection twitched eagerly. "N-Nick, Jesus." he huffed, tilting his head, urging Nick's mouth lower toward his throat. "How drunk're you...?"

He felt the Northerner hesitate before drifting his lips against the curve of Ellis' neck, and felt the tension rise in the way his fingers stilled. He wasn't sure if it was his statement, or something else, and he couldn't help but wonder at it... and certainly did not have the context of Nick's nightmare to parse out the reasons behind it.

"Are you sure -" he started, cut off when teeth scraped against his neck, suction bringing a wet heat to his skin.

It made him squirm, gasping out a breath, and the lotion bottle was twisted out of his grip. Without pulling his mouth all the way away from Ellis' neck, Nick held the bottle up and above the younger man's back, letting his other hand lift to twist the pump-top entirely off. "Shut up, kid. Fuck's sake." he mumbled into his skin. "Yeah."

He threw the top, the plastic thunking lightly against the carpeted floor a short distance away, and the next thing Ellis felt was the cold splatter of liquid against the small of his back - like Nick had just upended the open bottle over him and squeezed.

He stifled a yelp, jolting forward at the chilled sensation.

"Too much!" he protested, already feeling it start to leak like molasses down the dimple of his spine. One of Nick's hands darted to palm over the mess, and his fingers dipped under the waistband of Ellis' boxers, even as he snorted against Ellis' neck after the younger man hissed, "Shit damn, that's cold!"

"Whiny." Nick rasped, chiding, and affectionate.

Ellis had just enough time to brace before the teeth on his neck bit down, and Nick's slick hand stroked between his cheeks, smearing the lotion as he did so. It dribbled lower, even, a ticklish sensation that was shortly overwhelmed by Nick's middle finger stroking directly and firmly against the ring of muscle there.

The distraction of the cold trickling between his legs didn't stop it from sending a thrill up his spine. He couldn't help but buck his hips, leaning into the touch, and he snatched one hand to clutch at the sheets while the other darted to grab at Nick's bicep. He managed to stifle himself into just a faint moan of, "Oh, hell."
While it was better than nothing, the lotion wasn't exactly intended for the purpose. Not even Nick's much-too-liberal application could quite take the bite out of it when his fingertip pressed inside, and the slightest hiss left him as he sucked in air past his bitten lip.

Ellis reflexively leaned back onto it, eager to get through that familiar, initial discomfort. Before he could move much, though, Nick had retracted his hand. He let his head drop to the mattress, hair mussed by the gesture, sparing a strained frown up toward the other man.

He grunted, hoarse, "Don't let me - ... hurt you."

Ellis' heart could have broken right there at that soft pause, so loaded with gentle subtext - at the way his reddened eyes averted, almost in shame. Poor thing's a mess... Ain't never seen him like this. It'd be sweet if it weren't kinda scary. In that moment, Nick was a pendulum swinging perilously to and fro, grazing the tattered edges of a breakdown. If he's drunk now, whut's he gonna think tomorrow?

That question raised a more intimidating one: Am I... takin' advantage of him? Whut if he regrets all this when he sobers up?

They had, however, moved well beyond the point of no return. Ellis could not bring himself to consider turning the man away now, even if he'd been capable of it, and even if he'd thought it would do more good than harm. He felt starved of Nick's touch, starved of Nick's simple proximity. The yearning was a raw hunger, bone-deep, and he wasn't strong enough to deny it.

Whatever happened in the morning, they needed each other. He was more sure of that than he'd been in a long time - and one way or another, he'd convince Nick of the same.

Quickly, Ellis squirmed his hips, eagerly leaning down to brush his lips against Nick's, knees sliding wider apart as he did so. He felt the older man's body soften to him, a sigh escaping the man and one of his arms - lotion bottle still gripped in his hand - settling to loop around the Georgian's waist.

"S'okay. Promise." Ellis soothed. "Just go a li'l slower."

A mumbled affirmation left Nick, just before he lifted his chin to seal their mouths in a kiss. Ellis was the one to melt, then, flattening down onto his chest with a hum. The arm cradling his waist tightened, and he let a soft whimper escape him, deepening the kiss as Nick's fingers slipped back against him.

They circled, massaging, his motions turning into a rhythmic pattern that drew Ellis' boxers tight against his hipbones. The cold edge of a ring startled him at the apex of every stroke, excitement making his body tense and his heart rate spike just a little. He kept himself muffled, even as their kiss weakened to a simple press of their foreheads, and even as the rubbing pressure had his body reacting with gusto.

He bumped his hips forward, rocking into Nick's lap, an urgent noise leaving him. Nick responded by gripping tightly with his looped arm and pushing them into a roll, clumsily dragging Ellis flat onto his back. As the gambler's bodyweight flattened him against the mattress, he couldn't help but shudder.

The Georgian tried to hook his ankles behind Nick's thighs and urge him into a lazy grind - but the older man leaned back before he could. With space now between them, Nick twisted his hand to pry Ellis' boxers away from his body, dragging them roughly up his thighs. Any precise manipulation of them one-handed seemed to be a challenge, though, and Ellis readily lifted his hips and reached down to help push them down and off his legs.

Ellis tossed them blindly, relaxing back, now completely nude against the sheets. He might've shivered if his skin hadn't felt on fire - and he might've felt embarrassed, in any other moment. Nick was already intimately familiar with most all of him, of course, though that wasn't entirely the point.

He felt, for the first time, completely raw.

He had been vulnerable with Nick plenty of times before. Nudeness in and of itself, the act of sex, was vulnerable. He had been vulnerable with all of them, in fact; wasn't trusting his life in his teammates' hands the peak of such a thing?

This was different.

This was the first time it felt like all their cards were on the table.

There was a moment where Nick sat there, balanced on his knees, and looked down at him and across his body, and though it was too dark to quite see his eyes... there was a wistfulness, a longing, in the way his shoulders slumped. Raw and hoarse, he whispered, "Fuck. You're gorgeous."

Embarrassment did settle in, then, but it was a soft and pleasant thing that made his lips curve. Ellis let his legs settle against Nick's waist, squeezing with his knees and hooking his feet gently at the small of Nick's back. He couldn't help but bite his tongue as Nick dumped a splatter of lotion onto his palm, and then dropped the bottle to the side, smearing the cream between his hands.

Ellis had just enough time to open his mouth before the man made two simultaneous moves. One hand dove to take advantage of the cant of his hips and slip between his legs, the tip of his middle finger easing inside just an inch. The other hand pushed forward, slickly circling around his cock.

He expected, for the most part, how it usually worked: Nick would stretch him, stroking him just enough to keep his mind off any discomfort and get him desperate, make him beg a little. That was not what he got.

Immediately, the gambler's grip tightened, squeezing as he let his hand stroke up from base to tip. Warmed by his hand, the oily slickness gave just enough friction that Ellis squirmed, jaw slackening as he whimpered out a soft, "J-Jesus, God, please -"

The begging came anyway, it seemed.

A huffed chuckle left Nick, tilting his chin as if to get a better look down at the younger man. His upper body wobbled just softly, listing forward, and humour twisted in his voice as he slurred out, "Sweetheart, got my finger in your ass. You can call me Nick."

Ellis wished - wished, so much - that his heart didn't skip a beat.

"Shut up..." he groaned, letting his head fall back, eyes closing as Nick sunk his finger to the second knuckle. His legs tightened, cinching around the other man's waist, and felt his breath shallow as pleasure flooded up his spine, tension faltering throughout him. He wanted to relax and enjoy it, but an alarm clamoured in the back of his head. "Nick, you gotta - gotta slow down -"

Instead of obeying, Nick quickened his movements, fingers circling to a firm fist as he let his ring finger push gently to join the other. The stretch was painless; a thrilling fullness that made him push his knuckles against his mouth to muffle a shaky moan. They eased deeper, curling and
It had been far too long, and it felt far too good. At the rate Nick was going, Ellis would not last... and he wanted to last. He wanted, at least, to have Nick seated inside him before it happened. He wasn't sure how it all managed to be too much and entirely not enough.

"Nick, I can't - I don't wanna -"

Nick's hand lifted away from his swollen length, and past the urgent and animal disappointment, he allowed himself some relief. The cessation of touch did not stop the pleasure nudged up by the fingers inside him, but it did ease the spooling tension of oncoming orgasm. His erection throbbed, almost in protest, and his hips bucked against the fingers inside him in a desperate attempt to thrust onto them.

It was, perhaps, a wild attempt to provoke Nick into advancing. And an effective one, it seemed; he felt the intake of breath, Nick's sides gently expanding against his thighs, a hissed sound that might've been approval - and suddenly, a slick hand had his knee gripped by the side.

Ellis didn't have much leverage to fight, even if he'd wanted to. He could only gasp in air through his nose as Nick lifted the younger man's leg and let it drape over his shoulder, forcing the Georgian into more of a spread.

He had just a moment to glance over Nick's face, examine his features. He saw an odd brand of focused grit there, gilded with a vague consternation. He was holding back, or holding in, something, and Ellis wasn't sure what. The faint grin of dizzy humour was nowhere to be found.

Before he could formulate a thought on it, Nick moved.

To his conflicted pleasure and dismay, after they'd settled fully into the new position, Nick settled his hand back around the erection bobbing from the sudden jostle. He circled his fist around it, letting his thumb play over the tip, the calloused surface rough against the plush skin there. The new position gave him more room, and as suddenly as a second finger had entered him, a third slipped into place.

The lotion was already drying and absorbing in, and friction dragged at both motions. If anything, however, the subtle pull against his flesh brought the sensation into sharper focus, and he found himself writhing his spine against the mattress.

"O-oh -" he managed, voice pitching higher, and he reflexively crammed his fist against his mouth to force it shut. He braced himself, not even quite sure what he was bracing for.

Then Nick's fingers picked up a thrusting motion, leveraged with his thumb pressed into the crook of Ellis' hip. They almost slid out entirely before pushing back in, and the feeling of his body adjusting to the penetration only heightened the tumult of sensory overload rising up as the hand on his cock resumed its strokes, but faster, tighter -

Climax came abruptly, passing through him with such heat and warmth that it spilled all the way to the very edges of him, curling his toes and dragging a stifled cry, guttural against his knuckles. The snap of red-hot pleasure had his hips shuddering down to seat himself as far as he could onto Nick's fingers, riding out the pulses as his come puddled onto his stomach.

He was left panting and flushed... and just faintly disappointed, even as his body rung with the physical satisfaction.

There was still so much separating them; Nick hadn't even taken off his sweats. He wanted the wild abandon, the intertwining of their limbs, the union between them. He wanted to hear Nick fall to grunts in his ear. He wanted them both to lose themselves in it, and maybe find each other in the familiar closeness.

Before he'd even fully pieced himself back together, he squirmed his lower body, bent knee squeezing Nick's shoulder. "Don't stop - I - you can still - ... I need yuh, too, so, please - jus'..."

Instead, Nick pulled back. There was a measured slowness to the way he withdrew, gently pulling his fingers out, and shifted to let Ellis' leg drop to the bed from off his shoulder. The urge rose to reach out and grab for him, to reject his retraction, but before he could even think to act on it, the older man had slid back and stood up.

His heart ached, confusion and hurt threatening at him - until Nick bolted, and it all warped into thready concern.

"Nick?"

Ellis' body tried to fail him, but he forged through the wobbly collapse of his arms to thrust his elbows back and lean his upper body up, startled, eyes just tracking the Northerner as he moved across the floor. He did not, however, make for the door - instead, he was headed for the bathroom at an unsteady stagger.

The bathroom door was pushed shut behind the man, but did not completely latch, leaving the soft thud of some collision audible...

... as well as - soon after - the unmistakable sound of retching.

It took Ellis a solid few seconds to fully process what was happening. As his frame slumped and his body came down from that initial high of orgasm, his mind chugged sluggishly back to life.

"Whut the... hell...?" he muttered, uncertainly glancing down to wince at himself.

Sitting alone, covered in his own mess and with most of his rear and pelvis smeared with pasty-white lotion, felt more than a little uncomfortable. It brought things into abrupt and unflattering focus, and all the worries he'd kept at bay came flooding back in full-force, along with the unpleasant heat of shame.

It was, then, painfully clear: Nick was so drunk, he'd barely kept himself together long enough to go through the motions. And if that were true, if he was barely in control of his faculties, what did that say about either of them? Ellis hadn't noticed and hadn't stopped things. Would Nick stand behind his words in the morning? Worse - would he remember any of it?

Softly, quietly, he nursed a momentary pang in his chest. He allowed himself a moment of regret, and maybe just an ounce of anger.

"Lord. The hell am I doin'?" he sighed out, forcing himself into a slight roll. He dragged himself to his feet even as his legs threatened to give out, gasping in air to soothe the wave of discomfort that came with his movement. Powering through it, he didn't bother to locate his clothes, moving instead directly for the bathroom.

The idea of knocking occurred to him, but he discarded it. Nudging the door open let him peer inside, and he was not surprised to find Nick knelt on the ground, draped forward over the toilet.

His elbows were braced on either side of the bowl, hands cradling either side of his head as if to keep it aloft over the basin, breaths shallow and quick. He spat into the toilet, and the motion brought a shudder up his spine, like the beginning of a heave that he fought down.

A sigh slumped Ellis' shoulders, and he found himself mostly drained of anything but a vague sadness. Without speaking, he took a few careful steps forward, keeping a hand out and against the wall to balance himself. Nick's body tensed vaguely at his approach, but he did not break the silence, except for another half-hearted spit.

There was a towel draped over a rail bolted into the wall, and Ellis approached it, grabbing a fistful and yanking it free. He took a moment to clean himself, shakily, wiping clean his belly and blindly dragging it between his legs to bring himself to a level of decency.

He tried not to droop his head, tried not to feel the things that were clawing at him, not to feel used - because that wasn't fair. Nick was drunk and potentially ill, and even beyond that, hadn't even touched himself. He hadn't even undone his sweats. Only other time we've been intimate and he ain't - finished, was... Jerry.

His body stilled, and his head jerked back on his neck just a twitch. He frowned, softly, and found himself turning, soiled towel hung loosely in front of him. His gaze landed on Nick and found him unmoving, slumped bleakly over the toilet.

As if he felt the attention, Nick's hand lifted limply, visibly shaking, and dropped its weight against the toilet flush lever. The toilet began a fairly lazy flush, suction sending its contents cascading off and away, the water pressure middling and struggling. The noise was a low drone, almost a squeal, and it burbled unpleasantly as it began to settle.

Before it had quite quieted, Ellis hushed out, "Why'd you do this? Get drunk, come'n'find me. Why tuhnight?"

Nick's body shifted, and for a moment, Ellis thought it was a shrug and his only answer. Then, the Northerner spat again, shivering with the motion, and responded. "Bad dream." was all he said, and the mumbled slur to it sounded exhausted and small.

Frown deepening, Ellis cocked his head. He chewed on that for just a moment, but merely uttered, "Must'uh been some dream." He tossed the towel to the floor and crossed his arms over his chest, less in frustration and more in encroaching chill. "Nick... why didn't you say nothin'? Ain't exactly how I wanted it tuh go. I wouldn't've wanted tuh do nothin' if you were feelin' sick."

Simply, Nick thrust a shaky hand up, as if in bland indication. Duh, it said, like that were obvious.

He hadn't wanted Ellis to stop them.

His frown softened, then, and a sigh made his chin droop. He felt exhausted, and only some of that was the post-orgasm flagging of his strength. With a steeling of his jaw, he stepped closer, snatching up the bottle of mouthwash where it sat on the sink counter.

He cracked the top open, pouring a splash into the cap and offering it down toward the man knelt just a foot away. Nick's shoulders twitched, and he twisted his head, one reddened eye dimly looking over his bicep at the cup. A grunt made his body shift, and he forced himself up a few inches to grab it.

Ellis looked away as he did, glancing over the counter in front of him. There was a squat ceramic cup that seemed more intended to hold toothbrushes, but when he picked it up, it seemed fairly clean inside. He turned the faucet on, dipping the cup under it to fill it.

He kept quiet as Nick slugged back the mouthwash, swishing it between his cheeks and gargling it.
As the man spat it back out into the toilet, Ellis turned again, the cup of water now offered down.

"Drink." he stated, mildly satisfied when Nick silently obeyed, though he grimaced as he forced down a swallow of the tap water. As the man coughed, winced, and took another sip, Ellis shifted to set his hip against the edge of the sink counter. The cold laminated wood chilled at his bare skin, and he wished he'd thrown on his clothes, soiled or not.

His mouth opened, inhaling to talk, but Nick's quiet voice interrupted him.

"... sorry."

That hurt in a strange pang. A sigh drifted out of Ellis as he leaned forward, reaching to settle a hand under the Northerner's elbow. He gently lifted, trying to coax the man up off the tile. "Ain't no reason to apologize. Yer drunk, 'n' pukin' yer guts out was probably enough punishment, 'n'... I... should'uh known better."

That hurt, again, and he hadn't meant it to. He didn't feel used, he realized, but rather disappointed in himself; he'd fended off Nick's advances once, then doubted his actions, even though part of him knew it would've proven the man right. Given another chance, he'd given in... just like Nick had warned him he would.

Left in the wake of that, one single thought bounced around in the space of his skull: Is this gonna change anythin'?

Nick started to stand, gripping one hand onto the side of the toilet and the other onto the tank, but when he'd reached almost his full height, he faltered. His knees threatened to give, and Ellis wasted no time in sweeping forward to loop his arm under Nick's, gripping onto his side and pulling the Northerner tight to him. The older man grunted out a soft wheeze, but leaned into it all the same.

"C'mon, darlin'. Let's get you in bed, alright?" he mumbled, and Nick's stiffening didn't stop him from being whisked into a staggered walk back to the bedroom.

Nick didn't fight, but he also didn't say a word. His eyes struggled to stay open as they walked across the carpet, as if all his strength had drained and he might simply collapse. He was pliable, almost, as Ellis pushed him into the queen-size bed and nudged his limbs into something vaguely comfortable, then dragged the covers over him, careful to avoid the quadrant they'd made a mess of.

He wanted to brusquely find his clothes and leave, but he couldn't, not immediately. He lingered, taking a moment to smooth his palm over Nick's forehead, like he were brushing his hair into place. He was sweaty from the exertion of their dalliance - and the resulting bout of nausea - but not hot or clammy. He did not seem feverish.

The Northerner leaned away with a vague sound of protest, muttering up at him, slur thickened as he pressed into the pillow. "Fuckin' leave me to die."

A frown lingered at Ellis' lips, and he cocked his head down at the older man. It would've been the smart thing to do to leave, to not worsen what was already a confusing situation. He should've given Nick the opportunity to sober up, to feel a little better, so they could talk on more even terms. Maybe things would seem clearer in the morning.

Instead, he leaned forward, bending until he could press a kiss against the side of Nick's head. He felt distantly relieved when Nick did not make an effort to shift away again.

"I know it don't fix nothin', 'n'... I don't think it's a good idea, talkin' while yer drunk. But I... missed you." Ellis nuzzled into the space behind the man's ear, huffing out a sigh. "Whatever you wanna say in the mornin', you remember this: I wouldn't take any'uv it back. Not before. Not you. Not this."

Nick's face buried against the pillow, a vague inhale making his shoulders rise as he clumsily shoved a hand toward his head, bringing the blankets with it as if in a half-hearted attempt to cover himself entirely. Ellis smiled, just a little, fondness creeping up at the childish move to hide.

_I still love you._ he wanted to say, say it again, keep saying it until Nick realized it was true and immutable and bigger than either of them. He wanted to pour it out and into his lover, fill the parts of Nick that were so clearly empty, warm the parts of him that were so clearly cold. He wanted to drown them both in it until they learned to breathe it like air.

He whispered, "Night, sugar."

The Northerner didn't respond, and, pressing another kiss against his ruffled hair, Ellis straightened. He gathered his clothes, tossing on his boxers and undershirt and carrying the rest in his arms. He tried to move quickly, quietly, lest he rethink his actions.

If he'd crawled into bed, would Nick have welcomed him? Would they inevitably gravitate into each other's arms, curl tightly together in their sleep, as Nick had a tendency to? Would they wake up and hide there, safe in the protection of sheets and pillows, and finally - _finally_ - speak the same language? Would something change for the better in that tender place?

He left, and he was not so proud as to not admit it was driven by some brand of fear.

The answer to any of those questions might have been no.
Chapter 282

With Christophe on watch, Ellis was nervous to make his way downstairs. He'd slipped into the hallway bathroom, quietly wetting a washcloth under the tap to clean himself up a bit more thoroughly, checking himself over for any obvious signs of Nick's affections.

There were a few marks, a soft bruising at his hip and just beside his jugular, but they were barely of note beyond the normal bruising and wear on his body. If he didn't draw attention to himself, it was unlikely anyone would think twice. He was fairly sure they'd been quiet, but with as difficult as it had been to stifle himself, the fear remained.

He wanted to laugh, a little. Suddenly I'm the one panickin' 'bout us gettin' caught.

Then the urge to laugh faded.

... aw, man. Coach'n'Ro' are gonna be disappointed in me, ain't they?

It would complicate things, and the last thing he wanted - the last thing either of them needed - was more complication. He was already unsure of how he'd navigate the morning, and adding on the team's assorted opinions wouldn't help... especially when he knew what some of them would be. The sisters remaining in the dark was a given, but even the others knowing would make things difficult.

It ain't like... things're fixed. I know he was drunk and I know we shouldn't'uh done that. I know I... shouldn't'uh. But this didn't mean nothin'. I know Nick better'n he thinks I do; him comin' at me drunk like that, cryin', didn't mean nothin'. I just gotta convince him it'll be okay, no matter how embarrassed he is in the mornin'.

For better or worse, he needed to handle the situation carefully - so, when he finally made his way downstairs, it was with extreme care.

Christophe was laying on the floor, sprawled out, his arm bent up so he could reach and settle his hand on his stumped shoulder. His digits dug in, curled, massaging into the muscle around his collarbone. He'd clearly turned his head to pay attention to the approach of footsteps, but he hadn't halted the motion of his fingers.

He didn't speak, a slim brow arching up as he watched the Georgian step through the dining room. Ellis wasn't sure how long he'd been on watch, but it was clear enough from his expression that he wasn't expecting to be traded with yet.

With that excuse stolen from him, Ellis settled on a tired smile and a shrug, and a lie. "Li'l weird bein' alone. Thought I'd come'n'settle down here." It was easy enough to feign tiredness when he didn't have to feign it at all; Nick had wrung him out in more ways than one.

The foreigner did not immediately seem to accept the statement, but he did not argue, either. His eyes drifted away, and Ellis took advantage of the silence to shuffle into the living room and crawl unceremoniously onto the couch. He grimaced as he bent and moved his knees and hips in the motion, flopping flat on his belly.

Judging by the pangs already starting in areas he'd rather not think about, there would be several things to regret in the morning.

Fortunately, Christophe made no effort to pry, and no effort to draw closer. He was likely lost in his own thoughts, or simply cued into whatever subtle-or-otherwise indications Ellis was giving that he didn't want to talk. Whether or not that clashed with his explanation for his appearance either did not register, or Chris merely let it go.

If Ellis had been a little less caught up in the moment and averse to drawing attention to himself, he might have worried about the man. He might have at least noticed the way Chris' breathing was so even and slow as to seem laboriously intentional. As it was - and not out of apathy, certainly - he didn't notice.

The Spaniard, for his part, made no effort to be noticed.

Sleep came quicker than he'd have expected or even desired. He wanted to sit and stew on the night's events, and prepare himself for the next morning. He wanted to put together his words and rally his strength for the task ahead. It felt like he had a war to wage against whatever defenses Nick could summon in the meantime, and their relationship was on the line.

He needed to be ready to argue, to convince, to comfort and reassure. He needed to be stronger than he'd ever been, and strong enough to hold both of them up - even if Nick was determined to refuse his help. He needed to make good on his promise: Ain't givin' up on you.

He was exhausted, though, and it felt like his head hadn't so much as settled down onto the sofa cushion before consciousness escaped him. It was less like sleep and more like a clumsy passing out, and the darkness that gripped him and pulled him under did not feel soft and gentle.

It felt cold, and in it, he felt lost.

He'd dreamt of plenty things over the nights they'd spent holed up. He'd had frightening nightmares of teeth and bone and blood. He'd dreamt of fighting his way through an endless sea of bodies, slashing and striking and tearing, only to realize that they were not infected at all.

He'd dreamt of that pile of corpses in the diner, of the tiny limbs gone pale and blue-green with bloat. Sometimes Keith's littler brother, Riley, would be among them.

But, most often, he dreamt of home; either some mundane moment in time or well-worn favourite place, with his mother and Keith never far away. Sometimes he dreamt of his father, who sat stiffly in his memory. He was made of charcoal - only uncomfortably sketched out from what photos he'd seen, his voice gravel and static on the few VHS home movies they had taken.

Ellis had always wished for more scraps, more videos, more glimpses of him. But his father had died before he was barely three, and most of that last year, he'd been in the hospital. Cancer had eaten him whole, sucked the life from him in weeks. He supposed there was a blessing in the fact that he had no memories of his father wilting and dying, even if the few second-hand after-images Ellis did have felt sometimes inadequate.

The dream that consumed him, then, seemed more like a memory than it had any right to. It was simple, and faded, and so painfully detached it almost frustrated him: he stood at the entrance to the kitchen of his family home, unable or unwilling to move. Beside the rusted-out sink, his father loomed, unable or unwilling to look back at him.

His arms moved, just barely, and with every shift of his bicep came the snap and rattle of a vegetable peeler. Beside him, messily-peeled carrots and potatoes laid in a clumsy pile, growing ever larger, just-glistening with the soft sweat of their exposed insides.

It felt wrong.
Something was wrong.

In the yawning darkness of sleep, he felt terribly alone, before even the vaguery of the dream winked out into nothing.

Time surely passed, but the distance between the moment he'd closed his eyes and the moment he'd opened them again seemed thin. When he awoke he felt like he hadn't slept at all, all the same exhaustions like pins through his joints.

The faint uncertainty that flooded him in the drifting moments of stirring was only exponentially increased by the nonsense of Chris' native language. His brain processed it, quickly, and he blinked his eyes open as reality came uncomfortably into focus.

"¿Y tú quién eres, linda? ¿Qué te trae aquí?"

It was too far away to be directed at him, though, so he did not hurry himself to stirring.

He ached. Even just shifting his legs hurt, and there was an odd itchiness between his thighs that confused him right before he thought, Aw, hell. Feels all funny up in my nethers... lotion sucks. 'N'I thought goin' dry was the worst.

Rolling onto his back, he inhaled sharply, crinkling his brow and rubbing at his eyes. He wasn't sure precisely when Nick had woken him so he wasn't sure how much rest he'd gotten afterwards, but when he peeked around himself, he noticed only hints of blushing sunlight filtering in through the blocked-up front windows. The desire to sleep more was, however, tempered by the desire to be awake and alert well before Nick.

"Tengo suerte de tenerte. Y tú tienes suerte de tener a tal semental a tu disposición."

Regardless of his intentions, Chris' continued utterances ensured he wouldn't find rest, and the sound of Rochelle's faint giggling made his head lift up off the couch cushions. She sounded... happy, in a way he couldn't remember hearing in a long time. It shook him out of the last vestiges of sleep and made him pay more attention.

"Jesus, Chris, I can't tell if I should be smacking you or kissing you when you get going like that. Just because I can't understand you doesn't mean I can't see that... look on your face."

"¿Qué? ¿Este?"

He must've pulled some sort of expression, because she started laughing, and the sound made Ellis smile before he could stop himself. He shifted to lift his torso, a grimace fighting against the curl of his lips, and peeked his head up and over the countertop bar that the couch was snuggled against.

Chris had Rochelle half-heartedly trapped between him and the kitchen sink, his palm braced against the edge of the counter. They were not quite touching, a safe distance maintained between their bodies, but his head was leaned in close as if to catch her in a kiss.

However, when Rochelle's eyes caught on Ellis' head poked up over the kitchen bar, her head cocked away. "Voyeur." she accused, grabbing Chris' wrist to pull his hand up off the counter. "You could've told me we had a guest." Her fingers slid to lace with his once he'd relented and shifted his weight out of his lean, and she darted to the center of the kitchen with his hand gripped tight.

He didn't look particularly disappointed, trailing after her with a dazed smile, while her attention was locked squarely on Ellis.
"What are you doing down here, sweetie? Was the master too fancy for you?"

Ellis should've been prepared with excuses, but he had none of any substance. Her concern made him feel... guilty, strangely, knowing how angry she'd be with him if she knew the truth. Uneasily, he crinkled his brow and repeated the lie he'd told to Chris. "Just felt lonely. We ain't slept like... alone fer real, in a while."

He must've sold it, because she laughed out in a gentle huff and nodded. "Yeah. I got sorta nervous, too. It's weird not hearing at least one person breathing a few feet away. We're gonna end up like a pack of dogs with separation anxiety, huh?"

Chris tilted his head, breaking his gaze away to glance at Ellis. "It is good you came down, instead of being alone up there." he stated, simply, with the vaguest curl to his lips. It was pleased - too much so.

He knew.

He knew, like he'd known they were together in the first place. He'd put the pieces together, or maybe he'd even snuck upstairs and peeked in to find Nick missing. Maybe he'd simply heard them, awake on watch. However he'd managed it, he knew.

There was a flicker of humour in his expression, like it was something to laugh at. It was the first time in a long time that Ellis was driven to think back to the far-off, long-dead version of the man, another wolfish grin among a line of cruel strangers. His heart sunk just a little, injured, and he withdrew with a flinch.

Christophe noticed, and as suddenly as it had appeared, his amusement was replaced with a pinched look of pain. He cleared his throat, wetting his lips, and shrugged. "Pues... bonita, I think we were doing something, ¿sí?"

Rochelle hadn't entirely missed the scattered signs of something amiss, but she caught the tail end of the wrong pieces. Her confusion swiveled to Chris, who managed a clueless smile - and by the time she looked back at Ellis, he'd leaned his head down in a partially-feigned yawn.

Her eyes narrowed, though she nodded and did not seem overly concerned. "Yeah, looking for breakfast." She did withdraw, taking just a moment to press a kiss on the Spaniard's cheek before she released her grip on his hand and backed away. "I'll go start kicking everyone awake. You guys poke around... I know there was some cereal in the cabinets."

Ellis lifted his head enough to watch her walk toward the room on the far side of the first floor where the bikers had slept, his mouth screwing into an uncomfortable purse. He was now two losses deep; Chris knew and Rochelle sensed trouble. Think I might be bad at this.

He had every intention of avoiding conflict, but any plan to do so was waylaid when Christophe dropped to settle his rear against the arm of the sofa, face drawn in a vague grimace.

"Discúlpame. I did not mean to."

Quickly, Ellis lifted both his hands, waving to try and silence him. "Uh... man, it's... fine." With a wary glance passed down the length of the house, he quieted his voice to a mutter, watching Rochelle mostly disappear down the hallway. "How'd you know? Was it too loud, or -"

Christophe seemed hesitant at first, but despite a strangled attempt to keep it restrained, that humor sparked back in his eyes. He leaned forward in a way that was more submissive than an active effort at quiet, and whispered low, "I have a brain, tío. I... em... arropar a..." Frustration made him jerkily rearrange his words. "I put him in the bed, ¿sí? When you come down here, I go check, y... he is where you were. You know, it smells, too."

That made Ellis choke, scrambling an inch or two back on the sofa, as if to get distance between them. "Oh, Lord." he muttered, concerned at the implications. He wasn't exactly thrilled with the idea of reeking of sex, and especially not when he was trying to conceal the night's events entirely. "It's that bad?"

"You both smell like... hm." Chris shrugged, waving his hand lightly. "Dulce. O un pastel."

Lowering his chin, Ellis gave a hesitant sniff near his chest, and couldn't miss the definitive smell of vanilla. His face scrunched, and he pushed his hands to tuck under his armpits in a self-hug.

"Jeez, Chris, it ain't funny. Why'd you gotta go pokin' around?"

The Spaniard's face fell to a grin, and he cocked his head. "So you two are...?" His hand lifted up, circling his index finger and thumb, and only belatedly seemed to realize he couldn't complete the rude gesture. His consternation only lasted a moment before he tried - and failed - to curl his pinky enough to poke it through the ring made by his other digits. " Fucking, ¿sí?"

Ellis scrambled to grab at his wrist and push his arm down, releasing a blustered, "Shh! It ain't -"

Scuffled footsteps preceded Rochelle's return, and Rhiannon was close behind. The blonde had a blanket wrapped up around her shoulders like a shawl, and her fingers were clutched in it, drawing it tight and up against her jawline. Grimacing out from it with a scowl, her eyes darted toward the two men now frozen on the couch, taking in Ellis' barely-dressed state in his shirt and boxers.

She narrowed her gaze - then blinked.

"You fuckers jerking each other off or what?"

Ellis pulled back, releasing a strained sigh, and shot Christophe a look that flickered between plea and warning. Don't tell. it said, and Chris' eyes softened into affirmation. The Georgian promptly shrugged, dropping his gaze furtively toward his lap. "Mornin', Rhee." he offered up, blandly.

His attempt at avoiding notice only garnered him more, as Rhiannon swiveled on her heel to face them entirely. Her head cocked, stalking a few steps closer. Genuine concern tinted at her voice when she prompted, "You okay, dude? You look like shit. Didn't you get the best bunk?"

It was, he realized, a strange degree of comforting: it hadn't taken even a half-hour for most of his team to cue into the fact that something was wrong, and he might've been glad for it if it hadn't been completely counter to what he'd wanted.

He winced, turning to slip his legs off the couch. "'M fine, sorry."

The morning was already not going according to plan, and he needed to ensure no one saw Nick before he had a chance to, considering the likelihood of the man being fully recovered was slim. "I'll go wake up everyone else." he murmured, quickly averting his gaze when Rochelle quirked a brow at him.

His left foot touched carpet, and he shifted to settle his right foot down beside it - only for his heel to land on something rigid, an uncomfortable point digging into the arch of it. He lurched reflexively to lift it, flinching away from the painful pressure, and gave a startled glance toward the ground.

There, nestled against the carpet, was the slim black notebook they'd been passing around. And peeking demurely out from the binding was the slim marker they'd been using, uncapped.

The notebook everyone had signed except Nick.

Ellis didn't know, precisely, but he felt it like a spark of tender hope, his brow softening, his lips half-parting. He'd been consumed by so much uncertainty in the face of the night before that for a moment, this was almost like breaching the surface of some vast pool of water. He inhaled, and it came to him in a daze. He put his stuff in it.

Giddiness flared in him, suddenly, because that felt so much more concrete than drunken words and the hot press of a mouth against his in the dark. In the plain light of day, it felt like proof. Nick - drunk or not - putting a pen to paper and committing himself to them? Writing out a few scraps of himself and leaving them there for Ellis to find?

"Here, take it. Take me. No matter what happens."

Nick had shown him his driver's license, once, and it had felt like a tender concession. This was a confession, in stark black ink.

He bent down and found his fingers trembling as he scooped the notebook up. He was faintly aware of Rochelle saying his name, curiously, but it came to him as buzzing static. His thumb slid to crack open the journal, finding first the familiar hands of Rochelle, Coach, and himself. Next, Christophe's, his one-handed clumsiness etched out in ink.

His thumb pulled the page, feeling it fold under his fingertip before it slid to bare the next. His eyes traced the text there, and simply, gently, his heart sank low in his chest, crushing his diaphragm until he could hardly breathe.

It was a confession, after all. Just not the kind he expected.

Rochelle approached, her head cocking, watching him stare down at the journal in his hands. Her lips curled downward, torn between confusion and worry, and she reached a hand out to rest her palm against Christophe's hip. He glanced at her, but she did not return the look.

"Ellis?" she prompted, softly. "What's wrong?"

His head bowed, just an inch, and he said nothing. There was a frown starting to encroach on his face, slowly, and she wasn't sure she'd ever seen him sour so. His shoulders wilted low, his eyes dimmed and lowered, and for a moment, she thought he might start to cry.

Then his jaw tightened. Then, harsh, he bit his tongue.

As quickly as she'd identified sadness, anger rose instead. The journal dropped from his hands, and before it had even struck the sofa and settled there, he was moving. He barely dodged striking into Chris, rushing past and into the dining room, breaking into almost a run as he went thundering up the stairs.

"Ellis? Ellis!"

She almost started after him, but Christophe grabbed out, hooking his hand on her elbow. She forced herself to stop, scattering a startled look toward the foreigner, and found him nodding solemnly toward the couch.

Rochelle looked, despite the tingling desperation in her spine to run upstairs in Ellis' footsteps, and found her gaze drawn toward that black notebook.
Agitation made her fists clench, and she slipped gently out of his grip, crossing around the end of the sofa to draw near. She bent down, scooping it up, and flipped the cover open to let it fall to the second page.

There, tucked neatly in its own little section, lay an entry only partially familiar.

```
Nicolas I. Tobias
Rhiannon Victoria Thompson
Eleanor Bethany Thompson
182 Co Road 235
Haskell, Tx 79521
```

Rochelle stared down at it, unmoving, only barely registering the soft slide of Chris' arm encircling her shoulders. He gazed at the journal for a moment... then, softly, pressed a kiss to her ear. It was a soothing gesture, and one that she took with closed eyes.

Reopening them, she calmly lifted her gaze toward Rhiannon, now finding Lena somewhat nervously standing behind her, hazel eyes wide and expression tight with concern. They looked remarkably like the day they'd met - or, in Rhiannon's case, the second day.

Rochelle turned the journal around, facing the text outward, feeling anger tighten her features.

"What the fuck is going on?"
Nick liked to say he wasn't one for regrets.

It was true primarily in the sense that he didn't let them affect his actions, and that he quarantined them well out of reach, saving them for the less-than-rare occasions he felt like letting them run wild in a masochistic kind of purge. It was true, too, that he generally limited his dalliance with the emotion as it related to the things that truly mattered.

Thus, it was very easy to regret his alcohol intake when he drifted to a very painful consciousness... and much harder to look into the blinding regret that surrounded just about everything else.

Fortunately, the skull-splitting pain helped keep his mind off things.

"Oh, Jesus, fuck." he stated, just a groaned huff, and even the act of talking felt like too much reverberation for his brain. His tongue practically stuck to his teeth with how dry his mouth was, cotton rubbing against sandpaper, and he coughed to dispel the sensation that he might choke on it.

That hurt worse, and stirred an awful flavour in the back of his mouth. Tastes like I vomited a pack of Thin Mints. He remembered, vaguely and yet quite viscerally, gargling mouthwash before collapsing in bed. He should've known that wouldn't be enough to soften his eventual landing in a hangover, but he remembered barely being steady enough to stand, let alone to try and brush his teeth.

He remembered a lot of other things, too.

"Fuck..."

Nick eagerly desired to push it far, far into the back of his head, bury it and never look back - but the fraction of his brain that wasn't waterlogged and pulsing managed a cogent point: You fucked your chances of keeping a lid on things, buddy. Literally.

A groan left him. And then puked your guts out in front of him.

Slowly, as if moving might break something that was already fractured almost beyond repair, Nick tried to roll his body onto its side. The shift in gravity made his stomach lurch, and he gritted his teeth against the spike of nausea that followed.

The sound that escaped him was a whimper, and he cracked his eyes open to look out and into the bedroom, forcing a few breaths in through his nose. He wasn't quite sure how much of the pounding in his skull was the hangover and how much of it was rising anxiety, but he figured the difference was irrelevant.

Subtly, distantly, he wished he hadn't finished off the vodka bottle downstairs.

Reaching his arm to push the blankets off him, Nick found his hand brushing a familiar, warm softness. He didn't waste any time before sinking his fingers in Maggie's fur, pressing against her, bone and fur tight against his palm.

She shifted fractionally closer at his touch, and he felt her dry nose graze at his wrist, then the heel of his hand. Her snout found its way to his knuckles, and the faintest set of licks started against his skin. Her tongue was strangely hot as she gently lapped at his thumb, teeth prodding here and there.
The affection didn't salve his wounds or his situation, but he soaked it in all the same.

Jesus Christ. As if things couldn't get worse - Jesus. I remember about sixty-percent of the shit I said to him, and I'm fucking praying that's the worse portion.

He'd said it. Not quite a confession of love - that much, he'd never given to anyone, not without taking from them in equal measure - but something that felt harder to admit: "I need you." It had only taken one of the worst nightmares he'd had in a long time, and half a bottle of vodka, to get the words out of him.

I need him, and I'm not sure how to go back to forgetting what that feels like.

Love was more manageable, in a way. It was the strange twin to lust, something he could direct and misdirect. A little booze, a long night in a strange bar, a bit of pain to distract him from it all, and he'd forget. Burying himself into someone else's body helped the two feelings muddle together until he forgot the difference.

But this was different. Ellis was different, and the messy, clumsy thing between them was different. He'd tried - tried - to forget how it all felt, to move on, and nothing helped.

Ellis had snuck past his defenses in the dead of night, crept in like slow fog or a gentle tide, and ate away at something in him. Gnawed, like termites, shattering and fracturing. But where, once, he'd thought of it as a simple weakening, a structural failing the man's touch had caused him... he was starting to think that Ellis had ripped and torn and dug out the bad parts of him.

That was not, however, the frightening part of it all - no, that was something far worse, and far simpler.

He didn't know what was left.

Was there a good man hidden in him? Was there something worth saving, or worth loving? If he pried away his skin and dug down to his bones, was there a single piece of him worth what Ellis offered him? Worse, after scouring him down to raw nerves, he wasn't sure Ellis had left him anything to survive off of. Was the hollow feeling in his chest all he'd ever feel, now?

There was a dread in him that had driven sense and logic far underground, a tingle of fear that he couldn't explain. He was afraid in an awful, animal way; it was the sort of fear that made one unrecognizable, unfamiliar, even to oneself. He knew that fear all too well. He had been on either end of it before.

This time, it had started that night on the balcony, smoking a cigarette under a crystal-clear sky and a bright moon with a drop-dead gorgeous man who loved him.

He knew, at least, that he deserved the hot, pulsing agony burning along the seams of his skull. He also knew that no amount of misery and self-pity would ease the pressure clenched around his bladder, and so, lifting his fingers to scratch his cat's brow, he moved.

Getting to his feet felt like slogging through mud. Every tilt and shift of his body made his breathing veer awfully close to a retch, and he could do little to stifle the groan that escaped him. He felt, at best, half-dead.

Staggering upright, wobbling more than a little on his heels, Nick started the less-than-easy walk toward the bathroom. The door seemed to move before him, coyly, not quite in the same place any two times he blinked his eyes at it. He found his way inside with a trepidatiously extended hand, trusting his fingertips bumping into wall and doorframe to guide him more than his depth perception.

It only took one misstep, one near-fall that he barely saved himself from with a hand to the bathroom counter, for him to determine that sitting down was likely the safer option.

There, for just a moment, he sat on the toilet with his sweats around his ankles and his face pressed into his palms as if to hide. Relief came in time to a wave of tired shame, and he breathed out warmly against his wrists.

This might be rock bottom, he thought, wryly. Here I was thinking I got there a few weeks ago. Not one to be outdone, huh, Nick?

Alcohol had seemed like a good idea at the time; numb the pain and put himself to sleep at the same time. It was a fickle friend of his, and seemed to delight in tormenting him as often as it saved him. Often, whatever relief it offered didn't compare to the mess he was left with.

The fuck am I gonna say now? Fuck am I supposed to do when the kid can't leave me alone, and I can't leave him alone? He sighed, closing his eyes and leaning harder against his palms. Why didn't I try to seal the deal with Lena? Why'd I let her run me around like that? Get me drunk, pull out a little sob story... Jesus, that's my fuckin' move, and she didn't even do it to fuck me.

He was suddenly thinking that he'd miscalculated which of the sisters was the dangerous one.

Grabbing onto the edge of the counter with one hand and yanking his sweats up with the other, Nick dragged himself back to his feet, coming to a shaky halt in front of the sink. He did not look at himself in the mirror, tying his sweats tighter around his hips before hunching forward to nudge the tap on and run his hands under it.

After a quick scrub, he let water pool in his palms, dropping his head low so he could splash it into his face. The cold made him gasp in a sharp breath, blinking through the blur of water in his eyes. He lowered the tap to a trickle and stood there a moment.

Maggie leapt up into the counter, crouching down into the basin, greedily shoving her face under the faucet to start lapping up water. She did not seem bothered when the water dampened her front paws and spilled over her cheek.

He watched her, making a sluggish mental note to take better care of the scrawny feline.

Yeah. Rock bottom.

He hadn't gotten enough of tempting fate, it seemed, because the door to the bedroom flung open with enough force to strike the wall. It made him jump, startled, and he grabbed for Maggie, reflexively trying to pull her close. Before he could, she was gone, tearing across the bedroom to hide under the bed.

For an instant, his brain tried sluggishly to determine whether or not there was a weapon in close proximity. Had he seen Ellis' shotgun in the room last night? Would he even be able to reach it before whatever was invading the room reached him? Was he strong and coordinated enough to swing around the porcelain lid of the toilet's tank?

He didn't have time to act on either of those thoughts before Ellis came into view - no, stormed. His hangover didn't impede his ability to see, immediately, that the younger man was trembling with anger. It was more familiar of a sight than Nick had ever wanted it to be.

His nearness was soothing, his presence a relief, and his fury was a minor detail.

Maybe I just want to keep fucking things up so he won't leave me alone. Maybe I don't want him to. Maybe if we just stay here, stay fucked up, stay halfway to nowhere, I never have to lose him and I never have to give him anymore than I already have.

Looking at Ellis, water still trickling down his face and down his neck and dampening his hairline, Nick was tempted to laugh. It was hard to take the younger man seriously, standing there in his boxers and grey undershirt, hair mussed and body toned and gorgeous.

Don't you fucking realize I don't have anything left?

"Nick, I ain't never asked you fer much." Ellis' voice trembled, too, and he suddenly lifted his hands to rub fingertips against his browline as if to massage his forehead - and, maybe, hide his face behind his palms. "Let you do whut you was gonna do, fer a long while. Ain't done nothin' but cared fer you. Kept us a secret best I could, even when it hurt me, even when we wasn't together no more."

Nick lifted his chin, trying not to let the pain coursing through his body show. He gritted his jaw to fend off a sigh, eyes drifting low. He wished there was anything but listless exhaustion in his voice, wished the words he spoke didn't sound like cardboard. "Look, kid, last night was -"

"Don't you dare." burst out of him, and abruptly, Ellis' hands were down and clenched in fists, teeth practically bared. "You say, one more goddamn time, I'm a mistake, I will lay you the hell out."

Shock made Nick stiffen, eyes widening, and he took a half-step back. He didn't choose, precisely, to go silent, but his throat closed up of its own volition. He was not used to Ellis facing him with such rage. Did a number on him this time.

In the moment that followed, Ellis took in a harsh breath, chest expanding as he held it. His eyes shut just gently, his exhale shaky, his shoulders lowering as he managed to pull himself into a tight coil of controlled emotion. When his eyes reopened, his expression had stiffened to a calmer sort of fury.

It was, simply, frightening.

"I wanna think you didn't do it tuh hurt me." His voice was a whisper, shooting a chill up Nick's spine. His eyes averted as shame tapped against the back of his skull. "'Cause I wanna give yuh the - I wanna think you were just too drunk tuh think straight, that you were really scared, 'n you'll tell me you meant it. You meant whut you said, 'n' we can just... quit fightin', quit -"

Ellis bit his lower lip, silencing himself, eyes ticking to trace Nick's form in one slow pass. He hesitated, and a faint disappointment in the way his chin dropped said part of him knew he was wrong. For the first time the Northerner could remember, there was no stubborn disbelief in his eyes, no agitated conviction that he could make the man see sense.

That hurt - mostly because, as much as Nick wished it weren't so... he had meant every word, even the ones he shouldn't have said.

Softly, bitterly, Ellis asked, "You're leavin'?"

It took Nick longer than he'd have liked to admit. He knew, instantly, what the question meant, but his brain chugged and struggled against how Ellis knew. His immediate instinct was to search his memories of the previous night, aiming strictly for the parts he remembered least.

"They asked us tuh go, 'n'I didn't think nothin'uv it, but... they asked you, too, didn't they?" Ellis' jaw flinched with the force that he gritted it, a harshness twisting at his inflection. "Only you're gonna go. Yer plannin' tuh leave."

Then he remembered.

"Fuck." escaped him in a burst of air, head dropping to hang low. The decision to put his name down in the journal beside the sisters' felt far-away, and he couldn't remember more than the vague concept of it, couldn't even remember whether or not he'd considered the consequences in the moment. Jesus fuck. The fuck was I thinking?

Suddenly, Ellis thrust his arms up. When Nick forced a glance up, he found the Georgian's eyes boring into his, anger and some distant embarrassment inlaid there. "You didn't think I should know that before you came in here last night?"

Footsteps started up the stairs, and he flinched, taking a step forward to place himself in the doorway of the bathroom. He glanced over, gaze latching on the door to the bedroom. "Does everyone know?" left him in a hiss, panicked, and Ellis let out a growled sigh.

The younger man didn't respond at first, just turned and walked to the bed, sitting down on the corner of it and hunching forward. He pressed his palms against his temples, rubbing there.

"Goddamnit, Nick. Why, after all this time, you ain't scared'uh zombies half as much as you're scared'uv us?"

Nick found himself deflated, gaze turning back toward the Georgian, taking in the defeat in his posture. He looked tired more than anything, and Nick had never felt like such a disappointment.

Softly, quietly, he stepped back to rest his hip against the edge of the dresser standing against the wall. His hands settled against his thighs, and he closed his eyes, surrendering to the dull pain in his chest. He regretted it. He regretted everything.

The list of things he regretted stretched on and on, piling high, and what could he do but let it drown him?

"You have exactly five seconds." Rochelle's voice was not what he wanted to hear at that moment, and it came roaring into focus as the approaching footsteps thundered down the hall and into the bedroom. "At the end of those five seconds, I'm gonna beat your ass. You are welcome to explain why I'm beating your ass to me, but it's happening either way."

He didn't open his eyes, at first - not until something struck him. He reflexively darted up a hand to grab for it, finding himself slapping the black notebook to his own chest, barely catching it there. Realizing belatedly that she'd thrown it at him, Nick forced his mouth into a vague scowl.

"Ro' -" he tried, but she was suddenly marching toward him, and he was forced to raise his arm and fend off a blow. It was more of a smack than anything intended to hurt, but he wasn't going to take it silently. "Fuck's sake!"

"Don't 'fuck's sake' me, you sorry sack of shit in a suit." she snapped, jabbing at the soft curve of his side with curled knuckles. That did hurt, and spawned a wave of nausea as he jolted away. "Is this a joke? Because the girls won't say a word, and that leads me to think it's not a joke."

Like a slowly - or very rapidly - unfolding nightmare, three bodies pushed into view. Christophe stepped into the room and to the side, looking vaguely ill, and Rhiannon and Lena drew tentatively into the doorway without quite breaching it.

Neither of them looked at him. He wondered, abruptly, if they were still on his side.

"You tried to leave once." Rochelle muttered, lower, her arm faltering slightly in the air. Nick couldn't help but see a similar defeat, there, though her voice was sharp enough to cut. "You seriously trying again? Looking for the next bus out, wherever you can find it?"

Think I finally wore them out. Guess they had a limit, after all. Isn't this what I wanted? Burn them out so they won't give a shit when I leave... Wasn't that the plan? So why do I feel so fucking awful?

He forced his jaw to move, though it felt like he had to break it free from half-set cement. "I'm not in a suit." Before she could react - and most likely strike out - he slid off the dresser and took a couple steps back. "What do you want me to say?"

Her mouth gaped in a moment of disbelief, and she collected her focus with a pitched half-laugh. "Say it's a joke, for one!" She pushed the heel of her hand against her cheek, shaking her head. Her anger seemed to shift into something only faintly sad, and he wasn't sure if he could take disappointment from both of them at once. "Christ, Nick, you're serious?"

The gambler didn't say anything, mostly because he had no idea what to say. He merely gritted his teeth and narrowed his eyes.

Lena took a step forward. Her hand darted up to wipe at her mouth with her wrist, a nervous gesture. "Ro'." she muttered, quietly. Her voice was taut and urgent with a frustration in it, even as she tried to smooth it into something soothing. Though Rochelle wheeled around, an angry twist pulling at her mouth, it was Ellis who suddenly spoke up.

"How could you?"

There was something pitiful in the way he said it, and Nick stiffened, teeth clamping on the inside of his cheek. He darted a glance toward the bed, and the fact that Ellis was peering at Lena instead of him didn't make his gut twist any less.

I... really tried, kid. I know it doesn't look like it, but...

"How long did y'all know he was gonna go with? Was that what y'all kept whisperin' about all the time? When were any of you -" There, his gaze scathed its way from Lena to Rhiannon to Nick and back. "- gonna tell us?"

The sisters shared a glance, and Rhiannon didn't do much to hide a pointed frown.

With a sharp inhale, Lena looked forward, pinching her lips together for just a beat before she lifted her shoulders. "If I had my way, you'd all go." she murmured, simply, a distance entering her eyes. It was, no doubt, an attempt at neutrality, dodging the ire building up in the room.

All it did was flare Rochelle's anger hotter, and forced Nick's head to snap toward her in turn. His eyes narrowed, and the brunette's expression tightened, a pleading edge to her frown. Ellis wasn't kidding. They were trying to get everyone to go? Didn't fucking tell me that.
"That's not -" the producer started, but Nick's reaction caught her eye, and she rounded back on him. "Jesus. Bullshit. If this was about you not wanting to go to the military, you wouldn't care whether or not we came. No, Nick, this is you running away from your problems instead of facing them. Like always."

Movement at the bedroom door marked Coach's stirring, and he stilled next to Rhiannon, eyes roving the scene. He said nothing, and either ignored or did not notice the way the blonde hunched beside him. His expression did not hold much surprise, not even when it finally landed on Nick.

Whatever he hadn't overheard already, he was quickly caught up on.

A muscle jumped under Nick's eye, teeth going on edge, an unvoiced warning creeping up in his voice. They crept closer and closer to conversations he did not want to have. "You ask me, I'm facing things just fine - including the reality that our little merry fucking band was never going to last forever. I'm just looking out for me."

Rochelle blew out a harsh breath, thrusting her hands toward him in something like mock prayer. "Oh, yeah, right. It's all about you. Sorry, I always forget the sun and moon revolve around your goddamn -"

Nick didn't intend to break, but he did. His voice raised, his head tossing back, and the pain that pulsed through him only heightened the frustration in his voice. "I gotta ask, Ro', if you hate me so fucking much, then why aren't you beggin' them to take me?"

It was more sincere than he meant.

He felt the tension spike - saw Chris' posture in particular go stiff. The only person who didn't flinch was Rochelle. She gazed back at him, hands still out, and shrugged.

"If you hate us so fucking much, why did it take alcohol for you to get the guts to tell us you wanted to leave?" Rochelle's voice held a cruel humour, but her eyes softened. She let her hands drop to her sides.

"Go ahead, Nick. Lay it on me. What's your big plan? Sail away to Texas and live out the rest of your days in some prepper compound? Hope the military takes the U.S. back before the food runs out? Hope the zombies don't get bigger and meaner and deadlier, until you guys get overrun?"

"Fuck you." Rhiannon spat, just faintly, almost half-hearted.

Nick had let his jaw close for too long, it seemed, and the cement had re-set. He wanted more than anything to argue, but she wasn't wrong. As much as he didn't think they'd find rescue with the military, either, what point was there in traveling to Texas, just to be even deeper in zombie-infested territory?

Coach sighed, his breath rumbling, raising his voice. "Nicolas, you ain't in no shape to be makin' decisions. Let's sit down and talk like adults, a'ight? Figure shit out."

That cornered feeling rose, shooting cold up his spine. He tried to lick his lips, but his mouth was still so dry it did nothing but agitate the discomfort. "You're all fucking kidding yourselves. And none of this is up for debate, so there's nothing to talk about." he spat out, dumbly.

"God, fuck, stop arguing." Rhiannon hissed, shoving forward and pushing past her sister with a heavy strike, one that had Lena grabbing for the doorframe to catch herself. "You cuntshits haven't stopped arguing since we joined up. What the fuck is up with you guys? What fucking happened to you?"
"All I hear you fuckin' say is how you don't have any family to look for. Are you blind, or just fucking stupid?" Her hand thrust up, burrowing fingers in her slim camisole and clutching there. "I spent most of my life trying to figure out who my family was, and here you are, up to your fuckin' nutsack in people who give a shit about you, and all you want to do is fuck them over?"

"Rhee." her sister muttered, a less-than-subtle urge for silence. "You're not helping."

Rhiannon looked furious - but when Coach's hand brushed her shoulder, she lowered her chin, expression softening and the clear urge to protest dying in her eyes.

The eldest survivor advanced, stepping more into the room, drawing his arms into a tight cross. "I'd disagree. Nearest thing to the truth I've heard today. What do you think you're doin', Nick? You decide runnin' was better than bein' honest? Runnin' is better than dealin' with yo' problems? We ever done anything to make you think we ain't here fo' you?"

Nick gritted out a sigh, clenching his fists at his sides. He spoke before his brain could process the words, lashing out. "Not interested in advice from the bottle-blondie who's been trying to fuck her dad since she was sixteen, or her next target."

Why did he feel obliged to turn everyone in a room against him?

Before Rhiannon could do more than flare her nostrils, however, Lena thrust up an arm and raised her voice. "Okay, guys, come on. We're all running a little hot here, so let's -"

"Let's whut?" Ellis stood, taking one long stride to approach them.

His shoulders were up, posture aggressive. He was angry.

"Honestly, Lee, I dunno why you two're in here. How could you not tell me, 'n'then stand in here like -" He stumbled, fumbled, and blustered out a sigh. His gaze averted, and his anger strangled into a frustrated injury. "I thought we was friends. I asked you tuh help me - keep him safe, 'n'... instead, you... whut? Y'all just gonna lead us on 'til we found yer boat, then take him?"

There was a strained moment of silence, where Lena's gaze sat fixed on his face. Her expression slowly - tenderly - fell, hazel eyes gone weak. "I'm sorry." she murmured, teeth worrying at her lower lip as she jutted her chin forward. Apology bled genuinely into her eyes, the soft curves of her face down-turning as she gazed at her feet.

"I am sorry, sunshine." Her voice strengthened, however, gaining a tightness that was unyielding. "But this is bigger than that. It's easy for you guys to boil this down to a bunch of hurt feelings, but you know what this is for me? You want to know why I didn't just run to you, tell y'all about it when he asked?"

Spreading her arms, Lena glanced among them, fingers limply splayed. "We ain't gonna make it to Texas alone. We're going to die. I'm gonna to watch my baby sister die, and I'll probably die right after." A wetness sparkled at her eyes, even as her voice did not waver. "So, yeah. If Nick - or any of you - wants to join us, I'm not going to say no. I thought I could... work things out, make it all moot, but..."

It sat there, blunt, in her eyes. Nick didn't need to try terribly hard to read it: she was strained very nearly to the breaking point. He'd put her in an unpleasant situation, and a better person might've felt guilty.
"I can't force y'all to come any more than I can force him to stay. You can hate me if you want to, but I'm going to make the right choice for my family. I can't fix yours."

There was a dreadful sort of silence afterwards.

Ellis' posture softened, his chin lowering, and he glanced gently around himself, looking between Christophe and Rochelle with a tense uncertainty. The foreigner looked pale and a little lost, and Rochelle gave him the softest frown in return. Neither seemed sure of how to react.

His gaze shifted toward Rhiannon, and Nick couldn't stop himself from joining in. The blonde's gaze was furious and cold on the carpet. She didn't agree with her older sister, that much was clear - and a strange revelation. Not the sides I expected.

Only then did Ellis look back toward Lena, gaze settling on the woman's face, jaw rolling subtly in a tense gesture. "Lee, I - don't hate you. But you gotta know it ain't right. This ain't just hurt feelin's. There's shit you don't understand, okay? I -"

"I understand just fine." she interrupted, and where he had faltered, she grew firmer. The biker took a step forward, lifting her shoulders to match him. "I'm not kidnapping anyone here - if you want to convince somebody, talk to him." Lena nodded her chin toward Nick.

He, in turn, snapped his gaze to the side when Ellis reflexively glanced in his direction.

"If he wants to go, he goes." Her eyes averted, grabbing her left forearm and rubbing her thumb into the crook of her wrist. It was a gentle kind of anxiety, soft and wary. "Don't ask me to turn down help when I need it, and don't act like it's about right and wrong. We've all got to look out for ourselves."

Nick didn't enjoy watching Ellis struggle to work together a response. Watching the kid's composure fall apart brought him no joy, and he didn't even really have adrenaline to see him through it. He wasn't angry enough to convince himself that seeing the Georgian's eyes go pained and vulnerable didn't kill him just a little.

Rochelle stepped forward, anger flecking over her face, placing a hand against Ellis' bicep. "We got this far - got you this far - because we all looked out for each other." When he weakened into her touch, that anger heightened.

Lena flinched just subtly, eyes flickering to take in the woman's posture. She did not respond. Nick had known Rochelle long enough to recognize when a protective rage overtook her general kindness - and he knew enough to feel honest dread when her gaze landed back on him. She spoke, still, toward Lena: "So, I think that's some cop-out bullshit, honestly... but I agree that we're arguing with the wrong person."

His stomach tried its hardest to punch through the softer parts of his lower back, and he curled his hands into fists. "Nothing to fucking argue about." he stated, words stiff, a lame bleat the best he could pull together.

Ellis turned on his heel, breaking away from Rochelle's grip, and before Nick could do much as blink, pushed abruptly into his space. The few inches Nick had on him didn't seem to mean much; they did not feel, at least, like an advantage.

He felt small.

"Whut did last night mean?"
The following silence was so loaded, it felt more like an awful, shrieking din. Nick didn't miss the flash of awareness across Coach and Rochelle's posture. He definitely didn't miss the complete lack of surprise on Chris' face. He tried as hard as he could to block out thoughts of the bikers from his mind.

They were watching, and he didn't want to know what they were thinking. Didn't want to see the look in their eyes, the curiousity, the realization.

He felt his body tremble, just once, before he locked his gaze on Ellis'. "Means I'm leaving." he said, tone measured, words careful and forced. Ellis, despite a flare of irritation in his expression, did not jump to interrupt. Nick aggressed, pushed the issue, got a little louder despite the way it pulsed pain through his skull.

"Not sure if I can make it any clearer than writing it down. Would charades help? Pantomimes? Interpretive dance?"

Quietly, Ellis cocked his head, gaze flickering over his face, taking in his expression. There was calculation there, consideration, before his attention rose back up to Nick's eyes.

"Ain't talkin' 'bout the damn book." There, flat and blunt in his eyes, Nick saw the one thing he did not want to see, even more than the misery and hatred and hopelessness: defiance. "Talkin' 'bout you comin' in here last night, drunk, 'n' -"

Like flash-fire, Nick found himself reaching up, grabbing a fistful of the Georgian's undershirt just at his sternum. He pulled, fingers knotting in the fabric, feeling Ellis' weight strain against his hold. The younger man's chin tilted up, and his stone-blue eyes went low-lidded.

He looked... smug, and Nick wasn't sure he'd ever felt so completely outgunned, so completely vulnerable, so raw and injured and drowning.

Or, maybe, he'd felt that feeling a million times over, in gasps and sputters and sometimes floods, but this was the only time he couldn't truly run away from it.

"Out." he stated, just quietly. His free arm lifted, pointing toward the door - but his grip on Ellis' shirt did not loosen. Holding fast, he darted a glance up over the man's shoulder, gritting his teeth as he found the clustered survivors staring at him.

The combined heat of their gazes sent his skin crawling, and a subtle panic threatened to tunnel his vision into a fuzzy aura. It was hard to even quite process them, or put meaning to their expressions, unable to think much at all in the moment.

If the sisters found out, would he still be able to go with them? Would they let him, and would he be able to stand the feeling of their knowing? Two women that should have been conquests, instead privy to the one thing he'd wanted kept under wraps... it all couldn't have gone worse.

"Nick..." Rochelle uttered, voice approaching that coaxing flatness that he recognized more than he wanted to, like a soft attempt to talk someone off a ledge. "Easy. Let's just... take a breath, okay? I don't think you two should -"

"Out." he repeated, less quietly, a snarl that rumbled dangerously in his chest, breaking in his dry throat. He tightened his grip, shifting Ellis just an inch closer, and they might've come into contact if the Georgian had not been fighting back, leaning away.

Ellis' head turned, glancing backwards, eyes taking a careful scan over his teammates. His lips managed a gentle curve, reassuring, and he murmured, "S'okay. Y'all go downstairs, okay?" His tone seemed extraordinarily calm.

Nick realized it, then: _He's not afraid of me at all, huh?_

At the door, Rochelle took a careful inhale, shifting to dart a glance toward the other survivors. Coach was staring directly at her, frown intense, and she shied away from quite meeting his gaze. Chris, on the other hand, reached to touch her elbow and nod toward the hallway.

"Es bueno." he murmured, softly and just between them, and she couldn't resist a surge of doubt. "They need to fight, ¿sí? All the... sutileza, em, all the not... They need to fight. Es bueno."

"Doesn't feel bueno." escaped her in a hiss, but she straightened, regardless. Ellis wanted them to leave, and she, unfortunately, was sure he knew better than her. The fact that the bar was terribly low made her uncomfortable, but there was no real alternative. She'd barely kept Nick with them the first time.

She couldn't do it again, and the only option was to trust Ellis to manage.

Trying to get across her uncertainty in a glance, Rochelle received a tighter smile from the Georgian, one that pleaded, just softly. It begged her for faith, and beyond a distinct sadness, he seemed calm. Strangely, she understood it: no part of her thought that Nick would do him any harm.

_Physically, at least._

Releasing a sigh, Rochelle turned on her heel, lifting her hands. Her voice was strained and precise, head shaking. "I think we all need to breathe, anyway. Let's just go downstairs, regroup. Maybe not talk for a little bit."

"Sounds fuckin' good to me." Rhiannon muttered, jaw gritted and voice thick with frustration.

Lena, however, was first to move, and the glint of something streaking down her cheek betrayed the beginnings of tears. Coach shifted to let her past, some sympathy flinching at his expression, then looked up at the rest of the group.

They filed out, Rhiannon first, but the blonde didn't proceed down the stairs after her sister. She waited, awkward in her stance, as Rochelle and Christophe stepped out to join her. They stood, only Chris really looking at anyone's face, his own drawn in a nervous moue.

Coach closed the bedroom door, jaw flinching with obvious discomfort. There was no immediate burst of motion or sound inside, and the silence was, perhaps, more eerie than if Nick had started to shout.

There was a moment where they hesitated, Lena's footsteps fading as she reached the bottom of the stairs, and said nothing. It was tense, uncomfortable, and Rochelle wasn't sure what to say. She was just as angry at the bikers as she was at Nick - trust had been broken, and trust felt like a precious commodity.

Rochelle frowned, wishing she didn't feel so genuinely injured. "Why didn't you say anything?"

Maybe it showed on her face, because Rhiannon snuck a glance up, hazel eyes squinted past a stray strand of rough hair, and her shoulders wilted. Her voice, that pleasantly husky sound, went low. "She's my sister. And I've fucked shit up enough times and she's always had my back - I'm not gonna -"
She faltered, and Rochelle found Coach's hand settling against her elbow. When she glanced up, he was frowning, and there was no anger there.

Just... sadness.

"Let's go." he murmured. "Ain't time to give Nick the satisfaction of us fightin' 'mongst ourselves."

Christophe nodded, eagerly, moving suddenly to clutch at the big man's shirt, just at his hip. "El jefe is right. Vámonos, ¿vale? No good to stand up here and be angry. Y... they need some time, maybe."

"They don't know what they need." Rochelle growled out, thrusting her hands up in a helpless gesture before striding to and down the stairs. She didn't bother to wait for the rest of her teammates to join her, and by the time she'd reached the first floor, Lena was nowhere in sight.

She'd retreated to their chosen bedroom.

The stranger part, to Rochelle, was that when Rhiannon entered the dining room, the last to come down, she chose to sit herself on the kitchen's tiled floor. She leaned against the cabinets, elbows on her knees and head in her hands.

Neutral ground, she supposed.

Neutrality's done more to fuck us over than anything else. I'm more than a little done being neutral.

Rochelle sighed, and wished she found more comfort when Chris settled behind her, his chin on her shoulder and his arm wrapping loosely around her waist.

You better know what you're doing, Ellis.
There was a moment - and not a short one - after the door shut and after footsteps receded down the stairs, where neither Nick nor Ellis moved. They stood frozen in the bedroom, Nick's grip a stranglehold on his shirt, drawing the collar of it almost painfully tight against his shoulders.

He was brought halfway onto his toes, and only held tension kept distance between them. Ellis should have been intimidated, or at least nervous, yet he couldn't bring himself to feel much but a quiet anger. He could not reach sympathy, let alone regret.

He'd never wanted anyone he loved to feel pain, but pushing Nick into a corner felt undeniably satisfying. Finally, he'd reached the end of his rope, and it was freeing in its own way. He would not hide - he would not lie. He would not swallow down the way he felt anymore.

Nick was staring at him with bloodshot eyes, gaze running a marathon that looped from his eyes to his mouth and back. Fury cut dangerously close to lust, the line blurring, and Ellis wasn't wholly sure what he should have been bracing for.

Rather than wait to find out, he acted.

His hand darted up, circling Nick's wrist with his fingers, pulling downward, hard.

Although he wasn't able to quite disentangle the man's digits from his shirt, he was able to return his feet flat to the ground and take a half-step back. The Northerner's eyes widened, relenting without letting go.

"C'mon then, Nick. I know you wanna yell at me, so just get on with it." Ellis murmured, a grunted half-laugh escaping him, then a snort. "I mess things up? Were you hopin' the sisters wouldn't never find out? 'Bout whut, exactly? Afraid they'll think yer gay?"

Nick's fingers tightened, knuckles digging against his sternum, and Ellis let his fingers skate up until he could grip the back of the man's hand.

The touch of their hands felt intimate, despite it all, and both of them allowed it to masquerade as that previously-violent gesture. Both of them pretended the touch of skin-on-skin was some battle for dominance, and not a desperate attempt to stay anchored together.

"I'm not -" escaped Nick, a strangled sound, but Ellis' patience was dwindling.

"Stop. Just stop. I don't wanna hear it, Nick." A harshness drew his voice into a gritty tremble, anger surging over his self-control. "You wanna act like yer so wounded? Like I did you wrong?
We're both bleedin', Nick, 'cept I'm tryin' tuh fix it'n'you ain't done nothin' but make it worse."

He saw the hurt glint across Nick's face. It should have given him pause.

"All you ever do is hide, 'n'pretend like no one can see you. Act like it's the damn end'uh the world if I loved you, like the world ain't already ended. If you tried tuh let me in half's hard as you been tryin' tuh keep me out, we'd be okay. Don't you get that? You ain't dumb, Nick, so why does this get you so worked up? Why're you bein' so damn stupid?"

Nostrils flaring, Nick cocked his head, teeth on edge as he spoke. "That's fuckin' rich - if I'm so stupid and we're so miserable together, then why are you still fuckin' here? You think you're the smart one for hanging around so I can keep hurting you?"
Anger flared too high for Ellis to fully process what he was doing before he shoved himself forward. The strike of his body against Nick's chest forced the man into a stagger, and as Nick's hips bumped into the dresser behind him, Ellis lunged forward to set his hands atop the surface, trapping Nick against it and between his forearms.

There was no space between them, then, flat to one another from the belly down. Nick arched back in reflex, shocked into a choked sound, releasing Ellis' shirt entirely in order to brace himself with both hands jolted behind himself.

_Gotcha now, li'l gator. Now's the hard part._

Lips drawn into a grimaced frown, Ellis tilted his chin, unable to stop his voice from raising. "Why do you keep sayin' that like you don't got no fuckin' choice in it?!"

Nick's jaw tensed, eyes low-lidded. "Ellis -" he started, but Ellis spoke over him.

"I'm so damn tired of hearin' you talk 'bout us like we're already over. Who says? And why? Why are you tryin' so hard to piss me off'n'push me away? You said you needed me, last night, so whut's the damn problem? Can't you see I need you, too?"

Nick's body trembled against his, just subtly, and Ellis watched a strange mixture of emotions crawl through his eyes. Most of them were recognizable, some even outright familiar. One, however, eluded him; it seemed so conflicted and so muddled, that he couldn't quite discern if it was fear, or guilt, or something else.

It was easy to be angry, but that did not make it hard to feel tender grief.

"Tell me somethin', Nick. This ain't about yer ex, is it? So what is it about?" He did not miss the way the older man's eyes followed his lips. He hoped it also meant he was listening; this was, perhaps, the most important question. The one that really mattered.

Everything else felt... hollow, in a way. It was all things they'd said a million times before, in a million different ways, and to what end? What good did any of it do if they never made progress with each other? Without baring those raw wounds, maybe Nick was right: maybe they were nothing, after all.

"Who's Brett, really?"

He saw the betrayal as much as he felt it. Nick's posture stiffened, surging back against the dresser in an attempt at escape, and his chin lowered until it touched his chest. His gaze flickered around the room, or maybe it just did anything to avoid Ellis' face.

"I don't know what you're talking about." he muttered, hoarse and stiff. "Or the fuck that has to do with anything."

The Georgian shifted his right arm, hand sliding over the wooden drawer, thumb brushing against Nick's waist. He slid it just above the waistband of his sweats, touching the curve of his hipbone and smoothing over his skin in something like comfort. "You never told me he was dead." he whispered. "Whut happened, Nick? How'd he -"

He couldn't finish the sentence before the wind was knocked out of him, both of Nick's hands coming up to strike flat against his chest. With the blow unexpected, untelegraphed, Ellis was shoved back off his footing and forced to stumble to keep himself standing. He managed, but only just.
Unlike Ellis, Nick stayed frozen there and did not advance, hips resting against the dresser. His eyes were wide, lips barely parted to exhale the quick pants that shivered his chest in shallow motions. He spoke sooner than Ellis expected, voice rushed.

"Coach -" He cut himself off, however, eyes slitting with an abrupt intensity as he collected himself just a little. "You know what, Ellis? You can go right ahead and fuck yourself. You and everyone else keep digging around for the little sob story that'll make everything make sense. You've all got yourselves convinced there's an easy answer, and you're missing the fucking point."

Thrusting his arms out wide, Nick released a huff, a laugh that only came halfway to fruition. "It doesn't fucking matter. You think pulling the skeletons out of my closet is how we work out? You think if I just tell you all the shitty, fucked up things that fucked me up, they'll stop being shitty and fucked up? You think I'll stop being fucked up?"

Ellis felt his heart-rate pick up, his throat trying to constrict, his mouth going dry. "You ain't fucked up, Nick. Just scared. We can deal with it together - I know you, sugar, 'n' -"

"You keep saying that." Nick's voice chilled, suddenly, like ice spreading in crackling fractals over wet glass. His body shifted, taking an unsteady step forward, his fists balling up. Then another. "You keep fucking saying it like saying it means anything. You know me? What do you know, kid? C'mon. Wow me."

A frown clawed at Ellis' expression, gaze flickering to watch Nick's incremental advance. "I -" he stumbled out, lost for an instant before the words started of their own accord. "I know you got a real sharp sense'uh humour. I know you care so much it scares yuh sometimes. I know you'll do near 'bout anything fer the people you -"

The Northerner took another step. "Bullshit." he spat, harsh. "I'm not talking about my fucking horoscope. What do you know about me, Ellis? Do you even fucking know who I am?"

Confusion threatened at Ellis' composure, his body stiffening as the distance between them dwindled yet again. "I-I know you were born right before Christmas. I know you grew up in Bronx. I know yer uncle is a drunk'you had tuh take care of him when you was li'l, 'n' -"

He faltered, because something like humour flared in Nick's expression, and he knew he'd gotten something wrong but did not know what.

He forged ahead.

"I know yer parents weren't well-off, 'n'I know you gamble fer money. I know you get in over yer head with it sometimes, with bad folk. I know you were married, 'n'she didn't love you, but you loved her enough tuh keep hangin' ontuh the ring. I know I never would'uh hurt you like that."

There, the humour faded, and Nick stopped moving. His head tilted just a half-inch to the left. Did he look a little sad?

"I know you got real scared the first time you ever liked a guy, and you ain't never really stopped bein' scared of it. I know -"

"Stop." Nick said it flatly, lifting a hand, discontent curling at the corner of his mouth. His advance started again and did not stop, shoulders lowering as he approached, and Ellis couldn't keep his heart from beating a little faster. There was something aggressive in the way he moved. "You know what that is? You know what that all was?"

Ellis retreated despite himself, blindly stepping backwards. He was not afraid, precisely, but there was an anger in Nick's posture and a calm hollowness in his eyes that reminded him of the night everything had fallen apart. It was the consequences of it all that worried him, more than the immediate situation.

The edge of the bed suddenly bumped into the backs of his thighs, and he watched Nick draw closer. As he came within arms' reach, the gambler's hands lifted.

Ellis felt himself tense, and his body drew to its fullest height as Nick's fingertips touched onto his jawline. A breath left him - a whimper - and the Northerner pulled his chin up an inch or so with a thumb cradled just underneath it. It took everything he had not to let his eyes drift closed.

It was hard not to wet his lips, let them part, because it felt so good to be touched so gently. There was no veil of night to blur the mortification he should have felt at his own desperation, yet he only felt a yearning.

"That's the sob story." Nick murmured, and if he weren't so close, Ellis might've missed the downward flicker of his mouth.

The Georgian couldn't pull himself together quick enough to respond before the thumb under his chin pushed his face up, and lips came down bruisingly hard against his. There was a sour taste to it, but he barely noticed. Ellis sucked in a breath through his nose... and then his eyes did flutter shut, body desperate to succumb.

He did not obey it.

Pushing his hands up, he planted his hands against Nick's chest, applying just enough pressure to force him back an inch. The contact between their lips broke, and when he re-opened his eyes, he found the older man gazing at him, hands unmoved.

"No." Ellis stated, just whisper, sure that the trembling of his voice betrayed how difficult it was.

A smirk dragged at Nick's face, humourless, as he let the pad of his thumb drift against the younger man's cheek. "Dumbshit. You don't know anything." he husked out, and how did it sound so much like a sweet-nothing? "If you did, we could've saved a lot of time."

Ellis stiffened, allowing his jaw to tighten and forcing the words out past gritted teeth. "Then tell me." An inner piece of him screamed to retreat, to pull away, at least physically.

That smirk widened a twitch, and he felt like he'd stepped into a trap. Nick's head tilted, gaze flickering over his face, and he let out a short breath. Alcohol lingered on it, as well as something more unpleasant. "Let's start with a few things you do know. Gambling? Sure. I gamble. Gambling turns into other things real quick, though. Gets you in the wrong circles."

His hands dropped, releasing Ellis' face, and it felt like a loss.

"So gambling, yeah. Then I got into debt. And when you get in debt, you gotta find money. Sometimes it's loansharks - but I was smarter than that. Interest is for morons, right?" A laugh made his shoulders jump, but it was forced. "So you find work. And when you need more money faster than a fucking nine-to-five gets you, you get desperate. And when you're a fucking piece of shit, maybe you get dirty."

Ellis watched his expression, warily, feeling his heart rate pick up even further. He didn't know what he expected, and didn't know how to prepare himself for it. He just... braced, and felt a gentle sympathy spool in him.
"See, I got into some low-level gang shit when I was a kid. Nothing wild, just breaking into some houses for cash, joyrides in someone else's car. Nothing that stuck - and I stopped, sooner than later, tried to get something like a real job. But I knew some people who didn't stop."

His words brought a soft frown to Ellis' face, more worried than anything, though he tried to quash the expression as quickly as he could.

Nick's lips curled, again, and it was a stiff smirk. The hollow tone to his voice became crueler. "By the time I got back in touch with them, they were hard. They ran drugs. I didn't get into that, much, but collecting? Sure. Got my ass out of a few jams by breaking someone's arm. You ever need money from someone, try throwing a Mollie in their backyard. Suddenly, they pay up."

It was hard not to lean away, and harder still not to let his expression display unease. Hearing Nick talk about it felt surreal, somehow, and he fought to rein in a subtle panic in his chest. He'd never considered the other end of it: Nick had told him about getting assaulted over debts, but he'd never imagined the man on the other side.

Still, his instinct protested it, and he spoke past a dry mouth: "You were desperate. Folk do crazy shit when they're desperate. It don't -"

"Don't what?" Nick interrupted, green eyes glinting as he tilted his head the other way and parroted back Ellis' Southern diction. "Don't mean nothin'? Sorry to break it to you, sweetheart, but it does. It matters. Me being the sort of person who'd leave you to die the first day we met matters."

Ellis' eyes widened, gaze searching Nick's, uncomprehending.

That made Nick's arms lift, gesturing to either side of the room, a half-laugh escaping him. "I never told you, did I?" he uttered, at first, low, in a tone that said he was not surprised by that fact. Then his voice raised again. "First day we met. You got nabbed by a Smoker, and I had your gun. Only reason I came back to get you was because you had all the fucking bullets in your fucking overalls."

Hurt flecked in Ellis' expression, teeth clamping on his tongue as he re-assessed that memory, feeling it weaken and crumble at his touch. The first time Nick had ever saved him - only for convenience?

"Quit it!" Ellis burst out, unsure if he meant to direct it at Nick or himself. He curled his hands into fists and raised one, patting his chest with it. "That don't matter, man. It's been so long, 'n'so much has changed. You ain't the same person from then."

When Nick leaned forward, there was a breathiness to his voice. He seemed almost eager, like he'd picked up on the falter, like he wanted Ellis to break. "It's been weeks, kid, a month or two. Barely. People don't change, and not in weeks. People don't goddamn fall in love in weeks."

Anger made Ellis' fists tighten, but he couldn't summon words before Nick laughed again, nasal and sharp. He raised a hand to rub at his forehead, the gesture so erratic and stressed that he aborted it halfway through.

"You want to know what happened to Brett? Do you want the sob story or the truth?"

As fast as it had come, the anger faded, and Ellis found himself nervous. He swallowed, bracing again for the unknown, and lowered his hand back to his side. "I want everythin'. I wanna know."

Nick's eyes raised, staring out from under his palm, a coldness touching his expression beyond a faint surprise. His voice lowered and there, once again, came that indescribable flush of emotion over his face. It was clearer that time, by degrees: shame.

"He trusted me. He thought he loved me. And I killed him."

Ellis didn't move, gaze flickering over every minute detail of Nick's face, hunting out an explanation. He did not want to believe either of the implications in that statement. When he didn't find an easy answer in the man's expression, his right hand lifted to brush a stray curl away from his own temple.

"You...?"

Releasing a tight snort, Nick jerked his chin up. "Not literally. Not with my bare hands. But you take enough things away from a guy, pull his life apart piece by piece, and what do you expect? Put someone half-decent with a fucking greedy, worthless motherfucker like me, and what do you expect to happen?"

A shiver touched his frame, and on reflex, Ellis reached to settle a hand on his hip in an attempt at comfort. As quickly as it had touched down, however, Nick snatched it by the wrist and yanked it up to hover it beside his head. The grip was just tight enough and pulled his arm in enough of a weird curl to hurt.

"But if you need literal, I got that, too."

There was a strained edge to his voice that made Ellis' spine snap straight. It was clearer than ever how hard Nick was struggling - but it was difficult to discern whether that struggle was to keep things in, or force them out.

"Whut the hell does that mean?" the younger man pressed, swallowing down the anxiety plucking at his composure. "Nick, quit, yer scarin' me." he whispered, gaze darting over the older man's face. "Just... stop, okay? You ain't thinkin' straight, 'n' - this ain't makin' no sense, so -"

Something desperately unpleasant twisted on Nick's face, and he pushed just a little harder, sending a pang of pain down Ellis' forearm as it turned a few centimeters too far in its rotation. He didn't get the sense that Nick meant to hurt him, but the man was too distracted to notice that his elbow was twisted wrong.

The Georgian wanted to protest, but he bit it down and did not fight.

"You don't understand? Let me make it simple for you." Nails bit into Ellis' wrist as the taller man leaned forward, lowering his voice, a harsh derision in his tone. "I'm a fucking felon, you backwoods dumbass. Two years, manslaughter, before I got out on parole. It's illegal for me to even have a gun, not that that means anything anymore."

Ellis felt a faint illness crest the edge of his awareness, a nervous nausea, a discomfort he couldn't shake. His skin numbed with it, breath turning shallow. "Yer... a...?"

An abrupt snort made Nick's shoulders jostle, and in a reversal of his previous advances, he pulled Ellis' arm sharply forward, as if to pull the man closer to him. The move released the painful tension on his elbow caused by its overextension backwards, but Ellis did not allow himself to be displaced. His heels dug in and his expression tightened.

Nick only applied a little force, before it became clear that he could not easily overpower the younger man's resistance, and he stopped trying. Instead, he continued unabated, tone casual in a way that did not match how he closed his eyes.
"I cheated a guy out of a pot. He got wise, followed me home, tried to put a knife in my spleen. I pushed him down some stairs, and he split his skull open. Might've gotten self-defense if they hadn't had cameras in the parking lot."

Ellis' lips moved before his mind processed. "Was it?"

Nick hesitated, and suddenly, his eyes softened. He seemed to examine Ellis' expression in full, taking it in, and maybe he saw the genuine fear in the younger man's eyes. A doubt emerged in Nick's, a weariness - and then he shrugged his shoulders and laughed, and if Ellis weren't already split into fragments, he might've thought it a heartbreaking sound. It sounded miserable.

"He came at me, so maybe. But the jury changed their minds after the cops showed 'em a video of me sitting on the stairs for thirty minutes, smoking a cigarette and watching him bleed out."

The feeling Ellis had had, standing in the night-time air, listening to Nick tell him they were nothing - that had been a unique misery, a complete and utter evisceration. He'd nearly drowned in it, nearly suffocated in it, and it had taken him days to come up for air.

It had made him feel like shattered safety glass: a hundred thousand hairline fractures held together only by the faintest spiderweb of plastic fibres. He sat roughly in his original shape, yet was indelibly broken. He'd come back together over the last few days, slowly, but it wasn't until that very moment that he truly appreciated how delicate that healing was.

Ellis felt himself fall apart, again.

Suddenly, Nick released him. The younger man found himself sidling to get his back toward the bedroom door, getting distance between them. He didn't mean to retreat so brazenly, but it was an animal need to get space, like otherwise he couldn't quite breathe.

He grabbed at his elbow, digging his fingertips against the still-twinging muscle there, gaze averting sharply toward the ground. "Why -" he whispered, throat constricting as tears welled in his eyes, blurring his vision. "That ain't you, Nick. None'uh that's you. That ain't - this ain't fair. Yer just sayin' all this 'cause you think it'll hurt me, 'n' -"

"I told you once." Nick stated, words stiff as they left him, a nausea twisting his mouth into something ugly. "Only people left around in an apocalypse are lucky, or they thrive in it. Which exactly do you think I am? You think some bullshit post-Rapture attitude adjustment changes what I've done and who I am? You don't know anything about me. So who are you in love with, exactly?"

All the blood drained from Ellis' face. A dizziness swallowed him up, placing his hands against his chest as if his fingers could hold himself together by force. They trembled before he gripped them tight, tangling in his shirt, digging against his sternum.

It killed him, faintly. It killed him mostly because he knew there was some truth to it.

"You want to say it doesn't matter. You want to say it doesn't change anything. But it does - and you can't." Nick accused, voice deflated to a quiet and factual mutter. "So do us both a favour and fuck off."

The Northerner listened, watching only in his periphery, as Ellis took one step back. Then another. Then two more. Each impact of his heel on the carpet felt like it was striking directly on his chest, instead. Rather than the relief he hoped to feel, he felt an overwhelming misery.

Part of him was glad Ellis said nothing as he fled the room.
Part of him wished Ellis refused to.

In the silence that followed, Nick felt - more than ever - like he stood on a precipice, the earthen edge crumbling just past his toes. He'd been trying for weeks to jump or, at least, allow himself to fall. Now, finally, there was no one to catch him. You got what you wanted.

Nick turned, and did not choose to sit on the edge of the bed as much as his knees collapsed. He set his elbows on his thighs, leaning forward, and felt a surge of cold crawl up his spine and curl at the base of his skull. His breath left him, and he struggled to regain it, lungs shivering with each attempt to draw in oxygen.

_Happy?_

Fur brushed against his lower back. Unthinking, he reached one arm behind himself and grabbed a hand under Maggie's belly. She struggled when he lifted her, but quickly settled when he clutched her to his chest. Burying his face against her shoulder, Nick closed his eyes into her fur, shuddering into the tender warmth emanating from her.

Tears came before he could stop them, and they turned harsh, a crushing pressure threatening to collapse his ribs. He sucked in air, but all it did was fuel a sob that made him bend forward, a gentle hyperventilation jolting at his diaphragm. It was a quiet weeping, shoulders trembling from the pain spiked through his midsection.

He suffocated himself into the furry shape in his arms, feeling her front paws dig into his shoulder, toepads spreading into a knead. Her coarse breath shifted, lengthening, and a purr crackled in her throat.

She'd never purred before.

"Tryed so fuckin' hard to lie to him, convince him I didn't care, so he'd give up." he husked against her, voice muffled, suddenly choking out a laugh with the same breath that his lungs turned into a whimper. "And look at that, Mags. All I needed to do was tell him the truth."

Nick fell apart.
Chapter 285

The first floor was silent - until it wasn't.

Christophe was the one to break it, talking like he was continuing a conversation that had already been taking place. He'd paced the length of the living room at least twenty times since they'd settled there, and he spoke with teeth gritted, rubbing his palm against his forehead.

"I did not think he would leave. Nico... he loves Ellis. Yo sé que lo hace."

With her hands cradled against her face where she sat on the couch, Rochelle muttered a muffled, "I'm starting to realize making bets on what Nick's going or not going to do is a mistake. I doubt he even knows." Her thumbs pressed into her eyes, squeezing them shut. "Baby, stop pacing. Please. You're making me anxious."

The Spaniard flinched to a halt, then turned to face her, his arm crossing loosely over his chest. His slim features strangled into a faint frown as he glanced from Coach to Rochelle and back. "Maybe they are talking. Nico looked sad. Maybe they -"

"Y'know, I have a question." Rochelle's head abruptly lifted, interrupting him, her attention twisting to glance at Coach. The big man stood near the front door, leaned against the TV stand they'd set there, his eyes closed. "You two knew something was going on with him since the mall. Why'd you take this long to tell us? You don't think we could've caught this sooner if we'd been on him?"

Coach released a breath, eyes slitting open but not looking toward her. He'd settled his palm against the bandaged wound on his neck, absently holding pressure, more a nervous gesture than a necessary one. "Babygirl, don't start. Chris followed my lead, an' I gave Nick some time. Thought he'd come around."

"Oh, my God." Thrusting her hands forward, Rochelle practically spat out, "You guys are hopeless! Name one time Nick's come around. Name one time he's actually taken a chance we gave him and done the right thing with it. Name -"

But, softly, Coach interrupted. "Every day since the day we met him." His gaze lifted and matched hers, mournful.

It silenced her for a beat, and she deflated slightly into the sofa, looking down toward her lap and gathering her hands together in a tight clasp. "Damnit." she muttered, anger flooding into her voice along with a helpless sarcasm. "Maybe we should just go with the sisters. That'd piss him off."

"It is, maybe, the right thing." Chris mumbled, tone hesitant. "You know? If we stay together, I mean. If we do not see the military... it is better to be a big group."

Coach shrugged his shoulders and lowered his chin, thoughtful. "We just got off gettin' damn-near buzzed by a Navy chopper. I ain't throwin' in the towel, yet. My ex ain't in Texas. My li'l girl ain't in Texas. If there's a chance some evacs got out, stickin' with the guv'ment's all we got. We had this conversation a million times before."

"You ever think that your best chance at reuniting with your fuckin' people is to just stay safe, however you can? That may not be fingerin' each other on the beach making S.O.S. signs out of zombie limbs."
Where Rochelle's nostrils flared in an angry exhale, Coach let himself snort, gently humoured. He shrugged, again. "Unlike some of y'all, I ain't given up hope yet. Even if our military got caught off-guard, there's a whole world out there probably bandin' together to stop this shit."

Quieter, Rhiannon muttered, "Hopefully the plan isn't carpet-bombing the States."

With a sudden groan of frustration, Rochelle stood up, her hands framing her face. "I actually don't want to hear it. None of this is about what the right move is for survival - don't you get it?" She circled around the couch, strides lengthy, shoving her shoulder against the post at the end of the kitchen counter. Her head tilted until she could look in, seeing Rhiannon on the floor, sitting upright and almost fetal.

"He's using you guys as a shield. He's just... trying to run."

Slowly, softly, Rhiannon's head lifted up from where it had been tucked almost between her knees. A laugh made her slim frame surge, and her head tilted. The smile that cut wryly across her face seemed more sad than anything else. "You don't think we're using him?"

Rochelle hesitated, blinking, like she didn't know how to respond to that.

"I'll let you in on a secret, Ro'." With some discomfort flashing across her face, Rhiannon leaned back, flattening herself against the cabinets behind her. "Sometimes you gotta choose between keeping what little you have, and getting something new. Sometimes it's worth it. Sometimes it isn't, and you just lose everything."

A frown twisted at Rochelle's features, and she sagged against the post with a soft exhale. That hit closer to home than she wanted it to, though understanding did not necessarily change her mind. "Never know which it is until it's over, huh?"

Grinning just a little, the biker raised both hands, curling her fingers into loose finger-guns aimed up at the other woman. "Smart girl." Then her grin faded, and she sighed, eyes slitting half-shut and head striking the cabinets behind her. "If it helps, the dick came to us. Not the other way around. Lee was just reacting."

"It doesn't." Rochelle returned, immediately, but she offered the smallest laugh - a gentle apology - when the blonde darted a glare in her direction. "Just so we're clear, I'm not letting him go. And if you and your sister are half the people I know you are, you'll help."

Rhiannon did not move. She just closed her eyes, a soft monotone touching her voice when she responded, "If he wants to come, he comes."

Rochelle's head tilted, glancing over the woman's expression with a gentle resignation. No reason to keep arguing. She's gonna follow her sister's lead, and I can't really blame her for that. She sighed softly and took a step back rather than respond. Her body turned, shrugging as she found both men in the living room watching her closely.

Her mouth opened, but the softest sound caught her attention before she could form the words she meant to say. It was nothing abrupt, nothing loud, but more the gentle swell of some distant white noise to a volume that finally pierced her perception. Something she'd been hearing for a while, but had not yet noticed.

A pattering of rain built outside, striking the roof, now softly growing in intensity until the strike of it against the building was audible. More than that, even, came the subtle sound of burbling water as the gutters began to fill and then drain out.
She'd once enjoyed the rain. She found it soothing, and a convenient excuse to wear something fluffy and baggy and cook something warm. Now, it just made her think of Witches, and Chris' blood staining her hands, and the worst few days of her life.

Her eyes darted to the Spaniard, and found a tension in his jaw that mirrored her own. She wondered if he was thinking of the same things.

Without a word, Rochelle advanced, darting across the living room. She slipped up to the windows they'd covered up with thin cottony blankets, and leaned in to nudge one aside just an inch or so. Looking out into the street revealed a grey morning, overcast skies only providing some dull and gauzy light.

Scanning carefully, she didn't miss the vague flickers of movement amongst the buildings around them, infected wandering sluggishly in and out of sight. They did not seem affected by the rain dampening through their torn and muddied clothing.

The longer she looked, the more she saw. It was hard to keep count, and harder still to reconcile their sleepy wandering with the inevitable screaming horde they'd stir up amongst themselves. It didn't worry her, precisely, but she felt some discomfort.

Without looking away, she murmured, "I think the mess we left at the mall caught up with us."

Coach grunted out, "Swarmed?", frowning when she nodded. He barely moved, though Christophe jolted to scooch next to her, peering out through a different gap in the makeshift curtains.

"I have seen worse." he announced, faux-cheer in his voice to badly cover the fact he was nervous. "But it is not a good time to fight. Maybe we stay here until -"

Lena's voice cut quietly across the room, firm. "If Coach can move, we should move." It almost startled Rochelle, but she stifled the sharp inhale that betrayed her tension. When she turned to look, she found the brunette standing in the hallway, her large duffel-bag hanging from her right hand.

Her eyes were red, a puffiness settled around their sockets. She punctuated the statement with a quiet sniff, wet. Her chin was turned low as if to hide the clear signs of crying, though her voice was untouched by any emotion at all.

A frown settled on Rochelle's face. She tried for some calculation, weighing the value of pettiness over magnanimity, but her stores of the latter were not at their highest... and the idea of succumbing entirely to the former saddened her. Instead, she jutted her chin forward and avoided indulging in either.

Simply, factually, she stated: "I don't think it's the right call."

Inhaling through her nose, Lena shifted her gaze to focus on Rochelle completely, her jaw softening. Maybe she knew, acutely, the line that the other woman had chosen to walk, and responded in kind. Her voice remained careful. "We didn't plan to stop in the first place. The longer we take, the less chance anyone who survived the crash is still alive - let alone close enough for us to find 'em."

That made Rochelle's head tilt, and a tentative question touched her tone. "You still want to help find the crash?"

The brunette snorted, chin lifting up a half-inch. A dull humour etched into her expression, raising a hand to flatten it helplessly against her sternum. "Do you still want to help me find a boat?"
For a moment, the two women stared at one another, and it felt somewhere between the tender pause before a breakdown, and the loaded beat before someone threw a punch. Neither happened.

"I'm good." Coach announced, pushing to straighten off the TV stand. He glanced around the room, face crunched in an agitated look. He seemed equal parts concerned and frustrated. "But I ain't worried about me. You think stickin' them boys in a car together is gonna happen right now? Or that it should?"

Rochelle put a thumb against her forehead, pressing there with a wince. "Can't make decisions based on them. They'll work together whether they want to or not. They have so far."

A small sigh bounced Coach's shoulders, eyes rolling lightly upwards. He stepped to the side, bending down next to the wall. They'd piled most of their weapons there, including their backpack, and he started to dig through it as if to take stock of what was in it. "Ellis put the man's dirty laundry out. Shit ain't gonna be the same."

The producer hesitated, glancing for an instant toward Lena, her mouth pursing. She did not miss the slightly sad smile on the brunette's face, nor had she missed the summarily unfazed attitudes both of the sisters had displayed throughout the altercation between Nick and Ellis.

"Yeah, well. I get the feeling his panties were already out on the line." she muttered, half to herself, and turned to face Christophe. "Baby, can you dig through the kitchen and start gathering up anything worth taking? I'll go -"

The sound of a rapid descent was suddenly audible through the far wall, footsteps on the staircase, and all eyes turned to the dining room. The footsteps almost reached the bottom before they slowed, and when Ellis came into view, he looked... dazed. Pale. There was a vague glaze to his eyes, lips idly parted.

Immediately, on instinct, Rochelle darted forward. She halted herself a few steps in, however, and merely lifted a hand. "Sweetie?" she questioned, tone soft. "What's up? What happened?"

As if in afterthought, Ellis' head shook, and he carefully walked himself around the dining table until he reached a chair. He grabbed the back of it, just to steady himself - and Rochelle thought he was going to pull it out and sit down.

Instead, he turned on his heel and abruptly walked into the bathroom, shutting the door behind himself. He did not slam it, but the sound seemed painfully loud in the otherwise silent house.

Rochelle couldn't help but flinch, both at the noise and what it no doubt meant.

"Shit." she muttered, darting forward. "Someone want to go check on Nick and see if he's still breathing? And if he is, make him stop?"

The last thing she expected was for Rhiannon to stand, suddenly pushing against the cabinets to get herself to her feet. The blonde wordlessly crossed the kitchen, ducking past them and trotting toward the stairs. The more she considered it, however, the more she felt a weird sort of relief.

"Nick and her get along - ... for some reason. Not sure when that happened, but maybe he'll respond to her better than us, especially if he thinks she's his way out."

Rubbing at her temples, Rochelle turned her attention to the closed bathroom door, ignoring the way Coach, Lena, and Chris were all staring directly at her. Squinting against the headache trying desperately to sink claws in her brain, she walked forward until she could press herself gently against the door.
Without looking, she pointed toward the kitchen, and she could hear Chris' sheepish footsteps start in that direction.

Resting her cheek against the doorframe, Rochelle settled a hand just next to the doorknob, flat against the wood. "Ellis? You wanna come out here, or should I come in?" She was quite sure her tone gave no indication that there was a third option - so when Ellis did not respond, she pressed. "Okay, I'll reword. Either you come out, or I -"

"C'mon."

It was so soft, so hoarse, she might've missed it entirely had she not been pressed so close to the door. Frowning, she snatched her hand around the doorknob and twisted, pushing to slip through the smallest gap she could manage, as if to keep his privacy from the main room.

Absurdly, she was reminded of quite nearly every middle school dance, every social and every prom, every time spent crying or being cried on in the school bathroom - and it made her a little melancholy. Then, frustrated.

How much energy had they put into fighting amongst themselves and fighting Nick that could've been spent getting them to rescue? How many times had they been delayed, when a few more minutes might've let them catch sight of the boat, or flag down the helicopter, or...

Unfair, she accused.

The lighting in the bathroom was dim, but enough. Ellis sat on the toilet, leaned back against the tank, his arms draped limply down into his lap. He was staring down at his hands, tears starting to pool against the corners of his eyes. The slow, rigid rise and fall of his chest said he was trying to calm himself out of it.

Rochelle froze, but for the motion of her hands to pull the door closed behind her, unsure of whether or not to approach. She watched him carefully, eyes following as he lifted a hand to knuckle against the bridge of his nose, his mouth curling unpleasantly as he braced himself against a visible shiver.

"He told me I was gonna die." he muttered, faintly.

Seeing red did not quite describe the crushing fury that burnt a ragged hole through Rochelle's insides. Bewilderment and confusion came only slightly secondary, but before she could open her mouth, he continued.

"He said y'all were dead already, 'n'he'd take his time with me." His voice, quiet, quavered just softly. "Make me cry."

As quick as she'd angered, Rochelle deflated, understanding dawning on her; Ellis was not talking about Nick. She couldn't stop herself from advancing, dropping to her knees just beside him, her hands darting forward to cup over his. The momentary panic of being unsure if the contact was appreciated quickly ended as Ellis' fingers shifted to loosely lace with hers.

"Baby -" she whispered, but he shook his head, and she quieted.

He inhaled, deeply, and steadied his shoulders to sit more in line with his body instead of the slump he'd been in. "He was gonna cut me up. He had me pinned down, so - I grabbed - I got his knife, 'n'put it right in his leg. He let me go just enough so I could get away. I ain't never hurt nobody before... I mean, not like that. Just zombies, 'n'... y'know, shootin' Keith with paint-balls'n'shit..."
Rochelle felt that anger rising back up. Directionless, it did little but choke at the base of her throat like foul air.

"Y'know -" A subtle, puffed laugh left him, one brow scrunching. The motion freed one gathered tear from his left eye, and he darted to brush his cheek against his shoulder, nudging it dry. "When we was kids, we'd grab up sticks'n'play slaps, 'cept with like, switches. Cut our hands up good. Went until someone wussed out, 'n'Keith ain't no wuss."

When he didn't get a laugh or much of a reaction at all, he hesitated, then drooped his head. His lips pursed, frame tensing. "... I got away, a minute, until he caught up. But he was - enjoyin' it. Tried tuh shoot muh legs out rather'n kill me, I guess, so I couldn't get away."

Rochelle's hands tightened on his, and she hoped her horror didn't show on her face. She'd been avoiding imagining precisely what had happened, and Ellis had been reluctant to offer details. Now, she wished she'd pressed sooner. Maybe he wasn't ready until now.

"But his gun blew up in his hands. All the heat'n'shrapnel came back at him, 'n'he died, real nasty. Bleedin' from the face'n'neck like a stuck pig - I think the shock just knocked him clean out, y'know? I tried tuh... I wanted tuh help him, but... happened so fast, 'n'I was scared, 'n'..."

Her thumb stroked against the back of his hand, struck by the sharp urge to cry. She'd made efforts not to think too hard about what Jerry had done - or intended to do - to Ellis, but she'd known it had been nothing good. She just hadn't known to what degree.

"I wouldn't never hurt someone if I could help it. I gotta keep believin' shit's good, y'know? That people are good. 'Cause..."

When he hesitated and faltered, Rochelle leaned forward, just softly, chin tilting to get a better look at his face and the frustration therein. He looked agitated, and a little lost. "Sweetie. You know I'm here for you. But what does this have to do with Nick leaving?"

Ellis' gaze lifted, softly landing on hers. His mouth pulled into a purse, nostrils flaring with a deep inhale, then popped his lips. Only hesitantly did he mumble, "I don't think I know him."

She stared, a rapid set of blinks fluttering her eyelids.

He seemed to deflate, shoulders drooping, eyes watering as his eyes half-slitted and forced the dampness to their corners. "I-I mean... I do. But I don't... know the important stuff, maybe. 'N'maybe... things only worked 'cause I didn't. Like... shit was kinda simple. I know that seems dumb, but -"

"It really, really doesn't." Rochelle stated, firmly, tightening her fingers on his. "What did he say?"

The Georgian's expression fell, an anxiety creeping up into his eyes. Only warily did he turn his wrists, lacing their hands completely together and squeezing.

"He... went tuh jail, Ro'." he whispered, voice coarse and hushed. "'Fer killin' somebody. I-I know it's... I know things're complicated, now, I know he kinda killed Jerry'n'you kinda killed Brenda - but... way before the Flu started, he... He watched the guy die, Ro'. He didn't even try tuh call somebody. If it was an accident, why wouldn't you call somebody?"

She wished she could have felt shock - but that wasn't quite what she felt. Disappointment, maybe, and disheartenment, but not shock. It was not a wild revelation to think Nick had some criminal past, though she hadn't pegged him as a murderer or a felon.
Instinctively, immediately, she imagined there was more to the story. The only times she'd seen him lean into true violence had been rooted somewhere in a protectiveness, whether that was precisely protecting Ellis or protecting the team as a whole. Even his recent behaviour had been, in his opinion, an attempt to keep Ellis safe.

She hadn't known what he'd meant by that.

Now she did.

It's not my job to hand him excuses. It's not my job to pick up the pieces after Nick shits the bed. I did that way too many times before, and I'm done helping Ellis get hurt. So what the hell do I say?

She returned the squeeze against his hands and leaned back in her crouch. "What do you want to do?"

Ellis looked at her with a tiny, frantic exhale, shrugging his shoulders up tightly. "I-I dunno. He just scared me. I... I needed tuh breathe. Still feel like I can't. I felt like I knew him, y'know? Felt like no matter what happened, we'd be okay, somehow. I... dunno if that's... stupid."

Rochelle shifted one of her hands, pulling it free from the tight clutch they had on each other, and raised it to settle her palm against his cheek. "Love takes work, and compromise, and that's from both of you." She petted her thumb against his cheekbone, softly. "The end of the world doesn't leave a lot of room for that."

At her touch, he frowned, and his gaze averted. It went distant, as if in intense thought. "I know I should be angry. I should be... I should feel used, or somethin'. He touched me last night, knowin' full well he was gonna leave. He... kept all this from me fer so long. I should feel pissed."

Watching his face shift gradually into a sad frown, she murmured, "But you don't."

Ellis leaned his cheek into her palm, eyes drifting shut, a few streaking lines of wetness darting freely down his face at the motion.

"I thought I could fight enough fer both of us. I wanted tuh fix things. He just wants tuh break 'em worse. Every time I try anythin', I just push him further away. Every time somethin' half-good happens, it's like he... aims tuh ruin it." His face screwed up slightly, confused, sour. "He said he needed me, Ro', but now he's leavin'? Whut'm I s'posed tuh do? Whut's he expect me to do?"

She sighed, letting her hand drop away from his face, feeling the slickness of tears clinging to the side of her palm. "Honestly? I don't know. And I don't think he does, either. I think he's a cornered animal, and they bite. Whether or not he cares about you or needs you or - whatever... That isn't necessarily the important part."

Ellis' eyes flickered to watch her, his jaw tightening, silent as she shrugged her shoulders.

"You can't always fix people. You can rarely really change them. And when someone's in a crisis, sometimes they just won't let you help them, even if part of them wants you to. It's... not always clean, or simple, or... easy to do the right thing."

He mumbled, then, "Screw doin' the right thing, I don't even know whut the right thing is."

She smiled just a little, sadly, tilting her head. "You've given him a lot more love than I think he's ever had before. That might... not be the solution. You're just... dumping glue on broken glass."

At that, his head lifted, and he searched her face for a moment. She tried her hardest to ensure it was transparent, displaying nothing but an honest gradient of emotion - some disappointment, some uncertainty, and perhaps too little hope for comfort.

"I can't convince him, can I?" left him, a breathy few syllables that gusted out of him, less like words and more like a sigh. His face fell gently, and she wondered if she'd gone for too much honesty. "Can't force him 'round."

He spoke like he knew the answer. Rochelle shrugged, gently, a sympathy leading her voice to soften. "I think you tried, so hard. If you still want a relationship with him... maybe what he needs is some room to breathe, instead. There's still time before we find them a boat. Just let him come down a little - he's so panicked right now, I don't think he can even hear you."

Ellis' head bobbed, gently, eyes drifting to the floor. "He was so sweet last night. I really thought shit was gonna change. Stupid." He had been absolutely heartbroken after Nick had ended their relationship. This time, there was a calmness to his attitude that somehow worried her more. "But it's all the same... him gettin' drunk or scared or whatever, but can't just kiss me'n'tell me he loves me."

Frowning, Rochelle felt a sigh pull insistently at her chest. She straightened, suddenly, and the motion made Ellis reflexively look up to follow her. She crossed her arms, lifting her shoulders as if to fend off cold.

Maybe I'm stupid, too, but part of me wonders if he didn't keep all that from you because he knew you'd get scared off. Now, telling you the truth... maybe part of him hoped you wouldn't care.

"Do you care?" she asked, abruptly, and when he darted an uncertain frown at her, she clarified. "About the jail time. Does him having that sort of history change your feelings about him? I know it seems... I know the right answer feels like 'no', but..."

Ellis sucked in air through his teeth, holding it in his chest for a moment before puffing it out. He seemed to think, genuinely, rolling the thought around in his head before speaking.

"I-I dunno. I mean, no, 'course not... But I... gotta know more, y'know? I wanna know... whut happened'n'why. I don't care whut he's done, I care why he did it, y'know? Or... whut he thinks 'bout it now, at least. That's whut matters." A quiet sadness twisted at his mouth. "I-I just panicked. Fer a minute, I -"

When he hesitated, Rochelle reached out and touched his shoulder, a comforting nudge. "You saw Jerry instead of Nick," she supplied.

That sadness duplicated, and before she could quite process, he'd straightened and grabbed her into a hug. She was quick to reciprocate, circling her arms around his midsection and gripping tightly, her cheek nestling against his neck.

"I love you, El."

The utterance made him stiffen. She thought for a moment that it might've been the wrong thing to say - hadn't she said it to him before? Surely she had... it felt like something she'd have said before - before he lunged forward a half-step to bring their hug to a crushing tightness.

"Love you, too." he whispered back, and she held him as tightly as she could manage.
The walk up the stairs was enough time for Rhiannon to think, but not enough time for her to reach any meaningful conclusions. She did not know her aim, did not know her motivation. She did not even immediately know why she felt so angry.

Did she want to talk him down, or throw fuel on the fire?

Did she want him to come at all?

Those questions felt too complicated, and the feelings around them even moreso, and she did not have the time or the energy to parse through it.

The considerate thing would have been to knock or, at least, to gently open the door and offer some amount of time for Nick to pick himself up. It was only proper, especially when he was almost certain to be in some sort of compromising position or, at least, disinclined to want company.

Rhiannon did not strive, generally, to be considerate. The small kindness she extended was in letting her footsteps be heavy, and thrusting the door open a few beats before actually stepping in.

It was enough time for the man seated on the bed to whip his head up and arrange his features into something resembling a scowl, but not nearly enough time for him to wipe the tears off his cheeks. His face was red, eyes bleary, and for a moment, she paused.

Whoa. Fucker has tear ducts, after all.

Then her momentum returned, and she marched a straight line toward him. The faint blur of dark motion that darted under the bed indicated the cat's retreat from wherever she'd been, and the vague pain in his eyes said it had not been a graceful bolt.

Bereft of a game-plan, Rhiannon leaned on instinct; if the man was vulnerable, it only made sense to attack.

"Time to powder your nose and put on your big boy pants, faggot." she announced, halting barely a foot from him. "Got two tons of zed on our doorstep and -"

She saw the tension bristle up his body, fingers clenching into fists, nails digging into his palms. He was upright in an instant, and what had been a foot between them became barely inches. She actually hadn't expected him to rise so instantly to the offered challenge.

"The fuck did you call me?" left him in a snarl. There was a fury to it, but something sharper, too, like fear.

A smile twitched at her mouth, lifting her chin, angling it as if to align for a kiss. The proximity seemed to throw him off, and she took advantage of it to press a little harder. "I said, get your ass up and let's go. Unless you'd rather we leave you here, maybe leave you some Astroglide in case a Tank shows up with a foot-long. How's that sound?"

She could feel the anger rise off him like heat. She could feel the pressure in the air of his urge to strike out, sensed the paper-thin restraint stopping him from doing so. In response, she lowered her voice to a murmur, curling her tongue against the roof of her mouth.

"Aw, what? Wanna tell me you don't like dick? Maybe Rochelle just wouldn't put out, so you got El to bend over for you? Nice enough ass to pretend, and I bet he sounds like a girl if you close your eyes."

He was, suddenly, so close their noses almost grazed. His hands jerked forward but did not make contact, and he barely maintained a level tone. The risen hackles and fury in his eyes would have been attractive, under different circumstances. "Shut the fuck up."

Rhiannon's hand slid forward, darting between them to brush knuckles against his stomach. He seemed to flinch away, a far cry from the way he'd leaned into her touch previously, but he did not retreat completely. It was most likely stubbornness more than anything - a game of chicken she'd won once before.

"You know, honey-pie, that'd be so much more threatening if you weren't in here bawling over your boyfriend."

Then, just as suddenly, she jabbed the tip of her thumb against the soft spot a few inches above his navel, just at the nexus of his ribs. The sharp motion made him suck in air, clearly pained by the nail thrust into the yielding muscle there. His jaw clenched around a response, but she didn't let up long enough to allow the interruption.

"And I don't think you've got a leg to stand on 'bout shutting the fuck up, dickhole. You blew our cover real good, you know that?"

That seemed to disarm him, his brows twitching up before he wrangled them back under control. The anger did not diffuse right away, but he did seem to reel himself in as she shifted the focus toward the bigger issue at hand. It was a little bit of a calculated threat. A reminder, less-than-subtle, that he'd endangered what good will he had with her and her sister.

It was a message that seemed to land, and he stood a half-step back... and then took one to the side, slitted eyes averting. "Blame your fucking sister, if you're going to blame somebody. She got me wasted."

Rhiannon let him retreat, her lips curving now in a firm grin. "'Got' you? Oh, yeah, bet you didn't have any choice, huh? Can't say no to the lesbian half your size?" If he was disarmed before, he flat-out staggered then. His head rotated so fast she imagined his neck barely survived the motion, eyes widening as he read her expression and the smug honesty therein. "Guess that explains why you can't say no to that blue-eyed piece of ass downstairs."

A vague pleasure spooled in her as he stared her down, shock slackening his features. The gambler did not speak, barely moved, and she snorted.

"Didn't know? She likes pussy more than you do, I bet." She raised her hand, spreading her index and middle finger in order to stick her tongue between them in a quick, mocking flick. "Oh, yeah. She had you and the kid pegged from the start, by the way. I didn't believe her."

His posture wavered, faltering, and he abruptly took a step back and dropped onto the edge of the bed, practically dead weight as he sat down. Nick's hands settled onto his knees, and he released a long breath that warped abruptly into half of a laugh.

"Seriously?" he ghosted out. "Of all the fucking - conniving little bitch."

Rhiannon grinned widely, now casually resting her chin in the cradle made by her fingers. "Please tell me you tried to jump her like you did me - last time we were out drinking, a dude grabbed her tits, and she knee'd him in the balls so hard he choked up his own dick. Probably the only blowjob..."
She tilted her head, watching as he reached to grab a handful of tousled blankets and buried his face into them. He spent just a few seconds in a half-hearted attempt to clean himself up, rubbing down the length of his face and squeezing the cloth against his nose with a snorted, wet exhale.

"Gross." she added.

Nick ignored her commentary entirely. "Wasted my charm on you. Didn't feel like going for seconds." he muttered, dryly, like he knew the pathetic humour of it all. "Lucky fucking me."

Rhiannon's grin broadened, then faded, a serious edge creeping into her expression as she observed him idly. You know, fucker's halfway to cute when he's given up. Can't keep up the hardcore, big dick shit when you're covered in snot, huh?

She took a step closer before dropping to sit on the edge of the bed beside him, looking forward rather than at him, even when he darted a twitching frown at her. "Look, dude. Level with me. Why are you trying to come with us, actually? You sold me some line about how you don't give a fuck about these guys, and that's pretty bullshit. All of us just got fisted wide open, so how about you just fucking explain it to me?"

Nick's chin lowered as he tossed the soiled blanket corner to the side, staring down toward the ground. "You really need me to spell it out?"

There was a moment of silence, then, and she couldn't shake the feeling that he'd offered her some surrender. Perhaps his guard dropped just a little, knowing Lena's orientation, or perhaps he'd simply been run entirely out of energy. Dunno if it's... real, or if he's just desperate to get out of here. Guess it doesn't fuckin' matter.

Her eyes stayed focused away, but she reached out, delivering a knuckled punch against his bicep that she hoped hurt. He didn't let on if it did. "What? Fucking zombies are knocking at our door, and you think anyone gives a shit about what hole you've left your jizz in?"

Bewilderment made him shift away. She bit back a snort when he thrusted his hands up, palms out, an almost pitchy confusion twisting at his voice. "You... literally just called me a -"

"Some of my favourite people are fags." she interrupted, shifting her weight to lean in toward him, gaze flickering to examine his face. She moved quick enough to catch the discomfort there, like a wound, like he was only just catching air past something that had his throat constricted. He tried to muffle it into a tight frown, but she knew that look. She knew that agony.

It inclined her towards patience - and it might've even drawn some sympathy from her if she'd been in the mood to entertain the emotion.

"I'm not fucking gay." he muttered. "I like women. I was married. Hooker once asked for my number so we could meet up off the clock. I'm a lot of things, but I'm not -"

Slapping her hand against her cheek, Rhiannon uttered a faux-gasp, rolling her eyes. "Holy shit, congratulations. You just invented bisexuality. A bunch of dudes just found out they can get a dick in their ass while their dick's in a pussy, and it's all thanks to you."

"Fuck you - Jesus." His posture tightened, irritation making him exhale out a sharp noise. "It's not like that. It's - not that simple. And it's not the point, anyway."

With a shrug, Rhiannon offered up, "So what is the point? You're not crying because we found out you were pounding it out with the twink." When he let off a frustrated noise in blatant protest, she shrugged her shoulders. "Call 'em like I see 'em, sweet-cheeks. Fuck that shit, alright? Just tell me - what the fuck are you cunts fighting about?"

Nick did not speak for a moment, lacing his fingers together between his knees and staring down at them. It took him a fairly long moment before he'd cooled himself off to the point where he could focus. He pieced together a response, and when he did speak, it was hard not to notice the hollowness in it. He seemed exhausted.

"You know what's fucking stupid?"

She sat there, arching her studded brow, raising a hand to wipe her wrist against the corner of her mouth. She let the silence hang until he spoke again.

"I'm fighting to throw away the only good thing that's ever happened to me."

They lingered in that silence again, her eyes flickering on and off him, her cheeks slowly inflating to a heavy puff. Nick did not move, eyes anchored onto his hands, tension building slowly in his shoulders. It was insecurity, and the sort of emotion that tended to build to a breaking point. She couldn't tell if it would be a good break or a bad break.

Thoughtlessly, Rhiannon let the trapped air in her cheeks burst out in a popped sound, and stated: "That's gay as shit."

It was an unexpected - but not unwelcome - development when Nick barked out a strained, nasal laugh, quickly stifling the tail-end of it like it embarrassed him. He lifted a hand to press the heel of it against his forehead, grinding there. A sigh made his shoulders drop. "You're an absolute fucking moron. How did you and Lena come from the same gene pool?"

She grinned just a little, before shifting her weight. She threw her arm over his shoulders, feeling him bristle under the touch, his tentative humour melting away instantly. Rather than let off, she squeezed at his bicep with the hand that was now draped against it, tilting her head to get a better look at his face.

"You know, step one to fixing a fuck-up, is stop doing the fuck-up."

He hesitated, gaze flickering to hers, and she was thrown by the soft frown that arose on his lips. "Doll, you're missing the point. The fuck-up was... getting involved in this in the first place. I'm trying to... stop. That's all I was trying to do. I just... I think -"

Nick's expression fell, and for a moment, the exhaustion and the hangover and the argument all seemed to build to a weight that he could not quite stand under. A shiver touched his frame, his eyes half-closing, and he murmured, "I just finally ripped the band-aid off. Should be over."

Rhiannon fidgeted only a little, lips flattening. "So you were aiming to make the guy lock himself in the bathroom?" she offered, dryly.

The very last breath of the words was yanked out of her in a gust when Nick pushed abruptly to stand, shrugging out from under her arm in a sudden shudder of irritation. She let him go without a fight, watching him turn away, his hand brushing over his mouth in a nervous gesture.

A sigh left him, strained, before he shook his head. "Didn't do anything except make him realize what I've known a while now. Kid's too... himself to give up on somebody. I just made it easier on him."
She frowned, then, allowing her voice to harshen to a curtness. She liked Nick - but she liked Ellis, too. That was part of the problem, and part of the complex series of emotions that had her fairly uncertain of what side she was on. "Guess I'm not the only moron cunt in the room."

His head turned, and there was a moment where he looked at her, and she swore that she could see the flicker of neutrality enter his expression. A switch flipped, and distance built between them, tangible friction in the air. Something closed in his posture, though she'd not fully processed that it had been open.

"You have a fuckin' impressive amount of opinions on something you've been in on for about an hour." escaped him, and it felt somewhere between a flat-out snub and an accusation. He lifted a hand, thumbing against his nose. "You asked me to explain it. I did. We done here?"

A smile twitched at Rhiannon's face. She tucked her hands together and set them in a frame under her chin, batting her eyelashes gently. "Easy, sweet-cheeks, don't be mad at me. You twisted your own balls here."

Nick hesitated almost imperceptibly before he turned away, reaching down to adjust and straighten his sweats on his hips. The defusal of his anger felt like the closest she'd get to an admittance she was right. "Do me a favour and go get my clothes?" As if he instantly knew that she'd take issue with some part of the request, he quickly asserted, "It's better for all of us if I stay up here, at least for now."

Rhiannon considered an outright refusal, but decided instead to go with an arguable amount of truth. "Shit out of luck on that one, dude." His brows flinched in irritation, gaze tilting to look at her from over his shoulder. "There's a mosh pit building up out there, and we need to move."

He inhaled, sharply, mouth tightening into a thin line before he shook his head. An obvious flicker of panic flared in his eyes, though his tone remained fairly even. "Coach is -"

"Coach is fine. Guy's made of steel." she responded, haltingly, her shoulders lifting. "We're leaving, dude. And you're going to have to look your boyfriend in the eyes sooner than later, so tighten up your nutsack and let's go. As fun as watching you guys fight is, we have shit to do."

Nick's body was stiff, and he almost seemed frozen there, his mind scabbling for an escape plan and coming up with nothing.

Rhiannon spared a faint roll of her eyes, then pushed to stand, offering her left hand toward him. "Wanna hold my hand, sweetie?" she cooed, wiggling her hips. "We can go together. I won't let them yell at you."

Anger lit dully in his eyes, and he sighed, tilting his chin up to glance toward the ceiling. "Fine, Jesus, I take your goddamn point, Blondie. Just... go get my fucking clothes, okay? And Mag's carrier. If we're going, I gotta get her packed up."

She grinned lightly, dropping her arm and turning toward the door. As she walked, she thrust her arms to either side, letting out a short burst of a whistle. "Well, shit. You didn't use up all your charm, after all. I'm so horny right now I can barely stand it." she uttered in a loud monotone, her amusement strictly inward.

Nick watched her leave the room and kick the door shut behind herself. He calmed only incrementally, slowly wrapping his arms around his torso, tightening them until he almost felt like his arms might hold him together. He exhaled, and it shook.
Realizing, in hindsight, that Lena had known exactly what they'd been talking about when they'd discussed his supposed relationship with Rochelle... it had a strange effect on him, and not one he'd have anticipated. Was it getting a little easier to talk about, every time he talked about it? Did it hurt a little less, to be known by someone, every step he came closer to them?

It was an infantile sort of realization, perhaps, and pathetic by virtue of its simplicity, but he sat with it for a moment. He sat with the awareness that, once again, his privacy had been shorn from him and, once again, he found that he'd braced for something far worse than what truly unfolded.

Talking to Rhiannon had been something weirdly close to cathartic.

This time, at least, when he turned his head and glanced longingly toward the small window built into the side of the master bedroom, his urge to open it and climb out felt less sincere.

Even if that'd still be a hell of a lot easier.
Coach sat with their weapons in an array around him, thoughtfully checking the guns and ensuring they were fully loaded, as much as they could be. It was a necessary action, but also one that soothed him. He could do very little else, after all.

Context had been slow to come to him. He felt like he was consistently a few miles behind his teammates when it came to learning information and, more critically, understanding it fully. It had taken him a long time to come to terms with everything that had happened, and while he finally felt like things were within his grasp, he'd ended up more confused than ever.

He wanted to protect everyone involved, but was that even possible? And how was he to manage that when he didn't know what the optimal outcome was?

He knew, more acutely than most, that two good people weren't necessarily good for each other. He also knew that without conflict and strain, there was no room for growth. Both of his friends were at a pivotal moment in their development, and whether or not that development would lead to a renewed relationship... it would lead to somewhere new.

Wish I knew how to lead 'em there. I ain't no Moses.

Rochelle was frustrated, and he understood that. He'd been angry and lost his temper more than once with Nick; he just hadn't been expecting that the whole conflict would turn such that he felt just as bad for both men, and Rochelle's sympathy had run dry.

Nick was, charitably, unwell. The stress of everything had clearly taken its toll on all of them, but Nick perhaps most of all.

Thing is, Ro' was right. He don't have a plan. Ain't that wild? If he were calculatin' out his best odds, goin' with 'em to have a better shot at survivin', I'd almost be less worried. But he ain't. Ain't even thought through what he'll do, or how. That ain't the Nick I know.

He was unsure why Rhiannon had hurried to be the one to rouse Nick to attention, but he had his doubts. Still, he was hardly a good candidate for the spot; Nick was doubtlessly furious with him for betraying his trust.

And for all that, what had they gained? Ellis and Rochelle, locked away in the bathroom, speaking in whispered tones. Nothing good, that much was clear, and so Coach gritted his jaw and sorted through some of the smaller pockets of their shared backpack.

He found a few twenty dollar bills, folded messily against one another. He found a box of tiny band-aids with a variety of cartoon characters. He found a very compressed bag of soft candy sharks. He found a coin-roll of mints, unopened. He found a few loose scraps of fabric that he only belatedly recognized as Nick's old suit jacket.

He returned most of it to where he'd found it - except the money, which he crumpled in a hand and tossed aside.

A laugh huffed behind him in response, but he paid it no mind, zipping up the various pockets he'd examined and turning his attention to the two main sections. As he unzipped the biggest of them, Lena shifted to kneel beside him, her hands tucked primly between her thighs.

Coach did not acknowledge her, pulling out the limited supplies they still had stowed away. He counted out a few ounces of hydrogen peroxide, a roll of bandage tape and a roll of Scotch tape, two small bundles of gauze, and a few palm-sized adhesive patches. There was a box of tampons tucked in the bottom, and he allowed himself a moment to process that before he added them to the 'keep' pile.

The stitched pockets in the inner wall of the backpack held a few pill bottles: a few days' worth of the antibiotics and painkillers Chris had been taking, a small bottle of ibuprofen. Tucked away in the far left one was the empty bottle of the celecoxib that had his name on it: his knee pills.

He'd been unable to throw them away. Seeing his name printed on a label was soothing, somehow, and made him think of the day he'd picked them up. It felt like a good memory. It felt like some stubborn proof that his previous life was not a figment of his imagination.

His knee pain probably should have sufficed, but that felt pessimistic.

"We should look for a store." Lena advised, quietly. "Pick up some basic stuff, even just a bunch of Advil. And... see if we can find a clinic. Even a vet would work. Getting some actual medical supplies would be a lifesaver."

Coach didn't nod, didn't look her way. He pulled out an empty Ziploc bag crumpled near the bottom of the backpack and started to fill it, organizing the gauze and medication inside of it. As he did so, he simply grunted, "Don't much like the idea of walkin' our asses into a hospital. I'd think it'd be damn crawlin' with zombies."

A snort bounced Lena's shoulders, cocking her head. "And the streets aren't? If anything, it's evac zones you have to worry about. That's where things got crazy."

"Maybe." he hedged.

He wasn't particularly angry with her. He knew how manipulative Nick could be, and if he blamed anyone for the situation, he blamed himself. It had been his injury that had waylaid them, and his lack of awareness that had allowed Nick to sneak such a plan under their noses. If he'd been a little more attentive, a little more forceful... maybe he could've avoided it all.

If he'd pushed the issue at the Sunset, would they have ended up where they were?

Footsteps down the stairs drew both of their attention, and neither of them spoke as Rhiannon came bounding out of the dining room. She didn't pay them much mind, either, darting right down the hallway and swinging into the laundry room at the far end of the house.

Coach and Lena blinked at each other, his brow raising subtly in a blatant question. She shrugged, gently, and they returned their attention toward the laundry room in unison, watching with unspoken and almost tongue-in-cheek bated breath.

When the blonde returned into view, it was with Nick's clothes draped messily over her. The jeans were almost straddling her neck, either leg dangled down over her chest, and she'd tied the shirt around her waist by the arms. She'd tucked the socks in the left zipper pocket of her black pants, stuck out like tongues.

His boxers were dangling from her right hand, fingers pinching it by the waistband and holding it arms' length.

From the kitchen, hidden from Coach's view, Christophe let out a whistle. He called out, a laugh threaded into his tone, "¿Es la ropa de Nico? ¡Y parece que explotó por todas partes!"
Rhiannon grinned into the kitchen, waving the boxers like a flag as she walked back toward the front room. "I'm gonna assume that was a joke and say 'hah.' Hey fucknuts." she uttered, pausing at the end of the couch in order to bend down and snag the strap of Maggie's carrier where it had been tucked under the couch. She dragged it free, and started to turn away, intent on returning upstairs.

"Everythin' a'ight?" Coach grunted, raising his voice enough to carry, watching as the blonde stutter-stepped to a halt and glanced back at him. Her mouth flashed to a twisted little frown.

"Nicky still alive up there?"

She shrugged a shoulder, clicking her tongue against the roof of her mouth. That question seemed to give her pause, but she eventually answered, "Alive. Dude needs a cigarette, though, and probably a fuck. Guess that's out of the question now, though."

The slightest choke of air caught in Coach's throat, and he quickly cleared it, sparing a glance at Lena. She gave him a helpless look, her mouth just-faintly curled, and he returned his attention to Rhiannon. "That hanky-panky shit got us in this mess." he retorted, tiredly.

Rhiannon laughed, airily, flashing a wink in his direction. "Too much, or not enough, big guy?"

She spun back around on her heel, returning to her stride, disappearing back into the stairwell.

Coach couldn't help but chuckle after her, shaking his head, focusing down toward his hands. He didn't let the silence linger, gaze settling onto the backpack he hadn't yet finished with, and directed his next comment toward Lena.

"You mind lookin' fo' some batteries? Last thing we need is to run these radios out of power in the middle of a crisis." he uttered, attention shifting to the smaller main pocket of the backpack. It was full of what remained of their lighter food, a few snack bags and a handful of granola and oat bars. There was some trash and empty wrappers there, too, and he took a moment to clear it out.

Lena hummed, but didn't move to obey. She leaned forward, reaching out a hand to settle against his wrist, and he was forced to bring his nervous momentum to a halt. When he looked at her, she spoke.

"Coach, if there are hard feelings between us, I'd like to deal with them. You were -" Her voice fumbled, and she somewhat awkwardly forced the words out in their proper order. There was an edge of desperation to her voice, and it bemused him. "I need you to understand why I'm doing this. And I know you do, deep down, because I know you'd do anything for them, and - Rhee's my 'them', and -"

"Why?" he interrupted, before he really thought it through. His arm dropped out from under her touch, and he half-turned, appraising her with a tight frown. "Why do you need anythin' from me?"

She hesitated, a similar frown pulling at her mouth, before she released a soft laugh.

"That girl don't need shit from nobody. Neither of you girls do." He began to re-pack the supplies, satisfied with its cleanliness. "Ain't angry at you. Just angry at the way shit works out sometimes."

Angry 'cause I can't go upstairs or go in that damn bathroom.
Why did he feel so repeatedly, constantly, overwhelmingly useless?

Coach felt her gaze on him, so he stood up with a grunt. "Nick's been tryin' to make his way out, since before y'all girls showed up. You didn't make the boy go wild, an' you fo' sho' didn't give him no idea he didn't already have. Don't go takin' on our mess like it's somethin' you did. I'd be lyin' if I said you were helpin', an' I ain't happy with yo' ass, but you didn't cause shit. So quit watchin' me do work, and go find me some damn batteries."

His voice did not have an edge, but it was firm, and she stared at him with enough surprise to stifle any response she might've summoned. The silence was fine with him; they'd make no progress between the two of them, anyway.

The big man turned away, settling his palm against the bandages taped into the crease of his neck, placing some pressure against the dull ache there. The windows were still covered, and he stepped up close to them, nudging a corner just far enough to the side to enable him to peek outside.

It was still raining. There was still a sizeable amount of infected milling in the perimeter of where he could see. It was still, overall, an awful morning.

He might've not found any pleasure in the sight, but looking outside eased some gentle claustrophobia in him; as not eager as he was to get on the move again, he needed fresh air. The situation was closing around them with iron jaws, and while an open sky over their heads would not solve anything, it might make things feel less dire.

Coach sighed, and almost turned away - but something caught his eye.

Standing in the center of the road was a single infected. At a glance, it seemed like an average zombie. The proportions and the posture were near enough to human, minus a few missing chunks of flesh that were leaking black in the rain. There were no tentacles or sagging belly or oversized limbs, and no shock-green acid or wispy smoke.

However, unlike its nearby counterparts, it was not wandering. It did not stumble and stagger and grip its head. It stood almost perfectly still, staring ahead, almost directly away from Coach's view.

He watched it, driven by some instinct, noticing its aberrant behaviour against the backdrop of the other zombies' erratic movement and motion. The apocalypse made people paranoid, perhaps justifiably, but having his neck torn open by a strange Hunter had made him especially nervous.

The infected rotated at the waist, scanning the street to its left, and then to its right.

The thing seemed to be searching, and that was a far cry from the behaviour of commons, who did not actively seek out the survivors except when disturbed. Noise caught their attention more than sight - sometimes they were so focused in whatever misery made them clutch their foreheads and claw at their stomachs that they didn't notice anything further than a few yards from them.

If its left elbow hadn't been exposed to the bone, black material clotted and dribbling in thick sheets against the bloodied meat of its anatomy, he might've even taken a moment to wonder if it was an injured human. As it was, he recalled the strange infected that Nick and he had encountered in the yard of their previous base.

The creature they'd seen then had been a little too human for comfort. It had run in a strange show of self-preservation, much like some of the heavily mutated infected tended to do, but it had lacked any such physical mutations.

This another one? Ain't sure what to make of them. Ain't too dangerous, just... little too smart fo'
Standing in the street, it turned, head cocking, and began to scan the houses around it. Its mouth gaped open as if its jaw were broken, and its lips trembled with failed efforts to close against one another. The rain pattered against its skin, eyes wide and damp as they took on rainwater, the yellow glint of them only barely visible in the low light of the wet morning.

He was not concerned. It would never see him, not from that distance, and not with rain and soft fog obscuring the view. Plus, the gap in the curtains that he peeped out through was small enough that he would never catch its notice.

Then it saw him.

The way it glanced and caught sight of him made him startle, jolting back an inch, and he found himself frozen as it wheeled around with sudden interest. Its mouth moved in a shriek, but the sound was dampened by the rain so much that Coach could see nearby infected failing to react.

It screamed a second time, head snapping forward with the force of it, and two zombies did take some notice, but they only scrambled a few yards closer to it before losing interest again. They were agitated now, though, more focused than they'd been before, even if most of their ire was directed at the zombie that had disturbed them.

It, on the other hand, had not lost sight of its target.

"Shit." he uttered, watching it break into a sprint. It did not sprint directly at him, however. It ran parallel out of sight, and quickly disappeared toward the right side of the house.

There was no back door to the building, but the first floor bedroom had windows. If it was sprinting to break into those, he'd hear it shortly. Fortunately, nobody was back there... but he still cursed himself inwardly; the last thing they needed was a disturbance when they weren't ready to run.

Christophe's voice inquired softly at him, footsteps approaching as if drawn by his outburst. "¿Jefe?
You are okay?"

With a sharp grunt, Coach stepped away from the window. He did not charge across the room, but he moved at a quick pace, returning to the wall where he'd left the weapons. Dropping into a bend, he scooped up his double-barrel shotgun, tucking it into the crook of his elbow along with a handful of shells, pushing those into the pocket of his slacks.

"No." he stated, words stiff, a slight embarrassment making him curt. "Caught someone's eye. Lee, stay with Chris. Don't see nothin' comin' from the front, but who knows."

He was relieved to see the brunette biker come jogging back, taking him seriously and unquestioningly, and a little relieved to see Chris snatching his machete up from the ground as well. The Spaniard waggled it in his hand, flipping it up and catching it by the handle, a grin crossing his face as he winked in Lena's direction.

He seemed more confident than he'd been in a while. Maybe there was something positive to his and Rochelle's dalliance, after all. It would've been a nice change.

Coach focused, however, on striding toward the back of the house. If the infected was going to burst the back window and attempt to invade, he'd meet it with a faceful of buckshot.

That was the plan, anyway.
In actuality, he hadn't made it halfway through the hallway, hadn't even passed beyond the kitchen, when the very last thing he expected - or needed - to hear sounded out. It felt like a kick to the gut, and he couldn't help but cast a frustrated thought upwards.

Just outside, as if from the neighboring house to their right, came the whoop-whirl of a car alarm.

It could be heard even through the rain and the walls, and it started so suddenly, he jumped fresh out of his skin. His eyes swiveled in its direction, instinctively, even though he could only see the interior wall of the house, and he sucked in a sharp breath.

The source of the alarm's triggering and the cause of it escaped him, but he couldn't help but notice that the infected still had yet to break in. The only sound in the air was the alarm, and the zombie had almost certainly had enough time to close the distance between it and the back window.

Its absence nagged at him, a concern he would not disregard, but his immediate attention shifted to listening.

The rain could not fully disguise the roar that rose up around them, some far-off or muffled by the storm and others awfully close, and he felt the hair on the back of his neck prickle. The horde would be drawn to the sound next-door, but then they'd hunt for life. At best, they'd be trapped. At worst, the horde would zero in on them.

"Shit." he repeated, settling his index finger squarely on both triggers of his shotgun. He glanced over his shoulder, watching Lena pull into a tight position at Chris' flank, her heavy brush-hook gripped in her hands. The bathroom door swung open, and Ellis and Rochelle tumbled out, both looking startled and uncertain.

He caught Ellis' eye, and nodded toward the weapons. The other Georgian stiffened his jaw and bolted in that direction, and Rochelle was close behind.

They were not ready, but when were they ever ready? And when had they truly, actually, let ill-preparedness or strife affect their reaction to crisis? When had they - when it was down to the wire - ever done anything but put their makeshift family unit first?

Coach did not have faith in much, anymore, but he had faith in his team.

When he spoke, it was grim, but unafraid.

"Keep yo' shit tight, kids. It lookin' to get nasty in here."
Ellis hunched into the wall just in front of the front door, his pump shotgun held against his chest. The car alarm had squealed to a fever pitch, and with it, the horde grew to a shrieking climax. The flow of bodies around the house was hard to hear in the rain, but he could pick out their howls as they flooded around the neighboring house.

Glass and metal shattering seemed to mark their attempts to destroy the car, much like they'd done at the mall, and the car alarm modulated higher as they doubtlessly piled atop it. None of the horde had paid any attention to the house the survivors were in, but that would not last.

"Maybe we should run for it." he wondered aloud. "While the car's got 'em distracted. We could bolt fer the car, get movin'."

Lena was opposite him, standing at the window, her brush-hook wielded low. She shook her head, just once. "It's not going to keep them that distracted. And I'm a pretty good driver, but driving a motorcycle in the rain is dangerous. Running away from zombies on a motorcycle in the rain is just plain stupid."

"We can take them." Rochelle responded, easily, 9mm pistol gripped with both hands. She'd taken the backpack onto her shoulders, and stood just beside the couch, eyes wary. "Open the door, start taking them out while the car alarm is here to cover our gunshots. We move once things look clear enough."

Coach grunted an affirmation, his attention focused toward the back of the house. "Agreed. Ellis, clear the door. Y'all girls get his back. Only other way in is the bedroom - so we'll bottleneck 'em in the dinin' room." When no one argued, his voice tightened. "Now where the hell is -"

The noise and chaos made it hard to hear the footsteps as Nick and Rhiannon came barreling down the stairs, but their presence was quickly apparent. Ellis did not want to flinch, but he did. He did not want to dread the man's presence, but he did.

It wasn't that he didn't want to see Nick. Part of him wanted to, terribly - in fact, part of him wanted to draw the man into his arms and kiss him and tell him none of it mattered. He wanted to move on, forgive and forget, just stop, because the alternative was to keep fighting and keep hurting each other.

But that wasn't the right thing to do.

That wasn't the thing he needed to do.

"What the fuck -" left both of the approaching survivors in eerie unison, but where Nick halted, the blonde did not.

"- shitballs is going on?" Without waiting for an answer, she lunged to grab her bat from where it was braced against the wall. Tucking that under her armpit, she grabbed her stun baton as well, using the wrist-strap to tie it loosely to one of the beltloops in her pants. The baton was then secured there, dangling against her thigh, freeing her to get both hands on her baseball bat. "Turn my back for two fuckin' seconds, and you guys get in the shit?"

Nick had not come past the dining room's boundary, and when Ellis turned his head, he found the man's gaze squarely focused on him. He hung on it, frozen there, like not even the encroaching horde could distract him.
He seemed desperate and almost hesitant, Maggie's carrier hugged to his chest. He seemed - raw, roughened. Ellis didn't want to hope, but was the redness and flush to his face exertion or the aftermath of tears? Had he cried?

It put a shiver up his spine, and he felt like there was an overwhelming pressure crushed against his chest in that moment. How could he say everything he wanted to in a look? How could he communicate how he felt without words? How could he put his heart into something so fragile as a glance?

He knew he couldn't, and he did not try - but there, struggling with the soft melancholy that came with facing down danger, the answer felt obvious.

I don't care whut you done. I don't care who you were. Not really. I care 'bout who you are, now, 'n'even if I don't know everythin' about you... I know who you are. I know who I'm in love with.

It hurt.

I love you. But you gotta figure out whut you want, 'cause I can't... make you want me. You gotta decide if we're worth fightin' for, instead of fightin' tuh quit. You gotta decide that, 'cause... I don't think I can make you. Wish I could. Thought I could just grab on, hold tight enough... maybe love you enough tuh make up the difference. But I can't, can I? I'm just makin' it worse.

Strangely, he felt a calmness, then.

But I'll wait, darlin'. I'll wait 'til you figure it out. I don't got a lot, but I got patience'n'I got time. You and me, we can figure this shit out, if you want. If you want me.

The car alarm screamed out - then halted. It was hardly silent afterwards, as the infected surrounding them continued to shriek and the rain had only intensified, but it was such a difference that it felt like his ears started to ring.

"There goes that plan." Coach muttered. "Glad they didn't come after our car, at least."

Ellis averted his gaze, staring down at his hands where they clutched his shotgun before he turned toward the front door. "Y'all get ready. I'm gonna take some shots." He barreled forward, pushing his arm through the strap of his gun and letting it fall against his back to free his hands, immediately crouching so he could grab the TV stand by the front edge.

"Careful, sunshine." Lena's voice broke through his concentration, and he nodded toward her without looking.

Pulling hard, he felt its feet slide across the carpet with some resistance, and he only drew it back far enough to give himself room to work with. Hopping up and over it, he grabbed the bookshelf that was blocking the door, leveraging it into a twist to pull it away.

"He did not remove the bookshelf entirely, either - just rotated it away enough that he'd be able to open the door a foot or two. As he settled in front of the mostly-revealed door, he glanced over his shoulder, attention drifting toward Rochelle as he held a hand out toward her. "Can I get that pistol?"

She obeyed, darting to close the gap between them and turning the handgun around to offer the grip out to him. Their fingers brushed in the gesture, and he gave her a small smile. He tried to say I'm okay. but it was hard to know if it came across.

Rochelle smiled back, at least, and Ellis turned back around.
He wasted no time, shouldering against the doorframe and opening the front door with his left hand. He nosed the pistol quickly into the gap, giving himself a few inches to see through at first. His gaze darted to assess what he could see of the front yard and the road.

With the car alarm halted, there was no longer one discrete location drawing the infected. While most of them were still shrieking and howling to the right of the building, an additional stream of bodies flooded into the street, still chasing the stimulus of activity. Their advance was less focused, however, and some even slowed or drifted in their path.

Ellis nudged the door open a few more inches, letting his left hand stabilize the pistol as he cocked his head and let his gaze focus through and past the sights.

He focused on one in particular, a female infected that had staggered to a stop on the sidewalk. She screamed, the sound barely discernible amongst the chorus of voices around her, and flared her arms out in a gesture that might've been anguish.

She was still for just long enough -

The Georgian tensed his arms as he pulled the trigger, feeling the gun kick gently in his hands, the harsh snap of the gunshot echoing out and into the morning air. He couldn't resist a grin as she jolted, blood splashing out from the base of her neck as the bullet hit home.

"Gotcha!" he breathed, the familiar scent of burnt gunpowder acrid in his nostrils. She did not go down, but she stumbled forward, grabbing at her throat and bending low as if trying to choke in air.

The second shot found a home in the bared top of her skull, hair and flesh torn asunder by the penetration of the bullet, and she went suddenly limp.

His excitement was temporary, as four of the nearby infected in sight snapped their gazes toward the gunshots, and a hitch in the screaming to his right preceded it heightening and pitching up. His attempt to catch their attention had worked, though perhaps too well.

Bracing his feet into a wider stance and stabilizing his upper body, he focused in on the few infected he could see, bringing his gun to bear on their approaching forms.

It was easier to hit a target running straight for him, and he struck dead-center in the nearest zombie's chest - but it kept running as if nothing had happened. Only when the next bullet struck it in the shoulder did it even stagger, and the momentary slowdown caused the infected behind it to crash into it, knocking the wounded zombie to the ground.

He flicked his aim up, sights coming into focus on the new target as it trampled over its injured fellow. When he pulled the trigger, its head snapped backwards, gore spraying from the back of its skull in a black-red gush.

It collapsed, body shuddering, convulsing with whatever life remained.

Ellis could've taken a few more shots at approaching infected, but shrieks and footsteps thundering close on the right side of the building drew his attention. Rather than risk it, he jolted back, grabbing his shotgun with one hand to flatten it against his side. With it secured, he hopped his weight up to seat himself onto the TV stand blocking him in, then swung his legs to throw his body up and over.

His balance did not quite straighten out, and he landed hard on his hands and knees, quickly scrabbling to get back to his feet, shouting as he did. "They're comin!'"
The pistol was plucked out of his grip before he'd even stood entirely, and he spun to face the door, bringing his shotgun up to hip-height. His hand settled on the pump-action lever, his shoulder brushing Rochelle's as she came to stand flanking him, her pistol raising.

Behind them, Christophe drew close, his machete wielded carefully in his hand. "Once more, amigos." he murmured, almost too quiet to be heard over the approaching noise.

They were ready.

Then the windows burst inward.

Two bodies threw themselves into the house, lunging through the window, throwing glass and getting tangled in the makeshift curtains they'd hung over the glass. Lena shrieked, swallowing the tail end of it into a choked sound as she spun on her heel. Glass sprayed in, only barely muffled by the blankets, and more than one fleck caught against her skin and threatened to cut.

She raised her brush-hook, bracing her heels into the carpet as she put her body weight behind the weapon, holding it up and diagonal like one might a defensive spear.

One of the infected fell onto it, and the tool's heavy blade sheared straight through its ribs, aided by its own weight. She struggled to hold it up on its feet as its legs went limp, and she was forced to let it drop to its knees against the carpet. The large male zombie scrabbled its hands at the shaft of the weapon, screaming out, blood sputtering from its twisted mouth.

The other infected crashed in, falling into the television they'd left near the window, knocking the slim screen over as the zombie landed with a shriek on its side. It was quick to surge to its feet, and it might've jumped at Lena had Rhiannon not been abruptly next to her, leg swinging with the momentum of her last, long step.

The collision of her boot against its chin sent it into a half-roll backwards, a sickening crack sounding out. It seemed, however, to hurt her about as much as it hurt the infected, and she bowed forward with a blustered curse.

"Fuckshit, fuckshit cunt."

Her voice was mostly covered by the scattered gunshots from the door, tremendously loud in the enclosed space, and her ears rang as her not-yet-healed ankle protested the rough treatment.

"Dick ass!"

Wielding her bat tightly, she wheeled to her full height with her face strained in a frustrated expression. Getting a two-handed grip on the weapon, she let her upper body coil back before slamming the bat down against the zombie's body. It was more of an irritated gesture than one meant to kill, and it took a few blows before the infected stopped moving.

Lena twisted her weapon, jamming the brush-axe a little deeper, and blood guttered around the blade. The infected shrieked, squealing as its attempts to surge forward and claw at her only drove the weapon deeper into its chest cavity. It slowly faltered and slumped against the weapon, its death almost agonizingly protracted as its heartbeat pulsed out blackened blood.

Both sisters pulled away from their kills, panting. Rhiannon was speckled with blood all down her front, and Lena's hands were stained a greyish-red from what had gushed down the brush-hook.

They blinked at one another, silently taking stock, and an apology bled into Lena's eyes.
Rhiannon's mouth cut into a severe line, and she turned as a third infected sprinted toward the now blown out windows, launching itself through the hole created by its predecessors. She lifted her bat, putting her weight behind a swing to meet it as it came into arms' reach.

The way its skull split under the blow was intensely satisfying.

The front door managed, at first, to funnel them down. With the bookshelf blocking the door from opening all the way, the zombies could only cram themselves through one at a time. That made them easy pickings for Ellis and Rochelle, with Chris darting in to keep them at bay or finish fallen ones off while one of them was reloading.

However, they'd restricted access to the door well enough that the infected began to abandon that point of entry entirely. Most of them ran to the left and spilled against the windows, drawn to the screams of their fellows, and Rochelle started to split her attention between the two openings and carefully peppered shots at a safe distance from the sisters.

A not-insignificant amount of them ran in the other direction, and they struck wildly at the outside of the house as they went. Their bodies and fists beat against the walls, dull thuds in strange contrast to the insistent pattering of rain over the whole building. The sounds marked out their rapid path around the perimeter of the house in search of a way in.

The feeling that things were under control was quickly being overtaken by the feeling they were being surrounded. Trapped.

Coach's body prickled, and he lifted his shotgun up to aim down the hallway. It came as no surprise to him when he heard glass shatter in the first-floor bedroom.

"Nicky." he barked, short but soft, making the man startle where he stood.

The gambler had picked his katana up, twisting Maggie's carrier straps and looping his arm through them a few times until she was strapped almost flat against his side. The carrier was rigid enough to keep its shape, though the positioning had it tilted at an angle that was undoubtedly unpleasant for the feline.

In the middle of a horde, however, keeping her close seemed more important than the cat's immediate comfort.

Still, that didn't entirely explain away his behaviour; Coach could tell he was shaken, and it was a subtle hollowness that had crept in since he'd arrived downstairs. Was it the argument, or the aftermath of it? Had the consequences of his actions finally settled in, and he'd realized the uncomfortable position they all now stood in? Or was it something else?

Coach felt like he'd missed something, because Nick gravitated toward him obediently, eagerly, and that was not the behaviour he'd exhibited upstairs.

Without a word, the eldest survivor strode forward, presuming - correctly - that the other man would follow. He led with the nose of his shotgun, rushing across the kitchen to reach the hallway, only slowing slightly as he entered the slim T-intersection that contained the laundry room and the downstairs bedroom.

It was sparsely decorated, just a simple bed tucked against the wall, with a few piled blankets just beside it on the floor indicating where one of the sisters had slept. The cramped space was lit up by the window on the far wall, though that light was dampened by the infected currently crawled halfway through the windowframe.
Coach's mouth crunched up in a frown, and he raised his shotgun, taking two long steps into the room before letting his finger curl, one barrel blasting out a shot into the creature's upper body.

The damage was significant, bone revealed as the flesh was removed in chunks, and the infected seized in an attempt to shove itself through the window. It managed to crawl into the room, landing hard on its chin against the carpet, scrabbling its nails for purchase against the fibres.

It was wet, soaked by the rain, and it puddled water in as it ungracefully landed.

The zombie's head lifted as it pushed against the floor to haul its upper body up, mouth open in a snarl. However, the sound never made it past its teeth, mostly because they were abruptly scattered amidst the gore that burst against the wall, along with flecks of bone and fleshy material.

Coach lowered the shotgun, quickly breaking open the breech ends and feeding in two more shells. As he did, he took a step back, watching Nick slip around him and step up to the window. Another infected was right behind it, hopping the short distance from the ground to the window to grab onto the windowframe.

Glass speared through its hands, but it did not falter, kicking itself up to get an arm hooked through the opening. It shrieked out a protesting sound as the Northerner slashed out with the katana, drawing a ragged line across its face that nearly split its jaw apart.

The infected slumped, piled atop the first intruder, and Nick straightened where he stood. A third was close behind, scrabbling at the exterior of the house until it managed to hook fingertips on the broken window.

"Too bad they don't make a habit of coming in one at a time." he muttered, voice shaking just faintly. Coach lifted his head, and he moved to respond.

The words weren't formed in his throat, though, when a thick shadow snapped into his vision. It made him flinch long before he processed what it was; a Smoker tongue, propelled like a dart through the open window.

His reflex to stagger sent him just to the left of its aim, and its tip struck the wall, slapping wetly against the surface as a few coils of flesh followed behind. The tentacle collapsed, sliding toward the ground with a sluggish, wet glide. He, however, knew better than to relax.

Coach jolted back, thrusting himself flat against the wall, just as it drew abruptly taut. Its musculature squirmed, and the seizure of flesh that caused it to start reeling back in also caused it to start flailing in wild lashes and circles. It seemed to seek out a body - and it found one, snapping hard in the air and landing against Coach's foot.

He couldn't avoid it in time, though he tried.

The tongue continued to reel in, but its tip violently curled against his ankle, sliding up just enough to get a loop around his leg before it yanked. He almost tried to shoot at it, but the room was small enough and Nick was close enough to him that he couldn't get himself to pull the trigger. The chance of shooting the man was too high.

So he braced.

His leg was pulled out from under him in the very next instant. He only just kept himself from cracking his head on the wall behind him as it took him to the ground, flat on his back. Still, the impact knocked the wind out of him, and he saw stars in the few fragments of time that it dragged him toward the window.
His momentum died out, however, leaving just a burning sensation at the base of his spine where his shirt had been scraped up and the carpeting had left a bit of rugburn on the exposed skin.

His knee stung, too, like the tongue had twisted it a little too far out of joint in the process of dragging him. The pain came in a strange reverb to a pulsing, and he wasn't certain if his kneecap had slid out of place again or not. Rather than move, he opened his eyes.

Nick had the katana sunk tip-first to the carpet, his eyes widened slightly as he panted out a breath, more nerves than exertion. The tongue was still wrapped around Coach's ankle, but it ended in a ragged and oozing severance just beside the blade, the remaining section slapping enthusiastically against the window frame before being pulled out entirely. Glass scattered as it was retracted, and a thin shriek from outside made Nick's head lift.

He was staring, frozen where he stood as if in shock. His body stiffened, and Coach couldn't help but scrabble at the carpet to force himself upright. His knee protested, but he managed enough of a staggered kneel to see outside.

There, just in front of the fencing around the neighboring house, stood two figures.

One was lanky and hunched, its face and shoulders bloated into a twisted set of boils that seemed to consume its neck entirely, building into greasy-looking rolls of grey flesh despite the fact that most of the rest of its body was lean and bony.

A Smoker stood there, its body writhing as it sucked up what remained of its tongue, gagging on the flesh as if it barely fit down its throat at all.

Its features were barely perceptible past the mutations, even gender rendered mostly moot; as with most of their kind, it was often hard to tell. Witches had been the only dominantly female mutation, until the mall. The rest were generally warped out of recognition, the fat and muscle mass of their bodies reappropriated until the difference between them was hard to discern at a distance.

He'd seen female Hunters and male Spitters, but most of them were hard to categorize. It was like they followed some sort of pattern in flesh and bone - and their bodies shifted to match it, whatever they might've looked like before.

It was unremarkable, on the whole, as was the infected standing next to it.

Standing.

Just... waiting there, watching, and that was far from unremarkable. Smokers and Spitters tended to keep their distance, even running from danger - but the second infected at the Smoker's flank was nothing special.

The zombie stood next to the Smoker with a certain calmness, watching the infected flooding close to the window, another set of hands finding purchase in the windowframe. It hung back, almost taking a step to put itself behind the Smoker as the lanky creature gagged out a squawk of pain, swallowing down its stumped tongue with a shudder.

Coach didn't understand, at first.

Only when it shifted its gaze up toward the window and gave a ferocious snarl at them did Coach recognize it as that very first infected that had noticed them.

It cocked its head, rearing it back, and let off a subtle shriek that got lost in the cacophony just outside the window. It seemed angry, furious, but it still did not charge forward, nor did it move... from its spot when the Smoker turned to sprint for the fence and clamber over it, out of sight.

The strangely normal-looking infected screamed out a little louder as its gaze dropped back to the crowded infected clawing at one another in a frantic attempt to get to the small window, higher-pitched. Coach couldn't shake the awful feeling that it was trying to communicate.

A sinking feeling pulled at his gut, and he knew without having to ask that Nick felt it, too.

This is somethin' we ain't seen before.

A human scream - Rhiannon's, rasped out and howled - made both of them jolt. It was pain, anger, and the rising shouts of nearly the entire rest of the team did not offer any comfort.

Coach moved before he thought, and his knee tried to give out as he reached his feet. He stumbled, leg crumpling under him, and Nick's free hand was under his elbow in an instant.

But he hissed out, "Go."

Nick hesitated, fingers tightening. He might've even argued, but Coach lifted his shotgun and aimed it at the window. Even as he got a bead on it, he started to gently move backwards, pushing Nick firmly away as he did.

"Ain't broke. I'm comin'. Just go."

His leg could only bear a bit of his weight at once before the pain spiked and he felt a cold pressure beneath his patella, but it was enough to walk with, if slowly. Nick's fingers softened on his arm, and the man was shortly bolting back out into the hall.

Coach gritted his jaw and loosed a blast at the window. It did more damage to the wall than the infected crawling up into the windowframe, but losing a few fingers slowed the creature's progress. It satisfied something in him, though a rising fear had overtaken most other feelings.

He wasn't going to watch any one of his team get taken out. That included Chris. That included the sisters.

Whatever happens, I gotta keep them safe.

He couldn't stop himself from darting a glance out the window, and he found that zombie's eyes piercingly focused on him, even in the instant before he stepped past the point where they could see each other.

You ain't takin' 'em from me.
There was a surreal mindset that activated in the depths of a horde. Adrenaline kicked in, spiking and staying at that feverish high. It was the cold shock of a car crash, drawn out into five minutes, ten, fifteen - where the definition of a second felt negotiable, and the only thing anchoring them was pain and exertion and sweat.

There were times where the stream of bodies felt endless and continuing to resist felt like madness, but there was not room or space to do anything but persist. Hesitating was not an option.

Time slowed, but so did everything else. Somehow it felt like they had tremendous control over those ticking seconds, yet it also felt like there was an unstoppable force oncoming that they could not stop, let alone get out from in front of.

They all saw the Spitter lurch out from a house across the street, gangly limbs kicking and flaring as it sprinted out. They all saw the green shape burst from its mouth, whole body trembling as it put great pressure behind it, spit gushing from its mouth with the same force. They all saw the orb approach, sailing over the horde with the wobble and flow of a water balloon.

They could not do much, however, but see it.

Its arc took it up high, and when it breached the window it was aimed to strike the outside of the kitchen's cabinets where they hung above the bar. Past experience informed them it would burst and splatter, and Rhiannon tried to duck and rush forward, but there was so little time, and the way forward was mostly blocked by infected bodies.

Unable to even halt her offensive efforts, the blonde felt the liquid splash against her back, hot at first. The sensation was dull in the instant of impact, and, wildly, she thought it might be inert as it touched her.

Then the pain started.

She knew she shouted, knew sound left her lips, but animal instinct kept her moving. She continued to strike out, bat swinging, even as the movement caused her shoulder muscles to flex under the acid as it began to chew at her flesh.

One infected went down as the end of her bat broke the structure of its face, another knocked away as she bashed the pommel of it into its chest - but there, her frame weakened, the sizzling audible to her ear as the pain widened and broadened and deepened. It knocked the wind out of her, making her hands tremble.

If she was lucky, it was going to chew through layers of her skin, fading to a green gunk before it quite reached the fatty muscle underneath.

If she was unlucky...

Rhiannon tried, releasing a gritted half-scream of frustration, to focus herself. There were too many infected in the way to rush outside and throw herself into the rain in the hopes it might dilute the acid, and it was too far to reach a shower or bathtub. The damage would be done either way.

She couldn't get it off and couldn't make it stop, so all she had left was to fight. The biker lifted her arms, hands gripped tight around the handle of her baseball bat, ready to meet the next infected to come within arms' reach.
Her vision had narrowed, tunneling, such that she barely noticed Ellis' approach. Even when part of her acknowledged the movement, it was filed away as something safe, the movement and shift of her team rather than that of the infected. She didn't have energy to spare on it, and couldn't look away to even process what he was doing.

A zombie lurched forward, hands grabbing at her forearms, nails digging in - but Chris was suddenly beside it, and his machete sunk into its skull with an awful squelch. It went limp, sagging to the ground, taking his machete with it. His eyes darted to her, and they widened, and she wasn't certain what the expression was supposed to convey.

Then the water hit her.

It was undoubtedly room-temperature, but on her skin, it felt frigid. It hit the back of her neck and poured over her shoulders and down her back, soaking through her slim cami in an instant. Some of it waterfalled to her front, too, and reduced her shirt to a sheer gauzy texture over her petite chest.

Where it washed over the places that acid had started to eat away, however, there was agony - and then relief. Instead of pinpoint fire burrowing into her skin, the water scattered it and sent it trickling down her body. It clung to her like hydrophobic grease, continuing to burn, but at a fraction of the intensity.

Her eyes fluttered half-shut, and then blinked wide open. She tilted her head, and found Ellis standing behind her, the cooler they'd had filled with water held up over his head - and now empty.

There was panic on his face, and it seemed split between the lingering fear over her safety, and a newfound horror at his actions. His gaze flickered down to her body, taking in how the water had soaked down into the fabric of her cloth pants, too. He'd drenched her, like some high-school prank.

Only this faggot could save my ass and look sorry about it. crossed her mind, a spark of manic humour catching in her chest.

Nick sprinted into the living room, katana held low, darting to rush beside Rochelle and strike out at the next infected crawling over the TV stand. His blade sunk into its neck, head abruptly snapping to the side as the musculature holding up its skull failed.

"You okay, Blondie?" he shouted, hoarse. "That Spitter fuck you up?"

She glanced down, seeing the pink blossoming throughout her camisole where the water had taken blood with it. Her shoulders flexed, and pain seared across her back, the skin over her shoulderblades raw and screaming. The sensation almost distracted from the squishy feeling of her clothes clinging and sticking to every inch of her.

"Fine!" she shouted back, determined for it to be true, though Ellis' worried grimace - the only one of the team who had gotten a view of the damage - did not bode well.

She gripped her bat weakly and turned to face the window. Lena and Christophe were keeping the infected back, but only just. The Spaniard grew frantic and less confident when forced to the front of the line, and he was losing ground faster than Lena.

His machete caught in the shoulder of one infected, clipping harshly into its clavicle, and then did not release. His hand slipped, wet with gore, and he lost his grip with a shout. In an instant, it was torn from him, and he stood defenseless. Fear spiked his shoulders into a raise, sundered one flexing to match its whole twin.
Coach charged into the room at a staggered pace, one leg swinging more than flexing, and lifted his shotgun. "Chris." he shouted, and the foreigner darted backwards a few steps, making way. The instant his aim was clear, Coach fired into the zombies making their way through the windows, taking down the one bearing Chris' machete as well as the two flanking it. Christophe whooped aloud in celebration, but there was a dread in his expression. A disappointment, maybe.

Rhiannon tried to give a test swing of her bat, but the pain of her shoulders flexing made her cry out and her balance wavered with a queasy headrush. Ellis abruptly threw the cooler down in favour of grabbing for her, the plastic making a hollow thud as it struck waterlogged carpet.

His arm slung around her waist, clutching the damp waistband of her pants. "She ain't fine." he announced, gripping her tightly to his side, even when she strained to push away. "We gotta push."

The act of fighting against his grasp, however, shot yet more pain up her back, and she felt her skin split in a few places, like burst blisters. The fact she couldn't see her own back was a blessing - but amongst the spectrum of sensations occurring throughout her body, she could feel hot streams of something down her back. It could only have been blood.

"Huddle." Coach barked, voice strained. Rhiannon didn't miss that he was limping, her eyes trained on him even through blurry vision. She realized, with some frustration, that it was the haze of tears. "Rhee, Chris, in the back."

The team constricted, Rochelle sidling back as Coach and Nick pressed forward, the three of them taking the brunt of the horde's attention. Ellis pulled Rhiannon behind himself and Lena drew closer, brush-hook lifted. Steam rose off her shoulder where the small amount of acid that had splattered on her had been repelled by her leather jacket.

Rhiannon tugged on hers where it was tied around her hips, angrily pulling it loose and sliding one arm into one sleeve, then the other. A strained sound of agony leaked from her with every motion. The act of putting it on over her shoulders felt like rubbing sandpaper on an open wound - which was not far off, she supposed.

Christophe hovered close to her side, and Rhiannon pushed the bat into his hand, untying her stun baton from her beltloop and holding it up. It would prove a much better last-ditch defense with much less mobility necessary.

Every turn and twist and stretch of her shoulders ratcheted up the pulsating pain, and she found herself breathless, body shivering. She didn't know if it was the pain or the cold settling into her soaked clothing, or both.

The survivors' defense gave ground with their compacted formation and lessened fighting power, but as infected began to crawl up and over the TV stand and pile into the room, the tightened line they held presented a formidable challenge for the infected. The flow of a horde was a familiar rhythm.

Nick's katana sawed ragged lines through the oncoming bodies, sending gushes of black blood scattering against the walls and the carpet. Limbs were severed or torn half-off, tendon and bone exposed around them.

Rochelle stood behind him, aim steadied with both hands as she finished slapping a new magazine into the bottom of the grip. She picked up a pattern with him, shooting as he straightened from a swing, and her shots rarely missed skull or throat.
Ellis and Coach traded off firing and reloading, the pump-action much more agile than the double-barrel, and Lena lashed and jabbed into the horde to fend off the last quadrant, taking chunks of flesh with every blow.

It was hard to see past the flurry of bodies, and hard to hear past the screams and gunfire that felt so deafening. If Rhiannon hadn't been detached from the fight, she might've not even heard it.

A bellow sounded out, animal and furious, a roar she knew entirely too well.

She screamed it - "Charger!" - and did the only thing that seemed sensible: she grabbed hard onto Christophe's shirt and pulled him with as she thrust herself toward the wall. It was the closest she could get to escaping any direct line from any of the openings, though she couldn't tell where it was coming from.

The abrupt cessation of gunshots said her teammates listened, though she didn't look before crushing herself into the wall and drawing Chris after her. He flattened against her, and the contact of his chest to her shoulders made her vision go white.

When she finally collected enough sense to look, blinking past the tears streaming from her eyes, the outcome was not what she expected.

The Charger came through the double windows in the front of the house, broad shoulder taking a chunk of the frame with it. The three feet of wall beneath the window did not fare much better, chunks of drywall blown out by the impact of its thighs and knees.

It didn't completely destroy the wall, however, and the remaining structure caught its shins and made it stumble. Momentum barely kept it upright as it staggered through a few steps and caught its balance, though its sprint was brought to a halt.

The wall was not the only casualty; the creature had run straight into the back of the horde, and where it was dangerous to the survivors, it was fatal to the more fragile infected. It crushed more than a few bodies into the side of the house, and as it stumbled to a halt in the middle of the living room, several infected were thrown to the ground by its weight.

When it recovered, a rumbled shriek of anger left it, and the Charger swung out its bloated fist. Rough-skinned knuckles struck the skull of an infected trying to get to its feet. The creature's neck cracked, falling limp.

It seemed frustrated - and then it refocused, looking around the room.

The rest of the survivors had followed Rhiannon's lead, and they were all pressed against the nearest wall, shock freezing them there. Even the nearest infected were stunned, picking themselves up off the ground or gathering their balance on fractured limbs.

It centered its attention on Coach, the nearest survivor to it.

The first to react was Christophe. His hand circled around the stun baton in Rhiannon's other hand, twisting violently to pry it free, and he suddenly pushed away from her. His intention was clear: reckless, careless, he was going to attack the Charger.

"Asshole!" she shouted, more driven by fear than anger. Both her hands scrambled to snatch for his back, trying to hook fingers in his shirt, but he was already sprinting out of reach, and pain made her sluggish. "Get back -"

Sprinting forward, darting into a low lunge, Chris jammed the end of the baton into the soft and fleshy armpit of its almost vestigial off-arm. His thumb flicked the switch, and instantly, the Charger bellowed.

It couldn't quite straighten, its posture hunched by the flaky callous that had overwhelmed its right shoulder and arm, but it did surge and stagger away from the pain. There was too much bulk to quite be immobilized, and though its movements became stilted, it managed to swing its weight around.

It punched out, and its massive fist collided with Chris' chest. He released a pathetic sound, a whined exhalation of air, and crumpled backwards. As he hit the ground, the Charger turned to face him, its heavy feet striking the ground in an irritated kick. It peered down at the prone man, his body vaguely drawing in on itself, a weak groan leaving his lips.

Its attention was narrow and easily drawn, and though the Spaniard's actions hadn't strictly hurt it, they had soundly drawn its ire.

Then two shotgun blasts went off in tandem, and the Charger screamed out hoarsely, back arching, arms flailing as it wheeled back around to face the survivors behind it. The infected struck out, the blow just skidding off Ellis' shoulder as he dodged backwards with a yelp.

With its posture open and turned toward them, Coach's second shotgun blast sent chunks of its skull flying. The Charger stood there a moment, body shivering, before it slumped to the ground.

The urge to celebrate was tempered by the presence of what infected remained, and Chris' prone state. Immediately, Ellis and Coach darted forward, and Lena joined them in taking advantage of the way the Charger had scattered the remnants of the horde.

"Jesus Christ, people." Nick darted amongst them, one arm holding Maggie's carrier tight against his side, other arm wielding his katana to stab down and drive the tip into what few infected were still half-alive on the ground. "You're fucking magnets for trouble."

There was room to breathe, their surroundings quieting to the simple pattering of rainfall and the squelch of weapon-on-flesh, the familiar rattle of breath as the zombies around them faltered and passed - just one of a hundred different things that should have been disturbing, but instead felt... normal.

Both Rochelle and Rhiannon surged forward to drop to their knees next to Christophe, though it was Rochelle who reached out and grabbed either side of his face. Her thumbs stroked over his cheeks, her gaze darting over his face as his eyes gently rolled before coming into focus on hers. "Baby, you okay? ¿Bien?"

That seemed to startle him, his head lifting just an inch off the ground, before he fell into a glazed-over smile. "If I say no, will you talk more, like this?" he crooned up at her.

Both women snorted.

Rochelle pinched his cheek hard enough to make him yelp, and leaned back with a frustrated sigh. "You pull a stupid move like that again - I'll cram you in Maggie's carrier." Her gaze darted over her shoulder, grabbing one hand on his elbow and the other on his shirt, pulling him up as she stood. "C'mon, guys. No telling how much more attention we're gonna get."

The blonde settled a palm against the foreigner's back, supporting him as they rose, though it made her shiver with another flush of pain. "Stumpy needs a -" Dizziness made her hesitate, closing her eyes, taking just a moment to collect herself. There was no posture and no movement that did not hurt, nerves frayed and erratic with the pulse of slowing adrenaline through her veins.

"... babysitter." she finished, quieter.

When a hand touched her elbow, she reopened her eyes, and found Rochelle's gaze intent on her face. "You okay, stringbean?" she murmured, and the blonde managed a smirk.

Blood was trickling down her back, growing tacky against her jacket, and she had no clue how bad the damage was. The pain wasn't immobilizing her and she could still move, so it couldn't have been terrible - but she wouldn't know until somebody took a look, and there was no time.

"Never better." was her response, though she knew the tears streaked across her cheeks plainly demurred. "Can we get the fuck out of here?"

Coach stepped around the Charger's fallen corpse, setting his shotgun against his hip. "Let's move, people. Sittin' ducks in here. Got a Spitter and a Smoker, plus... whatever the hell else is out there." He surveyed the team, exhaling through his nostrils. It was agitated, though partially relieved; injuries were unfortunate, but injuries could be recovered from.

As their heightened sense of urgency drove them to move, Coach played shepherd - or sheepdog - and walked at the back, watching as Lena took a stance beside the open hole made in the front of the house and offered a steadying hand through it.

Rochelle was the only one who did not accept it, though her hurried clamber through the broken wall was followed immediately by turning and joining Lena in helping Christophe and Rhiannon through. The Spaniard took only a moment to find and recover his machete from the corpse of an infected.

Nick split the difference and climbed over the TV stand and through the front door, under the unspoken guise of checking around the corner of the house and ensuring it was relatively clear. He had the cat carrier still hugged protectively to his side.

There was no sign of the Smoker, nor the strange infected that had stood so distant from the horde.

Their absence was not a comfort.

The rain was thickening, pace increasing, the droplets striking the road and turning into a dewy mist that collected around them. Even if there had been any desire to loiter, the threatening rain would have hurried their escape.

Rhiannon, Chris, and Nick ran to the car, but Ellis and Rochelle lingered under the front awning of the house, watching for danger and waiting for Coach to join them. Only once they were all clear of the window did he move.

He climbed somewhat stiffly over the corpses layering the carpet, knee protesting when his ankle turned slightly too far to one side. A growl of frustration left him as the misstep thrust him into a stumble. On reflex, loathe to let his bad leg twist, he went down onto his good knee, hand catching onto the stiff shoulder of an infected corpse.

The contact was unpleasant, but his stomach had become hard to turn.

He was aware of Lena's voice catching in a muted gasp, a reflexive suck of air, and her immediate shift to approach. Coach intended to wave her off, but when he lifted his hand to do so, she grabbed his wrist. There was no polite way to resist, so he let her help him to his feet.
She clapped a hand onto his forearm as he got upright. "We literally haven't left the house yet." she uttered with a soft laugh. When he looked up, he couldn't miss the tremble of worry at her jawline. "Let's not all fall apart."

A small smile crinkled at the corners of his eyes, and he gestured around widely. "Days that start like this, I usually just get my ass the hell back to bed." he responded, dryly.

"Amen." escaped Ellis in a grunt.

"I'll take the bike alone. Limit the risk, driving in this weather." Lena stated, reaching down to pull her jacket up and display the radio attached to her belt. "Should stay out of the rain, but if we get separated, don't fritz it out. Get warm and dry and make sure water hasn't leaked inside - I won't panic if we can't get in touch immediately, and you don't either, alright?"

Coach nodded, taking just a moment to zip up his windbreaker, patting where his radio was safely zipped inside one of its inner pockets. "Agreed. But don't get separated."

The brunette smiled, slimly, her left hand flattening plaintively. "You guys are piling into a five-seater with six people and a cat, and enough emotional baggage for a U-Haul on top." All three of the survivors around her stiffened, like those particular details had previously escaped them.

She noticed, and grimaced.

"Don't kill each other."
The rain forced them to rush into the car, and there wasn't much time to argue over seating arrangements. Nick rushed into the front passenger seat, intent on interacting with the rest of the car as little as possible.

His teammates piled in, and the sound of their bodies shoving into the car, wet shoes squeaking on the floor mats and damp clothing screeching against the cloth seats, was distant and muffled. He inhaled, closed his eyes, and tried to focus on the smell of the rain.

It was earthy and clean, dampening out the usual smells of the apocalypse. There was a must, an oil-slick scent, but it was halfway pleasant, and he tried to lose himself in it.

An effort in vain.

Ellis had finally given up on him, and it should have felt like being freed. It should have been a relief, a victory, a triumph. Nick should have leaned back and been mirthful, with a smug, 'I told you so.'

Instead, he sat there with his head ground into the car seat's headrest, and a prickle behind his eyes threatened with tears. He sucked in air through his nose, the sound stuttering, and blew it out sharply. Stupid fucking piece of shit.

I didn't want to feel this, feel like fuckin' trash. Never wanted to see him look at me like that. I didn't want to - watch him realize - I didn't want to be the one who... lost. I spent so much fuckin' effort trying to be somebody he could hate, because... because that's easier than being someone he can't love.

He didn't want it to be true, but he knew it was: he'd almost believed that Ellis wouldn't be dissuaded. It had been equal parts infuriating and comforting. It was why leaving felt like the only option, though it was clear, now, that that was untrue.

Here, finally, Nick had located the 'one-too-many' - the step too far. He'd seen it coming. He'd felt it hovering at the edges of them since the very first day, and it was nothing unique to their relationship. It chewed at his heels and kept him moving, kept him running.

Me in the closet with all my fucking skeletons. Jesus Christ. What a way to fucking die.

Ellis had known him in ways nobody else had, as fleeting as their time had been, and all things considered. They'd been raw to one another, the simple side-effect of a life or death situation. Nick had hurt him and been hurt for him. He had confided in him and been surprised, every time, to find acceptance. It was alluring, and intoxicating, and firmly under false pretenses.

He never gave out the full story, the complete context, and certainly not when it came to the situations that truly mattered to him. It felt like offering more and more rope to the hangman, so he kept it all held close to his chest.

It was easy to paint himself as a murderer, and easy to abandon the hollow concept for someone else to fill.

Harder, to explain how it felt to have a knife lodged against the small of his back until the tip just pierced him, shoved into the brick exterior of an apartment building so roughly that the skin of his cheek was scraped and bleeding.
Harder still, as the man pressed close and groped into his pockets and huffed threats in his ear, to describe the realization that his body perked and responded.

It was the alcohol, or the adrenaline, or something. I didn't - I wasn't -

Impossible, to unravel the moments that followed, where they both froze with the knowledge. Where the knife twisted and drove into the muscle of his back with searing pain, and the man's hand sought out his belt, and the threats changed entirely.

Pushing him down the stairs hadn't been intentional, strictly, and the choice to watch the life drain out of him had not been a choice at all. Doing anything but sitting there, sucking in cigarette smoke like he could fumigate his own body with it, had seemed impossible.

Was it panic, to feel nothing? Panic felt like an excuse. It felt like a miserable little word he hid behind, when the truth was, panic involved fear and he had not felt fear.

He'd felt nothing.

If he could barely get himself to voice it when it might've made some difference in his criminal sentencing, why would he voice it now? Why would he submit himself to the pity and the sympathy he didn't want, when it didn't change what he'd done? He didn't deserve it.

Why's it matter, anyway? Why should I care what he thinks about me? I'm trying to leave. This is a good thing. I don't fucking care what anyone thinks.

But he did. He cared, and the feeling of caring was almost too much to process where it clamoured and clanged under his ribcage. It burned until he went numb, but not nearly numb enough.

Selfishly, cruelly, he'd been comforted by the idea that no matter what, Ellis would love him. Running away from it, cutting free from it and leaving it to die on his own terms, felt like the safest outcome. He, simply, didn't have to discover whether or not there was hope for them. Abandoning the chance to hope felt cathartic.

Instead, he'd proven to himself there wasn't any hope at all.

In that moment, all he could feel was grief.

The driver's side door flung open, and Nick couldn't repress a startled flinch when Ellis threw himself into the seat and slammed the door behind him. It felt like a joke, though by whom, he wasn't sure.

"Bless the Lord, it's pickin' up fast." the Georgian hooted, wearily, scrambling to put the keys in the ignition and turn them. The car rumbled to life, and when cold air blasted from the vents, Ellis quickly twisted the fan speed dial to 'OFF'. "Least you ain't the only one who's soaked, now, Rhee."

A weak snort from the injured woman in the backseat preceded the back doors flinging open, and in a raucous burst of harsh swearing and urgent yelps, the rear of the car was suddenly packed full.

Coach sat on the left, Rhiannon squished in the center seat by his ingress, and Rochelle took the remaining seat with Christophe clumsily crammed into her lap. There was a held breath as they slammed the doors behind them, and then a tentative slump as the four bodies tried to find some semblance of coexistence in the cramped space.

Groaning and pale, leaned away from the seat cushion behind herself, Rhiannon muttered under her breath, "You fuckshits are damp at best."
The absurdity of it set in, and Rochelle's barely-restrained giggling pushed Coach into a soft chuckle, despite himself. He leaned forward, rapping the ceiling of the car with a knuckle. "Ellis, get us movin'. I only got the patience to be in this car fo' so long."

The mechanic moved to obey, lips loosely curled, and swiveled his attention forward. Nick couldn't stop staring, even as he saw that half-smile fade, saw the stress blossom in the twitch of Ellis' jaw. Nick knew better, but he did it anyway; he opened his mouth.

Unfortunately - or very fortunately - Ellis saw, and did not give him the chance to speak.

"I think we oughta just let it lie." he stated, and it might've even passed as non-confrontational if the Georgian's knuckles hadn't been white on the steering wheel. He was trying, visibly, to remain calm. "Ain't no talkin' we can do now, whut we ain't done this mornin'. So let's just focus on movin'."

Listen to him. There's nothing you can do, and nothing you even want to do, so -

Nick muttered, "Ellis, advocating a silent road trip? Times have changed."

What the fuck is wrong with me?

The flutter of tension through the car's occupants was not insignificant. Ellis, strangely, was the least surprised of any of them - Nick included. He simply pushed the gearshift into drive and started to roll the car forward, slowly, waiting for the motorcycle to join them.

The Georgian spoke softly, and yet with a bitter sort of edge. "I can talk if yuh want me to, Nick, but I don't think you do."

He didn't. But he also desperately did - needed him to, more than anything. The argument was better than nothing, because the clock was ticking down, and the more real his intention to leave became, the more he found himself coming to an unpleasant realization.

They'd argued over whether Nick was trying to protect Ellis, or himself. Both had felt true at times, because both were true.

If you're gonna stop being in love with me... least you could do is help me do the same.

Nick put a hand on the dash, leaning into it with a dry snort. "Fuck's that supposed to mean?" he muttered. "Sorry, I thought we were fresh out of shit to parade in front of the whole crew. Didn't realize I was still under blackmail."

The scoff that resounded in Ellis' throat was... hurt, like that had caught him off-guard, but whatever emotion darted over his expression was quickly clamped down into a curt frown. "I ain't blackmailin' anybody. I did my best, Nick. You went'n'did this all tuh yerself."

Abruptly, Rochelle's voice interjected, "Guys, as much as I want to figure all this out, maybe now's not the best time." Her tone was gentle but insistent, and sharply frustrated. "We can't give each other a whole lot of space, physically, but we can at least - give it emotionally. Let's just ease off, okay?"

"Please." droned the biker beside her, head drooping, a grimace on her lips. There was no sympathy to be found in her attitude. "I can only take so much in one morning. Who put them up there together, anyway?"

A beat of silence passed before Coach shifted indelicately, then released a heavy sigh that was slightly embarrassed. His brow furrowed as he muttered, "Leave it, y'all. Damn."

They all knew he’d have been driving if it weren't for his knee.

The blurry shape of Lena on her motorcycle buzzed into view on the road, rain scattering off her jacket and the visor of her helmet. She waved at the car, a blurry motion in the hazy windshield, and then started down the street. Ellis followed suit, flicking on the windshield wipers, their pace slightly too quick, the rubber squeaking and catching on the glass.

"It was pretty straight-on from here - the bridge, I mean. Shouldn't be too long." Ellis was trying, valiantly, to move on, and to ignore the man seated beside him. He was putting in significant effort to focus on the task at hand, tone measured and pointed.

Nick didn't know what he wanted from the situation, but he couldn't settle, and couldn't bring himself to leave it alone. There was a trigger, somewhere, and he wanted to pull it - wanted it pulled, and didn't know how.

"C'mon, kid." he rasped out, thrusting his left arm up in a half-shrug. His voice sounded distant to his ear, as if he'd filled them with cotton. "Let's really blow this one up. Go on. Gimme your best sh-"

When Ellis interrupted him, it was nearer to a whine than a shout. Exasperated, his palm smacked the steering wheel, head tossing back as he groaned, "Goddamnit, Nick. You done everything tuh keep me from talkin' fer weeks, but the one time I -"

He halted, shifting in his seat, and the silence in the car was dampened by the patter of rain against the roof and the bassy rumble of tires on wet asphalt. Nobody moved to interrupt him, though the atmosphere in the car was terribly dense.

Then he continued, and it thickened.

"I'm done, Nick. I'm done lettin' you treat me like this. I had muhself thinkin', fer a minute, you really tried tuh fix things last night." A softness touched Ellis' voice that he undoubtedly did not intend. "But that ain't really it, is it? It's just the same shit it's always been... you bein' sweet tuh me, right up 'til you ain't. Right up 'til you decide not to."

There was a fidgeting from the back seat, uncomfortable, and Chris' voice just-barely started to hum out a syllable, but Ellis was undeterred.

"Yuh get so stubborn, it drives me nuts. I think you know full well yer wrong, but somethin' keeps you goin'. Like you get so damn stuck under whatevver bullshit you cook up, you can't even argue yerself out from under it. Like you'd rather be stubborn 'til the end than change yer damn mind fer once. You'd rather be alone than be with someone who knows you, the good'n'the bad."

Every word took a piece out of him, raw and ragged, torn out. It should've hurt. He should've been angry, or upset, or any of the emotions he'd felt just minutes before - instead, he just felt exhausted. He felt like giving up.

"So, shit, Nick." Ellis' free hand thrust up, pinching at the bridge of his nose, and the gentle glisten threatening at his eyes spoke to more upset than his frustrated tone admitted. "I ain't fightin' you no more. I can't keep doin' this, if yer gonna get meaner and meaner every damn step I take. If yer so damn determined tuh -"

Nick muttered, "Fine.", and it came out spiteful and small. He wanted it to cut, but he barely even got the word vocalized when his throat tried to constrict.
That made Ellis tense, and he suddenly gritted his jaw around a sigh. His gaze flickered toward Nick, a quiet disappointment in the stone-blue. "That's all you got tuh say? 'Fine'? Whut do you think I'm tryin' tuh say, Nick? 'Cause sometimes it just don't seem like you hear me."

Nick snorted, furtively focusing down on the carrier in his lap. If he turned it, he could see inside, the light scattered through the mesh door. The cat curled up inside looked positively miserable.

Some rain had gotten through the mesh in her carrier, and her fur was partially slicked to her body and partially mussed in every direction. She'd crammed herself into the far corner, and her mouth hung open, pink mouth and white fangs exposed. Her eyes flashed toward him, and she managed a croaked hiss.

It was a relatable sentiment.

"I hear you, alright." he stated, unable to stir more than a wry sourness. "I'm a jackass, and I'm too much trouble, and you've seen through my fucking bullshit. And I ran the... I ran goddamn Ellis, of all people, out of fucks to give. "Just glad you finally listened to me for once."

Ellis did not respond with anything but an angry huff of air, like half of a laugh. He stewed in his seat, body shifting in a stretch that seemed mostly like a desperate release of energy, considering he was otherwise trapped in his seat. His quiet fury was unusual, and the rest of the car seemed afraid to speak under it.

Silence crept in again, immensely uncomfortable.

That was it, Nick supposed; that was the end.

He closed his eyes and tilted his head into the cold glass, and wished he felt nothing.

The Georgian kneaded his hand on the steering wheel, strangling it softly between his knuckles, and they sat in a stifled and twisted quiet as the car rumbled along the road. Buildings loomed in close, some boarded up, some with broken windows, some still lit by flickering signs that spread odd colours over the rain-smeared windows.

They drew some infected after them, but the weather kept their passage from gaining too much attention, and they were largely able to avoid them. When one came close, the dark shape that was Lena buzzed to cross the street and intercept it, drawing the creature's ire long enough to prevent it from reaching the car as it passed, then speeding to catch back up.

The streets were not so clogged with cars as to completely block them off, but Ellis did have to take them up onto the curb to avoid a truck flipped onto its side across the center of the road.

The bumpy climb stirred a strained yelp from Rhiannon, along with Chris mumbling timidly, "Eh, sorry."

She groaned out a hum, body leaning forward until her forehead pressed into the shoulder of Nick's seat. "Fucking shit bitch hurts." she blustered, and the genuine pain in her voice startled Coach into placing a hand on her arm. "Ellis, how - how bad was it?"

The Georgian's rigid and angry posture melted just slightly, his eyes darting up to look at her in the rear view mirror. His mouth twisted into a frown. "I... only got a little look. It weren't... I mean, I didn't see bone or nothin'."

A shocked bleat of laughter escaped the blonde. "Oh." she managed, airily. "Good."
Coach's grip tightened, shifting as if he meant to coax the jacket off her shoulders. He nodded his head toward her. "Lemme see, girl. If we gotta stop and take care of you, we will. At least get this jacket off it."

But she didn't cooperate, and he did not force it. Her eyes narrowed into a wince, turning and burying her face into the front seat. "No. Fuck it. Just... fuck it. It's feeling better than it was a few minutes ago, and if you cunts go touching it, it'll just get worse. Leave it. Let's just... get over the fucking bridge."

Coach watched her, displeased, but maintained his silence. His hand relaxed to settle more gently around her forearm, squeezing in a soft and consistent pattern, monotonous in its rhythm. It was a soothing stimulus, and judging by the way her eyes closed and her breathing slowed, it had some effect.

Meanwhile, Rochelle pressed her face against Chris' shoulder, groaning quietly. Her arms tucked around his waist, and he settled his palm on her wrists with a comforting pat. "Shittiest road trip ever." she mumbled. "And I'm including the time someone had an assault rifle to my head."

Rhiannon's head darted an inch up, expression abruptly bewildered, eyes slanting to stare at the other woman.

"... What the ass?"
Ellis was angrier than he ever wanted to be. He hadn't meant to get angry, hadn't thought he had much anger left in him, but Nick's attitude got under his skin in an instant. It hurt, more than anything. It hurt, to try to explain how he felt, and get nothing in return.

And the anger made it harder to explain.

And then it was over.

Nick pulled away, and Ellis sat and gritted his teeth and rolled the conversation over and over in his head. I just want him tuh give half'uh damn. Is it so crazy, wishin' he'd just try a little? Try at all? I gave him so much damn time tuh figure shit out, but all he did was yell at me, 'n'plan some damn getaway. I ain't askin' much.

He sighed through his nostrils, shoulders jolting up slightly.

I ain't askin' that much, goddamn.

He was not a person who enjoyed fighting, not sincerely and with people he loved, but he wanted to fight. He wanted to pull over and drag the man out of the car, push him until the anger between them burst, take a punch and throw two. He wanted to do anything but sit there, and he definitely wanted to do anything but continue to try and piece together his emotions into a cohesive set of sentences. It would've been a pain he could handle, a pain he would've suffered, if Nick could have met him halfway.

Anger gave way to delicate sorrow, and he found it increasingly hard to focus as Coach spoke to him.

"Yeah, yeah, straight-on. Next left. We should be comin' up on it."

Shifting his hands on the wheel, he nodded his head. "A'ight."

He was so tired.

As they drove, the left side of the island thinned, until the rolling hills separating them from the beach was just a block or two away, though the actual shoreline was still some ways off. It should've been exciting, but Ellis couldn't bring himself to feel it.

In contrast, Christophe released a soft cooing sound, and he leaned into view in the rearview mirror, squinting over Rhiannon and Coach and looking toward the beach. "¡Ah! Incluso un día en la playa no es un día en la playa, con vosotros." he mumbled, a wistful edge to his voice, along with a laugh. "Maybe we go, when it no rains? I -"

Rochelle pinched his side, making him yelp gently, before she tightened her arms around his waist to pull him more flush into her lap. "Chris, cool it." she soothed, gaze flickering toward the front of the car. "Too much energy."

His mouth flinched into something like a pout, but he nestled into her grip regardless. "Vale, vale." he responded, then dropped his voice to a mutter, just between them. "I try to -"
"I know." she interrupted, much softer. When he glanced at her over his shoulder, she smiled faintly.

Silence was not the desirable option, but it was the only one available to them. Coaxing either man out of their respective corners was not a simple task, and any attempts to divert attention were liable to start it up all over again.

Fortunately, the bridge was not far. They'd managed most of the travel required to avoid the traffic clogging up the streets around the mall, the frozen remnants of whatever evacuation had been attempted there, the day before. The first hint of the bridge was from over a building, steel towers peeking just over the roof of a boarded-up storefront.

Then they turned the corner, and it was before them.

Ellis pressed his foot on the brake, reflexively slowing the car, leaning in and blinking through the blurry windshield. He couldn't resist the urge to suck in a breath.

It was not a tall bridge, but it was longer than he expected, from what he remembered of the look he'd gotten off the mall roof. The ground simply ended, shored up by thick pillars of wood and cement, a manmade canal cutting into the terrain and funneling off to the right.

It went inland a couple hundred yards, and then split into two. One fork lead even further into the distance, breaking off into curves and swirls of estuaries, while the other lazily curled in and deeper into the city, yet more pillars and concrete crafting a structured path for boats to take, disappearing behind some buildings and warehouses.

Boats that sailed under the bridge - when it was lifted.

It sat at street-level, now, but as he scanned the four towers of metal and steel surrounding it - one at each of its corners - he realized the entire midsection could raise. There was a squat structure set closely to one of the towers on the other side, and he figured it was a control tower, spindly legs raising it up off the ground.

"Well, shit." Coach grunted, and the source of his frustration was fairly apparent: the bridge was blockaded.

A sedan sat flipped in front of it, and an SUV was parked in a few feet. The more serious issue, however, was the boxtruck parked at an awkward diagonal, broad tire marks highlighting where it had almost swerved off the bridge entirely. The nose of it had broken through the barrier on the side of the bridge, and one wheel sat off the edge, cab slightly lopsided from the position.

There was barely enough room to get the motorcycle through, but they'd never get the car through.

"We could push it." Ellis offered, pointing toward the back of the boxtruck. An uncertain twist touched his mouth, trying to ignore as Nick straightened up from the door and seemed to drift into focus on the conversation. "It's already almost off, if we put it in neutral'n'all got behind it..."

Rochelle winced, tilting her head so she could set her chin on Chris' shoulder and look toward the Georgian. "No offense, sweetie, but I don't think pushing a truck full of who-knows-what off a bridge in the rain is exactly our best next move."

"Abandoning our car in the rain is?" Nick muttered, lowly, a frustrated resignation to his voice. "We're gonna run into a fucking Witch out here."

The weather did not show signs of clearing - if anything, it had worsened, the rain falling at a diagonal as it was blown by the ocean breeze. From where they sat, in the moments where the windshield wipers cleared his vision, Ellis could see the water tossing and roiling in the canal with the shockwaves caused by the tide further out.

Ellis opened his mouth, but something striking the window in the driver's door made him - and the rest of the passengers - jump.

He twisted around, leaning away from it, instinctively afraid of an infected punching through and shattering it. Instead, the glazed black of Lena's helmet visor stared in at him. She thrust her hands up in a pointed shrug.

Exhaling in a quick breath, soothing himself out of his initial shock, Ellis glanced over his shoulder. He found a frown on Nick's face, and worried pinches on both Coach and Rochelle's. Rhiannon looked more dazed than anything, and Christophe blinked back at him with a helpless expression.

Well, shit. he thought, before he stiffened his jaw and grabbed the handle of his door. He thrust it open, and the storm came abruptly into full focus, the rain cool against his face as it sputtered and spilled into the space between the car and the opening door.

As he jumped out entirely, coming to stand on the road, he felt it starting to seep into his clothes, denim jacket growing heavy against his shoulders. He'd be soaked through before long.

Lena straddled her motorcycle, both feet on the ground to stabilize it, and she'd waddled it backwards to give him the space to open the door. She was curled in close to herself, shoulders high, motorcycle jacket keeping her upper body dry, though her capris and shoes were soaked though.

She didn't raise her visor, an impassive sheet of plastic facing Ellis down. "What's the plan?" she shouted, voice muffled by the rain and her helmet.

A car door slammed - then another, then two more, and suddenly there was a messy cluster of bodies huddled close around them. The only outlier was Nick, who remained an arms' length away, leaned forward to bend over Maggie's carrier where it was held to his belly, like he could shield her from the rain.

"We can't just turn 'round." Ellis shouted back, blinking away the streaks of rain that followed the curve of his brow and tried to blur into his eyelashes. "That crash's all we got connectin' us tuh rescue. And Nick's gotta find his boat."

He shouldn't have said it, but it came out anyway. The moment it left him, he found himself wishing the rain would drown out the sound of his voice.

The way the Northerner flinched, the way he twisted around to look at him through the rain gathering and spilling down his features, caught Ellis off-guard. He didn't even spit something angry back, which felt like the clearest indication that it had hurt - instead, their gazes matched, and why did it feel like it cut both ways?

A clenching feeling in his chest teased at regret. I don't... I didn't mean that. I don't want'cha to go. I...

But he didn't utter it. If Nick wouldn't apologize, why should he? At what point did it become self-sabotage to continue to make excuses for the other man's behaviour? At what point was anger the appropriate response? If Nick did not want to work through things, what was he supposed to do?
"I don't know what'cha want me tuh do."

Terse, Rochelle thrust an arm up, her clothing plastered to her body by the rain. "If we're gonna go, let's go! We can find a new car, or come back and get this one if we need to. Let's just get over the bridge, and out of the goddamn rain!"

There was a moment, a hesitation, and then Coach started moving. It was hard to do anything but follow him, and in an instant, the entire team was in motion. Lena started to push her bike forward, and Ellis moved to bolt to the other side of it, shouldering his shotgun and grabbing one hand on the handlebar and the other on the seat.

They pushed together, picking up an easy jog together as they hurried after Coach, angling toward the side of the bridge that would aim them toward the gap left between the end of the boxtruck and the side of the bridge.

Christophe started forward, a grimace on his face, but he hadn't made it more than a few steps before Nick suddenly grabbed a fistful of the back of his shirt. The foreigner flinched, looking up toward the gambler, confusion sparking on his face.

Abrupt, as quiet as he could be to be heard under the storm, Nick said, "Here."

Before Chris could react, Nick pulled the carrier off his shoulder and shoved it into the other man's chest. The moment Chris reacted and lifted up his arm as if to hold it, Nick grabbed the strap and raised it, holding its loop open for him to stick his arm through.

He hesitated, but obeyed. With the strap settled on his good shoulder, he shrugged her close and held the carrier to his chest, his expression squinting against the rain. "Nico, I no can fight with her. It is hard enough -"

"I can fight better with two arms than you fucking can with one." Nick immediately retorted, expression grim. There was something cold in his voice, yet it was not anger; it seemed more like a hollow misery, plastered all over his face like the soaked-in rain.

It would never make sense, how two people so blatantly in love with each other could do anything but embrace it. He couldn't help but think of Rochelle, and it seemed obvious: especially with the world fallen apart around them, what was there to lose? And what was there to gain from denying it?

A hundred words jumbled together in his mouth, and very little of it contorted its way into something close to English. Nick hurt, and Ellis hurt, Chris hurt for them.

Son perfectos el uno para el otro - los dos sois igual de estúpidos y cabezotas y no sabéis cuando abandonar, es lo que eso significa.

"I'll cover you. Just stay with me."

Chris frowned, body shivering as the chill rain started to take its toll on him. He'd been so much more fragile since the Witch, like some portions of his body had yet to process the shock, while others powered on through adrenaline and cardboard bravado.

"Just... for fuck's sake, kid, I need you to watch her. Keep her safe."

He didn't want to. He both genuinely didn't want the responsibility, and genuinely didn't want to be reduced to carrying their things, cowering rather than pulling even some of his own weight. He wanted to fight, as much as he could.
But Nick's eyes held a plea, and he owed Nick his life. It was, in a way, a gesture of trust, and it made Chris' resolve weaken.

So, he steadied himself on his heels and hugged Maggie's carrier to his front, feeling her weight shift within. "I do it." he stated, aware of the way Nick's posture faltered in relief. "Even if you are a pussy bitch."

Christophe did not wait for a response, though he saw the Northerner's face go slack in shock, and he took some pleasure in it. He marched forward, passing Rhiannon, who was not so sluggish and pained that she did not lift her hand, knuckles facing outward.

He grinned, turning his body in order to bump fists with her without pulling his arm away from Maggie's carrier.

He owed Ellis plenty, too.

They clustered together as tightly as they could, three main groups forming: Nick caught up to walk close behind Christophe and Rhiannon, sword held low as he kept at their heels, attention alert behind them as he pulled up the rear of the group entirely.

Ellis and Lena were in the center as they pushed the motorcycle together, and in front of them, Coach and Rochelle had taken point. He walked with some stiffness on every other step, and they had not made it more than a few feet before Rochelle tuck close beside him, her hand catching his and linking fingers between them.

They moved in a distended pack as they circled around the two cars in their way, pace picking up, though not so quickly as to separate. Rhiannon was not slowed by her injury, but she did not move with her usual fire, either. Her movements were stilted, as if moving - or focusing on her movement - was a struggle.

As Coach reached the corner of the boxtruck, he did not continue, beyond a quick look beyond it to ensure there were no infected on the bridge itself. He stepped beside it and pulled Rochelle with him, out of the way of the few feet of space between its end and the slim steel barrier lining the bridge's sides, and looked back at the other survivors approaching behind him.

Careful, cautious, Coach lifted an arm, gesturing to shepherd Ellis and Lena through it.

As his arm raised and as he turned, a bright red light blinked on at the top of either of the two towers flanking the bridge's far side. They flashed on, red piercing through the fog and the mist, and then off. And then on, and just below them, clear yellow spotlights joined them, aimed out toward the city behind.

And then their flashing rate picked up, beginning a solid pattern, on and off.

In the instant that Christophe's head jerked up, staring up toward the lights ahead of them and feeling Rhiannon and Nick halt beside him, Coach's voice jerked up to look in the opposite direction.

The Spaniard twisted his head, looking over his shoulder, finding two lights atop the two towers behind them. They stood almost in the middle of the bridge, now, and there was a moment where nobody moved. Fear best described that moment, the bitter tang and the sharp twist.

The unknown had long ago become something worth fearing.

In soft concert with the flashing lights, a warbled siren kicked up, a smooth wail that accelerated to a pitchy song. The sound reverberated from both ends of the bridge, and as it escalated, several things happened all at once.

First, slim barriers erupted on either end of the bridge, rattling up to almost chest-height. Then, the structure underneath them shifted, a lurch affecting the very road beneath their feet and making all of them stagger and spread their arms as if to balance themselves.

It rattled the cars around them, too, and the SUV behind them gave a threatening chirp of its car alarm.

Then the bridge jostled again, beginning to raise and separate from the road itself. The lights on the SUV started to flash as its shriek joined the siren, screaming out into the rain and echoing in the space around them.

The answering roars of infected were an inevitability, a howl that surged up and beyond the howl of the storm. The bulk of it came from in front of them and across the bridge, and the reaction seemed obvious. They all responded the same way, with no communication required: they started to retreat.

Ellis and Lena outright abandoned the motorcycle, letting it crash down onto its side, and they all bolted to retrace their steps.

If they could get off the bridge before it raised, it would raise up and beyond the reach of the horde ahead of them. The infected might even run themselves off the edge and into the water below, if they were lucky, and they could hopefully fend off the infected coming from behind them.

They'd deal with next steps after they survived.

However, they only made it to the SUV before that plan, too, fell apart.

The rain was not so thick as to obscure the broad, inhumanly massive shape bursting out into the street from behind a building, though the usual tell-tale rumbling of its passage was impossible to pick out beyond the rumbling of the bridge's ascent under their feet.

The Tank stopped and beat its fists against the road, roaring, anger directed wildly toward the sound and lights. It had not immediately taken notice of them, specifically, but it dropped low and began its ape-like gallop toward the bridge all the same.

All at once, there was nowhere to go.
Nick wasn't sure the best way to say it. 'Between a rock and a hard place' seemed apt, but also insufficient as a metaphor. 'Completely fucked' certainly applied, but lacked creativity. 'Up shit creek without a paddle' felt better, but not quite there.

When Christophe muttered, "¡Cágate, lorito!", Nick only caught part of it, but he was fairly certain the Spaniard had vocalized his desired sentiment better than he could manage. He was, at least, not the only one trying to put their situation to words, as if defining it might lessen its impact.

There was a horde ahead of them, and a Tank behind them, and the bridge continued to raise underneath them. Each inch brought a shudder to the concrete, the structure protesting, clearly not meant to raise with so much weight on it.

It was dark, the sun blurred over with storm clouds, a haze of grey-yellow all that remained of its light.

"Where the fuck-shit-ass did a Tank come from?" Rhiannon's voice was strained, hoarse to the point of breaking. "We can't fight a fucking Tank right now! I can barely feel my fucking arms!"

"No fightin'. We run." Coach barked out, shouting past the storm's continued howl, already taking a few steps back. Retreating into the arms of a Tank was not an option under any circumstance, that much was apparent. "This shit gets high enough, we're gonna be stuck up here. We gotta push and get on the other side!"

Nick gripped his katana, tightening his fingers against the wet leather that made up the handle, and shrugged his sniper rifle closer to his neck where the strap was draped over his shoulder. "Then push." he shouted, voice harsh. "Now!"

He could see the fear, scattered. Fright sat heavy in everyone's eyes, panic drowning out any other emotion, and it bubbled up like acid in his throat. Feels like my fault. Why's it always feel like my fucking fault? If I didn't start things with Ellis, and then fuck things up with Ellis, I wouldn't have been trying to leave - and Coach wouldn't have gotten hurt - and we'd have been over this bridge fucking yesterday -

Despair was an easy emotion.

He'd wanted to disappear, and hoped the team would be better off without him. It became clearer and clearer that his chance for that had passed, however; he'd done irreparable damage, and continued to do so. He was the bull amongst the glassware, and the longer he stayed, the worse things became.

I don't know what I'm supposed to do.

They ran, because running was the only option. They barely made it past the boxtruck, dodging around the fallen shape of Lena's motorcycle, before the horde ahead of them had reached the bridge. The flood of bodies on the street below merged in with the fog of rain, and it was hard to pinpoint just how many there were.

A wave of infected climbed over the slim barrier set at the end of the road and easily circumvented the two-foot gap between the street and the raising bridge. They flooded over it, wasting no time before they were sprinting at the survivors, shrieks and calls heightening as they finally located a tangible target.
The moment the survivors breached the funnel created by the boxtruck, they fanned out, bracing for impact just before it came.

Nick turned to face behind them, hearing the sounds of weapons meeting flesh reverberate through the air, pushing water from his eyes with his wrist. The horde ahead of them was only part of the problem; there were still infected behind them, and they were being pinchered.

Two zombies sprinted through the gap between the truck and the edge of the bridge, and he lifted his katana, readying it.

The moment one came in reach, he lashed out, slicing a harsh diagonal line across its chest and bringing the tip up high. Rib bones were bared under the strip of split flesh, and it shrieked, staggering a half-step. The stutter in its movement gave him the time he needed to twist his wrist, letting the blade fall back onto it, and it struck into the side of its skull.

Bone and flesh scattered from the blow, its ear and the socket of its jaw torn through by the edge of the sword, and it was thrown to the ground with a sputtered shriek. It struggled, clawing at the ground, but its limbs did not seem to respond with precision.

Nick kept walking backwards, kept moving, lashing out as the second infected leapt over its compatriot and lunged for him. It got too close too suddenly, and he lifted the hilt of his katana instead, striking it bluntly toward the creature's face.

He made contact, but the impact only shook it slightly before it recovered and was lashing out, nails scraping against his shoulder through his shirt. He gritted his teeth, shifting back on a heel so he could kick out, the toe of his sneaker catching the zombie's knee just beneath the patella. The sensation of something crunching made his nose scrunch, and its left leg collapsed.

It shrieked at him, trying to scrabble up to hobble toward him, but he merely slashed out and caught it in the throat with the edge of his katana. He continued his retreat as the zombie's head tipped perilously back, flesh sawn open, blood guttering from the wound.

Three more ran through the gap, a taller female lurching ahead with broad strides, and Nick's pulse accelerated. He risked a glance over his shoulder, and wished he hadn't.

Ellis was swapping between loosing shots and using his shotgun like a battering ram, bashing the stock into any portion of an infected he could reach. Rochelle had Chris' machete in her right hand, her handgun in her left, and she was taking hunks and pieces with every swing.

A Jockey's cackling broke through the din, but was suddenly silenced, its rain-slick pinkened form caught by a shot from Ellis before it could make it out of the crowd.

Lena and Coach were close together, his shotgun filling in the moments where her strength with her brush-hook wavered. When the horde grew too thick for him to have the room to reload it, Rhiannon was suddenly behind him, pushing her stun baton into his hands.

She and Christophe did not join the fray. Rhiannon held her bat at the ready, pushing closer to the foreigner in a move that seemed more protective of him than nervous. He had Maggie's carrier clutched tightly to his chest, attention focused on keeping out of danger.

His team was holding firm, making ground, even - but not for a lack of effort on the zombies' part. The simple fact was, the bridge was pulling out of easy reach, and the horde had to climb the barrier and pull themselves up instead of simply throwing themselves over the barrier wildly. It slowed them, causing strife as the zombies behind them clawed and struck at their backs, as if impatient.

That complicated things, from more than one angle.

The window of time they had to easily get down was closing, rapidly, and the chance they'd get injured in the jump was increasing. Even a rolled ankle could be a disaster, especially with a Tank on their heels. Coach's knee could give in entirely, if he landed wrong.

They needed to get down, but the way the horde slowed and built up at the end of the road meant they'd be jumping straight into the mass of it. They'd be torn to shreds, as surely as the Tank behind them would crush them against the concrete.

Worse, the higher the bridge raised, the more its structure and the lifting mechanism seemed to protest the weight. The infected making their way onto it added yet more pounds, and though he would not think it would be enough to make a difference - there was, no doubt, a limit... one already tested by the presence of the truck and SUV.

It was, no doubt, not meant to raise with any weight on it at all.

The panic built in his gut, blurring his attention, and he couldn't think straight. What the fuck do we do? We can't stop, and maybe we can't even go forward, but what the fuck else can we do? There's nowhere else to go!

Manic, wild, a part of him laughed: They could jump in the river, if it weren't for me.

The three infected reached him, and he could not react past the blind need to fight. He struck the first one across the belly, gore pouring out from the gash created from its hip to its sternum, a coil of tar-black intestine escaping as it grabbed for its own stomach.

It might've kept its footing, had the next infected not struck it from behind, shoving it to the ground and lunging for him. Nick darted to the side, dodging it, and cut low - his blade slit across the back of its left leg, cutting a deep line through its hamstring. It tried to turn and lash out for him, but its leg did not obey and it crashed to the concrete with a wet slap.

He kicked out as it fell, shoving it into a roll to get some distance between them, though it stopped itself by clawing against the bridge's hard surface. Its nails broke against the asphalt, fingertips scraped raw as it halted its own momentum.

It started to crawl toward him with a shriek.

He could feel the distance between him and the others growing, but he was the only thing keeping the infected from Christophe and Rhiannon, and neither were in a shape to help him. All he could do was hold his ground, keep them at bay.

The time he'd bought himself by downing the second zombie was just enough to turn and lift his katana to meet the third zombie as it charged him.

Nick's body protested, arms aching, fingers cold and stiff in the rain. When he struck, the blade turned in his wet palm and hit with the flat instead of the edge, cracking against the zombie's chest. The blow sent a shockwave up his arm, and he gritted his teeth, darting back a step to try and regain space, and give himself the time he needed to wind back up.

Lightning flashed, cutting a harsh line in the sky that pierced the cloud-cover, and it seared colour and light in his vision.
He froze - and the infected froze, too.

No.

There was a vacuum of sound, just before the thunder crashed, like his ears knew it was coming and braced for the noise. It was the rending of air in the sky, a crack and not a rumble, sharp with the proximity of the lightning strike itself. It deafened him, just as the light tried to blind him.

It can’t - fucking -

It was hard, at first, to tell. Her hair was plastered flat to her face in the rain, her skin greyed and mottled by plump veins just underneath the surface. A deep gash cut from her jaw down to her sternum, revealing muscle and flesh amidst blackened coagulation. Broad holes in her clothing bared the swell of her left breast, that, too, torn until fatty viscera glinted in the light.

Blood and dirt was mixed and muted by the rain soaking her, but not even the downpour could rinse her completely clean. Instead, it turned everything dark, shades of black on shades of purple.

He could've dismissed it, at first, even as his katana slid over the delicate, torn ruffles of a once-vibrant purple blouse. He could've dismissed the likeness as a coincidence, or a mistake, even blamed it on whatever malfunction of his perception had caused him to hear Brett Sullivan's voice in the maintenance hall of a shopping mall.

But her eyes - bloodshot in the whites, and irises taking on a yellow-green opalescence as the light faded and they returned to their eerie backlit glow - met his, and it did not feel like a hallucination.

Brenda stood in front of him, and the rain bit coldly into his skin.

He could not move, could not think. Panic could not reach him where he stood - he was beyond panic. His heart pounded in his chest until it hurt, his ribs straining to contain the pulsing of it. He didn't realize he'd begun to hold his breath until his lungs began to hurt, too. His vision blurred, from the rain as well as adrenaline.

The glow from the lightning strike faded, his vision darkening as it did, but he could still see her head tilt. He could see her chin lower to look down at herself. He could see her left hand raise, settling over the blade frozen against her chest. He watched her fingertips slide against the edge, skin splitting against the steel when she applied too much pressure, blood washed away in an instant by the rain.

Brenda touched the blade like she remembered it, and she looked up at the sniper rifle hanging from his shoulder like she remembered it - and when her glowing eyes met his, she looked at him like she remembered him, too.

There was no reaction, no emotion, just animal recognition, enough stimuli to stir some far-off interest. Her head cocked and her jaw moved, and the sound that left her was a guttural whine, wheezed as air escaped the damage in her throat. It fluttered into a snarl - and then rage pulled at her features, blunt and animal, the same fury and agony that stitched itself into every zombie's face.

Fight or flight pulled hard at his reins, but shock simply snapped them. He tried to shout and could not even recall how.

A plea for help withered and died on his tongue. Before he could break through the cement thickening to rock in his joints, she lashed out. Her fingers wrapped around his throat, and her body-weight pushed into his. She was strong - too strong - and he could not stop from slipping on his heels.

He fell before he could catch himself, landing hard on his tailbone. His body was caught in the whiplash, the back of his head cracking into the concrete as he flattened into it. The pain was a blinding flash of red, jarring him, and where it should have stunned him - it woke him up.

There, finally, his voice returned to him, and he yelled out a hoarse few syllables, incoherent. He let go of his blade in order to reach up and grab at Brenda's forearms in a feral attempt to pry her hands away from his neck. They did not give, however, nor did her greyed flesh yield as easily as it should have.

He dug in nails as she dug in hers, but her grip closed around his throat and crushed his windpipe with a thumb placed just below his Adam's apple. The force turned his shout into a whimper, and he kicked up his knees, trying to get leverage to roll them over.

He did not manage anything but a buck of his body underneath her weight.

The rain poured down against his face, blurring into his eyes and filling his mouth as he gaped for air. Brenda lowered her head, curling into him, releasing a gargled sound that clicked and rattled in her mouth. It was almost inquisitive, past the fury, as her lips drifted close to his cheek, the scent of rot and blood cutting through his senses.

She huffed, faintly, as if to breathe him in.

His vision was fading, blurring, and his fingernails broke skin as he scrabbled at her forearms, desperate. He could not tell if the pain was constriction or her nails piercing him, too. He didn't know if he'd crossed some critical point, where his windpipe had collapsed, and it would not recover - and the thought of it pushed him firmly into terror.

His chest surged, and the single breath he managed was more water than air. He'd drown, maybe, before she'd even gotten the chance to strangle the life out of him.

Movement flashed above them, and her hands were suddenly ripped from his neck, nails scrabbling and leaving gouges behind. She was thrown away and off of him as if by a blow, but he couldn't look to see from what, vision drawn almost to a pinhole.

The release of pressure against his throat made him gasp in a breath, chest surging to fill his lungs. He was forced to choke and gag when they could only do so half-heartedly. His body curled in a pathetic reflex, and he could barely work his throat enough to reject the water pooling in his lungs.

Then, abruptly, a hand was on his leg, and it clawed into his shin with a sharp stab of pain even through his denim. A distant part of him knew that the zombie he'd downed had reached him, but he was barely able to move to escape or fight it off.

Past the agony curling through his chest, the screaming of his body as it begged for air, he sputtered water and saliva and bile. The cold draw of some hard-wired survival instinct had him scrabbling to grab for the Magnum holstered at his thigh. His fingers did not obey him, cold and stiff, and he only got it free as the infected grabbed nails in his thigh, crawling up his body.

He aimed half-blindly, pushing the gun forward and directing it toward the shape next to him, then pulled the trigger. His arm jolted with the force, and he felt the infected jerk and then collapse beside him.

Nick forced himself up onto an elbow, shuddering with a hacking set of coughs. The way the rain continued to pour down his face and chest made it feel like he was full of water, like he was under the surface, and there was no air left for him to breathe - but then he breathed.

It hurt, sharply, rattling as his lungs protested it. It surged him into another rush of coughs, vision blurring as his entire body ached, throat burning as he choked past the clenched pain in his neck. But he breathed, and with the oxygen came enough focus to turn his head.

Coach stood barely a foot away, stun baton lifted, facing away from him. His shoulders heaved, and he was frozen there, staring at the infected standing in front of him.

Head cocked, jaw dangerously cocked in its socket as if the left mandible had broken free, Brenda's fingers curled and uncurled. She released a shriek, modulated by her ruined throat and now-ruined jaw, gurgled through blood.

She's real. This is real. Isn't it? If it wasn't real, he'd have just killed it. He wouldn't be hesitating. He wouldn't be -

She charged, and when Coach swung out with the baton to catch her in the neck again, she lunged her body lower and dodged it. The move caught Coach off-guard, and she was suddenly in his space - and Nick couldn't see past his body at first, but he shouted out in pain, and when the man staggered back a step and half-turned, he saw.

Brenda - or what remained of her - had latched onto his upper arm, biting into his bicep. It was an awful sight, the way her jaw tilted with the force applied, unable to close evenly with the left side of her jaw broken. The bite still, clearly, hurt.

Coach tried to twist his shoulder and then his body, trying to pull away from her, but she did not let go. Her fists battered at him, one clawing up toward his neck, and he was forced to jerk his chin away to keep her nails from reaching his face. He couldn't swing the baton with her pressed so close, but he tried to lift it, pressing its end against her face.

When he discharged its taser-like burst of electricity, the sound crackling, he roared; the shock only forced her jaw to close tighter against his arm, her muscles jolting tense.

Nick's body did not want to move, but he did not give it a choice. He stood, legs threatening to fail, katana clutched in a loose grip and tip dragged against the ground.

His periphery was enough to see the rest of the team was getting overwhelmed. Without Coach, they had closed in on each other, and the horde was beginning to circle them. A line of infected was beginning to separate them from the rest of the team, and Ellis and Rochelle had yet to notice, they were so focused on holding back the infected near them.

Lena was expending all her energy protecting Chris and Rhiannon, but she spared a desperate glance in their direction, and shouted something he could not hear.

Nick marched forward, raising his Magnum, and he did not shoot until he was so close he could almost press the nose of it directly against her temple, until even his shaky hand couldn't possibly angle the bullet and hit Coach.

There was a moment, before he pulled the trigger, when her eyes flickered up and met his. He saw once more the blood-soaked woman lain against the concrete, bleeding steadily out from her gut. She'd gazed at him with such calm, like they'd simply finished a game of chess and she had lost.

He'd felt no pity, beyond the desire to put her out of her misery.

Here, now, why did it feel like a second chance to do so? And why did he feel - past an absolute terror - a strained and uneasy grief? Carmine didn't deserve it. And you didn't either, you fucking crazy bitch.

The hole that tunneled through the curve of her eyebrow seemed too small, too clean, to kill her so quickly. Her body stiffened, and then her eyes went distant, and her legs crumpled beneath her.

Coach stepped back, staggered, and grabbed immediately for his arm as her mouth dropped away from it. He and Nick both stared down at her as she slid first to her knees, then collapsed onto her side, striking the bridge's surface as dead weight. Her eyes stared sightlessly ahead, gore dribbling across her forehead, the contents of her skull spread out behind her in black and red speckles on the concrete.

It was washed away in an instant, blooming into thick and rippled rings of colour, the downpour trying and trying to clean it. The rain beat down upon them, droplets fat and cold, and pooled against the curve of her neck and within the soft part of her half-torn lips.

Nick's gaze shifted up, shoulders slumping, and found Coach staring back at him. The horror there sat as quiet affirmation: they'd both seen her.

I wish I was crazy.

The sound of crushing metal rent the air, and with it came a second shrieking car alarm to join the first. It felt surreal, for a moment, to turn and find their sedan sailing up and through the air in their direction. It struck the boxtruck with a wheel as it flipped over it, and the jolt was enough to bounce the truck forward.

It jostled further forward until its right front wheel joined the first in rolling over the edge of the bridge. With that wheel now no longer holding it somewhat steady, the truck began to ease forward on its back wheels, undercarriage squealing as it scraped against the edge of the bridge's structure. It eased its way closer and closer to a crucial tipping point - but it halted, catching on the hitch connecting it and its cargo, and teetered with a groan of steel.

The sedan did not stop, however.

Colliding with the boxtruck sent it into a sharp tailspin, suddenly dropping, and the car hit the bridge. It did not bounce, but rolled, catching only feet of air between each strike of a corner or a side against the concrete below. The sound was awful, each strike crushing more and more of its chassis.

Coach and he both bolted, breaking into a sprint toward the edge of the bridge to escape the sedan's path. They ran toward the barrier separating them from the edge, pressing close to it, and so close to one another that they flattened into the contact, side by side.

The sedan struck hard onto its belly on the next impact, and its momentum died out in one last flop of metal and rubber. It laid in the center of the bridge, alarm shrieking - the alarm likely the only thing still functioning inside of it.

There was a rumble beneath them, a stuttered motion before a sudden halt. A slope became just-barely tangible under their feet as the back half of the bridge did not continue to raise, but the front half did.

The impacts and the added weight had done it no favours.

"Holy goddamn shit." Coach uttered, and Nick almost took it at face-value, until the ex-football player struck out to grab Nick's sleeve, fingers clumsy on the soaked fabric. The Northerner looked toward him, instantly, and instead found himself looking over the edge.

He could just see bodies in the water, some floating, some in the process of sinking, and some floundering in the tossing waves beneath them. It took Nick a moment to understand where they were coming from, and even then, yet another to understand why.

The bridge had passed out of reach of the horde entirely. Rather than stop, the stampede continued to push, continued to crush in toward the bridge - and they were shoving each other over the edge. Given no alternative route to reach them, the horde simply spilled into the ocean.

Better, the flow of bodies up onto the bridge had been cut off, and the rest of the team was close to the edge.

It felt like a streak of hope, a shock to his system, because they had a chance. All at once, the balance tipped in their favour: if the horde below cleared out, they could jump down in relative safety, even if they took some injuries in the process.

"Fucking go!" Nick grabbed Coach in return and pushed, screamed, voice broken, before he'd even truly processed the revelation. Desperation clawed at him, an urgency, because nothing mattered more than his team getting to safety. He raised his voice until it cracked, trying to carry to the survivors. "Jump!"

They sprinted, charging ahead, and Nick felt some clenched relief when Lena darted to grab Maggie's carrier from Chris' grasp and hold it under her arm. They traded shouts as the entire team backed toward the edge, and then suddenly the brunette turned and leapt off.

It made a sick feeling lurch in Nick's stomach, watching her drop out of sight.

There was a loaded moment, where Christophe and Rhiannon looked down - but she must've made the landing, because her sister took the step after her. She reached back as she did, gripping Chris' hand by force, and he had no choice but to fall after her when she pulled him along.

Ellis and Rochelle were the only ones left, and they pressed back to back, fending off the infected now circled close around them. They were wearing down the horde, and even when there was an opening to bolt, they did not budge. It was obvious enough their intention: they would not jump unless they all went together.

Stupid. buzzed in the back of his mind, glazing over the tight warmth in his chest.

The Southerner twisted his weight on a heel, blasting a hole in the midsection of a zombie with his shotgun, and glanced urgently in their direction. "C'mon, guys!" he shouted. "We gotta -"

His eyes widened, head lifting, and Nick didn't need more warning before he looked over his shoulder.

The Tank's meaty fists gripped the far edge of the bridge, pulling its massive body up. Even had that end continued to rise in unison with the other end, the creature's reach was long enough to close the gap, and it clutched stubby fingers against the concrete to drag itself forward.

The Tank's weight, and the increasing difference between the height of either end putting more and more pressure on the structure, proved to be too much.

The sound of concrete and rebar giving way was deafening, every crack and fracture vibrating through the material under their feet. The worst of the split formed just behind the boxtruck, the bridge shearing apart, and both Nick and Coach both staggered as the ground beneath them shifted in a sympathetic jolt.

Metal shrieked as the truck suddenly shifted, tipping into a half-roll as the fracture formed beside it caused it to sink into the divot, crashing down onto its side against the bridge. That blow sent the cracks spreading in a violent shudder.

All at once, the broken section of the bridge tore free, and both it and the boxtruck plummeted. As the vehicle fell with a gentle spin, it clipped against the edges of the ragged hole it had created, knocking chunks of concrete loose and widening the gap.

Worse, was the sound it made as it all hit the water below.

The bridge was not completely split in half, but the few feet of asphalt still linking its two halves did not look like it would last long. The damage had followed the subtle fault line of a piece of framing, and didn't seem to be spreading further toward them, but Nick couldn't help a mindless, animal fear.

"Go!" he shouted, even as he started to move again, rushing forward and grabbing at Coach's shoulder to push him forward. "Just fucking go! We're right behind you!"

And the way Ellis' eyes shifted, matching his, and narrowed at him through the rain in a stubborn, resolute fury - an angry refusal - why was it a relief? Why did it comfort him, just subtly? He felt lost when they flickered away, refocusing on the infected around him, Ellis swinging out with the stock of his shotgun.

I need to know you care. Even if... I just need to know you're out there, somewhere, that someone cares... at all. I can't... lose that, even if I lose you... I -

Something struck his hip, and then writhed to loop around his midsection. The shout that left him was drawn out into a weak and rusted-out sound, diaphragm crushed as the tongue drew taut. He tried to turn and lash out with the sword gripped awkwardly in his left hand, but the tongue yanked his body back, and as suddenly as he'd attempted the swing, he was falling.

He hit the ground harder this time, and wrong. His shoulder took the brunt of his weight, body twisting as the Smoker's grasp pulled him into a roll. Something popped, deep in the joint, and the pain that lit up was searing. It hurt from his shoulderblade down to his armpit, and then a burning pain speared up to his collarbone.

He could not keep his fingers curled to maintain his grasp on the katana, and it was left behind.

Being dragged forward on it threatened to black out his vision entirely, and he felt like he might've shouted, but he could not be sure. He felt like he heard shouting from behind him, too, but it faded into a distant hum.

All he could hear, then, was the rain thundering down around him. It struck the asphalt, struck his body, struck the roiling ocean beneath them. The sound of water filled his ears, and he caught the barest glimpse up at his attacker in the moment before his face struck the concrete and his vision went blurry.

The Smoker stood on the opposite side of the wide strip taken out of the bridge, its heels braced to reel in his weight, pulling him closer and closer to the gap. He'd slide over the edge, and there would be no saving him.

Behind the Smoker, the Tank had gathered itself, and stood now at its full height. It roared, thrusting its arms out to either side, bloated musculature slick and glistening in the storm. The sound was somehow deafening and muffled by the sirens around them.

Realizing that he was going to die should have scared him. He should have been afraid, screaming, gone wild with panic as the edge tumbled closer. He should have cried and pleaded and kicked.

Instead, he tried numbly to get his Magnum in a position to fire ahead of him, like he might somehow catch the Smoker with a bullet. But the act of aiming, let alone hitting anything, while the tongue dragged him along was impossible.

When he lost his grip on it and saw it clatter away, he was still not afraid.

He felt nothing.

"You have to do this, Nicky."

His mother knelt down, taking his face in her hands, looking intently into his eyes. Her nails, manicured to blunt rectangular edges, caught against his jaw and pulled his chin up.

"I can't get my usual third shift, and we can't leave you home alone all day. And if you stay with Uncle Ollie, you'll be going to a better school than the one by us, anyway. This is good, okay? This is a good thing for all of us."

He didn't want to go. He didn't want to live with a man he barely knew, far from his parents, to go to a school with people he'd never met. He didn't want them to drive away and leave him there.

He didn't want it to be a good thing.

The palm that settled against his shoulder was huge, the thick and firm grip of his father's hand, jostling him gently. "C'mon, Champ. You'll do great here. You won't even miss us - and Oll can bring you by all the time." He knelt, too, and Nick wanted to hug around his rotund neck and refuse to let go.

"I -" His breath hitched, and he was going to cry, despite his best efforts not to. "I don't wanna live here, Pop. Uncle's mean. I wanna stay home. Why do I gotta live here?"

With an exaggerated frown, his father rapped a knuckle against his forehead, and it hurt. It wasn't supposed to, and he wasn't supposed to let it, but it did. "Don't talk about family like that. Oll's doing you a favour." When Nick's lower lip trembled, when his body shivered, his father intoned, "Here I was, thinking I raised up a son. Where's my tough little guy at?"

It took effort, but it got easier every time, and the smile that crossed his father's face when he managed to blink away the beginnings of tears was worth it.

"There he is."

His mother pulled at him, pulled his focus back to her, and she smiled at him slimly. "Don't make this a big deal, okay? It's only for a few months." She said it like it were true, and he believed it, though it would not turn out so temporary.

He would never completely forget how she exhaled a breath, impatient, like she was eager to leave.

She pulled him, too hard, and he did not want to go.

"It's time, Nicky."

The edge of the gap seemed to slide underneath him, rather than the other way around. There was a moment where he floated, and some absurd set of sensations coalesced such that he thought he might hover there, suspended amidst the rain.

Then he fell.

The fall hurt in its own way, gravity yanking on his body and pulling his stomach up so fiercely that he gagged, choking with the violent sense of vertigo. Closing his eyes was not a choice, but an instinctive reaction.

Reaching the end of the tongue hurt more.

It was tangled mostly around his midsection, so the majority of the force encircled there, crushing his ribs inward in a blinding crash of pain. His shoulder screamed out, and when he reflexively shifted, body curling, even the slightest attempt to move his arm resulted in nothing but further waves of agony.

It was broken, maybe, but did it matter? I'm dead. he thought, and it felt so easy to think. He felt relieved. Body just hasn't gotten the memo yet.

The tongue crawled up his chest, continuing to constrict around him, and its grip began to close around his frame. He breathed as if through a straw, choking in air, and his eyes flickered up.

Looking up toward the underside of the bridge felt... strange, an out of body experience that his body was unfortunately chained to. He gazed up, jaw gritted as his thoughts fogged, and all he could think was: This is good, isn't it?

It's good for all of us.

He'd found the trigger, finally, and he hadn't even had to pull it.

Nick wished he had the strength to feel shock when Coach's frame leaned out, staring down at him, shaded and silhouetted in the rain. He wished he could affect the situation, force the man to run, or slow the Tank down where its thundering footsteps began to charge along the bridge.

He wished he could do anything but gaze up, low-lidded, and use the last gust of air in his body to croak, "Run, Sam."

He wished he could have said, I'm sorry.

He wished he could have said, You meant everything to me. I just wanted you to be safe.

He wished he could have held Rochelle in his arms, squeezed her until she laughed. She'd punch out at him and protest, but she'd press into it, and she'd smile long after it.

He wished he'd drunk a little less, the night before, so he could better remember the way Ellis looked at him. He wished he could have gotten one more kiss, one more touch - but it was better.

It was better that Ellis' last words to him were fury.

It made it easier to let go, didn't it? Wouldn't it? Wouldn't anger be better than grief, when Ellis realized he was gone? Hate was so much easier to swallow than the alternative.

You don't have to love me, and I don't have to live without you. Break-even.

He hated it. He hated it all, and he hated himself more than anything. He hated that he'd found the only scrap of goodness in an otherwise miserable circumstance and squandered it.
Shit goodbye.

Darkness came quicker than he expected. His vision stopped working first, blown with stars and pinprick points of green, the echo of light left under his eyelids. He was conscious for longer, by seconds - but then it all faded out.

Coach watched him fall limp, dangling down from the bridge, cocooned in the fleshy and fibrous tentacle that drew ever tighter.

He knew it was over, the knowledge sitting cold in his chest, a cancerous growth that ate at him from the inside. The Tank was seconds away. There was no time to pull Nick up, even if he could've done so alone, and the ocean below was a death sentence regardless of his consciousness.

Tears streaked down his face, pain sharply prickling in his jaw as he gritted it against the urge to gasp in air, suck in oxygen. His shoulders slumped, and for just a moment, he did not move. For a moment, he simply stood, held firm against the desire to collapse.

The screams from behind him were not zombies'.

Rochelle wailed out denial, a rage burst into the air. It was agony, and not the kind that came with any physical wound. It was a wail that shifted from Nick's name to his - from grief to fear, soaked through with something visceral and broken.

The sound that left Ellis was nothing Coach had ever heard before.

It was inhuman.

It did not hit him - it broke against him, the sound shattering like so much fine glass, shards lighting slivers of hot pain over every inch of him. Raw and guttural, Ellis screamed out as if some part of him was being torn from him... as if he, too, were dangled from the bridge.

He screamed like he knew it was hopeless, even, to scream.

Coach's heart, already broken, split and shattered in his chest. His gaze raised, settling on the two infected across the gap, feeling the bridge tremble under his feet as the Tank's massive body crashed down with every step. The Smoker was frozen where it stood, straining against its own tongue as it held Nick aloft.

He spoke, airless, just a whisper, just for himself. His teeth chattered as he spoke, partly cold and partly fear.

"Those who hope in the Lord will renew their strength."

His hands shifted, gripping his shotgun, raising it. He settled the stock against his shoulder, bracing it against the softness under his clavicle, steadying it against the trembling of his hands.

"They will run and not be weary."

He aimed high, pulling just one trigger, and the clap of the shotgun firing was followed by the wet pop of flesh bursting open. The straining sacs lacing the Smoker's collar exploded, a grey haze pouring out as if under pressure. It shrieked, staggering, and its tongue was ripped loose from its internal moorings.

Nick fell, and it should have been louder. It should have been slower. He shouldn't have dropped out of sight in a flash, gone, eaten up by the storm like he was never there at all.
"They will soar on wings, like eagles."

Standing there just a moment, Coach turned his chin up, glancing toward the sky, chest heaving as he made no effort to stop the tears mixing in with the rain on his cheeks. He inhaled, filling his lungs, sucking in air with a stuttered gasp.

Coach released his grip on his shotgun, let it clatter to the ground. He closed his eyes, feeling the earthquake of the Tank’s approach.

He did not jump.

He fell, letting his body tip forward and over the edge, collapsing into the pull of gravity.

Amen.
Chapter 293

It was not a feeling. It was a physical sensation, a mortal wound, the shift and crush of something in his chest until Ellis could not breathe - until he wasn't sure that his lungs could even function anymore. He screamed, because the alternative was to think, and that, he could not do. The alternative was to cry, and that, he had no time for.

He hadn't even heard the Smoker, or heard the initial impact of its tentacle with Nick. He hadn't realized what was happening for a moment, not until he saw motion and took the time to look. Coach had sprinted, tried - but it all happened too fast, and there was no outpacing the pull of a Smoker's tongue.

And then they were gone. Both of them disappeared over the edge of the bridge, and the storm was so loud, he couldn't even hear the sound of them striking the river's roiling surface.

The process was so slow, it felt like he should have been able to do something. He should have run, or shot, or seen the Smoker step into view and yelled. He should have forced Nick to stay closer, instead of letting him drift to the back of the group. He should have done something.

You can't... do this tuh me. Neither'uh you. You can't - I won't let you.

Ellis started to run, bolting as if to sprint down the length of the bridge. The Tank's presence would not stop him; he'd rush ahead and dive into the river after them, pull them to safety. There was no other option. There was, simply, no other choice.

He'd faced the idea of his friends dying more than once, at the hands of an infected or not. He'd never truly bent to the fear, never truly believed that they wouldn't find each other again. They had always made it through. Regardless of the danger hanging over them, they had overcome and survived.

This ain't no different. We're gonna be okay. We're gonna be fine. They're gonna be fine. I'm gonna - Coach's gonna get Nick'n'I'm gonna get 'em, 'n' -

And then the Tank stopped, squat head cocking as it seemed to regard the gap in the bridge. Rather than continue forward, it turned, reaching out thick-fingered hands to grab ahold of the shrieking SUV parked just behind it.

He would have kept moving, if it had been up to him. He'd have charged ahead, whatever the consequences, because turning and running would have been allowing reality to cement itself around him. Doing anything but throwing himself into the river and joining his teammates would have been like admitting they were dead, or soon to die.

This ain't happenin'.

Rochelle's hands grabbed him, circling around his waist, and her weight pulled against him so hard she must've lifted her feet half-off the ground and hung off him. "N-no! You can't!" she shouted, and her voice broke with the ragged sound of an inhale, trembling with the beginnings of hyperventilation. "We have to -"

She was pleading, and when his gaze darted back to hers, he saw desperation. Terror drew her face into a fearful pinch, and her mouth was trembling. Her words barely collected themselves into a coherent arrangement - they broke down, instead, to a begged cry.
"Please, baby!"

The Tank roared, twisting its weight, lurching to drag the SUV forward and fling it as if it were some oversized Frisbee. The car's wheels squealed as its axles bounced with the pull right before it got air, spinning only lazily in the arc that it made toward them.

If Rochelle hadn't been there, maybe Ellis would have continued forward. Even with her there, he was stronger than her. He could break free of her grasp. He could bolt to the left, dodge the car, let it roll past him and sprint to the edge of the bridge before the Tank reached him.

But what if all he did was die, and get her killed, too? She wouldn't leave without him, and he wasn't going to pull her with. There was a fragile moment, only a fraction of a second, where his thoughts ground to a halt like so many stuck gears. God - whut'm... I supposed tuh do? Whut would Coach tell me tuh do?

He thought it like he didn't know, like he couldn't hear Coach's voice.

"Get her out, son. Can't do shit, now. Just get 'em out."

That thought made him weaken just enough that she got traction, pulling him into a stagger, and he found himself yanked backwards. His body obeyed before his mind could reconsider, and the distance between them and the undamaged end of the bridge evaporated in a few long strides.

He had only the moment before the jump to regret it - but the collision of steel with the concrete mere feet behind them, and the rapid approach of the SUV's screaming car alarm, struck a chill up his spine. The car might just roll and crush over them. Instinct kicked in, and all he could do was flee.

It would have been smart to lower themselves down off the edge, but there was no time and no space to do anything but throw themselves over. Air whipped past as they fell, the ground abruptly coming into view, along with their remaining teammates.

Ellis tried to ready himself, prepared to catch his weight and roll, but his limbs could not coordinate in so short a time. He managed nothing but putting his arms up, and when he struck the concrete, the blow sparked pain up both his forearms. He gasped, white stark over his vision for just an instant, before he regained enough focus to lift his head.

Rochelle was crouched next to him, halfway knelt but weight balanced down on her left arm. Pain was sprawled on her features as she lifted her arm to reveal blood mottling her elbow where she'd landed on it. He could tell there was similar damage covering his palms and the undersides of his wrists, but he barely felt it. He barely felt anything except the jagged hole settled just where his heart had beat, moments ago.

Darlin'... Nick, I-I love you, so much, please don't - ... Coach... we can't do this without y'all.

Above them, the SUV screeched to a messy halt, car alarm still shrieking, mere inches from the edge. It did not tip over but it did settle there on its side, an easy projectile for the Tank to punch off the edge or throw towards them.

Hands grabbed him, two grasping his left arm and one hooking on his shirt, and he tried to get his legs under himself as they hauled him up. He choked out a gusted noise of discomfort when one of the hands grazed a gash on his arm, reigniting something like sensation with a flare of hot pain, and swiveled his gaze to find Lena and Chris flanking him.

He looked around them, scanning a glance across their surroundings, driven by instinct - but he found nothing. There were no infected on the street. The horde had spilled into the canal and there was nothing left of it except the Tank, whose roar grew louder above. The half-formed gap in the bridge clearly did not stop it, though the mechanisms working within the towers flanking its entrance shrieked in protest with every thunderous step.

Rhiannon was similarly pulling Rochelle up, and the gesture made both women grunt out in pain, but the blonde warped it into a broken, "How -?"

The moment she'd reached her feet, Rochelle was staggering forward, grabbing hands on the other woman's waist in some half-baked embrace. She clutched at the biker, leaning into her, voice soaked-through with something beyond horror. "Smoker. Came out of nowhere. God... God, Rhee..."

Wordless, shivering, Rhiannon looped an arm against her back and pulled her closer. Past the hair plastered to her cheeks and forehead, Rhiannon's expression screwed slowly into something that approached sorrow before veering sharply into fury.

Christophe flinched, curling his arm into his chest where he'd taken Maggie's carrier back and held it close. There was an emptiness in his expression, whole body shivering, soaked through. He seemed absent entirely, a passive observer of his surroundings, only slowly following the flicker and shift of movement.

Shock didn't describe it, nor did Christophe or Lena seem surprised - they had seen it all, no doubt, from their position underneath the bridge - but something faltered, there in that moment, as if they all realized it as one:

_They're gone._

Ellis couldn't help a sob, a choke of air, pushing suddenly to turn. He wanted to sprint to the edge of the road, unsure if he wanted to see his teammates in the water, or wanted to see nothing at all. He could do nothing at all when Lena's arms were suddenly around his midsection, digging her heels in hard against his momentum.

"We have to go!" she rasped, husked. "We can't do anything! I - I know it's -"

This time, he fought, though it was hard to commit the entirety of his force behind it. He twisted, elbow pushing into the inside of her shoulder, trying to shove out of her grip. "I ain't leavin'!" he shouted, voice hoarse. "We gotta help! Nick can't swim, 'n'Coach's knee - they'll drown out there! They'll die, if we don't help!"

Lena's grasp on him only tightened, her voice hushing against his ear. She was trying for something like a comforting tone, but anxiety made it rushed, frustrated. Stress strained at her voice and made her grasp bite against him. "We throw ourselves in the water, we'll all die. And if we don't go, the Tank's going to kill us. They wouldn't want you to -"

Without quite disengaging from Rhiannon, still clung to her waist, Rochelle's gaze snapped toward Lena. Anger flooded into her expression, _despair_, and she bit off, "Don't you fucking dare tell us what they want. They aren't your goddamn family."

Ellis felt the biker's grip loosen, surprise weakening her, but when he shifted to push out of her arms, he only moved a step away. His fists curled, body stiffening, gaze lifting to the bridge where it had finally halted its excruciatingly slow ascent. It groaned and shuddered with the Tank's movements.
Then, there was a wheedled grating and squealing of metal, along with a roar from the giant infected.

A dark shape flew overhead, and amidst the rain, it was hard to identify it as Lena's motorcycle until it was past them and halfway to the ground. The bike hit a storefront just to the right of the road leading away from the bridge, flattening into the side of it with a shriek of metal.

It screeched as it skated down the paneled side of the building, crashing down onto the sidewalk with a tremendous crunch. It was just crumpled metal, their duffel bag only loosely lashed to its back with bungee cords. The bike was barely holding itself together, the connection between the handlebars and the front wheel fractured and bent.

The motorcycle was first - and then the crumpled remnants of their sedan was airborne, again. This time it flew to the side, flipping off the bridge as if it had been punched aside. Its impact in the river was loud enough to carry through the storm, a slap and crack of water.

The Tank was almost on top of them. It would plow into the SUV where it sat teetering on the edge, and lob it down at them where they stood, a glorified pack of sitting ducks.

He could not know for sure what would happen if he leapt in the river, neither to him nor to his teammates. He could, similarly, not know for sure what would happen if they ran. He didn't know if any action he took would truly impact the situation. There was a timer, or some far-off percentage representing Nick and Coach's survival, and he did not know how to affect it.

He just knew, with complete certainty, that they would die if they stayed.

This ain't it. This... can't be it. Coach'll get them both tuh shore, 'n'... we'll find 'em. They're gonna be okay'n we're gonna... make it out tuhgether. This shit ain't gonna take us down. That ain't how this ends.

The hollow feeling in him clamoured and reverberated until he felt he might not survive it, the cutting pain of an abscess, but he gritted his teeth against it. He gritted his teeth, yet could not stop the shiver up his spine, the flood of tears. He did not know how they'd continue, how he'd continue. He did not know how to move in a space that did not include all of them.

A wild thought crossed his mind; would Coach and Nick get pushed into the canal, or drawn out to sea? Would the storm pull them down into the depths, or buoy them up? It was difficult to remain focused past the grief crystallizing in his chest, but he tried, and let his feet carry him forward.

I'm... sorry. 'M so sorry. I hope I'm... doin' the right thing.

Ellis turned, lurching into a run, stumbling only slightly when his right hip twinged in some quiet complaint where it had twisted wrong in the impact with the ground. He bit his cheek though the pain, gaze darting to search for the best escape route amidst the unfamiliar territory. He could not cry and could not break, not with a Tank on their heels.

The road off the bridge continued on straight, but there was a turn that followed along the man-made river they'd crossed. It led off towards a fenced-in area, chainlink fencing bordering it and a small security gate that sat closed, tucked well away from the main road. It was, perhaps, a way to access the small canal that curved off the main one.

As much as moving away from the bridge entirely made sense, the gate wouldn't slow the Tank at all. They needed to get off the street, cut through a building, and get out of its sightline entirely. Down the road, the storefronts thickened, the alleys between them providing an optimal escape. point; they might've even been too thin for the creature to get into.

Ellis shouted, "C'mon. Over here! Off the road!" He heard his team shift to follow him, but glanced to make sure they were all in motion - and immediately noticed Lena's steps turning. She began to peel off from them, running toward the motorcycle.

"Whut the hell!?" His voice broke with concern, skidding into a slowed jog, twisting around to look toward her. "Lee, it's busted! Even if it weren't -"

"Can't leave our stuff." she shot back without missing a beat, strides lengthening as she bolted to the storefront and the crumpled motorcycle. "Keep going!" At her instruction, Ellis gritted his teeth, unable to fight a sense of frustration - if they left a quarter of their team behind, what value was a bag?

He was not going to lose anyone else.

When the Tank's roar cut harshly through the air, he whipped around, finding it standing just at the edge of the bridge. Its hands gripped either end of the SUV, and it lifted the vehicle over its head with a shuddering amount of effort, howling out a strained bleat of rage.

When it threw it, it aimed it straight down the center of the road, and the team instinctively scattered to either side. The momentary panic that caused the survivors to spread out put Ellis near enough to Lena to grab her arm. He gripped tightly, digging fingertips into her bicep, feeling her stiffen.

The SUV struck the ground with the tremendous shatter of glass and crunch of metal, rolling violently forward, but quickly losing momentum. The moment its movement became manageable, Ellis yanked on Lena's arm to drag her along with him. This time, he let his full weight lend itself to the gesture, and she was pulled almost off her feet.

"Forget it!" Ellis shouted when she started to fight him, wishing he didn't feel the subtle spite, the small degree of anger toward her. He wished a fractional part of him didn't consider it only fair; it wasn't her fault, and they'd all suffer the lost supplies. "It ain't worth it!"

Lena fought him for just an instant, coiled and twisting against his grasp - and then she was running along with him, sprinting, the team clumsily meeting back up the moment they'd outrun the SUV where it skidded to a halt on the road. They darted up the street, ducking into the very first alleyway they came up to.

The Tank's weight struck the road with a crash of flesh on asphalt, its roar faintly pained as it made the jump. It moved, immediately, to follow them.

They'd escaped Tanks a few times - but few of those times had been on foot, and never without a distraction. There was no bile bomb to throw and no forest to disappear into. If they hid in a house, would it lose interest, or break down the walls? How far could they run before they would encounter infected that hadn't been drawn in by the bridge sirens?

Can't outgun it. Can't outrun it. Gotta outsmart it. That's whut I do, ain't it? Come up with the harebrain schemes, wild ideas. Save the day. That's whut I'm s'posed tuh do. That's whut Nick'd ask me tuh do. S'whut Coach'd expect me tuh do.

But he had nothing, except the urge to run, and an overwhelming grief and guilt at doing so.

Why can't I fuckin' think?
As if by some small miracle, the alley they'd ducked into was, in fact, too small for the Tank to enter. It tried, reaching the entrance and pushing a step in, but its broad shoulders could not fit and it was not so smart as to attempt to sidle in.

Instead, it roared, and disappeared out of sight with a wide step, propelled by its knuckles against the ground. There wasn't even enough time to consider its absence before the crunch of wood and rigid panelling announced its attempts to scale the side of the building.

It could not follow them, so it would climb to stay atop them.

The survivors huddled, on instinct, in the very center of the alleyway, as far from either end as possible. The gutters overhead funneled rain away, except for a strip of open air in the center that poured down water in a deluge, splattering them like the spray of a sour-smelling waterfall.

The Tank's ascent was deafening, a window breaking as if it had punched through it in order to get a grip on the frame. The sounds echoed up higher until it reached the roofline of the single-story shops nestled tight together, stomping up until it felt like it was directly above them.

It was a dark shape, shadowed above the gap between the two roofs, and it was hard to tell if it was peering down to see them. Even if it couldn't see them from where it was, it would see them leave the alley in either direction, and there were no doors into either building inside of it. They were trapped.

The Tank roared, almost lost in the crack and roll of thunder.

Ellis felt nails dig into his wrist, sparking pain where they caught on the scraped-raw skin there, and Rochelle was suddenly pressed against his side. "Baby, we need to move." Her voice was stronger, now, more focused. She'd stuffed it all down, like they all had. "It's not going to just lose interest."

His voice went harsher than he meant. "I know!"

He wasn't angry, and certainly not angry at Rochelle. He was simply... full. Full of buzzing anxiety, full of bloated concern, full of grief and guilt and tension. Fear cramped into what few spaces remained, and there was no room for anything else, least of all concrete thought.

He froze, and freezing scared him worse.

Rochelle's hand didn't let go of him, though she didn't respond directly to him, either. She flickered a glance at him, an undeniable degree of hurt flickering across her features, but she turned on her heel. Her lower lip sucked between her teeth, attention strained. "We need to make a break for it."

The Tank roared, fists beating against the roof it stood on, footsteps pacing back and forth overhead. It was fury and rage, a fearsome energy driving it to vent out its anger in chuffs and growls and howls, and it showed no signs of calming.

Sharply, Lena lifted an arm, gesturing ahead of them to the opening of the alleyway onto the next street. "The alleys are our best shot right now. If it spots us, we can keep hiding, but... at some point it's gonna draw in more zeds. We have to lose it."

"It's right on top'uv us. Can't just go runnin'." he muttered, feeling himself start to move, but only taking a half-step forward before he bobbed back onto his heels, like a fractional pace. As if to concur, the Tank snarled a few guttural sounds, footsteps pacing above them before it started to claw at the gutters on the edge of the flat roof it perched atop. "We gotta... distract it, or..."

Water dumped down in a stream just a foot ahead of them, making them startle. The Tank's broad fingers got a grip on the thin metal frame of the gutters and bent a section open, causing a deluge as the contents of it began to pour down.

Grimacing up toward the roofline, Lena muttered low. "If we can get it to stay focused behind us, we can just stick close to the buildings and run. It might not hear us under the rain."

The storm was loud enough to suit the purpose, although saying it made Ellis suddenly perk to the fact that the bridge's sirens had shut off. Perhaps they only shrieked as it moved, but now that it stood at its apex, they'd halted - or the alarms had broken, much like the structure of the bridge itself.

Christophe shifted, clearing his throat past a rough wetness before he uttered, "I can - I can run -"
He nodded over his shoulder, toward the opposite end of the alleyway where they'd come from.
"Meet up, down the road?"

He'd barely gotten the full sentence out before Rochelle was suddenly next to him, releasing Ellis' wrists in favour of grabbing both hands on the foreigner's jawline. He startled, leaning away in some reflex as she cradled his face and stared into his eyes with abrupt desperation, but she tightened her grip to hold him still.

"Chris." she hissed, and there was a rawness to her voice that made his body stiffen. "No one's going anywhere. No one's doing anything. You're staying, right here, with me, okay? No more running at Chargers, no more running out into a horde, no - no more. Nobody else."

Her body trembled, and no one spoke.

"Nobody else throws themselves off a fucking bridge." she repeated, harsher, voice thickening as that composure threatened to fail. "I need you here."

Christophe's gaze darted to soak in her expression, and his softened in kind, his arm tightening against Maggie's carrier. His chin tilted, leaning his cheek into her left palm, his shoulders

Ellis felt the pull of something like misery, watching them, for just a moment. It wasn't that he didn't want to see the soft touches between them. Rather, he wanted to rush forward and grab them, shake them, because they were wasting time with half-baked confessions and subtlety. If he could've gotten one more chance to hold Nick, to speak with him, to make him listen...

He thinks I gave up.

It came from nowhere. It felt a bit like the moments before they'd jumped from the bridge, when the SUV had been close on their heels, and if they'd stopped for a moment it would have struck them.

He'd stopped, for just a moment, and it struck him.

Us fightin' was the last thing - us fightin' in the car. He thought I was... givin' up. I made him think I was -

Ellis couldn't breathe, nor move. He tried to suck in air but his ribs were frozen there, half-expanded, and he thought he might choke on his own tongue. Did it hurt more than watching two members of his family disappear over the edge? Would it hurt more, knowing what their last exchange had been, if Nick never came back?

Was it my fault...?

"Hey, hick."

His head jerked, chin raising, and he found himself staring into Rhiannon's eyes. He didn't know if she'd seen something in his expression or his posture, but her hazel gaze on his was gentler than it should have been. She did not, however, comment on it.

Instead, her arm lifted, pointing further into the alleyway. He hesitantly followed the gesture, only half-processing when his gaze landed on a couple plastic trash cans tucked next to one another in the alley. One was full to the brim of recyclables, bottles and cans stacked high.

"We throw that shit out in the street, it'll get the dumb fuck's attention for at least a few seconds. Help?"

He didn't want to move. He wanted to fall to his knees and break into tears. He wanted to grab his head and sob, like it might drain the pressure building up inside him, like it might ease the pain spiked through his midsection. He definitely did not want to move another step, another foot, another yard, away from the river.

"Okay." he whispered in a voice he did not recognize, moving his legs despite the way they protested and wobbled. He approached the bin alongside her, and they both reached to grab under its rim. His arms lifted of their own volition, and he only vaguely noticed her gasping in pain as she did the same.

Together, they raised it up, and began to sidle it toward the opening of the alleyway. They both moved as tenderly as they could, trying not to rattle the content as they moved, keeping it out of the spray of water from the gutters above.

Lena spared a frown toward them before nodding toward Rochelle and Christophe. Her chin was low, gaze lower, and her voice was taut. "Y'all ready to run? We need to get to the next block over, at least. And then maybe inside a building, hole up until it leaves."

Rochelle let her thumb slide over the mostly-healed scar on Chris' cheek, pushing suddenly to press a kiss there, too, damp lips skating over his equally damp skin. His eyes shut for just a moment - and then they pulled away from one another, both turning to face the other end of the alley.

"I'd rather kill it." she stated, brusque, shoulders shivering just gently. She wanted nothing more than to see the Tank's bullet-riddled corpse, collapsed on the asphalt. She wanted revenge, though on what? On whom? Even if they'd had the guns and ammo for it, what good would it have done? Make me feel fucking better.

The frown on Lena's face deepened, her body shifting. Anger drifted into her expression, an unfamiliar twist of frustration at her mouth. "Unless you've got a fully-loaded AK stashed in your sweats, Ro', I -"

Rochelle's gaze turned cutting, dangerous, and the brunette's lips sealed. Instead of continuing the conversation, Rochelle shifted to pull Christophe's machete out from where she'd tucked it into the backpack strapped on her shoulders. She traded it for Maggie's carrier, taking the strap and looping her arm through it, pulling it tight against her hip.

She spared a glance into the mesh, and found two owlish orange eyes peeping out at her from a mess of waterlogged fur in the vague shape of a cat. Maggie was gripping into the canvas of the carrier with all four paws, claws out and tangled in the fabric, and her pinkened mouth flashed as if to mime out a silent cry.

It was a strange addition to their grief, to realize that there was no one amongst them who could handle the cat, who could offer it any comfort.

Rochelle's gaze lifted, finding Christophe looking at the cat carrier, too. His gaze seemed so far-away. He seemed to become cardboard and paper before her eyes, soaked through and flimsy in the rain. He'd experienced so much loss - how much more could he take before something broke beyond repair?

How much could any of them take?

She'd seen Nick, in those few seconds before he'd been pulled over the edge. She'd seen him give up. She'd seen his half-hearted attempts to save himself, and the way he'd gone limp when his weapons had both been taken from him. He'd surrendered to it, instead of fighting tooth and nail til the last second.

Both men had simply let themselves fall - but Nick had not intended on seeing the other side.

That hurt like nothing she'd ever experienced before. The thought gutted her, clawing around in her chest until she couldn't quite breathe, until she couldn't do much but run that same thought over and over, along with one more: I should never have let things get so bad. I should have protected him. I should have helped him.

"You fuckshits ready?" Rhiannon hissed, lowly, and the producer was forced to look toward her. Ellis and the biker had positioned themselves near the mouth of the alley, the bin held carefully between them, and they were poised to throw it out into the street.

All she could think was how angry Nick would be at them, how stupid he'd have found their next move. They were pathetic, in that moment, caught at their weakest and with no better plan than tossing a garbage bin as distraction. It was laughable.

It was all they had.

She reached out and caught Chris' wrist, circling her fingers around his hand - a gesture he could not return without letting go of his machete - and pulling. She tried to communicate something in that grip, digging her fingertips in tight, a silent reminder that she had no intention of leaving him behind.

All at once, they moved: Rhiannon and Ellis threw the bin out, putting as much force as they could behind it, lobbing it out into the street. The moment it left their hands, they were sprinting back down the alley, all four of them close on Lena's heels.

They'd not made it more than a few feet before the bin struck the road with a loud clap of plastic, only just audible over the storm above. The impact sent its contents flying, and the mixture of glass, aluminum, and plastic striking the asphalt was far from quiet.

The Tank roared, and Rochelle felt a flood of relief when its footsteps thundered above, moving counter to them. It had taken the bait, at least for a moment.
None of them uttered a word, sprinting as carefully as they could, the strike and splash of their footsteps covered by the rain. They were all breathless and barely huffing in air as they ran, darting out of the alleyway. Re-entering the street went against all normal instinct, passing back into the sheets of rain outside, a cold shock.

Lena led them across the street, their pace accelerating when they all heard the tremendous thud - felt it, underneath their feet - of the Tank’s weight hitting the street. For an instant, Rochelle thought it might’ve jumped down after them, but when she darted a glance over her shoulder, the street was empty. It had jumped down to investigate the garbage, and for a moment, she felt a surge of adrenaline.

It was not triumph, precisely, but something more grim. Determination.

We can do this. she thought, and it was fragile, but the closest she could come to believing it. We're going to fight. So you fight, Nick. Coach - you fucking fight. We spent so much time acting like all that mattered was finding rescue, getting home to people that might be dead already, we never took the time to look at what we had, right here. We took it for granted.

The world was no longer the same. Nothing was real beyond what she could touch, and feel, and hear - and she would hold out hope for more, but fight for what she had, and fight to get them back.

Fight for us. For me.

The next alleyway was a block down the road, and their speed picked up even further, breaking into a reckless sprint. Getting more than one building between them and the Tank would not completely ensure their safety, but it was a step.

Please.
Two things made them stop running.

First, Rhiannon stumbled, striking the edge of the building they passed with her shoulder. She gasped in air and almost went down, kept upright only by a hand on the wall. Her body shuddered, pain apparent at a glance, and Lena darted back from her place at the front to tuck an arm against her waist and support her as they moved.

They kept going, seeking out a little more distance from the Tank, whose roars were still too close for comfort. They took a turn, circling around the boarded-up front of a building, and were abruptly faced with infected. The rain did nothing to discourage the zombies from flocking onto the street, staggered shapes crossing back and forth.

Agitation brought shrieks and snarls from them, moving with more interest and energy than they typically did. They weren't drawn toward the sounds of the Tank, but it stirred them up, roused them.

They were not the second reason the team stopped, however.

It was the lithe shape sitting in the middle of the road, proportions terribly off, talon-like fingers scraping against its bony arms and up to cradle its face. It sobbed, curling in on itself in the rain, shivering as if with cold. It sat there in the street, unmoving beyond the shudders of its wailing.

The chance of disturbing it by fighting nearby was not a risk any of them were willing to take. Wordlessly, without any coordination necessary beyond their mutual fear, they all skidded to a halt and backed up until the corner of the building was between them and the next street.

Christophe hushed out a frustrated noise, cracking the flat of his machete against the side of his knee. "Is no good, out here. Esto es una trampa mortal. We die, like this."

"Shit." Ellis muttered, both at the obstacle in front of them and the undeniable threat behind them. The Tank was not presently approaching them, but its movement was just loud enough and just scattered enough to make it clear that the creature was searching for them.

He couldn't shake the feeling that it had known to go in the opposite direction of where they'd thrown the garbage bin.

"Think now's the time tuh hole up." he uttered, louder, swiping the soaked denim of his sleeve against the side of his face. His voice stayed steadier than he expected, but he was acutely aware of the pressure building just behind his teeth. "We're just pushin' forward fer nothin'. Tank won't find us if we're quiet, 'n'I don't wanna... get too far from the canal."

It built further, pressure crushing his throat into a clench, but he blinked rain out of his eyes and pushed his cap down tighter on his head. He turned, starting to scan the buildings around them. "Anyone see a good -"

Lena jerked her chin, nodding further up the road. Her tone was inlaid with a pointed certainty that suggested she'd scoped it out as they'd been running. "That one." He quickly twisted to follow her gesture, seeing a slumped brick building that looked densely boarded up from the inside, wooden planks and grey tarp layered against the slim windows.

It wasn't uncommon to see boarded-up windows and tarped entryways; CEDA's instruction had been to take such measures back when the infection had simply been a rapidly escalating epidemic with a collection of excruciating and destructive symptoms, and not a mutating force that upended civilization as they'd known it.

Still, the building seemed particularly defensible, with limited windows and a small entrance. A visible side entrance was tucked into the far corner, leading into a tiny parking lot. There was a sign that had been covered in graffiti, black and green spray paint applied in wide splashes.

It might've formed words, at some point, but it had peeled and scuffed off in the weeks since its application.

As a result, Ellis could read neither.

"Let's go." he muttered, bolting into a jog to cross the intersection in front of them - sparing a glance to ensure the Witch was still seated in the street - and continue down the road. They moved in slim single-file, except for the sisters, footsteps splashing in the rain pooling on the sidewalk.

The front door had a small set of stairs leading to a tiny stoop, and Ellis took them in one long stride. He tried the handle, but though it twisted, the door itself only opened a half an inch.

"Somethin's blockin' it." he announced, setting his shoulder against the door and leaning into it. He felt it give a few centimeters, and heard the tiniest squeak of furniture scraping the ground. An irritated pinch drew his brows together, and he was aware of Rochelle's voice blurring out a protest when he took a step back and lifted his right foot.

He still had his workboots, and they were reinforced around the ankles as well as the front of his foot - but he'd have been lying if he pretended that factored into his choice to kick out, heel-first.

The door shuddered with the blow, and something jolted and then crashed, as if he'd knocked whatever was leaned against the door over. The move only gained him a few inches of space between the doorframe and the door. It was a loud noise, but not so loud that it would draw any attention over the storm, muffled inside the building.

The barricading furniture falling over meant the bulk of the weight would now be focused low against the inside of the door. He shifted his weight, prepared to kick with his toe instead, letting his leg swing back. Anger flooded him, souring in the back of his throat, and he growled out, "Stupid -"

A hand swiped to grab his elbow before he completed the motion. He stiffened, turning his chin to find Rochelle gazing at him, worry apparent in her eyes.

"Don't hurt yourself." she urged.

Ellis couldn't help but feel frustrated. His eyes slitted, shrugging away from her grip, and he gestured out in a vague wave of his hands. "Or whut? Think tuhday's gonna get worse if I stub muh damn toe? You rather stay out here?"

She started to respond, agitation flaring in kind on her face, but he moved before she could.

One fierce kick jammed the door back, and the awful squeal of the blocking furniture scraping back preceded a sizeable gap opening in the doorway. It was enough to sidle through, and that was exactly what Ellis did; he shoved his head through, shoulders crammed in halfway, and got a look into the building.

It was, he realized with some surprise, the remnants of a small gift shop. It was full of glass cases and shelving, but they'd all been shoved against the walls, and a lot of their contents had been scattered to the floor. Some of it was glass that had shattered and broken on the ground, unrecognizable in its fractured state, but most of it was kitschy T-shirts and canvas bags and purses all emblazoned with a variety of logos.

There was a section near the back with a table full of glass jars, full to bursting with rocks, stones, shells, tiny shark teeth, and fishbones, all alongside a basket full of palm-sized bags. A sign announced cheerily, '$4/bag'.

There was a back room that was closed off - and led, no doubt, to the second exit - and a restroom to the left.

It wouldn't be the most comfortable of places to bed down, but after the horde had burst through the front of their previous safehouse, the security of brick walls and a secondary escape route felt... better. Ellis felt like gathering them all inside and barricading the doors and never leaving again, in equal measure to the way he felt like turning and running back out into the street, retracing his steps, finding his way back to the river...

Instead, he pushed, squirming through the gap and stumbling slightly as his body slipped free. He caught his balance, glancing more thoroughly around the room, gaze settling on the heavy wooden cabinet that had been placed against the door and now sat on its belly on the ground. It was open-faced and, judging by the few that had been flung out and sat scattered on the ground, was full of beaded jewelry and earrings.

Ellis exhaled sharply, bending down to hook a hand on one of the gently sculpted edges of the cabinet's top, digging his heels into the ground as he pulled it a few more inches away from the door.

The rest of his team piled in after him through the opening. Rochelle, the last through, shut the door behind her, and they were left in relative silence.

Rain battered the roof of the building, thunder rumbling overhead, but the patter of water against the floor from their soaked-through frames was almost as loud. They all huffed, breathing hard, a mixture of huffs and sniffs and a heavy cough from Christophe.

The cold crept in now that they were no longer running, the dry air inside a harsh contrast to the water chilling to their bones. The rain itself had been colder than usual, temperature dropped by their proximity to the ocean, perhaps.

They were safe. Temporary and bittersweet as it was, they'd reached shelter, and had time to think. Ellis did not want to think.

His shoulders bounced, and he knelt down, grabbing the cabinet with both hands. He grunted as his raw and bloodied palms protested the contact, pushing hard, trying to lift it up off the ground. It was heavy, taller than him when upright, and did not give easily.

He strained and pushed harder, but it only began to move when Lena pressed next to him and joined the effort.

Together, they got it upright, and nudged it back against the door with a heavy screech of wood on wood, leaving marks in the floor. His boots crunched on the layer of bead-and-gemstone jewelry scattered in the space where it had lain.

With the door secure, he turned, inspecting the room. They'd need to clear the floor to have more room to sleep, but the back room was a more pressing concern. "Gotta make sure the other door's blocked." he muttered, shortly.

Nobody else moved. Rochelle and Rhiannon were staring at him, a mixed set of emotions across their faces. Christophe was staring at the ground, his body wavering gently where he stood. Even Lena had frozen, her hands in fists, staring at the front door rather than look anywhere near the rest of the team.

Ellis breathed, and it felt like huffing against a glass surface, feeling the damp air of his own exhale flutter back against him; there was a bubble around them, claustrophobic and constricting. It was ready to burst.

"Got shit to do." Coach's voice reminded him, gently. "Clear it. Get secure. No time fo' whin'gin'."

It scared him, for just an instant, to feel so bluntly like he'd heard the man's voice. Am I losin' it? Somethin' go wrong in me? Couldn't take it no more?

"Miracle we aren't all fucking crazy." Nick demurred, but it felt more like a memory of something he'd said once before, and it felt like a comfort. He clung to it, let it reverberate in his head, preferring it to his own thoughts.

Maybe it was just easier to pretend they stood just out of sight, just behind him, that he might turn and find Coach wearily bent over, Nick patting his back. "You good, big guy? Last time I saw you run that hard, was when we saw that Burgertank."

He'd groan, wave off the gambler, huffing. "Shut up, Nicolas. Don't make me think 'bout goddamn burgers right now."

Nick would laugh, start rattling off a list of condiments and toppings, and Coach would give him that look -

He'd been wrong. There was no comfort, there, just hurt that felt numb until it suddenly didn't. His lungs emptied and it was difficult to fill them again without shuddering. The hole in him grew wider, a chasm, and he knew if he didn't keep moving he'd fall in.

Ellis turned on his heel, marching forward, boots crunching on glass that he stomped thoughtlessly over. He swerved around a glass case, about shoulder-height and full of brightly-coloured mugs and bottles, and crossed to the door in the back.

It was unlocked, and gave no resistance.

The next room was darker, windowless entirely, and seemed to have been a storage room. Cardboard boxes sat piled around the walls, full to bursting with merchandise in bags. Most of them had been pushed around the squat back-door, but they did not sit flush with it, enough room left for the door to open.

In the space left in the center of the room, there was the clear fingerprint of someone's presence.

Food wrappers were strewn about, along with a small amount of blood - dried almost brown - on the front of a nearby box. A candle sat burnt-down in a lid of a jar, wax puddled and solid around the stub of a piece of blackened thread. There were a few scraps of fabric and bullet casings, but all of it was bluntly outlining a fairly even rectangular empty space, as if a folded sheet or a sleeping bag had taken up that room.

It made something in him uneasy, uncertain. It didn't look like the den of someone who'd holed up and died. The blood stains seemed minor, no more than the ones he'd left on the cabinet or the door handle from his injured palms.

It looked like the echo of someone who'd rested and then moved on.

"That's not a good fucking sign. Careful, Ace. Last thing we need is more friends." buzzed the tiny voice in the back of his head, Nick's, and it hurt. He pressed a thumb into the space between his brows, digging his nail in as he screwed up his brows.

Stop, please. I can't...

Rather than continue that thought, he stepped over the mess, approaching the back door. He knelt down, starting to grab boxes and push them back into place against the door, some heavier than others. His motions grew desperate, only pausing a moment when footsteps shuffled just in the doorway behind him.

"Shitfuck." Rhiannon muttered, her voice shifting as if she'd turned around. She sounded thready, and a soft shiver had taken control of her cadence. "Some cunthole slept here. Apparently we aren't the only geniuses who thought this shit-brick-house looked like a good place to hide."

Ellis had only just arranged a stack of boxes tight up against the door - it wouldn't stop entry, precisely, but it would make a fair amount of noise if it was all toppled over - when Rochelle's voice came softly from behind him.

"Ellis."

She'd glazed over the room, it seemed, and focused entirely on him. He turned his chin just a few degrees, enough to look back and see her leaning in, pressing just beside Rhiannon. There was a frown on her lips, eyes dark and damp.

"That's... enough. You -"

He knew that tone. It was her arresting, pointed, 'we're talking about this' tone of voice, and he'd never hated it before. It had never made him so angry before.

He didn't want to talk about it.

"We gotta clear some space." Ellis stated, words stiff and posture stiffer. He stood up, brushing his hands together and wincing when that hurt. He crossed the small room again, and when he reached the threshold, he didn't have to try very hard to pool frustration in his eyes.

The two women stood in his way, and he'd push past if he had to.

Rhiannon shifted on her heels, but couldn't back up with Rochelle in her way, and the blonde's expression twisted into something slightly stricken. Behind her, Rochelle mirrored that frustration back, her voice almost firm beyond a quiver that matched a tear spilling down her left cheek.

"Ellis, just... slow down. We need to talk... about this. We can't just -"

"Just whut?" he returned, and the fury that it left him with did not feel like his own. He felt caught, pulled in the wake of something bigger than himself, with no brakes even had he desired to find them. "I'm tryin' tuh get the fuckin' buildin' secure. If you don't wanna help, then don't."

He saw the hurt, the shock, on both of their faces.
They moved when he advanced, a jolt to make room as he nudged through the doorway. Ellis immediately refocused, looking first behind the tiny podium that held the register, then walking toward the bathroom.

"Need a broom." he muttered, mostly to himself, ignoring the four pairs of eyes on him. It was a raw feeling, to be watched, nobody moving but to track his motion with their gaze. It felt like they were waiting for something.

The bathroom was a swing-door, but a latch had been screwed on to let it be locked, the room containing a single toilet and sink in the relatively large space. It was an odd design for the building's purpose; it felt like the bones of the store had been meant for something else, and its trappings were just gauzy paper mache over the structure.

On instinct, he swiped a hand to feel for a lightswitch. When it clicked under his fingertip, nothing happened.

He frowned slightly, but there was enough light to see by if he opened the door all the way. A tiny utility cart was pressed into the corner - there was no broom, just a wet-mop formed of noodled material. When he approached and lifted it, it seemed stiff, mostly stuck together.

_Better'n nothin',_ he supposed, and strode back into the main room with it in hand.

He kept his eyes low, and started to sweep the mop against the wood, tilting it to take advantage of where its stiffness formed a flat edge along one side. Most of the glassware was small figurines or shotglasses, and most of it had broken cleanly, enabling him to sweep it into rough piles.

Glints here and there betrayed specks and shards stuck in the spaces between the slats of wood.

"Nobody go barefoot." he stated, unable to stop the words. Why couldn't he keep his silence? Why was he struck with the urge to speak, when the idea of talking cut pain across his chest? He didn't want a response, but he could not handle the loaded quiet, broken by the scrape of glass and the still-present patter of water.

His fingers trembled, and he realized, slowly, that his arms were mostly numb. It came unbidden, cruel: _If I'm shiverin', they must be freezin' out in the water._

Some comfort sank in, a quiet calm, when motion stirred among the team and he was no longer the only one working. Rhiannon moved to sidle around Rochelle, motion stiff as she did, starting to bend down and grab a few things off the ground. She tossed the soft objects aside, setting a few large shards of glass on the table in the far corner, silently tidying.

Christophe joined with mechanical attention, like he'd only now stirred from a doze, and jolted to mirror their behaviour to mask his disjointed awareness. Lena started to move, walking toward a glass case that lay half-fallen but braced against the wall, moving to straighten it.

That lasted but a few seconds.

Rochelle advanced a step, toe striking loudly on a mug that sat on the floor, sending it rolling and clattering forward. The sound made Ellis jump, and his gaze lifted.

"Stop." she croaked out, and it felt like a betrayal. He was running as far as he could from the feelings stewing in his chest, and she seemed intent on dragging them to the surface. "Fucking stop. What are you _doing_ right now? What is this? We're just going to settle in and make ourselves at home, like nothing's happened? Like Nick and Coach aren't missing?"

Lena was the one who stiffened, turning slightly, her voice soft. "Hun, I think... a minute to think is - ... Ellis is just trying to process -"

It was like setting off a firecracker. Rochelle's arms went up, and a choked laugh left her right before fury staggered her a step forward, pointing in the biker's direction. "I am not talking to you, and you can go right the hell ahead and not talk for him. This isn't about you."

Ellis' mouth twitched downward, suddenly flickering his gaze between both women, watching both of them tense and stiffen, as if they were feeling the moment out, unsure whether it would bubble over. Christophe looked anxious, acutely present, arm drawn tight to his side.

Rhiannon was frozen where she stood.

Rochelle advanced another step, and suddenly her attention was riveted on Lena. "You've done everything you can to get in the middle of things, and this is where it gets us. Why is it everything got miles worse the minute you pushed your way in all this?"

The Texan pushed out air through her nostrils, and pain flared over her eyes even as she spread her arms. "S- ... Seriously? I didn't - Nick came to us. We didn't do anything. And we were coming over here to find your helicopter, not -"

Sharply, Rochelle interrupted, venom entering her voice. "Don't 'we' this, Lena. This was all you."

Rhiannon tensed, further, turning her head a few inches. She moved stiffly, gaze darting to scan the room, focusing squarely on her sister. Her eyes narrowed, attention hardening behind a strangled frown, and she said nothing.

"Like any of us forgot your dock's over here, too. I mean, Jesus. Wasn't two seconds after they were gone and all you could focus on was getting to your goddamn duffel - let me guess, the boat keys were in there? Because that's all that matters to you."

Something shifted in Lena's expression, a frustration. She curled her hands into fists and returned, "And y'all don't give a lick about rescue, huh? I'm the only one who cares about -"

Rochelle's voice broke. "I care about the people I just watched fall in a fucking river!" She stood there, trembling now, and her fury did not stopper the flow of tears that began. "I care about the tiny handful of goddamn people I can trust, who're even alive out here, and that number just - I just lost -"

Her anger did not dilute, even as her focus scattered. "You've been using us from day one, and you aren't even sorry about it. You aren't even sorry about it when it just got them killed."

Ellis couldn't get himself to move. Pain seeped in, and not the least of it came from those words: 'got them killed.' Hearing them spoken so bluntly spiked pain through his skull, but the pain also slowed and sobered him. Clarity came very slowly, a light just-barely peeking from behind the muggy clouds choking out sense.

He was not the only one suffering, and his being angry was only churning them hotter and hotter. He'd fed into Rochelle's anger, and given it nowhere else to go. Minutes into their faltering new team dynamic, and he'd already let them down.

"Ain't time fo' this bickerin'." Coach chided him, softly, but he didn't know how to stop it. He didn't know how to stop his own anger, let alone everyone else's, but he tried.
Ellis raised his hands, dropping the mop entirely, shoulders tense. It felt half-hearted, his body lacking the energy to intercede, his voice even weaker. "G- ... guys, please, quit -"

Lena pushed her body to a tight stance, but did not give ground, nor did she let Ellis distract her. She shivered, and it was perhaps both the cold and a gentle wound. "How was this my fault?" she spat back, bitterly. "You think I wanted this to happen? Any of this?"

"Chica..." Christophe mumbled in a faint attempt at interruption, tenderly taking a couple of steps towards the dark-skinned survivor, his hand raising plaintively. He'd taken some strength from Ellis' attempt to intercede, it seemed. "Is too much."

Rochelle spared him no attention, either. "Of course not. Because you had a fucking use for Nick, didn't you?" She had closed the gap between them now, and when she gestured forward angrily, it was a hair's breadth from making contact with the other woman's sternum. "But you didn't know Nick's been trying to figure out how to kill himself for weeks, and you were helping him."

If the spark of the argument had been a firework, that felt like a bomb dropped out of the sky.

Ellis' chest clenched, and he couldn't help but think of that moment in the mall, when Nick had spat out some joke about killing himself. It had been morbid, and that was not unusual, but he'd been too sincere about it. It had come out wryly, and that wasn't the same thing.

But Nick hadn't jumped off the bridge. He'd been pulled. There was no choice in it.

Was there?

All his anger melted, there, and he was left with nothing but a stunned and hollow feeling. He couldn't even find grief, not really, nor guilt. It was just an all-encompassing sense of realization, like placing the last piece of a puzzle and seeing the whole picture.

Did he...? Did he let himself...?

Lena's expression went slack as her spine went stiff, and she blinked in a rapid flutter, eyes gaining a subtle sheen. She spoke like the air had been punched out of her, yet she pulled anger up to fill the rasped, "What's that supposed to -"

"You think he was going with you because he thought it was his best chance?" Rochelle's posture tightened in turn, and if the tears pooling against her cheeks were any indication, the words hurt her as she spoke them. "He just pointed himself in a direction and ran. You flagged him on because it benefitted you instead of telling us the minute you knew he was trying to leave, when we could've fucking done something. You were playing a game."

Lena stood there, eyes tracking away, like her brain moved faster than she could follow. Her genuine breathlessness, speechless in that instant, shook something loose in Ellis' brain.

They were close to some dangerous point of no return, a collapse, and nothing made that seem more real than the pale terror on Chris' face. He'd been through more than one such collapse, after all, and knew the signs better than most.

I... I can't do nothin' fer Coach'n'Nick right now... but if we go fallin' apart, there ain't gonna be no team tuh find'em. We... gotta hold it tuhgether. I gotta hold it tuhgether.

Ellis shifted uncomfortably on his feet, feeling glass crunch under the toe of his left boot. He cleared his throat, inhaling a sharp breath through his nose, wet and sore. His voice did not break when he tried to speak.
"Ro'. This ain't helpin'."

Rochelle pressed a palm to her mouth and inhaled harshly against it, her shoulders trembling, her brows screwing up. She barely acted like she heard him at all.

"He took Coach with him." she ghosted, and the words broke into a sob, shattering just past her teeth. Her chin lowered as she gritted her jaw against the sensation, and she looked like she might lose her balance entirely, as if the weight of it struck her, there. "Jesus. We lost both of them."

She did not protest when Christophe darted forward, moving with more fervor now, circling his arm against her back. She leaned into him, eyes going wide and distant, tears falling freely now, skating down her damp features.

"I don't know... how to keep going without him." Rochelle gasped out, her tone faltering, breaths winning out in a wheeze, as if she couldn't quite control her inhale and exhale. "Coach was... Coach is... he's the rock. He's my rock. How am I supposed to...?"

Christophe's arm tightened, drawing her closer, palm settling against the back of her neck to urge her to bury her face in his shoulder. "Chica." he murmured, even as his own voice grew thick. "They are not gone, until we are sure. Maybe -"

"You knew." came, whisper-quiet, from Rhiannon.

There was a tension that built, like the sudden rise of a static charge, when the blonde suddenly turned on her heel. Her fists were curled at her sides, shoulders high, and she focused a tight gaze on her sister.

Lena's defenses collapsed, a softening, and tears welled in her hazel eyes. "I -"

Rhiannon's body trembled with every step, a mixture of pain and something else. "You knew from the fuckin' start they were on the outs, that it was a whole... shit-ass mess. You had the breakup pegged from day one. You knew he wasn't just trying to run from some fucks he didn't give a shit about."

Lena's voice was raw when she spoke, her jaw shivering, like she might crumble under her sister's attention. "Rhee, you know it wasn't - I was tryin' not to get involved, I - you're the one who told me he wanted to -"

"You always fuckin' meddle." Rhiannon's next motion pushed into her space, and they were suddenly nose-to-nose. Lena barely kept standing, the tears flowing freely now, a desperate tremble pulling at her lips. "You stuck your fat ass in the middle of Mom and me for years, and for what? You pushed these fuckers til they snapped, and for fucking what? They could be dead. Coach could be dead right now. And nobody's coming on our fucking deathmarch to Texas, boo-hoo."

Airless and husky, stumbling the words past a hiccup of a sob, Lena tried for a response. She only got out, "I was trying to -", before Rhiannon moved.

The blow was a surprise. Everyone flinched as Rhiannon struck out, knuckles cracking against her sister's cheek, but Ellis couldn't stop himself from surging entirely to his feet in instinctive defense. The brunette staggered, clutching at her mouth, a blatant pain making her buckle over.

The taller woman took one step back, and as suddenly as she'd lashed out, her eyes widened. Her nostrils flared, a tiny admittance that she hadn't fully intended the outburst.
Still, furious, she spat out, "You fucked up. We all fucked up, duck. But you can't fuckin' sit here and pretend you didn't. You fucked up. And if Sam's fucking dead because of you, I might not be going on the goddamn fucking stupid boat."

Eyes swimming, clearly dizzied from the blow, Lena pulled her hand from her mouth and revealed a watery trickle of blood tracing down her chin out of the split in her lower lip. She rolled her tongue against it, hissing, and then husked out plaintive utterance.

"Ryan, you can't be serious -"

There was a strange dichotomy, in that moment.

Rhiannon and Christophe were the first to react, both of them straining at shocked expressions that broke through the tears on their faces. Rhiannon recoiled, and Christophe's gaze riveted on her back, his brows tangling into a sorrowful pinch.

Lena, Rochelle, and Ellis did not react, at first, partially out of some genuine assumption they'd misheard, or - in Lena's case - a failure to realize what she'd said.

And then it struck them, too.

Rochelle looked startled, gaze darting between the sisters, her lips parting in half of an utterance. Ellis rocked back on his heels, sucking in a sharp breath, feeling the cringe of discomfort that came with hearing something he shouldn't've.

Oh. he thought. Shit.

Silence did not describe the moment thereafter, because silence implied a degree of calm, or the absence of stimuli. Silence most assuredly did not describe the way Rhiannon's posture deflated, a practically audible creaking as all her anger petered out, no less tangible than the water pooling around her feet.

Her eyes darted low, staring at the floor, not meeting Lena's eyes as horror dragged both of the brunette's hands to her mouth. Lena did not speak, but her posture spoke volumes, her body frozen there as if she'd been encased in a dense layer of ice.

Quietly, without a word, Rhiannon turned and strode across the store. Only when she reached it did she mutter in a hoarse croak, "Stop fucking arguing. Won't help the shits fucking swim.", before she disappeared into the bathroom, shutting and latching the door behind herself.

In her absence, there was bloated stillness, as if none of them dared to move.

Ellis gazed at the bathroom door, and concern cut through the fog in his head, his priorities re-asserting themselves. He needed to keep the team stable, like Coach used to do, or they'd all lose it. He wanted to chase after her and ensure she was okay, but he had no idea what to say, and certainly had no idea what she'd want to hear.

'Ryan'? buzzed in his head, feeling at the unfamiliar name and its implications. However, his brain only half-heartedly picked at the realization before he rejected it, determined not to lose himself in the thought. It was neither his business, nor his biggest concern.

His attention shifted, gazing first at Lena, who'd fallen to a slump, clenching fists against her eyes until it must've hurt. Her shoulders trembled, and only trembled harder when he moved to carefully approach her.
He was fully aware of Chris' and Ro's eyes on his back as he stepped next to the biker, placing a hand on her elbow gently, and he felt a quiet relief when she did not surge away. She didn't lean into him, either, but he'd take the compromise.

"Let's just... get the floor tidied up, okay?" He tried for a soft tone, though it was hard to manage with his hoarse voice. He tried, too, to say the next part with clarity: he was trying to give her some space, not chase her away. "You can go straighten up the back room in case... she wants some decent privacy or somethin'? Instead'uh hidin' in the bathroom?"

Lena's head twitched in a nod, and she said nothing. He could see enough of her face to know she was barely holding back tears, and when she pushed to cross the room, she did so in a rush. She made no effort to make eye contact with any of them.

The back room door clicked shut behind her, and suddenly they were alone. Neither Rochelle nor Christophe moved, at first, both of them still held close together. She'd faltered to an exhaustion, and regret sat muted in her frown, eyes low-lidded.

Only eventually did she mumble, "... I'm sorry."

Ellis closed his eyes, for just a beat, gathering something like strength. He exhaled, and turned on his heel, grabbing for the mop again.

It was the only thing he could control.
Chapter 296

The shop didn't take too long to clean, although that was mostly due to the fact there was only so clean they could get it. They focused on a central area, pushing everything to the walls, including the shattered glass and strewn knick-knacks that had taken up most of the floorspace.

It had remained quiet through the process. Exhaustion had kicked in more than anything else, and with both sisters locked away, there seemed little point in any discussion. They didn't have much to say that hadn't already been said.

Rochelle had already said more than she should have.

Working in close concert with Chris, she couldn't help but keep an eye on Ellis. He seemed to relish the chance to focus single-mindedly on the task at hand, but he visibly lost steam. By the time they'd gotten the floor cleared, he'd fallen to shivering, giving into the cold trying to soak into him.

It was when his teeth started chattering that Christophe suddenly broke off to approach him. He spared a look toward her as he did as if seeking approval, and she gave a faint, affirming nod.

His spine straightened, coaxed on.

"Desnúdate. ¡Vamos!" he ordered, firmly, and Ellis didn't need a translation to understand when Chris' hand gripped on his denim sleeve and pulled. When the mechanic blanched, reflexively, the Spaniard shot him an unimpressed look. "You have seen me - now, viceversa. ¡Desnúdate!"

Rochelle kept her feet moving, pacing the center of the room, trying to get the light to glint off shards of glass they'd missed - but her attention mostly drifted to the two men. The windows and their boarded-up state, nailed into the wall and trapping squares of tarplike plastic in place, limited the light.

The ex-Angel had been mostly quiet, and this felt like the loudest he'd spoken, the most aware his gaze had been on his surroundings. It comforted her a little, and it clearly caught Ellis off-guard.

We need to, if he's gonna bottle this up.

Only hesitantly did the Georgian begin to obey, slowly stripping just his jacket off. It was difficult to peel it away from his arms, and as he was forced to drag it over his scraped wrists and palms, his eyes watered gently. He glanced down at them, and Rochelle caught a glimpse; they were still raw and bleeding, though it was hard to discern when they were damp all over.

Shit. We both need bandages, and Rhee, too. crossed her mind, eyes darting to the backpack she'd placed on the podium that held the shop's register. Not enough for any of us, probably.

Ellis twisted his mouth in a frown, perhaps doing a similar calculation, but he didn't vocalize it. Instead, he grunted out, "Chris, whut're -"

With a sigh, the foreigner stepped to the side, gesturing to the slim rack of T-shirts that they'd pushed against the wall. It was standalone, made of thin aluminum poles, the shirts hung with fragile plastic hangers. "Can... dry the clothes, ¿sí? And wear these?"

That made Rochelle halt, blinking at the gaudy shirts from where she stood. The thought had never occurred to her, but it made sense. Staying in their drenched clothes was uncomfortable at best and dangerous at worst - both for their health and their morale. She wasn't sure which was more in peril.

"Yeah. Good idea. We'll catch a cold like this." she murmured. "Go on, Ellis."

The brunette seemed only vaguely convinced, but a shiver betrayed him, and he grimaced down at his clothes. "...Okay." He shrugged out of his jacket entirely, and Chris took it from him, loosely folding it and draping it over his shoulder. He stood there as Ellis moved to pull his undershirt up and off his frame, too.

Ellis shifted to undo his jeans and start shoving them down his legs. He had to shuck his boots to do so, stepping carefully away from where the worst of the glass had been. He must've been satisfied with the dryness of his socks, because he did not remove them, replacing his boots the moment he'd shed his jeans. The Georgian's very situational bashfulness would've amused her, on a better day.

Rochelle exhaled weakly, turning away from them before he'd re-dressed in one of the T-shirts. She stepped over to the side of the room where she'd set Maggie's carrier down, dropping to a crouch until she could peer into the canvas bag.

Part of her wished they'd never picked up the cat. Part of her felt comforted by the little leftover piece of Nick's softer side, still with them.

"Hey." she murmured, finding two glints of light turned and focused at her. Her voice was raw, sorrowful. "Can't leave you in here, huh? Not fair to any of us, and definitely not when we can't feed you. Granola's not gonna cut it." She didn't miss the way Ellis hesitated, stiffening, and she glanced toward him - but the Georgian didn't speak. They all knew it was true.

Rochelle looked back down to the carrier, softening her voice further. "Nick let you out. I know he's... not here anymore, but... we're going to find him. Him and Coach." She didn't know where the urge came from, not to say the words, and certainly not to say them to a cat who could not understand her. She spoke as if to a child, but she also spoke to herself; maybe she just wanted to hear somebody say the words.

"So, Maggie, it'd mean a lot if you came back. We're going to look for them, okay?"

She didn't want to cry. She didn't intend it, or foresee it, but as suddenly as she'd said the words, the tears started again. They began as a blur, just a visual distortion as they accrued against her eyelashes - but she forced the rest out. "So if you go running off, and you're gone when he gets back, Nick's gonna... be really sad."

She also didn't expect Ellis to turn.

He frowned, softly, his eyes low under the curls of brown hair plastered to his forehead where he'd shucked his cap in order to get the T-shirt on over his head. Its bright red fabric and neon-glazed orange text, sloppily announcing 'Tybee's For Me!' only partially distracted her eye.

He chewed his lip, just softly, before he murmured, "So you - don't think they're gone?"

His composure scared her. He was a strong person, but he should have been crying. He should have been a mess, like he'd been in those instants after it happened. She didn't know what to think when he wasn't.

It made her feel weak, when her jaw trembled and her voice cracked softly. "I... don't know. But - like Chris said. I'm not... We're going to look for them, until we know. For sure." There, she dropped her gaze, struggling to keep her shoulders steady. "We didn't come this far to just... lose them, without fighting."

She wasn't sure she believed it.

Ellis didn't respond. He just gazed at her, teeth still working on his lips, and she shifted into more of a squat, letting her attention land firmly on his face. Why couldn't she read him? When had he ever been hard to read?

Christophe's relative numbness was no surprise to her; his capacity for conflict had been whittled down to a fragile, burnt-out wick, and he'd been through more trauma and loss than most people experienced in a lifetime. It was natural that his coping mechanism would be to distance himself from it all.

With Ellis, in that moment, it felt like pushing against some unyielding force. He was as stubborn in this as he was in most things, it seemed.

So, she continued: "I'm sorry. I shouldn't have said those things, not to Lena. Not... at all." she whispered. "I didn't... I shouldn't be picking fights, and... I shouldn't be throwing around the 'd' word."

He nodded, reaching up to scratch his fingertips against his hair, soaked even where his cap had covered it. His shoulders slumped slightly, and he winced one eye shut, but it still seemed distant, not quite sincere. "It's okay." he mumbled, reaching out to take his clothes from Chris' arms. "Just don't want us fightin'."

The Spaniard waved him off with a strangled gesture of his shoulder, turning away to start loosely draping them over the shirt rack. The aluminum creaked warily under the weight of the wet clothes and denim, but it held. "Vamos, vamos." he muttered.

Ellis frowned at him, as if subtly perturbed, but let him work. In nothing but the T-shirt and boxers that only peeked out from under it on every other step, he turned and walked toward Rochelle.

"Do you really blame her?" he asked, and Rochelle startled slightly, her head hunching forward with a flash of strained regret. She did not inherently wish the argument hadn't happened, but she certainly wished it had been more private. Before she could respond, he continued.

"Did you mean it all, 'bout her playin' us, or... was it just.... hollerin'?"

She found a scab on the side of her arm when she rubbed it, and caught a nail against the edge, reflexively prying it away. It didn't hurt - at least, no more than her entire body did already, her elbows still raw and bleeding.

I blame all of us. I blame her, I blame you, and I blame Nick. But I blame myself the most.

"... Not in the way I said it." she hedged.

His lips twitched downward, but he didn't press. Instead, he stepped forward, dropping to a crouch next to the carrier. His left hand flicked out, grabbing the zipper on the front flap of it. "We'll let her out when it ain't rainin' so hard. Ain't far tuh go in here." he ghosted, eyes focused squarely on the floor.

Maybe it was procrastination; putting off the painful task of watching the cat disappear out the door, leaving just an empty carrier behind, to match the space where Coach and Nick were not. Maybe they'd wait to let her go, and maybe they'd never do it.
Maybe they'd find their lost teammates, and maybe they wouldn't - or maybe they'd find something they didn't want. Maybe if they never made a choice, they could dodge reality. Maybe time would freeze there, events locked in place, forever only just unfolding. Schrödinger's paradise.

Rochelle reached out, setting a hand on his.

Ellis didn't look at her.

"Okay." she whispered, even though she wanted to say so much more. You can't bottle it up. You can't just act like you're fine. It's going to come out at some point, and the longer you wait, the worse it'll get. The worse it'll hurt. I'm here for you.

Instead, she watched as he opened the zipper, and they both leaned away as the flap fell open.

For a moment, nothing happened, and it seemed Maggie might refuse to move. Tenderly, slowly, her face poked through the opening of the carrier, twisted harshly to rivet her gaze on them, her eyes tracking every minute shift of their bodies.

Rochelle expected her to bolt. Instead, after a momentary pause, her whiskers perilously stretched forward as she huffed in air through an open mouth, Maggie slunk forward. Her belly almost touched the ground as she crept out of the carrier.

It was slow, cautious, and it felt like the closest she'd ever been to the cat without Nick there to buffer. Even with him present, it had been touch-and-go.

For an instant, she assumed the change in behaviour meant the cat was injured. The thought struck her with such terror that, on reflex, she leaned in to glance over her bedraggled limbs and mussed fur, seeking signs of an injury.

That made her bolt.

The black-and-orange cat disappeared in a flash, under the cabinet that they'd blockaded the door with, not even a hiss to announce her retreat, just the scrabble of claws on wood.

Frowning slightly, Rochelle's head tilted. She thought of Nick convincing Maggie to eat from her hand, and past the twist of pain, she couldn't help but wonder if they had made some progress. It was wishful thinking, she was sure.

"Poor girl." she mumbled, sighing, turning her gaze toward Ellis. He was looking after the cat, staring at the space under the cabinet, and the pinch to his brows was frustrated. It was subtle, but on his typically bright features, the emotion put the storm overhead to shame.

Rochelle meant to prompt him, but he spoke before she could.

"Why is it he won't open up t'un someone who can actually talk back?" he muttered, and it was more bitter than hurt, more angry than anything else. "Why's it feel like she'd know more than me, iffin she could understand English?"

That pulled at her gut sharply, like she'd swallowed a hunk of lead. Her lips pursed, head tilting, her hand tightening on his. Encouraging anger didn't feel right, but she didn't know how else to handle him.

"I think it's the part where people hear what he's saying that scares him." she ghosted, and saw the dull tension it sparked in Ellis' face. "You did your best, baby. You really did. You always did."
He grunted, just once, and lowered his chin. His tone was dark, and just the faintest bit spiteful. "Didn't help none. I should'uh been the one tuh jump, at least, instead'uv Coach. I can swim better, 'n'... it's my mess."

Rochelle gazed at him, and in that moment, she missed Coach terribly. He'd have advice, in that frank and simple way he always did. He'd rumble out a few words and Ellis would laugh, and smile, and then maybe shatter.

Shattering would have been preferable.

"It's all of our mess," she whispered, a sincere guilt pulling at her mouth. "I wish I'd... been a little softer to him. And I wish I'd kept less from Coach, trusted him more. I thought he'd just... confuse things, but sometimes I think that if we'd all been on the same page weeks ago, maybe... things could've been... better. I took both of them for granted."

Ellis crouched there, expression difficult to discern, but it shifted enough that a pinched tremble broke through. He stuffed a wrist against his nose, breathing in sharply, then letting it out in a puff.

"I wish I'd gotten that fuckin' whirlbyrd tuh land." he stated, and his tone was weaker than before, softer, despite the harshness surrounding the swear. "And I wish I could remember the last damn thing I said tuh Coach."

He stood, then, abruptly, rubbing his palm against his face. "You should get changed, girl." he mumbled, and as quickly as his defenses had lowered, they'd risen back up.

_God. He's acting like Nick._

"I'm gonna go check on Rhee, make sure she's okay."

That made Rochelle perk up, and a worried grimace twisted at her features before she could stop it. He didn't see it, fortunately, but Chris did. The Spaniard went from clumsily trying to work his way out of his soaked polo to shrugging it back into place, grabbing a shirt off the rack and pushing into a quick-hopped stride.

He moved and talked with a familiar cadence, the one that lilts on at such a pace that there was little time to argue. "I will go, tío. She and I are... swell together, ¿sí? You sit."

Rochelle tried to pass him a grateful look as he walked by, winded, and he tipped his head faintly. Neither she nor Ellis were equipped to offer comfort - Rhiannon clearly felt conflicted over their plan to leave with Nick, and if she blamed her sister, she no doubt blamed herself. That made both of them difficult to talk to, she imagined.

Christophe was not truly neutral, but he came off closer to it.

At least she was fairly certain she could get him to open up, later, when things were quiet and they could talk. Ellis felt like an equation she'd yet to solve, and she had very few resources to draw from, emotional or otherwise.

Chris walked hurriedly up toward the bathroom door and Ellis stood there, unmoving, before relocating to one of the boarded-up windows to find a place he could peek through. Watching them both, Rochelle didn't have a lot of optimism on her chances.

_Chris has lost too many people, and I don't think Ellis has ever lost anyone like this. And neither of them are dealing._
Shit.
Chapter 297

Christophe was not nervous, precisely, when he knocked on the bathroom door. He did not have space for nerves, it felt like, despite the fact that his body moved with all the grace of an empty cardboard box.

He couldn't find grief. It sat beyond him, a concept he could only peer at through thick glass, fogged up with his breath and smeared at his touch. He'd cried, but they'd fallen with all the weight of the rain still collecting on his skin in trickles and droplets. They'd felt like a simple, reflexive mirroring of the emotions around him.

They were dead. He knew that with certainty. They were dead, like Sean and Jerry and Brenda and Brock and, no doubt, all the others. His family in Spain was dead. Everyone's families likely were, and they were likely to follow.

It was a simple enough proposition: he'd live, until he didn't.

They'd all live, until they didn't.

Every moment he spent alive was borrowed - no, stolen from the lip of a pill bottle or the muzzle of a gun. He'd survived by happenstance and luck, and the kindness of his new team... a team now two members short.

Control had never been within his grasp. He'd been a victim to the current of events since the very beginning of the apocalypse, carried on by the will and whim of those stronger than him. His success, his value, was measured most by the willingness of others to keep him around. It was a lesson he'd learned early, and maybe even a lesson he'd learned long before the end of the world.

He loved them. He loved Coach, and he loved Nick, and he'd have given his life if it had meant they would endure. His life, for theirs? For Rochelle and Ellis to keep their loved ones for a little while longer? It was not a question. He wouldn't have thought twice.

But they were gone. And even had he been willing to acknowledge the agony brewing in the base of his skull, there was no room for it, and no room for his emotions added atop the others'. If there was any use for him now, it was not as another lit fuse.

It was easier than it should have been to bury it down deep. He felt at home in the grief - not comfort, but familiarity, just like the pain of his stump had become familiar. Well-practiced, he took the awful cold crawling up his spine and wrapped it around himself like a shield, used it like motivation. Rejecting the urge to feel anything made it easier to focus.

He put a placid look on his face as a thump announced Rhiannon's body leaning into the door from the other side. She did not unlatch it, and her voice came dully through the wood.

She sounded exhausted.

"Sorry, only fags and fuckups allowed in here."

Christophe cocked his head, and he did not quite stifle his laugh. Humour came easier to him than anything else; it was, consistently, the only comfort he could offer. He lowered his voice to hum, "I am one of these things, tía, at least."

A snort answered him from the other side. There was silence for a moment, and he thought he'd made no ground. After a moment, however, the latch did suddenly click, the door swinging open just enough to permit him entry. Rhiannon was not in sight, as if she stood behind it.

He couldn't help a wry glance over his shoulder to Rochelle, who was trying and failing not to blatantly watch him, and offered a small smile back to her. She returned it, but in a fractional way. He forced out a sigh as he stepped into the bathroom, immediately aware of the fact that it would be nearly pitch black with the door shut.

Then the door shut.

Darkness had become a strange and upsetting territory for him. In the dark, that neural pressure that pulsed on and off down the length of his missing arm became terribly, awfully believable. He could not glance down to verify that it was absent, and could not detect the difference between the pain of his phantom limb and the near-chronic pain of his stumped shoulder.

It made him anxious, and that made him talkative.

"Chica, you are okay? It is not like you, to run away. A ciencia cierta, is not like you to punch your hermana." He gestured, reflexively, despite its ineffectiveness, and he tried to soften his tone into sympathy. "I have never seen you like this before."

Rhiannon's voice, disembodied in the dark until she moved a step to the side and her outline became a little easier to discern, barked out a small laugh. It was injured and petty and struck a sadness through him. "Yeah, and you didn't know I was a dude, before, so ain't today a day for fuckin' surprises?"

His lips twisted, slumping his shoulders, unsure how to react to that. He didn't piece together more than a mumbled, "Pero - you are not -” before she was talking over him.

"I don't usually punch her in the mug, that's for fuckin' sure. Bet she's fucking pissed." He was sure her voice faltered with a strained insecurity, there. "Bet the whole club's mad at me. Or at least gawking. Y'know, usually ran out of bathrooms when people found out I was trans, not into them."

She rattled off the words with an anxiety not unlike his own, and, perhaps, a fear of letting him speak lest she not like what he said. She charged on with brute force, unrelenting, and even her momentary silence was broken by the sharp strike of her heel on the tile floor.

"Fuck. Such a fucking hypocrite."

It wasn't a surprise to learn she was hiding in the bathroom out of discomfort and not anger. She was more delicate than she portrayed herself to be, though he was not so simple-minded as to equate delicacy with weakness. He, himself, was delicate.

Nick had been delicate.

Rhiannon was certainly delicate - but so was glass, and its delicacy only furthered the damage it was capable of when it shattered. They were all glass, now, and their breakage had casualties. If they weren't careful, their team would end up no better than the floor they'd only barely gotten cleared.

"Is Lee pissed?" she spat, suddenly, and Chris could not waffle in silence any further.

"She... is hiding, too, but I no think so." he tried, softly, unsure if the words had any effect without being able to see her expression. It was harder than ever to communicate without any facial expressions or physical cues to guide him. He could follow most of what she said, except for the odd word that threw him. "Em... why would they be angry? You did not do anything."

The scoff that left the biker was quiet, and her footsteps suddenly moved away, scuffing as she carefully felt her way to the wall. The scraping and rustling that followed turned out to be her sitting on the floor, as when she spoke, it came from much lower than before.

"Usually a mixed bag when people find out you've been lying to them." she muttered, and that time, the insecurity was nowhere near subtle. He frowned, tilting his head as he did his best to keep up when she spoke faster. "She's never done that before. Messed up a few times, y'know, fuckin' habit - but it was never in front of anyone. I mean, it took me a while to get used to the new name, but it's been... years. You almost forget, until you don't."

He'd lost track in the middle, and focused mostly on the pieces he'd understood.

A frown touched his lips, and he shifted to lower into a crouch. There was a moment in the middle of the gesture where his balance was weakest, and he wished he could splay his arms to steady himself. Instead, he planted his palm on the ground as he tipped too much to the left and went down clumsily. He recovered with a grunt, and then sighed.

"Chica, you know, en España - it is..." He flapped his hand, promptly frustrated with the knowledge she couldn't see him. "Em, simpler, ¿si? Puedes follarte a quien quieras, besar a quien quieras... you be who you are, be with who you want. Some people are not so nice, but... you know, people are people. I think it was... a few years behind, you know? They changed the law so you can change the gender on the - ah - your documents."

The smallest smile touched his face, genuine, as he nodded his chin up. In the dark, he let his eyes close, thinking for just a moment on that far-away and oft off-limits subject: life before. "My compañero de clase, back home, he was a chica, you know? Now he is more guapo than me, ¿si? He -"

Rhiannon suddenly grunted, interrupting him. She sounded agitated, though he didn't sense that it was truly directed at him. "Look, stumpy, I get it: you're trying to be nice. But if you're just in here to fluff me with some fuckin' go-get-'im bullshit, let me stop you right now. I don't need a pep-talk. I just need to..."

The blonde stopped, and he didn't know why until she spoke again, and it was muffled slightly as if she'd buried her face into her hands. Her jaw was clearly gritted against emotion, the gesture making her voice thick.

"I need to know if I lost more than two fuckin' friends today."

Christophe couldn't help it. He approached immediately, scooching forward in an awkward crawl on his knees and his hand. He might've nudged right into her if he'd paid less attention, pushing forward until he could just feel the buzz of her closeness as his knees brushed against the toes of her boots.

He grimaced, winced, and regretted for a moment jumping so quickly to take over from Ellis. His inability to put his thoughts into words with confidence was frustrating enough when the stakes were not quite so high.

"You think they'd...?" he muttered, uncertainly. "You cannot think Ellis and Ro' are this way. Ellis is -"

"You think any of that shit matters?" she returned, immediately, harshly. He could hear tears threatening at the edges of her voice. "You think being part of some fuckin' spectrum makes a difference with this shit? It changes things. It makes my fucking skin crawl, y'know? I don't want anyone fucking knowing my shit, when it isn't their fucking business. I -"

She hesitated, breaking off, a shiver to her voice that she tried to contain. Her sharp exhale was frustrated, then, agitation leaking into the rest of her utterance. "Whatever. It's fucking stupid. And I'm a stupid cunt-ass bitch for being upset about it. Pity-party for fucking me, huh?Fuck Coach. Fuck Nick. Let's all feel bad for fucking me."

Chris reached out, finding her leg with his hand. It landed on her shin, as if she was sitting with her knees close to her chest, so he merely kept it there rather than attempt to move it upwards. His fingertips tightened, squeezing, relieved when she didn't shift away.

"It is okay, to be scared, and angry. You know? But... tía, we have just each other now." he whispered, softly, his voice more fragile than he wanted it to be. He did not want it to be true, but truth would not bend to his preferences. "I do not know what they would say, but... they want you to be okay. I do not think it... makes it different, now."

There was silence for a moment, and he didn't know what to do inside of it. He felt ill-equipped and ill-fit for the job, and he did not know if he had helped, or only made it worse. It was a familiar feeling, of late. The burgeoning tension he felt at the thought rippled across his skin like a harsh breeze that rose up gooseflesh, making him stiffen up, unsure of the efficacy of his words.

He should have stayed quiet, but he couldn't. He mumbled, "I am always your friend, ¿sí?"

When she shifted her weight, her shin pressed harder into the palm of his hand. He didn't know if it was intentional, but he very deliberately left his hand where it was. She didn't respond to his question, but the gesture seemed answer enough.

A sigh left her, along with an inhale through her nose that sounded wet. "I miss them already." croaked out of her, voice strained and trembling just faintly. His eyes had adjusted enough to the darkness to see her outline, but little more. "Coach was... nice, y'know? And I was gonna tell Nick, myself, when... shit calmed down. Thought it'd make him loosen up if he thought... he wasn't the only shitfuck faggot with issues."

She hummed, for just a moment, before suddenly falling silent for a few moments. He could hear her head thump dully down against her knees, a sigh leaving her in just a wheeze of an exhale.

Slowly, she mumbled, "My fucking shoulders hurt so bad."

Christophe cocked his head forward, reflexively looking toward the silhouette of her shoulders in the dark. Her injuries had almost slipped his mind, and being reminded of them solidified his resolve. If Coach was not present to tend to the team, then he would try and step in, try and fill his shoes - even partially.

At least I still have two legs.

It was enough to make him want to laugh, right before a tug of emotion stabbed sharp between his ribs. He inhaled, and tried to exhale smoothly. If he'd learned anything, it was that when the apocalypse decided to take, there was no arguing it down. There was no negotiation. There was, most often, simply nothing to be done but to continue on. Wasn't that more comforting than the alternative? Didn't it feel, somehow, like a form of control?

He lowered his voice as he murmured to her, softening it to something soothing. "We go. I look at your back, y... make sure you are good." He did his best to let a smile leak into his tone, brightening it. "You see that they are not mad, that we are all still friends. I go with you and it is okay. ¿Vale?"

Her body jolted faintly with a snort, suddenly shifting her knee in a mock-kick to shake him off. It was gentle, but firm. "I don't need babysat. I'll put on my fucking big boy-girl pants and go out. I just don't want... I just..." Rhiannon's voice faltered, there, and he waited as patiently as he could.

It took her a few moments before she started to softly stand. He pushed himself back to get out of her way, listening to the scuffling as her palms braced against the wall to keep herself steady as she rose. He could tell she was trembling by the stutter of her breath and the quick chatter of her teeth.

"I just want things to go back to fucking normal." she whispered, and then released a raspy little laugh, punctuated by a sharp sigh. It hitched like the beginnings of a faint sob, though just one, bubbled up from under her self-control. "Dunno when you cocksuckers became my new normal."

Chris' mouth tried to twitch upward, but he couldn't quite manage it, watching the flicker of her silhouette in the dark as she moved towards the door, sliding her hand against the wall to guide herself to it. He followed, keeping close.

_No sé, tampoco._
The lack of something to keep busy with let Ellis come dangerously close to thinking. He'd managed, so far, to avoid the thoughts trying to crowd in. With nothing to put between him and them, however, they resurged.

He stared out into the rain through a slit in the boarded and tarped window he was leaned into, and all he could do was replay those last few seconds in his mind's eye: Nick, dragged out of sight. Coach, tipping over the edge, gone in an instant. It looped, endless, until he dug his nails into his palms and shut his eyes and gritted his teeth.

You didn't even try.

He saw it, clear as day, in the fabricated version of it that played out in his head. Nick barely resisted. He barely even struggled in the moments before it was over.

You let it take you. How fuckin' could you? How could you? All we done, all we been through, 'n'you just let it pull you in like you don't matter? Like we'd just leave you? Like I wasn't gonna care?

It hurt, most of all, because it felt like his fault. The last things they'd said to each other had been part of a fight.

How'd I never convince you I cared? Whut'd I do tuh make you think we'd just... keep goin'? How could you think I'd just be able to keep goin'?

A cruel part of his mind, the part that couldn't let go of those images even as they crushed the air out of him, surfaced the thought of how long they'd have lasted. Would the impact with the water's surface have knocked them unconscious?

You hit water like that, s'like hittin' concrete. But maybe, it bein' all blown up by the storm, maybe... But even if that carried any validity, the waters had been a mess of debris from the road, and the vehicles tossed down into it. Not to mention the fact Nick could not swim, and Coach could not carry them both, not with his knee out.

Maybe they...

But he came up blank, and the void in place of any believable circumstance where they had survived terrified him. He choked rather than breathe, and it was such a visceral and pinprick terror that he couldn't even summon tears.

He'd just fail to breathe until he suffocated, perhaps.

The only thing that he could grab onto, the only feeling that gave him any leverage against hopeless and empty grief, was anger.

Fuck you. Just... fuck you.

But he was not thinking of Nick or Coach when the words formed.

I fuckin' asked you, fer one thing. Didn't never ask you fer nothin', not fer me. I ain't never once in muh life asked you fer nothin' fer me. I just asked you tuh keep 'em safe. Keep both muh families safe. But you can't do nothin', can you? You let all this happen, fer whut? I try so hard not tuh - I
'I ain't never thought you was all-powerful, or nothin', 'cause bad shit happens all the time'n'I didn't think you was... behind it or nothin', but...

His hands were shaking.

_You ain't shit, are yuh? You can't do nothin'. Or I'm just nothin' to you, 'n'verjust whut's it matter, then? Whut's it matter if you'd just let Coach die, when he ain't done nothin' but show the best'uv you? Whut's it matter if you'd just... take Nick from me, like this, 'n'

Suddenly his palms were pressed into his face, his upper body collapsing in some gentle falter, like his spine had rotted out then and there.

He'd missed his mother, and he'd missed Keith. He'd wished they were there, and wished that he could have heard their voices, beyond the fleeting dreams he had and shortly forgot. He'd never truly worried for them, because it was as apparent to him that they were alive, as it was that he was.

He didn't worry, then, and he didn't wonder. Those two emotions carried with them uncertainty, and in their own way, some kind of optimism. Wondering involved multiple outcomes - the chance for something better than nothing.

In that moment, for the first time, he did not even have the hope required to wonder. They may as well have all been dead, because without their presence, without the ability to reach out and touch and hold them... what did it matter?

_Fuck you._

Rochelle had been watching him like a hawk and noticed his sudden shift, and he heard her start to stand. The sound surged frustration in him, shoving himself onto his heels, trying to collect his composure before she tried to talk to him. He gritted his teeth, and swung himself around, and he didn't know what showed on his face.

He just knew she stopped, and her eyes widened slightly, and she looked daunted. She'd changed into a T-shirt, but her soggy sweats were still on, and she grabbed at them nervously.

Did he look angry?

Did he project his despair?

The bathroom door opened and both of them snapped their heads to the side to look. Rhiannon came first, followed shortly behind by Christophe. They were both still in their wet clothes, though they'd settled into a simple dampness rather than the active dripping of collected water.

Ellis gripped onto concern like a life-line. Worry was a safe harbour compared to what awaited him in the outer fringes of his thoughts. He could escape it. He _would_ escape it.

He started forward, and Rhiannon grimaced in his direction as if to discourage him from saying anything, or maybe approaching at all. He obeyed in a half-measure, only crossing a few steps closer to her before he stopped.

She muttered, "You look like a fucking dumbass."

He choked out a sound that might've passed for a laugh, on reflex, more a simple social transaction than any genuine response. He pushed his hands against his stomach, flattening the cheap T-shirt against his belly. "I'm dry, at least." he responded, trying to return her caustic humour.
The way she smiled just a little, just a flicker, said she appreciated the effort. Then it disappeared, and she turned her gaze sharply downward. Her mouth twisted, and she lifted a hand to pat weakly at the front of her left shoulder.

"Can you... help?" she muttered, her voice cracking gently in the middle. "I think my back's fucked."

Her disinclination to discuss the argument was not surprising, and Ellis wasn't about to press the issue. He caught a glance from Chris, and the Spaniard gave him a soft smile, encouraging. It communicated some faint confidence as if he'd had some success in talking with her.

Both Ellis and Rochelle approached, her footsteps slowing to fall in step behind the Georgian. Rather than face them, Rhiannon turned away, reaching up tenderly to grip her jacket and start to carefully peel it off. "I... don't know what we have..."

It wasn't the first view Ellis had gotten of her injury, but it was the best.

The acid had settled in a splatter across her shoulderblades, and the worst of the damage was near the back of her neck. Splotches of pink and red flesh, irritated, sat in stark contrast to the skin around them - the soft ridges surrounding them, about a fingernail's depth of skin, revealed how the acid had stripped away a layer of dermis. The skin itself was roughened, yellowed slightly, and bubbled here and there like pus sat just under the surface.

Blood had smeared between her skin and her jacket, staining down her back and turning her white cami off-pink. It seemed to have mostly stopped, but there were a few places where it had eaten deeper, where gauzy pink sat exposed, glistening in the low light and weeping blood.

The sight made him hiss out a sympathetic noise, and he was startled when her arm swung out and struck against his arm blindly.

"Don't fucking make that noise, shitbag." she growled out, fear staining the edge of her voice. "Y'know how much fucking confidence that does not in-fuckin'-still in me?"

He grimaced at her, reaching up to gently push her hair off the back of her neck with the pad of his thumb, clearing his view. "Sorry." She shivered at the touch, and he didn't know if it was pain or cold. "It's... not so bad. I -"

Déjà-vú seemed very near to agony, as the memory of tending to Nick's Spitter-burnt leg surged up, the so-similar exchange of words, maybe more or less similar in his fragile recollection. It took effort to push through without faltering more than he already had.

Rochelle was watching him, still, and he wished she'd stop.

"I think we still got some anti-biotics, at least. Can get the worst spots'n'... try'n'... find more stuff... when the storm clears." His words accumulated together to form the bones of a plan for the remainder of the day, as if their next actions were not defined solely by a desperate attempt to find the rest of their team. His next inhale hurt, but he forced it. "Ro', go -"

But she was already moving toward the backpack, speaking over her shoulder. "We can't bandage it, that's for sure. We should try and keep it clean. I know it's wet, but you might be better off staying in that top, since it's got a low back."

Rhiannon puffed out a sigh, her brows knotting together gently. Her pain came through clearer, now, as her composure whittled thinner and thinner. She feigned disappointment, rasping out, "Oh, no. I was so desperate to Donald Duck it with Ellis."
The slightest smile twitched onto Ellis' mouth at that, and it was almost sincere. He settled a hand against her elbow, tightening his fingers into a squeeze. It was an attempt at a comforting gesture, an affectionate one, but she seemed to stiffen at his touch.

She glanced at him, sidelong, and there was a hesitance in her eyes. He intended on changing the subject or forcing out a joke, but suddenly, anger flared in her eyes and she nudged her chin up.

"Can we get the awkward bullshit out of the way?" she hissed out. "I know you fuckers love dancing around shit for days, but can we just rip the fucking Brazilian wax off my asshole and move on? There's enough shit going on without you looking at me like that."

Ellis' eyes widened, taking a half-step back, retracting his hand as if the touch had caused her outburst. He frowned, despite himself, gaze still on hers. "I didn't -"

"Here, I'll take the easy ones off the list." she snapped out, and energy built up in her frame until she shivered. Chris reached out to touch her arm, but she whipped herself into a twist to dodge it before it could land. "Yes, no, no, and only if you plan on fucking me. I miss any?"

Rochelle had stopped partway into unzipping their backpack, head turned to watch them, concern rising in her expression. "Hey, whoa, slow down, string-bean." She stood, both her hands lifting, fingers splayed. "Nobody cares, Rhee."

The blonde's anger flared up, a reflexive reaction, but Rochelle was quick to continue before she could interject.

"I don't mean that like - 'we have bigger issues', or 'let's just not talk about it', I mean... we don't care." She turned away, slowly, crouching back down to dig into the backpack, quickly finding the sorted medical supplies Coach had put together.

She gazed at the antibiotic tube she'd fished out, hand shaking just a little - and then she stood. "I don't care, and I know Chris and Ellis don't. You're the same person to me as you were half an hour ago. And I happen to like her - she's as good as family. And with the rest of my family..." There was a pause, a falter, before she continued. "In... danger right now, I don't want to fight."

Ellis watched her, a somber frown lingering on his lips. Her presence was a relief, there, as he felt slightly out of his depth when it came to this. Some guilt crept in on the heels of that relief, because he'd been acrid and avoidant to her, and he knew it.

"She's just tryin' tuh take care'uh us. Problem is, I'm just tryin' tuh keep muh shit tuhgether, 'n'she just wants me tuh lose it."

Rhiannon's posture softened, just a little, weakened. She looked first at Rochelle, and then to Ellis, and he tried for a reassuring smile. She stared too long at it, gauging, but perhaps she knew its instability was not directed at her. She seemed to accept it, either way.

Her gaze lowered to the ground, and she sighed. All her anger petered out and left just a tired sort of upset in its place. She mumbled, "You think Coach will?"

A sad snort made Rochelle's shoulders twitch, and she approached, waving both Ellis and Chris to take a step back. "Go ahead and change, Chris. You're shivering." They obeyed, the Spaniard quietly retreating to change out of his polo and into a dry shirt, and Rochelle halted just behind the biker.

She carefully started to squeeze out a dollop of antibiotic gel onto her thumb, gaze critical on the back of Rhiannon's head before she refocused on her wound. As she leaned in, looking for the deepest places to start tending to, her voice lowered. "He likes you, too, Rhee. You know that. What's it matter to him, anyway?"

She didn't miss the flinch that touched Rhiannon's features, but it was easy enough to explain it away, as her thumb grazed against a stretch of raw skin. She carefully spread the gel, working in that all-too-familiar way, as quick but as careful as she could. The sight of raw muscle fibre peeking through the deeper burns did not faze her like it once might have.

Rhiannon's voice carried a pained edge when she hissed back, "Guess we're just pretending they're okay, now?"

Rather than respond, Rochelle collected another moderately-sized strip of gel on her thumb and took a step to the side, adjusting her angle to get a better view of one of the deeper, slightly oval-shaped patches of burnt skin. "I think you'll live. But take it easy, okay? Maybe you should just lay down for now."

The blonde grunted - and if they hadn't been facing backwards, they might've missed the back-room door opening across the mostly-tidied storeroom. Both of them froze on instinct, tension built as Lena opened the door and stepped into the threshold.

Strange, how they'd been in such a similar position just hours before.

But things were so different, now.

Lena hesitated in the doorway, chin low. She stood in a red hoodie that almost matched Ellis', except there was no text emblazoned on the front, just the vinyl imprint of a set of waves crashing onto a shore. Her pants were gone, too, replaced by loose shorts that seemed a few sizes too big judging by the way she'd pulled the gym-short strings tight around her hips.

She must've found more clothing in the boxes in the back - but not shoes, as her feet were still shod in sneakers, squelching with every step.

The silence between that moment and the one where she moved felt excruciatingly long. Then the brunette advanced, crossing the short distance between her and the other two women. Rhiannon shifted, backing up out of the way, as if recognizing the fact that her sister's eyes were firmly locked on Rochelle.

For an instant, the producer thought she might be in some danger - a reflexive reaction of her hair-trigger sympathetic nervous system, more than a true belief that Lena had any ill intent - and it took effort to keep herself from flinching when the older sister was suddenly in front of her.

Lena held out her hand, palm down, clutching something in the loose cage of her fingers.

When Rochelle tentatively hovered her left hand underneath it, thumb still glistening with antibiotic gel, she found a pair of keys dropped abruptly in her palm. It only took her a moment to recognize them as the boat keys.

She didn't get the chance to do more than widen her eyes before Lena spoke, quietly.

"I'm sorry." Her gaze shifted away, like she could look at neither of them. Her voice was stiff, like she'd planned the words before attempting to speak them. "I want you to keep them - and you can give them back to me when we get them back."

Rhiannon's attention flickered between them, worried, and it was clear that the presence of the keys was just as much of a shock to the blonde.
Rochelle found herself gently slumped where she stood. She gazed at the keys for a moment, and did not look up when she responded. "You weren't trying to get the bag for these." She said it like a question, but it was a statement, and an admission.

"I'm not trying to make a point, here, or make excuses. You were right to yell at me." was Lena's immediate response, and Rochelle looked up to frown at her. Her expression was a gentle grimace, hazel eyes squinted. "I'm not very good at trusting other people. I make a plan and I don't... involve anyone else, because I just assume I have it all under control. And right now, that means... people getting hurt because I thought I was... clever."

She focused, then, matching gazes with Rochelle with some faint hesitance. The more she spoke, the faster the words came, and her eyes watered past a stiff jaw that kept her tone firm.

"I honestly... wanted it to work out. I wanted all of you to come with us, and not just because it helps our chances. But I should've told you. And I should've just told him no, until he'd talked to y'all, and -"

Rochelle stepped forward, foot sliding to settle between Lena's, and pulled the woman into her arms. Lena stiffened, at first, before allowing herself to lean into the embrace. Her chin pressed into Rochelle's shoulder, and her arms came up to loosely snake around her waist.

"I'm sorry, too." she murmured, turning her face to let her cheek press into Lena's ear. "I'm sorry I yelled - and I don't think it's your fault. It's... everyone's fault, or it's no one's. I'm just scared."

Rochelle's arms tightened, rather than respond, and Rochelle felt something knotted and gnarled in her chest loosen just a little. She was gladder than she'd anticipated to know they'd be okay, and more desperate than she'd realized to feel secure in the ties she had left.

Rhiannon's voice cut in, dryly, before the moment could continue. "You guys gonna kiss or what? Chris, close your eyes."

A slight laugh passed between the two women, and they stepped apart, but Rochelle didn't completely take her arms from around the Texan. She sighed gently, steeling herself to speak, though Lena's eyes held a gentle resignation that said she knew what was coming.

Their trade of apologies was not the only one that needed to happen.

Chris, half-muffled as Ellis pulled the T-shirt over his head, babbled, "No es mi esposa, puede besarla. Ella puede besar a quien quiera." Then, quieter, "Sólo espero que ese sea yo."

Rochelle couldn't resist a glance over her shoulder, a smile tugging at her lips - she didn't understand most of it, but caught 'not my wife' and could extrapolate from there - but returned her attention forward just in time to watch Lena pull free from her grasp.

The brunette turned, looking toward her sister. Rhiannon met her gaze, jaw tightening, her shoulders lowering. They did not speak, and maybe it was a silent communication, or maybe it was just a stubborn stand-off.

Lena frowned gently, shifting on her heels, and only when she opened her mouth did Rhiannon abruptly interrupt.

"Honestly, I'm fuckin' over it." she muttered, quietly. Her body turned, offering her back up Rochelle, and the producer quickly scrambled to return to her with an apologetic pinch on her face. "I already punched you. Can we just move on?"
Lena's frown didn't weaken, but she nodded softly. It was, perhaps, the sort of conversation that needed to unfold more privately - and Rochelle didn't make any effort to force them. Settling Rhiannon's concerns about how the team would react was, she hoped, enough.

They had to stay strong, if they were going to find Coach and Nick.

They had to stay strong, in case they didn't.

"There's more clothes in here." Lena's voice was tender, and she thumbed over her shoulder toward the door she'd left ajar. "Just shorts, though. Beach cover-up stuff. And..."

Rochelle blinked, startled a moment when the biker looked down, reaching behind herself to pull something off the back of her shorts. As she brought it in front of herself and held it out, the air left Rochelle's lungs entirely.

The walkie-talkie.

She didn't have time to even inhale, to think about speaking, before a flash of red entered her periphery. Ellis was suddenly there, charging forward, and he'd snatched the radio out of Lena's hands fast enough to make her jolt in surprise.

He just held it, for a moment, cupping it in his hands and staring down at it. Rochelle thought he might turn it on and try, start yelling into it, because that seemed like something he'd do - but he just held onto it. When she looked at his face, his expression was torn, flickering between a quiet shock and a fleeting misery, thumbing over the controls.

"They fell in the ocean." he mumbled. "Theirs is probably - broke, or..."

Lena reached out, touching his wrist. His chin dropped, and his shoulders trembled when she murmured, "Might not work, but it also might. Worth a try, right, sunshine? But we may not hear anything until the storm's cleared. When they get a chance to recover, get somewhere safe, too."

He nodded, softly, and it was the first time Rochelle had seen his face settle into something that didn't look half-furious. "Okay." left him in a fractured tone of voice. "Yeah. That... sounds good."

When Lena circled her fingers more firmly around his wrist and lowered her voice, he looked up at her.

Her voice firmed, somewhere between comforting and assertive. "Coach wouldn't have jumped if he didn't think he could do something. Our part was getting ourselves safe so we can go look for them. We're halfway there, but until it stops pouring, we're no good out there. Definitely no good if a Witch catches us."

Ellis nodded, faintly, and although he fell quiet, Rochelle couldn't help but feel like it was a more balanced and steady state than he'd been in before. He turned away, gripping the radio, unable to tear his eyes off the currently-unlit LCD panel.

It's not apathy, she realized, gaze shifting back to Lena. It's never really been. She's just trying to compartmentalize all this shit into a bulletpoint list she can attack. I've done my fair share of that, and we've all done our fair share of locking shit away.

Lena caught her staring, and pulled her expression into something tired, a wince. Rochelle returned it, and the biker almost smiled.

I need her, right now. We need the help. We need the straight-forward, level-headed focus. And maybe we need a little calculation, a little big-picture foresight. Maybe with all of us pulled together...

Suddenly, quietly, it felt like they had a shot.
Chapter 299

It was an hour before the storm settled.

With the tumult indoors quieted long before that, the wait was not as uncomfortable as it could have been. Lena and Rhiannon had slipped into the back room, but the door remained open, and it felt less like an attempt to escape this time. Their voices hummed distantly, on and off, a soft conversation.

He was a little curious, but they'd already meddled enough in the sisters' business. If there was any chance they were mending their own relationship, he didn't want to go anywhere near them. She'd been unwillingly outed by her sister, much like Nick had at his hands - twice.

That bothered him, and he couldn't recall if he'd ever flatly apologized for it - but there was no more room for guilt in his head, and he pushed the thought away before it could take root.

They'd all changed as much as they could, and Rochelle and Lena had taken some of the extra shirts and used them like towels, laying their clothes against the shirts and wringing them out, absorbing the worst of the water. It would've been easy enough to trade their clothes out for the tourist-shop gear, but the fact was, their wet clothes provided much more protection. Every extra inch of fabric was helpful, and the thicker the fabric, the better.

Any help against the nails and claws used against them was an increased chance to avoid a wound that needed tending. If it was possible to salvage them, they needed to. And if they had to go back out with mostly damp clothing, they would.

Ellis had found a balance with the radio in his hands, some tender quiet that felt miles better than the frantic anger he'd felt before. He'd seated himself near the front door, and he was alternating between staring down at it and staring at the display case that currently hid their shy feline companion.

He was, however, afraid.

When should he try? If he tried too soon and got silence, would he be able to handle it? And what if he unknowingly missed them because he was scared to turn it on? Worse, what if he turned it on and ran the battery down, and then had no way to contact them at all?

In a way, he'd focused his worries. He would not think on their survival, and he would not think on what he could have done differently, and he would not think on the last words he'd said to the man he loved before he lost him. He would simply stare at the walkie-talkie and try to estimate how much battery power it had left.

It was a better cycle for his mind to loop on and worry through than the previous one, but still, he frowned.

When he turned his chin to glance again at the display case, he found orange eyes peering at him, glinted yellow-green in the darkness. It was the first real sight of the cat he'd gotten since it had disappeared under the cabinet, and her attention made him stiffen. She blinked at him.

He did not move, afraid to scare her. He held still and spoke gently, watching the cat's eyes widen and flicker, ears faintly perceptible shapes in the dark as she focused intensely on him.

"Hey, li'l bit." left him in a whisper. "You wanna come out?"
She shifted on her feet, not quite approaching but not quite retreating - and a hiss escaped her, completed with a vague smack of her lips that stifled the sound. He couldn't shake the feeling her mouth moved again afterwards, but no sound came out.

Her meow seemed a strained and intermittent thing, and a little worry bubbled up. She ain't mute or nothin', but she don't talk much. Ain't heard her cry once. I mean, it's good, I guess, but... ain't normal. I'd feel better if she went on hollerin'. Feel better if I went on hollerin'.

"We both know full well yer gonna take a hunk outta me if I move, so you just go on'n'figure it out, a'ight?" he hushed, keeping still, adjusting his gaze to look across the room. Rochelle and Chris were both looking at him from where they'd seated themselves on the ground in the middle of the room and leaned back-to-back. "I'll just sit here."

He didn't expect her to move - so when she stayed stubbornly still, he was unsurprised.

Then she moved.

It was just a tentative step closer, leaning out from under the display cabinet in order to sniff in his direction. One tiny black-tan-orange speckled paw led the way, balancing her weight on splayed toes. Her mouth opened, baring her teeth, huffing in sharply.

He saw her stiffen, saw her posture rankle with aggression, and he did the only thing he could think of: he talked.

"C'mon, you ain't so mean. I saw you snugglin' up tuh Nick before, so why're you hasslin' me?" She flinched at his voice, and suddenly her eyes and ears were directed squarely at his face again. Her whiskers trembled, even, and a strangely desperate energy entered the way she shifted her weight. "I ain't done nothin' to you. Heck, I voted tuh keep yer li'l tail with us. Bet'ch'yuh didn't know that, huh?"

He didn't know if it was his tone or cadence or the simple act of talking at all, but he was shocked to discover it worked. Her posture relaxed by degrees, but he could tell fairly easily that he was still in harm's way if he were to move.

She liked talking, and he'd always been good at talking.

Why did it feel like a struggle?

"Muh buddy Keith had'uh cat once." he mumbled, finding it easier than usual to keep his hands still as he spoke. He did not feel animated. "I mean, the cat kinda had him, y'know? It was this stray whut just walked intuh his house one day, like bolted intuh the door when he was goin' in, 'n'he'n'his parents was chasin' it around with brooms'n'shit, fer hours."

It was absurd, perhaps, to think the cat was listening, but she did seem to relax. Her attention wandered, eyes flickering over his seated body, gingerly taking another step forward. Her nose led the way, mouth open again to huff in air and breathe deep as she stretched her face towards his bare leg.

"Whut, I stink?" he muttered, just an aside before he continued, "Next thing they know, cat finds this hole in the wall, climbs right in! Took 'em all day tuh get it out, 'n'by then, it was kinda like.... squatter's rights, y'know? I mean, Keith's parents are real stern, but they got like, a code of honour."

Rochelle snorted from the center of the room, and Maggie's eyes darted toward her, jaw suddenly snapping shut. Abruptly, Ellis seemed to become the least of her concerns, and his eyes widened a little as the cat shuffled to face into the room. The posture put her hindquarters so close to him that when her tail lashed, it struck his thigh.

The touch of her fur was strangely comforting.

"Jeez, Ellis. She might be the first person who likes your stories." Rochelle teased, gently. Her voice was a little raspy, as if the tears she'd shed had left her tired and hoarse. When he squinted at her, limiting his protest to that lest the cat realize how close they'd gotten, she laughed. "At least she's warming up to somebody."

Ellis returned his gaze to the cat, a frown pulling at the edges of his mouth as he watched Maggie stare at Rochelle. He wanted her to warm up to him, so he could provide some amount of comfort, and so she might be more willing to stay with them.

He also just wanted Nick to return.

The producer shifted, adjusting her weight to kick her legs out, and all at once, the cat scrambled to dart back under the display cabinet. There was a moment where her feet scratched against the wooden floor, gaining no traction, and Ellis reacted without thinking.

He put out a hand, touching her hip, as if to steady her or push her along.

When she lashed out at him, he didn't even see her move. He just knew there were suddenly teeth embedded in his hand and at the juncture where his pinky connected into the joint of his knuckle. The pain made him yelp, though he managed to rein in the urge to shake her off. Despite how much he wanted to react more vigorously, he merely leaned away with his face drawn into a grimace.

It hurt. It was not a warning bite.

Damp breath huffed against his skin, but she made little more than a strangled squeak as she struggled to get her paws under herself. She released him, suddenly, and as she disappeared under the cabinet, he pulled his hand close to his chest. "Ow, ow, shit! Ow!"

"Jesus, Ellis!" Rochelle gasped out. "Sorry, I didn't mean to -"

"'M fine." he hurried out, only partially a lie. He tilted his wrist, and found a formidable crescent of teethmarks bit into the top and bottom of his hand. Her fangs had sunk in, and blood welled up in the tiny divots. He was lucky she wasn't a bigger cat... even with her small mouth, she'd managed.

He gazed down at the wound, trying not to let it upset him, trying not to let it feel like rejection. He tried, most of all, not to feel even more like he'd failed both the cat and Nick.

You gotta come back, sugar. 'Cause I dunno how either'uv us're gonna get on without'cha.

Christophe was suddenly in front of him, stretching down his hand in offer. He'd only stripped down to a slim set of briefs for a few minutes - causing Rochelle to shut her eyes - and had Ellis help him wring the water out of them before putting them back on, but he'd also taken one of the hoodies Lena had found. The empty left sleeve hung limply at his side.

"Tío, you are okay? She is la semilla del diablo. She maybe takes off your arm, and we are mellizos, ¿si? Ah..." He paused, that familiar distance entering his gaze as he thought on his words, then compromised: "The same?"

His chatter didn't make Ellis laugh, but it did force him to dispel his thoughts. He hooked the radio's beltclip onto the bottom inch of his shirt and stood, instead, pushing his unbit hand back against the wall to support himself as he rose. It hurt in its own way as his scraped-up wrists protested the flexion, and he was wincing by the time he stood.

"Y'all think the storm's let up enough tuh get a move on?" he mumbled, gaze shifting to look toward Rochelle, deflecting Chris' concern as best he could. The foreigner gazed at him a moment, just long enough to make it clear he noticed - and then turned to look toward Rochelle, too. "I wanna start checkin' out the canal. Fer all we know, maybe they got pushed up intuh that lil shippin' area, y'know?"

Ellis didn't believe it, but neither did he believe anything else. He chose neither, because believing they were dead brought on a grief he did not know how to handle, but believing they were alive felt terrifying. It felt like a risk he didn't know how to take.

He wasn't sure who he was anymore.

Rochelle exhaled, a slightly frustrated edge to it, and pushed to stand up. She walked over to the wall, peering out through a gap in the boarded-up window. "We're not going to waste the day sitting in here, that's for sure. It's not raining, but that Witch is probably still out there, and who knows where that Tank is." she responded, worriedly tucking her hands together and scratching at her palm. "We'll have to be quick and quiet. Maybe just make a run to the river, maybe try and leave a message for them, in case they come looking and their radio doesn't work."

That felt like a plan, or something close to it. Ellis nodded his head. "Yeah. Sounds good. We'll duck out, take'uh look 'round. We gotta find some supplies fer Rhee's back, anyhow, 'n' hopefully some extra." His chin turned, glancing toward the display cabinet with a small frown. "If we let her out, she'll prolly come back here. I mean, she came back tuh the café, so I think she gets it, y'know?"

He knew his teammates shared a look, and he knew it was dubious. He raised his voice before they could argue. "Maybe she'll run off'n'go find Nick. Bring him back her damn self."

Ellis felt his hot air run out almost immediately, felt his faux-gusto falter, and he wasn't sure what he'd have said next if Lena's voice hadn't suddenly called out. It jolted him to attention, buffering him from the dark places he'd begun to peer into, making it hard to focus on anything but the way the sisters suddenly re-entered the room.

"Are we going by the bridge? If we can get that bag back -"

Rhiannon puffed out a growl, rolling her eyes sharply. It was obvious enough by the close way they walked that they'd softened to one another, and regained at least the beginnings of their united front - though not, apparently, on this matter.

"Fuck-ass, Eleanor." The brunette's face flinched into a sour squint, but Rhee kept going, undaunted. Frustration made her palms turn up, moving gingerly so as to not strain her shoulders. "Let it go. We can... find more. And I'll live until we do, shit. I'm not gonna turn into a fuckin' pumpkin."

The shorter sister gritted her teeth slightly, shaking her head, frustration making her voice taut. "If we're going to be right there -"

Turning slowly to face them, Rochelle took a tentative tilt to her head and reached up to scratch at her temple. She glanced at Ellis and Christophe, but both men shrugged. "Uh... What's going on? Who's turning into what?"
Lena's mouth opened, but Rhiannon cut in, dryly.

"I'm a were-boy. My dick will grow back if I don't complete the daily ritual."

Ellis, Rochelle, and Lena all choked on their next breath. It was not a graceful reaction, and suddenly, the blonde's frustration turned into a slight grin, as if their shock entertained her past her discomfort. It was more hesitant than her usual shit-eating smiles, however, like she was still uncertain about the new situation.

"I... had enough estrogen pills for a few weeks in our bag." she explained, lower, thumbing gently against the studs in her brow. "But I'll be the first fuckin' person to say it's not worth walking our asses back to the spot where there's a bitch-ass Tank wandering around."

Clearing her throat to fend off her wary humour, Rochelle slid her hand to rub at her jawline with her knuckles, shaking her head. Her gaze darted to Lena, and she spoke firmly. "If it's important to you two, we go. Besides, wasn't there still some food in there? We aren't going to be any help to the boys if we starve."

"Few things we could use, for sure." the older biker affirmed, chin lowering. She reached up to catch a strand of her hair and start twirling it around her knuckle. "Some food, a couple waterbottles we had tucked away. Some other supplies I was saving."

Rochelle's foot tapped against the ground, and she glanced suddenly toward Ellis. Her expression was clear enough in its questioning pinch.

He nodded his head, then dropped his chin with a frown. "Good place's any tuh start lookin', anyway. I don't wanna get us lost tryin' tuh circle back around a different way, so... if we can pick us up some supplies, too, more's the better."

With a faint sigh, Rochelle placed her hands against her stomach and nodded. "Okay. As much as I hate to say it, we should gear back up, get ready to go. We'll take a loop and then come back here." Her voice grew stern, then, with a huff to it that felt on the verge of upset. "If we hear any sign of the Tank, we bunker down. We move slow, and keep an ear out for Witches. And nobody breaks off from the team."

Ellis turned on his heel, frowning down at the dark shadow underneath the display cabinet. He'd procrastinated long enough. He just had to hope he was making the right choice by letting her out, and that she'd find her way back.

He stepped forward, gently grabbing the display cabinet by the slim rim around its midsection. His body strained, jutting his hip into the piece of furniture in order to get more leverage, and he pulled it to carefully angle it away from the door. He moved slowly, skating it flat against the floor to ensure that he didn't hurt Maggie where she was hidden underneath it.

Once there was enough room to open the door, he did so, tilting his head to peek outside. He intended on giving their surroundings a once-over to ensure it was moderately empty, somewhat safe, before he released the cat. It was the smallest bit of security he could manage to pull together, to at least think he'd let her out into a cleared street.

He hadn't even gotten a good look out into the street before a flash of black slipped through the crack in the door, and the cat was gone, footsteps whisper-quiet as she bolted immediately out of sight. She didn't stop to look back at them, and he couldn't even quite determine where she'd gone to from the angle he stood at.
Ellis felt a surge of anxiety - and then nothing at all.

Rochelle's hand touched his back, gently, a soothing sort of contact, and did not speak. She gave him that moment of silence to process before she tried to pull him back in so they could change back into their half-dry clothing and prepare to leave.

It was painful to realize the truth, standing there. It wasn't that he didn't recognize himself - no, he saw himself very clearly, and with such abrupt and unfamiliar clarity, it made him dizzy. It made him feel ill. It made him feel desperately, terribly alone.

It's all hogwash. It's all just... bullshit, ain't it? Always been bullshit. Always been by the skin'uv our teeth. We ain't special. We ain't nobody. We could die, just like the next person'n'the person before us. We ain't even here 'cause we earned it or won it or fought for it, it's all just...

Soft, faint, like the tenderest of whispers against his temple, the private murmurs in the moments where Nick had forgotten he wasn't supposed to feel safe, he heard it.

"Just luck, Fireball. And luck runs out."
Chapter 300

It started, first, as a crushing shade of black.

It was not a shade that could be contained behind his eyelids. It must have been a void, a great expanse, stretching out miles and miles and perhaps forever onward. The blackness - the nothingness - loomed large in every direction until he was surely infinitesimal against its canvas.

But that seemed wrong, somehow. Was it instead a sheath, cocooned around him, no larger than a hair's breadth beyond his outline? Perhaps he was swaddled in it, so tightly wrapped that he could not breathe, sheer darkness melded flat against his skin until it became him.

If he struggled, would it break? Or would he?

Only gently, only slowly, did some far-off shape come into brief focus, back-lit only by its inarguable something compared to a yawning, endless nothing.

He did not know what it was.

There, in the dark, he was suddenly afraid, and the fear was a cold shock. His eyes flung open and he screamed, but the darkness rushed to fill his mouth and his chest and crush him from the inside out. He could not scream any longer.

It expanded in his lungs, and swallowed him whole, bleeding into him like stained ink blossoming into fabric. There was no pain, no sensory awareness of it, just events unfolding in a distant fashion. It simply encroached into the space that he had previously inhabited, and there, in the dark, he might've died.

A hand touched him, grip starkly real against the fiction of his surroundings, and the vastness around him turned into motes of light, particles of sand, collapsing in on itself and falling ever downward. Gravity had suddenly regained control. The surge of weightlessness was a punch to his stomach, and then he, too, fell - or rose, perhaps.

Reality re-asserted itself into shapes and borders he could not define, not at first, until it all snapped into focus.

He was eighteen, leaned into the railing of their apartment balcony, and his uncle looped an arm over his shoulders, pressing into him. He was drunk, but yet to lose his faculties completely. He smelled like ash and sweat and a particular citrus-sharp cologne.

It made him homesick.

"Saccente. So proud of you." he muttered, and squeezed his arm around Nick affectionately.
"Always knew you'd make it. You tried so hard not to graduate, didn't you, little bastard? Why? You want to be a fuck-up like me? Like your pop?"

He gazed down into the street, the motion of cars and people barely perceptible past the edges of the darkness gathered around them. He struggled to perceive more, further, but he had no control.

"You're gonna make it, Nico. You're gonna get out of here and make somethin' of yourself. You won't remember me or this fucking town, and don't look back. That fucking stronzo is in the ground - dico che è una liberazione. You are going to be fine, figlio mio."
Three hours later, after his uncle had fallen asleep, Nick climbed over the railing and jumped. The moment before he hit the concrete, he realized he didn't want to fall. He didn't want to die. He wanted to stop it, but gravity had decided for him the moment he'd released his grip on the railing, and all he could do was curl away from the ground flying up to meet him and scream out.

He woke in the hospital with broken bones. His uncle would think it an accident, or simply decide not to admit what it might've otherwise been. His parents never found out. It was the first and last time he'd try.

Reality re-asserted itself.

He was twenty-five. Clammy and hot, listening to the roar of voices around him, Nick closed his eyes. He couldn't take the sound, and couldn't take the way his father stared at him across the visitation table, and couldn't take the empty spot where his mother should have been.

"You should'a been there." he grunted, and his eyes were cold. "You should'a been there, Nicolas. Now I gotta bury her, and you're in here? You didn't make Ol's funeral, now your own mother? This how you got raised?"

"How would you fucking know?" he snarled, and the guards stepped in before they could go much further, on alert for conflict. His father left, and did not return. It was one of the last times they spoke.

Reality re-asserted itself.

He was thirty-three. The hotel room was plain, claustrophobic. She was there and sobbing into her hands, and he approached to draw her into his arms, and she did not resist. It was the only time they'd ever felt real.

Angel's mother died of lung cancer. They hadn't even known she was sick until she was in the hospital, and it had all happened so quickly, there was barely time to react. She hadn't gotten word until things were critical, and they'd scrambled for plane tickets, and arrived too late.

"I'm sorry, doll." left him, syllables rising from his lips as faint bubbles in the darkness. He knew how it felt, and he'd wanted it to be different for her, and he'd failed. "I'm so sorry."

She buried against his chest and wailed, and she didn't leave his side all day, all week - and the way she touched him felt real. He convinced himself that something had changed, maybe for good. It was the start of something between them, a new beginning in a year-old marriage. They'd figure it out.

Reality cracked, bled, and suddenly the darkness became freezing cold.

Water flooded his ears and blurred his vision, and something cut against his cheek as he lifted his head. Sour-tasting grit stuck in his teeth and against his tongue, and he was vomiting before he could stop it, rejecting the fluid in his lungs and mouth. He shuddered, body arching as he struggled to find something to grab onto, but his left hand found only sludge and his right arm did not move.

Trying to shift it earned him agony, a splitting pain tearing from his shoulder down to his bicep. He choked out a gasp of air that only drew more water into his lungs and drove him to a wracking, heaving set of coughs, tears streaming down his face.

His knees found ground, or something like it, and he felt them sink an inch into muck and silt. It was the slightest stability, the faintest sense of an anchor, and he stiffled with it. He straightened against them, and found himself waist-deep in water, though before it had felt like it might have been infinite around him.

His body slumped, gasping in wheezing breaths, left hand trembling as he reached up to touch his right shoulder. Pain, again, made him choke - and he sat there for just a moment, breaths rattling in his chest, instead trying to use the heel of his left hand to clear his eyes. His skin was muddy and wet, however, and the attempt stung ferociously.

Nick was left to blink, jaw slack as he heaved in air, staring ahead as his vision was nothing but blurred grey and green, unable to see clearly and unable to clear his vision.

It was real.

This is real.

His thoughts ticked by, slowly, coming together piece by piece, collecting themselves. The difference between the gauzy memories and the moment he now sat in felt faint, but they were there. The pain of his whole body, torso and legs shivering with waves of a pulsating ache, and the razor-sharp agony of his shoulder, were too overwhelming to be a dream.

As he blinked the water from his eyes and slowed his breathing, his surroundings became clearer. He knelt at the edge of a cluster of reeds, with a slim upcropping of earth beneath them that almost breached the surface of the greyed water.

The sky above him was grey and thick with clouds, dampening the light, and there was a distant grey haze in the air that seemed to mark the storm where it had crawled inland, passing over and beyond him. It had petered out, though far-off blinks of light in the sky continued, lightning strikes barely perceptible.

If he turned his head, looking over his shoulder, he could see Tybee in a dim silhouette behind him. He could not tell how far it was.

He'd washed ashore, like flotsam, in the silt marsh of an estuary traveling away from the town. Although he'd stabilized himself, he could feel the water by his feet sucking gently at his limbs, a current trying to pull him back toward the ocean. It had dislodged him from the marsh, perhaps. But how had he gotten there in the first place?

The shivering started to take hold of his entire frame, and every twitch and shudder surged further pain through his arm. He glanced down, gently, staring at it where it hung limply at his side.

His shirt was drenched and stuck to his skin, and the ball of his shoulder was not seated properly in the joint. It was not aligned as it should have been with his neck, and he did not know if it was broken, or if it was something he could fix.

He just knew it was agonizing.

His head lifted, sluggish against the protesting crackle of his neck, and he did not understand. How... didn't I...? How am I alive? Why aren't I dead at the bottom of the fucking river? He was not so aware as to be relieved, nor disappointed. He was still coming to terms with his physicality, with his surroundings, let alone his survival.

There were pieces of furniture scattered amongst the reeds around him, sofa cushions, slats of aluminum that might have been cast-off from a car. It had all come to rest against the reeds and the edges of the marsh's deeper sections, much as he had.
There were bodies, too, and the sight of grey skin surged a brief fear in him before he recognized they were unmoving.

I... should have drowned. He should have been a corpse among the corpses, collected here to rot. He touched his chest, fingertips catching in his soaked shirt, eyes widening, his breath catching and quickening. I was supposed to fucking drown. Why am I still fucking here?

He'd wanted to die. From the moment the tongue had grabbed him, to the moment his vision had blacked out and his consciousness had been ripped from him, he'd surrendered to it. It had been a relief to feel the choice taken away, to be allowed the blessing of letting go.

Now, here, agency had returned to him, and it was terrifying. His jaw gritted as he choked out a faint sound, and it felt like the punch of a sob in his diaphragm. He had to make the choice, now, to pick himself up and fight, and he did not know how.

Why couldn't I have just -

And then he saw it.

There was a car cushion a few feet deeper in the marsh, nestled tightly against a thick bushel of reeds, and it took him a moment to make sense of what he was looking at. His vision was still fogged, and when he blinked, grit was disturbed from the corner of his left eyelid and sparked sharp pain in his eye.

Through the renewed flush of tears, he realized: there was an arm tucked over the top of the cushion, hung limply. The hand was dark-skinned, and a bright red windbreaker was tugged up to its forearm, mud and dirt scraped into its skin, and he knew.

He did not remember, but he knew.

Panic cut everything out of him except a singular pain, his chest tightening until his heart struggled even to beat, and he was moving before he could stop himself.

His knees struggled to pull free of the muddy sand beneath him, and the very first step he took had him staggering, splashing as he struggled to get his feet under himself. He slapped his left hand down to dig nails in the silt, trying to crawl forward, his right arm shooting a shattering pain up his shoulder with every motion.

"Sam!" he shouted, the agony in his voice completely unfamiliar to his own ear. He pleaded, he begged, and the cold of his drenched body was nothing compared to the cold that sliced into his chest. "No, no, Sammy, please - please don't -"

This is what you get. This is what you do. You crawl out of the shit, every time, while nobody else makes it. You can't even fucking die right.

"You can't do this. You can't do this to me." He couldn't stop, even when it hurt, even when his voice tried to break between his teeth, even when he tasted blood at the back of his throat. He collapsed down into the knee-deep water, digging his knees again into the ground and reaching out with his one working arm to grab the man's wrist.

But the furious, desperate desire to check his pulse, to see if he was even alive, was a useless gesture. He could not feel anything but his own shivering, and his own pulse jack-hammering in his chest and his limbs.

"Please. Please." he whispered, straining, leaning forward. He scrabbled instead to grab the edge of the car cushion, pulling it off of the man, but maneuvering anything one-handed felt clumsy. Coach was halfway in the water, unmovable, his face slack.

He looked dead.

He's dead, because of you. And you couldn't even have the fucking decency to go with him.

"Please, Sammy," gasped out of him, and his breathing turned to shuddered heaves. "$P-please -" But it strangled into a groan, shouting out a furious and animal noise, summoning what little strength he had as he dove his arm down and into the water to loop it under Coach's body. He had to scrabble nails against the muck to get his hand wedged in, and he found the man's belt with his fingers.

Another shout fueled him as he started dragging Coach in deeper into the reeds, pulling him into the shallower water, kicking his heels against the mud and feeling his sneakers struggle and pull against the vacuum built by it. He splashed down shoulder-first, the water crashing up into his face and reeds battering him as he struck down and crushed them under his weight. The last yank secured them both on the nearest thing they had to dry land.

Gasping out a breath as the urge to vomit came hot and sharp up his spine, he kicked his legs, dragging himself forward enough to settle against Coach's side. He buried his elbow in the muck and scrabbled his hand up, patting the man's cheek, grabbing the side of his face.

He felt cold.

"Sam, say something." He was babbling, now, like if he kept talking, he wouldn't have to accept what his eyes told him. "You gotta say something, baby. This isn't fucking fair. You can't make me fucking stay here, and then leave me. You can't fucking do this to me. I can't do this without you. I can't - I'm not gonna make it."

His breaths stuttered, tone sharpening, growing more desperate, forcing himself forward with a squirm until he could bury his forehead against the man's jaw, huddling close.

"P-please... It should'a been me. It was just... supposed to be me."

It became a sob, and he could not help it. He couldn't stop himself, and couldn't stop the tears that started to flow freely now, eyes burning as they watered and streamed. He should have felt shame, but it seemed pointless beyond the anger and the grief and the desperation. He could not bring himself to care.

"I didn't want - I didn't want this. I didn't. I'm so fucking sorry. I'm so fucking sorry, Sammy. I -"

A cold, wet hand settled against the back of his neck. Fingers curled against the nape of his neck and drew him tighter, closer.

He had not felt the motion, had not heard the shift of water amidst the lapping of water and hush of reeds. It was a frigid shock, and then a harsh relief that tingled through him, and his body wanted to collapse. He wanted to go limp, and sob, and surrender to the misery coursing through him.

He wanted to stop a moment and feel that relief, until he could scrub out the stain of what he'd felt before.

"S'alright, Nicky." croaked dully from the man, a weak rumble in his chest, slurred with a pained exhaustion. He sounded dizzied, but stirring - had been stirring, perhaps, a few moments before.
Nick shoved up, instead of slumping, drawing himself up onto his trembling left arm and away from the touch, palm sliding off Coach's cheek to instead strike into the muck next to his head. He knew his face was flushed red and covered in tears past the mud, and he knew there was no piecing together his composure.

He did not care.

"What the fuck is wrong with you?" left him hoarsely, in what might've been a shout if he'd had the air to shout. "What the fuck were you thinking?! I thought you were fucking -" But it hurt, even, to say, so he did not. "Did you jump? Did you fucking jump after me?"

The eldest survivor's body shifted, subtly, and pain fluctuated over his face with a ferocity that made him gasp. He spread his fingers as he sought a grip in the waterlogged muck beneath him, struggling to straighten up. "Jus'... hold on, Nick, 'm -" he grunted, but Nick could not bite back an interruption.

"Did you fucking think about them?" His voice was gaining strength, anger boiling up from nowhere like bile at the back of his throat, fueled by a panicked terror. It kept the tears at bay, kept them from continuing, though his face was already streaked. "You think about how they'd fucking make it without you? You could've gotten out, you fucking - you could've -"

Coach sat up, then, and his eyes were bleary and half-closed when they focused on the Northerner. He coughed, shoulders wracked with it, and exhaled a rusted-out sigh.

"What was I thinkin', Nick?" Coach was so exhausted, his voice thin and frail, but he continued on. "I was thinkin' I can't lose you. I was thinkin' they can't lose you. I was thinkin' none of this shit's worth it if it ain't all of us, Nick."

The Northerner wanted to cut in, again, but the other man did not allow him to.

"I was thinkin' I'd rather die, too, than keep on movin' without you. I was thinkin' I don't leave family behind." A grief tugged his brows together, his right hand lifting to pluck at the collar of his shirt, trying to wipe the soaked fabric against his eyes. "An' what were you thinkin'? You want to die, Nick?"

Nick felt the air leave him, felt his face go slack, felt the twist of agony in his chest. It felt like a betrayal. He felt rubbed raw, chafed, scraped until he bled. He shivered, and did not know how to speak, though he wanted so badly to stop the man from speaking.

"I saw it. Saw the way you looked at me."

Trembling, clutching against the silt in his grasp, Nick forced himself to utter a few broken syllables of an argument. "The Smoker -"

Coach's head shook, and he closed his eyes, chin dropping against his chest. His voice lowered, softened, both a weakness and a gentleness entering it. "No, Nicolas. We both know that's bull. We both know it. We both know you been slowin' down, gettin' clumsy. We both know you didn't fight. Don't lie to me."

They sat there a moment, and Coach collected himself, touching his palms gently against his body as if seeking out injuries. When his hands settled against his knee, gripping around his patella, he stopped, slumping his head entirely.

He might've spoken, but Nick did, instead.
"You ever wonder if the... common denominator in every shit thing that happens is you?" he whispered, gaze going unfocused when Coach's eyes reopened and landed on his face. The softest frown touched his lips, but he did not interject.

It felt like moving through sludge to continue, but he did. "Like somehow everyone else manages to make it through life without breaking everything they fucking touch, but you just... you're just acid? And you spent so fucking long using it like a weapon, you can't stop, even if you want to?"

The older man's expression trembled, and maybe it was that soft weakness that brought it out. Maybe it was the surreal moment they sat in, hidden amongst the reeds, lost and alone, that pried it from between Nick's teeth.

"I don't fucking deserve him, but I wanted him." ghosted out of him, every word hooked and serrated as they passed from his lungs. "And I don't know how to fucking love him, but I don't know how to let him go. And you were... all of you, were all I had left. I didn't... know what to do, anymore. It felt... like the best..."

Coach gazed at him, softly, and then looked upwards at the clouds. There, with a slow and pained sort of resignation, his eyes watered. Tears collected at their corners, and his sigh drew them to close, loosing streaks down through the mud on his face. Regret tainted his voice when he spoke.

"I been wrong, Nick. I been wrong this whole damn time."

The gambler shivered, again, and closed his eyes. He listened, even as it began to sink claws in him, gnawing at his control, draining out his anger and leaving him with nothing else to lean on. The idea scared him.

"Whole time I've known you, I been out here, treatin' you like my son." Coach almost chuckled, but it faltered. "Chased you all day tryin'a get you to behave, to fix you up. Lettin' myself get disappointed when you didn't listen, like you owed me somethin'. Like you should trust me, 'cause I knew you better - 'cause I knew you better. Holdin' everything over you like it'd make you listen, when all it did was tear you an' me apart."

Bullshit. he wanted to argue, but could not summon words. Like I'm fucking blameless. Like I made it easy.

But the older man's attention settled back down on Nick's face, and it was patient and exhausted and sincere. "We ain't been speakin' the same language, an' I let you push me away. I let it keep on goin', let us keep fightin', so we never got nowhere. I looked you dead in the eyes an' told you how you felt, without ever listenin' to what you were sayin'. I never tried to learn you. I just figured I had you puzzled out. I didn't try."

It started again, first as the shaky beginnings of a sob, and then the flow of tears down his face. His body betrayed him, shuddering, and a stifled exhale preceded the ache around his eyes. He could not breathe evenly.

"I was wrong, Nick, and I'm sorry. I did wrong by you."

He could barely breathe at all.

Coach's hand touched at the side of his head, and he collapsed into it without thinking, and his face was suddenly muffled into the man's shoulder. Fingers threaded against the back of his head, and Coach's mouth buried into his temple, and their wet and muddy clothes squelched as they pressed into one another.
"You ain't my son, Nick, an' I gotta learn that."

Before that could feel like some rejection, some chastisement, some distance between them that Nick did not want, Coach murmured, "You're my brother."

Nick did not want to sob, but it felt like all he could do. It was agonizing, every inhale jolting his shoulder, but all the pain did was push him into heavier breaths, sucking in air and forcing it out in too-sharp, too-quick breaths. Every choked exhale brought on another wave of tears, and he curled in on himself, fingers catching on the other man's sleeve.

It was grief, and more grief than he could contain in the damaged borders of his body. It was misery and regret and guilt, and perhaps it was also much more than that. Shame and anger - but relief, too. Every word broke him down a little more.

"I wanna whoop you as often as I wanna kiss you, but I gotta learn to work wit' you." The man's tone softened, weakened, trembling, even as his grip on Nick tightened. "We gotta learn to work together. I gotta let you be who you are, even if it ain't what I want all the time, 'cause it don't matter what I want. It matters what we want, Nick, you an' me together."

Nick spoke, and it left him in a wheeze, a gasp, a desperate sound past the shuddered whimper that caught at the edge of his voice. "I-I'm sorry, Sam. I fucked up. I... fucked... everything..."

But Coach's head shook, sharply, a refusal.

"Tell me what you want, Nicky, an' we'll get it. We'll do it. I ain't gonna let anything stop you, a'ight? I got you." His voice broke, there, and the older man's shoulders shivered in kind as tears became more audible in his words. "You're my brother, Nick, and I ain't gonna let you go. I ain't gonna watch you hurt and not do everythin' I can to keep you safe. I'm here fo' you, an' I'll always be here, no matter what. Even if you fuck up."

Coach's other arm curled to settle around his waist, and how did he feel so small? How did he feel so fragile, so breakable, so broken - and how did he need the touch so badly, despite the way that touch made it all feel so much worse? He felt like he shattered as the man's embrace tightened, and he pushed into it, even as it became an agonizing pressure against his immobile right arm.

"I want us to be good, Nicky." the man whispered. "I just want us to be good."

Nick sobbed into his shoulder until he could not breathe, until he choked and gasped and struggled, wept as if some iron-clad, years-old gate in his chest had been flung open and he could not get it shut again. He cried, and felt tears in the shiver of the man's chest.

"I got you, Nicky."

It felt like a promise. It felt like a confession. It felt like the second time in his life someone genuine had told him they loved him, and the second time a tender and secret part of him truly believed them.

"I got you."
"Just fucking do it."

Nick spoke between gasps, head bowed where he knelt in the marsh. Coach had moved behind him and was tenderly feeling at his shoulder, thumbs digging into the swollen muscle there. Every touch hurt, spasming a tingling numbness up his neck, and he wasn't sure he could take much more of the manipulation.

His injury gave them an easy excuse for a reprieve from their previous conversation. His breakdown was not far from his awareness, but it was not such a crushing weight against him, either.

They'd both cried, and that felt like an equalizer. It made it harder to feel shame about having broken down, about the things he'd said. The wounds were open, now, and there wasn't much to be done. And if it was gonna be someone, I'm... glad it was him.

"Sam - for fuck's sake, please, just -"

Suddenly, the older man pushed back, coming to kneel beside him instead. He had only enough time to bark out a shocked sound of protest before Coach gripped a palm against his sternum and pushed him back. He struck the muck beneath them gently, the back of his head squishing into the inch-deep layer of water over the marshy ground.

They'd already flattened and broken most of the reeds around them, but a few rigid stalks pressed uncomfortably into his neck, and his eyes widened up toward the sky. He might've mustered upset at being pushed into the mud if he wasn't already covered.

"Never dislocated a shoulder before." he whispered, all-too-aware of how nervous his voice sounded. "Fucking hurts."

"Yup." When Coach grasped his bicep with one hand and his shoulder with the other, gently lifting his arm up off the ground until it was roughly perpendicular with his body, he expected something violent. He expected a shove, a jerk, and a crack. He braced for it.

Instead, the hand gripping his shoulder began to gently squeeze at the muscles just around the worst of the protruding bone, and the hand on his bicep started to massage up to the base of his arm. They both kneaded in alternating motions against the wet cloth of his shirt, avoiding directly touching the shape of his dislocated shoulder.

It hurt, but it did not hurt like he expected, and between the flashes of pain and tension it was almost soothing. He also did not see it making any progress in actually getting his arm back into place. He couldn't help but shift his gaze to Coach's face with a confused pinch, though he tried for a joke. "Are you comin' onto me?" he rasped out.

"Me jumpin' off a bridge fo' yo' ass wasn't romantic enough?" The older man grunted, a heavy harrumph. "Relax, Nicolas."

Nick's eyes half-closed, and his breath stuttered, trying for a laugh that came out choked. "This is the least fucking relaxing -" He gasped, despite himself, as Coach's grip tightened, pulling his arm up toward the sky just a half-inch, as if to lift him by it. It was just enough to put a fraction of his weight on it, drawing his shoulder taut. "Jesus, just fucking do it!"
The man frowned at him, an unimpressed arch touching his brow. "I shove this back in place, you're gonna tear somethin'. Just breathe, Nicolas. Relax. Talk to me." His voice softened, there, and his massage on the Northerner's arm slowed even as it grew firmer. "C'mon. Still mad at me? You had some shit to say?"

It was bait, an olive branch, and he wanted to take it. Coach gave him the chance to fall back into a comfortable pattern. Let's fight. he offered. It's okay if that's easier, just for now.

Instead, Nick whispered, "How'd we make it?"

He felt the man's body still, before resuming the digging and probing motions of his fingertips. He followed the lines of muscle and tendon that surrounded Nick's shoulder, trying to soothe the swollen joint. "Li'l blurry, if I'm bein' honest. We got lucky. I snagged you, kept us above the surface. There was a lot of shit in the water, an' some of it was floatin'. Car seats an' shit. Current did most of the work otherwise."

Coach in a fight for both their lives, with Nick no more than dead weight against him, was not pleasant to imagine. But it was over, and he was too tired for guilt.

"Why didn't it suck us out to sea?" It was infantile, perhaps, to mumble such soft and single-minded questions, but it was all he had the energy for. Coach did not seem to mind.

The big man hummed, thumb stroking a few circles against the muscle just above his clavicle, the touch far away from his injured joint and a welcome counter-balance to the rest of the contact. "Storm surge, most like. Water level rises, the tide pushed us in. Now the storm's passed over, it's dumpin' rain upstream, an' it'll be pushin' back the other way."

Nick's eyes closed, then, submitting to his exhaustion. It was easier to relax with his eyes closed, and he couldn't tell if the pain eased because of it, or because the numbness tingling in his shoulder was encroaching further.

He thought of a faraway night, when Ellis had crept onto the bed behind him and rubbed his shoulders, and a subtle misery settled a knot in his throat. Why did the tiny flush of tears that tickled his eyelashes feel just as pathetic as the sobs that had wracked him moments before?

"Did you... see her? Brenda?"

Coach didn't still this time, but it took him a moment to respond. He kept his fingers moving, letting his grip on Nick's elbow tighten, drawing his arm a little further in its extension. The feeling in his shoulder joint was faint and tense, like a bubble of air was trapped inside it and grew closer and closer to popping.

"Yeah. I did." he murmured, and there was a tremble to his voice, an unease that Nick wasn't used to. "Don't know how, or... why, but... yeah, I saw her, too. Got the bite to prove it. Guess Chris wasn't hallucinatin', after all."

Nick's chin lifted, feeling the silt conform to the back of his head with an unpleasant shluck, and he forced out a hollow laugh. He'd almost wanted Coach to say he hadn't, but there was some comfort to be found in knowing he hadn't imagined it. "Maybe all three of us were."

The grunt that left Coach was unconvinced. "I don't think there's any good in us talkin' 'bout that, Nick. I don't got no answers, an' neither do you."

"You told me to..."
"I told you to yell at me." the man countered, before Nick could go any further. He shifted on his knees, drawing himself a little straighter, pulling with fractionally more force on the Northerner's arm. "Not worry 'bout shit we can't solve right now."

Nick inhaled sharply when he felt something shift in his shoulder, the motion frightening him more than actively hurting. It did not pop into place, however, and he forced himself to speak rather than tense up. "Not gonna yell. I should be... glad you saved me." he muttered, and that was the closest he could get to admitting he wasn't.

Coach's hand shifted on his shoulder, stilling and tightening in a squeeze, and Nick deliberately did not open his eyes even though he knew Coach's were on his face. "I got that covered, if you still wanna feel some type'a way 'bout it." he responded, wryly, a soft worry at the edge of his voice. "But now you gotta get yo' shit together. Help my ass get home."

Nick didn't want his lips to twitch up, didn't want the grin, but it didn't ask before it landed on his lips. "Fair." he admitted.

If Coach hadn't been there - or, worse, if Coach hadn't survived, the gambler might've let the current grab him. It seemed distant and far-away, now, like he'd come to his senses in the moments since, but he could still recall the feeling. He wasn't sure he could have pulled himself together.

It was moot, now, he realized. He could not leave Coach alone, even if it felt like a part of him was still in the water. It was a reason to move when he wasn't sure he had any other.

Ellis doesn't love me anymore, and fine - that's fine. And the rest of the team'll side with him, and that's fine. He needs them. He was too tired to keep it at bay. It settled in, as truths often do, quietly and patiently. But I need them, too. I need... somebody. I needed...

And then his shoulder popped.

He could feel the slide and snap of muscle fibres regaining their normal position, feel the suddenrightness of the joint. It hurt, but only tangentially, a shockwave of soreness that made his teeth grit. Still, it was nowhere near the visceral pain he'd expected, and he was left to pant gently.

The tingling was worse, pins and needles beginning throughout his arm, and it still hurt when he shifted his shoulder. It felt... weak, somehow, as if it had atrophied in a cast.

Coach didn't release his arm, softly lowering it and settling Nick's hand onto his chest. He patted it in clear indication, and the prone man reflexively grabbed it with his free hand, keeping it there, unsure if he could manage to maintain its position without the grip. The hand on his shoulder tightened again and pulled him, and they both grunted as he was drawn upright.

The feel of muddy water trickling down his back was unpleasant, but no more unpleasant than the rest of his body felt.

"A'ight. Hold still." Coach started to pull off his windbreaker, but he'd only gotten his right arm free when he went to pull the other side off and froze. His eyes darted down, and before Nick could ask, he'd reached down and grabbed at a boxy shape protruding from within the jacket's flank.

The fucking radio.

Their gazes met, widened, and suddenly the older man was scrambling to unzip the inner pocket an inch above the lump. Nick bit the inside of his cheek, feeling his heart rate pick up again, unable to do much but watch as Coach pulled the walkie-talkie out of the pocket and drew it into his hand.
His thumb smeared mud against the side of it.

He did not, however, turn it on.

Nick was prepared to lunge and take it from him, one-handed or not, but the other man shook his head and cleared his throat.

"Shit ain't waterproof. Neither is my jacket - not the linin', anyhow. It's probably got seawater in it, an' if I turn it on now, it'll fry fo' sho'." he sighed out, frustrated. The way he stared down at the radio spoke to well-disguised restraint. "We gotta get back to town, dry it out first. Best case, we find some rice or some shit."

The Northerner frowned, despite himself, and lowered his chin. He glanced at his shoulder, trying to gently shrug it just to see if he could - and it moved, but a blinding flash of pain followed the motion, and he winced. It braced him, a little, for when he muttered, "We don't know if they -"

He didn't see the hand coming before it had grabbed the side of his face, palm against his ear, and that made his eyes widen as he glanced up. Coach was staring at him, intently, lips drawn in a tight line. "They got out." he responded, firm. "They got out, an' they're lookin' fo' us. Best plan we got is pickin' our asses up and makin' our way to the helicopter."

It was intense, and Nick wasn't sure to which of them the intensity was directed. He hesitated, before tilting his chin to pull away from the touch.

"Fine. Jeez." A sigh scraped up his throat, and he watched as Coach buckled the radio onto his hip, and then returned to removing his jacket. "Bet Ellis is puzzlin' out how he can just find you, though."

He didn't truly believe the words, and that fact made him wince when Coach's nostrils flared, and an irritated roll of his eyes flashed in his periphery. "I can't believe yo' ass still don't get it." he muttered, and it felt like the beginning of a tirade.

But the rest never came.

Nick wasn't sure if he was relieved or not.

Coach tied the sleeves of his jacket together, putting the loop over Nick's head and nudging his injured arm into the cradle made by it. It formed a loose sling, though it wouldn't hold up against much more than the dead weight of his arm. It was, at least, enough that he was able to let go of his forearm with his left hand.

Nick glanced up, and found Coach frowning down at it, wheels turning behind his eyes. The man blinked as the Northerner's attention landed on him, and he twisted his mouth before vocalizing his thoughts.

"You ain't in fightin' shape. You fall, and that's gonn' pop right on back out. You need rest, but we ain't got time." His head twisted, and he gazed around them, clicking his tongue. His eyes held calculation, along with a slow panic. "Don't see no zombies back here, but that don't mean there ain't any. Best we can do is follow the river back to town, an' get our asses somewhere safe. Can't just go runnin' around hollerin'. Doubt they killed that Tank."

Abruptly, sharp, Nick muttered, "Fuck." When Coach glanced back at him, he grimaced. "It's - all gone. My sword, Magnum, rifle... even if I had two fucking working arms, I have shit-all to fight with."
The older man nodded, quietly, gaze drifting toward the ground. "Mm. Nothin' made it through the fall. Might be somethin' in the debris out here - if all the wood ain't waterlogged." A sigh made his shoulders drop, and he turned, offering down his hand toward Nick. "C'mon, brother. You ain't gettin' better in the next ten minutes, so let's get movin'."

Nick allowed himself a renewed grimace, reaching up to grasp Coach's hand, trying to ignore the squelch as their muddy skin struggled to gain traction. He let out a pained sound as he was pulled to his feet, mostly by the other man's strength, and as he wobbled to stand with his sneakers half-buried in the silt beneath them, he forced a weary smirk.

"We're going with the 'brother' thing, huh?"

The big man smiled, just a little, knowingly. He canted his head before turning around, giving the ground a scan before he started to pick his way toward another stretch of shallow water. The raised portions of ground came in swirling peninsulas, and to keep near the main dip that formed the river, they'd have to cross in and out of knee-deep water.

The reeds coated their pantlegs in wispy seeds, topped with sharp hooks that snagged in the fabric. The scratchy sensation began to worsen as they moved through the marshy underbrush. The oppressive cling of their clothes was bound to drive Nick mad, the caked mud sure to harden where it had soaked into their clothing and onto their skin.

"I mean, I can call you 'baby', if you -"

But Nick put up his good arm, waving his hand. "No, no, that works." he muttered, dryly, feeling a flash of regret to know for sure how much Coach had heard - and then something else, something that might have been affection, or some strange cousin to it. "Brother's fine."

The other man chuckled.

In the quiet moments as they walked, Nick felt himself fall to a quiet misery, a subtle frown, and he couldn't completely shake the feeling he might cry again. Now that he'd given his emotions leverage, they chased him eagerly.

Glancing up and watching Coach's back, watching him power on, Nick let himself fall into the man's wake. There was a comfort, there, and a safety, and a few tears came when his thoughts wandered too far off track.

He'd barely pieced together some semblance of a way forward, allying himself with the sisters and positioning himself to go with them when they left. It was short-sighted, but a plan all the same. Now, that felt much less feasible.

Now, he had no plan at all.
Chapter 302

The rain had settled, leaving puddles sprawled out over the streets, gathering around the grates built into the concrete where bodies and debris had mostly clotted them shut. The quiet was jarring compared to the noise they'd left behind, and all of them were on edge.

They'd struck a balance between their own clothes and their new ones. Christophe hadn't given up his dry hoodie, and Rhiannon had helped him saw the empty sleeve off a few inches past his stump.

Ellis had slipped reluctantly back into his damp jeans and jacket, but he'd kept the T-shirt in place of his wet undershirt. He could already feel the chafing starting against his thighs, and he couldn't help but wince as he darted to flatten himself against the wall of the next building.

Behind him, Rochelle and the sisters slipped close. They'd all returned to their normal clothing, the fabric in varying states of dampness.

They were down weapons. The stun baton and the katana were gone along with the sniper rifle and Coach's shotgun, which left them under-equipped. They'd scattered the weapons they did have amongst themselves, which put Chris wielding the pistol and Rhiannon holding Ellis' shotgun.

Quiet, single-file, they darted from alley to alley, avoiding most attention except for a short scuffle with an infected that had slumped into one of the alleys and caught them off-guard. Rochelle had Rhiannon's bat, however, and it only took one quick strike to the skull to silence it before it could shriek.

Ellis led them, stopping at every alley exit in order to crane his head out and gaze down the street. He was perked to listen for the Tank, but as they retraced their steps, they found only evidence of its passage.

It had continued after them, but then taken a turn and wandered down a street and deeper into the second portion of Tybee. It was a relief for the short-term, but that placed it heading right for the site of the helicopter crash. There was no reasonable chance they wouldn't see it again; the remaining segment of city was not so large that they could avoid it forever.

Still, it was out of their immediate path, and that was something.

It was a longer way than it had felt the first time, now that they were moving slower and with more care. By the time they turned into the street that lead up to the bridge, Ellis' heart had begun to pound in his chest.

Silly, to hope they might turn the corner and see their missing teammates. Ellis could not quite stifle the longing and, instead of succumbing to it, he settled for reaching to the radio at his jeans' waistband and pressing the ON switch. The walkie-talkie gave a gentle chirrup as it came to life, and the sound drew the team's attention to Ellis' back.

He could feel their gazes - but nobody said anything, a fact he was grateful for.

"Okay." he mumbled. There was a few yards between them and the bridge's entrance, the bridge itself still raised up. The sight of it punched a hole in his gut, stirring up a clenched anxiety. "Let's grab the duffel and get movin'."

Even from where he stood, he could see the bridge. It was still raised up, but more of it had fallen apart. As if the built tension of its two sides sitting at varied heights, it had cracked further down the middle, and only strips of a denser metal remained connected on the left side.

He wondered what the water below it looked like. Serene, no doubt. No doubt the rain had washed away all evidence of the horde, and the vehicles tossed in by the Tank, and their lost teammates.

It was absurd to think, all things considered, but he could not shake the feeling that they might look over the edge and see bodies. He could not get rid of the mental image, could not convince his mind to leave it alone - the idea that he might catch sight of his loved ones, just two more bodies in the pile -

Ellis started moving with a wobbled misstep, and Rochelle came up gently beside him as they moved at a brisk pace toward the bridge. Her gaze tilted up to examine him, and a small frown twitched at her mouth. She did not speak, however, but merely reached out, offering her left hand.

With a soft sigh, Ellis humoured her, shifting the bat into his other hand so he could grab hers. The contact itched at him in a way he wasn't used to; he did not want comfort, he wanted action. Answers. He wanted his family back.

But she wanted to comfort him, and he let her.

They covered the distance at a jog, and as they came around the corner, Ellis skidded to a stop, using his grip on Rochelle's hand to draw her to a halt alongside him. He tilted his head, looking around the corner, only to find the street clear enough for their purpose.

The road running along the canal, perpendicular to the road they stood on, emptied directly into a fenced-off area. Past the single-armed security gate was an empty parking lot, but it curved to the left and behind a brick building, a wider space that opened up. A few infected milled inside the lot, and one was angrily bashing its fist against the chainlink fence, a mindless bout of rage.

Every clatter and rattle sent a flicker of unease through the infected near it, but they remained mostly docile.

"Hurry," he hushed, and Lena was first to dart around him, Rhiannon following sluggishly behind. They crouched beside the crushed remains of their motorcycle, working to loosen the bungee cables enough to pry the duffel-bag off of it. The bike's frame had twisted and crunched enough to where it was difficult to untangle them.

When it took more than a few moments, Rochelle let go of his hand and advanced, darting to join them. She muttered as she crouched down, voice low. "Here, you grab - no, crap, that's stuck - maybe -"

They hushed back and forth, the rasp of metal sounding out as they rocked the crushed motorcycle in attempts to get enough of the cabling loose that they could slide the duffelbag free from its place holstered onto the rear. They worked quietly enough that the infected down the road took no notice.

There was time enough to break away and move to the edge of the canal, to survey their surroundings, but Ellis couldn't coax his body to advance from where it stood rooted.

Ain't gonna change things, whether I go look or not. he told himself, but he remained stationary all the same.

Ellis glanced to their right, eyes tracing the small control tower positioned just to the right of the bridge. He'd noticed it before but paid little mind, and he would've paid it just as little mind the second time if it weren't for one detail: through one of the paneled windows built into the side, he could see movement.

If he squinted, he could just pick out a figure, stepping toward the window.

That, in and of itself, might have done little but register in his head. An infected had likely found its way in, or was trapped in after someone locked themselves in and then turned. It was not noteworthy, except to note that an enemy might appear from that direction.

But then it stilled - and then it dropped to the ground, suddenly, crouching out of sight.

_Hidin'. Zombies don't hide._

Instantly, his attention sharpened, and he turned on his heel. He did not want to alert his teammates on a false alarm, but he did not want to keep it quiet, either - so he compromised, and reached out blindly to grab Chris' side.

The Spaniard jolted in surprise, but obediently stepped closer the moment he'd collected himself. "¿Ay?" he muttered, instinctively following the other man's gaze. He searched, but didn't react with any indication that he'd seen anything of note. "What is?"

"You see somebody up there?" Ellis murmured, pointing up toward the control tower. Christophe squinted, craning his head, but gave a negatory sound. Insistent, urgent, Ellis took a step forward, lifting his cap bill up away from his face as if it might improve his vision. "I think... I saw somebody. I think there's somebody up there, 'n' -"

Slow, and then all at once, he realized it.

The bridge hadn't raised all by itself. Even if it were some sort of automated process, it would have at least attempted to lower in the time since - and what were the chances of it happening just as they were crossing? It wouldn't trigger off movement across its length, and even if it had, surely infected or fleeing survivors would have triggered it well before their arrival.

It didn't make any sense.

_Unless it weren't automated._ he thought, and an ill feeling twisted in his gut. _Unless there's someone up in that tower, someone who saw us crossin' n decided tuh try'n' stop us... someone who set the sirens off'n watched us almost die, watched Nick'n'Coach - they pushed a button._

He felt the urge to run. He wanted to charge forward, sprint and find a way up, break in the window and confront them. He wanted to... _hurt_ them, seek _revenge_, felt rage boil up in his chest, and perhaps it was that unfamiliar sensation that held him still.

Instead, he compromised. He tightened his grip on Chris' side, and lowered his voice, gritting out the words, "There's someone up there."

The anger must've come through in his voice, because there was a beat of silence before the women crouched behind him suddenly stood, abandoning their efforts to free the duffel-bag in abrupt unison.

"Are you sure?" Lena pressed, sidling to come closer, squinting as she gazed toward the tower. "The windows are kind of dark, I don't -"

It was harder to miss when movement flashed past one of the other windows. This time, it was silhouetted enough against an otherwise dark space that Ellis could pick out the shape of shoulders and a head, peeking up through the window before darting back down.

Motion flashed, and then the window was even darker, as though curtains had been drawn flush against it.

Rochelle blustered out a faint huff of air. "Holy shit." Then, quieter, with a dawning sort of disbelief in her voice, she muttered, "... holy shit. That's... That tower operates the bridge, doesn't it? There are probably controls in there. If there's someone in there... they must've... raised the bridge."

Like a dull collision, it struck them all at once. He felt the tension spark, the silence full of a sickened comprehension, a shock that drew his teammates a step closer together out of some instinctive pack instinct. For an instant, he felt a shade of regret, fear - what if he was wrong? What if he'd scared them for no reason?

Worse, what if he was right?

Rhiannon started forward, grabbing Ellis' shotgun from where it was slung loosely on her shoulder, bringing it to bear. "I'll fuckin' kill 'em." she snarled, low, dangerous, her stride long enough to take her out of Rochelle's reach when the woman tried to grab her arm. "I'll fuckin' kill 'em."

Ellis should've tried to stop her, but his legs moved before he could, and he surrendered to the urge to advance, his anger amplified in the face of hers. He did not know what either of them meant to do, fury blinding him. They both bolted.

Although it was at a delay, the sharp footsteps of their teammates followed.

Rochelle tried for reason, or something like it. "Don't - nobody jump to conclusions here, okay? We don't know anything yet, and we're not killing anyone." she hissed, but her pace picked up to match Ellis', an edge surfacing in her voice. "Just... maybe kicking the shit out of them."

"If they tried to kill us - if -" Lena's voice clung to a high-strung concern, tight with nerves. Despite her protests, she moved with them, her body turning to scan behind them and ensure the infected were still undisturbed. "Not sure a house-call is the smartest move! What if they set off the sirens again?"

But Ellis' head shook, teeth gritted, responding even as his gaze darted over the tower's structure. "Whut if Coach'n'Nick come back, 'n'they set the siren off on them?" There was a ladder up to the slim platform that extended a few feet before it ended at a door into the structure, but it had been retracted, and it was just out of reach. "We ain't walkin' away."

If someone had done this to them, he would look them in the eye. He'd hear why. He needed to know.

They skidded to a stop just beneath the ladder, and instantly, Ellis turned on his heel. He dropped down to a knee, setting the machete down and bracing his arm against his thigh as he laced his fingers together. He bit out, "C'mon. Somebody. I'll hoist you up, 'n'you pull the ladder down."

Rochelle traded a glance with Christophe, and a frown with Lena. The blonde standing next to him stiffened, and did not move to cooperate. There was an instant of hesitation where Ellis felt a strained fear that they might refuse, that even Rhiannon had reconsidered their actions.

Lena uttered a sharp sigh under her breath before darting forward. She set a hand on Ellis' shoulder, stepping up one foot onto his cradled palms. "This is not a good idea." she muttered, but braced herself with a nod, one hand stretched up in the air. "Get me up there, sunshine."
The scuff of her shoe-heel against his scraped wrists made him wince. "Y-yeah. Go easy, girl." It was with a faint grunt that he straightened, gritting his teeth as he stretched to lift her up. The woman wobbled as her weight was pulled up off her other foot, and Rochelle darted forward to grab her waist and steady her.

The brunette's fingers brushed the bottom rung of the ladder, and with a strained noise, she stretched the extra inch to grip it. She pulled, hanging her weight off it, but it did not budge more than a squeaky groan of metal. Something was locking it in place.

Ellis glanced up through one squinted eye, trying to see what sort of mechanism had it locked. Before he could speak, however, Lena pushed up, jumping her weight vertically to jostle the ladder.

Between the sudden way her weight dropped back down on him, and the pain that shot up his arms as her shoes ground against the cat bite dug into the meat of his palm, Ellis couldn't keep his hands laced together. His arms gave, and he might've dropped her outright had Rochelle not still had her by the hips. As it was, he slipped and struck onto his rump, pain flashing through his tailbone as he landed, and Lena's foot slipped off his hands.

The sound of her heel striking the ground, her body tumbling into his lap and knocking him back onto a bracing palm, was quickly overwhelmed by the loud rattle of the ladder suddenly dropping to its full extension. It did not reach the ground, but it hit the end of its length with a loud clang of metal, the sound echoing up through the structure itself.

He wanted to nurse his wounds, wince and gather himself, but the scream of infected from behind them made them all stiffen.

Before he could react, Lena grabbed the lapels of his denim jacket, getting her feet underneath herself and yanking to draw them both up. He gasped out a startled noise, struggling to catch his balance and reflexively grabbing her forearm in kind. She spared him a nod as they both got upright.

"Sorry."

Rochelle turned away, watching as the infected that had been previously cooped up in the fenced-in area were clambering over and crawling under the security gate, charging toward them with abrupt focus. They'd been too loud.

"Go, Ellis." the producer ordered, despite a blunt uncertainty in her voice. There was trust there, too, in the way she relinquished control. "We'll take care of these assholes. If there's someone in there, get them talking. If they set off the sirens on us, that Tank's going to come right back here, and probably more."

Ellis' body refused to obey him, for just a moment, protesting the idea of not fighting alongside them. He knew she had a point - there was no storm to hide in, and no storm to muffle the bridge's siren. If it went off, it would echo farther than the first time, and draw in even more infected. They'd gotten lucky, and might not again.

The grip of a gun was pressed into his hand, and he startled, grabbing it and turning to find Christophe beside him. The man crouched and picked his machete up off the ground, wielding it low with a frown. He said nothing as he stepped to flank Rochelle, bracing his weight on his heel.

He seemed uncomfortable.
Sucking in a sharp breath, Ellis twisted around, and did not allow himself another thought before he tucked the gun in his jacket pocket and started to climb the ladder. Blood had trickled onto his palms, his wrists reopened, and he grasped the rungs tighter to overcome the gentle greasiness it caused, though it was quick to coagulate and turn tacky.

His boots gave him a solid grip, the divot in the middle of the tread fitting snugly as he stepped from rung to rung, going as fast as he could manage. The ladder wobbled from his weight, and it felt like the entire tower moved just faintly.

It was not much more than twelve feet to the top, and he made it up just as the shrieks and squeals of the zombies turned into snarls, met with the wet impact of flesh on weapon. It drove a nervous energy to a whine in the back of his head, but he had no reason to doubt his teammates.

As the ladder ended above him and his head crested above the platform it connected to, he got a better look at the tower itself. It was not terribly large, square in dimensions and perhaps the size of a small bedroom. The windows were built high enough that he was able to slide himself onto his belly and get to his hands and knees without breaching above their lower edge.

There was a door a few feet ahead, and Ellis carefully crawled forward to settle beside it. He hesitated, just momentarily, before he drew the gun from his pocket. It felt heavy against his palm.

Leaning his head in, Ellis pressed his cheek against the door and flattened his ear to the metal surface. He could not hear anything from inside, and certainly not over the sounds of combat from the ground beneath him.

Gritting his teeth, feeling a surge of uncertainty, he did the only thing he could think to do, even as it seemed terribly absurd: he lifted his left arm and used the side of his hand to rap against the door, just two firm bangs. He knocked, and in the moments that followed, felt like an idiot.

Something scuffed against the other side of the door.

Reflexively, eagerly, forgetting his anger for just a moment, Ellis tightened his arms against his side and leaned tighter into the door. "Hello? Someone in there? We ain't zombies. 'N'we ain't here tuh hurt'cha, neither."

The blast of a shotgun from beneath him made him jump, slightly, but his teammates had not yelled or shouted, and he knew they would have had something gone awry. The single clap of a gunshot muffled, but did not completely disguise, an utterance from within the control room. He couldn't make it out, and he wasn't entirely sure if it was meant as a response at all.

Then, louder, the voice buzzed through the metal door: "You wouldn't s-say if you were. Snake in the grass, wolf in the..."

It was a man, he thought, with a reedy and strained intonation. The stifled nature of his statement couldn't hide the way his voice trembled. He was nervous, manic, and hummed a few unintelligible, mumbled phrases before he barked out a louder command.

"Go away."

Ellis’ teeth caught on the inside of his cheek, and he tried to maintain a calm tone, even as frustration tangled itself painfully in his stomach. "Man, we're all tryin' tuh make it out here, okay?" Try as he might, he could not quite moderate his tone into something soothing, coaxing. It came out agitated and urgent. "I ain't tryin' tuh mess with yuh, but I gotta know you ain't gonna hurt us or nothin'."
The stranger babbled, and Ellis tentatively replaced his ear against the door, straining to listen. "How am I supposed to - too many. Too many. Can't keep them out. Tried to. Can't listen. Don't listen. Better safe than..." There was a shuffle, a sudden strike of something against metal and a strained snarl of air, and it made Ellis' body jerk back on reflex. He was not afraid, but it was difficult not to feel intimidated. "What are you doing here?"

Shit. This guy ain't right in the head. He should have felt some sympathy, and it should have tempered his anger. This was no Jerry, in full control of his faculties and willful in his violence. This was someone alone and driven to a breaking point, and that much, Ellis could empathize with.

Still, he couldn't feel much beyond his fury, even as he swallowed it down and collected his composure. Ain't no use in harassin' him, when he's already on edge. Firm. Just be... firm, but don't scare him none.

"I know you set the bridge off." he stated, unable to hold back a bitter edge from his voice. "I ain't lookin' tuh cause trouble, but we gotta get shit straight, okay, bud? I gotta know you ain't gonna do that again. We - lost - friends, 'cause'uv you. I gotta know you ain't gonna do that again."

Two thuds, almost in unison, struck onto the door, as if the man had planted his palms against it in some abrupt slap. Ellis was not startled that time, frowning as the man's voice turned into a hiss. "You keep coming. I learned my lesson, already. Had to stop you. But you keep coming, and the helicopter, and the ship, and if you keep coming, they'll keep -"

A cold sensation pinned Ellis there, eyes widening, voice raising before he could stop himself. He did not know if he felt excitement or fear, or some bloated mixture of both. "Ship? Whut do you mean, 'the ship'?"

"Don't remember the name." He spoke as if mostly to himself, mumbling. "Knew it once, maybe." The sigh that sounded from the other side of the door preceded the man quieting, voice growing tired, a tremble returning to it. "There's a ship, pacing. Up the coast, down the coast. Every... week, maybe? Few days? Don't remember. But I don't think they're... I don't know if they're..."

Ellis could not help but press, leaning closer, an agitated tension clutching at his shoulders. He couldn't control the desperation that entered his voice. "You've seen a ship? The same ship, passin' by? When was the last time?"

"An ark, or a Trojan horse." the man murmured - he laughed, then, a soft set of giggles that fell to a listless silence soon after. Only with a grunt did he continue, frustration rising as if to match Ellis' at a delay. "Can't trust you. I can't trust anyone. So I'll make you leave. Again."

Panic shot Ellis' spine straight, and he could hear the shuffle as the man stood, pushing off the door. He could only assume the worst; his intent was to set off the bridge once more. It was unlikely to lower, as broken as it was, but the sirens would likely still function. He could not let it happen.

"Wait -" he shouted, driven to his feet as desperation quickened his voice into a flustered, "Wait, man! The Tank'll get you, too, if you bring it over here! We ain't gonna kill it!"

But the man did not speak again.

Ellis, only half-cognizant around the terror flooding him, grabbed for the door handle and twisted. The door opened, but quickly jammed against something blockading it from the inside. The fact it wasn't locked came as a shock, and he barely allowed himself time to process before he was turning his shoulder forward.
"Stop, please!" he shouted, voice trembling, but received no response. The Georgian reeled back a step before he slammed his body-weight into the door, grunting as the impact sent a shock through him, pain sparking in his shoulder.

Whatever was blocking it was not so heavy as to be immovable, and it only took the one blow to knock it back just enough to open a space he could squeeze through - but he hesitated. There was no way to know if the man had a weapon, or a gun. If he was willing to kill them by proxy, it was not so far a leap to cause them harm directly.

I can't let him set off the sirens. We can't handle this.

There were two options before them: run and hope to escape before the arrival of the Tank and whatever infected were alerted, or stop him. The former was not only unlikely, but it also did not take into account the risk of their lost teammates returning to the area. With that thought, he knew there was no alternative.

I gotta make sure it's safe fer them.

Inhaling sharply, Ellis reached to brace his fingers against the inside of the threshold, and shoved through the gap. A slim table had been lodged beneath the handle and braced against the steel-panel floor, but it was knocked aside as his body pried the door open a little more. It was only a half-hearted attempt at a barricade, considering the ladder had restricted access to the platform entirely.

"Stop -" he gasped out, but any further word died on his tongue.

The control room was dim, sheets and tarps drawn messily over the windows that encircled the top half of the building. He could only just make out the clumsy assortment of plastic lawn chairs drawn into a loose gaggle, covered over with blankets as if to form something like a bed.

The stench was overwhelming. It was rot and waste, acrid ammonia stinging at his eyes and nose. The air itself felt heavy, and he couldn't fight the urge to recoil at the density of it, as if the smell itself might precipitate against his skin. He staggered, his free hand going reflexively to his mouth as if to stifle it.

The scream that sounded out made him stiffen, and he raised his gun as the darkness ahead coagulated into the outline of a shirtless figure, sprinting the few strides between them. "No! You can't be here!"

It was the fear on the man's face - pale, but human - that made him hesitate. He couldn't convince himself to shoot, even as his survival instinct drove a desperate feeling into the back of his skull, an alarm blaring through his nerves, demanding he fight back. The man's approach was too wild, too much like a zombie charging toward him, and his finger twitched but did not settle against the trigger.

Then the man's left arm swung out, and a steel length of pipe cracked into the back of Ellis' hand. He yelped, the gun dropping from his grasp as he jerked his arm back from the blow, yanking his hand to his chest as pain sparked through his fingers and up his wrist.

The stranger advanced, shrieking with a desperate fury. "No! Get out!"

He gripped the pipe with both hands and shoved it flat against Ellis' chest, like he were trying to force him back through the doorway. It was less an attempt to injure him, and more a panicked attempt to get him to retreat. The man was thin, but adrenaline seemed to lend him awful strength.
"Ain't lettin' you set off a damn horde!" Ellis shouted, and scrabbled out with his uninjured hand, catching his nails on on the man's forearm.

He dug in, clawing, trying to shove the other man away in the same motion he tried to keep his own balance with the grasp. He did not mean to sink his nails into skin, but adrenaline tightened his grip, whether he wanted it to or not. He felt them tear and felt blood gather against his fingertips, and the way it made his skin crawl didn't stop him.

When the stranger howled out a startling sound of agony and jerked backwards, ripping out of the Georgian's grip, Ellis threw his elbow up to defend himself from another blow.

It never came.

Panting, they both stood but a few feet apart, the gun sitting between them on the ground. Ellis tentatively lowered his arm from in front of his face, just an inch, eyes wide and unsure as he peeked over his forearm. He watched as the other man's jaw trembled, and his posture collapsed, and tears flooded his mottled and bloodshot brown eyes.

"It's too late." he moaned out, lifting his left arm and gazing down at the streaks where Ellis' nails had torn crescent marks into the skin. The wounds on Ellis' wrists had left tacky blood smeared where he'd touched the other man, matted into the hair there, mixing with the fresh-smeared ruby colour. The half-formed handprint sat like blunt evidence against his skin. "All for nothing."

It took a moment for it to click. Ellis was so winded and flushed with adrenaline that his brain moved sluggishly - but it all made sense, then, and he stumbled a step back as he realized what he'd done. Dread cut cold through him, a sick and dizzy feeling; where they had had only good intentions in meeting Carmine, ignorant of the contagion as they spread it, he knew this time. He'd known, and not considered the consequences.

"Y-you..." Ellis whimpered, almost airless, terror making his fingers tremble. "You... ain't a-a... Carrier?" His voice caught in his throat as he forced out a babble, urgently. "You don't know - we don't know nothin', you might be - it's been weeks. It might be okay! You would'uh gotten sick by now! Maybe it don't -"

Surging into motion, the man suddenly dropped, grabbing for the pistol Ellis had dropped on the ground.

The Georgian shouted out denial, panic driving him to scrabble backwards rather than rush forward to try and beat him to the weapon, putting both his hands up as if he could somehow defend himself from the oncoming shot. He couldn't get through the door fast enough, would never get outside in time. He could feel only the hot clutch of regret, the gasped inhale of shock like his body had struck a frigid pool.

The distance he put between them in the motion meant there was nothing he could do but stiffen when the man straightened, glanced up at him, and set the muzzle of the gun against his own jaw.

He whispered, hoarse, gaze distant and glassy. "Better safe than sorry."

Ellis did not close his eyes in time to miss the flash of gunfire, lighting up the man's face as the bullet shattered up through his jaw, splitting the meat of his cheek and bursting into the hollow of his eye. The red that gushed in to fill the void was replaced with darkness, and the thud of his body striking the ground made Ellis' stomach turn. Worse, was the soft sucking sounds as he inhaled a few wet breaths, alive just a moment longer before he stilled on the ground.
The gore was different. It wasn't the same as the stripped-open meat of infected, and the smell of raw, fresh coppery blood struck him amidst the smell of waste. He turned, and all he could do was cover his face with his palm, huffing against it as his breath turned shallow and high in his chest. Shock froze him there, spine crawling with the urge to vomit, the urge to run. He could do neither.

The tower shook gently beneath his feet as bodies rushed up the ladder, and he could hear his teammates yelling - knew he should yell back to confirm he was alive - but he couldn't get out a word. The muscles of his throat sat paralyzed, until even the inhale and exhale of his breath rasped through a strained windpipe. I didn't mean to. I didn't mean - I didn't know -

His eyes flickered open, filling with tears and widening, reflexively shifting to take in the walls of the control tower as they came into blurry focus. They looked anywhere but the corpse just a few feet in front of him. His vision had adjusted to the dimness of the control tower's inner space, and he could suddenly make it out.

Some of it was in marker. Some of it was scratches into the metal of the tower's internal walls by some sharp implement. Some of it was painted in blacks and reds and substances he did not want to think on.

It was everywhere.
Better safe than sorry.
Moments blurred together.

Ellis remembered, vaguely, being pulled out of the tower. He remembered taking the ladder, one rung at a time, his hands and knees stiff as styrofoam. He remembered settling down on the road, inches away from the ruined corpses of the infected his teammates had dispatched.

He did not remember what Rochelle said to him.

He did not remember when Christophe had sat next to him, but the man was there, his arm wrapped around Ellis' waist and cheek settled on his shoulder. He did not remember if they'd said anything to one another; it felt like he hadn't talked in days.

The world moved slowly around him, light skating in dizzy tracks that burned into his vision, and it took everything he had to remember to breathe.

"I killed him." he mumbled, and he wasn't sure if he'd said it aloud or not until Chris' arm tightened against him. He felt numb, and that numbness translated to a sparking pain when Chris' touch intensified, like the sting of a pinched nerve. "I didn't mean tuh - I didn't think about... I broke intuh his base, 'n'he wasn't a Carrier, 'n'... I didn't think. I killed him."

The Spaniard stayed quiet, head turning to bury tighter into his shoulder. He did not know how to respond, perhaps, or knew there was nothing to say.

Ellis closed his eyes, brows scrunching as if to fend off tears, but they did not come. He couldn't bring himself to cry. The emotion sat at a distance from him, packed so tightly with shock that he couldn't dig his way to it. It seemed wrong to not cry.

Everything seemed wrong.

"I... I killed him, Chris. It ain't like Jerry, 'cause that was an accident, it's... he shot himself, 'cause I cut him, 'n'he figured he was gonna turn." He could not stop talking, like it was all tied together in a string and buried deep in his chest. He'd begun pulling it out, and there was nothing to do but keep pulling and drawing it free, because the alternative was to choke and suffocate. "He tried tuh stop me from comin' in but I fought him - I fought him like'uh damn zombie, Chris, I - "

Hands touched onto his shoulders, and he jolted at the touch that was clearly not Christophe. Fingers gripped against him, tight enough to ache at his sore muscles, and Rhiannon's face was suddenly craned down next to his, like she was bent down behind him.

"You didn't do shit, dude." she murmured, and her voice was the closest to soft he'd ever heard it. "It's not your fault."

But he twisted, pulling suddenly away from both of them, scrambling forward to sit on his knees. He fisted his hands against his jeans, gritting his teeth and shaking his head, ignoring the way his right hand ached. "I was angry. Couldn't even talk him down. All I did was set him off, 'n'... Why'd y'all let me go up? Why'd I think I could fuckin' - "

Ellis lifted his hands, staring down at the blood caught under his fingernails. Anger punched a hole in the numbness filling him up, but it wasn't what he'd wanted to find. It didn't make him feel better, but at least it made him feel.
Neither of them continued to push.

"I can't keep doin' this," he whispered, and wrapped his arms around his chest, leaning forward and ducking his head. "I can't. All I did was make things worse. I-I dunno - I dunno whut I'm doin' anymore. I can't hardly... think. I can't hardly -"

He finally ran out of breath, sucking in a sharp inhale and grimacing his eyes closed. He shivered, despite himself, because the darkness behind his eyelids were stamped with images he did not want to see. Closing his eyes was trading one hell for another.

So he reopened them, and he stood.

Ellis' body barely held, legs quivering with his weight, as he took a half-step forward he gazed out toward the bridge. He could hear the shuffled discontent behind him, as if both his teammates started to stop him and then withdrew when he advanced no further.

"I dunno whut tuh do."

It felt like giving up. It felt like he'd finally surrendered. He spat out the truth and it sizzled on the asphalt beneath his feet, and there was nothing to do. There was no way out. There was no solution. There was no certainty, nor sense, nor reason.

There had always been a way out, always been a way forward. He'd always seen his way through any situation, even if that had been to doggedly continue until a solution made itself apparent. He did not give up.

But who was he, anymore?

He reached down blindly and grabbed the walkie-talkie off his hip, lifting it up to stare down at the controls. His jaw was glued shut until he was forced to huff in and out through his nose, and he couldn't help but shiver, could barely stand to look at it. I'll just mess it up, like I mess everything else up.

Thrusting the radio back over his shoulder, he shook his head. "Somebody else take this. I can't." he forced out, aware that his hand was trembling.

He felt weak.

He wasn't sure who took it from him, and he did not look to confirm. He started walking, stepping into the road and turning to advance toward the canal. He could feel a presence behind him, but they made no move to stop him, and he made no attempt to acknowledge them.

The end of the road frightened him, the broken bridge looming over his head, but he did not allow himself the chance to hesitate. Ellis pushed forward, gripping onto the waist-high security gate that barred access to the edge, and leaned in to stare down toward the water. The ocean breeze tugged at his clothing, the salty air humid and tacky against his skin.

It was calm, comparatively, to when they'd last seen it. The water slopped idly against the walls of the canal, ripples and waves echoing in on each other, but ultimately forced into a gentle pull out to sea. The tide caused gentle whirls as both forces collided near the mouth of the shore, but the outward current won out.

Detritus floated along the edges, where pieces of wood and torn fabric had gotten caught against the barriers. There were no bodies, however, and certainly none in the shape and colour of their lost teammates.
It was just... water, and, staring down at it, Ellis felt something crumble in his chest.

He crossed his arms atop the barrier and buried his chin against his forearms, tucking his face low enough that his capbill hid everything but a sliver of moving water. He had not wanted to find anything, but finding nothing felt strangely hopeless.

I dunno whut tuh do. I dunno whut we're gonna do if we don't... find 'em...

Closing his eyes, Ellis buried his face tighter against his arms, and did not move. It was a few minutes before voices sounded behind him, and he listened without lifting his head.

"There's... nothing in there." Rochelle sounded shaken. She and Lena must have gone up to investigate the tower, he realized, putting the pieces together only in hindsight. "Seems like he holed himself up for a while, but he ran out of food. It's... it's not good."

Lena's voice carried a hoarseness to it when she agreed. "Yeah. Seriously gross. I don't think he was all there before this all happened."

Duller, Rhiannon's voice cut in, agitated. "What's it fuckin' matter? He tried to kill us. Twice. Good riddance." Ellis could hear the sucked inhale of protest, the beginnings of a disagreement from one of the other women, but the blonde sharply continued on. "Don't give me that shit. You and I both know Ellis doesn't get in a shouting match with a cocksucker who can get talked down."

There was a beat of silence, and suddenly, Rochelle choked out a laugh. When she spoke it was soft, and a little fractured. "You sound like Nick."

Nobody responded.

Subtle, gentle, footsteps came up behind him. A hand settled on the small of his back, and he knew it was Rochelle without looking. She stood at his flank a moment before she spoke, and when she did, it was at a whisper. "What happened, sweetie? Do you want to talk about it, or -"

And he didn't. He didn't want to explain the events a second time, and certainly not when he felt more in control of himself. He'd have to think through and compose the words rather than allowing them to pour out of him, and he didn't know if he had the energy to do so. It would hurt more, this time, and he couldn't do it.

"He saw a boat." Ellis interrupted, muttered into his forearm, and he felt Rochelle's hand stiffen against him. He lifted his chin, staring forward and up at the broken shapes of what was left of the raised bridge. "It's patrollin', I guess, along the coast. He didn't say much more'n that, but... it's probably the same boat the other guy saw, huh?"

Suddenly, driven by excitement as much as surprise, Rochelle pulled away from him. He glanced over his shoulder to watch her put her knuckles against her mouth and take a few stuttered steps down the road. "Seriously?" she hushed in a gently awed tone of voice. "That's... that's good news, right? When did -"

Before she could continue, Ellis shook his head, a bitterness jutting his jaw forward and muffling his speech when he responded, "He said it... passed by every week or so. That's all he said. Before - y'know." His right hand gestured loosely toward the tower, as if to indicate the scene within.

He felt the weight of the silence that followed, but Rochelle spoke before it could escalate to something uncomfortable. She started to pace a few steps back and forth across the asphalt, her eyes narrowing. "If they're patrolling, whether it's the government or not, they have to be looking for people."
"You'd think." Lena admitted, her voice low. When Ellis glanced at her, he found some uncertainty on her features. "But just because they've been looking doesn't mean they'll look forever. If you guys want to catch their attention, you have to assume the next time might be the last time."

His mouth tightened, working its way toward a frown. The implication was clear; if they saw the boat before they saw their teammates again, they might surrender the chance for rescue. Their choice might well be binary: escape and abandon their friends, or not.

"There ain't no world where we go anywhere without 'em." he responded, harsh, though he didn't intend to direct it at her. "Not while we... ain't sure. Not while they could still be out here."

The biker nodded, firmly, her eyes softening. "I know. And I'm not arguing with that, just... being realistic. If that's the call, that's the call." She splayed her fingers in a plaintive gesture, apologetic, as she gestured to indicate her sister. "We'll do whatever y'all need."

Rhiannon's eyes narrowed as she nodded her chin up, just once.

Rochelle's body twisted, facing Ellis abruptly, a thoughtful purse to her lips. "Every few weeks. And he didn't say when the last time it was here was?" When he shook his head, she waved a hand up. "We need to get oceanside. We need to start watching for it, if we're going to have any hope of figuring this out."

It was Christophe who piped up, his body shifting uncomfortably where he stood. "This is good, but... we look for the others, first, ¿sí?"

Clasping her hands together, Rochelle bit at the inside of her cheek. "We have no idea where they went. "We need to get oceanside. We need to start watching for it, if we're going to have any hope of figuring this out."

It was Christophe who piped up, his body shifting uncomfortably where he stood. "This is good, but... we look for the others, first, ¿sí?"

Pushing off the gate, Ellis blinked, lifting his hand to rub at his cheek. The motion stung, and he withdrew the touch in order to gaze at his fingers. His hand was swollen, first at the heel where the bite-mark from Maggie had settled into a light flushed colour, and then at the knuckles where the pipe had struck him.

It hurt, and flexing his fingers hurt worse.

"... Okay." he agreed. When he looked up, Rochelle's eyes were on him, both expectant and concerned. He steadied himself, and dropped his arm. "That... makes sense tuh me. If they don't turn up, then we keep lookin', but... headin' tuh the crash sounds like whut Coach'd say."

There was the smallest smile at the edges of her expression, just for a moment, before Rochelle turned away. She pushed her palms together and forced out a sharp breath, nodding. "Okay. Let's sweep the buildings around here for supplies, go from there. I'd still like to leave a message for the boys."

With a dull snort, Lena thumbed over her shoulder. "Tower dude had some paint." she suggested.

Ellis' nose wrinkled, and his head tilted to one side. He started walking up the road to come parallel with Rochelle, falling into step with her. "Pretty sure that weren't paint, girl." he countered.

"Let me have my denial, sunshine." the elder biker intoned, wearily, and the sour look that crossed her face almost made him laugh.
Moments blurred together.

It took some time for Coach to speak. He allowed Nick some space, some time, but neither extended infinitely. As they halted near a cluster of reeds clotted up with broken furniture and Coach began to kick through it, hefting a wooden chairleg with a critical eye that found it wanting, he did not speak.

When they continued on, their footsteps disturbing crickets and tiny fish hidden away in the reeds they crushed underfoot, he did not speak.

When they halted, suddenly, and Nick's attention was jerked upwards to spot a few infected wandering in the marsh ahead of them, he did not speak. He did, however, grab Nick's sleeve and pull him closer, leading him at a diagonal to cut away from the river itself and give them a berth.

It was only as they got some distance between them and that cluster of infected that Coach finally talked.

"You know, I think my ass finally gets why my wife left me."

The statement was so startling, so out of nowhere, that Nick couldn't do much but stare in surprise at the man's back. He'd taken to holding his injured arm, bracing it even further in its makeshift sling, trying to keep the jostle of movement from hurting more than it needed to.

"I mean, I always knew. She told me. It wasn't me gettin' old an' fat, much as you'd wanna blame that. Nah, it was us, you know? She didn't feel like I listened, or didn't feel like I cared, an' all the love we had got stale. She needed someone who was softer, I thought, who'd go'n give her roses, cry. She told me I didn't talk to her anymore, and I thought, damn. Our asses is talkin' right now."

A laugh choked out of Nick, and he swallowed it as quickly as he could, unsure if it was the right response. He stepped carefully over a sheet of corrugated metal lodged halfway in the muck, like a panel off a tin roof, a few shattered fragments of other pieces of thin metal nailed to its edges.

It was easier than the last time they'd slogged through muck and water. At least this time, they could see safety in the distance, the estuary marshlands flat enough that not much was blocking their view.

They still had a ways to walk, especially with Coach's leg slowing them atop Nick's injury. He didn't seem to be in tremendous pain, but his balance suffered on every other step. His knee was acting up, no doubt, after the strain of the fall and swimming in the canal.

"But I get it, I think. Easy 'nough to nod an' say 'yes ma'am' when she asks fo' somethin', shake yo' head and say 'no ma'am' when she asks if you need somethin'. But where's that leave either of you? When does shit change?"

Nick wanted to shrug his shoulders, but didn't risk it. He settled for trying to inject it into his tone. "When you get divorced."

It was Coach's turn to laugh and then summarily stifle it. He glanced over his shoulder with a sour look, though it softened, as if Nick's exhaustion was palpable enough to stir his sympathy. He continued, as if the other man hadn't spoken. "I thought I always did us a kindness by bein' no trouble. Thought I was easy, an' that was a virtue. Problem is, when you let all the bad shit just roll off, I think you don't never get to the good shit. Ain't real. We just coasted."

Frowning, Nick directed his gaze down to his feet - or what he could see of them between footsteps, submerged in the marsh. It was tempting to listen in silence, but it was too late for reservations. He spoke at a mutter. "And what if you're so used to living waist-deep in the bad shit, you don't know what the fuck 'the good shit' is even supposed to be?"

The big man sighed out of the corner of his mouth, just a puff, and rubbed his face with a dirtied palm. "Well, ain't gonna find an answer on that one out here." He chuckled, faintly, and Nick couldn't help the smallest smirk in return, though the other man didn't see it. "Tell me, Nick. What was wrong wit' you and yo' ex? Fo' real."

Pain twisted in his gut. He did not want to discuss the subject. He didn't want to put himself on display any more than he already had, and it was easiest to recoil into a wry humour and mumble back, "My ex-wife, or Ellis?"

But Coach's response was a stoic, "Either.", and that deflated him. They walked quietly for a moment, and in that silence, Nick found himself genuinely torn.

Coach was the most likely to be honest with him, after all - Rochelle was a close second, but she believed in him a little too much. Coach was skeptical and hard-eyed and wouldn't give him any bullshit, even if the answer was hard to accept. I mean, shit. Worst to worst, I tell him the fuckin' truth, and he just agrees with me. At least then I'll have somebody on my side.

His mouth started moving before he could fully land on a decision. He wasn't sure if he'd chosen the cowardly option or not.

"She was... a lot of things. She was beautiful. Also a raging bitch." he muttered, and the soft sigh that left him was tired. "But she was honest. She never loved me, and she never pretended to. We were... fuck-buddies with a piece of paper to make it official. She married me so she'd have a parachute when she got sick of me. And I... let her do it, agreed to it, because I'd just got loaded and I wanted some arm-candy."

Coach didn't say anything, and Nick was sure it wasn't because he didn't have anything to say.

"So, what's there to explain? We were two shitbags who deserved each other. Shockin' nobody, we didn't last." He wagged his chin, as if to gesture toward some unspoken pile of words he did not say. "Some... shit happened, the well ran dry, and she bolted. People like us, we don't do the through-thick-and-thin shit."

With a measured tone, Coach gestured over his shoulder, but did not look back. "Nick, I could say a lotta shit 'bout you, but fair-weather ain't one of 'em, much as you try an' convince us and yo'self otherwise." That was a startling sentiment, and if he hadn't continued, Nick might've had to respond. "Guessin' you loved her."

And that was, perhaps, harder to respond to.

The other man must've sensed his reluctance, because he laughed under his breath and offered a wry, "Don't take a genius, Nicky. Otherwise you wouldn't sound so damn bitter 'bout how she felt."

A snort escaped the gambler, and he glanced at his shoulder, shifting his grip on his forearm despite the way it hurt. His shoulder ached in a wave of heat and tingling sensitivity, like his joint was still coming to terms with the damage done. He couldn't blame it.

"I... don't love people, Sam. I want things they can give me, that's all. Loving someone takes shit I Coach halted, and the sudden way he turned to face the other man had Nick drawing up short in a reflexive defensive gesture. His eyes widened and darted to avert, feeling trapped, despite the open air above and around them. Coach, however, merely frowned.

"Love gets thrown yo' way whether you got the stones for it or not. You don't choose that shit, an' ain't nobody built from the ground up deservin' it. Shit comes at you an' you gotta shape up. You ain't got what it takes? Well, shit. If you want it, you best start diggin'. If you think you ain't got what it takes to push that rock up the hill, starin' at it sure ain't gonna make it move."

A heat burned at Nick's face, jaw clenching, eyes remaining far away from Coach's. Numbness, resignation, sunk into his chest, and he felt like he was mechanically regurgitating a series of well-memorized lines when he grated out a response. "That's bullshit. I'm not made for it, Sam. Someone always gets hurt, whether it's me or someone else, and it was... fine, before, but... I can't... it's gonna kill me, watching Ellis realize he was wrong about me, watching him -"

The ex-football player took one step closer, and it was enough to close the gap between them. He lifted his hand, index finger jabbing out to land squarely on Nick's sternum, hard. His eyes narrowed, and the Northerner had no option but to startle his face up and match gazes.

"That. That right there. You feel that? That feeling you just got, sayin' all that?"

Nick wasn't sure he felt much of anything, yet, but he could nod his head on the hypothetical - and Coach's gaze softened on him.

"You ask me, I would'a eaten my damn shoe before thinkin' I'd hear you say some shit like that." The man's head tilted, scalp gone rough-stubbled as his hair tried to grow back in, and he examined the other man's expression even as Nick forced it into a frustrated pinch. "But you mean it, don't you? You'd rather get on some boat or fall off a damn bridge than hurt him?"

Tilting his head low, narrowing his gaze down toward the marshy water collected in a grey foam around his ankles, Nick muttered, "It isn't like that." He could muster no larger protest, exhaustion drooping his shoulders. I thought it'd hurt me less, too. "You make it sound... romantic, or some shit."

Coach snorted, and its derisive edge made Nick startle again. "It ain't." he retorted, with a shrug, and the digit pressed into his chest jabbed a few times in a pointed gesture. "It's damn stupid, fo' one. Bein' selfish or playin' martyr ain't the only options, boy. The hell you think you were gonna do to us? You think Ellis ain't grievin' you right now? You think he'd've just picked up an' moved on? Any of the last week made you think that?"

The Northerner's mouth opened, but no sound came out, and Coach didn't let him try a second time.

"You love sittin' in yo' own mess, bein' all pity-me, but you gone an' fucked it up this time." His tone was blunt but unaggressive, and Nick couldn't find it in him to be offended. It was the truth, after all. "You got a family, now, whether you like it or not - an' a young man who loves you - an' you don't get to just bow out. You gotta see this one through, wherever it goes. You walk it up to the damn line, Nicolas."

"What if it's worse?" he spat out, quietly, hoarsely. He knew the frustration in his expression gave way to something weaker, more raw, but there was nothing to do about it. He took a half-step back, just enough to recoil from the fingertip prodded into his sternum. "What if I try, and it's even worse when it all fucking comes down?"
Coach's shoulders shrugged up, and there, the man raised a hand to catch fingertips on the soft shape of his own facial hair where it had thickened on his jaw and cheeks. He rubbed there, and sighed when his fingernails scraped off half-dried muck, and the next words he spoke were laced with a quiet unease.

"You think anything's gonna be worse than them watchin' you die? Can't tell if you're that selfish that you'd rather get off the hook and let 'em suffer, or that much a damn fool, thinkin' you ain't worth nothin' to us."

That stung.

Or, a little of both, huh?

A harsh breath escaped Nick, like a scoff, and he jerked his chin away. He thrust himself into a turn and staggered around Coach, walking past him, forcing his rusted joints into enough fervor that his steps kicked water up his heels. "You sure I ain't dead?" he muttered over his shoulder. "This isn't some fucking Georgia mire Purgatory? Because I didn't think my fucking guardian angel would be Tubs Mc-"

"Nicolas." Coach cut him off sharply, drawn into a stride after him. "Don't do that shit. Talk to me like a damn adult."

"I'm fucking done talking." he stated, harshly, but not even the anger he'd managed to summon up could quite convince him to genuinely outpace his teammate. He was fairly defenseless, after all. "Let's just fucking -"

With a frustrated little noise, Coach accelerated his steps. The pace exacerbated his limp, and even in just listening to the splashes, Nick could pick out the way one leg lagged behind. "You ain't hardly said shit, Nick. You're done listenin' is what you are, but you don't get to bury yo' head in the sand on this shit anymore. I kept my nose outta this shit, an' that was a damn mistake."

Nick expected the tirade, but he didn't expect the hand that grabbed at the back of his shirt. The fabric pulling taut yanked at his injured shoulder, and he yelped despite himself, the pain flashing hot and tight up into the muscles of his neck. It triggered an instinctive slump of his upper body, surrendering into the pull and halting as if that might ease the pain.

There, halted again, Coach's voice lowered. Nick did not look back at him.

"I don't care if y'all kids work things out. I don't. Honestly, I ain't sold on the idea of you an' Ellis, 'cause I think you beat on him too damn much an' he ain't had the steel to push back 'til you drove him half-wild wit' all this shit. But I don't care. All I care 'bout is both of y'all comin' out the other end. I want both of you on the other end of this, Nicolas, even if y'all can't stand each other."

There was a pause, there, and the fingers curled in his shirt softened in their grip, loosening, as Coach's voice weakened. "I'll be there, either way." It was, perhaps, the most frail he'd ever sounded. The word was not one Nick would have applied to the older man lightly.

"Don't know how much that matters, but it's all I got. I... ain't gonna watch you crawlin' into a hole, fallin' apart. I'm right the hell here, Nick, an' we're talkin'. So don't act like you ain't got nobody. Don't act like nobody cares. Yell at me all you want, Nick, but don't act like I don't care."

The water lapped against the denim of his jeans, already soaked-through, the sensation becoming almost white-noise. He stared down at its swirling and curling current, and muttered in a gasp, "You don't get it."
Maybe it was the way it punched out of him that made Coach take it seriously.

As Nick turned to glance back, the man's brown eyes flickered over his frame, considering him quietly. Nick hissed out, "I don't - I don't have anyone but you guys. Do you realize what the best case is for me, Coach? Do you realize what the happy ending for me is?" When Coach said nothing, Nick thrust out his left arm, abandoning his injured right one to hang loosely in its sling.

"It's you fuckers never finding your families - because the minute you do, I'm out. And maybe that's a fucking pipe-dream, because they're all fucking dead, and all you guys get is me as a fucking consolation prize. So I'm the fucking piece of shit who's glad you guys have nowhere else to go and no one else to go to. I'm the fucking piece of shit who couldn't find people he cared about until fucking Armageddon."

The sigh that left Coach was so near to exasperated, that Nick flinched on instinct.

"Nick, you are the dumbest muthafuckin' person I know. An' I taught boys' health class, so that's sayin' a damn lot." There was no anger in his voice - just exhaustion - when he shook his head. "It wouldn't change nothin'. You could tell me my wife an' daughter were standin' right behind me, and the second thing I'd say to 'em is introducin' you. You think you'd get pushed out? Naw, Nick. You ain't gonna get rid of us so easy."

The Northerner's gaze fell, landing on the mess of reeds stretched out around them, body slumping into a loose curve where he stood. He didn't want to feel relief, didn't want to feel the warmth that crawled tenderly into his chest. He didn't want to feel glad, or grateful, or any of the little squirming sensations that filled him up to his teeth.

He didn't want any of it, and that raised the next obvious question - why did it feel so caustic to him? Why did he want to reject it so badly, like he'd rejected Ellis, like he'd rejected them all?

I do want them, he realized, in a quiet way - the subtle and comfortable way that a truth settled in when it was nothing new. I love them, like I've... never... felt about anyone. I really do. Just doesn't mean fucking shit when I have no idea how to... do anything but fuck it up. It's just... worse, to know that I had something special and... ruined it.

God.

I ruined it.

He choked out a laugh, because it released some of the pressure pinned dangerously tight against his heart. "Got rid of Ellis just fine."

There, again, he saw a flash of agitation - but Coach didn't digress this time. His jaw pinched, eyes narrowed, and he thrust his shoulders up in a shrug. "If you're so damn sure Ellis is upset wit' you, why don't you do somethin' about it? If you're so damn sure he's wrong about you, why don't you step the hell up and start tryna be half what he thinks of you?"

It shouldn't have been so easy to say. It shouldn't have spilled out of him like he'd simply loosened his jaw and found water pouring from his lips, and he exhaled and his lungs squeezed yet more up - and maybe it wasn't easy. Maybe it was more like drowning, where it couldn't have been more unnatural, but his body did not have the cognizance to do otherwise.

"I don't know how."

Frowning, Coach didn't relax so much as falter. He shook his head and reached out to settle a palm against Nick's uninjured shoulder, a squeeze tightening his grip. "I meant what I said, Nicky. You tell me what you want, an' we'll get it. I'll help, if you let me. An' you best believe I ain't lettin' yo' ass off easy, so you can quit worryin' 'bout whether or not you'll manage."

It was a soft threat, yet comforting. Nick leaned into the touch before he could help it, gaze lifting to warily match with Coach's.

The man almost smiled, and for the briefest of moments, it felt like some long-lost memory, of the days when things had been easier between them. It felt familiar, and Nick craved familiarity more than anything.

"Think right now, what we both want is findin' 'em again, right?"

He nodded, and once again felt a childish collapse, a surrender. He had never needed to be led as much as he did in that moment - and Coach seemed to instinctively recognize that he'd reached the end of some tether. He nudged, guiding him into a turn, and they fell back into a slow advance through the knee-high water.

Nick didn't believe him, and he did not believe in himself - but it was nice, for a moment, to pretend they might forge through the reeds and end up in some better place.

It was nicer than the alternative.

End Notes

I have a Tumblr!

We have a Discord!

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!