The staccato noise of pebbles striking the road was enough to drive Rochelle insane. Seated beside her against the pawnshop wall, Ellis quietly plucked up bits of brick and concrete from the sidewalk around him and threw them into the street, squinting and aiming at little goals he drew out in his head.

tap tap clatter

Silence was nerve-wracking enough, sure, but Rochelle was pretty sure she was going to snap if he didn't stop soon. The sound was like a leaky faucet in the middle of the night, and her nerves were fraying. She bit her lower lip, eyes closed, reminding herself over and over that Ellis was just as worried as she was -

- that he didn't need the chiding -

- that he was just trying to distract himself -

thunk clatter

"Ellis, will you -" burst out of her in a mutter, teeth gritted. She immediately regretted the outburst, watching somewhat helplessly as Ellis jolted, snuck a tiny glance at her underneath the bill of his trucker cap, and lowered his hand to his knee. He seemed embarrassed, shyly rubbing at his leg.

"Uh.. oh." mumbled out of him, drawled voice lowered with a tender apology. Shifting his weight, the kid settled his forearms against his thighs, more fully turning his face toward her. "I was just passin' time. Didn't mean tuh bug you or nothin'."

The sigh that escaped Rochelle was almost frustrated, lifting up a hand to rub her fingertips into her eyes, full-bowed lips pulling into a grimace. She shook her head, slowly, voice a weak facsimile of reassurance. "No, no, it's.. okay. I'm sorry, okay? I'm just on edge, it wasn't your fault."

Ellis seemed a little surprised by the apology, his head straightening out to get his eyes better locked on Rochelle's face. A cocked grin peeked into life on his face as a small snort escaped him. He tried to lighten things with a tease, brows knotting over clouded, tired blue eyes. "Well, shit, Ro'. Don't make up yer mind or nothin'."

It didn't really land well.

Rochelle spared a sharply annoyed glance toward his face, one that distinctly chided him and very successfully made him shy away, lips drawing into an 'o' of realization. He fell into a moment of silence, darting eyes toward the toes of his boots with a shy gulp.

He genuinely hadn't meant to sour her mood even worse. He'd grown too used to the mocking back-and-forth he had with Nick.

Ellis did know how to do one thing, though: apologize.

"... man, I'm sorry, Ro'." His voice was softened with the light regret of the badly-placed comment. He leaned himself closer to her, letting their shoulders touch with a warm and hesitant contact. When Rochelle seemed to soften, he included, "I ain't thinkin' real straight, I guess."
She smiled faintly at him, dropping her chin to hang her head. A deep sigh rustled past over-dry lips, taut with stress. "I'm just worried. I don't -" She bit her lower lip, teeth capturing abused skin and nipping till pale little indentations were left behind. Ellis was quiet, pinching his coveralls between fingertips idly. "...I don't know what to do."

Crossing her arms, Rochelle drew her knees up toward her chest and hugged them between her elbows. Sighing, she gripped onto her forearm with one hand and forced her head back to rest against the brick wall, squeezing her eyes shut.

"I feel responsible. I'm the one who ran into the Witch in the first place - if.. I'd been more careful, if I'd listened more closely, it wouldn't have been chasing us... And if I'd stopped him from leaving in the first place... God, I just.. I feel like I did this."

The more she spoke, the more her voice grew strained, something almost tortured to the way she gritted out words. Emotion tickled at the edges of her tone, threatening to break through some wall she was trying to build up, and Ellis could only nod.

"The way he screamed..." Reluctantly, slowly, she shook her head, forehead screwing up as she wrenched her eyes shut tighter. Her words made Ellis' mouth take a sharp downward tilt. "I've never heard anyone scream like that.. it's not like the zombies, Ellis, it's..."

Ellis' chin lowered, and something tightened in his chest. Deep down in the back of his mind, stirring with an intensity that halted his breath like mud, came images he'd tried to push out of his mind.

Jerry's face, blown to bits of raw bone and gushing blood. The blood bubbling between his fingers, white froth trickling down his beard like thick saliva. The way his teeth gleamed red and white as he lunged - snarling - for Ellis.

The raging, animalistic sounds that left him... and the pain, low and whining, behind every breath. Agonized. Like his life were trickling past his lips in muted screams.

Quietly, he muttered, "I, uh... I know..."

It took Rochelle a moment. Like it had slipped her mind - and maybe it had. Ellis wouldn't have blamed her, though he found himself with a little bit of a frown in the beat of silence afterwards. He sunk his chin an inch, embarrassed with himself for bringing it up.

With a slow hesitance, Rochelle forced her eyes over to examine Ellis' expression, lips pinching tightly. "Ah, sweetie, I'm sorry, I didn't mean to - ... I kind of forgot about... Jerry."

Flustered slightly, the Georgian reached up to catch fingertips on the brim of his trucker cap and nudge it down low over his eyes. "I shouldn't'uv brought it up." he uttered, regretfully. There was a moment of thought between them. Insecurity, maybe. A burgeoning moment of awkwardness, cut short when Rochelle's hand settled softly on Ellis' shoulder.
He lifted his head, and their gazes gently met.

"Do you want to talk about it?"

Rochelle smiled softly as Ellis raised his head, but the expression on his face was one of faint distress. Like he had a secret he couldn't share, but needed desperately off his chest - features tensed in a terrible mimicry of a half-smile.

Ellis looked small. "'M fine."

She pressed. It reminded her of the time they'd sat on the truck outside Carmine's house… only ghastlier. Colder. Ellis was withholding emotions that burned at him, ached, and Rochelle didn't quite know how to soothe him. "Are you sure..?"

He nodded his head gently, eyes lowering. When his fingers twitched toward a fragment of brick to scoop it up and bounce it in his palm, Rochelle relented to the idea that he'd be better off, for the moment, if she let it go. He'd come to her eventually.

She hoped.

Pointing, Rochelle indicated a grate across the street, inlaid into the gutter of the street and half-clogged with trash. A smile forced its way onto her face as she challenged, "Bet you can't make it into the sewers with that."

The last thing she expected was him to rebuff her. Ellis was always a snap to distract - but not this time.

Sighing, gently, Ellis draped his elbows on his knees and half-curled his fingers into fists. The bit of brick grasped between his thumb and middle finger fell, cracking into pieces against the sidewalk and scattering. He shrugged his shoulders as he brushed his dusty fingertips against one another.

"S'okay, Ro'." He smiled… or tried to, face stifled with bleary uncertainty. "Don't gotta do that fer me."

She frowned at the youth's response, lowering her voice and letting her gaze drop to her sleek, dirty boots. Rochelle leaned forward and hugged her knees, muttering, like it were an afterthought. "Think that was more for me, sweetheart. Jesus, it's weird seeing you upset."

Burying his mouth against his bicep, Ellis closed his eyes.

"Got bigger things tuh worry 'bout." he reaffirmed - as bravely as he could.

The grill, thrumming with the flames broiling in its belly, had raised the temperature in the room to a muggy high. Sweat was even thicker in the air than blood. Nick could feel the warm cling of his dress shirt hugging the small of his back, damp with perspiration. The unpleasant sensation put his teeth on edge, breath snorting through his nostrils.

His brain was cottony and thick. A certain dizziness played at the edges of his mind, and he fought it off by pure force of will. He was almost certain he had a fever, but there was no sense in bringing it up. Chances were good his shoulder was infected. Guess taking a gore-covered sword to the shoulder wasn't the best way to stay healthy.

But Nick losing it was the last thing they needed right now.

In all fairness, Coach had it just as bad: he was sweating straight through his shirt, dark stains etching down from his neck and armpits. It beaded up on his face, and he had this grim look of weary frustration all over his expression, but said nothing.

The ex-football player's shirtfront was already soaked through with blood, crusted overnight, and it had to be miserable sitting there.

He's tough, I'll give him that.

The machete had grown too hot to touch. Though it was mainly rubber on the grip, a strip of metal arching down at either side of the handle soaked up the heat and burned. Nick had taken the sleeve of his waist-tied suit jacket and wrapped it around the grip to protect his hand.

Although the flames were only little licking tongues, they burned hot on propane, and the steel blade was glowing a vibrant shade of red-orange. It stung at Nick's eyes just looking at it, and his knuckles felt singed by the proximity.

The atmosphere was tense within the pawnshop, silent and distended with uncertainty. Moving with all the tenderness he could, Coach carefully started to unwind the blood-soggy bandages from Chris' shoulder.

Red seeped from the fabric and painted his fingers crimson shades, but he kept at it, stiffening his jaw firmly. Wrapping his wound had staunched the bleeding, but removing the bandages would take away that security. They'd have to work fast.

Coach's belt was still strapped around the base of Chris' shoulder, chafing reddened flesh along the edges of the skintight leather, but Coach left it where it was. What little good it was doing to stop the worst of the bleeding was, at least, something.

Nick watched sideways, his wrist rotating slowly to turn the machete and lay it even closer to the flames. Chris' shoulder was not looking good. Between the raw skin inflamed around the makeshift tourniquet and the blood and discharge built up underneath the bandages, it drew Nick's brows together in disdain.

That was hardly the worst of it, even.
When Coach peeled away the last layer of bandages, the gambler felt a surge of nausea stiffen his body. It was raw flesh there, meat and muscle bared to the air and threaded with veins and fatty bubbles. Blood leaked sluggishly amidst congealing pus.

The Spaniard's anatomy was spliced open, like some slab of animal displayed on a store counter - and perhaps worst was the shattered flecks of bone jutting from his shoulder socket where the last fragments of his humerus remained.

Mesmerized for a horrible instant, Nick forced his gaze away, nostrils flaring in disgust as a slightly gagged cough escaped him. Coach reacted much the same - more to the smell, a flood of gore, than the sight.

"Holy fuck." he muttered, flicking his tongue out to wet his lips. "No offense, Coach, but - holy fuck. I don't know if we're gonna make this one." It wasn't anything he'd have said in front of the other two, and he was suddenly glad they'd left. At least he could be blunt.

Coach sighed, wearily, frowning as he examined Chris' face. If Nick could read his body language at all, he didn't seem to have much more confidence. "Gotta try, Nick. You're the one who reminded us."

The gambler snorted, shaking his head subtly, his gaze moving to the machete in his hand. Releasing it, he shook out his wrist, flexing singed fingers. "Yeah, yeah." he muttered shortly. "I'm just Mr. Positive."

Coach didn't even react.

"If we're doing this, we should do it quick. First thing's cleaning up a little." Nick's expression was drawn with a certain fierceness as he examined the leaking stump. "Lean him forward, away from the wall."

Coach moved to settle on the other side of Chris, getting an arm behind him and one in front of him to gently pull him away from the store counter. Nick focused on setting up as the eldest survivor got into an uncomfortable kneel.

They'd used nearly all the bandages they'd found trying to stop the bleeding overnight, as Nick discovered upon opening the main zipper of the backpack. There was one roll and a handful of square gauze patches stuffed inside, along with a second bottle of alcohol and a couple bottles of pills.

The labels on the front meant little to him, the generic names for drugs he didn't know. He did recognize one - oxycodone - and knew full well what '-cillin' indicated. Nick eyed them, judgingly, and gave one a slight rattle. He was pleased to feel them fairly full.

There were names printed on each one, but Nick made a deliberate effort not to pay them any mind. Wouldn't be the first or the last time they stole from the dead.

Coach must have been watching him, because he spoke up with an unprompted explanation, distracting him. "Know somethin' 'bout medication from my work at school. Had to work with the nurses, keep pills locked up an' dispense 'em. Recognized the labels."

Nick grunted, faintly, tossing the bottles back in the pack and plucking up one of the square gauze pads instead. Shifting back to kneel beside Chris, the gambler shrugged his good shoulder.

"Surprised someone didn't clear out all the drugs."

"Yeah, well. Any ransackin' they did was on the front, snatchin' things off shelves. Didn't spend time breakin' into the pharmacy." Coach gestured lightly toward the backpack with his head, gazing over Chris' head where the Spaniard had slumped against his chest. "Didn't do us much good on bandages, but those pills'll help."

Forcing out a sigh, Nick let his eyes fall half-lidded. "You realize, even if we get him through this, we're gonna be draining a lot of supplies keeping him alive? If things were desperate before..." There was a few inches of alcohol left in the first container they'd opened up, and he scooped it up, folding the gauze up in his hand and pressing it to the bottle's mouth. "It's gonna be hell trying to take care of him."

Coach's face was drawn in a frown, though it didn't really deepen or soften at Nick's words. He'd considered the idea before. "Yeah. Ain't got no other option."

Tipping the flask, Nick let the alcohol dampen the fabric for a moment, though not too much. He pushed the bottle back to the hardwood floor before leaning forward, gaze lowering to the bloodied mess of Chris' shoulder. "Fucker better earn it."

The thick layer of blood and pus needed to be taken care of before they took the blade to it. Sealing in infection would only kill him faster. The real procedure involved cutting out infected flesh - but for Chris, there wasn't much flesh to take. It was so high on his shoulder, any more cutting would only do more damage.

"... This ain't gonna be pretty." the gambler warned. Coach turned his gaze away slightly, but said nothing.

Using the damp gauze like one might use a napkin, fingertips pressing into the center and ignoring the burn as the liquid stung at nicks and scrapes, Nick cleaned at the gore built up on Chris' open wound. He flexed his jaw, trying not to lean his face too close.

"... This ain't gonna be pretty." the gambler warned. Coach turned his gaze away slightly, but said nothing.

Using the damp gauze like one might use a napkin, fingertips pressing into the center and ignoring the burn as the liquid stung at nicks and scrapes, Nick cleaned at the gore built up on Chris' open wound. He flexed his jaw, trying not to lean his face too close. Jesus.

The mixed grime of blood and pus came off in a clotted mess. The more a view of the Spaniard's shoulder Nick got, the more he regretted cleaning it off at all. As solidly as he held his expression, the gambler's stomach roiled and stiffened, an acrid taste in the back of his throat.

It was lucky they'd left the belt where it was; the spill of blood was bad enough with it there. As Nick moved in a careful circle, avoiding the fractured bone in the center for the moment, fresh blood came trickling out like the run-off of a squeezed sponge. It stained down Chris' side - half-bare, his shirt split open along his ribs - and speckled on Nick's pantlegs.

Not that now was the time to bemoan his clothing.

Tossing the gauze, now crimson and yellow with gore, to the hardwood flooring by his knee, Nick moved onto the next unpleasant task. Using his index and thumb like careful pinchers, he plucked the stray fragments of bone from the center of Chris' shoulder. It had already been sundered by the Witch, so it was just a matter of peeling the shards away from flesh.

The squelching sounds were awful, making Coach cringe and turn his chin away another few degrees. He muttered a gruff, "Sweet Jesus.", holding Chris slightly tighter. The Spaniard's breath was shallowing out, but he didn't seem to be stirring. Thank Christ.

Nick's fingertips grazed flesh, despite his attempts to keep them from touching, and a wet, bloody heat clung to his skin tighter than sweat. The bone was eerily slippery underneath his fingertips, and he tossed the flecked pieces aside with a thick huff.

“I've done some nasty stuff, but this... this takes the cake.” Nick managed with a heavy sheen of distaste, shaking his head in a quick motion. “Or the arm, I guess.” He laughed, sharp and harsh, and Coach seemed to glance at him, judgingly.

Like Nick going insane was a very real possibility.

“Man, no one can take a joke anymore.” the conman muttered.

Reaching back behind himself, Nick pulled another square of gauze from the pack, shaking it free from its siblings. He took a deep inhale (regretting the action when he tasted blood) and reached out to press it against Chris' shoulder, palming over the open wound.

He put harsh pressure against it for a moment, feeling hot blood leeching onto his hand. Coach forced himself to watch, tightening his grip on Chris' torso, but not before he gazed at the Spaniard's face. Pale and sweaty, features drawn in a faint look of distress, he looked, honestly, inches from death.

But still breathing.

“Okay.” Nick spoke, voice steady but growled with tension. “I'm gonna throw the rest of the alcohol on there, and then it's barbeque time. You good, Coach? It's gonna smell like hell. If you wanna back out, now's the time.”

The heavyset man just shook his head, simply. “Do it.” Nick supposed he must trust him, at least to some degree, though it was perhaps more out of a lack of alternatives than real confidence. I don't think he's ever really gonna trust me.

Smart guy.

Moving as if he'd practiced the gestures a hundred times over, Nick tossed the gauze aside and snatched up the near-empty alcohol bottle. He poured the remnants over Chris' open wound, wincing in silent sympathy, as his other hand snagged fingers in his suit jacket sleeve.

Getting it wrapped in his fingers, he gripped the handle of the machete, jutting out of the grill. Hefting the cherry-red sword, he growled slightly, finding his heart-rate uncharacteristically high.

Breathe, man. You got this.

If he didn't move fast, he'd lose his nerve. Nick couldn't let that happen. Not in front of Coach; not in front of anyone. Never.

Sweeping his wrist firmly, Nick settled the blade in line with Chris' severed arm, flattening it. Gritting his teeth, the gambler tightened his fingers on the handle, shifting his weight. One breath - drawn in past clenched teeth - and then he pushed forward till the steel surface flattened against Chris' skin.

The first sound Nick heard was hissing. Sizzling, like the sound of bacon slapped onto an oiled skillet. The stench of charring flesh stabbed sharp in his senses, making his head recoil and his eyes water. Coach let off a disgusted sound, a thick curse, but held tight onto the Spaniard.

And then Chris screamed.

It was a fierce, shrill sound - raking and cracking, pure, unfettered agony. He screamed, arching up with such a sudden jolt that it took Coach a moment to get his grip again. "Shit!" Coach swore, starting to get a hand up to clamp over the youth's mouth and stifle the noise.
"Don't!" Nick snarled, retracting the blade almost as soon as he'd touched it down. It crackled even after the contact ended, skin plucked off and stuck to the steel, burning in hissing speckles. The wound was blaring red, agitated and inflamed, blood popping before Nick's eyes. They weren't near done. "If he vomits, he'll choke. Just hold him!"

Coach cursed, but obeyed, leaning his face closer to Chris' ear so he could whisper. Nick couldn't catch a word, but neither, it seemed, could Chris. The youth let out these miserable gasps, keening, his chest surging in heaving breaths. His eyes rolled back, whites fluttering under his lids, sweat - and now tears - pouring down his face.

When Nick pressed the blade against his wound a second time, Chris vaulted right back into screaming. It was an awful noise, like nothing he'd ever heard before. Like dying. It echoed and rebounded, heightening, sharpening...

"Nick!" Rochelle was shouting, suddenly, voice echoing behind them from the doorway. There were tears to her voice, spat sorrow, and Nick growled.

He pulled the blade away again, narrowing his gaze tightly. Blood trickled from the meaty wound, but slower. Stuttered, almost, as some of the smaller veins burned closed under the blade. "We're not fucking stopping, Ro', it's too late. Get the fuck back outsi-"

"We've got incoming." she interrupted, voice sharp with a certain ferocity. Nick glanced back just long enough to see her face. If she was crying, she hid it well. "He's attracting a horde."

"Fucking Christ." Nick hissed, sharply, tightening his grip on the machete handle for a moment. His mind whirled for an instant, sparking - of course the horde would jump at screams. The sound of pain, directing them toward prey. "Just what we need."

Coach snapped a hand up to gesture for the door, bloody fingers circling. His voice was rough baritone, demanding. "Y'all set up at the door. Bottleneck them, safest way. Keep tight an' don't let them in!"

Rochelle nodded sharply, already turning at the heel to bolt back out and get Ellis. Nick lifted his head, glancing sideways at the football coach, jaw tightening. He didn't want to say it - the idea of doing this on his own was unpleasant, trying to hold down a screaming, writhing man... but he did anyway. "Do you want to -?"

"No." Coach grunted, firmly grappling Chris against his chest. Deepset eyes flicked up, examining Nick for a second before he uttered, "Yo' ass needs me." There was a little snark to the statement, weighty humor, and it left an ironic twang in Nick's mouth.

He snorted, closing his eyes for just one transient moment, one instant of focus.

"Yeah, well."

Blade touched flesh, and Chris' torn screams exploded free, in tune to the rising noises of the oncoming horde.

I’ve done some pretty nasty stuff... but this...

or the aim, I guess...

Man, no one can take a joke anymore...
Infected swarmed the pawnshop like maggots spawning on rotten meat, squirming and writhing, all mindless hunger and a unified need to kill. Their bodies struck the walls in thudding harmony. Screams wracked the air as they clawed at the brick sides of the squat store, fingertips blunted to bleeding stubs against the rough stone.

Some managed to climb to the roof, clambering up a sturdy gutter system and using each other for leverage. They were too blinded by rage and fever to find the front door at first. The horde's footsteps were like thunder, shaking the very foundations of the building underneath them.

Ellis wanted so badly to just close his eyes as their screaming peaked around them.

The high privacy windows built into the shop walls rattled, and cracking sounds filled the air as a few of the infected beat upon the glass with their palms. They barely withstood the onslaught, shatters touching the clear surface amidst splatters of blood and blackened grime.

It was like being in the maw of a hurricane. Too much noise, too much vibration, his heartbeat joining the chorus as it hammered against his ribcage in furious tempo. Rochelle was gripping his hand in the open air between them, crouched on either side of the broken door, their fingers tangled in white-knuckled comfort.

She had Coach's double-barreled shotgun braced against her thigh, at the ready, and Ellis held his own against his shoulder. The moment the horde converged before the door, they'd be prepared. Or so went the unspoken plan.

But Ellis was scared. And being scared scared him more than anything the apocalypse could have ever thrown at him.

Christophe screamed behind them, the putrid scent of sizzling flesh wafting through the air. His voice broke with agony, incomprehensible gasps and half-sobs laced into every keen. The smell, the sound... it was impossible to pinpoint which was worse. It was all a kind of horror that jarred Ellis from his body, numbing his limbs and glazing over his expression.

Rochelle was so pale she seemed a breath away from fainting, but the stubborn set to her jaw said otherwise. Her eyes, a warm black with shades of creamy brown that reflected in the light, darted sideways to catch onto Ellis' face.

"You okay, sweet-?" she started to whisper.

Maybe it was her voice, so close to the door, that finally did it. A shriek overhead sounded an instant before a body flashed into sight, a male zombie in dirtied swimshorts flinging itself off the edge of the roof straight in front of them. It hit the sidewalk face-first, and the collision snapped its neck in a gush of red against the grey cement.

The horde followed after.

Bodies poured like liquid off the roof, exploding with ferocious energy toward the doorway. All Ellis could see was glowing eyes and blurred movement, and his fingers broke away from Rochelle's in a panic. He jammed his shotgun into a firm line from his chest, pump settled in his palm, and blasted into the mess.

Blood splattered as his bullets tore through the first layer of infected, throwing them back into the
The injured were torn apart before his very eyes, the zombies behind them clawing into their backs and trampling them to the floor like they became nothing more than obstacles.

Gritting his teeth, Ellis whined faintly - shit, did the recoil from his shotgun hurt. He'd thought he would be so familiar with the gun that it wouldn't be an issue, yet with his injured rib, the blast shook his whole frame.

It quite nearly knocked the wind entirely out of him. Even as he forced himself to pull back the pump, shell casings flicking off by his elbow as new bullets loaded into the chamber, he found his lungs locking up in his gut and making it difficult to breathe. Stars sparked behind his eyes, balking him with a certain dizziness, and it was fortunate he wasn't alone.

Rochelle fell back onto her heel for support, Coach's shotgun making a thunderous noise as she shot the encroaching infected just as the closest vaulted through the doorway. The horde stomped on the fallen bodies reduced to bloodied shambles beneath its feet. There was a shriek of pain, and Ellis saw a bleeding forearm tumble to the floor in front of him, torn from its near-rotten moorings.

The infected hit dead-on by the blast were blown back, crushing those behind them with the force of the collision... but the horde recovered like wiggling gelatin. Bodies crammed closer, shrieking mouths and yellowed eyes surging forward.

"Get it together, Ellis!" Rochelle snapped, tone suddenly miles harsher than Ellis expected. "I can't do this on my own!" The frustration in her voice stabbed a tiny splinter of hurt in the Georgian's heart, but he obeyed swiftly, snapping his teeth together, hard.

She was right.

Sliding closer to her, Ellis took up a stiff stance, breathing shallowly through his nostrils. They picked up a rhythm back and forth, trading shots to keep the horde at bay. Every shot thickened the number of dead at the doorway, every new body making it a little harder for the infected to get through.

The screams never ended. Ellis couldn't tell what was infected and what was Chris; rage and pain mixed in the air, musky and thick. He could still distinctly smell burning flesh, even with the intense stench of entrails and decay in front of him.

The sound of a shattering window echoed behind him, glass tinkling like crystallized rain down on the pawn shop floor. Ellis shot a cursory glance back toward it, but the fallen glass was far enough away from Coach and Nick, and there were no infected trying to shove itself inside through the new opening. He returned his focus forward -

- just in time to see one of the infected trampled underfoot was still alive. It crawled its body forward on shaking, clawing hands, trying to pull itself out from under the weight of several corpses atop it.

Ellis let off a "Ro!" in warning, but he'd barely even said her name before Rochelle shifted her weight, throwing her balance onto the ball of her left foot. Swinging her leg with a fierce snap of her knee, she kicked the toe of her boot straight into the zombie's face.

A loud crack said something broke, and it thudded flat against the hardwood floor. Its fingers twitched in strange, grasping patterns for what seemed like an eternity, even after its death.

It never even got its legs free.
Stepping back onto both feet, Rochelle took a potshot at the horde, barely even sparing a moment to aim. "Thanks." Although several infected fell under her gun, going down hard as the spray of bullets tore through their fragile insides, one zombie stumbled just in time to dodge out of the line of fire.

It lunged toward Ellis as it got its balance, snarling furiously with quickly-raising hands. The Georgian shoved his gun up to shoot, but as he pulled the trigger, the zombie grabbed the gun in a blind claw.

The barrel jolted down as the staggering infected's weight leaned on it, and when it went off, the bullets buried half in the ground and half in the zombie's legs. Undeterred by the damage done, it clawed toward him, shoving the gun out of the way.

Any other day, the fiery Southerner could've shoved the zombie back at least enough to get some breathing room - but his rib gave a fierce, stabbing throb that stole his breath when he tried to push it away. Rochelle's voice called his name, but his vision flickered in agony as the infected tackled him backwards.

They hit the wood floor in a tangle, Ellis losing his grip on his shotgun as the thud made him cry out. She squirmed on top of him, narrowly missing his crotch with an errant knee, nostrils flaring like an animal as she lurched her mouth toward his face.

Blearily, Ellis had enough sense to get his hands up, and he grabbed for the woman's scraggly red hair. He buried his fingers in the oily strands and locked his elbows straight to keep her gnashing teeth away.

She snarled with bulging yellow eyes, her hands clawing at his wrists first, leaving scrapes from her broken nails - and then beating against his chest and face. She struck at whatever she could reach. It was like being stomped on all over again, the pain throbbing in his sternum and along the frame of his ribcage.

"Shit!" he stuttered, twisting his face away when one of the flailing claws caught him in the jaw, ragged nail cutting skin. "Shit-"

"Ellis -" Rochelle's voice warned, reaching a frantic pitch. "I can't..!" She couldn't stop shooting long enough to help him, her shotgun blasts barely enough to keep the horde at bay without Ellis at her side. She struggled alone, using the already-bloodied toe of her boot to kick the feet out from under the zombie facing her down. She took advantage of the seconds it earned her to reload.

Grinding his teeth, Ellis let go of the zombie's hair just long enough to curl the fingers of his right hand into a fist and wind his arm back. All his scattered instinct honed in on coiling the muscle in his arm, bicep and shoulder tightening, and he swung with wrenched desperation to slug her across the face.

Her head snapped back, mouth gaping widely as blood gushed down her upper lip. It earned him a respite from the strikes of her hands - but only a momentary one. The blow didn't faze her, didn't disorient her like it would a normal human.

She gasped, snarled, and refocused down on him the moment her head completed its recoil.

Ellis braced himself to wrestle with her again, tensing up at the sight of blood- and dirt-flecked teeth... and then a hole, messily driven through her flesh by the heat of a bullet, appeared in the center of her face. Her skin shuddered with split-second impact, cartilage and bone shattered with a soft crack, denting in her features and blowing out flesh.
The distinct, thunderous gunshot came from behind Ellis, nothing like the heavily recoiled blast of Rochelle's double-barrel, repeating over and over as the woman fought the horde back.

The infected half-straddling Ellis to the ground collapsed forward on top of him, dead.

A strangled noise left the Georgian, blood spattering onto his face from the leaking opening in her face. He roughly pushed her body off of his before her head could loll onto his shoulder, squirming up onto an elbow and palming the blood off of his face in disgust.

He shot a glance over his shoulder, and the sight sent a shiver up his spine.

Nick was twisted around on a knee, steely green eyes sharp as broken glass, his Magnum leveled upon Ellis with a straight arm and steadied with his other hand cupped over the grip. His teeth bared in a slim line between his lips, a haunted shadow over the planes of his face. There was so much coiled anger, fractured emotion, in the tension of his pose.

Ellis' mind wandered for just a split second. Kinda badass.

Breaking through the dizzied, pained glaze humming over the Georgian's consciousness, the gambler's mouth moved - and then the words formed, delayed in Ellis' comprehension.

"Get up, dumbshit!"

Shaking his head furiously, as though the gesture might clear his mind, Ellis kicked the infected woman entirely off his body, gritting his teeth through the pain. Nick turned back toward Chris the moment the other man started to move, sliding his gun back into the holster attached at his thigh.

If Ellis just breathed shallowly, the pain wasn't overbearing.

Scrambling to pick up his dropped shotgun and get it back into his hands, Ellis scooted a knee under himself and took a kneel. He started to raise it up, steadying to aim for the door and help Rochelle, but a shadow flashed in the corner of his eye before he entirely looked away.

For an instant, he thought it was just an imagined flash in his vision - but when he twisted his head back, hunting it out, his gaze caught onto the spiderlike shape of a Hunter. It was bundled up in a dark sweatshirt, crawling a lithe body through the window previously broken open.

It moved almost tenderly, body coiled up in a tiny spring, timing its squirming motions to the blasts of Rochelle's shotgun as if in a conscious, sapient attempt at stealth. The Hunter growled eagerly, head cocking up in interest as Christophe screamed for what felt like the hundredth time.

The Spaniard barely even sounded human anymore. His voice was so rough it was like cracking, splintering wood.

The Georgian moved faster than he thought he could, adrenaline numbing the pains in his body. He shot once at the doorway to support Rochelle, body shuddering with the blast - then spun on his knee to face the window, pumping his shotgun in the same motion, taking careful aim at the coiled Hunter.

The Hunter gave a fierce cry, seizing with the strike of bullets through its body. It lashed out at the air before it jerked violently and fell limp, hooked over the edge of the window like a draped towel. The sound made Coach and Nick both startle, the gambler snapping his gaze up toward the window.

Nick glared almost accusatorially at the Hunter's corpse, lips moving faintly in some kind of muttered curse as he comprehended the situation. He slipped a glance back toward Ellis as he angled the machete into the grill to let it regain some heat, begrudgingly squinting at the youth in acknowledgement.

"We're even, brother!" Ellis laughed, breathless with pain as he blinked through sweat. Even injured and rattled, his hands shaking harshly on his shotgun, he managed to pull a smile. He turned to join Rochelle, moving with a limp. Nick couldn't help but grunt under his breath, aware of the kid's suffering.

But there was no time to think about him - a headache was burning in Nick's temples, the gunfire stabbing pins into the base of his skull, fracturing his focus. It was all he could do to keep his attention on Chris, and the Spaniard, unfortunately, needed it.

Nick fought a ragged frown, brow fierce over his eyes, examining Chris where the Spaniard shivered against Coach's chest. He looked like hell, eye sockets sunken and skin a clammy yellow. Sweat glistened on his skin, blood trickling from the corner of his mouth where he'd bitten his tongue.

His eyes were half-open, just paled white visible between his lids. He didn't react to anything - not the gunshots, not Nick's gaze, not Coach's touch - except the pain. Shudders touched the tendons in his neck as if, in his subconscious, he were flexing every muscle in his lost arm.

His shoulder was a sight Nick could've gone his life without experiencing. The flesh was burnt to a tinted grey-brown, blisters and wrinkled patches of burnt skin stemming the flow of blood from the open wound. The cauterization seemed to have worked, even if 'worked' was relative.

Nick didn't bother to look when the gunshots seemed to peter out, twisting his body to reach for the backpack on the floor beside him. The horde was reaching its end and it was long overdue - bodies lined the street in front of the pawnshop and bloated the doorway, fallen atop each other like a pile of dirty laundry.

The smell didn't even faze him, his senses already too overloaded to process any more. Digging through the backpack, Nick growled slightly, speaking over the last few gunshots that rang out as Rochelle and Ellis finished off the stragglers. "No cream or anything?"

Coach shook his head. The eldest had an expression stonier than Nick had ever seen, craning his neck to rub his sweat-doused cheek off on his shoulder. "Didn't find shit. We got pills, but I dunno how you wanna make him take'em. Used up most our bandages wrappin' him the first time."

Sighing in frustration, Nick gazed at Chris' wrecked shoulder. They'd need to get it covered... and change it later... and they needed some extra in case anyone else got hurt... and there was no way that they'd have enough, Nick knew that much already.

The gambler's hands were unsteady and it agitated him.

"... Fine."

Moving almost angrily, Nick reached down, untying his suit jacket from around his waist. The wrinkled, beaten fabric felt thin in his hands, defeated - and Nick shook it out, getting a grip on one side and fisting his fingers in the cloth.

Coach opened his mouth, but couldn't get words out before Nick violently tore his hands apart. Tearing along scratches and holes already marring the jacket's fabric, he ripped a jagged strip from the bottom of the jacket's torso. His shoulder protested, but the pain only made him angrier and pull harder.

Draping the makeshift bandage over his shoulder, Nick got his grip on the next few inches and tore another lengthy piece off. If the jacket resisted him, he grabbed up the still-hot machete and hacked a line through it before continuing to tear it apart.

Maybe it was the fact that Rochelle and Ellis had finally stopped shooting, or that the horde had fallen quiet, or that Chris wasn't screaming anymore -

- but the silence in the pawnshop was so deafening, all anyone heard for the long few moments afterward was the sound of fabric tearing.
"We shouldn't really try to move him." Rochelle stood, askance, eyes roving quietly over the slumped form of the Spaniard leaned up against the pawn shop counter. The youth had fallen back into unconsciousness... not that, beyond screaming and struggling, he'd really woken up at all.

She crossed her arms tightly, a frown etched onto her features as she cupped her palm over a freshly-bleeding cut on her forearm. "I don't want to stay here another night, but...

Nick said nothing. His head was pounding in these wet, burning pulses, and the last thing he wanted to do was think. He focused on wrapping Chris' shoulder, expression frozen in a cold frown as he wound the ragged fabric that had once been his suit jacket. There was little left - just the collar, and strips of the torso and shoulders.

Unrecognizable.

Nick had rolled the sleeves of his dress shirt up past his elbows to spare them a little mess, and his hands and forearms were tacky with blood and sweat. His fingers stuck together as he wrapped Chris' shoulder.

A trickle of blood escaped the corner of the Spaniard's mouth, and the frothing green-yellow faintly bubbled down his chin betrayed that he'd choked up vomit at some point in the process.

"Jesus, he looks..." Rochelle muttered, rubbing her arms as if she were freezing.

"Like he's dying." Nick finished for her, perfectly aware of the way it made her flinch. He didn't really care, but with something of an agitated shake of his head, he added dubiously. "He's not bleeding anymore. Whatever chance we can give him, we did." Despite his words, Nick couldn't fight the stirring thought that he'd done more harm than good - but there was no time for self-doubt.

He couldn't take it back, not even if he wanted to.

A pained "ah- hah..." and sudden thud from behind them caught Nick's attention in a flash, head perking. Coach and Ellis had been working together to drag the infected corpses out of the pawnshop, taking them one at a time by their legs and arms and tossing them into the street.

It wouldn't necessarily make the smell go away, but they couldn't very well leave them where they were if they did end up staying overnight. The pawnshop was unpleasant enough already.

Ellis had abandoned his grip on his half of the corpse, and stood with his hands clutched at his side, pain stricken over his expression and lips drawn in a heavy grimace.

"A'ight, son?" Coach uttered, concern tightening his brow. The heavyset football coach dropped his half of the corpse rather unceremoniously, hurrying to step over to Ellis' side and setting a hand on the small of his back.

The youth quickly nodded his head, gasping softly as his wince thickened and his body slouched to lean against Coach's support. "Yeah.. Yeah! I'm good, man..

But his reassurance was pushed aside immediately, Coach gesturing at the mechanic's side with one hand. He lifted his head, looking toward Nick and Rochelle with a slightly tense frown. "Y'all, with his rib the way it is, he should be restin'. He pushes himself too much, we'll have a real issue on our hands."
Ellis tried to protest, shrugging his posture straight to hide his discomfort. He'd probably have gotten a few words in had Rochelle not snapped.

She rounded on the Georgian, expression going suddenly and vibrantly infuriated. Ellis wilted slightly under her anger, eyes widening slightly as she started in on him. "What the hell! Ellis, you knew you were injured! Why didn't you say something?!!"

He could do little more than gawp. Nick silently returned to wrapping Chris' arm, jaw twitching with subdued irritation.

Rochelle clasped her hand on her forehead, digging her nails gently into her temples in frustration.
"We can't keep track of you every second, Ellis! You're not invincible! What if you'd broken your rib all the way? We don't have the skills to handle that kind of thing."

Meekly, Ellis forced his head down, shrugging his shoulders gingerly and lowering his voice to a chastised mumble. "Well... shit, Ro', I know that... I just - didn't wanna complain. It ain't like we got much time tuh be restin'. I gotta pull muh weight, especially right now..."

Sighing tightly, Rochelle crossed her hands - then uncrossed them, buzzing with agitation. Her gaze flickered to Coach, but the big man held a stony expression that didn't offer much advice. She reached up a hand, snapping sharply toward the squat table behind Ellis in demand. "Sit."

Ears burning slightly, Ellis touched a hand onto his injured rib and backed up with a plodding apology, carefully hoisting himself up to sit on the edge of the table. He frowned in silence.

"We have a lot to worry about right now." Rochelle muttered, still fuming. "Don't need to add you breaking something because you're too damn s-"

She stopped herself. A frustrated hum escaped her in place of the word, and she did a half-turn on her heel, dragging her palm over the top of her head to push down stray hair frizzes. Her eyes went lidded, sucking in air like she could inhale the sentence back into her lungs.

Ellis' frown deepened, lips quickly wetted by his tongue. He lifted a hand to wipe at his jawline with his palm, eyes adjusting downward in a humiliated motion as he mumbled, "Stupid?", tone dulled with a rare hurt.

Rochelle's anger deflated sharply, crushed underfoot.

There was silence for a pregnant moment... and then a sudden burst of motion.

"Ellis.. I didn't -" Rochelle started, almost panicked, stretching a hand out to Ellis' shoulder. Coach reached out as if to grasp her shoulder, poised to speak, but it was Nick that silenced all of them.
He didn't even stand up or swivel his head - not at first. He just spoke, and his voice cut with such sharp venom.

"What the fuck exactly do you expect him to do?"

Only when nobody said a word did he move. Folding an edge of the makeshift bandage underneath itself to tie it off, Nick pushed into a crouch, then straightened to his feet, eyes shadowed under low-cut brows. He let himself gaze once over Chris' limp frame, then turned to face his team.

Three sets of eyes were on him.

"This isn't a game, kids. He can't sit out because he's got a boo-boo, none of us can. If he's got a cracked rib - guess what? He pushes through it. If you've got a cut arm - guess what? You push through it. If I've got a fucked up shoulder - guess what?" He violently tossed up his chin, narrowing his gaze. "I push through it."

"Nick -" Ellis mumbled, rubbing at his forehead with his knuckles. His posture was still injured, but his voice was a pleading and soothing tone. He didn't want more fighting, least of all caused by him.

Coach fiercely interrupted him, deep bass unflinching as the ex-football player crossed his arms tightly over his barrel-framed chest. "You quit yellin', boy. Don't need yo' shit added on to this."

"Right, so you can get back to yelling at Ellis?" Nick jabbed a finger at Rochelle, scowl heightening. "We've got an extra person's worth of dead weight now. You think we can handle any more? You think we can handle carrying around two useless kids? This stupid hick is the only one actually making sense here. He can't back off because he's hurt. The apocalypse doesn't take doctor's notes."

"I didn't mean -" Rochelle tried, her voice tight with emotion. But she shook it off, curling her hands into fists. "Who the hell are you to defend him like this? You knock him down more than any of us!"

"That ain't fair!" Ellis pushed in with sudden energy, slipping off the table with a thud to stand as tall as he could on the balls of his feet, gritting his teeth against the pain throbbing down his side. "Everybody calm down, this ain't no time tuh be fightin' like this!"

"We been fightin' since the start." Coach gruffed, distaste creeping into the downward curl of his mouth. "All you do, Nick. Pick fights an' mock us like you know better."

"Guys -" Ellis was pleading, hapless.

"I'm getting the feeling I do." Nick snapped back, a growl at the edge of his voice. He could feel his heart pounding, blood pressure heating his skin even more than his fever already had. "Half the time I swear you guys don't even understand where we are. The goddamn world is ending. We can't even trust half the people we meet these days. We're alone. We're all we have. When will you get that? If we fall down, no one is going to pick us up. It's push through or die."

Rochelle's cringing jaw spoke to more emotion than her shielded eyes did.

Enunciating each syllable with a taut voice and spreading fingers as he uttered "We. Are. Alone." in a condescendingly slow manner, Nick took a sudden step forward. It was that motion that flipped his vision upside-down, and with a hot shudder of dizziness over his brain, he stumbled.

The disorientation in that momentary spell felt a lot like drowning in the river. Like he forgot which way the ground was and gravity released him to wobble aimlessly on fragile legs. He barely managed to get his feet back under himself in time to avoid falling, but it was far too late to hide the falter.

Rochelle immediately surged forward, argument pushed aside in a flash, to grab ahold of his elbows and try to support him. Unfortunately, reflex had him rejecting the help, and dizziness had him thoughtless. He pushed her away - too hard. He shoved with flat palms, almost a strike.

There was a very thick tension in the air as Rochelle lost her footing and crashed down to an awkward, startled sit on the ground, her mouth falling open in surprise.

Silence.
Dreadful, thick silence, broken only by Nick's ragged breathing and the buzz of flies gathering just outside the doorway.

Nobody seemed able to speak. Coach stood in this half-threatening posture as if he intended to charge across the room and belt Nick straight across the face. Ellis stood in utter shock, mouth open, eyes wide. Nick stood half-hunched, panting and low-lidded as he pieced together his own actions -

And then Rochelle laughed.

It was a weak noise, with a kind of sad humor.

"Sweet Lincoln's mullet. Look at us... we're a mess." She shifted forward until she could set her hands on her knees, bowing her head slowly. "We're lucky enough to have each other in all this - and all we can do is argue like a bunch of jerks every time something goes wrong. God.."

Ellis chuckled faintly, lowering his chin and raising a hand to rub at the back of his neck, almost shyly. "Guess we're all a lil' worked up." Coach's hostility bled slowly out like a deflating balloon, and he fell to a faint grunt, dark eyes moving to glance toward his shoes.

"No one's behavin' real adult today." the heavyset man admitted.

Catching his breath, Nick swallowed. A certain doubt laced itself into his brows, but he forced himself to loosen his stance. Even as his gaze darted to the side, dodging anyone else's, he cleared his throat and muttered, "... I - didn't mean to push that hard."

"I know." she sighed with a half-smile. The woman shifted her limbs to crawl back up to her feet, brushing her rear off with flat palms and a short pat. Nick had intended to offer her a hand - but she was already up, so he just tightened his arms at his sides. "A lot of stuff just happened nobody meant."

Ellis frowned cautiously, cuffing his nose with a knuckle. He spoke with a meek kind of apology, releasing a sigh in a frustrated puff as his stance relaxed back on his heels. His body slumped to take some pressure off his sides. "I'm sorry, y'all.. feel like I've been screwin' shit up lately.."

Coach moved over to his side easily, setting a hand on his shoulder with a reassuring clap. "Now don't you start up on that." The younger man smiled a little at him, but still seemed tense. "Ain't yo' fault, son. We're all losin' our heads, you didn't do shit. We just don't want you breakin' that rib all the way, that's all."

"I ain't gonna." Ellis promised. He tenderly pushed his hands into the pockets of his coveralls, almost shyly turning his head to nod toward Nick, eager to get the focus off himself - and genuinely concerned. "You okay, though, man? You ain't been lookin' too hot since this mornin'. Thought you were gonna pass out just then."

Nick snorted at the question. There wasn't enough sarcasm in the world thick enough to express his disdain, but he was perfectly willing to give it a shot - until Coach took the chance away from him.

Closing the gap between them in one broad step, Nick was silenced by the thoughtful press of a set of knuckles to his cheek. He didn't expect the contact, least of all from Coach, and he froze in disbelief long enough for Coach to get halfway to his forehead before he shoved back a step.

"Hey!" the gambler snapped, angrily wiping his cheek off with his palm. Coach's expression was impassive, one brow just dubiously lifting up, and Ellis couldn't fight a small grin even as he bit at his tongue to stifle it. "What the hell's up with the touchy-feely?"
"You got a fever, my man." Coach clarified, sighing wearily. "Bad one. Burnin' up like I ain't seen since my daughter got Lyme disease."

"I'm f-" Nick started, about two seconds before both Rochelle and Ellis suddenly advanced on him. She already had her hand up, prepped to feel at his face with a concerned look all over her expression, and Ellis looked primed to do the same.

The gambler immediately retreated a good few feet, defensively lifting up his good arm to keep them at bay. "I don't need any more sweaty hands on my face, goddamnit! I'm fine!"

Ellis stopped mid-step, but Rochelle wasn't so easily swayed. She gave a sigh and snapped a hand onto her hip, arching a brow up and lowering her voice. "Do you want me to get serious about this, Nick? You get back here before I beat your white-boy ass."

Nick thought about that for a moment.

"... Look, it's just a fever, alright?" he breathed out, agitated. The resistance faded from his posture, but the frustration didn't. Nick lifted a hand to rub the heel of his hand against his temple, blood smearing on his skin in a pale patch. "I'll take some of the antibiotics you guys got, get some rest, whatever. It's not the end of the damn world."

He couldn't resist the sarcasm.

Releasing a tired sigh, Rochelle lowered her shoulders, half-closing her eyes. She looked exhausted suddenly, pinching at the bridge of her nose with slender knuckles. "Your shoulder's probably infected... damnit. Do we have enough bandages left to -?"

"No." Nick immediately negated. "We're not using any on me when we've got a kid with his arm lopped off."

"Turnin' a new selfless leaf, Nick?" Coach questioned with a bit of a chuckle, one that Nick sardonically returned in a 'ha-ha.' Crossing her arms tightly, pressing a palm over a wet cut down her forearm to staunch the trickled bleeding, Rochelle shook her head at the both of them. Lifting her chin, she met gazes with Ellis, cocking a brow.

"Can you take a look at his shoulder, sweetheart?" Ellis nodded immediately, although Nick took on a bit of a scowl. "Just try not to ruin the bandages so you can re-wrap it, but get him cleaned up a little. Whatever we can do, we should."

Reaching up to scratch nails against his jawline, Nick muttered in slight agitation, "I said I was fine.." However, he didn't seem inclined to argue much further, his resignation highlighted by the fact he reluctantly started to undo the top couple buttons of his dress shirt.

Ellis obediently moved to Nick's side, keeping his eyes down rather than look as Nick slumped his shirt down to bare his bandaged shoulder. A faint smile traced at Ellis' lips quietly. He was happy to take care of the gambler, but even more than that, he was happy to have the group back at some kind of peace.

Rochelle and Coach resumed the task of trying to clear the bodies from the doorway, and though her injured forearm crippled her slightly, she powered through. They made good progress - but whether they managed to clean up the remnants of the horde or not, the pawnshop was hardly ideal as a place to hole up.

Then again, Christophe surviving a move was even less likely than him surviving the night. The Spaniard was trembling and sweaty from the physical trauma, hardly settled even now that they'd stopped touching him.

Kinda think it'd've been better if you'd just died, kid.

But Nick wouldn't say that out loud.
Despite their best attempts to clear the corpses from the pawn shop, it was just as unpleasant as it had been before. The harsh aroma of seared skin, gunpowder, and blood burned at Nick's eyes and clung to his throat in a gritty mix. Growling, the gambler rubbed at his eyes with his free hand, his other hanging limp at his side.

Between the stench and the pain of his shoulder, Nick was fast losing the will to live.

"Jesus Christ, kid."

Hissing quietly between clenched teeth, Nick slitted eyes to glare across the room as the Georgian chided him in return. "Quit squirmin', man..." Ellis' hands were warm and careful against his skin, but the touches were anything but pleasant. “Shit, it sure don't look happy.” he chuffed with a sigh, leaning in a little.

Nick had hopped up on the edge of a table near the wall so he could slump forward and moodily surrender to the attentions, and Ellis hovered beside him, shifting from heel to heel tiredly. He tried to be as gentle as he could, using a handful of fabric from what remained of Nick's suit jacket to swab blood and sweat away from the wound, but the skin was so inflamed every touch made Nick tense.

Plus, Ellis had dampened it with some alcohol, and it stung like hell.

“I know how it feels.” the older man muttered.

Licking his cracking lower lip quickly, Ellis reached up his other hand to dig fingers into his curls, scratching messily at his scalp. His eyes lifted, matching Nick's clouded greens. “We gotta get'cha cleaned up, 'fore you get worse. Thing is, I don't even know if we got any water left...”

“We don't got more than a bottle.” Coach interrupted from the doorway before the thought could go any further. He gazed out into the street, dark eyes squinted, body uncomfortably stiff as he stewed in sweat- and blood-stained clothing. He held his shotgun, on alert. “Bathroom in the back ain't workin’."

Nick gave an absolutely miserable sigh, frustration sending his hand shooting up to scratch at his browline. “Goddamnit.” escaped him in a small growl. He could feel the despondence of the situation clawing at his composure. No water, bare medical supplies, not even the security of a door. “Could this fucking day get worse?”

His glare found Rochelle as she walked past him, gripping a sofa cushion underneath either arm. She looked exhausted, though not so much so that she couldn't spare a moment to mutter, "Yes." before continuing forward. He watched her kneel down beside Chris, wearily setting the cushions down at either side of her.

The woman set to trying to arrange the two sofa cushions in a makeshift bed - her displeasure with her own work showing clear on her face - and then trying to get Chris laid down on it. The Spaniard was dead weight in her hands as she rolled him onto the cushions and off the hardwood floor, and she had to go slow and careful to avoid letting him slip.

Any other day Coach would have been at her side to help, both for Rochelle's sake and Chris', but a strained, quiet giggling had started to echo in the street. He stood in the doorway instead, shotgun ready for the hobbled creature that seemed intent on taunting them. Its laughter wheezed at the edge of perception, fading in and out as gasps that might not even have been real at all.

The scowl on Coach's face hinted at his very, very frayed nerves. "Thang's drivin' me nuts." he muttered under his breath, scanning the streets without any luck. A slight sigh drove his chin to the side, glancing over his shoulder toward Nick. "Least you still got all your limbs, boy. Be grateful."

The death glare that Nick sent him was enough to scald. The big man would have continued, only to stall into silence when the Jockey squealed a little sob as if in answer. It was so close, so excited, that Coach jumped slightly, prepared to hoist his shotgun up and shoot.

It stayed hidden.

Rochelle sighed, leaning back on her heels quietly to examine Chris somberly. He slumped limply on his back, upper body supported by one lounge cushion and the rest of him curled on the other. The rudimentary bed didn't seem comfortable, not that the unconscious survivor could complain.

His expression was devoid of emotion and his pallor was a sickly green. His eyelids flickered rapidly back and forth, rolling fitfully in their sockets, and tiny gasps escaped pallid lips with irregular rhythm. When she reached out to brush a knuckle over the sweaty plane of his brow, he flinched.

"We're not going to make it without supplies." she murmured, almost mournfully, slumping down so she could rub her temples harshly with fingertips. "He won't last the night without water."

"Gotta agree." came rather bluntly from Coach.

Reluctantly, Ellis pulled back, glancing up at Nick's face with a morosely serious look in his eyes. The passing days had left his jawline dusted with gold-brown hairs; it was nothing that went very far past peach-fuzz, but it was enough to put an odd scruffiness on generally sweet features.

A sort of clumsy mess that wasn't, Nick begrudgingly noted as he returned the glance, all that unattractive.

"Well, shit. Wish we could do more, Nick. 'M sorry." he mumbled, eyes genuinely apologetic even as Nick shrugged the words off with his good shoulder. Ellis set the small handful of Nick's suit-turned-bandage-material down on the table, sighing. "You should really take some meds, though, man."

"Whatever. If there's extra, maybe." Nick glanced down at his injured shoulder, examining the bared, inflamed skin. It throbbed in uncomfortable pulses along the slitted wound, making his jaw tense and putting a kind of huff to his sigh. "If we don't have water, we're fucked, period. Let alone food. We're all thirsty and hungry right now - and like Ro' said. Our patient needs fluids."

"Ain't right, us goin' on barely a meal a day." Coach muttered from the doorway. "Doin' too much runnin' an' stressin' to be eatin' this little - and bad. Biggest meal we had was back at the Burgertank. Lucky we ain't getting sick, this rate."

A weak sigh pulled Ellis' lips downward, licking quickly at them, his tongue flattening over the cracked shape of the lower one. "Can't argue with yuh, Coach. But..."

Rochelle turned as she stood up, surreptitiously nudging a palm against the edge of her left eye in a gesture that betrayed emotion she was fighting to bury. "But, last time we split up to hunt supplies, all this happened." she pointed out firmly, lifting her head to meet Nick's gaze, expression stoic. "I don't want to do that again."
"So what are you saying?" Nick retorted flatly, sarcasm thick in his voice. He adjusted his posture on the edge of the table, reaching up a hand to start flattening his bandages back into place. When he struggled to manage it one-handed, Ellis was at his side in an instant, quietly taking the job over. "We leave the kid, hope the zombies don't find him while we're gone?"

Rochelle frowned tightly, letting her arms cross and her head turn slightly to glance toward the crumpled youth. "You know we couldn't take that risk."

"Sure. Unfortunately.." Nick sucked in a slight breath as Ellis' hand palmed the bandages against his wound, but he shook off any apology the Georgian offered. ". when you turn down an option, you kinda have to come up with a new one. It's this stupid thing called 'decision-making.' Sucks, right?"

Rochelle was shaken - not so much by Nick's jibes as the truth behind them. They had to make a decision, and there was very little time and very little room for error.

"One way or another, we need supplies." Nick stated flatly, setting a hand on his knee. "If -"

The low baritone of Coach's voice interrupted, simply, "I'll stay. You three go out."

Immediately, arguments exploded in the air. Rochelle burst out with "We can't leave you here alone! What if something happens?" and Ellis leapt suddenly to a "No, Coach, I should! I ain't gonna be much help, anyway..", only to have Nick snap at him with a harsh, "Don't be stupid. No one is -"

Coach quietly raised his hands up in a hushing motion, and all three fell silent, obedient but restless.

"I know y'all don't like it, an' I appreciate that. Fact is, it's the only way. Can't leave Chris all by himself - so someone's gotta stay. My knee ain't actin' right, think I bummed it out runnin' from that Witch. I'd slow y'all down. Need Ro' to go, she's the least hurt. But she can't go alone - and if somethin' happens to one of y'all, she ain't gonna be able to get you back by herself. Only way it works out."

Ellis fell to a full-lipped frown, grasping his hands into fists as he finished with Nick's shoulder. He mirrored the discontent on Rochelle's face, glancing quickly between her and Nick, worriedly. "Whut if another horde shows up? Took Ro' and me to hold the door."

Coach shook his head, shortly. "Only got a horde 'cause Chris was screamin'. He's out cold."

"What happens if you get jumped by something?" Nick muttered, closing his eyes as he gently pulled his shirt back into place, fingers weak, re-buttoning his dress shirt with slow determination. "If a Hunter or a Charger or something gets in here, you're dead meat."

"Ain't no different from y'all goin' out and riskin' the same thing." Coach wasn't budging. His face was stoic in calm decision, patiently shaking his head in a slow bobbing motion. He'd entertain the argument as long as was needed - he'd already made his choice.

Rochelle gave a fierce sigh, letting her chin fall and lifting her hands to rub over her face. "God, I hate it when you're right." she groaned softly, her shoulders shaking softly with a mix of frustration and exhaustion. The eldest cracked a grin.

"I'll be a'ight, baby girl. Ain't no wimp-ass zombie gettin' one up on Coach."

The Jockey outside cackled fiercely, voice whined with a reedy stutter and echoed about the street til it was nigh-on impossible to pin down. Coach scowled over his shoulder, glaring out into the late afternoon with a real anger as he hissed out in frustration, "'Specially not one of them leapin'-on-yo'-back-bitches!"

Ellis couldn't not laugh, stifling his mouth against an open palm as his shoulders hunched with his muffled chuckling.

Sighing, Nick eyed the Georgian for a beat before shifting his gaze over toward Rochelle. Their gazes met with a quiet discontent passed between them. Neither of them could quite find the same humor, nor relax quite like Ellis did. Leaving Coach to fend for himself was an incredibly unpleasant concept.

Of course, lately - everything had become unpleasant.
"Holy fuck, it's hot." he groused flatly, leading the foursome out onto the sidewalk. He could still feel chalky medication at the back of his tongue, unable to drink anything to rid himself of the aftertaste. They only had one bottle left, and that was reserved for Coach and Chris while they were gone.

The team wasn't going to leave him alone unless he took some antibiotics, so he'd relented. He could already feel his stomach complaining.

"All the rain last night's gone straight to hu-mi-di-ty," Ellis unhelpfully explained, wiping a wrist at his sweaty forehead. He darted a glance along the street, scanning for danger - but there were only a few infected on the street, too far away to take notice of them quite yet. "This sun's gonna cook us faster'n greased-up bacon."

Coach gave a quiet, stifled groan at the poorly chosen metaphor, considering the air still stunk like Chris' burning flesh. Ellis only had a few seconds to look chagrined before Nick turned around and offered his hand out to the frowning ex-football player. Coach blinked, surprised - but matched the gesture.

"We're not gonna be long."

Nick and Coach clasped hands harshly between them, faint awkwardness passed between the two men as their grips tightened. The eldest gave a small grin, nodding his head slowly, speaking lowly back. "Sayin' you'll miss me, Nick?"

The gambler smirked. "Desperately."

Coach chuckled quietly, lifting his other hand to gently clap Nick on his uninjured shoulder. The gesture still made Nick wince, but he bit his tongue rather than complain, taking it with a stiff jaw. "Good man. You keep 'em safe fo' me, Nick."

The Jockey still hiding from sight gave a wheezed, faint giggle, mockingly. They ignored it.

"No promises. They're one big accident waiting to happen." Nick shot back, pulling his hand out from the handshake they'd started. He wiped his palm on the side of his shirt, a gesture Coach likely would've taken more offense to had their hands not been caked with sweat and bodily fluids no one wanted to think about.

Nick backed away, taking a watchful stance at the edge of the road, as Ellis and Rochelle crowded up to the ex-football player. They both looked exhausted with emotion, and Coach had to take a stumbled half-step back as he was swept up in a clumsy and rushed hug from the two, one pushed under each arm.

They clung to him like clustered children, faces ducked down rather than admit the emotion struggling over their faces. The embrace was sweaty and unpleasant - and none of them cared. Rochelle's voice was strained when she muttered, "I really don't like this."

A frown dropped the edges of his mouth, and he sighed, closing his eyes as he settled a hand on their backs. "Y'all shouldn't worry 'bout me." Coach rumbled gently down at them, a kind of paternal tolerance slowing his tone. "We got more important shit on our plate."

Though reluctant, Ellis was the first to pull away. He shuffled back a few steps and pushed his hands into the pockets of his coveralls, turning his chin to the side, embarrassed. He had their backpack strapped to his shoulders, emptied of what medical supplies they had left in case Chris needed any care. "Just wish it didn't have tuh be like this. If I hadn't gotten muhself hurt so bad..."

"Ain't yo' fault." Coach asserted, quietly. Ellis didn't look convinced, dropping his chin as the cackling zombie seemed to encourage his self-doubt with a giggle.

He frowned harder.

"We'll be back before you can say 'violently eviscerated by a horde of zombies."

"With supplies in tow, hopefully. If we don't find some water, at least, we may as well get offed. Be quicker."

Rochelle, still hugging around Coach's broad midsection, shook her head sharply and lifted her chin to glance up at him. "We'll find something, we'll make it work. I know we will. I just want you safe while we're gone."

He gently set his other hand against her cheek, pawed comfortingly against the slope of her jaw. "This place ain't bad. Strong walls, no back door... I'll be a'ight. Anythin' happens, I'll get Chris in the bathroom and hole up in the doorway. Y'all ain't got nothin' to worry 'bout."

Judging by the tremble to her jaw, she nearly teared up - but held it back at the last second, pushing up to plant a kiss on his cheek. "We have a lot to worry about." she corrected in a mutter, dropping her gaze to the ground as she pulled away.

Coach smiled. He sighed in a weary exhale - but smiled, real and thick.

Dark brown eyes lifted to gaze between his teammates, and the heavyset man lifted up a hand to wave them off in a short motion. His voice was gruff with stoic impassivity, visibly holding his spine straight and his face blank. "Y'all best get movin'. Daylight don't last forever."

Flustered, Rochelle nodded, pulling her rifle into her hands and resting the stock onto her hip. "If we don't leave now, I'll lose my nerve." she mumbled, shrugging her shoulder in a rolling motion. Coach chuckled quietly, backing up to rest against the threshold of the door, watching them as they started to leave.

Ellis slipped up beside Rochelle, nudging his chin up in a reassuring gesture. He smiled, even when she couldn't quite return it. They both turned at the hip to wave goodbye, calling back their farewells in forcedly hushed tones.

"Bye, Coach!"

"Be careful!"

Nick tightened his grip on his rifle, refusing to look back. Refusing to think, lest his mind travel unpleasant roads... like stress. Or worry. Or - worst of all - fear. Try as he might to shake off a feeling of tension, his hands were shaking and he knew it.

The Jockey laughed at him, shrieking out a cackle that sounded so close, Nick jumped out of his skin. He jerked his gun up, swivelng at the waist to follow the noise as it echoed around him, but the creature didn't appear.
"Fucking creep." he growled. I need a drink.

Mumbling sadly, Ellis sounded near-heartbroken as he gazed over his shoulder long after they'd turned a corner and lost sight of the pawnshop. "I hope he's gonna be okay." Quiet and quick, the Georgian reached out with his other hand. He had a thick black permanent marker they'd found behind the pawnshop counter gripped in his fingers.

In a swift series of flicks, he drew out a black arrow pointing behind them on the side of a building. They weren't going to risk getting lost this time, not with so much at stake.

"There's nothing we can do." Nick asserted, flatly, knowing Ellis was probably falling into an even deeper frown behind him. "Just keep focused."

He stayed several paces ahead of Ellis and Ro', silently raising his gun when he spotted a zombie hunched over against a wall. He took a breath, steadying his weakened aim before he fired. The bullet missed its skull - but hit the base of its neck, and it went down just as hard.

The gunshot attracted the attention of several infected huddled along the street, bolting up to their feet and shrieking as they wheeled around to sprint toward the survivors. "Stay close!" Rochelle shouted, side-stepping to Nick's side as she cocked her head to rest her cheek onto the stock of her gun and set her gaze into the scope.

Ellis swiveled into place at her back - but it took effort not to leave space for Coach in the formation. Suddenly, the three felt strangely small.

Their movements had become second nature, their bodies trained to trust in each other's presence - a bond built of fear and isolation as much as respect and affection. There was a singularity in how they moved, an immense unity strengthened by necessity and manifesting itself in subtle ways.

Like how their footsteps timed effortlessly, from Ellis' limping gait to Rochelle's light side-step to Nick's hollow swagger. Or how they'd trade coordinated shots, never caught with everyone reloading at once. Or how even the quietest commands and warnings were understood, a monosyllabic language that saved precious breath, time, and focus.

Or how they felt Coach's absence weighing on their nerves like lead.

The moment they started to fire, downing the infected before they could reach them, the numbers multiplied. Like a sleeping flock of crows roused from a tree, infected came shrieking out of the woodwork, enraged by the disturbance. They crawled out from under cars, broke through the windows and doors of streetside condos, and bolted out of alleyways, covered in blood and grime.

An infected sprinted in from an alley, moving fast and low, black spittle trailing from its mouth in rage. It moved in silence, like a wolf on the hunt, and it was that silence that let it slip in under Nick's radar.

He was too busy getting a bead on another infected, not noticing as it snuck up on his right. Rochelle only needed to ghost a soft "Nick -" to catch his focus, and his rifle was turned and firing in an instant.

Only, he missed.

"Fuck!" Nick snarled, shooting a second time. That one struck home, knocking the infected straight off its feet, though Rochelle found herself frowning. Nick was an incredible shot, compared to the rest of them. Coach had barely any experience before the apocalypse; Ellis was good, but his shotgun couldn't get near Nick's accuracy; Rochelle would have been mostly lost without the scope on her rifle.

Seeing him so unsteady was strange. She knew why, but it didn't make her any less concerned.

He was even more stubborn than Ellis was. "You okay, Nick?" she questioned, lifting her rifle quickly to re-focus her attention on the infected that remained. She didn't get a response, only a short growl that seemed to chastise her for even asking. "... Just be careful."

She downed two zombies in one shot, the bullet piercing straight through one and catching them both in the torso. While their snarls and struggles as they collapsed to the ground suggested they hadn't been direct strikes to the heart, they died fast enough to suggest they had definitely hit something vital.

It was a little discomfiting to think about them having anything vital. Rochelle would have preferred shooting zombified corpses, not live - infected or not - people.

A sharp squeal from overhead put prickles up their spines, and Ellis shouted, "Loogie dude!" Immediately, all three bolted, a brisk sprint sending them running down the road in an organized line. Rochelle pivoted as she ran, hunting the area around them for the neon green spittle that would betray the acidic infected's presence.

She spotted it on a rooftop a little too late, and it threw back its head with a squealing wail to shoot a glistening, fleshy orb from the melted cavern that had once been a mouth. The effort seemed to shock it, gasping for air as blood and acid streaked down its chin, and Rochelle was able to snipe it in the stomach before it could recover.

It didn't die, but the hole that exploded into its gut sent bubbling acid bleeding down its skin. Judging by the screaming and squealing that echoed out, it wasn't immune to its own goo. It disappeared behind the slope of the roof, still shrieking,

The survivors were forced to scatter, leaping out of harm's way as the acid bubble hit the ground and exploded, sending hissing green liquid splattering out in a wide puddle. Rochelle literally leapt, throwing herself to the sidewalk to avoid the splash after having waited just a little too long getting the shot off. She hit the ground with her palms, rolling quickly onto her side rather than risk injuring the bones in her wrists.

Three infected had still been alive before the Spitter had chased them away, and they eagerly bolted forward to take advantage of the scattered team. Rochelle tried to scramble to get her gun back into her hands and take them out - only they never made it.

Instantly, the acid started to soak into their skin. They were all barefoot or close to it, so the bottoms of their feet and their toes melted like heated butter, sending them off-balance as they gave way underneath their weight.

It was something between pathetic and horrifying to watch them trip and knock each other over, ending up on the ground and shrieking, more in rage than pain. Anywhere the acid touched them, it sizzled and crackled, eating away at sickly flesh... and the longer they were in it, the harsher it burned.

Nick could feel his calf twinging, painfully, memory bringing back the agony.

"Holy shit." Ellis uttered, frozen in place. There was a kind of fascination on his face, but his nostrils flared in disgust, watching one zombie claw a hand up at him, snarling - her fingers showing muscle underneath blotches of sizzling flesh. "They ain't -? I didn't think they'd get hurt by Nick swiftly crossed the distance between him and Rochelle, reaching down to pull her up to her feet with his good arm. It didn't startle her as much as it usually did, and she gratefully grasped his arm, catching her balance as they detached. "I guess they do." she muttered, warily sideglancing the infected.

The acid sizzled out, calming, but the damage had been done. They clawed at each other with melted fingers, trapped in a pile and crippled into stiff rolls, unable to get up with their muscles burned beyond function. Their eyes glowed bleary yellow, unwavering in their focus on the survivors, like they still believed they could get at them.

"That shit does a lot of damage." Nick growled quietly, lifting his hand to flick his index and middle finger in a near-militaristic gesture, ordering them forward. "Let's not join 'em."

He started to stalk forward - only to sense, instantly, that he wasn't being followed. Whipping sharply around, eyes narrowing, he found both Ellis and Rochelle stuck in awkward stares on the downed and snarling infected. Ellis mumbled, "Feel kinda bad...", looking slightly lost as he toed his boot into the asphalt. "Leavin' 'em like this..

Oh for fuck's - A heavy sigh touched Nick's breath, lifting up his gun in one tired motion. It's like herding fucking cats.

Ellis jumped out of his skin at the first shot, nearly stumbling over himself to get back as one of the zombie's heads exploded. "Je-" Nick, however, didn't so much as pause. A second - and then third shot ended the struggles of the mostly-melted infected, a mix of blood and now-inert goo covering their bodies.

The silence afterwards was stark and thick, Nick quietly lowering his gun.

Rochelle shot him a look in horror. Ellis swiveled his head to blink at Nick, more surprised than upset. Nick stared them down, completely unwavering and fiercely expectant. He reached into his slacks pocket, pulling out ammo and reloading his rifle.

"Congratulations, we wasted bullets. Can we go now?"

Shamed, Ellis nodded, reaching out to pat Rochelle's elbow and encourage her forward. She slipped him a glance but nodded, moving to follow after the gambler with Ellis close at her heels. "Uh.. yeah. Sorry, man, just sorta hard tuh watch sometimes."

As much as she didn't want to push Nick any further, that didn't stop Rochelle from tipping her head and murmuring to Ellis. "I'm shocked they aren't immune to their own acid... I mean, it's like our own spit burning us - it doesn't make any sense..."

Fortunately, other than a short roll of his eyes, Nick didn't argue. They were following him, and that's all he cared about.

"Shucks, I dunno, Ro'." Ellis shook his head, shrugging his shoulders in the same motion. "Them Boomer things? They affect zombies, too. Nick'n'me, we ran intuh one while we was lookin' fer you guys. Tried tuh get us, but we jumped outta the way fast enough - 'n'the zombies behind us, they got caught in the blast." Rochelle looked shocked, glancing over his face intently. "Next thing we know, they're tearin' each other apart. Didn't even spare a look at us."

"Really?" she hummed, unable to fight the thoughtful frown encroaching on her face. "That's..."
"Weird, h'uh?" Ellis blithely chuckled a little, cocking his head to one side. "Man, ain't seen nothin' like it. They just went nuts. Kinda reminds me'uh this one time when Keith was tryin' tuh trap raccoons, 'cause he was gonna start up this zoo in his mama's backyard'n'she told him he weren't allowed tuh catch cats or nothin'... well, he got this one caught in a trashcan, only he didn't have no real plan fer gettin' it out, so like the instant he opened it up that thing was on his face, clawin' and bitin' him all tuh hell. You ain't heard nothin' 'til you hear Keith screamin' over a pissed-off raccoon. Man, he had clawmarks over like ninety-five per-

Nick halted mid-step, and Ellis almost reflexively snapped his mouth shut, expecting Nick to whirl on him and demand he quiet.

He didn't.

"Do you hear that?" Nick questioned, hissing through clenched teeth, his head slowly turning from one side to the other, green eyes lowly scanning the street. Ellis and Rochelle blinked, mimicking him for a quiet moment. There was silence, broken only by their own heavy breathing.

Nervously, Rochelle shook her head. When Ellis joined in, Nick lifted his rifle warily and spat out a sharp, "Exactly."

The Jockey had fallen silent.
Slamming the butt of her rifle into the glass, Rochelle not-so-gingerly broke in the window before her, knocking out the rapidly falling shards with a few more swings. She stepped back to avoid the spray of glass, wincing slightly at the noise.

Nick sighed behind her, a hand fisted on his hip in an annoyed gesture as he watched her lean in, peering into the innards of the store they'd found. "I was going to do that." he muttered defensively.

Rochelle bit back a laugh, shaking her head. "Sure. You totally weren't going to waste time trying to pick the lock." She reached to grab the flashlight from its place at her hip, unhooking it from her jeans' beltloop, and raised it up to direct it into the store. It flickered weakly as it reached the end of its battery life, but the glow was enough to make out the cluttered insides of a gift shop.

She felt a tug of disappointment, sighing as her gaze roved shelves of gaudy snowglobes, keychains, shotglasses, clothes, and assorted objects.

"Nothing. Just stupid souvenirs. Third one we've found." She frowned, clicking off her flashlight and backing away with a tired slump. Ellis sighed with her, stepping up to the wall to etch out another arrow to direct them backwards. The plastic paneling was, fortunately, easy to write on, and the writing gleamed black under the bright sun, beckoning.

"Wonder if they got Jimmy Gibbs Jr. shirts." he chirped, a little wistfully.

"Who - … Actually, nevermind." Nick, though initially deadpanned, perked up slightly and leaned in with a cocked brow. "Might have smokes." he hummed in an introspective way that didn't even seem directed at the other two.

Rochelle rolled her eyes hard, immediately turning around and stalking past him. She snagged a hand on his dress shirt sleeve as she passed to drag him with her, chastisingly - accidentally choosing his bad arm, not that she felt guilty for it.

"Ow! Fuck!" he hissed, submitting to the pull just to take pressure off his injured shoulder. He complained sharply in a growl, pushing her grip away with his other hand even as Ellis broke into a stifled laugh. "Cheap shot."

"You're the one hurrying us along, Nick. We don't have time for cigarettes," Rochelle shook her head, smiling a little as Nick's jaw stiffened, clearly offended by the chiding. He jerked his chin up and lengthened his stride to regain his position at the front, swiftly checking his gun's ammo. He turned his back to them, defensively shaking his head.

"Can't even have one fuckin' thing." he groused.

Ellis scuttled after him, hopping to catch up, and nudged his arm with his elbow a bit playfully. He had a wide grin on his face that didn't exactly scream pity, even as he tried to offer up a sympathetic, "Aw, Nick. It'll be okay. If I see any, I'll grab 'em fer you!"

Nick glared sideways, exhaling sharply. "Find me some goddamn duct-tape first."

Obliviously, Ellis cocked his head, confused when Rochelle started laughing. He looked between the two, hoping for some kind of explanation. When neither gave one, he just kind of puffed and adjusted his cap on his head, dropping the bill over his eyes in embarrassment.
Moving along in a tight line, the three survivors kept to the sidewalk, quiet and swift. As much as the Jockey's disappearance unnerved them, it was also a slight relief. Their guard didn't necessarily drop, but having the giggling creature lose their trail was some burden off their shoulders - a reason to relax just a little.

As haunting as the thing was, at least it made its presence known, so they knew when it was gone. Its absence let them focus on the real problem: their search was proving fruitless.

"Fucking piece of shit town - where's the fucking tourist mall? Something?"

Nick's tight-lipped focus had rapidly started to falter. Be it his fever loosening his composure, or dehydration mixed with over-exertion, he'd gained a fractured dart to green eyes, growing more and more frustrated with every useless building they passed by. Ellis and Rochelle both noticed it, though neither said a word.

"We're stuck in housing I think." Rochelle noted, lifting her chin to scan their surroundings with a growing frown. "Beach houses and apartments and things like that. Maybe if we cross over, find a bigger street, we can find a store."

Lifting her free hand, she pointed across the road, gesturing at the mouth of a side street between two yarded rental houses. Nick nodded thinly, leading with his gun as they moved across the asphalt.

Tybee was a shell of something that had once teemed with life. A ghost town. It was cruel mockery that left the infected - shells in their own right - wandering the streets, like twisted shadows. Nick was left with an unpleasant thought stewing in his gut: weren't they just shadows, too? Struggling to survive with no real idea of what they were surviving for?

Moving forward only because the alternative was laying down and dying?

He needed a drink - something hard.

"Don't think any'uh these houses might have somethin'?" Ellis questioned in a lowered voice, only falling behind temporarily to mark their path. "I mean, it'd take awhile tuh search 'em all, but..."

Ellis fell silent quickly when Nick shook his head, shooting the Georgian down off-hand. "Even if they had anything - which I'd be surprised, piece of shit tourist town - the power's out. The fridges would be dead and whatever was in 'em rotten. That, and we need non-perishables, and the only place we're getting those is a store. You don't stock beachhouses with canned food."

"I don't want to spend all that time, anyway.. We need to get back to Coach." Rochelle mumbled, raising her rifle to take aim at an infected hunched over at the end of the crossroad. It was in the throes of illness, retching against cupped hands in a very humanlike shudder of pain, when she fired a round into its back.

It went down in silence, dead on impact, and Rochelle lowered her gun as it did.

The faint sound of a grunted moan was the only warning before a hulking Charger took a weak step out into the street, body slumped with the immense weight of its bloated side. It needed barely a second to orient its piggish, sunken eyes on the clustered threesome - and then it was in motion.

The thundering Charger barreled down the road, the distance between them disappearing almost faster than they had time to react. Instinct kicked in, and Nick reached out, shoving Rochelle out of the way with his forearm. He swung his rifle up and fired several shots in fast succession.
One of them struck the Charger's rock-hard shoulder with little more than a dent left behind, but the other grazed its skull and the last buried straight in its neck. The infected roared like an enraged animal, its charge suddenly going askew as its focus seemed blurred by the injuries.

Ellis had barely enough to hiss "Oh shi-!" before the Charger slammed straight into a car parked next to the sidewalk.

Vision immediately turning to stars, Nick clutched at his forehead as the car alarm squealed to life, heightened as the Charger crumpled the roof underneath its crashing weight. He barely registered Rochelle running back up to him, grabbing at his arm urgently.

She said something, but fuck if Nick could hear her over the alarm. He saw the yellow blur of Ellis' shirt, and - blinking fast to clear his vision - lifted his head to see Ellis bolt up toward the car. Although Nick first thought Ellis was going to disarm the car alarm like he'd done before, the Georgian surprised him.

One shotgun blast to the Charger's head ended its life before it could regain its balance, and another shot through the hood of the car abruptly silenced the shrieking alarm. Only the echoes of the ear-splitting noise and the sound of shattering glass lingered on the air.

That was, until the oncoming horde grew audible around them.

"We gotta get inside or somethin'!" Ellis huffed as he galloped back toward them, spinning his head to try and pinpoint where the infected would start to pour from. "They're gonna surround us out here!"

Disinclined to argue, Nick pointed to the nearest doorway from where they stood - a one-car garage, the silvery door pulled down to the concrete. Rochelle was the first one to it, and she dropped down to one knee, grabbing hold of the metal handles and hauling it up with a loud rattle. The three of them scrambled underneath the door the moment there was enough room.

As she rolled underneath the thick metal, Rochelle yanked her flashlight from her belt, quickly scanning the garage's depths. Shadows spasmed across her vision, figures and shapes sending her heart rate through the roof, but the garage proved empty of infected. A portly grey sedan sat quietly in the center of the room, abandoned.

Ellis started moving to slam the garage door shut behind them - and then stopped.

Before Nick could react, Ellis darted to his side, pawing a hand into the pocket at the breast of his dress shirt. He'd forgotten he'd tucked the matches away there until Ellis pried them free, flashing Nick an inspired look.

Nick did not like it.

Backing away, the Georgian lifted up his hand. "Ro'! Gimme yer rifle!" Rochelle seemed startled, but shrugged her rifle off her shoulder and tossed it to him. Ellis caught it one-handed, going down to his knees and ducking his torso underneath the garage door.

Pushing the stock against his shoulder, he tipped his head to peer through the scope. The car that the Charger had originally set off, crushed and ruined, sat just down the road. Holding his breath, he took aim several inches underneath the gas cap. The Georgian fired, wincing at the recoil as he peppered a few shots onto the metal.

Clear, shiny gasoline sputtered from the holes, spilling out - slow at first, then faster. Ellis smoothly drew a match from the book, lighting it with a swipe, and nudged further out into the street so he could toss the match toward the gasoline.

It caught fire in a flash, and as more spilled out from the car, the fire intensified. Burning gas spread in a thin layer over the road, catching the litter and refuse scattered on the ground and gaining momentum.

He saw the first of the horde come scrambling out onto the street a few seconds before Nick grabbed his shirt and yanked him back into the garage. Rochelle slammed the garage door shut with a foot braced against the handle, plunging them into darkness but for the beam of light from her flashlight.

Ellis blinked, starting to get up off the concrete floor - only to have Nick practically drag him up to his feet, grabbing his shirtfront in a fisted hand and snarling at him. Ro's flashlight darted into their faces, the dimmed glow making Ellis squint. "Are you fucking insane? Do you want to burn the fucking town down?!

"Hey, hey!" Ellis eased, lifting his free hand to grab at Nick's forearm. He was more startled than anything else, pushing the gambler's grip loose. "Ain't nothin' burnin' down! I was just tryin' tuh stop the zombies!

"Yeah, and us!" Nick let go, growling sharply as he turned away, scratching at his forehead with an angry series of gestures. He shook his head swiftly, shoulders stiff. "Jesus, you're the most reckless son of a bitch."

Catching his footing after Nick released him, Ellis couldn't help but mutter a small "Jeez.", pawing his shirt flat on his chest. He peered toward Rochelle, unable to see her face in the dark. He heard her sigh, sounding tired, but he didn't have time to say anything before a body slammed against the garage door, startling them all.

The infected screamed, beating its hands against the metallic plating. The smell of burning skin sunk into the garage, nose-wrinklingly pungent, heightening as several more crashed into the garage, beating on it for a few seconds before seeming to collapse against it. "See?" Ellis pointed out, voice lightening as he passed Rochelle's rifle to her. "It's all good."

"Let's not stick around, either way." Rochelle pushed the rifle back onto her shoulder, gesturing at the car. "Do you guys think this thing's key is here?"

Ellis scratched at his head, curiously, bobbing his chin. He reached out with one hand to gesture for the flashlight, and Rochelle passed it over, following close behind him as he started to poke his way back into the garage. "Sure would make movin' Chris easier, and gettin' supplies back."

Nick turned to face the garage door, narrowing his eyes at the smoke creeping in through the edges where tiny shafts of light gleamed. It was faint, but there - and he could hear the crackle of fire and feel the heat as the infected outside burned.

"Yeah, well, you guys better figure it out quick." Nick muttered, lifting his rifle to rest the back against his shoulder, keeping the barrel pointed at the ceiling. He stayed where he was, uncomfortably still in the dark. "I say we get out before this house turns into a torch."

Ellis tossed up a soothing wave over his shoulder, using the flashlight to scan over the cluttered garage countertops, hunting for keys. He found a pocketknife in the process, curiously flicking it open and then closed before pushing it into his pocket. "You worry too much, Nick. Everything's too wet tuh spread much, after all that rain. It'll burn out the fuel'n'that'll be that."
Nick didn't bother to argue. He wasn't interested in literally playing with fire - even if the reality was, Ellis' decision had probably saved them a lot of pain. That was the unfortunate thing with the Georgian's recklessness; nine times out of ten, he was actually right.

"Just look for the damn keys."

Laughing slightly, Ellis shook his head, pushing a small toolbox to the side - and letting off a pleased "ah!" as he did. He scooped up the heavy set of keys lying on the table, bulging with chained trinkets and reward cards from a handful of stores and gas stations. He bounced it in his palm, shining the flashlight on the sedan. "Lookin' good."

"Awesome, sweetheart. Let's get this thing going." Rochelle patted his bicep, taking the keys from him in a swift motion and darting forward to the driver's side door. Ellis' small "'ey-!" clearly protested having them stolen, but he just doggedly followed after her, lighting the way with the flashlight in his hand.

Sighing slightly, Nick shook his head, eyeing his teammates' forms in the barely-illuminated darkness. As much as the prospect of another vehicle relieved him, celebration was the last thing on his mind. He slid his rifle's strap onto his shoulder, drawing his Magnum from his thigh holster.

"Hey, killer." he ordered, simply. The Georgian's head perked, and Ellis passed Rochelle the flashlight before loping the few steps to join Nick at the garage door. He nearly tripped over a half-broken cardboard box on the floor, but did this wobbled limp that kept him on his feet.

Ellis stopped before Nick with curious obedience.

"Yeah?"

Nick could only faintly see him, mostly shadowed in the darkness, though his eyes had grown a little used to the lack of light. He could see Ellis' smile, teeth gleaming, stupidly tickled. "Let's make sure your plan worked." Ellis' head immediately bobbed, pulling his shotgun up properly into his hands.

Turning back toward the garage door, Nick bent down tenderly, finding the handle. His rings clanked softly against the steel as he gripped it, letting his other hand smoothly draw his Magnum into an offensive aim toward the bottom of the door.

Perfectly in time with the tired growl of the sedan starting up under Rochelle's careful hands, Nick yanked the garage door open. It rattled on smooth tracks, slamming up into the roof as it coiled out of sight, and Nick and Ellis quickly turned to take opposite sides, scanning the road.

Fire still burned in puddles of gasoline here and there, and the heat struck Nick's face in a gust. The corpses just in front of the garage door smoldered, the smell enough to send his stomach rolling. The Charger-crushed car sat in a quiet inferno, fire licking at the chassis as it fed off the seats and carpeting inside. Somewhat to Nick's surprise, the fire hadn't spread much beyond that.

The horde was reduced to burnt bodies on the road, having run themselves straight through the fire and not lasted much longer after that. Zombies or no, they were hardly immune to flames.

"Well." Ellis started to say, pride clearly bleeding through his drawl as he turned toward Nick. "Sure looks like it worked out, huh?" He was grinning a little and Nick wheeled on him, perfectly ready to argue about risk versus reward when it came to lighting their surroundings on fire.

He would have, anyway, had a zombie not come sprinting from behind the Georgian, arms up and gloved hands clawing. Bright yellow covered it from head to toe, a hazmat suit swaddling its body.
The only signs that it had even come close to the fire was a small singe mark at its shoulder.

Nick reached out sharply, snaking his arm around Ellis' waist and yanking him to his side. Ellis jumped out of his skin at the unexpected contact, crashing into Nick's side as the gambler practically hugged him to his hip. Swinging his Magnum up, Nick fired off a shot, striking the infected directly in the center of its plastic facemask.

Gore splattered as it exploded within its own suit, and it collapsed rapidly on its own still-kicking legs, hitting the ground with a hissing whine as air escaped its previously air-tight suit.

Slowly lowering his still-smoking gun, Nick glared tightly at the fallen infected, his gaze latching onto the CEDA logo written in bold print over the back of the hazmat suit. "... Jesus." he uttered, quietly - forgetting for a moment that he was still holding Ellis tight to his side. Contact between them was starting to feel entirely too natural.

The Georgian reminded him with a tiny "Uh-", at which point Nick shoved him off unceremoniously.

"Are you guys okay?!!" Rochelle shouted out from the car, and Ellis quickly turned around, red in the face.

"Yeah, we're fine, Ro'!!" His voice only betrayed the slightest embarrassment, and he darted a small look toward Nick - who dodged it, pretending not to notice the discomfort. "There was just this zombie out here. He's in one'uh them… quarantine suit things. Guess it kept him from gettin' burnt up."

Nick took a small step toward the infected, reaching out with his shoe to nudge the thing with his toe. It didn't stir; just sounded a wavering whine as the contact pushed more air out of the broken seal around the creature's ruined neck. "Didn't stop him from getting sick. No wonder they all fuckin' died - if CEDA workers got infected, things must've been chaos."

Rubbing at his forehead, Ellis backed up slightly, waving to usher Rochelle on. "Go ahead'n'pull the car out, Ro'. We should get outta here. We're on a big road now - so long as we don't take no turns, we'll find our way back to the marker trail real easy-like."

The car door shut as Rochelle retreated back into it, and both men moved out of the way as she reversed the car out of the garage. It bounced as she rolled it over burnt corpses, a disgusting kind of squelch and snap sounding as bones broke and organs split underneath the weight of the car. Nick felt his nose wrinkle.

He sighed, approaching as the car halted half on the street. "Got gas?" he questioned, relieved when Rochelle nodded. Pulling open the passenger side door, Nick ducked inside, settling into the seat with a judging crinkle of his nose. The car was cluttered with old fast food bags and the smell of grease was thick and tacky. It would've made him ill, had it also not kind of made him hungry.

The gambler lifted his head, noticing instantly that Ellis wasn't immediately on his tail. He hadn't shut the door, so he craned his neck back out into the humid air, finding Ellis within a few seconds - lingering next to the dead CEDA worker.

"Kid, the fuck? Come get in the damn car."

But Ellis ignored him this time, bending down. He pawed at something on the CEDA worker's body, seeming strangely intent, and Nick raised his voice. He didn't like being ignored, let alone when the Georgian was holding them up from leaving. "Ellis!"
"Ellis, what are you doing?" Rochelle questioned, gentler than Nick. She put her forearm against the car's steering wheel, leaning in to get a better line of sight on their youngest teammate.

The Georgian straightened back up. He had something in his hand, and stared down curiously at it before turning around, raising it up. It was a huge plastic vial, marked all over with signs and labels, like an over-sized prescription tube. Only it was clear and filled with something putrid green, sloshing thickly against the jar's sides as it trembled in Ellis' grip.

"Um... Whut's this?"

Suddenly interested, Nick leaned out of the car. He gestured Ellis over, and the kid loped to close the distance between them, gently offering the tube out toward the older man. Although Nick didn't take it - no way was he putting his hands on it before he knew what it was - he did lean in, gazing over the tube skeptically.

"CEDA Sample 0643. Boomer excretion." he read, mechanically, the realization hitting him about two seconds later. "... It's fucking puke."

It was probably lucky Nick hadn't taken the jar, because more than likely, that knowledge would have had him violently throwing the thing away. As it was, he recoiled strongly, leaning away from the jar like it might burn him. "Are -?" Rochelle blurted, startled. "Are you serious?"

Ellis looked almost ready to start laughing, taking a step back and raising the jar to his face. He wiggled it curiously, examining the sloshing liquid with a wide-eyed look. "Boomer puke? They were puttin' puke in jars? Man, whut the hell! A jar is no place fer bodily functions! Just ask Keith! This one time -"

Nick waved his hands sharply, silencing Ellis before he could even begin. "No, no. Don't. Wherever that is going. Just... no."

A little chagrined, Ellis scuffed his boot against the concrete, gesturing with the jar exuberantly. It sloshed rather chunkily, and Nick very nearly flung himself across the car's inside to get away from its likely trajectory. It was only ego that kept him still. "... Well, I'm just sayin'. Them CEDA folks've gotta be nuts."

Rochelle was quiet when she stated, "Maybe they were trying to study it. You were talking about how it set the infected against each other, remember? Maybe CEDA was trying to weaponize it." There was a kind of seriousness to the way she said it, a grim nod touching her chin. "Something that attracts infected and makes them kill each other?"

Suddenly, Ellis looked fascinated.

"Damn, Ro'." Nick uttered, resting back into the carseat. His brows lifted, gaze narrowing as he moved it toward the dashboard, settling on a bobble-head hula girl glued onto the dash. "You're right. If you could use that shit against them... large-scale, it could be a real weapon. You'd have to collect it, though. You think they were trapping Boomers or some fucked-up shit?"

Shrugging her shoulders, Rochelle couldn't help but sigh. "I don't know. Sounds crazy to me, but you guys are the ones who saw them turn on each other. You'd know better."

Shaking his head, Nick pulled his legs back into the car, resting a hand on his knee. "It doesn't matter much anymore. Whatever they were doing, it didn't exactly stop them from falling apart. C'mon, Ellis, let's go." With that, he shut the car door, resting his forearm against the window.

The Georgian sidestepped back to the back door, opening it up and starting to clamber in - and Nick didn't miss that he still had the jar in his hand. "Ellis." he growled, keeping a sharp eye on the youth through the sideview mirror. Ellis' face twitched into a frown, half in the car.

"But Nick, whut if -"

"You are not taking a jar of puke with us." Ellis opened his mouth again, ready to argue more. "No way." Nick said, fiercely, before he could.

The last thing Nick expected was for Rochelle to reach over and smack him on the arm, lightly. "Let him keep it, Nick." she murmured flatly. Nick started to stiffen, eyes narrowing, but Rochelle overrode him. "That stuff saved you guys, right? There's nothing saying it's not going to come in handy. Ellis knows what he's doing, and if anyone should have something like that, it should be him."

Agitated, Nick sunk down in his seat, eyes flickering out the window. "Fine." he muttered. "But if that thing cracks, I'm leaving you to the zombies, Fireball."

Bouncing with satisfaction, Ellis dropped down into the backseat and shut the door behind himself. "Thanks Ro'!" He grinned rather proudly, settling his shotgun beside himself and focusing on attaching the jar to the shoulderstrap of his gun with a loose lace of leather. Ellis kicked his boot up against the back of Nick's seat, slouching comfortably.

As Rochelle carefully reversed the car out onto the road, the gambler reached down to find the small lever that controlled his seat back's angle. Calmly cranking it, he heard Ellis yelp in pain and protest as the chair jerked backwards, pushing his crooked knee into his cheek.

"Feet on the floor, dumbshit."

Quietly, a sigh escaped Coach's lips, grunting a bit at the end. He shifted his body, slowly, relaxing into the pillow cushioning him against the front of the store counter. He'd made himself comfortable, grabbing the pillow off a beaten-up chair, and settled down beside Christophe.

The Spaniard hadn't shown any signs of stirring. The constant shiver and heavy breaths that escaped him had begun to turn into white noise to the eldest's hearing, and Coach had come to ignore it. The man would wake up on his own time - or not.

His body was weighted strangely with the loss of his arm, and Coach hadn't been able to get him sitting straight. He slumped, favoring his heavier half, chin pressed into his chest in an exhausted gesture as his body rested into the pillows behind his back.

Lifting his shotgun up from his lap, Coach set it aside, digging his bottle of water out from its snug position between two cushions. Cracking it open, the eldest took a heavy draught - but he didn't close it back up.

Swallowing the lukewarm liquid to ease a dry throat, Coach turned a bit on his seat, leaning in toward Chris. "I ain't a selfish man." he explained to the unconscious Spaniard, nudging one hand underneath the youth's chin.

Tipping his face up, Coach let his thumb push his jaw a little slack, mouth opening softly. The part gave Coach an opportunity to press the nose of the bottle against his lower lip, gently pouring just a trickle of water into his upturned mouth.

Coach grazed his knuckles down the Spaniard's throat, encouraging the flexion of muscles that drew the unconscious youth into the faintest of swallows. He muttered a soft few syllables as his mouth gasped open after the gulp, and though Coach initially thought it was nonsense - he realized, belatedly, it was Spanish.

Leaning in, Coach frowned, examining his face for signs the youth might stir... signs that never came, past a fevered shudder of his body, like a cringe from head to toe. The only word he recognized was "madre," and sympathy welled up in the football coach's brow.

The big man sighed, leaning back. Dark eyes gazed a little mournfully at the injured boy, shaking his head. "Remind me of my old team." He chuckled, relaxing back into his cushions, turning the bottle of water in his hand and examining the liquid. "Our runnin'-back was this kid. Family was from Mexico, but he'd never gone too far outta Georgia in his life, don't think. He was scrawny, wasn't too far from half my size, but he was damn fast."

Crossing his arms over his chest, Coach wearily rested the back of his head against the front of the store counter, eyes half-closing. His attention shifted toward the door and the couch that blockaded it, streams of light shining in past its shape.

"Real good friends, me an' him, two boys in a white school. We got snubbed fo' our skin color. Our coach didn't say nothin', but we never got put in the front of photos. Couldn't even see my friend half the time, gettin' stuck in the back, 'cause he was so tiny." He chuckled, stretching a hand down to scratch at his belly. He'd lost a little weight - it was strange, suddenly starting to lose the gut he'd maintained for nearly a decade.

"I hoisted him up on my shoulders, one time. Should'a seen him grinnin', finally gettin' to be the tallest in the lineup."

The memory made Coach smile, eyes crinkling at the edges. He withheld a sigh, shaking his head, patting just beneath his breastbone as his voice grew a little thoughtful - maybe even a little somber. "Lost touch after I busted my knee. He went places, I think. Saw him in the papers sometimes - and then on the TV."

Suddenly, the ex-football player chuckled, shaking his head as his eyes drifted back toward the unconscious Spaniard. "... Look at me, talkin' up a storm like Ellis. And to someone who ain't even listenin'." The tight exhale that left him then was almost apologetic.

He shifted his hands, drawing his shotgun back into his lap. He grasped a handful of his shirt, using the fabric to clean along the barrel of the gun, head continuing to shake as he wiped grime and dirt off the metal. "Ain't gonna lie. You're causin' us some real shit, boy." One brow lifted a little, forehead crinkling.

"But we ain't lettin' you go easy. Ain't like that. If the world's fallin' apart, all it is is more reason fo' good people to stay strong. We let you go, we're givin' up on bein' people. Bein' human. Can't condone that." Coach settled his shotgun down on his lap again, eyes closing. "Don't know if we can save you. If I gotta be honest, I don't think we can. But you hold on, a'ight, son? You hold on."

He wasn't sure why he talked to him. Maybe he thought he could reach him, or maybe he just needed to break the silence. The quiet after he stopped was even heavier than before, though he felt better.

In the moment, he lowered his chin and mumbled to himself, voice calm.

"Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil."

Chapter 115

The sedan's wheels crushed bits of debris into dust as it rolled easily to a stop in the middle of the road. Rochelle's fingers tightened on the steering wheel, then loosened. No one broke the silence for a few moments, all three sets of eyes focused forward in wordless tension, peering through the dirtied windshield at the grocery store before them.

The store sign had been toppled, neon-edged letters misted over, but more important were the words scrawled across the front of the building in yellow spraypaint.

'LOOTERS WILL BE SHOT'

Clearing his throat softly, Ellis cautiously leaned forward in his seat, chin grazing against Nick's shoulder as he poked his head into the front of the cabin. "Well, uh... Y'all think that means there's someone here?"

"Let's hope not," Nick muttered, lifting his hand to wipe his palm across his mouth, a sour taste rising on the back of his tongue. Ellis slipped him a slightly nervous glance, one of his hands gripping on the headrest of Nick's seat, fingertips digging into the fabric. "I've had my fill of crazy."

Frowning, Rochelle lifted her hand, rubbing a knuckle underneath her nose in thought as her other hand reluctantly pulled the gearshift into park. "I don't know, guys. I'm scared to risk it, but this is the best thing we've found in a while. I don't want to pass it up..." She tipped her head, glancing seriously at Nick's face. He met her gaze, but only sidelong. "How do you want to handle it?"

Shrugging his good shoulder, Nick reached out, opening the car door with a cautious quiet. He slid a leg out, pulling his rifle off of his shoulder and checking it over. "You're not gonna like it. Rochelle gave him a dull look, as if that was a given. "Ellis and I go in, you keep the car running in case things go south."

She was quiet at first - then she sighed. A skeptical kind of distaste arched her brows up. Though her tone was scoffing, there was an edge of sincerity. "Seriously? Leave the woman in the car? Why don't we all go?"

Nick's voice lowered to a growl, green eyes rolling upward faintly. "It's not like that. I trust your driving a million times more than I trust Ellis' -" He ignored the Georgian's protesting frown. "- and there's no way I'm doing any getaway driving with my shoulder like this. If there is someone in there, we might need to bolt."

Thrusting up a hand in a pointed gesture, he stated, "I'm not sayin' it because you're the weaker one here, I'm sayin' it because you're the strongest one." That statement significantly changed her posture. Before her grin could widen too far, he asserted, "In this situation."

A laugh escaped her, resting her hands on her lap with a tight sigh. She shook her head, then nodded in compliance. "Okay, Nick. We'll play it your way. But only if you guys promise me that if anything feels even a little off, you're out of there."

Nick smirked, letting off a chuckle. He reached down his thigh to get ahold of his Magnum, tugging it once to make sure it was solidly holstered. "Sweetheart, I'm not gonna spend one extra second anywhere I don't gotta be."
Rochelle rolled her eyes softly, leaning back against her seat and settling her forearm against the inside of her thigh. She tipped her head to the side, glancing back toward Ellis. As Nick slid out of the car and got to his feet to stretch out his body, she whispered back at him, "Hey uh - Ellis?"

He blinked, raising his head and giving her a curious look.

"This is um.. kind of weird to ask you, but -" Clearly hesitant to put the words together, Rochelle sighed, rolling her eyes upwards. "Asking Nick would be even weirder. Asshole."

Ellis bobbed his head in gentle understanding… even though he didn't understand at all. He flashed her a smile, half questioning and half supportive. "What'cha need, girl? I got yer back."

The woman waved her hand a little to encourage him closer, and he grabbed ahold of the back of the seat in front of him to lean forward, cocking his head to offer his ear. He glanced down in focus as she met him halfway, pressing her mouth close to his ear to whisper to him.

"Well - if there's a pharmacy section or something, see if they've got some tampons or something?" She sighed even louder, adjusting her place in her seat before explaining. "It's not urgent or anything, I just really don't want to be caught without. All this stress has me worried I'll be early, and that's the last thing -"

Ellis hadn't said a word, and she trailed off as she noticed his utter silence.

Leaning back a little, Rochelle lifted up a brow and got a look at his face. Panic wasn't really the word, but the horrified 'oh' plastered all over his features spoke to something pretty close.

The moment he realized she'd noticed, Ellis scrambled to cover it up, struggling not to choke as he swallowed and inhaled at the same time. His embarrassment was vibrant and obvious, voice practically cracking with the force he put behind it. "U-uh! I mean - yeah.. sure, Ro', I uh.."

She gazed at him with some amount of sympathy, though that didn't stop her from laughing as he fumbled.

"I'll get 'em! I-it ain't no problem, if you need it, I just, uh -" He was rapidly reddening, and Rochelle shook her head quietly, settling back straight in her seat. "I'll, um -"

She interrupted him, mostly out of pity. "... Thanks, sweetheart."

"Yeah!" Eager to escape before he made more of a fool out of himself, Ellis cracked his door open and scrambled out with his shotgun held tight to his chest - quite nearly forgetting the supply backpack entirely.

Ellis huffed as he reversed to grab it from where Rochelle had tossed it to the floorboard, snatching it up. He quickly rolled himself back out of the car before their eyes could meet.

He heard her trying not to laugh at his discomfort, and he shuffled his feet as he got the bag onto his shoulder and gripped his shotgun carefully to his hip. The bile jar remained where he'd put it, dangling from his gun's strap, one of the fasteners looped around its circumference.

Thankfully, Nick hadn't been paying much attention to them. He glanced at Ellis as the Georgian came out to stand next to him, arching a brow slightly at his reddened face. The question was implicit in his eyes, but Ellis wasn't about to explain.

When he shook his head and averted his gaze, Nick dismissed it out of hand.
"If you get in trouble, don't honk." the gambler ordered with a rather faux-charming smirk, leaning down to peer into the car at their female teammate. Rochelle rolled her eyes, reaching down to flick the button on the armrest of the car door and close the window in his face.

It ever-so-slowly rolled up, squeaking as it went.

He laughed, stepping back, and crooked a finger to motion Ellis after him. The Georgian obediently stepped up, shrugging the bag a little higher on his shoulder. "Let's go, kid." Ellis nodded.

Turning toward the store, raising his rifle up to rest the stock into his good shoulder, Nick moved with a careful gait. One foot placed lightly in front of the other as he advanced toward the door. Ellis mimicked him as closely as he could, lingering just behind him and letting his head swivel back to make sure the street was still clear.

They carefully walked up to the grocery store's glass double doors, and Nick leaned in to squint into the building. Although the lights were out, light filtered in from the doors and wide windows, and it wasn't hard to get a look inside now that they were close.

'Messy' would've been an understatement. Most of the shelving in the front had been flipped over, their contents knocked to the ground. Glass was shattered, plastic was torn open, and puddles of mixing liquid was in various states of drying out across the tile.

Nick immediately seemed to stiffen in disappointment, but Ellis nudged him with an elbow and pointed. "It ain't all wrecked, Nick! There's stuff in the back."

Releasing a grunt, the gambler reached out, touching a hand onto the closed doors. He squinted along the threshold, examining the doorway, like he half expected some sort of tripwire. "We'll see." he muttered, stepping into the center and digging his fingertips into the separation between the two sliding doors.

Pushing with a small growl, ignoring the pain in his shoulder as he flexed it, Nick pried the doors open. They rattled quietly, rolling back into their tracks a few stiff inches, and he was quick to get his gun back into his hands. Stepping cautiously through the doorway, Nick grimaced at the ruined floor. "'Looters will be shot' my ass. Barely anything left to loot."

"You want me to go in first, find us a mop?" Ellis hummed behind him, fighting a grin as his humor bled through. Nick cocked a brow over his shoulder, eyes narrowing. "I can clean up real quick, so you don't get nothin' on yer shoes."

"Ha, ha." the gambler snapped, annoyance rolling his eyes and dragging the corner of his mouth down. Nick cocked a brow over his shoulder, eyes narrowing. "I can clean up real quick, so you don't get nothin' on yer shoes."

"Ha, ha." the gambler snapped, annoyance rolling his eyes and dragging the corner of his mouth down. He pushed into the store, leading with the muzzle of his rifle, and Ellis chuckled pleasantly as he followed after. "Shut up and look around, dumbshit."

Ellis peered inside the store. It was dim, but not too dark, and his eyes rapidly adjusted to the change in light. There were signs at the entrance of each aisle, and though the toppled ones in the middle were buried under fallen and ruined goods, the ones in the back and to either side were still up and legible.

On the far left, he spied a medicinal section - at about the same time Nick did.

They both raised hands to point toward it, but Ellis blustered out words first. "Uh, I'll go look fer bandages'n'stuff. You can - look around. See whut food they got left, I mean." Nick gave him a solid stare for a moment, arching a brow at his clear insistence. "..if yer okay with that." Ellis held as straight a face as he could, trying not to look as nervous as he felt.

Turning away, Nick focused on picking his way through the mess on the floor. "... Alright, whatever. Don't let your guard down."

Ellis was left huffing a sigh, extremely relieved that he hadn't argued. He'd rather not explain the situation - not to mention, Rochelle would probably kill him if he did. The chance of Nick resisting the urge to mock her over it was next to none.

As embarrassed as the request had made Ellis, he wasn't going to let Nick make fun of her.

Shaking his head weightily, Ellis crossed down the tile floor, weight moving tenderly on his bootiveles. He maintained a tight grip on the shotgun in his hands. Even though the store was seemingly quiet, he kept Nick's command in mind.

Blue eyes darted to scan down each small aisle as he passed them, searching the darkness for anything suspicious. There was nothing but mostly-empty shelves and broken piles of goods in most, though a corpse lay down one aisle.

Ellis froze at first - but a second look revealed its head was blown to pieces. He couldn't discern much of the features, but its skin was a dull grey, most likely an infected. He exhaled, soothing himself before he continued along the width of the store.

The medicinal section opened up before him, and he halted in front of it with a blink and a frustrated sigh.

It was ransacked more thoroughly than any of the other aisles he'd passed by. It shouldn't have surprised him, but it did disappoint him. Everything was tossed to the floor in a wild river of empty boxes and torn plastic. His heart fell a little at the sight, and he pushed his arm through the shoulder-strap of his shotgun, shrugging it onto his back.

Carefully advancing down the aisle floor, Ellis let his gaze scan from side to side just in front of his feet, trying to decide if there was anything left. After Rochelle and Coach's success at the pharmacy they didn't need medication; it was bandage material they desperately needed.

It was a few more feet, kicking through empty boxes with the toe of his boot, til he found anything helpful. Buried underneath a small clump of torn packaging was a multi-pack of four gauze rolls, bound in tight plastic. Excited, Ellis dropped down to his knees to scoop it up, shoving it into the backpack and taking more time to look around in that area, hopeful there might be more of the same.

Ellis snatched up a yellow-edged box, eagerly turning it around to scan the front... and was faced by the brightly smiling face of a model, juxtaposed next to the bold image of a white tampon. He didn't know what freaked him out more - the cottony, phallic shape, or the fact there was a halo-esque glow around its edges.

He nearly dropped the box outright.

"Aw, man..." he mumbled, mortified. He tried to grip it as lightly as possible, just barely using his fingertips against the cardboard. Wincing slightly as he nervously - but curiously - scanned over the label, he couldn't help but redden. A distinctly awkward chill raised the hair on the back of his neck.

"The hell does 'super-ultra' mean...?"
The Georgian had never had cause to investigate the intimate details of feminine hygiene. His mother had certainly never brought it up, and it had never come up with the girlfriends he'd had in the past. He knew about it - but he'd certainly never had to purchase anything for them.

His longest-running girlfriend had suffered awful pain every month. More than once had they sat together on the couch watching a movie, her in his lap, a heating pad burning against her abdomen until they were both sweating from the cloying warmth.

Unfortunately, supplying heat and chocolate was the extent of his mechanical knowledge on the subject.

Squinting at the box, Ellis frowned, trying to find some guidance on the yellow-and-green cardboard. He looked from it to the few empty, torn boxes nearby, noticing the differences. They were color-coded and labeled, and the idea of choosing between them only worsened his anxiety.

"'Normal,' 'Ultra,'... Maybe it's like.. uhh.. super-ultra good? Uh.."

When he noticed the tag that exclaimed 'Insertion instructions inside!', he knew he needed to stop looking.

He sighed, straightening up and shoving the box deep into their supply pack. He'd make sure he had the chance to give it to her privately before anyone else got their hands on the satchel - but as it was, he had other priorities.

The longer he lingered, the higher the chance of Nick wandering over.

"Ro', girl, you owe me."
Chapter 116

Ellis took his search in slow steps, kicking his boot cautiously through the clutter on the tile. Whenever he spotted an unopened box, he'd duck down and scoop it up. Uncertainly, he read through the labels, scratching at the back of his neck as he determined if they were of any use.

Most of it was cold medication and antihistamines (a phrase he wasn't entirely confident about until he investigated the explanation on the back), and only hesitantly did he tuck a bottle of the former - a dark red liquid - into the bag. If nothing else, it was a sleep aid, and maybe it would come in handy.

He earned a few boxes of normal bandaids, several gauze and bandage rolls of varying sizes, and two thick tubes of antibiotic cream. One of the bandaid sets was styled with cartoon characters, and he couldn't resist a laugh. He'd trick Nick into using one if it killed him.

Which, upon consideration, Nick might.

A slight smile chanced on his lips. The haul wasn't exactly a jackpot, but the backpack was significantly heavier when he finished packing it. The gauze in particular was valuable, though Ellis wondered if Chris wouldn't need much more by the end of it all.

"Hey, Overalls." Nick called, voice a slight growl as he tried to keep it low, and echoing faintly in the cold, dim store. He sounded tense but not urgent, so Ellis merely lifted up his head and called back.

"Yeah?"

There was silence for a beat, and then Nick spoke in an almost brusque manner. "… Nothing. Just makin' sure." Ellis couldn't help but chuckle, raising a hand to scratch at his cheek, fingertips catching on the scabbed-over cut on his cheekbone from the gun he'd taken to the face several days ago.

"Okay." Starting to get up to his feet, Ellis zipped the backpack up. "'Ey, Nick, I found some shit. If yer findin' food, maybe we should make a few trips tuh the car, really stock up... ain't no sense leavin' without takin' advantage. I'll -"

His voice halted in his throat.

Half-straightened up but still on one knee, Ellis stared straight into the shelf just before his face. Perched in a messy little row, nestled against the feminine hygiene section, was the contraceptive section. Two boxes of condoms sat a few inches from each other - ribbed, according to the bold font on the front.

But they weren't the primary object of his shock, and weren't the cause of the goosebumps that shot up his arms - that was the white and blue box labeled 'K-Y' that froze him in place.

He knew perfectly well what it was, and his face went shock-red. Startled, Ellis blurted a strangled "Uh -" He regretted the outburst the moment it escaped him, hearing Nick's quick footsteps suddenly turn and approach, dress shoes making staccato noises against the tile.

"What?" the gambler demanded, voice sharp.

Ellis wheeled around, backing up so suddenly that he bumped into the opposite shelf, having to quickly grab at the metal to balance himself. "N-Nothin' - I'm fine!" He tried to sound reassuring, but Nick didn't listen. The conman came around the corner with a swift turn on his heel, hands on his rifle, halting when he saw there was no visible danger.

Nick examined Ellis' face... and then the cluttered aisle floor... and then his face again, more intently, scanning over those red cheeks and slightly panicked eyes. His expression was stony as he read that embarrassment - judged it, weighed it. Finally, with a drop of his brows, he swiveled his head to examine the shelf in front of Ellis.

Ellis felt his face burning with mortification, unable to stop staring at Nick. He hadn't meant to call the gambler over - at least not until he'd gotten what he'd say settled in his head. He didn't know what he would have said, exactly, but he knew it would have been a whole lot better than the ashamed stammering that proceeded to escape him.

"I-I - I was just lookin'! I mean, I wasn't lookin' - fer that - I was lookin' fer stuff'n'I just turned around'n' -" He palmed his hand down his face, roughly, groaning with a horrified shake of his head. "O-oh, man, this's gotta be the most embarrassin' thing... I swear, I -"

He silenced when Nick wordlessly stepped forward.

Shock popped Ellis' jaw open, watching in stupefaction as Nick rather calmly plucked up the box of KY and cracked it open, tucking the tube into his slacks' pocket. Without the slightest sign of concern, arching a brow like he were perusing a magazine, the gambler gripped fingertips on the edge of one of the box of condoms and twisted it around so he could examine the labels on the back.

Ellis couldn't begin to find words. He just stared.

"Eh. Too small." Nick casually dismissed, switching his gaze to the second box. A few seconds later, he picked it up, turning around to bounce it in his palm once. Ellis could hear the soft rustle of the foil contents, mesmerized by the calm lechery pooled over the older man's features. "This'll work, though."

Without another word, Nick tossed it at him. The Georgian was so startled he practically fell over himself trying to catch it, losing his grip on it once but re-catching it a little lower. He stared at the box in a daze before lifting his gaze back up to gawp at Nick's face.

The gambler smirked faintly, then turned away, patting his hand over his slacks' pocket. Past the small limp that showed itself in his Spitter-scarred leg, he swaggered confidently with a humored roll of his eyes. "Let's get the car loaded up."

The Georgian stuttered, bewildered and flustered. "J-Jesus, Nick.. you ain't got no shame, man.."

Nick just chuckled, low and seductive. "You aren't stopping me."

Ellis didn't rise to that, silently fighting to calm his heartrate. He tenderly opened the small box with a thumb and crammed a coil of foil packets into the spacious pocket of his coveralls. Hiding them away surreptitiously, he galloped after Nick, flustered into a light sweat.

The gambler led him a bit deeper into the store, where Nick had gathered up a fairly considerable pile of food supplies. Ellis couldn't help but notice that he'd found a surprising amount of real food - he'd gathered together some bags of granola, trail mix, nuts, cans of soup and vegetables.. and water, though it was only a few loose bottles.

"Man, you found all this?" Ellis questioned, a mix of shocked and impressed, leaning around Nick to size up the stash. "Barely scrounged up anythin' over there."

The conman let off a chuckle, shrugging his shoulders and gesturing toward the back. "They cleared out most of it, but I think they were focused on sweets. Kinda like us, back at the 7-Eleven... dumbasses."

That made Ellis laugh, scrubbing at his jaw. He dropped down into a careful crouch, body tilted to stop his shotgun and backpack from falling off his shoulder, and started to gather up an armful. He wasn't going to get too much, minding his injured torso.

It was when Nick shifted away a step, then came back, that Ellis stopped to glance at him. The gambler held out a small dollar bag of blue gummy sharks. They were all swaddled up against each other at the bottom of the clear plastic pack, tails and fins and tiny imprinted faces smushed together. Nick didn't quite look at him, just spoke, shortly. "They didn't get all of that, either."

Ellis felt a rush of heat touch his face, and he ducked his chin slightly to hide his grin under the shadow of his cap's bill. Quietly, as Nick grew visibly impatient, Ellis tugged the candy from his hand and pushed it into the side pocket of the backpack hooked on his shoulder. "Thanks," he murmured, gratefully.

It was such a small gesture - but maybe it was that very quality that made it feel meaningful.

Nick didn't really directly respond, just stepped forward to bend down and start picking up a few things himself. "I was looking for some smokes. I should be so lucky."

Chuckling, Ellis straightened, adjusting his grip on the pile of foodstuffs he held in his arms. He nudged Nick's hip with his own, laughing more when the gambler shot him a dark look at the jostle. "We'll find some, man. but the 'pocalypse ain't a bad time to quit, y'know."

The conman rolled his eyes, looking about as skeptical as ever. Straightening up with an armful of cans and a bag of trail mix under one arm, Nick snorted. He muttered under his breath as the two men turned to start making their way back to the door.

"Kid, that's the worst time."

Ellis could only laugh in response to that, head shaking softly as he ducked through the store doors. They split up, Ellis moving toward the back of the sedan and Nick making a beeline for the passenger side door.

Slapping his palm against the trunk of the car, Ellis waited until he heard the distinct click of the vehicle unlocking. He got a grip on the trunk door handle and hauled it open, awkwardly managing it around his load. He beamed a grin at Ro' through the rear window, but she wasn't looking at him.

"Tell'er whut we got, Nick!" Ellis chirped, pleased, bending in to start piling his armful of foodstuffs into the bed of the trunk.

Nick bent in toward the car window, tapping a knuckle against it as he held his load of cans under one arm. She rolled it down for him, the glass sliding into the door with a soft buzz. Rochelle had let the AC run, so the air that flooded against Nick's face was distinctly chilled, sending goosebumps straight down his neck.

Almost shivering, he quickly reached up to get a grip on his dress shirt collar, tugging it away from his breastbone so the airflow could run down his torso, blissful relief against a furred chest.
"Well, fuck..." the gambler moaned, a little jealous and very lustily. He leaned his face into the vehicle, melting as the cold air soothed against his skin. Even just a short dalliance into the hot day's air was enough to make him sweat, especially considering he had a fever to contend with already. "Now I know why you gave in to staying in the car so fast. Conniving little b"eautiful, intelligent lady?" Rochelle rather cheerfully suggested, reaching out her hand to grip fingertips on the vent that was aimed closest to Nick. Swiveling it around to face her instead, she grinned innocently into his scowl. Before he could respond to that, she prompted, "Well? What'd you guys find?

Nick sighed, straightening up and away from the window. He squinted one eye, glancing along the street thoughtfully as he let his head shake. "Food, mostly. Which is good. Ellis pulled together enough gauze to cover us for a bit, but it ain't like we're home free. Chris'll need a lot of bandages if we're gonna keep that shoulder clean."

Rochelle frowned a little, nodding.

He added, voice lowering in vague lechery, "We might have to sacrifice more clothing by the end. Guess you should go ahead and lose the shirt again, huh, sweetheart?"

"Oh, you wish." Rochelle turned around in her seat, glancing toward the rear window and -though she couldn't directly see him past the open trunk - Ellis. "No sign of trouble inside? Think whoever was holed up in there cleared out?"

Nick snorted, smoothly turning around to rest his back against the side of the car. He crossed his legs stiffly, trying to play off his limp left, and shook his head. Although his whole body felt sore, temples throbbing softly with the pounding of a tired headache, his leg and his shoulder in particular were lit up like fire.

He glanced down, eyeballing his own leg with a thoughtful stare. It only hurt when he overextended himself, and the limp only won out when he was tired, but he could feel the thick layer of scabbing every time he flexed it. Guess it could've been worse, but fuck.

"I don't know. We didn't see shit, though. Whether he skipped town or got killed, he ain't here."

Sighing, Rochelle started to speak, but Ellis suddenly loped around from the back and interrupted her. "I'll take yer stuff, Nick." he chirped obligingly. Nick merely turned at the waist to face Ellis, letting the kid take the supplies off his hands.

The Georgian smiled at him as he did, turning about and doggedly walking back to the trunk. Nick gazed after him, crossing his arms loosely - snapped out of it when Rochelle murmured to him through the car window.

"You make him happy."

Almost violently, Nick swiveled his head to stare her down, spine prickling at the statement. He curled his upper lip, preparing to tear into her, but she didn't give him the chance. Her gaze was low and voice lower, and she spoke with a solid kind of confidence that didn't allow for much argument.

"He's scared, Nick. I don't know that he's ever really been scared until now. People are dying. In his mind, he killed Jerry - and Christophe is dying in front of us. He looks up to you, and he needs that right now. Keep him going, okay?"

Nick wanted to argue. Protest. Dismiss the sentiment. He wanted to say something, but at the same time, he balked. Caught off-guard, he was unsure of how to speak such that he wouldn't really say anything at all.

So he did the next best thing: he shook his head and walked away.

"Whatever."

Almost angrily, Nick limped back to meet up with Ellis at the flank of the car. The Georgian blinked at him sideways, seeming to notice the foul expression on his face, but he visibly decided against mentioning it.

"Wanna get the rest?" Ellis prompted, thumbing over his shoulder with a lopsided smile.

Nick nodded, shortly, and slipped past him to lead the way back into the store.

Rochelle couldn't help but tip her head, watching after them. A sigh left her lips, body slumping softly into the car seat. She raised her hand up, pressing her wrist into her forehead, smiling as she closed her eyes into the air blowing against her face.

It would never cease to make her curious, thinking about those two men as a couple. They were utter opposites, two men that she'd watched get into fights over and over again. But in the same way, it made sense: maybe Ellis and his puppy-dog loyalty snuck right in under Nick's radar, got in deep under the gambler's shell.

It was kind of sweet.

Just hope Nick knows I'd deck him in his pretty face if he hurts that boy.

She had to laugh - really laugh for a moment, shaking her head into the palm of her hand. Resting the pad of her thumb against the bridge of her nose, she rubbed, chasing away a headache before it began. She wished she was a little more confident he wouldn't hurt Ellis, even if she was beginning to believe he wouldn't want to.

Rochelle could still see the hollow loss that had numbed Nick's expression to stone during the spare breadth of time where they'd believed Ellis dead.

It would be lying to say she wasn't eager to get them out in the open, so they could really talk - but that wasn't her call to make. Definitely not then, not with everything else they had to deal with.

Sighing gently, Rochelle made a determined effort not to let her mind wander back to the amputee they were currently responsible for. She couldn't let her guilt control her, not then. We're doing our best. That's all we can do.

Tiredly, Rochelle turned her head -

- and froze when the muzzle of an assault rifle clinked gently into the car window just before her face, steel glinting in the sun. Her eyes darted up, and she could see the silhouette of the woman standing just outside the car, finger on the trigger and head kept low.

Brenda's teeth bared in a grin past bloodied and cracked lips, one finger pressing over them in a hushing motion.
Laughter escaped Ellis' lips as he bent down, head shaking slowly in a fairly bemused gesture. Blue eyes darted a glance over his shoulder, scanning toward where the gambler had wandered behind the store counter. "Nick, are you lookin' fer smokes again?"

"A guy can dream." the older man shot back, his sigh audible even across the room. He pulled open the drawers underneath the counter, peering inside, but his search clearly proved fruitless when he slammed them shut with his palm in frustration. "Damnit. Not even any stashed away for the fucking employees..."

Chuckling as he started making a pile of bags in his crooked right arm, Ellis listened as Nick slammed another drawer and growled under his breath. There was, however, a frenetic energy to his behaviour that dampened some of Ellis' amusement, turning it into sympathy instead.

"Damn, Nick. It's only been like, two days, since you had some. Don't it suck bein' hooked on that stuff?"

Annoyed, the conman pushed his hands flat on the counter, letting his body weight relax onto it with a sigh. He bit at his lower lip, shaking his head - and when he spoke, it was with an edge of sarcasm. "I'd blame the apocalypse, but honestly, divorce put me back on the carton. I only smoked in bars before that shit went down."

Raising his head, Ellis glanced toward the older man. Honest apology streaked across his features, regretful of stepping on that raw nerve again. "Aw, man.. I'm sorry. Didn't mean tuh bring that up."

Nick shrugged. "You didn't. I did." Giving up his hunt, he stepped out from behind the counter, approaching Ellis with a wide gesture of a hand. "It's not that big of a deal. Honestly, it probably doesn't matter at all. Bitch is probably dead, turned into one of those Witches. Good riddance."

Ellis instantly frowned, lowering his arms. He nearly outright set his load back down on the ground, a certain upset turning his brows scrunched. The gambler arched up a brow, not having expected such a sharp response. "Nick - you can't mean that. Ain't nobody who deserves that."

"You didn't know her." Nick muttered, bending down. Reaching for some of the food, he only halted when Ellis suddenly closed a hand over his wrist. Narrowing his eyes with readied agitation, he glanced up - but Ellis' expression was distressed, not accusatory.

Soulful blue eyes searched his, slowly, and Nick sighed in a heavy bluster.

"Look, I'm just blowing off steam. Okay? I got some unresolved issues here, cut me some slack."

The Georgian dubiously held onto him for just a moment longer, but let go after a small shake of his head and a softly repeated "Ain't nobody who deserves that." as he started roughly tucking packages away into his arms. He closed off with a sudden huff, turning his gaze entirely away from Nick, and the gambler was left eyeing him in silence.

Ellis wasn't really talking about him anymore, Nick could tell. He could see it in the way Ellis' shoulders lowered with guilt - not disappointment. Nick wasn't the only one with unresolved issues, and he abruptly regretted allowing his spite to bleed through.

He opened his mouth, trying to curl his tongue around words to say… but shut it eventually, snorting quietly to himself. He didn't like the uncertainty he felt. Admitting his involvement in Jerry's death wasn't likely to go over very well, but it also didn't seem that the issue was resolving itself.

Nick struggled slightly to get his arm crooked properly to cradle the three loose waterbottles he'd found, his shoulder stinging as he moved it. Ellis managed much easier despite his cracked rib, straightening up and turning away. Heavy quiet hung in the air, discomfiting, but neither man broke it.

The gambler didn't even look when Ellis stepped away from him, starting back toward the front of the store, carrying his load in carefully folded arms.

He'll snap out of it once we're in the car. Nick assured himself. He wished he was less unsettled by Rochelle's words earlier. When had it become his responsibility to mind the kid's wellbeing? And when - more importantly - had Rochelle caught onto that?

Sighing with a shake of his head, Nick didn't notice when Ellis halted.

Or when he craned his head, seeming bewildered.

Or when he took a slow and intimidated step backward.

It was only when Ellis' arms dropped in one smooth motion, his entire armload falling to the ground. A can broke open on the tile around his feet, spilling greasy pasta sauce over one of his boots, and the noise made Nick jump straight out of his skin.

"Fucking -!" Immediately, Nick swiveled up to his feet. He barely had time to look the frozen Georgian over before Ellis bolted forward, shoving himself through the open store doors. "Ellis, what the -"

And then Nick realized what he'd seen - or rather, not seen.

The car was gone.

"Ro'?! Ro'!" Ellis started yelling at the top of his lungs, voice tremoring. He spun from foot to foot on the sidewalk, putting his hands up at either side of his mouth, not seeming to comprehend the empty road stretching in front of him. "Rochelle!"

Nick had to run to grab his arm before he started sprinting wildly down the street. He pulled the panicking Georgian to stand still on the sidewalk with a snarl. "Ellis! Calm the fuck down!"

Ellis fought him, whipping around to grab at his arm, eyes wide and breath heaving. Nick grimaced when the kid's fierce hold on his forearm ached, panic digging fingertips into his skin through his dress shirt. "Ro's gone! R- The car's gone! I don't..! She wouldn't'uv left us here! Why would she leave?!"

"I don't know!" Nick hissed back, raising his head sharply to glare around at the road. There were cars scattered here and there along the sidewalk, but none of them was their grey sedan. It was like Rochelle had just disappeared. "Maybe she's fucking with us... Just - calm down! You're going to get us -"

Ellis wasn't listening.

He half-spun around, and the pleading "ROCHELLE!" that bellowed out of him echoed above their heads, voice breaking in half. He sounded so miserable, so terrified. Nick felt a twinge in his chest... but not before a scowl started on his face.
Grabbing at the back of his neck, Nick sharply planted his other hand over Ellis' mouth. The Georgian instantly struggled, trying to elbow him in the side to get free, but he couldn't get leverage. Nick dragged him into a tight embrace against his body, pushing his face into the side of Ellis' and hissing against his cheek.

"Ellis, calm the fuck down. I don't need you losing your shit right now - I need you to fucking breathe so we can figure this out. You are helping nobody by screaming." He could feel Ellis' struggle halt, feel the Georgian leaning into him instead, their bodies bracing against each other.

"Just fucking breathe. Chances are, she's just around the corner, okay? We are going to find her. But you need.. to shut.. up.. before you set a goddamn horde on us."

Ellis stopped fighting, limp in the older man's embrace. And when Nick slowly, cautiously, removed the hand over his mouth, Ellis gasped in a breath and blustered out a shaky "S-sorry.." Nick shook his head in a small dismissive gesture, letting his other hand linger on the back of Ellis' neck even as he pulled away.

The touch made Ellis relax. He huffed, unsteadily, shaking his head repetitively. "If somethin' happened, Nick, I... what if somethin' happened -"

The kid was terrified. Nick had to steel himself, speaking calmly, intent on maintaining a level head. Far lighter than before, he uttered, "Let's just start down the road, alright? We'll re-trace our steps. Whatever happened, the best option is to head back toward Coach. Let's just go back."

Nodding, slowly, Ellis gazed firmly at Nick's face for just a moment before turning his gaze down. "Okay. So long as we just.. let's go slow, Nick. I wanna make sure we keep an eye out. I don't wanna risk walkin' past her or somethin'...

"Okay." Nick agreed, almost coaxingly. Relieved the Georgian had regained his senses, Nick focused on the next problem: his own gut was twisting around itself in painful, hot clenches. There's absolutely no fucking reason why Rochelle would leave. None. What the fuck happened?

Settling a hand on Ellis' shoulder, Nick gently directed him to turn around. He tugged the waterbottles from under his arm and unzipped the backpack just enough to shove them inside. "I'm sure she's fine. Just relax, okay, kiddo?"

Obediently waiting there until Nick had finished, Ellis tugged his shotgun back into his hands. "Yeah." the Georgian responded, quietly, sounding small and unconvinced. He palmed over the barrel, sweat leaving a greasy shine down the old metal.

"Let's go." Nick uttered, and Ellis wasted no time. He didn't bolt, but there was a frantic energy to the way he walked, head swiveling on a constant rotation to examine their surroundings. Nick pulled behind him as he started to walk down the road, keeping in line with his footsteps.

He rested the stock of his rifle against his shoulder, aiming it to the side as he thumbed off the safety. It didn't surprise Nick in the slightest when Ellis started nervously mumbling, voice unsteady.

"H-heh - Y'know, this.. sorta reminds me'uh this one time... Keith'n'I were.. campin' out in the woods. Guess he got up tuh piss in the night, 'cause when I woke up, I couldn't find him. I didn't get nervous till he was gone fer like'uh whole hour. Ended up.. findin' him up this tree.. Never did tell me whut happened, h-heh.. but.. he had claw marks all in the wrong places, man."

"Yeah?" Nick encouraged, voice light, keeping his steps even lighter as they moved down the street. Allowing the kid to talk - quietly - was the least he could do, even if it grated on his nerves. "You let him off easy on that?"

Ellis shook his head a little, chin lowering. He never stopped looking around, scanning the street, gaze darting to either side. His eyes sought for any sign of their lost partner. "Figured somethin' takin' a bite outta his junk was enough."

Cocking his head, Nick let his eye press into the scope of his rifle. Gazing down the sights, he examined even further ahead, though his attention was more on looking for infected than Rochelle. The last thing they needed was to get jumped. "Whatever stops that guy from breeding is fine with me."

Ellis wanted to laugh. Nick could hear it, this choke to his voice as if a chuckle started to escape him - and then collapsed in on itself before it passed his lips. He cleared his throat instead, mumbling a soft, "He don't want kids, anyway."

The stumbling shape of an infected caught Nick's eye wandering out of a building, and he immediately moved the scope to focus in on it. He kept moving, holding his pace, aligning the crosshair carefully over the infected's face. He waited - holding his breath -

And then slammed into Ellis from behind as the Georgian stopped.

The backpack cushioned most of the blow, and Nick's rifle went off, his surprise sending the gun shooting upward as it fired. Nick snarled at the completely missed shot, jerking his head back from the scope, immediately taking a step back to steady himself. "Ellis?!"

Nick could feel his nerves practically snap when Ellis started quick-stepping down the alleyway they'd just come parallel to. Growling, Nick shoved his rifle back onto his shoulder and snatched his Magnum from its holster, changing guns with slick ease. "Ellis, for fuck's sake, talk to me first, will ya?"

He felt his heartrate pick up when Ellis didn't respond, halting just a few feet into the dim alleyway. The asphalt was cracked under his feet, and even in the shadowed stretch between the two buildings at either side of them, Nick saw the dark pool of blood that Ellis stepped straight into.

The tacky red puddle thickened and quavered around the Georgian's boot treads, and Ellis' head drooped low on his neck, silent. Completely silent. Nick could see the shiver start up his body, the shaking - and suddenly every ounce of agitation drained from his body, along with the blood from his face.

"Ellis?!" Nick felt a kind of panic stir in his chest, suffocating him. Something in the very center of him went cold, brittle. He couldn't see past the Georgian. Just the blood.

If Rochelle was laying there, he didn't know what he'd do.

"E-Ellis - " Nick repeated, whispering, voice going throaty with fear. He reached out, ready to shove the youth to the side, desperate to see in the same moment he didn't want to. He so... so didn't want to. He wanted to turn around and never come back, because that was easier.

But Ellis was already stepping out of the way.

When Nick's gaze alighted on the corpse from which the blood had spilt, he recognized two facts. First - after a painful lurch of his heart - he realized that it wasn't Rochelle. A single breath of relief sucked life back into Nick's body, goosebumps tickling up his arms and a real, honest shiver making his body cringe.

"J-..Jesus ass Christ, kid.. I.. thought..."

And then, belatedly, he recognized the second fact.

The zombie had been hewn messily in half from shoulder to bellybutton with only fleshy membranes, shattered bones, and the mess of its innards holding it together where it had bled profusely on the asphalt. Although the pool was still, it was fresh.

A recent kill, from what could only be a blade. A strong, sharp one.

One much like the one Nick could still remember piercing him straight through the shoulder.

The realization hit hard. He could see it still sinking in on Ellis' face - see the real, fierce terror. Terror like he'd never seen on the youth's features, like he'd have hoped never to see. Nick's hands started shaking, and all in one, slow breath, inhaling the gore splattered before their feet, he felt anger flood his veins.

Like fire. Like lava. Like liquefied intent.

"She came back." Ellis ghosted out, almost shocked. He sounded empty - until he turned his chin, blue eyes meeting green, and fear flooded his voice in a wave. "Ro'.. C-Coach.. She came back!"

And she won't fucking live to regret it.

Nick grabbed Ellis' wrist and he ran, pulling the Georgian back out into the street before either of them could say another word. There were no words to say; none that would help, anyway. Nick tasted blood in the back of his throat and he ground his teeth against the copper twang and swallowed.

When Ellis' hand slid to twine fingers with his, sweat slick between their skin, Nick let it happen. They gripped so hard their fingertips left bruises where they dug, Nick dragging Ellis as much as Ellis dragged Nick.

Glistening black arrows guided them backwards - but fear made them run.

Rochelle's fingers bit into the leather steering wheel until her knuckles ached. She kept her eyes on the road, jawline so tense it twitched, refusing to look at the gun hovering just beside her face. She locked her fear away behind tightly clenched teeth, breath coming fast through flared nostrils.

The car rolled down the street, crackling glass and littered paper under its wheels, every noise amplified by the thick silence. Every time Rochelle moved her hands on the wheel, she heard the gun shift beside her face, and her chest clenched - but the shot never came.

Calmly sprawled in the passenger side seat, Brenda rested her arm against the door of the car. Her body was turned so she could face Rochelle and her free arm was raised up to keep the gun pointed at her face.

She'd fallen far from the last time Rochelle had seen her. Her purple blouse was torn, baring the black curve of her bra. Claw marks and slices of torn flesh lined her frame from head to toe. Blood streaked down her body, half of it dried and half of it fresh - and most of it probably hers.

Her nearly-black hair was matted against her scalp, a wild bareness to her bruised face as she'd pushed her hair back and blood had greased it behind her ears. Her stark, strong jawline was taut with quiet anger. But even worse - maybe worst of all - were her eyes.

They were empty.

Brown was stained with greens and yellows into a fierce hazel, their whites bloodshot into an almost damp haze. They were empty, like she couldn't see. Sitting slitted on Rochelle's face, they were nearly unblinking as they stared intently. The emotionless vapidity sent chills along Rochelle's skin, goosebumps betraying her discomfort.

Tremulously, whispering, Rochelle tried to break the silence for the first time. "Y-You're bleeding." Her voice cracked.

Although Brenda didn't react, not even twitching a brow or shifting her gaze, she didn't threaten Rochelle into silence, either. The woman merely stared, by all appearances not even hearing the statement.

So she tried again.

"You should get help for those... if - if we go back - we have medical supplies, we can - "

"Do I look stupid?" Brenda suddenly uttered. Her voice was rough, the sound almost flaking off at the edges, a tremor to it that spoke to restraint... not fear or pain. She flicked with the muzzle of the gun, nudging it closer to her captive's face. "Keep driving."

Rochelle tensed her hands on the steering wheel, forcing her attention to stay on the road. She waited, huffing slow breaths to try and keep herself calm, only a few moments before trying to press it again.

"You're not stupid. At all. So you have to know this is going to end badly for everyone." She spoke as carefully as she could, coaxing, slowly easing her foot off the gas to try and slow the car down without alerting Brenda. *If I can just delay us until the boys realize something's wrong..." Too many people have died already. Just stop."
The woman laughed. Just once - a humored noise that stifled in her throat.

"We can talk this all out. I promise. Nobody wants anyone else hurt."

Brenda's head shook, her gaze taking on an almost sympathetic sheen, like Rochelle were a child. "I know Chris met back up with you." The gun lowered just an inch, and Rochelle took in a real breath for the first time in what felt like ages... but Brenda's voice grew harsh, anger spilling into it, even as it failed to reach her deadened eyes. "Fucking traitors."

"He had a choice. Just like you do - to make it right." Rochelle tried to keep her voice soft, reassuring. "We can make this right. There's always another chance."

Brenda shot back, in a soft growl - though something about the way her voice faded, her lips parted... it was like she wasn't quite talking to Rochelle. "He left me. Like I was nothing to him. Like the Angels were nothing to him."

Rochelle responded anyway. "They are nothing. We're all we have anymore, Brenda, we're just people."

The woman lunged at her, snakelike. Ferocity sent her lips peeling back from her teeth, bloody whites glinting between her chapping lips. Her free hand grabbed Rochelle's shirt, wrenching her closer as she jammed the muzzle of the gun against her cheek.

Rochelle had to slam her foot on the brakes, the car jolting, eyes widening as Brenda pressed her face close to hers. She stank of sweat and blood - and vomit.

"Shut up." she hissed. "That's not fucking true."

But, forcing air through her nose, Rochelle didn't. She whispered back, voice gaining a sudden bite. "You're just a person, Brenda. What the hell else do you think you are?"

Brenda shoved her back into her seat, hard. "Better." Rochelle winced at the impact of her head against the leather cushion, regaining her bearings with a fierce shake of her head. Brenda retreated against the passenger side door again, putting both hands on her assault rifle and jerking it up in a twitch, commandingly. "Keep driving, before I shoot you."

Warily, Rochelle obeyed, placing her hands lightly on the wheel and letting her foot ease off the brakes. She thought - hoped, maybe - that Brenda would hold silent as the car started moving again, but the woman muttered under her breath.

"I should have listened to him... that idiot. We should have killed you from the start. I wish we'd just killed you."

Chills rolled up Rochelle's spine in curdled distress, drawing her brows tight over her eyes as she squeezed at the steering wheel. Her mind roiled in her head, desperate. Brenda already knew about the arrows, so there was no way she could mislead her.

Maybe she could catch her off-guard, get the gun out of her hands... the woman was a loose cannon. If she could make her snap again and grab the rifle...

Brenda's head turned, gaze moving toward the windshield, attention wavering off into the distance for a moment. "I'm not letting him leave. I'm not letting any of you leave." escaped her in a growl, and Rochelle felt her heart rate spike. She was distracted. Would there be a better time?

Instinct went before reason, and Rochelle snapped her hand up to grab for the gun. Her palm struck the barrel before she wrapped fingers around it, jerking the muzzle away from her head - and good thing she did.

Brenda immediately pulled the trigger, and the explosive gunfire deafened both of them in the contained space. Bullets pelleted the roof of the car, metal snapping like paper. The struggle sent the car veering off to the right as Rochelle leaned in to grab for the stock of the gun, trying to wrest it out of the other woman's grip, and Brenda clawed for her face.

The sound drowned out their yells, and it only took a second for Brenda to stop, the shots ringing in their ears like a far-off alarm.

The car hit the curb, bouncing heavily as the wheels struck the cement. Brenda's hand pushed Rochelle's chin up, but the pain didn't stop her from shoving all her weight forward. The butt of the gun snapped into Brenda's face, an audible crack sounding out as it collided with her cheekbone.

"Bitch!" she shrieked, and Rochelle barely had time to react before the dark haired woman returned the gesture. The muzzle of the gun cracked against the side of Rochelle's face, hitting her temple. The collision snapped her head to the side so sharply she felt herself come just to the precipice of blackout.

Going limp, Rochelle - out of purely reflexive self-preservation - retreated as quickly as she could, almost curling back against the door to get away from the other woman's grasp. Although Brenda seemed primed to keep after her, something stopped her.

The car grinded into the side of a building, glass breaking softly as it crushed its right headlight into the wood and scraped off the side mirror entirely. It eased to a stop there, momentum entirely gone, and there was nothing but the creaking of offended wood and the two women's heaving breaths.

Slowly, blinking through a splatter of blood from her struck cheek, Brenda raised her gun to aim it precisely at Rochelle's half-curled body. Rochelle could only half see, vision dark and head throbbing, but she struggled to straighten up in her seat, jaw set fiercely.

"...Drive. The. Fucking. Car." Brenda hissed, each word slow and harsh, spoken with more teeth than lips.

Rochelle didn't have to wonder why she wasn't killed. She was a hostage - a bargaining chip. The best way for Brenda to wiggle her way in until she had the opportunity to kill them all... and there was no doubt in Rochelle's mind that she would.

There was nothing but vengeance in those eyes.

Nothing at all, and especially not humanity.

Slowly, shaking, Rochelle reached down to pull the car into reverse and ease it back away from the house. Brenda's eyes locked back onto her face, and that terrible, deadened focus returned to her expression. Her fingertip played on the trigger, stroking it.

Breathing became difficult again.
"Turn off the car."

Rochelle obeyed stiffly. Her jaw was gritted so tight that her teeth ground together, a small bit of her tongue caught between her molars. It was pinched underneath the pressure - and it had been there so long she couldn't even feel the pain anymore.

Shifting the car into park with slow movements, cranking the gear shift with her right hand and then cautiously reaching up toward the car keys, Rochelle twisted them until the car sputtered and died. The silence in the moments following was thick, leaving only the soft bubbling of the engine as it cooled off.

Brenda kept the gun aimed at her, leaning in to snatch the keys from the ignition. They were bulky with keychains and tags, so she merely tucked the car keys in her jeans pocket and let the rest dangle against her hip.

Rochelle's struck cheek had started to swell, blood filling the thick bruise, and it left the lower lid of her right eye swollen and impeding her vision. She could only see the unclear blur of her captor, unwilling to turn her face toward the assault rifle directed at her head.

"Stay." The order came like one might snap off directions to a dog, and Rochelle felt her ears burn. She didn't move; didn't speak. Just listened to the creak of leather as Brenda straightened in her seat and the crackle of plastic and grating of metal as the woman opened up the car door. They were a few blocks away from the pawn shop and Rochelle felt her heart rate going wild in her throat.

Growling softly, the woman pushed herself out of the car, standing up on the asphalt. She drew the assault rifle against her hip and shrugged her sniper rifle higher on her shoulder. Brenda grabbed hold of the car door as she stepped to the side, gently pushing it until it was almost closed, resting against the locking mechanisms inside.

Alone in the car, Rochelle panicked in silence. Options, options - she had none.

She could hit the car horn. It would maybe give Coach a chance to realize something was wrong.. but it was also liable to bring a horde down on their heads. Brenda would throw her out of the car and let the infected do her work for her.

Her captor had thrown her hunting rifle into the backseat - but even if Rochelle got it, she didn't know if she could get the gun.. aim it.. and shoot before the Angel did. All it would take was one pull of the trigger and her enemy's assault rifle would have her full of holes.

The boys would come up with something. she self-berated angrily. Nick would have a plan already. He would've had a plan the second this bitch shoved her gun in his face. I'm just - But she didn't have time to waste on frustration, didn't get to indulge in hating herself for being caught off-guard. She had to start thinking clearly and quickly.

Brenda's shadow passed in front of the car, black melted over the glass as the shimmering air outside blurred her edges. She moved like a ghost, a flitting, stilted shape that darted around the hood and came to hunch by the driver's door.

Assault rifle casually placed against the glass, she reached down to the handle, opening it just as slowly as she'd closed her own. She twitched the gun to gesture Rochelle to get out, hissing with slurred urgency, "Watch it. It's not too late to get yourself put down."

Dull eyes glinted above bared teeth, and Rochelle felt a chill dart up her spine. That half-dead, animalistic intent was getting very, very familiar.

Brenda looked more zombie than human.

Tensing her shoulders, Rochelle carefully slid her left leg out of the car... then her right... and then the rest of her body, not moving more than one limb at a time lest she set off the unhinged female just a few inches in front of her. She tried to draw herself in as small as she could as she got up to her feet, keeping both hands at her sides.

"What are you going to -" she started, quietly, but Brenda hissed her into silence. The Angel reached up with her free hand, drawing her katana out of its holster on her hip. The metal was almost black with gore, caked and smeared on the edges.

She raised it on a stiff arm, pointing toward the brick pawn shop just down the road from them. "You first." she uttered, half-threateningly, her tongue sweeping over the flaking shape of her lower lip as hazel eyes darted over Rochelle's body.

Inhaling sharply, Rochelle moved to step forward, turning her eyes toward the shop with a tense jaw - when Brenda added, harder, "Slow. Be a good girl." A subtle scowl touched the producer's brows, bitterly fisting her hands at her thighs. The condescension bit at her, an offense that stirred her out of fear and into anger.

Brenda didn't say more. She let her katana swivel to graze its tip down Rochelle's back, dirty steel playing at the grey fabric with caressing threat. She understood the message clear enough: one wrong move, and the sword would slide between her vertebrae.

Footsteps matched in perfect time by the brunette behind her, Rochelle moved carefully to step up on the sidewalk. The blade pressed into the small of her back never wavered, only pressed closer… so close she felt the fabric of her shirt giving way.

For the first time in her life, Rochelle wished they would run into infected. She'd have given anything - anything - for a Smoker or a Hunter to crawl out from some dark hole and snatch Brenda up, or at least force her to use a gun and alert Coach.

Unfortunately, she wasn't that lucky. The horde they'd withstood while saving Christophe had cleared most of the infected near the pawnshop. The street was empty and Rochelle hated it.

Staring down the road toward the blockaded pawnshop that was fast approaching, Rochelle nervously tightened her fingers against her thighs. If she was going to be a hostage, then she damn well wasn't going to be a complacent one.

The words she said to Coach were her best weapon - just a handful of words she had to choose in seconds, with the power to sway the advantage their way. If Coach knew something was wrong, he'd come out armed and aware.

If he didn't...

What was she supposed to say? If Brenda sensed trouble she'd snap, and Rochelle wasn't looking to get any more intimate with that katana than she already was. It had to be casual and subtle but mean something…

But she was panicking. Her heart was beating like a hummingbird's, face numb with heat. How was she supposed to get across her situation without her captor realizing the trick? Anger surged in her veins at just how helpless she felt - and then Brenda suddenly hissed behind her, "Far enough."

They were just at the edge of the pawnshop's block. The building rose up, all musty brick, just feet before them. Rochelle could see the door, blocked up by a tall dresser pressed tight to the doorframe. There was little time left and certainly not enough to come up with a plan.

Brenda leaned in, hot breath leaving a clammy wetness on Rochelle's ear, to growl, "Call them out. Don't do anything you know you'll regret."

It struck Rochelle like a punch straight to the gut - 'them.' Brenda didn't know. She didn't know Chris was near death. She hadn't seen the Witch attack, or heard him screaming and realized he was so badly injured. She thought Chris was fine, and just hiding away with them.

Steadying herself with a shuddered breath and a dry swallow, Rochelle felt something very near a laugh crush her tongue against the roof of her mouth. She felt manic, terrified, riding on adrenaline and fear. That was her chance.

"Coach!" she shouted, inwardly shocked at how level her voice was. "You in there?"

The heavy noise of her own heart filled the seconds before Coach responded. His low tones were burdened with exhaustion, but there was a quiet relief behind them. "Babygirl! Y'all made it back. I was startin' to get worried."

As much as hearing his voice sent warmth tingling down her body, it also sent a large measure of tension through her.

"Yeah," she uttered with a stunted laugh, quickly continuing, every word bringing her closer and closer to the ones that really mattered. Please, Coach. Please play it smart. If you walk out here without a gun... "We found a nice stash, it should get us through a while. The boys are just unloading, uh..."

Her tongue felt like cotton in her mouth; her voice was tense, stifled.

"You wanna get Chris - out here?" She was terrified to push it, but what if that wasn't enough? She had to make it clear. "I know he's sleeping, but Ellis really did a number on himself and we could use the help carrying some things in."

Rochelle knew the words didn't sit well when Coach went quiet.

She was left hanging on air, her whole body shaking with nerves. In her mind, his voice played over and over - "Girl, what're you talkin' 'bout?" - with severe finality. She could hear it clear as day... all the phrases he could say and tones he could use. A million ways to doom her; maybe both of them.

When he spoke, Coach spoke with clarity. Short, simple, like he were just testing the waters.

"Where the boys at?"

She could have snapped in half from the tension. He was suspicious, and that was the best news she'd heard in hours. Keeping her voice casual was the hardest thing she'd done in her life. "I told you, Coach, they're starting to unload the car. You and Chris come on out."

Brenda was getting nervous. Shifting. Rochelle felt it in the way the katana nudged against her, and she knew the woman's patience was paper-thin.
Rochelle startled when the dresser suddenly shook, realizing Coach was moving it out of the way. She didn't have time to exhale before Brenda's arm suddenly snatched around her head, forearm clamping messily over her mouth and her other arm sliding to bring her katana in a press against Rochelle's throat. She held the grip backwards in her palm, blade pointing downward, dirty steel cold against the other woman's neck.

She huffed against Brenda's forearm as the smell of sweat and dirt made her head reel. The urge to struggle was overwhelming, but the metal digging into her skin forced her to hold still. All she could do was grit her teeth and straighten her spine, trying to ignore how Brenda eased flat to her back, breasts pressing against her shoulderblades and pelvis flush with hers.

It was enough to bring bile to the back of her dry throat - the contact and the stench. The pressure of Brenda's stifling arm made the urge to bite her rise, violently, but the blade against her neck dissuaded that line of thinking.

A sense of resignation threatened to sink in when the dresser screeched feet against the wood floor inside, easing out of the doorway... only to switch places with a flood of relief when the first thing she saw was the twin barrels of Coach's shotgun.

He isn't unarmed, thank God.

Coach came out left foot first, easing around the corner of the doorway cautiously. His eyes flicked sideways, quickly followed by his gun. It took him just a second to comprehend what was in front of him. When he did, he froze, nostrils flared wide.

Brenda's voice was tense when she barked, "Both of you. Out." Suddenly, she wasn't so amused.

Anger filled Coach slowly. Not just in his eyes - his whole body rose until he seemed huge, chest inflating and shoulders lifting, fingers crushingly tight on his shotgun. He'd never before looked quite that fearsome.

He didn't waste time asking her if she was okay. He knew she wasn't. "Let her go." he demanded, raising his shotgun till it was level with his shoulders, finger twitching toward the trigger but not quite curling over it. "You don't wanna do this, girl."

Brenda didn't laugh. She hissed, spit dusting Rochelle's ear with every harsh syllable. "Or what? You'll shoot me? I'm sure it'd go right through your babygirl, if you wanna take her as collateral."

Coach's fingers tightened.

"Where's Christophe?" the brunette demanded, broken eyes darting toward the doorway as her teeth caught against her lower lip. She raised her voice, tone sharpening with a taunting edge. "There's no back door, I know that. Is the coward hiding? From me?"

Eyes darkening, Coach seemed to shift. He jerked his shotgun upward, stiffly shaking his head. "No. Boy was checkin' out the houses around here when y'all showed up. You might wanna watch it." That panicked her, and she darted a glance around the street. "He took a huntin' rifle, an' if he don't already got a bead on yo' ass, he sure will real soon. You wanna talk, girl?"

Abruptly, Brenda stopped.

A grin tugged the edge of her mouth up, and she cocked her head, re-foocusing her eyes on the football coach. Turning her chin, she murmured into Rochelle's ear with a suddenly husky tone. "You should teach him how to lie."
Lifting her head, she asserted, louder, "See, what's funny about that.. is I happen to know just how many hunting rifles you have. Two. She had one -" she shrugged her shoulder to jostle Rochelle. "- and that asshole in the suit has the other."

Her smile widened, pleased. "Which leaves you high and dry."

She twitched the katana so fast Rochelle almost didn't realize she'd been cut before Coach shouted a booming "NO!", body lurching forward a step. A sharp pain etched along the side of her neck, and for a delirious moment, Rochelle had no idea how deep or serious it was. Maybe the blade had slid through her jugular and she'd simply not recognized it yet.

She surged back against Brenda's front in reflex, trying to get away from the blade, breath shallowed to a hiccupped rate - but the hot blood that snuck down the side of her neck was just a small trickle. She was left dizzied, but relieved.

"Don't fuck with me." Brenda stated flatly. "Where. Is. He?"

There was just a long enough silence between the three for Coach to reluctantly drag his gaze back toward the Angel, teeth gritted. The eldest jerked his head toward the pawnshop. "In there." he muttered, voice loaded with withheld anger. "Ain't doin' good."

Brenda chewed her teeth together, shifting her eyes over his face judgingly. "What's that supposed to -" Rochelle interrupted her, grunting in frustration against her forearm. The brunette narrowed her eyes before peeling her arm away.

Clenching her jaw against the urge to spit, Rochelle spoke with a rough voice. "He saved us from a Witch. It hurt him, he.. lost his left arm. The whole thing."

She could see that crack again; the break that sundered Brenda's whole self in two like wet paper, clear as day in the lifeless gleam of hazel eyes and pale sweat of her skin. The woman stared at her - then up at Coach, whose expression was grim - then hissed, low and sharp and demanding. "No. You're lying. You're lying to me again."

Rochelle tried to shake her head without moving against the blade to her throat. “I-I’m not. I’m sorry. I don’t know if he’s going to survi-"

“You killed him.” Brenda uttered, hollow. Rochelle tried to open her mouth, but the woman was already off, digging the blade tighter against her throat. The pressure made her squirm, tensing, breath halting. She was afraid to swallow, lest the bob of her neck slit it open against the steel. “You killed him, you fucking cunt.”

Coach lifted his left hand, palm flat, tone urgent but more level now. “Boy ain’t dead yet. Don’t be jumpin’ the gun here. He ain’t dead, an’ you still got a chance to turn this ‘round, girl.”

A frantic laugh escaped Brenda, lifting her other hand to point her assault rifle sharply at Coach. The sword eased away from its tight press on Rochelle’s throat again, sliding to cross diagonally over her chest instead. “Get him out here.” she hissed.

Hesitating, the big man shook his head slowly from side to side. He spoke honestly and carefully, eyes darting between the two women - and then past them, for just a split second. “I…” His posture stiffened, speaking a little quicker. “We can’t be movin’ him. He’s gotta stay stable if he’s gonna get better. You wanna go in, let’s go in.”

The Angel laughed again, harsher this time, her eyes narrowing with threat. Her voice trembled as she spoke, and something in it read like fear. “I’m not asking you. I’m telling you. Get him out here, or I will cut her throat. I’m not letting you kill him, like you killed Jerry.”

The sharp Northern voice that came from behind them sent both women jumping out of their skins - though for different reasons. Coach’s expression held strong with thinly veiled anger.

“I’ll take credit for that one, actually.”
Chapter 120

Sharp shock distorted Brenda’s features into a scowl. She spun on her heel, violently taking Rochelle with her. Both of them stumbled as she dragged her backwards, retreating more into the road as the brunette choked out a laugh and flicked a glance down the street.

Rochelle struggled to breathe with the katana pinned so close to her throat, eyes widening as she took in the two men approaching slowly. Nick and Ellis stood side by side, drenched in sweat and clearly winded.

Nick was wheezing softly under his breath, expression masked with a hateful veneer, and Ellis was hunched over his injured ribs. They’d run hard and suffered for it - not that exhaustion stopped the conman from drawing into a cocky smirk.

"Only thing I regret is not getting the chance to actually see him go down." He ignored the way Ellis tilted a confused look toward him, and ignored the slow way his words processed. The Georgian didn't say anything - just frowned, a frown which only grew in the moments that followed. "Your boyfriend was a huge jackass."

The Angel quickly drew into just the right position to keep Rochelle between her and the three men now opposing her. Coach’s expression had fallen to something blatantly furious, and he kept his shotgun pointed at the two women even as he glanced toward Nick and Ellis.

Brenda met Nick’s gaze dead-on. “You trying to be funny, asshole? I’m not in the mood.” She was more than happy to illustrate her point with a nudge of her cheek against Rochelle’s ear, making the shorter woman cringe, unable to pull away.

As much as the sight of the two men was a huge relief, it also struck her oddly.

Nick was holding a hunting rifle, Brenda had been right about that. They could have snuck up from an alleyway, and one bullet to her skull would have been enough. Then again… Nick's been missing shots all morning. If he wasn't willing to risk it, he'd never make Ellis do it.

Suddenly, doubt flooded her. They have a plan... don't they?

"You kidding? I am so in the mood." Nick shot back, cocking his head to one side as a grin cracked over one side of his mouth. "You're one big joke, sweetheart, and the punchline's got something to do with a padded room."

Brenda clenched her hand on the grip of her sword, darting a glance back toward Coach. The big man hadn't moved. He wasn't daring enough to try anything, not with Rochelle hanging in the balance, but there was frustration painted all over his face. He was pissed, and the sight made Angel's lips twitch into a grin.

Ellis cleared his throat, finally breaking into the conversation before Nick could ratchet the conflict up any more. There was a strained huff to his voice as he and Nick advanced slowly. "Listen, y'all, we can talk this out. Okay?" He turned his shotgun in his hands, dragging the strap off his shoulder and holding the gun out on flat palms in a subservient gesture. "Ain't nobody gotta get hurt."

Nick struggled to stifle a scowl, shooting a glance at the Georgian beside him before angrily releasing his hold on the trigger of his rifle. He flipped it, holding it by the barrel, expression stuck in disgust. He wasn't happy, either, and hid it about as well as Coach did.

When Brenda flicked her gaze back toward Nick and Ellis, it was the younger man she focused on. A little glint touched her eyes, and her gaze scanned over his face slowly, examining his features and lingering with a tight squint as if to find a weakness.

He flinched, just a little.

"Far enough, you two," she spat.

They both halted a yard or two away, guns held in front of them. Coach couldn't hold himself in any longer, hissing angrily, "What the hell are you boys thinkin'?!" Neither responded, though Nick's expression was one of dull agreement.

Brenda held back laughter, a restrained little giggle hitching in the back of her throat. She bent her head down, pressing her mouth near Rochelle's ear to whisper with a mocking purr at the edge of her voice. "There's your cavalry, princess."

Rochelle jerked her head away from the touch of cold lips, biting hard at the inside of her cheek as her eyes started stinging and muttering a defiant, "Fuck you." She refused to believe her teammates were laying down their arms without a plan… but her hope was flagging.

"You people." Brenda's head shook slowly, a kind of serene lift to her mouth. "You're incredible. How are you even still alive?"

Nick gave a hollow smirk, raising his voice to retort. He ignored Ellis' furtive little glance, trying to urge him to stop the antagonizing. "You should really be taking notes, considering all the rest of your team is sorta... y'know. Dead or dying. Guess that whole 'chosen ones' thing didn't work out too great."

The brunette stared him down, smile gone. Her expression went vapid - then furious.

Nick, however, wasn't one to flinch.

"Let's get those weapons off you." Brenda pulled her arm from where it was draped over Rochelle's shoulder, re-adjusting her grip on her assault rifle. She slid her finger against the trigger, straightening out her arm and raising the weapon so she could gesture with it. "All of you. So we can talk."

When Ellis took a step forward, Rochelle broke. She jerked hard against Brenda's grip, feeling the katana's edge press into her neck as she shouted out, "You can't -!"

Overpowering her immediately, the taller woman had Rochelle wrestled back into silence within an instant. She could only fight so hard when that dirty blade was one swift slide from slitting her throat, and the way Brenda jerked it tighter against her skin had her gasping for air. "Shh, shh," was crooned against her ear, taunting. "Let's play nice."

Once the woman stilled in her arms, angrily panting, Brenda gestured with her M-16 again. She grinned slyly at Ellis, cocking her head with a cursory glance down his body. "C'mere, cutie. And bring your friends' guns, too. Both of them."

The mechanic gulped, head bobbing as he darted a glance between Nick and Coach. He was faced by anger and disappointment, Coach shaking his head fiercely back and forth while Nick gritted his jaw in a far subtler but no less furious gesture.
He might have lost his nerve had Nick not jerked his wrist, offering the gun out to him. Green eyes refused to match his, but there was something in the small movement that, if nothing else, resigned control to the younger man.

It was that tiny sense of encouragement that pushed Ellis to move. He tucked his shotgun underneath his arm, lowering his eyes slightly as his left hand grasped around the hunting rifle's stock and peeled it away from Nick's hand. Tucking his arm into the shoulder strap, Ellis bit his lip, beginning to step away and lift his eyes toward Coach -

- but Brenda uttered, "His pistol, too." and Ellis had to stop.

Nick had the most impassive look glazed over the agitated downward tilt to his mouth. It almost seemed like he might try to argue - however, it was only after a split-second of thought that he growled. He reached a hand back to tug his dress shirt up out from its tuck under his belted slacks, baring the Magnum nestled against his lower back and holstered in by his belt.

The gambler yanked it out by the grip and stuck that out toward Ellis, too. Chewing at his lower lip, shamefaced, Ellis took it.

There was a cruel kind of enjoyment plastered all across Brenda's face, practically tasting the discontent in the air as Ellis made the agonizingly long walk to Coach's side. The entire time, the ex-football player's head was shaking like a jostled bobblehead, rounded jawline getting tighter as Ellis grew closer.

Ellis' mouth started to open, eyes squinting faintly in a look that came close to pain, but Coach never let him talk.

Unlike Nick, he looked Ellis right in the face as he angrily jammed his double-barreled shotgun out toward the younger man. It was the fiercest Ellis could ever remember him looking. Disappointed. Hurt sent his shoulders drooping even as he silently took the gun from the other man's hands and tucked it to his chest.

Inhaling a deep breath, calming, Ellis turned around, facing Brenda. He swallowed hard and started slowly walking a straight line toward her. All four guns were carefully held in non-threatening positions: his shotgun under his arm, Nick's rifle slung over his shoulder, his Magnum and Coach's shotgun in either hand but with his fingers away from the triggers.

"I didn't expect you to be the sellout here." Brenda mused with a wild grin, watching Ellis slowly step toward her. He tightened his jaw against the jibe, ears reddening, in silence. "No more sugar, huh? Guess you're a one trick pony. Too bad."

The youth stopped just in front of her, Rochelle trapped between them. He chanced the smallest look toward her face, but there was such abject despair on her features that he couldn't stand it.

"Go on. Drop 'em."

Slowly, Ellis lowered into a half-crouch, lips drawing into a frustrated line. Brenda noticed, smirking slightly and running her tongue over her upper lip. She couldn't resist continuing to rile him, a gleeful hum to her voice. "And my girl here thought you'd come save her. That's what you get for trusting people."

As Ellis gently placed the weapons down in a pile on the road, one after the other, he didn't expect Rochelle to say anything. Her voice was strained, and there was a layer of rawness to it that made his gaze lift.
"... Don't listen to her." Their eyes met, then broke away again, and Ellis was left with the faint image of Rochelle's eyes growing wet as she forced out words. "It's.. it's okay, Ellis." His brow knotted softly, heart aching in his chest. "You did the right thing."

His hands slowly flattened over the shape of his shotgun as he placed it at the top of the pile, blue eyes lifting up to glance out from underneath the bill of his cap. He didn't look at Rochelle - he looked straight at Brenda, matching her gaze solidly.

"You came back fer Chris."

The woman snorted, running her thumb along the hilt of her katana in thought. The sword was heavy, and with all the weapons now in her control, Brenda let her wrist relax. The blade settled against Rochelle's shoulder; it was still a threat, but one that allowed her to breathe. She slumped faintly, eyes lowering, entrenched in a stinging sense of shock.

Had they really given in - just like that?

There was no one else coming, no one else to save them. Brenda could shoot them all down where they stood and there was nothing to stop her. Surely they knew that? Surely Nick, at least, knew that?

"Nah. She came back 'cause she missed us. Adorable, really." the Northerner muttered, humor grating in his voice. He received a fierce glance from the katana-wielding brunette, so genuinely threatening that he couldn't bite back a small grin of victory.

"Shut up, Nick." Coach growled from where he stood, fists clenched at his sides. The gambler barely reacted, shooting a small glance toward the eldest before shaking his head. Coach took a small step forward, an aggressive tension in his shoulders. "This funny to you?"

Nick's grin disappeared, replaced with the minute quirk of a frown at the edges of his lips. "Yeah, sure. Hilarious." He almost leisurely dragged his gaze toward Rochelle, brow twitching upward. "I find this whole situation hilarious."

The look suddenly caught Rochelle's attention. There was something... something beneath the surface. A feeling, an inkling, that surged hesitant hope through her veins that they might actually be playing Brenda after all. Rochelle blinked past watery eyes and started watching.

What am I missing..? Shit..

"How about all of you shut up?" Brenda hissed, lifting her assault rifle to point it straight into Ellis' face. The Southerner stared down the muzzle of the gun, no real panic in his eyes, but the rest of the group tensed - including Nick, who tightened his fingers into a curl until his nails dug into his palm.

"Bring Christophe out."

Ellis cleared his throat, slowly standing back up from where he'd bent down to pile the guns together. Brenda followed his face with the nose of her assault rifle but didn't seem to fear his movement. As he reached his feet, he gestured flatly with both hands. "No."

Brenda's sharp jaw set forward, humming under her breath as she licked at her teeth. She glared, shaking her head, fury rising at the refusal. "No? When will you traitors understand - I'm not asking." she spat out. "Get him and put him in the car."

"We can't." Ellis explained, voice as coaxing as possible. "It really ain't a good idea. If we move him, he might not make it." Blue eyes darted to Rochelle's face as he took a gentle step backward, matching her gaze with a strange fierceness before returning his to Brenda's. "He ain't strong enough."

The Angel tightened her finger on the trigger, mimicking Ellis' step with one of her own to keep in line with him. Rochelle was forced to stumble forward with her, foot kicking out to balance herself. The motion collided the toe of her boot with the end of Nick's hunting rifle, laying on the ground, in a clank of metal and wood.

It was there that Rochelle pieced it together, and her relief was tempered by panic.

They had a plan, and it was her.

Nick couldn't have shot Brenda with Rochelle so close. It was too likely to miss - or Ellis wasn't willing to let him. Instead, they surrendered the guns... placing them just in front of Rochelle... and lulled the Angel into a false sense of security. It had worked, after all; the woman's katana was limp and relaxed against her shoulder, like Ro' were the least of her concerns.

Brenda had a height advantage, but Rochelle had the element of surprise, now. If she could just drop to her knees, she could get a gun and turn the tables. This close-range, there'd be no aiming involved.

Drop, grab a gun, turn, pull the trigger. Shoot her.

The realization must have shown on her face, because when she looked back up, Nick's eyes were cold as ice on hers.

"I don't think he'll make it, period, if I'm honest." he interjected, tone humorless. He was buying her time, and keeping Brenda's focus. "Witches are like a woodchipper on legs. Or a giant pair of weepy hedge trimmers." The Angel stared at him, and he kept going, eyes slitting in a self-satisfied squint. "If you came back to kill the guy, he's half there already. Not even worth the bullet."

Brenda's eyes widened, hazel going taut with fury. "I'm not here to kill him, you idiot. I'm here to get him back." the woman hissed, the frills on the chest of her purple blouse taking a gentle heave as her breath shallowed. Something bled through her voice - something desperate. "He doesn't belong with you."

Raising his hands in a plaintive gesture, Ellis tried to reason with her, voice as soft as he could manage. "If you care 'bout him... this ain't the way tuh save him."

Something in Brenda's posture went tight, but it was a disdainful laugh that escaped her, and a suddenly wistful fury that crossed her expression. "So I should leave him with you? Jerry's dead because of you - Christophe is all I have. I'm not letting you keep him."

Nick snorted, cocking his head, arms frigidly lifting to cross over his chest. He moved confidently but slowly, like sudden movements might startle Brenda. "What happened to 'no friends, no family'? Can't hack it alone?"

The Angel snarled her lips back from her teeth, bristling. She jerked another step forward, raising the muzzle of her assault rifle to point instead at Nick. Rochelle was forced to follow again, pushed by Brenda's body against her back - she was within arms' reach of the pile of guns, now.

"Don't push it. The only reason you're still breathing is because Chris would -"

She froze. Something flickered in her eyes, like visible thought, and whatever emotion was left on her face drained into cold realization. "If he's so injured… he won't even know what happened."
Brenda muttered, as if the fact hadn't occurred to her until that moment. "I can just tell him the zombies got you."

She laughed, voice crystal clear, the sweet sound so disparate from her wild countenance… and then she braced her elbow, finger tightening on the trigger.

There was no time left to consider the consequences.

Rochelle lurched, thrusting her palm against the grip of Brenda's assault rifle, sending it wildly askew. When the trigger pulled, it spat a violent spray of bullets, the explosive pops sending stabs of pain through her eardrums. They peppered the road, puffs of black asphalt following in their wake.

The producer caught a flash of blue and yellow: Nick and Ellis throwing themselves to the ground to get away from the gunfire. She couldn't tell if they'd taken hits, and there wasn't time to look or let the thought terrify her. She had to focus.

She kept her hand fisted over Brenda's, forcing the Angel's finger to remain stuck on the trigger, rapidly expending the magazine. It was more reflex than conscious thought, arm locked and muscles clenched to force the assault rifle as far to the side as possible.

Too far, in fact. Her weight pushed the gun to the side until bullets flecked onto their sedan's nose where it sat down the street. Dull metallic thunks sounded as they struck the grille and vanity plate in a wide spread, along with a pop and the fierce whining sound of air escaping a tire.

Brenda's voice roared in her ear, distant and muffled, and the katana jerked up from her shoulder as if to slash for her throat. Reflex sent Rochelle's other hand up, and before she could think, she clasped her palm over the blade to stop it.

Pain split down her nerves as the blade slid against her flesh. She didn't know how bad it was - all she could do was shove with her hand, holding the sword at bay. Most of the leverage was at Brenda's wrist, twisted awkwardly. It wasn't hard to contest her force, but if the Angel wised up and yanked the blade vertically… it might just slit through her hand entirely.

She had to do something else.

Rochelle was aware of her own voice yelling incoherently, and before Brenda could react, she lifted a leg and stomped her heel back blindly. It collided with something, and there was a dull cracking sound and a heightened snarl of fury - of pain.

All she knew was the Angel pulled away from her, staggering, and she could hear the clatter as Brenda threw her spent rifle to the ground. She seized the opportunity to lunge down to her knees, and grab at Nick's hunting rifle. Blood smeared along the grip as her sliced palm gushed against it.
The slickened wood almost dropped from her hands, and the pain almost made her flinch and let go… but she gritted her teeth and held on.

Rochelle didn't twist around so much as throw herself onto her back, rolling, dodging away in the fear that Brenda had advanced on her in the time it took to collect the gun. She landed past the pile of surrendered weaponry, thudding flat on her back and catching her knees in a bend, the gun aimed up from her prone position.

The Angel's katana stopped mere inches from the barrel of the rifle, Brenda barely skidding to a stop where she'd lunged to impale it through the producer's body. She was unsteady, stance wobbled; her weight was balanced mostly on one leg in a way that betrayed how Rochelle's kick had damaged her other knee.

They both froze. There was a moment of silence, only broached by the rustled sound of Nick and Ellis picking themselves off the ground, and Coach advancing cautiously.

Rochelle's finger was on the trigger, hunting rifle aimed right at Brenda's navel. She trembled, holding still - she didn't want to shoot. Didn't know how. Her muscles protested, the rifle suddenly heavy as lead in her hands. Heavy and hot, like it were burning her skin.

Oh God. I can't -

Gazing from the muzzle of the rifle to Rochelle's face in a slow drag, a sickly smile baring her teeth, the Angel chuckled. It was an almost airless sound, more a shrug of her body than an actual noise. Maybe she saw the hesitance, and figured the other woman wouldn't shoot.

Maybe she didn't care.

Something spiteful touched her eyes, right before she flipped her grip on the katana and hefted it, like she meant to drive it down through Rochelle's abdomen. Like it was a poker, and she was merely collecting litter on the roadside. Brenda took a step forward, haggard from her injured knee, and her arm raised.

Rochelle wished she could say she didn't register pulling the trigger. She wanted to have the gun just go off in her hands. She wanted to have it be a blur of adrenaline and motion, something she'd forget. Something transient and far-off. Like a dream, with her mind losing its grasp on more and more details with each passing second.

That wasn't what happened.

She felt every muscle in her hand and her arm as she pulled it. She knew with clarity the instant where her body shifted, the instant where she decided to do it. It was with full awareness that she pulled her index finger into a curl. It was with conscious choice that she felt the trigger resist, catching - and pulled harder.

She didn't even aim, but Brenda was so close it didn't matter.

The bullet pierced her midsection, and it did so almost unceremoniously. The shot had gone askew from her core, hitting just between her navel and waist. There was no blast or force. She didn't stagger. It almost didn't stop her at all - and then dark red blood pooled up through the purple fabric of her blouse where it stretched over her hip.

Then she did stumble.

The Angel wobbled forward, then went lurching unsteadily backwards until her heel hit the edge of the sidewalk and she went down. A keen left her, enraged, landing hard atop her sniper rifle and dropping her sword in favour of clasping both hands over the growing spot of blood.

"Fuck -" escaped her lips, gasped. "You - bitch -"

Rochelle didn't realize her teammates had started running until there were suddenly three sets of hands on her. Coach grabbed around her waist, and nearly picked her up entirely. Ellis' hands landed on her shoulders, ghosting a touch.

"Ro’… Christ. You a'ight?" Coach's voice was drawn in something very near agony, tone short and pained. He tried to meet her gaze, but she couldn't look away from Brenda. From the blood blossoming in the fabric of her blouse.

_I... did it._

Nick's hand touched her waist - but only to push underneath her, grabbing his Magnum from the ground. He straightened and stepped past her, drawing close to Brenda, silent at first. His expression was impassive as he watched the blood dampen and then trickle around her clutching fingers.

It was almost casually that he raised his pistol and trained it on her, and his tone was conversational when he spoke. "You made the wrong choice. Should've kidnapped Ellis - he probably wouldn't have shot you."

Brenda's head lolled back, hitting the concrete, and she laughed. It was a sleepy and drunken sound, honest amusement at the wings of her wheezed breathing. "Should've killed you... first thing."

Nick grunted, like affable agreement.

Though Rochelle's fingers were numb as Ellis pried the rifle out of them, they dumbly relented and loosened. He handled the gun almost squeamishly, avoiding the huge smear of bright red blood from her palm. "Yer hurt..." he mumbled, and it was the frightened tremble to his voice that shocked her into sense.

Rochelle forced her eyes to leap toward Ellis' face, distantly aware of the wetness falling down her cheeks. They didn't feel like tears - but there was nothing else they could be, she supposed. "I'm okay." Her voice sounded far away, like her ears were stuffed with cotton.

The mechanic set the rifle down, hand sliding to cradle under her slit palm. Blood was welling up fast, painting her skin a ruby colour, but the pain was almost an afterthought. Her nerves buzzed with something else, and she felt like she was floating a few feet above her body.

_Am I?_

"I'm sorry, Ro' - I didn't want... I didn't..." Ellis was mumbling under his breath, shaking his head, jaw going tight as he clenched his teeth against a wave of emotion. "I didn't mean tuh make you -"

There, coldness leeched into her body. Her senses snapped into sharp focus as if her body only then recognized what it had done. It was like jolting awake, forced to contest the strong feeling that she'd been dropped from a height - and there was nothing but dread and pain in the pit of her stomach. "You didn't."

She shifted as if to get up, but both men held her down, wordless sounds of protest escaping them in unison. Rochelle inhaled, eyes snapping shut. She didn't want to relent; she wanted to get up, walk it off, escape the sick feeling tugging and cutting at her insides. "She did."

Brenda tried to laugh again, but the attempt turned into a sputter, seizing up the muscles of her midsection. Nick took advantage of the moment to bend down, Magnum still trained toward her face. He grabbed the barrel of her sniper rifle and tore it off her shoulder, yanking the strap down her arm.

The jostling drew a snarl of pain from her, and she rolled slightly onto her side. "You're kidding you...rselves." The bleeding accelerated with the twist, staining to her waistline as she turned. Her words were taut and strained with agony, but she spat them out with force. "This - this is all there is
It had seemed, at least for the moment, Nick was fairly calm - like the mortal wound she was suffering had defused his anger. However, with a flash-fire of resentment, he lifted his bad leg and kicked the toe of his dress shoe into the backs of her clutching hands.

It was barely more than a loose swing, driven purely by the momentum of his leg, but even that was enough to send Brenda curling around her midsection. She let out a howl of anguish as her body spasmed around the gunshot.

"Nick -" escaped Ellis, tone fractured around the name. "Don't…" It was more a plea than a chastisement, but it was enough. The gambler let his weight slump back onto both heels, brow arching up in a sarcastic and hollow facsimile of innocence.

"You wanna hear her talk?" he muttered, disbelieving, expression falling into idle disinterest. He plucked at his dress shirt, peeling the sweat-stained fabric away from his body with his free hand. "I'm pretty done, myself."

When Rochelle pushed as if to stand again, her teammates let her. With a hand steadying behind her back, Coach helped her catch her footing, even as Ellis mimicked her posture the whole way to stay at her side. His hand was still clutched under hers, but she gently pried it free, curling her fingers and holding her arm to her chest instead.

Steadying, initially afraid her knees might buckle, Rochelle lifted her gaze toward Brenda. She took a few steps, drawing away from Coach and Ellis. "Why?"

Nick crossed one arm over his chest, leaving the other to maintain his Magnum's threat on the prone woman. His expression moved into something disgruntled, but he didn't say anything.

Brenda barely acknowledged Rochelle at first, too focused on cradling around her wound. "I thought you came back for revenge." Exhaustion was settling in as the adrenaline drained, and Rochelle found her hand pulsing with jagged pain. It was hard to keep her fingers from twitching, and every flex sent fire over burst skin. "But you weren't even going to kill us, not until you realized Chris might not find out."

That was enough to catch the Angel's attention, and she struggled in a gasp, lowering her chin to slant a glare toward Rochelle. Her eyes were dull - resigned. The dying woman didn't look like a wounded animal like she expected. The wild energy was gone.

That was a little worse.

"Things -" Brenda began, but then blood fell from her lips. The sensation seemed to startle her, chin lowering, but she merely ran her tongue over her mouth to lick away the crimson trickle. She swallowed. "I used to understand. It used to… make sense."

For all the world, she sounded lost.

For all the world, she sounded lost.

Rochelle twitched a brow, sliding her hands to clasp together. It only ground the pain in and squelched blood between her palms, but she interlaced her fingers and applied pressure, gritting through it. "What did?"

The Angel shifted a hand away from her wound, reaching down to her thigh. Nick tensed, but only a little. She had no weapons, even if she had the strength left to wield them, so her movements held little threat to him. "Hey -" he uttered, shifting faintly to nudge his Magnum in the air.
Her fingers were stained red when she grasped at the keys hooked into her pocket. It wasn't until she circled trembling digits around the fob buried amidst the keychain that anyone might've realized her intent - and that was far too late.

Brenda grinned a little, right before her thumb depressed the panic button.

"Survival."
The sedan whooped into a spiraling cry, chirps turning into wheedled shrieks. Nick shouted out in incoherent anger, dropping down to a crouch to wrest the keys from her. He shoved his Magnum against her cheek, but the Angel didn't even fight him, fingers going limp on the keychain.

She tried to laugh but only choked up more blood.

Coach charged back to the gun pile, scooping up their weaponry without more than a gruff "Shit." He grabbed up his shotgun in one hand, Ellis' in the other. The youngest survivor took it from him, head swiveling up to glance frantically about their surroundings as the car alarm echoed along the street.

"We're gonna have company if we don't shut that off!" he hollered, voice going taut.

Brenda fisted her other hand in the bottom of Nick's shirt as he yanked the keychain from her fingers, smearing blood into the fabric in a limp grasp. She whispered to him, the car alarm wailing over her words, and only he caught the fractured and breathy sentence.

"Tell Chris… I did it. I did Sean."

The gambler grimaced, shrugging violently away from her grip before the woman could make more of a mess of his shirt. It took a second or two longer than he wanted to hit the panic switch again, and the car quieted with a plaintive chirrup.

There was silence for a moment, except for the faint wheedle of Brenda's worsening exhale and inhale. The whole team froze, listening to the muddled breeze that whistled through the air. None of them spoke… like if they held their breath, the calm might maintain itself.

They were not so lucky.

The din rose up, far-off screams inciting more and more to rally. Although they had killed so many in their surroundings, it seemed there was no end to the infected. They had some breathing room before the horde hit them this time, at least.

"Fuck." escaped Nick, shoving the keys into his slacks' pocket. He shoulderred Brenda's sniper, slipping his arm through the strap and letting it slap against his spine. Straightening, it seemed for a moment like he might kick the prone woman again - but she ranked low on his list of priorities, suddenly.

Instead, he leaned down to swipe up her katana from the concrete, holstering his Magnum so he could grip it with both hands. He weighed it, tested his grip - it was heavy, but not cumbersome. Still, he wasn't in a rush to use it with his injured shoulder. "We got a problem. Plan?"

He carefully gripped the sword, sliding it between his belt and his slacks so it laid flat against his outer thigh. Brenda merely watched him claim her things, almost disinterested. She was quieter now, focus faltering and her eyes gaining a pale sheen.

Coach pulled his shotgun to his shoulder, aiming it down toward the ground with a fierce shake of his head. "Bunker in the shop again. We took a horde before, we can take another one. We hold strong and clean up."

Nodding her head, Rochelle started to move back, crouching to pick up Nick's hunting rifle from the ground. "What do we… do with her?" As she took the gun and straightened, however, Coach was grabbing at her arm to catch her attention.

"Babygirl, you just hang tight on that. You don't need to be shootin' wit' that hand. Just keep pressure on it." He saw the protest stirring on her face, shaking his head with quick reassurance. They'd had this argument too recently to re-hash it. "I know, I know. If we need it, you can help. Just don't be the frontline."

Rochelle didn't have the energy to fight. She shrugged the rifle onto her shoulder and wrapped her hand back around her split palm, thumb bracing over the wound, trying to staunch the bleeding.

As she relented, Nick shook his head, thumbing back toward Brenda. "If you ask me, this is a blessing. We hole up. Let the horde take care of her. Get her off our case, she gets fucked by her own horde, and nobody has to put her down."

The Angel snarled a little at the statement, and she curled around her midsection, body gaining a tremble to it. Pain or shock - or both. She held her tongue, however, and her expression darkened to something hollow.

Ellis frowned, shaking his head a little, reluctance creeping onto his expression. He gazed at Nick, teeth catching at his lip. The Georgian seemed uncertain. "I.. dunno, I -"

"Would you rather I shoot her?" Nick slid a hand onto his injured shoulder, palm soothing into his throbbing clavicle. His voice harshened, and Ellis didn't quite meet his gaze, frown deepening. "Because she's dying, one way or the other."

He meant, of course, to refer to the bullet wound in her gut. Coughing up blood meant it had nicked an organ; her stomach had most likely been punctured. Blood loss or septic shock would set in sooner than later. Even if they wanted to try and save her - which he definitely did not - it was almost less likely than saving Christophe.

Something trickled onto Ellis' expression, though. It was a little confusion, and a little shock. He turned to face Nick entirely, fingers tightening on his shotgun. His voice grew the slightest bit husky, and forceful. "... I don't want us tuh be murderers, Nick. I ain't gonna just… shoot her, when she can't do nothin' anymore. She's hurt."

Ellis' behaviour startled Nick in return, catching him off-guard before he could rein in his expression. He flickered his eyes over the Georgian's face, but couldn't quite discern the emotion there. Did Ellis think him a murderer, now? Compared to Brenda, of all people, who had repeatedly and actively tried to kill them? Who had just set a horde on them?

Are you really surprised, Nicolas? He knows you did something to Jerry, now. Only a matter of time before he starts asking questions.

A brow flinched up - then smoothed, and he pointed a finger toward the prone brunette. He spoke coldly, other arm going tight to his side in a defensive shrug. "Okay. So we leave her outside and the zombies finish her."

When Ellis' mouth popped open, brows crunching in obvious protest, Nick took a step forward. He spoke at a quickening pace, aware of the rising sounds of the horde approaching and gathering in their rush toward them, only minutes away.

"Those are the fucking options, Ellis." He didn't mean to snarl, but that was what escaped him, and the tone seemed to shock the younger man. Those blue eyes suddenly hooded underneath his
"We kill her now, or we let the zombies she fucking called on us kill her - because that stomach shot will kill her no matter what. There's no third fucking choice."

Ellis was staring at his steel-toed boots, shoulders a little high, hands almost trembling. The posture stabbed something like guilt into Nick's chest - but also frustration. "This isn't me making a call. This is reality." He darted a glance toward the other two survivors, hunting for backup.

The older man was looking down the street, holding a vaguely perturbed clench to his jaw. Rochelle was turned away as well, staring down toward her bleeding hand. Neither, it seemed, were primed to get involved. Nick's jaw flinched into an agitated clench, prepared to continue.

Brenda laughed from her place on the ground, suddenly. "Still weak." She'd slumped entirely to the sidewalk, and the sounds that escaped her were wet and tacky. The blood was starting to puddle around her body, viscous red dripping onto the concrete.

The mockery bristled Nick's shoulders, spinning on a heel. He drew Brenda's military-grade sniper rifle off his shoulder, snatching it into his hands. "You made your goddamn bed without any help from us." He checked it over with an aggressive fury that masked whatever uncomfortable sensation was brewing in his stomach. It was loaded, and high caliber.

"I'm going into the goddamn pawn shop. If you want to stand out here and defend this bitch, be my guest."

Coach turned, silent, stepping toward Rochelle and circling an arm against the small of her back. He led her toward the pawnshop at a quick walk, and she relented with a small, sweeping glance toward Ellis. Her eyes were cold and numb… but a little sad, too.

"Let's go, sweetie. We gotta go." she called back at him, and his head twitched. It wasn't quite agreement at first, but after a beat Ellis' head raised, gaze flicking toward Nick.

Nick didn't meet it, but his periphery gave him enough of a look to know Ellis was still frowning. It was softer now, though, full of grief rather than doubt. The Georgian nodded in silence and turned, making to jog tenderly toward the pawnshop.

If Nick looked down the street, he could see infected now, though there was still some distance to go. They were flocking onto the road, turning rapidly into a clot of bodies that merged into one fluctuating unit. A frown twitched at the corner of his mouth, and he turned, sparing a last glance for Brenda.

She was grinning, teeth stained red by her own blood.

He might have dismissed it as meaningless. He almost did; sorted it away as just the manic grin of a dying psychotic. Something made him stop, however. Intuition or some gut instinct, or maybe just paranoia. He turned and stared back at the cityscape, even as infected came sprinting out from between condos and fences.

Beneath the wave of screams, there was something else. Something growing louder. It was indeterminate from the sounds of approaching infected at first, but then grew apart. A thudding, crashing sound, unsteady and intermittent, but coming in pairs of two.

He knew that sound.

"No fucking w-"

A square of shingles on the roof of a condo some ways down the road suddenly crumpled under a fatty, wide hand, slapping down and gripping onto the very peak of it. A body dragged itself up into sight shortly thereafter, bloated muscles flexing to carry the weight of its squat lower body.

It seemed to squint in their direction - and then it roared, bulky arms throwing up in an enraged wave.

"Tank!" escaped him in a shout, body suddenly frozen in indecision. Half of him wanted to run for the shop, and half wanted to run for the sedan. They'd tried to escape a Tank by vehicle once before, and they'd almost lost Coach for the error - but he didn't know if they had the firepower to take it down alongside the horde. Blocking themselves in the pawn shop seemed like a very risky decision.

The two halves may as well have cleft him in twain and gone running in either direction.

Nick did the first thing that came to mind, instead. He grabbed Brenda's sniper rifle off his shoulder and swung it around, bracing it into his chest and tilting his head to look down the sight. It was a tactical scope with a measured reticle, and it took him a moment to get his bearings with it.

The magnification snapped the infected wave into sudden focus, and his vision was flooded with sprinting targets. He took shots, barely needing to aim. The bullets found their way into a zombie one way or another, blasts of blood and chunks of meat flying apart with each pull of the trigger.

Before he had the presence of mind to wonder where his teammates were, he found Coach very suddenly at his elbow. "Shit. Shit!" The ex-football player shouted, a hand going to his temple in disbelief and frustration. "We gotta get in the car!"

"Bad idea!" Nick uttered, even as he shifted his weight to jut his hip forward, pulling the trigger in rapid succession. It was a terrible idea, in fact, but he didn't have a better one. He could see his bullets penetrating through several infected with each blast, gore flashing in his scope - but he could also see the Tank making its clumsy way off the roof.

They had a little time, but not very much. "Pocket."

Not needing more than that for explanation, Coach dove a hand into the offered pocket of Nick's slacks. If they survived, Nick would take the time to thank God he had the presence of mind not to toss the keys into the same slacks pocket that currently had a tube of KY jelly secreted away.

The eldest survivor dragged the keys out with a tug, and bolted for the sedan. "Y'all go get Chris - I'll pull up. We got to get outta here!"

Unable to fight a grimace, the gambler nodded his head. He flung his new sniper rifle back against his shoulder, turning to bolt for the pawn shop. As his body swung into the motion, his eyes cut across the air to look at the brunette prostrated on the sidewalk.

Brenda wasn't moving anymore.

Nick didn't see Ellis or Rochelle until he passed through the threshold of the pawnshop. She'd taken the backpack from him and gathered up the supplies they'd left with Coach, and he was getting his arms under Chris' form in preparation to hoist him up. He was struggling, face drawn in pain.

The gambler crossed the pawnshop in a fierce few strides, lurching down to a crouch to join Ellis at the other side of the unconscious Spaniard. He didn't meet the kid's gaze, just silently jammed one arm against Chris' back and the other under his knees.
"Go." Nick uttered, and they lifted in one swift motion. Ellis was on his amputated side, and gave his stumped shoulder a berth as if afraid to touch it. The disparity put Chris in a lean against Nick's chest, taking more of the weight, but that was fine with him. He wasn't heavy, relatively.

One limb less heavy, at least.

Moving in a swift strafe, they carried the slight Spaniard toward the door. Rochelle darted around them with the backpack cradled in her arms, taking the lead. "Hurry! I'll get the door -"

Coach was pulling the sedan up as they re-exited, brakes creaking as it jolted to a stop, but something was immediately wrong. There was a wheedled squeal, heightening as he accelerated and tapering off as he braked, and the whuf-whuf-whuf of rubber hitting the asphalt. It took Nick a second to recognize the problem: the front right tire was deflated, shot in the conflict with Brenda.

He re-considered, and maybe God and him were even.

"Can it drive?" He directed it toward Ellis, even as his neck craned up to glare down the road. The bulk of the horde was still a few blocks away, but the Tank had gained a lot of ground in the interim. After making its way off the roof, it had started sprinting along the road, throwing itself with gorilla-like jabs of its fists against the asphalt.

The fact it hadn't stopped to throw something was a small mercy.

Ellis nodded, and they bolted the distance between them and the sedan. Rochelle reached it first to throw open the back door, and Nick got in, carrying Christophe with him. He clambered backwards into the seat, keeping a grip on the Spaniard, snarling when a blind swing of his leg smacked his bad calf into the edge of the car door.

The moment he landed, Nick slid himself across the seat, dragging Chris horizontal until he was sprawled on his lap. The sniper rifle jabbed into his back and the katana hilt jabbed into his hip, and he used his elbow to shove the latter through his belt, letting it clatter to the floorboards instead before he stabbed himself with it.

Nick lifted his head, expecting Ellis to cram into the seat under Chris' legs - but Ellis stepped away, instead, swinging his shotgun into his hands. Their eyes met for an impermanent beat of time, and the faintest of apologetic scrunches touched Ellis' nose. Reluctant, somehow.

"If this don't work, y'all don't wait fer me!"

Then he shut the car door, slamming it with a flat palm, and bolted down the road.

It was all Nick could do not to lunge after him, but he was trapped under Chris' dead weight and laying on the awkward bulk of Brenda's sniper rifle. "Overalls!" Getting his body turned around to get the other car door open would have involved throwing the Spaniard off, and he had to remind himself to be gentle.

It wasn't so much care. He didn't care about Christophe; he barely trusted him. However, he cared for the time and supplies and energy they'd put (and were going to put) into treating him, and he wasn't about to throw it all away by manhandling the guy to death.

Instead, he twisted at the waist, bracing his bicep against the back of the carseat and looking through the back window. The kid was running toward the horde, one hand on his shotgun and the other on his cap. "What the hell is he doing?!"

Nick hadn't even finished before Rochelle was joining him, shouting after the youngest survivor.
She'd almost gotten herself thrown into the passenger side seat, but now jolted back out, stepping onto the rim of the door and hauling an elbow on top of the car to lean up past it. "Ellis! Come back!"

The Tank was gaining ground on the bulk of the horde, smashing through them with a roar, but there were a scattered few zombies that had come from the nearby surroundings and reached the team first. Ellis didn't stop running, using his shotgun to take low shots, blasting their legs out from under them before they could reach him.

Nick heard Rochelle utter a strangled "Fuck.", and glanced her way as she drew the hunting rifle off her shoulder and laid it over the top of the car.

Pressing herself flat to the roof, she fisted her cut hand against the rifle to steady it as she aimed, awkwardly using her left hand to pull the trigger. She took out two zombies bolting toward them from across the street, body stuttering with the blasts and a hiss leaving her each time.

A Smoker's lanky, bloated form leaned out from behind a paneled house, its tongue-tendril dangling and squirming from its mouth. It seemed to twist to face Ellis, but Rochelle was faster. It took her a few shots to hit it, but it only took one to the tumorous growth that was its upper body to down it.

The creature exploded into a gaseous cloud of grey smoke, a hacking scream escaping it.

"What the shit…" Coach said it in a near-growl, and gripped his hands tight on the wheel, cranking it even while his foot was still pressed on the brake. As he rotated it, he tipped his head and shouted across the car, "Get in, babygirl."

Rochelle obeyed after one more shot, taking out a zombie who was bee-lining for Ellis. She gripped her arm against the roof of the car and dropped herself into the seat, stashing her rifle against her chest and slamming the door shut. The instant it closed, Coach gassed it. The car lurched on its flat tire, that squeal announcing the way the rim ground into the asphalt with every rotation.

Nobody had to say it: they weren't leaving Ellis, even if it meant driving right into a horde-bolstered Tank.

There was simply no other option.

Nick looped an arm around Chris' midsection, bracing the unconscious youth flat against his lap as the car swung into a sharp U-turn on the road. The Spaniard almost slid away, but Nick tightened his grip and kept him close. "Fucking idiot."

As the sedan straightened out sloppily on the round, unsteadied on its tires, Ellis came into clear view within the windshield. The road past him was flooded with the infected, and the Tank was surging closer, throaty voice roaring angrily. The ground was shaking - and even through the vehicle, Nick swore he felt the impact of each step the creature took.

Ellis looked tremendously small, set in profile against the approaching danger.

Something sharp and cold pierced into Nick's core, hollowed him out. He should have been used to it by now - they were all in danger of dying, every day, every second. After all, hadn't Brenda made just a little bit of sense, deep down? The world was reduced to killing and dying, fear and survival, torn down to some primal reality. Nothing was constant. Nothing was sure.

Nothing was the same anymore.
Why, then, did the sight so badly terrify him?

Ellis' shotgun was no longer raised. He hunched over it, hands moving. After a soft jerk of his shoulders, he lifted an arm over his head. The sun caught on the object clutched between his fingers with a putrid green glint: the CEDA canister he'd strapped to his gun.

He wound his arm back, whole body hopping weight on one foot - then threw it, putting all his energy into the swing. He threw so fiercely that he stumbled as he released it.

The canister spiraled through the air, arcing up as it flew down the street. It might have missed, had the Tank had the sense to step to the side or even just stop a beat. As it charged forward, however, the glass canister collided into its brawny shoulder and shattered.

Vile green liquid splattered, mixing with shards of glass, some stabbing into the Tank's skin and some scattering to the asphalt. It almost seemed to explode as the liquid made contact with air, darkening and exuding this flash of dark green smoke, like a struck match on a cloud of gasoline fumes.

For just a moment, nothing changed. The horde continued forward at the Tank's sides, and it continued in its charge.

Then - all in silent unison - the flow of the horde shifted.

Like running water, all the infected running with the Tank suddenly ran into it. They merged on either side, crashing bodies against it, clawing at its arms and throwing themselves into its back. The Tank howled in fury, swinging a muscle-bound arm out to throw a wave of them back. The strike crushed some, sending one female infected up off her feet and flying bodily across the street.

The horde closed to fill in the gap as quickly as the Tank had dispersed them.

"Lord Almighty." escaped Coach in something a little awed. Even the infected which had come from a different direction now focused their attentions on the Tank, running past Ellis with not even a snarl or a glance spared for him. Like everything had ceased to exist, except for the Tank.

The kid's arms went up, hauling his shotgun over his head with a wild shout of triumph - but the Tank itself was not fully distracted.

It released a thunderous bellow, trying to advance, and its forward momentum startled Ellis into a step back. Another bikini-clad female zombie leapt, tackling into the huge infected's torso and taking a swinging claw at the Tank's face. The monstrous creature shook itself violently until it had knocked the zombie free, taking a meaty chunk of the Tank's cheek with it.

Sense won out over his excitement, and Ellis turned and started running back toward the sedan, shotgun clutched to his chest and a hand clamped over his side. His expression was pained and shocked and exhilarated. His mouth was moving, but his words were inaudible shouts through the car.

Coach wasted no time in slamming his foot on the gas pedal. The car rolled forward with a painful squeal, swerving a little to avoid Ellis as he met the mechanic halfway.

As Ellis made it to the back door, he scrambled to open it and leapt inside. He pressed himself against the back of Rochelle's seat, barely balanced on the stretch of seat left in front of Chris' legs. "Go!" he gasped out, wheezed. "I don't think - it's gonna - die!"

Even as Coach floored it, Ellis slamming the car door shut behind himself, the Tank was still struggling its way forward. With each step, it swung either fist out in desperate attempts to beat away the horde that had turned against it.

Every time it turned one way, its exposed back was flooded with bodies and teeth and claws. No one infected could make a dent, but unified, they tore fistfuls of flesh away bit by bit, wearing it down.

It was still roaring as Coach sped them into a turn and down a side street, flat tire screeching against the asphalt.
"Stop. Stop the car. Please."

Rochelle was the one to break the silence. They'd finally driven far enough or long enough to stop hearing the Tank's roars. There was no way of knowing whether the Tank had killed the horde, or vice versa; either way, neither reappeared.

Tense wasn't the word for the atmosphere in the sedan before her words, just loaded.

Heavy.

Obeying immediately, Coach braced one hand against the steering wheel and the other on his thigh as he applied the brakes. She moved before the car had even fully stopped, opening the door and swinging a leg out. Her boot skidded across the asphalt for a beat before they came to a halt. Without much more warning, Rochelle was hunched out of the car, body shuddering as she heaved onto the sidewalk.

Little came up but bile, and she spat out threads of yellow saliva, huffing in hard through her nose. "S-sorry -"

Coach exhaled a little, glancing over his shoulder to check on the three in the backseat. Nick met his gaze, nodding toward her pointedly, and the eldest survivor took the cue and cranked the gearshift into park.

Twisting the keys to shut off the engine, Coach opened the car door and stepped out. An infected had been attracted out from a nearby house by the squealing of the sedan's ruined tire, and the loud blast of Coach's shotgun announced him putting it down in short order.

Nick held his silence as the ex-football player circled the car, drawing up to kneel next to Rochelle. His hand landed on her shoulder, rubbing soothingly, and he spoke to her quietly. "It's a'ight. You okay, Ro'."

She coughed, dragging her uninjured hand against her forehead. "Stupid... I'm being stupid."

Leaning forward a little, trying to bend his head around the headrest of her seat, Ellis seemed primed to speak up. He stopped, though, when Nick spared him a fierce shake of his head - and the Georgian slumped back instead, glancing down toward Chris.

Nick had drawn the unconscious Spaniard against his side, allowing Ellis room to sit on the carseat past his bloodied Vans. The sneakers had once been blue and white, but they'd long since stained into a murky, blackened shade. Ellis propped them up on his thigh, one hand bracing on his ankles.

They still weren't really looking at each other.

Admitting his involvement in Jerry's death hadn't been accidental, but a foolish part of him had hoped there'd be enough to distract from it. He'd get it off his chest, Ellis would learn the guy dying had been his fault rather than Ellis', and that would be that. No further conversation necessary.

Yet...

There was another part of him that had always known it wouldn't be that simple. Even that part didn't think Ellis would look at him the way he had back there, doubting, as they stood over Brenda and argued.

Like something tremendous had shifted under his feet.

Like maybe he wasn't sure anymore.

I'm not going to fucking apologize for -

"Are you mad?" the younger man mumbled, sideways, almost under his breath. Slanting a glance his way, Nick couldn't help the sharp twitch to his brow, uncomprehending. Although the Georgian didn't see the gesture with his eyes averted, the silence said enough, and he elaborated.

"... I only ran off 'cause I knew we weren't gonna make it out unless I did somethin'. We tried out-runnin' a Tank before."

That made Nick snort, tipping himself so he could look between the seats and catch a glimpse of Coach and Rochelle. They weren't speaking, even as Coach's hand had slipped to massage the back of her neck. He just kneeled there, soothing her through the wave of nausea.

"No."

Ellis did look toward him there, though only tilted under his capbill. He seemed to expect more - but Nick held his silence as a kind of stilted insecurity washed over the younger man's face. He supposed Ellis had expected him to be angry, maybe wanted him to be, because at least that was something normal.

Nick meant to say something else, but couldn't settle on what to say in time.

"Sorry. I'm sorry." Rochelle drew back up from her hunch, licking at her teeth with a disgusted crinkle before giving a shuddered spit toward the asphalt. "I'm okay. It just... it snuck up on me. I'm okay now."

Coach let his head shake. "Nothin' to apologize fo'." He stopped a moment, and raised his hand up to catch a knuckle under her jaw. She met his gaze, but only reluctantly. "It ain't supposed to be easy. That's what separates us from animals. And the zombies."

That made her nod, softly, a hollow smile twitching at the corner of her mouth.

Nick saw Ellis' head lower, faintly, and he could only imagine what was going through his head. He could hear it, almost; "How was it so easy fer you? How could you?" But he said nothing, and Nick felt something angry coil in him. He couldn't focus, past a simultaneously calm and fractured feeling of paranoia.

A need to know what Ellis was thinking and, just as quickly, an aversion to that need.

Reaching toward the backpack by her foot, Coach hauled it into her lap. He unzipped it, dragging out Chris' machete and tossing the blade down to the floorboard. The eldest survivor pawed through the satchel to find one of the thin strips of Nick's jacket. He grabbed up their remaining bottle of alcohol, as well, exhaling.

"One of y'all come out and watch my back. I'm gonna wrap her hand while we got a minute."

A look was passed between the two men in the backseat. Ellis was the obvious choice, with Nick having taken most of Chris' upper body against his side, so the Georgian pushed the car door open and slid out. He tapped his shotgun into his hands, leaving the car door hanging open and going to stand at Coach's flank.

Ellis looked on hesitantly, watching as Coach cracked open the bottle of alcohol and grasped Rochelle's injured hand at the wrist. She forced her fingers to straighten out, though they twitched with pain as she did.

The slash across her palm made him frown, guilt tugging at his features. "Is it gonna be okay..?"

"O-ow." escaped her in a hiss as Coach touched a fingertip against her flesh, examining the extent of the wound. "I think so, sweetie. It's not too deep, right, Coach?" He shook his head in silence, raising the bottle in a warning gesture.

Rochelle inhaled a quick breath, then waved him on with a nudge of her chin. He dribbled only a small splash of the liquid, but it was enough to make her body flinch with pain. Only the vicelike grip he had around her wrist kept her hand still, and as the liquid washed away the blood and the gore left behind from Brenda's dirty blade, he set the bottle down between his shoes.

"You gonna cry over a big papercut, girl?" he uttered, a playful crunch to the edges of his eyes. Allowing her just a moment to huff out a pained laugh, Coach draped the strip of fabric flat over her palm and set to tying it against the back of her hand. "Best go easy on this hand, though. May be better if we get you a weapon you can hold in yo' left."

Ellis pushed the stock of his shotgun against his shoulder, hesitantly turning to examine the surrounding streets, eyes alert for signs of infected. 'I'm... real sorry, Ro'. It was all we could think to do - Nick wasn't sure he could hit her, 'n'I thought if yuh caught her off-guard, she'd give up."

Nick snorted, quietly, to himself. He hadn't been so sure.

"Yeah." Rochelle forced out, teeth gritted just a little. Ellis glanced her way, fearing he'd upset her... but she was looking squarely at her hand as Coach wrapped it, and the pain on her features was actual pain. "I wish she had."

Drawing the fabric into a tight knot, Coach glanced over his shoulder, eyes catching on Ellis and then slanting through the car toward Nick. "Sorry fo' yellin' at you two back there. Didn't mean it." The statement surprised Ellis, and he turned his head, cocking it. "I knew you boys had somethin' in mind, but I figured playin' along was the best call."

"You did?" Ellis uttered, flexing his fingers against his shotgun. Something hesitant flickered over his features, unconfident and a little fragile. "You looked so mad, though..."

That drew a smile onto Coach's face, and he gave a reassuring nod toward the younger Georgian. If he noticed the uncharacteristic delicacy on Ellis' expression, he didn't say anything to indicate it - but his voice was even gentler now. "I was. Not at y'all, though. I wasn't sure what yo' plan was, but I figured playin' along was the best call."

If he noticed the uncharacteristic delicacy on Ellis' expression, he didn't say anything to indicate it - but his voice was even gentler now. "I was. Not at y'all, though. I wasn't sure what yo' plan was, but I knew it sure as hell wasn't givin' up."

"That's a switch." Snorting slightly, the gambler merely shook his head, raising his voice a little to carry through the car. "I guess I'm so used to being on your shit list, I can't tell the difference."

Coach exhaled a sigh, curling his fingers around Rochelle's to get her to clutch them against the bandage. She obeyed, leaning back against her seat carefully and giving him a small smile. "Don't be smart, Nick." he uttered dryly, but tolerantly.

"That's a lot to ask." Nick reached up a hand to tuck his knuckles against Christophe's head, tipping it away from his shoulder like the unconscious man might drool on him. The Spaniard slumped with the gesture, limply, uttering only a faint huff of air.

The movement attracted Coach's attention, and he leaned up, speaking as though Nick hadn't. "Just wish it hadn't come down to Ro' shootin' her." Draping his forearm over the roof of the car over Rochelle's seat and bending down, his head tilted into the car's interior. "How's the boy?"

Trying to shrug without moving either shoulder, unwilling to jostle his injured shoulder or Chris, Nick felt his voice fall into low irritation. "How did I get volunteered for nurse duty? Is this the thing where you assclowns bring home a pet, and I have to take care of it?"

That didn't amuse Rochelle, and she sent a cutting look over her shoulder, exasperation creeping onto her face. It was better than the hollow nausea previously residing there, at least, but only just.

He didn't want to feel guilty - but the feeling was there. If you hadn't gotten your arm fucked up... you could have taken that shot, instead of making Rochelle do it for you. He'd now made Rochelle kill someone in his place, and made Ellis watch a man die by his actions. Two for two, asshole.

"He's still breathing, that's all I know." Nick glanced sideways, scanning over the Spaniard's slumped frame and then up through the car at Coach. "I'm more worried about us. I dunno about you guys, but I am starving."

Coach nodded at that, agreement flooding his expression. "We can't go far in this car, anyway, not 'til we fix the wheel." He straightened again, putting a hand over his brow and gazing up over their surroundings. "Let's clear out one of these beachhouses. Need to be thinkin' long-term here for a bit, find somethin' we can hunker down in for a while."

Nick laughed, almost despite himself, head lolling back against the seatrest. "Long-term my ass. I don't think we've had a single plan work out for more than a few hours at a time."

More reluctant with his nod this time, Coach shrugged a shoulder and scratched at his jawline. His facial hair was turning dense, and it rustled with the gesture. "You ain't wrong, but if Chris is gonna recover, he's gotta get horizontal - and stay that way. We ain't doin' him a favour, cartin' him around like this."

"Nick found us food while we were out." Ellis supplied, helpfully, and his voice lightened a little as he grasped onto his own optimism. He let his shotgun droop at his side, cradling a forearm against his side and exhaling a soft and tired breath. "And a few bottles'uv water, but..."

Rochelle shook her head hesitantly, more in thoughtfulness than negation. "That's not gonna be enough, but let's just... take this one thing at a time. Shelter's first."

"Agreed." Coach took a steadying breath, leaning his shoulders back and placing the flat of his hand against the base of his spine in a sore gesture. He nodded at Ellis to get back in the car, and turned to circle back to the driver's seat and clamber in.

Ellis mimicked him, placing his shotgun on the floorboard and scooping an arm under Christophe's ankles. He carefully lifted them up so he could slide underneath, replacing himself on his seat with an exhale. His eyes darted surreptitiously toward Nick, but the gambler had situated his gaze forward and wasn't about to adjust it.

As Coach re-entered the cabin, he appended with a cautious gentleness, "Think some of us could use a breather." His eyes very intently avoided directing themselves at any one of his teammates, a non-confrontational kind of sympathy. He could have been talking about himself as easily as any of them.
"We're at the beach, right?" Nick muttered, tone scathing. He closed his eyes as all three car doors shut in staggered unison. "Who votes we go sunbathe until this whole thing boils over?" A soft snort escaped Rochelle at his suggestion, head tilting a little to look up toward the roof of the sedan.

It was a hesitant noise, ultimately hollow - but humored all the same.

Nick called that a victory.
Chapter 123

It was with due caution that they didn't drive far, even as they hunted for a defensible building. With the tire blown out, driving much more than they already had was liable to damage the metal wheel and bearings. Ellis had already urged Coach to drive slow - but the wheeled squeal and the slapping of the ruined tire was attracting attention, and Coach had to speed up to keep his distance from the infected chasing along behind them.

It wasn't quite a horde-sized crowd of zombies, but it added a new reason to stop.

Rochelle looked over her shoulder, squinting through the rear window at the collection of infected scrambling along behind them. "If we keep collecting tag-alongs, we'll have a rough time when we do pull over." She had her hands clasped in her lap, palms pressed to keep pressure on her wound. "We need to stop."

Grunting in acknowledgement, Coach took a hand off the wheel to gesture down the road. "Ain't sho' we'll find much better than that, anyway."

The condo he indicated was encircled by a sturdy wood fence, gated and enclosed. The building itself sat on stilts, stairs crawling up on either side of a squat single-car garage. The garage door was drawn open and revealed it as empty. One of the staircases led to a raised front door, while the other circled back to what might've been a back porch.

"More than one way out. Fenced in. Ain't got too many windows." Nobody argued, so Coach put his hand on the gearshift, readying with a breath. He kept the car rolling forward, preparing for the moment when they'd come parallel to the house. "Nick, can you get out? Gonna need to clear these bitches."

Nick passed a glance toward Ellis, removing his grip on Chris to relinquish him. "Take him." The younger man scooched to the side so he could get an arm around Christophe's waist and draw the Spaniard forward into a slump away from Nick. Catching his weight against his shoulder, Ellis held him there for a beat of time, seeming unsure how to best rearrange him.

"Um -"

Wordless, Nick got a grip on Chris' cargo shorts and gently dragged his legs over the edge of the seat so he was almost sitting up. He would have lolled forward at the waist had Ellis not quickly took his weight, hugging the man into a weak slump against him, hand hooked on his hip.

All the jostling forced a plaintive mutter from Chris' lips, an incoherent slur of syllables. Ellis froze, hesitant - but the man failed to stir.

Nick rolled his shoulder a little with his newfound freedom, straightening up in his seat. He quickly shrugged out of his sniper rifle's strap, reaching instead to snatch up Ellis' shotgun from where it lay on the floorboard. "Loaded?" he queried shortly, and Ellis nodded.

Flipping the shotgun into his hands, stock braced against his hip, Nick glanced up into the rearview mirror. His eyes met Coach's and, without a word, the car came to a sudden stop.

Nick threw the door open, catching a heel on the ground to lunge out, facing backwards. The small cloud of infected - ten or eleven, maybe - quickly caught up with the car. He blasted the shotgun off at hip-level as they approached, shooting into the core of the group. The recoil sent pain through his shoulder, but he ground his teeth through it.
Two went down, staggered by the shot and quickly shoved to the ground by the infected behind them. They might have gotten back up eventually, had their fellows not trampled them underfoot.

He aimed another blast higher this time, and Nick had the pleasure of watching one of them lose the bulk of their face under the shot. The pellets tore through flesh in a cloud of gore, and the male infected toppled backward as dead weight.

Coach was abruptly at his elbow, double-barrel shotgun in his hands. Between the two of them, it only took a few seconds of concentrated fire to down the infected, and the noise of their unified shots was deafening. The zombies stood little chance.

As the last one stopped moving, Nick lowered Ellis' pump-action. He turned his head to glance toward Coach, cocking a brow as he did. His mouth opened, readying to speak, but the clattering sound of something metallic falling to the ground nearby silenced him.

The two men jolted back-to-back reflexively.

"Shit. You hear that?"

Nick swiveled his gaze around the street, searching for signs of the noise's origin. Nothing immediately made itself apparent, and for a beat, there was silence - but he wasn't about to let his guard down. "Yeah… maybe just another infected. Keep a -"

Footsteps thudded in a stagger, and he saw a shadow flash into view from around the corner of a building: a bulky, lopsided figure, stumbling with the strange distortion of its own mass. The Charger seemed confused for an instant, gazing at the sedan. It was as if it almost recognized the shape of people inside, but couldn't connect the dots fast enough.

Oh, fuck.

If it targeted the car, they'd lose their ride… and who knew how much damage it could do to the chassis. It might merely crumple the metal in, or it might crush and injure any number of the car's passengers. He couldn't let it charge. They weren't going to survive a Tank only to lose people to a Charger.

Before Nick could so much as consider a course of action, Coach was lunging around him, shoulders tucked forward into a hunch. The moment he moved, he caught the Charger's attention; the creature roared in raw fury, stamping one bulky foot against the ground to launch itself into a barreling sprint.

For an instant, Nick thought it was still bound to hit the sedan - but Coach was running perpendicular to the car, and the Charger's trajectory curved to follow. The creature only had so much control now that it had launched its mass into a run, like its own momentum carried it more than any kind of conscious thought. The eldest survivor was, however, only so fast.

The Charger's course-correction kept them in line with each other.

A protesting shout escaped Nick, eyes snapping wide. More panic than he'd have liked to admit coursed through him, and the feeling sent his heartrate up. They'd as-of-yet avoided taking a direct hit from a Charger. He had no idea how much damage it would cause, nor how much Coach could take.

He snapped his borrowed shotgun up, taking a shot, the muzzle of the gun tracking the Charger's movement. The blast struck it, but had no visible effect. The infected ran with its bulky shoulder pushed forward, and it might as well have been a shield with its rocky and blistered surface. Flesh chipped away like frozen callus, not even bleeding.

He went for a second shot and came up empty. "Fuck -"

The Charger collided with Coach… or so Nick thought, for a beat of time. However, it was as the infected came within arms' reach that the man threw his weight, taking himself into a bodily spin around it. The Charger's shoulder struck his, but the impact contributed to his rotation and threw him to the side rather than carrying him with.

The infected continued past, roaring an almost infuriated denial, and Coach hit the ground rolling. He gave a shout as he did, body going a few feet across the asphalt in a messy tumble. He did not land gracefully, and Nick vaulted across the asphalt after him, only sparing a glance to ensure the Charger was still running in the other direction.

Nick dropped to a crouch beside him where the older man had stopped. Coach's jaw was drawn in pain, and his hand was clasped below his knee in a bracing gesture.

Shit.

He was aware of the car door opening and Rochelle's voice. "Coach?! Nick! Is he okay?!

Without saying anything, Nick set Ellis' shotgun down and took the double-barrel instead. With the hand that wasn't covering his knee, Coach fished two shells out of his pocket and handed them over, expression grim. "In case." he uttered, voice strained.

Snapping the shotgun open and confirming it was already loaded, Nick straightened, pocketing the shells and turning on his heel to bolt down the street.

The Charger was skidding to a stop, momentum taking it several yards as if it couldn't get itself to slow. It hit a metal garbage can with a tremendous clatter, stumbling over the object and almost going to a knee. The infected shook itself, doglike, regaining balance and focus. When it turned, sunken eyes alighted on Nick.

He readied for it to charge again, shotgun raising, but it didn't. With an angry chuffle, the infected instead approached him at something like a jog, bulked arm swinging in a threatening gesture.

Its face was ghoulis - much like its almost vestigial off-arm, it was like every ounce of fat and flesh had been suctioned off to fill the mass collected in its main arm. The result was blackened skin stretched flat over the bones of its skull in a taut and menacing mask.

Nick raised Coach's shotgun, aiming directly for that face as it drew close.

"Eat me, assclown."

As if aware of the danger, the Charger suddenly lunged, swinging all its weight in a punch. Nick pulled his fingers, and both barrels exploded in a thunderous clap. The recoil was vastly stronger than he anticipated, and the shotgun nearly reared up in his hands, stock slamming dangerously toward his face.

The blast made him stumble back, and it was only that step that kept the Charger's massive hand from boxing straight into his ear. It collided with his cheek instead, and even as the infected went limp - only gore and shattered bone left behind between its shoulders - the strike still snapped Nick's head to one side.

Stars sparked, and then black, and Nick wasn't entirely present during the time it took him to fall to
He blinked, vision only belatedly rearranging into shapes that made sense. He pulled a hand from off the shotgun, dragging his palm over his face, rooting himself with the gesture. Pain thrummed up his leg from where he'd landed on it, but it was a dull ache compared to the stinging of his cheek and lower face.

He hadn't clenched his teeth before the collision, and it had jostled his jaw. He rolled it, groaning, trying to shake his head to shake off the pain in the joint, along with the pain from the Charger's craggy skin scraping at his flesh. "Son of a..." came out, half-slurred, and Nick managed to drag himself into a lean to look back down the road.

Rochelle was kneeled next to Coach, wounded hand curled against her stomach while her other hand laid on his shoulder. His face was frozen into a stubborn, gruff look, but his brows were wrenched together in a way that betrayed his pain. He nodded toward Nick, and Rochelle followed the gesture with her eyes.

She started to get up, but Nick thrust up a hand to stop her. "I'm fine." he uttered loud enough to carry, and she gave a dubious frown - but stopped. Sparing a glance for the sedan, Nick noted Ellis pressing his face against the glass, nose smushed with the intensity of his worried squinting.

It was enough to make Nick chuckle under his breath. At least he stayed in the car.

Rochelle glanced toward Coach, eyes dark with worry. "Can you stand?" He nodded, pressing both hands onto his knee and holding them there for a moment, seeming to feel at his knee with his fingertips. He took in a sharp breath - then exhaled, speaking low to her.

"Knee an' me ain't agreein'. It ain't no thang."

She didn't seem encouraged by his dismissal, but merely watched as he shifted his weight to dig the heel of his injured leg into the ground, using his other leg and a palm set against the ground to get to his feet. As he moved, Rochelle scooped a hand under his elbow and tried to support him as much as she could.

Nick felt sturdy enough to follow suit. He crawled up to his feet, palm still rubbing at his cheek like he could massage out the bruise undoubtedly forming there. "You trying to relive your football glory days, there, Sam?" he tossed out sarcastically, grasping Coach's shotgun with his free hand as he straightened.

Rochelle's eyes narrowed in his directions in warning, but Coach chuckled - even if the sound was a little wheezed. She relaxed at his signal, bending to retrieve Ellis' shotgun and tuck her arm into the strap.

"That's 'bout the kinda shit that got me my bum knee the first go 'round, so yeah. Guess so."

Hooking an arm over Rochelle's shoulders, Coach nodded his head. "Yeah, boy. You just sit tight a minute." He didn't put much weight on her at all, and the gesture may have been more for her benefit than his. He slipped a glance toward Nick. "Can you go get that gate open? We gotta get Nick acquiesced with a grunt, reaching into his pocket and grabbing the shells he'd stowed away. He snapped the shotgun open, slipping a shell into either chamber before flipping it shut. "Let Ro' drive." he advised, striding past them and cutting in front of the sedan to step over to the condo's gate.

It was a good seven foot privacy wall made of pointed planks of wood, a simple metal hook acting as the latch. It was, however, undone, and the gate had simply swung to sit shut. Grasping a hand on the edge of the gate and walking it open, Nick waited there for the car to pull through.

The moment gave him a chance to rub at his neck and jaw, closing his eyes under the dull hum of pain through his whole body.

Sometimes he wondered. If he took the time to think, if he stopped long enough to consider it, would his body just fail - just collapse to ash and dust right there? Was it strength that kept him going... kept all of them going... or simply denial?

"You a'ight, Nicky?"

Coach's voice startled him, hobbling close, and his eyes reopened with a blink. Rochelle was sliding into the car, closing the door. Nick's expression must have given away his confusion, because Coach gave him a tired chuckle and shook his head. "If I get in the car, I ain't gettin' back out."

Grunting in faint acknowledgement, Nick watched silently as Rochelle shifted the car back into drive and turned the wheel, cranking it hard with only one hand dedicated to the task. The sedan rolled into a turn, limping forward through the open gate and rolling up to the garage.

"Next time, don't pull both triggers."

Nick wasn't in the mood for chatter, but he couldn't help his head from turning, gaze making to land on Coach's face. When he didn't seem to comprehend, Coach reached up, catching a fingertip against the double-barrel shotgun still grasped in Nick's hands. He forced it to tilt, and tapped on the bottom.

Sure enough, Nick glanced down and noticed the trigger was split in two. He'd barely noticed - just shoved his fingers in place and yanked. He'd never had to wield the thing past when they'd originally found it on a dead survivor at the roadside, and he'd not done a very thorough examination back then before handing it to Coach.

"You gonna take your arm off, shootin' both like that. Pull one, then the other."

Nick glanced up, unable to resist a twitch of his brow at the instructions. Instinct told him to snap at being ordered around, but instead, his voice went dull with loose humor. "That explains the fucking earthquake when this thing went off."

Coach's attention on him was weary, and pained - and sincere. He was looking at him with that same paternal tolerance he typically reserved for the two younger survivors. "If you gotta use both, hold it at hip-level, so the recoil don't make you brain yo'self."

Taking the shotgun under his arm, Nick freed a hand to reach up and scratch at the back of his neck. The gesture came off uncomfortable, he realized quickly, and he tried to play it off with a snide and tilted smirk. "Thanks, dad. Maybe next, you can teach me how to ride a bike."
Coach chuckled, and Nick felt a vague and disgruntled unease as the older man weakly stepped through the gate after the sedan. He was barely putting any weight on his injured leg at all - and what weight he did place on it seemed liable to crumple it.

Mouthing a silent curse, Nick grabbed again at the gate and walked it shut. He took the time to latch it before quick-stepping up to come to Coach's side, flanking his injured half. Without waiting for permission, he grabbed the big man's arm and dragged it up over his shoulders, muffling a wince of his own.

Coach tensed - then relented.

They walked in hobbled tandem to rejoin the rest of the team inside the garage. Every other step, Coach put weight on Nick like a crutch so his crippled knee could just swing forward with as little flexion as possible. Every time, it sent pain through Nick's injured shoulder, but he bore it with a faint grimace.

Neither man said a word.
Carrying someone up a flight of stairs would have been difficult on a good day - but Christophe was dead weight, and his amputated shoulder removed an entire quadrant of his body for Nick to grab. He made do, one arm caught under the man's other armpit and his other hand gripped into the belt of his cargo shorts, holding him up.

"We better stay here a while. I'm fuckin' done hauling this guy around."

Ellis slipped him a faintly chastising glance, but didn't say anything. He was a few steps down from Nick, taking the staircase sideways. His left arm was cradled under Chris' thighs and his right arm looped over his knees, bracing him into his gut. Between the two of them, they kept him fairly level, taking it carefully and slowly, step-by-step.

In the same way the rest of the building had been left open - like the owners had been in a hurry to leave - the door had been unlocked. It was a relief, mostly because Nick didn't know if he had the strength to kick the door down.

Rochelle was ahead of them, holding it open with her hip. "I just hope we haven't hurt him. If I hadn't let her get those keys, I -"

"Ain't nobody's fault what that crazy bitch did." Coach interjected before she got any further. "Beatin' yo'self up about it don't change nothin', just makes it easier on the Devil." He stood at the bottom of the stairs, hands clasping the railing, examining the steps with a tired trepidation. The ex-football player had looked intimidated before, but it was almost always in the face of some mortal danger, or approaching horde, or something.

Not a staircase.

"Well, stayin' here will be better than stayin' at that pawnshop. Right?" Ellis offered, trying for a helpful tone. He sounded hesitant instead. "Ain't all bad that we had tuh leave." A slight grunt escaped him as they reached the turn in the staircase. Trying to keep Chris level as Nick suddenly advanced a step in the new direction made Ellis' hip bump into the railing.

"Careful." Nick snapped, caustic, and Ellis couldn't help a frown from sprouting at the chiding.

"I am bein' careful.."

Stepping a little further out of the way, pressing herself flat against the door so they could pass by, Rochelle glanced into the house. "It seems quiet. There's a bedroom right here… we can put Chris down, and then make sure everything else is clear."

Nick wordlessly hummed agreement, head twisting around to watch his own steps as he drew up the final few stairs. He and Ellis tracked into the condo, footsteps matching as they pivoted carefully, Chris held between them.

The first floor opened into a cramped hallway, a small square of linoleum making up the entranceway before it quickly flipped to a faint grey carpeting. The hallway stretched out to span three separate doorways, the nearest of which was open to reveal a room only dimly lit from the open front door.

Rochelle was right, though, and the foot of a bed was visible through the shadows.
The furthest door was also cracked open, and Nick noted the metal edge of a washing machine through the slat of light. A utility room, then - so the third room was either a bathroom, or another bedroom. A stairwell stretched up the rightmost wall, leading up into a second floor that looked much more open.

Although Nick was eager to get Chris out of his arms, he wasn't eager to walk into a dark room, unequipped to defend himself. Rochelle must have sensed his hesitation, or seen the dubious way he glanced into the bedroom. "Hold on…"

Turning slightly, she leaned out through the doorway and peered tentatively down at Coach. He was making his way up the stairs, almost all his weight against the railing, and he didn't miss her attention. Waving quickly with his free hand, he urged her on.

"Go on, girl, I'm comin'. Don't fuss."

Rochelle's lips quirked in a displeased gesture, but she obeyed. Tucking her injured hand against her thigh, she slipped to stand next to Nick. Reaching down, she grabbed his Magnum from its thigh holster with her good hand. She had to cross over his body to do so, and her forearm made contact a little higher on his leg than she meant.

The touch surprised him, but not enough that he couldn't pull together a sly smirk. He cocked his head to look past Chris' slumped head where it lay against his shoulder. "Damn, doll. Buy me dinner first."

She wasn't fazed, carefully gripping his pistol and advancing toward the bedroom. "Come on, Nick, don't pretend you aren't easy." Her retort was a little gratifying, if only as a sign that she was returning to some kind of normalcy. He might have laughed, even, had he not slanted a glance at Ellis.

The kid's brows were up, and if Nick wasn't mistaken, there was a distinct 'Well, yeah.' hidden there. Nick narrowed his eyes dangerously, startled by the look. Ellis choked back a laugh that quickly simmered into an entertained half-smile, averting his eyes.

The moment was short-lived, however, and a kind of unease returned onto the kid's face and took his smile to a faded distance.

Nick's nostrils flared with a silent exhale, frustrated. They'd have to talk about Jerry eventually, no doubt. But not now. Ensuring the interaction passed under Rochelle's notice, Nick raised his voice a little, tone going harsh. "Watch the recoil on that thing. And if there's a Hunter in there or something, I'm not afraid to throw this asshole as bait and run. Just so you know."

Entering the bedroom in a slow strafe, Rochelle carefully scanned the room, borrowed Magnum following the lead of her roving eyes. "And have ruined your jacket for nothing…? Real shame."

As the door opened, more light flooded in. The room was furnished with a dresser, bed, and two nightstands. A large TV sat atop the dresser, knocked slightly askew.

"Ugh." Nick muttered in disgust. "Don't remind me."

The bed was a queen, stripped down to just the mattress. The sight was a little surprising; if the residents had been in such a rush to leave, it seemed odd to take the time to strip the bed.

Shaking that thought off, Rochelle swept to the left, following the room as it opened. There was a door at the far corner, and she approached it carefully. She didn't want to use her injured hand, but the door was closed - so she gently reached out her bandaged right hand and circled fingers around the knob, twisting and pushing it open.

She blinked her eyes wide as it squeaked on its hinges. The light streaming in from the front door was reaching its limits, and the room revealed was only dimly illuminated. The darkness forced her to strain to see in, and a sense of anxiety rose.

It was just a bathroom, however, squat and cramped. Seashells lined the counter in a messy attempt at cute decoration, and there was a small pile of paper cups on the counter, like one might use for mouthwash. Though the shower curtains were drawn, they were a faintly yellow transparent colour and she could tell nothing hid behind them.

Exhaling a little, Rochelle lowered Nick's Magnum and turned. "Okay. We're good."

Not needing more assurance than that, Nick came backing up into view, striding to the edge of the bed. Ellis kept in step with him, and they eased Christophe down onto the mattress. Nick didn't drop him - but he backed away the moment the guy was flat on the bed, leaving Ellis to fuss his three remaining limbs into something approximating a comfortable sprawl.

Growling faintly, Nick raised a hand to massage his injured shoulder, grinding away the pain by force. He'd way over-taxed it… though the entire team was over-taxing wounds of their own at the moment, and he really shouldn't have been complaining. Nick was, however, not one to pass up self-pity.

"Think we've got another amputation in us? My arm is killing me. I could probably stand to lose a few pounds, anyway."

The joke missed its mark: Ellis didn't even look at him, and Rochelle spared him only a sharp look of annoyance.

Tossing his eyes into a roll, he wearily dragged Coach's shotgun off his shoulder and tapped it into his hands. If he wasn't mistaken, the room's temperature had dropped a couple degrees. He wasn't about to linger and take the abuse. "Ookay. Hint taken. I'm gonna go check on the big guy and clear the rest of the rooms."

He retreated back into the hallway, and Ellis risked a glance after him, frown growing on his lips. Conflict rose on his expression when he couldn't identify the strangled bundle of emotions that built in his chest.

Ellis mindlessly thumbed at Chris' bloodied cargo shorts as a sigh escaped his throat. He didn't realize he'd done it aloud until Rochelle looked at him, eyes alighting on his face with a sympathetic edge. She advanced - but her attention went to Chris.

Laying still where he was, the Spaniard had taken to trembling. It was a constant shiver that twitched at his muscles, and there was a sheen of sweat on his skin that made it hard to tell if he was shivering from cold or fever. Maybe both. He still held a ghastly white pallor. The blood loss was still taking its toll, and if they didn't get hydration and nutrients into him, soon…

Ellis made room for Rochelle as she slipped to stand beside the bed. She set Nick's Magnum down, freeing her uninjured hand to idly untie the Spaniard's shoes. She was clumsy one-handed, but persisted. "You okay?" she murmured, voice tender. "You and Nick seem… off."

Ellis shifted his gaze to his hands. He chewed on that question for a minute, wishing he knew better how to respond. Was he angry with Nick? Or something else?

Knowing that somebody had died because of him was hard. Even if he'd been a cruel man, even if he'd been attacking him, even knowing what might have happened if Jerry hadn't died… Ellis didn't want to begin to guess at that. Didn't want to think what his intentions had been.

Even under those circumstances, he never wanted to be the reason behind someone's death. The idea that his actions had forced Nick's hand, forced him to kill someone… He felt too many things to rifle through them. He felt angry, but not at Nick. Maybe he felt angry at himself.

Though a part of him didn't want to talk about it - another part was already speaking, low and tremulous. "Did y'all know?"

Rochelle tilted her head without looking at him. She drew Chris' bloodied sneakers free of his feet, one after the other, tossing them to the ground. "Know what?" There was something in her voice, though. A hesitance. A gentled tremor.

She did, he was sure.

"Jerry." Ellis darted his eyes up, catching them on Rochelle's face. He could feel the tension in his voice, even as he tried to soften it out. "Whut did he do? Did he… do somethin' tuh make the gun backfire? Happened tuh Keith once, but it was 'cause the gun was real old, 'n' -"

He knew he'd been right when she stiffened, and his jaw went tense with the confirmation that they'd kept him in the dark. Anger flared up in his voice, then, before he could stop it.

"You knew - I thought it was an accident, and y'all didn't tell me?"

That made her turn, and she met his gaze fully. Her expression fractured into frustrated upset, and the anger was gone as fast as it had arrived, his body cowing instead. He shouldn't have been getting angry with Rochelle, and least of all right now.

"I -" she started, almost blustering… then pulled herself back, inhaling shakily and starting again in a calmer whisper. Rochelle clenched her fingers around the wrist of her injured hand, soothingly, because she'd almost angrily fisted it and the pain was clear in her eyes. "I wanted to, so you didn't blame yourself for it. He didn't want to bring it up again."

Ellis mostly struggled with a sense of raw shame, now, lowering his gaze. He hadn't meant to upset her, not after what happened, not when she was just recovering from having to kill Brenda. Not when he considered that his fault, too.

Rochelle's mouth drew into a frown, raising her left hand to smooth her palm over the top of her head. She examined him for a beat, and the collapse of his anger seemed to turn her own frustration muted and mild. "Are you upset with him?"

The words didn't match what he felt. He wasn't angry at Nick for killing Jerry. It wasn't the thought of Nick doing it that surged uncomfortable tension through him. It was the thought that Nick had had to do it - because of him. He'd put him in that position. He'd forced his hand.

If he'd only gone with them…

Maybe Ellis should have been angry. After all, if the decision had come down to Nick being there and pulling the trigger to save him, there would have been no question - but Nick had set a trap, without telling him, and left it to chance. Something that would have killed Jerry, whether the man had done anything wrong or not.

All Ellis managed to say was a strangled, "I dunno."
Her eyes skated over his face, and he didn't know how much of his thought was visible. Reluctantly, she shook her head and averted her eyes. "I wish it hadn't happened like that. But you know he was just trying to protect you, and I'm glad he did." A taut sincerity seeped into her voice. "Anyway, you should talk to him about this."

"I'm gonna. I just..." He shook his head, tucking his lower lip between his teeth and worrying at it. His jaw tightened - and tightened more, even as pain snuck in to the clench of his teeth on the flesh of his lip. If he bit down, he might stop the heavy weight behind his eyes, the rising feeling of tension and wetness. Something cold wormed in his gut. Something piercing.

Something like guilt.

He felt like he'd forced Rochelle to kill Brenda... and now, to find out he'd forced Nick to kill Jerry?

She noticed his visible struggle with a start, and her eyes softened. Rochelle turned her body to face him, reaching out her uninjured hand to place it against his chest. Her fingertips soothed there, brushing against his sternum. "Baby...?" The gesture made him inhale, shakily, and he reached up to grasp her hand softly with his.

He couldn't put this on Rochelle. He had to be strong.

Ellis prepared to reassure her, to lie and say he was okay - but before he could get the words out, a rough "Aw, hell nah." sounded from the hallway.

They both startled faintly, and Rochelle squeezed her fingers against his chest before stepping around him and moving toward the doorway. "Coach?" Her voice was questioning, and maybe a little fragile. Ellis took advantage of her distraction to put the heels of his hands against his eyes, taking a few short breaths to calm himself.

"Come on, man." he muttered, softly, just to himself. "Keep it together."

Coach stood in the hallway, gazing up at the stairwell, brows drawn over his eyes. His body was slumped, hunched until he could grasp a hand over his injured knee. He glanced at her as she came into his view, wearily. "I ain't goin' up more damn stairs."

A sympathetic frown touched her lips, and she started forward. As she reached him, tucking herself around to his other side so she could curl her left arm behind his back, Nick's voice floated in from down the hall.

"No need. Beds in here. Single and a bunk-bed."

Rochelle blinked, glancing toward his voice, and finding the second door in the hallway was now open. The dark-haired Northerner reappeared through the threshold, Coach's shotgun braced over his forearm and a lazy kind of disinterest in his stride.

"Take a load off, Tons of Fun."

Coach sighed, and had he not looked so relieved, he might've taken the time to be annoyed. He tucked a hand onto Rochelle's shoulder, allowing himself to lean against her a little. "Sounds like a plan." he gruffed wearily. "Need to get off this knee."

Lacing her fingers against his shirt, minding the stitched-up tear between his shoulderblades, Rochelle stiffened to take some of his weight. It had started to come undone, she noticed - just little gaps forming amidst the threads. A wry part of her couldn't help but think Carmine had done a good job for it to have lasted over all the exertion and trauma they'd been through.

Pushing him to start moving, Rochelle spared a glance for the gambler. It was all she could do to keep herself from glaring, but she honestly tried. For Ellis' sake, if nothing else. She had to let them work it out on their own. "Thanks, Nick. Can you check upstairs?"

"Workin' on it." he responded, distantly, skirting around them and moving toward the stairs without even glancing at her. She half swore that she could have outright stuck her tongue out at him and he wouldn't have noticed.

Now she wished she'd taken the chance.

Bracing the shotgun against his hip, Nick took the stairs carefully. He felt confident the condo was empty of danger, but he wasn't about to let his guard down. They were at the limits of their capacity for bad news, and there was simply no room for error. They needed a safehouse like nothing else, and definitely didn't need him getting hurt by some rogue zombie hidden away in some side room.

He breached into the upper floor with a cautious tension. It was more like a loft, almost the entirety of the space open, topped by a vaulted ceiling that stretched into darkness. Through the stair railing, to the far left, there was a small kitchen with an L-shaped set of counters closed in by a diagonally cut island.

Two stools sat against the back of the island, like a bar. The center of the room was dominated by a fat and lumpy couch and two loveseats in a symmetrical curl around a short coffee table. His focus, however, was drawn upwards.

He wouldn't have been able to see at all, likely, had light not filtered out from behind a set of curtains on the opposite wall. They were massive curtains, draping a good seven feet up the wall and crossing over nearly the entire width of the room. They were thick and only allowed slats of light in at the very edges.

Nick stood there a moment, allowing himself to scan the room carefully. There was no movement, no signs of life. There was, however, another door - above the entryway and behind the staircase, a corner of the condo was walled in. He could tell instantly it was too small to be another bedroom, but he still had to look.

Alert, Nick stepped up to sidle along the railing, making for the doorway. He took it like he'd taken the door downstairs; he pressed the muzzle of Coach's shotgun against the space between the door and the threshold, letting it push forward as he turned the knob and opened the door.

Anything unlucky enough to be there would get a face-full of lead.

But the bathroom was empty. It was merely a powder room, just large enough for a toilet and a clamshell sink. He grunted a little, dropping the shotgun to rest against his thigh and retreating. "Looks like we're good." he called idly downstairs, only a little annoyed when he received no response.

Truthfully, he was fine with the distance. The alone time was soothing.

Raising his eyes back to the curtains, he let his head cock. He'd figured the other staircase attached to the house led to a porch, but hadn't really considered the consequences beyond that. In pre-apocalypse life, a beachhouse balcony was appealing - now, all he could think was how a Smoker could yank him off it, or a Hunter could crawl up onto it.

If he'd had the time, he might have felt a little melancholic about that shift in mindset. As it was, he crossed the loft, carefully shuffling between the seating that centered the whole room. He approached the curtains, settling back on his heels before reaching out.

A hum touched his throat as he caught fingertips in the curtains and tossed them aside. They slid easily on the rails, metal connectors rattling as they dragged along. Nick blinked through the flash as sunlight exploded into the room behind them.

Through the set of glass doors and a long panel of glass above them, he gazed out over a thin stretch of porch. It was bare, no chairs or tables, just wide enough to stand in and extending off to the right where it no doubt looped around to the second staircase.

Beyond it, through a tall railing, his eyes locked onto something of far more interest.

He couldn't resist taking a step forward, palm sliding flat onto the glass door. The two-story condo was tall enough to allow his sight to slant over the few lines of houses and buildings that separated them from the shoreline. Tall enough to see over and past them, just a little. Just enough.

The horizon stretched out to seeming infinity, a thin sheet of blue betraying the ocean that was so nearby. It wavered and flowed, dark shades mixing with the white crests of waves, only barely discernable. He'd tasted the salt in the air, but now, it was truly before him. They'd been driving toward the shore for so long…

Nick felt something, but he wasn't sure what.

It sure as hell didn't feel like looking at salvation.
Chapter 125

To Ellis' considerable relief, Nick was avoiding them. He'd made some noise about unloading the car alone, but when Rochelle offered to help she was dismissed off-hand. She hadn't been in the mood to argue with him, so instead, Ellis and Rochelle had settled in to take care of Christophe.

The gambler had tossed the supplies backpack at them, made a few quiet passes up and down the stairs as he carried things in from the sedan… then disappeared after his last trip, climbing the stairs and not coming back down. It was for the best, even if it frustrated Ellis a little to feel like he was somehow in trouble.

Regardless, he needed to figure out what he even wanted to say when they did talk.

He had shucked his steel-toed boots, sitting crosslegged on the bed next to the foreigner. It bowed under their combined weight, enough to draw the unconscious man closer so his thigh and waistline pressed against either of Ellis' knees. He'd positioned himself on the left side, gazing down at the stump that remained of Chris' left arm.

It was still surreal. Almost nervously, he glanced at both of his own arms. He struggled to imagine what it would be like, losing one, losing part of himself. His eyes drifted onto Chris' face, and a mulled sympathy swarmed onto his features.

"I know we didn't mean to or nothin', but… Feels like we took.. everythin' from him."

Rochelle looked up from where she kneeled beside the bed, movements pausing. She tried to keep her injured hand against her tummy, arm posed as if it were in a sling against her side. Her other hand was in the midst of poking through their supplies backpack. "…Yeah."

There was a window on the bedroom wall, but it had been tightly shuttered, blocking out any light. Once they were opened, a yellow glow had flooded the room, lighting their surroundings. However, it was getting late and they didn't have any candles; the night would be dark, so they had to work fast.

Exhaling softly, she returned to her work, taking out one of the antibiotic tubes and tossing it onto the bed. "His arm and his team's gone now. I… don't know how close they were, but I can't imagine being alone in all this." Next, she grabbed up the pack of gauze Ellis had found, looking it over a little thoughtfully. "I can understand why she was so desperate to get him back."

Ellis glanced up toward her, dropping his arms slightly. She seemed more stable now that she had something constructive to do. Maybe dedicating her attention to tending to Chris was good for her - for both of them. He was feeling more solid, too.

"He ain't alone now. We'll take care of him."

That made her smile, softly, and she spared a grateful look up toward him. "I'm glad you feel that way. I just - after everything, I just… I couldn't forgive myself if we didn't try." Placing the gauze next to the antibiotics, she reached back in, digging through the contents. "I know Nick doesn't really trust him, and I don't know how much you saw of what happened at the gunstore…"

Ellis shrugged, just a little. "Plenty, I reckon, and y'all mostly filled in the blanks... I saw them scufflin' over the gun when I showed up."

"Yeah." She scooped up one of the waterbottles Nick had stowed in there, holding it up to Ellis. He took it, wobbling it in his hand idly so it sloshed. "She signaled Jerry to kill you, and he was really upset. It really didn't seem like their plan was to kill us the whole time - or at least, he didn't know it was. If he hadn't fought back, you might've been too late."

There was more, of course, but Rochelle still didn't know how to broach the subject of Brenda's fear of the military. They'd have to talk about it eventually, but at this point, part of her wanted to see if they could talk to Chris and get some kind of clarity before bringing Ellis into it.

The last thing she wanted to do was unnecessarily rouse fear in him that their search for rescue might just fall through.

Ellis seemed to consider her words, eyes darting back to Christophe's face. "Huh." The idea that she was hiding anything went right over his head. "Maybe he just got stuck with 'em. Heck, Nick didn't wanna stay with us at first - but, like you said. It's real dangerous goin' solo."

"Maybe." she uttered, softly. Grasping up their pillbottle of antibiotics, she finally pushed to her feet. "Can you lean him up? I really want to get him to take one of these. Figure we'll just… flush it with water, try and make him swallow."

Blinking, Ellis nodded his head and set down the waterbottle beside his hip. "Okay…" He carefully scooped a hand under Chris' neck, bracing him, and leaned him up off the mattress. He scooched until he could get himself between Chris and the headboard, slipping crossed legs underneath his shoulders to hold him up.

Ellis moved slowly, taking as much care as he could not to touch his stumped shoulder. The last thing he wanted to do was bump or scrape it.

Leaving his hand where it was, he tilted the Spaniard's head up, holding it there. His skin was clammy, cold yet doused in warm sweat, and as Ellis settled underneath him he uttered a few strained breaths. It was only hesitantly that he recognized them as coherent words.

"¿Vale?… Phil."

Ellis quirked his head so he could gaze over the man's face, but it was just more muttering with no signs of coming to actual awareness. "Sean… escasamente, para… " The Spanish escaped him, but the names caught his attention. He mused on it - and when he looked up, Rochelle's expression betrayed thought of her own.

She seemed slightly frustrated, though, so Ellis forced a smile to try and catch her attention. "Him talkin' is a good sign, though, right? Even if he ain't really wakin' up."

Rochelle half-nodded, focusing her eyes downwards. She reached out her left hand to scoop up the bottle of antibiotics, tucking it under her bicep to brace it. "I guess. Better than nothing, at least." Her expression scrunched slightly as she squeezed her arm to hold it still as she pushed against the child lock and twisted, trying to crack it open.

Hesitantly, Ellis suggested, "Maybe we should try tuh give him painkillers, too. I mean… he's gonna wake up sometime. Probably be in a bunch'uh pain if we don't, and we don't want him hollerin' again."

"Let's see if we can even get him to take this." Managing to get the pillbottle open and sliding her hand to grasp it with the cap stowed between it and her palm, Rochelle offered it out to Ellis, tilting it a little in an expectant gesture. He cupped his free hand under it, watching as she tapped one out onto his palm.
It was a little dual-coloured capsule, red on one end and yellow on the other. He bounced it thoughtfully, glancing back to Chris as Rochelle carefully replaced the pills under her arm and recapped it.

"Okay." she sighed, leaning over the Spaniard's body to retrieve the waterbottle Ellis had placed down. She opened it much like she had the pills, though it went better with no child lock to frustrate her progress. Thumbing the cap off to let it fall to the bed, she sat on the edge of the mattress, leaning in toward Chris.

Rochelle tucked the waterbottle between her thighs, readying herself with an inhale. She grasped her knuckles under Chris' chin, drawing his jaw open with a firm pressure. "Give me the pill and grab him here, I'll -"

"Wait." Ellis suddenly spoke, gazing at the unconscious Spaniard. She froze a little, expression darting into something nervous, like she'd done something wrong. "I ever tell you 'bout this one time, when Keith was bite-sized, one'uh his wisdom teeth got like… lopsided? It ain't like he did anything tuh cause it, it just - happens sometimes. Anyway, they -"

"… Ellis, I love you, but what's this got to do with what we're doing?" Her brows were wrenched up, gaze intent on his with something trapped between disbelief and humor.

He couldn't help a slightly put-out look. It wasn't like he didn't know he had a tendency to ramble, and that his stories generally weren't particularly relevant - but he did have a salient point this time. Rather than say so, Ellis simply exhaled, continuing a little more hurriedly.

"He got it pulled, but he had tuh take meds like this fer a while." Bouncing the pill in his hand to make his point, Ellis bobbed his head. "His mama couldn't get him tuh swallow 'em fer shit, so his pa just cracked 'em open and mixed it in juice. It tasted real awful, but his pa pretty much said he'd either drink it or get whooped, so…"

Rochelle was still staring at him blankly right up until the very end of the story. As he trailed off, her eyes brightened, and she glanced down at the water in her hand in realization.

"Shit. That's a really good idea. The painkillers are tablets, but we could crush them, mix it in water…" A laugh escaped her, almost tickled, and she dropped her hand to her thigh. "Here I am, getting ready to cram my hand down his throat… You're a smart cookie, Ellis."

He couldn't resist a grin, thumbing the pill against his palm so he could scratch bashfully at the back of his neck with his other fingers. "Aw, that ain't true. I just remembered it, is all." Glancing toward the door, Ellis nipped at his tongue. "Maybe there's a cup in the kitchen or somethin'."

"Actually…" Rochelle placed the waterbottle on the nightstand to get it out of her hands. She slipped off the bed, taking the few steps between her and the bathroom. Her eyes caught on that pile of paper cups she'd seen earlier, and she snatched one up, yanking it off the rest. "Yeah. Here."

Returning to the bed, Rochelle held up the cup. "Might need you to handle this. Not sure I can do this with one hand."

Ellis gave her trophy a practically excited once-over, grinning a little as his idea came to fruition. "I got'cha." He pulled his hand away from Chris' neck, letting his head settle back down, and grabbed the cup from her. He placed it on his knee, balancing it there, and grasped the antibiotic capsule between his fingertips.

The two halves of the pill started to move when he twisted either end opposite its partner, though it took a careful wiggling motion to get them to slide completely apart. With a squinted attention, he poured out the dusty white contents into the cup.

As he worked, Rochelle reached back into the backpack and retrieved the painkillers. She was forced to struggle it open again, visibly having to stop herself from using her bandaged hand. "Sweet Jesus, I'm gonna lose it with this... It just had to be my right hand." escaped her in a frustrated mutter.

Ellis gave a slight laugh, though it was muted with sympathy. He grasped the cup, holding it carefully in his hand and squinting down at the powder now resting inside. "Sorry, girl. You were a real badass back there, though. Saved our hides."

She gave him a smile - and it was genuine, nose scrunching a little along the bridge. "I'd never let anyone hurt you," Cracking open the painkillers, she offered it out to Ellis again. This time, she tapped out two tan tablets onto his palm. As she did, she tipped her head slightly. "We do have to figure out a way to grind them up."

Something like mischief flared when Ellis grinned at her. "I got an idea." He dove a hand into the left pocket of his coveralls, snatching out the steel pocket knife he'd nicked from the same garage they'd found their car in. He waggled it, and twisted himself a little, leaning back so he could place the pills on the nightstand behind him.

Grasping the folded pocket knife in a fist, the end sticking out from his curled fingers, Ellis circled his other hand around the pills. Using it like a barrier to keep the contents inside, he carefully pressed the end of his pocket knife against one of the pills and pushed, hard.

It snapped the pill in half, and he did the same to the other. Then again - and again. It took a little while to break them down into anything resembling a powder, and even then, there were some chunks amidst the pile. Eventually satisfied with his work, Ellis blindly reached back and held out his hand for the cup.

Smiling in a mild way, eyes soft on him, Rochelle placed the paper cup between his fingers. He carefully accepted it and pressed it to the corner of the nightstand, using his pinky to gently and meticulously scrape the powder off the edge and into the cup.

Lifting the cup with a thoroughly pleased expression, Ellis stuck it out to her. "There! That ain't half bad. It'll taste gnarly, but better than him chokin' on pills, right?"

"Good job, cutie." In one swift motion, Rochelle knuckled against his cheek in a teasingly affectionate brush and took the cup from him. He ducked his head, shading his eyes under the bill of his cap, watching her turn at the waist and grasp the waterbottle loosely with her injured hand.

She carefully poured out a splash of water into the cup - not too much, maybe two-thirds of the height of the paper vessel. The woman tucked the waterbottle under her arm, tilted up, and returned to sitting on the bed. "This should work." she agreed, exhaling a softly relieved sound, and dipped an index finger into the cup to swirl it around, mixing it carefully.

The contents didn't completely dissolve, but the water turned almost milky in colour as it swirled up and mixed together. It smelled like tacky, sour glue, but it was better than nothing.

Moving more confidently, Rochelle tucked the thumb of her injured hand against Chris' chin and forced his mouth open, pressing the paper cup against his lips and tipping its contents. She quickly grabbed the water again, following the pill mixture up with a little more water - but not too much.
Chris did cough a little, head twitching, and Ellis tensed nervously - but the cough turned into a tired clank of his teeth, jaw shifting. His throat clenched as his body seemed to reflexively swallow, and Rochelle visibly relaxed.

"Thank God."

Ellis and her traded smiles, relief and pride blatant in the gesture. Rochelle placed the cup and waterbottle on the nightstand, thoughtfully tucking her hands together and brushing her thumb over her knuckles. "We should change his bandages, and use this cream you found."

Glancing over the Spaniard, Ellis thoughtfully lifted a hand to brush a hand over the bandages that crossed over Chris' chest, bracing on his shoulder and looping over his neck. They were mostly made up of the cannibalized strips of Nick's suit jacket, and he mused with a nip on his lips. "Reckon we got enough?"

Rochelle settled her palm over the multipack of gauze, tapping fingertips against it. "No." Despite the word, she flashed a smile at him. "It'll be okay, though. Let's just loosen his bandages, and we can put some cream on and then pack in a layer against his shoulder. Like we did for your forearm that one time."

Ellis hummed in understanding, nodding his head in easy agreement. Following her cue, he started to work on undoing the bandages just enough to draw them away from Christophe's stumped arm. "Least he ain't been bleedin' too much."

As he said it, though, he peeled away some of the bandages, and his eyes caught on the underside of them. While there was a little red leeched into the fabric, Ellis' attention was more captured by a clear liquid that had wept out into it. He frowned, but merely continued to nudge the bandages away.

The ragged surface of his amputated arm had browned around the edges, more of a burnt pink in the center. It was somewhere between a burn and a scab, though there were cracks lacing it here and there, forming split-off chunks that followed the alternating depths of the ragged wound.

A curious edge touched the quirk to Ellis' brow, and he couldn't help tentatively dusting fingertips against the injury. He'd have to, anyway, to apply the cream. The contact sent shivers of pain down Chris' body, muscles flexing in protest at his shoulder.

The pink flesh had a feel like wet paper, tacky and slick with that weeping fluid, but the more brown it was the harder it became until it was sheathed in a rough scab. The spiderweb of cracks on the hard surface made him frown more - if he pressed on one of the sections, even gently, they almost felt like they might shift. The last thing they needed was chunks of the wound falling off.

"Here." Rochelle prompted, and when Ellis lifted his head, he saw she'd gotten the antibiotic opened up and torn off the small seal over the nozzle. "It.. doesn't look great, but I kinda thought it'd look worse…"

He didn't utter his concerns, flashing her a smile and taking the tube from her hand. "Y'know, Keith almost lost a limb once. He was tryin' tuh climb over this barb-wire fence, 'cause he'n'I found this real big warehouse in the middle'uh nowhere 'n' he got convinced it was some Area 61 shit or somethin'."

Rochelle stilled with a calm quiet as she listened, head tilted, and watched as Ellis squeezed out a careful line of the clear gel onto his index finger.
"Only thing was, he got all the way to the top, and then lost his grip. Man, he fell real bad, got a leg twisted up in the wires - he was screamin, 'cause he couldn't grab nothin', so he was just hangin' by his leg 'n' his weight was makin' it get tighter. Every time he moved, man, it got worse."

Horror started to blossom on her expression, so Ellis shook his head with quick reassurance. "He ended up fine. It was real scary, at the time, though."

She relaxed a little, seeming a touch disbelieving at that, and lowered her eyes as Ellis lowered his head. He started to carefully apply the antibiotics, paying special attention to the cracks in the skin where the flesh was threatening to fall apart. She gently probed as he did. "What happened?"

"Well, I couldn't get him free fer nothin', so we had tuh call like an ambulance'n'some firefighters'n'shit. They cut him down, but the wires were like dug in, and between the cuts 'n' it cuttin' off his blood flow, the doctors were real worried he'd have tuh lose it. It took a long while before they told us it was gonna be a'ight."

"Damn." escaped Rochelle, some twisted humor flicking over her expression. She couldn't help a soft flutter of sorrow at that - if Christophe had only had the benefit of a doctor… "I can never tell if that boy is that crazy, or if you're just exaggerating."

Ellis snorted, gently, flashing her the smallest of confused glances. "I ain't lyin'. Well, 'cept fer the shit I wasn't there for, I guess… Keith might make some stuff up. But I'm usually there!" When he ran out of antibiotics on his finger, leaving only a greasy layer he couldn't get off, he went to squeeze out some more.

He wasn't inclined to be too sparing. The first few days, he figured, were most important.

When Rochelle merely laughed, softly, Ellis changed the subject. "Do you think we should give Coach some'uh those painkillers?" he suggested idly as he worked, painting the traumatized flesh with his finger. "His knee wasn't lookin' so good."

Rochelle nodded, eyes darting up to gaze at the wall that separated the two bedrooms. Worry wrote a line between her brows. 'I've never seen him that bad. It's always been aching him, but I think he really did a number on it…" A faint pinch touched her lips, reluctant.

Ellis glanced at her, only examining her expression for a moment before looking down again. He smeared one last measure of gel over the surface of Chris' wound, pulling his hand away and letting it hang in the air for a moment. "Okay. Let's bandage him up."

After a beat of uncertainty, eyeballing the grease layering his hand, Ellis just shrugged his shoulders and moved to wipe it against his forearm. He had plenty of cuts and abrasions from who-knew-when, and he flashed Rochelle a bit of a goofy smile as he treated the gel like it were lotion.

She snorted at him, shaking her head faintly - but as he got the cream off his hand and reached out toward the bandages, she beat him to it. Grabbing up the pack loosely in her injured hand, she used the nail of her thumb to start cutting into the plastic. "I'll finish up. How about you go bring Coach some water and the painkillers, and go check on Nick?"

Ellis was nodding along - though the last bit made him blanch, just softly. It wasn't that he didn't want to talk to Nick, but the way that the gambler was actively trying to keep his distance made him nervous. He'd been planning to respect his space, and wait until night rolled around when they'd have some privacy.

And maybe he was procrastinating a little.
Rochelle didn't seem to notice his reaction. Trying to avoid bending her hand too much lest she agitate her cut palm, she busied herself with working out one of the gauze rolls and examining it.

"Oh.. uh.. You sure? I can stay 'n' help out..." At his words, a little smile twitched at her lips, and she passed him a knowing look. He blurted reflexively: 'I-I ain't avoidin' him or nothin'. I just don't wanna let'cha hurt yer hand..."

So much for not noticing.

Humming in faint dismissal, she scraped fingernails against the gauze to start dragging it undone. "Just leave that penknife so I can cut this. Coach is down for the count and I'll be busy with this, so go talk to Nick, okay?"

Before Ellis could respond - or even hesitate to respond - Rochelle dropped her uninjured hand to seek out his, curling fingers around his palm. "You'll feel better once you do, I bet." He squeezed back reflexively and fell to a smile despite himself. "And if he's mean, just tell me, and I'll go kick his ass."

He sighed, pressing his thumb against her knuckles and rubbing a little, soaking in the affection of the gesture. "You're right. Me beatin' around the bush ain't helpin' none." Ellis curled his tongue against his cheek before lowering his voice, not meeting her gaze. "I… I ain't sure if I said this before, but… I'm real glad yuh found out. Thanks fer - y'know. Bein' here."

Ellis couldn't help the heat that touched his cheeks as he got the words out. A grin threatened at Rochelle's lips, but she muted it with a pinched jaw, aware of his embarrassment.

"Anytime, sweetie." was all she said.

Returning her attention to the gauze and releasing his hand, Rochelle carefully dragged out a section of it and flattened it against her thigh. Ellis quickly shook himself back into action and grabbed his stolen pocketknife from the nightstand, leaning over Chris' supine form to place it on the bed next to her.

As she scooped it up and thumbed the knife out, only struggling slightly with her injured hand, Ellis slipped off the bed. He had to worm himself out from Chris' weight, being careful not to jostle him, before he could stand. It was quietly that Ellis made to retrieve the bottle of painkillers and the bottle of water they'd already opened.

Rochelle spared him a supportive glance, nose crinkling, as he moved out of the room. He tried to hold onto that feeling as he crossed the hallway, tenderly peeking into the bedroom Coach had claimed.

The room was more cramped than the other bedroom, only a small stretch of carpet between the bunk-bed and the bed. There wasn't room for anything else except a tiny chest of drawers at the foot of the single bed and a closet built into the wall on the right. The shuttered door closing it off had been opened, probably by Nick, and it was full of linens and towels.

Ellis noted the discovery, reminding himself to grab something later so they could cover Chris - but he focused back on the task at hand, looking toward the bed.

Coach was flat on his back. Like the other bedroom, the beds had been stripped, and Coach had laid down on the bare mattress without much ceremony. He or Rochelle had taken a towel from the closet and bundled it up, tucking it beneath his injured knee, so it was elevated a little. Ellis examined the man's injured leg thoughtfully as he approached.
His jaw popped open, ready to speak, but as he came up level with Coach… he realized the man was asleep. He closed his lips as quick as they had parted.

Gazing uncertainly from the pills in his hand to Coach's reclined posture, Ellis struggled for a dragging instant. He didn't want to wake the ex-football player, but the sooner he took some meds the sooner they would kick in… but - then again - if he got some sleep, maybe his knee would feel better by the time he awoke.

The indecision chewed at Ellis' gut, and it was a fiercer sensation than it should have been. Like making a choice at all frightened him. That feeling of instability threatened at him again in a rush, unexpected, and he had to take a breath to stop that piercing cold from returning. It took him a moment to realize his hands were trembling.

He felt… broken, somehow, and he'd never felt that way before. Never felt so rickety, way down in the very core of himself.

Huffing, shaking his head, Ellis reached to set both the water and the pillbottle on the windowsill between the two beds, in the center of the far wall. He backed up, moving quick on his socked feet, escaping the room in more of a rush than he meant.

Why did he feel so afraid?

Nick braced the katana against the coffee table, a wad of paper towel grasped in his fist. It was with delicate care that he swiped at the blade, working away the gore from the steel. There were a few layers of it, some fresh and some new, and underneath some of the worst was patches of rust that made his upper lip curl.

He wasn't exactly an expert on swords, but it was easy to tell it hadn't been very well taken care of. It was, he supposed, irrelevant - it was still sharp enough to cut, and that mattered more.

Not gonna kill a zombie with tetanus.

The thought made him snort, even as he focused on the motions of his hand. He kept his fingers well away from the edge of the sword, cleaning it in cautious and slow swipes to ensure he wouldn't slip. However, his focus wasn't so intense that he didn't hear footsteps coming up the stairs.

It sounded too soft to be Ellis, lacking the heavy noise of his boots. He wasn't particularly interested in talking to Rochelle, either, so he actively decided against acknowledging the footsteps at all. Keeping his head down, he twisted the blade to start tending to the other side.

The steps stopped at the top of the stairs, for a moment leaving only the soft sound of Nick's swipes against the blade.

Then: "... Wow."

Ellis' voice did startle him, inwardly, though Nick didn't do more than twitch. He riveted his eyes on the blade, aware of Ellis slipping into his periphery. He'd left the curtains half open for light, and the Georgian wandered close to gaze through them, seeing much the same view as Nick had earlier.

As he passed the circle of seating, Nick allowed himself a glance upward, with Ellis' back now facing him. The kid had taken his boots off, he noted, but more important was the faint weakness he perceived in his posture. It wasn't any one thing in particular that tipped Nick off - just a slump and a weariness, his usual energy sapped out of him.

It was just softly that he smiled, a gesture Nick could only spot through the reflection on the balcony doors. "We done made it. Pretty cool, huh?"

Nick lowered his eyes before the mechanic could turn back around. He pressed his thumbnail against the papertowel and braced his other fingertips against the dull back of the blade so he could get leverage to cautiously scrub at a caked-on smear of viscera. "Half the battle, kiddo. Ocean ain't gonna save us."

Maybe no one will.

Ellis did turn around, leaning his shoulders against the glass door and allowing his body to flatten there. His gaze settled on the older man, and he was quiet, fingertips stretching backwards to tap against the glass in a soft pattern.

Nick merely continued his work, intentionally keeping his body loose, lest his rising tension make him slip up and cut himself. He wanted to be angry, to recoil, at the idea of Ellis being upset with him. What right did the kid have to judge him? Or worse, doubt him?
He was also tempted to just come right out with it, tell him in no uncertain terms: I killed Jerry and I'd have done it with my bare hands if I'd had the chance. If Ellis disliked that, fine, but it was the truth. If that broke something between them, hadn't it been a long time coming?

He kept silent, instead.

Slowly, Ellis' tapping came to a stop. His fingers halted gradually, aborting the rhythm one note at a time until the last digit gave a vague pat against the glass and then stilled. Only then did he speak again, voice soft - though not so much gentle as it was faint. "Weren't a bad idea, takin' that ninja sword. I always wanted one'uv those. Well… not that I wanted tuh get it like this, anyway."

Nick grunted, non-committal.

The sound seemed to daunt Ellis, his head tilting softly. The motion scraped the back of his cap against the glass, the plastic of the fastener making a whispered rasping sound. After a beat, he lowered his chin, and it was almost a gesture of defeat.

"… you mind if we talk?"

Placing the sword flat on the table, Nick retracted his hands in short order. He folded the paper towel in on itself, using a clean edge to scrub away a few idle splotches of red and black that had gotten on his fingers. "Sure. Weather's nice today." he uttered, voice rolling with harsh sarcasm.

Unexpectedly - the tone seemed to relieve Ellis' tension just a little. It was better than outright aggression, and the Georgian gently pushed away from the door. He moved with caution, approaching a few steps like he were coming up on a wild animal, then stopped at the corner of one of the loveseats.

He pushed his hip against the arm, settling down. Despite the initial reaction to Nick's mockery, he did exhale a faintly frustrated sigh and lower his voice. "I ain't jokin', Nick. I wanna know what happened, and why - why'd you wait so long tuh tell me?"

Once his fingers were clean, Nick tossed the paper towel to the table, leaning back on the sofa. He put his left arm over the back, allowing his injured right arm to drape limply against his side. His eyes settled coolly on Ellis in examination.

Was the kid angry? He didn't seem it, suddenly, and not being able to read that soft face was a strange feeling. Ellis was normally an open book, but Nick couldn't pierce through his tension or get anything more from him than a wavering discontent.

"Fine." Nick stated, voice taut but smooth. "Before we left that morning, I blocked his gun up so it would explode if he shot it. And apparently he did." His diction went harsh there at the end, pointedly; after all, Ellis had been his target. "I figured it would hurt him, maybe kill him, if I got lucky. And I didn't tell you at first because I -"

Because he'd not wanted to know how Ellis would react? Because dodging the confession was easier, until it became a choice between hiding his hand in it and letting Ellis think he'd somehow caused it?

Nick wasn't entirely sure, so he smoothed over it before the fumble could grow obvious.

"It didn't matter. He's dead, and we had bigger things to worry about."

A frown touched the Georgian's lips. His eyes drifted, and try as Nick might, he just couldn't discern what the glaze over them meant. "Whut if he'd just been shootin' zombies or somethin'?"
You didn't know he'd try tuh - I mean..."

It was all Nick could do not to let his eyes roll. He snorted instead, nostrils flaring faintly at the statement. "I know his type. I knew there was a chance." Ellis' brows twitched, like he were unsatisfied with that response, and Nick shook his head. "Yeah, I wasn't sure - but I was right, so what the fuck do you want?"

Frowning softly, Ellis lowered his head. His hands laced together over his knee, tightening fingers against the fabric of his coveralls. "It don't… bother you?"

Nick shrugged up his left shoulder with a defensive kind of frustration. "Why? Because I might have killed him before he got the chance to turn on us? I'm crippled with guilt. Really." Ellis seemed to absorb that, slowly, and Nick expected him to get angry. Expected those eyes to turn on him with muddled accusation.

Rather than give him the chance, the older man threw his head back and closed his eyes, the crown of his head resting against the cushy top of the sofa. "I'm not in the goddamn mood for this, Ellis. The fucker deserved what he got and I'm not going to be sorry for it, so either get over it, or come out and say what you mean."

Fabric shifted as Ellis stood, suddenly sliding off the couch arm. The motion was so abrupt, Nick's eyes flickered back open despite himself to land on the Georgian. Ellis dropped his hands to fists at his sides, and fuck if he didn't look… miserable?

"I ain't -" He hesitated, and when he turned his chin to look away, the light from the glass doors caught across his face. His eyes were brighter than they should have been, glinting, and it took Nick a moment to realize why.

"I ain't mad. I thought I was, but…"

They were damp.

Shaking his head, almost reluctant, Ellis raised his hands and pressed his palms against his face. His body slumped forward with the gesture, shoulders deflating, and that misery peaked. "I… didn't mean tuh make you kill somebody. I didn't mean tuh make Ro' kill anybody."

Something tensed in Nick's chest - surprise? Guilt? Had he been misreading Ellis this entire time? Unthinking, he stood from the couch, as if his body violently refused to stay seated. His frame went tight and poised as if he'd come under threat.

"What are you -" Is that what this was? Ellis was upset that he'd forced Nick to do something grisly, rather than upset at the act itself? "Kid, you didn't make anybody do anything. You -" He had little time to react when Ellis suddenly approached.

All he knew was one moment they were both still, and the next moment the younger man was crossing the distance between them. Ellis didn't embrace him, just stepped to stand before him. His head turned to bury his cheek against Nick's shoulder, but the rest of his body hovered a half-inch away as if afraid to close the distance more than he already had.

The contact with Nick's wounded shoulder ached, but he held his tongue.

Ellis got the words out in hurried chunks, every syllable increasing the tremble that started in his body. "If I hadn't slept in - 'n'if I - if I'd been watchin' Ro', I… I could'uh stopped her gettin' kidnapped - if I just - you guys had tuh kill people - I made you kill him -" He was shaking, almost shivering. "If I hadn't gotten hurt, we could'uh - if we were there, when Chris came back, 'n' -
Nick froze as his brain tenderly found its way around this new revelation. That doubt he'd witnessed, and that insecurity - those faint glances and those averted eyes. Ellis hadn't been wrestling with judgment; he'd been wrestling with guilt.

Christ. Ro' was right. Dumb hick's taking all of this on his shoulders, isn't he?

Not just Jerry - but Brenda and Chris, as well.

"Hey." Nick uttered, tone quiet and rougher than he meant. It came out chiding, and he couldn't force it to soften or dull the edge of it. "Ellis." The words rasped out of him, and he felt his throat go raw when he spoke. "We didn't have any choice. They didn't give us one. They brought this shit down on themselves. It just happened. Sometimes - shit just happens."

He could tell he wasn't soothing the trembling, and that his words weren't easing the younger man. If he'd anticipated this, maybe he could have come up with something better to say. Something reassuring. He'd been so busy shoring up his defenses, preparing for a fight…

Fuck… Nick bit on the inside of his cheek before slowly sliding his hands up, grasping palms flat onto either of Ellis' biceps. He moved testingly, gaugingly, like he might scare Ellis off if he moved too suddenly - and like he wasn't completely sure of how the contact might be received.

The trembling slowed under his fingertips.

Nick spared a glance for the staircase, hesitant. It was only with the knowledge that he'd hear anyone approach up the stairs that he let his arms slip around the younger man. They enclosed him in an embrace, palms settled against his back and biceps framing his sides. He pulled, and the kid followed in a stagger, taking the half-step left between them so their forms pressed flat together.

The trembling slowed further… stopped… and then began anew, but gentler this time. Softer, and different. Less like anxiety and pain. Nick allowed his head to dip so he could brush his cheek against Ellis' curly hair.

Although he couldn't see Ellis' face now, he felt the warmth of the younger man's cheek against his shoulder. "You didn't want anyone to get hurt. You told me, remember? At the hotel." Ellis was silent, but his head twitched in something like confirmation. "If you'd had a say, nobody would have. You're a fucking idiot like that."

The Georgian didn't react audibly, but his shivering frame softened a little, easing further into the embrace. He saw through the sarcasm like he always did, paying attention to the meaning behind it. The faith in Ellis' good intentions, because fuck if he ever had anything else.

"But you didn't. You didn't have any choice, you didn't have any control, and the people who did tried to kill you. Kill Rochelle. So we reacted. I reacted. That's it; end of story. Chris made his own call, and took a lick for it. But you didn't do anything to anyone."

Softly, that warmth against his shoulder increased as Ellis pressed into his dress shirt. Nick only slowly realized that it had turned into a wet warmth somewhere along the line. When he did, he felt a far-off kind of twinge in his chest - but didn't acknowledge the tears aloud.

"So stop being stupid about it."

There, Ellis did respond. He snorted through a stuffed nose, wet and quiet. Nick might have thought the sound unappreciative had Ellis not also pressed into him hard enough to unbalance him, just a little. He wasn't entirely sure if the kid meant it as a plea for more contact, or just a chastising shove.

He took a chance on it being the former.

Nick gripped his fingers on his shirt and slid back to sit onto the couch. Ellis came with him, clumsily, and the shift of their bodies ended up pulling the Georgian into a perch on Nick's thigh.
He hadn't really intended them to end up that way - but it suited him fine, and he slipped an arm around Ellis' waistline.

The mechanic stiffened, seeming unsure of how to posture himself at first, and a faintly surprised inhale made his frame stutter. Nick smoothed a palm against his thigh in a silent attempt to calm him. That warmed him to the contact, and Ellis' arms draped uselessly against his lap as he slumped into the curl of Nick's arm.

Their faces were level now, and he could see under the brim of Ellis' cap. Wetness had smeared its way down his cheeks, glistening. His eyes were bleary, but he wasn't crying anymore. When was the last time he cried? …when Coach almost died, maybe?

Pushing the thought away, forcibly,
Nick allowed his eyes to close rather than examine Ellis any closer.

Rather than linger on the fact that the contact between them was pure comfort.

He could feel Ellis' gaze shift to his face, roving. "'M sorry." escaped him in a whisper. There was more brimming at the edges, so Nick held his silence, allowing his fingers to work against Ellis' thigh in a soft crawl over the seam of his coveralls. "… just… this ain't how it was s'posed to be.
We ain't supposed tuh.."

His voice caught, and Nick didn't need to open his eyes to reach out and catch a hand against Ellis' neck. He drew him down, forcing him into a slump, until he was half-curled into his chest. Nick's chin found the top of his head easily, pressing into the cloth of his cap, helped along when the younger man hunched to bury against his neck.

There was little space between them, now, and Nick inhaled. Now-familiar husky sweat and grime filled his nose, but the flood of oxygen calmed him, eased out the tension in his limbs. "People die.
It's the zombie apocalypse." Ellis’ head began to shake, and Nick tipped his head to stop the gesture by force, cheek pressing down on the Georgian's scalp.

"There was nothing you could've done, Ellis. It isn't like the movies. You can't save everyone, let alone a pair of murderous assclowns." He felt the younger man's laugh more than he heard it, a puff of air traveling against the triangle of skin revealed by the undone button of his dress shirt.
"Do you really think you could have stopped anything? The only other way this played out is with us dead instead of them."

When Ellis was silent, Nick shifted the hand on his neck, fingertips seeking their way to touch the Georgian's cheek. As they anchored there, he used his palm to wipe away the wetness smeared along Ellis' skin.

He hesitated - then took the risk, lowering his voice. "You okay, kid?"

Wordless at first, Ellis' arms slid up out of his lap, hands leading them to loop around Nick's neck.
His body draped against him, warily. Nick allowed it to happen with the slightest of distant frowns, only shifting subtly to make the posture more comfortable.

"Yeah." he uttered, then, softly. While his arms tightened around Nick's neck, his head lifted, glancing out from under the bill of his cap to slant a glance at the older man's face. His eyes were clearer now, but his expression still seemed weak. Soft. His face was still cradled against Nick's palm. "Just tired, man…"

Nick got the feeling it wasn't really exhaustion that he referred to.

"'M sorry if you… thought I was angry. I-I ain't… I know you were just tryin' tuh -"

Protect him? Keep him safe?

Nick didn't know what he was going to say, but he knew he didn't want to hear it. It only took a small shift to lean in and capture his lips, the Georgian's capbill pressing into his forehead and sliding the cap up and out of the way. The motion happened before Nick really considered it, like it were mere reflex, but the moment he'd done it it seemed… right.

It was easier than talking, at least, and he'd done enough - too much? - of that.

The kiss didn't truly surprise Ellis. He leaned into it instantly, shifting to tenderly press close. His place on Nick's lap didn't allow for their bodies to really align, but the warmth of his seat against the gambler's thigh was pleasant relief.

He slid a hand onto the younger man's waist, gripping instinctively as his other hand framed the side of Ellis' face and trapped him in the kiss for a moment, silencing him. The link of their lips was soothing, washing away that rising tension threatening at him the longer they sat there.

It was Ellis who parted his lips with a heavy sigh, and Nick who had to draw back. The silky press of his mouth surged a rush of easy arousal through him, but sense override desire. As much as he'd have liked to take advantage of the moment, to flip them over and turn the contact into something carnal, and as much as he felt like Ellis might just have submitted…

… and as enticing as that thought was…

It wasn't exactly the time or place.

Dragging his hand up from his partner's cheek, Nick used the heel of his hand to straighten the younger man's hat out on his head. Ellis blinked, lips sealing with a soft pinch, and the look on his face was vaguely disappointed. He slipped into a faintly apologetic smile, like he were having similar thoughts.

Nick inhaled forcibly, calming himself when that visible disappointment took yet another chunk out of his self-control. On the exhale, he spoke. "Forget it. Okay? It's over."

Lowering his chin, the younger man flickered eyes over Nick's face in a swift muse. Nick could almost watch him put himself back together, breath now shallow. "It really don't bother you…?"

This time, Nick read it clearer. It wasn't accusatory - Ellis was genuinely worried. A faint frown tugged at his lips, and it was all Nick could do not to laugh.

Of all the things he'd expected, it wasn't Ellis fearing for his conscience.

Firm but slow, Nick slid his body to one side, moving himself out from under Ellis. The Georgian acquiesced in silence, crawling himself to sit on the couch instead, with only subtle hesitance. He leaned against the back of the sofa, sliding a palm to brace over his side, smoothing over that sore rib.

"You're not upset by killing who-the-fuck-knows how many infected every day?" Nick returned, somewhat wryly, even as he recognized it was dodging the question. He took a moment to palm down his face, collecting something like composure, body leaned forward to rest elbows on his knees. "Not like we were sitting on a low body count before now."

He was aware of Ellis watching him, still, and merely pressed fingertips against his eyes and rubbed. "It ain't the same." escaped the Georgian in a soft tone, much closer to thoughtful than it had been. "They're zombies… you can't reason with 'em."

A snort left Nick at that, and he gripped on the edge of the couch to drag himself to his feet. "Yeah, yeah. I don't think there was a lot to reason with here, either, but sure." He stepped away, sliding between the coffee table and the couch to move toward the kitchen.

Nick snuck a glance backwards as he moved, noting Ellis' hand still lingering at his side. "How's the rib?" he queried, more interested in distracting from the subject than anything else. Distance applied to him, abruptly - physically and verbally.

"Ah -" Self-conscious, Ellis pulled his hand away and glanced down at his torso. He released a faint sigh, tone shifting to something confiding and body slipping to lay horizontally on the sofa.
He braced his shoulders on the arm so he could still see Nick. "It wasn't too bad, before, but it's startin' tuh catch up on me. Think I'm just… plumb tuckered out."

Brushing a thumb against his temple, Nick approached the island that cut across the kitchen, where he'd placed the supplies from the car. "Adrenaline wore off. Pretty sure we're all surviving off momentum at this point." He scooped up the family-size pack of trail mix, somewhere around two or three pounds of nuts, raisins, and chocolate pieces.

He eyed it, then eyed the collection of cans they'd put together. They were nothing he was eager to eat cold, but gorging themselves on salty trail mix was a sure way to get dehydrated. They didn't have enough water to last them, as much as the idea of going out supply-hunting again put something sour in the back of his throat.

As much as it grated on him, he felt something protective stir. If the team could just rest - together
- for just a little while… maybe he'd feel less god-awful. Is that really that much to fuckin' ask…?

"I'm gonna go make Ro' eat something." Idly, Nick grabbed one of the boxes of granola bars, shrugging it under his arm. He turned back, returning to stand at the back of the sofa, tossing the bag of trail mix down in Ellis' prone lap. "You, too. Not like we're going anywhere anytime soon, so you may as well put your feet up."

The Georgian seemed a little startled when the bag landed, but his expression quickly fell to a faint gratification. He set a hand over the bag and nodded his head in a gentle gesture. "'Kay…" he murmured, carefully prying the pull-tab apart to open the bag.

Satisfied with that, Nick drew away, starting toward the staircase. It was with a weary sigh that he made his way down, resting a hand on the railing to balance himself as he allowed his body to slump. However, he hadn't crossed below the second floor before Ellis spoke.

"Hey - Nick?"

The gambler stopped, glancing back upwards. His gaze was only a foot above the second floor now, so he couldn't see past the back of the sofa. Ellis was still fiddling to open the bag, and he could hear it crinkling. "Yeah?"

"Thanks." Ellis' voice was gentle. "I wish it - hadn't happened… But I dunno if I'd be here if you hadn't done what'cha did."

Nick fought a momentary feeling of surprise. He blinked, and it showed on his face, relaxed in the privacy he had where he stood. A subtle discomfort edged its way into his voice, shifting on his heels, in the same moment that he felt something… pleased. It wasn't that he'd wanted Ellis' approval, but -

He moved to continue down the stairs before he had any time to wrestle with that thought.

"Sure, kiddo."
Chapter 127

Nick stepped into the downstairs bedroom, expression arranged in something disinterested. He'd intended to give Rochelle the cold shoulder, but didn't get the chance. She didn't even notice his entrance, much to his disappointment.

The rise and fall of Christophe's chest had grown deeper and slower. He laid flat on his back, lower body covered over with a thin sheet, and Rochelle was kneeled on the mattress with her injured hand curled against her side while her other one grasped onto a pillow.

She was in the process of attempting to slide it under his head, but her progress was frustrated by her one-handedness. Her movements were growing frustrated, shoulders high with irritation.

With an airless sigh, Nick strode across the carpet, crossing to the other side of the bed. Rochelle seemed to notice him only as he crossed into her vision, brows going up, but she didn't get anything more than an "Um -" out before Nick was leaning in.

Though his left arm was tucked over the box of granola bars, he used his right hand to grasp under Chris' neck and lift his head up from the bed. Rochelle watched him move, and it took a second for her to understand his intention. When she did, she jolted to take advantage of the space he'd opened for her.

After she slipped the pillow under Chris' head, Nick eased him back down.

As the Spaniard limply settled, Rochelle leaned back. Her body slumped, legs curling underneath herself, and she released a relieved sigh. "Thanks. I guess I shouldn't be complaining about not being able to use one of my hands, huh?" Her voice was dry, eyes catching on the bandaged shape of Chris' left arm.

"I'm always pro-complaint." Nick returned, and he was quick to feel a touch insulted when she laughed far too loudly. A frown twitched at his lips, grabbing the box out from under his arm. He dug into it, tearing open the flaps to retrieve a bar so he could shove it under her nose.

"... Eat, before I change my mind and let you starve."

Rochelle allowed herself a faint grin at that, reaching up to take the bar from him. "You said it, not me, dick." she uttered innocently, gripping the granola bar and biting at the package with her teeth. A twist of her neck split the plastic, and she worked an end of it free so she could take a substantial bite out of it.

Grumbling under his breath, Nick retrieved a bar for himself, dropping the box onto the mattress. He tore and peeled the packaging away, revealing the rectangle of tight-packed granola and oats. Taking a delicate nip off one corner, Nick chewed thoughtfully, disliking the way it stuck to his teeth.

It had a kind of honeyed salt to it, and it wasn't overtly offensive - just subtly so. However, his stomach twisted with hunger, and he buried his pride to take a larger mouthful.

"Looks like you guys managed with him." he noted after a swallow, gaze going distant as he examined the sleeping foreigner. Although his breathing had steadied, the sallow complexion and deepset circles under his eyes weren't comforting. "Still pretty much looks like death, though."

She hummed in agreement, closing her eyes in a savouring gesture as she worked her jaw against the dense nutrient bar. "Yeah. But his bandages are fresh now, we got meds in him, and some water..." Rochelle rattled their progress off, and it sounded like a list she'd worked out well before that moment. "I just... wish he'd wake up so we can get him to eat."

Nick had to snort, sparing a glance toward her in the time her eyes were closed. He scanned her expression, musing; she seemed better, but was it merely by force of will? Between Chris' condition and shooting Brenda... Maybe I should talk to her -

When he caught himself in the thought, frustration flooded him. Since when is it my job to make the rounds on everyone's mood? Fuck. He merely grunted, but the sound was apparently enough to prompt Rochelle to speak again.

"He was talking a little, earlier. Wasn't conscious, but - it was clearer than earlier." That drew Nick's brow up, and she must have anticipated his surprise, because she elaborated shortly without opening her eyes. "Pretty sure he said some names. Phil, Sean... Not really sure."

The gambler kept his silence for a moment, raising his free hand to scratch at his jawline. He mulled over his response as he did, fingertips lingering. Brenda's whispered words to him came to mind - but he had considered simply keeping them to himself until he could get some grasp on what they meant.

Rochelle noticed his reticence, head tilting. Before she could question him, he shrugged a shoulder.

"Not the first thing I'm gonna be asking him about when he -"

He might have finished his sentence, had a shape not passed into the threshold of the bedroom. It took him a beat to realize it was Ellis, limping in, and a frown took root on his lips. Nick hadn't heard him on the stairs... maybe the kid had crept down, even. "Overalls, are you actually incapable of sitting still?"

Ellis had the bag of trail mix cradled in one arm, and he was actively chewing on a mouthful. His brows cocked in hurt, words a bit muffled as he spoke. "Wh- I didn' wanna sit up there, by muhself!" Nick followed his movements with slitted eyes, shallow irritation behind his glare, but the younger man was undaunted. "'Sides, I was thirsty."

Rochelle took the hint, leaning off the bed to reach into the backpack sitting on the floor and grabbing one of the two yet-unopened waterbottles they had left. She offered it out to him, limply, and he crossed to take it with a grateful nod.

"Sit." Nick ordered after he had, tone short, pointing a stickt toward the edge of the bed.

Offering a stuck-out tongue in defiance, Ellis sidled instead over to the wall next to the TV-topped dresser and delicately slid himself down to sit on the floor. He worked his legs into a vague sprawl, slumping against the wall with a content sigh as he snapped the waterbottle open and took a measured sip.

Nick allowed his arms to cross, granola bar fisted against his forearm. His eyes narrowed intently. Ellis caught it, and if the faint reddening of his cheeks said anything - he successfully read the fierce threat behind the look. He swallowed thickly, piping up. "Anyhow... I was thinkin' about that."

"About what?" the producer prompted, turning herself on the bed so she could better see both of them at the same time. She set her bar of granola down against her thigh, resting her arms in her lap and turning an open look toward the Georgian.
At that, Ellis bobbed his head. "Well… Y'all were talkin' about whut Chris said, right? The names."

Once Rochelle acknowledged him with a tip of her head, hecontinued, though it was with a faint worrying of the inside of his cheek with his teeth. "Jerry said one'uv 'em, too, when… The other day."

A reluctant tilt touched Nick's head, and he and Rochelle passed the slimmest of glances between them. Ellis had yet to really give details about what had occurred at the hotel, not that Nick was eager to know, and this marked the closest he'd come.

"He was tellin' me - well, he mentioned someone named Phil, 'n..." Ellis reached somewhat hesitantly into the trail mix bag, drawing out a piece of chocolate candy and pinching it between his fingers. The candied shell crackled a little, breaking, and he popped it into his mouth before it fell apart.

"I ain't real sure or nothin', but it sounded like he'd done somethin' bad to 'im."

Stepping back to lean against the wall behind the bed, Nick drew his legs into a lazy cross, good one over his bad one. He let his eyes half-close, momentarily slanting a glance at Ellis. The Georgian seemed moderately calm as he spoke - even if his description clearly left out some information.

Nick gave a mocking huff of air. "Really? That goes against all my fond memories of the guy."

Ellis snorted, screwing up his nose in a reluctant gesture, even as he mostly ignored the gambler's sarcasm. "Do y'all think... I dunno. Maybe there was more of 'em? The Angels, I mean."

"Yeah. I know there was, actually." Rochelle shifted, like she might get up - but she merely slid herself to sit on the edge of the bed, legs dangling off, grabbing her granola bar up to fiddle fingernails against the plastic. Ellis blinked at her, curiously, and Nick matched the sentiment with an arched brow.

She explained with a shake of her head, speaking slow and precisely. "Before things kicked off in the gunstore... Chris told me they used to have a different leader, but he died to a Hunter. It was a different name, though... B-something. The way he talked made it sound like things got... worse, after that. Like they weren't so aggressive before."

Nick was tempted to scoff, but merely tilted his head instead. "I didn't think those three made that great of a team." His voice dropped, hitting a weary lull. "I just figured they were lying about exactly how good they'd been doing, but having had more members would make sense, too. Guess they were fallin' apart even before we showed up."

Ellis' eyes blinked between them repeatedly, absorbing the words.

"Maybe, maybe not. They certainly didn't seem to be struggling, either." Rochelle shrugged up her shoulders in idle thought, breaking off a piece of her granola bar and eyeing it distantly as she spoke. "Anyway, it does explain something." Tossing the hunk of oats in her mouth, she chewed at the sticky substance, nostrils flaring.

Leaning forward so he could brace an elbow against his knee, Ellis cocked his head her way. "Whut?" he prompted, eyes alert on her every motion.

Rochelle only hesitantly swallowed, drawing her tongue against her teeth before leaning in to match him. "Remember back when we first drove in here? There were those... kill-counts?" Her eyes drifted between them, only continuing after getting a quick nod from Nick and a slower, more thoughtful one from Ellis. "They came in fours. I didn't really think too much about it, but it did surprise me when we only met three people."

Nick chewed on that, suddenly. How the fuck did I miss that? A trickle of unease made its way down his back - there were a few potential implications behind that information, and none of them appealed to him.

Startled into an easy widening of his eyes, Ellis dropped his gaze to glance over the carpet just in front of him. "I didn't pay no mind, I guess..." A frown touched his lips, then, just faintly. "But... we caught up to 'em real quick, if I remember right, 'cause the zombies was all pretty fresh-killed. Couldn't'uh been more than like a half-hour behind."

Rochelle nodded at that, though it was with a soft and almost guarded sigh. "Yeah. Which either means they lost somebody right before we met them, or -"

There's a fourth still out there somewhere.

"Look." Nick interrupted before she could finish the sentence, raising the hand that wasn't holding his food. He startled both of them. "We don't know anything, and we're not gonna get anywhere like this except straight into a Grade A paranoid episode. How about we put it on ice for now, and wait to just ask the member of that group that we currently have with us?"

Although she frowned a little, Rochelle tilted her head in a relenting gesture. Ellis darted a glance between them, not as quick to agree. A kind of nervousness crept into his expression, like a spark flaring on a bare cable. "But..."

Shifting his gaze to cut across the room and met Ellis', Nick held it with a tense pressure. His voice rode the line between firm and curt, though only through effort. "If there was anyone else, we'd have heard from 'em by now. That crazy bitch made it pretty clear Chris is the only other Angel left - so if there was another of those assholes, they're either dead or they split up. Either way, we're in the clear."

Nick was mostly confident he was telling the truth.

With some reluctance, Ellis nodded his head. He took a sip from the waterbottle, holding a mouthful on his tongue for a second or two before swallowing. When he did, he forced a smile. It started thin, then grew into something almost embarrassed.

"Yeah... Yeah, yer right. Sorry."

Nick shrugged a shoulder to dismiss the apology, leaning harder against the wall and letting his eyes close. Not fair to expect him to go back to normal that fast, he reminded himself, taking a calming inhale. Kid's still a raw nerve.

Ellis raised the waterbottle to his lips, looking between Nick and Rochelle. "Once Chris wakes up, we'll just ask him about it." His smile lingered even then, though it was soft in a fashion that indicated some hesitance... like maybe he knew that wasn't a certainty, even if he didn't say it outright.

That made Rochelle sigh, turning her head to gaze at the Spaniard.

"I've got a lot to ask."
They remained downstairs, not settled so much as stagnated. Though upstairs would have been more comfortable, Rochelle seemed wordlessly intent on staying at Chris' side… Ellis felt a need to keep her company… and Nick looked mainly too tired to move from where he'd positioned himself.

Or, at least, that was what he projected.

The cessation of Coach's snoring announced when he awoke. It had been somewhere around an hour since he'd laid down - not that they had a way to know for sure - and Ellis perked at the abrupt silence.

He spared a glance for Nick and Rochelle, the gambler still leaned tiredly against the far wall and Rochelle having slid to the floor and seated herself in a snug slump against the side of the bed. Neither of them noticed as quickly as he did, so he pressed an elbow into the wall behind him and pushed himself to his feet.

Nick arched a questioning brow at his motion, and Ellis thumbed over his shoulder. "Gonna check on Coach. Think he woke up." At that, the older man merely nodded.

"I'll come." Rochelle stood, using her elbows to hook onto the edge of the bed and get herself standing. Her eyes darted toward Nick, a plaintive note touching her voice. "Watch him, please? I'm afraid to leave him alone in case something happens."

Dismissively shrugging a shoulder, Nick leaned his body toward the window in the wall. "Nothing better to do but babysit." He flicked a finger against the slanted blinds so he could look out, though the view was nothing but the top of the privacy fencing and the faces of the buildings across the road. If he leaned in and looked down, he could just see the scraggly, sandy lawn below.

Rochelle glossed over the insincerity in his voice, merely offering an easy, "Thanks." She reached to the box of granola bars Nick had left on a corner of the bed, picking one out and nipping an edge of the package between her teeth. She moved to Ellis' side with it dangling from her lips playfully.

He gave her a smile as she looped her left arm in his, tugging their shoulders into a bump. They stepped out into the hallway - but it was a tired walk, leaning against each other like they might otherwise stumble.

Stepping down the hallway, there was only a few feet between the two bedrooms. Rochelle's eyes slanted to Ellis' face, and their gazes met. Without enough privacy to talk and a granola bar in her mouth, she merely bared her teeth in a loaded and questioning smile. Her eyes flicked over her shoulder to indicate toward Nick.

He returned the smile hesitantly, and nodded. That relieved her, visibly. She squeezed his elbow with the arm looped over it, and they advanced into the other bedroom together.

Coach was, in fact, up. He was still laying down, but he'd dragged himself backwards to prop his shoulders against the squat headboard. Ellis noticed the water and painkillers he'd left were gone from the windowsill. They sat instead on the floor next to one of the bed's legs; he must've stirred at some point and taken some.

"Hey, papa bear," the producer uttered, voice stifled as she kept her teeth gritted on the granola bar. Coach's attention centered on them as they entered the room, his eyes wearily raising. He nodded his head to return the greeting, and Rochelle lifted a hand to grab the granola bar out of her mouth. "Feeling any better?"

He sighed gruffly at the question, tipping his chin toward his chest. Dark eyes slid to examine his own leg, seeming bemused. "Mm. Just bruised up my pride is all."

Extricating her arm from around Ellis', Rochelle advanced to close the distance and stand at the bedside. She reached out a hand to hover over his injured knee where it lay propped up on a bundled towel, indicating it sympathetically. "Hurt more than that."

When he chuckled, she offered out the granola bar to him, tilting her head in affectionate question. Although Coach hesitated at first, he did take it, fisting a hand around the bar so he could rip open an end and peel it down. As he took a massive bite, Rochelle took a step back to sit on the bottom bunk of the bunk-bed on the opposite wall.

It was fairly small, perhaps meant for children rather than grown adults, so her seat on it left her head awkwardly pressed against the bottom of the top bunk. Her eyes widened a bit as if she hadn't expected the cramped space until she was in it, but she recovered quickly, playfully patting the space beside her with a look toward Ellis. "C'mere."

The mechanic laughed at the sight, nose crinkling a little, but went to join her. The hunch required to sit up straight on the edge of the bed made his rib ache, so he instead leaned back to arrange himself against the wall, body crammed down to fit. He gave a contented sigh, removing his hat to place it on his belly.

Rochelle rested her hands together on her lap, sparing Ellis an amused shake of her head. Lifting her chin, she glanced over at Coach, eyes soft.

He'd worked through nearly half the granola bar already, barely chewing between swallows. Though it seemed like hunger at first, the faintly displeased squint to his eyes suggested it was more like choking down something unpleasant.

She noticed, tilting her head. "No good?"

The attention half-startled him, like he hadn't realized his expression had been so transparent. He slowed to chew a few times, working on the dense granola-and-oats mixture before he swallowed thickly.

"Nah, babygirl. It's fine. Just too many days of eatin' this shit back in my ball days." Ellis gave a curious blink in his direction at the statement, and Coach shrugged faintly. "Too much trainin', too many long days, an' not enough money."

He eyed the granola bar, then took a somewhat bitter bite, even as he flashed them a look of tired humor. "Better than goin' hungry. Barely."

At that, Rochelle leaned in. She seemed leery of speaking at first, but fought through it. "Speaking of football. Your knee… Has that kind of thing happened before?" His eyes went a little guarded at the question, examining her expression. "I know it goes bad on you sometimes, but it's never gone that bad. You were barely standing…"

For a moment, it seemed Coach might not answer her. He shifted his weight on the bed, and his shoulders crunched up in something hesitant and defensive. It was slowly that the energy drained back out of him. He was left looking near-exhausted.

"Honest? It ain't, in a while." Grunting faintly, he shifted to paw at the top of his head, fingers scratching at the grey-speckled stubble there. It had started to grow in, slowly, encroaching over his scalp in the same way his jawline had become dense with the beginnings of a beard. "But I knew takin' a dive was risky."

Rochelle and Ellis merely gazed at him, heads tilted in unison, and their loyal attention got a mild chuckle out of him. He humored them, and kept going.

"Bummin' my knee was what took me out of the game, way back when, y'know. Got tackled, and the boy stepped on my leg in the fall." He reached down a hand, delicately grabbing onto the side of his knee, tapping at his kneecap with a thumb. "Did some damage, an' it ain't been the same since. When it's real bad, my kneecap - well, it shifts out." Coach paused, giving a thoughtful noise, then amended, "Subluxates, if y'all wanna get fancy."

Ellis piped up, shifting so he could stretch up a hand and scratch at his ear. His expression drew into sympathy, voice lowering. "Damn. That don't sound good. Reminds me'uh Keith's dog, Dusty.
He was kinda old, 'n'his back leg went bad… they had tile floorin', and man, he'd just skid, 'n' -"

Coach's attention had turned on him, dull and unamused. It took Ellis a moment to realize why, and he quickly gawped.

"Uh, oh, I didn't mean -"

Interrupting him before he could dig himself into a deeper hole, Rochelle leaned forward. "Do we… need to do something for it? Or… put it back?" Her leg made to bounce a little on the ball of her foot, an anxious and twitchy gesture, as if the thought of his injury made her knee uncomfortable. She put her bandaged hand against her thigh, loosely curling fingers.

The eldest shook his head, quickly, his chiding expression fading. He removed his hand from his knee, relaxing back down against the bed. "Nah." he assured her. "It ain't like a dislocation. Shit fixed itself already walkin' in here, just hurts somethin' fierce 'til the swelling simmers down."

She nodded warily, and there was heavy thought lingering within her expression. "Okay. At least we have painkillers." A breath left her, strained. Her words were composed, but something frenetic played at the edge of her voice. "Do you think it'll happen again? Maybe we should get some bindings or something."

There was an odd energy in her that both Ellis and Coach seemed to notice, their eyes meeting across the room. It wasn't fear… or stress… but it was something. Her tone came across almost compulsive, taut, like she couldn't quite slow herself down.

Her eyes wandered, distantly. "Or a wrap, so we can brace it. Maybe if we -"

Crossing his arms over his chest, Coach caught her gaze, and the intensity of his stare caused her words to falter in her throat. She seemed startled, for a moment, but he spoke before she could, firm but not chastising. "Babygirl, I told you not to fuss. It ain't a big deal."

That made her draw herself back, hesitantly, seeming unsure for a moment. "I'm not trying to -"

The crown of her head pressed against the frame of the top bunk-bed, allowing her eyes to fall to her hands. She shrugged, then, tiredly. "I just don't want you to get hurt."

Shifting his leg, Ellis let his knee bump hers. She glanced at him at the gesture, forcing a smile that gentled with effort, and he tipped his head. "You okay, Ro'?"

"Yeah. Sorry." Rochelle exhaled, raising her left hand up to wipe fingertips across her forehead. It was almost a ticlike gesture, that fraught energy still lingering. "I think I'm just… I just want to do everything I can, you know? If there's a way we can help you, I…" Her eyes lifted again, meeting Coach's apologetically, and his expression softened. "I guess I'm being over-protective."

"Nah." Coach quickly inserted, eyes closing sedately. Her lips twitched into a faint smile at his words, chin lowering. "You a'ight. Knee's gonna be weak now, might pop again if I ain't careful. Brace ain't a half-bad idea, assumin' we can find one." His eyes reopened, then, and he spoke seriously.

"Ain't havin' us go out just for that, though."

Rochelle nodded at the compromise, relaxing just softly, even if she hadn't truly shaken off that strange driving force. "Okay. We'll have to hunt for water soon, anyway. Maybe we can circle back by that pharmacy we found and see if there's anything left."

Ellis reached to grasp his hat, fingers flexing against the fabric, offering up cautiously, "If we get the wheel changed on the car - Nick'n'me left some stuff at the grocery store we found, too, since we didn't get it all loaded. I don't remember seein' no braces or nothin', but it was real messy. Could'uh been hidin' somewhere."

Although he nodded, Coach slid his hands to tuck them under his armpits, tightening his arms' cross over his chest. "A'ight." His eyes were growing low-lidded the longer they spoke, and just a little hazy. The painkillers were likely setting in. "How's everyone else?"

Rochelle glanced toward Ellis, then shrugged her shoulders delicately. "Okay, I think. Chris is resting, and Ellis helped me get his meds down." She slipped him a wink over her shoulder, and the brunette tucked his head down in a quick and bashful gesture. "The rest of us just need some sleep."

Coach grunted in weary agreement, and Rochelle slid up to her feet at the sound. She scratched at the back of her neck with her left hand, nails itching at the skin there. "And, on that note - how about you two get some rest in here? I'll take first watch, and trade with Nick. You guys seem exhausted."

Ellis blinked, mouth opening to protest, but Coach overrode him.

"Sounds like a plan."

The younger man pouted out his lower lip as if he'd been betrayed, receiving an idle chuckle from Coach. "You had a long day, son, we all did. Get some rest." He shrugged himself down on the bed, shuffling to lay back down flat with a tired sigh.

Rochelle leaned down a bit to reach and pat Ellis' knee. She smiled reassuringly, catching his gaze. "I'm wired, anyway, honey. Better me than you, if I'm gonna be awake no matter what." He relented at that, but only reluctantly, sliding himself along the wall to flop down on the bunk.

Relieved at his acquiescence, Rochelle stepped away. She approached the linen closet, carefully grabbing two blankets and two pillows one at a time with her uninjured hand and tucking them under her arm. "Could be worse, right? It's actually not a half-bad condo. Kinda small, but it's clean. You could almost forget what's going on out there for a second."

Ellis watched her move, head tipping against the mattress. The moment he was horizontal, his eyes grew heavy, unable to mask his exhaustion any longer. "Maybe we'll go on the beach." he murmured, almost wistfully, and she couldn't help but smile - in the same moment the idea was almost preposterous, it warmed her, somehow.
"Maybe."

Ellis grasped for his hat, reaching out to set it on the windowsill between the two beds. His lips quirked up, idly. "We ain't got much tuh do aside from findin' a way to signal somebody, anyway, right?"

That shook her, though she masked it with a lowered chin as she looked into the linen closet. It was with wary reticence that she said nothing.

Rochelle stepped back to their bedsides, hovering in the space between them. She offered Coach his linens first, and he wearily tucked the pillow under his bed and threw the blanket loosely over his body. He gave her a grateful look, adjusting his leg sorely where it still lay propped up a folded towel, and she turned to face Ellis.

"Maybe we can finally teach Nick how to swim." She leaned down, pushing the pillow across the mattress until it forced Ellis to raise his head so she could slide it under. He seemed surprised, faintly, reaching out to take the blanket from her. She merely grasped it carefully at the edges and laid it over him. "You think we could find some of those armband floaties?"

As she tucked him in, Ellis laughed with a series of snorts, looking tremendously entertained and mortified all in the same instant. The entertainment won out when Coach chuckled, too.

"I'd pay real good money to see that."
Chapter 129

The sun fell before long. With the power out in the area, there were no streetlights on to illuminate the outdoors, and there were no candles in the condo to light. As the day faded into night, the house delved into a soft, velvet darkness.

Rochelle curled herself against the wall, arms drawn into her lap. She'd kept Nick's Magnum - as it was the only one-handed gun they had with them - and had it set beside her on the carpet. She didn't anticipate needing it, but having it nearby was a relief.

Although it had been quiet, a part of her felt… tense. Like her hackles were up and she couldn't get them to lower.

With a tall, fenced perimeter, the condo was likely the safest of any of their previous homes - second only, perhaps, to the hotel… but going back to that place was hardly desireable. It would be going backwards, and was filled with the too-raw memory of what might have happened to Ellis.

She frowned, a little, glancing down at her bandaged hand and the blood that had dampened the fabric in a strip. The flesh of her split palm was too flexible and she'd been using it too much for the wound to really clot up. It hurt, on and off, but she had an almost spiteful surge of will to feel nothing.

It was the least of their suffering, wasn't it?

Tipping her head back to rest it on the wall, Rochelle closed her eyes. She couldn't shake the image of Ellis' smile, talking about frolicking on the beach, playing in the waves - waiting for rescue. Nobody had told him yet, not that she really knew what they might tell him.

All they knew was something had happened. The military had killed people. How many, who knew. Why, who knew. Rochelle wanted to believe it was just some panic-fueled mistake, maybe some frightened soldiers dealing with an outbreak they didn't understand. A misunderstanding. A horrible misunderstanding.

Whatever the truth was, it had been enough to strike fear into Brenda where nothing else did. Nothing except, Rochelle supposed, being alone. Losing Chris, her last compatriot, whether because he'd abandoned her or died.

That had driven her to -

What? Suicide? That didn't seem right, but neither did the way Brenda had approached her in that last moment, eyes cold and resigned. Like she'd accepted the chance Rochelle might actually pull the trigger - weighed her options and chose to advance anyway. Calmly.

The thought crossed her mind, then: would Chris blame her? They must've had some bond, she was sure, for him to follow her out of the gunstore after all that had happened. How upset would he be to learn of her death - and that Rochelle had killed her?

Maybe he'd hate her.

Maybe -

Rochelle dragged her left hand to pinch along the bridge of her nose, soothingly, exhaling out a breath before she could upset herself. Her fingers were trembling and that, more than anything, irritated her. She stood suddenly, pushing off the wall. Her hand reached down and pried the flash- light from where she'd clipped it to her hip, pressing the switch to illuminate her way.

They didn't have the information they needed. There were things they didn't know, and without knowledge, how could they make any kind of decision? If the military was dangerous... they needed to know. If finding a way to signal them wasn't the right choice, what was?

Crossing the bedroom, fingertips brushing against her thighs, Rochelle bent down to kneel beside the backpack where it lay on the floor. She reached to unzip the smaller, thinner pocket closer to the front. Her hand slipped inside, and she extricated the contents.

A spiral-ring notebook, bound by dark plastic: the journal she and Nick had found in an attic, alongside a man's corpse and a zombie. Rochelle gazed at it hesitantly, balancing it on her left hand. She hadn't looked at it since she'd secreted it away there in the unused satchel pocket.

It had been impulsive, maybe, but she couldn't resist it. He'd left it intentionally, hadn't he? A note for someone to find, a record of events. It wasn't truly invading someone's privacy to read something they wanted read. It wasn't like it was a diary.

Slipping down to sit on the edge of the bed, Rochelle spared a glance toward Christophe where he lay. Reassured that he was unmoving, she gently placed the notebook on her lap. Bracing the flashlight on her shoulder and turning her head to hold it there with her cheek like one might a phone, Rochelle bent her body so the beam of light drooped down and lit the notebook's surface.

The flashlight was fading; the batteries wouldn't last forever. Fighting a sense of nervousness, Rochelle flicked the notebook open, fingertips grasping the paper as her eyes alighted on the text written there.

She had to skim, at first. The bulk of it was nonsense, scattered notes and numbers and lists. Groceries and tasks and chores. Scrawled phrases that might have made sense to the person who wrote them, but now sat smudged and unclear. The contents of a notebook tossed in some forgotten drawer, used only rarely.

Pencilmarks mixed with penmarks of varying colours, varied between hard lines and idle scrawls. A few different handwritings, if Rochelle wasn't mistaken. She frowned, but sped her fingers to flick forward.

Then, blank pages.

Her heartrate increased slightly, thumbing through the emptiness until she found the entries again. They started suddenly and with no warning, as though he'd grabbed the notebook, thrown it blindly open, and started writing.

It was calm, at first, like a diary.

'We missed the evac. I tried to get us out, but there were so many of them outside. Caitlyn was so terrified and all I have is this revolver. We just hid up here in the attic. We've got supplies but I don't know how long it'll last. I don't know how long we have to wait. I want to tell her it'll be okay, but how can I say that when I don't know?

I'm so sorry Maria. God I hope you're okay.'

Rochelle frowned. She didn't want this - didn't want to read these details, these feelings. Didn't want to pry into someone's last days. She tried to skim, but she was afraid to miss something important, and every time she skipped a line she'd feel a rising tension until she returned and read
I think Caitlyn is starting to realize this is real. She's gotten quiet and I wish I knew how to make her feel better. She's been crying, and I don't think the radio is helping, but what if they come back? They might come back. I have to keep listening.'

'I'm afraid to get her hopes up but I keep looking out the window and waiting for the military. They'll come back and fix this. This can't be the end. We can't be alone.'

There was one that startled her into a blink, eyes slowing on the words.

'I just wanted to be a good father. I just wanted to reconnect with her. The separation was so hard on her. I didn't want this to happen. I wish I'd never invited her. She was always better off without me.'

She wished she felt something more like satisfaction that Nick had, in fact, been wrong about the inhabitants of the attic. Instead, she mostly just felt a kind of wistfulness.

As the entries progressed, they faltered, handwriting turning scratchy as if from a trembling hand. Sometimes it was a paragraph, sometimes an idle sentence, penned in a flurry. The pressure applied and the angle of the text betrayed the way they were built over time, like he'd snuck in text when he could.

Shifting her head against the flashlight as it began to dig into her cheek, Rochelle turned the page. She anticipated more of the same, but that wasn't what she got.

'Something got on the roof. I went to kill it, climbed up through the window. We're running low on bullets, and I saw the boat again.'

Rochelle drew her brows into a wrench, unsure, fingertip grazing under that sentence. That word. Unfortunately, the intensity of her stare didn't change the text before her. It remained vague and unassuming, and all she could do was look for more.

'I want to go to the shore and try to flag them down, but I can't leave her. What if that's our only hope? What if we die because I wasn't'

It cut off, leaving Rochelle to exhale a frustrated noise. She flicked to the next page, urgently scanning for more - but that was it. There was no more mention of a boat, no elaboration on the subject. The journal quickly fell apart as, it seemed, the man's daughter began to fall ill.

'She's getting a fever. It's the stress, I know it is.'

'The radio keeps repeating that fucking message over and over. Talking about symptoms. She's scared. I'm scared. I can't do this.'

'She's fine. She has to be fine. They haven't touched her. Why would I be fine if she isn't'

'Maria, you've got to know - I'm so sorry. I didn't mean for this to happen.'

She stopped. It went downhill from there, and she'd already read - and seen - where it ended. A frown lingered on her lips, fingertips brushing over the pages as she flipped back to that entry. A boat, that had passed by multiple times. Was it another survivor, or could it have been a military ship?
Maybe that was reading too much into it. For all she knew, it was just someone on a motorboat. Maybe they'd already left and wouldn't return. The journal hadn't provided much to go on.

Drawing her lower lip into a bite, she flickered her hand up to dog-ear the page before she flipped the notebook closed. It was wearily that she took the flashlight off her shoulder and turned it off, leaning back a little on the edge of the bed and letting her legs stretch forward, toes digging into the carpet and knees cracking pleasantly.

"I was kind of hoping for something a little more helpful." she admitted aloud, slanting her gaze toward Chris' face where it lay half-buried against the pillow. Not expecting a response, naturally, she turned herself until she could lean her hip against the footboard, eyes closing. "Like, 'hey - the military definitely isn't killing everyone! Yay…'"

A sigh escaped her in the silence that followed.

Her hand still rested on the notebook, now thoughtfully plucking nails against the edge. Was it even worth bringing up to the team? They did have a balcony, and though the view wasn't perfect, it was certainly enough to see a passing boat if it was large enough. If she mentioned it, they could all keep an eye out, at least.

Even if she wanted to temper her expectations, it was easy to get her hopes up - but who was to say it even meant anything?

Plus, part of her wanted to make sure someone was with Chris consistently, and keeping watch on the balcony was too far for her comfort. If something happened, or he woke up, and no one was there… she'd never forgive herself.

Sighing forcibly, Rochelle reached up her good hand, rubbing against her eyes. The only thing she could think that was worse than Christophe not making it at all, was him waking up alone to discover his missing arm. She couldn't begin to imagine how hard it would be on him, and couldn't begin to think of how they'd help.

But, again - she had to temper expectations. Him surviving was the first step.

Standing in the dark, leaving the notebook and flashlight behind, Rochelle followed the edges of the bed with her knee. Stepping cautiously back to the window, she reached up, turning the slats of the shutters to look outside. She couldn't see much, just the top of the privacy fence in the lawn below and the dull rows of buildings that surrounded them, shrouded in darkness.

"This sucks."

Fear sent Ellis jolting awake. It was like choking, at first, and the physical sensation lurched him up off the bed. His hands shot out to seek purchase on something - anything. His body didn't recognize his surroundings, and his spine straightened, launching his forehead directly into the framing of the too-low upper bunk.

The collision startled him more than hurt, but he reflexively hissed, reaching a hand up to palm over where he'd struck the wood. He blinked in the darkness, breath shallow behind his lips, fingertips trembling against his skin.

A disgruntled noise sounded above him, and he was forced to hold his breath, even as the feeling surged fresh panic in his chest. His eyes went up, blindly, staring at the bottom of the bunk. Rochelle's voice gave a faint sigh, and the top bunk bowed faintly as she rolled her body into a disturbed flop. Ellis waited for her to wake, but she didn't.

The bed stilled, and he let out a shaky exhale of relief, the sound masked under the gruff and rhythmic sound of Coach's snoring. He hadn't even been aware of when she'd come in and climbed into the top bunk.

The nightmare trickled away like sand with every passing second, leaving little but vague images and a deep and unsettled sweat on his skin. There'd been - something. Someone. A face collapsed amongst blood and bone, surging toward him, foaming and slathering. Digits circled his neck and tightened until he could barely breathe.

The body rode him to the ground, and crushed him flat, and he could still remember the feeling of his spine giving way under the pressure. He could still hear it. His skin crawled, and his vision blurred with the after-image of that face.

He thought it was Jerry - but it wasn't.

It was Nick.

Ellis crawled his body out from under the blankets, kicking their cloying weight off, and slid himself back down against the mattress. He tangled fingers in his shirt, palm over his heart, feeling it pounding through his ribcage. It wasn't the first bad dream he'd had since the outbreak, but they had never clung to him so strongly.

They'd never been so specific, so vivid, nor involved anything but faceless zombies in overwhelming numbers. He had to touch his neck to assure himself it wasn't ringed with bruises. As he felt along his jugular, the pads of his fingers found his thudding heartbeat there, too.

The more he heard it pumping, the faster it seemed to go. He tried to take a deep breath, but couldn't manage it before his jaw trembled and an exhale forced its way out of him. He needed, more than anything, to get out from the claustrophobic space of his bunk that felt like it might collapse in on him at any moment.

It was carefully that he rolled off the bed, trying not to jostle it or make noise. His legs almost threatened to give way when he finally got them under himself. He had to grab onto the wall, fingers catching against the edge of the window, to balance his weight. Ellis gritted his jaw, closing his eyes for just a moment - trying to calm himself.

It was just a dream. He didn't want the panic to win out. The feeling frightened him; his instability frightened him. He didn't know how to soothe his heartbeat, didn't know how he'd begin to fall back asleep.

So, he did the only thing he could think of.

Slowly, cautiously, Ellis stepped away from the wall. He moved with delicacy, timing his steps to Coach's snoring breath. The house was dark and the shuttered window provided little help, but his eyes had adjusted enough to note outlines. He was able to align himself toward the door, and he let a hand protrude out, flat-palmed, so he'd feel it before he reached it.

As his fingertips grazed the closed door, he searched out the doorknob and twisted it with a trembling gentleness, sliding himself through the opening easily.

The hallway was only just slightly more lit. He glanced around as he drew the door closed behind himself, hesitantly examining the staircase. If Rochelle and Coach were asleep, Nick must have been on watch, either upstairs or downstairs with Chris.

Ellis hesitated there, uncertainty winding itself into a coil until he struggled to swallow. He needed to find him. If he could just talk to him... see his face... the fear would fade. The images, more importantly, would fade.

A beam of dim and honeyed yellow light suddenly flashed into the hallway from Chris' bedroom. Ellis startled despite himself, turning to squint into the flashlight's glare. As he did, Nick lowered the flashlight to point to the floor instead, and the light scattered and bounced off the walls.

It illuminated up over the both of them, lifting craggy shadows over the bemused shape of Nick's expression. His face was intact and unbloodied, but for faint cuts and scrapes and the fresh bruise blossoming over his jawline. "Kid?" he uttered in something like a whisper, voice low and eyes cutting toward the bedroom door before returning to Ellis' face.

Ellis' mouth opened, but the fear must have been lingering on his face, because he couldn't get anything out before Nick advanced. The gambler's brow arched, head cocking in the midst of his stride, and his eyes made a slow patrol over Ellis' features.

He couldn't speak under the examination. It pinned him there and cracked him open, and he felt insecure and fragile.

Without speaking, Nick straightened his head. He twisted his wrist to clip the flashlight onto the waist of his slacks, and Ellis only then noticed he was wielding the katana loosely beside his leg. It was lazily that Nick braced his hand on the hilt, then stepped forward and around him.

Nick's chin jerked in a faint motion to urge him to come with.

Hesitantly turning to track his movements, Ellis watched him start to scale the staircase. He felt his lips tug into a faint and thoughtful frown, unsure, but followed. He knew talking downstairs where they could potentially awaken their teammates wasn't an option, but the silence made him nervous, anyway.

Equal parts of him wanted to tell Nick about the nightmare, and didn't. His heart was still going hard in his chest, but what would he say? He'd lost most of the details already as his waking brain worked to reject the images, and the little he did remember didn't make much sense.

It was just a dream. It didn't mean anything; it was just stress mashing images together behind his eyelids. There was no reason to let it bother him any longer than it had to. It wasn't like he was afraid of Nick, and he'd already forgiven him - bringing it up again wouldn't do any good.
As Ellis reached the top of the stairs, he inhaled, steadying his voice. He'd just be honest, or mostly honest. "'M sorry… I can't sleep none. I can take watch, if yuh wanna get some rest… or -"

That was all he managed.

The moment they'd reached the second floor and taken a few steps in from the stairs, the older man turned. Ellis jumped faintly as Nick's thumb caught on his hip, and he was suddenly being walked back until he flattened against the wall. The startled sound that left him was quickly muffled by lips pressing into his.

Nick slid his knee between the younger man's thighs, the pressure easing them to slide apart, at the same time his tongue grazed at the plush of Ellis' lower lips. The simultaneous attentions had the Georgian slumping into the wall, goosebumps flustering up his arms, and he couldn't help but close his eyes and submit.

As their mouths linked, Nick's tongue slid against his and a heated breath passed between them. The conman's thigh pressed up into him, grinding faintly there, and the contact flooded warmth up his spine.

Nick's leg pushed harder until Ellis was almost straddled against it, weight carried in a cradle between the wall and the older man's thigh. He squirmed before he could stop himself, breath hiccupping in his chest when all that did was cause friction.

His heart jumped into his throat, but where it had been a panicked and painful feeling before, now it was softened by familiar affection. He leaned into the kiss, muffling a sigh when his advance was met with Nick nipping teeth on his upper lip. Nick's hand lingered on his hip, still - then sunk lower, gripping just at the base of his thigh through his thick coveralls.

Ellis lifted his hands, letting his fingertips skate along Nick's waistline until they could stretch up and grasp at his back. His fingertips pressed into his shoulderblades and his arms embraced his midsection. The touches made the gambler purr a pleasant hum against his lips, and Ellis was shortly rewarded with a languid grind of the thigh slotted between his legs.

A huff left him, forcibly, at the sensation. The harder Nick leaned into him, the further he rose almost onto his toes, and a heat built in the space where they touched. He should have felt trapped, but all he felt was warmth - a bracing, clenching warmth, heightened with a sort of exhausted relief as his body responded.

He just… wanted. Wanted Nick, more than anything. He wanted away from the panic and the uncertainty that had been brewing in his chest. He wanted something to make sense again.

Ellis broke the kiss with some hesitance, tilting his chin, and Nick relented. He could, however, only go so far; the gambler lingered close, mouth grazing at the edge of his with sharp stubble prickling at the perimeter of the touch. The closeness left him caught in a whisper.

"Nick -" Hearing his name brought a faint smirk to his lips, and Ellis felt its curve, but outright tension bristled in Nick's body when he continued. "- I don't wanna think no more. Please."

He drew back, at that. Although the flashlight on his hip was pointed downward, the light bounced off the wall and up over them in a muggy haze, illuminating enough for Nick to scan his expression. Some surprise lingered on Nick's face, notable in the odd flatness that suddenly overtook his features.

Then he took a step back, releasing Ellis to slip back completely flat on his feet. "Me either."
The distance might have given Ellis time to grow embarrassed, but it didn't last long. Nick relinquished his grip on the katana, setting its tip against the carpet and leaning it against the wall, and then both his hands were suddenly sliding onto Ellis' waist. Gripping there, Nick pulled him forward and across the carpet.

They moved in graceless unison, walking until Nick backed into the sofa and could make his way around it, guiding himself mostly blindly. He recaptured the younger man in a kiss as they went, biting and dragging teeth against Ellis' lower lip. The kiss stayed shallow enough to tease him and keep him breathless, leading him around to the front of the couch.

Nick's voice lowered to a growl, one hand crawling fingertips to brace on Ellis' lower back. "Lay down." he commanded - but when Ellis started to shift his body back so he could lay on the sofa, he was halted almost immediately. "Not like that..."

After he startled, confused, Nick pulled him by the waist to turn around so he faced the couch instead. "On your stomach." Nick's breath grazed against his ear, spine going stock-straight at the sensation and the almost predatory way the taller man leaned into him.

Ellis could hear the edge of amusement in his voice, and it made him redden. The lurid nature of the request did not escape him.

He managed a faint "Oh.", gut twisting into knots in either mortification or thrill - he couldn't entirely tell. Nick was uncharacteristically patient as Ellis worked through his hesitance, though something in the low-lidded attention his eyes kept on the younger survivor's every move said it was more like savouring.

Getting one knee up on the cushions, Ellis eased himself onto hands and knees on the couch, then flattened down on his belly. His cheeks burned with the awareness of being watched as he did. The sofa was just long enough for his full height, though his socked feet were balanced up on the arm, toes curled.

Uttering a pleased hum, Nick leaned to set the flashlight on the coffee table, angling it so it pointed toward the end of the couch. "Good." The gambler braced his right leg with a knee on the edge of the couch, resting most of his weight there to give his burned left leg a break. He leaned down, hooking fingers in Ellis' coveralls and working them down off his hips.

The older man's knuckles grazed against him as they pulled, and it put a tremble up his spine. Unable to help squirming, Ellis hitched his lower body up a little off the cushions to ease Nick's efforts.

His eager movement drew a growl out of the gambler. He wasn't completely sure why until one of Nick's hands suddenly moved, cupping over the half-bared slope of his rump through his boxers, where his hips were now lifted up. The contact made him jolt, and if he hadn't been red before - he was now.

A faint whine escaped his lips, almost protesting, as the older man's fingers squeezed on the flesh against his palm. His body moved before he could stop it, pushing harder up against the touch, and Nick gave the softest of snorts. It was almost mocking, and Ellis might've really protested had the gambler not used the hand still gripped on his coveralls to yank them down further.

"Easy, Fireball." Nick murmured with a husky tone that dragged his voice into something hoarse. His other hand somewhat reluctantly lifted from the younger man's rear, grazing instead to place it flat on Ellis' lower back. He pushed, forcing him back down against the cushions. "Not trying to fuck that rib up. Just stay still."
Ellis relented with a small wriggle of his shoulders, relaxing down into the sofa, huffing out a tense sigh. The sound made Nick laugh, breathless, and he slid his hand back to regain a grip on Ellis' coveralls. He worked them down to the kid's knees, and after he got them settled, he let his fingertips skate up Ellis' now-bare thighs.

"I think I'm a bad influence on you."

Goosebumps followed their path, along with a tingling arousal. The Georgian flexed his toes, lips parting as Nick's fingers slid against the edges of his boxers - and a little underneath. His thighs trembled, and he pushed his hands up so he could fist them against the armrest pressed into his forehead. "Quit makin' fun'uh me..." escaped him in a groan.

Nick chuckled, lowly. "Just being honest. You're the one who hunted me down in the middle of the night." Catching fingertips on Ellis' boxers, he tugged them down to join his coveralls, and he couldn't resist slipping a palm onto the Georgian's revealed rump.

Ellis had to bury his face against the couch cushion to muffle the noise that left him, only half embarrassed.

The other half was wanting.

"I wasn't - yer the one who got ideas! I was just gonna trade watch, 'n' -" He broke off when Nick shifted, and he tensed faintly as the older man slid more of his weight on the knee braced against the couch. It bowed under him as he swung his other leg over, gently straddling Ellis' legs, and settled to sit just above his knees.

His weight was flustering, especially with the way it trapped Ellis against the couch. He tried to squirm his weight a little, biting at his tongue when all the motion did was rub his thighs against Nick's and his lower body against the plush couch. Both sensations made him shudder.

Nick leaned to the side, resting his left shoulder against the back of the couch. His smirk was audible in his voice. "Oh, yeah? So you wouldn't mind if I just went to bed?"

Ellis huffed a breath vaguely, closing his eyes - but Nick didn't move, the lingering silence making it clear he intended to get an answer. The Georgian could only imagine the smug look being directed down toward him, and it made his ears burn.

"... No."

The smirk worsened, and though he began to move again, he didn't relent. "No? 'No' I shouldn't go to bed, or 'no' you wouldn't mind if I did?" His left arm folded, hand slipping to settle on Ellis' waist and play at the fabric of his shirt.

Hyper-aware of how Nick's body shifted against his legs as the gambler slid a hand into his slacks pocket, Ellis couldn't help but twist his head, peering over his shoulder. "Nick..." escaped him in a disgruntled whine as his eyes caught on the gambler's movements.

That made him laugh, and Nick drew the tube of KY from his trousers' pocket, rolling it between his fingers. "Come on, kid. Bit late to play hard to get." He popped it open with his thumb - but merely held it, grunting faintly as he allowed his shoulder to slide down the couch.

His elbow wedged between the cushions on the seat and the back, balancing himself there, now leaned dangerously low over Ellis' body. He dipped his head, nudging close enough to brush his mouth against Ellis' ear. "I have a few promises to make good on."
It took Ellis a moment to remember, but he did. The last time they'd been intimate - and the things Nick had said to him, huddled there on a kitchen counter. Filthy, shocking words, growled into the space between them, hazy with arousal. Remembering them under more coherent circumstances surged embarrassment through him.

He exhaled a flustered breath when Nick nipped at the whorl of his ear, catching skin between teeth and then flicking the tip of his tongue there. "W- …we gotta keep quiet. Coach'n'Ro'…” he uttered, almost plaintively.

The mouth against his ear suddenly grinned.

"Sounds like a challenge."

Nick tilted his body to make more room, leaning against the back of the couch. Ellis pressed his forehead against the arm of the couch, burying his face, as a dribble of lukewarm liquid suddenly pattered against the flesh of his rear. He huffed, biting his tongue as Nick set the lube bottle back down on the couch, and then slid a digit against his entrance.

The contact was tremendously slick, turning his breath into a stutter as the gambler massaged against the muscles there. Ellis couldn't help but gasp, shoulders rising as a fingertip slipped into him easily, gliding on lubricants.

"Sh-shit." escaped him, mumbled, voice hitching as Nick leisurely circled pressure against the tension around his digit and hungrily smoothed his other hand over Ellis' waist. Nerves tingled with the lack of friction, even slicker than Vaseline had been. Only the pleasant pressure of penetration remained, and his body reacted to it with a spine-tingling kind of relaxation.

"Good?" Lips brushed his ear again, and rather than respond, Ellis twisted his chin to clumsily bump into Nick until their mouths linked. The angle was awkward, but the kiss no less intense for it. Nick wasted little time, pushing hard to part Ellis' lips and deepen the kiss. His hand moved at the same time, thrusting his digit in time with his tongue.

Between the two motions, Ellis felt a shudder of arousal make its way up his body. His thighs tried to slide apart, mostly trapped under Nick's weight, and the gambler nipped at his tongue in an appreciative gesture.

Every push drove that humming arousal higher, causing his hips to take a needy cant against Nick's hand. He whimpered under his breath, unable to quite vocalize the sound with his lips caught in the midst of a heavy kiss. Nick didn't miss the motion, though, breaking the kiss with a faint growl of interest.

Ellis was left to huff, swallowing wetly, a strained whine at the edges of his breathing. Nick drew his finger almost entirely free - then thrust to his last knuckle. A smirk tilted at his lips as the motion fluttered the younger man's eyes closed and drew a sugar-sweet whimper out of him.

"Fuck. Like that." Nick uttered with a rough tone, voice so low it was almost a murmur. "Christ, you drive me nuts, kid." He shifted enough to press his face into the space between Ellis' neck and shoulder, brushing stubble and nipping teeth in a grazing swathe over the flesh there.

Forcing out an embarrassed breath, Ellis tilted his head to shy away, burying his face back against the armrest until his voice muffled. "I-I ain't tryin' to…” That made Nick draw back, though by only barely an inch. A smirk drifted across his lips, even as he slipped a bent second digit against Ellis' entrance, slicking it with a stroking gesture.
A snort left him that was almost musing, almost wistful.

Ellis didn't have any time to question it before the other man was suddenly thrusting into him with both fingers, spreading him open and drawing a hitched moan out of the Georgian. His digits spread against the muscles there, taking advantage of the slickness. It was all Ellis could do not to rock back on him.

For all the teasing and spreading, he seemed to be making conscious effort not to crook a finger and hunt out that sweet spot. It didn't escape Ellis' notice, and he squirmed his hips in a faintly frustrated gesture, gasping against the cloth of the sofa. The only relief he achieved was shifting his hardening erection against the cushions, but the action flustered him more than anything.

"Nick -" he gasped out, shivering subtly at a particularly wide scissor of the fingers inside him. Pleasure hummed at the base of his spine with every slick motion of them, but with it came this rising desperation. It was thicker than lust - softer than frustration. It clenched at his chest and clawed at his skin and he needed more. "Quit teasin' -"

It came out in his voice, hoarse and melted in the center, and Nick's digits paused a moment. It was as if Ellis had startled him, and when the older man spoke, it was with a low, eager tone of voice.

"Yeah... Yeah."

Drawing his fingers free, slowly, Nick pushed against the back of the couch to slide back upright, kneeling on Ellis' legs. He hesitated just a beat, releasing a hissed breath and uttering, "Shit. Condoms?" There was a reluctance there - like the idea of getting up to go retrieve them grated on him.

Ellis stretched a hand down to gesture toward the coveralls bunched at his knees, shyly pointing without speaking. He felt Nick shifting, and then a hand wormed its way into the tangled fabric and started digging for his pocket. Ellis took a breath and tried to ignore the uncomfortable emptiness now aching at him.

Nick growled in impatience as he tore out the folded-up coil of condoms and ripped one off. He tossed the coil onto the coffee table, focusing on tearing open the packet and retrieving its contents. "You've got no clue how much I've been looking forward to this."

Embarrassed warmth snuck onto Ellis' face again, distinct from the heated arousal lingering there. He tilted his chin so he could get a gasp of fresh air, rather than the huffing he'd taken up against the armrest of the sofa. His eyes averted - but he still caught a glimpse of Nick unzipping his slacks and dragging them down just enough to free himself.

Ellis closed his eyes, cheek pressed into the armrest and lips parted to gasp in air. He could hear the faint and slick sounds of Nick sliding the condom over his erection, and the snap of the lube cap as he applied more of it. It was almost leisurely that Nick slid forward, leaning to brace a hand on the armrest just an inch above Ellis' head.

Straddling his thighs, now, Nick's hips rocked - and with a hand to hold it steady, slid his cock between the cheeks of Ellis' rump and against his entrance. "Fuck." he uttered hoarsely, fingers tightening against the armrest at the slick glide. The younger man pushed against his knees, nudging his hips up against the warm shaft pressed tight to him, gasping in a thick breath.

The movement snapped whatever was left of Nick's self-control.

Even as he hissed, "Stay still.", Nick canted his hips to align himself, grasping a hand at the base of his erection to guide it. It was with firm, slow pressure that he pushed in, exhaling a shuddered sigh as he breached into that spine-numbingly tight warmth. The motion was slick and easy, but he maintained that calm pace, torturously slow as he worked himself in.

Ellis tried to hold still - but he couldn't stop his body from squirming, toes curling fiercely and breath heightening to a whine with every added bit of length sliding into him. Pleasure followed the warm stretch, like the pleasant burn after exercise. Breathlessly, he buried his mouth against the armrest rather than surrender to the noises threatening to leave his lips.

His fingers clawed into the couch cushions, body trembling despite himself alongside the slick penetration. He heard the gambler's breath shallow out the deeper he went, a graveled kind of growl touching it when Ellis' body eagerly clenched around him.

Nick didn't stop until he'd sunk all his length, pressed flush against his partner. The intense fullness emanated hot pleasure through his body, nerves singing around the intrusion. Ellis could feel the parted V of Nick's undone slacks pressing into his flesh as he ground against his rump, hips circling just faintly as if loathe to stop moving.

His other hand now free, Nick took a moment to wipe his palm clean of lube on Ellis lower back - a gesture he might have protested had he not been preoccupied - and then braced it next to his other hand on the armrest. The posture slumped him comfortably, resting his weight against the couch rather than Ellis, and he gripped his fingers in a knead on the cloth.

"Goddamn, El." he murmured down to the younger man, voice thrumming with a throaty lust. Nick drew back just an inch - then pushed back in, slow and languid, back buckling faintly in time with Ellis' hitched, muffled moan.

He shuddered as he regained the depth, questioning in a growl, "Okay?"

Even as he tried to spread his thighs a little, body eager for movement, Ellis pried his mouth away from the couch long enough to talk, though he quickly regretted doing so. "Yeah… yeah." His voice was caught in this longing and thready moan, trembling. "S'good…"

Nick held there for just a moment - then rolled his hips back far enough that he could snap them forward. The collision was a rut, driving in deep, and Ellis choked out a moan that broke a little at the pulsing pleasure it drew out of him. He buried his face against the armrest when Nick's hips retreated again, further this time, skin gliding.

The next thrust was angled a little, and Ellis writhed with it, gasping breaths past the cloth pressed into his lips. As Nick's pace increased, gaining a steady rhythm, the rustling impact of his hips only jostled him slightly as if Nick were consciously holding back on the apex of each thrust.

His restraint didn't temper his lust, though - if anything, it heightened it, a straining eagerness tightening his voice to something urgent. A huff or a growl escaped him with each movement, and Ellis could feel the older man's knees tighten against him where Nick straddled his hips. The weight and the contact, the silken slide of penetration, driving into him quicker and firmer -

Ellis shoved a hand down, squirming fingers between his belly and the sofa cushion. He cradled a palm under his erection, fingers curling. He only meant to shield it from rubbing against the cushions, but reflex made him give a clutching squeeze on his hardened flesh, unable to resist the slight relief.

Nick noticed.
In a swift motion, he folded his elbows and draped his body down, mouth finding Ellis' ear. The shift in posture turned his thrusts shallower, but the pace maintained, and he ground his hips in eager motions as his teeth nipped along the younger man's ear. "Fuck..." he hissed, only to thrust again - harder. "Shit, yeah, kid."

Ellis turned his chin, begging for a kiss, but Nick retracted before he could. Only a bit of dull light illuminated the breathless smirk that cut across his face... right before he drove into a fierce set of thrusts, hips rocking with animalistic urgency. Even with the little leverage he had, he used the grip he had on the armrest to push and pull his body, fucking the younger man in earnest.

Caught unmuffled, the desperate sound that left Ellis was half-moan, half-yelp, and thick with drawled pleasure even as he tried to bite it back. The sound dragged a gratified chuckle from Nick, before he jolted forward to muffle it with a shallow kiss, however reluctantly. He grazed his mouth over Ellis', hungrily, only pulling back once the other man's noise had faded back to huffing.

"Christ. I wish." the older man muttered, though it was faintly amused alongside his lust. Nick shifted his weight on one arm, letting the other dart down to grab ahold of Ellis' hip. He dug fingertips against his skin to brace him, thrusts going ragged but no less harsh.

As Ellis buried his face against the armrest, moaning against the fabric and squeezing at his erection with fractured need, the gambler smoothed his motions into a constant rock. The pleasure built, tightened, and Ellis clutched with the hand that had Nick's wrist, digging nails into his skin. Nick's fingers slid between Ellis' hip and his bent thigh, and the Georgian gasped faintly, hips canting up to make room for him when Nick's hand dove underneath his body. "Come on, Ellis." Suddenly Nick's fingers were against his, wrapped around his erection. Every time Nick's hips collided with his, it increased the friction between their digits.

As if the growled command egged it on, orgasm came like a wave. It struck, a bliss-edged clench stealing through his whole body, with such fierce heat that Ellis writhed as if to escape it. The feelings pulsed and fluttered through him, jagged, and the gambler's hand fisted loosely over the head of his cock to capture his release before it could spill onto the couch.

He shuddered, open-mouthed gasps muffled into the armrest, as Nick's thrusts only drove the pleasure higher. A limpness entered his muscles as he found his climax, eyes closing as he surrendered to it, over-worked nerves sparking pleasantly when Nick continued to work in and out of him.

It was almost distantly that he felt Nick leaning up, straightening, his movements growing stuttered as he found his own release. He exhaled a lengthy and honeyed sigh with it, hips jerking to bury himself deep. A heavy shudder filtered to a casual slump, head rolling back on his shoulders.

His sullied hand remained where it was, looped underneath Ellis' body, but his other hand relinquished its grip on the armrest to slide against the back of the younger man's head, curling in his hair. Rubbing at his scalp in an idle scratch, Nick lethargically shifted on his knees. "Goddamn." escaped him with purred satisfaction.

Ellis couldn't resist a laugh, though it came out in sleepy embarrassment. The touches to his head made his body turn even more liquid than it had been, turning his cheek to press it against the armrest. He took a leveling breath, eyes low-lidded, fidgeting his hips where Nick still had him pinned, seated warmly inside him.

"Felt real nice..."
Leisurely, Nick released Ellis' hair, hand slipping to grab the back of the couch instead. He pulled his hips back with a faintly groaned exhale, slipping free of Ellis' body. "The joy of lube, kid. That find was gold." Ellis couldn't resist a shiver at the feeling of his withdrawal, sneaking a glance over his shoulder to watch Nick.

The older man slowly drew to stand, not bothering to stow himself away as he climbed off Ellis and got to his feet next to the couch. "I fucking needed that." he uttered, tone contented as he rolled his shoulders and stretched out his spine.

It was tentatively that Ellis pushed his cheek harder against the armrest, chin lowering, and agreed. "Y-yeah… me too." As the words escaped him, Ellis knew with self-conscious certainty: it wasn't the sex he meant. He needed Nick. The sex and the physical release was grounding, but more than that, he needed the intimacy and the comfort that came with it.

Some tiny piece of him wondered which Nick meant, but he couldn't summon the courage to ask.

Nick's fingertips brushed against his curls again as he moved to step away, stride loose with tired pleasure. "Don't move. I'll get something to clean up. Can't leave a mess if we're gonna stay here." Ellis hummed his assent, closing his eyes. He smiled a little, despite himself, focusing on the lingering warmth tracing his body.

The panic and fear that had catapulted him from his bed was a faded memory - still within his reach, but disconnected from him, now. He felt better, even beyond the afterglow humming through him.

The gambler wasn't long, returning to his side with a paper towel roll gripped in his hand. He tore off a sheet, offering it down to Ellis. Once he'd taken it with a grateful smile, Nick ripped one free for himself, tossing the roll to the coffee table.

Ellis tiredly fisted it in his hand, peeking self-consciously over toward Nick before he acted. The older man was busying himself with removing his condom, so Ellis took the time to clean the slick lube from his rump, face going a little red with the indecency.

Considering what they'd been doing mere moments ago, his embarrassment was a little silly - but he felt it all the same.

"Not that I'm complaining -" Nick took the time to daub off his softened length, tugging his boxers back into place and bunching the condom up in the papertowel after he'd done so. He wiped his hand off, turning away rather than look toward Ellis. His voice was conversational, if still caught in something of a thickly pleased hum. "- but what was this about, anyway?"

The question surprised Ellis a little, looking up toward his back and quietly examining the older man. He hadn't expected Nick to ask, though the fact he did brought a smile to his lips. "It weren't nothin'… just a bad dream. I didn't wanna wake Coach'n'Ro', so…"

Wadding the papertowel up and tossing it to the coffee table after cleaning off his hands, Ellis started to reach down toward his coveralls and boxers. He strained to drag them up his legs, huffing a little at the awkward angle and the exhausted, jelly-like weakness of his arms.

Nick grunted at that, tossing his papertowel on the coffee table. He turned, witnessing Ellis' struggle, and uttered a faint sigh before he leaned down. He grasped onto the Georgian's coveralls and boxers, pulling them upward. Ellis shyly pushed up his hips to help, reddening when Nick took careful and lewd attention to drag his clothes up over his rump.
"If that's how you cope, works for me." the gambler stated dryly, aware of Ellis' shoulders rising to protest, embarrassed - but he didn't give him the chance to speak. "Anything specific?"

With only a little crinkle of his nose, Nick gathered together their soiled paper towels in one hand. The other snatched the KY from the couch, shoving it in his slacks pocket, then grabbed the flashlight from the table. He casually turned to walk away again.

Ellis lowered his eyes to the ground as the light flashed away, leaving him in moderate darkness. Nick walked behind the couch, disappearing, but Ellis could still hear his footsteps. He chewed idly at his lower lip, eventually settling on saying, "It don't matter. It was just a dumb dream."

He heard a faint hum, though Nick didn't respond outright for a moment or two. When he did, it was dismissively. "It's the goddamn apocalypse, kid. We're literally living a nightmare. Shocked we sleep at all." That made Ellis laugh a little, pushing against the sofa to carefully slide his legs off the edge, seating himself on the couch.

Sitting flat brought a pleasant ache to his rear, and he had to resist the urge to squirm against the cushion. "I guess." he admitted, looking up as Nick circled back toward him. He wasn't sure what he'd done with the trash, but his hands were empty when he returned. "I feel better now, anyhow."

The older man held the flashlight at waist-height, halting at the end of the couch rather than step back in front of it. "I should hope so." He leaned against the arm, casually, slacks still undone in a way that let a tantalizing slip of his boxers peek through.

Ellis tried not to look.

"But, I should get back to Zorro down there. If Ro' finds out I left him alone, she'd blow a gasket. Last thing I need." Nick shrugged up a shoulder idly, thumbing toward the stairs. "You should get back to bed, before someone notices."

Although part of him wanted to argue, the rest of him felt a clinging, lazy kind of tiredness creeping up his spine. He nodded sleepily, reaching out to retrieve the coil of condoms and pocket them again. "Okay… Don't stay up too long, though. I can take watch."

He lifted his chin, looking up toward Nick. His eyes widened a little when Nick leaned in, and the older man gripped him by the chin, turning his face up. The gambler's eyes flickered over his features in the low light, lingering on his lips before closing the distance to kiss him. It was slow and lazy, lips pressing together in a shallow merge.

Ellis' eyes closed in the midst of it, warmth stirring in his chest as he melted against Nick's cradling hand. He could have stayed like that all night.

But Nick straightened before long, releasing him. His knuckles cuffed Ellis' chin, lips quirked in a sharp smirk, and he turned to step toward the staircase. Ellis had no choice but to follow, or be left in the dark. He clambered off the couch and moved behind Nick, eyes averted as the gambler retrieved his katana from the wall and started down the stairs.

They both moved cautiously, footsteps light as they descended. Once they'd hit the main floor, Nick strode back toward Chris' room, body casual and relaxed. "Night, Ace." he uttered without looking back at his younger teammate.

Ellis made to mimic him, turning toward the bedroom where Coach and Rochelle were asleep. A smile threatened at his lips as he whispered back, "G'night., feeling a distinct and heavy warmth in his chest.
It was hesitantly that Ellis stopped halfway there, turning his chin to glance toward the older man. Something surged up; a desire threatened at him, raw and soft. He didn't know how to distill his affection down, communicate the feelings he had. What would Nick even say if he tried? What would Nick say if he said 'I love you'?

That was what he felt, wasn't it?

The chance passed when Nick slipped through the doorway, disappearing into the bedroom. Ellis couldn't help but gaze after him, head tilting in the silence, but rather than feel disappointment - he mostly felt relieved. A little laugh escaped him, rubbing the heel of his hand into his forehead.

Taking that step frightened him a little, anyway. He was too tired to think clearly, and he needed to think very clearly when he tried to make that confession.

Pawing over his clothes, ensuring everything was back in place, Ellis slipped against the bedroom door and carefully let himself back in. Although he couldn't see much, Coach was still snoring, and if he squinted he could make out the slumped silhouette of Rochelle curled up on the top bunk.

A little sigh of relief passed his lips, tiptoeing up to the bunkbed. He made to start crawling back under the covers, rolling his body so he didn't cause too much disturbance to the frame of the bunkbed. He got himself under the covers and pressed his head to the pillow, just starting to close his eyes.

As quiet as he thought he was being, his body stiffened in surprise when Rochelle's voice murmured down to him. "You okay?"

Ellis did his best not to redden, even though nobody would see it in the dark. He wasn't sure how long she'd been awake, though her voice was sleepily drawled in a way that made him think she'd just stirred. He cut a glance up toward the bottom of the bunkbed, whispering back sincerely, "'M fine. Sorry."

A relenting huff sounded from above him, and movement caught his eye in the darkness. He blinked, worming his body flat and drawing the covers over his body, trying to squint to pick it out.

He realized belatedly it was her hand, reaching limply down off the edge of the bed. A smile lifted at his lips, and he reached out his own to clumsily find hers, twining fingers together to hold her hand where it dangled.

"Okay." Rochelle mumbled back.

He felt her fingers limpen slowly as she drifted back to sleep, but he kept a hold on her hand, closing his eyes. They'd slip apart as he fell asleep, too, but he'd keep the grip as long as he could.
Chapter 131

Shouting awoke Nick. He laid flat on the couch, arms crossed over his chest and legs crossed at the ankles, and instinct and reflex awoke long before the conscious part of his brain did. He barely knew what was going on until he'd already lurched off the couch, hand snatching underneath to grab the katana stowed on the floor.

He came to on his feet, both hands braced on the blade's handle, adrenaline thundering. He'd passed watch to Ellis and went back upstairs to crash on the sofa, the idea of him crawling into the bunkbed laughable. Between the sex and the late hour, he'd fallen asleep fairly easily. There was light streaming in from the glass door, now, though faint and pink like early sunrise.

Then another shout came from downstairs, and he was running.

The stairs were almost the end of him, socked foot slipping off the edge of a step, but he managed to grasp the railing on his way down to keep himself upright. As he hit the main floor, the shouts coalesced into words.

"-ey! Hey! Yer okay! Man, yer okay!"

Nick followed Ellis' frantic voice into the main bedroom, barely acknowledging the door to the second bedroom opening as he crossed the hallway. He slipped through the doorway, instantly scanning for trouble.

What he found was Ellis, knee braced on the edge of the bed, both hands holding Chris down as he seemed to be trying, insistently, to surge up. "N-no... ¡No me toques!" The Spaniard reached up with his remaining arm, scrabbling at Ellis' forearm - then shoving, flat-palmed, at his chest.

It hurt, if Ellis' expression was any indication. He released the other man, retreating from the contact, and Nick's jaw went tight with fury at the sight. His fingers flexed on the katana hilt, lurching to stride to the side of the bed. "What the fuck." Ellis' eyes darted up, startled.

"Nick -"

Although Nick wasn't sure what he intended to do to a man in Chris' condition, he would've gotten creative - had Ellis not surged out a hand, flat in a pleading gesture. "Nick, don't. He's just scared."

In the interim, Chris had barely moved. His chest was heaving and his hand was clutched on the sheets draped over his body, but there was something nauseated and distant in his expression. His eyes were glossy, unfocused. He seemed barely aware.

With a reluctant grunt, Nick drew to simply stand where he was, tapping a thumb against the hilt of the katana. It was then that Rochelle hurried into the room, pure motion, darting past Nick to get to the bed. "Oh, God - what happened?"

When her eyes alighted on Christophe and saw he was awake, her body stuttered. She froze for a beat, then suddenly moved with a calm and measured pace, sliding to sit on the edge of the mattress. "Okay." she uttered, almost to herself. "Okay."

Rochelle rested her good hand against the bed, leaning in just a little. Even as she came closer, Chris gave no acknowledgement of her, eyes caught on some far-off point. "Chris. You're here. You're fine."
The Spaniard tried to raise his head with some confusion, digits trembling numbly. However, once he'd lifted his head more than a few inches, a startled shudder traced through his body. He collapsed back down quickly, lips parting into a strangled exhale. "¿Por qué - s-sufri..?"

"Don't move." she urged, pushing herself a little closer on the bed. She cautiously grabbed the sheet covering him, softly trying to pull it up to his shoulders, like she could hide his injuries from him. Her eyes darted up toward Ellis, catching on the frightened shape of his features.

"Ellis." She spoke sharply enough to get his attention, startling him into meeting her gaze. "Run upstairs and get some soup. If we can get him to eat, we have to, while he's awake." The Georgian nodded, and he was gone in a flurry, disappearing up the stairs in a thunderous clamber.

Nick quietly stepped toward the foot of the bed, tipping his head to watch as Rochelle drew her legs into a curl on the mattress, placing her uninjured hand against Chris' jawline. He barely reacted, eyes now on the ceiling, gasping and huffing out air through a gaped mouth. He'd at least stopped struggling, but it seemed more like he'd been frozen by pain than calmed any.

"I don't think he's completely with us." Nick observed distantly, tone dry. Rochelle slipped him a glance, shaking her head.

"What do you expect…?" Returning her attention to the foreigner, Rochelle carefully stroked his cheek with the pad of her thumb, trying to shift herself to lean into his line of sight. "It's Rochelle. I need you to focus, Christophe. Okay? Can you hear me?"

Almost by force, the Spaniard's warm brown eyes - now cold and dim - shifted warily to her face. He gazed at her, shaking, but there was no recognition on his face. The only thing besides pain that showed in his expression was a bracing exhaustion. "Por favor, s-socorro…" he whispered, faintly, gritting his jaw with the words.

Seeming frustrated, Rochelle drew her hand back, sighing tautly. "Nick - can you… I dunno, talk to him?"

That caught Nick off-guard, taking a half step back and thrusting up a hand defensively. "I didn't say I was fucking fluent! Unless you want me to yell at him or start throwing out pickup lines, I'm not your guy."

The sudden movement caught Chris' attention - or so Nick thought. It took him a moment to realize where the Spaniard's gaze was riveted, and when he did, a wave of distinct tension washed over him.

Chris was staring at the blade in his hand.

Before Nick could drop it, Rochelle noticed, too. Her eyes darted from Chris' face to the weapon, and understanding dawned on her face at the same time a brash horror did. "Oh - Nick! For Christ's sake -" She surged up her bandaged hand, pointing toward the door. "Get that out! That's the last thing he needs to see!"

He retreated, one hand going in a flat gesture in front of his chest and the other sweeping the katana behind his back. He backed up toward the bedroom door, even as Chris' eyes silently followed him, expression caught in dizzied pain.

"Jesus, I'm going!" Nick leaned out into the hallway to tuck the katana against the wall outside the bedroom. When he walked back in, it was with his hands up as if in surrender, displaying his empty palms. "There. Better?"
Frowning, Rochelle glanced back at the Spaniard, fingertips reaching up to brush a few short strands of dark hair off his sweaty forehead. His eyes remained on the doorway, unmoving even when Nick returned to the foot of the bed. Something wrought and tired entered his expression, slowly, and it sobered the glassy sheen over his eyes.

"Chris?" she questioned, cautiously, examining his face slowly.

He did react this time - just a little. His eyes flickered to hers, and there was acknowledgement there before a groan left his lips. His head lolled back against the pillow, eyes closing. The slump startled Rochelle, quickly grabbing a hand underneath his neck to brace him. "Hey, hey. Chris, you gotta stay with us, okay?"

Although his eyes remained closed, his lips parted, uttering a faint breath. It was an attempt at a word that didn't quite form. Shifting her weight, Rochelle nervously shook her head. "Please, just a little longer, and then you can rest. You're gonna be alright, but you've gotta eat something."

Crossing his arms warily, Nick wasn't quite able to resist a snide mutter. "Because not eating your Wheaties is definitely the problem here."

Lacking the presence of mind to even pay attention to the Northerner, Rochelle started to slide to sit with her legs tucked under herself. "Nick, help me lean him up, please." He obeyed with a reluctant grumble, stepping over to the opposite side of the bed.

He pushed a hand under Chris' waistline, his other hand grasping behind his head, and together they lifted him up enough that Rochelle could slip underneath him. The foreigner groaned as they did, voice hitching with pain, but went quiet as he settled into a slump against her thigh, head cradled in her lap.

"Can you check on -"

Before she could finish, Ellis' clumsy footsteps sounded down the stairs, slower than the first time. "Sorry - sorry. 'M here. Had tuh open the can." He bustled in, cradling a bowl in his hands, half-full. It was mostly yellow liquid, but drifting amidst it was some rice and chunks of vegetables, maybe carrots and celery. "It ain't warm or nothin'…"

Nick shrugged up his shoulders, drawing back to lean against the wall. He crossed his arms reluctantly. "Beggars, choosers - or whatever the fuck."

Rochelle gestured beside her on the mattress, shaking her head. "It's fine. Come here." As Ellis moved to carefully sit himself on the mattress, balancing the bowl in his fingers, she turned her eyes back onto the man leaned in her lap. "Chris. You need to eat, okay? Can you do that for me?"

His lids flickered, momentarily, before his eyes opened. The pain and exhaustion had drained out of him, leaving an emptiness to his expression that was almost harder to look upon. His pale and clammy cheeks went paler, glancing blearily toward Ellis and the bowl he held.

"Tengo… tengo náuseas…" escaped him in a fractured tone of voice.

Rochelle nodded her head hesitantly, chewing on her lower lip. "It's okay… Just try." When Chris gave a vague and stuttered nod, tremulously breathing out, Rochelle gestured Ellis forward. "Give him some."

Hesitant and careful, Ellis scooted closer, bringing the bowl up toward Chris' face. The foreigner recoiled a little, reflexively, and Ellis froze with an apologetic frown. He held tentatively still, eyes flickering to Chris'. "Yuh gotta eat somethin', man." he uttered, tone gaining a note of plea. "I know it ain't good, but…"

Christophe's jaw flinched, and his eyes went dull and resigned. He forced a jagged inhale before tipping his chin in acquiescence, allowing Ellis to raise the bowl and push the rim against his lips. He tilted it up cautiously, until the liquid breached the edge.

Sipping from it sent visible shudders through the Spaniard, like the very act pained him. He took a small mouthful before drawing his head back an inch, and Ellis righted the bowl in his hands. He worriedly watched Chris take a choking swallow, jawline shuddering.

His face drew into a grimace, and it lingered even after he forced the soup down. The way his breathing shallowed out made it seem almost like he might heave it right back up.

Noticing, Rochelle gently slid her fingertips to rub at the back of his neck, curling nails into the hair at the base of his skull. It was a soothing gesture, and between it and a set of gradually deepening breaths, the man seemed to regain control. He bared his teeth faintly in a mindless gesture of disgust, reluctantly sliding his gaze back to Ellis.

"You a'ight, man?" Ellis questioned, tone half-nervous, raising the bowl again, pointedly. "Should try fer more… Them meds ain't easy on your stomach, either…"

The Spaniard parted his lips limply in acquiescence, and Ellis leaned in to press the soup bowl against his mouth again. Chris took a larger mouthful the second time, though it fought him about as hard.

Over the course of a few strained and tense moments, Christophe got through a little over half the bowl before he gave up. A final swallow made him nearly convulse, recoiling back against Rochelle's hand with a weak grunt, shaking his head in a pleading gesture.

"Okay, okay. You did good, Chris." She flicked her head at Ellis, pointedly, and he retreated with the bowl held carefully in his hand. A frown lingered on his lips, but it was faint and thoughtful. He snuck a glance up toward Nick, who silently canted his head with a dull expression.

"You can rest now, sweetie. You did really good."

The Spaniard limped against Rochelle's lap, eyelids drooping with a blink before they closed entirely. There was a strangled pain over his face, frame shivering faintly, and Rochelle relaxed her body gently against the headboard. Her fingertips stretched up carefully to card through his hair, a relieved sigh escaping her as her own eyes threatened to close.

She lifted her head instead, glancing between Nick and Ellis, a tired frown quirking her mouth. She kept her voice low, fingers slowing in their comforting motion against his scalp. "Can you guys go let Coach know? I'm gonna… sit here a little while, I think. Until he goes back to sleep, at least."

Ellis nodded his head cautiously, backing up toward the door. "Okay." He passed her a reassuring smile, circling the bowl against his chest with a forearm. "If you need anythin'…"

"We'll be down the hall." Nick finished rather curtly, pushing away from the wall to stalk across the room. He slipped around Ellis as he exited, the motion causing the younger man to swirl as if caught in a current, though Nick didn't so much as brush him.

Flashing a quick smile over his shoulder, Ellis followed in Nick's footsteps, taking the time to close the bedroom door carefully behind himself. He blinked, looking up to find Nick already halfway to the other bedroom.
"Nick -" Ellis hissed through clenched teeth before he could get any further. The gambler halted at the sound, looking over his shoulder with a raised brow, expectantly. Cautiously moving to close the gap between them, Ellis lowered his voice to a whisper. "Um… Can I ask somethin'?"

Nick gazed rather thinly at him, a sarcastic twitch to his jaw, merely waiting rather than responding to that.

"Do you…" He hesitated, shifting on his feet, seeming to chew on his tongue in thought. His voice went even lower. "… You don't think Ro' uh… likes him, do you? I mean… likes him?" Nick's brow flattened out, but his expression failed to look particularly surprised. He sent a look, askance, toward the now-closed bedroom door.

Ellis waved his empty hand in front of himself, dismissively, almost walking back his own words as soon as he'd said them. His face floundered into something apologetic. "I ain't tryin' tuh suggest nothin' or nothin' but… it's just… I mean we all want him tuh get better. But…" He sighed, then, eyes dropping to the floor, half-ashamed. "I'm bein' nosy, ain't I…?"

Nick allowed himself a shrug, speaking in an honest murmur. "She thinks he saved her. Twice. Tends to drop panties, even without lopping an arm off in the process."

That horrified Ellis, reaching out to shove at Nick's bicep. The gesture made the gambler smirk, even though he had to brace against it to keep himself unmoving. "Nick! That ain't polite… She's got a boyfriend!" Ellis hissed, mortified.

Rather than laugh, Nick placed a hand on the younger man's elbow and pushed him to start walking. "It's none of our business, Overalls." he chided, hollowly, fully aware he had no intention of leaving it alone. "Forget about it, if you know what's good for you."

Ellis resisted for a beat, taking only one step before digging in his heels. Nick wasn't going to drag him, merely watching as Ellis frowned a bit, sideways, then questioned abruptly, "Ro' said you don't trust him."

"I don't." Nick responded easily, eyes narrowing subtly. Ellis looked surprised, head tilting in confusion, so the gambler shrugged. "Look kid, best case scenario is he's an okay guy. Right?"

The younger man nodded, hesitantly.

"Then he's an okay guy who drank the Kool-Aid when the chips were down." The gambler thrust up a hand, fingers splayed. "That's almost as bad as a straight-up asshole. At least you can anticipate an asshole being an asshole - you take an okay guy who could do anything under the right circumstances, and that makes me nervous."

There was a frown on Ellis' lips as he spoke, but the younger man didn't argue aloud at first. He seemed more thoughtful than anything, mulling over the words. When Nick pushed on his elbow again, Ellis obeyed.

However, as they reached the other bedroom door, Ellis did speak up. His tone was non-confrontational, but pointed. "I think the chips were down in that gunstore, 'n' he didn't shoot y'all." Nick grunted, disinclined to argue. He let Ellis slip through the doorway, lingering in the threshold with his shoulder pressed against it rather than follow.

Coach was awake and alert, expression disgruntled where he lay on the bed. He glanced over the two of them, eyes vaguely frustrated. "Everythin' a'right?"

"Yeah." Ellis assured him, stepping to stand near the bed. He pushed his hands together, wiggling his fingers into a nervous twine. "Chris woke up - kinda. He weren't real talkative, but we got him tuh eat some. Ro's sittin' with him."

The football coach grunted, relief replacing his frustration.

Nick set a hand against his hip, thumbing at his belt idly. "Wasn't conscious enough to notice his arm, so we've still got that wonderful news to share. Plus, he… may have seen we have Brenda's sword. Not really sure how that'll go over."

Seeming resigned, Coach shrugged a shoulder. His eyes closed, relaxing back against the headboard. "Had to happen sometime. He seem angry?"

"No... but I don't think the guy had the energy to be, even if he wanted to." Nick raised a hand to thumb at his jawline, turning his body to glance into the hallway. He stretched his body slowly, working a few kinks out of his spine. The adrenaline of his awakening had worn off, and he mostly felt drowsy again.

Ellis shifted on his feet, glancing between them with a thoughtful pinch of his lips. "Least he's up, right?"

Coach nodded wearily, passing him a calm smile. "That, and y'all gettin' him food is real good. We just gotta keep workin' at it." His praise bolstered Ellis' confidence, a little brightness coming onto his face.

"Yeah." the youngest survivor agreed, eagerly. He reached up a hand, flattening his palm over the crown of his head to scratch fingernails on his scalp. His weight bounced on his heels, tone turning hopeful. "Maybe we're gettin' over the hump. I mean, if he's made it this far."

Nick's expression turned dubious, but he held his tongue. Coach merely grunted in agreement, turning his body to slip his legs off the edge of the bed, coming to a sitting position. Ellis jolted at the motion, taking a step closer and raising his empty hand, worriedly.

"You sure you're ready -"

Coach gave him a displeased look, brows raising. "Yeah, boy. I ain't 'bout to sit on my ass all day."
The look faded as Ellis relented with a couple steps back, bashfully, and a gruff smile replaced it.
The big man stood, and his posture was sturdy when he did. "Besides, you an' me got a car to fix up, don't we?"

Ellis looked thrilled at the suggestion, and he practically beamed when Coach's hand raised and ruffled his hair.

"Hell yeah!"
Chapter 132

Coach and Ellis exited the house, descending the stairs to the ground floor. Despite the eldest survivor's assurance he was fine, Ellis snuck surreptitious glances at him the entire way down, ensuring he didn't trip. And, although he moved stiffly, Coach seemed almost back to normal. It was relieving to see, to say the least.

The sun had risen over them, and though it was still shrouded behind a mass of clouds, the light was enough to begin layering a hazy yellow over the city. The temperature rose as the sun did, though a breeze whistled in from the shoreline and moderated the warmth in inconsistent gusts.

Shouldering his shotgun, Ellis bounced the car keys in his palm. He spoke idly as he reached the bottom of the stairs. "So, first thing I wanna check is the trunk. If we're real lucky -"

"When are we lucky?"

Nick's voice startled him, and Ellis turned around and canted his head to peer up the stairs. The gambler stood in the doorway, and as he watched, Nick slipped entirely out with Brenda's sniper rifle in his hands. Rather than look at either of them, he started to scan their surroundings from his vantage point on the small landing just in front of the door.

"You comin' out to help, Nick?" Coach questioned, tone edging toward surprise... but mostly humor, like he knew the answer he'd get. The football coach continued down to join Ellis on the ground, grasping at his waistband and tugging his khakis up a little as he moved.

The Northerner laughed outright, shrugging with his sniper to indicate it. "You guys got the manual labour covered, I think. Just gonna make sure nothing sneaks up on you."

With a glance slipped to Ellis, half-amused, Coach offered over his shoulder, "A'ight. Just keep that door cracked in case Ro' hollers." When Nick dismissed them with a flap of his hand, shifting a foot back to kick the door open a few inches, Coach moved on toward the garage.

Ellis lingered, tipping his head a bit. His gaze slanted up the stairs to watch as Nick meticulously set the sniper rifle against the railing of the landing, using it as a brace and leaning in to look through the scope. He started scouting out the road on either side of them, swiveling slowly.

Nick didn't so much as spare him a look, so Ellis merely quirked his mouth and moved to catch up with Coach.

As they entered the garage, dimly lit from the open door and the slatted windows in the garage door, Ellis took hold of the keychain in his hands, flipping through to find the fob for the car. He grabbed it - then froze, staring a moment at the blood that encrusted it, congealed to a dark rust colour.

He could almost pick out the fingerprint Brenda had left smudged on the panic button. He examined it quietly, feeling some lingering and wistful regret.

"You were talkin'?" Coach prompted, and Ellis bobbed his head, shaking himself back to attention. He flashed the older man a smile, unlocking the sedan's trunk with a quick button-press. It popped open audibly, the car's headlamps giving a short blink in recognition.

Walking toward it, Ellis shrugged a shoulder. "Usually you get a spare under the trunk, y'know. Might even have a jack'n'lug wrench under there, too." He sidled back toward the back of the sedan, pursing his lips to whistle quietly, thoughtfully. "If we're lucky," he repeated. "Sometimes folks use 'em and never replace it."

Coach nodded, leaving the door open behind himself. He moved to lean against the side of the car, crossing his arms. His eyes darted around the inside of the garage - it was completely empty, just concrete flooring and wood-panel walls, but the back wall had a breakerbox hooked into the center.

He eyed it, but turned back to face Ellis instead of investigating further. He gestured him on with a hand, nodding. "A'ight. Let's see."

Inhaling a little, Ellis pushed the keys into his pocket and opened the trunk door. He squinted faintly to see inside, reaching down to palm along the floor of the trunk. "Should be - yeah." He gripped on a loose flap of upholstery folded up along the edge, and peeled up a section of the trunk's bottom, revealing the compartment stowed away underneath.

Inside, tucked into carefully molded pockets, was exactly what he'd hoped to see: a temporary tire, with a lug wrench set to one side and a folded black scissor jack tucked inside the tire's middle rim.

A grin snuck up on him, nodding his head as he ran his fingers over the metal. "Hell yeah. S'just a donut, but it'll do us fine. Though, handlin'll be iffy, iffin we get intuh trouble. Won't be doin' no stunt drivin' on this." Ellis carefully reached in to grab up the jack, hauling it out of the trunk and taking a step back.

He babbled, idly, some distant kind of calm entering him as he did. "Won't be doin' the differential no favours, either." He'd forgotten how good it felt to be in his element - though a part of him expected to turn and see Keith. "But it'll do us."

Coach approached around the car, looking faintly relieved. "I got the tire." Ellis gave him room, watching as the older man leaned into the trunk, grabbing ahold of the temporary tire and lifting it from its compartment. He only strained a little, bracing it against his belly as he took it over to the side of the car. "Be too much effort to get a wheel from another car or somethin'?"

Ellis shrugged a little, taking the jack against his hip and under his arm so he could lean in and grab the lug wrench, too. "I mean, we could, but it ain't like we're gonna do any road-trippin'. We'd have tuh find matchin' sizes'n'shit. Heck, if we do that, may's well just go find us a new ride."

A grunt escaped Coach, and a frown touched his face. He lowered the tire next to their flat, leaning it against the side of the car and setting a hand on his hip. "Right..." he said, some hesitation working its way into his voice. "Road-trippin'. About that, Elli-"

"Oh, hold up!" Ellis interrupted, eagerly, abruptly moving to set the wrench and jack on the roof of the car. "I gotta check if this baby is front or rear drive. May have tuh swap the flat out with one'uh the back tires, put the donut on the back, instead."

Coach arched a brow at the interruption, tapping his thumb against his hip with cautious thought. "A'ight." He wanted to broach the subject of the doubts that had been raised about their rescue. As much as he didn't want to believe it, he'd been thinking: didn't Ellis deserve to know?

He was as much a part of the team as any of them, and keeping it from him was growing uncomfortable. Coach knew Rochelle didn't like it, but was afraid to scare the young survivor. Nick was undoubtedly waiting to confirm things with Christophe before circling Ellis in.

They were both fair and reasonable choices - but Ellis was grown, and deserved to be part of their decision. It wouldn't be pleasant, but Coach would take the burden of having the conversation.

"Sorry, though. Whut were you sayin'?"

As the mechanic moved around the car to open the driver's side door, leaning in to pull the latch that popped the hood, Coach crossed his arms. "There's somethin' we should talk about. We didn't wanna worry you, so we been lettin' it alone. But I been thinkin', you should hear it from us."

Ellis crinkled a brow at the words, pausing a moment to slant a look back at the older man. His expression went hesitant, curling his tongue against his teeth in reluctant thought. A faint embarrassment crept into his voice. "Um... this ain't about Jerry, is it...? 'Cause I talked with Nick, 'n' we're okay..."

Shaking his head, Coach dragged his arms into a cross. "Nah. Nobody's told you why shit went bad in the gunstore, right?" Ellis shook his head, continuing to the nose of the car. He grasped fingertips under the hood, pulling it upright. "Well... there was an argument. Now, we don't really know what it means, so I don't want you puttin' stock in nothin'. Just think you should know."

An outright frown spawned on his Ellis' lips, movement slowing a little. He grasped the steel rod that was tucked into the corner, pulling it out and setting the tip in the notch on the hood's roof to hold it open. "Well... I appreciate that. But... whut're you sayin'? Did somethin' happen?"

At that, Coach sighed. He rested back against the sedan, a reluctant sort of weariness dragging at his features. He watched Ellis lean over the engine compartment, hand slipping over the internal mechanics. "Sorta. We got to talkin' wit' Brenda about our plans. When we mentioned contactin' the military, she..."

He halted when his younger teammate leaned suddenly to the side, drawing his left hand up in front of his face. Something shiny and dark glistened on his fingers, with a ruddy brown tint. "Uh... shit."

Startled, Coach pushed off the car and approached, eyes darting from the youth's hand into the engine's innards. "Shit what?" he questioned, voice a little strained. "Somethin' broke?"

Ellis raised up his undirtied hand, taking his cap and turning it around so the bill jutted out behind his head. He leaned in, resting an elbow against the edge of the engine compartment, fingers catching on a piping system hooked up to a tank on the far left wall. "Looks like a bullet got in here through the grille.. Lucky it didn't hit nothin' vital."

Coach tilted his head to follow Ellis' motions, eyes going slightly narrowed with concern. He didn't miss the careful wording. "But it hit somethin'."

"Yeah." Ellis nodded, reluctantly. His fingers grasped around the pipe, sliding along its length in a probing gesture, and when he retracted his hand it was dark with the same fluid. It had a kind of burnt smell to it, and he shook his hand out with a glance toward Coach. "Nicked the power steerin' fluid line. It ain't a big hole, but it must'uh been leakin' all yesterday'n'all night."

Sighing faintly, Coach re-crossed his arms. He allowed a hand to wrest itself from under his bicep, though, pointing toward the engine. "Is it still a'ight to drive?"

That made the younger man's lips draw into a quirked frown, eyeing his stained digits in thought.
"Sorta. The pump'll burn out, though, and it'll be real rough tuh handle. Between this, 'n' drivin' on the donut, turnin's gonna be heck... and if we get intuh any kind'uh zombie trouble, we'll be fish in a damn barrel."

Frustration rose up, Ellis abruptly shaking his head. "I don't think it's a good idea. We'd need some patch tape 'n' tuh find some more fluid... ain't likely, unless we spot a hardware store or somethin'. Thinkin' we better just get a new -"

Before he could continue, a shot rang out, cracking in the air like a firework. It made both of them jump, and Coach bolted almost as quickly as Ellis did. The younger Georgian reached the door first, bursting through the threshold. "Nick?!"

Although his fear was abated slightly when he saw the gambler still posted at the top of the stairs, that didn't stop his head from swiveling to examine the fenced-in yard. He didn't see any obvious threats, but the privacy wall blocked his view. Nick, on the other hand, could see over it.

Mindlessly pawing at his cheek - only belatedly realizing he'd done so with his dirty hand and streaked his flesh with red-brown liquid - Ellis cocked a look up toward the scouting survivor. "What's goin' on?"

"Hunter." Nick explained coolly, voice low. He kept his face against the scope, scanning carefully in sweeping passes. "Poked up over the fence. This shit isn't zombie-proof, if anyone was wondering - and we've got some infected down the road. That shot just caught their attention, but they don't know where we are yet. So hurry up and do what you're doing."

Ellis' mouth opened, prepared to share the bad news - but Coach nudged him, elbow to his bicep.

The younger man blinked, curiously, when the ex-football player turned to walk back into the garage. It was with hesitation that he followed, watching Coach duck through the doorway and retake his position, arms-crossed, at the nose of the car.

He padded up to join the older man, head cocked expectantly. "If we're givin' up on the car, shouldn't we get back inside?"

Coach merely nodded with his chin. "Sure, son. In a second... Wanna finish what I was sayin' earlier before we do." Ellis gave a small 'oh,' shifting onto the heels of his boots, turning his chin up to give the man his full attention. He'd genuinely forgotten for a moment, bounced off-topic.

"What set shit off was us tellin' them we meant to call in the gov'ment. Chris and Brenda talked like the military had done some nasty shit. They were scared of us callin' them in, like we'd get killed, an' them too. That was why they turned on us."

The revelation came slowly over Ellis' face, thought ticking over his features in a hesitant wave. Coach let him think on it, waiting patiently for him to absorb the new information, with only a calm and reassuring injection of, "We don't know no more than that. They didn't explain it. We're hopin' Chris will."

Slowly, Ellis turned on his heel, averting his eyes toward the garage door. His lips drew tight against each other, almost frowning - but not quite.

A hard clench of frustration set itself into place in his chest. First he discovered the group hid the cause of Jerry's death from him, and now that they'd been hiding even more? Did they not think he could handle the news, or had his near-death experience suddenly shaken their faith in him?

Did they think he was weak - or just stupid?
"... Whut kinda stuff did they say they did?" he questioned, tentatively, maintaining an even tone as he spoke. He tried to shake off the thought, tried to focus - but it upset him more piercingly than what Coach was trying to tell him. "Like blowin' that bridge we found? Or...?"

The eldest survivor shook his head firmly, closing his eyes. He scratched carefully at the inside of his bicep, seeming reluctant even as he spoke. "Said they were shootin' people. Like survivors. But we didn't get to discuss it - we're hopin' it's a misunderstandin'."

Ellis' mouth warped into the frown he'd been trying to mask, lowering his gaze to examine the toes of his boots. Coach noticed the gesture, stepping close enough to reach out a hand and set it on his shoulder, comfortingly.

"You mad we didn't tell you earlier?"

Part of him wanted to step out from the older man's grip, but he forced himself to stay rooted, fighting against the instinct. The last thing he wanted to do was lash out. He was trying to find an even keel after his breakdown the day before, not collapse even further. "... I just don't get why y'all are hidin' things from me all'uv a sudden."

Try as he might, his voice did escape him in a bitter grit. The words - or the tone, or both - startled Coach, and the hand on Ellis' shoulder faltered, lifting away just slightly. Ellis bowed his chin to avoid looking at him, feeling petty, and small.

Before Coach could say anything, a surge of self-conscious energy had Ellis shaking his head.

"Man... sorry. I just... I'm havin' trouble gettin' over shit right now, I guess. I ain't normally this quick tuh rile... s'just been a long few days." He huffed out a breath, raising a hand to scuff the back of his hand against the wet splotch on his cheek. "I just hate feelin' like y'all don't trust me. Nick don't think I can handle knowin' shit, y'all don't think I can handle knowin' shit... when did we... when did I..."

He trailed off, then jumped when Coach abruptly grabbed him by the elbow.

The sudden contact startled him into an outright yip, but could do nothing but be scooted along by the heavyset survivor. Coach guided him effortlessly back out the garage door, grip firm.

"W-whut-!" escaped Ellis, half-convinced he was in trouble. The eldest team member didn't respond, dragging him along as he made it back to the staircase. Nick was still at the top, and he curiously glanced down at the sight, sliding his sniper rifle against his chest so he could make room for them.

"The fuck is going on?" he questioned, sounding genuinely baffled, particularly when his eyes caught on Ellis' stricken expression.

Coach pulled the mechanic up the stairs by force, going just slow enough to allow him to catch his balance on the steps. "Team huddle-up." he announced calmly, tipping his head to indicate Nick should retreat inside. The gambler did so with a suspicious look, backing up rather than turning around, keeping an eye on his teammates.

"The fuck is going on?" he questioned, sounding genuinely baffled, particularly when his eyes caught on Ellis' stricken expression.

Once he'd dragged Ellis into the hallway, Coach finally released him. He didn't give the younger man any time to protest before he stepped away, walking to the closed bedroom door. Cracking it open, he poked his head in.
"Need you, babygirl." There was a beat of silence, and Rochelle must have given him a face from the bed or whispered something too quiet for Ellis to hear, because a soft, gruff chuckle escaped him. "Don't look at me like that. It's important. He ain't gonna keel over in the next few minutes."

Nick closed the front door before he sidled up to the wall next to the stairwell, eyes scanning between his teammates. His eyes were narrow and guarded at first - but as Coach stepped away from the door, dry amusement touched his face.

"Can't drag her away?" he murmured, lowly, just barely loud enough for even Ellis to catch.

Sparing him a half-distressed, half-chiding look, Ellis pushed his hands against his coveralls, cleaning his fingers of the staining they'd collected inside the engine. "Coach, whut's this about? I didn't mean tuh... I mean, I didn't want tuh cause a ruckus. I was just ventin' is all -"

Coach waved him off easily, slipping his arms into a cross over his chest. He gave the kid a fond smile, lids lowering to a lazy half-close as his voice slipped into a rumble. "Overdue fo' this, anyway."

Ellis frowned, tautly, reaching up a hand. He meant to push his capbill down over his eyes, but he'd spun his cap around - so his fingers pawed uselessly at the air before he realized his mistake. A mocking snort escaped the gambler, leaned against the wall at his flank.

The look Ellis spared him that time was all distressed.

As Rochelle tentatively stepped out of the bedroom door, hand on the knob to draw it almost closed behind her, she prompted, "Overdue for what?" She blinked a little at the sight of all three of her male compatriots circled around her, and for a beat, her face flashed to something about as suspicious as Nick's.

In that moment of silence, Coach released a weary sigh. He closed his eyes outright, lifting a hand to gesture toward Ellis. "... He knows. I told him 'bout the gov'ment. Or, what the Angels told us 'bout them, anyway."

Ellis' heart started a clamour in his chest, thick and heavy. This was hardly what he'd intended to happen, and all he could do was shuffle his body into a slump, non-confrontational. Like he could hide himself if he just lowered his head enough.

Both Nick and Rochelle stiffened - though he averted his gaze toward the front door, while she darted her eyes straight to Ellis' face. Her lips parted, concern drawing a line between her eyebrows, but Nick was faster.

"... I thought we agreed..." His voice was clipped, and a little frustrated.

Coach shook his head before the gambler could continue, flexing his shoulders into a roll that was only tangentially a shrug. "We were wrong. Ain't we had this conversation before? We gotta make decisions, as a team. Together. All four of us. It ain't fair any other way. If we want the truth, we gotta tell the truth."

Rochelle's eyes lowered to the ground, suddenly dragging an arm over her midsection. She held her elbow, forearm almost hugging herself, biting at her lower lip at the words. "Yeah..." she agreed, if a little weakly, guilt catching in her voice.

Nick thrust the sniper rifle down to lean against the wall and slid a hand into his slack's pocket. He exhaled, raising his eyes to the ceiling with the motion. "I was going to, the minute we knew what we were actually talking about."
Reluctantly, Ellis shifted on his heels, shaking his head gently. His posture was a little strained with embarrassment, ears burning faintly at the feeling of causing friction. He wished he'd merely kept his mouth shut.

"What matters -" With a nod of his head toward Ellis, Coach lowered his voice to something gentler. "- is he thinks we don't trust him."

That dropped Ellis' jaw. He instinctively looked up at the eldest survivor, eyes wide, like he'd been outright betrayed. Coach met his gaze with a tolerant warmth, stoic, and it was all Ellis could do not to babble. "I - That ain't - Why would you - Coach -"

"Oh, gosh." Rochelle uttered, stepping to close the gap between her and Ellis. She reached out, grasping onto his bicep with her good hand. Her gaze tried to meet his, and he couldn't get himself to look right at her, abashed. "Is that true?"

"N-no... I mean, kinda, I guess." He huffed, managing to lean back a little on his heels. He could feel his face heating up, unsure if it was mortification or just unease at the attention. He had to work the words out, like they were stuck behind his teeth. "I just... don't get why y'all would keep me outta this. We're s'posed to be a team... 'n' I thought..."

He shrugged his shoulders, slumping just a little more - and Rochelle collapsed into a frown.

Moving quickly, she slid forward, drawing her arms around him and tugging him into an embrace. Her cheek settled against his shoulder, and even as he reddened, he tentatively returned the hug with an arm looped around her waist.

"Sweetie, that's not it at all." Her left hand brushed up his back, smoothing a circle between his shoulderblades. "We just didn't know what it meant, and you were hurt - and things just kept getting worse. We didn't want to ruin your hope and then find out we did it for no reason."

Ellis frowned a little. Although he did so gently, he did extricate himself from the hug to take a step back, shaking his head with a quiet sigh. "I ain't a kid..." That made Rochelle's frown deepen, chin lowering. "I know y'all meant well, it's just -" His eyes averted to the side, a pinch touching between his eyebrows.

"Sorry."

Coach shook his head, exhaling a weighty breath. "Don't be sorry, son. We shouldn't be keepin' things like this from each other. Ain't even just 'bout you feelin' hurt - if we gotta make choices, if we gotta decide... we gotta do it together." His brows dropped over his eyes, shading them, and his voice gained a low edge. "Even if it ain't pretty."

From his place against the wall, Nick slanted his head, cutting a look lengthwise across the three of them. He huffed something like a laugh, taut and cool. "Yeah. 'Cause there are so many options available to us."

Ellis turned on a heel to look toward him, mouth slipping into a faint quirk downward. "If we can't trust the military... whut are we gonna do?" It was with a subtle angle that Nick met his gaze, expression going flat as he gazed over the younger man's features.

He seemed... calm. Thoughtful, though worried. Nick had expected panic and disbelief, but there was none. Was he finally growing used to the idea of not trusting people? Had the sting of it finally faded, and it was becoming something he could wrap his head around?

That thought bothered Nick a little more than he liked.
"Not worth talking about until we can get our one-armed friend in there to give us a better explanation." He freed his hand from his pocket, flattening it in the air, palm-up. "I'm the first one on deck to vote for not trusting the government - who, by the way, couldn't stop the outbreak in the first place - but let's not start planning our life out here in this shitfest before we know for sure."

Rochelle couldn't resist a snort at that, squinting faintly in Nick's direction before her eyes rolled. "You kidding? Shoot, it's practically paradise, I'd love to live like this forever. Who needs rescue? Let's just stay out here."

He summoned up a smirk, flashing a strip of teeth in a grin. "Careful. Talk like that, and we'll have to start thinking about the future of the human race."

Rochelle gave a scoffing sound, dismissing that comment off-handedly, returning her gaze to Ellis. Though he'd retreated a step back, he was still within reach, so she stretched out her left hand to grasp his wrist. Squeezing comfortingly, she gave him a hesitant smile. "He's right, though. Let's just try not to worry too much until we know what we're dealing with."

Considering that for a moment, Ellis eventually nodded. "Yeah. Okay. That makes sense." His eyes darted, flicking between his teammates with a hesitant energy, splitting his gaze equally, firm but gentle. "I ain't mad. I just don't want us keepin' things from each other is all. I keep almost -"

He'd been so sturdy, it was almost startlingly sudden when that composure broke a little. His gaze dropped, chin trembling just faintly before he sighed. "We keep almost losin' each other. Last thing we need is tuh start hidin' shit."

Rochelle sighed, pinching her lips into a purse hesitantly as her eyes flickered over his face - but she didn't get the chance to speak before Coach was suddenly stepping forward. His arms swept around her and Ellis, drawing them suddenly in a hug that made Rochelle outright squeak in surprise.

"Group hug." Coach announced, gruffly.

His grip squashed them together and against his gut, gathering the two younger survivors together with all the atmosphere of a hen tucking chicks under its feathers. He jostled them just a little, a hand going to brace on either of their shoulders, and Ellis couldn't resist a tickled laugh. "Coach - he gasped out with a snort.

Unable to resist a laugh of her own, Rochelle twisted in Coach's grip to look toward Nick, voice growing a taunting edge. She spoke with careful intonation, slowly, drawing the words out: "He said group." Ellis laughed at the words, eyes going a little wide with the realization of her meaning.

The only description for the look that crossed Nick's face was horror.

With little more than a sly glance passed between the three of them, they scuttled toward him without breaking contact with each other. Coach's arms spread invitingly, at the same time Nick started backing up, pushing himself into the wall and raising a threatening finger. "Don't even fucking think about it."

Ellis' laughter heightened, turning into snorts, and Coach couldn't resist chuckling along. Rochelle merely grinned, cuttingly, dropping her voice to a monotone as she thrust up a hand in a grabbing gesture. "One of us - one of us..."

Their approach backed Nick into the corner, up against the door, and maybe it was the outright aggression that sparked up on his features that made them relent. Still laughing, Ellis ducked away from Coach, reaching up to slide his cap back around on his head. "We best let him be, y'all..."

"Says you. I vote for making him squirm." Rochelle snorted, amusement flickering over her face at the slow way Nick's hackles lowered, eyes still on them suspiciously. She grinned, slipping her arms into a loose cross over her chest, Coach's arm draped over her shoulders.

The big man gave a chuckle, tilting his head to one side. "Losin' our lives ain't my idea of a good team-buildin' exercise, anyway."

Nick exhaled a breath through his nostrils, huffing, and dragged his hands to a loose grip on his hips. Keeping his eyes narrowed, he slipped away from the wall, making to circle around them to reach the staircase. "Well, if we're done with the warm-fuzzies... I'm gonna go eat something."

Before he could place a foot on the first step, Rochelle's expression drained out to a slight frown. She glanced downward, and something in her posture must've tensed, because Coach slipped a glance at her curiously from an angle. "Babygirl?"

Nick heard his tone and halted, turning his head with a curious tilt.

They were coming clean, weren't they? The notebook and its contents - as questionable as they were, and as uncertain as she was of what to take from it - fought at her conscience. The last thing she wanted was to give Ellis more of a reason to think they were keeping things from him. And, honestly, she wanted their opinion.

They were a team, after all.

Sighing softly, the woman shook her head.

"... We aren't done. There's something else."
Chapter 133

Sunlight wheedled unenthusiastically through the glass doors, casting a glare over the surface. Nick was quick to take up a position against it, tilting his head to focus outside rather than pay much attention to his teammates as they came up the stairs. He'd taken the sniper rifle back into his hands, aiming it down at the carpet with a leisurely angle.

"This shit feels like an intervention." he commented idly, moving one hand to rub at the concave of his neck, just below his jaw. His statement made him examine his fingers in a side-eye, not missing the tremor still affecting his knuckles. "And I haven't even smoked in days."

Ellis slipped around to the front of the sofa, moving to sit down on it. As he started to lower himself onto the seat, he couldn't help but peek down over the cushions nervously. He didn't know if he expected to see stains, or some huge sign that announced that they'd had sex on it just some hours previous...

The thought made it entirely too uncomfortable when Coach moved to join him, dropping onto the couch with a grunt. He closed his eyes wearily. "She's comin'. Keep yo' pants on."

Looking up when Nick gave a noncommittal noise, Ellis was startled to find the gambler's head tilted, just enough to slip a glance at him. There was a smirk on his lips, and the Georgian could only silently redden. The source of his humor was, undoubtedly, the same as the source of Ellis' embarrassment.

Ellis swore Nick took pleasure in his mortification, and it was that floundering embarrassment that made Ellis' gaze dart down, averting it to the ground. Panic promptly flooded through him.

Just beside the coffee table leg, almost hidden in the shadow of the table's surface, was the split square of a foil condom wrapper. It must have fallen, and they'd missed it while cleaning up in the dark. He froze for a solid few seconds, horrified at the sight, not even a breath passing his lips.

When he did move, it was almost frantically, jolting out his foot to catch the toe of his boot atop the wrapper and shove it completely underneath the coffee table and out of sight. Coach noticed the gesture when it shook the couch, opening his eyes with a confused raise to one brow. Ellis was terrified to open his mouth for the lack of excuse he had.

Rochelle's approach up the stairs provided a blessed distraction.

She came up the stairs on soft footsteps. She held her hands behind her back, something hesitant in her eyes as she stepped up onto the second floor and turned toward the three men across the room. "Sorry... I'm here." Coach turned to look toward her, giving a comforting nod.

In the absence of his attention, Ellis practically huffed out a relieved breath, sliding a hand onto his sternum. He had to force his heartrate down a notch, rearranging his face into some semblance of normality.

With a small smile back toward Coach, the producer slipped over to the rightmost loveseat. Rather than sit on the cushions, she hopped up onto the armrest. She drew one leg into a cross under herself, foot tucked behind her other knee. It was then that she sighed, exhalng in a way that seemed to deflate her body.

"Okay."
Her left arm swept from behind herself, holding up her hand limply. Gripped tightly in her hand was the spiral notebook. Her fingers cradled it delicately, like it were liable to explode. "I -"

She couldn't get any further before Nick was reacting, shoulders drawing in something more like confusion than irritation. "Is that what I think it is? Why - when did you even take it?" He palmed against the crown of his head, shifting on his heels, even as she slipped him a faintly annoyed glance.

"After you left. And I don't know. I just did." she admitted, honestly, sighing faintly despite herself. Turning the notebook around, she flattened it on her lap and shrugged her shoulders up gently. "I was hoping it'd have something useful in it, I guess. Or maybe I was just curious."

Lifting a hand to rub self-consciously at his cheek, as if the lingering heat there was a smudge he could wipe away, Ellis drew his face into a confused pinch. His head flipped back and forth to look between Nick and Rochelle. "Whut's that?"

Dropping into a further slump on the sofa, grunting as he shifted his weight, Coach draped an arm over the back of the soda. "That's the journal from the attic, ain't it?" Rochelle seemed distantly surprised at his words, not knowing he knew of it, but nodded. Her eyes shifted to focus on Ellis, tapping the notebook against her thighs.

"Remember when Nick went up into the attic?" The kid nodded, a touch warily, so Rochelle gave him a reassuring smile. "We found some stuff. A guy who'd killed himself and a zombie... and this. He wrote some stuff in a notebook. Kind of a journal, and a suicide note."

He blinked gently, jutting his jaw forward in a thoughtful gesture. "Okay... So you kept it?"

Slowly drawing her fingertips against the notebook, Rochelle opened the notebook, working to hesitantly open it to the page she'd dog-eared the night previous. "Yeah. Nick only glanced at it, and I guess I just..." Her eyes softened before she shook her head to re-focus. "I dunno. It doesn't matter. But - I think I found something."

Curiosity drove Nick to step away from the glass door. Rather than approach her directly, he took to circling the couches in the center of the room, moving at a casual pace to ring them. "Something aside from more crazy? Because what I remember was less than reassuring, if we're talking about taking advice from some dead guy."

Rochelle mostly glossed over him, tapping her pinky against the edge of the notebook with a clicking sound. "It's mostly just... talking. But there's this bit in the middle... Let me just read it." As she came to the bookmarked page, her lips tightened a bit against each other. Ellis leaned in subtly toward her, eyes attentive and half-narrowed.

She read it carefully, intonation flat. "Something got on the roof. I went to kill it. Climbed up through the window. We're running low on bullets, and I saw the boat again. I want to go to the shore and try to flag them down."

As the words left her, the other three passed glimpses between them. There was a thoughtful kind of pause in the seconds that followed, with Nick continuing his pace around the room, though it slowed a little. Coach raised a hand to rub at his chin, fingertips rustling on the dense stubble accruing on his features.

"A boat." he repeated, thoughtfully.

Rochelle nodded her head, tentatively, balancing the notebook against her thigh. "Making passes, it seems like. At the very least, it showed up twice. He doesn't mention it again, doesn't describe it, so... for all I know, it's some kid on a motorboat, just trying to make it, like us... Or..." She trailed off a little, raising her hands into a vague gesture. "Maybe even a military ship."

Slipping his free hand into his pocket, Nick drew his chin down, tongue flicking at the corner of his mouth before he sighed. "Passing ship or helicopter is pretty much our only shot for getting someone to notice us."

Bouncing up slightly from his seat, Ellis tilted his head. "If we're not sure if the military is gonna help us... maybe we don't wanna get their attention." he uttered, thoughtfully. The words did draw a frown on his face, but it was faint.

"We can't be makin' no call on that yet." Coach inserted, hand still scratching into his jawline. "Not 'til we get Chris to talk to us. We call it quits on the military, we ain't got no plan B. So ain't no one gonna be hasty 'bout that shit."

Ellis' mouth pursed, sedately, acknowledging the thought with a faint nod. "So... fer now... guess we just keep an eye out? We got a pretty good view out the window if it's some big tanker or somethin'."

Nick slid to stand behind Rochelle, halting his pacing. "Maybe." He leaned in, looking over her shoulder, and she raised the notebook to show him the entries. He let his eyes scan the words, though it didn't reveal any more information than Rochelle had already shared. "If it's not military, we may as well just start scouting out for our own boat. Go sailing. Who wants to be pirates?"

That made Rochelle snort, despite herself, sneaking a surreptitious glance sideways at his too-close face. "Why am I not surprised that your first thought is pirating?"

At that, Ellis responded quite seriously: "That's 'cause pirates are awesome. Almost as awesome as ninjas." His head nodded in easy decision, reaching up a hand to grasp onto the top of his hat and rub it against his scalp in a gentle motion.

The gambler couldn't bite back a sharp laugh, flashing the Georgian a vaguely baffled look before returning his gaze to the notebook. "Christ, you're five."

A chuckle left Coach - but he cleared his throat shortly, dropping his hand to his lap. He changed the subject before Ellis could protest, a grim note to his voice. "Speakin' of scoutin'... we should tell y'all. The car ain't fixable."

Nick's eyes darted up fully at the admittance, a flat groan escaping his lips. "Really? Fuck." He retreated from Rochelle's side, reaching up to palm against his forehead in a frustrated gesture. "I thought it was just a flat?"

Ellis shook his head, leaning forward a little bit from the couch. "Thought so too. But when it got shot up, it messed with some internals. It'd drive, but if we got caught in anythin' dangerous, like a horde or a Tank... we'd have a real rough time escapin'. Heck, be better off on foot."

Exhaling a long and weighty sigh that fluttered into agitation, Nick turned away. "We've got - one bottle of water left?" Rochelle nodded, and though he didn't see the gesture, the silence was enough of a confirmation. "I hate to say it... but we can't wait this out."

The ex-football player frowned, dark eyes slipping to a squint as he adjusted his seat on the couch. "Can't hotwire another car?"

Sliding a hand onto his shoulder and massaging into his sore and aching shoulderblade, pain twinging with the touch, Nick shook his head. "Okay, boy scout. It doesn't work like that. We got lucky with that shitty truck I hotwired back then - anything modern's got failsafes. Keys or bust, unless we happen across another junker."

Ellis nodded in confirmation, lips drawn in a faintly musing pout. He stretched his legs out, the heels of his boots digging into the carpet. "If we gotta find water'n'shit... really be nice tuh have the storage. Ain't like the zombies'll be polite 'cause we got our arms full."

"Yeah." Rochelle agreed with a sigh, drooping her chin almost to her chest. "No way to do this without splitting up again, either. Not like Chris can come with us... and he's not conscious enough so far to defend himself."

Frowning deeper at the concept, Ellis scattered a glance over his team, drawing his lower lip into a slim bite. Something bad had happened every time they'd split up of late: at the hotel... when Chris returned... when Brenda attacked... Could they really do it again?

An aching feeling grew in his chest; if he took his eyes off his friends, even for a moment, they might just disappear.

"I don't wanna." he admitted, just a mumble, before he could stop it. His eyes fell to his knees, only barely registering when Coach stretched his hand over to rest on his shoulder. It was only forcibly that he tilted his head a little to acknowledge the contact.

Nick dragged himself into a turn, gazing reluctantly toward the youth. His posture adjusted, leaning back on a heel to slump his body tiredly. "No other choice. Can't go without water, and the sooner we find some more supplies, the better." When Ellis' head dropped faintly, Nick shrugged a shoulder, looking instead up at Coach. "Buddy system? So we've all got back-up."

The eldest survivor nodded his head in agreement, just once. "Ro' ain't in shootin' condition wit' her hand. I ain't in runnin' condition wit' my knee. Y'all boys should go." He glanced at Ellis' face, where the younger man was still caught in a frown. "Your rib a'ight?"

Ellis met his gaze, nodding. His eyes melted to something somber, but there was some resignation at the edge of his voice - even as it faltered with a tentative murmur. "I'll be okay."

Coach gripped his shoulder with a squeeze, head nodding. "We will, too. Don't worry 'bout it, son." He looked up, exhaling softly. "How 'bout we eat, then get a plan together? All we know, one of these condos 'round us has got a car with keys, make this easy."

Nick huffed a laugh, slitting his eyes faintly. He shook his head, sidestepping to make his way over to the kitchen and claim a granola bar from the box they'd relocated back to the counter. "Life making it easy on us? Come on, Sammy. You got more sense than that."

The big man snorted at that, closing his eyes tiredly.

"Get me somethin' to eat and shut yo' mouth, Nicky."
Nick chewed idly on his cheek, leaned in the threshold of the front door. His injured right shoulder was radiating a quiet pain through his torso, enough to make him sigh out a breath. He’d need to tend to it sooner than later; if they got enough water, he could at least wash it off.

Mild surprise did creep up on him when he passed the back of his hand against his forehead and found his skin fairly cooled. The antibiotics should have taken longer to kick in than that - not that he was going to complain about the fever passing. Small mercies, I guess.

His fingers were still trembling, but that much he attributed to a lack of cigarettes. The need wasn't fading so much as becoming blurred with an array of other aches and pains, to where he could almost cope with it. While that spoke poorly for his general condition, he'd take what he could get.

Plus, getting off helped.

At that, Nick wasn't able to stifle a small grin. Just privately - just for himself. The only thing better than screwing Ellis into the couch was watching Ellis have to sit on that same couch and keep a straight face.

He'd long since come to terms with his sadistic streak, and as much as the idea of anyone finding out haunted him - he also couldn't deny the thrill of fucking the kid under his team's nose.

He'd shouldered the sniper rifle, and in his hands was the katana. They were running low on ammunition, and the last thing they needed was to end up defenseless. Gripping it carefully with both hands, he thoughtfully spun it, testing his shoulder. The pain didn't really get any worse or better as he flexed it.

The real test would come when he swung the thing at a zombie, but at least it was feasible.

Ellis came down the stairs, boots tromping against the carpet. His approach drew Nick's gaze, a brow faintly raising. The Georgian was still looking about as thrilled as a kicked dog, mouth caught in a permanent frown. He'd drawn his shotgun into his arms, hugging it into his side, and he practically sulked his way down the steps.

He spared a frown in Nick's direction before stepping up to him, shoulders low. "Guess we better go."

"Jeez, Overalls." he returned, allowing the katana to drop and rest against the ground, hooking a thumb in his slacks pocket instead. "Spare me the death row look. Ro' and Coach are going to be tucked in safe here. You should be worried about us - we're the ones about to get fucked."

A gentled sigh escaped the younger man, eyebrows wringing into a discontent knot. He nodded his head in a sour gesture, Nick's humor going entirely over his head. The gambler felt a little disgruntled at that; he'd expected at least a scrunched-up nose, maybe a snort. Even a reluctant one.

Ellis merely trodded around him, slipping out the door and starting to make his way down the stairs.

Lazily, Nick followed, pausing only momentarily to close the door behind him. He shot a glance up toward the sky, eyeing the cloudless expanse of blue - though what it lacked in cloud cover it made up for in plumes of smoke, drifting sleepily from one direction or the other. "What are you worrying about, anyway?"
As he reached the ground floor, Ellis stepped to the side, kicking a heel against the scraggly and sandy earth that filled in around the driveway and edging sidewalk. "I just hate us splittin' up. We ain't had nothin' but bad shit happen every time we do. If somethin' happens to them while we're gone, I..."

He trailed off, shoulders raising a little bit, shaking his head in something almost mournful. "I'm gonna go crazy, man."

The gambler took the stairs in a slow glide, eyes rooted firmly on his younger teammate, narrowed to a suspicious slit. Ellis' composure had been failing him in this consistent degradation, like the stress had finally built to some critical mass. He hadn't expected a quick fuck to solve things, but that left him at a loss.

Ellis was drifting. He needed comfort, needed something to root him, so he felt less like he might lose everything at a moment's notice. Needed assurance. He needed something to trust in.

Nick didn't know how to offer that.

Sure as fuck ain't me.

"Look, kid." He'd at least try. "You realize the whole reason we're alive is Rochelle? If I'd be worried about anything, I'd be worried about whatever - or whoever - tries to get in this house while we're gone. She's past fucking around. Pretty sure she'd disassemble them by hand."

It was a shot in the dark, but it struck. Ellis let out a stifled laugh, turning a little to glance at Nick, tentative amusement flickering over those stony blue eyes. "She'd flip if she heard you talkin' nice about her like that."

The Northerner allowed a flash of teeth to show just before he strode forward, cautiously swinging his katana up to brace the dull back against his shoulder. "Don't tell her. Gotta keep her humble."

Ellis followed after him, moving with a little more energy as he caught up with, and came to flank, the older man. He snorted faintly, then shook his head. "I guess yer right. Plus, ain't like we got any bad folks tuh worry about, right? Even if there is another Angel or somethin' out there, they don't know us."

Nodding idly, Nick approached the gate to the privacy fence. He carefully tucked a digit under the latch, pulling it up to release the lock. "Yeppers." he agreed distantly, mostly focused on opening the gate just a crack. He tilted his head to peer out into the street.

The space in front of the condo was clear, it seemed. The roads collapsed down into low asphalt, dusted over with blown sand, and the houses set up on either side of it all had yards of varying sizes and clutter. Some had no fences - some just picket fences - some were so overgrown with unkempt shrubbery it was hard to see clear to the building itself.

He leaned through the gateway, allowing the door to swing open ahead of him, and got a look in either direction. A handful of infected were visible, stumbling along the roadway or leaning against cars and fences. He got the feeling there were more under the surface, though - some wandered in and out of his vision, clambering behind shrubs and buildings.

Disturbing them might bring a fair number down on them. It was their goal to avoid such conflict.

Ellis nudged up against his side, peering out alongside him and sliding his shotgun into his hands. His chin hovered just above Nick's shoulder, voice dropped to a whisper. "We can just sidle 'long the fence, get tuh the next house. We gotta check these garages fer some new wheels."
A nod touched Nick's head, even as he slid through the gate. He pushed himself against the fence, scanning their surroundings, keeping an eye on the infected wandering around, just in case. The Georgian carefully closed the gate behind them, latching it quietly before following in Nick's footsteps.

The two men moved at a tender walk, sliding the length of the privacy fence. As Nick drew up to the edge of it, he tipped his body to peek around the corner.

The house next to theirs was much shorter. It was on stilts, as well, but only a single floor made up the structure above the gap. Between the thick beams making up its legs was a shaded parking space, but there was no vehicle there.

A male zombie stood in an idle slump just a few feet away, hands up and clawing at its own face, back to Nick. Little agitated snarls left it, on and off, weight wavering forward and backward until it seemed it might stumble - or fall flat to the ground. Exactly what it was doing was hard to tell from behind, though a sickening squelch didn't speak to anything pleasant.

Nick craned his head to confirm it seemed isolated - then held up a hand carefully, indicating Ellis should stay. He didn't wait for confirmation, just grasped his katana with both hands and started moving. His footsteps were muffled on the scrubby lawn and even as he crept close, the infected remained focused on its work.

It pulled a hand away from its face with a jerk, and Nick just barely glimpsed a fleshy, grey-black mess of flesh gripped in its fingers before he acted. Swiveling his wrist, he ground his teeth together to focus, letting the katana shift back - then arc forward, driven by a step that put his body-weight into it.

The blade barely stuttered as it struck just beneath the zombie's hairline. It sliced effortlessly into - through - and then out of the creature's neck, separating it from its body entirely. The infected jolted with the impact, but it was dead before it could do more than inhale to growl. Its body shuddered, then collapsed slowly to its knees, head toppling to the dirt.

Nick raised his brows and drew the blade vertical in front of himself, gazing over the now-gory edge, moderately impressed. He'd seen Brenda work with it, but it was different handling it himself.

"Pretty big improvement from a crowbar." he admitted in a low voice, lowering the katana and turning to glance back at Ellis. The Georgian was peering around the corner of the fence at him, and his expression was oddly pinched. If it hadn't been for the faint redness creeping up his face, Nick might've not decrypted the look.

Huh. Kid's checking me out.

A smirk crossed his lips at the realization, swinging the katana at his side thoughtfully. He shouldn't have been shocked the kid would be fascinated by the blade, but it came as a surprise to discover his wielding it would bring such a reaction.

Ellis darted to join him, gaze swiveling up to look for any more danger in the yard, still holding tight to his shotgun. He cleared his throat a little, shaking his head as if he could shake off his embarrassment. "Yeah... Ain't no car here, though. Should we look inside?"

Still smirking, head now adopting a tilt, Nick had to carefully mull over whether or not to let his discovery pass without comment. He settled for reaching up a hand, thumbing against the neck of his dress shirt to ensure the opening of his undone buttons was sprawled just right over his chest.
"No car probably means nobody was here, or they took everything and left. If we scout all these buildings, we'll be hours." Despite the intense self-satisfaction purring to life in his chest, Nick allowed his face to level out, eyes lifting to scan around them. "I don't think we're gonna find supplies here. Better off looking for a car and driving around, look for a store."

Frowning just a little, Ellis glanced up toward the house they'd come in front of. "Okay... if yuh say so."

Nick couldn't help a brow from arching, shifting his katana into his other hand so he could reach out and slip a palm against Ellis' waist. The kid jumped at the touch, blinking as the gambler guided him to turn around. "Your confidence astounds me."

The younger man's lips parted, and he might've had a response had a strange and heightened squall not wailed out from somewhere down the road. Its source was hard to pick out, echoing a bit amongst the buildings surrounding them, though Nick felt confident it was originating from off to the right.

Ellis must have had a similar sense, because they jolted in unison to flatten against the side of the privacy fence.

It was cautiously that Nick passed Ellis the katana. The Southerner took it quickly, though with a confused glance. His unvoiced question was answered when Nick drew the sniper rifle off his shoulder and into his hands. He passed carefully around Ellis, keeping close to the barrier that protected them from the Spitter, stepping back up against the corner.

Nick got himself aligned with the edge, straightening the sniper rifle and bracing it on his shoulder. He took a deep breath, focused, before sliding himself a half-step to the side. He turned his body enough to look back down the road, eyes darting around to hunt for that neon green splatter.

All he saw was regular infected, stumbling around in dizzy staggers.

A frown touched his lips, shifting his hands on his rifle. "Don't see it." he hissed out of the corner of his mouth, feeling Ellis slide up close to his back and come close to hear his lowered voice. "Let's cross the yard. Next house has a garage."

"Okay." was whispered near his ear, and they slipped away from the fence, moving low across the ground to make it to the other side of the lawn.

The next house was a duplex, split straight down the center. The building was wide enough for a single-car garage on either side, squat stairs leading up to a door that was mirrored on either end. The two lawns were separated by a squat line of grassy bushes, and the two men slipped over them with lengthened steps.

The garage doors had paneled windows in the center, and Ellis carefully slunk up toward them, pushing his arm into the strap of his shotgun so he could get both hands on the katana. He drew onto his toes to peer in through the plastic panel, surveying the inside of the garage.

Nick swiveled on his heels slowly, still attentive for signs of the Spitter creeping up on them. "Anything?" he murmured over his shoulder, eyeing an infected that shambled out from behind a building across the street. It stumbled down to a knee, bloodying its skin on the asphalt, but shortly crawled back to its feet.

It might have seen them had it not turned, wandering down the street with a tired and boneless loll of its head. The gesture upset its balance, sending it staggering again. Its arms surged forward in a weak attempt to counter the movement, hands bereft of a few fingers, leaving only congealed stumps.

There was such variance in their behaviour. Sometimes Nick felt they were being hunted - yet other times, the infected seemed almost oblivious. Like if they weren't riled, they just... deteriorated.

"Nah." Ellis negated in a whisper, padding to do the same to the other garage door. "I thi--"

As his face slipped up to peer through the slatted window, something slammed into the garage door. It rattled and shuddered, furiously, and a muffled shrieking echoed from inside. Ellis outright jumped, scrambling back a foot or two, but he managed to only vocalize a stifled gasp of surprise.

The sounds the trapped infected made were enough, though, and Nick's head perked at the sounds of growls and snarls from their surroundings. A few came from down the road, but a few came from around the back of the house. They were inquisitive, but not quite enraged yet. "Shit. C'mon."

The gambler bolted for the next block, pulling his rifle against his hip. Ellis was quick on his heels, and they ran across the lawn, slipping past a dark purple butterfly bush that separated the two properties. They slid behind it, pressing up against the thin branches and delicate blooms protruding in conelike clusters.

While Nick leaned his head to look back and watch as a couple infected sprinted into the lawn behind them, attracted to the garage door, a frown touched his lips. They gathered around the door, snarling as the trapped infected gave another frustrated shriek from inside.

One of them stepped up and started beating against the metallic surface, thundering palms and knees against the door as if they could break it down. It seemed less like an attempt to rescue the infected locked in the garage, and more just mindless rage at the disturbance, vented at anything nearby.

"We're gonna have to deal with 'em on the way back." Ellis whispered to him, hesitantly.

Nick sighed under his breath, turning his head to glance at the kid. "Yeah." Between the two of them, they had about twenty shots. It was far from ideal, but as long as they didn't run into a horde, it would do. "Let's keep moving, Ace."

He shouldered his sniper rifle again, reaching out to pry the katana from Ellis' fingers. The younger man faintly put out his lower lip - but relinquished it, and they carefully advanced along the lawn.

The house directly next to them was another with no closed garage, and no car. The lawn was mostly cracked concrete, weeds growing up between the slabs and from the breaks in the material. They made it halfway across before an infected wandered out from behind the building, snarling. Its yellowed eyes latched onto them, and it gave a throaty shriek.

As its arms flashed out, fingers in claws, and it sprinted toward them, Nick readied the sword. He held it more like a baseball bat than a proper sword, flexing his fingers to ensure a tight grip. "C'mere, bitch." he spat out as the infected came within reach.

One downward slash across its center sheared it in half from clavicle to mid-chest. Its momentum continued carrying it forward, almost sliding along the blade, slamming into the blade guard and then collapsing. The weight suddenly forced on him sent a spasm through his shoulder, and he growled at the pain, withdrawing a step as the infected tumbled to the ground in front of him.
It wasn't quite dead - not for a few seconds, still flinching and twitching despite that the wound had revealed the innards of its chest, all the way to its spine. Nick let his injured shoulder roll to shake off the pain, turning away to scan behind them.

He could still hear the infected scrabbling and snarling at the garage door, and nothing came running.

Ellis peered down at the zombie as it sputtered out blackened blood from its mouth, stilling with a struggling seize of its body. "Man, that's nasty." That made Nick snort faintly, glancing at his expression. It seemed more like morbid curiosity than anything else.

"Zombies - meet sword, get fucked. At least something good came out of this whole shitty situation." He swung the blade thoughtfully, wrist twisting a little to sling off some of the viscera stuck to the metal. As he spoke, his eyes darted up, scanning ahead of them. "Y'know, aside from all my debts getting wiped out, I guess."

The younger man blinked up to him, face flashing into something subtly embarrassed. He smiled a little, reaching up to thumb at his forehead, scratching his hairline. When he spoke, it was with the tiniest crack to his voice. "I, uh... I dunno. There're some other good things."

Nick wasn't paying attention.

His eyes caught on a dark, mossy green sedan parked messily on the sidewalk down the street - though 'parked' was a relative term. Its nose was pressed tight to a streetsign, grille crumpled and the sign bent forward. The collision must have been fairly low-speed, as the damage was minimal. More importantly, there was a corpse in the driver's seat, slumped against the steering wheel.

"Check that out." He lifted the katana, pointing toward the car. "Driver means keys."

Ellis startled a little, quickly looking up to see what he'd indicated. He nodded his head a little harder than necessary, hand lifting to grasp his capbill and lower it a bit over his eyes. "Uh - yeah. Hope they turned it off, though. Ain't got an easy way tuh get gas, or jump it. I mean, we could, I guess, but..."

He was babbling, voice over-energetic, and it was that odd reaction that made Nick halt a moment. He reversed his attention, musing over Ellis' words, and the bashfully gentle way they'd left him. Too gentle. Sincere.

Had that been flirtation? Had Ellis meant them? Sexual interest he could take, but this was different, and Nick wasn't sure how to react to it.

So he buried it.

"Yeah, because fate has been so fuckin' kind to us. Lady Luck's just sucking my dick lately."

Lashing the katana to hang at his side, Nick moved to stalk across the concrete, sending a glance down either direction on the road. "Let's keep moving, Overalls." There was a few infected scrambling around within eyesight, but more important was the lanky, bloated shape creeping across the street.

Flashes of acidic green dripped from its split maw, just a melted gash across its face, visible in profile as it was in the midst of turning away. Its arms and legs were too long and too thin, midsection bloated underneath the ragged remnants of what might have been a shirt, but was now soaked in congealed blood and plastered tight to its waxy skin.

It gave an almost thoughtful set of chirped squeals, crackling and whining. Its head moved in a birdlike fashion, scanning the street with a tilt and shift of its nearly boneless neck.

The creature was definitely hunting.

Before Ellis could even attempt to speak, Nick thrust up a hand, fingers flat in a halting gesture. The sounds tipped the younger man off even before the gesture, and he silently stepped to Nick's side, spying the Spitter with a wary expression. Wordlessly, the gambler reached back to grab Ellis' wrist, dragging him into motion.

They quick-stepped across the street, angling for the car. Ellis wrested his arm free and ducked around Nick, darting up to the driver's side door with cautious urgency. The older man turned as he did, resting the katana on the roof of the car so he could free his hands up to sling the sniper rifle into his hands.

He pressed the stock into his shoulder, tilting his head to look through the scope. He got the sights aimed squarely on the Spitter, aiming for its core. It was cautiously moving down the road, swaying left and right, and he followed it. He wasn't eager to shoot, leery of drawing more infected attention - but he was about as fond of Spitters as he was of Witches.

"Hurry up and check it out." he hissed lowly over his shoulder, harsher than he meant.

Ellis didn't respond initially, but he heard the gentle sound of the door latch clicking ineffectually, and a faintly cussed, "Shit." It was locked, Nick figured, and he was just about to take a step back and suggest they just move on, when something snarled.

Reflexively, Nick spun on a heel, just in time to see the look of horror on Ellis' face as the corpse inside the car jolted upright. Its eyes turned on them, blackened teeth bared and gnashing, and it was with a ferocious movement that it went face-first into the window.

Ellis and Nick both jolted back, startled, but the impact did nothing but smear viscous liquid on the glass. The infected seemed enraged by the discovery, lashing out a hand to grasp onto the steering wheel so it could throw more of its weight into its next slam. It did not grab the outer rim.

Its hand landed flat in the center of the steering wheel instead.

The horn started blaring, hollering on and off as the infected leaned more or less weight against it as it beat its face against the glass. The car's hooting was only just louder than the screams that rose up from the surrounding area, and the heightened, gurgling squeal of the alerted Spitter.

Lady Luck can actually suck my dick.
The Spitter spun around at the intermittent honking, arms splaying out in an aggressive posture. It screeched, voice gargling as its jaw worked limply. A shudder advanced up its body, rearing back, acrid green liquid gathering and foaming at its melted and disfigured maw.

It didn't get much further in the process when a blast penetrated through its torso, forging a messy hole through the slumped shape of its left breast. Green leached out as much as grey-black blood did, sizzling and crackling, and the agonized scream that left it was muffled by a hoarking spit.

The wound staggered it, and it ended up spewing acid only a few feet in front of itself, wheezing messily. The bullet must have breached its lung, because the very act of breathing sputtered bubbles through the hole in its chest.

A second shot punched through its neck, sending its head toppling to the side on the moorings of just a few inches of flesh. The Spitter collapsed, gouts of black and green liquids spurting from the orifices of its body - natural and newly-torn alike.

Nick couldn't resist a smirk.

His pleasure was shortlived, as infected came sprinting onto the street from all around. The group that had surrounded the garage door came en masse, and Nick quickly rotated to fire on them. He aimed for center mass, not quite trusting his aim - and limited bullets - to try for their heads.

The car horn gave one more bleating cry, extended and strained, before Nick heard breaking glass. The zombie's snarl suddenly came to a clearly audible level... then slip into a gargle, suddenly cut-off. Nick spared a quick look over his shoulder, ensuring the younger man had it under control.

Ellis had busted the window - likely with the butt of his shotgun - and was in the process of removing the katana from the infected's skull, unsheathing it from its head with a grimace. The zombie slumped forward, collapsing into the now-open window, eyes going glassy.

"We gotta get the goddamn car moving, or take these assholes out!" Nick shouted, returning his attention to his sniper rifle. "I'm gonna fucking need you in a sec'!" He quickly swung the other way, catching a zombie as it bolted across the road at them. His aim went awry from its chest.

"Yeah!" Ellis shoved a hand inside the broken window, reaching underneath the zombie's body and flicking the unlock switch on the door. A dull chu-chunk announced the doors unlocking, and the Georgian threw open the door.

The dead zombie slumped with it - but not all the way out, just sagged limply to one side. Ellis had to grab it by the wrist and yank it from the driver's seat, dragging it to the concrete. It hit face-first, the collision cracking unpleasantly and drafting a putrid scent up on the air.

Ellis flung himself into the car, shotgun clattering on his shoulder and katana tugged across his lap. He slapped a hand on the ignition, violent relief surging through him as he found the keys dangling there, and in the off position.

He inhaled, hard, holding his breath - and twisted.

The car chugged... stuttered... then grumbled to life. The gas meter read just a sliver, barely halfway between a quarter and empty, but it would get them out. "Nick!" he shouted, sliding the katana into the passenger seat so he could slam his door shut behind him. Broken glass tinkled with the gesture, and a slash of icy pain on his arm said it earned him a cut on his tricep.

He ignored it easily, grabbing the seatbelt and strapping it over his chest and pelvis, snapping the buckle into the latch.

The gunfire stopped, and Nick was abruptly opening the door and cramming into the backseat, throwing himself in with a hiss of pain. "Go!" he snarled, before he'd even fully yanked the door shut. Ellis spared a look into the rear view mirror, but it was set for someone shorter than him, and all he could see was Nick's half-furious expression.

He pushed on the brake and shifted the car into reverse, quickly gassing it, just a little too hard. The car fishtailed just a bit as it jerked back away from the sign, and Ellis thrust his head through the broken window to squint back and aim the car, palm to the top of the steering wheel.

The sedan jolted back, turning just a little to swing the nose to point more directly at the road. Ellis slammed on the brakes, roughly jerking it into drive, and he could hear Nick swear a split-second before something hit the back of his seat. It jostled with the impact, making him blink.

Judging by the grunt, that 'something' was Nick.

"Sorry!"

Ellis grasped the wheel with both hands, stomping on the gas. An infected collided with the back of the car, hands bashing against the trunk in the moment that the tires burnt rubber against the road, screaming ineffectually.

Then they caught traction, and the car jumped into motion. They roared down the street, catching a few infected in the middle of the road. Ellis crashed the car into them, rolling them over the hood with a set of meaty thuds. He flinched just a little, pushing his lips into a relived ‘o’.

If he glanced back through the open window, he could see infected still chasing after them, but the car easily outpaced them.

"You okay, Nick?" he asked over his shoulder, faintly abashed. The gambler grunted noncommittally, but his tone was distinctly agitated, so Ellis put on an apologetic tone. "Didn't mean tuh -"

Abruptly, Nick reached out and grasped the shoulder of his seat, leaning in to hover his face into the front cabin of the car. "I'm fine. Focus." he chided, dryly, raising his other hand to point ahead. There was a side road that cut between two condos. "Take a right. We've got to backtrack to the main road, find a store."

Ellis obeyed, cranking the wheel into the turn and then allowing his palms to rasp against the steering wheel's leather as it returned to its original position. The sedan took the turn a little fast, forcing him to tap the brake as they drew onto the thin strip of asphalt that led them onto the next block in the sprawling grid of condos.

"Okay. We gotta be careful not tuh get lost, though."

The gambler shrugged a shoulder limply, leaning in closer to stare through the windshield. "Just keep going straight. I'll watch road signs." His eyes ticked along the road, watching carefully as they broached through the sidestreet and came to the next road. A few new infected sprouted from their surroundings, sprinting toward them, but Ellis merely turned onto the road and gunned it to escape them.

He slowed upon straightening the car out, left foot nervously tapping against the floorboards. They rumbled on down the road, Ellis steering them carefully around some clutter spread on the ground, mostly scattered fencing where something had broken down a picket fence. "Ain't got too much gas. Maybe we can siphon from the car back home."

Nick hummed his assent, though distantly. "Worry about it later, Overalls." He shifted on the seat, leaning forward so he could rest his entire elbow on Ellis' seatback, draping himself against it.

Nodding, Ellis nipped at his tongue, sneaking a glance at Nick out of the corner of his eye. A frown threatened at his lips, faintly. Was Nick being short with him, or was it his imagination? Nick was so often curt it was hard to tell the difference, and hard to tell when it was his fault.

Had it started with what he'd said earlier, or was he over-thinking?

A thin shape slammed onto the hood of the car, coiled on all fours. It startled Ellis so strongly that he jerked the wheel, swerving them to the right just a few feet before he righted them. Through the windshield, the crouched infected lifted its head to gaze right at him, sharp teeth glinting between abused lips. He couldn't hear the snarl through the windshield, but he saw its mouth move.

Darting one hand over his shoulder to grab firmly onto Nick's shirt, fingers coiling in the collar, Ellis braced him there and slammed on the brakes.

The gambler might've toppled again were it not for Ellis' grasp, and even with it, he was forced to latch one hand onto the seat and the other on Ellis' wrist. The sudden stop sent the Hunter rolling forward off the hood, hitting the ground like so much dead weight.

It rolled far enough ahead to be visible on the road, and it flipped itself back onto all fours in a catlike twist. If it had been damaged in the impact with the street, it didn't let on. The Hunter jerked its chin up to stare at them, coiling up as if preparing to leap.

So Ellis gassed it.

The infected tried to jump away, but all the gesture did was turn it to the side. When the sedan's nose struck it, it rolled easily under the wheel. The car jolted with a wet kind of impact as the Hunter was crushed into the concrete. Ellis couldn't help but stick his head out of the window, peeking back at it.

The corpse didn't show any signs of moving. "Damn, that was -"

"Eyes on the road." Nick grunted faintly, pushing palms against the back of Ellis' seat so he could yank himself free of the younger man's grip. He slid into the backseat, perched in the center, legs splayed to either side in a sprawl. "Can we not monster truck this thing around? I'd like to not break it within five goddamn minutes of finding it. Or me."

Jutting out his lower lip a little, Ellis refocused forward. He let Nick go without a fight, instead lifting that hand up to straighten the rearview mirror so he could see out of the back window. "Well, shit, Nick. Yer welcome tuh drive. That, or put yer dang seatbelt on."

The gambler gave a vaguely dismissive exhale, adjusting himself so the sniper rifle wasn't pressing into his back. "Or you can just avoid Tokyo Drifting us into a fucking wall."

Frowning thoroughly now, Ellis gripped his fingers on the steering wheel, eyes squinting a little as he kept his eyes on the road. "I didn't do nothin' like that." He didn't know why they were arguing - but worse than that was how he couldn't stop himself. " Anyway, we're fine, ain't we? You rather I let that Hunter crawl on in here?"

"God, please." Nick muttered, sarcastically, and it was all Ellis could do not to hit the brakes and round on him.

Instead, he just slumped down an inch in his seat, brows wringing into a knot. He chewed at the inside of his cheek, working together a retort, but didn't quite make it before the older man was abruptly sighing. It was long-suffering and almost rasped out.

Ellis flicked a glance up in the rearview mirror. Nick's face was just visible as he flung his head back against the seat, closing his eyes. There was a strangled frustration there, and Ellis quickly looked away before the gambler caught him looking.

"Just tired, kid. Can we focus on what we're doing?"

The Georgian's frown turned thoughtful, dropping one arm to his lap, hand just grasped onto the bottom of the steering wheel. It wasn't quite an apology, but Nick wasn't very good at those. As much as Ellis wanted to believe the sudden shift in mood hadn't been related to him, it wasn't like they'd expected their mission to go smoothly.

And, for the most part, it actually had - they'd found a car and gotten on the road with relative ease.

That just left him and what he'd said, and the thought of that was worrisome enough that he outright shook it off. A thin inhale steadied him, and he nodded his head, despite the fact Nick probably wasn't looking. "Alright." he agreed, tone catching toward something a little contrite, falling silent afterwards.

He'd give Nick the benefit of the doubt. He was likely just being insecure; it wasn't like he'd been very emotionally stable the last few days. The last thing he wanted to do was overreact and start a fight where there wasn't one.

He could only hope there wasn't one.
Chapter 136

Following the road down until it hit a main roadway fed them straight into the arms of a small shopping complex. It was a squat L-shaped structure, split into segments but all snug under a contiguous, grey-green slatted roof. Ellis carefully applied the brakes, squinting through the windshield at the parking lot in the center.

It was almost empty - of cars, anyway. One Jeep sat in the middle of the lines, angled awkwardly, collapsed on slashed tires.

Zombies, on the other hand, littered it liberally.

Most of them were sitting or laying prone on the ground, but a number were wandering around, slumped and staggered. At a glance, there was over a dozen, maybe fifteen. There were probably more just out of sight, like cockroaches.

Risking a glance over his shoulder, Ellis watched as Nick leaned forward, hovering between the two front seats again. They'd been mostly silent since tension had broken out, so it took a faint clear of his throat to coax himself to speak. "Uh - you wanna take the sword back? You lead, I'll get yer back with muh shotgun. Save shots, if we can."

The gambler nodded, reaching around the seat to grab the katana from where it sat in the passenger seat. He dragged it into his lap, gripping the handle with one hand, and shrugged out of the strap of the sniper rifle so it slid down onto the seat next to him. With it safely leaned against the far door, he opened the door next to him and stepped out.

Ellis shifted the car into park, turning the ignition and retrieving the keys. He shoved them into the left pocket of his coveralls, alongside his pocketknife and - though he tried not to think on it - the coil of condoms. His right pocket was reserved for the shotgun shells he had left, though their number was thinning.

He exited the car after Nick, wielding his shotgun low, and the two men took up a careful stance. With Nick in front and Ellis a few steps back from him, they jogged over the sidewalk that separated them from the parking lot. The Northerner got his hands on the katana, swirling the blade in the air with careful torque.

Their approach got noticed by one singular infected. It lurched off the ground from where it had been sitting almost cross-legged, a ferocious anger distorting its sallow features, and shrieked. The noise roused up the other infected in something of a wave, awareness spreading like a contagion. They sprinted across the parking lot, fury and rage packed tight into the bloodied, greying bodies of what had once been humans.

Nick was ready.

The first few infected came at him, and he drew the katana in a weighty slash at chest-height, meeting two of them as they lurched forward. The blade cut neatly through the first infected, splitting ribs, but as it struck the second, it caught. He'd lost momentum, and the zombie's sternum halted the blade with a raspy crunching sound.

The infected itself was shortly dead regardless, but Nick had to put up a foot and kick its body off the blade, snarling as he wrenched it free. It took enough time and effort to allow more infected to reach them, and Ellis stepped around Nick, shotgun set against his hip.
He blasted the nearest in the gut, punching a hole through its midsection in a way that crumpled it and sent it staggering backwards, as if it had been kicked in the stomach. He raised the shotgun for the next one, catching it right in the face, and the blast ruptured the top half of its head like a rotted-out watermelon.

Nick surged back upright, extending the katana forward to meet an infected as it raced for him. The blade slid through its body, seated in deep by the zombie's own momentum, but it barely even reacted to the wound. The infected came closer, sliding itself along the blade, arms outstretched and teeth working on spittle-soaked air.

It was with a growl that Nick jerked the blade, yanking hard to one side. It burst through the zombie's body in a lateral swipe, tearing out the fleshy remnants of black and wilted organs as it went, and that was enough to send the infected sagging backwards, dead.

Nick kept the movement going, twisting to capture the momentum and circle it back, striking the next infected just below the chin. Its head lopped off with little ceremony, body continuing to walk a few steps before it went limp and tumbled to the asphalt. The gambler had to retreat a step or two to avoid the guttering spray from its neck.

The infected started coming too quickly for Nick to cut them down one-by-one. It became a matter of lunging forward and slashing with the blade, lopping off whatever limb was nearest to him - then dodging back, ducking his body away to give Ellis room to shoot ahead of him.

Though it required a constant walk backwards to keep in line with each other, the tactic chewed through the infected with relative ease. The zombies went down as fast as they approached, and it wasn't long until they'd reduced the cluster to a sprawled mess on the concrete, staining the parking lot.

Rolling his shoulders, loosening up the tension building up there, Nick couldn't resist slanting a glance toward his partner. He cut the smallest of smirks, raising the katana with a taut wrist. "Not too shabby, kid. It's almost like we've been doing this awhile."

Ellis didn't really respond, turning away with a lift of his chin. He lifted a hand up to shade his eyes - not seeming to recognize the ridiculous nature of doing so with a capbill already covering his face - and glanced around at the shopping complex.

Signs hooked up to the awnings announced the store underneath, and the mechanic read them carefully, lips pursing into a thoughtful pout. Beyond one or two spaces up for lease, there was a salon, an electronics store, a squat local post office, and two restaurants, a Chinese takeout place and a diner.

"Them food places might have some water." Ellis questioned, lifting a hand to indicate them. "Sometimes they got bottled water fer folk, right?"

The gambler gave a vague nod, leaning back on his heels and allowing a hand to stroke along his jawline. "Worth a shot. Some other fuck probably had the same idea, but hey. We're here anyway." When the Georgian merely nodded his head and started trotting across the parking lot, making his way toward the diner first, Nick had to tilt his head.

He was the one who'd asked to focus on their work, yet he hadn't really expected Ellis to stick to it. It didn't really feel like the cold shoulder, but close to it. He'd hurt the kid's feelings, it seemed. He'd have to deal with it eventually, but part of him was tempted to wait it out.
Nick exhaled silently, and followed, lengthening his stride to catch up. Ellis was walking ahead of him at a pace that led Nick to believe he wasn't in the mood to wait for him.

It frustrated him - but it also stirred a little amusement somewhere.

They crossed the parking lot, stepping up onto the concrete that lined the structure's inner edge. The diner had chintzy plaid curtains inlaid on the windows, blocking their view inside, but the door was cracked half-open on a wedged doorstop. Ellis approached it warily, shotgun held low, using the heel of his boot to kick the door open all the way.

The door dragged the doorstop along with a rubbery scuffing sound, halting at a wide swung angle. Sunlight streaked in through the doorway, lighting the way into the restaurant, and Ellis froze with a visible stiffening. He didn't, however, move to raise his weapon, or lunge back - so Nick merely stepped up close behind the Georgian, tilting to look over his shoulder.

The diner was lined with booths on either side, a cheery vintage aesthetic layering the place with a gaudy red-and-white colour scheme. Subway tiles lined the floor, and a strip of smaller ones encircled the room at chest-height. It would have felt claustrophobic and cramped on a regular day.

That day, the feeling was heightened by the gut-wrenching smell of blood.

In the center of the room, piled like so much garbage, was a clump of corpses. Arms and legs were sprawled out, bodies lying atop each other in a messy array like they'd been thrown, one by one. They were not zombies, that much was clear; though they'd begun to rot and bloat, the greying skin, feral yellow eyes, and grey-black tint to their blood was missing.

They also hadn't been killed by zombies. Though there was rust-red blood smeared over most of them, the stark holes through torsos and limbs made the passage of bullets easy to note.

None of that was the worst of it.

The worst of it was the foot or hand jutting out from the pile, here or there, mixed in amidst the others. Tiny, fragile limbs. Hands barely bigger than Nick's palm. Feet shoed in small sneakers. A little face caught in the light, cheeks shallow, eyes open and glassy.

Nick's spine felt like ice - like he'd frozen from the neck down, and if he moved he might shatter.

He moved anyway, though it almost hurt to force his joints into motion. He slipped a hand up, crooking it around Ellis' face until he could catch fingers on his jaw, and pulled. He drew Ellis into a turn to face away from the sight - to face him, instead.

There was pain on the Georgian's features, and shock, frozen there. Nausea, maybe, and his gaze was distant like he couldn't see past the image printed on his eyes. Nick held his hand there, silent, until Ellis' eyes slowly met his. The younger man's blues flickered over his face, and something in the way they softened told Nick that his expression betrayed him.

"Let's leave," he uttered, carefully, speaking through gritted teeth because the alternative was letting his jaw relax - and if he had, he might have retched. "Not worth it."

Slowly, the gesture stuttered, Ellis nodded against Nick's palm. He started to walk away, but when the step was so limp that he almost stumbled, Nick dropped his hand and let his arm slip over Ellis' shoulders. The gesture pulled him close, and the younger man leaned into the embrace, eyes low.
They didn't speak, walking past the diner, and past an empty for-lease section.

It wasn't until they'd stepped in front of the electronics store that Ellis broke the silence. He did so quietly, just a mumble, confusion seeping into his voice to overtake the unsteady fear. "... Whut do you think - ... Who shot 'em?"

Nick allowed his arm to slip away, fingers just brushing down the younger man's back, palm lingering over the bunch of his coveralls at the base of his spine. He kept a frown from sprouting on his face - choosing, rather, to look ahead of them, gaze scanning around as if to hunt for danger.

"I don't know." he stated, flatly, because he didn't.

He didn't want know what kind of person would gun down a crowd of people - adults and kids alike - and stack them up like junk. Even amongst all the types of people he'd known, the drifters and deadbeats, the robbers and grifters, the cheats and murderers...

Did it even ring like the Angels? Jerry, sure. Maybe even Brenda. Chris? He wasn't so sure.

Ellis' head shook, and pain entered his voice, tone trembling. "There were kids, Nick. They was just lil' ones." Nick slipped a glance back at Ellis' face, and the brunette was frowning, eyes mostly hidden under his capbill. It wasn't like he didn't understand - he did. There was a thorn of nausea implanted at the base of his skull.

He wanted a cigarette and a few fingers of whiskey and wanted, more than anything, out of the fucking mess that had become of what used to be reality. Wanted to wake up and find out it was all a dream, and he could go back to his life, go back to something normal.

"Don't think about it, Ellis." Drawing a step away and relinquishing his grip on Ellis' coveralls, Nick tightened his fingers instead on the handle of his katana, letting an inhale swell his chest. "We didn't do it. There's nothing we can do now. Alright?"

The Georgian's chin lowered, gazing almost down to his boots.

"Plenty of people have died. Seeing it or not seeing it doesn't change it. We've just gotta keep moving." Nick wasn't sure if he was saying it for Ellis' benefit, or his own.

Something trembled up Ellis' body, like a shudder - but when he raised his head again, there was only dull sadness in his eyes. He mumbled, "'M sorry."

That made Nick's brow raise, but he stepped ahead, turning his gaze on the electronics store. The front door was closed, but the glass had been entirely busted out, shattered on the ground. He stepped carefully up to it, reaching out a hand to grasp the handle. "Why? It's fucked up. Don't blame you for getting -"

His hand didn't make it.

"That ain't whut I'm apologizin' for." Ellis' surged out to grab his wrist, thumb catching on the sleeve of his blue dress shirt. His voice was faint, and when Nick darted a surprised look toward him, his expression was melted into a forlorn distance. Something fragile leeched into his stone-blue irises, desperate. "... 'm sorry if - I... 'M sorry fer fightin' earlier. Can we be okay?"

God, those eyes kill me.

"I just... I want us tuh be okay." Ellis mumbled, releasing the other man's wrist as quickly as he'd grabbed it.
Nick looked away, because the alternative was to keep meeting Ellis' gaze, and he felt like if he did - he'd do something stupid. He'd been on the receiving end of looks like that, begging and pleading. They were usually hollow. His wasn't.

Sometimes he didn't know what to do with Ellis' sincerity, other than take advantage of it.

"Yeah, kid, we're fine." was what he said, gaze cut far to the left. "I'm not angry. I'm just an asshole, remember?"

Nick didn't expect it, but Ellis laughed. It was a snorted sound, barely exhaled, and it left an echo of a smile on his lips that was a strange companion to the sadness lowering his eyes. The younger man cocked his head - then nodded it, a little tiredly. "...Okay." His eyes forced themselves back up, gazing toward the electronics store reluctantly.

"I don't wanna hang 'round here anymore. Maybe we should just - find someplace else."

Nodding tautly, Nick released a breath he didn't realize he'd been holding. "Agreed. But I want to see if they have batteries in here for the flashlight. Last thing we need is to get left in the dark." When Ellis looked hesitant, the gambler assured him, "Just be a second."

Ellis assented with a blink, watching Nick reach again for the door handle and tug it open. Glass escaped the frame where it had shattered but hadn't quite been shaken loose, hitting the ground and splitting into fragments that sparkled in the sunlight like droplets of water. Nick stepped carefully over them, entering the store with his sword at the ready.

The store was dimly lit. The counter in the far corner had once held a cash register and a few small displays lined with trinkets and phone chargers, but it had all been tossed to the floor and left in piles. A corpse was bent over the counter in their place, a bullet hole splitting its face into messy fragments around what used to be a nose.

It, at least, was grey and warped with infection.

The walls were covered in racks, hooks jutting out. There were boxes of varying shapes and sizes hanging from them, all small - cellphone accessories and cables. The center of the store was taken up by stand-up racks, and they were mostly empty, stock tossed to the ground. It didn't surprise him to think people had ransacked it.

Nick inhaled sharply, a breath that soothed him. He lowered his voice to something sarcastic, stepping into the store to try and hunt for his prize. "Looters always go for the tech. Because flat-screen TVs and cellphones definitely come in handy in the fucking apocalypse." He heard a soft noise of acknowledgement from Ellis over his shoulder, and for a second, he wasn't sure if the Georgian would rise to the challenge of chatter.

He shouldn't have doubted Ellis.

"Yeah... I guess." It started slow, and remained a strange kind of tempered even as he gained momentum - but Nick felt a certain satisfaction, regardless. "Y'know... I ever tell you - this one time, Keith went tuh visit a buddy of his, who'd gone tuh college outta state..."

There was a knocked-over rack in the corner, and Nick bent down into a crouch, reaching underneath it to start dragging out boxes and examining their contents. "Someone you knew went to college?" he retorted, dryly, unable to resist.

He wasn't sure if Ellis ignored the sarcasm, or didn't catch it.
Yeah... name was - uh - Carl, I think. Anyhow... they had a football game or somethin', 'n' the home team lost. Big riot started. Keith came home with this big stereo set, and a concussion. The Georgian quietly stepped up to one of the walls, glancing through the items still left dangling from hooks. "Not from fightin' or nothin'... He was tryin' tuh get it in his truck, I guess, but it was real heavy. Fell right on him. I'm pretty sure he like, fractured his skull or somethin', but he never did get looked at. Guess he's okay, so..."

A little snort left him, faintly thoughtful. "Sucked extra bad 'cause he couldn't even fit the dang thing in his bedroom. Kinda weird watchin' TV 'n' playin' games with the audio playin' in the hall, but he's stubborn as a mule."

Nick caught a hand on a blister pack, turning it around. A set of tightly sealed D batteries stared back at him, and he couldn't resist a sigh. "Fuck yeah. Let there be light." Grasping the pack tightly, he pushed up to his feet, turning back to glance at Ellis. "Am I supposed to be shocked the guy has had a head wound?"

The younger man passed him a slightly crinkled look, head shaking. "Don't be mean, Nick."

Although he was tempted to rise to that, a faint smirk touching his lips, Nick was distracted by the way Ellis looked back at the wall and the box hanging just before his face. If he'd learned anything over their time together, it was what the Georgian looked like when he was thinking. Wheels ticked behind those eyes, but it was clouded this time.

Uncertain. Unconfident.

The smirk disappeared, and he approached. His voice tipped into a coaxing tone, a little low. "Got something?" Without waiting for a response, Nick let his gaze tick toward the box, narrowing eyes on it as he came close enough to read the text on the front.

It was a set of two-way radios.

Ellis glanced at him as he approached, brow quirked. "Is it a dumb idea? ... I know I'm bein' paranoid, I just... if we could contact each other, I..."

"Hell no." And Nick meant it, closing the distance between them and grabbing the box. He tore it off the hook, flipping it to examine the back. "That's a fucking great idea." Ellis brightened a little, scuffing the heel of his boot against the carpet. "Batteries included. 30 mile radius -"

"That probably ain't real true." Ellis interjected quietly, sliding one hand into the pocket of his coveralls. "Keith'n'I used these all the time when we were bite-sized... Never get the range they say."

Nodding, the gambler tucked the box under his arm, slipping a glance up toward the Georgian's face. Ellis was smiling a little now, seeming gratified, and Nick tipped his head to one side. "We'll test 'em out when we get back. Good catch, kid."

With his now-free hand, he reached up, setting his palm against the top of Ellis' head and pushing his cap down over his face. The younger man protested with a huff, but as he staggered a step away and reached up to straighten it back, he was almost grinning.

Almost.

"Let's get out of here." Nick suggested, and much as it might have been for Ellis' sake, he was just as glad to get some distance between them and the diner.
There was no comfort to be found in thinking that they'd all likely have died either way.
Chapter 137

As they stepped out from the electronics store, Nick forced in a breath. He glanced up toward the sky, squinting into the sharp light of the sun as it leaned out from behind a thick and spiraling plume of smoke. The temperature was rising, and he took a moment to unbutton and roll his sleeves up, baring his forearms.

It didn't really cool him off any, but it was the best he could do.

Ellis' footsteps crinkled over the glass at his flank, and Nick spoke without looking at him. "Let's go down the road. Pretty confident this is the same street that general store is on we went to earlier - we can get the shit we left behind."

"Okay." the other man agreed, quietly, advancing around him. He stepped off the sidewalk, a glance spared nervously toward the diner - but with a shake of his head, he focused ahead. "We gotta keep an eye out fer another store or somethin', though. Need water real bad."

Nick flipped his grip on the katana, holding it behind himself as he followed after Ellis. "Yeah. Just need something that hasn't been looted clean already." He exhaled a sigh, turning his head to squint down the road, measuring the danger posed by the scattered infected wandering the street - and looking for signs of a gas station or another shopping centre.

There was a clothing store a few blocks down, likely packed with swimming gear and tacky souvenirs. Hardly what they were looking for, but it wasn't impossible to think they'd have a beverage cooler near checkout. He hesitated to spend all day scrounging, but they needed to come back with something.

Got five people to keep sated now. If only the fucking power wasn't out...

As they approached the Jeep sitting in the center of the parking lot, Nick was startled out of his thoughts by movement. A lanky figure lurched up from where it had been hiding behind the car, crawling suddenly atop the cagelike structure of the Jeep's roof and giving a wet and rattled cough. Moving as if to retch, there was barely time to react before the Smoker lurched its upper body forward, and the fleshy tendril of its tongue came flying toward them. The sound it made as the tentacle unspooled from its gut was fleshy and slick and vile. It was aimed at Nick, shooting through the air with a strange rigid quality, like a spear.

In one reflexive movement, Ellis shoved out his arms, pushing Nick hard to the left and using the momentum of the force to throw himself to the right.

Nick stumbled hard, catching his weight just before he outright fell. The agitation at being knocked away was minor underneath the surge of relief as the tentacle shot past the both of them, extending a few more feet before suddenly tugging taut. It collapsed, losing whatever muscular force was keeping it aloft, and slapped to the concrete like so much tenderized meat.

The gambler looked up, raising a hand to point at the Smoker and opening his mouth to yell for his partner to shoot it.

He only got out, "El-", when the tongue suddenly jerked. It moved with snakelike accuracy, suddenly flopping itself against the concrete, swinging blindly to one side. It hit Ellis' boot, and started wrapping around his ankle with slick and constricting ease.
The Georgian tried to lift his gun and shoot, a startled yelp escaping him, but the infected was faster. It yanked, hard, the Smoker jerking backwards with the motion like it were reeling up a fish. It pulled Ellis' leg out from under him, sending him flipping end over end. When his leg thrust forward, his upper body counterbalanced backwards, and hit the ground first.

Skull met concrete, only buffered somewhat by his shoulders joining the collision. He might've had time to shout at the pain had the tongue not immediately started dragging him toward the Jeep, body skidding across the concrete.

Nick lunged forward, aware of the walkie-talkie box slipping out from under his arm. He spared just a beat to hope the sound of it clattering to the floor wasn't also the sound of them breaking - then sprinted along with the younger man, getting both hands on the handle of the katana and raising it to his shoulder.

He could only just keep up with Ellis as he was dragged across the parking lot, but Ellis wasn't his target. Narrowing his eyes, Nick aimed for the tongue where it lay taut against the edge of the Jeep's open-air roof, hefting the katana with a snarl.

The blade chopped through the tendril nearly clean. The few strands that remained snapped on their own, a thick mucous spilling from the rent flesh. Ellis skidded to a stop as the tongue was separated from its owner, halting just a few inches from slamming into the Jeep's belly.

The Smoker screamed, raspy and wheezed, fury launching its body across the Jeep's cage. The ruined end of its tongue flapped against its chin, a gaping mouth stuck wide open, and it lashed out grasping hands to claw toward Nick.

He swiped the sword through the air, retreating a step, and lopped off one of those arms at the elbow.

Although he'd thought the Smoker couldn't scream any louder, it did. It roared, wisps of foul-smelling smoke escaping on its breath along with a rotten scent, and suddenly the creature was throwing itself off the Jeep and running. The massive tumor that ballooned its head and shoulder turned its flee into a stagger, hobbling away, but its long stride helped it sprint away.

Nick was tempted to chase it, but a groan from the concrete distracted him. His gaze darted down to Ellis, where the younger man was laying flat, leg still wrapped up in the faintly twitching tongue. "Shit. You okay?"

Bending down to drop to a crouch, Nick reached down, grasping a hand against Ellis' cheek. The kid's expression was a little dizzied, but the touch made his eyes blink, and he looked up to meet Nick's gaze. "Y-yeah... Bumped muh head is all." He tenderly raised a hand, fingers spread, for a hand up.

Nick humored him, clasping hands and dragging the younger man to his feet. They both grunted with the effort, struggling a little as they came to standing. Nick caught the sight of red as he started to release Ellis' hand, and rather than let go, he torqued the younger man's arm to get a look at the other side.

He'd scuffed his elbow and tricep up, blood welling up from the abrasions on his skin from sliding along the concrete. The gambler frowned, circling to stand behind Ellis before the kid could do more than redder in discomfort at the attention, leaning down. His other arm had come out similarly wounded.

"Uh - Nick... 'm... okay, s'just a -"
It wasn't bad, but it drew an agitated breath out of Nick.

Ignoring Ellis' protest entirely, he grasped a hand on the mechanic's shirt, tugging it up. The scrapes to his back were much shallower, mostly protected by his shirt, but they were still there. Ellis practically yelped as the shirt was tugged halfway up his torso, quickly grabbing the front of it to yank it down. "Nick -"

Undeterred, Nick merely let go and refocused on his head. Reaching up to grasp a hand against the back of Ellis' neck, he pushed the younger man's cap up a little. He palmed against the crown of the kid's head, feeling there, and the Georgian hissed in pain at the contact. When Ellis recoiled, lurching forward to escape, Nick glanced at his palm.

There was a little blood there. Not much, for a wound to the scalp, but it was enough to grind in that sense of frustration. "Goddamnit. Fucking asshole," he muttered, wiping his palm against his hip. His dress shirt was stained to hell already, anyway. "Because you getting a concussion is definitely what we need."

Ellis lowered his chin faintly, but gave a hesitant half-smile - because Nick was glaring off in the direction of where the Smoker had disappeared to, and not at him. "I-I'm okay. I don't think it did no harm. Just hurt, is all." He lowered his gaze, startling a little as he noticed the tongue was still wrapped loosely around his leg.

He shook his foot, tossing it off with a grimace and taking a half-step away from it when it flopped weakly to the floor. "Let's just keep goin'. I can get cleaned up if we find some water."

It was with a weary sigh that Nick relented, turning to start back to the car with a certain irritation lining his posture. It was as he crossed near the flank of the Jeep that something caught his eye - he almost ignored it, but a whim had him stop and crane his head up.

There was a satchel in the back of the car, tucked in close to the seat. The car had likely been there through the storm the other night, but the satchel was a sleek canvas material and seemed to have survived mostly unscathed. A quirk touched Nick's brow, curious.

"... Hold up." he uttered, sliding back a step. He lifted a leg, catching a foot against the bumper of the car, and hauled himself up to stand. He bent himself into the cabin of the Jeep, scrabbling for a grasp on the satchel. His fingers found a handle sewn into the top, and he dragged it up - immediately startled at the weight.

When he buckled slightly, having made the bad choice to grab onto it with his bad shoulder, Ellis was suddenly beside him. They both hauled the satchel up and out of the car, grunting in unison as they carried it to the ground.

"What the heck..." Ellis muttered, confusion creeping into his voice. "Whut's in here?"

Nick shrugged, dropping to a crouch. He grasped the zipper set along the midline of the satchel, yanking it open. It caught halfway, but he forced it to open the rest of the way with an irritated jerk. Prying the satchel open, Nick leaned in to glance inside. The contents made him laugh - outright, really laugh, raising a hand to palm over his forehead.

Ellis leaned in, startled at his reaction, to get a look for himself. The satchel was filled mostly with a set of dumbbells, black metal gleaming dully in the sun. Trapped between two of the smaller ones, however, was a grey-black handgun. It'd been tossed in with little care.

Between rasps of laughter, the gambler buried his face into his hand, unable to wipe the grin off... his face. "Holy fuck. I can't tell if this is Deep South shit, or New York mob shit." He watched Ellis reach in and take up the gun, tilting it, eyes a little wide. "What the hell kind of -"

"Shit's loaded." Ellis observed, choking back a snort - then breaking into startled giggling. He couldn't help it; Nick's laughter was contagious, if only by virtue of the fact it was so rare. They both laughed with a kind of tension, high-strung and giddy with a stupid sort of release. "Who takes a loaded gun tuh the gym?"

Rubbing the bridge of his nose, laughter trailing into sigh, Nick shook his head heavily. "Kid, I wish I knew. Works for us though. Is there any ammo?"

At that, Ellis reached back into the satchel, pawing around. Though he initially shook his head, there was a side pocket zipped shut, and he crouched down to open it up. "Li'l bit, in here." he confirmed as he pulled out a palm-sized plastic case, tightly filled with bullets that fit into little holstering notches molded into the plastic.

"Neato." The gambler reached out to take the handgun, double-checking the safety before sliding it into his thigh holster. "Finally get my Magnum back from Ro'."

The Georgian pocketed the bullets, tilting his head gently, a soft grin lingering at the edges of his lips. "We could take the weights, too. Bash some zombies with 'em and get all buff at the same time." He lifted his arm, flexing a bicep playfully - only to regret it when the motion sent a sting of pain over the scrapes along the backs of his arms. "... ow."

Nick snorted at him, straightening up. He gave the other man a dubious look, turning on a heel to walk over and retrieve the box of two-way radios from where it'd fallen. He gave the box a once-over, and it seemed to have survived the fall without more than a scuffed corner.

"Come on, kid. Let's split before that Smoker comes back."

He turned away, and Ellis was quick at his heels, plodding on with his shotgun cradled in his arm. The kid pressed a hand to the back of his head, feeling at the wound there with a wince. "Yeah. Jerk." he muttered, sounding legitimately spiteful of the creature.

Nick had to laugh.
Chapter 138

The drive back toward the general store was calm, relatively. Zombies couldn't keep up, and the roads were clear enough that it wasn't hard to swerve around the occasional wreck or toppled streetlamp that attempted to impede them.

Nick had taken over driving to let Ellis rest in the passenger seat. Whether Ellis thought he was fine or not, Nick wasn't about to give the wheel over to someone who might have had a concussion. Or, at the very least, was gently bleeding from the head and numerous patches of scuffed skin.

The Georgian had sulked for approximately two minutes, and then buried himself in examining the walkie-talkies. He'd gotten them out of the box, and was carefully turning one over in his hands. It was black plastic, with a tiny square readout on the face, a few buttons and a knob on the side.

It was hard for Nick to resist amusement when he spotted a Boomer in his sideview mirror - it came from behind a building, staring after them with an enraged kind of shudder, not even attempting to chase them down. "That's it, fatty. Take a load off."

He flicked a glance toward Ellis, but focused his gaze on the road shortly afterwards. The younger man seemed alright, though he was paying very close attention to the radios in an unusually quiet way. I expected him to start babbling about how he and Keith chatted on them while doing their nails.

An exhale parted his lips, shrugging back against his seat. Normally, silence wouldn't bother him.

Right then, he was actively trying not to let his mind's eye resurrect images of that tiny, delicate face. He supposed they'd been lucky not to run across dead kids up until now, but it didn't make it any easier. Part of him felt hatred of whoever had shot them down.

Another part felt self-hatred.

Why do shithags like me get to make it, while some little kid gets gunned down? While all these fuckers turn? Why me at all? Why any of us?

Despite himself, his fingers were tightening on the steering wheel. He took in a heavy breath, holding the oxygen in his lungs until it burned a little. He wished Ellis would just start talking, so he didn't have to say something, or admit he needed a distraction - but he wasn't, so Nick took it into his own hands.

"Ever wonder why we aren't sick?"

The Georgian lifted his head, blinking gently. He turned his chin up to examine the older man, lower lip jutting just a little. "Ro' said CEDA wasn't real sure, remember? And it don't really matter, I guess. We ain't, so..."

Nick shook his head, sighing faintly. "I get that. I mean, why? Because we ate our veggies? Drank enough milk?"

That made Ellis frown a little, though more thoughtful than anything else. He set the walkie-talkies down on his lap, shrugging his shoulders. "I dunno. I mean, it ain't like you get sick every time you get exposed tuh viruses, right? Sometimes yer body fights it off. Maybe it's like that - maybe we fought it off, so we're immune."
"Us out of hundreds of thousands of people? Maybe more, for all we know?" Nick tightened his grip on the steering wheel, flexing his knuckles as he did, eyes drifting along the road ahead of them. Infected screamed at the car as they passed by, giving chase, but it didn't take long for them to lose sight of the car and give up.

"Why us, and not these fucks?"

Ellis' frown deepened softly, and he shifted in his seat. A wince touched his face as the motion ground his injuries against the fabric of the cloth seats, but he got himself straightened up from his previous slump. "... I ain't sure, Nick. Just is."

The gambler exhaled, with some reluctance. He released one hand from the steering wheel, letting it fall to set on his thigh, tapping out a frustrated pattern against his slacks. He wanted to relax, wanted to feel less - or at least just feel angry, instead of the convoluted set of emotions in his chest. "Yeah. I know."

Reaching out a hand, Ellis slowly and delicately touched fingertips onto the older man's wrist. It was just a tap, just a brush, but it lingered a moment. "You okay?" Nick didn't pull back, and that startled Ellis. He frowned softly, starting to settle his hand more completely down onto the older man's forearm.

He didn't quite get the chance.

"What the fuck?"

Nick braked, suddenly, and the car jolted with the abrupt motion. Ellis instead thrustet that hand forward to catch himself on the dash, blinking rapidly, gaze flinging forward. He didn't see what Nick was referring to at first - then he did. There was a slumped shape in the roadway, like a pile of meat, fleshy and pink.

The damage to it was visible even from the distance they were at. It had been ripped into, hunks of flesh taken out of it until bone was visible through its skin. It was damage that Ellis knew, and remembered. He could tell, even from there.

"... Whoa. It - That's that Tank from earlier... from the pawn shop." Ellis leaned forward, staring through the windshield, eyes going wide. "Whut's it doin' out here?"

"Maybe it was just wandering, and bled out?" Nick slowly returned both his hands to the steering wheel, allowing his foot to ease off the brake. He rolled the car forward, easing them along the road. As they approached the corpse, Nick turned himself to lean out of the window, gazing at the fallen Tank as it passed.

He couldn't help but notice a few bullet holes through what remained of its broad back. Had he shot it? He couldn't remember actively aiming at it, but he'd been firing half-blind into the horde. A stray bullet or two could've reached it.

He dismissed the observation.

"Whatever... At least we know it's dead." He shifted his foot to the accelerator, pulling away and continuing along the road. "Tempts me to drive over to the pawn shop and go spit on that bitch's body." Ellis shot him a glance, mouth quirking in a displeased gesture. Nick had to quickly wave fingers up off the steering wheel to assuage him. "I'm kidding. Christ."

His eyes squinted, narrowly. Mostly.
"I don't wanna go back there." Ellis softly leaned back against his seat, eyes blinking as he gazed ahead. "Ain't that the store?" he questioned, raising a hand to point. Nick followed his indication, and sure enough, he could pick out the yellow spraypainted warning that sprawled over the front of the general store they'd ransacked the previous day.

"Yeah." Nick grabbed the bottom of the wheel, directing the car to sidle up against the sidewalk. His eyes flickered to the rearview mirror, noting a few infected straggling along behind them, sprinting down the street. "Got a few fans on our ass. You ready?"

A noise of assent left Ellis. He pushed the radios onto the center console between his chair and Nick's, and retrieved his shotgun from the floorboard, clapping his palm against the pump. If the gesture hurt him, he disguised it. "Let's do it."

The sedan pulled to align with the general store, and Nick threw the shift into park and yanked the keys out in a swift motion. Ellis was already leaping out of the car by the time Nick joined him, and the gambler swept his blade into a readied stance, stalking back along the length of the car.

The infected came in a scattered line, some splitting off to charge at Nick, a few making a run for Ellis.

"I got you fuckers." With a heavy step, Nick met the first one with a quick cut to the neck, splitting it off just above the shoulders. He dodged the body as it fell toward him, wincing as something warm and wet hit his cheek despite his efforts, but he didn't have time to dwell before the next one was on him. "Watch it, Ellis!"

The Georgian was ready for his, blasting straight at hip-level. The spray struck two at once, sending them to the ground, gargling - but they weren't dead. They clawed and scratched at the ground, trying to get leverage to get back to their feet despite the guts spilling out of their midsections.

He backed up rather than spend the time to deal with them, as a third came sprinting toward him, stomping straight over its fallen fellows. Its heel went right against the left one's skull, crushing it down into the concrete, and it stopped moving.

Ellis greeted it with a blast to the face, and it flew back, flattening to the ground with the force applied to its upper body. He blinked a little, taking a step back, looking down as the corpse landed atop the remaining infected.

It shrieked, surging against the weight, furiously.

His head tilted, watching Nick gut the last infected on his side with a swipe to the midsection. The gambler gave a wrinkle of his nose at the gore, turning his chin away, and shook the katana off idly at his side.

"Nick, can you -?" Ellis gestured down to the trapped zombie with the nose of his shotgun. The older man looked over - then down, eyeballing the infected trying to crawl its way out from under the zombie that had landed on it, scraping its own wounds even wider.

A snort left Nick, turning to step over. He barely glanced down to aim his sword before catching it against the back of the zombie's neck and pushing, hard... but he didn't look as he did it. His eyes cut to Ellis' face, catching his gaze. "Gotta do your dirty work, huh?"

Ellis crinkled his nose at him, bewildered - and by the time he pulled together a vaguely baffled, "I didn't wanna waste shots!", he realized Nick had already ended the infected. Putting them down like that was never really the same as killing them in the heat of battle. Maybe Nick had intentionally kept his attention.

The gambler chuckled under his breath, drawing his blade back up and turning away. He reached his free hand into his pocket, retrieving the keys for the car. "Let's get ready to get the rest of the supplies."

He stepped around the sedan, aligning himself with the trunk. He'd open it and clear it of any clutter so they could come back with their arms full. Pushing the key into the lock, he twisted, palming against the metal to shove the trunk door open. His eyes flicked down to examine the compartment.

"I wanna look over in that medicine section." Ellis prompted, stepping up to the side of the car and leaning against it slightly. "We're hopin' tuh find a brace fer Coach's knee, or somethin'... I don't remember seein' nothin' but -"

Nick wasn't paying the slightest attention to him. His eyes were riveted on the contents of the trunk.

It was an ice box. Blue hard plastic, ribbed along the edges, with a handle folded down near the belly. It was sizeable, like one might take on a vacation - pack it with ice and drinks and not worry.

He held his breath, tongue pressed flat to the roof of his mouth, afraid to even inhale lest he jinx himself. It was with unsteady fingers that he reached out and palmed against the front of it. He pushed, just delicately, testing the weight.

It fought him, and the slight nudge he gave it caused a sloshing sound.

"Holy shit." he uttered, voice going raw with disbelief. Ellis startled at his outburst, blinking, but it took him a moment to round the distance between them and take in what Nick had found. In the meantime, Nick grasped a thumb under the lid, pushing it open.

The cooler was dangerously close to overflowing, every bit of ice having long since melted. Floating in the clear water was a jumbled up mess of cans and bottles, sodas and bottled water alike. At a rough glance, he'd have estimated fifteen or so of either type.

Ellis' jaw dropped as he stepped to Nick's side, but he didn't get so much as a word in before Nick lunged for him.

He didn't even know why. Maybe he just felt so fucking relieved - like they'd come off the brink of something disastrous - or maybe it was just the final release of that tension he'd felt since the diner. He moved without considering his actions, grabbing a hand under Ellis' chin and tugging him into a kiss.

It wasn't soft. Nick nipped at the younger man's lips, plying them apart so he could link their mouths deeply. He ravished that warm mouth, catching Ellis so off-guard he felt a startled snort of air leave his nostrils, puffing against his face.

Ellis reacted before long - he leaned into it, pushing back, teeth catching in a gentle bite on Nick's tongue. The scrape of teeth drew a growl out of the Northerner, appreciative.

It was with a lengthy and slow suction that Nick drew back, parting from him. He let his eyes flicker over the Georgian's face, and he wished he could have taken a picture of that lost look and warm redness all over the other man's expression. A smirk darted over his lips, dropping his hand from Ellis' chin.
Ellis looked up at him with a kind of melted, hazy interest. "... h'uh?" he queried, almost bemused, and Nick couldn't resist widening that smirk. The kid wasn't parsing a word, and if that didn't stroke his ego...

"O-oh. Yeah." It clicked, then, and Ellis twisted his head to glance down in a nearly shy gesture, lips twitching in and out of a smile. He babbled softly. "Man, that's real lucky. Even got all that melted ice tuh drink, too, 'n' use fer cleanin' stuff. Sure am glad we found this car."

The older man chuckled, turning back toward the trunk. He kept an eye on Ellis' face, enjoying the way the other man had to put himself back together - but the rest of his attention was focused on re-sealing the icebox, snapping the lid back on tightly. He placed a palm against it, pushing, nudging it tight in a corner of the trunk to free up space.

"Shit, I shouldn't be this thrilled about a goddamn icebox." he muttered, head shaking faintly. He stepped back from the trunk, gesturing with the katana toward the general store. "Let's pack up what's left in the store and get the fuck back home."

Ellis nodded his head, slowly patting a hand down his front. He slung his shotgun onto his shoulder, walking across the sidewalk to step up to the doors of the grocery store. "How 'bout you get the shit we left, 'n' I'll go look fer a brace fer Coach?" He heard the gambler's footsteps behind him, and a faint snort sound out.

"I'll help carry stuff in a minute! S'just I really wanna find somethin' for him." Slipping through the general store's doors, Ellis turned at the waist to glance over toward the medicinal section. "Maybe -"

A hand grabbed the collar of his shirt, so sudden and tight that he choked when the front of it was jerked taut against his throat. He quickly staggered back into the tug, nearly stumbling straight into Nick. "Gah -" he forced out, bewildered. "Whut the -"

Nick let go of his shirt collar in favour of hooking a hand on his waist, stopping him and holding him there, just a foot between them. His other hand raised the katana, pointing its tip slowly toward the tile just in front of the doors.

Slowly blinking, Ellis lowered his gaze to follow the direction it indicated. It took him a moment to recognize what he was looking at.

When they'd realized Rochelle had disappeared, he'd dropped an armful of supplies to the ground, including a can of spaghetti. It had split in the fall, spilling spaghetti sauce over the floor. It was still there, having leached out as it sat there, puddling orange-red liquid around the broken can.

The puddle of sauce had dried, tacky and bubbled, around the shape of shoeprints.

They tracked into the building, wandering, fading out into vague outlines as they went deeper into the store. Ellis felt a strike of cold surge through him - almost more like nausea than fear, though there was plenty of that, too.

"...maybe a zombie walked in here or somethin'. Maybe.. it's just..."

"Ellis. The supplies are gone." The Georgian let his eyes flicker up, examining. Not only should there have been other supplies where he'd dropped them at the doorway, but the supplies that Nick had dropped - the supplies that should have been left in the middle of the store -
It was all gone.

"Zombies don't fucking take shit." Nick's voice was cold, sharp. Ellis slowly turned his chin so he could gaze at his face, and it was extraordinarily flat. Empty, in a way that Ellis had become familiar with. He was thinking, weighing options. "Someone's been here. Someone killed that Tank."

Fright threatened at Ellis, but he took in a breath, forcing air into his lungs despite their protesting. He shook his head, returning his gaze forward, warily examining the store. "Why... We... We shouldn't panic. Right? Maybe it's just another survivor, like us. We don't got no reason to think they ain't friendly."

The gambler's hand tightened on his waist, voice lowering to something rough. "Do we want to take that risk? After all the shit we've been through?"

Ellis wasn't sure how he felt about the fact that his instinct was to say no - that he felt like he had no trust left.

He just turned his head and stared at Nick and it must have been all over his face, because the hard angle of Nick's brow softened just a twitch. Releasing him and taking a step back, Nick shook his head, flexing his fingers on the handle of his katana. "We go home. Now. We got water, anyway."

Although Ellis tried to exhale smoothly, it came out stuttered and hitched. He nodded softly, already moving to retreat to the car at a jog, and Nick was close on his heels.

Whoever you are... you mess with them, I'll fucking make you regret it.
Coach leaned wearily against the staircase railing, seated with one leg bent onto the stair he sat on, and the other draped down to rest extended against the stairs below him. If he closed his eyes and focused, he could hear the sounds of infected snarling and growling just outside the condo's fencing.

Whatever had happened when Nick and Ellis left stirred them up like throwing a rock at a hornet's nest. There'd been the sound of faint honking from up the road, and though the ruckus afterwards didn't sound like a true horde, it had caused enough disturbance to rile the infected in the surrounding area.

It had been some time now. Though they had no way of knowing how long, exactly, it felt like an hour.

Pressing his knuckles into his palms, Coach cracked them in a series of snaps. He watched with dull interest as Rochelle paced from the wall to the bedroom door. Every time she reached the threshold, she'd tilt her head to peek in on Chris, like his condition might have changed in the few seconds it'd been since the last time she looked.

"Do you think they're okay?" Rochelle murmured, body tense. "We don't even know - what if that honking got them swarmed and they didn't even make it down the road? Shouldn't we -"

Coach sighed, gently, shaking his head. He kept his voice reassuring and slow. "I'm worried too, babygirl, but we gotta stick to the plan. If they needed help, they'd have run their asses back here. Best thing we can do is stay put. They'll be back by the time it starts gettin' dark, with or without water, like we agreed."

Rochelle's arms thrust out in a helpless gesture, before swinging her left hand to cross against her chest. Reaching her hand up to catch fingertips against her lower lip, she nervously plucked at a scab there, prying it off with her nails. "So stupid. So stupid. Ellis was right. Splitting up is such a stupid idea. All it takes is a horde, or even just a Hunter and a Smoker at the same time -"

Although part of him was tempted to let her vent it out, he ended up glancing at her with a tired frown and interrupting. "Nobody's happy 'bout this. But it was this, or leave Chris alone. Like Nick said - least we all got a partner."

"I don't want it to be like this." Her voice was faintly muffled by the press of her fingers against her lip, picking at the roughness and split skin caused by dehydration. "I just want them to be safe. If they get hurt out there... God, Coach. How are you calm about this?"

He put his lips together, whistling softly, like a sharp exhale. His head shook, chin lowering. "Ain't. Just know there's nothin' to do."

"Oh, well. Nothing to do. Okay." A laugh escaped Rochelle, tight and high. "That just makes it all okay." She turned on a heel, walking across the carpet in a nervous gesture, and as she reached just in front of Coach - he suddenly reached up a hand to grasp onto her elbow.

She blinked, glancing at him, and his eyes were dark and worried on her face.

"Yo' lip is bleedin'."

That made her stop, and she slowly pulled her hand away from her mouth. The sight of blood on her nails startled her, and she touched fingertips to her lower lip, realizing she'd torn it to bleeding when she felt a cool and viscous wetness there. "Shit..."

Pressing her palm against her lower lip to wipe off the blood, she allowed Coach to gently pull her to sit on the stairs beneath him. His hand shifted to place on her shoulder, tenderly squeezing there, thumb rolling in a vague massaging gesture.

She exhaled in frustration, peeling her hand away and sucking her injured lip into her mouth, nursing it with her tongue. The copper taste of blood was heavy as it trickled down her throat when she swallowed.

"You wanna talk, Ro'?" Coach urged, voice low and patient as his thumb rolled against her spine, soothingly. "You been actin' on edge a while now."

Her eyes lowered, and she slowly wiped the blood off her palm against her thigh, staring instead at the blood now quickly drying on her fingernails. She allowed her lip to escape the suction, responding as a vague stinging pain finally rose up from the abused flesh. "Just... everything. I feel like I'm losing it, y'know?"

Coach let his eyes close, leaning his head back against the railing, letting his hand drift to place flat against her spine so he could press fingertips against her shoulderblades. She slumped under the comforting touch, head leaning forward with a sigh.

"I'm trying to keep it together, because I know Ellis is feeling the same way... it's just everything's building up. I had a dream last night about shooting Brenda. I can still... I can still remember every single -" She pressed a thumb between her eyebrows, rubbing there. "I wanted to be stronger than this."

The eldest survivor opened his eyes with a gentle chuckle, sympathetic and unhumoured. "May be selfish, but I'm glad you ain't." She tilted her head to shoot him a glance, almost annoyed, but he lifted his hand from her back to tuck a knuckle against her jawline instead. "The last thing I want is us gettin' hard. So I think it's real healthy fo' you to be upset."

Her eyes softened a little, averting downwards, even as her cheek moved to press into his hand. "I know."

Coach allowed himself a faint smile, grasping her shoulder again. This time, he tugged her to lean back, and she settled down with her head against his stomach. He draped his arm comfortably over her chest, forearm tucked beneath her chin and hand braced on her shoulder.

"What're you really worried about? You know we don't blame you. You know you had to do it. What's goin' on?"

Shaking her head, Rochelle let her eyes closed, succumbing to the warmth his embrace offered. When she exhaled, it was thin and hesitant. "I'm not - I know it was the right thing to do... I'm just... scared. Of what Chris will think. What if we get him up, and then he hates us?"

Her voice fell to something small.

"Hates me?"

Coach closed his eyes again, rumbling a breath in his chest, tongue pushing up against the roof of his mouth in a thoughtful gesture. "You don't think he knew leavin' her alone might kill her? You abandon someone out here, they ain't gonna make it. He made that choice already. Chose us."
Rochelle's lips drew into a frown, though the tension made her wince as it drew torn flesh taut. She sucked on her lower lip again, flattening her tongue against the spark of pain, the wet warmth soothing. "I... guess I didn't think about it like that." she admitted, slurred by her caught lip.

"Ain't worth fussin' over now, anyway." Coach's shoulders shrugged, jostling her gently. "We'll tell him what happened. Boy'll understand. Even if he don't, then he can be on his way - ain't like that'd change our minds on helpin' him now, right?"

She crinkled her brow, quickly shaking her head. "Of course not."

"That's that, then. We just keep doin' what we doin'." With a weary hum, Coach relaxed into the stairway railing. "We got enough shit on our plate without addin' to it."

That made Rochelle laugh a little, tentatively. She reached up her left hand to grasp his forearm, squeezing in an affectionate gesture. "I don't know how you do it - how you keep so level-headed in all this."

Coach chuckled softly, raising his free hand to rub fingertips along his jaw, scratching with stubby - but growing - nails. "I'm the old buck of this group. You think I got time to be bawlin'? Make you kids take over while I have myself a big ol' pity party?"

Frowning a little, Rochelle tipped her head. She pushed against his arm, straightening up, and he let her go. She twisted at the waist to look at him, leaning an elbow on her knee. "That's hardly fair. I don't want you to feel like you have to hold things in. That's how we ended up in trouble after your concussion, remember? I want to be here for you, too."

He gave her a soft grin, warm, though hesitant. "You are. Y'all keep me goin'. Keep me focused."

She reached out to set a hand on his knee, lingering there gently. "Still. How are you feeling about everything? About the military, Chris... where's your head? I've been so locked up in mine, I haven't asked how you're doing..."

Coach examined her expression thoughtfully, lips drawing into a tired line. His voice was reluctant as he shrugged up a shoulder. "I'm a'ight." Rochelle seemed to sense more or expect more, so she merely tipped her head, patiently, and he had no choice but to continue. "... Just worryin'."

"About what?" she prompted, openly. When he glanced at her tentatively, she forced a smile. "I'm not gonna let you go without talking about it."

He sighed, the exhale slumping his body into a limp posture. His reticence faded, replaced with a weary tension. "If we find out the military ain't keepin' shit together... if CEDA fell apart... If there ain't nobody helpin' us, who helped my little girl? Who's keepin' her safe?"

Rochelle couldn't stop herself from lifting a hand to cover her mouth, like she could stifle her breath or stop a gasp. She felt tremendously selfish for almost forgetting, letting it slip her mind. They all had people to worry about... except Nick, she supposed... but Coach had an eight year old daughter.

An eight year old in all this?

"My wife -" He caught himself; course-corrected. "My ex, she got married to this accountant - this scrawny mixed boy, barely grown." Coach tried - genuinely, visibly tried to maintain a neutral tone, even when his eyes darkened with something between jealousy and frustration. "'Tasha liked him fine. I was glad. But is he keepin' them safe? Is he gettin' the job done? My ex is diabetic. Is he takin' care of her?"
She could only slip her hand to grab his, and he humored her, grasping their hands together. He shrugged his shoulders, and the motion was suddenly weak. Subtle."... I ain't sho'. Maybe I'm underestimatin' them. Just hope everythin' is easier fo' them, an' they ain't havin' the time we are. If my li'l girl is out here, sufferin', or..."

His eyes went distant, and Rochelle knew how to fill in the silence.

Or dead.

He looked back down at her, head tilting, and the smile he gave her was excruciatingly exhausted. And, maybe, angry. "You see why I ain't 'bout to stress on this? I ain't got no way to know shit. Ain't nothin' I can do. So you let me keep you up, 'cause that's all I got. You, Nick, an' Ellis - you're all I got. All I can do is keep y'all safe."

Rochelle's eyes were watering before she could stop it. Her features screwed up despite herself, and she surged forward to loop arms around him. He gave a faint sound of surprise, then gently embraced her with his arms, a chuckle rumbling through his chest.

He blinked back a gentle tingle of wetness at his eyes, tilting his chin up to stare at the ceiling and will it away, glad when she buried her face against his chest rather than look at him. The chuckle turned into a laugh, and he shifted a hand to place it at the back of her neck, holding her there.

"Sorry, babygirl. Didn't mean to upset you."

She shook her head without lifting it from his chest, exhaling heavily. "Y-You didn't. I'm just... I'm sorry. I can't imagine how hard it must be."

Coach raised a brow at that with a faintly dubious look. Blinking a few more times to ensure he'd gotten himself back under control, he turned his face, gazing down toward her. "That ain't true. You got yo' man to worry about."

"It's different." she murmured, just softly. Her head turned, putting her cheek against his chest, a frown tugging at her lips. "Besides..." Something stopped her, breath hitching into something faintly upset. She shook her head, falling to silence; that caught his attention, and he tightened his arms, confusion entering his expression.

"Sides what?"

"Honestly, Coach, I... I'm not really sure. Maybe I'm -" Rochelle couldn't stop from slipping her lower lip between her teeth, worrying against the tender spot where it had bled earlier. "Maybe I'm being stupid. It's just... before I left home, we -"

Screams rose up from outside, startling them both.

They came in equal time with gunshots, and Rochelle launched to her feet, shoving her wrist against her eyes. "Oh, my God. That must be the boys! They're back, thank Christ..." She glanced back at Coach, desperation rising in her posture.

He grunted, exhaling, and grasped one of the spindles of the stairway's railing. Hauling himself to his feet, Coach reached for his double-barrel shotgun where he'd placed it on a stair above him, stepping down to join her. "Let's go greet 'em. We're gonna finish this talk later, though."

Rochelle averted her eyes just a little, the edge of her mouth downturnring, but nodded.

Together, they surged for the front door. Coach led, throwing the door open and stepping out onto the landing. He warily put a hand over his eyes, gazing out onto the street, and Rochelle pushed close to his elbow to join him.

The infected that had gathered around the house were clotting up, running up the street, arms flailing. Coach followed their path, pinning down the direction of the disturbance.

A dark green sedan sat angled on the road, and just in front of its nose stood Nick, katana in his hands. Ellis was flanking him, shotgun readied, and the two men took on the oncoming infected with practiced ease - and something else. Fury?

Nick swung the blade too hard, too ferocious, and Ellis was huddled down where he stood. Coach read the fright in his posture. They were too far to quite pick out their expressions, but Coach sensed something was wrong as naturally as if it had been printed out on them like nametags.

He didn't know if Rochelle saw it. He kept his mouth shut, and hoped he was misreading.

"C'mon. Let's go back 'em up."
Chapter 140

Nick sheathed his blade into a zombie's head, snarling as he threw his weight forward. The sword stuck, dragging the instantly dead infected along with him when he stepped back, and he had to kick it off, tilting the blade up so the zombie slid limply off the blade.

He got it back up in time to fend off another as it lunged for him, slashing across its chest. The blade skittered off its ribs, not quite enough force in the blow to break through - and although its chest poured out blood from the slash, it wasn't daunted in the slightest. It snarled, clawing for him, and he had to jump backwards to avoid it.

Ellis shot it through the side, shotgun blasting loudly, and it went down like so much meat.

The Georgian lifted his head to examine the next zombie in the line of infected rushing at them, but his eyes darted off target. "Hoh - Guys!" he shouted, voice unsteady with relief, and Nick's gaze blinked up to confirm his outburst.

The big man was barreling through the gate, shotgun at the ready, expression grim. Rochelle was on his heels, Nick's Magnum gripped in her good hand.

Ellis almost bolted, but Nick was expecting it. He lunged, hooking one hand on the kid's shirtsleeve while the other lifted up his katana to meet an infected as it reached them. The infected ran itself onto the blade, making Nick's grip on it shudder, and the blade must've sheared through its spine because the creature went ragdoll, gargling faintly.

"Zombies first, girl time second." he growled, firm.

The tone successfully hid the relief coursing through his veins.

Ellis made the faintest grunting sound of displeasure, clearly eager to reunite with their team. He relented despite it, though with an audible whine. "Okay, okay..." Where Nick's relief allowed him to focus more thoroughly on attacking the infected, Ellis visibly strained to stay attentive, like a dog at the end of a leash keeping him from his goal.

The Georgian switched his grip on his shotgun and used the butt to bash into the face of an oncoming infected. It staggered, swiping at him, and its nails caught on his wrist before it was jerked backwards by the blow. He gave a thin sound of pain, taking the time to allow the zombie to straighten back up so he could shoot it directly in the face.

While it fell to the ground, spitting and growling from a broken face, Nick swung low at the next zombie to reach them. The blade sliced through its leg, just below the knee. The flesh separated easily, bone fragile and fractured, as if it had previously injured it.

The creature took a step on its other leg, then swung its freshly disconnected thigh forward. It tried to put weight down on its now-severed foot, and went crashing to the ground for the error. With the breathing room now available, Nick lifted his head, watching Coach and Rochelle charge up from behind the cluster of infected.

She kept at his side, bracing her left hand on her forearm, head twisting to scan around as if to watch his back. Coach advanced with his shotgun, and when he fired, the blast hit two infected at once, downing them effortlessly.

Between the three of them, it took no time at all to finish off the remaining zombies. They cleaned up neatly, compressing on the road until they'd reached each other, corpses lining the ground on either side. There was a moment where they all looked around, examining the bodies for movement and the surrounding area for stragglers.

Then Ellis moved, launching himself at Coach and Rochelle. His shotgun dangled from his elbow, throwing his arms messily around both of them, jaw trembling as he spoke. A shudder made its way into his voice. "Oh muh - Lord am I glad you two're okay! I was so dang worried!"

Rochelle quirked her head to one side, a lost sort of frown replacing the relieved happiness that had started to grow on her features. "Us...? I - Why were you worried about us? You guys were the ones out there alone!" She looked up toward Nick, confusion lighting in her eyes, even as she slid an arm around Ellis to reciprocate the hug.

The movement gave Coach room to worm his way out of the hug, stepping away with a comforting pat to Ellis' shoulder and letting him drape himself entirely against Rochelle. "... Y'all okay?" he murmured, guarded. Nick met his gaze rather than Ellis', and a faint blink was shared between them.

Nick's eyes gave a simple allowance to him: something was, in fact, wrong.

Ellis squeezed his arms around Rochelle tightly, huffing out an exhale. "We're.. We're fine, really. 'N' we found some supplies... s'just - While we was -"

As she looked down on him, the news producer glimpsed the rough abrasions on the backs of his arms. She gasped softly, pulling her arms suddenly back as if afraid to hurt him. "Ellis, what happened?! Your arms!" She pushed him away gently so she could grab for his wrist, turning his arm around and getting a look at the scrapes.

He gawped his lips faintly, growing a little abashed. "Uh... Nothin'... I got drug by a Smoker is all." Ellis scuffed his heel softly, ducking his chin. "It ain't bad... just stings. Ain't near as bad as when Keith was surfin' on the back'uh this truck, 'n' fell, but he got his foot caught -"

"He hit his head, too." Nick muttered in dull interruption, but before Rochelle could gasp at the statement and go to reach for Ellis' face like she meant to turn him around and get a look, he jabbed a thumb over his shoulder at the car. "Look, can we get inside before we do this? Right now, being out here is not a good idea."

Coach frowned - but nodded, warily. "Agreed. Pull up to the gate, I'll let you in."

Nick shoved a hand into the pocket of his slacks in a dismissive gesture. He slouched his shoulders faintly as he turned on a heel and quick-walked back to the car, katana held at his side. He noticed - and did not like - the similarity between his reaction to Ellis' wounds, and Rochelle's reaction.

A scowl touched his brow, and he decided against thinking critically on the fact.

Rochelle circled an arm behind Ellis with delicate care, shooing him into turning around. "C'mon, Ellis. Let's get inside the fence, okay?" He scattered a glance back at Nick, wary of separating from him - but followed her push rather than argue.

"Uh.. Okay." he murmured.

The three of them walked back to the gate, Nick getting into the sedan and rolling up along behind their path. Coach grabbed the fence gate and dragged it open wide enough to allow for the car. After Ellis and Rochelle had passed through and stepped out of the way, Nick turned the sedan carefully in through the entrance.
With their broken-down car in the garage, he merely parked it in front of the garage door, the sedan shutting off with a guttered sigh. Coach closed the fence gate behind him, latching it, and turned to rejoin them.

Nick didn't wait for him. He got out of the car, keys fisted in a hand, and stalked toward the stairs to re-enter the house without allowing for any argument. He was eager to get a roof over his head and a door between him and the outside... and whoever else was out there.

Rochelle passed Coach a hesitant look before following, and Ellis went with her. The survivors made their way up the staircase in a loose line, footsteps mixing into staccato and dull thudding as they ascended it.

By the time the other three entered the condo, Nick was settled on the stairs to the second floor.

He had his legs spread, katana balanced against his knees, not seeming overly perturbed when the placement smeared blood on the knee of his slacks. His cold green gaze observed them quietly as they slipped in. Coach was the last to enter, closing the door behind him.

As the eldest survivor moved to lean against the wall, placing his shotgun down, Nick exhaled. "Good news or bad news?" he prompted, dryly, and though his tone was one of sarcastic humour, his eyes spoke to anything but. "Your call."

Ellis broke away from Rochelle with a touch to her wrist, slipping over to the wall to join Coach. The younger man dropped down to sit, tiredly splaying his legs ahead of him and drawing his arms into his lap. He squinted at the abrasions on them, a frown twitching at his lips.

Rochelle watched him move, brows flat, trying to ignore the way Coach looked to her expectantly. He tipped his head, surrendering the choice to her.

It was slowly that she answered, "Bad news."

The gambler closed his eyes, sliding a hand up to rub down his neck, fingertips scratching at the stubble growing there. His voice dulled. "... Someone's out there. We don't know who. We didn't see them. But they cleared out the store before we could get there."

Rochelle's eyes widened, flashing with fear, and she took just a half-step back. "O-oh. You're... sure?" she uttered, voice ghosting from her lips. "But you didn't see them?" Nick shook his head once in confirmation. "So... for all we know, they took supplies and just left, right? We don't know they're still around."

Coach's reaction was muted and thoughtful. He tilted his head mildly, eyes narrowing, and it was with a patient tone that he spoke. "All we know, they could be friendly."

Raising his hand in a flat gesture, Nick narrowed his eyes right back. "Sure, sure. Because we've been rolling around in friendly survivors lately." Coach's lips twitched into a frown at that. "And maybe they left. To fucking where? I remember the map of Tybee. There ain't that much real estate, and there's only one way out. And we had to go through the swamps because that way is a bridge the fucking military blew!"

Slowly shaking her head, Rochelle raised an unsteady hand to her lips, feeling fingertips against the roughened and tender section she'd worried to bleeding earlier. "Isn't it jumping to conclusions to think they're dangerous? ...What if they're like us, just trying to find rescue?"

It was Ellis who spoke up, voice wary and soft. "If we'd jumped tuh conclusions faster, maybe the Angels wouldn't'uh ended up hurtin' us." His eyes were hesitant when they slipped up, like he wasn't confident with his own words.

Outright surprise darted over Rochelle's face, turning to face the younger survivor. Her face went a little slack, startled, eyes smoothing over his tense and pinched expression. Was he really that afraid? Ellis, of all of them, on the side of not trusting someone - Ellis withholding good faith?

A cruel part of her wondered if it was Nick's fault, his influence. She regretted the thought as soon as she'd had it, but couldn't shake it off.

Coach's voice was weary as he interjected, head shaking. "What are you thinkin' we do 'bout it, Nick?" Although the words seemed confrontational, his tone was level. Nick glanced at him, and noted the honest question in his eyes.

So he shrugged casually, body lazing back against the stairs. "Nothing. Not anything active. I'm not saying we hunt them down or some shit, for fuck's sake, but you guys had to know. Trying to be a 'team player.'" He thrust up his hands to pull air quotes around the phrase as he said it, a brow arching. "I thought you'd be proud."

Coach snorted faintly, turning to glance at Rochelle, then Ellis. "If y'all ain't opposed, I got a suggestion." He waited for a nod from both before he continued. "We don't know them. Don't know their intentions. How 'bout we just agree to play it by ear? If we meet 'em, we take stock. Then we vote on what we do."

His eyes continued scanning them, hunting for agreement. "Ain't no use discussin' it now, when all we know is there might be someone who might run into us."

A nod touched Ellis' head, less reluctant this time. Rochelle slowly drew her arms into a cross over her chest, faintly frowning. She nodded in mimicry, but spoke with a wary tone. "Agreed. As long as we talk to each other. I don't want... I don't want the Angels to change us."

"I - I ain't tryin' tuh be - ... I don't wanna think they're bad, either." His eyes averted, lowering to gaze at his boots. A soft sigh left him, reluctant and fragile. "But after everythin'... if there's someone out there, I just... wanna know fer sure they ain't gonna hurt us. I want us tuh be careful, that's all."

Rochelle's frown softened, eyes doing the same. Guilt tugged at her, gently; it wasn't his fault that his optimism had been shaken. Nor, she reminded herself forcefully, was it Nick's. "... I know, baby. It'll be okay. We'll be careful about it. Maybe they're gone and none of this will even matter."

Coach put a hand on his hip, sighing weightily with a droop of his chin. Some chastisement entered his tone, wryly, as he shifted his weight to place his hand on the top of Ellis' head. The younger man blinked up, startled at the touch. "You did say yo' ass had good news, right?"

At that, Nick's head lifted, gazing at him for a beat. His expression was flat and cool, but the ice melted away from it, slowly. A grin started to form on his lips, baring a strip of teeth in an expression that was almost intimidatingly amused.

"Sweetheart, you're gonna love me after this."
"Holy shit, I could kiss you right now."

Rochelle hovered a hand over the open icebox, eyes locked tightly on the water pooled within, and the bottles and cans floating in the faintly warmed liquid. A grin crossed Nick’s lips at the words, and he leaned in to rest an elbow against the kitchen counter, meeting her gaze with a luridly slow blink.

"Promise?" he questioned, voice silky-smooth.

She could only crinkle her brow at him, seeming disbelieving - and maybe a touch chastising. "Don't push it, suit." Reaching tentatively into the box with her left hand, Rochelle scooped out the drinks one-by-one, lifting them out of the water and letting them drip a little before setting them on the counter. She did her best not to touch the water any more than necessary. "We should be careful with the water in here. Keep it clean… so we can drink it or use it."

Coach nodded his head at the comment, letting an arm slip behind his back, scratching idly at his spine. "Least it gives us some breathin' room. Y'all did good." He turned his head, glancing at Ellis. The younger Georgian had his arms looped under the box of walkie-talkies, and balanced atop was the blisterpack of batteries that Nick had found. "Why don't you set that down, let Ro' clean you up?"

Eyes widening in a gentle blink, Ellis approached a step to sidle up against the kitchen island. He slid the box carefully onto the counter, freeing his hands so he could twist them palm-up and gaze at the abrasions up his forearm. "Uh… it ain't worth all that, really. Barely hurts anymore."

Rochelle snorted with a patient roll of her eyes, stepping further into the kitchen. She reached up into the elevated cabinets over the main cabinet, opening them one by one, eyes scanning the mostly empty shelving. "Honey, you say that every time you get hurt. Just sit."

His lower lip stuck out faintly, but he relented, sliding to the side so he could crawl up and sit on one of the barstools set on the other side of the island. The sulking limpness in his posture made Nick snort, and the gambler straightened off the counter, striding toward the balcony’s doors. He leaned against the glass, looking out with half-closed eyes.

"Got batteries at a shop." he stated lazily. "Since the flashlight was dying."

That prompted Ellis into a smile, perking up faintly. He watched Rochelle locate a bowl, glancing it over to ensure it was clean before carrying it back. "We found somethin' cool, too." She gave him a curious look, taking the bowl and dipping it into the icebox, scooping out just a little bit of water.

Placing the bowl down next to Ellis, the water sloshing faintly, Rochelle snatched up the paper towel roll from where it sat on the counter and tore off a strip. She circled around the island, hopping up to sit on the stool next to him.

As she folded the paper towel up, dipping a corner into the water to let the water soak into the spiral-patterned fibre, Rochelle slanted her gaze down to his arms. "Arms out." she ordered, and firmly, and he could do nothing but obey, flattening his arms against the counter, twisted to bare the scrapes up his arms. Rochelle slipped him a smile. "Go ahead."

Ellis did his best not to wince as she started to clean off his wounds. Skating across the parking lot had rubbed dirt and fragments of asphalt into his skin, and she took care to daub with the wet towel and clean the scrapes off. Rather than succumb to the stings of pain, he focused his energy on talking, nodding his head toward the box of two-way radios.

"Well, we found some uh - y'know, walkie-talkies? - 'n' I thought if we have tuh split up again, we can keep in touch. I don't wanna get separated'n'lose each other again." Rochelle widened her eyes a bit in surprise as she listened. "Least we'll be able tuh talk, make sure everyone's okay."

Her movements slowed as she scrubbed some debris off his elbow, glancing at the now faintly pink surface of the paper towel. "That sounds… great, actually." she admitted, shooting a longing glance toward the box he indicated. "I can't begin to count all the times that would've saved us. It takes batteries, though, right?"

"Yeah, but they came with some. 'N' if we just use it fer emergencies, it'll last a long while." Ellis assured her, peeking down at his arms, allowing himself a small pout of pain while she was distracted. He tentatively poked a fingertip at his elbow, plucking out a sliver of concrete, appearing a little fascinated.

Rochelle tilted her head, a pleased grin crossing her face. "Sounds perfect." The smile wavered into a wary look before she continued, eyes and attention re-focusing onto Ellis' wounds, shooing his hands away with a wave of her left hand. "I have to be honest, I was... worried. We've all been through a lot lately, so some peace of mind if we have to separate again... I'm not sure if I'm happier about the water, or that."

A chuckle escaped Coach at the statement, approaching to grasp the box. He tilted it, allowing the replacement flashlight batteries to slide off, and popped the top flap open. "Gotta agree. Should be able to stay put a while now, with water an' food, but be smart to plan fo' the worst." The football coach removed the two-way radios, looking them over.

"Let's set one next to Chris." Nick dully interjected without bothering to shift his gaze from the glass doors. "Baby monitors, zombie apocalypse style."

Shooting him a displeased look, Rochelle let her eyes drift to meet Ellis'. They traded a commiserating look, smiles sneaking their way into the expression, and Rochelle shifted to tend to his other arm. She folded the paper towel around itself, dipping it in the water to get it freshly damp.

"Only baby we gotta monitor is yo' whiny ass." Coach returned, just about as dully. Nick reared his head around to direct a sneer his way, lip curling up from his teeth, and the eldest survivor gave a self-satisfied chuckle. He pulled the plastic tabs out from the battery compartment on either radio, unblocking the batteries, and powered them on with a button press.

They blinked on, small digital screens displaying the same default channel number. Coach tapped the call button on the one in his right hand - and the left one chirped merrily.

Satisfied, he turned them both back off and set them down on the counter. "We good. Be real glad to have this next time we go out." Coach turned away, raising a hand to palm against the back of his neck in a rub. "Gonna go sit wit' the boy. Holler if y'all need anything."

Rochelle hummed in assent, glancing to watch him approach and descend the stairs to the first floor. She somewhat thoughtfully retracted her hands from Ellis' arms, eyes distant with a soft quirk to her mouth.

She worried after him.
He lifted his hands up and twisted them to gaze over his forearms, assessing his wounds with a smile. "Thanks, girl. Feels loads better." Ellis looked up to her face - only to find her attention averted, staring after Coach with a faintly strained expression on her features. "Uh... Ro'?

The woman blinked her gaze back, quickly smoothing into a vaguely pinched smile. "Sorry. Nothing." Her left hand grabbed his, turning it around to bare the clawed gouge one of the infected had made on the side of his wrist. He held it there obediently as Rochelle placed the paper towel against the injury, applying gentle pressure on it. "Just think Coach needs some rest."

Ellis cocked his head at the statement, frowning a little. "Is somethin' up? He seemed okay tuh me...?"

"Says you. Guy's been halfway civil to me lately. It's giving me the creeps." The gambler thrust up a hand, idly, blustering an exhale. His voice was almost amused, though too bored to truly count as humor. Before either of them could do more than look over at him, Nick turned to press his back against the glass. "Besides, not like we have anything to do but rest. We're stuck waiting for the prick downstairs."

Nodding idly, Rochelle peeled the paper towel away from Ellis' wrist, examining the slice there. "It's for the best. Not like we can work on signaling anybody until we even know we want to." She scrubbed at the wound a few times, ignoring the way Ellis squirmed in her grip, eyes screwing up in discomfort. "And talking to Chris is a big part of that. I'm pretty sure he knows whatever Brenda knew."

"Judging by the way they argued in the gunstore? Yeah. Safe bet." Nick returned with a heavy lull to his voice, shaking his head. His eyes closed, and he moved his hand to rub at his jawline. The Charger's punch had coalesced into a heavy purpled bruise, though it was partially disguised amidst his stubble. "Nobody else annoyed at the fact we're making choices based off those assclowns? They're two-thirds dead and one-third dismembered. Not great odds."

A snort escaped Ellis, squinting curiously over his shoulder at the older man. "You were rootin' fer not trustin' the military since like... day one, man. Thought you'd be doin' a victory dance over there." He turned around entirely to face when Rochelle released him, tilting his head at Nick.

The gambler shot him a vague look of annoyance, shrugging a shoulder. "I'm changeable."

Rochelle crinkled her nose in amusement, setting the paper towel down on the couch and drying her hands against her thighs. "That's one word." He rounded his gaze on her, narrowing his eyes, but she was already turning her back on him and putting her elbows on the counter to slump forward. "Besides, we don't have room to talk. We're one-fourth huge asshole."

"And one-fourth bitch, and two-fourth Georgia redneck." Nick retorted harshly, shoulders prickling, flaring into legitimate aggression. When Rochelle merely graced him with a laugh, not even looking at him, he didn't have much of a choice other than to let the agitation defuse. A faint scowl placed itself on his face.

"... Whatever. For the record, I'm not gonna do any victory anything if we find out we've got no rescue coming."

Ellis hummed softly, popping his lips in idle thought. He eventually slid himself off the stool, sidling over to the couches so he could plop down onto a loveseat. His body tiredly sprawled over the length of it, and he pawed his cap onto his face to cover his eyes with it. "Least we got each other, right?" he uttered, a little hesitance amidst the words. "We'll be okay."
Unable to resist a short laugh, brimming with doubt, Nick moved to lean against the glass doors. He shook his head. "Oh yeah, kid. The power of friendship is the best weapon against a fucking zombie apocalypse, as we all know."

Rochelle crooked an arm against the counter, resting her head down against her forearm. Her eyes drooped a little as she settled down, tsing her tongue gently against the roof of her mouth. "Don't listen to him, Ellis. We're gonna be fine, one way or the other."

Although it was hidden under his capbill and saved just for himself, Ellis smiled a little. "S'okay. Ro'. He's just bein' nasty. Least he thinks we're his friends."

Nick recoiled instantly, jabbing a finger in his direction. A convoluted kind of protest crossed his features, body cocking to put his weight on one leg. His eyes narrowed fiercely, trapped by his own words. "That's not what I -"

He didn't get much further before Rochelle cooed a tired, "Awww.", drawing the noise out just enough to really ratchet up Nick's agitation. He rose to a fever pitch of annoyance, more at being the center of a joke than at his slip itself - because they were, he supposed, and the thought didn't bother him as much as it used to.

Not that that stopped him from snarling out, "That's not what I meant!"
Although there were plenty of other things to worry about, having a supply of water eased a tension in the four survivors that had been reaching a stifling degree. It was a relief - a small point of light in an otherwise dark situation. Nick hadn't really felt like they had a grip on things in recent days, so the stability and security came as blissful solace.

Solace that lasted, unsurprisingly, a very short time.

"Man, I wish we had a radio or somethin'. ... well, that'n'some radio stations that were still workin'. I could use some music." Ellis drawled it out innocuously, half-asleep on the loveseat. His body was comically draped, one leg hanging off the edge to rest a foot on the ground.

Nick snorted, despite himself. "Bored already? We can go outside and fight some zombies if that'll help." He'd taken up a sprawl on the loveseat opposite Ellis, crooking an arm behind his head and resting the ankle of his burnt leg on his other knee. He tugged his slacks up, touching fingertips on the scarring flesh.

He'd have gladly offered a different and far more enticing suggestion for how to spend their time - but Coach had returned, trading places with Rochelle, and was trying unsuccessfully to doze on the couch. So, Nick merely distracted himself, examining his calf.

The flesh was warped and taut in a blotchy pattern, pink as it healed over, and mostly bare of hair. It displeased him more the longer he examined it. A faint limp he could deal with, fight against - mask. The scarring, on the other hand, wasn't something he could so easily hide away. It was ugly, and grated at his pride.

"Could've been in a worse place, I guess. Like my face.

"Naw." Ellis returned, sincerely, like Nick hadn't been joking. "Just wish there was somethin' tuh do."

Exhaling a little, tiredly, Coach's eyes reopened. He tipped his head to glance at Ellis, something resigned in his attention - he knew full well he wasn't going to get any rest. When he spoke, however, it was affectionate at its core. "What music you like, Ellis?"

That piqued Ellis' attention. He reached up, pawing his cap up off his face enough to blink his eyes toward Coach, then break into a slight smile. "Oah, plenty! Classic rock, country... Long's it's got a tune tuh sing to. I mean, I don't mind pop or nothin', but..."

Coach nodded in slow agreement, giving a thoughtful pinch of his jaw. "When I was a young'un, snuck out to just 'bout every rock concert there was. Back at my house, got a whole bookshelf fo' CDs. My little girl'd go through 'em on my old Walkman." A quiet kind of smile crinkled at his eyes, reserved and private.

Nick noticed it, but said nothing. He'd settled on keeping an eye on Coach after Rochelle's odd behaviour toward him, but the big man seemed fine to his eye. More important to Nick was the beginnings of a conversation he was witnessing take root.

He hated those, particularly when they would inevitably circle to him.
"Aw, yeah." Ellis pushed against the couch, twisting himself to lay on his side and face Coach more thoroughly. His smile flickered to a sideways grin, though a little bashful. "Muh dad left some music behind. Always loved listenin'." He cocked his head into the cushions, curiously. "Whut bands? Who's yer favourite?"

Chuckling faintly at the question, Coach shook his head. "Ah, hm." He seemed to chew on that for a beat, cocking his head, eventually allowing, "Midnight Riders. Used to be my favourite, but they ain't real good no more. Still got all their albums, though."

Ellis launched up on the couch, practically scrambling to sit up, both feet hitting the ground in an eager patter. "Really?!" His voice pitched to an eager tone, and Coach settled into an easy smile as he watched the kid grow animated. "Oh, man, they're the best! They've saved my life like three times. I ever tell y'all 'bout the time Keith went tuh a concert'uh theirs over in Texas?"

Although Nick started to grimace and say something to dissuade the story, Coach caught him with a nearly threatening look. The eldest survivor shook his head at Ellis, encouragingly.

"He was tryin' tuh crowd surf, I guess, but he just kinda climbed up a fence and jumped on folk. He landed on this one guy who had these - y'know them big spiky shoulderpads, whut bikers wear sometimes? Man, Keith landed like, real hard. You'd think they'd be, like, aluminum or somethin', right? Nah - these were solid steel. Went right through his -"

Thrusting up a hand in a halting gesture, fingers flattened, Nick let one eye shut in a vague expression of disgust. "Your friend is a hazard."

That pushed Ellis' lower lip out, tilting his head faintly to the side. "Well... tuh be fair. Them spikes was the hazard." He shook his head as if to refocus, grinning at Coach. "Man. Riders got the best concerts ever. Me'n'Keith, we'd come back hoarse. Singed sometimes! Lost muh eyebrows once." He tapped his brow with a pinky pointedly.

"Best pyrotechnics in the business." Coach agreed, heartily, scratching at his forearm idly. "Even after they set that town on fire an' had to tone that shit down."

Carding fingers through his hair, smoothing digits just behind his ear to brush back hair that was growing unruly, Nick snorted a faint breath. "Sounds like some serious cock rock shit. Should have expected that kind of taste from you two." He should have stayed out of it - but couldn't resist the opportunity to make a jab.

"You ain't even heard 'em!" Ellis protested, blue eyes blinking toward Nick and nose crinkling. In the same instant that he seemed genuinely offended - he flickered into a teasing curiosity. "Whut kinda music do you listen to, then, Mr. Gamblin' Man?"

Nick laughed that off, giving a noncommittal shrug. "Better shit than you, apparently."

Leaning forward a little, Ellis placed his hands on his knees, a smile spreading across his lips. "Aw, don't be like that. 'M just curious." His eyes warmed to something affectionate, and it was beyond Nick why. He relented, though, looking back at Coach. "Man. I miss just hangin' out, jammin'. Keith'n'me used tuh just drive around, listenin' tuh music. He'd belt shit out so loud'n'crazy, we'd get pulled over 'cause they thought he was drunk."

Coach grinned at that, eyes lighting up gently. His voice turned to something conspiratorial, winking easily. "Who says you gotta miss it?"

The youngest survivor's head cocked, mouth gawping in hesitant excitement, at the same time
Nick's eyes narrowed dangerously. He had a fairly good idea where this was going, and every fibre of him hated it. "Please tell me -"

Coach's voice became a hearty baritone when he sang, hands lacing over his gut to tap the rhythm out there. The joy that entered his tone was second only to the joy that blossomed over Ellis' face, like Christmas had come early. "Save me some sugar, this won't take long..."

"Oh, God." was all Nick could manage, horrified.

It didn't stop Coach, and Ellis joined in, their voices mixing with a giddy energy that molded into a rough duet that wasn't far from pleasant: "Don't give me too much - I won't be there when you fall..."

Ellis broke out with an eager croon, "Save me some sugar - that's all you've got to do...", beaming hugely when Coach tagged on: "Anything left over, I'll take that, too..."

Nick was up and off the loveseat in an instant, clamping hands over his ears and shaking his head furiously. "Nope. Nope. I'm not dealing with idiot karaoke!" he practically snarled, stepping between the loveseat and the couch and retreating toward the stairs. "The fuck did I do to deserve getting stuck with -"

He couldn't even get the rest of it out, because Ellis was up on his feet and singing over him. The mechanic gripped a fist in front of his mouth as if holding a microphone, eagerly bursting out with, "I'll ask one thing -"

Coach's bass came in as a hummed back-up. "I'll ask one thing -"

"Not that you'll be true -"

"Not that you'll be true -"

Nick practically flung himself down the stairs, fleeing on the wings of Ellis belting out, "The one thing I'm asking of you -" and the two of them joyously singing together: "Save me some sugar -"

The gambler couldn't escape fast enough, taking long strides to flee into the main bedroom. As much as he had no interest in staying around while they sang, even worse than their singing was the fact that he had to admit that Ellis' rich drawl didn't sound half bad. Or how it was the happiest he'd seen Ellis in a while.

He shoved his shoulder against the bedroom door to force it open from its cracked state, and dodged inside, face drawn in a grimace. His abrupt appearance didn't really startle Rochelle; she must've heard their argument, or heard him descending the stairs.

She grinned at him from where she sat on the foot of the bed, head cocking as the singing from upstairs floated down, still just audible. "Party-pooper."

"Are you kidding?" he groaned, reaching up to pinch at the bridge of his nose. He approached her slowly, green eyes gone dramatically distant. "It's hell up there. Please tell me I can get some peace and quiet down here, at least."

Rochelle shrugged her shoulders, nodding toward Christophe where he lay on the bed. The Spaniard had flipped in his sleep, laying on his right side, stumped shoulder up in the air. His face was half-buried in the pillow, jaw slack. The breathing that expanded and collapsed his chest in a slow rhythm had turned a little more steady. Less wheedled, and far quieter.
"He's not about to start singing." Brushing a thumb against her temple, she gave him a faint smile. "And I'm not really a rock girl. Give me some electronica and synth-pop any day."

Nick grunted idly. He took a side-step, then sat down beside her on the edge of the bed. The gesture startled her, blinking curiously sideways at him - but he'd already settled and closed his eyes, arms crossing over his chest.

They sat there, for just a moment, and Rochelle weighed her options in the silence. He'd asked for peace and quiet, but sitting down next to her, rather than going to a wall and leaning distantly against it like he always did...? Maybe she was reading into it, or maybe he did want to talk.

She had learned quickly that forcing her way into Nick's personal space, prying, rarely went over well. Better to skirt the conversation - if there was one to be had at all.

"I'm glad they're having fun." she offered gently, innocuously.

Nick snorted, head shaking. "If that's their idea of fun, I'm happy to be left out of it. There's a reason people get drunk before they do karaoke; it's awful. I get my kicks in ways that don't involve screeching out the greatest hits of 90s rock."

Rochelle laughed softly, putting her hands in her lap. She let her eyes drop, carefully touching a thumbtip against the pink nail polish that still stained her nails. It had chipped and cracked and faded, pulling away from her cuticle as her nails grew it out, but there was some colour left.

"Maybe. They need it, though."

Shrugging his shoulders, Nick's eyes reopened. He glanced at her fidgeting hands - then, abruptly, he lowered his arms from their cross. One of his hands reached out and circled the wrist of her injured hand, dragging it up. Rochelle could only blink as he flipped it, examining the bandage wrapped over her palm.

She'd changed it, and he looked it over with a dubious eye. "You acted like Coach was upset, earlier." he stated, not meeting her gaze. He flicked a thumb underneath the bandage, lifting it away just enough to get a look at her wounded palm.

Much despite herself, Rochelle felt a warmth light up her spine when she glanced at his features, so near and so laser-focused on her injury. Nick was nothing if not handsome. And I really want to take a cheese grater to my face for thinking that.

She focused, sobered a little once she'd considered the question. Her head shook, curling her tongue against her teeth - she was a little leery of breaking confidence with Coach, but it wasn't like Nick was going to talk to him about it. And it wasn't like his family was a secret. "He misses his daughter, is all."

Nick gave little more than a grunt, so Rochelle shrugged a shoulder, continuing. "The less sure I am about whether the military has their shit together, the more -" She hesitated, chin lowering a little. "The more I'm wondering if our families are even okay. Even if they got to an evac... what if everything fell apart? What if nobody's safe?"

She knew her voice was weakening as she went, lowering to something confiding - and maybe a little afraid. Nick was the only one she could speak to brazenly; the only one she wasn't afraid to hurt or scare with the talk, because it wasn't like he had someone to worry about.

If anything, he'd likely been thinking the same things for a long time.
His muted reaction said as much.

"That really change anything?" he returned, dryly. "Even if everybody's dead. What does it matter? We just gonna give up?" He let her hand go, leaning his weight back to rest a palm against the bed, eyes going low-lidded. "We didn't fight this long for them. We fight because it's better than dying. So we keep fighting."

Rochelle drew her hands back together, a frown pulling her lips down. She let her eyes close entirely, sighing, and wishing the words comforted her more.

Nick must've caught her reticence, because he sighed, too. It was more frustrated than hers, and he shrugged. "Dunno what to tell you, doll." His gaze cut over to her, curious. He sucked in a breath, holding it - then released it, along with words. His lips shifted into a small sneer. "Worried about your boyfriend?"

He knew he'd hit on something when she flinched. Her chin dropped, turning her face away, and he practically thrust his hands up in a defensive gesture. "Whoa, hey. I know that look." Pushing up off the bed, Nick started to walk away, aiming for the window. "Forget I said anything."

Rochelle didn't stop him, frown deepening as she shook her head. "... Sorry. Just... it's complicated. Half of me is worried he's... dead, half of me -" She raised her uninjured hand, palming against her forehead with a sigh. "It's complicated." she repeated, softer. "You don't want to hear about it."

Sidling up against the window, Nick leaned on the wall, crossing his legs and slumping into a comfortable pose. He shrugged distantly, eyes lingering more fully on her now that he was behind her and out of her view. "Depends." he answered, voice dull.

Hand sliding down the frame of her face, Rochelle let her hand linger on her cheek. Her eyes went a little distant, gazing off toward a point that wasn't anywhere near. "Then let's say I don't want to talk about it, okay? Thought you wanted peace and quiet, anyway."

Nick laughed, just a little, amusement creeping in. "If you insist."

Rochelle turned, drawing her legs up onto the bed and allowing her lower back to rest against the footboard. Her eyes flicked up to the ceiling, head tilting back, and she gazed at a small circle of spackle that filled in a hole made long ago. She smiled, though, because Nick had practically acted like he cared.

The two men upstairs had moved on to singing an enthusiastic - and faintly off-key - rendition of 'One Bad Man.'

When Chris awoke, it was so quietly that Rochelle took a moment to notice. She sat on the edge of the bed, watching with no small interest as Nick took his Magnum apart and cleaned it as best he could with a toothbrush he'd nicked out of the bathroom. Judging by the displeased look on his face, it wasn't optimal, but he didn't grousel aloud.

Her gaze followed his hands as he worked, and it was only faintly that she registered a slight movement from the body laid out behind her. She ignored it, at first - but then it happened again, and she turned her head to glance at Chris. He'd attempted to roll over before, and she'd had to stop him from rolling onto his stumped shoulder.

This time, however, his eyes were open and rolling slowly in their sockets to look around the bedroom. There was pain in them, but clarity.

"Chris? Hey - hey." Rochelle slid herself quickly up the edge of the mattress, leaning in to hover over him. His eyes snapped to her face, warm brown latching onto the dark chocolate of hers. She heard Nick getting to his feet, but didn't pay him any mind. "Can you hear me?"

A flicker down focused his attention on her lips, as if their motion surprised him. His own parted with a tremble, and his voice came out in a cracked and exhausted tone. "Sí." A cough escaped the Spaniard like the word had caught in his throat. He grimaced as the gesture jostled him, pained him, and uttered in quiet plea, "¿Agua?"

Relief flooded her, too harshly, taking in a breath to steel herself. Rochelle nodded eagerly, reaching to the nightstand to retrieve the bottled water she'd left there. Opening it took too much time, her fingers trembling. She leaned in to press it against his mouth, tipping it so he could drink.

Nick approached, arms crossed. The Spaniard managed a desperate gulp, only just avoiding choking on the liquid as he swallowed it flat on his back. The Northerner observed with a dubious stare, head gently cocking to one side.

As Chris ran his tongue across his lower lip, tilting his face away, Rochelle replaced the bottle on the nightstand. "Me duele ... brazo... - ¿por qué duele tanto?" he muttered, almost to himself, eyes fluttering up toward the ceiling and narrowing into a squint. His body shuddered, one leg bending slowly, heel pressing into the mattress with the motion.

It didn't look like he intended to straighten, but Rochelle surged back anyway, placing a hand flat on his chest to keep him down. "I'm sorry, Chris, I know you're tired, but - I don't... I can't..."

She trailed off, but he nodded vaguely in understanding, closing his eyes entirely. It was with a low and flattened tone that he swapped to English, accent much thicker than it had been previously. "Hurts. The arm. Why no -?" He seemed to frustrate himself, jaw tensing, and it took a moment for Rochelle to realize why.

Beneath the sheets bunched tightly around his shoulders, the stumped remnant of his left arm was twitching, the muscles in his neck tautly flexed. Like his body was straining to lift a limb that no longer existed. As if it were merely weighted down, numbed, and if he could try hard enough he could lift it off the mattress.

Rochelle didn't know what was worse: the sight of him struggling, or the idea of having to explain what had happened to him.
She'd just raised her bandaged hand to cover her mouth, brows pinching, and started to work together a response when Chris' eyes suddenly snapped open. Terror flooded his expression all at once, and it was a breathless babble that escaped him. "B - B is coming. Vine a avisaros - come to warn..."

This time he did struggle as if to rise, even when pain stuttered over his face at the motion, and Rochelle had to grab firmly onto his torso, holding him down. He must have forgotten seeing her katana in Nick's grip - didn't know she was dead. "It's okay, Chris, it's okay. She - she came, while you were out." That startled him, faintly, limpening to surrender to her force. "We're fine."

His eyes searched hers, growing faintly confused when she avoided his gaze. Guilt crept over her features, drawing her lower lip between her teeth and worrying it. There was no delicate way to tell him, no way to make it less painful.

Nick's gaze bored into her, silent, and she could only guess at what he was thinking. Maybe urging her to not tell him. Why add the complication, after all?

She couldn't do that. Her conscience wouldn't allow for it, on top of everything else.

"She attacked us. We had to - ... She didn't give us much choice." Awareness lit on Chris' face, not so much shock as a kind of resigned acceptance. His eyes lowered, growing distant, and a pain struck through Rochelle's gut. She removed her hands from his chest, leaning away. "I'm sorry."

Voice thick with sarcasm, Nick inputted harshly, 'I'm not. Your friends were fucking psychos.
Both of them deserved what they got."

Horror jolted Rochelle's spine straight, twisting to shoot a furious look at him. She knew he thought it - and didn't really disagree, when it came down to it - but to say it, aloud? It was beyond blunt. Heartless. "Nick!"

Her fury only encouraged him. Nick put a hand on his waist, fingers curled in his dress shirt, voice lowering to an aggressive tone as his gaze cut past her to focus tightly on Chris' face. "If I even choose to believe you had any interest in helping us, and this whole thing wasn't some fucked-up ploy gone sideways, then you got a lot of fucking answers to give. Pronto."

Rochelle wanted to argue, wanted to leap up and chase him out, but Christophe was already speaking. His voice came out vague and confused. "Ploy? No entiendo..." His eyes traveled a rough and wavering route up to lock onto Nick's face, becoming guarded, hazy.

run in, catch us unaware, she follows up to clean house. Too bad you assholes didn't think of Wi-"

She did get up, then, thrusting to her feet. "Jesus, Nick!" He glared starkly at her, posture shifting with angry energy. "I'm completely goddamn aware of how you feel, but after everything he's been through? After saving Coach and me? Give him some breathing room, for Christ's sake!"

Oddly - Nick relented. Maybe her voice was more furious than she meant it to be, or maybe she'd simply gotten through to him. Either way, he thrust a hand up, turning half away from her with a curt utterance. "Whatever."

Footsteps sounded down the stairs, hurried. Coach and Ellis must have heard her raised voice, and were coming to investigate. Hands trembling at her sides, Rochelle forced in a lungful of air like it might clear her head. The last thing she wanted was a room of people surrounding him - or, worse, questioning him.
"... Sorry. This is ... stressful." Nick didn't register the apology with more than a jerk of his chin, almost angrily dismissive. "Please go outside, Nick. Let them know he's awake. I'm going to talk to him."

She added a little forcefully: "Alone."

Rochelle watched Nick stride over to the door, dragging it open and slipping out. Ellis' concerned face leapt into view just before Nick shut it behind him, and their voices became a low murmur on the other side. They talked for a spare few moments, maybe arguing just a little.

She waited, unmoving, until she heard footsteps ascending the stairs again.

In the silence that followed, she warily turned, facing Chris but not quite meeting his gaze. She slowly drew her hands into a clasp in front of herself, thumb pressing into the bandaged wound across her palm. "I'm sorry. He's just angry."

Christophe's head was tilted into the pillow, eyes low-lidded as he gazed at her. A hollow edge touched his voice when he murmured, "You agree?"

A frown touched her lips, and she slowly drew to sit on the mattress again - but lower this time, further away. "No. I don't. I don't know what happened, but you came to save us, right? To come join us." Her hands slipped into her lap, chin drifting downward slowly. "You threw yourself on a Witch for us. Nick just... He wasn't there. He doesn't trust easy."

Distant confusion wrought Chris' thin brows together, eyes flickering up in faint thought. "... Witch? ... I don't... remember."

Rochelle closed her eyes, tensing them against a wave of emotion as she nodded her head. "You remember coming to find us? It was raining, hard." That sparked something in his eyes, slowly nodding his head. "A Witch was trying to kill Coach and me. You grabbed it. It -"

She choked on the words, turning her head away rather than come even close to looking at him. She didn't want to be the one to tell him, but it was her responsibility. He deserved to hear it from her, not Nick.

It was softly that Chris' right arm pushed under the covers, crawling over the mattress, the motion slow and tortured like even that small movement pained him. His fingertips just touched the side of her leg, the sheets a barrier between them. "Rochelle?"

A kind of strained and miserable laugh escaped her, shaking her head. "I don't understand how you can't tell... It - it took your arm, Chris. You were fighting it, and I hesitated, and it - your other arm is gone." Her voice was breaking, composure crumbling. There would never be a good way to tell him. "I'm so sorry. We couldn't do anything."

He didn't understand. She could tell, even without looking directly at him. His gaze riveted on her, staring, just a faint utterance of a breath escaping his lips.

Something disbelieving laced the way he retracted his hand - and something hesitant in the way he turned his head, gazing toward the space beside him. Silence reined as he examined the place where his arm should have lain, taking in how the blanket flattened where it should have been raised over his limb.

He strained, then, trying to move it. When nothing happened, panic flooded over his expression. It was slow at first, but soon overtook him. His composure fractured, abruptly thrusting his hand up, jerking with the motion to push the sheets off his body. "N-no - I do not... I can... ¡Puedo sentirlo!"
Chin lowering, his eyes alighted on the bandaged stump of his left arm as the sheets drew messily away. "It - it is -" Rochelle had no choice but to watch as the realization clicked into place, suffocating on the desire to take it all back.

"No lo… creo..." he whispered, ghosting the words, voice so rough with pain and fear it hurt to hear. Rochelle reached out trembling hands, like she could soothe him - but he surged away, flinching frightfully, and she stopped. "¿Cómo es posible? ¿Cómo es que sigo vivo...?"

Agony wrenched at her stomach, guilt clawing its way up her spine with nails of icy, bitter regret. The meaning of most of his words escaped her, but the tone did not. She shook her head, trying hard to keep the tears at bay; they threatened more and more with every word she forced out. "I'm so... so sorry. If I could have -"

No. Don't focus on you.

"... You'll be okay. I promise. I swear, we're going to keep you safe. You didn't deserve this."

If Chris parsed her words, he gave no indication of such. A sort of frantic mumble left him, raggedly, his shaking hand raising to reach toward his stumped shoulder. "I am... estoy soñando..."
He grasped just above his clavicle, squeezing. "Claro..."

Rochelle buried her face in her hands, pressing fingertips against her eyes forcefully. "I know it's... hard. Please, Chris, just -"

As if he'd abruptly been reminded of her presence, Chris gazed sharply up toward her. It was with a faintly broken shudder that he grasped the sheets, tugging them back into place over his shoulders, gasping in pain at the gesture. He blurted out, "P-por favor. D… déjame solo, por favor."

Looking back up at him, Rochelle gave a stuttered exhale of frustration. His expression was earnest and pleading, but he was speaking too quickly and she didn't understand a thing except for 'please.' "W... what? I'm sorry, I -"

He shook his head, frantically. His body moved in slow motion, every shift met with a shudder of pain, until he'd slowly crawled himself against the headboard. "Leave me. Please." His posture collapsed into something almost fetal, curling in on himself and drawing his forearm over his eyes to hide them.

"I... I don't know if that's a good idea." Rochelle hesitantly placed a hand on the bed, trying to keep her voice steady despite the hitch that threatened it. The Spaniard looked miserable, and small, and her gut was wringing itself into knots. "I know you're scared, sweetie, but I - I don't think you should be alone. We're all - ... I'm here for yo-"

"¡N-no quería que me vieras así...! No lo soporto..." His tone was close to desperate, and harsh breathing wracked his frame, picking up speed and shallowing until it approached hyperventilation. His legs drew into a curl, bundling under the sheets. "Go. Please."

Startled, almost, Rochelle stood off the bed - and as soon as she'd risen, so too did a wave of wetness over her eyes. She turned herself away in a stumble, palming over her eyes to stop the tears from scattering down her cheeks. Chris wanted her gone, and while part of her had expected such - Another part was injured, cut by it.

What could she have done to make him feel better, anyway?

Rochelle's body moved of its own volition, hurrying across the carpet and to the bedroom door.
She tried not to run, but found herself doing so before she could stop. She ducked out into the hallway, closing the door and leaning her body against it, bowing down into a hunch.

She felt sick, almost. Nauseated. Disappointed, and mostly in herself. "Stupid." she muttered, eyes tightly closing, anger suddenly rising at the feeling of wetness that trickled down her face as they did. "Stupid, stupid. Couldn't have handled that worse." She tried to wipe at her cheeks, but her hand didn't make it all the way there.

"Eh, I dunno." Nick's curt and matter-of-fact tone shocked her into a gasp. "Always further down to go."

He was leaned against the wall just to her left, body posed casually. The look on his face was almost demurely disinterested, as if he was just a stranger observing her at a distance. Rochelle had only moments to feel furious that he'd eavesdropped - then she just felt hollow.

"Breathing room, right?" At his words, she looked up at him. "Go upstairs. I'll make sure he doesn't do anything stupid."

A crease twitched at her brow, slowly moving to wipe her knuckles beneath her eyes. "Don't grill him. He needs time. Please, Nick." She didn't mean it to come out harshly, but she couldn't tell what her voice was doing anymore.

Nick gave her a limp eye-roll. "Promise." he retorted, sarcasm bloating the word. His body shifted, moving a few inches closer before resettling against the wall. "Won't even talk to the guy. Just keep an ear on him from here, make sure he stays down." When her gaze remained dubiously, unsteadily, on him - he sighed.

"We doin' pinky-promises now or something?"

Rochelle shook her head faintly, turning her chin away. Her lips dragged into a frown, and her voice was soft as she pushed away from the door and approached the stairway. "We can't fix this one, Nick. This doesn't get better."

The gambler watched her go, head tracking her movements as she ascended the stairs. His mouth remained a rigidly flat line, some amount of tension in his low-lidded green eyes. It was better to shove her off on Coach and Ellis than try to comfort her himself; he didn't know where to begin. They were better at that.

Slowly, after she'd disappeared up to the second floor, his eyes cut sideways to examine the bedroom door.

When had he ever made good on a promise?
Chapter 144

Christophe was drawn into a ball against the headboard by the time Nick pushed his way quietly into the bedroom. He closed the door gently, using the palm of his hand to guide it shut, knob held twisted so he could slowly release it and close the latch without much noise. It was his first footstep that drew the Spaniard's attention, though he barely acknowledged him.

Taking the distance between him and the end of the bed, Nick drew his arms into a cross over his chest. He gazed critically down at the slumped man, head ticking into a tilt. He waited - just long enough for Chris' head to shift, one eye staring dully out at him from over his forearm.

Nick didn't bother to see if he'd say anything.

"She doesn't want me to talk to you, so count yourself lucky when I keep this short." Slowly, Nick leaned forward until he could place a hand on the footboard of the bed, hunched in. His other hand slid into the pocket of his slacks, sprawling his body in a posture that was simultaneously casual and aggressively broad. "I have a question. You're going to answer it."

The foreigner gazed at him, eyes so thinly focused that Nick wasn't entirely certain he was being understood. "... Why?" A slight snarl touched the edge of Nick's mouth, anger stirring at the seeming refusal - but Chris continued, voice quieting to something rough and hollow. "Why am - why did you help me? Intúil.. I am... no use."

That made Nick snort, snarl flashing into a flat expression as he absorbed the man's words. He felt only a vague annoyance where a better man might have felt sympathy, shaking his head. "I'm not the person to ask that. I didn't have that much of a say." Chris' face lowered softly, burying back against his forearm, and Nick shrugged a shoulder. "Unfortunately for both of us, I'm surrounded by bleeding hearts."

When Chris failed to respond, body adopting the slowest of tremors, Nick bit hard on the inside of his cheek. As much as he wanted to get furious, he wanted answers more. So he leaned in, voice dropping to a simple mutter. "Look, asshole, if you wanted pity, you shouldn't have chased Ro' ou-"

The Spaniard's head lifted, sharply - too sharply. Pain fluctuated over his face with the motion, but he spoke anyway, suttered. "¡Mirame!" His eyes softened after the outburst, dropping, and he gazed down at his bandaged shoulder with an empty frown. "I do not... I cannot -" His jaw moved for a beat, thinking, before settling on: "I cannot see her." Chris closed his eyes, exhaustion sweeping over his features until they became almost sunken, sallow. His voice was almost faint when he questioned, "... I upset her?"

"Do I look like I'm here to talk about this?" Nick returned, agitation twitching at his brow. The Spaniard didn't flinch at his anger, but his chin lowered in silent acknowledgement. "Are you going to answer my goddamn question, or aren't you?"

Chris' eyes did not open, and it was just softly that he acquiesced. "Sí."

The gambler stepped to lean a hip against the footboard, exhaling in a slow stream, like one might blow out smoke. It was on the final moment of exhale that he spoke, green eyes ferociously attentive on Chris. If he lied, Nick intended on catching it. "The Angels. There were more of you."

Chris nodded, just once, simple. "How many?"
Sighing softly, Chris' head slumped. He slowly tightened his arm, drawing it around his legs and tightening it to hug his knees. "... ¿Antes? ... nueve." That startled Nick outright, not that he let it show on his face. Nine? He hadn't expected nearly so many people. "We... there was... un incidente. We separated."

Nick let the hand that wasn't in his pocket drift up, catching his palm against his jaw and rubbing there. "So it was you, and the two assholes you were with?"

Negation flickered in the sigh that escaped Chris, lips tugging downward. "Two more."

At that, Nick exhaled lengthily. He chewed on the correction, weighed it - and noted the part of him that experienced a vaguely pleased sensation. He'd figured there were more already, keeping in mind Rochelle's observation of the kill scores at the entrance of Tybee... but knowing Chris was openly admitting it helped him relax. Just a little.

He hadn't legitimately suspected that Chris had been working with Brenda previously, but that was a far cry from actually trusting him. There was a test inlaid in his words, and Nick's reaction hinged on his success or failure. So far, he was passing. The next step was who those other two members were, and he took a gamble. An educated guess.

"Phil and Sean?"

Nick knew he'd struck home when Chris jolted against the headboard, eyes flashing open to stare at the Northerner, lips faintly parting. Shock mixed with confusion on his features, and Nick couldn't resist the smallest and most hollow of smirks. Rather than explain, he merely continued.

"What are the chances they're around?"

Slowly and forcibly shaking out of his surprise, Chris managed to respond, wetting his lips with a vague pass of his tongue. "¿Aquí...? No... no. No lo creo. Sean está... muerto." A distant pain twitched at his eyelid, something Nick might've missed had he been paying less critical attention. "Phil... left. Why...?"

Eyes narrowing, Nick carded fingers through his hair, dragging his fingers across his scalp until they reached the back of his neck. He scratched there, frustrated, voice tightening. More news part of him expected. "Left where? When? We know you had a fourth member here in Tybee. Is he still here?"

Some panic entered Chris' posturing, shifting, though it clearly hurt to move. Distress and confusion made him shake his head, inhaling with a short stutter of air. "How do you -" Nick kept a close eye on the man's behaviour.

Was he merely upset and confused at Nick's knowledge, or was he hiding something? It became difficult to tell what was merely erratic, and what was suspicious.

"My questions, your answers, buddy." Nick half-growled, tension making his fingers curl into fists. "You know they blew the bridge into Tybee, right? If he was here with you, then he's probably still here." Chris' head was still shaking, and Nick could see the composure cracking, breaking.

Though it frustrated him, a part of him recognized that he could only push the guy so far. He was exhausted and in pain, among other things.

Nick inhaled - then exhaled, working his voice into something flatter than it previously was. "If you actually came to fucking warn us, help us, then consider this phase two." That was enough to jog Chris into some kind of sense, and though his body was still trembling, he nodded. His eyes had gained some amount of energy since they'd started talking, but they became vaguely deadened after that.

"You have a habit of picking bad friends, so what kind of friend was this?"

Slowly, Chris let his chin lower til it almost touched his chest. He chewed at his lower lip, either thinking on the question - or just trying to piece together the words to express his answer. "... Phil was... not like them. He - we did not kill people. Not until..." The foreigner gestured with his fingers, flatly, indicating outward.

"You didn't turn into murderers - attempted, thank fuck - until you did." Nick grimaced, closing his eyes with a tired breath. "Great. Perfect. Model citizens, right up to when you go Lord of the Flies."

Christophe leaned against the headboard, slipping down a few inches to curl tightly against it with a pained hitch to his voice. "No... We.. stole. Pues - hemos... perseguí- em..." he rambled, distantly, and Nick could tell his focus was waning. "Attacked people. Did not like it, but - it is... how it is now, no? B always said..." He trailed off, eyelids drooping, a limpness touching his body.

A snort escaped Nick, shaking his head. "Drank the Kool-Aid, kid." he muttered mostly to himself, almost resigned, looking away for a beat. It wasn't sympathy he felt, he was sure. He was just tired. Exhausted, suddenly, and why was it that all he could think of was that goddamn diner full of bodies?

Wasn't it possible, if he'd met someone else... if he hadn't ended up with his current team... that Nick could have become warped? Hadn't they kept him straight, kept him focused? Kept him from doing things he would have - might have - regretted?

Disasters made monsters out of even good people, and Nick wasn't a good person. If he'd had to choose between being alone in the apocalypse or siding with those around him, good or not, would he really have chosen the former? It wouldn't be the first time he'd gotten into the wrong circles, and done bad things.

The thought left a sour taste in his mouth. His lip curled up from his teeth, agitated, and he was prepared to spit out something harsh - but Chris was already speaking, "If... he is here, no fear. Phil is good. He left... upset. No gusta Jerry." His tone was muted, exhausted. A slur entered it, and Nick was left to watch as his head twitched in and out of a slump, like a doze.

The gambler slid his arms to hang limp at his sides. It wasn't really a satisfactory answer, but it was enough. If the stranger they'd found evidence of had to be somebody, he'd accept somebody who hated Jerry. That was, at least, a start.

He shrugged, heavily, relenting with a taut sigh. "Fine. That's enough." He'd already driven Chris close enough to a breaking point; the last thing he needed was Rochelle catching on, or coming back downstairs. "I'll leave you alone, for now."

Cuffing knuckles against his chin, Nick cocked his head, letting the gesture guide his body into a swivel. "Don't tell anyone we talked. I don't need a new reason to want your ass gone." He spun on his heel, walking toward the bedroom door.

Christophe weakly slid down the headboard, a groan of pain escaping him as he worked his way to curl flat on his side, head tucked low and weight resting on his good shoulder. His eyes flickered shut, exhausted, and the faintest mutter escaped him.

It took Nick a moment to register it as "Gracias."
He halted, arm in the middle of extending out to reach for the doorknob. Confusion worked into the twitch of his brow, turning his head enough to glance back at the Spaniard. What he could see of the man's expression was distant and hazy enough to blame the words on exhaustion, but Nick couldn't resist asking. "... the fuck for?"

Although his voice was thick with a distant pain, there was an edge of something almost like humor. Cold, fractured humor. "No sientes lástima por mí."

Nick's jaw gritted faintly. It took a second to parse the words, working backwards to unravel the sentence and then put it back together until he arrived at the translation: You don’t feel pity for me. He thought the words before the meaning settled in, and with it came frustration.

He left rather than say anything, because a part of him could understand that sentiment.

Pity was for broken men.
Rochelle's eyes were closed where she laid on her side, resting her head on Ellis' lap. He had his arms draped over the back of the sofa so his body sprawled out, thoughtfully tapping a foot, eyes low to gaze on her face. She hadn't said much, other than that Chris was awake and had learned of his missing arm - but it was difficult not to notice that she'd been crying.

He waffled between saying something, and respecting her space. The last thing he wanted to do was upset her further, but the silence in the room was setting his nerves off.

Ellis rolled his lips against one another, sneaking a glance up at Coach. The older man was already looking his way, and gave a slowly deliberate blink down at Rochelle. The communication was clear, and Ellis couldn't resist a slight widen of his eyes.

He carefully raised a hand from the back of the couch, gesturing at Coach, insistently. The ex-football player gave a hapless shrug and a shake of his head, and Ellis couldn't stop a strained expression from tilting at his lips.

‘What do we do?’ he mouthed, intently.

A grim kind of clench touched Coach's jaw, putting his hands up. One mimed talking while the other pointed at their female teammate, and Ellis gave a bewildered shake of his head. If Coach didn't know what to say, how was he supposed to?

"Okay, boys." Rochelle muttered, voice low and just faintly amused. She didn't bother to open her eyes. "You don't have to tiptoe around like I bite. I'm fine."

Ellis immediately startled, shooting her a glance, abashed and wary. "Uh, we weren't - I was just -"

Coach, on the other hand, slipped his arms into a calm cross. He shook his head with a subtle roll of his neck, quieting Ellis. "You ain't gotta be fine, babygirl. If somethin's botherin' you, tell us."

The low-lidded ease of his gaze settled on her, and she blinked her eyes open to return the look, though hesitantly.

Her lower lip slipped between her teeth, tongue running over the rough patch of freshly healed flesh where she's nervously torn into it earlier. The abused texture bothered her, and it took active effort not to slip a hand up and attack the beginnings of a scab. "Just wondering what we can do for him. I've never... it's not like losing an arm is something you just get over. I'm almost more worried for how he's going to feel than if he's going to live at this point…"

The eldest survivor grunted out a rumbled breath, shrugging up a shoulder. "Ain't outta the woods yet on that, but I take yo' point."

Frowning softly, Ellis cocked his head. "Well... Y'know, back when I thought Keith might lose his leg, I did do some research on shit. Y-" Coach shot him a confused look, brows up in bewilderment, and the mechanic's frown switched to a bashful half-grin. "Oh, uh, yeah. I ain't told you, Coach. So, this one time, me'n'Keith were tryin' tuh climb this barb-wire -"

With the slightest of strained tones, Rochelle broke in, interrupting him smoothly. "Keith did Keith stuff and almost lost a leg." A soft snort escaped Coach at that, a twinkle of humor entering his eyes when Ellis looked just a little put out at being railroaded.

"... Well, yeah. Guess that covers it." he admitted, jaw shifting forward a half-inch, releasing a laugh to cover the fact his feelings got just a little bruised. "So I was thinkin', y'know, best if I learned what tuh expect. Just in case it happened. Read a book on it."

Nick's voice came from the stairs, droll and mock-surprised. "You can read?"

Ellis' pout went even more thoroughly injured, craning his head around to peek at the older man as he came up the stairs. "That ain't nice, Nick…"

Hearing the Northerner made Rochelle jolt upright, pushing hands against Ellis' thigh to straighten on the couch. She turned, eyes darting to Nick's, a question inherent in their attention. Nick gave her an annoyed scrunch of his brow.

"He's asleep. Do you want me to tuck him in, too?"

She sighed, just softly, shaking her head. "Okay… thank you." She shifted, pushing away to sit upright on the sofa, a leg curling underneath her. Looking back at Ellis, she forced her expression to smooth out of the worried pinch it's gained. Instead, she offered him a faintly encouraging smile. "Go ahead, Ellis."

Ellis' sulking look didn't completely disappear, but he focused on the conversation at hand, shrugging up his shoulders. "I don't remember everythin', but… I mean, folks go through therapy'n'stuff. Like not just seein' a shrink or nothin', but physical stuff, too. You gotta like… recover. Guess it's better than a leg, seein' as he can still walk."

It was almost subconsciously that he flexed the hand of his left arm, and Rochelle noticed. She wasn't the only one having sympathy pains. "But, y'know. If he don't got an arm, then like - his shoulder joint's gonna get weak, since it ain't gettin' used."

Coach nodded slowly, some thought in the way he laced his hands over his gut and tapped his thumbs on his shirt. "Had a boy get hurt in a game once or twice. Did some PT with 'em. Don't know if it applies, but we can try."

Ellis nodded eagerly, sucking on his teeth with a blink. "Ain't gonna hurt. Ro's right, though. I wouldn't blame him none fer bein' upset, but - y'know. Folk get depressed'n'shit." The Georgian lifted his arm from the back of the sofa, scratching at his cheek. "I ain't never seen Keith like how he was when he thought they were gonna take his leg. Like, after, he was all jokin' that he wished they had, so he could get a pegleg - but while it was happenin'... Man. I was worried."

"I can't believe you assclowns." Nick muttered, somehow simultaneously scathing and bored. He stepped across the loft, ducking past the seating, and moved to the glass door. The gambler hooked a finger on the lock, undoing it, and pulled the door open just a crack. The air that drifted in was crisp and refreshing, with a scattered sense of salt woven into the breeze.

Nick rested a forearm against the wall just beside the door, gazing out over the balcony. "All the guy's put us through, and you're sitting here worrying about his feelings. Should we go find some flowers? Some chocolates? Maybe write him a nice 'Get Well Soon' card?"

Rochelle gave a scoffing sigh, shaking her head. She allowed her eyes to close, a vague frustration running up her spine. "Nick, can you just shelve the dick routine for five minutes? It gets really old sometimes." Ellis' mouth gawped as he blinked between them, caught off-guard by the tension suddenly bursting to life as Nick cut a glare over his shoulder at her. "How would you feel if you lost a limb?"

Dusting a hand against his dress shirt, palm brushing over the dried-out bloodstain where Brenda had grabbed at the fabric, Nick honed his voice to a point. "In the apocalypse? I'd probably shoot myself in the head."

A startle went through all three of his teammates, though the surprise was tinged differently in each of them. Coach, disapproving, like he was picking a fight. Rochelle, offended, like he was mocking her. Ellis, horrified, and Nick didn't bother to wonder precisely why.

"My point - yeah, shocker, I have one - is that doing the whole love and caring, touchy-feely shit might not do it for this. You ask me, we get him doing something productive, and fucking soon, instead of laying there like a goddamn invalid. He's no good to us like that, anyway."

Rochelle strained to get a response together, struggling, and her eyes gave away the shift in her surprise - because Nick was offering an actual suggestion, one that almost passed as helpful. Almost. "He... is! He's the literal definition of an invalid. I'm not gonna throw a gun in his hand and kick him out to fight!"

Nick couldn't resist putting his mouth into a purse, exaggerating it with a faux-musing tone. "Mmm... Gun's probably a bad idea. Kinda hard to reload with one hand." When he made the effort of mockingly tucking his left arm behind his back - miming a gun in his other hand and twisting it around with a bemused look on his face like he were puzzling out the mechanics - Coach sighed. "Hate to say it, but Nick ain't wrong." As Rochelle shot him a betrayed look, Coach shook his head. "Babygirl, I ain't sayin' now. But... y'all didn't miss that messed up, survival-of-the-fittest shit them Angels were spoutin', did you? Seems to me, worst thing we can do is let him think he can't help out... that he's helpless. Not 'cause we agree, but just fo' his sake."

Keeping utterly silent, merely cocking his head and turning back away to distance himself from the conversation, Nick felt the vaguest self-satisfaction. He'd set the conversation in motion without tipping his hand more than necessary. He didn't want to appear like he was looking out for the guy. He was looking out for himself. The last thing he wanted was to draw this process out any longer, and he definitely didn't want dead weight on the team. As far as he was concerned, Chris had a long way to go before he earned his place.

"I guess." Rochelle allowed, hesitant. "I don't think we should push him, either, though. Getting him on his feet is fine, but fighting? ... He's gonna need to recuperate. I don't even know if he'll be able to fight like this."

Coach eyed her distantly, dark eyes thoughtful and mouth quirking a little. She didn't miss the look, giving a confused one back at him.

He sighed quietly, shaking his head. "Probably the sort of thing he shouldn't hear right now."

Some surprise darted over her expression, along with a faint edge of self-defense. "I wouldn't - say that to his face. I'm just trying to be realistic." Rochelle tucked her hands in her lap, scratching at her thigh through her jeans. "Do you guys really think, even if he gets mobile, he's going to be in fighting condition?"

Ellis couldn't help but bounce his leg, springing his weight on the ball of his foot so his heel struck out a rhythm on the floor. "Well, don't take two arms tuh swing a machete..." When Rochelle turned on him with something very close to a glare, he slunk down in his seat.

"And when it gets stuck in something?"

Despite his visible trepidation, Ellis did lift a hand, one finger raised in a leery gesture. "It ain't like he's gonna be fightin' alone. Any one of us couldn't manage by ourselves out there fer long. I only mean, if he has to... it ain't impossible."

Rochelle exhaled out a frustrated noise, relenting with a shake of her head. "Look, I get it. We'll do what we have to do. I've seen all the same things you guys have; I know we can't always choose whether or not we get to rest. I just think we're getting ahead of ourselves."

"We're so fucking far behind at this point, it's not exactly hard to do." Nick shot over his shoulder without looking. His eyes caught onto a shape crawling up on a roof some distance away, narrowing, but he couldn't quite decide what it was. He reached to grab the door handle, shutting it. The fresh air was nice, but avoiding infected attention was better.

Ellis blinked in his direction, pinching his lips together - then blustering out a sigh that popped them faintly. "At least if he's wakin' up, maybe we can talk 'bout everythin' soon. I'm almost lookin' forward tuh him gettin' better... he seemed pretty nice." A hesitant smile crossed his face, glancing between his teammates, searching for assurance. "It'll be cool, havin' a new friend, right?"

"Talk about getting ahead of yourself." Nick muttered, sardonically.

Coach squinted in his direction, and though Nick was turned away, the smirk on his face said he felt it. "That's the spirit, Ellis." The eldest survivor leaned back, eyes closed, voice going firm. "All this shit aside, we're all here. We're together. Ain't sho' there's much we can't handle. Gettin' Chris through this is just another trial. We gonn' tackle it like anythin' else."

Where Rochelle nodded, despite herself, and Ellis broke into a grin - Nick outright laughed. It was a short sound, high in his throat, almost nasal. There was this almost tangible bracing between the three of them, anticipating his usual pessimism. Something critical and negative, to dismiss the sentiment.

Instead, he stated with dry humor: "Tackle? That's a little on the nose, Coach."

Ellis was the first to laugh. Rochelle couldn't resist a snort, covering her mouth with a hand, and Coach gave a tolerant roll of his eyes. "Like yo' ass has any room to talk. I hear one more gamblin' or card game metaphor from you, I'll lose my damn mind."

Nick was nothing if not quick on the uptake.

"You wanna bet?"

Between his response and Coach's over-exaggerated sour look, Rochelle and Ellis were lost, breaking into giggles where they sat on the sofa. Nick so rarely played along, let alone amicably, and let alone at a joke mostly at his expense.

He smirked anyway, and it was just a little self-satisfied.
Chapter 146

Something had gotten into the fencing. Snarls andgrowls sounded through the walls as it wandered the yard, seeming almost infuriated - like it had made its way in, and was now lost as to how to escape. Nick scowled as he listened to it, standing close to the wall.

He could track it as it moved around, though there were no windows on the street-facing side of the loft, so he couldn't see it. It circled the house a few times - then went quiet.

He'd just been about to relax, when the abrupt sound of metallic clanging announced it beating on the garage door. Fury clenched at his jaw. "I'm gonna fucking kill this thing." Nick stepped away, reaching to grab his katana where he'd left it leaned against the back of the sofa.

Coach eyed him as he moved, grunting softly. "I'll come with. Watch yo' back."

A snort escaped Nick, swinging his katana on a swiveling wrist. He turned, stepping toward the stairs. "It's one zombie." he stated, scathingly. It wasn't an outright rejection, so Coach pushed up off the couch and went to follow after him. Nick didn't argue, leading the way down to the first floor, dress shoes landing hard on the carpeted stairs.

"Be carefu-" Rochelle started to call down after them, but cut off with a noise of confusion as Ellis yelped, "Wait, wait, wait!" The kid's footsteps suddenly thundered across the second floor, scrambling excitedly for something.

Nick halted at the bottom of the stairs. His expression was mildly tortured, eyes closing, and Coach laughed under his breath - a sound that only contributed to Nick's frustration.

It was with a loping gait that Ellis threw himself down the stairs, his prize held in one hand while his other hand latched onto the railing to keep himself from falling: one of the handheld radios. He stuck it out toward Nick with a grin big enough to blind.

Nick avoided looking at it when he snatched the walkie-talkie away, turning it in his hand a few times. He'd forgotten how long it had been since Ellis had looked that... kiddish. Proud. Giddy and unburdened. Let alone in a look directed at him; part of him wanted to take it in for a moment.

"Really?" His voice had different ideas, going harsh of its own accord. It was reflex to snap, like the slinging of a rubberband drawn taut. His emotions and his thoughts had pulled too close to something affectionate, and if he didn't right himself, it just might show. He could never quite tell when that turned into an over-correction. "We're literally going into the fucking yard for two minutes, tops, you moron."

Ellis was undaunted, fisting a hand and setting it on his hip. His posture sagged into something chastising. "We got 'em fer splittin' up, man. If you don't take 'em when we split up, whut's the point?" He pointed at the radio in Nick's hand insistently, pinched mouth and screwed-up brows clear in their lack of compromise. "You never know what'll happen."

The gambler rolled his eyes, exhaling. He clipped the radio onto the waist of his slacks, angrily, freeing his hand to dismissively wave it in the air. "Christ. Fine, Mom." Nick said it as he turned on his heel, and had just enough time to witness the awkward blink that crossed Ellis' face. The faint pinch, like he was trying not to laugh.

It was weird.
It was weird of him to say, and he felt it.

Rather than confront the awkward utterance, Nick slid his katana-wielding hand up, holding it vertically at his side - and strode to the front door, thrusting it open to escape. If Coach noticed anything off, he didn't say anything, merely following along behind with a reassuring phrase thrown over his shoulder.

"We'll be right back, son."

As the Northerner stalked out onto the porch, he couldn't help a mental self-berating. Of all the shit to say... What am I, flustered? By some stupid Georgia hick? The thought sent a weird emotion through him. Something warm and almost unfamiliar - painful, nearly.

Like stretching a long-unused muscle. I don't fucking get flustered.

Snarling under his breath, Nick swung the katana up so he could grab it two-handed. The moment he began to descend the stairs, he heard the infected's snarling raise in pitch, swiveling, as the thing heard his footsteps. It wasn't until he got halfway down that he saw the creature.

It was a woman, garbed in thick jeans and a dirty white cami, heavy-soled boots on her feet. A backpack was strapped tight to her shoulders, full and jangling, and an empty holster on her hip indicated the place where a gun had once hung. He might've mistaken her for alive, had her skin not carried that corpse-grey tinge, and her face not had a hole blown through its jaw, taking out part of her mandible.

It looked like a wound that would've killed her, had her blood not clotted up furiously, scabbing in gritty clumps along the surface of the injury. The gaping hole made her snarls louder, sounding out even when she closed what remained of her mouth to bare the few teeth left.

Just a regular infected. Suits me fine.

Nick didn't have much time to react before she charged, arms flying up to claw fingers at the air, furious. Spittle drained through the hole in her jaw, turning rusty brown from the dried blood there, and she gargled out a sound of rage as she took the distance between them in huge strides. Coach shouted an alert, but Nick didn't need any encouragement.

He lifted his blade, waiting where he was rather than advancing and giving up the higher ground. She didn't seem to consider the tactics, throwing herself onto and up the porch steps, barely reaching when her hip collided so hard with the railing there was an audible crack. The lunge put her within reach, and Nick lashed out the blade.

He was aiming for her neck, but the angle was wrong and it hit to the side, hewing through her shoulder just above her clavicle. The blow struck, hard, and a shriek escaped her as blood sputtered up from the rent flesh. Nick prepared to saw down, to commit his weight to the attack and cut into her torso, but something stopped him.

Where infected usually ran at him, brainlessly, even when that meant impaling itself on a blade or worsening the damage already done, this infected stopped. She skidded on her heels, boots grinding into the sandy earth and body stuttering with the strike. The infected flashed its gaze to the sword, yellow-glazed eyes widening.

If Nick didn't know better, he might have said it looked afraid.

Before he could collect himself from the shock, the infected reached out, shoving hands against the sword blindly. She screamed, high-pitched and frantic, as the gesture freed the katana blade from her shoulder. Her hands were damaged in the process, deep gouges cut into the taut skin of her palms, but that didn't stop her from bolting backwards.

As she spun into a turn, scrambling away, Nick couldn't help but stare. It's... running? What the hell? His shock was such that he couldn't will himself to move, watching as she took a running leap, slamming into the fencing.

Her injured arm was limp, like he'd broken the structure of it too severely for it to move, but she got her other hand hooked on the top of the fence, dangling her weight there. She screamed, snarling, trying and failing to drag herself up with one arm, boots kicking and skidding wildly against the fence.

It bowed, complaining with a creak of wood, and realizing that she might damage it startled him into action. He reached down, grabbing the pistol they'd found in the Jeep - and he had yet to give to Rochelle - and yanking it free from his thigh holster. His thumb flicked off the safety as he raised it, bracing his knuckles against the wrist of his other hand, closed one eye to center the sights, and aimed.

The shot struck home by a razor-thin margin, just zipping through the edge of the zombie's skull. It splattered gore against the fencing, red and grey and black, and she dropped from her dangle like so much dead weight. Her body crumpled onto the ground, landing on her satchel with a whumpf. Nick couldn't resist staring, even as Coach slowly descended the stairs to flank him.

"... Lord Almighty," the older man practically sighed, sounding faintly bemused. "Ain't seen them common zombies run away like that. Too dumb."

Nick nodded in agreement, still moving slowly, shaking off the strange sensation clinging at the wings of his awareness. "I didn't think they had it in them. Seen a Jockey run away, Spitter, Smoker… hell, I swear they think. Plan, sometimes." When Coach shot him a fairly disbelieving look, Nick forced himself to shrug.

He wasn't about to relay the story of a Jockey nearly tricking him into killing Ellis in the swamp, so instead, he exhaled harshly. "You can't tell me you haven't gotten that feeling too. Sometimes their timing, their attack, it's almost… coordinated."

Coach tilted his head, absorbing that. "Guess so. Like them tongue-zombies an' Hunters pickin' the weaker of us, or them Jockeys splittin' people off an' draggin' us into danger. Ain't much thought about it." The eldest survivor rubbed at his jawline, scruffy stubble rustling under the touch. "Maybe it's whatever mutated to make 'em different, makin' them smarter, too. Or... less stupid."

"Maybe." Nick gave a dismissive shrug. "What about this bitch, though? She's normal, not mutated. Not a Smoker, or a Hunter. She's just... a person. Looks like she survived a little while before getting infected. Long enough to get equipped, anyway." He grimaced at his own words. "We're not going to have to deal with smarter commons, are we? If they start getting smart, and coming in hordes, I -"

Before he could finish the sentence, the radio at his hip gave a chirrup, and a mechanized voice came through. It was full of concern. "Ey, _Nick_, ev'rythin' olay? Y'awl? -"

Shoving his gun back into its holster, thumb flicking the safety as he did, the gambler snatched a hand around the radio and flicked the power button. Ellis' voice cut off with a fuzz of static. A certain relief flickered over Nick's face, grimacing over his shoulder at Coach.

The ex-football player didn't look particularly sympathetic, but grinned lightly, anyway. "You should be nicer to that boy. He means well."

"We're so close, I can practically hear him from inside the house! Him and his stupid radios." Nick muttered with an agitated energy, swinging his katana as he took the steps left to reach the bottom of the stairs. "Besides. Being nice to him was not abandoning him to die the instant I met him."

Coach watched him move for a moment, head cocking, then stepped to follow. The big man's head went on a swivel, examining their surroundings; though he couldn't see through or over the fencing, he listened for sounds of infected that might've been attracted by the gunshot. It wasn't as loud as a shotgun or a rifle, but it still echoed across the town surrounding them.

"How did y'all meet, anyway? Ro' and I met on the street. She saved me from runnin' straight into that first Tank we dealt with back then."

Nick approached the infected where she'd crumpled to the ground, upper lip peeling back in a disgusted expression at the heavy smell wafting up from the body. "Overalls? Eh. Not that much earlier than we met you two."

He knelt down, tilting his head to examine the body. The backpack intrigued him. It was full of something, though whether it was something useful remained to be seen. "I was walking into town and he blew past me in a decked-out, ugly monster truck. Nearly ran me over."

Coach laughed, just a gruff chuckle, but quieted when a voice yelped from above them.

"Whut?!"

There was a window just at the end of the stairs on the first floor of the condo, and Ellis had pried it open just a few inches, so quietly and carefully Nick hadn't caught the sound of the glass panel sliding upward. His face was pressed into the glass, and he urgently shoved the window up even higher, nose now pressed into the mesh wiring that separated him from the outside. "I did not!"

Nick turned without standing, an elbow resting on his thigh. He slanted his head to look up at the window, eyes rolling with the gesture. "Yeah, you did. Just outside Savannah. Yelling like a dumbshit the whole time - what were you goin', like ninety?" From what he could see of Ellis' face, the kid was shocked, eyes gone wide.

The gambler twisted his voice into drawled mockery, nasal with his Northern accent. "Didn't'ch'yer mama teach you how tuh drive?"

That startled Ellis out of his dumbfounded look, breaking into laughter, tickled. Nick wasn't sure if it was his mocking imitation or the revelation that amused him more. "Oh.. man. I'm sorry, I don't even think I saw you, or I'd'uh stopped! Guess it's a good thing I crashed, or we wouldn't'uh met, h'uh?"

"If that's the case, then when I write my memoirs, you crashing your car will be Chapter Twenty: The Worst Thing That Ever Happened To Me." Nick returned his attention to the corpse, fully aware of the fact that the words made Ellis' eyes soften a little, in that 'you don't mean that' sort of way. He hated that look, because maybe he did mean it.

Or maybe it was the worst thing that ever happened to Ellis.

He didn't want to follow that train of thought, so he reached to grab ahold of the infected's satchel, yanking it upwards.

With a grunt, he flipped the zombie over so he could access the backpack, unzipping its main compartment so he could look inside. There was clothing, a pack of handgun bullets - the wrong caliber for either his Magnum or the new pistol, he noted with a small irritation, and the gun itself was nowhere to be found.

Digging in, there was little else beyond a few rolls of bandages and a box of gauze patches packed into a plastic Ziploc. He grabbed it, holding it up in the air to show it off. "Delivery for us, apparently." he uttered, with a grin.

... a grin that vanished upon looking down at the space where the bag had sat within the backpack, and seeing what was underneath. "... Holy shit." For a moment, that was all he could say. "Holy shit. Holy shit!" He dropped the Ziploc outright, drawing a bit of a frustrated sound from Coach, who strode forward to retrieve it, brushing the outside off gently.

"Lordy, Nick. Breathe. What you got?" the football coach gruffed, stepping closer to get a look for himself.

The sound of the window wire mesh straining with the pressure of Ellis leaning into it - as if he could see from that distance - was almost audible. "Whut is it?! Somethin' good?" His voice went a little impatient, suddenly darting from the window to instead push open the front door. He'd just stepped out onto the porch landing when Nick straightened, his find held in one hand.

A box of cigarettes, and a lighter, clasped in a fist. "Holy shit, there is a God."

Coach's groan threw his head back, and Ellis stood there, frozen and blinking in disbelief as Nick tore open the box, almost laughing as he discovered it full, minus one or two cigarettes. He shook the lighter - red with a checker-print across the middle - and it sloshed delicately with fuel.

"I take it all back, Sam. You were right, this whole time. God is real and I love him." When Nick lifted his head, a slanted grin stuck on his face, his good humor was thoroughly undaunted by the vexed exasperation lining the postures of the two men staring him down.

"What?"
"No, no, no."

Rochelle had her hands on her hips, leaned in, head shaking furiously even as she spoke. Her face was lost between shock and offense, jaw cocked faintly forward. "Absolutely not. You are not smoking in here. We have to stay here for who knows how long - I am not going to sit around in cigarette smoke. It reeks."

Flicking his thumbtip against the lighter's trigger, Nick arched a brow at her. There was defiance there, like he was daring someone to try and take it away from him.

"I'll crack a window." he returned, dismissively, only to have her headshaking increase in pace. Nick raised his voice in mock-outrage, even though he could barely even muster enough energy to be irritated. Even just holding a box of cigarettes was soothing his heartrate to a calm beat. "What? You want me to go outside? I'll get jumped by a zombie or something, you heartless -"

"Just go on the balcony." Coach advised, with a sort of put-upon weariness... though also a sharpness, as if warning Nick not to finish that sentence. "You outnumbered, boy."

Narrowing his eyes faintly, Nick only spared a moment to glance around the loft, standing there at the end of one of the loveseats. Ellis was standing near the kitchen island, and his slightly abashed expression made it painfully clear he didn't intend on defending the older man.

Nick made sure to make enough eye contact to get across the message that Ellis would pay for the disloyalty - right before he broke into a sly grin, waggling the lighter. "Fine. Whatever. You assclowns can literally not piss me off right now. I am on cloud nine."

He practically swaggered to the glass doors that opened onto the balcony, sliding the door open and escaping onto the porch, closing it behind himself. There was just enough room for him to lounge against the railing, legs crossing, busying himself with his cigarettes.

Rochelle sighed, though the sound was half-amused. She crossed her arms, glancing toward Coach, eyes narrowing at his hapless shrug. "You guys were gone for two minutes. How the hell did he find cigarettes, and why did you let him?"

"That zombie out there had a backpack." Coach shook his head as he lifted up the bandage material they'd found, packed up in a plastic bag. "This, and cigarettes. Not much else." He did grin a little, warily. "Least he's in a good mood."

She gave a reluctant laugh, squinting slightly. "What are the chances..." Rochelle thrust her hands up flatly, the gesture a little bewildered, before approaching to take the Ziploc from him and examine its contents. "You're probably right, though. Whatever gets his panties out of their permanent twist."

Ellis blinked out through the glass doors, watching Nick place a cigarette between his lips and light it. The look on his face was practically blissful, and there was a heat in how he hunched forward and inhaled from it.

Between that and the savouring way the gambler held the smoke in his lungs, his exhale billowing out smoke and draining the tension from his body until he was slumped... Ellis felt stupid for feeling embarrassed, for having a heat rise up to his face. He hadn't seen Nick look that pleased and relaxed since -
Since the previous night, actually.

That thought only served to embarrass him more.

"Zombie with a backpack, huh? Wish more of them had supplies." She tucked the bag under her arm, smiling gently, even as a faint tension touched her brow. "Especially medical supplies. We should change Chris' bandages with this. Good timing, since we have water to clean it up, too."

Prying his attention away from Nick, Ellis hopped faintly onto the balls of his feet. He scratched at his waist, peering down at his clothing. As much as a mess didn't bother him, his clothing was starting to turn a little unrecognizable.

Blood and sweat and who-knew-what was building up, and he was sure he stunk. It was hard to tell how much of it was him, and how much of it was the gore and decomposition permeating the air almost permanently. "Man... I wish we had more water. Sure could use a wash myself."

Coach chuckled, spreading his arms in a slight shrug. He half-turned, looking back over his shoulder, eyes straining to look at the failing stitches that just barely held his shirt together across his spine. He wasn't looking much better than Ellis, especially after taking the brunt of the mess during Chris' amputation. "Shower, and some new clothes."

"Maybe we can find a clothing store at some point. We cut Chris' shirt up, too..." Rochelle sighed a little with the words, pouting out her lower lip. She hooked her arm around the baggie of medical supplies, freeing her other hand to gesture at her clothing. "And I wouldn't mind a change. Get out of these stupid jeans..."

That made Ellis laugh, crinkling his brow. "Yeah. I mean, these coveralls are comfy'n'all, but it'd be nice tuh have real pants. Not sure they'd have anythin' Nick would wear, though."

The reporter shrugged her shoulders, russet-coloured eyes narrowing with amusement. "Doubtful they have a suit shop out here, but who knows. I'd get a kick out of seeing him in some beachwear. Anyway, we'll see when we get there, I guess." She thumbed toward the kitchen. "If you guys want, I think there's some washcloths in there. We could at least wet them, do a scrub-down."

Ellis spared a faintly worried look at her, head cocking. "You think we should use up water like that...? Whut if we don't find no more?"

She sighed, pushing her tongue between her teeth, breath whistling softly with the gesture. "Honestly, you can do what you want. I'm going to spend the cup of water it'll take to feel a little less gross. I feel like I've earned it."

He quickly flickered to an apologetic look, like she was saying he'd implied otherwise - so she smiled at him, tiredly. "Later, though. I'm gonna get some food together. Chris should really take some more meds, keep the painkillers in his system. Especially for when we go to clean his shoulder...."

When Rochelle turned to step toward the kitchen, Ellis followed at her heels. "I'll help." he chirped, eagerly, and she disguised her relief behind a vague nod. After how the first time went... she wasn't about to go back to Chris alone. And if anyone could cheer him up, it would be Ellis. "You think more soup? Maybe he could handle some granola or somethin'. He's gonna waste away, at this rate."

"He ain't the only one." Coach groused quietly to himself, and Ellis gave a laugh, turning to sneak a grin at the older man as Coach made his way to the sofa to sit down.
Coach grasped at his bum knee, rubbing fingers on either side of his kneecap, exhaling tautly. His expression flickered through a few emotions before settling on curiosity, voice lowering to a questioning tone. "Hey, you two. You ever think about zombies bein' smart?"

As Rochelle mulled over their food stores, trying to decide on what was best to bring to Christophe, Ellis turned entirely to face Coach. He quirked a brow in interest, shrugging. "Smart? Dunno. They run intuh fire, and they get tricked by them puke bombs. Don't seem too smart to me. Heck, animals know not tuh run toward fire. Well.. mostly. I ever tell y'all 'bout the zoo Keith was tryin' tuh make?"

Both Rochelle and Coach shook their heads in slow unison, less because they thought that was the case - and more because there was little stopping him, even had they wanted to. Ellis brightened instantly, grabbing the edge of the kitchen island and thrusting his other hand up in a vague gesticulation.

"He tried tuh teach this squirrel how tuh jump through fire, like in them circuses with lions, but well... I guess it got scared, 'cause it just jumped right in. Lit up instantly. Then - I dunno if it was angry, or scared, or whut, but it ran right at Keith! Got up his pantleg, still burnin' - man, between him screamin' and the squirrel screamin' and me screamin'... well. Mama pretty much put a stop tuh the zoo thing after that."

Grabbing a small bag of granola, squeezing it and finding it a softer, oat-baked variety, Rochelle tucked the pack under her arm to join the medical supplies. "I don't blame the squirrel for that one. Poor thing." Her eyes cut back to Coach, crinkling the bridge of her nose. "As for zombies... I just think about when we were in the swamp, and that Jockey and Smoker attacked at the same time. Seemed like a weird coincidence. Felt like they split us off on purpose."

"Mn. Can't say Chargers seem real smart, though." He rubbed underneath his chin, musingly, only to look up and shrug them off. "I ain't got no point. Just thinkin' on things. Y'all go on and tend to the boy. Need somethin', holler, and I'll come down."

Rochelle didn't seem completely convinced, but flashed him a smile anyway. He seemed merely thoughtful, calmly so, so she let it go and crossed the loft to reach the stairs. "Okay. Let us know if something's up. C'mon, Ellis."

She canted her head to urge him to follow, descending the steps as he came up to her side.

They moved in an easy shoulder-to-shoulder line, steps matching as they went. She waited to speak until they'd gotten halfway down, sure Coach couldn't hear her anymore. Her voice lowered as they went down together, eyes closely watching the movements of her own feet. "Can you do me a favour?"

The Georgian blinked at her sideways, a grin touching his lightly stubbled face. "Course."

"You probably figured out Chris wasn't in the .. best of moods earlier. I don't really blame him." Her eyes softened, gaze averting with something like guilt. "I don't think I'm really who he wants to talk to right now. Could you kinda... take point on that? I'll get the meds and stuff ready, but I think he needs to talk to someone who isn't the reason he lost his arm."

Ellis was outright startled, fighting the urge to stop where he was. His body only partially obeyed, resulting in a faint stumble as he landed his foot half-off the next step. They were already at the bottom, so he only staggered down one stair before he'd recaptured his balance on the ground floor. "Uh... shit, Ro'. Why would you think that? The Witch took his arm, not you!"
His slightly raised tone made her eyes narrow, darting a glance back up the stairs - but Coach didn't react, whether by ignorance or intent. "I hesitated. If I'd shot faster..." She shook her head, though, before he could do more than pop his mouth open in protest. "It doesn't matter. I just know he didn't want me in there earlier, so... just talk to him, okay? Like everything's fine."

The younger man was still frowning, but nodded his head. He reached up to grasp a hand on his trucker cap, screwing it a little tighter on his head, determination seeping into his posture. "I can do that."

Rochelle gave him a grateful look, some amount of tension relieved. He smiled back, deciding against pressing her on the subject of her guilt. He understood how that felt: the weight of feeling like he'd done something to hurt someone else. Even unintentionally, even accidentally. He merely secreted the knowledge away. She didn't want to talk about it, or wasn't ready yet.

He'd just be open, and wait.

Ellis took the lead as they approached the bedroom door, carefully opening it up, butting his shoulder against the door as it swung open. He padded in far enough to get a look at Chris, tongue pressing into the roof of his mouth in a faintly nervous gesture as he noted the Spaniard was asleep. He had not slept well, it seemed.

Somehow, he'd ended up flipped, head near the footboard. He was curled on his side, stumped shoulder in the air, and the sheets were strangled around half of him, baring his naked upper body but wrapped tight around his legs. His bandages were misaligned, almost dragged off of his injury, though Ellis couldn't quite tell if he'd been actively fussing with them - or if they'd merely loosened as he'd restlessly moved on the bed.

Ellis couldn't help but notice the swollen flush around his eyes, stark against his otherwise bloodless, tawny skin. He'd been crying, not that Ellis blamed him. Still, sympathy stirred up in his chest at the sight, and he approached the bed at a cautious step.

Keeping her head low, Rochelle ducked across the room to reach the nightstand where they'd left the pills and a half-empty bottle of water. She set the food and medical supplies down, nerves tangible in the way she very carefully arranged it all out and started to crack open the pill bottles, moving gently with her injured hand.

As she did, Ellis carefully slipped to sit on the edge of the bed, cocking his head to align it with the angle of Christophe's. He stayed leaned away, trying to offer what little privacy he could, and uttered a gentle, "'Ey... Chris. Wake up, buddy."

When the foreigner failed to stir, Ellis pinched his lips, settling on reaching out and touching a hand to the man's waist. He jolted, hard, and Ellis recoiled. There was raw fear on his face, and for a moment, Ellis thought he might outright panic - but the moment Chris' eyes alighted on his, it dissipated.

In its place came a quiet pain, and he slowly pushed back down against the mattress, grimacing. "¿Tío..?" he whispered, voice strained.

Ellis' head cocked a little further, gradually returning his body to its previous posturing. "Hey, bud. I bet you don't feel nice right now, but we're gonna have you take some more meds, okay? 'N'eat somethin'. You'll feel better, I bet."

When Chris gave a bleary nod of his head, the movement staggered as if even it hurt to manage, Ellis flattened a hand out in a soothing gesture. "You don't gotta get up, but we should lean you upright a li'l. I'll put the pillow up on here -" He patted his palm against the footboard. "- and we can get you set. Okay?"

His voice was soothing, drawled with a casual tenderness, slow and clear. Christophe followed it with a fractured attention, the vague twitching of his brow indicating some difficulty - but he seemed to understand, lowering his eyes. "Vale." His arm shifted, pressing his elbow into the mattress, and he waited with a wince.

Ellis quickly leaned back, snatching up the pillow from the bed so he could set it up on the bed's footboard. He started to brace himself, reaching to get hands on Chris and help him shift, but the foreigner flinched in a way that made Ellis hesitate.

An urgent, quiet utterance left the Spaniard, shaking his head in clear negation. "I can..."

The Georgian blinked, hesitantly pulling his hands back. He could only think of Coach's instruction; that they shouldn't make him feel helpless. He struggled with it, something in his very core protesting the idea of sitting by and letting Chris potentially hurt himself, and couldn't help but frown. He didn't know what was the right choice.

It was more indecision than anything else that made him watch as Chris leveraged with his elbow, pushing against the bed and dragging his body closer to the footboard. The agony was visible in the lines of his face, jaw clenching, and it was all Ellis could do to keep himself from lurching forward and helping.

Chris slowly pressed his face into the pillow, body and remaining arm trembling strongly - then eased down, exhaling with the effort. Sweat beaded up on his skin, and he closed his eyes, lips parted in a faint gasp. His voice was reedy when he spoke. "Arm.. hurts..."

"I bet." Ellis practically crooned, turning himself a little on the bed so he could better face Chris. The Spaniard panted gently, eyes slipping past him, vantage now such that he could see Rochelle standing at the nightstand. His expression darkened just a little.  "S'why we're gonna give you some more painkillers, a'ight? You think you can take some pills?"

"Sí." Chris whispered, gaze thoroughly rooted on Rochelle.

He didn't seem angry. If anything, he seemed conflicted - ashamed, maybe. The Georgian squinted slightly at the other man, mouth pursing, before casually raising his voice. "'Ey, Ro'. You think you can run upstairs and get some water? Figure we'll need it later anyway. That, 'n'Nick needs tuh take another pill. While you got 'em open and he's in a good mood."

When she turned to glance at him, he got the distinct sense she knew what he was doing. The idea was only cemented by the obedient way she nodded, plucking up and palming one antibiotic capsule and turning to leave the room, a little quicker than was really necessary. She didn't close the door behind herself, but her hip brushed it as she passed, drawing it into slipping half-closed on its own.

Ellis glanced back at Christophe, watching as some of that darkness faded, leaving him mostly just weary-looking. The Georgian clenched his jaw, thoughtfully, chewing on his tongue. He settled on slipping away, standing up and moving over to the nightstand. He gathered up an antibiotic capsule and two painkillers, holding them in one hand and grabbing the waterbottle with the other.

"I'm real glad yer okay." he uttered, conversationally, tone light. "You saved Coach'n'Ro, y'know. They'd probably be dead if you hadn't come back."
Chris watched him as he approached, eyes dull. "I remember, a little." Although his voice had a raspy edge to it, some amount of humor developed as he spoke. "Did not mean, so literal, to... em... para expiar." When Ellis cocked his head, uncomprehending, the other man sighed softly, eyes half-closing. "... Lo siento. Hard to... focus."

"That's alright." Ellis assured him, giving a little smile. "Sorry I don't understand none. Y'know, Nick knows some Spanish. Maybe y'all can talk."

A faint kind of smile touched the Spaniard's lips, and Ellis couldn't help his expression from shifting into a grin in eager response. He took a chance on the moment, stepping to retake his seat on the edge of the bed. Chris' eyes lowered to observe him as he did, the smile only slightly fading.

"You okay, man? You seem kinda weird... when Ro' was in here, I mean." When that faded the smile entirely, Ellis splayed the fingers of his right hand, still holding the waterbottle between his thumb and palm. "I ain't tryin' tuh be nosy, s'just... she's kinda upset."

Chris gazed at him, jawline tensing. "I am... I do not wish to upset her. It is ... hard." His eyes closed entirely, and a sadness lined his features amidst the lingering pain. "You would not want el traje to see you like this, ¿no?"

Ellis froze, breath catching in his throat. Denial struck first - because surely he just misunderstood, or misheard. He wasn't sure what 'traje' meant, but he knew Chris had called Nick that once before. There was only one conclusion to draw from that, and it startled him into wordless horror.

With his eyes closed, Chris didn't seem to take notice. He continued, voice lowering to something almost mournful. "It is worse, to see her, I think. Even you... look at me, and I..." He blinked his eyes open hesitantly, and when his gaze alighted on Ellis, his sentence abruptly cut short.

The Georgian was white as a sheet, staring back at Christophe.

"Ay... ¿Tío...?"

Ellis might have started babbling, unsure if he meant to deny his and Nick's relationship or merely question how Chris knew - had the sudden ratatatat of gunfire not sounded out. Ellis had no idea how far off it was. It was muffled, but sharp enough to pierce the walls. A few blocks off? A few streets?

All he knew was none of them had an automatic.
Nick hit the front door shoulder-first, rifle gripped in his hands. He lunged out onto the porch, cigarette still held between his lips. He shoved the rifle up to his shoulder to scan their surroundings through the scope. The moment the gunfire had started, he'd wordlessly charged through the condo, ignoring the outbursts of his teammates.

Rochelle had yelped, and Coach had hollered a fierce "Shit." He hadn't stopped to say anything, and he heard them running after him. Ellis was roused from the bedroom, shoving himself clumsily through the door with as much grace as he usually carried. That being very little.

Nick's eyes kept catching on figures - but they were just infected, roused by the gunfire. The zombies seemed as unsure as him of quite where it had originated, as they prowled in varied directions, filtering down the road and around houses.

It was less like a horde and more like the slow shifting of attention, drawing away the same zombies that his gunshot earlier had attracted.

More gunfire sounded, and this time, Nick got a better sense for where it came from. It was definitely off to the right, echoing from the direction of the pawnshop and general store. That was not comforting; they hadn't taken the supplies and left. They were lingering, not that he knew why.

Even worse, they'd likely heard him and Ellis fighting infected while they were hunting for supplies earlier. It was likely that whoever they were, they knew the team was nearby... and if they hadn't already left, they clearly weren't concerned about running into them. That could mean a number of things, and Nick didn't like any of them.

Nick lowered the rifle, slowly, just as Rochelle suddenly pressed against his side. "Where -" she hissed, voice gone wild with something a lot like fear. He didn't know if she was wrong or right to feel that way.

"Few streets off, at least. Back around the pawnshop," he stated, voice bristled with an oddly calm kind of anger. He used his tongue to roll his cigarette to the corner of his mouth, inhaling sharply. Maybe it was the nicotine, but he mostly felt focused. "Fighting infected. Maybe we'll get lucky and the zombies will take care of them for us."

Coach's gruff tone came from behind him, at a slight distance. He hung back rather than crowd into the doorway, but worry baked into his tone with a certain tension. It deepened when more gunfire came thundering sharply through the air, though quieter this time - like they were moving further away. "What if they ain't hostile? Y'all don't think we should consider goin' to help them?"

"Whut if they are?" Ellis' voice was quiet, hesitant. He approached, stepping up behind Rochelle. She turned to glance at him, eyes flinching toward a concerned pinch; hearing him so suspicious was still strange, even if she didn't disagree. "If they got guns - whut if they just start shootin' at us? That sounds like a machine gun or somethin'."

Nick turned slightly, pressing back against Rochelle. His sudden turn made her stumble a little, and the gambler herded both her and Ellis into the condo. They obeyed with a wary scatter to get out of his way, and he stood in the doorway, stance wide.

Protective, almost, as he blocked the open threshold.

"There's no reason to go looking for them. If they're in trouble, it's their own problem, and we've got too much to lose going out on a limb for some fucker we don't know."

Rochelle's lips quirked downward, head tilting to follow. She slowly grasped at her bicep, squeezing there with her injured hand. "I know you're right, Nick, I just - if that was us... and someone could've helped but didn't..."

He shrugged, reaching up to pinch fingertips on his cigarette filter and pull it free from his lips so he could blow out a breath from the corner of his mouth. He'd already taken it down to a stub, voice gone a little raspy from the smoke.

It was a pack of menthols, and while he'd typically have hated the cool burn left behind, he couldn't begin to care. Being picky had stopped being an option a long time ago.

"Think of how many people are dead, Ro'. Anyone alive is either lucky as shit, or the type to thrive in a warzone. I think we've soaked up all the luck around here, so let's assume they're the latter - and I've had enough of that bullshit for one apocalypse. The slim chance they're friendly... is it worth it?"

Rochelle's expression turned to reluctant understanding, and she shook her head.

Nick replaced the cigarette in his mouth, taking one last deep drag. He held the smoke in his lungs, feeling the cold burn travel down his throat and eke its way up through his nostrils... and then he took a step back, smashing the cigarette out on the porch railing. He left it there, gazing in at the others where they stood.

"Anybody disagree?" As bluntly harsh as he asked it, he waited genuinely for responses, guarded green eyes flicking from Rochelle - to Ellis - to Coach. They shook their heads on cue, though none of them did so enthusiastically. Satisfied, Nick carefully stepped inside and closed the door behind himself. The sound as he locked the knob and the deadbolt was strangely loud.

Two snap-thunks, met with a now-muffled spit of gunfire from outside.

"Whoever's on watch should be lookin' out fo' them, too." Coach slid his arms into a cross over his chest, eyes drawn with hesitant concern. "Don't want us gettin' snuck up on. If they mean us harm, they ain't gonna announce themselves like a zombie bangin' on the door."

Nick nodded his head, wiping a hand idly on his hip. "Keep the windows shuttered, too. And no more gunshots. Not until we feel like they're gone." He started to step away, leading with his shoulder as if to brush past Rochelle and walk up toward the staircase.

He stopped, abruptly, when Chris' voice came thinly from the bedroom, straining to be heard. "¿Qué -? What is... going on?"

Nick's brow arched, but Coach spoke for him, head tilting and arms dropping from their cross on his chest. "He's up an' talkin'? When Ellis nodded, hesitantly, eyes averting, Coach shrugged a shoulder and gestured toward the bedroom. "You think he's ready fo' some questions? Ain't trying to push him."

"Uh..." Ellis curled his hands into fists, sucking his lower lip between his teeth. He'd barely had enough time to react to the idea that Chris might know about him and Nick, let alone decide how to handle it. What if Chris knew - somehow - and said something in front of everyone else? He'd seemed almost confused at Ellis' shock, like he hadn't expected it.

Or maybe Ellis was merely overthinking. All Chris had really said was that he wouldn't want Nick to see him injured. That didn't necessarily mean anything. It certainly hadn't inherently implied a relationship between them. Maybe he'd even misspoken; after all, his English was suffering from his exhausted and pained state.

He was being paranoid. How would Chris have even found out? Still, if he could just get a moment with him - just to make sure...

"Yeah... I think so. Just, we was givin' him pills, so... y'know." It came out stilted, forced, and Rochelle noticed. She flashed him a faint look of confusion, brow twitching. He could do little more than widen his eyes at her in a plea for backup, hoping she'd catch on and help him. "Give us a minute...?"

Rochelle didn't react fast enough, though, and Ellis could only watch as Nick dismissively waved a hand. "Sure, sure." The gambler strode toward the bedroom, shoving his way past the door and slipping inside. Coach followed suit with a faintly grumbled breath, quick-stepping to stay close as if to keep an eye on him.

When they entered, Coach was quick to speak, voice softened. "Hi there, son. Good to see you up an' movin'." Chris responded quietly, but Ellis couldn't hear what he said. He was too busy shooting Rochelle a frantic glance. She frowned, stepping close and cocking her head with a curious look.

Ellis pushed his mouth against her ear, cupping a hand against her temple to muffle his voice. He knew it trembled a little, strained with uncertainty, and he couldn't stop a bashful tone from hushing the words. "Is... there any way he - Chris knows? 'Bout... me'n'Nick?"

She startled in such a blatant way, practically leaning away from him, that he grew immediately certain she certainly hadn't told Chris. "What - no way! I didn't say anything...!" Rochelle blurted out, too loud, and Ellis quickly reached out to put hands against her arm, soothingly.

The gesture made her quiet, gaze flickering toward the bedroom doorway. Strained confusion wrought her brows into a quirked shape, teeth sneaking a nip onto her lower lip. "There's no way. What makes you think -"

"Come on, ladies." Nick drawled from inside the bedroom, impatiently and a little snidely. "This is a group activity."

Rochelle's eyes rolled at the Northerner, expression hesitantly flattening out to something cool. She reached to grab Ellis' hand, cautiously meeting his gaze and holding it. "We'll deal with it. Don't worry. Okay?" He only barely nodded, unconvinced, but followed when she tugged him along.

They padded into the bedroom, their behaviour earning them a dubious look from Nick. "Gossip?" he questioned, languidly stretching his shoulders where he leaned against the wall next to the dresser. Rochelle flashed him a low smile, blithely, before turning her eyes toward Christophe.

The gambler grinned to himself, eyes half-closing and weight settling more firmly against the wall. It was pure luck that he didn't glance toward Ellis; the Georgian wasn't nearly as good at keeping on a poker face.

Christophe had sat himself up, legs drawn into a messy curl under his body and hand braced against the mattress to hold his weight up. There was pain on his features, but he stifled it with a clenched jaw. It was mostly the winded tone to his voice that gave him away.

"Aquí estás..." he uttered, with something like a laugh hiding somewhere in the phrase.

His eyes then went vague, and maybe saddened.
"Chris." Coach approached the bed from the other side, allowing himself to drop down to sit on the edge of the mattress. His weight made it bow just a little, and the shift in balance jostled Christophe just enough to make him panic vaguely, gripping fingers against the bed to steady himself.

His ruined shoulder twitched, the muscles in his neck going tense, and the way he glanced numbly at the footboard made Ellis think he'd reflexively tried to grab it with a hand that no longer existed.

"You mind talkin' to us for a minute? We been hopin' you could... clear up some things." The eldest survivor placed his hands together, lacing his fingers, as if very carefully mulling over his words. Chris turned his head, sluggishly, gazing at him. "I wouldn't be botherin' you if it weren't important."

Slowly, the Spaniard averted his eyes down to his knees. "I do not know if I can help..." He didn't sound convinced, chewing at the inside of his cheek, but nodded regardless. "But... Sí."

Ellis approached tenderly, gathering back up the pills and water from where he'd practically thrown them onto the nightstand. He slid to sit next to Chris, holding the pills up on a flat palm. The foreigner cautiously gave up his grip on the bed to take them, fingertips trembling a little as he scooped up the three pills from Ellis' hand.

He slid them into his mouth all at once, dully, holding them on his tongue. Ellis quickly offered the waterbottle out, watching as Chris took the bottle and gulped heavily from it, downing the pills with only a faint strain. He recovered quickly, lowering the bottle to his lap with a tense few inhales and darting his tongue out to flick over his lower lip.

His eyes slid to gaze toward Rochelle, shaded under his brows with a dropped chin. "If you need, I do it. Anything."

There was some desperation there, and Ellis couldn't completely tell why. The younger man fell to looking between all of them in a slow circle, and there was something vulnerable in his posturing. Insecure in a way that was heightened, even from minutes earlier.

"A'ight." Coach allowed, gently, shifting on the bed. He settled his laced hands over his knee, gripping there, a weary energy touching his eyes. The big man glanced at Nick, but the gambler merely canted his head as if in surrender, and Coach continued. "You remember the fight we had in the gunstore? When Brenda went wild?"

Chris nodded, tautly, attention darting toward Ellis. "Sí. And... I'm sorry, hermano... I did not know they meant to hurt you, te juro - I swear."

Although it came a little strained, Ellis flashed a reassuring smile at him, nodding in a slow and soothing way. Absorbing the forgiveness in that gesture for a weary beat, the Spaniard seemed just the faintest bit surprised. It took him a moment, but eventually, he glanced back at Coach. "... y, ¿qué?"

"Us bringing up the military set her off." Nick leaned forward slightly, eyes slitting vaguely, tone placid. "Why?"

With a hesitant look, Chris stowed the waterbottle between his thigh and calf and raised his hand to touch his jawline, brushing fingertips against the scruffy facial hair there. His eyes flickered roughly between the survivors, slumping just slightly down where he sat. "Em. Coño. Yes. It is... hard to say."
Nick's calm tone turned a little irritated, head tilting. "Try."

Rochelle put her hands on her hips, fingers squeezing tenderly, agitation drawing her brow into a pinch. "Nick. Don't be a dick." The gambler slid her an unamused look, making her eyes narrow. "He's trying. It's okay, Chris, I know you're having a hard time with English right now... We -"

The foreigner's expression went dim, eyes half-closing as he inhaled. "No, no... not... language. I mean I do not know much." He shook his head, missing the slightly apologetic look that crossed Rochelle's face. "I did not see it - pues - de primera... First-hand?" Chris' eyes flashed around, questioningly, only continuing after a small nod from Nick.

"I only know what B told us." He grasped his hand around the waterbottle but did not lift it, a soft frown edging his features. Exhaustion heightened the lisp at the edge of his accent. "She went to evac, at the beginning. There was - habían entrado en pánico. They shot many people, because a woman was a Carrier, and the crowd... they panicked. They test, ¿sí?"

To illustrate his point, he raised his hand, two fingers extended, as if to tap at the inside of his other elbow. It was only when his fingertips made contact with air that he seemed to realize his mistake. Some amount of shame touched his jaw, as well as the too-quick way he lowered his hand again.

Ellis shook his head quickly, mouth screwing up in confusion. "Carrier? You mean, like -"

Nick pulled off the wall, stalking carefully to stand more directly in front of Christophe. He interrupted Ellis easily, eyes narrowing. "Brenda used that term, too. Please tell me that doesn't mean what I think it does, because -"

"You do not know?" Chris' eyes widened faintly, head twitching back on his neck, interrupting Nick with the same ease. He looked between the survivors with a growing kind of horror, lips hanging in a vague part. "... How?"

When a kind of fury twitched at Nick's lips, Chris quickly raised his hand, stuttering out a fast few words. "I-it just.. I am surprised. I thought..." Coach placed a palm against his back, half-soothing and half-bracing - and the younger man slowly shook his head. "The infection, it does not make you one of them. It stays in you, and you make others sick."

Understanding hit all of them in unison. Coach's hand drew back in a snap, eyes going dull. Nick reacted sluggishly, slowly stepping his weight forward and beginning a quick pace on the carpet. Ellis froze, reflexively looking around, as if unsure how to react at first.

"Oh.. God." left Rochelle in a vague breath, leaning back on her heels. "Fuck." Her eyes flashed wide, suddenly lifting a hand to clamp it over her mouth. It was with some horror that she turned, staring at Nick. He returned her stare, but uncomprehendingly at first.

"Nick..." She just whispered the words, muffled past her fingers. "Carmine."

The gambler's footsteps halted, fingers halfway through carding through his hair. It wasn't really shock or realization that appeared on his features, more a distant resignation. He lowered his hand, letting his thumb brush along the curve of his thin lower lip.

"Honey..." Rochelle uttered, reaching a hand out - but Nick stepped to dodge it without a sound, moving instead to approach the side of the bed, eyes slitted dangerously.

The Northerner slipped a hand into the pocket of his slacks, rolling his head on his neck, matching gazes with Christophe solidly. The foreigner didn't flinch outright, but he did lower his posture slightly, slumping vaguely as if in submission. "How do we know? You said there's a test. Like a blood test? Is that the only way to know?"

Chris shook his head slowly, putting some suction on his lower lip and letting his teeth press against it. "Do not know. But if you have not fallen ill, then... que yo sepa, you are Carriers." He spoke warily, nervously, seeming aware of the tension his words sent rippling through the gambler's body. "Some talk of... Immune. I do not think there are any. Just infected, uninfected, y Carriers."

Quietly, Coach spoke, arms drawing into something of a hug across his torso. His tone was gently questioning, but riddled with tension that made his voice rough and raw. "Are you a Carrier?"

"Que yo sepa." Chris repeated, nodding his head in slow confirmation.

There was silence, for just a few moments. Rochelle's hand kept almost lifting, like she were desperate to step close and touch Nick, but she repeatedly forced it to lower and held herself still. Ellis only gradually let his eyes settle onto Chris, brows drawn tight with worry.

"If... Do you think Brenda was right? Maybe she was right about bein' scared tuh call them in... Maybe we shouldn't. If they shot folk - if we're Carriers, and they were shootin' Carriers, I -"

That worry slowly shifted. Tightened. His tone went breathless with something frightened, and Rochelle's attention did a sharp turn, abruptly drawing close to the Georgian. She wrapped an arm around his back soothingly, and was close enough to hear his voice hitch when he spoke again.

"They ain't gonna shoot us. Right?"

Chris gazed at him, a frown plastered across his face, tired lines dragging at the corners of his eyes. "I... No se, tío. B saw these things in the beginning - there was fear. Panic. Maybe it has changed. But we have not seen the military since, or CEDA."

When Ellis turned half-away, not entirely disengaging from Rochelle in the motion, Chris was left to wince faintly. He averted his honey-brown eyes. A sigh escaped him. "... lo siento. I wish I could... say better things."

"It's not your fault." Rochelle murmured without looking at him, slipping her hand up. She braced her palm against Ellis' cheek, forcing him to meet her gaze. His stone-blue eyes were vague with a frantic energy. "Ellis, sweetie. It'll be okay. We'll figure it out."

Ellis stepped away from her, quickly raising a hand to tuck a knuckle on his billcap, dragging it low over his face. The shadow of it disguised the way his lips trembled, expression unconvinced. "I... hope so."

He drew no comfort from her words, and she sensed it.

Rochelle wasn't certain what shook her more: the revelations now sinking in fully, or just how much blunt fear was laced into Ellis' posture.
Chapter 149

Sitting on a lower step of the staircase, Nick slowly twirled his box of cigarettes in one hand. Every time it came vertical, he tapped it against the knuckles of his other hand, listening to the rustle as the paper sticks secreted away inside would jostle to one direction or the other. His eyes were aligned carefully with the window at the bottom of the stairs, the shutters slanted just right so he could see out.

Chris had begun telling the same story he'd told Nick, and the gambler had stuck around just long enough to ensure the foreigner didn't blow his cover - then escaped. He needed the quiet, and needed away from Rochelle's attention.

He wasn't upset. Upset wasn't the word for it. Did he care that it was likely he'd been responsible for a girl's death? Did it make his fingers shake a little, just a tremble, to know she'd turned into a Witch because of him? He wished he could say that, almost. That would have been the human reaction. To feel bad, to feel sympathy, to feel sorry.

Instead, he just felt angry.

Ain't that how it goes? Just when you think fate can't give you anything else, when you're tapped out, it finds a new way to kick you in the teeth. Turning into a zombie seemed preferable, almost. At least then he could've been saved the stress of thought. He glanced at his hand, staring down at the blue-green veins tracing lines underneath his skin. Shouldn't I feel something? Shouldn't it feel... like something?

A delirious part of him wanted to deny it. If he'd been infected, he'd have known. He'd have been able to tell if he were a ticking time bomb of a zombie virus. That isn't something that you just... don't notice.

The infected were mutated and wild and mad. Even the common zombies were vile, grey-skinned monsters, caught in fury and animal rage. How could that same virus be in his veins, silent? Harmless - except for, apparently, still being contagious? There was simply no way. He didn't know why he was putting such faith in Chris, anyway.

The so-called Angels of Death had done nothing but bring misery down on them. Why would this be any different?

His skin was crawling with some far-off disgusted sensation, and he decisively opened his cigarette pack, already yanking out another. At this rate, they wouldn't last him the day. He placed the stick between his lips, reaching for his pocket to search out his lighter, when the bedroom door opened. Ellis slipped out, head low and face masked under his cap.

Nick didn't say anything, but his hand stopped. He settled instead for rolling the cigarette back and forth with his tongue, eyes closing. He didn't want to talk, turning his chin away faintly, hoping Ellis might just pass him by. If the younger man needed comfort, he definitely wouldn't find it with Nick.

The gambler barely knew how to comfort himself.

He was kidding himself to think the Georgian might leave him alone, naturally, and Ellis drew cautiously close. However, as the Southerner pushed down to sit on the stair just below Nick's, he was silent. They sat there quietly, both unmoving except for the soft rustle as Nick toyed with his cigarette and the low sound of Ellis fidgeting a thumb against the toe of his left workboot.

The quiet wore at Nick's patience. He became hyper-aware of Ellis' presence, and that small sound became gratingly loud. Where he should have felt a temptation to leave, or snap until Ellis left, he instead mostly felt an urge to break the silence. Hearing Ellis talk would be better than this, surely. At least it'd be a distraction.

It was only gradually that Nick allowed his head to straighten back out. He didn't open his eyes, but he did exhale, switching to bite his cigarette between his teeth.

"Sucks, huh?"

He knew that wasn't the thing to say when Ellis' head ducked a little, hanging low. The younger man's voice was muted when he agreed, "Yeah."

"Yeah."

and there was a hanging silence afterwards that made Nick think he might not speak again. It was with a faint sniff that Ellis sighed, rolling his head suddenly backwards, entire body following with the motion until he flopped back awkwardly across the stairs above him.

It was enough to make Nick laugh, had he been in a better mood.

"You think they got a cure or somethin'? I mean, if we're carryin' somethin' - whut if... we can't go back tuh normal? I don't wanna make no one sick, but...

That did make Nick laugh, short and harsh. "Go back to normal? That's a pipe dream and a half, even before we found out we're all apparently zombies." He tucked an arm against the wall, leaning on his elbow, staring blankly out of the window. As much as he posed himself as if on guard, his mind was on anything but the view outside. "It's actually kind of hilarious."

Ellis peeked at him, sideways, a faintly confused frown twitching at the corner of his mouth.

"C'mon, dumbshit. Surely even you can see the irony." Nick thrust up his free hand, taking his cigarette from his teeth and letting it sit between his index and middle fingers. He brandished it in a sweeping gesture. "All this fighting to stay alive, and we've been sick this whole time. The military's probably gonna line us up against a wall and shoot us, same as the zombies."

He shouldn't have said it. Shouldn't have even been talking - and he regretted the words before they'd even fully formed, but his mouth moved faster than his brain could. Ellis' eyes flashed wide, and a hand slid to grasp at his chest nervously. "Y-you - you don't mean that. They wouldn't."

"Ellis -" The temptation to light his cigarette came back full-force, but Nick merely stared at it. He bit hard onto his tongue, barely stopping himself before he could keep going. We all know what they were doing with blowing the bridge into here: containment. Why save people who are literally sick, and making other people sick? We're the kind of people they were trying to cut off.

Why was he taking this out on Ellis? It didn't make him feel better to see the rising fear strangling itself on Ellis' face. It just made him feel worse - but maybe that was exactly the point. Maybe he just wanted to languish in feeling terrible, and if that meant lashing out at someone who didn't deserve it, fine.

For some reason, he suddenly hated that about himself.

"I'm just prepping for the worst." His voice went vague, off-hand. He pushed suddenly to stand, shrugging a shoulder, unsure just where he intended to go - but desperate to leave. "You know me. You be the stupid optimist, I'll be the smart realist."
He didn't get far before Ellis snatched at his wrist, fingers tightening. Nick stiffened at the touch, instinctively glancing toward the bedroom door. It was that gesture that made Ellis release him as quickly as he'd grabbed him, and when Nick looked back at him - the younger man was peering down at his lap, embarrassment strong on his features.

"... are you scared?"

Nick stared at him, feeling an abruptly hollow sensation in his chest. There was some strained hope on Ellis' face, and the older man could read it as simply as if it were written out in plain writing on his forehead. The kid wanted to feel a little less alone. It was the same look he'd had the night before; a lost and lonely fear.

It should have intimidated him, because what kind of anchor was he? What kind of strange circumstance had led to those soulful blue eyes wrought with hope and fear, looking to him? Him, of all people? He didn't know where to even begin... especially not when half of him wanted to run and the other half wanted to scorch away whatever ties bound them, then and there, because that was easy.

He didn't know what made him turn around. All he knew was he was suddenly facing Ellis, and something like truth was tumbling from his lips. It did not feel easy. "Maybe."

Ellis looked surprised for just a beat, lips faintly parting with the warmest of puffs... and then he snorted, turning his head away, a little smile curling at his mouth. "Me too." he returned, almost affectionately. He raised a hand to rub it down his face, flatly, and Nick felt some wary sort of relief when that smile lingered.

He'd stumbled on the right thing to say. Or a right thing, anyway.

"Maybe Chris is wrong, and there's immune folk, too. Maybe we ain't even Carriers - but." Ellis slowly lifted a hand, pressing his palm against the crown of his head, fingertips rapping on his trucker cap. "Even if we are... do we really got any other choice? Findin' the military, or CEDA, is the best shot we got at findin' our families. We can't just stay out here."

Nick slid his free hand into his slacks pockets, letting his gaze avert. He inhaled, canting his head. "... Yeah. Much as I'm enjoying our time out here, starving, nearly dying... y'know. Having a ball."

When Ellis gave a snort of humor, Nick shrugged his shoulders. "I dunno, kid. I'm stuck between trusting one of those Angels and trusting the government. Rock and hard place."

Ellis gazed up at him, warmly - but a little worried, too. "What else is there tuh do?"

The gambler was saved from having to respond to that by Rochelle stepping out from the bedroom. She gazed carefully between them, eyes alighting on the half-smile lingering on Ellis' face. Nick drew his body into something taut and defensive, taking a step away as if to distance himself.

As Coach slipped around Rochelle to leave the bedroom, she lifted a hand into a tentative gesture. "Ellis... can you give me a hand in here? Chris is exhausted, but we've gotta change his bandages before he gets some more rest. The painkillers should be kicking in soon anyway."

The youngest survivor gave a slow nod, hesitant. He pushed up from the stairs, slanting a look at Nick. It was a look the gambler did not return, choosing instead to gaze at his cigarette, rolling it between his fingertips. He kept up his disinterest as Coach stepped beside him, and Rochelle and Ellis disappeared into the bedroom. The door closed behind them, gently.

"We'll be a'ight, Nicky." Coach murmured, just between them. Nick barely restrained a faint sneer in his direction, an expression that turned muted when the ex-football player abruptly put a hand on his shoulder, flat and comforting with a squeeze. "We in this together."

Nick didn't even have the energy to argue.

He just pulled out his lighter.
"Are we sure we shouldn't wait some more..?" Ellis questioned, tremulously. "Maybe the painkillers ain't kicked in real well yet."

The look on Chris' face was stricken with anxiety. He huffed out quiet breaths, panting between parted lips with his eyes shut tightly. They'd barely even begun, and he already looked miserable... but vague desperation fueled his voice when he uttered, "No. Please. Do it now."

Ellis and Rochelle sat on either side of him where he lay on his side, stumped shoulder facing upwards. Unwrapping the existing bandages from his shoulder had made him whimper with every pull and graze of fabric, sweat building up on his skin.

The Georgian had to bite back apologies as he worked, and now, there was nothing separating them from the worst of Chris' wound but the gauze packed flat against it.

"Don't look, okay?" Rochelle leaned in close to Chris' face, and raised a hand as if to place it atop his head, soothingly - but she halted and retracted it shortly after she'd started the motion. Ellis couldn't help but peek up to see the vague frustration over her features. "Just... let us handle this."

"It is very bad?" the younger man murmured back, voice trembling and breathless with a thick dread. He obeyed her direction and did not open his eyes, going so far as to turn his chin slightly and bury his face into the mattress.

Ellis carefully plucked at the gauze, drawing it up and off the ruined flesh. It stuck here and there, peeling away, and he could see the shudder that passed down Chris' spine with the sensation. "It's better." he said, because that was as close to the truth as he could get.

The wound's swelling had fallen a little, though it was still flared an angry red around the deepest parts of the sundered stump. The scabbing had spread, and the broken, cracking sections that Ellis had observed seemed to have sealed back together with time to sit under moist antibiotics. He reached out a hand, hovering it just at the edge of the damage.

The idea of manipulating it while Christophe was conscious made his heartrate go up. So he spoke, quietly, and a little nervously. "I'm gonna touch it, okay? If it... if it hurts too bad, just say somethin'. We can give it some more time."

Chris barely nodded, gritting his jaw.

Tenderly, Ellis thumbed against one of the worst of the welted, separated pieces, where the cauterization had left trauma. It felt softer, and didn't give so much when he applied pressure. His relief was short-lived when the contact also made Chris' entire body jolt.

"¡Joder!" he hissed through clenched teeth, tone more than clear enough that it was a swear. The Spaniard visibly tried to hold still, but had only minor success. Ellis quickly recoiled, and Chris gave a weary and shaky breath. "I am.. okay." he muttered.

Ellis struggled to believe him when he sounded like he might vomit.

They'd gotten a bowl of water and a washcloth, along with the whole of their medical supplies.
Ellis threw the gauze over his shoulder, grasping up the washcloth where it lay puddled in the bowl settled on the mattress next to him. The rough fabric was lukewarm as he wrung it out, water pouring out between his fingers and pattering back into the bowl.

"I'll be careful, but this ain't gonna feel nice." Cautiously, Ellis gripped the cloth in one hand, feeling a trickle of water dart down his forearm as he held it up. He waited only a beat before daubing the washcloth against the wound, taking small swipes, careful not to move against the worst of the scabbing.

The flesh was still weeping - but when he examined the surface of the cloth, he found it mostly clear rather than the browned yellow-green fluids that had escaped it earlier. A little pinch touched his lips, aware of the way every touch made Chris flinch, but unable to do anything but persist. They were making progress... If they let up now, who knew what might happen.

Chris' breath turned wheezed, tension rippling through him. Each brush seemed to catch him off-guard, pain flooding him anew, and Ellis tried to move quickly while still tenderly.

A benefit to Chris' bedridden status was that the wound had stayed relatively clean. Still, sweat and a mix of blood and discharge lined the flesh in a layer of grime. He delicately cleaned it, head cocking back and forth and tongue caught between his teeth.

Little muttered outbursts escaped the foreigner, an incoherent mix of languages and syllables. Ellis raised his head, poised to apologize, but stopped when his eyes caught on a sight over Chris' waist: the man's hand had jolted forward, crawling across the bed, and laced fingers with Rochelle's left hand. They squeezed on one another, his knuckles going pale with the force.

Ellis quickly averted his eyes, feeling a strangled sense of embarrassment, and focused on his fingers as they moved. It wasn't his place to wonder just what the gesture meant. Assuming it meant anything at all - if he were in Chris' position, he'd want to hold someone's hand, too.

Although he could have kept cleaning at the flesh, there was an intensity to the injured man's trembling that made him think he wasn't going to take much more. That, and his ministrations had welled up blood here and there, and he didn't want to make it worse. "Gotta put on some more gel, then we'll wrap you back up, okay?"

Christophe uttered a weak "Okay.", voice distant in a way that didn't imply much understanding.

Replacing the washcloth in the bowl - now sullied - Ellis started to wipe his hands on his shirt, but changed his mind at the last second and just shook them out in the air instead. His clothes were hardly clean, after all, and he still had to touch the wound.

His gaze risked a dart upwards as he snatched the tube of antibiotic gel from where he'd tossed it in his lap, opening it up and squeezing out a helping onto his thumb. He barely ghosted his fingertip against the wound as he spread the cream over it, dotting it here and there.

Chris' reactions were much more subtle this time. He breathed in slow and cautious patterns, only hitching here and there as Ellis worked.

"Hey, Chris?" Rochelle murmured, head tilting to get a better look at his face. He blinked up toward her, eyes gone hazy, but still attentive. "... Mind a question? I know it's bad timing, but you're probably gonna pass out after this, and... this needs... privacy."

Ellis panicked for a beat or two before he realized what she was referring to - namely, not the tension between her and Chris. Then, he panicked more.
When the Spaniard gave a tired nod of acquiescence, Rochelle visibly braced herself. "You know about him and Nick?" Her voice lowered carefully as she spoke, nodding her chin toward Ellis in explanation. Some confusion flickered in Chris' eyes, lips starting to work at a response airlessly, and Rochelle's nostrils flared with an exhale.

"Their relationship."

Ellis flustered at the abruptness of her clarification, jerking his hand away rather than risk fumbling and hurting Chris. "R-Ro'! I wasn't even sure if he - now yuh done and -" he babbled, ears warming, as she slipped him a faintly exasperated look. "Lordy, this is the last thing -"

"I was..." Chris' voice wavered a little, but regained some strength now that Ellis had stopped touching his wound. "Is this strange? I - ¿no deber-? Should I not know that you are a couple?"

That startled Ellis into a strangled noise, sealing his lips. He hadn't expected Chris to know - and not know it was a secret? Some tiny part of him was a little pleased, to think someone had looked on him and Nick and merely accepted them as being together. There was another part, though, that felt some melancholy.

Christophe thought they were a couple.

Ellis wished he could be as confident in the fact.

Rochelle gently withdrew her hand from Christophe's, lips pinching faintly, in favor of thumbing against her temple. He gripped his fingers vaguely on the dead air now between them, slowly drawing into a clenched fist as Rochelle sat there silently for a beat. Thought ticked wildly in her expression, but she eventually just tossed out the question: "How...? When did you even... find out?"

The Spaniard seemed to grow nervous, lids lowering a little and body hunching faintly down against the mattress. His gaze flicked between them in short darts, a slight insecurity fueling the motion. "I... At the hotel. Jerry said you shared rooms. Supongo, ¿si? Como... I assumed."

With Rochelle flashing him a look of vague surprise, Ellis could do little but stammer.

"I - it ain't like we did nothin', I only switched 'cause - Jerry spooked me, is all! He was stalkin' around and I thought - so I went tuh Nick's room 'cause I was scared -" He fizzled out when he witnessed the faintly affectionate crinkle to her nose, sensing he was only digging himself into a deeper hole. "Guess that explains how he knew tuh look fer me in Nick's room." the Georgian allowed, weakly. He hadn't considered that before: why Jerry hadn't kicked down his original hotel room door first.

He'd gone straight to Nick's.

The woman's smile faded a little at the reminder of the attack on him, and her attention returned to Christophe. Her expression grew serious - so much so that Chris flinched, staring up to meet her gaze. "Look. It's a secret, okay? We need you to not say anything. Especially not to Nick."

When the Spaniard's lips twitched into a slight frown, confusion lingering across the amber-brown of his eyes, she shook her head. Her tone was gentle but pressing, leaning in further and speaking with the faintest edge of plea. "You seriously can't say anything. It's ... kind of a delicate situation."

Some weary acknowledgement flickered on in his eyes, a vague nod of understanding twitching his head. "You are - ¿cómo se dice...? ¿Los armarioazos? In the closet?"
Ellis' first reaction was to protest, startled. "N-no - I mean... not really. It don't bother me, it's just that Nick ain't very - well... He's just kinda scared of havin' anyone know, I guess, so he is." He twisted his elbow and used his forearm to rub at his temple, pushing his hat up a little on his head, chewing nervously at the inside of his cheek. "If he knew Ro' found out... or you too, now... he'd flip."

A vague wrinkle placed itself between Chris' brows, but whatever he was thinking, he didn't say it. Some resignation made its way into his voice, and he lowered his head onto the mattress, eyes closing. "You do not need to worry."

With a small smile, Ellis bobbed his head. "Thanks. It means a lot... Y'know, don't mind Nick none. You're a swell guy." He busied himself with capping the antibiotics tube and getting out a square of fresh gauzepad from the backpack. Christophe gave a vague questioning noise, and Ellis couldn't resist a snort. "Oh, uh. Nice. Cool."

Although Chris kept his eyes closed and head down, he supplied in a small voice: "Guay. And you are, too, hermano."

The smile flashed to a grin, and Ellis couldn't help a slightly pleased duck of his head. He tore open the gauzepad's packaging, taking it out, and gently placed it flat over Chris' stump. The man shivered at the touch, spitting out a quiet, "Mierda... please... finish soon?"

Ellis quickly nodded his head, reaching for the rolls of bandage material. "We just gotta wrap you up." It was tenderly that he unrolled some of the material, laying it across the wound and down his chest. Rochelle shifted forward to slip one hand under Chris' neck and her other under his torso, slipping fingers between him and the mattress. He tried to assist, weakly, and with her help lifted his torso just enough to give Ellis some space. The Georgian moved cautiously, circling the bandage around his torso to anchor the gauze tightly against his ruined shoulder. He tried to wrap it tightly - but not too tightly, aware of the way the pressure made Chris tense and his breath go ragged.

Using a thumbnail to make a nick in the fabric, Ellis tore the roll off. He took the two ends and carefully tied the bandages off, exhaling faintly with some amount of relief. "Okay. That's that."

Nodding in agreement, Rochelle released her grip on Chris in favour of leaning to pick up the bag of granola she'd left on the nightstand. She opened it, tearing the plastic along the top edge and set it on the very corner of the nightstand where Chris could reach it. "The meds'll be rough on your stomach, and you need it, anyway. You've barely eaten anything since you got hurt."

A quiet murmur left the Spaniard, like soft acknowledgement. He barely spared a glance for the bag, however, instead watching Ellis come around the bed. The Georgian cradled the bowl and washcloth in an arm, passing him a smile as he made for the door. "Gonna clean up."

Rochelle inclined her head, starting to get up and follow after him - but as Ellis left, Chris' hand was suddenly up, fingers curling around her wrist. She startled at the touch much like she'd startled when he'd grabbed her hand the first time. Her body halted mid-stand, hovered awkwardly over the edge of the bed, and she looked at him.

He barely returned her gaze, eyes averting to some distant point. "I am... sorry." Confusion turned Rochelle's expression a little raw, breath caught in her throat. "For everything. No... quise... I did not want this."
She started to speak, brows twining a little, but he shook his head into the mattress and she quieted. Christophe did meet her gaze, then, and there was some resolve there that she could not quite understand. "Eres demasiado guapa para tener esa mirada tan triste." he breathed, almost to himself, so quick and short she could barely follow the words. His lids lowered, and he sighed. "... Don't worry for me. ¿Vale? Promise."

Rochelle tried to piece together a response, tongue curling around words, but she couldn't work out more than a forced breath at first. Maybe it was the intensity of the eye contact, or the strange and tepid resignation hiding in his tone. He seemed somehow fierce and miles away.

It made her balk, unsure.

"I... No. That's not something I can promise." She shook her head, feeling his fingers tighten just faintly on her wrist - just a squeeze. The touch darted warmth up her arm, and she drew her hand away. "But I can promise you'll get through this. So get some rest." He let go without more than a graze of his fingertips in protest.

Faster than she meant to, Rochelle slipped to her feet, flashing him a smile even as she moved to follow Ellis. He watched her leave, hand sliding to hang limp where she'd left it, slowly allowing his cheek to bury against the pillow where it lay tucked against the headboard.

Christophe closed his eyes, wearily, the vaguest of laughs escaping his lips. Something mournful lingered at the edges of his breath.

He made no motion to reach for the granola left on the nightstand.

Chapter End Notes

Scattered gunshots littered the afternoon. They kept shifting in direction and location, sometimes sustained and sometimes only a few sharp snaps. It became something like torture, sending a lingering tension through the team every time - and every time, Nick became convinced they were getting closer or louder. He paced along the length of the entry hallway downstairs, only half-listening to the voices coming from the loft.

After they'd put Chris back to bed, Ellis and Rochelle had escaped upstairs and joined Coach. They'd been quiet, mostly, except for Ellis dispensing some story about Keith that Nick mostly parsed as white noise.

All his energy was focused on the gunfire, and fighting the urge to smoke another cigarette. He had to savour them, or he'd be out again as soon as he'd gotten them. The nicotine in his bloodstream was sweet relief, and he couldn't help but hold a hand out - just to enjoy the way his fingers didn't tremble anymore.

"We need to talk about this." Rochelle was in a better mood, it seemed. Her voice was stronger, more full and gentle. "How are you guys feeling?"

Nick snorted to himself, resisting the first response that came to mind.

"How am I supposed to feel? Great? Hurray, we're all half-zombies and destined to get put down by the government. It's my wildest dreams come true."

He knew she wasn't really talking to him, anyway, but he called drolly up the stairs: "Peachy-keen."

She didn't even respond to him, though he knew full well she could hear him. "I know it's - let's be honest. It's shitty. But one way or another, we aren't turned, anyway. And if Chris is right - and if more people are Carriers... the government's got to be working on a solution." Neither Ellis nor Coach responded at first, and her tone went insistent. "Either CEDA or the military has a plan or - they don't. But isn't giving up on them kind of... final?"

Gruffly, Coach spoke, sounding a few inches from beleaguered. "I ain't eager to say we got no shot. This ain't the sort of livin' you can stand for too long. Shit's gonna catch up to us, whether it's gettin' too hurt or too hungry or too sick."

"Whut do we do, then?" That new tone of Ellis' came back - not fearful but unsteady, treading on tender and unfamiliar ground. Nick wasn't sure how he felt about it. Probably for the best. Kid needs some survival instincts. "Maybe we should try tuh get in touch with 'em somehow.. So we can ask if they're plannin' on rescuin' us or... somethin' else."

It was there that Nick's body turned, making his way calmly up the stairs. While he'd have been happy to stay out of the conversation, he did have something of a vested interest in the outcome, and he wasn't about to let the discussion continue unchallenged. "Yes, that good ol' refrain - 'hey there, how ya doin'? So you guys gonna kill us or what?'" he muttered as he scaled the steps.

Coach and Ellis sat on one loveseat, comfortably scrunched hip to hip, while Rochelle had crawled up to perch on the back of the sofa with her heels braced on the seat cushion below her. All three spared him a glance, with varying enthusiasm. The Northerner strode up and took a stance in front of the railing, leaning his hip against the banister. "You guys wanna know what I think?"

"No." echoed between his teammates in unison - followed quickly by laughter, enough that Nick had to merely stand there and wait for it to settle.
A scowl perched on his features, and when he spoke, it was scathingly. "We supply up, find a boat, and sail somewhere. Literally anywhere else. Let's go find a goddamn island for all I care, live out our days, zombie-free." He didn't even know how much he really meant the words. Maybe it was a joke. Maybe not. All he knew was he wanted an answer that didn't necessitate trusting someone else.

Ellis' expression scrunched, equal parts amusement and confusion. "Nick... that ain't hardly likely. You get stranded on island, you don't go live on one. If we find some island, it'll probably suck or somethin'. And there ain't gonna be no food or shelter or nothin'. It ain't like they're all like Hawaii or somethin'."

"Well, Ellis, then maybe we just go to Hawaii." Nick gestured widely, voice thrumming with condescension. The younger man squinted at him, matching his sour tone with a sour look, lips pouting together at Nick's retort. "That's the joy of a boat. You can go anywhere."

"You can't swim, Nick." Coach inserted, pointedly. His dark eyes went mild with a certain entertainment, grin showing a strip of teeth before he laughed outright with his own words. "Why is yo' ass votin' we get on a boat? In the middle of the damn ocean?"

When Ellis inserted a "Yeah!" in agreement, Nick scowled with a quiet huff of air.

Rochelle lifted a hand, flatly, shaking her head. "Okay... yeah... no. The island thing is not gonna fly. And going somewhere else - look, who knows? Even if we could make it anywhere... which I doubt... if the Green Flu hasn't already made it around the world, do we really want to leave the U.S.? I'm not gonna be the smallpox blanket here."

That hurt, and whatever humor Nick might have felt disappeared in a swift moment. Her implication struck somewhere that Nick hadn't even known was injured, like the sudden pain from a cut that had gone unnoticed until it started to bleed.

Coach and Ellis both looked a little bemused at her words, but Nick was already speaking. He bared a faint snarl, putting his hands into fists as he shoved them into his pockets, locking his elbows to shrug up his shoulders so his body hunched. "Oh, that's nice. Thanks for that, Ro'." There was genuine agitation there, and Rochelle blinked slightly, uncertain.

Putting his jaw forward slightly, Ellis uttered a quiet, "Huh? What're y'all talkin' about?"

Nick waved him off, quickly, voice going dull with heavy scorn. "She's saying we'll infect and kill people if we try to go anywhere. You know, like the sudden pain from a cut that had gone unnoticed until it started to bleed.

Nick waved him off, quickly, voice going dull with heavy scorn. "She's saying we'll infect and kill people if we try to go anywhere. You know, like how I fucking killed Carmine."

"Nick -" Rochelle surged straight-backed, eyes widening with the outburst. Regret struck a line between her brows, lips pinching and rolling inward as if she could just breathe back in the words she'd spoken. "I didn't - That's not what I meant. I - I'm sorry. I just meant -" The gambler turned away to squint toward the stairs, shrugging a shoulder with taut apathy, and her eyes lowered.

"We all did. It wasn't just you. That's the point, okay?" Rochelle's body shifted, visibly resisting the urge to stand and step to his side. "We're together in this. Whatever we... have. We have it together. So we need to stay together. Wherever we go, whatever we end up doing. Okay, Nick?"

The feeling in his chest faded, leaving just a quiet imprint of exhaustion. Maybe he did feel guilt, after all, self-pitying though it was. He'd done plenty to hurt the women he'd been with; taken advantage of them, cheated on them, dropped them once he was done. It was their own fault, wasn't it, for getting involved with a guy like him?
This was different. He'd killed her, one way or the other, whether by infecting her or allowing one of his teammates to. Maybe it was airborne, and she'd been doomed the moment they'd made contact. Or maybe it had been that kiss they'd shared before he'd gone to bed.

What if it was that fucking kiss -

"Yeah, sure. I'm not saying we don't. I'm just offering alternatives to running into the meatgrinder."

Rochelle's gaze on him lingered for longer than he'd have liked. Where had his composure gone; where had the wall between him and everyone else disappeared to? And when? He remembered meeting her for the first time, and feeling her try to read him. Look at him and gauge him.

He'd laughed, internally, because who was she to think she could?

She had his number, now. Her eyes cut through him almost as easily as Ellis' did, half the time.

"Ellis ain't got a bad point." Coach had drawn back against the sofa, stretching, and now threw an arm over the younger Georgian's shoulders. Ellis warmed to the embrace with an embarrassed half-grin, at the same time he looked just vaguely unsure. "Maybe we can get in touch with somebody. Military got radios, don't they?"

Rochelle shrugged up a shoulder, focusing her attention suddenly on the ceiling. "I'm not sure. Even if they do, it's not something we can just... tap into. We'd have to find a working military radio, and we haven't seen any military forces this whole time. How would we find that kind of thing?" Her question was met with silence, and she sighed softly.

"Questions, questions, and more questions. What I'd give for an answer or two..."

Nick slid his tongue against the corner of his mouth, still tasting the remnants of his last cigarette. He snorted, despite himself. "Wishful thinking, doll. Sometimes you just have to go all in, with nothing but gut instinct. And a gun."

Coach abruptly stood up from the loveseat, and reflex had Nick startling, posture going almost aggressive. One swift motion had the eldest survivor grabbing a pillow from against the armrest and chucking it across the room. It might have struck Nick in the face had he not swung up an arm to deflect it. The cushion went clumsily to the ground, and irritation was writ large over his expression.

"What the f-"

The ex-football player had a hand on his hip, overriding him. "What did I tell yo' ass about them gamblin' metaphors, boy?!" Nick wasn't able to get more than an agitated few syllables out before Ellis and Rochelle were bursting into laughter, and a scowl went rampant in his eyes as he threw up a hand and escaped back down the stairs to resume his post at the window.

As much as he'd have liked to know where they stood, a new part of him found some kind of comfort in knowing they would, at least, stand together.

Nick wasn't sure what made him take first watch. Maybe it was just because he wasn't tired in the slightest, or maybe he wanted some time to think. Or, maybe, he simply knew he'd not get much rest with the knowledge that there was someone out in the streets. He had energy, and if he could put it to the task of defending the condo - why not?

As darkness fell, it became difficult to see. The moonlight cut awkward lines around the buildings and fencing and debris surrounding them. Between that and the thin spacing he allowed himself through the mostly-closed shutters, it was hard to tell what was the movement of infected, what was the wind brushing through foliage, and what might have been a human.

It didn't ultimately matter. He had his katana braced against his thigh and his sniper rifle leaned against the wall, and both the front door and the glass doors upstairs were locked. They might not have had the housekeys, but they could still lock themselves in safely. Nobody was getting in without causing a racket, and Nick would meet them with force.

He was being paranoid, perhaps, but it soothed him to be paranoid. At least it made sense, because none of what he knew about human nature indicated anything but the likelihood that the stranger was hostile.

Nick slid a hand to his mouth, thoughtfully running fingertips along the curve of his lips before sinking them into the growing stubble along his cheek. A section of his attention was spinning endlessly, like a quiet hum at the back of his skull. He had to deal with the reality of the situation one way or another: We're fucked.

He had no alternatives. What could they do? Even the few paths open to them - continuing to travel, to wander... or settling somewhere for good - seemed ludicrous. If they'd even been possible, they weren't real options. His teammates had people to reunite with. Families, relatives. Friends. They'd never go for an outcome that didn't involve finding them.

And he didn't really want to ask them to, even if he found himself doubting that anyone was still alive.

Nick was the only one who didn't really give a shit what they did, at that point. He'd prefer to find himself somewhere that was safe, a place where he didn't have to fight and scrabble every day just to make it through. The idea of rescue... he wasn't stupid. It sounded great - even if he didn't have anyone waiting for him, and his desire for safety and survival was a purely selfish endeavour.

I just don't think it's going to happen.

He'd had his doubts from the start that they were walking into anything but the mess left behind by CEDA's failure, and now to know they were not only abandoned but actively wanted dead? As much as Nick wanted to believe it wasn't true, his pessimism caught up with him, and he felt a deadened and quiet resignation. Of course it's true. It's the cherry-on-top of the wreck of my fucking life.

For some reason, his mind kept returning to the diner, and the pile of bodies he could still remember with such visceral clarity. He could have laughed, almost, because it suddenly made sense: they hadn't been saved their fate. Hadn't been saved the fate of the infected, either.

Maybe this was worse, even - because maybe everything they'd been through was all for nothing.
Maybe one day the virus in their blood would mutate and decide to infect them, too. Maybe the next time he felt a fever rising in his skin, it'd come with yellow eyes and grey skin. Or maybe some soldier would simply put a hole in his head.

He wanted alcohol. Wanted and needed to cut the emotions out of his chest, even if it took his bare hands to do it.

Unable to do that, Nick would have settled for dragging Ellis into some corner of the house and fucking him until he screamed, screw every last bit of sense out of them both. Gonna go out, may as well go out with a bang. That should have made him laugh.

It didn't.

Nick didn't recognize how long he'd been sitting in one position until he shifted, and something popped in his spine. It was a satisfying enough sensation that he rolled himself into a stretch, closing his eyes, a faint sigh escaping his lips. It was tempting, but waking the Georgian up would inevitably lead to talking, and the last thing he wanted to do was talk.

He just wanted to stew, and feel sorry for himself, and -

A quiet noise perked him up. He couldn't determine its origin at first; it was a scraping noise, like wood on wood. A frown instantly tugged on his lips, and he stood in a smooth surge, palming onto the hilt of his katana and grabbing it. His head cocked, looking toward the front door at first... but when another noise sounded, a flat and rustling thump, he realized where it was coming from.

Christophe's room.

Although he should have dropped it at that, suspicion made him move. He crept to the bedroom door, pleased to find it open just a crack. He shouldered against the door to very softly push it open, moving as if he had reason to sneak, though he wasn't even completely sure why.

It took a step inside the bedroom to get sights on the foreigner, moonlight from the window and a cloudless night the only reason Nick could see at all. Chris was laying on his belly, agony raw with a scarlet flush across his face, arm stretched out to grasp onto the nightstand. He'd knocked the granola bag Rochelle had left for him to the ground, and his fingers were sprawled against the nightstand surface, stretching with a tremoring energy to reach something.

Nick flicked a glance past his fingertips, and his gaze alighted on the bottle of painkillers Rochelle and Ellis had left behind.

His brain connected the dots easily enough: the guy had awoken, in pain, and was trying to self-medicate. While he didn't blame Chris, he also made a mental note to chastise the two for leaving medication in his reach. Like giving a guy a morphine drip button. Bad fucking idea, since chances are good, he's gonna be in a lot of pain for a long time.

"Hey." he uttered, finding his voice trapped in a strangely calm tone. "Shit's on a schedule, buddy."

He expected Chris to startle, but not to the degree he did. It was as if he'd struck him, and the Spaniard recoiled so violently he almost rolled over. The movement put weight on his stump, and the sound of pain that left him was something akin to a wounded dog, high and weighty and slurred.

Nick might've advanced, had Chris not immediately gone limp, rolling back away to push his weight on his good shoulder. The man's eyes went wet with pain, and he looked up to the gambler, brows going wrought with some emotion, simultaneously fragile and stone-solid. It took Nick a moment to realize it was shame.

Too much shame. Dirty, messy guilt, too harsh to fit the moment.

"I was -"

A sigh left Nick's lips, forcing the vaguest of eye-rolls. He shook off the excuses, disinterested. "Whatever. It's too early, but here." He pushed the katana under his arm, pressing the blade between his rib and bicep to hold it there. He approached and grabbed the pill bottle from the nightstand, aware of Chris' eyes on him. He palmed against the cap, pushing and twisting to open it up. "Just one. Last thing we need is you ODing."

Nick tapped one into his palm and held it out, but Christophe wasn't looking at it. His eyes were settled on the katana under Nick's arm, and his voice was rough and quiet when he spoke. "You killed her?"

It was hard to determine his tone beyond the slur to his voice, but there didn't seem to be accusation. Just a questioning, exhausted pain. Nick mulled over his response, curling his fingers around the pill - and it was only eventually that he responded, deciding on the truth. "No. She made Ro' do it. It was shoot her or let her gun us all down. And Ro' came out of it with that hurt hand for her trouble."

The Spaniard closed his eyes at that, and his jaw gritted so tightly that Nick heard the grinding of his teeth. He considered the idea that the truth had not been the correct choice, but there wasn't any taking it back. The foreigner would find out one way or another.

"Are you gonna take this, or -?"

"Nick. You must... do something. Please." The gambler's hand lowered slightly, eyes narrowing slightly and lip curling into a frown of vague irritation. He didn't appreciate either the interruption, or the idea of doing Chris any favours. "You are... Tú eres el único puedes ayudarme."

Rather than speak, he cocked his head. Chris reopened his eyes after a moment of that strained silence, glancing up to look toward him. Despite himself, Nick was unsettled by just how hollow those amber-browns were. It took him aback.

"You understand. I am no good to you. I am better - it is better to go. Please. You know, don't you? It.."

The dots rearranged themselves.

It hadn't been the desire for pain management that was making him go for the pills.

Nick wished the realization struck softer than it did, even though he couldn't say he was surprised. He moved slowly to replace the pill in the bottle, closing it, collecting his thoughts with the gesture. Hadn't he said it himself - if he'd been in Christophe's position, he'd have hunted for a way out, too. "Look. I get it. But -"

Chris' head shook, hand going to a fist where it hovered. "No. I am useless." His fist began a tremble, and the tremble made its way into his voice, going raw as he begged through clenched teeth. "I will die, from this, from los muertos - cualquier manera. Please. You know, don't you? It is better to do this."

Anger flared, and Nick shoved the painkillers into his slacks pocket, freeing his hand to pull the katana from under his arm and lower it. The tip pressed into the carpet, balanced there, his palm sliding flat onto the end of the hilt. He didn't miss what Chris was getting at: he thought Nick was the only one of the group who might just let him do it. And why?

Because Nick was the heartless asshole who wouldn't care whether he lived or died?

"I am taking... using things. Medicine. It is... No tienes sentido." His hand gestured weakly at his bandaged stump without allowing his gaze to alight on it. Though he tried, Nick couldn't tear his eyes off Chris' face and the pleading misery there. "I cannot fight - please, déjame hacerlo. It is easier. I -"

"Easier?" What had been anger turned into fury. Nick took the step between him and the edge of the bed, forcing Chris to retreat, leaning in to place a fist against the mattress and balance his weight against his knuckles. "Easier for who? You'll fucking kill them, you realize that?"

Chris' lips parted - but for all the wary submission in the way he slumped down and away, he did not look afraid. "I..."

"You ask me, we should have just let you bleed out." His voice turned to a sheer hiss. "But no. These fucks spent all this time and all this effort keeping you alive, and you're gonna sit here and tell me it's easier to chew on a bullet? You think we've had it easy? You think it was easy, what you and your friends put them through?"

The Spaniard's head made for the faintest shake, but Nick wasn't about to stop.

Scorn filled the spat-out words, and something like disgust. "You'll hurt them worse than your friends ever did. You will ruin them, making Ro' come back in here and find your brains on the wall."

Nick knew he'd gone too far - felt it, the tactile sensation of tension that came with crossing a line - and Chris stared at him. The faint sheen of pained tears deepened and welled until the man's brown eyes watered. He made no effort to hold them back or brush them away. Tears trickled down his cheeks in a slow deluge.

"I cannot do this." was all he said, soft and fragile, like shattered glass just a touch away from collapsing into shards.

A snort escaped Nick, empty. He reached suddenly down, prying the handgun from his holster. As he got it into his hand, he was aware of Chris' eyes following his fingers, and there was fear there now.

"You know what? Honestly? You make the fucking call here. We're past coddling bullshit, and we're past dragging you."

He grasped the rack, snapping it back to chamber a round. The sound made Christophe flinch suddenly, fingers going into a fist. "Maybe you'll die today. Maybe tomorrow. Maybe we'll all fucking die. But I'm not going to convince you of shit, because if you can't commit to living, you will get us killed. And you will die."

Nick gestured the loaded gun in a short flick, barrel pointed at the far wall. "It's not my choice, and I'm not going to sit here and argue with you over it. I can't make you want it." He stared Chris down, examining the way the man's attention was now riveted on the pistol. "It's the fucking apocalypse. There's no time for this. You can either fight and claw and scrape by, or join all the poor fucks who made the same stupid decision as you. Just don't take that bullet and think you're doing anyone a favour except yourself."

Nick's thumb pushed the safety off, and he set the gun down on the edge of the nightstand, closest to Chris. It struck the wood with a metallic sound, scraping just slightly as Nick's fingertips lifted away from it. "But, if you don't think you can try - if you're giving up already - then that's the ballgame. It's over."

There was a hollow listlessness to the way Chris stared at the pistol. He said nothing, tears flowing in smooth tracks that showed no signs of stopping.

"So just fucking do it."

Nick turned, letting the katana fall until its tip dragged against the carpet as he walked away. He almost left it at that - but frustration stopped him just before he reached the door.

The Northerner turned on a heel, gazing back at Chris where he laid. He lifted his chin, so his gaze was slanted down the length of his nose, and spoke with abrupt flatness. "For the record - I don't give a shit. But those guys out there care. And if you stick with them... if you drop the fucking self-pity and the selfish bullshit and let them save you... you might just make it out of this."

The Spaniard moved, then, just enough to look up toward him, eyes glassy and flooded with tears. Nick didn't match the gaze, unwilling to meet it and take measure of the emotions there. Anger fueled his exit, knuckling the knob to drag the door shut behind him.

He barely parsed the distance between the bedroom door and the stairs, and suddenly he had his elbow braced on the wall, body slumped, staring through the slats of the window and out into the dark. Fuck. Nausea crept up on him, and his breath came shallowly, like panic.

Nick wasn't equipped for this. Couldn't deal with it. His own words came back to him in reverberating echoes, like a tide, and he could only run his tongue over his teeth and swallow away the sour taste in his mouth.

The silence of the house was jarring. Even his breath seemed too loud compared to the dead quiet, and it constricted in on him until he felt somehow suffocated. He should have done something other than stand there. He should have woken the others, or gone right back in and taken the gun back.

He didn't, because somewhere, he believed what he'd said - maybe he even thought the guy deserved that choice.

Nick shifted carefully, retaking his seat on the staircase. He didn't look out the window, staring at his knees instead. At least if it happened, he could get there first. Stop the others from running in on him. Spare them, at least, that. Even if he couldn't and wouldn't stop it.

He just sat there, shoulders raised and chin low, in silence - anticipating the gunshot.

Waiting for it.
At the soft utterance of his name and a touch on his shoulder, Nick awoke - and not gently. He startled, reflex surging his hand out, finding his fingers wrapping vicelike around someone's wrist. He squeezed and shoved to force it away from him, defensively. Rochelle yelped faintly, and the sound made him let go.

"Ow - Jesus." she hissed, complaint clear in the tone. The gambler cracked his eyes open, gaze landing on the woman where she knelt in front of him, rubbing at her wrist with fingertips like he'd bruised her. "Sorry. Didn't mean to startle you."

When he shifted his body, moving to straighten, pain flooded him from end to end. His spine lit up like fire and he released a ferocious groan. It took a moment for him to recognize why; he'd passed out on the stairs, lower back pressed into the edge of the stair above him and shoulder pressed into the wall.

Slumped there, he honestly couldn't remember falling asleep. He could only remember sitting there, hanging on the silence. How long had he sat there, and how long had it been since he'd dozed against the wall?

How long since -

Gritting his jaw, Nick pushed forward into a slump, elbow sliding to brace his weight on his knee. His breath came out in stuttered pain, a stab of agony driven into his lower back where the step's edge had buried into it. "When..." he muttered, but his eyes were already flicking up toward the window, blearily.

It was the dim hours of early morning.

"It's okay. Nothing happened." Her words made him start, almost panicked - how had she found out about the situation? Had Chris told her... and how much? She'd be furious if she knew what had happened. His brain was already on overdrive to fabricate excuses, explanations, but: "Next time you start dozing on watch, come wake me up. Okay?"

He forced himself to breathe, inhaling.

Of course she wasn't referring to Christophe's suicide attempt. That didn't make sense.

He should have felt soothed by the vague and sympathetic smile on her lips, because surely that meant that nothing was amiss - but he felt no such comfort, pushing his palm against the wall to shove himself up.

Rochelle retreated to give him room to stand, lifting a hand as if she meant to help him. The Northerner dodged the gesture, moving mostly by momentum as he got to his feet and stalked across the first floor entryway.

Grasping the bedroom door knob, he shoved it open, leaning in. His eyes cut across the room, alighting on the curled shape of Christophe's body on the bed. He had dragged himself entirely under the sheets, collapsed into nothing more than a fetal shape.

The gun was still where Nick had left it.

The muscles in his jaw flickered, clenched. He felt angry, and he wasn't entirely sure at whom. It was a helpless feeling that took some of the edge out of his emotions, leaving a weariness in its place. He hated the guy, just a little, for putting him in that position.

"Nick - he's sleeping, don't bother him..." Rochelle whispered furtively from the hallway, concern leeching into her tone. Nick moved before she could advance, stepping quietly to the nightstand to retrieve the pistol.

He popped the magazine free from the grip and held it between two fingers. With it tucked out of the way, he yanked the slide back, turning the gun to let the loaded round fall to the nightstand surface with a soft tinkle. He put the gun back together and flicked the safety on before retrieving the loose bullet, tucking it into the pocket at the breast of his dress shirt.

If Chris was awake or heard him, he did not show any sign. Nick might have questioned his health, had he not seen the faint rise and fall of breath in the curled shape of his waistline under the sheets. For better or for worse, the guy was still alive.

Rochelle was peering in after him, and he felt her disapproval without looking to confirm it on her face. Nick exhaled sharply, pushing the gun into the holster at his thigh with a small glance back at the Spaniard.

Guess you're in this after all. For now.

Relief found its way into his head, and he hated that, too.

Nick left the bedroom, sparing Rochelle a vague look of disinterest as he passed through the threshold. Her gaze started to move to his hands, perking to ask him what he'd been doing - so he distracted her with a snarky, "Whatever. I'll leave your new beau alone."

The woman squinted after him, tongue slowly sliding out to be bitten between her teeth. There was plenty she should have said, and nothing she could. A resigned sort of roll touched her eyes, and she closed the door behind him. "You could act a little apologetic for falling asleep on watch, you know."

He snorted, sliding a hand onto the railing of the staircase to balance himself as he stretched up onto his toes, trying to curl his spine backwards and crack out the pain there. "Thought you said nothing happened."

Her brow twitched in rising annoyance. "Well -"

Nick started up the stairs, body slumping into each step. His muscles groaned with the effort, complaining and creaking, and he'd never felt so old and worn-down. If he'd gotten any sleep, he couldn't tell. "Then what's there to be sorry for?" he muttered over his shoulder.

He could feel her exasperation, and he was almost surprised to find her following after him. Although he'd rathered avoid conversation, at least it wasn't Ellis. "I swear, Nick. Sometimes it feels like you're doing your best to be a dick."

That made him snort, vaguely, and he tilted his head to one side, rolling it in the joint of his neck. Something crackled, and he gave a puff of air. "And you do your best to cause me grief."

"I'm a delight." she protested, huffily, and Nick resisted a laugh. He settled on passing a smirk over his shoulder, eyes dark, and advanced up into the loft. "What? You are not one to talk, boy. You're lucky we keep you around. Every day, I wish we'd just taken Ellis and left you behind, you big grouch."
Nick made immediately for the sofa, slipping around it and dropping down onto the cushions. He collapsed against it, pressing his aching back into the soft surface. He stretched so ferociously, arms going up over his head and legs stretching out in front of him, that a breath left him in something of a whimper. "Me, too." he muttered, lowly.

She laughed in a short manner, shaking her head with a sigh. "Impossible." escaped her, just an idle utterance. Nick closed his eyes, hearing her footsteps as she circled the couch. "Where did your parents go wrong...?"

The Northerner might have had something to say about that - Letting my uncle babysit me every day was probably step one. - but Rochelle was abruptly dropping down next to him. He wouldn't have minded her presence terribly, except she turned to push her back against the armrest of the couch, and thrust her legs up onto the sofa to curl up.

The position put her feet against his thigh, and he snapped his eyes open at the contact. Considering how dirtied and bloodied his slacks were, he shouldn't have cared - but that didn't stop him from curling a lip up from his teeth. "Egh. Watch it!" he muttered scornfully, and Rochelle began to grin at him.

That grin vanished when Nick lowered his arms, grabbing at either of her calves, and dragged her legs out flat. It put them draped in a relaxed sprawl over his thighs, knees slightly bent to rest heels on the cushions on the other side of him. Her lips pinched in a vaguely embarrassed gesture, releasing a huff of air when Nick settled an arm over her knees and the other over her shins. "Um." was all she got out, as he idly rolled his head back to relax against the sofa.

Nick closed his eyes, and it was idly that his palm smoothed out her jeans just below her knee so he could get a grip to faintly rub at her shin, fingertips massaging in weary circles. Her eyes turned a little suspicious, watching the gesture - but the subtle pressure felt so nice, she couldn't help but burrow into the armrest and sigh softly.

"I'm pretty sure I'm gonna have shin splints for the rest of my life." she muttered, with a vague and distant chuckle, Nick focused a little more on the work. His other hand slid to join in, one hand on either of her shins. "... I meant to say thank you. I know we fight sometimes. But I'm really glad you're here, and... without you, I don't know if we'd all be alive still."

Some discontent lingered in the way his jaw flinched. Wonder if you'd feel that way, knowing what happened last night. He didn't say it aloud, but the thought soured his voice when he responded dismissively, "I'm just trying to make it to tomorrow. You fucks are an unhappy accident."

She almost laughed, but bit it back at the last second. Her eyes were on his face, and he could feel her attention even as he refused to open his eyes. "You seem upset. More than usual. Is it about the Flu...?"

Nick should have said yes. It wasn't entirely untrue, after all, it just wasn't the whole story. Instead, he cracked one eye, gazing sideways at her. She seemed surprised by his gaze, cocking her head. "And what about you? You seem pretty infatuated with our Spanish friend down there. Distance make the heart wander with you and your boyfriend?"

It worked precisely how he wanted, and he didn't feel particularly satisfied by that.

She huffed, shortly, eyes narrowing. "That's none of your - and I don't -" Rochelle started to pull herself away, curling her legs to escape him, and there was honest hurt across her face.
Nick didn't stop her, but he did lift his head and give a vague grimace. He hadn't really meant to injure her, though that excuse seemed flimsy considering the confrontation had been engineered to rile and distract her. "Past time to put on airs, sweetheart."

Her body halted, half-pulled away, gazing at him with a stark sort of vulnerability. Her eyes melted a little, like warmed chocolate, expressing a wary tension and the vaguest plea. The gambler relented, softening his tone. "I'm not judging, just figured you might want to talk about it." He closed his eyes again. It was manipulative, but when was he not?

Rochelle frowned slightly, giving him a significant once-over. Her body eased gradually back into place, and as she settled, Nick let his hands merely rest atop her knees. "... Okay. I know you're just dodging me, but sure."

He smirked, privately.

"Can I be honest?"

Nick didn't even bother responding to that, so Rochelle leaned her head back, staring up at the ceiling. "Jacob -" Her frown deepened, and she slowly raised her left hand. Using her other hand to pull away the bandages, Rochelle gazed at the soft and delicate scab that crossed her palm. "The last time I saw him, we had a fight."

Her eyes went vague, placing a thumb over her injured hand. "He didn't want me to go to Georgia. Said he had a bad feeling, and he wanted me to stay. Give up the opportunity to report on the outbreak - back when it was just an illness. I said something stupid... like he was jealous, or something. I don't even remember. I accused him of not wanting what was best for my career. He thought I didn't want what was best for us."

A sad twitch touched her brows. "He said I had to choose. Him or the story."

Shifting his arm slightly, Nick curled his hand under her knee, getting fingers between the underside of her leg and his thigh. He gripped there, arching a brow, and prompted flatly: "You left."

She nodded, head tilting until she could rest her cheek against the armrest. "Not the first time something like that happened with us... but it was the worst. We were always great together - except under pressure. Except when it counted, I guess."

"I guess a part of me just... figured it'd be the same as it always is. He gets mad, I get mad, we take a break..." She gave a softly wistful exhale, shoulders shrugging. "Now, I don't even know... he might not even want to see me again. He might not even be alive."

Nick didn't speak, gazing sideways at her, expression almost vapid as he listened.

"Everything we've been through..." Rochelle glanced at him, brows low. There was a tired fear lingering in her expression, and the more she said, the more of a wet sheen grew over her eyes. "What are the chances he's alive? Any of them are? Ellis talks about his mom, and Keith, and Coach talks about his daughter, and I just... really, Nick. My dad's diabetic... what are the chances...?"

"Hey." Nick murmured, quietly, leaning slightly toward her. He reached out, catching a hand against her cheek, and her composure fractured. A tremble passed over her features like she might truly start to cry. "Talk like that spreads. Last thing we need is to worry about that shit right now.
Not like it'd change anything, right?"

She tipped her head slightly, grabbing his wrist to pull it away from her face with an embarrassed shake of her head - but she held onto him, gripping at his forearm for a moment.

"Y-yeah. I know. I'm just scared, and... sometimes it feels like you're the only one I can talk to." When he shot her a confused look, she exhaled a shaky laugh. "I don't want to scare Ellis, and Coach... he only wants to protect me, but sometimes that just makes me feel even worse about telling him the truth."

Nick snorted, retracting his hand gently. He raised it to lay it across the back of the couch, eyes narrowing just a twitch. "So I'm your bad news confidant? I'm flattered."

She snorted, humor a little more sincere that time, scrunching her nose. "I don't mean it like that. But sure. And... if you need someone to talk to, too... I'm here." Before he could protest, she shook her head in a quick gesture. "I know you don't like opening up, but - a lot's happened. And I get the feeling a lot more will happen. I'm just saying I'm here for you."

The Northerner wasn't able to resist the urge to gaze at her, head tilting just a tick. She was looking at him softly, eyes wide and vulnerable, and if he hadn't known better he might have taken it as the look of a woman waiting for a kiss.

He slipped into a grin, and reflex had him leaning forward just slightly, pressing closer to her. "Look on the bright side." Rochelle blinked, questioningly. "If your boyfriend dropped the ball, I still have a shot."

Nick had approximately two seconds to enjoy himself before she suddenly had a grip on his ear, twisting. He barely stopped from bursting out into swears, body pivoting to follow her grasp as she rose from armrest and forced him away.

"We were having a moment, Nick." she stated, calm in her disappointment, speaking over the angry huff-snarls escaping him in a constant stream. "And you just had to ruin it."

It took everything he had not to shove her away, instead relenting to her force at the same time he pushed her legs off his lap and scooched away. "Goddamnit - let go, you harpy -" She did, but only reluctantly, crossing her arms and watching with satisfaction as he rubbed at his ear, now bright red from the abuse.

"I wanna be really clear here, Nick. You never had, and will never have, a shot."

Nick glared sideways at her, green eyes gone harsh with a sulking energy, and all she could do was laugh at him. He should've been angry, but he mostly found himself enjoying the sound of her laughter.

"Harpy." he repeated, because that was the only thing he could think to say.

Ellis yawned, long and hearty, stumbling with the gesture as he padded up the stairs. He hadn't expected to sleep so long. Although there wasn't much to do, since they were mostly stuck where they were until Chris was fit to move, he'd expected to take watch at some point in the night. He found himself a little bemused... not that he regretted the sleep.

And it had come mostly undisturbed, except for the vague remnants of a nightmare he couldn't remember. The grease-slick fingers of the dream had lost their grip on his consciousness within a few minutes of awakening, though he'd tried to remember it.

It hadn't been Nick strangling him, at least.

Scratching at his ribs, he cocked his head, squinting around the loft as he came to the top of the staircase. At first, it seemed empty - but his eyes caught on the top of Nick's head atop the armrest of the sofa, the man clearly laid out across it. He wasn't moving.

Ellis carefully shifted onto the balls of his feet to quietly sneak over. He leaned up to peek over the sofa's back, unable to resist a smile.

Nick was dead asleep, arms crossed over his chest and hands tucked tightly beside his biceps. He didn't look particularly at peace; rather, he looked remarkably grouchy. His face was a little scrunched, brows taut and jaw tense in his sleep. It was strangely endearing, leaving Ellis to merely stand there and look him over.

He missed the few times he'd gotten to wake up to that irked, tired face. The likelihood of them getting to sleep together in the relatively small condo was low. Maybe now that Chris was awake and aware they could at least sneak more time together on watch, since nobody had to actively watch him... but even then.

Ellis wished it didn't have to be so hidden and awkward. His smile faded a little, more thoughtful than sad. With Chris knowing, there were now more people who knew than who didn't. If he could just tell Coach... and convince Nick to stop being afraid...

Wouldn't it be nice to stop hiding it? If they were open about it, he could just crawl onto the sofa right then and lay against Nick, and close his eyes, and rest -

"Morning."

Rochelle's voice startled him faintly, turning his head to spy her stepping out of the bathroom. She was making final tugs to set her clothing back in place, and the cleaned cuts and scrapes on her face and arms revealed she'd been making good on her decision to bathe. The bowl and washcloth circled in her arm just confirmed it.

Slipping over to approach her, keeping his voice low, Ellis smiled at her. "Hey. How you feelin' today?"

She laughed a little at the question, shaking her head. "Fine, sweetie." she assured him, walking into the kitchen. She gestured with her elbow, bouncing the bowl in her grip a little. "You want to wash up? There are some more washcloths, if you don't want to use the same one..."

"Oh, uh... Yeah, I guess." Following after her, Ellis slid a hand against his hip, idly squeezing there. "Maybe Chris'd like to, too. I had tuh help Keith take a spongebath this one time 'cause he got stitches on his belly and couldn't take a shower. So... y'know."

Rochelle nodded her head, eyes low as she set the bowl down. Her left hand reached to pull open a drawer, grabbing up a washcloth and offering it out to him. "That'd be nice of you. Maybe you can talk to him a little, too." Ellis took the cloth from her, and she opened up the icebox of water and started to scoop up a little more water for him. "He seemed... off, earlier. Not that I blame him, but he could probably use some cheering up."

When Ellis' "Yeah..." was muffled, she glanced at him. He was in the process of taking his shirt off, the fabric tangled up around his head as he pulled it off, dragging his cap with it. Rochelle startled into a slight laugh, crinkling her nose, and he quickly squirmed the rest of the way out of his shirt at the sound.

Hair tousled and eyes wide, he blinked at her. "Whut -" Ellis glanced down at his bare upper body, reddening just a little. "Well - I'm just gonna... y'know..." Gesturing at his pits, he put his shirt and hat down on the kitchen counter, rubbing at his stomach with burgeoning embarrassment. "Didn't think it was worth goin' to the bathroom..."

Rochelle waved him off, still grinning a little with amusement. "Men." she uttered with an exasperated tone, setting the bowl down and closing the icebox. She retreated to the other side of the kitchen island, hopping up onto one of the bar stools and relaxing down against the counter. "Your chest looks better." she commented, closing her eyes.

"Yeah." he allowed, flashing a small grin as he grabbed the washcloth and soaked it. "I'll be back tuh normal real soon." As he fist the wet fabric between his fingers and scrubbed at his arms, taking care not to hurt the wounds that littered his skin, he sucked casually at his teeth. "I was thinkin' - we should deal with the car today. It ain't got a lot of gas, and if we need it in a pinch... gonna be kickin' ourselves."

"You're probably right. Think we can siphon out of the busted car?"

Ellis jutted his jaw thoughtfully, nodding at the same time he shrugged. He lowered his chin, moving to scrub gently at his torso, minding his still-sore rib. "Most like. They make 'em hard tuh siphon these days, but it's an older car, bet it'll be fine.. I'm more worried 'bout whut we're gonna put it in. Be real nice if we had an actual gas can, else it'll be tough gettin' it in the fuel tank."

"We'll figure it out." she reassured him, lifting her head back up. She watched as he took a few steps back and snatched the roll of paper towels off the kitchen counter, breaking a piece off to give a gentle rub over his skin, soaking up the worst of the wetness. "At least we have those radios now. Makes me feel better."
Ellis smiled, pleased, and nodded along. "Me, too. Long as Nick don't turn his off again."

The gambler gave a biting mutter from his place on the couch, voice rough with a sleepy edge. "Long as someone other than Ellis mans the other one." Ellis was half-startled and half-embarrassed, turning with a slight hop to peer toward the sofa. He carefully stepped to retrieve his shirt, slowly pulling it back on.

"Uh... sorry, Nick, did we wake you...?"

"Let me think." There was a rustle as Nick shifted, but he did not rise from the sofa, instead rolling half onto his side. Ellis could only see the bottoms of his feet from where he stood, hidden in black socks and tucked atop the armrest. "You two gabbing nonstop two feet away from me? Nah. That doesn't wake people up."

Ellis wanted to protest, popping his lower lip out a little, but Rochelle waved at him with a roll over her eyes. He quieted, ducking his head so he could push it through the neck of his ratty and bloodied Bullshifters T-shirt.

"Because you didn't get enough beauty sleep last night?" the woman murmured, practically a croon, full to the brim with sarcasm. "Y'know, while you were on watch...?"

Nick merely grunted.

She passed a grin toward Ellis, nodding slightly when he flashed her a confused look. That explained why he hadn't been woken to take watch - Nick had fallen asleep. The Southerner felt a strike of fear, thinking of the house unprotected... and then guilt, in equal measure. It wasn't fair to blame Nick. They were all exhausted.

"Well... Since yer up." The Georgian scuffed his toe against the grout of the kitchen tile, squinting slightly toward the sofa and its inhabitant. "Maybe I'll go see if Chris wants tuh clean up, then you'n'me can go deal with the car...? I was thinkin', we could go the other way down the road, see if any of the garages got a gas can or somethin'."

"Pass." escaped Nick in a mutter, short and scathing.

A flash of hurt made Ellis frown, grabbing his cap from the counter and screwing it down onto his head. He'd thought it a fine excuse to get some time alone with Nick, and the gambler himself being an obstacle wasn't something he'd anticipated. "We gotta gas the car up, Nick. Whut if we need it?"

"Besides." Rochelle inserted before Nick could do more than inhale. When Ellis slipped her a glance, she winked. "You got more than enough rest. You can help Ellis - or, I can always have you take over bathing Chris. I'm sure he'd love the attention."

Nick was up and off the sofa in a flash, bent over to retrieve his dress shoes from the coffee table and tuck them on his feet. A scowl lingered at the edge of his expression, glaring over at them. "Not a goddamn chance." Ellis had to stifle a laugh, tucking a fist against his mouth, at the mental image. He was aware of Nick turning that glare more fully on him, and quickly ducked his head.

"Good." Rochelle stated, a grin unabashed on her lips. She shrugged up a shoulder in Ellis' direction, tilting her head. "Why don't you guys do that now? I'll get Chris some breakfast and you can offer a wash to him when you get back."

Standing, Nick grabbed his thigh holster from the floor, pulling the pistol out. He tucked it under his arm, taking a moment to strap the holster around his right thigh. "Fine." he muttered, lowly, setting the handgun down on the coffee table. "That's for you. Found it earlier, meant to give it to you. Where's my Mag?"

Rochelle blinked a little, straightening. She reached to point toward the ground to the left of the couch, and he cocked his head, leaning over. His Magnum was leaned against the foot of the sofa, and he retrieved it, giving it a small look-over before stowing it away.

As he did, Rochelle glanced back at Ellis. Her lips pursed faintly, and she nodded past him. "I gave Chris' machete a little clean-up, too. I figure if we're gonna try to be quiet, avoid gunfire, you both should have weapons." He crinkled his nose a little, and she put her hands up before he could protest. "I know, it's kinda gross. But it's a good blade. Besides, not like Nick's not using the sword that speared him through."

"It's catharsis." Nick slid a palm against his shoulder at the mention of the injury, thoughtfully massaging into the aching muscle. He strode toward the staircase, slanting a glance back over his shoulder but barely pausing as the made for the first floor. "Let's get this over with, then."

Ellis turned, reluctantly, and saw the machete sitting in the kitchen sink. He approached with some hesitance, grabbing the hilt of the blade and lifting it up. He turned it, examining the surface with a morbid fascination. There wasn't much sign of the macabre work it had been used for; he couldn't imagine Rochelle had enjoyed washing off the burnt-on flesh and blood.

He passed her a look over his shoulder, and her expression said as much. But she smiled, faintly, and he smiled back. Rochelle flapped a hand to usher him away, eyes warming a little. "Nick has a radio, I've got the other. Go on."

Getting a good grip on the machete, Ellis turned and scampered across the loft, hooking a hand on the railing as he passed it to spin himself onto the stairs. Nick was waiting impatiently by the front door, katana in one hand and sniper strapped to his back. His stubbled expression was trapped in a vague and distant irritation, and Ellis approached him with some wariness.

He lifted the machete, mouth opening to speak, but Nick was already turning. He unlocked the front door smoothly, calling out over his shoulder. "Lock the door behind us." Without waiting for a response from Rochelle, the gambler stepped out and made his way onto the porch.

Ellis frowned, following.

He wasn't really sure why the older man was in such a sour mood, but it was cowing him. He had to mentally reverse back through recent events - had he done something, intentionally or otherwise? Had anything happened to explain it?

Nick being grumpy was normal, but he hadn't expected to need Rochelle's help in threatening the other man into going with him. Maybe it had to do with whatever had caused him to mess up on watch the previous night, and it had nothing at all to do with him.

Or, Ellis was just being paranoid.

Closing the door behind himself, Ellis advanced up behind Nick, following as the Northerner quick-stepped down the stairs. He was looking around, eyes narrowed and attention focused. The neighborhood had quieted down as the stranger's path had attracted infected away from them, but that didn't stop the survivors from being on alert.

So, Ellis spoke quietly, both to keep a low profile and to avoid agitating the older man further.
"Let's look in on the broke car first... I gotta make sure we can get the hose in - they got these stoppers sometimes, y'know, fer keepin' folk from stealin' gas."

"Folk like us." Nick retorted, an edge of amusement touching his voice in a way that made Ellis grin a little.

Nick took a sharp turn at the bottom of the stairs, walking over to the garage door. He opened it up, craning his head in to glance around the interior. The sedan was where they'd left it, leaned awkwardly to one corner by its wrecked wheel, and the thick smell of leaked oil had only worsened over time.

He held it open for Ellis, gesturing with the hand that held his katana. "Ladies first." he prompted with a sly grin that showed a strip of teeth. It might've offended the younger man, had he not been a little distracted by the look on Nick's face.

All that irritation was gone, leaving only an oddly intense energy Ellis could only define as mischievous.

Scrunching a brow in a suspicious gesture, Ellis carefully stepped past him, keeping an eye on him as he entered the garage. "That ain't nice, Nick. And it ain't funny any other time you say that, either. I ain't a girl."

When the older man merely kept on with his grin, head cocking faintly, Ellis turned away with a faint huff. He stepped toward the gas port on the flank of the car, setting the machete on the roof and bending down to hook a finger on the cover and flip it open. He peeked in, but the light from the slats in the garage door and the open door behind them wasn't enough to get a good look.

"Ah.. shit. You ain't got a flashlight, do you? I -" The door shut, halving the light shining into the garage. It startled Ellis, and he gave a discontent noise. He started to push a finger into the fuel port, feeling for the anti-siphon flap of metal that would potentially frustrate their efforts. "Nick, don't. It's already dark enough. I can't see whether -"

Footsteps announced the gambler's approach just a beat before Nick's hands alighted on his hips. They slid down the fabric of his coveralls, crawling fingertips until they had a grip on the insides of his thighs, and the contact jolted Ellis backwards as if to escape the touch.

All that did was push him back against Nick, body flattening against the Northerner's, and a pleased hum vibrated against him. Nick dipped his head to tuck his mouth against Ellis' ear, hands quick to smooth upwards, coming dangerously close to the younger man's crotch as they delved thumbs into the crooks between hip and thigh.

Goosebumps flared up his arms, hips hitching, and Ellis let out a protesting huff of air. His knees threatened to wobble, his body's interest quick to pique at the touches. "N-Nick -" he managed, putting one hand against the car and darting the other down to grasp onto one of the gambler's forearms. "Whut're you doin'? We gotta..."

"We will. In a minute." Nick almost delicately nipped the younger man's ear between his teeth, biting along the edge of it. The warm pressure of his teeth was enough to make Ellis shiver, and Nick did not miss the gesture with how closely they were pressed. His voice lowered, turning to silk. "Maybe a few minutes."

Releasing a soft whine of protest, Ellis' fingers tightened on Nick's forearm, willing himself to push the other man away. "Nick," he uttered, a little more forcefully, allowing some frustration into his voice. The gambler relented, but only by holding still while Ellis spoke. "You didn't even wanna..."
A laugh brushed against his ear, and Nick cocked his head far enough to look the younger man in the face. Ellis pushed out his lower lip, scrunching his brows in an attempt to appear surly... but it was difficult to commit to anything but a vaguely wanting expression when Nick was so close. And his hands were so close to -

"Just covering our tracks, kid. Like she was gonna let me stay if I complained. She's got it out for me right now."

That made it a little easier to look surly. Ellis' expression faded, distracted by the sentiment - it wasn't the first time Nick had intentionally masked their relationship by making a show of acting irritated by him. It wasn't really that that bothered him; Nick was irritated by most things. It was just... another thing to think about. Another example of the strange quality of their situation.

He didn't want to have to cover their tracks anymore.

"What?" Nick pressed forward, tucking his head down to graze his mouth below Ellis' jaw. He nipped along the side of his neck, letting little exhales flutter along the wet skin he left behind. "Do I gotta apologize or somethin'? Since when are you so touchy...?"

The contact made Ellis reflexively stretch up onto his toes, turning his head, a wordless sigh escaping him. He squirmed a little, nudging backwards. "Wouldn't hurt." he muttered, voice raw.

A grin was quick to come to the Northerner's lips, voice turning almost soothing. He jumped on the break, eagerly. "I've got a better idea." Nick didn't waste any time, raising his hand far enough to dive it down the front of the younger man's coveralls. Ellis outright yelped, softly, hips hitching eagerly as fingers massaged him warmly through his boxers.

He could feel the tension pool in his stomach as his body responded, and he moaned gently, reaching back with both hands to grasp blindly at Nick. Ellis tangled fingers in his dress shirt, so tightly that it pried up and out of its tuck under his slacks. "Sh-shit." Ellis uttered, chin lowering, a flush rising to his cheeks. As much as his focus fuzzed under the warm pulses of pleasure, that didn't stop him from uttering a strained, "That ain't a proper apology..."

He felt the way Nick's body stiffened against him, and there was a graveled quality to his voice when he responded. "That a challenge?" he growled, softly, and Ellis found himself abruptly pushed against the side of the car, Nick's body pinning him there by force.

Without removing the hand from his coveralls, Nick darted the other one up, catching it against Ellis' jaw. He turned the younger man's face, meeting him halfway to steal his lips, biting his lower lip with a scrape of teeth and the vaguest suction.

Ellis might've had the mind to complain about the fact the cigarette taste had returned to his mouth - but there was an oddly minty sort of aftertaste, and it mostly just startled him.

He didn't have much time to focus, anyway, when Nick's hand slipped all the way into his boxers and gripped him firmly. The kiss was well-timed, because between the squeeze of fingers directly on his flesh and the way Nick ground his hips forward against him from behind, Ellis might've made an outburst louder than the groans he muffled into Nick's lips.

Unable to resist rocking back, Ellis tugged on Nick's shirt in wordless plea. The older man obeyed, movements increasing in urgency until there was a desperate and messy friction between them, grinding and shoving - trading kisses - Ellis' knees threatening to crumple with every dry stroke -
The radio chirruped from its place hooked onto Nick's belt.

Both men froze, the kiss turning into a numb press as they registered the noise. Nick pulled back, tongue flashing out to lick at his lower lip, and he muttered out a "Fuckshitgoddamnit." as he inhaled tightly. Ellis had to seal his lips by force, breathing out hard through his nose, because Nick didn't even remove his hand from where it sat wrapped around the younger man's length.

Rather, he merely took one step back with one foot to pivot away, snatching the radio off his hip. "Quiet." he ordered, curtly, and Ellis gave a timidly obedient nod.

That spawned a smirk on Nick's lip, and as he pressed the green talk button on the radio... his hand moved, giving Ellis just the slightest, teasing squeeze. "What?" Nick uttered into the walkie-talkie, voice full of casual disdain, like he wasn't gazing luridly down at Ellis struggling not to make a sound.

The Georgian quickly put a hand over his mouth, letting out a stifled whine as his hips hitched of their own accord.

It was Rochelle, voice made tinny by static.

"Are your guys still n egrby?"

Nick only half-paid attention, enraptured by Ellis' struggle, particularly when the younger man grabbed at his forearm with his free hand in a pleading, desperate gesture. He grinned subtly, aware that the pleading was for him to stop - so, naturally, he continued. "Yeah. Checking the car out. Why?"

The look on Ellis' face was nothing short of shocked, even as his body needily writhed into the touches. He gave up his grip on Nick, using both hands to stifle his mouth, now stuck staring at the radio in horror.

"Coach just woke up. His kne's sti ff, _and it'll do-him s ome good to get out _and walk. Yo_u guys mind if he comes with?"

Nick stopped dead. It was with outright fury that he yanked his hand free of Ellis' boxers, taking a half-step back to stare at the radio in his hand. The younger man had to collect himself with a shaky inhale, leaning against the sedan while his legs protested having to support his weight.

It took Nick a few moments to work through it. His mouth opened - then closed, more than once. Ellis could see any number of excuses and responses appear and then wither on his lips.

He came up empty.

"... Whatever." he managed, and all the frustration and outrage that he kept out of his voice was on full display in his eyes. He narrowed them at Ellis, waiting a beat to determine that Rochelle wasn't going to respond before he jammed the radio back onto his belt.

Ellis got himself straightened up, awkwardly and shyly brushing his wrist over his mouth and glancing down at his clothing. Nick had left it in disarray, coveralls low and cocked on his hips and shirt nudged up by the friction of his forearm. Carefully putting himself back into a presentable state, Ellis managed a weak, "Uh.. Sorry, Nick."

He peeked upwards, finding the older man very intently watching him. Nick didn't say a word, quietly reaching into his slacks to drag out his cigarettes and lighter. He popped the pack open, retrieving it and sliding one between his lips.
He slowly flicked the lighter and set the cigarette to burning. "She is fucking out to get me." he muttered, voice unsteady even as he inhaled. Smoke roiled harshly into his mouth and out of his nose, billowing up around his head like the furious emissions of a volcano.

Ellis couldn't help but glance up in the direction of the house and wonder if she wasn't.

When Coach made it to the bottom of the stairwell, Nick and Ellis were standing in the yard. The gambler had his arms crossed, glaring off into the distance, and Ellis was carefully examining his own feet. Coach seemed to sense the tension from a yard off, a brow going up. He had his double-barrel shotgun against his shoulder, hand grasping the stock to keep it balanced. "You boys fightin' again?" he questioned, half-amused.

Barely withholding his disdain, Nick scowled in his direction. Swinging the katana at his side, the gambler muttered sharply. "Can we just fucking do this shit? I don't want to be out here any longer than I have to be."

Setting his free hand against his hip, Coach tilted his head, giving him a dull look and quickly turning his attention toward Ellis. The look on his face was one of patient disinterest, dismissing Nick out of hand and instead seeking an actual answer from Ellis. Passing Coach a wary smile, Ellis thumbed over his shoulder toward the garage.

"So.. uh. We checked the sedan, and I'm pretty sure we can get a hose down in there. Ain't really gonna know fer sure until we try, though."

Sighing softly, Coach dropped his shotgun into his hands and turned to start walking toward the fence gate. The other men followed behind him, collecting into a single file line. "A'ight. Guess we start checkin' houses for a hose?" Nick couldn't resist glancing down, giving Coach's gait a once-over.

He seemed stable enough. The last thing they needed was his knee going out again, though he didn't plan to go far from the house. If they got further than a few blocks, Nick would be urging them all to return.

There hadn't been any gunshots that day, but he was far from feeling safe.

"Yeah." Ellis agreed, flipping Chris' machete in his hand thoughtfully. Coach unlatched the fence gate, swinging it open carefully, and leaned out to gaze either way down the street. "A'ight. Guess we start checkin' houses for a hose?" Nick couldn't resist glancing down, giving Coach's gait a once-over.

He seemed stable enough. The last thing they needed was his knee going out again, though he didn't plan to go far from the house. If they got further than a few blocks, Nick would be urging them all to return.

There hadn't been any gunshots that day, but he was far from feeling safe.

"One problem at a time." he growled, quietly, striding to take point. He slid both hands to grasp the katana's hilt, stepping onto the sidewalk and advancing down the street. It was the opposite way they'd gone the last time, in search of a car - and toward the direction they'd been hearing shots.

He didn't like that, but they needed to get the car functional and trustworthy. Especially if these guys are sticking around.

Coach closed the gate behind them and he and Ellis were shortly on Nick's heels. Ellis held up the rear with Coach between them, less for his protection and more to keep the melee weapons on the outside. Using a gun was a last resort.

The infected were so listless and distracted, sleepily so, they probably could have snuck past without much trouble. However, Nick squinted at the four scattered zombies and glanced over his shoulder at his teammates. "Let's take 'em out. Rather not have infected between us and home if we gotta book it.” Both the other survivors nodded, and Nick refocused ahead.

He put his lips together and let out a sharp, quiet whistle, just enough to catch the zombies' attention. The one laying on the ground snapped its head up, releasing a wild shriek and catapulting itself up off the asphalt into a stumbling sprint.

The other infected were alerted by the movement, and in one flash of rage, all four infected were on them. Nick and Ellis slipped to flank Coach, advancing a few steps to meet the zombies. The gambler struck first, lashing for the neck of the first infected to reach them, but the creature lurched at the last second and the katana sunk into its shoulder instead.

Nick snarled, kicking out at its knee. It collapsed, and he took it to the ground, ripping his katana free and stabbing it straight down through the zombie's face. He could feel bone protesting the blade's intrusion, rough and stuttered as it fractured through, and the infected went limp.

The time it took him to finish it off had the other three zombies too close for comfort, but Ellis was quick to sling himself forward. The machete had enough weight to apply itself easily into a swing, and he chopped it into the top of an infected's skull.

The zombie didn't immediately die. It collapsed, falling into something like a seizure on the ground, snarls coming in gurgled flutters. Ellis was startled into a slight step back, and Coach darted up to his side. He used his shotgun like a battering ram, smashing the stock into the chest of the next infected.

It flew back, striking the one behind it, sending them both to the ground as they grabbed and clawed at each other in reflexive rage. Nick advanced as they landed, and he pierced his blade down in a swift jab. He felt it hit concrete, and the two infected only worsened the wound by flailing and clawing.

They died quickly, and Nick retreated a step. "Anybody want zombie shish-kabob?" he offered, pulling the katana free and turning a grin on his companions.

They did not look amused.

"Man, still feels sorta weird usin' their weapons." Ellis murmured, shaking a bit of gore off his machete with a frown. "Wonder if we look as scary."

Coach snorted, turning away to glance at the condo next to theirs. His eyes scanned the yard for signs of a hose, to no avail. "No offense, Ellis, but you couldn't look scary if you tried." The younger man shot him a look as if trying to decide between being pleased and offended - and Coach grinned at him.

"It's a compliment. Rare man who can stay level in these times."

Ellis shrugged his shoulders, scratching at his neck with his free hand. "I guess." He followed as Nick and Coach kept moving down the road. "Goes fer all of us, though. Like... we got lucky, didn't we? Meetin' up? 'Cause we're all nice folks, so it ain't hard tuh keep... y'know. Sane, I guess."

"Maybe." the ex-football player grunted. A car sat straddling the curb, and they cut to the right, stepping up on the sidewalk to get around it. "Half the battle is havin' somethin' to keep you thinkin' straight, though, and you do a real good job of that. You an' Ro', too, but you help her the same."

The next condo had a fence just a little taller than eye-level, and Nick strode up to it, reaching up to grab a hand on the top. He didn't really climb it; just used it to balance himself as he gave a light hop, catching a glimpse over into the yard. He could see across the lawn and into the open single-car garage.

"No go on the hose. There's a garage, but it's empty." he uttered as he landed, turning away. His voice rose with a touch of sarcasm as he interjected, "Ellis, the moral compass of the group."

"Amen." Coach uttered, humoured, as if he hadn't caught that Nick wasn't serious.

The youngest survivor crinkled his nose, swinging the machete alongside himself in an idle gesture. "That - that ain't hardly true. Y'all would be doin' just fine without me." He glanced between the two men at either side of him, a slight redness touching the tips of his ears, embarrassed at the line of thinking.

Nick upthrust a hand, taking care to step around a long-dead corpse lying on the sidewalk, grimacing at the strong smell of rot. "Oh, hell yeah. I'd be doing great. None of you to bother me, hold me back. I wish."

"I would'a strangled yo' ass." Coach retorted, dully, eyes lit with amusement. "If Ro' didn't do it first. And we'd probably all be dead anyway, a while back."

Ellis couldn't help blinking down toward his toes, caught off-guard and embarrassed at the words. Did they really think he was that integral? That important? That the group wouldn't exist, and wouldn't have lasted, without him?

It made him feel a strange kind of shame, and he wanted to argue - because they were the important ones. He couldn't imagine going through all they'd been through alone.

"Let's look in here." Nick suggested, as he came up to another tall fence. It was too tall to catch a peek over, so he reached for the gate. As he tugged on it, however, it refused to open. Something rattled on the other side with a dull sound and firm resistance. "... Damnit."

Ellis peeked up, shaking off his thoughts. He glanced over the fence, stepping up to a tiny hole in the grain. He shut one eye and reached up to flip his cap around so he could press his face up close to get a look through the hole.

Squirming left and right to scan across the view he had, he could see just enough. "There's a garage. Pretty big-lookin', might have somethin'... and there's a hose hooked up to the house." Pulling back, the mechanic shook his head a little, mouth crooked. "Can't tell if it's small enough from here."

Frustrated, Nick gave the gate a few yanks. It protested with a sturdy groan, barely shifting, so he gave up and released it. Instead, the gambler dropped to a crouch, cupping his hands together and bracing his forearm on the inside of his thigh. "... Let me haul you up. Don't jump over, just see what's closing this door, and if you can undo it if you got in there."

Coach immediately crossed his arms, narrowing his eyes. He shook his head firmly, discontent. "I don't like puttin' him on the other side of a fence from us. Might be somethin' in there."

Sparing a glare in his direction, Nick shrugged. He riled a little, irritated at the implication that he'd do so without thinking twice. "One, it's dead silent in there. Two, I literally just said don't jump over. Just take a look."

Ellis quickly advanced, waving a hand gently at Coach. "I'll just look, I promise." He stepped up beside Nick, resting a palm on his shoulder and scooting up a foot to place his boot on Nick's clasped palms. The gambler grimaced, disgust apparent on his features - and Ellis almost laughed.
Once he'd gotten his balance there, Nick counted out a muttered "One, two -" and Ellis shifted all his weight onto Nick's hands. The gambler straightened a little, not quite coming out of his crouch, and Ellis lifted up a hand to grip onto the top edge of the fencing as it came into reach.

"Little more." he prompted when it was still too tall to see over, receiving a nasty snarl from Nick, who straightened a few more inches.

Craning his head over the fence, Ellis peeked straight down, looking at the other side of the gate. The handle was a flat bar, and someone had wedged a slat of wood between it and the gate, locking it in place. "Oh, yeah. It's just blocked up. I can get it open."

"Anythin' hostile in there?" Coach questioned, dubiously. "Any zombies?"

Ellis did a quick scan of the lawn, shaking his head. There were a few lawn chairs sprawled out across the grass, and the remnants of some long-past grill party. The grill had long since gone out, and the charred shapes of what might have been hotdogs and hamburgers were burnt into the grating.

It made him hungry.

"Ain't nothin'. Just lemme hop over, I'll get the gate open." When Nick grunted in affirmation, Ellis dropped his machete on the other side of the fence, freeing his hands to grip it with both hands.

They both surged in unison, and Ellis kicked himself up onto the fence. Momentum did not carry him over, and he landed for a moment on the very top, buckled over it - and a vague cry of pain left his lips. He'd forgotten about his rib, and the fence jabbed up into his midsection.

He tipped over the fence in a clumsy surge, recoiling to get his weight off his injured rib. Stars sparked in his eyes, vision blurring amidst the pain. The next thing he knew he was flat on his back in the grass, eyes squinted shut.

"Ellis!" Coach called out, urgently, at the same time Nick hissed a sharp, "Overalls?"

It took Ellis a moment to regain his breath, inhaling sharply, eyes watering slowly. He forced himself up onto his elbows, blearily seeking out the machete and getting it back into his hands. "'M fine! Sorry! Just fell is all..."

"Christ." Nick's voice was a little muffled through the fence, moving as he approached the gate's other side. "That was about as graceful as I expected from you. You still in one fucking piece over there, or are we gonna have to put you back together, Humpty-Dumbshit?"

Coach pressed close to the fence, voice stern and concerned. "Ellis, open the gate up."

"Yeah, yeah..." Coughing softly, Ellis pushed himself up, curling an arm to press a hand against his ribs. He got his feet under himself, straightening, and turned to walk up to the fence gate. He got a grip on the plank of wood barring the gate, testing it with a wiggle.

It moved, but not much. "It's a li'l stuck, gimme a sec.'" He tucked the machete under his arm, grasping the plank with both hands. He put his weight into it, grimacing a little as he pulled - and the plank made a few squeaks of progress, but it was wedged tightly.

He frowned, vaguely. "Can you push on the door?"

The fence gate suddenly jerked, as Nick put weight on it from the other side. Ellis pulled on the plank again, but it moved even less than before. Blinking, he uttered, "Um... Pull?" There was an annoyed growl right before the gate jolted again, this time yanking the opposite direction. When Ellis tugged, he found it just as stuck.

"Um... It ain't mov-" He hadn't finished the sentence before a light flickered on in his head. Ellis slowly looked toward the machete handle sticking out from under his arm as if seeing it for the first time. He laughed softly, then murmured, "Oh, I am dumb."

"What?" Nick and Coach uttered in unison, some panic shared between their tones.

"Step back, man. I'm 'bout to Voorhees this mother."

He heard their footsteps, stuttered as they retreated, and Ellis carefully pressed the edge of the machete against the plank, readying himself. He coiled his body behind the gesture, angling it, before taking a hearty chop out of the wood.

The machete sunk effortlessly into the board, sundering it halfway through. He let out a laugh, tickled with himself, and tore the blade free. He tapped the edge against the notch he'd made, letting the muscle memory of the swing sink in as he prepared for another chop.

He raised the blade right as something collided with his back.

A warm, wet giggle sounded in his ear, as a disfigured set of teeth suddenly pushed hard against the side of his head, smearing blood and saliva against his cheek, and a set of gnarled limbs latched around his shoulders and neck.

Ellis yelped as the weight slammed him forward, hitting the fence face-first. The strike made his vision go black, and as soon as he hit it, the Jockey was yanking backwards. He stumbled back a few steps, arms pinwheeling, barely having the presence of mind to keep a grip on the machete.

He could hear shouting from the other side of the fence, but couldn't respond before the Jockey slapped a sweaty palm over his mouth, fingernails digging into his cheek. He gave a muffled yell and halted, digging in his heels.

The Jockey leaned off him as dead weight, and all stopping did was make it topple him to the ground, landing hard on the grass.

Spiderlike, the creature crawled out from under him, clambering to sit on his chest. It landed either greasy foot on his upper arms, pinning them there, and leaned in greedily toward his face. He choked on the fetid air escaping its broken and elongated maw, and it wrapped knobbled fingers around his neck and squeezed.

The airflow through his throat stopped with an almost tangible compression, and he found himself instantly straining. He hadn't thought to take a breath - and even if he had, panic emptied his lungs.

All he could think was of Jerry, crushing his chest under his boot. Of the bloody and disfigured face of Nick, cracking his neck with his bare hands. His heart rate went wild, thundering, and an animal fear took over.

He struggled, bucking his body, trying to surge up the hand wielding the machete. He stabbed it toward the creature, and its edge found purchase on the Jockey's back and side. However, even as he could hear its papery flesh giving way and feel the splatter of blood against his fingers, it did not desist.

Although his vision began to fade, he could see past the Jockey's warped shoulder and to the fence gate. It shook, ferociously, like a blow had been applied to it - and though the plank threatened to give, it didn't. Ellis could hear his companions yelling, and he choked out a few desperate syllables.

He tried to surge his arms up, but the Jockey tightened its grip, and the lack of oxygen was numbing his limbs. The Jockey laughed in his face, delirious, something in its bulging eyes speaking to utter terror.

Some tremendous force blew the gate open, hard enough to shatter the plank that he'd chopped half through, and the gate slammed on its hinges and cracked into the fence as it spun open. Through the blurring of his vision, Ellis saw it: Coach and Nick were shoulder to shoulder, recovering their balance from a joint kick.

The ex-football player had his arm around Nick's shoulders, and there was pain on his face.

Barely registering the motion as they charged forward, all Ellis knew was the weight was suddenly lifted off of him, and he sucked in a violent breath. The expansion of his chest hurt, and before he could stop, another breath came. And another. And his breath was stuttering, shaking, like he couldn't get ahold of it.

The Jockey wasn't even on him anymore, wasn't gripping his neck anymore, but he couldn't breathe.

"Son. Son. You a'ight." a voice whispered to him, and he barely felt it as he was pulled up into a seated position on the grass, arms wrapping around him. His face tilted, burying into Coach's chest, and he felt the hyperventilation of his lungs only slowly stop as the big man's hand smoothed in circles on his back.

Ellis didn't even realize he'd begun to cry until he forced an inhale through his nose, and it was wet and stuffy. Coach just held him, and the mechanic was only distantly aware of Nick standing in front of both of them, arms crossed and face drawn in an irritated frown.

He didn't even look up toward the gambler, because he was afraid to know who he was irritated at.

"You breathe fo' me, son."
Ellis sat on the edge of one of the lawn chairs, slumped, expression drawn into something a little miserable. "I'm fine, really!"

Coach shook his head, arms crossed over his chest tightly. "Son, I ain't tryin' to make you feel bad, but you ain't. We'll just head back, and you can stay with Ro'. Nick an' I can handle things." When Ellis became poised to argue, Coach shifted to carefully and tenderly kneel down.

Pain fluctuated over his features, but that didn't stop him from reaching out and grasping the back of Ellis' neck. "Ellis... it's a'ight. You don't gotta hide bein' upset." The younger man averted his eyes, embarrassed with the knowledge of how his eyes were still red and his face still flushed. "What is it? I ain't seen you panic like that."

"I-it's nothin'. I just couldn't breathe, is all, and my chest is still hurtin'." It wasn't a lie, after all. Just an omission of some details. "Is your knee okay...?"

He knew Coach saw through his weak attempt at distraction, and the big man gave him a weary look of disapproval. "It's fine, son. And if yo' chest is hurtin' that bad, just means even more reason to send you back home."

Nick came up from behind them, stepping lightly. He'd unhooked the hose from the faucet, and shoved it out where Ellis could see it. "Small enough?" he questioned, curt.

The mechanic pulled gently back from Coach's grip, looking nervously up toward the Northerner. His face was impassive, cold almost. Ellis wasn't sure if he should take comfort from the lack of active anger, or be unsettled. Maybe he merely meant to be angry later.

He tried to focus on the hose, reaching out to grasp it with a still-trembling hand, getting a feel for the diameter. "Uh... yeah, maybe, if we cut off the cap..." Ellis snuck a glance to meet Nick's gaze, and found himself looking into distant greens that gave no sign of emotion, merely frigid understanding. "I'm not... real sure, sorry."

Nick tilted his head, eyes darting for Coach. "Sam, we still need something to hold the gas. Not gonna do us any good to siphon it out without a can or something. And no offense, but if your knee goes out, I don't think I can get your fat ass back alone."

When Coach turned a frown up to the gambler, Ellis ducked his head slightly. At the same time he felt some gratification at Nick standing up for him, he didn't like them fighting - and especially not over him. "I can get my damn self back home, Nicolas. And if you'd listened to me and not had Ellis go over the fence, we wouldn't be in this mess."

That made Nick laugh, barking out an unhumoured noise and shaking his head. "He's a fucking grown adult. I didn't make him do anything."

Coach's jaw flinched, and he suddenly straightened, weight tilting off his bad leg and shoulders going stiff. Ellis' eyes widened at the sudden, unexpected flash of vitriol between them. "You know full well he'd do somethin' dumb, especially if you told him to."

"What the fuck is that supposed to mean?" Nick hissed, nostrils flaring and eyes gone narrowed. His posture tightened, and Coach matched him, the two men squaring off like they meant to fight.
"You wanna say something, Sam?"

"Hey!" Ellis yelled, anger flaring up and sending him to his feet. "I'm right the hell here!" He wobbled, but caught his balance to thrust himself between the two older survivors and physically block them from each other. "Nobody did nothin' dumb! It snuck up on me, and y'all saved me. We're fine. So quit fightin' over nothin'!

Coach was the first to relent, stepping back rather than fight Ellis' intrusion. Nick looked vaguely smug as he lowered his shoulders - like he'd won.

Scratching at his forearm, Coach uttered a grunted sigh. He turned away, looking toward the house's garage with lowered brows. Rather than apologize or acknowledge Ellis, he uttered, "Gonna check on if they got a container in there." He moved away, stepping tenderly on his weak leg.

Ellis gazed after him, frowning gently. He inhaled, sharply, curling his fingers into fists. His gut trembled, threatening nausea, and it only sharpened when Nick passed him a look sideways.

"Someone's pissy today." he commented, dryly.

Ellis exhaled and followed after Coach without responding. He wasn't upset at Nick, exactly, but couldn't they go a day without a communications breakdown? Every time he thought things had finally evolved past petty arguing - he was proven wrong.

He could barely keep himself together anymore. Why did they think he could keep them together?

"'Ey - Coach." he called, hurrying to catch up with the man. Coach was in the process of grabbing the handles to the garage door, and Ellis sidled up to join him in the effort. Together they pulled it up, the metal rattling as it coiled up and out of sight.

The garage was silent inside, a set of shelves and cabinets set up against the wall. Coach didn't spare Ellis a look as he ducked inside and started to pace along the shelving, looking through the assorted junk piled on the racks. The younger man followed at his heels, close enough to trip over him.

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean tuh yell - or get hurt." When Coach held his silence, Ellis reached to grab his arm. That stopped him in his tracks, and the ex-football player glanced his way, eyes betraying a vague surprise. "Don't be mad at him."

The big man actually chuckled, turning a bemused look on him. He drew his arm free with a shake, instead patting a hand on Ellis' shoulder. "Nicky just knows how to push my buttons, that's all. Just need to cool off."

Ellis smiled a little in return, nodding his head. He snuck a glance over his shoulder, checking to ensure that Nick wasn't paying attention. The gambler was standing with his back to them, out in the lawn, working on sawing the hose's endcap off with his katana. The non-serrated edge struggled just a little to chew through the webbed and netted layers of plastic.

work half-completed, looping the hose up so he could put his arm through it and tuck it alongside his stowed sniper rifle. Shouldering the burden, he glanced back at his teammates. "If we're done fighting."

Together, Ellis and Coach retreated from the garage, returning to Nick's side. The younger man passed Nick a hesitant blink, gauging his expression - and the older man offered him the slightest squint back.

He was gauging him, too, so Ellis forced a smile.

Nick looked unconvinced as he shrugged the hose higher on his shoulder, walking toward the gate. "We'll try a few more houses, cut across the street, and go back. I don't want to go too far." There was no argument from his teammates, though Coach grunted faintly.

As they walked across the lawn, Ellis couldn't help but look down at the corpse of the Jockey. Nick had slit its throat deeply enough to almost sever it completely, and the creature lay in a tightly coiled fetal position, like a squashed bug. Its eyes stared sightlessly off into the distance, tears streaked down its waxy skin and tongue lolling between mutilated jaws.

He frowned, a little. "Weird thinkin' we got whatever them ugly things got..." he murmured, mostly to himself, but Coach turned to glance at him curiously.

"Hmm?" he questioned, tolerantly.

Ellis looked up to respond, but didn't get the chance.

Soft enough to be in the distance, but loud enough to be heard, came the thrum of an engine. They all startled, freezing, and Nick bolted to duck against the fence. Coach followed his cue, grabbing Ellis' elbow to drag him with, and the survivors ended up flattened against the fencing.

"Shit. Is that a car?" Nick hissed, craning his head out through the open gate. His hands shifted, sliding his katana under his belt to sheathe it, and pulling his sniper rifle into his grip instead. "If they heard us..." The motion caught Ellis' attention, and stoked a little fear in his chest. He didn't want things to turn violent.

Ellis shook his head, pushing forward against Coach to listen. The noise continued in a purring rhythm, heightening and pitching as it went, seeming to travel across the air. "N-no." he managed, anxiety quieting his voice. "I don't think so. Sounds like a bike. Can't be too far, either."

Wordlessly, Coach grabbed the radio off Nick's hip, eliciting a slight startle from the gambler. He raised the handheld to his mouth, voice hushed as he spoke. "Babygirl?"

She responded instantly, sounding tense - even through the radio. "I'm here. Is something wrong?"

"We're comin' back. We got company out here."

The engine was growing louder, if Ellis wasn't imagining things. Nick growled, turning and leaning in toward the radio. Coach hit the call button for him, offering the mic out toward his mouth. "If you hear gunshots, fucking stay inside."

It almost seemed like Rochelle might not respond, but just when Coach began to lower the radio, a crackle announced her response.
"As if."

Nick smirked, just faintly, then turned back toward the gate opening. He couldn't see any sign of the vehicle, but it couldn't have been more than a few blocks away, judging by the volume and echo of the sound. He murmured over his shoulder, voice firm and eyes coldly calculating. "What's our play?"

"Run. If they know where we are, ain't no sense sneakin'." Coach uttered, and when Ellis nodded his head, Nick snorted.

"Only if you can, old man." Rather than give Coach a chance to retort, Nick made a break for it. He cut hard to the left as his stride took him through the fence gate, and his teammates were close behind. Their footsteps pounded on the sidewalk as they charged to retrace their steps.

Ellis couldn't stop looking over his shoulder, terrified that each glance would reveal the source of that thrumming engine on their tail.
Rochelle paced carefully across the entryway hall, thumbing against the curve of her lower lip. She gazed at the radio in her hand, mind racing. She wanted to check in - but if they were in danger, her yelling in their ear was the last thing they needed.

It wasn't like they could have gone far in the time they'd been gone. As long as she didn't hear gunfire, she had to keep her calm. "They'll be back." she murmured, reassuringly, taking in a deep breath. "They'll definitely be back."

Releasing the breath in a bluster, she carefully turned, stepping back into the bedroom. She'd come in to bring Christophe something to eat and found him cloistered away under the sheets, so tightly it would have taken force to unwrap him. He hadn't stirred, and she'd been hesitant to wake him.

But if they were under attack, and God forbid they had to leave...

"Chris? I'm sorry, I need you to wake up." She approached the bed, urgently setting a knee against the edge of the mattress so she could lean in. "We might have to leave, so I need you to be awake."

He shifted, just softly, and his voice came thin and muffled through the draped sheets. "Leave?" he questioned, just a ghosted word.

She nodded, gently flexing her injured hand. "Hopefully not. But the boys are saying they've run into someone, and they may or may not be onto us. If it's... if it's your friend, Phil, then... I need you to be ready to talk to him. And if it's not, we need to be ready to leave."

When Christophe started to move, breath going pained and reedy, Rochelle reached out a hand to help drag the sheets out of their tight wrap around his body. He pushed his arm against the bed, shoving himself up toward a sitting position. He slumped there, shirtless body still crusted in shades of pink and red, face drawn in a tight grimace of agony.

"Sí." was all he said. His eyes were dull, and Rochelle couldn't resist a frown.

She understood the emptiness in his expression, but it hurt her to see. She didn't know how to make it easier, didn't know how to fix it. Everything that came to mind was some platitude or useless sentiment, and the last thing she wanted to do was say something that would only make him feel worse.

Reaching out, Rochelle gently touched his shoulder, aware of the way the touch made him flinch a little. She wasn't sure if it was pain, or something else, but she pressed on. "It'll be okay. We'll all be here for you, and we have a car - so you shouldn't have to go far, alright?"

Chris glanced up, looking her face over in a slow wander of attention, and the faintest slip of amusement touched his eyes. "You will have to carry me, I think, bonita."

Rochelle couldn't stop a smile from appearing on her lips, some warm and heavy relief seeping into her chest. He hadn't called her that in so long - she'd almost thought he never would again, and it was an odd comfort. And when she smiled, he returned it. It was small and fragile, but there.

"Get ready on the door." Coach's voice hummed out of the radio in her other hand, startling her.

She averted her eyes, clipping the radio back onto the pocket of her jeans, and took a quick inhal. Fresh relief flooded in at the idea her teammates were close by. "I - gotta go get them. Stay here..."
for now, okay? I'll come back and get you if we have to make a run for it."

Chris nodded, just once, and she turned and hurried back out into the entryway. Her boots hit hard against the carpet, and it was in somewhat of a scramble that she made it to the front door and undid the deadbolt and doorknob lock.

Carefully, reaching back to pull her pistol out from the waistband of her jeans, Rochelle drew it into her left hand. Maintaining it pointed downward, she turned the knob enough to open the door and used her shoulder to nudge it open. She gave herself enough of an opening to see, and her sightline cut straight across the yard to the fence gate.

Rochelle held her breath, and if she listened - she could hear something. It made her frown, leaning out slightly, processing the noise only slowly. An engine? A car of some sort, roaring and chugging somewhere nearby? That must have been what startled the others, and she couldn't blame them.

As much as she didn't want to be, she was afraid. The sound sent chills up her spine.

A soft startle made her jump when the fence gate shifted, creaking abruptly as it tipped open. Ellis was the first one through, and he shuffled to hold the gate open. The clutch of dread on her stomach, nonsensical, lasted until Coach and Nick followed behind him and he shut the gate.

Rochelle had been holding her breath, and it was only as she watched all three of them come running toward her did she release it.

"I'm glad you guys are okay!" she uttered, even as her hand flashed down to flip the power button on the radio. Coach followed suit as he started up the stairs, eyes darting to meet hers with a soothing blink. He quickly dove into the condo, sighing.

"You an' me both, babygirl."

Nick snorted, dismissively. He dumped the hose off his shoulder before he reached the staircase, thrusting up his hands. "Okay, and also fucking irritated. Waste of a trip. Couldn't find a gas can or anything before that fucking asshole started making noise. All we did was get a fucking garden hose, and help him hone in on where we are!"

"How 'bout you get in the house before you start yellin', Nick?" Ellis murmured, tone gently worried, and he stepped up to follow the gambler. Nick grasped his katana and ascended the stairs, grumbling under his breath. As he came up to Rochelle, Ellis slipped a hand to touch her elbow. "Sorry if we scared you."

Rochelle smiled hesitantly, fighting the urge to grab him up into an embrace. She put a hand against his back and ushered him inside, sparing one glance through the door before shutting it again. She turned, facing her teammates with a wary attention. "Do you think they saw you? Heard you?"

"Ain't real sure, babygirl." Coach dragged fingertips against his neck, eyes screwing up in thought with a weary sigh. "Sound like they were comin' toward us, but never saw 'em. They're real close by, though."

Ellis slipped his arms into a loose hug around his torso, squeezing fingers on the handle of Chris' machete. "I... I sorta messed up, so they might have heard us." Rochelle shot him a confused blink, eyes gone sympathetic. "Nick'n'Coach had tuh make a ruckus savin' my hide."

"Kid's a Jockey magnet." Nick stated, coolly.
Rochelle took a step toward Ellis, looping an arm around his. She looked him over, and her eyes caught on the bruises beginning around his neck. They were thin and tapered, mixed with the abrasions of nails. "I'm fine." he muttered before she could ask, eyes averting.

Her hand petted softly on his forearm, and she looked up toward Coach, expression fading to something serious - and slightly frightened. "Do we need to go?"

The football coach shook his head in slow negation, sighing. He looked down at the carpet rather than gaze on her features too long, flicking the tip of his thumb against his index finger. "Don't see no point. If they know we're here, and want a fight, they'll just follow us. If they don't, we ain't got no reason to shake things up. Be hard on Chris, anyway."

"And we didn't... actually get a way to fuel the car up." Ellis hesitantly interjected, eyes soft with regret. His voice went vaguely unsteady, insecure. "Like, if we pulled the cars up real close, maybe we could just... get the flow goin', stick the other end'uh the hose in the other gas tank...? They're kinda on a hill.. maybe it'd work..."

Gently, Rochelle nudged him with her shoulder, smiling in a soft and forced manner. "Look. Don't worry about it right now, okay? You haven't eaten today, and you sound a little faint. Go grab something, and we'll puzzle it out together, okay?"

He gave her a dubious look like he was wise to her less-than-opaque attempt to distract him, but nodded, echoing softly, "Okay." He extricated his arm from hers, turning to pad up the staircase, head vaguely low.

In his absence, Rochelle slipped her gaze toward Nick. Her voice lowered to nearly a murmur, eyes narrowing. "What happened?"

Nick shrugged his arms up, prepared to respond, but Coach overrode him. "He got pinned by a Jockey. Panicked. Ain't seen the boy that upset - ever." Rochelle's expression fell to some struggling emotion, and the closest definition of it might have been disappointment. In herself, maybe, or all of them. "Cryin', couldn't breathe, the whole nine yards."

"Damnit." she muttered, putting a hand over her mouth and turning half away. She tapped nails against her lips, closing her eyes for a few beats. "I knew he wasn't okay." It was with an inhale that Rochelle, eyes still closed, murmured. "Nick. Go talk to him."

The gambler thrust his arms out to either side, defensively. He took a step back, ragged irritation coming up over his features. "What the fuck? Why is it always me? I'm sorry, did I miss the part where somebody died and made me group therapist?"

Coach's hands slid to grasp at his hips, a frown alighting on his lips. "You don't think anyone other than Nick might help?"

With that, Nick's defense did a sudden and violent 180, and he turned a glare onto the football coach. "Oh, right, because I'm never helpful. I'm definitely not the reason one-arm in there is alive, or any of you fuckers are alive at any given point. Definitely haven't cleaned up your mess a few times."

Coach bristled gently, fingers curling into fists. "That ain't my point, Nick. My point is -"

Their voices were raising, and Rochelle reached out her free hand, grabbing Coach by the wrist. He snapped his eyes to hers, and she blinked slowly into his gaze. "Papa bear. Ellis doesn't need to hear this. Okay?" She didn't anticipate what happened next.
Of all the things she'd have expected, it wasn't what happened.

Coach's brows drew into a pinch, and he glared at her.

Flipping their grips, he abruptly took her hand and strode down the hallway. She had little choice but to follow, even as Nick looked after them with an almost bewildered posture. Nearly all the anger drained out of him in favour of confusion. "Wh-? Bye to you, too, assholes."

Gently guiding her into the second bedroom, Coach closed the door behind them solidly. He sighed, weightily, releasing her wrist with something like an apologetic shake of his head. She frowned, an insecurity tugging her shoulders down as she gazed at him in silence. He didn't look that angry often.

"Look, Ro'. I don't get in this mess, 'cause I know you and Ellis are close - but can you give me a damn clue here?" She gazed at him in vague shock, unsure, mouth gawping softly in silence. "The boy's real messed up 'bout somethin'. Why do you keep pushin' him on Nick when the man's just gonna be a horse's ass?"

Rochelle was at an utter loss for words.

That was the last thing she'd thought he had on his mind, and part of her immediately froze. She'd never told Coach anything about Nick and Ellis, never so much as hinted toward it. She'd wanted to, of course, but Ellis had entrusted her with the secret... unintentionally or no.

"I...", Rochelle tried to raise her hands, stop him, but he was already off.

"That boy is - impressionable. You tellin' me you don't think Nick's got a hand in him being so damn scared? Havin' Nick as a friend is helpin'? The man can't take two seconds to say somethin' nice half the time, and the rest of the time is doom and gloom, or bein' a hard-ass."

That frustrated Rochelle a little, jaw flinching, because she had her own doubts. She had her own fears, and her own concerns. She knew Nick cared for Ellis - but that wasn't the point, was it? That wasn't what mattered, when it came down to it.

"So help me out here, Ro'. Do you know somethin' I don't? It wasn't a big deal back when I thought Ellis was a'ight, but the boy cracked today." Coach reached out, and suddenly he had hands cradling her face, and there was a strained and tense worry drowning his dark eyes. "I ain't seen him act like that. He needs us. Why ain't you up there talkin' to him?"

Her jaw trembled, and she suddenly felt the intense desire to cry.

She didn't.

But she knew if she tried to argue, if she tried to tell him how she felt, she'd tip her hand. There was no way to discuss this halfway, so she closed her eyes and took a step back, sighing harshly. He seemed to catch on that something was wrong, and he released her, mouth tugging into a frown.
"Look, Coach. I understand, okay? I'll talk to him." she mumbled, softly. She raised a hand to pinch down the bridge of her nose, stressed. "I promise. But... don't think so badly of Nick. He does better with Ellis than you think, he just... doesn't let us see it. Pretty sure it wasn't Nick behind the breakdown he had today."

Sliding his arms into a cross, Coach cocked his head. He thumbed against the waistband of his slacks, exhaling. "Jerry?"

"Among everything else going on right now." She smiled, though it was hollow, slanting a glance up through her eyelashes to gaze over the older man's face. His expression faded into a tense and creased look of concern. "You really blame him?"

Coach turned away, palming flatly against his face. There was genuine anger in his voice when he muttered, "Damn this shit. I the only one who didn't think anythin' would break that boy?"

Tentatively, Rochelle stepped forward. She stowed the pistol under the waistband of her jeans, at the base of her spine, and freed her hands to reach out both arms. She slipped them around Coach's waistline, pulling him into a hug, and he was quick to return it.

"Sorry, girl. Long few days."

She sighed out a soft, "Yeah.", burying into the hug for a few moments. Rochelle would not turn down the warmth and the affection, even if only for a beat of time.

On the other side of the door, Nick delicately pulled away, a frown etched deeply into his brow. There was a subtle but vicious anger in his posture as he turned and made for the stairs, careful to mask his footsteps until he'd gotten far enough away.

Always the bad guy, huh?
Chapter 158

Fidgeting fingers against a granola bar, Ellis couldn't help but sigh. He was as far from hungry as he'd ever been, stomach twisting into knots and heart thudding out a frightened pattern in his chest.

Carefully, the Georgian pushed himself up onto the kitchen counter, dangling his legs limply. He set the bar down on his lap and raised a hand to gently palm against his neck. His skin was still moist from contact with the Jockey's hands, and it was a tacky and oily wetness.

Sweat, or saliva, or who knew what. He grimaced, reaching blindly for the roll of paper towels behind him. He ripped off a section and used it to scrub at his neck and cheek, where the Jockey had pushed its rotten-out teeth against his face. It wasn't really disgust that fueled him, but a desire to wipe away the tactile sensations left behind.

It didn't work.

Slowly, his motions lost energy, then stopped. He dropped his hand to his lap, closing his eyes, trying for a deep inhale and ending up with a stuttered hiccup instead. He didn't want to feel like this. He didn't want to teeter on the brink of something like panic. Try as he might, his heart rate would not slow.

"Hey, kiddo."

Nick's voice broke through his focus, and he startled faintly. The gambler took the last few steps up the stairs, expression a thin veneer of calm, and approached him at a slow pace. Ellis couldn't help gazing at him, trying to find some kind of center, and calm himself with those familiar features. That familiar voice.

At least his heart stopped trying to thunder its way through his ribcage.

Lowering his gaze slowly, Ellis exhaled out a puff of air. As Nick advanced close enough for him to mumble, he questioned, "They're talkin' about me, huh?" The other man seemed irritated, and the fact he was even trying to disguise it told Ellis it wasn't him he was mad at. That was a relief, but only a very small and tentative one.

"Nah." Nick lied, and Ellis had to smile a little, despite himself. "Why would they talk about a little dumbshit like you?"

Lacing his fingers together cautiously, Ellis gazed down at his knees, letting his legs swing where they dangled off the counter's edge. "I didn't mean tuh freak. Honest. It's just..." His head raised delicately when Nick slid to stand just beside his knee, one hand going to brace against the countertop. He looked up, hesitantly, finding Nick's face perilously close to his.

The gambler's eyes searched over his face, a frustrated glint to the green. "Mean to? You think they're mad at you because you got scared? They're not angry, Ace. They're worried. Big difference." He reached out, grasping, as if he meant to get a thumb under Ellis' jawline and nudge his chin up, examine the abrasions on his neck.

The gesture made Ellis flinch. He didn't want to, but couldn't stop it, and Nick noticed it. His hand dropped, abruptly.

"... What's going on, anyway?" There was a note of irritation in his voice, and Ellis lowered his chin further, nearly embarrassed. "Only seen you come close to that upset once." He didn't say it, but there was tacit understanding: the hotel. When Ellis had burst through the door separating their rooms and broken down in his arms.

"Wasn't a Jockey that did it that time, though."

Ellis felt his face heat up, subtly, at the reminder. He turned his chin away slightly, only to find Nick leaning to keep within his vision. The older man's voice was taut, innocuous. The Southerner wanted to close his eyes, but he was almost sure he wouldn't like the images burned into the backs of his lids. "It's... nothin', Nick. I'm just -"

"Bullshit." Nick interjected calmly, a brow raising. "Try again."

His voice had become significantly less innocuous, and Ellis splayed out his fingers in a helpless gesture. "I-I just didn't see it comin'. Whut do you want me tuh say? I ain't supposed tuh be upset, gettin' jumped by that creepy sumbit-"

The gambler's head tilted, some frustration entering the posture as he shook his head right back, interrupting effortlessly. "Nope. Keep trying." The rejection stirred a tension that made Ellis utter a noise of agitation, leaning forward, and Nick reacted with a calculated disinterest.

He wasn't going to escape unscathed. Nick read him too well, and there was no way to play off the panic he'd experienced. The older man was stubborn, and not stupid.

"It - it just reminded me, that's all. Of Jerry, of ... that nightmare the other day, it just - it ain't sittin' well. Everything that's goin' on, I feel like I ain't got a handle on nothin' right now." Ellis glanced down at his hands, brows screwing up, and he was aware of Nick's silent attention on him.

It embarrassed him, somehow, and he hated how he felt in that moment. Nick's silence left him to flounder there alone, trapped in his own words, unable to do anything but forge through. Struggle past it.

"I'm just scared." blustered out of him, and it was with a sudden hunch that Ellis palmed against his eyes, hiding them behind spread fingers. "I don't wanna be, I just - I just am. Whut if these folk are crazy, too? Whut if they wanna hurt us? I can't - I can't do that again. I ain't got it in me, Nick."

Nick's eyes ticked to wordlessly watch the slow collapse of emotion in his posture, the cracks in his composure.

"I thought I wasn't gonna see y'all again." He was going to start crying, and he wanted so badly not to cry, but his lungs were collapsing in his chest and his voice was going high. He could feel the break coming. Tangible, and just around the corner. "He told me you were dead, and he was gonna hurt me - I didn't think we'd make it, Nick. I didn't think -"

Fingers suddenly snatched onto the side of his head, palm flat against his ear, fingertips pressing against his scalp. Nick's thumb got a grip against his cheek, and leveraged his face up, pulling it away from his hand. Their gazes met, and Nick's was simultaneously cold as ice and aflame.

"And now he's dead. I killed him, and we made it, because the bad guys lose and the good guys win."

Ellis stared at him through the vaguest veil of tears, slowly managing to shake his head within Nick's grip. "You don't think that's true. I know you, Nick, and you don't believe that." he mumbled, voice muffling to quiet when Nick's thumb traced down to press against the edge of his mouth.
"But you do. Or did, anyway." The older man leaned in, closer, and his lids lowered. The piercing quality of his gaze dulled with the gesture, voice growing vaguely distant. "When did that change, kid? And why'd you let it?"

The tears broke through, and Ellis reached up a trembling hand to close it over Nick's - but the gambler was already pulling away, turning on his heel, running fingers through his hair in a tense motion. The younger man was left with little recourse but allowing his hand to drop limply into his lap.

Nick ticked a nail against one of the rings on his fingers, inhaling and exhaling deeply, trying to calm himself. He was angry, and interacting with Ellis when he was angry had been a bad choice from the start. It would bleed through, one way or another - and what was the point?

If he was nothing but a bad influence, what was the point, anyway? Of any of it? He'd never meant for it to last this long, go this far. He'd learned long ago he couldn't be trusted with other people's well-being, and had spent so many years surrounding himself with awful men and women who couldn't have gotten any worse had he even tried...

Ellis was a genuinely good kid, and maybe it was too late, even if he left that very moment. Too late to undo whatever damage he'd already done, amongst all the damage the apocalypse and the Angels had done. He no longer had the comfort of knowing he would inevitably be just a bad memory of a misguided fling.

Nick had already ruined him.

He stiffened distantly when Ellis mumbled at his back. "I-I'm sorry."

Cocking his head, Nick glanced back over his shoulder, examining Ellis where he sat there, slumped and ashamed. His eyes widened for just an instant before a laugh escaped him, vague and unamused. Because of course Ellis would apologize, like he'd done something wrong.

"Christ." he muttered, voice wry. "Maybe you haven't fucking changed."

They stared each other down, trapped at a hesitant distance, something surging in the air like tension - but warmer than that. Like desire, or longing, drawn taut by stress and exhaustion. Ellis might have broken and tumbled off the counter, closed the gap, had Rochelle's voice not called gently from downstairs.

"Ellis. Can you come help me? Let's get Chris cleaned up. We've gotta be ready to go, just in case."

Nick averted his eyes, snorting, anger flaring despite himself. She was undoubtedly leveraging time with Ellis; to talk to him where he, apparently, couldn't be trusted. It irritated him, as much as he wanted to say it didn't - he didn't fail to comfort Ellis. It just wasn't his job to. It had never been, and wasn't supposed to be.

He wordlessly stepped away, moving toward the couch, clearing the path for Ellis to obey. He was aware of the younger man's eyes on him, but didn't return the gaze. "Go on." was all he said, low and muttered, and he listened to the quiet sound of Ellis getting up and walking past. The Southerner's footsteps paused just behind him, hesitating for a beat - only to continue on and down the stairs.

Nick sat on the couch and gazed out the glass doors, silent. It was some self-destructive whim that made him fish his wallet out from his slacks pocket, bouncing it on a palm, fingers catching on the golden ring pressed tight against the leather from the inside.
Chapter 159

Convincing Chris to let them wash him did not, immediately, go over well. The foreigner's reaction amounted to horror.

"I-I would... rather no." Christophe's expression was drawn in fear, brown eyes latching onto Ellis' every move. The Georgian couldn't help slipping Rochelle an unsure glance, to which she shrugged. "It is necessary to ... do this?"

Gently seating himself on the edge of the bed, Ellis mustered together something like a soothing smile. He showed his empty hands in a reassuring gesture. "You got my word that it won't hurt none. But you're still pretty bloody, and it's messin' up the sheets, and it'll just make your bandages dirty again."

The Spaniard glanced down, a slight frown touching his lips as he wearily examined the red and pink staining in the sheets he'd left by contact with his skin. His anxiety at the suggestion of another bandage change was visible on his expression - and that was, apparently, plenty of incentive. "If you say so." he muttered, more of a whisper.

"I can leave, if you'd rather..." Rochelle suggested, lightly, but the man shook his head in a weak gesture.

"It would not be less ... violento." Chris uttered, pushing the sheets clumsily away from his body, hand trembling. When Ellis cocked his head, obvious confusion on his features, the Spaniard's movements stuttered. "Este... embarrassing? Mas o menos."

Ellis gave a slight laugh, leaning closer to delicately help tug the sheets away from him. "Well - we ain't gonna make you get naked or nothin'." Chris was sitting on bent legs, weight balanced onto his knees, and his hand went clenched, vicelike, on air. When the Spaniard managed a tilted grin, Ellis returned it, gladly.

Rochelle stood behind Ellis, a cloth and bowl of water in either hand. She offered them carefully out on flat hands, and the Georgian reached back to take the washcloth. He dunked it in the water and set to wringing it out, ensuring it was damp but not dripping. "Can I ask you somethin', Chris?"

Ellis wanted to talk for more than one reason. He intended to distract Chris, but he also wanted to distract himself. Silence threatened to bring that buzzing static anxiety back, and he'd much rather talk about something. Anything.

"Claro." the Spaniard murmured, his tone affirmative.

Folding the cloth up into a tight square, Ellis turned back around. He averted his gaze, leaning in to carefully start brushing the fabric against the worst of the stained and crusting blood over Chris' torso. He took care to stay away from his shoulder, and didn't let the wet cloth brush the bandages that crossed over his pecs to anchor the gauze.

"This guy, Phil. You talked like he was a pretty okay guy, right?" Chris nodded, tenderly, eyes half-closing. At first it was a fearful gesture, anticipating Ellis' touch - but then it smoothed out, relaxing at the edges, as he seemed to acclimate to the lukewarm coolness and the fact it wouldn't hurt. "If he up'n'left, why didn't you go with?"

Chris' lips dragged into a vague frown, mostly thoughtful. He worked the words out with a sort of reluctance, as if insecure of them. "Numbers, tío. Why trade dos for uno? We survive in numbers."
Ellis gently scrubbed at a spot of crusted-on something on the man's clavicle, putting his jaw out subtly. "Even if it meant stayin' with folk who are mean to yuh?" He did his best to ask it how he meant it: non-judgmentally. He was simply curious, and wanted to understand.

That made the foreigner laugh, just a short huff, mostly through his nose. "You think Phil is nice? I did not mean this. Only... that he was not like B and Jerry. There is a difference, ¿sí?"

Rochelle allowed herself a faint sigh, curling her tongue against the inside of her teeth. "I think what Ellis means is - why not go with the guy who seemed less likely to actively hurt you?" To illustrate her point, she reached up and brushed a fingertip against her own cheek, mirroring the sliced scab on his cheek where Jerry had taken a butcher's knife to it.

He gazed at her, expression fading into a sort of tired numbness. Chris tilted his head obediently when Ellis turned the cloth to wipe at his neck, closing his eyes to the touch. "I choose them, instead of death." he muttered, slowly, as if tasting the words anew. Something ticked over his face, like unpleasant realization.

Chris reopened his eyes with a blink, clarifying, "Brock and Sean, they both did not - listen. And died. Brock was arguing with Jerry. It was why we were distracted, and could not save him. Sean tried to stop B from stealing things from a group, and the strangers caught them, and shot him."

He almost shrugged, but halted the gesture at the last second, before he reflexively jostled his stump of an arm. A wince traced his features all the same, sparing a glance for the bandaged shape. "So, I listened."

Ellis let his free hand settle on the man's arm, steadying, as he carefully rinsed and re-wet the washcloth. It turned almost pink in the transfer, and the water left behind was just as sullied. "It ain't like you had much choice, seems like." he murmured, sympathetically. "And you made a better one when it came time."

Christophe gazed at him, suddenly, and the faintest shiver crossed his jaw. It was with a softly choked tone of voice that he murmured, "I hope.", raising his hand to gently offer it to Ellis. The Southerner took the cloth and washed the dried blood from his fingers and palm, slipping a hesitant glance toward Chris' face. He hadn't meant to upset him, unsure if it was a good or bad set of emotions flickering over the man's face - but he decided against mentioning it at all.

"I borrowed yer machete earlier. Pretty badass." he offered instead, feeling a distinct lightness when the words brought a quiet interest to Chris' eyes. "'Bout saved my skin, out there."

"¿Sí? I am glad. It always fought good for me." He smiled a little, some gratification sneaking into his expression, gaze lowering to watch Ellis cautiously wash off his forearm. Ellis didn't miss the past tense, halting his motions to look up and meet Chris' gaze firmly.

"We'll get you up and usin' it again before long, I bet. Yer a tough sucker."

Chris blinked back at him with a flinch of confusion touching his brow, right before he laughed, a gentle and faded sound. "You think so, hermano?" Ellis nodded meaningfully, returning his attention to his work with a soft smile, even as Christophe turned his gaze off toward the far wall. "Quizá..."

Rochelle couldn't help cocking her head, glancing between the two men. Looking at them there, huddled close and chatting in low tones, she was struck by how alike they seemed. She'd never thought to wonder how old Chris was, but seeing them interact made her suddenly think he couldn't have been much past Ellis' age.

She couldn't tell if Ellis was putting up a strong front, or if the two were genuinely cheering each other up.

"Y'know..." Shifting to lean her hip against the edge of the bed, she craned her head forward, flashing a conspiratorial smile between the two younger men. "Since we've got a circle of trust in here." Ellis blinked at her, pausing the motion of his hands, uncomprehending at first. "Chris, what do you think of Nick and him, anyway?"

The Georgian's lips parted, and he looked vaguely betrayed and plenty mortified. He didn't, however, manage to get out a response before Christophe exhaled a subtle chuckle.

"I understand more now, that I know they are in the closet, why he is so... the son of a whore, ¿sí?" Rochelle could not hold back a burst of laughter, clapping a hand over her mouth and lifting her brows in something like surprise. Unperturbed, Chris turned a slightly tired eye onto Ellis. "He is not very kind to you. Debe estar follándote muy duro."

Ellis gawped at him, almost frightened to ask, and the man translated helpfully.

"The sex must be good, no?"

When he froze, jaw working at words with no sound escaping him except a stuttered whine low in his throat, Chris laughed a little. He reached out his hand, placing it on Ellis' knee in a pat of fingertips. "Los americanos, you are so -" Shaking his head when he couldn't seem to find the word, he offered instead, "Tímidos."

"It ain't none of y'all's business!" he protested, voice a bit of a hiss as he darted a look toward the closed door, heart rate going up at the prospect of Nick overhearing them. "Y'all shouldn't even... know at all, let alone - be askin' about that stuff! It's private! ...and embarrassin'!"

"To be fair..." Rochelle reached out and cuffed a knuckle teasingly against Ellis' cheek, grinning when the younger man leaned away, huffing. "That's also just Ellis' good Southern manners. We're not all that wound up."

Lowering his head with a flustered air, Ellis focused down hard on his hands, leaning to clean at Christophe's other shoulder. "I ain't wound up over nothin'... Jeez..." He gave his stump a wide berth, but even the act of going close seemed to tense the man's body, and his voice went a little faint even as he continued to talk.

"Lo siento, hermano. I am messing, ¿sí?" The foreigner tilted his gaze to nervously watch Ellis' movements, a shiver touching his frame. "He is a pendejo, but also - pues... Swell, no?" A faintly pleased grin touched his lips when the Georgian had to laugh. "And he must be in love with you."

That stopped Ellis outright, blinking gently, aware of a heat rising to his cheeks at the words. He slowly withdrew the cloth, getting both hands on it so he could roll fingertips against the fabric. "Uh... whut - whut makes you say that?"

"The gunstore. It was... romántico."

"The sex must be good, no?"

Glancing down, Christophe took stock of his body, running a palm lightly over his side. His skin wasn't pristine by any stretch, but they'd cleansed off the worst of the dried and stained blood, and the look on his face was vaguely pleased.

Ellis flashed Rochelle a look of confusion, brows wrenched together, and she shifted on her heels. A sort of awkward energy trickled into her posture. "Uh... huh. Did Nick never tell you...? Guess he wouldn't."
"Tell me what?" he questioned, growing nervous as his eyes darted between her and Chris. He straightened, unsure if the rise in his heart rate was anxiety, or excitement. He wasn't sure he could tell the difference anymore. "I mean, he was upset, thinkin' I was dead, right? You told me that..."

Rochelle began to respond, visibly rolling her jaw as if to mold her voice into something innocuous, but Christophe uttered a slight laugh that stopped her before she could do more than open her mouth.

"Upset? No, no, hermano. He became like a Charger." Rochelle lifted a hand as if to urge him to stop, unsure, but Chris didn't notice. "That is why his shoulder is hurt. B said you would die, and he ran at her, sin - with no weapons. Like a mad man." He took his hand and flattened it, gesturing as if to spear himself through the shoulder.

It was his stumped side, and the contact made him flinch, like he'd forgotten it was tender. He forced an exhale and faint smile. "Muy romántico, ¿si?"

Ellis stared at him for a moment, like it took him time to parse the words. He slowly averted his gaze, looking toward his hands - why did he feel so conflicted? His heart leapt at the idea, some shy joy stirred at the concept of Nick caring so much... but there was something else in his chest. Hard, cold guilt.

He knew he'd been partially responsible for Nick getting hurt. After all, if he hadn't stayed behind at the hotel, the situation could have worked out differently. But completely responsible? Nick had taken the news of his potential death so poorly, he'd run himself onto a sword? For him?

Rochelle's hand suddenly gripped his chin, turning his face toward her. The touch startled him into a flat blink, looking up at her, hesitant. Her eyes were on his, and narrowed with a knowing energy. "It's not your fault. I can see you blaming yourself."

Slowly chewing at the inside of his cheek, Ellis averted his eyes back down, trying to shake his head. "I-I ain't..." he tried, but knew it sounded flimsy.

When Chris spoke, it was nearly fragile. "...lo siento... did I... say something?" His tone was so close to frightened, both Ellis and Rochelle jolted, looking up at him in unison. There was a tenderness to the way his posture had wilted, leaning away. "I did not mean to -"

"No, no, you're fine." The producer raised her hand, palm flat, shifting over to set the bowl on the nightstand so she could free up her hands. "It's not your fault. I can see you blaming yourself."

"It's just... Ellis is having a rough day today, and he's taking it the wrong way."

"It is good, no? To sacrifice for someone you love?"

The mechanic looked up, blinking slowly at the words. A slight smile betrayed him, shaking his head. "I... yeah. I wish he didn't have tuh get hurt doin' it, but I - it is kinda sweet, huh?" Rochelle scrubbed her palm against the top of his head, screwing his cap down on his head, making him smile a little wider. "Like in the movies."

Rochelle couldn't resist an inward sigh as he looked up toward her, blue eyes seeking some sort of validation, a bit of reassurance.

"Yeah, sweetie." she murmured, silently praying it was the truth.

Coach sighed, leaning against the front door heavily, hands sunk into the pockets of his khakis. He eyed the tile entryway under his feet, mind ticking along on an endless cycle.

The engine sounds hadn't approached much closer, and the vehicle had cut out shortly after they'd returned. There wasn't any more sign of it, nor any gunfire to warn them of the location of the intruders. Just silence, and the muted sound of conversation from the bedroom.

Rochelle had taken his advice, it seemed, and pulled Ellis into helping her with Chris. The sound of their voices comforted him, even if he stayed well enough away to avoid listening in. He hadn't meant to get upset, let alone upset enough to lecture Rochelle - but Ellis' intense panic had activated that parental instinct he tried to keep under wraps when he could.

He glanced upwards, eyes on the second floor staircase, a crease touching his brow. He couldn't help but run her words back over in his head.

Maybe he did give Nick too hard a time. After all, when a fence gate had separated them from Ellis, he'd had to bodily stop Nick from running his shoulder into it. It had taken a moment to convince him to work together to kick it down. There had been genuine panic in his eyes, wild and ferocious.

It was unfair to say he didn't care for the kid, same as they did. Unfair, too, to say he wouldn't do his best for the team when he'd proven it so many times.

Some internal reflex had never had an easy time trusting Nick. He put off airs of the fox in the hen house, and Coach never found it in him to do anything but take a man at his word. He wanted to, but Nick didn't make it any easier. Every time he thought they'd made progress -

But maybe that was his fault. Maybe he took for granted the idea that the gambler would change, kept expecting him to... though wasn't that unfair, too? He'd changed plenty, gone from a loner barely willing to stay with them, suffer them, to a man who'd step in front of a bullet - or a sword - for them.

A man who'd burn everything to the ground if it meant keeping the team safe. His dedication was different, harsher, but did that make it any less than Coach's?

It was on a withheld breath that Coach pulled away from the front door and stepped upstairs. He took them carefully, watching his bad knee as it bent, aware of the soft tactile snap in the joint with every motion as if in protest.

The loft was quiet and dark, as they'd drawn the curtains in fear of prying eyes, leaving only a strip through which they could just see the ocean.

Nick was on the couch, and barely acknowledged his presence with a glance over his shoulder. Coach twitched his jaw up, and when Nick silently returned his attention forward, he advanced. Surely the lack of comment meant Nick had cooled off, too, and the football coach took the chance.

"Hey, Nicky. You -"

He was wrong.
"Oh, sorry, are we talking now? I must have missed the memo." Nick's tone was halfway cruel, and sarcastic without an ounce of humor. He thrust up a hand, elbow braced on the back of the couch. "Unfortunately, I'm all booked up on 'be a huge asshole' today, so. Try again tomorrow."

Frowning slightly, Coach drew his arms into a cross. He sighed, tightly, and lowered his chin. "Alright, I deserved that. Let's start with an apology." He moved to circle the couch, reaching the arm and standing within Nick's peripheral. "Sorry. I'm takin' shit out on you."

A laugh escaped Nick, harshly, and he tipped his head. Pressing his index and middle finger against his temple to brace there, he gazed ahead at the window. He couldn't resist it. The opportunity was there, and he leapt on it, voice scathingly slow. "Why not, if I'm just being a horse's ass?"

If Coach was startled by the words - the same words he'd used to Rochelle - he didn't show it. He merely gazed at Nick, arms tightening in their cross. "You eavesdropped?"

"No, you talked shit about me behind my back. I caught you." Nick lounged his legs up, resting his heels against the coffee table. He spoke dismissively. "So you can drop the apology bullshit. I know how you feel, you clearly know me like the back of your hand. No further conversation needed."

A long and tired sigh left Coach. He shifted, rubbing down the planes of his face with a flat palm, pressing against his eyes. "I didn't mean -" The big man stopped, abruptly, dropping his hand. "...Naw. We're past bullshit, I guess. I meant it. But you really gonna tell me you're nice to that boy?"

Nick massaged the fingertips pressed to his temple in circles, staring toward the glass doors. "Ellis ain't used to this. Boy's damn scared, and are you really gonna look me in the eyes and say you're gonna take the time to be his friend? Talk it out with him? You ain't never been that guy. I didn't think you wanted to be. You spend all this time yellin' at him, yellin' at us askin' you to be his friend, and now you're angry at me for listenin'?"

He wasn't wrong - which made it all the more frustrating when Nick felt a flash of anger. If he hated anything, it was having his own words thrown in his face. He couldn't muster an argument that didn't make him sound pathetic.

Coach suddenly dropped, sitting on the armrest. Nick was in the center of the sofa, so there was still some distance between them. "Look, Nick. This ain't what I came up here for. I came up to apologize, fo' talkin' how I did. I know you ain't havin' any better of a time than us, and me gettin' angry at you ain't doin' nobody no favours."

Nick snorted, refusing to look over at him. He slipped his hand to grasp his own jawline, thumb pressed into the nook between his jaw and his ear, and inhaled. "Sorry you got mad, but not for what you said?" he mocked, lowly.

Shrugging, the big man lowered his chin. "An' talkin' behind yo' back. That's grade school shit. We should be adults 'bout this shit, even if we disagree." Nick laughed outright, the sound cut with a nasal, sardonic edge, and Coach leaned in slightly. "I ain't tryin' to do anything but look after Ellis, you hear? You get that, don't you?"

That lifted Nick's gaze. He glanced at Coach, sideways, a meticulously calculated flatness taking over his features. That was about right, wasn't it? Protecting Ellis from him. Because Nick was damaging, and always would be. He rusted out those around him, one way or another.
Whether by his attitude, or his touch, or an illness run rogue in his veins -

The word escaped him without thinking. "Sure."

He looked away before Coach startled, the ex-football player blinking carefully at him, seeming genuinely surprised. He set a fist against his knee, taking stock of Nick's relaxed posturing before he uttered, "I'm just sayin' Ro' takes point on talkin' to him for a bit." When Nick made no motion to respond, he nodded his head. "Boy thinks the world of you, but he needs a gentle hand right now."

Nick wanted to laugh, to throw it in his face that his hand was anything but gentle and that seemed to work fine - but his urge to get in the last word did not outweigh his urge to keep his secrets.

"What part of 'sure' was unclear?" he snarled, with little energy put to it. It came out weak and tired, and he hated how his voice sounded when he spoke. "I could really do without this soap opera shit, so how about you go sit on your chicks downstairs, and I'll sit up here and worry about the numerous fucking ways we're going to die horrifically in the next few days?"

Coach gazed at him, sitting back slightly. A faint chuckle escaped his lips, even as he straightened and stood. He uttered a sigh wearily, stepping away from the sofa. "That's the shit I'm talkin' about."

Resting his head back against the couch, Nick closed his eyes. He was angry, and lashing out, and fuck if it didn't feel good. "Just being realistic. You think we've survived all these close calls, because we're good? We've gotten lucky, and it's going to run out. So you can sit here and stress over who's feeling sad, who needs a hug, or you can get with the fucking program. I recommend a smoking habit."

Tilting his head, Coach looked toward the glass doors, eyes settling on the far-off horizon. A distance entered his expression, seeming to mull the words over, his jaw shifting as he trapped his tongue between his teeth in a musing gesture. After a moment, he finally uttered, "You think we'd be here without them?"

Nick didn't open his eyes to look. He grunted, noncommittally, and the sound was enough to prompt Coach to continue.

"You think either of us would have kept on goin' if it weren't for those two? I'm too old fo' this shit, Nick. Maybe you could do this alone by bein' so damn stubborn, but I wouldn't. I'd have given up already." Slowly, the eldest survivor drew his palm against his neck, rubbing there. "Now it's flippin'. They're runnin' out of steam, losin' hope, so you an' me gotta be there fo' them."

He turned slightly, shifting on his heel, gazing toward the staircase. "I wish Ro' was right, 'cause I don't rightly know if she's even got it in her to keep Ellis goin'. I'd be damn thrilled to be wrong 'bout you, Nick, I would. So if you wanna drop the bull and be a friend to him, I'll eat my damn shoe. Just try not to make this shit harder on them, a'ight?"

Nick did not respond, and something about the tension in his posture told Coach he'd gone far enough. Any further and the conversation would swing right back into all-out argument - so he backed away, lifting a hand in a gesture of defeat.

"That's it, Nick. Just think on it."

He retreated, only distantly aware of the way Nick's gaze latched onto his back as he made for the stairs.
Christophe grew tired again before long. As nice as it was to see him up and talking, he needed rest if he was going to recover - so Rochelle had taken Ellis' arm and gently ushered him out, leaving the injured man to sleep.

She didn't get the sense that Chris was anything but genuinely enjoying his company, but Ellis could have kept him up for hours if she'd let them stay at it. Rochelle got the feeling Ellis needed a new friend more than he let on.

The atmosphere in the rest of the condo was less than warm, however.

Coach had taken up a post at the window downstairs, and Nick was upstairs, flooding his surroundings with an aura of disdain so thick it was practically buzzing. If Rochelle understood the small warning look Coach passed her at all - they'd talked, and it hadn't gone well.

Part of her was annoyed, because the last thing she needed was Coach meddling in Nick and Ellis' relationship when he had no idea the context, the repercussions. He needed to trust her to handle things.

She wanted to sigh, but held it, for Ellis' benefit.

Instead, she turned to face him, flashing him a small grin. "Hey. We haven't really done an inventory of the house. How about you check the closets and bathrooms down here, and I'll check the kitchen? Maybe there's something we can use to hold the gas."

He looked at her with some hesitancy, and it was much the same look he'd passed her earlier as she'd urged him upstairs. A look that said he'd seen through her... so she leaned closer, and whispered to him with a gentle wink. "I need a distraction as much as you do."

That made him smile a little, and snort, and Ellis shook his head. "Alright. That ain't a half-bad idea, anyway. Gotta make do with whut we got, since we can't really leave... not without riskin' runnin' intuh whoever's out there." When Rochelle patted a hand coaxingly on his arm, he turned away to walk down the hallway.

"There we go." she encouraged. "I'll go look upstairs, holler if you find something."

He waved at her over his shoulder, already ducking into the secondary bedroom to look into the closet, and Rochelle inhaled deeply. She couldn't decide whether things were looking up or not. Every time she thought they were doing well, something else came up.

At least things were close to okay at the moment.

Steeling herself, Rochelle turned and made for the stairs. Coach eyed her as she passed, and he seemed poised to make her stop - but said nothing in the end, merely watching her pad up the staircase to the second floor. Maybe he sensed she was irked with him, or simply knew he'd not coax her to do anything but persist.

She didn't have any intent to speak with Nick about the issue, anyway. Whatever Coach had said to him had likely done enough damage, and there was nothing she could say without potentially making it worse. Nick didn't take advice well, even when it was well-intentioned.

Better to let it blow over.
As it turned out, Nick seemed equally as interested in avoiding her. He'd laid himself across the couch again, and his attention was solidly riveted on the glass doors. He made no move to so much as look in her direction as she passed above the floor and stepped into the loft, even though he was clearly awake.

Rochelle turned and crossed the space to enter the kitchen, glancing a little hesitantly around at it.
There were drawers and cabinets galore, and though instinct had her trying to determine the best starting point, she eventually just threw herself into an eye-roll and started from the left.

Sliding drawers and throwing open cabinet doors, one by one, she initially found a lot of nothing.
There was a drawer full of plastic cutlery and napkins, all wrapped up in plastic seals, and another with a set of basic wooden kitchen utensils. One of the larger cabinets on the lower level had some pots and pans, and underneath the sink was some assorted cleaning supplies.

She'd gotten the washcloths from there, and beyond that, there was a bottle of bleach, some disinfectant lemon-scented spray, and a bottle of window cleaner.

Rochelle was almost tempted to spray the disinfectant around, if for no other reason than the pleasant smell of something other than sweat, blood, and gore. She resisted the urge, however, continuing her search.

One of the drawers at the end had a small collection of supplies, pencils and pens and a few small pads of notepaper. She gave it a cursory look before noticing a small book tucked away in the corner, bound in a plastic cover like an agenda or a calendar booklet.

Picking it up, she turned it over, finding 'A Guide To Tybee Island' written in bold print across the front, stamped into the plastic. A slight laugh escaped her, crunching her nose, unable to resist amusement at the oddly mundane sight - a guidebook to tourist spots. It seemed strangely ridiculous, now.

Curiosity made her flip through it.

The book was mostly about the history of the area, though a few sections were devoted to modern-day sightseeing opportunities and landmarks. There was a theatre refurbished from an old movie house constructed for soldiers who were stationed at the nearby army base, a marine science center, a museum built within an old fort, a watchpost that had been converted into a party and wedding rental spot...

Melancholy made her close it.

It was difficult to even remember the days when she might have entered a town and taken the time to casually wander, bouncing from tourist spot to tourist spot, taking photos and posing in front of the same stupid places everyone else did.

She set the book down on the counter and closed the drawer, turning away to focus on opening the remaining few drawers. There was no sense in pining for a life and a time that didn't exist anymore.

The second-to-last drawer in the kitchen stuck when she attempted to open it. The resistance made her blink, head tilting, and she tightened her grip and yanked a little harder. Something was trapping it closed, so she reached her hand in and felt inside the space.

Her fingertips touched plastic, and she wrenched it carefully out, finding herself holding a yellow cooking funnel. She frowned a little, turning it over in her hands, examining where it had been warped into a soft oval shape by the pressure of the drawer closing on it. A little squeeze made it widen back into a circle - but it collapsed back into an oval when she let go.

Rochelle stared thoughtfully at it, only idly raising her voice. "Hey, Nick. I got one of those dumb little funnel things in here. You think that might come in handy somehow for gassing the car up? Like... if we get the fuel from the old car in a container of some kind... we can use this to pour it into the new car?"

She shouldn't have been surprised when Nick responded in a droll and uncaring fashion, but somehow it still managed to make her eyes roll.

"How the fuck should I know? I look like the car guy of the group?"

She exhaled, grasping her fingers around the funnel and lowering her hand. She put her knuckles against her hip, turning to face him. She could have reacted angrily, spited him - but she willfully chose an alternate tactic, dropping her voice to something innocent. "You need a lay, suit."

It worked about how she hoped. He perked up off the couch, just enough to slant a look over toward her, expression somewhere between suspicious and intrigued. Better than sullen, anyway. "Is that an offer? Changed your mind?"

Rochelle flashed him a smile, batting her eyelashes with a tilt of her chin. "Not on your life. But the point stands." He dropped to a glower, but it was a mild one. She quickly took advantage of the change, intent on plying him with harmless conversation. "Chris is doing good, by the way. He's in pretty good spirits, all things considered."

For reasons that escaped her understanding, that deflated any chance she'd had of breaking through his fugue. He settled right back into that dark and unwelcoming look, sparing a scowl for her before he settled back down against the couch. "Great." he muttered, brimming with sarcasm.

Frowning after him, Rochelle took a deep breath, holding it for a moment. She certainly didn't know why Chris would suddenly be a hot-button issue, but she'd take the hint - lick her wounds - and leave him alone. "Okay, boy. You take a nap and get your panties untwisted, huh?"

Sighing sharply, she took the time to nudge open the remaining drawer, ensuring there wasn't anything else. Its only contents were a set of oven mitts, a cheery yellow, stained black along the fingers from contact with heat. With that, she tucked the funnel under her arm and moved to leave.

Nick made no effort to stop her, so she ducked onto the staircase and hopped down it, elbow bracing on the railing.

She passed by Coach at a quick pace, and the glance he gave her was meaningful. Like a tiny 'I told you so'. Rochelle pointed a finger at him in a warning gesture, narrowing her eyes, daring him to say it aloud. He quickly averted his gaze out the window.

When she turned the corner to go down the first floor hallway, she was faced with the sight of the laundry room at the end of the hallway open. The washer she'd picked out a glimpse of earlier was in full view - as was Ellis, crouching atop it in socked feet, reaching up for something.

Rochelle couldn't stop a startled sound, launching into a soft sprint to skid into the room. It was small, barely larger than a powder room, housing only the washer, dryer, and a set of coated wire shelving above them. There was a broom and mop leaned against the wall in the corner. She didn't need to advance more than a step to get behind Ellis, putting up a hand to set it flat on his lower back, a bracing gesture.

He startled at the contact, but only just. Ellis craned his head around to peek down at her, grasping a hand on the wire shelving to balance himself.

"Ellis, are you trying to fall and crack your head open?!"

Shaking his head with a slightly bashful grin, the Georgian returned his attention forward. "Nah. Just this was pushed up against the wall and I couldn't reach it." He stretched both arms up, and before Rochelle could lean and look around him, he'd dragged the object down and was turning to show it to her.

It was a bucket, clearly a pair for the mop. The capacity couldn't have been more than five gallons or so, but it made her eyes widen. She reached out, grasping it with one hand and looking it over, at the same time she held up the funnel so he could see it. "Hot damn. With this and what I found - I think we can do it!"

Eagerly, Ellis nodded. He slipped down onto his butt on the washer and then dropped off it onto the floor, circling an arm around the bucket. 'Okay... so... should we do it now? Ain't heard anythin' outside in a while... and we won't need tuh leave the fence or nothin'. And I'd sleep better knowin' we had the car workin' proper."

Rochelle took a step back, nodding her head. "Agreed. We don't want to be scrambling to do this if we get in trouble." She glanced back out into the hallway, noting Coach's attention on them. "Can you keep an eye on us from there?"

He nodded, shortly.

"Okay." Tossing the funnel into the bucket in Ellis' arms, Rochelle freed her hands to pull the handgun out from its tuck at her lower back. She turned away, leading the way toward the front door, calling over her shoulder. "Nick - Ellis and I are going to try and deal with the fuel situation."

The gambler made no effort to respond, so Rochelle rolled her eyes again and turned away. Both she and Ellis shuffled into their boots where they'd left them near the front door. She set to opening the door, undoing the locks in a quick gesture.

Together, they piled out of the condo. Ellis scooped up Chris' machete from where he'd left it leaned against the wall near his bedroom, and tucked it under his arm. Rochelle couldn't resist glancing around their surroundings, a little anxiety rising.

There were some milling infected, including a Boomer that she just glimpsed waddling around the corner of a house a few blocks down, but no obvious sign of humans. Although part of her wanted to be nervous, when she glanced at Ellis and saw him looking excited - she buried it.

"Grab the hose, I don't think Nick finished gettin' the cap off." he uttered, hopping down the stairs and scooting toward the side door of the garage. He nudged the door open, toeing it open far enough that it caught on an elevated patch of earth and stuck there.

Rochelle obeyed him, stepping to the bottom of the stairs and crouching down to gather up the coiled hose where Nick had unceremoniously dropped it. Ellis was correct: the endcap, where it would screw onto a faucet, was only half removed, frayed and broken where the plastic mesh had come undone.

She looped her arm through the coil, hauling it up and carrying it after Ellis. By the time she joined him in the garage, he was already kneeling beside the gas cap, still open where he'd left it. Rochelle approached him, grasping the sundered endcap in one hand and the rest of the hose in the other, offering it out to him.
He flashed her a small smile and raised the machete, carefully bracing the blade edge against the material left connecting the two pieces. He sawed in very careful motions, watching the hose give way so he could take off pressure once it came close to breaking.

With only a few strands left, he pulled away, and Rochelle merely tugged it apart. The endcap tore off, and she tossed it over her shoulder before offering the hose down to him.

"Neat." Ellis uttered, taking the hose from her. He leaned up, flipping it around in his grip and cautiously moving to insert the hose into the fuel port. It took some wiggling to get it to nudge aside the metal flap, but it made it in, and he released a sigh.

"Man. I was worried it'd be too big." he admitted, setting the machete down. He put both hands on the hose, carefully working on pushing it down the fuel line. "Pretty -" He abruptly stopped, motion betraying that he'd hit resistance. His eyes widened just a twitch, and he gave the hose a tug to retract it - then put his weight on it, shoving.

It did not go further.

Rochelle couldn't resist stepping closer, bending in a little. "What's wrong?" she urged, voice more strained than she meant. Ellis gave her a hesitant shake of his head at first, testing the hose a few more times, yanking it up and wiggling it.

"Shit." he uttered, letting go. "Ah... shit." His eyes lifted to meet hers, a weak apology in his eyes. "So... you got this line, right, whut leads intuh the fuel tank? Well.. tuh stop gas from goin' back up - y'know, whether yer siphonin' it or the car done flipped - they put this little ball in the valve. Lets gasoline trickle past, but you can't get nothin' through the pipe, and it'll pop up'n'seal the tube if the car goes belly-up."

Slowly nodding in understanding, Rochelle turned her eyes onto the car, staring at the vehicle's flank. "Okay... so what are our options?"

Ellis slowly rubbed at his jawline, shaking his head. "I mean... shit, girl. We could just take the tank off, but I need tools fer that. It's got a little scissor jack fer changin' tires we found earlier, but I need two good ones tuh lift the car and the transmission up. We could just open up the drain on the bottom, let it pour out, but the bucket is too dang tall. It's gotta fit under the car tuh catch th-"

He halted, again, suddenly, staring abruptly at the hose. Rochelle couldn't resist a frustrated noise, leaning slightly closer.

"What?"

Dragging the hose back out of the fuel port, he turned it around, eyeing the sundered end of it. He thoughtfully stuck his finger in it, wiggling it. "Huh. Gimme that funnel?" Without any hesitation, Rochelle turned, reaching into the bucket sitting behind him on the floor and grabbing up the funnel. She offered it out to Ellis, and he snatched it up, eyeing the smaller end.

With his tongue sneaking out to stick out between his lips, Ellis put it against the open end of the hose and carefully worked the narrow mouth of the funnel inside. It almost threatened not fitting, squashed into its strange oval malformation, but he pressed it back into a circular shape and wiggled it in. The hose was just flexible enough to stretch around it.

Holding her breath, Rochelle watched with a mix of fascination and incomprehension as he worked it firmly in. A joyous little noise escaped him, and he looked from his contraption to the car. "... Okay. If we can get the tank drain open... I can get under there'n'hold this under the hole. The gas'll drain out, and you can hold the other end over the bucket so it'll pour in there."

Nodding, the woman couldn't resist a slight smile. Ellis was never more bright than when he was in the midst of solving a problem, let alone a car-related one.

"Only problem is -" and though her heart sunk at the idea there was yet another obstacle, Ellis seemed almost excited. "- the drain's a lug nut. We just gotta hope the lug wrench fer this car fits it. It's in the trunk, if you can grab it... should still be open."

When she sidestepped to approach the car's trunk, Ellis turned around, leaning down to lay flat on his back on the garage floor. The blown wheel dropped the sedan's profile just enough to make it a tight fit, but he managed to reach his arms under the sedan, feeling a flat palm along the belly until he'd located the fuel tank.

His fingertips hunted out the drain plug, and he let his other hand reach back out, grabbing the funnel-tipped hose and pushing it underneath the car where it would be in easy reach. It didn't take but a moment for Rochelle to return with the lug wrench they'd been planning to use to change the tires, and she bent down to tap it against his thigh.

"Is this gonna be messy? I don't know that a washcloth is gonna be enough to get you clean if you spray gasoline all over yourself. " she teased - promptly lowering her voice. "And Nick might have a problem with it, too."

With his face disguised under the edge of the car, she didn't have the joy of seeing his face redden at that, and he merely muttered something incoherent and reached out to grab the wrench from her hands. She grinned to herself, quietly.

He pushed his arms back under the car, getting the lug wrench around the tank drain nut mostly by feel. He gave it a testing twist, just enough to confirm it fit, wincing a little as he had to torque his shoulders against the concrete.

"Can you get the hose set up in the barrel? Not sure how fast it'll work."

Rochelle obeyed, crouching down and grasping the other end of the hose. She put it in the bucket, anchoring it with a hand, and watched as Ellis worked at the tank. Turning the lug wrench was difficult in the tight space he had, and he mostly ended up scraping his shoulders up on the concrete.

Grunting, kicking his heel against the ground idly, Ellis worked the wrench in a circle, feeling the nut give way. When it felt it might break loose, he shifted to one hand, using the other to grab the funnel-tipped hose and hover it close. "Ready?"

"Yeah." Rochelle uttered, and he yanked.

The nut clattered loose, and he let the lug wrench follow after it, jolting his hand to shove the funnel under the now-open hole. Gasoline began draining in an enthusiastic sputter into the funnel. Ellis couldn't really tell if their plan was working, unable to see up into the funnel, so he merely craned his head back and peered toward Rochelle from under the edge of the sedan.

"Give it a minute. Ain't flowin' real strong. Try'n'hold the hose kinda low...? Gravity ain't on our side."

Rochelle tipped the bucket, letting the hose lay more of its length flat on the ground - but it was a waiting game more than anything.
Ellis kept his fingertips on the edge of the funnel, just in case it started backflowing... not that he was quite sure what they'd do if it did. "Guess if it don't work, I'll just cram my finger up on the hole tuh stop it, and you can go get a pot from the kitchen." he joked - mostly. "It'll take a real long time, but we got all evenin', right?"

She laughed a little, crinkling her nose at him. "God, I hope not." Shifting on her knees, Rochelle exhaled gently, changing the topic with an interested tone. "You and Chris seemed to get on. You like him?"

Putting his jaw forward slightly, Ellis fidgeted his legs. "Well.. I mean, yeah. He's pretty cool." He had to hold the funnel where it was, and it was less than comfortable. "He's real interestin', and it's nice havin' someone new around."

"Do you trust him?" Rochelle glanced down at Ellis, adjusting her grip on the hose and bucket. "I know it wasn't really.. optimal, having him know about you and Nick. But I think he'll keep it secret. He understands the situation enough to get it, I think."

The Georgian gazed at the underside of the sedan, chewing on his tongue. "Yeah. I do." he admitted, inhaling faintly as the smell of gasoline came strongly to his nostrils. "I just wish we could tell Coach. That, and get Nick tuh quit hidin' it."

Rochelle slipped him a sympathetic glance, but there was not much comfort she could offer. She was saved the pain of holding her silence when a sudden pattering sounded out from the bucket. Startled, she glanced down, and found a burnt yellow liquid pooling in the bottom of the container. "Holy shit." she uttered, laughing with a giddy edge. Rochelle steadied and straightened the bucket, moving slowly so as to not disturb the hose's flow. "You did it!"

Ellis grinned widely, unable to resist it. He carefully held the funnel in place, even as his shoulders and back complained incessantly from contact with the hard concrete.. At that rate, it would take a while to fill up - but he was proud of himself all the same.

"Nah, girl. We did it."
By the time Ellis and Rochelle were finished, the sun was dipping low in the sky. Rochelle burst into the house in a flush of exhausted energy, high on their success, and hopped to land half-crouched before the doorway. She reached out an arm to hold it closed behind her.

"Drum-roll, please!" she hollered.

Coach was the only one in sight, seated on the staircase, and he turned a bewildered and tired look toward her. He made no motion to humor her, but it didn't douse her enthusiasm. She rapped her knuckles on the door a few times to make her own, before throwing it open.

Ellis stood on the front porch, a bashful grin over his face, machete held against his shoulder. "Ro' -" he uttered, embarrassed, but she was already off, voice passionately over-dramatic.

"Our vehicular saviour, the best mechanic this side of the apocalypse, sweet and neat and quick on his feet - Ellis -" In the midst of her introduction, she balked, twisting her head and glancing up at him. He blinked back, unsure. "... Huh. I don't actually know your name."

His grin flickered to a smile, shaking his head gently. "Um... Mayfield."

Without skipping a beat, Rochelle flung her arms out to flourish toward him, fingers splayed and wiggling, despite the way the Georgian gave a mortified shake of his head. "Ellis Mayfield! Everyone give a what-what!"

No one responded - except the softest, sleepy "¡Olé!" from inside the bedroom.

Rochelle couldn't help but laugh, straightening up. She reluctantly waved Ellis on, reaching to close the door behind him as he shuffled in. "You guys are no fun." she complained, slanting a squinted glance at Coach before jumping to step ahead of Ellis. "Let's go wash you up, boy."

"Y'all worked the car out?" the big man uttered, shifting up to stand and clear the staircase. He leaned against the wall, glancing out of the window. "I was about to go out there and check on y'all. Been awhile."

Ellis nodded his head a little excitedly, padding after Rochelle as she made for the stairs. "Yeah. Took some doin', and the bucket we had was too small, so I had tuh block the tank drain while Ro' emptied the bucket." To illustrate his point, he raised his left hand, showing off the slickness staining his palm and trickling down his forearm. "- but we managed okay. Car's gassed up, anyhow."

Coach nodded, exhaling faintly in relief. He watched the two tromp up the stairs, a slight smile lifting the edge of his mouth. "Good job, you two. One thing we ain't gotta worry about." It was only with a sharp inhale that he followed, leaning against the railing to take some weight off his bad knee.

"Just figured, better get it done, right?" Rochelle uttered over her shoulder, reaching out to scratch playfully against Ellis' back. He jumped at the touch, giving a ticklish utterance and a laugh. "Ellis and me can't be stopped."

"Fantastic." came a sarcastic utterance from Nick as the three advanced up into the loft. He'd taken up a seat at the island, sitting on one of the barstools facing away from the counter with his elbows draped on the edge. "Now we'll end up with two greaseballs."
He had his dress shirt half undone and dropped off his shoulders, and was carefully scrubbing his shoulder wound clean of what sweat and grime had accumulated around it. It had healed enough to stop bandaging it for fear of bleeding, at least, but removing the bandages left it open to getting dirty. The puckered skin around the sealing wound did not speak well of its health, and the look on his face betrayed its tenderness.

"Nah. I think I'll leave that to Ellis. I'm not afraid to say getting my arm elbow-deep in car guts is not my idea of a good time." Rochelle shrugged her shoulders, slipping up to the kitchen counter to tear a sheet of paper towel free from the roll. She turned to offer it out to Ellis. "Fun to watch him do it, though."

Grinning a little bashfully, Ellis wiped his hands clean, head shaking the whole time. "I did run a car shop, y'know. Keith'd be right pissed with me if I couldn't make do." He lifted his head, hesitantly glancing up toward Nick. His bared shoulder and back were - while intriguing - the least of Ellis' focus.

Although Rochelle had done a good job in distracting him, the point remained that Nick's conversation with him had left him on edge. The older man seemed almost disappointed, though he couldn't discern at what. Like Ellis being upset, afraid, bothered him. It made him feel guilty, atop so many other feelings.

And then there was what Ellis now knew about that shoulder wound.

He couldn't help but imagine it. Nick flying into a blind rage, rushing Brenda senselessly - charging at her without even a weapon? Running himself onto a blade he was so shaken by the idea of Ellis being dead? He couldn't lie and say he wasn't fascinated, grateful. A little embarrassed.

Nick felt everything - anger, dismay, fear - so ferociously, so harshly, viscerally. Wouldn't it make sense to think he'd love much the same? That he was afraid to admit what he felt for Ellis because he knew, for better or worse, he loved at the expense of himself?

Maybe that was wishful thinking. Maybe Nick would have done the same if Rochelle had been in Ellis' shoes, or Coach. Still, it made his chest tighten, and he found himself staring longer than he'd meant to. Nick noticed, and their eyes met with a faint spark of energy, the gambler's brows arching subtly in question.

Ellis quickly averted his gaze, embarrassed.

"How's yo' shoulder?" Coach offered up before Ellis could, stepping to cross his arms and stand just behind the couch, posture guarded. He kept his gaze right on Nick, even as the gambler did not acknowledge him beyond a quiet grunt. "Better keep on those antibiotics. Gotta keep you healthy, boy."

Nick snorted, quietly, dropping the washcloth in his hand to the counter. He shrugged his shirt back on straight, tilting his chin down so he could button it up. "Aww, you care about me, big guy?"

It was with sincerity that Coach bobbed his head, saying simply, "Course."

That seemed to catch Nick off-guard, as he shot the older man a flat glance before pushing forward off the barstool. He snatched a hand back to grab a nutrient bar from the pile of foodstuffs on the table, head shaking. "Whatever. For the record, I'm going to lose my shit if we don't find something other than granola and trailmix. Or a way to heat up this soup. So if you fuckers want to magically fix another problem, how about that one?"
He stalked across the loft, taking up a position in front of the few inches of glass they allowed to show through the curtains. Squinting out at a dimming sky, the gambler set to shelling the bar of its plastic wrapper, shoulders lifted defensively.

Coach's head shook, glancing back at Ellis and Rochelle. "He ain't wrong, but that's a task fo' tomorrow. We should eat somethin', and head to bed. Gettin' dark soon." He spoke as he reached for a bag of trail mix and one of the small cans of diet soda that had been in the icebox. "I'll take first watch; ain't much tired."

Reaching a hand carefully up to grab onto his shoulder, rubbing carefully where he'd earned himself abrasions on his shoulderblades on the floor of the garage, Ellis piped up. "I can take second watch. Got a bunch of sleep this mornin', so, y'know..." he uttered, trying to keep his voice casual.

He was desperate to steal some time with Nick. With everyone else around, he had no real hope of working through whatever fugue the gambler had taken to - but if he could get some privacy, maybe Nick would open up. Maybe they could talk, if only for a little while.

Something was bothering the older man, and Ellis wanted to find out what. That, and he was sure nothing would help ease the anxious feeling in his chest more than Nick's hands on his body.

If he thought too long on that, he might just fluster himself - so he focused on grabbing up something to eat, instead.
Considering how worked up he'd felt, Ellis was surprised at how quickly sleep had come. He'd hit the bunk bed mattress face-first and couldn't remember much more past that.

Maybe it was emotional exhaustion from the day, or physical exhaustion from cramming up under the car for so long - where he'd normally have been settled on a cushioned roller Keith had fashioned for him out of a skateboard and a throw pillow he'd stolen from his parents' house - but either way, he'd passed out without much ceremony.

Sometime in the night, he awoke from a dream. It took him a moment to recognize what was happening. His eyes were suddenly flooded with light through his lids, but when he blinked them open, the light flashed away to illuminate the wall instead.

Still faintly blinded, he could only just make out a shape standing next to him, and for a moment his heart leapt - but then Coach's soothing baritone came to his ear, quietly, and he relaxed. "Hey, son. I'm dozin' off. You ready?"

Quickly nodding, Ellis blinked away the blotches left in his vision, vaguely blinded. He reached up to rub the heel of his hand into his eyes, carefully sitting half-up without smashing his head into the bottom of the too-small bunk.

"Huh.. yeah." he uttered, unable to resist mumbling. "Man, I had the craziest dream... like everythin' was normal - I mean, now normal, like it was the apocalypse'n'stuff - but Keith was here. Like we were just sittin' around together, talkin' about our plans, just like we are now... 'cept with Keith."

As his vision returned to him and adjusted to the darkness, Ellis could see Coach focusing a vague smile at him. The older man was holding their recharged flashlight, pointing it off toward the wall. "Yeah? He have any advice?"

Ellis uttered a laugh, despite himself, crinkling his brow and glancing down at his knees. "He voted we start our own city. Call it Badassville. No zombies allowed." He shrugged his shoulders, lowering his voice as he shuffled out from under the sheets and crawled off the bunkbed. Coach reached up to put a palm against the top of his head, ensuring he didn't hit the edge of the top bunk on the way out.

"I know it was just a dream, but it was nice seein' him again. I miss him." he uttered, and he meant it.

He'd rarely spent so much time apart from Keith; they'd been attached at the hip since they were children, and from schooling together and working at a mechanic shop together - little had coaxed them to separate. There was plenty to keep him distracted, but he'd have loved if Keith had been there, too.

Coach released him as he stood, pressing the flashlight into his hand. "Bet he misses you too, Ellis." he said, a simple comfort. Ellis grinned gently back at him, stretching out a kink in his back as he took a step away.

"Yeah." he hummed, a little wistful edge touching his voice. "Anyway. G'night, Coach. See you in the mornin'."

The eldest survivor grunted, making his way to the bed against the wall. Ellis stayed long enough to light his way with the flashlight before ducking to the door, slipping out. There, he stretched for a moment, rising up onto his toes and thrusting his arms into the air, squirming there as a few pops sounded from his back.

The bunkbed was less than comfortable, and it hadn't done any favours to his injured back - between being dragged on the parking lot by a Smoker and crawling around on a concrete floor, his skin felt more than a little abused. It was with a faint mewl of pain that he shuffled out of his stretch, alighting his gaze on the staircase.

He steeled himself with a breath. He wasn't nervous to talk to Nick - he was pretty sure, anyway. Of course, that was assuming Nick even wanted to talk to him. It wasn't like he'd explicitly announced 'yeah, I'll take second watch so I can sneak up and meet with Nick!' to the team.

Before he could start second-guessing himself, Ellis lurched into a stride, taking the stairs on careful steps. He'd quickly noticed one of the stairs had a creak to it if he stepped just in the center, so he made sure to hop over it, taking two steps at once.

"Nick?" he murmured, softly, as he passed up into the loft. He lifted the flashlight, glancing around the room, but didn't immediately see the older man. It was with a vague frown that he approached the couch, leaning over the back to direct the flashlight down onto the sofa.

And right into Nick's eyes.

"Jesus, kid!" he snarled in protest, flashing up a hand to smack the flashlight away. He nearly knocked it out of Ellis' hands entirely, but the Georgian stumbled to catch it, startled, immediately blustering into apologies.

"Uh, sorry, sorry, man, I didn't know if you were there - you didn't respond or nothin', so - sorry, I -"

Nick straightened, dragging himself upright on the sofa. He slid an arm over the back of the sofa, gazing at the younger man with a few blinks to clear his vision. He interrupted Ellis simply, raising his hand to rub into his eye sockets. "I didn't know if you'd come up. Seemed tired."

Halting, Ellis carefully circled his hands around the flashlight, squeezing at it softly as if to wring it out. "Uh..." he uttered, nerves flaring when he couldn't get a read on the gambler. "Is that okay...?"

With a flat gaze, Nick looked him over, taking stock. Distant humor lit a smirk on his face before he shifted, palming a hand against the cushion next to him. "Sure. You and me got some unfinished business." His tone of voice was anything but simple, then, lowering to something dark and graveled.

Ellis felt his spine go to jelly, knees weakening. Between their interruption earlier and the way Nick's voice cut through his self-control, it took effort - but he refused to move, digging in his heels. Nick noticed his hesitance, head cocking.

The Georgian didn't give him the chance to ask. "Um... I was wonderin', Nick - if you were okay. You seemed kinda upset earlier, and I didn't know if I'd done somethin'... or if you wanted to talk about it, or..." He was flustered and he felt it, eyes doing their best to dodge Nick's for a moment before he forced himself to match gazes.

He saw it, for just a beat. Something flickered to life in those green eyes, and it was new and raw and Ellis did not know what it meant.

Then Nick was straightening, weight on his knees, and reaching out. Ellis might have been able to coax himself to stay still, but there was not an iota of his being that wanted to actually recoil, and Nick got a hand on his waist. He pulled, drawing the younger man forward until the couch back was the only thing separating them.

His hand skated all the way up until he could circle a hand behind Ellis’ neck, bracing him there so he could press a kiss upon him. It started gentle, coaxing, but did not remain so.

The moment Ellis responded, parting his lips and reaching out a hand to brush his fingertips against Nick's hip, the gambler leaned into the kiss, deepening it. His hand darted back down to retrace its path, hooking fingers on Ellis' shirt. He tugged it upwards, and a grin curved at his lips when Ellis' breath hitched at the brush of his knuckles against his belly.

Nick put both hands to the task, some ferocity lining the way he grasped at Ellis' T-shirt and drew it upwards. He only gentled when Ellis gave a slight hiss, the shirt scraping against the abrasions on his shoulderblades. "Sorry." he immediately uttered, muffled into the kiss, but Nick hummed dismissively.

Nick slowed his movements to lightly peel the shirt up, avoiding dragging it over his shoulders. Ellis raised his arms to cooperate, and they broke the kiss to get it up and off his head. The Georgian didn't bother to glance after it when Nick tossed it aside, much too distracted by the way he settled both palms against his waistline.

"I don't want to talk." he murmured, smoothing his palms up, the touch raising goosebumps as it went. "But I do want to fuck you senseless." His thumbs brushed over either of the other man's nipples, a grin curving his lips as Ellis released a soft sound of appreciation, leaning into the touch.

"Come over here, kiddo."

Ellis obeyed, inwardly chastising himself for being so easily coaxed out of his plan. He comforted himself with the idea they'd get to talk afterwards, but that was mostly an afterthought, and probably an excuse. As he hopped to circle the couch, the only thing on his mind was getting into Nick's arms.

As he slipped to sit, one leg curling underneath him, he reached out to grip palms against Nick's jaw. The gambler looked mildly surprised as he was dragged into a kiss, Ellis leaning back gently so the other man had no choice but to lean against him.

A growl left Nick as that surprise turned to arousal, and he placed a hand at Ellis' bare lower back as if to trap him, surging to close the gap.

When their positioning didn't allow for enough contact, Nick was suddenly wrapping both arms around his midsection and dragging him into his lap. The Southerner had to scramble to get himself seated properly, legs spreading to straddle Nick's thighs.

The moment he'd done so, Nick shifted forward and languidly ground his hips upwards, hands descending to brace on Ellis' waist and hold him there. The friction made Ellis shudder, and he couldn't help but push down, meeting the pressure halfway. All the energy from the garage came suddenly flooding back, and they were rutting against each other with increasing desperation.

"Damn, Nick." he whispered, voice catching in his throat. He looped his arms around the gambler's neck, anchoring himself. His spine arched to cant his hips, a sigh escaping him. His thighs tightened, eagerly, and he let his head fall back gently on his neck.

Nick took advantage of the gesture, tilting his head and grazing his mouth up to nip at Ellis'
"You wanna do something for me, Ace?" he murmured, words mumbled against his jaw with a thick and cutting hunger. Ellis couldn't resist a shiver at the tone, feeling suddenly vulnerable. "Try something new?"

He was nodding before he even realized it. Maybe it was the need in Nick's voice, and his desire to please the older man - or maybe it was his own blind lust, wanting something. Anything.

A subtle grin touched Nick's lips, seeming amused by the ready acceptance. "Good..." He slid his hands around to Ellis' stomach, pushing gently, and the younger man didn't comprehend at first. It wasn't until Nick uttered, "Knees, on the ground." that he caught onto the instruction.

Shifting back, Ellis let his body shuffle off the couch, dropping his feet down to land on the floor. He slid to kneel between Nick's legs, hands lingering to grasp just above his knees. He sat there, nervousness rising, as Nick's lids lowered to gaze down at him with a tight and animal interest.

"Whut do you...?" he managed.

Nick outright laughed, then, and it was a pleasantly rough sound. One hand slid to brush against the top of Ellis' head, then card fingers loosely through his hair. His other hand dropped, and Ellis froze faintly as Nick gripped his chin, thumb brushing against the swell of his lower lip.

"C'mon, kid, don't be naive. A blowjob was probably the first thought I ever had about you." Ellis was shocked into silence, reddening, when the gambler's thumb pressed subtly between his lips. He tasted gunpowder and cigarettes and sweat and it shouldn't have aroused him, but it did, a little. "With a mouth like that?"

Ellis stammered his way through a few words, leaning back slightly to escape the touch of Nick's thumb. "I-I uh... I don't... I mean, I ain't sure..."

He'd had the act performed on himself once or twice, but that was a far cry from having the confidence to actually do it - and they were years-old memories, and not overly good ones. Him young and awkward, his girlfriends barely any better...

But the idea of it - wasn't it somehow enticing, if for no other reason than the fact that Nick had apparently been wanting it for a while? The idea of pleasing him so literally sent a nervous thrill up his spine, jaw tensing.

The focused attention Nick had on his mouth, even as he spoke, only worsened his embarrassment. It wasn't so much an unwillingness to try as the fear he'd mess it up. The last thing he wanted to do was disappoint. "I mean... I wouldn't know how tuh... do it."

Nick flashed a grin, widening with an eager edge, like Ellis had hardly seen on his lips. "That's half the fun." He sunk his fingers deeper into Ellis' curls, twining until he could grip there. The clutch was enough to press his rings into Ellis' scalp, a tingling sensation accompanying the touch. "Don't worry about that. I'll take the reins."

"O-okay." Hesitantly, the younger man nodded, just a twitch in the space he could. Even still, the gesture made him tug against the grip held on his hair, and he was aware of a flash of arousal dilating Nick's eyes as he tightened his fingers slightly. "If you wanna..."

Other hand withdrawing, Nick lowered his voice to a faint growl, grasping at the zipper of his slacks. "Fuck, yes." His desire bled through in the frantic nature of his movements, pushing his hips up enough to allow for his slacks to slip down low on his pelvis.

Ellis couldn't help but watch raptly as the Northerner slid his hand into his boxers, curling fingers to grasp his erection and draw it free. He gave it a soft stroke, mostly for the younger man's benefit - and it worked, flooding a mortified fascination into his blue eyes, riveted on the rigid flesh just a foot in front of his face.

Looking at it with the awareness he needed to wrap his mouth around it made it suddenly seem intimidating.

As if sensing his hesitance, Nick settled his head back against the couch, slanting his gaze down his nose. His voice settled into a croon, fingers going from a grip on his hair to a soothing stroke, running fingertips through the brown curls and against his scalp. "Don't overthink it, Fireball. It's easy. Just open your mouth, and let me know if you want to stop."

His voice was taut with restraint, eyes lit and narrowed with lust, and Ellis withheld a faint whimper. His nerves eased at the coaxing nature of those last words, gentle reassurance. He obeyed, unable to stop from running his tongue over his lips before he parted them, loosening his jaw.

Nick's eyes did not miss a single movement, and he let the pressure of his palm tip Ellis' head back just slightly. He gripped his cock firmly, allowing his hips to nudge forward, forcing an exhale as the tip of it nudged against the Southerner's lower lip.

The warmth and velvet-softness of Nick's erection didn't surprise him, but having it pressed against his mouth was very different from touching it with his hands. He inhaled, sharply, body stiffening with the sensation of the pulsing flesh against his lip and the husky smell now flooding his senses.

It was only gently that Nick pushed forward, sliding the head of his erection past those plush lips and into the hot space of his mouth. Ellis took an urgent breath through his nose, closing his eyes in a sudden blink. The hot flesh pressed into his tongue, filling his mouth with a heady warmth, and he could hear the stuttered sigh that escaped Nick.

It was low and graveled with pleasure, and it made Ellis' hair stand on end. He couldn't hold back a shudder, jaw reflexively tensing and lips sealing softly around Nick's length. It was mostly the self-conscious desire to ensure he didn't drool - but it made Nick's fingers tighten on his hair.

"Fuck, Ellis. Shit."

He didn't expect it, nor did he expect the way Nick bucked his hips softly, rocking up an inch or so into his mouth. The feel of velvet sliding against his lips, his tongue, shocked arousal up his spine, but even stronger was the thrill he felt at Nick's cursing loss of control. He spread his thighs a little, allowing his body to slump forward, nudging up against Nick's palm.

The Northerner seemed to take it as encouragement. Rather than raise his hips, he used his grip on Ellis' hair to drag him lower, gently urging his mouth to take in more. His breath thickened with every slip of added length -

Then it was too much, brushed too far, and Ellis felt the urge to gag hit in a surge. His face scrunched as he resisted, spine flinching. He tried to hide it, play it off, but Nick's gaze was so intent on his face that he caught the shift.

With a deep groan, the gambler dropped flat to the couch, letting his fingers loosen reluctantly on Ellis' hair. "Breathe." he uttered with the motion, and he might've been talking to either of them. Between the two gestures, his cock slid free of Ellis' lips, and the Georgian couldn't resist a quick cough, licking his tongue against his teeth.
"S-sorry, I -"

Before he could continue, Nick smoothed his palm over the top of his head, sinking fingertips into his hair with chill rings pressing into his scalp. "That's fine. That's fine, Ace, fuck." He lifted his head from the couch, gazing over Ellis' face with a warm sort of lust. "I'll keep shallow. You good?"

There was a restrained interest, a desire that flickered in his eyes, and Ellis couldn't find any part of him that wanted to stop. He didn't know if it was the sensation itself, or just how much Nick was clearly enjoying it, that made him want to continue.

All he knew was he was stiff to an almost uncomfortable degree.

"Yeah." he managed in a wet huff, and Nick did not hesitate to lift his hips, pushing up off the sofa. Ellis let his jaw go slack, pushing his tongue forward to press against his teeth, and the Northerner guided his erection back between his lips. His fingers tightened, clutching, and he held Ellis right where he was.

A faint and honeyed sigh left Nick's lips, hips picking up a slow and cautious rhythm. His length glided in and out from Ellis' lips, pushing against the hot silk of his tongue, and his voice went thick and almost desperate. "Christ. Fucking better than I thought."

There was a tremor to his voice, and Ellis couldn't stop his body from shifting, fidgeting. His groin was pulsing and tense, heartrate rising. Ellis was almost sure he could see a flush of color lit over his thin and stubble-dark cheeks, and the flood of arousal seeing Nick flustered spurred in him was enough to make his hips buck with want.

He tried to moan, utter any sort of noise, but he couldn't do more than hum past the flesh in his mouth.

The younger man's eyes closed, flustered breaths escaping his nose every time Nick rolled his hips up and thrust into his mouth with increasing urgency. His erection was rigid and full, slick with saliva and hot to the touch. Somehow it was almost more intense, more intimate, than the feeling of that same flesh sliding into other parts of him.

"Come on, El." Nick soothed, roughly, almost hoarse. His free hand drifted, grasping at Ellis' cheek, thumb smoothing over his cheekbone. He reopened his eyes to look up, and the older man was staring down at him with faintly parted lips. "Suck for me."

The command sent a shudder through him, and Ellis drew in a breath, letting his jaw widen just softly to place some suction on the flesh in his mouth. Nick snarled quietly, fingers clenching, and his hips rocked to drag in and out of the tight pressure. "Goddamn." he uttered, an awed breathlessness touching his voice as he grunted out, "Fuck. Fuck."

Ellis almost startled when Nick suddenly drew back, both hands sinking to grab at his biceps, hauling him up off his knees. He struggled to get his bearings as Nick dragged him up, and the next thing he knew, he was being dragged back into a straddle on the older man's thighs. He swallowed, thickly, mouth full of a husky flavour, limbs numb and clumsy as Nick's hands arranged his body on his lap.

Before he could speak, Nick was yanking his coveralls down, boxers quick to join them, just enough so he could bare Ellis' erection. When he glanced down, disbelief flashed raggedly over his features, tongue flashing eagerly over his bottom lip. "... shit, kid." Embarrassment flooded Ellis' face with even more of a redness, instinctively glancing down, too.
He was hard as a rock, and there was no hiding it. "U-um." he managed, huffing shortly, but didn't get much farther before Nick leaned forward, burying his mouth against the side of his neck.

Sharp stubble scraped into his skin, and Nick's teeth caught on the tender muscle just below his jaw. "You like that, do you?" he murmured, heavy lust fueling his tone. One of his arms looped around Ellis' waistline, while the other slid to grip their lengths together, squeezing on the hot flesh. "Maybe I should just push you back down, fuck that pretty mouth some more, huh?"

Ellis pushed against his knees, shivering, arching his back to grind against the older man's grip. He should have been mortified, or at least protested, but all he could do was clutch a hand on the back of Nick's head and rut against him, whining out a thin breath. The Northerner bit and nipped along his neck, catching teeth on skin and sucking softly, roving between his clavicle and his jawline.

When Nick joined the motion, stroking and squeezing his hand loosely to encourage him along, Ellis found himself tumbling effortlessly into orgasm. His voice pitched as it struck, burying his mouth into Nick's shoulder to muffle the sounds that threatened to leave him. He mouthed softly against the older man's skin, just barely nipping, mindlessly, as the older man's fingers drew tight around his length.

He didn't have the chance to feel abashed that he'd come so quickly, because Nick was not far behind.

The arm around his waist tightened, and they huddled there, breathless and shuddering, Nick's bites turning to slow and languid kisses against the side of his neck.

"Fucking hell." the older man muttered, almost to himself - almost shaken, and Ellis couldn't stop a thrilled joy from singing up his body at how pleased he sounded. "Holy Grail of fucking Georgia."

Ellis laughed, half-uncomprehending and snorting in his exhaustion, and nothing felt better than the curve of Nick's smirk against his neck.
Nick pinched fingers against his cigarette, holding it still as he took a tight drag and watched the end burn a dull orange, crumbling. As his lungs filled, chest expanding, he tilted his head back, held it a moment - then exhaled, billowing smoke out over the back porch balcony.

Though he wouldn't have willfully opened the door, he also knew he'd get chewed out for smoking inside.

The view across Tybee and toward the ocean wasn't terribly unpleasant, anyway.

He watched the smoke drift up and off on the wind, a vague frown lingering on his lips. He'd left Ellis to clean up, eager to light up, clear his head, because fuck if he was thinking straight anymore. His body was limp, like all the tension had been drawn by force from his muscles.

Or sucked. he thought, and promptly smirked.

With a little more training, some confidence, he was quite sure the kid could effortlessly blow his mind. And to know he'd enjoyed it? It was all he could do not to grin off into the distance, aware of how stupidly his pleasure must have painted itself on his expression. He'd known a few women who'd enjoyed giving head - or claimed to enjoy it, anyway, as it was hard to tell the difference when he didn't take the time to wonder - but to have Ellis slide into his arms, rigid and begging for release...

I take it all back. I am, apparently, the luckiest motherfucker in the apocalypse. He took another inhale off his cigarette, enjoying the rush of calm from the nicotine. He glanced up at the dark sky as he puffed out a smoky breath. Little to no light emanated up from the city, with the electricity out seemingly everywhere, and it left the sky untarnished.

The moon shone down from a cloudless black, dotted and speckled with stars.

"Pretty out here." came a quiet mumble from behind him, and Nick maintained his gaze forward as Ellis slipped out through the glass doors, joining him next to the railing. The Southerner slipped his forearms hesitantly against the top of the rail, craning his head back to peer up.

"Almost makes you think things ain't changed, huh?"

Nick pulled his cigarette from his lips, tapping it out over the lawn below. "Almost." he echoed, morosely, though he flashed a faint smirk sideways. Ellis didn't look at him, merely smiling up at the sky. "My uncle used to smoke on his apartment balcony and pour beer on people walking by. He thought it was hilarious. Kinda was. That, and a good use of shit beer."

Grinning a little, Ellis shifted forward. He let his body slump, armpits draping over the rail, looking down toward the ground. "Man. That's like Keith - when we was kids, used tuh go to Whisperin' Oaks, this amusement park over in Griffin County...? We'd go sneak intuh the Tunnel of Love, get on this overhangin' bridge, make a contest outta who could hang loogies down long enough to hit folks floatin' by, kissin' -"

Releasing a bewildered exhale, Nick pushed out a hand to hit his palm flat against the side of Ellis' head, shoving him away gently. "Gross. Colour me not fucking surprised." He wished he could say he didn't want to laugh.

Ellis grinned wider, letting his head duck down with the gesture. "We were kids, man." He slid back into place a beat later, nudging a little closer, even. "Y'know, I had a dream last night 'bout him. He was here, just like... part of the team. Made me wish you could meet him."

Placing his cigarette between his lips at the edge of his mouth, Nick snorted, letting his eyes close. "I dunno." He rolled the cigarette with his tongue, inhaling shortly and exhaling smoke through his nostrils. "I think I'm glad I don't have to. You fill my idiot quota for this century."

A slight smile quirkd at Ellis' lips, though he turned to glance at Nick, examining his face. A hesitance crept into his posture, shifting on his feet with a gentle clear of his throat. "Well... If we got rescued - y'know, if the government don't let us down or nothin'... maybe you could." He dropped his chin, focusing again toward the ground. "Or somethin'."

Nick tipped his head, eyes still closed, dismissively waving a hand before lacing his fingers together where they draped off the railing. "As if that's likely." he uttered, easily.

Hesitance deepening, Ellis carefully molded his face into something casual, brows quirking over his eyes. "Well... if it did happen. I mean, if we got rescued,...y'know. Whut would you do?" He was aware of Nick's head turning, gaze alighting on him, and he tried to relax his posture. "Y'know, after everythin's over."

The gambler's lips drew into a vague pinch, shrugging. His voice lowered, dulling. "Dunno. Not like anything's going to go back to normal. 'When everything's over'? It'll never be over, Overalls, even if the government does come pick us up. What'll that get us? Packed away in some refugee camp somewhere, at best?"

He could tell by the faint drop to Ellis' head that that wasn't the response his younger counterpart wanted, or expected, so he shrugged again and reclosed his eyes. "Not the best thought to be having right now, kid."

Tentatively, Ellis turned, letting one of his arms slip off the railing to hang loosely at his side. He faced Nick but didn't look at him, gaze lowering to the ground, and it was a shy tone that lowered his voice. "Better than thinkin' it won't happen, ain't it...? Sorta nice to hope on it...?"

That made him stop. Nick let his features fall to a flat veneer, exhaling gently. Coach's words threatened at him; did he have to crush the kid's hopes with his pessimism every time? Couldn't he stand to be positive just once?

He slowly took his cigarette from his lips, tamping it against the railing to crush out the cinders, and flicked it off into the darkness. Ellis was watching him; he could feel the younger man's attention on his every move, and it was slowly that he turned.

Nick reached out to get a hand on Ellis' chin, thumb brushing over his mouth, drinking in the way abrupt surprise turned into flustered embarrassment at the touch. "I prefer to think about anything else." he uttered, letting some lust leech into his voice. "Like how good those lips feel on -"

It didn't surprise him when Ellis stumbled back, escaping the grasp shyly, but there was something in his eyes that betrayed a faint disappointment. That surprised him, unpleasantly.

"I -" the Georgian began, a little unsteady.

Some distant tension rose up Nick's spine. Something was going on, and he didn't like being at a disadvantage. Rather than give Ellis a chance to respond, he jumped on defense, suddenly wishing he'd kept his cigarette.

"What? You gonna play coy and pretend you didn't love my dick in your mouth? 'Cause I have pretty hard evidence to the contrary." Knowing full well Ellis was likely upset about something else didn't stop him from trying to direct the conversation elsewhere, only pushing harder when embarrassment flared up on the younger man's face.

"I wasn't even expecting you to get excited over it." He took a step closer, leaning in, and self-satisfaction purred to life in his chest when he noted Ellis swallowing, the kid's blue eyes darting toward his mouth reflexively. He was nervous, and that was a win in Nick's book. "Maybe next time I won't stop. See how you like -"

"You'd stay, wouldn't'cha?" Ellis' gaze went intent on his, suddenly, colour filling his cheeks and the tips of his ears as Nick broke off into silence, blinking just once down at him. That nervousness lingered. "If we got rescued. If all this... was over. Yuh wouldn't leave?"

There was soft desperation there, cut in half by something Nick could only describe as fear. Before he could do more than part his lips, Ellis broke off into silence, blinking just once down at him. That nervousness lingered. "If we got rescued. If all this... was over. Yuh wouldn't leave?"

Nick stood in place, joints stiff as though a cold wind had suddenly frozen him where he was. Ellis thought he was being subtle, but Nick had been here before. Dealt with the shy, dismissive candor of a one-night-stand hoping for more. He knew the dance, and its steps, and where it ended.

That thought didn't stop him from fighting, resisting, doing his best to lead the conversation away. The reflex agitated him, because he could feel within his chest some buried hope that Ellis would just give it up, and they could continue on as they were. "I already said that's not likely. More likely we die tomorrow, or whatever we're carrying finally decides to kill us, or -"

Ellis twitched his head into a shake. "I know. But... if we make it, y'know."

Shifting to put his elbow on the railing, Nick cradled his chin against his knuckles, allowing his stare to direct numbly outwards. "If you're trying to ask something, just ask it." he uttered, quietly. It was a last ditch effort, because maybe if he put Ellis on the spot, he'd shy away -

"Are we gonna... stay tugether?" The mechanic's voice was soft, hesitant. Nick didn't bother to look, lest his expression match the vulnerability of his words. "I mean, would you want to?"

Part of him had expected such a question. Felt it coming. Maybe it was overdue.

Maybe this is overdue.

Nick let his digits spread, scratching into his stubble. He inhaled, and fuck if he could feel anything but a distant exhaustion. "Stay together?" he echoed, flatly. He wasn't even sure why he was still playing dumb. "Why? Aren't you all bound for your families?"

Ellis' head lowered, and he managed a careful, "Well... yeah, I guess. But you could come, too... Meet Keith. My mama." A soft excitement rose in his voice, tender and cautious, the kind of emotion that struck a tight discomfort into Nick's chest. "You and me could -"

"Meet your mom? Jesus, kid." Nick couldn't fend off a disbelieving shake of his head. He sensed the stiffness that entered Ellis' posture at his words. "Where's this even coming from?"

There was a weakening when Ellis spoke. A fragility that came to the surface, a tremor to his voice, like he was holding on - but just barely. "Look, Nick, I know... I know yer scared, but we need tuh talk about this. I can't keep goin' like this... I need tuh know - whut we are." Nick didn't want to, but he looked. His gaze cut sideways, catching the fear gone wild in the Georgian's eyes. "I'm startin' to... think... I..."

He trailed off, abruptly putting his hands together into a nervous clasp. He couldn't get it out, and the Northerner was almost glad at the failure.

"I'm not scared." Nick returned, voice going harsher than he meant it to, cutting as he broke through the vagueness. The tone seemed to startle Ellis a little. "I just am what I am. What we are? I fucking told you from the word go, what this was, Ellis. When did I ever say anything else? When did I tell you I was anybody else?"

Ellis steeled his jaw, and reached out. He grabbed Nick's forearm, squeezing on the fabric of his the fabric of his dress shirt. "Nick. I get it, okay? You don't think... you got yer heart broke, and you don't think you can trust nobody. But -"

Nick recoiled, trying to yank his arm away, and was vaguely surprised when Ellis let him go. "What the fuck are you talking about?" He took a step to the side, turning, glancing off along the length of the porch where it wrapped around the condo. "Look, Ellis. It's very simple. I don't do the relationship thing. I've tried, and it doesn't work out. I didn't get my heart broken, I'm just not that kind of guy. And I never fucking said I was."

He could feel the younger man's eyes on his back, and he didn't turn around, not even when the softest mumble escaped Ellis from over his shoulder. "Maybe you just ain't tried with someone who loves you...?"

Some cold and harsh emotion cut into his chest, and Nick gazed down toward his hands. It hurt to hear, and he didn't know why. Some ferocious guilt threatened to crawl up his spine, talons sunk deep into his body. He'd been selfish to put himself on Ellis, the fucked up guy he was, and for what? I shouldn't have even let this happen.

Part of him knew he could have loved Ellis, and maybe that just made it worse.

There was something familiar and comforting in the decision to burn it all down.

"Don't be stupid." he snarled, quietly, lowering his chin. "We're just two sad fucks looking for something that doesn't hurt for two seconds. You don't love me, and I don't love you." Nick palmed down his chest, flattening his dress shirt, head shaking. Were his fingers shaking, too? "You -"

When Ellis spoke, breaking in, he could hear the fractured emotion just barely held back. He didn't have to look to imagine the misery threatening on the Georgian's features. It was in his mind's eye, clear as day, because Ellis had been nothing but miserable lately. "Nick, I... I know you. I know you don't wanna admit it, and I don't... need you to say you love me, but you gotta... You can't keep sayin' we ain't somethin'."

He was pleading, and nothing had ever sounded so pathetic. "It... it hurts. I just wanna know we're somethin'."

It wasn't fury that flared in him. Nick had passed the point of anger; anger was just the raw material he shoved up to insulate him from the conversation. A wall. It was separate from him, distant. No, it was a hollow and wickedly cold feeling that took him over. Like letting go, because that was easier.
"We aren't." His voice hissed as it escaped him, more like air from a punctured balloon than actual words. "What the fuck exactly do you think we have, here? I'll go and meet your mama, come for Sunday dinner, take you to a movie? I'm not that goddamn guy."

There was a beat of silence, just enough, and Nick thrust up a hand toward the sky. "You don't love me, and if you think you do, you're a fucking idiot. I'm not what you want. You want some little cute blonde in a sundress to come and impress your mom, make you breakfast, laugh at all your fucking jokes."

Ellis' footsteps sounded on the wooden porch as he took a half-step back, and his voice was soft and trembling. "All the stuff you've said - everythin' we've been through - you can't be serious. You don't mean that. I -" He hesitated, and it was with a voice like sugar that he whispered, "I'm in love with you, Nick."

Nick turned, poised in anger, lip curling up from his teeth.

It was worse. It was so much worse than he expected. He couldn't speak, it struck so deeply.

Those blue eyes sunk pain in his chest. They were wide and vulnerable and wounded, tears building up along those delicate lashes and sparkling like ice. He saw it: saw the desperate flare of love and need, like he'd never seen on anyone. Never seen directed at him.

"... 'n' I think you are, too."

For a moment, he could have lied, just to capture that look and call it his own.

Or was it tell the truth? Did he even know, anymore?

"That's how you got that shoulder wound, ain't it?" Ellis' voice hitched, a hiccup that shook a tear loose, tracking down his cheek in a glistening path. "You were so afraid I was dead, you 'bout killed yourself chargin' at Brenda. So you can't stand there and tell me you don't care. You can't keep sayin' all this stuff."

Nick slapped a hand over his shoulder, grasping into his shirt with clutched fingers. "What -" But there was no room to argue over how he'd come to such a conclusion, not when doing so admitted it was true. "You expect me to say I don't care if you die? That's a far fucking leap."

The younger man's mouth opened, but Nick overrode him, taking a harsh step forward. He didn't know how he felt about the fact Ellis retreated a step to match. "Just because I don't hate your company doesn't mean I love you, or we're gonna be anything. This isn't a relationship, we aren't dating. You're a good screw to pass the apocalypse with. That's it."

Every word brought another tear down his cheeks, sped the flow, until he was staring up at Nick with a tremble through his form, tears freely falling. It was like watching something fall apart inside of him, something breaking. "You don't mean that." he whispered, barely audible. "Please - I can't keep doin' this. Tell me you don't mean that."

Nick put his arms out, and a laugh escaped him, harsh and sarcastic and cruel. He did not recognize the sound. "Then don't. Don't keep doing this. What the fuck do I care?"

He turned, but Ellis abruptly reached out to him, hands outstretched. The Georgian's fingers just barely brushed his chest before Nick reached up to circle his wrists, shoving his hands away without letting go. The contact was hot - too hot, and some rogue voice begged him, screamed at him, to just stop.
Pleaded with him shut up, drag the kid into his arms, kiss him until the tears stopped. Keep him. Not because anything good would come of it, but simply because if he didn't have Ellis, what the fuck did he have?

"Please, Nick -"

The Northerner let him go, taking a step back. "Please what? What do you want from me? You want me to lie?" Ellis' head started shaking in time to the tremor of his body, but Nick just snorted. "Fucking drop it, Ellis. We aren't anything. I'm just a mistake, kid, one you made because you're too fucking stupid to know what's good for you. So just fucking go."

He turned his head, averting his gaze off into the night, and the faint shudder of Ellis' voice betrayed the way he surrendered to his tears. "What... are you..." He was hiccuping with each utterance, struggling to even piece together words as he teetered on the edge of sobs, and his voice grew muffled as he pushed his hands against his face. "Nick -"

"Get out." He leaned to shove his weight against the railing, gripping it with either hand, gone white-knuckled with the force. "You'll thank me for breaking this off, eventually." He dug his fingernails into the wood until it ached and he felt he might break them, turning his back on the younger man.

He truly believed that.

He didn't believe a lot - but he genuinely, sincerely believed that.

He heard Ellis stumble back, heard his toe catch on the threshold of the glass door and almost fall. Heard his breaths shift into sobs as he fled, and heard them shift to silence as the Georgian retreated into the house. He was left with nothing but the night sky and the whistling breeze and a throbbing pain in his chest.

It was better, wasn't it? Better for Ellis, better for him. They'd never amount to anything together. Nick would have broken him sooner or later, and better to do so cleanly, when he could still recover. The selfish thing to do would have been to keep up the illusion Ellis had, keep taking advantage of him.

Ellis wanted things Nick would never be. Didn't he?

Nick stared up, looking toward the moon.

He didn't understand why it blurred, why he couldn't focus on it, not until he blinked and something hot traced down his cheek. He shoved a hand up to wipe it away like it burned him, and he was left to gaze at the slick stripe across his palm.

It mocked him.

Rochelle didn't know what made her wake up. With Coach's snoring, it was hard to imagine it had been a sound - but that was the only thing that made sense.

That, or some sixth sense.

All she knew was she came to consciousness with a deep and unsettled feeling of wrongness. Something ached in her gut, spooling nausea through her body. She pushed up off the bunk bed, blinking into the darkness, startled at the feeling.

"Ellis?" she whispered, instinctively, only to be met with silence and the rumble-squeak of Coach's inhale. She craned her head off the edge of the bed, looking down into the bottom bunk, and found it empty. That shouldn't have worried her; he could easily be on watch, or sneaking some time with Nick, or gone to the bathroom for all she knew.

Yet, she worried.

Pushing the sheets off herself, she straightened up to get her legs scooched toward the edge of the bed. She took a moment to mull over retrieving her bra from where she'd shucked it to a corner of the bed, but enough exhaustion and aches laced her body that she couldn't begin to care. With luck, she'd soon be back in bed.

With a tired sigh, Rochelle slipped down to get a foot on the bunk ladder, clambering to the floor. She had to be careful; the last thing she needed to do was stumble in on the pair. That in mind, it was cautiously that she stepped to the door and cracked it open to slip outside.

She did not have to search long. Ellis was sitting on the stairs, elbows on his knees, hands up and buried in his hair. Rochelle couldn't resist a relieved sigh at the sight of him, putting up a hand and whispering to him.

"Oh, hey, sorry. Thought I heard something - anyway. Are you -"

She didn't really seem to startle him, though there was a sluggish surprise in the way his head lifted. His eyes darted to hers, and it took just a moment for her to realize what she was seeing in the low light.

He was crying. All-out, messy, unrestrained crying. Tears streaked his face and put blotches around his eyes and even as she looked at him, his lower lip trembled and his body hitched with a sob. She'd never seen him so miserable, so shattered. He looked hollow.

Her body reacted before she'd even fully processed the sight. She bolted, dropping down to her knees in front of him, arms sliding to envelope him. Her hands slid up to grasp his shoulders, gripping there as he succumbed to a full-body shudder.

"Hey, hey, shh. It's okay. Everything's okay." she soothed, mindlessly, rubbing at his arms in gentle circles. "You're okay, baby." Ellis' head dropped, and she surged to catch his forehead against her shoulder, arms slipping to embrace him entirely. "You're okay. Just breathe."

Rochelle stopped herself from rubbing his back, mindful of his injuries, and instead slipped a hand up to brush fingers through his curly hair. The touch made him tremor, and it was a choked and muffled sob that escaped him.
"I-I tried. I just wanted... I didn't mean tuh.."

She didn't stop petting his hair, setting her cheek against the side of his head. "It's okay now, sweetie." she murmured back to his nonsense, squeezing him gently when he leaned further into her. "I'm here. Was it a bad dream? Did you have a nightmare?"

All he could do was shake his head at first, so she held him tighter, palm pressing against the back of his head to encourage him to bury into her neck. He didn't need much coaxing.

It was as he buried against her shoulder, wet immediately leeching into the thin fabric of her shirt, that he whispered out a fractured and mournful, "Nick broke -" Ellis couldn't get through the whole sentence without a sob wracking him, breath hitched to a rattle in his throat. "- up with me."

Shock froze her there, holding him tightly, expression drawn into wide-eyed surprise. She couldn't utter a sound.

"I-I fucked it up. I ruined it." he muttered, so miserable it almost came across as disgust. "I just - I tried tuh tell him how I feel - I love him, Ro'. I love him 'n' he just said - the most awful -" He was whispering, but the more he spoke, the more his voice pitched and raised, and Rochelle forced herself into motion. Her eyes darted to look up the stairs.

Nick couldn't be far. The condo was only so large.

Rochelle looped a hand to press at the base of Ellis' spine, slipping away and pushing him to follow. "Come on. Let's go in the bedroom. Okay?" He followed numbly, like he would have merely collapsed without her support, and it was gently that she guided him toward the main bedroom.

"There we go." she murmured, soothingly, barely cognizant of the words as she spoke them. Her mind was spinning, wheels stuck in the mud. Had she so badly misread Nick's bad mood? She'd thought it nothing abnormal, something that would pass, like his moods always did - had Coach so terribly overstepped as to cause such a breakdown?

Or was it simply a matter of Ellis scaring him off with a confession?

Were they so out of touch?

Rochelle pushed the bedroom door open, not having bothered to close it entirely when they left Chris to sleep earlier. She barely convinced Ellis to walk much further than the end of the bed before his legs collapsed under him, sliding down to the floor, pushing his back against the outside of the footboard. He drew his knees up to his chest, wrapping his arms around them.

"I should've -" He was losing it, now, voice quavering. He pushed his palms over his eyes, but all he managed was to smear tears across his face. "- j-just kept muh.. muh dang mouth shut..."

Gently slipping away just long enough to close the door, Rochelle returned to his side. She slipped down to sit on her knees, rubbing one hand up and down his shin, and letting the other lift up to tuck a wandering curl behind his ear. "Honey, no. That wouldn't have been any better."

His head shook, desperately. "N-no. I knew - I knew he was scared, 'n' I did it anyway - I just ... I know he cares 'bout me, I just wanted him tuh... I just wanted tuh hear it..." One of his hands dragged up, pushing into his hair, curling fingers in it until he could draw it painfully taut. "I thought if he just said it, we'd be okay - He'd get all riled but we'd be okay -"

A frown found its way onto her face, and she felt abruptly and suddenly close to tears. Maybe it was how miserable he sounded, or how sincere. Or maybe it was the flood of guilt she felt for having let him get this far. She'd known better, and hadn't listened to her gut and put a stop to it.

Some part of her had believed in Nick, or Ellis' ability to soften him.

"Sweetie -" she began, but a vague rustle from the bed halted her. She raised her head in time for Chris' head to lift, and he blinked at her in bleary confusion. "Sorry, Chris. Just... Just go back to sleep." She shouldn't have expected it to work, but she didn't have the energy to protest when he started to wearily and achingly crawl himself upright and down the length of the mattress.

Ellis' head shook, releasing a few staggered breaths that came worrisomely close to hyperventilation. "We were fine, 'n' I just had tuh push him - I'm such a fuckin' idiot -" he muttered, voice close to a whine, barely even acknowledging it when Chris came to a panting halt just behind them at the end of the bed. "I couldn't just -" He groaned through gritted teeth, like actual pain flooded him.

Slowly, Christophe blinked over the footboard at Rochelle, eyes questioning. She shook her head gently without speaking, expression morose, and some comprehension made its way onto his face.

"You didn't do anything wrong." she hushed, settling her hand at the back of his neck and rubbing there. Ellis peeked vaguely up at her, quiet misery stained on his features, and he did not look convinced. "Okay? He's the one who messed up. He's the idiot. You're sweet, and perfect, and he's going to regret this."

If I have to make him...

Ellis put a trembling hand against his mouth, muffling the choked breath that escaped him. "I thought - I really think he... cares 'bout me. Wh.. whut if... whut if I ruined it? Whut if we'd be okay if I just hadn't... made him say it? I knew I was pushin' him..."

Rochelle took a breath, leaning in close, til her forehead touched the top of his head. She closed her eyes and tried to summon some kind of calm. She found none. "You can't think like that." she whispered, soothingly. "You can't live not knowing these things. It's not healthy to love someone and hope they love you back, think it. You don't think you deserve to hear it?"

He shook his head, not knowing how to respond, or perhaps not able to past the sobbing that clenched his throat. She pressed a kiss against his temple, soft and unassuming, before pulling away. As she did, Chris' voice raised tentatively from the bed.

"Rochelle is right, hermano." He said it with a grunt, grasping his hand on the top of the footboard to leverage himself and lean forward just enough to look down at Ellis. "En España, if you see someone beautiful, you say something. If you love someone, you say it. Not this... estaís vacilantes." He lifted a pinky to gesture in a flick, seeming afraid to let go of the footboard lest he lose his balance.

"Can't make up your minds, ¿sí?"

Ellis' head lifted enough to turn wet blue eyes upwards, looking up at the Spaniard, their faces upside-down from each other. "I know how I feel." he mumbled, weakly, lips quivering as he spoke. "'N' I thought I knew how he felt."

That made Christophe cock his head gently, a soft and discontent emotion darting over his eyes. "¿Quizá...?" he uttered, sympathetically, glancing toward Rochelle with a slightly helpless twitch of his mouth. "Perhaps he only needs time? He will come around?" She frowned at him in quick disapproval, the expression only deepening when Ellis shifted his gaze to her, too, and she could read a faint hope there.

Nick was stubborn. Too stubborn. Was there even a chance - or were they mistaken after all? What if he truly didn't love Ellis, and breaking it off with him had been the one truly honest thing he'd done? The thought frightened her, but wasn't it her responsibility to consider these things, to guide Ellis to the right conclusion?

"Em... I only mean -" Chris seemed to recognize he'd stumbled into unsteady territory, shifting his weight uncomfortably as apology flooded his expression.

"I don't know." Rochelle admitted, honestly, turning to look Ellis directly in the eyes. He crumpled into a kind of resigned disappointment, nodding his head, and she gently pulled her hands away to settle both of them, clasped, in her lap. "We'll figure it out, okay? But right now, you need to feel this. Okay? I know you want to think it'll get better, but you need to be prepared... it might not. He might not be able to do what you want."

Ellis fell into tears as quickly as they had begun to stop, a shake traveling over his form, but Rochelle forged through. She had to, even if it hurt. And God, it hurt.

"We don't know what's going to happen. I need you to be prepared for the worst, because I can't watch you run this track anymore. If he's hurt you, if he can hurt you like this, then he's going to have to buck up and make it better, or maybe you're better off, anyway."

It was cruel, and she knew it. Knew it when Ellis' tears turned into sobs, though he tried to muffle it behind a hand. Knew it even more clearly when she glanced up and found Christophe trapped in a vaguely pained expression, though he merely lowered his gaze in some strangely visceral submission.

"All this time, I thought - it was okay, because he made you happy." She reached out, touching her hand to his cheek, her chest clenching when he pushed his face against it in a desperate gesture. "You're not happy now."

That tore a stuttered breath from him, and he barely managed a nod. "I-I know." he whispered, fractured, staring suddenly down at his lap. "I just - I love him. I love him like I ain't never loved anyone. I don't wanna do nothin' ever again if he ain't there. I wanna -"

He lost his voice to a sobbing groan, hunching forward, and Rochelle jolted to catch him in her arms. She held him, tightly, grasping at the back of his head and pushing him down to bury against her chest. "It's okay." she whispered, closing her eyes, though all the gesture did was force out the tears she'd been fighting. "I never wanted to see you like this."

As Ellis buried his face against her, the thudding in his ears was not enough to muffle the sound of the door opening.

They both jolted away from each other, startled, and Ellis looked up through a thick blur of tears to see Nick standing in the doorway, holding it open with one hand while his other hand dangled the flashlight low and pointed at the ground. His heart felt like it stopped in his chest, leaving only a numb sensation to crawl delicately up his limbs as they ran out of oxygen. His skin prickled with anger and misery and fear.

Fear, because he did not need more than a glance to see the betrayal laced in the older man's expression.
Rochelle stood, abruptly, putting both her hands on her stomach to slowly flatten out her shirt along her body. Her voice was remarkably calm when she spoke, though her insides roiled with fury. "Nick. I -"

Nick did not spare her a glance, did not even acknowledge her presence in the room. His eyes were locked onto Ellis', even when the Georgian tried to avert his to the ground. "How long?" he asked, simply, voice hollow despite the vivid rage stewing just behind his eyes. "How fucking long?"

He knew. He'd listened in long enough to know Rochelle knew, overheard the conversation clearly enough to pick up on it.

Though his throat felt like it might have wrung itself into knots, Ellis worked out a wheedled response, rough and raw with tears. "A while." he said, honestly, because it didn't matter anymore. The Northerner's eyes flashed wide, cutting across his face with something that might have been horror had it been less enraged.

"I asked for one fucking goddamn thing."

It started quiet. Not soft - no, his tone was razor-sharp, but so quiet it was almost just a hum.

It did not remain quiet.

"I asked you for one fucking goddamn thing, and that was to keep it a secret. You fucking agreed to it. How many fucking times did you lie to me? How many times did you tell me they didn't know?" He was getting louder, stance wider, aggressive. His hands lifted with clenched fists, looking for all the world like a cornered animal. "How many times have you three been laughing behind my fucking back?!"

Ellis could not manage more than a hoarse whisper. "No one was laughin' -"

Nick paid him no mind, pacing just a few steps forward - and the gesture was almost threatening, so much so that Rochelle reflexively stepped in front of him, blocking his view to Ellis by force. Nick's gaze didn't lift to hers, and she swore the way he kept it low was ashamed, or something so close she couldn't tell the difference.

"Coach doesn't know." she stated, still calm, because someone had to be. "I found out on my own. And we haven't been -"

"I'm going to give you five fucking seconds to reconsider talking to me right now." Nick hissed, low and furious, eyes darting around her face with a panicked and wild energy. He looked half like he was trying to puzzle a way to dart around her, like she was merely an obstacle. "Like I need to hear from you, when you apparently can't keep your legs or your mouth shut around this fucking -" He jerked a hand up to gesture at Christophe, and there was a surge of motion.

Chris looked like he might lunge off the bed, voice going sharp. "¡Cómo te atreves!" he shouted, though what he intended to do was uncertain, considering his legs didn't seem sturdy even with him balanced on his knees on the mattress. "You do not speak this way!"

Instantly, Ellis was up and on his feet, reaching out to grab an arm around the Spaniard, pulling him into a messy hug with the footboard between them. The man did not succumb, trying to push away but lacking the leverage to do much more than squirm his torso.

His fight only worsened when Nick flicked a look, askance, toward him, coldly spitting out, "You shut the fuck up. You are not part of this team, asshole. I don't give a shit what you think, and I'm not scared of a fucking cripple, so sit the fuck down." The Spaniard nearly got his leg up and onto the edge of the mattress, like he meant to fling himself up, but Ellis tightened his grip and dragged him back by force.

When the Georgian released a desperate, "Please - don't.", Chris' fight stilled, darting a glance at him. His brows still wrought with fury, he slipped his attention reluctantly toward Rochelle, examining her without moving an inch.

For her part, Rochelle stayed perfectly still, her eyes on Nick's as they doggedly traced her form rather than match her gaze. There was a beat of silence, as if Rochelle were patiently awaiting to see if Nick intended to continue - and when he didn't, she very quietly spoke.

"He found out on his own, too, but for the record - I don't give a shit. You spent this whole time stringing him on, treating him like shit in front of us just because you wanted to keep up your appearances. Keep him hidden." Nick was inflating his chest with fury, lip curling up from his teeth in a snarl, but Rochelle did not give way. "You didn't think how that would make him feel?
How lonely that would be? When you couldn't even let him talk to you about you guys, you thought he'd make it without someone to talk to?"

She thrust out a hand, jabbing a finger toward him. "I was there for him. That's all. If you want to call me ugly names, fine, but considering what you did to him tonight, he needs someone who gives half a shit."

Suddenly, something tipped in Nick. A darkness entered his eyes, like a light had cut out behind them. He gazed abruptly up straight into her eyes, so cold and numb it almost frightened her. She retreated a step before she could stop herself.

In perfect time, a door opened in the hallway, and there was a thunder of footsteps as Coach threw himself into the doorway just behind Nick. "What in the damn hell is goin' on?" His expression was weary, stricken, and the fog of sleep had not yet lifted from his eyes. "Y'all are shoutin' like -"

His eyes caught on Ellis, tear-stained face just lit by the scattered glow of the flashlight. He slowly took in the bubbling anger on Chris', the cool disgust on Rochelle's. Nick did not turn to look at him, but the aggression in his posture lingered enough to give an idea.

Coach stood in silence, even when that silence dragged on for a few strained, uncomfortable moments. His expression gave away nothing but vague concern.

It was only very softly that Rochelle murmured, "Maybe we should just sleep on this. Talk in the morning."

She didn't anticipate Nick's reaction: he laughed.

He laughed, and it was the coldest sound she'd ever heard. It put goosebumps up her arms, it was so hollow and empty - emptier, even, than his voice when he had been sitting on the floor of the gunstore. His tone rasped with it, and he looked at her as if she was just a photograph in his hand.
A fond memory he was in the process of stowing away, but wanted to steal one last glance of before it went in some box in some closet somewhere.

"Talk? There's nothing to talk about. Talking is the exact thing I never wanted."

Rochelle barely got the chance to part her lips before he turned, shouldering past Coach forcibly.
The eldest survivor half-turned to gaze after him before looking back into the bedroom, a tense confusion lurking behind an otherwise stern gaze.

Nick did not go up the stairs. He hit the wall and turned, and there was the clatter of the katana as it was drawn away from its lean on the wall. Just a beat later, and the front door locks were turning, metallic thunks announcing their progress.

Ellis released his grip on Chris, taking a stumbled step forward so he could place a hand on Rochelle's arm. "Nick!" he burst out, voice breaking in half with a certain desperation. The sound terrified him, and that terror bled into his voice. "What are you doin'?! You can't -"

The door swung open - and then ferociously slammed shut.

As fast as Ellis could lurch to bolt, intent on chasing after him, Rochelle put an arm out to grab him. She dragged him by force back a few steps, pushing him until his hip hit the bed - and as he fought against her, she fought back. "No, Ellis. No. Stay." He shoved his forearm flat against her chest, trying to dodge to the side, and she stifled a wince as she wrestled with him. "Ellis! I will get him!"

That made him stop, lips parted to pant, eyes darting desperately from her face to the door. Fear had stopped his tears, leaving just a wild panic across his features. "I will get him." she repeated, slower, and the Georgian slowly relented. He slid his weight back, hip braced against the footboard.

She waited just long enough, hands sliding to hover flat in the air - and then she ran, skidding out into the hall. She had to throw her boots on, swearing a simple "Fuck!" under her breath when they resisted her attempts to step into them without unzipping the sides... and then she was out the door.

Coach gazed after her, arms slowly drawing to a cross. He turned his head, examining Ellis and Christophe.

The Spaniard slowly and tentatively slid himself flat in a sit on the mattress, reaching out his hand to place it flat on Ellis' shoulder. The Georgian's frame threatened to crumple at the touch, dropping his head to bury his face against his palms, and it was miserably that he leaned there.

If they'd looked a little less broken, Coach might have stepped in and asked for an explanation. As it was, he drew away from the bedroom, slipping instead to follow Rochelle.
"Nick!"

Rochelle hissed it, trying not to shout, as she bolted down the porch stairs. The gambler was just a light blue and white shape in the dark, lit by moonlight, striding across the lawn. She chased him down, and his pace did not change as she came up behind him.

"Where the hell are you going?! You're just gonna walk out in the middle of the night?"

Swinging the katana to rest it on his shoulder, it was with a dull tone that he kept walking, stepping up on the slab of concrete that made up the driveway, linking the fence gate to the garage. "Sure. You should be glad I didn't take the sniper, too."

It was so flippant and casual, Rochelle felt a flash of anger. She lunged forward, grabbing his shirt sleeve. He halted at her touch, arm just barely drawn behind him by her grip. "What the fuck is wrong with you, Nick?! What are you gonna do, go solo? We know how that goes!"

Snorting, he didn't turn to look at her, but he didn't pull away, either. He glanced upwards, suddenly, gazing at the sky. "Maybe I'll hunt down whoever the fuck's out here, join them. Better than you lying fucks."

Rochelle stared up at him, and it was all she could do to keep her voice steady. They couldn't afford to yell, not outside, where infected - or humans - could hear them. "Lying? Us, lying? You're the one who made him think you were together. You're the one who led him on."

The casual sarcasm disappeared in an instant. Before she could blink, Nick turned, snapping his arm free from her grip and jerking so close to her face she had no choice but to arch her spine and step back. He snarled at her, eyes dark. "I never fucking did anything. I never fucking said -"

Then he was turned away again, hand over his mouth, and she couldn't deny that her heart rate had picked up. There was something wrong in his energy, cold, and it took her a moment to realize why it unsettled her so much; it was like an animal under attack. Wild and unpredictable, visceral. Terrified, maybe.

Ellis had said he was afraid of people finding out about them - she'd thought he'd been exaggerating.

Nick hunched away from her, head faintly shaking. "I told him from the start I wasn't that guy. It's his own fucking fault he convinced himself I was." Rochelle didn't want to believe... didn't want to let herself hope... but did he not seem miserable, in his own way?

"And his own fucking fault for telling you - Jesus. The one fucking thing..."

Did it not say something that he was so angry, so upset, so frantic?

She tried to soften her stance, her voice. She reached out, and her fingers just brushed at his upper arm. "Nick... sometimes I wonder if you don't have yourself convinced you're a certain kind of guy."

Nick stepped away, a furious exhale escaping him. "You and Ellis both. You're a fucking pair. Tell yourself fairy tales and blame me when they aren't true." he uttered, scathingly. He shifted his grip on the katana, dropping it to his side as he started to walk away again. "Forget it. I'm not staying in this shit."

Frustration flooded her, hands curling into fists. She jolted a step forward, hissing after him. "Nick. You're going to die out there, and it'll kill him. It'll kill all of us."

She couldn't have known how the words cut him through, so close to an echo of what he'd told Christophe. Like a leash had drawn taut, Nick halted. His gaze dropped to the ground, shoulders raising a twitch. He didn't turn, but he stayed where he stood.

She felt a surge of hope in her chest to see him falter, and pressed.

"If you run out there because of something he did, and get killed - by a zombie, or whoever's out there - he'll never forgive himself. You've got to know that." Putting her hands together, carefully, she lowered her chin. "I don't believe you don't care at all. You're part of this family, Nick. Whatever's going on, whatever happens, none of us want you to walk out there and die."

His head tilted, a little - not enough to look back at her, but enough so that she could see just the side of his face. She had him, almost, but she needed to hook him. She had to get him back in the house, one way or another. Wasn't that the priority?

Rochelle inhaled, carefully, steeling herself to make a promise she wasn't sure they could keep.

"We won't talk about it."

That stiffened his posture.

"Please. Just come back inside. We won't talk about it. Okay? If you really don't want to - we won't. I need to be there for Ellis, but we'll leave you alone. This is between you two. We're not going to circle you and have a big argument. Okay? You can just hole yourself up like you always do. Just..."

She couldn't help a hand from lifting, weakly spreading fingers into a pleading gesture. "Please. Just come back inside."

Nick gazed down toward the ground, katana slowly lowering until it touched the concrete with a soft metallic rasp. His posture fell to something vaguely slumped, resigned, as her words settled over him. He exhaled a short breath and turned on his heel.

"Fine." was all he said, and it was rough and small and petty.

He didn't look at her as he stalked back across the lawn. He took the porch stairs in a quick stride, and only slowed slightly when he noticed Coach waiting on the landing just outside the front door. The two men didn't utter a word to each other, with Coach watching him closely and Nick staring solidly past him.

The football coach stepped to make way, silently watching as Nick shoved past him and into the house.

Rochelle watched Nick disappear through the threshold, hearing the door to the second bedroom slam shut a few moments later. She slumped, all the energy draining out of her body in one swift motion, and raised a hand to cover her eyes.

It was breathlessly that she uttered a thin stream of swears, venting out an elongated stretch of "Shitshitshit." When it failed to make her feel better, she eventually simply rubbed over the length of her face and started walking back to the stairs.

Coach was looking at her.

She didn't expect him to talk - he'd been so silent, part of her had forgotten about him. Not so much his existence, but forgotten that he was a rogue element. Forgotten that he didn't know what was going on, and she had no clue, even, how he would react.

The woman might've just walked up the stairs and back into the house without a word, had he not reached out and pulled the door closed before she'd made it more than halfway. The sound startled her, and her eyes darted up to his.

He didn't seem angry, but she couldn't determine what he did seem like.

Slowly, Coach drew his arms into a cross, sighing, such a gust of wind leaving him that his body deflated. His eyes closed, leaning back against the railing of the staircase. "How long's this been goin' on?" he questioned, tone flat and exhausted.

Rochelle tenderly closed the distance between them by just a few steps more. She ran her tongue across her lower lip, biting it between her teeth when it hit the corner of her mouth. Only eventually did she admit in a soft and half-humoured voice, "A while."

He didn't open his eyes.

Shame flustered her as she realized what that expression was: disappointment. She didn't know at who, but shouldn't it have been directed at her? Hadn't she had a hand in all this, encouraging Ellis on a path to heartbreak?

"I didn't think it would go like this, Coach, I swear -"

Lifting a hand from his forearm, he waved her off with a halting gesture, voice gone dry and low. Anger did rise, then, but it was almost melancholic. "Here I was, thinkin' Nick wasn't a good friend to him, an' you tellin' me they were datin'? Nick's said all that shit to Ellis, done all the shit he's done, an' they were datin'? Lordy, girl, just what in the hell were you -"

Something snapped, and she didn't know what. She didn't even feel the tension rising in her chest until it broke her, the backlash of force hitting her so strongly she barely stayed standing.

"I don't know. Okay?! I don't know what I was thinking! Maybe I thought they loved each other, and it was all just a big show for Nick to be a jerk, but deep down he loved him - just like deep down he loves us. Is it so damn wrong, am I such a horrible person, for trying to support Ellis when he's in love?"

Coach seemed startled by her fury, taking a half-step forward on the landing, but there was no stopping her.

"Maybe I fucked up. Maybe I should have done something different. But it wasn't my relationship. It wasn't my place to say anything. I didn't want anything but the best for him. Do you really think I meant for him to end up hurt?! Do you -"

She was almost shouting, and a snarl drifted up, cutting through the cold and empty night air. Coach's head lifted, moving in a flash to open the front door with one hand in the same gesture his other hand raised to hush her.

It sounded again, closer, inquisitive.
It didn't sound like a Hunter; it may have even just been a regular zombie, wandering near the fence and alerted to the sound of her voice. Rochelle didn't have much time to think before Coach was practically hauling her up the stairs and into the condo, close behind her. He shut the door and leaned against it, letting his head fall back against it, eyes closing.

"Babygirl, that ain't what I said."

Running a hand over the top of her head, exhaling, Rochelle shook her head. "... It's how I feel." she stated, dully, before glancing suddenly at him. Her voice went tremendously quiet, a murmur just between them. "I need to know, right now. Do you have any problems with Ellis being gay? I'll need you to stay out of this if y-"

Coach couldn't raise his hands up fast enough, waving both. A sort of irritation crept into the quirk of his brow, though his voice was reassuring. "Girl, I taught boys' football and health class. You don't think I had young'uns ask me for help comin' out? Advice? I been through that shit already. That ain't my issue."

She gave a cursory glance over his face before nodding. "If you want to talk about everything... we can talk later. Can we please just be there for Ellis right now?" Letting her eyes lower, she pleaded, because the last thing Ellis needed was more arguing.

When the big man nodded curtly in acknowledgement, Rochelle turned to walk into the master bedroom with a short flick of her hand to indicate him to follow. He did, hanging his head faintly in a tired shake.

Ellis stood in the center of the room, hands fidgeting nervously on the hem of his shirt. His eyes tentatively darted between Rochelle and Coach as they entered, a tender balance to his expression. He'd stopped actively crying, but only by force of will, it seemed.

His eyes were threateningly wet.

"I-I'm sorry." he managed, softly. "I didn't mean tuh ruin things.. or get y'all involved." His eyes flickered shamefully toward Coach, fixating on his face without meeting his eyes directly. "'n... I'm sorry - I would've told you, but... he didn't want to, 'n'..."

The eldest survivor stepped forward, circling an arm around Ellis to place a hand on the back of his head. The younger man startled, eyes widening a little, as he was drawn against Coach's chest.

"You ain't got nothin' to be sorry fo'," he stated, simply. "You just quit that, a'ight? We'll get through this, like anythin'. It'll be a'ight." At Ellis' soft noise of uncertainty, Coach lowered his chin and uttered, "We love you, son."

When Ellis' body trembled, burying against his shoulder with a sudden and fractured sob, body practically wrenching with the force of it, Coach tightened his arm. The gesture brought Ellis into a hug, Coach's chin settling atop his head.

From the bed, Christophe slipped tiredly back, bracing his weight on a flat palm. He cocked his head, unable to resist blinking over Coach and Ellis with some bemusement. Whatever he thought, he didn't put it to an utterance, slowly easing himself back to lay on the bed with a quiet groan of pain under his breath.

Rochelle crossed her arms, setting an elbow against her inner forearm to prop her hand up and gently cover her mouth. She exhaled, closing her eyes, because watching Ellis cry into Coach's chest would have brought on tears and she couldn't afford to lose it.
"Guess we're gonna be sleeping upstairs on the couch, huh?"
Chapter 167

Nick hadn't made it one step in the bedroom before sliding to the floor. He landed hard on his rear, back braced on the door, staring ahead into the darkness. His eyes were wide, sightlessly riveted on the far wall.

His heart was not racing.

His mouth was not dry.

His chest did not ache.

None of those things were true. They could not be true, as long as he repeated them enough times to carve a track in his mind - dig a moat of pure will between him and the treachery of his body.

He slid a hand to cover his mouth, only to regret the motion when it brought the trembling of his fingers into harsh reality. "Fuck." he whispered, choked with the urge to get up and break something, break furniture, break the window, like the glass' sharp edge might shock him out of feeling. Break his fist into the wall.

He couldn't get his body to move to try any such thing, and maybe that was for the best. They'd have heard him, noticed, and wasn't he hiding from them in there? Wretched and huddled in the dark, primed and ready to run, because he couldn't stand to be under their attention. He shouldn't have let Rochelle convince him back into the house.

He hated it.

It was worse than just leaving, throwing himself to whatever fate awaited him, fighting alone.

But what was it, exactly? Having a house full of people knowing he sometimes fucked men, or how absolutely miserable Ellis had looked? How broken and tiny and shattered? The sound of him sobbing to Rochelle, voice barely holding together, had cut through Nick like - but that wasn't right. It had been hearing Ellis talk frankly and openly about their relationship, like it was something normal and commonplace, that had cut through Nick like a razorblade.

He was sure of that much. Wasn't he?

Allowing his head to tip back, touching the door, he closed his eyes. Nick inhaled, despising the way he could not do so smoothly. He wasn't sure of anything anymore. This was his punishment. His punishment for a moment of weakness, where he'd almost reconsidered everything, considered breaking all the rules he'd set for himself.

Where he'd stood in the loft, staring down the staircase, trying to convince himself not to go down, not to find Ellis, not to see if he was alright - because no good would have come of it. What would he do? At worst, he'd apologize and lie and pretend he'd changed his mind that they would be anything but a miserable wreck of a pair... at best, he'd try and offer useless comfort to a person he'd crumbled with his bare hands.

No good would have come of it, just like no good would have come of them together. Nick didn't have it in him to do it. Even if he could have pulled together the fractured scraps of feelings lurking around in his chest into something like love, did he really think he could make it with a man? Did he want to be that?
He'd never manage, and didn't Ellis deserve better? He and his ex-wife had deserved each other, but Ellis? If they died tomorrow, he could be comfortable in the knowledge that he hadn't stolen any more of Ellis than necessary. But what if they survived?

What if they survived, and Ellis felt stuck with him? Ellis was too kind, too sweet, too heartfelt. Nick was the manacle around his ankle dragging him under the surface. If there was even any slim chance they might survive, find rescue, make it out - what a waste it would be for Ellis to love a guy like him, who didn't even think he could love him back.

No good would have come of it, which did not explain why he had ended up standing in front of that door. If he could have found whatever part of him had caused him to make that walk down the stairs and to the bedroom door, he'd have dug it out with his nails. The part of him that couldn't have slept knowing Ellis was breaking down alone, and by his hand...

Only to discover he wasn't alone. And hadn't been for some time.

The violation came from such a visceral place, it was like he'd seen red, and only come to halfway outside. It was like awakening in a house of mirrors, surrounded by nothing but the mockery and scorn of a wall of warped faces. He just wanted to run, like gravity had changed and the air was suffocating him by simple, unyielding compression.

Ellis had betrayed him, and that was suddenly easier to handle.

He pushed away from the door, using his palm against it to shove himself until he reached his feet. Nick stepped into a walk, though his heels dragged on the carpet, and forced himself over to the single bed. He dropped the katana, not even caring to lean it against the wall or tuck it away, and let his body collapse onto the mattress, face-first. He hit so hard he clanked his teeth together, but couldn't muster up the energy to be irritated.

Would it hurt less tomorrow? Would he feel better? Would the sun rise and clear away the ferocious anxiety brewing in his gut? He didn't want to imagine walking out into the condo in the morning. Coach and Rochelle looking at him like he had blood on his hands, Ellis unable to look at him...

What did you expect? What did you expect, you fucking asshole? Did you think he'd sleep it off, be fine? That he'd be able to hide it from them even if they hadn't already known? No. You didn't think anything. You didn't think about anything. You never think. He lowered his chin, just enough to bury his face against the mattress, sucking in a muffled breath. When have you ever considered the consequences for anything? For anybody?

He raised his hand, sliding fingers against the side of his head - but they lifted further on their own until they carded furiously through his hair, pulling, clawing against his scalp. Why did you ever fucking get him involved in this? You knew he was stupid enough to think he -

He couldn't even think the words. Not even the voice in his head could, fueled by anger and self-hatred and a desperation to inflict pain on himself... because at least he could control his own misery. Deepen it. Stew in it.

You just wanted something good. You just wanted to steal a little warmth for a little while, because that's what you do. You crawl your way into people's lives, steal a little something, and then dig your way out. Fuck the consequences, right? Fuck everyone in your way.

And then that voice spat out what it knew would cut:
You'd never have made him happy, anyway.

If he buried his face hard enough into the mattress, he could almost pretend the world around him had ceased to be.
Chapter 168

It had taken some time for Ellis to fall asleep.

With Nick having holed up in the secondary bedroom, there was no choice but to go upstairs and camp out on the couches. Coach laid flat on the sofa with Ellis and Rochelle on either loveseat. It wasn't uncomfortable, but there was an odd silence between them. Nobody really knew what to say, though that was, perhaps, for the best.

Not talking kept Ellis' composure together, and he eventually drifted off, curled up tight against the armrest with a slumped exhaustion. The emotional turmoil had wrung him out, and he was left exhausted and hollow. Crying had risen dark circles under his eyes, and he looked almost ill.

The two older survivors remained in silence, some tacit unity in the way they merely sat, watching Ellis' chest rise and fall. The slower and deeper the motion grew, the more calm settled itself into Rochelle's chest. Watching him sleep was like some quiet reassurance that he'd be okay. That they would all, perhaps, be okay.

Though they'd intended to leave the windows mostly closed, for fear of revealing their position, Rochelle couldn't stand the claustrophobic atmosphere and had flung the curtains to the porch doors open. The cloudless night lit the air with unrestrained moonlight. It helped, a little, and the house was raised so high it didn't really reveal them to infected down in the street.

Eventually, Coach's attention shifted to her.

She merely sighed, at first, stretching her leg out to catch her heel against the coffee table. She didn't want to have the conversation, but it was due. Coach was due answers, and if she didn't calm him now, he might otherwise explode on Nick the following day. She'd brokered wary peace so far, and if anything happened to chase Nick out again, she wasn't certain she could do it a second time.

She inhaled, preparing for the worst. She knew he, more than anyone, would take issue with the promise she'd given Nick. He was undoubtedly chomping at the bit to go down and yell at the gambler, because that would definitely solve their -

"You okay, babygirl?"

Startled at that, Rochelle felt a gentle flicker of guilt as she forced a small smile. She shifted on her loveseat, crawling gently closer to the armrest to lessen the distance between them. Her eyes lingered on Ellis, ensuring they didn't disturb him. "Yeah. Just the last thing we needed, y'know?"

When he nodded, calmly, leaving it at that, she gave an insecure puff of air and continued. "I guess you want to talk about everything?"

Coach shot her a vaguely droll look, like she were being obvious, so she prompted: "How much did you... hear?"

The ex-football player shrugged his shoulders weightily, sliding a hand to rest flat on his gut. "'Nough. They been datin' in secret, you knew, Nick found out, blew his top. Now we got this shit to deal with, alongside everythin' else."

"Well... mostly." Rochelle cautiously slid her fingers to twine with each other, draping an arm over the armrest and letting her hands lay flat atop it. She put her jaw forward, sucking her cheek between her teeth to worry it for a moment. "That's true, but... Nick and Ellis broke up, I guess, first. Ellis told him he loved him, Nick freaked and ended it... I'm not really clear on the details. Everything fell apart from there."

He gazed at her, muted surprise flickering across his face. His voice lowered, passing a faintly concerned glance to the sleeping mechanic. Coach cuffed his knuckles against his lower lip, brushing there thoughtfully. "You think he does?"

She could only shrug, speaking gently. "Does Ellis love him? ... Yeah, I think he thinks so. But he's young, and who knows, y'know? ... Nick? I'm not sure. You know as much as I do on that front, if I'm being honest. I think Nick cares about him, but he's afraid, and I'm not really sure if that's just... him being afraid to let someone in, or... some closeted macho shit, or what." Her hand lifted tenderly, brushing fingertips over her temple in a small massage. "For all I know, he really was just - he really doesn't have any feelings for Ellis. Not love, and he's just so ashamed of it and ashamed of himself for getting Ellis' hopes up..."

Coach tilted his head, closing his eyes at that with a stiff grunt. "Don't much care why. He hurt Ellis real bad. If he cares, ain't lookin' like it."

A wince crossed her expression at that, canting her head. "Look, I... I know. Okay? You don't think I've been wracking my brain this whole time trying to decide if they were good for each other or not?" She palmed flatly over her forehead, a stressed motion. "Every time Nick hurt his feelings, or yelled at him, or closed him out, I thought - God, what kind of person am I to let this happen? ... And half of me felt like it wasn't my place, but there was a lot of my gut that said Ellis was happy, and they had a shot, and -"

He didn't interrupt her, exactly, but when her voice faltered, he interjected. "If I'd known, I'd have sat Ellis down a long time ago, had a real good talk 'bout this." Coach uttered, shaking his head in a slow wag. "Gotten him to rethink this shit. I hate sayin' I told you so, girl, but Nick ain't good fo' him. Don't know if Nick is much good fo' anyone. Man's already divorced, who knows what he did to his ex to make her -"

"Whoa." Rochelle jolted up off the armrest, straightening, voice going reflexively stern. "Whoa, now. That's a leap." The big man gave her a dubious look, but relented, allowing her to speak. "I don't know a whole lot, but I've picked up enough to know that's bullshit. He told me he actually wanted to commit to her. I think she hurt him, and whatever ended it, I really don't get the feeling she was all that heartbroken over it."

Some surprise traced Coach's face, turning his head to glance suddenly toward the stairs. "... I assumed..." he uttered, vaguely, trailing off for a beat before he caught himself, pushing back a little defensively. "You tellin' me you don't think he's to blame fo' nothin'? He's just a victim, heartbroke?"

Rochelle lifted a hand, flatly, forcing herself to relax back down. She gazed at Ellis, trying to moderate her voice back into a whisper. "I didn't say that. I just mean..." She trailed off, unsure at first, but then her eyes darted back to him, suddenly. "My relationship issues with Jacob are equally my fault. The way you talk about your ex makes it sound like you blame yourself. You gonna suddenly make everything about Nick's ex?"

The faintest hurt lined itself into Coach's face, just before he sighed, shaking his head in a relenting gesture. "A'ight, a'ight, point taken." Dully tilting his head, the eldest survivor passed her a blink, voice softening. "Relationship issues? You said you two were on an' off, but that sounds like somethin’ else...?"

Quickly, Rochelle raised her hand, waving it. "Not important right now. What's important is we get
He didn't look convinced, but canted his head in acknowledgement, remaining silent.

"I know you're angry. I'm angry too. But whatever the reasons, Nick is... not in a good place right now. We need to focus on keeping Ellis sane, and not ripping into Nick." She could tell he didn't like that idea - his eyes narrowed a twitch - but he said nothing. "None of us want him to storm off and get ripped apart by infected, especially Ellis. Even if we're angry at him. He's still our teammate; he's still Nick. We haven't given up on him yet, and I don't want to now." Her eyes lowered, gazing toward the ground, softening. "Not after everything."

Coach's arms crossed over his stomach, shoulders raising, a quiet discontent to his posturing. "An' if it turns out he's been playin' Ellis fo' a fool this whole time? Takin' advantage of him?"

Rochelle lifted her eyes to his face, a sadness twitching at her mouth, even as she maintained a steadiness to her voice. "Then I'll never forgive him. But if we chase him out, he's going to die. Are you comfortable sentencing someone to death? Nick? Because that's what kicking him out is."

When he didn't respond, at first, staring her down - she felt a surge of insecurity. Surely on that, at least, they could agree?

He dropped his gaze, eventually, weakening. The relief that flooded her was a tangible coolness, because she wasn't sure if she could handle having that argument. "Course not. I don't want that. Whatever he's done, that ain't what I want. Just don't want him hurtin' y'all, an' I hate how this all turned into him havin' the upper hand. He can just threaten to leave, and we all shut up, he ain't got to deal with the consequences?"

"Yeah, I know." Rochelle gently squinted her eyes, exhaling. "It was the only thing I could think of to get him back inside..." She curled her tongue against the roof of her mouth, delicately, shaking her head. "But, look. The only thing I can promise isn't going to help is yelling at him. If he doesn't close up more, he'll just run again. So believe me, as much as I want to go and tear him a new one, all that'll do is make things worse."

Coach gazed at her, and his question was clear in his eyes: Then what do we do?

She shrugged her shoulders, and it was with a weighty exhale that she tipped her head to snuggle into the crook of her arms. "For now, you get some sleep. Let tomorrow's problems be tomorrow's problems. I'll keep guard for a while."

Though his glance was dubious, he relented, shrugging his weight against the couch and settling his chin against his chest. He let out a gruff sigh, slouching down with no small exhaustion. "Y'all kids are gonna run me ragged." he muttered, dryly, and it was enough to make Rochelle laugh a little, even as it made her distantly sad.
When Ellis felt himself awaken, there was a blissful and bedraggled moment where he forgot where he was. Being on the loveseat confused him, and he couldn't remember why he'd arrived there or what had happened -

And then it all came back to him in a flood. Like ice water dumped over his head. His chest constricted, sunk again into the realization that he and Nick were no longer together. Worse, that Nick hated him. No more sly grins cast his way. No more quiet utterances of 'El', or 'Ace', or 'Fireball', or any of the so-close-to-petnames he'd grown so used to. No more soft touches in a private moment. No more chances to look into those green eyes and wonder just what the heat behind them meant.

He felt empty, and yet full to the brim with such an aching, cottony sensation. He hurt all over, til he felt like he might snap in half if he attempted to get up, just by the pure force of his own movement.

Was this what heartbreak felt like? Or was it what Chris felt, missing an entire piece of himself?

That thought stirred him into motion, reluctantly, because it was petty of him to compare himself to Christophe - even if that didn't feel so far off. He grasped onto the back of the loveseat, dragging himself slowly upright, rubbing his eyes to clear them of the sharp remnants of sleep and tears.

As he got upright, he blinked around the room, faintly surprised to find the other sofas empty. He had to twist at the waist to locate Rochelle, hunched over the counter. She had a blank gaze down onto the surface, the only noise escaping her being the soft sound of chewing and, slowly, the crinkle as she reached into a bag of trail mix to draw out a little more.

Ellis tiredly propped himself against the back of the loveseat, eyes flickering over her face. He couldn't help but wonder what she was thinking. Was she thinking about him? Or Nick? Or something entirely different, just one more worry atop the mountain that had them cornered in at every side? He frowned, softly, under a soft wave of regret.

If he'd just kept his mouth shut...

"Yeah." he managed, startled when his voice cracked in the center. He cleared his throat, swallowing, averting his eyes as Rochelle gave him a sympathetic pinch of her brows. "Kinda exhausted." He forced a smile when she pushed the trail mix bag out to him, taking it, even as he felt a general sinking sensation at the idea of eating. His throat still felt so closed up, he wasn't sure he could swallow if he tried. "Thanks."

She swept around to the side of the loveseat, taking up a perch on the armrest. Her head tilted, but she glanced toward the glass doors rather than look at him, and he mimicked her. The sun was up, though there was still such a golden tint to the light that it must've been just past dawn. "Coach is downstairs getting Chris something to eat, and his pills."

Ellis nodded, slowly. He reached into the bag, plucking up a small chunk of chocolate from the mix and popping it into his mouth. He didn't bother to chew or swallow, just tucked it under his tongue and let it melt, closing his eyes to the sweet and heady flavour. It soothed him, though only a little.

"I had an idea."

He blinked, glancing toward her uncertainly. A smile lingered at her lips, and he couldn't help but turn to face her, cocking his head.

Rochelle splayed up a hand, fingers spread. "Yesterday, when I realized I didn't know your last name... We're all probably missing a lot of information about each other. If we get rescued, if the government is taking refugees... we might get separated. Finding each other might be hard if we don't even know our full names."

A little frown touched his lips, nodding as she spoke. "Yeah... I guess I didn't think 'bout it like that."

Pointing a finger in an eager gesture, Rochelle leaned forward. She reached out, snatching up a small notepad from the coffee table, along with a small black pen. Ellis hadn't even noticed them laying there, and he squinted curiously as she drew the pad against her thigh, flipping it open. "See, Coach and I already did it..."

The first page was adorned with two entries, the first broad yet precise.

Rochelle Maureen Palmer

The second was compact and rounded lettering.

"Maureen?" he couldn't help but utter, looking up to find her face immediately drawn in a displeased squint. Ellis ducked his head, a fragile grin sneaking onto his lips much despite himself.

She threw her free hand up, shaking her head. "My grandmother's name. Believe me, I wanted to change it for a long time. Teenage girl with that for a middle name...? Then my grandmother passed away, and... I guess I understood why people do that." When his grin faded in sympathy, she smiled at him, taking up the pen in her grip and tapping on the page. "Anyway, I thought we could all put our information down, memorize it. Then if anything happens, we can identify each other."

Ellis gazed down at the page, a softness touching his features. He felt a heavy conflict - because his instinct was to jump at the idea, jump at the chance to more securely know they wouldn't lose contact... but it was tempered by the awareness that Nick would want nothing to do with the plan.
Hadn't that been the start of their argument, anyway? Nick didn't want to stay with them.
Didn't want to stay with him.

Coach had been right, after all.

He could see Rochelle's hesitance rise when his silence extended, grew, and he forced himself to smile. There was nothing he could do, and no matter what happened, it wasn't like he wouldn't want to stay with Coach and Rochelle. "It's a good idea," he managed to say, aware it sounded choked and light, and he quickly reached to take the pen from her.

Ellis chewed on his lip, applying pressure to chase away the tingle of tears hidden just behind his eyes. He'd cried so much in the past half-day, he didn't even know if there were any tears left in him. He was determined not to. Snapping the pen open, he carefully set the tip against the page, continuing on just below Coach's.

Ellis Tyler Mayfield

"How did you end up with such a cute name?" Rochelle murmured, stretching an arm to sling it around his neck. He had to shuffle his legs around to meet her in the embrace, putting his feet on the ground. A smile transiently passed over his face when she landed a smooch on his temple. "Thanks, baby. See? Now we can memorize it, and if anything ever happens, we'll have an easier time finding each other."

He couldn't help faltering, touching fingertips on the blank space left at the bottom of the notepad. There was just enough room... Ellis could remember Nick's name and his birthday from when he'd looked in his wallet, but that wasn't the point.

"Nick ain't on here." he murmured, unable to help himself. He frowned down at the page, feeling a surge of pain, crisp and fresh. He was far too tired to cry anymore, but his jaw tightened down to bite on his cheek as if to fight off tears. He lowered his chin as Rochelle raised her hand to tuck some wild curls behind his ear.

She tipped her head to catch his gaze, smiling firmly. "We'll convince him. Okay? Give it some time."

Ellis nodded, knowing the gesture came off insincere. He took the pad from off her lap, slipping sideways and out of her grasp. She let him go, watching him collapse to lay flat on the loveseat, back braced on the armrest. The Georgian pulled the notebook up to his face, eyes tracing the other two entries.

"I'm gonna sit and read it a few times, if that's okay." he murmured, softly. It wasn't that he didn't want to talk to her. He just didn't want to talk to anyone, at least for a time. Her attention made him nervous, like he needed to pretend to be okay.

He wasn't.

Rochelle patted a hand against his shin, nodding her head. If she sensed his ulterior motives, she gave no indication. Standing back up on her feet, the woman stretched a little with a sigh. "Okay. I'm gonna go check on Coach and Chris. Maybe if you feel like it, later, you could come and talk to him? You seem to really cheer him up."
She didn't really wait for an affirmation, flashing him a smile before turning away and retreating to the staircase.

In her absence, Ellis let the notepad slip to his chest, frowning after her. His eyes slid half-shut, exhalting tightly. At the same time he relaxed... he also stiffened, tension clawing a discontent through his body. He just wanted to go back to sleep. Sleep was easier than having to think.

He missed Nick already.

Rochelle took the stairs two at a time, hand balanced on the railing. She slipped down onto the first floor, crossing the hallway gently. Her eyes slipped to examine the bedroom Nick had taken for his own - there hadn't been a peep from him all night. She wasn't inclined to be concerned, not yet. He'd have to come out for food and water at some point, whether he liked it or not.

Passing by, Rochelle stepped into the master bedroom, tilting her head as she passed the threshold.

Christophe was completely upright. He'd slipped his legs off the edge of the bed, socked feet flat on the carpet, body hunched forward. His hand was braced on his thigh to take the weight of his torso, face trapped in a heavy wince. "S-sí. I think so," he uttered under his breath.

Coach nodded, patiently, glancing back as Rochelle gently tapped a knuckle against the door in greeting. "Hey, babygirl. Just talkin' to Chris 'bout takin' a walk around the room. If we need to move, best if it ain't the first time he's on his feet."

Unable to resist a frown, Rochelle glanced toward the Spaniard. He flashed a small smile at her, but all the expression did was betray the trembling fear bleeding into his eyes. "Are you sure?" she questioned, worriedly. "I don't want to stress him out for no reason..."

Christophe lifted his fingers in a vague gesture, palm still flat against his dirtied cargo shorts. "I did not lose my leg. Just do not ask me to... como - ay, juggles? Por favor." Rochelle was struck by the urge to laugh, but uncertainty stopped her until he smiled again, and sturdier that time.

She did laugh, then, raising a hand to cover her mouth hesitantly as she advanced a step or two. "Okay... Carefully, though. Just a test run." When he nodded, Rochelle stretched out both hands, offering them in a slight clamshell to grasp his hand. He slipped his hand into her palm, gripping there as she gripped back, and Coach placed a hand at his lower back.

Carefully, the Spaniard straightened, resting some considerable weight on them as he pushed flat onto his feet. There was no small tremble to his frame as he came to his full height, a strained inhale touching his breath. The muscles in his neck were flexing, and judging by his wobble, he was instinctively trying to thrust out his missing arm to counterbalance himself.

Judging by the unpleasant frown touching his lips, it hurt and upset him.

"You a'ight, boy?" Coach questioned, examining him carefully. Chris gave a silent nod, stubbornly moving to take a step forward. They moved with him, and as he proved fairly stable, Coach pulled his hand away. Rochelle kept a grip on his hand, and carefully walked back with him until she hit the wall.

Though his breath was stuttered, his eyes were fairly bright as they came to a stop, his gaze dropping to glance down his form. "It is... strange. I can still feel it, yet I am... lighter. Inclinado." He glanced up, hesitantly, honey-brown eyes flickering between Coach and Rochelle. "Do not know if I can run without falling."

Rochelle couldn't help a light sigh, nodding. "Well, hopefully you won't have to run. Fingers crossed." He passed a faint smile at her, eyes flickering down to glance at their linked hands. She meant to continue, but he carefully twisted his wrist, catching his fingers around her palm and baring the scabbing slice across her palm.

He glanced over it, a frown dragging his entire expression into a mournful and quiet anguish. The expression startled her a little, and she curled her fingers hesitantly, cocking her head. "Uh... it's nothing." she managed, lowly, gently pulling her hand free from his grip. "I'm okay."

The Spaniard did not protest, merely nodding. When she reached to brace his elbow as he began to turn, he waved her off, and she merely watched carefully as he started to gingerly pace the distance to the bed. His balance was still wobbled, arm stretching slightly to one side, and his expression was caught in bemusement. Like he'd lost some intrinsic understanding of his own body.

As he walked, he murmured, "How is Ellis?"

That made Rochelle laugh a little, a kind of sad humour touching her expression. She was faintly amazed at how readily concerned he was over the Georgian, considering he had plenty of things to worry about.

"He's... he's making it. It's too early to tell, really." A flash of inspiration struck, like lightning, and it was all she could do to keep her voice casual, innocuous. "He could probably use someone to talk to, though, if you wouldn't mind letting him come in and chat with you. Boy's a little sad."

Christophe nodded his head, reaching the edge of the bed and stretching down his hand to grasp at it, a weary tremble touching his frame, as if he were exercising rather than simply walking. "Claro." he uttered in strained affirmative. "I would like the company, ¿sí?"

Rochelle couldn't resist a self-satisfied little grin, one Coach caught and gave her an inquisitive glance over.

It was the perfect opportunity. Both of the men needed a friend, some distraction, and maybe Chris was just uninvolved enough to help where she couldn't.
Nick didn't want to awaken. It wasn't a choice, so much as that when something disturbed him - footsteps, he was sure, in the loft - his mind instantly snapped awake. And once it was alert, there was no deactivating it.

He did not move, but his attention became a wild and frenzied static. Every sound set his teeth on edge, waiting for it to approach his room, waiting for someone to knock or open the door. He prepared every time for conflict, coiling, only to have the sounds fade away.

Even when his stomach began to complain, Nick remained still on the bed. He had no interest in leaving the room, if he had to starve there. Opening himself up to the group's attention was the last thing he wanted to do. He'd rather just waste away in the bedroom, end up a corpse for some other survivor to stumble upon and wonder what had ended him.

Better that than walk out and interact with them.

Inhaling sharply, he slowly rolled onto his back, placing a hand against his chest. He hated the feeling huddled there, hated the cornered sensation that raised his hackles. It didn't shock him, exactly, but he'd hoped to never be in the position to find out what it felt like.

No one had ever outed him before, not like this. He'd never had to face the truth in the open, raw light of day, where someone knew who wasn't the other half of his trysts. Not even his ex-wife knew. It had never been a part of him, never settled in as something he was defined by.

He felt like the material of his being had been whittled away, revealing the raw and ruined nerve under it all. He'd prefer to be seen as an asshole who took advantage of Ellis, a cruel and heartless man, than a -

What? Bisexual? Worse, gay, when that couldn't be in any way the truth? That just grated at him. He felt lessened by it, weakened, that label he had never wanted stuck to him. He'd long since relegated his interest in men to something secret and transient, because it was never anything he wanted to pursue. I learned my lesson on that one a long time ago.

It wasn't about morality. Even if he had believed in any higher power beyond karma and luck, it wouldn't be the first or last sinful deed he'd committed. It was about his image. His reputation. The way people would look at him differently. He shouldn't have given a shit, but when had he ever really not cared? Wasn't everything he did a careful balancing act, filtering and processing himself into something uniquely and precisely unpalatable, so those around him would leave him alone?

If they thought him an irredeemable asshole, he could handle that. He was trying to be, so therein lay his success.

If he offered out something genuine, only to be rejected... well. There was no sense in letting anyone have that power over him.

He was a fake. Just a pile of lies and misconceptions in the shape of a man. Why did anyone think he was capable of a stable relationship, and least of all with Ellis, who needed things he could never be? He couldn't pretend not to care. He cared, more than he wanted to.

More than he ever wanted to.

Footsteps down the stairs made his head lift. He listened, despite himself, tracing their passage. He didn't know how he knew they were Ellis', but he did. Maybe the gait, or the weight. They paused at the bottom of the stairs, and he could do nothing but wonder after what look graced Ellis' face as he gazed toward the bedroom.

Was it sad? Thoughtful? Did he look on the verge of tears, or the verge of breaking into the bedroom and confronting him? Did he look betrayed - infuriated, perhaps? Nick preferred the latter.

Hate me, kid. Please. It's easier like that.

Then the footsteps continued, moving up the downstairs hallway to the main bedroom. He heard the hum of voices, too muffled by the wall to discern any words - then a laugh, quiet and mild and definitely Ellis'. Christophe and he were getting on, it seemed, for the foreigner to make him laugh so soon.

Why did the sound hurt?

Why did it make him a little angry?

He wasn't jealous. That would be stupid, and selfish. Manipulative and abusive, to push him away and then spite him for having any kind of good moment - and isn't that just like you? Jesus. Don't you want him to forget about you? Move on; Wasn't the whole point to get him to give up on you, go back to his life? Come on, Nicolas. Get your fucking act together.

Groaning faintly, Nick allowed a hand to flatten over his face. He pressed fingertips into his eyes, massaging out the headache building in his sinuses. The window just beside the bed called to him. He could crack it open and leap out. It was an 8, maybe 9 foot drop to the lawn. Landing flat might twist an ankle, but if he rolled, he'd make it. Because sneaking out like a rebellious teenager would reflect well on him, he was sure.

When the hum of voices continued, Nick thrust himself up off the bed. An irritated energy drove him to movement, storming across the bedroom and toward the door. He grasped the knob, twisting it with a smooth pressure. He eased it open just an inch, careful to move slow and easy so it made no noise.

As the door cracked, the voices came into clarity.

"- hope so. It'd be real cool if you could come fight with us." Ellis was in the middle of saying, voice tender and raw. Nick could hear the tightness to it, the insecurity. He knew Ellis well enough to know the difference between it and his regular voice, and there was something rough and injured in the tone. "I bet you could do it."

The Spaniard laughed a little, hesitantly, voice a rolling murmur. "You have more faith than me, hermano. I do not feel like I can fight." A sadness bled through, real and grief-stricken. "No good to you all like this."

"Aw, that ain't true. We like you just fine. And you wouldn't be fightin' alone or nothin'. We'd have yer back if anythin' happened."

Nick couldn't help but snort, letting the door shut gently, their voices relapsing into muffled hums. He didn't want to listen to the conversation, them continuing on as if nothing were wrong. Cheering each other up. He definitely didn't want to find out if it would work.

Stalking back toward the room's window, Nick leaned forward. He flicked the shutters open, staring out toward the fencing. Leaving wasn't an option. He wanted to get out from under the consequences of his own actions, sure, but out of the dark cloud of panic, he knew as well as anyone that leaving would be a death sentence. One Hunter, or even just one sizeable horde and he'd be dead.

Even more than that - he didn't know if he wanted to. After all, whether he'd wanted to or not, hadn't he grown a little used to the bunch? He wouldn't know where to go, what to do. He'd fight, sure, but why? Just for the animal need to keep on living?

Surviving alone suddenly sounded lonely.

Growling under his breath, Nick picked up a pace up and down the length of the room, sliding his hands into his slacks pockets. He felt trapped, suddenly, which only grated at him more; he should have just strode out and sat on the couch and emblazoned his apathy on him like armour.

But he couldn't do it, and fuck if that didn't infuriate him. Since when had he started to care so much about what they thought of him? When had he lost the ability to withstand their disapproval? They'd weakened him.

He was weakened, and he didn't know when it had happened.

Nick kept his body moving, because if he didn't, he might pull out a cigarette and start smoking. He only had six or seven left, and if he started, he might not stop. Pacing back and forth, he let his fingers clench and loosen in his pockets. It somehow reminded him of being in a jail cell.

The abrupt and distant bark of an engine made him halt where he stood, for just a beat. He moved on instinct, jolting to the window and shoving his hands under the blinds. Shoving the window up a little, the plastic squeaking as it rolled upwards, Nick leaned down to hover his face toward the opening.

The sound was coming from the other side of the house, but he could still hear it. It was, he was sure, the same sound from the other day. It guttered and roared in uneven patterns, wavering, and it was approaching. He was confident it was approaching.

As Nick closed the window with a flat palm pressed against the glass, he lowered his chin. He could hear the alarm raising throughout the house, footsteps moving fast across the loft and Ellis' voice hollering in concern from the master bedroom.

He barely listened. He couldn't parse it, mind whirling, because he had to make a choice.

There hadn't been enough time for him to recover. He wanted more time, to find balance and work through his state of mind. If he left the room now, he'd still be raw and sore and unpredictable, even to himself. He didn't know if he could look Ellis in the eyes, let alone stand to be around the team.

Maybe it's just a false alarm, and they won't need me, anyway.

He wanted to believe it, but with his luck, it was unlikely.

With a taut sigh, Nick advanced to the door, and grabbed the doorknob. He hesitated... for just a beat... before turning it sharply.

Fuck it.
Ellis had already reached the downstairs front-facing window by the time Nick opened the door. As he stepped out, the Georgian startled, slanting a glance over his shoulder to look in his direction. He didn't want to meet gazes any more than Nick did, it seemed, as his attention was angled downward.

He didn't say anything, and Nick matched his silence.

There wasn't time for it to drag on, as Coach and Rochelle thundered down the staircase to join them.

"Shit. That sounds really close." Rochelle muttered, slipping up to the window. She reached to grab the drawstring to tilt the blinds, squinting through them out into the street. She didn't acknowledge Nick's presence in the slightest, resting a hand against the wall. "I can't believe they're not attracting a horde with that..."

Coach stood at a slight distance, arms slipping to a cross over his chest. Discontent read clearly in his posture, not that Nick was surprised to see it - if anything, he was surprised that Rochelle had apparently convinced him to keep his mouth shut.

Ellis' head shook carefully. He practically whispered to her, head lowering, as if afraid to speak. "It... it sounds like stock pipes. Ain't that much louder than a car, just must be real clo-"

He didn't have the words out before Rochelle jolted, startling, a hand clasping over her mouth. The wheedling sound of the engine hit a fever pitch, and from between two condos across the street buzzed a slim black blur. The motorcycle crossed into the main road, hitting the turn too fast as it made to straighten out, and it toppled.

As the bike flipped onto its side and skidded, grating against the concrete, it flung its cargo - two passengers, and a sizeable duffel bag that had been loosely lashed to the back.

The two figures hit the ground rolling, cast in opposite directions in the crash. They were dressed in matching motorcycle helmets and riding leathers, thick Kevlar jackets adorning their torsos and protective guards strapped over their shins and knees. The protection did not stop the crash from hurting, it seemed, as they lay where they landed for a few seconds, curled into almost fetal positions.

"Lordy." Coach uttered, closing the distance to stand behind Rochelle, leaning in to look past her and out at the strangers. "They a'ight?"

With a heavy surge, one of the figures crawled up onto hands and knees. They carefully picked its way over to their partner, placing a hand on the fallen shape's leg in a few quick pats - and the still-prone person raised a hand in a weakly reassuring gesture. Clasping hands, then, the two hauled themselves to their feet, stumbling and stiff.

Ellis couldn't help but lean himself forward, squinting toward them, voice raising to a normal level as it grew a little fascinated. "Think so... They look like ladies, don't they?" It was hard to tell, with the helmets obscuring their faces and the thick jackets and protective gear bulking their frames - but Rochelle nodded.

"Kinda." she admitted, watching as the two figures straightened up, revealing one to be a good few inches taller than the other. "Lucky they didn't smear themselves on the pavement with that..."
Attached to the shorter woman's back by a brown leather strap crossing her body in bandolier style was a long-handled brush hook. The blade on it was wide and curved backwards at the tip, covered by a laced-up sheath to cushion the edge where it threatened to hit the backs of her thighs.

The taller woman had a wooden baseball bat hooked under her belt, lined along its length by a few strips of what looked like sheet metal, pocked by nailgun marks where it had been attached to the weapon. The bands of steel encircled the wood like reinforcing brackets.

The taller figure took her partner's arm and dragged her to spin, examining her back as if to look for injuries. When the shorter woman tried to coax her off with a shrug, she relented... only to get blindsided by a smack on the side of her helmet by her smaller compatriot.

They started arguing, gesticulating out their arms in vague threatening motions. Judging by the way the shorter woman kept pointing a gloved hand at the bike, it was about the crash. Rochelle couldn't resist a vaguely bewildered glance over at Ellis. He returned it, shaking his head.

"Not... sure if I should be laughin', or worried..." he muttered, uncertainly. The argument made them seem a little more human, but at the same time, the show of anger worried him. The last thing he wanted was to run into more aggressive types - but wasn't that presumptuous to think? Having an argument didn't mean they were murderers.

It was then that Nick spoke, just a quiet utterance, voice rough. "Worried."

Despite the innocuous nature of the statement, Ellis flinched, lowering his gaze to stare toward the floor. It was enough to flare agitation in Nick's chest - as if he didn't deserve it. As if he hadn't brought it on himself, asked for it. Stop interacting with the kid. All you're doing is making yourself angry, and him miserable.

Rochelle reached up a hand to point, voice raising. "Shit. They did attract some stuff. " As she said it, a few infected came sprinting out onto the road, two from the same alleyway the motorcycle had fled through and four from scattered directions. One came running from alongside the survivors' condo.

The infected shrieked as they ran, and it was instantaneous that the strangers reacted. In swift unison, they tore their weapons from their holsters, the shorter woman taking a second to yank the sheath free of her axe. She stuffed it into the deep pocket of her thick-fibre jacket, and got a firm two-handed grip on the long axe handle.

The whole weapon from hooktip to hilt end was a good four and a half feet long. She held it tight, swinging it loosely at her side to warm up - and as a zombie reached her, she let it arc up in the air... then drop, momentum carrying it in a horizontal slash. The hooked blade made such an impact into the infected's chest that it sheared through its ribcage and implanted itself.

Just as quick, the woman yanked back with her body weight, and the curved hook took flesh with it, disemboweling. The creature collapsed, guts spilling in a flood of black and red, snarling and stretching up its arms in vain fury as its body failed.

She readied for the next one, slinging the axe forward as if it were a lance, bracing her hands on it to meet the zombie's force as it ran senselessly at her.

The baseball bat-toting survivor had it up at her shoulder, and she adopted a bouncing stance on her feet as she squared up to the infected racing at her. As it came close, she lashed out, and the bat caught the infected on the side of its face. Its head cracked violently to the side, body continuing on even as its neck seemed half-broken.
She kicked it hard in the gut with her boot heel, shoving it back so she gained the breathing room to turn to face another zombie that had closed the distance. Raising her bat over her head, she brought it down flat on the creature's head, crushing its skull open in a splatter of gore.

The infected with the injured neck recovered faster than she did, however, and it was abruptly on her. Its hands went clawing for her face, but merely squeaked and slid on the surface of her motorcycle helmet. She shoved up her arms to push it away, dropping quickly to take a swing at its knee.

The bat splintered its leg, sending it crumpling to one side, and it was shortly toppling to the ground. When it gave a snarl and dug its fingers against the asphalt, stubbornly trying to drag itself toward her, she slammed her bat down against the back of its head.

What was left of its neck must have snapped free of its spine, internally, because it went suddenly and abruptly still.

The two women slid closer to one another, facing the couple remaining infected together, and it was with a familiar ease that they took them down. As the last infected hit the road, unmoving, they seemed to collect themselves. The taller woman spun her bat in her hands as if to shake off the gore, head shaking in time.

They returned to talking, slowly stepping back toward the motorcycle. There was something conciliatory in the taller woman's posture, scratching up at her shoulder. When she leaned down to start hauling the motorcycle upright, shaking her head, her teammate stepped to help her.

Rochelle slid her arms into a careful cross, eyes still on them. "I'm... not sure," she uttered, warily. "Maybe we... should greet them. They seem like... regular people, for what that's worth anymore... And if they're not, I mean, we outnumber them and we have more guns, so surely we can just chase them off."

Allowing a shrug, Coach reached up to rub at his jawline. "We talked about this. We ain't doin' nothin' without a vote. They might help us. Might attack. Might leave an' come back, try an' rob us. But we gonna vote, and abide the vote, yeah?"

There was silence, then, as they all gazed out on the two strangers fighting to get the bike upright and the duffel bag placed back on its back end, hooking it in with what looked like bungee cables. Nick could barely resist a snarl, sliding his hands into his pockets. "Look, I realize you guys are desperate for new friends, but why take the fucking risk? We don't need them. Just keep your fucking mouths shut and they'll move on."

"What if we do?" Rochelle abruptly retorted, turning her head to glance at him. He didn't want to - but their gazes met before he could look away, and he had no choice but to hold the stare. "What if they know something that would help? Something about the military, or the evac?"

Ellis placed a hand hesitantly against the wall, thumbing at the blinds in a nervous gesture. "I... I dunno. They don't know we're here... maybe it's best tuh just... let 'em go. If they ain't friendly, we'll be puttin' Chris in danger, too..."

Thrusting up a hand in a vague gesture, Nick shook his head. He squarely avoided directly responding to Ellis, glancing at Coach, instead. "You want to let more fuckers in where they can hurt us?" The big man did not return his gaze, and Nick could tell he was biting back anger. "I lied to you guys with the Angels. I'm being real straight-forward now. This is a bad fucking idea."

Coach slipped him a small look, and past the restrained anger there was a small reluctance there, like he didn't disagree. He inhaled, and closed his eyes. "Who's for goin' out there? I say no."

Nobody responded, at first, beyond Nick shaking his head firmly. Both Ellis and Rochelle glanced up at the window, hesitantly, and he chewed at his lower lip. She noticed the gesture and reached over to touch his arm, gently. "What are you thinkin', honey?" He shook his head, watching the women as one of them toed the kickstand of the bike down and leaned against it.

She was gesturing, one arm stretched out wide to indicate something off in the distance, and her partner had her arms crossed, a hip cocked.

Ellis wasn't sure what made him glance up. All he knew was his eyes darted toward movement, and his body stiffened - there was a Hunter crouched on the roof of a house opposite them. It was coiled down into a tiny shape, watching the two survivors with intense interest, walking itself back and forth as it seemed to seek out the best footing to leap.

He didn't know what broke in him. Maybe it was just everything that had happened lately, or maybe very specifically what had happened the night previous. All he knew was he couldn't watch someone die. Couldn't stand there and allow it to happen. He'd never forgive himself if they stood aside and watched that Hunter pounce and tear into one of the strangers.

The vote didn't matter. Nothing mattered, except for the fact that he was a good person.

He was determined to be.

He bolted, grabbing the sniper rifle from where it was leaned next to the front door. He heard his teammates give a startled outburst at the motion, heard Rochelle give a "What -" right before she realized the same thing he had and shouted, "Oh, God, there's a Hunter out there -"

Ellis fully processed as Nick hissed out a furious, "So what?! Great! Let it take them out!", and Coach hollered his name. He processed all of it, and didn't care.

Shoving open the front door, Ellis jumped out, flinging himself out onto the front porch. He raised the sniper rifle, getting the stock against his shoulder and his gaze slanted through the scope, aiming squarely at the Hunter. He swore it looked up at him, just as he pulled the trigger.

The bullet missed its head, entering in through its shoulder and carving a path through its body, with gruesome results. It collapsed, clawing against the roof, its own wild struggling tipping it over the edge and sending it falling down to the ground.

There was a moment of peace, where Ellis felt nothing but a faint sense of relief, of rightness - and then the two women went sprinting to take cover behind the condo's fence, disappearing, and several pairs of hands grabbed him to drag him bodily back into the house.
Ellis found himself pinned to the wall, Coach's broad hand flat on his chest, holding him there with a gentle force. Nick and Rochelle both shifted to join them against the wall, the gambler moving to align himself with the edge of the window and look outside.

"God fucking damnit!" he snarled, head shaking, gaze darting to scan for any sign of movement. "What happened to fucking majority rules, Coach?!!"

Slowly, Ellis lowered the sniper rifle to point at the ground, eyes gently closing. The anger didn't surprise him, even if it hurt, a little - not because Nick was angry, but because he didn't even direct his anger at Ellis. He felt terribly small. Did Nick not even care to talk to him anymore?

Rochelle grabbed for her pistol where it sat under the waistband of her jeans, tension touching her voice. "Shut up, Nick. It's over. Now we deal with it." She stepped back toward the front door, slipping into the threshold and hovering just at the edge of poking her head out. "Do you see them?"

"Of course not." he retorted, bitterly. "They got fucking alerted of where we are and scattered, and now we're fucking surrounded."

Ellis' eyes reopened, lowering to the ground as his fear was confirmed. Nick was managing to yell at him without acknowledging him at all. He was being ignored, suddenly, and that was almost worse than being the focus of his anger. "I'm sorry." he whispered, roughly. "I couldn't let 'em get hurt."

Releasing him, Coach exhaled deeply. He drew a hand across his forehead, catching sweat there before it could do more than bead up. He met Ellis' gaze, firmly, though not aggressively. "Son, next time we're makin' a choice, you make it with us. Hear? That was dangerous, what you did."

He nodded in understanding, just a soft twitch, and Coach stepped away.

"They ain't gonna leave if they think a sniper's got a bead on 'em." The health teacher gestured toward Nick, flatly, and the gambler slipped him a snarling twitch of his brow. "Last thing we need is them chargin' in here, locked and loaded, just 'cause we scared 'em. Let's just holler, see if they respond."

Nick did not protest, green eyes flickering back to the window.

Inhaling, Rochelle steeled herself, hand flexing on her pistol as her other hand flattened against her sternum. "Okay. Okay." she murmured, just privately, self-soothing. Her eyes flashed nervously back over her teammates before she turned her chin and called out testingly, "Hello?"

There was a few beats of silence, where she chewed on her lip, waiting. It was only cautiously that a voice responded, echoing from somewhere over the fence, though it was difficult to pinpoint it. It was muffled, like she still had her helmet on, and there was a strained delicacy to it: an amicable edge that only served to make Rochelle visibly nervous.

"Hi. That was a pretty good shot." Words had lost their meaning, when it came to determining intent.
Ellis took a half-step forward, moving as if to slip next to Rochelle and talk, but Coach grabbed his arm to stop him, head shaking firmly. Rochelle glanced at them, frowning faintly, even as she responded. "Sorry if we startled you. We just didn't want that Hunter to make a move. Are you guys okay?"

That same voice spoke out - instantly, this time. "We're fine. Who's we? How many of you are there?"

Uncertainly, Rochelle passed a glance toward Nick. The quirk to her brow spoke to a kind of fear, as if she wasn't sure whether to tell the truth or not. He caught the look and merely nodded, so she inhaled carefully and called back honestly. "Five. Is it just you two out there?"

There was a heavy silence after that. Though it only lasted a few seconds, it was noticeable enough.

"Yeah." the woman responded, a tension entering her voice. If she was trying to mask the fact that Rochelle's answer intimidated her, she did not do so very well. "Pretty nice house you set up in. Got power? The grid's down around here, seems like."

Leaning suddenly over, Nick hissed urgently underneath the woman's questioning. "She's buying time. Where's her partner?"

Rochelle gave a faint nod, leaning just outside the doorway, eyes scattering a glance over their surroundings. The fence that had provided them security was now blocking their view, trapping them. "Why don't you two come in here, and we can talk?" Her voice grew just a little confident, forceful. "We shouldn't be shouting out here where the infected can hear us."

When the stranger responded with a wary tone, Nick began shaking his head furiously. "No offense, but we haven't really had the best luck with people in all this. How about you come out and we talk in the yard?" The gambler's head only shook more, and Rochelle made an agitated gesture of dismissal at him.

"Neither have we, okay? So let's just take a -"

Christophe had been silent, so much so she had almost forgotten he was awake and aware. It startled her, then, when he suddenly spoke, voice thin and raised in alarm. "Amigos, someone is climbing the back fence."

Rochelle jolted, looking up toward the master bedroom. Nick was instantly in motion, snatching the sniper rifle out of Ellis' hands too quickly to allow him time to protest. The Georgian tried to grab after it, yelping out a faint noise, but Nick was already out of reach.

In a swift and primal sprint, Nick went up the stairs, rifle held tight against his side. Rochelle gave a frustrated utterance after him, muttering, "Don't shoot her...!" The gambler did not give any indication he'd heard her - and if he had, whether or not he intended to obey. Coach seemed to take notice of that, because it was with a grunt of annoyance that he went silently charging after Nick.

With that, Rochelle clenched her hand into a fist, biting the inside of her cheek as the woman outside spoke again.

"Take a what? A breath? Look, dude, I agree. Let's all stay breathing." There was a pause - just a short one, enough time for an inhale - and then she added, voice thickening with abrupt and visceral desperation. "So let's just... look... you sound reasonable, okay? So I'm going to come into the fence, because right now my stupid, stupid baby sister is trying to flank -"

That startled Rochelle, eyes going a little wide as she flashed a confused look at Ellis. The woman being honest was the last thing she expected, and it set an entirely new sort of tension in her chest.

However, there was no time to react before Nick's voice shouted abruptly from the second floor, startling them both. "Don't fucking move! ... that's right, asshole. You just fucking come around to the front."

There was a moment of silence, and then the front fence gate was suddenly shoving open. The woman must have had the latch already undone with how fast she burst through it, brush-axe held close to the blade and flat against her side. Rochelle heard her intrusion and jolted out onto the porch. She pulled her pistol into her hands, aiming it up, one hand braced under her other hand.

Just as she'd gotten the sights focused in the woman's direction - she watched as the helmeted stranger dropped the weapon outright, throwing both hands up. "No! No, no no, don't hurt her, please!" Her voice got frantic, breaking in the center.

Rochelle felt Ellis behind her, his hand brushing against her back in a faintly frightened gesture. She couldn't take the time to reassure him, slipping forward to quick-step down the staircase, pistol trained on the woman. "Coach? Nick? You guys calm?" she shouted, because the last thing she needed was Nick losing it and shooting someone.

The gambler was the one to respond, however, shout just a furious hiss. "We're completely calm. Cool as a fucking cucumber, as long as this bitch keeps walking."

Slowly, the second woman came into sight around the side of the condo. She was moving with a delicate and careful posture, arms up, baseball bat dangling out of her left hand. As she approached, Nick and Coach came down the other staircase, the gambler's sniper rifle focused unerringly on her head. The stranger said nothing, carefully continuing on until she came within arms' reach of her partner.

The moment she did, the shorter woman jolted forward to grab her, snatching fingers in her jacket sleeve and dragging her close. "You stupid, stupid jerk - I thought you learned your lesson. God, why -" she hissed, furiously, barely audible under her motorcycle helmet. The taller woman's head started shaking, and she seemed to be trying to whisper to her partner, but Nick was already striding forward, rifle trained on them.

"Give me one reason not to fucking shoot you two right now, because that stunt was a pretty goddamn good reason to." he snarled, halting a good yard away from the two women. Coach slipped next to him, a heavy frown drawn on his features, glancing over toward Rochelle and Ellis.

Carefully, Rochelle raised one hand, even as she kept her pistol at the ready. Her tone was taut, but cool. "He's not wrong. If you're not looking for a fight, why go sneaking up on us?"

With a slow caution, the shorter woman stepped in front of her partner, raising both hands to carefully grasp her helmet. She dug thumbs in along the edge and shoved it up, freeing her head from it. The woman underneath was a brunette with a set of almond-shaped, muddy green-hazel eyes, wrought with an earnest panic.

"I'm sorry, okay? She's way too into this dog-eat-dog... crap. She didn't even have a gun, she was just... trying to... scare you. I'm sorry."

Frowning, Rochelle slowly turned to glance at Ellis. He blinked back, and an uncertainty passed between them. "That... ain't very nice, tryin' tuh sneak up on us." the youngest survivor managed, quietly, taking a gentle step to flank Rochelle. "We weren't doin' nothin' but -"
Coldly, Nick shifted his grip on his rifle and uttered, "Sorry doesn't mean shit." The way he cut Ellis off made the younger man flinch, gaze lowering. "Sorry doesn't tell me you fuckers won't try something again if we let you go. You -"

"Nick. We get it." Rochelle hissed sideways at him; it was her turn to interrupt, and Nick looked distantly furious even as he held his tongue. "Okay? Let's take a second and calm down. Can you let me handle this?" His continued silence, along with a petulant snort, was the only response.

The brunette stranger turned to look Rochelle directly in the face, chin tilting, slim mouth gone into a tense line. "I swear. If you guys just let us go, we'll go, and we won't come back. We've got some food in that duffel bag, you can have some, okay?" Her intensity struck sudden insecurity into Rochelle's chest.

They weren't supposed to be the group shoving guns in people's faces and threatening them. Was their fear justified, or had they just been so jaded by recent events as to lose sight of what mattered? Did she even know how to tell the difference anymore? Maybe these were just two frightened survivors who'd been through the same things as them.

"Look..." she managed, hesitantly, lowering her pistol. It wasn't like Nick didn't have them under his gun, anyway. "I... can sympathize with panicking, okay? We just went through a lot of shit with some survivors who nearly killed us, so... We're all paranoid right now."

The stranger nodded very slowly in careful understanding, and Rochelle continued with a vague glance over her teammates. Nobody seemed completely content - but neither did they interrupt her, so she took it as a cue to continue.

"We don't want to steal your stuff, we don't want to fight. We're trying to figure some shit out. Maybe we can have a conversation, without the weapons. As people, right? We're just people. The zombies are the bad guys, aren't they?" She couldn't help a hopeful lift of the corner of her mouth, meaningfully. "Maybe we can help each other."

The taller woman leaned forward, whispering urgently to her through her helmet. It was too quiet to be heard, but whatever it was, it widened the brunette's eyes. "You're kidding me -" she whispered back, genuine fear touching her voice when her partner shook her head.

Both women took a step back, and Nick's eyes went narrowed at the sudden shift. He advanced to close the gap, hand shifting on his rifle.

The brunette started to nod, some relief fluttering over her features and a slight crinkle of humour touching her prominent nose - only to startle openly when her partner grabbed for her arm.

Both women took a step back, and Nick's eyes went narrowed at the sudden shift. He advanced to close the gap, hand shifting on his rifle.

The brunette was not a talented liar, it seemed, and her face betrayed her; something was wrong. There was an edge of almost-laughter to her voice, raw with the same panic she tried to play off. "Look, okay, I... I think we should just go. We were just on a supply run, and -"

Rochelle gave a hesitant tilt of her head at the change, and Ellis lifted a hand in a soothing gesture. "'Ey, whut's goin' on?" he uttered, some suspicion entering his voice as he didn't miss the interaction. "We ain't lookin' tuh do nothin' but be friendly."

Suddenly, Nick advanced, jerking the muzzle of his rifle. "Take your helmet off." he ordered, tone cutting. When the brunette put an arm in front of her taller teammate as if to shield her, he only grew fiercer. "We're all friends here, right? And you've been awfully quiet so far." That helmeted face slowly shook, back and forth, the woman hunching backwards.
The refusal flashed fury into his expression, though it filtered down into something cold and fiercely curt. "Take. It. Off."

Coach slid a hand up as if to wave Nick off. His other hand held his double-barrel shotgun, where he must have grabbed it from its place upstairs while chasing Nick. "Maybe we should just send 'em off. We didn't want no trouble to begin with, seems like they don't either." He exhaled, jaw flexing carefully. "Ain't no reason to be fightin'."

Rochelle was just about to step forward, when Nick lunged.

The shorter biker shouted, making to block him, but Nick got a grip on the bottom edge of the taller woman's helmet. When both she and her partner tried to retreat, arms lifting defensively, all it did was tear the helmet off. He came away with it gripped in his hand, a triumphant sort of snarl touching his lips.

That snarl disappeared in a flash as the woman carefully reached up a hand to tuck rough blonde hair away from her face. It was unkempt and straw-straight, dark roots revealed along her scalp where the dye had begun to fade. She glanced up, hazel-green eyes in a perfect match for her sister's, and now tremendously familiar when set in a harsh face, highlighted by the metal stud in her brow.

The slim chip taken out of her left canine when she parted her lips in a weak and nervous pant only confirmed it: standing in an awkwardly defensive posture was the woman who had tried to mug them in front of a gas station.

Shock and slow realization fueled the moment of silence before all hell broke loose.

Nick was the first to react. He charged, and there was no indication in his posture that he meant to use the gun in his hand. He looked half ready to drop it, like he might just leap on the woman and strangle her. "You fucking piece of shit, I told you you'd regret showing your goddamn face to us again!"

Coach was on him just as quickly, grabbing an arm around his waist and holding him stationary like he were little stronger than a child. "Nicolas!" The gambler made a noise of utter fury, swinging an elbow back and colliding it directly with the side of his head - but the big man held firm.

Rochelle reflexively raised her pistol, only to drop it again. In the same moment she didn't trust the blonde, who'd proven herself a liar, part of her wanted to trust the older sister. There was something there, something sincere.

This was all secondary to the part of her that simply longed for friendly faces. Especially now...

As the two men struggled, the brunette stranger tensed the arm held defensively before her sister and began slowly walking them back. "I'm not gonna let you guys hurt her!" she shouted, voice heightening when the sign of her retreat only worsened Nick's anger.

"Hurt her?! Bitch tried to shoot me!" he snarled. There was some surprise that flashed over the shorter woman's face, glancing at her partner with a stricken disbelief, like she hadn't heard that part of the story. "And -" Whatever he was going to say cut abruptly off, in favour of a ferocious growl as he twisted his body.

Nick lifted a foot, like he might kick back at Coach's knee - and it was fear that made Coach recoil, releasing him to jolt back a step. Whether or not Nick would have actually gone through with it was left uncertain.

When Nick lunged forward, Rochelle threw herself in the way, hands going up as if soothing a rearing horse. Conflict raged on her expression as she clearly had her own thoughts on the situation, but she wasn't going to stand by and watch them escalate to violence. "Nick! For Christ's sake, let's take a breath! They're obviously scared!"

As he came up on her, trying to dart around her only to get matched step-for-step, Nick snapped off a furious, "Good! They should be, because I'm going to fucking tear them both a new -"

The blonde thief jerked her chin up in threat, hissing past her shorter companion. "Yeah? Try it, big boy! You and me, no guns, loaded or not!"

Before she'd even finished, her sister ferociously wheeled around on her, throwing gloved hands up in the air. "Rhiannon! Jesus... frick, can you try and not make this worse? Let's just go!" she practically pleaded, voice high-strung with concern and fear.

Hesitantly, sliding to step to the side, Ellis shook his head. He lifted flat hands to gesture, eyes slipping worriedly toward Nick. "Maybe that's best..." he mumbled, reluctantly. Did he even have the ability to calm the older man anymore? He remembered pulling Nick away from the brink of shooting the woman once before, soothing him away from blind rage.

Would Nick even listen to him now?
The two women managed a step further back, only to halt when a gurgled belching noise echoed from the street. The vast and bubbled shape of a Boomer waddled into view through the open fence gate, looking at them from a stiff and bloated face. It looked almost triumphant as its body wretched up and its mouth opened.

If there was anything that could break up the fight, it was that.

Everyone - Nick included - scattered to either direction at the sound of its guttering gag. The thick stream of green-yellow fluid sprayed from it with projectile aim, and though most of it hit the ground, not one of them was spared some of the splatter.

Some more than others: Nick's fighting had placed him and Coach directly in its path, and they did not escape it unscathed. Though it mostly struck Nick on the shoulder and side, Coach couldn't turn fast enough to avoid taking a blast of it to the face.

He roared, hands immediately going up to his face, and blindly stumbled down to take a knee. Past a groan of horror, visibly board-stiff in disgust at the mess soaking into his shirt, Nick staggered toward Coach to get a hand on his back. "Fuck - oh, fuck that smells - you okay?"

Coach's head shook, muttering a stiff, "Can't see... shit's in my eyes." He grabbed his double-barrel shotgun, holding it up blindly. The approaching sounds of shrieks and howls on the horizon was not a surprise. He growled, "Someone take it, I can't shoot like this. Gonna have a horde on us in a second."

When Rochelle recovered her footing, one hand having grabbed Ellis' to drag him along with, she looked up to see the two strangers bolting outside. The Boomer charged them as they came close, but the taller biker swung her baseball bat and hit it flat across the belly, sending it staggering back.

A generous tear split its skin from the blow, and it gave a bleat of pain, arms lashing out as it retreated up the sidewalk and out of sight. With it out of the way, the two bikers sprinted to the right, disappearing toward their motorcycle.

Flexing her hand on her pistol, she couldn't help a hissed, "Shit." She wasn't about to chase them down, but a surge of frustration went through her, anyway. "Of course they aren't going to help." Turning her head, she glanced at Ellis, quickly pointing at Coach. "Honey, take his gun."

Nodding, carefully, Ellis winced as he brushed a chunk of something foul and sticky off his arm. It was at a quick jog that he ran to take the weapon Coach had held out. He avoided Nick's gaze with a vengeance, tucking the double-barrel shotgun under his arm before grabbing a hand under the blinded man's elbow. "Maybe we should get Coach inside, defend on the stairs...?"

Nick glanced up, glaring at the fence gate and the empty space where the strangers had stood, a cold fury baring his teeth. "You should have just let me fucking shoot them from the start." he muttered, tone acidic.

Swinging to glare at him, Rochelle choked out something like a laugh. "They didn't sic the goddamn Boomer on us, Nick, you shouting like an asshole did." she retorted, anger making her talk too fast and too thoughtlessly. "And maybe if you hadn't terrified them, they'd have been willing to help us deal with this!"

His eyes snapped to hers with abrupt rage, but the screams of the horde were pitching higher.

"This ain't no time tuh argue!" Ellis blustered, irritation turning his voice desperate, pulling hard to drag Coach to his feet. He leaned the ex-football player against his side, not taking the time to mind as the smell hit him full-force. "Y'all shut up'n'focus, or we're gonna get swarmed!"

There was just a beat of silence, and then Rochelle huffed, turning to bolt toward the staircase. Nick growled under his breath but moved to follow, slipping a step forward and starting to grab Coach's other arm - but before he could, Ellis tugged the big man into a step, dodging them both out of the way.

Slipping Nick a glance that just barely slanted out from underneath his capbill, Ellis muttered, "Stop bein' a dick, man." His voice was raw, and it came out rougher than he meant it to.

Or maybe just as rough as he wanted. He wasn't sure anymore.

Ellis didn't wait to gauge his reaction, but he was convinced he saw a flicker of surprise dart over Nick's expression, just before he turned around. Steeling himself, Ellis braced Coach's weight and guided him toward the stairs. "You're okay, Coach." he muttered, receiving a vague grunt in return. If he wasn't crazy, there was some humour in Coach's voice, and it embarrassed him a little.

They'd just reached the bottom stair, Coach tripping a little as his foot hit the edge, when voices halted him. Ellis startled into a turn, lips falling into a part as his eyes fell on the two women standing in front of the gate opening. The shorter woman was wielding some kind of steel tube, wrapped with wiring and topped by a length of thread, and they were arguing.

"What's the fuckin' point?!" the thief hissed, jabbing at her with the end of her baseball bat. "They're -" "They're -" Head shaking, her older sister snatched a hand into the pocket of her jacket and shoved the object into her hands. "Can you just freaking turn it on, Rhee?! Please?!" she yelled back, furious, digging for something as her partner started fiddling with the tube.

The blonde's hands worked quick, taking hold of some of the wires dangling from the steel cylinder. "Fuckin' goddamn shit, fine. Waste of time." she growled out, frustrated. She twisted the wires, linking the copper ends bared from the rubber sheathing, and with a sudden blink, something lit up on the object. Ellis was too entranced - and confused - to move, and Coach gave a bewildered utterance.

"Boy, what's goin' on? Let's go!"

Ellis dragged Coach's hand to touch the staircase railing, dodging away from him to jolt a few steps toward the gate entrance. "You go!" The horde was close enough that the noise had turned piercing, shrieks and howls approaching from up and down the road. He skidded to a halt a good yard away from the bikers, hollering, "Whut are y'all doin'?" His tone was fueled by concern. "They're almost here!"

The taller woman blinked toward him, pausing for just an instant. Some surprise darted over her expression before a guarded squint overwhelmed it. "Stay back!" she responded, tilting the object toward her sister. The harsh sentiment startled Ellis, a frown touching his lips.

"I'm just tryin' tuh -"

When the brunette suddenly tore her hand out of her pocket, it was with something gripped in her fingers. It took Ellis a moment to realize what it was: a steel lighter. She snapped it open and flicked it alight with her thumb, and the thief grasped her hand to guide the flame to set the thread alight.
Then it clicked - it was a bomb.

His realization must have shown on his face, because the slightest grin cut across the thief's lips, right before she pressed a button attached to some of the wiring. After just a beat of time, a shrill noise cut through the horde's screaming, fierce and ear-splitting.

It was the howl of a fire alarm, and there was a moment where the horde seemed to silence... and then roar anew, screams heightened like they'd been enraged. Though Ellis could hear Rochelle's voice calling his name, all he could do was watch as the woman turned and threw the bomb down the street.

It spiralled through the air, still-screaming, and as infected came into view across the room, they turned and sprinted after it. More came flooding in from up the street, and they ignored the survivors entirely, chasing after the thrown bomb.

Curiosity drove Ellis to bolt forward, stumbling out through the gate, halting just next to the bikers. He stared down the road, blinking at the sight of the horde as it gathered around the pipe bomb. They were dogpiled on it, clambering atop each other in the need to get closer to the screaming alarm, even beating at each other with claws and fists -

It stopped beeping just an instant before it exploded.

The force of it was not tremendous, but it must have been full of shrapnel. With the explosion came a spray of blood and gore. The infected that didn't instantly go limp went staggering and stumbling back, screaming in denial as the bomb had blown away limbs and pierced vital organs. They were quick to scatter and quicker to die, collapsing as their bodies failed from broken muscle and bloodloss.

Ellis could not stop himself from hooting, leaping up onto his toes, a familiar thrill coursing through him. His mouth went on babbling before his brain could catch up. "Oh muh gawd, that was the coolest thing I've seen since - how did you -"

Then he remembered himself, and he quickly took a half-step back, lowering his chin as he turned hesitantly back toward the women. He could see a struggle taking place between them, the thief struggling between laughter and a surly silence while her sister fluctuated between nervous fear and a certain pride.

Gently, the shorter woman offered both her hands out in a flat gesture, almond eyes softening to something apologetic. "... Now can we talk? Without the shouting?"

Ellis hesitated, shuffling on his feet where he stood. He glanced over his shoulder, looking back to find his teammates at varying heights on the staircase, all frozen. Nick and Rochelle were both staring at him, the gambler's gaze guarded and disapproving while the producer looked mostly dumbstruck.

Blinking warily, Ellis turned back around. With a decisive and sudden smile, he reached out to clasp his hand on her inner forearm. The dark-haired biker seemed startled, at first, but quickly adapted and clapsed his forearm back, the gesture firm and amicable. Her sister gave a dubious glance up and down the Georgian, but Ellis could not find it in him to be intimidated.

Few people matched Jerry, anyway - and her posture soon softened to something dismissive. He didn't have to search hard to see the buzz of shame lingering at the edges of her expression, an awkward and embarrassed sort of distance, and something about the so-very-human attitude made him yearn to forgive her. Hadn't they all made mistakes?
"Name's Ellis." he uttered, feeling an immeasurable sort of relief course through him when the shorter woman smiled back, eyes crinkling in an expression that mirrored his own.

"Lena."
With Coach incapacitated, the team's priority became getting him up into the condo and into the kitchen. As unpleasant as the stench was, worse was the way it had splattered into his eyes and blinded him. Rochelle and Ellis stood on either side of him, papertowels wielded to try and clean off the worst of it.

It was difficult not to gag, the physical reaction set off with a visceral urgency. Every time they did, it was with a vague "sorry", and Coach looked about as thrilled as they did.

The two women were out stowing their motorcycle away safely in the yard, and taking awhile doing so. Whether they were talking amongst themselves was up in the air, and it hardly mattered; the survivors were certainly doing as much. They'd been in such a rush to get Coach safely inside, there hadn't been much time to talk.

Nervously, Ellis glanced between them - and then glanced up. Nick was across the kitchen, facing away, using a paper towel to try and wipe away the worst of the mess from his dress shirt. His posture was close to furious, or maybe sulking, hunched and disdainful. He hadn't said anything so far, though his silence was fast becoming far worse than active anger.

Ellis had to try. He felt his voice come out plaintively when he murmured, "I know we didn't get off on a great foot with 'em. But they could'uh left, and they didn't. Means somethin'."

Nick did not respond beyond a muted grunt.

"Look, I'm with Ellis." Rochelle offered up, cleaning Coach's eyes off with cautious attention. He flinched, blatantly, like it hurt. "I was super on the fence, okay? But they just saved us an entire horde. And we aren't doing great on ammo right now. I wasn't sure if we were even going to be able to handle that."

Shrugging a shoulder, weakly, Coach tried to speak without opening his mouth, as if he could avoid inhaling the stench lingering around him. "I ain't 'bout to argue. You wanna talk a gesture of good-will... that was a'ight."

She laughed, a little, shaking her head. "I think we're all just on edge after everything that's happened. Let's not lose sight of things, okay? It's not crazy to be suspicious, but... I don't want us to totally give up on people. I don't want the apocalypse to win, y'know?" When Ellis nodded in soft agreement, she slanted a look toward Nick. "You on board, suit? Or do we need to be on alert for you going on another rampage?"

It was with a remarkably vapid tone that Nick muttered, "Whatever. Not the first or last shitty decision I let you guys make."

Slowly, Rochelle glanced back at Coach. He blinked at her blearily, eyes bloodshot and watering. A tacit wariness passed in the look, and she cleared her throat. "No offense, Coach, but you're not gonna get any better without us dunking you in the ocean. I should go update Chris on what's going on - he's probably pretty confused, and I don't want him to freak if they walk in."

Ellis couldn't help an inward tension when Coach calmly grunted, standing up with a vague shudder. "A'ight. I think I'm gonna air out on the porch." The two moved away simultaneously, and there was nothing at all subtle in the way they left Ellis alone in the kitchen. He wished they hadn't; wished Rochelle didn't look at him with this bemused sort of intensity.
Like she wasn't sure what he'd do - or, maybe, wasn't sure what she wanted him to do.

Coach opened up the glass doors to the balcony and stepped out, and Rochelle quick-stepped it down the staircase to the first floor. Their absence left Ellis standing in an awkward silence, slowly turning the papertowel inside out in his hands and using it to scrub away the splatters of foul-smelling liquid that had stained his arm.

Nick made no move to acknowledge him, giving a faint growl and abruptly starting to undo the buttons of his dress shirt. He snapped them open, shrugging out of it, and took it in his hands to scrub more thoroughly at the staining. He'd grabbed a half-drunk bottle of water and now dribbled some out to wet the fabric and ease his efforts.

Ellis made strict and careful effort to not look at him and his bare upper body. His frustration and his hurt and his sadness did not so easily override the part of him that also wanted Nick's body on his and hands down his -

He couldn't think like that.

Instead, he inhaled, steeling himself. Was there any reason not to have the argument? Any reason to keep the peace? If Nick was going to be upset no matter what, Ellis could at least speak his mind. He didn't have a plan. The words just sort of left him, with more anger than he expected from himself.

"Are you just gonna ignore me, now?" he muttered, squinting down toward his feet. "We can't even talk no more? You can't even yell at me?"

Half of him didn't expect Nick to respond, only to be proven vastly incorrect. The older man set his shirt against the counter, flattening it, and a short and derisive snort escaped him. "Oh, forgive me. I didn't realize you thrived off me getting angry at you. Believe me, I can do that again. You make it real easy, pulling shit like that."

Ellis clenched his fingers into fists before he could stop himself, cocking his jaw to release a slightly disbelieving puff of air. "Like whut? Not lettin' someone die? Not -" He shook his head, harshly, glancing suddenly away, determined not to let Nick rile him into losing track of the conversation. "That ain't whut I'm talkin' about. You ain't so much as looked at me all day."

"You fucking let the whole team know." Nick's voice went chill and stark, head shaking in quick snaps of his neck. "The one fucking thing I wanted kept secret. Am I supposed to be sorry? Because I'm in the fucking doghouse on this one? I don't want to look at you, Overalls. Least of all talk to you. Is that a fucking shock to you?"

As fast as lightning, that anger melted, and all Ellis wanted to do was cry. He'd grown so good at looking past Nick's outer shell, translating what he said into what he meant - why did he suddenly hear nothing but anger? Vitriol? Nick had never spoken to him like that before, not in a way that said he meant it.

Pain blinded him, numbed him. He bit back a thick tension in his voice, feeling his jaw tremble as he spoke. "Nick - don't -" was all he got out, soft and half-broken.

"Don't what?" Nick turned, suddenly, eyes gone distant and cruelly veiled. He was mocking him, and Ellis wanted to run rather than listen to it, flee, because there was some fire burning at the core of Nick's voice that he couldn't identify and it frightened him. "I thought you wanted me to yell at you. Be angry at you. Isn't this what you wanted?"
Ellis shook his head, lifting a hand as if to cover his eyes, feeling his breath go unsteady even as he tried to tense his chest and force it back into a rhythm. "I just - I can't handle you actin' like this. Please, Nick, just -" He was begging and he hated it. "I'm sorry, okay? I'm sorry they found out, I'm sorry - but you can't keep doin' this. I just can't do this -"

Nick released a laugh, a distant and angry sound. "The alternative being...? Is this a fucking 'why can't we still be friends' conversation? Jesus Christ." Before Ellis could protest, Nick was suddenly moving, stalking toward him - and the Georgian's spine went flimsy as he slumped back at Nick's approach, eyes averting. His heartrate went up and he didn't want it to; couldn't tell if it was fear or something else.

"Let me be really fucking clear, Ellis." Nick enunciated with such vicious clarity, it made Ellis' chest ache. "We weren't dating. We were fucking, and now we stopped. I don't want to spend any more time around you than I have to. I definitely don't want to act like nothing's changed, because it's changed. And you don't get to make the choices here, because you're the fucking dumbshit who thinks he's got feelings."

Ellis couldn't get himself to meet Nick's gaze, forcing his eyes up just far enough to stare blankly at the older man's chest, eyebrows gone wrought with the pain surging up his spine. "Why?" was all he could utter, just a whisper, as if afraid of hearing his own pathetic tone echoed back to him.

Nick's fist hit the counter in an infuriated strike, slumping his body, tilting just far enough forward that Ellis couldn't help but flinch. "Because." he hissed, snarled, faster than he seemed able to control. "I'm not a good enough goddamn guy to say no when you try to fucking fix this."

He'd said too much.

Ellis could tell it, suddenly, lifting his chin and blinking warily into Nick's face. He could see the moment of panic, the darkening of Nick's eyes, and could only startle faintly as Nick snatched his shirt from the counter and stalked forward. "Do us both a favour and fuck off. The house is full of new friends for you to make miserable." His shoulder hit Ellis', body-checking him into a stumble, and Ellis gazed after him as he stormed out of the kitchen.

Nick took a hard right, ducking into the upstairs bathroom, slamming the door shut behind him. Frowning, lifting a hand to shove the back of his hand against his eyes in a faint self-beratement at the tingle of tears, Ellis exhaled harshly. Somehow he'd ended up more confused than he started, and without any of that anger left to buoy him through it. It left him empty and hollow and hurting.

"Whut's that supposed to mean?" he mumbled, a miserable utterance just for himself. Did Nick think he'd take advantage of him? That Ellis would let him? That if they interacted any more than necessary, Ellis would end up back in his arms and Nick wouldn't think twice about it?

Wasn't it just a little bit true?

He might've just stood there, struggling with the conflicted emotions roiling in his gut, had a gentle tap-tap not caught his attention. He looked up, blinking quickly to focus himself, finding Coach leaning into the glass doors from the other side. When their eyes met, Coach crooked a finger to urge him over.

It was reluctantly that Ellis obeyed, with a glance over his shoulder for the bathroom door. He'd prefer to leave before Nick came back out, anyway, he supposed.

Coach opened the glass door for him, and Ellis slipped out, quickly advancing to lean himself against the railing. He sighed, glancing up at the sky, closing his eyes as a breeze cut across his cheek, bloated with salt. The ex-football player slid the door closed again, stepping to rest on the railing a good few feet away from Ellis.

They didn't speak for a few moments. The silence did more to fray Ellis' nerves than soothe them, even as he tried to inhale and exhale, like it might calm him down. When that didn't work, he settled for holding his breath until he felt his chest might burst. Maybe he could just pass out right there, spare himself the effort of thought.

It was eventually that Coach chuckled, and the sound startled Ellis into blustering out the held air.

"Can I be honest, son?" Ellis shrugged gently, making a soft hum of affirmation. "This whole time, I thought you were gay, an' had a big crush on Nick he didn't know about." Shock widened Ellis' eyes, unable to stop a gape from dropping his jaw as he turned to look at the big man.

Coach merely slipped him a soft and weary grin. "Seen enough of that, schoolin' boys. You catch the signs. I kept tryin' to coax you away, an' watchin' Ro' keep pushin' you on him just... drove me nuts. Figured she didn't see it, an' I never said anythin'. Didn't want to, in case I was wrong." Coach gave an almost bashful shrug, shaking his head, quickly turning to a grimace as he wiped a hand down his cheek that came away sticky. "Or right."

Looking away slowly, Ellis absorbed that, blinking at a gradual and surprised pace. "Oh." was all he managed. He didn't know how to feel about that - and not the smallest reason for his uncertainty was that word.

Gay? Was he? His instinct was to protest, because he'd had girlfriends before. But had any of them really made him feel what Nick made - had made - him feel? The buzzing warmth in his chest and head and plenty of other places, some he shied away from thinking about too hard, was like nothing he'd felt before.

He found he didn't mind the idea; it didn't really change anything, after all. It mostly felt like something he should have realized a long time ago, like slipping into a brand new, carefully sized shoe after years and years of hand-me-downs.

"I ain't tryin' to stick my nose in yo' business." Coach murmured, misinterpreting his silence. Ellis glanced over at him, tilting his chin down gently. "Just can't help but wonder what you see in the guy, if he can treat you the way he does, convince me you're just pinin' after him, all this time."

Unable to resist a sigh, Ellis allowed his eyes to close. The sentiment didn't sit well. It hurt, stung, and mostly because he didn't know what good it would do him to argue anymore. He couldn't gather together the energy to protest further than a soft, "He ain't who you think."

Coach shrugged up his shoulders, gazing out over Tybee from their vantage point on the second floor balcony. He didn't argue, exactly, simply responding with a sincere tone. "Just worried 'bout you, son."

Ellis merely hushed back a quiet, "Me, too."
Chapter 175

By the time Nick had redressed and left the bathroom, Ellis was gone, standing out on the porch with Coach. That suited him just fine, and he wasted no time in crossing the loft to duck downstairs.

Christ. I'm gonna fucking lose it if he doesn't drop this soon. was all he could think, taking the stairs two at a time. He couldn't handle the argument Ellis wanted to have. It was entirely too easy to sink into that old, familiar cruelty. Too easy to make Ellis cry, as fragile as he was. Too easy to hurt him.

And too hard to watch himself do it.

It's better this way. had turned into a mantra. He repeated it to stave off any moment of weakness he had, that distant longing to just forget everything and go back to the unspoken simplicity of whatever they had before - mutual comfort, sex, warm familiarity. He missed it.

He missed the way those eyes looked at him. The presence of another body, even in the quiet and the calm. Knowing he could turn a dry gaze to catch Ellis' and get that nose to crinkle up.

He missed Ellis.

You're fucking pathetic. You can't have him, just because you're lonely and want some stupid kid to validate you. You aren't what he wants, and you've never changed before. Why would you change now? Pretending anything between you would work would be lying to him and yourself. Just let it go.

He was better off alone, anyway. Every time he tried anything different, it collapsed under his feet. He'd always been alone. It was only fitting; a skin he'd become used to.

Nick intended to sequester himself back in the bedroom. However, he had not even reached the bottom of the stairs when the front door slid open. Through the doorway came the two women, moving warily and halting the instant they spotted him.

The brunette gave a forceful clear of her throat, carefully placing the head of her brush-axe against the floor. She'd cleaned it off and re-sheathed it, the curved blade covered by a thin leather wrap. "Um. Hi." Her sister hovered close at her elbow, and there was a mistrustful scowl written into her features as she gazed silently up at Nick. "We didn't get properly introduced. I -"

He cut her off, lifting a hand, closing his eyes with a put-upon sort of sigh. "Let me save you some time."

Stepping off the stairs, Nick flashed an arm out flat in a vague gesture, voice condescendingly slow. "I don't give a fuck. I don't give a fuck about you, or what you think. The best you can hope for is me deciding to ignore that you exist. So ride that high, girls, because fuck would today have gone differently if I had -"

"Ookay!" sang Rochelle's voice, sudden and abrupt, practically bursting from the master bedroom. She skidded out into the hallway, raising both hands and firmly placing herself in front of Nick. "Hi! Hey! My name's Rochelle."

With a slight snarl at the interruption, Nick shifted away. He wasn't about to press the issue, so he merely stepped to lean against the outer edge of the staircase and throw his arm over the railing. He glanced down to examine the carpet, posture gone hostile in its tense lean, even as he held his silence.

Breaking into a slightly nervous smile, Lena offered forward her hand. Rochelle had to fumble a little, stopping herself from returning the gesture with her injured right hand and instead sticking out her left. The woman switched quickly, and they shook gently. "Lena. And this is Rhiannon. She's on her best behaviour, I promise."

The blonde gave a slight chuffing snort, breath vibrating through her nose, even as she averted her eyes. Her hand lifted in a small wave. "... Hey." was all Rhiannon said - only to get a firm glance from her older sister and, with a pained blink, added, "And sorry. For all the shit I did. It was, um... it was fucked up."

A tense laugh forced itself out of Rochelle, head shaking quickly. "Honestly, the shit we've been through lately, I'd half-forgotten about what you did. Besides, Ellis is the one you hit and he's willing to give you another chance so let's just... forget about it. Okay?"

Rhiannon's eyes downturned, looking vaguely uncomfortable, even as she nodded. There was something awkward in her posture, like she didn't know quite how to respond, and Rochelle couldn't resist a slight smile. It was almost endearing to watch her flounder.

That, and it was nice to talk to people who seemed half human.

Rochelle thumbed up the stairs at the second floor. "We can sit upstairs. I'd love to talk, team to team, share ideas..."

The master bedroom door nudging open all the way startled her, just as she'd begun to turn and lead the way upstairs. Her eyes blinked a little wide as Christophe stepped carefully around the door, a vague pain in his eyes.

"Oh, Chris, you didn't have to -" the producer began, raising her hands, only to be interrupted.

Rhiannon burst out, voice bluntly shocked, "Holy shitfuck, dude!" There was no holding back the awe in the way she stared straight at Chris' bandaged stump, morbid fascination mixed with a kind of horror that struck her face blank. "What the fuck happened?!"

Although she tried to shove an elbow at her sister's side and stop her, Lena looked similarly shocked. Her attempt to stifle it only made it more apparent when she managed out a quick and stuttered, "Rhee, don't be rude..."

Chris balked, and had he been a little less weary he might have been able to hide the flash of insecurity that crossed his eyes. It was with a quick and slim smile that he uttered a laugh. "All these beautiful women, and me, en este estado..." he murmured, gently placing his hand on his ruined shoulder, just before the bandages. "I was wounded. They saved me."

"Criminy." the brunette managed, almond-shaped eyes gone soft with sympathy. "That's... kind of amazing. I've seen some wounds before but... I'm shocked you're even mobile. How long ago...?"

Rochelle slipped over to duck herself under Chris' arm. He relented, slipping his arm over her shoulder to balance himself, weight shifting gently into her side. "Too recently." she interjected pointedly, bracing a hand on his waist to tug him into motion. She spoke wryly as they moved toward the stairs in a faint hobble. "Come on, ladykiller."

A faint grin touched his lips, more sincere this time. He dropped his voice to murmur, just between them. "No te preocupes. I only have eyes for you, bonita."

She couldn't resist a purse of her lips, rolling her eyes and choosing very specifically not to respond.

As they carefully began ascending the stairs, the two women walking a safe distance behind, Nick circled around to go to the front door and lock it, unable to resist a glare up toward the stairs as he did so.

How they'd gone from at each others' throats to acting like buddies was beyond him. He didn't trust the two bikers as far as he could throw them, and if the team was intent on letting down their guard, he'd just have to double up.

Or quadruple.

It was with that in mind that he followed, stalking up after them, intent on observing. As much as he'd have liked to secret himself away and get a break from being around people, he didn't have any interest in missing whatever discussions took place. The last thing he needed was to turn around and find they'd invited the women to join the team, collected two new strays to go along with their cripple.

He needed to monitor things, so he followed. Rochelle led the way with Chris, and as they passed up into the loft, she helped him to one of the loveseats. Lena and Rhiannon moved to stand in a slight huddle behind the couch, seeming insecure, and Nick slipped past them to take up a lean on the kitchen island.

After she got Chris settled into a sit on the sofa, slumped to ensure his ruined shoulder didn't nudge into the cushions, Rochelle straightened. "Okay. You two can sit, and we've got some drinks if -"

The way Rhiannon perked indicated an eager interest, but Lena stepped closer to her with a careful quickness, uttering, "We're okay. Not gonna take your supplies." She flashed Rochelle a careful smile, even as the producer prepared to insist.

Nick interjected, sharply, "You already did." All three women darted looks at him, some more tense than others. "The food at that general store up the road? That was ours."

The brunette biker passed an uncertain glance at her younger sister, only to witness a rising kind of anger flinching to life on Rhiannon's face. Nervously, Lena raised the hand that wasn't gripping her brush-hook. "Um... Crap, okay. We can give it back, if, uh..."

Rochelle instantly laughed, more a tense gesture to cut the tension than actual humor. "No, no. No way. It's not a big deal. Don't pay any attention to him, okay? He's in a bad mood, and it's got nothing to do with you." Nick turned an acid stare toward her, lip curling up from his teeth, as if daring her to discuss the situation with them.

She didn't.

"Just play dead and he'll lose interest." she joked, instead.

Lena did not look sure if she should laugh, but Rhiannon flared into a practically enthused set of snickers, raising a gloved hand to tuck a knuckle against her mouth. Smiling quickly, Rochelle backed up to walk toward the glass doors, rapping on it to catch Ellis and Coach's attention.

They blinked back at her in unison, and Ellis doggedly turned, sliding the door open. He stepped into the loft, glancing up at the bikers with a hesitant smile. It was a smile that dissipated immediately upon seeing Nick standing across the room.

Ellis lowered his chin, crossing to slip behind the loveseat and rest his forearms against the top, just beside Chris. It put him as far from Nick as he could get, barring literally walking to the wall. "Glad you guys stayed." he mumbled, blinking across the loft at Lena.

Coach did not move from the balcony, but he did turn around to face inside the condo. "Think I'll stay out here. Ain't tryin' to stink up the place." he explained, wryly.

With a careful nod, Rochelle slipped to center herself in the room, clasping her hands gently in front of herself. She inhaled - and then smiled, thinly. "Okay. You guys met me, and Ellis. This is Coach, and Nick is the grump over there." she introduced them with gestures. Before she could get to Chris, he leaned in gently.

"Christophe. Chris is bueno." he said, lightly, raising his hand to point at Lena. "I like your weapon, ¿sí?" She gave a blink, only belatedly glancing down at her brush-axe where it was leaned tip-down into the carpet with the haft rested along her side.

"Oh. Thanks." she managed, grinning a little. "It's heavy as crap, but it wrecks those freaks."

Nudging her carefully with an elbow, like some little encouragement, Rhiannon offered up, "Broke into a hardware store across the way, Lee found that. Guess trees and zombies aren't that different." She flashed a grin, displaying her cracked canine with the slanted expression. "She kicks ass with it."

Nick tightened his arms against his sides, exhaling with a vague eye-roll. He interjected harshly, "Great. Awesome. Bonding over. Pretty sure we had some fucking questions to ask them? Or are we just here to have a slumber party?"

Rochelle carefully shook her head, expression going a little tired. "Nick, please feel free to fuck off. Some of us are enjoying two seconds to chat with people that aren't complete assholes. And I'm literally talking to a girl who tried to mug me."

When the gambler started to respond, tensing, he was interrupted by Coach's quiet laughter - and worse, the way Ellis glanced up at him, vague and mulling disapproval lingering in those guarded blue eyes. Rather than retort, Nick merely snarled out a huff, turning and digging through their food supplies to find a granola bar. His anger bled into the way he tore into it and started eating.

He felt cornered.

More than that, he felt unwelcome.

He wasn't sure why he suddenly minded it.
Chapter 176

Lena shrugged her shoulders, carefully touching her fingertips together. She and her sister had undone most of their protective gear, revealing more clearly the clothes they wore underneath.

The brunette was in a thin grey hoodie, pale blue capris hemmed just a few inches below her knees. She had black running shoes, but had slipped half out of them, curling and flexing her socked toes in idle cracks. Rhiannon wore nothing more than a thin white cami, tight along her waistline, and black pants with zipper pockets in slashes at the sides of her thighs.

Her black boots took up a tapping on the carpet, eyes watching Lena's hands move as she spoke. "The military? ... Honestly, we've been avoiding everyone. We haven't seen much sign of anything or anybody, least of all the military. Nothing except whoever blew the bridge into Tybee. And you guys, I guess."

Ellis frowned a little. He'd taken up a pace behind Christophe, and every time he turned to start another pass, Chris fidgeted. He was making the Spaniard nervous, he could tell, but he couldn't convince his body to stop. "You guys ain't lookin' fer an evac?" he questioned, lightly.

With a slight snort, Rhiannon lifted her gaze, cocking her studded brow. "Bud, if you're looking for evac, you're shit outta luck over here. Last I heard, they'd pulled back to New Orleans. I think the zombies just overwhelmed everybody."

Rochelle couldn't resist a slight frown, glancing toward her knees. "New Orleans..." she echoed, faintly, some uncertainty entering her tone. "We hadn't heard that. You guys haven't... seen a ship around, have you? A military boat, maybe?"

The two women looked at each other, then shook their heads in unison.

Exhaling, Rochelle shifted her weight. She'd taken up residence on the empty loveseat, legs crossed tightly. "Okay. We... found some information that made us think there's a ship hanging around here. Not sure if it's true, but..." Flicking her gaze between the two bikers, she risked, "If you don't think anyone's still here, why are you guys hanging around? Why aren't you heading for New Orleans?"

Rhiannon thrust her jaw forward. She thumbed at her cheek, scratching there with a light sniff. "We're trying to grab a boat, get enough supplies to head down the coast. We gotta hit Texas." When Rochelle's head cocked in obvious question, the blonde flapped a hand. "Our dad lives there. He's a fucking loser, but we don't have anyone else."

It was so off-handed, so casual, Rochelle wasn't completely sure of how to react. There was some kind of well-worn hurt there, so old and familiar it came off more like a scar than a wound. There was a grin faint on her lips and mirrored in Lena's eyes, like the topic had become almost satire between them.

Coach approached a little closer, tiredly stepping and leaning in the threshold of the glass doors to the balcony. "Y'all think he's even still there? Way things have gone, ain't sure anybody's stayed home."

"I wouldn't even think he's alive, but..." Lena raised a hand, placing fingers over her mouth carefully. "He's a huge nut. Literally has a bunker built in his backyard. He was pretty sure aliens were gonna get him, but I bet now he'll just say aliens dropped the zombie virus as a bioweapon or something."

Ellis couldn't resist laughing, brows crinkling up at the statement. "Oh, man. That's like muh buddy Keith. He's real convinced that this one time, he got - like - abducted, but I'm pretty sure he just got drunk'n'passed out in a field. I mean, he came home with all these bruises he said were on account'uh them testin', but they sure looked like hoof-marks tuh me."

Snorting, Rhiannon leaned in slightly, placing her elbow on her inner thigh to slump her weight there. "We grew up thinking it was normal to have our dad guarding our bedroom with an AR because the aliens might take us. Dude, you should have seen the fucking look on the CPS lady when we told her. She could've combusted."

With a grin, Ellis halted in his pace, pushing his hands into his pockets. "Dang. That's worse than Keith. Was he intuh them tinfoil hats'n'everythin'?" The blonde seemed primed to nod, but Christophe lifted his hand to gently interrupt, fingers splayed questioningly.

"¿Qué es 'CPS'? This is some kind of police?"

Lena laughed a little, reaching down to rub thoughtfully at a scrape on her shin. "Child Protective Services. They handle neglect and abuse, stuff like that." She shifted enough to bump her sister with a shoulder. "Our situation was more the former, but y'know. That was a long time ago."

A wary nod touched Chris' head.

"You're not from around here, h'uh?" Rhiannon questioned, abruptly, glancing at him as he blinked in uncertainty. She seemed to realize the abrasiveness of the question after a beat, quickly raising a hand to scratch at her scalp, fingertips nervously brushing over the dark roots showing there. "Sorry you picked a bad time to visit, with all the zombies."

The Spaniard gave a rich laugh at that, placing his hand against his chest. "I came for education, on a visa. It took me a few days to realize it was el apocalipsis, and not just ... ah, vuestras vidas diarias -" His tongue flicked against his teeth, settling on, "Em, normal for you, ¿sí?", with a teasing grin that warmed at his eyes.

Coach leaned in slightly from the porch doorway, a chastising tip touching his head. "Boy, what's that supposed to mean?" When the foreigner gave a chagrined blink, Coach outright laughed.

From his place in the far end of the kitchen, Nick observed with no small scowl. He attempted to emanate disgust, but couldn't shake off a sulking edge that just made him feel petty. He didn't know what was worse: that the team was getting along with these newcomers, or that Ellis was.

As if the kid sensed that his attention had shifted, he looked up. Their gazes met for just an instant, Nick caught red-handed staring at him - and then the Georgian furtively looked away, surging forward to place a hand on the back of the loveseat where Christophe sat. The Spaniard startled, flinching, though he tried to play it off.

"If y'all are lookin' fer a boat, maybe we could help out? We're tryin' tuh figure out whut we're doin' anyway... Ain't like it's outta our way. Already on the coast. Maybe we can do some huntin', look fer a boat."

That sparked indignation in Nick's chest. Between inviting them in and now offering help out of hand - it felt half like Ellis was just doing it all out of spite. Like he meant to make Nick as miserable as possible. Is he actively trying to piss me off?

Rochelle thumbed at her lower lip, glancing suddenly at Coach. Some hesitancy bled into her posture, a distant voice that wondered if they could afford the extra risk, danger - but Lena was already talking, hands lifted.

"Gosh, I'd never say no. It's dangerous out there. We do okay, but the close calls have been closer than I'd like... And if we can do anything for you guys -" She passed a glimpse at her sister, receiving a faint look of wary affirmation before finishing. "We'd be glad to help."

Before Ellis could start to grin, looking pleasantly surprised and a little proud of himself, Nick uttered a cold retort. "I love how you all have accumulated such great additions to the team. We really needed some thieves and murderers to spice things up."

Ellis flinched, a certain frustration simmering up in his chest. It felt like he couldn't do anything, say anything, without inciting Nick to anger. He had to inhale, breathe, because the last thing he wanted to do was let Nick rile him up in return and have an argument in front of everyone.

All those tender feelings had turned into something painful, and he'd never felt like that before. It was a kind of anger he didn't know how to deal with, not when most of him just wished it would stop - wished he could cross the room and bury his face into Nick's chest and sense that familiar resignation just before Nick returned the affection.

It wasn't supposed to go this way.

Though everyone else turned to look at Nick, Coach was first to speak. His tone was almost droll, like he didn't have the energy to keep up the illusion of the argument any longer. "She didn't even steal anythin'. An' Chris didn't kill no-one. You wanna say somethin', Nicolas, say it."

The two bikers passed unsure looks at each other - then Chris. He noticed, and tried for a small grin as if to reassure them. It came off hesitant.

Nick thrust up a hand dismissively. He laughed, short and breathy, pushing away from the counter to stalk closer at a lazy and threatening pace. "Why? I'm apparently not part of the decision-making process, so why ask me anything?"

Abruptly, Coach took one step into the room so he could get a clear sightline to Nick. Their gazes met, wickedly sharp, and the football coach rose up into an aggressively puffed stance. "I wonder why we'd be ignorin' you right now." he uttered, flatly.

Nick looked surprised for just a beat of time, before his expression cut off into something hollow. He snarled under his breath, eyes slipping to gaze off to the side, and moved to cross the loft. He snatched his katana from where he'd left it leaned against the wall, gripping it tightly.

"Fuck you." he muttered, darting down the stairs and making for his claimed bedroom, because silence was better than the atmosphere there. Try as he might to think otherwise, to put off an aura of something else - he knew he was fleeing. Retreating.

Ellis watched him go, head tilted to slant his gaze out from under his cap. A frown lingered on his lips, deepening once Nick had disappeared down the stairs. Why did some strangled part of him still want to follow after, check on him? Nick had told him, so explicitly, not to try to fix them, but the alternative was letting him go.

Ellis didn't know how to do that.

In the silence that followed, he sighed, and Chris turned to glance at him over his shoulder.

"You are okay?" he questioned, gently. "Ellis?"
Slowly, the Georgian blinked back toward him, and realized all eyes were on him. He cleared his throat, turning half-away, giving a shrug. "... I'm fine. Sorry." he lied, unsure of how much his tone betrayed him. "Dunno why he's gotta be so damn rude."

Leaning slightly over to catch Rochelle's gaze, the brunette biker hesitantly thumbed toward the stairs. "... What's going on? Not to be nosy, but... is this just because we showed up, or...?" When Rochelle inhaled deeply, a wince catching over her face, Lena quickly waved a hand. "It's fine. Forget I asked. Team drama, right? I'm traveling with my sister. Believe me, I get it."

Rhiannon grimaced at her, lengthily. "Ditto."

"Something like that." Laughing - and then sighing just as quickly, Rochelle let a palm slip over her eyes in a tired gesture. "Between you and me, I'm kinda thrilled to see some other women. These boys are exhausting."

"Hey." echoed in unison from Christophe and Coach, booming bass and trilled tone mixing in vague offense. All three girls laughed, Rhiannon surging to cover a hand over her lips and hide her cracked canine.

Ellis barely paid attention.
Chapter 177

With a frown, Ellis worked to crack open a can of spaghetti rings. He'd shaken it mercilessly, still remembering the lesson they'd learned long ago on eating it without shaking it up. It was bad enough eating cold soup without being stuck with settled layers of varying consistencies. His attention was now focused on using his pocket knife to saw open the top.

He hadn't eaten anything all day, despite Rochelle's attempts, and it had finally caught up to him. His belly grumbled in angry mutters, and even though he'd have liked to sulk around and refuse to eat, the sound had grown embarrassing - so he'd settled on one of the cans they had, attacking it with little enthusiasm.

As it turned out, their two new acquaintances hadn't eaten that day either. Still waving off any offers of shared supplies, the two had slipped outside to retrieve food from their duffel bag.

Ellis was sure he hadn't heard them return - which made him startle nearly out of his skin when Lena's voice suddenly spoke at his elbow. "Need help?" she uttered, muffled, and he jolted to look at her. Her mouth was full of something, and he didn't realize what it was until the smell hit him.

Spam.

She was gripping a soft-edged rectangular can of it, having popped off the slim top and bent it into a rudimentary spoon. The smell of it struck him with such a greasy, meaty intensity, he could have collapsed. It smelled incredible, surging up such bittersweet memories of the sandwiches his mama used to make -

Blinking, she seemed startled by his wide-eyed attention, and took a half-step back. Then she offered it up, swallowing her mouthful to give a wary smile. "Um... Want some? It's not as good uncooked, but -"

Ellis quickly shook his head, a little embarrassed at himself. With how regularly rank the air was in those blood-soaked days, the smell of something closer to real food was intoxicating. He returned his attention to his can, furtively, tightening his grip on it and the pocketknife to work on sawing a line through the lid. "Uh. No, thanks, that's okay. Just smelled good is all."

Lena seemed tempted to laugh and argue, but she didn't. Instead, she focused her attention on her food while Ellis worked to extricate his from its container. As he got enough of an opening made, he flipped the can upside-down over the bowl he'd set beside it, shaking out the contents.

It was about as appealing as cold spaghetti could be, though more appealing than eating yet more too-salty trailmix. With that, he took ahold of the spoon now buried amongst the spaghetti rings and lifted it up to his mouth. He shoved it in, quickly setting to a quiet chew as the thick tomato flavour mulled over his senses.

Lena had retreated a little more, pushing her hip against the counter, and seemed off-put by his quiet. She took a slow glance over her shoulder; Rhiannon was pacing cautiously near the staircase, mowing through a chocolate protein bar. She held guarded attention on the center of the room, where Rochelle, Coach, and Chris were splitting a bag of trailmix.

The Spaniard was barely eating, and Rochelle did not fail to notice. "Still feeling sick?" she questioned, around a hunk of raisins that had all collected together in a dusty lump.

He gave a vague shrug of his shoulder, holding a peanut between his fingertips as if to examine it.
Though his expression was distant and mostly inscrutable, it was hard not to notice a trailing exhaustion. His pallor had gained a thinness, like his veins might show through his skin.

Rochelle pushed the issue, voice turning soft with unsure sympathy. "You should've stayed in bed. This is a lot of activity for you." She almost stood, elbow going against the back of the sofa to brace her weight. "Maybe you should lay down."

Christophe winced, eyes averting, but relented with a clear nod of his head. "I can do it." he responded, just a tiny utterance. There was some subtle force - some frail irritation - behind the tone that made Rochelle sit back down. She frowned, barely, watching as he thumbed the peanut into his mouth and freed his hand to grasp the back of the couch. Chris worked his way down to lay on his back.

As he settled, he closed his eyes, looking half ready to pass out. Rochelle turned her frown to Coach, who merely shrugged in silence.

"Kinda tense around here, huh?"

Lena's statement made Ellis stop outright, twisting his head to blink at her. She used her lid-turned-scoop to dig out a measure of the moist pink substance, throwing it back with ease, barely even chewing the finely processed pork. She shook her head, quick to elaborate. "I get it, but dang. Things really that bad for you guys lately? You're acting like it's the end of the world."

She was trying to make a joke, make him laugh, but Ellis barely processed it. He only forced a huff when she smiled awkwardly at him, driven by some social instinct.

"We, uh -" He fumbled, momentarily, because the last thing he wanted was to talk about the events of the last day. Some far-off spite surged, reminding him that there was little reason to keep it a secret anymore... but that faded as fast as it rose. "Yeah. Some folks tried killin' us, 'n' then Chris got hurt. We're just... worn out."

Nodding faintly, the short biker thumbed behind her in a vague gesture. "Your friend, Nick - seems more than worn out."

Nodding faintly, the short biker thumbed behind her in a vague gesture. "Your friend, Nick - seems more than worn out." Ellis flinched a little at that, canting his head as if to glance away, but Lena lowered her voice and leaned in slightly. He couldn't help but look back at her, eyes widening slightly at the force in her voice.

Her expression, so soft and highlighted by almond-shaped hazel eyes that didn't seem capable of harshening, went suddenly firm and direct. It stirred up Nick's words in his mind; that nobody was alive anymore who didn't flourish in the chaos. Nobody was alive anymore who was weak, anyway.

The thought made him feel tired.

"Look, I just want to know Rhee's gonna be safe here. He seems a little... okay, a whole freakin' lot unstable, and she didn't exactly - get off on a good foot with you guys. If she's in danger, I'd rather just leave now."

She wasn't trying to step on a nerve, but it was all he could do not to thrust a step forward and argue. Was it even his place to defend Nick anymore? Did he know what to say? Some injured and flagging part of him wondered if he knew Nick as well as he used to think.

Ellis settled for frowning rather than say what he was thinking.

His eyes averted, and it was thoughtlessly that he mumbled back, "I ain't gonna let him do nothin' stupid.", wanting it so badly to be true. His voice softened despite himself, furtively glancing down to swirl his spoon through the cold spaghetti before him. "He's just - been through a lot. He don't know how tuh deal with stuff except gettin' angry. That's all."

Warily, Lena nodded. Something in her expression exposed this awkward uncertainty, chewing on her tongue - but she forced a smile all the same. "Okay. Can't say that's not my sister, too." She grasped at her makeshift spoon, scooping out a hunk of Spam and eyeing it momentarily, returning almost cheerily: "Guess every group needs a big ol' jerk to get through all this, huh?"

That hurt, and he knew precisely why: he didn't know if he'd get through without Nick. Maybe he was the weak one, after all.

Rochelle must have sensed his discomfort, because she was suddenly turned on the sofa, bracing an arm over the back of it and calling out. She did so innocuously, but he knew instantly she was offering him a lifeline - and checking on him. "Hey, Ellis. Finally get that damn can open? And with or without cutting your finger off?"

Eager for the chance to duck away, Ellis grabbed a hand under his bowl and carefully sidestepped around the short woman. She watched him go, a little curiosity making its way into her expression as he practically fled. "Yer just jealous, 'cause I got somethin' better than more granola." he retorted, weakly.

The producer flashed a smile back at him, all teeth, and it was soothing somehow.

"You got cold pasta, son." Coach interjected, calm, tone wistful. He somewhat moodily dropped the bag of trail mix on the coffee table, shoving it away. "I don't think none of us are winnin'. Reminds me of when my wife tried puttin' me on a diet."

Ellis tried to laugh, but all that came out was a strangled squawk. "Least we got food at all. Can't be fightin' zombies on an empty stomach." He approached the sofa and rested his hip against it, unfazed when Rochelle stretched back a hand to grab onto the folds of his wrapped overalls and yank on them playfully. "Besides. It ain't that bad."

Coach flinched as the younger man took a heavy scoop of spaghetti rings, shoving his maw full until tomato sauce threatened to trickle from the corner of his mouth. "Boy -" he uttered, half-threatening and half-disgusted, causing Ellis to sputter into a more genuine laugh.

Grinning slightly, Rhiannon took a step forward, plucking at her cami straps to rearrange them on her shoulders. "You guys are a fuckin' riot. Remind me of some old buddies." she muttered, almost to herself - and her eyes darted to glance toward her sister.

Something passed in the look, something only translated by years of familiarity, a blink and a quirked sentiment in a language just their own. They must have settled on an agreement, because both women looked toward the other survivors in unison. Lena was the one to speak.

"So, we weren't gonna mention it, but I feel like... we can work together. And you guys seem like you need a break." the shorter sister offered up, tentatively. All eyes moved to her - even Chris reopened his gold-browns, tiredly tilting his face to glance at her from his place prone on the couch. "We've actually got a base across the way. Rhee staked it out the other day. There was a generator set up, and we got it working."

Rochelle blinked, surging to straighten up. She raised a hand to brush fingertips over her mouth, uncertainly. "Really? So it's got power?"

Nodding, Rhiannon shifted on her feet cautiously. "Takes gas though, and the shitfuck makes some noise. We've been trying not to use it too often. Always end up getting a few fucking zombie fa-" Whatever she was about to say died behind her lips, shooting a wary glance at Lena before modulating the sound into something else. If the brunette noticed, she didn't indicate it. "-uckers."

Coach palmed against his chest, fingertips brushing over the blood-encrusted fabric of his worn-out shirt. "That mean runnin' water?" he queried, visibly trying to mask his interest behind innocuous question. Lena didn't miss that, however, and a grin touched her lips.

"Heck, yeah." she responded. "Hot water, too. It's a restaurant, though, so it's not like there's a shower - but it's got this huge sink for dishwashing, and a big spray hose attached to it. There's a drain in the floor, so we were just washing off right there. Not, uh... decent, but we're sisters, so..."
She gestured with her head, taking up a hearty helping of Spam onto her 'spoon'. "Doubt you guys give a frick at this point, huh?"

Rochelle and Ellis passed a startled glance between them, his eyes widening gently. While scrubbing down with the water they'd found had been refreshing, the idea of something closer to an actual shower was enticing.

The very first thought Ellis had was how thrilled Nick would be - and that hurt the moment it struck him, pain joining a kind of anger when he found he couldn't break himself so easily from caring about what would and wouldn't make the man happy. He tried to shake it off, but it lingered, even as he tried to smile and pretend his heart didn't ache.

"That sounds kinda amazin'... we could probably get our clothes washed a bit, too. If y'all want, I bet we could siphon a car to get more gas for it. Repay y'all whut we take."

Laughing a little, Rochelle prodded at his stomach, making him jump. "He's our resident mechanic.
And sweetheart." When Ellis allowed a strained noise of displeasure to escape him, his ears heating up slightly, Rochelle turned to better face the two other women. She glanced meaningfully between them, receiving a faint grin from Lena and a slightly awkward head-tilt from Rhiannon.
"We'd owe you two so much. Seriously."

Crossing her arms over her stomach, Rhiannon gestured flatly with a hand in a negating motion.
"Not really." she responded, bluntly. "Kicker is, last time we left, got jumped by a Boomer. Left a horde back there. It'll be an ass-nasty fight clearing them out." She looked warily toward her older sister, earning a supportive nod. "If you pussies are up for it."

That supportive nod turned into a weak grimace, and Rhiannon looked faintly mischievous in some awkward and half-apologetic sort of way. Despite himself, Coach chuckled. He gestured around at his teammates, vaguely, tone wry. "Our asses don't look up for it?"

Him, keeping weight off his bad leg.

Christophe, one-armed and pale.

Rochelle, nursing her injured hand.

Ellis, broken and distant.

Nick, absent.

As much as he didn't want to admit it, Coach legitimately had to wonder. Were they together enough - strong enough - to venture out? Pick up and move? Should he put his foot down and veto the idea, or take advantage of the chance for some much-needed relief? They could clean themselves and their clothes, even warm up some soup and have a hot meal... And with Chris' burgeoning struggle to eat, a hot and appetizing meal might make the difference.

He felt out of touch with his team. Nick and Ellis had been so far from what he thought, and Rochelle had been party to it. It left him unsure, off his footing, and moreso than his injured knee made him. Leading a team, a well-oiled machine - that was one thing.

Now that they had fractured, did he know how to pull them back together?
Knowing it was petty and stupid and transparent didn't stop Nick from closing himself off in the bedroom.

He sat on the edge of the bed, cigarette held between his fingertips, trying to convince his other hand not to reach for his lighter. Every hum and buzz of conversation that was audible through the ceiling made that urge grow stronger, an unreasonable frustration coursing through him. Instead of feeling glad and relieved to not be a part of the goings-on, he just felt like shit.

Maybe it was the fact that Ellis was getting along better with a woman who'd mugged and pistol-whipped him, than with Nick.

It was pure anger that made him stow the cigarette back into its box, cramming it into his pocket. He wouldn't allow himself the indulgence, not with those sorts of thoughts going through his head. Who was he to yearn for what he'd willfully thrown away? It's over. You need to start acting that way, buddy. He's not yours anymore. Get over it, and stop feeling so fucking much.

Unfortunately, the feelings were not so simply numbed. Looking at Ellis made something in him ache, something far-off and muted, a vague pining for any lingering hope that he could be the type of guy who could make it work. Make them work.

Make anything work in his entire life.

It was easier to admit he wanted Ellis, now that he knew it was over.

The idea of someone like Ellis, someone good, wanting to be around him for longer than it took for a drink and a fuck, seeing through him and still wanting him; he didn't have it in him to deny it was enticing. Still, wasn't it just wishful thinking to believe Ellis actually wanted him? And how far was he willing to go down that rabbit hole, knowing how it would go in the end?

He didn't know what scared him more: opening himself up to care about Ellis, only to have the kid grow sick and tired of him - or the awareness that he would inevitably ruin it. Nick would cheat, or hurt him, or lose interest. There was no path that didn't converge on a single point: they'd never last.

If only that hurt less.

Surging up to stand, Nick released something close to a growl. Impulse made him raise a hand, striking himself across the cheek with a flat palm as if it might shake himself out of the spiral threatening. All it did was hurt, sting, but at least he could focus his mind on physical pain to the exclusion of whatever other pains lingered.

He'd landed the blow on the dulling bruise a Charger had left behind near his jawline. The pain caught him by surprise, a sharp cuss escaping him, doubling over as his eyes fought to water. They won.

It was almost defeatedly that Nick soothed a hand over his jaw, stubble scraping his fingertips. The presence of wetness across his vision just made him feel pathetic all over again. You're a mess. Nobody needs this shit right now, Nicolas. Least of all you. Pull it the fuck together.

Exhaling, some measured and feigned calm sunk over his expression. He brushed his eyes dry against his sleeve, making to sit back down.

He'd only just dropped when a knock sounded at the door.

Although he started to prickle, he forcefully cooled himself off. Rochelle was the only one light enough to get down the stairs without any noise, and she was the lesser of his worries. She was, if nothing else, the one who promised to keep her mouth shut.

"What?" he responded, aware it sounded rough. He could only hope it came off angry, rather than whatever it was he felt.

The door did not open, but Rochelle's voice came through the wood. She sounded wary, but spoke anyway. "I have good news. Thought you'd want to hear it. I can guess your answer, but figured you'd want a chance to respond before we made any plans."

Nick snorted, coldly, resisting the urge to spit back something sarcastic. He inhaled, sharply, closing his eyes and responding instead: "Don't make me say 'what' again."

There was a soft rustle, as if she'd pressed herself against the door. He was sure he heard her sigh, but she continued regardless. "The bikers have a place for us to go. They've got a generator, and hot water. We'll have to do some fighting to clear it out, but I figured you wouldn't need much more encouragement than the idea of getting cleaned up."

She should have been right - so why did he feel so apathetic?

Nick stirred up something like agitation in his chest, shaking his head at nobody. "You fucks are serious, aren't you? It isn't enough to sit around and gab with them, but now we're literally teaming up? How the fuck haven't you guys learned your lesson is beyond me."

He didn't expect her to explode, nor for the door to suddenly burst open. With no warning, Rochelle was standing in the doorway, one hand lingering on the knob while the other thrust toward him. "Jesus Christ, Nick. What lesson? Never to trust anyone ever again? Excuse me if I don't want my last days on this Earth spent being like y-"

Rochelle stopped. Regret blinked across her features, but Nick wasn't stupid. Like you. He wished that, too, hurt less.

Rather than acknowledge it, Nick placed a hand against his thigh and released a half-laugh. "Whatever." he uttered, not looking directly at her. The last thing he wanted to do was watch the mixture of anger and apology strangle itself on her features. "I'm outnumbered, so fine. When all this turns south, you guys'll only have yourself to blame. And I get first goddamn shower."

Gazing across the room at him, Rochelle allowed her hand to clasp over her stomach. She caught her lower lip between her teeth, exhaling shortly. "Chris needs a little rest before we do anything. I'm going to start packing up in the meantime." When she stepped into the room, Nick almost protested, but she was quick to take a step to the side and lean into the linen closet just to the right of the door.

He watched her flip through what was left, tucking some blankets and towels under her arm. She didn't make any effort to speak, which left them drenched in moderate silence as she gathered up what remained, and what seemed useful. She had only some difficulty with her injured hand, but seemed intent on powering through.

Nick might've gotten up to help, had things been different. Instead, he just observed.
Once she'd collected up enough - four woolen blankets and three thin beach towels of varying gaudy colour and design - Rochelle made to retreat, ducking for the door without a word. He should have let her go. He almost did. But some stupid, vestigial part of him needed her to understand. She was the closest thing he had to a friend.

"Would you have liked it more if I lied to him? Told him what he wanted to hear, instead of the truth?"

The producer halted as if she'd been grabbed, staring a moment out through the door before tenderly turning on a heel to glance back at him. He could see the thought in her eyes, weighing whether or not she should respond. But he'd been the one to break their silence, not her.

So, she rose to the challenge. "That's what you think you did? Told him the truth?" Her eyes flickered to a muted disapproval, darkening, and her lips pursed. "He thinks you hate him. You broke his heart."

Nick tightened his jaw against a snarl at the statement, unsure if it was the accusation that made him angry, or the fact it was undoubtedly true. "That was his own fault. I didn't make him care. All I did was put a stop to it before it got any worse."

Rochelle laughed, the sound full of a saddened yearning he couldn't quite decode. "God. You really think you stopped anything?" Before he could protest or question, she shook her head, attention going abruptly piercing on his expression. "You honestly don't have feelings for him?"

The question startled him, though he should have seen it coming. He couldn't stop his gaze from averting, squinting to the beat of that ache in his chest he couldn't shake. He wanted to say 'no,' wanted to laugh in her face and assure her just how ridiculous the notion was - but his lips had other plans, much despite himself. "I can't."

It was too close to the truth, and Rochelle blinked at him with a certain exhaustion. "That's not the same thing." she responded, simply, shrugging her armload closer and turning to slip out of the door. He watched her go, feeling nothing but burgeoning pain.

Isn't it close enough?
Chapter 179

Coach stood at the kitchen counter, gazing down at the pile of foodstuffs they'd stored. He couldn't help a slight frown, more thoughtful than anything else. "Y'all don't think this is too soon? Feel like we just got settled here." Reaching up to brush his palm over his scalp, rustling over the hair growing there.

It was tentatively that Ellis glanced over at him, chewing at his lower lip. He'd set himself to collecting their weapons from where they'd become scattered around the condo - his shotgun, Coach's double-barrel, Rochelle's new handgun, Nick's sniper rifle, and Christophe's machete. "Maybe. But gettin' washed up'd be worth it, especially fer Chris."

Quietly, the Spaniard spoke up from his place on the couch. "You think I smell, hermano?"

Ellis couldn't resist laughing, though it came out in an airy giggle, biting on his cheek and shooting a look at the other man that struggled between apology and chastisement. "No... if anyone stinks, it's us. Took that Boomer real hard." He thumbed at his cheek, scratching. "But keepin' you clean means fightin' off infection. 'N' bringin' the swellin' down."

Christophe gave a heavy grimace, eyes opening to turn a dulled glance his way. It wasn't quite the fear he'd shown at Ellis wielding a washcloth, but close. "More wash... mierda."

"Keith don't like it either." Ellis exhaled a little tautly, fiddling fingertips against the coffee table where he'd arranged the weaponry. He traced fingertips over the butt of his shotgun, idly. "Always gotta haul him caterwaulin' intuh the bath when he's hurt."

Rhiannon had taken up a seat against the wall, knees bent up toward her chest and arms wrapped around them. Her iron-banded baseball bat lay snug between her heels and rump, frowning gently as she watched them. It didn't seem so much dislike or distaste as it was unease - discomfort, maybe.

He'd thought she was opening up, softening, but the moment her banter had died she'd retreated back into a strange awkwardness. Like she'd stepped too far out of familiar territory and only belatedly realized it, though it wasn't harsh so much as self-conscious.

It reminded him of Nick, a little, and that dragged his lips into a frown at the same time he felt a distant and sad fondness.

Pacing in front of the glass doors to the balcony, Lena held her brush axe with both hands, slow and cautious movements swinging it along with her steps. It seemed like exercise, taking advantage of the heavy weapon to gently stretch out her arms and shoulders.

"Who's Keith?" she questioned, lightly and with off-hand interest.

"Muh best friend." Ellis stood up, grabbing Chris' machete. Lena offered a blink, then nodded, unaware of any reason to think his response odd - the curtness, the simplicity. It was left to Coach to stare at the younger Georgian, looking faintly shocked. "'Ey, man. You should take this."

Carefully tensing, the foreigner looked up at him, fingers curling against the sofa as if to steady himself. He avoided meeting Ellis' gaze directly, protesting thickly, "... I do not think I will be any help with it. Keep it, please."

Frowning to himself, Coach withheld his thoughts. Watching Ellis not rise to take the bait of talking about Keith - to someone new, most of all - it scared him, a little. There were so many warning signs in his behaviour, his stability, yet somehow that seemed the most severe.

At least Ellis was trying to keep things together. They had to, if for no other reason than survival.

"It'll be okay." The mechanic put on a smile, sincerity warming his eyes, turning the machete around to offer the handle toward him. "Better tuh have it on hand, in case you need it. We'll all be with yuh. Ain't nothin' bad gonna happen."

Christophe did not look convinced, a strained discontent flickering across his features - but he relented, reaching up his hand to grab the machete from him. He lifted it up above his head, slowly flexing fingers against the handle, a quiet thought collapsing his expression into something small. "Sí." he mumbled, quietly.

Ellis' prop smile faded soon after, turning his attention back toward the brunette biker where she moved in smooth patterns along the width of the balcony doorway. She was staring after Chris, and Ellis cocked his head in clear question.

Lena acknowledged it without looking at him, tongue flicking to wet her lips before she spoke. "I don't want to be rude, but - I'm flippin' shocked you're alive." Stopping, she set the tip of her axe against the ground, wrapping her elbow around the shaft to rest her weight on it. "How'd you even survive?"

Blinking at her, forced to tip his chin up and look at her almost upside-down, Chris managed a weary grin that did not touch his eyes. "No sé... if I am honest. I was not awake for it. Ask them, ¿sí?" He jerked the tip of his machete in Ellis' direction, though the end of its arc included Coach in the gesture, too.

So, the big man shrugged a shoulder, aware of both of their new acquaintances looking in his direction. "Nick's the one to thank, mostly." he admitted, aware of a flatness at the edge of his voice - and the way Ellis suddenly looked down toward the floor, lips tightening against each other. "Burnt the stump shut. Boy would'a bled out otherwise."

Christophe's expression went conflicted, suddenly, brows threatening to lift like the words surprised him.

"Burnt?" Lena echoed, tone bewildered. Her eyes widened vaguely to stare closely at Christophe's bandaged stump shoulder, too shocked to take notice of how he flinched with the attention. He let his gaze drop and his eyes, eventually, close. "You mean like cautery?"

Bursting in with a soft utterance, Rhiannon gripped a hand against her shin tightly. "Shitfuck. That's hardcore." Her sister shot her a disapproving squint, quick to raise her hands. "Freaking amazing is what it is." Pointing toward the ground in a firm motion, Lena shook her head. "The fact that that worked... I mean, you use electrocautery to stop bleeding, but... not... this."

She lifted a hand to press her thumb between her lips, nibbling thoughtfully at her thumbnail. "Makes you wonder if it's luck, or -"

Rochelle came up from the stairs, wielding an armload of linens. "Luck would have been him not getting hurt in the first place, but y'know." She swept quickly around the railing, hurrying into the kitchen in such a rush that Ellis swore he felt a breeze follow her passage.

He also swore that when he glanced back at her, he caught a glimpse of something odd on her expression. If he hadn't known her as well as he did, he might've missed the signs of tears.
"And yeah. Nick's the only reason a lot of us are here. We're also the only reason he's here."
Almost throwing the blankets and towels onto the counter, Rochelle set her hands against her hips, only a faint flinch marking the pain from her hand. She sounded angry, curt. Focused, most of all.
"Let's start loading up the car."

Frowning, Ellis was quick to his feet. She'd gone downstairs to speak with Nick, ensure he was on board to go - and now she came back distressed? He'd made her cry?

He started to advance, raising a hand to catch fingertips onto the brim of his hat, only to watch as she looked directly at him... and stepped to return to the stairs. Her posture could not have spoken more clearly of retreat, and all he could do was look after her as she made to return to the first floor.

"I'll get the backpack from the bedroom." she muttered over her shoulder, cool and so much more collected than her expression spoke to.

Ellis wrung his hands carefully in front of his chest, staring after her, his heart jumping into his throat. She didn't want to talk to him, and he didn't know how to feel about that. Was something wrong? Had Nick said something? He must have agreed to the move, but... there was something else.

He barely noticed as Coach began to organize the foodstuffs into piles he could carry, stacking cans. "Guess that's that." he grumbled, only a quiet irate quality to his voice. He, too, seemed concerned, but his worry died out into a disgruntled weariness. "Ellis, young'un. Come help me."

Lowering his chin, Ellis reluctantly obeyed. He kept his eyes on the staircase, mind spinning and whirling faster than he could control. If there was something wrong, why wouldn't Rochelle tell him? Maybe she was just waiting until they could get privacy from the bikers - but if that had been the case, surely she'd have given him a look or a nod.

No, she'd fled from him.

It was hollowly that he started to scoop up some of their supplies, barely watching his own hands as they moved. He hardly noticed as Coach dumped a few cans into the crook of his arm, merely grunting and adjusting to the added load. The health teacher slipped him a look of vague question.

He couldn't panic. He'd stow away the feelings, and save them for later. Later, when he could just ask her what was happening.

Ellis turned, averting his gaze when he found Lena crossing the loft toward them. She raised her weapon to tuck it behind her back, guiding its shaft into the holster strapped across her body, letting it hang there. "I'll help." she offered, stretching her freed arms up toward Coach in a cradling gesture.

The big man humoured her, something close to a grin making its way across his features. "Offerin' a chance to clean up ain't help 'nough?" He shrugged his shoulder to emphasize the vomit-soaked slope of his shirt, and the short biker's expression drew into a wary smile that softened her eyes.

"It's a start."
With a grunt, Ellis tossed his armload into the sedan's trunk. He took the time to carefully arrange the food, setting the cans at the bottom and laying the bags of granola atop them. It was mindless organization, something to put his mind to.

Better than thinking about Nick and Rochelle. Try as he might, he couldn't shake mulling over what might have happened. If they'd had a fight - and if it had been about him - why hadn't Rochelle told him yet?

If he didn't fight it, he might get angry. He felt the sensation of fury lingering at the edge of his head like the creeping, hunched presence of a Hunter ready to pounce. He didn't feel on the verge of tears anymore; he felt on the verge of shouting.

Wasn't it the next stage of grief? Denial, first, because Nick surely hadn't meant what he said. Surely he hadn't found it so easy to toss him aside... surely hadn't looked at him that way, touched him that way, if not for love...

Now came anger.

Inhaling, Ellis rested his hands against the rim of the trunk. He slumped, closing his eyes. He didn't want to be angry. The emotion had never suited him, and he'd never found that getting fired up and hollering solved many problems. But he was human, and he wanted so badly to holler.

He didn't even know at whom - maybe Nick, maybe Rochelle. Maybe himself, or no one in particular at all. He just wanted to vent out the frustration building in his chest before it reached some critical mass. Better than lingering in the helpless fugue that had overtaken him.

What if Nick had told Rochelle he'd really never cared for him?

Patting palms against the car, Ellis uttered an agitated sigh and stepped back. He turned to circle it and make for the condo, eager to continue loading the car. As he moved, he raised his eyes and watched as the blonde, taller biker hop-stepped down the staircase.

Rhiannon had replaced her protective gear, kneepads and shinguards strapped on tight, but had her jacket carefully folded over her forearm. The woman blinked at him, freezing for just a second before continuing down.

"Hey." she uttered, making to quickly step out from in front of the staircase. She couldn't work out something feral in her posture, an energy edging her steps like she were squaring up for a fight.

"You look pissed."

Ellis waved off the inherent question, barely slowing as he moved to pass her. "'M fine." he responded, soft and idle - words that turned into little more than a startled surge of air when Rhiannon grabbed his arm. She didn't quite apply the force and grip required to halt him, but he stopped anyway.

Shooting her a bewildered glance, he was almost surprised to find her staring ahead blindly. She did not meet his gaze, and her words were spoken through the side of her mouth.

"Hey, buddy. I don't know what's going on with you shitters, but - I know you got the most reason to hate me, and you're the one who took out that Hunter. And got your friends to give us a chance. And stopped that crazy asshole from shooting me the first time we met."
His mouth gawped, slightly, and she turned her face to direct a steely and stiff-jawed look at him. He could see the strain gratitude put on her expression. "So. I wanna know. We cool?"

Ellis wanted to laugh, suddenly, because it was almost absurd. She was so low on his list of worries, so far off his radar - and maybe that was irresponsible of him. Shouldn't he have been more worried, considering what she had tried to do? He could hear Nick now.

What the fuck is your problem, dumbshit? Do I have to save you from every bad actor in the apocalypse?

But Nick wouldn't. Not anymore.

Shaking his head before the thought could sink in, Ellis averted his eyes. "Uh... Yeah. 'Course." He tried to shrug her grip loose, but it only tightened. When he glanced back at her, he found her expression drawn in a frown with her teeth bared and tongue bitten under her cracked canine.

He got the feeling she misread his conflict.

"That face says no." She let him go, abruptly, taking a step back and spreading her arms in something nearly threatening. Her expression, however, was anything but - she flashed a grin and cocked her head as if to offer her cheek for a kiss. "C'mon. Hit me."

Shocked, Ellis let his jaw swing open. His eyes could have bugged out of his head for how wide they flashed, darting around Rhiannon's face. It wasn't the first time someone had urged him to punch them - Keith did it often enough, either for dares or as a way to avoid uttering the words 'I'm sorry' - but a girl?

He had never hit a girl. Never wanted to, or been in the position to. The idea stung so ferociously at his sense of honor. It hadn't been pleasant to watch Nick do it the first time, and he had no intention of doing it himself.

"No, no way - it's fine, really..." he babbled, putting up his hands in a guarded gesture. "I don't wanna do that. We're fine, I promise."

Rhee flexed her jaw with a gape and then clenched her teeth, speaking past them. "I hit you, you hit me." She kept her cheek turned outward. "Come on. Even it out. I can take a punch from some little cunt redneck."

The insult might have sparked a nerve, had he not known so clearly it was an attempt to rile him into attacking. That, too, was something Keith did. He retreated a step, only to have her advance to match.

"Look -"

But the biker was already leaning in, voice attaining the nasty twist he remembered viscerally from her robbery attempt. "Too much of a pussy? Come on, do it. Hit me. Or does your dickwad buddy do all the work around here?"

That hurt, and for reasons beyond him. It wasn't machismo or insecurity, but it was something deep and instinctual - a sort of fear. Nick wasn't his buddy anymore. Not his lover. Not his... anything.

Not his, anymore.

"You can't be a huge cream puff. You made it this far, and I bet it wasn't totally on the backs of those other shitbags." She reached out, suddenly, shoving knuckles against his chest to push him Something blinked on in him, like a light or a flame - or maybe it blinked out, leaving him in some moment of quiet dark. All he knew was there was a surge of bile up the back of his throat, hearing that word, alongside the pang of pain through his chest.

A word and a pain that did nothing but remind him of Jerry.

He wanted to say he didn't panic, but the alternative was saying he was fully conscious when his fist collided with Rhiannon's chin.

It wasn't the most collected punch. He realized his own motion halfway through and tried ferociously to abort the gesture, but his momentum carried him into a swing. It caught the biker off-guard, and he practically heard her teeth grind as her jaw popped sideways under the blow.

Horror and regret shot through him as her head snapped back, and he tried to grab for her arm as the rest of her body followed suit. His fingers slipped on her bare wrist, however, and he had to watch her fall flat on her rump on the grass.

"Oh!" escaped him, snapping both his hands flat over his mouth. "Gawd - Lordy, I'm -"

Rhiannon's voice was muffled as she grabbed fingertips against her jawline, a vague groan touching her tone. "Fuck me!" She rolled into a lean, hunching forward. "Cheap shot, you shitfuck!"

She started laughing, and Ellis couldn't help a distressed noise, dropping to a crouch. He lifted his hands to hover them in a helpless gesture, waving. "I'm sorry! I didn't mean to -"

"What the fudge-nuts!" High and bewildered, Lena's voice burst from up the stairs. Ellis barely had time to react before she was sprinting, stumbling down the stairs. He recoiled, shame dragging his lips into a frown.

His knuckles hurt, but his heart hurt worse.

After all he'd been through, had he finally reached some breaking point? Violence had never been in him. Sinking a knife into Jerry's thigh had been self-defense under the animal fear of dying. He'd orchestrated Rochelle shooting Brenda, but it hadn't been his finger on the trigger.

He'd always tried so hard to cling to goodness. Where had the instinct to strike come from, and why? It felt so contrary to everything he felt about himself. It was all he could do not to fall to his knees and beg for forgiveness.

Or run, rather than face his actions. But that was what Nick would do, wasn't it?

"I didn't mean tuh, I swear!"

When Lena reached them, almost slipping off the last wooden stair, she dropped to a knee and grabbed her younger sister's arm. It was with no small surprise that Ellis watched the brunette's ire flare... and turn on Rhiannon.

"What did you do? Rhee, I turn my back for two seconds, and you start up crap -" While the blonde choked out a laugh, Lena grabbed a hand under her jaw and forced her face upwards, examining for damage. She thumbed under Rhiannon's chin and squinted eyes into their twin pair. "And not even with the one who already hates your freakin' big-headed -"
Shoving her head into a jerk to free herself from the attentions, Rhiannon rolled her jaw in its sockets with an audible pop-crackle. "Chill, damn! We were settling things."

Her gaze flicked up, meeting Ellis' in his horror. She seemed almost inclined to frown, puzzled at his expression, and it was with a grunt that she grabbed at her sister's shoulder to haul herself off the ground. Lena helped, snatching a hand at the waist of her pants to pull her upright.

Reaching her feet with a hop, Rhee flashed that cracked smile, fingertips nursing over the injured slope of her jaw. "We're good now. Right?"

Ellis balled his fist up, thumbing over the soft tenderness there from colliding with her mandible. He wanted to frown, but forced a vague smile back, instead.

He didn't feel good - and mostly because he felt a little better, like he'd vented out something that had been building pressure in him. It left him hollow, but better that than full to bursting with emotion.

"Did I hurt you...?" he questioned, tremulously, approaching a step or two.

She snorted, reaching out to shove at him again, palm pushing at his shoulder. He took it with dug-in heels, resisting the stumble. "What do I fuckin' look like, my sister?" Lena scowled sideways at her, affection bleeding through. "You got a right hook, though. And I thought you Georgia shits were all talk."

Ellis' face heated up, embarrassment flooding down his spine. He raised a hand and rubbed at his neck, shaking his head. "I... Usually am." he tried to joke, weakly.

Rhiannon outright laughed, palming over her jaw. "Not today, motherfucker." She turned, patting sand and scraggly grass off the seat of her pants, and started to wander off toward the garage and her stowed motorcycle with a long-legged swagger. "Least that's settled."

As she left, Ellis dropped his chin, wary of Lena's attention turning to him, but it didn't. She merely slid on her heel to half-spin, following after her sister - though not without a wink over her shoulder.

"Don't feel bad. She could make Mother Teresa grab for a switch." the brunette uttered, quickening her pace to catch up with her sister.

Ellis couldn't help but snort, expression softening just a little to something quietly ashamed. He looked after the two women, watching as they ducked into the garage. He looked at his fist, too, observing the rising redness blooming amidst his knuckles.

He didn't like the color.

Sighing, he pushed both his hands into the pockets of his coveralls, raising his head. He glanced toward the beach condo, intent on returning to grab something else to load into the car.

His motions fell to a slumped energy, trying not to think. The two women had acted like it were nothing, but it didn't feel like nothing. He didn't want to change, or let things change him. Punching someone shouldn't have been an act within his power.

Ellis took the stairs at a careful and plodding pace, worrying his lower lip between his teeth. It was a bad sign when he was almost looking forward to getting on the move and fighting some infected.

The front door had been left cracked open, so he nudged an elbow into the space and leveraged it Cigarette smoke struck him an instant before his eyes alighted on Nick, leaned against the wall next to the window. Ellis' eyes widened faintly, taking in how the blinds were parted enough to see past - how the gambler was bent in toward it -

Ellis didn't have to wonder how much he'd seen. The answer was scrawled across those rugged features.

The softest glimmer of humour shone in his eyes, greens gone fractionally readable in a weak flash of emotion. Then they broke away, and Nick stared out the window, teeth clenched around his cigarette.

Shame exploded through Ellis with such ferocious and cutting force that he could do little more than drop his gaze. Nick had seen everything, and that was almost worse. It wasn't bad enough that they were broken up; Nick had to see him in such a state?

Ducking his chin, Ellis accelerated his pace to practically rush through the doorway and up the stairs, making every effort not to look at the older man. He dodged everyone else just the same, funneling his energy into motion.

He missed, then, the wistful way Nick slanted a glance after him. The vague bemusement that bled into his posture. Like there were a puzzle before him, and only force of will kept him from investigating.

Nick let smoke billow from his nostrils.
Tapping his cigarette out over the grass, Nick licked idly at the backs of his teeth.

He didn't know what to think, really. Watching Ellis punch the biker out had been the single best thing to happen to him in what felt like years. He'd struggled, at first, watching them square up, but he restrained the urge to intercede.

Sure, it made rage flood him - but it wasn't his job to clean up the kid's mess. He wanted to go down and eviscerate her the instant she put a hand on Ellis, but he forced himself to remain stagnant. Better that than the mixed signals he was liable to send... so he watched, trying to ignore the boiling temperature of his blood.

Then she went down. Nick wasn't sure what he felt more like doing: laughing at the thief's suffering, or getting his hands on the Georgian. He also wasn't sure what it said about him that watching the man lay somebody out was enough to stoke a fire in him.

It did not, however, last. Past the humour, past the arousal, a quiet discontent sunk in. He wasn't stupid enough to miss that Ellis was upset, but seeing him explode in such uncharacteristic violence was startling. Surprisingly attractive, but startling.

Was he really that upset? And what the fuck did she say to get him to snap? He was at fault, surely, but it had to have been more than that. All the things the kid had been through, all the things Nick had put him through, it had never pushed him to physical retaliation.

And he'd looked humiliated as he'd stormed past.

Exhaling sharply, Nick flicked his cigarette away with his pinky, licking the tacky flavour of menthols from his lips. What's it matter? Not your business, anyway. Shaking his head, he turned to face the car sitting in the driveway, mindlessly taking the time to grind his cigarette into the sand with his heel. Not the time to pretend you give a shit, Nick.

Rochelle was nervously pacing alongside the sedan, while Coach shoved their icebox of water into the trunk. His jaw was set tightly, a hand raising quickly to brush over his forehead and wipe off sweat from his skin. "Gettin' hot." he muttered with a sigh. "If these showers don't pan out, I might lose my mind."

Pushing a hand into his slacks pocket, letting his posture slump, Nick allowed a snort. "My shirt still reeks." Coach didn't make much effort to acknowledge him, closing the trunk with a slam that sounded harder than was necessary. "So, what's the plan? Follow these bitch bikers into some fucking trap?"

The big man grimaced toward him. "Nicolas." he chided, simply.

Leaned down where she stood, Lena tightened the bungee cables holding their duffel bag to the motorcycle rack. She raised her voice without raising her head, tone pinched. "Nobody's forcing you to come, dude. But for the record, we're not trying to kill you."

Nick rolled his eyes, lips going taut as he shrugged up a shoulder. "Well, then." he growled quietly. He mostly believed her, but that didn't stop him from protesting. If they were intent on traveling that road, it would be with his loud opposition. "Neato. That's all I needed to hear. Now I can rest goddamn easy."
Rhiannon stood with her hip against the side of the motorcycle, thumbing against her leather jacket. Her lip curled away from her teeth, a quiet agitation flitting past her eyes. "You -"

In a flash, Nick turned on his heels to face her, snapping the fingers of one hand so his index finger ended in a threatening point toward her. 'Do I look like I want to hear from the chick who got sucker-punched by a fucking hayseed?"

Both Coach and Rochelle turned, confusion sparking between them. She spoke first, shrugging her shoulders up in an insecure gesture. "What? Ellis? What are you talking about, Nick?"

Lena paused, hands stilling on the duffel bag. She lifted her head, teeth catching on the inside of her cheek and eyes darting toward Nick. He leveled his gaze with hers, a small smirk touching his lips as he recognized her anxiety. Nothing would destroy their chances of assimilating with the group like getting into a fight with Ellis.

_I should know, considering._ That soured his mood, and he reached up a hand to scratch at his eyebrow. He meant to shift the conversation away, toy with her, but didn't get the chance.

"Nothin'." came Ellis' voice, and all eyes lifted toward the condo's main staircase. The Georgian had his arm looped around Christophe's waist, body tucked under the foreigner's armpit to support him.

Nick slid his hand up, knuckling into his shoulder, massaging a stinging pain into his muscle. He allowed his eyes to track the younger man, even as he tilted his chin down to shade them. Annoyance flickered through him, though faded.

"Are we good to go? I think we got everythin'." Rochelle frowned at him, and the look on her features spoke to lingering curiousity - but Chris gained her attention, surging to hurry forward and wait at the bottom of the stairs for them. "Yeah, I think so." She set a hand against the stair railing, watching as they began their descent.

It was a tough thing to watch. Ellis and Chris stayed molded close to one another, the Georgian taking his weight in a solid and constant lean. The Spaniard looked vaguely out of it - like he was focused so harshly on some distant point he couldn't recognize what was in front of him.

He tightened fingers on Ellis' upper arm, squeezing. "Cuidado." he whispered sideways, voice a trembling hush. "Me siento mareado."

Quickly, Ellis soothed him with a cluck of his tongue, encouraging him into a few more steps. "I got'cha, man." he promised, glancing up at Rochelle with a faint squint as if sensing her concern. "He's a'ight. Think it's mostly the painkillers."

She nodded, advancing to hover near them as they reached the ground. Chris’ Vans hit the scraggly grass and slid on the sand, but Ellis was prepared. It didn't take much at all to catch him, and the Georgian braced his knee against the other man's in order to keep him upright.

"I got'cha!" he repeated, cheeriness forged into his tone. Chris nodded slowly, thickly, following his pull.

Rochelle's frown deepened, following behind as the two men walked toward the parked sedan. "Alright. Let's get everyone into the car." She turned her head as she walked, eyes flickering toward the two women. "What's the plan? We'll follow you?"

Wiping her hands together, Lena stood, wincing vaguely. "Makes sense. It's not that far. Rhee and I will lead on the bike. If we run into trouble, she and I can take it. Hopefully we won't, but -"

"Whoa. Whoa." Nick's hands both raised, fingers splayed, advancing a step. His shoulders raised in aggressive tension, eyes narrowing. "Run that one past me again?"

Ellis frowned, but did not speak. He approached the car with Chris tight against his side, nodding gratefully as Coach opened the rear passenger door. The process of getting the Spaniard in the car was awkward, but he slid in with his stumped shoulder leading, letting his arm stay hooked over Ellis' shoulders as he went.

Crossing her arms over her chest, Rochelle turned to face Nick. Her posture shifted, widening, matching his. "What, Nick?" she spat out, maintaining a remarkably flat expression compared to her tone. "What is it this time?"

The gambler approached one long step closer, bending at the waist a few degrees to come closer to eye-level. He had shown some vague weakness to her earlier, and had no intention of letting it stand. "When did it get decided they were going to lead us? And we're supposed to trust they won't lead us into a trap, or just fucking abandon us out there?"

Rochelle did not so much as flinch. Her chocolate-brown eyes turned such a frustration on him, he was the one tempted to break.

"What the hell reason would they have for doing that?" She didn't even sound angry, just exasperated. "If they wanted to kill us, they'd have done it already, or let the horde earlier get to us. If they wanted to lose us, they'd have left when they had the chance. So go ahead, Nick. Explain this bout of paranoia to me, or are you just being a bitch?"

Nick's lip curled up from his teeth, advancing, but Lena was abruptly walking toward them. Her hands lifted in a defensive gesture. "Hey, easy. It's okay. Let's -"

That burst a nearly furious sound from Nick, throwing his arms up. "Oh, well, fuck me right up the ass, some Sonny Barger wannabe thinks it's okay." His voice grew louder as he went, unable to put a stopper on the fury rising in his chest. "I guess we're goddamn fine and dandy, then! I'll just take a goddamn nap. Wake me when we fucking get there."

Nick had the distinct feeling of being observed, like his team merely gazed upon him, waiting for him to quiet. It made him feel impotent, and that was almost as infuriating as being ignored outright.

"Shitbird." Rhiannon muttered under her breath, just loud enough to be heard.

Had Nick had the time to react, he might have rounded on her and started anew in rage. However, before he so much as registered the insult, Lena was speaking. Her voice raised as if to speak over her sister. "Let's compromise. We'll swap a member, okay? So neither of us can abandon each other."

Nick had to utter a laugh. "Oh, like hell. Been here before, lady, I'm not giving you a hostage."

Standing up from easing Chris into his seat, Ellis couldn't stop the smallest glance over his shoulder. Past a frown, he couldn't avoid an awareness: he'd been the hostage Nick had left behind before. He also couldn't avoid the distant piece of him that wished Nick might glance his way in that moment, that those eyes might give away some insecurity. Some emotion other than anger.

That thought frustrated him into surging back around, leaning in to carefully pat Christophe on the leg. The Spaniard gave him a weak grin, vaguely drugged.
"Tu amante, se puso furioso." he uttered, earning a confused blink back from Ellis.

"We'll both have a hostage." Rochelle pointed out, tone dry, with an apologetic edge to the way she glanced at the other two women. Lena tilted her head in quiet acquiescence, like a soft 'it's okay.'
"One of them in the car, one of us on the bike. Besides, it'll let us split our hand radios to keep in touch."

Nick fell to a scowl, unable to stop his body from retreating one staggered step. He darted his tongue to wet his lips, glancing toward Coach - a futile gesture, as he'd receive no support from the ex-football player. The big man briefly lifted a brow at him, daring him to argue.

"Fine." he snapped off, reaching down to draw his Magnum from his thigh holster. He tapped the muzzle against his palm, pointedly, in a gesture that drew nothing but a quietly disdainful blink from Rochelle. "I'll go on the death trap. Gets me a fucking break from you guys, anyway."

Faint surprise flashed over Rochelle's face, and she scattered an abruptly nervous glance between Lena and Coach. "I was thinking Ellis, or me." she returned, carefully, sliding a palm against her cheek. "Someone not as likely to overreact?"

Nick tightened his jaw, agitation rolling his eyes, but it was the brunette biker who spoke, raising an index finger.

"No, it makes sense. If he's the one with issues, he should be the one to do it. Anyone else goes and he'll just be nervous the whole time." Her eyes - primarily green with that slash of brown - shifted toward Nick, holding a firm and sincere attention on his face. He matched it, letting a brow twitch in a clear indication of contempt. "Rhee can go with you guys."

The blonde barked out a sound of protest, but Lena raised a hand to silence her into a quiet grunt. The younger woman shifted antsily on her feet, but took a few silent and agitated steps away from the bike in a relenting gesture.

Keeping his head low, Ellis turned to face the group. He hated the feeling of relief that crept in his chest; the plan meant Nick wouldn't be trapped in a car with him for the move. His lips twitched uncertainly, before he offered up, "Means if we get separated or somethin', we'll still have someone tuh lead us."

Nick slit a glare his way, and the subtle narrow to it made it supremely clear Nick read between the lines. There was something angry in the look; an agitation. "Shit's for the best." he snapped off, shortly, and Ellis let his eyes avert toward the ground.

It was wishful thinking to feel like he reacted out of hurt.

Lena turned, reaching to pull one of the two motorcycle helmets from where they dangled off the bike's rear-view mirrors. She shoved it over her head, straightening it out, and took the time to zip up her leather jacket. Her hands dusted over the protective pads strapped over her knees and shins, testing their grip with a tug or two, before she grabbed the other helmet and held it out toward the gambler.

He drew his chin up, sidling across the grass and up onto the driveway concrete. Rhiannon advanced to pass him, and they seemed liable to snap at each other like wild dogs as they drew near. He managed to resist the urge - but she did flash her cracked canine at him in an irritated half-snarl, one he could read like an open book.

She was scared, and that made him smirk. He had no intention of doing anything that wasn't self-defense, but he wouldn't say no to having her be afraid of him. \textit{Over-estimate me, under-estimate me; I don't really give a shit as long as the assclown doesn't know what I'm capable of.}

With little more than a sneer, he stepped up and snatched the helmet out of Lena's hands.

The brunette let it go without a fight, expression now hidden behind the blacked-out window of her helmet's faceplate. Her voice came out just a little muffled, cocking her weight onto a hip. "I'd get Rhiannon to give you some gear, but I don't think it'd fit you. I'll try not to crash."

Nick flashed her a look of irritation before he lifted the helmet and drew it down over his head. It was a slightly tight fit, but it would work. He didn't bother to respond, turning to glance back at the sedan. He watched as Ellis slid into the car next to Christophe and Rhiannon stepped anxiously around to enter from the other side, baseball bat gripped in a cross over her chest as she opened the door and ducked inside.

He could just see her through the back window, and her body ended up squished against the inside of the door like she was trying to shrink away. It was likely in the interest of avoiding Chris' stumped arm, now facing her, but Nick liked to think it was discomfort. He wanted nothing more than for their car ride to be cripplingly awkward.

Coach stepped to the driver's seat, and with Rochelle hanging half out of the passenger side door, he glanced up. "A'ight. You lead, we'll be behind." he uttered, firmly. At Lena's nod, he opened the door and slid inside, Rochelle following suit with one last wary glance toward Nick.

Two car door slams later, and Lena turned toward the motorcycle. Grabbing the handle of her brush axe, she swung it up to collide the shaft against her shoulder, taking its weight there with her wrist hooked over the top to keep it from tipping backwards. "Okay. Think we can be civil?"

Nick went to smirk - but quickly faltered, reminding himself that she couldn't see his expression anymore than he could see hers. He grunted aloud instead, shaking his head. "That's up to you." he snapped back, and when her head cocked as if in preparation to respond, he pointed at the motorcycle. "Let's fucking go."

Grimacing to himself within the privacy of the borrowed motorcycle helmet, Nick approached the flank of the vehicle, setting a hand firmly on the biker's shoulder to brace himself as he slid up behind her.

Settling down, Nick braced a hand back against the bike beneath him, palm flat on the leather seat. Lena noticed, head turning to speak over her shoulder. "It's okay. You can put an arm around me. I won't bite, and it's safer." There was no malice, no mockery - nothing but a vague and hesitant warmth, like an olive branch.

He stared her down, silent in his disdain, so she shrugged at him and turned back around. She grasped ahold of her weapon, sliding it back and hooking the hilt within the bungee cables that rigged down their duffel bag. It remained within reach, sheathed and curved blade nestled against Nick's side.
She slipped a hand onto the bike keys and twisted them in the ignition, the bike rumbling to life. It was quieter than he expected, more a purr than a roar, and the woman lifted her foot enough to let it skid against the ground as she twisted the handle. The bike gave a lurid growl, effortlessly kicking into motion, rolling down the driveway.

Lena guided it past the sedan, and Nick was aware of eyes on him from inside. He inhaled, fighting off a sense of annoyance. While riding bitch wasn't optimal, neither was he interested in piloting the metal contraption. He'd never had the need to learn or the desire to, and getting on it at all was an unpleasant prospect. It vibrated dangerously beneath him, and he felt tremendously close to falling off.

At least they'll be more miserable than me.

He had approximately five seconds to enjoy that thought before Lena drove them through the opened front gate and out into the street - at which point she gave it some gas, causing the bike to lurch, and the sudden shift of balance caused Nick to snatch an arm around her waist. It was that or fall, and he'd had enough scarring and pain for one lifetime.

Nick heard her laugh, just a faint chuckle. The only reason he didn't outright demand to be let off was that she'd waited just long enough to get the fence between them and the sedan, saving him the pain of having everyone else witness it. That did not, however, stop him from internally making a note to get revenge.

Somehow.

Suddenly, he second-guessed who had it worse.
Chapter 182

There was quiet in the sedan - or the closest approximation to it, with Christophe in the back.

He sat leaned against Ellis, slumped into the curve of his arm, voice a low and thoughtless mutter. It didn't seem to be to anyone in particular, and most of it was in Spanish.

"Si hubiese sabido que iba a ser así no hubiese dejado - deseo haberme quedado en España..."

Ellis tried to keep his arm tucked tight against the carseat, making sure it didn't touch the foreigner's stumped arm. He frowned, distantly, eyes on his knees. The silence of his teammates itched at him, made almost worse by Christophe's quiet utterances. His nerves frayed at the sound - until he inhaled, and focused on listening, instead. The man's voice was a little soothing, with its rolling trill... even if he didn't really understand a word.

That, and he sensed that even had he spoken the language, it wouldn't have been very intelligible.

"Deseo haber ido con el. You know? Deseo. No hago bien a nadie."

Ellis tried to nod, soothingly, and it seemed to work well enough to calm the foreigner. Chris turned his chin, face nearly buried into Ellis' chest. The gesture startled him just slightly, but he tried to take it in stride.

"El corazón me duele... Hermano, you know. Tú y yo."

Rhiannon glanced over at them, lips quirking, but said nothing. She'd been tensely silent the entire time, huddled around her baseball bat with a certain nervous energy, out of place and isolated. Ellis would have normally extended some conversation to lighten the atmosphere, but he had little left to give.

The sedan trundled along the roadway, dodging obstacles and corpses under the careful guiding hand of Coach. They followed along behind the motorcycle, both moving at a fairly slow pace, half to keep close to each other and half to avoid making too much engine noise.

With the commotion and pipe bomb earlier, the area directly around the beach condo had been fairly quiet. It did not, however, last long. Within a few turns, the motorcycle led them onto a street littered with infected.

The survivors' presence quickly earned them some attention. "Fuck." Nick hissed from his place on the back of the bike, bracing himself with a tension, expecting the woman to speed them past. She did not.

Lena shoved her head into a jerk. "Grab the axe." she called loud enough to be heard through her helmet, an instruction that made Nick grimace. He was loathe to release her, and even moreso to add the heavy weapon's burden to his poor balance.

He was, however, beyond loathe to reveal those concerns, and retracted his arms from her waistline. The Northerner grabbed onto the brush axe's lengthy handle, just beneath the curved blade, and yanked it free of its bindings to the chassis of the motorcycle. It was not light, especially with his lingering shoulder pain, but he gritted his teeth and dragged it into his lap.

"The fuck am I supposed to do with -"
Lena's enthusiastic twist of the motorcycle handle sent them rollicking into an easy lunge, cutting across the road. The handful of infected streaming toward them followed eagerly, sprinting into an awkward clump as they followed the growl of the engine. Their screaming rose to a fever pitch, enraged.

She yelped, "Joust, dude!", as they approached. Nick had little option but to obey, even as he wanted to complain mightily. He got one hand on the handle mid-way up, twisting it to brace the end against his stomach so it was jutted out horizontally from them.

The biker swerved, just softly, and lined them up to cut just in front of the collection of infected. Nick snarled, angling the axe like a lance as they drove past. The collision was hard, jamming the end of the weapon into his gut. He grunted in pain, but the infected gave way before he did.

The blade sunk effortlessly through flesh, splitting an infected nearly in half as it speared into it with the motorcycle's momentum. It collapsed in a flood of viscera, snarling from a pallid and sunken face.

The next infected lunged into the weapon, grabbing at it as they drove past. It missed, mostly, but managed to ram its hip into the blade with a wet pierce. The blade sliced into the joint, sawing through the base of its thigh by pure momentum, but sticking grittily against the thick thigh bone.

Nick tightened his grip on the brush hook, growling as the strike sent him off-balance. He was distantly aware of Lena's gloved hand abruptly grasping fingers in his shirt, directing the bike one-handed as she used the other to keep him aboard. He might've protested, had he not been a little glad.

"Hold on!" she announced a split second before she squeezed the brakes, killing the forward momentum that had been carrying them along even when she'd released the gas. The motorcycle jolted, twisting hard to the side, and Lena dropped a foot to drag her heel across the concrete as they slowed to a stop.

When the woman leapt off with no warning, Nick startled into straightening his legs and catch his heels against the road, keeping the bike upright when it threatened to topple.

Her hands slid to tear the axe from his, gripping it like a spear. Lena dropped into a low stance, facing the oncoming group of infected. A quick swipe lopped off the head of the closest, though it continued to run at her with only a gradual, twitching failure of limbs. It collapsed onto its knees - then its face.

The remaining zombies charged her, and she was forced to slant the axe into a diagonal block, shoving out at them with the long handle. The blow struck them into a stumble, bumping into each other, and gave her enough time to get a hand under the shaft and jab it out, piercing the hooked end through the midsection of one.

Pulling it back caught the curved blade on flesh, rending the infected's body open in a gash as it was removed. The smell of torn stomach and bloated intestines was nearly enough to singe Nick's nose, even at a distance.

Nick reached down to grab his Magnum from its holster on his thigh, thumb snatching the safety off before he carefully raised it, gripping his other hand over his knuckles to steady his aim. She must have spotted the motion out of the corner of her eye, because she took a quick step backwards to get out of his line of fire.

He fired twice, pulling the trigger in quick succession.
Two infected went down, one missing a hole through its cheekbone, the other choking through a burst throat. He eyed them as they collapsed, one of them stumbling back and crashing into the remaining zombie still on its feet. Guess my aim's gone back to normal. crossed his mind, some idle observation. He spared a glance toward his hands, noting how the muzzle of the gun did not tremble anymore. If only everything else would.

Surging forward in her newfound room to breathe, Lena swung the brush hook over her head, wielding it with a tight two-fisted grip like a sledgehammer. Gravity did most of the work, and the blade came down right into the infected's skull, sundering it just as it had recovered its balance. It stood there as if in shock, arms up and hands striking her helmet, but its nails found no purchase against the polycarbonate front visor.

Lena twisted, hard, blade prying the two halves of its skull apart. A seizure struck its body before it collapsed, sliding to the ground with a gargled and incoherent whine. She grimaced, quickly retreating, lowering the axe and twisting her wrist to shake some of the gore off. Glancing over her shoulder, the blank face of her helmet - now streaked with fingerprints of black and red gore - directing toward Nick.

"Thanks." she uttered, lightly.

He grunted noncommittally, replacing his Magnum safely into his holster.

The sedan rolled up to them, wheels crackling against the asphalt. Coach leaned his head through the broken driver's side window, where Ellis had broken into the car, and gazed at them. "Y'all a'ight?" Nick could see faces peering at him through the windshield; Ellis' was a notable exception. "Better keep movin', them gunshots'll bring on more."

Lena waved up a hand in quick acquiescence, turning to jog back to the motorcycle. She handed the brush axe back to Nick to free her hands, hopping smoothly in front of him. Her weight shifted back against his front, raising her elbows in an instinctive gesture to allow Nick room to grasp her midsection again. "Gosh-darn zombies." she muttered, only just audible through her helmet.

Nick snorted, despite himself. It reminded him just a little of Ellis, and that should have annoyed him. Instead, he crossed the brush hook over his chest with one hand bracing it there, and let his free hand snake around the woman's waist. He gripped fingers on her hip, digits catching on the leather of her jacket. "Just don't throw me off, yeah?"

She let out a laugh, a charmed little twist to the sound. "If I haven't kicked Rhee off all this time, you should be fine." she promised. As she twisted the gas, drawing the bike into a thin U-turn to get them facing the right way again, Nick couldn't help an idle awareness of how warm it was in the space between them.

He didn't know what bothered him more: that it had taken him that long for his interest to perk, or that he felt a faint and soft guilt at the thought.

That did annoy him.
Chapter 183

Rochelle chewed on and off on her lip, teeth grinding against the grooves dehydration had made in the flesh. She blinked her gaze subtly up to the rear view mirror, gazing at their passengers.

Chris had fallen asleep abruptly, pressed tightly under Ellis' arm. She could see the shine of drool on the Georgian's shirt, and couldn't help a little swell of fondness. It was cute, if worrisome, to see him so delirious. "Are we sure we didn't mess up the dosage?" she murmured sideways to Coach. "He's super out of it."

The big man shrugged, eyes riveted on the motorcycle rumbling on ahead of them. "Don't much know. Gave him what you told me." he responded in an almost defensive snap, drawing a frown from Rochelle. She hadn't meant it critically, but couldn't blame him; they were all tense.

Drawing her arms into a careful cross, she tried to respond with a flat tone: "I'm not saying you didn't. I'm saying maybe we gave him too much. Especially considering he hasn't been eating, and he's lost weight - maybe we should be halving it or something..."

Coach grunted, indelicately, flicking a pinky against the steering wheel. "Maybe he took extra."

She blinked, head tilting, worry draining irritation from her posture. "You think?" Her eyes returned to the mirror, gazing more intently at the Spaniard. "I hope not. Last thing we need is to run out of meds, or have him get sick. No wonder he's loopy..."

"I'd be popping shitloads of pills if I lost a fucking arm." Rhiannon offered, quietly, the first words she'd said since they'd left the condo. Ellis' head vaguely twitched up, turning to look at her, curiously. "That's ass luck. I felt like going postal just with a cracked tooth."

The Georgian allowed a slight wince, gaze dropping. He wasn't certain why he felt responsible, but he did. After all, he was almost sure Nick had gotten so violent because he'd been injured. Because he cared, or at least felt so protective, it drove him to rage.

Still don't mean he loves me, I guess. Ellis wasn't sure if he meant it sarcastically or not. All he knew was that it hurt to think.

"Yer tooth still achin'?" he questioned, instead, earning a slightly slanted grin from the blonde.

She took her gloved thumb and tapped it against the broken canine pointedly. The bottom left edge had sheared off, leaving it jagged. "Nah. Don't notice anymore. Just gotta eat on the other side. I bit into a piece of jerky once and fucking lost my shitting mind. Hurt like a bitch."

Ellis shook his head, vague shame touching his voice. "Sorry 'bout that. If I could go back'n'make it not happen, I -"

Rhiannon put a hand up, cutting a grin across the cabin at him. "Hey, douchebag. We're even, remember? Drop it." She kept her eyes on him, missing the way both Coach and Rochelle stiffened. Ellis caught it, however. His eyes flickered forward, a flood of relief threatening when they waited to gauge his reaction. At least they trusted him enough to follow his lead.

So he laughed, maybe slightly forcefully. "Okay, girl." escaped him in a soft voice. He saw Coach's fingers loosen from their death grip on the steering wheel, and Rochelle's head relaxed against the seat headrest.
The blonde pushed her body against the car window, tilting her head to look out at the street. "Anyway, I'm sure your buddy is fine. He seems like a fucking badass. You don't get an arm chopped off and come out laughing if you don't have some big brass balls."

Ellis tightened his arm against Chris' side, hearing the softest murmur from the young man as Chris' hand tightened on his waist in response. It was embarrassing to admit, but he didn't mind the contact, the familiarity. If Chris had been intentionally trying to comfort him, he might have felt awkward about it - but the way it was, he allowed himself the indulgence.

It helped quiet the pain in his chest. Made him feel less alone. Warmed him. He didn't know if the foreigner would have initiated the embrace without the influence of painkillers, but he decided not to overthink.

"He is." he admitted, closing his eyes. "He fought to protect us from his last group when they turned bad, and he wrestled a Witch to save Coach'n' Ro'. It's how he got hurt."

The biker's studded eyebrow raised, giving a sideways glance to Christophe. A vague surprise lingered there, and a calculated blink, like she were adjusting some calculation in her head. "Reminds me of a guy Lee and I met awhile back. We split up, though. Fucknut didn't want to hang around, I guess."

Rochelle placed a hand against her thigh, turning her head to glance back over her shoulder. "Oh, yeah? When was this?" Her tone held itself back to something innocuous, but Ellis knew better. It was a cautious voice, verging on nervous.

He scrunched his nose slightly, curious. The question was loaded, and he didn't entirely understand why. Sitting behind her meant he couldn't see her expression to gauge her intentions.

Rhiannon shrugged up her shoulder, bouncing her knees from side to side so her banded bat tipped one way and then the other. "Few days ago. Man, he was a fuckin' prick. Hot, though, like - take a bite kinda sexy. I'd have gone there, even with an eye missing."

Unable to resist, Ellis cocked his head to interject, "Damn, an eye? Did he have one of those glass eyes or somethin'?"

The biker snorted, snapping her legs together to catch her bat and still its motion. She flicked up a hand to run gloved fingers through her roughened blonde hair in a thoughtless gesture. "Dude, no. He lost it in the apocalypse, fighting with his old buddies. Apparently some cunt just hacked it out with -"

Coach slammed on the brakes, hard.

Ellis felt the distinct sensation of the car halting, and his body trying very hard to continue on without it. His seatbelt dug ferociously into his collarbone with a snap, and Chris nearly flung forward and off his side. It was reflex that made Ellis grasp fingers onto the waistband of his cargo shorts, keeping him from tumbling off, but the jolt still woke the man.

"¡Mierda!" he blurted, eyes glazed as they darted around the car. "What -?"

Rhiannon grasped the shoulder of Coach's chair, leaning to look ahead. "Oh, motherfuck." she uttered, raising her free hand to point. Lena and Nick had halted, just before an intersection in the road. "Trouble."

Ellis scrambled to join her in leaning forward, arm keeping Chris close as the foreigner druggedly clung to him, expression trapped between confusion and alarm. Lena was waving, just twice - and then she fisted a gloved hand and tapped it against the side of her helmet.

"She's hearing a Charger." Rhiannon announced, simply, drawing a slightly gawped look from Ellis before he realized what was happening. The idea of telepathy was slightly more fun than the concept of hand signals, but he still felt a flood of envy.

"Aw, man, my buddy Keith'n'me used tuh make up signals! Especially after his hearin' got bad."

"And a Smoker." Rhiannon overrode him flatly, as Lena tapped two fingers near her covered mouth. She didn't get to continue before the brunette flashed up a hand and circled it in the air, then thumbed toward the road crossing theirs. "That's for horde. Goddamn, it's a clusterfuck ahead... Maybe -"

"If we're done doing sign language like idiots." Nick's voice crackled abruptly from the front seat, droll and agitated. Ellis' eyes flickered up, watching as Lena's arms lowered, posture abashed as she glanced back at Nick where he sat behind her. His helmet was lifted just enough to talk into the radio grasped in his hand.

Lena smacked the forehead of her bike helmet with a palm, and the softest echo of her voice came through the radio. "Oopsy-daisy. Forgot." If Ellis squinted, he could almost see the slip of teeth from Nick's grin under the bottom edge of the helmet, and - for reasons he couldn't quite put into words - it bothered him.

"Uh-huh. Anyway, we're gonna get fucked out here. Sounds like a goddamn rock concert around the corner."

Since when had he been being nice to them? Good-natured? Last Ellis had checked, the gambler was all-around violently opposed to their presence. Now they were getting along? Ellis should have been relieved, but all he felt was a distant jealousy.

Surely, he was just being paranoid.

Coach grabbed the hand radio where it sat belted on his khakis, pressing the 'Talk' button with his thumb. "A'ight. How 'bout I keep drivin', and everyone else comes out, be ready to fight? We'll try skirtin' trouble if we can, go slow."

Lena waved a hand at Nick, and he offered the radio forward toward her, activating the transmission. "Sounds good. If we're careful, we can probably go around the worst of it. Our base is still a few streets down." she uttered, eagerly. "I'll push the bike."

With that, Coach glanced over his shoulder. His eyes darted to Christophe, thoughtful, then matched the younger Georgian's with sudden ferocity. "The girls go. Maybe Ellis, you stay wit' Chris, make sure he stays calm? And in his seat?"

Ellis wanted to frown - but not out of offense. If anything, he frowned because he felt a little glad for the excuse to stay in the car. He knew it wasn't realistic to want to avoid Nick entirely, but he needed just a little break. Some breathing room, where he could think clearly.

He definitely didn't want to watch Nick be nice.

"Yeah." he managed, quietly. He reached down to the floorboard, grabbing up Nick's katana where it lay there. Raising it, carefully, Ellis poked the handle up into the front of the cabin. "Ro', take the sword. Ain't got the ammo fer a bunch'uh shootin'."

She relented, grabbing the katana and dragging it into her lap. Her other hand slid to pick up her handgun from the cupholder in the door, flashing a smile over her shoulder. "Okay, Rhiannon. You ready to fight some zambos with us?"

The biker gave a look that could almost be misconstrued as beaming, sliding her hand down to grip the handle of her baseball bat.

"I was fucking born ready, baby."
Chapter 184

Lining up next to the motorcycle, there was some quiet tension as the group took stock.

Rhiannon tapped her baseball bat against the toe of her right boot, the metal of the bands plinking softly. Beside her, Lena balanced her brush hook on its tip against the asphalt, fingers tapping against the shaft. Nick leaned with a hand on the motorcycle, attention rotating around them guardedly.

Rochelle approached, the faintest of frowns on her lips as she stepped away from the sedan.

Her eyes flickered to the two bikers, withholding a sigh. She was wary of jumping to conclusions, but the idea of them meeting a man a few days ago... one who had been chased from his group by someone cruel enough to carve out an eye...

Didn't the dots connect themselves?

Panic oozed at the edge of her consciousness, a paranoia that desired to flood out her good sense. If the other ex-Angel were still around, how would he react to seeing Chris? Wasn't it possible the man might blame him for his pains, much like Nick seemed to feel the Spaniard had been complicit in theirs? Worse, what if he didn't understand why Brenda had perished alongside Jerry, and considered the survivors enemies?

You're being ridiculous. she tried in some vague self-soothing gesture. At least wait until you know something for sure. Don't just freak out.

Rather than obsess over potential fears, she focused on the very real ones at hand. Assuming they made it safely to their new base of operations, she'd have plenty of time to grill the women on the subject, anyway. There was not nearly as much time to deal with the infected quietly snarling and wandering along the adjacent street.

"Okay. Nick -" Rochelle lifted the katana gripped in her left hand and offered it out, hilt-first. The gambler shot her a mildly surprised glance, taking in her posture as she advanced. "You, Lena, and Rhiannon lead with the melee weapons. I'll push the bike and watch our backs."

As Nick lazily crossed the distance between them to pry the sword from her fingers, Lena frowned just softly. "I can push it. It's my bike, my problem."

Though the words came off defensive or possessive, she didn't break from her usual gentle tone - so Rochelle spared her a smile and raised her right hand, palm out, to display the wound there. Her skin had knit together in a rough and jagged line, the flesh light where it was newly healing. "I'm not in great fighting condition, least of all with a two-hander. Better to have you on deck."

Her skin had knit together in a rough and jagged line, the flesh light where it was newly healing. "I'm not in great fighting condition, least of all with a two-hander. Better to have you on deck."

The biker's eyes darted to take in the injury, quick to nod. Some sympathy tinted the green-hazel colour, but a businesslike brusqueness took her body into a turn. "Okay. Let's move, then. If we go down two or three blocks, I think we can cut across and make it to base."

"That's all well and good -" Nick uttered, grasping the katana and slinging it up to rest the back edge against his shoulder. "- but I just want to make some things clear before we move."

Rochelle crossed her arms, rolling her head back slightly on her neck. She got an immediately bad feeling about his intentions.
"We're under a bit of a time crunch here, suit." She was growing thoroughly impatient with Nick, even as she tried to rein in her frustration... for the time being, at least. Fighting wouldn't make it any easier on Ellis. "Like zombie-bite sort of crunch."

Nick snorted, reaching his free hand to catch fingertips on his dress shirt, plucking idly on the button at his navel. "I just want to make sure we understand each other. I'll fight, but I'm not putting my ass on the line for some fucks I barely know. If shit goes south, we leave."

With narrowed eyes, Rhiannon watched Nick's movements, her posture carrying an intensity that came off vaguely threatening. She curled her tongue idly against her cracked canine, sucking in air enough to make the softest whistling sound. "Same to you, cuntstick." she spat back, shoulders hunching up.

Rochelle felt a stir of humor. Working to understand Nick's warped shows of emotion had trained her well, making it almost trivially easy to decode the woman's posture as faint hurt - but fear, too. Defense.

Lena put out a hand to almost touch Rhiannon's arm. "Sis." That silenced the younger woman, and Lena let the hand drop, grabbing instead at her axehandle. She twisted it to face the blade forward, gripping the weapon close to her side. "You can do whatever you want, hoss. But for the record, we'll have your back."

Turning, the biker gingerly stepped toward the intersection, leaning out to look across the road. Rhiannon almost moodily followed, body slinking low like that of a stray dog. She slipped up behind her sister and a mutter was shared between them, making Lena grin outright.

Rochelle glanced sideways at Nick, a faint smirk touching her lips. "I like her." she offered, dodging the wilting stare he sent her way by busying herself with sidling up beside the motorcycle. She bumped the kickstand out of the way, grabbing the handlebars and grunting faintly as she shoved it into motion.

"All I need is more women badgering me." Nick muttered, exhaling a frustrated sigh as he turned away. "I get enough of that from you." He started to move forward, matching Rochelle's pace as the bike rolled forward.

Her palm stung where it pressed into the handle, so she adjusted her grip to rest more on the heel of her hand. She grinned to herself, wearily. Her voice dropped to a mutter with little energy behind it. "Boy, if that's how you think about women, colour me unsurprised you're into dick."

Nick's gaze swiveled, latching onto her face without stopping his stride. "What?" he snapped, low and suspicious of her utterance, it having been just barely too quiet to be made out.

Rochelle's grin turned devilish, pushing harder to jog the bike forward for a few paces to pull ahead of him. "Nothin'." She turned to look behind them, watching the sedan roll along at their heels. The sunlight streaked a messy glare over the windshield, but she was almost sure Coach was glaring at her like he sensed she was making trouble.

She stuck her tongue out.

Nick didn't have time to press the issue when Lena advanced out past the fence that bordered the street corner. She gripped her brush-hook with one hand midway up the handle and the other cupped around the end, bracing it, and gave a thin chirrup of a whistle.

Although Rochelle couldn't see, a snarl made it clear there were infected waiting for them. It only took a beat of time for a shape to flash forward, a female zombie bolting forward in a staggered lunge. It didn't seem to register when the head of the axe slid into its torso, bringing it to a stuttered halt as the flat end of the haft struck into it and impeded its progress along the blade.

Lena took a short step back at the collision, grunting. The infected stretched out its arms, kicking and sliding its feet against the concrete sidewalk to surge against the weapon spearing it. A single flip-flop slapped from its place on the thing's left foot.

As it struggled, the biker slid a palm to the top of the handle and pushed downward with a jump of her weight.

The blade burst down through it with a wet splatter, striking hard into the thick pelvic bone and getting stuck there. The creature screamed, bending forward in a rage-possessed attempt to reach her, but all it did was hurry the leaking of its innards.

The short woman yanked, hard, unsheathing her weapon. When the zombie tried to lunge forward, footing unsteady, Lena swiveled on her heel, hands sliding up the shaft as she moved so she could whip the end up and strike the infected across the face with it.

Its head snapped to the side, and whatever light was left in its eyes went out.

"More coming!" she alerted, quick to relax back into a readied stance. Rhiannon jolted next to her, a practiced distance between them to allow space for Lena to swing her axe.

A faint scowl touched Nick's face, but he didn't hesitate to advance. "Okay, come on then, assclowns." he muttered, gripping his katana with both hands as he strode wide around the two women.

Rhiannon was staring at him; he could feel it.

He could definitely feel that she feared him, for one reason or another. He knew when someone was afraid of him. It had always been, after all, one of two of his favourite emotions to manipulate. Fear and lust gets you anywhere. Even if it's all lies.

Love had never made that list.

He'd never wanted anything to do with it.

There was just a handful of infected streaking toward them, and their attention was zeroed in on Lena. Taking advantage of their tunnel vision, Nick took a few steps forward, turning himself and winding up with the sword.

One good swing as the infected came within range cleaved a head from its shoulders, and the body took a wide stutter-step to the side and crashed into one of its fellows. The smaller zombie went down under the weight, screaming, and the remaining three merely trampled them in their urgency to advance.

He watched them pass, turning a cool stare onto the blonde biker as if to say: "Well?"

She snarled, furiously, and he knew he'd gotten under her skin.

Rhiannon jumped forward, catching one of them with a blow to the knee. Its leg twisted wildly as bone broke, shards and rounded planes of white popping easily through the flesh, and she followed it to the ground. A quiet huffed growl left her as she brought the bat up over her head - and then smashed it down, bursting the thing's skull on the concrete like a rotted-out pumpkin.
Her teeth flashed in a sneer of challenge, eyes darting up toward the gambler, just in time to watch him spear his katana down through the zombie that had become trapped underneath the headless one. The blade sunk through the back of its skull, though it took a twist to get it to stop moving.

She stared at it - then his face, almost uncomprehending, pierced brow twitching.

Nick froze up where he stood, tongue half-curled, because what he meant to say got stuck in his throat.

Two to your one.

His eyes darted away, and his body followed. As Lena jabbed her brush-hook into the chest of one zombie, twisting to shear between ribs and thrust into its lungs, Nick lashed out at the other infected remaining and took a massive slash out of its back.

It screamed, turning in a stagger as black blood flooded from the wound like sludge. The zombie rushed him, and he barely struck in time to stop it from clawing out at him. His katana split through its midsection, rending flesh like paper.

As it fell, the four stood amidst the pile of corpses - still, but for the twitch of rogue neuron impulses and the flow of sickly-sweet smelling blood - and panted.

Nick licked at his lower lip, regretting the reflex when something sour touched his senses. He turned, sharply, taking in the road ahead rather than acknowledge the way Rhiannon's scowl had turned nearly befuddled.

"Let's go. And watch for Chargers." he muttered over his shoulder before darting into motion. The sound of footsteps and the roll of wheels behind him was the only indication anyone obeyed.

He wished he felt anger.

Anger was better than melancholy.
Chapter 185

Rhiannon and Lena fought like a well-oiled machine.

Watching them was distantly mesmerizing, as the brunette's heavy weapon swings took off limbs and hacked deep into flesh - and Rhiannon filled the space between, agile movements darting her in and out of the fray. Her bat was lightweight enough to pepper blows and keep the infected back, but the banded reinforcements kept it strong enough to lay down bone-shattering strikes when backed into a corner.

It made sense that they would work well together. Even without a familial bond, the idea of surviving as a pair did not pass Nick by without a fair bit of surprise. It was a simple matter to get overwhelmed as a foursome; as only two, it was hard to believe they'd made it at all.

It impressed him, he dared to think.

This did not preclude him being an asshole.

"Keep the fuck up, ladies." he ordered, slashing his katana easily through the blur of flesh that streaked past him. When they gathered in a crowd, a flood, it became hard to distinguish one zombie from the next or even the whole. Every time he thought he'd killed one, a limb would surge to grab and claw for him.

They kept up a constant pace forward, but the infected kept up a constant stream, sprinting out from alleyways and doorways and charging at them. Between him and the two bikers, they managed to keep forging ahead - but it felt like whatever they severed would only grow back exponentially.

What is it? Chimera? No, that's the goat thing - "Zombies don't reproduce, right?" he snarled, beheading an infected as it lunged, teeth snapping and broken nails catching on his sleeve. A burning sensation said it had scored his wrist, but cuts and scrapes barely triggered his awareness anymore.

As the fighting intensified, Rochelle had drawn nearer, huddled close to the motorcycle she pushed. Her eyes kept a constant guard around them, taking care to watch their back and ensure Coach was following along in the car. "Why? Looking for a date?" she retorted, mildly, only avoiding a nasty stare from the Northerner by virtue of the fact he was distracted.

"Trying to decide if they'll run out." he snapped back, colder than he meant. Nick could feel the vague pleasure radiating from her, satisfied with getting on his nerves. She'd found a loophole in their agreement, it seemed; being a bitch to him without specifically mentioning Ellis.

It was working.

"There's only like, a few hundred million people in the U.S., so... I guess." Lena offered helpfully, tone breathless. "Eventually." She braced the handle of her brush-axe against her waist, jabbing it, spearlike, to implant it in the chest of a zombie. The creature clawed and gnashed in protest, stuck there like it was looped in the end of a dogcatcher's pole.

Rhiannon leapt at the opportunity, bashing the infected in the face with her bat. It stumbled back off the blade, staggering, neck crackling as the strike fractured vertebrae. It seemed like it might recover, so she struck it a few more times, grunting. "Minus all the immune like us. And everyone dead."
Shaking a hunk of flesh off her blade, the older biker grimaced lightly. "And anyone like Dad, holed up." She gripped the axe tight, lashing out low to cut into a zombie's thigh as it raced forward. Its leg failed underneath it, but that didn't stop its momentum as it put weight on the dead flesh, knee locking in some vague mimicry of a step.

The joint protested, wobbling, and it lunged itself at her in a leap with arms splayed. The male was dressed in swim shorts and an open Hawaiian shirt, though both were so bloody and dirtied as to be a dim shade of brown. Lena reacted quickly, thrusting her weapon up in a crossed shove.

"Crap -"

The creature hit the weapon first, lunging against it, but Lena's arms were not quite long enough to hold it entirely at bay. Its hands scrabbled at her shoulders, failing to find purchase against the leather or do more than scratch at the material.

Lena's strength held firm, heels digging into the street as the large infected shoved against her weapon, shrieking into her face. She winced as black spittle struck her cheek, ducking her chin away in time for Rhiannon to grab her bat with both hands and jab the tip of it into the side of the zombie's head.

It staggered with the force of the blow, turning with a ferocious snarl to face the blonde.

The infected might have lunged for her, had Lena not jolted backwards a step and swung her axe. The blade slammed hard into its back, hooked edge piercing through its flesh. One good yank caught the hook through its spine, and its lower body collapsed like it had been paralyzed.

It hit the ground, helplessly clawing at the air, snarling and champing its teeth. Lena didn't waste the time to put it down, abandoning it to suffer on the ground. She continued on with a slightly winded exhale and a quick glance of gratitude toward her sister.

Nick eyed the eager grin that crossed Rhiannon's lips, unable to help a twist of humour. For all her intensity and acrid attitude, she looked like little more than a praised child under the attention of her sibling. It amused him at the same time he filed it away.

It was obvious enough that Rhiannon was Lena's weak spot, judging from their behaviour earlier. Knowing it was mutual gave him a weapon, an edge. Nothing he'd use except in dire straits, but a tool nonetheless.

After all, hadn't Chris' soft spot for Rochelle come in handy?

He turned his attention forward, noting that the flow of infected had slowed. "So, ultimately, too fucking many." He stepped ahead into the street, slashing at a zombie scrambling at him, nearly on all fours. His katana slid easily through its shoulder, cutting in until it hit chestbone and halted.

Nick winced at the impact. He did not want to break the blade.

"But one less."

Withdrawing it gently, he kicked the dying infected away with his heel. His chin lifted to glance down the road, scanning the streetside. They'd left the scruffy, unkempt rows of beachhouse condos and re-entered something like a town. The road widened to accommodate fat sidewalks, lined with storefronts.

It might have been filled with wandering vacationers, in some distant past, and not a clotted mix of infected and corpses.
"Where's this base of yours?" he questioned harshly, jerking his sword to point down the road. There was a cluster of cars a few blocks away, noses crushed together in what looked like it had been a high-speed collision. One was a dirtied SUV, but the other was an ambulance, white and red paintjob marred with streaks of blood as infected had leaned and pawed past it. "Close?"

Lena nodded, raising a hand to wipe gore from her cheek with an unpleasant twitch of her lips. In the same motion, she thumbed ahead in a motioning gesture. "Yeah. If you look, you can see the -" A snarl from behind them snapped Nick's head around, eyes quick to catch on the shape of an infected scrambling toward them. It was sprinting up to the sedan, and reflex had him moving before his mind fully processed it. "Watch Ro'." he barked over his shoulder, striding up to and past the car. His gaze cut to the side long enough to catch Coach eyeing him up through the broken driver's side window, almost gaugingly. The look wasn't aggressive; moreso, it was an examination. It was beyond him what he'd done - recently - to earn the stare, so he ignored it.

And then his gaze flicked up, slanting into the backseat, to find Ellis with an arm wrapped around Christophe. The Spaniard was tucked into a curl, so tightly pressed into the loop of Ellis' arm and the curve of his side that it put his cheek on Ellis' chest. The man's existing arm was shoved behind him, and Nick could just make out his hand, gripping Ellis' waist. He felt nothing, and then he felt fury.

Nick did not intentionally halt, did not mean to stare. He didn't realize he had, not until the infected was suddenly upon them, slamming hard into the trunk of the sedan. It bent over the rump of the car and started clambering up, hands beating on the rear window, squealing out a furious noise through a broken set of teeth and torn lips. The impact startled Ellis, grabbing suddenly to place his other arm in front of Chris and keep him close. His eyes lifted, blinking up to meet Nick's through the cloudy window. Genuine confusion flickered over them, and Nick forced his body into motion.

He lifted his sword, thrusting out with it like a rapier. The blade sunk straight through the zombie's torso, and with it caught against the strong bone of its ribcage, he shoved hard to the side. A squawk left the infected as the sword dragged it along, rolling off the car. It slid free of the blade as it fell to the ground.

It recovered almost immediately, scrabbling to get its feet under itself and catapult itself back up. The creature screamed, eyes gone wild and yellow behind a set of swim goggles, and charged him. Nick slashed the blade at neck-level, taking off its head with a wet squelch. He had to step to the side as its body fell at him, muscles twitching in some attempt to keep running even after its head had been cleft from its shoulders. He grimaced at the flood of black-brown blood that left its sundered neck. It didn't squirt out like it should have. It oozed, like the creature's heart had long since slowed, or its blood thickened and congealed.

Green eyes flickered back up, staring for just a moment at the car, though he had lost his line of sight to Ellis.

He knew what jealousy felt like. He wasn't stupid enough to miss the feeling brewing in his chest. Knew that feeling from the late nights his ex-wife spent out - the casual way she'd come home, or not come home at all, and how he'd sit there and stew. Knowing acutely he shouldn't care... that he cared.

The only difference was that he’d earned the pain this time.

Exhaling shortly, he shook his head, sliding his katana to hang at his side and charging back toward the front of the group. He was being ridiculous; it wasn't as if there were anything actually going on between the two men. The Spaniard was ill and injured and needed support, and Ellis was too kind to do anything but provide it.

That was what logic told him.

Emotion had him snarling at Rochelle as he passed.

"Watch your fucking boyfriend." She startled outright, straightening, confusion making her eyes flicker between him and the sedan. He didn't wait for her to process, continuing on, vitriol lingering in his voice. "Let's fucking go, Jesus Christ. Is this a goddamn picnic or are we going to actually make any goddamn progress?"

He hated the ugly feeling roiling in his gut. It made him feel pathetic and small, wretched, and he wanted to slide his katana into his stomach and carve the tension out.

If only he had the courage.

Lena passed a look toward her sister, lips pursing and teeth catching on the inside of her cheek. She tried for a small grin, shrugging, though she seemed vaguely put off when Rochelle failed to even look her way. The producer was busy examining Nick's back, expression somewhere between confused and thoughtful.

Lena's bewilderment only worsened when Rochelle abruptly looked - for all the world - tickled.

The brunette paused long enough to scratch at her arm, frowning faintly before she forced herself to continue moving before Nick got too far ahead. She snatched Rhiannon's sleeve as she went, dragging her along. "Hey, Nick, slow -"

Her words fell on deaf ears, interrupted flatly by the hacking, squelching cough of a Smoker. Nick froze, and that was potentially the worst response. It made him an easy target for the agile, glistening tongue that shot out from a fence across the street and struck his leg.

There was a serene quality to the sensation. The idea of being dragged away and eviscerated did not distress him as much as it should have. Then the tendril yanked his legs out from under him, sending him crashing bodily to the concrete, and survival instinct kicked in.

Namely, he curled his body, turning to take the majority of the fall on his shoulder, and lashed out blindly with his katana. He did so blindly enough that he missed, and a sharp gush of pain said he'd nicked his leg, instead. The sensation flinched his hand away, and he distantly heard the sound of it clattering away on the asphalt.

The tongue retracted, dragging him effortlessly across the road.

Even as hot pain marked the scrape of concrete as he rolled and skated, he tried to grab for the Magnum holstered to his thigh. Unfortunately, the tongue was faster, and it wrapped up the length of his calf and trapped his hand there, flesh oddly rigid and tightening to an excruciating crush.

It felt like the bones in his hand might give way, crushed against the hard shape of his gun, and he could do little but shout in pain. It seemed to take years to reach the Smoker, eyes closed and body as tightly curled as he could manage to focus the damage on the softer shapes of his shoulders and legs.

_Holy shit, how fucking slow are your fucking reflexes you useless fucking pieces of shit -_

And then he was slamming easily against a strange shape, and a set of cold, greasy fingers closed around his head, gripping on his jawline to tip his chin up. He was vaguely aware of the reeking scent of smoke and decay, but had little time to acknowledge it before the tongue wormed its way straight up his torso and slid around his neck.

It could have torn his throat out, or ripped claws into him. It could have done any number of things to kill him.

It didn't.

The creature hacked out a noise near his ear, breath somehow both chill as ice and moist like steam - and it drew him close, tongue tightening around his neck. It meant to squeeze the life out of him, feel him die, and that was uniquely terrifying. It exposed a cruelty that he didn't know how to process from something that should have been mindless and fueled by rage.

He writhed, fought, but it only encouraged the creature to tighten fingers against his jaw and tendril against his frame. He could not think clearly enough to recognize that he should have limpened, as oxygen-starvation started to whiten his vision.

Then it screamed, and the tongue loosened enough to let some air enter his chest. Nick gasped in a surge that shuddered his whole body, but he didn't get oxygen. He got foul, acrid air that stung his eyes and burned in his lungs. He felt a hand grab his chest, and blindly collapsed toward the contact, feeling the tongue slither loose from his upper body.

It remained tangled around his legs, and he stumbled down to his knees as his saviour dragged him out from the worst of the cloud.

"Jesus, Nick!" Rochelle's voice cried out, agitated, as she dropped to a crouch in front of him. One hand slid to grab the back of his neck, while the other set down his katana on the concrete. She started to yank the tendril free from his legs, movements frenetic. "Get your shit together! We've got a Charger nearby -"

Nick didn't have the presence of mind to fight as she freed him, or complain. He couldn't do much but cough, like the foulness exuded from the Smoker had sunk low in his lungs and he couldn't breathe deep enough to expel it.

He only just managed to crack his eyes open, barely registering his location, now on the opposite side of the street from where the bike and car sat. The blur of dark colours in his vision marked where Lena and Rhiannon stood in the middle of the road, braced close together. There was a much larger blur of grey that loomed out from behind the crashed ambulance, lopsided shape hard to mistake.

The quiet did not last before it _roared._
Chapter 186

Nick wanted to say he chose to be useless. That he was just holding up his promise not to put his life on the line for two near-strangers, and it was a conscious decision to sit there incapacitated. That felt better than admitting he was too weak to move, his hand pulsing and his head and chest aching ferociously, vision barely clear enough to identify what emotion was on Rochelle's face.

"Fuck." she uttered, leaping up to stand. "Stay here!"

Nick could do little more than give a rattling cough in response, spitting onto the concrete as a sour taste threatened to crawl its way up his throat. The sensation and the flavour prompted a heave from his gut, though it resulted in nothing more than tacky bile.

Uttering a frustrated noise, Rochelle turned, fearful attention darting for the Charger. It stamped hard against the road, chuffing incoherently, sunken eyes darting between the survivors. Rochelle's abrupt movement had drawn its attention, but the bikers were closer - it seemed unsure, like it couldn't quite decide who posed a more significant threat.

The creature turned, head swiveling to stare toward Rochelle and Nick.

Panic startled her into motion, grabbing for the pistol tucked in the waistband of her jeans. She couldn't let it charge; even if she dodged it, it would either trample Nick or kill him by hand the moment it'd regained its bearings. She also didn't know if she could hit it from that distance, and did she have more than one or two shots before it reached them?

Okay. Breathe. Focus.

She raised the pistol, bracing her palm against her curled fist to steady her aim. The Charger snorted - then howled softly with a snapping and rigidly boned jaw, zeroing in on the gun with pinpoint attention. That was a threat, and its posture shifted, ready to propel itself with muscle-bloated legs, the gesture sending its withered off-arm into a boneless flap.

Focus -

"Hey! Hey, you jerk!"

Thrusting her arms up, Lena suddenly jolted into a few steps, nearly pinwheeling them as she shouted. Rochelle's eyes shot wide, darting between the creature and the brunette. There was just a moment where the Charger froze, head cocking. "Come on, big-arm! I'm -"

A flash of motion marked the moment where it spun, and there was so little time to react. For how large it was, skin rough and cracked like stone, it moved with unnerving speed - or maybe just momentum, like a boulder set to rolling down a mountainside. Its bare and bloated feet struck the ground with thunderous noise.

Lena jolted to dodge out of the way, but it was too fast, and it curved its sprint to follow her. The sound of its shoulder striking her was only just louder than the feral shout that left Rhiannon.

The collision was like watching a car accident. It was as if Lena had been effortlessly blown off her feet, and the speed at which the Charger exploded forward pinned her against its arm. Her weapon flung from her hands, unable to keep a grip under the agony of the blow. There was just a beat of time where Rochelle saw her struggle, grabbing at the Charger, clawing for its face -
Enough time for her to wonder, fear, because she'd never actually seen someone get hit by one dead-on before -

Then the Charger slammed into the side of the building across the street. The sound was gut-wrenching, as Lena hit the vinyl siding first and then the Charger struck second, the full impact of its weight slamming her into the surface. It stepped back, staggered away, and shook its head in a ferocious wag as the brunette slid down to the ground.

The softest groan left her, body trying to crumple to one side, and the Charger blinked down toward her with animal curiosity. Its face was too sunken, skin stretched too tight over the bones of its facial structure, to do more than snarl out a few huffs of air in anger. It reached down with its ballooned arm, broad fingers grabbing her shoulder in a clutch.

She protested weakly, trying to reach up as if she could unhook its fingers from her shoulder. The creature effortlessly dragged her into a lift - and then slammed her down, grunting with the effort it took to bodily smash her into the sidewalk.

The softest mewl of pain sounded out, and then nothing at all.

Rhiannon screamed, shrieked, rage fueling the sound as she sprinted into motion, throwing her bat to the ground in favour of grabbing her sister's brush-hook from where it had clattered to the ground. "You fucking mutant piece of shit! I'll kill you!" she howled, misery bled into the waver of every word.

It was the second smash, the Charger pulling Lena - her frame now limp - up and then crashing her back down that shocked Rochelle into motion. Her hand tightened on her pistol, readying it. Shooting it anywhere but the head would do little to nothing. She had to get close enough, get it right in the face.

Rochelle jolted forward, running, but Rhiannon was faster and reached the Charger at a scrambling sprint.

"Let her -" Thrusting the axe, the blonde stabbed blindly, piercing the infected just where its kidney should have been. "- go -" The curved blade sunk in an inch or two, and no further. Blood did not leak out; rather, it weeped a strange and chalky whiteness, the flesh crumbling rather than tearing.

"Fuck!" she bellowed, forced to pry the weapon back, putting her whole weight behind the yank to get it to come unstuck.

The Charger made no indication it was hurt by the attack, but a faint grunt of agitation escaped it. Shaking its head, it grasped tight onto Lena's body, dragging her up into the air. She dangled there like nothing but a ragdoll, and Rochelle caught the smallest glimpse of her face, eyes closed and blood trickling from the corner of her slack mouth.

Was she even breathing?

Rhiannon screamed something primal, thrusting up and below the Charger's arm where it was now raised. The blade shoved through the thin and chafed flesh at the creature's armpit, and she twisted, wrenching her entire body to one side. That got its attention, and it gave a strangled snarl, jaw snapping in a few angry bites on air.

Releasing Lena to let her body drop limply to the ground, thudding softly into a half-curl on the concrete, the Charger turned. Its arm swung out with the gesture, flaring, and the bloated mass struck Rhiannon across the chest. Her fingers slipped on the axe handle, leaving it implanted in the infected like a dart. She released an utterance of pain, slung hard to the ground and left breathless by the blow.

The broad-chested infected groaned, vaguely, some faint twitch traveling through its vestigial arm as if trying to move it. When it could not, it spun dumbly in a few steps, chittering out a harsh breath as the brush-hook wobbled from its anchor underneath the infected's arm.

The Charger looked up, dull gaze catching onto the muzzle of Rochelle's pistol just before it went off.

Panting softly, Rochelle watched it collapse, skull obliterated into so many pieces amidst a mess of greyed flesh. Her hand was trembling as she lowered the pistol, adrenaline accelerating her heart rate to a pound in her chest.

"Shit." she muttered, eyes lifting to gaze toward Rhiannon. She was vaguely aware of Coach getting out of the sedan, his dirted yellow-and-purple shirt a fuzz in her peripheral vision, but didn't acknowledge it. "Are you -" she uttered, but the blonde was already moving, scrambling up to her hands and knees.

"Fuck, fuck, fuck." Rhiannon blurted, slurred, her posture wavering in a pained shudder before she forced herself forward. The biker pawed past the Charger, forcibly, crawling to reach her sister where she laid. She dragged herself into a slight curl around the brunette, softly pressing a palm against Lena's cheek, trying to pet there without jostling her... "Hey. Hey. Lee. Come on, you bitch."

Rochelle couldn't stop a hand from raising to cover her lips, brows wrought into something pained as her body went limp and a sheen of wetness crossed her eyes. It was their fault. Her fault for letting Nick get ahead - her fault for not returning sooner, not shooting sooner - for just watching as Lena took a Charger that should have been aimed at her -

Maybe it was just her fault.

"You're fine. You're fucking fine, you son of a bitch. You're too badass for this, right? Not one fucking Charger. Not one fucking cunt Charger." The blonde was trembling, voice gone rough, breath stuttering at the end of every word as if she couldn't catch it. Her palm smoothed over her sister's chin, trying to wipe away the blood there but only smearing it, the liquid thick with saliva. "That's not how this goes."

Her arm started to loop underneath Lena's shoulders, like she might try to draw the older woman against her chest - and then suddenly Coach was beside her, kneeling just a short distance away.

"Don't." he stated, calm and short and soothing. "Don't move her."

The blonde stared at him, chin trembling, eyes too full of fear and fury to make any room for tears.

It was only as she didn't protest that Coach leaned in, delicately placing a hand underneath the unconscious woman's jawline. Though Rhiannon maintained her silence, she watched his every move with feral and deeply mistrustful attention. Coach's fingertips pressed in tight against Lena's jugular, pausing for just a beat before he nodded.

"Got a pulse." Very cautiously, he slid a hand to rest against her knee, gaze tilting toward Rochelle. "We don't got no clue if she hurt somethin'. If she's got damage, and we move her, could make it worse. Spinal fracture could turn into a break."
Rochelle couldn't respond, even as he looked at her as if for answers. The shock of it hit her, cold as ice, and she couldn't get the words out fast enough... and they couldn't soothe the miserable guilt that shot up her spine. "I-I'm sorry. Rhiannon, I - if I'd gone faster - if we hadn't stopped, I..."

"We move her."

The blonde spoke, suddenly. Hollowly. She didn't look away from her sister's face; she barely even moved. It was not soft - it was, perhaps, the harshest she'd ever sounded, like her voice was nothing but shards of glass. Like it cut her to even speak. "Can't stay here. So we move her."

Carefully, Rochelle took a half-step forward, raising her hand in a subtle gesture. It was dangerous, especially if her spine had been damaged... but there was no alternative. Nothing to do, nothing they could do. They were helpless, just like with Christophe, left with nothing but half-assed solutions to problems they weren't prepared for. "Are you - sure?"

"Yeah." was all that left the blonde. Her eyes fell to an empty stare, gazing down at the limp body of her sister. The younger biker's body seemed frail, somehow, quivering at the edge of something - though whether it was collapse or explosion, Rochelle could not tell.

She hesitantly shifted her gaze to Coach. He met it, then abruptly looked past her, inciting her to turn.

Nick half-hobbled toward them, wiping something slick from his neck with one hand and other arm loose at his side with his katana gripped tightly there. His eyes were guarded, nothing exposed but a distant pain as they still showed a lingering redness from smoke and burst blood vessels.

Rochelle tried to tighten her expression, tense it, as if she could get across some plea. The last thing they needed was Nick saying something cruel and starting a fight. He examined the look with a short glance, but said nothing at all. Instead, he focused on looking down, inspecting the blood seeping thickly from his calf and staining his pantleg.

He listened, for once. Or maybe he was merely cowed. For once.

Attention shifting toward Coach, Rochelle carefully slipped an arm across her stomach, forcing an inhale. "We should get her in the car. Be softer than carrying her down the road." she murmured, earning nothing but a stiff silence.

Resolved, Rochelle replaced her pistol in its place at the base of her spine and approached, tucking herself to the side. She gently started to get her hands underneath Lena's frame, delicately supporting her. Rhiannon instantly pressed close, shoulder to hers, and joined the effort. Coach looped an arm under Lena's knees, palm going to rest against her stomach as if to keep her as still as possible.

They were almost ready to hoist up, a tacitly coordinated pause bracing them before they lifted - and then Nick was abruptly bending down, slipping to the opposite side of Rochelle and Rhiannon. He grabbed one hand on Lena's bicep and pushed the other under her lower back.

He said nothing.

Nobody did, other than Coach uttering a soft, "Ready.", prompting them to lift. There was something comforting in the faint groan that escaped the brunette as she was hoisted up off the ground as smoothly as they could manage.

It was better than silence.
Ellis felt like he'd forgotten how to breathe. His chest clenched, his throat tightened, his heart rate went wild against his ribs.

He didn't want to move, with Chris nestled so tight against him, but it was like torture to watch Lena get charged out of his sight and have to sit there, helpless. Coach sprinted out of the vehicle, not even bothering to close the door behind him. Ellis only kept himself in place by repeating a mantra: his responsibility was Christophe. He had to stay with Christophe.

He had to -

When his teammates came walking carefully toward the car, circled around a limp shape, he broke. Pain surged in him, thick as sluggish denial, and he had to leave the car, had to know what was happening. His hands dusted softly over the Spaniard's side, whispering in a cracked and pleading tone: "Just - Just stay here, okay? I'm sorry, I gotta - I gotta go."

The foreigner muttered something faint, and Ellis tried to be gentle as he pried himself away, pushing Chris against the car seat. The man's honey-brown eyes flickered open in a low-lidded gaze, only belatedly shoving himself upright as if in some weak attempt to be helpful, though he seemed confused.

Huffing shortly, Ellis scrambled to get the car door open, less sliding out than falling. He landed on a heel, stumbling before he got himself upright. He grabbed a hand onto the side of the sedan, balancing himself as he ran toward them. "Is she - is she okay?!" he shouted, barely holding himself back from saying 'alive.'

He tried to meet someone's gaze, get some kind of reassurance, but nobody looked at him. Not even Rochelle looked his way, or made any attempt to respond to him. Raw and vulnerable reflex had him staring after Nick, and the gambler's brow twitched in some faint tell. What emotion hid behind it, Ellis didn't know.

"Open the door." Coach instructed, short of breath as they carried Lena carefully up to the car. Ellis was frozen in place, shifting back and forth from foot to foot, causing Coach's voice to harshen into a snap. "Ellis! Door!"

That broke through his trance, and Ellis bolted to the opposite side of the car, yanking open the back door. He held it with a white-knuckled grip, watching as they tenderly carried Lena up to the opening and eased her onto the seat. Christophe watched through half-closed eyes, weakly reaching his hand up to grab onto the safety bar screwed above the passenger window.

A groan of pain left him as he dragged himself by it, pushing himself up against the door to make room. He was cognizant enough for that, at least.

It was a careful balance of curling her body to fit without manipulating her any more than necessary. There was not enough room in the car to lay her flat, not without bending her knees gently and putting her head in Chris' lap. He didn't utter a protest when they did, merely laid his hand against her shoulder in some gentle comfort.

"Maybe..." Rochelle uttered, voice tremulous, trying to hold herself together. She had no right to be upset, and yet she wanted nothing more but to throw herself to the ground and cry, sob, scream - rail against whatever sick world they'd become trapped in that had such a sense of humour, that thought it appropriate to crush every speck of goodness they had left.

"... Maybe there's something in the ambulance that'll hel-?"

"No." Rhiannon uttered flatly. She stepped away, not even sparing a look for her sister once she'd been settled down in the car. Rochelle couldn't help but watch her, worry flinching at her lips. "We checked it already." The blonde bent down, grabbing her baseball bat from the road. She tucked it under her arm and continued on to the Charger's motionless corpse. "Let's just go."

Her tone was so close to authoritative, it unsettled Rochelle. She'd only known the woman for a few hours - but that had been long enough to recognize the titanic shift in her behaviour. The hollow intensity, the stability that made no sense, like Rhiannon had detached. Dissociated.

She wanted to say she didn't think of the hollow, animal glaze that had overtaken Brenda in that final day, but that would have been lying.

It frightened her, just a little.

Rhiannon grasped the long-handled axe, using a bootheel to brace herself against the Charger's ribs, wrenching it free with a near-silent growl of effort. She held it in her hands for just a moment, frame still... and then she thrusted it, sinking it anew into the fallen Charger.

Once, twice, she gored the steel through the Charger's back - but she faltered before the third strike, strength failing such that the blade merely nicked its thick hide before halting where it sat. She stood there a moment, head low, before withdrawing the axe.

"Someone." She turned, slipping both her hands to grasp the weapon and lift it. "Take this."

It was offered out blindly, Rhiannon's eyes averted to the ground. Something like shame tightened her shoulders, revealing the gesture for what it was: a plea for help, because she couldn't wield it. Her hands trembled, and it wasn't from the effort of holding the axe aloft. They quivered like touching it burned her.

Rochelle's chest ached, almost ashamed of herself for comparing her to Chris' previous leader. Of course the woman was detached - the alternative was to break down, and there was no time or room or space for it. They had to keep going.

"I... I'll get it." Ellis suddenly burst out, drawing a surprised blink from Rochelle. Her eyes sought his, but it was her turn to be avoided. "Chris's okay now." Even as he spoke, the Georgian turned his head, gaze slanting in to look at Christophe, gaugingly.

Urgently, because he needed to be okay.

The Spaniard blinked back at him with foggy attention, the healing cut along his cheekbone crinkling when he offered a weak smile. It held as firm as he could manage, like a reassurance. His hand tightened on Lena's shoulder to hold her where she laid. "Yes, okay, hermanito. You go."

Ellis spared a look for the fallen woman, eyes flickering over her features and the blood thinly coloring her lower lip and chin. She didn't deserve it, hadn't earned it. She'd thrust herself into danger to save his friends. She'd taken a Charger that could have hit Rochelle instead.

Or Nick.

_You'll be okay. I promise._ He wanted to say it aloud, but what good would it do? _We got you._
"Let's hurry." he muttered, feeling the sudden warmth of threatening tears lash at his eyes like the crawl of high tide. He stepped away, following in Rhiannon's footsteps. "Sooner we get in, sooner we can get her layin' down..."

As he reached her, Ellis grabbed ahold of the brush-hook, drawing it from her hands. The biker let it go with only the softest resistance, and when he got the weapon solidly in his hands, she turned away. Letting her bat fall into her grip, Rhiannon pointed down the street with it.

"Few blocks down." she stated, waving her bat in a small motion. "Place on the right. Sunset Café."

"Okay." Ellis murmured, turning to glance hesitantly back toward the sedan. He watched as Rochelle closed the back door, and Coach prepared to slide back into the driver's seat - though not without sparing a short mutter at the younger woman.

Whatever he said, Nick heard it, too. Ellis could tell by the faint flicker of annoyance that darted over his expression, and he could tell it was about him by the way both of them looked his way.

He frowned, silently, and Rochelle abruptly hurried away from the sedan. She returned to the motorcycle she'd abandoned to save Nick, struggling momentarily with the kickstand before she got it folded away. She took the bike against her hip, guiding it into a roll forward.

Ellis was distracted enough by her efforts that he momentarily forgot the consequence of his joining the survivors on foot: Nick approached him at a slow walk, katana held low. The older man gave him a visible berth, attention cautious and gauging. Ellis couldn't help a surge of frustration - anger, almost, but then something softer than that.

Longing.

He buried it by force, inhaling. He buried the part of him that wanted Nick to pull him into an embrace, kiss him, soothe away the pain and the fear like he'd done so many times before -

He only wished he could bury the part of him that felt a surge of sympathy when his eyes caught onto the blood staining Nick's slacks' pantleg. "Yer leg -" left him before he could stop it, and he quickly averted his gaze, clearing his throat. Try as he might, he couldn't take the words back from where they hung in the air.

Nick glanced more fully at him. A distance entered his eyes at the same moment he examined Ellis' half-turned face, the attention causing a heat to rise to the younger man's face. Some kind of soured humour touched Nick's voice when he spoke, roughly. "It's my bad leg. Barely feel it."

He walked past, then, turning his back on Ellis.

The Georgian raised an arm, wiping his forearm against his brow, fighting the urge to close his eyes. At the very least, they needed to communicate enough to get to the base. With danger at every turn, they had to work together. There was no time to argue, no time to fight.

If not for them - for their new friends.

So Ellis steeled himself, sliding one hand up the handle of the brush-axe, letting the other grip low, near the end. He held it carefully, blinking out from underneath the bill of his cap. "I'm ready." he stated, as calm as he could. "Let's go, before somethin' else finds us."

Rhiannon nodded without looking back at them, fisting her free hand at her side as she marched down the road. The soft sound of the sedan rolling along the road to catch up to them prompted Nick to follow. Ellis took a careful inhale before starting to move, allowing his steps to take him closer than he wanted to Nick. The gambler didn't acknowledge him, and that suited him fine.

Rochelle quick-stepped to join them, jogging the motorcycle alongside her. Moving in a loose triangular formation, with Rochelle at their back and the sedan making its way gently across the road, they approached the accident blocking the center of the street. The smell of gasoline was thick in the air where it puddled around the wreck, like a gas tank had been punctured in the collision.

Ellis eyed it as they stepped past, curiously - the sight surprised him, as the crash seemed otherwise gentle... but he didn't have time to mull it over. Rhiannon stepped quickly to the nose of the ambulance, tilting to glance past it in a cautious scan.

She halted with a short, "Shitfuck."

Although he knew already what she must have been seeing, he hurried forward, anyway. The Georgian pushed to stand near her flank, blinking past the emergency vehicle.

A block or two down, the road was swarmed with infected. They were in varying states of rest - laying on the asphalt, leaned against building storefronts, kneeling and squatting with their heads in their hands or digits clawing at their skin. The remnants, he was sure, of the horde that had chased them out of the base in the first place.

"Shit." he stated, despite himself.

Nick glided to stand behind them and gazed over Ellis' shoulder, ghosting the quietest mutter in agreement.

"Fuck."
Chapter 188

Nick paced quietly on the concrete, thumb brushing repetitively back and forth against his chin and the softening stubble there. He was uniquely aware of how quiet Ellis was, leaned against the side of the ambulance, bent to place his hands on his knees.

Nick tried to catch a glance at the Georgian's face, but it was hidden under his trucker cap. "Watch him." Coach had said, simply. "He can't take much mo' of this shit." He said it with such concern, like Ellis was weak, and that agitated Nick. Ellis couldn't handle more? Could any of them?

He probed into the feelings in his chest, the tension, the boiling discontent - and why? He'd barely just met the woman, and had no reason to feel anything but apathy. He told himself that, repeated it, yet her bloodied face and slack body stirred something so close to regret he couldn't stand it.

Her soft face, gentle eyes, the sweetness edged with fierce attitude, even the brown hair - maybe she reminded him too much of Ellis. He'd held her in his arms and carried her to the car and a voice hissed in his ear, Maybe next time it'll be him.

Nick's frame shivered, instinctually, practically tasting the fear roiling in his stomach. It made his pains seem far-away and unimportant, buried under the overwhelming self-awareness crawling unpleasantly up his spine: he knew if it had been Ellis in the path of that Charger, he'd have done the same thing Lena had.

He'd have willfully died - or risked death, at least - to save the younger man. He knew that, as clear and real as the pain pulsating in his sliced leg. Even with Ellis standing healthy and whole before him, he couldn't shake a feeling of dread. It had nothing at all to do with Lena, he realized, and perhaps that was cruel of him, heartless.

Not that that's news to anyone.

He tightened his grip, squeezing on the hilt of his katana. He had to focus. He could stew later, berate himself for his weakness later. "We heard you two shooting a gun earlier. Where is that?"

Crouched low, Rhiannon had her wrist pressed into her mouth, lips parted in a faint panting gesture. Her eyes were blank on the air, like she was thinking, wracking her brain. That, or on the brink of some terminal collapse. "Ran out of ammo." she muttered in response, almost idly.

"Okay." the gambler huffed out, turning his chin to glance over his shoulder. Rochelle had her fingertips up against her mouth again - tearing, gently, at the chapped flesh of her lower lip. It was new, he thought. A new neurosis. "We've got three people on melee weapons, two handguns with nearly no ammo, two shotguns with even less, and a sniper rifle with a few bullets left. Not a fucking armory, exactly."

Rochelle shook her head, slowly, murmuring under her breath. "We should have taken a detour back and gotten more ammo. We knew we could be walking into trouble. Stupid."

Nick huffed, harder, doing his best to moderate his voice even though part of him wanted to raise it and drown her out. "If we set up, have someone tick them off and then make a line back there -" Nick was speaking low, pointing back down the road. "- and have everyone on guns while they're charging... then grab melee weapons once we've taken out everything we can..."

He trailed off, and it was hard not to notice there was very little attention being paid to him.
Nobody responded, nobody even looked at him. He snorted out a quiet breath, squeezing fingers on his katana handle, and shrugged. "It might work. Or, we cut our losses and leave."

Rhiannon's head twitched, by a degree, to one side.

It seemed innocuous, until she slowly drew to stand, her head turning to cut a glance his way. Her eyes widened just faintly, then narrowed, and cold fury drizzled across her expression like the first gust of a cold front. "Cut our losses?" she echoed, quietly, tone vibrating on the cusp of fury.

His lip curled up away from his teeth, affronted - and mostly because he hadn't meant it like that - but Rochelle exploded out of her reverie and abruptly pressed between them, hands up.

"No, no, no. Shush, both of you. No fighting. Not right now." she hissed out, gaze darting between them. "That's the last thing we need. We need to get somewhere we can get Lena safe and resting. Can we all agree that's the priority right now? Please?" Her gaze stopped darting, then, and stared directly at Nick.

He wanted to protest, argue, but didn't. He matched her attention with a lifted chin, but a calm acquiescence.

She did a half-turn, glancing at Rhiannon. The blonde's posture didn't relax so much as deflate, jerking her face away to glare off toward the other side of the street. Tenderly, Rochelle spoke, a wariness drawing the words out. "I don't know if we can handle that many at once, but we have to try. Nick's plan's what we got, so let's focus, okay?"

The blonde didn't respond at first, and when she did it was with merely a nod.

Rochelle turned to Ellis, bending in slightly and placing a hand against his cheek. "You okay, baby? We're gonna need you for this." He nodded, and the listlessness of the gesture drew Nick's attention. Isn't this backwards? Isn't he the one always making stupid, ridiculous plans that get us out of trouble?

Hadn't he come to rely on it?

Nick crossed his arms indelicately, katana dangling at his side. He examined the Georgian, clamping teeth on his tongue to withhold a sigh. He knew fighting the horde head-on was a bad idea. They didn't have the brute strength or the ammo for it. They needed something crazy.

The solution to his problem was obvious - and he hated it. Hated himself for thinking it. Hated the fact that he knew he'd do it.

"Overalls." The Georgian startled at hearing his nickname - jumped, a little, and his head lifted. Blue eyes blinked to meet Nick's, caught off-guard in a raw display of confusion. They held, though Nick wanted intensely to break away. Instead, he thumbed over his shoulder, away from the group. "Can I talk to you for a second?"

Some subtle upset made his jaw flicker tense when Ellis looked almost panicked. The kid's eyes flickered in soft fear toward Rochelle, as if seeking out reassurance or support, but she looked nearly as surprised as he did. Warily, he forced himself to straighten up, slowly lifting a hand to rub at his jawline. "Uh..." he muttered, airlessly, and Nick could tell he didn't want to go.

So, Nick didn't give him the chance to say no, turning on a heel and striding across the road, doing his best to mask his limp. With the slash he'd given himself along the side of his calf, cutting straight through his slacks, the discomfort from his Spitter-lame leg was only worsened.

There was a pause before he heard the Georgian hurrying after him, boots striking hard on the
As he reached the sidewalk, Nick stopped, only turning half-way back around. The gesture forced Ellis to tentatively step around him in order to be in front of him, and he stood there, awkwardly grabbing at his elbow with his free hand.

"Um. Whut's up?" he uttered, rubbing up to his bicep with a nervous tension. It was unfamiliar and strange to see him so awkward. It was painful to be alone with him, like the air itself was choked with everything they'd said in the past few day - and everything they hadn't. "I kinda thought we weren't..." He trailed off, eyes darting to look anywhere but Nick's face.

Nick forcibly placed his gaze focus squarely on Ellis'. He inhaled in a soothing hush, lowering his chin. "Ellis. My plan is shit." The Georgian startled, eyes snapping to his. "We don't have the ammo for it. They'll swarm us. And between my leg, Lena being out of the picture, Ro's hand - at worst we'll get killed, at best we'll get more injuries to add to the pile. It's not gonna happen."

Softly, Ellis frowned, shaking his head. There was no comprehension there, just insecurity. Discomfort. A whole host of other emotions Nick wouldn't have ever desired to witness on his features, let alone directed at him. "O... Okay. Whut're you sayin'...?"

It took Nick effort to soften his features, drawing them into something like sincerity. It was easier, though, for the fact that he wasn't entirely insincere. "I'm saying - we need you." That struck Ellis like a blow, the younger man taking a half-step back, gaze scanning with such urgency over Nick's face... it ached, just a little, to play that game. It ached to manipulate him, and worse for the fact that it worked.

It ached, but not enough to get him to stop.

"You're always the one getting us out of this shit. So come on." He advanced a step, and hated himself for it when Ellis flinched into a slump. "I know you can do it. You've done it before, and under more pressure, and with less time." His face reddened slightly under the intensity with which Nick held his gaze, and there was that soft fire, that tingling electricity, that urge to close the distance - and Nick might have broken, under different circumstances.

"Start thinking up something. Stop worrying and start coming up with a plan to get us past that goddamn horde." Ellis was staring up at him, hanging onto his voice. The only thing sweeter than that flush on his cheeks was the helpless sense that, for one isolated moment in time, Nick could have fixed it. There was some resignation, some desperation, in the way Ellis looked at him that said he could have leaned in and kissed him and returned everything to normal.

It said that they were not so broken that he couldn't find a way to put them back together.

I'm sorry, kid. I can't.

Nick turned, murmuring over his shoulder, closing his eyes rather than look at Ellis when he said it.

"We need a Hail Mary and you're it, doll."

If he'd slipped a knife into Ellis' heart, that was the twist. He didn't hear the reaction, didn't see it, but he felt it in his bones. Ellis stared after him with a gaze so hot and sharp it rose the hair on the back of Nick's neck. He walked back to the ambulance with his chin low, acutely aware that Ellis did not follow.

Rhiannon was staring off into the distance, fingers caught around a strand of frizzy blonde hair, but Rochelle was watching him with something akin to accusation. She narrowed her eyes, lips tight and thin and tone laced with wary threat. "What was that about?"

She hadn't heard any of their conversation - but she knew, maybe, or merely figured he'd been up to no good. He couldn't argue the notion.

"Nothing." the conman returned, voice low. He cast a shallow glare her way in some aloof challenge, like a silent urge to keep her nose out of things. The look offended her instantly - she straightened, tensed, and approached a step toward him in a gesture that made it extremely clear she had no intention of doing so.

Rochelle raised a hand, pointing indelicately toward his face. "Nick." she muttered, quieting her voice to something dangerous.

She might have continued, had her eyes not flickered over his shoulder. He didn't turn, but Ellis' approach was audible enough on its own. The producer started to speak, strafing a step to get out from behind Nick, but Ellis ghosted past both of them to stand at Rhiannon's flank.

Nick got enough of a look at his face to see some of what he'd hoped for - but a lot of other things. Resolve, but shame, too. Disappointment, and he didn't know who it was directed at.

"Hey, girl." Ellis uttered, though Rhiannon didn't acknowledge him with more than a grunt, staying where she was, crouched on the road. "That bomb yuh threw earlier. You got any more?"

Rhiannon shook her head, slowly. "I got a bomb, but it needs an alarm. There's a spare fire detector in the bag, but shit's dead." The thought seemed to draw her out of the fugue that had overcome her, gradually turning her head to look up at him with a vague snarl playing at her lips. "The dickbags won't come if it's not noisy. If we throw it right we get maybe two, three...? More if we're lucky and they clump up?"

Hesitantly, Rochelle spared a short and nervous glance at Nick before drawing her arms into a clutch over her stomach. "Dead?" she queried, seeming almost afraid to speak at all, like some trance had fallen over Ellis and she was wary of breaking it. "We have batteries, if that'd help - double-A, for our flashlight..."

"Fucker takes 9-volts." the blonde returned, shaking her head in negation, a frown appearing on her face as she did. "No good."

Ellis turned, glancing up at Rochelle. He very explicitly did not let his gaze shift toward Nick, screwing up his brows in a look that walked the line between worry and apology. "We don't need no alarm. We got one already." When nobody seemed to understand, the Georgian took a step, patting a hand on the ambulance.

Rochelle's eyes widened a little, glancing up at the emergency lights bolted to the top of the ambulance. "Oh." she uttered, half in realization and half in lingering uncomprehension. "But -"

The mechanic lifted the hand back up, waving it to interrupt her, a sigh escaping him. He dropped his chin with a kind of exhaustion, morosely shrugging up a shoulder. "But, you ain't gonna like the plan." It was not his usual elation with an idea. He looked self sure, but hollow. Tired.

Nick had gotten what he wanted, and it left a sour taste in his mouth.
The group had retreated from the ambulance, pulling back up the road to avoid drawing any attention from the infected swarmed along their path. They huddled around the sedan's driver's side window, and all eyes were on Ellis - except for Nick.

The gambler stood at the slightest distance, eyes scanning their surroundings to ensure nothing snuck up on them. It was a mere bonus that it allowed him to avoid looking at Ellis.

Was it guilt, lingering in his chest? Is that what he felt? You didn't do anything wrong. You just motivated him to get his head in the game. Just so happens the best motivation you have is in using the fact he thinks he loves you. That's not your fault, that's his.

It was weak, and he knew it, but it was all he had between himself and the tingle of disappointment that he hadn't taken the chance that Ellis had offered him.

If you die tomorrow, you'll wish you'd taken what you could while you had it, Nick.

Ellis leaned Lena's weapon against the car and raised both his hands in a hesitant gesture. "Okay. We need somethin' tuh draw 'em together fer the bomb, right?" He spoke slowly, pointing toward the ambulance where it sat in the middle of the street. "Well, the siren'll handle that fine. We turn it on, wait for 'em to get all gathered, then throw the bomb."

Rochelle put her shoulder against the car, frowning gently in a clear indication of uncertainty. "How do we know they'll stay while the bomb goes off? Or go after the car and not us?"

Ellis shrugged up his shoulders, chin lowering. "When we set off alarms'n'shit, they get drawn - but they don't attack the car or nothin'. But that pipe bomb Rhee rigged up, they went after it like crazy. I think it ain't just the noise, but it's the lights, too. Like the whole thing drives 'em nuts as Boomer puke. Figure the sirens'll do the same thing."

Rochelle couldn't quite force her frown away, raising a hand to brush fingertips against her jawline in a faint scratch. "Okay." she uttered, carefully. "If that's true, then they swarm the car. Without blowing the whole ambulance up, it's not like we could kill all of them. They'll probably circle it."

Pacing back and forth beside the flank of the car, gloved fingers working against one another in a vague wring, Rhiannon shook her head. "So, we kill half of the fuckshits. Better than two or three."

A faint smile darted over Ellis' lips at the support, raising a hand to rub at the back of his neck with a quietly bashful dip of his head. "We'll get rid of some of 'em, n'the rest'll be distracted long enough fer us tuh get the jump on 'em. It'll give us a better shot than just facin' the sons'uh bitches down." He glanced warily between Rhiannon, Coach, and Rochelle, gauging their expressions.

Coach nodded his head, exhaling out a grumbled breath. "Agreed. How we gonna trigger the sirens?"

That faded Ellis' smile, reaching up to thumb against the bill of his cap and push it up from his face. He licked the backs of his teeth, swallowing, nervously. "That's... the part y'all won't like. We don't wanna attract any more zombies than we gotta, so... I was thinkin', someone should stay in the ambulance, so they can shut the siren down once the bomb goes off."

Rochelle bristled a little, blinking around his face as if in search of something. "That... seems dangerous. Doesn't the bomb have shrapnel in it? What if it blows through the ambulance and hurts whoever stays behind?"

"I know." the Georgian agreed, looking distantly toward the ambulance. "It's pretty reinforced, though. Shouldn't nothin' get in, as long as we throw it on the ground 'n'it don't land on the windshield. But I can't promise nothin'..." Some worry fretted at his features, dragging his lips into a frown. "I know it's risky."

Leaning to rest his elbow inside the open car window, Coach lifted a hand to chew thoughtfully at a hangnail jutting out from his thumb. "Why don't we all just get in the ambulance? Least that way, if somethin' goes wrong, we'll all be together."

Nick released a snort, dryly uttering the first words he'd dared to say since the conversation started. "So we can all die in there? Have that gasoline light up from the bomb and set the whole thing on fire, cook us inside? No thanks." He thrust out an arm, glancing just lowly over his shoulder. "Why not just one person, in case something goes wrong? It sucks, but can we afford more risk than that?"

A sigh escaped Ellis as he muttered out, "It ain't gonna catch fire. They're frag bombs."

"I don't like sitting someone out like bait." Rochelle muttered, crossing her arms tightly over her chest. Her eyes wandered up, striking a slant to gaze in at what she could see of Lena's slumped frame. Christophe's gaze drew hers when she looked in, his eyes softened in some silent empathy, and she averted her attention to the ground. "It feels... We've lost enough today."

Rhiannon stepped abruptly closer, a frown cutting a harsh line across her face. She reached up to brush her hair behind her ear, fingertips catching on the stud in her eyebrow in the gesture, brushing against the steel. "I'll go." she stated, flatly, tone sharp as a tack as she slid her hand to grab ahold of her bat and swing it. "Give those motherfuckers what for. For Lee."

There was the smallest flurry of motion. Rochelle and Ellis both poised to protest, because it was untenable to risk her with her sister already injured; Nick turned around entirely with an easy frown, because he knew the others would argue despite the fact that sounded just fine to him... but it came to a halt when the car door opened, suddenly.

Moving rigidly, Christophe crawled out from the sedan, his hand gripping the roof of the car to keep himself balanced. He got to his feet, standing as straight as he could manage, turning to gaze at them over the roof of the sedan. His bare torso trembled just a little, goosebumps raised on tan flesh, and who knew if it was pain or chill.

"No." he uttered, simply. Nobody had the time to protest before he was advancing, crossing his arm in front of himself in order to keep a hand on the sedan, gliding it along the metal to support himself. "It should be me, sí?" He glanced at Rhiannon, attention slim, before he focused on Ellis. "She can fight. I cannot. No tiene - you do not have sense, to put her in the car."

Ellis flung his hands up, seeming to only just hold himself back from bolting around the car and grabbing Christophe, like the man might fall if he didn't. "N-no - buddy, you can't - you're barely standin'. You been out of it all dang day."

Rochelle had no such restraint, and she quickly moved to circle the sedan and step in front of Chris. He kept moving, however, so she started to back-step to keep up with him. "Not a chance, Chris. You're gonna sit back down and watch Lena. We need you to watch her, okay? And keep her safe. I need you to do that."

Ellis couldn't help but quiet, glancing at Rochelle, unable to shake the sense that it was the same as the way she'd urged him to watch Christophe. To stay on the bench, because he couldn't do it, out of fragility, weakness - whatever it was.

A frown spawned on his lips, hands lowering.

Slowing his footsteps, Christophe met her gaze, examining the intensity there. He laughed, a little, and his arm twitched like he might reach up and cup her cheek like he'd done in the gunstore, that gesture that somehow seemed so tender and so dismissive all at once - but he didn't. He merely cocked his head and lowered his voice. "En verdad tengo que hacer esto." he murmured, witnessing frustration spawn over Rochelle's eyes.

Chris looked instead toward Nick, eyes low-lidded, and everyone joined him in the gesture.

Nick allowed himself the smallest of grimaces, reaching a hand to touch flatly over his bicep where it stung from abrading against the concrete. 'I need to do this.' He hated it turning to him, like Christophe thought he'd understand. As if they were somehow alike, as if Nick cared at all. It was softly that his forearm brushed into his chest, and something hard pressed into him from the breast pocket of his dress shirt.

He didn't need to remove it to know what it was.

The bullet that Christophe might have put through his skull, had things gone differently. He'd never reloaded it.

Adjusting his gaze to point up, staring toward the sky for a beat, Nick shrugged his shoulders. "Don't look at me. Assclown wants to do it, let him do it. Pull his own weight. Someone has to." was all he said, flat and apathetic.

Rochelle's gaze shifted to a glare, seeming disappointed, though unsurprised. Ellis looked down at his boots, and Nick was almost sure there were wheels turning under his grungy, faded cap.

Christophe smiled just a little, sublimely, and a dusky exhaustion crept into his eyes that might have been as much the influence of painkillers as it was resignation. "Puedo ser útil." He glanced back to Rochelle, and his arm did move that time. He reached out to cradle her wrist in his hand, fingertips just gently brushing there. "I cannot rest forever, mi bonita. I can be helpful here, por favor."

Fighting a soft pant, stress drawing her brows into a wring, Rochelle retracted her hand from his. Her voice quivered just faintly, head shaking a few furious times. "I... no. I'm injured, too, but I could still defend myself if I needed to. If someone's going it should be me."

Releasing a faint growl, Rhiannon thrust her arms out in an agitated gesture, voice turning to a scathing hiss. "Fucking shitballs, people, I said I'd go. I'm not part of your fucking team, so that's that. I'm going, whether you shitsticks like it or not."

She started to turn, charge off, but Nick snapped out a hand and grabbed her elbow, snakelike. His fingertips gripped on the leather of her jacket, almost squeaking with the force it took to keep her there.

She had just about a second to look utterly enraged, like she might turn and drag him to the ground, pummel his face into the asphalt below them - and then he stated, shortly, "Your sister wouldn't let us let you. And I'm more scared of her than you." Rhiannon stared at him, a raw discomfort edging into her expression until he twitched into a smirk.

The blonde snarled, almost flapping her arm up in order to shake free of his grip. He let her go, but only after her posture turned a little in a clear indication of surrender. She shifted away from him a foot or two, defensively, tightening her fist around the handle of her baseball bat. Her eyes set to a shifting, low scan, growling out a rough-hewn, "... What the fuck ever."

Nick knew enough of body language to know he'd successfully triggered at least one of those choice emotions: fear.

Lust was up in the air.

"If Chris thinks he can do it, then I say we let him." Coach grunted, slipping a hand down to grasp the handle of the driver's side door, popping the latch so he could get to his feet. He bent his arm back to grab up his double barrel shotgun from the passenger seat. "We gotta trust each other. Now more than ever."

Ellis nodded in quiet agreement, a gesture that brought a gentler smile from Christophe. He glanced back at Rochelle, halting, examining the woman's face with a mixture of earnest curiosity and a subtle sadness. "I will be fine, ¿sí? I promise."

Rochelle stared him down, dark eyes widening just a tick before abruptly closing. "Yeah. I know you will." He relaxed just an instant before she continued: "Because we're both going."

The Spaniard gazed at her, head tilting, but no protest rose to his expression. He revealed only a small slip of a smile that flashed teeth, full of an adoration that lit his eyes to sparkling. She nearly flustered under the look, but jutted her jaw and scanned her teammates for dissent.

Nobody could find the footing to argue, it seemed, not when it would spin them in circles yet again. She spoke anyway, soothingly. "I'll have a gun to cover him, if it comes down to it. And I wouldn't be much help to you guys as it is."

Nodding indelicately, Coach reached to place a gentle hand on Ellis' shoulder. "You three best go look in on the ambulance, see what we got. Gotta make sure we can even go 'bout this before we get all riled up."

Ellis laughed a little, ducking his head at the contact. "Yeah, okay." He stepped away, glancing across the sedan with a faintly concerned tilt to his lips. He watched Rochelle step back, leading Chris around the nose of the car. "Get all the weapons ready, I guess."

He couldn't help but think Christophe looked at her like he'd just crawled out from a desert and she was a glass of ice-cold water. He followed her, less like he meant to and more like he couldn't manage anything but to be near her.

Was it possible to feel nervous, pleased, and envious, all at once? Whatever that set of emotions amounted to, it sat in his throat like a frog he could not swallow.

"I'll get the bomb." Rhiannon muttered, quietly, turning to slink over to the motorcycle and the duffel bag lashed to its rear.

Ellis tried to pass her a smile, but the blonde was already facing away. He let the expression melt off his lips, sighing faintly before he turned to follow Rochelle and Christophe. As he did, he drew past Nick. He didn't intend to engage - even tilted his chin to shade his eyes in the hope Nick would let him go. The man did not have such self-control, it seemed.

"Good job, kid." the gambler uttered, quietly.

Ellis froze mid-step, feeling an ache in his chest he thought might grow until it choked his lungs off air... but it didn't. It stayed a faded hum and that was, perhaps, worse. Like he'd gone numb.

He looked over his shoulder, recognizing the strain in Nick's flattened expression. Either he was forcing himself to affect some warmth or holding himself back from something deeper, and Ellis didn't know which he preferred to believe. He settled on the former, because at least that came with resignation, and that was almost like calm.

"I didn't do it fer you." he responded, low enough to keep it between them. Nick almost looked startled, and that stirred a nugget of spiteful satisfaction - right next to the well of heartbreak. "And next time yuh want somethin', just ask. Don't say... that stuff."

The older man gazed at him in silence, expression thinning into something cryptic, unreadable.

"It hurts me when yuh don't mean it. So quit."

Ellis could have waited for a response, but he forged on ahead. He didn't want to hear whatever Nick had to say. It would either be a new lie or an old one, and he didn't trust himself not to get angry if Nick defended himself. It had been obvious, after all.

To hear him compliment him like that - worse, that little 'doll,' that petname he'd never used before... It hurt, and hurt even more for the fact Ellis knew it had been on purpose. Even more for the fact it worked. He hated being vulnerable, desperate, hoping Nick might reconsider them.

He'd felt that surge of emotion like he could just kiss Nick and make it all go away, and he was disappointed in himself.

Maybe Nick had been right. Maybe it was better if they kept their distance, considering Ellis felt like one step less distance and he'd have been begging Nick for just... something.

> Can we just ferget it all? Can we just... stop, and go back tuh how things were? I'll fergive you, we can ferget everythin'... You don't gotta say you love me... I just wanna stop bein' like this. I wanna fight fer you. I wanna touch you again. I wanna - listen tuh you breathin' at night, sleep knowin' I'll wake up tuh see you - I miss yuh -

And there, Ellis supposed, was bargaining.

Nick watched him leave, a coldness seeping into his veins, and supposed that love had finally made the list.
Chapter 190

Ellis carefully cracked the ambulance door open, a visible relief surging through him when it did so with no protest.

"Okay. Watch muh back." he whispered over his shoulder, looking back to see Rochelle nodding quickly. He carefully craned his head into the vehicle and peeking around the cabin. The interior was completely open - the two seats in front had just enough room between them to slip past, and the main portion of the ambulance was accessible to him.

There was a bench-like table built into one wall of the interior, and a cart that might have held medical supplies at one point. He squinted in, but there was not much else - aside from a corpse, dressed in a crisp pale blue shirt and dark khakis. He gave it a nervous stare in the shadowed space, but it did not move.

It stank, ferociously, and he could tell even from that distance that its skin was bloated and bruised as it decomposed. The smell of rot and even more unpleasant things burnt his nose, but he focused on the task at hand.

"Least them zombies don't play dead like in the movies," he offered, sighing. As Rochelle and Christophe looked on, Ellis crawled up into the passenger seat, perching himself there and glancing over the dashboard.

There was a small box attached to the roof, just near the rear view mirror, and he reached up to brush fingertips over the metal surface. It had a set of controls - an on-off switch, a red button labeled 'SIREN' and a dial that had a variance of settings that meant little to him. 'WAIL', 'YELP', 'PHASER', and then a notch that read 'W-Y-P'.

Tones or patterns for the siren, he decided. Though he didn't know what they correlated to, it made enough sense compared to the sound he imagined in his head. Worst to worst, he figured, they'd just pick one at random. Any noise would work, as long as it was loud.

There was a fat panel of switches built into the dash, and he squinted at it. The labels next to each switch read out a dizzying array, and though a number of them referenced lights and floodlights, he didn't feel certain which he actually wanted. He grimaced faintly at the unfamiliar sight, inhaling shortly.

They had some room for error, as long as they managed to get the lights and the siren going in some form - but still.

Thoughtfully gazing over the switches, Ellis touched idly at the buttons. Everything was flipped into the 'ON' position, except a scattered few, and one marked 'MAIN POWER'. With a vague grunt, he decisively moved to flip the handful of switches that were off - leaving only the power switch deactivated.

Shit better light up like a Christmas tree, if this's gonna work.

"It is okay?" Christophe questioned, leaning his shoulder against the inside of the open door and looking in to follow the motions of Ellis' hands. "I do not see the key."

Ellis sighed gently, tilting his head to glance at the ignition. It would have been too easy for the keys to be merely dangling there, he supposed, but there wasn't much reason for the keys to have gone far. "Me neither. Won't know if it's gonna work until we can test the battery. Don't need her tuh turn over, just get power."

Grabbing ahold of the headrest of the chair, Ellis shifted up, pushing between the seats and drawing to his feet in the back of the ambulance. He carefully picked his way around the corpse on the ground, kneeling down next to it with his nose wrinkling at the smell.

As he neared, his eyes found a needle clutched in the woman's hand... or what remained of her hand, rot-fattened fingers appearing waxy and skin stretched like it might burst.

He wasn't sure what the needle had been full of, but it seemed likely it had been what had taken her life. It wasn't the first suicide they'd seen, but it didn't get easier with time, it experience. A frown touched his lips, sympathetic, as he steeled himself with a sigh.

The Georgian reached down, trying carefully to probe at her pockets without touching her. Despite his efforts, when his fingertips brushed something metallic in the right pocket of her khakis, he had to slip his hand entirely into the pocket. He clenched his jaw against disgust when he felt her skin give way inside the constraints of her pantleg, like she crumbled into meat and tendon at the manipulation -

When his fingertips caught on the set of keys, he yanked them free in a hurry, fighting off a shudder. He didn't mind the gore so much when it was zombies, but the corpse of an uninfected was different. It yanked at his gut til he felt like he might be sick.

He had to focus.

Straightening, Ellis clutched the keys and scrambled back into the front of the ambulance. He raised them with a shake, jingling them at his companions. Chris gave him a heady grin, leaned into the door, but Rochelle merely watched from her place beside him.

"Alrighty. Let's see if she's still got some juice." the mechanic uttered, sliding into the driver's seat. He nervously grazed fingertips over the controlbox above his head, double-checking that the power switch was flipped to the off position - because the last thing they needed was it barking to life - and then slipped the keys into the ignition.

He glanced to the dash, sticking his tongue out enough to clamp it between his teeth. Pleasepleaseplease -

Twisting the keys just once, he couldn't help a wave of satisfaction when the dials jumped to life and a few lights blinked on, including a tiny red dot in the corner of the controlbox and a glowing light in the center of every one of the buttons on the switch panel. "Yes." he hissed out in a joyous utterance, but just as soon as he'd turned it on, he turned it back off.

He glanced up, leaving the keys dangling from the ignition. "Okay. Y'all best get up in here." he uttered, even as he pushed himself up and carefully stepped back past the seats. Rochelle shifted to give him some room, and he clumsily slid out of the ambulance and back onto the road. Ellis lifted his head to look over at the sedan.

Coach was standing next to Rhiannon, and Ellis could see she was holding another pipe bomb in her hands, their discussion close and quiet. He frowned a little, curiously, but focused his attention back toward Rochelle and Christophe.

The Spaniard grasped ahold of the edge of the passenger seat, dragging himself up into the car. "Dolor de muelas." he grunted as he did, and Rochelle placed a hand at his lower back. She didn't really push him in - just held it there in some reflexive gesture, following his progress.
As his hip hit the seat, he shoved himself in place, exhaling hard. He grabbed the steering wheel, then, steadying himself as he sidestepped the distance between the two seats and plopped his weight down.

The effort was not overly strenuous, but lacking an arm seemed to disturb his balance enough to slow and stagger him. He sought to balance himself or grab out with an arm and hand that didn't exist, only recognizing the fact when his weight would shudder, leaning into support that wasn't there.

Rochelle bit her cheek rather than ask him if he was okay. The answer was obvious, and it seemed foolish to press the issue, not when it was most likely to make him feel worse. Instead, she stepped a foot up, getting ready to push up into the ambulance.

Shifting into a thin smile, Chris reached his hand out, palm up and fingers gently curled to offer her help up. She blinked between it and his face, unable to stop herself from recalling the first time he'd offered a hand out like that. She'd sort of despised the smug affection bleeding into the gesture as he tried to ferry her across a busted-down door like she were feeble.

A lot had changed.

She took his hand this time, fingertips locking in something that was less than a clasp; it felt like some delicate, old-fashioned invitation to dance. Rochelle crawled up into the passenger seat, wanting sincerely to believe there wasn't a warmth making its way to her face. "Thanks." she uttered, almost out of the corner of her mouth.

He merely grinned.

As Rochelle settled down, flattening her palms against her thighs, she looked up and gazed over the ambulance dashboard. "What do we do here? This looks only slightly more complicated than my old control room."

The mechanic pushed his body forward, gesturing in widely. "Just turn the car on, then flip the power switch up there -" He pointed toward the controlbox rigged into the roof, then down at the dashboard panel. "- and there. If everythin' goes tuh plan, it'll all turn on, and them dead'uns'll swarm yuh." She looked daunted, almost, and he couldn't offer much comfort.

He was worried, too, and sighed. "We only got one shot at it. If it don't do like we're hopin'... You two stay in here, okay? 'N' after y'all turn on the siren, maybe duck down or go in the back, away from the windows."

Waving his hand in a dismissive gesture, Christophe leaned a bit to one side to rest against the door. He had to twist to avoid pressing his bandaged stump against the surface, almost turning entirely to face Rochelle and Ellis. "Everything will work. No fear, hermanito." he promised, and Ellis flashed him a hesitant smile.

It was easy to be positive under the influence of painkillers, he mused, though he kept that to himself.

Hadn't he been unerringly positive, what felt like so long ago? The realization drew him to an uncomfortable realization, an awkward sort of self-awareness. He'd lost something, somewhere along the way, and he wasn't sure if that was Nick's fault or not.

"I think he's the only reason it didn't happen sooner."

"You okay?" Rochelle was looking at him, and he hesitated. Honesty came thrusting to the forefront, tempted to tell the truth - but Rhiannon's hushed voice interrupted.

She approached at a cautious pace, eyes alert to an overstimulated degree. "They wanted me to bring this." she muttered, raising a hand as she walked, clutching one of the two hand radios. Rather than hand it over, she tossed it, forcing Ellis to scrabble to catch it lest it fall and hit the ground. "So. Yeah."

Grasping the radio carefully to his chest, trying not to frown, the Georgian turned to offer it up to Rochelle. "Here." She took it from him delicately, like it were precious, setting it in her lap. "Y'all get ready in there. I'll radio when we're good tuh go, okay?"

The producer winced, offering a barely-withheld sigh as she shook her head. "Okay, sweetie. Just make sure you guys are careful with that bomb, alright?"

With a grin, Christophe leaned in to whisper across her, conspiratorially. "Sí, por favor. I am running out of limbs to lose."

Ellis snorted, wrinkling his nose at the both of them. He started to respond, mouth opening - but Rhiannon turned to walk away, and he gave a scattered look toward her and scuttled to follow. He caught up with a few long strides, settling into a trot at her flank. The Georgian cut a slightly hesitant look to the side, scanning her expression.

It was a little cold. Distant, like she were actively trying to affect a hollow expression.

"Um.. hey. You holdin' up alright?"

The blonde grunted offhandedly, wiping a hand up to brush her hair behind her ear with a crooked thumb. She bit her tongue, baring teeth in the gesture as she glanced at him, askance. "Dude." she stated, flatly, like he'd said something stupid.

He blinked, deflating just slightly, glancing down toward his boots. "Just askin'." he muttered back, unable to fight a slight irritation, hands fisting at his sides. He felt too on-edge, on too thin a tightrope to handle being rejected so thoroughly. He didn't want to be angry with her; after all, she was the one who'd nearly lost her sister, and still could.

Ellis tried to inhale, like it would calm him.

It didn't, really.

Rhiannon lifted a leather-clad shoulder, returning her gaze forward. She said nothing, and gave no indication she intended to. It shouldn't have bothered him as much as it did.

He felt like he'd run out of patience.
Rochelle inhaled, hard.

Okay. This isn't awkward.

It was.

You aren't alone with him for the first time that doesn't involve him being unconscious or you tending the arm he lost saving you. No big deal. Just a cute latino boy who nearly died for you. Nothing new. It's not a big deal.

It absolutely was.

She flexed her fingers on the radio clutched in her hands, gazing intently through the windshield of the ambulance. Shaking her head quickly, she tried to leave the thought process behind. She exhaled thinly, watching her teammates as they held some conversation. Nick was animated, gesturing at the bomb, and she wished she could read lips at that distance.

Ellis looked somewhere between frustrated and embarrassed, averting his face to the side, and she didn't need to so much as squint to see that the gambler was talking about him again. And, judging by Ellis' reaction, it wasn't wholly negative.

A surge of protective instinct rose up, drawing her into a sigh. What are you doing, Nick? All you're doing is confusing him. At least when you were being a bitch to him, we could pick up the pieces. Now what's he supposed to do?

"¿Cómo estás, mi sirena?" the Spaniard murmured, drawing her attention with a blink.

She sighed, raising a hand to run the pad of her thumb along her chin, closing her eyes for a passing moment in time. She considered shrugging the question off, but she didn't have anything to hide anymore - not when it came to that. "Nothing. Just this whole thing with Nick and Ellis is really messing me up... I'm not really sure what to do about it."

Chris didn't respond, eyes on her, so she flipped a hand up and continued. "Like, what? I can't separate them, and I can't make them make up. The only reason Nick's still here is because we... I agreed not to talk about it." She wrung her hands a little, circling them on the air in a strangling gesture. "Even though what I want to do is chop him into little pieces with that sword of his."

"Pagaría por verlo, de hecho." he murmured, and she wasn't sure what he'd said - but his tone was a subtle croon and she found herself embarrassed all the same.

It was tempting to ask, but she suddenly thought she might be better off leaving it alone.

Pushing her shoulders back into the seat cushion, Rochelle exhaled tautly. "I just wish Nick would get his head out of his ass." She flipped her hands to give a vague gesture, palms up and fingers splayed. "He... said some stuff to me that makes me think he... cares. I just can't tell if he cares enough to admit he doesn't love him, or if it's.. something else."

She didn't want to say it, like the uttering of it might jinx it: maybe Nick didn't think he could handle a relationship after a failed marriage. Maybe he did feel for Ellis, but was afraid. Didn't it make more sense than Nick being a liar?
Strange, that she'd come to trust him, when it came down to it. She firmly believed he might hurt Ellis out of some well-meaning but warped intention, but maliciously? Maybe, at worst, it had started off like some ploy for sex and evolved out of Nick's control - beyond what he wanted, what he meant.

That made sense, too, though she desperately wished it wasn't true.

The man tensed his lips to whistle, just softly, eyes flickering toward the team where they stood. He watched Nick point toward them, watched Ellis jostle forward to interrupt as Rhiannon looked like she was getting angry. "It is a shame," he murmured, lowly. "They are a good couple."

Rochelle frowned a little, drawing her arms into a cross over her chest. "I'm not so sure. Couples talk, they're honest. They don't want to hide their relationship. This on-again off-again shit, it's not... good for you. Even if it's great in the time between, you end up spending all of it waiting for the next disaster."

Christophe hummed quietly. His attention lowered, staring at the dashboard, and she could sense a discontent. Rochelle turned her head to glance at him, uncertainly. "... What?"

The man shrugged, a pained gasp leaving him when the gesture jostled his bad shoulder. Rochelle wanted to surge over and make sure he was okay, but she was trying not to overreact. Treating him like he was breakable was tempting - but ultimately unhelpful. So, she merely watched as he reached to place his hand over his ribs, rubbing there with a shaking head. "I think he is honest. Just not by speaking. He is... a man of action, ¿sí?"

"He may as well not if he's not gonna say it." she returned, ire flaring, despite herself. "Maybe I'm crazy, but Ellis deserves to hear it. Out loud."

Chris curled his fingers to scratch at his side, pursing his lips with a coked head. "He did not say it enough in the gun store?" he offered up, almost soothingly, only to widen his eyes when Rochelle outright flashed a glower up at the roof of the ambulance. "I do not mean to upset you, bonita. Is it not the truth...? Running into a sword, sin pensar... It is romántico."

Rochelle let her head hit the headrest, closing her eyes. "... I don't... I don't disagree. It just isn't enough. Whatever he did or didn't do, it doesn't change the fact that Ellis came out of this in love with him - and thinking Nick doesn't love him. That's what matters. And now he's just... confusing him."

"¿Qué?" Christophe questioned, examining her cautiously.

She kept her eyes closed, chewing on her tongue for an instant. She was tempted to keep it to herself, but Chris was a third party. A fresh set of eyes. She couldn't tell Coach much, as it'd only make him angry... and telling Ellis would only further the issue. At least she could tell someone, now.

"I'm pretty sure you made him jealous, sleeping on Ellis in the car." she stated, guilt threatening when she couldn't help a slight grin. "I really shouldn't be laughing about this, but it's about time he suffered a little. The guy was practically spitting fire."

Chris looked vaguely shocked, his jaw popping open in a thoughtful gesture. He huffed out a sound of interest, looking ahead to glance toward the sedan. "He was?"

Rochelle lifted a hand, waving it. "The look on that boy's face, you'd have thought you two were an item. I know Nick's paranoid and all, but he was about to have a straight-up meltdown. It would've been hilarious if it weren't frustrating. Like, you dump him, treat him like shit - then have the audacity to get jealous? And over nothing? Honestly."

Slowly, Christophe tore his gaze away from their teammates. He glanced back at Rochelle, a slow grin filtering onto his lips. He cocked his head, leaning toward her just the smallest degree. "Seems that he is not the only one."

It was surprise that made her balk. Her eyes darted over his face, caught between protest and bewilderment. She didn't know what was more startling: the fact he wasn't upset at the idea of Nick thinking he and Ellis were flirting, or the implication she was jealous.

"I'm not jealous -" she blustered, affront touching her voice as she prodded a finger in the air, reflexively trying to turn it around on him. "Unless you're trying to tell me you and Ellis actually were cuddling."

She said it without thinking. Her face heated up, catching her lower lip between her teeth in a quick gesture of nerves, one Chris noticed. That isn't nearly the point, is it? His grin widened a little as if he sensed her realization, but whatever he was going to say was lost when the radio abruptly crackled to life in her lap.

"Okay, folks. " Ellis' voice came through, a nervous and stressed breeze to it. Rochelle quickly averted her eyes, pointing down at the radio, and Chris dropped the conversation obediently - but not without a slim grin. "We're gonna hide behind the sedan and wait for the zombies to cluster up, and then I'll throw the bomb. Y'all ready in there?"

Rochelle glanced up, spying their teammates. Ellis stood near the nose of the car with Lena's brush-hook gripped in his off-hand, and Nick was standing behind him with his katana balanced on his shoulder. Coach had Christophe's machete in hand and Rhiannon was swinging her bat idly beside her.

"Yeah." she responded with a quick press of the radio's 'Talk' button, trying not to look at Chris. "Let's do this."

"Okay. We'll go when y'all go. Just hit the power switches'n'let that baby shine."

Scratching at the side of her neck, Rochelle pointed toward the ignition. Chris easily grabbed ahold of the keys, twisting them to turn on the battery. The ambulance clicked to life, and Rochelle looked over the controls now lit in front of her. She reached out to place a fingertip against the main power switch on the dashboard switchpanel, nodding her chin up toward the box on the roof.

With a blink, Chris stretched up his hand, grabbing the power switch of the sirens. Neither pressed it quite yet, gazes matching on a sudden whim. Rochelle soothed herself with an inhale, trying to coax herself into that familiar calm that came with surrendering to her teammates' protection. They'd keep her safe. They'd get through, because they always had.

"Ready?" she uttered, earning a grin from the Spaniard beside her.

"Espero que sí." he responded, with an affirmative nod.

It was in calculated unison that they pressed the switches. There was just the subtlest moment of silence, of calm, where Rochelle started to wonder if the ambulance was even working. She had just enough time to glance up at the ceiling before a pitchy wail reverberated around them, and the softest click preceded lights flashing on from every angle.

She looked around, startled. Red and white lights flashed against their surroundings, and bright white flood lights snapped on at either side of them to light up the street. The siren shrieked up to a fever pitch - then fell, dropping to a low growl before it rose back up. Rochelle almost laughed, a sense of pride swelling in her chest at Ellis' plan finding its footing.

And then the ambulance shuddered, and the scream of infected broke through the noise. They flooded around the vehicle, pouring into the back of it. The pounding of body and hand against the rear of the car grew until the zombies changed tactics, flooding up toward the front, seeking out weaknesses in the ambulance's chassis.

Rochelle's eyes widened slightly, flinching backwards as an infected gave a furious pound of its fist against the window on her door. Her lips parted to speak, discomfort threatening - and then the zombie leapt, bashing its face against the window, instead. A crack started in the glass, spiderwebbing gently between its own edges. "Uh -"

As the infected reared back, readying itself for another attack, Rochelle scrambled back off the seat. She bumped into Christophe's side, grabbing his elbow to drag him with as she retreated into the rear of the ambulance. Her heel struck the corpse there, raising that horrendous stench around them, and she halted with Chris leaned into her.

The window broke a little more with another meaty thud, and Rochelle carefully stretched a hand back to grab her gun from its place tucked under her waistband. She thumbed the safety off and exhaled, feeling a kind of clarity when Chris' hand slipped to loop fingers loosely around her wrist, stabilizing himself - and offering some sort of comfort, some solace.

Come on, Ellis.

We need you.
When the sirens started and the lights flared to life, it was hard not to leap in the air in triumph. Ellis felt that familiar rush that came alongside the success of some hare-brained scheme, some stunt coming to fruition. He wanted to holler, throw his hat, but Coach must have sensed it. The big man set a hand on his shoulder, eyes grim as he nodded toward the pipe bomb. Ellis chewed at his lower lip, gazing through the car window where they all crouched behind the sedan. They had to time it right, and there was no room for error with Chris and Rochelle in danger. He had to throw it soon enough to stop the infected from breaking into the ambulance, but late enough to get as many infected in the blast as possible. The latter, as it turned out, would not be a problem. There seemed even more infected than he'd expected, as if they'd erupted from the ground like ants from a disturbed anthill. They swarmed the ambulance in a writhing and furious horde, smashing against the boxy rear before clambering their way toward the front. Some bashed and clawed at the sides while some flooded against the nose, crawling up to reach the windshield. Panic struck like lightning; there were too many, and they came too quickly. Ellis could see the ambulance shuddering and jolting with the assault, and he scrambled to activate the lighter in his other hand. "Shit." he uttered, attention scattered as he snapped his thumb against the lighter's trigger until it lit. "Shit. They're movin' faster than I thought!"

"Come on, Ellis!" Nick snarled, looking through the car window to watch the zombies clamber atop the car's front. One slammed its fists against the windshield, a vast set of shattering lines crackling along the glass in a branching pattern. "They're getting swarmed! Either get the bomb thrown or we go in -"

Rochelle's voice crackled from Nick's hip, edging toward desperation. "Guys?! Now would be good! Please!"

Ellis crammed the fuse into the flickering orange flame, watching the thread catch fire eagerly. "Got it!" he shouted, standing straight up. He put one arm out, counterbalancing, twisting his hips just faintly to coil his body behind the throw. Nerves started a chanting self-encouragement in the back of his head.

You threw a 'nade at a Tank from yards off, you can do this, man - just don't land it on top of the car - that's all - and don't roll it under - and don't -

He inhaled, and threw.

There was a helpless sensation that sunk in the moment it left his fingertips. He watched it go, tumbling through the air, top-heavy. It went too high, but there was an infected kneeling on the nose of the car, and it struck into its back. The soft ricochet sent it to the ground, sitting neatly just in front of the ambulance. Ellis might have dumbly watched it explode, had fingers not latched in his shirt from both sides and dragged him down to the ground. He hit a knee roughly, wincing, and scattered a look to his left and right. Nick having a hand tangled in his shirt didn't surprise him - bothered him, sure, but didn't surprise him - but Rhiannon doing the same caught him off-guard.
Their eyes met, and she looked almost as startled as he did.

Then the pipebomb went off.

It wasn't a tremendously loud sound. As he'd learned the first time, the girls' bombs weren't about percussive force so much as gathering infected in a tight clump to then shred them with shrapnel. Behind the siren's wailing, he didn't hear much at all - except the wet thumps of any number of infected hitting the ground, some gurgling and snarling, but most silent.

He raised his head enough to peek, and the front of the ambulance looked like it had collided, full-speed, into the horde. Blood smeared it in messy swipes and stripes, a bit like a Boomer had exploded just at its nose. Although plenty of infected had perished outright from shrapnel to vital areas, some looked merely staggered as they grasped and palmed at the metal jutting from their skin.

One grabbed hold of a nail stuck through its cheek and yanked it free, tearing away a hunk of flesh with it. Another tugged and clawed at a shard of metal sunk straight through its eye, only stopped by the thick ridge of bone that made up its eyebrow.

They were stunned for just a moment - and then the remaining infected resumed their attack like nothing had happened at all.

A zombie leapt into the front of the ambulance, feet striking blood and viscera and slipping, sending it crashing to the ground. The next had more luck, and it went skittering up to crouch on the hood. Its hands started a quick and lashing pound on the windshield, thickening and broadening the cracks.

"Come on!" Coach bellowed, that protective instinct driving him to lunge to his feet. He sprinted, lighter on his feet than seemed possible, machete ready in his hands. "They gonn' get through!"

Nick was on his tail in an instant, katana gripped in both hands, and the two men bolted toward the screaming, flashing ambulance. Ellis scrambled to grab up Lena's weapon, racing after them with a shout. "Nick - tell 'em to shut down the -"

The infected broke through the windshield with a tremendous shattering, the tempered glass turning to sparkling, crystalline shapes. It tinkled up and over the nose of the ambulance, raining into the interior. Amidst the glinting white flakes of glass, the zombie crawled into the ambulance's front cabin, shrieking in tune to the siren.

Ellis felt horror for the split-second it took for a gunshot to ring out, a flare of light illuminating the interior. The zombie fell backwards, landing spread-eagled over the breach between the hood and the dashboard. Its mouth was still gaped in a growl, teeth bared. If he squinted, he could just see Rochelle standing behind the seats, gun raised.

And then her gun lowered as she cradled her head, nearly collapsing as the gunshot sent agony through her ear drums. Christophe tried to catch her, but he was struck just as badly by the sound reverberating through the echo-chamber of the ambulance, and they both collapsed into hunched curls.

Another infected leapt to fill the gap made by its predecessor, but Coach was faster. He grabbed it by the leg, halting it, and it had just enough time to twist around and howl into his face before he slashed the machete into its midsection. The weapon took a massive slice from its side, its insides draining like so much grey and ruby molasses.
It screamed, clawing at his face in fury. He earned a scrabbled strike to the cheek before he could attack again, hewing the infected entirely to the spine. They were resilient, but not invincible, and it slid bodily to the hood and then to the asphalt. Coach brushed the back of his wrist against the blood streaking along his cheekbone, glaring up at the lights flashing atop the ambulance.

"Cut that shit off!" he shouted, trying to be heard over the wail, and only partially succeeding.

There was one small benefit to the sirens' continued cry. The infected that hadn't yet noticed the windshield opening seemed possessed by the lights, trying desperately to climb up to attack the spinning and flashing glow. They offered easy targets, scrabbling and kicking at the ambulance in their efforts.

Nick and Coach separated, stepping to either side to start picking them off. With their blades, it was a matter of slicing into their core or their neck, taking advantage of their single-minded distraction. It felt less like taking down a horde and more like clearing vines, unearthing the ambulance from the scattered few that had survived the bomb.

It was simple enough - until more infected began sprinting out from around fences and flat, gravel alleyways, and their attention zeroed in instantly on the survivors.

Ellis saw it first, but Coach charged before he could react, meeting the first infected with a swipe to the neck. "The siren!" he shouted when Ellis started to run to help him, and the younger man balked for just an instant with uncertainty turning his step into a stumble.

As much as he wanted to help fend off the infected, they had to turn the siren off or more would just keep coming. And that was not so simple, either. The broken windshield had scattered glass everywhere inside the cabin; trying to go for the control panels would tear him to shreds. He had to shut it off another way, and quick.

Lena's brush-axe was suddenly heavy in his hands.

He bolted for the ambulance, skidding to a stop just in front of it. He shifted his weight to bounce into a wide stance, swapping his grip to level the blade with the ambulance's hood. He jammed the tip between the hood edge and the chassis, jerking and shoving to get the length of the blade sunk in - and then he set his palms flat on the handle and jumped.

It took two tries. He could feel the weapon groaning, protesting, and the hood undoubtedly did the same. The sensation of something snapping traveled up his arms, and he thought it might have been Lena's axe - right before the hood flew up a foot or two, and all his weight suddenly bore down on the handle of the weapon with nothing to counter it.

He went down, Lena's brush-hook clattering to the ground in front of him, only just managing to catch himself so he didn't land completely on his wrists. His knees took some of the blow, though he felt the bones in his lower palms sting, shaken by the collision. He gasped a little, scrambling back up to his feet before he could really feel the pain.

Grabbing fingertips underneath the hood's edge, he thrust it open, holding it there with a palm flat against the edge of the hood. His eyes instantly flashed to the battery there, and he took one single inhale before he grabbed the black cable that marked the negative terminal.

He didn't know how ambulances worked, really, but tearing the battery out seemed like a good start.

There was a lugnut holding it there, so he put a heel against the nose of the ambulance and yanked, leaning his whole body into the gesture. It strained, resisted, and he released a sound that verged on furious as he pulled -

When the cable's connection failed in his hands and released from the battery post, he stumbled back by his own force. Ellis only kept on his feet by luck, reflexively shoving a foot back to catch his weight on his heel. The relief that flooded him at the success was short-lived when the sirens and lights did not deactivate.

Ellis looked up. He had enough time to feel a distant disappointment in himself, a frustration, and then white and orange flickered along the dashboard.

A spray of sparks drifted up, then faded. He blinked, the colours searing into his vision at the same time a sour smell prickled at his nose, unpleasant and burnt. The lights blinked out instantly, though the siren gave a sleepy and warped groan before it faded to silence.

"Huh." he uttered, almost bemused, unsure.

Although part of him sunk into curiousity at the explosive and unexpected reaction, he was startled into motion when a faint lick of flame darted up from the dashboard. It struggled to catch on the plastic and likely wouldn't turn into much, but he shouted anyway: "Guys! Get out the back!"

He could just see Rochelle straighten, dizzily grabbing Chris by the elbow and dragging him deeper into the ambulance to open up the rear doors. Ellis turned, reaching to pick up Lena's axe from where it had fallen on the ground. His wrists ached softly as he gripped it, clutching, darting a look around.

Rhiannon had joined Coach, the two standing nearly back-to-back. She struck her bat against an infected's head, dropping it to the ground, and followed up with a quick kick against its face. The strike snapped its neck, leaving it twitching on the asphalt.

Nick had one zombie speared on his katana, backing up as it snarled and flailed its way up the blade thrust through its midsection, but another was charging at his flank. There was no hesitation as Ellis bolted toward him, shifting his grip on the brush-axe to ready it like a sledgehammer.

Whatever he felt, and whatever happened between them, it wasn't in him to watch Nick get injured.

He sprinted, and cut the zombie off before it reached the older man. The creature screamed at him, flaring hands forward in a clutching grab, refocusing on the new threat. Rage sent spittle dribbling from the corner of its mouth, along with some greasy black substance.

Momentum swung the brush-hook over his head, bringing it down over the infected like he were chopping a log. It landed on the zombie's shoulder, shattering clavicle and splitting it down until the blade was stopped by the thick bone of its ribcage. The infected shrieked, continuing toward him even as its arm peeled away, lifeless.

Ellis grunted, kicking out at its knee. The infected stumbled forward at the strike, snapping teeth at him in some effort to bite. He reflexively shoved up a hand, palm catching against its forehead - but while the zombie's right arm was nonfunctional, its left snatched forward to dig nails into his bicep.

He grimaced with the pain, startled by the discomfort as its clawlike grasp cut into his skin, damaging the abused skin left behind by the Smoker that had dragged him across the parking lot a few days earlier. "Sonuva -"

Ellis might have punched it away, but before he could react, Nick was next to him, almost surgically thrusting the katana into its chest. The blade struck through its lungs, an audible tacky breathlessness touching its snarls as they lost function, and its body went quickly limp.

Nick let it slide to the ground off his katana, sparing the shortest glance for Ellis, eyes only just tracing the crescents of blood on his bicep. Something guarded touched his eyes, a distance, and he turned with a short and flat utterance. "Be more careful."

Gritting his teeth, Ellis almost didn't respond - almost had the strength not to.

Almost.

"'Thanks' works too, y'know." he snapped, a flustered energy flooding warmth to his cheeks when Nick didn't so much as acknowledge him. He watched the gambler stride away to glance up the road, examining the now-clear street. Ellis grunted in agitation and turned toward Coach and Rhiannon, who had finished off the last of the infected.

He felt a furious kind of annoyance, but he felt a little stupid, too.

Yuh gotta stop lettin' him get under under yer skin, man...

Stumbling out from around the ambulance, Rochelle staggered along with Chris in tow, his arm looped over her shoulders. They both looked dizzy, disoriented, and Ellis took it as a merciful distraction.

"Guys! I'm so sorry!" he babbled, racing toward them, putting one hand up while the other gripped the brush-axe at his thigh. "That didn't work near like I wanted. Shit was too dang close, I -"

"Ay, dios." coughed out Christophe in a weak tone. He leaned into Rochelle's side, lifting his hand in a pleading gesture for silence. Ellis skidded to a stilted stop, frowning a little before he realized the Spaniard was joking. "Talk slowly, hermanito. I hurt, my head hurts - como estar borracho."

Helping him along as they walked, Rochelle uttered a faint laugh. "Okay, yes, shooting the gun was a bad idea. I got it, Chris. I got it. I'm very sorry. Next time I'll let the zombie crawl in and eat us, okay? Will that be better, you big baby?"

The man tipped his head to give a grin, eyes low-lidded with exhaustion. "Y estoy borracho de tu amor."

With a curtness that startled all three of them, Coach cleared his throat. He gestured with the machete in his hand, sweeping it back to point toward the sedan. "A'ight, young'uns. Glad everyone's a'ight, but we still got Lena to get settled. Can we get a move on, get our asses inside this base?"

A faint embarrassment lowered Rochelle's eyes, glancing at her boots in a discomfited sort of shame. She hadn't forgotten, but adrenaline had flooded out her good sense. The fact that she'd been enjoying Chris' company only worsened the cold feeling of distaste with herself that wormed up her spine.

She shrugged out from under his arm, a hand cupping under his elbow to keep him supported. He blinked at her, confusion entering his expression. She avoided looking at him, fully aware that he thought he'd done something wrong, but didn't know what. "Let's get you back in the car. Coach, you stay here - I'll drive."

Ellis watched them head toward the car, offhandedly aware of Rhiannon stepping toward Coach. The blonde raised a hand to sift fingers through her hair, uttering a small, "Thanks, big guy." The football coach offered a nod of acknowledgement, highlighted with a gruff smile.
"Nice fightin'." he stated, and Rhiannon nearly grinned.

The mechanic felt abruptly like he and Nick were the only ones not getting along, and the thought brought on an unexpected surge of loneliness.

Any pride at his plan working out turned to nothing but a sour taste in his mouth.
Chapter 193

It was self-indulgence that led Nick to stand watch on the street corner. The task gave him quiet, gave him time to think, though thinking felt more like sinking into the clinging quicksand of self-pity. He gritted his teeth and tried to pay attention to his surroundings, even as he wanted to do anything but.

There was no way to come out unscathed, it seemed.

Ican't leave, but seems like that's the only thing that'd make you happy. Nothing else fucking works.

Spite flew a whim across his thoughts: If he's just going to be miserable no matter what, why not let him stay with you? At least it'll be less fucking lonely. He exhaled, shaking it off. He couldn't. If they survived long enough to find rescue, Ellis could leave him behind, scot-free. Guiltless. If they didn't, at least they'd die being honest with each other.

Isn't honesty the fact that seeing him like this makes me want to gouge my own goddamn eyes out? But what's the alternative? I lie, get back with him, waste his time? Waste our time, whatever we have left?

Watching Ellis grow to hate him was easier to swallow this way. It would have happened one way or another, and at least now it was on his terms. Burn it down before it burns you. If it's doomed anyway, why try? Why keep trying? Why ever fucking try?

Nick's eyes flashed up to watch a scrap of litter dart across the street on a wayward breeze.

Because you miss him. snapped a smaller part of him, and he grunted aloud, shaking his head as if to dismiss the thought. It didn't work. Because you miss the way he looked at you, that made you feel like you were worth half a damn. You miss believing for a minute someone could care about you the way you care about them.

Because you miss feeling safe with someone for the first fucking time in your life.

He closed his eyes, though the action prickled the hair on the back of his neck. Breathing didn't soothe him, not when the air was practically rancid, and he wasn't sure that his own body wasn't contributing. He felt infuriated - and tremendously alone.

Thing is, he won't be safe with you.

As it turned out, the Sunset Café was a small seafood restaurant, gilded exuberantly with seagulls. The sign was painted with them; there were sculptures of wood and metal gulls adorning the fence and the scrubby yard; the windows had stickers stamped on them of seagulls in varying states of flight and bow-legged repose...

A grimace crossed the gambler's lips. "What the hell kind of senile asshat decorated this place?" he muttered, distantly registering Coach's appearance at his flank. "Because disease-ridden, flying rat shit-factories make a guy real hungry."

That drew a snort from Coach, wearily. The big man crossed his arms, turning to watch Rochelle ease the sedan up and into the squat parking lot just in front of the building. It had a slim porch, and though its door was busted off its hinges, he could see the front door through the fine mesh walls and noticed it was intact.

"If it'll get me washed, I ain't gonna moan 'bout nothin'." he stated, quietly, rubbing a hand over his gut.

"Good luck washing the old lady stink off after a few nights here." Nick was quick to retort, thrusting a hand up to indicate the restaurant, palm out like he was warming it at a fire. "I can actually feel it from here. Is that shit contagious? Someone got a fucking Geiger counter for Alzheimers?"

Coach broke, uttering a rumbled laugh before he muffled it into a dry look of disapproval. It was the closest to normal Nick had felt since the break-up, the closest Coach had come to treating him like everything hadn't changed.

Then it passed.

"Rhiannon." the ex-football player uttered, shortly. She lagged behind the sedan, posture tense as she pushed the motorcycle along. Her eyes darted up to acknowledge him, silently. "You wanna check the base out? Make sure nothin' got in? I'll go with."

Exhaling shortly, the blonde sped into a slight jog, running the bike up the slight bump that made up the sidewalk. Once it was settled there, she nudged the kickstand out, letting the motorcycle lean there. "Okay." she agreed, flatly. "Then we get Lena inside."

Coach nodded curtly, leading the way at a quick march. "We'll do a sweep. Y'all watch the car." The blonde fell in line behind him, bat dropping from its tuck under her arm, quick to catch up. "Ellis, check on the girl."

With that, the two stepped up into the porch, making their way to the door. Rhiannon drew a key out of her pants pocket, unlocking it, and they slipped inside together.

Nick turned his attention just enough to watch Ellis as he padded up, chin low and face masked under his trucker cap. The younger man was in his own head like Nick had never seen - stewing, boiling, primed to blow. His gentle nature had failed him, leaving just a frustrated, wound-up anger.

It was only more proof that Nick was nothing but bad news.

You'll get over it, kiddo. I promise. You're young. One day, you'll be glad you passed me by, glad you got while the getting was good.

And maybe one day, Nick would stop regretting it.

"Who bets Tons of Fun gets murdered in there by our little maneater?" he tossed out, agitation prickling his shoulders and only worsening when nobody paid him any mind. He should have been used to it, but it grated on him, now. It wasn't the reaction he sought to elicit, though he didn't know what was.

Rochelle pushed the driver's side door open, sliding out with a mewled grunt as she pressed her injured palm to her tummy. She watched Ellis approach the sedan, reaching to pull the unlock switch so the back doors clicked open. "Too bad there wasn't a stretcher in the ambulance. Would've been nice to carry her in on."

Crossing his arms loosely over his chest, Nick shrugged. "If there's damage to do, probably already done." When Rochelle flashed him a frown of disapproval, he repeated the gesture, firmer. "Just being honest. I'm not thrilled about it, either, for the record."

That seemed to surprise her, and the producer quieted to a thoughtful blink. She didn't seem sure what to react to: Nick caring at all, or admitting as much aloud. She settled for neither, and turned to keep an eye on Ellis as the younger man pulled open the car door and leaned inside.

He reached in to touch a hand onto Lena's ankle, where she lay compact and crumpled along the backseat. His fingers gripped there, uttering a sigh as he gazed over her face. The blood on her chin had dried and no more had dribbled to join it, leading him to think - hope? - that she'd merely bit her tongue or cheek, and not bled internally.

There was nothing they could do if that were the case. Nothing but pray.

"She's doin' okay still." he announced, whether it was true or not. He could see her chest moving under the thin hoodie zipped up snugly to her neck, a quick-paced breathing that only comforted him a little. "Maybe we should -"

He didn't get to finish, not when her eyes flickered open. The sight shocked him into freezing, hand still lingering on her ankle, the intense feeling of his heart coming to a bracing halt in his chest sending cold tension down his limbs. His body surged forward instantly, leaning further into the car to bring his face closer to level with hers.

"O-oh - shit, she's - she's awake!" he uttered, voice cracking just a little, barely registering the way Rochelle rushed to push herself up against his flank and look in. She said something, a frantic question, but Ellis barely listened.

Lena's green-hazel eyes darted, matching his, and he could see the pain and realization there. It sparked a faint fear across her face, jaw just barely moving to run a dry tongue over her lower lip, rustling against the blood caked on the flesh. She did not move - but her body trembled in a way that made him think it wasn't incapability so much as fear.

It was that fear that sparked Ellis to speak, hushing out a soothing tone, even as he felt like he were floating a few inches above his body.

"Hey, girl. Yer okay. We got'cha." His hand tightened a little on her ankle, just softly, and relief threatened to break him into a small smile when she flinched at the gesture. She felt it, at least, and that was better than not feeling it at all. He released her just as quickly, lifting both hands up in the air. "Sorry. Sorry. That's good, though. Okay? We made it home 'n' we're gonna get you inside. Okay?"

He didn't think she was listening, if the glazed look on her face was any indication. She grunted, exhaled, and the roughest utterance left her: "K-.. kitt.." There was urgency there, desperation.

Ellis didn't react fast enough to stop her when she pushed an elbow against the seat cushion, wrenching up a few inches, but neither did it last. Pain caught like a hook in her, and as suddenly as she'd blinked awake, she was gone. Her body limpened, eyes rolling up to disappear in a flash of white before they closed entirely.

He yelped, despite himself, almost reaching out to grab for her, but Rochelle put a hand on his back to stop him.

"It's okay, baby." she muttered, grief apparent in her voice. "Let her be a sec'." Ellis turned just enough to look at her, see the wetness over her eyes, before he broke into a sigh. She let her hand retract, slipping a thumb between her teeth. "She's in pain. I don't know if we have enough painkillers for both of them."

She said it quietly, vaguely, so Chris wouldn't hear it where he sat inside the car.

Ellis winced, gaze flicking to his fingers. He curled them, tightened them, head shaking. "We'll... we'll figure it out. Maybe we can find some more, or maybe she won't be so bad after some rest."

Rochelle seemed dubious, thoughtful, but didn't get the chance to respond before Nick took a loud step forward, catching both of their attention. He lowered his chin, voice falling to a muttered, clipped annoyance. "We're spending meds on them, too? Is this the fucking game plan, nurse every broken-winged bird we find lying around?"

With a slow turn, Ellis landed flat on his heels. He lifted his eyes, gaze struggling to meet Nick's. When he spoke, it was flat and calm. "She's hurt 'cause you ran on ahead. So we're gonna help her best we can, and you can just go sit by yerself if you don't wanna help. He's seemin' the only person you care about, anyhow."

He didn't get angry. He didn't let himself get angry. It felt better to say it like that, as if he'd regained the higher ground. He didn't feel petty that way - he felt collected, and maybe disappointed. It felt even better when Nick's eyes widened just slightly, caught off-guard.

Did he look hurt? Injured, behind those guarded eyes?

Ellis was okay with that, if only just this once. He'd feel bad later, maybe, but in the moment - it felt good.

He lifted his chin, looking away well before Nick managed to collect his expression into a scowl. Ellis shrugged his arms into a loose cross and looked up toward the restaurant, a little relieved when he saw Coach lean out of the doorway. The interruption kept Nick from getting in a retort, and that felt very good.

"A'ight, y'all." the big man announced, tone level. "Rhiannon's gettin' somethin' set up fo' Lena to lay on. They got some beddin' in there, but the shit we brought'll come in handy. Let's get her in, an' then we'll unload." His eyes flickered over them, and if he noticed something had happened, he didn't let on. "Nick, you keep on guard."

The gambler grunted, noncommittal and irritated. He turned on a heel, and the slouch of his body - though he likely meant it to look closed-off, dismissive - mostly came off sulking.

Rochelle inhaled gently, sharing the smallest glance with Ellis, wordlessly searching. Telling Rhiannon her sister had drifted into consciousness seemed risky, and potentially do nothing but raise false hope. If the woman woke again, then it wouldn't matter.

If she didn't, it wouldn't matter, either.

She turned, leaning slightly toward the car to softly utter, "Hey, Chris. We're gonna get inside, and then you can get some rest, okay?" When the man did not respond, she frowned, stepping around the open car door to lean in and look through the broken driver's side window. "Chris?"

She paused there, softly, before an almost melancholic laugh left her. Ellis side-stepped to lean in and look for himself.

The young Spaniard had fallen right back asleep, drool and all.
Chapter 194

Coach carried Christophe in his arms, the boy's arm tucked against his stomach and stump facing outwards. He seemed half present, eyes opening before fluttering shut again, content to surrender to the larger man's care.

A fondness found its way into Coach's expression, even as he winced a little with every other step.

"Guess he tired himself out." Ellis mumbled, watching the elder Georgian carefully return inside the restaurant. Coach pushed the door open with his knee to protect Chris' legs from hitting it on the way past, and the two disappeared. "Guy's a real trooper. Dunno how he's keepin' it tuhgether."

Rochelle nodded quietly, focus shifting back to the car before her sympathy could shake her resolve. "He did good. He deserves some sleep. We all do." She sighed, lacing her fingers together and straightening her arms to crack her knuckles. It hurt her palm, the flesh drawn taut.

"We should go ahead and get Lena inside. Nick, give us a hand."

Both men turned, faces in varying states of protest and discomfort. Nick looked half angry, and Ellis' face drew in a wrenched look of betrayal. It was what she expected, but no less frustrating.

Rochelle put a hand up before either could speak, a finger extended and agitation flaring. "You can split the café up with a chalk line and stay separated later. Right now, we need to get her indoors, so everybody put on their big boy pants and come grab a leg." As much as she could, she kept her tone light - but her anger must have bled through, as the two men cowed under her direction. It was either that, or the awareness of Lena's health standing in the balance.

She chose to believe the former.

Ellis looked more apologetic than Nick did, head ducking low and eyes averting. The gambler grunted out a sound of irritation, gaze slitting as he advanced toward them. It should've been laughable to watch them flounder, but all it did was make her sad.

"Okay." she stated, taking a step to approach the open back door. She gazed in on the unconscious brunette, eyes flickering uncertainly to look for the best way to haul her out. "I'll climb in the other side and push, you two get a grip as you can, okay? Try and be gentle."

Without waiting for any sign of assent, Rochelle retreated. Ellis moved to take her place, shoving in close and setting a hand on Lena's hip. The producer circled the car and yanked the opposite door open, crawling onto the seat on her knees. By the time she got settled, Nick had appeared beside Ellis, and the two looked insufferably tense standing that close to one another.

Sighing, Rochelle slipped her hands forward to cradle them under Lena's shoulders. As she did, Ellis' other hand tucked under the woman's waistline, and they both shared a momentary nod before moving.

It was a calculated motion to slide Lena along the seat, and as her lower body neared the edge, Nick ducked to grab under her legs. With that supported, Ellis' arms slid to hug her torso, and she slipped off the seat to balance snugly between the two men. The posturing put them much too close together, and Ellis wanted nothing more than to stop the warmth threatening at his face.

It was childish, he was sure, to struggle so much with proximity - but it hurt. It ached with the reminder of the intimacy they no longer had. Nick felt warm and all he wanted was to turn his chin... and bury into the gambler's shoulder.

He set his jaw, keeping his eyes on Lena's face where the woman tilted into his chest... or he tried to, until Nick's eyes caught his. The older man looked almost self-satisfied. Amused, like he'd sensed Ellis' conflict and found humour in it. Nick blinked his expression back to neutral upon realizing he'd been caught, but too late.

It was with an agitated energy that Ellis slipped a foot back, only truly committing to the step when Nick moved with him. The gesture was less like a coordinated effort, and more like Nick losing his footing in some tug-of-war contest. "Quit." escaped him, more flustered and weaker than he wanted. "This's hard enough without you enjoyin' it."

Even as they stirred to motion, Nick drew his head back in something almost affronted, narrowing his expression into a pinch. "I didn't say any-"

Ellis didn't have the patience to let him finish his protest. He hushed out a sharp breath, tightening his arms gingerly around Lena, ensuring she wasn't jostled more than necessary as they moved. "You don't gotta." he snapped off, quietly, and the statement seemed to put Nick off enough to silence him for just a moment.

The older man's frown gave nothing away other than an exasperation, even when a distant bitterness made him sigh. Kid's got you pegged, huh? Just a sadistic asshole.

They walked in cautious parallel toward the café's front porch, and it was just before Rochelle hurried to catch up with them that Nick allowed himself a muttered, "I'm not enjoying anything. Fuck, since when did you start playing the victim? Careful, kid. You'll put my ex to shame."

He knew acutely he'd crossed a line the moment he'd started, but his voice could not be halted. He witnessed a flash-fire of anger cross those blue eyes, and for a moment, they were strangers.

Then misery washed up over the younger man's face, mired in some distant disappointment, and he knew precisely who stood in front of him - and who had taken that blow. He wished he could coil the words back into his lungs, diffuse them back into nothing but air in his chest.

But they'd formed, and there was no taking them back now.

Rochelle had rushed up as if to help them, to take some of Lena's weight, but she was stopped dead in her tracks by the exchange. Nick didn't bother to look her way, and Ellis merely tipped his chin away and resumed his cautious strafe toward and through the restaurant's front door. Nick followed, as there was no alternative.

The restaurant's interior was nothing but wood paneling. Dark brown boards lined the floors, the walls, the ceiling - the entryway funneled into a short pathway blocked off by a shoulder-height partition. The building itself was shaped like a squat L. Over the partitioning wall, a main section of sturdy tables and benches lead up to a bar. Past the bar curled off a small ancillary section of the restaurant, lined with tables set up end-to-end as if to host larger groups.

It was there that Rhiannon was putting together a pad of bedding. She'd gathered together an assortment of blankets, some light-coloured and delicate, others dark and woolen. Her eyes darted up as Nick and Ellis approached, gazing over the distance between them, attention sharp on Lena's limp frame.

Coach was at her flank, setting Chris down atop a bench, laying him flat on his back with a tender attention. He acknowledged his teammates' entrance with a grunted utterance, but did not turn his head. "Bring her over here." he stated, simply.

Ellis led the way in silence, eyes rooted any place but on Nick. They wound cautiously between tables, careful not to bump anything or allow Lena to. Nick felt more than ever like crawling into the nearest hole and expiring - though that seemed too quiet and calm an end.

... Fuck. This is getting... I got what I want, he already hates me. Why am I tormenting him? Why can't I stop - this? He felt oddly claustrophobic, pinned between Ellis' utter silence and Rochelle's threatening presence on his heels. Why can't he just stop pissing me off for just a minute? It was never supposed to be -

His chest tightened with something he couldn't pinpoint, but his heartrate increased with something he knew well enough: regret. Self-hatred. Some bitter mix of the two, brewing into a layer of frost that cooled his blood and rose goosebumps along his arms.

This was never about making him miserable. Was it?

The moment they'd passed the bar, slipping through the small space between the edge of the bar and the inner corner of the building's bent shape, Coach and Rhiannon approached. The big man stepped to meet them, and he scooped his arms under Lena's body to help carry her - but as he slipped into place, Ellis' shoulder abruptly pressed into Nick's, turning.

It was an unmistakeable gesture. Ellis forced him away, leaning into Coach to let the health teacher's arms take her weight instead. Although the big man looked vaguely confused, he said nothing. In one swift transfer of grip, Nick was left with no reasonable option but to let go. He halted, watching Ellis and Coach carry the woman gently to the table.

Rochelle came to stand next to him, arms drawing into a cross, and he could feel the vibration of her anger. He didn't need to look to know she was slanting a glare his way, and he almost laughed at the intensity of her vitriol.

Rhiannon had no attention to spare for them, too busy rushing to flatten out the blankets in preparation. She leapt up to stand on the bench, resting a knee on the table itself. Her hands were quick and darted to follow as Ellis and Coach eased Lena down.

"Careful." she hushed, repeatedly, an edge of anger left sharp in the word. Neither man took it personally.

As Lena came to lay flat, Rhiannon sat down entirely on the edge of the table and placed a hand on her older sister's cheek. She said nothing at all as Coach and Ellis retreated, muddied green eyes firm on Lena's face, thumb drawing a line from her cheekbone to her jaw.

She seemed listless, suddenly. Harmless. Empty. It was like all the energy she'd funneled into keeping herself together had drained to numbness.

With a sigh, Coach turned, raising his eyes to Ellis' face. He studied it, thoughtfully, but did not seem inclined to comment on whatever he saw there. "A'ight, son. Let's get settled, sooner we get cleaned up."

The younger Georgian's head bobbed in agreement, and he turned on a heel. Ellis strode back to make his way toward the front door, chin low. He moved stiffly, arms at his sides, and his upset was a palpable tremor. When he stepped to pass Nick and Rochelle, the gambler lifted a hand and moved to intercept him with a step.

He didn't know exactly what he wanted to say or what he wanted to come from the conversation, but he had to say something. He'd let things get too far, and they had to regain some kind of equilibrium. He couldn't just make a mess and leave it behind; there was nowhere to go.

An utterance left him, just a growl out of the corner of his mouth. "Kid. That wasn't... I didn't mean -"

Shock left Nick reduced to silence when Ellis passed him as if he'd said nothing. It was not a matter of stepping around him - Ellis charged through him, giving no quarter. He led with his shoulder, and Ellis was a bundle of muscle and wound tension that had Nick stumbling out of the way before he could catch himself.

A scowl grew across his face, swinging a hand out to strike onto the edge of a table and steady himself. He turned his chin, watching Ellis march his way back toward the entrance. Nick slowly rubbed a palm onto his bicep, soothing out the scattered pain from their collision.

He spared a look for Rochelle, and the expression on her face was conflicted. Whatever amusement she might have felt was tempered by a drowning kind of concern. The woman tried to stifle it upon Nick's gaze turning to her, but couldn't quite manage.

She inhaled, letting her gaze drift slowly to meet his.

"Are you going to fix this?" she mumbled, seeming abruptly exhausted more than anything. "Or just keep making it worse?" Nick wanted to growl and bluster and blow her off, but her fatigue was contagious. He leaned onto his palm where it sat on the table next to him, slouching into his own arm.

Rochelle continued, with a wary quiet to her voice, even as Rhiannon couldn't have paid less attention to them. "He's angry. And I'm pretty sure he's going to get angrier. Nick, talk to him. Whatever damage you thought you were doing, it can't be worse than -"

Fury surged, feeding off his weariness, turning sharp to cover the weakness that wanted to overwhelm him. Nick's eyes slitted to challenge her, frustrated. "Didn't we have this fucking conversation already? Where you said you'd keep your goddamn mouth shut about it?"

Rochelle's expression tightened, and he knew just as clearly that he'd crossed a line with her, too. She didn't look angry anymore - she just looked injured. Her eyes turned the faintest bit soft, wetness threatening, and she shrugged her shoulders. "If that's what you want." she stated, and the way she turned and walked away... it felt final.

Like maybe she wouldn't come back this time.

Coach passed Nick by, and though he prickled in readied defense, the eldest survivor didn't even look at him. He ghosted past, focused solely on the task at hand, ignoring Nick entirely. The gambler was left to watch both his teammates follow after Ellis, and something deflated in him.

He felt tired. Alone.

He'd started to forget what that felt like, but he closed his eyes and succumbed to the feeling - and it welcomed him back with open arms.
Inhaling, Ellis grabbed up an armful of blankets, burying his face into the fabric for a moment. The soft darkness soothed away the headache starting behind his eyes, but it did nothing for the pain in his chest.

He was overreacting, wasn't he? Nick had even started to apologize - didn't that mean something? It hadn't been the first time he'd said something rash and regretted it soon after. Ellis had always forgiven him, or known better than to take him seriously in the first place.

This time, though, it cut.

He wasn't strong enough to make excuses anymore. He searched for that resolute knowledge that Nick cared for him, that feeling he'd thrived off of, and found nothing but a struggling insecurity. He didn't know anymore, and that was more frightening than the apocalypse. More frightened than the infected waiting to tear him limb from limb.

He just wanted it all to stop.

To be so bluntly, so dismissively compared to the woman who'd broken Nick's heart - it was pain he didn't know how to handle, and he didn't feel he deserved.

It was still fresh in his mind, the way Nick had sat in a lawnchair, lazy with beer and exhaustion. The way he'd relayed the story of his ex-wife and their marriage - their divorce. The pain in his voice. The bliss-soaked urgency with which they'd had sex there, like Nick had buried into him to escape whatever feelings had overcome him.

It had been frantic, but more than that, meaningful. Ellis' first time and for all the pain that came afterwards, it felt like such a honeyed memory. Nick had opened up to him. He'd let Ellis be there for him, shared something painful -

And now to conflate him with the woman who'd broken his heart? Like any of this had been Ellis' fault, Ellis' choice? That he'd wanted this, and wanted them to be like this?

It hurt. For many reasons, but especially because it seemed so clear in intent: he was nothing special. Just another bad memory that Nick would walk away from sooner than later - that he had already walked away from. Like it was easy.

For all he thought he knew Nick - maybe he'd been wrong.

A hand touched his arm, and he jumped. He thrust his bundle of blankets away from his face and shied from the contact, turning to find Rochelle warily standing beside him. She looked concerned, and he wanted to groan. The last thing he wanted was more pity - so he said as much. "... Don't look at me like that." he muttered, trying for sincerity... humour. He fell short. "'M fine. Ain't like I ain't used tuh him blusterin' already."

Rochelle frowned indelicately, shaking her head in a slow and pendulous motion. "Now, that's a load, and we both know it. You're hurting. We need to talk about it, before you explode."

Ellis' eyes met hers in a surge of frustration. It was the last thing he wanted to do; put his misery on display, hash out a situation that had no resolution. He just wanted to stop feeling entirely, or at least busy himself with something such that he might forget for a little while. "I don't want tuh -"
"Too bad." she responded in something near sing-song. The producer slipped around him, grabbing their supplies backpack from the trunk. As she brushed close, she planted a kiss on his cheek, startling him into a quiet gawp. She pulled away and flashed a saddened smile at him. "Look, sweetie. I haven't been a very good friend to you."

Ellis' eyes widened, outright shocked by the statement. If he'd had the chance to guess how the conversation would go, he never would have guessed those words. "Wh-what!?" left him in a vague whine, dropping his arms to hug the blankets to his belly in a confused squeeze. "How... do you figure that? You ain't the one makin' him... makin' him be like this."

Exhaling in a tired murmur, Rochelle shook her head and let her eyes close. "I wanted you guys to work out. I... I needed it, a little, I think. You seemed happy and I wanted it so bad... Like it was the one good thing around us sometimes, you know? I think it blinded me. Or scared me, anyway."

Frowning slightly, Ellis felt his body fall to some weakened slouch. He listened, but couldn't help but notice Coach standing in the doorway of the café's porch. It was hard to tell if he could hear from that distance, but he approached no closer. Maybe he could tell they were talking, or maybe Rochelle had told him to hang back.

"It meant I wasn't honest with you. Or me." Her fingers fidgeted against each other, a stress to the gesture that belayed a fragility. "I didn't tell you the truth about how I felt or what I thought, and I supported you when I shouldn't have - and maybe didn't support you enough sometimes."

Ellis felt almost numb; blindsided. This wasn't what he'd anticipated, and he wished he knew how to react. He wanted to argue, but didn't have the energy.

"I know Nick isn't easy. He's an ass, and he's... fucking up. Major." Her lips curled in the vague shape of a frown. "I also know he cares about you. I don't know if that means you two can patch things up, or even that you should... But it's the truth. It's the truth he should've at least made sure you knew."

Ellis gazed at her, unsure if the feeling in his chest was pain or not. He wanted so badly to believe her, and so many things - moments - chimed in his head as proof, but fear drowned out what had once been confidence. Surety. All he had anymore was a vibrating anger.

"It don't feel like it." escaped him in a whisper, a tiny and fragile admittance. She opened her eyes and looked abruptly right at him.

"I know." Tiredly, Rochelle turned to lean her hip against the car's bumper. She took a deep breath like it might cleanse her, and it trembled on the release. "I cornered him the other day. I didn't mention it, but - he seemed... messed up. I think he genuinely thinks he's bad for you. That you're better off this way. I think we can all agree that's not true, but... it means something, right? Even if he's doing it the wrong way?"

Ellis hesitated, trying to digest the statement. It was a bit like chewing glass. He was trapped somewhere between wanting to believe her - and wanting to hear none of it. He felt too much and too ferociously to allow Nick any such excuses.

"I... He's scared. I know that. I knew that, 'n' I never thought him spoutin' off meant much... But he ain't never been this nasty before. He said - " A strangled sensation tugged at his throat, and he knew he wouldn't get through the conversation without crying if he spoke too long, so he spoke rapidly, instead.

"He said stuff 'bout us bein'... nothin'. Just - sex 'n'stuff, 'n'.. I don't wanna believe it, but whut if it's true? Whut if he's always planned tuh leave?" It hurt to say, but there was nothing stopping him now. "And even if it ain't... He don't wanna be with me no more. I can't - I can't change his mind. I can't make him do nothin'. Never could."

Rochelle was watching him, seeming just barely holding herself back from rushing to embrace him. He wouldn't have minded if she had.

"I wish he'd just - stop. Even if he don't love me, he don't gotta be... I can't keep doin' this. We could'uh been okay, even if he didn't want... me.." The wetness was encroaching, blurring his vision, tightening his breath. Had he ever felt this deeply broken before? "I... I miss 'im, Ro', but I feel like I hate 'im right now, too."

Softly, Rochelle sighed. She raised her hands to press her fingertips into her temples, massaging. "I think you guys need time. Away from each other." she stated in a whisper, before lifting her gaze to his face. She nearly continued, but her eyes caught the distressed tremble to his chin. Thick regret found its way into her eyes, and she advanced in a smooth step.

Her arm looped around his waistline, and he couldn't stop himself from leaning into it, his face burying into Rochelle's neck. She quickly let her other arm slip up to encircle behind his back, and they embraced with the bundle of blankets trapped awkwardly between them.

"It's not gonna be easy, ever. And if you two don't - make up... I know it'll hurt." she murmured to him, squeezing her arms. "... I don't know how it'll all work out. But I know this can't keep going on. I think he needs time to figure himself out, and fighting like this... It's not helping either of you."

Ellis shut his eyes, pressing closer into her arms. "I-I dunno how to fix it." he mumbled. She tightened her grip in response, holding him tight.

"You don't." she responded, simply, shaking her head. "That's not what I'm saying. You don't do anything - maybe even ignore him. You _stop_ doing things. I know you, Ellis, you don't want to fight. It's killing you to be like this, and it's killing me to watch you. And right now, I'm not sure anything you do would change his mind, anyway."

He frowned, squeezing his eyes tighter until he saw stars. The gesture sent tears tumbling down his face, and a shiver passed through him at the sense of weakness - but when he reluctantly reopened his eyes, something like a relief of tension passed down his spine. "Yeah." he mumbled. He relaxed, just a little, though perhaps it was just resigning to weariness.

"He deserves you being angry at him, but you deserve better. It's eating you up. So let Coach and me be a buffer. Chris cares about you, too. He'll stay with you, keep you distracted. And hell if we don't have plenty of other stuff to worry about, right?"

She pulled away a bit, slipping her hand to cradle his cheek. He flustered at the sudden way she drew back to get a look over his face, a sad smile creeping across her lips before she wiped at his cheek with a thumb. "We'll be okay, honey. I promise. I'll keep talking to him. I think he... I like to think he trusts me, as much as he trusts anyone. I'm not saying give up, I'm just saying stop playing his games."

Huffing out a laugh, Ellis stumbled back, forcing himself into the mimicry of a frowned pout. He freed an arm to shove his wrist against his eyes, shaking his head. "Y-yeah. I guess. I'll... try tuh stop lettin' him rile me up. I..." A sigh left him, eyes darting down to gaze toward his boots. "I've had breakups before. Man, it ain't _never_ been like this..."
Rochelle smiled wider, leaning into the trunk to scoop up one of their family-sized packs of trail mix into the crook of her arm. "Honey, I ain't never seen you like this. You're handing that boy his butt on a silver platter. It'd be hilarious if it weren't terrifying."

Screwing his brow into a slightly bewildered look, Ellis allowed a disgruntled noise to leave him. "I-" he uttered, uncertainly. "I guess." Did he not feel a little satisfied at the idea? In some distant, petty corner - a part of him that he wasn't wholly fond of? "I don't really like how I'm actin'. I wanna be better than that. I... I don't wanna hurt him, either."

"Speak for yourself." Rochelle sang back, breaking into a laugh. "I'm telling you to get off his back. I didn't say anything about me. I more than plan on making up for you leaning off." Ellis wanted to protest in the same moment he wanted to laugh with her. It wasn't a completely unlikeable solution, but he didn't get the chance to respond.

"Don't hassle the boy." Coach's grunted chastisement announced his abrupt approach. Ellis blinked up toward him, suddenly lowering his head into a vaguely submissive gesture. The big man must've noticed it, as he met Ellis' gaze and gave a firm and comforting smile.

It made Ellis smile back, dropping his gaze to the ground. He tightened his grip on his armful of blankets and took a step back, making room for Coach next to the trunk. "Uh... s'okay, Coach. She ain't doin' nothin'. We was just talkin' 'bout stuff. We better get this shit unloaded, though, 'fore the zombies come knockin'."

"Agreed." the eldest survivor uttered, leaning in to start stacking cans atop one another so he could grab up several at once. "We unload. Make sure the girls are settled. Then we investigate into this shower business. We go any longer an' I'm gonna start puffin' up BO like a Smoker. Coach needs a freshenin' up."

Rochelle uttered a small whimpered sound of interest, shuddering idly with a groaned and elongated "Yes...!", and Ellis had to laugh.

He wasn't sure if he felt better - but he felt a little less alone, and that was something. He inhaled, closing his eyes, and focused. It was for his own good, to stop the fighting. It wasn't for Nick's benefit; wasn't because he was afraid, or weak, or giving up.

"Me, too." he agreed amidst a sigh.

Maybe getting clean would put everything into perspective. He could only hope.
Chapter 196

Unloading the car was a somewhat tiresome project - it felt like they'd only just claimed a place as something like home, and it was difficult to settle in again. They piled up their food supplies on the bar, and set their excess weapons down along the foot of it.

Ellis took the blankets they'd scrounged up from the beach condo and set to trying to put together some sleeping spots around the main dining area floor. They didn't have quite enough blankets to make anything comfortable on the hard wooden floor, especially for five people.

If they'd had their old truck, or even the van they'd lost to the Angels, they could have scavenged mattresses and made something vaguely comfortable. A sigh left him, thoughtfully pressing a palm down flat on the ground. If for no other reason than Christophe's comfort, he felt a twinge of regret.

Maybe it had been a mistake to leave the condo. Chris was barely on his feet, still, and who knew the setback that might come from sleeping on a floor. Was it counterbalanced by the chance at getting cleaned up? Surely the risk of infection was more of a priority, but he felt bad all the same. The man needed rest, more than any of them.

Ellis straightened up, turning and walking toward the bar. He craned his neck to see past the inner corner of the building, and his eyes caught on the sprawled lower body of the Spaniard. He hadn't so much as stirred from where Coach had laid him on the bench, jaw slack and chest rising and falling at a steady pace.

A little smile caught onto his lips. Maybe he was worrying too much; sleep did not seem out of the man's reach so far, and he was tough.

"Not exactly comfy cozy." Rochelle remarked. Ellis twisted around to look at her where she sat on one of the barstools, legs curled to place her heels against the supporting struct between the legs. "But we'll manage. We can always just pile together for warmth."

A snort left Ellis, wrinkling his nose a little. "You and Chris, maybe." he teased, quick to flash a stuck-out tongue when she looked almost startled by the retort. A warmth flooded her face, and he was left with the impression she was gratified beyond her embarrassment. Maybe she was just pleased to see him joke around.

If she needed him to be upbeat - he could do that, at least.

"Me and Chris? After that car ride, I think it's you and Chris. You two were little peas in a pod. Maybe we'll just set you two up for a sleepover." she uttered in a lilt, wagging a finger at him. "You apparently make a good pillow."

Ellis crossed his arms with a huff, shaking his head. "Man, he was sleepin'. Whut was I supposed tuh do? Push him off?" he blustered, finishing with a stubborn lift of his chin, "Besides. He's muh buddy, 'n' it was nice."

An idle giggle escaped her, putting a fisted hand against her jaw. "Uh-huh." she stated with a small grin, almost begrudgingly jumping up to her feet. The woman thumbed over her shoulder to the deeper portions of the restaurant, where the rest of their team "C'mon, snugglebug. Let's go see about this generator, yeah?"
He obeyed, only a little reluctant. They walked around the bar, slipping into the secondary dining section. Rhiannon had settled down to sit on the table with her legs tucked under herself, one arm wrapped around her sister's frame and the other resting in her lap. She looked up as they approached, a defensive tightness to her posture.

Ellis felt a wary concern spark up his spine, despite himself. He was fairly sure if anyone tried to so much as step near Lena, she would attack like a wild animal.

"Hey, girl." Rochelle soothed, voice soft and unassuming. The blonde flinched a little, but met her gaze. "You said this place had power? Be nice to get cleaned up. If there's a kitchen, maybe we can heat up some of the soup we have. You're welcome to join us."

A blankness lingered on Rhiannon's face, half like she genuinely didn't parse the words. It was with a sluggish shake of her head that she lifted a hand, pointing at a slim door in the furthest corner of the building. "Outside. Little shed. Shit's gas-powered, but it was good last I checked."

Rochelle nodded, gratefully, glancing between her and Ellis. "Okay. How long do you think it'll run? Ellis and I have gotten pretty good at siphoning gas -" she said with a wink toward him, reassuring. "- but I don't want to waste any more of your stuff than we have to."

When Rhiannon didn't immediately respond, offering a shrug, Ellis raised a hand to scratch at the back of his head through his cap. He somewhat awkwardly inserted, "Most'uv 'em don't run much longer'n ten, twelve hours? If it's cheap, more like nine. Presumin' it's full up."

Rochelle inhaled, humming in comprehension. "Okay. We should hurry, then, so it's not running too long. Maybe tomorrow, we'll hunt for some more gasoline, keep a reserve." She rubbed her palm against her chin before allowing herself a weary grin. "I don't know if we said thanks - but thanks for letting us come here. It... was a really good thing of you two."

Blinking back up, Rhiannon examined her face for a solid moment. She seemed frustrated, distantly, but disguised it behind a vague flash of teeth, more like a sneer than a smile. Ellis got the feeling she'd have rathered the topic never came up again. "Yeah. Well. I owe you guys, right?"

Forcing a quickly panted exhale, Rochelle shook her head in a few repetitive gestures. "Water under the bridge. More important things to worry about, now."

It was a slow, lancing jibe that intruded on the conversation. "Speak for yourself." From where he leaned in the far corner, Nick had his arms crossed and his chin low. He watched them with an almost wolfish, predatory attention, and the way he postured said he'd found his opening. "Some of us are still on the fence. Had enough of hosting up with assclowns who turn out to be Children of the fucking Corn."

Ellis drew in a reedy inhale. He thought he'd had enough time to prepare himself to ignore Nick - but it was still a punch to the gut to listen to him talk. It was an uncertain feeling where he couldn't seem to decide between running to engage in the argument, or running from the building entirely. Love was not the only thing Nick made him feel intensely, it seemed.

For her part, Rochelle swooped in gracefully, a sublime smile to her lips. Her eyes kept Rhiannon's, and for the best: the blonde's jaw twitched in a surge of anger that looked anything but composed, but Rochelle's interceding kept her quiet a moment longer. "Is that what that movie was called?"

Nick shot her a scathing look, tightening his crossed arms with a snorted sound of derision. "I'm just saying. Am I seriously the only one holding a grudge here? We really upgraded our friend group. Pickings are slim these end-days, I guess."

Drawing into an exasperated sigh, Rochelle just barely kept together that light and easy-going sense of humor, like Nick weren't trying to start a fight. "Can you just try to be polite? Don't make me take your shower away, boy, because I -"

"Lee's like this because of you." Rhiannon uttered. It was spoken so simply, flatly, that there was a moment of silence where nobody knew what to say. The blonde turned her chin enough to slant one eye at the gambler, energy cold and somehow fractured.

Nick, however, was not quick to drop his guard.

"Oh, bullshit." He spat back, teeth flashed when his upper lip twitched with near-disgust. "Save your pity party for the bleeding hearts. She's like this because of a Charger. Shit could've happened to any of us. Me, even."

Pressing her palm onto the table, Rhiannon slid herself slowly off of it to stand next to the bench. "Yeah." She fisted her hands at her sides, voice thickening, as much rage as it was grief. "It happened to her because your bitch ass ran ahead. So you can fucking cry at me all you want, but you're lucky I don't fucking tear you a whole new -"

Urgently, eyes going a little wide, Rochelle raised her hands to direct her palms at either of them. "Guys! This isn't helping - please!"

Nick paid her no mind at all. There was a fury leaching into his posture, with such ease that he seemed almost relieved. Like he'd been itching for a fight he could win, and had found one. "I'd love to see you fucking try. Remember how that worked out last time? You know, when you tried to fucking shoot me?"

A harsh breath left Rhiannon. She looked on the verge of either flying into a rage or collapsing into tears - it was hard to pinpoint the difference. "Like you wouldn't have fucking done the same if your buddies hadn't been there!"

The gambler allowed his head to cock, chest inflating just softly as his nostrils flared to fill his lungs. There was a sage wryness that entered his voice when he returned, "Fuck, really? That seems so unlike me. I wonder what could'a made that happen."

He paused just long enough for the silence to taunt Rhiannon into opening her mouth - and then he flung his arms to either side and let his voice explode into a growled: "Oh shit, that's right. You mugged us! That's what it was. What a fuckin' relief! Here I was worried over my fucking goddamn integrity for a second. Phew."

Rhiannon's fists trembled, nails digging into her palms. "You think I don't remember?"

Sympathy more than anything drove Ellis to speak, low and defensive. He tried to remember what Rochelle had; he tried to keep calm and focus on anything but Nick. "That was a while ago. We all been through a lot, bet Rhee has, too. I don't think she's the same person."

"Oh, yeah. Because people change all the time. Especially for the better, and especially these days." Nick scoffed, crossing his arms back over his chest. There was a nasty humour to his voice, sharp and unforgiving. "She's probably a saint now. Gives money to charity. Donated a kidney."

Ellis chewed on the inside of his cheek. He couldn't convince himself to speak, though he yearned to catch Nick's eye and utter what came to mind. You changed - I thought.
It was Coach who abruptly cut in. He spoke calmly, rumbling from where he sat at the far end of the row of dining tables, carefully holding a palm over a gouge on his forearm where it was sluggishly bleeding. "Explanation wouldn't hurt nobody."

Nick's head snapped toward him, and the way he stiffened said he expected an attack - so when Coach essentially agreed with him, it left him unsteady. He swapped between a frown and snarl before settling on some small and discontent moue. "Explanation of what? Sorry, is this where we find out she had a bunch of mouths to feed, so it was all okay? She was really just robbing us to save us from poisoned food?"

The big man didn't look at him. Instead, he glanced at Rhiannon, low-lidded attention catching her gaze. The way he spoke wasn't kind, just matter-of-fact. "We spent the last while fightin' folk who didn't care 'bout their fellow man. Any one of us could'a been killed, 'cause we put trust in a group we shouldn't'a. You understand why gettin' some comfort y'all ain't the same breed would go a ways to coolin' tempers?"

Nick's eyes slitted. He seemed caught between satisfaction and disgruntlement, like he'd partially wanted a war on all sides, and it had been stolen away from him.

The blonde dipped her chin, gritting her teeth slightly. "I - what the fuck else do you want?" she muttered. "Bringing you here, Lee getting hurt for you - what else do you want from me? I gotta do jumping jacks? Suck a cock?"

"Like putting your dick in a bear trap. Pass." Nick inserted, scathingly, earning a furious look from both women in the room. Self-preservation made him recoil an inch or two, baring his teeth, though it was unclear if he was more put off by Rhiannon's agitation, or Rochelle's. "Christ. Joke."

With a sigh, Coach lifted the hand that wasn't covering his injury, waving it. "What I'm sayin' is... Our boy, Chris. He wasn't on our side, either, back in the start. We went through shit and he's proven himself. You don't gotta lose an arm, but we deserve some kinda answer." His eyes flickered over Rhiannon's face. "We're grateful, don't misunderstand. But we got ill-meanin' hospitality before."

Rhiannon seemed to stutter her breath, suddenly looking up to glance between the survivors standing in a loose circle around her. Her shoulders limpened, and she closed her eyes, but said nothing. One hand drifted back, gloved fingertips brushing against the warm curve of her sister's forearm.

Soothingly, Coach shook his head. "Just talk to us, girl. Ain't askin' fo' nothin' else, just talkin'. Why'd you attack us back then, and why should we feel safer now?"

"Look -" she muttered, bitterly, and a weight fell on her that dropped her to sit on the bench. "My sister and I got separated. Lee would've told me to leave you guys alone, but she wasn't there to tell me no. I didn't want to hurt any of you fuckers, shit just - ... I don't know. It got out of hand." She splayed her fingers before angrily taking a moment to yank her leather gloves off, throwing them to the ground with an exhale.

"I don't know what you think I'm gonna say. I'm sorry. I was trying to be a badass, but I was just an asshole. I've been an asshole my whole life. I've been an asshole and a fuck-up and everything in between. But don't pretend I didn't fucking suffer, too, even if it was my own fucking fault."

Nick looked half-ready to retort, but Rhiannon reached down suddenly to grab the bottom of edge of her dark pantleg and yank it up, showing the puckered line of a healed gash up the front of her leg. It went from ankle to halfway up her shin, and the pinkened flesh cut a smooth and scarring line through the dark hair on her skin.

"You -" She stuttered a beat, before hissing out a sigh. "I'm not saying it was anyone's fault, but I didn't have a fucking weapon after you left me. It took a day to find Lee again, and before I did, a Smoker dragged me into the side of a crashed car. Slit my leg open on some metal. I barely made it out. Wouldn't have, on my own."

Ellis drew his arms into a tight clutch over his belly, regret sinking his gut into a pained shudder. He'd never considered the impact of their actions back then - he'd not cared to think what might happen to the thief they'd disarmed. It made him feel cold; insecure... even if there hadn't been a better option, and she hadn't given them much choice.

Slowly, the biker replaced her pantleg flush against her skin, shrugging loosely. "When all this started, I thought... Fuck everyone who isn't me or my sister. You can't tell me you haven't thought it - how do I survive, screw everyone else? What good is being nice if it gets you killed? There was no cops anymore. No jail. Why not take your shit and live a little longer?"

Coach's attention went vaguely weary, and Rhiannon must've noticed the tired disapproval. Her eyes suddenly caught on her hands, frustrated, digging a nail against a scab on her knuckle that was beginning to peel off.

"I didn't think I'd ever see you again. Didn't even think you would live much longer, whether I took your shit or not. So yeah, I fucked up. Could've killed you if that gun had been loaded. And I'm fucking sorry, but I can't do anything about what I did fucking forever ago." Her gaze darted up, and she tried for a sardonic flash of teeth. "Just my fucking luck it was you I ran into again."

Leaning down gently, Rochelle placed a fisted hand against the edge of the table, knuckles pressed into the wood. She exhaled tightly, softly encouraging, "You seem different, now."

Rhiannon let her head shake. "A whole bunch of shit happened since that. Just... what the fuck's the point of any of this if we just tear each other apart as bad as the fucking zombies? I don't..." Her voice faltered, roughly, and she turned at the waist to stare down at the unconscious frame of her sibling. "... Whatever. I'm not gonna fucking sit here and beg. You can believe me or not, I don't fucking care."

Ellis warily looked between Rochelle and Coach, reading the restrained sympathy in their eyes before letting his attention dart toward Nick. There was no such sympathy there, but Ellis caught just enough of the neutrality there to know he'd tipped.

Then Nick caught him, and all he received was a blank look and a tightened jaw, like a tiny admittance of frustration. At what, Ellis wasn't quite sure.

"Te creo." came a soft utterance. Ellis startled at the man's tired voice, craning his head to look. It shouldn't have surprised him to find Christophe awake considering the argument raging around him - though judging from the Spaniard's only-just cracked eyes, he'd been trying quite desperately to stay out of it. "I do. You thought the rules changed, ¿sí? Todo fue diferente. To survive, you change, too. I understand."

The blonde's flecked eyes darted down to her knees, placing palms against her thighs and smoothing down their inner sides. "Maybe. Think I didn't change that much, though." she muttered bitterly, giving a bracing inhale before she clanked her teeth tightly together and gritted them there.

"Fer whutever it's worth, I think you changed plenty." Ellis offered, hesitantly, and when Rhiannon snorted it sounded a little genuine. "'M glad we ran intuh each other again, 'n' sorry fer how things went before. I think we should all just get cleaned up'n'fed, cool off."

A vaguely moaned agreement came from Christophe's prone form. "Sí, por favor... me muero de hambre."

Rochelle glanced over the two - then lifted her eyes toward Nick. The gambler shifted a cold look her way, and they matched stares for just a moment. She didn't speak, but the question was clear enough. "Satisfied?" So, Nick sneered and turned to glance out the heavily tinted window at his shoulder. The gesture might've had more impact had he not ended up looking into the eyes of a sun-bleached seagull sticker pasted onto the glass.

It had its beak wide open to a gaped grin, and he was moderately sure he was being mocked.
Coach examined the gash across his forearm, cautiously thumbing over the worst of it. It was clotting, but it had taken some pressure to manage that. He'd lifted his hand and lost his progress, so he inhaled and held it tightly again.

He meant to keep watch as Ellis and Rochelle rooted out the generator, but the bleeding kept him still.

Closing his eyes kept his heartrate low, even as his head spun. Every time he thought he knew the situation for what it was, it flopped on its side and took some new turn. He was starting to feel like he should stay out of it, if only by virtue of his own cluelessness.

Nobody seemed terribly inclined to keep him in the loop. His calm and measured attitude was too often mistaken for disinterest, he supposed, though that was the very last emotion he felt. His body rumbled like an idling engine, full of stress and anxiety he had no way to release. The only difference was, he'd had a few more years than his teammates to learn how to keep it under wraps.

There was no room for him to lose himself. He'd lost himself just once, dizzy and confused in the darkened belly of a forest, and he'd failed them. Failure in the apocalypse turned fatal, fast.

He'd meant to never let that happen again, even if that meant sitting on the sidelines. The team had grown its own leadership since then, after all. Between Rochelle and Nick, sometimes he'd wondered if he deserved the moniker at all anymore. When was the last time yo' ass led these kids?

Instead of taking control, Coach had merely watched as they came unraveled. Contributed to it. He'd lost some core grip on things, and now he felt mostly like an outsider, observing, detached. Had he been so disconnected as to miss all the signs, all the evidence? Or had he simply not made them feel safe enough to come to him?

He should have reached out to Ellis. Even if he'd been wrong, thinking it was just some secret crush, he should have done something. Anything.

Anything but nothing.

Instead of getting involved, he'd just... watched. And by the time he made any attempt to meddle, it was practically all over. Now it felt too late to intercede, when he was only just recovering from the revelations at all. He'd been two steps behind for a long time, and that hadn't really changed.

He'd watched as Ellis had acted angry, for a while. That had been new - and not entirely unwelcome. Frankly, Nick deserved it, and it was the only way Coach saw things healing. Anger fueled Ellis’ honesty, and maybe they could hash things out... but after Rochelle spoke with him, he'd fallen back into quiet.

The health teacher was a little disappointed. He didn't enjoy Ellis' suffering, but how would anything change if he didn't make his frustrations known? Surely Rochelle didn't intend to silence him, but that had been the effect. Nick needed sense knocked into him, and he didn't listen to anyone but Ellis.

I know my ass won't have no luck, shit.

Coach wanted to lower his head to the tabletop and rest. The whole situation had catapulted out of control from his perspective; if he'd only known about the relationship earlier, maybe catastrophe... could have been avoided. He could have done something.

Damn. Who am I kiddin'? I don't got advice fo' this shit. Barely sho' I think they belong together, in the first place. He sighed, half at himself, unsure if the pang in his chest was guilt or just sadness. Did he care, or did he just want whatever would make all his team - his new family - happy? He wasn't sure. If they'd come to him and told him, he'd have given his blessing.

Their relationship was strange to him, sure, and he hadn't always been accepting of their sort. His younger self would've had a much different reaction to the situation, a fact he wasn't proud of. Would'a had a real easier time in this damn mess, though. Miss my damn knee workin' right.

He had to make a choice: he had to decide if he wanted to help them patch things up or not. Whether he could was ultimately irrelevant, but he needed to come down on a side. He was determined not to repeat Rochelle's mistakes, though he couldn't and wouldn't blame her for them. If he had any intention of offering Ellis any advice, he wanted to be certain. Clear.

That was difficult when he felt about as clear as mud, and as certain as anything else in the apocalypse.

He screwed up his face, exhaling. A frustrated part of him wanted to do nothing at all, because what had he done to deserve being wrapped up in such a strange situation? However, that spite died as soon as it rose. His family was hurting. Even Nick, he was almost sure, was hurting.

The man never got so nasty as when he was upset, and while it was no excuse, Coach understood it, too. He hadn't always thought well of Nick, and the gambler still got under his skin like it were second nature, but when it came down to it...

"I didn't notice."

The mutter caught him unawares, and Coach quickly lifted his head to blink up. He found Nick gazing squarely down at him, quiet discontent on his features. It was genuine enough, so the ex-football player allowed a tilt of his head in open question.

Silent at first, Nick slid down to lean his hip against the table edge. Coach sat at one corner and Nick stood on the opposite side, leaving only a feet between them. As he settled, the conman gestured at the older man's injured arm.

Coach shrugged instinctively in dismissal, letting his eyes re-close. "Ain't no thang. Took a swing earlier. I'll live, most like."

Nick snorted with a faint wring of his brows, turning his head to glance toward the clustered forms of their new acquaintances, Rhiannon busying herself with blotting sweat and grime off her sister's face with her wrist. Coach noticed the vaguest of snarls at his mouth and couldn't fight the sense that Nick was jealous.

It might've made him laugh, any other day, to know Nick was envious of the girl. She'd mugged and nearly killed them, and she currently stood in better standing than he did with the group.

Nursing his wound with a tightly clamped palm, he was caught off-guard when Nick returned his attention forward. "Need a patch job? I think we have some scraps of my jacket left, along with whatever's left of my sanity." When the big man gave him a dubious look, Nick raised both hands defensively. "What, are you going to be pissy at me, too?"

Giving a slight roll of his eyes, Coach allowed himself a flash of bitter humour. "That's a real shit way of askin' fo' a cease-fire, son, but let's let it sit." he stated, jerking his chin up as he couldn't gesture with his hands. "I'm a'ight. I'll wash it off, get it bandaged after that. Thanks fo' the offer."

Nick nodded vaguely, turning his body away just a little. Coach couldn't resist watching him, picking out the subtle shift and twitch of insecurity. It brought something like discontent to his chest, inhaling thinly.

If he put down his pride, rejected his fear, spurned his need for retribution - he couldn't let go of a simple fact: Nick meant something to him. He'd throw himself to the wolves for the gambler, and he felt some tremendous certainty that Nick would return the favour. He'd watched him throw himself to the sword, after all, though that had been for Ellis.

_I am a damn fool fo' not seein' that shit earlier. Don't help that Nick's got a stick up his behind, right to his mouth._

Nick's body slid to drop to sit on the bench, and Coach watched him reach into his pocket and pull out his carton of cigarettes. The man tapped it against his palm, and Coach didn't miss how lightly it moved. He was running low. Dealing with his nicotine withdrawal along with everything else did not sound appealing.

"Getting clean and a hot meal sounds good." the gambler uttered, quietly, succumbing to a tired frustration. "Might make up for sleeping on the floor for a while."

Uncertain, the health teacher merely cocked his head. Nick didn't see the gesture, turned away as he was, and Coach watched a vague rise touch his shoulders. It seemed almost self-conscious, and there was some humour to be found in how easily frustrated the man was by being ignored when it wasn't on his terms. Like he'd rather fight than fade quietly away.

He envied the man for that.

Coach had stood by and watched his marriage come unraveled, too. He'd taken it like some inevitable fate, as if he'd been living on borrowed time, anyway. He let it wash over and past him, bowing and folding because he'd known there was no changing her mind. She'd claimed it as his greatest weakness - that she hadn't seen him fight for something since his knee had taken him out of the game. That he'd grown lazy, physically and emotionally.

What he'd thought was calm and measured was a cover, perhaps, for something more like resigned. Apathetic. He was just so tired, though he didn't want to feel that way. He tried more than anything to bury it, to take charge. God-fearing men didn't lay down and accept life like some bitter pill. _You give, the Lord gives. You take, the Lord takes. You turn your chin down, give up - the Lord ain't got time fo' you._

Weariness stung at his eyes. _That's all well an' good, but damn if I don't need some help._

He'd failed his team, and he didn't know how to recover.

"Hey, Nicky."

The gambler's posture prickled, and he turned his head to cut a slim glance back at the older man. He looked primed for attack, though it eased off slightly as if he could read something non-confrontational in Coach's posture. Doubt lingered in his eyes, but he said nothing, merely waiting.

"What's the odds on us makin' it outta this shit?" Coach wasn't entirely sure what fueled the question. Maybe he just wanted to reach out, felt some exhaustion with the friction among them.
He wanted some reassurance, some lifeline, even if it was only in the form of some small moment of connection. "Not dyin' to zombies, findin' rescue... gettin' somewhere safe fo' more than a few days..."

Nick thumbed abruptly against his cigarette carton, slowly easing it back into his pocket with a regretful slowness. He half-turned to face the other man, licking at his lower lip with a short sigh. Coach watched a softening touch his jawline as his defenses lowered. "You know that guy who landed a plane on the Hudson? Some birds kamikazed into the engines, jet started falling?"

Coach nodded just once, matter-of-factly. Before he could question the point, Nick ticked a nail on the table before putting his elbow on the surface and his chin on his palm, closing his eyes.

"Honey, brace for impact."
Chapter 198

When the power turned on, there was no dramatic flash of lights or buzz of electricity. Nick almost didn't notice at all, and if it weren't for a small lamp on the corner of the bar, he wouldn't have.

The silhouette of a marching seagull, flat-footed and and its wing tight to its sides, hunched under a pale blue lampshade. The lightbulb screwed into the crown of its head, and when it lit into a dull and faded yellow, its features were shaded and highlighted by the sickly glow. Nick startled into straightening, staring at it for a moment.

He should have been excited. He should have been thrilled.

He didn't feel much at all.

Had he felt much of anything lately, beyond the comforting warmth of frustration and spite and self-pity? It was odd to think on a hot shower with such disdain, but he felt like he'd just as soon crawl into a corner and sleep. Taking the time and energy to soothe himself with anything but oblivion sounded like too much effort.

"Hell yeah." Coach uttered, suddenly pushing his weight against the table to jump up to his feet with abrupt agility. "They got it. Boy, we gonna have to fight fo' first wash? Coach is 'bout to have himself a spa day up in this shit." Nick blinked up toward him, guardedly. Hearing Coach so easily joke in his direction again was a welcome surprise.

He hated to admit he'd been lonely, but there was no avoiding it. He'd gotten used to the company of his team, and being on the outs with Rochelle and Coach was wearing on him nearly as much as being so with Ellis. I miss not giving a shit. He meant it as a joke, but all he ended up with was a jumbled set of emotions that boiled down to bitterness.

"I can take you." he stated flatly, flashing a judging look up and down Coach's frame. "I already know your weakness."

Coach crossed his arms over his chest, exhaling a harrumphed breath. The man's dark eyes lit with some kind of humour, head cocking, and his voice came out playfully threatening. "You go fo' my knee, I'll give that shoulder a good check. Just 'cause it's been a while since I played don't mean I can't lay yo' ass out."

Nick lifted a hand, fingers splayed neatly. "Actually, I was just going to throw a bar of chocolate outside, watch you scramble." He observed with no small satisfaction as a dry disapproval flooded the older man's face. He couldn't resist the urge to grin just a little, tucking his chin low to shadow it.

"I think, if you are not careful, el jefe would throw you after." came a mumbled retort from nearly below the table where Christophe lay on the bench, turned to put his stump a little in the air and save it from contact with the wood surface.

Dragging his lips into a slight sneer, Nick let himself lean in closer to the Spaniard, who was positioned not far from him on the bench. "Sorry, did you say something? I was too busy thinking about that time I saved your life." A little more spite entered his voice than he intended - how angry was he, really? Am I actually gonna be the pathetic asshole pissed at every ounce of attention my ex gets from someone? "Oh, no, the two times. Right."

Yes. Apparently, I am.
Chris' body stiffened a little, and Nick felt a stir of satisfaction when he hunched his head against the bench. The Spaniard had become the least of his concerns when contrasted against the bikers now invading his territory, but he had no intention of being friendly, either. Claiming the man's silence as a victory, Nick glanced back upwards.

Coach crossed his arms, giving a disgruntled look at him, but spoke as if nothing had happened. "Anyway. Need to be movin' quick so we don't waste power or hot water. I was only kiddin', if you wanna go first, Nick. Figure you'll need the good mood."

The gambler snorted distastefully. He wasn't sure he liked the implication, but couldn't argue. His eyes caught on the lamp again, and before he could find some derisive way to take the offered kindness, something triggered in the back of his mind. A quiet and laughable realization settled like a soft glee.

He considered - for just a moment - and then allowed a small, demure smile. "I don't care. I'll be just as clean if I shower last. You go ahead." The football coach blatantly sized him up, seeming startled but disguising it behind curiosity. Before he could question the uncharacteristic show of self-sacrifice, the back door of the restaurant slipped open.

Rochelle re-entered at a slow pace, eyes alert on their posture and expressions. She looked at the ready for a fight, like she'd entered a zombie-infested building and not their new base. Her eyes scanned them, but seemed to not find whatever she was looking for.

So, mildly, she offered: "Power's on. Who's up first?"

Ellis came up behind her, ducking inside the restaurant and nudging the door shut behind them. He pushed his hands into his pockets, straightening out his arms until his biceps tensed in an awkward posture. "I'm a'ight." the kid mumbled, just loud enough to carry. Ellis' eyes flashed furtively toward Nick, and the thought on his face was obvious enough to stir Coach to a statement.

"Nick's passin' up first go."

When both Ellis and Rochelle looked startled, gobsmacked, Nick released an unpleasant sigh. It grumbled at the edges, and he let it heighten in his throat. He'd intended to play up the drama, but found himself genuinely annoyed instead. "Jesus, is it that fucking unbelievable I do one thing nice? Can we all look less goddamn shocked? For fuck's sake." He pushed back against the edge of the table, allowing his leg to cross up with his ankle on his knee.

Rochelle shared a small glance with Ellis, though he ducked away from it quickly. It had become easier, after all, to imagine Nick being unkind. Especially lately.

Seated on the top of the table, Rhiannon had her arms wrapped around her legs where they curled to her chest. She'd shed her jacket and laid it over her sister. She now sat in her thin white cami, buckled safety pads locked tight to her shins and knees. The woman gazed between them, the metal stud glinting on her brow as she raised it.

"... Fuck, you guys argue a lot. And I thought Lee and I bitched. Look - I'll make it fuckin' easy, shitsticks." she muttered quietly before nodding toward Coach. "How about the guy who stinks like Boomer barf goes first? It reeks in here."

Blinking, Coach tilted his head to sniff toward his shoulder, where the splattered mess from the Boomer attack earlier in the day had dried to a faint crust. "Ah, hell, I do? I can't smell shit lately. Nose been burned out by all this runnin' about with infected an' dead bodies an' shit." He brushed a palm against his gut, sighing in tired disappointment.
The blonde laughed a little, muffling it quickly behind her knees. A light caught in her eyes that hadn't shown all day, bristling with mischievous energy. "Yeah. And that's coming from a girl who once popped a puker with a fuckin' switchblade. So - go on, big guy. Door's behind the bar. Sink in there has a hand-sprayer, and there's a drain in the floor. Isn't a classy setup, but it works."

Rochelle put a hand to her cheek, fingertips catching near her temple in a slight scritch. She couldn't help but grin a little in Coach's direction, however sympathetically. "We snagged a few towels from our old place - and I'd like to do something about our laundry. I don't really think any of us want to hang around buck-naked, but maybe we could give our shirts a wash at least. We look like we've been playing paint-ball with zombie guts."

Ellis blinked down at himself, lower lip jutting a little. "Man. I miss paint-ball." he muttered in a wistful manner, pleased when Rochelle gave a snorted laugh.

She waved a hand over her shoulder to dismiss him, attention focusing more alertly on Coach. "Here." The producer crossed the restaurant floor, reaching the bar. Beside their foodstuffs on the bar lay some towels - the only linens they hadn't used to set up bedding in the main section of the restaurant - and Rochelle grabbed up the loosely folded stack. She offered it out, and Coach took it off her hands as he passed.

"Y'all kids scared of me sittin' 'round in my boxers? Shit. Hurt my feelin's." he teased, nudging past the bar counter and toward the door behind it. His head tilted, eyes catching on the contents of the bar. The shelves - where bottles of liquor and mixers should have sat - were oddly empty, with only some scattered remnants of broken glass on the wood to indicate it had ever been full.

_Fo' the best._ he thought. Had there been alcohol, he wasn't sure he could have kept his teammates from it, let alone himself. Part of him abruptly wondered if some kind of group release might have been good for them, but it was a moot point in the end.

The glass had been swept tight against the inner edge of the bar counter, leaving the pathway past it safe. He'd only just put his free hand out to catch a palm against the kitchen door when Rhiannon released a thin wolf-whistle. It stopped Coach in his tracks, and he uttered a legitimate, throaty laugh.

"Girl, quit." he uttered as if in chastisement, head shaking as he pushed into the kitchen, letting the door swing shut behind him.

Unable to resist a grin, Rochelle put a hand over her mouth to try and disguise it. She glanced toward the blonde biker who was doing much the same, though she busied herself instead with turning her attention back on her sister. Rochelle drew her lower lip between her teeth and let an elbow set against the edge of the bar.

Nick was lounged past Rhiannon at the banquet-style table, and something eerily satisfied lingered in his posture. Whatever it was that pleased him, she had no interest in it at all - so she made the intentional choice not to give him too much attention, instead looking toward the Spaniard hunched just in front of him on the bench.

"You doing okay, Chris?" The man lifted his head enough to peek at her over his stumped shoulder, the white bandages of which had turned damp with an off-yellow staining. It might have been sweat, or pus, or a mix of the two. "You're gonna have to wash up, too, so we can change those bandages."

He flashed her a miserable look, muttering, "Oye, no me hagas sufrir más... not again, mi alma."
Barely allowing him to finish, Rochelle lifted a hand, finger extended to jab idly in his direction. "It's either clean you up or let your shoulder rot off. So buck up, buttercup, because I've got no intention of letting you sit there and stew." Christophe grimaced with a meek nod, and she softened just a little, dropping her arm to her side. "It'll be fine. Afterwards we'll drug you up again."

Chris' nod that time was more sincere, if a little eager. His pain bled through the gesture, and a tug of sympathy drew Rochelle into a frown. However, Ellis spoke first, voice tender and eyes wide beneath the bill of his cap. "It hurts, huh, buddy? 'M sorry we can't do more."

A weak laugh escaped the Spaniard, and he lowered his head back to the bench, curling his knees a little to come closer to a fetal position. The posture put the crown of his head dangerously close to Nick's leg - a fact that did not escape Nick's notice. The gambler curled his lip up from his teeth and shifted a few inches away in a shuffle against the bench.

"I am fine, tío. At least I am alive."

Ellis didn't look quite satisfied with that answer - but didn't argue, either. He merely bobbed his head, blue eyes darting uncertainly toward his hands. "If yuh say so."

Rochelle could barely resist a sigh, watching him. His attitude had turned so meek of late, it was difficult for her to keep her irritation under control. The last thing she wanted was for him to realize how upset she was over everything. It would only make things worse for him.

He'd been near-silent while they'd explored the yard and the thin shed that housed the generator, tucked up against the building like a rickety lean-to. She hated seeing him so withdrawn, especially when it was transparent that he was trying (and failing) to act normal for her benefit. Sweet baby Jesus, Nick. You just had to pick Ellis to screw with, huh?

If their ever-optimistic Georgia sunshine went grey and faded, what did they have left? And what was she supposed to do to make things better? She didn't even know what the right thing to do was, anymore. Encourage them to make up? Encourage Ellis to move on?

"Son'uv'a!" Coach's voice burst from the adjacent room, muffled by insulated walls and wrought with something between surprise and disgust. There was enough of a bark to it to shock Rochelle to attention, but not enough fear to send her running.

Sparing a bewildered look for Ellis, she took the distance to the kitchen's swinging door at a slim jog. Rhiannon watched her move, head cocking idly. "Uh -" Rochelle didn't open the door, but leaned against it and raised her voice. "Papa bear? Everything okay?"

She was sure she heard a few scattered swears before he growled out, "Water's damn cold."

It took Rochelle a moment to register what he meant. When she did, her first instinct was to turn her head and stare directly at Nick. He met her gaze with an unmistakable readiness and a curt grin, both of which she saw through instantly.

'Nice thing my ass. Rochelle narrowed her eyes to get across the sentiment, but Nick was unfazed by her. "What?" he questioned, innocently, even going so far as to bat his eyes a few times. Had they been a little less bloodshot and a little less tired, it might have even been attractive.

Because naturally the heater would need some time to start up.

"You are so bullshit, suit." she muttered, and his satisfaction faded into something disgruntled. The interaction drew confusion from the others in the room, but Rochelle decided against making it into a public argument. Instead, she pressed a knuckle into the space between her brows. "Coach, just come back out - we'll let it run for a little bit so it'll heat up."

Ellis frowned, tucking his arms over his chest in an awkward cross. "I can go.. I don't mind a cold shower none. Keith'n'me used tuh go fer baths in this river by muh house when we were campin', it weren't too bad. I -" he offered, but too quietly to carry into the kitchen. Coach spoke up and over rode him, unknowingly.

"How's 'bout we just eat first? So we don't waste power sittin' around. Water'll be warm by the time we're done, then we just shower an' shut it off."

With a short shrug, Rochelle allowed herself a sigh. "It's fine, Ellis." She waved her hand at him in a soothing gesture, and laughed a little as she spoke, tiredly. "I'm not letting any of us take a cold shower. We've been through too much shit lately not to have something nice happen."

The Georgian grinned softly with a nod. "Yeah, 'kay." He, with a small inhale, dared to add: "That, or we make Nick use up all the cold water."

Nick looked bluntly affronted, but the impact was lessened by his disinterest in looking directly at Ellis. The gambler instead tossed his arms into a cross over his chest and exhaled a taut breath. His disapproval bled harshly into the tone of it, but Ellis merely kept eye contact with Rochelle, looking a little pleased with himself.

She grinned back, despite a voice in the back of her head that wondered if it was the right thing to do.
The kitchen was fully functioning, beyond the currently-cold water. It was a relatively nice setup, with stainless steel and clean white subway tiling affecting a kind of confused aesthetic on the line between 'bathroom' and 'hospital'. The air was tainted by the odd and musty smell of rotten food. It was not entirely repulsive but getting there, fast.

The room was a lazy rectangular shape, empty in the center and lined on all sides by steel countertops and appliances. That was, ultimately, as deep an examination as Ellis managed - try as he might, he couldn't get his eyes to lift long enough for anything else. After one perusing glance, he'd yanked his attention to the floor and taken up an intense stare on his boots.

There was a mock clothesline made from an empty pot-rack. Dangling from the hooks were a few items of clothing, stiff, as they'd clearly been hung to dry some time ago. A few T-shirts, a set of cloth capris, a long-legged pair of camo pants - but a couple other things, too.

All he knew was he saw a mix of bright colours and pale tans in distinctively feminine shapes, and then averted his gaze solidly. Seeing the bikers’ underwear was the very last thing he wanted to do.

It Rochelle noticed, she gave no indication, and it seemed Coach had already seen and dismissed them out of hand. Their lackadaisical attitude shocked him a little, grabbing the bill of his cap and tucking it low to shutter his vision from the dangling delicates.

It was wholly embarrassing, and only moreso when he started to pick apart his own reaction. Was it normal to feel mortification? Wouldn't Nick have sauntered in and made a snide comment, all while drinking in the sight?

He didn't exactly want to be like Nick, but if they were no longer together, Ellis had to answer some questions for himself. Their relationship had managed to bring on numerous revelations without giving him any clarity at all... mostly because it had been so easy.

Nick never demanded answers, nor did he give them. They'd behaved on instinct and followed some magnetic draw he'd never felt before. They'd certainly never really discussed it at any length, which had been the whole issue. Ellis hadn't had any ammunition to defend against the assertion their relationship had been only physical - because hadn't it?

Just touches and feelings. He'd thought he'd understood what any of them meant, but maybe he'd been wrong.

Ellis sighed through his teeth, forcing his eyes up to glance solidly toward one of the bras hanging limp from the pot-rack. He tried to feel anything but awkward, and failed. Relief only came when he looked away, and he did so with a vaguely agitated twist on his heel. Man. Am I really...?

Rochelle groaned under her breath, sidling quickly over to where a few pots sat nested inside each other on a countertop. She took the largest out from under the pile, lifting the smaller ones up to free it, and gave the inside a wary examination. "One of you get a stove running."

Coach obediently crossed the kitchen to one of the two stoves, topped by four circular elements each. He squinted down at the control panel on the front before prodding a button with the pad of his thumb, and the foremost element lit with a quiet snap. The big man shrugged in a begrudging manner, like he'd expected it to be more complicated.
"Reminds me of that ol' Burgertank we took over, back when." he stated with an edge of warmth, like the memory were a fond one. "Things might just start lookin' up, we get some full bellies. Shit always seems real dire on an empty stomach."

Rochelle laughed, just a faint pant of humour, shaking her head. "I'm pretty sure you always say that, Coach. Are you sure shit's not just dire?"

Coach passed her a look that was on the line between chastising and affectionate, rolling his eyes. "'Scuse me fo' tryin'." He waved a hand over the heating element, as if he wasn't convinced it was working until the growing warmth grazed at his palm. "Ellis, you mind grabbin' some cans from the front? Beef sounds a'ight. Think we got enough to feed everyone."

It took Coach a moment to notice Ellis wasn't responding. He didn't look back, at first, but when there was no sound to announce Ellis scurrying for the kitchen door, he twisted at the waist. Coach blinked squarely at the younger Georgian, who was staring off at the far wall with a look he could only describe as consternated.

Warily, he glanced at Rochelle. She caught the look and turned, too, and both of them stared toward Ellis in unified silence.

It was, eventually, enough to trigger his awareness.

Ellis looked at them with an initial lack of comprehension, but with a short double-take he stomped to attention. His eyes flashed wide between the two of them, trying to read their expressions and seek out any hint of what he'd missed. "Uh - huh? Sorry? I was -"

"Not payin' us a damn lick of attention." the eldest survivor finished with a laugh. It faded, however, when Ellis mostly just looked injured. He set a hand on his hip and leaned forward with a cautious eye. He tried to gentle his tone a little, soften it, sympathetically. "What's eatin' you, boy?"

The mechanic blanched faintly, shoulders hitching up, a guilt flashing across his face like he'd been caught at something. He put up his hands, waving them, backing up across the kitchen and toward the door. 'N-nothin'. Sorry. I'll go get the food." he managed, in a hushed and hurried tone that only just avoided squeaking.

Coach might've stopped him, had Ellis not bustled out from the kitchen in just a few long strides. The football coach was left exhaling in a quiet and disgruntled tone, glancing at Rochelle. She had little to offer but a bewildered shrug, approaching him with the pot she'd chosen rested against her shoulder.

"Got a lot on his plate." she murmured, setting the pot on the warming element where it had just begun to glow a little. "I can't blame him."

The big man raised a hand, thumbing against his lower lip. He closed his eyes and shook his head lengthily. "Ain't sure how to talk to the boy. Damn complicated. Feel like I'll just trip on my damn tongue." The statement drew Rochelle's attention, a frown sparking on her lips. "Had a boy or two come out on my teams, you know, but shit was simpler. Advice was easier."

She nodded her head gently, eyes darting to the kitchen door. When Ellis did not immediately come back, the woman allowed a small utterance. "I'm not sure what the best advice is, either. More than anything, we just have to be here for him."

Coach seemed to mull that over, his expression drawing into a reluctant frown. It wasn't obvious whether or not that response helped him, and he reluctantly maintained a tired silence.
The kitchen door re-opened with a scuffled sound, and Ellis returned to the room, hunched forward with three white-and-red cans cradled in his arms. He had an uncomfortable squint on his face, an awkward laugh escaping him as he shoved the door shut with a kicked heel. "Man. They're quiet as mice. Kinda weird," he whispered, roughly.

Rochelle quickly flashed him a grin, brows lifting. "Oh, yeah. It's not exactly the A-team out there, huh?" Her eyes caught on the cans in his grip, and a hummed thought had her turning, looking around uncertainly. "Anybody see a can-opener?"

Taking the cue not to speak on Ellis' odd behaviour, Coach stepped away from the stove, circling the kitchen and glancing along the countertop. There were a few drawers, and he tossed them open, digging through the variety of tools inside. "Feel bad for Christophe."

That made Ellis laugh, a little snorted sound that verged on a giggle, and the younger man picked his way across the kitchen. There was something vaguely embarrassed in his posture, like he knew full well they were intentionally not having a conversation. "I grabbed our switchknife, tuh open these, in case we don't got a can-opener. Worked okay earlier."

With a begrudging nod, Coach tossed some kind of peeling implement back into the drawer. "'A'ight. Bring it over here." He met Ellis halfway, scooping the cans from him in one easy motion, not allowing the kid any time to argue. The ex-football player carried them to the counter next to the stove, dropping them there and then holding his hand out flat for the knife.

Ellis merely put his lower lip out, fishing the switchblade out of his pocket and patting it onto Coach's palm. "Oh, uh.. Okay." It was with some hesitance that he pushed his hands against his thighs, peering between his teammates.

There was a companionable silence as Coach flicked the switchblade open and cautiously sawed into the top of one can, prying the metal up enough to create a hole. He pushed it toward Rochelle with the back of his hand, moving unceremoniously to the next one.

Rochelle grabbed the sizeable can with one hand, taking a moment to sniff at the opening with some suspicion - but with a shrug, she tipped it end-up over the pot.

The first trickle of liquid to touch the pot sizzled and snapped on the hot metal, making her startle. The reaction was quickly muted as the rest of the can splattered out to join it. She gave a chagrined bite of her tongue, peering down at the gravy-brown liquid, highlighted by the soft tan of chunked potato, the neon orange of chopped carrot, and the perfectly cubed lumps of beef.

"Smells like a regular weekday dinner." She uttered it like a joke, but it mostly sounded melancholic.

Ellis shifted on his feet with an antsy energy, lowering his chin. "Muh mama used tuh get this big ol' beef roast from the butcher down the road, throw it in a crock-pot like, this big -" To illustrate, he circled his arms as if hugging something to his gut. " - 'n' put a whole load of veggies in there. It'd stew fer like, twenty-four hours. I'd wake up starvin', 'cause I had tuh smell it all night long. Man, that shit was my favourite."

Coach hummed easy agreement, practically smacking his lips with the sound. "Sounds like a swell lady."

The younger man grinned, waving a hand. "Not as swell as that pot roast. Keith had like a sixth-sense fer it. Mama'd so much's crack the lid off tuh check on it, 'n' he'd be knockin' at the door." He watched, a little tentative, as Coach passed the second can for Rochelle to dump out. As she tapped it against the edge of the pot, he questioned, "We got enough?"

Rochelle tossed up a hand, smoothly shifting from a dismissive gesture to grabbing a ladle off a thin shelf screwed into the wall above the stove. She dipped it in the stew, stirring it in lazy circles. "We'll find out." she responded in a cheery tone, flashing him a smile as he stepped closer. "So, what's up?"

It was so casual - so off-the-cuff - that he hardly registered at first. It took a solid beat for him to catch up, abruptly staring at her in blunt confusion. "Uh." was all he uttered, inciting her to laugh, just gently.

"Honey, you're a neon sign sometimes." she explained with thick affection. Rochelle shook her head in time to the swipes of her ladle, keeping any of the meat and veggies from burning to the bottom of the pot as her other hand darted down to twist the temperature dial and lower the heat. "What's on your mind? No more secrets between the three of us, so go ahead."

Ellis gaped in fishlike bewilderment, eyes darting between her and Coach. He blustered out reassurance first, a tiny note of frustration leaking through. "I - I know that. It ain't like that. I'm just thinkin' on stuff, is all."

Rochelle gave a casual shrug, slipping a glance toward Coach. The older man looked back with an expression akin to distress, wide-eyed, an edge of humour to it. She was taking a leap, and he looked clearly at a loss - but there was a solidarity in how he nodded, giving up control to her.

So she inhaled, and went for it. "Stuff like what?"

When there was obvious frustration on Ellis' face, shifting uncomfortably and gaining a flighty sort of nervousness, she disengaged. Her attention focused solely on the stew, and she accepted the third and last can from Coach, dumping it in. She sniffed at it as steam started to rise up from the pot, sighing in a pleasant fashion.

It was hesitantly that Ellis shifted, stepping over to an empty section of the countertops. He put the heels of his hands up on it, and pushed to hop himself up on it, legs dangling. He put his elbows on his knees, idly palming against the backs of his upper arms, where scabs lingered from being dragged across a parking lot by a Smoker's tongue. "I... I dunno. I guess it's dumb, worryin' 'bout stuff like this, just... sorta stuck."

Rather than push, Rochelle merely hummed supportively, just a sound of acknowledgement.

"Do y'all think - I mean... is it possible tuh, y'know, go through like... Go through life thinkin' somethin', and find out you were wrong the whole time? 'N' not somethin' small... somethin' big. I feel like... I'd'uh known..." He trailed off, brows quirking in distant frustration. Rochelle passed him a small look, blinking, and he didn't miss the meaning: he wasn't being tremendously clear.

So he sighed, raising a hand to palm over his eyes. "I... Ever since Coach said it, uh... I'm wonderin' if I ain't uh -" His voice cracked a little, but he forged through. "Y'know. Gay."

Bewilderment pushed Coach and Rochelle to stare abruptly at each other, confusion causing a moment of silence. It was with a slightly high laugh that the woman managed a response, nose crinkling up as she queried a little teasingly: "Um, sweetie... what did you... think was going on with you and Nick, exactly...?"

Ellis forced a breath out through his nose like a snort, screwing his face up. He was aware of Coach somewhat awkwardly avoiding his gaze, and hunched down in his seat. "N- Ro'... that ain't what I meant." he huffed, growing a little flustered when she grinned at him, like she knew full well what he meant.

It was with a sigh that he shook his head, attention darting to his hands, spreading his fingers out idly. "I'm sorta confused, is all... S'just, he was the first guy I ever liked. I didn't know I did. It's all real new, 'n'. Guess I'm feelin' sorta lost 'bout it, now that we... Ain't. Not like I'm upset or nothin', I just dunno how I'm only figurin' this out now."

That drew a grunt from Coach, a determination making him murmur, "We've all been learnin', changin'. Whole world flips upside-down, you find some shit you didn't know about. You think my ass figured he'd be survivin' the damn apocalypse?"

Ellis frowned, though more in thought than disagreement. "I... guess. Just weird thinkin' 'bout my girlfriends, back in school. It feels like I was lyin' or somethin'."

Scooping the ladle up through the pot of stew, Rochelle tipped it to allow the contents to pour back out, slow and ponderously. "You know, I was just teasing. Just because you like boys doesn't make you gay. Bi, maybe." She glanced at him, prompting: "So you had girlfriends. Did you like them?"

He didn't balk at saying, "Yeah, of course!", but he did hesitate shortly thereafter. His frown deepened, and he gazed at his dirtied and rough-edged nails. The smallest spark of sadness caught in his voice as he admitted, "Just, uh... I dunno. Not like I like him, I think." Ellis caught himself there, mumbling a vague correction. "Liked."

Rochelle's brow darted up at that, but she decided against pressing the issue. Instead, she lifted her shoulders, exhaling a laugh before she clarified, "Sexually?" If Ellis startled, Coach startled twice as much. They both shot her disgruntled looks, and she couldn't quite pinpoint which one of them was more mortified. She put her hands up, abandoning the ladle in the pot. "It's just a question!"

Bumbling through an awkward duck of his head, Ellis cupped a hand over his billcap, puffing out air. Coach was trapped squarely between them, and it was with a grumbled sigh that he took a step back, crossing his arms.

"Come on, boy. May's well humour her, else we ain't gonna get through this."

Ellis grimaced, firmly rooting his eyes on the floor. He chomped his jaw open and shut a few times, clinking his teeth together, before he sighed. Resignation made him open up honestly. He had nothing to lose. "N-... I dunno. I guess I... never really cared. The girl I was with the longest, she wanted tuh wait til marriage, so we just... didn't. I just liked bein' with her."

Sympathy flecked into Rochelle's posture. She crossed her arms, watching the stew over her shoulder as small bubbles started to form in the still surface. "... Can I share a story?"

Ellis nodded, eagerly, lifting his chin up to look at her.

"When I was a little girl, I had the coolest best friend. She was smart, and pretty, and her parents were rich. I'd go to her house and we'd play with all her toys, and I just wanted to be around her every day. We hung together at school, we'd come home and play - next to my parents, she was my favourite person."

Both Ellis and Coach listened intently as she waved a hand, laughing a little. "I was like, six, and I decided I was going to marry her. I knew I loved her, and that was the only thing that made sense. My mom always talked about being soulmates with my dad, and I felt that, I thought."
Quietly, Ellis leaned forward. His eyes were a little wide, and he asked gently, "Whut happened?"

Rochelle grinned, head shaking. "It passed. We lost touch the minute we weren't in the same grade, and I met a different best friend. My point is - I had all these feelings, and I didn't know what to do with them, or what they meant. I learned about romance, and that was the box I thought they fit in. Do you think maybe you just loved this girl like a friend, but the only box anyone gave you was dating her?"

Ellis couldn't help but blink, scanning her expression. His lips parted as if to speak, but nothing came out.

It was Coach who uttered, "Damn, girl."

The producer gave a slim smile, focusing back on the pot. "Maybe you just didn't click with her. Maybe you don't like girls at all. I'm not sure." She grabbed the ladle and stirred, making sure to scrape the bottom of the pot to ensure nothing was sticking. "End of the day, Ellis, it's about what you feel. And it only matters as much as it matters to you, anyway. So don't let it get to you."

Slowly nodding, Ellis seemed to take some comfort from that. His posture straightened slightly, a thoughtful purse touching his lips as he put his palms together. "That... that helps. ... Thanks. So you don't like ladies, after all?"

Rochelle put one finger up, wagging it. "Boy, I am not sure of a lot, but I am sure of one thing: you and me like dick."

There was just a beat of silence before both men burst into laughter, Ellis clapping a hand over his mouth and Coach breaking into a great belly-laugh, like the statement had caught him so off-guard he couldn't help it. "Girl, what in the good Lord -"

The kitchen door opening startled them all into silence. All three of them turned, Ellis' expression turning a little bit stricken to find Nick leaned into the threshold. The expression on his face was vaguely sour, and Ellis couldn't help but wonder how much he'd heard. Until he spoke, anyway.

Flatly, the gambler stated, "... She's awake."

Ellis' gaze snapped instantly to Rochelle's face, as if seeking permission.

She was nodding toward the door before he got the chance to speak. "Both of you, go," Rochelle nudged her elbow in Coach's direction. "Go check on her, and make sure Rhee's okay, too. I'll watch the food."

There was no hesitation, and the two men charged out of the kitchen in unison, nearly shoulder-to-shoulder. Nick lingered there, sidling back to open the door and hold it there as they brushed past him. His eyes did not follow them. They instead slanted to gaze at Rochelle, something inscrutable behind the attention.

Was he angry - or maybe just curious? Rochelle didn't know, and was left to blink back at him. She slowly drew her arms into a cross over her chest, palms tucked over her upper arms in a hug. She wanted to question him, but didn't. She merely held the stare, chin up, caught in defiance despite herself.

It only took a moment for him to look away, turning to follow in his teammates' footsteps.

She exhaled, deflating. Her eyes closed, feeling inexplicably shaken, unsure just what caused the feeling. Maybe Ellis, maybe Nick, maybe a little bit of both. She just knew they needed good news, and Lena recovering would do.

Rochelle turned on her heel, staring down at the stew which was just approaching a boil.

Or a good dinner, at least.
Chapter 200

Lena was silent and still when Coach and Ellis rushed into the dining area of the restaurant. Both Rhiannon and Christophe had ended up seated on the table, and the Spaniard scattered a vaguely alarmed look toward them, his arm wrapped around his midsection.

"She is almost as tough as me, amigos." he announced, voice feigning a confidence that wasn't reflected in his posture.

A strained huff of a laugh escaped the prone brunette, followed by a thin whine of discomfort. The noise startled Ellis, almost stopping him in his tracks. He hadn't expected Lena to be cognizant enough to handle such humour, and he couldn't help a swell of relief. "You ain't kiddin'..."

His eyes darted toward Nick when the man slid to stand next to the bar, too close to him. The Northerner ignored him, but Ellis couldn't help himself from shying away, lips tugging into a purse. He was moderately sure he saw Nick's shoulders bristle, though he tried not to pay attention.

Coach bustled past him, circling the bar to reach the long banquet table. He stepped to the opposite side from Rhiannon and Chris, and as he came up level with Lena's face, he cocked his head to look her over. She laid flat on her back, and eyes like muddied jade met his dark ones.

"Hey, girl. How you feel?"

She grimaced, blowing a small breath through clenched teeth, the noise whistling. "Like I got... hit by a big zombie, or something..." she managed, very gently raising a hand to rest it against her stomach, fingers clutching just a little on her grey hooded sweatshirt. Her humour was sickly with pain. "Hurts like heck."

Tapping his thumb on his thigh, Coach quickly raised that hand and reached to touch the woman's bare shin in a gentle prod. He kept it light enough to avoid jostling her, fingertips brushing over the dark hair there. "You feel everythin'? Toes move?" He nodded at her socked feet, bare above the ankle.

She didn't immediately respond. A quiet fear darted across her eyes - but it was merely trepidation, as a beat later, she wiggled her toes in a gentle wave on both feet. "Y-yeah." she whispered. "Think... everything works. Just dizzy."

The big man nodded, glancing up warily toward Rhiannon. His gaze did re-lower to match Lena's after a moment, but he was clearly asking both of them for permission. Rhee did look, after all, primed to fight. "I ain't no medic, but I know a little 'bout gettin' bashed up. Played football, coached it, ran a health class and did some nursin' at school. You mind if I take a better look?"

The sisters shared the smallest glance, Rhiannon's raised shoulders brimming with distrust and tension. The blonde nodded in a short jerk, however, and Lena closed her eyes in a tired fashion. "Sure." she whispered, the quieter tone sounding less pained. Her expression remained gently stricken. "Whatever."

As Coach settled one foot up on the bench to lean on, Ellis nervously approached the very end of the table. He intended to watch closely - but when Coach reached down and grasped the zipper of Lena's thin hoodie, he couldn't help but avert his eyes. Chris did the same, he noticed.

Gently dragging the zipper down to unhook it from its counterpart, Coach pulled the hoodie open to bare her upper body, hugged by a black shirt speckled with grey. The shirt's form-fitting cut and tight jersey material made it difficult to ignore the fact she was without a bra. The biker's body was svelte and petite, and the jacket had disguised it well enough before.

The eldest survivor swallowed whatever embarrassment he could have felt on that point. He was much more concerned for her well-being than decency, though he cursed himself for not chasing the rest of the team away beforehand. He took some measure of comfort in the fact that the two younger men were looking away - and that Nick was lingering at the bar rather than approaching.

Come on. Ain't the time fo' this shit.

Withholding a sigh, Coach announced his intentions carefully before he acted on them. "'A'ight. Just wanna look at yo' belly, maybe get you rolled over, check yo' back." He gently grasped the bottom edge of her shirt and slipped it up her midsection, just to the middle of her ribs.

Any embarrassment evaporated as he examined her.

He'd done his fair share of quick once-overs, when a boy on his team had taken a tackle or a charge too hard. It wasn't something he'd claim as experience, not under the circumstances he now found himself in, but he definitely knew enough to know he was out of his depth.

A soft purpled color flushed up from her stomach, mottled around her ribcage. He bit his tongue at the sight, flattening a hand to touch delicately at the soft slope just above her belly-button. She flinched faintly, though perhaps that was less pain and more self-consciousness. He scattered a look up toward her face, but she had not yet reopened her eyes.

Lena's skin was clammy to the touch, and when he applied some gentle pressure, she sucked in a breath that heightened with discomfort. Rhiannon's gaze flashed toward him with a sharp and territorial anger, and he couldn't help the instinct that made him yank his hand back.

He did, however, swallow the apology that threatened to dart from his lips.

Indecision struck. It was clear enough to him that she'd bled internally, but he had no way of knowing how badly - or how likely it was to continue. Where was the line between bruising and hemorrhaging? The sweaty, cool feel of her skin worried him, but she seemed alert and awake enough. It was, he ultimately knew, a matter of chance and time.

At least they could clean Christophe's wound, keep it tended, apply antibiotics topically and orally - but this? What could they do, if she was bleeding internally, beyond pray?

More than that, he had to choose what to say. He didn't have the right to withhold what he did know. He couldn't lie and say she was fine; he couldn't lie and say that she'd be fine. His gut said she wouldn't be, and that the bleeding might just continue until she fell into shock and died. If something had ruptured inside of her, what could they do but watch her deteriorate and pass?

Then again, they'd thought much the same of Chris.

Coach's eyes lifted, and he found Lena's on his face. He startled just a little, because she was looking at him with a serene sort of calm amidst the pain tightening her face. Hazel eyes flickered toward Rhiannon, almost imperceptibly, such that he might not have noticed had he not been staring straight at her.

It was a paternal instinct that made him understand: she knew, and in that split-second, begged him not to say it.

Coach tenderly grasped her shirt and tugged it back into place. He held his silence as he carefully ran a hand along each of her limbs, squeezing at muscles and joints, just probingly. "Hurts real bad anywhere else?" he questioned, the words spoken with some small breathlessness. "Nothin' feels broken?"

Lena's eyes closed, wincing faintly with his touch on a few key spots - her right elbow and wrist, her left shin, the outer stretch of either thigh. Despite the reaction, she gritted out a noise of negation, and he allowed a soft sigh.

"Think it's best if we leave you layin' still." he uttered, cautiously, keeping his tone level. He had no intention of going through the strenuous process of turning her over - part of him wanted to know how tender her spine was, how delicate her condition, but was there a point?

"You just rest, a'ight?"

The woman nodded thinly, a wheezed stream of air passing between her lips as she tried to exhale without too much force. She turned her chin enough to crack her eyes open and look toward her sister, and Rhiannon's chin lifted. Eyes widening slightly, the blonde examined her with razor-sharp attention, almost watching her very lips move as Lena whispered, "I'm okay, kitten."

Something broke. Coach watched the younger biker's posture shatter, and he willed his eyes away as Rhiannon's head ducked low. She gritted her teeth so tightly that her voice came out like gravel, rasped and tight.

"I thought -"

When Lena merely nodded her head, the blonde flattened herself down low, prostrating against the edge of the table so her face buried into her sister's shoulder. "I tried." Rhiannon muttered, body trembling. Lena immediately placed a hand against the back of her neck, though pain fluctuated across her face at the effort of crossing her arm over her body. "I - tried to keep going... like we swore. You fucking scared me... I thought I'd... never..."

"I'm okay." the injured woman repeated, softer, exhausted eyes brimming abruptly with a wetness that threatened to escape down her temples. "You did good, Rhee. I'm okay."

Coach retreated, the urge borne by the feeling of intrusion. He didn't want to hover by them and listen, not when a yanking, clenching feeling in his chest told him Lena was lying. He fell to a quiet blindness, almost charging right through Ellis in his hurry. The young man obediently darted out of the way, too urgently interested in slipping forward and worriedly glancing over the sisters to pay him much mind.

Nick did not act nearly so oblivious.

The gambler slipped one solid step to the side, not quite blocking Coach's path, but mostly. Their eyes met in a muted sort of stare, and Coach merely jerked his chin up before continuing on. Nick passed into lockstep behind him, and it was wordlessly that they returned to the kitchen.

Ellis barely noticed, at first, so focused was he on their newfound partners. "I'm real glad you're okay." he uttered, delicately, twining his fingers together in front of himself. Lena matched a soft smile at him, slanted from where she lay. "We were all worryin'."

Christophe leaned slightly over, his hand settling on the slope of Rhiannon's bicep, soothingly. She made no motion to shrug him off, so he let it remain there, fingertips tightening. "You should have seen Nico. He was upset, I think. For a softer man, it was like him crying, ¿si?"

A faint hiss left Rhiannon from her muffled posture, angrily. "Best be. Fucker's half the reason this shit happened to her." she muttered, spite bristling at her voice, though it was half-hearted with exhaustion. "He should've taken that fuckin' Charger, instead of Lee."

The thinnest frown touched Ellis' lips, despite himself. He still couldn't quite fight the instinct to defend the Northerner, but he did manage to stifle it down to a vague platitude that just left him feeling obtuse and tense. "Wish nobody had."

Neither woman responded, but Lena allowed a soft twitch of a nod. Her eyes closed tightly, and Ellis looked hesitantly over his shoulder. His gaze sought out Nick in some reflexive hunt for comfort - but found only empty air, and the softly swinging kitchen door. His frown deepened at the realization that his teammates had slipped away and left him behind. To talk, maybe?

He wanted to be angry, a little, but stopped himself. Anger had gotten the best of him too much of late, and he wanted to hold onto the warmth in his chest that spawned from hearing Lena talk again. He'd trust them - and ask later.

Rochelle had given him a task, and he intended to uphold it.

The Georgian pushed in to rest a knee against the bench, leaning in a little. He managed a smile, eyes squinting. It felt fake on his lips, and Christophe's eyes flickered to him. His gaze thinned a little, like the Spaniard wasn't as easily fooled. "You up to eatin'? We got a stew cookin' that'll knock yer socks off, here in a minute."

The woman didn't quite open her eyes, but she did flash teeth in a weak show of humour. "Charger already did." she whispered, a phrase he had to strain to hear - and one that made him break into laughter, even as he felt a stir of sadness.

Hearing Rhiannon snort in a wet, genuine laugh, buried into Lena's shoulder... it took the edge off, just a little.
Chapter 201

The declaration had been simple and blunt. "I don't think the girl's gonn' make it." Coach looked distraught as he spoke the words, eyes refusing to quite meet anyone's. "She's bruised up somethin' foul. Hurtin' like she's swellin' in the gut. If she don't stop bleedin'..."

He trailed off rather than say it twice.

Nick couldn't help but cross his arms, tightening them, fingers clenched in the sleeves of his dress shirt. He stood in the center of the kitchen, eyes slowly tracking between Coach and Rochelle. There was some awkward tension there, fitting when put against the backdrop of sizzling, popping stew.

It was an after-thought that made Rochelle turn and snap the temperature dial down a little, moving it to point to the 'Simmer' label.

"... You don't know, though." she stated, voice strained in its lowness. Her shoulders trembled before she raised them, stiffening them against the weakness that showed there. "None of us do. Shit, Coach, what were the chances Chris lived this long? If she's awake, isn't that a good sign? What do we know?"

The ex-football player thrust his hands up, palms flat. It was a gesture he must've regretted as he lowered them shortly thereafter, but too late; Nick could pick out the way his fingers shook. "Baby girl, we don't know shit, a'ight? Maybe I'm wrong; Lord, I hope I am. You think I don't want her to get better? But we ain't seen someone get hit like that. Ain't got no idea how much damage it did."

Rochelle's head gently nodded, a soft dismay dragging the full curve of her lips downward. "Okay... okay. I understand." Her eyes closed tightly, squeezing. "We can't really help her chances, right? You can't... do anything to help this kind of injury. Like Ellis' rib fracture."

The shrug that touched Coach's shoulders was tight, hollow. "Not us. Surgery, maybe. IVs." He pushed a palm into his hip, idly twisting. "I got the feelin' she knows, so.. I didn't say anythin'. Don't know if Rhiannon should hear it from us. Shit, don't know if I'm right, anyway. Scare the girl for no damn reason."

Nick's eyes blinked between them, darkly. His chin lowered to shadow them before he spoke. Whisper-quiet in his interjection, he uttered: "Should prepare for the worst."

That made a sharp exhale leave Rochelle, stiffly turning around to face the older man. Her eyes sought his, a twitch lowering her browline. "Prepare?" she questioned, softer now. It could have been an innocuous statement, but she picked up on something in his tone that said otherwise.

He shrugged his shoulders, eyes slitting. "You think her sister's gonna let it go easy? Lena dies on our watch, but 'oh no, too bad, shit happens', and she's cool? We're gonna end up in another fucking survivor war, and we barely made it out of the last one."

Nick watched the protest rattling around Rochelle's expression, though it took her a solid few seconds to form her response. "I... Jesus, Nick. I'm not there, not even close." she hissed out, eyes flashing toward the kitchen door. "Let's just... let's just focus on now, okay? We've got two injured people out there, and an entire team who needs food."

He snorted, closing his eyes for just a moment, before flashing them back open. "You're not the one who's gonna be on the fucking chopping block when that blonde bitch goes sour again, Ro'."
Rochelle spared a faint look for Coach, a little confusion breaking through in her eyes. "Nick... where is this coming from, I -" She abruptly dropped her arms flat to her sides, a laugh escaping her flatly. It was disbelieving, and her voice fell to a gentle and yet pointed note, testing the waters.

"You feel guilty," she stated, aware she'd struck gold when his head reared back, disgust darting across his features... but did not speak. She flicked a finger up to indicate at him. "You're freaking out because you think it's your fault." The knowledge satisfied her, at the same time it frustrated her. Where was that guilt with Ellis, when it would have been more valuable?

Nick's arms tightened, and what should have been an angry gesture turned into something vaguely pathetic and huddled. He shook his head in a frustrated surge of energy, tongue flicking across his lower lip. "It's got fucking nothing to do with what I think. It's what the goddamn situation is, and if Lena dies, we are fucked. Specifically me."

"Damn, son." Coach grunted, sighing deeply. "Quit playin'."

He flashed his teeth a little, some muscle going wild in his cheek in agitation. "I'm not." he retorted, coldly, eyes flicking up toward the ceiling to avoid looking at them. "And I'll keep not while we get fucking betrayed, again. This is the same goddamn shit as always - you assclowns circling up and having your kumbaya shit that gets us nearly k-"

"Nick." Rochelle stated, voice so sharp it actually startled him. He tipped his chin to turn a lancing gaze in her direction, but it was a look that crumbled to outright bewilderment when the woman was suddenly in front of him and suddenly grabbing his hand.

Their fingers didn't lace, but she did curl hers around his palm. His arm flinched, eager to yank it free, but he restrained the motion at the last second. "You're not in a good place right now. I get that. Can you please just... trust me? Us?"

The gambler didn't want to look at her, that much was clear in the screw and twist of his brow. He did anyway, and in the depths of his expression she swore there was something like a wry and faded misery.

It was little things like that that made her believe in him, though she felt just as much like a fool for doing so.

He tore away from her grip, snapping off a sigh. Whatever she'd seen was gone as fast as it had risen, leaving only agitation. "Fine, whatever. At least this time I've got the goddamn katana." That was an uglier joke than Rochelle fully expected, but she simply watched him stalk a few steps away. He pressed his palm to his mouth, rubbing ringed digits against his stubble. "For the record, I fucking protest."

"Noted." She exhaled quietly, raising her hands suddenly to press fingertips to her temples. "Can you protest your way to finding some bowls and spoons?"

Almost to her surprise, he obeyed. That didn't stop his posture from turning loose with annoyance as he moved, throwing a hand up in a flashed middle finger, but she allowed him that much. After watching him walk up to a hanging cabinet full of dishware and start piling bowls onto an upturned palm and curled fingers, she returned her attention to the stove.

She found Coach at her elbow, and couldn't stop herself from talking. "I don't know what the hell to think." left her, without anger and full to the brim with exhaustion. "I got so scared for Chris, but he's bouncing back. I never thought he'd be walking around already. How hasn't the shock killed him? The blood loss?"
The big man let his head wag in a shake. "Got me, girl. CPR cert don't help a man deal with shit like this."

That almost made her laugh.

"Maybe we're just lucky." Nick muttered over his shoulder in brash sarcasm, the stack on his hand growing taller. Rochelle eyed it with abrupt clarity; there were seven bowls nested atop one another when he turned away. It seemed like a tremendously huge number.

It felt like they'd only just been four, and now they'd accumulated seven. Her eyes slipped to the stove in one smooth turn, and trepidation came unbidden to her, unsettling her stomach. The responsibility threatened to rest its weight on her chest, crush her in a soft and stifling pressure. Hadn't the Angels reached such numbers - before their collapse?

Had they taken on too much? Whatever their flaws, the foursome had survived. They'd fought their way, tooth and nail, and survived. Sometimes they'd almost done so easily, and achieved things she'd never have thought possible before the world ended. Now they were in friction, unbalanced, and not just because of Ellis and Nick.

What if they couldn't find more food? What if they used up all their medicine and then another of them got injured? What if they spent so much time recuperating that they missed some chance to escape?

They had moved away from the shoreline, she realized. If a ship did pass, they'd never see it.

What if Lena did die and Rhiannon snapped?

"Let's focus on feeding the gang. That's the one thing we can do," she uttered, brushing off Coach's hand with a small turn. He watched her, closely, but didn't press the issue. He turned instead to watch Nick approach them, observing the gambler's rough scowl and high shoulders. Sulk - quietly, it seemed.

He couldn't help but enjoy watching the clout Rochelle seemed to have with him. As much as he was trying to stay neutral in the odd situation they found themselves, seeing Nick humbled was a pleasant change. It comforted him.

Whatever Nick's mistakes, he was still the same man Coach had grown to know and care for: petty and sometimes cruel, but never evil.

"I'll tell Ellis." Coach stated in a sigh, eyes closing. "It'll upset him, but the boy deserves to know."

Rochelle hummed her assent, but felt a tug of discontent. The last thing Ellis needed was more reason to break down, and she felt a strong urge to protect him from the news. Something must have shown in her expression, because Coach rested a hand on her arm, squeezing. "We'll handle it like we done everything else. Together."

She tried to smile at him, but it felt strangled on her face.

Feels like we're the least together we've ever been.
The polite thing to do would have been to wait until everyone was served. Those were the kind of manners Coach and Ellis had obtained as thoroughbred Southern men. Nick, spawned from lower-middle-class New York, had no such instinct - and his hunger won out over any interest to pretend he did.

He claimed the first bowl Rochelle ladled full of stew, and a stool at the bar. It was the closest he could get to separating himself from the group without isolating himself entirely at the other section of tables. He wanted to listen, after all, if only to make sure he didn't miss anything important.

It was easy to bury himself in his food and look unapproachable when it was the best food he'd had in what felt like weeks. His stomach grumbled in protest, groaning and chugging as he ate much too fast, but he couldn't take the time to care.

Between bites, his gaze darted up to watch the rest of his growing team get situated. Rhiannon ended up seated on the table again, legs crossed under her and thigh acting as a pillow to Lena's head. The injured woman looked only half awake, but was conscious enough to take the cautious spoonful offered to her by her younger sibling.

The blonde moved gently. Tenderness edged her every move, and she watched Lena like a hawk. It was tremendously unlike her, and put a sour twist on Nick's lips. The closer the two girls were, the harder it would be if Lena didn't make it. He'd have preferred them acting like a normal family and hating one another.

He stared down at the oily stew gently steaming in his bowl, using his spoon to prod at a sizeable hunk of potato. He didn't feel guilty about her injuries - he hadn't forced her to jump in front of it, nor had he been the one to slam her into the ground like a ragdoll. She'd made the choice, and the Charger had done the damage. It wasn't guilt, but it wasn't a simple emotion, either.

It was a very Ellis thing to do, to self-sacrifice like that, and he couldn't stop his brain from following that train of thought through. What would he have done if Ellis had been injured that badly? If the situation were reversed, and Lena had, unintentionally, architected it?

The answer was not as difficult to discern: he'd have shredded her, limb from limb.

That was more than likely the source of his anxiety - that he'd understand Rhiannon taking her vengeance on him, because he'd do much the same in her shoes. He wouldn't have blamed her. Still, it wasn't guilt that fueled the tightness in his chest, and it wasn't fear, either. Rochelle hadn't really pinpointed it, but she'd come closer than he felt comfortable with.

Maybe he just felt overwhelmed at the idea that Ellis could have just as easily been the one to go down. Or maybe his survival instinct had some fight-or-flight terror surging through him, eager to get away from a woman who'd already bodily threatened him once before. A girl who'd looked down the sights of a gun at him and pulled the trigger... unloaded or not.

Maybe you just don't want to deal with the consequences of your actions. That's your M.O., isn't it? Trash the place and leave. How's that going for you, buddy? With either of them?

If he thought too much, he might ruin his meal. So, he turned his eyes up, seeking out distractions. Ellis and Chris sat together on the bench, nearly thigh-to-thigh, and the foreigner was treating his food like so much poison. Nick didn't miss the way he faked it, keeping the spoon near his mouth whenever Ellis looked at him, motioning as if to eat while barely taking sips of the stew broth.

Whenever he did anything more significant, or slurped up some hunk of vegetable or beef, his expression blanched in unmistakeable nausea. Good; a waste of food. Exactly what we need right now.

That and their proximity accumulated together in yet another reason to be sour. He had no idea why he was the only one upset with how cozy Christophe had become with Ellis - For fuck's sake, Rochelle doesn't even care. When is she gonna jump the goddamn gun on that one and get him out of my hair? - but he was not about to make a scene. The last thing he needed was attention drawn to his jealous streak.

Super. Thanks, Ellis. You really did make me into the crazy ex.

He grimaced when that felt a little too true, reminding himself he was trying to avoid ruining his appetite. He looked instead to watch Coach and Rochelle settling in on the other side of the table, both of them quick to turn to eating. He didn't blame them, but he had to fight off humour as their motions were undeniably ravenous.

He didn't realize his snort carried until Ellis slipped a glance his way, and Nick made the mistake of letting their gazes meet. It was... painful, and mostly because of the way the younger man wilted down in his seat, furtively staring at his meal.

Nick missed watching Ellis struggle to get enough of looking at him. Craved it, maybe more than the food currently trying to start some sort of revolution in his gut rather than be digested. Shit.

He grabbed for a canned Coke from the bar, cracking it open with a sigh. The caffeine was liable to kill him outright, considering how delicate and sensitive his body was behaving, but he was willing to accept the risk. The warm liquid foamed up against his thumb where it pressed into the metal tab, though he didn't waste the time to lick it off before he lifted the rim to his mouth and practically inhaled some of the sugary drink.

His stomach only protested more, and he sat there in a long-suffering silence, closing his eyes to will himself to some kind of internal equilibrium.

Rochelle was the one to break the silence. Nick hadn't realized it had grown awkward until she did, her voice a little weak. "Doing okay, Lee? Food okay?"

Lena uttered a faint affirmative sound, but it was Rhiannon who responded for her. The woman seemed calmer than usual, her tone relaxing. "Yeah." Her chin lowered, watching her sister indelicately chew and swallow, even that small motion making the brunette's expression shudder painfully. "Thanks for sharing, or whatever."

Easing herself into a lean against the table, Rochelle laughed slightly, more meant as a dismissive gesture than one of humour. "Don't sweat it." She focused acutely on her bowl, using the tip of her spoon to carve a piece of beef in half, the meat so tender it submitted without much force required. "All that's happened... We didn't really get much time to get to know each other."

There was something vapid in her voice, so casual as to be uniquely pointed. Nick wouldn't have noticed it had he not known her as well as he did. She had some ulterior motive, though he didn't know what. "Your dad's into aliens? That's pretty nuts, even for Texas."

A laugh left the biker, teeth flashing in a grin. She set both her bowl against her thigh, letting Lena rest a moment. "Wasn't that much weirder than your normal shithole of a house to grow up in. Just instead of a curfew because some fucker wants to kidnap you, it was a curfew to stay clear of the UFO patrols."

The prone woman laying against her leg huffed a laugh, strained, and Rochelle's eyes ticked across Rhiannon's expression. She set her spoon down abruptly. "I for real can't tell if you're joking."

With a thin smile, the blonde threaded the fingers of her free hand in her sister's hair, playing with the strands in some gentle gesture. "Not, mostly. But it was okay. Made us scrappy little shits. We figured out pretty quick he was fucking insane, and... after that it was... fine."

The softest utterance left Lena, her eyes tightly shut. "He loved us."

Rhiannon tipped her head to look down at her, and something flickered to life in her face. Discomfort - regret, maybe, but too mired in relief to be read clearly. "Yeah. Can't say the loony bastard doesn't."

There was more, Nick was sure, but Rochelle merely deflected. He wasn't in a position to press the issue, nor did he care to. "Everyone we've met so far were all strangers before the apocalypse. We all just ran into each other... How'd you two end up being together? Just coincidence?"

Rhiannon nodded her head a tick, green eyes harsh as they returned to focus on the other woman's face. Her mood had just faintly soured, turning her tone short. "We were meeting up to ride to a concert. We hadn't seen each other for awhile, so.. Whatever. Sister road trip. The evacs started right after... so we turned around to head to our dad's. We got lucky."

It was softly that the producer prompted, "You guys have made it pretty well out here, for just the two of you."

"Yeah. Guess that streak ended." the blonde retorted, a bit harshly - but she seemed to recognize it. Shifting her weight, Rhiannon flashed a look back at the other woman, face contorted in something close to discomfort. "Not... that we were perfect before. Shit, I got really fucked up after I met you guys the first time."

Rochelle offered a lifted chin, urging her on. "Smoker, right? You mentioned that earlier."

Shrugging her shoulders, the young survivor let her free hand lower to her hip. "Yeah." She casually scratched at her waist through the thin fabric of her cami, sighing before returning her attention to Lena. "Wouldn't have made it out if she hadn't found me again."

A hum touched Rochelle's voice. Her gaze was attentive, but she seemed to be fishing for something in particular - so when the attempt didn't bear fruit, she adopted a slightly more direct method. "You talked about someone else in the car."

The blonde seemed distinctly surprised at that, like she'd forgotten. Her tongue darted to rake against her broken canine as she surveyed the room, nodding her head slowly. "Uh, yeah. Not for that long, though." Some discomfort edged her posture when Coach abruptly looked directly at her, like he were hearing it for the first time. "He was a cool guy. Helped us out of some shit, and we helped him rest for a few days. I -"

Nick did not waste any more time. He was on his feet in a flash, any sense of his upset stomach evaporating behind what he could only describe as fury. He reflexively clenched his hand around the can of soda before him, leaving it awkwardly stifling the way he tried to gesture at them. "Ex cuse me? When the fuck did this conversation happen?"
Rochelle's expression went dry, though unsurprised. She'd expected his outburst but remained disappointed in it. "In the car, Nick." The casual manner she handled him with was belittling, like she didn't respect him much anymore. He shouldn't have cared. It shouldn't have mattered. "When we separated because you asked us to."

Protest darted across his eyes at that description of events, but he forced himself to prioritize arguments and rounded on Rhee. Her eyes turned to quick darts across his face, insecurity funneling to anger. "So there's someone else out there? And what blonde biker bitch was he friends with, exactly, the new and improved Saint Rhiannon or the one who tried to kill us? Where's this guy on your fucking moral gradient?"

It was going to turn into a fight, and Nick was beyond ready for it. He'd been ready for days. The energy in the room sparked suddenly into aggression, as tangible as electricity arcing through the air. He might've gotten goosebumps had he not felt so iced over, so unreasonably calm, so -

Then Ellis stood up.

Nick knew he flinched. He couldn't get a handle on his expression before it happened, and he saw Rochelle and Ellis look surprised. For that matter, he was surprised. Since when did the kid's ire unsettle him so, intimidate him?

The idea put him off so much he lost steam. Momentum escaped him in favour of hiding away the reaction that had betrayed him. His head twisted, snapping his gaze to the side, shaken even further by his own falter - and Rochelle jumped on the moment of weakness.

"Look, this is why I'm bringing it up. Okay? I bet you and me are thinking the same thing, but if you could cool it for two seconds, we can find out if we're right."

He didn't want to admit defeat, but seeing Ellis aggress at him drew the situation into sudden and sharp clarity. What had he done to push the younger man to that? What had he become, and why did the idea bother him so much?

He'd wanted Ellis to forget about him, to hate him enough to move on. He hadn't appreciated what that would actually feel like.

You're bein' an asshole, Nick. spoke the chipper drawl that had taken up residence in the back of his head; the angel on his shoulder that was all he really had left of the Georgian. It was a sentiment that made him want to laugh for innumerable reasons, a flash of humor that struck him somewhere deep.

"Whatever." left him in a snarl, his mouth reflexively filling the silence. He dragged himself back to his stool, excruciatingly aware of Ellis' eyes on him. The kid's attention was... perturbed, and he didn't have to stretch to imagine why. Ellis was just as put off as he was by the newfound shift in power.

He felt weak, and couldn't do much more than stew in it.

Rhiannon warily scanned the room, her anger having deflated into a quiet smugness. Alarm won out on her face, however, voice shifting to a cautious tone when she spoke up. "What... do you mean, 'find out if you're right'? The fuck's that supposed to mean?"

Ellis nodded heavily, echoing the question silently as he sat back down. Coach merely observed, his eyes stuck on Nick. Sympathy put his mouth in a weird quirk, like he'd tasted something sour.

With a small inhale, Rochelle tipped her head toward Christophe. The Spaniard looked startled at the sudden attention, sitting straight, dewy brown eyes blinking past a fog. "He... used to have a friend. He disappeared a while back, hadn't seen him since. I'm -" She corrected herself shortly, passing a glance to Nick he did not return. "We're thinking he may be the guy you met."

The reaction to her words was odd, and tremendously unbalanced. Christophe's lips drew into a grin that managed to echo the brilliance he'd once put into everything he did; Ellis' jaw made an effort to strike the table. Coach grunted in surprise, but his eyes betrayed the easy way he adapted to the new thought.

Rhiannon, body stiff, merely blinked. She seemed frozen for a beat of time, her emotions unclear behind a guarded stillness. It was mechanically that she turned her head, eyeing Chris with precise attention, and harshly that she spoke.

"You didn't do his eye, did you?"

Christophe's grin faded, confusion taking the place of excitement. He searched her face for a moment, before uttering, "¿Qué?... No comprendo. Do... what?"

Though the blonde's mouth opened, Rochelle cut in. Her hurry to do so revealed a concern, and she spoke delicately, reaching suddenly across the table to flatten her left hand on the table just in front of him. "He was... missing an eye." Chris almost didn't focus on her words at first, so distracted was he by staring down at her hand, like it were an offer he was afraid to accept. "If... it is him."

Then it clicked, and Christophe looked up abruptly. His face fell, thinned lips drawn into the softest circle. He had to swallow before he could manage to speak again, brows screwing up in a knot. "Qué mierda." he ghosted. "Less and less is left of us."

Shrugging her shoulders, Rhiannon lowered her chin, glancing toward Lena. The older woman had closed her eyes, and she sighed. Her voice faded as some of the confidence drained out of it. "He talked about some chick, and the dude who cut his eye out. You don't seem like either. How do you know we're even talking about the same guy?"

A sadness crossed Chris' expression, but it was gone just as fast as it had come. He flashed a smile, instead, lowering his chin coyly. "I had both arms when I knew him. Less, em - memorable, creo."

When the biker merely grunted at him, seeming unconvinced, Rochelle tipped her head and piped up. "If you'd met his old team, you'd... know." Her smile was uncomfortable, and it took everything she had to avoid looking at Ellis when she spoke. "They were the type to hurt you like that."

Ellis seemed uneasy, but his voice remained in a soothing register, a hand slipping to rest on Christophe's shoulderblade. "Did you know his name?" he questioned, shifting where he sat. His eyes tentatively searched Rhiannon's face.

The blonde shook her head, tongue curled against the roof of her mouth. "No. Wouldn't tell us, and we weren't with the fucker that long anyway. I can describe him, though." Her attention flickered to Christophe, raising her voice slightly. "Dark hair, dark eyes. Uh... Asian, maybe. He was heavy, barely taller than me."

Everyone in the room looked his way, causing him to hesitate. It was almost fearfully that he managed a nod, eyes shifting as if to seek out some reassurance, first from Rochelle and then from Coach. When that failed, he leaned into Ellis' hand, gaze falling. "Que coincide... sí, that... sounds like him."

Ellis squeezed fingers against his back, comfortingly.
There was silence, full of the grinding of thought and only just broken up by the clink of Coach's spoon as he set it down in the bowl. There was something grim in it, uncertain, and he spoke up before it could settle too thickly.

"Ain't no sense in gettin' fired up, kids. Nothin' anyone's said says he's a bad person. Sounds like the boy might just have reason to like us, if all this shakes out the way it's lookin'." He lifted his hand, flicking a finger in Chris' direction. "Enemy of my enemy is my friend, and most definitely if my enemy cut my god-damn eye out."

Christophe hesitantly bobbed his head, raising his hand to press his thumbnail against his lower lip. "I... did not know. He disappeared. Nunca pensé - ... I did not know Jerry had done this." Guilt threatened at his voice, trembling.

It was with a narrowed gaze that Rhiannon lowered her chin, glancing at her lap. She took a slow spoonful from the bowl resting in her palm, and popped it into her mouth, speaking past it in a grumble. "Not sure why you guys are afraid of him. He was pretty chill, and besides. He's missing a fuckin' eye. For all I know, he kicked it out there."

A sigh dropped from Rochelle's lips, and she closed her eyes. "It's a... it's a long story." She looked to be summoning the strength to explain, dredging up some inner strength - and failing. Her well had long since drained to empty, and all she earned for the effort was a tremble to her chin.

The silence she left behind was enough to incite Nick to speak again, quietly. He cut to the quick.

"We killed the two people he talked about. Self-defense doesn't make them less dead. Not sure he'd love that. Or how he'd act, seeing Chris again." He grasped at his Coke, aware of everyone's eyes on him but definitely aware of Ellis'. Rhiannon's eyes darted to him, inscrutable in a squinted stare. "Generally a shitty can of worms I have no intention of fucking opening if I can help it."

The blonde glanced down at her sister, shoulders lifting slightly. She seemed to chew on that for a moment, caught in some insecurity without Lena there to guide her response. Only eventually did she look back up, expression narrow and tight. "Sounds like they got what was coming to 'em to me." she stated, simply.

Nick offered little more than a slanted sneer.

Rochelle pressed a palm into her temple, rubbing in a small circle. "Yeah. I wish it had gone differently, but they brought it on themselves. We aren't like that - we really tried to stop it." she whispered, half to herself. "Hopefully everyone sees it like that."

She jumped just a little when a hand touched hers where it lay still on the tabletop. Her eyes reopened, expecting Ellis' fingers to be the ones settled atop her knuckles... but Chris' slender ones grazed there instead, soft and just a little cold.

When she blinked up at him, she found him doggedly avoiding her gaze. The fact surprised her right out of her distress, as he'd never come off to her as shy before. If anything, he'd always exuded a casual, easy confidence that toed the line between grating and a little suave.

That had changed, it seemed.

Rochelle let her fingers fidget, just enough to brush against his palm and acknowledge the touch. "It's just been a rough time for us. We're all a little gunshy."

It wasn't the new stranger who worried her, in and of himself. It was the potential for misunderstanding, and the risk therein. Would they have the chance to explain themselves, and would they be listened to? What proof did they have besides Chris’ corroboration?

Would he accept that, if he didn't even care enough to mention the Spaniard?
Chapter 203

Ellis laid flat on the bench, one arm draped across his stomach. He tapped his foot against the floor in a dull tune, eyes half closed. It was all he could do not to run through it a million times in his head, to sit there mulling over Nick's stricken look.

He'd cowed him. They'd come to conflict and Ellis had won, without even saying a word. Just his anger had been enough to send the older man running.

He didn't enjoy the feeling. It mostly made him feel frustrated, and maybe a little disappointed in himself. He'd promised Rochelle he'd try to stop letting Nick get under his skin, but the older man's antagonism toward their new teammates was grating. Especially when the girls had done nothing but help them, and at great cost to themselves.

The new dynamic wasn't what he'd wanted, but was it better?

Maybe regaining some power would be good for him. He jutted his jaw forward slightly, trying to own the sensation, to force himself to feel it. Yeah. 'Bout time he gets tuh feel shitty, instead of it just bein' me all the time. 'Bout damn time.

Saying it didn't make it feel any more true, and Ellis just felt a tired sorrow.

Wish neither of us did.

Coach had tried a second time to go wash up, and judging from the fact he hadn't burst into shouts again, it had been more successful. The dining area was quieter, with Lena back asleep and most everyone else trapped in a variety of thoughtful silences. It felt tense, like they were all waiting for something.

That tension made Ellis startle outright when Chris' arm curled over his raised knee, the man draping his body forward against Ellis' shin to hang his head low and peer down at the Georgian's face. All Ellis could do was blink, trapped there, caught off-guard by the contact. "Uh -"

"Chico, la cabeza me explota." Chris lifted his hand off Ellis' knee, pressing fingertips into his own forehead. A flashed pout touched his lower lip, making the Georgian frown a little.

"Headache?" he questioned, reflexively touching his cap where it pressed into the top of his skull as if to communicate the word in gesture form, as well.

The Spaniard's pout twitched to a grin, shaking his head smoothly. "No, no... it means... I worry. So much to think about." Releasing a sigh, Chris dropped his chin til it rested atop his bicep, body curled almost entirely around Ellis' bent leg. "And only some of it bueno. " His eyes drifted up, slanting toward Rochelle where she stood across the dining area, looking out a hazily tinted window and into the street outside.

Ellis didn't miss the angle of his stare, and he allowed a tiny grin of his own. Some internal voice nagged him, reminding him of her boyfriend - but a louder voice decided to leave those worries to her. It wasn't much of his business, either way. Besides, who even knew if her boyfriend was still alive?

So, he threw caution to the wind - not that he had much left, anyway.

"I saw you two holdin' hands."

Chris whipped his attention back toward the other man, practically huffing in denial, but Ellis was already shaking his head. "I know what I saw, brother. You got a big ol' crush on her."

Christophe's eyes squinted as if in anger, but he couldn't hold the expression for very long before it cracked into humour. "What is this you say, ¿pequeñín? I do not understand." he responded in an airy fashion, tilting his head to lean an ear closer.

Ellis stuck his tongue out at that, laughing a little. He shifted his knee to jostle the other survivor, raising an arm and crooking it casually underneath his head. "Whatever, man... be like that."

With a grunt, Christophe placed his hand against his sternum, palm pressed onto the bandages that wrapped around his chest and made up the only fabric covering his upper body. His humour was gone as fast as it had appeared, dulled by some distracted emotion. "Lo siento, amigo. I would prefer not to think about it."

That surprised Ellis, his eyes darting up to seek out further meaning on Chris' face. The young man's expression was oddly stricken for a moment, but he warped it into a smile by force. His voice dropped to a whisper.

"You know, tío, I think we - nos vigilan. We are being watched."

Ellis blinked - and then he craned his neck, looking around the restaurant. It took him longer than it should have to realize what Chris meant, and even then, it was only by virtue of the way Nick looked suspiciously interested in his hands. He must've caught Ellis looking around and dropped his gaze.

A frown tugged at his lips. "I... dunno whut you mean." he half-lied.

The expression made the other man laugh, slyly nodding. He peeked over his stumped left shoulder, checking to ensure Rhiannon was paying them no mind, and lowered his voice even further. "I hear he is jealous. I move close to you, and it is like he tries to kill me with his eyes, ¿sí?"

Furtively scrunching his face up, Ellis put an elbow against the bench abruptly, leveraging his body to bend at the middle and lean closer. Free couldn't help but babble, barely moderating his tone. "That's - that's silly. Yer imaginin' things, man, he's just... angry at everythin' lately. And it ain't like he's ever been real nice tuh you."

It was silly, wasn't it? The idea of Nick envying Chris seemed ridiculous, so he puffed out a breath and said as much. "He's the one who dumped me. Besides, it ain't like we'd... I mean, yer way intuh Ro'. 'N' I like you, but not like that."

The Spaniard put out his lower lip, complete with a slight flutter of full lashes. "No...?"

Ellis could've choked on his own tongue. He knew his face lit up, and that only furthered his distress. He didn't want to give the wrong impression, nor did he want to hurt Chris' feelings. Sure, the man was attractive enough, but he'd never considered it from his own perspective, just Rochelle's... and even if he recognized the fact of Chris' looks, he'd never do anything to hurt her or intrude on whatever she and the ex-Angel had.

That fact didn't stop a thought from intruding in on his internal debate.

Is... he my type? Do I got a type? I mean... aside from Nick, I guess... Is my type really angry guys from the city? Shit...
Before he could internally dig himself any deeper of a hole, Chris broke into a grin. "Ah, please do not look at me this way, amigo. I am only messing."

Ellis blew out a blustered sigh of annoyance, relief etching itself into his expression. "Man... That ain't funny right now." He jostled his knee again, and this time, Chris removed himself from his lean. A teasing beam faced him as the Southerner dragged his body upright, sitting in a straddle on the bench so he could lean in close.

"Look, even if he was -"

The kitchen door shoved open, and Coach strode out. It was a night and day difference. Layers of grime and blood had been scrubbed from his skin, leaving it practically glowing, except for the scrapes and scratches - new and old - that lined his frame. More than that, though, he looked almost happy.

He was also in only his tan slacks, with a towel wrapped tenderly around his torso in a modest drape. Ellis couldn't resist bursting into laughter at the sight, startling Chris into looking with him.

Coach gave a dry and dull look in their direction, but his lips twitched in the threat of a smile. "Don't make me whoop y'all." he warned, placing a palm over his chest. Ellis quickly tried to affect an apologetic, chagrined look, ducking his head. "I had to wash my damn shirt. Nearly fell apart on me. That seam's ready to call it."

Rochelle turned, arms wrapping around herself, attention drawn to the exchange. She seemed only freshly attentive, like her mind had been elsewhere. "Yeah. We could all really use a change of clothes. Maybe next time we're out, we can keep an eye out for a store or something."

The big man shrugged his bare shoulders, half-hearted. "Maybe. Least we can clean up some now." He stepped away from the kitchen door, thumbing back at it. "Someone go on and take the next shower. An' don't take too long. We're wastin' gasoline here."

Ellis didn't expect Rochelle to turn in his direction. A slight hunch touched his body as if to hide, reflexively, blinking gently as she spoke - but her eyes were on Christophe, not him. "Why don't you go, Chris? That'll give me a minute to prep some bandages so we can change yours after you clean up."

The Spaniard struggled with a hesitant frown, body shifting. He looked about as excited as if he'd been asked to lose his other arm, too, for a moment. Then some energy lit in his eyes and spawned a subtle grin on his face. He exhaled in soft drama, turning his head to blink at Ellis.

"Chico, I am... em, ashamed, to ask... but I do not know how hard it will be to wash." He illustrated his point by raising his arm and trying to reach at his back, a sincere grimace of pain fogging at his eyes with the strain it put on his body. "¿Ayúdame, por favor?"

His legitimate discomfort didn't distract Ellis from the convenience of the moment. They'd been discussing Nick's jealousy, and Chris had seemed so oddly pleased with it. Now to try and pull Ellis into helping him shower, and with a glimmer of sly encouragement in his eyes... the Georgian was left wondering if he was actually trying to inflame tension.

More importantly, he wondered if he should let him.

His peripheral vision caught Nick straightening where he sat on the barstool. The motion was snappy and half-aborted, and surprise struck Ellis at the same time frustration did. There was no room to deny it when the evidence was on display: he was jealous, and reacted like a coiled snake.
Quiet, but furious.

It was a posture and attitude Ellis had grown more than a little familiar with.

The Southerner looked more fully at Christophe, and those honey-brown eyes lit up in a coy and knowing energy. He'd seen the realization and looked a little triumphant at it, like they were playing a game and he'd gotten the upper hand. Playful.

Anger brewed in Ellis' stomach, bringing a nearly embarrassed flush to his face. He didn't want to laugh about it. It wasn't funny, it was mortifying. Infuriating. Nick threw him to the wayside, and then had the audacity to act offended when he got close to someone else.

Was he not allowed to have a friend? Intimacy? If Nick had no interest in him, why should he care about what Nick thought? And even if he did have any interest in Christophe - how was it any of Nick's business? And why did the Spaniard think his struggle was something to laugh at?

"Yeah." he gruffed out, agitation and a little hurt lowering his chin. He pushed away from the bench and scrambled to stand, ignoring the perturbed look Rochelle sent his way. Instead, he lowered his chin and looked away, trying not to curl his fingers into fists. He failed. "Fine."

There was a moment where Coach and Rochelle looked at each other, confused, balking at speech. They seemed at a loss for the sudden shift in energy, and couldn't gather their sense before Ellis lost his patience. He turned away and started to cross the dining room, giving what berth he could to where Nick sat at the bar.

He swore the gambler's shoulders prickled in anticipation of his proximity, drawing the bloody and faded blue of his dress shirt tight against the plane of his back. The hole speared through his shirt at his shoulder caught Ellis' eye, and only served to stir his emotions into a fever pitch.

How was it that the man could run onto a blade at the thought of losing him - kill someone to save him - and then hurt him like this? What was he supposed to feel, to think? He'd tried to reason with Nick. He'd tried to argue. He'd tried to feel nothing at all.

None of it worked.

He was being mocked, it seemed. Mocked by his ex-lover, mocked by someone he thought of as a friend. Mocked by his own thoughts, spinning until he wanted to burst. It blinded him, and he charged into the kitchen door with his shoulder. By the time he reached it, he was almost running.

The kitchen dizzied him, surrounded by steel and white tile, and he struck stomach-first to the counter on the far wall. His palms hit the surface to balance himself, and he hunched down and squeezed his eyes shut. He couldn't breathe. His throat constricted, so tightly wound that his muscles began a full-body tremble, screaming for oxygen.

Ellis wanted desperately to stop. He wanted to pick himself up and recover. He was tired of suffering, and tired of the pain and the weight crushing at him. He'd never felt so thoroughly enraged and miserable and alone all at once.

He'd never loved someone the way he'd loved Nick - and he'd never hurt this deeply, either.

When a hand touched his back, he moved on instinct, whipping his weight onto one heel to both turn and jolt away from the touch. He spun, chin raising, barely managing to maintain his composure long enough to open his eyes and look. He just wanted to be alone, for a moment, just to catch his breath... "Please..." escaped him, desperately.
Christophe's presence silenced him.

Any anger Ellis felt died the moment he processed the man's posture. Chris had seemed to stumble his way into awkward confusion, catching onto the idea he'd erred. His eyes panicked their way across Ellis' face, and his abrupt fear was striking.

He looked terrified, and it was raw and bone-deep. The fervor of it took Ellis by surprise. Chris might have been trembling, though it was difficult to tell past the haze that had overtaken his vision, half dizziness and half tears.

Ellis was forced to take just a moment to remind himself, shakily, that Christophe didn't mean any harm. The man had given up everything he'd ever known in their new, torn reality - and all for them. He'd chosen good, or the closest they came to it anymore.

The Spaniard hadn't meant to upset him, or reopen wounds Ellis had just barely been staunching. Getting angry with him was just one more way to let Nick get in his head, to surrender to the tempest that was stirring in his chest, his heart.

Ellis didn't want to.

Chris never had the chance to speak. Before he could, Ellis shot his hands up to bury his face into his palms, crushing them against his eyes. "'M sorry," he blurted, almost a sob with the tender way it cracked in the center. When Chris didn't respond, he repeated it, softer. "... 'm sorry."

When the Spaniard slipped forward, pressing close and putting his hand against his shoulder, any control shattered. His body crumpled into the touch, burying forward to fold into Chris' chest. He had enough sense to avoid touching his stumped shoulder, snatching his arms around Chris' waist and clinging.

The embrace was returned as best as the man could, with one arm. He looped it over Ellis' back and placed his hand against the back of his head, sinking fingers into his curls. "Chico -" he uttered, almost startled.

Ellis tried to talk, but it left him in such a blubber, he had no confidence that Chris understood a word.

"I-I can't keep - I'm goin' nuts. I miss him, 'n' I - I thought I knew him, but now I.. I dunno if I was stupid or not, thinkin' he'd love me... I thought I knew him, man. Now it's like we..."

It was like they were strangers.

Everything he took for granted, everything he thought he knew, it had fallen apart under him. He couldn't get through it or over it. Every time he felt better, something dragged him back into the muck. He couldn't let go, not when he had so many questions, so many loose threads dangling from what remained of his heart.

Was he not worth the time? The effort? Had he done something wrong, or had Nick never intended to see it through? Had he not been as special to Nick as the man had been to him?

"I dunno how tuh stop," he whispered into Chris' neck, the words breaking apart as tears caused his voice to hitch. "I can't stop thinkin' about him."

The Spaniard tightened his fingers into Ellis' hair, palm pressing against the crown of his head to draw him even closer. The gesture was encouraging as Ellis' arms went practically vicelike around the man's thin frame. There was a wall between him and breakdown - but just a thin one.
He felt it, like the surface of a bubble, transparent gossamer built only by force of will. If he breathed, moved, it would burst.

"Aguanta, tíó, aguanta." the man whispered to him, soft, like he knew being too loud might crumble the Southerner. His hand shook free and dropped, releasing Ellis' curls to instead rest over his back. Chris' chin lowered to touch down against the top of his head. "The world has ended, and you cry over a boy?"

Ellis laughed, bleary, half-hearted. His lips parted to speak, but nothing came out.

Then that barrier broke.

Whatever control he thought he had, whatever composure he'd clutched tight, it was gone. His body wrenched into sobs before he could stop it, shuddering, and Chris did not have the strength or grip to hold him up.

They slid to the ground, collapsed. The cold tile flooring bit into his knees as he buried his face into the ex-Angel's collarbone and surrendered to the pain surging through him. He gave up, gave in, and it could've swallowed him whole.

Maybe he'd leave something behind, there on the kitchen floor, and come out lightened.

Christophe let him try.
Neither Ellis or Chris were inclined to talk about what happened, not at first.

Awareness of the clock ticking - and the gasoline burning - stirred them to action. They moved in silent unison from their crumpled place on the tile, retreating to gather up the composure they'd lost. Ellis leaned against the counter, using his palms and forearms to scrub at his face.

He should've felt ashamed, insecure, but he didn't.

It was partly because when Christophe pulled away, his face was marked by wet trails. Ellis didn't know if it was sympathy or his own emotional break, but it made him feel less alone. They'd shared some pain, and when it was over, Ellis felt... calmer.

He lowered his hands and looked at them. The dried blood speckling his fingers had smeared with the moisture on his face and turned tacky, and he wiped it off on his thighs. He let his lips part, sucking in air, inhaling until his lungs expanded and his chest trembled.

His mind was clearer even though his eyes felt cottony, like he'd flushed out more than just salty tears. He'd traded sorrow for exhaustion, and his limbs were loose and heavy. Better, somehow. He felt like a cloud had lifted from him and he could actually breathe.

Even if it was short-lived, even if the next time he saw Nick the pain all returned to him, he was grateful.

Lifting his gaze, Ellis watched as Chris awkwardly balanced on one leg, the other bent up so he could yank his shoe off. He swapped to do the same to the other foot. With no left arm to counterbalance, he struggled to stay upright - or, at least, struggled to stay confident with his balance.

Ellis cleared his throat, pushing off the counter to approach. There was a towel on the floor where Christophe must have dropped it in favour of holding him, and he bent down to snatch it up and sling it over his shoulder. With it settled there, he padded up behind the other man.

Rather than speak, he quietly placed a hand against Chris' back, at his shoulderblades. Splayed fingers and a flat palm offered him something to lean against without getting in his way, and Chris took the offer. His weight settled against Ellis, and he shed his Vans and socks in short order.

The silence continued, not terribly uncomfortable. When Chris reached up to hesitantly pluck at the bandages across his chest, Ellis quickly took over. He separated the knot where it sat on the man's ribs, and peeled the bandages away. Most of it came off in one strip, but the gauze padding set against his stump was stuck there.

Ellis reached for it, even as Chris flinched his body into a tight hunch.

He set his jaw and forged on, using the hand at Chris' back to hold him steady while his free hand grasped at the gauze and delicately peeled it away. The man's shallowed breath seemed more anxiety than pain, however, and it came off easier than he expected.

Tilting his head, Ellis examined the wound. The dark black and greyed colours left behind by Nick's cobbled-together 'procedure' were, to his surprise, circled and highlighted by healthy pink and red. His biggest concern was improved, too; the segmented chunks of flesh that covered the surface of the stump had smoothed, skin waxy as it healed back together.
Chris was progressing so quickly - and so well. He was glad, but confused, too.

It gave him pause. He'd had plenty of experience watching wounds and injuries heal even before the apocalypse. Keith had never been hurt so seriously, but a few times came to mind. He tried to pull together what he knew about amputees, but most of it was about rehabilitation. He didn't know much about the medical recovery, or the timeline...

Maybe folk're just stronger than I think.

He was hardly inclined to reject what was distinctly good news. A puff of air left his lips, looking up toward Chris. The Spaniard returned the look through squinted eyes, warily, his jaw trembling just faintly.

Ellis didn't have to force the smile that tipped his lips up.

"It'll be okay." he promised, voice rough as he managed the first words he'd said in a while. "It's doin' real good, actually, but we better clean it up anyhow."

The man nodded, slowly, head drooping. He seemed resigned more than anything, and he took a stumbling step forward. The Spaniard came to stand in front of the huge stainless steel sink on the inner wall of the kitchen, just to the side of the door. He put his hand on the rim, leaning into it.

His eyes closed, stiffening, and Ellis took that as permission.

The sink was topped by a tremendous faucet, and a sprayer nearly the size of a showerhead. Ellis grabbed it, and it came loose from its bracket in the wall, a coiling tube with a flexible linked mesh giving it some freedom. It extended far enough to reach Chris with ease, though he directed it into the sink at first.

He reached out to twist the faucet, and water just barely trickled from the mouth of the sprayhead. He twisted just one more rotation, and a trickle turned into a jet. It splattered into the sink basin with a high-pitched squeal, the tube shuddering with the force at which the water flowed.

The sudden explosion of pressure made him outright jump, and Chris' expression contorted into abject horror. He may as well have threatened the man's stumped shoulder with a power-washer, and the Spaniard looked prepared to flee.

Ellis quickly decreased the flow, reversing the twist of his wrist, until it sprayed out in a gentle rain. He shot an abashed look at Chris, but the man didn't relax so easily. The foreigner surrendered in a turn despite his reticence, offering what remained of his shoulder to Ellis.

"Be gentle, amigo." the man uttered in some weak attempt at a joke that mostly came off pleading.

Nodding, Ellis focused on the wound. He still had some bandages gripped in his offhand, and he crumpled them in a fist, burying his thumb in a fold of fabric so he'd have a scrubbing surface. He wrapped his other hand around the head of the sprayer so his fingers crossed over the water stream, which was cool - but heating up.

He waited, and it settled into a burn that he wasn't comfortable with exposing Chris to. He let go of the sprayer and let it dangle, turning the faucet closer to the blue mark. When he dunked his hand back into the flow, it had settled to a pleasantly warm temperature.

Rather than give Chris more time to tense up and grow anxious, Ellis moved quickly. He grasped the sprayer and lifted it to hover over the man's injured shoulder, letting water gently trickle down over the stump's surface. He used the bandages in his other hand like a washcloth, leaning in to eye the injury as he moved.

He swept away grime and sweat with ease, but he took some time to carefully brush off the gunk of dead skin, shedding away in grey peels. He tried not to apply too much pressure, but even a feather touch sent shudders through Christophe's body.

Ellis was tempted to apologize, but there was no room for it when Christophe started a stream of Spanish so thick he couldn't have begun to understand a word. The intonation and sharpness was not indicative of anything polite, though he didn't direct it at Ellis. He closed his eyes and shivered, hunching his chin to his chest.

The nicest thing he could do was not waste time, so Ellis hurried. Cleaning away dried blood resulted in more seeping up, but it quickly washed away under the gentle spray of warm water and it stopped before long. Redness flushed up Chris' neck and across his chest, as if his very body was protesting the treatment.

Surges and flinches crossed the man's body in inconsistent waves, tortured and strenuous. He visibly struggled not to jerk away or fight it, and Ellis avoided looking at his face, lest the pain there distract him.

Scrubbing the wound's surface clean revealed the strained flesh that had scabbed over the very center, where it covered the remnants of his upper arm bone. It was so close to the joint he was sure it wasn't functional and wouldn't move, but some length of bone remained there under the surface.

He wondered if they should have removed it before the wound healed over, but it was a little late to think such things.

Rather than worry, he kept his attention on his work, ensuring that he'd given every area at least some attention before he dropped his hand and pulled the sprayer away. The moment he relented, Chris curled down against the sink's edge, gasping in a reedy breath like he'd not inhaled the whole time.

Ellis winced, feeling guilty, and averted his eyes as the Spaniard pulled himself back together. It only took a few moments for him to come back to cognizance, and he swapped back into English with a sputter. "I... I think I... hurted less to lose it."

A slight, awkward laugh passed Ellis' lips.

Then Chris collapsed.

Ellis wouldn't have caught him, had the Spaniard not landed first against the sink, belly striking flat into the rim before he started to tip sideways. The extra few seconds allowed Ellis to react, grabbing for him in a scrabble. One hand snatched into his capris and the other against his side, gathering him in an awkward hug as most of him went limp.

"Whoa! Hey, Chris, buddy...!"

It was only a passing swoon, it seemed, as he began to stir almost immediately. Dizzied and glassy-eyed, the man gazed up at him and breathed a soft, "Lo siento."

Quickly shaking his head, Ellis pulled him back upright, turning a little to push him to lean against the sink's front. "No need, buddy... It's over." When the other man nodded distantly, regaining some amount of strength to his limbs, Ellis released him and took a step back. "I didn't mean tuh hurt you." he uttered, regretfully.
Christophe forced a smile, dipping his head low. His breath was tight and panted, accelerated as it shallowed his chest. "Una maldad necesaria." Ellis was only partially sure of what he meant, but the words were reassuring - right before they turned pleading. "Perhaps I rest? Un momento?"

Exhaling shortly, Ellis reached over to shut off the water, sending a sympathetic look his way. He stepped away to throw the bandages in a massive trash can sitting in the corner of the kitchen. "Yeah, 'course. Take a breather."

The Georgian sidled to stand in front of the kitchen door, peering through the small and faded glass inset in the top of the door. It was not very clear or clean, but he could see through it enough to watch Coach and Rhiannon talk. They were almost around the corner and out of sight, but he could press his cheek into the window and catch a glimpse.

Coach had come up to stand next to the table where she sat, and they were laughing, almost. She tucked her thumb against her chin and nodded at something he said, lifting her arm to rap on her wrist with her fingers as if tapping a watch. He grinned, a look that enthralled Ellis with its honest brightness.

So he babbled, to fill the silence.

"Man. Coach is gettin' along with 'em real well. I ain't seen him cheered up like that in a while." Leaning slightly tighter against the door, he released a sigh. "Guess it's pretty cool, havin' new folk around tuh talk to. Especially some neat ladies."

Chris' lack of response didn't daunt him. He merely rested his body more completely against the door and continued. "I was worried, at first, thinkin' they might hurt us. But I like 'em. They fight real well, 'n' - you weren't out there, but... Rhiannon had another bomb like whut we threw at the ambulance, 'cept she had a fire alarm hooked up to it. All the zombies jumped on it like it was candy. Then -"

He splayed his fingers in a small mimed explosion, grinning slightly. "Zombie guts everywhere. It was awesome. Keith would'uh loved it." Glancing over his shoulder just long enough to make sure Christophe was still standing, Ellis crinkled his nose. "Closest we ever came was this one time when Keith made these homemade firecrackers. Turned out he didn't really understand how folk make 'em... I mean, he was only a li'l tater tot back then... So he just packed it full'uh -"

"Hermanito, you speak too fast." Chris complained abruptly, tone winded, and Ellis turned to blink at him. "What... is a 'tater tot?'" The Georgian's mouth opened, hands raising, but the other man shook his head strongly before he could speak. "No importa. No, forget it, por favor."

Ellis tried not to laugh, but didn't succeed. He grinned to himself, lowering his chin and pulling away from the door. He walked back toward the Spaniard, embarrassed. "Sorry... uh. I get carried away. My mama says I get it from my pa, but she's a chatterbox, too."

Chris rested his hand against his stomach, sparing a glance for the sprayer. He squinted at it, and released a sigh. "It is hard to understand. You Americans have so many... it is so different to hear you talk, or Nico. Like you speak different languages."

A smile quirked at Ellis' lips, only a little mild at the mention of Nick. "I feel the same way, listenin' tuh cityfolk jabber." He thumbed at the sink in a gentle encouragement. "If yer ready tuh rinse off, we can do that. That won't hurt none."

When the other man nodded, Ellis was certainly expecting him to undress. That didn't change the flood of embarrassment when he tucked his thumb under the waistband of his cargo shorts and pushed like he meant to shuck them. Reflex sent Ellis' hand flying up to cover his eyes, and he froze slightly in his self-imposed blindness.

Christophe didn't notice at first, grunting as he shimmied free of his clothes. When he did notice, he laughed - cackled, almost. "Americanos..." he muttered, disbelieving.

Ellis jumped a little when something metallic pressed into his hand. It took him a moment to realize it was the sink sprayer, and Chris grabbed his wrist and raised his hand up. The posture left his arm and hand posed like a showerhead, and Ellis couldn't stop from breaking into laughter, mostly at his own predicament.

"Uh... is that helpin'...?"

A soft noise of affirmation from the other man made him relax, and he kept his hand where it was as Chris turned the water back on. The sprayer sputtered, and then picked up a strong flow, raining down onto the tile. The sound changed when the other man ducked into the impromptu shower, water hitting skin and misting.

Despite himself, Ellis knew his face reddened. He wasn't a stranger to bathing publicly, either jumping into lakes and rivers in the nude with Keith and his other friends, or showering in the locker room when he was a teenager - but it felt different, now.

Awkward.

He would've kept quiet, but curiosity would've strangled him had he not asked the question at some point - so he went for it. It wasn't like he had much pride to lose after breaking down in the foreigner's arms. "Uh... hey, Chris. You mind if I ask you somethin'? Um... personal?"

Another affirming sound encouraged him on, even as the man stuttered out an uncomfortable grunt, faintly pained. "I have nothing to hide, mi amigo. I am naked."

Ellis reddened further and decided against trying to respond to that sentiment. He merely continued, exhaling gently. "Uh... I'm just curious if you're... I mean, if you've ever been with a guy, or wanted tuh - I mean I'm only askin' 'cause I couldn't tell if you were really jokin' or -"

Laughing in a startled squawk, the Spaniard gave a quiet and winded response, rife with humour. "I told you I was messing, amigo. Mi corazón pertenece a Rochelle, em... she has my heart, you know? I am flattered, and you are - ¿Qué dicen? Fine, I think? Muy guapo."

Laughing in a startled squawk, the Spaniard gave a quiet and winded response, rife with humour. "I told you I was messing, amigo. Mi corazón pertenece a Rochelle, em... she has my heart, you know? I am flattered, and you are - ¿Qué dicen? Fine, I think? Muy guapo."

Ellis wanted to drop through the floor, mortified, but Chris flew into a burst of Spanish and spoke too quickly to interrupt. "Pero... no quiero herirla, y no quiero una pequeña aventura de rebote. I -"

He paused thoughtfully, likely to try and translate, but Ellis jumped on the break.

He understood enough, anyway, even without the last piece.

"N-no! That's... That ain't what I meant. I'm just askin' in case..." The moment he started, he felt a wave of regret. The words felt stupid as they left his mouth, but he couldn't stop them. "I dunno, I was hopin' you might have some advice or somethin'. I'm still figurin' stuff out, 'n' Nick weren't never the type to talk about it, so... If you'd gone through the same thing, maybe we could... I dunno. Talk."

He was glad he didn't have his eyes open, because he could sense Chris' gaze on him before the Spaniard slowly started to wash again, water pattering on the ground. He didn't know if it was pity or amusement, and neither felt particularly good.
When Christophe spoke, however, it became apparent that the only thing he felt was honest empathy. "I do not think I know how to help, hermanito. I have only tried once, with a boy, a few - a few years ago. We were... compañeros de cuarto, em... we lived in the same house, ¿sí? Para la universidad. We drank and..."

He trailed off, and Ellis nodded, unsure if the man was even looking at him.

"I did not like it much. But perhaps I did not like him, or he was - ah - bad."

Ellis frowned in thought, absorbing that for a moment. He certainly couldn't have said either of those were true with Nick and him, though he picked up on something in Chris' tone and prompted: "So... You didn't like him, but..."

"Maybe I would like someone else." the other man agreed, tone a little dismissive. "Or maybe not. No se."

"You don't care." Ellis stated, less a question and more an observation, and Chris didn't argue. "I mean... I don't care, either, I guess... S'just..." He sighed, shoulders drooping, though he made sure his arm stayed upright. "Things were easy with Nick. Even when it was hard, it was easy, 'n'... Now that he's gone, I..."

A quiet intruded, bringing the splatter of water into harsh focus where it struck the floor, or the softer noise as it struck Chris' frame. Ellis chewed on his tongue in some attempt to stir his brain into functioning, but all he was left with was a feeling akin to white noise.

Loving someone thoughtlessly, throwing himself into the feeling without stopping to care about what it meant - that was easy. Would it be as easy the second time around? Would there be a second time, some other man, that made him feel the same way?

A tiny voice cried out in the back of his head, protested and wailed and ached, because he didn't want someone else.

"You think too much, tío, like you talk too much." Christophe stated, a cheer touching his voice. "Maybe los muertos will eat us tomorrow and you will not have to worry about love, o desengaño. Or maybe Nico will eat his pride and come back to you."

Ellis couldn't hold back a slight grin, sighing as he flexed his bicep against the encroaching tingling in his arm. Holding the sprayer aloft drained the blood from his fingers, but he resisted the urge to swap arms.

"Man. I wish." he uttered, not really sure which of the offered options he meant.
By the time everyone finished showering, the sky had darkened. The idea of being the only lit house in a pitch black night was unappealing - like being a lamp surrounded by moths - so they'd shut down the generator as soon as they were done.

Coach felt like he'd blinked, and suddenly, everyone was asleep.

He didn't mind. He'd intended to take first watch, but he was still bemused by the silence. Exhaustion made sense, but it wasn't just that.

It hadn't passed his notice how furious Nick had looked, doing everything but snarling and snapping his teeth like a rabid dog as he went to take his shower. Coach may have been oblivious, but he wasn't brain-dead; watching Ellis and Chris go off to shower had sent the gambler into a broiling rage.

Nick wasn't about to discuss it aloud, but he telegraphed his displeasure loud and clear. Coach thought it was wholly childish, though that had never stopped Nick before.

They had all instinctively mimicked his example, and it seemed each of his teammates had taken at least one article of clothing and washed it alongside themselves. Nick had come out shirtless, hanging his dress shirt up as best he could. Rochelle had bemoaned the state of her jeans but ended up washing her underclothes instead, citing how long it would have taken to air dry them.

Ellis had plodded out just in time to hear her say that, missing his denim coveralls and in just his T-shirt and boxers with a towel tied around his waist.

He'd looked just shy of horrified.

It hadn't taken much organization to get everyone tucked in for the night. Nick had bodily grabbed a few blankets and curled up inside a small two-person booth at the far side of the restaurant, and that left Rochelle, Ellis, and a freshly-bandaged Christophe to set up in a sprawl between the tables and chairs that filled the dining room.

If they had gathered much closer, he'd have called them a pile. Coach took some peace from that, if nothing else.

When he'd told Nick their younger compatriots needed help, support, he had been deathly serious. They'd both dropped the ball, and he hated that. Least the kids got each other.

Pressing his fingertips into the dips just at the inner corners of his eyes, Coach crossed the restaurant at a cautious pace, trying not to make more noise than he had to. He grabbed his shotgun from where it sat leaned against the bar, snapping the barrels down to check the dual ammo wells.

It was unloaded, as expected, and he dipped a hand into his pocket to fish out the two remaining shells he had left. He sighed, plugging them in with his thumb and cracking the barrels back into place. They should have doubled back and gotten more ammo. Now he wasn't even confident he could find his way back to the gunstore.

He turned away, making his way down the restaurant floor. As he moved, he grabbed a chair by the back and hoisted it up against his side, taking it with him.

He circled around the chest-high wall separating the dining area from the front door. It would come in handy if they drew a horde - like a chokepoint, any infected would have to come down the funneled hallway to reach them. That was assuming they didn't just bust through the windows encircling the place - but Coach had some hope left in him, it seemed.

Stepping up to one of the glazed windows in the wall, he peered out. The screened-in porch provided a layer of security from the street, though it would never hold up to an attack. He could already see one furious zombie lunging straight through the mesh like it were paper.

It did make him feel slightly more safe, though, as the dark wire barrier would make it harder for the zombies wandering outside to notice him in the window. They were already fairly oblivious when they hadn't been stirred to rage.

Coach stilled as one stumbled toward the café, as if it had heard his thoughts. The creature wandered up to the porch, crawling across the scraggly, dusty lawn until it reached the outer mesh wall. It seemed perturbed by the obstacle, lips moving in a snarl as it lashed out a hand.

When its fingertips didn't have much effect on the wiring stapled in place on the porch framing, it slumped down, collapsing onto its knees. Exhaustion made its head lower, too human. Too alive, too real.

Grimacing, Coach looked away. He was almost tempted to cross himself, but it seemed a little moot.

He continued on to the center of the wall, setting his stolen chair down and taking a weary seat.
With a sigh, he slumped, and the towel wrapped around his torso slipped free. It earned little more than a grumpy stare before he shrugged it off, shifting enough to let it fall to the floor.

Relaxing, the man placed his shotgun across his lap and closed his eyes. He kicked his feet free from his shoes, stretching out his legs, the curl and flex of his aching feet blissful. Bathing had almost worsened his pains; it hadn't been long enough or hot enough to soothe his muscles, and it had been just enough to flush his body with circulation and bring his nerves back to life in a resounding -

"Ow." he muttered. Just to himself.

He thought of his tiny house on the outskirts of Savannah, with almost more porch than home, seated on a cozy field nestled between farmland and untamed forest. If he closed his eyes, he could've been seated on the stairs with a glass of iced tea - laced with a splash of whiskey, to the dismay of his doctor - listening to the drone of cicadas.

Like the trees are screaming. he'd said once, to his daughter. It was a joke, but one he regretted when she started to cry.

It's the bugs. He'd caught one, a fat creature with long legs, bulbous and somewhere between green and brown in colour. It sat in his palm, and he never was sure if it was fear or the lack thereof that made it stay. They're singing to each other. Just ain't real good at singing. He'd hummed, as if to join them, and she'd beamed at him past big wet tears and hummed along.

Sometimes, instead of a lullaby, he'd hum her to sleep. It always worked.

But he reopened his eyes, and he was sitting in an abandoned café, listening to the groans and snarls of countless infected, trying not to breathe in the smell of rot and death.

What did he feel, deep down? Was there fear waiting to overcome him, the spectre of every failure, every misstep? Or was he angry? At his wife, at Nick, at himself, at God? Where was the well he drew his strength from, and what was the cost?

His wife used to ask why he never cried, like it was some failing of his. Why couldn't he open up to her, express himself? She'd ask why he never talked openly, honestly, and he'd throw up his hands and ask her what that even meant.

He still didn't really know.

Coach placed a hand against his chest, like his pulse might beat out an answer from inside his ribcage, some staccato insight that would lead him to epiphany. Instead, it just thundered there, like a dull promise to sustain him.

Perhaps in spite of him.

Exhaling, Coach turned his head to look through one of the other windows and found a shape caught his eye, instead.

Someone stood at the far end of the building, just at the turn where the wall ended and left room to curve into the dining space. Instinct stiffened him, while sense kept him from reaching for his gun.

Rhiannon ducked forward into the light hazily entering from the window in front of her, broken grin glittering. "Shit. I was trying to scare you."

He screwed a brow up, relaxing his shoulders by force. His voice harshened, though it was only half sincere. "An' get a damn face full of buckshot fo' yo' trouble? Girl, get yo' ass back to bed."

He felt no surprise whatsoever when she ignored him, approaching at a casual pace. "Fuck you." she chimed out, looking through the windows out at the infected littering the street. Their attempts to clear the horde had only attracted more, leaving them thinned, but never zero. "We're living in a shark cage out here, huh? Fucking crazy."

Coach grunted, lowering his chin. "We ain't even got us a cage." he pointed out, solemn, despite the joking way he passed her a smile.

She grinned back at him, fiendish.

It was with a decidedly stubborn energy that the blonde sat herself down on the windowsill just to his left. She curled up one leg and put the heel of her thick boot on the edge of it, allowing the other to dangle. She looked firmly out the window, and he said nothing.

He didn't mind the company. The blonde seemed to think he was funny, for reasons entirely beyond his understanding. He had no reason to deny enjoying the attention, though he also found himself simply enjoying the presence of someone new, and who didn't want to kill him.

He could sense she was smart as a whip, beyond her sincere attempts to radiate apathy. That, and what he thought was brash vulgarity, he was coming to see as a refreshing honesty. Nick used anger to disguise how he felt, and did so to great success.

Rhiannon was just, it seemed, angry.

Coach closed his eyes, feeling that uncomfortable tension crawl back into his chest. He felt like he was keeping a secret from her, not being honest about his slim confidence in her sister's survival. It wasn't inaction to hold it back - it was malice.

He'd want to know, if he were her.
She spoke, quietly. "You know, I thought about you guys."

Rather than open his eyes and look at her, sure he'd lose his grip on his tongue if he did, Coach merely hummed an inquisitive noise.

"Yeah. At first I didn't think twice. Then Lee mentioned the bridge being out, how there was nowhere to go but forward... fuck, I said. We might run into those guys again. They'll fucking kill me. I warned her, but she was sure it'd be okay. I knew at least the Yankee would fuck me up."

Coach swallowed a laugh, crunching his brow.

"Then - we found this guy, your friend's friend. He was half-dead, and all Lena wanted to do was nurse him back to health. I wanted to leave him, but he was a hunk and I figured what the shit, right? Maybe he'd put out."

He didn't swallow his laughter that time, eyes opening to shoot her a startled look. She cut a sly grin his way - but it faded, and she looked sharply back outside.

"And... I thought about you guys. About how shit could've gone if I'd been... human, to you. Maybe we'd have gotten out of this fucking shithole already." She put an arm around her raised knee, pressing her chin into the crook of her elbow. "Everything that's happened since, I thought, Jesus. This is all fucking me. I did this. Everything. Because I thought you deserved to live less than me."

Coach laced his fingers together, tightly. He didn't know what to say, and she didn't wait for him to come up with something.

"I don't know when the fuck it happened, but I started - after I heard about those freaks who cut his eye out, I kept thinking, what if they took you guys out, too? And I should've been relieved, but I felt... like shit. I hated it. And when I saw you assholes again, fuck. I was glad. I was glad you guys were okay."

She fell silent, abruptly, gaze severe on something outside. Coach hesitated - waited - before gently reaching out a hand. He set fingertips against her arm where it hooked around her leg.

Rhiannon flashed a dull look at him, dry. She didn't shrug him off, but her expression was clear in its meaning: she didn't want comfort, or soothing. He didn't know what she did want, though, so he willfully dropped his hand and spoke. "That's good."

The blonde sighed, closing her eyes. She leaned forward until her forehead touched the glass window, landing atop the soft plastic legs of a seagull sticker. "Yeah. I know."

She didn't continue, and Coach looked up and through the window rather than look at her. He sighed, tightly, and wished he had a harder time deciding what to do. Lord, if I go on an' break promise with a dyin' girl, I won't be too sore if you cast me down. Just know it ain't easy, either way.

"... Girl, I gotta tell you somethin'," he managed, voice almost a croak, forcing the words out. "She didn't want me to say anythin', but... yo' sister, she might not -"

"I know." Rhiannon repeated, just a mutter. Coach blinked back at her, mouth slack from the interruption, confusion sparking over his expression. The woman didn't open her eyes, but his silence made her clarify. "She's not got much chance. I'm not stupid, dude."

His surprise gave way to genuine shock. He examined her face, cut into fragments by the shadows the fast-fading sunlight left behind. He couldn't tell if he imagined a quiver to her lips or not. Her voice maintained a steadiness that put him off his guard.

"It's hard out here. It's fucking hard. And just the two of us - we barely made it, so many times. She made me swear if anything ever happened to her, I'd keep going. I wouldn't let it take me down, too. I'd leave her and go on. I was ready. I'm still ready."

Coach stared at her, his heart clenching in his chest like it might break. He forced himself to speak evenly, level, calm. "We don't know, not one hundred percent. I'm just worryin'. We don't know fo' sho'."

"I know." Rhiannon repeated, hissing just gently, not angry so much as frustrated. "We don't know shit. I just know, if things had gone different, if I hadn't made you guys enemies, maybe it wouldn't have happened like this. Or it'd have been me with her, not Nick, and maybe I could have taken the Charger hit."

She shook her head in a jerk, suddenly sliding off the windowsill. Her eyes cut low, avoiding his face, and she turned away to retreat in some fevered hurry. He made no attempt to stop her.

"... Whatever. I'm going back to bed. I'm... done talking about this."

Coach watched her go, a frown on his lips. He wished he had any answers - but when he reached for something to say, something that would fix what was broken, he came up short. She was still a stranger to him, and he barely even knew how to help his family.

It was at the very end of the hallway that she stopped a moment, head tilting. He couldn't quite discern if she looked back at him or not, so dark was the room, but he heard when she spoke.

"But thanks, anyway. For telling me. It... means somethin'."

Instinct made him hold his tongue. He merely canted his head in acknowledgement, and the shadowed shape of the biker passed back out of sight.

Coach leaned back in his seat, exhaling and focusing back out into the street. He was almost sure, if not completely certain, that he'd managed to do the right thing.

Just this once.
It was still dark when Nick awoke, stirred by a faint knocking sound. It threw him, disoriented in the moment of time between sleep and actual consciousness, trying to parse where it came from and what the sound was. Then his eyes blinked open, and he reminded himself where he was.

Shitty bird restaurant.

He rolled his tongue over his teeth, frustration quirking a brow. It took will not to snap and roll his body away, bury his face into the booth cushion and refuse to get up. He wanted to sleep, and he'd actually found a comfortable position against the wall that the booth was set flush against.

Or he thought he had, until he shifted his weight.

Pain sparked violently through his arm, the pulse and throb and clenching agony of a pinched nerve, so close to numbness. The limb was completely dead, immovable where it was curled under his weight. "Motherfuck -" he gasped out, growled, trying to stifle it behind bitten lips.

His urge to quiet himself was split between an awareness that most of the team was likely asleep, and simply not wanting to admit that it fucking hurt.

He was vaguely aware of Rochelle's voice, concern overwhelming her tone. "Nick? Sweetie?" A hand touched his elbow, soothingly, and the woman was suddenly kneeling on the booth cushion beside him. "What's -"

"Am fine." he forced out, a tight breath escaping him as a dull whine. He grabbed at his bicep, squeezing at the muscle, though all that did was intensify the discomfort. "Arm's asleep."

She eased off slightly at that, and he was aware of her watching him. He struggled to sit upright, thrusting his legs off the bench, and get his arm away from the wall. As bloodflow returned, stabbing needles in every nerve-ending from his fingertip to his shoulder, he regained some amount of mobility.

Starting to shake and flex his joints, snorting out a breath when that only hurt worse, Nick squinted carefully over at her. It was too dark to catch much beyond her frame and the smallest glimpse of amusement in the glint of her eyes.

"My turn?" he grunted, flatly, earning a nod from her. Coach had taken first watch, and since Rochelle was stirring him, she'd likely gone after - which meant it was probably halfway through the night. "Why isn't Miss Bitch on watch?"

The producer leaned back slightly, giving him more room on the booth bench. "She is." she stated, just as flatly. "I'm trying to get her lazy ass up right now."

Nick grimaced, mostly upset with himself for teeing the joke up for her. He blamed it on exhaustion, and shoved himself down the bench. "Christ. I'm going." Rochelle dodged out of the booth, retaking her footing with crossed arms. "Your bedside manner could use some fuckin' work."

He got a good look at her smile when he slipped past her, holding his arm to his chest like it were broken. As he stood, losing the insulation of his curled body, he was struck by how cool it had become. Cold, almost, and he regretted the loss of his shirt.
Looking across the restaurant toward the kitchen, he considered going to see if it had dried. There was a good chance, considering it was a thin dress shirt - but it was also likely to be stiff and scratchy, the once-expensive fabric suffering from the poor treatment. He mulled it over, but had no chance to make a choice either way.

A dull impact whumpf ed against the side of his head, and he had to jolt a foot forward to catch himself, releasing his numb arm in favour of grabbing for the shape that struck him. It took him a moment to realize it was a blanket, thin and cottony.

Holding it awkwardly against his chest, Nick blinked back toward Rochelle, bewildered by the gesture. She was already returning to her bed, practically flopping her body down onto the set of linens she'd folded up into a mock mattress. "Shotgun's by the door." He was left to feel put out, uncomfortable, only reluctantly drawing the blanket over his shoulders.

Her being considerate just made him feel like an asshole.

Resisting the urge to try and come up with a retort, he stepped into his dress shoes and turned away, wincing at the lingering pain pulsing through his arm. It was like every signal sent to the muscles in his limb was mistranslating - like his brain said "Hey, move to the left." and his arm replied "Oh, I'm on fire? Neat."

Nick sucked in a breath as smoothly as he could, rubbing a flat palm into the meat of his bicep. He could've very easily walked the few feet between him and the entryway, turned the corner and put the chest-high wall between him and his team. That would've been the smart thing to do.

Instead, he turned and looked behind himself, eyes unerringly finding their way to the curled-up shape of his ex-lover. His vision had adapted enough to pick out the Georgian, eyes skating over the bare legs tangled up in a sprawl, just kissed by reflected moonlight -

He groaned, inwardly, willing his mind away from the thought. The last thing he needed was an Ellis without pants, flaunting stocky legs he'd much rather have wrapped around him. He could practically feel the warmth under his palm, tickled by soft leg hair, digging his nails into pale skin as he held his body at just the right angle -

"Shit, Nick -"

His mind, unsurprisingly, was disobedient.

Frustration had tossed and turned in his mind from the moment he'd had to watch Christophe and Ellis go off into the kitchen together. He was being punished, that much he knew for sure. Whether it was an intentional act by Ellis or just God enjoying his misery, he didn't really care.

He didn't even really blame Chris, though he wanted to rage and shout and strangle the Spaniard with his bare hands, and he'd probably do a few of those things anyway. It wasn't like the guy had taken Ellis from him. He'd managed that feat all on his own.

Storming into the odd hallway that lined the front of the restaurant, Nick tried to focus himself. He couldn't chase his tail and run in circles, regret his choices just because he was horny - or lonely, or whatever he felt. He'd made his (cold) bed, and he had to lie in it.

Inhaling, he forced himself to slow, striding to the door. He passed a chair set by a window, double-barrel shotgun resting atop the seat, and he grabbed the weapon as he passed. It only took a moment to confirm it was loaded, and then he held it low against his hip and continued to the entryway.
Nick found himself a place against the doorframe, digging into his left pocket with his free hand. His cigarette pack and lighter were secreted away there, his right pocket stowing his wallet and the bottle of lube he didn't have it in him to throw away. Sex was the one area he tended to hedge his bets.

Then he wondered if Ellis had thrown the condoms away yet, and the thought drove him to yanking a cigarette out and lighting up in a desperate rush.

Stop. Thinking. About. It.

The flood of smoke into his lungs helped, minty cool. He reached out to open the front door a crack, directing his smoke outside and holding it open with a foot tucked into the doorway. He gazed out into the night, through the mesh wall that enclosed the porch.

Staggering shapes lined the street, passing in and out of what moonlight streamed in from the sky. He watched them wander, attentive to any sign that they noticed him or the gentle glow of his cigarette. It wasn't unusual for one or two infected to grow interested in their base, but for the most part, keeping quiet and dark at night seemed to pass them under any zombie's radar.

The mutated ones, however, seemed to have more of a sixth sense.

They'd been haunted by Jockeys and Hunters before most often, as if there were something heightened to their senses - or their intelligence. Nick was inclined toward the latter, considering past experiences.

For that reason, his gaze scanned the rooftops. Most of the mutated zombies seemed to love a height advantage, with the only exceptions being Boomers and Chargers. He had no interest in being dragged from the house by a squirming, slimy tongue or getting blasted by skin-melting acid.

At least the porch separated him from danger. It was far from impenetrable, but better than nothing.

He sighed, letting his cigarette droop in its place between his lips. He wasn't looking forward to the next day. Assuming Lena survived the night, they'd have a decision to make: what to do, and how to do it. He knew the bikers' plan had been to secure a boat and sail down the coast, and they'd offered to help - or more specifically, his teammates had.

Nick mulled over the thought. As much as he wanted to put them on a boat and see them gone, he had to wonder: should they make the same choice? They had no evidence that the government was going to help them, and some evidence that they might just be hunting them.

Or, at the very least, not interested in helping.

Was he stupid to think they should join them? They could find some kind of yacht and sail away as a group. Zombies could likely swim about as well as he could, and if what he'd heard about their father was true - Isn't it always the kooks who end up making it? Like cockroaches? Like that redneck in the swamp we met?

His nose stung at the memory.

It wasn't anything he'd suggest aloud; he didn't even know if it was a good idea or not. He'd prefer getting executed by the military than floating the thought to his team. Not to mention that it would be moot if Lena died. Rhiannon would never agree to it, assuming she didn't just turn on them on the spot.
Regardless, the next day was going to unpleasant. Either they'd go out hunting for a boat or clothes or ammo, leaving their injured behind... or they'd huddle in the café, resting. Trapped in a building with one person who hated him, two people who mildly disliked him, and the guy he'd freshly broken up with.

He genuinely didn't know which sounded more fun.

Palming over his mouth, Nick gripped his cigarette idly between his knuckles and pulled it away. He sighed forcefully, breath gusting smoke through the open door. If I have to spend one more minute getting the fucking evil eye from every person in this building, I might just reconsider sticking around.

It was, he knew with unfortunate surety, a bluff.

He'd had his chance, floating ten feet above his own body that night. The panic had numbed him just enough to disregard the consequences of his actions. Maybe even invite them, in some apathetic and offhand way.

Like closing his eyes and walking into the road, to let fate decide whether he got to the other side or not. It wasn't suicide; it was more like surrender, and letting someone else choose whether they'd accept the white flag. Or maybe it's just like telling yourself you're playing Russian Roulette when you really just want to blow your brains out.

Then you're a little disappointed when it clicks.

But he was a cockroach, too, ultimately. He couldn't stop going, finding some new way to make it through. No matter how low he got or how many hits he took, there was some animal need for survival that drove him. He'd burnt things to the ground around him, people, but he always crawled out only a little worse for wear.

Nick was shaken by the thought. He wanted to ignore it, shrug it off, but it stuck in his craw and he could barely swallow.

His ex-wife hadn't loved him. She'd had plenty of other flaws, but that had been the very core, the foundation, of their failure. She hadn't loved him, and everything collapsed from there. He'd loved her and she had tossed him aside, broken his heart, burnt it all down rather than try. She'd left him when he'd needed someone the most.

Sound familiar?

Suddenly his cigarette burned his fingers, and the feeling startled him so much he dropped it. He had to jolt a step back to avoid it dropping into his foot, hissing out a breathy, "Shit."

He examined the smoking cigarette where it lay on the ground, sighing just lightly before dragging his gaze away. He had two left, and they were unlikely to last him the day. He'd have to keep an eye out for more the next time they went supply-hunting; nicotine was very likely the only thing keeping him going.

Nick rubbed a knuckle over his mouth, pressing his tongue into the roof of his mouth and swallowing as if to get every last wisp of smoke - and then he looked up.

Standing in the very center of the road, staring bluntly in his direction, was a slumped and bulky shape. It was uneven, too wide on the bottom, forming an almost rectangular shape if it weren't for the clear shape of a head. He squinted, but couldn't pick out anything for sure.
It wasn't nearly large enough to be a Charger or lanky and stretched enough to be a Smoker. It wasn't rotund or belching - so Boomer was off the list - and it wasn't spewing the green saliva that marked it as a Spitter. Standing upright meant it wasn't a Hunter or Jockey.

He was at a loss, then.

It didn't move, at first, as if it were watching him. He should have ducked back inside, but he hesitated. There was something mesmerizing in the silence, his eyes locked on the odd shape and only just processing the stagger and shift of forms beyond it.

Then it stepped forward, upper body lilting to the left as it did so, and he jolted to the side of the door. He placed an elbow against the door, shoving it closed, and sucked in a breath. Fuck. It was just one infected, but its screaming attention would draw more. A gunshot, most certainly, would draw more.

He slipped carefully along the wall, pressing his cheek against the edge of the window so he could peer out. The creature was approaching, swaying with every step. It didn't seem in any rush, as if it had only the barest awareness it was going toward anything at all.

Tightening his fingers on the shotgun, he carefully turned it around, getting the butt against his shoulder. He got his hand in place, feeling the split trigger under the pad of his index finger. Fuck. I should've kept the fucking door shut.

He could bail, run in and alert his team quietly. Or he could just yell from where he was and get their attention.

Nick watched, instead, as the creature staggered limply up to the porch stairs. It stood there, swaying lightly, as if examining the screen door in front of it. He held his breath with his tongue bitten, willing it to turn away. Come on, fucker. Go slump around somewhere else.

It didn't.

Pushing forward, the zombie thrust itself blindly into the door to blunder through. The screen door gave way eagerly, though the creature barely made it, struggling with its significant width. There was a clatter, like plastic and metal, and Nick screwed his brow up. What the fuck is this thing?

He surveyed his options for just a moment. It made sense to retreat, since the creature hadn't even really noticed him yet. He could get some back-up in case the encounter turned dangerous - or loud.

Then again, he could also just handle it. Asking his team for help was not high on his to-do list at the moment.

It was with a grunt that he decided. He strafed to stand in front of the door, using his free hand to tenderly rotate the deadbolt. The click it made was dull and scraping, too quiet to alert the infected on the other side. He inhaled, grabbing the knob. Okay. Twist, pull, shoot. Catch it off-guard. Deal with the collateral. Easy.

He could hear the creature's scraping, dragging footsteps. It approached the door at a shuffle, stepping up so close he could almost hear it huffing, snarling. He settled his finger in a careful position over one half of the trigger.

Twist.
He rotated his hand in one smooth motion, turning the knob.

Pull.

He yanked the door inward, pushing the shotgun up to direct the barrels out at the creature.

Shoo-

It was close now, close enough to see in the low light. It seemed to react in a sluggish jolt to the door opening, peering at him. He only had a moment to take it in. The infected stood before him in full body armour, grey so it almost melded into the darkness.

Its hand was trapped in the arm straps of a full riot shield, holding it awkwardly in front of itself like it hardly knew what to do with the bulk. The shield just scraped along the floor, dragged in front of it.

Through the cloudy plastic that made up the top fourth of the shield, he could see beady yellow eyes staring from the facemask of a helmet. The word POLICE was printed across its helmet's forehead and the bottom of its shield in reflective white. He swore the creature looked as confused as he did.

Then it lunged.
Nick knew full well the gun would be of no use. It didn't take a genius to make the leap that shooting point-blank into a riot shield - let alone a zombie in full Kevlar body armour - was a bad idea.

That didn't leave much in the way of alternatives, except bracing.

The zombie's body-weight was not insignificant, a broad build more than filling the armour it wore. That weight was put behind the flat plane of the riot shield, and Nick imagined it felt something like getting struck by a snow plow. He was scraped unceremoniously along the floor, pushed and slammed flat into the shield's front, and then between it and the wall.

All the air left him with the blow, stars spinning in his vision as he was pancaked against the shoulder-high wall. His only relief was that he was tall enough that his head didn't smash straight into it, instead craning his neck over the top edge as the zombie pressed its body into the shield, straining and pushing to reach him.

It was as if it couldn't comprehend that the shield was in its control. Rather than swing it to the side and attack him, it smeared itself into the inner side of the riot shield, beating on it with its free hand.

Its face jolted into the plastic panel at the top of the shield, snapping teeth uselessly at the air as both its helmet's acrylic faceguard and the riot shield cooperated to separate the creature from him.

They fought, struggled, squirming in thick unison. He felt the blanket scraping off his back, slithering down to the floor behind him.

"Je - sus - Christ -" he gasped out, shotgun caught between him and the shield. He tried to shove with it, a hand on either end of the weapon, but there was no leverage against the face of the shield. The zombie snarled, muffled from inside its helmet, shoving hard into him.

Smashed anew into the wall, Nick acted on raw instinct: he went limp and slid into almost a crouch. The zombie's weight kept pressing, pushing to close the distance - but the top of the riot shield hit the top of the wall first, and its bottom edge caught against the floor.

It was stuck there, diagonal, and Nick rolled himself to the side in the space left in the center. He scrambled to get to his feet and by the time he'd caught his footing, the zombie had only just begun to face him. It struggled with its own bulk, and before it could turn and drag its shield to follow, he leapt.

Nick let the shotgun go, hearing it thud dully to the ground, in favour of grabbing the riot shield with both hands. He snarled even as the infected snarled back, and it reached with the hand that wasn't strapped to the shield to try and claw for him.

Only just piercing his awareness was the shape of someone darting out into the hallway, and when he saw them freeze for a beat at the sight of his situation, he couldn't help a vague surprise. A distant, Oh, yeah. I have a team. Right. Like he'd forgotten for a moment.

"Get a fucking weapon!" he shouted across the space between them, voice choked with strain. He didn't know who it was, but they obeyed without a word, sprinting back into the darkness. He was sure he heard voices beyond his own, but the ringing in his ears and his pulse were too loud to pick out specifics.
He kicked off the balls of his feet, practically running his weight into the infected. The zombie squawked out a wet sound of frustration, stumbling over its own feet and going down. Nick had little choice but to ride it to the ground, all his efforts focused on contesting its mass.

He likely would have failed, had the creature reacted a moment sooner or thought to dig in its heels.

They went tumbling and clattering to the floor, the shield landing flat and both of them collapsing on it. Nick landed on his knees in something like a straddle atop the zombie, his weight leveraged to keep the creature down. The zombie's free arm lashed up at him, but he grabbed it by the wrist, holding its grabbing fingers at bay.

It had lost its glove, revealing the waxy skin of its hand, fingers tipped by calcified nails that approached talons. It grasped and stretched its digits toward his face, desperately rotating its wrist in attempts to get close.

He grimaced down at it, flashing a glance up and out of the front door. The scuffle had not passed notice, and there were shapes approaching. He blinked, and there were more. He didn't know how many, unable to see in the dark, but any was more than he wanted.

"Fuck," he said, simply, before abandoning his grip on the zombie's wrist to one hand. It became more of a struggle, then, but he focused on twisting around and grabbing for the shotgun laying just behind him.

It dodged his fingertips, skating further away, so he snarled and thrust his weight into it. The second attempt succeeded.

He swiveled back forward, jamming the shotgun directly underneath the infected's helmet, finding the gap between the helmet and the collar of its body armour. Only a thin fabric separated him from the flesh of its neck, and he couldn't resist a satisfaction when he pulled one of the two triggers.

The blast was small, but still enough to send a shock up his arm. The recoil that couldn't escape through jerking the barrel up went straight to his body, and he might've lost his grip on the gun had he not had it flush against the infected. Gore and blood splattered out and onto the shield beneath them, almost pitch black, and he wasn't sure if it was the darkness or its actual colour.

The zombie went into a seizing set of jolts and tremors as its nervous system processed the loss of its connection to its brain, but Nick ignored it. He couldn't shut the door with the infected's body in the way, and the porch door was hardly an obstacle. He wasn't sure he had the time or the brawn to haul the big male zombie out of the way, loaded down with Kevlar.

The strength afforded to him by sleep and food couldn't make the zombie weigh less than it did.

Without something between him and the oncoming zombies, he'd be dead. He set the shotgun down and grabbed for the riot shield at the same time he stepped off it, trying to wrest it out from under the infected. If he could get it, he could use it, block the door with it until help arrived -

His efforts failed, and he only recognized why after a moment of struggle: the strap was buckled tightly to the zombie's forearm, just below the elbow. He'd never get it off in time and in the dark.

He looked up and outside, vision quickly filling with the movement of dark shapes, sprinting up to the porch. They'd be on him shortly, and one shotgun shell wouldn't be enough, nor did he have the time to implement his plan as he'd intended.

"Nick!"
The sound of Ellis' voice was oddly, uniquely pleasant. Maybe it was the honest concern, the fear. It was the closest to a positive emotion he'd heard from the Georgian in what felt like ages - directed at him, anyway. His skin prickled, and if there hadn't been a cluster of infected charging for him, he might've let himself enjoy it.

Instead, he jolted to his feet and looked up to see Ellis' shadowed form striding toward him, either hand gripping something.

As he approached, Nick recognized them: in one hand, his katana. In the other, Chris' machete. He reached reflexively for the sword, only to find Ellis planting the machete's handle in his palm. It was, most definitely, intentional defiance.

Nick allowed him that, not that he had much choice.

The first infected through the door trampled right over the infected policeman, stumbling only slightly. It lashed out its arms, sprinting directly at them with a shrill scream. Ellis gripped the katana's hilt with both hands, stepping in front of Nick to slash out with it, catching the zombie on the shoulder.

The blade stuck on its clavicle, but before Nick could feel any kind of spiteful satisfaction, Ellis merely twisted his wrist and let the blow skate up its shoulder so the blade sunk into its neck. Blood guttered from the wound where the steel cut into an artery, though it was quick to clot and thicken to sludge.

The zombie tried to shriek but couldn't manage more than a broken sputter, like Ellis had damaged its windpipe.

It lunged at them, but Ellis met it with a step, and the momentum slid the blade deeper into its neck. It didn't last much longer after that, and he had to dodge as its body went down, spine flashing white through the dark shades of its flesh.

There were more behind it, scrambling to reach them.

Jaw flexing, Nick slipped to stand beside Ellis, thrusting into the fray. There was only just enough room for both of them, the hallway awkward and cramped. He had to pay a little too much attention to where he swung the machete, lest his backswing hit the other man.

It felt natural, to fight alongside Ellis. They moved in practiced rhythm, even in the dark, when it was so easy to fall out of sync or miss a cue. When one of them lunged, the other retreated, rested. When they overextended, the other was there to cover.

The silence, he supposed, helped. It was easier to pretend things between them were anything like normal.

Together, the small rush of zombies fell without much trouble at all. There only ended up being a handful - whatever infected had been in the immediate area - and they couldn't overwhelm the survivors in the thin hallway.

Nick and Ellis held their ground, and before long, they were left standing there, quiet but for the panting of breath and the trickling patter of blood against wood. Nick tightened his grip on the machete, looking carefully over the pile of corpses they'd left behind.

The only movement he saw was twitching, shuddering, the remnants of life leaving rent and inflamed flesh. He glanced at his body, just able to pick out where blood had sprinkled over his torso and right arm.
And I just fucking showered.

Ellis was watching him, he quickly realized. The sensation tugged on his awareness until he turned, gaze landing on Ellis' face. The low light allowed little detail to be gleaned - but enough. The Georgian looked at him, perturbed, eyes darting rapidly between Nick's chest and his face.

Was he thinking the same thing - bemoaning the so-soon degradation of cleanliness - or was he as distracted by Nick's lack of a shirt as Nick was by his lack of coveralls?

Ellis' frustrated voice came to mind, pleading with him to stop enjoying the kid's obvious and lingering attraction to him. The memory plucked a note of guilt in the back of his mind. It was, among other things, unpleasant.

He'd never intended torture, suffering. He'd never meant the situation to sour so. He'd wanted to free them both from the tangled mess he'd woven them into, the promises he'd never meant to make, that he'd never be able to keep.

He inhaled, scrabbling for something to say that didn't reveal his thoughts.

Ellis beat him to it.

"Why'd you open the door?"

Nick's expression screwed up slightly, brows crinkling at the question. His mouth popped open before he had any time to consider what he was saying, sarcasm writ in broad strokes across his voice. "I thought it was the pizza guy."

They stared at each other, trapped in vague tension, hovering on the edge of something, and Nick didn't know what was beyond the precipice.

He was dreading that discovery.

The slightest laugh, airy and wet, escaped the young man standing next to him. A smile tugged at Nick's lips, eyes squinting in the darkness in abrupt desperation, seeking out a better view of the Southerner's face. He'd not forgotten the visceral pleasure of Ellis' genuine attention, his amusement. He'd not forgotten it, but he had underestimated its effect on him.

"Is everyone okay?" Rochelle's voice broke through, sharply, and the light from a flashlight burst into the hallway as she came around the corner. Her other hand was tightly gripped on her handgun, black metal cold in her palm. "Nick?"

"Yeah." Nick stated, looking forward. The light gave him a much better view of the carnage, and he advanced, picking through the bodies until he reached the front door. "Just some zombies looking for a midnight snack."

He came to a stop standing over the infected riot officer, eyes intent on its slumped form. He shifted and rolled his shoulders, working out tension. Moving the creature would be difficult, but necessary.

It was with a sigh that he bent down, setting the machete on the floor. He sunk fingertips under the zombie's Kevlar jacket, digging into the holes made for its arms.

"Need to get these outside." He struggled with the weight, strained, taking a step toward the door and trying to drag the body along with him. "They'll reek by morning."
It only mildly surprised him to have Ellis step up behind him and get a grasp on the creature's legs, haul them up. "Okay." They dragged it out onto the porch, and then through the porch door. Together, they indelicately threw it into the lawn.

Both of them reflexively wiped their hands, and in the moment, Nick glanced at Ellis. The moonlight was cold, and the air was colder. Sharp. It was crisp against his skin, raising goosebumps across his chest.

The younger man trembled, and his posture tightened with the awareness of the gambler's eyes on him. "... s'cold out here."

Nick felt a swell of tiredness as whatever remained of his adrenaline faded away. In its place came a hollowness, and he looked up at the sky instead. He could imagine the version of himself that still had the right to wrap an arm around the kid, drag him close.

He didn't want to picture it, but he still could.

When he turned, walking back into the café to grab another body, Ellis followed close behind. There was a bloated hesitance between them that was missing, suddenly, and Nick wasn't sure why. He just knew he preferred the wall that had been between them.

"Then let's get it done with." He focused himself on the task at hand. There was no good that would come of it, mulling over their relationship, or lack thereof, or whatever was burgeoning between them now.

Rochelle lit the way with her flashlight. A peculiar silence sunk its claws into her, watching them work for just a moment before she moved. She clipped the flashlight to her jeans - flipped the safety on her pistol - tucked it against her lower back - and joined in the efforts.

There was some flutter of activity in the house as their teammates confirmed their safety. However, only Rhiannon appeared to help, a thickness to her movements that betrayed her exhaustion.

It was the first time Nick actually felt a thing in common with her.
Chapter 208

Morning came like sludge, unpleasant in its advance. Christophe flinched at the feeling of surfacing consciousness, trying to turn his face away from whatever it was that it perceived. Even the simple flexion of his neck hurt.

A gritty taste in his mouth was his reward for awakening, pushing a dry tongue against the backs of his teeth. He sighed past a sharp pain in his throat, like the flesh had cracked in his sleep. He forced his eyes open after a moment, finding Ellis' sympathetic face hovering over his.

He groaned, and a hand patted gently at his thigh.

"Take a minute, man. S'okay. Just figured I'd wake you up since we were all rousin'."

A broad range of responses came to mind, some darker than others, but Chris merely nodded. Ellis shifted away and disappeared from his sight. Taking the time to breathe, Chris reached up to rub fingers at his eyes and chase away the sleep.

Nothing landed on his face, and he corrected himself, lifting his right hand instead.

It was strange to so vividly feel his amputated left arm. He could sense its presence, accounted for it when he moved, felt the flex of muscle when he tried to use it. He could even feel the cottony press of the blanket underneath him, cushioning an elbow he didn't have anymore.

Was he crazy? Had he snapped, finally, after all? He was hallucinating the presence of a limb that every piece of evidence said was long gone. That unsettled him more than anything he'd yet experienced, and he'd woken up in his college dorm room to find his roommates disemboweled in the living room.

He frowned, very gently placing his hand below the bandaged end of his stump. He waved fingers there as if to convince himself the air was, in fact, empty. Unfortunately, the action did nothing to erase the sensation of weight; logic had no impact on what his senses were so sure of.

Chris looked up, scanning the restaurant carefully. He startled to find Nick staring directly at him where he sat at the bar, arms crossed, wearing his unbuttoned blue dress shirt. The gambler's cold eyes ticked between him and his missing arm, pointedly.

Shame drew Chris' chin down, tucking his hand against his waist. It was bad enough to be sick and tired and crippled. Showing weakness took his breath from him, raised his heartrate. He felt an instinctive fear, and that fear inverted into something sunny.

"Good morning, traje." He plucked at his lower lip with his teeth, as if hiding a smile. "Not that there is much traje left, eh?"

_Distraigo. Desvío._

If he disguised his pain, his fear, he wouldn't get hurt.

Except he'd already shown plenty of weakness to Nick. More than he'd meant or planned to, though he hadn't expected to live through the admittance in the first place. Part of him had pegged Nick for a heartless survivor - or at least someone who despised weakness. Someone who'd look at him, begging for death, and grant it to him.
Then Nick had done the opposite. He was, really, the only reason Christophe was still alive.

Nick grimaced at him, eyes falling away to instead focus over where the rest of the team clustered around Lena. "A good bit of my suit went to your fucking bandages, so watch the attitude." he snapped out, dully.

Chris examined his face, trying to get a read on the scowl there. He didn't know a lot about Nick - just scraps and inferences. The man must've had something under the surface to get Ellis' adoration, and he'd seen enough in the gunstore to know Nick was hiding something.

Setting his jaw, Chris pushed the heel of his hand against the floor and scrambled to his feet. It was difficult not to try and swing his left hand out, grab the nearby table for balance. He steeled himself against the sensation of unsteadiness and got to his feet.

"I want to thank you." he stated, aware of Nick's expression souring even further as he approached. He smiled, gripping at his ribs as if to hold his body together. "You have helped me. If I can, I would - te devolveré. Pay-back, ¿si?"

Nick's eyes snapped to his face, gauging, and Chris held strong against the examination. It took a moment, but the gambler relaxed, apparently deciding that his slight misuse of the term was innocent.

And it was, mostly.

"Not necessary, bucko. I really, honestly don't give a shit." Sighing lightly, Nick put his elbow on the bar counter, resting his chin on his palm. His tone was blasé, dismissive, and Christophe took advantage of the disinterest to step closer. "You're pretty much the least of my worries."

The Spaniard grimaced melodramatically, lowering his chin and puffing a breath. Most of his theatrical energy was wasted when Nick barely looked at him. "You have more worry than most. It is... hard, watching you all fight. Quizás -"

Nick shifted his hand, tapping his pinky against his lower lip as he interrupted the man. "I'm not interested in chatting with you. You don't owe me anything, and I don't need a shoulder. So thanks, but no thanks." His eyes narrowed, but he maintained his gaze on their teammates without sparing Chris a glance at all.

Chris' gaze did a quick dart over toward the rest of the survivors, standing around the table where Lena lay. His mouth pursed, thinking. It was all he could do not to respond before he'd put his words together in careful order.

"Nico. I think... if you try, he wants to forgive you. You miss him, ¿si?"

He watched Nick stiffen and adjust his posture, aggression seeping through even as he tried to keep a lid on it. He lowered his voice to a silky-smooth mutter. "Watch where you're headed. This conversation could turn unpleasant for you."

Scuttling back a step, Chris increased the distance between them again. However, after an inhaled breath, he stomped back forward, fisting his hand tightly. "I only mean -"

Nick jolted upright on the barstool, tensing, mouth tightening to a thin and dangerous line.

There was no doubt in his mind that Nick would've gotten up, that he would've hurt him. He felt himself steeling for it, impudently tipping up his chin to match Nick's gaze. He'd take it, whatever it was. He'd taken it from Jerry, and he'd take it from Nick.
He'd take whatever he had to. If helping Ellis was the foothold he could find to fitting in, the way he could make himself useful - he'd take any punishment. He found a clarity in his desperation, and meaning in it.

What he didn't expect was for Nick to look at him, green eyes sparking confusion for a split second before he awkwardly blinked. He saw the expectation in Chris’ eyes, the resignation, and it startled him. The Northerner raised a hand up, palm flat, a wince crinkling one side of his face.

"Look - just... leave it alone." he stated, tone chilly with irritation. "And lose the kicked dog look."

He shoved off the barstool, stepping around Chris in a frustrated sweep. Nick set to buttoning up his shirt, focusing very closely on the motion, and Chris watched him cautiously.

It took a moment to shake off the electric sensation of danger, reminding the animal part of his brain that he was, relatively, safe. He felt tremendously out of his depth, somehow moreso than he had with his old team.

At least he'd known what his purpose was, his value, with them. At least he'd had an idea who he was in a new reality where nothing was the same. Being around his new team made him feel the yawning distance between him and who he'd been, and some wild and mournful part of him missed his old teammates.

Of course, his old teammates would have put him down themselves, in this condition.

He could barely fight, if he ever regained his strength at all. He was just... present, hanging on by the mercy of others, and felt at any moment like he might say the wrong thing or do the wrong thing. Worse, like if he garnered their ire, maybe they'd leave him to die.

He tried to inhale, breathe. He shook his head and retreated a few steps before turning around entirely. If he weren't crazy - and of that, he wasn't confident anymore - he'd managed to offend the man.

"Él debe languidecer por ti, y tú debes languidecer por él." he stated, a mumble, earning him a cold glance from Nick. The gambler didn't wait or ask for a translation, merely retreating across the dining area as if to escape him.

They pine for each other.

Chris raised his hand and palmed over his forehead, exhaling a frustrated breath. It seemed simple to him - though, he supposed, he was being a bit hypocritical.

His eyes immediately found Rochelle across the room, and she seemed to shift, as if she felt his attention. She pushed a thin lock of stray dark hair behind her ear, a self-conscious gesture that set his heart to thumping in his chest.

It was easy to call her beautiful, but that didn't encompass he way he felt about her. She'd come crashing through the delicate balance he'd found in this new life, shattered everything he'd thought he'd understood about how the world worked now that it had fallen apart.

He'd accepted violence. He'd accepted survival above all else. He'd accepted the warping and culling of morality, because it made sense to do so when faced by an apocalypse. He'd taken, chameleon-like, to mimicking those around him in the interest of living another day. There had been no alternative, and no other option.

Chris wouldn't pretend that he'd never gotten caught up in Brenda's self-serving tirades, that he hadn't felt powerful, better than those that died or got sick. Games of dominance were a good distraction from a new reality that should've terrified him.

Then Rochelle looked at them like they were monsters, and he'd never so badly wanted to please someone.

She was normal, and kind, and part of a team that didn't vacillate between despising each other and actively perpetrating violence against one another. They took care of each other, and behaved with a warmth and humanity he didn't think existed anymore. He hadn't thought there was room for it anymore.

He was drawn to it, and his team had punished him for that - but when the time came to choose, he chose to believe that there was still good.

"Or," spoke the laughing voice of his dead leader. "You just went with the better odds. Not that I blame you. Why die with me when you could live with them?" He shook his head, trying to stop her words from forming. "Just don't pretend you ditched me because you had a crisis of conscience.
You jumped off a sinking ship."

He practically felt the cold point of a butcher's knife suddenly press into the small of his back, nudging in until he could either retreat forward or let it pierce him. "And we'll be the ones laughin' when this ship sinks, too, cunt."

A stuttered breath left him, and his chin dropped as his chest tightened. Terror cut through his body like a cold breeze, making him tremble. He clenched a hand he didn't have, nails biting into an imaginary palm.

His arm wasn't the only thing he'd found himself hallucinating.

Christophe had withdrawn so fully into the recesses of thought that he didn't even see Rochelle look at him, or frown, or pull away from the group to move toward him. It wasn't until she stepped up to him and spoke that he snapped back to himself.

"You okay?"

He tried to crack a grin, tried to brighten his expression, but she barely acknowledged it. Her hand suddenly lifted, pressing the back of it against his forehead. He flinched, staring up at her wrist where it hovered before his face.

Her hot touch was enough to give him goosebumps.

"You're clammy." she stated, frown pulling her face into a disappointed pinch. "You feel sick?"

A smile came easily, then, and he reached up to set fingertips against her elbow. "Sólo en mi corazón." he murmured, though he knew his voice shook as he spoke. She saw through him, eyes flashing to his with some concern, though she smiled anyway.

"... Apparently middle school Spanish class and pop songs on the radio prepped me just enough to get embarrassed by you." she chastised, sighing, lowering her hand in a quick motion. Rochelle rubbed at her arm gently, smoothing over the place he'd touched. "Don't feel like Lena being injured means you can't be, too. I don't want you to push yourself just because you don't want to be a burden."

Chris' body deflated a little, though he tried to keep it propped up by a stiff spine. He forced a grin, gaze skating to the side. "We are all hurt, ¿sí?" he managed in a quiet voice, shifting on his heels.
He didn't want to be weak in front of her. He felt damaged, lessened, just a broken thing still clinging onto something it didn't deserve. He didn't deserve her, and she deserved more than whatever he'd become. What value did he have, now?

She blinked into his face, head tilting gently. "Yeah." she agreed. "Thanks for making Ellis hurt a little less yesterday."

Christophe's eyes darted up, meeting hers, a little startled. He hadn't shared Ellis' breakdown, and he hadn't thought Ellis had. She smiled knowingly, and he was filled with the warm and tingling sensation that accompanied the sight. \textit{Te deseo.} he yearned to say, craved it, but the words caught in his throat.

He laughed instead, voice cracking in the middle of the sound. "I am happy." he stated, quietly, shifting on his feet. "He is my friend, and I want to help him."

"You did. Not sure \textit{what} you did, but keep doing it." She looked to the side, glancing at Nick. The gambler had busied himself with buttoning, straightening, and tucking in his shirt, but the intensity of his exuded lack of attention only highlighted how much attention he was paying. Chris couldn't fully tell if she was amused, or a little sad.

Rochelle blinked back at him, and reinvigorated her smile. "Come on. I can at least give you some meds." She turned away, leaning down to grab the supplies backpack from the floor next to the bar. She started digging through it in search of the antibiotics and painkillers they had stowed there.

Chris watched for a moment, eyes flickering up toward the other end of the restaurant. Lena was stirring, woken by her sister cautiously petting at her cheek and forehead, and he sighed lightly. She had, at least, survived the night.

He cocked his head, slowly looking down at the empty air where his left arm should've hung. He hadn't noticed the dull ache rising over time; he'd never relaxed it. He tried to, now, but the feeling of clenched fingers and tremulously stiff muscles didn't change. He attempted to move it, spread his fingers, but the limb didn't respond.

It didn't take long for the clench of imagined muscle to scatter burning pain along the memory of nerve-endings. He couldn't shake it out, couldn't convince himself that his nails weren't digging into his palm and his muscles and tendons weren't strained in a spasm.

A staggered puff of air left his lips, shakily. When Rochelle looked at him curiously, he forced a grin that belied the rise of anxiety that came along with the new, unfamiliar kind of pain. "Sí, por favor."

She didn't question him - but she moved a little quicker.
Chapter 209

Lena's eyes were hazy, unfocused, her face drawn in an unclear pinch. She seemed to only partially understand where she was and what was going on around her. When Rhiannon leaned in to talk to her, Lena watched her mouth move with a glassy stare and a hesitant blink.

"Hey, sis. You're here. I got ya."

The brunette's focus wavered, eventually lifting to look her sister in the eyes. It was like she looked out through a one-way mirror, with only preternatural instinct telling her someone was on the other side. Her lips pursed, and a vague cough preceded a flush of agony across her expression.

She looked pale, fragile.

"H-hey -" she whispered. "Hey, kitten."

Rhiannon cradled her palm against Lena's cheek, laughing sharply under her breath. "Hey, duck." she murmured back with a sigh. Her eyes darted around her sister's face, examining her closely. "Looks like you made it through the night. Fuck dying, right?"

Lena bared her teeth in something like a smile. She moved her arm carefully and tenderly, slowly placing her hand against her belly. "Cold." escaped her in a huff, and Rhiannon quickly moved to tuck the blankets more thoroughly around her body.

Every touch, every jostle - even small - made Lena's face go white. Rhiannon couldn't soften her touch enough to avoid hurting the older woman, and regret soaked her expression in a grimace once she pulled her trembling hands away.

Coach leaned in, eyes slanting to meet Lena's. He offered her a reassuring and soft expression as he spoke. "You're lookin' better today." he lied, gaze catching on the strip of her belly he could see between the folds of the blankets around her. She seemed more swollen than before, and shades of red and purple were battling for real estate on her midsection.

The brunette shut her eyes, a single wheeze passing her lips in a laugh. She didn't bother responding, expression tightening in intense focus, and Coach looked back over his shoulder. Ellis and Rochelle stood together, her hand resting on his bicep in a soothing touch.

"Ain't no surprise, but she ain't goin' anywhere. I say we hole up, maybe a day, maybe a few days. Get all of us some rest." He gestured to the bar, where they'd lined up most of their supplies. "We got food, water, med'cine. We can afford a break."

Ellis found himself looking rapidly between Coach and Rochelle. He felt a conflicted set of emotions at the idea. On the one hand, he agreed with the sentiment of not straining their injured teammates. Chris would benefit, too. On the other... the restaurant was very, very small. Whatever tiny and tender peace he'd eked out between him and Nick was in danger.

There wasn't much room to get away from each other. Whatever tiny and tender peace he'd eked out between him and Nick was in danger.

Not that that was reasoning he could very well share.

Rochelle pressed her lips tight together, shaking her head. "I don't disagree, but... We're really low on ammunition. I'd feel safer if we had some stockpiled, in case we get any infected attention with the generator." She gazed between her teammates, an appraising edge touching her eyes. "We've got enough people to split up without spreading ourselves too thin."

It was Ellis who piped up, uncertainty making him shift on his socked feet. He was still bare-legged; his coveralls had, unsurprisingly, not dried overnight in the cold and heavy air. "Nick'n'me handled some zombies real fine last night with the weapons we got. You sure we need tuh risk it...?"

A sigh left Rochelle, putting both her hands up. "Yeah, you guys did. But that was, what? Five, six? The girls got chased out of here by one rogue fatty. What if another Boomer waddles in here and gets a horde on us? We won't just be fighting them off, we'll be the only thing between them and our injured."

The Southerner nodded reluctantly, conceding her point with a light frown. "Wouldn't hurt tuh be armed."

Speaking lowly from his place near the bar, Nick helpfully muttered, "Hey, look. A plan I finally agree with. It's a Christmas miracle." When all eyes turned to him, he set a hand on the bar and sighed. "Just because we've gotten lucky so far at night doesn't mean we'll stay that way. And fighting with swords and bats means more injuries. We can't keep getting hurt."

Coach grunted, sounding unconvinced, even as he closed his eyes and dropped his chin in a resigned gesture. "Think there's ammo 'round here? I don't want y'all goin' far."

Rhiannon lifted a hand, palming over her forehead to wipe away sweat from her brow. "There are signs for a gun and pawn around here, but we could never find it." Her eyes hung on Lena's, expression falling to a grim clench. It took her effort to spit out, "I can show you."

A hesitant curl touched Rochelle's fingers, reaching out toward the blonde in a useless gesture. "You don't want to stay? We can go. You should be with your sister."

The woman shook her head, a harsh laugh passing her lips. She stood suddenly, hopping off the table and to her feet. Rhiannon turned entirely away, scratching nails along her brown, undyed hairline. "I'm gonna fucking lose my shit if I have to sit here. So do us both a favour and let me go."

Rochelle looked her over, not missing the tremble and shiver of her frame, nor the restraint at the edge of her voice. She was just holding herself together - not that the producer could blame her. Sympathy welled up in her chest, and she nodded. "Okay."

Coach put his thumb against his upper teeth, biting down on it idly. "Alright." he uttered. "So Rhee goes. Chris stays, Lena stays. I'll stay, mind the radio. Ellis stays." He started to gesture between Rochelle and Nick, but Ellis released a displeased and protesting huff of air, only for the big man to round on him. "Boy, you ain't got pants. You wanna go fight zombies with no damn pants on?"

Ellis' eyes gently lowered, abashed, peering at his boxer-shod lower body. "Uh... Right. Yeah."

Even as she patted at his shoulder in idle comfort, Rochelle turned to look at Nick. He stood with his hip braced on one of the barstools, arms crossed over his chest. "What do you say, suit? Join the away team?"

Nick winced, eyeing her with a heavy dose of disdain. "Please... tell me that wasn't an intentional reference. I don't need another reason to doubt your taste, beyond the obvious." He said the final word with a heavy roll of his entire head to jerk it toward Chris, who stood by the wall, expression vapid and eyes a little distant.
The Spaniard didn't even respond to the attention, just staring down at the floor, clenching and releasing a fist with his hand in a slow and repetitive motion. He seemed remarkably attentive - just not on the reality that currently surrounded him.

Rochelle chalked it up to his fresh dose of painkillers, and focused wholly on Nick. "Bitch, Nichelle Nichols is a national treasure. I will fight you."

A stunted chuckle rumbled from Coach, nodding toward Nick. "If y'all two are done." he stated, dryly, only continuing once he had all eyes on him. "Let's organize our weapons, get us a grocery list. Nick, you mind? Get the guns, see how much ammo we got, what calibers we need."

The gambler tipped his head in acquiescence, stepping away from his stool and turning. He kneeled down next to the weapon stash by the bar, removing them from their stack and instead lining the guns up in a grid on the floor.

Rochelle approached, stepping up to his flank and pulling her pistol from her jeans waistband. She carefully pointed it toward the ground and released the magazine, catching it in her palm. She pulled back the rack, turning it to peer into the chamber and confirm there wasn't a bullet loaded. With that, she offered the gun to Nick, grip stuck down to him.

"Five shots in there. I think there were some spares in the pack, though."

He grunted, accepting the gun. He set it on the floor, pointing at the backpack in a silent request for it. Rochelle obeyed the direction, using her foot to slide the pack toward him, an eyebrow raising when he spoke. "I never did ask how you knew your way around guns. The hicks, I get, but you? Aren't you a news nerd from Ohio?"

The woman laughed, crouching down. She watched him unzip one of the front pack pockets and pull out the ammo boxes they had left from the gun store, crumpled and mostly empty. There was a fair number of loose bullets at the bottom, and Rochelle was quick to dart in a hand and start sorting through them.

"My dad was a cop. Pretty sure he wanted a boy, because my nursery was painted blue, and I learned gun safety before I learned how to walk. I didn't really want to. Never practiced using them, so this whole apocalypse has been a little sink-or-swim, if we're talking about shooting. I apparently swam."

Nick took to aligning the guns with their ammo, a careful order to his movements. Ellis' pump-action was entirely empty; Coach's double-barrel had just one shell left. His Magnum had three bullets in it, and his sniper had five.

Rochelle helpfully offered one more sniper round to him, and he sighed before taking it.

"Was that a jab at me?" he retorted, loading the bullet with a slanted grin. She blinked innocently at him, batting her eyes, and the conman huffed a breath before focusing on his work. "Okay. So we've got two 12-gauge shotguns that need ammo, one .50 caliber pistol and one 9 millimeter pistol. Sniper takes 5.56 millimeter."

Blinking, Rochelle nodded. She picked up the magazine for her pistol, gripping it in one hand as she grabbed one of the few bullets she'd found for it. Carefully pushing it into the magazine, using her thumb to brace and guide it into the mechanism, she bit onto her tongue. "Emphasis on the shotguns. We could use some heavy firepower."

Nick agreed with a dull hum.
Footsteps approached from behind them, and Rochelle was a little surprised to look over her shoulder and see Ellis. He was hugging his midsection awkwardly, glancing between them even when Nick didn't turn to acknowledge him. "Need any help?" he offered, quietly.

Rochelle hesitated, balked, because she'd honestly not expected the Georgian to come over. She found herself looking immediately toward Nick, and the only thing that surprised her more than Ellis intruding was what the gambler responded with.

"Yeah. Load these."

Nick pushed the sniper rifle across the floor toward him, metal scraping, and cupped his hand in the air with the couple of loose rounds he had cradled there. Ellis put his hand out, and Nick dropped the bullets into his palm without letting their fingers touch.

The mechanic dropped to a squat, lifting the sniper rifle and resting it against his knee. He set to loading the rounds, one after the other, eyes low. "You guys better keep in touch with the radio. I'll be a nervous wreck til y'all get back." he stated, quietly. "And if you catch wind'uh this other guy, Phil... come back, okay?"

"I'm not looking to make any new friends." Nick responded simply, tone flat and matter-of-fact. He took the magazine out of his Magnum and loaded it with the couple .50 cal rounds Rochelle scavenged together. "Why, you worried about us?"

He couldn't fight it; couldn't kill the idle flirtation before it started. It didn't surprise him, but he was left remorseful of the words as soon as they escaped him. Getting complacent was a surefire way to repeat his mistakes, and getting cozy with Ellis again was the last thing he wanted to do.

It was also very easy to do.

Fortunately (or unfortunately, depending on which side of the debate he landed on) Ellis breezed over the sentiment entirely, his gaze lifting to focus on Rochelle. "I'm just not lookin' forward tuh sittin' around while y'all risk yer lives. So be careful."

The woman smiled, though the tension around her eyes betrayed a quiet worry. "We'll be fine. Trust me, I get it. You haven't sat out fights much, since you're usually one of the first to go, up in the action. But you can do just as much good here, taking care of Chris and Lena, okay? Coach needs your help."

Ellis nodded, cracking a small grin. "Yeah. Ain't like I got a choice, anyhow."

"You'd be the only badass zombie killer who forgot his pants." Rochelle supplied in a cheerful tone, grinning back at him before she finished loading her pistol magazine. She grabbed the pistol from the ground and slapped the mag back in with her palm.

Slowing his movements, Ellis put his lips out in a thoughtful jut, voice thick. "I ever tell y'all 'bout the time Keith showed up tuh school with no pants?" The kid set his hand flat on the side of the rifle to hold it in place, gesticulating widely with his other hand. "He just walks right intu class, bold as can be. I mean he had undies on, but Keith's a briefs guy, so... Barely."

"Man. The teacher was flyin' off the handle, kids were hollerin' - but it weren't til I grabbed his arm and was all like 'whut the hell' that he jumps outta his seat and yells, 'I thought it was a dream!', before boltin' like a bat outta Hell."
Ellis set the sniper rifle back down, grinning gently toward the floor. "Fer like, a month, he just slept in his clothes so he knew he'd be a'ight." He scooted the rifle back toward Nick, who snatched it up and aligned it evenly with their other weapons.

With a teasing roll of her eyes, Rochelle leaned toward the Southerner. "I didn't know you had Keith stories that didn't end in bodily harm."

The young man crinkled his nose and snorted. "I mean. If we're bein' honest, the e-motional scarrin' was just as bad." He pointed at the row of guns, eyes catching on Nick's hands as he collected the few .50 cal rounds Rochelle had found and started to load them into his Magnum's magazine. "You guys should take the guns we got loaded. We'll keep quiet, won't need 'em."

Thumbing over the opening of the magazine to ensure the bullets were tightly loaded, Nick placed it into the Magnum with a hearty snap. "Agreed." he uttered, before turning the handgun around to offer the grip to Ellis. "But take it, anyway."

Ellis startled, looking at the gun and then back to Nick's face. The gambler's expression was difficult to read, flat in an almost inscrutable plane of vague annoyance. It was the plaster he used to fill in the cracks that formed on his self-control, the skin he found most comfortable.

Ellis might have said he knew what it hid, but he lacked the confidence to claim that anymore. An insecurity blurred his focus until he couldn't bring himself to keep looking. He wanted Nick to care about him. He wanted Nick to press the gun in his hand and press a kiss onto his lips, to say "Be careful, Ace." He wanted to cradle the man's face in his hands and say "You, too."

Nick's eyes flickered between his, like he could follow the thought across Ellis' expression, but he gave nothing away.

The Georgian took the gun and mumbled a soft, "Okay.", before he straightened up out of his squat. He knew Rochelle was looking at him, eyes soft and a little concerned, but she said nothing. The Magnum was still a little warm from Nick's hand, but a coolness settled in as the metal returned to its normal temperature.

He could've gotten dizzy, could've practically floated away. It was a bittersweetness that tightened his chest and threatened to topple him, but he found himself inhaling deeply and soothing the sensation away by force. He closed his eyes, then reopened them, refocused.

He felt a distant calm, watching his teammates pack up and prepare to leave. Nick shouldered the sniper rifle, and Rochelle kept her pistol. Rhiannon took the double-barrel shotgun, using the slashed zipper pocket at her thigh to hold the extra shells they'd gathered together.

With the radio attached to her jeans pocket, Rochelle led them out of the restaurant, a quiet having taken over the group.

Listening to the porch door clatter shut behind them, Ellis turned away and did the only thing that made sense: he cracked a big smile in the face of the faraway stare from Chris, the barely-there attention from Lena, and the tired look from Coach.

"Y'all wanna play a game?"
Chapter 210

Nick liked to think he could size people up.

He could sort the weak from the strong, the gullible from the intelligent. The sheep from the wolves, so to speak. He knew who he could mess with and who he'd be smarter to avoid, though he tended to ignore his own advice on that subject. He knew a mark when he saw one. Sometimes he was wrong, but he trusted his gut.

His gut had said Rhiannon was dangerous, but ultimately in over her head. He'd proven the second half right during their first meeting, from which he'd come out with the upper hand.

It was, apparently, time to affirm the first half.

They'd left the brush-axe and machete behind for Coach and Ellis, but Rhiannon had kept her baseball bat, and Nick had the katana slipped through one of the beltloops of his slacks. The weapon was wooden, but four strips of some dark metal plating had been nailed around its width at the top, twice amidst the center, and just where it thinned out to the handle. The nails holding it all together were messily done, jutting up from where they sat.

She charged up to the nearest infected standing on the street, and a guttural snarl escaped her as she took a swing that collided directly with its jaw. The zombie barely had time to lock eyes with her and growl before its head snapped cleanly to the side, a crack announcing the fracture of its neck. Its arms pinwheeled, and she lunged forward to collide her shoulder with its chest.

The creature went down, gargling, and couldn't get up. Rhee spun the bat in a quick circle, twisting her wrist, and darted for the next one. It was already running for her, but she was ready. Placing the handle's end against her palm, she fisted her other hand around the grip and jabbed it into the zombie's gut as it came within reach, letting the creature's momentum double it over.

Zombies did not react to pain in the same way a regular human would. It was not winded by the blow, and beyond the initial energy it wasted on scrabbling at the bat itself, the infected wised up and reached out to claw at her face.

She'd shrugged into her leather motorcycle jacket, and the moment the zombie swiped at her, she released the end of the bat and flung up her arm. The creature's nails dug into the leather and barely made a dent. She kicked out at its knees, forcing it to trip to the ground. The moment it landed, Rhiannon gripped the bat with both hands and bashed it into the back of the creature's head until its skull shattered, brain matter burst on the asphalt.

Two more came running, and while Rhiannon turned to face one, Rochelle lifted her pistol and snapped off a quick shot at the other. Blood burst in a spray around the lower half of its face, jaw collapsing, and it staggered a few steps before going down.

She spared a glance for Nick as she lowered the gun, a little worry laced in her gaze. It was, however, a sympathetic worry. Rhiannon was angry. The last thing she wanted was Rhiannon's anger to translate into recklessness. Nick did that enough for all of them.

"Need to get everyone some fucking weapons." the blonde muttered almost to herself, shaking her bat until the fleshy remnants of skin and brain stuck to the metal banding fell free. "Need a gun and a back-up."

Rochelle took a few long strides to catch up with her, aware of Nick close at her heels. The gambler adopted a cautious lookout, head swiveling, and used his rifle's scope intermittently to check down the road and get a better look at far-off figures. He very willfully stayed out of it.

"Did you make that?" she questioned, tone light and conversational. "The bat, I mean. It's pretty sweet."

Rhiannon didn't bother to look at her, craning her head around in a gauging motion to get her bearings. "Yeah. We found a hardware store back when shit went bad. Lee got her axe there, and I put this baby together." She tossed the bat up a few inches, catching it as it fell. "I tried barbed wire first. Got it stuck in a zombie's neck and the other ones just about fucked me."

She took off at a jog, moving with the steady calm of a predator following its prey, conserving energy and priming for the final sprint. "It was a shitty idea. They bleed out too slow, and there's always too many of them." Rochelle and Nick kept up, falling into a single-file line along the sidewalk.

The producer uttered a thin 'huh,' nodding her head in understanding. "Guess that makes sense. We've just been picking up weapons as we find them. Didn't think about modifying anything. Maybe you can help me whip something up."

"Yeah." was muttered back, though Rochelle couldn't tell how serious Rhiannon was.

They approached an intersection down the road, the streetlights all sitting dead on their wires. Two cars had collided with each other, their noses crushed up and merged in a mess of metal. A few infected wandered around the wreckage, one zombie leaned against the car's passenger door.

It snarled, bashing a fist against the vehicle's roof, anger making it lash out senselessly. None of them noticed the survivors.

"Left here." the blonde hissed before darting along the sidewalk, keeping close to the thin wooden fence lining the road. The backs of thin beach houses loomed over them, with the opposite side of the road lined with lengthy strip-mall buildings. Most of them were covered with FOR LEASE signs, though a scattered few had been inhabited.

At a glance: a chintzy souvenir shop, a fast-food seafood restaurant, and a nails and hair salon.

"Hey, Nick." Rochelle hissed over her shoulder. He looked at her with such calm obedience that she almost felt bad for making fun of him. Almost. "Need some hair-gel?"

He looked to where she pointed, recognition flickering to life in his eyes, and he sighed, a little miserably. He raked the fingers of the hand that wasn't holding his rifle through his hair, unkempt and scraggly strands hanging over his forehead. "Yes."

Rhiannon halted, dropping to a low crouch and sliding up to the side of a parked car. She didn't bother to gesture for her new teammates to follow suit, and she didn't need to. Both of them ducked to join her, and Nick narrowed his gaze upon spotting the same thing she had.

It was, to his surprise, the rest of the police zombie's squad.

There was something almost comical about the sight. Three zombies in black riot gear clustered mostly together, staggering mindlessly down the road. Whether they intentionally kept close in some animal pack instinct, or pure coincidence had kept them together, Nick wasn't sure.

"Shit." Rochelle uttered, shaking her head. "We can just avoid them. No reason to go wrestling with armoured-up zombies."
Rhiannon clucked her tongue with an eye-roll, pointing insistently. "Don't be a pussy, dude. Check out their kit." She leaned forward, tongue flashing over her lower lip. It took Nick a moment to recognize what she was referring to; the cop zombies had heavy utility belts with straps holding gear. "One of the fuckers has a baton. Couple grenades, probably flashes and smoke. Might have mace, too."

"Is... any of that really useful?" Rochelle whispered, screwing her brows up. "Against zombies? That's all riot defense, tactical weapons. We're not dealing with a riot. It's a zombie apocalypse."

The blonde laughed, just a puff of air. She thumbed at her chin in an idle scratch. "Any grenade'll catch their attention. And they're still fucking human, they can get blind and deaf just like us, it just doesn't usually stop them." She grinned over her shoulder at Rochelle, gleeful. "I saw a group of the shits chase after a little dollar store smoke bomb like it was crack. Not as good as my pipebombs, but got me out of a tight spot."

Rochelle examined her expression for a moment, and found herself nodding. The bikers had survived against fairly long odds, and it would've been short-sighted not to take their advice. She glanced at Nick, and he shrugged at her.

She took it as acquiescence.

"Long as we're careful. I'll back you guys up, just try to take them out quickly."

Hopping to her feet, Rhiannon shook out her shoulders in an eager gesture. "As long as he doesn't get in my way." She flashed a narrowed glance at the gambler, almost threatening, and he leered back.

"Won't be a problem, since you won't keep up." he snapped off, throwing his sniper rifle onto his shoulder and letting the strap dangle it against his back. He drew the katana cautiously from his belt loop, ensuring he didn't cut the fabric, and gripped it tightly in both hands. "Have fun beating them to death. For the next hour."

Rochelle gritted her teeth, fighting the urge to sigh. She had known they wouldn't get along and she'd end up being caught in the middle of their tension, but that didn't make it less frustrating. "Can you guys focus the anger on the zombies, please?"

"Gladly." Nick growled immediately, charging around them before Rhiannon could react.

He wielded his katana low at his hip, skidding out into the street. It didn't take more than that to catch the zombies' attention, and the closest one wheeled around, snarling and growling. It had lost its helmet, revealing the pallid and waxy skin of its face - which was missing most of its lower lip, like it had been torn or bitten off.

The infected howled a guttural noise, arms waving with the intensity of its fresh rage, and its kin quickly followed suit. Nick was prepared to dig his heels in, let them come to him - but Rhiannon exploded past him at a full sprint. She practically leapt, putting all her body-weight into the swing as the very top edge of the bat collided with the zombie's forehead.

The raw metal banding split skin, taking the brunt of the force of the blow. Blood gushed from the wound, thick and blackened, and the zombie staggered as if some critical damage had occurred within its skull. However, it soon reasserted its balance and lunged for her, and she dodged to the side.

As it stumbled past her, she funneled her momentum to bring the bat right around, striking it in the back of the head. The creature went down, catching itself on all fours, the body armour on its legs and arms protecting it from the asphalt.

"Gonna stand there and watch, fuckstick?" she snarled up at Nick, right before she grabbed the bat with both hands and bashed at its head until it caved in.

Nick gritted his teeth, striding forward. He met one of the other infected before it reached her, twisting his katana around and using the end of the long hilt to strike it in the front faceplate of its helmet. The hit sent it staggering back a step, giving him enough room to reorient the katana and drive it directly into the creature's neck.

The metal slid between its helmet and its body armour, slicing through the vulnerable viscera in its throat. He slanted it hard to the left in the interest of avoiding its spine, and the angle sent it slicing through flesh and artery. Not even the infected's quick-to-clot, thickened blood could resist the pressure of its own heartbeat gushing it out.

He freed the blade with a yank, dodging back. The zombie tried to continue after him, mostly unhampered by the gout of blood pouring from its jugular - but before he could react, Rhiannon was up and hitting it in the side of the head.

"Fucker!"

The fragile structure of its neck failed with so much muscle sawn in half. She didn't quite knock its head off, but its vertebrae groaned before giving way like the rotted trunk of an old tree. The zombie went down with as much life.

The two survivors turned on the last infected in unison. Had it been sustained by anything but animalistic rage, it might've made the choice to run.

One blow from Rhee's bat sent it reeling, and she lashed out a hand to grab onto its faceplate. She wrenched at the hard plastic, lifting it up off the zombie's face to bare its bloated features, and then dodged out of the way. Taking advantage of the opening, Nick hefted the katana before lunging, piercing the tip right through its clouded left eye.

He felt it break through, felt the sudden stutter of resistance as the blade sunk through and entered the cavity of its skull.

The cop zombie continued to move up til the moment he pivoted the blade, sharply raising the hilt end so the tip arced downward. A jolt passed through the infected before it dropped to the ground with little more than a meaty thud. Nick had to wiggle his katana free, prising it from the zombie's ruined eye socket.

He grimaced, sparing a glance toward the biker.

She returned the look with a deadened lift of her studded brow, like a dull 'what?'. Despite her efforts to appear aloof, he recognized the glimmer of surprise in her eyes. It matched his own.

They didn't make a terrible team, as it turned out, and she wasn't a terrible partner. The dynamic was much like her and her sister; she was the quick brawler bouncing in and out of the fray, supporting his larger, slower weapon. It worked, though it would have its limits.

If they got overwhelmed or separated, she didn't have the killing power, and he didn't have the speed. The katana was deadly, but too heavy to handle an onslaught of infected. She was fierce and her bat had stunning power, but could only kill with some time and space to move.
He shared none of these observations, instead turning away from her and examining the street they now stood on. It was empty of additional threats, it seemed, though his hearing prickled at the sounds of infected in the streets surrounding them. He watched Rochelle approach, handgun held low.

"Good work, guys." she uttered, taking to a light jog to close the distance. She stepped up to one of the corpses, leaning down to look it over. "I'd rather not toss some grenades in our pack. You think we can just take one of these belts? Keep them on there?"

Rhiannon grunted in affirmation, dropping down to her knees. She placed her bat down, reaching down to the infected corpse lying at her feet. She gripped onto the utility belt strapped around the riot policewoman's waist, wrestling it unlatched. She used the toe of her boot to kick the corpse over, rolling it off the belt as she pulled it free.

Straightening with the belt gripped in her hand, dangling loosely, Rhiannon tore from the straps a slim baton. The weapon was about the length of her forearm, and she flipped it a little in her hand. The motion was slow and weighty, the object heavier than she seemed to anticipate. "Huh. Shit isn't what I -"

Interest sparked over her face, right before her thumb shifted on the grip, and a flash of light lit over the tip of the baton. The joy in her expression was unbridled, and nothing Nick had ever expected to witness. The odd, snapping sound of electricity preceded her cackling.

She whipped around, lifting the stun baton over her head and letting it snap and hiss just a second longer before she released the switch on the handle. "Oh, fuck yes." she blustered in a tone of voice just approaching a moan. "This is my shit. You can borrow my bat, Rochelle, because this is my new boyfriend. I am gonna fuck some zombies' day up."

Rochelle covered her mouth, stifling laughter. She tried to focus on retrieving the slim canister grenade from the corpse lying near her. "Watch it, Nick. You probably shouldn't run your mouth at her anymore, unless you wanna be a test dummy for that thing."

Nick's mouth popped open in protest, but Rochelle corrected herself.

"Actually, nevermind. Run it. Please."

The look on his face soured when Rhiannon let out a sneering and self-satisfied chuckle, and he glared down at the corpses of the three riot police at their feet. He sighed, loudly, dropping down to cautiously examine and pry free the cylindrical grenade hooked on one's belt. It had an odd, latticed appearance, with large holes cut out along the center of the casing.

Text along the rim identified it as a stun grenade, along with a few serial numbers that meant nothing to him.

He didn't know much about the equipment, but he knew enough to know it wasn't a harmless flash of light. He liked having all five digits attached to his hand, and had no intention of holding it for longer than necessary. If a grenade were going to go off in someone's hand, he wasn't about to let it be his.

"Why I get stuck with the fucking Dixie Chicks is beyond me," he muttered. "Can we get this over with?"

Having both of his teammates break into satisfied laughter was the last thing he wanted.
Chapter 211

A small billboard stared down at Nick, prominently displaying a cartoonish black-and-white bird with an uncomfortably toothy grin. Broad font wrote out 'Magpie Gun & Pawn', and an address was listed as 'on the intersection of 7th Avenue and Prawn Street.' That, obviously, meant nothing at all to him. He barely knew what street they were currently on.

"Jesus. The fuck is this town's obsession with birds?" he groaned, putting his hand over his eyes to shade it from a cloudless sky.

At his elbow, Rochelle stifled a laugh before kneeling down. She set the backpack hanging off her shoulder down on the ground, unzipping one of the side pockets with a yank. "Nick, chill." she hushed off-handedly, before digging into the satchel.

Rhiannon padded up to her, spinning her baton with the wristwrap attached around her forearm. "What're you looking for?" she muttered, nosily leaning in to look over the other woman's shoulder.

"Well..." Rochelle explained with a grin. "In our last base, I found this town guide." It took her a moment to dig the small booklet out, flapping it a few times like a fan next to her face. "I almost didn't grab it when we left, but I thought it might come in handy. There was a map, though... I don't know how thorough it is."

Opening up the booklet as Rhiannon dropped to a crouch beside her, Rochelle thumbed to the very end. There were a few different maps of different sections of Tybee, divided up in sections and only inconsistently labeled. Rochelle squinted down at the book, carefully chewing her lower lip.

"Do you recognize anything?" she muttered, thumbing carefully on the page. "Most of the smaller roads aren't labeled here. There are numbers for a key, though..." She tapped her thumbnail on the left side, where a rectangular box contained store and locale names helpfully numbered from 1 to 30. The map was dotted with matching labels.

The blonde biker leaned in closer, using a pinky to point to where number 23 sat on the map. "That's base."

Rochelle confirmed the number on the key, exhaling with a surprised laugh as it read 'Sunset Café'. In the same moment, she was disappointed to find that their target, Magpie Pawn, was not on the list. Pawn shops weren't the most common of tourist destinations, she supposed.

"Okay, cool. I was counting intersections on the way here, and we should be -" Pausing, she used her index finger to trace the path they'd taken, ending in a vague circle around the road they'd landed on. "- about here. Yeah?"

The blonde nodded warily, but seemed unconvinced.

Nick spun on his heel and tossed a hand up. His voice raised, expressing the doubts she likely shared, judging by the way she crossed her arms and looked tautly at Rochelle. "How is any of this helpful? If we don't have an actual map, where we are is useless."

Undaunted, Rochelle placed a palm on the page in a light pat. "No, no, hear me out. These roads are almost all grids. And if there's a 7th Ave, that means it's probably next to 6th and 8th, right? All we need is to find a numbered street and figure out which way is up, and then we're golden."

Nick stared her down, squinting his eyes slowly. His voice adopted a dull mockery, enunciating each and every syllable in an exaggerated fashion. "So... We just need to find it. And then we're good. Because we found it."

Rolling her eyes, Rochelle jumped to stand. "Don't be a bitch." She aligned her hand with the crosshatch of roads, vertically and then horizontally. "They should be one of these sets. If we can just get on the right system..." Suddenly turning, Rochelle darted up the road, retracing their steps and dodging over the corpses they'd left in their wake.

Rhiannon hadn't had the opportunity to use her stun baton. Nick - entirely out of spite - was intent on taking the chance from her, and had renewed his efforts to take point. Although she wished she didn't, Rochelle found Nick's pettiness a little funny. He was nothing if not committed.

Between his sudden energy and Rochelle wielding the bat and joining the fray, the biker barely managed to get licks in. Though, they'd also avoided much zombie attention at all. It should have been a relief, but it was mostly worrisome. It felt like the calm before the storm whenever it was quiet.

Stepping out into the T-bone intersection they'd taken to get there, Rochelle looked up at the dangling streetlights and pointed to the thin green signs hanging there. The one facing them - labeling the road running perpendicular to where they stood - was 'Triton Street.' Rochelle cocked her head, looking for the one that would label the street the billboard was located on.

It was nowhere to be found. She noticed the small hinges still dangling free off the cabling, but the sign itself was not there.

Her eyes immediately dropped, looking around, but the green rectangle of metal was not on the ground, either. Crawling around looking for it under the garbage and gore piled on the street seemed ill-advised, so, she pinched her lips and strode ahead, squinting down the road.

Another intersection was only a few blocks away, and just a couple zombies wandered across the length of the road. She couldn't see road signs at a glance, but it was their next best shot. They needed, more than anything, to secure a load of fresh ammunition. It was the last loose end between them and some security.

Chris' convalescence was not truly over, after all, and Lena's had only begun.

"Let's run down there." she muttered, unsurprised when Rhiannon pushed past her and strode down the road.

The blonde rotated her arm in its socket, stretching, footsteps turning aggressive as an infected came scrambling from around a crashed car. She got a two-handed grip on her baton, squaring off with the female now charging at her. Eagerness bled into her posture, excited at the chance to draw blood with her new weapon.

Nick only just convinced himself that it wasn't worth the bullet it would cost to snipe off the infected before it reached her. Even if her face would be goddamn hilarious.

Instead, he reluctantly watched her come up on the infected, using the baton to strike it directly in the face. It staggered wide, arms pinwheeling, but recovered as soon as its feet hit the asphalt. The creature spun to face her, snarling and spitting out the cracked remnants of broken teeth.

Rhiannon smoothly jabbed the baton out, tip sinking into the flesh just above its sternum, where a bloodied V-neck shirt bared waxy skin. She grinned ferociously, right before thumbing the switch and activating the electricity.
The response was immediate. There was no dramatic flailing or throwing of sparks; just a stiffening of the zombie's body, right before it fell to the ground, stiff as a board. She followed it, keeping the stun baton in full contact until it thudded to the street. As it landed, she released the button, and stomped her boot heel into the creature's skull.

Something crackled, and the infected was left writhing its legs, upper body oddly immobile.

"Oh, sweet mama, that felt fuckin' amazing. That is better than an orgasm." the blonde blustered out in a moan, gripping her baton tightly, almost hugging the weapon. "You are my -"

She did not finish the sentence before a flood of infected came bolting out from an alleyway. Her voice had likely drawn them, and they charged out en masse, too many to count at a glance. She dropped back a step, fear pushing her into a defensive posture, preparing for the onslaught.

It was a little like she'd forgotten she had back-up, judging by the surprise in her eyes when Nick and Rochelle came in at a sprint, skidding to her sides. The producer raised the bat with a test swing, voice raising. "Might be a good time for that shotgun, girl!"

Rhiannon jammed the baton under her arm, reaching up to yank Coach's double-barrel shotgun off her shoulder and into her hands. She charged forward, meeting the group of infected with both barrels - one, and then the other, pulling the triggers asynchronously.

Nick had the maddening feeling of irritation at the idea Coach had taught her how to use it. He wished the thought never crossed his mind, because there was no explanation for the sensation except raw jealousy. Like she'd stolen something that should've been his; stolen a moment he hadn't realized had meant something to him.

It was childish. She wasn't the reason he'd become estranged from his teammates.

He funneled his anger into a slash that very nearly disemboweled a zombie deeply enough to spot its spine as it toppled to the ground. He grimaced down at it, but the next one was on him too quickly to allow for introspection. Focus, Nick, Jesus.

Rhiannon flung the shotgun to dangle at her side by the shoulder strap, now that its two shells had been spent. Rather than take the time to reload it, she grabbed her baton from under her arm and jumped into the fight, the heavy-duty metal landing damaging strikes. The infected were many things, but invulnerable was not one of them.

They could survive grievous wounds, but not head wounds or broken necks. Though they weren't truly the living dead, aiming for the head seemed just as effective as fiction claimed. They could clot fast enough with their gritty black blood to last through cuts and gashes and lost limbs, but their nervous system was fragile.

Rochelle hit an infected so hard in the jaw with the banded bat that the skin split open to reveal a mandible unseated from its joint, all grey skin and grisly fat. It merely shook out its head, unhinged mouth flapping, undeterred by the damage.

Then Nick struck out, thrusting the tip of his blade through that open maw and through the soft palate of the roof of its mouth. The tip of the blade struggled to penetrate the bony structures beyond, and he had to twist with both hands. He more likely hit spine than brain, but whatever he hit sent the zombie sagging to the ground.

All three of them tore through the small horde, spiraling around one another, like the gears of some fell machine that ground and churned. They left blood and slumped bodies behind, and as the last infected fell, Nick was struck by a surreal kind of self-awareness.

It was not the first time, nor would it be the last.

*It's like when you're sitting in some crazy dream, and out of nowhere you go 'Oh, fuck. I'm dreaming. Why didn't I realize I was dreaming back when that elephant in a suit sold me a Lambo? How did it take me this long?' except I haven't gotten to that part yet."

I'm still sitting here, goddamn katana in my hands and intestine on my shoe, thinking 'Yeah. This seems about right.'

He shook the gore off the toe of his dress shoe and turned to face his teammates. Both women were recovering, alert for movement from the corpses around them - but their attention was directed toward the ground, and they did not notice the flash of limbs from a rooftop across the street.

Nick's eyes darted to follow it, and as it settled into a leer over the edge of the roof, he recognized the string-bean limbs attached to a bloated midsection. The creature was topped by a sputtering fountain of neon green liquid, flowing and scattering in dripping globs.

"Acid!" left him in a shout, and he leapt into a sprint that carried him down the road and behind a white panel van. He was aware of bodies behind him, but all he could focus on was escaping the oncoming blast. His leg protested, clenching, like the very muscle itself cringed in fear of the hiss and sizzle.

He hit the rear edge of the van at a full run, catching a hand on the edge to stop his momentum. It mostly slung him into the side of the vehicle, rocking it with the force that he slapped into it, and he slid along the surface to make room for his teammates.

The Spitter must've been tracking him, because the two women hadn't even made it to safety when a wet splatter struck the other side of the van. The wheezing and huffing of the creature recovering from the expulsion of its acidic bile was audible even at that distance. Even louder, however, was the snarl of a Hunter somewhere in the same direction.

Nick tightened his grip on his katana, glancing sideways at Rochelle as the producer came suddenly pushing against his side. The contact was warm, and he might've found a comment to make, had circumstances been different. He settled on an internal pleasure, and gestured behind them and through the van with one hand.

He meant to speak, to warn them of the Hunter lingering somewhere nearby, when Rochelle shoved him.

It was a cheap shot, he determined, and he'd been caught off balance. That was the only excuse for the fact that he was so easily pushed out of the way, crashing down to his knees and palms on the asphalt. If he'd been prepared for it, she'd never have gotten him off his feet. She'd also never have lived to tell the tale, had he not quickly realized why.

From the top edge of the van, acid dribbled down. It must've pooled on the top of the van and spilled over. Had he remained where he was, it would've fallen down over his head and his shoulders. The very idea made his skin crawl, and he scattered a thin look up toward Rochelle as he righted himself.

She didn't seem particularly self-satisfied. She was mostly still shaking off a look of horror, like she was imagining it herself.

"I can't tell where it is." Rhiannon hushed, crouching beside the cabin of the van. She had the baton gripped tightly in her hands, wringing it in a slow and practiced rotation. The Hunter growled again, but it had moved, now echoing from their right. "Little fuckshit's crawling around."

Carefully turning to peer through the van's windows, looking through the interior and out into the street, Rochelle shook her head. "I don't see it - I think it's circling." she whispered back, stretching down a hand toward Nick blindly, offering him help up. "Let's just hang here a minute. Wait it out."

Nick ignored the portion of his brain that wanted to push her hand aside, and instead grabbed up his katana from the ground where he'd dropped it, and used his free hand to grab hers. He got to his feet in a shove, quickly releasing himself from her grip in favour of dusting off his knees.

"So it can get the perfect angle to jump us?" he growled, quietly, glancing just once at his palm and the subtle rasp of a friction burn from the sidewalk. "Not good." Despite his protest, he did not make an effort to leave. He pressed back toward the van, avoiding the puddled acid, even though it was dulling to a dark green and the sizzling was slowing to a quiet pop.

They waited, breath held, Nick's attention to the left of the vehicle and Rhiannon staring to the right. Rochelle split the difference, peering through the van windows and intermittently glancing to either side. There was an eerie silence, as if their focus made it quiet down.

It was a matter of patience, and felt like a contest of who would break first.

While the mutated zombies may have had elevated intelligence, they maintained the rage of their more common counterparts. The Hunter, it seemed, couldn't resist attacking, even though waiting for them to bolt out from the van would've been the tactically superior move.

When it suddenly came crawling around the nose of the van, it was clear that tactics hadn't factored in.

It screamed, howled, and all the tightly wound energy in every fibre of its musculature came flying loose. It pounced on Rhiannon, hooking clawed fingers into her jacket at the shoulders and landing the toes of its ruined sneakers into her midsection. It rode her to the ground, their bodies tumbling.

The blonde looked pale as she fell, eyes wide with adrenaline and fear, and Nick couldn't help but notice the feral energy there. He had the time to feel a little bad for the Hunter as he noticed the stun baton pressed just under its chin, trapped between them.

They landed hard, skidding to a stop, and the Hunter raised its arms, intent on lashing out at her. It seemed to aim for her throat, trying to slit it with one good slash of its ragged talons. She didn't even flinch, thumb squeezing on the baton's trigger.

This time, there was a crack and snap - but rather than that of electricity popping, it was the sound of the Hunter's jaw slamming shut so hard it must've broken teeth or bitten right through its tongue. Its body seized, twisting hard to the side as the taser arced the high-amperage current directly through its neck.

Rhiannon followed it, rolling to her knees in a straddle on the slight creature, gripping both hands on the stun baton to keep it jammed where it was. The Hunter lashed out in inconsistent jerks, but kept catching nails in her leather jacket rather than find purchase in her skin.

Her eyes snapped to the side, darting for Nick. The gesture was clear enough even without her saying a word: she couldn't necessarily kill it with the stun gun alone, and if she released it, the Hunter might regain the advantage. All she could do was immobilize it.
While it was tempting to make her ask, Nick didn't want to be the one who stood there and watched her get a claw to the face.

So, he lunged forward, katana readied in his grip. She leaned as far back as she could without losing her grip on the baton or surrendering its place tight into the creature's jugular, freeing Nick to slash down with the blade right into the center of its stricken, grey face.

Its features split, skin raw where it sundered from the blow. Nick was sure he saw straight into a broken nasal cavity, inflamed flesh clung tight to bone, and he averted his eyes before the details could quite sear themselves into his mind's eye. He looked up instead, watching Rhiannon slowly withdraw her baton.

She was panting, jaw slack, and he suddenly saw something new in her eyes.

Weakness.

He'd seen surrender, but it had always been stubborn and spiteful. He'd seen pain, but that of a wild animal's. He'd never seen raw and fragile weakness, like she had nothing left, not even anger. She was empty, and made no effort to disguise it. It was an emotion he could understand, but his understanding was a selfish feeling that mostly stewed into self-pity.

The urge to feel real sympathy came, but Nick couldn't summon any. He exhaled harshly, and faked it.

"C'mon, kid. Up." He reached out, tucking a hand under her elbow. She stiffened, and he almost thought she was going to shake him off, ferociously reject the assistance. She disappointed him, and let him haul her to her feet. Her chin lowered to reject any eye contact, a frustrated clench at her jaw.

He let her go once she'd straightened, turning away, aware of Rochelle watching him closely. If he'd cared to, he might've tried to read her expression. He didn't. Instead, he pointed down the road at the next intersection.

The road didn't have streetlights, so the road signs were not hung from cabling. These were on a post at the corner of the sidewalk, and he could just barely read it from that distance. "Doesn't that say -"\n
Quick as lightning, Rochelle was darting forward. Her energy gave her teammates no choice but to follow, or be left behind. "4th Ave!" As she said it, she turned a beaming grin back at Nick. "Told you, ya big loser."

Nick couldn't stop a strangled snort, brows screwing up. Her enthusiasm reminded him of Ellis, and the thought didn't sour his mood like it should have.

"Keep your panties on, doll. We ain't found shit yet."
Ellis put both hands on his knees, leaning in, seated on the edge of the chair he'd dragged over. His eyes were squinted, focused, and he rolled his jaw in a thoughtful gesture. He was silent for a few moments, under the stare of all three of his companions - including Lena.

She'd awoken, and though she was essentially immobile, she'd propped herself up on a lump of blankets and had a sightline around the room. Her attention was vague and glazed with pain, but being alert was better than nothing.

It was with a dramatic flare of his fingers that Ellis finally nodded.

"Okay." he stated, calmly. "Here goes."

The Georgian gripped his cap and raised the bill away from his face, the hat tipping back. With his eyes unshaded, he put up a fist - then extended his thumb. "I ain't never eaten a waffle." His index finger uncurled next. "I once burned muh eyebrows off at a Midnight Riders concert." His middle finger joined the others. "I spent a whole week in a haunted house."

Proudly, he sat back, crossing his arms with a heavy lounge against the back of the chair. Chris immediately looked toward Coach where he leaned against the wall, but the heavyset survivor lifted his hands. "I ain't givin' no hints, boy, you on yo' own."

The Spaniard grimaced, gesturing limply with his hand as he protested loudly. Between him and Lena, the haze of opiates over the conversation made Ellis feel a little like he was babysitting drunk friends. "It is no fair! We are new. How do I know those things?"

Ellis tipped his chin up, a helpful and understanding tone to his voice. "That's okay. See, you don't know much 'bout us, but we don't know nothin' 'bout y'all either. By the end, we'll all know more." He was undaunted by Christophe's perturbed expression, and flapped a hand dismissively. "C'mon, you can't pout 'til you try it. Whut's the lie?"

A few stuttered sounds of protest escaped the man, mindlessly grabbing at his waist. He almost surrendered to the game, sighing breathily with legitimate reticence. "Ah... Vale, vale, si quiere." The man's honey brown eyes darted between Ellis' lips and his eyes as if hunting an answer. He found nothing, and merely shook his head. "You Americans have too much breakfast. I do not believe this."

Despite himself, Ellis huffed a laugh, leaning closer to the other man. His eyes twinkled with humour, and he shook his head back. "Too much breakfast? Whut's that?"

Patiently settling a hand on his belly, Coach inserted, "You ask me, all other meals oughta have more breakfast in 'em."

The statement drew a wiry, cracked laugh from Lena, sputtering a pained sound just as soon as she'd exhaled. Ellis was a split-second from leaping up to check on her, but the dark-haired biker blinked away tears and spoke first. "I miss eggs. Could go for a big omelette."

Ellis smiled at her, slowly settling back completely in his chair. Her tone was wistful, and saddened in a way that made him yearn to hug her. He only resisted the urge by reminding himself the gesture would probably hurt her more than anything else. "You'n'me both." He lifted a hand and waved it amongst his teammates. "C'mon. The rest'uh y'all gotta answer."
Sighing wearily, Coach placed a hand under his chin, scrubbing at the dense facial hair thickening around his mouth. "I don't think no one goes to no Riders concert and comes out intact, so that's not it. An' I'm wit' Chris. You a Georgia boy, and you ain't had a waffle? You tellin' me you ain't ever eaten an Eggo, boy?"

The younger Georgian grinned in a thoroughly unhelpful manner.

Lena closed her eyes, quietly murmuring past the hitches and sighs her weakened body was wracked with. "I-... I don't buy a week in a haunted house." She shook her head in a minute gesture. "What haunted house is - even open for a week? Sounds like bull-honky."

Ellis merely tipped his head, looking so sublimely pleased with himself that it only took a few beats for Chris to bleat out a sigh. "Chico, por favor, ¡desembuche!"

The young man laughed and lifted his hands, palms out as if to defend himself from an oncoming attack. "Okay, okay... Fine." He lowered his chin to peep out from under his trucker cap. A glint of mischief made him bite his lower lip. "I dunno whut to tell y'all. Muh mama always made pancakes, 'n' that's all I ever ate."

A sincere uproar of disbelief had Coach's hands going up. "Son, that is a damn travesty. I have never been disappointed in you before right this damn minute."

Affection bled into the words, leaving Ellis to grin bashfully. He focused entirely on the first portion, putting his knuckles against his chin. "Aw. Not even when I set that car alarm off that one time, pushin' Nick?"

Coach chuckled, barking out the sound, and shook his head. "You mean when you used Nick's head to set off that car alarm? That was the proudest I ever been of yo' goofy ass." He thumbed at his mouth as Ellis burst into a pleased chorus of laughter. "Might take me some time to get over this no waffles shit, though."

Clearing her throat with a wince, Lena let a half-smile play at her lips and croaked out, "Dish on the haunted house, dude."

At that, Ellis eagerly gripped a hand on his jaw and whistled, low and soft. "Aw, man, that ain't nothin'. Muh buddy Keith's grandma's house was haunted real good. That shit was built hundreds'uh years ago, man, you couldn't take a step without gettin' haunted. Weird sounds, chills, lights flickerin' - you name it. So this one time, this big ol' storm knocked the power out in our neighborhood, 'n'we stayed at her place fer like a week and a half. Just lucky they weren't like, angry ghosts."

There was not a trace of belief anywhere on Lena's pinched expression, but she exhaled an admirably non-committal sound before uttering, "Oh. Thought you - meant Halloween."

Scratching at the few patches along his jawline doing their best to grow out facial hair, Ellis snorted. "Nah." A spark suddenly appeared in his expression, thoughtful. "Aw, man. I wonder if all this means there won't be no more Halloweens."

Coach couldn't help but laugh, shaking his head. "Sorry, son. Probably so. I ain't keen on any of that spooky shit after livin' through it, myself." He rounded on the young Spaniard perched on the closest edge of the bench, lifting his eyebrows pointedly. "A'ight. Who's next?"

There was a little force in his gaze, face tightening as he could tell Christophe didn't want to play along. The Spaniard was tired and in pain, and he knew that, but a game to pass the time was a small price to pay to give Ellis something to smile about. It was good for all of them.

He might've engaged in an all-out battle of wills with the ex-Angel, had Lena's quiet voice not broken in. "I'll go." she almost whispered, hazel eyes wide and gentle.

Ellis had to resist the urge to clap, turning and giving the woman every ounce of his focus. "Aw, hell yeah!" He waved encouragingly, urging her on, looking pleased as punch at the ready volunteer. "Two truths and a lie, girl. I bet I got you pegged already."

Christophe looked mostly relieved at having the pressure of Coach's stare removed, but the injured man did pay genuine attention as she chewed her lip thoughtfully. The bikers were fairly mysterious, after all, and he couldn't resist the chance to learn something new. It only took her a moment to settle on what to say, and she nodded.

"I used to be a vegetarian." The words took effort, and every few syllables there was a small hitch as she had to take in a breath, like she were only using a portion of her lung capacity. "I have a dog back home that comes up to my hip - and I've never had a boyfriend."

Ellis blinked, unable to stop his expression from faltering a little in thought. He couldn't help but grab onto that statement, turning it over in his head. Maybe he was overthinking it, and maybe it was as simple as it seemed, but an obvious conclusion landed in his lap: she'd never had a boyfriend because she'd only had girlfriends. If he was wrong, he might embarrass her - or himself. If he was right...

He wasn't really sure what he'd do if it were true. He just knew he felt a longing, a quiet curiosity.

Chris bolted out a laugh that outright startled Ellis, rubbing down the bare plane of his side. "You are messing. You, sin novio? ¡Eres demasiado guapa! There is no way." The biker tried to laugh as he went on, pain fluttering over her face as her body shook with the effort, and a smile pulled at her lips and didn't fade. "I do not have the fingers anymore to count the chicos who must be in love with you."

"Aww." she mumbled, appreciatively. Her fingertips reached up to brush at her mouth when a cough shortly wracked her, as if nervous to find wetness there. "You're - you're sweet."

The Spaniard huffed in protest, and looked over to his teammates as if searching for support. Ellis blinked back, at a loss, mouth gawping a few times. Coach lifted a brow, releasing a grumbled hum, before offering up, "I've seen some big damn dogs. What I ain't seen is a damn vegetarian from Texas. Girl, you tellin' me your pop let yo' ass skip steaks? Y'all kids and y'all damn food bullshit."

Lena managed a demure tilt of her mouth. "Dad was a lot of things. Not a dictator."

Attention moved, naturally, to Ellis, as the last to give an answer. Putting both hands on his cheeks, Ellis took a moment to squash his face in a massage, puffing out air in an awkward attempt to look like he was thinking. He started to speak, but his lips had not fully popped open before a crackle of static sounded suddenly at his feet. He jumped, before remembering he'd set the radio there.

"Hey." It was short and flat, and garbled as it was, Ellis only recognized it as Nick by the annoyed cadence.

"Uh, one sec." the Georgian muttered, dipping down to grab the radio. The flash of relief at hearing from the other half of his team was outweighed quickly by a vague nervousness; he'd not yet gotten used to the newfound peace between him and Nick. He quickly got the radio in his hands,
Nick's response was immediate, almost cutting into the last few syllables of Ellis' statement, the radio chirruping aggressively. "Checking in. We found the pawn shop. Shouldn't be that long back, just calling to -"

Another voice interrupted abruptly, sing-song, and so loud that it crackled through the radio and almost pitched out of audibility. "To talk about how much of a rockstar I am." There was shuffling and scratching, like the radio were being wrestled with. "Oh, yeah, baby. Rochelle saving the day - beauty, brawn, and brain, all in one. I am accepting all praise, starting n-"

The audio clicked off abruptly. Ellis was left to stare down at it in bemusement, stifling a laugh with a bitten tongue. He glanced up at his teammates with an embarrassed pinch to his brows. "Uhm. Least they're havin' an okay time out there."

Chris crossed his arm over his chest, curling his fingers into a fist. "Nico sounds angry." he observed, simply, golden-brown eyes flashing across Ellis' face, suddenly clear and alert.

Ellis gave a heavy shrug, expression dulling with a 'duh' plastered over the look. "Huge surprise, man. Least Ro's keepin' him under control." Chris practically swooned at the statement, a quiet affirmative noise escaping him. Trying to keep a straight face, Ellis lifted the radio to his face and spoke into it cautiously, rather than wait. "Okay. Y'all keep safe. Everything is fine down here."

It took long enough to get a response that Ellis almost put the radio back down. He was struck by the image of Rochelle and Nick fighting over the radio like school-children, and couldn't decide how he felt about it. He wasn't jealous, and he wasn't upset with her. He knew well enough that Rochelle was mad at Nick on his behalf, and it didn't do any of them any good to harp on it.

Being actively hostile to each other was only going to risk actual danger. The apocalypse didn't have much room for pettiness.

"Roger." spat back through the radio, Nick's voice full to the brim with agitation. The word caught Ellis by surprise, brows going up with a startled laugh. He choked back the sound as quickly as he could, reflexively looking up. Coach was eyeing him, a dubious and knowing pinch to his face.

Ellis felt his cheeks blanch a little, eyes darting to the ground. He felt guilty, like he'd done something wrong, and quickly sighed out a breath. "Uh. Anyway - I'm with Coach, I guess." he managed. He lost the confidence to go with his gut, ducking down in his chair, vastly preferring staying under the radar. "You sure didn't look guilty eatin' that Spam earlier."

Coach beamed, slapping his thigh in an eager gesture. "I knew it. I know a red-meat-eatin', good Southern girl when I see one."

The biker lifted a hand very delicately, spreading her fingers. A wistful energy touched her expression, but she still smiled. "Big ol' Great Dane named Wrecker. Worst thing he ever did was wreck Rhee's shoes, though." Her hand dropped, lying flat against her hip, and she closed her eyes with a sigh. "At least I know he's keeping dad safe."
Christophe blustered out a bewildered, "Dios. You are serious? How?" He thrust his hand in her direction, tone bordering on legitimately upset. For all his disinterest in the game, he now seemed almost overly invested. Ellis couldn't decide if it was a competitive streak, or simply frustration at being wrong. "Not one boyfriend? I do not believe this, ni por un momento."

Stretching out a foot to kick his ankle, Ellis soothed out, "Chris, leave her alone." He felt a sudden drive to cover for her, to stop the Spaniard from pressing the issue, an urge he couldn't completely explain. He kept his gaze away from the woman, insistently overriding Chris' attempt to respond. "Maybe she just don't like datin'. I knew a girl once who just didn't wanna date no-one. I -"

With a little chime of laughter, Lena placed a palm over her mouth. "I'm lesbian, dude." she interrupted, smooth... except for the crack in her breath at the end that sunk her into a small coughing fit, body clenching up and legs curling just a degree.

Chris floundered, mouth moving like a fish gasping for air, trapped out of water. "Oh. Oh. I -" It was the first time Ellis had ever really seen him at a total loss, stammering for words. "I - no quise decir - I mean -" He might've outright blushed, had the woman's coughing not spiralled into almost a wretch, startling him. "¿Chica?"

Coach didn't waste a second, launching away from his position against the restaurant wall. He strode up to the table, getting one hand on her shoulder, tone soothing. "Easy, girl, easy." He rubbed a thumb into the divot of her clavicle, massaging in a tiny circle.

It took her a moment to get her breath back under control. Her coughs were rattled, and wet. It sounded like the phlegmy exhale of a pneumonia patient, but there was a wheeze to it like her lungs struggled to manage. Her eyes met Coach's, and the mirth that had glinted in her eyes quickly faded, swapping with a kind of fear.

"Easy." he repeated, lifting his hand to carefully catch her wrist and pull her hand away from her mouth. He was unsurprised to find a smear of blood across her palm and dampening her lips. A sigh escaped him, worry darkening his voice. "Ellis - go get a cloth from the kitchen."

Ellis bolted obediently, scrambling off his chair and toward the bar. "Right." he practically shouted as he went.

Chris put his hand on his chest, leaning in toward the table and cocking his head to catch a glimpse at Lena's face. "Ay, pobrecita. You okay?" When she managed a nod, face pale and fear wild across her eyes, Christophe pursed his lips. He reached out to rest his hand against her elbow. "Te tenemos." he promised, and a lack of comprehension didn't stop Lena's expression from softening a little at his tone.

The brunette gave a slow sigh - more like a leak than an exhale, eyelids fluttering shut. She swallowed, and nausea followed the gesture. "My frickin' luck, right?" she whispered. "All the ways to die out here, and I pick the slow way."

Sharply, the ex-football player bent down, voice chastising. "Girl, don't talk like that. We gonna get you through this."

Her bloodied lips twitched up, and her voice became faint, like it barely mustered the strength to pass beyond her teeth. "Don't think you got much say in that, Coach." She fidgeted her fingers just enough to shoo him off, and he set her hand back down, releasing her wrist reluctantly. "Nice to - ugh, to... have friends, though. Don't let Rhee chase you off, okay? Please..."

Coach watched her, worry caramelizing to outright anxiety on his face, warily flicking a glance toward Christophe. The young man shook his head, slowly, silent, and the heavyset survivor lowered his voice to a hush. "You just quit worryin'. Let me worry. You rest, a'ight?"

Lena mumbled some non-committal sound, attention drifting off as her eyes flickered under their lids.

Ellis was scrambling back in, footsteps slapping on the tile of the kitchen, and Coach took advantage of the moment before he returned to pull the blankets away from her - just enough to glimpse her bared midriff, where her skintight black-and-grey jogging shirt had ridden up. The blood pooling around her midsection had deepened, darkened. The purple and red had intensified until it was almost black, and he grimaced, before carefully returning the blankets to their original position.

He could feel Chris watching him, but said nothing. There was nothing to say. Admitting that he had no hope, no confidence, wouldn't do any good. All it would do was scare his teammates and weaken his own resolve. If stubbornness and denial was all he had, then at least he had something.

Denial, and a prayer, if those even worked anymore.
"Come on. Say it." Rochelle insisted, loudly.

Nick grabbed at the air, miming grasping a rope. He looped it in his hands and neatly ducked his head into the imaginary noose. After he'd pretended to settle it comfortably around his neck - he drew it taut with a yank upwards. His tongue lolled out, complete with a short and dramatic choking sound. "Aaghk!"

"Somebody can't admit when they were wrong." the woman sang out, knuckling both hands against her hips and leaning in to squint into his face. "Come on, you big dumb lug. Just once, I wanna hear you say it. You were wrong. I was right." She jerked her chin up at the pale two-story building rising before them, all waxen stucco and slats of white vinyl siding. The broad window making up the front face of it was tinted, and a partially peeled sign was taped onto the outside: 'Magpie Gun & Pawn.'

It was a plain looking establishment, but the outside was clean and maintained, encircled by trimmed shrubbery. The parking lot was gravel and sand, and heavily used, if the deep tire tracks criss-crossing it thickly were any indication.

"Gurhhk." Nick sputtered back, lifting his hand as if to tighten the noose.

The gesture made Rochelle's eyes roll, and she tossed up a hand, looking toward Rhiannon. "Can you believe this douchebag?" The blonde bared a small grin, cocking her head. She'd remained well out of the argument, but was visibly enjoying it. "Here I am, having gotten us safely to this shop, and he can't even put his ego aside to just give me a li'l credit. Not even a word."

Exhaling heavily, Nick dropped his hand, mouth popping open. "You -"

"Oh, no." Rochelle swung her gaze back on him, jabbing a finger into his face so suddenly he had to jolt backwards from it. "You hung yourself, remember? You don't get to talk anymore. If I can't get you to admit I was right, I'm definitely not going to listen to you bitch."

It was almost defiantly that he narrowed his eyes... but he sighed, shortly, rolling his head back on his neck. "Jesus, fine. You were right. Congratulations, Magellan, you successfully navigated the streets of a small, backwater village. Your talents are miles above all the other assclowns stupid enough to get themselves lost in the apocalypse, and your ability to count up to seven is unparalleled."

Rochelle put her lips out in a pout. Before he could recoil, she patted a hand on his jaw in an affectionate gesture. "You're such a sweet-talker. I see how you get all the girls." She tried to pinch at his cheek, but he ducked back and escaped her touch before she could manage it.

The man scowled at her, wiping his cheek with the back of his hand. "And you're a goddamn treat. Can we just go, please?"

Laughing, Rochelle turned, waving over her shoulder dismissively. She stepped off the sidewalk and onto the gravel, her boots crunching on the ground-up stone, and both Nick and Rhiannon were quick to follow. "Keep an eye out, guys. I can't see in those windows to know if there's any trouble in there - seems quiet, though."

Slipping his katana under his arm, Nick pushed both his hands into his slacks pockets. He dropped his chin, glancing around the empty parking lot. "I have such fond memories of the last pawn shop we took over." he snapped, ignoring the obvious curiosity that made Rhiannon blink over at him. "Let's double-down. Ten bucks there's a Witch in there."

Rochelle accelerated into a light jog, hopping up the small set of stairs leading to the front door. She grabbed the doorknob, twisting just enough to test if it was locked or not. It turned easily, and she looked back at her teammates. "Guess we'll find out." she responded, almost cheery. The producer reached up to yank the baseball bat out of its resting place in the backpack on her shoulders. "Ready, guys?"

Falling into place behind her, Rhiannon lifted her stun baton. She reached down to her hip, brushing fingertips against the utility belt she'd buckled tight around her hips, and the two smoke grenades and flashbang dangling from the holsters sewn into it. "Let's rock and roll." she hissed.

Nick grunted an assent, and with a quick inhale, Rochelle opened the door. It was certainly dim inside, but the large window let in enough light to see. The shop was built more like a jewelry shop, with an inner set of cabinets surrounded by open carpet, and the walls lined with display cases offset by just a few feet. At a glance, she saw mostly a lot of junk.

'Junk' was, of course, relative - the contents of the shop would have likely added up to a pretty penny. Valuables, however, had little value anymore. Rochelle couldn't help but reach up and touch her earlobe. She'd abandoned her earrings long ago, the jangly hoops begging for trouble. They'd been her favourite, too.

"Wanna get a gift for your boyfriend? The Spanish one, to be clear." Nick muttered. "I bet he'd love a nice diamond necklace."

She flashed a discouraging look his way, sighing out a breath that betrayed a genuine stress. It was carefully that she strafed to the side, looking around the cabinets in the center. "Look behind those counters. I don't hear anything." she ordered, glad to see the gambler quickly obeying her.

He strode to the glass display cases lining the room, putting a palm against the metallic skeleton that held it together, and leaned up to peer over the edge. "Nothin'." he stated, simply, turning his head to watch as Rhiannon crossed to the far wall of display cases.

She shrugged, before hopping over the counter entirely.

Nick wished the glass had broken under her - but he wasn't so lucky, and she landed on her heels on the other side. "Nope. Shit-all." Straightening up and sidling up behind the register, Rhiannon reached down and opened a drawer beneath it. She started rifling through it one-handed. "There are a bunch of keys in here. You guys see any guns?"

The gambler scanned the room, noting a wide set of cabinets hanging off the far wall, behind Rochelle. Though they were shrouded in darkness and closed, they seemed of the right size for weaponry. He gestured with a flick of his hand, and Rochelle turned, quickly registering the sight.

She also noticed another feature of the room when she looked up: there was a thin shelf lining the wall, encircling the entire room, only a foot and a half below the ceiling. It caught her eye, mainly because it didn't seem very functional. There was nothing on the shelving, and it was far too high to be reachable.

The woman couldn't help but turn, following the structure with her eyes. It met with itself in the far corner, and beneath it was a staggered set of shelves. They, too, were empty, and set in a specific pattern: one in the center, and then two split below it. This configuration repeated itself all the way to the floor.
Rochelle might've taken the time to wonder at it, had she had reason to care beyond simple curiosity. Instead, she noted the door just to the left of the shelves crawling their way up the wall. "Second floor," she announced, hearing a grunt from Nick in affirmation. She slipped to the side, finding a gap between two of the display cases and shimmying through, only struggling when a beltloop on her jeans got snagged on the metal casing.

She managed, scrambling free and settling on her feet in front of the tall cabinet. She set Rhiannon's bat down on the waist-high glass case behind her, raising her hands to grip the cabinet's handles. Tugging resulted in nothing but a creak, and she carefully thumbed over the surface of the cabinet door, feeling around the handle.

It was too dark to see details clearly, but her thumbtip found the metal shape of a lock.

She reached over her shoulder, slipping her hand into the backpack on her shoulders. It only took a moment to fish out the flashlight there, and she got it turned on and flipped around, directing it at the cabinet first - and then pointing it halfway between her and Rhiannon. "Hey, this cabinet is locked. Mind bringing those keys over here?"

The blonde took just a moment before walking around the perimeter of the room, stepping up beside her with a heavy ring of keys in her hand. It was split into a few different rings, all interconnected, and one of the rings had keys labeled with a small strip of tape wrapped around the ends. They were marked on with black pen, from 1 to 20.

Ignoring them, Rhiannon flipped through the main ring of keys. There were four in total, and she gripped them all together before thumbing one free. With Rochelle holding the light, she tried it, but it immediately stuck and refused to enter. The second one immediately felt too small, though she tried it anyway. The third one sunk in with a metallic rasp.

Rhiannon twisted it with a triumphant energy, and when she grabbed the right-hand door, Rochelle grabbed the left. They opened it together, and the producer's free hand pointed the flashlight in at the contents.

The inside was structured neatly with hooks, from which hung an array of coloured locks. The key lock was connected to a loop of flexible plastic, a kind she recognized from the gunstore the Angels had led them to - the type that looped through the gun's barrel, blocking it from being loaded or firing at all. Most of them were empty.

The only one that wasn't was labeled 17, which was looped around the rack of a slim rifle. It was a little flimsy, but Rochelle reached out to grab it anyway, offering it out to the biker standing next to her. She looked away while Rhiannon focused on fishing out the matching key and getting the lock undone, and instead peered into the bottom compartment of the cabinet.

Lined up in careful rows were boxes of bullets of assorted brand and amount, organized beneath tags for caliber and size. Rochelle whistled out appreciatively, shrugging out of her backpack and setting it down on the floor between her feet. She carefully rattled off their contents as she plucked up boxes and set them into the open satchel, pleased.

"Plenty of 9 mil and shotgun shells. I don't see any for the sniper rifle, though." She prodded through the rows, ignoring some ammo she didn't recognize and a box of blanks. "Here's a box of .50 cal - just one, though. Can't have everything, huh?"

Rhiannon snorted, prying the gun lock free. She turned the rifle in her hands, examining it, and erupted in an outright laugh as her eyes alighted on it. "Um. Dude, this piece of shit doesn't have a trigger." Rochelle uttered a disbelieving sound, turning immediately to lean in and look, using her flashlight to inspect the gun. Rhiannon put her finger where the trigger should have been, wiggling it on the empty air. "No go."

"Gun and pawn my ass." Nick inserted, helpfully.

"Well." the producer uttered, taking a step back and shaking her head. She flashed an encouraging look at Rhiannon. "We... we didn't really come here for more guns, anyway, just ammo. I don't think we're in a position to repair it, even if we wanted to or... knew how."

The blonde gave her a thinly veiled look of no shit, and tossed the gun to the floor like so much refuse. She pointed in at the ammo Rochelle had rejected, waving her hand. "Don't leave that." she stated, more an order than a request, and Rochelle squinted at her. It took the biker a solid few moments to realize what it meant, and she looked almost embarrassed. "Uh. Please?"

Rochelle's expression immediately flashed to a beam, and she scooped up the boxes of ammo she'd previously ignored. A glance at the labels revealed it was buckshot and birdshot; it would work in their shotguns, but she doubted the efficacy against zombies. "Sure thing, string bean." she uttered.

The biker looked at her like she'd burst into a foreign language.

"The rest of this shit is useless." Nick announced. Rochelle turned to look at him, and found him wandering the store, peering through the display cases and cabinets. "Unless we need a waffle iron. Or, hey, a set of golf clubs."

As quick as it had come, Rhiannon's confusion turned to interest. She spun on her heel, grabbing onto the edge of the glass display case behind her and leaning in. "Clubs? How shitty? If they're sturdy, you could bash some fucking skulls in." The biker flapped her hand, insistently. "Get one out, let's take it for a test drive."

When Nick didn't react beyond grabbing the sliding door of the display case and yanking it open, the biker shifted on her feet. "... Drive. Hah." she muttered under her breath, swiping her tongue over her lower lip and letting it curl over her broken tooth.

It took Rochelle a moment to recognize the joke, and she held back a laugh when the realization struck. "Oh my god. I'm surrounded by dorks." she groaned, zipping up the backpack as she'd finished loading it with ammunition. "And for once I don't even mean Ellis."

"Har." Nick uttered, flatly.

He had no time for any other response, as a heavy thud sounded in the ceiling. They all jumped, reaching for their weapons, but only Rhiannon fully completed the motion. Wielding her stun baton low at her side, the biker stared up. All of them stood, still and silent, waiting for any other noises.

They came in the form of a crash, like something breaking. It didn't sound quite like glass - the shattering was thicker and heavier than that. A scattered few thumps, like footsteps, traced a path across the ceiling. Then: silence.

When the quiet encroached on them and did not seem likely to break, Rochelle turned her attention toward Nick, lips pinched. "Well. We got what we were looking for, right?" To prove her point, she lightly jostled the backpack dangling from one hand. "We don't have to go following every noise we hear. Why go hunting for trouble?"

The gambler arched a brow, pausing for just a moment before he started walking across the pawn shop floor and toward the door in the corner. "No offense, sweetheart, but who the fuck are you talking about? We love trouble."

She couldn't really argue.
The three survivors moved in slick single-file, creeping their way up the stairs. Rochelle was holding the flashlight high, lighting the otherwise pitch black stairway, and Nick was leading the silent - and very slow - charge.

No more noises had come from the second floor, but that didn't ease Nick’s concerns. He'd been joking about a Witch in the pawn shop, but now the thought came back to haunt him. The idea made his skin crawl and it was all he could do not to let his nerves show. He couldn't. He had to stiffen his jaw, shake it off, and take point.

A thought occurred to him, and it soothed him in a strange way - At least Ellis won't be that broken up about it if I get my head lopped off. He raised the katana in his hands and forced his breath to stay level. "Ro', keep the light up. Blondie, get ready on the door. I'll go in," he uttered in forceful instruction.

Neither of them protested, and Rhiannon slipped past him on the stairs to reach the small landing just before time door to the second floor. She pressed herself into the corner, reaching out to grab the doorknob. Her eyes darted up, body tensing as she waited for Rochelle and Nick to ready themselves.

It wasn't until Nick was poised at the door and Rochelle had the flashlight trained on the gap that she cocked her head.

"Ready, old man?" she breathed and, when he glared, yanked the door open.

He didn't burst in. There was no reason to lose the advantage afforded to them by a bottleneck and a door they could close back up, so he merely jolted into the threshold, sword held up in front of himself. His eyes struggled to find one thing to focus on, assaulted by moving shadows, lit in a ramshackle splash of yellow from Rochelle's flashlight.

There was not a single window in the small loft space, and it was thinly furnished, but packed with cardboard boxes. They were full to bursting, some with papers and folders, but others with assorted items. Dishware and silverware, stuffed animals, clothing - an observation he tucked away for later - and piles of books.

A bed sat on the far right wall, and a desk beside it. He didn't have the time to examine its contents when another detail caught his eye: kneeling beside the bed was a slumped shape. It was a person, bent down on all fours, with one arm stretched beneath the bed. There was only a few inches of space, it seemed, and whatever he was straining for was further than the distance of his arm.

He, Nick recognized. He, because he could not determine immediately whether the shape was an infected or not. It was too dark, the hunched form intensely focused on reaching his arm under the bed. It was possible, wasn't it? The owner, holed up in his shop?

Nick hesitated. He took a half-step forward, lips parting, ready to call out a warning.

Then the man's head turned, swung to face him, and yellow eyes flashed to look at him. They were pinpricks in the dark, and reflected the light shone upon them in an eerie way that shot an animal fear up Nick's spine. His fingers tightened on his weapon, and he readied it above his shoulder.
The infected howled, scrambling away from the bed and charging toward him. It struck into a pile of boxes, almost tumbling, but it caught itself with a wide stagger of feet and lunged at Nick. The gambler was ready, however, and it was simply a matter of completing the swing he'd prepared and poised for.

The blade struck just at the side of its neck, but he felt it stutter. It didn't slide through like he expected, like he'd hit on a dull section of the edge. "Shit -"

Blood guttered around the blade from where it had pierced skin, but the infected continued on unimpeded. It lashed out both hands, one gripping Nick's bicep, the other tangling fingers in his shirt. The zombie staggered into him, and the weight of it nearly sent Nick stumbling back into the stairwell. Rather than risk him or one of his companions falling down the stairs in the struggle, Nick snarled and fought back.

He twisted on his heel, leading with his shoulder to charge into the infected in kind. The creature was less interested in defending its balance than it was on doing damage - and as Nick shoved it back a few steps, its teeth snapped in his face, nails digging into his arm enough to shoot pain through the limb.

Nick was forced to recoil to stop those yellowed teeth from finding purchase on his cheek, but he'd gained himself enough space that he was able to jolt a few steps backward.

Drawing the katana low and shifting his grip on it, Nick thrusted. Where the edge had failed him, the point speared straight through its midsection. He yanked it down, applying his weight, and the blade split the creature from its bellybutton to the top of its pelvis. It screamed and lashed out an arm, striking him in the head with its forearm.

The blow landed across his ear, snapping his head to the side, and his vision swam with it, dizzied. He staggered backwards, unsheathing the katana from its belly as he moved, and a blackened sludge poured from the wound as it tried to advance on him. He raised his arm in a reflexive attempt to defend himself.

It wouldn't have worked. Fortunately, he didn't have to find out, as Rhiannon was suddenly next to him. The blonde lunged, baton pressing just below the creature's jaw. When she depressed the trigger, its neck arched back, face twisting and contorting in more anger than pain.

Though the shock clearly distressed its cognitive abilities and stole away any chance for coordinated movements, it did not immobilize its limbs, and the infected swung wildly with its arms as if to lash out at whatever it could reach. The zombie caught nails in her jacket front, scrabbling, and she released the trigger, winding her arm back.

The infected had almost recovered when she landed a fierce, cracking blow across its mouth. It snarled, spitting blood, and she struck it twice more before it collapsed.

It took Nick a second to shake off the disorientation from the strike. He huffed, blinking his vision back into focus, lifting his head to watch the zombie land in a slump on the ground, blood leeching from its midsection and freshly crushed face. His eyes darted up to watch Rochelle slip into the loft.

"It's dead?" she questioned, sighing lightly when Rhiannon gave the creature a swift kick in the thigh, to no effect. The woman turned toward Nick, reaching out to touch his elbow. "You okay, suit?"

He grunted, placing his palm against his sore ear. "Oh, yeah. Getting boxed out by a zombie and..."
saved by a Bitch of Anarchy. I'm just peachy." Rhiannon sneered at him, shaking her baton to flick off the blood left behind by the zombie, and he sneered back. "I need to sharpen my sword. Apparently."

Rochelle looked around, carefully directing her flashlight around to check over the rest of the room. "God, it reeks in here." she muttered, crinkling her nose. "Guess this sorry son of a bitch has been stewing this whole time."

Nick mimicked her, examining the room. With more time to focus, he could acknowledge that she was right. There was a heavy stench dousing the room, blood and decay and something much fouler. Ammonia stung as his nose in waves, and he carefully took a few steps forward, moving up to one of the cardboard boxes that he could see clothes in.

He leaned in to it, sniffing - and he nearly wheeled himself backwards, the smell was so strong. "Aw, fuck." he muttered, disgust making his stomach roil. He retreated from the box, trying not to inhale too deeply. "God. What the fuck is this? I thought we could grab some clothes from here, but screw that. Smells worse than my uncle after a bender."

Paying him little mind beyond a hum, Rochelle muttered, "What was he after, anyway?", picking her way across the small room.

Rhiannon followed after her, moving toward the desk and examining the papers and trinkets littering its surface. As she stepped up, her boots crunched on the waxy white ceramic of a shattered plate. It was, no doubt, the source of the crash they'd heard earlier.

Her attention was stolen by a small picture frame. A man and a woman kneeling together, her arms spread in excitement and him giving a big thumbs-up. Behind them, framed by pristine shades of blue, was a yacht. Rhiannon reached out and touched the glass of the photo, tracing the edges of the ship.

"Hey, uh..." The scattered glow from Rochelle's flashlight let her see, until the other woman knelt down next to the bed. Rhiannon protested her actions immediately, stilling in the pitch black left when the flashlight turned away. "Dude, we're in the dark over here. The shit are you doing?!"

Mostly ignoring her complaint, the producer leaned herself down, directing the flashlight under the bed. She swept it over the space between the floor and the bed, scanning along the wall. "Just looking. I -"

The sound that left her was nearly choked out, a reflexive shriek, more startled than frightened. Nick jolted to advance toward her, moving off the memory of the room. A faulty memory, as it turned out - and he swung a leg directly into this side of a cardboard box, knocking it over with a heavy thump.

The contents of the box tumbled out, clattering as a set of metal cookie pans went sliding to the floor. Nick had time enough to catch his balance before he looked up.

It was not time enough to prepare himself as a pair of glinting eyes came flying at him in the dark. His instinct screamed Hunter, but logic overrode it - not even a Hunter could've fit under the bed. The shape was far too small to be a human, though he could barely even make out the edges of its darkness in contrast to Rochelle's light.

Then it struck his chest, and needle-sharp points of fire pierced through his shirt and directly into his skin. He yelped in pain, dropping his katana to the ground in favour of grabbing for whatever was anchoring itself in his flesh. He didn't know what he expected to find, but he didn't expect fur.
A hiss sounded just beneath his face the instant he'd touched it, and the claws tensed, finding purchase to crawl higher up his front. Pain made him stagger back, and he tried to prise the small body off himself. Gripping the soft fur only drew another growled hiss, and before he could react, teeth sunk into his thumb. They were almost as sharp as the claws, and as determined to not let go.

"Fuck!" he shouted, trying to jerk his hand away and only earning himself the pain of every individual sharp object hooked in his skin jostling all at once. He was blinded by Rochelle turning the flashlight on him, and fully expected the woman to come and help him.

Instead, she maintained her distance and yelled, "Nick! Nick, stop!" He had the presence of mind to think, Oh, sure. I'm being mauled by a feral cat, but I should stop. Okay. Sure. before she continued, urgently. "It's scared! Just stop moving, for Christ's sake!"

He froze, forcing his legs and his arms to lock in place. It felt a little like holding still after putting his hand into an activated blender, but he didn't have much choice. Yanking the creature off him would take off most of his flesh with it, if the stabbing pain on his chest was any indication.

So he held still, and held his breath, and there was a remarkably quiet moment where the only sound was a low and constant panting in perfect time with the clench and release of claws in his skin. Its body pressed flatter against him, and he could feel a hummingbird-quick heartbeat beating into his sternum.

Slowly, tenderly, the teeth released his thumb like a tiny bear-trap coming undone.

He had to fight off the urge to jerk his hand away, hesitant to move too quickly. He instead allowed his fingers to slide, just centimeters at a time, and come to rest at its thigh. Applying a small degree of pressure made it hiss again, the sound mingled with a heavy pant, but also took some of the weight so the thing wasn't dangling solely by his flesh.

As his vision cleared of white spots from the flashlight pointing directly at him, he slowly tilted his head down, getting a look at his tiny assailant.

It was equal parts black and orange, merged in a scattered coat of splotches and streaks of fur. Its attention was firmly trained on the rest of the room, head cocked to stare back and forth between the two women standing there, askance.

"Jesus." Rochelle muttered, her voice oddly taut and distressed. "Poor thing."

The gambler tried to choke out a laugh, but even that small movement made the cat tense, sinking its claws a little deeper. He flinched, whispering, "Seriously? I'm getting fucking sliced up here, and you're sorry for the fucking cat?"

There was a beat of silence that, he imagined, contained expressions directed at him. Since he couldn't see them very well past the light, he was spared knowing exactly what kind. Rochelle dropped the flashlight a few inches so it didn't point directly at them before stating: "It's been in here, this whole time, with a zombie trying to eat it - a zombie that's probably its owner. I'm very sorry for the cat."

"I'm surprised the little shitter didn't starve." Rhiannon spoke quietly, sounding less sympathetic and more curious. "And this explains why the place stinks like piss. I fucking hate cats, dude. They're everything that sucks about dogs, with claws and a shitty attitude."

Nick glanced down, startled to find the creature looking directly up at him. Owlish eyes peered up at him from a tremendously round face, pupils blown to black with a ring of pumpkin orange edging them. Its mouth was open, revealing white teeth, and its sides heaved with the force of its panting.

The cat's nose was almost entirely black except for the smallest touch of pink... though it was more like red, flushed and bright with its elevated heartrate.

"I really want to not be a fucking pin-cushion." he stated, quietly, staring back at the feline as it licked out a bright red tongue in a flash. It wasn't like he expected the creature to comprehend the instruction, but it seemed worth a shot. "Can you please get your goddamn claws out of me?"

Unsurprisingly, it did not respond.

Rochelle approached hesitantly, head shaking. "I didn't... think there were any animals left. There were a lot of reports of pets running away, before the epidemic. Like they sensed it coming." She cautiously leaned in, eyes flickering over the cat curled tightly into Nick's chest. "I figured the rest died, or... starved." She lifted her free hand, stretching it out toward the small cat, knuckles first. "How did you make it in here, little guy?"

The cat whipped its head to stare at her, and Nick felt its claws clench in his skin right before it released him with one paw. The minor relief of pain was quickly traded for more when it lashed out, striking at the air in Rochelle's direction, jostling its whole body in the process.

Rochelle yelped as its claws caught in the skin of her hand, recoiling immediately. The cat outright growled, the sound vibrating into Nick's chest and muffled when it licked its chops. Looking almost hurt, the producer huffed, putting her bloodied knuckle against her lips, soothingly.

"Can you please -" Nick gritted out, eyes watering much despite himself as the agitated creature shifted its weight. "- not piss the cat off?"

"Sorry." she managed, retreating, sounding insulted. "I wasn't trying to..."

The further she got, the more the cat's slim body relaxed. Nick blinked past the pain to look down at it, confusion worming its way into his brain. Why was he safer than her? Why would it have picked one stranger over the other to cling to? A gender difference, perhaps, making it gravitate toward whatever was closest to its deceased owner?

Nick inhaled, squinting as if to try and ready himself for a blow. He raised his other hand, slowly and carefully. The movement of his arm caught the cat's attention, and it twisted to watch him move, sides heaving. Nick almost halted out of fear of a strike - but he steeled himself and went ahead to tenderly placed his fingertips against the cat's back.

He just touched it, lightly. A half-formed hiss left its open mouth, tensing, but it didn't attack.

There was a cautious silence in the room - like a held breath - as he let his fingertips trace down the cat's spine. Its skin flinched and twitched in rapid patterns, but it stayed perilously still as he very slowly stroked its back. Nick almost halted out of fear of a strike - but he steeled himself and went ahead to tenderly placed his fingertips against the cat's back.

"I think it likes you." she murmured, her tone softening.

Rhiannon put her arms in a cross to tap her baton against her thigh, forcing out a thin laugh and lowering her chin. "Can't imagine why." she grumbled.

Blinking down at the cat, Nick watched it look back up at him. Its pupils had shrunk, and its whiskers were high and twitching in an over-stimulated, fearful gesture. He managed to slip his arm into more of a cradle under its rump, supporting its weight, and only received a small growl for his effort. The sound was a warning, and he was mindful to stop petting it for a moment or two, lest he overwhelm it.

"I'm a pussy magnet." he stated, trying it like a joke, but he was unable to muster up anything like a smirk. A feeling clenched in his chest, a sensation he couldn't quite define. It was fragile and small, and a protective instinct swelled in him before he could stop it.

The creature looked at him desperately, eyes unblinking, like it were trying to communicate something mortally important. The warmth against his sternum from its belly was comforting somehow, and he could almost ignore the pain blaring across his chest. He tightened his arm to gather the feline close to him, a little surprised when the gesture made it loosen its claws.

With his grasp tighter, he could feel its bones jab into him and press into his forearm. The thing may not have starved to death, but he wasn't sure how far off it had been, after all.

He felt shaken.

"I'm... gonna sit on the stairs. For a minute." he uttered, voice distant. He didn't bother to look up at his teammates, aware they were staring at him. He didn't care to know what they thought, or what they could read off his expression. "I don't think there's anything in this shithole for us."

Rochelle offered an innocuous, "Sure. We'll look around real quick."

Nick backed out through the doorway, until he'd found the stairwell wall with his back. It took effort to slide down without bending forward, keeping as still as he could to not jostle the small bundle of fur and claw. That didn't stop it from lacerating his chest on the way down, insecure in the movement and grabbing for purchase with its paws.

As he landed on the edge of the top stair, sliding one leg down the staircase, the cat wriggled its way up to anchor its claws in the shoulder of his shirt. They caught more fabric than skin that time, and he was able to exhale a breath of relief as some of the pain eased.

Its nose was close enough to his jaw that its whiskers tickled at his neck, and he closed his eyes, returning his hand to a slow pet against its spine. Rochelle turned the flashlight away, leaving them in the dark as she examined the rest of the bedroom space with Rhiannon.

The cat laid against his chest, dreadfully silent but for its heavy and winded panting. He found it soothing to feel the creature's heartbeat slow, its breathing soften. It perked at every sound from the bedroom, body tensing at every movement. It was only gradually that Nick crawled his fingers up until he could get the pad of his thumb behind its ear, rubbing there.

"I think you took more blood out of me than most zombies." he muttered down at the creature, sarcastically.

The warm press of a dry nose grazed against his neck, along with the tickle of whiskers as it cautiously sniffed at his skin.

"Probably don't smell great, huh?" His index finger slipped behind its other ear, massaging the back of its head in a careful pinching motion. The cat's shoulders twitched, and he flinched his hand away in anticipation of a bite - only to feel its whole body shake with a heavy sneeze. The pain of its back paws digging into his midsection was enough to make him grit his teeth, but that didn't stop a slightly winded laugh from escaping him.

"Yeah. Figured."
Rochelle's mind was spinning at what felt like a dizzying pace. She had her knuckle between her teeth, pressing her tongue flat against the bleeding slice she'd earned from the cat's ire. A thin section of flesh was detached, bubbling underneath with dots of blood, like a papercut had sheared across her skin.

She didn't blame it. She could barely wrap her head around the idea of what it had gone through, trapped in a small bedroom, hunted constantly by someone it had trusted - loved. She closed her eyes, clenching them tightly, and it was all she could do not to think back to those few early hours of pandemonium, when the apocalypse truly began.

The slow way her cameraman, Neil Lundberg, had begun to sweat, to cough - and then how quickly that had become vomiting out blackened, foul liquid. How fast he went from laughing, joking, to lunging at her. She'd blinked, and he was gone. The young man she'd known for years, bright and hopeful and loving, reduced to murderous rage.

She hadn't killed him. She hadn't had the strength to do it. She'd begged him to stop, even as every instinct told her it was futile. If it hadn't been for a military man passing by who'd shot him dead, she wouldn't have survived. He'd have bashed her skull in, clawed her throat out. She'd sat there, holding his limp and swollen hand, and cried until she had no tears left in her.

It had been easier, when it came to defending herself against Carmine. Maybe it had been easier because Carmine had been so far gone, so warped and alien in an overnight metamorphosis, or maybe it had been easier to defend her team than just herself.

Maybe it just got easier.

She couldn't say, though, that pulling the trigger on a rifle aimed at Brenda's gut had been easy. It had taken something from her that she wasn't sure she'd been able to find yet. There was a hole in her, like the bullet had passed through her as much as it had passed through the Angel's leader. None of it ever gets easier. It just... stops being a matter of choice at all.

Rochelle shook her head, trying to shake it off, exhaling a harsh breath.

Loss was not an emotion unique to humans, that much she knew for sure. The small tortoiseshell cat had experienced no less trauma than they had, and it hadn't had anyone there to comfort it all this time. It was a miracle it had accepted anyone at all, let alone that Nick had allowed it to. She genuinely wasn't sure which part surprised her more.

Her eyes darted up, looking toward the doorway, unable to see more than the vague shape of Nick's slouched frame. She'd never seen him that way: never seen that vulnerability so brazenly on display. He'd taken the claws almost in stride, and rather than hurry to get rid of the animal... once he'd realized it was merely afraid, he'd soothed it.

Compassionate was not a word she'd describe him with. There was affection in him, and warmth, but it had taken all they'd been through to uncover any sign of those qualities. It was hard work to earn his trust, and harder still to maintain it. He did not open up easily.

Maybe it's not so weird that he'd like cats. That made her laugh, but none of it changed the voice in the back of her head that chanted out, This is stupid. We can't keep a cat. What if it cries at night, and draws in infected? Where'll we get food for it? Where would we even start to take care of it?

Rhiannon walked up to her, hands gripping a small object. The blonde seemed impatient, shifting on her feet, and lifted it up. She pressed it abruptly into Rochelle's hand, insistent. "Check this out."

It took Rochelle a second to gather herself, dragging her eyes away from the doorway and trying her best to focus on the metallic object in her free hand. She didn't realize what it was at first, attention scattered and body numb - and then it clicked. Her eyes darted over the picture frame, examining the photo placed inside. "He's got a ship?" she uttered, distantly.

The biker snatched the ring of keys they'd found downstairs out of the slashed zipper pocket at her thigh, thumb flicking through them until she found a small silver key. She held it up, turning the flat head into the light of Rochelle's torch, and illuminated on the silver metal was a small beveled sailboat.

"There's a fuckton of papers on the desk. Might say something about it." Rhiannon stated, voice low and full of brimming excitement. "Give me the flashlight."

Rochelle acquiesced, handing her the flashlight with a sigh. She lifted her hand to rub her eyes tiredly. It was difficult to remind herself that the bikers had an ulterior motive. Their hunt for a boat had slipped her mind, especially considering Lena's current condition. It seemed far-away.

Rhiannon needed something constructive to focus on, she supposed. Something to do that presumed Lena would survive.

While the blonde stepped back to the desk, aggressively sifting through the paperwork covering the desk and filling the two drawers beneath it, Rochelle eased herself across the room. Although her eyes had adjusted to the dark, she still kept a hand out in front of herself to make sure she didn't run into a cardboard box. It was a slow process, and when she reached the doorway, she dropped to a crouch.

She could barely see Nick, but the cat's two glinting pale yellow eyes flashed toward her, crystal clear in the dark.

"You okay, Nick?" she murmured, rubbing her wrist. "You seem -" Rochelle hesitated, tongue curling against the backs of her teeth, unsure what exactly to say. 'Upset' seemed mild. She was saved having to finish the sentence when the gambler grunted, and she heard him shift his weight.

"Fine." he responded, voice low, and she was surprised to hear so clearly in his voice that he was not. Maybe it was the darkness, and the fact that they couldn't see each other much at all, but he seemed raw and honest, suddenly. "I'm gonna need stitches after this little brat is done."

It wasn't pain in his voice, though. There was something else; a melancholy. She kept her silence, and he continued.

"My uncle had a cat. Tabby he picked up off the street, when I was in high school. Lost his tail getting run over by a car, and he was mostly deaf. You couldn't walk up to him without pissing him off - he never heard you coming, so you'd scare the shit out of him and get slashed for it." Rochelle watched what movement she could see in the dark as he stroked the cat on his chest. "I figured out real quick to come at him from the front. I think he appreciated it, because after a few weeks, he started to come up and sit on my lap."

Pressing her palms together with the photo between them, Rochelle settled for looking down toward her knees. "He just needed someone to understand him. Give him a chance."

Nick exhaled, shortly, irritation creeping into his shortened diction. "Yeah. Somethin' like that."

Rochelle waited, biting at her lower lip, sure there was more. It didn't take him long.

"My uncle died a few years later. I'd already fucked off and gotten myself an apartment, so - when he died, my parents had to do something with the cat. They tried to get me to take it, but I didn't want to deal with it. It wasn't that I didn't like the cat. I did, I just... I was on my own for the first time, and... stupid. Angry."

Something brewed in his tone with that last word, and she knew there was more to it than he let on. Context she didn't have, and insight he failed to share. Rather than press him on the issue, she simply murmured, "What happened to it?"

The silence that dragged on after her question was tense. Her nerves frayed at it, unable to see his face to know what kind of thought was crossing his eyes. She was tempted to approach, but kept her distance, afraid to upset the cat that had grown so much calmer from earlier. It had grown difficult to know how to handle Nick when part of her wanted to lay him out, but she couldn't stop the instinctive sympathy that dragged at her conscience.

"I've fucking got it." Rhiannon announced, a bit of actual excitement touching her voice. The woman was suddenly striding toward them, the flashlight illuminating the top of the stairs, and Rochelle twisted around to see her gripping a folded piece of paper. "There's a bill for a dock. We've got fucking keys and we know where the boat is. Shit yes. I can't believe it took me this fucking long."

She halted a few feet away from where Rochelle crouched, waving the slip of paper.

"Lee's gonna be over the moon."

Hesitantly, Rochelle glanced back at Nick, now that she could see him. The gambler's eyes were averted, staring downstairs, his hand still on the back of the cat who'd ended up nearly bent over his shoulder. The small orange-and-black cat was completely silent, its paws tucked together on his clavicle and its tail curled tightly between its huddled back legs. Its ears and whiskers twitched compulsively, staring between the two women like any move might set it to growling.

"Nick -" she nearly whispered, but didn't get any further.

"I know." he stated, flatly, abruptly matching her gaze. His eyes were cold now, and tired. "We can't take it." His voice harshened to something angry and mocking, like he were echoing her rather than stating it himself. "The fuck'll we do, right? Cage it up? Get kibble? Find a litter box?"

Rochelle closed her eyes rather than keep looking at him, a pain striking in her chest. "I - even if we kept him... what if something happens to us? All we'll do is lock it up in another room to starve to death if we never came back. We don't have the luxury, Nick. And it's not fair to him, either."

"I know." he spat out, a scowl twisting at his lips. "I'm not a goddamn dumbass."

Silence hung for a moment, and she let her eye reopen, watching him catch the cat's ear between his fingers and roll it gently. The touch made the cat's head lower, and its eyelids threatened to soften for a blink. It shifted its paws in a slow gesture, and its body settled a little tighter against his chest.

Rochelle glanced over her shoulder, and if she could be glad for anything, it was Rhiannon sensing that she should be quiet. Her hazel eyes were wide and dubious, but she held her tongue, examining the situation in front of her like it were a puzzle. She met gazes with the woman, and softened her face in an encouraging gesture, a small degree of gratitude.

When the blonde awkwardly looked away, Rochelle turned back to Nick. She did reach out, then, and as her fingertips touched Nick's knee, the small cat noticed. Its eyes flashed toward her, tensing up and crawling its body around to face her, hissing out a slow and tired sound. It was an almost heart-breakingly weak noise.

It was exhausted.

The gambler winced in clear pain as its claws must've come back out - but he didn't complain aloud.

"I put a bottle of water in the pack. We can get a bowl and leave it with some water, at least. Give it some time to rest in here." When his head twitched in faint affirmation, she squeezed her fingers on his leg, just softly. "It's a wild animal. It'll have better luck out there than we do, I bet."

Rhiannon did speak up, then, quietly. Her tone had a reedy impatience to it, just a little drawled, and she thumbed over her shoulder. "There's actually some bowls in there. They were under the desk. Water bowl's almost dry, and it tore into a food bag in one of those boxes. Must've been crawling around whenever the zombie got distracted. It would've starved otherwise, for fuckin' sure."

Nodding with a tense sigh, Rochelle stretched a hand out to point downstairs. "Just. Give us a minute, okay?" she mumbled. "Why don't you go down and check out those golf clubs real quick?"

The biker's expression flashed with a slight annoyance, but she handed Rochelle the flashlight and slipped to obey, anyway. Her approach sent the cat into a sharp hiss, jolting its front legs straight to ease itself off Nick's shoulder. Its back arched awkwardly as it faced her, tail twitching low in a fearfully aggressive gesture. She huffed out a laugh, sneering down at it as she moved past Nick.

Just as she came almost into range, the tortoiseshell cat lashed out with a paw, swiping in three quick gestures that all struck only air. It nearly overbalanced itself in the gesture, scrabbling for purchase on Nick's arm. Whistling out in a pained breath, Nick moved to smooth his hand over its side, trying to calm it. However, the cat snapped its head around and landed a bite square on his wrist. He flinched and jerked his hand back, grimacing.

"Y'know, I hate her too. Don't need to bite me. .." he muttered at the cat, who only had eyes for Rhiannon as she descended the stairs.

Rochelle couldn't help a small frown, gazing at him. She slowly pulled the backpack off her shoulders, unzipping it and fishing out the water bottle tucked deep in one corner. "Here." she murmured, offering the bottle out to him. The cat stared at her extended hand, tense, until Nick reached out to snatch the bottle from her. "Do you... want me here? Or -"

"No." he grunted. He fist ed his hand around the bottle and set his knuckles against the ground, pushing himself up. His other arm scooped under the cat to hold it to his chest, keeping it there as he got to his feet. "Brat's not gonna let me go with you here."

Rather than move past him, Rochelle slipped back a few steps and gave him room to come into the bedroom. She placed the flashlight on the ground, letting it roll to illuminate the room, and shuffled into the stairwell landing before coming to her feet. She turned, looking after him where he stood beside the fallen corpse of the pawn shop owner.
His shoulders were high, turned away from her. She could just see a set of eyes peeping over his shoulder, staring at her with such an intensity she couldn't help but feel a swell of guilt. "We're - I'm right, aren't I, Nick?" she ghosted out, gaze dropping to the ground. "Maybe -"

"You want to bring a cat home, and get it killed?" His tone cut, and it was angry, and she knew it wasn't directed at her. "Give everyone the choice of wasting food on it, or starving it? What if it gets sick, or hurt? You want that on our shoulders? A new reason to be fucking miserable, like we don't have enough?"

Rochelle didn't say anything, curling her fingers into a fist.

"If we let it go, at least it can be outside and hunt. Take care of itself. If it can dodge a zombie locked in a bedroom, it can dodge them outside." he muttered, stepping into the room, carrying the cat toward the desk. "We can barely take care of ourselves, let alone a fucking pet, as if we haven't picked up enough strays already. We saved it from starving to death in that bedroom. That's all we can do."

She got the feeling he was talking to himself more than her - but she let him have it, and didn't argue. Tucking her arms in a soft hug across her chest, she turned away, carefully moving to start making her way down the stairs. She'd already passed the doorway when he called after her.

"... They put him down."

She halted, and her footsteps stopping must've been enough of a query that he elaborated.

"My uncle's cat. My parents put him down. They said he was violent, because they didn't give enough of a shit to work with him. I didn't find out until it was already done. Always felt like I left the grumpy furbag to die."

Her gaze dropped, eyes closing for just a beat. The words sat on her chest, crushing out a tiny breath. Nick said nothing, and she knew him well enough to know she had nothing to say back that he would accept. She shoved the framed photo in her backpack to free her hands so she could follow the wall with her palm and balance herself, maneuvering down in the dimming light.

The hole in her gut felt a little bigger.

Chapter 216

When Nick stepped out of the pawn shop, he sucked in a heavy breath. The air wasn't pristine, but it was clear and fresh in contrast to the air in the shop's upper floor. He glanced around the parking lot, scanning for danger.

There were a few infected wandering the street, but they hadn't noticed him yet. He had enough breathing room to close his eyes for a moment, trying to calm the turmoil in his stomach. He shouldn't have been upset. It shouldn't have dug at him like this.

The cat hadn't known what was happening. He'd set it down, and it had lapped up a few desperate mouthfuls of the water he'd set out for it, and then bolted back under the bed. It hadn't had any awareness of its circumstance, or the instinct to do anything but hide.

It was a shitty goodbye, but wasn't it appropriate?

They didn't have any other choice. It was the only realistic thing to do, and the fact that he felt guilty didn't make him wrong. They couldn't take on the responsibility - or the risk. The last thing they needed was the added stress. He could only imagine the team's reaction to having a pet. Worse, their reaction when something inevitably happened to it.

It was begging for an unhappy end.

Letting it go was better for both of them.

Or maybe this is just another round of 'Nick quits rather than lose'. He sighed harshly, head shaking, palming down the plane of his face. Jesus. This is getting to me.

Footsteps approached as his teammates joined him outside the pawn shop, and he reluctantly looked back to find Rochelle pushing the pawn shop door wide open. Gripped in her other hand was a small wedge-shaped block, and she dropped it next to the door before kicking it into place, nestled under the door and holding it open.

He watched her for a moment, before letting his gaze shift to watch Rhiannon step past her. The blonde had tucked the haft of her stun baton into the back of her black pants, the already tight fabric straining at her hips, and had in her hands a weighty golf club. She drew it close, and held it out, moving it as if to test her grip.

"This thing's either gonna bust some heads, or bend in one go. Let's fuckin' find out." She grinned, just a slash of teeth between her lips, and bolted out into the middle of the parking lot. She leapt into a low stance, swinging the club just at shoulder-height and shouting out: "Come on, shitstains!"

Rochelle uttered a faintly nervous sound, shrugging her backpack higher on her back before jogging after the other woman. "You like tempting fate, huh?" she muttered, earning a loud, pleased laugh from the biker. Rochelle freed the bat from its place in the pack on her shoulders, moving just close enough without stepping into range of Rhiannon's backswing.

Nick couldn't get himself to care enough to join in. He watched with a quiet kind of apathy as the infected charged them. Rochelle darted to the side, and the zombies split between them. Rhiannon nearly jumped into her swing, and the head of the club struck into the oncoming zombie's skull so hard it cracked open.
Gore dripped from the iron, and she might've celebrated had the next infected not been right behind.

The two women took the handful of infected with wordless coordination and practiced ease. Rochelle's palm, healing from getting sliced grabbing Brenda's katana and holding it from her throat, seemed not to bother her.

Indelicately, Nick hooked a finger in the collar of his shirt and pulled it away. He could finally get a look at the damage done to his chest, and it was not insignificant. Stripes of red wound amongst the hair on his sternum, droplets of blood having bled through his faded blue shirt.

He glanced at his thumb, too, and found gentle bruising in the shape of a tiny mouth. It hadn't actually broken skin, as it turned out. Hurt like it did.

The brat's a fighter.

That thought crystallized into a feeling he could only describe as misery.

Panting heavily as she brought the bat into a horizontal shove, pushing an infected back and earning herself enough room to prepare a swing, Rochelle burst out, "Having a nap, Nick? I didn't know you liked making the women do all the work." She struck the zombie square in the nose, the metal banding slicing at skin.

It stumbled, blood gushing from its nose, and a flash of silver followed the head of Rhiannon's golf club as it seated itself in the zombie's skull. "I saw that shit coming a mile away." The blonde grinned fiercely. "What's the term for a dude starfishing?"

"Sex?" was Rochelle's morose response, and their explosion of cackling set a surreal background to the infected left dying on the ground. Rochelle turned on her heel, struggling with a smile - though it faded the moment her eyes alighted on Nick's expression.

He looked nauseated.

"C'mon, nothing? No bite?" she tried, but when it earned nothing but a vague stare that said he hadn't been listening... a sigh escaped her, and she moved to quickly close the gap between them. Irritation flashed into her voice. "Nick. You're this upset about a cat, and you can't spare a minute to be upset about -"

That got a reaction. His eyes narrowed, threateningly, and she was forced to lift a hand in a coaxing gesture.

"I'm just saying." She lowered her gaze, biting onto the inside of her cheek. "I really don't want to be the cold one here, but we've got too much to deal with already, and it's just not feasible. We have to be logical about this. You know I'm right. You said I was right."

Nick slid his hand to grab at his chin, thumb tucking underneath his jawline to press against the softness behind the bone. He inhaled sharply, aware of Rhiannon turning to look over at them. A mild frustration set her foot to tapping.

A much less mild frustration set his heart to pounding.

"Give me the radio." he stated, low and matter-of-fact. It was easy to tell she had no intention of doing so, and before she could protest, he continued. A snide edge touched his voice, despite the fact that he was dead serious. "We're supposed to vote on shit like this, aren't we?"
Rochelle took a step back, releasing a scoffing breath. "Nicolas. You know full well that's a terrible idea. You know if Ellis heard anything about this, he'd never let it go." She put a fisted hand against her other bicep, like a half-cross. "Are you seriously going to put this on them?"

Nick laughed, outright. "Oh, so I hide shit from the group and I'm an asshole. You do it and you're just looking out for 'em. Is that how it is?"

She gritted her jaw, clenching her teeth against each other, pushing a palm against her temple. "Jesus. I am not the bad guy here, and you know it. You're emotional about it, and that'd be fine, if you were honest about it instead of being a dick." Anger made her turn away, rubbing at her eyes, like she couldn't stand to look at him.

Looking away left her surprised when he muttered, "... I don't want to leave it."

Rochelle spun back around, lips falling to a flattened line. Her eyes traced his expression, soaking in the tension and the frustration there - and she sighed. Her whole body slumped a little, and it was reluctantly that she reached to pull the radio from where it sat hooked on her backpack's side pocket.

"I still think it's a bad idea." she murmured, pressing it into his hand. "But if we're gonna make a bad choice, then yeah. You're right. We can at least make it together."

Nick avoided meeting her gaze. His face felt hot, and it was with a sharp turn that he directed his body away. Maybe he felt like everything was spiralling out of control - a hilarious under-exaggeration, considering the world as they knew it had ended - and he needed to dig his heels in on something. Seize control.

Or it's just a pathetic attempt to fill a hole. Same hole I've been trying to fill for years. Booze, sex, gambling. It all just makes it bigger. Blindly, he thumbed the radio's activation trigger and grated out a quiet phrase before he lost his nerve. "Someone there?"

The same hole I don't want Ellis to fall into with me.

It hurt to think. The blunt truth of it pained him. It wasn't news to him, really, but it felt like the first time he'd admitted it to himself. It was easy to say he was a shitty person, and that he'd be bad for Ellis. Easier still to use that martyrdom, that self-hatred, to push off the obvious next assumption.

I wanted him. I wanted the stupid dream he believes in. I wanted to be whoever the hell he seems to think I am.

I still do.

"We need to talk."
It had not taken long for Lena to drift off. Their short game and her coughing fit had exhausted her, and she'd fallen asleep as soon as attention wasn't focused on her.

Ellis was left gripping the cloth he'd cleaned her mouth up with, eyes on the smear of bright red blood. A thoughtful frown touched his lips, slowly folding the cloth in half, feeling a twist in his gut. He felt even more helpless than he had watching Chris suffer.

At least there had been things he could do; they could wash and bandage him, give him medication. Lena was suffering injuries for which there was no care or treatment. It would have taken actual surgical experience to stop whatever was hemorrhaging in her midsection. All they could do was watch.

He didn't want to watch.

A hand alighted on his shoulder, and he blinked up to find Coach gazing at him, somber and quiet. The big man shifted to sit on the barstool next to him, leaning his elbow on the bar counter while leaving his hand where it was. "You doin' a'ight? You look like you're thinkin'."

Ellis lowered his gaze, sighing out a breath. "Just worryin'. She's gettin' worse. I feel useless watchin' it happen."

Grunting in agreement, Coach let his hand squeeze on the younger man's shoulder. "Shit ain't easy. But who knows what'll happen. I'd never have thought Chris would make it, an' here he is, crackin' wise like nothin' changed." Ellis didn't look convinced, glancing over at Christophe, where the man sat alone on the small bundle of blankets that made up his bed on the floor.

He'd not missed how the Spaniard had suddenly taken to zoning out, his hand clenching on the empty space where his other one might've lain on his thigh or hung in the air. He had it filed away for a time when it felt appropriate to talk to the man about it. It seemed like pain, and the last thing he wanted was the Spaniard to be suffering in silence.

"This whole situation, it makes us hardy. Those girls ain't lasted this long without bein' tough. You ain't wrong that we can't do anythin' - it's up to her an' God. But we're givin' her the best shot, keepin' her safe here. It's all we can do." Coach leaned in, and Ellis was forced to look back at him. The older man smiled. "That an' keep morale up, right?"

The brunette couldn't even force a smile back, sighing out a frustrated noise. "Sorta gettin' tired of that bein' all I can do." He didn't mean it as caustically as it came out of him, but he couldn't help it. Ducking his chin, he scooted off the stool and to his feet. "I'm gonna check on Chris."

Coach watched him go, a frown playing at his lips. It was with a heavy sigh that he resigned himself to silence, palming against his forehead.

Chris didn't seem to notice Ellis' approach. It wasn't until he could have touched the Spaniard that he finally shifted to attention, warm brown eyes darting up, a look on his dark features like he'd been caught. "Oh - hola." he quickly uttered, scrambling for a smile.

"Hey, man." Ellis dropped down into a crouch, tugging on the edges of his boxers to ensure his decency remained intact despite their dogged attempts to ride up his thighs. He ignored the slow way Chris noticed and expanded his smile into a slight grin. "You okay? Need anythin'?"
The foreigner blinked, and Ellis had come to recognize it as the flutter of lashes that preceded him misdirecting the conversation. An act of innocence; a ploy. It didn't frustrate him, but it did confirm that the man was hiding something. "Me? I am fine, chico. Pero... ¿Cómo estás? If you miss Nico half as much as I miss Rochelle -"

Ellis decided to let him have the win, and allowed the conversation to drift out of his control.

He huffed a laugh, slowly putting his elbows on his knees and pursing his face into a grimace. "Just can't let it go, huh?" When Chris merely smiled, all sublime wickedness, he closed his eyes. "I dunno. We're... okay, I guess. Like, we can talk without fightin', and he don't seem so angry all the time anymore. I just ain't sure where tuh go from here. I..." He hesitated, eyes flickering open to stare at the ground.

He couldn't help but think back to the fight he had with Nick in the condo, where the older man had snarled out his reasoning for acting so vitriolic: that if he didn't keep Ellis at arms' length, they'd end up in bed together. That Ellis would, inevitably, try to mend things, and Nick would use the leverage for sex.

'Because I'm not a good enough guy to say no.' was what he'd said.

It was tremendously confusing, when all Ellis heard from it was: 'I don't want to hurt you.'

The Spaniard watched him, his expression slipping to something curious, prompting him to continue with a gentle, "¿Qué?"

"Uh." Ellis looked up at him with a quiet exhale of breath, trying to decide how to put the words together to explain. The honest truth was that he didn't even know what he wanted anymore. It wasn't so much that he felt differently about the man - he knew he didn't, deep down - but he definitely knew he wanted things to change.

Though a desperate, tiny little part of him probably wasn't strong enough to say no, it wasn't what he wanted. He didn't want to tumble back into their half-baked relationship, even if the alternative was never having anything at all between them. He wanted something real, even if Nick decided he could never give that.

But, if he could... if it were possible... if there were a way to rebuild what they'd broken... he wanted it with Nick.

That much sang in a klaxon truth through his very soul.

"¡Cristo todopoderoso!" Christophe crowed out, only quieting himself back to a mutter when Coach shot him a warning look from across the restaurant. "You make me wait so long, I think it is better to guess." Without giving Ellis time to protest, the man leaned in, nudging his bare knee with a knuckle. "You want to forgive him, but he has to earn it, ¿sí?"

Ellis must've looked a little dumbfounded, because Chris flashed a triumphant look. "No soy estúpido." he stated. "And it is normal. You want him - ah, ¿suplicar? You want him to beg, ¿creo?"

Frowning, the Georgian shifted to drop down to the ground, sliding his legs into a cross as he landed flat on his rear. He didn't like the idea of making Nick beg, even if the idea of Nick begging for him put a warmth in his chest. "It ain't like that. I'm just worried 'bout... lettin' him off the hook, I guess. That if we're friendly, I'm... sendin' the wrong message, I guess. I like us not arguin' so much, it's just... it's hard tuh..."
"It is hard to be angry with someone you want to fuck, and hard to fuck someone you want to be angry with." Christophe finished for him, smiling in a blissful way that suggested he thought he was being genuinely helpful. Ellis choked on his own saliva, slapping a hand over his chest. He jolted to look behind him, and judging by the way Coach was looking fiercely down at the floor, he was listening.

"Uh -" Ellis barely managed to utter.

He was saved the mortification of continuing the conversation when he heard the crackle of radio static. He'd left it on the bar - now next to Coach.

"Somebody there?"

Nick's voice prompted a considerable colour over Ellis' cheeks, and he started to stand, inwardly cursing the timing. However, he hadn't even gotten fully to his feet before Coach waved him off and grabbed up the radio. Ellis was left to stand there, awkwardly watching, unsure which outcome would've been worse: Coach talking to Nick after that conversation, or him.

"We need to talk." It was grim, but not frantic.

Resting his elbow on the counter, Coach reluctantly hovered the radio next to his mouth, eyes closing in a look of subtle consternation. It was the silent suffering of a tired man, who'd run out of gas and couldn't even find the energy to protest his lot in life anymore. "I got you, Nick. What's goin' on?"

"I -" The pause was full of dead static, like Nick sat there with the TALK button depressed, trying to decide what to say. "Is everybody with you?"

"Mostly. Lena's restin'. Why?" Though Ellis had been listening closely, the words drew Chris' complete attention, tilting slightly to look around Ellis' legs.

"That's fine." His voice flashed to irritation, quickening - but more than that, Ellis couldn't help but think he sounded upset. "Look, we found something at the pawn shop, and we need to agree on what to do about it. Vote."

Coach's attitude wrapped right back around to impatience, using his free hand to pinch at the bridge of his nose. He used his elbow to haul himself off the stool, getting to his feet and walking toward the two other men. A small glance as he passed by confirmed Lena was still fast asleep. "Spit it out, Nick. You're gonna give me an ulcer."

"... There's - a cat."

The silence that followed was deafening. Coach was only a few feet away at that point, but he stopped dead in his tracks, staring at the radio. It was slowly that his gaze ticked up. He must've found equal amounts of disbelief on both of them, because his eyes seemed unsure whether to settle on Ellis' face or Chris'.

"Yes, you heard me."

That stirred Ellis into motion, babbling, almost faster than his mouth could keep up with. "Whut the - hell - are you tellin' me they found a cat? How could - how'd it survive all this time?! I thought all the animals got eaten by zombies, or somethin' - is it okay? Where -"

"I can hear Ellis freaking out from here."

The Georgian startled, but Coach turned the radio immediately to display the fact his thumb was not on the trigger. That was almost worse. "Look, Rochelle is giving me a fucking death glare, so I'm just g-"

A moment of silence preceded the radio clicking back on, Rochelle's gentled voice taking over. "Guys. I know the instinct is to save it. I get it, okay? I really, honestly do. But I've got to be the voice of reason here and say there's a lot to consider here. If we take it in, we're taking on a lot of responsibility."

Chris reached out suddenly, grabbing Ellis' wrist. The Georgian quickly responded and clasped his forearm, half-turning, to help the Spaniard to his feet. "If it has lived this long, why would it need us?" he gasped out, voice smoothing out once he'd caught his balance.

Ellis outright stepped back, eyes widening like he'd been slapped. "That's -" he stuttered in horror. The foreigner seemed a little startled, like he'd not anticipated the reaction, a sluggish apology sinking over his eyes even as Ellis burst out a protest. "It's a cat, Chris! It ain't meant tuh be alone out there, with all them zombies, like -"

Coach flung a hand up, palm flat, silencing both of them. "Let me talk, kids, damn." Only once both men were looking at him did he lift the radio and speak into it. "What's the situation, Ro'? How'd you find it?" When Ellis looked ready to speak, Coach's eyes went sharp, warning him to stay silent. "An' why not just let it go?"

A sigh rustled into the radio. "I... It was locked up in the pawn shop. Its owner holed up there, but he turned. He's been hunting it around the bedroom for who knows how long." Shock dropped Ellis' jaw, and he barely kept himself back from lunging after the radio. "It's not exactly an alleycat. So - no, I'm not gonna pretend I think it's gonna thrive on the streets. But how are we supposed to take care of it? Feed it? Keep it safe? It's scary, Coach. It's a scary burden to take on."

Sighing, shifting his hand to rub over the whole length of his face, Coach affirmed the sentiment with a grunt into the radio before lowering it. He spared a look at Ellis, eyes dark and conflicted.

"Son... I know how you feel. But Ro's right, too. This ain't as easy as it would be, if shit was different. If we can't take care of it - it'll be better off on its own. My family had a cat for years, thing spent more time outside than in, hunted mice an' birds more than it ate from us."

Flinching his jaw tight, Ellis curled his hands into fists and leaned in. His voice went firm, conviction inflating his chest. "This ain't the same. It ain't right tuh just abandon it. We're the only other folk it'll ever see, that ain't tryin' tuh eat it. It lost its dad - it ain't got anyone else."

Coach did not look convinced, but he examined Ellis' posture, and resignation touched his eyes. He lifted the radio, thumbing the TALK button. "What do y'all think?"

"Rhiannon is a no. I - I think it's a bad idea. Nick is a yes."

That startled Ellis. All his frustration and conviction dissipated, leaving only a wide-eyed confusion. Nick, voting against logic and reason and the best interest of the group, and landing on the side of selfless kindness? To save an animal? The same man who'd violently protested at every turn as they decided to save other people, first Christophe and now Lena?

It wasn't that he thought the rest of his teammates were being cruel. He understood the concerns, and the risks associated with the choice. Taking on a pet was not something they'd ever planned for, and with two injured teammates, it was already a careful balancing act. He appreciated that. He just hadn't expected Nick to be on his side.
Quietly, Coach's eyes darted to Chris. A brow silently raised, prompting the foreigner.

Christophe paled a little, caught between Coach and then Ellis. He panted out a slight laugh, ducking his chin, looking abruptly like he'd have preferred fainting. A small gesture of his hand highlighted his bandaged shoulder. "I am here because you all pity me. I cannot say no to someone else."

Ellis immediately looked back to Coach, his heart rate picking up in his chest and his throat. If the older man refused, then they'd be tied, and it would come down to Lena... if the woman was even in a state to wake up, let alone vote. If he agreed, then her vote would be inconsequential, anyway.

The ex-football player lowered his shoulders, posture outright drooping, his head shaking in a slow motion.

Ellis felt his gut drop.

Then Coach muttered, harshly, "You got a worse puppy-dog look than my daughter." He lifted the radio, sighing before stating into the grille of the microphone: "Got three yes votes. Looks like we're gonna figure this one out on the go."

He was almost sure he heard a weary "Okay. We'll figure out a way to catch it and get it back to base." from Rochelle, but any shot at responding was stolen from him by the full-force collision Ellis had with his gut. The kid's arms were around him and squeezing in an instant, a chorus of "Thank-you!"'s muffled into his chest.

There wasn't anything for Coach to do but to set a hand on the crown of his head and sigh, deeper.

"Ain't sure I'm doin' any of us a favour."

All the same, he held onto Ellis for a few moments longer.
Chapter 218

The waiting was insufferable. Pacing seemed the only reasonable way to vent the energy buzzing in his skin, and Ellis took to circling the restaurant tables, cap in his hands. He didn't know if he was excited or afraid, but he knew whatever it was, it was too much.

Coach had his eyes closed, seeming strangely calm, and Chris' head ticked to watch him orbit the room. Ellis kept expecting someone to snap at him, to tell him to quit it, but the chastisement never came.

It took everything he had to keep from rushing over to the radio and demanding an update. The lack of contact drove him crazy, and his mind flittered between the possible outcomes. Maybe they'd run into trouble, or the cat had escaped. Maybe they'd gotten into trouble because of the cat or due to the extra time they'd had to spend.

What if the very first thing to happen was trouble because of their new charge?

It took what felt like hours. He was almost sure he'd go crazy waiting - and then there was gunfire, the short and snappy crack of a handgun. The moment he heard it, he was off, bolting for the table where he'd left Nick's Magnum. It felt cold and heavy in his hands, and he gripped it tight as he bolted for the front door.

His socked feet skidded as he turned the corner into the walled-off walkway, a hand lurching to grab the edge of the divider and sling himself around. Even as he ran to the door, his neck twisted, trying to look out the windows as he passed them.

Coach was not far behind, but Ellis didn't have enough patience to wait.

Twisting the lock undone and thrusting open the door, Ellis scrambled out onto the screened-in porch. He landed in an awkward stance, like he only just kept himself from running outside entirely, and scanned the street eagerly.

When the rest of their team appeared, it was not the sight he expected. Rhiannon had Nick's katana in her grip, walking backwards behind them, and Rochelle was to the side with her handgun. Nick had his sniper rifle and Coach's double-barrel shotgun shouldered on his right arm, his left hand busy holding a rectangular, dark blue canvas shape, about the size of a small duffel bag.

It took Ellis a minute to realize it was a pet carrier.

A few infected sprinted into sight, chasing after them. Rhiannon darted forward, slashing as she moved, blade hacking through the delicate flesh of the nearest one's face. The edge skated across bone, taking messy hunks out of its nose and cheek, and it stumbled to the ground. She took advantage of the falter to jab the point of the blade through its neck and twist.

Rochelle let the other two infected get just close enough - and then the shotgun went off, one blast after the other. The first shot punched a hole through one zombie's midsection, big enough to shear the flesh off its ribs and reveal its spinal column. The second one jolted higher as the recoil lifted the barrel of the gun, and the next zombie's skull burst in a flash of black and red gore.

They kept moving, Rochelle retaking her place at Nick's flank, and they darted across the parking lot and up to the restaurant. Ellis quickly opened the porch door, pressing himself against the threshold to make room for them to come through. He couldn't help but blink up at their faces as they passed.
Nick looked oddly calm, and didn't acknowledge him at all. Rochelle strained to put together a smile before he noticed she seemed stressed. Rhiannon winked at him, practically cheery.

He didn't know which one threw him off more.

"Where'd y'all even find a li'l cat case like that?" he couldn't help but question, bewildered, closing the porch door behind them. He spared a careful glance to ensure there was nothing still after them before he followed his teammates into the café. By the time he'd made it inside and locked the door behind them, Rochelle was the only one still waiting for him.

"Its owner had it." she answered, rubbing the bridge of her nose. "We got lucky. Though the thing's so attached to Nick, I'm pretty sure he could have just carried it the whole way."

Ellis found himself immediately screwing up his brows, startled. "Really...?" He still wasn't used to the idea, and the image summoned by the statement was surprising to say the least. He hadn't expected Nick and pets to land in the same sentence, and he didn't really know what to do with the new information. "H... huh."

"Mm." Rochelle turned away, slumping a little under the weight of the backpack on her shoulder. She walked down the wooden walkway, voice tired and quiet. "No hard feelings about the cat, right...? I wasn't trying to be mean, I'm just... concerned we're in over our heads."

Instantly, Ellis shook his head. His eyes darted to the floor as he followed after her. "Nah. I get it, I just - couldn't sleep if we didn't do nothin'."

Rochelle laughed gently. "You're a big softie. I'd never ask you to change that." She continued on into the restaurant, eyes darting to account for Coach and Chris before settling on Rhiannon where she stood next to Lena. The blonde's head was low, her hand settled on her older sister's forehead. "Is she okay?"

"Más o menos." escaped Chris from where he sat on the floor, wrapped in a thin blanket.

The gentle rumble of Coach's voice cut in, reluctant. "Girl had a little fit. Coughed up some blood. She was doin' a'ight for a while before that, but tired herself out. Ain't had good news today." It was bluntly honest, and Rhiannon's chin dropped in response.

When she turned away, her expression had fallen to a coldness. Whatever cheer that had been there earlier was gone. She sat on the bench, and did not have eyes for anything but the floor.

Hesitantly, Ellis twisted his head to look at Nick. The gambler had slipped back into the booth he'd claimed for himself, setting the pet carrier on the table. He hunched down, looking in through the mesh front to peek in on the animal inside. Curiosity grabbed Ellis by the ear and he was approaching before he could stop himself.

"Uh... hey." he managed, awkwardly. Nick glanced up, and their eyes met with an ease. Ellis came to stand near the end of the table, hands fidgeting down to tug at his boxers.

Slowly, Nick placed a hand on the top of the carrier and turned it, sliding it to face the Georgian. The older man's eyes were hard to read, curious and attentive. "Wanna see?" he offered - but before Ellis could move or nod, he warned, "It's taken a swing at everyone else so far. So watch your fingers."

Ellis frowned a little. "I'm usually pretty good with animals..." He shifted, dropping down to a crouch to get himself at eye-level with the mesh of the pet carrier, and squinted inside. The first thing that struck him was the brilliance of two orange eyes, peeping at him from the dark. He clucked his tongue against the roof of his mouth, and those eyes stayed trained on him in unblinking silence.

He raised a hand, gently pressing one fingertip against the mesh. "Hey, li'l -"

The second thing to strike him was more literal.

Jolting forward and giving him just a glimpse of its mottled orange-and-black fur, the cat slashed a paw at the mesh, catching in the fabric rather than his skin. He recoiled, a startled noise escaping his lips as he reflexively looked at his fingers to confirm they hadn't gotten nicked. When he found no blood, he lifted his gaze back up.

Those orange eyes had returned to the dark. It was telling, in his opinion: the cat wasn't pressed against the mesh, hissing and trying to reach him. It had fled immediately to the very back of the carrier. It was scared, not angry. "It's okay, buddy." he hushed out, settling back on his heels. The moment he leaned away, he saw it shift, eyes lowering in the dark as it curled itself down on the floor of the carrier. "I ain't gonna hurt you."

Nick set an elbow against the table and put his palm against his jaw. The gesture slumped him, and Ellis' eyes caught on his chest. The blood speckling his shirt wasn't anything out of the ordinary, and Ellis wouldn't have thought to examine it. With Nick's posture, however, he could see past the open part of his undone shirt buttons.

Cat scratches laced his chest, visible as red lines through the hair on his sternum. A frown touched the younger man's lips, blinking up at his face.

"I didn't know you liked cats."

A slight smirk twitched at Nick's face, abruptly closing his eyes with a light exhale. "It's not really like that. I hate pets. Never had an interest in some fuzzball shedding all over my clothes and tearing up my furniture." Ellis watched him, dubiously, and it wasn't long before Nick added, "But, ya know. If I had to have something, it'd have been a cat."

Crossing his arms over his knees, Ellis smiled a little. "Guess that ain't a huge surprise." To the older man's arched brow, he clarified: "A-holes get along with each other, usually."

Nick's affront was tremendously gratifying, only worsened by the short laugh that escaped Christophe. "... Fuck off, both of you."

"We still have some things to work out." Rochelle sighed out. When Ellis turned to look at her, she was hopping up onto one of the restaurant tables, dangling her legs off it. "We found a lot of ammo, so that's off our list - but now we've got a cat to worry about." She slung the backpack off her shoulders, unzipping the front pocket, and dragged out the wadded-up shape of a laminated paper bag. "There was a little cat food left, too, but it's not gonna last that long."

With the slightest tone of irritation, Nick leaned up and back into the booth seat. "I was thinking about that." He lifted a hand, gesturing flatly. "We were arguing between saving it, and letting it loose. So we compromise."

Rochelle crossed her arms, slowly, tilting her head. "I'm listening."

"We crack a window in the front, and cut a hole in the side of the porch screen. Let it come and go." He didn't miss Ellis' heavy frown, and shook his head. "If it runs away, we weren't going to be able to keep it here, anyway. And if it can hunt something out there, then that's less we have to feed it. Plus, we're on a beach. It's a giant litterbox out there."
Ellis ducked his chin down to look into the carrier, watching the pumpkin-coloured eyes flicker to stare him down. "But... whut if it gets hurt out there? Ain't we tryin' tuh keep it safe?"

It was Rochelle who spoke up, leaning her head back on her neck. "Yeah, but we can only do so much. And if it can take care of itself even a little, that's a big deal for us. Could be the difference between this working out." She glanced at Nick, head still draped backwards as if to stretch out her neck. "You think it'd come back?"

Nick shrugged his shoulders. "Do we have another choice?"

Coach sighed, bouncing his knee idly as he did. "This is the damn last time I let y'all go out on yo' own. I turn around, and y'all start bringin' pets in this house." He stood, wiping his palm over the scruffy stubble covering his chin and jaw. "We at least gonna see this new damn spot of trouble?"

Grabbing at the edge of the carrier, Nick unzipped the front, pulling the mesh cover open. Ellis couldn't help but flinch when he reached in, but there was no hiss and no scrabble or flash of claws. He watched, a little surprised, as Nick gently drew out the small feline. His hand was tucked under its belly, and it curled its paws and tail up, only scrabbling for a moment on his forearm before he set it down on the table.

Instantly, it was down into a low crouch. The cat tentatively scanned the room, pink mouth hanging open as it huffed in a few breaths, like it were tasting and sniffing the air all at once. Its whiskers trembled, and as its sides heaved with the force of its inhale, it gave a low and hollow growl.

"Ah, más bello." Chris uttered with a soft whistle, staying very still where he sat. "Un gato precioso."

Coach took one step forward, and in a flash, the cat was scrambling across the table. Its paws skidded on the wood for an instant before it caught traction. Nick uttered a grunt as it scrambled down onto the bench and - judging by the way his hips rolled forward to pull away from the booth's seatback - burrowed into the space behind him.

Even Nick looked a little startled at the act, with an expression somewhat like he'd been goosed.

"Damn." Ellis uttered, scooting to the side. He could almost see the glint of eyes peering out from the dark space behind the small of Nick's back. "You weren't kiddin'. It's real skittish, and it definitely likes you..."

Rochelle laughed slightly, raising her hand. The bloodied knuckle she'd received from the cat earlier had scabbed over, a line of red gone dark and congealed. "Skittish is a word. Little scamp nearly took my finger off." She nodded toward Nick with a slight grin. "Guess Nick has a new friend, since none of us can touch the thing."

Nick shifted a little, stretching one arm behind his back, settling a hand on the cat's back. "I think 'leech' is a better word, considering it won't let go for two minutes." he uttered. "And it's bleeding me about as much."

Rochelle laughed slightly, raising her hand. The bloodied knuckle she'd received from the cat earlier had scabbed over, a line of red gone dark and congealed. "Skittish is a word. Little scamp nearly took my finger off." She nodded toward Nick with a slight grin. "Guess Nick has a new friend, since none of us can touch the thing."

Standing up in a slow motion, Ellis put his hands on his hips. "Maybe it just needs some time. From whut y'all said, it's had a real hard time. I know I'd be real freaked if I'd been trapped in a room fer that long, let alone with a zombie. Best if we just let it get some rest. Maybe it'll calm down."

Nick shifted his weight, careful to keep from leaning back and squishing the cat dug in between him and the booth. The cat was utterly silent now that it had hidden away again. "Great. We'll just let it rest. On my spine."

"You're the one who wanted to adopt it, Nick." Rochelle returned, a teasing tone to her voice that made his grimace widen. She hopped off the table and walked toward the bar, hunting out a bag of their trail mix, her stomach having kicked into gear now that the adrenaline of being out and in danger had begun to wear off. "Welcome to the pains of motherhood."

Nick grimaced.
Chapter 219

The day passed quietly. With Lena's health in decline again, Rhiannon had retreated into herself, and the atmosphere in the restaurant was less than relaxed. Stress hung heavy in the air, and there was nothing to say that didn't feel cheap and over-used.

Chris had fallen asleep after eating a small bowl of granola and taking his painkillers. He'd curled up onto his side, and Rochelle had ended up sitting next to him, letting her legs stretch out and supplying her lap as a pillow. She rested back onto the legs and seat edge of a chair, and her chin drooped to her chest, eyes closed.

Coach had whittled some time away reloading all their firearms, but that had only taken so long. He'd then set himself to the task of cleaning off their melee weapons, armed with cloths from the kitchen, and he was only halfway through the process when Ellis approached him.

"Need some help, Coach?" he offered, already kneeling down. "I can -"

He hadn't even finished the sentence before the big man waved him off. "I got it, son." Coach grabbed ahold of Nick's katana, wiping it clean from haft to end, scrubbing at a few swatches of flesh that had stuck to the metal. His voice offered no alternative but to listen and follow his instructions. "You get some rest."

"Oh... okay." Ellis managed, trying not to betray his disappointment as he turned away, looking around the room.

That left him nothing to occupy himself with.

He wanted to check on Rhiannon, but the girl was radiating an unnerving aura. Her posture discouraged his approach with pinpoint accuracy, and he wasn't sure what he'd say even had he ignored the signs. She'd never taken comfort very well, and he didn't know how to reach out to her.

He could've taken a cue from Chris and Rochelle and taken a nap - but he wasn't tired in the slightest, and he needed to put his body to work, lest his mind pick up the slack. Between Lena and Nick, he had too much to think about.

Ellis quietly made his way across the restaurant, kneeling next to their backpack. He unzipped the front pocket carefully, reaching in to search for the small notepad they had stowed there.

Thumbing the cover up revealed the three sets of information they'd written down: his, Rochelle's, and Coach's.

A determination sunk into him. He'd pass it around tomorrow, and convince everyone to fill it out. Even Rhiannon and Lena, whether Rhiannon did it in her stead or not.

Even Nick.

The idea pleased him, and he pulled away from the satchel with the notepad gripped in his left hand. He intended to go curl up on his nest of blankets, but halfway there, he stopped in favour of looking into the booth Nick had claimed as his bed. The gambler had ended up slumped forward, arms crossed on the table and head buried into his forearms. He was unmoving, except for the slow rise and fall of his shoulders.

Ellis craned his neck, looking for the cat. Nick's back was pressed firmly against the back of the booth, which eliminated that as an option. It was dark under the table, but he was pretty sure it wasn't in his lap, either. He turned and looked around the room, hunting out any sign of the little tortoiseshell cat.

Had it escaped? They still had all the doors closed, so there wasn't anywhere for it to go, but if it was running around the room, scared and alone...

He glanced back at Nick, for just a moment, and a flicker of movement caught his eye. It took him a moment to realize the motion was the twitching of a tail-tip, almost hidden entirely under Nick's elbow. It barely made itself apparent from the shadows around it, black with a speckling of orange.

The cat had crawled onto the table and stowed itself under his chin, burrowed into the space made by his crossed arms. It must've been fast asleep, judging by the fact it didn't react to his presence, and those big orange eyes didn't peep suspiciously out at him. It was comfortable, no doubt, and safe.

The most absurd feeling of jealousy sparked over his mind, followed by a flash of humour at his own weakness.

He quickly scratched at his temple, turning away before he could think too much on it. He tucked the notepad against his belly, retreating to his bed on the floor. He'd pushed it underneath a table, giving him something like a cave, and he sighed as he flopped himself down.

There wouldn't be enough light to read by for very long. He'd have enough time to go over it a handful of times, to burn the letters and numbers into his brain. The act calmed him, like it were some little rebellion against the apocalypse. A declaration that they'd be alright, that his family would stay together.

He just needed to fill out the rest of the notepad.

"¿Chico...?" came a mutter from Chris, bleary and slurred. "¿Dónde estás?"

"It's okay, buddy." he whispered, eyes flickering up to watch the Spaniard's stirring shape lift from its place against Rochelle's thigh. He hadn't meant to disturb Chris, and didn't want him to disturb Rochelle. He coaxed, "Just go back tuh sleep."

"Ojalá pudiera dormir..." the Spaniard moaned back, quietly. Ellis screwed up his brows, trying to listen as best he could. His lack of comprehension set another knot of determination in his chest: maybe he'd get Chris to teach him a little Spanish. If they were trapped in the restaurant for some time, they may as well entertain themselves. "Me duele el brazo. No se detendrá."

'Duele' stuck out. He'd heard it before from the man, and some far-off instinct, some unconscious association, said it had to do with pain. "Do you need more meds?" he whispered softly, and was surprised when the young man uttered a sigh. It was frustrated, angry, and more than a little delirious.

He almost straightened, worry shooting him upright. He'd not heard Chris that agitated before, and it sounded like something far deeper and harder than just an ache. Before he could speak, however, the Spaniard dropped down against Rochelle's thigh and mumbled, "No, gracias."

Ellis wanted to press the issue, but Christophe didn't utter another sound, and they'd as-of-yet avoided waking Rochelle up. He let it go, focusing back on the notepad in his hands. Another task for tomorrow, he decided, thumbing over the varied curves and edges of the three sets of handwriting on the page.

At least he wouldn't lack things to do.
Chapter 220

The first thing Nick felt when he woke was fur. Warm and soft, and crammed against his mouth and nose until it was a miracle he hadn't suffocated. Instinct jolted his head up, shaking off the sensation, and he slapped a hand against his forehead and dragged it down his face. His fingers came away dusted with fur, and when he moved his jaw, the unpleasant feeling of fur caught in his mouth made him grimace.

He looked down, finding his other arm looped around the small cat curled up underneath him on the table. His rude awakening had woken it, too, and it was peering up at him intently. It looked, he was almost certain, a bit offended.

The cat must've crawled there after he'd fallen asleep. He wouldn't have minded it that much, if it hadn't apparently come hand-in-hand with trying to suffocate him in his sleep and coating him in a layer of fur. This is exactly why I never had a pet. All this goddamn fur on all my suits.

"Brat," he informed it, and it surprised him by meowing. The sound was small, and the second half of it broke into just a silent movement of its mouth. He arched a brow, staring down at the cat as it flicked its tail against his bicep. "So you do make noises other than hissing and growling."

It blinked at him, and he lowered his hand to place his thumb under its chin. He scritched there, watching with some satisfaction as its eyes almost closed. It wasn't that he liked cats. He hated plenty of things about them, after all, and not the least of those were the claws that had torn him to shreds the previous day.

He mainly just liked the chance for unassuming company. He didn't have to excuse or explain, and a cat didn't give a shit who he was or what he'd done. All cats cared about was the warmth of another body, and that much, he could provide.

"Still no purr, though, huh?"

Continuing to rub at its tiny chin, Nick let his other hand rub the crunchy sleep from his eyes and looked out from his booth. It was early morning, with the sun just beginning to lavish the windows with a glow. He hadn't been woken to take watch, or by any disturbance, and he was surprised to count out the entirety of his team.

Chris and Rochelle sleeping together, Ellis curled under a table, Coach sleeping upright in a chair with his legs laid out on the seat of a second. That meant Rhiannon was on watch.

Glancing back toward the small cat, Nick exhaled a breath. He'd made a plan, and he needed to stick to it. Pulling away from the table, Nick slid off the booth and stood. He was aware of the cat watching him with precision, every step and movement under careful supervision.

It gave him the strange impression of being observed, like the creature didn't fully trust him not to suddenly turn on it. Or just turn. Maybe the thing knows we're all Carriers.

He considered whether to laugh or wince at that, and settled on neither. Crossing the restaurant with careful steps, skirting around his slumbering teammates, Nick found the crumpled-up bag of cat food where Rochelle had placed it on the bar counter. He picked it up and carefully unfolded it, reaching in to take out a handful of the dry kibble, and turned on his heel.

The cat hadn't left the table, but it had gone to the very edge of it, looking like it was ready to leap after him. Its eyes were huge, whiskers perked desperately, all attention on the bag in his hands. He couldn't help but laugh, choking it back behind a knuckle. He was lucky it didn't seem prone to meowing, as it would've woken the whole room had its posture translated into vocalization.

All that time spent in a room with a zombie had likely trained it out of making much noise, he supposed.

Rather than torture it, he quickly set the bag back down, grabbing up Chris' machete with his other hand and tucking it under his arm before he returned to the booth. The cat practically paced along the edge of the table as he approached, tail up and curled at the end.

By the time he reached it, it was trembling. He set one hand on the cat's back and deposited the food on the table with the other, giving it a few pats along the spine as it hunched down and started lapping up kibble piece by piece. Its fur twitched under his touch.

The kibble wouldn't last, but at least it was something. He left it there, crossing the restaurant to make his way to the front. He dropped the machete into his hands, placing a thumb against the edge and testing it in a few places. It was dulling, too, and he wasn't entirely sure what to do about that.

Chris would know, most likely. He'd kept it sharp up till then.

Glancing up as he came around the corner of the half-wall, Nick found Rhiannon perched on a chair, her feet up on the windowsill. She acknowledged him with a sidelong glance, not even moving from where she had her chin on steepled fingers. Her eyes darted from his face to the machete in his hands, and then returned to looking out the window.

Nick considered a comment, but decided against it. At least she's taking watch shifts now.

He quietly passed by, stepping up to the front door and gently unlocking it. He opened it just a crack, enough to stick his head out and look for any infected near to the porch. When he didn't see any, he slid through, immediately scanning the bottom edge of the screened-in porch.

He needed one of the inner corners, where a small hole wouldn't be noticeable. Although the porch wasn't high-tech security to begin with, it wouldn't do to slash a giant gap into it that a zombie could just stumble through. He wanted, at least, a semblance of security. So, he moved to the far left side, examining the screen where it attached to the frame.

Prodding it with his thumb, he found where the sheet of mesh wiring was nailed into the wooden slats building the skeleton of the porch. He set the tip of the machete against the screen, just to the right of the wooden frame, and used his fist to tap on the handle end. He started gentle, trying to make as little noise as possible. When the screen didn't give, he went harder.

It took a few firm strikes, but eventually, the blade sunk through.

Once he had leverage, he sawed it down a few inches, then pulled it free. He used his left hand to wriggle fingers through the slit he'd made, and pulled. A slight creak announced the mesh giving way, folding, and when he released it, he'd created a messy opening big enough for the cat and little else.

The hole led directly out into shrubbery. It was, at the very least, a secure exit. He stepped back and admired his work, most likely more proud of himself than he should have been.

The window directly next to him squeaked open, just a few inches, and he turned to find Rhiannon leaning in and giving him a dark look through the safety screen. "The fuck are you doing? I thought you were going out to piss."
Nick thumbed at the damage he'd done to the porch. "Making a hole for the cat. We talked about it last night. Did you not listen?" he returned, voice low and sarcastic, happy to state the obvious. She glared at him dully, and he approached the window, grabbing the edges of the window screen. "Watch it, spitfire. I'm popping this off."

It took him a moment. He struggled to get leverage, digging his nails into the trim, and it was only when Rhiannon leaned forward and pulled up the two tabs on her side that it came free. He didn't bother to thank her, pulling the screen away and setting it aside.

"There." he uttered, turning and looking through the screen. The street wasn't clear of infected, but they were idle and wandering, not paying him any mind. "So tell me, Blondie. Do you seriously think you're just gonna float on down the coast, make it to Texas?"

Rhiannon leaned down, crossing her arms on the windowsill to center her face in the opened window. She blinked at him, caught off-guard by the question. "... We don't really have another choice, so, yeah. That's the general fuckin' plan. Why?"

He shrugged, rubbing at his neck. He didn't look at her, because looking at her was liable to lend too much sincerity to what he said. "Because I'd like to know there's some substance to a plan before I hitch my horse to it. So to speak." He reached into the pocket of his slacks, pulling out his cigarettes and lighter in a fist. It was his last one - and as good a time as any.

_Never saw reaching out to the biker bitches for help in my future. World must be really upside-down._

A scoff escaped the blonde, raising a hand to rub at her jaw. "The shit? Who ever said invitations were open?"

Nick pried out the final menthol, putting it between his lips and turning his attention to the lighter. A laugh escaped him, harsh and quiet. "You're not a goddamn school club." He lit up with a snap of the trigger, inhaling the moment it caught and started smoking, and watching as it blared bright orange like a flare. "And before long, you might even be the only member."

He heard the chair scrape as it was pushed backwards, and he was completely unsurprised to listen to her fleet footsteps charge to the front door and shove through it. He let her move toward him, and did not turn. It was hard to resist the animal instinct to defend himself, but he merely breathed in tangy smoke to soothe his nerves.

"You fucking piece of shit -" she snarled under her breath, all fire and fury, and he almost expected her to jump him. To her credit, she didn't. "Don't talk about her. You asshole. You -"

He wasn't in the mood to get yelled at, though he was fully aware he'd brought it upon himself. He couldn't quite bring himself to stop it, either. "Yeah, yeah." he muttered, pulling his cigarette away and tapping some ashes out onto the porch. "I get it. I'm the reason she's hurt, right? I invented zombies. I specifically made that Charger, and ordered it to attack her, and -"

"Can you just fucking apologize?!"

She broke. That was the only word for it - she broke. He had to turn to look at her, disguising his surprise when he found her posture wide, and her muddied green eyes wet. "That's all I fucking want. Just -" She shoved both her hands against her face, turning half away. "Just... Once. Fuck."

He found his shoulders dropping, of their own accord. He'd not expected her to fold, and certainly hadn't expected her to start crying. Hadn't really meant her to. Averting his eyes to his cigarette, he held his silence. He had no comfort to give, so he just gave her a few moments, pretending not to hear the wet sounds of her crying.

It was slowly that she quieted, and only then did he roll the cigarette to the corner of his mouth and speak.

"For the record, I'd have traded places with her." He looked up and outside, ensuring her outburst hadn't garnered them any attention from infected. "If that was how this shit worked." When he received only silence, he turned on his heel and glanced at her. She was staring at him, and hatred still brimmed in her eyes, liquid.

Or maybe it was just misery.

"But it isn't. And no amount of apology and begging and crying is going to change that. But if you want me to say it, sure. I'm sorry. I'm sorry for a hell of a lot more things than your shitty situation, but 'I'm sorry' doesn't fucking change anything there, and it won't change anything here. Do you feel better?" he spat out, jabbing a pinky at her. "Did that really help?"

Rhiannon's chin dropped. She hesitated, her body stuttering before it slumped, and she let out a snort that bubbled wetly. "No. But you suck ass at apologizing, so that might be part of it." Her arm raised to rub at her eyes in an oddly childlike gesture.

He smirked, just a little, taking a puff of his cigarette. The temptation to snark back was intense, but he bit his tongue, watching her pull her composure back together. The woman slowly crossed her arms, seeming to suddenly notice the morning chill outside in her thin cami.

"What even makes you ask, anyway? Aren't you fuckers trying to contact the military, get saved?" She said it with a wave of her fingers, lifting them off her forearms in a plainly dubious gesture. "I thought you guys had a big plan."

Nick shrugged his shoulders, settling back on his heels. "They are, yeah." He plucked his cig from his lips and looked at it, examining the small length he had left before it burned down. "But I don't have a family to look for, and I'm not sure it's the best move for me anymore."

Rhiannon snorted more intensely that time, screwing up her studded brow. "Jesus. I got the feeling you shits were fighting about something, but I didn't -" She made a vague gesture, trying to illustrate the words she couldn't find at first. "I thought you were still tight. Didn't think it was that bad."

That made Nick stop, and cautiously inhale off his cigarette. He held the smoke in his lungs for a moment before forcing it out through his nostrils. "It is what it is." Lifting a hand, he scratched at his jawline, unsurprised to find cat hair stuck in the stubble. He scowled at it for just a moment before shaking it off. "... Just think about it. It's a ways off. But even if your sister gets better, she'll be weak. You two could use somebody else."

She was watching him, and he wasn't sure what exactly was behind the attention. She was thinking, though, and considering the offer. That was more than he'd expected, if he were being honest with himself.

Eventually, she muttered, "You're not exactly the kind of guy a girl wants to take home to daddy."

He laughed, genuinely. The statement caught him off-guard and pleased him in a visceral way, and he forgot to keep quiet. He was almost certain he heard a growl from outside the porch in response. "Inside, Blondie, before we get eaten out here. And do me a favour and don't mention this shit to anyone. I don't need the drama."

The biker moved to return to the restaurant interior, but not before shooting back a cool, "That sounds like blackmail to me. Looks like you're my bitch now, Yank." She lilted the end in sing-song and laughed shortly, despite the fact it was very clear she wasn't joking.

Nick didn't give her the satisfaction of hearing him admit she wasn't completely wrong. He just stamped out his cigarette and took a second to mourn its passing.

_Damnit._
Chapter 221

Ellis had never been more grateful to have pants on.

His coveralls were still a little stiff from the mistreatment, but they were dry, and he was happy with that. Running around in his boxers was bad enough on its own, but it bordered on problematic with Nick in the room. He'd felt exposed and vulnerable and a whole host of other things he couldn't describe.

Sighing softly, he shifted on his feet, reaching back behind the microwave on an upper shelf in the kitchen. He'd hidden the roll of condoms there while his pockets were out of commission, and now stared at them in his palm.

He hadn't been able to convince himself to throw them away, despite the crawling shame that came along with their presence. Like it was a symbol to represent his hope for more, or his weakness to it. If he hung onto them, wasn't that giving in already? Clutching at them in the thought they'd come in handy?

He winced, at that. He didn't want the crinkle in his pockets to remind him every time he moved that if Nick called, he'd probably come. Or desperately want to, at least, and that was almost worse. Not to mention, if Nick ever discovered he still had them... God forbid.

But what if he did need them? If keeping them was a statement that he wanted Nick again, was throwing them away a statement that he didn't?

Did he really want to make that statement? It felt... significant.

All those thoughts spun and whirled in his brain until it dizzied him, caught up in the centrifugal force dragging at his skull. The act of dropping the roll into the trashcan nearby was like slamming on the brakes, and he took a deep breath, closing his eyes for a minute.

Once his gut calmed down, relief washed over him. It was for the best. At least he wouldn't have to think about it anymore.

Ducking back out into the main restaurant, pushing through the swinging door of the kitchen, Ellis looked up. Nick was seated in the booth, slouched down with an elbow on the table and his knee acting as the perch for their newest addition to the team. The cat was crouched down, tail curled around its paws and attention flickering around the room as movement caught its eye.

Rochelle was kneeling next to Coach where he sat on a chair, her arm draped over his leg. Her head lifted, blinking toward Ellis with a small smile. "Hey, sweetie," she called. "Your clothes finally dry out?"

He shifted on his feet, gesturing down at his coveralls. "Yeah... at least they're a li'l cleaner now." He approached, glancing over at the cat perched on Nick's knee. It tensed at his proximity, and he didn't test his luck, keeping a good distance between it and him. "I hope we find some new clothes before our old ones wear out. Maybe it wouldn't be a bad idea tuh go back out soon."

Coach grunted, lightly. "Gotta be shoppin' around here. But I ain't rushin' to get folks on the street again." He nodded his head toward Lena, drawing Ellis' eyes to settle on the woman where she laid. She hadn't stirred all night. "Rather have Rhiannon around if shit goes sideways again."

The blonde was not out of earshot - and at her name, she suddenly hopped up from the other side of the shoulder-high wall, folding her arms over the rim and tucking her chin on her forearms. "I'm not leaving." she stated, simply.

Lifting his hands in a soothing gesture, Coach nodded. "That's what I'm sayin', girl. That's a'ight. Until Lena gets better, you shouldn't leave. I don't want nobody callin' you up on the radio sayin' somethin' happened." He sighed, and let a hand rest on Rochelle's shoulder. She tipped her head to lay her cheek on the back of his hand. "We got time. Got food and ammo now."

A small frown touched Rochelle's lips, her eyes closing. "I wish we were still near the coast. We could keep an eye out for ships."

That made Rhiannon perk up, shifting her hand to place her thumb against her cracked tooth and bite on it in a few controlled clenches. "We've been on the coast a lot, you know. Haven't seen a ship. Not to be a downer, just..." She shrugged. "Honest. I think you guys are shit out of luck."

Ellis put his hands on his stomach, slouching his shoulders. "Well. Whether there's a boat or not - we gotta find a way to contact somebody. They can't all be gone. The army'll be tryin' tuh take cities back before long, I bet."

Setting his knuckles against the cat's cheek and rubbing, Nick sighed out a breath. His eyes were low-lidded, relaxed, and Ellis might've marveled at the cat's influence on him had he not caught a whiff of cigarette smoke that explained it away. "Nobody is sure they're not going to count us in as infected if they do a purge. Honestly, if I were them, I'd be carpet-bombing the whole country."

He was, apparently, not so relaxed that he couldn't be pessimistic.

"If a whole bunch of people are Carriers, they can't just write us all off." Ellis protested, shaking his head. "They probably just panicked, before they understood whut was goin' on. I mean... if they thought Carriers were gonna turn, it'd make sense they'd be scared at first. They're probably workin' on a cure right now. Heck, there's probably Carriers in the army, right?"

Nick snorted, but merely closed his eyes rather than continue to argue. In his stead, Rochelle raised her voice, body shifting to stand. "We've been here before. Let's leave it, okay? I say we get some food scrounged up." She clapped her hands, rubbing her palms together. "I'm 'bout to get hangry."

Ellis nodded tentatively, opening his mouth, but Rhiannon spoke first. "We could fry up some Spam." she offered, bouncing on her toes. "We've got a couple cans left, if Lee didn't guzzle it all without me knowing."

Coach looked like he might jump to his feet at the statement. He restrained himself, but only barely, placing his left hand on his knee while the other patted at Rochelle's shoulder. "You best not get my hopes up, girl. You talk fryin' up meat, I get excited."

The blonde grinned, fiercely. "Now my hopes are up."

A choke put Coach's hand over his mouth, lowering his chin with a sharp clear of his throat. "Ellis, wake Chris up." he ordered, quietly but firmly, pushing to stand gently once Rochelle leaned off him. "Boy's been crashed out. Gotta get him up an' movin' so he'll eat."

Ellis obeyed with a ducked head, sliding a hand up to rub at the crown of his head through his trucker cap. Coach's embarrassment surprised him, and he tried not to laugh. Watching him get teased was unusual and more than a little hilarious, though Ellis couldn't help but wonder how serious it was.

That was a perplexing thought, and he shook it off.
Ellis crossed the restaurant floor, pausing beside Nick. The cat on his lap was peering at him, tense but calm, and he took the chance that a night's rest had calmed it down. He offered his hand out knuckles first, fingers almost curled into a fist. He was relieved to find that it didn't immediately attack him.

When the feline flinched, he froze entirely - and after a few seconds of a wide-eyed stand-off, the cat's black nose started working, whiskers taut and trembling. It very cautiously leaned off Nick's knee, stretching onto its toes to sniff at Ellis' hand. A few deep breaths preceded its mouth popping open, hanging frozen as a slip of pink and white, and it blinked up at his face before releasing a mumbled growl.

Hunching down, the creature turned, slipping off Nick's lap and onto the booth seat. It disappeared under the table and out of sight, body like slinking liquid. Ellis lowered his hand, looking after it with a small exhale. It was progress, he supposed.

Though he knew full well Nick was watching him, he didn't acknowledge him. Turning around, Ellis walked over to the bed where Chris was still asleep and dropped to a knee. The man was laying on his back, his arm flopped over his eyes as if to hide away under it.

Patting his leg, Ellis watched as the Spaniard vaguely stirred, taking very careful stock of the man's behaviour as he did. "Wakey-wakey." When Chris groaned, he queried, "You alright, buddy?"

When a shudder passed through Chris' body he was quick to grab at the other man's elbow. "Chris?"

The touch seemed to bring him back to himself, and Christophe uttered, "Ah... eh. Sí. I am fine. I am fine." He leaned heavily into Ellis' grip as he dragged himself to an upright position, seeming bewildered and only partially cognizant. His voice was huffed and low, blinking away a haze before he looked up at Ellis. "Pesadilla."

Ellis frowned, hand reflexively going to rub at the other man's upper arm. "Whut's that mean?"

"It is -" He hesitated, pressing fingertips into his temple. Ellis wasn't completely sure that it was really the language barrier that had him stuttering and struggling. "Bad... sleep. I -"

"You had a nightmare?" Ellis supplied, and Chris shrugged his shoulders in a frustrated gesture. The Georgian glanced up, and found the entirety of the team watching them. Rochelle gave him a slight frown, concerned. "Sorry, buddy. I know how that is. You wanna talk about it?"

Christophe shook his head tightly. "Just... un momento, por favor."

Ellis hesitated. He lowered his voice, and was aware of the sudden way Rochelle gestured to Rhiannon and murmured something to Coach. It was a brazen attempt to draw attention away from them, giving Ellis space to work. "You sure, man...? If somethin's botherin' you, I'm happy tuh talk 'bout it. You went through a lot. You're goin' through a lot. If there's anythin' I can do..."

The Spaniard exhaled, his head still shaking, but gentler. "You have enough to worry you, mi amigo. I am fine." When Ellis frowned, obviously dissatisfied with that statement, Chris lowered his chin. His voice sharpened a little, going desperate. "I do not want to talk, tío. Por favor. Maybe later."

Ellis didn't want to relent, but something in the other man's voice made him stop. There was a sincere plea there, and Ellis didn't have much choice but to let it go. Again. Though he didn't do so without a forceful, "Okay. Later."
Without affirming the promise, Chris placed his palm over his brow and rubbed there. "We are going somewhere?"

"No, no." Ellis quickly assured him. "Just wakin' you up so you can be ready to eat in a bit. We're gonna get the gennie back on and fry us up some Spam, I guess. Be nice tuh eat some real food again." An after-thought struck him, and he somewhat bashfully prompted, "... Uh, do you know what Spam is?"

The man waved him off, shifting forward to fold his legs and rest his chest against his knees. "Sí, sí. I am not that kind of alien." A barked laugh left him, one that wheedled off into a tired sigh. "Vale. I will try to eat."

Ellis smiled gently, easing back on his heels. "Okay. I'll get you some water."

Chris held his hand out in front of his face, staring at his fingers rather than watch Ellis stand up and walk away. He flexed his fingers, trying to coax his nerves into believing what his eyes could see clearly: that his left arm wasn't there, and that it wasn't trembling, clenching, muscles seizing in agony.

He stuttered a breath.

It just wouldn't stop.
Chapter 222

The sizzle and pop of grease as the thinly sliced Spam seared from a bright pink to a browned and crispy colour was intoxicating. The smell of processed meat cooking threatened to weaken Rochelle's knees. It was easy to underestimate the effect their relative malnourishment had until her body was reminded of what real food was like.

She paced, listening to her stomach grumble and complain, only vaguely paying attention to what was going on around her.

"Hey, Nacho Libre." Nick grunted, leaning out from the booth to glance at Chris. The Spaniard has taken Coach's seat, the big man having disappeared into the kitchen to cook their lunch with Rhiannon. "I had a question." When Chris looked at him, he gestured loosely. "How were you sharpening your machete? I was having some issues fighting zombies. Think the edge is going."

Chris seemed surprised by the question, a frown touching his lips. He scratched at his chin slowly. "B had a sharpener I used. I do not know what happened to it."

Nick grimaced unpleasantly. "Nice. So that's out." He turned his head, looking toward the kitchen. It was with a weighty groan that he rolled out of the booth, stretching his arms over his head for a moment. "Maybe there's something in there. Guess I'll go interrupt our new lovebirds."

Flapping a hand from where he sat cross-legged on the ground, Ellis groaned. "Nick, don't be weird."

"I'm not the one hitting on Coach." The Northerner grinned with a lowered chin, taking a moment to glance under the booth. "Behave." he instructed the glowing eyes peering at him from the shadows. He nodded like it understood, and put a hand in his pocket before striding into the kitchen.

Watching him leave, Rochelle rolled her eyes with a sigh. "Who the hell saw Nick the cat-lover coming?" she muttered, laughing shortly thereafter. Her arms curled over her stomach, feet guiding her to a halt. "At least this apocalypse has a few good surprises every once in a while."

Ellis snorted, tapping his feet against the floor. "Guess so."

The woman turned to look down at the Georgian where he sat. She cocked her head, seeming thoughtful, and lowered her voice. "You okay, sweetie? You and Nick seem kinda - ... good all of a sudden. Did something happen?" When Ellis' expression flashed to something a little startled, she quickly raised her hands. "I'm glad, don't get me wrong. I just -"

Ellis frowned, hands slipping to rub at his shins through the denim of his coveralls. "Just whut?" he prompted, tone guarded. "I thought you wanted me tuh stop lettin' him get me angry. And we ain't fightin' anymore."

"Yeah, of course." she soothed. "I just don't want you getting in over your head. I know what getting roped back in looks like. You get your mind set on 'never again', and then there's some cute buns up for grabs and it's like a reverse snake charmer." It took Ellis long enough to understand what she meant that he only had time to look horrified before she continued. "I'm just trying to look out for you."

Although Ellis understood, and it wasn't anything he hadn't been thinking about himself - hearing the accusation aloud made a sense of shame flood him. Surely his struggle hadn't been that obvious. "I'm not gonna do nothin' stupid, I promise."

Rochelle lifted her hands, a sigh parting her lips. "I'm not saying it'd be stupid. I'm just saying I don't want you to do anything you'll regret. What that is, or isn't, is up to you. I just don't want to see you pining after him." His frown deepened, but he nodded. As reluctant as the gesture was, he knew she was right. "Do you think there's a shot? At... y'know, working things out?"

He balked, lips parting. That was hardly the question he expected from her, and he realized he genuinely hadn't put much thought to it. His eyes darted to the floor, and then over to Christophe, who was very quietly listening to their conversation. The Spaniard seemed at a loss, and shrugged his shoulders in a gentle gesture.

When Ellis responded, it was with an honest uncertainty. "I'm tryin' not tuh think about it like that." He scrubbed at the corner of his left eye, sighing faintly. "I'm just figurin' out where we are, I guess."

He looked up, expecting concern from her. What he got instead was a smile and an affectionate scrunch of her nose. "Good."

Ellis didn't totally know how to respond, but he felt gratified by the positive reaction. Maybe he was handling this okay, after all. He smiled back, gently.

The kitchen door swung back open, and Nick stepped out, gripping a long steel honing rod in his left hand. He released a triumphant "Hah." as he circled the bar counter, hopping his weight half onto one of the barstools. Sliding the machete into his lap, he got a good grip on its handle before setting the sharpener against its edge. "I am a goddamn champion."

Christophe made an urgent noise, putting the heel of his hand to the floor and pushing to roll himself onto his knees. Ellis immediately turned, grabbing for him, intent on helping him to his feet. The Spaniard let him with only a small grimace, but he pushed away once he'd gotten standing. "Chulo, you need help?"

Nick darted a glance over his shoulder, staring the Spaniard down as he approached. "I've got two arms to work with, so, no. I'm g-" As Chris padded up and crawled into the barstool next to him, he grunted, "...And you're here. Neato."

The Northerner focused back on the blade in his hand, slanting the sharpener at an angle before starting to slide it along the edge. The rasp of metal was rough and scattered, and he followed the curve of the machete carefully. When Chris leaned forward, lifting his hand, Nick shot him a threatening blink.

Smartly, Chris withheld whatever advice he'd started to offer.

Working quietly, Nick pretended not to pay attention as Ellis and Rochelle moved away. They crossed the restaurant to sit around Lena, speaking quietly, and he took advantage of the distance to initiate a conversation he'd been meaning to have for days. It had simmered in the back of his mind, but it had only been recently that the Spaniard seemed recovered enough to take it.

He certainly hadn't been inclined to bring it up anytime soon after the man's attempt at suicide.

"I've been meaning to ask. Who was this friend of yours - Sean?" He didn't acknowledge Chris' initial startled look. "Just another kill-crazy assclown you guys picked up?"

Then Christophe's eyes softened a little, and he exhaled the slightest laugh. "He was the first I met, that was not sick. He lived in my dorm but I did not know him. We tried to get to the evac, but - always one step behind, ¿sí? He stayed with me. He was very kind. Me recuerda a él." A nod towards Ellis preceded his messy translation. "He is like him. Was."

Nick kept his eyes on the weapon in his hands, testing the edge with a flick of his thumbpad. It definitely felt sharper. With his window of opportunity now open, he turned the honing rod to the opposite angle and uttered, "You said he's dead. How?"

With a slow nod, Christophe lowered his gaze to watch Nick hone the edge of the machete with careful and unpracticed strokes. "Ah... sí. I guess I did not tell you. He, Phil, and B were going for supplies, and they found some people. B wanted to steal from them, but... Sean argued. The people heard them and shot him." He raised his hand, shaping his fingers into a gun and pressing his fingertips between his eyes.

He let his hand fall, landing on his lap limply. "If he stayed quiet, listened to her... He would be alive." A cynical smile touched the man's lips, fingers fidgeting. "And if I did, I would have both my arms."

"Not exactly." Nick grunted. "I'm pretty confident in my ghost's haunting abilities to say you'd have gotten fucked one way or the other. You got off easy, I'll bet." When Chris merely huffed a laugh, Nick shrugged. "For what it's worth, I think there's something to be said for keeping your shit together through all this. It's easy to go crazy; hard as shit to stay sane. You might be a cripple, but at least you got off Team Batshit."

Chris looked at him, those golden-brown eyes suddenly gone gentle, and Nick recoiled a few inches. He had only half intended it as a compliment, and it was painfully clear Chris had taken it completely too seriously. "Nico..." he crooned. "This is the most nice you have been to me."

"Don't get used to it." Nick snapped off, glad to fall into the simmering silence between them for a moment.

He chewed on the new information, rolled it around in his head. He set it down next to Brenda's dying words and observed where the two stories merged, and where they differed.

"If Brenda murdered Sean, and Phil was there to see it, but didn't tell anyone... Who's the real bad guy? Nick halted his efforts to instead press his knuckles into his brow, exhaling harshly. Feels like the setup to a joke. A one-armed twink from Spain ain't the worst punchline in the world, either."

"... When the fuck are we gonna get out of these asshats' shadows? Swear they're still breathing down our neck."

Chris peered at him, curiosity tilting his head. "¿Nico?"

"Nothing, kid. Just thinking." He reached out, setting the machete down and grabbing his katana from the counter. He placed the hilt between his thighs, resting the dull back of the blade against the bar so he could start sharpening the edge. "I could really go for doing less of that."

The Spaniard flashed a grin that seemed to agree, eyes lowering to focus on his knees. Nick examined him from the corner of his eye, and then looked away.

There didn't seem to be any point in telling him. The man's reality had been rocked enough, and sharing the information seemed mostly like playing into Brenda's post-mortem revenge. There had been no other reason than spite to tell Nick what she had, after all, and Nick was content to not give her the satisfaction of his obedience.
It had nothing to do, he was quite sure, with protecting the man.

"Oh! Hey, hey -"

Rochelle's raised voice made him stiffen, and he jolted upright to look across the restaurant. He was vaguely surprised to see Lena's head lifted, and it took him a moment to follow her gaze.

The cat had crawled silently from under the booth, creeping closer to Nick, but Chris' presence had balked its progress and it was left to sit in the middle of the dining room. Its body was hunched low, all its four legs tucked tightly under its belly and its tail twitching incessantly.

"The - frick? I'm..." ghosted from the biker's lips, and it was a monumental task on Nick's part to keep from laughing at her confusion.

He apparently did a poor job of disguising the struggle, because Rochelle shot him a dark look before surging to rest a hand on the woman's forehead and encourage her to lay back flat. Ellis was quick to join the efforts, placing a hand on her shoulder while Rochelle uttered, "Come on, girlfriend, relax. Everything is fine. Just rest, okay?"

Even as she spoke, she was jerking her head to gesture at the kitchen, eyes still on Nick. He took the cue with a grimace and slid to his feet, resigned to alerting their errant teammates of the development.

Nick did not miss the way Chris slid off the stool to casually follow behind him and, not interested in encouraging the puppy-like behaviour, he pointed severely back at the bar. Christophe slumped back into his seat, almost chagrined, but not quite.

The Northerner was left with the impression he'd played into a game by accident.

As Lena's head rested back down, her eyes darted up to pin Rochelle with a glassy fear. "Y... You see it, too, right...?" She seemed shaken and fragile, and Rochelle soothed her with a careful pet across her hair and a quick nod. Appeased, the brunette closed her eyes, exhaling gently.

"... Thank God."
Chapter 223

Nick was relegated to finishing up the Spam - a task he might've bemoaned had it not given him some time to himself, and saved him the pain of faking interest in the bikers’ predicament. It also gave him the chance to stuff a slice in his mouth before splitting it "evenly" amongst the team.

It was greasy and sweet, salt overwhelming any other flavour. It was spine-tinglingly pleasant, in the same moment it stirred a bitterness in his chest.

The moist pork product tasted like long nights trying to cook and care for his drunken uncle. He ran his tongue over his teeth and thought of burying his head in his knees and crying to the sound of his mother's voicemail. The memory made him laugh, really.

Those nights had fueled in him a spiteful desire to make something of himself. Rich kids become politicians, businessmen, leaders off that shit. Poor kids usually just end up criminals. And he had, among many other things.

The problems of his younger self couldn't have been further away, yet somedays they seemed closer than ever. The entire purpose of his trip to Savannah had been some slapdash attempt to convince himself he was fine; that he'd moved on; that nothing - or everything - had changed. He had been desperate to escape the life he'd crafted for himself, to prove something to somebody.

Then he'd driven himself into an apocalypse and a new ex.

He rolled the phrase around in his head: his new ex. It was so dismissive, so compartmentalized. So easy. He wished he could scrub Ellis' actual name from his brain. He wished he could sterilize his memories down to everything he hated, and all the annoying, stupid things about Ellis that grated at him.

Instead, he just had the irrepressible conviction that if they'd met in a world that made sense, under different circumstances, where Nick had the time and the breathing room to let him - Ellis might've been the one to make him into something better.

Nick didn't bother to portion the thin slices out onto enough plates for each person. He took only three, with enough for Rhiannon and Lena on one, enough for him on another, and the rest piled high for his teammates. The heavy plate went on a flat palm, and the other two held in his other hand, separated by his index finger.

Reluctantly turning, Nick made his way across the kitchen and pushed through the swinging door. He was immediately struck by the fact that Lena was upright. It actually made his footsteps pause, though the hesitation didn't earn him any attention. All eyes were on the injured woman.

"Just because you feel a'ight, don't push it." Coach was in the middle of saying, voice firm. "Most like, you're just feelin' better on them painkillers."

Lena grimaced gently at him, though it was edged with a small smile. "If I don't sit up, I think my butt's gonna fall off." she whispered, placing a hand over her belly. Her fingertips probed there through her shirt, tenderly following the underside of her ribs. "And I'm... serious. I feel... better."

"You can't be better." Rhiannon snapped at her, thrusting her hands up. She didn't actually put them on her sister, but the gesture was clear enough in its intent. "Don't lie just to make me feel better. Lay down, for fuck's sake. You're just making it worse."
Ellis shifted back and forth on his heels, hands tucked tightly behind his back. "I'm with Rhee." he stated, quietly. "You shouldn't be pushin' it. You should be restin'."

The brunette uttered a laugh, the exhale bringing a cough to her lips - and when the sound made just about everyone flinch, she sighed. "Fine, sheesh." she mumbled, and slowly eased herself back, resting her elbows down first to let her body relax at a controlled pace. "Can I eat, at least?"

At that, Nick pushed himself to advance, raising the plates. "Suspicious pink meat, at your service." he announced, circling the bar to set the heavier plate down on its surface. He kept the other two, walking over to the group to offer the bikers' plate out to Rhiannon. "Three slices each. Not exactly a buffet."

The blonde offered him little more than a glance before hopping onto the table to sit next to her sister. She set the plate on her knee, grabbing up a slice from the six arrayed there and tearing it in half with her fingers. "Yum. Grease."

Ellis practically lunged across the room, scooting up next to the bar and leaning in on an elbow. He grabbed three in a neat pile and, without skipping a beat, stuffed the stack in his mouth all at once. Nick watched it happen, biting back on the laughter that wanted to bubble in his chest.

He thought of little tuna sandwiches; the masquerade of family. A fantasy he'd believed in, just a little.

"¡Asqueroso!" Chris yelped in obvious disgust, leaning back and away from the other man. "Chew! ¡Eres un cerdo!"

Rochelle moved to join them, but Coach stayed behind. As Rhiannon nibbled at one half of a slice and offered the other out to Lena, he leaned in and gestured at the prone woman. "You mind if I look at your gut real quick, young'un? Just wanna keep an eye on things."

Plucking the torn square of pork from her sister's fingers, Lena bit off an edge of seared meat and nodded. Her free hand dropped and grabbed into her thin shirt, like a tight jersey athletic top, tugging it up a few inches to bare her belly, just to above her bellybutton. "So much better cooked." she murmured, mostly to herself.

Coach snorted gently, leaning in to examine her stomach. It did not take more than a second of looking for his eyes to widen.

"The damn hell?" escaped him, standing straight up. The urgency of the motion pushed the bench he'd been sitting on back, scraping wood on the floor below. His body bent in, circling a hand over Lena's hip to balance himself as his gaze darted across her belly, thoughtless of the touch.

Nick immediately set his plate on the edge of the long banquet table, stepping closer. He didn't know what he expected to see, but he didn't see anything notable. Her entire midsection was still bruised, and just a little bloated beyond what seemed normal for her frame. It looked pretty much the same as the last time he'd looked.

"What?" Rhiannon hissed, eyes jolting from Lena to Coach. "What?!"

"I -" Coach's voice hesitated, and he seemed to remember himself. He retracted his hand, and very slowly and cautiously placed his palm against his chest. He seemed less shaken and more confused, speaking like he'd only half-formed the thought to begin with. "I know how bruisin' heals. This ain't healin' normal."

Blinking, Nick tried to look again, doing his best to find some kind of meaning in the mottled colours. When he failed, he commanded, "Coach. Let's take a deep breath and try talking in English. You're making less sense than Chris."

As Rochelle slipped suddenly up to his side, Coach reached out to touch a fingertip to the edges of the injury. "Sorry. Just - look. It's turnin' green at the edges. Good half-inch, already." Both women leaned in to look at where he'd indicated. Lena shifted her weight, uncomfortable under the scrutiny. "Bruises go red, then darken, then go green, then yellow before they fade out."

"Doesn't that take time, though?" Rochelle warily returned, frowning, her voice containing the fragile tension of realization.

"Days." was Coach's immediate response. "You whack yo' knee on somethin', it'll take days to go green and yellow. Takes a week or longer fo' the body to break the blood down, absorb it. Lena didn't get smacked. She's bleedin' internally. She got hit barely two days ago, and she was coughin' up blood just yesterday."

Rhiannon thrust a hand up, palm flat. Agitation crept into her voice, a frustration, as did a certain anxious force. "Sounds like a really long fucking way to say 'she's doing really well.'"

Coach's brows were up, his expression having finally settled into disbelief. "... Yeah. I guess... that's what I'm sayin'." However, his head shook, and he looked anything but satisfied. He eased back, slowly finding the bench with his calves to drop down to sit. "I'd call it a miracle, if I'd been seein' any of those these days."

Lena slowly pushed her shirt back down, gaze somewhat shyly darting around the cluster of bodies near her. She tried for a joking tone, but mostly ended up unsure. "I told you I felt better." Her intonation lifted at the end, like it were a question.

Coach released a laugh, as if he didn't know what else to do.

Rochelle gently placed a hand on his shoulder, squeezing, catching his gaze with some effort. "Let's eat, big guy. It's good news, right?" When he nodded, she circled his arm with hers, giving him no choice but to stand up. "So let's celebrate, and get some food in you."

Nick watched as they moved away, and only slowly returned his gaze to examine the two women. He trusted Coach's knowledge, and in retrospect, it did make sense. The green colour stood out, now, and he acknowledged that he'd known that information somewhere in the back of his mind. Her rapid healing was weird, though it was a kind of weirdness he couldn't decide how to react to.

It was unarguably good news - but it stuck in his craw.

He understood Coach's reticence. It was in his nature to look gift horses in the mouth.

He stared too long, and Lena looked up at him. She offered a small, gentle smile, and the expression shot discomfort through him. He turned away, focusing down on the plate in his hands and picking up a slab of Spam. "What, Coach, you can't believe something good would happen to us?" he muttered, walking back to his claimed booth.

"Hell no."

It was nice, admittedly, to find the small cat waiting for him on the booth seat. Its tail shot up, and its whiskers and nose went wild. Most of its excitement was undoubtedly directed at the meat in his fingers, but he'd take it.

As he sat down, he tore a piece off and offered it out to the feline. He was mildly surprised when it hopped easily onto the tabletop and gently mouthed at the Spam, taking it without biting his fingers. The tortie quickly returned to its safe spot on the opposite booth bench, and he could just hear its breathy chewing.

"Whut if it's the Flu?"

Ellis' voice stilled all movement in the room, and Nick blinked up, looking at him from across the restaurant. The Georgian put his hands in his pockets, jutting his lower lip at the abrupt attention. "Uh... I just mean... we're all Carriers, right? So even though we ain't sick like zombies, it's in us. We don't got any idea whut it actually does to us."

Slowly lowering her chin, Rochelle swallowed her bite of pork and shook her head. "I - you think the virus is helping us? That's crazy."

"Is it, though?" he returned, lifting his shoulders. "You ask anyone a few months back, they'd'uh said all this mess was impossible. And it's mutatin' folk all the time, so why not us? If zombies can take a wallop 'n' keep tickin', don't it make sense that we can, too? Or somethin' like that, anyway?"

Choking out a disbelieving laugh, Rhiannon set an elbow on her knee and leaned in. "Why the fuck would a flu that's wiping out the fuckin' human race want to help us survive it? That's not how sickness works. That's not how viruses work. The fuck are you talking about?"

Nick slowly pulled a slice of Spam in half, watching it tear messily along the seared surface. "Technically, we don't know how it works. That's kind of the whole point."

"This shit's way over my head, babygirl." Coach sighed out, slowly grabbing up a slice of Spam and popping it into his mouth. "I just know it ain't normal, how she's recoverin'. I'm glad an' all, it just ain't normal. Not even fo' us. Shit, what 'bout Ellis' rib? Nick's shoulder? Yo' hand? None of it healed this fast."

"They all healed faster than we expected, though, didn't they?" Rochelle countered, turning her palm up to look at the pinkened strip across her flesh. "I mean... Christ, Coach. It's crazy, but it makes sense."

Coach grunted, shaking his head, less in negation and more in frustration.

Christophe hesitantly looked between Ellis and Coach, placing his hand gently over his bandaged stump. He seemed oddly distressed, and it was with a reassuring smile that Ellis leaned over to nudge his thigh with a knuckle. "Hey, man. It's a'ight. Just means we're like... superheroes, right? It's pretty cool, if yuh think about it. I always wanted superpowers, but I guess I didn't think it'd happen like this."

"Let's not jump to that kind of shit." Nick muttered, turning his gaze to stare back at the two orange eyes peeping at him over the edge of the table, watching intently as he took a bite of Spam. "We've seen Carriers die. Whatever it's doing, if it is actually doing something, let's not act like we're invincible."
He was pretty sure Ellis stuck his tongue out, but couldn't look up fast enough to confirm it. The Southerner crossed his arms over his chest and dropped his chin. "I always wanted super speed." he drawled, pleased when Chris uttered a laugh. "Or controllin' time."

The Spaniard waved his hand in front of his stump, and grimaced. "I would take, em, regeneración, ¿sí?" Ellis snorted, breaking into a full grin when Coach had to swallow a laugh of his own.

"Y'all kids can't take shit seriously."
Chapter 224

It was overdue when it finally happened. They'd all been so buried in their food and their thoughts, wrestling with the revelations and what it all meant, that it was easy to forget that Lena had been unconscious for most of the previous twelve hours.

Finally, as Nick had settled into a sprawl with his legs stretched out on the booth seat and the feline crawled up onto his lap, Lena asked the question.

"Is someone gonna explain the cat...?"

He looked down at the orange-and-black bundle of fur settling down into a tight ball in the crevice between his thighs. A laugh escaped him, realizing that her confusion probably equaled his own when he first set eyes on the creature. It was a tiny, fragile thing that didn't belong in the apocalypse.

"Uh -" Rochelle uttered, rubbing her palm on her cheek. "Yeah, sorry... We found it last night, going on a supply run. Some of us are big softies, so... Now we're stuck with it. He's pretty cute, but Nick's the only one he'll let close. Everyone else gets clawed."

"She." Lena responded, earning her a bewildered blink from the producer. With a faint smile, the brunette curled her arm to rest it above her head on the table, letting her head nestle into her forearm. "Tortoiseshells are all female."

Ellis popped his lips in a surprised noise, turning and looking toward the prone biker. He'd hopped up on the bar, sitting between Coach and Chris, and his dangled legs swung and kicked in the air. "Really? Huh. I didn't know that." He scratched at his jawline, nails catching on the few scattered hairs trying to grow there.

Sliding her hand to rest on Lena's arm, Rhiannon bent her head in with a frown. The sisters locked eyes, and the blonde's voice went low. "Speaking of. I found something while we were out there."

When Lena nodded encouragingly, Rhiannon darted to her feet and slipped to kneel next to the group's backpack.

She unzipped the main pocket and pried out the small picture frame they'd stowed there, carrying it back to her injured sister. Offering it out, she grinned. "Looky-looky."

Lena took it, holding it up in front of her face. A glint sparked in her eyes, brushing the pad of her thumb over the surface of the frame's glass. "Did you -" She didn't even finish the words before Rhiannon was prying the small keyring from the slashed pocket at her thigh, raising them with a jingle.

"Got a bill for the place it's docked at, address and all. Say you love me."

The brunette laughed a little, though the exhale brought her to a few small coughs. When she'd regained her breath, she smiled and uttered, "I love you." At Rhiannon's giddy grin, she looked back at the photograph and let its bottom edge rest against her chest. "Where'd you get it from...?"

"Same place we got the cat." Rhiannon responded easily, shrugging her shoulders. "Magpie Gun and Pawn, or some shit. The owner -"

She shut her mouth, disgruntled, when Lena burst into laughter. The sound immediately turned pained, and she almost desperately placed her free hand over her mouth, tears pooling in her eyes.
as one leg kicked up off the table in a small flail. She was too breathless, wheezing, to respond when Rhiannon flashed a confused look down at her.

Lena pointed at the photo, handing it back, and Rhee was left to stare at it uncomprehendingly.

Interest piqued, Coach grunted as he got up to his feet, walking over. He held his hand out for the photograph, and Rhiannon acquiesced to handing it over. The big man took a long look at it, and barely restrained a twitch at the corners of his mouth. "... So we're clear, this is the owner of the place y'all found the cat? So the owner of the cat, too, right?"

Nick frowned, feeling very distinctly like he should've gotten involved in the conversation before it escalated. He didn't know what was coming, but he'd been around long enough to know when he was about to dislike something. He definitely disliked whatever was going on across the room. "... Yes?"

That released the floodgates, and before he knew it, Coach was barking laughter, bending forward with the hand that wasn't holding the photo braced on his knee. He, however, had the composure and health to speak through it.

"Nicolas - he looks just like you!"

Nick very much wanted to charge across the room and grab the photo, but he had four pounds of anxiety with razor-sharp talons on his lap, and he was pretty sure his crotch wouldn't survive if he tried to throw the cat from his lap. He was forced to watch as Ellis did instead, and the Georgian practically hopped to steal the frame from Coach's hand and look at it.

"Ho-lee shit." he ghosted, rubbing his thumb against the man in the photo. Dark hair was held back from his forehead by a pair of sunglasses, and a broad smile cut into his sharp features and shone white through the trimmed stubble covering the lower half of his face. "Dude, he does! The eyes ain't right, 'n' he's older, but -"

"Wait." Nick snapped, much faster than he could control. He set a hand against the cat's side, gently trying to encourage it - her - to slip off his lap. Her claws came out, catching in his slacks, and he was forced to stop almost as soon as he'd started. "Which one of us is older, exactly?"

Ellis didn't get a chance to clarify before Rochelle was on him, grabbing his wrist so she could turn the photograph around and get a look at it. She gaped, staring at it even as she snatched it up and sidled over to show it to Chris.

"No way -" she uttered. "I didn't even look at him! It's like Nick, only happy, and apparently the purveyor of a local business. It's the Twilight Zone in here." Nick could not put into words the various ways every part of that offended him. "No wonder the cat likes you, Nick! She thinks you're her daddy."

Christophe helpfully offered up, "Do not feel bad, Nico. You are more handsome."

"That really doesn't help." Nick glanced down at the small tortoiseshell, and was faced by an owlish pair of eyes that looked at him with something he was almost sure was fear. As much as he wanted to protest the suggestion, it also made a lot more sense than pretending he'd earned the cat's loyalty.

"You do realize your dad tried to eat you, right?" he reminded the feline, watching her face slowly squint into a blink. "Maybe not the best role model."

He made a concerted effort to ignore the giggle that escaped Rochelle. She turned away, taking the photo and walking it back to the bikers. "Sorry. I'm a sucker for a chance to make fun of Nick."
She grinned. "And for what it's worth, I'm really glad we could help you guys. We'll do whatever we can to keep helping, even if I'm not excited to say goodbye to you two."

Rhiannon hesitated visibly. Her eyes darted up to Rochelle's face, examining the producer's dark features and wide smile. Rochelle's cheer faltered, sure she'd misspoken or over-stepped.

Then the blonde reached out to snatch the photograph up, curtly turning her chin away. "Yeah. Thanks." She set the photo frame down on the table, leaning in to rest her elbows on her knees and glance down at her sister. "Keep up your inhuman healing, and maybe we'll be outta here soon." she snarked, baring her teeth in a gesture that was definitely not a smile.

Lena's lips curled, and she closed her eyes.

Rochelle gently folded her hands together, standing there for a soft moment. She considered pressing on the shift in behaviour, but knew better than to do so. It was likely as simple as Rhiannon being uncomfortable with the emotional show. It wasn't the first time, after all, and it certainly wasn't anything she hadn't gotten used to from Nick.

So, she inhaled, and stepped back. She spun on her heel and faced Ellis, smiling. "You know, we should really give her a name."

Ellis' eyes practically bugged out of his head. He put his hands on the back of his neck, fingertips curling into the muscles of his shoulders, beaming. He started bouncing on his heels, practically hopping. "Oh, man. You're right. We don't know whut her real name is?"

"No collar or nothin'?" Coach inserted, gently.

Nick placed a hand at the cat's scruff, circling fingers halfway around her neck and rubbing up to her ears. "Nope." he answered, simply. "Not that it really matters. It's not like she cares what we do or don't call her. How about, 'little furbag'?"

Ellis slid his hands up the back of his neck and got his fingers under his cap, pushing it up enough to rustle his own hair. He completely ignored Nick, practically buzzing with thought. "Whut'd you say the shop was? Magpie?" he questioned, searching out affirmation from Rochelle.

When she nodded, he paused - and then beamed.

"I got it. Easy." With a wide and exuberant swing of his arm, he pointed across the restaurant and at the booth. Nick couldn't help but tense - but mostly because the kid practically hollered, and the cat on his lap sunk claws into his thighs in response to the noise. "Maggie."

Rochelle slapped a hand on her cheek, laughter chiming in a burst of pleasure. "Oh, Jesus. It's like a little grandma cat. It's perfect."

Nick scowled, leaning his head forward to try and get a look at Ellis. The kid looked tremendously pleased with himself. "Who put you dumbshits in charge of naming her? She doesn't even like you."

"Oh, how quick his tone changes. Okay then, Mr. I-Vote-When-It's-Convenient. Let's vote." Rochelle crooned, before turning to face the rest of the survivors. She slung an arm over Ellis' shoulders and ordered authoritatively, "All in favour of Maggie, say 'aye'!"

Nick grimaced at the shouts that rose up from every goddamn person in the room except him.

He genuinely regretted the fact it didn't bring a horde down on them. All it did was send the cat - now christened, he supposed - shooting to the floor under the booth, leaving behind tracks of pain where claws treated his slacks like tissue paper.

He wasn’t sure he'd come out of this experience with much skin left.

Or dignity.
The café had proved a solid enough hideout. The day passed with only a few incidents of infected wandering too close, and one Hunter that spent an hour crawling around on the rooftop, growling reverberating through the ceiling. Rhiannon was the one to eventually lose her patience and run out into the yard, taking it out mid-leap with Coach’s shotgun.

She came back with blackened blood on her cheek and a relaxed air like she’d released some energy.

Maggie disappeared a few times, slinking into the front of the restaurant and through the passageway Nick had prepared. She returned, however, looking none the worse for wear. Nick didn't say anything, but he seemed tense while she was gone... and relieved at her reappearance.

Lena's improvement wasn't all-encompassing, and she quickly tired, falling back asleep in her bundle of blankets. It seemed more like genuine rest, though, and less like a sweaty, clammy convalescence.

The restaurant was a distinct downgrade from their previous home, however, particularly when it came to privacy - or more accurately, the lack thereof. Although Ellis was a generally heavy sleeper, the team was so closely compacted that any disturbance was liable to wake at least someone, and the apocalypse had trained him to be alert for conspicuous noises.

Those factors together meant that halfway through the night, Ellis woke to the soft sound of a chair scraping against the floor. He startled, eyes opening, almost unsure if he'd imagined it for a moment. A soft groan made him straighten, blearily trying to blink away sleep. He pawed at his eyes, curling his legs underneath him.

His eyes were not adjusted to the darkness, and when he sought out the source of the sound, he mostly just saw shadows moving amongst shadows.

It happened again, and he was fairly confident it was Chris. He had, unfortunately, grown familiar with the Spaniard's pained utterances. Ellis straightened up further, eyes latching onto the shape of a body as it came into gradual focus. The man was slouched, standing in the center of the restaurant, arm hugging his torso.

Rather than speak, Ellis pushed a fist into the floor, getting himself up to his feet. His legs wobbled with exhaustion, but adrenaline was quickly working its magic on his muscles, waking his body up well before his mind had completely stirred. He approached the other man, working mostly off the assumption that the floor between them was clear.

Luck was on his side, if nothing else.

"Buddy?" he whispered, gentling his voice. He wasn't entirely sure who was on watch, but judging by the fact Rochelle had not stirred, he thought it might be her. "Whut's goin' on?"

It did not fully surprise him when Christophe moved away, retreating from him. "Nada está mal. Todo bien." came the response, harsh and torn and full of tears. It was so gut-wrenching that it caused honest fear to spark in Ellis' stomach, surging to maintain their closeness. "Go back to sleep."

"Chris -" he uttered, reaching out a hand. His fingertips made contact with the man's waist, and found him recoiling, uttering a pained noise. Ellis let him, at first, but instinct overrode his caution.
Something was seriously wrong, and he couldn't let it slide again.

"Chris." he repeated, forcefully, aware that his volume was raising. If he had to wake the rest of his team in order to corner the man, he would, and his intent must have carried. The ex-Angel halted, holding mostly still but for a soft tremble. "Talk tuh me. I can't help if yuh don't talk about it."

He knew he'd broken through to the other survivor when his head dropped. The shame that suffused his voice, however, came as a shock. "N-no. I do not want to - I am fine. I do not need help. Sleep is hard, but I - it is fine."

Ellis hesitated, arms falling slack at his sides. Suddenly, in the darkness of night, he felt like he saw it clearly for the first time: Christophe was not just unwilling, but terrified of being a burden. He was afraid of it, in a more primal way than made sense. His tone was desperate, like he were begging Ellis to forget, to let it go.

His old team would'uh never helped him through this. Does he think... he can't be weak? He wanted to laugh. Man. We're weak all the dang time.

"You know we're here for you, right? You don't gotta hide it if yer hurtin'." Softly, Ellis spread his arms, helplessness imbuing his tone with a plea. "Please, man. You helped me, gettin' through Nick. I just wanna do the same."

Did he hear the audible snap of Chris' self-control, or was it his imagination, fabricating the noise? All he knew for sure was that there was suddenly a body against his, collapsing, and he only just caught the man in his arms. He tightened his grip on Chris, slipping the man's arm around his waist and getting fingers gripped on the waistband of his cargo shorts.

His relief and his worry mixed into a discontent in his chest.

"C'mon. Let's move before we go wakin' everybody up." he whispered, glad when Chris cooperated. They made their way across the restaurant floor, carefully picking through the tables and chairs to make their way into the tiny, unisex bathroom built into the corner opposite the front walkway. Ellis pushed the door open with his shoulder, and walked them carefully to the toilet.

He nudged the cover down with his knee before coaxing the Spaniard down onto it. The moment that the man was seated, Ellis dropped to a crouch, resting his forearms in a tight cross on Chris' knee. He looked up at him, blinking through the darkness to get a better view of his face. "Whut's goin' on?"

Christophe's expression was strained, young features stricken with pain. His breath was damp and thick, and sour with the slightest hint of bile. "My arm hurts. It is - the drugs no help. It does not stop."

Frowning, Ellis echoed, "Arm? Like, yer shoulder hurts?"

Christophe negated that with a frown. "I... My arm, tío. It is like I still have it, and it... hurts. Mordiendo mi puño - I -" To illustrate, he gritted his teeth and curled his hand into a tight fist until his nails dug into his palm. "I can't move it. It is like... fire. It has been days."

Ellis' chest tightened. He retracted his arms and settled his hands on his thighs, gaze lowering. "Do you know what phantom pain is?" Without waiting for confirmation, he curled his fingers into a fist, eyes closing. "It's... like yer body's tryin' tuh find the arm you lost, but yer arm ain't talkin' back, so it keeps tryin' harder'n harder, until all you got is pain."
When he reopened his eyes, he found Christophe looking at him, inscrutable in the dark. He couldn't tell if he understood or not, and found himself babbling. "Yer brain's tryin' tuh play Marco Polo, but yer arm ain't respondin', so yer body's yellin' "Marco!" louder and louder. It's like, a feedback loop, or whatever."

"How I stop it?" the Spaniard whispered, lifting his hand to press his palm against his left eye and grip nails into his skin.

Ellis frowned, sucking carefully on his teeth. "I... wish it was that easy. There's some stuff we can try. Like, massagin' yer shoulder's somethin' we gotta start doin'. Gets the blood movin'. But stoppin' the pain is... I dunno. You gotta find somethin' that works, get yer mind off it. Or if somethin's triggerin' it - stop that, y'know?"

Chris' head lowered, chin dropping in a hopeless gesture, and Ellis glanced up and around the bathroom. His eyes caught on the small circular mirror hanging over the sink, putting his lips out in a purse. "There... is somethin' we could do. I read about it once. It's kinda silly, though."

A slight laugh escaped the Spaniard, wry. "I think I am desperate, ¿sí?"

Straightening, Ellis got to his feet and walked over to the sink. He dug his fingertips underneath the mirror, prising it from the wall. It came off with barely any effort, tearing away like it had been attached with nothing but sticky tack. It weighed little, and he bounced the delicate frame in his palm. "Okay." he uttered.

"Scooch over." he ordered, sitting down on the toilet next to Christophe. He cradled the mirror in his arm, turning toward the other man. He did not miss the confusion that spawned on the Spaniard's face as he watched.

"Hermanito, what are you doing?" he protested, tone bewildered as he gestured with his hand toward the reflection tilted in his direction. Ellis was torn between laughing at his confusion and feeling a bitter sadness at the weakness to his voice. "I do not want to see this - mi cuerpo destrozado. I don't want to see it."

Chris had been full of over-confident bravado when they'd met him. He seemed different, now. Smaller.

Insistently, Ellis pressed the edge of the mirror perpendicular to Christophe's chest, nodding down at it. "Just look, a'ight?" When the man obeyed, glancing down at the reflection of his upper body, Ellis peeked over the top of it to join him. "See? It looks like you got both yer arms now. Like a magic trick."

The reflection was not quite perfectly lined up, a few inches off-center, but the mirrored halves of Chris' body made a convincing illusion - and the Spaniard was suddenly desperately quiet. "Guess the idea is, if you can convince yer brain tuh stop yellin'... make it think it's gettin' listened to..." He trailed off. Ellis was tempted to continue speaking out of nerves, but something made him keep quiet. He watched the other man, feeling a soft tension in the air.

Chris lifted his hand, stretching his fingers in a careful and slow motion. He seemed simultaneously fragile, like a child discovering the movements of his own limbs for the first time, and abruptly focused with a steely dedication. Responding to the optical illusion seemed to come naturally to his body, eyes riveted on the reflected image.
"¿Qué demonios?" he muttered, voice fractured. He sounded disbelieving, and Ellis struggled to follow the words. "Quiero decir, sólo un idiota creería esto."

A soft laugh escaped the Georgian, and he settled his chin more solidly against the edge of the mirror. He was almost sure there was slightly less pain in the other man's posture, but he was afraid to assume. "Man, I can barely catch a thing when you get goin' like that. You gotta throw me a bone here, man. Is it helpin' at all? I don't think it'll fix things all at once, but..."

Christophe mumbled a non-committal sound at first, eyes not lifting from the mirror's surface. Eventually, he spoke. "I do not know. But... I can... move it. Move my fingers." His body pressed a little closer, and Ellis wasn't able to stifle the vaguely startled noise that escaped him. "It is good to feel it move. Even... un poco. A little."

"That's good." Ellis responded, pleased fit to burst. ",M glad."

They sat there for a while. Ellis didn't bother to count the minutes, content to be there as long as Chris needed. He was just happy to have even the smallest positive effect, the subtlest therapeutic influence. It was a favour he could finally return, at least. The contact of their hips and legs was soothing, and he relaxed his head back against the tank. Ellis closed his eyes, determined to rest them for a moment.

He didn't even realize he'd started to drift off, not until the Spaniard's hand was shaking his shoulder, startling him out of the twilight of half-sleep. He'd kept a grip on the mirror despite the relaxation of his body, and he tightened his fingers, blinking quickly into Chris' soft look.

"We go back to bed, ¿sí?"

Ellis gave a tired smile, lifting his free hand to rub at his eyes. "Sorry - guess I didn't wake up all the way." He shifted the mirror away, dropping it gently onto the floor, braced against the bottom of the toilet. He tried to give the other man a more thorough once-over, and felt confident that he was less tense. "You think you can get some rest now?"

Christophe nodded his head, expression settled into a slightly shy frown. "Creo." he murmured, nodding. "It is better, now." When Ellis moved to stand, he was stopped by Chris' hand abruptly alighting on his elbow. He startled, turning to acknowledge the man, finding the Spaniard's face drawn in a weak smile. "Gracias, mi amigo. It helps to have you here."

His voice was oddly abashed, withdrawn, and his uncharacteristic embarrassment lent a sincerity to the words that made Ellis' face heat up in response. As confident as he was that he didn't have feelings for the other young man - he was tremendously unsure how Rochelle held hers back.

"'Course, man." He grinned, offering his hand out with a reassuring nod. Chris took it, unbalanced as he drew to his feet, but kept aloft by Ellis' firm grip. "I'm here anytime."

The Spaniard looked at him, eyes almost black in the darkness, and a frown touched his lips. Ellis couldn't help but cock his head, sure there was something more. It stuck in the foreigner's throat with a visible hitch, his body struggling into a shiver as he fought down the urge to voice it.

"You okay?"

Softly, just once, Christophe nodded.

Ellis considered him. He knew it was a lie, but Chris had already opened up more than he'd expected. He didn't want to push him too far and have him break, not when he'd gotten the man settled back down. It was a process, he reminded himself. A process he didn't want to mess up.
So he smiled. "Okay. If it starts hurtin' again, wake me up."

The man's nod was honest, then, and that was enough.
Rochelle was absolutely convinced something had happened. She couldn't put her finger on it, had no concrete evidence, but she was certain that something was different.

It wasn't odd for Chris and Ellis to be near each other, for sure. The two boys had become close, and she was glad for that - but it was different, today. Chris orbited him like he was leashed to the Georgian's wrist, and the once or twice that Ellis left his side, Chris started to fidget and grow tense.

He only relaxed once the mechanic returned to him, like it was a breath he'd finally taken.

When she initially noticed it, she dismissed it. Then the pattern continued, and she was left to wonder. Ellis either didn't pay attention or simply didn't mind it. Either was likely, in her mind.

Her first instinct was to go to Nick, not that she was quite sure why.

The man was slouched in his booth, resting up against the inner wall, his low-lidded attention on the can of carbonated orange soda in his hands. He was playing with the tab, bending it up and then flattening it back down, listening to the aluminum creak. When she slung an arm over the top of the booth and leaned in to look at him, he didn't acknowledge her.

"Hey, Nick. You notice anything weird today? Chris is acting... off."

The gambler snorted, looking at her with a slight sneer. His tone was just a little crueler than she expected, though she'd anticipated some amount of aggression. "You mean his separation anxiety with Overalls? Yeah, a little. Maybe he's finally gotten tired of waiting for you to make a move."

The ease at which he understood what she was talking about, and the speed of his diction, made it painfully clear how attentive to the situation he was. If he'd had any chance at playing it cool, it was gone. She considered leaving it alone, but couldn't resist taking a shot. "Jealousy doesn't suit you, suit."

Nick tried for a dull look, but didn't quite manage the apathy.

"Nothing happened last night, right? You didn't hear anything, or -"

His thumb suddenly pushed too hard, and the can tab snapped off from its moorings. He seemed vaguely agitated at the aluminum's failure, taking the slim piece between his fingers and tensing his thumbnail against it like he might flick it away. "Do I look like I fucking care? Jesus Christ, woman. I am not your wingman on this. Go talk to the guy yourself."

Rochelle frowned, though it was mostly hollow. She didn't feel much disappointment or surprise at Nick's scathing attitude, not lately; it was the simple sting of a readjustment, leaning back into the same rut that had become almost comfortable with time. The quiet reminder that yeah, right, that's where we stand. She sighed, hands going to her hips.

"That's not the worst advice, actually." left her, flashing him a sad smile before turning away. She'd have to be satisfied with the clear discontent that went through him, and how apparent it was that he disliked her getting the last word.
One tiny victory.

Ellis was huddled at the bar with Chris, their attentions intently focused on something on the bar counter, and it wasn't until Rochelle had stepped up closer that she recognized it: the small notepad they'd filled with their personal information. Her last-ditch attempt to cheer him up after Nick had dumped him, not that she'd not been deadly serious about its use.

If they ever got separated, they'd never find each other again, if all they had was first names. Hell, she was pretty sure most of them would've stupidly gone looking for a Georgia man named 'Coach.'

It's weird, how we don't really know each other that well... and I still feel like these guys know me better than anyone I've ever met. Guess this kind of situation pares everything down to the bone, down to what matters. You think you'd die for someone, but we've all actually been in that position.

"What'cha doin'" she chimed, trying for a playful tone. She let herself hop into place behind Ellis, slipping her arms around his shoulders and linking her fingers over his chest. He started, looking his usual degree of embarrassed, before he craned his head to smile at her.

"I was just tellin' Chris 'bout our plan. I thought now'd be a good time tuh get everyone in on it, since we ain't got much tuh do, anyhow."

She nodded in a big, slow gesture, eyes flicking toward the Spaniard. He avoided meeting her gaze directly - something else she'd noticed that he'd been doing of late - and flashed a nervous little grin. "I wish I knew my student visa number. Ay, no importa."

"Do y'all got social security numbers over there?" Ellis asked, scrunching his nose curiously. "Or like... somethin'?"

Christophe laughed, at that, placing his hand on the clavicle of his stumped arm and rubbing there idly. "¿En serio?" When the Georgian looked a little put out at the clear tease in his voice, he shook his head. "Sí, sí... it is not like this, though." With a vague flick of his hand down at the other entries on the page, he reached to grab the slim marker Ellis had left on the counter.

Ellis instinctively reached out to help him with the cap, but Chris had it gripped in his teeth in a flash, yanking the marker free with a soft squeak of plastic. He kept the cap trapped between his teeth like a cigar, leaning in to start writing beneath Ellis' entry.

The Georgian's body stiffened. Rochelle could feel it perfectly, pressed into his back, and she knew exactly why: he'd mentally eked that space out for Nick. It was silly, of course - there was plenty of room for all of them, and Chris' entry wouldn't replace Nick's.

She squeezed her arms, then released him, sliding between them. She rested a palm on either of their stools, watching Christophe's name take shape on the page. He tried to brace the notepad with his wrist, but the strange posturing of his hand made his handwriting shaky and uneven.
"It is similar, ¿sí? I only came to here for school, so I did not get anything like this." The cap in his mouth exaggerated the soft lisp that exposed itself now and again in his accent. He tapped his thumb against Ellis' social security number - then, abruptly, froze. His thumb slid down to the date Ellis had written: 04/05/85. "...Ellis, mi amigo. This is your birthday?"

The Georgian's eyes blinked down to the paper - and then both men looked at each other in unison.

"You're younger than me?!!" Ellis blurted, shocked.

Christophe lifted his hand in a bewildered gesture, fingers splayed except for where he held the pen. "You are older than me?!!" He spoke with such force that the cap caught by his teeth fell, landing on his lap.

Hesitantly, the Georgian put his elbow on the bar, palm bracing his jaw. "I mean... I guess I should've figured, when you mentioned college, but... I didn't think 'bout it. You just seemed older than me." He blinked a few times as if to process the new information, and then lifted his gaze. "Huh."

The one-armed survivor seemed utterly bewildered, still uttering little offended huffs and puffs.

"I... sort of figured you two were about the same age." Rochelle managed, doing her best to keep a straight face. And though it was true, she still couldn't deny feeling the slightest bit weird about having it confirmed. Ellis was too young for her, already.

But that was a very presumptuous thought. Besides. It's not like I see Chris as a little brother. It's totally different. Which left the question of what she saw him as, and that was too far deep in waters she didn't know how to traverse.

"Why don't you go get the girls to put down their info?" Rochelle put a hand on Ellis' shoulder, soothingly, thumb catching on the blue tattoo peeking out from under his sleeve. Chris placed the pen atop the notepad as she spoke. "Even if they go off sailing to Texas, it'll be good to have a way to look for them some day."

Rhiannon was already looking up, eyes narrowed suspiciously, but Ellis didn't seem daunted at all when he got up and practically bounced to close the distance. He started babbling, explaining the notepad in his hands. Lena's attention was soft and understanding, though Rhiannon seemed strangely awkward about the whole thing.

Lowering his chin, Chris glanced over his shoulder, eyes flickering over Rochelle's expression.

There it is. she thought, confusion creeping through her. He was already getting tense, nerves visible in the way his fingertips started to tap together, index finger following the line of his thumbnail cuticle. He dug at it, trying and mostly failing to peel off a hangnail.

It was an itching gesture, scratching, subtly neurotic. It was hard to separate abnormal hints of blood from the average spray and splatter of the apocalypse, but she reminded herself that he had no reason to have speckles of dried blood around his nails. He hadn't been in combat in a long time.

She wondered if it was anything like the tic she'd picked up of tearing at her lower lip - and the moment she thought of it, her tongue sought out the roughness of the plump flesh. It took effort not to go after it, and she wrung her hands together to stifle the urge.

Crap. We're all gonna end up anxiety-ridden and setting each other off. Cabin fever gone self-destructive.

She smiled, gently. "Do you want to get some air? You've been cooped up more than any of us."

When the man - she was trying so very hard not to think 'college boy' - hesitated, she dipped her chin to get a better look at his face. "I promise I'll keep you safe from the zombies."

That hooked him, and his lips twitched upward, their gazes matching. "I believe this." With a gentle shift, Chris set his hand on the edge of the bar, sliding himself to stand. "Vale. But you must get me home before dinner."

Rochelle uttered a genuine laugh, covering her mouth with a quick flash of her hand before she retreated, giving him room. She turned to lead him toward the back door, aware that Coach was very closely monitoring them from his seat at one of the restaurant tables. She didn't say anything, but she turned her hip to show him the gun tucked into her jeans.

He let her go.

The backyard was small, pressed close to the neighboring building. There was a small square of concrete off the door, with a set of stairs down to the ground. The shed that contained the generator was right up against the restaurant's exterior, built next to the breakerbox.

Easing down to sit on the stairs, Rochelle gave a tight sigh. She pulled her handgun from her waistband, setting it beside her hip on the concrete. "Can't believe I'm this close to the beach, for the first time in years, and I'm stuck in a damn crab-shack with a bunch of uptight grumps."

Christophe didn't respond, so she looked up at him. His eyes were on the pistol.

She followed his gaze, then returned her attention to his face. "You can probably shoot it, you know." He startled at the words, almost recoiling, like he'd been caught. "The recoil's not that bad, and we can always trade off when you have to reload it."

He stood there, awkwardly parting and sealing his lips in a strange rhythm. He struggled at words, and she found herself frowning. She had no concept, no way of knowing, that he'd very seriously considered placing that very pistol to his temple and pulling the trigger. That didn't mean she was oblivious to the existence of some kind of emotion surging through him.

"... Sorry, did I say something wrong?"

The Spaniard laughed abruptly, a soft fracture to the noise. He approached, slowly joining her on the stairs. He crouched down first, then put his palm against the concrete to balance himself as he pushed his legs down the steps and relaxed onto his rear.

There was not much room on the stairs. They were so close, she could feel the gentle buzz of almost-contact between their arms. "No, bonita. Lo siento. I would like to fight again."

Her frown softened, though it didn't completely disappear. She was tempted to look at him, but decided instead to keep her gaze up, scanning the yard for any sign of infected. "I didn't mean to make you nervous. I just wanted to talk to you, and I thought we could get a minute alone."

Naturally, that served to make him nervous, curling his fingers into the fabric of his cargo shorts. "There is not so much... 'alone' in this place." he responded, softly.

"Yeah." she agreed with a subtle grin. She didn't miss the way he snuck a glance at her, like her smile caught his eye and he couldn't convince himself to look away. Her composure maintained itself by force. "Packed like sardines. But at least we're clean."

Chris uttered a hum, lowering his chin.

"You want to talk?" he queried, his tone much more conversational than his stiff wording made it seem.

Rochelle slipped her elbow onto her knee, resting her chin on her knuckles. "I'm just worried about you. You've been quiet, and I feel like it's been getting worse, not better - and I know Ellis is being there for you, and that's great, but... I know he's got his own stuff right now, too. So, if you need a different ear..."

She trailed off, pinky slipping to her lips, grazing the chapped flesh. The quiet that came afterward was not uncomfortable, but she felt a nervous flutter in her stomach at the silence. If he'd laughed and quickly agreed, reassured her, given some dismissive affirmation, she would've almost felt comforted that she was being paranoid.

But he hesitated, and that let her know he was sitting on something important.

She was ready to dig, ready to hunt for the answer. She'd chase him if she had to.

"... Mi alma, I do not want to upset you." That startled her, and her head snapped gently to glance at his face. His expression was set in a deep frown, brows tightly quirked. "But I - want to know. How did she die?"

Rochelle wished she didn't instantly understand. She wished that it had taken her a moment, because then, at least, she could believe that it was not always on her mind. She could have convinced herself that she might forget it one day.

Instead, she was left with a ferocious pain in her stomach, like the violent stab before illness. It stole her breath, and she knew Chris noticed, but he said nothing. He let her have it, maybe, let her deal with it - like he didn't trust his ability to comfort her. Or he knew that nothing would.

"I..." she started, then faltered. Her voice grew the slightest edge, a frustration, though she wasn't angry. "I'm not sure what you want me to say. Do you want to hear she died quickly and painlessly? Do you want to hear she suffered? I don't want to tell you something that'll just make you feel guilty."

Christophe's posture lowered, eyes slanted to stare down at his shoes. He closed them entirely after a moment, exhaling a soft and trembling breath. "I do not care. I just want to know she is dead."

That wasn't the response she expected. Rochelle shifted to examine him, lips parting slightly in a hesitant gesture. "You... aren't sure?" He didn't speak. His mouth quirked, pursed - strangled his expression into a mire of emotions she couldn't even begin to read. Shame read most vibrantly, just under his skin, almost glowing.

"Chris -" she began, confused, but he barked out a laugh that startled her.
"I have pain. So bad, it is like I..." Rather than find the words, he lifted his hand to circle fingers around his neck, as if to cut off the flow of oxygen through it. She watched his nails dig into his throat, watched his eyes grow misty. "It is like they are still here, and they punish me."

She moved on instinct, one hand sliding to rest on his knee, palm tickled by the curly hairs that covered his legs. Her other hand lifted, slipping her fingers to lace with his, prying them away from his neck. She should have let go, then - but she held on, feeling his digits tighten against hers.

"I hear them." he admitted, and it was so broken, so tiny - her chest ached. "Both of them. Like they are still here."

She sucked in a sharp breath, gently rubbing the pad of her thumb against the side of his hand. "You're hallucinating." she stated, less a question and more an observation. When Christophe shrugged in a strange and half-aborted gesture, she squeezed her grip on his knee. "You know they're dead, Chris. Ellis watched Jerry die, and Brenda bled out in front of me. They're gone."

That didn't matter, and she knew it. Saw it, clear as day, in his expression.

"Do you miss them?"

She had to ask it. It had every chance of being a cruel question to force upon him, something he might not even know the answer to, and most likely wouldn't want to answer at all. It was awkward and hard and necessary. He lifted his head and looked at her with a wrenched frown, startled. She met his gaze with cautious intensity.

"I know you think the right answer is no, but... it doesn't have it be."

Christophe wilted, just a little. He looked down at their hands, linked in the air between them, and bit into his lower lip. "I think I forgot how to... not be with them." he croaked, weakly. "Yo no pertenezco aquí. I... am not part of this team."

Rochelle was quick to snort, shifting her arm so their wrists fell into a soft touch, more of their skin in contact now. "Not part of this team? Chris, you've been a part of this team since you put down that gun rather than shoot us. You fell in with them, but you fought for us."

Tears started streaking down his cheeks, droplets of salted glass.

"You think you're responsible for what they did. And maybe you were, back then. But you paid for it - God, you paid too much..." Her voice trembled, shaking. "You changed. You did the right thing. You saved my life, more than once. How can you say you aren't part of us?"

He struggled, lowering his chin, and she'd never heard a voice crumble like his did. He sounded bitter, a mockery to it that cut inward. "I - no, chica. I only went to the best chance to survive. Stay with the bigger numbers, ¿sí? I just survive."

Rochelle hesitated. She almost withheld her response, but it escaped her anyway in a soft tone, soothing. "Is that what you hear them say?"

She knew she'd struck truth when his honey-brown eyes lifted, looking into her eyes with a quiet misery. Her heart ached at the sight, and at what his face admitted: he wasn't just hearing voices, they were tormenting him. She felt a fear brew in her belly, because she had no clue how to help him.

"Chris. We care about you, so much, and I think you're one of the bravest people I've ever met. You stood up to Brenda when it mattered. You made the choice, and it wasn't the safe one. You made the hard choice." Her fingers squeezed, tightened, and he gripped her back so hard it almost ached. "They're wrong, Chris. You're part of our team. Absolutely. And you did what you did because you're a good person."

His eyes were vast and hopeless in their search of hers.

_We aren't equipped to deal with this. This is real; this is goddamn PTSD. This is a guy breaking, and I don't know how to help him. This is serious. This is -_ the soft touch of lips on hers.

It was so quick, and they had already been so close, she barely registered the movement of his head before he was kissing her. It was the gentlest press, the most chaste of gestures, just a butterfly kiss with the graze of his lower lip against the curve of her upper one.

Her heart leapt into her throat, and she didn't have time to formulate any reaction before the Spaniard was scrambling to his feet. She'd never seen him so flushed, tawny skin lit up in a blush that rivalled Ellis'. He looked so _shocked_, it was like she'd kissed him rather than the other way around.

"A-ah. Ah." he uttered, practically stammering. He backed away, stumbling softly like his legs didn't completely function. His expression was bluntly apologetic, and he burst into a flustered few sentences. "Perdóname. Discúlpame. I did not ask - I - _mierda_ -"

She lifted her hands, fingers going flat in a soft gesture. "Chris." she tried, intent on coaxing him to calm, but all her voice did was make him jolt further back. He was _fleeing_ from her, and she couldn't get him back.

Surprise and, maybe, embarrassment froze her to the spot, watching him stagger back into the restaurant. She lifted her hand, fingertips settling on her mouth, feeling the tingle of raw nerves zap over her lips. She uttered, "I'm not angry. ", because it seemed the most important thing to say.

Because she wasn't.

She felt a lot of things, and confusion was high on that list. Anger, however, was not anywhere.

Chris' footsteps stuttered just enough that she knew he heard her. That didn't stop him entirely, however, and he slipped inside with a posture that reminded her entirely too much of Nick's slinking, scared cat. He moved slower, though, less like fear and more like embarrassment.

It was in a faint fugue that Rochelle stood up. She dropped her hand, self-conscious, and she couldn't even begin to stop the laugh that left her. Honest, sincere, genuine laughter. She felt _good_ for the first time in what felt like forever.

The feeling lingered like a hot coal had gotten stuck in her chest, and she wanted desperately to jump and spin and maybe scream just a little... but she wouldn't allow herself the girlish reaction.

Rochelle was completely unsurprised that, upon re-entering the restaurant, she found Christophe firmly rooted next to his Ellis-shaped protective shield. He did his absolute best not to look at her when she was looking at him - and took every opportunity to glance her way when she focused on something else.

The one time she managed to catch him, their gazes came together for a long moment. Then Christophe winked, and it was a rare flash of the flamboyance that she'd almost thought he had run out of. The bright exuberance that she'd once thought of as grating, but had grown to miss.
It wasn't like they hadn't flirted with flirting before - but this was something entirely new, and absolutely uncharted.

She felt delightfully out of her depth.

Chapter 227

The scatter of metal across the ground was followed by the scramble of claws and limbs.

Nick had been spinning the tab of his soda can on the table, nail caught in the small hole. It had taken very little time for Maggie to notice, and her ferocious interest was visible in the extreme perk of her ears and the tremble of her whiskers. Her tail was almost perfectly still, except for the soft twitch at the base of it.

The orange of her eyes was almost invisible, just a sliver surrounding blown pupils.

It was off-hand, really, how he'd thrown it out into the restaurant floor. She leapt after it, chasing it between the legs of the chairs and tables. He figured it'd be a few seconds of entertainment, she'd scamper after it, and that'd be that. Laughter burst across his team at her antics, a pleasant noise.

It was nice, having something to distract them. Something innocent and... real. Something that felt normal. It was a lot like what Ellis had been to him: a bracing reminder that he was still human, in a world that tried desperately to make him feel less than.

Something good and warm and distinct from all the pain.

He hadn't expected her to suddenly leap up onto the table, body low, the tab glinting silver from her mouth. Even then, he definitely didn't expect her to drop it with a clatter, and stare at him expectantly.

"Jesus. Of all the cats, I get the clingy one who plays fetch? What happened to being independent?" Despite his words, he snatched up the tab, chucking it across the room. Maggie became a blur of black, gone like a shot, slim body managing a significant amount of noise in her hurry.

"She's so gosh-dang cute." Lena murmured from where she laid. She'd curled on her side, the compromise they'd reached rather than let her get up and move around. The position gave her a better view around the restaurant, though the L shape cut off her sight of the far corner, where the bathroom was. "I haven't seen any animals before now."

A hum left Ellis, sprawled lazily over a few chairs he'd lined up seat to seat, his body messily arranged across them. "We met this one girl who had a dog, but she said it ran off. Oh, 'n'my neighbor had a cat who disappeared a few days afore the outbreak, now that I'm thinkin' on it."

Rochelle practically startled, her head lifting in a snap that betrayed the way she hadn't been paying attention. Nick smirked to himself at the gesture - he'd been watching closely enough to notice she was distracted, and it wasn't hard to puzzle out why.

She had dragged Chris into the backyard, and they'd come back awkward and flustered. Nick figured they hadn't had the time to screw, but something had happened. They kept staring at each other in shifts, blatant as teenagers, and it was a wonder how he seemed to be the only one that noticed. It's about fucking time.

Ha.

'Fucking' time.

He had no vested interest in them doing or not doing anything, but it was the perfect opportunity to taunt, harass, and otherwise make her miserable, and he had revenge to get. Nick didn't like remembering the fact that she'd known about him and Ellis for as long as she apparently had, but the idea of turning the tables on her was very appealing.

Not that she's likely to hide it like I did.

That soured his mood.

Maggie jumped back onto the table, soda tab in her teeth, and nearly slid straight across the smooth surface. This time, when she dropped it, Nick picked it up and merely held it. She seemed primed to tackle his arm, but instead obediently sat and watched him turn it in his fingers.

"Sorry, what?" Rochelle queried, drawing Ellis' gaze. "I said what?"

The Georgian laughed softly, quirking his brow. "I was sayin' how all the animals are gone. The swamp was even kinda empty when we went through it. Didn't even see no gators or nothin'." Something flashed in his eyes, eager, and he flapped a hand up in a limp gesture. "Man, did I ever tell y'all 'bout the time muh buddy Keith -"

Nick leaned out from the booth, aware of the tortoiseshell cat following his movements like a hawk. He carefully aimed, flicking the tab with his thumb, watching it arc gracefully to clatter just beneath the chairs Ellis was laying over.

He watched with no small joy as events unfolded precisely to his intent: Maggie bolted for it, Ellis scrambled upright at the sound of her approach, his movement frightened her into freezing mid-sprint, and Ellis was completely distracted from his story.

"Aw, Nick!" the kid complained, loudly, swinging his legs off the chairs. He looked sympathetically down at the cat, who had dropped low into a crouch, owlish eyes observing Ellis' movements with a small hiss. "You made me scare her!"

"She doesn't like your stories." Nick returned, calmly. He'd been about to lean back into his booth, but Ellis bent down to grab the can tab, and he couldn't help but watch.

When Ellis held it up, dangling it in the air, the cat's conflict was visible in her posture. Her ears tracked him closely, but her eyes were riveted on the small scrap of aluminum. "You want this?" he teased, gently, waving his hand in a circle to get her head to rotate. "You want it?"

The small cat seemed mesmerized, fascinated - and when Ellis tossed it in her direction, she leapt straight up to catch it.

Ellis laughed, pleased, watching her wrestle it for a second before flopping hard onto her side. The aluminum tab was far too small, but that didn't stop her from gripping it tightly and trying to kick at it with her back paws. She mostly ended up kicking air.

"You guys went through the swamp?" Lena's voice was a light question, distantly tired. Rochelle hummed in affirmation, leaning in from her place at the bar. Coach was sitting next to her, and he snorted.
"Yeah. Was damn miserable. How'd you two make it? The bridge was out, and all the maps showed it as the only way across. We had to take a big detour, gettin' 'round that river."

Rhiannon passed a grin at him, crossing her arms. "Uh, shit, dude." Her expression waffled between humour and mockery, jerking her chin. "We went down-river a mile or two, and there was a crossing. Shallow spot with some rocks. We almost lost the bike, and Lena, but we got back on track pretty fast."

Her sister uttered a soft laugh.

Coach blanched, looking like he'd swallowed something unpleasant and was in the early stages of deciding whether or not he'd choke it up. "... Mile or two?" he managed, grunted, with a haunted tone.

They'd spent somewhere around twenty-four hours in the swamp, all-told, after all.

Rhiannon seemed to pick up on his horror, and her grin widened. "How big was that detour, exactly?" Exhaling heavily, Coach slid his hand onto his temple, holding his head in a reluctant gesture. Rather than respond, he merely held his silence.

When Maggie finally returned to Nick's side, interest in her makeshift toy having waned, he scowled at her. "Cheating skank." he muttered, reaching out to scratch at her forehead. She gave a quiet meow, half-broken, and slid down to settle into a squat on the table. The position allowed her the vantage point to look out at the restaurant with attentive, twitching whiskers.

Ellis babbled on, obliviously. "Man, the swamp was crazy. There were these zombies that crawled around in the water, 'n' they slung mud at us. Like tryin' tuh blind you!" He waved both his hands up, fingers splayed. "We had tuh cross on this boat, but Nick can't -"

Nick cleared his throat, loudly.

"- swim, so -"

"Overalls!" Fury made Nick straighten, sliding to sit on the outer-facing edge of the booth seat and lean out. "You wanna not go giving out all my fucking personal information to every goddamn assclown you meet? Jesus Christ."

The dismissive way Ellis waved him off only served to throw fuel on his anger. "It ain't nothin' tuh be embarrassed about." Then Ellis blinked, head tilting slightly as his tone dipped into playful mockery. He either didn't know how much his words clawed at Nick's self-control, or didn't care. "Well, you fallin' in the river and almost drownin' was kinda embarrassin'."

Rhiannon's cackle exploded instantly, her legs curling up to set her heels on the bench, tucking her body into a curl. She squirmed in glee, raising a hand to press her fingertips into her scalp, rubbing at the streak of brown hair growing in under her dyed blonde. "Oh, fuck, yes! Please give me all the details. I want a perfect fuckin' mental image of this."

Helpfully, Rochelle lifted her hands to wave them at either side of her face. "Think drowned rat. Angry drowned rat." Her description made the blonde burst into more laughter, joined after a beat by Ellis, his grin flaring wide.

"I had tuh dive in after him." he practically boasted, like it were something to be proud of.

Both the bikers laughed, Lena's laughter weak and faded.
That fury tripled, gone wild in Nick's blood. He had no interest in being made a fool of, let alone by Ellis, and certainly not with Rhiannon listening. If he'd softened his stance and lulled Ellis into thinking he was going to stand for being the butt of their jokes, he'd have to rectify the misunderstanding.

He was, if nothing else, a master of over-correction.

"I'm glad everyone thinks it's so funny." he hissed through his teeth. His tone caught Ellis' attention, the Georgian looking at him with lingering humour. The half-grin only served to send crawling agitation up Nick's spine.

"It was." Ellis returned, easily, a childish jut touching his jaw. His grin faded, traded for a thin glaze of challenge.

Lacing his fingers together, Nick forced his expression into something flatter, less like anger. "You wanna talk embarrassing? Let's talk embarrassing." His eyes did not stray from Ellis' face. "Let's talk about the time you popped a Boomer in your own face and reeked for hours. Or when you ran into a building with a Smoker, and I had to drag your dumb ass out. Hmm, two times? Three?"

The Georgian's expression went from perturbed to outright irritated, jovial contrariness replaced by a quiet hardass. "Jeez, Nick, somebody got yer goat today?" His frustration only heightened Nick's, feeding off each other in some discreet stubbornness.

Rochelle must have sensed things were catapulting out of control, because she lifted her hands, fingers splayed. She opened her mouth to talk, but Nick steamrolled over her, easily.

"My fucking goat almost drowned in that goddamn river because you thought it'd be a fucking great idea to cross in a glorified goddamn bucket. I don't know what fucking chemical imbalance makes you think the way you do, but you have been a goddamn menace from the day I met you."

The producer almost stood, expression drawn in a look halfway to horrified. "Nick, what the hell -"

Surprise flashed across her face when it was Ellis who interrupted her, voice quiet. "Let him talk, Ro.'" The calm edge to his tone was quickly betrayed by his tight fists and raised shoulders. "He's got shit to say? We got nothin' but time."

Nick didn't know what had toughened the kid up more: him, or the apocalypse. He'd have been impressed if it hadn't made him angry.

If his ex-lover wanted to fight, they'd fight.

He tossed a hand up, layering on the sarcasm liberally to his voice until it practically pitched up. "Oh, shit, if you're gonna ask so nicely - let's talk about the seven hundred times you've set off car alarms. Or attracted zombies with your fuckin' loud mouth. And how about the time we were stuck out in a forest and you fucked up starting a fire so many times we ran out of goddamn matches and nearly froze to death?"

Or the time you fell in love with me.

His chest was volcanic rock, and his anger was magma, rising and bubbling from nowhere. His footing was unsteady, tectonic plates shifting under him, until he couldn't even recognize his own landscape. His chance to regain the reins had passed.

Or the time you made me almost think I loved you back.
Ellis' jaw flexed, and his eyes held a quiet edge of sadness. "I didn't do none'uh that on purpose. And are you gonna pretend I didn't help out a lot, too? That I ain't saved y'all?"

Dragging his hand over his face, Nick shook his head, a fierce roll of his eyes joining the gesture. "Before or after you caused the thing that got us in trouble? How about you taking a fucking nap instead of having our backs with the Angels?"

He was out of control, and the temperature in the café was dropping rapidly. Chris was pale, gaze ping-ponging between everyone in the room like he was looking for someone to step in. Lena and Rhiannon had disengaged from the situation with calculated distance, two onlookers to a fight they had no skin in.

Ellis' body wound tighter with every second - but his voice remained stoic. If Nick hadn't known him well enough to pinpoint every time his words struck home, the kid might've fooled him. "You ain't gotta be nasty, Nick. Besides, you ain't perfect, neither."

Nick laughed, aware that it came out caustic and loud and aggressive. The words that tumbled out of him were uncalculated. It wasn't that he hadn't meant to say them - but he did not measure the consequences, did not consider his surroundings. It was the lashing out of animal instinct, the desperate, below-the-belt jab.

"Oh, no. I can think of one pretty big mistake I've made off the top of my head."

You. hung unspoken.

The silence that followed was so loud, he withheld a swallow for fear the whole restaurant would hear the sound. Ellis' expression flinched between a hollow disbelief and a tense frown, eyes searching Nick's, looking for something.

Hunting for some amount of regret or apology to signify he hadn't meant it.

When Nick offered him no such thing, Ellis quietly drew himself up and off the chairs. "At least I can say I ain't never done nothin' tuh hurt any of y'all." There was a composure to his movements, a carefully structured stiffness that only highlighted just how injured he was. "I'm gonna keep watch out front, if y'all need me."

"Ellis!" Coach tried, voice a low chastisement, but the younger Georgian did not respond. He disappeared around the wall separating the restaurant from its entranceway, and awkward tension filled the room in his wake.

Nick lifted a hand, thumb brushing over his left eyebrow in a frustrated gesture. The anger left behind threatened to choke him, engulf his vision in a blur. He huffed out a laugh, shaking his head with a sardonic utterance. "Dishing it out but can't take it. Goddamn."

"If you keep talkin', Nick -" Coach's voice came, thin with a sort of anxious anger. He did not finish the sentiment, but he didn't really need to.

Clenching his jaw against the urge to retort, Nick slammed his palms into the table hard enough to launch himself to his feet. He spat off a bland breath, just a scoff, and charged across the restaurant. His shoulder lead the way, shoving open the kitchen door and storming inside to some amount of safety.

Escaping, if he were being honest.

_Fuck. The kid really knows how to push my goddamn buttons._
Anger made him growl, fisting hands in his hair, but it was hard not to lose steam when there was no one around to posture for. ...Goddamnit. He didn't deserve that. Why do I have to take everything to a fucking ten?

Some fervor left him, drained out of his body, and he found himself suddenly bent over with his hands on his knees. They were trembling, so he bit his nails into his slacks to stiffen them against the sensation.

Why am I so fucking angry all the time? Why does he make me so fucking angry? Have I always been like this? Maybe I just never gave a shit about the people I hurt before.

His imagination summoned up the image of Ellis out front, baby blues full of tears, and Christ if he didn't get angrier.

They'd almost reached some neutral place, some calm, and Nick's reaction was to hunt down the pettiest reason to blow it all to shit again. And for what? The fuck does this get me? The fuck does any of this get me? God, I need the hell off this fucking trainwreck.

He wanted to go find a boat and sail away, with or without his tentatively formed new alliance. He wanted to walk out the back door and never see any of them ever again. He wanted, more than anything, to have it all just go away.

Instead he straightened, and turned on his heel.

Nick's posture was dull and his eyes half-closed as he walked back into the café, feet moving, possessed by something very far from conscious will. He didn't acknowledge the startled suspicion he earned for his reappearance, didn't utter a word to his team.

He just walked toward the entryway, feeling very much like a man gone to the gallows.

Come on, Nicky-boy. Time to clean up your mess, for once.
Chapter 228

Ellis' gaze was fixed on some far-off point, and made no effort to move it when Nick approached him. If he was surprised, he stifled it.

The gambler moved languidly, drawing into a lean on the wall a few feet from the chair Ellis sat on, posted just in front of one of the windows. The motion was casual enough to play off the berth he gave Ellis, the space he maintained between them.

Nick waited, but he didn't have to wait long.

"If Ro' made you come talk tuh me, you can just -"

Smoothly, Nick lifted a hand, pressing his palm into his jaw as he shook his head in negation. The gesture made Ellis' eyes dart toward him, but they returned to facing forward just as fast.

"I ain't in the mood fer this, Nick. I don't know why you felt like yellin' at me today, but if you think I'm just gonna sit there'n'let you, yer wrong. So unless yuh got somethin' tuh say -" He trailed off, there, and his meaning was clear.

Nick inhaled through his nose, chest filling with sour air, and eyes shutting. He chose very explicitly not to have them open when he spoke. "I'm sorry."

The darkness behind his eyelids didn't leave him deaf, and he heard the rustle and sharp shift as Ellis whipped around in his seat. Felt the burn of eyes on him. Imagined very clearly the look of shock on the kid's face. It should have offended him, how much it threw Ellis for a loop.

"I crossed the line."

Simple. Flat. Matter-of-fact. It should have been easy, the normal, human thing to do. Swallow his pride and apologize for a mistake. So why does it feel like pulling my own fucking teeth out?

Ellis' silence practically drowned him. With his eyes shut, he couldn't see the kid's face to even get a hint on how his words were being received. For all he knew, the other man had fainted. It seemed likely enough, considering how shocked he was.

Then a slight huff of air left the Georgian, and Nick dared to open his eyes.

Ellis was slumped, seeming tired more than anything else. A small, perturbed smile tugged at his expression, strangled into a weird grimace as he tried not to allow it to widen. "... I don't think you've ever said that tuh me before."

Nick frowned before he could stop it, cocking his head as a scoff touched his voice. "I've apologized before."

"Not like that." Ellis looked down, abruptly, peering at his socked feet. His smile faded, replaced with an exhausted pinch that drew a line between his brows. His tone stiffened, growing guarded. "You always just blow it off, or pretend nothin' happened, or... do somethin' rather than say somethin'. So why're you sayin' it now?"

The Northerner had to close his jaw tightly to prevent himself from the instinctual response: Nevermind. Fuck you. Pretend I didn't say anything. He sighed, shaking his head to jostle himself out of it. "I told you. I went over the line. I can always take it back, if that'd make you more comfortable."

Mostly out of it.

Ellis shot him a mild look, verging on annoyed, but not quite. He inhaled a deep breath as if to calm himself before he responded. "I shouldn't've been teasin' you. But you -"

He hesitated, gently, before lowering his voice, mindful of the fact they were separated from the rest of the team by nothing but a few feet of wall. "That hurt. Sayin' that, let alone sayin' it when they're all there, 'n' I can't respond on account'uh the sisters not knowin' about us. Especially when I'm keepin' quiet fer you, not me. I don't gotta, y'know."

The inherent threat should have irritated him. It did, in fact, but Nick merely tipped his head a few degrees and kept an even keel. "I'd prefer you did."

That was not the correct response, it seemed, as Ellis released a gust of air that might've formed a laugh had it contained any humour in the slightest. Instead, it sounded more like the aftermath of a punch to the gut. "Yeah, I figured that part out muhself." His stone-blue eyes narrowed, squinted, and he looked up and out the window.

Silence clawed at them for a moment, very far from the comfortable lull between two lovers.

When he did speak again, the mutter that left Ellis was small and fragile, a vulnerable little utterance. "I thought we were doin' better. I'd... I'd've liked tuh be friends, y'know, even if... we ain't... y'know."

Nick cut his gaze to the side, curling his fingers into fists and crossing his arms over his chest. "That's not what you want. You want things to go back to normal, and I don't."

Rather than obey the urgent need to escape the conversation, Nick put his thumb up in the vague mimicry of a shrug. "So I - got pissed." It was too honest, too clumsy, and he found his footing amidst the words only in retrospect. "And I took a pot-shot. Because at least when we're fighting, I know we're both on the same page."

The Georgian's gaze lifted to meet his, and those eyes cut to his quick. Wounded, bleeding, he grimaced and deflected.

"I'm aware it's fucked up. And I don't actually enjoy it, for the record."

Ellis seemed to mull that over. He rolled it around in his head, considering it from every angle, with such honest curiosity that it made Nick anxious. Every second that ticked by made him regret more fervently every word he'd uttered. He regretted his honesty, because what was the point?

Slowly, the younger man settled his hands on his knees, a calm pout touching his face, plush lower lip lending a terribly enticing edge to the expression. Nick had known plenty of women who batted their eyes and pouted their lips, all sex appeal and coy energy. Ellis was utterly oblivious to his own attractive nature, and that was the worst part.

He's the stupidest knock-out I've ever met.
"Do you really think that?"

A momentary flood of discomfort preceded Nick reminding himself that Ellis could not, in fact, read his mind - and he uttered a slightly dull, "Think what?"

Ellis' pout faded, and a hesitance drew the slightest shift of colour to his face, subtle enough that Nick could almost pretend it wasn't there. The younger man knew full well his face was giving away his shame, ducking away before clarifying lowly, "Us bein' a big mistake."

The answer was easy. It was gift-wrapped, poised on a silver platter, teed right up for him. He knew exactly what to say: yes. They'd been a huge mistake, a mistake he desperately wished he could undo. All he had to do was say yes, and walk away.

So, when he hesitated, actually froze up, a small beat of time might as well have been an eon.

In games of bluff and lie, tells were everything. A twitching muscle, a fidgeting digit, a tapping foot. Pupils dilating on the reveal of someone's winning hand, and the gentle pause on realizing the cards were against them. Luck and chance played their part, as did talent and simple ploys, but nothing pleased Nick like pinning down someone's tell.

The shock and the horror as an enemy realized they had betrayed themselves.

"I think my big mistake was not letting you run me over in that goddamn monster truck, save myself all this fuckin' time." he shot back, like a joke, a joke that betrayed him.

Ellis looked up at him, eyes gone soft, and Nick turned away. He didn't let himself utter another goddamn word, not when he'd lost faith in what he'd end up saying. He clutched his silence close, his last defense, and buried himself in the refuge of his booth-turned-fortress.

Fuck if relationships aren't like poker. You don't gamble with the same people over and over if you want to win. They learn your game, and they learn how to beat you. You get them worn into you like tire tracks, until you're predictable. You can't play someone who knows you.

The only reason he didn't have a pitchfork-wielding mob at his heels, he was sure, was because Ellis followed shortly behind him and started chattering up a storm like nothing had happened. He didn't seem cheery, but he was, at least, relaxed.

Nick wished he didn't feel some creeping relief.

Christ, he's got my goddamn number.
Chapter 229

Stretching her arms over her head, Lena tried desperately to work the muscles in her biceps and shoulders without straining the ones in her torso. She grunted, groaned, squeezing her eyes shut. Her body felt tremendously close to shattering, like she was metal brought on and off heat until she cracked and warped.

She'd been so hot - as if whatever was happening under her skin was in overdrive. The idea of the virus in her veins working to keep her alive should have scared her or made her uncomfortable, but she mostly just felt grateful.

I can't leave Rhiannon alone. Not like this. She needs me.

Inhaling slowly, the brunette did not notice Rochelle's approach, not until the woman was just a hair's breadth from the table. Conscious of the proximity of another person, she opened her eyes and looked up.

Rochelle smiled at her, gently.

"Hey. Doing okay?"

Curling her fingers into limp fists, Lena considered answering honestly - and then smiled back with an affirmative noise. "Are you guys?" When the other woman winced, she managed a soft laugh. "I know, I know. It's none of our business. I'm just worried about those two."

Rochelle followed her glance to look in Ellis' direction, where he sat near to Christophe. The Georgian was quietly kneeled behind him, tremendous delicacy tempering his movements as he worked hands on the man's shoulders. It was very close to a regular massage, just achingly slow.

"Oh, yeah. They're fine." The dark-skinned survivor seemed relieved, an animated edge touching her posture as she waved both hands. "I think Chris was in some pain. Coach and Ellis said it helps with blood-flow or something."

"I wasn't talking about Christophe and Ellis."

Rochelle seemed hesitant, right before she rolled her eyes and dropped her body down to sit on the bench close by. Her voice lowered to almost a whisper, furtive and frustrated. "I'm sorry you guys had to see that. It's... been rough, lately. We're just cooped up with nothing to do but fight. And Nick and Ellis are really good at fighting."

"They remind me of my sister and me. We haven't always been close; we fought like crazy for a long time." When Rochelle gave her a curious look, she shrugged a shoulder. "Family drama."

Lena hummed, quietly, eyes slanting to look across the room and watch Rhiannon pace the length of the dining area with her baton in her hands. She considered prying - but it hadn't borne fruit in the past, and she didn't want to upset the woman.

So, instead, she gave a soft laugh.

"The producer put her hands together, palms cradling her chin, and smiled. "I'll show you mine if you show me yours." she teased.
If Lena hadn't already been flush with a fever, that would have done it. Shoot. How come the one cute gal I meet out here is taken? Smoothly lowering her chin, Lena canted her head in order to get a more level gaze on Rochelle's face. "Our parents separated when we were young. My dad got custody of us, and Rhee blamed me for taking Mom away from her."

Frowning, Rochelle leaned closer, taking the cue of the other woman's lowered voice and keeping hers to a murmur. "Why?"

Shrugging her shoulders, Lena slipped a hand up to tap her cheek with a fingertip. "Mom and Dad disagreed on what to do with me when they found out I was dating girls. She wanted to kick me out and he wouldn't let her, to be specific. They compromised with sending me to boarding school."

Rochelle's flash of surprise affirmed what she had already figured; nobody had spread what she'd told them during their game. That was fine with her, even though she didn't care to keep it a secret. Nice to know I can trust them.

"Oh." the woman uttered, and Lena was gratified to see her stay close. "I didn't know."

The biker summoned up the slyest smile she could manage, wishing she wasn't borderline infirm. It put a damper on her game. "You would've, if you weren't clearly head over heels for that Spanish boy... I'd have been puttin' all the moves on you."

It was a risky joke - but one that paid off when Rochelle broke into laughter, the closest to giggling she'd heard from the woman. She leaned forward, crinkling her nose. "Aw... Thanks. You're sweet." Not fully distracted from the conversation, Rochelle tipped her head. "If they agreed on boarding school, why'd they end up splitting?"

Lena's smile faded to a soft neutrality, resting a hand on her swollen gut. "Because my dad eventually found out that it wasn't boarding school." When Rochelle's gaze searched hers, unsure, she shrugged a shoulder. "Reparative therapy. Pray the gay away, we usually called it."

Rochelle's eyes widened, and Lena couldn't help the way she tensed when the woman suddenly reached out, grabbing her hand in a tight clench. The touch served to fluster her, and she reflexively curled her fingers. "Jesus. Seriously?"

"It wasn't as bad as you think." she quickly murmured, glancing up. Coach was looking at them, quietly arching a brow, but didn't get up or approach them. "It was mostly like messed up therapy. It only got bad when I didn't play along, and even then, I know some kids had it a lot worse than I did. It was a long time ago, too."

Rochelle's concern was undaunted. It was terribly flattering, and Lena was sure her peaking heartrate must've been audible through her chest. "I... I knew that was a thing, but I've never known anyone who went through it... Christ. That's horrible."

Lena laughed a little, pulling her hand gently free. Rochelle let her go, tucking her hands into her lap, instead. "It could've been worse. The worst thing they did was put me on emetics and play lesbian porn on full blast. All the junk they said, I shook it off, but that... stuck for a while. Sex scenes in movies still give me the heebies."

"That's awful." whispered the producer, voice catching in a sympathetic hush. "I can't believe anyone would do that - or your mom would do that to you..."

Forcing a quick smile, Lena lifted both hands in a dismissive gesture. "I don't think she really understood what I was in for, honestly. They didn't let me call my parents, and it took about two months for Dad to realize Mom was lying to him about hearing from me. He found her emails with the management, found the place, and stormed it to come get me. They divorced pretty soon after."

Rochelle looked like she was bursting with questions, and they all must have lobbied so hard for priority that she ended up speechless for a moment. Lena averted her eyes with a small grin.

"Like I said. It was a while ago. I'd probably be messed up about it, but my dad was there for me. He even sent me to therapy, even though he's super sure they're all quacks. He didn't know how to help me on his own, but he made sure I got help from someone."

The other woman was watching her closely, attentive, and Lena fidgeted with a strip of blanket. "Anyway. It's not illegal or anything, but the judge took it all into account and gave Dad custody anyway. Rhee loved Mom, so... Dad decided we wouldn't tell her what happened with me."

Lena scratched at her ear, her eyes drifting low, thoughtfully. "She was pretty young at the time, but she wasn't stupid, and Mom played her against us a lot. She knew it was my fault somehow. Gosh, she hated me. She was hard on Dad, too." She chuckled, wryly. "She always hated that she didn't get any say in the custody battle. She wanted to stay with Mom."

Rochelle curled her fingers together, shaking her head. "But you're okay now. What changed?"

A soft frown preceded Lena shrugging. "Honestly? I'm not completely sure. She and Mom had a falling out a few years later, and I guess Mom told her everything. I figure she thought it'd make Rhiannon hate us, but it back-fired. Rhee felt like she betrayed me, and... I think she realized we'd been trying to protect her. Both by keeping it all secret and letting her have a relationship with Mom... and by keeping her under Dad's roof."

Puffing out a sigh, Rochelle leaned back, gaze tracing her expression. "I see why she's such a firecracker, and why you're tough as nails." she murmured, gently. "That's a lot to grow up with, for both of you."

Lena hummed before giving a laugh, brows wrestling into a knot. "That's what people always tell me. But it's just... what it was, y'know? I got lucky, though. Most kids in my position didn't have a dad who cared enough to fight for them. So, I try not to take it for granted."

Turning a little on the bench, Rochelle glanced out over the restaurant. Lena followed her gaze, seeing where Chris was laying out flat on his belly, speaking in low tones with Ellis. Judging by the Georgian's apologetic expression, he'd pushed the man to his limit.

Coach and Rhiannon were at the bar, sitting peaceably in each other's presence. Nick was, unsurprisingly, still asleep - or pretending to be.

"Your turn."

Lena felt a mild amusement when Rochelle startled into refocusing on her, and she smiled when the other woman nodded quickly. "Mm... I did promise, huh? My family's pretty boring compared to yours. Not sure I can match up."

Slitting her eyes half-shut, Lena laughed softly. "I was thinking more your current family." When Rochelle regained that stricken look, restrained, she tipped her head and tapped her fingertips against her midsection. "C'mon, Ro'. I think I earned a story, didn't I?"

She meant it as a joke, but Rochelle flashed a frown at her. "Oh, girl, it isn't like that. It's just... not my story to tell. I'll just make things worse. You understand, don't you?"
Lena pursed her lips to fight off a heavy smile. She reached out, cuffing her knuckle on the other woman's cheek, allowing herself the enjoyment of Rochelle's blatant embarrassment. "Yeah, okay. Only because you're freakin' cute."

Rochelle laughed out loud, quickly batting the woman's hand away. She pushed up to her feet and backed away, muttering under her breath, "First Chris, now you. Why did it take a goddamn apocalypse to bring out all the people who are into me?"

Thoroughly pleased with herself, Lena let her eyes close, listening to the woman's retreat. It didn't take long at all for her sister's voice to break the silence, low and private as she scooted up to sit on the table.

"... News?"

Lena hummed once without opening her eyes. "Inconclusive."

Rhiannon grunted, sounding dubious, and a palm landed on the top of Lena's head in a condescending pat pat. Her voice was almost a whisper. "I'm tellin' ya, dude. You're fuckin' crazy; there's no way they're boning. Your gaydar is broken."

A grin touched the brunette's lips, faint. "Doesn't take a gaydar to see heartbreak." She only drifted one eye open, glancing across the room to where Ellis crouched beside the Spaniard. The boy's face was soft, but his eyes were sad - and he didn't strike her as a sad person.

Another grunt sounded from her partner, as dubious as the last.

Then, softly: "I should tell you... Something happened the other day."

Lena lifted her head to look up at her younger sister, their matching eyes meeting in a flash. The discomfort in Rhiannon's face made her instantly nervous. She braced for the worst, and was not disappointed.

"It's about Nick."
Chapter 230

The next two days passed in short order. There was a tension nobody could quite put a name to floating in the air. Rhiannon and Lena reverted to huddling away in the larger dining area, and Christophe spent most of his time sleeping. Ellis and Nick gave each other space, but that also translated into a weird void of conversation where they didn't engage one another.

It wasn't aggressive or spiteful, but neither was it subtle. It was like they'd decided not to argue, and also decided not to get along, so they were left with largely ignoring each other.

Rochelle and Coach were the only ones to bridge the numerous gaps, but even then, the bikers seemed distant.

The producer was left to wonder if Rhiannon had gotten angry over Lena sharing their past, and she'd caused tension. That explanation grew flimsier the more she considered it, however. Even moreso after Rhiannon abruptly handed her a tiny snack-sized bag of low calorie brownie bites she'd apparently hoarded away in their duffelbag.

It felt like a conciliatory gesture, but Rochelle hadn't the faintest idea what for.

It was the morning of the second day when something changed in the air. Nick sensed it the moment he awoke, a restlessness. A buzzing energy. They were all uneasy, and their close quarters only worsened the anxiety.

Everything was harder when they weren't even good company to each other.

Lena got to her feet, moving well before anyone could protest it. She stretched, bringing her arms up over her head and lifting onto her toes, a whined sound of pain escaping her. As she fell back into a slump, she looked up and squinted her eyes.

"... Can we please get out of this darn building today?"

Nick perked his head up, lifting it from its place on his crossed arms. He arched a brow as he looked at her, snorting thinly. "Are these accommodations not up to snuff? Someone forget the mint on your pillow?" he returned, humour and sarcasm blending until it was hard to tell what reaction he actually wanted.

Standing quickly, though not as quick as Rhiannon, Rochelle watched the younger biker grab her sister by the arm as if to hold her up. Lena allowed it, shaking her head. "Look, hoss. I need air. And if I don't move my freakin' legs, I will go nutty."

"Do you think you're up to it?" Rochelle pressed, gently. "I know we underestimated how fast you were gonna heal, but... the last thing I want to do is knock you back. We can wait a little longer. A day, at least."

Coach grunted, just once, before gesturing a hand around them. "I disagree. Restaurant's been gettin' weaker. That last Smoker who came pokin' around almost punched our back door in. An' the longer we're down, the harder it's gonna be to get back up. Think a trip out is just what we need."

Ellis leaned up and out from his bundle of blankets on the floor, peering around at his team. "We could go shoppin' fer new clothes." he offered, cheerily. "Chris was whinin' 'bout bein' cold. He needs a shirt."
A soft mumble from the lump of blankets and slimly bared tan skin was Chris' lodged complaint. "Yo no era - I was not."

"I can get behind that." Rochelle muttered, looking down at the ratty grey T-shirt that had long since replaced her Depeche Mode shirt, and the bloody and torn jeans doing a modest job of holding themselves together. "Our town guide might include a strip mall or something."

Pumping her fist in the air with a small grin, Rhiannon circled her other arm in Lena's and nodded. "Shit yeah. I'm so ready to get on the road again. And Lee and I have a boat to start looking for - I was thinking we could find a real map of Tybee, hunt down the dock address we found."

Ellis pushed his hands into his lap to push his blankets down and off his body. "Maybe it's time tuh get Chris back on the horse, too."

"We have fought before." Chris muttered like a deflection.

"In both meanings of the phrase." Nick offered up, sunnily.

Rochelle put both her hands up, spreading her fingers in an attention-getting gesture. "Okay, chill. Look, I'm eager to get my wiggles out, too, but we need to be ready that things might get nasty. If there's a horde, or God forbid a Tank... We need a plan. And I've been thinking about this for a while."

She seemed to pause, like she expected commentary, but none came. Everyone was looking at her with quiet attention, and that put her off so badly she couldn't help but stammer for a second. "Uh - right. So."

Nick didn't miss the shift in her posture. She stiffened, tightened, and he was left with the strong impression that it was the same change that overtook her in front of a camera. Authoritative and composed. He found a little humour in it.

"We need to mesh our teams. When Nick and Rhee and I went out, we did fine, but it's a matter of muscle memory, too. Our teams fight differently, and we've gotten used to each other. So we're gonna be clumsy, and that's fine, but we have to account for it. And that's not even taking Chris into account; he's gotta relearn how to fight at all."

Coach released a soft sound of affirmation. "Fo' sho'."

Christophe frowned, pushing himself messily to sit upright. "I do not think I can. I am weak, and - I do not know how I will be useful. I will be dangerous."

"Ah... cielos. That is fine, but... I thought I would fight with you, mi alma." He lifted his gaze, peering up toward her, so sincere it visibly ached him.
Nick watched the flash of embarrassment over Rochelle's expression.

"I'll be back-up, but I think it's better if you have a dedicated partner, so you can get used to each other. And Ellis is super flexible and quick-thinking, and I think he'll do a better job than I will. I don't want to mess things up when it's life or death, and -"

She was doing an admirable job of pretending she wasn't floundering, but Nick didn't miss it. So, he decided to be helpful and interject, and it had nothing at all to do with the vague annoyance he felt at the two men being paired up. "Worried you two can't keep your hands off each other? Or, hand, as the case may be."

Rochelle looked instantly furious, darting a glare at him, and her angry response only confirmed his statement. He grinned in slim self-satisfaction, shaking his head when she retorted mightily. "I'm worried about everyone being safe. And Chris and Ellis work well together."

"Sure." Nick lazily murmured, looking away.

Frustration seeped into her posture, but Rochelle shook it off, pressing a knuckle to her lips and clearing her throat. "Keep in mind, I'm not saying we split up. Just keep to the buddy system if anything goes wrong, and stay close to each other."

Rhiannon turned her head, glancing over her sister's face. "I got Lee." she stated, flatly, very much not like a suggestion. "We've been fighting together a long-ass time, hurt and not hurt. Just not this bad before."

"I'm fine." Lena insisted, making to pull her arm free, only to find it trapped in a vicegrip. She grunted faintly, trying a few times to tug away, fighting insincerely to escape. "Sis -"

"That makes sense, but I don't want to partition you guys off. Ruins the point." Rochelle turned, looking toward Coach. It made sense; Nick had noticed Rhiannon and him getting along, as much as either of them seemed to get along with anyone. That mostly amounted to silently enjoying each other's company.

If Coach went with the girls, then he would likely be partnered with Rochelle. He was mostly fine with that.

Nick looked away, glancing at his hands. He clenched them into fists gently, letting his thumb escape in order to toy with the rings on his fingers. Got so used to being partnered with Ellis so much, it's practically weird to not be. I gotta get over this shit. Then, unbidden, We made a good team.

He was rudely disturbed from his thoughts by a statement that raised the hair on his neck. It made his skin crawl, made his most animal instincts kick into high gear. He was a few inches away from leaping out a window.

Rhiannon uttered, "Why doesn't Nick pair with us?"

Fortunately for him, nobody cared to look over and see him barely restraining himself from crawling over the restaurant wall like a Hunter and escaping through the front door. Instead, all eyes were on the bikers. Lena stood next to her with a casual resolve that shamelessly suggested they'd come to an agreement on the issue previously.

"Oh. Uh." Rochelle managed to spit out in something not completely shocked. "Okay. If that works for you guys - Nick? Are you fine with that?"
He had just long enough to assemble his poker face before she and every other survivor in the room turned to stare at him. No. I am not fine with that. I am absolutely not goddamn fine with that. Please save me. If there is a God, please save me from this.

"Yeah, why not?" was what he said instead.

_Jesus Christ. I am gonna die, Basic Instinct style._

Lena shot him a smile, and he could not fathom what made her show him such a sweetened look. It made him tremendously suspicious, though it also served to focus him. There was a game afoot, and he could wrap his head around that.

He allowed a slip of teeth, just a plain and unassuming smirk. "Let's bond. Sounds like a good time for everyone."

She didn't even blink. Lena's voice was reasonable and calm and definitely hiding something. "I figure we got off on the wrong foot. Seems right to work it out with zombie guts. That's how we fix everything nowadays, right? Darn zombies."

"Mm." Nick agreed, resting his hand on his thigh. The other lifted to card through his hair, eyes slitting closed. "Are you gonna resist the urge to throw yourself in front of another moving train in Charger form?"

He felt his words strike out at some invisible barrier. It was the first serve, the first volley. He was testing the waters.

When she laughed outright, wincing with a soft touch to her midsection, he was decidedly surprised - but it was Rhiannon's utter lack of reaction that really got to him. She looked between them, blankly, and it was not natural on her face. _Shit. She fucking coached her on this. They prepared this. I wonder if this has got to do with - _

He blinked, despite himself, as the pieces came together with a tactile snap. _They must have talked about me coming with them. Wonder if this is tryouts._

"Coach and I'll stay together." Rochelle interjected, with the busy rush of someone trying to force a conversation past an awkward rut. "We'll keep close to Chris and Ellis in case anything happens, but everyone have everyone's backs, okay? We're a big team now. We have to keep focused."

With a subtle shift of his body, like he couldn't quite contain the energy therein, Ellis bit back a small grin. "Oh, man. I'm so excited!"

Nick didn't let his gaze stray from the bikers, even as they turned away. He hummed calmly, thoughtfully. He forgot himself long enough to utter sarcastically, "You are the only person I know who gets excited for zombies. Or is it the shopping?"

Ellis must have forgotten himself, too, because he easily chirped back, "Both!"
"Let's get a move on!" Ellis hollered eagerly, thrusting the porch door open with such gusto that it struck the outside of the structure as it swung on its hinges. The wood clapped together, and the snarl of zombies surrounded them, attracted by all the noise.

The front yard reeked of decay, as the corpses of infected they'd killed previously lay baking in the sun. Nick barely flinched as the stench hit him - his nose was distressingly used to the smell. His attention remained focused solely on his surroundings and the infected charging toward them.

Ellis was a blur of energy, five-and-change feet of youthful muscle driven to excitement. He had his pump shotgun in his hands, and with its stock set against his hip, he was gripping it less like a gun and more like a flamethrower. The laugh that left him was exaggerated, like the cackle of a cartoon villain.

"Get some, baby!" he yelled, charging forward with a long stride.

Nick wasn't sure what had the kid more thrilled: being outside again, or having ammo for his shotgun. It had been so long, he'd almost forgotten how good Ellis was with it; the Georgian's left hand flashed in and out of the pockets of his coveralls, feeding shells into the gun whenever there was enough time and space to do so.

It reminded him of simpler times - times when evac had been a few streets away, and they weren't all bloated with painful subtext.

Of course, it was just as possible that he was being over-dramatic, and it had never really been easier or simpler or any different at all. Or maybe the team had built something special, and he'd torn it all down, brick by brick. He didn't know which of the two options he preferred.

"¡Tío!" Chris burst past Nick in the doorway, already panting. It was likely as much emotional duress as it was physical, and he seemed unsure of himself and his balance as he moved. His machete was gripped in his hand like a lifeline, and he looked out at the infected swarming close with a pale fear.

Nick had never seen him face battle with anything but sick pleasure. This was a kid who had shorn a zombie's head from its shoulders, and then kicked it like a can down the street. He'd stood, blood-splattered and covered in gore, and beamed and howled along with his team of wolves.

Now he looked small and terrified. He's just a kid. Just a kid, hardly old enough to survive on his own in the real world, let alone the new world before them. Maybe it was all an act, after all, the way he was. I'd have done the same thing in his shoes - fake it to make it. Or maybe losing an arm just does that to you.

Breaks you.

"Cuidado, por favor..." Chris croaked, staggering slightly out of the way when another shape burst from the porch doorway.

Rhiannon barreled past on long legs, bat held low. She lurched to meet the nearest infected, winding her arms up in a coil before lashing out, and the metal banding cracked straight into the female zombie's skull. "Leave some for the rest of us, hot stuff!" she shouted sideways at Ellis, making him laugh.
They were a storm, a whirlwind, a flurry of violent force that kept the infected at bay as they tried to swarm into the yard. Playful and competitive energy turned into a formidable offense, but it did not lend itself to solid teamwork.

Ellis turned his back for an instant, catching a zombie coming up on his flank, and his shot struck home in its gut. Rhiannon did not notice the opening he created, and another infected lunged to take advantage of it, slamming into his back. He shouted in a startled yelp, and Nick's skin prickled with a sharpened sense of fear.

The Northerner was ready to run, to sprint in and defend him, but Ellis moved too fast for him to react. He dropped down to a knee in one smooth motion, and the infected lost its balance in the gesture. It collapsed in an awkward bend over the Georgian, and then fell to the ground in a scramble of limbs. It screamed, scrabbling to try and get back up off the dirt.

It might've managed to regain its footing, had Ellis not immediately swung his shotgun up and clocked it directly across the brow with the stock of the weapon.

Nick forced himself to ease, lowering his shoulders and watching the infected reel from the blow. Ellis straightened, directing the shotgun at its core. When he pulled the trigger to put it down, the creature's bare chest burst under the shot, splitting along the lines of its ribcage. The infected screamed, gurgled, but did not die.

Rhiannon had dispersed the last of the infected near her and noticed the scuffle. She darted a glance over as Ellis placed the next shot into the infected's skull. As gore splattered across the earth and the zombie's corpse followed, she winced.

"Shit. Okay, bud?" she called out, rough with a slight coughing sound that disguised her apology.

Ellis hummed an affirmation, getting to his feet, none the worse for wear. If he was annoyed at her he didn't show it, and Nick lowered his katana to hang at his side. It took effort to remind himself that Ellis had survived a long time off his own talent, with and without his team's help. He was not weak; he had not been broken.

Nick observed as the rest of his team came piling out from the restaurant porch door. Rochelle had taken Rhiannon's stun baton, and Coach had his double-barrel shotgun shouldered by its strap and Lena's brush-axe in his grip. When she stepped out into the daylight, Lena was moving slow and cautious, body trembling like some loosely connected machine.

Her eyes were faint and pained, but they were driven to focus when she noticed Nick's attention on her. She grimaced dramatically in his direction, but he could barely stir himself to even fake interest.

Undaunted when he did not react beyond a dull and distracted blink, she approached, arms slipping into a tight fold over her belly. Lena had tucked herself back into her grey hoodie, and over that was her black motorcycle jacket. "It's too hot out here." she complained in a soft voice.

Nick arched a brow, glancing down to examine her layered clothing. "You're kinda over-dressed." he muttered, droll.

Lena flattened herself back onto her heels, lips curving subtly. "Says the dude in a suit in the apocalypse." she challenged, leading him to snort. Her hands tightened on her sides, squeezing fingers against the tough fabric of her jacket, meant to protect her in the event of a crash. "I'll happily sweat if keeps me safe from a Hunter."
That made his head cock, and he glanced at the black leather jacket set high on her shoulders. He wondered if the material would actually do any good against claws - and if she'd ever tested the theory. Rather than voice the thought, he looked up, glancing over the survivors clustered nearby. "What's the plan?"

Rochelle hesitated before turning to look at him, setting a hand on her hip. "I checked the town guide, and there's a small strip mall a few streets over. We can just walk down there, and we'll be back soon. We could keep an eye out for new bases, but, until we figure out where this dock is for you guys -" she spoke the words with a nod toward Rhiannon. "- we don't know what direction we're gonna be moving in. We can figure that out later, if this trip goes okay."

Nick tensed his brows in a flash of thought, lowering his gaze before turning entirely to glance up at the restaurant's porch door. "Sure." He inhaled thinly, stepping back to the porch stairs and slipping inside. He crossed the porch and approached the window he'd cracked open for Maggie's egress, setting his palm against the top edge and pushing. It closed with a heavy thunk.

He felt a tug of insecurity. An urge for control.

There was no telling if the cat would stay there and wait for them to return. He had no way of communicating with it, and locking it up in the restaurant was condemning it to the same fate it had already almost suffered, if they didn't come back. The alternative, however, was accepting the chance the cat might decide they'd left and run away.

So he chose the lesser of the two evils, caught underneath a strong sensation of helplessness. He wanted to protect her, and he couldn't. Add one furball to the long list of things I can't protect lately. It was a list he didn't have any interest in thinking on too hard.

He returned out into the yard, aware of the intentional way nobody's gaze was directed at him.

"Makes sense to me." Coach grunted, adjusting the holster on his shoulder that Lena had given him to hold her brush-hook. Closer examination revealed it as scavenged strips of fabric stapled together to accommodate the weapon, remarkably sturdy for the seemingly ramshackle construction. "We gotta get back on track fo' signallin' the military, too."

Rochelle gestured with one hand out into the street, fingers loosely spread. "As long as we get back within sight of the shore, I'll be happy. I hate to think we've missed a boat going past while we've been over here."

"Even if we see a boat, we gotta get their attention somehow." Ellis pointed out with one hand up and cradling his cheek, brusquely scratching at the fuzz marking his jawline. His tone carried his characteristically helpful and obsessive lilt of determination, sinking his teeth into a problem that needed solving. "Like flashin' S.O.S. or somethin'."

Lena's chin lifted, her eyes narrowing softly, voice light with an unassuming curiousity. "Anything that's going to get a boat's attention will probably get some zombies' attention, too. You folks should be careful with that plan."

Ellis looked vaguely put-out, but it only took him a moment to recover, bouncing on his heels. "Whut if -."

Before he got any further, Coach lifted a hand in a shushing gesture, grimacing. "One step at a time, son. Let's focus on not gettin' killed out here first." When Ellis ducked his chin in an apologetic gesture, Coach turned to look out into the road with a soft squint. "Everyone good? Ro', you gonna lead us?"
Rochelle flashed her teeth in a broad smile, a laugh passing across her eyes that she didn't allow to fully form. She slipped her hand into the wrist-strap of the stun baton, looping it there so it was solid and stable in her grip. "Lead you bunch of rascals? I do not get paid enough for this."

"You get paid?" was Nick's flat response. "I want to get paid."

"Boy, don't think I forgot you cramming money in your wallet." Rochelle glanced back at him, eyes narrowed, mirth in the challenge of her tone. Nick met her look with a puffed chest, defensive energy making his body stiffen. "I'm pretty sure you're the only one of us with cash anymore. For whatever that's worth."

Rhiannon tossed her bat from hand to hand, tongue slipping out to get caught between her teeth in a pinch before she offered up, "Toilet paper."

The disgusted sound that left Nick stirred Ellis into a violent sputter of laughter, a sound he choked down, sharply. The gambler looked his way, but the younger man was already facing the other direction, head bowed, so Nick merely stated: "If society pulls itself back together, I intend on being the richest motherfucker alive."

Lifting her borrowed stun baton like a torch, Rochelle started marching forward. "Society wants new clothes. Let's go, guys!" Coach fell into close step behind her, and from there, their pre-apportioned teams fell into place. Christophe jogged up to Ellis' side, posture huddled low, and Nick found the bikers moving in eerie unison to stand at either side of him.

"This is going to go horribly." Nick muttered, sarcastically, unpleasantly tensing when Rhiannon's elbow jabbed into his upper arm. He would've dodged it, but all that would have done was stagger him into Lena. He felt definitively trapped, and there was not much to do but start walking forward at the touch, haunted all the while by the image of two head-strong Texans ushering him on with a cattleprod.

The blonde's cracked grin did not pass by his notice. "Don't worry, puddin'. We'll take care of you."

Nick would get revenge, one way or another, though he had not yet figured out how.

_Maybe I'll get in their boat and shoot a hole in the bottom when we're out at sea._

_Two birds, one bullet._
The scream of an infected was broken sharply off, as Nick's katana slotted into its chest. Whatever he hit was vital enough to degrade its howl into a wheeze of wet air, but wasn't enough to kill it. The zombie thrust forward, arms gone wild, left forearm striking him across the face.

Its skin was wet, smearing something half-congealed on his cheek, and he snarled in disgust at the sensation. "Ugh - asshat!"

Twisting his wrists sent the blade sawing along the curve of its ribcage, and a ferocious seize preceded its collapse. He let its own body weight pull itself off the blade, shaking its limp corpse free, and he was turned and prepared for the next in an instant.

Rhiannon was close behind him, but her attention was mostly focused on protecting her sister. Lena had taken Rochelle's pistol and was not defenseless, but the younger Texan was quick enough on her feet that she wasn't forced to use it very often. Nick cut them a path, and Rhiannon cleaned up the stragglers. It was not precisely coordinated, but they managed.

Their teammates were near, the larger group never quite splitting up even as they kept in their smaller duo and trios.

Rochelle and Coach worked together smoothly, the news producer staggering infected with her stun baton so that he could jab out the borrowed brush-hook from Lena and gut them. They were a well-oiled machine and kept in the frontline.

Christophe had yet to kill anything at all, but Ellis had more than enough bottled-up energy with which to carry his weight. Regardless, they were pinned closely enough to Coach and Rochelle that the one-armed Spaniard was protected.

The constant, steady flow of infected was - in its own way - more dangerous than a horde. They came from houses and side-streets and burst through windows, broke down doors, attracted by the gunfire of the survivors and the screams of the infected before them. They were unending. They did not tire. They did not hesitate.

The survivors were not so impenetrable.

Nick's arms were sore, muscles straining with the weight of the two-handed blade. His back hurt from a swing he'd taken slightly too far, twisting just beyond his normal range of motion. His jaw now ached from the fresh blow. They'd only been out for a short time, and he already felt exhausted.

"Come on, Chris, you got this!"

Eyes darting up, Nick watched Ellis take an infected down with a heavy swipe of his steel-toed boot. The creature shrieked, tumbling down to the ground, its left leg buckling with the damage. It struggled back up, weight entirely on its good leg, half-broken one slumped and barely supporting it.

The female's slack-jawed rage turned to Chris, eyes hazy and muddled, flashing yellow as the sunlight struck them at odd angles. It surged toward him, black spittle dripping from the corners of its mouth, but the Spaniard did not act. Christophe held his machete in his hand, fingers white-knuckled, frozen in fear - like Ellis weren't asking him to do something he'd done a million times before.
Nick's eyes were riveted on him, watching the young man take a step backward to maintain his distance. Did he think of the number he'd scrawled on the sides of buildings, the kill counts the Angels had touted? Did he see hundreds of kills in his mind's eye, corpses and blood and gore, at his hands? Did he even recognize himself anymore?

Nick felt a surge of some indescribable anxiety flood him as Chris lifted the weapon, body shuddering as he found his balance. The infected stumbled closer, and Ellis had his shotgun aimed - but he did not shoot.

He merely watched, and Nick's pulse jumped, erratic.

Kid, shoot it.

Ellis tracked the infected with the nose of his shotgun, following it, but his finger was loose on the trigger.

What the fuck are you doing?!

Chris hesitated, shifting another step backwards, retreating from its approach. Nick knew full well that he wasn't ready, if he'd ever be ready. The entire purpose of pairing Christophe and Ellis was giving the Spaniard somebody to rely on, somebody who'd protect him in a pinch.

He wasn't ready to fight. Putting him in that position was begging for disaster; either he'd fail and get injured, or he'd falter and have his courage crushed for good.

Nick didn't know how to quiet the part of him that cared about the outcome.

The infected lunged, and the clipped blast of Ellis' shotgun sounded out. Nick watched the infected collapse to the ground, the skeletal structure of its ribcage bared in sleek stripes of white, gore sputtering from its broken body.

The sharp tension that passed through Christophe's body, shuddering and then hunching his head low, betrayed his shame. He did not react in the slightest when Ellis darted to clap a hand on his hip, soothingly, speaking soft enough that Nick strained to hear. "It's okay, buddy. I got yer back 'til yuh feel up to it."

There was a clinging anxiety that set his stomach to flipping, and a bitter taste that crawled up his throat. He had to remind himself that he was the only one who knew how close Chris had come to ending his life over his injury.

Ellis had no reason to coddle him, not like he might've needed, and Nick didn't have the capacity to. He'd already come to terms with the fact that keeping Chris' secret had been a mistake. He was the worst person to deal with the situation - and someone needed to.

Sooner than later.

"Spitter!" Rochelle shouted, her voice cutting through the din of infected. Nick turned on a dime, hand darting down to the holster wrapped tight on his thigh. It only took a flick of his thumb to unlatch his Magnum, and he drew it and lifted the weapon, eyes darting for signs of the elongated and clumsy creature.

He didn't spot it, not before a glossy splash of green sparked into his vision. The instant it did, instinct made him bolt, heel hitting the ground hard to absorb and reverse all his momentum. It was only when the wet projectile struck the ground and burst a few feet ahead of the team that he convinced his body to stop.
The acid bubbled and spat, puddling in their path. Rochelle and Coach hadn't even needed to retreat to dodge it, only to halt; it was as if the Spitter had aimed to catch them as they charged forward along the street.

That tactic had failed. It did, however, serve the purpose of slowing their progress and allowing a cluster of infected to gather around them. They circled the survivors like a flood of liquid, flowing between and around them in a blur of grey skin and yellow eyes.

Snarling and growling, a set of blood-splattered zombies charged toward Nick. He took one out with a messy shot to the skull before shoving his Magnum back into his holster and gripping his katana with both hands again.

As one sprinted close, he lunged out. The tip of his blade drove straight into its nasal cavity, sinking the tip into bone somewhere deeper in its skull, and the zombie slumped in an instant.

"Cripes. I hate those things." Lena muttered, her pistol lifted and gripped in both hands. She took careful aim, pulling the trigger with a measured determination, only shooting when she could get an angle well away from any of her teammates.

The explosive laughter that followed was definitively inhuman - and Nick jolted a step closer to the bikers nearby in the same instant that he perked onto the balls of his feet, trying to keep his other teammates in his sight-line. Zombies had snuck between them, separating them into two groups, and flashes of skin and colour were all Nick could get beyond the gathering mess of bodies.

"Watch yo' asses, there's a Jockey 'round here!" Coach shouted, his tone wrought with a mixture of anger and discomfort. "Don't let the damn facehugger grab nobody! Y'ALL, close up!"

Nick swung his katana sharply, blood spraying as the blade sliced through the mass of a zombie's chest, and pushed back until he felt the brush of bodies against his. Rhiannon and Lena formed a tight triangle with him, and with them at his flanks, he focused on cutting a path toward the rest of the team.

An infected lunged at him, but its chest burst with a light spray of red as the brunette at his elbow shot twice into it. The damage did not stop it, but it staggered it enough that Nick could easily land a slice across its throat, sawing halfway to its spine and sending it to the ground.

"Shit -" ghosted near his ear, and he half-turned, finding Rhiannon jolted entirely too close. He met her muddied eyes and then followed them, and a flash of pinkened skin was just barely visible as the hobbled Jockey skittered through the infected around them. It was running straight toward Coach and Rochelle.

It didn't take long for his mind to process the situation. He'd seen the dirty work of enough Jockeys to know how things would play out; the scrawny creature would leap, and either Coach or Rochelle would take the blow and stumble.

They'd stagger, trying to keep their balance, and the Jockey would swing and jostle its weight to usher them on. It would, no doubt, take them directly into the acid still sizzling ferociously on the ground. The window of time to stop its victim would be perilously short.

He could fling himself into the fray, throw himself bodily in their direction, chase the Jockey and stop it from reaching his teammates. It was what he wanted to do, but it wasn't the smart thing to do. He was paired with the bikers, and he needed to stay with them. Abandoning them in the midst of a fight seemed a surefire way to fuck his chances with them.
It was for those reasons that he was mildly surprised to find himself sprinting forward.

The sound of Rhiannon shouting his name, the twist of betrayal in her voice, registered in the back of his mind. He'd suffer the consequences later. Committed to his choice, Nick swiped in jagged motions to cut through the infected separating him from his team. He could only just spot glimpses of the Jockey through the encroaching crowd, and he could only keep up by luck.

The zombies did not part ways for him - but they didn't for the Jockey, either. The creature's twisted and small stature only afforded it so much of an advantage in ducking past infected, and adrenaline fueled Nick to make up the difference.

"Coach!" he shouted in warning, katana cutting deeply into the side of a zombie. The infected collapsed, its body spreading apart as it twisted in its fall, sending a gush of viscera to the asphalt. His heel landed on something wet and hard, and his footing slid right out from under him.

_Fuck._

He was going down, one way or another, so he shoved his weight forward in a leap rather than let it tip him backwards. The Jockey was just ahead, its skeletal face twisted to look back at him, tongue lapping wildly at its crooked cage of teeth.

Its eyes lolled back before focusing on his face, and he felt a tug of satisfaction as his outstretched hand encircled its knobby little ankle.

Then he hit the ground.

Belly-flopping on a street surface was not, as it turned out, an enjoyable activity. He felt any number of pain points where a knee or hipbone collided with the rough ground, and the only reason that his chin didn't crash into the asphalt and crack his teeth was because he'd landed half on his side.

His ribs and his shoulder complained exuberantly about that, but he was quickly given a distraction.

Most of the infected around him ignored him, as they were enraptured in the single-minded focus of sprinting toward a different target and lacked the presence of mind to look down. The Jockey, however, reacted instantly and violently to his touch.

It kicked out with the leg he'd grabbed, and the power of it startled him. He gripped so hard that he felt its skin give way, the outer layer of flesh squeezing off like loosened sausage casing. It was enough to make him want to retch, and it took all he had not to let go.

He abandoned his grip on his katana, surging that hand up to scrabble for purchase on its other leg. It screamed a strange sound, broken and whistled, seizing in his grip.

"Someone - fucking -" he choked out, unsure if his voice even carried. He swore he blinked, and the Jockey was abruptly twisted almost into a ball, straining down toward him. The bend of its spine was wholly unnatural, an impossible angle that should have snapped it in two.

He didn't have time to recoil before it sunk its craggy teeth into his forearm. The sound of pain that left him was unfiltered in his shock, and he couldn't stop his body from instinctively yanking backwards. The Jockey released him the moment he released it.

It had precisely enough time to hop up to its feet and cackle out a thrilled whinny before the dark metal of a machete blade implanted itself in the creature's skull. The sound was dull and flat, and there was no blood at all.

The Jockey simply twitched, jerked, and then collapsed.

Nick blinked away the blur of pain from his vision, warily lifting his head to look up. Chris had given up his hold on the machete the moment he'd completed the swing, and he stood with his arm curled close to his chest, pale and wide-eyed.

Their gazes met, but Nick got the strong feeling the Spaniard wasn't seeing very much at all.

As fast as it had formed, the rush of infected ended. Nick was vaguely aware of the blast of guns and the impact of weapons on skin, and then there was some approximation of quiet. He pushed up to his knees, grimacing down at the smear of saliva and black blood pressed into the sleeve of his shirt.

He didn't pull it up to look; he could feel the damage already. It hadn't broken skin, but he'd be feeling it for days, all the same.

When the survivors approached, Ellis came immediately to Christophe's side. His eyes darted toward Nick, taking stock of his condition, and the Northerner allowed a faint wince in his direction. Ow, it stated, blandly, and Ellis seemed to accept it at face value.

"Chris, man!" he cooed, excitement bleeding into his voice. "You did it! 'M so dang proud! Man, if it weren't creepy as all hell, I'd make you a damn trophy outta this thing!"

"That's... a horrifying mental image." Rochelle supplied, breathless, bent over with her borrowed stun baton braced above her knees. Her eyes slanted to look over at them, worry etched into her face. "You okay, Chris?"

Christophe's expression filtered to something vaguely conscious, weakly forcing a smile. He looked down at his hand, spreading his fingers and then clenching them. His fist trembled softly, like he were digging his nails into his palm. "Ah... Sí. I... Yes."

Shaking his head fiercely, the man relaxed his fingers and reached down to grab at his machete handle. It was stuck fast, and he had to set the toe of his shoe against the Jockey's corpse to get the leverage to pry it free. It dripped with a tacky layer of fluids, more pus than blood and gore.

When he got it in his hand, straightening, his smile became a little more sincere. "Cago en tu leche." he spat down at the creature's limp body, a huff to his voice.

"Shit, Nicky." Coach's voice boomed gently, walking at a quick pace to close the distance. He bent down the moment he reached Nick's side, setting a hand on his shoulder. "You a'ight?"

When Nick ticked his head up in a nod, the ex-football player got him by the elbow and the back of his shirt and dragged him to his feet. A distressed sound left his lips, both at the ache of his body and the feeling of being, essentially, plucked up by his scruff.

"Jesus - I'm okay, I'm okay..."

Coach didn't acknowledge his protest, turning in a small circle to look over all the survivors. He had the focused look of a teacher taking a mental roll call. "Everyone a'ight?"

When Nick turned to follow his gaze, he wasn't prepared for a glimpse into the fires of hell - but that was what he got when he looked into Rhiannon's eyes. She was staring him down with the exact kind of fury he could remember from the first day he'd met her.
Except this time, I sort of deserve it.

He opened his mouth, and then thought better of speaking at all.

"We're fine. Let's go." Rhiannon gritted out before charging ahead with Lena close at her flank, the older woman blinking apologetically in Rochelle's direction. The fact that the blonde was withholding her anger at all did not bode well for the rest of their time together.

Nick was fairly certain that by the gentle way Coach patted his back before turning away, his suffering was common knowledge.
Chapter 233

Fear spiraled hard up Chris’ spine, sharp and painful. Was it cold as ice, or so scaldingly hot his nerves couldn’t tell the difference? He bit his lower lip, enduring it, like he endured the seizing pain of his phantom arm.

An infected lurched toward him. It filled his vision in a swell of grey skin and clouded eyes, and he swung out with his machete in a panicked swipe. His blow was weakened by the way he flinched, unable to commit all his force to the action. He only managed to slice through the flesh of its cheek, inflicting just a cosmetic wound.

Jawbone and blackened teeth showed through the yawning gap in its flesh, stretching and tearing as it opened its mouth to scream at him, and his second swipe was harder only out of desperation. The blade sunk into its throat and threatened to catch in its vertebrae. As the infected fell, dead, Chris gasped out a sharp yelp.

He felt the weapon tug at his grip, and he almost lost his hold on it; he almost let it go. Only having one arm meant that he had no other defense. If he lost the machete, or it got stuck in a zombie, he was helpless. He could have kept a zombie at bay with both his hands, gripping it by the wrists and holding it at arms’ length.

Now, with only one limb, what could he do? What use was he? Jerry would have put him down without a second thought, if he'd ever seen him in this condition, and Chris couldn't blame him. Everyone had to pull their weight, and he could not. If he had been alone, he wouldn't have lasted. He'd be dead. He should have been dead.

Tranqui. Toma un respiro. Breathe, he thought, lungs protesting the instruction by beginning a fevered few jolts and hiccupps of air. His eyes darted up and around, reassuring himself with the sight of Ellis only a few inches away. His friend's attention passed to him for an instant, beaming, before he turned away and shot an infected directly in the midsection.

Chris gulped in air, turning again to face outwards, to face the infected swarming them.

He had to maintain his calm. The Georgian was so relieved to see him regain his confidence, and it clearly meant so much to him to know Chris was improving. He couldn’t reveal the honest truth of how bone-deep his terror was. He didn't know how to admit he was afraid, that he was broken. It had been hard enough to admit his pain to Ellis, and his - whatever it was to Rochelle -

Saving Nick had been a fluke, and it had not bolstered his confidence. He was left only with the bristled sensation of anxiety, like he'd lied and convinced them he could do it. They'd trust him to handle himself, and he'd eventually let them down.

Christophe hadn’t been truly terrified of infected in a long time. He had been during the first few days of the outbreak, but all his energy had been focused on keeping Sean safe - safe and happy, or the closest he could come to it. There had been no room for his confidence to waver, not when his partner relied on him to be upbeat and optimistic.

And then they’d stumbled upon the Angels of Death, back when the group had been at its height, and things had changed. They had changed.

He’d never felt so powerful. It was the iron grip of animal instinct, of realizing that everything he'd believed in was gone. He’d once considered himself gentle. He’d taken pride in being the sort of man who’d turn the other cheek, who’d talk his way out of a fight. None of that meant anything anymore.

Jaime, the red-headed Kansas native with crooked teeth and biceps that rivaled Jerry’s, had grinned at him the first time they’d met. She’d handed him a machete and rasped out, "You’re cute, but you better learn how to swing a blade."

And he had. Driven on by the saccharine praise of his team, the drug of it consumed him. He’d grown apart from Sean, drawn tightly into the vague alliance between him, Brenda, and Jerry that would later split the group in half. He’d never been so important. He loved the power, yes, but he mostly loved how valued it all made him feel.

As much as the majority of them hated each other, they still stood shoulder-to-shoulder and took on all comers. He was relied upon, and for so long, they succeeded. Life had become a game of violence, and they’d won. They’d come out on top - though he’d realized too late what the cost had been.

Jason, Brock, Phil, Sean, Jaime, Brenda, and Jerry. They’d all look down on him now.

If he blinked too quickly, turned his head too suddenly, he’d see the broad shape of Jerry’s shoulder - but it was only a large infected, gutting blood from a fresh wound to the gut. Brown hair would flash past his vision - but it was not Brenda, just a zombie falling dead to the ground.

Jaime’s solid frame and jaded green eyes flashed toward him, shambling. Jason’s dark skin covered in black blood. Phil’s sunken features, a black gash where his left eye had been. Brock’s corpse laid flat with its arms spread and its guts slung out like he were nothing more than ransacked luggage.

He could not look without seeing them. Driven to drowning amidst air his lungs refused to take in, Christophe closed his eyes.

A body struck his, a rank stench swelling in his nose and throat. He shouted as he was taken to the ground, and when he landed, the impact of his hewn shoulder with the asphalt was nothing less than agony. His head collided with the ground shortly thereafter.

Any grasp on reality snapped free from him, plunging him into a dark and quiet space. Something like a memory surfaced, a gentle realization, though he couldn’t be certain that it had really ever happened. He felt some subtle dissociation with the sensations of it, no different from the distant-yet-visceral pain of his missing arm.

"Mi español es malo." Sean's voice was soft and his pronunciation was warped, some heavy American dialect clinging to his words. Chris laughed, burying his face in his hands, rather than look at his partner's disappointed face. “What? Was that wrong?”

He couldn’t stop. Tears came to his eyes, ribs aching, driven to hystericis. It was the stress, he was sure, making such a stupid thing so hilarious. He tried to breathe, but nothing passed his lips except cackling.

“Why are you laughing?” It was accusatory, but Sean was starting to laugh, too. “Am I just a big joke to you?” He always broke, even when he was angry. Hands gripped his wrists, pulling them away, and Chris had to look up.

Sean's eyes gleamed at him from either side of a gushing bullet hole.

“It was always just a joke.”
Chris came back to himself, and he only recognized the fact he was screaming by the fact that there was someone else's hand clamped over his mouth. It was Coach, he realized, when the voice speaking nonsense in his ear was deep and bassy.

He forced his jaw shut around the sound that was escaping him, the guttural noise that he didn't recognize as his own voice, and arms encircled him and pulled him close. He wanted to scream, then, as his body seemed to take the pressure and touch and translate it into pain. He'd never felt so claustrophobic in his own body, strangled by the skin wrapped around his bones.

There were voices all around him, and his attempts to focus and listen were only partially successful. His English was good, but it was so hard to hear, understand, and then translate before he'd already forgotten the words they'd spoken. He mostly clung to his own name where he caught it.

All he knew was he was suddenly upright, seated on the ground, and a hand gripped the back of his neck. A thumb braced beneath his jawline, forcing his face up, and his vision filled with someone's face. The features barely registered, just a jumble of shadow and light and colour.

"Chris."

A sharp inhale tugged at his chest, and the shape crouched in front of him snapped violently into focus. Nick's eyes were dark and flat on his, searching, and he felt the fevered static in his veins fall to a quiet hum. Calm fell across his body, more like surrender than relaxation. He'd put his life in Nick's hands before.

"Stand up."

It wasn't gentle. It was a command, with an edge of anger. Christophe tried to obey, but his body failed to respond. When a panted breath left his lips, stuttered, Nick reached out and grabbed his elbow to drag him up to his feet. His legs almost collapsed, but the Northerner's grasp was iron-clad, and it was either stand or dangle from his hand like so much dead weight.

So he stood, legs trembling beneath him. His body seized with a diffracted pain, spiralling in ribbons through his nervous system. He tried to hug around his torso - only to be reminded of the absence of his left arm.

The darkness that swallowed his vision thinned, drifting further into his periphery, and Chris vaguely glanced around to see that they were almost alone. They'd been given a berth, some privacy. Coach, Ellis, and Rochelle had moved forward, and the bikers were lingering close, but not too close.

Chris blinked, focusing, and if he looked ahead, he could just make out Rochelle's worried face looking in his direction. It should have soothed him, but it only served to heighten the stress buzzing in his teeth.

"You need to get your shit together."

Christophe's head twisted too quickly as he looked at Nick, the abrupt shift sending his balance teetering. A hand struck flat onto his elbow, steadying him, and he uttered a wheezed breath. "Nico -"

Nick's face was suddenly tremendously close, leaned in, voice a low growl. "You made a choice to keep going, kid. You made a choice, and now you've got to deal with the consequences. What did I fucking tell you? We can't carry you, and if they can't rely on you, you're going to get someone killed.”

“I no say I can do it.” spat from Christophe’s lips, a thought he hadn’t meant to vocalize. His eyes darted to match Nick’s with a startled squint, aware of the sigh that deflated the man’s chest. Nick seemed regretful, for just an instant, before he snapped back to quiet irritation.

When he spoke, there was a wry humour to it. “Too bad. We’re out here. And if you’d been out here alone, you’d be dead, whether you were ready or not.”

Chris blinked his vision into focus, staring abruptly up at the gambler, slanted to account for the height Nick had on him. He felt a surge of pain, followed shortly by numbness. His hand lifted, reaching out, and he gripped fingers in Nick’s sleeve where his hand had lingered at Chris’ elbow to keep him standing.

“I should be.” a voice stated. It took a moment to recognize that it was his own.

Nick gazed back, unaffected. Nothing flickered in his eyes, not recognition and not sympathy. It made Chris second-guess himself; had he even spoken English?

Then Nick turned away, leaving his hand where it was, looking over his shoulder. “Lena.” he called, shortly, frustration mingling with a kind of determination. Chris’ vision blurred, chin lowering, gasping for air when his throat threatened to close. “Come give me that gun.”

An absurd, manic laugh passed Chris’ lips. Perhaps Nick had decided to put him down after all.

"’Bout time." hushed Jerry's voice, just by his ear. It made him flinch, sure he felt the brush of hot air, of breath sliding down his neck. He barely maintained composure, though his body jolted away from the imagined stimuli, and Nick looked back at him with a cautious attention.

Chris looked anywhere but his face, afraid his eyes might give his fear away. He watched Lena approach at a limp, not oblivious to the way she avoided looking at him. Her lips were drawn in something pinched, eyes difficult to read, and she silently turned Rochelle's borrowed pistol around and offered it to him, grip-first.

When Nick took it, she stayed, muddy eyes flitting between them with rapt attention.

Nick seemed to pause, to hesitate, but he didn't say anything to her.

He slid his katana between his belt and his slacks, letting it sit there, and released Chris' elbow to get both his hands on the pistol. Drawing back the rack, he glanced in, and Chris watched with a furrowed brow as Nick grunted lightly and then reached up to his breast pocket.

Chris didn't understand, not even when Nick's hand came back with a bullet gripped between his fingers. He watched, uncomprehending, as Nick thumbed the bullet into the chamber and let the rack slide back into position. He could do nothing but cooperate when Nick shoved the gun in his hand, staring down at it. It was so cold, though Lena's grasp should have kept it warm.

So heavy, though he knew it weighed very little.

"You chose not to put that bullet in your brain." Nick stated, voice cold, derisive. Lena's body shifted in discomfort as she listened, and her eyes rooted fully on Chris' face, widening a little as she absorbed the new information. Chris might've paid more attention to her, had he not had his gaze yankedsolidly upward to stare at Nick. "But that was just half the battle. You've got to fight or die, because everything here wants to kill you. There's no time for you to straddle the line here, Chris."
It wasn't just a bullet, he realized. It was the bullet that Nick had loaded for him, and taken back when Chris had been unable to use it.

The Northerner's arm lifted, gesturing out, fingers splaying and then clenching. "You made a choice. So either stick with it, or don't. You're firing that gun, kid, one way or another; that's the world we live in now. The only thing you get to choose is where the bullet goes."

Christophe lifted his chin, and he could see it with such clarity: he could still remember Brenda's slumped frame, her exhaustion blending with rage, grip shuddering tightly on her katana. She had not begged him to stay, or threatened him. She'd just trembled and uttered a single word.

"Choose."

And he'd made a choice. He'd left her and stepped into the yawning unknown, determined to find himself again.

"So choose, kid."

Christophe lowered the pistol, aiming it at the ground, and fired. The recoil was explosive but short-lived, and the snap of gunfire was followed by a puff of dust as the bullet lodged itself in the asphalt road. His arm trembled, shivered, and he couldn't relax his finger enough to release the trigger.

He exhaled, closing his eyes, taking in the quiet surge of calm that enveloped him. It felt like purging something. It had never occurred to him that Nick had hung onto that bullet, that it was there in his pocket, following them like some cursed trinket.

Burying it in the ground felt good.

Pulling the trigger felt good.

Making the choice, most of all, felt good.

For the first time in days, he realized he couldn't feel his left arm at all. He felt its absence, felt the lack of it, like the buzz of a pinched nerve - but he didn't feel it. He didn't know if it would last, but even a moment's respite was enough to make him sigh.

Nick snorted, shallowly, and he felt the man brush past him. It took Chris a moment to open his eyes, and when he did, he watched Nick bend down to retrieve his machete. He offered it out to Lena and the brunette took it without a word.

"I was thinking something more like aiming it at a zombie, but let's go with that." he uttered, and his voice held a strained kind of humour that vibrated with an urgent composure. His features were sharp with tension, jaw clenched until it thickened his speech pattern. "You good, Pancho? Take the gun for a while."

Christophe gazed down at his hand, slowly coaxing his finger to relax until he could remove it from the pistol's trigger entirely. "Sí. That is okay," he croaked out, aware his voice was faint and reedy.

His features were sharp with tension, jaw clenched until it thickened his speech pattern. "You good, Pancho? Take the gun for a while."

"Sí. That is okay," he croaked out, aware his voice was faint and reedy.

Nick looked at him for a moment. Their eyes met, and Nick's gaze tightened. It was a subtle warning, a challenge. "Keep close. And keep the screaming to a minimum."

A laugh panted from Chris, faint. "Sí."
When Nick turned away, Lena moved a step closer to him. Her hand settled at the small of his back, and her head tilted to look at his face. He forced himself to meet her gaze.

"We got you covered, hoss. Don't worry." Her eyes were full of concern, and just the slightest bit of doubt. He wasn't sure if she didn't believe in her own words, or didn't believe in him. Neither would have surprised him.

He smiled, just a little, and managed, "I believe whatever, when a beautiful chica says it."

Lena's eyes brightened, just before she punched with her knuckles into his back. "I get the feelin' you'd flirt on your deathbed. No wonder Rochelle likes you so much."

Chris' smile widened, and he lowered his gaze just before letting his body turn and his attention drift up. He watched as Nick came up to the rest of the team, gesturing up the road.

"He's fine. He's going to stick with us, so you three stay together." the man stated, and nobody looked entirely convinced. "Let's go." Ellis' concern shifted to apology, hurt, as if he'd failed in his duties. Rochelle peered around Nick to look directly at him, and her pursed lips spoke to worry.

So, Chris lifted up his hand, shifting his grip in order to lift a thumb.

Rochelle stifled a smile, raising a hand to mirror the gesture.

When they mobilized again, organizing into two tightly knit clusters, Christophe looked into the swarms of infected and saw only strangers.
Chapter 234

The road drew tighter, thinning until it was only one lane on either side of the faded yellow line that Ellis walked along, one foot after another. Cars dotted the road thickly enough that even had they brought their sedan along, they would have been forced to leave it behind. There simply wasn't enough room.

Zombies came at them in waves and bursts, and they cut through all of it without missing a beat. As much as he didn't want to admit it, reorganizing the teams made them move a lot quicker. He and Chris had been slowing them down, and with Chris now safely tucked between Nick and the bikers, their pace had improved.

Of course, there were a lot of things Ellis didn't want to admit.

He didn't want to admit they'd rushed Chris into battle. He'd been so confident in his ability to protect the man and so hopeful that it would go well, that he'd not stopped to consider how Chris felt. They'd made a mistake, and now they might have even set the Spaniard's confidence back.

He, similarly, didn't want to admit that he'd ignored the signs that said Chris wasn't ready. He thought Chris had been doing better, but one zombie had been enough to reduce the man to screaming and babbling Spanish. He'd looked completely out of it, like a sleepwalker mid-nightmare, and it had taken brute force to quiet and calm him before he brought a horde down on them.

More than anything, Ellis didn't want to admit he was jealous. At first, he attributed the grimy feeling in his chest to Chris' outburst. He'd thought he'd been making breakthroughs, helping him, but it was Nick that talked him out of it? Nick that knew what to say - whatever it was he'd said - to soothe him? Nick that picked him up off his feet and put a hand on his face and...

Shit.

He was definitely jealous. Just not of Nick.

Ellis grimaced, rolling his eyes before he could stop the gesture. He couldn't help but be angry with himself for the petty and unfamiliar emotion surging up. It was beyond him why the two men would have any kind of rapport; Nick barely gave Chris the time of day. Had they ever even been alone together for more than a few minutes?

Logically, he should have been proud of Nick for stepping in and helping. It had been desperately needed, and Chris seemed significantly calmer now. Ellis should have been grateful. He didn't want anything but the best for his friend, even if it meant someone else providing the support.

Emotionally, he wanted to put his fist through a wall.

Everything would have been easier if Nick weren't still the same person as he'd ever been. Ellis wished that the break-up had soured his view of Nick, that he thought less of him. He wished he thought he'd been wrong about Nick the whole time. Maybe Nick genuinely didn't love him, but he couldn't believe that Nick didn't care about him, and that everything they'd shared had been completely hollow.

Maybe Nick didn't love him, but he, unfortunately, still loved Nick. That much was obvious to him, struggling to keep a lid on the intense frustration broiling in his gut. He didn't even know who he was angry at. Chris? The man hadn't done anything except get scared. Nick? All Nick had done was offer support to a teammate.

Himself? That seemed more likely.

Shit. Shit. Shit.

Sudden movement snapped his head up, and he watched a zombie charge at Coach. The big man lifted the brush-hook in his hands, widening his stance, and he jabbed out with it as the infected came within reach. The blade sliced into its face, sending blood gushing around the metal. It gargled, grabbing at its face, and Coach twisted the weapon to send it limp to the ground.

Ellis quickly scanned for any more, but nothing appeared. He'd have happily taken the distraction from his inner turmoil.

He must have sighed louder than he meant to, because Rochelle abruptly looked at him.

"You okay, peanut?" she murmured, lowering her stun baton to her thigh. Her eyes were sympathetic, and a sad smile crept onto her lips, like she knew full well the answer to the question she asked. Her steps shortened to match his as he traced the road lines with toe-to-heel steps. "You look grumpy."

He grunted, chin lifting to look around them. "Think 'm okay..." he responded, as honestly as he could, glancing at her. When she blinked, tilting her head in an obvious urge for him to elaborate, he shrugged and said nothing. He couldn't explain how he felt in a way that didn't make him sound pathetic - and he would be okay, he was sure.

Rochelle must have picked up on his reticence, because she smoothly looked up and down the road. Her voice raised to carry to the rest of the survivors walking some distance behind them. "We're close. I think it's a left up ahead." She had tucked the tourist guidebook into the waistband of her jeans, so she pulled it free in an easy motion.

It was already folded open to the loosely labeled map, and she merely glanced down to confirm the name of the street that crossed in front of the mall they were aiming for.

"We've still got a few blocks." Her head turned, gaze slanting to look over her shoulder. "Hope this goes okay. A strip mall is probably going to have a bunch of activity."

The knowledge of their destination's proximity drew the survivors together, and Lena quickened her steps to come in line with the other woman. "I know the first thing I'd do when I heard a disease was spreading is go to the mall." she joked, lightly, drawing a grin from Rochelle. "Green Flu? Pshh. Need me some new shoes."

Nick, Rhiannon, and Christophe approached close behind, and Ellis couldn't help but glance over. He was struck most by the extreme tension in Nick's posture, shoulders high and jaw gritted. It wasn't anger; no, his eyes were too empty, too calm. It was something else, simultaneously new and familiar.

He was paper-thin. He looked on the edge of something, but it wasn't the usual way he brewed his way towards an explosive outburst. It was wilted somehow, like he'd hollowed himself out. It cut through the anger rolling around in Ellis' gut, replacing the emotion with something a lot more troublesome: worry.

"You'd be surprised the dumb things people do before disasters. And nobody really knew how bad things were until it... was." Rochelle responded, screwing her nose up. "Most people didn't even believe the evacuations were mandatory."
It was very casually that Christophe cut in front of Nick, darting in a wobbled sort of strafe to park himself at Rochelle's elbow. She looked like she was completely ignoring him - except for the gently affectionate quirk at her mouth that she couldn't fight off.

"And what about you, bonita?" he cooed, and if his voice hadn't been rough and winded, he might've seemed completely normal. Ellis couldn't help but examine him, staring for a moment, bemused by the resurgence of his chipper attitude. "Why you no evacuate?"

It's almost like Nick'n'Chris done traded places... except for the part where Nick ain't ever really cheery, but... still. A thought occurred to him, alongside a flood of uncertainty. Are either of 'em okay...?

Rochelle laughed, lightly. Swinging her step a little wide had her boot come perilously close to tripping Chris, and he stumbled a step away with a wicked grin plastered all over his face. I'm with the news. The news doesn't evacuate. We run into hurricanes and fires and, apparently, zombie outbreaks."

"The 'news'?" the man responded, tone delicate around the apparently unfamiliar word. "¿Qué?"

"You know." Ellis interjected with a flap of his hands. Chris turned to watch the gesture, the confused twitch of his brow indicating that he was probably trying to put meaning to it. "Like, folks on TV talkin' bout what's happenin. "Like, a reporter."

That triggered Chris to cluck his tongue, nodding, gesturing with the gun in his hand. "Sí, sí, comprendo. La reportera." His eyes squinted slightly, exhaling a breath with a disgruntled expression. "Americans have so much... news. It is a lot of talking for nothing, ¿sí? And so much about politics, y... escándalos. Drama."

A choked snort escaped Rochelle, turning at her waist to lift a brow at him. Her voice walked the line between casually offended and extremely offended. "You have news in Spain, too, boy. It's not some dumb American invention. What are you talking about?"

Christophe cautiously pointed his pistol down at the ground, tilted away from his feet. His eyes widened just a twitch, realizing he'd stepped squarely into something unpleasant before he managed, "Em, ¡sí! Claro. I only mean to say, en España, there is not so much like it, so... tipo de... entrometido." He shook his head in a placating gesture. "I am sure you did ah, muy buenas, eh, news, y -"

"Oh, God, please stop. Let's call this conversation a loss." Rochelle coughed out a laugh, snapping her head to the side with a wince, as if to look well away from him in embarrassment. "I hated running politics, anyway. And I'm a producer, not a reporter. I only got on the ground because -" Her voice faded a little, and when she re-directed her gaze forward, it was sobered. "- my coworkers kept getting sick."

Dropping his chin, Christophe focused squarely at his blood-encrusted Vans. His footsteps stuttered a moment, and he said nothing.

"Let's keep moving, huh?" she offered up, calmly.

He slowed, where Rochelle didn't, and Ellis took advantage of the discrepancy to side-step over toward the younger man. Chris glanced at him as he approached, his light brown eyes unsure, and Ellis gave a questioning tilt of his head.

"Hey, buddy." he whispered from the corner of his mouth. Chris acknowledged him with a few blinks. "You feelin' any better? Sorry 'bout that zombie gettin' you earlier. I wasn't lookin'."

"No worry." the Spaniard responded, lifting his gun with a jerk of the muzzle. His gaze lifted and directed elsewhere, down the road, and Ellis didn't miss the slight urgency in the reassurance, the dismissive edge. He didn't want to talk about it. "This is better, anyway, creo."

Ellis pursed his lips, thoughtfully. He was going to let it go, and change the subject or simply not say anything at all. He must've looked like he wouldn't, because Chris abruptly burst into a laugh, throwing up his hand, gun gripped tight. "¡Tío! No worry, ¡por favor!" He leaned in close, arm still up as if to balance his weight as he leaned into his amputated side. "I feel good. I do not feel it anymore."

He went to gesture with the gun, turning it to point the muzzle at the empty air next to his left side, but seemed to think better of it at the last second and lowered the weapon. Ellis gave a hesitant smile, nodding his head gently.

"That's good." he uttered, feeling distant from the words as he spoke them. He didn't want to be discouraging, and tried for delicacy. "Just, uh, y'know... it may come back again. It ain't just gonna go away like that. Stress'n'shit'll bring it on, so... if it don't stay gone, just -"

Exhaling a sigh, Christophe shook his head. He limped his body until his knees bent a little mid-walk in a full-body gesture of agitation, even as his voice was edged with strained affection. "Ay, Ellis. You give me the can, mi amigo."

Ellis felt his face screw up. "Huh?"

Rather than answer, the Spaniard shook his head and jogged a few steps forward. "Nada... nada. I am fine." he called back. With the only alternative being to chase him, Ellis let him go with a sigh. Chris clearly didn't want to talk about it, and the Georgian didn't see the point in forcing the issue. It'd come out, or it wouldn't.

He watched Chris move to the side of the road, and Nick came into his periphery. The gambler spared him no mind, speeding up to fall into step behind the Spaniard. He leaned in, the hand that wasn't gripping his katana pushed stiffly into his slacks pocket, and growled thinly over Chris' shoulder.

Ellis blinked, startled, because he swore he heard Nick say to him, "Watch it, kid." Chris didn't react at all, like he hadn't even heard the chastisement.

That just put a whole new set of emotions broiling in his gut. Was Nick defending him? And why? He asked himself the question, despite knowing perfectly well the answer: if Nick felt justified in being jealous of him, then it only made sense that he'd be justified in being protective of him. It all added up to the same picture, and multiplied the same confusion.

_Damnit, Nick. The hell do you want, anyway? And why do you look so damn miserable when this ain't any'uh my fault? You did this all tuh yerself - tuh me - 'n' I gotta see you lookin' like a kicked dog. I gotta deal with worryin' about you when I can't do nothin’ bout it._

He sighed, _growled_, letting the noise rumble in his throat.

Embarrassment flooded him when Rhiannon suddenly slipped beside him, looking at him, with one pierced brow raised high on her forehead at his outburst. He hadn't realized she'd been so close behind him, and all he could do was offer a strained look.

She grinned harshly and offered up, "Me too, dude."
It was the first time Ellis genuinely felt a camaraderie with the blonde, and he wasn't even completely sure what she meant. He'd have pressed - but the next wave of infected was upon them, a crowd of zombies bursting up from their prone positions beyond a wrecked bus, and there was no time.
Chapter 235

Nick couldn't coax his body to move. His feet were rooted to the spot, arms slack at his sides, and he was aware of his teammates at either side of him doing much the same thing. Rochelle came close, her hand brushing against his elbow before catching fingers in his sleeve like a child.

"What... the hell?" she whispered. "What the hell is this?"

They'd come around the corner, and the squat roadside had opened up into a courtyard of patterned pavestones. The shopping mall was a U-shaped construction, two stories tall, and its walls were speckled with windows so densely packed that it seemed more like a greenhouse than a mall.

The heavily tinted glass was shatter-proof, and bullet-holes pecked most of the upper panels in isolated dots of open air without having brought the whole structure down. The ground-level panes were not as lucky; they had been mostly busted inward or outward. Glass was scattered all around, shimmers and sparkles prickling here and there as the sunlight struck it.

The building itself was made faded adobe stone, pale yellow chipped and cracked in what might have been some intentional weathered aesthetic, or - just as likely - disrepair. It was difficult to tell if it had even been in use before the apocalypse, as what little Nick could make of the insides looked like rows of shuttered and empty storefaces.

It had definitely been in use since.

A few police vans were parked messily to one side, doors flung open. He couldn't help but think it was the source of the infected decked out in police riot gear that had attacked him several nights before. It was also the closest he'd come to really seeing any kind of organized military presence, and it genuinely unnerved him.

The plaza was packed tightly with tents, separated by metal fencing that eked out pathways between them. Some of them were simple, like oversized camping tents or simple awnings, but one was a massive construction with metal ribs holding up dense camo-green fabric. The door flaps were closed tightly, zippered shut.

All of those details registered, but all Nick's eyes could focus on were the bodies.

They layered the ground, a carpet of gore. Limbs jutted up where they'd fallen, and the smell was tangible even at a distance. They'd been there a while in the heat and the weather; their skin was mottled red and green and their skin bloated, bursting at the seams of their carcasses. The stone below them blushed with a rusty wash, like the flow of rainwater over and around them had painted it with bodily fluids.

From where he stood, he could pick out the difference between infected corpses and uninfected ones. It was hard to tell beyond the rot, and with their eyes too cloudy and dessicated to determine if they held that yellow and reflective quality. However, there was something distinct in the pallor imparted by the Flu.

It was a greyness. It was a hollow and drained look that not even death and decomposure could quite match up to... not that they didn't try.

"Jesus, Mary, and Joseph." Coach muttered under his breath. He shifted into place next to Rochelle, setting a hand against his cheek in an uncomfortable gesture. "What the hell happened? Looks like a survivor camp... or, it was."
It was Rhiannon who spoke, and Nick swallowed mild surprise. She'd been frigidly ignoring everyone since he'd abandoned the bikers mid-horde, and he hadn't expected her to stop. "It looks like an evac center. We've come across shit like this a few times. They all got fuckin' overrun, though this is... pretty fucking up."

Lena stepped close to her sister's side, looking out at the mall with widened eyes, her voice low and husky. "Understatement."

"Yeah." Rochelle muttered, her hand still gripped tight on Nick's sleeve. He might've shaken her off, had the touch not provided him a little comfort. "We were trying for an evac site at a hotel when we all met up, but... it burned down before we could get there."

Ellis' croaked voice barely registered above the buzz of flies swarming around the area. The black shapes zipped and flashed through the air in miniature battles for valuable real estate amidst the corpses. "It didn't look nothin' like this."

Nick wanted to turn his head and look at the Georgian, but didn't. His neck prickled painfully, a wretched disgust tugging at his stomach. It was too much like the diner they'd discovered, the piles of bodies arranged there like refuse. Was Ellis thinking of it, too?

Past the surge of unease in his veins, Nick forced himself to look at the scene critically. His voice came out hard, mechanical.

"They're not all zombies. Looks like a horde came down on them and whoever had the guns just opened fire, fuck the casualties." His hand lifted, pointing toward the handful of police vans, and he was only partially sure nobody noticed it shaking. "I don't think they made it, either, or why leave the cars?"

Rochelle's hand pulled away from his arm, and she took a half-step forward. Nick got a look at her face, and she looked faint. "God. Looks like what Brenda was talking about. Maybe she wasn't completely insane, after all..."

Christophe stood at a distance, his head low. "She said they see if you are a Carrier, before they help you. Maybe these were Carriers?" he suggested, mildly. Nick didn't miss the lack of reaction in his eyes, the disinterest. Zombies might have scared him, but the massacre before them did not.

"Look, y'all. We didn't come here fo' this shit." Coach turned, gaze darting over the line of survivors next to him. An authoritative edge touched his voice, waving one arm vaguely toward the scene before them. "Let's just circle 'round it and get in the mall, see if they got any clothes. A'ight?"

Nick was aware of a strong wave of assent passing through his compatriots. He was forced to sigh, chin dropping a few sudden degrees. Dully, he stated, "There might be something interesting in that big tent. Medical supplies, if we're lucky, or information. Worth a look."

Coach did not look pleased. His face crunched up, thickening beard gone salt-and-pepper along his jaw and chin. "Ain't nothin' worth walkin' through that." he argued. "Don't go bein' contrary for no reason, Nicolas."

"I'm n-" he started, fingers curling, but he abandoned the protest as quickly as he'd started. The agitation that flooded him was vague, tired, like he couldn't even stir up the energy to have a real argument. "Good thing you're not my keeper. I'm going to go take a look. If someone wants to come watch my back, neat."
A quiet, "Nick -" from Rochelle was strangled into silence, turning into a frustrated sigh instead. She'd mostly given up talking sense into him of late, it seemed. He should have been relieved.

Nick shifted his grip on his katana, lifting it to hip-height, and started forward. A discomfort prickled sharply at the back of his neck, and taking steps felt like moving his legs through quicksand. He didn't want to go, and he definitely didn't want to go alone. The plaza was seemingly clear of actual infected, but there was no telling what the tent contained.

His anxiety eased when he heard footsteps behind him, though didn't look to confirm who it was. Looking would have affirmed that he cared, and that was hardly desirable. My luck, there's a fucking Hunter in there or something.

The large tent was central in the makeshift camp, surrounded by steel rail fencing set up in loose pathways. It was a queue, he realized as he approached it. A queue leading through and past the tents and into the mall. The image summoned of a screaming mass of people, crammed into the pathway like cattle, made him feel strangely claustrophobic.

But they were all dead now, he reminded himself, and there was no point in thinking about it. And jaggedly - with immense difficulty - a hundred people, if not more, were forced into white noise in the back of his head. Discarded. If he'd had the luxury of self-reflection, he might have been disturbed by it, might have taken the time to acknowledge it as an indictment of his stability.

Sometimes he understood Christophe better than he wanted to.

Making his way through the sprawl of corpses was difficult. It was impossible not to nudge or brush a body or a limb with the toe of his shoe or the edge of his heel. He didn't want to look down, but looking down was the only way to ensure he didn't step directly on a corpse.

When he reached the hip-height fence that marked out a path, he got a hand on the metal and started to swing a leg up and over. His blind urgency pushed him to continue even when it ended up being just slightly too tall. It landed him in an awkward straddle on the railing, his foot failing to make contact with the ground on the other side, and the immediate flash of regret that coincided with the pain of the position multiplied at the touch of a hand on his elbow.

It was not a graceful move, and had not gone unnoticed by his previously-silent partner.

Nick's head snapped to the side out of reflex, withholding some surprise when he found his arm gripped firmly by Lena, the woman's slight frame hunched back as if in preparation to brace against his weight. She'd been readying to keep him from falling.

He would've thought on that, and how it - both her willingness to help, injured as she was, and her apparent perception that he wanted her help at all - made him feel, had his gaze not drifted a little to the left.

Ellis' stone-blue eyes were big enough to dive into. If Lena had him gripped by the arm, the Georgian's attention had him by the scruff. He wanted to scramble and right himself, ears picking up an unfamiliar burn, because he looked like an idiot who needed help from a woman only a few days off her deathbed to keep upright.

To be fair, his mind supplied helpfully. You are apparently exactly that.

He bared his teeth, more in exertion and pain than anger, and threw himself into a tip. His foot hit ground, and he was forced to do an awkward hop-step onto his heel to get his other leg up and over the fence. His scarred calf gave an angry pulse at the abrupt weight, muscles complaining under the strain.

Lena seemed to recognize his agitation and recoiled her hand, watching him stagger into his balance. She set her knuckles against her hip, almond-shaped eyes gone squinted. "You good, hoss?" she prompted, with an edge of humour.

Nick could barely focus past the stinging awareness of Ellis looking at him. Staring, as if they were on good terms. Terms where the kid had the right to look at him like that; soft and full and concerned. Terms where Nick felt the urge to stare back.

"Nick?" prompted Lena, voice hoarse and vaguely tired. His gaze snapped to hers, refocusing, and he didn't miss the waning patience in her expression.

He was not doing a brilliant job of schmoozing his way into the women's good graces - though, he supposed, he'd be fooling himself if he thought that had ever been within his power. Whatever tact he could have summoned had long since been drained out of him.

He'd been a good liar, once, hadn't he? He'd kept his cool under pressure, upheld false pretense, manipulated and played games. When was the last time he'd kept a lid on his emotions and faked it? Not since the divorce, at least. Definitely not since the world fucking ended.

Definitely not since -

He grunted, and put out a hand toward the biker, palm up and arm extended over the fence. Lena seemed surprised, right before she clasped his hand and used it to brace herself as she climbed up and over the railing. Her movements were nearly as clumsy as his had been, wincing with the bend of her midsection.

It made sense, in retrospect. Rhiannon wouldn't have let her sister go alone, and Ellis was eternally eager to please, volunteering to fill the void and make sure she was alright. It made sense to think Ellis' concern was for her, not him. Because of course it wasn't.

Jesus, Nick. You are a shitshow.

"Oof." Lena muttered, weakly, as she landed on the other side of the fence and next to Nick. "Thanks." He released her hand the moment she'd come to her feet, and he turned away in silence, starting to pick his way down the queue. It was littered with corpses just like the main plaza.

He could hear Ellis clamber over the fence after them, loudly, and tried not to pay attention. The other man's presence, buffered only by yet another person he didn't want to talk to, was very acutely painful. He didn't want to engage either of them.

Instead, he focused on the large camo-coloured tent just before them. He had to take a turn in the queue, following parallel with the side of the structure, before the fencing guided him up to the entrance. The tall flap was zipperered shut down the center, the large metal tab resting at the bottom edge of the material.

He couldn't hear anything inside the structure, but that hardly ruled out the idea.

Turning his head slightly, he glanced over his shoulder, acknowledging the rest of his team where they waited at the edge watched as Lena approached, tailed closely by Ellis. The kid's chin was low, capbill almost covering his face, mouth drawn in a grim and focused line as he picked his way through the bodies beneath his feet.

It took effort to rein in his gaze, force it to lock onto the woman rather than his ex-lover. "Don't think there's anything in there." he stated, flatly, thumbing toward the tent.

She smiled, quick and breathless, and the spark of humour in her expression had him tensing long before she actually spoke. "We got your back, if there is." It was innocuous, calm. It shouldn't have irritated him.

"Swell." he uttered past gritted teeth, definitively irritated.

The gambler redirected his attention forward, dropping down to a knee. He gripped the metal tab that held the tent flap zippered shut, and with a silent count of three, drew it upwards. He stood with the gesture, guiding it open, stretching up onto his toes in order to push the zipper up to the highest point his wingspan allowed.

The tent flaps remained stoically shut around the small slit of open air left behind. He wished they'd flung open enthusiastically, and removed the element of choice from whether or not he wanted to see what was inside. Instead, he was forced to extend his arm, grabbing the canvas and pulling it to the side.

His eyes blinked, adapting to the dimness inside the tent, reflexively hunting first for movement. When nothing reacted to him, lurched toward the door, his gaze slowed and hunted out detail.

It wasn't a medical tent. There were no cots, no IV stands or platter of syringes. No sign at all of any paraphernalia that might have indicated a hospital. It was more barren than he expected, though he might have presumed that was the result of a speedy exit - if it weren't for the relative neatness of what did lay before him. There was a plastic table, like one might set up for a card game or a backyard house party. There were no chairs surrounding it; it did not look like some casual arrangement.

Papers lay sprawled out over the surface, piled thinly until there was little surface left. Nick struggled to identify much from the doorway, and the very first thing he noticed was the thick layer of blood pooled and splattered over the table.

The previous owner of the sizeable puddle was flat on the ground nearby, belly-down and limbs spread out in all directions. The woman wore dark body armour, very similar to the riot-equipped zombies they had encountered earlier, though with less padding and no helmet. She likely regretted the choice, if the dark shape of a bullet hole in the back of her skull was any indication.

Across the room was a whiteboard roughly stood on spindly legs. Rather than being covered in marker scrawl, it was completely shrouded by one huge sheet of paper. On it was printed a full-size map of continental America in grey-scale, with states and their counties roughed out with dotted lines. Nick gazed for a moment at the map, eyes tracing the familiar shapes and observing the circles, arrows, and X's written in bold red ink.

He breathed out, less a sigh and more an unconscious expulsion of air.

_Holy shit._

Quietly, he spoke without looking over his shoulder. "Tell them to come over here."

Lena brushed close, leaning to try and see around him. Her voice fell to a hesitant hush, aware of the strange and sudden calm that had overtaken his tone. "Ro' and Coach seemed pretty happy not coming anywhere near all this." she pressed, a slight cough following her words. "Not sure they -"

The woman was hovered just at his shoulder, and as she took notice of the map, she broke off. Her abrupt silence was eventually ended by a quiet swallow.
"I'll get 'em."

Nick barely paid attention as she pulled back and retreated back out into the fenced-in queue. He paid more mind when Ellis took her place, though the kid said nothing. They stood in silence, both staring across the dimly-lit tent. He hurt, ached. He should have left it alone. He should have listened to Coach; he should have let it be.

He should have let that very first infected, hunting him in a remote gas station parking lot, tear his throat out.

"Jesus." Ellis muttered, voice so weak it nearly broke. "That can't be right. There ain't no way."

Sharp red X's were scratched all over the map.

Every major city center was crossed out. He could recognize most of them: Chicago, Los Angeles, Philadelphia, Austin, Indianapolis, Boise... some he didn't recognize at all, didn't know how many dead or infected the X represented. He felt a clench of fear when he saw a huge scratch over the New York area - and a strange and disconnected realization at the sight of an X over Savannah.

The three circles lacking X's seemed small. Insignificant. One lay near the lower edge of Louisiana, one bordered Washington, and another within Michigan limits. The last bastions of humanity, he thought. Then he laughed.

It wasn't humour. He didn't know what it was. He felt like he'd broken, then and there, shattered by the vivid representation of how far gone they all were. The laugh threatened to choke him, hard and solid in his throat as it closed, tightened. We're all fucking doomed.

His eyes slipped to look at the young Georgian next to him, unsurprised to find Ellis looking back. There was fear there, and a fragile uncertainty. It was not panic. Maybe he was not completely unprepared for the reality laid out in grey-scale and red. "That can't mean whut it - all those places ain't overrun, are they? Maybe they're places whut got evacuated already, or -"

The other man trailed off, and Nick swallowed heavily, trying in vain to wet a painfully dry mouth.

"I don't know." he lied. It wasn't quite the lie he wanted to tell; he wanted to say everything would be alright. He wanted to erase that worried look off the kid's face, make him laugh again. He wanted to be comforting, reassuring. He definitely didn't want to say the truth and admit that he was mostly sure they were some of the last people even alive - but he wished he could have managed a better lie.

Something better than, "I'm... I don't know."

Ellis saw through it, surely, but said nothing at all.
Chapter 236

Rochelle picked through the papers littered across the table with a slow and rigorous focus. There was a numbness in her chest, like the feeling right before her hand recognized the pain of a scalding surface. It was quiet anticipation, a held breath.

She hadn't spoken a word since entering the tent - not when everyone else was handling the talking for her.

"Jesus." Coach muttered for the fourth time. He stood shoulder-to-shoulder with Nick, both men staring at the map hung drably before them. "They ain't accountin' fo' every city here, but they got most every portion of the U.S. covered. Maybe them circles mean main evac centers? Places where the army had folks hole up?"

Nick's arms were crossed. He trembled, like he were cold, but spoke with a blunt calm that said he might not have even noticed it. "Every single one is scratched out except for those three." His index finger escaped the grip of his crossed arms in order to point at the remaining circles. "So, what? Every major city but these three is done for? They've given up? The zombies won?"

Christophe was quietly knelt beside the single corpse in the tent, gently pushing it onto its back. He struggled to gain the leverage with only one hand to put to the task, and Rhiannon flashed to his side, expression grim as she got fingers tangled in the woman's pantleg and helped flip her over.

"We don't know what this map even means." Ellis argued, hands deep in the pockets of his slacks. "Maybe they're scratchin' out successful evacs, or - maybe this ain't even about the zombies. We can't just... go assumin'-"

Brusque and sharp, Nick shook his head, a sigh clawing at his throat. Ellis' attention darted toward him, hesitantly, head shifting into a low hang. "We have to assume. That's all we fuckin' got."

Lena pushed gently closer, her hands pressed into her waistline in a gentle grip, as if holding her ribs together while she inhaled deeply. Coach and Nick parted in unison, opening enough space between them for her to stand there. "That's New Orleans." she stated, reaching out to tap a fingertip on the circle within Louisiana. "That's the only place I've heard was still safe."

Her eyes darted to the scratched out marker over Texas - but she said nothing.

Rochelle peeled a stapled-together set of papers off the table. The spray of gore had saturated most of them, making it hard to pick out the text where it had stained and run. There was as much handwritten as there was printed - but she couldn't miss CEDA's logo emblazoned on most of them.

"This is CEDA stuff." she mumbled, eyes darting down the page. "These are... guidelines? For detecting the Flu, or something... 'fevers of 110 or higher', 'elevated perspiration and salivation', 'extreme hypoxemia'. here it says, 'the appearance of' - ... 'mutated tapeta and retroreflection', whatever that means. They must have been screening people before they evacuated."

Nick turned only partially, gazing over his shoulder in her direction. "We've seen CEDA employees in hazmat suits who got turned, and watched a girl go from completely normal to a fucking Witch in less than eight hours. They don't know what the fuck they're talking about." he snapped in a low tone.

When she blinked up at him, silently tensing her jaw in a warning, a muscle under his eye jumped and he dropped his chin. It wasn't an apology; just an acknowledgement that his anger was really directed elsewhere.

"I'm just saying."

Chris, having successfully turned the policewoman over with Rhiannon's help, now bent down to stick his hand into either of her heavy denim pants pockets. With some effort required to manage the awkward angle, he came out with a set of four silver keys, jangling loudly amongst themselves. Hidden in the mix was a thick black fob covered in a few rubber buttons.

His head lifted, mouth open to announce the find - what was most likely keys to the police vehicles outside - but when Coach spoke gruffly over him, his shoulders deflated slightly and he fell to silence. "Fever that high will kill a man."

Rhiannon tilted her head in Chris' direction. When the Spaniard looked at her, she lifted a hand, fingers curled and fist offered out toward him. That sparked a grin on his lips, and he gripped the keys in his palm in order to mirror the gesture, bumping their knuckles together.

Puffing out a breath, Lena shook her head. "108 and over usually starts killing you, I think, yeah." She reached out, pressing her palm onto the map, square in the center. "Don't think any of us thought the Flu was in the normal limits of the human body, though, huh?"

"Not really." Nick muttered, palming over his mouth. "And last I checked, hocking acid and growing claws wasn't on the average resume."

The older of the two Texans looked on the verge of a smile at the statement, but it never quite made it to her face when Ellis urgently sighed. He jerked his hands out of his pockets and thrust his arms in either direction. "Whut're we s'posed tuh do? If this map means - if they lost all these cities... if they lost all these places... if they've given up..."

Gently, Coach turned. He set his palm against his mouth, walking away from the map and toward Ellis. When he was within arms' reach, he dropped his hands to grip Ellis by the biceps, fingers firmly curled. "Son. We don't know what it means. Even if all these places got overrun, this ain't got no math on how many people they evacuated beforehand."

Ellis looked up at him, expression falling into a vague frustration, teeth pulling his full lips into a harsh bite. "I... know." he mumbled, voice stifled. "S'just... I guess I was hopin' things were just real bad here, 'n'... it was better in other places. If they're pullin' out like this - where're our folks...?" His eyes lowered, then, blinking a few times as he sucked in a tight breath.

"Keith got on one'uh them whirlies with Mama. Whut if it took 'em somewhere worse? Tuh somewhere that got overrun?"

Coach shook him, jostled him just a little bit, before pulling the shorter man forward. He wrapped one arm around Ellis' shoulders, tucking the younger Georgian tight against his chest. "I hear you, Ellis. I do." Ellis' arms remained loose at his sides, merely leaning into the embrace.

Rochelle slowly replaced the set of barely legible papers back down onto the table, glancing at her bloodied fingertips. It was hard to muster disgust at the all-too-common liquid, turning her attention back toward her teammates. She gazed at Ellis and Coach - then Nick, who was staring down at his shoes in a blunt attempt to look anywhere but at the other two men - and then up at the map.

Her mouth quirked, a softness to her voice. "If those X's mean lost causes... we're awfully close to one."
Nobody responded, not for a moment.

It was slowly that Lena turned, pinching at the tip of her sharp, defined chin with her index finger and thumb. The brunette watched the other woman closely, concern tugging at her mouth. "You guys keep talking about a military ship, right? If there's government around, they can't have pulled out that far."

Closing her eyes, Rochelle sighed. "We've never seen it. Might not exist." She lifted her left hand, gesturing up at the map. "Look, we don't know what this means. We don't even know who these people were, or where they were getting their information from, or - anything. And who knows what's going on in Canada, or South America, or the entire rest of the world."

Christophe's head lifted, vaguely, eyes flickering at the sentiment. "You think they are better?" he murmured, a clear sense of uncertainty in his tone, as if the thought had not occurred to him previously.

"I don't know." she responded, lifting her hands to gesture openly in either direction. "I don't. But I know that this map - whatever it means - doesn't change anything for me. I need to find my parents. I need to - do whatever I can to find the people I care about, to get the hell out of here. Maybe the government has given up. Maybe CEDA has. Maybe they're waiting at the border with shock blankets and hot cocoa. Whatever the answer is, we need to find out."

When she was met with silence, she looked up and around the room. "Anyone feel differently?" Coach and Ellis both shook their heads quietly, but Nick made no move at all. She gazed at him, the corners of her mouth curving down. "Nick?"

His head lowered, and the laugh that left him was low and harsh. "Is me saying yes going to change any of this? We're so close to home free, but I'm the holdout?" When no-one responded, he shrugged. "Las Vegas was a fucking waste of space, anyway."

As if that were an answer, he turned his body and carefully stepped past where Coach stood. His efforts to look anywhere but Ellis was not subtle, and he strode out of the tent at a pace that was too calculated and slow to be casual. Rochelle watched him go, shaking her head, and when he slipped past her sight, she returned her gaze to the table full of CEDA documents.

She was aware of Lena watching her, but said nothing, letting the other woman eventually speak unprompted.

"If New Orleans is one of the last evac spots or - areas they've got under control..." the brunette managed, voice husky with her effort to speak gently. She took a small step forward, a feint toward closing the gap between them. "You guys should really think about going there. I'm not trying to tell you anything you don't already know, but..."

Rochelle didn't intend to speak as curtly as she did. Her jaw refused to relax, and what left her was gritted and short. "How? All seven of us pile on your boat? I'm not sure the logistics work out on that one." She grimaced, sighed, eyes lifting toward the Texan. "You aren't totally wrong, though."

"Nawlins ain't real close by, but it's the closest outta all this shit." Coach offered up with a big gesture across the map before them. "If we find out this military ship ain't an option... we gotta start talkin' alternatives."

Ellis returned his hands to his pockets, sighing. "Yeah. We just been so busy just... makin' it. Ain't hardly had time tuh make no real plans." His eyes darted toward the tent entrance, looking after the gambler, now absent. "Ain't been makin' no plans as a team, that's fer sure."
Unable to help staring at the young man for a moment, always surprised by the unfamiliar melancholy on his face, Rochelle forced herself into motion. She leaned forward, clapped her hands together, and found herself staring pointedly at Chris. He blinked, looking back, unsure.

Was it suddenly easier to look him right in the eyes, or had their kiss made it wildly more difficult? Why couldn't she tell the difference? Then he smiled just a little, and she landed squarely in the latter.

"I think we all got a little distracted when somebody decided to lose their whole damn arm."

That smile turned into a grin, and Christophe lifted his hand, patting his chest with the found car keys tucked in his palm. "Us españoles, we are big on drama, ¿si? I thought I would lose only a hand, but that seemed too small." He shifted to stand, only wobbling for a moment before regaining his balance. "Now we go...? I would like to leave."

Motivated by the request, Ellis seemed to shake out of his faded reverie and instead focused on the Spaniard. He smiled, weakly, bobbing his head. "Yeah, okay, buddy. That sounds good."

Rochelle gave one last look in the direction of the map before shrugging her shoulders. "I don't think there's anything here for us. Just CEDA crap. I don't need this kind of reading material." With a soft thrust of her hands, she turned, moving as if to usher her teammates out of the tent. "Let's move, before Nick gets himself snagged by a Smoker."

"Hah." snarked a dry voice from just beyond the tent flaps, betraying that the Northerner had not gone very far at all. For some reason, the thought soothed her, even as it reminded her bitterly of the night he nearly left. The fear that threatened to close her throat at the idea of losing the family around her was worse, perhaps, than whatever fear the map stoked in her.

At least we're not completely falling apart.

We can do this.

We have to do this.
The front entrance of the mall was a set of large push doors, spanning four across. They had been mostly glass, but the tinted material was almost entirely busted through. Metal framing held the doors otherwise together, and shards of glass jutted out from the outer edges, clinging delicately to the corners like cobwebs.

Most of the carnage had been contained to the plaza, but not all. Nick could see sprawled corpses, blood sprayed and pooled amongst the tile flooring. They had been spared the weather, but they were no less rotten. The smell was like a tangible, hot mist just in front of his face. He could have reached out and touched it.

The mall was a strange mixture of well-lit and terribly dark. The closer hallway, edged by shuttered storefronts, was lit by the dense network of windows. The inner center was lit, too, by the streaming sunlight from clear glass roof panels. It was the space between that was pitch black, unaided by a sun that was approaching its highest point in the sky and casting light straight downward.

He could see infected milling in the dark. They almost seemed to avoid the lit portions, preferring the darker hallway. Some staggered in and out of profile against the bright interior as moving shadows, while some were barely visible where they sat and stood in the hallway.

A presence brushed near his elbow, and he glimpsed dark leather and pale skin without needing to turn his body and really acknowledge the younger of the bikers. "Just like high school trips to the mall." Rhiannon offered up mildly, a grin cutting across her face in raw humor. "I'll probably hate this more."

Nick turned his head to glance at her, aware of the pull of a frown at his mouth. "You seem awful chipper. Guess the apocalypse suits you, huh, blondie? None of that back there bother you?"

Rhiannon's muddy eyes flicked to look at him, snorting. "Dude. My dad was a prepper, he ran apocalypse drills. I literally trained for this." Her head tilted, dropping her voice to a low hiss. Some amount of aggression edged her expression, defiant. "Besides, what do you care?"

Because he shouldn't have.

Because he was not going to stay, not going to find out whether the government was really going to come through.

Because he was going to fold, give up, finally. An overdue reality.

He grunted, focusing forward. "I don't." he lied, swallowing the unpleasant taste that accompanied the reminder of their plan. It felt like a train barreling toward him, something unfathomably larger and heavier than he could ever hope to stop. He'd pulled the lever, shifted the tracks to direct it toward him... and there was no pulling it again.

If they found a boat, would he really get on it? He'd had the chance to leave his team, and he'd chickened out. The haze of betrayal and anger and shame fell to leave only the awareness of how vulnerable he was without them. And, perhaps, how little he wanted to.

Second try's the charm. They don't need me, anyway. I was always tacked onto the edge of this stupid fucking family fantasy they cooked up. Mama Ro', Papa Coach, and precious little Ellis.
The fuck do I fit in? Shitty uncle?

The ex they never liked, anyway?

Rhiannon scoffed dully, her thumbs catching in the waistband of her tight black pants. "Whatever you say." she muttered, studded brow lifting high. She turned to look behind them, raising her voice just a little as the rest of the survivors came into earshot. "We got a bunch of zombie cock-suckers in here. Who's ready for a party?"

Christophe whistled low, lifting the handgun held in his hand and squinting one eye shut to aim down the sights. "I have one, quizá... two left before my arm no work anymore." His grip trembled, and despite his quick grin, it was clear that he was exhausted.

With a hushed breath, Ellis suddenly launched into a jog, stepping next to the Spaniard. "Uh, yeah, buddy. Maybe watch yer aim with that, huh? Last time I saw someone shootin' like that, it was Keith tryin' tuh shoot out the back of a truck. We was gettin' chased by this wild dog, see - man, it actually reminds me of that time we fought this Tank, drivin' through -"

"Ellis..." Rochelle managed, weakly, sighing. Nick stole a glance at her face, recognizing the too-familiar conflict of wanting him to stop, while also not wanting to crush his enthusiasm. "Can we do this when there isn't a mall full of zombies waiting to notice us?"

The Georgian inhaled, nodding, a meek energy about it. He scratched the back of his neck. "Sorry. Okay."

Coach drew close, pulling his shotgun tight into his hip. Lena's brush-axe had been re-holstered in its makeshift leather strap, tight on his back. "We got two shotguns here. Let's lead with those, y'all keep close and watch our backs. We should see pretty quick if there's any call fo' us bein' here." He gestured up with the nose of his gun, pointing toward the inside of the mall. "Think I see some signage on the second floor. Don't think the place was a hundred percent shut down."

Stretching up on his toes, Nick strained to see what he indicated; the mall did have a second floor, and the center of the building was built like an open-air atrium with a balcony encircling the space. There were a few dull signs over storefronts on the upper floor, and though they were shuttered, they didn't seem completely abandoned.

"Yeah, alright." he responded. "Ladies first."

The sigh that left Ellis would have made him laugh, under different circumstances. It was desperately put-upon, and made even better by the momentary confusion that flashed in unison over the bikers' faces. He wanted to soak it in - but then the kid walked past him, and there was genuine frustration on his face.

They weren't on those terms anymore.

The two Georgians aligned in a calm row, sharing a glance and a nod. They turned to face the mall entrance, Ellis dragging his shotgun down from its position strapped on his shoulder. There was an easy coordination between them, strides starting in one easy joint step. Nick stepped to their flank, drawing his katana from its holster in his belt.

Lena and Rochelle joined him closely, and Rhiannon and Chris took up the rear. The blonde casually slipped behind the Spaniard, swinging her bat in wide circles behind her body as if to stretch her shoulder. She stepped high, hitting her heels with the weapon with each stride, the metal banding making a satisfying clang against the tread of her boots.
The impact of rubber and metal was the beat of a battle drum, and as they stepped up to the front entrance of the mall, it was a dinner bell. Snarling from the darker innards of the mall started - and then shrieks, and before Nick could so much as blink, his vision was a blur of greyed bodies and yellow eyes flashing in the dim light.

The infected burst through the front doors, breaking out what was left of the glass, barreling through the doorframes. If they disliked the sun at all, their hatred for the survivors won out. Jesus. Like kicking a hornet’s nest.

He lifted his katana, but between Coach and Ellis, the infected never made it close enough that he had to use it. The blast of the shotgun shells tore through them in wide sprays, shearing the flesh off their ribs and revealing blackened gore. Corpses hit the floor in dull, wet thuds, carpeting the ground as the survivors breached the entrance.

There had been a ripple effect; as infected noticed them, their outburst alerted the ones further in. There was a limit to the zombies' awareness, however, and even as the gunshots echoed in the empty, tiled space, Nick could see infected wandering further inside. They were just shadows against the lit inner atrium, too lost in their feverish misery to notice them.

The survivors pressed in as the initial flood wore down. They didn't bother to open the mall's front doors, simply climbing through the open frames. Nick delicately gripped the edge of the metal doorframe as he stepped through, glancing over his shoulder. He watched as Rhiannon placed a hand on Chris' back, keeping it anchored there while he clambered through.

He didn't know when they'd gotten familiar. It likely had something to do with the bikers being let it on his fragile mental state. He hadn't actually been completely convinced Rhiannon had any sympathy in her at all, so it came as a mild surprise.

Maybe she was just softer to people who hadn't tried to kill her.

A harsh, feral growl snapped his head back around, and his eyes immediately started searching for the crouched shape of a Hunter. It didn't make itself apparent, and there was just enough leftover infected charging toward them to obfuscate his vision.

"I hear a jumper out there." he hissed out, clipped, instinctively jogging forward to take up a position flanking the two gun-toting men in front of him. His sudden advance earned him the attention of a few infected, peeling off from the main group to charge him.

His katana slid into the first zombie's chest with slick ease, the satisfying glide a far cry from how it had performed before he'd sharpened it a few days prior. He wrenched it, twisting, gritting his teeth as the infected seized against his grip. It didn't go limp as quickly as he'd anticipated, and he couldn't free his weapon from the infected when it continued to lunge into him.

Nick did the next best thing, and he let the infected push him. They staggered backwards, further from the other two zombies rushing at him. The gap opened up was filled by Rochelle, darting forward with a yell, both hands gripped tightly on the heavy stun baton in her hands.

Turning at the waist put as much momentum as she could muster behind her swing, uppercutting the first infected, and its head snapped up with such force that Nick heard a crack. The next zombie shoved past it, knocking the half-dead woman to the floor, and lunged for Rochelle with a shriek.

The producer was off-balance, and she couldn't redirect her weight quick enough to bring the baton down on it. She dodged it instead, diving to the side to avoid its reaching arms. In the spare few seconds the jolted motion earned her, she recovered her footing.
"Come on, you -" she panted, breathless, but the zombie did not wait for her to finish. Its dark features split into a fearsome snarl, murky eyes blown wide, and it scrambled itself back around to charge at her again. The creature had a foot or so on her and at least fifty pounds, but Rochelle did not hesitate to meet it halfway.

She swiveled the pronged end outward, catching the infected man in the stomach. The moment her thumb depressed the switch, the zombie's body convulsed into a rigid posture, muscles spasming. Its expression was one of rage, and its arms struggled against the sluggish immobilization caused by the electricity arcing through its body.

A normal person might've collapsed. The zombie kept on its feet, reaching for her in erratic jerks, spittle trailing from its tightly gritted teeth. Disgust darted over her face right before she kicked out, striking the heel of her boot flat on its knee.

Its leg failed with a wet snap, sending it teetering down to the ground. The creature didn't catch itself in time, landing flat on its side, body still recovering from the trauma caused by Rochelle's stun baton.

She startled when Ellis suddenly stepped into her vision, but instinct made her step back. The Georgian directed his shotgun down at its skull, and one quick blast scattered grey and pink all across the tile. She shot a quick smile up at him, but it faded within a few seconds. Her eyes moved in time to see a crouched shape dart across the floor, on all fours and inhumanly low to the ground.

Its gaze was locked on Coach. Fear choked at her throat at the sight of its glinting talons, though it wasn't enough to stop her from uttering a warning. "Coach, Hunter!"

The ex-football player was already in motion. He dropped to a knee without a thought, crunching his body up behind his double-barrel shotgun. The posture made him a smaller target, lessening the area he had to defend. The Hunter seemed to recognize the challenge, uttering a deep growl before it screamed.

Its taut legs wound tight, the small creature burst from the ground, frog-like, and launched through the air. Its arms were spread, claws ready and stretched out in search of purchase in his body.

The eldest survivor waited with a calm patience, waited much too long. Rochelle's heart threatened to thump right through her ribcage in those few beats of time that felt like ages - and then there was a tremendous clap, a flash, an explosion. Coach rolled his weight, landing on his hip with his legs loosely sprawled to the side, and the Hunter's body sailed past, landing on the ground in a crumpled pile of tattered clothes and blackened gore.

Rhiannon hooted with a laugh, darting across the tile floor in a blur of long legs and blonde hair, balancing her baseball bat against her shoulder while she shot her hand down, reaching to offer Coach help up. He clasped hands with her, grunting as he rolled to his feet. "Smooth, Pops! Very smooth."

The heavy-set man grinned at the blonde as he got upright, patting his fingertips against the side of his shotgun. "Coach ain't no slouch." He spared a glance for the Hunter, its upper body shredded by the blast, blood pooling thickly around it. "Hate those damn things."

Sealing her lips tightly, Rochelle watched Ellis and Nick finish off the last of the infected. They'd cleared out most of the inhabitants of the hallway, though there were more waiting to be disturbed. She pulled the backpack off her shoulders, prying open the main compartment wide enough to stick her hand in and retrieve the flashlight they had stowed inside.
Clicking it on, Rochelle lifted it just enough to direct it into the dark middle section of the hallway, illuminating the space. The few infected stumbling past or seated on the tile didn't react to the scattered light, eyes glinting a metallic yellow in the dark.

"Plenty more where that came from, sweetheart." Nick muttered, sourly.

"Ay... claro." Christophe crooned back. He turned his hand, wiping the back of his wrist against his forehead. "Too many, Nico."

Rochelle inhaled, tucking the flashlight under her arm. "New clothes are definitely worth it." she whispered loudly, as if to herself, chanting it. "New clothes. New clothes. New clothes." She was aware of Lena stifling a laugh at her from somewhere over her shoulder, and it only egged her on. "New clothes."

Ellis joined in the chant, low and drawled, and then Coach's bassy voice accompanied them, and Nick muttered, "You're all fucking weird." despite the fact that he was just as eager as any of them to get out of his bloodied, sweat-soaked clothing.

Rochelle didn't stop - and Ellis did, but only for a moment before continuing - and Coach got only louder. Maybe the hanging awareness of the suddenly-too-real end of the world had driven them all insane, because they broke into laughter, and it didn't stop even after a few infected were driven to screaming and running at them, disturbed by the ruckus.

She did not miss the way Nick pulled away from them, drifting, letting the bikers fill the space between. That drained her humour away more than anything else, a sadness tugging at her chest that she couldn't dissect, couldn't shake. She didn't know how to close the gap again, but maybe something pleasant like a change of clothes was a first step.

As the producer landed a blow right into the jaw of an infected, splattering blood across her front from the impact, she did have to wonder how long new clothes would even last.
The inner atrium of the mall was split into two levels, connected by escalators in the very center. They were, naturally, not functional. That much was obvious at a glance - and yet it still felt strange, somehow, when the group split to go up both sides, up and down. Like they were breaking some critical law of nature.

But there were no over-worked mall cops there to chase them down for going up the down escalator, just zombies.

The small horde scrambled up the escalators in an awkward flood, tripping over and clawing at each other in their desperate attempts to reach the survivors. Nick jabbed out with his katana, scoring the tip straight into the eyesocket of an infected, and when it went tumbling backwards it did so directly into several of its fellows.

The result was initially almost comical. Then, as the infected caught behind the dying one caught their balance, it quickly became grisly; they tore through the corpse blocking their way. They rent it where its Flu-weakened flesh made it soft and tender like meat left too long in a crockpot.

His body threatened to gag, but he swallowed it down. It was easier than it should have been to shake off, to turn away and blink the image off his eyes. There was no more room for nightmares in his skull, and so many still shots of gore and viscera behind his eyelids that little merited remembering anymore.

That was the way of things, now, he supposed. There was a category for infected, filed away in his memory, for the awful things they saw. A box for the feeling of cutting and shooting and killing infected that he'd long since pushed away from himself, distanced from who he was.

That had been why the Angels had so disturbed them, hadn't it? It was the difference between isolating the violence from oneself - a necessary evil, kill or be killed - and wearing it like a second skin.

_I don't enjoy this. Any of this shit._ he thought, watching Ellis pull the trigger on the infected charging up the other elevator. His eyes tracked the spray of the shells by way of the blood that guttered up, the flesh that separated from bone, the shards of bone that separated from flesh. He observed it, distantly.

_I just wish I wasn't so fucking used to it._

The survivors ran up the frozen escalators, and infected met them there from the second floor. There was a moment where Nick thought they might get trapped there, sandwiched... but only a few came to meet them from the second level. Coach launched himself to the top step, where the escalator leveled out, and his broad shoulder turned to form a battering ram.

He thrust his body weight into one of the first infected that scrambled into the escalator. "Come on, folks!" he barked as the blow sent the scrawny zombie up and over the rail of the escalator. It gave a wheezed scream as it fell, and though the thud of its landing wasn't audible, Nick caught a glance and saw it land headfirst. It did not move again.

"Jesus. We're going for clothing, not chocolate, big guy." he muttered, panting out a laugh that didn't hold any humour at all, hurrying to close the gap between him and Lena higher in the escalator.
"Maybe both?" Christophe suggested, voice winded to the point of hoarseness. He kept close to Rochelle, gun stowed in the deep pocket of his cargo shorts to free his hand so he could grip the escalator railing and balance himself.

Rhiannon was at the very top, matched with Coach, and she was fury in a leather jacket.

The blonde had traded weapons with her sister, wielding the machete, and she slashed out with it in a wide swipe. The wide blade hacked straight through the outstretched arm of an infected, lopping it off with an audible crackle of bone. "Whatever the fuck we're going for, let's fucking go!"

Lena was struggling, though that had been normal for her since her injury. The effort of climbing stairs seemed to worsen it, her breaths short and strained, shoulders trembling. Nick noticed, jaw tightening, and turned to face down the escalator. He dug his heels in, slashing with his katana to fight back the infected scrambling up toward them.

"Thanks." she gasped out, making him grunt, withholding the response he wanted to give: Just picking up your slack.

"No problem." he gritted out instead.

The bottleneck of the escalator did them a favour, forcing the infected into nearly single-file and creating a blockade of corpses that the zombies had to climb over and claw through. Nick walked backwards up it slowly, heel finding the edge of each next step with caution, only striking out when an infected managed to clamber within reach.

His gaze darted to the side, watching Ellis on the other escalator, separated from him by the glass-and-plastic railing. The Georgian was using the butt of his shotgun more than shooting it, allowing the infected to cluster and gather packed tightly together before he fired, pellets tearing through them.

The kid had an urgent calm on his face, composed like wrought iron, tense and focused. It spooled a tension in Nick's chest. How scared was he, faced with the possibility of the military’s collapse? How much was that reality weighing on him? His mom’s probably dead. Keith. Didn’t he mention a kid? A cousin, or...?

Ellis' gaze flicked toward him, catching his stare, and Nick snapped his head forward. Frustration made him lash out with his sword, puffing out air through his nose with the exertion.

Don’t think about it.

Not Ellis' mental state. Not the myriad of worries that must have been bouncing around in his curly-haired head. Not the fact that everything was no doubt worse - no, exponentially worse - for the fact Nick was still hanging around.

He could've been over you already, instead of adding all this shit to the mix. That hurt in some far-off place. It was a remote, grey sensation, miles of haze between him and the feeling. It’s better if you leave. For everyone else. They're better off without you. You just make everything fucking harder.

How was it that he felt both relief and nothing at all?

Nick took a moment to breathe, to swipe at his forehead with his wrist, and it came away slick with sweat. Had he exerted himself that hard? The mall was lined with tile and stone that didn't keep much heat, and the air felt cool on his skin. It was the adrenaline, he was sure, and nothing else -
Not stress, or anxiety, or anything at all to do with why his hands were still shaking -

Rhiannon shouted in alarm, followed almost in unison by Rochelle, and Nick startled into a half-turn. His view was just obstructed by the top of the escalator and Lena's form, but he caught enough to see the blonde's frame zip past his sightline, a greying loop of flesh ensnaring her midsection.

Whatever pains slowed Lena's progress, she quickly forgot them in favour of launching up the escalator. Everyone else followed suit with Coach in the lead, the big man sprinting past and to the right down the balcony-like second floor.

As Nick breached onto flat ground, his eyes immediately tracked to follow Coach. Rhiannon was getting pulled by a Smoker's tongue, her body half-curled as it skidded across the slick tile. The zipper on her pantleg thigh grated against the tile, echoing in the wide-open space.

A significant distance down the balcony stood the tall figure of a Smoker, its frame half-crouched with the effort of reeling in its victim. Its mouth was slack-jawed to allow for the girth of its tongue, but its rotten lips were drawn tight as if slurping it down into its throat, and - to where?

It was a thought Nick didn't even know how to approach. It hadn't really occurred to him until then; maybe hearing CEDA's description of the Flu - mundane, like it were just a normal outbreak - had stirred him to think about it. What sort of mutations had taken place to create the creature before them, or any of the others?

Fortunately, there was no time to dwell.

"Get her!" he shouted, scanning the upper balcony. A few infected burst out from a half-open storefront shutter along the wall, drawn by the noise, and he strode to meet them.

Not needing the encouragement, Coach was long-gone, racing after the biker with his shotgun held tight to his chest. Rochelle was close behind him, and Lena had to visibly restrain herself from staggering after them. She stayed at the top of the escalators instead, placing herself just between the two stairways.

Lifting her sister's bat, she gritted her teeth and squared her body. When an infected made it to the top, she was ready, bashing it in the head and sending it careening back down the steps. The effort made her body shake, but she managed, maintaining their back line.

Picking up their slack, he supposed.

Christophe lingered just behind the brunette, drawing his gun again, eyes darting between the splintered survivors with a dull nervousness. "Do not separate!" he shouted, before turning to watch Lena with his finger tense on the trigger.

Nick's left hand released his katana, darting to retrieve his Magnum from the holster wrapped around his thigh. He snapped it up, shooting at one of the infected when it darted to go around him and aim for the rest of the team. He winged it, the impact sending it to the ground, but it scrabbled back up and started to run again.

"Ellis -" he started, falling back on instinct. Expecting the kid to intuit what he meant: you get that one, I'll get the others. It was a well-worn reflex, expecting the kid to be right behind him, within earshot, ready to back him up.

Frustration filled him at the easy way he betrayed himself, but a vague wistfulness won out instead when Ellis suddenly - obediently - charged through his periphery. "Got'em!" the Georgian yelled, sprinting to intercept the infected. One swing of his steel-toed boot knocked the zombie's legs out from under it, and he used the metal nose of his shotgun to crack it in the back of its skull.

Nick might have stared dumbly, had his share of the zombies not been upon him and forced him into motion.

His Magnum shoved back into its holster, Nick gripped his sword with both hands, focusing his full attention on the three infected trying to circle him. They fell simply enough, no match for the sharpened edge of his katana. Blood puddled around him, forcing him to back up a step or stand in it. He inhaled a short and focused breath before turning.

Looking up, Nick watched as Coach finally reached the Smoker. The creature had pulled Rhiannon up and into its grasp, circling its arms around her, but not without a fight. The blonde must have kept her arm extended out, because the Smoker's tongue had entangled around it but hadn't managed to bind it to her side.

That freed her arm to messily, blindly jab with the machete gripped tight in her fingers. The blade struck home in the Smoker's neck, but the blood that guttered out was black sludge that clotted faster than it could spray.

An admirable effort, and certainly more than he'd ever managed to pull together in the same situation. However, the tongue must have started compressing around her and cutting off the flow of oxygen into her lungs, because her grip limpened and then released entirely.

The Smoker's claws dug into what it could reach of her past its own tentacle-like appendage, clinging, choking on its own massive tongue as the flesh pulsed and trembled in its tight hold. Its eyes were dull and cloudy, peering out from a bloated face, staring at Coach as the big man thrust the muzzle of his shotgun up to its forehead.

It seemed frozen, like all of its energy and focus went toward maintaining the constriction around Rhiannon. The best attempt at self-defense it could manage was lifting an arm, stubby claws lashing out at him.

Then the shotgun went off, and the Smoker went down. Its skull burst, but the explosion of gore was secondary to the unnatural seepage of dark air. The sundering of its head was like puncturing something pressurized, and the gas that escaped was acrid and horrendous. The smell of rot stung at Nick's eyes even from that distance, and he knew from experience that being closer to it was almost unbearable.

Coach's coughing was instant, booming, but he didn't recoil. He dropped down to grab the tangled-up biker, tongue and all, and started to drag her back. Rochelle was close behind and, despite the tears that started glistening in her eyes from the burning smoke, quickly grabbed onto Rhiannon's arm and helped pull her across the tile.

Its tongue had not detached from whatever internal structures it connected to - not at first. When they hit its end, the fleshy tentacle drawing tight, it slipped free from the Smoker's ruined neck with a squelching, wet sound that made Nick shudder.

He could've joined them, but Ellis had already started toward them, practically tripping over himself in his hurry to help. Nick tightened his grip on his katana and turned toward the escalator instead, jogging quickly over to Lena's side. There was another infected charging up the stairs, and as he came close, she leaned forward and struck out with the bat in her hands.

The blow burst a bruised slice across its temple, sending it staggering backwards. The fall down the escalator killed it halfway to the ground floor. Lena held her ground and watched it go down, but her body was trembling. She looked like she might collapse, and when he set a hand on the woman's shoulder, she almost did.

Nick quickly dropped his hand to cup under her elbow, steadying her. "Whoa, doll. That's enough." he muttered, pulling her away from the escalators.

She followed, at first, eyes a little wide with pain. It wasn't more than a couple steps before she shook free from his grasp and staggered toward where Rochelle and Coach had halted. They were in the process of unwinding the convulsing tentacle from the younger biker's body, and the more they freed, the more she struggled.

"Fucking - off - me - goddamn - cuntstick -" was the only coherent thing Nick caught.

Chris drifted near his elbow, leaning in to breach his personal space. It was a far cry from the solid few feet Ellis put between them, though the kid kept glancing at him from under the bill of his cap. It was not subtle.

"Poor Smoker. It is like going to fish, and catch a piraña, ¿sí?"

Nick couldn't stop a choked laugh from escaping him. He also couldn't stop his eyes from darting to catch a glimpse at the small grin that flashed across Ellis' lips.

Covering his mouth with his wrist, Nick forced a rough exhale. "Pretty sure we all feel like that lately." he muttered, lowering his gaze rather than watch Lena drop to her knees and pull her sister into a tight embrace, staring at the ground rather that look anywhere else.

The blonde's struggling continued in earnest.
Chapter 239

Coach gripped the bottom edge of the storefront shutters, crouched there with no small discomfort at the low position. He shifted his weight before trying to lift the metallic barrier, rolling onto the balls of his feet and pushing, straining -

Then his bad knee gave a threatening stab of pain, and he halted.

His mouth opened to ask for help, but he didn't get a word out before Ellis was kneeled beside him with a softly eager look on his face. He passed the younger man a blink and when Ellis nodded, they both heaved.

The shutters gave a rattling protest before something snapped audibly above their heads. The gate promptly succumbed to their force, rolling up on squeaky tracks. They lifted it up above their heads, arms extended, the metal shutters lopsided where Coach reached higher.

It was likely meant to be motorized, opened and closed with a button, because it did not stay shut when Coach started to let it go. The slight jolt of it trying to drop made him grip harder, and he kept his elbows locked to hold the shutters up.

"Whoop -" Ellis chirped out. "I think we done broke it."

Coach grunted, peering into the shop. The room was dim with no windows to let in light, and the light coming in through the space they'd opened only went so far. His eyes had adjusted to the low light, however, and he could see enough to confirm what he'd been hoping for: clothing.

If anyone had come to loot the few stores remaining, they had apparently had no interest in clothes. The racks were full, though he couldn't help but notice that the only clothing he saw in the nearest racks was all distinctly for women.

"Gotta wonder if this shit's even gonna fit me." he muttered, allowing himself the small bitterness before glancing over his shoulder. His eyes skated over his team, nodding his head toward the space between Ellis and him. "Y'all go on before my arms fall off."

Rochelle was the first to dart forward, eagerly ducking between the two men to enter the store. She pulled the flashlight from where it was hooked on her jeans waistband, but didn't turn it on quite yet, not when there was still enough light to see. "Looks pretty promising, actually. I didn't know if we'd end up in some kind of Hot Topic hellhole."

Close behind her was Lena, the brunette raising both her hands to pat her fingertips against her cheeks with a small smile. "Speak for yourself. I know a chick who still shops there. Or... shopped."

Rhiannon released a low huff, kicking out her foot mid-step in the older woman's direction. "Watch it, dude." She turned sharply to the right, walking up to an advertisement stand that stood just to the side of the entryway. She grasped ahold of the steel framing, giving it a shake. When it proved sturdy, she looped a hand under the bottom edge and started dragging it back toward the door.

Coach stepped out of the way, keeping the shutters held open, and watched Rhiannon drag the framed stand into the center of the entryway. He and Ellis both lowered the shutters, letting them fall onto the top edge of the steel-framed poster board so it was blocked open.
Ducking beneath the shutters where they were bowed open at shoulder-height, Christophe slipped into sight with a gritted flash of teeth. He gave a weary huff of air, stumbling immediately to one side to press his back against the wall next to the entryway.

He looked exhausted, pallor thin and breath reedy. Coach withheld a sigh, closing his eyes for just a moment. It took effort to remind himself that they had no good alternatives to bringing Chris with. Boy's gotta get up to snuff sooner than later. Been lucky, but we ain't gonna stay lucky.

His eyes blinked back open. Coddlin' him don't do him no favours.

Despite the thought, Coach strode past the store's entrance to stand by the Spaniard. He reached out with both hands, but before he could grip the man's arm and waistline, Chris was sagging. It wasn't a full collapse, but it was enough to make Coach startle.

He scooped the Spaniard into an embrace, getting an arm fully encircled behind his back. Together they lowered to the ground, with Chris' shoes skidding on the ground in short squeaks. Once his backside was planted on the tile, the ex-football player relaxed into a kneel beside him, quick to grab his chin and tip it up.

"Chris?" he prompted, firmly, and the silence in the room said everyone had noticed the disturbance. Nobody approached, but he felt eyes on his back. "Talk to me."

"Estoy bien." the foreigner groaned out, lifting his hand as if to push the older man's hand away. He seemed to forget there was a pistol gripped in that hand, because Coach was forced to lurch his head back from the muzzle of the gun when it flopped dangerously close to his chin.

With a huff of air, Coach retracted both his arms, quickly snatching fingers around Chris' wrist. He slipped the gun out of the ex-Angel's grip without much resistance, checking the safety - off, naturally, so he switched it on - before setting it on the ground.

"Take a breather, son." he responded, trying not to let his agitation get the best of his moderate tone. "You look terrible."

The Spaniard burst into a small cackled sound, eyes widening before focusing on his face. "Amigo, you try to flatter me?" Coach felt a small stir of worry, looking back at him, reading the manic hollowness there. It wasn't his usual cheeriness, not really. It was just so close that he could almost confuse them.

Coach released a sigh. A swell of paternal warmth made him reach up to flatten his hand on the young man's cheek, palm gripped against the slim beginnings of a beard along his jawline. Chris didn't flinch at the touch, didn't seem surprised. "You gotta be honest wit' me, Chris. All the shit we got goin' on, I gotta know you're bein' honest."

The tilt left Christophe's lips, deflating them to a thin line. "Estoy - I feel fine." he managed, and it was almost angry. His entire presence shifted instantly into something anxious and tense, like if Coach pressed a little harder he might break into outright animosity. "Te prometo. I am just tired. Why do you think I am lying?"

That made the bigger man lean back, softening his expression into a sympathetic moue. "I don't think you're lyin'. I think you're holdin' it together, like everyone else. An' that's fine, so long as you admit when it's too much. And don't swing that gun around."

Chris fidgeted, shifted, lifting his hand to push Coach's hand away from its framing position on his face. The older man watched as his anger dissipated as fast as it had arrived, replaced by that fragile exhaustion - *Boy's gonna give me whiplash. "Vale."

A hand touched his back, and when Coach didn't turn to acknowledge it, Rochelle murmured down to him. "I think Lena spotted some clothes that might fit you. How about you go look?" He felt a vague surprise at the abrupt statement, and twisted his head to look up at her. The woman's expression was distinctly casual - too casual. He was being extracted from the situation.

Coach's gaze drifted, spotting Rhiannon and Lena both looking in their direction, though their attention was firmly on Chris. He might've argued, had a part of him not recognized that it wasn't the worst idea.

Delicacy did not come easy when his body felt like Styrofoam and cardboard, hollow, surreal and fake and liable to collapse. Nothing came easy when he was buried under the suffocating weight of their circumstances. Don't think about it. Not yet.

He inhaled, exhaled, and nodded. "A'ight."

Rochelle slid a hand under his elbow, but the gesture was largely ceremonial. Coach got himself to his feet without putting any weight on her, patting off his thighs before turning away. He glanced back long enough to watch her kneel down in front of Christophe and reach out to rest her palms on his crumpled legs, soothingly placed just at his knees.

She leaned in to murmur to him, and he caught the genuine smile that sprawled onto the boy's lips. It was a far cry from the manic energy that had driven him a few moments' prior. It was honest, adoring.

Coach knew that look.

He just didn't know how to react.

You get a bunch of kids in a room together and they ain't got the sense to keep their hands off each other. Like runnin' a damn high school. As if we need all this mess, on top of everythin' else. Like Nick an' Ellis ain't bad enough.

He didn't mean it, not really, and sighed in a morose and guilty grumble at himself. He observed where Ellis had busied himself against the far wall, picking through packs of socks that were stuffed tightly into multi-tiered wooden trays. Nick stood near the two bikers, hands stuffed into his slacks pockets.

The man looked agitated - more than normal. The closer Coach got, the better a view he got, and the higher his brow rose. Stress seemed to be settling in; he looked pale, haggard. He didn't seem focused on anything other than the air directly before his nose.

It was worrisome, but Nick hadn't appeared healthy or content in days.

"Nicky." he stated, drawing the gambler's irked attention. He felt the snap to attention between them, the abrupt tension, but the threat of conflict didn't stop him. "Yo' ass looks near as bad. You feel a'ight?"

Nick's mouth twisted into an unpleasant grimace, putting a hand against his temple. His palm came away with sweat, which he wiped off on his shirtfront. "Dunno. Headache creeping up. All the running around and the fucking stench out there got to me or something," He seemed to catch himself, and clarified, "I'm fine."

"You sayin' you're fine is always a bad sign." Coach allowed a smile and paused, reaching into the wide pocket of his khaki-coloured slacks. He'd slipped a bottle of water there, crumpled and bent and half-full, and drew it out to offer it to the Northerner. "Drink."

There was protest on Nick's face, even as he snagged the bottle and cracked it open. Coach turned away with some small satisfaction, some relief at managing to tend to one of his teammates successfully. One of his family.

Maybe the only family he had left.

Not yet. Don't you go there. Don't.

He turned his gaze on Rhiannon with a weary sigh, nodding toward Lena. "Y'all actually find somethin', or was that just hot air to get me to leave?" he joked, trying for wry. He figured he succeeded when Lena laughed.

Beside her, the blonde grinned, thumbing over the slashed brown of her studded eyebrow. "Both." she returned, voice coarse in a way that was not unpleasant. Husky. He grimaced playfully at her when she nudged at him with her elbow. "Come on, Chief. Let's get you out of those clothes."

Coach snorted, shaking his head in her direction. He spared a glance at Lena, but she had nothing for him except a vaguely unhelpful smile. The brunette lifted her hand and saluted with two fingers against her temple before turning away.

She wandered toward where Ellis crouched, and Coach sighed before following in Rhiannon's wake. She had not waited for him, and he had to pick his way between two racks to see where she'd ended up. "What -"

The flash of colour through the air preceded a bundle of fabric heading squarely for his face. He jolted, reflexively lifting his hands to intercept it before it struck him, huffing out air. "Woman, watch yo'self." he barked out, even as he laughed, extending his arms and gripping the fabric in such a way that it unfurled before him.

Rhiannon's snickering passed by him, drifting away as she searched through the clothes around them.

It was a T-shirt, just plain grey speckled with white. He held it up to his front, aligning it with his body, and eyeballed the size - too small. "Ain't gonna make that shit work." he muttered, tossing it into a nearby rack. He lifted his head, glancing toward where Rhiannon now crouched in front of a set of shelving, pawing through sealed plastic-wrapped white undershirts.

"You got an XL in there? Got football shoulders over here."

She hummed, before snagging a pack and offering it up over her shoulder. He approached to take it, but when his fingers caught on the thin plastic packaging and pulled, she did not release it.

Rhiannon side-eyed him, slanted up from her kneeled position. The humour had left her.

"You shouldn't push him, dude. We're lucky he's fuckin' holding it together at all. I don't think poking holes in whatever is keeping him moving is the best idea." She spoke like she always did: blunt, confrontational, but not strictly cruel. Or strictly wrong.

Coach sucked in a breath, pulling the pack of shirts free when she finally let go. "Can't blame me fo' tryin'. Only thing we got's each other anymore; I just want the kid to know he ain't alone. He... lost a lot, past few weeks. More that any of us."
He noticed her pause, and watched her a little closer. She was moving stiffly, nursing her left leg where she'd been dragged by the Smoker, but that wasn't it. The woman was unusually somber, teeth worrying at her lower lip.

With a faint frown, Coach stepped closer, resting one hand on her shoulder. She flinched but didn't recoil, stilling.

"I saw Texas on that -"

Then she did recoil, shooting him a hollow glare. It was mulled, half-sweet and half-bitter and wholly injured, like he'd taken a cheap shot. "What did I just say about poking holes, shitbird? I don't want to talk about it."

He gazed at her, hand hovering where it was. A misshapen ball of frustration caught in his throat, tightening his voice when he grunted. "Sometimes it ain't helpin' to hold it all in. Gotta purge it, get it out there. Every damn mistake I ever made could've gone different if I'd listened a little more. Talked a little more, too."

Rhiannon's mouth drew into a downward curve, displeasure tainting her sharp laugh. "Fuck, big guy. Welcome to the human condition."

Coach frowned, aware of the way it tugged at his brow and twitched at his jaw. "Rhiannon, I'm serious. We ain't known each other long, but I know you're scared damn silly just like I am. I know that shit out there scares the daylights outta me."

"Yeah, and I bury it." She shook her head, tangling fingers up in her dyed blonde hair, scratching at the browning part where her colour was growing out. "We bury shit. It's what we do. You see us getting through all this if we were all pissing and moaning about how scared we are and how much it all sucks ass? Not likely."

"I been buryin' shit all my life, an' I wouldn't be here if these three hadn't lifted me up." Coach muttered, focusing down on the packet in his hands. He started tearing through the plastic with an overgrown thumbnail. "Kept me goin'. Stiff upper lip only gets you so far. You gotta open up sometime or this shit'll kill you."

Maybe the rest of the team could hear him. He didn't care. Maybe he hoped they did. He meant every word; maybe too much.

"Close up, cut off from the grief, what you got left? What we got left if we ain't got each other? If the damn world's endin', the hell kind of consolation prize is ego an' damn - pride? If we can't comfort each other what the hell are we doin' here?"

The woman was silent at first, staring at her hands. She lowered her head as if to laugh, snicker at him, but all that escaped her was a pant of air. Coach had one of the three shirts packed tightly in the bundle, but he just clenched it in his hands.

She muttered, "You don't feel like if you start crying you'll never fucking stop? Because I look at that shitty map out there, and all those cunts out there who put bullets in their heads start to make sense. So don't fucking lecture me, dude. We're all scared shitless and trying to keep a lid on it."

Rhiannon stood, abruptly, head briskly jerking in his direction despite the fact that she didn't meet his gaze. "More clothes in the back."

When she strode past him, he didn't stop her. Coach simply watched her go, wrestling down the urge to respond. He surrendered with a weighty sigh, drooping his head toward his chest and closing his eyes.

"Wasn't lecturin' you." he grunted, before she passed beyond earshot. "That was all fo' me, girl."

Coach didn't know if she'd stopped at first. He was about to give up, open his eyes and follow her, when a hand alighted on his forearm. Her fingers tightened in a light squeeze, just enough.

He let his eyelids blink back open, gazing at her perturbed little frown. Exasperated, almost, and she flashed her teeth when he looked at her. "If you needed to... I mean, if - uh, shit, you know. I got ears and nothing fuckin' better to do. Maybe later."

It took him a moment, it honestly did. Her awkward stance and bloated wording threw him, but it all snapped into place with a realization that made him smile. She was offering to listen. Badly, but sincerely.

Rhiannon immediately wheeled around, striding further into the store, tossing her hands up in the air with an agitated flare. "Don't look at me like that, Coach. That's my second-least-fuckin'-favourite look."

Coach chuckled, following after her, and did not rise to the bait.

She clarified shortly thereafter.

"My first-least-favourite is every single look Lee gives me."
Chapter 240

Rochelle tugged on the shirt she'd found, worming into it and pulling it down over her newly donned sports bra. The top was a dense material, like a hoodie, but it was loose and almost cropped. A slice of skin was just visible above the waistband of the black sweatpants she'd gravitated toward, a huge change from the discomfort of her old jeans.

Cozy. Easy to move in. Tight enough that they weren't cumbersome. Thin enough that she didn't feel like they'd cook her alive. The logistics of the outfit didn't bother her, but she was otherwise significantly bothered by it. She couldn't help but look herself over in the dressing room mirror, illuminated messily by the flashlight propped against the wall at her feet.

Her eyes were critical, lip caught between her teeth.

_Still got it._ she assured herself, inhaling. _Don't look almost thirty. Don't look like you've spent the last - forever in an apocalyptic nightmare. Don't look like your last shower was crouched under a sink faucet. You definitely look like someone who should be macking on a college student._

Her expression fell into a grimace, sighing, lifting a hand to place it on her belly. It was all the last thing that should have been on her mind, but it sat in the attic of her skull, a ferociously silent weight. It was safer than anything else she could have thought about, anyway.

"You doin' okay in there, Ro'?" Ellis' voice chirped out to her, only partially muffled by the dressing room door. She heard his footsteps approach, shuffling and clumsy in the dim light of the hallway that lead to the singular dressing room. "Lemme see!"

Rochelle glanced down, giving herself a small pat-down before she nodded. "Okay, jeez, nosy." she returned, taking the small step between her and the door. She cracked it open and retreated back so the light fell on her.

Ellis hadn't decided on anything, it seemed. He was still in his Bullshifters T-shirt and overalls - but he'd shucked his boots in favour of padding around in pristine white socks. He stood flat-footed, eyes widening slightly when they darted to absorb Rochelle's form. He was silent for just longer than made her comfortable.

"Well?" she prompted, hands quickly darting to tangle her fingers together. "It's kind of, 'just rolled out of bed on a Saturday' but I've been suffering in denim for too long and you are not going to get me back into that. Lucky me, I wore my skintight jeans to the end of the world. My legs are still numb."

It was apparently clear that she was nervously babbling, because Ellis waved quickly at her, a laugh escaping him. "Whoa, girl. I just didn't - you look great, I promise."

Her eyes narrowed, but he seemed sincere enough that she believed him. She puffed out a breath and turned away, peering at herself in the mirror. "Why am I asking you, anyway? You're gay."

She said the joke before she thought about it. Was he at that point - humour? She didn't know. Her immediate regret was, however, washed away firmly when he bolted out a laugh. The Georgian clapped his hand over his mouth and looked at her with something between affection and scandalized horror.

"Ro' -" he coughed out.
"Sorry." she stated, anyway, passing him a grin. "I ran you into that. Your sense of fashion is not exactly refined, though." When he scrunched his nose up at her, she threw her hands into the air. "Oh, come on. You can't deny that one."

With a vague softening of his expression, Ellis lowered his hand. He smiled and responded, "Actually, I can't deny either of 'em."

That caught her off-guard, and she cackled, stepping closer to wrap her arms around her waist. However, any attempt at further response was waylaid by the approach of footsteps.

Rochelle blinked in their direction and hesitantly retreated a step back from Ellis, grabbing the strings of her hoodie's cowl in a nervous gesture. She ignored him when he cocked a brow at her, all of her attention on the hallway, her heart lurching up into her throat.
