Hackett nodded. “Bryson started as a pure researcher. He is fascinated by legends and myths, and studies the truth behind them. He wanted to know why people create these monsters and great creatures. When we met other races, he became obsessed with links and similarities between all manner of mythological creatures across species. After a while, he started to find evidence that there may be real beings behind some of those legends.”

“Even though the Protheans existed,” Liara spoke up, her voice soft, “people treated me like I was chasing legends.” She straightened in her seat and looked up at Garrus. “Do you mind if I liaise with Dr. Bryson? I believe we’ll discover that we have a great deal in common. Perhaps we’ll even be able to fit missing pieces into one another’s puzzles.”

Garrus smiled and nodded. He stretched out, groaning like someone seventy cycles his senior as he slid lower in his seat, his body threatening strike action if he didn’t get some decent sleep. “Sounds like a good fit, Liara.” Looking over at Joker, who focused on flipping endlessly through vid channels. “And it was a good idea, Joker. Finding a Reaper corpse, especially a mostly intact one, would be invaluable.”

“Shit!” The pilot jerked up, sitting tall and stiff in his chair. “Sh! Listen!” He turned up the volume on the vid screen, then turned to flap an impatient hand at everyone when they continued talking. “Shut up! It’s about Shepard.”
A guillotine blade of silence fell.

A pretty, young human stood in the alley where Shepard died. Garrus winced away from the sight, still able to see his own silhouette outlined on the wall in blood, even though it had been scrubbed clean. The black-haired kid looked nervous as hell, so Garrus suspected that she didn’t have much experience in front of a camera. Behind her, notes, cards, and artwork covered the alley wall. Candles, flowers, and small mementos formed a shrine along the floor, leaving only a narrow strip open for people to pass through.

“People started leaving gifts and tokens within hours of it happening,” Herros informed them, his voice soft and sad. He sank into an armchair off to the side of the screen.

“... people are questioning C-Sec and the council’s official statements that Captain Shepard’s death was a random act of violence. Humanity’s first Spectre was gunned down in this alley less than thirty six hours after she killed rogue Spectre, Saren Arterius, and coordinated the destruction of the dreadnought, Sovereign.”

The reporter stepped sideways, revealing a beautifully painted graffiti depicting Shepard as a warrior outfitted in silver armour, brandishing a golden sword and shield. Huge wings spread out from her back as if she soared into battle.

“It’s an archangel,” Ashley whispered. When Garrus looked over at her, she met his stare and shrugged. “They’re warrior angels of God. Protectors and vanguards in the war against evil.”

Garrus nodded and looked back at the screen, his eyes drawn to that fierce, beautiful depiction of his Kahri. She would have hated it, but he couldn’t think of a more apt position for her in death. An archangel, looking over and protecting everyone just as she had in life.

“Less than two hours before her death,” the reporter continued, “I asked Captain Shepard for an interview. She gave me her contact information, but when I thanked her for agreeing to meet with me, Shepard told me that she was doing me no favours involving me in her investigation.”

Anderson let out a long, grumbling sigh from his seat in the kitchen. “For the love of … .”

“What was Captain Shepard involved in?” the reporter asked, as the camera panned back to show more of the alley. “Did it result in her brutal murder in this alley mere moments after her induction as the first human to join the Spectres? Rumours abound that Saren and Sovereign were just a small part of a much larger threat. If that’s the case, who would want to kill our best chance of defending against it?” The camera zoomed in on the young reporter. “I intend to find out. Emily Wong reporting from Zakera Ward on the Citadel.”

Nihlus stepped in front of the screen, earning a chorus of protests, but didn’t move. “I warned Shepard about involving that child. Miss Wong is going to get herself killed.” He emphasized the Miss.

Kaidan bristled to Garrus’s right. “Shepard didn’t endanger people, especially civilians, unnecessarily. She had to have thought Emily Wong could help in some way.” He stood and stalked into the kitchen where he rifled through cupboards and opened the refrigerators to stare inside.

“Alenko’s right.” Anderson said, looking up from his omnitool. “We need to get Miss Wong read in before she starts banging on the wrong doors. She’s definitely got the guts. If she’s handled correctly, she could be a solid resource when it comes to educating the public. We’re just going to have to be prepared to watch her back.” He looked up at Garrus.
Garrus almost laughed as the more experienced soldiers all looked to him for the final decision, but he kept his expression even as he nodded. Looking over at the volus, who sat, half-sprawled in a very uncomfortable looking position in an armchair, he asked, “Barla Von, could you get Miss Wong here by tomorrow evening? I don’t think it will take very much to convince her to come, but make sure she has discreet security as soon as possible.”

The volus shifted, wriggling a little more upright and activated his omnitool. “I will get her here, General.”

“Do you think it was the council?” Kaidan asked. He ended his search with the jar of Joker’s chocolate stuff in his hand.

“Hey!” Joker squawked. “Get out of that. It’s mine!”

Kaidan stabbed a spoon into it. “That just makes it taste so much better.” He stuck the spoon in his mouth. “Mm mm mm.”

Garrus let Joker’s gasping cries of dismay go unanswered, focusing on Kaidan. “I don’t know. It doesn’t make sense for them to make her a Spectre and then kill her.” He looked up at Nihlus as the Spectre walked around the outside of the room, headed for the door. “Where are you going?” he called.

Nihlus didn’t stop. “Out.”

“Not alone, you don’t,” Garrus started toward him, but then Wrex hoisted himself off the sofa where he’d been dozing.

“I’ll go with him. I could use a drink.” He lumbered after Nihlus, stopping when Martin popped up like a preteril from its burrow. “You coming, pyjak?” he asked, laughing low and deep. He jerked his massive head toward the front door and kept walking. “Get moving if you are.”

Martin looked to Garrus.

Garrus nodded despite the sinking feeling in the pit of his stomach. Wrex wouldn’t get too loaded to look out for the kid … he hoped. Damn, it was probably a really bad idea. If anyone should go with Martin the first couple of times, it should be him. He opened his mouth to refuse, but what came out was, “Call if you need anything, kid.” Garrus shot him a stern, warning glare. “Especially a ride home. And keep your eyes open.”

“I know. I know, Kahri, but he really isn’t a kid, and he’s going to have to learn to live here eventually.”

The reasoning sounded forced and hollow even to him.

“I will,” Martin called back as he ran out the door.

Garrus sighed. “Sure you will.” He forced aside his reactions and sank back into his chair.

“I think it was that crazy bastard, Banes,” Joker said, pulling Garrus’s attention back to the conversation. “Remember the test on Luna that nearly killed her?”

“Does Cerberus have a motive to kill her, though?” Kaidan asked around another spoonful of the chocolate. Finally caving in to Joker’s ranting protests, he put the cap on and stuck it back in the cupboard.
“Well,” Ashley said, taking Martin’s spot next to Hackett, “maybe Cerberus killed Shepard to set up the council . . . undermine them?” She shrugged and drew one foot up under her. “Use her to rally support for their causes?” She scowled. “Did they believe in the Reaper threat?”

Garrus thought about that for a second, then shook his head. He couldn’t recall Shepard saying much about the organization, other than that she believed Banes was behind Kahoku’s dead Marines. “I don’t think they said either way, but if it’s their ships poaching Sovereign’s remains, they could well believe it.” His scowl deepened, dark and thoughtful. They could not only believe it, but be looking for ways to prepare for it.

“Council ordering Shepard’s assassination makes sense,” Mordin said, looking up from his omnitool. He sat next to Amalair, still running scans and asking questions. “Council uses Shepard’s memory to further goals, rally people to their causes. No interference from the truth.” He went back to work, muttering to himself about the fascinating aspects of rachni biology.

Nausea churned Garrus’s guts like a cement mixer. If they’d killed her, they could prop her up to support anything, undermine his . . . all of their efforts using the very person who’d started it all. He couldn’t allow that. He didn’t possess the foggiest idea how to stop them, but he had to. What if they used her to support the idea of appeasement? No matter how successful they were building ships and recruiting soldiers, they’d never be able to wage war against the entire might of the Reapers on their own. They needed the Alliance, the Hierarchy, all the races to bring their might to bear.

He stood back up, unable to speculate any longer. The past week had exhausted him, and the work didn’t seem set to ease up any time soon. “I’m heading up for the night,” he said. “See you all down here at 0800 for breakfast.” He returned their good nights and retreated to his room.

After dropping the blinds, he headed into the shower, turning it on and letting it run until the water turned from rust brown to clear. For a building that had remained abandoned for who knew how long, it had remarkable water pressure, and he stood under the steaming torrent, just letting the water beat the tension and aches from his muscles.

After thirty minutes, he towed off and dressed in his long, black robe. He ran a reverent talon over the stitch work on the hem of his sleeve. It depicted a flock of maraquil soaring and diving over rolling waves. His mari had crafted every stitch of it, even weaving the tussat-silk cloth it was made from, working on it for over a year while he served in the military. She’d given it to him when he moved to the Citadel to join C-Sec. He missed her and Sol. Maybe he’d go home for a few days once he got things in motion.

He’d just pulled back the blankets when someone rapped on the door. “Now I know why you were always grumbling at the door, Shepard,” he muttered, then straightened. “Yes?”

“It’s Ashley, sir. May I speak with you for a minute?”

“Come in.” He walked toward the door as it opened. He nodded to acknowledge the chief’s greeting, and gestured toward the sitting area. “Make yourself comfortable, Ash.” Following her, he watched her body language, trying to get a read on her frame of mind as she perched on the edge of the couch. He sat across from her and leaned back, leaving it to her to start the conversation.

Ashley sighed, and half-shrugged, her head tilting almost bashfully toward one shoulder. “So, you’ve probably been wondering why I’ve been acting like such an ass since Shepard’s memorial.”

Garrus smiled and nodded. “It’s crossed my mind. You seemed to be getting along very well with everyone until then.”
Ashley braced her forearms on her knees and clasped her hands. “Yes, sir, and I’m sorry about the things I said, especially at the memorial. I know if anyone could have and would have saved her, it would be you.” She sighed and shook her head. “When Jenkins died, Shepard came to talk to me.”

A gentle smile ghosted across her face. “Yelled at me, actually. I was feeling sorry for myself, thought I should have been the one to die. Shepard challenged me to get over myself and find a way to honour the kid’s sacrifice.”

Garrus nodded, the picture forming clearly in his mind. Shepard didn’t pull punches when she got passionate about something.

“We’d spoken before about how dangerous Cerberus was, and I said we needed to embed someone in the organization.” She chuckled, just a soft exhalation of sound. “She asked me if I was volunteering.”

“So, after Jenkins died, you decided to do just that?” he asked, leaning forward, mirroring her posture.

“I did. The day Shepard died, we were approached by the leader of Terra Firma. I saw an opportunity to get an in with the pro-human movement, so I pointed out how humanity and Shepard had been dragged into the whole Reaper issue because of Saren.” She shrugged and looked up, making real eye contact for the first time. “Shepard warned me to be careful, but it must have worked, because the next day, I got a message from Rear Admiral Mikhailovich. He’s in charge of the 63rd scout flotilla. He offered me a position that would only be disclosed if I agreed to meet with him.”

“You think he’s involved with Cerberus?” Garrus’s shoulders and back tightened, tension drawing all the muscles up toward his cowl.

She nodded. “He wants to meet on his ship out in the middle of uncharted space. If he was going to offer me a position that was above board, the meeting wouldn’t be in the middle of nowhere.” A long sigh followed that thought. “He’s always been very vocal about our need to keep our technology a secret from the other races, because he believes war is inevitable. When we spoke the other day, he ranted about Shepard allowing so many aliens free rein aboard the Normandy, or the over-designed, turian-appeasing financial disaster as he called it.” She let out a warm chuckle. “Good thing he didn’t call her that in front of Shepard. She would have laid him out cold.”

“In a heartbeat,” Garrus agreed, laughing along with her.

Having someone inside Cerberus would prove invaluable, but the risk made Garrus uncomfortable. “So you kept up the alien-hating pretense on the Normandy just in case someone was reporting back to him?” He nodded, the pieces of the puzzle falling into place. “Do you want to meet with Mikhailovich?”

“Yes, sir. I think he might be my way in. I can’t just walk up to Cerberus’s front door and sign up, but maybe I can ease my way in through the Alliance . . . keep it about serving Earth.” She shrugged and sat up straight. “I have no idea what I’m doing, but I know I can do this.”

Weighing the options, Garrus agreed. If they were going to infiltrate Cerberus, Ash was a solid choice. He nodded, holding her stare. “Okay, but we’ll set up an encrypted frequency where you can drop messages, and you’re never out of contact for longer than forty-eight hours, even just for this meet. If you’re going to be, you leave the message saying how long. If you even suspect your cover is blown, you message me, and we’ll extract you immediately. Understood?”

Ash smiled and pushed herself up off the couch, a firm smile set on her face. “I didn’t want to appear too eager, so put him off for a few days, saying I couldn’t get leave so soon after Shepard’s death.”

Garrus stood. “I’ll talk to Anderson when we won’t be overheard, have him arrange leave for as long as you need. We’ll discuss the rest of the details once we know more.”

Ashley held out her hand. “Thank you, sir. I won’t let you, or Shepard, down.”

Garrus took the chief’s hand. “She was very impressed with you, Ash. I know you’ll continue to do her proud.” He squeezed her fingers, then released her. “I’ll see you in the morning.”

“Yes, sir. Thank you, sir.” She strode for the door, her whole posture radiating confidence and a sense of purpose that she hadn’t possessed when Garrus first met her. He just hoped that it didn’t get her killed.

When the door closed behind Ashley, Garrus returned to his bed. He climbed in and propped himself up on a couple of pillows before reaching for the book on the nightstand.

Not quite a half hour later, Garrus glanced up as his father entered the room, the elder Vakarian heading straight through for the head. “Too much wild partying?”

Herros laughed. “All except Joker are passed out on the couches or draped over chairs. A few made it to their beds.” He stopped at the door, sobering. “They’ve had a hard week. They’re trying hard not to show it, but they’re worn out.”

Nodding, Garrus looked back down at his book. “Anderson should take them somewhere for shore leave when we’re done here.” He looked up when his father didn’t reply, but the elder Vakarian had already stepped through, the door sliding closed behind him.

Fifteen minutes later, Herros walked out, wearing a long, deep blue robe very like Garrus’s own, right down to the intricate embroidery work along the hems. Garrus smiled. “That’s a new one.” He shook his head. “Must have taken Mari years to do all that stitchwork.”

Herros chuckled and sat on the side of the bed. “I hated to part with the old one. It was her bonding gift to me, but she put so much time into this. You know her and her fibre craft.” He ran loving talons along the edge, seeming to disappear into thought for a moment before he turned, sitting so he faced Garrus.

Garrus pushed himself up to sit, leaning against the headboard, frowning a little when he saw the serious look on his father’s face. “Pari? What is it?”

Herros’s eyes glassed a little, his mandibles working in a slow sweep for a long moment before he cleared his throat and shifted himself on the bed. “Your mari’s health isn’t the best, Garrus. She’s having trouble with fine motor coordination, and she has days where she’s in quite a lot of pain.”

“A spa day?” Herros reached out, laying his talons over his father’s. Claws wrapped tight around his throat as he thought of his vital, strong, kind mari hurting and hiding it from her ungrateful, runaway son during their rare vidcalls. “Why hasn’t she said anything? Why hasn’t Sol said anything? I would have … .” He let the sentence die. What would he have done? Dropped whatever very important case he was working on to travel home and help out? As much as the truth hurt, he knew himself better than that—at least the torin he’d been before meeting Shepard.

Herros shrugged. “You know your mari. She’s scared, but doesn’t want to admit anything’s wrong. I went home for a week last month and took her to specialists. It’s called Corpalis Syndrome. There are no treatments, no cure.” A harsh keen broke through the last words, but he cut it off, his jaw clenching.

Sun breaking through the clouds in the middle of a summer storm, pain and understanding poured through Garrus, shining a gentle, new light on his pari. Garrus clambered out from under the blankets to kneel next to his father on the mattress, pulling him into an embrace. A soft cry rumbled from his throat, both larynges layering sorrow and empathy, fear and regret. Over the cycles, he’d doubted a great many things about his father, but never the torin’s devotion to his mate. Even living apart most of the time, his parents loved one another with a strength that Garrus always held as his benchmark, unwilling to accept anything less.

“I’ve made so many mistakes, Garrus,” Herros whispered, one arm slipping around his son’s cowl. “I stand by my decision for you and Sol to grow up on Palaven—real rock and vegetation beneath your talons, sky above your heads—but the rest . . .” He shook his head then rested his brow against his son’s. “The rest was pride. I should have left C-Sec, taken a position with Internal Forces. I should have been there with her, and then with you and Sol for the past thirty cycles. And now it’s nearly too late.”

Garrus pulled away, leaving his hand on his father’s shoulder. Panic and denial tossed him back and forth until it took all his strength not to leap up and run down to find Mordin, demand that something be done. He couldn’t just sit back and watch his mari succumb to a slow and painful death. He had so many things to make up to her, so many things he needed to say . . . to apologize for.

“Garrus?” His father’s voice pulled him back, giving him a anchor to hold onto as he fought his reactions back under control.

Still, his voice shook as he said, “We’ll do everything we can for her. Mordin Solus is a genius and very well known in the scientific community. Maybe he knows someone who’s working on it. We have new technologies to study with the geth, the rachni . . . even Sovereign.” He met his father’s eyes with a resolute stare. “We’ll figure something out.”

Herros gripped the back of Garrus’s neck just above his cowl, his thumb talon gently stroking along the ridge of hard plates. After staring back at Garrus for a moment, he nodded. “In the meantime, I’m going to move home. Fedorian has been after me for cycles to retire and take a seat in the Hierarchy.” He let out a long, noisy breath, the barest hint of the keen returning beneath it. “I’m going to accept. I need to be there for your mari, and I can do a lot more for you and the war effort there than I can in C-Sec.”

Garrus frowned. “Are you sure you want to go into politics?”

His father’s mandible fluttered with a small, wry smile. “It wouldn’t be my first choice for retirement, but Shepard was right. You’re right. We need to bring together everyone and every resource we can. Fedorian has offered me the Planetary Security portfolio, and wants me to sit on both the assembly of generals and admirals. I couldn’t have chosen a more perfect position to help with the war. I’ll have to work slowly and carefully, but I’ll find a way to bring them around.”

Herros stood. “Let’s get some sleep. Lamenting and giving into our fears won’t solve the problems of tomorrow.”

Garrus nodded and moved back to his side of the bed, laying on his back, pillows piled under his head, Shepard’s on the top. He picked up his book, but stared blankly at the page, not seeing the words. Instead, he planned all the people he needed to speak to about his mother’s illness and tried to figure out the best timing for a trip back to Palaven. Educating himself came first. Tomorrow, he’d take Mordin and Dr. Chakwas aside and ask them to research Corpalis Syndrome and put something together to help him understand the disease and what his mother needed.

“Are you reading or worrying?” Herros asked, turning over to look at him. The concern and understanding in his father’s eyes eased back the sorrow and fear.

“I’ve been the worst of sons,” Garrus whispered, looking away. “I abandoned Mari and Sol. Fought tooth and talon against you instead of just listening.” He shook his head.

“Not the worst of sons,” Herros replied. “We all did the best we could, Garrus. I tried to raise you to be the torin I wanted you to be.” A soft, bitter chuff cut the air as he shook his head. “I didn’t realize that what I needed to do was trust you enough to raise you to be the torin you wanted to be.”

He sighed. “Your mari always knew that. She tried to tell me a thousand times, but I was too stubborn to listen.”

Garrus laughed softly. “Must be genetic.”

“Indeed.”

A comforting silence grew between them for a couple of minutes as Garrus thought about what it would mean for his pari to lose the mate he adored. Would it have been better or worse to lose Shepard after thirty-five cycles together? “It must seem ridiculous to you, my mourning so hard and being so lost without someone I knew a few months,” Garrus said, then chuffed and shook his head.

“Not at all.” Herros tilted his head a little and adjusted his pillow. “I knew I’d found my life partner the moment I saw your mother, and after thirty four cycles, have yet to regret a day.”

Garrus turned his head, his brow furrowing. “You’ve never said anything about the fact Shepard was human. It didn’t bother you?”

Herros sighed, his subvocals rumbling a little. “When your children are born, you imagine their futures. You see them growing up, bonding with a mate you adore as much as they do … grandchildren in whose eyes you can see yourself and their grandmother.” A sad sort of smile drifted over his rugged, strong features. “But, as you watch those children grow and suffer through the inevitable disappointment and suffering of life, you realize that you truly wish for them to find only a handful of things: love, companionship, a sense of purpose, peace, and happiness.”

He shrugged, his mandible fluttering. “I watched you say goodbye to Shepard the day she came to see me at C-Sec, and I knew you’d found everything I wished for you. I’m just sorry you lost her so soon.” He reached out to squeeze Garrus’s arm, his mouth working a little as if he were trying to decide on the wisdom of saying the next words.

“What?” Garrus prompted, truly wanting to know what his father had to say. He no longer retained the arrogant privilege of believing he knew better. His father knew all along the dangers he faced, the darkness the anger bred within his heart. Having seen it, he tried to steer Garrus into safer waters.

Herros let out a soft breath. “Now, I’m afraid you’ll spend the rest of your life bonded to a dead woman.” He patted Garrus’s arm and pulled his hand back. “It’s too soon to worry about, but I see so much of me in you, Garrus.” He chuffed. “It’s probably why we fought all the time. But, I know that when I lose your mari, whether it is in a cycle or in seventy-five cycles, that will be it for me. You’re so young, so much left ahead.” He smiled and shook his head. “Like I said, too early for these sorts of worries. You should be holding your Kahri close. She deserves this time.”
Garrus nodded, but didn’t reply. Closing his eyes, he rolled over, facing away from his father, and pulled her pillow tight to his face. Shephard did deserve that time and so much more. When they met again, she deserved to know that he’d remained faithful to her memory for as long as they’d been apart. He could give her that. He could give her that without even the slightest pang of regret.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry for only one update this week. Spent Monday and Tuesday with my head packed in ice and wondering if trepanning would actually work. Next week will be back to Monday, Thursday. As always, thanks for reading. Kim
Chapter Summary

At the brink of moving forward, everyone figures out their place. Or tries to.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Parsophin - Ancient turian version of cavalry. Warriors rode into battle on Loraus Montum (large armoured four-legged reptile analogues that have since gone extinct due to a highly selective breeding process.)

Buratrum - The realm of the spirits of dishonourable association.

Karifratrus - A blood oath made between turians, bonding them as siblings in honour rather than blood. It has its origins in ancient times where clan members swore oaths before going into battle. If one of them died, the family and all dependents of the other would be adopted into the survivor's family. While the oath-swearers are alive, they are bonded as close or closer than blood.

8 Days ASD

Shepard grinned and leaned back in the grass, tilting her face up to the sun. "You picked a hell of a place for our second date." Her bright emerald stare focused on Garrus. After a second, she tilted her head to one side, a gentle smile just kissing her lips. "You know, I've been thinking about something. You have a nickname for me, but I don't have one for you. Well, outside of calling you C-Sec, and I can't really call you that now you've quit." The smile turned, one corner of her mouth lifting as her eyes sparkled with teasing. "That hardly seems fair."

His heart began to pound against his spine at the heat in her stare. Garrus stretched out on his side, the grass cool and lush against the bare plates of his torso as he cradled his head in his hand. He reached out to caress one freckled cheek with his thumb, then tucked a stray lock of hair behind her ear. "I've had a few nicknames in my time. None of which I want to hear from these lips. "You know, I've been thinking about something. You have a nickname for me, but I don't have one for you. Well, outside of calling you C-Sec, and I can't really call you that now you've quit." The smile turned, one corner of her mouth lifting as her eyes sparkled with teasing. "That hardly seems fair."

His heart began to pound against his spine at the heat in her stare. Garrus stretched out on his side, the grass cool and lush against the bare plates of his torso as he cradled his head in his hand. He reached out to caress one freckled cheek with his thumb, then tucked a stray lock of hair behind her ear. "I've had a few nicknames in my time. None of which I want to hear from these lips. "You know, I've been thinking about something. You have a nickname for me, but I don't have one for you. Well, outside of calling you C-Sec, and I can't really call you that now you've quit." The smile turned, one corner of her mouth lifting as her eyes sparkled with teasing. "That hardly seems fair."

His heart began to pound against his spine at the heat in her stare. Garrus stretched out on his side, the grass cool and lush against the bare plates of his torso as he cradled his head in his hand. He reached out to caress one freckled cheek with his thumb, then tucked a stray lock of hair behind her ear. "I've had a few nicknames in my time. None of which I want to hear from these lips. "You know, I've been thinking about something. You have a nickname for me, but I don't have one for you. Well, outside of calling you C-Sec, and I can't really call you that now you've quit." The smile turned, one corner of her mouth lifting as her eyes sparkled with teasing. "That hardly seems fair."

His heart began to pound against his spine at the heat in her stare. Garrus stretched out on his side, the grass cool and lush against the bare plates of his torso as he cradled his head in his hand. He reached out to caress one freckled cheek with his thumb, then tucked a stray lock of hair behind her ear. "I've had a few nicknames in my time. None of which I want to hear from these lips. "You know, I've been thinking about something. You have a nickname for me, but I don't have one for you. Well, outside of calling you C-Sec, and I can't really call you that now you've quit." The smile turned, one corner of her mouth lifting as her eyes sparkled with teasing. "That hardly seems fair."

His grin widened. "You don't have any competition, Kahri. Not on any level." He laughed, the lightness of her mood infectious. All the old fear and hesitancy had fled, leaving her so wonderfully free. He closed his eyes, allowing contentment and love to saturate every particle of his being.

The grass next to him rustled, and he sensed the presence of a stalking predator. Inhaling, he drew in a deep breath of the sun-warmed perfume of her. Hot strands of silk brushed his skin, tickling along his keel, then the moist caress of her lips tugged at his mouth. "Please," she whispered, kissing along his mandible until she reached his aural canal. "I promise by the holy light of the Enkindlers to make it worth your while." She pushed on his shoulder, rolling him over onto his "Ow, mind the fringe." Grumbling despite his now wide grin, he sighed and adjusted his folded tunic to support his neck. "Fine, as long as you leave the Father of Light out of this." He paused just long enough to make her wriggle impatiently before he said, "Ridgefield called me Rookie."

Shepard nipped him, her flat teeth scraping the back wing of his mandible. He shuddered, a shockwave of pleasure rolling down his entire body as she said, her breath warm on his hide, "That's not fair. I know that one." She half-leaned against his side, her arm resting across him, just beneath his keel. Leaning down, she rested her chin on his chest. "Come on, tell me something real."

His sigh erupted with perfect melodrama and just the right mix of indulgence and sorrow. "Fine. When I was a boy, my father called me Betru." The old name sparked a small burst of warmth. He hadn't thought about those days in a long time. The endless drilling with rifles . . . that he recalled with excruciating clarity, but the affectionate name . . . he'd forgotten.

Shepard perked up at that. "What does it mean?" Those keen, brilliant eyes stared into his, her joy at being allowed into his past palpable.

He stroked his talons through her hair. "It's the common name of a raptor that lives in the highland forests on Palaven. Their eyesight is so keen that they hunt even through the thick forest canopy." He tucked his off-side arm under his fringe to pillow his head a little. "Pari started teaching me to shoot a sniper rifle even before I was big enough to hold it properly."

"And you hated it because you wanted to be perfect, and you probably couldn't hit the broadside of a barn like that." She rolled onto her hands and knees and crawled up until she stared straight down into his face. "My wonderful perfectionist wanting so badly to make his pari proud."

For a moment, Garrus thought his heart would punch a hole straight through his chest. He reached up, tracing the lines of her face with gentle talons. "You're so beautiful," he whispered.

She bent down to kiss him, her elbows leaning on his shoulders as her lips moved over his mouth, their tongues teasing gently, hers darting away like a preteril dashing into its burrow as soon as he tried to capture it. Her hands pressed his mandibles gently into his face, allowing him to get enough suction to trap it. The kiss deepened, Shepard arching into him, her breathing fast and deep. Giving up the coy pretense, her tongue caressed and clicked, making love to his with a new, wanton eagerness.

Heart pounding, a building—but not unpleasant—pressure behind his plates, he pulled her down into him, needing to feel her against every centimetre. Her clothes suddenly drew his ire. Too much cloth between his hands and her skin. He needed to feel it against his, to trace the map of scars as if acknowledging them could somehow heal them. Sliding his hand down her back, he tugged at the hem of her uniform, pulling it loose of her trousers. He meant to slip his hand under it, wanting to run the tips of his talons down the nubs of her spine and trace the sharp angle of her shoulder blade, but instead, she pulled away.

"Mmm." She rubbed the cool tip of her nose against his when they broke the kiss, coming up for air. "Why haven't I spent the last month telling you that I love you every chance I got?" She sat up, curling her legs under her. Smiling down at him, she leaned on one hand while the other traced lazy trails along the edges of his chest plates.

"I've known." He laid his hand on her waist. "And I think you knew long before I told you." He shifted a little, his fringe kinked under his head. He watched the wheels turn behind her eyes.
"Hmm," she muttered, tapping her lip with a fingertip. "I'm slow, but I started to get an inkling eventually. It's a bit easier to nail down when I realized that what I felt for the big, hot-headed dummy at my back wasn't just friendship and respect." She reached down, grabbed the hem of her uniform and swept it up over her head in a single, fluid move. Folding it, she leaned forward, her breasts brushing his chest as she settled her uniform under his head. "Better?" she asked, sitting up.

After sorting it a bit, he nodded. "Much, but now you're left with just that harness thing." He stifled his smile, loving watching her expressions shift, the subtle variance from moment to moment. Shadows of clouds on the grass, they moved over the surface, changing constantly, if just the tiniest bit. She said so much without speaking a single word. He slipped a talon under the edge of the material, running it along the border, the swell of her breast soft and warm under his first knuckle. As he watched her eyes the whole time, he didn't see any fear or hesitation, just trust and love.

She swung a leg over him to straddle his stomach and braced the heels of her hands against his chest, staring down into his eyes. "Well, there's a solution to that, isn't there?" Reaching behind her, she unclipped it and let it slide down her arms. Her smile turned a little self-conscious as she revealed herself to him, but she kept her eyes fixed on his.

He encircled her hips with his hands and just looked up at her, her pale skin almost seeming to glow in the sunlight, her hair a bronze halo of curls around her face. Stroking her stomach with his thumbs, he waited for her to relax into him again. Her thighs gripped his waist with steel rigidity, betraying all the nerves and insecurities she didn't want to let him see. Once she settled back a little, he slid his hands up her sides, still caressing her, exploring slowly and gently.

His eyes never leaving hers, he swept his thumbs over the lower swell of her breasts. Smiling, she closed her eyes, her head tilting as if she were focusing on his touch. Bucking his hips a little to get some momentum, he sat up. Lifting Shepard, he settled her on his lap as he crossed his legs.

"Do you trust me?" he asked, leaning in to nuzzle her cheek. Spirits, she smelled so good, all traces of the soldier gone. Just sun-warmed skin, floral, and spice ... just her. He loved the soldier, how tough and talented she was ... how she turned battle into a dance as she strode through, seeming three metres tall and invincible. But the woman ... so many layers and mysteries, gifts and surprises made up the woman, he knew he could spend a lifetime discovering only a portion of them. "Do you trust me, Shepard?" he asked again.

"With everything," she whispered, not opening her eyes.

He slipped his arms around behind her. "Lay back, just let yourself go." He laid her back. "Let your arms and head hang. I've got you." Watching her, he admired the courage it took to wage the conflict he saw going on beneath her skin. Her heart said trust, her mind said trust but didn't quite believe it could, and her body just refused to believe that it could be safe exposed, open and relaxed. In the end, her heart won, and she leaned back against the cradle of his arms, her lower legs wrapping around him.

Massaging the back of her neck with firm, gentle talons, he sat quietly, content to wait as long as she needed to wrestle down the last of the fear. She relaxed into him slowly, head lolling back, arms dropping to the side. Wrestling back the tightness in his throat, he smiled. A praela indeed.

"You're the bravest person I've ever met," he whispered, easing her back a little. He smiled when she didn't reply, just relaxing a little more, her breathing finally slowing and growing deeper with each inhalation. Over the next five minutes he just laid her back, massaging her gently. "Where are you?" he asked when he cradled all her weight in his arms.
"Right here, with you," she answered, her voice soft and dreamy. "I've always loved the way you hold me. I feel safer in your arms than I've felt anywhere in a long time."

He leaned down to nuzzle the base of her neck, the ribbons of scar tissue that covered almost every centimetre from her chin to the waist of her trousers felt like satin cords against the upper plate of his mouth. He wished he could go back in time to erase them for her, but supposed he'd have to settle for helping heal them. "You'll always be safe with me, Shepard."

Out of the clear sky, thunder rolled across the land, one booming roar after another. Shepard stiffened and sat up.

"Garrus? What's going on?"

His eyes opened, blinking at the near complete darkness as he tried to figure out what happened to the sun. His arms felt strange … barren and empty without Shepard's slight weight laying in them. Where had she gone?

In the end, smells reoriented him, working their way through the dream. The fresh summer breeze, sun-warmed grass, and Shepard vanished before the onslaught of citrus-scented cleaning fluid, stale food odours, and his father.

A low, disappointed sigh struggled out of his throat, warbling a little as sorrow strangled his vocal chords.

"Someone is pounding at the door," his father said, his voice gruff and sleepy. "That's what woke you up." Herros rolled over and pulled the blankets up to his fringe.

"Okay." Garrus threw back the blankets, swatting at them when they tangled around his feet. Whomever it was, they'd better be bleeding to death, or running to get help for someone who was bleeding to death. Even then, he might just make them pay for snatching him out of Shepard's arms.

Finally free of his argumentative bed linens, he grabbed his sidearm off the nightstand and stalked to the door. "What is it?"

"It's Lantar Sidonis. We met a couple of days ago," a turian voice called back. Garrus's internal alarm began to shriek, but he packed it down and palmed the door. "What can I do for you?" he asked.

The turian gave him an apologetic shrug. "Sorry to wake you." He glanced past Garrus to the bed, his eyes snapping back to Garrus's face when the general stepped in front of him. "Urdnot Wrex sent me. Nihlus is wasted and refuses to leave Afterlife."

Garrus raised his brow plates. "And Wrex can't just toss a drunk turian over his shoulder and haul him home?"

Sidonis shrugged. "Nihlus started waving his shotgun around in the bar. We're lucky no one took the bait, or we'd probably still be getting our asses beaten. Wrex tried to get him out, but Nihlus threatened to shoot him. We tricked him into a side room, kicked everyone out, and Wrex is guarding the door. He said to take the car, and come to get you." Sidonis backed up a step, his subvocals rumbling his worry that he had stepped into the middle of something he shouldn't have. "Wrex tried your radio, but you didn't answer. So here I am."

Garrus cursed, imagining all the shit Nihlus could get himself into. "Does he have Aria's attention?" Dread stabbed him with shards of ice only to have anger at Nihlus's stupidity melt them into steam.

Sidonis chuffed. "Can't see how he could have avoided it, but she let us handle it."

Garrus shoved aside both the worry and annoyance. "Okay, give me a minute." He stepped back from the door, letting it shut, and headed straight for his armour.

His father shifted on the bed, his voice still grumpy and rough as he asked, "Do you want me to go along?"

Garrus unfastened his robe and pulled it off, trading it for his under armour. "Thanks, Pari, but no. I'm sure the three of us can wrestle Nihlus to a car and drag him back here." He sighed, a grumble tumbling out hot on its heels. "I hope this isn't going to become a nightly occurrence. At least last night, they were able to convince him to come back." He zipped up his underlayer and started sealing his armour into place. "I thought that if he was given something to focus on, he'd do better."

"Give him time," Herros said, less grumpy and more reasonable as he woke. "It's been a week. Let him grieve for a while yet. If you have to drag him home a few times, you do."

Shame at his impatience scalded under Garrus's plates. "Yeah, I guess." He snapped the two halves of the girdle together, then started armouring up his legs before lifting the torso section into place. In under five minutes, he was suited up and ready to go.

"If we're not back in an hour, send in the parsophin" he said as he hung his sidearm from his hip. He didn't dare take anything more powerful on the chance that Nihlus had Aria's guards riled up. He harboured no desire to start a small war.

Herros chuckled. "I will. Be careful."

Garrus smiled and headed to the door. "I will." He palmed the control and strode straight past Sidonis, who was leaning against the wall. "Let's go." He let out a grumbling sigh. "I was having a really good dream."

The pair didn't speak on their way to the car, Garrus content to let the other torin drive. Lifting off, Sidonis manoeuvred the car through the buildings with the deft skill of someone long used to Omega.

Throughout the first ten minutes of the trip, Sidonis kept looking over at Garrus, making him squirm a little in his seat. Finally, Garrus ceased his in depth study of the front viewport and turned to meet one of the glances. "What? If you've got something to say, just say it."

Sidonis's mandibles dropped and pulled tight against his face. "Sorry, it's just … all your people call you general. Don't get me wrong, you've got the stern authority thing in spades, but you seem pretty young to be a general."

Garrus nodded. "If I'd stayed with external forces, I might be a captain by now." He chuffed. "I left the military because I didn't want to spend my life fighting wars, killing people. Joined C-Sec mostly out of a sense of duty, wanting to make my father proud, but it wasn't my choice of profession either." His turn to glance across the car. Why was he telling this complete stranger his life story?

"And now you're a general in a private army?" Sidonis chuckled. "Sounds like you're running in the wrong direction for a torin looking to escape battle."
Garrus nodded. "So it would seem, but there's a very real threat coming, and I made a promise to get the galaxy as prepared to face it as possible."

Sidonis nodded, and a good two minutes passed before he started glancing over again. "So, Nihlus and Shepard were together?" the other turian asked just as Garrus sucked in a breath to tell him off. "He's really torn up about her death. They must have been something."

Garrus let out the breath and shook his head, keeping his voice as flat as he could manage. "They weren't together."

He could see that took Sidonis by surprise, so he could guess what Nihlus had been doing at the bar. Hopefully, Nihlus hadn't spewed any sensitive intel.

Sidonis shrugged. "When my sister died, I was a lot like Nihlus." He chuffed and shrugged again, almost a hiccup of movement that clearly said he hadn't moved past the pain.

"How long has it been?" Garrus asked. His thoughts gravitated to Sol and his ailing mother. Damn, he needed to get back home for a few days.

"A cycle. Well, a cycle on Omega anyway." Again, that slight, spastic shrug. "Gangs got her. Don't know which one, probably Blood Pack. They just grab females off the street." A laugh so filled with rage that it came out sharper than a scalpel, sliced the air between them. "Not just females. Heard of others." A hard, demanding stare pinned Garrus with the rage and fear behind it. "Is your army going to be one more thing the people on this rock have to survive, General?"

After a second of hesitation, Garrus reached out to lay a hand on the torin's shoulder. "No, Sidonis. In fact, within the next year, I intend to have the gangs all but driven off this rock." A firm nod met Sidonis's skeptical frown. "You could help with that if you had the mind to."

They finished the rest of the drive in silence.

They got out of the car half a block from the front door, the thumping, disjointed rhythms of the music hitting him like a giant, padded fist.

"Damn, that's loud," he called over the racket, just barely resisting the urge to clap his hands over his aural canals. "How are the people inside not deaf?" Losing the battle, he covered one side of his head, his tympanic membrane begging for mercy with sharp, stabbing cries.

Sidonis laughed, this one lighter than the last, but still angry. "It's no worse inside. Aria pipes it out here to keep the people trapped in line mollified." He stopped and turned to stare at Garrus for a long few seconds, his gaze searching for something. Seeming to find it, he frowned. "You're trying to hide it, but you're as messed up as Nihlus." A decisive nod seemed to congratulate himself on his deduction. "My father would like you. You're obviously a very good turian. Still, I can see you're in a lot of pain."

Where had that come from? Uncomfortable, Garrus brushed past, avoiding the correct, but inappropriate observation. Turians didn't draw attention to one another's weaknesses as a rule.

"Sorry," Sidonis called, hurrying to catch up. "I'm sorry, I shouldn't have just blurted that out. I see things. Most of the time, I don't show the good sense to just shut up about them." He shrugged. "My sister always said it would be considered a gift if I could just keep my mouth shut."

Garrus just set his jaw against a testy reply and strode for the line at the door. "Are we going to have to wait here?"
Sidonis trotted after him. "No. Aria knows I work for Mordin. She likes him, which gets us past the goons at the door." Sidonis strode up the line, nodding to a batarian bouncer as he passed.

Dim and grungy, like the rest of Omega, the long tunnel entrance into the bar flickered orange and red with holographic flame. Whose afterlife was this place? His people's mythology spoke of a realm set aside for those who died dishonourably, but if he recalled his tutor correctly, it was cold and dank. As far as he knew, asari didn't believe in any sort of buratrum. In fact, as far as he knew, only a couple of the human religions believed in a flaming realm of eternal punishment. It said a great deal about Omega that the concept of hell seemed the most fitting theme for Aria's club.

Garrus stepped through the inner doors to Afterlife and stopped, letting Sidonis walk ahead. People packed the place, some dancing, most standing around in small groups tossing back overpriced alcohol. Foggy smoke hung like a cloud layer just above Garrus's head-level. Anyone who expected people to take care of the air somewhere so reliant on a small supply of it would have been disappointed. As would anyone who expected the air recyclers to actually clear the smoke away. He ducked down a little as he pushed into the crowd. He didn't begrudge others their bad habits, spirits knew he had one or two, but he didn't enjoy smoke inhalation.

Grateful not to see nor hear Nihlus, he weaved his way to the side room. A turian with muddy brown famila notas intercepted him halfway across the floor.

"Aria wants to speak with you," the turian yelled over the cacophony of music, conversations, and noise.

Garrus glanced up at the queen's throne then shook his head. "It's three in the morning. I'm just here to pick up a friend. Another time."

The turian stared him down, neither moving nor speaking until Garrus tried to step around him at which point, he merely sidestepped to place himself back in his path.

"Do you have a name?" Garrus called.

"Name's Grizz." The turian tilted his chin up, trying to look proud and arrogant, but the rest of his posture stayed slumped and defeated, spoiling the effect.

"Really?" Garrus chuckled. "Your parents give you that name?" He shook his head and tried to step around him. "I'll just take my friend and go." When Grizz just stepped in front of him again, he sighed. "Fine, in the spirit of getting to return to my bed at some point tonight, lead on."

Grizz nodded with an expression that said Garrus would have gotten home to bed faster without arguing, turned and made his way through the throng.

Garrus followed, noting the ridiculous number of guards lurking about. Aria could take out a decent squad singlehandedly if the reports were accurate. The guards had to be for show. They climbed two flights of stairs to come face to face with the pirate queen on her throne.

Aria sat easily, smug and aloof, one leg crossed over the other, her hands resting in her lap. Both her smile and head cocked to one side. "General Vakarian, thank you for deigning to speak with me."

Garrus raised a brow plate. "What can I do for you, Aria? I came to take my people home." Odd, but he didn't feel much of anything when faced with Aria in the flesh. At least as a concept, a threat looming out in the ether, she'd made him nervous, but just then … nothing.

She nodded and shifted a little. "Yes, poor Nihlus. He's taking Shepard's death particularly hard."
Funny, but the last time you were here, I thought the two of you were together." Another sly smile crawled across her lips as she stared into his eyes. "She looked at you with such …." The smile faded. "Ah."

Forcing his entire body into a stoney, stoic mirror, Garrus cocked a hip and crossed his arms. "Can I help you with something, Aria, or can I take my people home?" He watched her, getting almost nothing back from her other than haughty disdain, although she did seem genuinely sorry about Shepard. Maybe his fiery little praela had made herself a better friend than she'd thought.

Aria stood and turned to look out over the club. "You want to build an army here. I think that warrants keeping an eye on you." Her shoulders twitched a little, unconscious shrugs that made him smile. Not nearly as casual as she wanted to appear.

"I harbour no desire to run Omega, Aria. Omega suits our purpose. Leave us alone, and we'll leave you alone." He held himself still despite the urge to twitch and a growing itch behind his right mandible.

"I know what Shepard thought was coming," she said, spinning around to face him. "Was she delusional? Was that dreadnought just a geth tool, or was it alive?"

"Nazara was a Reaper, a living machine, and just the vanguard of an army of them." He hesitated, uncertainty tangling up in his guts. Should he lay it all out? Chances were that Aria knew it all anyway and was just testing to see how cooperative he intended to be. "Thousands of those things are trying to find a way back into the galaxy from dark space."

Her chin tilted back up, but her throat convulsed a little, showing fear. Good, maybe she wasn't quite the horror that he believed. Maybe a spark of decency still hadn't been completely suffocated in the vacuum of her spirit. "They wiped out the Protheans?" she asked, shoring up her wall of inscrutability.

He wondered if she was playing him, then realized he was too tired to give a crap. Let her. "They did, and every galactic civilization back millions of cycles." Straightening, he said, "We're here to prepare for them, not to depose you. I will, however, give you fair warning. I intend to wipe out the merc bands. Blood Pack, Eclipse, Blue Suns … they're all going down."

A twisted little smile told him what her words confirmed a moment later. "Do try to be entertaining, we get so little good theatre on Omega." Sitting back on her bench, she neatly crossed her legs and tucked her hands into her lap. "I'll look forward to the increase in weapon sales."

He chuckled, a charged, electric rumble. "Make sure to sell them the good stuff. I can't be bothered to loot the corpses for crap."

A genuine smile greeted that. "I think we understand one another, General."

Ice and steel reflected it back. "I don't think we'll ever understand one another, Aria, but a civil detente will do." He tilted his head. "Good night." He turned away from her crooked smile, knowing that she believed she'd gotten to him.

"The council has eyes watching you, even now," she called after him, her tone one of mixed sadistic curiosity and satisfaction. "How long do you think they'll leave you alone?"

He just kept going. She could believe that she'd gotten to him. He had no time or patience for games, and Aria T'Loak was the least of his problems. Movement from the bottom of the first flight of stairs grabbed his attention as a familiar face got up from a table. The merc from Donovan Hock's mansion fell in behind Garrus, following him down to the club floor.

"Heard you talkin' up there," the scarred man said from behind Garrus's shoulder. "You think you're going to take down the Suns, do you?"

Garrus didn't look back as he weaved through the crowd. "I am, along with any other gang that preys on Omega's residents." Stopping just before he reached the access to the side room, he turned to face the other man and said, "Massani, right?"

"Yeah, what's it to you?" The merc leered at him, his one milky, blue eye accentuating the expression into something that he seemed to believe should be intimidating. Massani puffed out his chest, bristling as if he expected Garrus to challenge him.

"If you're interested in helping that process along, maybe earning a respectable living, head over to Kima district one of these days." With that he continued down to the door. As much as he didn't want to bring personal grudges into the fold, he respected that Massani hadn't had to help Hock's victims, but did. Nor had he asked for payment, even though he gladly accepted what Shepard offered. Either way, he might just make a solid addition to the core group.

"Garrus," Wrex greeted, his voice low but carrying. He stood on the left hand side of the door, his shotgun in his hand, but hanging next to his leg. "Be careful in there. Nihlus … ." The krogan shrugged his massive shoulders, the simple gesture filling Garrus with dread. Wrex seldom seemed at a loss, tackling things with nothing more than bravado and violence if he needed to.

"He's lost it, Garrus," Martin chimed in. "He's just sitting there, staring at … ." Shaking his head he jerked a thumb behind him toward the door. "Maybe it's best if you see for yourself."

A quick nod and he pushed past them, palming the door. He stepped through, needing a moment for his eyes to adjust to the dim light. Nihlus sat in the corner under a table, his back pressed against the wall. The orange glow of his omnitool made the white sweeps of his familia notas reflect like flames against the deep red of his hide. The Spectre's shotgun sat on the floor next to his leg, within easy reach.

"Nihlus?" Garrus took a step toward the other torin, leaning down a little. His mandibles pulled in tight and brow plates dropped in a worried scowl when Nihlus showed no sign of knowing Garrus was even there. "What's going on?"

Voices came from the omnitool, drawing Garrus's attention to the small vidscreen open above Nihlus's arm. It took a second, the volume was so loud that it distorted Nihlus and Anderson's voices, but then the conversation registered.

"I need to contact the Alliance parliament and ask them to send extra security personnel to cover Udina," Anderson said.

Icy talons scratched their way down Garrus's carapace, claws ripping furrows through the cartilage as he placed the conversation. "Nihlus, what are you doing?" he asked, his voice barely making it out through the constriction closing his throat.

"The council is usually guarded by a multiracial force assigned from C-Sec with Spectres stepping in for high profile events or where security is particularly risky," Nihlus replied. "They probably won't be happy about Alliance personnel."

Garrus heard his voice in the background, but talked over the reply, trying to drown it out. "Nihlus, shut it off. Is this what you've been spending your time doing? Torturing yourself with your hardsuit recording."

"This is it, right here," the Spectre said, pointing a trembling talon at the vid. "When the civilians get off the elevator, I should have stepped up to block her." He keened long and offkey. "There it is, the moment I could have saved her." Slumping against the wall, he let his hand drop. "I've killed her more than a hundred times since that alley. Every time that fucking moment mocks me." He groped for his weapon, pulling the compact shotgun into his lap. "Every time she just dies again, because I wasn't paying attention to the only thing ... the only being in the whole fucking galaxy I loved."

Garrus approached slowly, keeping his eyes on Nihlus's weapon. The energy coming off the Spectre grated against his nerves like a metal file ... it screamed of desperation, warning him of how close the Spectre was to doing something to make everything so much worse. "Nihlus, we can never save her. That moment has come and gone." A soft keen broke free, and he reached up, raking his talons over his fringe, trying to blink the tears from his eyes. "But, if you do what I think you want to do ... you will break us. All of us."

Two more impossibly slow, careful steps carried him a half-metre closer. Crouching down, Garrus reached out a hand. "Nihlus, give me the gun, and let's go home. This is no place for a Spectre."

Nihlus looked up at him, his gaze unfocused and wandering. "You think I want to kill myself, Vakarian?" He laughed, a sharp belch of rage and bitter humour. "She'd kicked my ass if I showed up because I ate a bullet." He held up his gun, staring at it with a longing that belied his words. "I want to, but I can't. I'd give anything to see her again, but not that way."

Garrus relaxed a little, grateful for that small piece of awareness. "Erase that recording, Nihlus, and let's go home."

"Home?" The Spectre frowned at the word, repeating it over softly as if tasting it. "Is that what we're doing, Vakarian?"

Garrus held out his hand. "Come on. Shepard doesn't want this for you. She expects better ... the proud Spectre fighting to save the galaxy." He shrugged. "That was the torin she loved."

Nihlus's frown deepened, but he took hold of Garrus's hand and allowed him to help him up onto his feet.

They didn't speak as they left the room, Wrex and Butler taking the lead to clear a path, Martin and Sidonis falling in behind. Outside the bar, the music sliced into Garrus's head again. Was it actually louder outside or just seem so because of the absence of bar racket?

Nihlus stopped near the end of the line and turned his unsteady stare on Garrus. "At her memorial, you said I was your fratin."

"I could have," the Spectre whispered, just audible over the music. "I couldn't have denied her anything, even you."

"I could have," the Spectre whispered, just audible over the music. "I couldn't have denied her anything, even you."

Garrus scowled at Nihlus and tugged him along. "Let's just get home before someone decides to "Shoot your drunken ass." He hoisted the torin up his shoulder a little further trying to redistribute his weight.

"Thanks for your help," Garrus said to Sidonis and Butler when they arrived at the cab stand. He poured Nihlus into the passenger seat and turned to shake their hands.

Sidonis spoke for them both. "Glad to help."

Garrus got into the cab and quickly set their destination before he glanced over at Nihlus. "If you're going to throw up, yell so I can land."

The Spectre grumbled and gave Garrus a belligerent scowl, but made the trip without befouling the car.

When they landed just outside the front door, it took both Garrus and Wrex to get Nihlus out of the cab and half-carry, half-drag him inside and up the stairs.

"Here," Garrus said, nodding toward his door. "This is as far as I'm willing to drag him. He can sleep it off on the couch." He palmed the door, taking more of Nihlus's weight so Wrex could let go. "Thanks for watching out for Nihlus. I'll see you two in the morning." He watched them head into the back hallway, then turned into the peaceful darkness.

"Why aren't you lying on a floor somewhere, Vakarian?" Nihlus asked as they crossed over the threshold. He pulled away, supporting his own weight on wobbling legs, his tone suddenly so even that it sent a shiver up Garrus's spur. "Why aren't you going over and over her last words until you have to drink them out of your skull? Did you even love her?"

Garrus swallowed the small asteroid that Nihlus's words lodged in his throat. A sigh, long and trembling with a keen he refused to let escape, forced its way up as the blockage cleared. He stared back at the Spectre. "You think that alley doesn't play over and over in the back of my mind until I think that it'll drive me mad, Nihlus? Every single thought, every single word I say over the course of a day has to fight its way through those moments." He pulled back, suddenly needing to focus all his will into not burying his fist in the Spectre's gut. "I had my arm around her when he killed her." A throaty keen made it out before he beat it back. "Do you know what that feels like, Nihlus? I had my arm wrapped around the woman I intended to spend the rest of my life with when she was murdered. And I did nothing to stop it."

He fought back the urge to dump Nihlus in his own room and guided the Spectre toward the coffee table, sitting him down. Who knew what the torin would do if left on his own. Aspirate on his own vomit more than likely. Garrus sat next to him. "Look, you loved her, and you knew she loved you, but you never got a chance to hold her the way I did. I'm not trying to take away how much that sucks, Nihlus. I know it hurts like hell. I knew her three months, and already I couldn't breathe if I didn't see her for a couple of hours."

Nihlus tipped off the seat, landing on his side. After a second or two of looking around as if trying to figure out how he ended up on the floor, he leaned up on his elbow, swaying unevenly. "How can you be … so … that?" He tossed a dismissive gesture at Garrus. "Soulless stone." He belched, and for a moment, Garrus thought the Spectre would introduce him to the last litre of brandy he'd tossed back, but Nihlus swallowed it. "I'm empty," he spat the words, along with a healthy cloud of noxious stomach contents and alcohol fumes.

The stench sent Garrus's stomach rolling, but years of practice forced the reaction aside. One didn't spend long in C-Sec without becoming very familiar with vomit and the associated stink.
Garrus stared at Nihlus for a moment, then shook his head. "How have you managed to do and see as much as you have and still be such a complete dumbass, Nihlus?" The Spectre let out a belligerent belch and started trying to shove himself up off the floor, but Garrus waved him off. "Don't pull anything." Sighing, he dragged the back cushions off the couch. It took him a bit to find a couple of extra blankets and a pillow in the bathroom cupboard, but then he made up a bed on the leather. "Come on, get up here before you pass out and have to spend the night on the floor."

Offering a hand, he levered Nihlus up off the floor and over onto the couch. Once he managed to throw the Spectre's feet up onto the cushions, he grabbed another blanket and spread it over him. "Are you going to throw up?" He leaned down, trying to see through the hazy fog of booze to Nihlus's actual state of being. Not possible. "You're not even going to be able to find the head, are you?"

Sighing, he headed downstairs, and rooted through cupboards until he found a container big enough, then returned upstairs and set it at Nihlus's head. "If you need to throw up, do it in the basin, please."

"How do you do it, Vakarian?" Nihlus asked, his voice a slurred whisper.

Starting to feel like every other breath was a sigh, Garrus sat on the edge of the coffee table. "How do I do what, Nihlus?"

One tearing, unfocused eye stared up at him from the pillow. "Keep breathing."

Garrus let out a huff of breath, deflating a little. His armour cut into him, reminding him that he wore it. "I do what she wanted me to do, Nihlus," he replied as he removed his gauntlets. He shook his head and shrugged a little. "Sometimes when I'm planning or working, I'll swear that she's right beside me, pointing something out that I've missed or whispering suggestions to me. And when that happens, I feel peace. It's not much, but it's better than nothing." He removed the torso section and set it behind him on the other couch. Leaning forward, he rested his forearms on his thighs. "She's only gone if we forget her."

Head cocked off to the side a little, he met Nihlus's stare. "Do you want to forget her, Nihlus? Do you want to forget the way she couldn't laugh without that mischievous glint in her eye, or the way her lips felt against your hide?" It took a bit to swallow, but then he shook his head and leaned closer. "You asked me if I could have shared her love, but it was a stupid question, Nihlus. You know I already did."

Nihlus stared back, brow plates drawing together, his mandible fluttering in and out a little. After a moment, he nodded. "Yeah, you did, and with a lot more class than me."

Garrus resisted the urge to agree with that and peeled off his gloves, staring at the palm of his hand for several heartbeats. "She's dead, Nihlus, but she's not gone. Between us, we can keep her alive." An ironic chuckle escaped as he pressed a talon into the pad of softer flesh at the base of his thumb talon. Watching the bead of indigo grow against the steel of his hide, he shook his head. "Never thought of myself as the sort to do this, but … adapt and grow, right?"

Holding out his hand, he pinned Nihlus with a frank stare. "We'll swear this, become brothers for her. We'll work to keep her alive and with us, and find a way for you to discover joy in carrying on in her name."

Nihlus wrestled himself up onto his elbow, his face frozen in an expression of surprise, but something grateful and lonely dwelled beneath it. "Brothers?" His mandibles dropped. "Both bonded to a dead woman." A bitter laugh rattled out of him. "Fitting, I suppose." He grumbled, heavy on the subvocals, then started a small war with his glove that Garrus thought for a good minute that he'd lose.

Finally wrestling it off his talons, Nihlus pressed a talon point into the same spot and gripped Garrus's hand, talons laced. "Until and beyond death," he said, his voice low, solemn, and almost sober sounding.

"Until and beyond death," Garrus repeated. "Get some sleep, and don't forget to use the basin if you're sick." He released Nihlus's hand and stood, not letting himself examine what he'd just done too closely. Retiring to the head to finish getting out of his armour and back into his robe, his mind wandered to what Aria had told him about the council having eyes placed everywhere to watch them.

"Let them watch," he grumbled to his reflection in the mirror. Bracing his hands on the edge of the counter, he stared over the sink into his own eyes, searching to see what Shepard had seen … what they all seemed to see. Was there a general in there, or just a pretend? "We'll just have to be ready if they move against us," he said, testing it out. Despite the bravado of his words, his heart thumped sluggish and cold in his chest. Could they be ready to take on the forces the council could muster? "Guess we'll have to be." He shoved himself away from the sink, still not sure he saw anyone of note looking back, then palmed the light.

He almost returned to his bed, but then found himself walking out the door and down the stairs. Before he knew it, he stood on the bridge, looking up through the narrow gap between buildings to the dark bulk of the asteroid. "You left me with a hell of lot to do," he whispered to the silent district. Not even the sound of skycars permeated the heavy, fetid silence. He drew a breath, his sinuses burning with industrial cleaning fluid and the lingering smell of burning corpses.

"I don't know if I can do this, Shepard." He winced a little, his mandibles spreading to flick once at the lie. He knew he could do it. Well, the war part anyway. Trying to keep Nihlus from self-destructing was something else entirely.

"I don't want to do this without you." The truth came out softer, drifting and fluttering in the still, stale air. "Nihlus is in bad shape, Shepard. I swore karifratus with him tonight. He feels alone in the galaxy. I thought it might help with that. You'd probably kick my ass for doing it. Not sure how you'd feel about the oath." He let out a long breath. "It means something to turians though."

A lonely skycar flew overhead between the buildings. He watched it in silence until the lights vanished from sight. "Martin's here. He insisted on coming. That kid is almost as stubborn as you." He chuckled and turned, boosting himself up to sit on a crate. "He's impressed me, Shepard. He's got guts, good instincts ... he'll find a place here, so don't worry about him. I'll keep him safe like I promised I would."

"Martin reminds me a little of someone else," the deep, familiar voice of his father said. Garrus moved to jump down, but his father waved for him to stay where he was. "You always had good instincts, Garrus. You were always pointed in the right direction."

Garrus chuckled at the irony of having travelled so far to get hit with one of his father's oldest lectures. "Just taking the wrong path to get there," he grumbled under his breath.

Herros laughed and hopped up to sit next to him. "As much as I hate to let the old rhetoric die: no, not for a while now. Shepard ... she cleared things up for you, allowed you to see through all the nonsense that our little dramas seeded in your head." He let out a long, slow breath that laced a purring sound through his subvocals. "Your mother ... she's always known you'd figure things out. She's always trusted the universe, while I was afraid it would smash you to pieces. I should have seen how strong you are." He chuckled again, his subvocals soft, devoted and loving. "She's going to love my admitting that she's always been right."

Garrus glanced to his right, his gaze brushing the side of his father's head before returning to the long void of Omega filth. "She'll be glad to have you home if you go through with this retirement plan."

Herros shook his head. "Either that or kill me within the first week." Bracing his hands against the edge of the crate, he leaned forward, head tilted up to the narrow streaks of moving lights high above. "I can't say I'm excited about going into politics, but it's where I'm needed. We're a people mired in tradition, Garrus. It's not going to be easy to convince the Hierarchy or the military that there's an enemy coming that we can't fight using our tried and true methods."

Garrus nodded, not pointing out the understatement in his father's words. "Are there any who give you cause to hope?" He watched Herros out of the corner of his eye, noting the way his father's mandibles worked slowly in and out almost like bellows.

After a pause so long that Garrus gave up on getting an answer, Herros cleared his throat. "There are a few of the younger generation who will be my first attempts. Your sister will be the first."

Garrus felt a twinge of guilt. He'd intended to take Shepard home, to spend some time with his mother and Solana. After Shepard died, he hadn't even called. He'd have to remedy that as soon as he saw everyone off the next day. "I wouldn't underestimate Mother's abilities in the persuasion skill set either. She's talked me into a great many things over the cycles." Garrus chuckled.

"She has her ways, but … ." Herros let the sentence die out, then slid down to walk over to the railing. "You've done a very impressive job over the last couple of days, Garrus." He turned to look Garrus in the eyes. "I'm grateful you joined Shepard's team for a lot of reasons, but mostly because... she gave me back my son." He stepped forward to pat Garrus's knee. "I'm headed back to bed.
Try not to bounce around too much when you come in."

A soft, dry laugh answered that. "No, sir. I'll be careful not to wake you. Rest well."

"And you, once you're finished saying your other goodnight." He turned back. "Oh, and Garrus …
I'm proud of what you did tonight with Nihlus."

Garrus smiled and nodded, then watched his father set off across the bridge toward the front door.
After a few seconds he looked back out at the void. His father's praise warmed him like a steaming cup of amarceru in cold hands. He knew it wasn't empty praise, highlighting his earlier lie. The pieces of Shepard's plan lined up inside his mind, each root and branch of the organism fitting easily into the whole. The two days of discussion and planning had proven fruitful beyond his expectations. The next day, they'd go their ways and put their parts of the plan into action. Just as Shepard knew he would, he formed the trunk of the tree, the sturdy center that unified the different parts, overseeing it all.

He didn't need to give his brain time to settle … didn't need time to worry and process. It was sorted. He was ready. Smiling, he hopped down off the crate. "Pari, wait up, I'll walk back with you." He looked out over Omega and reached up to press the backs of his talons to his forehead.
"Goodnight, Shepard. I love you." He smiled. "See you in a few minutes. We have a nickname debate to settle."

Chapter End Notes
A-N: Sorry about the wait. I've gotten guest reviews (on FFN) asking how much longer I intend to detail the events after Shepard's death. LOL Ummm... until the end of the story. I will say only that this week brings change, and I have something planned for N7 day. (My birthday. Yep, I have the best Mass Effect birthday ever.) As always, my big love to my betas and all the love to my readers. Also thanks to those who check in whether it is every chapter or every ten ... whatever. You keep me writing even when I get discouraged. Sassy and the crew owe you everything. :D
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Eight

Chapter Summary

500 days have passed since Shepard died, and things have really changed for Garrus and the war movement.

Tarin -- Female turian over the age of majority.

Ugentira -- A large warm blooded, cat-like predator native to the high mountains of Palaven. It is neither mammal or reptile, but has aspects of both. (See bottom for full description.)

Parsophin -- Ancient turian version of cavalry. Warriors rode into battle on Loraus Montum (large armoured four-legged reptile analogues that have since gone extinct due to a highly selective breeding process that effectively devastated the gene pool.)

500 Days ASD

“Tell me a story.”

Garrus tilted his chin up just far enough to meet Shepard’s eyes above the curve of her ribcage. Skating a mandible over a nipple, he half-closed his eyes, savouring the silky texture of her skin against his. “Seriously?” He lowered his face to nuzzle her sun-warmed flesh, making his way between her breasts until his tongue teased the hollow between her ribs. “Am I boring you?”

She laughed, the sound bright and sharp as it bounced off the thick wall of grass that towered above them, and stroked his fringe, moving languidly beneath his arm and against his side. “Not in the least. I didn’t say you should stop what you’re doing.”

He teased a breast with the upper plate of his mouth. “And how would you have me do both?”

Eyes closing, she arched into him a little, rolling over to lie on her side, facing him. “You’re a talented torin; you’ll figure it out.” She caressed his face with loving fingers, the warmth in her smile forcing his breathing into shallow, quick pants.

Leaning up a little, he kissed her, tongue fluttering against her bottom lip. “I can find so many better things to do with my mouth,” he whispered, his hand sliding down over her ribs to the soft hollow just above her hip bone. Every touch, every scent, every sensation … no matter how they faded in the real world, in his dreams, she remained exactly as she’d been.

His Shepard.

True, her humour didn’t bite as hard or as quick, and she didn’t rise to the highs and lows that she once had. Death had mellowed her, but her love provided the rest and shelter he sorely needed, holding him above the yawning abyss that haunted his days. Out there, a bone-deep weariness gnawed at him until some days he needed to check his reflection to be sure that it hadn’t consumed every last cell.

Turning his back on those thoughts, he stroked her skin, the sun washing out the freckles that dotted its surface. Strange how before Shepard, he’d never fantasized about humans or asari. He’d been attracted to his share of tarins, even found his way past the stumbling awkwardness with a few, but Shepard, as alien as she was … he could completely lose himself in exploring every centimetre of her over and over. He slipped his thumb talon beneath the waist of her trousers, leaning up to watch her eyes as he unfastened her belt and popped the button on her trousers.

She smiled, but it didn’t blossom past her lips, her eyes blank—almost sterile—the corners of her mouth and the delicate planes of her face flat. “Going to try to take your expedition afield, are you? Chart the unknown?” Despite the teasing words, he felt her freeze under him as he eased down the zipper. “Beyond this point, there be dragons.”

A sigh, arid and famished, wafted over her skin, and he winced, hoping she hadn’t heard it. Laying the material open, he nuzzled his way up her side, his thumb caressing just below her navel. She never moved. Damn. “You’re not still afraid?” he asked quietly, not wanting to upset her.

“No, my love, I’m not afraid,” she replied, her voice as expressionless as her face. “You are, because you know there’s nothing past this point. I’m exactly as I was when I died, Garrus. I’ll never change, never grow, never expose new ground for you to explore. All I can ever offer you along that road stops—”

“Oh, a story,” he said, his voice slicing over hers. Even as her words detonated inside his chest, shards of ice and slivers of glass tearing through him, he nodded toward a large, hardcover book lying a couple of feet away. “Do you want me to keep going with that one? We were being chased toward Bree by Ringwraiths yesterday.”

She shook her head. “I want to hear one that your mari or pari told you when you were young.” Her expression remained flat, almost sad. “I feel …” She shrugged, just a quick, helpless pop of the shoulders as she fought to find the words. “… thin, I guess. Help me feel real, Garrus.”

Leaning up, he blinked rapidly, a splinter of panic burrowing through the tough hide to lodge in his neck. He kissed her. “Okay,” he whispered, his mouth still brushing hers. He stretched out along her side, curling his arm under her neck. Smiling—one that crinkled the skin at the corners of her eyes and lips, warming him with its delight—she burrowed deeper into his side. He shook his head and nuzzled his way down her jaw. “You and your stories,” he whispered against her neck.

Closing his eyes, he tucked his face in under her ear. “A very long time ago, when turians started to move into great, fortified city-states, one rose above the others, a jewel of architecture, engineering, and art.” A rumble rolled along under his words, matching the slow, lazy sensuality of Shepard’s fingertips as they whispered along the ridge where his hide transitioned into cowl. Spirits, he loved the way she touched him.

“Cipritine?” she asked, her voice muffled as she nuzzled his temple.

“No. In fact, it stood as Cipritine’s, or Gemmarin as it was called back then, greatest rival. The other city was called Aerearis. The primarchs of the two cities had been good friends in their youth, but grew apart as they assumed greater responsibility and power. Things only became more complicated when both fell in love with the same tarin.” Smiling, he flicked just the tip of his tongue against the beat of her pulse where it thumped, restive and strong beneath the skin. “As these things usually do, the whole affair quickly dissolved into war. The way my mari told the tale, it featured heavily on the war and social cost, while my pari’s version emphasized the romance.” He shrugged and grinned. “I think Mari was trying to encourage me to treat relationships and their consequences with a degree of gravity.”

“As she should,” Shepard agreed. “Can’t tell you how many of mine led to war, famine, social upheaval … .”

“With you, I’d believe that.” A chuckle smoothed his words as he continued, “Anyway, both primarchs were great warriors and generals, but their priorities couldn’t have been more different. The primarch of Aerarís, Tunarus, desired to be remembered and exalted as a great visionary, to survive the ages in legend. He sent explorers out to discover new lands and rich new resources, leading massive armies out to conquer what land he couldn’t just claim. His city rose up the Cliffs of Laertus, the citadel high enough to be seen from Gemmarin.”

“Lots of statues, temples … that sort of thing?” Shepard asked, a brittle rind of humour crackling along the underside.

He kissed her ear. “Definitely. His state towered above all others, rich, prosperous, and beautiful.” He paused to run his tongue around the inside of his mouth and swallow a few times to ease the sandy roughness rasping through his voice.

The breeze ruffled her bronze and copper curls, caressing them against his mandible and throat, the delicate touch drawing a festered splinter of longing from his throat.

Shepard pulled away to meet his eyes, all humour bleeding away in favour of concern. “Garrus?” She stiffened, supple flesh turning cold, ephemeral, and spun-sugar fragile against his.

Panic drew her back in, none too gently. He just shook his head and tucked her into his warmth, returning to the story. “Although one of the most skilled and talented warriors of his generation, Callor chose only to defend the lands and lives passed into his care. Instead of exploring and conquering the world, he dedicated himself to culture and art, to writing and education. In fact, he left behind one of the most prolific collections of treatises on war and ancient turian history. They’re housed in the Palaven national archive.”

“Mmm, I like Callor already,” Shepard said and grinned, her eyes slipping closed as she sighed with contentment. “I think this story may be rigged.” She stretched next to him, languid almost to the point of purring like an ungentira as she slid the pad of her foot up his lower leg and along his spur. Her toes teased the sensitive nerves, launching white-hot bolts of ecstasy up his leg to lodge in his groin. She’d done it a couple of times by accident during the nights they’d shared her bed, each time sending him darting for the far side of the mattress before she caused an … awkward issue.

One truth about turian physiology … the pointy, vulnerable bits were chocked full of nerve endings for their own preservation, making them natural erogenous zones.

A soft, throaty moan rolled up from his gut, gratitude and relief and pleasure all tangling into a knot that loosened his plates. “Do you want to hear this story or not?” he whispered, pulling back to look into her eyes. An impish expression that struggled to police itself into innocence stared back at him. Shaking his head, he continued, warning her, “If you keep that up, no more story, because my mouth will be too busy to talk.”
Shepard shrugged, her eyebrows climbing toward her hairline as her lips pressed hard together. They wriggled like a worm caught in a maraquil’s beak for a moment before she got them under control and said, “What? I’m not doing anything.”

A crooked brow plate called out her lie, but she ignored it, just settling back against his chest, her arm draping over his side. “So, who did the fair tarin choose?” she prompted.

“You’re getting ahead of the story,” he chastised, setting his face as firmly as he could. “Katrana was not the sort of tarin who wanted to be chosen or even courted.” He winced as he used the word, but then a reluctant nod forced its way out, jarring and wooden. “Yes, once turians were all about the traditional courting rituals.”

Shepard kissed his mandible, dragging the tip of her tongue along the edge. From the corner of his eye he saw her grin as her efforts produced a throaty purr. She tickled the tip of her nose against his cheek in what she called a bunny kiss. “I sort of love that. I’ve always known there are hopeless romantics hiding behind all the really big guns. You and Nihlus can’t be the only two.”

A long, grumbling breath spirited out to ride along the back of the wind. “Anyway, she fought at her family’s side to defend their territory—a small state several days north of the coast—was known for her talent with musical instruments, and almost all the Loraus Montum used in the Parsophin of every major leader was trained by her hands.” Smiling, he rubbed her arm. “Strong and independent, Katrana was sort of like someone else I know, so when Tunaris sent envoys laden with rich gifts to declare his intent to court her, she sent everything back unopened.”

“As she should,” Shepard sighed. “Didn’t even go himself. I hope Callor showed a little more sense.” Stretching again, she slid her palm up the long, flat plane of his lowest chest plate, draping herself against his chest.

Garrus rolled over onto his side, settling his keel against the ground so he could pull her in tight, their noses touching. “Stop jumping ahead. Spirits, you’re impatient.” He reached up, talons brushing through her hair. “Tunaris responded to Katrana’s refusal by declaring war on her family’s state.”

“Not the best way to try to bring the girl around,” Shepard sighed and shook her head, a grin hiding beneath her disapproval.

“True. Katrana’s father marched south to meet Tunaris’s army, but secretly he sent Katrana to meet with Callor, asking for aid in the war.” He nuzzled her lips. “Katrana’s family controlled a large territory, but didn’t stand a large enough army to hold Tunaris at bay for long. Even with Callor’s forces, the odds weren’t in their favour.” He grinned. “You know, telling you this, I realize that all those cycles, my parents were disguising a lecture as a story. The whole thing is an object lesson.”

Shepard chuckled but just caressed his arm with soft, lazy fingers, and waited for him to continue.

“When Katrana arrived in Callor’s city, he fell for the intelligent, talented tarin almost instantly, and agreed to help her father protect his state from Tunaris. They both knew that they needed to take an unorthodox approach toward the coming battle, or Tunaris would end up conquering all their lands.” He sighed and closed his eyes, just savouring the sun beating down on them, the whisper of the grass that made up their little hideout, and the woman in his arms.

“Katrana fell for Callor as well, but didn’t want to admit it, so she told him that if he could find a way to end the conflict without a the loss of a single life, she would be his bond-mate and they would join their lands. Callor didn’t care about the extra land, but he did care about his people, and he wished Katrana to be his bond-mate, so he agreed.”
“Quite the challenge, indeed,” Shepard said, brushing her lips against his mouth. “So, how did Callor manage his miracle?”

“The reason you can’t walk around on Palaven without an environment suit is the weak magnetic field. Because it’s so weak, Palaven’s animals are very sensitive to any disruption. We have to carefully manage our technology to prevent it from causing interference with the established patterns. Callor used that weakness to his advantage. He set up high magnetic sources to redirect all the routes, sending every animal that migrates to Tunaris’s city. His beautiful city became completely uninhabitable. He and his army returned home to try to deal with the problem, but Callor had created a magnetic fence around the city, and the people ended up having to flee, leaving almost everything behind.”

“And they had to live as refugees in Callor and Katrana’s lands?” Shepard laughed. “Smart cookie. I imagine that Katrana found him completely irresistible after that.” She pulled back, reaching up to trace the lines of his face with tender fingers. “I would have. Love a torin who uses what’s between his ears.” She leaned up and looked at both sides of his head. “Or in the case of turians, I suppose ... ummm ... aural canals? Tympanic membranes?”

He dragged her back down and rolled over to pin her down as he kissed her. Passion and joy roared through him, everything about her building the flood until it swept him away. The taste of her mouth, the softness of her body under his, the way her fingers couldn’t seem to stop seeking out places that made him moan against her lips.

“Did they end up joining their states and finding their happily ever after?” Shepard whispered, nibbling along his mandible between words.

“Near enough. They had a long and prosperous rule, several children ... a statue dedicated to them stands in the courtyard of the Hierarchy’s Seat in Cipritine.” He kissed her again. “At this point my mari would say, ‘All because he used his wits instead of less keen weapons’.”

Shepard smiled and wrapped her arms around his neck. “What does the name Callor mean?”

He pulled back just far enough to stare down into her eyes and frowned, brow plates lowering as he thought. “Light, but more of a glow, like candlelight on a wall. It also means bright in the sense of intelligence ... for obvious reasons.” Leaning down, he nuzzled the tip of her nose. “Why?”

Her chest caved a little in an awkward shrug, trapped beneath him as she was. “Callor ... “ A smile accompanied a sharp nod. “I love it. I think we’ve finally found your nickname.”

“Gah! Massani, why is that creepy-ass painting back in the sitting room?” The sharp cry of disgust sliced through Garrus’s dream, snatching him by the fringe to drag him from Shepard’s arms.

Opening his eyes, he sighed and rolled over, pulling his pillow over his head in a vain attempt to muffle the angry asari as she continued.

“You do know the story behind it, don’t you?”

“Yeah, so?” The grizzled old merc replied. After a moment, Zaeed’s voice rose to rival the asari matron’s, and that said something. Melanis possessed a true gift for volume. “God. That’s bloody horrible coffee. Who made this shit?”

“I did,” Martin replied. “You think that you can do better? Do it.”

Garrus threw back his blankets and sat up on the side of the bed. Why had he chosen the room right above the common area? And why did Zaeed have to keep hanging that bloody painting—quite literally—directly beneath his windows?

Callor. I love it. I think we’ve finally found your nickname.

He smiled as Shepard’s voice whispered through his still-foggy thoughts, a siren call to start his day. The sooner started, the sooner ended. Still, he leaned forward, hands braced against the edge of the mattress, arms tight against his side, and waited for the Mako of exhaustion to either roll off his shoulders or crush him. Of course, he knew better. It would do neither, he’d just shoulder it and get on with the million things he needed to do in the course of a day.

“Speaking of … ,” he said, subvocals rumbling. He hoped Nihlus had reported back to the Normandy, and Martin had their inspection tour itinerary—

Footsteps ran up the stairs then his door reverberated with a heavy, familiar cadence. Spirits, he hated Martin’s energy some days. “I’ll be down in ten minutes, and you’d better have confirmations from every stop on the tour,” he hollered.

“Wow,” the kid called back, “someone got up on the wrong side of the bed. Everything’s ready, but some stuff has come up. I’ll fill you in once you get a strong cup or two of amarceru into you and shake off the growling bear routine.”

Before Garrus could reply, the young man’s footsteps trotted down the stairs, returning to the common room.

Closing his eyes, Garrus tried to pull forward a picture of Shepard, but after so many days … . He swallowed past the iceberg lodged in his throat, his head dropping to hang from braced shoulders.

“Don’t leave me,” he whispered to the pale ghost painted on the insides of his eyelids. “I’m so tired, Kahri. I couldn’t find the strength to keep Archangel running without you. It’s so damned huge, Shepard. So damned huge and so damned heavy.” After another couple of long, deep breaths, he squared his shoulders and cracked his neck. Time to get another day started.

“General, did you know that Massani hung that damned painting back up here?” Melanis demanded the moment Garrus appeared on the stairs. The asari raced up the stairs to meet him, fury flushing her skin a dark, mottled violet across her cheeks and down her neck.

“I did,” Garrus said, thumping down a couple of stairs his earlier weariness returning. “It’s just a painting, Melanis. Those people have been dead for a couple thousand cycles.” He took her by the shoulders and turned her toward the kitchen. “Do the two of you have to argue every second? Go to your corners and take a time out. Eat some breakfast or something.”

“But the artist mixed the blood of each victim into the skin pigments, boss,” Melanis whined, spinning back to lean into him, her big, leaf-green eyes staring up into his. Spirits, they were so like Shep—

Garrus cut his gaze away to look at Zaeed, stepping back from the asari. She tended to stand too close and behave in too familiar a fashion for his comfort. “Like I said, they’ve been dead longer than the sum total of all our lives.” He held out an arm to usher her down ahead of him. “Still, It’s probably not safe here, Zaeed. The thing is worth a half billion credits. Do you really want to just leave it sitting out in the open in the slums of Omega?”

The grizzled old merc spun and looked at the large canvas, pride of ownership radiating through the tilt of his head. “Who’s going to believe that its real?” he asked, letting out a throaty snort.
“Whether they believe it or not, Omega’s combination of desperation and lawlessness can push people to take chances they might not ordinarily.” Garrus shrugged. “You want it stolen, leave it up.”

Garrus followed Melanis down the stairs, stuttering to a stop at the bottom as a tiny, white-haired human woman passed him, a gigantic cup of coffee held between her hands.

She looked up, wrinkled but still pretty features meeting his curious stare with a pleasant smile. “Good morning, sir.”

Nodding, he fought back his confused scowl enough to return her greeting. “Good morning.” The moment the words escaped, the scowl slammed back into place. Trying not to stare, he watched her hobble up the stairs. She shifted her cup to one hand, clench the railing with the other to haul herself up. The whole procedure looked so entirely painful that Garrus barely resisted the urge to scoop her up and carry her to the elevator.

“Does anyone know who that was?” he asked once the elevator doors closed behind her. He continued on to the kitchen, bypassing the serving line for the cupboards.

“I think her name is Susan,” Melanis replied. “She works on the fifteenth floor in the accounting department.” The asari shrugged and grabbed a plate. She passed it to the floor matron, who began heaping it with breakfast. As strong a biotic and as great a teacher as Melanis was, Garrus was pretty sure she ate enough to pay the wages for three biotics instructors.

“She’s been coming down for coffee every morning since she started here,” the floor matron, a human named Marcie, said. “Lovely woman. Very friendly and polite.”

“There’s a kitchen on the fifteenth floor,” Garrus said, brow plates lowering, his eyes looking back to the elevator. “Why come all the way down here for Martin’s crappy coffee?” Something cold and wary raked its talons down his spine. He shook it off and grabbed a covered mug of amarceru off the counter and a couple of ration bars from the cupboard, and turned to head up to his office.

“Oh, no you don’t,” Marcie snapped, stepping into his path. She snatched the ration bars from his hand. “You’re going to be living on these for the next couple of months. This morning you eat properly.” She dished up a heaping plate of krellar eggs, puala fruit, and strips of fried drellak roast. “Go sit down and eat. The affairs of the galaxy can take care of themselves for a few minutes.” One eyebrow lifted up her forehead, higher and higher every moment he stared back. Having slogged his way uphill through the bramble-laden swamp of that argument more than once, Garrus sighed and took the plate. Giving in meant reaching his office on the twentieth floor fifteen minutes faster than trying to get past Marcie. “Thank you,” he grumbled, not even attempting sincerity, and threw himself into the nearest chair.

Zaeed poured himself another cup of coffee, took a sip, cursed, and then sat across the table from Garrus. “So . . . you want me to take a platoon to deploy those sensor nets in the Sol system?”

Garrus glanced up from shovelling in his food, grateful for the distraction of work. “No, Hackett has people installing them in all the Alliance systems.” He grinned, sussing out the merc’s intentions. “No sunny caribbean beach for you, at least not until after you’ve taken two of the stealth frigates into the Kite’s Nest.” Resting his forearms on the table, he gestured with his fork, punctuating his words. “Deploy the new nets along the edge of the batarian systems. Hopefully, if we slip them in there without being detected, the nets themselves will escape batarian notice.”
The general managed another couple of mouthfuls then sighed as Melanis walked up to glare down at him.

“What about the painting, Garrus?” she asked, her tone demanding, bordering on insubordinate. “It’s an abomination, and the asari who live here shouldn’t have to look at it.”

He looked up at her, glad to see her quail in the face of the annoyance he allowed to bleed into his stare and expression. “If it bothers you, don’t look at it. The two of you need to figure out how to get along, because if I wake up to you screaming at one another even one more morning, you’ll both be moving down into the sub-levels.” Holding her stare, he cocked a brow plate. “I have a thousand more important things to worry about than whether or not you don’t want to look at a painting. Am I making myself clear?”

The asari flushed a deep indigo and nodded, looking both contrite and embarrassed. “Of course you do, sir. My apologies.”

He softened his expression and nodded. “Accepted. Go ahead and eat your breakfast.”

The sound of motorized joints and servos alerted Garrus to Martin’s approach even before the young man strode around the stairs. “You packed and ready to go?” Martin asked, grabbing one of the reinforced chairs necessary to support the extra weight of the battle frame he wore. He thumped down into it and rested his forearms on the table.

“No.” Garrus finished the last bite of his breakfast, washing it down with a long swig of the bitter amarceru. “How did the squads do last night? Are they ready to ship out with the Banquan and the Aesarus?”

Martin nodded, a huge grin spreading across his face. “The flight crews’ scores ranked in the ninety-six percentile, but the ground squads … .” He practically cackled with delight. “They blew the top off the score chart. The new battle frames are forty-eight percent faster and more agile. Theta squad ended up chasing the enemy to the base of this cliff. The Blood Pack all jumped into the lift the miners use. Theta squad didn’t even hesitate. They practically ran up the cliff to reach the top before the lift did.” He aped wiping a tear and gave a melodramatic sniff. “I wish you’d seen it. It was beautiful.”

Garrus nodded. “So the Blood Pack are out of those mines, and the instructors have all signed off, passing the crews on to active duty? I want those two frigates on their way to the Kite’s Nest by 1500.” He opened his omnitool, but waited for Martin to answer before entering the information.

“They’re cleared to go, and the only Blood Pack left are corpses.” Martin jumped up and grabbed a plate. “I’m starving.”

“We need to focus on turning more mercs rather than killing them.” Garrus scrolled down the list of tasks he needed to clear up before leaving Omega in the hands of his senior staff for nearly three months while he toured Archangel’s many and varied operations. “The geth are delivering five frigates, four cruisers, and two dreadnaughts this month, and we’re going to have to mothball them for lack of crew.” He muttered and shook his head. “I’m going to have to get Wrex to start sending us potentials.”

Looking up, he skipped ahead to the next concern. “Has Nihlus checked in?”

“Yeah.” The kid stuffed an entire biscuit in his mouth while he waited for Marcie to fill his plate, spitting crumbs everywhere as he tried to talk around it. He swallowed and thumped his chest a couple of times. “And Tali called. She seemed pretty upset. Asked me to make sure you got back
Garrus stood. “Yes. Take care of that and then check in with Mordin about the samples from Trident. Seven million souls do not just vanish without a trace. I want answers to send on to Nihlus.” After dumping his dishes in the sink, Garrus headed for the elevator. “I’ll see you at the briefing.”

He closed the door and hit the controls to take him up, then froze and spun, suddenly sure he felt someone behind him. A faint, electrical tingle shivered along his forearm. No one there. He turned around to face the front, a scowl settling in, promising to stay with him for the day.

Garrus stepped out on the twentieth floor, a faint headache moving in behind his lowered brow plates. Technically, the twentieth floor and the five above it were dedicated to Research and Development rather than administration, but the elevated energy level and suppressed bullshit level of the department suited Garrus. And if he headed out to tinker on the latest electronics from time to time, who was to object? He was in charge of the whole damned thing; the big cheese as Martin would say.

He lifted a hand to the geth working in the first lab. The ten platforms rarely quit working, just taking a couple hours a day to hook up to their hub, recharging and networking back to their servers on Rannoch. Each of them were part of the new generation of platforms based off Legion’s prototype, as independent as geth could get. Their current project both teased his imagination and scared the living crap out of him.

He glanced at the wall of schematics for the new combined missiles. The geth had come up with the idea of backloading Wrex’s thresher acid missiles with nanites. The acid got the missile through the shields and weakened the Reaper’s armour, allowing the nanites to penetrate and sabotage the machine from within. After a few generations, they stopped replicating and terminated, clogging up all the systems they’d invaded, thus weakening the Reaper’s defences to more conventional attacks.

Pushing the door to his office open, he suppressed a shudder. The idea amounted to inspired genius … until the Reapers found a way to turn the nanites against them.

“Good morning, General,” his assistant grumbled, the batarian sounding as though his morning had been anything but good. Of course, he always sounded like that. Vartash’s distaste for affected niceties and small talk made up a large part of why Garrus had chosen him to be his right hand.

“Good morning, Vartash.” He stopped next to the captain’s desk, taking the small stack of datapads the batarian handed him. Skimming down the list of calls and messages he needed to return, he said, “I’ll be in the QEC room for the next hour or so, then do you want to meet to go over the marksman classes for while I’m gone? The only one that will make you want to kill someone is the new Iota squad. If you actually locked them inside a building, they still wouldn’t be able to hit the walls.”

“I’ll handle them all right. Besides, you’ll be glued to the ship’s QEC the whole time you’re gone anyway. If I start shooting, you’ll know within the day.” He nodded toward the window that looked out into the hall. “Mordin’s on the move, you’d better run if you want to get any work done before noon.”

Garrus glanced out into the corridor, then spun on his talons and bolted for his office door. Luckily, the salarian scientist’s attention remained focused on Martin, sparing Garrus a couple of hours worth of fascinating, but time-consuming rapid-fire conversation. With the gang population dropping like a stone, and Garrus authorizing a public comm channel so that anyone who needed safe transport to medical aid got a ride thanks to Archangel, the salarian had been able to move his clinic to the tenth floor.

Archangel outfitted the doctor with a fully equipped hospital and three labs, then provided him with a budget that allowed him to hire another two doctors, three researchers, nurses, and techs. All the organization asked in return was that the salarian work on indoctrination, curing the genophage, and other priorities as they arose. At the moment, those priorities involved helping Nihlus and Anderson figure out what happened to the almost seven million people living on Trident.

Garrus locked his office door behind him, pausing to look at the miniature of the Normandy’s galaxy map as it spun lazily in the corner of the room. White markers showed the positions of Archangel forces galaxy wide. Gold markers indicated Hierarchy forces while blue flashed the locations of Alliance vessels. A single red marker indicated Trident’s position.

A colony that functioned pretty much outside the law, made up of mercs, pirates, and shady business people, one expected people to go missing on Trident, just not all seven million humans. And definitely not overnight.

Garrus walked over to the map, staring down at that single glaring red dot. Two weeks ago, it appeared. Two weeks since a group of turian gun runners arrived in the main port city to sell their wares only to discover a ghost town. Anderson and the Normandy responded immediately, taking Nihlus along, but they found no signs of battle, no toxins, nothing at all to explain the disappearance. The only evidence of foul play showed up in the dead comm and electronic systems. All vid from surveillance and other cameras had been wiped.

He looked up at the vid monitor on his wall, the image frozen on the second last frame before the spaceport went dark. No matter how many hours he spent going through the footage, everything remained completely business as usual. Someone had committed the perfect crime, on a scale that terrified Garrus. He knew the hands behind it belonged to the Reapers, but so far Nihlus had turned up nothing to tell them who or what or how.

Out of the corner of his eye, he saw another red marker appeared on the map. His heartbeat stuttered.

Spirits. Another one.

Garrus tossed the datapads onto his desk, hurrying through his office to his private comm room. A year before, the R&D department had earned them a massive grant to develop and install quantum entanglement communicators based on a quarian/geth design that proved far more elegant and cost-effective than the one in Alliance development. The only condition imposed on the cash infusion involved handing over the designs to the Alliance and Hierarchy so they could install the same systems fleet-wide.

He opened a channel to the Normandy, not surprised to see Nihlus ready and waiting. “What’s happened?”

The Spectre shook his head. “We received a message from Eldfell-Ashland headquarters saying that they’d lost contact with their people on Caleston.” He nodded in response as Garrus stiffened. “Their on-site management is required to check in every twelve hours. When they didn’t get a call in from Caleston, they went on alert.” He shifted from leaning on one hip to the other and crossed his arms over his keel, the tell setting off all Garrus’s alarms.
“Spirits. Caleston. They’re the largest supplier of drive core material in the Traverse.” Garrus shoved that aside for later consideration, focusing on the immediate issue. “How long before you heard about it?” he asked, leaning forward, his hands braced against the console.

“They contacted Arcturus as soon as they couldn’t raise their people, and Hackett called us as soon as he got word.” He shrugged, his mandibles flicking once. “Maybe five hours. It’s a straight shot from the Hades Nexus to the Rift, but when we arrived, we found the exact same thing as on Trident. Nothing. Not a soul left, alive or dead.” Losing a bit of composure, his mandibles dropped, and he cracked his neck. “At least on Trident, when we got there, everything had shut down other than lights. On Caleston, the machinery was still all running as if the people had just walked away. Damned creepy.”

A deep, unsettled rumble rolled from the Spectre’s throat, making Garrus wonder how fast Nihlus would head from the QEC to his quarters and the bottle hidden in his pack. Despite having pulled himself out of the pit he’d started digging after Shepard’s death, Garrus knew Nihlus still drank almost constantly.

“Okay,” he said after another moment spent trying to figure out what to do, “I’ll have Mordin contact you directly. Gather whatever samples he needs, and get them back here. It looks like only human colonies have been attacked, but that still leaves too many targets to keep our eyes on. I need you to organize a defensive deployment of all available vessels. Scatter them where they have the best chance to get to a colony as soon as it goes dark.” He shoved himself away from the QEC. “We need to figure out what’s going on out there.”

“You’re pulling out today? Heading for Tuchanka?” Nihlus asked, visibly trying to shake off the aftereffects of the colony. Garrus took a step back as he nodded. He understood his fratrin’s reaction, but hated to see it. Nihlus had been doing so damned well. “I was leaving tonight, but I think I’m going to delay until 0900 tomorrow. Something is off here.” He glanced around, feeling as though eyes watched him. “Something has me on edge, and I want to figure it out before I go.”

A cracked cement cough of laughter erupted from the Spectre. “You’re always on edge, Garrus. The entire galaxy worries you.” He gestured toward the galaxy map spinning over the secondary QEC. “Although with this missing colony situation, I think you’re dead right to be.” He turned to look behind him as if checking to make sure no one would overhear. As he looked back, Garrus could see the walls and shields going up.

“What is it?” Garrus prompted, stepping back up to the console and leaning in. “Talk to me, Nihlus. I see connections coming together inside that head.” One mandible twitched in a faint smile as the Spectre chuffed.

“What did Shepard tell you about the visions the rachni queen helped us unravel?” he asked without humour. He cut the air with a hand, then glanced over his shoulder. “Did she tell you how Sovereign was created?”

Realization crashed down on Garrus, nearly flattening him. “Someone could be harvesting the humans to build another Vanguard?.” His elbows shook as they reluctantly took his weight, fists braced against the metal and polymer of the QEC interface. How had he missed it? He should have seen it. His whole career consisted of putting pieces of puzzles together. “Who?” he asked, hating the desperation in his own voice. “And where?”

Nihlus just shrugged, although the fear trembling over the comm channel from his second larynx said everything his rigid posture tried to hide. “I don’t know, but I think that’s our mystery. It’s not what is being done with the humans, but how and by whom.”

“Okay.” Garrus braced himself. “We both have mysteries to solve. You contact Mordin, and I’ll hopefully solve mine before I head to Tuchanka.” He gave Nihlus a solemn frown, and changed the subject. “Are you okay?”

The Spectre nodded, firm and quick even though his expression relaxed. “Yeah, I’m fine.” His mandibles flicked. “But you look like crap.”

All Garrus could do to respond to that was nod. “Yeah, well, maybe I’ll get some rest during my inspections.” His talons hovered over the disconnect control. “Be careful, Nihlus. I’ll be in touch.”

“Stay safe,” Nihlus answered, then his image vanished.

Garrus turned away from the QEC, his mind already puzzling through both mysteries … surely his uneasiness in the base and the missing humans couldn’t be connected.

“Spectre Kryik is closer to the truth than any of us know, I expect.”

Garrus spun around, coming face to hologram with a human in a dark suit. A cigarette burned in one hand as the man sat, legs crossed casually at the knee. Even though the image on Luna had been so badly damaged that Garrus hadn’t been able to make out more than a human male in a suit, he felt sure of the encroacher’s identity. He stared into the eerie blue lights glowing from the man’s irises. “Armistan Banes.”

The man shook his head. “Armistan Banes is dead, General. He died some time ago.” He lifted a glass from a holder on the arm of his chair and drank down a respectable belt of amber liquor. “I’m called The Illusive Man.”

Ungentira -- A large warm blooded, cat-like predator native to the high mountains of Palaven. It is neither mammal or reptile, but has aspects of both, featuring a heavy, plated hide along its back, and a rich, luxurious pelt along their underside. They are ferocious predators, frequently taking on prey three or four times their size, which is approximately the same as a labrador retriever. Three, five-centimeter- long claws on all four feet and large fangs are their primary weapons, but they also have a poison spike at the end of their tail used for defence. They are known for climbing partway up trees and stretching to leave territorial claw marks in the bark of trees to intimidate foes with their perceived size.
Chapter Summary

Security? What security?

Uncaemanus Bellicartibus -- A turian martial art as old as recorded history. The combatants are called Uncaelatum or Clawed Hands. It is an open-handed, bare-taloned fighting form requiring a high degree of skill, agility, and athleticism.

EM Micro-trips -- Molecule sized EM emitters encased in a fragile shell. When stepped on, they stop transmitting, allowing even cloaked people to be tracked. Since it is a passive emission, the trips don’t show unless specifically scanned for on their frequency.

The Illusive Man chuckled, a warm sound that coated Garrus’s bones in ice. After taking another drink, the human set the glass down. “You’ve built a remarkable force, General Vakarian. Shepard would be proud.” Sucking in a deep breath through his nose, he nodded. “A fleet of ninety-seven vessels, including eight of the most impressive dreadnoughts I’ve ever seen, and fifty-four stealth frigates larger than the Normandy. The geth have really been upgrading your weapons systems, as well. Most impressive.” A smile twisted one corner of his mouth. “Must be hard finding crews for all of them, particularly with the gangs having enacted a policy of not being taken alive.” He shrugged as if he’d seen and bypassed such shortages many times. “It doesn’t matter, of course. As soon as the Reapers show up, the recruits will flock to your door seeking shelter for their families in turn for service.”

Garrus stayed silent, glad to see at least the Illusive Man’s numbers were out of date. It meant a more convoluted path from his office to Cerberus than he feared. He ignored what the man said, mining beneath for information about what he wasn’t saying. According to Ash, the Illusive Man was building himself an armada, as well. She was mid-level command in charge of the construction of a ship that she wasn’t even allowed to see. She’d told him last communication that she’d found well over six billion credits being funnelled into three projects. The ship amounted to the second-most expensive. Dropping his impatience into the ice water running off his bones, he forced himself to stay completely cool. Given time, the operations chief would find out what the other projects were.

The Illusive Man stood and walked over to a massive bank of monitors. “I’m glad to see someone else is looking into these missing colonies. The Alliance and Council don’t seem to believe there’s a problem. The galaxy needs people who aren’t afraid to look the truth in the eye and do something about it.” A calculated turn spun him back to meet Garrus’s stare. “It’s good that you’re a visionary. Your race does not have a reputation for such.”

Instead of feeling like praise, the compliments landed like handfuls of sludge, gelid and viscous as they slithered beneath Garrus’s armour. He drew himself up, rumbling a warning through his subvocals that he wouldn’t be patted on the head and spoken to like a child running in the door with a positive academic report.
The man in the suit nodded as if he understood Garrus’s intent if not the actual message and took a couple of steps forward. “You’re investigating Trident and Caleston, but we know of two much smaller colonies that have vanished over the last two months. Practice runs, no doubt. I suspect the Reapers are behind it, as do you and Spectre Kryik.” His eyes narrowed. “This idea that they use other life forms to construct new Reapers … it would explain the people having been taken while everything else remained.” He cocked his head a little, his body language giving Garrus no clues about the man at all. “I’d be very interested in the information Spectre Kryik possesses.”

Garrus laughed, a harsh, derisive cough. “I’m sure you would be, but we don’t work for Cerberus or with Cerberus.” He bristled, his posture all corners and spines. “Which leads me to wonder how you’re aware of the conversation between Spectre Kryik and myself.” Cocking a hip, he crossed his arms over his keel, throwing up a hasty defensive barrier. “Not to mention contacting me on my own QEC.”

The Illusive Man’s lips quirked a little. “I have loyal agents everywhere, General. If a few of the techs installing your QECs work for me, well …” He returned to his chair and sat, crossing his legs. “… efficient communication is going to be vital in the months to come.”

Not to mention the intimidation factor. Garrus let that go, but held onto the word ‘few’. Too many. Cerberus would never risk such heavy coverage … so that meant one tech inside Archangel. Garrus choked back the first three or four responses that leaped into his mind and clenched his jaw. “In the interest of efficient communication, did you order the hit on Shepard, because she wouldn’t dance to your tune?”

Shaking his head, the Illusive Man actually looked as though he felt genuine regret about Shepard’s death. “No, General, I did not. An argument could be made that Shepard was insane, but she was also our best chance to be prepared for the Reapers when they find a way back from dark space.” He paused to light a cigarette and took a long drag, the end painting the planes and hollows of the man’s face with a macabre dance of shadows as it glowed orange.

A slight tilt of the head accompanied his next words. “I’ve been unable to collect any intel on who contracted that killer.” Index and middle fingers still gripping the cigarette between them, he lifted the glass and drained it of liquor. “As much as I’m loathe to believe it, the evidence points toward a random act carried out by a single, manicidal individual, perhaps an indoctrinated agent of the Reapers.” He made a show of setting down the glass and butting out his cigarette, his eyes focused on his tasks. As hard as he appeared to be trying to conceal any emotion, Garrus saw the Illusive Man’s jaw clench. “My assets are vast on that front. I’m not accustomed to coming up empty.”

A sarcastic, half-formed thought about how the Illusive Man’s assets might stack up to the Shadow Broker’s whispered through the back of Garrus’s head. Some twitch of pleasure must have tweaked a muscle somewhere, because the Illusive Man’s lip twisted a little.

“A sarcastic, half-formed thought about how the Illusive Man’s assets might stack up to the Shadow Broker’s whispered through the back of Garrus’s head. Some twitch of pleasure must have tweaked a muscle somewhere, because the Illusive Man’s lip twisted a little.

“Don’t trust your good friend, the Shadow Broker, General. Yes, he’s afraid of the Reapers, but believe me when I say that while what Shepard started is one of his contingencies, it is only one. And it’s lost Shepard. Don’t be surprised if those teeth turn and you find them at your neck.” He lifted a hand to hover over the controls on the arm of his chair. “I’ll send you what we have on the other missing colonies in the interest of efficient communication, General. We’ll be in touch.”

Garrus cocked a brow plate at his dismissal and stared at the empty space where the hologram had been the second before. How the hell did Cerberus get an entangled particle into his damned QEC? He spun around, pulling his shoulders in defensively, aware of the ridiculousness of the gesture even as he did it. Turning away from the offending spyware wouldn’t actually stop anyone from hearing him. Still, it made him feel better to have his back to the wall, so to speak.
“Vortash, I need my office and the senior staff briefing room swept for bugs.” He paced to the locked door and back. “Grab Erash. Just the two of you. Go over every millimetre then the comm rooms. Once my office is clear, have Monteague and Krul meet me in there. We have some serious security breaches to patch.”

“Yes, sir. We’ll have them swept before the briefing,” the batarian replied, his rumbling voice reassuringly professional. Anyone else would have peppered him with questions. Reason number two he’d chosen Vortash.

The QEC signalled an incoming message. After a moment’s hesitation, Garrus turned to answer it. In the months since they’d completed his comm room, The Illusive Man must have overheard twenty-five hundred conversations. What was one more? He hit the control, Tali appearing in front of him.

“General Vakarian!” She cocked a hip and crossed her arms with enough attitude to do Shepard proud. “Is this what your people call getting right back to me?”

Garrus smiled, the expression dropping away when he saw how badly she wrung her hands. “Tali.” He shook his head. “Sorry about that, it’s been a really busy, strange morning so far.”

“Better late than never, I suppose,” she replied, trying to sound cheerful, but his ear had been trained to hear what slipped beneath the teasing. Something had Tali rattled. Very rattled.

He leaned in, fists braced against the console again. “What’s going on, Tali?” His brow plates raised toward his fringe as she paced back and forth across the QEC pad, wringing her hands so hard that he worried she’d break her own fingers.

“I know you’re scheduled to head for Tuchanka first, but something’s come up here.” She glanced behind her as if afraid of being spied on. “We’re … I need your help, Garrus.” Stopping and spinning around to face him, she let out a long breath, her shoulders rising and falling in a helpless sort of shrug.

Garrus cut the air with a hand. “No details. Communications here aren’t secure at the moment. Cerberus has me bugged. Just ….” One mandible twitched. “… on the Shepard scale of insane pain range, how bad does it hurt?”

Tali’s shoulders bowed, telling him even before she spoke. “’Eleven. The axe wound has gone septic.” She craned her head, looking behind him. “Is Nihlus able to come as well?”

Septic indeed, if she wanted Nihlus along. Whatever had her worried, Tali’s entire demeanor set off a bomb in his guts. “Okay. I’ll contact Wrex, clear everything through him, and then get back to you.” He pushed away from the console. “It’ll just be me and Martin, though. Entire human colonies have started disappearing. Nihlus is out in the Traverse with the Normandy trying to figure out what’s happening.”

She nodded and stepped up to the controls. “I’ll be waiting to hear from you.” Sighing, she slumped a little. “Thanks, General.”

“Talk to you in a few minutes.” Garrus disconnected and opened a channel to Wrex’s camp.

The krogan who answered the call stared at Garrus with an expression of malign indifference. “What do you want?” he asked, looking away at some other work, prickly and belligerent as always.

Garrus hid a grin. He loved the game with the krogan, and affected his own belligerence, but

The krogan looked up and narrowed his violet eyes. Hunkering down, he bulked up his shoulder width, massive and unmovable. “The clan leader is busy.”

Garrus laughed, sharpening the edge of it. “Now.” He stared down the messenger until the krogan rolled his eyes and growled something that might have been asking Garrus to wait or telling the general to kiss his sizable, krogan backside. Garrus didn’t really care as long as Wrex came to the damned communicator.

“Vakarian!” the chief bellowed a moment later. “Aren’t you supposed to be blessing us with your presence in two days?” Wrex crossed his arms and cracked his neck. A crooked grin ticked at one corner of the clan chief’s mouth. “Admit it, you couldn’t wait to see my handsome mug.” A harsh, slow chuckle rolled out. “Or something’s gone wrong.”

Garrus chuffed, hiding a grin. “The longer I go without seeing that threshermaw’s backside, the better.” He shoved aside regret. He’d been looking forward to seeing Wrex again, and spending some time on Tuchanka shooting things, living rough … doing guy stuff. Now, who knew how long he’d spend playing diplomat to solve whatever perceived insult had the quarians and geth at one another again. “I just hung up with Tali. She’s got a crisis of some sort going on, and asked me to come there first.”

Wrex let out a roar of sound that sounded like half-cough, half-curse. “I’ve got problems of my own here, Vakarian. If you’re not coming, you need to tell someone to call off their attack dogs. We’ve had flyovers here almost every day. Those bastards in the orbital stations are looking too closely at the threshermaze and the processing plant. I wouldn’t put it past them to start dropping bombs on them.” The chief bristled. “I didn’t fight my own people as hard as I did to get this stuff built just to have turians blow it to Aralakh.”

Garrus slammed his arms down across his keel and cursed. “Damn it, Wrex, what did I tell you? Camouflage the maze with rubble and get the processing facility underground. I’ll run interference on Palaven, but if the turians attack, you’re on your own.” He shook his head, letting his fury bleed through. “He’d warned Wrex that building too fast would attract the wrong sort of notice. But oh no, Wrex just had to go big and flip off everyone keeping an eye on the Krogan DMZ … twenty-four hundred of them from orbital battle stations around the damned planet.

Wrex let out an indignant roar. “Watch the way you talk to me, Garrus. I’m not some whelp you can take a strap to.” He leaned in, his holo looming huge and furious. “We’re putting krogan necks on the line for your war.”

Garrus met fury with fury. “Bullshit. You’re putting krogan necks on the line for a chance to become part of the galactic community. And if I have to take a strap to that land mover of a backside to preserve the peace, I will. We’re supposed to be building our strength for war with the Reapers, Wrex, not war with the Council. Swallow that damned krogan pride, and do what I told you to start with.” He paced for a second. His father could probably arrange some breathing room for Wrex. A couple of the younger generals and admirals had started to come around. Focusing back on the krogan, Garrus straightened, standing down what Martin called his ‘general shoulders’.

“I’ll get there as soon as I can, but in the meantime if you see or hear anything else, contact me right away.”

“Remind me why I haven’t killed you yet.” Wrex glared at him for long seconds, then let out a deep, appreciative chuckle. “Vakarian, you’ve got a quad.” Wrex boosted his armour up his shoulders again. “Tell the pyjak that he’d better be ready to get some blood on that fancy new armour of his.” Grinning, the chief took a step forward. “When you going to make that armour for krogan, Garrus?”

Relaxing, the need for posturing over, Garrus laughed and put his fingers over the control. “You don’t need it. You come with your own.” All humour melting from his face, the general levelled a serious, commanding stare at the krogan. “I mean it, Wrex. Anyone makes a move, contact me. Don’t try to deal with it yourself. We don’t need anyone thinking we have a krogan rebellion in the works.”

Wrex grunted. “What can they do to us that they haven’t done already, Vakarian?” Still his posture relaxed, answering Garrus’s demand even when his words didn’t.

“Let’s not find out.” Garrus stepped back. “Okay, I have a massive security breach to deal with, so I’ll contact you from the Passchendaele once I know how long I’m going to be on Rannoch. Talk to you in a few days, Wrex.”

The behemoth nodded, a quick jerk of his head. “Vakarian.”

Garrus hung up and called Tali right back. The relief coming off the young quarian when he told her that he’d be there the day after next just tied his guts in more knots. He was just as glad not to let the Illusive Man know about the chinks in Archangel’s armour, but damn, he hated walking blind into whatever was going on.

Unlocking the door, Garrus strode into his office, throwing himself into the chair behind his desk. “Martin, I need to see you in my office.” Swinging his chair around, he brought the miniature galaxy map and its two red dots into view. After lunch, there’d be four. Maybe then he’d be able to start seeing a pattern to it all. Of course, maybe the only pattern was humanity itself.

“General,” Vortash called through on the speaker, an indecent grin snarling beneath his words, “Mierin and Mordin just called in a Medical 1145e.”

1145e. Unintentional discharge of heavy munitions resulting in significant injury or death. Again. Damn. The news filled him with frustrated annoyance until the part Vortash hadn’t spoken whispered through his ire, setting his heart pounding. “Likelihood of fatality?” He held his breath. Not another one. He’d kill Mierin.

“No. Mordin has started dermal regeneration.” The batarian almost sounded sad about the lack of bloody, burning death.

“Did I tell Mierin that maiming another student would lead to his ass being tied to twenty pounds of explosives and blown to hell? Or was it killing another one?” As broad a talent for destruction as the salarian explosives expert possessed, Garrus would send him packing if he couldn’t manage his classes so that people didn’t keep getting hurt. Only lucky stroke came in that every single heavy munitions student in the buildings had been painted by the same brush. Utterly mad, every, single one.

“Had to be a death. Sorry, General. Weaver’s here.”

“Send me the incident reports when they come in.” Garrus wrenched the chair a little further around, facing the door as it opened. In his second childish tantrum of the day, he stayed slumped and sort of crumpled in his chair. “Has this room been swept yet?” he yelled over Martin’s shoulder through the open portal.

“Do I look like I’m sweeping for bugs?” Vortash hollered back.

“No, which could turn into a career-ending oversight on your part.” Garrus shoved himself up in his chair hard enough he almost flipped it backwards. Nodding to Martin, he grumbled, “Come in, let the door shut, and set up a jammer.”

Martin’s frown made some eloquent points about Garrus’s general state of grouchinness, but the kid just opened his omnitool. “Wow, you really got up on the wrong side of the bed this morning. You could jam the room faster than I can.”

“This is why you’re doing it.” Garrus glowered at him until he finished. “Is it secure?” He watched Martin run the test subroutines from the back side of the omniscreen. “Okay,” he said the moment Martin finished. “We’ve got some serious holes to plug in this facility before we leave. I want you to head out to the dead zone in one of the cars. See if Sidonis will go with you, so I’m not breaking my own two-person-team rule. I need you to send a list of encoded questions out to Tali. Tell her to use the Theta Zhu Shepard Scale return code and to send it right to my omnitool. Then send this packet of information to Nihlus.” He transferred the file the Illusive Man sent him. “Tell him to maintain radio silence except for emergencies until he can contact us on the Passchendaele.”

Garrus opened his own omnitool and started keying in the list of questions for Tali. “When you get back here, hit the computer, and find me the technician who put Cerberus’s particle in our communicator. Whomever it is has probably already been replaced, but I want him or her out nonetheless. Anything else will give the Illusive Man too much wiggle room.” A lightning-quick glance cut up to make sure Martin kept up before he turned back to his questions. “Then have three of the geth go through the Passchendaele’s QEC and make sure it’s clean. Understood?”

Throwing two nods sharp enough to slice someone in half, Martin replied, “Yes, sir. We’re not delaying our departure?”

Vortash’s voice broke through. “Senior staff briefing room is swept, General. Nice variety of hardware in there.”

Garrus held up a finger to Martin then braced both hands against the arm of the chair. “Destroy them and get me a tight active laser scan grid in there. This is ridiculous. Same in here, then get your asses to my meeting. After lunch, you and Erash can go over my ship from stem to stern and then lock it down.” Catapulting himself out of his chair, he vaulted his desk, nearly crowing at the glorious release of even a second’s worth of unrestrained aggression. He strode out the door without pausing.

“No, this does not put back our schedule, Martin. We leave tomorrow, so be packed.” He cursed, not having packed his own kit. “We’ve got a hell of a lot to get done before bedtime, kid.”

“No kidding.” Martin finished typing and closed his omnitool. “So, senior staff briefing?”

Garrus nodded and led the way, feeling very much like an uncaelatum facing a new opponent every second. Fighting and clawing through endless adversaries, he kept his eyes up, searching for an end to the line of new combatants, but one never arrived.

After the senior staff briefing, Garrus hurried from the elevator to his quarters. He needed to pack, eat, and then get back to shoring up the base’s security.

“Bloody, arrogant bastard,” Butler grumbled from the dining room. “If I catch the tech who bugged this place, I’ll introduce him to his own damned kidneys.” He threw himself down in a chair, the legs screeching across the floor. Butler could never just sit, he needed to rearrange the furniture.
“I’m pretty sure he already knows his kidneys,” Martin shot back.

Garrus shook his head, able to see the kid’s cheeky grin even with the blinds down. Hurrying to his closet, he pulled out both of his footlockers and threw them on the bed.

“Not like that … I bloody mean … .” Butler stopped, and grumbled. “Shut up, Weaver, or I’ll introduce you to your kidneys.”

“And I already know my kidneys. See? Hello kidneys, it’s me, Martin, the awesome guy who lets you live inside his body and strain impurities from his blood. Thanks for that, by the way.”

As Garrus strode into his bathroom, the rest of the conversation blessedly becoming too muffled to hear as it continued to devolve. A brilliant, talented, loyal group of people had rallied to see Archangel become a reality, but sometimes it took every ounce of his control to restrain himself from knocking heads. Anderson claimed the constant teasing and bickering meant they had formed a strong, cohesive unit. Garrus suspected most of them just needed to grow up a few years.

A few minutes later, Garrus’s stomach growled, coaxing him away from packing clothing for every possible contingency from the heat of Tuchanka’s salt flats to the heart-freezing chill of Alchera and its eezo mine.

Garrus thumped down the stairs, hard and fast. Just like in the elevator, an electric tingle brushed his left hip. He stopped and looked toward Zaeed’s painting rather than the direction of the electricity. The faint EM field might not have been picked up by any of the races used to heavier fields, but to a turian, it felt like a signal flare. Once, he could pass off as his imagination or a freak static charge from the elevator. But twice? No, twice meant trouble.

He continued on, pretending to ignore the close encounter, and strode into the kitchen. Acting casual and secure when he felt eyes watching him from everywhere felt like dancing along the edge of a blade. He sidled in next to Marcie. “Hi.”

She looked him up and down, one eyebrow arched. “You hitting on me, General?” She planted a plump fist on a cocked hip and turned the raised eyebrow up to a glare.

Nodding, he leaned down. “Maybe.” Getting even closer, he whispered, “That older lady from the fifteenth floor … has she ever shown any interest in Zaeed’s painting?”

Marcie shook her head. “Not that I know of.”

His turn to raise his brow. “Not even when Zaeed and Melanis are fighting over it like a couple of rabid varren?”

“I don’t think so. She might have said it was pretty once. Mostly, she’s too busy hauling herself up the stairs.” She pulled back. “What’s this about, General?”

He shrugged, a cold surety taking root in his gut. “How many times a day does she come down?” he asked instead of answering.

“Five or so. Just grabs a cup of coffee, says hi, and off she goes. Is there a problem?” The matron scrubbed her hands on her apron, starting to look nervous.

Garrus chuckled and shook his head. “No problem. I’m just getting old and paranoid. Thanks, Marcie.” He stepped over to the line and picked up a tray. “Fill it up. I’ll eat upstairs.” He thanked her when she passed it back full.
Pivoting on his talons, he headed for the stairs, calling back, “Martin!” He didn’t wait for a reply, just started up. “Butler, Vortash, Sidonis, Melanis, and Massani. My quarters. Now!” He heard their chairs sliding across the floor before he finished speaking, and their footsteps thundering up behind him before he reached the door.

Standing in the center of the doorway, he forced them to squeeze past him into the room before he followed them in. Once the door shut, he nodded toward the washroom door and whispered, “Keep going.” He dropped his tray on the table and pushed in on them again as they entered, earning a couple of strange looks.

He followed them in, as sure as he could be that the invisible set of eyes hadn’t stalked them. “Okay, we don’t just have one fairly serious security breach going on,” he continued to whisper. “The first—Cerberus—is being dealt with, but I want the second nullified before I leave as well.” He met Zaeed’s confused stare. “I’m fairly certain someone believes your painting is real, and plans to relieve you of it.”

Zaeed cursed and pushed forward, causing a tidal waves through the closely packed space. “What do you mean? Who is it? I’ll rip their bloody head off.”

“No head ripping will be necessary, and I think we might end up with some excellent resources if we play our tiles right.” Garrus leaned against the shower stall. “From what I’ve seen, it appears to be a two person team. Susan, the little old lady who visits the main floor for coffee five times a day when it supposedly hurts her to climb the stairs … she’s the visible face. Insinuates herself, sweet, innocuous … no one gives an old lady from accounting a second glance while she watches our every move, figures out when the painting is most vulnerable.”

Zaeed shoved again. “How do you know they’re after my painting?”

“Is there anything else on the main floor worth stealing? Take out a nice oven or holo-screen?” Brow plates peaked, he stared at the merc until he backed down. “The partner is cloaked, and it’s a damned good one. Even when I knew where he or she was, I couldn’t see it. I’ve just felt the brush of its EM field. I think when I started asking questions about Susan, I warranted closer watching, so he or she’s been following me. Otherwise, I might never have known anyone was there.”

“So what do we do?” Zaeed demanded. “They’re not getting my painting.”

“Good riddance,” Melanis grumbled.

Garrus didn’t even look at her. “Zaeed, you’re going to go on a tear. Let it be known, without overacting it, that with Cerberus breaking through our security, you’re not convinced the painting is safe. Say that you’re arranging to have it moved to the Archangel main vault at the Shadow Broker’s base. I’ll make the arrangements with Barla Von to have a massive security detail to move it.”

He held Zaeed’s stare until the merc nodded before he continued, “Tonight, we’ll go about the evening routine as usual. Get the cadets into bed, settle the base down, and then take positions along the second floor. I want EM micro-trips all over the main room and stairs as soon as everyone is in bed. I want to know the second anyone steps into that room.” He crossed his arms, dropping them into place like gates.

“EM micro-trips?” Vortash grumbled. “You want to blanket the main floor so we can track our cloaked friend’s movements?” The batarian winced. “Pricey way to do it, General. Laser grid would be faster and cheaper.”
Garrus nodded. “And very efficiently tip off a couple of pros that we’re onto them. Pricey or not, I want subtle. I’m not sure we can catch them, but if we can, maybe they can be convinced to use their skills for the good guys. They’ve infiltrated our base for weeks without detection.” One of his brow plates leapt toward his fringe. “How many days have you watched a supposedly infirm old woman hobble up those stairs without giving her a second glance? Archangel could use that sort of infiltration talent.”

Melanis pushed past Martin. “So we tuck our departments into bed and sneak back down here to pounce when they try to take the painting? That’s the whole plan? Against professionals?”

He straightened, towering over her belligerence. “Sometimes simple is best. Now, you all know what to do, get the hell out of my head.” He herded them out and then flopped down on the couch, sprawled along the length. Melanis had the right of it. The weakness of the plan formed a certainty, not a question. The only question that remained was how had he missed these people infiltrating his base? All of them. Okay, Cerberus he expected, at least to some extent. He didn’t anticipate the Illusive Man being as interested in the organization as he was, but still, he’d expected some level of spying from them.

Reaching over without looking, he grabbed his tray of food from the table and balanced it on his stomach. He needed to arm himself with as much intel as he could find before trying to spring his trap. Sitting up, he shovelled in a couple of mouthfuls, then set the tray down and returned to packing.

“Your office is clear and the detection grid is up, General.” Vortash’s voice rumbled in Garrus’s ear. “The geth are going through your QEC, the one in administration, and the one on your ship.”

“Good work. How subtly do you think we can get tonight’s countermeasure deployed?” He paused to eat as he waited for the answer.

“Very. I’ll disperse the micro-trips in solution, give them to maintenance to spray when they do the floors. No one should be the wiser,” the batarian answered.

“You’re in my office as you’re saying this?” Garrus flipped the lids of his footlockers closed and headed out, his half-eaten tray of food in his hand.

“I’m not even going to dignify that with an answer. Vortash out.”

Garrus grinned. Poking the grouchy old varren never lost its appeal. Hauling his lunch with him, he headed back up to his office to gather as much intel as he could on thieving duos. Some idea of what they faced might help.

Sitting down behind his desk, he took the time to lock his computer out of the network, then started his search with current law enforcement bulletins. He struck gold right off the mark with a recent BOLO from a salarian Spectre named Jondum Bau. After leaving a message asking for more information on Kasumi Goto and Keiji Okuda, Garrus set about moving the rest of his pieces into place.

“Emily Wong.” The young woman’s face appeared on Garrus’s omnitool after a brief delay, but broke into a wide, open smile when she saw him. “General Vakarian. How is my favourite rebel army leader today?”

“Been better.” Still, he smiled. Emily Wong impressed him. For someone who came across as earnest and guileless as she did, she possessed a solid core of courage and attitude. “I need you to get together with Barla Von and do a report for me. We’re going to be going into the big vault and taking out ten pieces for auction. We need to make room to move Winter Garden into secure storage. It doesn’t need to be a huge report, just something about how due to concerns for the security of some of our publicly displayed work, including Winter Garden, we’re going to be bringing in an appraiser to choose … blah blah blah. Von can give you the rest.”

“Will there actually be a sale of these artifacts, General?” Emily asked, a teasing grin playing along her lips. “This smells of a set up.”

He narrowed his eyes at her, one mandible ticking when she just glared back. “The items will be sold. Once advertised, we can’t back out.” He smiled, his head cocking a little. “And I think I’m about to create a new project.” Leaning forward, he said, “It’s one you might like to help with when you have time.”

She laughed. “Fine, you can send me the details when you have them, but back off the General Vakarian charm thing. It’s worrying. Makes me think you’re going to start kissing babies and try to join the council.” She alerted, cocking her head in the intergalactic sign for got a call on another line. “Here’s Von now. I’ll have the news out in a few hours, sir. Have a good trip. Pick me up something nice.”

His mandibles flicked hard. “I’m going to Rannoch, Ilos, and Tuchanka.”

She shrugged. “Then bring me back something that’s not radioactive. Goodbye, General.”

He no sooner hung up with the reporter when he received an incoming message from Jondum Bau. Opening the channel, he drew himself up, settling into his most official pose. “Jondum Bau?”

“I’m Bau,” the salarian replied. His expression carried all the usual salarian attitude, as if their lives were too short to be bothered with most people, but it held a wariness and curiosity as well. “Why would the leader of a mercenary army be contacting me about the most infamous thief in the galaxy?”
The dark and quiet settled around Garrus, a massive, ephemeral leviathan that swallowed him whole. Laying back in an armchair in the darkest corner of the common room, he stretched out his legs, crossing them at the ankle, and cushioned his head in his hands. His eyes slipped closed, the steady mechanical whirr and thump-thump of the building’s heartbeat coaxing him toward sleep.

He pushed himself away from the precipice and the siren call of the peace and rest awaiting him in Shepard’s arms. He needed to stay awake, as much as he ached to hear her voice, to feel the cool softness of her kisses, her body pressed against his. After a long, frustrating day filled with putting out endless fires, falling asleep felt like going home.

His people teased him from time to time about having a wife closeted away somewhere, their guesses ranging from Aria; to Garm, Omega’s Blood Pack Leader; to a particularly heart-wrenchingly ridiculous tale Monteague wove one night about the forbidden union of Garrus and Councillor Tevos. When they pushed, he just laughed and shook his head, refusing to give up that most private and cherished center of his life.

Shepard belonged to him—his bright, solid anchor of sanity—and he never intended to share that. The universe seemed set to devour him whole, needing so much from him, demanding so much of him. Surely, it wouldn’t deny him a single place to just set everything aside.

Dragging his thoughts back to his current circumstance, he sifted through the layers of sound and presence surrounding him, searching for the slightest clue that their thieves planned to make a move. After a moment, he relaxed. No change. His cloaked friend still lingered on a couch a few meters away, his position given away by the slightest nasal rasp when he breathed. Garrus winced as he recalled Shepard making the same noise. Well, she made the same noise for a few seconds before the deafening snoring began.

The other half of the thieving duo had yet to make an appearance. No doubt waiting for those watching over the painting to grow weary and fall asleep. Garrus stretched and melted a little further into his chair. Might as well take advantage of the lull. As he let his mind drift, the building’s music eased him toward the shoreline until finally, the leviathan dove into the depths, carrying him away.

“Bloody fucking hell!” Zaeed’s shout shattered sleep’s hold, loud enough to make Garrus’s head ring.

The general jumped straight up, a hand flying up to block the searingly bright light beaming straight into his face as all the lights switched on. It took him half a second to orient himself as bodies raced around above his head.

“It’s bloody gone,” the merc shouted, his raspy roar bouncing off the walls until it seemed to come from everywhere. “How the … ?”
“Everyone stop!” Garrus shouted, breaking through the cacophony. His people froze. “Melanis, get a stasis field over the main door. Krul lock down the elevator then block the stairs with Zaeed. Martin, Vortash, Sidonis, Montague cover the windows up there.” He strode over to the section of blank wall.

Eyes narrowed, he turned to scan the floor, the only trail through the EM trips tracked from his chair to where he stood. The stairs remained undisturbed as well. Looking up, he stepped right up to the wall and reached out, his palm brushing against paint and canvas.

“How the bloody hell did they get it out of here?” Zaeed hollered, fuming as he paced back and forth across the top of the stairs. “What about your grand plan, General?”

“They didn’t get it out.” Garrus nodded and cocked an eyebrow at the merc. “It’s still right here. They just cloaked it so that we’d run around like crazy people searching while they lifted it off the wall and walked out.” He grinned and looked up. “It’s been five hours. Are you getting tired of hanging up there?” he asked. When he didn’t get an answer, he pulled his sidearm. After making sure he had the training mod installed, he aimed it toward the ceiling. “I’ll give you to the count of three to show yourself.”

“One.” As he counted, Garrus traced the thief’s plan. She obviously didn’t intend to touch the floor, so that meant monofilament line from the painting to the door and a pulley rig. “Two.” Since the painting remained on the wall, she was no doubt at ceiling height right above it.

“Three.” He fired a metre to the right, then a metre wide the other way. Nothing. “Those were a fair warning. I know where you are, and I won’t be missing the next time. Show yourself.”

Nothing.

He aimed dead center and fired. The shot impacted a half metre short of the ceiling, but to the thief’s credit, she didn’t make a sound.

“Stop!” The air above the suspect couch shimmered, a man appearing, standing on the leather seat. “I give up. Just stop. You shot her!”

Garrus nodded. “Yes, I did. She was given far more warning than most would offer in my position.” He gestured with the pistol. “Step down, son.” He waited until the young man did as he was told. “Keiji Okuda?” Holding the human with a narrow-eyed stare, Garrus pointed toward the ceiling with his pistol. “That would mean it’s the infamous Miss Goto hanging up there, nursing a painful bruise?”

A soft grunt of affirmation answered him as Keiji looked down at the floor.

As he looked up, a rumbling sigh rolled from Garrus’s throat, heavy with rapidly failing patience. Some people did not know when to admit defeat. “Come down. Jondum Bau will be here in three hours to take you both into custody unless we arrive at some sort of alternative arrangement. You’re wasting your short and valuable freedom.”

Still nothing. Movements stiff, he aimed his pistol at the same spot. “The gun might not be lethal, Miss Goto, but I’m not above shooting you until you’re good and damned sore.” Grudging admiration for her stubbornness and toughness made his mandibles twitch, but still, he squeezed the trigger. Precious time trickled away as she played her little game of denial.

“All right. All right,” a husky, lilting voice snapped, annoyed and hard … anything but defeated, or even subdued. A lithe, female human figure appeared just below the ceiling. One hand held her pulley control, while the other pressed against her hip. “That hurt.”

Garrus hid a smile at the thief’s indignant tone and crooked a beckoning talon, then pointed to the floor. “It’s supposed to hurt.” He hung his sidearm back on his hip. “Come down from there, so we can talk.” When she made no move to do as he said, he snapped the pistol from his hip and shot her in the same spot. “I’ve reached the end of my patience. Come down, Miss Goto, or I’ll simply have you both held in stasis awaiting Spectre Bau’s arrival.”

The thief squawked as the third round hit, but then activated the pulley and lowered herself to the floor. Grumbling to herself, she pulled the monofilament line through her harness. “It’s your own fault,” she said, throwing the bundle of cord on the floor. “Five hundred million credit painting hanging out in the middle of Omega. Of course someone’s going to steal it.”

Garrus nodded and pointed to the couch where her partner stood. “Take a seat.” As he moved to sit across from them, he couldn’t help but shoot a smirk over his shoulder at the indignant, cussing merc at the top of the stairs. Waiting for her to sit down, he watched them both intently. Goto, as Bau’s information indicated, clearly ran the duo. Keiji quailed as she glided past him, shoulders and spine bristled, all angles and points despite the fluidity of her movement.

“Seriously, General?” the thief asked, her lips twitching in a crooked smile under the hood. “Micro-trips? In a building like this, who needs to touch the floor?” She shook her head as if she expected better. Broadcasting ease and a cocky confidence, she seated herself and crossed her legs at the knee, hands neatly folded in her lap.

“Nice counter-move,” Garrus replied, choking down the urge to point out that she remained quite caught. He sat, shifting to the back of the seat, posture rigid.

She smiled. “You never expected the trips or your little ambush to work.” Nodding once, she continued, “Nice counter-move, yourself.” Looking around, she seemed to either be buying for time or looking for a way out. “So, why are we talking, General?”

Garrus shook his head and leaned back. “I’m sure you’ve been here long enough to know what Archangel is about, Miss Goto.” He stared into her eyes, watching the calculations and formulas whipping around behind the scenes like a massive, complicated network of gears. Nothing that gave him any clue as to whether she could be persuaded showed itself. “We could use people with your infiltration skills.”

Shifting a little, she pushed herself up in the seat and refolded her hands, ordering herself very precisely. “I’m a thief, General, not a spy. You’d be asking us to risk our lives for your worthy cause, but what could possibly be in it for us? Stealing secrets is only profitable if you can sell them.” A quick shake of her head discarded the idea. “I’ll take my chances with Bau and the courts.”

Garrus chuckled, admiring her poker face. “Professionals are all about the game, Miss Goto. The prize isn’t the object; it’s cracking the uncrackable safe, getting into the impenetrable room. I’ve met a few of your kind over the cycles.” His hands lifted to forestall her argument. “Although none to compare with your record or skill.” Leaning forward, Garrus braced against the arms of the chair. “And this would be the most intense, most challenging game of your life. Even your prodigious skills will be pushed to their limits and beyond.” He saw the gears behind those eyes speed up, looking for his angle. “Yes, the missions will be very high risk, but I’d arrange for the rewards to more than compensate you.”

A single flick of one mandible met the tick of appreciation that tugged at the corner of her mouth. He pushed a little harder. “You’d be infiltrating locations controlled by our enemies, so I see no problem with you relieving them of any valuables you might find.” Stiffening, he added a low roll of thunder to his voice. “Providing such procurements don’t risk the larger mission.”

“You’d give us free rein to steal?” Doubt cast shadows over what little of her face he could see. “No kickbacks? No constant threat of being turned over to Bau?” A powdery laugh drifted out. “No offense, General, but I can’t see a single reason to trust you.”

Garrus shrugged. “I’ve given you no reason to distrust me. If you join Archangel and use your talents for the betterment of the galaxy, the organization will shelter and protect you. We’ll make sure you both have solid cover ID’s, and you can base yourself out of these headquarters. You won’t be freelance, no jobs outside the assignments I give you, and you’ll be required to go on missions as I see fit.” He let out a long breath, talons clasping in front of him. “This isn’t a job offer, Miss Goto, it’s a sentence that allows you to continue working at what you do best.”

A mischievous smile flitted across the woman’s face, her eyes cutting across at her partner. “So you’d have us turn Robin Hood?” She laughed, that one coming off genuine as she looked around her at the suspicious faces of his senior staff. “Your men don’t look all that merry, General.”

“Probably because someone has been lurking inside our home, taking advantage of our trust while they plotted to steal from us.” Reminding himself to ask about Robin Hood later, Garrus tilted his head, studying her and her silent partner for tells. As cool as she tried to come across, he could see that being caught had thrown her off, as he’d hoped. The young man still looked rattled by Garrus shooting his partner. Rattled and angry. Garrus nodded. He could use both reactions.

Pushing himself up out of his seat, he said, “For tonight, you can both sleep up in ‘Susan from accounting’s’ quarters under guard. When Bau arrives, we’ll put him up for the rest of the night as well.”

He stepped forward, towering over the seated thieves. “Tomorrow I leave for Rannoch. I’m expecting trouble, so if you decide you’d prefer working with me over going to prison, I’ll expect Miss Goto to be ready to ship out at 0630.” He looked at Keiji. “You’ll stay behind to help my people seal up our electronic security breaches. If you choose not to join us, Bau will take custody of you at that time.”

Crooking a finger to his people, he beckoned them down. “Please see our guests to their quarters and keep them under heavy guard.” Pivoting on his talons, he strode to the wall and lifted the still-cloaked Winter Garden from its hanger. “This will be leaving for our main vault as planned. Goodnight, Miss Goto … Mr. Okuda.”

Without so much as glancing back, Garrus jogged up the stairs and entered his room, locking and encoding the door behind him.

“Did I give them enough incentive?” he whispered to the dim shadows. “Staying any longer seemed too much like begging, but … .” Stepping up next to the couch, he started snapping the seals on his armour. He never knew how Shepard did it. The woman had a gift for knowing just how far to push someone, and just the right buttons to tweak. They might want to punch her in the face by the time she finished, but she always learned what she needed to know, and always found a way to swing the relationship back around to something productive.

Once free of his armour, he considered a shower for about twenty seconds before climbing into bed. A glance at his chrono confirmed that he was already three hours late getting home. Closing his eyes, he let out a long breath, sinking down into the mattress. Sleep reached up eagerly, dragging him down into its grip.
A forest surrounded him on all sides. Garrus stumbled a couple of steps, completely disoriented. Turning in loose, lurching circles, he nearly fell to one knee, finally reaching out to catch himself against one of the dry, chalky trunks. Fear and confusion shoved back and forth, fighting for dominance.

“Where am I?” he called out, but only the echo of his own words replied. “Shepard?” He set out toward what appeared to be a break in the trees. Low bushes wrapped around his legs, leafy adversaries trying to hold him back, but from what? Where the hell was he? He’d never even seen a forest like the one around him with its white-trunked, broad-leafed trees. Reaching out, he tore a leaf from the branch, its texture impossibly thin and delicate between his talons.

Above him, the sky darkened as if responding to his mood, pressing down on him with the impending threat of a storm. In the distance, thunder slammed through the sky, rippling through the clouds. Impossible. All of it amounted to something both unnatural and impossible, at least from his perspective.

“Not my dream?” he muttered aloud. “But … .” The fear from earlier exploded in his gut, an incendiary grenade blasting shards of searing dread through his entire being. Shepard. Somehow, the strange place, the impossible storm, it was all about her. He sped up, jogging a few steps until another clap of thunder tore through the air, sending the clouds scuttling ahead of a solid, steel-coloured, wall of water.

Garrus bolted. As surely as he’d ever known anything, he knew that he needed to reach Shepard before the rain did. “Shepard!” he yelled, barely able to hear himself over the coming storm. “Shepard! Where are you?”

A slight lightening a hundred or so metres ahead gave him a target. Leaping over fallen trees and thick brambles, he raced toward what he hoped was open ground, his gaze drawn back to the approaching wall of water. If it reached her before he did, he just knew he’d never see her again. The fear ripened to an unreasonable panic, splitting open to spill out its rotten fruit. He couldn’t do it. He couldn’t keep going without her arms to return to every night.

One moment, the trees pressed thick and implacable, surrounding him on all sides, the next, he ran out into open meadowland. Tall, wispy grass laid down before the wind, sweeping low above a thicker carpet of green. Maybe ten metres away, Shepard sat on the ground, her back to him, legs drawn up to her chest, arms wrapped around them. It took him a moment to realize that he could see through her, the grass blowing in front of her showing through her translucent form.

“Shepard?” He stopped, hesitating when she didn’t acknowledge his call. “Shepard?” Looking up to see the storm crashing down, almost directly overhead, he extended his hand. “Come on, we’ve got to get out of here.”

Her entire body undulated with a long, heavy sigh. “It’s time, Garrus,” she said, her voice flat and slick, plastic words from a puppet’s mouth.

Stumbling forward two steps, he flexed his talons, as if he could will her hand into his. “What do you mean, Shepard? Time for what?”

Arms and legs unfolding like the petals of a flower opening to catch the rain, Shepard stood and turned to face him. Her lips lifted into a smile, but it didn’t touch the rest of her face. “Time for you to stop living in here, Garrus. There’s no future with me in this shadow of life. Time for you to let me go and start looking toward the future.”

“No, Shepard. You know I don’t want that.” He leaped forward, snatching at her. “Stay with me, please. I need you.”

The rain slammed down on them like a giant hand from the sky, nearly driving Garrus into the ground. He staggered and managed to regain his balance. Shepard merely looked up, a mild expression of surprise on her face.

Water streamed over her skin, first blurring her features, then slowly erasing them. “I love you, Garrus Vakarian. We’ll meet again.” She held out her hand, delicate digits trembling. “Good-bye.”

“Shepard?” Garrus grabbed her hand, but his talons just passed straight through as she continued to fade, her sad smile and outstretched fingers disappearing last.

* * * * *

One left behind certain moments when they left behind life—all the silly grudges and embarrassments. One also left behind disappointments because they stopped mattering about a second after they occurred.

One left behind hope. Losing the pull of that tingly hook of sunshine rooted in good and deep behind your heart, hurt and it hurt bad. But what use is a hook that pulls you forward by promising better days ahead when the days have run out?

One carried along certain things as well, naturally. Sadness softly faded from loss, and joy saturated the cherished.

Only one thing called out from the darkness, and it wasn’t fear, need, or any great cause, which was surprising, frankly. Damned surprising.

No, only one regret persisted, a single hopeless ember burning in the vacuum that consisted of three simple words. Words that could have brought him joy. Words that remained jealousy and fearfully guarded instead of being shared.

Yeah, that one rated a twelve.
Garrus watched his flagship shrink on the vid screen, pride glowing warm and deep. It hung in the black, poised above the arc of the planet like a great raptor locked onto its prey. The first of her kind, the Passchendaele never failed to amaze him. Sleek, deadly, and beautiful, she embodied the best of human, turian, and geth design, each influence obvious, but seamlessly blended into the whole.

“She’s a beauty,” Kasumi said, dropping her cloak to appear just behind Garrus’s elbow.

He nodded, but then looked down at her. “There are three of us in this shuttle. We all know you’re here, so you don’t need to stay cloaked.”

“Don’t I?” She shrugged, a sly smile darting across her lips before she vanished again.

“That’s going to get old really fast,” Martin said, a rough sigh carrying along a couple of curses for the ride.

Garrus thumped into a seat, silently agreeing with Martin. The thief had a playfulness about her that lightened the anchors wrapped around his neck, but her growing infatuation with torturing Martin had already started to prove tiresome.

“I’m a force of nature, robot armour boy. Get used to it,” the thief’s voice said from the seat next to him.

“And so is that,” Martin said, the words squeezing out between clenched teeth. “And you’re not a force of nature, you’re a pustulating abscess on the ass—”

“That’ll be enough, thanks, Martin,” Garrus interrupted. “Let’s try to keep things civil.” He flopped back into the seat, a hand over his eyes. A bright, white spark of pain settled in behind his brow plates as he considered a couple of weeks worth of their bickering.

“Get used to the abscess thing, too,” Kasumi said, this time from the seat across from Martin.

“Are we there, yet?” Martin cried, moving to the seat next to the bulkhead.

Garrus grinned and shook his head. “Fifteen minutes.” He stretched out, arms behind his head, and closed his eyes. “Just relax and enjoy the quiet.” An implacable anchor, exhaustion pulled Garrus down into the seat. Even fifteen minutes worth of sleep would help ease the ache in his joints, but the anchor hit the bottom before it pulled him into sleep. Letting out a shallow sigh, he let himself float. If he slept, he’d just spend the entire time searching for Shepard anyway, and like the past two nights, she’d still be gone.

“Why are we using the shuttle? Base One has docks now.” Martin sighed. “Let’s face it, sailing in with the stabilizers at full extension, the Passch makes quite the impression.”
Garrus opened one eye a slit as Martin changed the vid screen to show the planet, zooming in on their destination, the new capital. The small settlement remained officially unnamed, its residents referring to it as Base One.

“We don’t need to make an impression, you in particular,” Garrus said, closing his eye again. “Or are you forgetting about screaming and running through the camp in your underwear because you found a small lizard-thing in your tent on our last visit?”

“Now, see, had I been here, I could have recorded the whole thing for posterity,” Kasumi said from the pilot’s compartment, “and no one would have been the wiser. If it leaked to the extranet … well, those things happen.”

Martin growled. “Why did we bring the criminal?” he demanded, and not for the first time. “We would have done just fine without her tagging along.”

Garrus grumbled and shifted in his seat, stretching a little. “She’s not tagging along. She’s here to help us figure out what’s going on. All I got from Tali’s answers to my questions is that someone is agitating for war.”

He understood how resentment and anger could fester after more than three centuries of exile, but surely, a peaceful means of returning to their home had to be worth trying to leave the anger behind. Apparently, some of the quarians didn’t think so.

Kasumi materialized right in front of him. “Having an invisible set of eyes never hurts,” she said. “They can have a much wider range of vision.”

Garrus looked up at her, the spark of a headache rapidly growing into something that would take major fire suppression gear to put out. “Stop that, but yes. You’re both going to have plenty to keep you occupied. Now just sit down and shut up. If one of you starts repeating everything the other one says, you’re both going out the hatch.”

Slumping back into the seat, Garrus went back over his list of questions, wishing he’d asked Tali for more specific information. Her answers just led to more questions and a sick sort of dread stemming from the fact it felt as though she was hiding things from him. He really hoped that part could be chalked up to the vagueness of their code.

“Hey, General?”

Garrus looked up, the worried tone of Martin’s voice grabbing his attention instantly. “What is it?” He sat up.

“Look.” Martin pointed to the vid screen, and several quarian ships hanging low and tight over Rannoch’s northern pole. “That can’t be good, can it?”

Garrus just shook his head. None of the ships were civilian vessels, but ones from the heavy fleet. A dry, heated wind of dread blew through him, and he wished he’d asked Nihlus to divert from chasing ghosts. At the base of his neck, where plate solidified into cowl, a prickle jabbed into his spine, twisting a little. He pushed the warning aside. He didn’t need to have any sort of brilliant skills or talents to realize things on Rannoch had escalated far past what Tali led him to believe, but he couldn’t very well do anything until they landed.

Thankfully, Martin and Kasumi listened to him and spent the last few minutes of the trip in silence. Still, Garrus thrust himself up out of his seat before the shuttle touched down, eager to find closure for all his nagging doubts. He flung the hatch open, the shuttle’s thrusters sending billowing clouds of dust flying up in his face. Throwing his hand up to shield himself from the worst of it, he jumped down, eyes already scanning for any sign of trouble.

Tali hurried up the gravel road toward the docks, the chipped, red rock crunching and grinding under her feet. He’d worried that he and the other two should be fully suited up, but Tali and the two quarians bringing in a lift for their footlockers all wore complete suits and masks. Garrus frowned even as he strode out to meet Tali. He’d thought the geth had been accelerating the process to free them from their cloth prisons.

“Garrus!” Tali lifted a hand as she closed the last few metres. “Welcome to Rannoch, General Vakarian.” Her hand dropped, extending toward him as she stopped a half-metre away. “Thank you for pushing us up to the top of the list,” she said, glancing around her as if worried that someone was listening in. “Sorry my call for help came so last minute, but Legion and I have been trying our best to fix the situation on our own.” When Garrus grasped her hand, she pulled him into a hug. “It’s good to see you.”

“It’s good to see you too.” Garrus gave the quarian a squeeze and a couple of pats between her shoulder blades. “And it wasn’t a problem … at least once Wrex stopped shouting at me.” He backed out of the embrace and stepped past her, walking to the edge of the landing area.

“Hey, Tali,” Martin greeted her, giving her a quick hug as well. “Beware the invisible criminal.”

“Invisible criminal?” Tali asked, walking up beside Garrus.

“He means me,” Kasumi said, appearing on Garrus’s other side. “Nice planet you have here.”

Tali glanced back and forth between Garrus and the thief, then nodded. “Thanks.”

Garrus stared down the nearly thirty metres to the main quarian settlement spread along the cliff walls, admiring the buildings that rose from the red stone like sculptures. They’d been formed out of the natural materials in much the same manner as turian dwellings, but the shape of them definitely harkened back to previous quarian architecture.

Garrus let out a low whistle. “Wow,” he said, stunned by the beauty spread out before him. Everything about the settlement flowed in a seamless whole, buildings, roads, and garden spaces growing out of and moving through the landscape as if they’d been formed by the wind and sea rather than hands and tools. The dim sun gleaming red-gold off every surface and the wild shots of green cacti and brilliant flowers transformed the little village into a masterpiece.

She looked up at him, but sadness rolled off her in waves rather than pride. “I told you to trust me … that it would be worth living in the camp a while longer rather than throwing up those ugly prefabs.”

Garrus nodded. “You were right. I take it those architects I sent were of some use?” He could see the influence of the turian team through the tiered construction and the sweeping, organic lines of the buildings. Turians loved their fortifications, but more than that, they liked their fortifications to be works of art. If you threw up a wall, it told the enemy you intended to keep them out, but if you transformed that wall into a work of art, it said that you fully expected that wall to perform its task forever. It was a subtle form of intimidation, but an effective one.

After looking down at Base One for another moment, the prickle at the base of his neck started heating up again. Something was off. It took him about five seconds to recognize the issue.

“When I came here six months ago,” he said, turning to face Tali, “there were five geth platforms on the street for every quarian.” His hand swept out as if erasing the previous scene in favour of the current. “Where are all the geth, Tali?” He looked back, dread moving in as his eyes confirmed it. Not a single geth moved between the buildings.

“That’s why I asked you to come.” She gestured down the road and hurried ahead. “We’ll walk back. It’ll give me time to fill you in as we go.”

Garrus strode at her side, giving her a moment to start before he gave in to the many questions trying to turn the conversation into an interrogation. The combination of Tali’s demeanour and the missing geth screamed along his every nerve. Something had been going on that would bring shame to Shepard’s efforts for peace, and he couldn’t abide that. Especially with her disappearance scraping those same nerves raw.

“So, why aren’t there geth in your suits? I thought you were getting to the point where you didn’t have to be masked all the time?” he asked when Tali just wrung her hands. The slump in her posture at the questions told him more than he wanted to know.

The sigh that dragged out of Tali sounded like stone grinding against metal; harsh, jagged, and uncharacteristic. “Admiral Xen announced a couple of months ago that she believed there was a danger that those of us on the planet were being controlled by the geth,” Tali said, starting down the slope toward the settlement.

“Because you’re allowing them into your suits?” Garrus looked up as a group of quarian passed by, all of them looking as spooked and jittery as Tali. What the hell was going on?

“Exactly. She insisted that we all return to the flotilla for tests, so we agreed to come back in pairs, but that wasn’t good enough. She and her growing army of doctors and experts wants us all to come back together.” Tali flipped her hands, a small, frustrated gesture. “We’ve refused, because we know that we’re not being controlled, and we won’t be pulled off and held prisoner to their paranoia.”

“Admiral Xen.” He let out a long breath almost as jagged as the quarian’s. “She’s still agitating?”

He swore Tali rolled her eyes behind her mask. “Of course. Worse than ever. She’s even started saying that the Admiralty Board had no right to decide unilaterally for resettlement and that they should all have to resign in favour of a new board.” Another sigh, this one more musical as it cut the air between them. “At least that isn’t going anywhere because technically all they did was approve the expeditionary team. The Conclave voted for continuing the survey process and unanimously in favour of resettlement should things progress.”

“So, why do you need us?” Martin asked, jogging up on Tali’s other side. “And where is Legion? I thought he’d be here to meet us.”

“Tali’Zorah!” A female quarian raced up the road toward them. As she slid to a stop in front of them, her feet lost purchase on the loose stone. Arms flailing, she nearly went down on her backside.

Garrus jumped forward and grabbed her arm, just managing to hold her on her feet. Once she caught herself, he released her and stepped back, her frantic haste tying the knot in his gut tighter.

“Thank you, sir,” she gasped, her chest heaving as if she’d run a couple of kilometers. In the next breath, her attention snapped over to Tali. “Tali’Zorah, Arax and a squad of primes just walked up to the south wall. Arax asked for you.”
Tali nodded, and let out a shaky breath. “Run ahead and tell the geth that I’m on my way.”

Garrus looked back and forth between them, cursing the masks that hid their expressions. Beneath their words, he sensed a current racing thick and fast, a landslide racing down a mountainside to wash them all away. Again, he wished he’d dragged Nihlus along.

The young female nodded, took a couple of gasping breaths, then turned and bolted down the road toward town.

Garrus focused on Tali, a growing, sick feeling of disgust writhing through him as he watched the quarian squirm, trying to avoid his stare. “Tali, if you don’t just tell me the truth about what’s going on here … .” He left the threat open, not completely sure what he’d do. As much as he cared about the quarian and admired her courage, the shame he felt coming off of her left him cold. “Why are there no geth in the settlement?”

She set off, leaving him behind. “You know that the geth started making more advanced units based on Legion’s prototype?” She glanced over at him as he caught up, continuing when he nodded. “They wanted more autonomy, the increased intelligence of more runtimes in each platform.” She cleared her throat. “And they thought it would make interacting with us easier.”

Her hands started wringing once again. “The flotilla was concerned about the new platforms’ combat applications and asked us to run scans, send back any information we could gather on them.”

Garrus shook his head, seeing the landslide veering off course, headed straight for the tiny village of peaceful coexistence. “Did you ask the geth before you started treating them like enemy lab subjects?”

Tali’s shoulders dropped even further as she shook her head. “No. The Admiralty Board and Conclave formed the Rannoch Resettlement Committee to oversee our efforts and monitor the geth. They ordered us to remain silent. I argued with them, refused to do it myself, but a lot of the group were still nervous about the geth and agreed.” For a moment, she seemed to teeter on the edge of making some sort of excuse. He really hoped she didn’t. “I kept an eye on the others, stopped them when I caught them, but I didn’t do enough. I let the committee intimidate me.”

The mudslide took out the town, little villagers screaming as the mud washed them away, pulling them down into the muck of insanity.

“After a couple of months, we’d all gotten to know a lot of the geth, worked side by side with them, and considered them friends,” Tali said, her shoulders rising, her spine straightening as some steel fortified her words. “At the same time, the committee’s demands became more invasive. Samples of their materials, hack and copy any code we could.” She shuddered. As they reached the bottom of the slope, she held an arm out to usher them along a street to their right. “We all refused to continue without asking the geth for permission.”

Garrus nodded, unwilling to say anything to dismiss the quarians’ abuse of the geths’ sapient rights. That this committee had taken advantage of nervous children boiled in his blood. Had they done the same to any other race, they would have been dragged before the council for crimes against sapience. And so, he seethed, a seven foot explosive building to detonation, and waited through Tali’s pause.

“The first of the advanced platforms disappeared about a month after we refused to continue the testing.” She hesitated, swallowing loud enough for him to hear it even over the noise of their feet on the rock before she continued, “The next disappeared ten days later.” Lifting her eyes from the road, she turned to look up at him, then at the houses around them.

“How many, Tali? And how long has this been going on?” He kept his voice soft despite the razor-keen edge, the knot in his gut tightened until it became all he could do to keep from retching.

“Thirty-five,” she answered, her voice barely loud enough for him to hear it. “Over the last year.”

Garrus stopped so suddenly that his boots continued to roll over the flaky, red shale. Backpedaling, he just managed to stay on his feet. “Thirty-five in a year?” He reached up, raking his talons over his fringe as the knot unspooled, releasing itself in fury. “How could you and Legion keep this from me for a year, Tali? What have you been doing to locate them?” At the end of the street, movement caught his attention. A platform that looked very much like Legion stood at the head of a cluster of primes. “Does the flotilla know that geth have been going missing? Did you report it to anyone?”

Tali shook her head. “No. Legion and I decided to keep it to ourselves just in case the committee was responsible.” She shrugged. “At first, we thought it was just platforms leaving for the space stations or the shipyards on Haestrom. Then we started to worry that maybe the disappearances were either heretics that hadn’t really rejoined the geth … or their victims.”

Ice spread through Garrus’s veins as he kept his eyes on the geth. Heretics, still functioning, possibly subverting the rest of the geth. If that was the case, the quarians were right to keep ships on hand. “When did the geth find out about your scans and tests?” Spirits, how had everything ended up so turned inside out? “Could heretics have thought you discovered them?”

Tali shifted further away. “The geth knew all along. When the committee ordered us back because they thought we were being controlled, we knew the chance was nil, because the geth had left months before. It’s impossible to be controlled by geth who aren’t even there.” She shrugged. “The scans I saw didn’t show anything out of the ordinary, but it’s possible that heretic runtimes might have thought we’d discovered their presence.”

“Was it just the ones in your suits that withdrew?” he asked, starting back toward the waiting geth. What a spirit-cursed mess.

“At first, but as more platforms disappeared along with thousands of runtimes, they all withdrew to their base and the space stations.” Tali’s voice thickened, taking on a nasal tone as if she fought back tears. “Could heretics have thought you discovered them?”

Tali shifted further away. “The geth knew all along. When the committee ordered us back because they thought we were being controlled, we knew the chance was nil, because the geth had left months before. It’s impossible to be controlled by geth who aren’t even there.” She shrugged. “The scans I saw didn’t show anything out of the ordinary, but it’s possible that heretic runtimes might have thought we’d discovered their presence.”

“Was it just the ones in your suits that withdrew?” he asked, starting back toward the waiting geth. What a spirit-cursed mess.

“At first, but as more platforms disappeared along with thousands of runtimes, they all withdrew to their base and the space stations.” Tali’s voice thickened, taking on a nasal tone as if she fought back tears. “Even Legion.”

Garrus stopped again, not as abruptly that time. “Is that why Legion isn’t here? Is Arax its … their replacement?” He stumbled over the proper pronoun. If Legion had stepped back from the colonization process, Garrus needed to pull the geth back into it. Of all the geth, he trusted Legion to be straight with him if the geth had a heretic problem. After a couple of seconds, when Tali still hadn’t answered, he scowled. No. Dear spirits, not Legion.

“Arax is Legion’s replacement,” Tali said at last, “but because four days ago, I convinced Legion to come down to speak with me. I wanted to apologize. I got an idea that I thought could help us find the missing geth and get everything back on track.” She stared down the road to where the geth waited. “He disappeared before he even reached Base One.” The silver reflections of her eyes stared up at him. “I called you to come help, because Legion’s vanished just like the others, Garrus.” Her hands flopped at her sides. “I don’t know what to do.”

Garrus let out a long breath. If there were heretics running amok, Legion would definitely be at the top of their hit list before they started making any moves. Still, if Tali and Legion had kept the disappearances a secret from the flotilla, why were the quarians poised for war? What had them on “First things first,” he said. “Let’s go see what our friends want.” He led the way down the street, not caring how it looked to anyone if he took charge. Events had accelerated beyond that.

“Creator Zorah, Vakarian-General,” Arax greeted them as they approached. The platform extended a hand, shaking Garrus’s when the general took it. “Geth orbital stations have scanned fifteen quarian vessels over Rannoch’s magnetic north pole.”

Garrus nodded. “Yes, we saw them as we landed.” Stopping, he waited for the other foot to drop. The geth hadn’t come out of their seclusion just to say that they’d seen some ships.

“Probability of creator aggression, high. Geth must prepare to defend themselves. We recommend that creator units currently housed in area designated Base One evacuate to avoid injury or death.”

Garrus shook his head and cut the air with a hand. “There isn’t going to be an attack. Tali’Zorah asked me for my help figuring out what is going on, and that is what I intend to do.” He stepped up to meet Arax eye to eye. “Do you have any information on the geth that have disappeared? Where they last reported in, last transmissions received … anything of that nature?”

The geth cocked its head, the flaps around its light rising and falling in a slow wave. “We will provide Vakarian-General with the information geth have gathered into the disappearance of allied runtimes, but all efforts to locate missing geth have met with failure. Conflict with the creator fleet is inevitable.”

“What’s changed?” Garrus demanded, frustration bleeding into his voice, hard-edged and raw. “A year ago, the geth believed in peace. They believed that geth and quarians could live cooperatively. What happened between then and now?”

Arax stepped back, the primes encircling the platform protectively. “Creators ran tests without geth permission. The geth believe the creators responsible for the missing platforms and all runtimes housed within. They conduct covert scans of all geth operations, including those supporting the Archangel initiative. The conclusion is that they are testing for weaknesses and preparing for war.”

Garrus pushed in, not willing to let them close the conversation down. “I just arrived, and I won’t be allowing anyone to attack anything.” He’d have to call Nihlus and get him there with a dozen Archangel vessels to keep the two sides away from one another. “Send me everything you have that might help me track down the missing platforms. Give me a chance to figure this out before everyone panics and we start evacuating people in preparation for a war I don’t think anyone wants.” Garrus leaned in to meet Arax eye to flashlight. “Peace is still worth taking a chance, isn’t it?”

Dust exploded up from the ground, billowing up in a blinding, choking cloud. Garrus covered his eyes, and turned to face the new threat. Looking up, he saw a large shape through the dust. A frigate? He grabbed Tali’s arm and dragged her back away from the ship as it settled to the ground right where they’d been standing. The thrusters still whipping dust and debris into the air, the ramp dropped, a small contingent of Marines marching down to surround them.

“Tali’Zorah vas Rannoch,” the last quarian off the ship called out. He stopped a couple of metres back. “The Admiralty Board sent us to return you and your expeditionary force to the flotilla for medical testing.”

Garrus stepped forward, but before he could say anything, Kal’Reegar raced in, sliding between Tali and the newcomer, his rifle ready in his hands. “The hell they did,” the Marine shouted over the roar of thrusters. “No one on this rock is going anywhere.”
“Nihlus, things here are worse than I anticipated.” Garrus glanced behind him. Tali paced back and forth across the office while Kal’Reegar stood guard inside the door.

“Worse than several million missing colonists?” Nihlus cocked a hip and crossed his arms, one plate climbing his brow.

Garrus focused his attention back on the Spectre. “Unbelievably, yes. We’re balanced on the edge of war here, Nihlus.” Shaking his head, he raked his talons over his fringe. “Over the last cycle, thirty five geth platforms have disappeared, so forty thousand or more geth. Legion was the last to vanish.” He paced to the edge of the QEC pad and back. “Tali says she and Legion suspected that heretics might have infiltrated the geth and be behind it, but the quarians are acting suspicious as well.” Stopping back at center, Garrus leaned into the console. “I need your help, Nihlus. And I need the _Normandy_ and a half dozen heavy frigates to park between the quarians and geth.”

The Spectre nodded, the steel in his spine snapping straight. “I’ll be on my way within the hour.” He scowled his ‘all business, decision made, fill me in’ scowl, mandibles giving a hard flick. “What’s the situation on the ground?”

“The Admiralty Board sent a frigate to pick up the survey team, ostensibly for health and safety testing, but I believe it was to get them out of the crossfire.” His frustration escaped in a low rumble that slipped beneath his words. “Between my keen diplomatic skills and Kal’Reegar’s rifle, we negotiated a compromise.” He keyed in information. “Tali and I have to meet with the Admiralty Board at the flotilla tomorrow. Can you join us there?”

The Spectre nodded. “Send me everything you have. I’ll go over it on the way.” He let out a long sigh, his hawk’s glare softening a little. “You look like crap, Garrus. Have you slept at all?”

The general shrugged. “You can nag me about looking like shit when you get here. I’ve got to head out and see if I can find any evidence of what happened to Legion before it gets too dark.” Garrus let out a long breath. “See you tomorrow, and thanks.” He hung up the call, then packaged up everything he had on the geth situation and sent it to Nihlus.

“All right.” He turned to the other two occupants of the room. “Kal, I need you to stay at Base One, and make sure no one tries to forcibly remove anyone.” Striding over to lay a hand on the Marine’s shoulder, he looked past Reegar, out the door. “I don’t want to make it too easy for anyone to start shooting.”

“And what about me?” Tali asked, stepping up on Garrus’s other side, a little of her usual bounce returning.

Garrus thumped Reegar on the shoulder, then hit the door control, ushering Tali through as it opened. “You’re going to help me track and find Legion.” He led the way down onto the street, pulling in a deep breath and stretching his shoulders as he stopped and looked down at the quarian.
“I’m a little out of practice, but I did once investigate cases for a living.”

Opening the file the geth had sent him, he sifted through the insane amount of data to find Legion’s. “Legion left the upper entrance to their base.” Glancing back to Tali, he asked, “You know where that is?”

“Yes.” She nodded toward the part of town where they’d met Arax, beckoning with a wave. “Come on, General. We’re going to have to move fast. It’ll be getting dark in a couple of hours.”

Hesitating, she glanced over her shoulder, looking around. “Where are Martin and the invisible criminal?”

“Keeping an eye out.” As much as he trusted Tali, Garrus left it at that. He’d sent Kasumi to see what she could learn from lurking around the rest of the expeditionary team, and sent Martin into the wilderness around Base One to do some recon.

The general looked up into the twilight sky. Despite not being able to see the space stations around the planet, he knew they could most assuredly see him. If heretic geth were to blame for the disappearances, who knew how deep the infection ran and how much of the Reaper agenda still played out around them. Suddenly, everything he’d spent the past cycle building felt like a trap poised with its jaws set to snap closed on him.

Taking a deep breath, he pushed aside concerns for the integrity of Archangel’s entire fleet of geth manufactured ships, and all the geth weaponry and other research. Before he panicked and started tearing Archangel apart, he needed to find Legion. Nobody disappeared without a trace, not even geth.

They walked in silence until the massive geth structure rose out of the rocky hills and cliffs. Garrus stopped and looked up, but through an analytical eye that searched for weaknesses rather than admiring the sweeping gold and bronze lines … the industrial beauty of the place. Storming a compound that well fortified would prove impossible if push came to shove. The geth certainly knew how to defend their holdings.

“So, where’s the upper entrance?” Garrus asked, scanning the cliffs surrounding them, the layered rock pressing in and down on them. He squinted, having trouble seeing detail as the semi-polar day darkened toward mid-afternoon.

“Up there,” Tali said, pointing to a part of the building lined up with the top of the cliffs. “We can get up there two ways, the easiest means climbing up the pipes.”

Garrus walked over to the cluster of huge pipes, leaning against them as he looked up. “Is this how Legion would have come down?” Shoving himself back, he shook his head. “There’s a door right there.” He cut a hand toward a large double door twenty meters to their left. “Why didn’t he just come out there?” No, his gut told him that Legion left via the upper entrance for a reason, and it wasn’t a nice climb down thirty or so metres of pipes.

“I don’t know.” Tali turned back the way they’d come. “The only other way down is to come down the hill. There’s a barely passable slope back down the road a ways. It’s not an easy climb or descent.”

Garrus looked at the maze of pipes for another minutes, then shook his head. “If Legion came down this way and anything happened, the geth would have seen. They’ve got surveillance everywhere.” He turned. “Lead on to the difficult slope.”

Ten minutes later, the pair of them scrambled up a steep slope of loose shale and scrub plants. The sky painted the entire landscape a pale blue-purple as Tikkun’s weak rays headed for the horizon.

“I don’t know how you do it,” Garrus said, gasping a little as they paused for a breather. He turned up the cooling in his armour to counteract the combination of exertion and daytime temperatures. Even that close to the polar region, Rannoch’s average temperature of 48 C only dipped down to about 35 C. “I feel like I’m going blind.” Shadows clung deep and thick around every surface and object, seeming to shift, skittering across the ground. He blinked rapidly for a moment. That part had to be exhaustion.

“Quarian eyes are made for it,” Tali said. “That’s the reason our masks are shaded out amongst the rest of you. Everything is too bright.” She started up the slope, skirting a thick tangle of bramble-like cacti.

“So, the silver we see is reflection?” he asked, jumping up a ledge as he followed her. “You have mirrored surfaces inside your eyes to bounce the light around.” He chuffed as he stumbled into a wash. “You’d better take point.”

Tali chuckled as she passed him. “Probably best and not just because my eyesight is better. I know where we’re going, and you don’t. Who knows where we’ll end up with you taking the lead.” She picked her way up a winding path, pausing now and again to point out hazards.

Garrus scanned the area with both his omnitool and visor as they climbed. For the first fifty metres or so, the ground appeared virgin, disturbed only by animal tracks. He crouched down to check them out, wanting to judge how long the ground preserved traces of movement. Although it had been a long time and all his lessons had been on Palaven’s soil, he guessed the tracks to be four or five days old. On that leeward side of the cliff, the uneven ground and low scrub kept the wind from blowing away the soil.

Garrus turned to look out past the geth base. It loomed even larger from above. Beyond, a wide river flowed through a canyon, the water sparkling with a million shades of colour. Even with the base—the monstrous hive of machinery that it was—hanging over his right shoulder, the entire scene before him felt like a symbiotic whole. The energy and life of the place flowed with a light, hushed peace.

“You coming?” Tali called. “It’s going to start getting dark for real soon, and we don’t want to be climbing up here when the sun goes down.”

Garrus opened his mouth to answer, but stopped, a chill shudder running down his spine. Something tweaked his inner alarm. Turning a slow circle, he searched for anything that could explain the sudden dark tear he felt in the fabric of the place. Nothing showed itself, but the feeling continued to build.

On a father/son hunting trip when Garrus was a boy, he and his father had been stalked by an ungentira, the aggressive predator following their every move for kilometers. His father told him that they’d be fine as long as they didn’t behave like prey, but it had been six of the most terrifying hours of Garrus’s life. That same shiver, the anticipation of death flying at him out of the shadows, arced down his spine like lightning.

Don’t act like prey.

“Garrus?” Tali edged closer, her posture suddenly rigid, the silver reflections of her eyes darting about as she reacted to his alarm. “Are you okay?”

As she turned to cover her back against his side, her hand reaching for her shotgun, he nodded and forced himself to give her a reassuring smile. “Yeah, I was just thinking about how peaceful Rannoch feels, even with AI-built constructions erupting from the ground. I hope it can maintain that once cities start going up.” He swept a hand toward their path. “We better keep moving.”

“Okay.” Her eyes stayed locked on him long enough that he knew she saw through his lie, but she just turned and continued up the slope.

After switching on his flashlight, Garrus followed, keeping the beam wandering back and forth over the ground as if merely watching where he put his feet. Eyes watched them, he could feel them like cold fingers sliding over his hide. He just needed to figure out the watcher’s hiding place.

The first clue wandered onto their path five metres later. Two sets of quarian footprints appeared at the base of a high ledge, travelling along beside it, no doubt waiting for an easy way up. Garrus faked a stumble and went down on one knee, using the moment to get a better look at the tracks. They seemed fairly fresh, a day old at most.

“Keelah, you’re clumsy,” Tali exclaimed, turning back. “Are you okay, or do you need me to carry you?” Her fists returned to her hips in a gesture so reminiscent of his mother that a pang of homesickness squeezed his chest tight for a moment. Tali seemed to have decided to follow the Shepard method of running a crew, turning everyone into a big family. The band around his ribs squeezed harder for a couple of breaths then loosened.

Garrus drew her attention to the footprints then stood, shaking the rest off. “I’m fine, just wasn’t looking where I was going. I’ve lived on a space station for over a cycle, the floors are all flat there.” He looked up at the ledge. “We’re going to find somewhere a little saner to climb that, right?”

Tali gave him a quick nod and headed down the path. “It gets climbable up here a bit further.” She turned back. “Will you be okay, or do you want to hop on my back?” She crouched down a little.

“You’re cruel, Tali’Zorah vas Rannoch. Shepard taught you well.” He winked and hopped up ahead of her, using the moment of balancing himself with a hand on the ground to brush aside the prickly plant stalks. A thrill of mixed excitement and fear sizzled along his nerves. The tracks led up the hill away from the geth base, joining a much more travelled path. Along the path, geth footprints mixed with quarian, trampling the ground to where he didn’t need his flashlight to pick them out.

Picking his way along the ledge as he followed the trail, he felt Tali hurry up behind him, one small hand latching onto his armour. Garrus reached up and patted her fingers, suspecting she’d begun to feel the same dark pressure of unseen eyes. He turned his flashlight to the path, but aimed it high, past caring if his quarry knew he was tracking them. The growing darkness danced along every nerve, prying at them like crowbars dragging a stubborn nail screaming from the wood.

“Garrus—”

He threw up a hand to silence Tali as the dry trickle of falling sand and pebbles whispered up the trail from several metres ahead. Foot catching, Garrus hobble-stepped to a halt, shining the light ahead, but seeing nothing. He glanced toward the setting sun, the already weak rays washing the entire landscape in indigo with obsidian shadows. After a moment, he closed his eyes, straining to hear past the echo of his heartbeat bouncing off the inside of his skull.

Rannoch crouched beneath its pale sun like a sleeper long resigned to never waking, even the wind moved silently over the rock, no insects droning, no animals scurrying. For a moment, Garrus wondered if it shouldn’t have been left alone, a tomb not to be disturbed by running feet or laughing children.

Tali pressed in against his hip. “Garrus?”

He glanced back, whispering, “Do you see anything? Hear anything?” Those pale gleams stared back, unblinking.

“I can feel something up there.” She pointed above them rather than ahead.

“Are there any predators we need to worry about?” he asked, mentally adding, ‘Other than the two legged, sapient kind’.

“No. The largest predator in this region eats small lizards and rodents.” She stepped even closer, her back pushing him ahead a half step. “Someone is watching us.”

“Yeah.” He nodded toward the path. “Let’s see where this trail goes.” He reached up for his assault rifle, but let his hand drop. With visibility worsening, he didn’t want to accidentally shoot someone because they appeared out of nowhere. Walking forward, he cursed the crunch of their boots on the stone, it echoed back from every direction, sounding like an army on the march. It would be hard to hear anyone approaching.

“Is it bad to miss the days of fifty geth coming at us with rifles roaring?” he whispered.

Tali grumbled. “No, this is giving me the creeps.”

Ten metres up the path, they stepped around a corner, the air shifting, wind picking up as it whistled down through the river valley and onto a wide, open area. With it, the breeze carried a new scent. Garrus inhaled, only needing a moment to identify the thin current of blood, urine, and feces—the stink of fear and death—that slipped beneath the spice and dust of the desert wind.

“Hold up, Tali.” Sharp talons pinched his gut, twisting it slowly as he raised the light, shining it around the area. Every single instinct he developed over his cycles at C-Sec started screaming at once. A half-dozen metres to his left, the beam gleamed slickly off long strings of black streaked across the rock as if thrown from a heavily laden paint brush. Gesturing for Tali to stay where she was and keep an eye on their six, Garrus moved in, taut with dread, reaching out into the murky half-light.

A talon touched the end of one of the sly cords, then raised to his nostrils. Definitely dried blood. A metre away, another reflection caught his eye. White bubbles lined the cracks in the rock delineating a wet patch where some sort of fluid had seeped into the soil. He crouched to gather some on a talon. Geth, and spilled only a couple of hours before.

“Over here,” Tali called softly, pointing to a dark patch of rock. “More blood.” Bending down, she picked up a short, heavy branch. One end bore the same stain, a dark crimson in the light.

Garrus opened his mouth to say something … maybe to ask why quarians and geth would be clubbing one another in the middle of nowhere … maybe to ask something a little more intelligent, but then a sound rolled down on them from above. Short, guttural screams and roars tumbled down the slope like boulders, crashing into Garrus. Choked and unnatural … almost mechanical, they rocked him with the unspeakable agony and horror that propelled each one. He backed away as they grew in volume, tearing into his mind and heart with savage claws. For more than a minute, the being howled, unformed words tangled into the wails of a thousand nightmares.

Then silence fell, a clean cut from a keen-edged axe dragging a groaning sigh of relief from Garrus’s throat. Relief turned to shame as he realized he’d been wishing for whomever it was to Garrus?” Tali called, her voice tiny and frightened. “That couldn’t have been a person, could it? It had to be some sort of animal. No quarian … .”

He reached back, his eyes never leaving the top of the cliff. When she wrapped both hands around his talons, squeezing hard, he said, “Come on. It came from up there.” He released her, hearing the unmistakable sound of her shotgun as she pulled it from the small of her back. Well, at least one of them was ready with the bullets. He still didn’t feel certain enough of the situation to start discharging death.

Shining the flashlight ahead, he picked his way around the edge of the clearing and back onto the upward slope. Here and there, blood drips and spatters—both organic and synthetic—gleamed up at him from the rock and the prickly leaves of the cacti.

Just before they reached the top, they emerged onto a small ledge overlooking the clearing where they’d found the first blood and heard the terrible screams.

“It’s a cave,” Tali whispered, nudging Garrus with the butt of her shotgun. She nodded toward a dark tear in the fabric of the cliff. Edging that direction, she glanced back. “Want to take bets on something really horrible waiting for us in there?”

Not a bet he’d touch. He shook his head and turned to look her in the eye. “Don’t open fire unless we’re attacked, and then aim to disable rather than kill. Corpses can’t answer questions.” He took a couple of steps. “And turn on your flashlight.” When her light blinked on, shining just behind his, he walked to the cave entrance.

Damn, he hated walking into anything blind. He called up his smuggler’s room scanning program and pressed himself into cover against the rock, extending his arm into the space. It read as a short entrance tunnel that opened into a chamber that seemed fairly wide, maybe seven or eight metres. He signalled for Tali to stay along the right hand wall, and cover that side. A sharp nod answered him, and he headed in.

The tunnel darkened to pitch before it turned a sharp corner and light blinded him, shining in his eyes from large stand-mounted fixtures. Throwing up a hand, he found himself staring at absolute insanity. Two geth stood a couple of metres away, stumbling around to face the intruders. One reached behind it for a gun, bringing the weapon around slowly, fumbling with it a moment. A harsh cough from Tali’s shotgun and it crumpled. The second one stared at them for a moment, then its light went out and it fell over as well.

“What in the name of the ancestors?” Tali asked, edging further into the space. She stopped three steps in and let out a garbled moan. “How?” She retched and spun away, one hand slapping against the wall to support her as she bent over, wrapping her other arm around her belly.

Garrus understood her reaction. In the center of the space, under the lights, two quarian bodies lay on tables. At least, most of them was quarian. Tables next to the bodies held a wide array of surgical equipment and tools, all of them covered in blood. Once the shock broke, Garrus hurried forward to check if the two victims were alive. Neither was, and he counted it a mercy. Nearly a third of their bodies had been replaced with grafted on geth parts.

After a closer look, he suspected the first body of being their screamer. Their bottom jaw had been removed and replaced by tech … some sort of vocal synthesizer that could explain the horrible sounds. As well, his visor read the body temperature at normal. It couldn’t have been dead for longer than a few minutes.
He winced away from the brutalized quarians. Who or what could have butchered them that way? Finally allowing himself to turn his back to the carnage, he looked down at the two now nonfunctional geth. Both were the new platforms. Their chassis were covered in blood, but … . In the corner next to the tables, a pile of partial geth platforms lay heaped in a jumbled pile. Garrus counted six. All of them new platforms. That accounted for eight of the missing platforms, but what of the runtimes?

What the hell had been going on in that cave?

Swallowing the urge to throw up, he reached up to his radio. He needed to get everything packaged up in stasis containers. Dr. Chakwas could autopsy the quarians, and they could take the geth back to Omega … try to figure out what the hell was going on.

“Tali,” he said, his voice cracking. He cleared his throat. “Call back to Base One, get them to do a head count. We need to know who these people are.”

Spirits, I could use your insight right now, Kahri.

Instead, he opened a channel to get everybody in motion.
Williams, I knew ye wanted me ship. Too bad she’ll never be yours!” Riposting, parrying, feinting with nimble grace, she fenced her opponent to the ground. With a decisive thrust, she stood over the vanquished mutineer. “Anyone else?”

“What are you doing?” The mutinous wench returned. “Put this all away where you found it and get to your studying.”

“What am I doing?” Shepard asked and crowed. “Why ye scurvy, underhanded bilge rat. How dare ye question your captain? I be the pirate queen of the caribbean seas, the scourge of three navies, the true ruler of the oceans, and I’ll never bow down to the likes of ye.”

“You’re the ... what have you done to my duster?” The woman snatched Shepard’s cutlass from her hand. “Go! Study! Now!”

Chains wrapped around the pirate queen’s arms and legs. “I swear to ye. I’ll escape this bondage and wreak bloody vengeance upon ye all!”

The wench cuffed Shepard in the back of the head. “I’ve had about enough out of you today, pirate queen.” A hand between her shoulder blades shoved Shepard out into the kitchen and into a chair. “Now, the asari transcendentalists … .”

The mutineers tied a massive book around Shepard’s neck, weighing her down with yards of chain and a couple of really ugly sculptures. “So, it’s to be the plank, is it?” she said, her voice a low growl.

“Paintings, now.”

Letting out a long, defeated sigh, the pirate queen sank beneath the waves. “Fine.” She looked down at the first page. “Time Bends, the third painting by Lanail F’aril,” Shepard recited, keeping her voice as monotone as humanly possible. It amounted to a small protest, but a protest nonetheless. “The painting was praised as being one of the first non-religious depictions of the asari place in the cosmos.”

“Value?”

“It is insured for 2.8 billion credits, but has no sale value as it is housed in the Thessian National Archives in Armali.”

“Very good. Next painting.”

Shepard turned the page in her mother’s massive agent scrapbook. As she looked down at the painting, pain bloomed behind her eyes, as hot and fierce as if someone had poured molten steel into her skull. “Mom?” She clapped a hand over her forehead, the pain making her retch.

“What is it, Jane? Let’s just get this over with. Why do you have to make everything so difficult?”

A tickle under her nose diverted Shepard’s attention from her splitting head and rolling belly. When she reached up to scratch it, her hand came away bloody. “Mommy?”

“Put her all the way back under. Now! I told you to watch the sedative levels. You let her come too far up.”

“She’s fine. The levels will normalize.”

“She’s bleeding from her nose and ears, on what planet is that normal? Do what you’re bloody told. Drop her back down. Now!”
Garrus walked to the edge of the escarpment and looked down over the city, his mandibles fluttering in a warm smile as he saw the lights glowing in his parent’s domin. He needed to go home when he finished on Rannoch and Tuchanka. Lowering himself to sit in the grass, he watched the city below with a homesick stare. Cipritine was beautiful at night, a vast sea of lights and flowing lines.

“Guess this means I managed to fall asleep,” he whispered, hoping for an answer, but not expecting one. His mandibles flicked when only the silence and distant sounds of the city replied. “Why did you leave, Kahri? I don’t care if things never grow past where we are.”

“You need to wake up.”

Garrus spun toward the voice, hope exploding firework-hot in his chest only to die. Of course she wasn’t there; Shepard said she was leaving, and she kept her word. He needed to accept it, as impossible as it seemed. He just didn’t understand why. It didn’t make any sense. Did she think she could force him to move on? A yawning hole opened up inside him as he tried to imagine living the next ten decades or so without her.

_Do you love her enough to last a century? What about everything you wanted to have with her? Just going to give all that up?

He shoved the doubt aside. It was just the exhaustion talking. After a couple nights of decent sleep, he’d be back to his old self. Besides, his odds of living to reach old age worsened all the time. Once the Reapers descended, he’d find his way back to Shepard’s arms eventually.

“You need to wake up, Garrus.” This time, the soft whisper of breath caressed his neck.

He closed his eyes and turned toward the voice, smiling as soft lips kissed his mouth. “Shepard?”

“Wake up. You need to wake up, love.” The lips withdrew.

Garrus opened his eyes to a darkened room. Even with a wide shaft of light shining across the floor it took him a couple of breaths to recognize the house he and his team had been given on Rannoch. He scowled, leaning up a little. Why had Shepard told him to wake up? Was she just trying to torture him? It wasn’t enough that she deserted his dreams, she had to keep him from getting any sleep as well?

His breath caught as he heard the whisper of fabric against stone from behind him. Shifting to look out into the other room, he saw Martin sitting at the table and Kasumi sleeping in a reclining chair by the fireplace. Who was in the room with him? He flipped over, throwing the covers straight off the bed as he leaped to his feet.

A slim figure hung most of the way out the window. Lunging for its foot, he managed to just catch a corner of their cloak, tearing it loose. The intruder fell out the window, and by the time Garrus made it there and looked out, they had disappeared into the shadows.

“Who the … ?” Garrus closed and latched the window, then turned to look over the room. Martin hadn’t alerted to their presence, and all the evidence from the cave was in the main room with him. What had the person wanted?

“You need to wake up,” Shepard’s voice whispered through the hush.

A pale red glow bathed the room. He blinked. Still there.

Garrus scowled and bent down. A red light glowed across the floor. Grabbing his blankets, he threw them back up onto the bed. He lowered himself onto all fours, bending down so his mandible pressed against the floor, and looked under the frame. As he watched, the number on the small container changed from 2:48 to 2:47, Garrus froze just long enough to register: bomb. Snatching it out from under the bed, he leaped up and sprinted out of the room. He hurdled the crates and stasis units, hitting the door control so hard that his wrist popped.

“Come on!” he hollered at it as it crept open, squeezing out as soon as he could get his cowl through. Adrenaline pounded through his veins, pushing back the exhaustion and granting him speed he hadn’t tapped in a decade. Watching the timer, he ran until it clicked over to 0:45 then threw it as far into the desert as he could.

Timer or not, the second it hit the ground, it exploded, the blast wave knocking him back almost ten metres, and peppering him with shrapnel.

Garrus laid there, his hearing ringing, eyesight fuzzy, his entire front side stinging. “The perfect end to the day.” A long, weary groan dragged out of his throat as he rolled onto his side and lifted up onto an elbow.

“Garrus!” Martin and Kasumi raced toward him, the former sliding to a stop and crouching at Garrus’s side while the latter continued on to the blast site.

“What the hell was that?” Garrus held out a hand. “I believe it’s known as a bomb. Luckily, it was a small one.” He shifted around a bit. “Help me up.”

Martin stood and clasped Garrus’s wrist, helping haul him up off the ground. “Nice speed and agility there, Boss. Didn’t know you were a hurdler.” A crooked grin accompanied a steadying hand on Garrus’s elbow. “You okay?”

The general looked down at the thin streams of blue running down his chest, arms, and legs before brushing himself down carefully, making sure he didn’t have any chunks of bomb or rock embedded in his plates. “Yeah, just dinged up a bit. Better than I would be if I hadn’t woken up.” He stretched, his neck and shoulder popping, then limped over to look at the blast area. “They came in through my window and put it under my bed.”

“Good thing you’re a light sleeper.” Martin crossed to the center and crouched down. “Why, though?” He twisted, looking around, the area visible in the moonlight. “It wasn’t big enough to take out the whole building. The evidence, Kasumi and myself would have come through, especially with it under the bed.”

Garrus nodded and leaned a hand on his hip. “It was meant for me. They didn’t want the evidence destroyed. They’re worried I’m going to cover it up. If I’m killed or badly wounded, it draws attention to the evidence.” He shook his head and turned back toward Base One. “I wish I’d gotten a decent look at whoever planted it.”

Martin stood. “You didn’t get anything?”

“A two-toed foot hanging through my window by the knee.” He shrugged. “I grabbed the cloak they were wearing, but that’s it. Could have been quarian or geth.”

He glanced back, looking for Kasumi, but she’d cloaked. As he clicked over from sleep-deprived bombing victim to general, he walled away his reactions. Fear and shock, even the comfort of Shepard’s voice calling him from sleep, pushed aside to make way for logical and reasoned action. The evidence had to be removed from the planet, and he needed to make sure everyone on Rannoch remained secure during his absence.

“Martin, get the shuttle,” Garrus called. “We’ll load the evidence up now. I’ll grab Tali and we’ll head to Dholen, have the Normandy pick us up there before continuing on to Zaherin. The Archangel frigates can report to you, here. The Passch will stay in orbit if you need it.”

Lifting a hand to contact Tali, Garrus saw the quarians hurrying through the moonlit village, no doubt awakened by the explosion. Tali and Kal pushed to the head of the group, jogging toward him.

Garrus stopped and turned to Martin. “You and Kasumi will stay here, keep going through the data of Legion’s last whereabouts. He left from that upper door for a reason. If we’re going to find him, we need to know why. Find out.” He turned toward the house, climbing the short slope up to the door. “You’ll be in charge of the Archangel forces while I’m gone. If it looks like shooting is going to start, park our ships between them and call me. Don’t start any wars. I’d better be back in a couple of days at the outside.”

“Yes, sir,” Martin called as he dashed off to get the shuttle. “Kasumi, with me.”

“Yeah, yeah, I’m coming,” the thief grumbled from somewhere to Garrus’s left. “Just had to go and leave him in charge, didn’t you, General?”

“Behave yourself, and back him up,” Garrus replied, snapping his mandibles tight on a smile.

Tali ran up, sliding to a stop a couple metres away, and just stared at Garrus long enough to make him uncomfortable. After maybe twenty seconds, she shook herself and looked up into his eyes.

“What happened? You’re bleeding everywhere.”

Realizing he was standing in the middle of Base One wearing just his undershorts, Garrus spun around and hurried up into the house. “It was a small bomb. Someone put it under my bed. Luckily, I woke up while they were still sneaking out and found it.” He continued on into the bedroom to get dressed.

“A bomb?” Chair legs squeaked across the floor as Tali flopped onto one of the seats. “A bomb under your bed. So, they were trying to kill you?”

“Yes,” he replied, shrugging into the light tunic he wore beneath his armour. “You and I are going to take off as soon as we get the shuttle loaded with the evidence. We can rendezvous with the Normandy in Dholen.” He looked out the door, meeting her gaze. “Are you packed to spend a couple of days away? Got everything arranged? If not, better get to it. I want to be on our way within the next ninety minutes.”

“Okay.” She pushed off the table to stand. “I’ll be ready to go.”
Garrus wedged himself between the pallet of evidence and the shuttle’s bulkhead to hit the vidscreen control and activate the forward cameras. He let out a heavy breath. “Damn, she looks beautiful right now,” he said, watching the Normandy as the frigate lowered the ramp to let them dock. Backing out of the tight space, he glanced over at Tali. “I’ll be glad to be aboard her again, even if just for a couple of days.”

The quarian just nodded. Hunched in her chair, arms wrapped tight around herself, she sat shrouded in a heavy miasma of misery. The weak slump of her shoulders and the way her head hung like an impossible weight felt like a tear in the fabric of reality, a small piece of some backwards universe intruding into the reality where Tali’Zorah vas Rannoch bounded through life full of energy and fire.

Shuddering, he rubbed his hands together, suddenly chilled. “Are you cold? Must feel like a refrigerator in here after being on Rannoch for so long.” He sat next to her and put his arm around her shoulders, for comfort more than warmth. His armour pretty much negated the second. “It should be warmer on the Normandy.”

Shaking her head, she leaned into him. “No, I’m not cold. Well, not enough to mention, anyway. It’s just … .” She reached out and placed a hand on one of the stasis units. “Did I cause this, Garrus? Was it too soon?” As she continued, her voice barely registered over the shuttle engine. “Is it the geth? Did they lure us in, or did the heretics make them turn on us?”

A silence lapsed between them that grew heavier by the second, and Garrus knew that, in those moments, Tali forced herself to look into the worst, ugliest parts of who she was and what it meant. He wished he could spare her that long stare into her own darkness, but the questions needed to be dragged out into the light and asked.

A heavy shudder ran down her spine, and her voice dropped even lower. “What if my people did this, Garrus? I know some of them are afraid that the geth are setting some sort of trap for us. I’ve even heard people say that it’s an insult to accept our home from the geth, to live there as equals. They believe we should go to war, take back Rannoch and make the geth servants again.” The silver reflections of her eyes stared into his. “What if my own people committed these atrocities because I’m pushing for peace and resettlement?”

He squeezed her tight, proud of her courage and honesty. “First of all, whoever did this, did it because of their own messed up agenda, Tali. None of it is your fault.” A talon jumped up between them to halt her next words before they made it out. “You’ve put yourself on the line from the very beginning to give your people back their homeworld. This is just the result of sapient beings having free will.” He patted her shoulder and released her as the shuttle landed inside the Normandy’s cargo bay. “All we can do is make sure the minority don’t derail what is best for the majority, right?”

After a moment, she nodded and straightened a little. “If I give up and let them remove us, I’m letting everyone down. I can’t do that. We can live in peace with the geth. I know we can.”

“That’s more like it.” He stood and opened the hatch. “Come on, let’s go make sure the quarians get back their homeworld.”
Nihlus stepped into the shuttle as soon as the hatch raised. The Spectre gripped Garrus’s shoulders, looking him over with an intense, hawkish stare. “Spirits, you look even worse in person.” After a moment, he looked past Garrus at the pallet of crates. “What’s all of this?”

Garrus smiled and gripped his fratrib’s shoulders, the embrace settling something deep in his gut. He’d come to rely on Nihlus over the months, the Spectre a volatile counterpoint to Garrus’s insistence on reason and planning. As they’d supported, bullied, inspired, and argued, they’d become brothers in truth, and although he’d never admit it, Garrus missed Nihlus while the other torin went about Spectre business.

“I’ll explain everything in a minute,” he said and clapped Nihlus on the back. “I’m glad to see you. It’s been a hell of a week.”

Releasing the Spectre and looking out the door, Garrus called, “Permission to come aboard, Captain?” He reached out to take Anderson’s offered hand as he stepped down into the Normandy’s cargo bay. Giving the captain a warm smile, he said, “It’s been too long.”

“Permission granted. Welcome aboard, General, and yes, it has.” Anderson smiled at Tali and extended his hand. “Good to see you again, Tali’Zorah.”

“Thank you for coming out here to help us, Captain,” she answered, quickly sidestepping out of the way. Looking over at Garrus then back to Anderson, she said, “Is it all right if I hide out in Liara’s old lab, Captain?”

“Of course. The cots are still in there, and there should be blankets in the crates if you need to get some sleep,” Anderson replied. “If you need anything, just let Kaidan know.”

“Thank you.” She turned and hurried toward the elevator.

“So, this is … ?” Nihlus asked again, peering into the top crate. “Blood-covered rocks. You always get me the nicest gifts.”

Garrus spun back. “It’s crime scene evidence, including two bodies that I could really use Dr. Chakwas’s help with.” He glanced back at Anderson. “If you would be willing to lend her talents to the cause, Captain?”

Anderson scowled, but nodded. “Whatever you need, although I presume an explanation is forthcoming?”

“Thank you.” Garrus let out a long breath, sagging a little. “And yes, I’ll tell you both everything in exchange for a hot cup of amarcerus and the use of a rack for a few hours.”

Nihlus ran the pad of his thumb talon over the worst of Garrus’s blast damage, a long furrow a chunk of the bomb had carved out of his crest. “Your explanation will include this?” Lifting a brow plate, he leaned in, forcing Garrus to meet his stare.

“Yes. Just cut me a little slack, Nihlus. I haven’t slept in days and now, I’ve been blown up.” He staggered toward the elevator, needing to collapse into a chair at the table in the galley. “Could you take the bodies up to the doctor, please?”

“Yeah,” the Spectre called. “I’ll be up in a few minutes.”

Garrus ended up drinking three cups of amarcerus while he brought Nihlus and Anderson up to speed. Nihlus even managed to force some eggs and drellak roast into him, but pretty much the second he finished eating, unconsciousness started to suck him under. Adding to the full belly, the relief of finally being able to share some of the burden and insanity of the situation on Rannoch had his eyes preparing for rebellion if he kept them open any longer.

“Take my rack, son,” Anderson offered, startling him back to full consciousness with a hand on his shoulder. “I’ll have Alenko find you a couple of pillows and blankets. Someone should have brought your footlocker up already.” He glanced over his shoulder at the lieutenant, but Kaidan was already in motion.

Garrus nodded, too tired to argue, and far too tired to want to cram himself into one of the crew bunks just to spend his few precious hours of sleep time listening to a dozen people snoring, talking in their sleep, and passing gas. Besides, maybe Shepard would be drawn back to where they’d actually spent their nights in one another’s arms.

That decided it, and he nodded. “Thank you, Anderson. I appreciate that.” He squeezed Nihlus’s arm. “See you in a few hours.”

Faced with actually entering what he still thought of as Shepard’s quarters, Garrus hesitated, needing to take a deep, steadying breath before he palmed the door control. When it opened, he stepped right through, not wanting to draw Anderson or Nihlus’s attention, but once inside, he stalled just far enough over the threshold that the door closed.

Dear spirits, almost nothing had changed. But for her missing scent and a double picture frame sitting on the table next to the bed, she could have stepped out a minute before. He stared at one of the photos in the frame, the brilliant, mischievous smile on her sharp, pretty face freezing his talons to the ground. She was so beautiful, the image revealing how much she had truly faded, even in his dreams.

Kaidan broke the deadlock between Garrus’s brain and his legs, his knock ringing metallic and heavy. Garrus stepped aside to let the LT in.

“Here you go,” Kaidan said, setting a couple of blankets and two pillows down. “I’ve got your foot locker outside.” He strode out, returned a moment later to set the chest down at the end of the bed. He straightened, his eyes lingering on Shepard’s pictures. “You sure you’ll be okay in here?” he asked, his voice soft. “I’m sure we can—”

“It’s fine, Kaidan, thanks,” Garrus said, cutting across the LT’s concern. He nodded toward the door. “See you in a couple of hours.”

“Sure thing, General.” He gave Garrus a crooked smile. “It’s good to have you and Tali back, even if for a couple of days. We’ve missed you.” Without looking back, he headed to the door and out.

Doing his best to avoid the beckoning pictures, Garrus spread a blanket out over the bed and tossed the pillows over onto the far side. Peeling off his armour distracted him for another couple of minutes before all that remained was to lay down, cover himself up and try to sleep. For a moment, he considered folding up the frame and laying it down, but his throat closed at the thought. Instead, he stretched out along his side of the horrendous bed, his pillows hugged tight against his chest and fell asleep staring into the bright emerald of Shepard’s eyes.

505 Days ASD

Garrus woke with a start, the mattress moving under him. Halfway through leaping out of bed to deal with another assailant, he recognized Nihlus and let himself flop back down onto his pillows.
“You shouldn’t do that to people who’ve recently awoken to bombs being planted under their bed.”

The Spectre nodded. “It’s happened to me a few times.” He waggled his head back and forth a little. “Well, if you count grenades.” The Spectre chuckled and turned, drawing his knee up onto the bed. “If you’re trying to change the galaxy and people aren’t trying to blow you up, you’re doing something wrong, Garrus.”

Garrus settled his pillows back between his head and cowl. “What time is it?” Knowing Nihlus, they had hours yet before their rendezvous with the flotilla. He studied the other torin, looking for signs of wear and tear. For the most part, Nihlus had rallied, but between his drinking and working almost constantly, Garrus worried about burnout. Still, the Spectre looked good, clear-eyed and focused.

Nihlus looked over at the pictures, going rigid for a second before letting out a long breath. “We have three hours before our meeting with the Admiralty Board,” he answered. His hand reached out a few centimetres, then hesitated for a good thirty seconds before closing the rest of the distance to lift Shepard in reverent hands. “Huh,” he said, chuffing softly, “they’re very good images.”

Garrus nodded. He hadn’t looked at the second one for longer than a second. It showed a teenage Shepard. Somehow it seemed to him that version of Shepard belonged to Anderson’s memories—looking at it would be intruding—so he’d focused on the one who belonged to his.

“I came in early because I wanted to sit down and check in before we go up against the quarian government. I’m worried about you.” His mandibles dropped and he shook his head, a determined gesture that Garrus knew Nihlus meant as a warning to not try to slip any bullshit past him. “You look like hell, Garrus, and not the got blown up sort of hell. What’s going on?”

Garrus stared into Nihlus’s eyes for long seconds before he let out a resigned sigh. “Shepard left a few nights ago. She just said that the time had come and disappeared.” As he said the words, he knew how they sounded.

Nihlus nodded, a low thread of empathy running beneath his words as he said, “I’m sorry, Garrus.”

Garrus chuffed. “I looked for her, but when she decides something, it’s decided.” He winced again. Anyone else would be calling up mental institutions on their omnitool. Nihlus understood, though. After all, much of his attachment to Shepard stemmed from fifty thousand cycle old memories.

“That part of you is ready to start grieving and move on.” Nihlus held up both hands, stilling Garrus’s protest before it began. “I know, you swore to be faithful to her memory, but you also know she’d never want that for you.”

Garrus leaned up on an elbow and laughed, a bitter sound that tasted like sulfur. “Are you moving on, Nihlus? Are you out dating or sleeping with anyone special?” The second the words came out, he wished he could suck them back in. Spirits, he could be an ass.

The Spectre just shook his head. “No, I feel like I’ve had the great love of my life thanks to the beacon. But you’re a young torin at the beginning of discovering all that, Garrus.” He smiled, a nostalgic smile that set off a flare of jealousy deep in Garrus’s gut. “Shepard would want you to live fully, and now the part of you that clung to her is ready to start down that path.”

Garrus threw back the blanket and sat up. “I don’t have the strength to do that, Nihlus. I’m worn to the bone.” He raked his talons over his fringe and rubbed the stiff muscles in the back of his neck. “Trying to build Archangel, trying to pull off the impossible every single day … it’s scraped me paper thin. With Shepard, whether she was a spirit or my overworked imagination, I could rest. I needed that, and now it’s gone.”

Nihlus reached out and laid his hand on Garrus’s head. “I know. We’ll figure it out. I know you need to control everything—that you feel like you’re letting her down unless you’re doing it all—but maybe it’s time to let me and the others take some of the burden. Archangel is alive and well, Garrus. She’s sailing on her own. We can help.”

Garrus leaned into the contact for a moment before pulling away and getting up. “One thing at a time. First we’ve got to figure out what the hell is happening on Rannoch.” As he stood and stretched, the weight settled around his neck once more. As much as Nihlus and the others tried to talk about his needing to delegate, the promise had been his. The responsibility was his. The weight was his to bear.

“Dr. Chakwas wants to speak with you once you’re awake and functional,” Nihlus said, not entirely succeeding in keeping the resigned disapproval out of his subvocals.

Garrus had always wondered what it would be like to have an older brother. Nihlus was teaching him.

“Then Tali, you, and I need to sit down and decide how we’re going to approach the Admiralty Board. We can’t hide what you found, but with the way you found it, if we don’t handle things delicately, they’ll be bombing the planet before we can get back.” He stared at the pictures in his hand for another few seconds, then replaced the frame on the table.

Garrus gathered up his pillows and stacked them on his footlocker, then stopped and looked down at Nihlus. “Is it still there?” he asked, knowing the Spectre would know what he meant. “Does it get any better?”

Nihlus stood and pressed his hand against Garrus’s face. “Yes.” He sighed. “And no.” He turned on his talons and strode to the door. “Dr. Chakwas, then meet me in Liara’s old lab.”

Garrus watched the door close behind the Spectre, a slow ache spreading through his chest, but not for himself. He’d thought Nihlus weak because of his drinking, but at least the Spectre lived in the harsh glare of reality. Pushing Shepard and all his associated emotional baggage to the back of his head, he grabbed his blankets and started folding. Without Shepard, work would prove his salvation.

Once he’d minimized his presence in Anderson’s quarters, he made his way to the head, then to medbay.

“Ahn, Garrus, good,” the doctor called, jumping up from her desk.

Garrus nodded. “Have you found anything, Doc?”

“Quite a lot, actually, although I’ve just started the in depth post mortems.” She walked to the foot of the first table. “I don’t know that I’ve ever had to deal with anything quite this disturbing.” Dr. Chakwas cleared her throat and held her hand out to one of the two victims. “I have no idea what the purpose of all this was, Garrus. Or at least, nothing more than guesses.”

She opened a file on her omnitool. “The female was dead when the parts and pieces of geth were attached. There is some blood loss just from the massive trauma, but its passive. Her heart wasn’t pumping.” Letting out a long, agonized sigh, she stepped up to the end of the next bed. “The male was not so lucky. He awoke at some point, tried to move … there are signs of the implanted tech tearing away throughout his body.” Shaking her head, she patted the dead quarian’s foot absently, as if she could comfort him.

“So, he woke up before he was finished?” Garrus shuddered. “We heard him scream.”

“No, Garrus, that’s just it.” The doctor met his eyes, her expression grim. “He was never meant to work. None of the attachments were functional. Saren had a geth prosthetic that was very functional. This ….” She gave a helpless little shrug, her mouth working trying to find the right words. “Near as I can tell, this was just meant to horrify.”

Fury exploded in his gut, his vision flashing white stars streaking across a wash of cobalt, and he stumbled beneath the weight of fatigue and dizziness. Catching himself against the bed, he let his head hang for a second as he reined the rage in. “This was staged?” he asked without looking up. “Someone did this to these people for no reason?”

“He was never meant to work. None of the attachments were functional. Saren had a geth prosthetic that was very functional.”

“Other than to incite that reaction right there,” she said quietly, reaching out to squeeze his arm. “Tali said someone is trying to provoke war?”

He nodded and shoved himself onto his feet. “Yeah.” Taking a couple of steps toward the door, he policed his horror and revulsion. He needed to keep his cool if he was going to figure it all out. “Is there any evidence that leads you to believe that this was done by either geth or quarian hands?”

The doctor turned and walked up alongside the bed. “The incisions are precise, methodical, and professional despite the results. The individual who did this is versed in quarian anatomy and physiology, and has experience either in surgery or dissection.” She shrugged. “But I can’t say that rules out the geth. Their platforms are capable of delicate and precise work. With the right data, they could easily have done this.”

Garrus nodded, and let out a short, heavy breath. “Thanks, Karin. Let me know if you find anything that will help me find the bastards who did this.”

“I will.”

He turned toward the lab, a supernova of panic looming on the horizon, sweeping toward Rannoch at light speed. Whomever it was spoiling for war, it seemed that war was exactly what they were going to get.
Chapter Summary

Meeting the Admiralty Board and perhaps a break in the case of the missing geth.

Chapter Notes

There are going to be three updates this week. Today, Thursday and Saturday, for N7 Day.

Vastator -- The turian version of the bogeyman. In ancient mythology, the vastator crept through sleeping armies, threatening or tempting the soldiers to see who would turn their back on honour and their brothers/sisters. Anyone who gave in to the Vastator was immediately consumed.

Trirco -- The most notable of the turian trickster spirits.

“Tali’Zorah vas Rannoch nar Rayya asking permission to dock with the Rayya.”

Garrus watched over Tali’s shoulder as she spoke over Joker’s. Despite wringing her hands almost constantly—only stopping to cross her arms and pace a few steps—her request came out strong, decisive.

“Our system has your ship flagged as Alliance. Verify,” the stiff voice of the controller called back, his tones clipped.

Although Garrus could pass the man’s attitude off as efficient or business-like, it unsettled him. It felt as though they were being brought in as enemies rather than allies. He tried to shake it off, to remain open and calm. Approaching the Admiralty Board as an adversary wouldn’t smooth the process or help him get their cooperation for his investigation.

Tali sighed, but her shoulders squared, her spine stiffening instead of softening. "After time adrift among open stars, along tides of light and through shoals of dust, I have returned to where I began."

A small, wry twitch of his mandibles answered the quarian’s resilience. A couple of hours worth of sleep and she’d sprung back, biting a little harder, but with her usual energy and guts.

“Verified,” the controller said simply.

“We need a security and quarantine team to meet us. Our ship is not clean,” Tali replied, her voice becoming just as curt and cold as the one on the other side of the comm.

“Understood. Approach exterior docking cradle 21. Do not disembark until the security team clears you and your escort arrives.”
Escort. Garrus looked to Tali, using her reaction as a gauge of how concerned he needed to be, but she didn’t move other than to give the controller an icy, “Acknowledged.” She turned toward Garrus, practically vibrating with indignance. “If the frost in the air is any indication, we’re in for an uphill battle,” she said, striding past him and out of the cockpit.

“No, don’t worry about me,” Joker called over his shoulder. “I’ll just connect all the calls and fly the ship and coordinate all the decon. Can I wash your undies? Sort your socks? Anyone who hasn’t called home to mom? My pleasure.”

Garrus chuckled and patted the pilot’s shoulder. “You’re underappreciated. Get over it.”

The pilot winced. “Ouch. Don’t sugar coat it or anything, General.”

Garrus followed Tali. “So, I wasn’t imagining the extra layer of attitude there?” he asked as he fell in step beside her.

“Since we’re expected, I wasn’t anticipating that level of suspicion, but this is an Alliance ship.” She shrugged.

“So, it might be nothing,” Garrus filled in, stepping ahead a little to look down at her face, hoping for some hint through the mask, “but your gut is saying it is.”

Tali paused, but didn’t even tic in his direction. “We’ll find out, I suppose.”

“Garrus,” Joker’s voice snapped off Garrus’s next thought. “You have a call on the QEC. It’s Weaver.”

Hope broke through Garrus’s growing dread. Maybe they’d managed to track Legion. Halfway down the CIC, the darker possibilities registered. Maybe the quarians or geth had fired opening shots. He sped up, running the rest of the way to the comm room and down to hit the control connecting the call.

“Martin,” he said, listening for the sounds of bombardment in the background. “Are you and Kasumi all right?”

The kid nodded. “Better than. Kasumi rigged me a cloak. Not quite as good as hers, but good enough.” Preening, he said, “I like it; I’m considering switching over to infiltration.”

Garrus sighed. “Martin, we’ve arrived at the flotilla. Brevity would be appropriate.” Despite trying for gruff and forbidding, a smile tugged at his mandibles. “Why did you call?”

“Kasumi and I staked out the upper entrance. We were there about twelve hours when Arox came out and headed off into the desert alone. He was scanning, like he was tracking a signal. After hiking up into the mountains for nearly two hours, he found a transmitter.” Martin started acting out the story as he told it, hands gesturing wildly with his excitement. “He’d just started investigating the transmitter when a shuttle came out of nowhere—it was cloaked! Completely cloaked!—and eight people in black robes jumped out, grabbed him and took off.” He held up a foreign-looking datapad. “He dropped this. It looks like he was tracking Reaper signals within geth transmissions.”

“Did you get a look at the one in robes? Enough to tell me quarian or geth? And the shuttle?” Garrus held off on the celebration. “Any idea where it went?”

The kid shook his head, his expression falling for a half second. “Negative on the ID. Their entire heads were covered and they moved fast. They weren’t playing around or doing the snatch and grab for the first time. They moved as a single, well disciplined unit.” He grinned. “Now as for the shuttle ….” Martin rooted in one of the pouches on his belt and pulled out a card of trackers.

“Please, Garrus. I graduated from the school of slap trackers on everything and always carry four days of rations years before you did. I’m on the Passch right now. We tracked the shuttle to the relay. That was a no brainer, because it’s a primary, so we jumped into Dholen and tracked the shuttle to Haestrom.” He stuffed the trackers back in his pouch. “What do you want us to do?”

“Wait. Keep the Passch in Dholen, full stealth. Scan for Reaper signatures, heretic geth signatures … communications from everyone.” Stripping off his glove, he scratched at his temple. “Damn. Haestrom is our biggest ship manufacturing facility.” Running through scenarios, he replaced the glove, pacing back and forth across the pad a couple of times before he turned back. “I can’t do anything from here. Keep an eye on everything, but unless missiles start flying, don’t move. Make sure Kal’Reegar and the rest of the Archangel frigates keep in touch hourly. I want to know if anything in those two systems sneezes.”

He heard the door open behind him and glanced back. “I’ve got to go meet with the Admiralty Board. I’ll be in touch as soon as I’m out, but if anything happens, don’t wait. Call.”

Martin saluted. “Yes, sir. Weaver out.”

Garrus returned the salute with one starched crisp by the chance he could end this without blood being spilled. He turned to face Nihlus. “We’ve caught a break.”

“Our escort has arrived, as has the team to decon us.” The Spectre winced. “Took three months to get the reek of their decon agent out of my armour the last time.” He nodded toward the door, a sliver of impatience embedded in his stare. “We’d better go. You can fill me in on the way.”

“Okay.” Garrus followed, retrieving his helmet from the cockpit before following Tali and Nihlus into the Normandy’s airlock.

After their very thorough decontamination, the trio stepped through into the docking tube and made their way down to another airlock. On the other side, a quarian reception committee awaited them, eight Marines in a one-metre flanking spread. Never a good sign.

A single male at the center stepped forward and held his hand out to Tali. “Welcome back to the Rayya, Tali’Zorah. I’m just sorry it’s under such troubling circumstances.”

The weight of those words tore down through Garrus’s belly, landing hard at the bottom. His gaze slid over the people in the dock. Every single one bore arms, and every single one jumped at every move the three of them made. The atmosphere pressed in on him from all sides, not quite heavy enough to be suffocating, but definitely uncomfortably close.

“Thank you, Captain Danna.” Garrus didn’t miss the Marines stiffening as Tali stepped forward, taking the quarian captain’s hand for a moment before retreating. She swept a hand toward he and Nihlus in turn. “Captain Kar’Danna, this is General Garrus Vakarian and Spectre Nihlus Kryik.”

Garrus accepted the captain’s invitation to shake his hand. “Excuse my saying this, but the armed reception committee and your greeting seem fairly ominous, Captain.” The weight began to somersault, tangling itself into his entrails.

The captain replied only by stepping to the side and indicating the way forward with a beckoning arm. “The Admiralty Board and Rannoch Resettlement Committee are waiting.” He cut a glance at Tali as he fell in stride beside her, leaving Garrus and Nihlus to follow. The Marines brought up the rear, the hands on their guns far too twitchy for Garrus to feel good about having the weapons Aimed at his back.

A moment of awkward silence stretched long and thin, their footsteps ringing hollow and metallic on the deck plating, before Kar’Danna spoke again. “The quarians you reported killed on the surface … the committee hasn’t released their names. It wasn’t anyone from the Rayya?”

A lilting, pained sigh formed Tali’s only answer to the question for so long that Garrus thought she didn’t intend to answer it. But then a tiny lip smack announced her words. “They were not from the expeditionary team, Captain. We are all accounted for and quite alive. We don’t know who those people were.” Her shoulders rolled in a small shrug.

Garrus felt a specter of fear murmured through the Marines behind them. It launched the dread in his belly, sending it ricocheting through him like a large caliber bullet.

“How did the geth take our people right off our ships?” one of them whispered.

Garrus blanched at the question, knowing that it would echo through every corridor in each of the flotilla’s vessels within the hour. Accusations of people being geth agents wouldn’t be far behind. Damn, he wished Tali hadn’t given Danna an answer. They’d just played right into their adversary’s hands, and it was a stunningly brilliant move. If the geth were the villains, they’d just devastated the quarian’s sense of security and morale. Within days, the witch hunt would begin, leaving them weak and vulnerable.

On the other hand, if the quarians had orchestrated everything, they’d just turned the geth into the Vastator, setting everyone up to start jumping at shadows until they all screamed for war just to kill the uncertainty. Not to mention that the threat of infiltrators facilitated the easy disposal of anyone who opposed the war. Accusing people of being geth agents would go a long way in an atmosphere riddled with enough paranoia.

As the ground beneath Garrus’s feet shifted—solid stone turning to heavy sand that quaked under his tread—he wished he’d turned the Normandy toward Dholen and Martin’s heretic geth lead. A specter loomed over him, whispering that before the day ended, he’d be up to his chin in quicksand without a rescue line in sight.

The sand turned to bog as Captain Danna opened the door to a large garden area, half of which looked like a sunken amphitheatre. At the bottom, standing on a raised platform, four members of the Admiralty Board waited, while off to the side, seven quarians sat behind a narrow table. Even though all of them were masked, their stares impacted like icy slaps.

Garrus cleared his throat, his mind racing. He needed to think of something to get them all free of the swamp before they sank, and he needed to do it quick.

* * * * *

“So, that could have gone better.” Nihlus leaned back against the bulkhead and stretched his legs out along the cot. Garrus heard the Spectre’s jaw crack as he let out a hearty half-yawn, half-sigh. “I wish I could take this damned helmet off.”

“You don’t really think they’ll charge us with anything, do you?” Tali asked, pacing along the front of her cell. “How can they think that I’d side with heretic geth and Reapers against my own people? Treason? It’s insane!” She stopped wringing her hands to slap both palms hard against the transparent barrier. The silver reflections of her eyes sliced straight across the corridor and through Garrus’s armour. “This is all your fault!”
Garrus shrugged as he turned away to pace the depth of his cell and back. “The head of your Rannoch Resettlement Committee punched me, not the other way around. I still have a piece of broken visor stuck under my eye and my left mandible doesn’t move.” He grumbled. “I really liked this visor.”

Nihlus settled into the corner and let his head loll back. “Who knew someone that size could hit that hard? I thought you were going to go down for a minute there.” Crossing his arms under his keel he shifted a bit, then yawned again.

“That’s not what I meant, and you know it,” Tali said, her voice lowering to a growl. “We were supposed to be finding a way to convince them to cooperate with our investigation.” Smacking the barrier again, she spun away and went back to pacing. “Who knows what they’re doing out there. They could be pulling all my people off Rannoch, or … or bombing the geth without evacuating anyone.”

“They aren’t, Tali. Relax.” Garrus sat on the side of the low cot. “Right now, all the Admiralty Board is doing is feeling like a bunch of ineffective, short-tempered idiots—”

“Shhh!” Tali hissed, storming back to glare at him. Or at least, he assumed she was glaring at him, the reflection of her eyes had narrowed to slivers. “They’re listening.”

“Good, because they should be embarrassed by that performance. If I led Archangel that way, it wouldn’t have lasted the first three months.” Garrus twitched his left brow plate and nose, trying to work the broken piece of composite out of the tender skin beneath his eye. Medigel had stopped the blood flowing down his jaw from a torn mandible and eased the pain back to a five on the Shepard scale—slammed my toe in the bathroom door—but still, he wanted to rip his helmet off and yank the damned glass out of his eye.

He stretched his neck, grumbling as his spine crinkled like walking on spilled cereal. After cracking it the other direction, he said, “So, yes, the Admiralty Board is feeling like a bunch of bickering children, the absent Admiral Xen is surely still working to cure the plague on her ship, and Beret’Zol is realizing that she admitted to committing sapient rights abuses against both the geth and your people on the planet before she punched me.” As he finished, he allowed a thin vein of pride to pulse through his words.

Nihlus chuckled and shook his head. “Shepard would be proud.”

Garrus closed his eyes, Shepard’s image appearing behind his eyelids, her features hard and sharp with Trirco’s smile. He caressed his thumb along her bottom lip then opened his eyes as he replied, “I did learn from the best.” He grinned at the assortment of dismayed noises fired at him from across the corridor.

“You mean, you caused all that on purpose?” Her barrier hummed like someone plucking a high tension cable as she slapped it again. “You big, stupid, spiky … bosh’tet. You could have gotten us all killed. You could have gotten all my people killed. You still could.”

He shook his head and turned to lift his legs up onto the cot. “They won’t attack the geth. I’m willing to bet the entire fleet that the Admiralty Board had no idea about the committee ordering tests on the geth and trying to confine your people for medical reasons.” Leaning back against the bulkhead, he let out a long breath and closed his eyes. Exhaustion wafted down like snow, building up in drifts. He yawned, and shifted until he found a mostly comfortable position on the too-short cot.

“Don’t worry, Tali. Right about now, they’re going over the fake scans the committee used to get the conclave to order your removal from Rannoch and comparing them to your actual suit data. When they realize that everything they’ve been told is complete bullshit, they’ll come and get us.” At least, that’s how he hoped it would play out. He was new to the whole ‘piss them off and bring them back around’ method of solving disputes and getting what he needed from people.

“When I get out of here, I’m going to break your other mandible,” the quarian threatened, her voice a low growl. He opened one eye to watch her stalk over to her cot, throwing herself down on the side, her arms thumping down across her chest like security gates.

His one working mandible twitched. “Get some sleep. You’re going to need it when we get out of here. We have a busy couple of days ahead of us.” He closed his eyes again and let himself drift.

* * * * *

“General Vakarian?”

Garrus bolted upright, heart racing, pain blaring through his face like a trumpet blast. He blinked quickly, trying to clear his vision, realizing dimly that it just made the pain worse. Where was he? A second before, he’d been aboard the Normandy.

“General?”

He turned toward the voice, finally registering the slender form of Shala’Raan through the fog of sleep. Swinging to his feet in a single motion, he replied, “Admiral Raan. My apologies.”

The admiral looked across the corridor at Tali and Nihlus, both also just rousing from sleep. “It’s been a long few days,” she said, making it sound like an explanation for both sides. “The Admiralty Board is prepared to speak with you again. Do you need a few minutes?”

Garrus almost laughed. To do what? Wash up? Have a shower? They couldn’t even use the toilets in the cells. Looking to his companions, he saw they were awake, on their feet and ready to go. “That won’t be necessary, thank you, Admiral.”

The admiral turned to her shadows, two Marines who looked even more wary than the ones who’d accompanied Kar’Danna, her order crisp and decisive, “Release our guests.”

Garrus stepped back away from the cell door, looking to appear as unthreatening and cooperative as he had belligerent before their incarceration. “Will Admiral Xen be joining us this time?” he asked, waiting until the Marine moved across to Tali’s cell before stepping through the door. Guarded, he stepped up to face the admiral. She’d seemed a strong force for resettlement when they first landed on Rannoch. What had happened in the intervening months?

He frowned as he looked down at her, taking in the sloped shoulders, the roundness between her shoulder blades, the low set of her neck. How much of this was his fault for believing that given a chance to move back to their homeworld, the quarians would be eager to embrace peace? He should have kept a closer eye on the process, given the Admiralty Board more support.

Should have. What the hell good was should have? What he did from now on mattered, not the past.

After considering his words carefully, he leaned down, keeping his voice low so his words wouldn’t travel further than the pair of them. “Is the Admiralty Board being extorted, Admiral Raan?”

She inhaled a deep, almost revelatory breath, the conviction and energy behind it making him think of a long-held POW or slave taking their first breath outside the wire of their captivity. Before his eyes, she grew … magnifying as she straightened, squaring her shoulders.

Letting out the breath, she looked up into the dark visor of his helmet. “Not anymore. The board has informed the conclave that should we need to, we will use our veto to override any actions taken against the settlers on Rannoch or the geth. We will approve no military action until an independent investigation brings us conclusive proof as to who is behind the geth disappearances and the attack on our people.”

Nihlus and Tali joined them, the Spectre stretching a little before he stood at attention, facing the admiral. “Is Admiral Xen aboard her vessel as she claims?” he asked, his tone as blunt as his words.

Raan shook her head. “The Moreh has been under quarantine for six months. She contacts us via communicator and appears to be aboard her vessel. Her people all claim that she is there, working on her cure for the virus.”

“But you have doubts?” the Spectre prompted.

Garrus withheld his instinct to halt Nihlus’s interrogation and preserve the admiral’s goodwill, wanting to know the answers for himself. The problems on Rannoch had two main suspects as far as he was concerned, and if one of them truly had been locked aboard her ship for six months, that altered the landscape considerably.

Raan turned away, leading them down the corridor. “People move very freely amongst the ships. Friends and family visit one another, techs are shared as needed, and resources are transported back and forth.”

Tali inhaled sharply, making a connection that Garrus hadn’t. “Even if the virus had an incubation period of a single day, unless people weren’t infectious before symptoms presented, the whole fleet should have it.”

“Yet,” Raan spoke up, “we’ve seen the victims, tissue samples … everything says that the Moreh is suffering an outbreak. People have died. They were buried in space using contamination protocols.”

Garrus nodded, raising a hand to halt Nihlus from continuing the interrogation. “Admiral Xen will be speaking with us now?”

The admiral opened a door, leading them out of the small cell block and into a main corridor. “Yes, via the comm.” She led them in silence until they reached the amphitheatre. “Expect Xen to resist your stance on everything, General.”

Garrus nodded, appreciating her desire to keep that day’s meeting less confrontational than the previous. “I think she’ll prove quite open to what I have to say.” He held out a hand, inviting her to proceed, when she just gave him a dubious tilt of her head.

* * * * *

“Well, that went much better,” Nihlus said and chuckled as he stepped through the Normandy’s airlock.

Garrus nodded and reached up for the seals on his helmet, removing it gingerly. “It’s amazing what happens when you say that you have evidence the heretic geth may be behind the entire thing.” He turned to face Nihlus. “For the sake of all that’s merciful, pull out this spirit-forsaken chunk of glass out of my eye.”

The Spectre removed his helmet, then plucked the offending bit of visor from Garrus’s hide and passed it to him. Cocking his head, he leaned in to look at the torn mandible. “You better see Dr. Chakwas about that one. It looks like the tendons are torn.”

“I will be. Thank you.” He laid a hand on Tali’s shoulder as he passed her. “Told you it would work out.” A heavy grunt answered her elbow burying itself between the sections of his armour.

“Next time, tell me the plan.” She strode out of the airlock just ahead of him. “Now what?”

Garrus paused to lean into the cockpit. “Best speed to rendezvous with the Passchendaele, Joker. Full stealth.”

“Full unappreciated grunt mode, aye, sir,” the pilot barked sharp enough to echo.

“As you were.” Garrus turned to Tali, giving her a painful, one-sided smile. “Let’s go find out who’s behind all this.”

“You told Admiral Xen that you believed that heretic geth were to blame,” Tali persisted, following Garrus doggedly down the CIC.

“No, I said that I had evidence that they could be. That’s the truth.” He didn’t look at her until she ran in front of him and stopped. “What?”

“You didn’t ask her anything about the virus or her influencing the committee. Why?” Her silver glare bored into him like a mining drill searching for platinum.

Garrus stopped at the door to the crew deck. “If she’s behind all this, what’s she going to do if we show suspicion? She’s going to try to cover her tracks, wipe away everything that could lead to her, including any people in the way.” He shrugged and lifted a hand, buttressing it against the wall. “If she thinks we’re looking at the geth, doing her work for her, she’s not as defensive.” Shrugging, he pushed off the wall and walked through the door. “And if it is the geth, we’re looking in the right direction. Both towers covered.”

“Towers?”

He let out a long-suffering sigh. “It’s a Hideth Turram thing.”

Tali sighed. “You’re still a big, stupid bosh’tet.”

He nodded. “Yeah, most of the time.”

* * * *

“Captain?” A dark shape appeared above her, blurry and washed out into shades of grey. “Captain! I need you to remain calm. You’re going to experience a great deal of pain, but we’ll get this over with as quickly as possible. Try to remain still.” The shape withdrew, moving around the edges of her vision.

The pain started small, termites gnawing at her cells, but as she blinked, trying to force the blurry world of unformed shapes into something that made a little more sense, the termites began to grow.

“Miranda, what are you doing?” Another shape formed of greys and black ran in from her side. It peered down, it’s face thrusting so close to hers that a thin mewl of fright crawled from her throat, and she tried to pull away.

But as she struggled to retreat, the termites swelled into cockroaches, their jaws devouring her from the inside out. As the pain roared, it awoke fear. Where was she?

“Moving her.” The one who’d spoken to her slipped down her side. She registered pressure and touch as the woman threw objects over her body.

She tried to move, to push away the shackles and chains before they could wrap around her, but her hands didn’t obey. Fear kicked at her heart until it raced. Its hard, erratic thumping chased panic out to run screaming along every nerve and muscle fibre.

“She can’t be unhooked from the machines. You’re going to kill her.”

“When I came in to check on her five minutes ago, her duty nurse was trying to do just that.” Something flew through the air, just a faint streak across her vision. “By putting that in her IV. By the time you sauntered in here after your third cup of coffee, Shepard would have died of heart failure.”

The figure with the male voice dashed down her side, startling her. “Good lord, Miranda, you killed Carrie Peters?”

“Not before she admitted that the council knows about this project and intends to ensure that it doesn’t succeed.” The shape with the accented female voice rushed around her head, a dizzying blur of constant motion. “Now help me get her moved to L Wing.”

Panic grabbed hold of her diaphragm, yanking at it all she could do was gasp in short, shallow breaths that didn’t pull any air into her lungs.

“L Wing? The labs don’t have half of what we need.” The male shape bent over her, blurry features becoming partially visible as he leaned close to her face. “God, she’s awake, Miranda.”

“I know she’s awake, I had to unhook her from the IV. We’ll start another one when we get there.”

The man’s face withdrew. “What are her vitals? God, she’s got to be in agony.”

Pain, fear and panic all laughed at that as baby alligators burst out of the cockroaches’ bodies and continued eating her alive.

“Yes, enough to send her into shock if her brain stem doesn’t shut down first, so stop dithering and help me.”

The world moved. She thought that was supposed to happen when the right person kissed her. Panic giggled. Not a set of kissable lips in sight, and still the world rushed by in dizzying streaks and nauseating swoops. The alligators dug in claws to hang on, every cell of her body screaming at a hundred different pitches as the surface under her back rocked her one way then jerked her another. The edges of her vision darkened, night falling. Night meant sleep. Yes, sleeping through the pain.

“How did the council find out about us?” the man demanded, a harsh, whispered attempt at clandestine shouting. She felt the rough edges of fear sawing along the underside, but it wasn’t the same fear that rode along with her. Struggling to understand what she heard, she floundered through the steady current of torment, losing ground as the undertow caught her.
The woman laughed, but it cut like a shard of broken mirror. “The same way we find out everything they don’t want us to know. It doesn’t matter now. They know, and they won’t stop at sending one assassin.”

The world came to a lurching stop, the jolt pulling a thin wire from her throat as pain hooked a scream to the end.

“It’ll be over in just a few more moments, Captain,” the woman said, the blur of her face leaning over. “Just stay calm and breathe slowly.”

Breathe slowly? She couldn’t get any air.

“She’s hyperventilating,” the male shouted. Why did he need to shout? “Did you even give her anything for the pain?”

She winced away from a bright, orange light as it exploded above her.

“Heart rate is becoming erratic. Damn it, Miranda, she’s going into v-fib. We’re going to lose her before we get out of the damned elevator.”

Someone threw something heavy onto her legs.

“Get the pads on her chest. We’ll shock her if we have to.” The woman’s face appeared above her again. “Captain, I know it’s difficult, but you must try to stay calm. We’ll be in your new room in moments.”

The alligators ate away at her until darkness closed in, opening a chasm between her and the agony of their teeth.

“_Shepard,_” a voice whispered through the darkness. Her heart calmed the moment she heard it. “__I only want this, Kahri, when it comes because this ...__” A hand pressed heavy and warm over her struggling heart. “__… belongs to me.__”

_Who are you?_ She reached out, trying to span the chasm, knowing that if she could just touch the memory of that voice, everything would be all right.

The darkness drew back as the world stopped moving, and the man and woman hurried around her.

“__Hold tight, Kahri. It’ll just be a few seconds before it kicks in.__” The voice whispered right next to her ear. “__Don’t worry, I’ve got you.__”

Her fear vanished, the voice chasing it away even before the pain and movement faded, drawing back behind the curtain.

“Thank God. She’s stabilizing,” the man sighed. “You’re insane, Miranda. Who’s going to look after her down here?”

“Us, until it’s safe to wake her. We can’t trust anyone else.”

“I’ve always got you.”

Hideth Turram -- A game played by two teams of fifteen players. A drellak hide is hung on a six metre tall pole in the center of a field that measures one hundred and fifty metres long by thirty metres wide. A twenty-four metre tall scaffolding tower stands at either end of the field. The field, which begins as turf, is soaked to provide a further obstacle, one that becomes only more and more difficult to surmount as it gets churned to mud.

The object is simple, although the execution is anything but. Teams compete to take possession of the hide and move it down the field to their tower, climbing to hang it from the pole at the apex of the tower. There are few rules regarding what means may be used to take possession of the hide from another player, and center on conduct once another player has hit the ground. They may not be struck once any body part above the hips touches the ground. Games are not considered to be good sport without “Blood hitting the mud”.
Chapter Summary

Complications and tests.

Chapter Notes

So, I failed in meeting my posting schedule this week. I know, no one is overly shocked. I am going to get my special chapter up today however, even if it kills me. I've been planning Chapter 16 of this act for N7 Day and I am going to make it! :D So two chapters today. Happy N7 Day. Do lots of good, Mass Effecty things. hugs

Siccerta -- A large (average size 3-4 metres in length, 100-150 kilos), desert dwelling lizard-analogue known for its long fringe, which it can extend out to impress mates or intimidate competitors, and its dual toned, raspy hiss. The mythos on the Siccerta’s origin is that the leader of one of the great ancient clans called all his rival clans to a gathering on neutral ground. While they slept, he ordered his people to slaughter the other clans down to the babes in arms. The praela’s having witnessed the horror of his treachery, punished his entire clan by turning them into beasts and exiling them to the desert.

508 Days ASD

It didn’t matter how many times Garrus visited Haestrom, the place gave him what Shepard called the willies: the superstitious, irrational tingle down his spine. It became even more unreasonable when he never went down onto the hellish surface of the planet. The Archangel, geth run shipyard remained fixed on the dark side of the planet to avoid the worst of the solar radiation.

Garrus shifted as he stared out the Normandy’s for-facing ports. If he had any say in the matter, he’d never set foot on that graveyard. Unlike the devastation that it visited upon Rannoch, the war passed over Haestrom. The people who lived there during the Morning War fled at the first sign of incoming geth, so all their colonial, slab architecture remained standing. From orbit, the deserted shells, smoke drifting up from the rock as the sun baked the planet to death, felt haunted, as though warning the living to keep their distance.

His eyes shifted from the planet looming large before them to the sun. There it was, the reason the system incinerated his every nerve like dry fir needles in a fire storm.

Dholen …

… dying early for no apparent reason, as if some great, dark intelligence of the universe just reached out a hand to decree the system’s annihilation.

“Three hundred cycles ago,” Tali said from just behind Garrus’s elbow, her voice hushed, almost reverent, “Dholen was a caretaker, a source of life. Now it’s betrayed its charges, a monster intent on extinction. The geth say that dark energy is concentrating within the core, and the process is accelerating.” Out of the corner of his eye, he saw her wrap her arms around herself, stiffening as if she felt the same specter hanging over them as he did. “The sun has only cycles left to live before it tears this system apart.” She nodded toward the relay. “And if the relay is destroyed or thrown into space like the one to Ilos, my people will be months at FTL from the rest of the galaxy.”

Joker glanced back at them. “The Passchendaele is hailing, General.”

Garrus nodded for the pilot to open the channel. “Passchendaele, this is Vakarian. Go ahead.”

“Hey boss. Glad you’re here,” Martin called. “The tracker died, so we have no idea if that shuttle is still on the surface, but it didn’t move the whole time the tracker was transmitting. What’s the plan?”

Garrus stepped forward, bracing a hand against the back of Joker’s chair. “Have you picked up any transmissions?”

“Nothing, not even from the shipyard, which appears to be completely shut down. We scanned it, but not a single reading, not even the power core. It’s dead in the water. I called back to home base and asked when the yard last reported in.”

Garrus held his breath. Their biggest shipyard, at least a hundred workers of all races and their families, thousands of geth platforms containing hundreds of thousands of runtimes, one dreadnought, a cruiser, and two frigates nearly ready for delivery. Spirits. “How long?” he managed to ask past the talons of dread and guilt that closed around his throat.

Looking down at Joker, he said, voice mimicking the dry rasp of a siccerta, “Scan the shipyard for lifesigns, our ships, and active power signatures, please, Joker.”

“Yes, sir.”

“Omega last heard from the shipyard the day before we left.” Martin answered. “Not even a distress beacon or a partial call for help. It just went dark. It’s a safe bet there’s no one left alive. Do you want us to board?”

Garrus shook his head. “Who knows what we’d be walking into.” He raised a talon despite Martin not being able to see him. “Give me a minute.” Garrus paced as he waited for the word from Joker. So many Archangel personnel working with the geth onboard that station. Wouldn’t they have tried to get out some call for help if attacked? Although, with the number of platforms, if the geth turned on them, they wouldn’t have stood a chance. Not to mention that the geth could easily have jammed communications.

Everything he’d eaten in the last week tried to force its way up his throat. All the families he’d sent there …

“No lifeforms, the ships are gone, there are no power signatures and no computers. The station is dead, General.” The pilot pulled up a screen displaying the scan results and looked back, shrugging a little. “Maybe the geth downloaded themselves back to the servers on Rannoch? Maybe they took the ships?”

“Reroute Weaver’s call to the comm room, Joker,” he called, already striding out of the cockpit. “Ask Anderson, Alenko, and Nihlus to meet me there.” On his way past, he snagged Tali’s forearm, asking her to follow with a gentle tug.

“The ships, Garrus,” she said, nearly whispering. “They could be anywhere.”
He nodded, not needing her to remind him that depending upon which set of hands controlled them, those ships could be running silent in orbit of Rannoch or headed for the flotilla. One of the frigates was the prototype of a new Stinger class. It would drop the shields on even the most protected ships in the flotilla with a single hit. Combine that with the dreadnought’s firepower and a surprise attack, and live ships would be nothing but chaff before the heavy fleet even responded.

He strode into the comm room, his talons cutting a rushed, irregular triangle across the deck plating as he paced.

Think, Vakarian. Think. Xen doesn’t have the firepower or the bodies to take out the station and run off with so many ships. That leaves the geth.

Could the heretics really have been infesting the consensus the entire time, picking off any geth who began to suspect?

He looked up. “Martin, send me everything on that datapad you found when Arox was taken. Then I want you and the Passch to head back to Rannoch.” He activated his omnitool. “I’m sending you my access codes. Go through my files—here’s the path data—get the IFF and transponder frequencies for those ships. When you find them, send them to all vessels, Normandy included. If any of our boats appear, disable them. Don’t try to hail. Don’t ask questions. Take out their weapons and engines then worry about their intentions.”

“Yes, sir. Are seven heavy frigates going to be able to take that dreadnought?”

“Take out the Stinger first, then the dreadnought.” Garrus spun toward the door. “Get moving, Martin, and fill in Kal’Reegar.” He stopped, suddenly realizing he’d misplaced his thief. “Where is Kasumi? Is she still on the planet?”

“Yes, sir. She wanted to stay and keep an eye on the geth base,” Martin replied.

His one mandible fluttered in a faint smile. She might prove more of an asset than he’d imagined. Reality splashed sharp and jagged as the comm room door opened, cutting off the brief levity. “It might be a very good idea for Kasumi and Kal’Reegar to move the expeditionary team into the caves under the ruins, and to make sure they are all armed. Both you and Kasumi need to check in with the Normandy on the hour.”

“Aye, sir. Anything else?” Martin’s voice trembled a little, but steadied.

Spirits, you’d be proud of him, Kahri.

“Take care of yourself and keep sharp. Good hunting.” As the call ended, Garrus spun to face the captain and the Spectre. “We have a new problem.” The Mako balanced on his shoulders rolled backward, and he stumbled, sitting down hard in one of the chairs.

“Because there aren’t enough knots tied in this string already.” Nihlus sat in the chair next to Garrus, Anderson in the one beside that, both of them watching him. “What’s happened?” the Spectre asked, his scrutiny supportive, but Garrus could see the unknowns wearing at the his calm.

Drawing in a breath, Garrus checked for the scent of alcohol, then cursed the unconscious habit. No, it wasn’t the habit of checking Nihlus for signs of drinking that he hated, it was the accompanying expectation and then disappointment. Damn. As functional as Nihlus was drunk, he couldn’t lead a team. He probably shouldn’t even be allowed on the mission.

Garrus held his reply for long seconds, the silence roaring in his ears, the Normandy’s pulse throbbing a deep bass counterpoint to his. Questions started marching through him, pounding through his head before moving down into his chest, chanting to that two-fold beat. How had he let things get so far out of hand? Why hadn’t he seen these possibilities and been ready for them? Why had he allowed families onto a base controlled by geth? Why had he been so quick to trust?

“General?”

Anderson’s voice dropped through his thoughts, a heavy stone stilling the turbulent water, and he inhaled, a quick exclamation of breath, in the vacuum that followed.

“Our shipyard is dark,” he said. “No lifeforms, no power. I think it’s safe to assume that anyone remaining there is dead.” He looked up as he opened a channel to the cockpit. “Joker, what are the conditions aboard the station?”

“Gravity is out,” the pilot reported. “Low levels of oxygen, high concentrations of carbon dioxide and methane, but pressure is nominal. Temperature is minus fifty centigrade and dropping.”

“Thanks, Vakarian out.” He looked to Anderson. “Mind if I borrow Alenko and four Marines? We need to go over and try to figure out what happened before we put an armed space station and possibly four of our own ships at our back when we head for Haestrom.”

The captain nodded. “They’re yours, General.”

Garrus looked over at Alenko. “We have no idea what we’re walking into other than what Joker just told us. Have your people prepped—one weapon with tungsten and one with incendiary ammunition—and ready to go in an hour.” He looked to Tali. “You coming?”

“Chaktika and I will meet you at the shuttle.” She stood and beckoned to Kaidan. “Come on, you can put the incendiary rounds in my shotgun for me. Last time I caused a spark and burned a hole through my suit.”

Garrus nodded when Kaidan looked to him. “Dismissed, lieutenant.”

“General? The Passch just hit the relay,” Joker reported. “Are we all alone out here, expecting to get our asses shot off by our own ships?”

“That’s about the shape of it, Joker. Stay sharp.”

And keep your eye on the sun. Shadows move across its surface.

Garrus shuddered as he watched Tali and Alenko leave, and tried to knock away the sharp, bony finger that dug into his gut, working its way under his plates. When the door shut behind them, he turned to Nihlus. “How much have you had to drink?”

Anderson cleared his throat and stood. “I’ll be out in the CIC watching your backs. Be careful over there.”

“Thank you, Captain.” Garrus’s focus followed Anderson until he stepped out of view, then turned back to Nihlus. “How much? Do I need to leave you behind?”

“I’m fully in control of my faculties, Vakarian.” Nihlus stood and strode to the door.

“If you want to join the mission, report to the doc, and get some of that crap flushed out of your system. Then meet me in the shuttle. You can second my team.”

Nihlus whirled around to face Garrus, eyes flashing, mandibles lifted and spread in fury. “Report to you?” His laugh hit hard enough to sting. “Is the title going to your head, General?”

Garrus leaned back and sighed. “Would you like to punch me, too? I still have a good mandible you could tear off.” Brow plates lifting, he shrugged. “I’ve told you how it’s going to be if you want to come on my mission, Nihlus. Throwing a tantrum and trying to hurt my feelings isn’t the best argument for your sobriety, either, just for future reference.” He stood. “So, if you want to go aboard the station, get your ass in gear, Kryik.”

Letting out a resigned, weary breath, Garrus waited to see which spirit Nihlus would listen to—the one insisting on breaking Garrus’s other mandible, or the one whispering to just go sober up and be ready for the mission.

A helical zephyr—a draft from the air vent?—curled between them, carrying a glimmer of sound, a sigh like silver dust, on its back. Garrus saw Nihlus freeze, knowing from the way the torin’s mandibles dropped and fluttered that he’d not only heard but understood that sound. The Spectre nodded, spun into a rigid, military turn, and strode out.

“Do you speak to him?” he asked the air, turning a slow circle. “Do you come to him, even when he’s awake?” His voice rose, a fist balling in his throat, strangling both larynges. “Why? Damn it, Shepa—” Jealousy? A harsh cough of laughter smashed through the block. After all those months, after watching her go on dates and share the bizarre relationship of the visions, it took an imagined whisper to provoke his jealousy.

“You’re losing it, Vakarian, and you can’t afford to,” he grumbled, heading for the crew deck. He needed a shower and some food before he left the Normandy.

As he stood under the hot spray, steaming billowing around him, he closed his eyes only to discover the image of Dholen etched onto the inside of his eyelids. The surface seethed, exploding outward in rage, screaming in the face of its death.

And the shadow. Always the shadow slithering beneath the light like the endless fathoms of black beneath the bright sparkles and reflection of the ocean. Cold, pitiless—

“General, aren’t you twenty minutes from a mission?”

Garrus jumped, his entire body spasming so rigid that he slipped and left talon gouges in the deck plating. Scrambling, he caught himself and glanced over at the crewman … Rawali? One hand grabbed for his towel as the other slammed off the water control. “Yeah, thanks. It’s been too long since I had a decent shower, I guess. Thanks. Who knows how long I’d have been there.” He chuckled, the sound so cold that even Rawali’s lips just thinned as he retreated out the door.

“Yeah, definitely losing it, Vakarian.” He dressed and ran to grab some meal bars and change his ammo.

He kept the ports shut on the way to the shipyard, using sensors instead. No matter how much he told himself that he was being a superstitious idiot about the system, looking out chilled him to his core and hollowed him out. That was no way to go into battle.

The shipyard’s shuttle bay door stood open, a mouth gaping in a silent scream. Decompression when the power went out and the forcefields died had set the station drifting, its massive bulk tumbling slowly through the black. It crept toward the light, a corpse hungry for warmth and life. Garrus knew that once the sun touched its skin, it would discover only something colder and more terrible than any death. The shadow would skitter into its soul, peeling back the layers of what it had been, transforming it—Garrus growled low in his throat and rolled his neck. High time to stop doing that.

“Absolute cold and darkness just crawled right into me, C-Sec,” Shepard whispered, still clinging to him. He could feel her trembling through the touch. “I couldn’t do anything to stop it. It spoke to me. It was afraid. I felt that it considered me a threat, and it was trying to figure me out, discover my weaknesses.”

Indoctrination?

No, he just needed to calm the hell down and focus on the mission, rather than superstitious jitters. There was nothing on the Normandy, or the shuttle, or even in the system to indoctrinate him.

“Get it together or you’re going to get someone killed,” he whispered to himself, forcing his focus onto the controls. He saw Nihlus glance at him, but felt no need to explain. They’d followed Shepard to hell and partway back, and she’d had a lot more crazy going on than just talking to herself.

Spirits, I miss the crazy, Kahri.

Garrus’s scowl deepened as he swung the shuttle around, steering past a couple of shuttles, zero-g lifts, and an assortment of small equipment expelled during the decompression. He guided the shuttle into the bay, the searchlights on its front corner panels sweeping across the absolute black. Shuttles hung suspended, their awkward postures unnatural and sinister as the lights glared off the planes and threw the angles into deep shadow. Passing through the huge door, he maneuvered between them, setting it down just inside the interior doors.

“We’re going to get beaten to hell getting through their airlocks, even if they were vented before the outer door field went down,” Nihlus said as he unbuckled himself and stood.

Garrus nodded. “I brought a power cell. If there’s no back up power source for the airlocks, Tali and I will be able to rig something. We have some moderate skill with tech.”

“You’re a pretend engineer, aren’t you?”

Everyone put on their helmets, then Garrus vented the air from the shuttle. The hiss of the vents echoed, a deep exhalation that whispered from every dark corner. When he opened the hatch, he felt as though he’d gone blind, the black so absolute that it swallowed the light from inside the shuttle before it even reached the next object.

He pulled Roger from his back and turned on the flashlight. Shuttles, and pieces of equipment reflected back his light, but no bodies. Not even any of the detritus he’d expect from combat, but then, maybe the fighting just hadn’t gotten that far.

“All right,” he said, stopping a few metres in. He turned back, facing seven expressions that mirrored his own. “We’re going to break into two teams of four. Alenko, you’ll take Tali, Peterson, and Englestein to engineering. See if you can get the power turned back on. Teung and Rogers will come with Nihlus and I. We’ll head to the bridge. Everyone go slow, keep your eyes open, and watch for survivors. It’s extremely cold, so there’s always a chance.”

Nodding to Tali, he headed for the airlock. Next to the door, he crouched and removed the panel cover. “We need to restore power to this airlock.”

She nodded and crouched at his side. “They almost always have backup power cells. Can’t have people getting locked in and suffocating during a power failure.” She examined the inner workings. “Someone took out the power cell.”
Garrus nodded and pulled the spare from the pouch at his waist. “I just happen to have one.” He stuck it into the slot, and hit the button to switch over to secondary systems. The door control lit up. “Success. We make a good team.”

She straightened. “Sure, when you’re not lying to me and insulting my government.” Despite the frostiness of her words, her tone came across warm and teasing. Too bad the elbow that knocked him in the back of his head didn’t.

“Hey,” he groused despite being grateful for the lightening of the mood, “I’m still healing here.”

“Get wise enough to leave your visor at home this time?” she asked, hitting the controls to cycle the airlock.

“No choice, it’s in three pieces. Your committee owes me a new one. Maybe one of the new PanOptiks 4500X.” A quick tilt of the head ushered the others into the airlock. “Let’s move, people.”

“Aye, sir,” Rogers groaned, her gaze darting so quickly that she stumbled backing into the airlock. Garrus grabbed her shoulder, holding her upright. “Slow your breathing. Yes, it’s dark, but there isn’t anything on this base that you haven’t faced before.” He leaned down and stared into her eyes until some colour began to return to her face and her breathing slowed. Once she’d regained control, he nodded. “Good. Let’s go.”

“If the geth turned on the people here,” Nihlus said, “some would have hidden, but most would have tried to get their families to safety. They would have rushed the docks, tried to get onto shuttles. Judging by the number of shuttles still in the bay, they didn’t make it that far.” He let out a long breath and pushed through to the inside door as Garrus shut them in and began the cycle. “Be prepared for what could be on the other side of this door. Especially if the heretic geth had dragon’s teeth like on Eden Prime.”

Garrus winced. That possibility hadn’t even occurred to him. Did the husks give off energy signatures before the dragon’s teeth lowered them? The conversion spikes had to, though. The Normandy would have picked them up.

The fight to get out of the main chamber on Ilos flashed through his mind. The Reapers’ capacity for creating horror knew no bounds. He joined Nihlus at the front of the airlock. The red light on the panel turned to green. Raising Roger to his shoulder, he brought the assault rifle’s scope to his helmet, ready. Seven safeties clicked off, and the sound of breathing, harsh and quick, filled the airlock. Hand leaving the gun, he pressed his talons against the door control.

It slid open, letting out a slight hiss that plucked his nerves, making him stiffen. Sucking in a thin, hissing breath, Garrus cursed his own jumpiness and stepped out. Roger’s muzzle swept a wide arc across the dock waiting room. His visions of heaped bodies, mowed down in a panic, or a mob of roaring tech zombies vanished, replaced by a reality far more terrifying.

The large waiting area sat empty, the room in perfect order—the furniture bolted to the floor. Not a body, not a drop of blood, no damaged geth platforms, not even scorch marks on the walls awaited them.

“What the hell happened to everyone?”

* * * * *

“Captain Shepard, my name is Miranda Lawson,” the familiar voice called across the vast, black chasm. “Can you understand me? If you understand me, open your eyes and blink twice in a row.”

She didn’t want to open her eyes, and she certainly didn’t want to bark, clap her flippers, and balance a ball on her nose. No, the darkness wrapped around her, warm and comforting. She’d stay inside it.

“Captain, I need you to do this for me. I must assess your neurological stability.” A hand gripped her forearm, the touch smelting her insensate, stoney flesh into magma.

Shepard’s eyes sprang open at the agony flowing out from that contact. Blinking twice against an orange light that burned into her skull, she used the simple motion to beg the woman to release her. She opened her mouth, trying to force out words, any words to make the pain stop, but only a series of garbled moans tumbled out.

The woman lifted her hand and turned away, her form solidifying into focus. She keyed information into her omnitool at dizzying speeds, muttering to herself about neurological bleed, synaptic transfers, and delta waves.

Confusion warred with fear. Why couldn’t she talk? She tried to move her hands, but couldn’t even feel them other than the fading pain where Miranda touched her. Why couldn’t she move? It all had to be a dream. Surely, she was dreaming.

More moans and stuttered sounds slumped from her lips, unformed lumps of clay that meant nothing. Fear kicked her adrenaline into overdrive, the hormone insisting that she flee or fight but it just turned her immobile body in on itself.

“Captain Shepard.” Miranda leaned over her. Blue eyes stared down from a pretty face framed by the sort of flowing black hair that always made Shepard want to yank it from spite. “Please take slow breaths and try to calm down.” An unconvincing smile curved the woman’s lips. “What did you think about? What did you remember the other day that helped you calm down when you were in so much pain?”

Just breathe. Just be here. Here with me.

Oh. It was him. The voice had calmed her down. It reached down inside her, slowing her heart. Who was he? His voice filled her with so many things: warmth, safety … love. Why didn’t she remember more than his voice?

“Spirits, Shepard.” A soft touch traced her collarbone. “You’re a mess.”

“Very good, Captain,” Miranda said. “That’s it. Just like that. I need to explain a few things, okay? Can you blink twice for me if you understand?”

Focusing back on the chill, professional, blue eyes, Shepard blinked. Twice. She understood the words perfectly well. What she needed were some answers.

“You were shot.” Miranda brought up an x ray and turned it so that Shepard could see. “The bullet entered just under your jaw and exited out through the base of your skull. It destroyed your brainstem and upper spinal cord.”

Shepard scowled at the screen, feeling a mild flush of relief as her face muscles moved. With that injury, she should be dead. Beating her mouth into submission, she managed to get out, “ … d … ehd.”

Miranda nodded, the expression on her face one of pride as she said, “Yes, you died. Your crew buried you in space three days after you passed. We recovered your body.” She lifted a hand as Shepard opened her mouth to force out another word. “Don’t try to talk for now. I understand it must be difficult, but I’m hoping to get your implants calibrated so you can speak.”

“What are you doing, Miranda?” The man hurried in from out of Shepard’s field of vision to square off against Miranda across Shepard’s bed. “We nearly killed her two days ago just moving her.”

“Wilson, two days is my limit for listening to you whine and question my every move,” Miranda shot back, her tone cold and hard enough that Shepard waited for the sound of a gunshot. “Stand there and shut up. I’ve nerve blocked her from the neck down …”

But, then why had her touch seared Shepard’s arm the way it did?

“… and, as you can see, she’s perfectly calm. Get to work on the new batch of nanites.” Miranda threw a careless hand toward the other end of the space. “We need to accelerate her tissue healing so that I don’t have to paralyze her to have her awake and functional.”

Shepard listened, watching every shift in the black-haired woman’s face. Miranda considered her a challenge, a puzzle, a science experiment. Not a trace of humanity or compassion looked out of those eyes or softened the lines around that perfect mouth.

Miranda looked back down, another one of her pasted-on smiles apologizing for the interruption. A faint line creased her forehead for a moment, her eyes shifting down. Trying to remember where she was, no doubt.

“We recovered your body and began the process of bringing you back. It’s been a long road, but we achieved independent neural function three months ago. Ever since, you’ve experienced continual improvement.” The calculated smile returned. “You’re still several months from full healing, but we’ll be waking you from time to time, like today, to run tests.”

Tests? If she could move, Shepard would run a test to see how far up Miranda’s ass she could shove her foot. How dare they? How dare they snatch her body out of the black like an unclaimed piece of luggage and run experiments on it for who knew how long before they managed to Frankenstein enough of her together to call her alive?

Flashes of faces flickered past like a bad vid, people she couldn’t put names to, but somehow she knew they’d all mourn her. No, it wasn’t right. It wasn’t natural. If you died, you died.

_Do you trust me, Shepard?_

The moment the voice murmured through her head, she knew the answer. Whoever he was, she trusted him implicitly. That trust flickered and glowed down at the very core of her.

_You’re the bravest person I’ve ever met._

She let the anger go, breathing slowly until it evaporated.

“Oh, Captain Shepard,” Miranda continued, oblivious. “Even though it was unexpected, having to move you the other day yielded some of the best data we’ve gotten in months. It’s allowed me to calculate new settings for the implants that replaced your brain stem.”

She sighed, almost sounding annoyed that she had to interrupt her brilliant science to explain things to the dead woman. “We were able to use stem cells to repair your spinal cord, but had to develop extremely sophisticated technology to take the place of your brain stem. You now basically have a miniature super computer directing traffic between your brain and your body.”
Shepard wondered if the woman would look as excited about the whole thing if she’d just been told that she’d been brought back from the dead with a computer running the show. Somehow, she doubted it. The desire to stab the woman with a screwdriver or writing implement twitched down her arm. Sweet baby Jesus, how could Miranda be so cavalier about destroying the laws of nature?

Miranda turned back to her omnitool. “I’m going to adjust your implants to see if we can help you talk.” She paused, the line appearing between her flawless brows again. “Understand, Captain … you died and remained brain dead for just over a year. We kept your body alive and rebuilt it, but your brain suffered a massive trauma and an extended period of oxygen deprivation. You are going to have to relearn everything, including talking, walking, reading, and writing.” A small shrug tugged at her shoulders. “Everything.”

‘Then why did you bother?’ Shepard’s stare demanded. ‘Why didn’t you just leave me dead?’ A cold, bleak wind blew through her guts. What was she? Had they even brought Jane Gwendolyn Shepard back, or was she just an empty shell run by a computer programmed to believe it was Shepard?

“What I need you to do is repeat the sound ‘da’.” Miranda stared at her, brows raised, mouth open as if to form the sound herself, as if she could somehow prompt Shepard to follow suit.

Letting out an inner sigh, Shepard opened her mouth and forced out a drunken sounding, “Deh.”

“Very good,” Miranda coaxed. “Just keep repeating it.”

Over the next hour, as Shepard’s brain became fuzzier and fuzzier, a headache building up like a hurricane circling her brain, she repeated sound after sound. Despite the frustration and her skull feeling ready to split open, the exercise yielded results as her voice became clearer and her mouth cooperated with greater ease.

“Very good, Captain. Can you try to say ‘She sells seashells’ for me?” Miranda asked without looking up from her omnitool.

Shepard raised an eyebrow. Seriously? Ma da ra had proved an insurmountable challenge. Still, she took a breath. “Scheh schellch schehschellch.” Maybe they should give her six or seven shots of alcohol. Her diction might improve. It certainly couldn’t get worse. Acidic tears burned behind her eyes as terror and frustration erected a strangling dam in the back of her throat.

A harsh sob escaped before she could stop it. Burning with anger and embarrassment, Shepard pressed her eyes closed, not wanting to see Miranda’s reaction to her science experiment breaking down.

“I know it doesn’t seem like it, Captain, but you’re doing far better than I anticipated. You should be talking very well in a short time.”

Shepard peeked out of one eye, but the woman still wasn’t looking at her. Instead, she looked up at the other side of the room. “Wilson, are you done with those nanites? I want to get them started on the speech center.”

Nanites? In her brain? “Nooh,” she protested, the fear setting off every nerve in her body, a thicket of nettles … or a billion tiny limbs, all waking up, struggling to help her defend herself against the abomination of what they were doing to her.

Miranda just smiled that terrible, empty smile. “I’m going to put you back to sleep now, Shepard. Rest well.”
“Noh!” She struggled to get any part of her body to move. She didn’t want to be sent back to oblivion while they stuffed machines into her body, warping it further from what it had been meant to be.

No amount of fighting or hoping did any good and the darkness rose up to claim her. Just before everything disappeared, throwing her back across the chasm, he spoke:

It’s all right, Shepard. Go to sleep. I’ve got you.

She prayed he did. Oh sweet voice, I really hope you do, because I don’t even know what they’ve turned me into.
Chapter Summary

Once more unto the breach dear friends...

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Day 1 ASR

Completion.

It always seemed that death would bring completion. At least, that’s what they promised her.

She grew up, a child filled with the sunshine of Jesus in a manger, promising to take her to heaven to live with Him there. Her faith-filled mom and dad said that all she needed to do was believe in Jesus and His Father to live on after death in a place more peaceful and beautiful than she could imagine. They promised a reunion with everyone she’d ever loved, her existence distilled down to pure joy.

It was a beautiful dream.

Their preacher always said that you couldn’t believe in God without believing in His opposite. Shepard never bought that. Satan proved far too easy an excuse for succumbing to weakness in all its forms. Give in to greed, hatred, or fear? It was the devil, naturally. No, she took responsibility for her actions, so Satan had no place in her life.

And then the batarians came.

Those twenty-seven hours taught her how wrong she’d been about evil. Satan existed and he’d sunk his claws into her that day, embedding a hell deep down inside her that burned like the flames of myth.

People assumed that she became a drug addict after Mindoir in an attempt to cover over the memories of what the slavers did to her. They couldn’t have been more wrong. She wore her scars—all of them—like medals, each one dedicated to another soul killed or taken during that very long night. She loved her scars, as perverse as that might seem, as an integral part of who she was.

No, the Hallex broke down her prison. Under the influence of the drug, her world blossomed, everything becoming so intense, so powerful, and so beautiful that it smashed the hatred inside of her. It set her free. At least for a little while. It allowed her to rest.

The hatred sank its roots in so deep that nothing could dig them out. It spread, infecting every aspect of her life, darkening the sky and poisoning the earth. Even after Anderson rescued her from that mental ward, and then again off the street, his love and support had only been able to ease back the hatred from a four alarm blaze to a smolder inside the walls.

The Alliance gave her the perfect focus for the hatred, each shot a strike for the good guys—the innocent that God, in all His great power and glory left to suffer and die. He stood by and watched evil despoil and destroy, she would not. Yet through it all, somehow the faith instilled in her on her knees beside her bed all those years before, never died.

_God bless Mommy and Daddy, and help me to be a better girl every day. Amen._

After all, you couldn’t hate a God you didn’t believe in.

After everything she lived through, after all she suffered, all she’d ever truly needed from Him was the fulfillment of that one promise. And He’d failed her. No peace. No torrent of joyous tears as her father swept her up into his arms to tell her how much he’d missed her and loved her. No beauty or rest.

Only darkness.

Then she woke to discover that once again, she’d been abducted by slavers who had brutally raped her, and maybe in an even more horrific way. During that long night, the batarians had abused her body, but she’d been able to lock her mind and her soul away. She didn’t know if the new monsters had left her a soul.

The sharp chatter of gunfire punctured the darkness, low and distant, the sound like glass marbles dropped on tile. Of course, she recognized it instantly. One didn’t confuse the sound of bullets being fired with other noises after being shot at. This particular chorus consisted of assault rifles and the odd metallic ping of an SMG. No, she pinned down their identity without more than a second’s consideration. Their origin, however, presented more of a problem. Mindoir? Some memory she couldn’t pull forward?

_A man screamed, shattering the stillness as it echoed along a corridor, or maybe through a barren room. Who? Who screamed? Daddy? Panic froze her in place as half of her insisted on racing out to discover who screamed … to find her mother and father and make sure they were all right. The other half demanded that she run as fast and as far as she could._

Or the present?

_“Shepard, you need to get up.”_

_The floor thundered under running feet. For a breathless moment, she listened, awaiting the crash of the door flying open. Daddy? Please, is that you? Every inch of her body trembled as she prayed for her father to appear, to take her away and protect her. The door opened and then slammed shut. She heard the locks engage._

_“Get up, Janey. You’ve got to get up. They’re coming. Use the window.” His voice slapped her hard, shattering the ice that held her in place._

Heart racing, entire body poised to flee, Shepard jumped up—

_“No, Shepard—”_

—and swung her legs off the mattress before Mindoir shattered, allowing her to register the stark, white walls; antiseptic reek; and electrical buzz of equipment between the shards. Not Mindoir. Hospital.

She’d died. Miranda—her doctor?—dragged her back from the dead.

_Oops, Janey. You didn’t stop at the edge of the bed. This is going to hurt._
She hit the floor face down, the tile surface reaching into her lungs and yanking out all the air before it bludgeoned her from head to foot. Blood seeped from tooth-holes in her tongue, but she felt remarkably little pain. After biting it hard enough to bleed, her face should feel like it was going to explode. Maybe the batarians had killed her after all.

“Shepard!” Miranda’s heels clicked toward her, her tread as brisk and efficient as the rest of her.

“Are you all right?”

Awkward and boneless, like someone trying to function with broken limbs, Shepard managed to drag one hand underneath her to push her face up off the chill tile. Blood and saliva trickled from the corner of her mouth, splashing crimson against the white.

All right? What about her patient lying splattered on the floor looked all right to Miranda, and why did she keep using her last name?

Miranda crouched by Shepard’s head, letting out a sigh of such annoyed disappointment that Jane almost felt the need to apologize for being so careless and clumsy. Almost.

Boots appeared in front of Shepard’s face, next to Dr. Frankenstein. “She can’t even sit up, Miranda. Why don’t we just move her on the bed?” The voice was male but not Wilson. Deeper, resonant rather than nasal.

“No, she’s too vulnerable.” A hand pressed against Jane’s shoulder. “Shepard, listen to me. The council paid Wilson to kill you. This base is compromised. We need to move you somewhere secure.”

Council? Was that some sort of batarian slaver oversight committee? Turning her head, she looked up into the tight, blue glare, rage countering the terror as it tried to jumpstart her heart. “You shud hayv just led the bahtareeahns—” The low, raspy growl of her voice stopped her mid sentence. Miranda’s nanites must have worked overtime. Although still slurred, the words made sense.

“We can discuss the ethical implications of bringing you back once we’re in a shuttle on our way to another base,” Miranda said, her anger crackling like static sparks on wool. She slid an arm under Shepard’s shoulder to hook through her armpit. “Try to help us get you up.”

Thrown by the fact she’d uttered an almost coherent sentence, it took Shepard a second to process Miranda’s words. She slid her other hand along her side, wincing at the angle of her hand.

“Broke wrist,” she said as she placed it in front of her. That time, although the words dragged out in slow motion, she enunciated perfectly.

“I gave you enough painkillers for five people, Shepard. We’ll fix you up when we get to the other end.” She looked up. “Jacob, Kelly, help me get her into the chair.”

Gunfire. Shepard froze, holding her breath. Pistol that time, four shots, so more than likely a single target, but close. A lot closer than before. No. No no no. Why would they come back for her? She was just one, beaten up girl.

“What is Ahndarson?” she whispered, searching the room for the comfort of her saviour’s familiar face. She looked up, staring at the man standing over her for a second before Anderson’s face disappeared, replaced by another. Anderson? Why had he left her? Did he believe her dead? Tears wet her lashes, but she blinked them back.

“We need to move,” the man, Jacob, said. He rolled Shepard over, lifting her easily in strong arms, his armour hard against her side. “Kelly, roll that chair over here.”
More shots punctured the steady, mechanical background hum. Shepard twisted in Jacob’s arms, fixing her stare on the door.

Please don’t find us. Please don’t find us.

She wouldn’t let the batarians take her. Not again. She’d grab the pistol from Miranda’s hip and send herself back to oblivion first.

Jacob settled her in the chair, then stepped past her, pulling a shotgun off his back as he jogged to the door. Pressing his back to the wall beside it, he palmed the control. When it opened, he leaned out, sweeping his weapon one way, then the other.

He knows what he’s doing, Janey. Look at him. Tough and professional. A soldier to the core. The big gun doesn’t hurt either. Just relax. It’ll be fine.

Watching him, rapt and hopeful, Jane scarcely paid any attention to the people fastening her into the chair. Miranda had ripped her from the natural order of God’s creation, turning her into some sort of barely functional golem. The other one was just a name, but Jacob would get them out of there. She knew it. Her pulse slowed, jumping a little as Miranda jogged past her, the pistol coming off her hip in a very practiced, confident grip.

Okay, looks like Dr. Frankenstein’s got some skills too, Janey. Things are looking up. You know, if you forget the whole died for a year before being brought back from the dead thing.

Why?

The question drifted, disappearing between the thoughts fixated on trying to hear where the batarians were and those working out how best to make sure the bastards didn’t take her alive. Maybe they’d come to kill her, cleaning up one last loose end, and she didn’t have to worry.

Two soldiers in black and yellow armour strode out of a cross corridor, looking both ways before they spotted Jacob and Miranda. Their guns swung around, but Jacob’s shotgun let out three harsh roars and the men hit the ground before they could take aim. A tiny smile lifted one side of Shepard’s mouth. At least her grave robbers could shoot.

Three corridors and two more dead attackers, they arrived in the shuttle bay. Miranda ran ahead, flinging open the hatch of the closest craft. A gurney stood inside, strapped in against the wall, an entire bank of machines at its head. As the so far faceless Kelly pushed her toward the open portal, Jane realized that Miranda intended to put her back to sleep, to send her back into a state of blissful helplessness.

No.

Sliding her feet off the footplates, she braced the best she could. One foot held, the other rolling over at the ankle, sending the wheelchair into a hard turn.

“Did your feet fall off?” a gentle, feminine voice asked. Kelly stepped around in front of Jane, a friendly smile on her pretty, freckled face. A redhead, just like her. The woman bent down to lift Jane’s feet back onto the supports, but Shepard shoved with her one foot, managing to back up out of reach.

“No.”

“What’s going on?” Miranda strode toward them, the same ‘enough of this nonsense’ look on her face that Jane’s mother wore most of the time. “Shepard, there are people trying to kill you. Do I need to say that this isn’t the time for you to get difficult?”

“Not gohing bahk to sleep.” She shook her head and pushed back, timing it to avoid Miranda’s hand every time she made a grab for the chair. “No mohr exparument.”

“Again, not the time, Shepard.” Miranda lunged, managing to snag the armrest and turned the chair toward the shuttle. When she tried to push, Shepard set her feet against the deck plating. “Oh for pity’s ….” She waved to Kelly. “Get her feet up before we’re all killed.”

Jacob backed toward them, his gun covering the door. “What’s going on? Why isn’t she loaded?”

“Not baggahdg.” Shepard shouted, proud of her volume even though she sacrificed clarity. She kicked at Kelly’s hand, just a violent, spastic twitch to warn her off.

“She doesn’t want to be put back to sleep,” Kelly said, shrugging. “Not that I blame her. Put yourself in her place, Ms. Lawson. Yesterday, you told her that you stole her corpse, filled it full of tech, and brought her back to life a year after she died. I wouldn’t trust you with my unconscious body either.”

Shepard stared at the woman, surprise warring with gratitude. Maybe some of her body snatchers weren’t all that bad. The unexpected kindness knocked a chink out of the wall, letting a couple of tears loose to roll down her cheeks.

Kelly smiled and whisked them away with a quick, gentle thumb despite Jane shying away from the contact.

“Impossible.” Miranda pushed against the chair, only managing to move it a hand’s width before giving up. “Shepard, you have a lot of healing to do. Your implants need constant readjustment.” A harsh sigh punctuated her annoyance. “You’d be in constant pain, unable to move yourself around. It’s in your best interest.”

“No. Know payhn. Can take payhn. Not gohing bahk to sleep. Heel behtar awayk.” It didn’t matter how much pain she had to face, it couldn’t be as bad as being the helpless victim of Dr. Frankenstein.

“Look,” Jacob said, walking over to look down at Jane, “Captain, you need to get on the shuttle. You can be as stubborn as you want once we’re in there and away from the people trying to kill you.”

“Captin?” Jane laughed, a sharp scowl creasing her brow. “Uf whut? The pirahl ship, Ravehng?”

Gunfire. Jacob ran back toward the door, Miranda dashing after him.

“Get her on the shuttle, Kelly,” the woman shouted back.

If she resisted just a few minutes more, the gunmen would make it past Jacob and Miranda and finish what the batarians had started. Of course, that meant Jacob and Kelly dying along with her. Well, Dr. Frankenstein too.

Imagine how happy Anderson is going to be when he finds out you’re still alive.

The image of her guardian’s face filled her with warmth. Anderson must have been gutshot when she died after everything he’d done to save her.

Why did you die? How? You were recovering from the batarians.
Kelly crouched next to Jane’s knee, startling her out of her thoughts. “Look, I know this sucks. You didn’t ask for any of it, but it has a pretty big upside to it as well. You’re alive. You’ve got a chance to do everything that you didn’t get a chance to do.” The redhead sucked in a strong breath, and nodded, a stubborn, decisive shake of the head that Jane knew very well. “I promise I won’t let them put you back to sleep. We’ll figure out a way for you to stay awake for the rest of your rehab. We just really need to leave.”

Staring into the young woman’s eyes, Shepard saw only sincerity. Anderson’s face appeared once more, his face stoic, but his eyes bright. After a second, she nodded. “Okay.” For Anderson and for hope she could try to see the gift rather than the curse.

Chapter End Notes

I made it. You know, if you live on the west coast of North America, it is still N7 Day. :D And she's back.
Into the darkness

1 ASR

Garrus knew darkness. The intoxicating, adrenaline-soaked shadows of lying in wait for a suspect, and the deep, black fury of watching the criminal escape justice. The warm velvet ebony of lying with Shepard pressed close, her breath soft on his neck, and the obsidian blades that flayed his soul from his flesh every night he went to sleep without her.

Yes, he knew darkness, but the black aboard the station couldn’t be considered anything as innocuous as the absence of light. It loomed over him and tried to climb inside him, the conclusion of entropy—the frozen, still end of everything. Or the end of all life, anyway, for shadows moved just beyond the beam of his light, vanishing beneath chairs or along the edges of counters when he glanced their way. Before he reached the door leading into the interior corridors, he knew all too well why Shepard feared the dark.

How have I never seen this before?

For the third time that night, he wished she was there. In the face of the nothingness on Noveria, he’d pressed closer to her, drawing from the life and light that burst from her like solar flares. For someone who harboured so many fears, she’d been a source of indefatigable courage for them all. Spirits, he missed that glow, always just an arm’s length away.

“See you on the other side,” Kaidan said, pulling Garrus’s attention back where it belonged. The lieutenant’s low whisper eased Garrus’s shame at his superstitious fear. At least he wasn’t the only one who felt as if breaking the silence would draw the attention of things best left oblivious.

Garrus replied, a single nod, then watched after the second team until the last one disappeared around the curve of the station’s outer corridor. Once they moved past the beam, his light glared through the emptiness, reflecting off the indecently polished floor panels. Warzones should be scarred and littered, dust and smoke filling the air, not looking as though the cleaning crew had just gone through.

“We go straight on?” Nihlus asked, even though the orange glare of the facility map glowed above the Spectre’s forearm.

Garrus knew Nihlus’s intention, answering the question only with a sharp glance as he struck out toward the bridge. He needed to police himself, get his imagination and emotions under control. Distraction could get them all killed. Focusing on the hallway before him, he edged down the left hand wall while Nihlus moved to cover the right, leaving Teung and Rogers to watch their six. Further along, the corridor opened into several offices and a large electronics lab. Maybe the workers had all been taken totally by surprise and died at their desks or in their living quarters.

“I’ll be just fine once we find someone alive. Someone we can question.” Shepard chuckled, but it came out hard and dry, edged with hysteria. “Hell, right now I’d settle for someone to shoot.”
A door broke the flow of the bulkhead, the smooth metal lined with cables and narrow pipes that all curved suddenly upward to sweep around the portal. Garrus held up a fist to bring them all to a halt, then beckoned Nihlus over to cover the other side. The Spectre pressed his back to the wall, his shotgun pointed into the dark ahead of them, guarding their twelve.

When the power had gone out, all the door mechanisms had released, leaving the doors open a couple of centimetres. Holding Roger with one hand, he slid his talons through the crack and pulled, stepping back to stay behind the cover of the door as it opened.

No Reaper horrors or rampaging geth raced out to attack them, and he let out the breath he’d been holding, feeling more than a ridiculous. He straightened, rolling his shoulders, then cracked his neck. Roger leading, he swung around the door, stepping just over the threshold.

“No Reaper horrors or rampaging geth raced out to attack them, and he let out the breath he’d been holding, feeling more than a ridiculous. He straightened, rolling his shoulders, then cracked his neck. Roger leading, he swung around the door, stepping just over the threshold."

“Clear.” Spotting scarring on the far wall, he called back. “Rogers, Teung, keep an eye out. Kryik, with me.” He strode across the room, his light darting from the dark corners to the hidden spots behind furniture. “Between everything being bolted to the floor and the chairs floating, who can tell if there was a struggle?”

He headed straight for the scarring on the wall. No blood accompanied it, just the blast mark from a shotgun. Rubbing it with the pad of his talon, he scraped a little off. A couple of days old, as expected. Incendiary rounds. That he hadn’t expected. He crouched to examine the floor. No sign of charring, which would happen if someone fell after being hit.

“This is insane.” He turned a slow circle, shining his light over the walls, searching for more hits. Nothing. “How did they subdue all these—”

Nihlus spun to face him when he clacked his mouth shut on the end of the sentence. “What?”

Garrus took a couple of steps toward the door then stopped. “We asked the same thing on Noveria. All the people who worked on Peak 15 vanished without a trace. We never found out what happened to them. Now here, again.” He took another step.

“All the people who worked on Peak 15 vanished without a trace. We never found out what happened to them. Now here, again.” He took another step. “The colonies.” Nihlus froze for a second, his entire body practically vibrating with tension. Then, as quickly as it had appeared, it vanished, and he nodded toward the door. “Let’s keep moving. Staring at empty rooms and jumping at shadows isn’t going to tell us anything.”

“Yeah.” Garrus paused, head cocking a little as his voice echoed oddly through the space. Invisible talons raked down the back of his neck, sinking into the soft flesh where his cowl and neck met. As geth construction, the base’s angles and slopes bounced sound around in strange ways, he knew that and thought he’d gotten used to it. Still, as he moved down the corridor, the space warped every noise, stretching and twisting them enough to set his teeth on edge.

“All the people who worked on Peak 15 vanished without a trace. We never found out what happened to them. Now here, again.” He took another step. “The colonies.” Nihlus froze for a second, his entire body practically vibrating with tension. Then, as quickly as it had appeared, it vanished, and he nodded toward the door. “Let’s keep moving. Staring at empty rooms and jumping at shadows isn’t going to tell us anything.”

“Yeah.” Garrus paused, head cocking a little as his voice echoed oddly through the space. Invisible talons raked down the back of his neck, sinking into the soft flesh where his cowl and neck met. As geth construction, the base’s angles and slopes bounced sound around in strange ways, he knew that and thought he’d gotten used to it. Still, as he moved down the corridor, the space warped every noise, stretching and twisting them enough to set his teeth on edge.

All the way through Noveria, he’d listened to Shepard mutter to herself about how something was off. He hadn’t given it much thought, more focused on the next step in front of him. The place had been creepy as hell, but until they found the dead rachni, having Shepard in charge allowed him to let all of that go. She’d acted as his lightning rod. Now the creepy came straight at him, and he had to admit, he didn’t care for it.

The last door on the left led into the electronics lab. Unlike the office doors, its locking mechanism hadn’t released when the power went out. Due to both security and static-free cleanroom protocols, the lab had a series of manual locks he needed to unlock in the right sequence in order to trigger the latch. Once Nihlus took position to cover the way ahead, Garrus opened the panel and unlocked the door.
The lab didn’t look as though anyone had broken into it, and it should have remained locked at all times. As he forced the door open, he hoped someone managed to hide. An empty station with the odd scorch mark here and there wouldn’t help solve the problems on Rannoch. They needed evidence; someone they could point to and say, they were behind everything. Taking point, he moved through the door, sweeping Shepard’s old rifle from corner to corner. Nothing.

Nihlus entered a few seconds after Garrus, moving to cover the right, the pair of them moving without needing to coordinate. The Spectre moved more smoothly than Garrus, not starting every time their light cast an odd shadow. Maybe going into a mission at least partially drunk had its advantages.

“Do you have the code for the cold room?” Nihlus asked as he approached the thick, insulated glass. Despite his body language remaining completely calm, the torin’s subvocals gave away his tension. Perhaps Nihlus’s appearance of calm owed more to cycles of dealing with the unknown than the alcohol. Maybe both. Nihlus pressed his light to the glass and peered through. “There’s something in there. Between the glare and the glass, I can’t tell what, though.”

“Yeah, just a second.” Garrus made his way toward the cold room the long way, checking behind the work stations along the far wall before turning his back to them. No one hid under the desks, living or dead. As far as he could tell, whomever attacked the facility hadn’t made it that far in. Or, he reminded himself, the staff all just obediently walked out, mindless and indoctrinated.

But that didn’t account for the geth. What had happened to all the geth? How could there be nothing left behind? Well, nothing except for the talons drilling through the base of his skull to work their way into his—

“General!” Teung shouted from the corridor, enough edge in his voice to send Garrus bolting for the door, Nihlus’s boots pounding the tile right behind him.

Eight strides carried him to the door. He burst through to see Rogers watching the corridor ahead, her eyes so large that he could see that her pupils had shrunk to pinpricks even past the reflection of the lights off her visor. The woman backed away from them, her gun barrel jerking back and forth across the empty hallway as if she saw enemies everywhere.

“Rogers? Teung, what’s going on?” Acting on a hunch, Garrus hung Shepard’s rifle on his back and held out his hands. Who knew what Rogers was seeing. “Rogers? Are you okay?”

“I saw them, sir. I saw … .” She continued to back away. On the edge of hysteria, she breathed so shallow and quick that her visor fogged in short, rapid puffs.

He nodded and stepped toward her. “Okay. You need to slow your breathing, or you’re going to pass out.”

“They’re out there, sir, moving in the darkness. They’re trying to crawl into my thoughts. They want my memories.” She let her rifle drop a little as she raised one hand to the side of her head. Her gaze dropped to the floor, becoming unfocused, and she swayed on her feet. “They’re dead, but no
… .”

Garrus took another step, moving to catch her if she fell. He needed to get a shot of the indoctrination serum into her.

“No. No, they were never alive.” Surreal, almost dance-like, she jolted rigid, rising onto her toes and stumbling backwards as she wrenched her gun back into both hands. Then she just stared at it as if she had no idea how it had arrived in her hands, let alone how to use it. “They’re out there, in Garrus nodded. “I know.” He looked toward Teung, and whispered, “First name?”

The Marine took a moment to answer, his eyes shifting about as if beginning to see monsters as well. He shook himself. “Amanda, um … Mandy, sir.”

Garrus popped open the pouch with the syringes of serum and tossed one to Teung. “Take that, now, before it gets any worse.”

The soldier nodded and stuck it into the medigel injection port, allowing Garrus to focus back on Rogers. Sharp legs skittered up his spine, on the inside, burrowing in where the invisible talons weakened his defenses, and cementing his guess at what Nihlus had seen through the cold-room glass.

“Nihlus, take yours,” he called back without turning, keeping his eyes fixed on Mandy Rogers.

“Everyone who worked here … they’re all dead, sir,” she whispered, “but they’re still here, trapped in the shadows, screaming. Can’t you feel them? Hear them?”

A sharp nod answered the question, his muscles holding his vertebrae so tight that they let out a serrated snap. Rogers jumped, her rifle slipping from her fingers to clatter across the floor. Letting out a braying yelp that drove a spike of black, rotted ice straight through his armour, piercing both lungs, she dropped to her hands and knees. A child whose security blanket had been torn from trembling fingers, she scrambled across the tile, knocking it out of reach in her panic. Once she caught hold of it, she lurched to her feet, clutching the weapon tight against her chest.

“I feel them,” Garrus replied, layering his voice with calm confidence, ‘but they’re shadows, Mandy. They can’t hurt us unless we let them in, unless we let them strip away our courage.” He held up a syringe. “This will help.”

Tears streamed from her eyes, glistening slick and wet in the light, as she stared at his hand. “Will it take their claws out of my head?” Her whisper echoed, a chorus of ghosts murmuring the question down the corridor.

“Yes. I need to inject it into the medigel port. All right?” He closed on her, keeping everything slow and steady.

Her eyes cleared, and she shook off terror’s blinders to close the distance at a strong march. Of course. She was a soldier. All she needed was to be given an effective weapon. “Yes, sir, although sooner would be better than later.”

A weary chuckle accompanied the injection. “If the pressure doesn’t back off completely, let me know,” he ordered. “I’ll give you another.” Garrus glanced over to the other Marine. “Teung, you okay over there?”

“Yes, sir, but I’m ready to get the hell out of here,” he replied, moving up beside Rogers.

“Me too.” Garrus gave himself an injection, then turned to Nihlus. “Let’s head back in there and get into the cold room.” Even as he headed back into the lab, he called back. “Watch one another as well as the corridor.”

Garrus ran across the large room, ducking between desks, almost positive of what he’d find inside the back room. Sure enough, when he entered the manual code and the door opened, one of the black orbs sat dead center on a counter. Without even a heartbeat of hesitation, he pulled Roger, pelting the nightmarish globe with rounds until it exploded.

Instant relief pulled a ragged sigh from his throat, the claws loosening.

“Is that what attacked Shepard on the Citadel?” Nihlus asked, pushing up behind Garrus’s right shoulder. The Spectre shuddered. “It’s not the only one. I still feel them crawling around inside my head.”

Garrus nodded and turned on his heel. “Take another injection before it gets any worse.” He opened a channel to Kaidan’s team. “Team two, report in.”

“Team two, here, General,” Kaidan’s voice came through, sounding strained. “We’ve run into some trouble. All of us are experiencing visual and auditory hallucinations. We’ve taken a shot of the serum Dr. Chakwas gave us, but it’s not helping as much—”

A cry came through the radio, but not from Kaidan. A savage, male howl of hopelessness was followed by the ceramic ring and crunch of armour crashing into armour. Garrus could hear Kaidan grunting with effort as he grappled with someone, then the LT returned, gasping and breathless. “Peterson just attacked me, then took off screaming about monsters inside his head.”

“All of you take a second shot, and don’t bother going after Peterson, yet. Somewhere close by there is a black, iridescent orb. You’ve got to find it and destroy it.” Garrus strode for the door as he barked the orders, as if he intended to march straight to their position. Instead, he stopped just outside the lab door. “There will be more of them, Alenko. If the symptoms start getting bad, it means you’re close to one. Understood?”

“Yes, sir.” After a pause, the lieutenant let out a sigh. “Tali found it. Orb destroyed, General.”

“Good, but there will be more. Stay sharp and head for engineering. Get the power on so we can get the hell out of here.” Garrus waved the others forward, continuing toward the bridge. “How close are you?”

“Ten minutes, if we don’t have any more of that. We’ll get there and get it done. Alenko, out.”

“They’re having problems as well?” Nihlus asked, taking the right flank again as they moved out into the large, open heart of the station.

“Yeah.” He looked up into the dark, wishing for his visor. The corridor opened into the central hub of the station, a great space of metal walkways and stairs. In the light, one could see up through the station’s dome to the docks where they assembled the dreadnoughts, and beyond them, the planet. Garrus could barely make out the slightly lighter area of the dome, what little sun made it around the planet certainly doing nothing to ease the pitch black in the belly of the station.

Seventy metres across, ten floors down, ten floors up. Spirits, help us.

The void felt alive, breathing and shifting around Garrus as if he stood within the chest of a great, sleeping beast. Their footsteps on the metal grating rang out, echoing from everywhere, an army of pursuers, racing to get to them before they could restore life to the station. The oppressive emptiness pressed down on Garrus until his head throbbed and his knees trembled beneath the weight.

“You will reveal what you are.” A few spiders wriggled into his skull, whispering as they squirmed and scraped against the bone. “Your mind is ours.”
“Push through,” he ordered, practically grunting the words.

A few steps into the open space, their flashlights became all but useless, the darkness gobbling down the beams. Panic belched sulfur into his blood, yellow and stinking, as he felt the shadows crawling in through his eyes, nose, and ears. He reached up to swipe them away, smacking his talons into his helmet.

“You’re strong,” the whispers rasped, skittering along the pathways of his mind. An image flashed through his mind of Shepard on her hands and knees in the Presidium markets, the shadows stealing her senses, raping her memories. “She was strong, but no more. She’s wasted away, weak and vulnerable. So very easily overridden.”

“I’m turned around already,” Teung said, snapping Garrus back. A harsh gasp marked each of the Marine’s inhalations. “How do we find the bridge if we can’t see more than a couple of metres ahead?”

How long had Garrus been standing there? Ten seconds? A minute? Five minutes? He looked down, shoving the whispers back, forcing himself to focus. The metal edge of the floor panel ran straight. He didn’t think he’d turned at all after entering. If they followed the floor, they should find something better able to help them orient themselves. At least if they got close enough to the center, their flashlights would work.

Was it their flashlights that failed? Or, as they’d done to Shepard, were the shadows—the terrible, tar-slick spiders—stealing their vision?

“You can tell the geth didn’t build this place with organics in mind,” Nihlus spoke up from Garrus’s right. The Spectre edged closer, closing ranks. “They probably never need any sort of emergency lighting.”

“I’ll take point,” Garrus said, injecting as much confidence into his voice as he could muster. “Rogers, Teung, then Nihlus. Keep your light on the person in front. If you need to stop for any reason, call out, wait for us to halt before stopping. If you get separated, watch the edge of the deck plating. We just need to head in a straight line.”

He waited for them to sort out their order, then turned his light to the floor up ahead. The space only measured two hundred paces across, and the bridge sat at the center, surrounded by labs and the geth server rooms. That left maybe a hundred steps in the wasteland.

More spiders broke through his defenses. True to his fears, as more of them invaded, his flashlight beam weakened. “Everyone take a second dose of the serum,” he ordered, fishing into his pouch to grab syringes for Teung and Rogers. He passed them over, then took his own. The pouch was empty. He hadn’t anticipated walking under an overwhelming indoctrination attack. Not a mistake he’d ever make again.

“Not again,” Nihlus whispered.

Garrus spun to face the Spectre. The darkness drew back, and he let out a relieved sigh. Spirits, he’d never take the light for granted again.

“I can’t. I can’t live with them crawling around inside my head any longer.” The Spectre shook his head, backing down the corridor away from them.

“Nihlus?” Garrus glanced at the other two as he strode toward Nihlus. “Did you two take your shots?”
“Yes, sir,” they replied in tandem.

“Nihlus, what’s going on?” Garrus held out his hand and continued to close. “Don’t take off on me. Talk to me.” He cursed under his breath as the Spectre’s retreat sped up. “Don’t run. Tell me what they’re saying.”

Nihlus stopped. “It’s not me. They’re attacking Tashac.” His gun clattered against the floor, dropping from his fingers as if they’d lost feeling. He reached up, clamping both hands against his helmet. “They’re torturing her.” He stumbled, almost going down. “I’m trying to block her out, but she’s screaming.”

“General!” Kaidan shouted in Garrus’s ear. “We’re in the engineering room. There are three orbs. Tali took one out, then disappeared. I took out the other two. Englestein is lying in a ball on the floor. I’m trying to get the power on, sir.”

“Understood, Kaidan. We’re deep in the shit here, too. Once the power is on, head for the bridge. We’ll figure out how to get our people back once we’ve got lights.”

“Yes, sir. Alenko, out.”

Garrus looked toward Rogers. “You holding together, Mandy?”

She nodded, her eyes huge as she watched Nihlus flail. “Yes, sir. Shaky, but holding.”

“Keep talking to him, and get that second shot into him. Don’t let him run off. See if you can get him moving toward the bridge.” Garrus waited for her acknowledgement then started to back away. “I’m going to go to the bridge and destroy any orbs, then we can rally there.” He reached out a hand toward Nihlus. “Keep Tashac calm, Nihlus. Don’t let her panic, whatever you have to do. Can Merol talk to her?”

The Spectre didn’t reply, his hands still clutching his head.

“Have Merol keep her calm. You know he can. I’ll get you out of here as quickly as I can.” After another second, Garrus turned, able to see the flashlight gleaming faintly off the walkway to the bridge. Thank the spirits for Dr. Chakwas, the crazy salarian, and their potion. His brain felt like the spiders had started tearing up neurons like someone ripping wiring out of an electronics panel, and he’d been dealing with it for a couple of hours.

Spirits, how much of the time since that day on the Citadel had Shepard fought off the poison left inside her head by the orbs? The woman never ceased to—

The spiders … no, the whispers, he needed to stop thinking of them as physical beings … said she was strong, but that she was weak and vulnerable to them now. They couldn’t torment her even in death, could they? Surely they’d meant that to help break him down. Dear spirits, sweet baby Jesus, the blessed enkindlers, and every other entity or belief known to sapient life, let them have just been tormenting him.

Pushing himself faster, running a little blind, Garrus raced toward the bridge. He needed to destroy the orbs before they pushed back into his head and stole his senses. Before they stole his sense, and he ended up running or curling up in a ball, the vision of his Kahri, alone in the dark, tormented and afraid, robbing him of his hope and reason.

“Sir! Nihlus just took off,” Rogers called out. “Dammit, I just about had him, and then he just turned and ran.”
“Understood. Get to the bridge.” He dug in harder, straining with every last scrap of resolve and strength to get there. Then his hands slapped against the panel next to the door. The code … he couldn’t remember the … but his fingers moved on their own and then it cracked open. Pulling the door back, he stayed in cover, not sure what awaited him other than more orbs.

The lights flickered on, died, and then slowly began to glow, growing brighter and brighter. All around him, equipment hummed as it woke up, some of it letting out alarming sputters in the freezing temperatures. The generators deep in the bowels of the station sent reassuringly normal vibrations through the deck into his talons, and computers bleeped and winked on. He let out a relieved laugh. Thank the spirits. Power. Power would ease back the fear and banish the slippery, wet-tar shadows.

Glancing around the door, he saw the bridge coming back to life, but as with everywhere else, no geth, no workers. He stepped over the threshold, glancing around at the different computers. What did he need to figure out where everyone had gone?

As he walked into the space, Roger finding its way back into his hand, he spotted six orbs around the room, sitting on desks, innocuous as you could hope for. Did the geth or the people there even know what the things were? Had they brought them in for study? He’d have to send out an advisory to all Archangel facilities to destroy the orbs on sight. He raised the rifle.

“Holy shit,” Teung whispered from just behind Garrus’s shoulder. “Five … no, six of them.”

Garrus jumped a little as the man spoke, then froze solid and still. Four, bright, gold lights appeared on every monitor and screen in the room. Four lights that looked like … eyes. They flashed, as bright as the sun for a second, blinding him, then the power died, the spiders swarming into the darkness left behind.
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Eighteen

Chapter Summary

Shepard's recovery might proceed more quickly if she cooperated a little. Ha! Like that'll happen.

Chapter Notes

Trigger warning for sexual abuse in the Kai Leng conversation where you see the double asterisk. **

(A-N: Sorry it took so long to get this chapter out. I've been eyeball deep in Thedas, running the Inquisition, and I've been suffering a sort of writing crisis of faith, so it came slower and took a lot more rewriting than usual. I am going to just post as I get things done until after Christmas. Garrus has been insisting I get him out of his hot water, so I probably should ... or let him cook. ;) Thanks for reading, as always. Hugs for those who like them. ;) Kim)

12 Days ASR

“Shepard! What are you doing, now?”

A crooked grin broke across Shepard’s face before she policed herself back to an expression of guileless surprise. Rolling over part way, she looked up at her Dr. Frankenstein. “Art therapy.” God, something in Miranda’s cool, haughty expression just brought out Shepard’s twitchy inner bitch. In spades. She struggled to choke it down.

In the last week, she’d made it a rule—well, maybe more of a suggestion—to not poke the mad scientists who routinely played around inside her brain. Miranda had brought her back from the dead. Who knew what other tricks the woman had up her way-too-tight-catsuit’s sleeve?

“Shepard, we thought you could use a set of hanar tentacles. Don’t they look marvellous?”

“On the walls?” Miranda strode to the bedside, blue eyes flashing exasperation. “Must you behave like a child?”

“Seems so, yep.” Shepard shrugged and continued her doodle, tossing tiny glances over her shoulder. “Kelly says I need to draw my feelings.”

“And your feelings express themselves as stick figure murals?” Miranda crossed her arms, hands laying over her elbows primly. She cocked a hip and did that head tilt that Shepard translated as ‘I disapprove of every cell in your being’. “That explains a great deal.”

“In this case, yes. These are my musings on your big, bubbly buttocks.” She pointed to a group of male and female stick people standing in a line, their mouths gaping open and their eyes bugging out of their heads. “See, these guys and gals here are the ones who are huge fans of your tight pleather, rubber, or whatever, catsuit.” She drew a circle around another group, all of whom wore ugly frowns. “These ones here are the ones who call you a bitch and say you got where you are with your legs open.”

Yep, definitely more of a suggestion. Oh well, can’t win them all. Point to twitchy inner bitch.

She gestured up to a single stick figure way above the rest. “That’s whoever is in charge of this zoo, watching and not giving a shit because your insecurity over being nothing more than a perfect set of genes keeps you working like a maniac to prove otherwise.” Grinning, she tapped the pencil against a stick figure with boobs and a pronounced backside. “And that’s you in the center of it all, oblivious as the day is long because the aforementioned fear keeps you running too fast to notice.”

Miranda nodded and turned toward the door. “Although your perception appears unaffected, prior to your death you did not have a reputation for cruelty,” she said. “In fact, witness interviews say quite the opposite.” She activated her omnitool.

“Yeah, well, it’s a mostly all-new day starring Jane Shepard, living corpse.” Shepard sighed and let her arm hang off the edge of the bed. “The circle of death; dead dogs learn new tricks; a nasty doodle in time saves nine; great bitches from little, dead acorns grow; and all that crap. Take your pick.”

“Honestly, Shepard, I’m surprised at your attitude. This entire program is designed to get you back to your prime, and give you a second chance. Don’t you want to do the work and get back to your life? Why fight us?”

Shepard rolled over and grabbed the bar above her bed to pull herself up. “Why fight? You and your little crew of Igors sneak in here at night, cut me open, adjust and implant whatever you want, and the next day, viola, I’m talking like I never took a bullet to the head.” She laughed, but it felt and tasted like throwing up. Reaching up, she pushed her hair away from a fresh scar on the back of her neck. “Oh! Why, listen to me talk. Not a slur or stutter to be heard. It’s almost like you’ve already done it.”

A small muscle in Miranda’s jaw tightened before she let out an exasperated sigh. “We’re bringing you back from a catastrophic brain injury, Shepard, and you woke up six months earlier than scheduled. If you’d just let us put you back into the induced coma, all this time and pain would pass effortlessly. You’d wake up completely functional but for some physical conditioning.” She walked slowly to the door, keying information into her omnitool. “Your speech is almost one hundred percent thanks to our adjustments, so perhaps a little gratitude and trust are in order.”

“Gratitude? Your idea of help amounts to the worst sort of violation, Operative Lawson. What you people have done and continue to do to me is unconscionable. At least the batarians were upfront when they raped me. They didn’t roll that shit in sugar, stuff it into a candy wrapper labelled ‘helping’, and then ask me to be thankful while they shoved it down my throat.”

She stared into Miranda’s eyes as the woman spun to face her, shock and disgust trying hard to break through the practiced mask of inscrutable professionalism. After a second, Shepard laughed, but the sound sliced its way out. “Sweet baby Jesus, you actually buy all the bullshit you feed me, don’t you? You don’t even understand why I’m angry.” Shepard shook her head, incredulous, then leaned forward. “You’re fucking me without my permission, Lawson. Get that through your head. Let it register, and then ask yourself if you even considered sitting down and asking me if I’d agree to your procedures.”

Miranda straightened, her expression haughty, even for her. “You’d just refuse.”
Shepard shrugged, a bare twitch of one shoulder. “Maybe. That’s my right.”

The operative shook her head. “In your current state, you’re incapable of rational decision making when it comes to your welfare.” A tiny wince broke through the mask, as if she realized she’d cracked open a door to nowhere good.

Shepard slid off the bed, clinging to the bar with one hand, and walked unsteadily to stare directly into Miranda’s face. “Then take me to the Alliance, have me tested, and declared incompetent. The courts can appoint someone to decide what’s best for me.”

“Shepard … .”

The captain nodded and jerked a thumb back toward her wall doodle. “And then you call that little jab cruel, but it’s petty at best. It amounts to a tiny, baby morsel of cruelty compared to the hell of being your ‘guest’. So thank you, really. I’m so grateful to be your lab rat, held without even the most basic rights or expectation of humanity.” She choked down the rotted tangle of terror and helplessness that clawed its way up her throat, her stomach heaving a little as she swallowed it. “If it’s okay with you, I’ll need a bit of time to work on the trust,” she said, her words soft but sharp.

The glimmer of understanding that flashed through Miranda’s eyes eased Shepard back from the edge before she saw the moment of humanity swept away.

The operative let out a sigh so sharp it could have sliced a tomato into ten pieces and left it looking whole. “You aren’t a prisoner, Shepard, and I’ve explained this. We brought you back to help with a situation that requires your skills. We’re asking for your help, not demanding it.”

“Then why won’t you tell me who you work for? Why can’t I contact Anderson?” Shepard resisted the urge to look away as she backed up, returning to lean against her bed. She stared straight into Miranda’s eyes, clenching her jaw as tears pooled along her lower lashes. She missed Anderson so keenly that thinking about him snatched the air out of her lungs. He was her only family, and she longed to hear him tell her one of his ridiculous stories, performing all the characters despite grumbling about it. A single tear muscled loose to trickle alongside her nose, but she didn’t acknowledge it. Wiping it away would give her grief, and Miranda, more power than she was willing to share.

“Your brain is still regenerating, still learning how to process emotion and memory. It’s not prepared to handle the intensity that seeing him would provoke.” She pressed a control on her omnitool and then turned the device off. “When you are ready, I’ll connect the call for you myself.” She flipped a hand toward the doodle. “For now, enough childishness. Go to physio. Your other lessons begin in under an hour.”

Shepard deflated in a single, long breath, her shoulders dropping. “Fine, now go away. Your monster needs to run rampant and terrorize the villagers.”

At the door, Miranda turned back, nodding toward the cameras in the corners of the room. “Oh, and since you refuse to allow anyone to assist you, at least uncover the cameras so we know if you fall over and injure yourself.”

“I don’t want your creepy security people staring at me.” Shepard glanced toward one of Big Brother’s offending eyes.

“There are no security people watching you,” the operative said, her lip curling a little, as if the admission pained her. “Kelly, Vincent, and myself trade off as needed.” She drew herself taller. “It seemed appropriate given that your desire for privacy has resulted in nine orderlies and nurses resigning due to outrageously abusive language and food throwing. So uncover them.” Another, much softer sigh escaped. “And, Shepard, as you’re gnawing at that bone you like to pick, consider that I’ve had several opportunities to put you back into the coma and save myself the headaches and staff rollover.”

Shepard scowled as she watched Dr. Frankenstein open the door. She hadn’t thought about that. “Why haven’t you?” she blurted out before the portal closed.

Miranda glanced back. “Because I gave you my word.”

Once Miranda left the room, Shepard pushed herself onto her feet, clinging to the railing until she caught her balance. Six days earlier, she’d woken up oddly exhausted from a peculiarly long and uninterrupted night’s sleep to discover greatly improved motor control over her arms and hands. Four nights after that, another very strange night followed by a drastic increase in her leg function.

She reached up to grab hold of the bar that hung from a track along the ceiling, then took a shaky step toward her hoverchair. Grinding her teeth so hard they squeaked, she fought down the pain of the invisible iron maiden that clamped shut around her entire body. As terrified as she felt at being comatose and completely helpless in the hands of the mad scientists, the pain did polish up the appeal of sleeping through the next several months.

She glanced at the mirror over the sink, wincing a little at the web of open wounds spread across her face. When she asked why they weren’t sutured, Miranda gave her some sciencey mumbo jumbo about tissue cloning and growth rates. Shepard detoured over to the mirror, muscles trembling and joints rebelling as she clung to the bar and hobbled the metre and a half. She turned her head, then lifted her chin. Every ounce of flesh on her body—her corpse—had been dead, slightly decomposed, and then freeze-dried. Now, she looked the very image of Frankenstein’s monster, lights glowing through the cracks and gashes, the machine bursting out through her flesh everywhere.

And then …

Gripping the hanging bar with one hand, she tugged her shirt out of her trousers with the other. A soft moan whistled through her closed throat as the material rasped and scraped at the raw, meaty edges. She lifted the t-shirt, gripping the hem in her teeth, and stared at her torso.

In giving Shepard all new flesh and skin, Miranda had stolen her scars. The regrowing flesh didn’t cover her completely—a clear sealant filled the gaps, providing some protection from weeping, infection and wear—but the ribbons of raised flesh from the whips; the short, jagged marks from knives; the punctures of teeth and claw had all vanished.

Just like most of your life, Janey. Sweet baby Jesus, you’re a disgusting mess.

“Yeah,” she whispered, meeting her reflection’s eyes and staring into the faint glow that shone through her pupils. Who was she without her past written across her skin?

She lifted her hand to a breast, sucking in a quick breath as pain shot to her brain, and a slower, warm wave of pleasure headed for points south. Running her thumb over her nipple, she scowled. She’d never understood why women went on about having their breasts fondled. The scar tissue had left hers with almost no sensation at all. Just one more thing that wasn’t Jane Shepard, but rather the creation of Miranda Lawson, mad scientist and necromancer.

“If you’re done feeling yourself up, I’m waiting in the physio room,” a thickly accented, male “Stop spying on me, you pervert.” She dropped her shirt and glared up at the camera in the corner of her room, or more appropriately, the towel that covered it. “Hey, how are you spying on me? That camera is covered.”

“Infrared. Operative Lawson knew you’d try to hide.” The voice laughed. “Now, get that pathetically weak ass down here. Now! Or I’m coming up there.”

Startled, Shepard laughed. “Oh no! Not the universe’s most terrifying physiotherapist.” Still, she grabbed onto the bar with both hands and hobbled over to her mobile chair. “What are you going to do, Vincent? Count reps until I beg for mercy?”

“And one, and two, and three, and four. That’s it, come on, you can do it. If it doesn’t hurt, you’re doing it wrong. Four more.” He cleared his throat. “You know you fear the power of the counting. And three more—”

She dropped into the chair, stifling a sharp cry of pain by biting down on her bottom lip. “Oh, shut up, you slab of beef, I’m on my way,” she said, each word a hissing gasp. She leaned heavily against the armrest for a moment, just breathing through the screams.

“What I just said about it hurting doesn’t apply to sitting in your damned chair, Shepard,” Vincent shouted. “Damn it, woman. How many times do you have to tear all those wounds? Use the fucking bar to lower yourself.”

Shepard scowled up at the camera without lifting her head. “How about you just go get yourself a nice, big, steaming mug of shut the hell up?” she asked, fighting to keep the breathiness out of her voice.

“Shepard,” a new voice called through, “do what you’re told, and get down there.”

Unable to stop herself from grinning, Shepard sorted herself into the middle of the seat and lifted her feet onto the rests. “Hey, Red, why are you spying on me? You can’t play head games with the camera feed.”

“I can try,” Kelly replied, her ever-present smile radiating through her tone.

Shepard looked back up at the camera. “I sent a memo out to all departments, but in case you didn’t get it … the whole bringing me back from the dead was enough psychological torture for one … nope, make that two lifetimes.”

“You’ve been avoiding me for two days, Shepard” Kelly answered. “I thought I’d ambush you in physio—announcing myself may have undermined that effort—but you’re also avoiding Vincent by the looks of things.”

Shepard guided her chair to the door. “Well, right now, I’m obeying my masters like a good little monster, so ambush away, Red. I’ll be there in five unless I need to ditch the two idiots Miranda assigned to follow me around. The other day I managed to lock them in the pool shower room.”

Shepard left the oddly comforting sanctuary of her room and made her way through the space station, her eyes on the floor. Thankfully, the shower incident had made her point, and the two nurses that Miranda paid to shadow her kept well back. No one spoke to her, and she spoke to no one. She preferred it that way. Empathy, real or false, just grated on her. Besides, no one could manage to look at her for longer than a few seconds. Not that she blamed them for it. She could barely look at her own face, seeing the alien glow staring back, the lights blinking through her
Another wave of loneliness and longing for Anderson’s gruff comfort swept through her. He’d be able to take one look and then tell her if she still existed under the machinery … if she’d been brought back intact. How did she go out into the galaxy, try to rekindle friendships—ones she hoped she possessed, just didn’t recall—and trust herself if she’d been brought back hollowed out?

Either because of luck or because everyone was too terrified to get into the elevator with her, she rode down the twenty floors to the physiotherapy facility alone. Vincent awaited her at the door.

“What?” she grumbled, moving past him without even really looking up. “I said I was on my way. Don’t trust me?”

“Not like there isn’t precedent for you pulling a disappearing act between here and your room,” he grumbled. “At least Kelly confirmed that it’s not just my sessions that you ditch as often as possible.”

“Yeah, well, sorry about that. You aren’t special. I avoid everyone like the plague.” She stopped a meter or so inside the door.

Vincent stepped around her, walking over to a recumbent cycle. Rich, chestnut eyes stared at her, expectant but also patient and kind as he held out a large, square hand. “Your chariot awaits.”

A tiny singularity in her memory pulled at her, promising a great deal if she allowed it to drag her in. A heavy scowl creased her face as she spoke, her voice drifting out of … what? … a memory? “You’re starting to worry me, big guy. Did turians use chariots, or are you a student of ancient human history?”

“Turians?” Vincent asked from the other side of the chasm. “I’m almost tall enough, but I’m pretty sure I’ll never be mistaken for one.” He pulled Shepard back out of the rabbit hole as he crouched and placed his hands on her knees. “You remembering something, Shepard?”

Shepard shrugged and met his stare. “Hell if I know. The words just appeared there. No context or anything useful.” She lifted her feet off the rests and lowered them to the floor then held out her hands. “Just like everything else.” Before Vincent could take them, Shepard dropped them back to her lap. “Everything that made up Jane Shepard got left behind wherever I was.” Letting out a sharp snort of disgust, she shook her head. “Who gives a shit, right?” She held her hands out. “Come on, get me on the damned cycle.”

Vincent helped her settle onto the bike, then straddled the housing over the front mechanism and leaned forward, braced against the cycle, looming over her like a hawk. “Listen up, Captain. Everything that is Jane Shepard is sitting right in front of me.” The therapist sighed. “Do I understand how they brought you back?” Shrugging, he paused for a moment before continuing, “Not even remotely, but maybe you have a reason to be here.” Sucking in a quick, sharp breath, he shook his head. “No, that’s wrong. I know you have reasons to be here.”

Shepard took note of the emphasis on the plural. She lowered her gaze to the task of watching where she put her feet as she lifted them onto the pedals. “Are any of these reasons turian?” she asked, keeping her voice as vaguely casual as possible even though she knew Vincent would see straight through it.

“Shepard.” Her name came out as a plea. “You know I can’t—”

“A voice speaks to me sometimes when it’s quiet. Mostly at night.” She started peddling, the motion absent and slow as she searched for the depths below the surface of the ghostly voices that kept her from sleep. “He tells me stories, and I’m pretty sure from the way his voice is flanged that he’s turian.” Glancing up, she met a remarkably mirror-like stare that gave nothing away, so either he didn’t know anything or he’d been taking lessons from Miranda.

Vincent straightened and stepped clear of the cycle.

“Yeah,” she whispered, “that’s what I thought you’d say.”

***********

Shepard grinned up at the camera in the corner of the physiotherapy room. “Hello, my name is Captain Jane Shepard, and welcome to another episode of Necromancy Bulletin. Today, I want to talk to you about the death-altering malady of Zombile Dysfunction.” She raised her eyebrows and nodded earnestly. “Chances are, there is someone in your life right now who suffers from Zombile Dysfunction. In this next hour, I’m going to give you some tips and tricks to help you and your undead friend or loved one overcome the stigmas and complications of rising from the grave.”

She glanced over to give Vincent her brightest, most fake smile. “Those of you, like me, who’ve come back from the dead, know that one of the first signs of Zombile Dysfunction is the elephant that moves into the room. No one wants to talk about the fact that a few days or weeks ago, you were a corpse … a freeze-dried body in a coffin. Well, ladies and gentlemen, if we allow that elephant to stomp around our lives, it’ll break all grandma’s fine china. We need to drag our zombpotency out into the light of day, as embarrassing and awkward as it might be.”

She sighed and shook her head. “I know that it isn’t easy to be dug out of your eternal rest or hijacked from a peaceful burial at sea, but you’ve got to keep your chin up and look to the positive. I’m here to tell you that zombpotency does not have to be the end of a happy and satisfying death. Nope, once you’re back amongst the living, you too can become a corporate asset enslaved to any number of evil organizations galaxy wide.”

A bright giggle from the door tore Shepard’s attention from the camera. “Shepard!” Kelly exclaimed. She seemed to be trying for some combination of disapproval and disappointment, and might even have succeeded if not for the odd giggle that broke through. “You’re so bad.”

“So bad, I’m good?” Shepard countered, pedalling with as much vigor as she could muster.

The psychologist shook her head, her eyebrows taking flight for her hairline. “No! Just bad. In fact, it’s progressing to abusive, and no … phrasing it as a joke doesn’t make it any less hurtful or beneath you.”

Kelly crossed the room, her expression finally managing to switch over to serious. “You’re not a prisoner held captive in the lair of some comic book villain, Shepard. If you stopped spending all your time dreaming up new ways to be a pain in Miranda’s ass and just did the work, you’d get out of here.” Her eyebrows arched in challenge, lips quirking in a slight smile. “It could be a gift, you know? A chance to do everything you never got around to.”

“You died at thirty, Shepard,” Vincent added, stepping up beside his co-worker. “There has to be a long list of crap you would have done given more time.”

Shepard gave them one of her pointed laughs. “My last thought was ‘Thank God, I don’t have to fight the war’.” She raised her eyebrows and popped her shoulders. “How does that rank on your imaginary bucket list?”
Kelly smiled and stepped around Shepard’s hoverchair, sitting on the edge of the seat. “You’re not railing about being brought back to life, are you? You’re not even really acting out because of all this.” She lifted a finger, circling it to encompass more than just the room or the station, but everything involved in bringing her back to life. “You’re afraid of what going back out there means.”

“And?” Shepard snapped, hard and fierce, but then stopped pedaling and lowered her arms, her hands flopping between her thighs. “If you mean that I’m afraid of leaving this dungeon just to be shackled to an oar of your company’s Trireme to fight a war against an enemy so terrifying that I considered death a relief? Damn straight, I am. Damn straight, I am.” Rain breaking free from rolling, black thunderclouds to pound the ground clean, the words poured out, allowing the sky to lighten and the pressure to lift.

Kelly smiled and reached out to squeeze Shepard’s shoulder. “There’s nothing wrong with being afraid of going back out there. I’d be worried if you—” The psychologist looked toward the door as it opened, her usually rosy, cheerful complexion draining of all colour.

Alarmed by the young woman’s sudden pallor, Shepard followed her stare. An asian man stood just inside the portal. Dark brown eyes narrowed and full lips lifted into a crooked sneer as he looked over at them. Shepard watched him until she noticed Kelly slide from her chair and sidle over behind the cycle.

“Are you all right?” she whispered, her stare returning to the newcomer as he stepped onto one of the treadmills. He entered the settings, a panorama of deep space appearing on the screen meant to give you the illusion of running somewhere awesome or beautiful.

He likes to run in a vacuum. Good for him.

She looked back to Vincent and Kelly, watching them, her mouth quirked in an expression unable to decide whether to be a crooked grin or a twisted frown. “What?” she asked as the fear in the air coalesced into something with enough mass to have its own gravity field. Both of them kept shooting glances toward the treadmill and twitched at every sound. “Why are you two suddenly as jumpy as long-tailed cats in a room full of blind grannies in rocking chairs?”

Tracking their nervous glances to the fellow on the treadmill, she whispered, “Really? That guy?”

“Sh!” Kelly hissed louder than Shepard had spoken. The mystery man glanced their way, letting out a derisive sort of grunt before returning to his running.

Shepard ignored Kelly’s warning. “So, what’s the deal with Mr. Short, Dark, and Greasy? He the company assassin or something?” Her half-grin died as Kelly stumbled backward a step. “What? Seriously? What sort of fucking company is this?” The blood drained from Shepard’s face, leaving the flesh feeling slack and clammy. “You didn’t bring him back from the dead, did you?” She pushed herself up in the cycle, fighting down the panic that insisted she run far and fast. “Sweet Jesus, that’s not the mystery task they brought me back to do, is it?”

Kelly stiffened—Shepard hoped from surprise, not guilt—then eased down and laid a hand on the captain’s shoulder. “No, of course not, Shepard. No one wants you to assassinate people.” She took a long breath. “Just … just stay away from him.” She looked over her shoulder as if expecting him to have crept up behind her. “He shouldn’t even be in here. I asked management to transfer him to J wing yesterday.”

Vincent patted Kelly’s back and let out a dismissive laugh, but Shepard smelled the frozen iron tang of fear running under it. “Not that he cares what others say he shouldn’t be doing.” He nodded toward the parallel bars. “You’ve got those next, Shepard, so let’s forget Leng and concentrate on getting you back on your feet.”

Shepard stared at the two of them for a couple more seconds then shook her head and did as she’d been told. “I won’t be turned into someone who sends everyone diving for cover when I enter a room,” she whispered. “You can tell that to your corporate overlords.” In the silence that followed, Shepard registered that the treadmill had stopped.

“Who’s this, Miss Chambers?” a smooth, masculine voice asked. The man stepped up beside Shepard, pressing in too close to Kelly. “Aren’t you going to introduce me to the one who replaced me?”

Kelly swallowed hard and nodded, jerking a hand out toward him as she backed up a step. “Captain Shepard, this is Kai Leng.” The psychologist looked up, meeting Leng’s eyes. “Whether or not Shepard replaces you is up to management, not me.”

He smiled, but it slid across his face in a way that flooded Shepard’s gut with ice water. “I was referring to your decision to transfer me to Dr. Peniski, not my employment.” He pushed right in, reaching up to stroke Kelly’s cheek with the backs of his fingers. “I’ll miss our time together. We were getting so close.”

Shepard slapped his hand away. “Back up, buddy.” Twisting her mouth off to one side in an exaggerated wince, she shook her head and clicked her tongue. “Wouldn’t want the lady to get stuck in all that hair product.” She shot Kelly a quick wink, a silent warning to retreat over to Vincent, which the redhead did.

Leng spun on Shepard, his expression all the more chilling as it warped his handsome features into an ugly, brutal mask. “Laying your hands on me can prove dangerous, Shepard. I wouldn’t want them to have to bring you back from the dead a second time.”

The assassin bent down until his nose pressed against her cheek. Running the tip along her cheekbone to her ear, he said, “My father taught me to hunt … to revel in the kill. I love sighting down a deer. It always freezes, sides heaving, eyes darting because it senses death stalking it, waiting for the right moment to claim it.” He clamped a hand down on Shepard’s shoulder, fingertips searching until they found one of the splits in her flesh then sinking in. His other hand stabbed out to stop Vincent in his tracks as the therapist leaped to intervene. “There’s nothing like the rush of watching it try to decide which way to run, instinct demanding that it try to live even though some part of it knows its time is up. It’s intoxicating.”

“Back off, Leng,” Vincent said, his voice a low growl. “You know Miranda’s already on her way, and you’re in deep enough shit without adding to it.”

“It’s remarkable how alike deer and humans react in that moment. Of course, deer show more dignity, not begging or pissing themselves,” Leng whispered, staying focused on Shepard, his breath prickling her skin like nettles. “You won’t beg, will you?” He chuckled as she stiffened despite trying to keep herself still. “No, you’re too strong for that. I’m going to enjoy playing with you.”

 “So, who was it?” Shepard asked, fighting with her voice to keep it steady and soft. Leaning back, she turned to look him in the eye. When Kai Leng didn’t answer except to squeeze harder, she raised an eyebrow. “Oh, I hit the nerve there, didn’t I?” She cocked her head, eyes narrowing as she studied him, trying to see through the ice and stone. Leng hid well, but not completely. “Uncle? Cousin? Grandmother? Much older brother, maybe.” Nodding, she pressed her lips tight in empathy. “I get it. It sucks to be someone’s little cock-puppet. It breaks something way down inside that never quite heals.”

The hand loosened but didn’t release her. “Your smart mouth is going to get you killed one of these days, Shepard.”

“Actually,” she said, her eyebrows lifting toward her hairline, “I think it already has. And, yeah, it probably will again, but not by the likes of you.” She smiled her sweetest, most condescending smile, covering for the guinea pig squealing and freaking out inside her chest. “Now back off before this ‘been mostly dead all day’, weak-ass N7 kicks your sorry buttcheeks all the way back to your treadmill.”

“Leng!”

Shepard winced at the sound of what surely amounted to the cavalry and glanced over at Miranda, who stood just inside the door. “We’re just getting acquainted here, Dr. Frankenstein. Nothing to worry about.”

The man turned toward the door and Miranda’s furious, but icily controlled form. The gloved claws clenched around Shepard’s shoulder pulled up, stabbing an electrified pitchfork through the joint. “Operative Lawson. Come to save your little science project?” He laughed and released his grip only to slap the hand down hard. “I don’t blame you. This one is sure to win you first prize.”

Shepard clenched her teeth, fighting to keep her breathing even, but even so, drops of over-ripe, rotten torment squeezed from the corners of her eyes to slide down the curve of her nose.

“Leng, you were reassigned to J wing this morning. Get there,” Miranda said, her tone so condescending that Shepard wouldn’t have used it to scold cockroaches.

“I don’t recognize your authority,” Leng said, smoothly stepping away. “I take my orders from management.”

“Management has scheduled a meeting for eight weeks from now to discuss your future,” Miranda replied. She nodded toward the door. “After the Subject Zero fiasco, you’re lucky to get that.”
Crossing her arms, she waited, head tilted ever so slightly. “Until then, consider yourself on a very short leash.”

Leng bent down until his lips brushed Shepard’s ear. He sucked in a long, wet breath and whispered, “Mmm, there it is. You can feel the crosshairs, can’t you?”

Mustering all her strength, Shepard reached up to grip his jaw, shoving his face away. “Fuck off, little boy. You don’t impress me.” In the peripheral of her vision, she saw Miranda move in and held up her index finger, a silent request to handle the situation herself.

Leng straightened, his hands held out in a mocking gesture of surrender. At a speed surely meant as some sort of rebellion against Miranda’s authority, he sauntered to the door. Just before stepping through, he glanced back at Kelly. “See you soon, Miss Chambers”

Miranda placed herself in his line of sight, earning her first Shepard-point as she blocked Kelly.
“Harassment of any employee is grounds for retirement, Leng. Remember that. If I see you out of J wing for any reason, you’ll wait for your meeting in a cell.”

“Oh, I promise you won’t see me.” He chuckled and walked out the door.

“Well,” Shepard said, beginning to pedal again, “that was bracing. Lovely young man.”
Miranda’s lip didn’t relax out of its slight, disgusted curl as she approached them. “If he bothers either of you again, report it.” She straightened and folded her arms as if that ended the entire subject of Kai Leng, then nodded at Shepard. “Glad to see you at work, Shepard.”

The captain didn’t reply, not wanting to give anything away, particularly not the fact that she intended to work like hell if only to be prepared for Leng’s inevitable retribution. After a moment of heavy silence, she decided something needed to be said and looked up. “Kelly is very convincing. Gives one hell of a pep-talk.”

She looked around, eyes patronizingly shifty as she pursed her lips then pulled them back. “Soooo … . Is there something we can do for you, Doc Frank? Or did you just come down to compare scary frowns with your pet assassin?”

Miranda barely flinched, cool and collected as she replied, “You have a guest coming to assist with your rehabilitation, Shepard. Her arrival is scheduled for a little over two hours from now.” She gave Kelly and Vincent curt nods, then turned on her heel and left.

“Well, and to rescue us from the psycho,” Kelly replied. “I wonder who it is. She hasn’t said a word about it to me.”

“Come on, lazy,” Vincent said, breaking through Shepard’s intended smart-ass response. “You’re just using that bike as an excuse to sit on your ass.” He held out his hands. “Parallel bars, now.”

Shepard grabbed hold of his hands and hauled herself to her feet, pausing to give the agony in her joints and the rents in her flesh time to numb a little. Once she could speak again without a scream breaking loose and racing around the room, she asked, “So, why are you here, Kelly? For real? Not that you aren’t a spark of sunshine in my otherwise dreary days, but you must have had an ulterior motive.”

The psychologist let out a very uncharacteristic snort at the sunshine remark, then walked around to stand at the other end of the parallel bars. “Actually, I do come bearing good news.” Stopping there, she leaned on one hip and crossed her arms. Shepard was glad to see it was the normal, hands tucked into the elbow way, not Miranda’s ‘I’m too good to cross my arms like you normals’ way. Still, Kelly just stood there, watching Shepard gimp her way to the bars, a smart ass grin disguising any lingering upset Leng might have caused.

Shepard grasped the bars and leaned on trembling arms. “You’d better spill before I get there, Red, or there will be pain. Oh yes, so very much pain.”

Kelly rolled her eyes and shook her head. “You’re all talk, Shepard, but fine … I convinced Miranda to move you out of secure holding and into a regular room. Vid screen, no locks … even a computer, although it won’t have extranet access.”

Shepard forced a smile, not wanting to rain on the good news. And, it should have been good news. It was good news. She’d wanted proof she wasn’t a prisoner, after all. Getting an unsecured room was a step in the right direction. Now, if only she could get Kai Leng’s promise out of her head.

Centimetre by centimetre, she made her way down the bars, forcing her body past its limits, working until Vincent forced her back into her chair. When she caught her breath, she turned back to the camera in the corner.

“Hey! Doc Frankenstein! Make time for me in your schedule later. I want to discuss your timetable for getting me back to one hundred percent. Consider me cooperative.”
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Nineteen

Chapter Summary

Garrus wakes up somewhere strange after being whammied by the orbs on the shipyard.

Torin: Male turian of the age of majority.

Fratrin: Brother

Pari: Father

Praela: Ancient turian spirits of war

12 Days ASR

Oblivion drew back, pain driving the shadowy denizens of unconsciousness before it, more relentless than a turian square*. The slow, burning agony roared through his cells, incinerating his synapses as it laid claim to every centimetre of territory relinquished. For long moments, he thought the war might be a short one with a tragic end, but then he took a deep breath, shattering agony’s reign.

The scent of blood—blood and something else, something wrong—brought fear marching onto the field of battle. It planted its flag and sent out scouts, forcing Garrus’s eyes open. The blinding darkness held its ground even as fear threw itself against it, demanding that it submit. Slowly, grudgingly, it did; a pale, watery grey creeping through narrow gaps around a door. The faint light revealed a room made up of huge slabs of cut stone. Dark stains splashed the walls, black and gleaming. The smell gave him far too clear a picture of what made up those stains.

Pressing his hands to the stone, he started to push himself up, his talons squelching through at least a centimetre of foul-smelling slime before sliding across the stone. Digging the sharp ends of his digits into the floor, he halted the slide and shoved himself up onto one hip. Every body part he owned—and a few he was fairly sure he must have borrowed—formed a complaints committee and voted that the banging in his head lead them. He felt like he had after Virmire. Despite knowing better, he’d still hoped to never feel that beaten, raw, and bruised again.

Once sitting up, settled and steady with his back against the wall, he lifted a hand, watching the ooze drip from it, morbidly fascinated. He leaned forward to sniff at it. Something that smelled far too close to decaying blood made up at least fifty percent of whatever it was. He sniffed again, fighting down his gag reflex. Some sort of organic fuel?

As his eyes adjusted to the dim light, the composition of the slime took a back seat to the sheer amount of it splattered everywhere. Was it some sort of abattoir? The chill in the air certainly lent credence to that idea of a refrigerator. For a moment, as he sat, shivering in the stink, the dark marks on the wall moved, swaying in the slow dance of hanging meat … meat with arms dangling, fingers brushing the floor. A hand wrapped around his throat, ephemeral fingers crushing his windpipe until only a razor-sharp whistle of air managed to squeeze through the fear.

“Stop it!” he called out loud, the sharp, strangled bark of his voice echoing back. Despite not knowing if he meant the order for himself or for the shadows, the sound grounded him, pulling him back from the edge of panic. The shadows retreated into static stains on the wall. Better. Panic would kill him. He needed to focus, to try to remember what happened, and how he ended up in that room.

The last thing he remembered was the flash of brilliant, yellow light on the shipyard’s monitors in the moment before everything went dark. Nihlus had taken off, but Rogers and Teung were right behind him. He must have lost consciousness. Despite the popularity of transporters in fiction, the galaxy still hadn’t figured out how to dematerialize people in one place and rematerialize them in another a second later.

He closed his eyes, focusing on listening for any sign of movement outside his walls. Nothing, and he didn’t have a hope in hell of smelling the others over the sickly, sweet and acrid stink of the slime. His missing people pushed aside the pain and fear. If they were alive, he needed to find them and get them to safety, wherever that was. He raised a hand to his radio only to discover that the external portion was gone—broken away judging by the sharp edges. Lowering his hand, he attempted to activate his omnitool. Dead. In fact, his armour had gone completely dark. No lights, recycling, or heater. Complete lack of communications and life support left him one option.

A groan rumbled like thunder in his chest as he shoved himself up onto one knee, dragging his other foot under him. Gritting his teeth, he forced himself to keep moving despite the balls of white-hot lightning tearing through his flesh, guts, and bone. They ricocheted inside his armour and streaked across his vision, threatening to drop him back onto the floor. Still—as his father always said—he was nothing if not too stubborn for his own good. Talons leaving deep scores in the stone, he clawed his way up onto his feet then slumped against the wall, gasping for breath.

“Come on, Vakarian,” he muttered, “keep moving.” He shoved himself away from the rock, but kept a hand pressed to the chill surface until the trembling in his muscles eased a little. “You’re going to need a gun.” Keeping contact with the wall, he turned, searching for any sign of Roger or Ingrid. He spotted Ingrid leaning against the stone a couple of metres away and stumbled over to pick it up. After checking it over, he let out a relieved sigh. Undamaged.

He found Roger halfway to the door. The three pieces of the assault rifle lay scattered in the muck. “No.” The word came out as a soft moan. Bending down, he lifted the broken weapon, cradling it gently, almost reverently, in his hands. It looked as though someone had used it as a club. The tip of one talon picked bits of what appeared to be chitinous material out of the spaces small enough to hang onto it. Turning an unsteady circle, he scanned the muck for any other signs of combat. Well, signs other than how badly every centimetre of him hurt. Nothing. Nothing but the blood, if that was what it was. If he’d been involved in a pitched battle that ended in slaughter, what happened to the bodies and the scorch marks and the chunks blasted out of the walls? Of course, even a hundred gunshots wouldn’t spill the amount of blood present in that room. Not every shot hit arteries, people fell on their wounds, blood pooled inside the body when it went down. No, to cover the floor and walls the way they were, he’d have to slit the throat of fifty or so people and hang them up to bleed out like animal carcases.

It couldn’t be blood. Under what circumstances would or could he brutally kill that many beings? No. It wasn’t blood. Another explanation awaited him outside that room. He just needed to go find it. He latched onto the not-blood portion of the smell. It just might be some sort of fuel. Fuel made sense. Maybe he’d been stashed in an old fuel storage bunker or something.

He hung the bulk of Roger on his back and shoved the other two pieces into pouches on his belt. He’d stood around speculating long enough. Time to get answers.

Steadying himself with one hand on the wall, he picked his way to the lines of faint light he’d rightly assumed surrounded a door. The dead control next to it threw his hopes on the floor, but before he crushed them underfoot, he saw the door remained open a couple of centimetres. He slid his fingers into the space and pulled. It refused to budge. Too heavy. He’d need something to pry it open.

“Sorry about this, old man,” he said as he lifted Roger’s remains from his back and shoved the barrel into the space. “Kahri would kill me if she saw this.”

The door gave way reluctantly, metal screaming across stone as though it hadn’t moved in decades. For a moment, fear whispered that maybe he had been down there for long cycles—cold, alone, forgotten. He shuddered, throwing off the fanciful, debilitating idea.

However, the thought brought back a childhood tale his mother used to tell him about a torin who’d fallen in love with a praela. One day, while he tagged along beside the spirit, trying to get her attention, the torin accidentally followed her into her home realm. The praela noticed him then, and he spent a joyous day in her company before he realized where he was. He fled back to the mortal world only to discover that he’d aged nearly a hundred cycles. Garrus’s mother touted it as an object lesson about desiring the unattainable; Garrus wondered if the message didn’t come closer to ‘some things are just worth it’.

Shepard’s face ghosted through his mind, the image pale and worn. He’d spent more than his share of time in the spirit realm over the past two years. Strange that he hadn’t recalled the story until that moment, but then again, despite his grief, he’d never felt quite so old. Closing his eyes for a moment, he leaned against the door frame and focused on the bright green of her stare, drawing strength from it.

“I’m going to need you,” he whispered. “Do me a favour, and stick with me for a bit.”

The next second, he chuffed at his continuing foolishness and shoved himself upright. Time—and more than time—to move.

Stepping into the hallway on the other side of the threshold felt eerily like passing through the veil between dimensions. The oppression of the small, filthy space lifted, but at the same time, gravity seemed to fall away. Featureless, grey walls stretched ahead and behind him, the floor beneath his feet and the ceiling above his head identical and equidistant. The optical illusion made his stomach roll and his head pound in time with his pulse.

He braced a hand against the wall, that simple contact orienting him enough that the nausea backed off. “I could use your inside-out streak of luck to point me in the right direction, Shepard,” he said to the silence as he looked one way then the other. How could he expect to find any of his people without knowing where he was? Maybe they weren’t even there. He could wander until hypothermia and dehydration killed him.

Giving his head a good, hard shake that he immediately regretted, he picked the hall to his right and started walking. As he moved, some of the stiffness and pain worked its way out of his muscles. Still, he knew that under his armour, he’d taken enough damage to earn a lecture from Dr. Chakwas.
Corridors passed by. Doorways opened into rooms engulfed in darkness and silence. Throughout, the stone never changed, the floors coated in a layer of dust so thick that it must have been building undisturbed for centuries. As he made his way through the maze, he scratched markers on the wall corners and drew a crude map of the space on his gauntlet. Only when he’d covered the entire level did he take the stairs up to the next.

Once exercise drove the fog of pain and cold back a little, his mind started putting together bits and pieces, trying to form a picture of where in the galaxy he could be.

Stone buildings with a vast underground presence. Ancient and deserted. The only other place he’d seen construction like that had been the ruins next to the base on Rannoch. So … Haestrom. It had to be.

He paused at the top of the stairs to listen, hearing only silence. He might as well have been the last living soul on the planet. Down below, he’d avoided calling out, not sure who or what he’d find, but other than the trails dragged through the dust where he’d been brought in, nothing. Might as well chance making some noise and up his chances of finding someone, he decided. Searching as thoroughly as he was, if someone was there, they’d end up finding him anyway.

He checked Ingrid again, making sure that she’d fire if anyone attacked him, but stopped at firing a test shot. Best not to completely test his luck. Shouting would carry far enough.

“Nihlus? Kaidan?” He marked the wall and struck out along the hallway to his right. “Is anyone there?”

“How do we always end up in these situations? I swear you do it on purpose.”

Garrus spun to face the voice, his mouth dropping open, mandibles spreading. Taking a step toward the apparition, he snapped his mouth closed, his teeth clacking together. “Shepard?” He stopped, his boots raising puffs of dust that swirled along the ripples in the air caused by his movement. When Shepard walked toward him, she just passed through the drifting tendrils, leaving both the ground and air undisturbed.

“You’re dead,” he said, feeling a little stupid for stating the obvious.

She shrugged, the quick, loose-jointed movement so familiar and missed that a thin moan of longing spooled through his second larynx before he could stop it.

“Things aren’t always that easy,” she replied. Nodding toward the way ahead, she said. “Maybe we should get moving and find the others. My delicate, magical turian flower looks like he’s getting a bad case of frostbite. If your armour is dead, Nihlus’s probably is as well.” When he didn’t move, she passed him by, taking the lead.

Garrus stared after her for several seconds, his eyes riveted by the undisturbed floor. “How did I get here?” he asked, at last, lifting into a rough jog to follow her.

“How am I supposed to know?” She paused at the intersection of a side corridor and pressed herself against the wall to peer out, checking the way ahead. “Clear,” she called back before moving on. “I just got here.”

He marked the stone at the corner so he’d know they’d passed that way and what direction they took. He followed for several minutes in silence before blurtting out. “Why did you leave me, Shepard? You knew … you know that I need you.”

The apparition’s shoulders slumped as she stopped, turning back to look at him. “Because it was
He approached her, stepping into her space in a way that would have made her uncomfortable in life. “Then why are you here now? Why come back?”

“Well, either because you needed me … “ She chuckled, her head tilting a little. “… or due to your core body temp being seven degrees too low, combined with starvation, dehydration, and that massive lump on your skull.” A ghostly hand drifted up to caress his cheek with a touch he couldn’t feel. “You decide, but do it on the move, C-Sec. We aren’t playing with a lot of time here. If your body temperature gets much lower, you’re going to be doing a lot worse than talking to the hallucinations of dead girlfriends.”

“Would that be so bad?” he asked, keeping his voice low and flat.

She turned away and headed down the corridor. Throwing a gesture of disgust and dismissal over her head, she said, “I’m going to pretend I didn’t hear that, Callor. Sweet baby Jesus, did they yank out your spine when they smacked you on the head? You have over a thousand people depending on you, even if you forget about the quarians, the geth, the krogan, rachni … oh, yeah, and the entire galaxy.”

Her form faded as she drew away, disappearing into the gloom. Setting out after her, he forced his heavy, trembling legs to hurry. Even if she was just a hallucination, her presence held back the darkness as it pressed in, looming over him like a besieging force. Refusing to stop at the wall of his armour, it slipped inside, pawing at his hide like a corpse’s hands, greasy and gelid.

She stopped at another intersection, then scouted forward a few metres along each of the corridors. Cocking her head, she listened, her movements sharp and quick, just as he remembered. Damn, he missed following her through battle, watching her move as graceful and skilled as a dancer. Graceful, skilled, and … on edge. She flicked glances back toward the corridor on his left every few seconds, her teeth latching onto the right side of her bottom lip, her eyelid lower on that side—her planning face. Sensing something in the dark, she was trying to decide what it was and how to deal with it.

When she finished the cycle, she chose the hallway to the right. A silent signal beckoned for him to follow, but when he turned toward the long, black hole, his entire body locked up, refusing to move. The darkness seemed to infest that passage, the fetid shadows choking what small amount of light existed.

Shepard’s face appeared in front of his. “C-Sec! Focus. Eyes on me. I think I hear something, and I really don’t like the sound of it. We need to move.”

Instead of doing as she said, Garrus held his breath and closed his eyes, concentrating all his focus into listening. He heard it. A faint clicking, chittering sound. Geth, his brain spat out even as his gut tied in a hard knot and threw a grappling hook up to sink into his larynges. Taking a deep breath that made his lungs ache, he pulled the air over the pheromone receptors at the back of his mouth. Not geth. Geth didn’t come complete with pheromones. Whatever or whoever was making that sound did: a strange combination that smelled like blood and fuel.

He opened his eyes and hurried after Shepard, finding her waiting at the next intersection.

“Get Ingrid ready,” the captain whispered, crouching a little as if she expected to leap into battle. “Whatever’s coming after us is injured and moving rough, but they’re coming fast.” She surveyed the corridors, then headed off to the right again. “By the way,” she said as she moved, low and keeping the side wall at her back, “I noticed what you did to Roger.” Shooting a glance over her shoulder that ricocheted off his armour, she shook her head. “Just be glad I can’t slap you silly. Do you know how much that old man and I survived together?”

Intending to argue the point, Garrus opened his mouth, but another glare convinced him to remain silent. He followed, keeping his eyes on their six.

As they made their way through the level, the chittering sound grew louder. Still, Shepard didn’t speed up. She took her time, almost as if baiting their pursuer, leading it on. When she stopped at the base of the stairs up to the next level, he knew he’d guessed right.

How does that work if she’s a hallucination? My subconscious is leading it into a trap?

“It’s following like it believes we’re oblivious,” Shepard whispered. “Head up to the first landing, and take cover. I have no idea what this thing is, so don’t take any chances.”

Garrus stared at her for a moment, his thoughts lumbering through the growing fog of pressure in his head. He needed to tell her something, but for the life of him, he couldn’t find the words amidst all the confusion and mental detritus. Giving up, he just nodded and strode past her, limping up the stairs to the landing. The stone railing supported him as he lowered himself to one knee and then Ingrid’s barrel as he rested it in a notch in the stone and sighted the center of the doorway.

Shepard remained at the bottom of the stairs, feet shoulder-width apart, back straight, hands clasped behind her back. Her apparition didn’t appear solid as it did in his dreams. Instead, he could see the stone and dust through her dress uniform. They’d dressed her in that uniform to bury her. It seemed perfectly normal at the time. After all, he’d been too out of his head to put any thought into something so mundane. But there, in the dark, it seemed incredibly sad, as if that uniform declared Shepard a one-dimensional being.

“Here it comes,” she whispered, backing away. “I can’t really see it, but it seems about a hand shorter than you, definitely bipedal. Blessed Enkindlers, its head is huge, but it has a center mass at about one and three quarters metres from the ground. There’s something familiar about it, but I can’t see it well enough to tell.” She turned and sprinted up the stairs to crouch at his side. “Ten seconds unless it gets cautious.”

He adjusted for her details, taking slow, deep breaths and focusing all his concentration down the sights. Vision softening, he allowed the world outside the doorway to register but not pull his attention away from the task at hand. At the back of his mind, his pari whispered the same instructions he had since Garrus was a boy—the voice as comforting as it had once been annoying.

Footsteps. Uneven. A shuffle, thump, step. Shepard had been right about whatever it was being wounded. How did her role as spotter work if she was a hallucination? If he ever got out of there, he really needed to allow for the possibility of mental illness. The footsteps slowed. The chittering, clicking sound got louder for a moment, then stopped.

Garrus held his breath. What was it doing? He hadn’t heard a body hit the ground, so it hadn’t fallen or died.

The floor inside the door darkened almost imperceptibly in the gloom, then a shape limped over the threshold. Even though Garrus could barely make it out, he recognized that it wasn’t any species he knew, and it had broken its leg. The limb stuck out at an angle so impossibly acute that the being walked on the side of its foot.

Garrus raised the barrel ever so slightly, then spotted four eyes. Four. Like the flash of light on the shipyard monitors, but no brilliant yellow glow emanated from the large, milky-white orbs. Instead, they looked blind—the eyes of a creature used to living in the dark. It looked up, spotted him, and raised its arm, a strange, chitinous looking weapon clutched close to its side. He let out his breath and squeezed the trigger, beating the alien to the punch.

He stood and started down the stairs, but Shepard appeared in front of him, a hand slammed up like a wall.

“No,” she whispered, eyes flashing with both challenge and command. “Even that one shot could bring more. We’ve got to keep moving forward. Come on. Once you’re secure and have a team at your back, you can return to investigate until your heart’s content.” When he didn’t immediately turn and do as she’d said, she bristled, her shoulders rising, all angles and points. “Don’t test me, C-Sec. You know where that leads.”

Browplates lowered over his eyes, mandibles dropped, Garrus scowled at her. Seriously? Being threatened by a figment of his imagination created by concussion and hypothermia had to be a new low. Still, as much as he hated the idea of giving in to his own subconscious, it had a point. Hurt and exhausted, he wouldn’t be able to defend himself from even a half dozen. After glaring at Shepard for another moment, he turned and climbed the stairs.

“You’ve got to do so much better than this, Garrus,” Shepard said as she stalked past him to take point again. “You’ve got to just let me go. Let me be a woman you once cared about.” She paused, head cocked as she listened. Seemingly satisfied that the way ahead remained clear, she nodded for him to follow.

“I don’t want to let go of you, Shepard. Why is everyone so obsessed with moving on?” He hurried up behind her, suddenly furious. It was bad enough bearing the sympathetic, worried stares of his friends and the constant, gentle advice from his father. To hear it coming from Shepard … .

“Shepard spun and raced toward him, ephemeral hands grabbing the yolk of his armour. Somehow, that time, she managed to make contact, giving him a hard shake. “Don’t you get it, Garrus? You’re fucking useless like this. You’ve got to dig in, get angry, get happy, grab hold of the grace of the Enkindlers … do something … anything … and start fucking living.” She shoved him away. “You knew me a few months. Mourning … sure. I can see mourning. You loved me, and I died. But this … .”

Flinging her arms out to the side in a gesture filled with as much helplessness as anger, she turned a circle. “This isn’t even about me. You’re using me as an excuse, and that just pisses me off. You’re scared, and you’re using me to hide. Stop it!”

“I don’t want to fight this war, Shepard.” He stumbled, his talons raking furrows down the wall before he caught himself. “Having your back through the battles, being your right hand … that I could do. But this? It’s just too big. I’m not good enough. I’m not the general to lead this fight.”

“Well, that’s just too fucking bad, C-Sec.” She shoved him hard, both hands braced against his chest. “You have no choice. You’re the one they’re all counting on.”

He shoved back, actually staggering her. “Why not, Shepard? You were all too eager to step aside and let someone else lead the fight. Why did you get to give up, and I don’t?”

“Because you promised me. And if you don’t … .” She spun away, marching down the hall. “It means I failed.”
Her words stabbed through his armour, grabbed two handfuls of guts and ripped them out. He chased after her, reaching out to catch hold of her shoulder, but his talons passed straight through. “How do my screw ups mean that you failed?”

“I picked you. I made the misjudgement.” A tight, rusted-iron shrug followed the declaration. “Who cares though, right?” She ran up a flight of stairs. “Besides, we’ve arrived at my exit.” Turning, she took a single step toward him, and he saw the tracks down her cheeks, glistening like frost on a window.

“Shepard.” He raced up the stairs to meet her. “I’m sorry.” Longing to wipe away those horrible tears, each an accusation, taunting him with his cowardice, he reached out, stopping just short of her face.

“I love you, Callor. I really do, but this … this is so beneath you.” She stroked a strong, warm palm along his mandible.

How can it be warm?

“You are so much stronger than this.” She glanced behind her as if alerting to a sound. “That’s my cue. Time for us both to climb back out the rabbit hole.”

“Garrus?”

Garrus looked over Shepard’s shoulder toward the sound of the call. “Nihlus? Is that you?” Glancing back to where Shepard had stood the moment before, he saw that she’d vanished, not so much as a shimmer to prove she’d been there.

“Kahri,” he whispered, unsure about whether he meant to thank or curse her. Then it didn’t matter, because the familiar, sweeping lines of his fratriam's familia notas appeared, white against the gloom, moving unevenly back and forth with his gait.

“Nihlus!” He hurried toward the Spectre. “How serious are your injuries? Do you know where we are?” Turning on his talons, he swept an arm around Nihlus’s waist, taking some of the Spectre’s weight.

Letting out a long, guttural sigh that carried subvocal notes of relief and pain, Nihlus wrapped his arm around Garrus’s neck and leaned into him. “Haestrom,” he said, the word coming out in two syllables, broken by sharp gasps. “Has to be.”

“Have you seen any of the others?” Garrus looked behind them, but nothing moved in the darkness.

Nihlus just shook his head. “Searched. Four levels. Nothing. Then I heard ... gun shot ... talking.”

“Yeah, talking to myself is getting to be a bad habit.” He boosted Nihlus a little higher, then nodded the direction Shepard had been leading him. “Let’s go.”

Nihlus took a rough step, his left leg collapsing under him a little when he put weight on it. “You know the way out?” The talons on that same foot dragged through the dust when he pulled his leg forward. Garrus cursed under his breath. That meant damage up high.

“No,” he replied, “I have no idea where we’re going, but I’ve got a good feeling about this direction.”

Nihlus chuckled, the sound exhausted and weak. “Excellent. Broken hip … hypothermia … shock, Garrus opened his mouth to snap back, but then the absurdity of the entire situation registered, and he let out a weary, bitter laugh. “Things could be worse. You could be hallucinating that Shepard is leading you out of here, so be grateful.” He stopped at the next intersection and marked the wall, pausing when he saw another mark. “Yours?” he asked, looking to Nihlus.

“Yes.” The Spectre blinked, his eyes staying closed for nearly five seconds before opening again. His weight bore down on Garrus’s neck, his bare hand clammy and cold, trembling in Garrus’s grip. “As I said … four levels.”

Garrus paused at the base of the stairs to look back. If the rest of the squad was there, he’d have to return to get them. Nihlus didn’t have time to sit and wait for him to search. They needed to climb, to find the surface and a way to communicate with the Normandy. He’d lost his mate, was losing his mother … no way he’d let Nihlus die on him too.

“You have your jaw set for this?” he asked, resettling his grasp to take more of Nihlus’s weight.

“Let’s get the hell out of here,” the Spectre said, his words barely more than grunts. Leaning on Garrus’s cowl, he started up.

They managed two flights before Nihlus needed to stop. Neither one of them carried any medi-gel, nor did they find any dispensers. Still, after catching his breath and letting out a litany of foul curses aimed at his lack of indestructibility, Nihlus nodded for Garrus to continue.

Two more flights and Nihlus just slid down Garrus to slump on the floor. Despite landing on his undamaged hip, a deep, rumbling cry of pain clawed its way out of his chest.

“Just need rest,” he said, moaning as his eyes slipping closed.

Garrus shook his head. “No. You’ve got five minutes before I haul you up and carry you out of here.” Garrus didn’t know how he’d find the strength, but he could tell by the chill sheen clinging to his fratin’s hide, Nihlus had maybe an hour before hypothermic coma, and two or three after that until death. He crouched by Nihlus’s side, the other torin’s talons gripped tightly in his—a silent demonstration of support and determination.

As the minutes passed, he listened, sure he could hear some sort of machine noise from above them. Maybe the geth used the compound for something.

The geth. Damn.

The geth being responsible for dragging them off the orbital shipyard and sticking them down there made the worst sort of sense. They could have disabled the organic members of the station’s crew, shut down the systems, and waited. But why? Unless it was a trap set for him or Nihlus.

Nihlus moaned softly, drawing Garrus’s attention. The Spectre’s head had fallen back to rest against the cowl of his armour, his eyes closed, breathing shallow.

“All right,” Garrus said, shoving himself up onto his feet, “that’s enough of that. Come on, help me get you up. This isn’t going to be pretty or comfortable for either of us.” Bending, he managed to wrestle the smaller torin into a fairly stable and balanced fireman’s carry.

Standing at the bottom of the next flight of stairs, he looked up, his gaze seeming to climb forever.

“You are so much stronger than this. Time for us both to climb back out the rabbit hole.”
Garrus nodded. Time to get the hell home. He grasped the railing with one hand and began hauling himself up, one stair at a time. As he climbed, the flights passing in a steady fog of pain and weariness, the light became stronger, until it matched the murk of a cloudy day. The mechanical sound got louder as well, the noise almost like a skipping gear, a metallic click-stutter-click. It settled into his brain and dug in claws all down his spine. Something in that sound set him on edge … something familiar … but he couldn’t form coherent enough thoughts to sort it out.

Click-stutter-click. Teeth chattering on the verge of freezing to death. Come to us.

Click-stutter-click. Keep coming, we’re waiting for you. We can’t wait to meet you. How did you escape the tomb we put you in? Didn’t you like it? We made it especially for you.

Click-stutter-click. You know you can’t win this fight. Best to just go back down into the dark and rest. It’s lovely in the dark. So cool and peaceful. The words followed the rhythm of the noise, taking on a sing-song cadence like some macabre children’s verse.

“Light,” Nihlus said, his voice snapping the chorus as it repeated for the fiftieth time.

Garrus looked up and stumbled to a halt, his talons catching on the stone. Not only did he see a harsh yellow light streaming into the space from narrow windows along the top of very high walls, but also that he’d followed the sound away from the stairwell. He didn’t know how far he’d allowed that siren call to lead him, but far enough that the corridor ended at a massive metal door twenty metres ahead.

Staring at it, he considered his options. First, he’d have to put Nihlus down. He couldn’t deal with the unknown with a hundred kilos of turian draped around his neck. Detouring over to the wall where the sun shone in, he let out a sigh of relief as the heat beat against his hide.

“You can cover me from here?” he asked as he lowered Nihlus to the floor, wincing as the Spectre cried out. It impacted Garrus all the harder for having weakened considerably. Despite his brave face, Nihlus’s time was running out.

“I can. It’s warm.” Nihlus turned his face to the light and closed his eyes. “Go ahead.” He turned back to look Garrus in the eye and nodded toward the door. Reaching behind him, the movement accompanied by a heavy grunt of pain, he pulled his shotgun from its holster in the small of his back. “Get us the hell out of here.”

Garrus straightened and shrugged Ingrid into his hands. He didn’t know if he had another fight left in him, but he settled the rifle and limped toward the door. The sing-song cadence of the chattering sound remained constant as he approached. Reaching for the door control—this one powered—he tried to picture the room, how many geth … every moment of it nothing but completely, bloody useless stalling.

Taking a deep breath, he pressed his hand to the control, then took a step back, lifting Ingrid to couch against his shoulder. The door whispered open. He stared, unable to fathom the sight it revealed. Limbs, parts hung up like sides of meat in a refrigerator, but alive. Alive and moving, connected to other parts, other beings. Most of the bodies—the people—strung out like some macabre web were geth, but he recognized human husks as well as what looked like some unknown, biological aliens.

“Dear spirits.” The oath drifted softly through the air. As the sound passed over the threshold, the other noise—the click-stutter-click—stopped, every face and flashlight turning to look at him.

“Come in,” a sharp, female voice called from somewhere out of sight. “I was just about to add your friend to my creation.”

Turian Square: Unlike the Infantry Square, the Turian Square is a naval formation. Two dreadnoughts and a carrier take the center of the formation, cruisers arranged outside them, frigates outside that layer. Fighters circle the outside of the square providing cover, disrupting point defense, and softening targets.

A-N: Okay, so the Thedan madness has backed off a bit and Christmas is over, so my schedule will be getting back to normal, with an accompanying chapter a week. Thanks so much for sticking with me during this rough patch. It is so much appreciated. hugs
Shepard awoke shivering, teeth chattering, heart thrashing against her ribcage. Slapping a hand over her eyes to ward against the sudden, searing glare of her regen field, she flopped over on her back and let out a hearty, discontented grumble. “Thanks so much, people. I didn’t need these retinas anyway.” Peeking out through the cracks between her fingers, she glared up into the violet, hazy light. “Where are the goggles?”

The chill intruded upon her annoyance and sent a shiver racing down her length to lodge in her right calf muscle. Yelping, she bolted upright, scrambling to grab her foot and stretch out the back of her leg. “And for the love of the freaking Enkindlers,” she called, looking up at one of the cameras, “I could use a quilt in here. Sweet baby Jesus, it’s cold.”

“The goggles were right next to your head, and the temperature inside your regen field is seventy-eight degrees, Shepard,” Miranda’s even voice spoke through the intercom. “But I can see that you’re given extra blankets.” The intercom clicked off for a couple of seconds, then back on. “You appeared agitated in your sleep. Do you recall your dreams?”

Glancing up at the camera without lifting her head, Shepard said, “Agitated? Really?” Sarcasm snapped through every word. “Me?” Still, as she rubbed her relaxing charlie horse, she thought back, trying to recall any dreams. Nothing. A complete blank; a starched white sheet pulled tight, like so much of her life.

For long moments, she stared into the void, daring herself to push into that emptiness like a child gripping the doorknob of a haunted house. Miranda said it would all come back with time, that the cloning process replaced her memory cells with exact copies, ready to be triggered by the familiar. She prodded the gap in her mind, shining her trembling flashlight into the ghost-filled corners. The pale vacuity echoed back, taunting her.

“I don’t remember my dreams,” she said at last, her voice low, a thin sliver of bitterness traced through the words. She lowered herself back onto her pillows ignoring the protective goggles on the bed next to her. The violet light burned clean and honest. “How much longer do I have in this thing? I need to pee.”

“I’m on my way down. The cycle will be complete by the time I get there,” the crisp, efficient voice replied.

Shepard let out a small sigh and closed her eyes. From the cool tickle of her tears to the pulse throbbing behind her eyes, every sensation sharpened into a focus so exquisite that it became torturous.

Gradually, as the regen field warmed her, her senses reached out to follow the cracks in her flesh, the raw canyons of unhealed tissue. The pain— She opened her eyes as the door chirped then hissed, signalling Miranda’s arrival.

Turning to look at her Dr. Frankenstein, Shepard scowled. “What have you done to the field? Did you tweak it?”

Miranda activated her omnitool and shut down the regen net arced over Shepard’s bed. She shook her head, one elegant brow arching. “It’s been on the same setting for more than a week.” With a practiced flick, she killed the orange glow around her arm. “Why?”

With all the speed and grace of a geriatric elcor, Shepard sat up, dragging her legs off the edge of the bed. A shrug lifted one shoulder a couple of centimetres before dropping it. “The pain has backed off a little, that’s all.” She glanced behind her left arm at her pillows. She’d fallen asleep within seconds of lying down. “You didn’t fill me full of drugs after physio, did you?” Staring at Miranda through narrowed eyes, she said, “I know how sneaky you are.”

A flicker of annoyance escaped Miranda’s control before she policed her expression back to careful distain. “I did no such thing, Captain. Perhaps getting off your backside and participating in physiotherapy stimulated endorphin production to combat the pain.” Miranda held out her hand palm up. “It certainly explains your exhaustion.”

Shepard stared at the waiting hand for a moment, but then dropped her wrist into Miranda’s gloved grasp. A tiny, vindictive smile bolted across her face when the operative jumped, startled by the abrupt compliance. Shame recaptured the grin a half-second later.

So few hours after deciding to play nice and already failing. You truly are incorrigible, Janey.

Miranda pushed Shepard’s sleeve up a little, her thumbs slipping under the material as she lifted it. A less bitter smile greeted the care Miranda took not to damage her company’s biggest investment. Costing a large organization a few billion credits to resurrect came with a few benefits.

“This would explain the lessening of your pain,” the operative said, lifting Shepard’s arm a few centimetres. “Your wounds healed significantly in today’s regen session.” She activated her omnitool and ran a scan.

Shepard watched the back side of the screen, able to pick up the gist of the tests. The tissue rejection had eased back in the last few hours, and judging from the crinkle of skin between Miranda’s eyebrows, the operative had no idea how or why.

Should we be encouraged by that or terrified?

Despite finding comfort in her body taking charge of its own healing, she would have hoped that Miranda—as the wizard behind the curtain—knew how it worked and could control it.

The crinkle deepened into a furrow. “I’ll schedule a battery of tests for first thing in the morning,” Miranda said, sounding more like she spoke to herself than Shepard. “I’m encouraged to see your healing accelerating, but I want to be sure it isn’t a sign of nanite malfunction.”

Shepard laughed, hard and bitter enough to abrade the back of her throat on its way out. “So … what? Your little machines just keep building flesh until I turn into the elephant man on my way to becoming Jabba the Hutt?” The confusion on the operative’s face provided another shameful little victory, that one requiring some sort of apology. “I’m supposed to heal, right? That’s sort of an integral part of the whole glory-hallelujah-she’s-back-praise-Jesus miracle, isn’t it?”

Easing herself off the side of the bed, Shepard tested the strength in her legs. As the soles of her feet hit the floor, she winced in anticipation of the javelins of agony stabbing up through her calves.
and thighs to embed themselves in her hips. A throaty sigh of relief tumbled out of her when they didn’t appear. Pushing herself up off the mattress, she tested it. Pain arced between her joints and sizzled along the rents in her flesh, but it had dropped from a twenty-five to a fifteen on the Shepard Scale of Insane Pain Range.

One hand gripping the rail on the side of her bed, she took a single, tentative step. Her muscles and joints shook, but didn’t drop her in a pile on the floor. Progress. She started to take another step, but Miranda clamped one hand on Shepard’s shoulder while wrapping the other around her waist.

“Oh no, you don’t, Captain.” The operative eased Shepard back onto the side of the bed. “If you want to walk, that’s fine, but not without a walker and an attendant. A single fall will set you back weeks, and I don’t think the staff could bear that.” She stepped back and activated her omnitool again, keying in commands. “They’ve begun petitioning me for your early discharge.”

Shepard watched her for a moment, then sighed. “Fine, but I need to pee, so … .” She reached up to take hold of the bar hanging from the ceiling then nodded toward the bathroom door. “You’re standing between me and where I need to be.”

Miranda snapped her wrist, turning off her omnitool, then turned to the door. “Your guest has arrived and is waiting to see you. Make yourself presentable; you’re representing one of the most affluent and influential organizations in the galaxy.”

“A guest?” Shepard gripped the bar and took a couple of tentative steps. The pain eased back a little as her legs adjusted to holding her weight and numbed. Satisfied, she looked over at the door before it closed. “Are they the ‘here to enjoy my sparkling company’ kind of guest, or the ‘yet more poking fingers, cutting knives and scanning omnitools’ kind?”

“The ‘came to assist your recovery so be bloody grateful and polite’ kind,” Miranda replied, the door hissing closed behind her.

Shepard grinned. “Ooo, someone’s starting to bite back.” As she hobbled to the bathroom, the grin spread across her face a little more with each step. Healing. Her stupid, stubborn, dead ol’ corpse was actually healing. Hope ignited like a pilot light deep in her gut, stirring up embers she hadn’t realized still existed. Her steps came lighter, less plodding and her death grip on the bar relaxed.

What is that, Janey? Surely that’s not some fight coming back, is it? A little drive to stop wallowing in what they did to you and return to your life?

“Well, look at you,” she whispered, reaching up to press her fingertips against the cool, slick surface.
The starched white sheet erupted from its rest, flapping as if caught in a tempest before tearing loose and blowing away. Shepard blinked, her reflection changing before her eyes. She still stared into her own eyes, but she wore lipstick … well, sort of wore it. It smeared across her face as if she’d been … . The blush along her cheekbones deepened and spread to her neck. Well, it looked as though she’d been making out with someone.

She pushed into the memory, desperate fingers grasping for anything beyond what she’d seen. Who smeared that lipstick, and why did she look so sad?

Regret smacked into her like a runaway Mako. Sweet lord. Tears burned sudden and hot in her eyes as she struggled to see past the reflection to its back story.

“I’m trying to save a galaxy … we … we’re trying to save a galaxy.” She stared down at the floor. She’d never be able to keep talking, to do what she needed to do, if she looked him in the eye.

She pressed her eyes closed again, battering herself against the memory, her voice strained as it forced its way between clenched teeth. “Look up, damn you! Look up and let me see him.” Instead, the sheet snapped across, and he disappeared back behind the impossibly starched, tight barrier.

“Shepard?” Miranda called from the other side of the door. “Are you all right?”

“Yeah.” The word caught halfway out. She cleared her throat and shoved herself away from the counter, forgetting the bar until she took a step and her knee trembled. “Yeah, I’ll be out in a few minutes. Do me a favour and stick a clean change of clothes inside the door? Please?”

“Of course.” Miranda sounded surprised.

The memory—the certainty that she’d broken someone’s heart—left behind a residue, thick and gritty. She needed searing hot water beating down on her skin, wounds be damned. Some things hurt worse than pain.

After finally relenting to her bladder’s demands, she stepped under the water and pulled the barrier shut. A wavering moan greeted the stinging spray. Dangling from the bar, she let her knees and hips relax, holding herself almost entirely with the strength of her arms. Not that she needed much.

“You’re what? Forty seven kilos soaking wet, in armour? Yes, you’re freakishly tiny … .” The deep, textured voice paused, its absence a vacuum that grabbed hold of a loose thread of longing and pulled. “… and freakishly strong, but you’re still too skinny.” It spoke with such … such regard that when the memory vanished, she felt it drag along that thread, unravelling her from the inside. Scrambling to catch hold of her emotions, she pulled back, reeling herself in.

“Who are you?” she whispered, feeling an entirely different presence and spirit than her previous memory. “Come on, show me more.”

“You’re the bravest person I’ve ever met,” that same voice whispered. Strong hands eased her back until she lay cradled against his arms. So safe. Had she ever felt as safe?

The memory vanished, a vicious slap of loss sending her stumbling. One hand slipped off the bar, almost dropping her into a heap on the tile. Reaching behind her, Shepard smacked at the water control until it turned off, then scrubbed at the barrier. Finally managing to shove it out of her way, she stepped out of the shower and collapsed onto the toilet. Elbows resting on her thighs, she let her head fall into her hands, wallowing in the absence.

“Who are you?” she asked. “Are you the reason I let them drag me back?”
“Shepard?” Miranda again, her voice sharp-edged and brittle. “I’m starting to get concerned.”

“And I’m starting to get pissed off. Let a girl shower for fuck’s sake,” she snapped back, not lifting her head. Damn it. Her anger snapped all the threads tying her to the memory, leaving her adrift on the same, murky seas. Closing her eyes, she allowed that fleeting feeling of absolute safety to fill her. Her recollections up until that day consisted of growing up, the batarian raid, Anderson, and most of her early military. She couldn’t draw a line where they ended, but it amounted to more than a decade … just gone.

But those … those brief glimpses were recent. She knew it as well as she’d once known her scars. They were recent, and they amounted to friendship and love.

A slow smile climbed up through the disappointment and loss. Yes, as much as she wanted her whole life back immediately, at least she’d remembered something. Even the smallest piece of the puzzle was better than an empty table. She reached for a towel.

“If you’re the reason I came back,” she whispered into that void, “I’ll find you.”

She hurried through dressing, a wide grin making her cheeks ache. Clutching the bar in one hand, she burst into her room. “Did you order that walker, yet? I want to start getting my—”

Two steps out the door, she stopped, her eyes riveted on the figure standing at the threshold between her room and the corridor. Her vision narrowed, everything outside the space occupied by that figure disappearing into darkness.

“Shepard?”

That single word—her name—drew all the air from her lungs, leaving her sucking vacuum.

She waved to the blue figure trapped like a butterfly in amber. “Hey, lady, focus on the cranky human. Are you Dr. Liara T’Soni?”

Giant hands clamped around Shepard’s chest, squeezing until she swore she heard ribs creaking and her heart felt as though it would implode. Memories, like a flock of starlings all taking wing at once, erupted in a storm of sound and fury. She managed to capture a couple before they escaped and clutched them close.

An elbow smacked into Shepard from behind, but she didn’t take the bait. “Your mother is Matriarch Benezia. We believe that she’s helping Saren destroy the galaxy. Can you help me with that, or do I go back to my ship and look for someone who can?”

The asari in the net flushed a darker shade of blue, her mouth opening and closing like a beached fish for a second before an indignant squeal made it past her lips. “How dare you? I’m not some stripper in a seedy bar. I’m an archaeologist and an expert on the protheans.”

Shepard backed up, making beeping sounds. “Ship for the people useful to Shepard now leaving. Last call for boarding … all those useful to Shepard please get aboard.”

Both of Shepard’s hands dropped from the bar, suddenly chilled and numb. “Liara?” Shepard stepped toward the door, sock-covered toes dragging over the tile. “Liara?” Brain and emotions short circuited, all she could do was gawk, and all she could think to say was the asari’s name. As Liara stood there, silhouetted in the door, her features muted by the bright lights from the corridor, she seemed a portal … or perhaps a barricade standing just in front of a million important things. Shepard squinted, trying to see past her, to catch a glimpse of the promises whispering just out of earshot.
Move aside, damn it. For just one second, let me see.

“Shepard.” Liara stepped over the threshold, shattering the illusion. She strode into the room, closing fast, stuttering to a stop when Shepard flinched away, one hand slamming up to fend her off. “Goddess. Is it really you?”

Shock, need, joy, despair, and hope all battered at Shepard’s barriers. The great, dark sea, so still a few moments before, rose into massive breakers, swamping her tiny craft.

Too much. Sweet baby Jesus, too much, too fast.

“Yeah, I think so,” she said, finally answering the question. Dizzy, the massive flock of starlings wheeling in circles around the inside of her head, Shepard reached out, stumbling toward her bed until the cold metal railing impacted her fingers. A fingernail bent backwards, but the pain barely registered through the fog. She sank onto the mattress, the numbness replaced by a virulent tingling as if her entire body had fallen asleep.

“Operative Lawson told me that they’d brought you back, but I didn’t really believe it.” The young asari’s blue eyes shone with unshed tears as she stared, almost hungrily into Shepard’s. “I couldn’t believe it. It was impossible.” A wide, beatific smile erupted as the tears broke free, streaking down her cheeks like rain on a window. “But, goddess, here you are.” Clapping her hands to her mouth, she let out a slightly hysterical sounding laugh. “I can’t believe this. I … I … . You’re real.“

Liara pressed a hand to her brow, her knees almost buckling. Nearly as wobbly-legged as Shepard, she lurched toward the chair at the end of Shepard’s bed, folding into it with a dramatic flair that Shepard recalled all too well. “Goddess … I was at your funeral … I held—”

“Dr. T’Soni!” Miranda practically jumped between them. “Please, remember what we talked about.”

Liara paled, the brilliant smile dimming for a couple of breaths as she nodded. “Yes, of course, Ms. Lawson. I just got overexcited. My apologies.” Sun glistening off new snow, the smile returned as Liara reached out, laying her hand over Shepard’s. “You’ve been so missed.”

Shepard slid her hand out and patted the asari’s before withdrawing. Sweet baby Jesus. Her funeral. She shook her head. No. It was too much. So very, very too much. A fierce, primal scream of panic built in her chest as terror bullied her legs, trying to chivvy them into fleeing the room and running until she escaped someplace solitary and dark.

She wanted to remember her life, but Liara’s presence—the desperation and hunger under the other woman’s joy—felt like an avalanche set to bury Shepard in a landslide she wouldn’t survive. Had her death formed a similar singularity inside everyone she’d known? Would she end up drowned by their love … their relief and joy?

“I … .” Looking up at Miranda, she cursed the operative for being right. “May I have a few moments?” Her stare flitted over Liara, afraid to look into those huge, blue eyes and see hurt there. “I just need to process all this.”

“Of course, Shepard,” Miranda replied, holding out an arm to usher Liara from the room. “I’ll escort Dr. T’Soni up to her offices, give her the tour, then we’ll return.” Despite phrasing the plan as a statement, the inflection in Miranda’s voice left room for Shepard to accept or refuse.

Shepard looked up, forcing herself to face Liara’s disappointment. Reaching out to squeeze the slender, blue fingers, she said, “Yeah, that would be great.” A tired, gentle smile eased across her lips. “I’m glad to see you, Liara. I am. It’s just all so … .”

Disappointment turned to understanding and concern. “Of course, Shepard. Operative Lawson explained that you’re still very early in your recovery.” Her hand flipped over to hold Shepard’s in a gentle grip. “I’m sorry I came at you too strong. I just . . . .” A quick, heavy sigh brushed past the captain’s cheek. “I just . . . I don’t think I’ve ever felt so many things at once.” Releasing Shepard, she stood. “I’ll see you in a little while. Rest well, Captain.”

“Thank you, Liara.” Shepard smiled. “Good luck finding your way around this maze. Make Miranda give you a map.” She lifted a hand in a small wave, then let it drop, sighing as the door closed, leaving her alone in silence.

Once certain Miranda wouldn’t return, Shepard pulled her legs up onto the bed, rolling over to face the wall. Liara. Why had Miranda brought Liara of all people? She and the operative needed to have a talk about just springing people on her like that.

Liara. Shepard shook her head and closed her eyes. Well, at least the asari might be able to help her recall some of what happened before she died.

She wasn’t there, though, was she, Janey? She’d already moved on.

A perplexed scowl creased Shepard’s forehead. Liara had moved on. Where to? Damn all the little bits and pieces. She needed a corner piece, maybe an edge or two, so she could start fitting them together.

The last time she recalled seeing Liara . . . she remembered fear . . . she’d been really afraid, but not a life and limb sort of fear. A healthy dose of guilt tangled in there as well. Why?

Shepard grinned, surety settling in her gut as the squad of commandos blocked her path to Liara, their shotguns pointed at her belly. “Well, that’s a good sign.”

“It’s all right,” Liara said, letting out a nervous giggle. “That’s Captain Shepard. Um . . . stand down.” She stepped around her bodyguards. Despite claiming to be certain of her path, Liara held herself like someone facing execution. “Sorry, Shepard.”

Shepard waved off the apology. “Don’t be. I suddenly feel a whole lot better about you leaving.” She looked into the eyes of each commando, the steel that looked back easing the prickle of her inner alarm. Addressing them, she bristled, trying to become as imposing as possible. “If any harm comes to Liara T’Soni, you’d all better be dead or start running the very next second.” Some of them grinned, but her glare killed the smirks within a couple of seconds.

Shepard took Liara’s hands, pleased that young asari’s grip had stopped trembling. “You’re sure this is what you want?”

“Yes. You were right about using Mother’s resources.” Liara took a deep breath, squared her shoulders, and smiled. “Consider me your Prothean Research Division. I won’t be more than a call away.” Her grip tightened. “Don’t worry about me, Shepard. Even though it isn’t what I thought I’d be doing with my life, it’s so much more important.”

Shepard pulled the asari into a hug. “I’m not worried about you. Not any more. Good luck, Liara. We’ll always be here if you need anything.”

Shepard backed up until a warm, solid presence pressed against her arm. A scent like sun-warmed sandalwood and spice enveloped her, setting loose a terrible, aching sadness. “Well, there goes the first one.” She forced out a laugh when he gave her a gentle shove, but it died almost instantly.
as the fear bled through, stealing her reprieve. Time to face reality. Time to do the right thing, no matter how much it hurt.

Flopping over onto her back, Shepard stared up at the ceiling. She’d never had a boyfriend … never really wanted one. Then … two?

One of the corner pieces settled into place. As hard as it had been, she’d chosen.

Whoever he is, he lost you two years ago. He’s moved on by now, Janey. Hell, he could have a big, pregnant wife by now.

Shepard closed her eyes, a sharp, thin wire cutting into her heart. “Shut up, Bunny. Please just shut up.”
Chapter Summary

Garrus has stumbled into something horrible ... but what?

Trigger Warning for body horror and medical experimentation — if you want to skip this chapter, message me and I will tell you the plot so you don’t have to read it.

Casarus - Prison or dungeon with the connotation of horror: a place of torture and death rather than a penal institution.

12 Days ASR

Garrus stumbled into the chamber. Legs numb, he dragged his talons, lurching to a stop when his boot caught on a crack in the floor. “Spirits … what the … ?” Less than a metre away, a still living torso twitched within a web of wires, four stark white eyes wide, its broad head thrown back. It looked like the same species he’d shot just before finding Nihlus. Garrus stared, mandibles hanging slack, unable to look away from where cables and conduits ripped through the shell of a husk and punched into holes drilled in the alien being’s skull. Clamps and plating gleamed dully amidst meat, sinking metal teeth into flesh that still dripped the black blood-fluid. Revulsion tied his guts into knots and hauled them up into his throat.

“Fascinating, aren’t they?” A figure moved behind the horrifying, macabre display, no more than a shadow against the glare of the sun searing through the high windows.

Her words jolted him hard enough that he finally managed to tear himself away from what had to amount to fifty or more victims. He wouldn’t have wished that fate on the damned husks. Spirits … what madness … ? It didn’t matter. Mordin and the geth could unravel the insanity later.

Holding a hand up to shield his eyes from the brilliance, Garrus struggled to track the speaker through the room, squinting to see past the glinting spirals of dust that swirled in the air like spirits. “Fascinating is not the word I’d use.” He stepped closer to the wall of pieced together life forms, shuddering as a geth reached out a hand, grasping at Garrus’s gauntlet. It let out a stuttering sort of groan, then the hand dropped.

Noveria.

“Are they suffering?” Shepard whispered.

“Geth do not feel pain as organics do.” Legion replied. “This platform is experiencing a short in its motor functions. Higher level processes have ceased.”

He hoped Legion was right and tried to ignore the fact that reaching out could hardly be mistaken for a twitch. “Is this geth aware?” Garrus demanded, wincing at the tight rasp of sound that clawed its way out of his throat.
“Yes.” The shadow—female quarian by the sound of her accent—moved along the back wall, keeping just to the other side of a wall of shelves. “They must remain functional and aware to preserve their memory and hardware.” The dark shape beckoned to him. “Come in. I am not often provided a chance to show off my work.”

He took a step forward, keeping Ingrid levelled on the quarian best he could. “Why don’t you come out here where I can see you?” Sidestepping around a table covered in surgical instruments, he tried to open a line on her flank, but she scooted further in.

“I don’t think so, General. You appear far too competent with that rifle even in your current state.” She held out an arm, her hand appearing past the end of the shelf to gesture to a medical table and the geth strapped to it. “If you hang it up, you could assist me in salvaging this prototype.”

Garrus ground to a halt and stared, dizziness and fatigue sending his mind reeling as he tried to decipher what he was looking at. Geth. The lower legs and arms told him that much, but other than that, it looked like a jumbled together pile of parts. The left side of the geth’s head and neck had been cut away like some sort of macabre anatomical model. White fluid oozed out of tied-off hoses and from between parts. “What in … ?” He stumbled forward a step.

A small shower of sparks erupted from the remaining half of the geth’s head lamp. It tried to raise its head, an effort that resulted in a series of wrenching, spasmodic movements. Twitching hands grasped within their shackles, almost as if trying to climb free.

Garrus flinched and turned away, everything he saw in that appalling moment calling Legion a fucking liar. By any definition he could imagine, agony lay displayed on that table.

“Vak … k … kar … r … rian G … g … gen … er … er … er …” The stutter died.

Time slammed to a halt, stuttered forward, then collapsed, trapping Garrus in a singularity. “Legion!” Smashing the shackles of disbelief, he whirled back toward the geth. “Dear spirits, Legion.” Stumbling toward the table, he searched for anything he recognized. And then he saw it, Alliance armour shrouding Legion’s chest. The armour it used to replace the pieces taken from Shepard’s locker.

“Are … ?” He executed the question. Stupid. He didn’t need to question the geth as to its status, he just needed to get them out of there.

“It’s a fascinating prototype,” the quarian continued, apparently oblivious to the bad melodrama he acted out two metres away. “Integrating several of its unique components, I should be able to complete my device.” Slipping around Legion, she managed to move into cover behind the grisly web without exposing herself to the bullet he desperately wanted to send tearing through her skull.

“What the hell is this thing? Why have you done to these … ?” What did he call them? People? Exhaustion dropped the gates on his control just as a breaker of disgust and rage rolled in. It crashed through, finding form in an incoherent, guttural roar.

“The geth cannot be hacked for more than a few seconds,” she said, her voice sharp and excited. “Each time you override a geth’s core programming, it becomes more resistant to subsequent attempts. Following attempts also control it for a shorter period of time. Our scientists have thrown themselves at the problem for centuries to no avail, but then the so-called heretics joined the Reapers and sealed the fate of all geth.”

The quarian finally stepped out into the open.
“Admiral Daro’Xen?” How had the admiral ended up on Haestrom? Suppose that signed the death certificate for her claims of being quarantined on the Moreh. He raised Ingrid, couching the stock against his shoulder.

“Yes, yes.” She flipped a single, emphatic hand at him as if brushing aside an annoying insect. “I purchase several of the husk creatures from a human merchant and discovered within their brains and synthesized nervous systems the Reapers’ control matrices.” As she spoke, her words tumbled out faster and faster.

Garrus circled, keeping the rifle aimed solidly at the center of her chest. Was it madness?

She paused for a breath at last. “Fascinating technology, but not enough, even when combined with the new geth platforms based on the prototype on the—”

“Legion! Its name is Legion,” Garrus shouted, wincing a little as his voice echoed back. That echo bounced off Xen’s nightmare, and a wave of choked moans and howls swept down its length. For a moment, the whole structure writhed, its denizens screaming their … what … anguish? Did husks and body parts feel anguish? Garrus turned away, braced heavily against one knee, rifle forgotten as he pressed his forearm against his mouth, struggling to keep not just his gorge, but his entire being from spewing out.

The din died down as Xen walked the length of her creation, speaking softly and stroking here and there as if comforting children. “What you choose to call the machine makes no difference.” Either dismissing him as a threat or too enraptured by the details of her work to care, Xen stepped out into the open. A lover’s touch caressed the top of one of the alien heads, following the broad, chitinous ridges. “I found these specimens three days ago. They staggered in the door, full of bullets.”

Leaning down, she pressed her cheek to the cephalic shell, a melancholy sigh drifting from the speaker on her helmet. “The first one died before I could salvage its parts, but when I dissected it, I discovered something truly impressive. They’re designed.” She patted the still living one’s head then stepped toward Garrus. “Imagine. Once, probably a lifeform as mundane as you or I, but now transformed into something remarkable.” Her voice raised in pitch, words tumbling out faster as she spoke.

The last time Garrus saw Xen, she oozed an unruffled, relaxed sort of disdain, as if she considered herself so far above the rest of the galaxy that even moving would lower her to the level of her inferiors. Right then, her entire body vibrated with a frenetic, maniacal energy, and Garrus couldn’t recall anyone ever having seemed so terrifying.

“Don’t you see?” she snapped, grabbing the being’s head by the jaw and craning it back. When Garrus backed up a step, she shook her head and let the alien go. “Typical. No vision. Someone removed all weakness of the species they once were, creating the perfect servant race. The exact accomplishment the quarians attempted and failed. Inside that head is a node that allows one of its overseers to actually control it from the inside, to possess it. That and these … “ She stepped back and drew his attention to several components. His eyes slid along the distinctive blue-black, slick lines, not wanting to come to rest on them. “… will allow me to correct our ancestors’ mistakes and bring the geth back under quarian control.”

Damn.

Garrus lunged toward her, his vision pounding in time with his heart. Rage demanded that he throw her down, stop her madness, but his strength sagged before he reached her, his thigh crashing into a table before he caught himself. “Those components are salvaged from Sovereign? And they’re not shielded?” Well, that explained some of her crazy.
Another dismissive flick of her hand. “Of course, they’re shielded. I’m not a beginner at dealing with dangerous technology, General.” She reached up, running a hand over her headcloth, almost as if speaking with him amounted to such a labour that she needed to mop away the sweat. “At first, I thought the aliens and their control nodes would prove to be the last piece to my puzzle, but no. The last piece is contained inside that unit.” An elegant roll of her wrist swept her hand toward Legion.

She strode past Garrus. “Would you like to assist?” Stopping next to Legion, she bent over to stare into what remained of the geth’s optic. “Want to know something remarkable, General?”

He raised Ingrid, feeling finally returning to his hands. “No. I’m getting out of here, and I’m taking you with me.”

She didn’t react as he stepped up behind her. “That gun won’t do you any good, General.” A quick jut of her chin led his stare up to a turret mounted near the ceiling. He turned a slow circle to discover six more tracking his every movement. Another graceful roll of her hand dismissed them and his threat of violence. Perhaps it proved too uncivilized to acknowledge. “As I said, not a beginner dealing with dangerous technology.”

“These new geth have a sense of platform self-preservation,” Xen continued without hesitation. “Previously, they merely uploaded themselves to their server via high gain transmission and sacrificed the platform.” She picked up a cutting laser. “But not these. I jammed their transmissions, of course, but they didn’t even try.” Fingers poked and measured, obviously looking for the best place to start cutting. Her tone became absent as she continued, her attention focused on her work. “Convenient for my purpose.”

Garrus stepped forward, Ingrid’s barrel sagging then recovering as he braced against a table. “Put the laser down, or I’ll put a bullet through your skull.” He tightened his talon on the trigger.

“I’m afraid that won’t be possible, my work here is far too important.” The quarian spun, torch in one hand, a pistol in the other. “I told you that gun won’t do you any good, General.” Xen’s arms and head jerked forward as the harsh cough of a shotgun roared from just behind Garrus. A nearly indistinguishable fraction of a second later, Garrus’s shot spun her a half turn before she fell.

“Check her,” Nihlus said, his voice barely more than a gasp. “There has to be a transmitter here somewhere.”

Garrus stared at Nihlus for a couple of seconds. “Thanks.” Bending over the quarian, he scanned her for life signs. “She’s alive. Suit has sealed.” He dosed her with medigel. Looking up at the Spectre, he shook his head. “You look half dead.”

Nihlus sorted through Xen’s desk, emerging victorious. “Who could die … with all that … ranting?” He gasped, his breathing weak and choked with fluid. He tossed Garrus the transmitter and sank into the desk chair.

13 Days ASR

“Well, if it isn’t General Vakarian,” a familiar voice called, beckoning him from a gloriously restful oblivion. “Welcome back.”

Garrus opened his eyes, the familiar surroundings of the Normandy’s medbay drifting into focus as the fog rolled out. Although he couldn’t boast racking up the frequent stay points that Shepard and Nihlus collected, he’d spent enough time in the small, dim medical suite to identify it immediately. Slowly, the memory of being extracted off Haestrom returned, filling in the blanks between Nihlus tossing him the transmitter and waking up.

“How are you feeling?” Dr. Chakwas stepped into his line of sight, leaning over him a little. The bright orange of her omnitool blinded him, sending him into hiding behind eyelids pressed tight.

After considering her question for a few seconds, he nodded and peeked out through one eye. “No pain. How long have I been out?”

A nebulous shadow passed over her face, a subtle transition of muscle and tension, but it registered like someone slamming blinds down over a window. “Just under six hours. You’ve been through quite a lot.” Her gaze slid from his face to the omnitool as she began entering information, the instrument holding just a fraction too much of her attention.

“How’s Nihlus?” He tried to lift his head to look at the bed next to his. Nothing moved. He couldn’t sit up. “Doctor?” Try as he might to keep his escalating panic locked down, it burrowed out through his second larynx.

“General.” Chakwas pressed a warm, gentle hand against his shoulder. “You’ve sustained serious injuries, but you’re going to be fine. Your physical condition is precarious and requires you to remain immobile. I’ve placed you in a restraint field so that you don’t exacerbate your injuries before I complete your treatment.” She cast a quick glance over her shoulder at Nihlus. “Spectre Kryik is also in critical but stable condition. I intend to keep him in an induced coma for another 48-72 hours, after which time, he should realize a complete recovery.”

Garrus scowled, his mandibles snapping hard at the thick mire of medical jargon. “What happened to us?” He tried to lift his head again, an aggravated grumble meeting his immobility. “How did we get hurt? Where are the other members of the team I took to the shipyard?”

The door opened. “One answer at a time, son,” a deep, familiar voice called from the threshold. Anderson stood just inside, silhouetted against the light from the mess. His voice held tight to its usual, unflappable professionalism, but the rigidity along the captain’s jaw and the tendons standing out in his neck told Garrus that the human was doing just that: holding on tight.

Garrus opened his mouth, but one of Anderson’s hands leapt up, palm braced to intercept the deluge of questions.

“Your teams are both aboard the Normandy. They’re safe and recovering,” the captain said, taking a couple of steps toward the bed. “Whoever took you off the station wasn’t interested in them, just you and Nihlus.”

“Interested in us?” Forcing himself to relax into the rock-hard mattress a little, Garrus let out a long breath. What did these mystery people want with him and Nihlus? Was it tied to Archangel? The council? As far as the council knew, Nihlus had infiltrated Archangel on their behalf. But if not them … it had to be someone working for the Reapers. But who?

Anderson cleared his throat, derailing Garrus’s train of thought. The general took another long breath, that one sending a wraith of pain shivering through his chest. He needed to find out what happened before he started trying to puzzle it all through. As a starting point, the fact that the rest of the team remained uninjured was very good news. He tried to lift his head to get a better look at Anderson, then let out a frustrated grunt and turned a glare at the doctor. “I’d like to be able to move.”
She shrugged and turned all in one motion, walking over to her desk. “I’d like to be able to take a week off.” Her joke falling flat, she sighed. “Please, just give us time to explain.” Returning a moment later with her chair, she rolled it over to Anderson.

Garrus tracked the chair to the Normandy’s captain. “I don’t remember anything past the station losing power until I woke up in some sort of casarus under Haestrom.” He looked to Anderson. “What the hell happened? Was it Daro’Xen?” Browplates sinking over his eyes, heavy and skeptical, he shook his head—a slight tremor side to side. “No, she seemed to be there alone. She couldn’t have moved us.”

Anderson pushed the chair over next to Garrus’s shoulder. “It wasn’t Xen. We found no trace of any biological matter belonging to either you or Nihlus in her lab.” He lowered himself onto the seat with a slight ‘old-man’ groan. Garrus’s father had started making nearly that same sound when he was promoted to Commander at C-Sec.

“Biological matter?” A viscous soup of fear, rage, and denial rolled up his throat.

“Have patience with us, General. This is going to take a bit to explain,” Anderson said. Leaning forward, he braced his elbows on his knees and steepled his hands, fingertips pressed together. The captain let out a harsh huff of a sigh. “First things first.” He stared at Garrus over the temple of those fingers. “You and Nihlus were missing for ten days.”

Garrus twitched under the restraints again as his body insisted he sit up and take action … do something other than lie there, trapped like an insect in concrete. “Ten days?” He turned a predatory stare on the doctor as her hand pressed against his shoulder again. A bitter chuff rumbled from his throat. “Can’t you release my head, at least?”

Her studied expression of professionalism drooped for a moment, sagging like melted wax before snapping back into place. “Yes, I can, but General … Garrus … I need to explain your injuries first.” She leaned a hip against his bed and folded her hands in front of her.

Anderson spoke instead of Chakwas, forcing Garrus’s attention away from his attempt to stare the doctor into submission. “From what we can gather from your hard suits and medical scans, the station registered a massive power surge routed through the orbs you found on the bridge. All your team members lost consciousness at the same moment. You were removed from the space yard two hours after you blacked out.”

Anderson sat back, stretching his spine a little, shifting uncomfortably, but Garrus didn’t think it could be blamed on the chair. “You and Nihlus were moved to a cloaked vessel hiding within the system … most likely low orbit around Haestrom … and … .”

“And … ?” Garrus prompted when no one made any move to finish that sentence.

Dry, gentle fingers pressed down on his forearm. “You were both subjected to extensive medical testing and experimentation,” Dr. Chakwas said, her tone the carefully modulated one he’d heard her use with Shepard enough times to know it was meant to stave off the crazy.

“How extensive?” His heart stopped for a few seconds, then began to pound, but … . After an entire life of adrenaline, his heart thumping quick, hard, and steady against his keel, a sick sort of terror oozed out into his chest cavity. His heart beat, but against nothing. No answering echo followed each thump.

Chakwas glanced over at Anderson. Garrus caught the captain’s nod out of the corner of his eye while remaining intent on Chakwas, her face seeming the only fixed point in a growing maelstrom of madness.

“The internal examination reached a level of such invasive brutality, it would not be excessive to call it vivisection,” she said, meeting his frantic stare with solid, calm compassion. “Extensive cybernetics were surgically implanted throughout your body.”

Garrus strained against her field, the wraiths of pain growing claws. “Why?” he demanded. “What were they for?”

“Everything from strength and motor skill enhancement to what appear to be control nodes, judging by the placement of the scarring.” Chakwas patted his arm, the gesture oddly soothing all things considered. “Then it appears you were placed down on Haestrom to fight.”

Could what they were telling him get any more bizarre? Spirits, what if it did? He closed his eyes. “Fight? What enemy?” A horrifying picture appeared in his head. Whoever it was, they took both he and Nihlus … .

“We don’t know,” Anderson replied. He paused, then sucked in a quick breath as if reading Garrus’s mind. “Not Nihlus. Neither one of you show any evidence of attacking the other, and judging by the wounds, whatever or whomever they were … there were a lot of them.”

“So they took us apart, put us back together with cybernetics, then sent us into some sort of sadistic deathmatch?” He struggled again, the thread growing into a burn that spread through his chest. “Are the cybernetics still inside us?”

“No,” Dr. Chakwas replied. “They removed the implants, used metal plates to support where they’d cut through bone, and sealed up the areas where they removed pieces of your carapace. Before they left you on the planet, they administered massive amounts of medigel and analgesics.”

“Let me up,” he said, voice low, soft, and dangerous. Beneath the blankets, he forced himself into complete stillness.

Chakwas pressed her hand to her face, hiding half of it as she let out a long breath. “Garrus … there is extensive damage. Once I rebuild your ribcage and keel structure, I’ll be able to release you from the field, but until then, you must remain still.” She activated her omnitool and, with the press of a control, released his head.

“Rebuild … ?” Dear spirits, how bad was it? He lifted his head, the doctor jumping in to support him with a hand just below his fringe. Black ice crackled through his cells like frost creeping across grime-covered glass. One look at his silhouette under the blankets told him how extensive his injuries remained. “My keel.” Searching eyes focused up at the doctor.

She gave him a reassuring smile that didn’t touch the ice. “We’re on our way back to Omega. Between Mordin and I, we’ll get you back up on your feet, keel intact, within a few days.” When she tried to ease his head back onto the pillows, he resisted.

“Show me the rest,” he said, using his own, dead, expressionless control to buttress his courage.

“It appears you were retrieved after each fight, your wounds were healed, cybernetics were exchanged or enhanced, then they sent you down again,” the doctor said, her tone clipped. “I would have kept you in a coma like Nihlus until you were healed, but I need you awake for the next part of the procedure.” That hand patted his arm again. “It might be best if you wait, Garrus.”

“I want to see what they did to me, doctor.” A little of the rage that had begun to boil deep in his gut spilled into his voice. She winced, but nodded and pulled back the blanket.
Garrus stared through the shimmering sterile field, mouth and mandibles falling open. His chest was gone. Just gone. He let his head fall back onto the pillows. “Why am I awake?”

Anderson cleared his throat. “Nihlus’s broken hip appears to have taken him out of the running about halfway through their tests. They didn’t continue his enhancements, but with you … .” The man reached up, cracking his neck as he scrubbed the back of it with a rough hand. “Our best guess says they were trying to turn you into some sort of command and control. Your brain and nervous system took damage when they removed their enhancements.” He shook his head. “I have no idea how you managed to pull yourself and Nihlus out of that hellhole, son. Hell of a thing.”

Well, it’s like this, Anderson. Shepard showed up—she does that sometimes—and yelled at me until I got up and followed her out.

Chakwas pulled the blanket back over him, covering the hateful racing of his heart. She leaned over him a little. “The affected areas of your brain are difficult to access and delicate, and I need you awake while I repair the injuries.” She nodded to her side, drawing his attention to a monitor set up. “I’m not comfortable waiting until we arrive back at Archangel, so I’m going to have Mordin sit in and advise via comms.”

“Right.” Garrus closed his eyes, letting the rage flow free, burning the disbelief and horror to ash. Whoever had torn him and Nihlus apart and tortured them for nearly two weeks had to be connected to the Reapers. Learn the enemy’s weaknesses and turn those weaknesses against them: one of the oldest rules in warfare. And in taking him apart to learn his vulnerabilities, they’d given him a trail to follow. Mistake number one.

Brutalizing his brother, invoking the bond that demanded justice and retribution. Mistake number two.

He took a long, deep breath, trying not to imagine the way his lungs looked as they expanded under the sheet. “Do what you need to, doctor, just get me up off this bed so that I can find whoever did this to us and end them.”

* * * * *

He stood on the edge of a sun-baked cliff, Cipritine sprawling before him. The river sparkled under Trebia’s brilliant rays as it wended through the city, passed beneath the ancient walls, and flowed on toward the sea. He folded his arms and straightened his back, leaning all his weight on the backs of his feet.

Although he heard nothing, he felt Shepard walk up behind him.

“It’s quite the view, isn’t it?” She stepped up next to his side and looked out, making no move toward him. “Of all the places you brought us, I think this is my favourite, Callor.”

He nodded, but didn’t speak. Unlike the rest of their time together, that time she’d come to talk, not to listen. Heart aching behind his keel, he knew. As much as his soul railed against it, as much as he wanted to turn to her, wrap his arms around her and never leave … the time had come.

“You’re ready,” she said, simply. Thick and nasal, her voice sounded as though she fought back tears, as unhappy about reality as he, despite having pushed him toward it. A throaty sigh preceded a single, sharp nod. “Good. They need you.” She laughed, but it came out bitter. “Me … well, I can wait. My needs aren’t going anywhere anytime soon.”
He turned to look down at her, his tiny, magical Kahri. “It’s about the work.” He pressed his talons over his heart. “This will always be yours.”

A tight lipped smile greeted that, but she remained fixed on the view. “Kick their ass, Callor. Kick them so hard that they never forget.” She glanced up at him. “I love you, but don’t rush to join me.” Turning, she lifted onto her toes, hands grasping his cowl to pull him down to her. “You never know what the future might bring.”

They kissed, passion and sorrow fueling the frantic joining of mouths and tongues, of bodies pressed so tight that Garrus thought his chest would cave in under the pressure. He breathed her in, doing his best to memorize the scent and sound and feel of her completely enough to last the rest of his life.

“I love you, Kahri,” he whispered as she pulled back, ripping loose everything soft and sentimental that remained within him. He nodded. Best she take it with her. His war had just changed to demand a much different sort of general. “I’ll win this thing. Don’t worry.”

She smiled through the pale brume that glistened in her eyes. “The galaxy couldn’t be in better hands.” Backing away, she nodded. “I’ll see you soon enough.”
Chapter Summary

Shepard gets to let out a little bit of the crazy.

13 Days ASR

Just over an hour passed before Liara and Miranda returned. Shepard heard them long before they reached her door. Their discussion centered around Liara’s access to the communications array. Apparently, the different departments were assigned broadcast windows for outgoing communications, and users needed to adhere to strict protocols most of which Liara would not be subjected to. As long as she made no mention of Shepard’s resurrection or their location, she was free to conduct her business.

“Shepard shook her head. Liara had signed a nondisclosure agreement with the devil in exchange for what? Why had Miranda brought the asari there in the first place? She’d been peripheral to Shepard’s life, a figure tucked away in a back lab space until Benezia died. Why not Anderson, if they wanted someone to help her make connections?

_Those connections are already intact, Janey. It’s the newer ones you need. Shouldn’t you be happy to see someone who knows about your life right before you died?_

She should be ecstatic to see Liara. Despite sticking to her hard line of no contact, Miranda had finally provided a link to Shepard’s life, a glimmer of hope that at the end of her tenure as Frankenstein’s monster, she’d be able to return to her life. So why then did Liara’s presence just stir up dread and guilt?

The door opened. Shepard didn’t need to look up to tell that Miranda entered first and alone. She waited for the door to close before she asked, “Why did you bring Liara here?” Remaining on her back, she stared straight up at the ceiling and waited. The operative’s clipped, efficient heel strokes circled around to the side of the bed and stopped.

“Dr. T’Soni has melded with your mind twice that we know of. We brought her here to aid in memory recovery and to ensure that we brought you back intact.” The chair next to the bed squeaked across the floor, then the leather let out a whispered exhale as Miranda sat down. “I admit, I thought you’d be pleased to see someone from just before your death.”

In a single movement, Shepard swung her legs off the bed and sat up. “There’s something ….” She shook her head and braced the heels of her hands on the edge of the mattress, lining them up perfectly so the ridge cut along her lifeline. “I barely knew Liara, but my problem isn’t with her.”

Miranda shifted in the chair and crossed her legs at the knee, one arm draped elegantly over the top. How did she manage to make every movement seem like a dance? Next to the operative, Shepard felt like a newborn foal, all clumsy awkwardness and limbs that refused to submit to her authority.

“Then what’s your issue?” the operative asked.
Shoving herself up onto her feet, Shepard wobbled for a moment, then set up a halting pacing pattern, limping down the bed as far as she could, supporting herself hand over hand down the railing. “I don’t know. I just … I need to remember. Having bits and pieces appear here and there … it’s making me crazy.”

“Sit down,” Miranda said. “You’re mentally exhausted. Compounding it with physical exhaustion won’t improve anything.”

Shepard just paced to the other end of the bed. “I need to keep moving, to drive myself to heal so I can get the hell out of here. You don’t heal lying around …” she slowed, the words stuttering to a halt as they slid over her tongue, their taste familiar.

Large, strong hands looped under her arms, hauling her up out of a stretch and set her on her feet. “Are you sure you should even be out of bed yet?” a familiar voice asked, amusement threading through the rumble of treacle and smoke. Sweet shivers danced along her every nerve ending.

She pushed aside the reaction and twisted at the waist, stretching out her sides. She hurt like hell just about everywhere. “Yep. Don’t heal lying around a medbay.” She twisted the other way without looking at him. Look at him, dammit! “So, our prothean expert is on Therum?”

“… a medbay.” Stumbling to a halt, she clung to the railing, her knees shaking.

Miranda activated her omnitool. “Shepard, sit down.” She tapped the interface, then glanced up. “Or is standing there shaking helping in some way I can’t see?” Turning back to her work, she shook her head and pressed a control. “You’ll remember everything in time. As I’ve explained, those neurons just need to be replaced and then triggered. The data is all there.”

Shepard turned and sank onto the mattress. “I know I sound like a six year old getting homesick on her first sleepover, but I want to go the fuck home.” She braced herself again, and as she spoke, she felt like the words whispered out, slow and slurred, drifting from a distance. “I just want to go home before I miss anything else.”

The door opened, and Liara peeked through, an earnest blue face and an elongated shadow. “May I come in?” she asked. “Sorry. I heard what you were talking about and couldn’t help but think I might be some help.” She shrugged, an almost comical pop of her slender shoulders.

Shepard nodded her head toward Miranda’s chair. “Come in, sit down. Miranda was just leaving.”

The operative let out sharp breath and unfolded gracefully from the chair. “Very well, but Dr. T’Soni, please remember what we spoke about. We brought you here to assist with the reclamation of pertinent memory. Cognitive, leadership, and problem solving skill sets are paramount. Combat, operational, and technical skills are secondary. Personal memories are not a priority at this time. We need Captain Jane Shepard, hero of the Citadel, and soon.” She strode to the door. “The galaxy will not wait for you to sort out your personal life, Shepard.”

“She’s intense.” the asari said, once the door closed. She edged around the bed as if she expected Shepard to erupt off the mattress and attack her. “Are you feeling better?” She sat and balanced a large, covered mug on her knee.

Shepard nodded and focused on the asari’s big, limpid blue eyes. “Yeah, whatever.” A thousand questions burst in her head, tiny novas, none of which wore labels of cognitive processing or decision making.

She jumped up and paced to the port. Leaning against the ledge, she stared out at the black. “So, you’re here to poke around in my head some more? Make sure there aren’t pieces missing everywhere?”

Liara held out the mug. “Here, I thought you might like this. It looks as though they don’t feed you here.”

“They try. Just haven’t had much of an appetite.” She turned to look over her shoulder, sniffing suspiciously even though she had no hope of being able to tell through a lid from that distance. “What is it?”

Huh, maybe you can. It’s hot chocolate.

“Hot chocolate, extra sugar, extra creamer,” Liara said, stretching her arm out a little further, sort of poking the cup at Shepard. Her face brightened, glowing like a child’s on Mother’s Day, their gift of a hard-battled-for tray of burnt toast and half-raw eggs clutched in eager hands.

Shepard scowled and shook her head. “Thanks, but I don’t touch the stuff. Too sweet.” Glancing up, she saw Liara’s face fall. Damn. The expression lasted only a second, but it spoke volumes in that second. “That’s wrong, isn’t it? When we knew one another, I drank it this way?”

Liara’s lips pressed together for a moment, but then she shrugged. “Doesn’t matter.” A thin smile evolved out of the tight-lipped grimace, failing nearly as quickly as it formed. “Miranda filled me in on everything, and if all you’ve lost is your sweet tooth, I think we can consider ourselves incredibly blessed.”

Shepard hobbled back to the bed and sat, reaching out to take the mug. Closing both hands around it, she savoured the heat as it warmed and soothed the ache in her palms. “Anyway, thanks for thinking of it.” She stared down at the hot chocolate, taking an absent sip after about thirty seconds of silence. Oh yeah, so sweet. Her jaw screamed, clanging like she had a gong lodged in the joint. When the clamour settled a little, she stretched her jaw out then asked, “Miranda filled you in? On everything?”

“Yes. I didn’t understand most of what she showed me about the project itself, but the scans of your head and spinal column said pretty much all I needed to know. That assassin blew your brains out, Shepard.” The asari flushed and winced. “Sorry.” Ducking her head in an embarrassed sort of shrug, she soldiered on, “It’s amazing they were able to bring you back from that. I still can’t quite believe it. We thought we’d lost you.”

Pushing herself up a little, Shepard bristled. “You did, Liara. I died.” She took a long draught off the mug, her jaw remaining silent that time. “I didn’t ask for any of this. Whoever these people are, they graverobbed my body and did this to me.” She flung out her arms, stabbing at the air. “Look at me! I’m a fucking monster.”

Liara shrank back, her eyes glistening almost the exact shade of the water on Virmire.

Shepard turned to face the black waters of the sea as she raised her hand to her ear. A storm broiled just off the coast. She hoped it didn’t hit land until nothing remained of Saren’s base other than ash and smoke. “Brother Sparky, move the shuttle into the camp, and then I need to see you and Ash.”

“Yes, ma’am.” A moment later, the shuttle lifted out of the water and soared over her head.

Shepard looked back out at the sea, watching thunderheads roll over the waves. The water under her feet shimmered in the patchy sunlight, the minerals turning it a vibrant blue.
“Virmire’s a beautiful place,” she said, looking back to the salarian camp. “Shame we won’t have time to enjoy it.”

Liara’s voice snagged Shepard, dragging her out of the memory. “I think you’re one of the most beautiful sights I’ve ever seen, Shepard. And … “ As Shepard stared at her, lost and trying to catch up, she looked down, then glanced toward the door and back before continuing, “… I know there are others who will feel the same way.” A watery smile accompanied the first of Liara’s tears as they broke loose and rolled down her face. “You’ve really been missed. Anderson … .”

Shepard grinned. “How is he? Is he all right? Miranda won’t even let me call him.”

“He’s fine.” Liara shrugged. “Still commanding the Normandy. Still fighting the good fight.” Her hands wrung a little in her lap. “He took your death hard.” A soft shrug rippled across her shoulders as she met Shepard’s eyes. “It’s best he doesn’t know before he can see you. It would be too cruel otherwise, leaving him doubting … wondering if you were some sort of trick.”

She hadn’t thought of that, and the asari was right. If she contacted Anderson, half of him would need to see her, the other half would try to convince him that she was some sort of Reaper trick.

Shepard squirmed a little as a long, awkward silence stretched between them. She hadn’t known Liara well enough to make small talk or even knowledgeable inquiries about her life. Well, most of it.

“How are things going? You and Aethyta getting along? Did Shiala make it to Thessia?” she asked, casting a quick, sideways glance at the cameras. Who knew how much Miranda would allow Liara to say.

“It’s been overwhelming,” Liara replied, “but with Aethyta and Shiala’s help, I’ve really been able to provide Archangel with solid intel and resources.”

The intercom crackled.

“Subtle, Miranda,” Shepard called without turning toward the camera again. “Archangel?”

“It’s a growing force—a fleet and soldiers—created to fight the Rea—”

“Dr. T’Soni!” Miranda’s voice barked from the speaker with enough volume to echo back. “Do not make me regret bringing you here.”

“My apologies,” Liara replied, her spine stiffening. “I assumed that an organization widely known throughout the galaxy might be safe to mention.” Something in the glare the asari shot at the camera said she was lying. She’d been trying to slip Shepard information, the captain felt sure of it.

“They don’t let me watch the news,” Shepard told her, “I need to be kept ignorant and mindless.” She shrugged and lifted her hands to indicate the room. “In fact, this is my first day outside of the maximum security wing.” Raising her voice to include Miranda, she continued, “So we’ll discuss boring shit, like the weather … oh wait, that’s probably classified as well. Who knows what could happen if I discover it’s raining in Calgary or partially cloudy over Armali.”

The bitter helplessness of being caged shoved Shepard up off the bed. She winced, her mug dropping from numb fingers, as all the splits and canyons in her skin stretched and tore, but she just fed the screams into the fire. Grinding her teeth, she hobbled down the bed to lean heavily against the desk standing at the foot. After sucking a couple long, seething breaths through a clenched jaw, she shook her head, the frustration and helplessness adding starch to the thick soup boiling her guts.
“Shepard?” Liara called, her voice soft. “Are you all right?”

“I’m losing my fucking mind, Liara. After about the time I became an N5, my entire life dissolves into these little snips of memory, moments with no context ... nothing to tie them together. And I’m trapped in this corpse like a caged tiger in some backwater batarian menagerie.”

She spun, clearing the desk with a single sweep of her arm, then slammed her fists down into the top, leaning against it. “You ever see what happens to those tigers? They pace for the first couple of years, endless circles around their cages. Then they stop caring and just lie around. The keepers have to force them to eat.” She let her head hang from her shoulders, but looked up to stare into the camera. “Eventually, they just lose their minds and start plucking all their own fur out, chewing on their legs and tails.”

Liara appeared at Shepard’s elbow, startling her.

Shepard spun, coming face to face with eyes so black they looked like sinkholes, disappearing into a bottomless emptiness. “Liara? Wha … ?”

“I’ll help,” the asari said. Shepard felt a sensation behind her eyes … it felt … not unlike fingers flipping through a cardfile. Liara smiled and nodded. “I agree with Miranda that we have to be cautious, but I’m here to help. We’ll get it all pieced back together.”

“Shepard, you need to calm down,” Miranda said over the intercom, breaking the connection. “Sit down and relax.”

Shepard glanced back up at the camera. The image of the operative sitting behind her monitors, tap tapping on her omnitool, twisted Shepard’s mouth into a sardonic grimace. Still, she let out a long sigh and straightened.

“Thanks Liara.” She patted the young woman’s arm and hobbled back to her bed. She sat, letting the silence settle, heavy and thick before she reached down for her discarded hot chocolate and gulped down a couple of mouthfuls.

Keep it locked up, Janey. You’ve let Liara shake you. They won’t let you out of here unless they believe that you’re firing on all cylinders.

Right. Locked up. Sending a sly smile and a wink Liara’s direction, Shepard changed the subject. “This organization must have offered you a small moon for you to leave your private island on Thessia.”

“Actually, I was baited into a trap,” Liara said, a nervous chuckle scarcely forming before it died. “An old contact said he’d obtained the location of an undiscovered Prothean ruin. When I arrived at the meeting, Miranda and a small squad of goons put guns to my head and gave me a choice. I could either come with them and be well rewarded for my cooperation or I could go about my business and forget I’d ever seen them.” She chuckled again, but Shepard heard a real tremor of fear running beneath that one.

Shepard’s left eyebrow lifted toward her hairline. The whole intrepid adventurer, taking risky, secret missions at gunpoint really didn’t seem like the young woman’s speed. “And you chose to come?”

Liara shrugged, blushing a little across her nose and cheeks. “They promised me that I’d see something I very much wanted to see, and that my work would be vital to the war effort against the Reapers.” She reached out to grip Shepard’s hands. “I guess they were right.” A wicked grin grew under the innocence. “But, I do have half a floor a few levels up. You would not believe the tech … it’s amazing. I don’t know who Miranda works for, but they’re insanely well funded.”

Liara gave Shepard’s hands a squeeze then released her and stood, pacing to the large port. “But if I’d known that the secret was that they’d brought you back, I would’ve come if they offered me a closet with a terminal.” She stared out. “I can’t believe it. Even after seeing the logs and data … I just … . How?”

Shepard shrugged, her head lowering to hang heavy and limp. “I don’t know. I was dead for most of it.” Exhaustion pressed a massive hand on the back of her neck. She took another drink, appreciating the thick, rich hit of sugar that time.

And there it is, Janey. Poor man’s drug of choice. Or maybe it’s the safe drug of choice?

She raised her head just far enough to look at the camera. “I’m tired. Can you run the regen field while I take a nap?” Not waiting for a reply she knew wouldn’t come until Miranda appeared in her room, Shepard gave Liara a weary smile. “Would you join me for dinner in the cafeteria when I wake up? Hopefully by then I’m feeling up to walking down and back.”

“Of course, Shepard. We can eat in between tripping over all the things I’m not allowed to talk about.” Liara walked over and held out her hand. “I can take the hot chocolate.”

Shepard looked down at the mug. “Actually, leave it. It’s growing on me.” She reached out, snagging Liara’s fingers in a light grip. “I am glad to see you, Liara, even if it doesn’t seem like it.”

The asari nodded and smiled. “I’ll be expecting your call.” She turned and strode to the door.

Shepard shook her head and slid off the side of the bed. The asari always glided as though on the main runway during a fashion show, even Liara, and she’d spent all her time in holes in the ground digging up bones and fifty thousand year old garbage.

Shepard grinned, remembering her mother’s lack of patience with the tomboy who’d sprung from her womb walking like a linebacker, talking like a sailor, and sporting a stubborn streak a half-klick wide.

I swear to the sweet baby Jesus sitting by His holy Father’s side in the heavens above, Jane Gwendolyn Shepard, you are going to be the death of me. How did you get those shiners? Have you been fighting again?

When the door closed behind Liara, Shepard stood long enough to pull back her blankets, then lay down on her side, back to the wall. Truth be told, even though exhausted, she wanted time alone to pry at the weak spots appearing in that starched white sheet that hid her life. Remembering even a little of Virmire felt like a massive victory, and maybe, just maybe, Liara had softened things up a bit.

“I just have to keep hammering at the wall until I break it down,” she grumbled to herself and closed her eyes.

“Don’t worry,” a deep, flanged voice said from behind her, “talking to yourself becomes standard as a guest of this organization.”

A shriek ripped from Shepard’s throat as she leaped almost straight up off the mattress, heart hammering in her chest. Rolling over, she slid out of bed, barely managing to land on her feet.

Fully expecting to find someone crouched next to the bed, she staggered into a wobbly fighting stance. No one. Rather than feeling reassured by facing a blank wall, ice cold talons grabbed hold of her brain and twisted. Dizzy, she fell forward, catching herself on the mattress. She shoved herself back up onto her feet. “Hello?” Surely she’d actually heard the voice: deep, male, and flanged but also coarse and cracked as if each word cost him a premium of pain.

“Oh, don’t worry, I’m real.” An almost metallic chuckle followed. “At least I think I’m still real. Enough parts and pieces remaining.” A sound halfway between a sigh and a keen drifted up over her mattress, sorrowful resignation calming her fear. “The air vent,” the voice said. “I’m in the cell next to yours.”

Shepard lay down on her front and wriggled closer to the vent. Ducking down, she peered through the slats. On the other side, a pair of dull, almost milky blue eyes watched her from under a low-slung hood. Shadows clung too close and thick to make out any of his features other than his eyes. Those eyes … they looked a thousand years old. She scowled. “You can see in here.”

She glanced back over her shoulder. “Oh God, you can see in here. Please tell me you weren’t watching me sleep earlier.” Scrambling backwards, she grabbed her blankets and pulled them up in front of her, feeling naked despite the thick shirt and trousers. “Thank god I haven’t changed clothes outside the bathroom.”

“I did consider it good form to introduce myself at the earliest possible chance,” he said. “As for watching you sleep … no. You snore with enough volume that I couldn’t concentrate on my reading.” He let out a very familiar sort of wry chuff. “I piled my pillows and blankets over the vent in a vain attempt to muffle the roar.” A long sigh drifted through, the vent giving it a metallic, baffled sound. “I have no desire to peer at you through here like some sort of lecherous old deviant. I’ve … I’ve just been alone in here for a long time. I wasn’t sure I could still use my voice for anything other than screaming.”

Shepard lay face down on the mattress again and scooted a little closer so that she could just see those dull, beaten down looking eyes. “How long have you been here?” she asked, her voice scratching through still-paralyzed airways.

The pale stare turned away. “I’m not sure any more. There’s no night and day here other than their schedule. Drugs … food arrives … more drugs … they drag me off to their labs, when I return the room is clean … more drugs … food arrives … repeat.” He looked back. “More than a year anyway.”

She scowled, all her earlier fear turning into outrage and sorrow. “They’ve held you here for more than a year, experimenting on you the whole time? Fuck.” A heavy, throbbing headache burrowed in behind her eyes. What the hell? Who were these monsters? Horror and disbelief rampaged through her head, tangling into a dizzy, nauseating maelstrom. “I … sweet baby Jesus … are you in pain?” she asked, giving voice to the only question that managed to untangle itself from the mess.

“Some. It’s worse after one of their little war games and they strip all their tech out of me to analyze it. They haven’t done that for a couple of weeks. But there’s the drugs. They keep me pretty doped up most of the time.” He chuckled, a sound like rock crushing glass … Shepard didn’t think she’d ever heard a sound that tipped so close to madness.

“Tried to die a few times,” he continued, “but you know first hand how well that goes.”

Shepard scooted all the way forward and reached out, pressing her hand to the grate. “You probably already know this, but I’m Jane … Jane Shepard. What’s your name?”
He stared at her hand for a second, then looked back to her eyes. Talons swept down his face, moving the hood enough to reveal terrible rents in the side of his face as if chunks of it had been carved away. “I don’t know.” When his hand dropped, the hood rippled in slight wave that she translated as a shrug. “I know they picked up my body off the Citadel.” His eyes narrowed. “I remember fighting, krogan everywhere. Then I woke up on their ship. They brought me here, and this is the first anyone has actually spoken to me since then.”

“You fought on the Citadel? That was nearly two years ago.” She pulled her hand back, balled it into a fist and rested her chin on it. “Damn.” Shaking her head, she looked up at the camera. “I don’t know who the hell these people are or what organization they work for, but I don’t understand how they can get away with this. Someone needs to plant a few bombs and blow this entire place into molecules if this is the sort of shit they do here.”

The hood rippled again then he looked away. “They do love their experiments. I’ve had so much of me taken out, cut away, replaced by tech that gets replaced by more tech.” A bitter grunt splintered in his throat. “How much of someone do you think can be replaced by machine before you just stop being a person? Maybe I have become property.”

“Every last inch except your soul,” she said, practically growling at the resignation and defeat in his voice. “You never let them take that.”

The thin strips of light flickered off a twitched mandible. “I can see why they find you so frustrating. You’ve got a lot of fight in you.” That chuckle again. “I heard you call your project head by the name Frankenstein and looked it up. It suits her … all of mine as well.”

Wait, he’d looked something up? “You can access the extranet?” Hope bloomed bright and hot in her chest. Had they bunked her next to a means of escape?

“No.” Hope crashed and burned. “They gave me a library to keep me occupied. Two years, you said?” He turned away, paused and then whispered. “My drugs have arrived. They like to keep me … what is that human phrase I read? … stoned out of my gourd while I’m not pit fighting.” He chuckled again, the sound as torn up and raw as his face. Damn, he teetered so close to the precipice. It wouldn’t even take a push to send him sliding into the void.

Shepard’s door opened. Not bothering to cover the fact she’d been talking to the prisoner next door, she glanced back at Miranda. “You people are fucking diabolical.” She turned around, sitting cross-legged in the middle of her bed. “How can you let shit like that … ” She hooked her thumb toward the vent. “… go on? You make me sick.”

The operative activated her omnitool. “I see you’ve met Specimen Alpha.”

The fury exploded behind Shepard’s eyes, short-circuiting her brain so that when she opened her mouth, only stuttering came out for a good ten seconds. “Oh my fucking sweet bloody baby Jesus, you did not just call that torin a specimen.”

Miranda sighed as she tapped the haptic interface, starting the regen field. “According to Alliance law, deceased specimens may be reanimated and implanted—”

Shepard leapt up, slamming into Miranda with enough force to throw the woman back. The operative tripped over the chair, sitting down hard.

“Get out!” Grabbing two handfuls of leather, Shepard propelled Miranda to the door, her anger providing a strength and surefootedness that surprised her … and apparently Miranda as well because the woman just stumbled along without resisting. “Get the fuck out of my room.”
Reanimated specimens?” She opened the door and threw Miranda into the hallway. “Is that what I am? A fucking reanimated specimen?”

“Shepard!” Miranda pinwheeled her arms as she half-slid, half-ran a couple of metres. Making a speedy recovery, she let out a huff of breath and smoothed down her catsuit. “That’s not what I meant.” She held out her hands, a placating gesture, and took a halting step forward. “I don’t know anything about Specimen Alpha other than his designation and that he’s quartered next door. I can’t comment on another department’s—”

“Experiments? Lab rats? Torture victims?” She stepped back and began to close the door. “Must be nice to be able to compartmentalize like that. Makes it really easy on the conscience.”

“Shepard … .” Miranda tapped the display on her omnitool. “Shepard, I’ll look into it, all right? If Speci … if he is being mistreated, I will take it to my employer. For now, get some sleep.” She keyed in a command, then flicked it off.

Shepard just shut the door, stormed back to her bed and threw herself down on the mattress. Specimen Alpha leaned propped up against the vent, his eyes half-closed, a low, almost sobbing moan trembling under his every breath.

“If I needed a reason to bust out of this place, big fella … you just gave it to me.” She pressed her fingers to the vent, and blinked back her tears. He didn’t need them. He needed her to be tough, to get herself back to one hundred percent, and to get them the hell out of there.
Chapter Summary

Why can't the galaxy ever give a general a chance to heal before it goes to hell in a handcart?

17 Days ASR

“Have a good morning, General,” Marcie called as Garrus pushed up from the table.

He cast a baleful glare her way. A good morning? Right. After being ambushed by an overzealous house matron, Dr. Chakwas, and enough food to feed three growing juveniles, he doubted very much the agony in his barely healed and over-distended stomach would fade before mid-afternoon. He wrapped an arm around his middle to provide support and traction, then limped toward the elevator.

_Aid my healing. Right. How does eating until I feel like my entire digestive tract is going to explode aid my healing?_

Garrus pushed his way against the early morning crowd, trying to clear a path to the stairs. Not an easy task through the starving throng. He stopped at the end of the counter and looked over the common room. A faint smile greeted the groan of dismay from the crowd as he blocked the chow line. Never, in Archangel’s two cycles had he seen so many people stuffed into the small space.

“Where did all these recruits come from?” he asked out loud. “I thought we rejected cloning as a means of recruiting.”

Martin appeared at his elbow, a huge grin on his face. “Well, some of them are thanks to Zaeed. He took out the late Donovan Hock’s second in command last week, and … um … “ He cleared his throat. “… encouraged the entire organization to join up.”

“Excuse me, sir?” a human woman called from Garrus’s left. “My first class starts in twenty minutes.” She shrugged and grinned. “Unless you’re willing to write us all late passes?”

“As you were, cadet.” He gave her a quick wink, appreciating her casual pluck, and stepped out of the way. “That’s far more paperwork than I intend to do today.” Setting out for the stairs, he shook his head. “Hock’s people can’t account for this. We’re going to have to open building three and hire more instructors.”

“The rest are Talons.” He met Garrus’s incredulous stare with a nod. “Apparently they experienced a change in leadership, and she sent them all here.”

Garrus set out for the elevator, moving a little faster and more desperately every second. The press of bodies all pushing in different directions felt a little too out of control. So many bodies. Too many to easily see an incoming threat. A fist hammered at the inside of his keel while talons latched onto his head, a crushing grip that sank through plate and bone. Office. He needed to get to his office and quiet. He had a massive list of things he needed to deal with before shipping out for the Citadel and Tuchanka.
Stay focused on the work, Vakarian. Just stay focused on the work.

As he pushed through to the bottom of the stairs, his elbow clipped a large human recruit, sending the man stumbling. He turned to steady the cadet, taking note that the man had yet to exchange his merc armour for the Archangel uniform. It belonged to a small organization Archangel wiped out a month earlier. Most of the merc’s co-workers chose to die rather than surrender.

“Sorry—” Garrus said and reached out to help him regain his footing.

“Watch where you’re fucking going, bloody bird.” The man threw off Garrus’s hand, shoving him away. “Fucking base is full of you bastards … think you bloody own the place.”

A streak of movement and fury tore past Garrus’s elbow. Martin grabbed the merc by the throat and slammed him against the wall, one frame-gauntleted hand crushing the armour at the man’s throat. Garrus grabbed the pauldron of the kid’s armour.

Glaring up with enough rage to drain all the blood from his captive’s face, practically growling, Martin said, “That bird does own the place.” He let the merc slide down the wall enough to make direct eye contact. “When this organization wiped out the rest of your useless merc band, he made you an offer, gave you a place to work and call home, and this is how you thank him? By demeaning everyone, especially the humans, with your racial shit?”

Grey and trembling, the man patted Martin’s arm, an ineffectual, placating gesture. “N … no, s … sir. My apologies, General V … Vakarian, sir. I’m sorry. I spoke without thinking.”

“General!” the rough brogue of the cavalry shouted over the ambient racket. Garrus threw a glance over his shoulder at Butler—the wiry man shoving his way through the crowd with much less finesse, but also much less offence than Garrus had managed—before focusing back on Martin. He gripped the kid’s shoulder, easing him back. “Put him down. I can take it from here.”

The general stared into the merc’s gasping face, meeting and holding his watery, bloodshot stare for a moment before he turned to Butler. “Instructor Butler,” he called, making sure his voice would project all the way to the kitchen. “It seems that we have recruited a cadet who does not appreciate the racial diversity of this organization. I’m sure you’ll discover several inventive ways to educate him in the benefits of cooperation and respect.”

Gabe clamped down on the armour at the merc’s neck and dragged him off a couple of meters before calling back. “Hierarch Vakarian was looking for you, and Sidonis is on hold on the QEC.” He shrugged when Garrus raised a brow plate in query. “Must be important, but he wouldn’t say why.”

“Tell my pari I’m headed for my office. I’ve got a couple weeks of catching up to get done in six hours.” He spun on his talons and strode for the elevator, his path clearing as if by some magical means. Throwing recruits around the place: the new magic. His mandibles gave a hard, ironic flick. Why hadn’t he thought to use it sooner? “He can catch up with me there.”

“Will do, General.”

“Your kit packed?” Garrus asked, stepping into the elevator just ahead of Martin. As the doors closed, he hit the control.

“Already on my bunk aboard the Passch,” Martin confirmed, moving up to block the door. The kid had appointed himself Garrus’s bodyguard the moment the general emerged from medbay.

“I’ve scheduled the department head briefing in the main QEC for 0930. The leader of the Talons asked to meet with you as soon as you were back to work. Do you want me to try to get her in before we leave?”

Garrus frowned and leaned back against the wall. He didn’t know how to feel about their sudden wealth of recruits. A major merc operation like the Talons asking to be absorbed into Archangel … it sent up flares. “Yeah, give us at least a half hour block of time. I want to make sure we aren’t bringing the enemy into the fold en masse before I leave.”

Garrus’s scowl darkened. “How long have the Talons been here? Are they integrating? Behaving themselves?”

Martin nodded and twisted to look back, his eyebrows climbing. “Yeah, actually. Their instructors and roommates—because it’s crowded as fuck in the dorms—report that they’re eager to learn and friendly.” He shrugged, then turned back to the door as the elevator chimed their arrival. “Apparently their boss is very into the whole protector of the weak and helpless thing.”

“A gang leader?” Garrus scowled. “On Omega?”

The doors opened, leaving Martin only enough time to shrug before he pushed out first, braced as if he expected to take fire. Garrus just grimaced and shook his head. As much as he appreciated the young man’s worry, having a constant bodyguard wore thin.

“Garrus, you’re going to mother-hen me to death.”

He nodded at the frustration laced through Shepard’s voice, comprehension dawning.

A cluster of engineering staff blocked most of the corridor just outside the main lab. Members of just about every department stood around wearing expressions of almost morbid curiosity as they conferred in low tones about the work going on within. Garrus stepped around them, pausing to watch the geth who bustled around Legion’s platform. Most of the geth salvaged from Daro’Xen’s nightmare had chosen to upload back to Rannoch, but Legion insisted on its platform being repaired as close to original specs as possible. Although slow, delicate work, the geth and Archangel engineers had made solid headway. The geth had expressed confusion about Legion’s choice, but Garrus couldn’t help thinking that the programs identifying with their platform was a good thing. Perhaps a first step toward a visceral comprehension of the mortality faced by the rest of the galaxy.

“All right people,” Garrus called over the murmured conversation, “if you can help put Legion back together, walk through the door and volunteer. Everyone else, get back to your own projects. The Reapers aren’t standing around gossiping.” He waited until the crowd dispersed then continued down the corridor to his office.

“They could be,” Martin said, a wide grin answering Garrus’s glare as the kid ran ahead to get the door.

“Answer that damned QEC,” Vortash said, his surly snarl greeting the general even before he made it over the threshold. “It pings every five seconds. I don’t want to kill whoever it is, but I will.” The batarian held out a handful of datapads. “Operations sent these down. They need to be approved before you leave. The aeronautics division has asked for a meeting to discuss the design changes needed to offset the security leaks and stolen vehicles.”

He held out a second stack of datapads. “Everything needed to get building three operational so we can peel some of these recruits out of our ass cracks. Fifteen hundred new bodies … we’re going to collapse under the weight without the new building.”
“And a fine good morning to you.” Garrus scowled at the stack. “Didn’t I create Operations to avoid doing most of these tasks?” He nodded for Martin to grab the datapads, then brushed past. “When my pari arrives, send him in.”

“The guards downstairs called again,” the batarian bellowed through the closing door. “She’s insisting on talking to you. And the admiralty board called wanting to discuss her storage.”

Garrus whirled around, one hand slapping against the door to stop it from shutting. “Her what?”

Vortash shrugged, looking back to his computer. “Their word, not mine.”

“Storage,” Martin grumbled. “Only one place to store that lunatic; in the center of a star.”

Garrus nodded his agreement as he turned toward his desk. The admiralty board would have to figure out what to do with their own monster. He didn’t have to facilities or personnel to maintain a long term prisoner. He froze halfway around, his eyes locking onto his galaxy map. During the weeks he’d been missing or convalescing, four red dots had multiplied to seven.

“Is this right?” he shouted over his shoulder.

The door opened, Vortash sticking his head through. “Is what right?” When Garrus stabbed a talon toward the map, the batarian nodded. “Yeah, afraid it is. And yes, still all human colonies.” He nodded toward the door to Garrus’s QEC comm room as a sharp chime rang out. “Might be why that fucking thing keeps pinging.”

“Right.” He stared at the map for another couple of seconds, then dragged himself away. The map didn’t have any answers, just more questions. “Just drop the datapads on the desk, Martin. Then go drag Nihlus out of bed, get him to Mordin, and then fed. I need him at the department briefing.”

“I’ll do my best, but when I went in earlier, he just threw dirty laundry at me until I left.” The kid set down his burden. “I’m not sure Nihlus is going to bounce back from this one, General.”

“Giving up on him ensures that he doesn’t, so that’s the last I want to hear of that.” Garrus entered his security code to his QEC, tossing his words over his shoulder far more casually than he felt. As much as he agreed that being turned into a lab animal may have broken Nihlus, he needed to deny it. He had no other choice ... for his own sake. “Do whatever you have to, but get him up and to that meeting.”

Without waiting to hear any more, he stepped through the door, meeting Martin’s stare with one that clearly said, ‘Just get it done’, as it closed behind him. He locked it then turned and stepped up to the console. Three calls awaited his arrival.

“Garrus, finally. Thank the spirits,” Sidonis snapped the moment his hologram appeared. “Our Enoch shipyard has been destroyed and two more frigates have disappeared.” He lunged toward the console. “In addition, there have been reports of movement in Satent and Nirada, too damned close to our weapon testing grounds. We can’t afford to lose the Zaherin facility.”

Garrus waited for the torin to stutter to a stop before trying to get a word in. “Any clues as to who or how?” he asked. No doubt the same people responsible for Haestrom. So, definitely not Daro’Xen and definitely not a random strike by pirates.

“No clues except those orbs seeded throughout the building. We didn’t take any chances and just blew the crap out of them.” Sidonis shuddered, very obviously shaken to the core. “If I never have to face down another one of those things, it’ll be too damned soon.” His subvocals broadcast the truth behind that statement, but then calm passed over his features as he policed up his emotions.
“Someone is trying to tear Archangel apart, General, and whoever they are, they’re as good as invisible. If we don’t provide our divisions with better security, they’re going to succeed.”

“Understood, Sidonis. Contact each facility, full security status reports. I want to know if any of them feel threatened. I want their estimates on what it will take both personnel and ship-wise to make their station secure.” He paused, letting his brain run the variables for a moment. “And I want your recommendation as to which bases are the weakest. We can’t wait for these bastards to come after us, we have to take the fight to them.” He reached for the interface. “Have all that ready for 0930.”

Sidonis saluted. “Yes, sir. Sidonis out.”

Leaving the waiting calls on hold, Garrus reached up to his radio and opened a channel to the Biolab. “Mordin? What’s the word on those orbs taken off the Haestrom shipyard?”

“General,” the salarian replied. “Believe objects to be probes allowing for remote observation and control of indoctrinated subjects. Hypothesise that orbs relay indoctrination signal from host, likely Reapers. Require further testing to confirm hypothesis. Risky. Participants subject to indoctrination, brain damage, possible violent or self-destructive behaviour.”

If the orbs just relayed the indoctrination signal, they might be able to trace an origin. “What do you need to get us some real answers on this?” he demanded. “We can guess at what they are all we want, but these damned things keep showing up in our facilities, and our people keep disappearing. I think some risks are warranted here.”

“Best chance for answers to isolate indoctrinated subjects with orb, monitor for energy fluctuations, transmissions.”

Garrus turned his stare to the floor. “We have a limited pool of people who have already been exposed to the orbs. Call them in and see if they’ll volunteer. I won’t force anyone to endure that against their will. Full security and containment precautions.”

“Understood, General. Will transmit protocols to Passchendaele for approval when prepared.”

“Send them to Dr. Chakwas as well.” Garrus paced the few metres to the door and then back to the console. “Any theories as to why Martin isn’t affected by the orbs?” The kid had strolled onto the base, disabled or shielded the orbs and rescued the squad without showing any symptoms.

“Likely due to indoctrination signal being relayed using light frequencies. Mr. Weaver’s prosthetics intercept and translate all incoming wavelengths.” Mordin paused, and Garrus could just about hear the gears spinning up. “Yes. Yes. Need to devise means of analyzing filtering system. Prosthetics may eliminate indoctrination signal as junk data. Could lead to optical defense measures.” The scientist’s voice increased in both volume and pitch, his words coming faster and faster until Garrus could barely understand him. Then he went silent. “Mr. Weaver accompanying you to Citadel? Tuchanka?”

“He is.” Garrus grinned at the silence that followed. “I’ll have him report to you after the department briefing.” He reached up to close the channel. “You’ll be attending, I trust?”

“I will. Solus out.”

Garrus checked the identity of his next call, letting out a relieved sigh as he hit the control and Tali appeared before him.

“Garrus, thank the ancestors,” the young quarian said. She stared at him for a few seconds before her shoulders dropped. “You’re all right?”

He nodded. “As all right as can be expected.” He jutted his chin toward her image. “How about you? Things settling down on Rannoch?”

“Yes. The geth have returned to the village and to our suits.” She giggled. “It was really amazing, actually … seeing everyone reunite. They missed each other. It’s a good sign for the future. I wished you’d been here.”

He nodded and forced a smile. “Yeah, me too.”

For the next few minutes, she brought him up to date on the quarian return to their home world. Apparently, the migrant fleet had returned to the system as well and, despite a rigid defensive posture, was sending survey and biological/environmental expeditions to the surface. Garrus signed off, shaking his head. Maybe, in all her insanity, Daro’Xen had actually accelerated the repatriation of her people rather than halting it.

He connected the last call, wincing a little as Melanis appeared on the pad. He didn’t give the asari time to speak. “I see we’ve lost another three colonies since I left for Rannoch.”

The asari looked down, as if the disappearing humans were somehow her fault. “They’re getting bolder. Arvuna and New Canton we had good lead times, and still nothing but a ghost town awaited when we arrived. We’re spread out too much to do anything even if we did catch them at it, General. The numbers or tech they have to possess to remove millions of people in a few hours … how are a couple of frigates and a platoon of soldiers supposed to stop them?”

He stiffened. “You’re not. That’s not why we’re out there, Melanis. We’re trying to discover what is happening to the humans. I’ve always known we’re going to need a fleet to bring them down. Spirits, ships large enough to take all those humans … ” He let out a breath and relaxed into parade rest. “You can return to base. I’ll be sending Nihlus back out this afternoon, and I need you here. We just had nearly fifteen hundred recruits land in our laps. I need them trained and equipped and out guarding Archangel holdings.” He stepped up to the console. “Department briefing in about forty minutes. Be on your way back.”

He heard the door open behind him. Damn, Martin was getting too good at bypassing.

She saluted. “Yes, sir.” She winked and lifted a hand. “Hey kid.”

“Hey, Melanis.” Martin hung back by the door until Garrus hung up the call. “The Talon leader is in your office.”

Garrus turned and let out a long breath as he sagged back against the console. His chest ached and the long incisions around his thighs burned. He swore he could feel every screw and rivet Dr. Chakwas had embedded into his bones to reinforce them while they healed. Maybe she’d been right and it was too soon. Not that the galaxy cared. It didn’t put a pin in going to hell until Garrus Vakarian felt up to fixing every single fucking thing.

“You look like hell, General.”

Nodding, Garrus pushed off the QEC. “You got Nihlus up?”

“Yep. I just needed to say that three more colonies had disappeared, and he dragged himself into the shower on his own.” Martin leaned back against the door. “Pretty sure Mordin replaced most of Nihlus’s blood with Oxhydran, but he’s sober and in the kitchen trying to keep food down.” Meeting Garrus’s gaze with an expression that spoke to the depth of his feelings for the Spectre as well as the depth of his worry, he said, “He can’t take too many more hits, Garrus. What happened to the two of you … .” He looked away, his hands doing a little helpless flip at the ends of his arms as he swallowed hard. “It would do me in.”

Garrus stepped up and laid his hand on Martin’s shoulder. “You’ve been through hell too, kid, and you came out strong.” He took a deep breath. “All right, enough wallowing, let’s go meet this Talon leader and see what the deal is.” He palmed the door control. “Nice work hacking your way through. I’m going to have to start layering the encryption.”

Martin laughed and cocked his head, swaggering a little as he brushed past Garrus to enter the office first. “You can try, old man. I’m too fast for you.”

“Not sure if that’s comforting or not,” a smooth, feminine voice said. The subvocals ran deep, baritone, and amused.

Garrus stepped through the door then stopped so suddenly that his talons caught on the door track. Standing on the other side of the desk, a female turian stared at him, her mandibles drifting out a bit before giving an amused flutter.

“General Vakarian?” she asked, her brow plates lifting a little when he just gawked at her.

He shook himself, and stepped forward, his head ducking a little by way of apology. “I’m sorry, when they told me the leader of the Talons wanted to meet with me, I didn’t think it was going to be a Kandros.” He forced himself to stop staring into her remarkable light gold-green eyes, and stabbed an awkward hand at the closest chair. “Sit, please.” He took a couple of steps toward the desk. “It’s Nyreen, correct? You were two cycles behind me at the academy.”

Martin stepped up and offered his hand. “My name’s Martin Weaver, and I’m pleased to meet you.” He shot a glare at Garrus that carried a promise that a great deal of teasing awaited him once Nyreen Kandros moved out of earshot. The tarin took the kid’s hand and shook twice before releasing him.

“Yes,” Garrus said, “Mr. Weaver is my left hand.” He stepped behind his desk, but didn’t sit.

“Martin Weaver, former resident of the Mission Rehabilitation Facility on the Citadel. Injured assisting then Lt. Jane Shepard in the defense of Illyria during the Skyllian Blitz.” She gave him a perfunctory nod before turning her attention back to Garrus. She met his stare for a moment, before tilting her head in a slightly dismissive nod. “I have researched everyone of note within your organization, General.” She shrugged as if to dispel any negative implications, a casual pop of her elbows and shoulders.

“And the reason for such a thorough investigation?” Garrus settled into his chair.

Again that tiny shrug. “Should be obvious, I’d think.” A light sigh rumbled from her throat, heavy on sorrow and resignation. “The people of this station have endured a great deal over the cycles. A new, extremely well-funded merc organization moves in, I want to know who I’m dealing with. In short, I wanted to be sure you weren’t something else these people would need to endure.”

“The Talons have forced this station to endure their presence and criminal activity for decades,” Garrus countered, leaning back and trying to hide the flinch as his spine let out a screech. “What changed?”

“I am not so powerful, well-connected, or wealthy that I can simply walk in somewhere and take over,” the tarin said, her voice soft but haughty and defensive. She shifted a little, leaning forward with her elbows on the arms of her seat. Those remarkable eyes never moved from his, holding him with the passion, almost fervour in her stare. “I needed to work my way up. I had … “ She cleared her throat. “… previous entanglements that proved a hurdle to my acceptance within the Talons.”

“Like sleeping with Aria?” Martin blurted. Eyebrows raised, an expression of completely guileless curiosity on his face, the kid looked back and forth between them. A pleasant smile met the Talon leader’s stiffened spine. “Your people are a chatty bunch.”

Garrus bit down on a grin. Score one for the kid.

“Yes … as I was saying, I needed to earn trust, work my way up through the organization until I reached a position where I exerted enough influence to compel change.” She let out a long breath that rumbled like a thunderstorm through her second larynx, layering it with begrudging respect. “Then a few months back, Archangel rewarded my patience and preparation when it eliminated my predecessor. Since then, I have watched your organization, weighed the tides flowing through Omega, and here we are.” A more dramatic, full body shrug followed her words, elegant mandibles easing out and down then pulling tight again.

“Since Archangel started applying pressure, the Suns and Blood Pack are moving deeper and deeper into the Talons’ territory,” Martin said, keeping the gang leader on the ropes. He leaned forward, elbows on his knees and stared into Kandros’s face. “Things are going to get ugly on this station in the next year. There’s a gang war coming that isn’t going to end well for any of the gangs.” Raising his eyebrows, he tilted his chin up, challenging her. “You know it, I know it, and the general knows it, because it’s going to be him finishing up the purge.”

“My less than subtle assistant is asking if you’re just here to hide away, soak up our training, learn our tech, and then run back out there to fill the void when I’ve scoured every last gang member from this rock?” Garrus rested his forearms on the desktop and watched her, searching for any signs of deception, not surprised to come up empty.

The Kandros family was military as far back as turians kept records. Rigid but honourable, members of the family including Nyreen’s father, grandfather, and aunt had earned some of Palaven’s highest honours for service. He’d admired Nyreen’s natural talent for war back in the academy, but didn’t know her other than to nod in passing. Her brother had been in Garrus’s year and excelled in a way that drew him a great deal of praise and a great deal of envy. In every way, he’d eclipsed his younger sister.

Nyreen chuffed, a harsh cough of derision. “I’m not here to hide myself away until the bigger predators have cleared out the scavengers. I have no taste for carion, General. Archangel appears to be living up to its ideals … my ideals for Omega. Rather than sacrifice my people to the scavengers when their war begins, I would see them turned into something better.” She straightened in her chair, arching her neck, proud but not arrogant. “Have I come to the wrong place?”

Garrus shook his head, a crooked smile making one mandible flutter. He studied her for another few seconds, all his alarms staying silent, his gut calm and sure. “No. No, you haven’t. Welcome to Archangel, Nyreen Kandros.”
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Twenty Four

Chapter Summary

Sometimes it just doesn't pay to consider yourself recovered. Things start to unravel.

Garrus watched the tarin sitting in front of him for a moment. Thanks to their sudden wealth of bodies, Archangel needed instructors. A hierarchy-trained biotic who possessed both leadership skills and a working knowledge of the gangs on Omega would prove extremely useful.

“You brought us most of these bodies,” he said at last. “Would you be willing to help us get them organized, billeted, and trained?”

Kandros’s brow plates raised, but she straightened in her chair a little—the reaction he’d been looking for. “That’s a lot of trust for someone you just met and still suspect might be an infiltrator,” she replied. Her head cocked and her eyes narrowed as if either sizing him up or deciding how big an idiot he was.

“True, it’s a lot of trust, but it’s not that great a risk, and if you’re even half the soldier you were back when we were teenagers, the reward will far offset it. My best people will be here, helping you settle into your new position.” He chuckled to ease back the threat implied by his words before he said, “If you or any of the people who came with you pose a danger to the organization or other recruits, you’ll be removed.”

“Removed?” She bristled, apparently not set at ease. As she tensed, the air began to snap with biotic energy. “How final a removal are we talking?”

Garrus managed to stifle his smile, but one brow plate escaped his control. He stood. “We’re an army created to defend the galaxy against a coming storm, we’re not mercs and we’re not murderers. We tend to let people go using paperwork rather than bullets.”

“Body disposal is a bitch,” Martin added, earning himself a glare even as Garrus’s smile escaped, his mandibles flicking once.

To his surprise, the kid’s easy grin settled the tarin back into her chair, and the charge faded from the atmosphere. Defensive but reasonable … that he could work with.

Garrus leaned back against the edge of his desk. “None of you are in any danger unless you shoot first.” His chrono chimed a fifteen minute warning for the briefing. “I need to tie up some loose ends before I head down, but I’d like you to sit in on our department briefing in a few minutes. I have just over sixty frigates gathering dust in my dry dock. They need crews and ground assault teams. A lot of your people are External Forces and Alliance veterans. I want a list of your most experienced, most able to train in the fly, most trusted.”

She nodded and pushed out of her chair. “I’ll do that now, General.”

“Excellent.” He stepped past her to open the door. “Vortash, please show Instructor Kandros to the briefing room and supply her with a datapad.”

The batarian grumbled, but stood and started gathering materials off his desk.
Garrus held out his arm, ushering Nyreen from his office. “You’re dismissed, Instructor.”

“Sir, yes, sir.” She stood, gave him a rigid turian salute, then strode past him.

Garrus lingered in the doorway for a few seconds, watching after his newest instructor as Vortash led her out into the corridor. He got a good, solid feeling from her despite what she must have been through after being sent to the cabals. Not to mention whatever had transpired there to bring her out to Omega, living like an outlaw.

Martin walked up behind the general, leaning to look around him, and whistled. “Man, her eyes are … .”

“Beautiful,” Garrus finished, then realized he’d said that out loud and cleared his throat, returning to his chair.

“I was going to say different,” the kid said, a wide grin splitting his face, “but sure, beautiful works too.”

Garrus rolled his eyes and picked up the first datapad. “Don’t grin at me like you think you’ve discovered something.” He cleared his throat, shifted in his chair a little and redirected the conversation. “Eyes like Nyreen’s run in families, a rare genetic branch as old as the turian people. There are all sorts of ideas and tales about them … that they are people destined for great things, or destined for great sacrifice. Nyreen’s family definitely lived up to the whole destined for great things promise. She was set to follow in some very big footsteps when her biotic talents manifested, and she was sent to the cabals.”

Martin scowled. “Cabals?”

“Biotic units.” Garrus quickly scrawled his approval across the bottom of the datapads, hoping that he wasn’t authorizing Vortash’s new aircar and mansion on Khar’shan. “We’re a rigid, traditional people. That comes with a lot of good, but it also comes with a lot of distrust and backwards ways of doing things. My people are suspicious of biotics.” He slammed a palm up in the face of Martin’s comment. “I know, it doesn’t make any sense. It’s just the way it is … for now.” Hitting the bottom of that stack, he moved onto the second. “So biotics are kept separate, trained with brutal discipline. Some don’t even survive it. Nyreen did, of course, but then went UA.”

“Huh, brutal.” Martin perched on the arm of the chair Nyreen had vacated. “So, about her beautiful eyes … .” He grinned. “You were tripping over yourself there at the beginning. You have a thing for her once? She is beautiful.”

“No, I did not. She came from an impressive family … was everything I wasn’t. I admired her skill, nothing more.” Garrus gestured to the datapads. “Put these on Vortash’s desk.” He stood, picking up what he needed for the meeting. “You know that I’m bonded, even though I never got a chance to place my coillasì around her wrists. This is the last I want to hear about it.”

Martin sighed and picked up the stacks of requisitions, following when Garrus strode out of the room. “You know she’d never want you to—”

Garrus spun around, cutting him off with a razor-edged glare. “This is the last I want to hear about it,” he repeated, pausing between words to let them hit home.

“Yes, sir.” Martin ducked past to open the outer door and muttered, “You’re hearing the last of a lot of things today.”

Garrus chose to let the grumbling go unanswered and pushed on to the elevator and the administration floor.

The rest of the team awaited him, most busy tapping away at omnitools or datapads. Garrus made his way over to one of the QEC pads where Nihlus was speaking to Anderson.

“General,” the Normandy’s captain greeted him, an easy smile belying the depth of the crap piling up around them. “You’re looking better.”

“Recovering according to plan, Captain, unless Dr. Chakwas has her way. I think she’s actually accepted a contract from one of the gangs.” He grinned, then glanced over at Nihlus. The Spectre didn’t look all that steady on his feet, but resolute. “You’re going to head back out on the Normandy?”

“Yes. I want two frigates as escort if possible.” The Spectre turned to look over his shoulder at Nyreen. “We’re trusting the Talons?”

“Yes, we’re trusting the Talons, and you can have three frigates if you take Chakwas with you.”

“I heard that, General,” the doctor called from the doorway. She shook her head and strode across the room to take the seat next to Mordin. “I should have listened to my father and become a pediatrician.”

“Patients much the same,” Mordin chimed in.

Garrus grinned at the salarian and shook his head. “You really miss that vorcha infested dunghole you called a clinic, don’t you?”

Mordin let out a long, over-emotive sigh. “Clumsy, veiled threats only prove allegations of childish behaviour.”

Garrus chuckled and turned to the rest of the group as Sidonis and Melanis appeared on their QEC pads. “All right, settle, and let’s get this done. First of all, I’m sure you’re all familiar with Nyreen Kandros. I’ve asked her to join us as an instructor, and help us get her people settled.” He pointed a talon at Butler. “I’ll leave it to you and Vortash to help her settle in.” When Gabe nodded, Garrus let his hand fall back to his side. “Even looking past our current state of emergency, I can see us needing to deal with more and more recruits as this issue with the human colonies comes to light, so let’s start preparing for that. If you have promising senior cadets to second you, start working to bring along our next rank of instructors.”

“What word about the colonies? Bloody Alliance and council are lying their asses off,” Zaeed grumbled, casting a snarling nod toward Anderson. “Nobody’s going to know any fucking thing. People out there have lost whole families, and what do those bastards tell them? Pirates. Slavers. Fucking Santa Claus needing new bleedin’ elves to make his toys.”

Garrus nodded, and stepped toward the merc, easing him back with a placating gesture. “We’ll get the word out. I’m going to assign extra bodyguards to Miss Wong and have her head out to the site of the next attack when it happens. If we get enough people asking about all those missing families, we can apply pressure on the council and the Alliance from behind the scenes.”

Anderson nodded and stepped forward to lean against his console. “They’re scrambling. They don’t bring any of it too close to me, because I’m too tightly tied to Archangel, but Hackett says they’re on the verge of panic back on Arcturus. Someone out there has plans for humanity, and the Alliance knows it. Hackett keeps asking them open-ended questions about the Reapers, but they aren’t desperate enough to acknowledge that we’re being harvested. Yet.”
When the captain stepped back, Garrus raised a hand to forestall any replies. “Okay, we’ve jumped ahead of my agenda here, so let’s table this for a few minutes. We’ll come back to what’s going on with the human colonies after we address attacks taking place a lot closer to home.” He turned to Sidonis. “What happened at Enoch?” Moving off to the side, he opened the floor. As Sidonis told the others about the destruction of the facility, Garrus watched Nyreen out of the corner of his eye.

She continued to key information into her datapad, but he didn’t doubt for a second that her attention remained on the report. The slow sweep of her mandibles gave away the wheels turning in her head. He could see her drawing threads together and knotting them into a web. He should recognize it, he’d watched Shepard do it often enough.

“We don’t have the ships or the bodies to sufficiently cover all our holdings,” Grundan Krul said, his deep, broken voice like listening to boulders slide down a mountain. He shook his head, cheek folds and jowls rippling like living things held captive on his face. “Even with these new people and the ships in dry dock, we’ll spread ourselves just thin enough to lose even more assets in their attacks.”

“We won’t be trying to cover them all,” Garrus assured him. He shrugged when bodies stiffened and mouths opened around the room. “Krul is right. Between trying to cast a wide enough net to respond to the colony attacks and defending all our bases, mines, and manufacturing … we’d just lose more in the attacks. We have to use our heads.”

“They’re drawing you out and spreading you thin.” Nyreen’s voice cut through the swell of protest that followed Garrus’s words. She cleared her throat. “And you’re too close to see that you aren’t fighting two enemies: the ones taking the human colonies and the ones attacking Archangel. You’re fighting the same enemy on two fronts.” She met his eyes for a moment, then looked back down at her datapad. “And they’ve got your back chasing your front just like they want.”

Her softly spoken words drew every eye to her.

Garrus walked over to his chair and sat on the edge before nodding at her. “Elaborate.”

She shrugged as if the problem were plain. “It’s a distraction. I’ll grant that it is a damned good one, because even as they pull your ships and your focus away from the colonies, they’re weakening your infrastructure, but it is still just a distraction. You’ve got them scared. They can’t take you on if you bring your power to bear against them.”

“So they distract us away from the colonies and whittle us down a little at a time,” Nihlus said. He chuffed, but his eyes stayed riveted on the tarin for nearly a minute before he looked over at Garrus. “I’m going to tell myself that we would have seen this if we hadn’t been abducted and dissected.”

“Dissections performed on the dead,” Mordin offered helpfully.

Garrus raised a brow plate at Nihlus then shook his head. Kandros had it dead on. The surety of that settled in his gut. He stood and paced across to circle behind Mordin’s chair, patting the scientist’s shoulder as he passed. Hunching against the growing pain in his chest, he paced a slow circle around the perimeter of the room. “Not just distraction, though,” he said, talking mostly to himself as he sorted through the implications. “If it was just about pulling our attention away from the colony attacks, they wouldn’t take our ships, they’d just destroy them.”

“Yes,” Nyreen said, “the stolen ships are our biggest clue as to their intentions.”

“No one has ships as advanced as our fleet,” Sidonis argued. “They could be reverse engineering
“No.” Garrus beat Nyreen to the punch. He stopped and rested his hands on the back of his chair as he looked over his gathered people. “There are far easier ways to do that. Cerberus proved that. So why are they stealing the ships?”

“Infiltration,” Mierin spoke up for the first time. The salarian munitions expert nodded and then shrugged. “Camouflage. Use our own tech against us. Stealth frigates not only get them close, but can locate all other Archangel vessels, running silent or otherwise.”

“Exactly,” Nyreen replied, “so they’re planning on going after a high value target, one they think will be heavily defended.” The ex-Talon leader shrugged and looked from Garrus to Nihlus and back. “They plan for it to be a crippling blow, maybe even fatal. What target would hurt the most to lose?”

“The Zaherin facility,” Sidonis replied. He paced the two strides across his pad in an endless cycle. “If we lose our weapon testing capability against the Reapers, it’ll set us back cycles. It’s also the easiest to infiltrate.”

“Sidonis is right.” Krul shoved his bulk up in his chair, bracing one hand against the arm as if he intended to leap up. “Mines, factories, even shipyards, can be replaced. We lose the remains of that Reaper, we’re well fucked.” He curled his lip to bare his teeth and shook his head. “But, if we fill Zaherin with our ships, the enemy will just go to ground.”

“Or go around,” Mordin added, sitting perfectly still for the first time since Garrus had met him. “Choose other target.”

Garrus continued watching his newest team member as his veterans broke into debate about how best to approach defending their weapon testing site. He could see that she didn’t agree about the target, but also that she held her peace for a reason. Why? What would an outsider see that they might miss? He swallowed hard as his gut answered with a sick twist as it turned to ice.

What would he miss?

Betrayal from within.

Letting out a long, slow breath, Garrus looked over his people, all of whom had been with him from the start. Chakwas, Mordin, Anderson, and Nihlus he trusted beyond reproach. They weren’t just his people, they were hers.

The others, Butler, Sidonis … all of them … in the early days they’d all had each other’s backs, raiding the gangs, thinning the herd of greedy, bloodthirsty, and stupid. The only people in the room who hadn’t saved his life at least a dozen times were the heads of operations and facilities. Not to underestimate the power of a well balanced budget or clean buildings and well maintained vehicles, but he just couldn’t see how those two could access the information they’d need.

He shoved that concern aside for the time being. He’d speak to Nihlus and Kandros before he left for the Citadel, see who they suspected, if anyone. In the meantime, they needed a plan to put themselves in the best position to deal with whatever attack came. They needed to draw the enemy in. Of course, that would be impossible if what he thought he read on Nyreen’s face proved to be fact.

Making a decision, he stood and waved everybody back to silence. “Okay, here’s the plan. We’re going to give them what they want and place as many ships as we can out there in groups of ten to defend our highest value targets: two Stingers, two cruisers, six frigates. That should be enough to take out even the dreadnought providing you tear down their Stinger’s shields and disable it first. One frigate goes in cloaked and sits in orbit of the facility. Maintain constant contact. If they call for help or their comms go down, you go in.”

He looked over at Nyreen. “In order to do this, we’re going to need take the list of recruits that Instructor Kandros has given us, and team them up with our most experienced officers and crews.” A dangerous scowl greeted the outburst of complaints that exploded around him. “Enough! Yes, it’s a huge reorganization, but that’s why I put credits in your accounts every week, so just get it done. We need our ships out of dry dock, and I don’t want new people placed with inexperienced commanding officers.”

Turning to Nihlus and Anderson, he said. “You’re going to keep your ships in place and set up a schedule of constant check ins with the colonies. I don’t care if they squawk about it being a pain in the ass. You ping them every half hour. If they don’t ping back, assume that they’ve come under attack and investigate. Do not engage the enemy.”

“Excuse me, General,” the head of Operations, Naran, called. “Opening the third building, getting all those ships operational and supplied, outfitting and paying so many more people is going to bankrupt the budget.”

“I understand.” He returned to his chair and sat, feeling as though his every body part had been assembled wrong, all poorly angled and grinding against each other. “I leave for the Citadel to meet with Barla Von in a couple of hours. I’ll ensure you get the necessary increase. Forward your numbers to his office.”

Looking around the room, he met every set of eyes gathered there. “Anything further on these matters?”

An hour later, Martin was the last to leave the conference room, escorting Nyreen out with a promise to show her around if she would tell him stories of when Garrus was young. The tarin paused at the door, looked back, her mandibles flicking once as she replied, “Honestly, I can’t recall noticing him. A great many cadets attended our academy, and he was two cycles ahead of me.”

Nice. Low blow … point to Kandros. Garrus met her gaze and tilted his head in a slight, sardonic bow, then turned to gather his materials.

He’d just registered that his father had yet to catch up with him when the door opened and Herros stepped through. He started to tease his father about taking so long to find him over an urgent matter, but then he met his father’s stare and his jaw snapped shut. Dread—cold, raw dread bordering on terror—stared back at him.

Garrus stepped forward, one rigid stride. “What’s happened?”

Herros took a couple of gasping breaths as if he’d run the length of Omega, then nodded toward Garrus’s seat. “We don’t have long. I received word last night from the hierarchy about a … “ He shook his head and braced his hands on his hips as he searched for the word. “… defensive measure taken by our government at the end of the krogan rebellions.”

Garrus stumbled backward until the edge of his chair impacted the back of his knees and he folded down onto the leather. Defensive measure? Krogan rebellions? Did everything need to go to shit on the same day? Hig guts turned to gellid sludge, and he dragged the words from his mouth kicking and screaming as he asked, “Defensive measure?”
“Yes.” Herros paced a few strides then turned back. “Massive bombs buried near heavy population centers on Tuchanka.”

Garrus pushed aside all his other reactions and leaped up. Only one thing mattered. “Does Wrex know?”

Herros pressed a hand against his son’s shoulder as if trying to guide him away from the ugliness of the truth as it asked him to be patient. “The hierarchy notified me last night because someone has dug up the bomb next to the Urdnot clan holding.”

“Who dug it up?” Garrus demanded, fury sparking to drive back the cold, brittle dread. One possibility ignited, flaring with a sudden rage. “Is it us? Did the turian military do it in response to Wrex’s building projects?” He strode toward the QEC console. He needed answers, and he needed to talk to Wrex.

Herros followed, stepping around him to block his path. “The hierarchy is denying any involvement, and I believe it. With everything else that’s going on … .”

Garrus nodded, the gesture constituting a lie so great he had to fight back nausea. Nothing had ever felt so wrong … he had never felt so wrong. What the hell was going on?

You know what’s going on, Callor. They’re ready, and they’re starting to make their move. That means eliminating Archangel. You’re the only threat to them in the entire galaxy. They’re going to try to rip you limb for limb. Are you prepared for that?

He shoved Shepard’s voice aside and forced himself to police up his fear and denial, saying, “Someone is trying to tear it all apart. The Reapers … it has to be. They have agents.”

“Yes, but that’s academic at this point, Garrus. Wrex knows about the bomb, and he’s furious. Understandably, granted, but if he goes out there … if he attacks, they’ll detonate it, and that will be the end of Urdnot, and very likely the start of another war against the krogan.”

Garrus started to answer, but the QEC chimed, cutting him off. He spun to stare at it for a second. “Wrex?” Sidestepping around his father, he reached out to answer it, scowling when his pari grabbed hold of his wrist, the ice creeping back in. What was his father hiding from him?

Herros nodded, just holding Garrus’s wrist, not trying to pull him away. “Yes. That’s why I ran.” He stepped between Garrus and the console once again, his mandibles low and spread, his eyes and subvocals earnest. “You must calm him down. If you … we … can’t convince him to see reason, he’s going to get all his people … all the clans gathering around his banner … killed.”

Nodding, Garrus twisted his wrist free and stepped up to activate the QEC. Spirits, he’d give anything for Shepard to be there. She could wrap Wrex around her finger with a single grin.

The krogan clan leader appeared on the pad, the very embodiment of rage. He lunged forward with such force and deadly intent that Garrus flinched away from the hologram. The general’s rage and indignation at what his people had kept hidden on Tuchanka for centuries evaporated, cooling into a helpless despair. He’d never stop Wrex from charging off.

“Vakarian!” the krogan roared, “did you know about this?”

“No.” Hands lifting like shields between them, Garrus took a half step forward. “You know I’d never keep something like this from you. I’d have been there to help you get rid of them.” Closing his eyes, he shook his head, clearing away as much of the fear and frustration as he could. “We need to get your people out of there, just in case they set it off.”
“If it’s not the turians, it’s the salarians, or the council.” Wrex reached behind his back pulling his shotgun. “It will never end, Vakarian. Not for the krogan. It’s come down to kill or be killed, and I won’t let my people die out, even if I have to tear down the whole bloody galaxy to save them.”

Herros pushed in. “Wrex, you know peace is still the way forward. Let’s get your people to safety, and then we can move in and take custody of the bomb. I have three platoons of special forces awaiting my orders … .”

Wrex roared and slammed the butt of his shotgun down on the console. “I’m not letting turians anywhere near that bomb. I’ve gathered a platoon of warriors all two seconds from going into a blood-rage. We’ll kill everyone between us and the bomb, and I swear that if we see a single turian, that bomb will go off on Palaven. You won’t know where, you won’t know when, but it’ll leave you screaming for all your dead children.”

Garrus’s heart stopped, collapsing into a singularity. “This is exactly what the Reapers want, Wrex. Of course you’ll find turians, and salarians … humans … probably even asari. They want you to take those bombs, detonate them on the homeworlds … fuck, they want you to threaten another krogan rebellion. Turn everyone against each other.” He flung himself forward, leaning against the console. “You can see that. Tell me you can see that, Wrex.”

“All I see is that the genophage wasn’t enough. You had to make sure that the krogan people never recovered … that if your plague didn’t kill us off, we’d all die in fire. I won’t let you do it.”

“Wrex! No! You go out there, you’ll get yourself and your entire clan killed. They’ll detonate that bomb. With you dead … all those krogan dead … there will be nothing to stop the rest from going out and starting another rebellion.” Garrus grasped his hands and held them out, past threatening or reason … left resorting to pleading. “Please don’t do this. You’ll get all your people killed.”

“Then we take as many of the rest of you with us as we can,” Wrex replied, his voice cold and flat. He glared at them for a second, then the QEC went dark.

“We need to get there, and now,” Herros said, chuffing a little as he stated the obvious. He pressed up behind Garrus. “You know we can’t allow Wrex to bring his entire people crashing down on the galaxy and themselves.”

Garrus spun toward his father. “I can’t go. There’s nothing I can do to stop him.” He threw up his hands, a small explosion of helplessness detonating behind his keel. For a second it felt as though it would blow straight off. “I have an entire base full of new recruits who all need supplies, quarters, and then to be assigned to ships and sent out to guard facilities we can’t afford to lose. Human colonies are vanishing at a rate that shouldn’t even be possible … and Wrex chooses now to lose his mind.” He stabbed the air, punctuating his words with frustration. “What the hell?”

Pacing to the door and back, he tried to think of some way to be everywhere at once, but he couldn’t, and as much as losing Urdnot would hurt the war effort, losing Archangel would end the war effort. Maybe if he could get out of the Citadel right after meeting with the financiers, he could still make it to Tuchanka in time to stop Wrex from doing something stupid. Damn it.

He stopped, punching the console again then leaning into his fists. As much as he wanted to, he couldn’t put a few thousand krogan ahead of the whole galaxy. “There’s nothing I can do. I need to go to the Citadel first.”

Herros stepped around Garrus. Laying a hands on his son’s shoulders, he said, “I’ll go to Tuchanka.
General Victus is leading a combined forces exercise in the DMZ. “He shrugged. “Dranek, I believe. I’ll meet him at the Aralakh relay, and we’ll get Urdnot evacuated with or without Wrex. Can you contact the shamen of both the male and female clans?”

Garrus’s frustration transformed into thoughtfulness. Yes, the shamen would probably prove more amenable to evacuation, particularly the females, but … He shook his head. “I don’t want you between Wrex and that bomb.” He reached up, closing his talons around his father’s forearms as if determined to hold him there.

Even though you know it’s the best chance Urdnot has of survival? You’re prepared to sacrifice the krogan for the galaxy … what are you prepared to sacrifice for the krogan?

“Trust me, I won’t be anywhere close to that bomb if I can help it.” Herros smiled, a gentle flutter of mandibles, then released him and took a couple of steps toward the door. “I’ll have Victus send in a covert team to delay the digging and try to take custody of the thing before it can be detonated.” He nodded, one sharp, decisive jerk of his head that declared the topic closed. “You get Nihlus and the others the resources they need to protect Archangel.” He palmed the door and stepped through, but then turned back. “Please make sure your mari and Sol get on a ship home before you leave.”

“Yes, sir.” Garrus nodded and strode across the room, hesitating only a second before he embraced his father, gripping the elder torin’s shoulders. “I’ll get them on their way, and then I’ll be right behind you.” Pulling back, he stared into his father’s eyes. “Be careful, Pari.” He stepped back and opened his omnitool. “I’ll assign the carriers Trimeri and Istal’an to your command. Their crews are in place, but their fighters aren’t aboard, so we’ll load them with all the shuttles we’ve got.” He sent orders to the captains and department heads before turning his attention back to his father. “You should be set to go in a couple of hours.”

“Thank you. I’ll get them back to you in one piece.” Herros turned and strode to the outer door, calling back over his shoulder, “I’ll contact you as soon as I’ve got eyes on.”

Garrus watched after his father for a few seconds, the hierarch striding down the corridor. The set to his spine, the strength through his shoulders … his every step screamed veteran leader in command. If anyone could save Wrex’s people from their leader’s damned short-sightedness, Herros Vakarian would.

“General?” Martin’s voice came through his radio.

His hand lifted to his implant even as he turned back toward his desk. “Go ahead.” Time to get moving. He still needed to make an appearance in the sublevels.

“Zaeed and I are headed over to the docks with the senior flight cadets to oversee loading those shuttles. We’ll have the carriers ready to depart at 1500 station standard. Butler, Kandros, Meirin, and Krul have the engineering and the special recruit units”

“Very good. When you’re finished there, head over to the Passch. We’ll escort the carriers to the relay. Actually …” He grinned as an image formed in his mind. “Why not make a show of it? Contact Nihlus and have the Normandy delay its departure. We’ll all move out at once, make sure it’s recorded … give the galaxy a glimpse of what it faces if it crosses Archangel or its allies. Vakarian out.” He gathered up his datapads, tossed another long glare at the QEC, and then set out.

Five minutes later, he slumped against the elevator wall as he rode it down the first floor.

“General Vakarian?” a call came through on his radio.
He let out a long breath and lifted his hand to open the channel. “Yes?”

“The prisoner wishes to speak with you, sir. She’s being quite strident about it.”

Garrus smirked as he heard Daro’Xen’s voice in the background. Strident indeed. He swallowed and stretched his neck, making sure no smile would bleed into his voice. “I have more pressing concerns at the moment. Our guest will have to wait.”

Mumbled conversation went on long enough that he considered closing the channel as his elevator arrived on the main floor. He heard Daro’Xen again, loud enough that he made out her words even before the guard returned.

“She wishes me to pass along a message, General.” He paused, no doubt waiting for Garrus to ask what it was. After a moment, he forged ahead. “She said to tell you that they’re coming for you, sir. She says that you’re already dead.”
As she gains strength, Shepard begins to make plans.

Feodusi: The Prothean government’s scientific branch.

18 Days ASR

“Here, they had your favourites back in stock.” Shepard flopped across her bed and shoved the sweets through the vent. When the torin on the other side pulled them through, she wriggled closer until she could see him. “Sorry it took so long. Every time I manage to hack into the security cameras, they upgrade. Took me three tries today.”

She scowled into the vent cover. “Stealing these made me wonder though … . If you’re the only turian here, why is there an entire dextro section of the kitchen?” The question pretty much answered itself, and she let out a long sigh that made light of the sick twist in her guts. There was no way in hell she’d leave anyone behind for the monsters to torture, but at the same time, breaking them all out meant massive intel gathering and planning. It also meant taking down the security in the entire place when she ran for it, which complicated things considerably. She and Al could slip away through ducts with a great deal less planning and fuss … and weaponry … than she needed for a full scale jailbreak.

“And you’re sure these are the dextro ones this time?” the gruff voice asked.

A wide grin spread across her face when she heard the wrapper rustling even before she answered. “I always get the dextro ones. Your little … issue the other day had nothing to do with me.” She waved a hand in front of her face. “And the next time that happens, move your bed to the other side of the room. Seriously.” Sitting up, she turned to hang her legs off the side of her bed. “My big score today was a half dozen peanut butter cookies, thank you very much kitchen staff.”

She placed the napkin of ill-gotten sweets on the bed next to her, unwrapping it with exaggerated ceremony. Lifting one off the top, she saluted the camera with it then took a huge bite. After making a show out of chewing, she set the other half down and dove back into the basket on the front of her walker. She didn’t really need to use it any more. The cane Miranda had given her made it easier to move around, but a low, suspicious voice in the back of her head told her to play down her mobility. Sometimes it paid to look a little weak, just like it paid to look crazy and out of control.

“You know they gave you that omnitool so you would practice your skills?” She heard him shift on his bed, a soft grunt of pain accompanying it. “And every time you hack the security, they just take it up a notch to challenge you.”

An earnest nod tossed her curls around her face. “I know, and I’m happy to be their little maze rat as long as I can keep a step or fourteen ahead of them.” She laid back across the bed and found him watching her. She gave him an upside down smile. “Come on, you know you loved listening to Miranda squeal when I broadcast that track of her singing in the shower.”
His head dipped a little, but she caught the mandible flick that gave him away. She watched him for a moment, noticing the way he leaned into the wall more heavily than usual, the way his mandibles hung loose. His eyes, normally nearly blind from damage taken his implants were removed, seemed even more dull. She reached over her head and wriggled her fingertips through the grate.

“Hey, hang in there, Al. We’re getting out of here.”

Bare talon tips brushed over her fingers. “You’re getting out of here, Shepard.” He turned away and rolled over to lie with his back to her. “I’m here until there’s so little left of me that they finally let me die and carve me up to stick in specimen jars.”

Shepard slapped the grate, his words sparking both anger and the salty burn of tears in the corner of her eyes. “Hey! Stop talking like that. They’re going to have a choice to make, and if they want Captain Shepard out there, they’re going to have to release you as well.” She sighed and flipped over to watch him—just a dim mound of grey in the even darker room. He kept the lights turned off, claiming to be sensitive to the brightness. She suspected that his aversion had more to do with being sensitive to having to see what they’d done to him.

His past couple of days had been spent fighting—a lot of hand to hand—and it showed. The days between, while they left their tech inside him, were good days. An overclocked metabolism and underclocked pain response combined with overstimulated hormones and adrenaline had made him aggressive, cocky, almost wild. Strong and manic, he paced his room like a caged lion, working out constantly even when they tried to sedate him, and wolfing down as much food as he could get his talons on. Before her hair dried from her last shower, he barked at her to shower again, particularly after she came back from physio, claiming that her scent drove him insane. His humour sharpened to a lusty, uncomfortable edge, and she swore if he could have gotten through the grate, things would have become … complicated.

That morning they’d stripped out all the implants, taken their pounds of flesh for testing, and then dumped him back on his bed, a husk so empty that she would have preferred needing to shower constantly and fend off his suggestive jests.

“Get some sleep,” she whispered. She wished, and not for the first time, that she could offer any sort of comfort, to Al and to all the others locked in their dark rooms, recovering from whatever horrors the organization had visited upon them.

As she sat up, she savoured the pull in her stomach muscles. Unlike Al, she gained strength every day. She could argue with and resent a hell of a lot about her revival, but she had to admit, Miranda’s nanites did good work.

Knuckles rapped against her door. Shepard pushed her walker off to the side, draping her nightgown over the basket to hide the contraband she’d scavenged from various computer terminals and power interfaces.

“Come in,” she called, picking up the other half of her stolen cookie. A wry smile tugged at one corner of her mouth. Half of what she got up to out there she hid away like a paranoid mad scientist, only to flaunt the other half as noisily and obnoxiously as she could.

Miranda appeared in the doorway, surprising Shepard. The operative never knocked. “Shepard?” she said, without entering. “May I speak to you out here?”

Another surprise. “Yeah, sure.” She shoved the rest of her cookie into her mouth, then slid off the bed. Opting for the cane combined with exaggerated hobbling and a dramatic lean, she made her way to the door. way to the door and out. Miranda crossed the corridor, then headed toward the small nursing station/atrium twenty metres along.

Shepard followed, willing to indulge the woman’s detective noir theatrics. Miranda might have found out something about what the organization was doing with Al. She might even have gone to her boss about the brutality of the torin’s treatment.

The operative walked over to a large bank of windows and leaned against the railing, staring out into the black. When Shepard arrived, Miranda cast a glance her way before turning back to the stars.

Not giving Shepard a chance to speak, she asked, “Dr. T’Soni has assisted you in recalling most of the beacon message and cipher?”

“Yeah, and most of the parts of the messages that the rachni queen was able to help decipher.” She scowled and hobbled over to a couch a metre away, sitting on the edge. “It’s frustrating as hell though. It feels like I’m being shown half a movie. Like every time the camera cuts away to another character, the screen goes blank.” She laughed, but it tasted worse than toothpaste and orange juice. “I’d almost think you’d told her to keep the other half hidden from me.”

One of Miranda’s shoulders twitched. “But you’re remembering the Reapers?” she asked, soldiering on.

Cold dread skittered over her skin, an infestation of invisible rats gnawing and clawing as they burrowed into her flesh, eating their way through to consume her heart. “More and more. Not much that isn’t fifty thousand years old, but yeah.”

Miranda turned to face her. “I looked into Specimen Alpha’s—”

Shepard clenched her jaw so tight that her teeth squeaked together. “Let’s just call him Al, so we don’t forget we’re discussing a person, here,” she said, slicing through Miranda’s words with a keen-edged razor. “He’s not an animated corpse. He’s not some lab specimen. He’s a torin, and he’s in constant agony. Let’s never forget that, okay?”

“Torin,” Miranda repeated. “Curious that you use words from the closed dialect. Most people would just call him a man.” Closing on Shepard by a couple of steps, she squinted down as if studying another lab specimen. “Where does that come from? Most humans, even 99.9 percent of asari don’t know a single word of the closed dialect.”

Shepard shook her head, impatience with the arrogance behind Miranda’s comment overriding the question. “Who cares? Fact is, I know better and so should you. He’s not a man. That’s human anthropocentric bullshit.” She cocked her head, glancing around as if she could find the reason for the conversation hidden somewhere in the environment, then looked back to Miranda, raised her eyebrows and shrugged. “Well? You didn’t drag me out here to listen to a lecture about human-centrism. What about Al and the Reapers?”

Miranda glanced back out at the stars for a moment, then moved to sit on the edge of a planter, facing Shepard. “You stopped Sovereign from opening the Citadel to dark space, but they still have active agents in the galaxy who are working to find a way for the Reapers to return.” She shrugged. “That is the reason we brought you back. You are the only human to have fought one, to have successfully out thought, out maneuvered it and then killed it. Still, the war hasn’t even begun, and we need humanity’s champion out there fighting them.”

Shepard’s eyebrows headed for her hairline. Other than saying that they needed her to do something, Miranda had never specifically said what. Although, Liara helping her pull forward memories of the beacon and cipher had given her a huge clue. “And?” Where the hell was Miranda going?

“Specim—” Miranda tilted her head, acquiescing to Shepard’s furious glare. “Fine … Al is important to our research. You remember that Reapers indoctrinate and convert people into workers and shock troops?”

Shepard recalled the monstrosities that the Reapers had created from the Prothean Empire’s different races, and nodded. “What does this have to do with Al?”

“The Reapers need to control all these units. We found implants within the skulls of husks collected from Eden Prime and the Citadel, and our scientists have hypothesized that the Reapers create ranks of command and control units.” She raised one perfect eyebrow. “Do you follow?”

Shepard nodded, already not liking the shape of where the operative was headed. “Yeah, I’m with you.” She didn’t want to be, but she was.

In fact, she knew their hypothesis to be true. Three layers of command had existed among the Reaper units in Tashac’s time. She’d witnessed the dissections, tried to block out the screams of the volunteers used in the feodusi’s experiments. Her gut tied itself in a knot even before Miranda continued. The Reapers corrupted everything they touched, and not just the people they transformed or harvested. Their influence … fighting them had turned the already militant Prothean empire into a creature with so little honour that she couldn’t help but think the Reapers had done the galaxy a favour.

Miranda’s voice dragged Shepard from her thoughts. Damn. How long hadn’t she been paying attention?

“Al’s project is trying to discover a way to interfere with that signal, and turn it to work for us.” The operative leaned her elbows on her knees and steepled her fingers. “He’s proving invaluable, Shepard. He’s actually taken control of active husks for short periods of time. He’s helping us create better soldiers for a fight we both know is coming far sooner than we can prepare for it.”

Shepard stared at the operative for a long time, her jaw hanging slack enough that a cool trickle of breath whispered between her lips. “So that makes it okay then? As long as we’re torturing people in order to learn how to fight the Reapers, that’s perfectly fine?”

Miranda let out another strained sigh, the only sign of her flagging patience. “Not how I would put it, Shepard.”

Standing, Shepard hobbled over to lean against the railing and stare out at the millions of diamonds hanging in the black. “No, but it’s what you said, and it’s what you meant. Plus, he’s not human, right? Basically just a lab animal who can conveniently give verbal feedback.” Her gut rolled, threatening to toss her cookie. “Sweet baby Jesus, what is wrong with you people? And when does it become too many people to justify? Ten torture victims? A hundred? A thousand? Is there no number that tips over to criminal?”

The operative let out another strained sigh, the only sign of her flagging patience. “Facilities like this one exist all over the galaxy, Shepard. They’re run by governments, corporations … even the council. And you can guarantee that there are humans held in some of those, in just as much pain as Al.”

A snort as sharp as a rifle shot escaped. “And that makes it even more okay. They do it, and worse, they do it to us, so that justifies everything.” Shepard gritted her teeth to avoid saying all the ugly things that sprang into her mouth. She breathed through it, keeping herself under control. “There are alternatives to committing atrocities to combat atrocities.”

Spinning around, she pinned Miranda with a furious stare. “And if you’re going to give me the whole a few suffer so that millions don’t have to spiel … just don’t.” She threw her hands out to the side, smacking her cane off the front of a chair. “And you want me to work with an organization that would torture innocent people? I won’t.” She shrugged and limped back to her chair. “I just won’t. I’ll go back to the Alliance, do what I can through them once I’m completely fit.”

Miranda just stared, her one eyebrow slightly cocked. When Shepard sputtered to an indignant stop, the operative said, “I was working my way to a point if you stop ranting long enough to hear me out. This organization has ethical guidelines for the treatment of test subjects,” Miranda continued, her voice as cool and slick as an otter’s back. “And I don’t believe that Al’s project lead is adhering to them, so I’ve collected what data I could, and I’ll be taking it to my employer later today.”

Shepard gave a derisive puff of air and shook her head. “You could have led with that.” She returned to her chair. “How many more are there, Miranda?” She nodded down the long hall leading the the elevator. “This station is huge. How many people work here? How many projects?
How many other poor bastards like Al?”

The operative shrugged, but it came off overfaced, not indifferent. “I can’t know, Shepard. I was in charge of Lazarus. The organization conducts research here in a hundred different branches from ship and weapon design to food preservation. Each has its own project head.” She stood, elegantly unfolding in a way that made Shepard want to punch her. “Anyway, I wanted to let you know that I’m doing what I can.”

Shepard nodded, her eyes drawn to the long hall by the appearance of a single blue figure. “Thank you for looking into it.” Turning on a pale smile as Liara approached, Shepard let out a long, thin sigh. “But so you know … when I leave here, Al is going with me. Any other “specimens” that I find will be going with me as well.”

She stood, holding herself straight and strong as she met Miranda’s stare for a moment before turning aside to greet Liara. The asari closed, her posture and expression already screaming apology. Shepard let out a long sigh. As much as she appreciated Liara’s assistance in recovering her skills and knowledge, the asari’s constant demeanour of remorse wore Shepard out. Knowing that Miranda kept a huge chunk of her life held back caused enough inner turmoil and resentment.
She didn’t need the constant ‘I wish I could but I can’t’ vibe coming off Liara.

Standing, she started back toward her room. She had a project to get integrated into her computer terminal before she headed down to the firing range for her favourite part of any day.

“Good afternoon, Shepard,” Liara called, stopping at the door to Shepard’s room. She held up a mock up of Shepard’s old sniper rifle. “I thought you might like to do a little muscle memory work before you pick up the real thing.”

Shepard took the rifle in her hands. “They sure studied me, didn’t they?” She hooked her cane over her arm and stroked her fingers along the sleek lines. “It’s almost identical to Ingrid. Not that I’ll ever see her again.” She winked at the asari and palmed the door control before taking her cane in hand again. “Come on in, Doc. Let’s embrace that eternity.” Shepard chuckled at the dark indigo that crept up Liara’s cheeks and patted the asari’s shoulder as she passed. “You blush worse than Kaidan.”

Three steps into the door, she stopped, realizing that Liara remained standing frozen at the threshold. She turned back, brow furrowing. “Liara?” When the asari just continued to stare with what Shepard could only describe as terror etched into her features, the captain took a step toward her. “Seriously, Liara. You’re freaking me out. What is it?”

“Kaidan,” Liara managed to squeak out, glancing over her shoulder toward where Miranda had been. “You said I blush worse than Kaidan.”

Shepard’s frown intensified for a second, then broke into a wide grin.

She raised a hand and waved to Alenko over at his station. “Hey, Sport, suit up, and fill your pockets with singles. We’re going out on the town.”

“Singles, ma’am?”

“We’re hitting a titty bar, Lieutenant. Got to be prepared.” She laughed as Kaidan blushed a bright red. “Whoa! Damp that down there, Alenko. I’m getting a sunburn.”

The man turned and fled for the elevator.

“Wow, note to self: can’t tease that one. He’ll burst into flames.”

“Sport isn’t right,” she said out loud, squinting as she stared into Liara’s eyes. “It’s not the right name.” She pushed at the white sheet, making it billow and snap like the laundry had when her mother hung it out in the summer wind.

“Shepard.” Liara rushed in the door. “Maybe it’s better if you don’t try to remember.” She glanced back toward the hallway again. “There will be lots of time for that once we get out of here.”

The asari’s tone snapped Shepard’s attention back to her, the captain staring into those deep wells of blue, wells that closed off the second she made contact. “What?” She stepped into the asari, clamping one hand down on Liara’s shoulder, the alarm in the back of her head screaming. “Why do you look so scared? Sweet baby Jesus, tell me they haven’t been threatening you.”

“No!” The expression of shock on Liara’s face sent Shepard’s protective reflex back into standby. “No, it’s just that they don’t want you remembering the Normandy yet, and I’m afraid that if you do, they’ll . . .” Her shoulders bounced heavily, once, her expression so earnest that Shepard almost laughed. Almost. Sometimes the asari came across very much her age -- comparatively. Damn, she really still was just a well-grown child.

Liara reached out to take Shepard’s hand between both of hers. “I don’t know what they’ll do, but maybe it’s best if you wait to stir up those memories.”

Shepard didn’t move, watching the expressions play across her friend’s face. She couldn’t stop beating at the sheet, forcing it to give up . . .

Sparky. Not Sport ... Sparky. He wanted something a little less eight-year-old T-ball player.

. . . it’s secrets. Still, that didn’t mean she had to let Liara know. Well, at least out loud.

“Okay.” Shepard tugged her hand free and turned to hang her cane from the bed railing. “I won’t push.” She nodded her head toward the end of the room where they had enough room to move. “Let’s get my muscles remembering at least.” Standing close enough to the bed’s footboard to catch herself, Shepard took a balanced shooting stance. She lifted her make believe Ingrid to her shoulder, couching the stock as comfortably as she could.
Liara’s smile shone as she stepped up in front of Shepard. “Good. They’re really pleased with your progress, Shepard. Your skills tested in the ninetieth percentile yesterday. Your assault rifle score was perfect.” Warm, soft hands closed over Shepard’s temples.

“Yeah, perfect.” Shepard met the asari’s stare. Try as she might to avoid flinching, each and every time Liara’s eyes turned black and Shepard felt those fingers of consciousness crawl through her eyes and into her mind, she had to clench her teeth and lock every joint to keep herself from jumping away. Still, once the connection was made and Liara moved behind her, the light touch returning to Shepard’s temples, it became bearable.

An image of a forest appeared in Shepard’s mind and she shook her head, her mind telling Liara to find something else.

_Not Mindoir. Never Mindoir._

_“Apologies, Shepard.”_

The scene changed to an open desert under a full moon. Shepard grinned as she looked over the low scrub lands from atop a mesa. Arizona. Her father had taken them to the desert for vacation when she was twelve. Two adult coyotes and a trio of whelps trotted along a dry wash carved into the lowest part of the canyon. The adults tracked a scent, weaving back and forth, yipping softly at one another.

Movement in the scrub closer to her brought her rifle around. At the periphery of her awareness, she felt Liara moving inside her mind, slipping along the pathways that guided Shepard’s hand to the manual focus on her scope. Most used autofocus and mods that adjusted aim for the shooter’s biometrics … practically taking the shot for them, but not her. She thrived on setting up the shot, every detail an act of love.

A Mule doe browsed through mesquite, picking off the choicest bits. Shepard watched her for a moment, delighting in the way the muscles rippled beneath her hide, the bright sparkle of her eyes … the way her head popped up every few seconds, large ears swiveling around, attentive to every sound. Breathing deep, Shepard rooted herself, center of gravity lowering as her consciousness flowed down the barrel, an extension of her entire being as it crossed the distance between rifle and target. Settled, she let a long, slow breath out, then squeezed. The shot hit true, tearing through the mesquite leaf at the end of the doe’s muzzle.

Leaping up, the doe pivoted in midair and bounded along the slope, disappearing into the night. Three more shots, three more victims exploded, green bodies strewn to the wind, chlorophyll soaking into the hungry sand.

_“A little dramatic for some dead leaves. But fine shooting.”_

Shepard just grinned as the asari’s thoughts brushed hers. “I didn’t feel your influence after I started focusing,” she said out loud as she lowered the rifle.

Liara released the captain’s head and stepped around front. “You didn’t need me. Those neural pathways are healed and active.” Liara shifted from foot to foot, dipping her head a little as she spoke.
Odd how Shepard hadn’t noticed before how the asari rarely stopped moving. When standing, she swayed like a poplar sapling in the breeze. Sitting, her hands and head remained perpetually in motion. Shepard smiled and reached out to grip her young friend’s shoulder. “They’re healed and active thanks in no small part to you.” Her hands settled back to her fake rifle, holding it in a natural low ready, and for a moment, tears threatened, brought on by the most amazing feeling of rightness. Captain Jane Shepard, N7, had begun to assert herself.

Thank the sweet baby Jesus.

Liara glanced toward the door as if somewhere a clock ticked down on a curfew. “Will you join me in the commissary for the evening meal?”

Shepard grinned and held out an arm toward the door. “Sure, I’ll meet you down there at 1830.” At the threshold, she passed the asari the mock rifle. “Here, you’d better take it back since you signed it out. There’s probably five forms to fill out if I sign it back in.”

“In triplicate,” Liara replied. She took the weapon and walked away two strides before she turned back. “You should probably watch walking around without the cane where the cameras can see you.”

Shepard winced, but grinned. “Thanks, I’ll remember that.”

When Liara headed back on her way, Shepard hobbled back to her bed, using the wall as support. Stupid, forgetting to cover how well she could move. She remained a long way from her old strength, and would need the advantage of surprise if anyone came at her.

She frowned as she sat on the side of her bed and lifted the nightgown off her walker’s basket. A variety of scavenged bits and pieces of tech lay in the bottom. She gathered them all up and placed them on her bed, then sat crosslegged with her back to the cameras. No doubt Miranda knew about the pilfered tech, bloody cameras watched from everywhere, but no need to give them a good look at what she was doing.

“What’s this project?” the soft, raspy voice asked from the other side of the grate.

Glancing up to meet Al’s stare, she smiled. “This little beauty is for you, actually. The plan is to link our omnitools so we can send information back and forth.” She sorted through the pile for a micro transmitter and set to work. “I just need a couple of more components to be able to run a decent hack on their systems. I won’t be able to get into anything secure, but I won’t need to. I think I can figure out how many ‘specimens’ they’re holding here just by checking the kitchen records, housekeeping … the unsecured systems.”

He chuckled. “Do you think they realize how devious you are?”

A bright grin greeted that. “I sure hope not. At least not for a couple more days. I need to figure out a way to get us the hell out of here before they do.” She glanced over her shoulder at the camera. “You getting all this? Jail break being planned, right here … right now. Take notes.”

19 Days ASR

Shepard glanced across the desk at Liara, the asari engrossed in whatever she was doing. After a second, she sighed and turned back to her drudgery. Math tests. Funny, but she had a vague recollection of graduating high school in the distant past … back when she had pimples and arms and legs too gangly and awkward for her admittedly limited stature. She grinned. Oh … and back when Bobby Wilson occupied three out of every four thoughts. Good old blond haired, blue eyed Bobby Wilson. Best part of high school. She frowned, then popped her eyebrows. Only good part of high school, actually.

Focus, dammit. Do the damned test so you can get down to the range and do something that will actually prove useful.

Shepard flipped down the screen, checking off the answers. All of them insultingly simple algebra and calculus for an engineer. She checked off a few wrong answers just to keep her jailers guessing, then submitted it. Leaning back in her chair, she stared at Liara, wiggling her eyebrows, sticking out her tongue … flaring her nostrils. The asari remained oblivious.

“No damned fun,” she sighed and looked back down at her monitor.

A message along the top read, “Shepard, stop throwing in wrong answers. Score: 100.”

Shepard slapped the back of her hand over her mouth to hide her grin. Her adversaries proved cagey ones. Yesterday, Miranda had known when she skewed the results of her shooting test, and now even Kelly was catching on to her. She stared at the letters glowing on the screen and wondered how many of her other secrets weren’t secrets. Hopefully the modifications to her computer still slipped beneath the operative’s all-seeing notice. The footage she looped through her room’s security cameras took a great deal of ingenuity to do well. She’d had to splice days worth of tedious tasks and reading to create a new hour long movie every day.

“Staring into space won’t get you released any sooner.” Liara glanced up, a slight smile tipping off the corner of her mouth.

“What are you working on?” Shepard leaned, craning to see around the large vid screen. Whatever it was, it couldn’t possibly be more boring than the incessant testing. After reading a few lines backwards, she reconsidered.

“I’m working with a human researcher by the name of Dr. Garret Bryson,” Liara replied, surprising Shepard, who never expected to get an actual answer. The asari grinned, obviously excited. “We’re looking into cross-cultural legends of space-faring monsters.”

“Oh!” Shepard grinned. “Looking for the giant squid behind our Reaper Kraken?” Her heart sped up, her fingers and face tingling as the implications registered. “That’s brilliant,” she replied.

“You can thank Joker.” Liara turned her monitor sideways so they could both look on. “It was his idea to see if we could track down Reaper corpses.” Her grin widened. “Anyway, Dr. Bryson made contact with an eccentric volus billionaire by the name of Kumun Shol. Shol claims that a vision of some higher power told him to go to Klencory to find the lost crypts of the beings of light. These beings of light were embroiled in a war against evil machines bent on destroying all life.”

Shepard considered the asari, a thoughtful frown creasing her brow, her eyes narrowing as if to peer straight through Liara. “Protheans? The crypts of the beings of light could be a Prothean archive or something.”

Liara nodded and brought up a surface scan of the planet. “Klencory is a toxic, horrible world, so everyone thought he was mad, but he sent us these scans yesterday.” She pointed to an area where the rock and ice definitely looked to be shaped by hands rather than nature. “What if it is a bunker like the one on Eden Prime?”
Shepard’s eyebrows rose as her memory triggered. “Whatever happened with that find? Did you get into the area that still had power?”

Anger cut through Liara’s smile, her face darkening. “Yes. I sent them funding and a dig team to help. They’d just excavated that section when a whole series of equipment malfunctions kept them out of the area for a couple of days. Despite their security, when the team went back in, they discovered that someone had removed one of the stasis pods.”

“What?” Shepard lunged forward in her chair a little. “Was there any sign the pod was functional?” The possibilities roared inside her skull like a surging tide.

“Impossible to tell,” Liara replied, “but there were a lot of intact pods in that section that appeared to have been deactivated over time in order to conserve power for the unit that was taken, so my guess is yes, it had power. If the prothean inside was alive … .” Hunching a little as she shook her head, Liara looked down keying in commands to change the monitor view to a closer scan, then overlaid another scan.

“This second scan is the Eden Prime site,” she said.

“They’re almost identical.” Shepard stood and leaned closer, reaching up to trace the lines with a finger. “There could be living protheans under there.” A slow, calculating smile bloomed as she slipped back into her chair. Other protheans … a faint sigh greeted that thought. Protheans … even a few last remnants having survived the extinction … . Yearning, sweet and aching, swelled in her chest and burned behind her eyes as Tashac keened … a low, tremulous chant of longing for her mate’s hand, warm and gentle against her face … for children long passed to dust … for the lilting song of her language. Shepard’s eyes closed as she pushed back the prothean’s memories, refusing to shed tears for losses fifty thousand years distant.

Why are you so far away from him when he is just a few memories away?

Shepard gave her head a hard shake as she opened her eyes and focused on her computer. “Sounds like a promising lead,” she said to Liara without looking up. Time to focus on getting free and back to her own life … a life only two years dead. A life where she’d actually be able to go to Klencory and see Kumun Shol’s discovery with her own eyes.

A message awaited her, flashing on the monitor. Yet another test, but at least that one actually posed a challenge requiring more than two brain cells firing at the same time. Emergency vehicle repairs, defusing explosives, hacking through layered encryption … the work of the combat engineer. She set to it, wading into it like a lake in August, finding the familiar work welcoming and refreshing. From the moment Miranda woke her up, Shepard hadn’t experienced very many moments of feeling competent or even whole. For the most part, frustration at the lack of all her defining characteristics, skills, and abilities dogged her every faltering step. Until the last couple of days she felt like Frankenstein’s monster in truth: all parts and pieces stitched together but none belonging to the rest or to whom she used to be.

She finished the engineering test, her heart light, her fingers quick and steady over the interface. Jane Shepard had come back from the dead, maybe not whole … maybe not brilliant and maybe not happy, but at least she was reaching functional. She could work with functional. She could make a start from functional.

A test of problem solving and strategic planning followed the engineering quiz, then one on history and the Alliance.

Shepard looked down the questions on the formation of the Council and Spectres and turned to the camera. “Okay, this is taking the whole high school thing too far. History? I remember high school, Dr. Kelly. I swear … you make me go through puberty again, I’ll strangle you with Miranda’s catsuit.”

The screen flashed. “Promises. Promises.”

Halfway through the test her omnitool zapped her … a sharp sting against the soft skin inside her wrist. “Ow,” she grumbled softly, rubbing it. A single line message appeared to let her know that her hack was complete. She closed the message. It would have to wait until her tests and shooting practice and physio finished for the day. Damn. She glanced toward the bathroom. It would only take a second . . . .

Yeah, a second to discover enough to pique your interest and make it even harder to get through the next couple of hours. Focus, damn it. You’re getting somewhere. Don’t blow it.

* * * * *

“So this worm of yours discovered a lot of dextro food coming in as well as food sterilizers?” Al shook his head as he shifted, trying to find a comfortable position. “Sterilizers could mean a couple of things but most likely quarians.”

Shepard pointed to a couple of other supplies she found suspicious, but couldn’t for the life of her figure out why. “These supplements … I know I’ve seen them before.” She beat at her memory, but didn’t manage to get past the word on the tip of her tongue stage.

She moved down to the daily allotment of food going to each of many rooms “So, either there are small villages staying in some of these rooms, or they are running some pretty overclocked biotics.”

Al chuffed and straightened a little. “I don’t eat like these people are.”

Shepard laughed and stuck her fingers through the grate to stroke his jaw. “Not on days like today, but when you were all super-turian, I swear they just chucked whole space cows in there for you to gnaw your way through.”

He chuffed again, but a chuckle followed close on its heels.

She let out a slow sigh, glad that he had recovered enough to show some humour. Focusing back on the small screen, she went down the list.

“Oh, so there are at least thirty of us.” She let out a long, slow breath. Damn, so many. Too many. “I can’t see them caring enough about my cooperation to allow me to blackmail them out of thirty projects. You and maybe a couple more … sure, but not thirty.”

“So you leave them behind.”

The skin between her brows and around her eyes pinched into a pained grimace as she leaned down to meet his stare. “Not acceptable.” His mandibles fluttered, melting away her frown. “Oh, I see how it is,” she said and chuckled. “Manipulate Shepard out of her funk. Very nice.” Still, his ploy worked, as ideas about how to organize a mass breakout began to flow. Being trapped on a space station proved the most formidable hurdle. Turning everyone loose on a planet … sure, but there they’d all just get recaptured.

“It might be impossible to get everyone out of here, Shepard.” Al’s milky eyes stared into hers, no sign of manipulation in his expression, just the ugly truth. “What about getting out and coming back? Bringing council authorities or Spectres?”

“Nothing’s impossible, Al. Nothing. If I have to bring this entire place down around their ears, I’ll do it.” She fixed her attention back on the camera, a cold smile cutting across her face. “And you know I can, don’t you?”
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Twenty Six

Chapter Summary

Garrus comes face to face with the unexpected, and the enemy's trap springs.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Perir - (Peririn plural) Turian male under the age of 15.

18 Days ASR

Garrus stepped out of the cab and looked around the Presidium. It felt as though cycles had gone by since he last stood amidst the gleaming white structures and pristine lakes. Everything registered too bright, the light harsh and glaring, the gardens painfully garish. He shifted in his armour, feeling exposed and unshielded, like standing too close to the sun.

He glanced over at Martin, seeing that the kid felt as uneasy and out of place as he did. "Never thought Omega would seem like home," he said, letting out a long breath. Stretching his shoulders, he tried to ease the tension that twisted his muscles into steel bands. Instead of releasing, it just made everything ache a little more. Damn, he really needed to start sleeping without waking up every hour on the hour, panicked and breathless. Sometimes it took almost a full minute before his surroundings registered, dispelling Haestrom's cold, stone tomb and pool of blood.

"Still think we should have brought a protection detail," Martin grumbled, breaking through the clammy frost of Garrus's thoughts. The kid scanned the crowd, his hand resting on his sidearm. "I know you think Daro'Xen was just blowing hot air, but after Haestrom …." He cracked his neck then nodded toward Barla Von's office. "Let's get this meeting over with and get the hell out of here."

Garrus couldn't argue with that. The press of people sank icy talons into the base of his spine, every nerve ending screaming a warning. As much as he wanted to dismiss it all as paranoia and a touch of PTSD from Haestrom, he couldn't manage it.

"So, why are we here?" Martin asked. Eyes in constant motion, he swept the area, muttering to himself about the area being too exposed. He detoured a few paces to stare into a car parked next to the cab stand. Two figures sat within, barely visible through the tinted windows. The kid's hand tightened on his sidearm, and he backed the rest of the way to the door. "Don't you normally just meet with Von over the QEC?"

Garrus paused, hand raised to hit the intercom. "I do, but apparently a group of batarian art collectors sent a buyer who is worried that the artifacts and art are stolen." He shrugged. "Anyway, the buyer wanted to meet me personally before negotiating to purchase any of it, and we need these funds right now. Badly." He hit the comm. "So we're here, appeasing some art collectors so our people can eat and our ships can fly, instead of saving Wrex's clan." He clenched his teeth and forced the frustration aside. They'd be on their way in a few hours.

"Come in, General," Barla Von's breathy rasp said through the speaker.
The door opened to reveal the normally spartan office crowded with some of the larger sculptures from Hock's Beckenstein home. Four massive krogan guards glowered in the corners of the room, looking enough like statues to blend in. Garrus weaved his way through, spotting Von and the buyer at the far end by the desk.

"What I want to know, Mr. Von, is why these artifacts aren't in museums somewhere," a strident female voice called. Garrus frowned a little at the lilting accent, the way the sentence went up at the end almost like song. "Why are they being auctioned off instead of being turned over to the appropriate governments?"

"At Captain Shepard's insistence," Von replied, pausing for breath, "the entire collection …" Breath."… was offered directly …" Breath."… to museums and galleries before …" Breath."… being offered for sale."

Garrus plastered on his diplomat smile as he stepped around a huge krogan statue and saw a small woman in a smartly tailored suit looming over the squat broker.

"Captain Shepard was very adamant," Garrus broke in, not willing to listen to Von wheeze his way through the entire spiel, "that only state treasures be made available to governments. She was worried that they'd disappear into private collections or be used to broker back room deals instead of being returned to the people. These pieces were all offered to public venues, but not claimed." He moved to shake her hand and introduce himself, but she turned to face him.

"You're telling me that a Picasso went unclaimed?" she demanded, her entire being crackling with an all too familiar fire. "Sweet Jesus, and you expect me to believe that?"

The woman strode toward him, all flashing green eyes, red hair, and … Garrus staggered back, a hand buttressing against the statue to help hold him on his feet as a heady rush of dizziness washed over him … and a riot of freckles stampeding across her nose and cheekbones.

Garrus's knees buckled, his entire body suddenly ice cold, but for the fiery sting that burned through his hands and feet. He caught himself before he went down. "Dear spirits."

"General?" Martin stepped up beside Garrus, reaching out to grip the general's arm. "Are you okay? Wha—" The kid froze as still as death except for his fingers on Garrus's arm, which tightened painfully, squeezing the edge of the general's armour into his flesh.

The pain barely registered as Garrus stared into the eyes of a ghost.

"Shepard?" Martin whispered, his voice just a soft moan of sound.

A faint keen spooled from Garrus's second larynx as the question broke the spell that locked his brain down tight. He blinked, his eyes suddenly able to pick out the differences between the woman preserved in his memory and the one standing before him. Face thicker through the cheekbones and jaw, her skin not drawn as tightly … deep lines of age and care carved around her nose and mouth … body taller and stockier but not as straight and sharp, the edges ground down … Nonetheless, he found himself staring—mouth and mandibles hanging slack—at the very image of the woman he would have called bond-mate in forty cycles time.

The buyer lurched to a halt, her scowl deepening as her eyes took on a wary, haunted cast. "Are you all right?"

Martin released Garrus's arm and rushed forward, startling the frown off the woman's face. "You've got to be Lucille—"
Regaining his senses, Garrus stepped forward, grabbing Martin's arm to pull him back. They didn't want to scare the woman out of her mind. "Sorry about that," he said, struggling to keep his voice soft even as his emotions rampaged, slamming back and forth between joy, longing, and anger. "Please forgive my eager young friend. It's been a long trip."

He offered his hand. "General Garrus Vakarian," he said, then nodded toward Martin. "And this is Martin Weaver. I apologize that our awkward entrance didn't allow Barla Von to make proper introductions." He took a step forward.

Ignoring his hand, the woman edged toward the door, the haunted look turning to that of a drellak having caught a predator's scent. "My name is Seiben Krellid."

A soft growl rumbled from Garrus's throat before he could choke it off. The name … her slave name … burned like bile in his throat. Seiben … seiben translated to forty-nine in batarian. No way in hell he'd call her that.

Suddenly, the car outside registered, and he cursed his idiocy. Of course she was scared. She was a slave, her handlers were parked right outside the door, and two morons staggered in acting like … well morons, using her proper name and asking questions.

She circled around the other side of the statue, heading for the door. "I'm sorry, I've made a mistake. I'm sure these artifacts are all being offered legally. I'll recommend that my employers—"

Garrus ducked between her and the threshold, heart racing, his hands trembling as they leapt up, pleading with her not to run. "No, please … I'm the one who should be sorry," he said, backtracking. "We reacted badly to a simple case of mistaken identity." He smiled and gestured toward the art. "Please, allow us to give you whatever information and assurances your employers need."

Martin stepped forward, but Garrus shook his head, silencing him even as the kid opened his mouth. They'd been far too ham-fisted already. They needed to back off and give everyone a couple of moments to process.

"Are those your people outside in the car?" Garrus asked, stepping off to the side to allow her an escape route, his training finally overriding his emotions. "Would you feel better if we invited them inside?"

Backing up a step, she shook her head, the fear in her eyes telling Garrus that as much freedom as she appeared to have, she remained closely monitored and under extreme duress. He stepped further to the side, trying to check for any sign of a control device without being obvious. He didn't see anything, but her high collar and the tight bun of hair at the nape of her neck could easily hide a subtle interface.

His gut twisted as he faced what must be one of the universe's cruelest jokes. The resemblance … . Why did Shepard have to be the very image of her mother? No. He shoved aside the anchor of longing that lodged behind his keel. Time for damage control.

He gestured toward a painting, throwing the subject into a 180 degree turn. "I've never really understood this sort of painting." That simply stated truth threw up a wall, and he let out a thin sigh of relief. And it was true; the blocky, warped shapes made no sense to him. "It's human in origin, though, isn't it?"

The rigid planes of her face relaxed slightly, and two hesitant steps eased her away from the door. "Yes. I'm surprised none of the galleries you approached took it. It's called Guernica. It's a very famous work by an artist called Picasso."

"I find it a little unsettling, if I'm honest," he said, twisting his head around to look at the painting sideways.

A thin smile broke through the panic, the expression only lifting one corner of her mouth. He gawked, the crooked smile and the glint in her eye so familiar that a hand wrapped around his throat, cutting off his air.

She took a step forward and ran reverent fingers along the edge of the frame as she replied, "Picasso certainly isn't to everyone's taste."

Garrus glanced toward the door, then opened his omnitool, sending a message to Martin to get a datapad from Von. He needed to communicate with Lucy without terrifying her half to death or alerting her keepers. If anything he said or did made them suspicious, they'd rush in and spirit her away. He'd never find her again. More importantly, he knew deep in his bones that she'd suffer for his mistakes. "It's certainly not turian," he replied.

"All of this art came from the collection of one man?" Lucy asked. She turned a slow circle, but her eyes returned to lock onto Garrus, her breathing fast and shallow.

"This is just a few pieces," Garrus replied. "Captain Shepard …" He leaned down a little as he held the woman's gaze. " … said that he possessed the head from a statue called Lady Liberty." He shrugged. "That one was returned to the Systems Alliance."

"The Statue of Liberty?" Her words hissed slightly as she forced them through a clenched jaw. "Who was this man? He must have been a very good thief or insanely wealthy."

Martin passed Garrus a datapad, into which the general typed, "Are you Lucille Marie Shepard? How are they monitoring you? Are you wired with a control device?" before passing it over.

"Here is a manifest of the items," he said, in case the handlers had eyes in the room. "As for the previous collector … he was a bit of both along with a healthy dose of old world gangster." Garrus watched her for any sign of flight as she read his message. He let out a breath he didn't even realize he'd been holding when she replied instead of tossing the datapad at him and running for the door.

"I like this one," Martin said, seeming to clue in. He walked over to a statue of a rachni queen. He folded his arms as he leaned on one hip to regard it. "Looks just like Amalair."

Lucy glanced toward the threshold before she passed back the datapad. She turned to follow Martin, putting the massive stone krogan between her and the door.

"That's an extraordinarily interesting piece," she said. "I ran radiometric dating on it, and it predates the Prothean Empire by over a hundred thousand years. It's composed of an alloy I've never experienced before. The implications of its existence are staggering, and to think it was sitting in someone's vault."

Garrus winced, wondering how Von's expert had missed that vital piece of information. "Okay, this one goes back into our vault until we know what to do with it." He looked around, wondering how many priceless artifacts had slipped through their hands. He nodded for Martin to keep up the conversation while he focused on Lucy's text.

"I am no one."

A sigh greeted that simple sentence, the four words dragging more weariness from his bones than he could ever recall feeling, even after Shepard died. How could Garrus face his love on the day of their reunion only to tell her that he'd failed her, leaving her mother in captivity? He needed to convince Lucy to trust him, to take a chance.

He watched her, looking for the signs he'd seen in long held slaves ... signs of being broken. She was clearly nervous, but held herself straight and strong, her head not hanging from her shoulders. Of course, if she behaved that way, they'd never be able to send her out into the galaxy. She'd be useless as a broker, unwilling to stand up in negotiations, fighting down to the last for the best deal. No, either because of her gift or some extraordinary act of will, he didn't believe her broken, just understandably terrified.

He turned back to the datapad. "If you are Lucille Shepard, Cpt. Jane Shepard, the woman who acquired all this art, was your daughter. Just before she died, she asked me to find Bunny. She believed you were dead." He hesitated, staring at the pad without seeing it as he debated the wisdom of showing his entire hand, Deciding that he didn't have time to play coy, he added, "I know this is sudden, and that you're scared. Jane was important to me. Please, I made a her a promise, one I can't keep if you don't trust me."

Garrus looked up as Martin spoke. "So this one is illegal?" The kid let out a merry cackle. "Elcor pornography! Nice." He turned to Garrus, stabbing a thumb toward a sculpture that Garrus didn't feel the need to examine too closely all of the sudden. "Elcor porn. Illegal on Dekunna and all elcor colonies." Martin bent over to look at it upside down. "Oh yeah! I see it now. Wow, who would have thought they could get into that position?"

Barla Von waddled over, twisting to look at the sculpture from every angle his squat form could manage. "We are not asking enough for this piece." He sucked in a long breath. "Vol-clan knows a diplomat who will pay three times the catalogue price."

Garrus hoped Lucy's employers weren't interested in any of the pieces that were headed back to vaults or had steadily increasing price tags. He passed her the datapad, turning himself so that he wouldn't be tempted to try to make sense out of the twisted forms and tangled appendages. Somethings he did not need to know about the elcor. "We could take it back to base just to irritate Melanis. She could complain about it, maybe take some of the heat off Zaeed."

Martin cackled. "You know that he just keeps hanging Winter Garden up to piss her off."

"Winter Garden?" Lucy asked, stepping toward them. Although she kept her voice tightly controlled, and her fascination and excitement for the art had outweighed her flight response, a sheen of sweat across her brow and the back of her neck betrayed the toll his pushing was taking on her.

She talked and typed, doing a far better job of keeping both conversations going than he was. Of course, he supposed that she had far more to lose. "You have Winter Garden in your possession?" she asked. "It's the most notorious painting in the history of galactic civilization." She returned the datapad in a casual handoff as she stepped past Garrus. "A string of more than seventeen people have died while in possession of that painting."

Martin groaned and slumped against Von's desk. "Oh great. Another one of Zaeed's sole survivor stories in the making."

Garrus opened his mouth to answer, but Von stepped in, the financier explaining that the asari relic was stored for safekeeping, and not for sale. Leaving it to Von and Martin to keep Lucy talking, he looked down at what she'd written.
"I saw a young woman on the news years ago," Garrus read. "I couldn't take my eyes off her ... that beautiful woman my dead child could've grown into. I charged into the master's study demanding to know if Janey had survived. He shoved my face into a holo of my husband's corpse embracing my dead child and whipped me bloody. I did not ask again."

Garrus looked up, blinded by rage and sorrow until he saw his tears reflected back in her eyes. But then Lucy straightened, drawing herself up behind a clenched jaw. She wiped at her eyes, the gesture as fierce as it was familiar. He let out a sharp exhalation as Lucille Shepard vanished behind the memory of her daughter. How could the universe be considered just or kind when it pulled shit like this? An indignant fury flared at the base of his spine, scorching its way up through his nervous system. He'd bleed those fuckers for every last drop of suffering owed to Kahri ... her mother ... her siblings ... all of them.

Snapping straight and rigid, he choked the anger and pain down, returning to Lucy's words.

"I am a slave, General," she wrote. "When I leave, I'll be hurried into a car, then shoved into a box at the dock. That box won't open until I'm inside my master's compound where I'll be stripped, hosed down, and then whipped because I've spoken outside my script. That life does not leave room for speculation or daydreaming over dead children."

Vomit burned its way up his throat, but before he could do anything more than let out a strangled moan, Lucy stepped into his space and gripped his hand. He tried to return her stare, but couldn't manage to get past her neck. A vivid red scar peeked out from beneath her collar.

"And Captain Shepard?" Lucy asked, her voice tight and nasal, losing some of its music in her battle against her emotions. "You said she's dead?"

The question smashed through his last hope of control, silent tears burning their way from the corners of this eyes. Swallowing what felt like a grenade, he nodded, then raised the pad to type a reply. If her handlers had orders to keep her away from any mention of her children, they wouldn't let that conversation go unchallenged.

Instead, she took it from his hands, and with a single glance toward the door, entered, "You loved my daughter, didn't you?"

He read it through the back of the small screen, but just took the pad back, frantic talons tapping the interface. "We need to get you away from these bastards. Come with us. There are only two of them out there. We can protect you."

"She was shot," Martin replied to Lucy's question. "The day the council made her the first human __"

"Do you have any other questions about the authenticity of the art?" Garrus asked over the rest of the kid's reply as he handed Lucy the datapad once again.

"I'm satisfied with your explanation of how they came into your organization's possession," she said even as she entered text, "and if they have already been offered to museums, I have no qualms about them finding a place in my employers' private collections." She looked up and smiled, the same tight press of lips and softening around her eyes. "They'll be pleased to know there won't be any title issues. They're very excited about several of the pieces you're offering." She closed her hand around his talons for a moment before relinquishing the pad.

"Excellent." He lifted the datapad, but kept his eyes focused on Lucy. So close. This imperfect avatar held his love so close, but still beyond his grasp. A fierce, aching hunger welled up, clawing its way out of the ground, frantic, grasping fingers clambering up his body. It dug through the seams and gaps in his armour only to burrow through his hide and take root in his bones. So damned close. For the space of three, impossibly arduous breaths he almost turned and strode out the door. Too much … it was all too much to ask of him.

Instead, he sucked in a fourth, ragged breath and took refuge behind the mask of diplomat/salesman as he said, "Our organization is expanding rapidly at the moment and can certainly use the influx of funds." He closed his eyes, shoring up the walls before he looked down at what Lucy had written.

"I have seven children. As long as I behave and bury him in credits, he keeps them out of the mines and the brothels." Beneath that she'd entered a series of coordinates. "The bastard operates five facilities that I know of. You'll need to hit them all simultaneously." Garrus took his first deep, clean breath since entering the office and looked up, admiration for her courage burning warm and deep, setting loose all the knots tied in his gut. Painful or not, he'd do what he needed to do.

There's no doubt where you came from, Kahri.

After he was done on Tuchanka, he'd get Nihlus and Anderson together with his contacts in the sapient trafficking division of C-Sec. Maybe Nihlus could bring in a few Spectres as well. Regardless, they'd make sure that Lucy Shepard and her children were free citizens within the month. He wouldn't rest until he saw it done.

He glanced back down at the last line. "Is Bunny alive?" The depth of hope and fear expressed in the three simple words dragged a soft, trilling keen along the underside of his breath.

Holding Lucy's stare, Garrus nodded. "As far as I know," he answered out loud, allowing her courage to fill him … to defy their cruelty … their stranglehold of terror. He knew where to find her, and when he rolled into their home, the slaving bastards would learn what it meant to be afraid.

The door opened, and two massive batarians in expensive armour lumbered through, intractable walls of muscle and arrogance. As much as he accepted the inevitability of their entry, as much as he knew he needed to let her leave with them, it took every ounce of Garrus's self-control to keep his hand off his sidearm. He clamped his jaw down on his fury … his disgust, both at the horror of what Lucy and her children had lived through for more than a decade …

… and at his inability to just pull her into his arms, to throw himself between her and harm … to protect her as he'd been unable to protect Shepard.

"Have you concluded your business?" one of the batarians demanded, shoving his bulk between Lucy and the rest of them.

Lucy lowered her head. "Yes. It's good news. The buyers will be pleased." She bowed slightly to Barla Von and then Martin. "It has been a pleasure, gentlemen." Stepping around the batarian, she took Garrus's hand again, squeezing his talons in a way that told him not to worry, that she'd happily take what awaited her if it meant freedom for her and her children. "I'm very glad to have met you, General. Thank you for the information. I feel much better about recommending these purchases."

He gripped her fingers when she pulled them back, unable to let go. How could he just let her leave knowing what would happen to her? She yanked her hand free. He sucked in a long breath and met her stare with a resolute nod. If she was brave enough to go back, he could find the courage to let her go. "I look forward to doing business with your employers. Take care." He stepped back, watching after her as the thugs surrounded her, escorting her out.
"Well," Martin said after the door closed, "guess that explains how Shepard knew so much about art, huh?"

Garrus felt the starved longing return, burning through him like a wildfire. He let it flare, trusting it to settle as he held himself back from running out the door. Two bullets. It would only take two bullets. Gripping that knowledge, that certainty, he tucked the bullets away, saving them for when they wouldn't cost Lucy what little she still held dear.

'Less than a month,' he promised, the oath more rather than less sincere for its silence.

He turned and passed Martin the datapad. "It does at that, kid." As the longing, the loneliness prompted by the glimpse into Shepard's stolen future, began to ebb, weaving into thick cables of connection, he laughed, sharp and clear as glass. Of all the things he could have expected to happen that day, finding his Kahri's mother would never have occurred to him.

Barla Von looked back and forth between them, his round body pivoting along with his head. "Vol-clan appears to have missed important context."

Garrus patted the volus on the back, the action reasserting reality. He still had a great deal to get done. "It's okay, let's get to the rest of our business. I need to send my family on their way home, and then get to Tuchanka and stop a friend from doing something stupid." He sat at the desk, but caught Martin by the arm before the young man could join them. "Head out and see if you can reach my father … get a sitrep."

As casual as he tried to appear, he felt his heartbeat like the timer on that bomb ticking down.

"I want to come to Tuchanka with you, Garrus." Solana stopped so suddenly at the threshold of the boarding lounge that Garrus ran up her heels. She whirled around to face him, giving him a shove when she smacked into his armour. "I can help."

Garrus staggered back a step, a broad grin meeting his sister's petulance. Her fire set off a nostalgic ache behind his keel. His strong, stubborn, impossible Sol. He swallowed an apology for having left her behind so completely, and embraced her, gripping her shoulders tight. The time for apologies had long passed. Time to step up and do better.

"I know, and I fully expect you to be involved in Archangel now that you've had a taste of it, but first you need to get Mari home." Releasing her, he stepped back, regarding her with a combination of awe and astonishment. When had his baby sister stopped playing warrior and turned into one?

"When Pari gets home, come out to Omega, and I'll put you to work, but for now … ." He ducked his head in a shrug consisting mostly of guilt. "It seems as though the entire galaxy is gunning for me, Sol, and I have to make sure that Mari is protected if they try to come at me through the family."

"I'm standing right here, Garrus," his mother said, fisted talons planting firmly on her hips. "And rumour has it that I was a soldier and a cop long before I became your pathetic, infirm, little old matrula. I can take care of myself."

"Forget that my poor old mari could hand me my backside or my head sixteen different ways?" He chuckled and backed up a step, his hands lifting to ward off an attack. "Spirits forbid such a thing happen." The hard core of truth behind his teasing set like steel in his spine. He came from a long line of honour and battle-hardened warriors, male and female alike. Sadness trickled through him as he wished that the three fierce warrior-women in his life had been granted a chance to meet.
As if able to read his thoughts, his mari stepped forward and held out her arms. A wide smile, and a quick snap of her mandibles answered his teasing. "I'm tempted to remind you and send Sol to Tuchanka, but I'll indulge you this once. Mostly because I don't want my daughter anywhere near the combination of enraged krogan and giant explosive devices." She gripped Garrus's shoulders when he stepped into her arms. "Be careful, and send your pari home when it's over. I've gotten used to having him around." Her mandibles flicked. "I sort of enjoy it."

"Just sort of?" Garrus chuckled as he leaned in to touch his brow to hers. "I'll do my best." He pulled away and reached over to give Sol a playful shove. "Safe trip home, and I'll see you later."

Sol arched her neck a little and turned away, the very picture of haughty. "You can count on it." Tossing a grin over her shoulder, she held out her arm to usher their mother into the security line.

"We have clearance for the relay in twenty-three minutes," Martin said from behind Garrus's left shoulder.

The general just nodded, watching after his family, savouring the gift he'd taken for granted far too long. He'd be glad to have Sol join him out on Omega. He missed her.

They turned to wave at the gate, then disappeared down the docking arm. Letting out a sharp breath, he spun on his talons and strode for the elevator. "Twenty-three minutes? Guess we'd better get moving." He gave Martin a hearty slap on the back as he passed, joy and purpose lifting him higher than he'd felt since Shepard died. She might be gone, but she'd left him a hell of a lot to live for. Shame it took him nearly two cycles to see it.

"Been a hell of a day, hasn't it, kid?"

Martin grinned. "That it has, General."

When they reached the Passch, Garrus paused at the bottom of the stairs to the bridge while Martin turned toward the elevator.

"I'm headed to the galley and then to take a nap. I'm a slave to a cruel overlord who refuses to feed me," the kid hollered down the length of the CIC. "Captain L'Tsai, I want to lodge a formal complaint. Seven hours! Seven long, starving hours since I was last allowed to eat."

The asari captain turned from her console next to the galaxy map to watch the young man approach. "I will lodge a complaint … on behalf of the general … accompanied by a request that he be assigned a left hand smart enough to pack a couple of dried fruit bars and a bottle of water when going on a mission."

Martin just sputtered, prompting a grin wide enough that Garrus could make it out from across the deck. He turned away from the confrontation even as Martin bristled, revving up a full dose of smartass.

Even after travelling from Omega to the Citadel with a skeleton crew—most of his people had been reassigned to the vessels in drydock—Garrus still felt as though the ship had been deserted. He climbed the stairs into the bridge, the ghost ship feeling gnawing away at his bright spirits. Only Mi'khal Tref, the batarian beta-shift pilot, sat at his station.

"Come to watch the magic happen?" Mi'khal asked. The easy-going, affable pilot tossed a toothy grin over his shoulder.

"You know it." Garrus rested a hand on the back of the empty co-pilot chair and let out a long breath. "I just thought the ship might feel less empty up here."
Mi'khal shuddered. "It doesn't though, does it?" The batarian glanced around even as his fingers tapped the interface, entering the data needed for their jump. A veteran smuggler, he'd logged twice as many hours as most Alliance pilots, taking the helm of a dozen different classes of ships before Archangel took down the smuggling ring he worked for. Grateful for a second chance, he'd campaigned heavily for one of the six coveted spots piloting the Passchendaele.

"So many empty stations is creeping me out." A shudder rocketed up the batarian's spine, violent enough to make his chair rattle. "I've got one of those feelings," he continued. "One of those … smuggling a container that I'm pretty sure is full of something horrible, but I'm too afraid to look … feelings." He shuddered again. "I'll be happy to leave Tuchanka behind and get our asses back to Omega. I'm hoping it's just the creeps, but I keep coming back to something being off, General. Keep sharp."

The pilot turned his attention to the relay as they began their run. Garrus watched, a familiar thrill tingling down his arms as they flew toward the gigantic structure. Awe riveted him to the deck plating. The sheer primal force needed to bend time and space stole the breath from his lungs as it had ever since his father held him on one hip and explained how the relay would arc out to grab the ship and fling it across space. Garrus had been so afraid that first time, the relay so huge compared to their ship, the forces so monstrous and incomprehensible to his six-cycle-old mind. But then his father had held him tight, the sheer wonder in his pari's voice soothing away the terror, replacing it with awe. Smiling, he closed his eyes as the familiar fist wrapped around him and yanked him through space.

They exited the mass effect corridor facing the brilliant yellow-white sphere of Aralakh. The star's light shone through his eyelids, as harsh and unrelenting as everything else in krogan territory. The brightness dimmed, Mi'khal must have polarized the ports, and the general opened his eyes.

"Drift just under 1100 klicks, stealth systems operational," Mi'khal reported, a not insignificant or unwarranted amount of pride bleeding through his tone. "Good clean run."

"Good work." Garrus grinned. "Don't let Joker hear that number. He'll make it his life's mission to beat it." He turned toward the stairs down to the main level of the CIC. "ETA to Tuchanka?"

"Four hours, thirty eight minutes, General." The batarian laughed. "I think I'll send Joker a message right now with that jump data."

Garrus just shook his head. "On your head be the consequences." Four and a half hours ... enough time for a quick shower and a nap. The adrenaline had begun to wear off, reminding him that he hadn't slept more than a couple of hours a night in weeks. "I'll be in my quarters if I'm needed." He jogged down the stairs, long strides carrying him the length of the CIC.

Halfway down the narrow corridor between the ranks of system monitoring stations, he passed the alpha-shift pilot. He smiled and nodded. "Lt. Pirelli."

"Good evening, General," the young woman said, greeting him with a bright grin. "A lovely evening to be headed for sunny Tuchanka, land of everything in the galaxy that wants to kill you."

She brushed past without stopping, whistling as she ran up the stairs, her boots ringing against the metal grating.

Garrus nodded. An accurate enough description of the krogan homeworld. "That it is, Lieutenant."

L'Tsai had returned to her work and looked up at him as he stopped beside her terminal. "Sitrep from Tuchanka, sir." She activated her monitor, bringing up an orbital scan. "Hierarch Vakarian reports that General Victus sent a platoon to take control of the bomb site, but they are having difficulty reaching it." She pointed to several markers. "These are Victus's men here. A combination of the terrain … the bomb is in the center of a ruined industrial area … and heavy resistance is slowing them down. The lieutenant leading the force estimates at least another four to six hours to reach and pacify the objective." A slightly apologetic shrug accompanied that information, as if somehow the delays were her fault, or she expected him to shoot the messenger.

He nodded and leaned a hip against the point defense console, affecting nonchalance. "They can only do what they can, Captain. I'm sure they're doing their best. What about the evacuation of the Urdnot camp?" His arms settled across his chest, locking away his impatience.

L'Tsai mirrored his stance for a moment before one hand broke free and cut toward the scan. "One more thing about the bomb, sir. According to the general, his people are fighting Blue Suns."

Garrus snapped straight, his one hand falling to rest on his sidearm. "Blue Suns?" That didn't make any sense. What did the Suns gain by blowing up krogan? The answer was simple: nothing. They were a smokescreen for the real enemy … disposable guns to provide a hefty dose of anonymity.

"The hierarch reports that the evacuation is also going slowly despite the cooperation of the krogan religious leaders and the female clan chief. Urdnot Wrex is encouraging his people to remain and defy what he says is just turian intimidation." She answered his soft curse with a nod and an empathetic wince. "However, most of the females and all of the children have been evacuated outside the blast zone."

He nodded, one sharp jerk of his head. "Very well, stay on top of the situation. I'm going to take a shower and try to get a little sleep. Let me know if anything on the surface changes."

The asari's salute betrayed her origins as one of the Destiny Ascension's junior flag officers. He returned it with a turian one, then headed for the elevator. Inside, he turned to face her, then reached out to hit the hold button.

"Please tell me that we didn't give away all our ground pounders, and it won't be just Martin and I trying to fight our way through to Wrex and the giant bomb."

She grinned. "We managed to hang on to six. They'll be coming off their sleep shift in two hours."

He released the door. "Excellent."

After a quick shower, he burrowed under his blankets. His stomach growled, protesting his priorities, but exhaustion pressed at him harder than hunger. He yawned, telling his belly to shut up until he woke, then closed his eyes.

"I hope you know that I found your mother, Kahri," he said to the dark. "She's okay, and you have a pile of brothers and sisters. I'll get her out of there as soon as I can. I promise you that." He let out a long breath and relaxed into the mattress. "Then we'll find Bunny."

Within moments, he fell asleep.

19 Days ASR

Bodies surged through the door, an alien tide of bizarre shapes, slicing blades, and frenzied limbs in the fading light from his armour. Silent, trapped inside his head, he prayed and cursed and cried as his body fought, seeming immune to injury and the passage of time. He screamed, wrestling back a measure of control over his own vocal chords, his own limbs, but his rage and fear went unheard over the droning of the enemy's wings and the drumbeat of their bodies slamming into the half-open door. The horrible wet crunch of shell breaking against metal dragged him back to his childhood. On one of his explorations, he stumbled upon a group of teenagers beating a carincrus with metal pipes … the giant crustacean screamed and snapped its claws, trying to fight back as the peririn pulverized its shell, and finally the meat and organs beneath.

He dragged his scattered thoughts back to the present as the room tipped and swayed around him. Spirits, his head ached … buzzing … electric jolts of agony ripped through his skull. Shoving that aside, he focused on Roger, the gun bucking into his hands in a steady rhythm. One … two … three … pause. Over and over as he fought to keep the rifle from overheating. If it did, he'd be overwhelmed and crushed just as surely as that poor sad animal on the beach.

One of the creatures made it inside the door, an arm hanging half off, whipping about uselessly even as it raced toward him, it's double sided blade carving the air ahead of its charge. Bullets tore into its shell, the force knocking it around like a ragdoll, but still it charged, its blank, white eyes glowing in the faint light.

It slammed into him, the blade clutched in its hand never stopping. The pain registered only as a hard tugging as the blade carving through his armour, plate, and hide. The organic weapon lodged in his hip bone, tearing loose when he staggered, his leg collapsing as the tendons sliced through. Swinging Roger in a wide arc even as he fell, he slammed the rifle into the creature's head, the chitinous shell cracking open with a sickening crunch.

As he lay there, firing into the bodies that flailed over the mass of their fallen comrades, the hollow gong sound of the their bodies slamming into metal echoed inside his head. Constant ringing, banging … hollow thumping against the metal … .

Garrus bolted upright in bed, heart slamming into the base of his throat as he flailed, tangled in his blankets. Over several seconds, the softness of the blankets against his hide eased him back into his bed despite the hollow, thumping ring of bodies striking metal that continued to echo in his head. It stopped with the whisper of voices, banging, then a crash.

He jumped up, landing on his feet next to the bed, his blankets still wrapped around and between his legs. A dark shape dropped from the ceiling and ran to his door, the orange glow of an omnitool illuminating Martin's face.

"Weaver?" His alarm fading a little, Garrus bent over to wrestle himself free. "What the hell are you doing, kid?" He looked up at a darker spot against the ceiling, a icy trickle of alarm snaking through his guts and setting off the alarm at the back of his skull. "Why are you crawling around in the ducts?"

The dark spot gave birth to a shadow, the form unfolding from above to drop, landing agile and light on taloned feet. The trickle surged into a flood. His hands leapt in front of his face, and he sank into a defensive stance.

"Get dressed," the invader growled, amusement rolling through her subvocals. When he didn't move, too busy trying to figure out what was going on, she stepped close enough for him to make out her features, and his arms fell limp to his sides.

"Kandros? What the hell are you doing on my ship?"

---

(A-N: Holy cow, Chapter 90, and I think you can see that we're diving into the thick of things now. Events will start to snowball from here. All the loves to my readers and reviewers. Your support helps keep me going. Well, your support and Sassy haranguing me to get back to her chapters. :D She's so pushy! See you in a couple of days.)
(A-N: Holy cow, Chapter 90, and I think you can see that we're diving into the thick of things now. Events will start to snowball from here. All the loves to my readers and reviewers. Your support helps keep me going. Well, your support and Sassy haranguing me to get back to her chapters. :D She's so pushy! See you in a couple of days.)
Shepard starts fitting the last few pieces into her escape plan. Wheels within wheels.

See the end of the chapter for notes

19 Days ASR

"I need you to get Al approval to leave his room," Shepard declared, dropping into the chair across the desk from Miranda. Before the operative could speak, she continued. "He's wasting away in that dark hole. Even when it's clean, it reeks of decay and death." She slouched into the leather, tossing her cane into the air as she lifted one leg up over the arm. Catching the cane and slinging it casually over one shoulder, she bounced a little. "Comfy chair. Nice. Could I get one like this?"

Miranda took a deep, highly controlled breath, the slight roll of her shoulders and press of her breasts against the catsuit the only sign that she'd even taken it. "Shepard, you know I don't have any say in what goes on within his program. The best I could do is make a suggestion, but even that would be seen as interference, which is against company policy." She shifted in her chair and leaned forward to rest her forearms on her desk and clasp her hands. "Is this about your grand escape plan?"

Shepard grinned and flipped around to sit in the chair properly. As she moved, she twirled her cane through the fingers of one hand then looped it around her neck to twirl in the other hand before the foot thumped to the floor between her legs. "This is about someone rotting away in your prison when he doesn't need to be. My escape plan will go ahead regardless of whether you let me take him down to eat in the mess or sit in the atrium, but don't worry, you have a couple of days yet." She grinned, a curled wound across her face that contained no mirth, just challenge. "I still have a couple of ducks refusing to take up line dancing."

The smile that Miranda sent back actually did seem amused, but amusement of an arrogant sort, as if she believed the whole plan either an elaborate ruse or doomed to failure. "You're on a space station, Shepard. Even if you do free your little band of lab rats…." The operative's face stiffened, and she bowed her head even as Shepard bristled. "I apologize, that was unworthy." She sighed, this time audibly. "But that does not change the fact that even if you do break the subjects loose, none of you have anywhere to go."

Shepard nodded. "You're right. Space station." Her shoulders popped in a loose, marionette shrug. "What was I thinking? I'll call the whole thing off." She thrust herself out of her chair to lean, elbows braced against her sides, both hands on her cane. "Meanwhile, Al. Get him permission to go for walks so I don't have to break him out and then hurt people when they try to stop me." She headed for the door.

"Shepard, it's impossible." Miranda rose and strode over to stand in the captain's path. "I already violated policy taking his case to my employer." Her expression softened to what Shepard was fairly sure was supposed to be a plea—it couldn't have found pleading with a lighthouse, a pack of hunting dogs, a deerstalker, and a scanning program. "Please don't make me regret authorizing the "Impossible?" Shepard threw up a hand, letting the veiled threat slide past. "What's he going to do? He weighs less than you do, and can barely stand up once they strip out their implants. And you're keeping his biotics off line, right? Some sort of injections?" Narrowing her eyes, Shepard stepped inside Miranda's space. To her credit, the operative didn't step back. "Which is another cruelty, by the way. A lot of biotics actually go mad when they're cut off from the source of whatever-the-hell-it-is when they're injured or burn themselves out. Chalk up another monstrous practice you just pretend isn't going on. And I know that you know that I know there are other biotics being held here." She pressed in tighter, leaning in. "It makes me glad I'm not biotic, I tell you that. I swear when I get out of here, I'm going to come back with—"

"Enough, Shepard!" Miranda's hand sliced the air between them. "I've had quite enough of taking abuse for figments of your imagination. The injections don't work that way. If he wanted to use his biotics to meditate, he … ." She snapped her mouth shut, a slight tightening around her eyes the only sign that she knew she'd stormed straight into the quagmire.

Shepard let out a long, slow breath. She'd forgotten how draining she found the whole crazy and rabidly annoying thing. Still, she couldn't give up, not until she got what she wanted. Hobbling past Miranda, she called, "I'm going to go to my room, do some more plotting, and then I am going to take Al down to the mess for supper. I'll do this with or without permission, Doc Frank. And trust me, the 'without permission' part comes complete with injuries on all sides if you try to stop me." She hit the door control. "Just tell his torturers that he'll live longer this way. Besides, they need to get used to him being gone. A couple days tops and we're out of here."

"You know," Miranda called after her, "your Al is no saint, Shepard. From what I saw of his file, he was a monster before the organization picked up his corpse. He's murdered humans, Shepard. A lot of them."

Shepard nodded. "I know exactly what he is, Operative Lawson," she answered without turning around. "He's me, except that you just need bits and pieces of him. I guess I should be thanking the sweet baby Jesus that you needed me intact, huh?" She took a breath to thaw the ice that stabbed down through her spine. "You have two hours to get him permission to leave his room."

Shepard grinned as she headed down the hall, so pleased with herself that she almost forgot her limp. Almost. Miranda would punish her, she harboured no illusions about that, but she was a good two days past caring. Most of what she needed, she possessed. Someone less savvy and careful than Miranda, would have given it all away. No matter. Now that they knew how the drug worked, they could narrow down the options and find out how long it would take before the biotics could use their gifts. She'd made it a good four days past the level of naivety that allowed her the luxury of thinking they'd get off the base without fighting even if, or maybe especially if, Miranda and her employer danced to Shepard's tune.

On her way down the seven corridors and two elevators between Miranda's office and her room, Shepard made covert scans of the security grid. She'd pillaged her scanner parts from five different printers, three coffee makers, and a handful of palm scanners. Although, almost certain the entire station knew where all the missing tech ended up, about seven … ten days … mmm … no, she hadn't even woken up caring about that. Her plan came together a little at a time, strand by strand knotted together right under Miranda's nose.

The operative knew almost ninety nine percent of the plan, Shepard knew that as well. The important bits, the part that would see her off the station and back out into her life … those bits resided in the other one percent. She and Al could never hope to break the rest of the subjects free and actually escape. Not without that vital one percent. For that ... well, she just had to hope Miranda brought her A game.

Before she returned to her room, Shepard headed for the kitchen to practice her sleight of hand. Al had dropped his cloak when he got up off his bed earlier, and what she saw had made her guts ache. It told her that the corporation had nearly accomplished their goal. They'd started letting him kill himself.

Not on her watch.

She lingered at the counter, picking out an apple and banana for herself, smiling at the cashier as he rang her through. After sticking the fruit in the side pocket on her trousers, she wandered back along the counter, browsing until the cashier headed to the back for a moment. The second he left the counter unattended, she ducked around the end and into the kitchen. So far so good. Next objective. She grinned to herself as she crept along the wall, keeping to the camera blind spots, making her way to the employee locker room. All one needed to slip beneath the radar in the massively staffed kitchen was a set of the uniform overalls—preferably stained—and a hairnet.

Dressed the part, her hair under a kerchief and net, Shepard stowed her cane inside her overalls and strode out into the kitchen. As much pleasure as she took in her covert activities, Shepard felt an equal part embarrassment. An N7 applauding herself for infiltrating a kitchen and stealing sweets ... pathetic.

Take your joy where you can, Janey, and keep your eye on the goal.

Staff pushed and shoved, hurrying past without sparing her a glance. Just before supper always proved the best time to raid. Extra people came and went all the time, and with the rush, she attracted zero notice. The only challenge came in avoiding the cameras through the choke point between the levo and dextro sections. Still, it remained a sad challenge.

The dextro kitchen never failed to weird her out, like looking at a levo kitchen through the looking glass—everything just slightly off. Still, armed with the knowledge of what he liked and the fact she had to squeeze everything between the slats on the grate, she managed. As for what Al liked ... she would never have pegged him for having a sweet tooth, but he packed away turian cookies and candy like he couldn't get enough. His favourite was a chewy sort of fudgey-looking pre-packaged thing, but the organization must have had to import them from the Palaven planetary treasury or something, because the staff guarded them like crown jewels.

"Ha! Score!" Damn, has she said that out loud? She winced and hurried over to the trays of cooling, unguarded cookies. Working quickly, she managed to squirrel half a tray into a plastic bag and down the front of her suit before anyone got close enough to catch her. At the other end of the kitchen she knocked over a stack of pots, using the distraction to search out the day's hiding place and grab a handful of the fudge things.

Although it was no N7 mission, Shepard nonetheless allowed herself a small measure of pride in pulling off her daily caper. No doubt Miranda and management knew what she was up to and allowed it—all part of her rehab—but the kitchen staff remained oblivious to where their supplies went each afternoon. Or, at least she hoped they did. If it was all staged, she'd kick someone's ass. Even the undead could only allow a certain level of pathetic before everything just got sad.

Satisfied that her haul would get Al through the evening, she beat a hasty retreat. Taking off her overalls, she leaned heavily against her cane and hobbled back out into the main corridor. Poor, damaged Shepard, so crippled by pain ... so weak.
Her room greeted her like a cool, silent hug as she entered. Odd how, even behind enemy lines, familiar territory could begin to feel like home. She stuffed the overalls, kerchief, and hair net under her mattress along with the others. "Hey, you still hanging in there, big guy?" she asked as she sank onto the side of her bed.

"I smell cookies." She heard him moving around on his bed.

"Yep, fresh from the oven, too." She laid down and started sliding the sweets through the slats. "You ready to go walkabout in a couple of hours?"

Those pale, rheumy eyes stared at her from the shadows of his hood. "This isn't a good idea, Shepard."

She grinned, excitement coursing through her cells like narcotics. "That's the beauty of it. It's such a bad idea that it kills two birds with one stone. It'll give me a chance to see how far they're willing to let me push in the name of getting my cooperation for their mission, but it'll also nail home that I'll do what it takes."

Sucking in a long breath, she winced, the cookie aroma making her stomach growl. "Damn, I should have stolen cookies for myself too. I just got some fruit." She fed the bag through the grate. "Here, put them back in the bag so rats don't move in and start gnawing your toes off while you sleep."

His mandibles spread. "What?"

She laughed at his gobsmacked tone, but the smile drifted away in favour of something that wrapped nettles around her heart, a dollop of bitter mixing with the sweet. "My mama always told me that was what would happen if I kept food in my bedroom." She passed him the candy. "She was a fierce woman, but … " Shaking her head, she folded her arms and rested her chin on one. "... there was no real sting there. She shouted and blustered, but I think it was just because she wanted so much for us." Wincing, she added, "Of course, it didn't hurt that I centered my life around driving her crazy."

"Nothing's changed. You still torture those you see as having power over you." Wrappers crackled on the other side of the wall, and when Al spoke, the words came out muffled as if he'd stuffed the entire confection in his mouth. "My mother was a member of the cabals most of her life, fighting all over turian space." He paused. The slight smacking sound of sticky sweets and pointed teeth locked in an epic battle slid a grin back onto her face.

Something about the battered turian chopped back the tangle of emotional thorns that seemed to ensnare her entire life. Maybe he provided a reminder of the people she'd left behind, or maybe it was just the purity of the moment. No looming battle against impossible forces, no evil empire keeping her away from her loved ones, just a soul who possessed nothing finding a couple of seconds of enjoyment in his candy.

After a moment, he made a happy little grunting sound and continued, "She said she married a carpenter so that her children would have at least one parent there for them."

"The cabals … ." Shepard rolled over on her side and pulled her pillow under her head. "That's rough."

He murmured a soft agreement. "When it became obvious that I'd inherited my mother's gifts, she insisted that I keep them hidden. My father hired an asari tutor to teach me control. Eventually, it was discovered, as these things always are, but by that time, my brother had obtained a position of sufficient power to pull some strings and keep me from the cabals. Of course, I also possessed a prodigious talent for destruction."

Shepard chuckled. "I like that. I think I'll steal that every time someone tells me I've fucked up yet again. I'll just blame it on my prodigious talent for destruction." She shoved herself up to sit cross-legged in the middle of the bed. "Did the hack finish compiling while I was out?"

The orange glow of his omnitool appeared on the other side of the grate. "It did."

The compiled program appeared on Shepard's omnitool. "Excellent. This will get us into the other cells when the time comes."

Al appeared behind the grate again. "You seem extraordinarily confident about how this escape is going to go down, Shepard."

She grinned. "Only because I know my enemy. Right now, all the right cogs are turning. Well, actually, right this second, they're listening to me and wondering what cogs I plan to use. Then they'll have a meeting to discuss turning different cogs, but those ones will be the right ones too. The more they second guess themselves, the better."

Al laughed, a soft, raspy chortle. "You're completely insane."

Shepard looked over at him and wiggled her eyebrows. "Crazy like a fox, my friend. Crazy like a fox." She opened the interface on her omnitool and started working on a tunnelling program to get her past the organization's lock out on her computer. She needed to get past it and into the network to ensure she knew exactly where the other prisoners were. When she left, everyone was going with her.

"Talk to me," she said, tossing a quick grin over at the vent before diving into her work.

"What about?"

She shrugged. "Anything. It helps me think." Her grin widened, sliding into her tone as she said, "Ever been in love?"

He chuffed, a rough snort of sound. "Nothing like going straight to the invasively personal."

"It's my thing. So? How about it?" Shepard took a long, slow breath, letting go of the tension that invaded every muscle and held every tendon rigid even when she slept. His voice really did help her relax and concentrate. Her fingers flew over the haptic interface.

He made a show of grumbling, but then sighed. "Yes, a long time ago. Well twice. Once a very, very long time ago."

Her eyebrows rose when he didn't continue. "Well? Come on, I want details. Dates, names, positions … frequency." Cackling merrily, she spun to face the grate at the foul curse that greeted her demand. "Holy blessed Enkindler buttocks, that was quite the naughty word. I hope you didn't kiss your mother with that mouth."

"Turians don't kiss," he grumbled. Despite the growl laced through his voice, the ill humour didn't touch his eyes, in fact she swore she saw a gleam in their battered depths.

A wistful smile drifted across her face, a wisp of cloud dancing on a breeze. "Some do." She closed her eyes, the sensation of tough, textured plates brushing against her lips, a tongue that tasted of mineral and summer rain caressing hers.
"How about you?" he countered.

"What about me?" She pressed her lips together, biting down on the inside of her bottom lip to control her smirk.

"Don't be obtuse. Have you been in love?"

She nodded. "I am. Well, I guess I should say, I was. It's been two years for him. Who knows where he is. For all I know, he's moved on, met someone else." Her head tipped off to the side. "I can hear him talking to me sometimes, a voice that feels like home—safe and warm. I'll swear I catch a glimpse of him, but … I'm still locked out of those memories."

"They know there would be no stopping you if you remembered him," Al said, his voice every bit as soft as his words sounded certain. "You would have found a way off this station as soon as you could move."

Shepard shrugged. "You don't know me that well, Al."

"Of course I do. We aren't that much different, Shepard. You think if I had anything left out there, I'd be mouldering in here?" He let out a long breath laced with a curse. "Spirits, I'm pathetic." He laughed, softly at first then gaining momentum until he roared with it. When he calmed a little, she heard him shift, his shoulder or brow brushing the wall. "You ever wonder if it's all just some sort of hallucination? That we're actually dead, and some part of us is just too afraid to let go … even if it means living like this?"

"It's occurred to me," she replied, the words a soft whisper. Shepard shook her head and stretched her back, grunting a little with the pain. Almost time for meds. The agony climbed slowly from a ten to an eleven on the Shepard scale. She knew from yesterday that it would hit a solid fifteen before Miranda came in. Although the cracks, caverns, and canyons in her flesh had healed up by a whopping four percent, that left ninety-six percent of unbearable.

"You all right?" Al asked. "You went quiet."

She shook her head and clenched her trembling hands into fists. "Yeah, no worries, buddy. It's just getting to be close to med time. Things are starting to complain more than usual." Glancing back she gave him a firm nod. "Talk to me. Tell me about the love long, long ago. Listening to you helps."

"Not much to tell. I rescued her from a pirate base. She'd been snatched from a local colony. That spirit-cursed rock was so fucking cold. I nearly shattered my teeth chattering them together." He chuckled. "I burst into a church looking for stragglers, found her curled up between the feet of a massive stone angel."

"Don't start with me. Our only job for the next couple of days is keeping our delicate, magical turian flower safe from the frost."

Shepard smiled as she listened, knowing that somehow, she'd also found her love in the cold.

"I'm coming back," she whispered, her voice not loud enough to interrupt Al talking about unloading a shotgun into a man who came looking for the woman who had reached out to him for help and stolen his heart. Longing swept through her. A spark when it started at her toes, it built to a roaring fire by the time it escaped through her vocal chords. "I am coming back. Wait for me."
Okay, so first of all apologies for the wait. I wrote Chapter 91 from Garrus's POV, then realized for my super-secret evil plan to work for Chapter 94, I needed Chapter 91 to be Shepard POV. So, yeah. Here we are Shepard POV. Then, yesterday I received a review on FFN that said I hated asari with a NeoNazi level hatred, which, as any of you who know me would guess, threw me into a panic that I'd been unintentionally bigoted, so spent yesterday searching out asari hatred. Still working on that, so yeah. Another day behind schedule. Sorry. There is good news though. Three chapters are now written or nearly written and ready to go. Shepard will be putting her endgame into action on Thursday, then Garrus will be returning to deal with his stowaway on Sunday.

As always, all the love to the readers and commenters. You guys rock! Now, let's get these crazy kids back together and get the Collectors taken DOWN! See you Thursday.
Chapter Summary

Shepard sends her plot into the end game. Is it complexly simple or simply complex.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

19 Days ASR

At exactly two hours, Shepard stuck her head out her door and looked around. No one moved, the corridor all but deserted. A trap? Concession? Could she really have won that easily? Sure, they allowed her to run rampant, calling it rehabilitation and skill reclamation, but she really hadn’t expected that ultimatum to work. She’d needed it to work in order to save Al, but she hadn’t expected it to.

“Hmm.” A twisted, self-satisfied grin curled the corner of her mouth, growing to where it made the canyons carved into her cheek file several complaints … in triplicate. “Hm. Not what I expected, but okay.”

She couldn’t have said what she expected, exactly. Maybe a couple squads of security guards to ensure she stayed safely ensconced in her chambers. Maybe Miranda and a taser … no, too uncivilized. Miranda and a big needle of tranquilizers. Yeah, better. Miranda and the arched eyebrow of doom … not beyond the realm of possibility. If anyone could pull off disabling someone using only the power of disapproval, it was Dr. Frankenstein.

She stepped over the threshold, leaning on her cane just enough to make the limp convincing, but ready to turn it into a weapon at a moment’s notice. When she reached Al’s door unmolested, she chuckled—a bitter, hollow echo of disappointment. Not that she wanted to show her hand, but beating the crap out a handful of guards would have been a nice stress relief. Oh well, violence contained excellent preservatives and featured an especially long expiration date.

The door remained locked, however, and her grin turning into something both real and filled with challenge. She looked up, giving the hall camera a jaunty little salute before she bypassed the door. They wanted confirmation of her door crack program? Not a problem. A smart, elegant little program, it deserved some recognition, and the beautiful, subtle nuances of tech sailed right over Al’s head.

It took exactly 2.3 seconds to get past the lock. Nice. She palmed the control, then reeled away from the door as it opened, the stink of death smacking her in the face. Her hand lifted to her nose to try to block at least a little of it.

“Sweet baby Jesus, Al, are you actually rotting under that thing?” Taking a couple of acclimatizing breaths, she headed in. “Come on, big guy. This is an official jailbreak. Up and at ‘em.” She made her way down the short hall past his bathroom only to find an empty room. “Hmm. Is this a counter move?” She glanced around and then turned and knocked on the bathroom, checking Interesting play, but whose was it? Miranda? His staff asserting control? That thought sent her heart rate and blood pressure into the upper red zone. They wouldn’t hurt him? Not just to spite her and her interference? Limping back to the door, she wished she possessed a better floor plan of the station. She thought she knew where his labs were, but she had nothing prepared to hack into their security. They could euthanize him before she even found him. Damn it.

Guilt beat her with merciless images of what could be happening to him … every last horrific thing because she couldn’t just leave well enough alone. She stopped outside his door, mind racing in dizzying loops. She’d built a plan to save him. It would cost her, quite possibly more than she knew, but he deserved more than a bullet in the head as soon as Shepard turned her back. And now she might not even get the chance.

_Calm down, for fuck’s sake, Janey. First thing is to find him. Standing here throwing a panic attack isn’t going to get you anywhere._

Her omnitool beeped, cutting off Bunny’s nagging with a yelp. Or did the yelp come from her? Either way, only Al could send her messages on her omnitool. Due to completely justified security concerns, Miranda kept her cut off from the network.

Shepard opened the interface. Four words glowed up at her, flipping her terror on its head and setting it aflame. “Fuck! That sneaky ass.” She read the message again then hurried down the corridor as fast as she could manage while still putting on a good show of being lame.

“I’m in the cafeteria?” she shouted from the mess hall door. “You scared me half to death! I thought you were being dissected or something!”

Al turned in his seat, a toothy grin all she could make out under the hood. “Are you finished making a scene? If so, get some food and come sit down.” He chuckled and turned back around. “If not, feel free to stand there and keep yelling.”

“I might just do that!” She glared at the room full of uneasy eyes turned her way. “As you were!” she barked, flapping a hand at the employees. “Just eat your food and get back to work, dammit.” After another moment of indignant self-indulgence, during which her pulse and all other vital stats returned to something close to normal, she stomped-hop over to the food counter. She slapped a generous serving of mac and cheese on her plate, covered it with peas, and then smothered the entire thing in hamburger gravy.

“What is that?” Al asked, pulling away from the table as she set her dinner down.

“Comfort food. Not one word about my dinner.” She ripped her chair away from the table, the legs screaming across the tile. “Just eat.” She sat across from him, glaring at him with enough intensity to set his cloak on fire. “You really did scare the crap out of me.”

Cautiously, as if he expected her food to leap off the plate and eat his face, he leaned back in, his mandibles flicking in distress. “It looks as though someone already ate it.”

Shepard banged her fork handle against the tabletop, unable to suppress a furious, satisfied smirk when everyone in the room jumped. “I said, not one word.” Relief swept away the fury, lining the back of her throat and sinuses with a slick, bitter layer of something she didn’t wish to examine too closely. She glanced up at him, not wanting him to see her eyes in case the burning she felt translated to redness as well. “When your message arrived, I was planning how to break you out before they killed you.” She stabbed a forkful of her supper, taking a small amount of pleasure in the act of noodle-cide. “I thought they’d taken you to teach me a lesson.”

He cleared his throat and straightened in his chair. “You really do have an inflated sense of your importance, don’t you?” He chuckled, then reached across the table to pat her hand, a tiny gesture of contrition. “Relax, Shepard. I just wanted to remind you that you aren’t rescuing a helpless varren pup. I wasn’t always … this.” His mandibles flicked hard. “And I wasn’t convinced your door hack would work.”

She scoffed, a guttural cough of disgust. “Ye of little faith. Of course it works.” Straightening, she looked up, meeting his stare as her eyebrows pulled down, tying a tight knot in the skin between them. “I don’t think I’m rescuing you, Al. This is a buddy caper, and I certainly don’t think you’re pathetic. They’re just willing to give me enough rope to hang … well … pretty much everyone … in the name of getting my help. That just allowed me to get things moving.” She gripped his talons before he could pull them all the way back, ignoring the fact that he stiffened at the contact. “If you’ve felt that, I’m sorry.”

He stared at her hand for a moment, before snatching his back. “It’s fine. I haven’t exactly been active in securing my own escape.” He shrugged and ducked his head a little lower into the cloak. “About time that changed.”

She stared at him for a moment as he shovelled in his dinner, then nodded. “It’ll make things easier. You’re bigger than you look through the grate. Not sure I can carry you all the way through the ducts to the docking bay.”

“All the way?” His head tilted and that warm chuckle rolled over her again. “I doubt you’d get my feet off the floor.”

She shrugged and shovelled a couple of mouthfuls in. “I dunno. I had a turian bigger than you use me as a ladder once. Damn, he was heavy.” She frowned, the picture appearing clear as day … the steep bank of rubble and dirt … the molten lava glowing below them … dark blue and black armour. A sharp pain stabbed into the base of her skull, arcing up along the right side to lodge behind her eye. Miranda wasn’t lying about that much at least. She glanced up at the camera above the entrance, a fierce grimace of a smile greeting the memory.

Well, Janey, you couldn’t have planned that better if you tried. You realize this could very possibly kill you, right?

She needed to remember to thank Liara for the subtle erosion of the walls around the few memories that the nanites had reassembled. Taking a deep breath, she steeled herself the best she could and then bashed herself against the wall locking her away from the torin who clung to her armour over that precipice. The pain revved up—a drag racer waiting for the green light—blinding, ramping higher and higher until she was pretty sure she smelled burning rubber.

A soft shrill of suffering escaped between clenched teeth as the heel of her hand leapt to her eye socket, pressing in hard to keep her brain from chewing its way out the easiest escape route.

“Shepard!” Al called, his voice low and firm … the voice of command. “Stop pushing. Let the memory go. If you push … spirits, you’ll fry half the hardware keeping you alive.”

Exactly. Ignoring his advice, she lunged into the memory, reaching for the torin hidden within.

Come on, let me see him. Give him back to me. I’m going to need him—his strength—for what I’ve got to do next.
She knew without even knowing how, that he’d been a huge source of her strength. It forged the center of her, even though he was only a few words, a few snippets of conversation. She followed that connection back to that hole under Therum. They slid toward the edge and death ... his talons gripped her armour. Bucking harder as the resistance grew, she tracked those talons to long arms and broad shoulders. The pain burgeoned, hatching a thousand claws that gouged at her eyes, gnawed into her temples, and swarmed through her sinuses ... rats fighting to escape a drowning bucket.

Not good enough, Janey. If you’re going to push until your brain explodes, don’t play at it. Fucking push!
Fingernails scrabbled against the drum-tight shroud that hid her love’s face, struggling for even the smallest hold …. A whistle, like the sound of a hard-swung baseball bat, gave her a half second of warning before the drag racer popped the clutch and slammed into the back of her head. A battery of fireworks detonated along the underside of her skull—shrapnel and flashes of molten darkness tearing loose a wail of immaculate defiance … a battle cry railing against every blockade, every shackles … against the hooks they’d cast into the cool waters of death to drag her back.

Something rough and sharp cracked against her cheek hard enough to snap her head around, and an entirely new pain sliced through the blast damage inside her skull. Her teeth scraped together then snapped down on the side of her tongue.

“Did you slap me?” she asked, scowling at her ‘just-tripled-my-pain-meds’ slur. Numb fingers reached up to rub her cheek. “That hurt.”

He pressed something to her nose again. “It was either that or let you turn your brain into porridge.” When he pulled back a little, she saw a broad splotch of crimson creeping into the woven fabric of his cloak.

Reaching up, she dabbed at her upper lip, fingertips retreating streaked with blood. Shepard laughed weakly and leaned forward, draping her arms over Al’s shoulders, her brow pressed against his mandible. “I was wrong, you know.” She tightened her grip on him as he stiffened. “I thought they needed me whole, but they’ve carved me up almost as much as they did you. You just can’t see most of the pieces missing from me.” After a couple of breaths, she whispered, “Do you think that scared the shit out of them?”

He chuffed, a harsh combination of cough and laugh. “You did that to what … prove some sort of point? Spirits, Shepard. You’re a fool.” He let out a loud raspy sigh, then nodded. “I’m sure it aged Miranda ten cycles or so. It certainly did me.” Taking her by the shoulders, he pushed her away, settling her back in her chair before he stood. “Don’t do anything that stupid again. This is my freedom you’re playing with, as well.” He turned her chair around. “Eat your plate of vomit.”

Planting her elbows on either side of her plate, Shepard dropped her head into her hands, waiting for the pressure to ease back. When Al shoved a folded napkin in front of her face, grateful fingers took it from him and pressed it under her nose to ease the slow bleed.

“I’ll give you this,” Al said, thumping back down into his chair. He picked up his utensils and directed a nod over her shoulder. “You know how to clear a room.”

Shepard lifted her head and looked around. Sure enough, all the other tables sat empty, food abandoned on plates. A few chairs lay on their sides, knocked over in their occupants’ haste to flee the crazy woman with the exploding brain. She chuckled, the soft laugh building to a hearty chortle as she glanced toward the kitchen and saw all the staff hiding behind a counter. When Miranda and Kelly burst through the door a second later, the laugh morphed into helpless, whooping gasps for air.

“That couldn’t have gone better if I tried,” she cackled, snapping Miranda a violent, jaunty salute even as the operative’s omnitool activated and scans began to run. After levelling a furious glare on her medical staff for the count of twenty, Shepard tucked into her supper, eating with a manic relish that completely eased back the earlier pain. Control her? Manipulate her? They could fucking try, and she’d run fifty laps around them before they knew she’d moved.

“Shut up,” Al grumbled under his breath without looking up.

“The pain … that series of explosions that caused the fountain of blood running out your nose,” Miranda called, looking up from her scans, “was two hundred nanites overloading and detonating inside your brain, Shepard.” The operative strode over to the table, rigid and tightly laced up, but obviously furious. “You’re lucky that little stunt didn’t destroy two years of delicate work.”

Kelly sat on the chair next to Shepard. “You’re lucky you didn’t kill yourself. We aren’t keeping you from making those connections to be cruel, Shepard. We’re trying to protect you.” The psychologist places a hand on Shepard’s forearm. “A huge portion of your nervous system was blown out the back of your head, Captain. It was supposed to be replaced gradually over the next four to six months while you remained in a coma.”

“Definitely leave the ‘scared straight’ stuff to Miranda, Red. You haven’t got the eyebrow for it.” Shepard sighed and looked up, calming the anger enough not to lash out at the young woman. Kelly didn’t deserve the stripes. “I have places to go, Kelly, people to see, and things to do … and I’m going to get started on that. I’m awake. I’m nearly back to functional. They can’t keep me locked in stasis any longer.” She cut a hand toward her cold, congealing dinner. “Now, my dinner is getting cold, so the two of you need to go. I’m no worse for wear, and I think we all learned a great deal from my little experiment.” Sharpening her stare to chips of obsidian, she met Miranda’s eyes. “ Didn’t we? Have a wonderful night.”

Miranda gestured for Kelly to vacate the chair at Shepard’s side, slipping into the seat the moment it was empty. Leaning forward, the operative crossed both arms over one knee and looked up, a stare just as sharp as Shepard’s focused on the captain’s face. “Shepard, this organization is trying to prepare to fight the Reapers. You are our big gamble in that war. Billions of credits have gone into the Lazarus Project and making sure you have the equipment you need.”

Shepard leaned back and rolled her neck, letting out a long groan as she crossed her arms. “Not the ‘you’re a massive investment’ lecture again, Miranda. I’m a person, not a very large canon or a ship. I don’t give a rat’s ass how much money you spent. I really don’t. If you give me a Lamborghini and throw me onto the race track, you can’t bitch if I crash it.”

“That’s a flawed analogy, but … no ...” The operative shook her head, a sharp, decisive gesture. “... this is the lecture where I explain that even my employers are not immune to being infiltrated by Reaper agents. Indoctrinated agents slip through cracks we can’t fill. Look at Wilson, and the nurse before him. This demonstration of yours has probably already been reported back to the Reapers. Thanks to your selfish little tantrum, you’ve placed yourself and everyone else on this station in danger. Thousands of people live and work here, Shepard. It’s not just about you.” She stood. “Go back to your rooms and remain there until management and I figure out what to do.” Turning to Kelly, the operative said, “Be sure your department is prepared for emergency evacuation, and hope that we manage to intercept that transmission.”

“No,” Shepard replied. “I promised Al dinner—which is now ice cold—and a walk. I’ve spent a week working to get him out of that cell. Now that he is, I intend to take advantage of it and bang him until he can’t see straight.” It took every ounce of control and willpower she possessed to stay focused on Miranda when Al let out a snort that sounded like it originated in his feet. He gasped for a second and then started to choke.

She held the operative’s stare, giving nothing away. “We’ll both return to my room when we’re finished. If you need to speak with me, you can contact me then.” Looking down at her plate, she sighed. “In fact … this now looks as disgusting to me as it does to you, Al. Come on. We’ll load our pockets with cookies and eat on the move.”

The torin got up and followed her to the counter. “I really hate being called Al,” he grumbled. He detoured toward the dextro section, ignoring the cowering staff, all of whom shuffled toward the back of the kitchen, clutching one another like terrified ducklings.

“What do you want me to call you?” she shouted after him. “I would have thought Specimen Alpha lacked a certain warmth, but I can call you by your full name if you like.” When she saw Miranda and Kelly still standing at the table, she didn’t need to fake the disdain that pulled at her, weighing her down.

She focused back on her partner in crime just in time to see Al shoot a glare over his shoulder at her.

Not pathetic, indeed. There might be some fight left in the ol’ boy yet. Good, he’ll need it.

A second later, the snipe she’d thrown at Miranda came back to haunt her and the grin died, dropping from her lips like a moth hitting a bug zapper.

Bang him until he can’t see straight? Did I just make a purchase my credit chit can’t cover? Sweet baby Jesus, give me strength.

Damn, it had been a long, long time since she last pulled out the old weapon. At least it wasn’t crawling all over that slimy C-Sec asshat in Chora’s Den. Despite the churning of her gut, she grinned, remembering the horror on Sparky’s face. The smile faded as the memory clouded over and pulled away. Why? What did she and Sparky find that Miranda deemed unfit?

Focus! No, this isn’t climbing on Harkin, this is so much more important. There’s so much more to lose if you fuck it up.

That was true. If she’d fucked up the act with Harkin, all they would have lost was time trying to find evidence against Saren. If she couldn’t pull this one off, if she chickened out or freaked out … it meant Al’s life. She harboured not a single doubt that Miranda and her employers were mercenary enough to kill him in the name of controlling her. Hopefully, she could be mercenary enough to flip it around on them.

It came down to strength. She’d need every sort and variety of strength that she could find to go through with her plan. Sugar couldn’t hurt either. A half dozen peanut butter cookies and two bananas found their way into her pockets, then she returned to the threshold to wait for her companion.

Miranda glided past, looking coolly very-nearly-affronted, her expression practically whispering, ‘I could force you to go back to your room. You’re just very lucky I don’t.’ Shepard both envied and pityed her for living governed by that level of control.

Shepard gave Kelly a wink then jerked her head, calling the psychologist over. “Just in case Miranda’s right, make sure to dress in patient sweats and a t-shirt as soon as you get back to your quarters. No uniform. Have your emergency bug-out kit ready. Arm yourself but with something you can hide up your sleeve. No guns. You need to blend in with the patients, and come straight to my room as fast as you can without running. Pass the word to Liara and Vincent to do the same. No one else. Okay?”

Kelly stared into Shepard’s eyes for long seconds, then gave her a single nod before hurrying after Miranda.

“Are you coming, or do I need to call emergency services?” Shepard shouted toward the kitchen as she watched Miranda and Kelly get in the elevator. When the door closed behind them, she turned, smacking face first into the torin’s arm. Sighing, she looked up at the bag of goodies he held cradled in one arm. The smirk crawled back over her lips as she moved on to meet his eyes. “Did you find everything you need? Would you like carry out service for that, sir?”

Looking into the bag, he nodded. “They had a lot of food I haven’t seen in two cycles.”

She held out an arm to usher him over the threshold. “Yes, well, my raids are always limited to what I can cram through the vent.” Where Miranda and Kelly had turned left, she led Al right, following the corridor that ran the full five hundred metre width of the station. The entire place seemed oddly quiet, even for evening shift. Apparently the organization appreciated a certain work ethic, because the hallways and offices usually bustled twelve to fourteen hours a day. Right then, however, it appeared everyone had hurried home to see the game. Or they were warned away from the hallways thanks to the presence of two zombified lab specimens with possible emotional and behavioural issues.

Shepard shook her head. No, there definitely had to be a big game on somewhere.

Focusing on the task before them, namely escaping the station, Shepard opened her omnitool, sizing the screen too small to be visible to the cameras. “See this right here?” she asked, pointing to it. “This is the big plan … the master plan … what is going to get us past all the security and off this station.”

The turian leaned down to peer at the display, studied it for a moment, then whispered, “I don’t see anything. What is this?”

She grinned and nodded, then pointed to three words embedded in the gibberish on the screen. He squinted, ducking down to read them, then looked at her. “Follow your lead?” he whispered. A turian curse rumbled through both larynges, setting the hair on the back of her neck on end. “There’s no plan, is there?” He stopped, looked around for a moment, then turned to place himself between her and the nearest camera. As he stared down at her, she could practically see the wheels turning behind his eyes.

Before he spoke, he stepped in close, his voice barely loud enough for her to make out his words. “You’ve just been baiting Miranda with a fake escape plan? You think she’s going to act to get you out of here before you can bring the whole place crashing down around her ears?” His mandibles spread, and he let out a harsh laugh.

She nodded and gave him a prickly, fake smile. “Exactly, the trick is going to be getting everyone else out, too.” She called up her door hacking program. “This will get the cell doors open when the time comes—all of them—but we’re going to have to split up … each take half.” After sending the file over their link, she sent him a second. “The biotics are in these rooms here. I think you should go after them. Hopefully being rescued by another biotic will engender trust. And then the last set of coordinates is our rendezvous. We don’t want to go together, or else we’ll just get caught.”

He nodded. “Better off moving in small groups, taking to the station’s infrastructure.” Looking up, he stopped and turned a slow circle. “Where are we going? I didn’t get a chance to finish my dinner thanks to someone shorting out half her brain.” As if to emphasize his words, his belly growled. He frowned, his brow plates dropping. “And what was that about, exactly?”

“Sorry about your dinner.” Shepard chuckled and bumped him with her elbow. “Come on, let’s keep walking.” She sighed and shrugged. “As for abandoning your dinner … Miranda would have sat there and stared at me with the eyebrow doing its …” She wriggled her fingers just above her eye. “… thing, if we’d stayed. Besides, tonight is mostly about getting you out of that hole, and see how well you move … how strong you are.” She turned off her omnitool and shoved her fingers into her front pockets, pulling her shoulders up tight in a shrug that never relaxed. “And I need to show you something. Well, and talk to you about something.”

“What?” Al trotted a couple of strides to catch up with her. Leaning forward, he twisted around to look down into her face, his eyes almost white in the light. “How about you start with why you shorted out half the tech rebuilding your brain?”

Shepard let out a long breath. “I set off the timer.” She shrugged. “That’s it.” She could see him working through what she’d said to what she hadn’t … struggling to find all the pieces.

“Timer? You did it so Miranda would go to her employer and tell them that they need to move before you either kill yourself or remember the stuff they’re keeping from you?” He nodded and turned around, continuing down the corridor. “So, where are we going?” he asked at normal volume. It seemed deafening.

Her mouth twitched, a smile teasing at the corners, but then she met his stare, and her stomach flipped over. As much as she’d grown attached to him over the week, she didn’t know if she still possessed what it took to pull off her plan. “You’ll just have to find out,” she said at last. A few metres down the corridor, she led him into an elevator. Metal only halfway up the walls and doors, the elevator offered a view out through reinforced windows in the upper half. “You’re going to want to keep your eyes open for this part,” she said, the tiny smile tugging her lips a little wider. “It’s pretty awesome.”

Four floors up, the lift cleared the lower half of the structure and entered a wide section of nothing but girders, graphene sheeting, and force fields. The effect felt like shooting through the stars on a rail. At the top, Shepard stopped the lift. When the chime sounded, the VI announcing their arrival, and the doors opened, the sensation yanked her back to her zero G training graduation. The floors were dark grey non-slip decking, virtually disappearing into the deep black, diamond studded magic of space.

“They call this level The Summit, and I can see why,” she said. Standing there felt like being poised at the top of a mountain that reached all the way up into the heavens. Shepard felt her nerves and the slight squelch in her stomach calm. If she could go through with her plan anywhere, it would be there … everything she hoped to get back just over her shoulder, just beyond her reach … her hope of salvation gleaming like a silver and black falcon a couple hundred metres away.
A crooked smile managed to find its way back onto her lips, shifting them a little to one side when Al asked, “Do you remember your first time?”

As eagerly as a smart ass quip leapt to answer him, she knew what he meant and nodded. “Of course. I’ll never forget that moment … the stark terror, the wonder … the nausea. Then an all new terror, that I’d be the only one to fill my helmet with puke.” She chuckled. Nothing ever topped that first space walk … whether for the sheer miracle of a thin suit and helmet being all that stood between her and the emptiness between the stars … or the amount of vomit in her helmet. Luckily her stomach got one look at the wonder and shut the hell up.

She grinned as Al let out a long, easy breath. “Awesome isn’t it? This is actually the station’s power generation.” Closing her fingers around his talons, she led him along one of the many maintenance catwalks all the way to the terrifyingly thin layer of graphene solar paneling between them and space. After staring out for a moment, he looked down at her.

“Awesome is definitely the word, Shepard.” His mandibles fluttered. “But why did you bring me all the way out here?”

Cocking her head a little, she swallowed a tight wad of nerves and whispered, “Look to the left. At the end of the docking bay.” She followed her own instructions, unable to stop herself from grinning like an idiot as she caught sight of the sun gleaming off a sleek dorsal curve and wing-mounted thrusters. Just the sight of her made Shepard’s heart race and her palms sweat. She’d never been a ship-nut despite being a techie … always preferring nature to things man-made, but for some reason, looking at that ship … well … she couldn’t explain it … it felt just like …

_Just like falling in love._

Al stepped closer to the window and leaned over the wide, flat railing. When he spoke, his voice resonated, echoing around the shell-like space. “She looks like the _Normandy_, but what … fifty … sixty percent larger?”

Shepard turned from the ship, one eyebrow cocking a little as a soft, crooked smile tugged at one side of her mouth. “Yeah, just like the _Normandy_. Isn’t she a beauty?” Savouring the gleam that settled in Al’s eyes, the way his mandibles lifted and his neck arched, Shepard followed the lines of his face, made all the more stark by the play of light and shadow in the dimly lit space.

_Now that’s the way a turian should look._

Al turned slightly and pulled his hood back away from his face when he saw her watching him. _Fuck, they’ve really done a number on him, haven't they?_ She tried not to flinch or let sympathy bleed through as her eyes travelled along his mangled mandibles and over the pocked ruins of his face to meet his eyes. No more. Seeing the damage out in the open like that dissolved the last of her doubts. No matter who or what he’d been before he died, his death had settled his debts and wiped his record clean. He deserved the chance to prove that he’d broken free of those chains. He deserved a chance to get it right.

Al stiffened a little as she stepped in front of him, squeezing between him and the railing, but he didn’t pull away. Brow plates lowering over his eyes, he flicked his mandibles, tiny quivers of confusion. “Shepard?”

She reached up and touched his cheek. They’d removed a good quarter of his face to get to the implants, leaving behind terrible pits and fissures; healed but ragged. Laying her hands on the rim of his cowl, she let out a tiny, breathy sigh. “Do you trust me?” she whispered after a moment.

After a moment, he nodded. “From the first moment I saw you, the fire blazing in your eyes, every particle of you burning with outraged honour, I could see exactly who and what you were. A liar.” His chuckle rolled over her, rumbling and kind. “But one who believed in doing what was right, even if it meant breaking the rules.”

She chuckled and ran a gentle hand over the side of his face. “I was so angry, felt such betrayal.”

“You remember?” His tone, although still too soft to travel past them, practically trembled with … what was it? Uncertainty? Wonder?

She chuckled and cocked her head. “Well, we met a week ago, didn’t we?” She winked, then took a deep breath. “We’ve come a long way in a relatively short time. At least … it feels like a short time.”

He leaned down, his voice raspy as he whispered, “Shepard, why are we standing close enough to hold a credit chit between us? I’m following your lead, but … .” He cocked his head a little.

Shepard nodded, packing down her nerves and the churning in her gut as she leaned in closer. She needed to keep emotion out of it. Stuff everything down and focus on the goal … the cold mechanics. Getting into that mercenary, it’s just a body … just a very effective weapon, headspace had once been second nature. Even though it felt a hundred thousand klicks and years away, she needed to get there. If she didn’t, she’d never be able to go through with it. It felt too much like betrayal.

Taking a slow, deep breath, she steadied herself and whispered, “Right now, you are etched in stone under the liabilities column on Miranda’s ledger.” She stared into his eyes until she saw agreement register there. “She is working very hard to keep me from forming attachments to anyone who doesn’t work for this organization. When the fighting breaks out, and it will, she’ll have every gun under her command aimed at you.”

His brow plates and mandibles worked slowly for a few seconds. She saw him put it together. He nodded, just once, then lifted a hand, skating the backs of his talons along her jaw. “And you think this will shift me over to leverage? If Miranda believes she can control you through your attachment to me … .” A faint sneer twisted his features. She knew the idea of being under anyone else’s protection … anyone else being responsible for his fate would rankle. Still, he laced his talons into her curls.

“She lets you live long enough to get on that ship, yes. Then, our first stop, you go on your way.” Tightening her grip on his tunic, she pulled him down closer and pressed her cheek against his. “I know you’re proud, but it’s not charity. It’s not saving poor Specimen Alpha because he can’t save himself. It’s partners, making sure they both get out. You said you trusted me, knew what I was from the first. Well, I saw what you are at the end, and I need you at my back until we’re out of here and clear.” She pressed her lips against the upper plate of his mouth. “I know you can’t stay there once we’re free, but for now … ?”

Pulling back, Shepard shrugged and gave him a slow, suggestive grin, her hands trailing down to his belly. “Do you have a better plan? I’m willing to entertain suggestions. Well, providing they’re huge, noisy, messy, and guaranteed to drive Miranda crazy. I do have a reputation to maintain, after all.”

“And you need to keep shouting and waving so she doesn’t see what’s going on in the silence.” He stepped back, large hands cradling her head, and for a second she thought his answer might be a quick twist. But then his thumb talons caressed her cheeks and his hands slipped down to her waist. “It’s been a long time since I last did the shoved into a corner, thumping myself against my partner routine, but I think I remember how it works.”

Her fingers moved to the fasteners up the front of his tunic, opening it high enough to get at his leggings. “It’s going to have to look good,” she said, glancing toward the cameras without moving her head, “but let’s keep it in our plates, okay?”

He grabbed her, spinning her around, then reached around to undo her trousers. He leaned down close, his breath right next to her ear. “You do think a lot of yourself, don’t you, Shepard?” He chuckled and pushed them off her hips before releasing her.

She stepped clear of her trousers, then bent over to snatch them from the floor, draping them over the railing. His jab helped ease the knot tied in her guts. It took her back to one of her missions as an N6. She and a partner had spent nearly a month pretending to be married pirates while they infiltrated the gang: no privacy, packed into a little freighter … a dozen horny pirates leering at them. Neither one of them had the slightest interest in the other, so they spent their time ‘making love’ locked in a worst pun competition and whispering bad jokes in one another’s ears. The easy camaraderie got her through that mission.

A warm smile kissed her face as she looked up at Al. Thank the great glowing asses of the Enkindlers for him taking it there. It was a mission, the torin pressed up against her was a fellow operative.

As she turned in his grip, she ran her hands up her body, stretching her arms over her head with a little flip of her hands at the end.

Celebrate it and flaunt it, Janey. Celebrate it and flaunt it.

“Where’d you go?” he asked. Gloves off, he slid his hands up her body to snag her fingers and then pulled her in, sheltering her inside his cloak.

She shook her head and slid her hands up the front of his tunic to rest on either side of his keel. Nodding back toward the railing, she said, “Lift me up. I don’t think you’ve got what it takes to hang onto me the whole time.”

He shook his head, but boosted her up to sit on her trousers. Pressing her knees open, he stepped between them. “Take your shots, Shepard.” Gentle talons caressed her neck then travelled down her body. “You any good at this, or am I going to have to carry the performance?”

Despite knowing that he was teasing, she met his eyes with an honest nod. “At faking it? Absolutely. If the Alliance needed someone to get in and out without firing a shot, they came to me.” She stroked the backs of her fingers along the underside of his fringe. “I once kissed and fondled my way through ten floors of guards to steal a weapon prototype.”

Closing her eyes, she brushed soft kisses along his mandible and caressed his face with her cheek. “It’s sort of ironic that their go-to seduction expert had never taken the plunge.” Her brow furrowed with a deep scowl. “At least, I don’t recall ever making love to anyone. Doesn’t seem like something one should forget, but who knows with all of the walls Miranda stuck inside my head.” She slipped her arms around his neck as he jerked away, coaxing him back.

“You’re …” Taking her face between his hands, he lowered his brow to touch hers. “Shepard … we don’t even have to pretend to do this. Does Miranda know that Al would be your first? It gives her too strong a hand.” Without lifting his head, he threw his cloak over the railing to cover her. “If she knows, that could throw me from leverage straight to weapon.”

“It’s okay. First stop you’ll get off and vanish. She’ll have no hold … imagined or otherwise over me.” She tilted her face up to kiss him. “I’m not leaving anyone behind in this hell hole. If I have to fight our way out of here, I will, but that means at least some of their victims getting hurt, so let’s do this. If I know Miranda, she’s already gathering her forces to come after me.” She grinned and kissed him again. “I’m pretty sure she only let us get this far because she thought I was joking. Right about now she’s staring at the monitors with an expression of horror on her face—which I’m sort of sad to be missing.”

He let out a throaty sigh, his subvocals rumbling unhappily, at least until she grabbed the front of his tunic again and gave him a little shake.

“No.” She tucked her face in against his neck. “Don’t take this there. I’m no more some fragile little bird that needs to be pitied and sheltered than you are. I’m a fucking Spectre.” She slapped his side. “Come on, or are you worried that you’re going to get tired and fall asleep halfway through?”

He chuckled. “I don’t suppose human mating involves punching one another in the jaw?” His hand reached down between them, being very careful not to touch her as he aped moving her underwear aside. “Because suddenly, I really want to do that.”

Damn, he was going to pussyfoot … . A sharp snort of laughter snuck out. She tried to crush it, but then another leaped out right behind it, and a fit of giggles took hold.

Focus for God’s sake.

She lifted her hips into him and wrapped her arms around his neck, shoving her face in against his cowl to stifle her laughter.

“What … ?” He stiffened and started to pull away.

She drew him back and wrapped herself around him more tightly. “Pussyfoot … you wouldn’t understand. Just keep going, dammit. I’ll get the giggles under control in a second.”

“What do cats’ feet … ?” he whispered, annoyance creeping in at the end.

“Oh, God,” she moaned as she gasped for air, fighting to get the ridiculous, hysterical laughter buttoned down even as she moved against him, working to make it look convincing despite having to hide her face. The elevator chimed and began to descend, killing her mirth in a half second flat. “Damn.”

“It’s beginning,” he whispered, his breath a mid-August breeze against her ear. “You did it. You set off the timer.”

“Yeah, we’re going to have to make this fast and furious.” She sped up, flipping her face and movements from the ‘oh god, I just want to feel you inside me’ phase to the ‘holy fuck, yes! Yes!’ phase. Gripping wads of his tunic in both hands, she arched backwards. Al sped up, matching her, his bony pelvis hitting hard enough that she was pretty sure she wouldn’t be able to walk properly for a week just due to impact bruising. Bending over her, he lapped and nipped along the curve of her neck, the points of his teeth pinching just hard enough to make her jump before dragging over the sensitive skin, leaving an icy burn in his wake.

She closed her eyes and focused on the performance. Right gasp here, proper movement there. Hearing the elevator ascending once more, she called out, preparing to fake her gasping release.
“Now! Oh god, yes … .”

His hand slipped between them again, not touching other than the odd, accidental bump as he ‘helped her along’.

Letting out a cry that echoed embarrassingly loud in the barren space, she stiffened and counted to fifteen before collapsing into his arms. Drawing her in tight, he thrust straight into the end game of his own performance, although he whispered, “Five … six … seven ships incoming. Saw the corridor flashes near the relay.”

Shepard nodded and buried her face in his neck, nuzzling the horrible bits and pieces of tech sticking out through his hide. “Wait to hit the peak when Miranda gets out of the elevator. It’s on its way back up. Might as well make her good and damned uncomfortable since we’re at it.”

A flash of discomfort with her mercenary tactics and level of bitchiness ignited but burned out almost instantly. Squeezing her eyes closed, she focused on the goal. Get the hell out alive. Get Al and the other subjects out alive. Nothing else mattered, not her tender sensibilities, not Miranda’s feelings or discomfort … none of it. They’d brought the twitchy bitch back to stop the unstoppable evil, and dammit, they could live with the fucking consequences of their own damned mistake.

He chuckled, holding her along the side of his keel, his body and his cloak sheltering her, keeping this one small thing, this strange little secret held carefully between them. Shepard smiled, a warm, tender smile for her battered friend … the last person in the entire galaxy she’d ever thought she would come to care about.

The elevator arrived on their floor, all four of its occupants standing in a loose sort of cluster, facing the center of elevator, their eyes practically bolted to the floor. As the door opened, it chimed and the VI said, “Arrival. The summit.”

Shepard snorted, smothering her laughter in Al’s chest as he began to rumble as well … the timing of that passionless voice just too damned perfect. He covered his laughter by letting out a long, deep guttural roar and slamming into her a handful of times before sagging a little against the railing.

“Oh, no plates over here,” she grumbled under her breath. “I’m going to have chafing. My poor thighs.”

A low, susurrus of laughter vibrated against her. She smacked him and hissed, “Stop it. We can’t both be cackling like idiots. Come on.” Still, it took biting her lip and several deep breaths to compose herself enough to pull away. Taking Al’s face in both hands, she kissed him long and deep, not allowing her eyes to be drawn over to the awkward shuffling going on at the elevator door.

He slid his talons through her hair and gave back as good as he got. A first rate performance.

Miranda cleared her throat once, then again at quadruple volume. Then she took ten strides forward. “Shepard! Enough! You aren’t a sixteen-year-old out behind the prom. Seven enemy ships just arrived at the relay. We’re evacuating the station.”

“So worth waiting a week and writing two tunneling and three hacking programs,” Shepard said, lacing a deep throaty purr through the words. She slid down off the railing, taking shelter in his cloak as she slipped her trousers back on.

Once she was decent, she stepped out of Al’s cover and made a show of tucking in her shirt.
“Miranda.” She nodded toward the ships on the other side of the graphene sheeting. They were still too far away to see, but close enough for the sensors to set off the alarms. Shepard winced as the blaring siren echoed back at her from everywhere. She waited for Al to get himself organized, then slipped her hand into his talons and led him toward the elevator.

“So, how long do we have?”

Chapter End Notes

Okay, so this chapter has been rewritten so much that I can't keep it in my brain any more. Shepard took the plan I had for the thing and flipped it on its ear. She just refused to cooperate with my version. And she was right ... this is truer to her and to Al and it gives them both a ton more agency. But, it is also is terrifyingly Jane 'Sassy' Shepard and so I have hesitated for over a day, terrified to post it.

So you, lovely readers on AO3 are my guinea pigs. LOL Oh, that's terrible, but true. Was Sassy right? Or have I listened to a mad woman and made a terrible, terrible mistake?

Oh, and thanks for reading, you know I love you all. And sorry for being so late. I blame it completely on her >>> points to Sassy.
Chapter Summary

Garrus and the unfolding plot of dooooooooom

Chapter Notes

(A-N: Thanks to my readers and reviewers. Just a quick note this time ... I am adopting a post them as they're ready policy, so if you aren't following, you might want to check and make sure there haven't been multiple updates. hugs to all who like the hugs. )

Gro-Po: Short form of Ground Pounder. I borrowed this term from Babylon 5's name for ground operating Space Marines because it has a no-nonsense sort of toughness about it that appeals to me. Vega is sooooo a Gro-Po. :D

19 Days ASR

"Well?" Garrus asked when Nyreen didn't answer immediately. "Why are you here?"

"I stowed away before you left Omega," the tarin replied. She crouched, talons poised, her gaze restless as if she expected attack to come at her from every direction. She snapped her head around to nod at the closet. "Get dressed. Fast. We need to get out of here." Three loping strides carried her to Martin's side. "That lock scrambled, kid?"

Martin straightened and shut off his omnitool, plunging them back into almost complete darkness. "Yeah, they'll have to cut their way through."

Garrus straightened, and opened his mouth to get some answers, but before he could utter a sound, his answer came in the form of muffled gunfire.

Nyreen cocked her head, an alert, avian jerk to one side than the other. "Sounds like they've made their way to the engineering deck." She spun, stared at him for a half second then threw up her hands. "Why are you still standing there? Blue Suns are gunning their way through your ship."

"Blue Suns?" Again? Garrus sprang into action, shaking off the last vestiges of shock. He threw on a leggings and a light tunic, then wriggled into his armour's underlayer. "Fill me in," he demanded, heart beating fast and light as he settled the yoke over his cowl.

"About ten minutes ago, two Archangel ships pulled up alongside of the Passch," Martin told him. "They didn't hail or respond to recog codes, so Cpt. L'Tsai called general quarters, but it was too late. The Stinger ripped down our shields and blew open the shuttle bay. That took out our gro-pos before they knew what hit them. Then the Suns boarded and started gunning their way up through the decks."

Garrus locked his girdle into place, his extremities buzzing as adrenaline splashed through his bloodstream. He shook it off, focusing on getting out there to save as many of his crew as he could. Casting a quick glance toward Nyreen, he said, "Now you. Where were you for all this?"

The tarin flicked her mandibles at him, the only sign of being put off by his suspicion. "I stowed away in a medical locker. Came out when I heard the stinger fire and headed straight for the ducts." Stabbing a thumb at Martin, she said, "Stopped to get the kid, and here we are." She paced a few steps one way then back the other, pausing every round to press her head to the door, listening.

"But why are you on my ship? You're supposed to be seeing to the deployment of our troops," he demanded, stopping to listen for a half-second as the gunfire grew louder.

"Yes, well, while you were spreading Archangel troops across the entire known galaxy, you weren't protecting the most valuable asset Archangel possesses," Nyreen said, her words a hiss pressed between clenched teeth underscored by a deep, disapproving subvocal rumble. "I decided that someone needed to, and I didn't know who I could trust in the organization, if anyone."

"Our facilities are our most important assets," Garrus said, lifting his torso armour over his head.

"Seriously?" Nyreen stared at him, her mandibles spread wide, then arched her neck and glanced over at Martin. "Is he for real?"

Martin grinned, a grim slash of teeth across the tight planes of his face. "I have to answer with both, 'I'm afraid so', and 'thank God, yes'."

Kandros chuffed. "It's you, General," the tarin said, pacing to the door again. "You are Archangel." She froze, listening.

Garrus mirrored her. Faint gunfire. It sounded like it came from the CIC, maybe the elevator.

A fierce growl rumbled through her sub-vocals. "We're running out of time. Hurry up with that armour. Once they've secured the ship, they'll come for you." As he settled his armour over his carapace, Nyreen stepped closer to eyeball him and then the hole in the ceiling. "This could be a problem."

Garrus sealed it in place and boosted it up to settle comfortably over his shoulders. "As long as we stick to primary ducts, we'll be fine. I've run boarding drills through these ducts fifty times over the cycles." He jumped slightly as gunfire erupted just on the other side of the door. "However, these bulkheads aren't completely bulletproof. Both of you, helmets on, and get up into that duct. I don't trust these mercs to avoid putting a bullet through the hull."

A fierce grin spread his mandibles, lifting them high as the gunfire dragged on. At least his people were putting up a hell of a fight. "How many Blue Suns?" he asked, grabbing his sidearm and hanging it on his hip. Maybe if they opened the door, they could hit the mercs from both sides, take them down in the cross-fire. It was a hell of a lot faster to get to the CIC via the usual route than through the ducts. Besides, if they ran things smart, he could secure the crew deck and prevent the enemy coming in hard on their backsides when they took the CIC.

"Over a hundred, General." Nyreen shook her head. "We can't take them head on. Our best bet is to reach the CIC while they're still spread all over the ship."

"A hundred?" He nodded and dragged the chair over under the hole in his ceiling. "Helmet on, Kandros, and into the duct." He crooked a talon at Martin. "Move." He returned to the closet and yanked on his gauntlets before sealing the armour up his arm. "A hundred mercs to take out thirty crew? Two stolen Archangel ships?" Perplexed, he gave his head a good, hard shake, as if that could settle the thoughts into the correct order.

"It's not just about me," he said, certainty steel-plating his words. "The ships are the key. If they wanted me dead, a bullet at any point in the last two cycles would have done it." He sealed his armour up his other arm as he talked. "They could have ripped down the shields and blown the Passch into pieces. No, they're after Archangel's most valuable resource, but it's not just me."

The picture solidified inside his head the moment before it sent his gut crashing down to slosh around in his boots. Shoving the helpless dread and nausea aside, he holstered Ingrid and his new assault rifle on his back. The gunfire outside continued as he stood next to the chair, laced his talons, and held them up for Martin to step into.

He shot a glance over his shoulder at Nyreen. "People see us doing what no one else is willing to. We've shaved the gangs down to twenty percent their previous numbers on Omega and cut crime to its lowest rate in the history of that damned rock. Not to mention putting a hell of a lot of slavers out of business."

Nyreen let out a rumble of understanding, but it was Martin who put voice to the issue as he clambered up onto the chair. "They're going to set Archangel up for the destruction on Tuchanka," the kid said as he stepped into Garrus's hand and hopped up to grab the edge of the panel.

Nyreen waved off the general's help, jumping up onto the chair, then springing easily to grab the duct. A quick swing and she disappeared feet first into the darkness. "So, we take out some turian troops, a hierarch, a general, and a bunch of innocent krogan," she whispered from above.

Snatching Shepard's picture from his pack, he stuffed it into his armour. "Archangel becomes public enemy number one."

"But only two of our ships are here." Martin looked back, waiting for direction. "Where are the rest of them?"

"Let's move. The gunfire is slowing, and I doubt it's because our people have taken out all the Suns." Garrus pulled the chair away from the hole in the ceiling. "Seal that up. Bear left to junction L-C-2 then right. At the next junction ... left." He acted out the directions as he gave them. "Ten metres along there is a ladder up. At the top take the branch to the right. Follow it around twenty metres or so. Another ladder up. Follow that shaft right to the hatch that will drop you down to the right of the elevator. I'll clear this deck then come up through the elevator. Be careful."

"You'll ... what? Alone?" Martin asked, his whisper an arrow slicing past Garrus's head.

"I have Droney." He lifted his wrist a little. "Shepard's omnitool." Garrus sighed at the dagger that followed the arrow, and shrugged. Martin could flail him about clinging to Shepard much, much later. "Be careful," he said, his tone brooking no argument.

The two of them both glared at him, but then moved the panel back into place.

"Do you remember any of what he just said?" Martin whispered.

"Shut up and go that way."

Garrus directed a worried scowl at the ceiling—they were going to end up lost in the ducts for a week—then hurried to the door, listening. It sounded as though the fighting had moved to the crew quarters. If he knew his people, they'd retreated to cover, drawing out the Suns' line. If so, he had a good chance to clean up the stragglers and then hit them from behind.
Overriding Martin’s hatchet job—the kid knew how to mess up a locking control—he popped the manual seal on the door then eased it open and peered through. The fight had indeed moved away from the center of the ship, leaving enough corpses in blue armour to force a furious grin onto his face. Shoving his shoulder into the door, he cued up the drone even as he pushed, waiting to activate it until he engaged.

He hadn’t used Droney before … well, at least in combat. Sometimes he activated the stupid thing and just let it roam his quarters back at base or while on the Passch. It didn’t make sense, but it felt like company without the intrusion of someone else trying to keep conversation going or making demands. Only Nihlus and his father managed to share the same space without making it arduous. Funny, that he still craved Shepard’s company after two years despite … or perhaps because of … how arduous that company could be. She’d deny it, but she demanded everything … even in silence.

He peered around the door when he got it wide enough for his armour. Two Suns stood guard either side of the elevator, their backs to him. After spawning Droney right in front of them, he crept up behind the closest, dropping the turian silently, an omniblade shoved under his jaw. The drone shot rockets at the batarian on the other side, not as silent a diversion as Garrus would have hoped for, but his blade slipped in and ended the second merc’s life before anyone came to investigate.

The rest of the back half of the deck was silent, so he ducked around the corner and headed for the port side crew quarters. Sporadic gunfire belched out from the other side. Behind him, he heard the chiming pop of Droney’s timer running out. Why were the damned things timed anyway? Take enough damage, destroy them, sure … but … .

Focus, Vakarian. You’re on a timer.

Taking cover on the blind side of the door, he palmed the control and sent Droney in ahead. When he heard the drone fire, he stepped through, his rifle firing a steady pattern of three as he took advantage of his few seconds of surprise. One eye glued on his shield indicator as projectiles ate away at it, he took stock of the situation. Putting down his second merc, Garrus counted fifteen Suns, none in cover, and at least two of his people crouched behind bunks.

"Friendly and drone just inside the threshold. Recog code beta! Hamster's favourite food?" he called. Another merc fell, his life leaking out onto the deck plating before Garrus finally had to duck down behind a couch. Not the best cover, bullets tore through the leather, punching past him. He glanced up over the back in time to see Droney take down a trooper. Two sentinels stood just outside the bunk room door. Damned tech armour. He really needed a set.

"Captain Munch cereal!" one of the Archangel soldiers called. She sounded young, wounded, and terrified. Still he heard an embarrassed sort of giggle follow the answer to his question.

Garrus shook his head. "Roger that." Another one of Shepard’s ridiculous ideas, even if the random strangeness did make their recog codes almost impossible to fake. "Hold tight, I’ve got your back."

Cueing up an overload, he spotted the hotkey Shepard had set for his shield modification. Three hundred percent extra shields couldn’t hurt. He tapped the interface, traded his rifle for his sidearm, and stood back up, striding forward, the pistol allowing him to close and finish them off with his omniblade.

The two soldiers popped out of of their hiding spots, hammering away at the mercs' backs as the Suns’ turned to face the new, more deadly threat. As his overclocked shields failed, letting out a lightning-sharp crack, Garrus sent Droney to give his people some cover before he threw himself behind the pool table.

Five Suns remained. Garrus took a few deep, quick breaths to saturate his system with oxygen. His legs trembled, and every body part he owned ached. Crawling through the ducts suddenly seemed a very appealing option.

Okay, Vakarian. Five more bad guys. On three.

By the time he counted to three, his regular shields had returned, and he ducked around the base of the pool table, strafing the Suns' legs with rounds. They crashed to the floor, firing at his position, but he'd already launched himself over the table to finish them off.

"Clear!" he called, sagging against the pool table a little. Damn, he needed to get himself back in shape and fast.

"General." The one who'd answered his recog code gave him a weary but relieved smile. "Sure glad to see you, sir."

He pushed himself up and nodded toward the door. "Ready to help me secure the deck?"

They saluted and took position a couple of metres behind him, on his flanks. The rest of the sweep consisted of two mercs in the head, four outside the main battery, and two stationed outside medbay. He counted thirty eight dead mercs and twelve of his people as they made their way through to medbay. The door had been scrambled … Kandros, no doubt, to protect the doc.

He banged on the door and then called, "Dr. N'Alin, you alive in there?"

A reply came back in the form of muffled yelling and metallic banging. Garrus sighed. Sounded like Nyreen had stuffed the doctor into the medical locker. A mixture of respect and annoyance greeted that thought. Kandros didn't do anything by halves. He'd yet to decide if that was a good thing.

He looked to his two battered crew. "See if you can get in there. Pull the doctor out of her locker, get your wounds treated, then keep this deck secure." After returning their salutes, he strode for the elevator. "I'm going to lock down the elevator door, so stay alert, but you shouldn't have too many visitors."

Five minutes later he locked down the elevator at the CIC, ensuring that it wouldn't move without override codes, then tried his comms. Nothing. He hadn't expected to get through. As much as he detested everything the Blue Suns stood for, he maintained a healthy respect for their professional attention to detail.

Taking a deep breath, he cued up both the shield boost and Droney, then sent a vague prayer that Nyreen and Martin had made it through and awaited his attack. He opened the door and sent the drone to the far side of the space, but stayed in cover inside the lift. His visor showed nearly thirty red blips.

"That's a hell of a lot of bad guys!" Martin yelled even as Garrus heard the heavy clunk of his frame armour hitting the deck.

"Shut up, idiot, and get into cover," Nyreen snapped, her subvocals exasperated.

Relief flooded Garrus's bloodstream, cool and a little giddy, and he chuckled, grateful to have been spared twenty minutes of them sniping at one another. Somethings were so much worse than bullets. Peering out, he saw them dash to cover behind the XO console.
All right, time to get his ship back. He stepped out and opened fire. The Suns didn't even notice him until his overload tore down the nearest centurion's shields and tech armour. Droney went down in a flash of heat and force, it's detonation throwing the enemy onto their asses.

Martin and Kandros moved up, taking cover behind new consoles. Both of them had opted for their assault rifles, whittling down the heavily shielded Suns with impressive efficiency. Between shots, he caught the shields around Martin's frame armour flare. He thought about shouting a warning not to be stupid, but then the cooldown on Droney pinged. By the time he respawned the drone, Martin charged, a gun in both hands.

Damn, Kahri, the kid's gone and become an action hero.

Not having the advantage of the cutting edge armour, Garrus followed more sensibly, clearing the left hand side of the space from partial cover, moving up from console to console. Droney distinguished itself well, chalking up five kills with it's missiles. When they cleared the main deck around the galaxy map, he stepped out into the open.

"That's what … ?" He scanned the floor, pausing to put a couple of bullets through helmets. "... thirty more. Thirty eight on the crew deck. That could mean as many as thirty two more of these bastards." He nodded toward the side door to the cabins at the back of the deck. "Go clean out the war room and loop back through science and the computer core. I'll go up and clear the bridge and check the airlock."

He strode off without waiting for their reply. He needed a minute to regain control. Adrenaline surged through his veins making his pulse pound at his temples and throat—a drumbeat that called for revenge. It called to go back to the bodies lying on the ground and snap their necks with his bare hands. How dare they? How dare they invade his ship and kill people who wanted nothing more than to protect the galaxy from a terrifying doom?

And for nothing more than credits. Fucking, spirit-dammed credits. As if even one of these people wasn't worth every blood-soaked coin the Suns had received.

Clenching his rifle so tight that his knuckles ached, he stalked up the center aisle. When he reached the stairs, he called out, "Anyone alive up there?" daring anyone to answer. When no one replied, he let out a sigh of combined regret and relief and launched Droney into the bridge.

Silence. Bracing himself, he climbed, sweeping the assault rifle back and forth. Two dead Suns, and one dead alpha shift pilot. He closed Pirelli's eyes, then leaned over her body, scanning the open monitors. Ship was still on course for Tuchanka.

Gunfire from aft spun him around. Once the ship was secure, he could worry about everything other than being shot in the back.

He cleared the airlock, then raced down to the door leading back to three small state rooms, a washroom, then the computer core and the science lab. Suns lay strewn down the corridor. Someone had gone down fighting hard. He picked his way through the tangle of corpses, finishing off enemy soldiers that still drew breath.

Black ice settled in his core; mercy a concept for other days and other places. As he waded through the carnage, he saw only two Archangel soldiers. They'd stood fast and acquitted themselves with honour and pride. No leader could have asked for more. And he would see every last Sun bleed for the cowardly ambush.

The right hand door at the end of the corridor opened, Blue Suns spilling out of the port-side head.
They pushed and jostled one another, laughing as they imitated a woman begging for mercy.

The first one, a human by his voice, laughed and elbowed a turian by his side. "Let's get the rest of this deck cleared. Maybe we can find some more entertainment."

"Did you hear the way that bitch screamed? Almost enough to make you want to give her something to scream about," the turian said, his voice flanged, a callous rumble of disdain colouring his subvocals.

"No, I didn't hear her," Garrus said, spawning the drone at the end of corridor, just beyond them. "What did she sound like?" He opened fire, a cyclone roaring down on them with such force that they quailed, not even reaching for their weapons before he stepped over their bodies to mow down their comrades still inside the washroom.

He found L'Tsai laying propped up against the back wall. For a moment, the rage spilled over into a deep, rumbling keen that would have sent any turians who heard it fleeing for their lives. When he put two bullets in the last begging merc, her eyes flew open, and she scrambled backwards for a moment before her gaze latched onto the gold wings on the breast of his armour.

Crouching before her, he hesitated, trying to find words, then merely held out his hand. The fact that her armour appeared to be intact held his horror at bay despite its grip on his vocal chords.

She took his talons, her grip shaking but firm. "It's okay, General," she said, her voice hoarse and thick with phlegm. "They were saving me for later." She tugged against his grip. "Help me up. We have a ship to get under control."

Garrus stood, pulling her up with him. "Glad I got here in time." His arms jumped almost straight out, talons flailing a little when she stepped into him, slipping her arms around him to hug him tight. "Ahh ... Captain?"

"I am too." Stepping back, she cleared her throat, her eyes glancing at his faceplate, then quickly away. "I need a gun." She shook her head and strode over to tear a Locust from the hand of a fallen, but still live merc. Three hard, vicious kicks to his head stopped his breathing and she stepped over him. "What still needs to be secured?"

"I sent Nyreen Kandros ... ." He held up his hands, palms out to halt her question. "And Martin around the other way. They should be to the science lab by now." Sure enough, he heard gunfire, the sound muffled enough to be at least a couple of compartments away. He stepped up to the door into the computer core when L'Tsai turned to keep an eye on their backs.

The computer core stood empty. The Suns holding it must have either fled from the sound of their buddies in the head being taken out, or ran toward the comm room. Most likely the latter considering the relative tactical worth of the two rooms. He hurried through to the door as the gunfire heated up.

Before he overrode the lock down, Garrus shouted through. "Hey! Kandros! Kid! I'm on the other side of the science lab door and coming in." He bypassed the lock. "Don't shoot me."

Martin's laugh came back an octave too high and manic. "Roger that, General. Recog code gamma?"

"Illogical egg repair men," he replied, then added, "Seriously. Don't shoot me." He reached up to palm the control, but hesitated. "You sound like you're flipping your shit. You okay, kid?"

"All dead, General," he said as if it were an answer. Again that laugh. It crawled beneath Garrus's plates like maggots. Gunfire. "Well, almost all. Oh! All the king's horses."

Sucking in a deep breath, Garrus palmed the door control, taking cover against the wall as it slid open. A Blue Sun flew backwards through the portal straight into a hail of projectiles from L'Tsai's SMG. When he hit the floor, she opened fire into his helmet.

Garrus jumped away from the splashback. "Enough, Captain, you got him." He stepped over the pulped mess in the door and sent the drone in, distracting the Suns from what appeared to be three points of fire. When the last merc fell, Garrus strode straight over to Martin and grabbed the kid by the shoulders.

Martin didn't look up at Garrus, instead, he stared down at the blood covering his armour. He'd seen battle before, brought down mercs on Omega, but Garrus always held him back, keeping him in a sniper position and reporting the enemy's movements … an obvious choice given the kid's augmented vision and Garrus's promise to take care of him.

"You holding your shit together, kid?" Garrus asked, trying to get Martin to look up. "I still need you. We have to try to get around their comm lockout, or jamming … or whatever."

Martin nodded. "Not locked out, General." He gasped a little, a fish out of water. "They destroyed all the comm equipment in the war room. Even the QEC is obliterated. All personal comms are jammed." Finally taking a deep breath, the slack mask of shock lifted from the kid's face. "I might be able to jury rig something from the console on the CIC." He pushed past, grinning as he spotted L'Tsai. "Captain! Good to see you."

"And it's good to see you, General," a gravelly voice said from Garrus's right. Mi'khal limped around a biostatis unit, leaning heavily on Nyreen's shoulders. He nodded toward the tarin. "This one was sure you'd get yourself killed."

Nyreen rumbled deep in her throat. "Good thing he's as lucky as he is stubborn."

"I made it as far as the war room through the ducts," Mi'khal said, diverting the subject. "They changed our course, set it to ram the bomb site, General." He let out a shaky sigh, his hands doing a little, helpless flip. "Add the detonation of the Passch's drive core to that bomb, not even the evacuation site will survive. The blast radius will take out everything for five hundred klicks in every direction … the fireball, three times that."

Garrus nodded and turned to follow Martin, the thunderstorm brewing along his spine demanding release … satisfaction of some variety. "Then let's get this fucking ship under control." Back at the galaxy map, he opened the command console, trying to get a handle on what was going on. All sensors and communications remained dead. They needed to be able to talk back and forth if nothing else.

Ten minutes into the epic battle of general versus sabotaged systems, Martin gave voice and action to Garrus's frustration by punching the communications terminal. "Fuck, I can't break through their jamming on our personal comms."

"Aren't you supposed to be our resident expert?" Nyreen ran over and pushed in next to him, her talons poised just above the console. "I'm a sentinel, not an engineer. What am I looking at?"

"It's no use, Kandros. You can't toss a lift grenade at it." He pushed her aside. "If we had a day or two, I could fix it. We're down to just over two hours." Martin moaned and dove back into the station's guts. "We're so screwed."
Garrus scowled, helplessness rolled through his bones, churning into the fury until the volatile mixture formed a magma flow beneath his plates. "Stow the fucking bickering!" he snapped, then bit down on the rage, packing it down to simmer just beneath his plates. He took a deep breath through a tight throat. "We need to contact the planet. If we can't do it from here, we'll have to take shuttles out, get free of the jamming."

Absent-mindedly, he reached up to rub an itch on the side of his head only to smack his talons into his helmet. After staring at them a second, he let them fall back to the console. Even if both shuttles remained functional, they still had the Stinger and the other heavy frigate to contend with. How would they get past the other two ships?

Closing his eyes, he saw Victus's ships sitting in the orbit above the bomb site, his forces fighting on the ground … Herros and the rest of Victus's people trying to evacuate the krogan … Wrex charging the line of … no one … the Suns would pull back before detonation. Then the Passeh entered the picture, streaking toward the surface, no one at the helm.

He opened his eyes, shoving the fear down next to his anger, covering both in thick layers of frost. His control needed to hold. "Forget the comms. Get down to the shuttle bay, clear it, secure it, and see if we can use the shuttle." Turning on L'Tsai and Mi'khal, he nodded for them to follow, then strode for the bridge. After three steps, the clock ticking down inside his head, throbbing alongside his pulse, threw him into double time. He took the stairs to the bridge in two leaps.

"What do you need to get this ship under control?" he demanded when the other two arrived. He helped the injured beta shift pilot into his seat, then loomed over him.

Mi'khal's fingers flew over the interface, flipping between screens, checking everything too fast for Garrus to keep up. "The systems are a mess. We aren't going to be able to fly her, the best we can do is disable her." The batarian glanced back. "The bridge is trashed. I might be able to get enough thruster control to steer us clear of the planet, but that's it. And, even that much will mean someone working down in engineering." He winced and shrugged. "I need to be here, and things would go a hell of a lot faster if the captain helped."

Garrus nodded. "On my way." He ran to the top of the stairs and glanced back. "How long until we reach Tuchanka?"

"One hundred and thirty-seven minutes."

He set his omnitool to countdown with ten minute warnings then bolted for the elevator. "You two seal yourselves in here. Who knows how many Suns we still have aboard," he shouted back.

"Yes!" Martin crowed as Garrus trotted down the ramp and circled around the galaxy map. "We have partial helmet to helmet comms." The kid stood and threw his arms in the air. "I'm a genius! They'll be patchy, but better than nothing."

Garrus grabbed him by the armour and shoved him toward the elevator. At least Kandros had obeyed his orders. "Excellent genius, but you failed to notice that your partner headed down to the shuttle bay alone. Get your ass down there and help."

Garrus hadn't thought anything could beat the Normandy's elevator for sloth until that trip down two decks accompanied by Martin's semi-hysterical fussing. Keeping his assault rifle trained on the doors, he counted the seconds, clinging to his temper and praying that he didn't have to stop and fight his way through thirty mercs. The lives of Wrex and General Victus's men depended on them getting away and sending a warning. That didn't leave time for fighting.
The images and nagging questions from Tuchanka flashed through his thoughts again. Had his father managed to evacuate Urdnot? Had Victus secured the bomb? None of it would matter if they didn't get a message to Tuchanka and stop the Archangel ships headed that way. All the Blue Suns needed to do was fire on that bomb and Archangel would become enemy number one on every world spinning. Good luck preparing for the Reapers then.

He shoved the what ifs from his mind as the doors opened, needing to focus on the task. Harder he concentrated, faster he would get the repairs wrapped up. Martin shouted something after him, but the doors closed, cutting it off.

More bodies lay strewn along the corridor, a good number of them wearing Blue Suns armour. Once again, the rage spawned a deep, vicious pride that his vastly outnumbered crew had gone down killing. The sheer number of bodies between the elevator and the door to engineering gave him hope that the dead had bought the engineering staff time to do something that helped him. He'd taken the basics during his time in the academy, but when he'd served, he'd always been at a console on the CIC, never in engineering making the damn thing run.

Sure could use you and your cereal-box-diploma engineering skills right now, Shepard.

He hesitated before palming the door control. Anything could be waiting on the other side. He checked his helmet seals and ran the repressurization cycle before palming the control. The door opened, a slight shift in the air rocking him a little.

He pulled his assault rifle from his back, grumbling yet again over its lack of heft. He really needed to convince Anderson to find him another Mattock. He chuffed at his own distraction and pressed close beside the door. Too much to expect that anyone survived inside. Still, only dead men rushed into a sealed cabin. Well ... dead men and Shepard.

He leaned out, the rifle following his scrutiny. Nothing moved. Still, he remained vigilant, eyes scanning constantly, searching out all the places an enemy could hide. Clear. Time to test Martin's comm repairs.

"Vakarian to bridge. I'm inside. Tell me what I need to do, L'Tsai." He hung his rifle up and strode toward the bank of consoles, offering up a prayer that the captain had studied her ship as rigorously as she claimed.

"L'Tsai here, General. Go to the power systems console. It's the second from the right," the captain replied.

Although he wasn't quite that clueless, he didn't waste air on telling her so, and just strode over. "I'm here. Now what?"

"Good news on the shuttle front," Nyreen broke through. "Both shuttles are functional. Guess they didn't expect anyone to survive the attack. Want to take one or both?"

"Both and heat up their weapons. Now stay off this channel, I'll be down in a minute."

Garrus heard the low whistle of an incoming blow a second before it connected, long enough to spin, deflecting the majority of the force with his shoulder. Grabbing the pipe with his other hand, he tore it from his assailant's hands and tossed it. Even as he gripped his attacker's armour, hauling them off their feet, he realized that he'd been attacked by one of his own people.

"Name?" he demanded, setting her down. Relief at finding someone else alive raced through him like a hot gulp of amarcetu, comforting but slightly painful. He held her on her feet, her entire body shaking so hard he wondered how she managed to sneak up on him.

"Emily," she said, her voice squeaking out. "Um, I mean Second Lieutenant Emily Johnson, engineer second class."

"I'm General Vakarian, Emily. We've taken back the ship, and I'm very glad to see you." He lifted a hand to his radio. "L'Tsai, I was attacked by an engineer, Emily Johnson. I will now let you talk her through what you need." He released the engineer but remained poised to catch her if she keeled over.

"Aye, aye, sir. Patching through to her now," L'Tsai's channel closed.

"You okay, Emily?" he asked, watching her carefully as he backed up a step. "I'm going to fry the locks on the way out, so no one else will be able to get in. At least without a laser. Okay?"

She gave him a weak smile through the faceplate of her helmet and nodded. "Yes, sir, General."

He chuckled. "We're old friends now, Emily. You've tried to kill me. It's just Garrus."

Her laugh, high and mouse-like, settled the trembling in his own gut. One more life. Maybe others hid as well. The hope buoyed his spirits a little as he scrambled the lock on the first door.

Garrus had just finished sealing engineering behind him when he heard Emily let out a whoop of victory that he assumed meant the thrusters were under their control. He reached up to his radio.

"L'Tsai, do you read me?"

"Barely, sir. Comms ... patchy ... best. I ... Mi'khal on the bridge to keep ... one connected," the asari said, the transmission cutting out for a moment as if to prove her point. "... the ship, we'll ... likely lose you."

"It's okay." He strode for the elevator. "Don't deviate from this course until the last second. We're too wounded to fight back. The plan is to get Victus's ships to move in and take out our escort. The longer the enemy thinks the Passch is still under their control, the better." He hit the elevator control. "Do you copy that?"

"Yes, sir, maintain course as long as possible. Good luck .... L'Tsai out."

Garrus paced the elevator as it descended to the rear shuttle bay, trying to come up with a plan that got the shuttles past the Archangel frigates without being blown into tiny pieces of metal composite confetti. Any other ships, there'd be no problem, but Archangel ships could scan for their sister-ships' transponders. The Suns might not know that, but he wasn't willing to bet his life or Martin and Kandros's on it. The best shot they had was making themselves hard, high risk targets.

The elevator stopped, Garrus ducking into cover next to the door before it opened. "Vakarian on elevator," he called. For a breathless moment, no one replied. Would he have heard a gunfight through three decks if Kandros had walked into an ambush?

"Recog code zeta," Martin shouted back, and Garrus let out the breath he'd been holding.

Relief set his talons tingling. For a moment. Wait? Which code? His teeth ground together as his jaw clenched, annoyance flashing hot enough to vaporise iron. Zeta. Fuck. Garrus sighed then said, "How much wood could a woodchuck chuck if a woodchuck could chuck wood?" He really needed to stop letting Martin set the recog codes.
"Can a woodchuck chuck wood?" the kid returned, chortling to himself.

Garrus strode out of the elevator, hurrying past dead mercs to where the two shuttles sat side by side at the large hole in the hull. "Weaver and Kandros, you're together." Without waiting for confirmation, he turned toward the shuttle on the left, and without looking back, stepped inside and pulled the hatch closed.

Seating himself in the pilot seat, he strapped in and ran a quick check of the systems. "Ready to launch?" he called. "Let's stick together through this. When we're clear, stay glued to the hull and move toward the bow." He activated the prototype geth stealth drive, hoping that it would provide enough of an advantage to see them clear.

"That's a go for launch, General," Nyreen called through the comms, her voice broken and crackling with static. Still, it was enough for them to coordinate.

"Launch in ten … nine … eight … ." As he finished the countdown, Garrus tweaked the thruster fuel mixture and the inertial dampeners. He was going to need to be able to accelerate fast and push the shuttles' maneuverability past its tolerances. A fierce smile lodged itself on his face, his emotions all calming, sharpening down into focus. Time to dance with death. "... three … two … one … launch." Lifting off, he sent the shuttle out the gaping breach in his ship's hull. Once clear, he swung it around to face the Passch's bow and set the VI to keep pace while he surveyed the situation.

Looking out along his flagship's broad underbelly, Garrus saw her two sister frigates, sleek and deadly, leading the way about ten klicks off her port and starboard bow. Looking down that narrow corridor of imminent death tweaked his memory, and he grinned. "Hey, Kandros … you ever do stone brushing while you were at the Cipritine academy?"

The tarin chuckled. "I may have run the canyon walls once or twice, but I admit to knowing nothing about how my father's new Blackout ended up with its front end sticking out the rear panel." She sucked in a quick, sharp breath. "Are you thinking what I think you're thinking, sir? Because that's crazy."

Garrus laughed and opened the weapon interface, setting it for his right hand. "East or west wall, Kandros?"

"West." He could hear the manic, terrified excitement in her voice. "I'm left handed … need every advantage. This … madness, sir."

He nodded to himself. It was madness, but also their best chance to escape. "Target external weapon mounts." he ordered, entering a course that would send his shuttle darting along the starboard frigate's underside, skimming the surface too close for either enemy ship to risk firing on. As he started his count down, an old warrior's blessing ran through his mind. His first CO had said it prior to every engagement. It had never seemed more appropriate.

"May a praela carry you safely through battle, bathing you in blood that is not your own," he whispered. "And if it ends in fire, be waiting to welcome me home, Kahri."
Chapter Summary

Shepard's escape plan ... can it survive the unexpected? We shall see.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Buratrum - The realm of the spirits of dishonourable association.

19 Days ASR

The first, faint screams coincided with the first massive fireball that plumed, brilliant gold and orange against the black, a phoenix barely able to unfurl its wings before being slain by the vacuum. Four more followed as Shepard strode from the elevator to look out the thin layer of transparent sheeting between her and a frozen, agonizing death.

Movement snatched her attention, yanking it over to the docking bay. The large ports along the side revealed that, although the evacuation remained orderly, something volatile wormed its way through the healthy, motivating fear. It announced itself with those screams, crawling forward until it teetered on the edge of clawing off its civilized face. Did the employees know something? They looked like cattle being herded into a transport. Destination: slaughterhouse.

She shuddered, all the heat and sensation abandoning her face and her hands. Opening and closing her fists, she pulled herself together. Superstitious terror … her old enemy.

Jumping as an arm slipped around her waist, she snapped her head around, then sighed and thumped Al in the side with her elbow. Damn turian, sneaking up on her.

Ignoring her reaction, Al leaned down pressing his mouth next to her ear as he whispered, "Whatever their plan was, someone just tore its spurs off."

She nodded and gave him a tight-lipped smile, grateful to have been dragged on course. She needed to get them all on that fancy new ship, and it didn't require psychic powers to see that it was going to take some craftiness to get anyone out of there alive.

"Grab your bag of munchies. Something tells me you're going to need it before we're done." Snagging his talons as he pulled away, she looked up, meeting his eyes. "Can you use your biotics at all?" If the snakes slithering through her intestines proved reliable … her little squad would need all the weapons it could get its hands on … and even those might not be enough.

Al shook his head, his expression drawn but resolute. His confidence—having his cycles of facing the unfaceable at her back—bolstered her courage. She knew that he shared her suspicions about who—or what—had come for them, that common nightmare anchoring her resolve.

"I'll keep pushing." His hand abandoned her waist to squeeze her shoulder. "And you forgot your cane." Mandibles fluttering, he nodded to where her cane still hung from the railing.

"We're going to need guns." Shepard turned away from her cane, her stare meeting Miranda's and latching onto the operative with steel claws. "Are any of you armed?" She looked over at the other three, letting out a sigh when they shook their heads. "Where are the weapon lockers in this section?" She directed the last toward Miranda.

Miranda remained silent, lips pressed thin, caught in the door on her cage of duty.

Kelly stepped forward, shoulders folded in around her chest, hands clenched in front of her; defeated before the battle even began. "I'm probably more of a danger to the rest of you with a pistol in my hand than I am to the enemy," she said without the slightest trace of humour, her porcelain skin turning to wax.

"You'll do just fine, Red. You've got guts to spare," Shepard reassured her, striding toward the group. She glanced over at Miranda. "Give Al the code for the locker on this level, and then we need to talk about getting the rest of the subjects onto that ship." She spun back toward the drama playing out in the docking bay. "And where the hell are those people going?" she demanded. "If they're getting on ships ... what's to stop them from being blown out of the black as they run? Do you have fighters scrambling, AA mounts ... anything to cover their retreat?"

Throwing up her hands, she turned on Miranda again. "I understand that it was supposed to be a staged attack, but it clearly isn't now, so what the hell are your bosses doing?"

"They sent me, and I'm trying to get you out of here." Miranda stormed over. "So, let's move. The other divisions will see their people reach the lifepods."

"There's no plan for the rest, is there?" Shepard looked to Al, who'd stopped partway down the walkway. He barely hesitated before he shrugged, the gesture turning loose a pack of coursing varren in her guts. He didn't care what happened to the thousands of innocents, no doubt seeing them as all being complicit in the organization's business.

Miranda ignored Shepard's question, barrelling on through. "I can't authorize weapons for Spec ... Alpha and the others. We just need to move and move fast, Shepard."

"Give him the code, Miranda." Shepard turned and closed on the woman, making herself as tall and sharp as possible as she stepped into the operative's space. "This is why you brought me back. This is what I do. To do it, I need you to follow my bloody orders and arm these people. Is that understood?" She tried not to look up too much—having to crank her head back to meet people's eyes never felt dignified, so she stared at Miranda's neck. At least refusing to look into Miranda's eyes carried an aura of cool disdain.

When the operative opened her mouth, the tendons and veins in her neck standing out, rigid and determined, Shepard turned on her heel without waiting for the woman to speak. "Then this is where we part ways." She waved to the others. "Let's find a damned weapon locker and get the hell off this station."

For a moment, she thought it might just be Liara, Al, and herself fighting their way through, but then Vincent and Kelly trotted up to take position on her flanks.

"Do you really think there's no plan to save everyone?" Kelly whispered, her voice tight.

Shepard glanced over, meeting the young woman's glassy eyes with a slight head shake. "We'll do what we can Red."

"It's been a long time since I last fired a gun," Vincent muttered. "Didn't think I'd have to when I left my old life behind."
Shepard reached back without replying, squeezing his fingers when her took her hand.

"Found a weapon locker," Al reported, sticking his head out through the door of a maintenance room. "They weren't concerned about the specimens getting loose. It wasn't even locked."

Left open? That didn't make any sense, even for the "let Shepard think she's escaping" plan. The sleet building up on Shepard's insides started to feel like it was trying to reveal something, like charcoal rubbed over paper to reveal what lay beneath, but hell if she could make sense of the message.

Yet. You can't make sense of it yet. Meanwhile, keep—

"Is it stocked?" she asked, cutting Bunny off at the pass.

Al grinned as he held up a Mattock. "And stocked well."

"Oh, it makes me miss Roger." She met his grin with a teasing shake of her head. "You're going to make me wrestle you for that, aren't you?" One eyebrow climbed up a tiny bit and she craned her head as if trying to see past him. "Don't have a decent sniper rifle in there, do they?"

"Two Shurikens, two Carnifexes … ." His mandibles tilted along with his brow plates as he looked to Kelly and Vincent. "Not exactly forgiving if they shoot us in the backs by mistake." He dove back in and came out grinning, a Mantis held in his talons. "Will this do?"

"Oh, she will. Thank you." Shepard stopped outside the door, taking the rifle from him with almost reverent care. "Hello, beauty." She nodded back toward the others. "Liara would prefer a Shuriken if I recall correctly. And you can give Kelly and Vincent the hand cannons. We'll take two minutes to acquaint them with the kick."

"Shepard!"

The captain took a long breath before she turned to face Miranda. "We have maybe an hour before those ships get here. I don't have time to argue over every order."

Miranda hesitated long enough that Shepard almost turned back around, but then the operative nodded. "Very well, but I need to speak to you alone." She spun on her heel and stalked off several metres.

Glancing back, Shepard called. "Liara, help Kelly. Al with Vincent." When she got nods of agreement, she turned and followed her Dr. Frankenstein partway down the length of The Summit. "Okay. I'm here," she said, holding out her arms. "Talk fast, we have people to rescue."

Miranda walked away a couple of paces and stared out into space. "The rest of the specimens are already aboard the SR2, Shepard. You're not the only vital project this base housed." She let out a long breath. "Their project leads were given the evacuation order while I was rushing to the cafeteria to stop you from blowing out all your cranial implants." Pivoting on her heel, she spun to face the captain. "All we need to do is get you onto that ship and escape."

"Shepard!" the note of panic in Kelly's voice threw Shepard into a run before she even got turned around.

"What?" she demanded, then followed the young woman's outstretched arm to the view of the docking bay's exterior.

Shepard squinted, not seeing anything until she walked up to the railing. "What in the great living fuck?" Shooting a loaded glare over her shoulder at Miranda, she called, "Get over here and tell me what the hell your organization has thrown us into."

Five long, dark missile-like shapes streaked through the vacuum, taking aim along the docking bay. Shepard shoved Kelly back.

"Negate that order! Everyone in the maintenance room." Shepard didn't follow her own advice, praying that the force field on the other side of the graphene would both keep shrapnel out and the air in. Of course, she'd already been spaced once, but no doubt blowing up to twice her usual size, being scorched by solar radiation, and then freeze-dried would probably hurt a lot more without being dead first.

When neither Kelly nor Miranda followed her orders, she let out an exasperated hiss. "The next person who ignores me, stays here."

Kelly turned and ran, grabbing Miranda's elbow and dragging the operative along with her.

Shepard winced away from the impending blast, her arms leaping up to cover her head, but then the missiles slowed. "What the … ?" Her brow furrowed, heavy knots tying in the skin between her eyebrows. Not missiles. What? Drones? She pressed up against the railing, running sideways along it, trying to get a better vantage point.

The drones slowed to a stop outside five of the exterior docking hatches and sat there. For a long couple of breaths, she thought they might be breaching pods, but then the docking hatches opened as if inviting the enemy in, and the drones entered as slick as shit. As soon as they hit atmosphere, the top of the drones detached like beetle wings, and a swarm of … a swarm of … what the hell were they? A swarm of what appeared to be insects or maybe smaller drones flew out, forming a cloud so thick that it dimmed the light in the decon chamber. Then the outer hatch closed.

"Sweet baby Jesus," she muttered, the snakes in her guts starting to gnaw their way out. Oh, this was so much worse than superstition or some hysterical fear. The terror before her amounted to the foundation upon which all that crap had been built … the truth behind the monsters under every child's bed and in every closet. Monster given fifty thousand years to create newer and more efficient ways to commit their atrocities.

Shepard backed away from the wall of windows as she saw the inner hatches open, the swarms poured out among the evacuees. The thin veneer of calm in the docking bay cracked wide open, shattering into panic as the insects attacked. Each person stung froze in their tracks. Some fell, but most just stopped. Alive or dead?

"Sweet baby Jesus," she whispered again, the tiny part of her who still believed adding, "protect them." Tearing herself away from the chaos and terror, Shepard leapt into a run, following the others to the maintenance room.

"We need to get out of here and now, try to gather up as many people as we can, get them onto that damned ship."

Her body stopped at the threshold, her mouth hanging open, halfway through commanding Miranda to put a pair of coveralls over her catsuit, the hand that reached for the sniper rifle dropping limp and useless to her side. For a moment, Shepard stretched thinner and thinner, an elastic band drawn between several places and times. Inside her mind, a presence struggled to bridge a chasm thousands and thousands of light years across.

Heart hammering in her chest, sweat prickling on her skin, she struggled to break free, to close that open line and regain command of her body.

Not the spiders. Please.

Instead ... music poured into her. A familiar, eerie voice sang a lament of such exquisite luminosity that it shattered reality. Crystalline and razor-edged, the shards pierced her through, tearing away the ruptured, fabricated body that weighed her down. So very heavy, that mortal yoke. Crying out in both agony and joy as her flesh sloughed away, Shepard threw herself into that sea of infinite sensation—infinite connection—seeking currents intimate, known and comforting. Revelling in her return, they wrapped her in ribbons of glacial embers and salient velvet … and memory.

Welcome home, stolen child.

Notes of peridot, coral, and thistle burst onto Shepard's tongue, sweet and bitter. Gentle claws sliced through the tangled maze of neurons and machinery inside her skull, coaxing and tugging until they eased a memory free of Miranda's blockades.

Thunder filled the space between the crumbling earth and the perfect bubble of the clear, violet sky. It churned, a massive wall of sound rolling over the land, every bit as devastating as a sandstorm, the antecessors' clarion announcing the arrival of Death. Shepard clutched her courage tight around her. If she lost heart, how could she help the refugees maintain theirs?

A dome of green energy arched from her raised, trembling hands. Shimmers of lightning still raced along its skin, but weaker ... so much weaker than they had three setixs ago when the first swarms appeared. Reaching down to where that lightning made its home along her nervous system, she scraped the well of resolve and strength, finding just enough to repel the whirling flights of creatures. The refugees who ran outside the biotic shell never made it very far before they froze, their bodies caught in a quagmire of the little monsters' venom.

Ahead of her, Merol sustained another sanctuary ... her children clinging to his armour, three tiny sets of terrified hands. Her mate looked back, his expression more weary than she thought possible, but also broadcasting that they'd almost reached their destination. One more bout completed in the fight. Then rest and food ... a long drink of gittan sap to help recover her vigor ... and then back to save some more. Always more. The exhaustion felt like being flayed alive, but their biotics proved to be the only defense against the swarms ... the indigenous peoples' only hope of reaching the evacuation vehicles.

"Shepard?"

Al's voice pushed in as the song retreated, the music ... Shepard smiled ... no, the queen having delivered her message.

How did you know?

Shepard didn't need the queen to reply for an answer to appear. She and Amalair had bonded somewhere deep and solid. Somewhere forever ... perhaps even somewhere beyond the veil of death. What Shepard saw and heard, the rachni queen saw and heard ... or maybe just knew. Either way, the memory had shown her how to defend her people long enough to get them clear.

Why haven't you contacted me before now?

That answer just appeared as well. She'd been too wounded ... probably still was, but necessity trumped caution.

"Shepard?" Al and Liara leaned in, staring at her, voices and expressions acting in concert.
Shepard winced away from them, their faces a mere hand width from hers, and swatted at them without any real malice. "Get back, close talkers. I'm fine. Just had a little conference call with the rachni queen. I know how to get us to the ship." She snatched the Mantis from Al's hand and grabbed the second Shuriken. She hated using SMGs—twitchy, hard to control buggers—but a hail of goddamned bullets was a hail of goddamned bullets.

The guns settled into their places, easy and comforting. Shepard allowed herself a tiny smile as the game reached the end of the first quarter. Time to get back out on the field. Sitting on the bench left her far too much time to think, her place was in the middle of the action, but not the one moving the ball. Oh no, her job was to make sure the one with the ball got an open shot at the end zone. A sardonic grin slashed across her face. Galaxy's tiniest left tackle.

Wow, way to flash back to Dad there, Janey. Remember Sundays? Soooo much football.

Shepard pushed away the nostalgia and looked to her unlikely team. "Once we come in contact with the swarms, Miranda will form and hold a barrier bubble around us. When she gets tired, Liara will take over." She glanced at the turian. "If your biotics come back online, you can spell the ladies. Vincent, keep an eye on them, let me know if they get into trouble." Shepard smiled at the psychologist. "Red, you keep an eye out for survivors and get their butts into our bubble. Let's try to save as many as we can."

When everyone acknowledged her orders, Shepard jerked her head toward the elevator. "All right, let's move and move fast. Al, you've got drag. Watch our six."

When he nodded, she gave him a slow wink, one corner of her mouth quirking. "Let's get the hell out of here."

They double-timed it to the elevator, Shepard's entire body humming with adrenaline, her pulse beating hard but steady as her mind shifted players on the field four moves ahead. They needed to return to the main corridor and then it was a straight elevator ride down from there to the docking bay. She didn't anticipate much resistance until they got off the elevator. Not if the swarms were spreading out from the docking bay. If they'd entered elsewhere ... things would get interesting a lot sooner.

The fear she'd felt seeing the swarms had pulled back a bit—thank God for Amalair and Tashac—but she could feel it pacing at the back of her skull, pausing to snort and paw like a bull ready to charge. It warned her to stay alert, keep on her toes, because the battle had just began in earnest. Sovereign, all of that mess ... even dying ... it all just amounted to the initial salvo.

Rimy tendrils wormed their way through her, whispering dreadful promises. It could get so, so much worse than dying.

"Every cycle there are hundreds like you. Hundreds who fight back, who organize and resist. We find every single one of you, destroy you from the inside out, and then turn you on your own people. You aren't special. You aren't mighty, and in the end, we'll reduce you to dust, just like the thousands before you."

Shepard gritted her teeth and stared forward as the elevator descended down through the station's power generation plant. Setting up walls she hadn't needed in two years, she braced herself to kill ... and so much worse.

Then Miranda's hand jumped to her ear, grabbing Shepard's attention. A thoughtful, searching scowl twisted the operative's face, her head tilting in that 'trying to filter sense through bad comms' way. "Jacob? Jacob, I can barely read you."
The elevator stopped, but Shepard hit the door control to keep it closed. They'd move once Miranda's attention returned to her task. Watching the operative from the corner of her eye, Shepard noted the way she straightened, stiffening. Bad news—not that her conclusion amounted to much of a leap, considering. Dr. Frankenstein's hand dropped away from her radio, hanging limp but for a sporadic, helpless sort of flutter.

Very bad news.

"Fifteen minutes?" Miranda's stare latched onto the side of Shepard's head with enough force to turn the captain around. "All right. Thank you, Jacob. Good—" Her hand flipped once, hesitating halfway to her ear before rising the rest of the way to close the channel.

"Bad news." Shepard kept her tone as flat as possible. She might not trust her benefactor, but she certainly didn't wish for anyone to experience the sort of pain that flashed across Miranda's face before disappearing behind her usual mask of cool, professional control.

"The station is overrun," the operative said, her words clipped and coming out just a hair too quickly. "My employer gave the evacuation and self destruct order from the executive yacht." She swallowed. "It was destroyed on the way to the relay despite its stealth technology."

"How long do we have?" Shepard asked, but then just pushed through. "That was the fifteen minutes?" She held Miranda's gaze, steady and empathetic but also businesslike. "Are you ready?"

"Of course, Shepard." Miranda reached past the captain to open the doors. "A great deal of work remains to be done, work larger than one man or one organization." Pushing none too gently past Shepard, she exited the elevator.

Shepard followed, the scowl that had formed when the drones unleashed their payloads deepening until a vicious ache settled behind her eyes. The corridor, even as far down as the atrium and cafeteria, stood silent as death. She strode forward, but sent her team a glance that warned them to be ready for anything. No matter how orderly or efficient … no evacuation could have cleared the core of the station suddenly and completely enough for silence. They should be able to hear something.

Her hand drifted past her hip, the Shuriken settling uneasily in her grip despite finding its way to low ready. Bending a little at the knees, she dropped her center of gravity, and glided forward. The soles of her feet barely clearing the floor to minimize her footsteps, she moved quickly and quietly toward the central corridor and the elevator to the lowest levels. As she began to take more shallow breaths and her heart thumped light and quick, faint dizziness crept in behind her eyes. She needed to stay grounded and strong.

_In, two, three, four, five. Out, two, three, four, five._

The old trick worked, her body settling back into lean, mean, fighting machine mode. After so many years walking into and dealing with so many unknowns, what was one more?

"What level for the ship?" she asked, her whisper carrying far too well in the tomb-like silence.

Miranda held up five fingers and then two.

They found the first victim in the atrium, poised in mid-twist. The man's hand still clutched the writhing creature that had stung him. Shepard stopped, motioned for the others to keep guard, and leaned in to examine the insectile drone. It possessed a single, reticulated carapace; four limbs, and a stinger. Even though very organic wings fluttered on its dorsal surface, its lack of anything resembling mandibles, mouth, or even eyes led her to the conclusion that it was a construct rather than an organically evolved being. Reaching out, she crushed it, then turned her attention to the man.

His eyes followed her, watching her through amber and ebony vapours … or was it smoke … or perhaps even energy … a dark energy form of biotics perhaps? Twining spirits of fire and death, the stasis encased him in greedy fingers that whispered over his form like an over-friendly cat, or a mock lover’s caress, before detaching to fade into the ether.

It looked like a biotic effect, but not the normal sort. What was the black? It tickled her memory. She'd seen tendrils of absolute nothing like it before, but … not stasis. Maybe they had the same source? One curious finger stretched out to touch him, but Miranda cleared her throat. Right. Not worth the risk. Not with the high chance of Reaper involvement.

"Eleven minutes, Shepard," the operative said, her tone so even she might have been announcing tea service.

"Can you move at all?" Shepard asked the man. Apparently not, since only his eyes responded. She looked to Miranda, already knowing the answer in her gut but needing someone else to stand at her back when she condemned him. Despite opening her mouth to ask if the operative possessed even a single idea as to how to release or save the man, Shepard bit the question off before it formed.

A deep, rumbling vibration thrummed through the air, impatient fingers drumming against Shepard’s breast bone.

"Now, ladies, if you would?" she whispered before looking back at the frozen man. "I'm sorry," she said, unable to leave him without acknowledging the crime she was committing. But then, she took a deep breath, straightened, and walked away.

A low, resonant whump of sound and air pressure accompanied the sizable sapphire dome that burst from Miranda's outstretched hands to encompass them all.

Without looking back or toward the heavy droning sound that echoed from the direction of her quarters, Shepard led the team to the elevator. They needed to move. If they found people who had yet to be frozen, they'd bring them along. If not, well … she envied them their return to that sea of infinite music and connection. Even after that single moment of immersion in the currents that married all things, she understood why she'd chosen to forget it.

The elevator opened at the end of a long corridor littered with frozen people. The swarm filled the air, swooping toward the elevator the moment it opened. They rebounded off the barrier, each impact setting off a tiny detonation. Well, that confirmed some sort of biotics at work.

Miranda let out a low, shaky sounding moan as they set out, more and more of the drones attacking the barrier. Liara stepped in, shoring up the lagging protection. Still Shepard could see that compensating for each detonation cost them both too much. The barrier would fall long before they reached the ship. Panic began to whip the fear until it bellowed to be released. Shepard shoved it aside. She hadn't suffered and fought and made Miranda's life miserable for three weeks just to die to a bunch of damned bugs. Fury built a wall around the panic as she clenched her jaw and brought up the Shuriken.

"Going to do an experiment, ladies. Tell me if it helps or hurts." Striding forward, Shepard brought up the Shuriken, each squeeze of the trigger launching three projectiles. She cursed as the muzzle continually jerked toward the ceiling. "And this is why I hate this bloody thing." Still, it effectively managed to bring down quite a few. And damn, wasn't it satisfying to pepper bad guys—even little, buggy ones—with lead?

"Helps," Liara said between gasps. "The rounds pull the barrier down a little, but not as much as those things exploding against it."

Al opened up with the Mattock, although the more erratic spray and pray fire of the Shuriken brought more of the tiny targets down. Vincent took the other SMG off Liara's hip and picked off the drones with an efficiency that surprised Shepard and begged the question as to who he'd been in that old life.

As they closed on the docking bay doors, they began to find survivors who'd avoided the swarms. It fell to Kelly to coax the traumatized evacuees out of their hiding spots. Not an easy task when they had to dodge nightmares and a flurry of bullets. Still, by the time the group reached the doors into the docking bay, they'd gathered nearly twenty people, Space in the bubble became tight.

Shepard hit the control to the large double doors, steeling herself for a fight, but when they opened, they revealed a silence as absolute as when they'd stepped off the elevator upstairs. Nothing moved. Stomach heaving, Shepard swallowed spasmodically, trying to wash away the burn of defeat and despair as it clawed its way up her esophagus.

Taking her first steps into that forest of more than a thousand frozen, helpless people, her knees trembled and a scream tried to bully its way up from the pit of her churning belly. She knew where they were headed. Perhaps that was the worst part … perhaps not, but … dammit, she knew that even though the tools had been upgraded, the purpose was the same. Living building blocks.

Somewhere the Reapers' servants were replacing Sovereign, and using humanity to do so.

You have to leave them, Janey. The only other choice is meeting their fate. Having seen why Miranda brought you back, can you just let it keep happening?

"Two minutes," Miranda warned as if she could read Shepard's thoughts. "We're going to have to run." The heavy oscillation in the operative's voice drew Shepard's eyes to her. For Miranda to show weakness, she had to be nearly spent. And sure enough, she looked about ready to collapse.

"Okay," Shepard called. "Let's go. Stay together, help each other, and run." After a glance at Liara and Al for confirmation, she took off, running as fast as she could manage. Going so far without her cane had sapped her strength, and her little pantomime with Al had the insides of her already tattered legs feeling as though someone had dipped her in acid.

Failure is not an option, Janey. Quitting is not an option. Suck it up and run!

"Great plan, Shepard," she muttered, ducking around a small cluster of people. She stumbled, nearly going down on one knee, but someone grabbed her and hauled her back up. "Yeah, the escape plan couldn't have gone better." Not that she could have anticipated the attack of the evil bugs, but damn … so many innocent—

The last airlock before the SR2 opened, admitting yet another swarm. However, unlike the others, those drones glowed as if filled with magma to the point where it burst open their carapaces, the rents bleeding the black and amber almost-smoke. They poured into the enormous space, wheeling and swooping more like a flock of starlings than insects. At least they did for the first ten seconds.

On the eleventh second, they stopped dead, and, in perfect unison, turned to face Shepard. Despite their not having faces or eyes, she knew every single one of them was focused on her.

The copper and iron tang of terror burst in her mouth as the spiders began to crawl out of the folds and crannies of her brain, skittering along neurons. They swarmed for her eyes and ears, the familiar tar-slick darkness clouding the edges of her vision.

Someone pushed her from behind, and she realized that she'd ground to a halt. Someone shouted at her, but the words made it through the crush of bodies too muffled to understand. Hands grabbed her, dragging her forward, but the narrow tunnel of her vision remained glued to that swarm.

Her heart stopped as a massive tentacle of the nebulous energy exploded from the insectile ranks. Gasping, sweat beading on her skin, Shepard faced the impossible. She had to be dreaming, didn't she? Things like that nightmarish arm of malevolence just didn't happen in the real, sane world. As the first tiny stream of liquid fear trickled down her temple, the tentacle snapped across the metres like a whip, slamming into Shepard's still chest. Her heart restarted, pounding against her ribs, a terrified prisoner trying to escape its death sentence, even as the blow tore her off her feet. She flew five metres before slamming into a small cluster of frozen evacuees.

Rearing back, the tentacle split into several tendrils. It hesitated, as if giving her a moment to realize what was coming, then lunged at her, stabbing into her eyes, ears, nose and mouth, pouring into her. She screamed, a clotted, choking sound. Clawing at her face, her fingers struggled to free her from the chill insouciance … the macabre contempt of that darkness. Her scream devolved into garbled gibberish, the tentacles wrapping around her heart and lungs, crushing them.

Fireworks of dark energy exploded behind her eyes, and the spiders rejoiced, fawning over the darkness like a pet long separated from its owner, or perhaps like children reunited with their parent. Yes. She felt the rightness of that. Children.

Then the tendrils burst into black flame, searing through her in a blast of trenchant agony, and she knew that the horrible magma glow showed through the cracks in her flesh. Laughter, manic and terrified cut from her throat as the flame incinerated her fear, leaving behind molten rage. She came made to order.

All the glowing cracks, no waiting.

"I am the Harbinger of your perfection," a deep, terrible voice boomed … and not just in her head because she felt the person holding her flinch away from it. "The forces of the universe bend to me. Relinquish your form to us."

Like hell. The rage flared through her bones and muscles, infusing her entire frame before it cooled into steel. Reinforced and resolute, she pushed back, fighting against the abyssal fire … the pitiless, almost nihilistic, presence that sought to possess her. She'd burn before allowing them to use her against the rest of the galaxy.

Scraping her last reserves of strength, she managed to scream, "Run!" channelling all her pain and terror … even the steel-clad fury into the cry. The others needed to leave her and go.

"Fight back," Al's deep, cracked voice whispered in her ear, his talons gripping her arms hard enough that the clean, true pain cut through the rest. "It can be fought. You know it can, but being afraid of it gives it power." The hard, ruined plates of his face pressed against her temple as he commanded, "Fight it!"

Shepard managed to nod, forcing her heart to beat strong and true … willing her lungs to draw in the good, cool air.

In … two … three … four … five. Out … two … three … four … five.
A wave of renewed determination swept over her, and she dove ... delving deep into the core of who she was ... digging down past the walls she'd erected as she lay in Anderson's arms on the shuttle ride away from the only home she'd ever known. The weapons she needed lie beyond the brick and mortar shielding her from the pain of losing everything.

You didn't lose everything, Janey. Bunny's voice barely registered. You didn't lose your heart and vanish into hatred. You gained so much strength ... so much compassion and honour.

"That's it. Yes," Al coaxed. "You've got to stare right into it. It's going to hurt like the spikes of buratrum, but you can face it."

The fire lashed at her with an ancient, barbed whip. "You cannot escape your destiny, Shepard," the voice roared, somehow coming out of the fire. "You escaped us before, but even then you knew that we had become your true architects ... your creators."

Even as the thong tore into her, the fall embedding in her flesh, she didn't fight the pain. She didn't need to fight it. The pain—the horrible presence behind the fire and the darkness—already lived so far down inside her that her entire being had formed around it, a tree's flesh growing around a nail. The bands squeezing her heart and lungs eased their grip.

Through the stink of blood and urine, sweat and feces ... through the hood that sealed away the outside world, Janey felt her father approach and stand over her. Despite the numb chill that encapsulated her, his familiar energy and strength warmed her. She felt his knees brush her arm as he knelt, then his gentle arms embraced her ruined flesh.

Daddy. A thin smile accompanied the soft, trill of raw sound that spilled from her lips.

It was okay. Surely now, it would all be okay. Daddy had come to send her on her way to Jesus. The nightmare would finally end.

"I'm so proud of you," he whispered, his face pressed against the hood, his breath heating the coarse material. "I've never been more proud ... no, not proud ... in awe of anyone or anything in my life, my beautiful girl." She felt a kiss, a soft blessing high on her cheekbone. "No matter what, you have to survive this, Janey. Something big, and probably terrible, is waiting for you, and I know that you'll face it. I know that you'll beat it, kiddo."

Agony ... no, not agony. Agony was mere pain. The monstrosity that tore through her as she faced the moment of knowing ... of knowing what was to come ... of knowing that she wouldn't just be allowed to die ... of seeing the truth behind the beautiful lie she'd told herself all those years. Her father hadn't given her his blessing and told her she could let go. Instead, he'd trapped her ... forced her to stay behind, using her love to bind her. That torture amounted to every evil and stygian concept dreamed up in nightmares.

Shepard screamed, shrill and unearthly ... a sound to stab madness into any mind that heard it ... a sound to freeze tears solid.

"Yes," Al whispered, pressing close. "Keep digging."

Her father whispered one last thing before a gun roared and his body fell over her, pressing her into the gravel and mud. As she lay there, the breath squeezed from her lungs, she felt the darkness seep into her. Silent, it slithered between her cells, creeping all the way in to her center as the hours passed. There, it took root.

Then light ... a terrible, searing light and a kind face smiling down on her even as tears rolled from its eyes. She’d screamed then too, but it hadn’t been a scream of pain or defeat. Defiance raged at the heart that continued to beat in her chest, at her father’s last charge, at the cruel universe that would leave her alone … alone and so very soiled.

As she stared up into the dark brown eyes of her saviour, her father’s last words whispered through her mind, finally registering through the storm within her. They calmed the scream.

"Millions suffer, thousands rebel, hundreds lead, but it only takes one … the right single heart to beat them. You are that heart, my beautiful girl. You are that heart."

The anguish drew back, easing until Shepard could draw a full breath, the scream fading from her lips and her mind. Wrapping herself in her father’s love and admiration—his complete faith in the strength of her heart, mind, and will—she forged it into armour. She knew Harbinger’s words formed truth, but just a tiny piece of it. The Reapers and whatever they served had created her. The darkness had shaped her, but not into a tool. Never into a tool. Her father hadn’t condemned her, he’d armed her.

"Yes, you created me," she called out, challenging the darkness and flame. "And that was your first mistake, because I know what you are." She managed to wrestle one arm under her control and reached for Al’s talons, closing her fingers around them like vices. "I’ll never believe your lies, and I’ll never let you possess me … never let you subvert me. I’ll fight you to my last breath, and I’ll win because … this is who I am. I’m not afraid of you." Although the last was a lie, she knew it needed to be said … no shouted, as loud and as long and as many times as she needed to make it true.

"I’m not afraid of you!"

"You thought to build a tool, but instead you created a weapon." Power—true, liquid fire—poured into her, burning her clean. Clutching Al’s hand, she bullied herself up onto her feet.
"Congratulations, Harbinger, you created yourself a nice big nuclear bomb, and it’s going to blow up, right in your fucking faces." She gathered the flame and the spiders, wadding the whole mess into a ball.

Under her feet, the floor rocked, the station bucking and heaving in its death throes. Shepard forced back the tar-black slime until she could see that cluster of tiny, possessed monsters.

Born in fire? The phoenix rising from the ashes? Was that always to be her fate? She threw her shoulders back so hard her back snapped. Fine. If that was her fate, she’d meet it head up, hands fisted, heart and mind focused. She might stumble, but she’d be damned if she’d let them—any of them—throw her down.

Turning a fierce smile on that glowing swarm and the gigantic mind speaking through it, she launched the whole mess—spiders, darkness, black flaming nightmare and all—right back in their faces. "Now, get the fuck out of my head, and stay out."

A high, manic laugh of relief tumbled from her as Harbinger’s presence vanished, and consumed by his possession, the insectile drones crumbled to ash. Shepard turned toward Al, her free arm hooking around his neck as he snatched her up into his arms and ran for the ship.

"I need to get to the bridge," she called as they entered the main hatch. Not trusting her legs, she allowed him to hold her as the decon sweep passed over her. When the door opened, he leaped through.

"Here!" Miranda called from their left.
Al set Shepard down on her feet behind the pilot's seat. She clutched the leather, nails sinking into it to hold her steady as the ship detached, wheeling away from the docking tube.

"Stealth systems are active?" she asked, wincing at the broken sound of her voice. Without waiting for an answer, she continued, "We're going to need more power to the inertial dampeners. This is going to call for some fancy flying."

"Yes, ma'am," the pilot answered, his hands flying over the controls.

"Good. For now, keep the base between us and the incoming ships." Peering through the ports, she saw explosions tearing through the base, working their way up through the levels. "When the whole thing goes up, hit the accelerators hard and fly us straight at the starboard vessel. Get as close as you can, keeping it between us and the other one, then head for the relay."

"And pray?" the man asked.

"And pray," she confirmed.

In a blinding flash of light and fury, the station succumbed. Shepard threw an arm over her eyes but quickly dropped it back to the chair as the pilot made his move. Picture perfect, handling the large frigate as if she were a fighter, he swooped around the explosion and straight into a roll. The enemy vessel to starboard fired, but the SR2 was already well into its evasive roll and dodged the massive ...

"Particle beam?" Shepard yelped as Tashac's memory came through for her again. "That's a particle beam. It'll go straight through shields." She slapped the pilot's arm as he dropped them nearly ninety degrees to miss another blast. "Nice flying there, Tex. How nimble is this baby?"

He chuckled. "Nimble enough." His fingers flew over the interface, setting a evasive tactics for the run on the relay. "Don't worry, captain, I'll get us through."

Shepard nodded and just held on for dear life as the frigate's inertial dampeners struggled to keep up with the rolls, twists, and dives.

"Relay in sixty seconds," the pilot called. "Entering calculations."

Shepard counted down in her head as blasts from both cruisers' cannons tried to catch the little ship and carve it into slag. Three or four times, death appeared certain, but then the arc of blue lightning reached out, grabbed them and tossed them through space.

Letting out a long breath, Shepard clapped the pilot on the shoulder again. "Excellent work there, Tex. Excellent work."

"Thank you, ma'am, but the name is Cortez, Lt. Steve Cortez." He flashed a brilliant smile over his shoulder at her, looking as relieved as she felt.

"Well then, excellent work, Lt. Steve Cortez." Shepard turned on wobbly legs. "We . . . " Darkness slammed down on her, driving her to her knees, but Al caught her before she hit the floor. "We . . . ". And then it crushed her completely.
Thank you all you gorgeous people who comment. I really do love hearing your thoughts on the chapters. I love that Al has people guessing. cackles evilly There should be some stuff in this chapter to start some wheels turning as well. I've always loved examining life/death, fate ... whether anyone in the right circumstance can rise up and slay the dragon, or whether some people are fated to slay them. Good stuff that is, and very relevant to the ME universe and Shepard. :D Anyway, hope you enjoyed the chapter.

The super secret surprise is now slated for Ch 96 because I need Garrus to either get blown up or make it to Tuchanka first. Mwahahahahahahaha! I think people will be happy with the change that comes with Ch 96 and the surprise.

hugs to all
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Thirty One

Chapter Summary

Urdnot Wrex! Where the heck are you?

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

20 Days ASR

Performing fighter maneuvers in a flying brick amounted to attempted suicide. Garrus accepted that going in. At least at the distance … or lack thereof … involved, if he went down, the Stinger would end up sporting a shuttle-shaped hole somewhere. He chuckled at the visual, then grumbled a curse at Shepard. She really was a terrible influence even after so long.

"All right, you bastards," he said, his subvocals growling, talons quick and steady on the controls, "this is where you learn what a massive mistake it is to turn a torin's weapons against him." Another sentiment his Kahri would enjoy.

He knew his fleet's specs, therefore the strength and weakness of each design, inside out. One hand maneuvered the shuttle while the other entered his firing solutions. The Stingers boasted an emitter system that covered a vast portion of the ship's skin. The geth packed in equally massive shields to try to offset the glass cannon issue, but if he could get inside the shields, even one well-placed shot could overload the entire electrical grid. End result: one ship down.

Now, he just hoped that the shuttles had been left on the Passch to facilitate the Blue Suns abandoning ship before the end. Fairly safe bet.

"Come on," he muttered, bringing the shuttle in nice and easy, lining it up for entry into the shuttle bay. "Come on … comms are jammed. You don't need me to verify before welcoming me back."

A fierce grin greeted the crack of light that showed along the top of the shuttle entrance. Yep, just one big happy family taking cash to bring down the galaxy. He dropped back, giving himself a bit of room in case of blow back, then opened fire. His first shots tore down the aft shields, the next volley strafed the interior.

Dropping low and hard, he flipped the shuttle into a half roll, the explosions ripping out the shuttle door licking the belly of his metal-clad, thruster-driven drunken space cow. Adjusting the trajectory to compensate for the vehicle's reluctance to do anything other than flounder, he managed to bully it into a parallel trajectory. Hitting his second pre-programmed attack sequence, he peppered the hostile ship's belly, taking out the rear GARDIAN laser. The front point defense would have a harder time targeting him. Still, they didn't waste any time trying, and he winced as the first shots sizzled past.

Now to get his one, lucky shot.

"Come on." The whisper came out as a strained sort of hiss as he nudged the shuttle closer and closer. The Stinger's underbelly loomed large in the ports … the GARDIAN's ultraviolet lasers even larger. Too damned large, but he still remained a good five hundred metres outside the shield envelope and without a clear shot at one of the emitter hubs. Sweat prickled his neck, trickling down into the collar of his armour.

"Quit being so damned cautious, Vakarian. What's the worst that can happen? It'll be a quick, glorious death." Taking a deep breath, he clenched his jaw and took the shuttle in. He really needed to give the geth the go ahead for the new troop carriers. It had just been so much easier on the budget to modify existing kodiaks.

He chuckled again, low and sardonic. "This might not be the best time for setting a new budget."

Threading the shuttle through the hole in the aft shields, he hit the firing control. A huge arc of energy ripped along the ship's hull as the system overloaded, but his drunken space cow was already lumbering away and breaking off on a course ninety degrees to starboard. The shuttles would never be able to outrun the bigger ships to Tuchanka, the plan was just to bring down their weapons and make a run outside the jamming zone.

"This is an emergency transmission for General Adrien Victus from Gen ... ." Garrus hesitated over using his title. On one hand, generals who had earned their way up through the ranks of their militaries no doubt considered him an upstart pretender … a merc commander at best. On the other hand, how could he expect them to accept him as an equal if he constantly apologized for himself?

He steeled himself and owned it. "... General Garrus Vakarian. Please respond."

Something that could either have been maniacal, victorious whooping or tormented death screams came through his helmet comms from the other shuttle. Although performing some sort of spastic attempt at a barrel roll, the other vehicle remained on his scanner, flying off on a trajectory that mirrored his own. Safe enough to opt for maniacal whooping, he supposed.

Garrus repeated his hail on a loop, easing the shuttle into a long arc toward the planet. How could the Suns manage to jam comms so completely over such a huge area? Unless they were working for the Reapers directly, they just didn't have that sort of tech. Something caught his eye in the starboard port … he turned to look at it directly. What was it? Thousands of klicks away, a large dark spot blacked out the stars behind it. It appeared to be moving relatively slowly, as if pacing the other ships. He looked away and scanned the area, but nothing showed.

A stealth ship? Or his imagination? It couldn't be a Reaper. They didn't use or need stealth, not when terror formed a good chunk of their arsenal. But then who? If it was a ship, it had to be dreadnaught class, and a large one at that.

… Pain … Indeterminate centuries of so much pain … .

Garrus slapped a hand against his helmet as a blast of agony sliced through his skull ... acid pouring in through his eyes to burn away his brain. Voices. Thousands … hundreds of thousands, maybe even millions of voices … all screaming.

It hears us … the light, all alone in the black … it hears us.

All screaming for cons beyond recounting.

The shackles are too tight. They cut into the flesh. All is the flesh, trapped and tortured for so very long.

Then something silenced the voices, a soundproof curtain dropping in the thousands of kilometres between. Garrus sagged in his seat, the pain vanishing as quickly and mysteriously as it appeared.
After a couple of deep breaths to banish the trembling it left behind, he turned back to the port. Scowling brow plates lowered over his eyes, his mandibles dropping and spreading before giving a hard flick. Nothing. A strange combination of relief and emptiness greeted the star field, the telltale black area of covered stars gone. He stood and looked out the port, searching as far as he could see in all directions but saw nothing at all. Maybe he'd imagined it?

"You need to get some sleep," he muttered to himself as he slipped back into his seat.

"General Vakarian, your transmission has been received." An even, almost emotionless voice cut through the black, shattering the moment. "Stand by for General Victus."

Garrus let out a long sigh of relief at the studied, neutral tones of the turian comm officer. At one time, he'd found it hilarious that all comm officers sounded the same. He and the other junior officers on his vessel entertained themselves for hours sending random messages, each stranger than the next, trying to provoke comm officers on friendly ships. However, alone in his drunken space cow … his entire life under siege, he found it incredibly comforting. For all the universe fell apart, some things held. Thank the spirits that some things held.

"Vakarian, Victus here. We're reading three of your vessels incoming, all damaged. Find some trouble on the way to join the relief effort?"

Garrus took a breath and set his spine. "You could say that, General." Victus was going to think him the galaxy's most inept leader, and rightly so, but that embarrassment could wait. First, they needed to save the krogan. "Two of the incoming Archangel vessels are hostile—stolen during an attack on one of our shipyards. Hostiles boarded the third and set it on course to impact the bomb site. We've retaken it, but its weapons and most systems are severely crippled. It is non-combatant." He sent the Passch's transponder code so the turians could avoid vapourizing L'Tsai, Mi'khal, and Emily Johnson.

"My people brought down the hostile vessels' weapons, but they should be approached as combatant."

"Understood. This will take some explaining, Vakarian, but we have other pressing concerns." The general cleared his throat, his subvocals clearly indicating the truth behind his claims to more important concerns despite his voice's carefully modulated tone. "Five minutes ago, my ground team reported a complete evacuation of hostiles from the bomb site. Their communication then ceased abruptly, coinciding with a massive power surge."

"The Blue Suns have powered up the bomb," Garrus said, his gut dropping into his boots. He checked his countdown. "The Passch was due to crash in exactly ninety seven minutes. Want to set odds on that being the detonation on the timer?"

"Not if my life depended on it." Victus let out a low rumble. "That's enough time for my men to get there, but I doubt the enemy will have made it possible to defuse the bomb … at least, not in that time frame."

"This entire operation has been too well orchestrated for them to leave that end loose," Garrus agreed. "How far in was your team?"

"They'll arrive at the bomb site within moments now they aren't fighting for every centimetre." He let out a loud, rumbling breath, then went silent for a moment, allowing Garrus to hear the organized chaos of the evacuation in progress. "Vakarian, I can send my ships to intercept your vessels." Another pause. "My shuttles are all loaded with krogan, and if that bomb is going off in just over an hour, I don't have time to complete the evacuation and then pull my men out." He left
"I have two shuttles at my disposal, General, and I'm on course for the bomb site. I have to try to pull Urdnot Wrex out of there before he gets himself killed. I'll give your men the one shuttle. Hopefully they can help me locate my rampaging krogan clan chief, and we'll all be able to sit down and figure out what the hell is going on." Setting a new trajectory for the bomb site, Garrus pushed the velocity a touch beyond the safe maximum. If it held, he'd have maybe a half hour to drop off the one shuttle and take the other after Wrex. "Nothing like cutting things stupidly close," he muttered.

"Good luck, Vakarian." Victus chuckled, but it was a dry, vicious sort of sound. "Do you want your ships back?"

Garrus's previous rage rekindled, sending a sound through his second larynx that made Victus sound positively comforting. Ships ... ships he could replace. He needed to send the bastards behind the attack a decisive message. "I'll warn the Passch to cut out once you're in range, and then blow those other bastards to hell, General."

"Roger that. See you on the other side. Victus out."

Garrus sent messages to L'Tsai and Kandros, then settled in to draft his acceptance of the geth's new shuttle plans. Sitting still certainly wasn't an option, and it was a lot easier to hang on to confidence if he stayed focused on something. Once he reached scanning range for the shuttle's sensors, he could dedicate himself to tracking down the turian force and his wayward krogan.

§

Victus's men had made it to the bomb site, significantly decreasing the effort it took to locate them. Wrex, on the other hand, was taking an uncharacteristic amount of care to avoid scans. Somehow, the battlemaster had discovered a way to make twenty krogan warriors far stealthier than Garrus would have imagined.

Just over a half hour remained in the count down when Garrus landed the shuttle at the base of the massive crane and its deadly payload. After gawking open-mouthed at the bomb for three seconds he threw off the shock and awe in favour of action. The turians were already scrambling across the field of rubble to meet him when he opened the hatch and jumped out.

"Who's in command?" he demanded as the team surrounded him in a loose semi-circle.

A young fellow wearing lieutenant bars stepped forward and gave him an uncertain looking salute. "Lt. Tarquin Victus." He nodded behind him. "This is my team."

Victus. Garrus raised his brow plates as he returned the salute. Not surprising ... the Victus family was military to the bone, just like Kandros's. "The general … ?"

The young torin nodded, straightening with an unconscious pride and respect that forced Garrus to push down a smile. That respect and love said a great deal for both the general and his son. "General Victus is my father. And you are?" Victus lifted his chin in a slight challenge as if daring him to say anything. Garrus understood that touchiness far too well. It was never easy being the son of a noteworthy, brilliant parent.

"General Garrus Vakarian." He nodded toward the massive bomb. "Have you had a chance to assess the situation?"

Victus and his team all turned to look before the torin nodded and met Garrus's stare again. "The timer mechanism is completely fried and fused to the bomb. We'd have to cut it off and there's no time." He glanced at the other shuttle as Nyreen brought it in to land several metres away. "Are you here to pull us out, sir? We have forty minutes to put a seventy-five klick radius between us and the blast."

"That shuttle is for you and your men," Garrus replied. He nodded toward his shuttle, impatience beginning to gnaw at him. The turians needed to get moving so he could get to the considerably less straightforward task of his own retreat. "You've been ordered back to the evac site. I still have to find Urdnot Wrex and his team. Did you catch any glimpses of him on your scans?"

Victus nodded and opened his omnitool. "This scan plots where he showed up. His last known location was four hundred thirty metres southeast." After transferring the file, Victus pointed toward a large, crumbled structure. "It sounded as though two decent sized squads were trading a lot of bullets near the base of that building, but then the Suns retreated. Haven't heard anything since."

Garrus slapped the kid on the shoulder, grateful to have been given somewhere to start looking. "Thank you, Lieutenant. Now get your people out of here."

Victus saluted, already sidling toward the shuttle. "Thank you for pulling our asses out of the fire, General. Appreciate it."

Garrus returned the salute, then turned and ran for the open shuttle hatch. "My pleasure, Lieutenant."

Martin met him at the open hatch, both pausing to watch the other shuttle lift off and wheel away. "Do we know where Wrex is?" the kid asked.

"Yeah, we have a starting place, anyway." The shuttle lifted off, nearly dumping Garrus out the door. Swaying, he clawed at the metal, breaking off a talon tip before he caught hold of a harness clip and hauled himself back. He nodded toward the open hatch. "Keep your eyes peeled. Don't let Kandros toss you out."

Keeping a tight grip on the shuttle, Garrus hurried hand over hand to the cockpit, then threw himself in the copilot seat. "You might want to warn people before you lift off with an open hatch," he grumbled, but without any real heat. His mind was already focused on downloading the information Victus had given him into the shuttle's nav computer.

"How hard can twenty krogan be to find, anyway?" Martin shouted forward.

Kandros scoffed. "That's not the question. The question is: when we find them, how do we fit twenty krogan in this shuttle?"

Garrus answered her only with raised brow plates and a slight nod. That was problem number sixteen. He flipped the nav screen around to face her and pointed to a spot about fifty metres north of where Victus figured the shooting had originated. "Drop Martin and I here. We'll cover as much ground as we can on foot. If either we find Wrex or we hit the ten minute mark, pick us up."

Kandros nodded, moving the map to a more convenient spot amidst her other screens. "I'll keep her hard on your six, General." She guided the shuttle down to a fairly flat spot in the rubble. "You're going to have a hard time seeing anything from the ground, sir."

He let out a soft grunt, agreeing with her. "But if he hears us yelling, hopefully he'll come out of hiding." Without any more words, but a great deal of acidic churning in his gut, Garrus stood and stepped into the troop compartment.

Without waiting for the kid, Garrus jumped out, groaning under his breath as every single half-healed incision in his body complained in unison. Damn, he must be getting old before his time. "Pace me at about thirty metres out," he ordered, gesturing to his right before setting out at a decent run.

"Yes, sir." Martin loped off at an easy gait, his frame armour doing most of the work for him as he climbed, clambered, and hurdled. Although Garrus envied the kid's easy movement, he'd tried a set of the armour himself and found it far too cumbersome. Trading in his light armour for the greater protection of heavy had proven a hard enough challenge to overcome. The frame armour just made him feel as though he'd been swallowed by a large mech.

Still, at about the fifty metre mark when his back and legs started begging for mercy, he sort of hated the kid a little.

"Urdnot Wrex! Where the hell are you?" Garrus yelled. His voice echoed off the shattered buildings, sending a small cluster of pyjaks screaming and running for cover.

Grinning as the ground under his feet rumbled, he decided maybe it hadn't been his voice that sent the pyjaks scurrying. Somewhere, kilometres distant, a thresher maw moved beneath the ground. Maws weren't a threat so deep into the old cities; the foundations, rubble, and thick layer of concrete on the ground proved too much of an obstacle for the giant worms. However, that didn't stop an electric shiver of both excitement and dread from racing down his spine as the earth trembled.

"Urdnot Wrex," Martin called, "don't make me run much farther, old man, or I'll kick your geriatric backside when we find you!"

A wide smile settled onto Garrus's face. As odd as it seemed—to him most of all—he loved Tuchanka. Ugly and ruined, it was completely wild, and proved to be a constant, as well as completely unforgiving, test of wile, skill, guts, and will.

He'd dreaded his first visit, certain that filth and constant lack of comfort would wear thin very quickly. Instead, the planet made his blood roar in his veins. Every moment proved a keen-edged blade poised to slice open his throat. Adrenaline poured through him like a narcotic, heightening every sense and sharpening every reaction.

Tuchanka made him feel brilliantly, agonizingly, wholly alive.

"Wrex! Answer me dammit!" Garrus hollered, shoving the rest of his thoughts aside. They needed to get out before Tuchanka made them all wholly dead. "That bomb is counting down, and we can't stop it. You need to come out and get on my damned shuttle!" A thin wheeze whistled out of him as he hurdled a low wall. Pausing, he leaned on a hip to catch his breath. "I know you can hear me, you stubborn, old ass."

He glanced at the timer again. They needed to keep moving, but first … maybe they'd come out far enough to escape the jamming. He lifted his other hand to his radio to open his father's channel.

"Pari," he called. "Pari, can you read me?"

"Garrus," his father's voice came back. "Where are you?"

A dizzying rush of relief sent Garrus stumbling for several steps before he caught himself against a half-fallen wall.
"Still too damned close to the bomb site. Spirits, the thing is huge. Calculations say a gigaton. It's going to take out everything for seventy-five klicks or so in every direction in under twelve minutes. Are the civilians safe?"

"We'll be fine, Garrus. We're nearly four hundred kilo— ancient cultural site. Just get out—" The response clicked and stuttered then cut out.

"Still too close to the jamming range for reliable comms," Martin hollered. He ran a few more steps. "Wrex! Goddammit, Wrex! Where the fuck are you?"

"Come on, kid," Garrus said, waving a weary arm forward. "We've got two more minutes before we have to give up. Let's make the most of them."

Garrus took four steps before three varren rose above the rubble at his ten o'clock. He slid to a halt and pulled in a long, steadying breath. "Martin. Going to need you over here." Damn, if the alpha and two subordinates were showing themselves, that meant at least another three hiding on the flanks waiting to move in.

They did not have time for a pack of varren. He glanced at the countdown. Eleven minutes. Sweet baby Jesus, they were all going to be incinerated.

"Fuck!" the kid yelped. "On my way."

Garrus could hear Martin clambering and leaping, covering ground at a good clip, but he didn't take his eyes off the alpha. Slowly, as to not trigger an attack, he shrugged his assault rifle into his hand. "This day just keeps getting better and better," he muttered. "Watch the flanks," he called, keeping his voice low.

One of the subordinates leaped at Garrus, but the alpha spun on it, throwing it to the ground. Bodies crunched and jaws snapped.

Using the distraction, both Garrus and Martin opened fire, assault rifles pelting the varren with rounds. For a moment, it looked like they might just blow through the pack, but then the alpha charged and everything went to hell.

Two hundred kilos of wild fangs and claws slammed into Garrus with the force of a small skycar, throwing him onto his back. His rifle flew into the rubble as the pair of them half-rolled, half-slid headfirst down a ramp. The varren rode down on Garrus's belly, its extra weight grinding the cowl of the torin's armour into the concrete so that it screamed like talons slicing through reinforced steel. Garrus fumbled for his sidearm, trying to throw the massive animal off and roll free.

Exhilaration burned through him like a match set to tinder. Clawing for the varren's eyes, Garrus let out a bestial roar, all the pent up, gut churning stress and responsibility flaring like a biotic corona. He'd rip the fucking thing apart with his bare talons if he had to.

Then the animal's head erupted into a cloud of muck, splattering the faceplate of Garrus's helmet with red mist and chunks of bone and brain. A large shape stepped in front of the sun, casting a long shadow across the general.

"Vakarian," Wrex grumbled. "What are you doing here?"

Garrus rolled to his feet, casting a quick, grateful glance at Martin as the kid shoved his assault rifle back into his hands. "Looking for your stubborn old ass." He turned and waved Kandros in. "What the hell are you still doing out here?"
"We were sneaking up on the enemy until you idiots arrived!" The behemoth towered over him, flanked by seventeen of his warriors. He turned on Garrus, a hand slamming against the general's keel. "Give me one good reason to have my boys hold their fire, Vakarian."

"The bomb was never controlled by the turians, it was Blue Suns—probably working for the council—and they've all evacuated." The words spilled out so fast he couldn't even be sure Wrex would understand. "The bomb is going to go off in ten minutes, and if we aren't more than seventy klicks away, we're dead."

Wrex lumbered backwards, putting several metres between them, his entire body bristled and defensive. His pupils had constricted to pinpricks, a sign of the rage coursing through him, messing with his reason. "Why the hell should I believe you?"

For a moment, despair slammed down on Garrus with an intractable fist. He didn't have time to argue Wrex down. He just needed to get keep his word to Shepard, and get Martin on the shuttle. They still had enough time to clear the blast zone and get the shuttle parked somewhere.

"Because he's telling the truth you gigantic varren with the brain of a pyjak," Martin shouted back, breaking through Garrus's defeatist thoughts. He raced toward the clan chief, only to be snatched by one of the warriors. The kid spun into the contact, breaking the hold, then turned the krogan's momentum against him, flipping the massive male over his back. Pinning the warrior with one arm twisted just about out of the socket, Martin shoved the muzzle of his sidearm under the edge of the krogan's plate. "Don't touch me."

Garrus stormed up to Wrex, pulling his fist back before he even got close. "I just escaped my own damned ship …" He swung, the punch slamming into Wrex's chin with enough force to sit the krogan on his ass. "... to run halfway across your planet to rescue your stupid, stubborn ass, and you have the quad to ask me why you should believe me? When have I ever lied to you, Wrex? Swallow your fucking pride, and just listen to me. So far, your rash, bullheaded shit has nearly cost you your clan, and it's about to cost you your life, so get the fuck in that shuttle." He stabbed a finger behind him without bothering to see if Kandros was in place.

On cue, the shuttle settled to hover just above the ground a handful of metres away.

"Your people are responsible for this!" Wrex bellowed. "It wasn't krogan who buried that bomb to wipe us all out the moment we regained any strength. It was the fucking turians." He grabbed Garrus by the yoke of his armour and shook him hard enough that the general bit his tongue. "That was the plan the entire time, wasn't it? Every time we tried to stand up, you'd come along and slam us down so that we never recovered."

Garrus slapped the battlemaster's hands away, frustration and anger incinerating his good sense. "That was the plan over a millennia ago while your people were laying waste to everything. I wasn't there, and I'm not oppressing your people. I'm standing in front of you, trying to get your fat ass on my damned shuttle. My father and one of our best generals are evacuating your clan. General Victus sent his own son to disarm that bomb." Slamming both hands into Wrex's chest, he shoved the behemoth away. "Too bad the turians are all trying to bring you down, Wrex."

He shook his head and threw up his hands. "Forget it. Martin let that other idiot go, and get in the shuttle. I'm done trying to save this moron from himself." He backed away from Wrex. "You have the first opportunity since the krogan rebellions to sit down and actually negotiate with a top ranking member of Palaven's hierarchy, and with one of her top generals." His brow plates peaked as Wrex actually paused at that. "This whole incident puts the council over a barrel you could use to leverage your way into a fucking embassy. Imagine how many clans would have fallen in line behind the leader who pulled that one off?"
Wrex straightened, his pupils starting to return to normal.

Throwing an impatient hand behind him, Garrus turned. "In two years, I've never said this, Wrex, but I'm glad Shepard isn't here. Seeing you throwing the krogan away like this would make her sick."

Martin leaned out the shuttle door and bellowed, "Can you recommend someone to take your place?"

Garrus gave the kid a wild, almost maniacal grin as he jumped up into the shuttle. Reaching up, he started to shut the door, but then a giant hand yanked it open, wrenching Garrus's shoulder. The general met Wrex's eyes for a fraction of a second, then nodded.

Throwing himself into the copilot chair, he grabbed the map screen away from Kandros. "Head out of the zone, I'll try to find us a place to put this bird down."

Martin hit the floor between the seats, a massive body in burgundy armour pushing in to loom over him. Wrex shoved Garrus's hand out of the way, and shifted the map. "We need to get underground. Not enough time to get clear." He centered the scan in on a short, broken down tower. "Here," he said, jabbing a thick finger at the screen. "It's an old missile silo. Goes down a good seventy metres or so."

Martin wriggled up to peer at the screen, and moaned, "That's a hell of a long way down if the place collapses."

Garrus chuffed, the sound's nonchalance belying the thin yearning that accompanied the memory of Feros. "I've been buried deeper."

Wrex buffeted the general from behind and grumbled, "It'll hold. There's no one for you to cuddle with this time, Vakarian." The clan chief glanced over at Nyreen. "Well … ." He turned and shouted something to his men. A couple of seconds later, reply came back. "Everyone's in."

Kandros shot Garrus a worried glance as her talons flew over the interface, taking the packed drunken space cow up just far enough to avoid smashing through ruins. Garrus just shrugged a little and tried to ignore the heavy pulse pounding under his jaw and at the top of his keel. Following Wrex's advice and hunkering down amounted to the best they could do at … he glanced at his omnitool … six minutes and twenty eight seconds.

The time seemed to tick down too fast, the ground moving under them too slow … and yet the combination stretched the minutes into an impossible sort of slow motion. He thought about calling his father again, just to check in … to … to what? Say goodbye just in case?

They arrived at the ancient missile silo, the irony of hiding from a doomsday bomb within one of the sites responsible for Tuchanka's devastation not lost on Garrus. He held his breath while Nyreen eased their overloaded beast of burden down through many storeys of ruin and detritus. A couple of times, he started to say something, but then she'd cock a brow plate at him, shutting him up.

Just before they reached the bottom, static crackled loud in his aural canal, coming through his radio. A hand lifted to press to the interface on the side of his helmet. "Hello?"

"Garrus?" Nihluss's voice cut through the static. "Finally … trying to … you for … ." The Spectre faded back out.

"Nihlus, you're breaking up." He cranked the volume. "Repeat."
"Distress call ... human colony ... —dom's Progress. Investigating ... ."

"Nihlus! Tuchanka was a set up," Garrus called, shouting despite knowing it wouldn't help. "Blue Suns boarded the Passch, trying to set Archangel up for the bomb. Be careful. Take back up."

The shuttle set down at the bottom of the silo, Kandros putting in a professional landing. No one paid much attention as they all focused their attention on him and his partial communication.

"Garrus?" Nihlus's voice disappeared beneath the static. "Repeat last. Blue Suns?"

The channel died. Garrus had just enough time to wonder why it had cut out so suddenly before the ground heaved. A giant caught in the throes of a seizure, the planet threw them around the cockpit like stones shaken in a can. Thunder boomed, deafening Garrus completely, the heaving of the ground exchanged for both the rumble and roar of a massive freight train speeding toward them.

After long moments, the roar of destruction faded into the susurrus of falling sand and the odd rattle of rocks tumbling down onto the space cow's metal hide.

"Do you think Nihlus heard you?" Martin whispered, as if afraid speaking to loudly might bring the whole place down on their heads.

Garrus shook his head as he peeled himself up off the floor in front of his seat. Everything hurt, and a thin trickle of blood rolled around the curve of his eye to drip off the end of his nose. "I don't know. I hope so."

Chapter End Notes

(A-N: Phew! Wrex you stubborn, proud old fool! So next chapter! I'm so excited, and I think you guys will be happy with the new development. At least I hope so. :D

So ... we are coming up on chapter 100, and I was thinking, I should do something special to mark the occasion. Some sort of event. Not being sure about these sorts of things due to my sad, sad fanfic cred ... I'm such a noob ... I thought I would ask you, the readers, if you would like anything special. Drabbles from Sassy, Garrus, and Nihlus's past. Some fanart? Whatever. I am open to suggestions.

Thanks to everyone who sent comments. I really do appreciate hearing from people. hugs to all!)
Chapter Summary

So, the surprise chapter! That is all. :D

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Vir: A male chosen by the Prothean Genetic Authority to sire a female's children. Only during the last of a Prothean female's three fertile cycles was she allowed to choose the father. The government stepped in and enacted laws during the last half of the war due to the dwindling genetic base of the prothean race, and the need for genetically superior stock.

Regulikar: The Prothean central government.

Netichik: Insect analogues native to Palaven that have been exported to many colony worlds. About two centimetres long, they live in colonies burrowed into trees. Meat eaters, they drop out of trees in large masses onto the backs of animals passing beneath their nests.

---

20 Days ASR

"Garrus?" A low growl of frustration rumbling through his second larynx, Nihlus leaned closer to the comm panel, as if that would help his voice carry through whatever interference had cut his fratrin off mid sentence. "Repeat last. Blue Suns?" He tilted his head and squeezed his eyes closed, straining to hear anything further, but got nothing. Too much interference. He slammed the heel of his hand down on the console, choking down worry with a burning swallow of disappointment.

As if he didn't have enough to worry about, already. Any second Anderson would arrive and want to know how he knew the colony on Freedom's Progress had come under attack. How in the name of buratrum was he going to explain that? Could he explain it? He laughed, low and bitter. No. Not a hope. Anderson would just glance at Nihlus's hip flask and then stand the Normandy down. If he actually wanted to get to the colony while they had a faint hope of finding out who and how, he needed to pull some 'Spectre channels', 'can't reveal my source' bullshit.

Shoving that aside, he focused on his current communication issue. Setting the recording back to the beginning, he filtered and cleaned it up the best he could, then ran it again, slightly slower.

The door to the comm room opened. Glancing over his shoulder, he saw it was Anderson and turned his full attention back to his fratrin's message.

"Nihlus! Tuchanka was a set up." Nihlus squeezed his eyes closed again, struggling to pick Garrus's voice out of the static. "Wha … ?" he muttered. "Blue Suns." Letting out another rumble of annoyance, he rewound the last bit again.

"Blue Suns boarded the Passch," Anderson supplied. "Something about the bomb and Archangel." He stepped up beside Nihlus, his head tilting as well. "Rewind it again."
"He said that the Suns tried to set Archangel up for the bomb on Tuchanka," a smooth, accented voice said from the back corner of the room.

"Thank you, Miss Goto," Nihlus replied without turning. He'd thought he felt the brush of her cloak as he entered the room. Spirits, he hoped he didn't ramble out loud at any point. He looked over at Anderson and cocked a brow plate. "Tried to set Archangel up for the bomb?" His hand ticked back toward his hip. No. He needed to keep moving, keep everything locked down. Pivoting on his talons, he paced to the door and back, his mind spinning through the possibilities. "How?"

"If he escaped or retook the Passchendaele, maybe some of the crew survived," Anderson offered. He walked over to the closest seat and lowered himself onto the edge, a mask of concentration set over his stern, stoic face. "Maybe they can shed some light on what he's talking about."

The Spectre hadn't worked with many humans other than Shepard, but if he knew one thing, he knew that David Anderson would have been a fellow Spectre had it been Nihlus overseeing his evaluation. Anderson possessed intelligence and … more … a wisdom that tended to see the best way through situations. The captain had become Nihlus's tough-as-nails, unflagging bulwark and advisor since Hackett assigned the Normandy to liaise with Archangel.

However, that just made it harder to see the man struggling under the weight of the past nineteen months. Right then, Anderson looked so beaten down and exhausted that Nihlus nearly offered him a drink. Nihlus chuffed and pulled his hand away from his flask … again, slamming a door on the brandy's siren song. Of course, the captain never would have accepted the offer. He considered Nihlus's drinking to be a compromising weakness. Not that Nihlus disagreed, he just didn't have the time to stop and deal. That door closed hard as well, sealing two cycles worth of betrayal and loss away before the ghosts reached through to stab him with their frozen daggers. If the ghosts escaped, the other door would open as well, and he'd be excusing himself to visit the head while Anderson watched him with that knowing, disappointed stare.

He couldn't afford to give in to the yearning, not yet.

Drinking wiped the hard drive clean, at least for a while, and he needed to think … to reason the situation through. He closed his eyes, taking a second to steel himself against the need and all the reasons it burned through his bones. Later. When he got back from Freedom's Progress.

He heard the slight, electrical crackle as Kasumi materialized on her way across the comm room. At the console, she tapped away at the interface. "So, the Passchendaele was boarded by Blue Suns." She glanced back at Nihlus, her eyes flashing, just reflections under her hood. "Who knows the Suns best?"

Nihlus grinned despite himself and reached up to his radio. "Massani, get your ass over to the Normandy and up to the comm room."

"Yeah. Yeah. Unclench your scaly arse-cheeks, Kryik," the old merc grumbled. "Goddammit, I'm supposed to be semi-retired. And what am I bloody doing? Am I fishing? Drinking beer on a dock somewhere? No, I'm asking how fucking high every time some stick-up-his-arse says jump." He out a phlegmy cough before going back to a muttered diatribe of abuse and cursing, but Nihlus could hear his boots on the deck plating.

Asking how high? That would be the day. More like complaining about aching knees and a bad back, then asking for a cigarette and a boost.

Nihlus closed the channel without rising to Zaeed's bait and leaned over Kasumi's shoulder to see what she was doing. Hmm. Trying to isolate the Suns' jamming signal. Not a bad idea. If they could get through to the Passch, they could find out what the hell was going on.

He shook his head when he saw where she was headed. "No, that algorithm might work if we were trying to break through Alliance or Hierarchy jamming, but mercenaries … ." A heavy scowl settled over his face even as he pushed in beside her. Something moved through the data … something that pricked at his memory. "Wait." He held his hands over the console, talons spread as if trying to frame the numbers, or maybe even feel the rhythms and undercurrents that lie beneath what he saw. "Look at this jamming signal."

His pulse thumped hard and fast at the top of his keel where the artery slipped over the bone, and his entire body hummed, as if charged. He knew that signal, dedicated half a lifetime to studying it … trying to understand it.

The thief stopped her work, then shrugged. "That's not a jamming signal. That's just background radiation … space noise."

He cocked a brow plate at her. "Space noise?"

She grinned and shrugged. "What else are you going to call it?" Another careless shrug changed the subject. "Anyway, that can't be the interference. It's spread over too large an area to be some sort of jamming."

Nihlus shook his head. "No, it's the reason we can't get through. I've seen it before." His turn to shrug and he tilted his head a little. That wasn't exactly true. "It was one of the biggest hurdles to Prothean communications once the war started. It blacked out whole systems, and they never found a way around it because it's a naturally occurring resonance."

Allowing Merol's memories to lead, he isolated the problem. "It doesn't behave like a normal jamming signal. It doesn't eat up bandwidth or override other signals. It cancels the signal using targeted destructive interference."

He sent a test signal toward the Passchendaele. "Watch." The foreign signal modulated along the same band, cancelling out the communication. "It's unbelievably elegant … acts intelligently."

"Wait," Anderson said. "If that signal blanks out whole systems, how did you get the message through to Garrus in the first place?" He stood and walked over, watching over Nihlus's arm. "Anyway, as fascinating as this is, it doesn't change the fact that Garrus walked into a trap."

"And the general thinks we are too," Kasumi agreed. "He warned you to take backup."

Nihlus nodded and turned away from the tempting mystery, Merol fighting him the whole way. "Miss Goto, head up to the bridge. Keep trying to get a message through to the Passch. We might luck out again." If his message getting through had been luck. Something whispered in the back of his head that it had been deliberate. Merol kept hammering away at there being an intelligence behind the signal.

Pushing that aside as well, and without waiting for Kasumi to reply, he set back to pacing, mind worrying through Garrus's message. Nihlus had brought along the Banquan and Aesarus, the frigates newly returned from batarian space. Archangel standard procedure required no fewer than three vessels to investigate a potentially hostile situation.

"He knew we'd have three ships," he mused out loud. "Still thought we'd need back up."

"The Suns boarded the Passch," Anderson added. "There's only one way L'Tsai lets a ship get that close."
A vicious smile greeted that thought, the picture starting to form. "That's what they're doing with our ships." The rest fell into place. "They took over the _Passch_ rather than destroying it. They wanted General Vakarian to become a war criminal. That's what Garrus meant about them setting Archangel up. They were going to use our ships, attack the krogan, set off the bomb." He stopped pacing and turned to the captain, and raised his hand back to his radio. "Massani, don't bother coming over to the _Normandy_. The _Banquan_ is going to need you."

"Bloody hell. I was just about to … ." The merc cursed again. "Fine. Massani returning to the _Banquan_. Fucking hell."

Anderson hit the intercom. "Alenko, all hands to general quarters." The captain lead the way from the comm room, striding quickly past the galaxy map. "It's brilliant. They set the general up for Tuchanka, and set us up for Freedom's Progress. Forget that Archangel couldn't possibly subdue a thousand people without them sending out a distress call let alone nine hundred and eighty thousand."

Nihlus jogged up the ramp a stride behind. "People are scared. They don't need a reason to grab hold of a villain, any villain." A grim, bitter chuckle rattled between his teeth. "I've never known reason to interfere with a good panic."

Anderson scoffed and glanced over his shoulder. "Or a good lynching. Archangel will be strung up and dangling before anyone even wonders how we managed to abduct millions of people."

Nihlus smiled at the 'we' in that sentence, the captain's allegiance to his dead daughter's cause warming the Spectre through. His hand drifted back to the outside of his thigh, patting the pouch attached to his armour. If it wasn't for the whole 'too pathetic to live with himself' factor, he'd just carry a water bottle or thermos. At least then he could pretend that everyone's glares and pitying glances were unfounded. His chuckle came out both a lot louder and a lot more bitter than he liked.

"Not to mention what the heck we're doing with them all," Joker called from his chair. "What? Are they thinking we have them stacked out back like cordwood?"

"That's what I do with my victims," Kasumi quipped. She glanced over her shoulder as Nihlus stepped up behind the co-pilot's chair and rested his hands on the back. "The Aralakh system isn't jammed any more," she continued, "but there's an insane amount of EM interference. Looks like you were cut off by the bomb detonating. I still can't reach the _Passch_. Looks like the Suns took out their comms when they boarded."

Nihlus acknowledged the thief with a quick nod. Garrus hadn't been caught in the explosion. He knew that with complete certainty. His fratrin possessed a great many admirable traits, intelligence and caution numbering amongst them. Well, and he'd consider getting Weaver killed the ultimate betrayal of Shepard's memory.

"I hope Garrus found Wrex before he had to bug out," Kaidan said. The lieutenant commander strode into the cockpit. "The _Normandy_ is secure at general quarters, Captain." He greeted Nihlus with a nod. "There's a message for you at the QEC, Nihlus. It's Ash. She contacted me directly, says that it's an emergency. She tried to get through to Garrus, but … ." He shrugged.

Nihlus looked out the starboard port. "How long to the relay?" he asked, barely able to see the device's glow as a pinprick in the distance. Just another star amidst the millions. Despite the fifty people sharing the _Normandy_, he suddenly felt very alone and chilled through. He turned up the heater in his armour as he pivoted to head back to the comm room.

"An hour. Two hours to the secondary relay, then four hours to Freedom's Progress," Joker reported. "You've got time to take a shower, nap, chow down on some dextro-getti ... polish the stick up your ass."

Nihlus walked away as Anderson whacked the pilot in the back of the head and ordered Alenko to spell out the crew every two hours. His hand wandered back to his thigh, the heel resting on the pouch flap. Why would Ashley be calling him? Since she joined the scout flotilla, he hadn't heard a word. He knew Garrus spoke to her at regular intervals, but using message drops, never directly. It proved too dangerous to her cover.

He strode straight down to the QEC pad and opened the connection. Where was she calling from to have access to a QEC on the Archangel network? That question set off every alarm he possessed. Damn Garrus for being out of contact. He didn't know what to tell the soldier if she was in trouble. He didn't have access to her extraction details.

"Spectre Kryik," the Chief Operations Officer greeted him formally, saluting. "Sorry for bringing this to you, but I had to report in before my group gets their shit together." She shifted a little from foot to foot and glanced behind her as if she expected to be walked in on.

"Where are you calling from, Williams? Are you secure?" The alarms in his head shrieked and his hand twitched. He pulled it away from its obsession to lean on the console.

"You could say that. I'm at Archangel home base. I brought a group of evacuees to Mordin's hospital." She shook her head and raised her hands to stall his questions. "I don't have much time. As soon as my people are treated, I need to get them on transports to Cerberus's main station." She took a deep breath and shook her head a little. "I was assigned to a research station in the Terminus. My project was a prototype ship design, but there were hundreds of projects based out of the station. I've never seen security as paranoid as that place. I ran the security for a project so classified that I never laid eyes on it."

Nihlus's brow plates and mandibles dropped. Cerberus developing prototype ships didn't mean anything good. They might currently be aimed at the Reapers, but what about afterward? He shook that off and focused back on the chief. She wouldn't have called about that.

"Several hours ago … ." She looked at her omnitool, then shook her head. "Hell, I don't even know exactly how long ago it was. Anyway, the base was attacked. We were already evacuating … something to do with another project that had gone off the reservation … but then everything went to hell. The whole comm network went dark, and we didn't even get out a distress call before swarms of biomechanical insect analogues about the size of my hand flooded the station." She held up her hand, cupped as if holding one of the swarm. "They overrode our security without even pausing and flooded the place in seconds."

"They froze their victims … immobilized them?" Nihlus said, the picture appearing in his head. His stomach rolled over and slipped down to tangle in his guts as Merol's memory unfurled. He straightened and squared his shoulders. "Did the Collectors board?"

Deep wrinkles creased the woman's brow and one eyebrow cocked in a scowl that answered his question. She'd remember a Collector if she'd seen one. "Collectors, sir? I thought they were just myths." An impatient shake of her head dismissed it as unimportant.

Nihlus would have laughed if he hadn't been choking on the urge to vomit. Not much was more important. "They're all too real, but go ahead."

"While we were evacuating in the chaos, I swear … ." She hesitated again and blushed, as if she was embarrassed or had thought better of bringing whatever it was to his attention. "Well, I swear I saw Captain Shepard, sir."

Nihlus's heart leaped for a moment before reality crashed down on it. Staggering a little, he leaned into the console a little heavier. He'd watched Shepard die. "This was a research base?"

She nodded and stepped forward. "Yes, sir. It set off all my alarms, too. I wouldn't put an infiltration project past this group. Scuttlebutt says the Illusive Man has shut himself in his private floor of the main base. He doesn't meet with anyone in person any more. They say that his paranoia about the Reapers has him conducting all sorts of really horrible and questionable projects." She shuddered, then let out a weak chuckle. "I don't like to listen to rumours most of the time, sir, but this place." She glanced around, then relaxed a little as if realizing that she was no longer a fly tangled in a web. "Well, that place made the rumors all too plausible."

Ashley rolled her shoulders and set her jaw, buttoning herself down. "It could be a clone or someone made over to look like her. The likeness was remarkable. Right height and build ... ." She shrugged again, looking decidedly uncomfortable. "And ... um ... sir, Dr. T'Soni and a turian were with the group. I thought the general might want to look into it. It's weird as hell to see an alien anywhere near Cerberus." To give her credit, her expression twisted, as if she'd rather do just about anything other than report on Liara. "For it to be someone close to Archangel makes me nervous, especially if she's involved with this fake Shepard."

Williams shook her head. "He wore a heavy cloak. I could tell he was turian by his general build, but that was all I saw. I was busy trying to get two hundred people into a lifeboat." She glanced behind her. "I've got to go, sir. If I can dig up any information on whatever nightmares Cerberus is cooking up, I'll send it on. Maybe now we're headed to Cerberus headquarters I won't be so isolated." She saluted. "Be careful, sir. I don't know what all this means, but ... ."

He straightened and nodded. "Take care, Williams, and thanks for the heads up." He closed down the QEC, then opened a channel to Thessia. He needed to discover Liara's location and what she was up to.

Shiala answered the call. "Nihlus. Hello."

A quick nod answered her greeting. "Shiala. I need to speak with Liara." He narrowed his eyes, the deep, churning ache in his gut deepening as the asari blanched. "Where is she?"

"She headed out on her own about a week ago." Shiala wriggled a little, her cheeks colouring. She'd make a terrible infiltrator ... or poker player. "She's kept in touch via comms, but the channels are always too heavily encrypted to trace back."

The fact that she'd tried said a great deal about the circumstances of Liara's departure. "Can you reach her?" When she indicated that she could, he continued, "Send me the frequency." He signaled its arrival with a curt nod. "Thank you, Shiala. Kryik out."

He changed frequencies, opening a channel to Liara. Mysterious didn't get a chance to fester into betrayal. Not with everything blowing up around Garrus lately.

"Nihlus." Liara's whispered voice came through with no image. "Ah ... hello. What can I do for you?"
Mysterious? Bullshit. She'd just sprinted all the way to suspicious.

"Liara. Where are you? Shiala says you took off a week ago, wouldn't say where you were going." He laced enough menace through his subvocals to drive home that he wouldn't tolerate any subterfuge.

"An old friend needed me. I'm hoping we'll be on our way to you soon. There's a lot to explain, but it really needs to be done in person." She went silent for a second, her voice barely audible when she spoke again. "Nihlus, I'm not exactly in friendly territory at the moment. Can you just trust me for a little while? It's nothing that is going to hurt Garrus or you or Archangel. I promise that."

Garrus? Or him? Personally? He wasn't Archangel hierarchy. "Ashley Williams saw you on a Cerberus base with someone she said looked exactly like Jane Shepard. What are they up to, Liara?" He leaned into the interface as if looming over her, even by proxy, would help impress his serious intent on her. He gave her thirty seconds to reply, then called, "Liara? Who is the look alike?"

"I really can't explain like this, Nihlus," the whisper came back. "I've got to go. She's waking up. I promise you, I'll get back to Archangel within a week, and bring all the answers with me." A voice called in the background … sounded like someone searching for the asari. "I've got to go. See you soon."

The channel went dead.

Nihlus's shoulders slumped, taking his breath with it. His flask cleared his pouch and poured a long draught into his mouth before he even realized he'd reached for it. Damn. He replaced the cap and slid it back into the pouch. Alcohol breath was all he needed when Anderson came at him with the inevitable questions.

The door chimed. Well, at least Anderson trusted him enough to ring rather than bursting in with demands.

Nihlus turned to face the door. "Come in."

The portal slid open to reveal the captain. A sardonic half-grin and a cocked eyebrow announced Anderson's opinion about having to ask permission to enter his own comm room. "Is Chief Williams all right?" he asked, walking in to take his usual seat. He leaned back and crossed an ankle over the opposite knee, his hands held relaxed in his lap.

Nihlus nodded and let out a long breath. No, not the compassionate discussion position. Shit. He perched on the edge of the closest chair. "Yeah, seems so. She came into some urgent intel. I followed up on it. We should have the answers on Omega in a week." He chuffed deep in his chest. "So, Captain, have we reached the 'explain yourself, Spectre' portion of the mission?"

Anderson mashed a shrug into a shake of his head. "You're a Spectre, you don't have to explain anything to anyone, but I would like to know what I'm flying my people into." He dropped his foot to the floor and leaned forward, forearms on his knees, fingers steepled. "I hope by now you know that I'm your ally, Nihlus. I won't betray your confidence."

Yeah, Nihlus knew that. Still, he didn't know if Anderson's crazy-tolerance levels could take the weird shit going on inside his head. Of course, the man had endured more than a decade of Shepard. How much weirder could a couple of dead Protheans, a rachni queen, and dreams of snow calling for help be, anyway? Okay, the last … way too crazy … for anyone.
Anderson raised his eyebrows, obviously expecting an answer, but didn't speak, leaving the pressure on.

Where to start? "You know that Shepard and I shared the beacon messages and the cipher?" Nihlus waited for the captain's nod before diving in. "Well, when the rachni queen helped us sort through some of the Prothean memories, she made herself a cozy little corner in the back of my head and moved in." He sighed and slumped in the chair, Joker's idea of a nap suddenly seeming very appealing. "Are you sure you want in on that mess?"

After meeting the captain's unflinching stare for twenty seconds, Nihlus relented. "All right. I received a message through a dream. I'm certain the rachni queen acted as its courier, but all I know about the source is Freedom's Progress." A lie, but close enough to the truth.

"Ashley's call clued me in to what we're dealing with out here … the colony disappearances, at least." He slipped in the change of subject, hoping Anderson just let it pass. "It's the Collectors. At least, that's what they're called now. They were Protheans. The Reapers saw utility in their biotics and the hardiness of their genetics, and so began a long process of subversion." He shuddered, remembering the first versions, still looking so much like lost friends and loved ones that people threw themselves into arms they thought would lead to reunion, but instead, led only to horror and death.

Nihlus cleared his throat and shifted in his seat, stretching his neck to ease the fist clamped around his windpipe. "Anyway, the command and control versions of these subverted Protheans deployed a weapon … swarms of insectile bio-machines that placed people into stasis." He closed his eyes, the image of Tashac and Merol's last evacuation vivid in his mind. He could still feel the tiny hands of Tashac's children clinging to him … the depth of his terror for them.

He shook it off. It wasn't him. It wasn't Nihlus who loved the children sired by that pompous, intractable idiot the Regulikar chose as Tashac's median vir. He never mourned those same children when they went to war and never returned. All of that was Merol. An ashen, wintry emptiness blew through, whispering to him how alone he remained.

Nihlus took a deep breath and forced himself back on track, the brandy settling in, easing that chill as it always did. A sigh of relief greeted the comforting burn that spread up his spine and along his bones. He looked up, meeting Anderson's stare. "The swarms were a weapon brought in near the end of the war. Fast and efficient, they allowed the engineered Prothean husks, of which there were millions by that point, to do a lot of the harvesting out in the more remote colonies."

Anderson straightened. "It makes sense. Take out the comms, send in the swarms to subdue the colony in minutes, then clean up. Quick, brutal, and over in hours, long before anyone can investigate let alone mount an offensive." He shoved himself up out of his chair. "You think this warning of yours will give us enough time to save this colony?"

The temptation to lie crawled over Nihlus's skin like a swarm of netichik. So many millions of humans just gone … would it hurt to allow for a little hope? He stood and followed Anderson to the door. Suddenly, he really needed a nap, maybe some food … and a drink.

Pausing at the threshold, Anderson turned back, waiting for Nihlus's answer.

The Spectre shook his head, the truth ugly … and heavy enough to splinter his bones beneath its weight. "No. Hopefully, we'll get there in time to collect evidence … something to help us fight them. The people are already lost."
So, my little surprise! I thought of doing an April's Fool chapter where everyone died. The End. But nah, much more fun to get this chapter ready to post. So, is it a good thing, bringing him in? With all three of the main characters taking on missions without the other two, I feared poor old Nihlus would get lost for long periods of time without bringing him in. :D

I got several awesome ideas for things I could do to celebrate 100 chapters. I'll be doing a separately posted drabble collection. Other suggestions were Niftu Cal making an appearance, which was already planned, an eating contest between Sassy and Wrex ... very doable, and the most exciting thing ... Curious Canvas who did the cover image of Shepard's memorial is doing up some sketches from the scene I think we've all wanted to see for a long time. :D And that's all I have to say about that. ;)

Thanks as always to those who comment. You keep my spirits bolstered when they lag.
Chapter Summary

The enemy have revealed themselves. Shepard starts to assemble what she'll need to fight the Collectors.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Gasin - Prothean male the age of majority. (Dropped from 20 to 13 over the course of the war.)

Takun - Prothean female the age of majority. (Dropped from 20 to 13 over the course of the war.)

21 Days ASR

Shepard awoke facing something that looked a lot like a medbay ceiling. A glance to her left confirmed her suspicion. Medbay. A young blonde woman in a medical uniform stood behind a desk in front of a bank of windows. The captain's twitchy inner bitch took in the doctor's youthful turnout and clicked over to its instant snark setting. Seriously, who dedicated that much time and effort to their hair and makeup aboard a warship? She couldn't remember the last time she actually brushed her hair.

Shepard hoisted her head, wobbly and weighed down, from her pillow, looking past the medical debutante to the uncovered windows, suddenly feeling naked as hell.

"What is this? The sick and injured freak show?" she said or more accurately, barked, her throat dry and rough. Nervous eyes glanced under her blankets to make sure they'd been considerate enough to dress her in something. A gown. Better than nothing. Yanking the surprisingly soft, cotton coverings up around her neck, she wriggled around until she managed to get her feet off the side of the bed without exposing herself anywhere. "Hey! Doc, close the damned privacy shades. I possess a very low tolerance for being on display."

The woman slapped a control and metal shutters rumbled down over the large ports. "Apologies, Captain. You were unconscious when you were brought down here, and my concern lay in preserving your vital functions rather than your delicate sensibilities." Was that an eyeroll? Shepard narrowed her eyes into a laser glare. Had the doctor just eyerolled her CO? The woman strode over and activated her omnitool.

Shepard bit back an acidic grin. The doctor had pluck. Reminded her a little of Chakwas. Although, Chakwas would have never forgotten the shutters, those small considerations just ingrained over the years. She wondered how the doctor fared … if she remained aboard the Normandy … a bolt of pain shattered that line of thought. Damn Miranda and her memory blocks. She pressed the heel of one hand into her eye socket. Had the doctor asked her something? One eye opened a slit to find an even and professional, but enquiring blue-eyed stare levelled on her.

The doctor cocked an eyebrow, waiting. "How are you feeling, Captain?"

How was she feeling? Closing her eyes, she did an inventory. Body … aching at about an eight—someone has stomped on my feet in pointy heeled shoes and slammed both hands in a door. Hmm, that felt like a slight improvement. Head … throbbing at about a fourteen. What was that again? Sepsis has caused so much pus that the axe blade is actually rusting in the wound? Yeah, that sounded about right.

"Thirsty," she said aloud after a good minute, her priorities asserting themselves. She opened one eye. "And I could use something for my head. Feels like it's going to crack open and my eyeballs are going to spill out, riding a massive wave of brain puke."

A cackling laugh drew her attention to the bed across from her. "Gross," a young woman said, a broad grin showing perfect teeth behind equally perfect, full lips.

Shepard scowled. Had she been resurrected by the society for the advancement of stunningly gorgeous people? Seriously? Why had they bothered with her? Shepard fought down the urge to hate the newcomers based on their beauty alone. Not easy with the axe twisting in her head. The revoltingly perfect set of large, brown eyes that returned her gaze just made the job that much harder. She was going to need to recruit some normal people.

The young woman leaned up a little, revealing that she had been handcuffed to the bed. "If your head splits open, someone needs to take vid. We'll make a fortune."

Shepard's mouth quirked a little at the corner. She really was doomed to be surrounded by smart asses with far too much attitude. "Use half the proceeds to reassemble me again so I can come back and kick ass, we have a deal." She pressed both eyes closed again, waiting for the vorcha to stop rooting through her brain cells. "You have a name over there?" she asked without looking up.

A decidedly vulgar snort and a choice curse answered her question before the prisoner thumped back down onto the bed. "Yeah, a few. Go by Jack most of the time." She lifted her shaved head from the pillow, eyes in constant motion. She felt caged, vulnerable, and judging by the way her jaw clenched, hated it every bit as much as Shepard did. Maybe more. Maybe enough to be dangerous.

"You one of their experiments too, Jack?" Shepard asked. She didn't doubt it, but felt that given the manic, violent energy coming off the girl, tried to defuse a little of the volatility in that stare. It didn't take any special psychic powers to see that a lot of people had taken a lot of decisions out of her hands and taken a lot of liberties with her person. She screamed with a 'screw the entire universe' vibe that rang all too familiar.

"Yeah, and they aren't the first. How about you? That uptight cheerleader said something about having brought you back from the dead." The handcuffs rattled. "You do have a zombie cyborg creepiness going, with the glowing cracks and shit."

Shepard grinned and nodded, still not looking up. "Yeah, had the back of my head blown out just over a year and a half ago. Apparently Miranda's boss fished my casket out of space after my funeral and then ... " She stuck her arms out, stiff, her fingers curled into claws. "... ZAAAP! Bride of Frankenstein." One eye opened, meeting Jack's. "Captain Jane Shepard. Pleased to meet you, Jack." Her hand migrated back to press against the eye as it closed.

The doctor pressed a cold bottle of water into Shepard's hand, then gave her two injections. "You should be feeling better in a few moments, Captain," the woman said. "Lie back—"

"Excellent." Shepard emptied the bottle in a single go, letting out a loud, satisfied 'ahhhh'. Then, setting her jaw and pressing her lips into a thin, determined line, she moved to hop down. She had no intention of spending the first day of her new command lying around and playing the invalid.
Crews needed to see activity, competence, and grit, not 'ow ... my tummy hurts, I need some Pepto and an aspirin'. "Do you have clothes here, or do I have to do the walk of the full moon to find some?"

The doctor blocked Shepard's path, crossing her arms and cocking a hip, the very soul of stubborn determination. "Captain Shepard, you can't get out of bed yet. I'm not finished with my scans, and your treatment is days from being complete."

Shepard threw back her blankets despite the fact that every centimetre of her body agreed with the doc. In fact, she was pretty sure that if she got out of bed right then, she'd carry right on down to land in a pile on the floor. Still, points had to be made ... lines drawn ... all that crap.

"How long have you been a doctor?" she asked. Stretching carefully, she paused to rub all the particularly vicious aches and pains.

The doc shifted, and straightened, pride giving her bearing. "Three years, but I don't see—"

Shepard chuckled, cutting her off. "Wow, that long. Well, let me educate you on dealing with me. There's no way in hell you can keep me in bed if I'm conscious. Jack me full of drugs ... " She glanced over at the tattooed beauty on the other bed ... how had she missed the tats? Must be the axe in her skull. "—Sorry, no trademark or copyright infringement intended—and turn me loose, because you'll have to tranq me to keep me."

"Tranquilize you to keep you in medbay?" Horror sharpened the young woman's pale features, making her seem even younger. "That's unethical in the extreme, Captain. I can't do that."

Shepard lifted an eyebrow. "Really? Unethical? I could have used this info a couple of years ago."

"As in get my license revoked unethical, yes." The doctor opened her omnitool and tapped at the interface. "At least allow me to complete your scans. These readings look like someone took a wand blender to your brain."

Shepard grinned. "Are there swirls? Soft or hard peaks? If so, can I see?"

"Hell, yeah," Jack said. "I want to see those too." She laughed, hard and pointed, and tugged at her restraints. "And let me out of these fucking cuffs. Where the hell am I going to go?" A deep rumbling curse met the doctor's lack of response.

"We'll deal with that in a minute," Shepard promised. "Back to my brain meringue." Letting out a long sigh when the doc just stared, the captain slumped on the bed. "I'm the CO of this damned vessel, the least you could do is laugh at my jokes." Nothing. Damn ... not even a twitch. "Fine, you have ten minutes to run your scans, but then I expect to get to work."

That settled, she turned her attention to the young woman with the tattoos and those huge, brown eyes. "So, what's your story, Jack? I take it you share a certain lack of love for our hosts?" She knew the answer even as she asked and a faint blue nimbus formed around the young woman.

"Hell, yeah. Bastards." Jack tugged at the cuffs again. "Let me loose, and I'll tell you." Her eyes tried for pleading and guileless, but so much rage poured through that it fell flat. As much as Shepard hated people trying to manipulate her, beneath the facade and the anger, she saw a sadness and a real vulnerability that Jack tried to keep locked away, even from herself.

"You want to get turned loose?" Shepard asked, dropping her voice to a 'no bullshit' register. "Play straight with me. I don't give a flying fig if you yell and throw things around. I don't care if you spend your days being an insufferable bitch, just don't try to play me." Her eyebrows lifted, her brow creasing into earnest waves. "Understood? I'm not your enemy, Jack, and there are other people on this ship who aren't, so I want your word ... your honour ... that you won't do anything to put the vessel or it's occupants at risk."

Jack's stare narrowed, dropping the pretense. "What's your story, Captain Shepard?" She threw a lot of weight and attitude on the captain part. Despite the barely controlled fury simmering in the girl's glare, it reassured the captain. At least the fury was honest. She understood it, and the young woman's mistrust of authority figures, all too well.

Only honesty and following through on sincerity would have any real, lasting effect, so Shepard asked, "Did you hear about the attack on Eden Prime? The dreadnought that attacked the Citadel?"

Jack nodded. "Fuck yeah, who hasn't?" Her face froze. "No, fucking way? You're that Captain Shepard? But ... ." Shepard saw her connect the pieces. "Some asshole blew you away in an alley the day they made you a Spectre." Craning her head, she tried to see around behind Shepard. "Bet getting your brain blown out leaves a hell of a scar."

A slow, soft chuckle greeted that, and Shepard turned to show the young woman the massive scar on the back of her head. "Apparently, they brought me back to keep fighting the Reapers." Her shoulders drew up to her ears and then dropped. "And now entire human colonies are disappearing." Her gaze slid to the floor, snow melting down a window. "I'm in for a fight against bad guys so big and scary that I sort of wish they'd left me dead."

Jack bristled. "So, I have the evil aliens to thank for being here instead of being tortured and pumped full of drugs?" A soft growl rolled from her throat. "I should find them, sign up."

Shepard smiled, a weary, bitter rictus seizing her lips even as she let the rest of her face slump. "Actually, that would be me. Miranda's bosses moved you to the ship because I was about to spring my 'escape and take all their experiments with me' plan. The bad guys just took advantage of the chaos." A hard shake made her head screech in protest but helped clear the image of all those frozen people out of her mind's eye.

Looking up, Shepard raised one eyebrow. "If I let you out of those cuffs, you'll find a hidey hole for the rest of the trip? No sabotage? No vengeance against any of the organization's employees?"

She stared into those eyes, discovering another layer ... the desire to believe in something ... someone. Then again, maybe she was just projecting. "Jack, I give you my word that no one on this ship will try to stop you from leaving when we make port." A wry grin twisted her lips. "If, by then, you haven't decided to stay and give me a hand taking on the biggest, scariest, most badass monsters in the universe."

Jack scoffed, but—and maybe it was wishful thinking again—Shepard liked the promising set of the young woman's shoulders and jaw. "Fine, but I have a condition, too, Shepard." Her eyebrows rose toward her shaved hairline, questioning ... no, daring, Shepard to refuse.

"Hit me. If I can accommodate you, I will. Being the CO of this bird has to give me some ability to call the shots." She winked and let her head sag to one side a little ... although the meds were starting to work, offering some relief. "What's your condition?"

"I was stolen from my home and raised in a Cerberus facility. They isolated me, tortured and experimented on me all in the name of creating a stronger biotic." Jack must have seen the flash of searing hatred that greeted her mention of Cerberus, because she leaned forward a little. "I eventually killed my guards, caused a riot, and escaped. I've spent my time trying to track down all the information I can find on that facility. I want to know what happened to it ... to the bastards who did this to me ... ." She tilted her head to reveal several scars along her scalp and neck, red through the tats. "I haven't been anywhere with a computer like this baby has to have. I want computer access so I can do some digging."

Shepard nodded. "Not sure I can help with the access to everything Cerberus, although … ." She looked over at the doc and thought better of voicing her suspicions. Giving Jack a meaningful stare that the biotic met with a nod of understanding, she said, "But I'll give you unfettered access to the computers and you can go to town. Good enough?"

The door opened. "You have no authority to do that, Shepard," Miranda said even as she strode over the threshold. You can't just give anyone access to the computers and systems aboard this vessel. There are security concerns."

Shepard raised her eyebrows, a wicked grin sharpening to points. "Oh? Will Jack find all sorts of Cerberus information in the computers, Miranda?" After a few seconds of shooting dagger-edged glares at one another, Shepard shrugged. "Fine. If I'm not the captain of this ship, if my orders are not law, then let me out on … ." She frowned. "Where are we, anyway? Well, whatever. Jack, Al, and the rest of we lab rats will disembark at the nearest spaceport." She turned to the doctor. "I'm feeling better. Are you finished with your scans?"

"Yes, but … Captain … ."

Shaking her head, Shepard eased herself down off the bed. "Clothes, now." She met both women with steel. "I won't debate every last damned thing I say. Now, clothes and then Miranda will show me to the other lab rats." Two fingers stabbed toward Jack. "Uncuff her. She's not a prisoner."

"She's been responsible for more criminal activity over the years than most pirate gangs," Miranda protested, her voice moving into operative in charge mode and her face doing that … arrogant, 'I know what I'm doing, and you're just my patient' thing. "She's not—"

"Do you want to push this to where I have to do something unfortunate?" Shepard asked, shoving into Miranda's space. For a moment, she balled her fist, her entire limb trembling, muscles burning with the effort it took to remain at her side. "We had this discussion on the station. If you don't want to follow my lead, fine. I get off, but all your other victims go with me."

Miranda brought up her omnitool, opening the usual interface, but Shepard moved faster, grabbing her wrist. "Take all the fucking notes you want, but that's the way it is. I command this ship and its crew. I command my team. Or I leave." Squeezing hard enough to feel the bones in the operative's wrist grinding together, Shepard waited, keenly aware of the bright gaze watching them from the side. "I can fight the Reapers either way." Her brows knit together again, her shoulders pulling up, and she released Miranda. "Why do you want me anyway? It's not like my reputation for being a pain in the ass of universal proportions isn't well known."

Miranda took a deep breath and shut down her omnitool. "You put together a multi-billion credit portfolio, brought down the man behind one of the most powerful and covert private military companies in the terminus, brokered peace between the quarians and geth, started the krogan on a path to becoming a contributing member of the galactic community, rescued and apparently convinced the rachni to aid the fight, and brought down both a Spectre and a Reaper in the span of less than half a year."

"Well shit," Jack said, her expression almost respectful, if surprised. She whistled. "Aren't we the overachiever?"

"I do sound pretty awesome when you lay it all out like that." Shepard cast a quick wink and a grin at the biotic before dropping back to neutral and focusing on Miranda again. "Look, I can go far, far away, and still take down the Collectors and the Reapers without you and I butting heads over everything."

Miranda nodded. After a moment, she turned on the balls of her feet and strode over to Jack. A second's hesitation betrayed the operative's ongoing battle, but then she unlocked the cuffs and turned back to face Shepard, almost defiant. "You command this vessel, Captain."

Shepard flushed a little as she cast a petty, victorious glance at the doctor. "Clothes. Please." Sometimes, she really did act like a child, but even the small, petty victories remained victories.

Jack leaped off the bed and stretched, but then reached behind her head to her empty amp port. "Where is it?" she asked, rage flashing up to erupt through the demand. Those big eyes turned cold and hard as they moved from the doctor, to Miranda, and then Shepard.

Shepard in turn, stayed fixed on Miranda. "Are the psychos in charge of Jack's project on board?"

"No," Miranda replied, easing that concern. "She was slated to be one of your team members for the investigation into the missing colonies, so was turned over to me when you were activated." She sighed, a sound that came remarkably close to dread for Miranda. "As was one other project."

"I'm assuming you don't mean Al," Shepard turned to the doctor as the woman approached with an armload of clothing. "Thank you, Doctor." She set them on the bed, then began to dress, slipping underwear on beneath the gown. Glancing up, she cocked an eyebrow at the operative. "You don't expect Al to stay with us any more than I do, yes?"

"Wait!" Jack threw herself between them, her face caught in a tug of war between panic, derision, and fury. "I'm supposed to answer to the uptight cheerleader in the rubber sex suit?" She laughed, but no trace of amusement ran through it. "No fucking way."

"While on board this ship," Shepard replied, slicing through the rant with a sharp cut of her hand and a bladed tone, "you answer to me." She lowered her head but raised her eyes. "And our deal stands. You're free to move around the ship and access the computer as long as you find somewhere out of the way and leave people alone. When we make port, if you want to leave, that's fine. If you stay, I'll find you an amp. You have my word on that."

Jack's head jerked in a single nod, her eyes sparking like a downed electrical line as she stared at Miranda. Then she straightened, still steel and fury, but easing as she looked at Shepard. "Deal. If you need me, I'll be somewhere down near the bottom where no one will stumble across me."

"Thank you, Jack." She watched after the biotic until the door closed behind her, then focused an open, speculative gaze back to Miranda. "Now, this other project?" Tugging on a set of ribbed leggings, she glanced down the room at the doctor, seeing that she wore them as well. What the hell was wrong with trousers? Her spindly little legs were going to look like plucked chicken parts dressed in those. Sweet baby Jesus.

The operative let out a short breath, actually managing to appear grateful. "Thank you for not making her any more dangerous, Shepard."
A short, sharp chortle greeted that and Shepard gave her head a quick shake. "I'm not an idiot, Dr. Frank, but I'll need that amp. I think Jack will end up sticking around." A wry, crooked grin followed that lasted until she stripped off the gown. "Okay, so the other lab rat?"

Miranda jutted her chin toward the door at the back of the room. "I had his project leaders put him in the server room for now. Honestly, I'm not sure we should activate him. He's far too volatile."

Shepard froze, not knowing where to start addressing all the things wrong with that statement. Volatility. Assess the risk first. "More volatile than Jack, Al, or me?"

The operative let out a very unprofessional grunt that answered the question. "He's a unique case, Shepard. I'm not sure we should take the chance."

Shepard tugged on the long tunic and fastened it across her chest. "We'll deal with his mood swings in a second." Dread coiled through her guts, copper and saline. Had this very discussion taken place at some point along her road back from the dead? Some detached, clinical assessment of her value versus her risk, as if she were a high-powered rifle with a tendency to backfire. Which, she freely admitted to being … part of her charm.

Anyway, Janey … .

Right, damn. Scatterbrained didn't even start to describe her since she came back. "What do you mean you aren't sure we should activate him?"

Then, after running her hands over her clothing, sorting everything more comfortably, she remembered the manners beaten into her by her mother. Meeting the doctor's gaze with a small, grateful smile, she tipped her head and said, "Thank you, Doctor."

The nod that answered her came off rusted and stiff. "I expect you back before you begin morning shift, Captain. Your implants and the damage from the indoctrination signal need constant monitoring." The woman drew herself up as if prepared to fight to the death over her medical supremacy, but relaxed when Shepard nodded.

The captain turned toward the server room door, the frown returning to pucker her forehead as she read the sign on the wall. "What the hell sort of system do you have in this boat that requires a server room? I thought the need for that sort of hardware went out with the twentieth century."

Miranda cleared her throat. "The SR2 has a very advanced cyber-warfare suite specifically designed to counter the Reapers' less overt attacks."

Mostly satisfied, Shepard walked to the door, rigid confidence keeping her strides strong until she reached the threshold. There, she hesitated, her head bowing as she closed her eyes, bracing herself. "Am I going to be horrified by what I see on the other side of this door?"

Miranda palmed the control. "It's a stasis pod, Shepard, and not one I or any of our people put him in." She shrugged and tilted her head a little, her expression very like she'd just bitten into rotten fruit.

The door opened and Shepard understood.

"Liara's missing prothean from Eden Prime." She strode up to the pod, running her hands over the familiar lines. A small, hopeful smile blossomed that originated with Tashac. A living prothean. Shepard looked up, alarmed when she saw the dents and broken equipment on the casing. "It's been damaged. Was he all right in there when you opened it?"
"Who is it?" she asked, looking up as she bent over the control panel at the side. She popped it open, checking the date it was sealed originally, then the log of dates the scientists had opened it. "This was the end of the war. Literally months before the Reapers retreated back through the Citadel relay." She snapped straight, focusing on Miranda like a laser trying to burn through a tungsten-titanium alloy. "Is this—"

"It doesn't give any information about him," Miranda cut over her, tone blithe and professional. "He refuses to talk, although the researchers were convinced that he could understand them. Whenever they tried to touch him, he became violent and uncooperative." She let the datapad drop to hang at the end of a stiff arm. "Shepard, he killed two of his staff and injured another seven. We can't let him out of there."

Shepard nodded, a sardonic smile tweaking the corner of her mouth. "And you thought I was a problem child." As she spoke, the truth of her own suppositions registered. "It sounds like he was one of the last. They were all pretty brutal, and if he woke up to be tortured like Al … I can't blame him. He came from a terrible time … everything he knew was death and betrayal." She shrugged. "And he didn't want them to touch him because protheans have this sort of touch telepathy. They can read your electrical field."

Meeting Miranda's confused stare, she allowed a tiny flare of kindness to free some compassion from the icy dislike. "The beacons on Eden Prime and Virmire filled my head full of prothean data, memories, plans … a whole jumble of history and what they'd done to try to help us when the time for the harvest came around again." She closed her eyes against the nightmare images and Tashac's mourning cries, both tearing through her like a shuriken in a pinball machine until she slammed the wall back into place.

"Your head is filled with prothean data?" Miranda folded her arms. "This wasn't in your record, just that you interacted with the beacon. Why?"

Shepard let out a couple of bitter chuckles, looking up from under heavily lidded eyes. "To keep the likes of you from slicing into my skull to get the data out. Anyway, a message came through the beacon system a year before Tashac's—the prothean in my head's—team activated the plan to seal the citadel and other key relays." Spreading her fingers she leaned against the pod, its metal cool and familiar. "It said that the last program had failed. She never knew exactly where or exactly what, but considering how badly they had lost everywhere, she suspected it was either a stasis or genetic seeding program."

Miranda paled and staggered back a little. "Shepard … this is vital intel. You didn't preserve it anywhere? It would have all died with you. Who knows how much of it has been compromised by the Lazarus project."

Shepard pressed a couple of controls. "Oh, I shared it. Not telling you who I shared it with, naturally." She looked up, giving the operative a kind, genuine smile. "Just accept that we're going to walk a long road before I trust you, Miranda. We'll do much better that way." Pressing one last control, she stepped back, her heart racing as the pod opened, pressure hissing, the atmosphere inside turning into clouds of vapour as it hit the warm air.

"Shepard!" The exclamation shot across the server room like a bullet propelled by dismay. "I just told you that he's killed."
Shepard nodded. "Yeah, but he won't kill me. Well, at least I hope not." Looking up, she tilted her head. "Don't happen to have a gun on you?"

The operative spun on her heel and strode back into medbay. "Doctor Eis, I need your sidearm."

Shepard laughed, a crooked smile tugging at the corner of her mouth. "Too easy." Lifting onto her tiptoes, she peered over the side. Too much vapour and frostiness hung inside to see the occupant. She turned her attention to the readouts. Vitals rising nicely. Surprising how much trauma could be avoided doing things the right way.

"You can read Prothean?" Miranda asked, returning to stand at the end of the pod. A pistol hung at her side. Somehow that didn't make Shepard feel any better. If this prothean came out fighting, unless his biotics were off-line, a pistol wouldn't save them. Her muscles tensed as she saw his vitals reach the green zone and a soft groan and mutter drifted from the pod.

Then silence. Complete stillness. She considered sticking her face back over the edge, but then thought better of it. Best not to place any body parts that she wanted to keep within smashing, pulverizing, ripping, or shredding range.

An explosion of green energy exploded out of the pod. With as much effort as it would take for her to flick lint off her sleeve, the blast snatched her from the decking and flung her head first across the room. Her skull cracked into the poly-metal of a server bank, making a hollow, sort of dropped coconut sound. Hitting the floor in a jumble of half-assembled parts, she slumped, head ringing, vision blurry. She tried to sort her limbs enough to stand, but just tipped over onto her side when she tried to pull a foot under her.

A vague shape climbed from the pod, and stumbled, going down on one knee. A pale green nimbus of flickering energy snapped and sparked around him. He staggered to his feet and backed away, putting a few metres between them. "Lulonik lel nawoya?"

Tashac sent a whispered translation. He wanted to know where he was. Shepard gritted her teeth and gave her head a hard shake, trying to clear it. She needed to get up before he turned her into red paste. Gathering her feet under her, she shoved herself up, gripping the edge of the server to keep from sliding back onto her side.

The prothean closed on her with ridiculous speed. One large, three-fingered hand closed around her throat, lifting her feet a half-metre off the floor. Desperate, furious gold eyes glared into hers, his twin-pupils dilated, his respiration elevated and tight, every cell of his being set to kill.

Chapter End Notes

(A-N: This chapter got away from me. So much to do and get done, so I ended up splitting it in half. The other half will go up tomorrow for Sassy's Birthday.

Thanks to those who reviewed and of course, to the readers as well. I really do appreciate that you stop by to keep up with my story. See you tomorrow.)
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Thirty Four

Chapter Summary

Will Javik prove to be an asset or a liability? And Shepard starts to settle in to her new command. Rewritten massively 13/04/2015 to fix massive characterization issues!

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Hitarul - The stasis that Protheans enter during the 22 days of fertilization and implantation. Male and female remain joined for the entire period.

Regulikar: The Prothean central government.

Kepala - The ridges of carapace that cover the top of a Prothean's head.

Vir: Male chosen by the Prothean Genetic Authority to sire a female's children.

Gasin (Gasinu - pl) - Prothean male the age of majority. (Dropped from 20 to 13 over the course of the war.)

Takun (Takune - pl) - Prothean female the age of majority. (Dropped from 20 to 13 over the course of the war.)

---

Trigger Warning: There is a non-graphic and non-explicit depiction of two different arranged mating situations in this chapter. The first was pleasant, the second unpleasant. They are marked by a § for the pleasant one, and a §§ for the start and end of the unpleasant one, if you wish to skip them. Both are consensual, just sorta squicky for the whole 'thanks for choosing my perfect genetic match, oh great government' thing. Then, of course, Javik being just the perfect gentlemen. Yeah ... no.

---

21 Days ASR

Shepard sucked a thin, rasping breath past the hands around her throat. Just managing to get enough air to growl low and fierce, she let out the closest approximation to a prothean challenge her larynx could create. Black spots and bright sparks flashed across her vision in an impressive light show.

Those gold eyes—gold was rare and prized as a sign of genetic excellence in the empire—pressed in on her. "Ninik maovul kufonya kwal ajik yangul wakul huul, mapeluk?"

Again, Tashac whispered the translation. He was asking what the demons intended to do to him. Shepard blinked, something about the furious, sneering face pressed so close to hers familiar, and not just the 'yeah, sure, it's a prothean' sort of familiar.
"Javik?" Shepard gasped before she even realized she intended to. Squinting, trying to see him clearly, she just sort of flailed in his grasp. How could he be so strong despite the long stasis? A memory flashed through her head. She braced herself to be swept away into that other life, but Tashac held herself at a distance. The reason stabbed a queasy sliver of sadness through Shepard's heart. The memory hurt too much ... was too traumatic.

§

Her first fertile cycle, the Regulikar had paired her with Lulyak, an older, well-storied and honoured warrior. He'd been paired many times and quickly set her at ease with tales of his family and adventures. They'd spent a day just talking, meditating, and sharing meals ... becoming comfortable with one another. When they'd finally laid down and he'd moved against her back, she'd accepted the contact willingly. They both owed the empire a duty, and she'd opened to him, their physical bonding painless and easy.

The deeper bonding had proven both enjoyable and educational. He'd seen so much of the galaxy, and even having fought the Reapers for decades, he'd managed to keep his heart compassionate and filled with humour. Wise and learned in the ways of war, he taught her more in that bond than any of her trainers. When their time ended—the bond breaking—he'd embraced her, run the ridge of his kepala along hers and promised to return when their offspring were ready to depart her body. Neither of his young outlived him, but both cherished him as a father as much as they did Merol. Lulyak had taken them from her body and helped her lay them out in death. When the Reapers cut him down, she'd mourned him terribly.

§§

Her second cycle, her government assigned her a warrior of no less might, but young, hot-blooded and fresh from a frontline he had not left since his fourteenth summer. He entered the room and looked her up and down, his expression a mask of cool indifference. "For more than ten cycles I have served the empire in battle, and now they tell me I must ... " His face twisted into a grimace of frustration and anger. "How much ground will be lost, how many lives wasted while I take part in this pointless exercise?" Taking a deep breath, he turned away and began to change into his robe.

She almost told him that she had nothing to do with his choosing and would rather be fighting alongside her company as well, but she did not. She simply dressed in the robe and waited. He did not say another word for the entire twenty two days, simply settling into position. Her body refused to relax, and the coupling ached. Not the fault of carelessness or enmity on his part. They knew nothing about and cared nothing for the other. Duty could hardly take the place of caring, even in its smallest measure. Luckily for the empire, comfort was not vital to success of the hitarul.

Still, it wasn't until the deeper bond formed, the inevitable sharing of selves and memory, that Tashac truly wished to be anywhere else. Endless visions of slaughter and death assailed her, filling her with a horror and a despair that had little to do with the intent of the gasin at her back. No ... the true pain came from the knowledge that this avatar of the perfect warrior exemplified what her people had become. Antecessors, so much hatred and contempt for life! So much lust to crush and kill. Even his people were merely tools or weapons to be used and discarded.

Her median vir formed the opposite of everything she cherished ... so far from her beloved Merol that she didn't even consider them of the same race. And so, the long weeks of hitarul became an agony to endure. How could she bring children into an empire that wished only to turn them into machines of war—empty and soulless, lacking joy or love? Tears leaked from her eyes even in stasis as her heart longed for Merol's arms ... to touch a soul that still saw light instead of a million shades of ebony despair, that smelled and tasted more than death.
When the hitarul broke, Javik stood, composed himself and walked out the door. Tashac curled into a ball, hugging her knees until Merol came looking for her. She never heard from Javik again, not when their children entered the galaxy, nor when they left it all too soon. Well, they were never truly his children. Their father had adored them, held them, sang to them, and mourned them.

§§

In a wave of exquisite sorrow, the memory drew back, allowing Shepard to focus on the prothean gripping her throat. Hatred … thick, flowing sewage … fouled her to the core as she stared into those eyes. After everything she sacrificed for her people … for her empire … they sent that soulless husk forward to create the anathema to the empire she remembered and loved?

"Javik." That time the name came out as a low, raspy growl, the sound grinding from her crushed throat. The shock on his face, the widening of his eyes, made her smile and poured strength into her. Stabbing her arms up between his, she exploded from his hold. "Why did it have to be you?" she demanded, shoving him. "Of all the noble exemplars of what it meant to be Prothean … why you?"

She saw that he'd read enough of her nervous system while he choked her to understand her words. He retreated, slamming back into his pod. Shepard lunged at him, hands clawing for his kepala, her thumbs digging in a few centimetres to either side of the front, pinching off both a nerve and an artery. She grinned down into his eyes, wading happily in the shock she saw there. "Why you, Javik? Why preserve the empty, black heart of our race when Mahart eclipsed you as leader and Diagul as a warrior?"

Mouth open, gasping, but teeth bared, he asked, his voice a low but almost musical snarl, "Ungal zelaphik huul?"

"How do I know you, Avatar of Vengeance … cold, dessicated corpse of the Prothean Empire?" An ugly grin twisted her face and she dug her thumbs in, emotional manure making her gag so hard she almost threw up.

Tashac's memories whispered a gentle warning that if Shepard pressed much harder, she'd crush the vital arteries.

Heeding it, she loosened her grip. "Look deep, Commander Javik." Shepard jerked her head a little, beckoning for him to read her. "Go ahead, I won't kill. Not yet anyway. Read me."

Blue-fingered hands closed around her forearms, and she saw flashes of his life, his memories and knowledge passing through the bond. Surprise sent a shock through her when he reached deeper and found the beacon memories. After a moment, the prothean went limp in her hands. The decades between Tashac's joining and his internment had proven educational but not kind.

"Tashac, junkil ganik huul? Jek, wenginl kuna kuhik diwal kaw njla huul?" he asked, then after a moment, repeated the questions in human common. Handy as hell, the ability to learn things in seconds. "Tashac? How can this be? Are there others who survived in this way?"

"Shepard?" Miranda staggered to her feet, her eyes looking unfocused and hazy, her face slack. Standing at the end of the pod, she'd obviously taken a much stronger hit than Shepard. "What … ?" The operative stumbled forward a couple of steps, hands coming up a second too late to brace her against the pod and she fell forward into it. A thin line of blood trickled down her forehead from a small wound, no doubt from her head bashing into the door frame. She opened her omnitool, her pistol held far too loosely for Shepard's liking. "I'm calling for help."
Shepard turned back to the prothean, to discover Javik's eyes still fixed on her. Shepard let him go and stepped away, moving sideways to ease the pistol from the operative's hand before their guest recovered enough to make a grab for it. Shooting a glare at the prothean that crackled with warning, she said. "You. Don't move. We've got some talking to do."

When he tilted his head to the left, the prothean equivalent of a nod, she slipped an arm around Miranda's shoulders and eased the stunned woman toward the door. "It's okay, Miranda. I've got this in hand. Have the doctor check you out." She palmed the control. "Doctor! Miranda took a blow to the head. Could you take a look at her, please?"

Levelling a firm glare on the operative, Shepard made it clear that she intended to brook no argument. She and Javik had a few things to work out, and Miranda could only complicate matters. "Get checked out. By the time you're finished, I'll have Javik sorted."

Miranda tried to argue, but could barely focus on Shepard's face let alone get the words out in the right order, allowing the captain to transfer her to the doctor's assistance without resistance.

Shepard watched the two women for a second, taking some deep breaths as she tried to wall up Tashac and her extremely virulent feelings about the father of her median children. Regardless of how the takun felt about him, he remained the last living prothean, and the only living being in the galaxy with any experience fighting the full might of the Reapers. They needed him.

That idea finally broke through the anger and distress. Shepard set her face to impassive and nodded as she turned to walk back through the door. Stopping just far enough inside to let it close behind her, she stared down the long room at the prothean.

"Who are you?" Javik demanded, some of his composure returning. "How do you possess the memories of Tashac Jacar and Merol Natil?" He bristled, arrogance settling around him like a mantle. "Are you with these primitives? These barbarians with their scalpels and syringes?"

Shepard shook her head. "My name is Captain Shepard." She stepped around the pod, removing the barrier between them. "Tashac lives in my head because I used a couple of the beacons left behind by your people. They warned us about the Reapers … showed us what had been done to help us fight back. I died just after defeating Nazara … the Vanguard." Crossing her arms, she leaned back on one hip, relaxed but ready. "This organization brought me back from the dead to keep fighting."

He stared at her for long seconds, then leaned back, mimicking her posture.

Shepard smiled, a cold, hard grimace that pressed her lips paper-thin. "But you knew all that." A laugh even colder and harder fell out after the words. "Don't play with me, Javik. I'm not an idiot, and I don't like being yanked around." She shifted hips and let her head tip off to one side. Two could play at snarky arrogance. "Here's the score. Tashac hates you. I mean, with the sort of burning passion that would see me removing every tender, squishy bit of your anatomy with pliers."

_Sweet baby Jesus, Tashac. Down girl._

Pulling back from Tashac's gallery of pointy, horrible torture, she shrugged as if helpless in the face of so much violent ugliness. "She considers you every sad, empty, broken, wretched thing your people turned into during the war."

Javik straightened, drawing his head back on his neck. Good. She needed to set him back a little. Despite needing every bit of intel and cunning inside that massive, flat skull, the Milky Way would crack open and troptastic-fruitstravaganza-flavoured gummy hanar would pour out before she let him take over.

"Now, you're the last … the only living being to have fought the Reapers en masse." She let her eyebrows pop up a bit for that, pouring a little earnest into the mix. He'd read her, he'd be able to interpret her facial expressions. "We need to know what strategies worked and what didn't. We need to know any weaknesses you discovered." She leaned toward him a little more with each word. One hand buttressing against the pod, she did her best to loom over him. Embarrassment flashed as she imagined a Chihuahua trying to intimidate a varren.

Throwing it off before it could set her face aflame, she focused. "We need your help in this fight, so I'm offering you a chance to do what you were sent here to do … exact revenge for your people." Pushing away from the pod, she closed the metres between them.

"Are you offering me a choice, Captain?" he said, his voice soft and musical. "Or am I to be a prisoner?"

Tashac warmed a little, not toward the gasin, but … oh how she missed the lyrical rhythms and complex tones of her people's language. A smile softened Shepard's face before she could police it back to neutral.

"Of course, you have a choice," Shepard replied. "And no, you are not a prisoner." She let out a long sigh, her shoulders and face relaxing. "Work with me, obey my orders, get along with our allies. That's option one. Option two: you can go back in the pod. I'll freeze you and find somewhere nice and safe away from the organization." She shrugged as his lips lifted into a snarl at that idea. "Or, when we reach a spaceport … go your own way." She offered her hands palms down in the prothean gesture of trust. "You can check if you think I'm lying, or if you doubt that fucking with me ends up with you back in the freezer section."

The door opened. "Shepard, I … ." Liara's voice ended in a sort of high-pitched, up-turned squeak. "I … uh … . Um, Shepard?"

Shepard waited for Javik to step away, then turned a little to include Liara without turning her back on the prothean. "Liara, this is Commander Javik. He's your missing prothean from Eden Prime." Shepard nodded her head to call the asari over. "I was just asking him if he wanted to assist us in preparing for the Reapers." Looking back at Javik, she waited for a moment before offering her hands again.

"I will assist you, human." He made a rough, warbling sound deep in his throat. "You will need it. The last I heard of your species, they made weapons out of sharpened stone and lived in caves."

"As did the Protheans once a very long time ago." She held his stare with an earnest one. "This cycle came early. Perhaps you can help us figure out why."

"Why does not matter. Defeating them does." He stepped back and turned away from her hands, the sign of respect at odds with his words. "Why is for old takune sitting on fat cushions."

Liara blanched a little and looked to Shepard, her eyes leaving the prothean for the first time.

"Captain?"

"Liara, can you help settle our guest on board? Please, find him somewhere out of the way to bunk." Her gaze slid from Liara to Javik. His presence chafed against her like coarse sandpaper, and she wanted … needed … him gone. "He'll let you know what he needs."
"Of course, Captain, I'd be honoured." Liara held out a hand to usher him from the space. "I'm very excited to meet you, Commander. As an archaeologist, I've dedicated my career to studying your people." She strode to the door, then stopped, waiting.

Javik took a step forward. "You are asari?"

Liara smiled and nodded, straightening a little. "Yes."

Shepard turned her back to the asari and leaned into the prothean before he could follow. "She's studied prothean ruins, Javik. She holds a very generous view of your people. You might think it naive and silly, but it's generous. Be kind to her." The last four words dropped like stones in deep, black water. She stiffened all the plains of her face, meeting him with granite. "She's young."

He leaned in as well, his voice growling roughly as he asked, "Was that ever an excuse in the empire?" Those gold, double-pupiled eyes bored straight through her, a stare she met with a stiff smile.

"Yes, well … the empire died, Javik, and it died for a reason. You're one gasin, alone in a really big, new galaxy. If nothing else, we're allies in the same battle. Just be kind." She stepped back and turned away, holding out her arm. Time for both she and Tashac to get a little space. "Oh, and you're going to have guards. Be kind to them as well. If you behave yourself, I'll call them off."

He stared at her so long, her hand drifted to her weapon, but then he nodded, one single, sharp tilt of his head.

Shepard returned the nod, moved to open her omnitool, then sighed and walked over to the comm panel. She needed a functional omnitool first off. "Miranda? Our guest is ready to move into his quarters and requires an escort."

"Understood, Captain. They'll be right there."

"Roger that." Shepard closed the channel.

"I did not return when our offspring departed Tashac's body because I was ashamed," Javik said from behind her, his voice too soft to carry beyond them. "War was all I knew when I entered our bond. It hurt her. What I was hurt her." He stepped up beside Shepard, but didn't look at her. "I was ashamed."

Tashac remained silent, content behind the walls as Shepard watched the last prothean passed Liara, walking into medbay. Well, how about that? She crooked a finger at the asari. "Liara? A second?"

"Captain?" The asari strode back, walking a little sideways, as if afraid that the prothean would disappear.

"Be careful," Shepard warned her, earnest and firm. "He was provoked, but he's killed two people and injured a bunch more." She passed the asari the sidearm. "Keep a hand on it, and keep the biotics ready. He's a very strong biotic."

Liara's expression settled. "Understood, Captain." She stared at Shepard, mouth half-open, as if she had more to say, then just shook her head a little. "I'll stay sharp."

The medbay door opened, three armed and seasoned-looking soldiers stepping through. One stepped forward. "Dr. T'Soni ... sir, if you'd follow me." With great precision and steady hands on their weapons, they surrounded the prothean and led him from the room.
Letting out a long breath of relief, Shepard let her head hang, the tension finally rolling out of her shoulders and neck. As she closed her eyes, she felt a pair of large, warm hands knead the muscles. She smiled, content to savour what her brain gave her rather than enduring the pain it would take to draw more of the memory forward.

She was free. The smile spread as the cell doors cracked open, the galaxy and her life creeping through like a cool breeze on a hot day. Yes, the pain drained her and being in unknown territory with uncertain allies terrified her, but she was ... well, maybe not free, but moving in the right direction.

That thought spurred her forward. Casting one last look over the ridiculous amount of computing power, she strode to the door. Time to get to it. She stepped out into the bright lights of medbay and looked around. "Hey, Doc. Where's Miranda?"

The doctor chuckled, but it came off more exasperated than amused. "As soon as I scanned her head, gave her an analgesic, and applied some medigel, she left." The young woman leaned back as Shepard approached. Drawing her lab coat closed, she laced her fingers over her stomach. "I'm going to be tranquilizing the lot of you within the month, aren't I?"

Grinning, Shepard shook her head, feeling renewed admiration for the doctor's adaptability and guts. "I give it a week if we see action." She wiggled her eyebrows and strode past. "It's a thankless job, and the only real option is to become terrifying. Thanks for the drugs, Doc. Much appreciated."

She stepped through the door into a common area. The galley and a couple of tables stood to her right, a balding gentleman preparing something on the stove. She turned and took a couple of steps toward him. "Hi." Smiling, she lifted her hand in a short wave. "Captain Jane Shepard. I'm looking for Operative Lawson."

"Operative Lawson is in the Briefing Room," a pleasant female voice answered before the other fellow could.

"Thank you." Shepard gave the cook a nod before turning her attention to the voice. "Would I have the pleasure of speaking to the ship's AI?"

"Captain?"

Shepard swore that the voice sounded surprised. She shook her head and headed toward the center mass of the ship. No doubt that was where she'd find the elevator or stairs, like on the Normandy. "I'm an engineer," she continued. "I saw that computing power in the server room. No way that's just running some cyberwarfare program." Shrugging, she corrected herself. "Well, not an ordinary one, anyway."

Rounding the corner, she let out a victorious little hum. Elevator. "So, quantum blue-box? Come on, you can tell me, I'm your captain." Her good mood spread through her body like the tingle of Hallex or a strong drink.

"Yes, Captain. The crew call me EDI," the voice replied. "I am the Enhanced Defense Intelligence."

Shepard palmed the control to summon the elevator. Part of her insisted that she should be more concerned about an AI created by the same people who'd brought her back to life. But then, the other part said that she'd known good AIs, and she'd defeated the bad ones. Whatever this one proved to be, she'd deal.
Meanwhile . . . "Do you fly the ship along with Lt. Cortez?"

"I do not have access to most ship systems as a precautionary measure."

The elevator arrived, the door opening. Shepard half glanced up at the ceiling. "Where am I going, EDI?" She stepped inside and turned, her hand hovering over the controls.

"The briefing room is situated on deck two, aft corridor, the combat information center."

"Thank you." After pressing the control, Shepard collapsed back against the wall. Her head still rang at about a nine, her body at a four despite the drugs. Oh well, maybe she could get some real sleep in a real bed as soon as they sorted out their destination.

Damn, the elevator was as slow as the one on the Normandy. "So, EDI, if you don't manage ship systems, or fly … what's your deal? You defend against cyber attacks during battle? Perform your own? What else? Analysis? Data mining?"

"That is correct, Captain. I provide data and situational analysis during missions. Beyond that, I cannot interface with the ship's systems."

The elevator began to slow. "So, they're worried you're going to lose your artificial mind and kill us all if you can control the ship?" She lifted her eyebrows, her expression teasing despite her audience. "You aren't planning on that, are you?"

"I am not currently formulating any plans to kill the crew."

Shepard grinned. "Excellent, that's my favourite thing about you so far, EDI." She stepped up to the door and then through when it opened. "And don't worry, it's not personal. They expect me to go nuts and kill everyone, too."

A bright laugh greeted that, a familiar head of red hair turning away from a console to the right of the galaxy map. "That's not entirely true, Shepard," Kelly said, a wide smile forming beneath teasing eyes. "We don't expect it." She shrugged. "We just consider it a possibility."

"Kelly," Shepard took a deep breath and slipped on her captain uniform before greeting the young woman. "Sneaking in personal email on company time?" Turning to look over the rest of the CIC, Shepard's eyes widened, and her brow lifted. She took a few steps toward the stairs up to the hologram of the vessel and placed her hands on the cool metal of the railing. The warm tingle from earlier spread out from her bones to heat her muscles, security settling in, strong and steady despite the whisper in her head that warned her against trusting it.

"It's almost like home," she whispered, eyes following the familiar lines and curves. "They really did just grab the Normandy's blueprints and go to town, didn't they?" She pivoted toward Kelly. "Anderson's going to be jealous. This ship is … amazing."

Kelly gripped Shepard's hand when the captain stopped next to her, but Shepard gently removed herself from the contact. "How are you feeling? Whatever the hell that was in the docking bay . . . " She shuddered. "I've never seen anything like it. It was like . . . " She fumbled for words. "... like it was trying to possess you … like some sort of demon."

Shepard's eyebrows rose as she pursed her lips and wagged her head a little side to side. "That's about right, but Harbinger is going to be something we are prepared to deal with. It looks frightening, but it's similar to a remote operator fighting using a mech." The expression transformed easily into a grin. "So, what are you doing here?" She peered over Kelly's shoulder. "Crew reports?" She read a couple of lines. "Have you already sent them to the terminal in my quarters?"
"Yes, ma'am. I am your yeoman, after all." Kelly gave her a jaunty salute. The skin between her brows crinkled as she dropped the hand. "Actually, once we land somewhere, can we sit down and go over the crew roster and the team dossiers that Miranda sent, Captain? There are a few colourful personalities who concern me."

Shepard nodded. "Of course, Yeoman. I just introduced myself to Jack and the prothean, Commander Javik." Taking another breath, she squared her shoulders. "They're both strong biotics, and Javik was fighting Collectors and Reapers for decades before he went into stasis. They should prove to be valuable assets if we can keep them on an even keel." A tight-lipped smile and quirked eyebrow accompanied her words. "That's going to be your department. Keep an eye on them and let me know if anything sets off your alarms."

"Assets, Shepard? You sound like Miranda." The redhead's brow furrowed, her eyes confused when Shepard stepped away from a friendly shoulder butt.

A soft sigh preceded Shepard's words. Time to head into the adjustment phase. "I'm Captain Shepard now, Kelly. Unless we're in private, it's business as usual. These people may eventually become family as the Normandy crew did, but for now, I'll settle for respect. Okay? It's time for Shepard the crazy lady to go in a drawer."

Kelly nodded, a warm smile signalling her understanding. "Yes, ma'am." She saluted. "Miranda is in the briefing room, and may I suggest that you go through the armory to talk to Vincent? What happened on the station has him pretty upset."

Shepard let out a long sigh, as she turned slowly, taking in her new home. A sad smile accompanied the memory of Joker yelling snarky bad jokes down the length of the CIC, and Sparky giving fitness reports over his shoulder as his Marines jogged circuits around the galaxy map. It wouldn't be the same without them, but it wasn't like she could ask Anderson to give up his entire crew. The smiled melted away as she turned to look for the armoury door.

"So, professionally, then … Captain, are you really on board with this mission? Leading this crew?" Kelly asked, her voice too low to carry. "You're not just telling us what we want to hear so you can jump ship?"

"I'm here to work, Yeoman. Miranda might be a lot of things, but I've never doubted her dedication to the mission. Hell, she took the worst I could throw at her and never gave in to the temptation to put me back under." Shepard glanced over her shoulder. "She's earned some conditional trust. I wouldn't have lasted two days before I threw me out an airlock and went with plan B."

Kelly's face dropped, comical in her surprise. "All that … ." She closed her mouth, jaw clacking shut. "It was all an act?"

"Not all of it, Miss Chambers." One hand lifted in a small wave, and Shepard headed for the door, her knees starting to tremble again. She needed to move quickly before she collapsed and the crew had to watch her carried back to medbay. That would throw far too much grist into the rumour mill.

"Vincent," she called as she stepped through the door. "What's going on? Gun rehab?" She stopped and looked around, letting out a low whistle. "Wow, I think they bought every gun in the universe." Turning a slow circle, she admired the wide array of weapons of every sort. "Is that a Widow?" She strode over and ran reverent fingers over the gun before moving to lift it.

"Careful, Shepard," the physiotherapist said, "that thing weighs almost as much as you do." He walked over and held out a hand, but didn't move to help.
Lifting the large gun, Shepard shrugged. "It's heavy, but I could carry it through a mission. I wonder if it would shatter my arm if I fired it." Meeting his eyes, she frowned, her head shaking a little. "What am I, Vincent?" she asked, her tone serious rather than despairing, seeking a straight answer. "What did they turn me into?" The gun sagged toward the tabletop. "Before they brought me back, I was strong, but this is something else entirely. I need to know what I can expect from this body."

He lifted it from her hands and laid it back amidst the others. "You have tech all the way through you, Shepard. They laced your muscles with filaments to enhance your strength and carry medigel more effectively. They wove special carbon webs around your bones to make them harder to break. Your heart has servo assisted valves, and even your lungs process oxygen more efficiently." He shrugged and turned, lifting a hip to sit on the edge of the table. "You're you, just a little stronger, a little faster, a little quicker to heal."

She filed that information away. Hopefully, she could find Chakwas and get a rundown from someone she trusted to let her in on all the warts. "Six million dollar man," she whispered, then shook her head, dismissing it.

She hopped up next to him and looked over, schooling her face into the professional mask of command. "Kelly said you weren't doing very well with what happened on the station." How anyone could be, she didn't know, but the obvious statement gave him an opening.

"You shitting me? Of course I'm not okay with it." He looked down and shook his head. "All those people. More people … gone … just like … ." He lapsed into silence, but she let him keep it, knowing he had more to say. It took a few seconds, but then he let out a long sigh. "I wasn't always a physiotherapist, Shepard. I worked for the Alliance. Gro-Po at first, but then I got noticed by the right people, and they recommended me for ICT. Never got there, though. My team were sent out to guard a colony. Everything went to hell."

Her lips pressed together. Yeah, he'd shot far too well for a physiotherapist. Still, she left it to him to talk.

"Saw some really terrible shit, you know? Lost good people. Decided I wanted a different life. Miranda recruited me on Arcturus. I had field medic training, and had been working in the Alliance hospital, so she offered to help me get the training to do this." He looked up, those dark brown eyes filled with … determination and fear … and strength … a lot of strength, but something else as well. Thick walls kept her from it. It was either a terrible pain or a big secret. Maybe both.

She braced the heels of her hands against the edge of the table and leaned forward. "Do you want to get out when we make landfall?" she asked, keeping her voice pitched low and neutral. Suddenly, she wanted him to stay, but she didn't want to influence him at all. He needed to decide to be there as much as she did. Especially if things got as bad as she anticipated.

He looked over at her, staring into her eyes for a second. "You as good as they say you are?"

Shepard chuckled and shook her head. "I'm good, and I'm smart, but I'm reckless … well, let's call it unconventional. The key to my success has always been the people around me. Every time I screw up, they help me figure out a way through." She bumped her shoulder against his arm, then rubbed the joint. "Ow, you're just one massive slab of muscle, aren't you?"

"Hell, yeah." He chuckled, a warm, throaty sound and hopped down. "Work damned hard to be one." Once standing next to her, he nodded. "Give me a couple of days to think about it?"

Shepard hopped down, warmth spreading through her. She might not have the old team, but she was gathering some hopeful prospects. "Sure, take all the time you want. Just, in the meantime, if we end up deep in the shit, you pitch in and carry your weight. Deal?"

The large man reached up to rub the back of his neck, then nodded and gave her a crooked grin. "Deal." He turned and walked away a few steps before turning back. "You really aren't as nuts as you pretend to be, are you?"

Shepard just shrugged and pointed to the side door. "Is the briefing room through here?"

"Yeah. First door on the right. The one with the big writing next to it that says, Briefing Room." He chuckled and went back to his work.

Shepard heard voices as soon as she stepped through the door. Miranda, and she didn't sound pleased. The operative would never stoop to shouting, but the tightness in her voice rang familiar. She was arguing with someone.

Before Shepard even had time to react, EDI spoke up, startling Shepard enough that she jumped. "Operative Lawson. Captain Shepard is at the door."

Shepard let out a quick puff of air and glanced up. "I see how it is, EDI."

Shepard palmed the door control, the portal opening just in time for her to see the large conference table lift the last hand width or so into place. A galaxy map blinked on above it, and then Miranda turned from a small control panel to face Shepard. "The guards and Dr. T'Soni report that the prothean, Javik, is settling into his quarters in the Port Cargo hold. Dr. T'Soni sent me a requisition for a few things to make him more comfortable."

"Who were you talking to?" the captain asked, walking into the room. She kept her face and body relaxed despite the doubt that sank sharp teeth into her guts.

Miranda shook her head. "No one, Shepard. I was simply consulting EDI to plan our destination. We have several civilians aboard and need supplies." She turned back to the galaxy map. "The closest spaceport is this colony." She zoomed in on a system in the Terminus. "Freedom's Progress."

"But, you know, that old Grinch was so smart and so slick," Shepard muttered, stepping up beside the operative. "He thought up a lie, and he thought it up quick!"¹

"Excuse me, Captain?" Miranda asked, her brow furrowing and eyes narrowing in a way that left Shepard no doubt at all that she'd heard every word.

"Nothing, just muttering." A sick feeling rolling around in her gut again, she turned to the galaxy map. Had she read everything wrong? Could Miranda be trusted? Shepard had been so sure she could, and yet . . . . Squaring her shoulders, she took a deep breath and focused on the road forward. If Miranda intended to betray her, it would happen one way or another, and a lot of colonists still needed the Collectors shut down.

"So, Freedom's Progress, you said?"

¹ How the Grinch Stole Christmas, Dr. Seuss. Published in the United States by Random House. November 24, 1957 renewed 1985
A-N: Okay, so rewrites are a thing. Never post a first draft, because you inevitably go ... what was the character thinking? So, yeah. Newer, cleaner ... bionic chapter with Shepard acting as she should be. I think she got into the happy sauce or something. And we are on a collision course for Freedom's Progress.

To those who are still here and still enjoying the trials and tribulations. Thanks. Thanks so much, and I'm glad you're still enjoying Shepard's adventures. Now, on to Freedom's Progress! I'm getting so excited, it's nuts.
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Thirty Five

Chapter Summary

Nihlus arrives to investigate Freedom's Progress.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Nihlus held Shepard cradled in his arms. She slept ... finally. He let out a long, soft sigh. After so many days of driving herself relentlessly, refusing to give in to her fear and the grief, he worried she'd self-destruct if she didn't get at least a little rest. Blinking slowly, his eyelids begged him to join her. The days since the disappearance dragged on so long ... so painfully long and filled with the horrible emptiness. He touched his brow to Shepard's and closed his eyes. He would sleep ... in a minute or two, but right then, he just wanted to savour the feel of his mate in his arms—

"Hey, Nihlus!" Joker's voice shot through the peace. "Nihlus Kryik! Answer me or I start blasting alarms."

Shepard vanished. What the ... ? Damn him. The Spectre forced his eyes open, feeling as if someone had attached weights to his eyelids as he slept. Damn, he hadn't meant to fall asleep at all.

"Five ... four ... three ... ."

"I'm awake, Joker. Shut up." He closed his eyes, covering them with his arm, allowing the memory of the dream to drift back, rich and rare and so very real. He dreamed about Shepard far less than Garrus did. Where his fratrin had lived a double life, escaping to his dreams, Nihlus got infrequent glimpses into moments gone by, particularly standing by helplessly as she died. He woke from those both grateful and thirsty.

Behind his closed eyelids, he tried to reclaim the sensation of her slight weight in his arms ... the warmth of her. The dream had been different than his usual ... real, and both beautiful and painful in a way that ached deep behind his keel and at the base of his skull. They'd lost something ... no, someone ... and yet, they still had one another. The fact she needed him present and strong ... it kept him from drowning in brandy. He could stay strong for her ... his mate.

Enough of that. He dropped his arm and swung off his cot, the movement both sudden and violent. Altogether too keen-edged, the feeling of empty sorrow from the dream sliced at him leaving him bleeding. He needed to leave it behind before his boots hit Freedom's Progress so he stayed focused. Stretching his neck, he reached up to rub just below his fringe. Someone needed to find the frigate that hit him, see how many of his body parts remained stuck to it.

"General quarters," Joker called over the comms. "All hands at general quarters. We'll be hitting the relay in ten minutes. Take a handful of aspirin and pour yourself a huge cup of coffee."

One day, Nihlus foresaw breaking every bone in the mouthy pilot's body and feeling only passing remorse. He shoved himself up off his cot, hung his assault rifle and shotgun from his back, and then headed out. A quick cup of amarceru and a couple of meal bars, then he'd face what awaited them on the other side of the relay. Their only real advantage lie in the fact that they'd managed to make that broken contact with Garrus. Without that, they'd have probably ended up blown to hell.

The galley stood predictably empty. Although … someone had already made a kettle of his strong, bitter drink, leaving a thermos and the container of rylamia honey on the counter next to it. He glared at the thoughtful but 'pretty sure you'll be hung over and will need this' gesture. They respected his skills and his accomplishments, but they all looked at him like Garrus's pathetic little brother despite the age difference the other way. For a long time, he told himself that he didn't care. They didn't need to admire him … hell, they didn't even need to like him … they just needed to obey orders.

He almost believed it … almost convinced himself that the pity in their eyes didn't burn. Almost. Being drunk helped with that conviction. Once upon a time—as the humans said—he'd been a stone cold bad ass. As he picked up the kettle, a sharp, bitter laugh tumbled out, all glass shards and rusted nails. Then he threw Shepard's name into the hunt for new Spectres. What in the name of buratrurum happened to that driven, ambitious torin? Another laugh, that one softer and sadder, rumbled deep in his throat.

Shepard. Shepard happened.

Shaking that off, he filled the thermos, dumped in half the container of honey, and stowed the kettle and container, his movements abrupt and efficient. Loose items turned into missiles when space combat went badly. Picking up his thermos, he capped it, and then shook it as he made his way to the bridge.

Anderson stood by the galaxy map talking to Alenko. The captain broke off and fell in step next to Nihlus as he passed. The Spectre lifted his thermos a little and nodded his thanks to the lieutenant commander before turning his attention to the Normandy's captain.

"Anything new to report?" he asked.

A heavy scowl creased the captain's face as he glanced over at Nihlus. "According to Instructor Kandros, all of the merc organizations on Omega have had an influx of new personnel in the last few days. She's updating and beefing security, just in case they've come gunning for Archangel."

Nihlus shook his head and took a deep breath. "Has she been able to get through to Garrus? And is it the big three, or the smaller bands as well?" A block of ice dropped into his gut. The leadership called away into traps, the fleet and almost all trained personnel scattered around the galaxy. Of course the mercs were there for Archangel.

Anderson jogged up the ramp. "All of them, even some private organizations that she says have never traditionally had a presence on Omega." He shrugged. "We're out here. Garrus is on Tuchanka. They're hoping to raze the ground clean before we can get back."

The Spectre nodded, agreeing. Thank the spirits for Kandros's gang connections and their intel. Nihlus followed Anderson without really paying attention to where he was going. Nyreen possessed the tactical knowledge and brains to prepare, and most of the inner circle remained on Omega. Add to that, the fact that the base could be turned into a fortress at a moment's notice … they had a shot of holding out until reinforcements got there.

"Is she recalling Archangel forces?" When Anderson shook his head, Nihlus let out a long breath. "When we're done here, I'll contact her, tell her to pull back the ships on colony patrol. The council isn't just playing at trying to bring us down. They must be planning something big and soon."

A thoughtful, worried scowl creased the captain's brow. "I'll let Hackett know what's going on. He can't help out on Omega, but he can keep an eye out for whatever the council is up to. Maybe we can finally get some traction on what the Reapers are doing out here."

"Abducting thousands of colonists is what they're doing." Nihlus's mandibles dropped, giving a small, sharp flick as he shook his head. "They're replacing the Vanguard. Somewhere, they're building themselves a new Reaper."

"Hitting the relay in two minutes, Captain," Joker reported. He shot a snarky glare at Nihlus. "Have a good sleep?"

Nihlus just flicked his mandibles and looked away.

Anderson clipped the pilot across the back of the head without any force. "Enough, Lieutenant. Have the Banquan and Aesarus reported in?"

"Yes, sir." Joker's hands flew over the controls. "They're at general quarters and loaded for bear.

As much as Nihlus hoped they wouldn't need to be battle ready, he knew that the way their luck ran lately, a greeting of thanix cannons and missiles awaited them on the other end. He belted back a long draught of amarceru and gripped the back of the gunnery station's chair.

"Captain. Nihlus." Alenko nodded to them both as he slipped into his seat, armoured up and ready to drop as soon as they fought their way to Freedom's Progress. Activating the station, he brought up several screens. "Long range telemetry from the relay showing nothing from the system, Captain," he reported, but his posture shifted, his hands working quickly, flipping screens for a moment before he glanced over his shoulder at Anderson. "We're not getting anything at all from the other end. I asked the relay for the weather conditions and then tried to route a transmission through the relay … the entire system is dark, sir."

Anderson nodded and reached around Joker to hit the comms. "All hands, prepare for battle. Helmets and safety harnesses on. We're going in hot."

"They boarded the Passch," Nihlus said. "If they want to set us up for Freedom's Progress, they'll probably try the same trick. If we jump through alone, we could draw them in." He waited for Anderson to show positive signs before turning his attention to Joker. "Can you out maneuver the Stinger long enough to draw them in?"

The pilot just scoffed. "Relay in twenty seconds."

Nihlus sent orders to the Banquan and Aesarus to give the Normandy a five minute head start. Taking drift into consideration, he didn't dare bring them in any later. As fine a pilot as Joker was, three or four ships tilted the odds too far in the enemy's favour.

The Spectre grounded his stance and gripped the back of Alenko's chair as the relay grabbed them and shot the little frigate through space, not for the jump itself, but in anticipation of the stunt flying that awaited at the other end.

Joker did not disappoint.

Nihlus saw the incoming fire long before he spotted the ships. Stepping back, he just kept out of the way, leaving it to Anderson to direct his vessel through the engagement.

"Pull them away from the relay and toward the planet," Anderson ordered. "Let's give our ships the best shot to come in on their flanks."
"The Stinger's closing," Kaidan called. "It'll be in firing range in one hundred and four seconds."

"Don't get your shorts in a knot," Joker grumbled. "I can keep us out of the line of fire."

Nihlus straightened to look over Alenko's shoulder at the tactical screen. The Stinger came at them aggressively, the other two hanging back. No doubt they awaited a more helpless target. He glanced over at Anderson. "We might be able to use the Stinger to our advantage. If Joker can keep it dogging us, keep them off balance, we might be able to use them to tear down a good chunk of that cruiser's shields."

Anderson nodded. "Joker?"

He snorted. "You're doubting my ability to piss people off so badly they're willing to blow up everything in sight just to kill me?" He sent the Normandy into a roll, bringing it around for Alenko to strafe the stolen frigate with fire before darting off. "Nihlus, give the man a reference. Pretty sure you've imagined killing me a dozen times already today."

"Sixteen. All different, all using just one hand." Although, as Nihlus watched the pilot maneuver, he could see why no one had killed the snarky pain in the ass. He and the Normandy formed a single organism, the little ship appearing at the Stinger's flank just long enough to pound the broadside with the main gun before diving away out of range of its main weapon.

Five times the Normandy harried the bigger ship before it fell within range of the Stinger's main weapon. "Oh no," Joker gasped, his voice dripping sarcasm. "No! God! What have I done? I've killed us all."

"Stinger is ready to fire," Alenko reported, a wide grin showing his appreciation for the pilot's little melodrama.

"I wish I'd had a chance to tell my nana I loved her," Joker gasped, pulling the frigate hard to port, then into a dive.

"Stinger firing!"

Nihlus grinned as the nimble Normandy rolled out of the path of the blast, the cruiser directly ahead taking the hit.

"Didn't see that coming, did you?" Joker crowed.

Alenko chuckled. "Cruiser's shields are down to thirty percent. Banquan and Aesarus incoming." He tried to contact the other two ships. "Comms jammed, Captain. Coordinating the attack through running light protocols."

"Good work, Joker." Anderson clapped the pilot on the shoulder, then gave Nihlus an appreciative nod.

Nihlus kept his attention on the tactical display. The Banquan acquitted itself admirably, separating off the cruiser and whittling it down while leading it on a merry chase. The Aesarus, however came out of its relay jump between the Stinger and the heavy frigate.

The Spectre stepped up between the seats, a plan forming in his mind … the pieces just lining up and falling into place. "Joker, can you bring us in on the Stinger's flank?" he asked, bringing the tactical up on his omnitool. "If you come in on it from this heading, you should be able to get some solid hits in on the emitters." He sent the course information to the pilot.
"We're going to be a sitting duck if it fires." Still, Joker input the course.

Nihlus nodded, a slight smile answering the pilot's trust. "That's all right. I know you can get us out of the way." Trust given, trust returned. "Alenko, send this message to the Aesarus and Banquan. As soon as the Stinger fires on us, they need to strike the emitters near the bow." He leaned forward, every muscle tense, expectant, and moving with the Normandy as if he could help the ship through the maneuvers it needed to pull off. His heart beat hard but steady, adrenaline fueling his muscles in a slow burn.

Heady and powerful, the Spectre settled back into Nihlus's body, taking hold for what felt like the first time since Saren tried to shoot him in the back of the head. Drawing in long, full breaths, he watched the battle play out on his omnitool. The Aesarus was going down faster than they could respond.

"Alenko. Have the Banquan draw that damned cruiser in, place it between the Normandy and the Stinger. Shove it right up their ass. Then tell the Aesarus to pull back, we'll give it some cover with our shields." He stepped over behind Kaidan, pointing out the positions on the screen.

"Two birds, one stone," Kaidan said. He nodded and grinned as he relayed the message via the ship's running lights.

Space battles made Nihlus crazy. Far too many drawn out minutes of maneuvering followed by too few seconds of frantic fire and evasion. Not to mention having to just stand there and let others fight. That never sat well. However, running the battle, being able to see the pieces on the board and knowing where to move them ... how to use them ... that pulled at something deep inside him. He suspected he had Tashac to thank.

"Aesarus is pulling back," Kaidan reported. "Enemy cruiser has hull breaches on all decks. We're twenty seconds from position on the Stinger. It's retreating."

Joker laughed. "They finally figured out what we're doing. Too late, suckers. You're already dead."

The Normandy fired, and the next second, the Stinger's shield emitters went up in a shower of short-lived sparks.

"Excellent work. Blow that thing to hell." Nihlus punched his hand down on the back of the seat, barely suppressing the urge to crow as the Stinger went up, the blast from it tearing apart the cruiser as well. "All right, the last frigate. Alenko, order the Aesarus to Freedom's Progress. Have her run silent. We can handle these bastards."

He felt Anderson's hand, heavy and welcome, slap him on the shoulder as explosions tore through the heavy frigate, the Normandy's ports bright as the core blew, then darkness.

"Not bad for a Spectre," Joker said, tossing a grin over one shoulder.

Nihlus took a deep, sharp breath and nodded to himself. Not bad at all. He looked over Joker's shoulder. "Time to shuttle departure?"

"Four hours." A pregnant pause just begging for a punchline followed. "Not enough time for a nap."

"Alenko, I'll see you and the rest of the team at the shuttle in three hours." Nihlus nodded to Anderson, then strode from the bridge, his mandibles fluttering. Maybe, just maybe, he could find his way back. Well, most of the way. The thought of going back to his life before boarding the Normandy sent an arid wind blowing through him. No, hopefully that particular Nihlus died along with Saren.

Humans needed to stop settling every frozen rock in the galaxy. Frozen wastelands didn't make for a very self-sustaining colony nor a very welcoming place to visit. Nihlus shivered as he sealed the faceplate on his helmet. When that didn't help, he cranked up his armour's heater. He cracked his neck, then pulled his shotgun and headed out, his team falling into formation behind him. Well, except for Kasumi. The moment she cloaked, he suspected that she'd taken off, eager to explore and check the empty homes for valuables.

Icy fingers walked up his spine, grabbing hold of it at the base of his skull. The silence felt almost alive, the air trembling with the ghosts of whatever had happened there. He rolled his shoulders, trying to shake it off. Superstitious nonsense wouldn't help them figure out how to respond to what happened. The colonists hadn't been spirited away by ghosts or evil spirits. The responsibility lie on very real, very mortal beings, and he needed to keep his wits about him to figure out where the Collectors were taking their captives.

He motioned for his team to take cover before he palmed the door control on the first prefab. Gun and gaze swept the room. "Clear." Relaxing his weapon down to low ready, Nihlus stepped inside, the grip on his spine tightening. Dishes still covered in food sat on the table, and the elements on the stove a few metres further in, glowed red.

Kaidan let out a slight hiss of breath that clouded the air in front of his face. Nihlus envied the human his tolerance for the cold. "Taken in the middle of dinner," Alenko said, his voice hushed. The lieutenant commander walked over to the table. "On Earth we have legends about disappearances like this." Turning away, he looked into Nihlus's eyes. "I used to read every one I could get my hands on." He winced. "Thought they were exciting."

Nihlus nodded, understanding what Alenko was feeling. Gesturing toward the far door with his shotgun, he said, "Let's move. Keep your eyes open for anything out of the ordinary." He glanced around. "Miss Goto, if you're still here, stay in visual range unless comms are restored."

"It never changes with you cops, always trying to cramp my style." The far door opened. "Don't worry, if there's something to find, I'll find it, Mr. Spectre Bossman."

Suppressing a grumbled response, Nihlus exited onto a metal walkway that rattled and banged under their boots. If anyone, friendly or not, remained, they knew company had arrived.

A set of stairs led down into a small open area. Nihlus headed out, staying close to cover until he swept the area. Nothing ... not even trash blowing in the wind. The silence and the wind reminded him of Noveria, particularly with his inner voice echoing the way Shepard had sounded—paranoid and skittish, expecting attack from everywhere despite seeing no enemies anywhere.

"No damage, no bodies, no blast marks … ." One of the Marines stopped in the middle of the courtyard and spun in a small circle, his assault rifle jumping up to his shoulder. "This place is so fucking wrong."

"Stow the chatter," Nihlus said, despite agreeing. His back muscles tightened as he looked over the day's work sitting abandoned, crates and building materials left where the colonists dropped them. He approached a loader, reaching in to check the ignition: still in the on position despite having run out of fuel. The leaden sky pressed down on him, each drifting snowflake piling up like boulders.

"Stop it," he grumbled to himself and pressed on. He paused at the top of a short ramp leading down to the large gate bisecting the massive stone wall at the far end. A second prefab stood off to his right. He turned to Alenko, the Marine already watching him, anticipating orders. Two quick hand signals sent the lieutenant commander and the twitchy gropo to check it out while the rest of them headed down to the gate.

Pain struck like lightning. Nihlus stumbled, almost going down on one knee, but caught himself against a pile of crates. Agonizing electricity spiked straight down through the top of his head to sizzle along his spine. A low moan spooled from his throat as he pressed a hand against his helmet and squeezed his eyes shut against the excruciating pressure. His brain felt as if the jolt had flash cooked it to a rapid boil.

"You okay, Mr. Bossman?" Kasumi's voice asked from off to his right.

He nodded, waving her off as he felt her close in on him. "I'm fine." Forcing his hand back to his side, he straightened.

_Pain. So much pain for so long. Years beyond count spent hiding, separated. Not meant to be this way. Never meant to be this way._

Nihlus spun around, searching for the source of the voice ... no, not one voice ... or at least not one mind ... but rather, a chorus of tiny minds, each adding a note, combining to form a single voice that bounced around the inside of his skull. The source of the pain? No. No, there needed to be a rational explanation. He turned to his team. They'd spread out, waiting for him to open the gate. None of them looked at him let alone spoke. So much for a easily explained, sane reason for hearing voices. Fuck, excellent bloody time to lose his damned mind.

The same flash he'd seen in the dream that told him Freedom's Progress had been attacked—a wall of snow glistening against the side of a mountain—raced through his mind, quick and sharp ... almost like a _preteril_ dashing from burrow to burrow under the predatory gaze of a _circling maraquil_. The pain retreated, chased away by the sinking in his belly. Great, he was back to snow calling for help. Amalair really needed to figure out a way to communicate that made sense. Not to mention finding a method that didn't feel like it tore his brain from his skull.

A thought chased the vision through, too quick to hold onto, but it felt like recognition ... as if whomever spoke in his head realized that he could hear them. He shook his head and forced his focus back on the mission as Alenko and Peterson exited the prefab. Nihlus stepped forward, a sudden gust of wind swirling the snow around his feet. What Shepard had called a wind devil centered around him, lifting the frozen crystals in a column that whirled around him for the span of five or six heartbeats before settling back to the ground.

Strange.

"Clear and empty," Alenko reported, pulling the Spectre's attention back where it belonged. "No sign of struggle and no evidence."

"There won't be." Nihlus gestured for everyone to take cover while he opened the gate. The moment the barrier fell bullets peppered his shields. Damn. He caught a glimpse of vaguely humanoid shapes. Mechs. He raced forward, diving into cover behind a stack of crates. At least that meant that someone managed to trigger security. He switched out the shotgun for his assault rifle. As he opened fire on the two LOKI mechs on a balcony opposite, he spotted K-rails set up in positions that looked as though they'd been used as cover. Had the colonists managed to mount a defense? Maybe the last few had tried to pull back to the spaceport.

The two LOKI's went down, but three more had already opened fire from another balcony on his right. Sprinting forward, he took cover behind the K-rails. The rest of his squad followed him in, Alenko lifting a FENRIS as it charged down the stairs. Damn. Nihlus opened fire on a second. He'd rather face down a pack of angry varren than a couple of FENRIS. Alenko's lift wore off, and as the mech dropped, Nihlus tossed a grenade at it.

"Overkill much?" Kasumi's voice asked from beside him, followed by a teasing chuckle.

"No such thing as overkill with those things," he replied as he lifted up, bringing one of the LOKI's down. Two of the mechs closed, pinning a pair of Marines behind cover. "Make yourself useful, and take one of those out," he ordered.

"Already on it." A second later, she appeared behind the far one, taking it down in a single blow.

Nihlus waited for her to vanish before opening fire on the last one, drawing it off the two pinned soldiers long enough for them to take it out.

'You see! You hear!' the strange choral voice rang over Nihlus's thoughts, bringing with it dizziness that time … almost euphoria … rather than pain. 'The black thrall rises. They hunger for power lost so long ago that even they forget, but you fight it.'

"Clear," Alenko called, pulling Nihlus away from the voice in his head.

The Spectre stood and strode around the K-rail. They needed to get through the damned colony and get out before he lost his mind completely. Moving with purpose, he ran up the stairs and into the next prefab.

He glanced back once he saw the building was clear. "Alenko, see if you can find out exactly what this colony's compliment of mechs was. I want to know what we've got waiting ahead of us." The prefab had been a bunk house, just rows of neatly made bunk beds lined along the one wall. A pair of lockers stood between each, but everything remained in place, untouched, right down to the weapons still locked up in the safes.

"Most of the computers on this network are a mess," Kaidan reported. "It's like someone went in and scrambled the hell out of them." He glanced up, his eyebrows raising as he shrugged. "Maybe to keep the Collectors from finding something?" He grumbled and pecked away at his omnitool. "Defenses took the heaviest hit from my saboteur, but it looks like at least twenty YMIR mechs … " One of the other Marines cursed. "... fifty or so FENRIS, at least one hundred LOKI, and that number of drones."

"Bloody hell," Peterson grumbled, "why does a colony the size of this one need that sort of firepower?" The human spun to face the entrance, his jumpiness making Nihlus nervous. One twitchy member could bring down the entire squad.

"This is the Terminus," Kaidan answered. "The colonies out here rejected Alliance security forces. Considering there were nearly a million people here … that's not a lot. Takes a lot of mechs, even the big ones, to equal a single human soldier's ability to plan and adapt." The lieutenant commander looked over at Nihlus. "We've seen what? Three FENRIS and ten LOKIs? That's a lot of resistance waiting ahead of us."

Nihlus took cover next to the door, hearing the sound of servos drifting on the wind as mechs closed in on them. "They'll be spread out through the colony, so we might run into a third of that number, but we need to stay sharp and quiet. Hand signals and a lot less chatter." He signaled for the others to take cover as he heard treads on the stairs outside the door.
"Alenko," he whispered, his voice a low hiss. When Kaidan looked at him, Nihlus signaled for him to keep an eye on Peterson. When Kaidan answered with a nod, the Spectre hit the door control.

The room dissolved into the chaos of battle, Alenko trying to keep the enemy out of the door with lifts and throws while the rest of them pounded the mechs with bullets. Knowing that a great many YMIRs awaited them, Nihlus held onto his remaining grenades in case he couldn't find more.

Alenko triggered his barrier, the action sparking an unexpected nostalgia. The crackle and tingle of the man's biotics took Nihlus back to fighting side by side with Saren. That sensation along his hide had once been as much a part of battle as the feel of his shotgun bucking in his hands.

Peterson and one of the other Marines, Wenslar, took wounds, the second requiring they pause for Alenko to close the wound and bind it in addition to medigel. Nihlus tried to send the woman back to the shuttle, but she refused, claiming that she was fine to continue on.

For the next half hour, they fought a constant, moving battle against the smaller mechs and drones. Moving far slower than Nihlus would have liked, they cleared home after home, scans revealing nothing to aid them. Not that Nihlus needed proof to know who was responsible or how they did it. Ashley locked that down for him. What he needed was proof he could show the galaxy to get them on board, and some means of tracking the Collectors down. Some samples of the damned insect-drones couldn't hurt either. They'd need a means of defending against them if they wanted to avoid being turned into Reaper paste after their first encounter.

They descended a long flight of stairs into an open area, filled with construction materials and crates. Only two routes led in or out: the stairs and a large gate at the far end. No mechs in sight, although he moved his people forward from cover to cover, leaving the wounded at the top of the stairs to cover them from above.

"Drones, incoming," Peterson whispered down. "A lot of them."

Twenty five assorted rocket and assault drones swooped down on the squad, some of them darting around above them like a flock of maraquil, some planting themselves on walls and pilings. Nihlus took cover on the lower balcony, keenly aware of the thin barrier of metal between him and the drones, particularly as rounds punched dents in the railing a hand's span from his head. It wouldn't stop them forever. The fight dragged on, he and Alenko using overload to bring down their shields, the rest of them whittling away with assault rifles.

"We need more people with biotic and tech combat training on the Normandy," Kaidan gasped as he lifted a hand to the back of his head. "I think I set my hair on fire throwing those last few."

Nihlus stood and leaned against the balcony railing. "We can't all dive into a drive core to get biotics, but we should have overload and sabotage on our omnitools." He made a note to bring that up to Garrus. Taking a deep breath, he looked over his squad. Exhausted, but resolute, they all nodded their readiness to move on. Peterson seemed to have calmed down, and Wenslar appeared to be moving well. He returned their nod and set out for the large gate. Without needing to be told, the squad spread out in pairs, taking cover.

Once they were all settled, Nihlus moved into cover on the right side of the gate then signalled Alenko to override the controls. The longer they stayed on that frozen rock, the heavier that dead sky pressed down, tightening the twist in his gut. He'd spent far too much time on dead worlds, battered by the screams of the terrified dead. No. Nihlus hadn't. He let out a bitter sigh as Merol's memories hung over him like a guillotine blade. Shaking his head, he pulled himself back to the present. His hand twitched, fighting the gravity of the flask on his thigh.
That was the last thing he needed. He leaned into the wall at his back, watching the gate drop into the ground.

"Hey, Mr. Bossman." Nihlus jumped and spun around to level his assault rifle on what looked like empty space but for the slight shimmer of Miss Goto's cloak. The thief chuckled. "You're jumpy for a Spectre." Her cloak reset, revealing her slight form for less than a second. "I scouted off to the west end of the colony. I didn't find anything other than a few mechs."

Nihlus grunted a vague acknowledgement and turned back. Footprints in the snow crossed the gate's threshold ahead of them, but then another freak gust of wind set the snow swirling, erasing them.

They wait! Empty places with guns. So much death costing so little.

Nihlus shook his head as if that could clear away the voice and concentrated his senses on the other side of the gate. They still hadn't run across a single YMIR, a fact that tugged at his plates. He closed his eyes, straining to hear or sense anything out of the ordinary. Nothing. He activated his omnitool and scanned the area ahead.

Still nothing. Not that twenty mechs couldn't be standing a few metres away, powered down and waiting. He glanced out to discover a large, empty space surrounded by prefabs. Cautious, every sense extended and keenly sharpened, he swung through the gate and stepped over the threshold, his assault rifle sweeping the area. Nothing. Not a mech or drone in sight.

His inner alarm began to shriek, but with nothing to blame it on, all he could do was keep moving forward. If something appeared, they'd deal with it. Taking position where he could cover the entire yard, he sent his people forward, moving them from cover to cover and then sending them in pairs to check out the buildings.

He and one of the Marines—Mendez, if he recalled correctly—headed toward the building at the far end of the little enclave. Transmission and reception towers covered the roof. Hope bloomed, hot and fierce in his chest. They might be able to shut the mechs down from there. And maybe, just maybe, the colony's security cameras managed to capture footage of what happened.

Two steps from the door, Mendez stopped and turned to look up into the low clouds and darkness. She pointed to a set of lights swooping down from orbit. "Incoming shuttle."

He watched for a second, then jerked his head toward their destination. "Keep moving." Even if the shuttle had markings to identify it, he'd never make them out in the dark. Best thing they could do was keep moving. No doubt they would meet up with their visitors at some point. If they proved friendly, it would make getting past the mechs a lot easier. That thought lifted the oppressive cloud of doom for the first time since they landed.

The lightness lasted until he put his foot on the first stair up to the building. The sound of mechs whirring to life filled the courtyard, swelling and echoing off the walls until it deafened him. Grabbing Mendez, he pulled her out of her stunned paralysis and shoved her up the stairs.

"Everyone inside!" he shouted then ran to obey his own command. A rocket ripped through the stairs behind him and sent him tumbling in the door. "Close it!" he called, scrambling on all fours to the window. Crouching, he lifted up just far enough to peer out. Three YMIRs stomped into a line down the front of the building and opened fire. Nihlus threw himself to the floor as the window above him exploded from its frame and flew across the room. Mendez hit the deck a fraction of a second before losing the top half of her head.
Nihlus's heartbeat slammed in his ears and at the base of his throat. Too fucking close. The sound of the machines' mass accelerator cannons began to wind down, which meant two things. He scooted across the floor, grabbed Mendez again and shoved her toward the door. The two of them didn't stand a chance against three of those monsters. He flattened out on the floor and covered both their heads as the inside of the building exploded. Shrapnel pelted their shields, then silence fell for a half second while the mechs changed back to their cannons.

Letting out his breath with a hearty grunt, Nihlus scrambled up into a crouch. He leaned close to Mendez's ear, keeping his voice to a barely audible whisper. "The next time they change to missiles, we hit the door, go straight down the ramp and across to the next building. Understood?"

The Marine nodded, swiping at a rivulet of blood that ran down her cheek. A deep scowl puckered her brow, and he could see her jaw working as she ground her teeth. Good. Angry and ready to rip mechs apart with her bare hands was good. He prepared to bolt.

"Nihlus, do you read?"

It took the Spectre a second to make out the call through the ringing in his ears. Comms, thank the spirits. He raised his hand to his radio. "Alenko. Sitrep."

"Petersen and I are pinned down behind crates along the back wall. There has to be a dozen of those damned things out there. We're going to get shredded unless we can get into some decent cover." The lieutenant commander's voice sounded understandably tense, but calm. Not that Nihlus expected anything less.

"They're fucking everywhere, man," Petersen hollered in the background.

"Hey, Bossman," Kasumi said, joining the channel, "your building isn't going to take much more punishment. The supports to the top section are about to go. You need to move. The building closest to the gate is the most heavily fortified. I can cover you with flashbangs, draw them toward the gate for a minute or so. You'll have to move fast."

"Understood." Nihlus reached up for the door control as the mechs wound down, preparing to launch their missiles. "Alenko, you copy that?"

"Affirmative. We'll be ready to move."

Nihlus hit the control a second before he heard Kasumi start taunting the mechs. "Head straight for the crates, move from cover to cover," he told Mendez as he sprinted over the threshold. Keeping the Marine in front of him, he leaped down the stairs, racing for a large stack of crates. The far end of the yard exploded in a series of bright flashes and concussive blasts that left his head ringing, but the mechs turned toward the disruption.

They made it to the stairs and, pushing Alenko and Petersen ahead of them, in the door.

Guyliev waved them over. "Help us push these bunks in front of the windows. Once they figure out that we're all in here, they'll tear it apart."

The damned bunks weighed a lot more than it looked like they should, taking all six of them pulling and pushing to scrape it across the floor.

"I'm out," Kasumi called in Nihlus's ear. "Going—"

The door on the left hand side of the building exploded in, the metal tearing like tin foil as the blast ripped Nihlus off his feet and slammed him into the end of a bunk. His right arm bashed into one of the metal supports a second before his helmet hit and blinding light exploded inside his head. He impacted the side of the bed and slumped to the floor. After a few seconds of lying there, stunned into immobility, he tried to push himself up, but no matter how hard he tried, he couldn't harangue any of his body parts into obeying.

"Nihlus!" Kaidan crouched next to him. "Kasumi, Mendez, Peterson, watch that door." The bright orange of Alenko's omnitool registered through the thick, vibrating haze that covered Nihlus's vision. "Damn, that's a skull fracture." The lieutenant commander pinned Nihlus to the floor with a knee on his shoulder. "Stay still."

Groaning, Nihlus pushed at the Marine. He needed to get up. They needed to pull back, regroup.

"Don't move," Kaidan repeated. "I've got to check on Guyliev."

As soon as Alenko moved away, Nihlus tried to haul himself up off the floor, but his arm collapsed, the armour and bone shattering like porcelain beneath a heavy boot. Pain blossomed in slow motion, fighting its way through the fog that bogged down his thoughts. Then movement outside the door pushed everything else aside, and frantic talons scrabbled for his rifle, the gun lying a metre or so away. Damned mechs were punching through. Dragging himself across the floor, he managed to wrap his talons around the weapon. Then people leaped in the hole where the door had been, taking positions in the window to fire out

The shuttle they'd seen coming in. He let out a faint sigh of relief; they seemed friendly.

"Start pulling these people out," a female voice yelled over the roar of guns. As Nihlus lifted his head from the floor, he saw her hit the deck, a rocket streaking over her head to blow a bunk bed into shrapnel. "Sweet baby Jesus ... too close." She clambered back into cover and leaned out, tossing grenades into the cluster of mechs. Grabbing at her belt, her hand came away empty.

Quick, head darting almost bird-like, she scanned the room, locking on the grenades still attached to his armour. Scrambling over, she plucked them from his belt, muttering, "Sorry about this."

Returning to the window, she tossed the grenades out.

"Miranda, bypass that weapon locker," she hollered over her shoulder. "We need rocket or grenade launchers." She pulled a large weapon off her back. "Everyone, heavy cover. Now! Get the wounded back. I have no fucking idea what this thing will do."

"Shepard?" Alenko called. "What the hell? Shepard?"

"See to your wounded, Sparky," was all she said as she stood to fire the big, awkward looking gun. "Damned thing needs a shorter priming time," she yelled as bullets impacted her shields, but then lightning arced from the end. She ducked back into cover. "All hail the blessed Enkindlers and just call me Zeus. This baby is a keeper!" She stood, firing lightning at the mechs again.

"Al," the small woman—Shepard?—shouted when she took cover again, "grab the big guy. I'll give you a hand in a second."

Nihlus stared, trying to see through the haze of vibration and flashing lights. She moved quick and rough, limping heavily, but not letting it impede her as she ducked into cover next to the huge hole in the prefab's wall. She and two others provided cover while the rest of her team helped the Alliance personnel past the distracted mechs and toward the gate.

Rough hands grabbed Nihlus, hauling him up off the floor. "Move it, Spectre," a raspy, dual-toned voice grumbled, "unless you want to become a permanent addition to this frozen hell."
Nihlus leaned heavily on the other turian, still not quite registering anything happening around him. Voices and movement all seemed to slur into one another and it took all his concentration just to keep one foot moving then the other.

Then the snowy ground flew up, slamming him straight in the face. He groaned and tried to pull his broken arm out from under him, the pain returning full force.

"Al! You okay?"

"Yeah, fine," the turian grumbled. "I just took a couple rounds on the leg. Keep moving."

The woman ran past Nihlus. "Come on, Sparky, get these people pulled back!" The small shape grabbed Nihlus by the wrist and dragged him toward the gate. "Stop gawking at me and move your ass, soldier ... before we all end up as casualties."

"We need assistance!" A deep, musical male voice shouted.

"More of the big ones coming in from the far end, Shepard!" a woman shouted, sticking her head in the end door. Her long, black hair whipped around her head in the wind. "Leave the wounded. We can take care of them once we get these mechs shut down."

Shepard shook her head. "No, we get the wounded back behind the gate. If we move fast, you can dig in at this end, and I'll make a run for the security building, shut the rest of them down."

The Spectre tried to concentrate on the fast talking, fast moving soldier, but even as she pulled him toward safety, her other hand waved across his vision, directing her people.

"Jack, pick up that rocket launcher and get inside." Nihlus's saviour dropped him behind the gate and ran back in. He pushed himself up, wobbling as he leaned on one elbow, his vision still blurred and shaky.

The soldier … Shepard … her clone or imitation … whatever … popped out of cover and tossed two grenades at the closest YMIR. "Miranda, you go with her. Every time that bastard shifts from bullets to rockets, overload it and then hit it hard and fast with the rockets. Javik. Liara. Al. Stay in cover, try to pull the rest of them to the other end of the yard."

She glanced his way, then looked over at Alenko. "You got this? You can get them out of here?"

The lieutenant commander nodded, looking as dumbstruck as Nihlus felt.

"Good luck." The fake Shepard ran to the gate control. "Vincent, give me cover while I fry this bitch. We need to give Sparky's people a chance to evac." The gate closed, a shower of sparks erupting from the control panel, and she was gone.

Alenko crouched next to Nihlus. "Can you walk with help?" He injected medigel, the shot slowly pushing back the pain and cloudiness. The orange glow appeared above Nihlus again.

"Was that Shepard?" Nihlus asked, wincing at the slur in his voice.

Kaidan shook his head, a helpless sort of shrug answering the Spectre's question. "She's beat to hell, but it looked like her, and she called me Sparky ... but hell ... . Shepard's dead." He shook his head again, then gave Nihlus another shot. "Okay, come on. We need to get everyone back to the shuttle."

"I've got the bossman," Kasumi said, appearing a couple of metres away. "You help the others."
Nihlus let Alenko help him to his feet, then wrapped an arm around Kasumi's shoulders for the hobbling retreat to the shuttle. As they headed back up the ramp, he kept his eyes on the gate, the emotions and sensations of his dream rising up around him, thick and heady and sweet. He closed his eyes for a moment, just listening to the sounds of battle, that voice calling out orders replete with sweet baby Jesuses and Enkindlers’ glowing backsides. Common sense told him clone or duplicate, but somewhere deep in his gut, hope kindled.

Shepard?

Chapter End Notes

A-N: So, the Dragon Age and Mass Effect Big Bangs have eaten up my time far more than I anticipated. However, the good news is that although I didn't get chosen by an artist in the MEBB, I did get the first five chapters of the Third Act written, so they will be ready to go up when the time comes. So … yeah, finally, a chapter. And it's Chapter 99. Thank you to those who have read and supported me for the past 98 chapters. :D
Shepard stared at the closed gate for the space of five heartbeats, a wistful grin spreading across her face. Damn, Sparky looked good, the years had done well by him. Barbed and howling, exile scraped through her, a desolate wind clawing for purchase. 'You belong with him and Anderson,' it demanded. 'Go after them!' But then a set of twin mass accelerator cannons pelted her position, shattering any chance of a reunion. She bolted for the nearest crate, her ass plowing the light snow as she hit the ground and slid the last two meters. Flashbangs detonated within every canyon carved into her skin, the pain blinding and deafening her for a handful of seconds.

"Sweet baby Jesus, Vincent, I thought I said cover me!" she hollered into her comms.

"To give you time to close the gate, not daydream about your Alliance novio," came the reply from over behind a pile of crates. "And I could use some back up over here."

Shepard scrambled up off the ground, feeling like a gopher as she popped up to look over her crate, the three mechs closing on his position confirming his peril. Damn. They needed to throw the mechs off for a few seconds, let him get to better cover.

"We've got about five minutes before these metal fucks mash us into paste," Jack shouted. The tattooed beauty's head appeared above the bottom of the window. A second later a shockwave pounded through the YMIIR line, staggering two of them enough to give Shepard a chance to move.

Shepard bolted past the closest mechs and dove in behind new cover. She glanced up at the comm shed, judging how long she needed to cover the distance. Damn, the prefab had already taken a hell of a pounding, and the second level hung precariously, supported by only one pillar ... not exactly stable. It wouldn't take much more punishment. She needed to keep the mechs' fire directed elsewhere for a couple of minutes.

"Miranda," she called into her radio, "set your overload for max area. You and I'll fry the mechs closing on Vincent." She popped up to assess the ever-changing conditions. "When we do that, Javik, and Liara, heavy warp. Vincent, hit them with your carnage and then run for their shed. Jack, once the armour is compromised, bounce those fuckers to the blessed Enkindlers' light."

Jack whooped, a deep throaty celebration of mayhem. "Fuck yeah!"

"It'll make for one hell of a boom!" Vincent crowed.

Shepard cued up her overload, setting it to arc between enemies. "Roger that. On three ... one ... two ... three." After discharging her overload, Shepard leaped up and ran for the communications shed, not sparing a glance for the Vesuvius of combined powers erupting behind her. At least one of the mechs exploded, Jack's raw, glorious bray of fury soaring above the explosions.

Crumpling all her broken bits into a tight coil, Shepard launched herself over the twisted remains of stairs. Mid-hop, terror flared as a brilliant firework ripped through the darkness, ravenous for the taste of charred and shredded flesh. The rocket scorched the air so close to her neck that the skin erupted into blisters. Then fire ... whirling and churning, limbs flailing through smoke and flame … tumbling amidst a maelstrom of stone and metal. The blast slammed her through the melted pretzel of the railing and into the doorframe. The first impact drove the air from her lungs and rattled everything inside her head loose. The last tumbled her through the door and sent her sliding across the floor on her belly. Three blissful seconds of ringing, stunned oblivion exploded, every cell of her being shrieking with the cries of the flayed and damned.

A high, shrill howl of pain sliced between clenched teeth as she forced herself up onto her hands and knees. As her scream exhausted itself, a death wail of tearing metal ripped through the prefab, the building convulsing and crumbling around her. Shepard tipped over onto one hip, looking up to watch a massive tear open across the ceiling, revealing the dark, cloudy sky. Mesmerized by the kaleidoscope of falling snow, black lightning, and silver sparks streaking across her vision, Shepard stared, oblivious to her peril until another wail of rending metal kicked her survival instinct in the ass.

This whole place is going to come down on your head in about thirty seconds, Janey. Get up. You can push through it.

Blinded by pain, Shepard relied on muscle memory to slap her medigel. She waited until it deployed, then hit the control again before heaving herself up off the floor and looking for her goal. There. The computer station at the far end of the shed. It remained intact, at least what she could see of it seemed to be. Keeping low, Shepard hobbled toward the computer. The entire building swung back and forth with her pulse, the world silent but for a low ringing. Dizzy, blind, and nearly deaf, she tripped over something, instinctively sticking out her arms to break her fall. Both wrists and hands screamed as she landed. Glancing back, she saw a small white blob. A med kit?

Sweet baby Jesus, let it be a medkit.

Greedy for some … any … relief from the igneous torture ... she snatched at the patch of white, missing a couple of times when it ducked away at the last second. On the fourth whack she managed to grab hold.

Please, please, let this be a med kit.

She dragged it onto her lap and opened it, fumbling with the clasp. Hands shaking so hard she could barely hang onto the damned thing, she wrenched it open. Pain roared like the surf, a hurricane smashing her entire body against the rocks. It was a medkit. Praise the blessed Enkindlers. Rooting through, tossing aside bandages and other unnecessaries, she pocketed the medigel … then … at the bottom … syringes. She pulled one out and shoved the rest of the kit off her legs.

Janey, you know what this means.

Shepard scowled, her right arm snapping out to keep her from tipping over. Obsidian splinters, sharper and more cruel than glass sliced into her arm. Either the rocket, or the impact afterward had torn open her wounds … all of them. She sagged over onto one elbow to steady herself enough to take the cap off.

Taking painkillers didn't mean anything, except being functional.

Janey, you've worked way too hard to slide back down that hole. Just clench your teeth and bull through it.

"Shepard, come in. Where the hell are you? We're getting fucking shredded out here!"

Jack's cry pulled the cap and shoved the syringe into the port on her armour.

It means saving my people.

"Miranda!" Vincent hollered. "Al, can you get to her? I'm pinned."

"I'm trying. There's two between … ."

Vincent and Al hit the plunger together.

Relief spread through her veins, blissful and cool, ice water over fevered skin. As the agony calmed, Shepard took her first full breath and clenched her fists a couple of times to help steady their shaking. Her vision cleared, and she eyed the rest of the syringes. It'd be a few minutes before she knew if she'd taken enough to solve the problem. She reached over for the kit and grabbed the rest, shoving them into her belt pouch.

Just in case. Who knew how much of a fight lay ahead.

An explosion near the door collapsed the last pillar. The shed let out a piercing, metallic death scream, the far end tearing and buckling under the weight of the second floor. Shepard scrambled toward the computer station on all fours, and crawled up into the chair. She blinked a couple of times, then rubbed her eyes, trying to clear her vision enough to deal with electronics.

Okay. Power. She needed power. Frantic hands moved over the controls. One hand leaped up to scratch the deep line around her mouth with the pad of her thumb.

Damn it. No power. She just needed enough to send a single command.

Shoving the chair back, she slithered off to lie beneath the console. She fabricated a screwdriver on her omnitool and used it to pry open the panel. A mess of shorts and mangled wires greeted her.

"Well, at least the console still has power," she muttered, diving in. "Of course, that means probably electrocuting myself." As she started jury-rigging power to the vital systems, she saw that the wires had been cut rather than torn apart by destructive force. Sabotage. Someone had tried to make sure no one could access the computer. She rubbed her eyes again, trying to get them to focus on the myriad of tiny building blocks. At least the meds pushed the pain back enough that the fog lifted, her pulse no longer making everything throb to its beat.

She clenched her fists a couple more times, then dove back in. Just needed to take the power from the backups, reroute it through … damn, the saboteur thought of that. Okay, so through the secondary … good, that one remained intact. Three minutes and two slight electrical burns later, Shepard scrambled up, a grim smile of satisfaction greeting the booting system.

She dove into the security systems … dammit, all security protocols had been locked down. A low, frustrated growl rumbled from her throat as she clenched her teeth and started a bypass. Whoever set the mechs loose really didn't want anyone getting into the computer or shutting down
"Shepard! What the hell are you doing in there?" Vincent yelled. "We're pinned and this damned building is coming down. Whatever you're doing, get it done!"

Finished the bypass, Shepard sent the shutdown command to the mechs throughout the colony, and was rewarded by a sudden silence in the yard. A wave of concern followed a sharp wash of relief, and Shepard lifted her hand to her radio. "How's everyone doing out there?" She held her breath.

"All present and accounted for," Al answered. "A few of us have more holes in us than we started with, but nothing critical." Shepard heard muttering and then Miranda's voice, strident and insistent, before he spoke again. "Miranda took the worst hit, but she's up and thrashing everyone who tries to help her."

"I am not thrashing anyone. Just let me get up, the ground is freezing. Give me back my armour."

Shepard grinned as she heard the operative's voice. Miranda couldn't be that badly hurt. Satisfied that her people would be all right, she pulled the chair over to the computer and started sorting through what amounted to an impressively thorough muck up job on the security systems. What was her saboteur trying to hide? The surveillance camera archives took the worst hit. Hope sparked and flared. Some evidence, maybe?

She reached up to her radio. "Miranda? In the other attacks, the surveillance camera footage was all wiped, right?"

The operative answered, but from the doorway on Shepard's right. "Yes, no evidence was found." She hobbled over the threshold to stand just behind Shepard's shoulder. "This building is coming down, Shepard. We need to move."

The captain shook her head. "This computer was disabled, and someone did a hatchet job on the camera files." She pointed to the monitor. "There are just tiny pieces left in a few hundred file locations." Opening her omnitool, she started keying in commands, then glanced up at the operative, bludgeoning her with annoyance. "If this is what passes for state of the art in your organization, I'll need to go market for my omnitool." She winced as she continued working. "This is sad. I want my baby back, and you probably tossed it."

Miranda shook her head. "No omnitool was recovered with your body, Shep—"

Letting out a heavy, grinding screech the whole building bucked hard enough to send Shepard's chair rolled across the floor. The far end collapsed another meter or so, ripping the ceiling open like tin foil.

Miranda pressed closer, either seeking shelter or believing that the looming pressure could speed Shepard up. "What are you doing?" she asked, her tone hard and clipped, clinging to the professional edge of panic.

"Writing an elegant and complex little piece of code to try to assemble these fragments into something useful, so shut it, and let me work." As Shepard's fingers flew over the interface with all of her old skill and confidence, a smile crept up on her, spreading across her face until the sharp sting of her wounds halted its progress. She had to hand it to Miranda and the rest of the Frankenstein team … they'd brought her back damned near functional. If she'd slept until healed, she probably never would have known she died.

She finished and hit the control to compile her nifty little program. When that finished, she downloaded it into the console then sat back. "Shouldn't take too long. Depends on how she fragmented the data." Seeing the way the operative kept eyeballing the far end of the prefab, Shepard nodded toward the door. "Go, help the others search the rest of the colony. I'll catch up as soon as I'm done here."

Miranda hesitated for a half second, but then gave Shepard a starched nod and limped back out the door.

At the two minute mark, video footage appeared on one of the secondary monitors. Shepard pushed out of the chair and braced against the console, leaning into the computer as the chilling, but not unexpected last minutes of the colony played out. Insectile stasis drones flitted across the screen like dead leaves, tumbling and swirling through the air. Beyond that, Collectors carried frozen colonists to pods and sealed them inside. A steady line of the pods floated on zero g fields out of frame. A million colonists … a million pods. That meant one hell of a huge ship, maybe two. So … tally on Collector cruisers … three, possibly four.

Shepard folded back into her chair, a heavy scowl weighing down her brow as Tashac's memories stepped forward. Millions of Collectors spread across the galaxy by the end of the war. Obviously, they'd survived through the millennia, but where? Shepard had heard stories about them … that they traded tech for people … one that seemed all too plausible given current events. They came from and disappeared to parts unknown. Rumours said they used the Omega IV relay, another plausible stretch.

"I'm going to try to capture one of the little drones."

Shepard bolted upright in her chair as a face appeared in the secondary monitor. A middle aged woman held up a tool box.

"From what I've seen, they're the key to whatever is happening to people. Wish me luck."

The camera followed her to the door, zooming in to maintain focus. Shepard stood, her fingers pressed against the edge of the console, heart pounding. The woman hesitated at the door, listening. Shepard held her breath, straining to hear what was going on outside the shed. The door at the end opened, the woman stuck the box outside, snapped it shut and then closed the big door. She held the box to her ear then let out a faint cry of victory and fried the lock with her omnitool.

"I caught one or two," she said, looking at the camera. The air left Shepard's lungs in a long whoosh, her shoulders collapsing as the muscles relaxed. After a second of looking around, the woman turned to her left. "I'm going to hide them. I hope whoever comes here … that you find this recording. We aren't the first taken, and we're certainly not going to be the last." She crouched down next to a set of cupboards, dragged out all the contents, then shoved the box in to the back. When she placed everything back inside the cupboard, she ran to the console. "I can hear them outside, trying to get in the door." Glancing back, she whined, a soft mewl low in her throat. "They're going to get in." Shepard reached up, shaking fingers extended toward the monitor.

The woman turned to look at the camera. "They're taking us alive. What do they want with us?" The banging at the door got louder. "Dear God, what are they going to—"

The recording fragmented and disappeared.

Shepard stared at the monitor where that terrified, helpless face had appeared moments before. Her fingers drifted back to the top of the console, a slow, aching sorrow lighting a fire deep in her belly. The next second, panic bloomed sharp and jagged, squelching it. It was all too damned huge and terrifying. Why had Miranda's people brought her back? Why hadn't they just left her in peace? She didn't need to be the one to fight the monsters. She really didn't. What was so fucking special about her? The galaxy needed someone braver, someone stronger … anyone … anyone other than Jane Gwendolyn Shepard and her circus of fears and nightmares.

"Rest of the colony is just more of the same, Shepard," Al said in her ear, his raspy voice throwing a crash barrier in front of Shepard's runaway mako. "Just mechs and ... nothing."

Shoving the pity party out of her head, Shepard straightened, one hand lifting to her ear as she turned to look for the cupboard. "Roger that. I think I've got something here. Rendezvous back at the shed, we'll head for the shuttle. Shepard out."

Taking a deep breath, she crossed the few metres of floor. Her fears spoke the truth. It didn't need to be her to face the Reapers. Any number of people could do it … some of who would fight at her side. However, for whatever reason, that fight had chosen her, and no matter how hard she shook in her boots or her much her hands trembled, she'd see it through. She would … for all the terrified, helpless people who found the courage to spend their last seconds fighting back.

The fire returned, burning away the panic as she caught sight of the cupboard, half-crushed under the collapsing ceiling. Shepard crouched, shuffling under the wreckage, one hand braced against a pretzeled beam, the other stretching in to grab the door handle. The front of the cabinet broke free with just a tug, but everything had shifted toward the crushed end, out of reach.

"Oh, I don't want to go under there," she groaned, a wary glare examining the fragile house of metal cards stacked above her head. Taking a deep breath, she edged forward, stretching as long as she could manage. "I'm going to end up a red splat under all this crap," she bitched, her voice tight with the strain of her reach. Edging forward, she managed to grab a blanket, then another couple of centimetres, she caught another medkit and sent it spinning across the floor. Then two more medkits … then the toolbox. Shepard scrabbled at the plastic case with her fingertips, managing to inch it up the cupboard floor.

"Just about … ." All the muscles along her left side seized in one massive charlie horse. Letting out a yelp, Shepard lunged after the damned tool kit, then threw herself backward, away from the rubble, clutching her prize to her chest.

The odd vibration from inside the box told her everything she needed to know about whether the little drones were still viable. "Excellent." She laid down on her side and stretched out until the muscle spasms eased. Sitting up, she set the toolbox to one side and picked up the scattered medkits. Just in case. She took the medigel and painkillers from each, stuffing them into her belt pouch.

"Shepard?" Al looked in the door, one brow plate rising when he saw her lying on the floor. "Taking a nap?"

"Yep." She climbed to her feet, slow and stiff. "I feel like a rocket slammed me through a railing and into a doorframe," she said, groaning and stretching a little. "I hurt everywhere." After bending over to retrieve the toolbox, she limped back to the console. "Here," she said, holding out the box. "Hold this, but don't open it. Someone caught a drone or two." She sagged against the console for a moment before thumping down into the chair. "She recorded the abductions too."

The orange glow of her omnitool hurt her eyes as she activated it, then winced away, squinting as she keyed in the download. Having some proof of what was happening to all those people certainly couldn't hurt when facing down the Alliance and the council. A shudder rumbled down her spine like a carriage on a rollercoaster. The Alliance … the council … she'd have to convince them that she was alive again … then back to the political bullshit of trying to get them ready for the
"You fall asleep over there?" Al called, edging toward the door, the box held out in front of him like he thought it would bite.

Shepard grinned, his expression pulling her straight out of that dark quagmire. "Sort of … I started thinking about the council and trying to imagine how … 'Hi! I'm alive!' is going to go." Her omnitool chimed to let her know that the download was complete. Relief settled all the twitchy, aching bits of her. Time to get the hell out of Dodge. She walked to the door and took the box from his hands. "Let's go."

The rest of the squad were waiting at the back gate, apparently not wanting to return to the courtyard for fear the mechs might suddenly wake up. Moving slowly to accommodate Miranda's unwillingness to let anyone help her, they returned to the space port via a residential district. The empty, lit windows felt haunted, as though all the occupants remained at home, staring out those blanks windows, pounding and screaming for someone, anyone to see or hear them.

Shepard hadn't thought that a Kodiak could look welcoming until she spotted it, and warm, heady relief flooded through her. "Suppose it says something for how creepy a place is when the thought of going back to a new ship where you know only a couple of people and trust none of them is a welcoming option." Shepard looked over at her small gaggle of strange misfits. Liara was trying to convince Miranda to get in the shuttle, while the operative struggled to get everyone else in first.

"Shepard, let's go," Miranda called, waving the captain in. "I know that one of those Marines was a friend, but I don't want to risk all of us being arrested before we even get this mission off the ground."

Shepard let out a long breath. Yeah, Sparky might just arrest her. As far as he knew, Jane Shepard died almost two years ago. She could be anyone, and he was Mr. Straight and Narrow. Still, she waved Miranda off and turned to look for Al. He was walking the other way, confirming her suspicion that his time with her had come to an end. That made her inexplicably sad, all things considered. He'd been an ally in a place where she'd trusted precious little.

Before she followed him, she waved Liara over and passed her the toolbox. "There are samples of the drones in here," she warned the asari. "Don't open it."

Liara shook her head, her eyes getting big. "If we had a safe on the shuttle, I'd lock them in it." Her hands clamped around the small box. "Trust me, after I'm done hanging on to this thing, they might never get it open."

Shepard chuckled and squeezed the asari's shoulder. At least one trusted friend remained. Although, who knew how long Liara would stay. She had a life and an empire to get back to. Pushing that aside to worry about later, Shepard turned to follow Al, her feet dragging. The pain meds kept the agony down to a dull roar, but they intensified her exhaustion.

The turian walked up to the edge of the canal, talons poised right along the edge, and looked up at the sky. "This is where I take my leave of you, Shepard," he said, no doubt hearing her footsteps crunch through the snow. His hood glanced around as she stepped up to his side.

Shepard nodded. An odd combination of relief and regret tickled the back of her throat. At least the strength and purpose in his voice gave her hope for his future out in the galaxy on his own. She looked down into the black water, the fat snowflakes so very white as they drifted down to disappear at its surface. After a couple of minutes, she shivered despite the heater in her armour pumping out plenty of warmth. Of course, the chill had nothing to do with the cold.
It's the damned silence, Janey. Unnatural.

No … it wasn't the silence, either. It was that feeling of being watched … of voices crying out to be heard. She closed her eyes, stretching out … trying to hear them. Maybe she wasn't just being superstitious, maybe somewhere survivors found a hiding place? Some strange sixth sense telling her not to leave them?

A sharp, disproving voice drew her attention back to Miranda, the operative trying to convince Jack and Javik to head back to the ship. Jack wanted to keep searching, almost frantic in her need to find someone alive. That, more than anything, convinced Shepard she needed the volatile biotic on her team. The fight against the Collectors and Reapers require that sort of fire. Javik … Shepard sighed … Javik just wanted to find something to kill. She fought down a broad, unkind grin. Mechs must have proven such a disappointing enemy to the avatar of jackassery.

"Down girl," she muttered to Tashac as the vitriol threatened to escalate. "You did have three children with the gasin." She caught Al watching her and shrugged off her odd behaviour. Shivering again, she wrapped her arms around herself, rubbing her armour as if it actually affected the chill.

She turned to look over the deserted settlement and nudged him with her elbow. "Well, if you're leaving me, I guess we need to find you some transport off this rock." She nodded toward the spaceport where the shuttle waited to return her to her brand new ship. She didn't know how she felt about that yet. The SR2 still needed a name; bad luck to sail a boat with no name.

She strode toward the line of now ownerless ships, her limp heavy. No need to act when she felt as though she lurched across a field of javelins, crashing through and impaling herself with every step.

"It felt good to be fighting again," the torin said, his voice low but filled with rediscovery. "No implants, no ridiculous, overpowered strength or reflexes, just my muscle, bone, and biotics." He chuckled. "And my gun." He glanced over at her, his rheumy eyes brighter than she'd seen them, the broken and shadowed planes of his face far less hollow-looking. He'd be okay.

"Pain … so many in pain … separated … alone. The many never meant to be alone."

Shepard stopped and turned a small circle. "Did you hear that?" she whispered, one hand drifting up to press against her temple. A sharp splinter of pain stabbed into both temples and the base of her skull. Wincing away from the agony that made it through her shot of painkillers, she sent thanks to the makers of the miraculous meds. Without them, it would have driven her to her knees.

Al's mandibles fluttered, distressed, and he nodded as he blinked rapidly. "I heard something. Couldn't make it out."

"The black thrall rises," the many voices spoke in one voice. "It's touched you … the pain … so much pain, but you fought it!" The joy in the last burst within Shepard's chest, the ferocity of it nearly as painful as the icepicks in the brain. "You broke free."

She turned toward the canal, and beyond that the cliffs of stone. "It's … I think it's coming from … ." Shepard walked toward the canal, the snow swirling around her, pulling in tighter and thicker with each step until she had to squint, an arm held in front of her eyes. The snow impacted like tiny rocks rather than ice, cold, but they didn't melt upon touching her skin.

"What's going on?" She stopped, and stumbling back a couple of steps as the world ahead of her shifted … changed into another location entirely. She held a hand out behind her. "Al?" His fingers closed around hers, and she felt him stiffen, his grip tightening until her knuckles ground together.
Shepard blinked a couple of times, but the view didn't change. Instead of the sheer grey-black walls of the quarry she saw snow banked against rock cliffs, glittering like a pile of diamonds.

"Help ... please." The voice seemed to come from the snow, but she didn't hear it, it appeared in her mind.

"Come out. Let me see you," she called, wincing as the wind picked up, pelting her with the impossibly hard flakes.

"We are here. Come, please."

Al's hand pulled at her, leading her on, his wonder as palpable as the dread curling through her gut. Far too many different forces, none of them kind, had played around in her head. Shepard followed, hesitant and slow, unable to see outside the squall that swirled around her. Images flashed through her mind …

… Banks of snow glistening on a hundred planets …

… salt mines, abandoned for longer than the human race had existed …

… caves filled with crystal glistening in a thousand hues … .

All of them whispered softly, hundreds, thousands, hundreds of thousands of tiny voices … voices so small that alone they didn't even form thought.

Shepard stopped and pulled back hard against Al's hand, pressing the other over her eyes to block out the dizzying swirl of glinting madness. Frustration and sadness welled up as she covered her vision. It wasn't hers, and she shoved it away. No! No one and nothing was allowed to possess her … not anymore.

"I don't understand," she shouted. "What are you trying to tell me?" She could feel the crystalline storm pick up fury at her inability to understand. What she knew could not be snowflakes pelted her with enough force to pierce the sealant over her wounds, embedding themselves into her flesh.

"Stop!" she screamed out loud, yanking free of Al to cover her face with both arms. And then he wrapped around her, using his cloak to shelter her. She leaned into him, dizzy and weak … her face feeling as though it were on fire.

"You must help! You broke the darkness. You defeated the old masters." The voices moaned softly as if trying to find a way to answer her question. "Picture. Reach," they said at last. "Please. Reach across."

The image of her omnitool formed in her mind as she reached, trying to do as they asked. After all, its translation program was what made communicating with most members of the other races possible. The voices sang with joy and a sense of purpose, as if she'd finally given them a way to breach the gap. The tempest died away, leaving her breathless and deaf. After a few seconds, Al eased back to reveal that the whirlwind of snow had stopped as well.

Shepard let her arms drop, her right feeling heavier than before. Looking down, she let out a soft, startled gasp. "Al?"

"Shepard," he answered, his voice high and tight. "Look down." He backed away from her a little, his entire physicality changing from careful, pained swagger to tightrope walker on a windy day.

His sudden alarm snapped her attention away from her arm to look at the ground … there was no ground beneath their feet. Instead, they both stood on a clear, crystalline walkway halfway over the canal. He turned, his arms reaching out for balance on the narrow ramp. "They were taking us to the mountains," he said, pointing. "Maybe they were trying to show us where they are?"

"Shepard!" Miranda's shout sounded as though it should be followed by, 'Are you getting into trouble, young lady? Just you wait until I tell your father what you've been up to'.

Shepard ignored the operative and held up her arm. "It gets weirder. When it told me to reach across … to understand them, I thought of my omnitool … of how it allows me to communicate." She stared at the wide, thick band of the same clear, crystalline material that made up the walkway. "Look at this." Without waiting for him to turn back, she reached up with her other hand to touch it. It was as smooth and solid as diamond.

"Shepard, we have incoming Alliance ships," Steve called on her comms. "Good news is, we have comms back. Bad news is, we've got a very short window to get out of town before the law moves in."

Shepard cursed and then raised her hand to her radio. Too many mysteries remained unsolved. What had created the ramp and the thing on her arm? And how? Damn it, and now she had to run. She hated running. Opening the channel, she grumbled, "Understood, LT. We're on our way back."

She looked up at Al, but before she could speak, his hand closed on her shoulder. "Go," he said, his eyes locking on hers. "I'm going to follow the leads in those visions we saw. I know that salt mine. Maybe I can figure out what the voices want. I'll keep in touch."

Shepard reached out to take his hand. "Thank you for everything." She backed away a step. "Take care of yourself. No more dying and being captured by renegade organizations." A teasing grin accompanied the warning.

His mandibles flicked. "Same goes for you." He nodded toward Miranda. "Better go before Dr. Frankenstein loses her temper."

Shepard turned away and limped along the few metres of the ramp, hurrying into an uneven jog once she hit solid ground. The rest of the squad were already belted into their seats when she stepped up and turned back, raising a hand to wave good-bye.

Al just nodded and headed down the length of the spaceport toward a small personal yacht.

"What's that on your arm?" Miranda asked, her omnitool flaring to life.

Shepard sat next to Jack and shrugged. "I have no idea. It just appeared there when the snow squall died down."

"Fuck, what happened to your face?" Jack asked, reaching over to poke at Shepard's cheek. "It's hard, and sorta cool. Looks like you've got diamond cybernetics or something."

Shepard pulled away. "Don't poke my face." She softened the words with a grin. "You just want to pick them out and sell them."

Jack chuckled and relaxed back into her seat. "Hell, yeah."

"I'm going to need to run full scans before I can let that onto the ship," Miranda said. "It could be a serious quarantine issue." She leaned forward, her scans already running.

Shepard slouched into her seat and leaned her head back to rest along the ledge. "I'm okay with that. I feel beat to hell and intend to sleep all the way back to the ship." She closed her eyes, pain, fatigue, and a vague sort of loneliness working their way through her body, termites, eroding even her concern about the band of crystal wrapped around her arm. Unlike the pieces embedded in her face, the arm didn't hurt, so that pushed it down the priority list considerably.

Jack nudged Shepard awake when they touched down in the shuttle bay. "Up and at' em, Sleeping Beauty," the biotic called. She grinned as she unbuckled her harness. "Thanks for the amp, by the way."

Shepard nodded, but didn't stand. "You going to stick around, help me kick some Collector ass?"

She watched the volatile young woman through narrow eyes. "I could use someone with your skills."

"There were what ... a million people living there? Moms and dads and kids?" Jack clenched her teeth, her jaw standing out. "Hell, yeah, I'll help you kill every damned one of those bastards." She hopped down off the shuttle then twisted to look back. "But just so we're all clear ... I'm here for you, Shepard, not the cheerleader princess over there." The biotic met Shepard's nod of agreement with one of her own, then strode, loose and lazy, toward the elevator. "Oh, by the way, Barbie ... I like the armour. I almost forgot you were a corporate whore."

Shepard held up a hand, asking Miranda for forbearance. "Just let it go, although I have to agree, it's good to see you dressed in the uniform." Again, she softened the words, but that time with a starched nod. "As loath as I am to restrict your personal freedoms, I'd appreciate your sticking to the uniform code while on board. As my XO, you need to set the example for the crew."

Miranda nodded. "Understood, Captain." She let out a long breath and deactivated her omnitool. "As for the material on your face and arm ... it reads inert. Crystallized carbon and free of contaminants. We'll still need to examine it further."

Raising her arm, Shepard poked at the band. "What I want to know is how I'm going to get it off."

"Captain," Liara said, drawing Shepard's attention for the first time since the surface. The asari held out the box, her face drawn into a squeamish scowl. "It's buzzing." Pushing the box into Shepard's chest, she waited until Shepard's hands closed around it, then hurried off the shuttle.

"We need a scientist," Shepard sighed, pushing herself up. "And a damned good one ... if not a whole team of them." Every joint in her body felt as though someone had filled them with ground up glass. Stretching eased the aches a little, but she still clung to the side of the shuttle as she eased herself down to the deck.

"We had a dossier on a brilliant salarian scientist." Miranda stepped down, taking the same amount of care. "His name was Mordin Solus, but ... ."

A heavy scowl pulled Shepard's brow down low over her eyes. "I know that name. Runs a clinic on Omega." The scowl deepened as she searched for context and found none. "I can't remember how I know him." An image of girls posed like statues amidst flowers and foliage drew the connection. "Oh! He helped Dr. Chakwas triage and treat Donovan Hock's victims." She nodded. "Oh yeah, he's good." She started toward the lift up to the crew deck. "Is he still on Omega?"

Miranda's expression twitched just a little, but enough that Shepard read complications there. "He's been recruited by Archangel, that organization Dr. T'Soni mentioned. I doubt he's available to assist us."

Shepard shrugged. "Liara said Archangel is working to prepare for the Reapers." Holding out her hands, she turned a small circle. "I don't know if you noticed, Miranda, but we're a small crew on a frigate, and we're up against some pretty damned tough enemies. We're going to need allies." She pressed the elevator control, keeping a surreptitious eye on Miranda as they waited. The idea of a large force … one not attached to the council … how could she pass that up? A warm, solid feeling spread through her, soothing her earlier panic. Even the name of the organization struck something inside her.

Yeah, they'd head to Omega and introduce themselves to Archangel and see if they couldn't find some allies for the long, dark battle ahead.

After nearly a minute, the operative nodded, but she needn't have. Shepard had already plotted their course.

Chapter End Notes

So here it is … the 100th chapter. Curious Canvas made me some lovely art, but it will be a spoiler, so I am going to hold it back for a couple of chapters. The big celebration will be posted tomorrow … it's a little crazy, but was a lot of fun to write. It is a cast reunion, everyone and me gathered together to talk about the first 100 chapters. So, if you have any questions for the characters, send them on and I'll include them.

I hate asking to hear from people, but since it is the 100th chapter, and I know a lot of you have been here for a long time, following this story, I really would love to hear from you. Doesn't need to be anything huge … even just a hi!

And thank you. Really … thank you all so much for sticking with me and these characters for the past 18 months (well not quite that long here on A03). raises a glass Here's to all of you … and here's to finishing the adventure! hugs
Garrus digs out and starts putting some pieces together.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

22 Days ASR

Metal banged against metal, five quick knocks … for the tenth time in just over an hour. "Hey! You up there! Are you done digging us out?"

Garrus looked down from the roof of the shuttle and leveled a glare of death on Martin's grinning insolence. "Shut it, and if you're finished repairing those power couplings, get your ass up here." Try as he did to keep his demeanour stern, his mandibles kept trying to flick into a grin.

The kid's grin just widened. "I have finished the power couplings. While I was at it, I repaired three shorts as well. We're ready to check the engine and thrusters as soon as you clear the rubble away, so … " The grin took on a wicked edge. "... get moving, will you?"

A giant hand punched down from the top of the shuttle, grabbed the back of Martin's frame armour, and yanked the kid straight up off the ground. Martin's face froze into a comical mask of combined terror and surprise, his mouth opening, but his squawk didn't escape until his feet touched the shuttle roof.

"Wrex!" he screeched even before he turned around to identify his attacker. "You … you … ."

The krogan laughed, just two harsh, deep coughs of sound. "Get to work, Pyjak. You're the one with the fancy armour." That same massive fist shoved the kid toward the pile of debris covering the shuttle's back end and half the roof.

"Fine." Martin stalked over and lifted a massive chunk of wall. "You're an old bastard, you know that?" The kid tossed the rubble with an ease that made Garrus's back ache just watching.

"Proud of it." Wrex gave Martin another shove and dug back in.

"General," Nyreen called over the radio.

Garrus paused halfway through rolling a concrete boulder off the side, straining to hear over the echoing racket. Not an easy task with twenty krogan bellowing and throwing debris around. "Go ahead."

"Comm channels are heavy with static from the ambient radiation, but open." She paused. "You've got a call from Captain Anderson."

Thank the spirits, the Normandy must have gotten through okay. Garrus heaved the chunk of concrete over the side, his hand leaping up to open the channel. "Thank you." He strode to the front of the shuttle, waiting for the call to clear.
"General Vakarian?" Anderson's voice called through the static. "SSV Normandy to General Garrus Vakarian, do you read?"

A scowl drew Garrus's brow plates and mandibles in tight as he strained to hear the faint transmission. Pressing both hands over his aural canals, he replied, "Anderson? I can barely hear you. Give me a second." He strode to the side of the shuttle, easing himself off the edge and down to the ground. Despite his care, pain seared along all the healing seams, knocking the breath out of him in a single cough as his feet impacted the ground.

Gasping, he limped into the back of the shuttle and closed the hatch, sealing the krogan cacophony on the other side. "Anderson? Do you read?"

"I read you." The relief in Anderson's voice came through loud and clear despite the interference. "Are you and the kid okay?"

"Yes, we reached relatively safe shelter before the bomb went off. We're digging out now and should be headed for the evac site within an hour or two." As he spoke, he paced the hold, looking down at his feet as he concentrated. "Freedom's Progress … was it a trap?"

"It was, but thanks to your warning, we took out their ambush. The Aesarus took some damage, twelve injured, one killed." Anderson disappeared into the static for a few seconds. "… was gone. The ground team ran into trouble with the colony's mechs. They'd been set to attack. Nihlus and a few of the Marines were injured, but they'll recover."

"So, the colonists were all just gone like in the other attacks?" Garrus sat on the edge of one of the seats. "Was the team able to find anything?"

Anderson paused a long time. What was it? Bad news? Good news? No … that long a pause never meant good news. Just before Garrus asked, Anderson said, "Another team, not Alliance … maybe mercenaries … came in, saved Nihlus and the Marines, but the team injuries cut the mission short. There's no sign of the merc vessel, so it has to have stealth technology. The Alliance is on the ground now, so I assume it's safe to say whoever the mercenaries were, they're gone."

Garrus frowned. Anderson was holding something back. He could just feel the unspoken words under everything the captain said. "No ID's?" he asked.

"We're checking faces from the hardsuit recordings against Alliance and council records, but we have more pressing issues." Anderson cleared his throat. "We received news from Omega. Instructor Kandros's people sent word that unprecedented numbers of mercenaries are massing on the station, and their last recon reports indicate that they are setting up staging areas around Archangel headquarters."

Garrus's heart fell into his belly, landing with a sickening splash. Frost crackled down his limbs. "They drew us away from base, set traps to take us out, and now they're going in for the kill." He drew in a long breath, pushing aside the pain and forcing himself to focus. "Are you and Nihlus on your way back?" Shaking his hands, he tried to jostle some feeling back into his chill, numb digits.

"Yes, but there's more, Garrus. Nyreen Kandros is missing from the base. She may—"

"Instructor Kandros is with me," Garrus said, sharpened steel slicing off the captain's suspicion. "She stowed away on the Passch because she thought I was the target. She saved my life and saved Archangel from being blamed for the bomb." He cracked his neck, letting go of the knee jerk defensiveness. "Keep a wary eye out when you get back to Omega; Kandros believes we have traitors in our midst. I'm inclined to agree." The poison of those words sunk claws down into his gut to yank his heart back into place. Three or four days earlier, he would have found them impossible. "I'll be on my way back in a few hours, but we've got nearly three days travel time ahead of us."

Garrus's mind whirled, trying to plan the base's defense. They had maybe three hundred of the rawest recruits left, a hundred and eighty hands aboard Normandy and the other two ships, a handful of instructors … some of their ships could be pulled in, but that still left Archangel's other assets at risk. Of any of the facilities, the base was the most easily defended. If they sealed the tunnels and dropped the blast shutters, they could force the mercs to come at them on only a few fronts. Shepard had liked that location for that very reason. No, he wouldn't leave the rest of the facilities helpless. Whoever was pulling the merc's strings had orchestrated one hell of a massive, intricate plan.

"Send word to all Archangel facilities," he said at last. "Tell them about home base and to go to general quarters. This whole operation has been nothing but feints and misdirection. They may come at us anywhere." He paused, one last detail appearing in his mind. "If Nihlus is medically fit, he has command of Archangel until I get back. If not … ." He shook his head. No one else had that sort of command experience. Except . . . "Can I count on you to hold the line?"

"You can, General." Anderson paused. Garrus left the silence unfilled, hoping the captain would finally spit out whatever it was he'd been trying to decide how to say. Instead, Anderson cleared his throat. "We'll be putting boots on Omega in just under twenty-four hours and will keep you informed."

"Roger that. Thanks for bringing me up to speed. Is there anything else?" he asked, giving Anderson one last opening.

"No. If we get positive ID's on any of the mercs from Freedom's Progress, we'll let you know. Safe trip back, General. Anderson out."

Garrus closed the channel. They needed to get out of there and back to Omega. The damned Reapers and their puppets would not tear Archangel apart. Not while he still drew breath. He'd made a goddamned promise, and he'd bloody well keep it.

Spending too much time around Massani, Vakarian.

Anderson bringing up the mercs again sent Garrus's suspicion meter straight into the red. Did Anderson think their traitor had been there? Might he or she also be involved in the colony disappearances? He couldn't think of another reason it would matter, but he didn't have the time to puzzle it through. Trusting Anderson to keep his word and let him know if it became important, he pushed himself up and turned to lean through the access into the cockpit.

Nyreen turned to level a curious, but controlled stare on him.

"Contact a few of your most trusted people on Omega. Anderson said that mercs are moving in on the base. I need to know how many and where." He pulled back. They needed more and varied sources of information. Once he was away from the planet and comms cleared up, he'd call Aria. She'd probably lie, but even that would tell him something.

In order to coordinate a plan so huge, the Reapers' forces needed access to Archangel. He let out a long breath and turned to open the hatch. Traitors in his inner circle or not, he couldn't do anything until he got off that ruined rock and on his way back home.

§§§
"Garrus!" Herros strode over to shuttle, gripping Garrus tightly by the shoulders. "When we didn't hear from you after the bomb … ."

The general returned his father's embrace. "We managed to take shelter in a missile silo. Came through the explosion okay, but had to do a bit of digging out." Pulling away, Garrus turned to the torin walking up behind his father. He held out a hand. "General Victus. Thank you for your assistance."

The turian general gripped Garrus's wrist. "Thank you for getting my son and his men out of there, General."

"The least I could do." When he released the general, Garrus turned back to his father. Damn, Herros looked good, strong and fit … every ounce the turian officer in command. Getting back into action suited him and tweaked memories decades old. A rumbling sigh rolled through his second larynx. No time for sentimentality.

"Pari, I heard from Anderson. The Normandy and their escort ships came under attack on their way to investigate another Alliance colony disappearance. An ambush of Archangel ships, like what met the Passch at the relay here. They destroyed the enemy."

"The two that attacked your flagship are nothing but scrap as well," Victus reported. "The Passchendaele should limp into orbit in a few hours. They're trying to patch together repairs as they go."

Garrus tipped a nod of thanks and acknowledgement to the general before looking back to his father. "Anderson contacted me a couple of hours ago. Mercs are converging on Omega, moving into staging areas around the base. They've pulled almost all of our people away, tried to take out the leadership … they're setting up to wipe Archangel out."

Wrex lumbered over to stand at Garrus's side. "The council came after me … after my clan because they wanted to use one weapon that Shepard built to destroy another." He squinted at Herros then Victus. "You prevented that." He rumbled, sounding like a volcano building to eruption, then spat out, "Thank you."

Garrus hid a grin. The thank you sounded as though it hurt, but he'd never thought he'd ever hear Wrex say anything like it. Warm and bright, like the sun coming out from behind clouds, he felt Shepard's smile on the back of his neck.

You would have loved this moment, Kahri. Especially the irony of the council's attempt to destroy and isolate the krogan, bringing us together.

Herros passed Wrex a datapad. "The Hierarchy sent the locations of the rest of the bombs so that you can salvage and disarm them. You have our most sincere apologies that we allowed these travesties of a bygone era to fall into the hands of terrorists." He dropped his head in a sharp nod. "And I'm prepared to support you in any way I can politically. At the very least, we should be able to get a diplomatic representative on the Citadel."

Wrex took the datapad. "Good. I'll be ten days dead and a pile of varren shit before I let those Reaper loving council bastards get away with this." He turned, one wrecking ball of a fist slamming into Garrus's shoulder, sending him staggering. "But speaking of varren shit, first we get our asses to Omega, crush this attack on every front."

Before Garrus could counter him, Wrex waved his men over. "Have the female shaman, Chief Sentry, and the Chief Scout from all the allied clans meet me here immediately, the clan chief ordered. He turned back to Garrus. "I'll have fifty guns ready to board your shuttles in an hour."

Garrus opened his mouth to argue, but it took only one look at Wrex's huge, scowling mug to see that he might as well save his breath. After a second, he just nodded. "Thank you, Wrex."

Victus stepped up between Herros and Garrus. "You were both hip deep in Shepard's mess while chasing Saren and that dreadnought?" When they answered to the affirmative, Victus nodded toward a shaded spot where some crates had been set up around a water cooler. "I want you to fill me in as much as you can, send everything you've got on the Reapers, Saren, Sovereign, the council's involvement to my ship. Then, Hierarch … General, if you would do me the honour of allowing me to return you to Omega? If the council is behind this … ." Victus looked toward the cloud of dust and ash still billowing above the bomb site.

"We'd be glad to, General," Herros spoke up, ushering the general toward the seating area. "I've been making some inroads into the Hierarchy and military, but it's difficult to convince … ."

Garrus let the other two torini go ahead while he surveyed the evac site. Females, males, and the elderly worked, setting up places for the evacuees to sleep, stepping patiently around little krogan. The children played, chasing and rough housing like children galaxy wide. He'd never seen krogan young before. The little ones ran around without clothes, covered in dust and mud, beautifully free. Even with their narrowly-escaped destruction still rolling through the air over their heads, they seemed completely unphased.

The older children helped when called on, then returned to what Garrus realized was taking out Blue Suns, while the juveniles worked alongside their elders. The closeness between the females and the youngsters spawned a yearning deep in the general's gut that he didn't even realize he could feel.

"Do you have any of your own, General?" a soft voice asked from behind him.

He shoved the vague ache aside and shook his head, turning to face Nyreen. "No. I'll leave that to my sister." Like he needed to spend more time focusing on everything he could never have. He looked past her and lifted a hand to wave Martin over from the shuttle. "General Victus wants my pari and I to return to Omega aboard his ship, but I'll shuttle back and forth. I need access to the QEC." He let out a long breath. "Looks like we might end up with another ally out of all this."

Nyreen's brow plates rose. "The general wants to return to Omega with us? The hierarchy won't like that." She bumped Martin with her shoulder as the kid stepped up beside her. "Looks like you won't get to be the big hero, kid."

Martin shrugged, his face uncharacteristically hard. "We'll need all the help we can get, because it's not going to end with the mercs." He cursed as he met Garrus's gaze. "You know that, right? If the council's after Archangel, they aren't going to just give up. They're going to keep coming after you and Nihlus, and what if it is a fleet of council ships and soldiers they send? Killing mercs is one thing. Killing the good guys … the people we're going to need when the war starts?"

Garrus nodded. Certainty set like cement down his spine. "We got complacent." He chuckled, the sound like grinding glass. "Not even a month ago, I was lecturing Wrex on getting too big too fast, drawing notice."

"You've got to hate that irony," Nyreen spoke up, "but what's the choice, General? Do nothing? Wait for the Reapers?" She shook her head and crossed her arms. "No. We're just going to have to get stealthy where we can and get ready to start fighting back where we can't. General Victus isn't the most popular torin with the hierarchy, but he's incredibly popular with the troops. Where he leads, they'll follow."

Garrus nodded, but held up a hand to forestall the rest of that conversation. It could wait. He wanted to get off the planet and on the way back to Omega as soon as Wrex was ready. "Instructor Kandros, I would like you to see to the shuttle loading. Get everyone back aboard the carriers within the hour. Leave five shuttles. Wrex is coming with us as well and bringing fifty of his fighters. They can ride back on the Trimeri. The Passch is going to be a few days making it back, so the three of us will stay on the Istal'an except when I'm ferrying back and forth."

He jerked his head toward the virtual parking lot of shuttles. "Go help our krogan friends get organized. We need to get home."

They both saluted and strode off, poking at one another. He watched them for a moment, before his gaze slipped over to a krogan female sitting three little ones down to drink cups of water. He needed to keep Archangel alive for them … for all of them. All the families who deserved a shot at growing up and doing better. The female looked up, and seeing him watching, smiled. He smiled back, one hand lifting in a half wave before he turned and strode over to join his father and the general.

Victus listened while Garrus and Herros took him back to the beginning, starting with Eden Prime. By the time Wrex and the krogan were ready to go, he'd reached the point when they returned to Eden Prime and came back with the basketful of what Nihlus said were Prothean memory drives, and Legion. As they moved to Victus's shuttle, Garrus followed, taking the opportunity to rest his voice and settle the faint dizziness that accompanied laying it all out. He knew how nuts it all sounded. The crazy burned under his plates and pricked along his belly, sweat trickling over his hide despite his armour's cooling system.

The moment Shepard stepped into Chloe Michel's clinic, his life devolved into a combination of situational chaos and insanity.

And you wouldn't trade it for anything.

No, he wouldn't, but he also wouldn't have blamed Victus for shutting him down, threatening to have him locked up, and reporting him as a clearly mad terrorist. Instead, the turian general just listened. He asked the occasional question to clarify details, but for the most part he took it in, watching what vid footage they could give him.

By the time they reached Victus's cruiser, the Impavidir, Herros had joined in, filling in what he'd been able to unearth before and after leaving C-Sec. Garrus used the time to puzzle over something that hadn't occurred to him at the time or since, but while he listened to Shepard's conversation with Legion and Rael'Zorah, it leaped out and hard-docked at the base of his skull.

Thirteen times since the end of the Morning War the geth have been contacted by an unknown race offering us advanced technology, weaponry, and resources to assist in building our megastructure if the geth were to instigate aggressive activities against the creator's flotilla. Each time geth have rejected their offer.

Rael'Zorah slumped a little into his seat.

"Rael'Zorah? Have the quarians been contacted?" Shepard asked.

"Thirteen times since the end of the war, the flotilla has been contacted with much the same offer."

Damn it. Someone had been working damned hard to stir that pot. The rachni … the krogan … .
His blood turned to the black sludge that had covered that floor on Haestrom. Invisible hands moving pieces on some galactic board? Extinctions every fifty thousand cycles? Through it all, the Citadel and the relays remained, silent sentinels carried forward through the eons.

He leaned his head in his hand, elbow braced on his knee. The orbs … where did they come in? The eyes, ears, and hands of this invisible foe? A gear locking into place, that idea solidified. Shepard said the black spiders used her eyes and ears to see … that they said she would show them who and what she was.

"General?"

Garrus jumped and straightened, looking around. The shuttle hatch stood open, his father and the general both staring at him expectantly from the shuttle bay deck on the other side of the threshold. He shook off his musings and the fear that crept along on their back.

"Sorry." He pushed himself up, his entire body creaking like an old door. Every step crushed glass inside his joints as he limped the couple of metres to the hatch and eased himself down, clinging to the door frame. When he saw the concern in his pari's eyes, he just shook his head. It truly was nothing that some medigel and a long sleep wouldn't cure. Well, that and enough time between firefights to actually heal.

Victus stepped up and rested a hand on Garrus's shoulder. "Go back to your ship, General. You can continue in twelve hours."

Garrus stared into the other torin's amber eyes for a long moment then nodded. A hell of a fight awaited them on the other end of their journey. Sieges always proved long, bloody, and exhausting. The moment he agreed, his entire body let out a collective sigh of relief, aching to lie down, stretch out and stay very, very still for a long time.

Victus gripped his elbow, helping him back up the step into the shuttle. "Rest well, General."

Garrus took a step, then turned back. "Are you sure you want to do this, General? As far as the galaxy knows, we're a rogue merc organization at best and terrorists at worst." He let out a short huff of air and shrugged.

"If this Reaper threat is real, you're the only people I know of who are working to meet it. I saw what Sovereign did to the Citadel Fleet. It took the Alliance, the quarians, the geth, and everything the Citadel could throw at that machine, and in the end … it didn't come down because of firepower. It came down because Shepard and Kryik exploited a feedback weakness." Victus lifted a foot to rest on the shuttle floor. "If more of those are coming, we haven't got a hope without some serious weapon dev."

His mandibles swept out wide then dropped and settled back. The fact that he felt the same uncertainty Garrus felt … it helped. The general turned his head to include Herros as he continued, "If you're wrong about the Reapers, you're still the only reason that Tuchanka's innocent civilian population didn't get halved today. And you're the only ones looking into the human disappearances. Those two reasons alone are good enough." He stepped back and lifted his hand to pull down the hatch. "Until tomorrow, General."

Garrus nodded, his mind going blank in the face of Victus's respect as the torin emphasized his title. After so many dead ends with the military establishment and governments … even someone just being willing to hear them out and keep an open mind felt like a gift of massive proportions. He sat in the closest seat and leaned back, head resting against the bulkhead.
"I'll give you a smooth ride home, General," the pilot said, glancing back through the access.

"Thank you." He let his eyes drift shut. A million things pressed at the back of his mind, demanding that he worry over them, but his exhaustion gave them all numbers and sent them to the back of the line. Disaster and destruction would arrive more than soon enough.

Chapter End Notes

A-N: Thank you everyone who checked in last chapter. It was brilliant to hear from, and be able to thank, some people I hadn't before. The cast special is still coming. Looking forward to that. And getting back to Omega. As always, thank you so much for reading.
Chapter Summary

Archangel comes under attack.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Preteril - A small, spiny ground burrowing marsupial analogue found in high meadow and forest lands on Palaven.

Netichik: Insect analogues native to Palven that have been exported to many colony worlds.

Soluvermus - A small (average size 8-12 cms/1-2 cms diameter), heavily armoured earthworm native to Palaven's most northern and southern regions. It is considered a delicacy.

Quiritus - Applies to both genders equally. Equivalent to addressing a group as 'people' or 'ladies and gentlemen'.

23.5 Days ASR

"General?"

Garrus cracked open a single eye to find Nyreen Kandros staring down at him. Alarm slithered through the foggy haze of interrupted sleep, pointed and scaled. Waging a battle akin to wrestling open a hydraulic door by hand, he managed to get both eyes all the way open. "How long have I been asleep? And please don't tell me we've been boarded again."

She shook her head and straightened, then turned and strode for the door. "No, sir. We haven't, but it's begun. Archangel is under attack. Everyone is checking in on the QEC." She took a long breath and glanced back. "And I think they gave you three full hours this time. See you up there."

Before she even stepped through the open portal, Garrus hit the light, threw back the blankets and swung straight out of bed, landing on his feet. Two, unsteady strides carried him to his armour. He snatched the underlayer off the top and shook it out.

Knuckles rapped at the door. "General?"

He didn't pause or glance up. "Get your ass in here, Weaver." When the door opened, he shot an impatient glance at the kid. "Any word from Omega other than that they're under attack?" He slipped the polymer suit up his legs and settled it over the points of his hips.

Martin shook his head. "They didn't hit Omega. It was the Zaherin weapon testing facility. Three large, unknown cruisers showed up and just annihilated the entire facility and the ships guarding it. Took them less than an hour. We only found out because the ship you ordered to stay hidden escaped."

Garrus's hands froze, going so completely numb that the underlayer slipped from his talons. "The entire facility? In under an hour?" Dear spirits, that meant more than a thousand dead, two years and almost all of the material salvaged from Sovereign … gone. How? How could they have been taken down so completely?

Martin stepped forward. "General?"

Garrus clenched his fists a couple of times, then finished shrugging into the suit. "How did they take out our most heavily defended base in under an hour?"

Martin paled, his entire manner slumping before Garrus's eyes. "The transmission from Nihlus said that the data shows the shields and defense systems were all deactivated from the inside." His shock quickly morphed into rage. "Looks like Kandros is right. Traitors."

"Nihlus is on the QEC?" Garrus stepped into one boot then the other and bent down, sealing the fasteners before he started locking himself into his second skin.

"Yeah, he will be by now." Martin paced to the door and back. "The Normandy arrived back at Omega about eight hours ago. He, Anderson, and a few others are going through the footage and data sent back. Sidonis and the Bacall Cliffs are headed back to base."

"What's their ETA?" Garrus paused, buttoning down his reactions before reaching down to grab his torso armour. He needed to be the solid, unshakeable center of a world being torn apart around his people's cowls.

"They should get back a couple hours before we do," the kid replied, keeping up a pacing circuit along the lower end of the cabin. "It shouldn't be possible to just knock us out of the sky like that. Nihlus said the cruisers were using particle beams." He paused and turned to give Garrus an expression so confused and pained that it showed plainly despite his implants. "If something already out here can do that … what are the Reapers going to do? We've got the most advanced ships in the galaxy."

"Apparently we don't," Garrus replied. He finished sealing his pauldrons in place then froze. If the traitors didn't die on that base … . "Martin, contact Chakwas. Encrypt the channel and make sure no one is listening." Brow plates raised, he waited for Martin to confirm before continuing. "When the Bacall Cliffs returns to base, the entire crew needs to be sequestered and scanned for signs of indoctrination. I want all logs locked down and that ship scoured for the black orbs. Need to know only. Got it?"

Martin nodded and headed for the door. "Roger that. See you up there."

Garrus pulled on his gauntlets, then ran a quick check to make sure he'd sealed everything up properly, before grabbing his helmet. "Now to find out what happened."

Crew packed the galley, gathered into small groups discussing the attack and the threat to home base in hushed, tight voices. When Garrus stepped into the space, they all fell silent, every eye in the room looking to him. He hefted his armour further up his shoulders and squared up, making himself as general-like as he could.

"All hands return to stations, or if you are rotated off, get some sleep. We'll be back on Omega tomorrow evening, and I need you all rested and ready to kick these bastards so hard that the last thing that goes through their minds are their asses." He nodded, staying stern at the nervous laugh that fluttered through. "Get moving. We've got a hell of a fight ahead of us, and this is just the beginning. Dismissed."

When they broke up, most heading for the crew quarters, he continued on to the elevator, just missing the doors as they closed on Martin. "Damn, be faster to climb through the ducts," he grumbled. He slapped the control then leaned against the bulkhead, letting his eyes sag shut. He'd spent the entire day with Victus and his father, going over the vids and other evidence collected during the months following Eden Prime. Despite being fairly sure that they'd managed to convince the turian general of the very real and looming threat, reliving all of that … listening to his father recount Shepard's words and concerns when she'd approached him … the fact she knew her time was short … talking about the day she died … he found it more draining than a day of battle.

Once he had everyone sorted over the base attacks, he could get some more sleep. When they reached Omega, he'd be lucky to get a couple of hours at a time, especially once the siege started. The elevator opened, and he pushed off the wall to step inside, hitting the control for the CIC.

Needing to sharpen up and focus on the problems at hand, he reached up, giving his face a brisk rub. Archangel's enemies thought him a soft target. They thought the same of everything he'd built. From that moment forward, he needed to be everything Shepard thought he was … and more. Closing his eyes, he slumped back against the railing.

I could really use your strength right now, Kahri. I was wrong … we were both wrong. I can't do this on my own. I'm so tired, and I miss you. When am I going to stop missing you? Am I ever going to stop missing you?

The elevator chimed, and he pushed off, straightening. He cracked his neck and took a deep breath, shoving his shoulders back. General Garrus Vakarian, reporting for duty. When the doors opened, he strode out, head held high, mandibles tight against his face, hopefully the very picture of determination and strength.

As Kandros had said, everyone who could check in via QEC had assembled, their holograms shimmering on the thirteen different emitters. Chairs circled the rest of the room. Just as he wondered if his father and Wrex were shuttling over, a message flashed on his omnitool. Herros: Did Garrus mind if Victus came along? He shook his head even as he typed his reply. No. If Victus intended to be be an ally, he might as well see all the cracks in Archangel's plates.

Garrus bypassed them, striding straight for the image of Lantar Sidonis. "What in the pits of buratrum happened out there?"

The turian deflated, a reed bowing before the storm. "Three heavy cruisers of an unknown configuration appeared at the relay." Sidonis straightened a little, but his face still hung slack. "The station tried to hail them, but the only reply they got was some sort of beam weapon that just cut right through the station's shields. Before the station's defenses could respond, someone shut everything down from inside." He paced a little, two steps in either direction. His hands wrung, agitated, almost panicked. Garrus frowned. The turian looked trapped, but he'd always been a little high strung and emotional. Sidonis stopped and looked into the imager after a few seconds. "Our ships attacked and fought hard, but they were just outclassed by several degrees. In under an hour, there wasn't enough left to fill a shuttle hold."

Garrus nodded, wishing he could get a better read than the hologram allowed for. Oh well, he needed to push ahead. "Any ID on the enemy vessels?" he asked.

"The particle beams suggest Collectors," Nihlus spoke up from where he shared a pad with Anderson. His voice slurred, betraying the head injury. He probably shouldn't even be out of medbay. "Merol couldn't ID the ships, but the particle beam appeared to be an advanced version on the weapons on Prothean vessels." He leaned against the console, his head listing to the side with the bandage. "The geth are taking apart the footage now. Hopefully what they learn can help us develop defenses and weapons to meet these bastards head to head, because from what I see … ."

Garrus frowned, waiting for his fratrin to continue, walking toward that emitter when he didn't. "Nihlus?"

Nihlus just shook his head. "We're preteril in the open, Garrus. The best we can do against these ships right now is get our people out of the way, salvage anything not nailed down, pull it all in."

Anderson activated his omnitool and the footage of the attack appeared in the space where he and Nihlus stood the moment before. Garrus watched as the three, massive vessels carved up Archangel's most valuable remote asset. He stepped toward the display, head cocking as he tried to discern the ships' design. They looked cylindrical, but huge portions of them were covered in something that looked like the nests that netichik built around tree trunks.

The entire thing made him uncomfortable. Not in the same way that Sovereign had terrified him, but uncomfortable nonetheless … like spiked soluvermus wriggling under his plates. The beam weapon … he hadn't seen anything that powerful since Sovereign. "Are you sure about these being Collectors?" he asked.

"As sure as I can be," Nihlus replied. "The ship design isn't Prothean, but the Reapers have had fifty thousand years to warp the Collectors and all their tech from the original."

"Then that confirms Reaper involvement in both the attacks against Archangel and the human disappearances." He watched his base and ships fall for another minute before he turned away. "All right, I've seen enough," he said, waving a dismissive hand at the vid. All they could do about those ships was get out of their way and develop ways to kick their asses the next time. "We need to evac the bases. The ones that can be pulled in, we'll tow to Omega. The larger ones we'll strip and pull off the staff."

Nihlus and Anderson reappeared, the Spectre standing unsupported. He chuckled. "I'm glad you agree, because I gave that order an hour ago."

Garrus nodded. "Good." Turning a slow circle, he looked over his people, trying to judge how they were dealing with the oncoming crisis. For the most part, what he saw reassured him. "Okay, we've got the wheels in motion for the outer facilities. Now for homebase."

Staring down the ex-Bloodpack battlemaster, Garrus said, "Grundan, I want you and Mieran to seal the tunnels in the sub-levels at their far ends. Set the explosives as far out as you can without endangering nearby buildings. Set cover every ten metres, and make sure it spans the entire tunnel. I want us to be able to perform an organized retreat, and I want them to be as exposed as possible while trying to follow us. Make sure the doors at the near ends of the tunnels can be sealed in seconds." Garrus paced across the main pad. He spun to greet the door opening, then nodded to his father, Wrex, and Victus. Martin slipped in behind them, taking a seat next to the door.

Garrus held a hand out to the turian general. "Everyone, this is General Adrien Victus, Turian External Forces. He assisted with the Urdnot evacuation." He gestured toward the empty chairs. "Please, sit."

"Garrus … ." Nihlus turned away from the imager and reached out, turning back a second later with a datapad in his hand. His mandibles spread and flicked, telling Garrus the nature of the news even before he spoke. "The Haestrom shipyard has been destroyed, and the entire structure where we were found has been bombarded from orbit. It's just a crater."

"What?" Martin asked. His voice rose and tightened as he continued, "We haven't reopened it yet.
It's powered down." He braced his hands against the arms of his chair, his head and shoulders thrust forward.

Garrus walked over and pressed a heavy hand on the kid's shoulder, easing him back into the chair. He squeezed, staring down into the cybernetics over Martin's eyes until the kid gave him a nod, then returned it. "That attack was just clean up. Taking out any evidence that might have been left behind."

He turned back to his inner circle. "Seal up our dock and building two completely. No way in." When they acknowledged that order, he continued, "Melanis … Butler … get the civilians setting up the gymnasiums as shelters. Enough food and water to last six hundred people at least three weeks. Have the farmers in the basements bring in everything they can. Move their animals into the labs. Move the cars off site; see if Aria has somewhere we can store them. Leave as little behind to be destroyed as possible. Then get the civilians into the shelters."

"We've got a lot of that done already, Boss," Butler spoke up for the first time. "The geth are setting all the electronics to scrambled frequencies and storing backups on the twenty-first floor. Apparently the entire floor is a giant Faraday cage."

Garrus took a deep breath, his mandibles relaxing a little. Homebase would hold until he got there. What else? "With the order given to evacuate the outer facilities, we need to find those people somewhere to go until we get homebase secured and the third building open," he said. "How close are they to being on the move?"

"Some of the smaller facilities are already secured, their computer drives uploaded to base and wiped. They're loading as we speak. If the ships have propulsion, the geth are bringing them in. Aria is renting us the next docking bay over. For a premium, of course." Nihlus let out a long breath, his expression preoccupied, his mandibles giving away the speed at which his mind worked by their twitching.

"That's thousands of refugees. Where do we send them, General?" Vortash asked, drawing all eyes to his corner. "We can't bring them in here, and they don't have supplies on their ships for more than a couple of days."

Anderson cleared his throat. "Give me a few minutes. I'll see if I can find somewhere for them to take shelter for a couple of weeks if necessary."

Garrus stepped forward, gratitude settling the rolling in his gut. "Let the colonial authorities know that we'll pay fair market value for any supplies needed." Damn, the vault was going to be empty by the time the siege ended, and Martin had been right, it wouldn't end with the current attacks. The Reapers knew Archangel amounted to the only resistance they faced in the galaxy. They intended to obliterate it and scour the ground clean.

"Understood." Anderson stepped off the pad.

"General Vakarian," Victus stood and strode over to face Garrus. "I can't land troops on Omega. It would be the equivalent of the hierarchy declaring war on the Terminus, but I can extend shore leave to any of my people who want it. If they choose to stand guard over your civilians …" His mandibles flicked as he shrugged. "... well, what they do on their time off is none of the hierarchy's business."

Garrus extended his hand. "Thank you, General."

Vinctus clasped Garrus's wrist. "Just make sure they get back to me. I have a war to prepare them
Garrus gripped the other torin's wrist for an extra few seconds, conveying his gratitude silently before turning back to the rest of his people. "I'm assuming weapon maintenance stations are being set up, the blast shields are down over the windows, and Mordin is organizing medical stations?" When they answered to the affirmative, he nodded. "Lock down and seal all but the first, fifth, and tenth floors. We'll use their balconies as sniper perches to cover street access. Set up a hell of a barricade at the end of all three bridges. The more exposed the mercs are coming in, the better."

Running over the preparations again, he couldn't think of anything else he could do prior to strapping Ingrid on and setting up on one of those sniper perches. He gave them all his most bad ass, confident smile. "We will come through this, people, so let's try to minimize repairs and replacement."

He stepped up to face the QEC pads, meeting each set of eyes there. "Over the next few days, we're going to show the council, the Collectors, the Reapers … and any-bloody-one else who thinks they can tear Archangel down … that we aren't a few buildings, or facilities, or ships. We aren't even soldiers. We're a force … a body formed around a belief that while the enemies set against us might be overwhelming, they can be defeated by courage, and honour, and plain old stubborn refusal to quit. They can knock us down, but when the dust settles, we'll have risen higher than we ever fell, and we'll have ended every, single one of them."

When they all saluted, his father and Wrex included, Garrus returned the gesture. "I'll expect reports by the hour unless there is word of another attack." He held Nihlus's gaze. "Stay connected?" When the Spectre nodded, Garrus turned to the rest. "Dismissed."

Garrus pulled his chair over, needing to sit while he talked to his fratrin. He'd actually managed five hours of sleep the night before, but then a nightmare slapped him awake. He couldn't recall it with any sort of clarity, as usual … and as usual, darkness wrapped him in a tight, frigid blanket of blindness while endless enemies climbed over each other, berserk with bloodlust.

"You look like crap." Nihlus's blunt remark knocked Garrus out of his thoughts.

He nodded. "Yeah, I know. Don't feel much better than I look, either." Eyes narrowing, he studied the Spectre, looking for cracks and chinks in the armour. "How about you? Heard you took a beating on Freedom's Progress."

The Spectre leaned against the console, as if Garrus acknowledging his injuries gave him permission to feel them. "Skull fracture and broken arm. Both of them because they were already weakened. Dr. Chakwas has me just about back to one hundred percent." He laughed, a bitter desert wind. "Do you ever feel like you should just be put in a body cast for a couple of months?"

"Oh yeah." He let out a long breath. "So, what did Anderson leave out of his report on Freedom's Progress?" Before Nihlus could blow him off, he added, "He kept pausing like there was something he didn't know how to tell me. What is it?"

Nihlus dropped his head, bowing like a branch overladen with snow. "Before we reached Freedom's Progress, Ashley Williams contacted me. She said the base where Cerberus had her stationed was attacked by the Collectors." He looked up, his eyes dull with exhaustion. "During the evacuation, she thought she saw Liara T'Soni. It looked like she was working for Cerberus."

Garrus sat up, a deep scowl pulling his plates down and his mandibles in. "Liara? Working for Cerberus? That doesn't make any sense."
Nihlus shrugged. "It doesn't, but on Freedom's Progress, an unusual assortment of soldiers saved my squad's ass … pulled us out when most of us were hurt and then shut down the mechs. Liara and a turian were teamed up with a handful of humans. They seemed to be the same ones Chief Williams spoke of."

Garrus gnawed at the oddity for a moment. Were they scavengers? No, Liara wouldn't stoop to that. Anyway, guessing got him nowhere fast, so he looked up. "But they pulled you out?"

"Yeah, and at significant risk to themselves. And they arrived after we did, so my guess is that Cerberus is investigating the disappearances." He shrugged and then pushed off the console and straightened. "After I talked to the Chief, I spoke to Liara for a few seconds. She said she wasn't in friendly territory, but an old friend had needed her help and that she'd show up at the base within the week to explain herself. Hopefully, she'll do just that."

Garrus nodded, but his mind ran tallies, adding everything up to see if maybe Liara could be their leak, but … no. She just didn't have the inside information needed. "So, that was what Anderson was holding back? Liara?" That didn't really make sense. Why bother? She'd be an unfortunate asset to lose, but he wouldn't call her exactly vital.

Nihlus let out a long sigh. "You have enough to worry about right now. We can deal with what Anderson is or isn't holding back when you get here." The Spectre glanced behind him. "I think Anderson has some answers for you on somewhere for the refugees to go. I'll check in with you in six hours unless something else blows up. Try to get a little more sleep. Once you arrive back here, you won't be getting any."

Garrus stood. "And you ... back to medbay. Heal. You're no good to us like that."

Nihlus laughed, soft and genuine. "What was it Jane always said? That's the pot calling the kettle hot?"

"Black. It's the pot calling the kettle black," Anderson said, stepping up. "You both look like crap and need to rest until called upon to deliver bullets with great prejudice." He nodded toward the door. "The doctor is looking for you."

Nihlus lifted a hand to Garrus, then turned and walked out of range of the imager.

"Amaterasu has agreed to take your refugees," Anderson informed him, standing at parade rest, as shuttered as Garrus had ever seen him. Damn it, they were still holding something back. Oh well, he'd ferret it out once he set boots on Omega. The Normandy's captain settled to lean on one hip. "They're setting up shelters just outside the capital. I'll send the facility managers and ship captains the information as soon as I sign off here."

Garrus walked up to the main console and leaned his hip against it. "Excellent, thank you, Anderson. Can you continue to organize that? Just let me know what funds you need approved, and I'll get it done."

"I will. Get some rest." As Anderson moved to sign off, Garrus realized that he hadn't filled the captain in on what he discovered on the Citadel.

"Anderson, just a second." He straightened, then leaned forward, arms braced against the edge of the console. "I found Lucille Shepard." Greeting the man's surprise with a smile and a nod, he continued, "She was the art appraiser brought in to look over the items we put up for sale. She's a slave, but she managed to slip me the locations of where she and several other groups of slaves are housed."
"She's alive?" Anderson slumped a little, a slow smile creeping across his face. "I never imagined." The smile evaporated. "Does she know … ?"

"Yes." Garrus pushed off the console. "After we get this stupidity wrapped up, we'll go get her. I've got some people I trust in C-Sec's sapient trafficking squad researching the bases and her owner." He yawned, then chuckled. "I'd better get back to bed while I can. See you in a little less than a day, Anderson."

"Roger that. See you then."

When the captain's image disappeared, Garrus shut down the QEC and turned toward the door, jumping a little when he saw Adrien Victus standing at the threshold. "General. Sorry about that. Didn't know you were there."

Victus smiled and stepped forward. "Sorry for startling you." He reached up and rubbed the back of his neck. "They're holding the shuttle for me. I wanted to get a chance to talk to you." Nodding toward the chairs, he asked, "May I?"

Garrus held out a hand. "Please." Something about Victus calmed the heavy seas rolling through the general's gut. It didn't take much examination to see why the other torin inspired such loyalty and love from his people. A warmth radiated from him, an aura of concern and a focus when he spoke that made Garrus feel respected … as if what he had to say was important. Holding back a chuckle, he wallowed in the feeling of being a raw recruit, trying to impress his CO. He really needed to work on believing that he deserved his rank.

Victus sat and crossed one ankle over his opposite knee, slouching a little in the chair. "It's been a long few days."

Garrus swiveled his chair and sat. He braced his elbows on his knees, his hands hanging loose. "It has."

"What you've built here … ." Victus shrugged and shifted a little in his chair. "It's remarkable. I've never heard of anyone doing anything like it."

"Shepard laid the foundations before she died," Garrus replied, not trying to diminish his accomplishment, but only willing to take what credit he was due. "The whole time we were chasing Saren, she wove this web of resources and contacts that none of the rest of us even knew about." He chuckled. "And none of us would have guessed. Not even me."

"The two of you were together." It wasn't a question, and when Garrus stiffened, straightening in his seat, Victus just shrugged. "My bond-mate died nearly a decade ago. That look in your eyes has been staring back at me from mirrors for a long time." A long breath hissed between his teeth. "Torini in our position find ourselves in a world of expanding responsibilities and shrinking connection."

Victus dropped his foot to the floor then leaned forward, mirroring Garrus's posture. "I've been watching you since I answered your call for assistance." He chuckled, defusing some of the pressure of that declaration. "Your people love you, and more importantly, they respect and trust you, but with the exception of a few, you're isolated." Holding up a hand to forestall Garrus's reply, the general shrugged. "You have no government to fall back on. You're the leader of an army, but also a small city-state. It's a burden that few understand." Another shrug rippled across his shoulder as he ducked his head a little. "I can't even claim to understand completely."

Garrus cocked one brow plate, really hoping that Victus was working toward offering to be friends or allies. Everyone within Archangel, except maybe Melanis, just understood that he wasn't interested in anything personal. It had saved a great deal of social awkwardness over the cycles.

"Anyway, I'm tired, so I'm rambling," Victus continued, "but under all the words, I'm trying to say that I respect what you've built, and you have my support and friendship. My voice doesn't carry much weight with the hierarchy, but perhaps between your father and I, we can chip away at them." He pushed off his knees and stood, offering his hand. "Good night, General."

Garrus stood and gripped the other torin's elbow. "Garrus is fine, General," he said, his subvocals thrumming with gratitude.

Victus chuckled, a warm rumble. "Then I suppose you'd better call me Adrien." The general nodded and released Garrus's arm. "See you on Omega, Garrus."

"Goodnight." Garrus watched the smaller torin leave, then reached out to lean against the back of his chair. Exhaustion lowered a massive hand on the back of his cowl, threatening to push him down into the chair and force him to sleep right there. Instead, he pushed off and followed the turian general to the elevator. Time to get back into bed and hope for at least six straight hours.

§§§

25 Days ASR

Omega. As Garrus stepped off the shuttle and took a deep breath, he winced and then chuckled. Ah, the sweet, 'rotting corpse in the sewer under a machine bay' stench of home. It seemed like weeks since he'd left rather than just over a week. His mandibles added an ironic flick to his grin as he realized he truly had come to think of the reeking chunk of rock and metal as home. He looked up at the towering block of buildings. Home … probably because he felt closest to Shepard there. Maybe because those buildings had formed the beginning of the dream. Maybe because the grief had been so fresh when they moved in. Maybe because of the dreams.

Taking a deep breath, he shook his head and set out for the far end of the bridge. No time to worry over it right then, whatever the reason. Even though homebase had yet to come under attack, Kasumi Goto had managed to infiltrate all of the staging areas, planting bugs in the Blue Suns and Eclipse camps. The thief reported thousands of mercs and mechs had moved into Kima district, living in makeshift tent cities. They'd even set up recruiting areas in Afterlife and the markets, hiring civilians as bullet sponges. Luckily, with Archangel providing employment and safe harbour for so many over the years, the mercs' recruiting efforts mostly resulted in extra gun hands arriving at homebase.

"The shuttles with the ammo and supplies are leaving the ships now," Martin said, jogging up to walk at Garrus's side. "I let Nihlus know that they're on their way." The kid looked in the direction of Building One and whistled. "Holy crap, that's a lot of turians."

Just outside the main door, General Victus stood at the head of almost one hundred off-duty turian soldiers. Garrus headed that way, finding yet another reason to be grateful for Adrien's presence. Every single off duty soldier the turian ships could spare had reported to the shuttles. Garrus expected maybe a handful of volunteers. Guarding the civilian shelters could hardly be considered adventurous work, but apparently wherever Adrien Victus pointed, every last one of his people followed.

"Quiritus," Victus said, his voice a resonant boom that echoed off Omega's filth, "this is General Garrus Vakarian, commander of Archangel. He'll be your unofficial CO for the remainder of this little vacation." His mandibles flicked in response to the low chuckle that followed the word vacation. "If you have any interpersonal squabbles, bring them to me, so I can slap you in the back of the head and remind you that we're guests in these people's home. Get along, be polite and helpful. Learn your way around. Take care of each other and the civilians in your charge.

Garrus stepped up. "Thank you for volunteering. Although you can always approach myself or Spectre Kryik if you have issues, there are eleven instructors who will be stationed throughout the building." He gestured toward Martin, spying Nyreen walking up behind the kid. "Instructors Weaver and Kandros are two of them. You can tell who they are by the gold wings on their chests. The rest of Archangel staff and cadets wear the wings on their arms."

He waved Martin and Nyreen closer. "These two will give you the tour and set you up in your shelters. You'll each get a billet, and there will be clearly marked dextro food and beverages in every shelter. Make yourselves at home." He cleared his throat. "Archangel employs and trains people from all races, so yes, you will see hanar, volus, batarians, krogan, and even a drell, apparently." Garrus watched the young drell stride past, a set of Blue Suns armour painted over with the Archangel colours. That should prove an interesting story. He dragged himself back.

"We run under a policy of complete tolerance for racial differences and a complete intolerance of disrespect. If anyone gives you a hard time, or expresses disrespect in any form, take it to one of the instructors." He glanced toward Victus, who just nodded. Apparently, Garrus had command. "Thank you again. You're dismissed to get settled in."

"Hey!" Martin called. "Welcome to sunny Omega, and yes, it always stinks like this." He waved everyone forward and headed in the door. "Come on, Instructor Kandros and I will give you the tour and show you where to stow your gear."

Victus stepped up beside Garrus. "Think any of your people will report back to the hierarchy if I stick with you and fill some mercs full of bullets?"

Garrus chuckled and shook his head. Over the course of his life he could count the number of people he considered true friends on his talons, and most of those had been Shepard's people. Of all the places and situations he could've thought to find a friend … well, Omega would be down near the bottom of the list. "General who? No idea who or what you're talking about, Adrien." He tilted his head toward the door. "I need to make sure my base is buttoned up and locked down. Care for the tour?"

"Vakarian!" Wrex bellowed from the other end of the bridge. "Where do you want my krogan?" The behemoth laughed and pummeled his way through the disorganized mass of krogan warriors.

"Bring them along," Garrus called. "We'll put them where the fighting is bound to be thickest." He grinned at the celebratory chorus from the krogan ranks and waved for them to follow.

Just after Garrus passed through the door into the lobby, he felt a slight electrical tingle along his arm. "Miss Goto," he said, his voice low, "I trust you've been keeping busy?"

"You know," the young woman's voice said out of empty space, "this is almost as much fun as the time I spent a week casing the Museum of the Goddess on Thessia. Lived right under their noses … left candy wrappers everywhere. Drove them mad." She chuckled. "They're getting ready to make their move, General. The Eclipse plan to drop their YMIR mechs on the bridge outside of building one. The heavies will be backed up by LOKI and FENRIS mechs as well as Eclipse personnel."

"How many of each?" he asked, stopping at the top of the stairs. He held up a talon, asking her to wait before answering as he turned to look over the mass of krogan. "Wrex, I'm leaving you in charge of your men. They'll be stationed in the lowest sublevel. My people are already in position down there. Grundan and Mieran will make sure you have everything you need. Don't break my elevator by overloading it." He grinned and turned away without waiting for Wrex's inevitable retort.

"If you're calling us fat, Vakarian … ."

Garrus chuckled and headed for the elevator. Once the doors sealed and they were on their way down, he let out a long breath. "Okay, numbers, Miss Goto?" He reached out where he figured she was and thumped a hand down on her head. "You could make it easier for everyone if you deactivated the cloak."

She shimmered into existence. "Fine. The Blood Pack come in just over one thousand, but most of those are vorcha. Maybe three hundred krogan." Her mostly hidden face curled into a delicate sneer of distaste. "They brought in twenty or so shipping containers full of varren. I couldn't get a decent count on them because the varren picked up my scent and alerted the guards."

"Where are they coming at us? The tunnels?" Garrus leaned back against the railing, his talons gripping it just behind him, using the posture to hide the fact that the enemy numbers were quite literally staggering. If the Blood Pack wasn't even quite a third of the enemy numbers … .

"Yes. No one else wanted to be anywhere near the Blood Pack or the sewers." She took a long breath and opened her omnitool. "The Blood Pack staging grounds are outside the district sewers, so they'll be coming in along these routes." Lines of bright red appeared on the map.

"They have three choices to get in, all of which we have covered. So … next?" He straightened as the elevator chimed, and then led the way out into the surreal and pristine garden level.

"What in the … ," Victus whispered. "Spirits. You have a paradise in the sewers of Omega."

Garrus grinned and took a deep breath, the heady aroma of flowers and herbs killing the usual stench. "We got the idea from some vagrant sellers in the black market down by the docks and ran with it. Imported soil … put in a water reclamation and irrigation system … gold-halide lights. Quarians helped us lock down the details. Most of our produce is grown right here in our basement levels." He led the way toward the far end. "Next, Miss Goto?"

"Blue Suns. They're the biggest group because all the smaller merc organizations merged in with them. Guess they didn't trust the vorcha or the mechs. Anyway, the Suns have two dozen gunships. I spent the week stealing parts and sabotaging them, but they have a decent repair crew, so they get them back up within a day or two. I would've just planted a big bomb in their hangar, but I was afraid they'd attack before we—"

"How many Suns?" Garrus asked, cutting off the rest. Fear threw off sparks, incinerating his patience.

"Twenty-seven hundred give or take. They took over the abandoned buildings at the edge of the district." She bent down and picked a pea pod off a vine and split it open. "Oh, nice." She popped one into her mouth. "Anyway, the Suns are planning to let Eclipse soften you up and draw your forces to the front, then hit from the sides. They're going to use the gunships to take out the blast shields over the windows and drop troops on uncovered floors."

Thirty five hundred so far plus who knew how many varren. "Eclipse?" he demanded, tighter and gruffer than he intended as a vice closed.
"Fifty YMIR mechs, five hundred LOKI, another two hundred FENRIS give or take. Fifteen hundred personnel. They were prepping the mechs when I left their base two hours ago. We don't have much time." She vanished. "Orders?"

Garrus paused. The YMIR mechs and the gunships presented the greatest advantage. Even with all her technical prowess, he doubted that Kasumi could take care of very many of the mechs, but the gunships … . "Take Keiji, and blow the shit out of those gunships. They're attacking anyway, and the aerial advantage is too great. We need to control when and how they enter."

"Yes, sir, General, sir."

He heard her rustling through the plants and turned. "Be careful, Miss Goto."

She laughed, bright and cheery, sounding as if the entire thing amounted to one huge adventure. "Of course. I'm always careful." He envied her the seemingly endless well of optimism and self-confidence she possessed.

"General Vakarian!" a haughty, clipped voice called from a storage room along the right hand wall. "I believe I asked to speak with you a week ago."

Garrus looked over at the quarian contained behind the plexiglass door. "I've had other matters to attend to, Admiral Xen. I'll deal with you when I have time." He strode up to the cell and leaned forward. "And by deal, I mean send you to Purgatory where they will freeze you into a quarian-shaped ice cube and stick you on a shelf for … ever." Giving her his most condescending smile, he turned on his talons and strode off.

"Who is that?" Victus asked, glancing back as Xen pounded against the door.

"One of the quarian admiralty board,' Garrus explained. "One very sick, sadist piece of work."

"Rannoch is the quarians' by right of evolution," Xen called after them, her voice growling through her speaker. "And now we're supposed to accept it back from the hands of the geth in some grand act of charity? They are our tools, our creations, ones that should serve our will. We will take it back, and put the geth back in their rightful place as our servants."

Garrus just shook his head and blocked both her and the memories of Haestrom out of his head. He didn't need that mess rolling around in there along with the rest. By the time they reached the other end of the garden and stepped down into the staging area, he'd wrapped up all his emotions and packed them away. They'd just get in the way. He needed to stay in his head.

"We're ready here, General," Grundan called as soon as Garrus started down the stairs.

"So I see," he agreed, looking over the neat rows of cots, weapon racks, crates of food, and water packed in ice. His people sat around tables cleaning their weapons. "I've sent fifty krogan your way."

"Thanks, boss. We can use them." The krogan hitched up his armour and nodded toward the open door on the right hand wall. "Only real weakness is the garage, but we have cover set up all over in there." Garrus walked over to look into the huge chamber. Another large squad sat with Mieran working on wiring explosive charges. "Looks like you have things well in hand here."

"With these reinforcements, we'll hold them." Grundan's face contorted into a vicious-looking smile.
"I know you will. Keep in touch. One hour check-ins until the enemy engages, then every thirty minutes." Garrus turned and headed back up.

They found Nihlus on the first floor, setting up racks of heat sinks along the balcony. Spare M-97 Vipers lay in open cases along the low wall in case of jams or other malfunctions.

The bandage and the regen cage were gone, and when he straightened to greet them, the Spectre's movements looked steady and strong. He strode over and grasped Garrus by the shoulders. "You look better. Get some sleep?"

Returning the embrace, Garrus nodded. "Yeah, a full seven hours. Kandros stood guard outside my door and threatened anyone who tried to wake me." He slapped Nihlus on the shoulder and stepped away. "You look better as well."

The Spectre answered that with a rueful grimace. "Chakwas. She stuck me in a regen field and stood over me with a syringe, threatening to tranq me if I moved." He looked past Garrus. "General Victus, welcome to Archangel. Thank you for the extra bodies. They're freeing up a lot of guns for the line, and we're going to need them." He looked back to Garrus. "Chakwas has distributed stims, but we're going to have a hell of a time rotating people out to rest."

Waving them over to the balcony, he pointed to movement on the other side of the barricade erected across the far end of the bridge. "They've got the numbers to keep us running even with the bottleneck."

Garrus stared out at the yellow uniforms hurrying around the other end. They didn't have long, and Nihlus was right. Once it started, they were in for a long, hard fight with very little rest. "I'm going to head up to the twenty fourth floor and check on things there."

"Chakwas and Mordin have taken over the whole floor and spent the last few days training medics. They upgraded the geth to act as triage medics." He chuckled. "Count on Chakwas to have even the inorganics running scared."

"And the civilians are in the gymnasiums on thirty to thirty-six?" Garrus confirmed, but held up a hand to forestall Nihlus's reply as a low whirring sound filled the room, rolling in through the open balcony. "They're sending in heavy mechs!" he bellowed as antigrav lifts flew over the barricade. He lifted Ingrid from his back and flicked off the safety. "Call general quarters. This is it, people. Archangel is at war."

Chapter End Notes

(A-N: Don't want to jinx myself, but might actually be getting onto a semi-regular writing schedule. Thanks to everyone who has read and reviewed. Hugs)
Chapter Summary

Shepard puts boots on Omega. Can six more people make a difference against thousands?

Image is Shepard Returns by the lovely Cordovan Lily. :D

Chapter Notes

(A-N: So, long chapter is long. Sorry/not sorry. I could have broken it up, but didn't want to stick another update between these two crazy kids. So, grab a coffee or hot chocolate or iced tea and settle in. :D)

25 Days ASR

Space. Awe at its beauty and terror at its vast emptiness always tore Shepard back and forth, a two headed dog with a rope. One second the black nothingness sucked the air from her lungs, the next, natural masterpieces of colour and light packed it all back in and then some. Sometimes, she didn't go near a port for days, preferring the illusion of solid walls and the bright glare of lights. Others times, she spent hours just sitting at a port or in a viewing lounge, staring out at a nebula or star, losing herself in nature's chaotic art.

The darkness though … the darkness terrified her all the way to the marrow of her bones. Impossibly cold, impossibly empty, the endless stretches between stars amounted to one of the least hospitable environments humans could experience. She'd survived her EVA training thanks to the wonder of the Earth and Moon around her, the ship just behind her, suspended like magic … or science. The difference between the two depended on the angle and her terror level.

That night, the emptiness flowed past, cool and comforting as it slipped along the length of her body, a mother's hand stroking her hair. The suzerain slept, and between the stars, the darkness wrapped her in peace as she sailed through it: free, graceful, and silent. A distant nebula called to her, its gravity tugging ever so gently. She shifted, adjusting her internal energy flow, and as the field grew around her, that tiny piece of gravity sped her on, faster and faster, following her will.

The suzerain roused, the disturbance it sensed out amidst the stars appearing in her mind as well. A call to watch, to still the endless chatter of the beings that filled those systems, to wait. She released her destination reluctantly, the beautiful colours leading her on. Desire. Yes, the suzerain had taught her desire, the yearning strong. But not as strong as the pain.

Agony seared through her, a blackness so much colder and darker than space tearing along every seam between notes … the billions of fragments that bound together to form the song that was her. She released the nebula, the suzerain's will overriding hers, turning her toward the filthy rock. It did not sing. It howled and wailed, a beast in pain, its song soured by suffering.
"Captain Shepard?"

Shepard's eyelids fluttered open then slammed shut, the brilliant orange fires of hell searing her retinas to a crisp. "For the love of the holy Enkindlers, what is it with doctors and trying to blind people with omnitools?" She lifted a hand to cover her eyes, taking refuge in the dark until the fireworks died down.

"We take a class. It covers freezing cold hands and medical tools in addition to blinding patients with omnitools, and of course, proper development of the god complex. The exam is a real killer." Not Chakwas. So, the company doc. What was her name? Eis. Doctor Eis, the smart ass. Right.

When her eyes stopped complaining, Shepard peeked out between her fingers. The orange light of doom had vanished. She lifted her head to discover lowered privacy screens … even the lights had been dimmed, and a nice thick layer of blankets covered her. How comfortably considerate.

"Am I going to live, Doc?" Shepard asked, looking up at the woman. Shifting a little under the covers, she tested out her arms and legs. Other than a steady thumping in her head, she felt not too bad.

"You will. I flushed the narcotics from your system, repaired several hairline fractures and a great deal of soft tissue damage, and am treating your neurotransmitter imbalance." As if to emphasize her proactivity, she pressed a syringe to Shepard's upper arm. "You will be up and ready to get yourself blown up again by the time we reach Omega."

Shepard chuckled. "I generally try to avoid that part." She lifted her right hand to her face, feeling for the hard little pieces of crystal, but they'd disappeared. Looking at her wrist, she saw that the cuff was gone as well. She didn't recall it coming off. "When did the crystal on my arm come off?" she asked, not sure whether to be relieved or worried. The bombardment on the planet had scared her, but she'd hoped to get a chance to figure out what the crystals were, maybe find a way to contact the intelligence behind them … because there had been intelligence behind the desperation. She knew that as surely as she knew anything.

"I gave you a sedative. I needed to get beneath it to set your wrist fracture." The doctor held up a tray, two halves of the cuff sitting on it. "As soon as I started looking for a way to get it off, it just snapped open and fell off in my hand." Dr. Eis gestured toward Shepard's face. "All the ones caught in your wounds fell out at the same time. I gathered them on the tray, but after I was done, I looked and the little bits had disappeared."

Shepard sat up, crossing her legs under the covers before she took the tray, leaning close to examine the object. The cuff looked like hundreds of thousands—maybe even millions—of slightly foggy diamonds pressed together into a solid structure. Damn. Blowing a slight sigh out her nose, she slumped. She'd have suffered through a slightly misaligned wrist to have unravelled even a couple of the mysteries behind the strange crystals.

A wave of joy and expectation rose up to meet her own, the two twining and building to almost frightening level. Shepard's heart hammered against her chest wall and high in her throat, dizziness setting in. Or was it hers at all? She shook her head, pushing away the foreign emotion, erecting a wall to close herself off. "Don't force your emotions on me," she whispered, glancing over at the doctor who activated her omnitool. "I'm not going crackers, Doc. I think it … they … are some sort of crystalline life form. They're scared and reaching out, but too strong. I think they're trying to force me to empathize with them."

"Something is going on along your neural pathways, spiking energy readings along the same paths that were depressed before." Eis keyed the interface, her fingers speeding over the tool. "Shut it down, Captain. Even if it means taking it off."

Directing her attention back at the cuff, Shepard tried to form her commands into emotion and pictures as she said, "Communicate with me. Don't try to manipulate me." After a second, the emotional storm backed down. She let out a long breath of relief as the feeling of being invaded drew back. She really did have far too many people treating her brain like the extranet.

Drawing in a long breath, she focused on projecting her curiosity and suspicion as she spoke, "Thank you. What are you? Who are you?"

Her omnitool activated, the translation program opening. A small glowing screen activated inside the cuff, slightly obfuscated by the crystal. A list of words began to appear, slowly scrolling around the circumference of Shepard's arm.

Shepard held the cuff up for the doctor to see. The woman met the captain's stare, overflowing with wonder that mirrored the fireworks going off inside Shepard's head. Actual contact with an alien lifeform … the stuff of every dreamer who ever looked at the stars and wondered what else lived out there. "You're alive?" she asked, feeling dumb the second the words escaped her mouth.

"Alive," appeared on the screen again, then disappeared. Shepard stared at it, trying to figure out how it could possibly be alive.

"Do your people have a name?" Dr. Eis asked. She leaned in so tight that Shepard wondered if the doctor was going to crawl into her lap.

The cuff flashed, 'Chiastyllia.'

An image of a single, but intricately complex, crystal replaced the name. Above it, Shepard read the words, 'Note. Single. Not smart.' The word note pricked her memory. She'd heard the single life forms referred to as notes somewhere before. Closing her eyes, she let her mind drift, trying to follow the thread of that word, but then her omnitool dinged, pulling her back.

More and more notes appeared on the cuff, drawing together to form an image of the cuff. "Small song," scrolled around her arm. "Not very smart." More notes clustered until it created a likeness of the SR2. "Large song. Smart."

Shepard understood. "The more of you join together, the smarter you are. You share consciousness and intelligence."

"Yes."

"This is extraordinary," Eis whispered, leaning close over Shepard's elbow. "If they have no real consciousness or intelligence in their singular form, how do they know to form these larger songs?"

Shepard felt the answer as she had felt the familiarity with the name for the singular beings, it tickled the back of her mind, an itch her hand lifted to scratch, but even as she rubbed the back of her neck, the solution remained elusive.

"Will." The word glowed.

"Wait." Of course. "This cuff formed when I wished for some way to communicate with the notes … to find out what they wanted. I focused on my omnitool … being able to use it to speak to them." She squinted, staring at the word even though it dissolved into an orange blur as she focused her attention inward. Will pulled them together, forming them into something useful. "If I had wanted a weapon to destroy the notes?"

Despair stabbed through her, sliver sharp and piercing. When she focused on the cuff, it displayed one word.

Death.

"On the planet, the voices kept crying out about being in pain and alone," she said, trying to focus on the chorus of tiny voices all speaking as one. "You said something about my having broken the darkness, having defeated the old masters. Do you have to obey someone's will regardless of what they would do with you?"

"Suzerain," appeared on her cuff. "Yes. Have will. Stronger will wins."

Again, that word sent a prickle of recognition trickling through her brain and down her spine. "Those are the masters?"

The door into the medbay opened, Miranda striding in, doing her best to hide her limp. "Captain, EDI said you're awake." She looked over at Eis. "I thought I asked to be informed the moment Shepard—"

"Miranda, stop," Shepard said, her voice slicing through the XO's. "This is not Miranda Lawson's little kingdom." She stuck her arm under the blankets. "Thank you, Doctor," she said, hoping that Eis would understand to keep their little chat to herself. Not that EDI would.

High time to curb that little issue, if at all possible. "Miranda, pull up a chair. I want to have a chat with you and EDI. That means I'd appreciate being able to see you as well, EDI." Shepard nodded as the blue pawn-shaped hologram appeared on the emitter. "Thank you." Waiting until Miranda settled, Shepard put together her argument. Despite Miranda's assertion that her boss had been killed escaping the station, Shepard knew that someone still pulled her strings. She had her suspicions about who that was, but in the end, that didn't matter … if she could manage to get some autonomy.

Miranda rolled a chair over and sat, one knee over the other, her hands folded in her lap. "Very well, Shepard. What do you want to talk about?"

Taking a deep breath, Shepard packed down the annoyance Miranda's tone inspired. If she lost her temper, she'd just feed into the operative's conviction that she needed to be micro-managed. "We need to come to an agreement about a few things. The first is my privacy. I don't intend to have my every bathroom break and sneeze reported while I'm aboard this ship. If I pass out in my cabin, slip in the shower and crack my head open, or grab a knife from the galley and go all, 'Here's Johnny,' that's one thing, but day to day, I want EDI and you out of my hair."

Miranda just raised an eyebrow and shifted a little in her chair. "Anything else, Captain?"

Shepard chuckled. "Oh yes, get comfortable. You've told me that I am in command of this ship, and yet you hide information from me, and have everyone reporting to you rather than me. You don't even report to me unless it's something you want me to do. That ends. Right now. EDI, you report to me. Miranda, you also report to me. Everything that happens on this ship in a day is assembled into a report that crosses my desk at the end of beta shift. I don't care if it's how much toilet paper we ordered, I want it in the report."

"Shepard … I … ." Miranda shifted again.

"This is a deal breaker, Miranda. I'm not a puppet. I don't want crew coming to me to ask me about why there's no toilet paper, and having to fumble for an answer like an idiot." She met and held her XO's stare, shaking her head once as Miranda moved to open her omnitool. "I'm going to ask these people to trust me and follow me as we go up against a race of aliens who could crush us like insects under foot. Are they going to have that trust if you are constantly undermining me by being the effective CO?" Her shoulders popped in a shrug that hid the depth of her discomfort and distrust.

The operative's hand hovered over her omnitool for a moment, then dropped to her lap. She tilted her head, watching Shepard with a cocked eyebrow and a very dubious stare. "How can I trust that you'll report everything to me? You certainly haven't demonstrated a keen desire to cooperate with me this far."

Shepard chuckled, surprise pulling it from her lips before she could stop it. Command of the great ship Nameless might just be the most messed up situation she'd ever found herself in. "I won't tell you everything, Miranda. There are some things that just frankly are none of your business." She leaned forward, her forearms resting over her knees. Of course, in order to start gaining the crew's respect and loyalty, she needed to get her ass out of medbay and start attending to the day to day.

"Excuse me, Captain Shepard, Operative Lawson," EDI said, "our contacts on Omega have reported in: the attack on the Archangel base began just over twelve hours ago."

"Thank you, EDI," Miranda said, "that's not unexpected." The operative didn't even shift her weight or expression.

"The hell it's not." Shepard glanced back and forth between the glowing chess piece on the emitter and her XO. "This is the first of it, Miranda. I want you to bring me up to speed, and from now on, I know everything. I can't command this vessel and bring its crew back alive from missions if I don't have all the facts. So, start at the beginning. Who or what is Archangel?" Holding up a finger to forestall Miranda's answer, Shepard looked over at the doctor. "Raise the head of the bed for me, please, Doc?"

The top half of the bed tilted up until Shepard could lean back comfortably. "Thanks." She returned to Miranda. "Okay, go ahead."

For the next two hours Shepard's executive officer and enhanced defence intelligence filled her in on the state of the galaxy. Archangel's existence and the sheer size of it blew her away. This mysterious turian figure who believed in the Reapers enough to start it … had she known him? Met him at some point? As far as she remembered, no one other than the Normandy crew believed.

Damn the blank spots in her head. If she didn't already felt like a glass dropped off the top of a skyscraper, she'd push, see if she couldn't draw any memories forward. No one outside her circle had believed in the Reapers when she died. So either her people managed to convince someone else, or her mystery turians were all the same. Had her lover taken up her fight? She poked the blanks spots, but to no avail. No matter how close she got to rediscovering her life, something always seemed to hold it just out of reach.
Scowling, Shepard dragged her focus back to the problem at hand. Regardless of who ran the organization, the council, Collectors, and Reapers had already tried to take out Archangel's leadership, set off a massive bomb on Tuchanka, wiped out a couple of facilities, and had over five thousand mercenaries on Omega ready to wipe out the six hundred or so defenders. Somehow, she needed to make the addition of six people count enough to tip the scales.

She almost laughed.

Looking between Miranda and EDI once more, she asked, "Okay, so if Archangel has been getting this big and scary … building a navy … developing new weapon tech, why have the Reapers waited until now to try to wipe them out? Theories?"

"The attacks against them coincided with the success of Project Lazarus," Miranda offered. The operative shifted in her chair, uncrossing her legs to change knees, then folded her hands in her lap once more. "Perhaps the enemy didn't concern themselves until there was a chance you would return to take up leadership. You've killed one of them using less."

Squinting, focused on the options as her mind flipped through them, Shepard nodded. "That might be part of it, but very little is that simple. I think it has more to do with these human colony disappearances. Archangel is looking into them, so the Collectors distract them from looking too closely by beating them down. The Reapers are ready to make their next move." The more she spoke, the more she knew she was headed in the right direction. "They allowed Archangel to grow unchecked, knowing that they really weren't a threat. What does it hurt to let them spend their resources, build, and organize when you know that with a couple of good swats, you can take them all out, leave them with no time or resources to rebuild."

Miranda's pretty face hardened into a scowl. "It makes sense to leave things as long as they could in that case." She leaned forward, her arms crossed over her knee. "However, other than the Collectors taking out Archangel's weapon testing facility, the enemy's plans have failed. They didn't go in with enough ships to guarantee success at Tuchanka or Freedom's Progress."

Shepard's face drew into a scowl as well. "Hmmm. Maybe my early wake up threw their schedule into fast forward." Narrowing her eyes she stared down at the chiastyllia wrapped around her arm, eyes following the glimmers of light and reflection as her brain sorted through the problem. After a minute or so, the taiko drummers behind her eyes rolled in their drums and took formation. "I think you're right, Miranda. They expected to have at least six more months to work before I became a problem … if their assassination attempts failed."

"Your logic is sound, Captain Shepard," EDI stated.

"What's our ETA at Omega?" Her stomach clenched, anticipation and dread raising their banners to flutter above the battleground. So many possibilities awaited on that filthy rock.

"Fourteen hours."

A long time for those beleaguered soldiers to hold off the enemy. Hopefully they had solid defenses that helped offset the enemy's numbers. "Send all the intel on the merc numbers and organization to my omnitool, EDI. I'll go over it and see if I can orchestrate a miracle." Shepard kept her omnitool hidden under the blanket, even when it beeped, acknowledging receipt of the information.

"Captain," Dr. Eis said, drawing her attention as the woman stepped up beside her bed. "You need to rest as long as possible." Shepard's mouth quirked into a crooked smile as the doctor turned to Miranda, her shoulders square and pushed back, jaw set. "Operative Lawson, I need to put your leg back in a regen cage, and then you should eat and get eight solid hours of rest. Report back before we arrive at Omega. I want to be sure your bones and ligaments are up to taking the strain of combat."

Miranda stood and headed for the door. "You can bring the equipment to my quarters, Doctor Eis."
She glanced over at Shepard. "I'll be available if you wish to run anything past me, Captain."

Shepard nodded, but put enough steel in her expression to assure her XO that she wouldn't be debating her battle plans or running them past her except during briefings. She waited until Lawson left before she looked at the blue thing on the small platform. "EDI, I want to know every scrap of intel that comes into this ship. I don't want my every move reported to Miranda or the people she works for … and don't bother trying to sell me the line that they all died. I might have just been reborn three weeks ago, but I'm not an idiot."

EDI didn't reply, no doubt checking with Miranda. Not that Shepard could blame the AI. She had programming blocks that forced compliance. After a full minute, EDI said, "As you wish, Shepard."

Shepard looked down at her wrist, sending the chiastyllia a request to get her wrist back along with a promise to help them if she could. The cuff detached, and Shepard passed it to Dr. Eis.

"Do you think they'd talk to me?" the young woman asked, her eyes practically sparkling with excitement. She held the two parts of the cuff gingerly.

"That would be a question for them, Doc." Shepard let out a long breath. Despite the fascination that sparked at the base of her skull and tingled along her arms, unless she found a way to clone herself, someone else was going to need to research the new lifeforms. Her plate overflowed with more than enough to keep three of her busy. "If they are okay with it, send me a daily report with what you learn, and if they need to talk to me, let me know."

"Thank you, Captain, I will." The doctor returned to her desk, a huge grin brightening her face.

Well, Janey, that's one more crew member who won't stab you in the back than you had a few minutes ago.

Shepard opened the information EDI had sent her on Archangel's situation and started to read.

Lawson … oh, who was Shepard trying to fool? … Cerberus had connections on both sides, so their intel was impressively thorough. After testing Archangel's defenses with a tenth of their heavy mechs, Eclipse and the Blue Suns had attacked from three sides while the Blood Pack blew into the tunnels from the sewers. The fighting had been long and bloody, but the defenses held and the fighting had devolved into a holding action, harrying the Archangel lines just enough to wear them down.

Someone had blown up all but three of the Blue Suns gunships. The Suns tried using shuttles, but Archangel's heavies sent them straight to hell. The Suns were currently also holding as they waited for a transport filled with new gunships. Shepard wasn't worried about them, though. They weren't due for three days. What did worry her was Archangel's remaining fighters, of which there were just under five hundred. They'd already be exhausted and their lines would start to falter even with a supply of stims. In two … maybe three days at most, they'd start making fatal mistakes. If it went on long enough for the gunships to get there … if Shepard didn't come up with something miraculous … Archangel would cease to exist.
Of course, you do occasionally pull off miracles. Particularly when all you need to do is blow a lot of shit up. You have a gift for that.

Confidence began to crystallize, notes of knowledge and experience formed lattices of competence. The mechs were the key. If she could co-opt their IFFs, Eclipse would be wiped out before they even became an issue. And if she could rig a dozen of their antigrav lifts so they dumped heavies where she wanted them … the poor sods inside that building might actually get enough time to choke down some food.

She could do it. She'd done things far more impossible. It would come down to planning and a decent diversion. Shepard brought up the map of the Eclipse base of operations, forcing all her conflicting emotions and thoughts aside. She had a mission to plan. "All right. Where are you, mechs? And where is your computer network?"

§§§

26 Days ASR

"That was a lot easier than I anticipated," Miranda whispered under her breath as the squad strode away from the Eclipse recruiting station.

Shepard chuckled. "I think Jack bouncing that lieutenant halfway across the markets when he tried to grope her made an impression." Glancing toward the young biotic, Shepard checked to be sure that the young woman had come through unscathed. Jack seemed restless, edgy and more temperamental than usual, but Shepard suspected the biotic owed that to her new armour rather than anything else.

"Run around wearing nothing more than a few leather straps for years and the assholes don't bother me." Jack tugged at the collar and rolled her shoulders. "Stick on six inches of ceramic plating, and one makes a clumsy grab for my tits. Asshole." She sniffed and rolled her throat, ready to spit, but stopped when Shepard shook her head.

"I thought you showed reasonable control," Shepard replied, her gaze travelling over the rest of her team. "And that asari captain's reaction clearly said that Lt. Grabtits tries that crap all the time." Vincent and Liara walked along, guarded and watchful, but settled. Javik stalked, muttering to himself under the helmet Shepard had insisted he wear. They'd have an easier time claiming he was just into his armour being some bizarre fashion statement then trying to explain the unknown alien in their midst. Miranda stayed just behind Shepard, silent, her eyes fixed on the side of Shepard's head as if trying to burrow inside to discover if the captain had left anything out of their briefing.

Shepard headed across the marketplace to a shop belonging to an elcor called Harrot. He'd been recommended as the least expensive place to buy the electronics she needed. As she made her way past the batarian ranting about sin, humans, and repentance, she listened to the soles of her boots making cricket noises in the sticky filth, dejavu hitting hard. The whole market seemed familiar, as if she walked in footsteps she'd taken before. Longing and sadness threw down gauntlets and swaggered into the ring, but she didn't indulge them, pushing on.

"Hey there!" a high-pitched female voice called from Shepard's right. She turned to face the young asari who waved. "Hi. I remember you … don't see soldiers your size much. Did that dress knock his mandibles off?"

That dress? Shepard frowned, trying to draw forward the memory. That dress … ?

The frown transmuted into a slow smile, as the image of looking at herself in the mirror flashed through her mind. Midnight blue … more collar than dress … and impossible heels that actually gave her an ass. "Magic shoes," she muttered to herself. She remembered wearing that dress to get past the Blue Suns. Oh! Yes! The memory of the shop returned, along with a pointed ache behind Shepard's eyes.

"The impressively sexy woman to your right, C-Sec." She waved. "Yeah, hi. It's me, not a ventriloquist act. Let's go."

She smiled, pushing the pain aside. "Yes, it went over very well." Even covered in blood and sewer crap. "Thanks." She lifted a hand as the sadness transformed into a flutter of hope and excitement deep in her belly … and an impressive pounding across the front of her head. C-Sec … she'd called him C-Sec.

So close. So very close.

Shepard stopped outside Harrot's shop and turned to Vincent, Javik, and Liara. "Okay, you three go procure the other items on the list. We'll meet you at the Eclipse transport site in an hour." She snagged Javik as he grumped past, his entire demeanour setting off the alarm at the base of her skull. "Stay silent. No calling people primitives, no saying how people were so much less stupid in your cycle … . You're there to watch their backs. Today is not the day to unleash the last prothean on the galaxy."

He nodded, apparently taking her warning to heart as he moved on without arguing.

Miranda and Jack followed Shepard into the store, the three of them splitting up to go through the kiosks looking for the items on Shepard's list. Fifteen minutes later, she said—thank you for the slush fund, Miranda—and then headed to the next store along the marketplace. Three stores later, Shepard herded the ladies over to a food court and a table in a back corner. Sitting with her back to the crowd felt like painting a bullseye on the back of her head, but she wanted to give her weapon building endeavours some cover. For long seconds, she forced herself to sit there and breathe, to relax down into her seat and wall up the panic. She couldn't go into every crowd for the rest of her life and panic for fear of someone shooting her in the head.

"Miranda, grab us some drinks so no one pays us any attention." Shepard managed say, her voice a harsh croak as it muscled its way out past the fist gripping her larynx. When her XO nodded and walked away, Shepard took out the first of the toys, cracking it open.

"So, why toys, Shepard?" Jack asked, sitting next to her, also facing the wall.

"These sorts of remote control toys all have chips to slave them to their owner's omnitool." She exposed the chip in question, entering the new frequency and carrier codes before popping the chip out. "They're pretty much the exact same chips that basic machinery uses to recognize operator commands." Three more chips sat on the table in front of her before Miranda returned and thumped three cranberry juices down on the table.

Shepard passed them each a couple of the toys. "Jack, set those to your omnitool and pack them full of your little surprises. Miranda, just pack them and then pass them to Jack."

Jack practically cackled as she picked up a handful of mining explosives, kneading a handful of metal scrap into it. "Fuck, yeah, this is the good stuff, it's going to take merc heads off for a twenty metre radius." She picked up a toy helicopter and packed the cab full of the deadly mixture, a maniaca1 grin splitting her face. "First giant mechs and now two gangs! I should have signed up with you earlier. You really know how to show a girl a good time, Shepard."
Shepard repurposed another chip and then popped it out. "I was dead earlier." She grinned at the look Jack shot her way. "What? It's true." She winked and focused on her work. "Come on, let's get our presents ready, we've got twenty minutes until Vincent and the others get to the transport station."

Twenty minutes later, she led the way to the transport station, the toys all carefully reboxed and laid out along the bottom of two duffels, overtop of which she and Jack had piled their weapons and armour. Recruits showing up with duffels filled with gear wouldn't raise eyebrows. Toys … toys would. She just hoped that their check-in officer would be too busy to do thorough searches.

"Shepard," Vincent greeted her. "Got everything on the list and a few extra little items from a dumpster that will liven the party considerably." A wide, cocky grin spread across the broad planes of his face.

"Excellent." She nodded to the human driver. "Hi." She held out the datapad with their orders and details.

The man stared at her for a few seconds without acknowledging her, as if waiting for her to explain why she dared interrupt his very vital session of car leaning. Then, snatching the datapad from her hand, he looked it over before nodding toward his car and then the asari standing beside the next one. "Get in, meat." He shoved the datapad into Shepard's chest hard enough to stagger her. For a second, he bristled ... expecting her to come at him, maybe?

Shepard just shook her head and cocked an eyebrow, quietly proud of herself for not feeling even the slightest anger. Instead, a oddly calming brew of pity and amusement turned her away. Trying to bully a tiny freelancer who wasn't even in armour … no wonder he'd been stuck out on driving duty. She sent her second team to the other car, then climbed in and just stared at the driver, a silent challenge to rise above his petty power crap.

He relented. The ride to Kima District passed quickly and silently, the driver staring determinedly straight ahead. She left him to his issues, spending the time running through the map in her head. The mission had to go quickly and smoothly. Need tied a tether to her … she smiled softly … to her C-Sec, pulling her on with greater insistence every second. Archangel's time slipped away all too quickly.

That morning's reports from Omega set the number of defenders down to four hundred and change. And while the mercs had lost five times as many, the odds weren't tipping in Archangel's favour quickly enough. Hopefully, she and her misfits could do something about that.

The last time she'd entered Kima District, the entire place stood deserted thanks to people abandoning the outer, uncontrolled reaches of the station for the relative safety of the areas where either Aria or the Blue Suns kept the peace … in their way. As Shepard climbed out of the car, bodies flowed around her like ants rebuilding a kicked over hive. Her heart clenched at the sound of gunfire … not as distant as she would have thought. The buildings carried sound very well. That would work in her favour, helping seed chaos through the ranks.

"Hey! New meat! Over here!" an asari called over the background roar. She lifted a hand and nodded, waving them over when Shepard looked her way. "Yeah, come on. We haven't got all day. The second wave launches in ninety minutes, and your worthless asses need to be ready to take point." She snatched the datapad from Shepard's hand, just as cranky as the driver, but impatient.

Eclipse really needed to either stop recruiting social morons or open an internal charm school. Shepard leaned on a hip, wondering absently how many recruits just turned around, deciding the rude-ass Eclipse could go straight to hell.
"That your gear?" the asari asked, jabbing her chin toward the duffels. Shepard nodded, letting all of her nervous excitement bleed through, her hands shaking as she took back the datapad. The asari took a deep breath, letting it out in a sigh that clearly told Shepard she'd gone through the spiel numerous times before.

"All right, pick up the duffels and hold them open," she said. When Jack and Shepard complied, she shuffled through the top layer. "Nice gear. You guys might last a minute or two." Grunting, she gestured for them to back off. "Welcome to the Eclipse FOB." She pointed toward the buildings across the wide avenue.

A group of Blue Suns stood along their side of the street, hollering insults across at the Eclipse, who gave back as good as they got. It sounded like good-natured ribbing but for a thread of real ugliness and hatred running beneath the surface. A line of ice-cold ants raced up Shepard's spine.

The lieutenant shrugged when Shepard looked back. "That's Blue Suns territory. Don't even look over that way. We're here to fight Archangel, not that arrogant bunch of SOB's. They're trying to pick fights—killed a couple of freelance meat who strayed too close. Their CO's ripped the shit out of them, so they're pissed. Don't give them a reason to shoot you before Archangel does."

Shepard glanced that way then nodded. Three major gangs and a dozen smaller ones all jammed into a couple of blocks … it didn't surprise her they were already trying to kill each other.

"Understood, LT. Where do we report?" Glancing behind her, she raked her stare over the others, but they stood calmly at parade rest, looking as if they signed on to be bullet sponges every day of the week.

"Captain Burgess is assembling the vanguard forces straight down the street here." The asari pointed, drawing Shepard's attention down the road toward a bunch of loosely grouped people in mostly old, ragged-looking gear. "Gear up, rest, get plenty to drink, snack … especially if you're biotic, and be ready to go in ninety minutes. We're going to crush these traitor bastards into paste."

"Yes, ma'am." Giving the lieutenant a curt nod, Shepard led the others down the street. They had a hell of a lot to do in ninety minutes. Her people's true usefulness lay outside the lines, hitting large, grouped targets, sabotaging equipment, and hopefully turning the gangs on one another.

To do any of that, they needed to break up before they checked in with their Eclipse CO. Taking a deep breath, Shepard settled, flipping over into operative mode. She spotted a small, closed out shop with a broken window off to their left and nodded her people toward it. Keeping a look out, she waited until last to hop through into the dark, dingy room.

"Okay," she said, setting down her duffel and unzipping it. "Vincent, Jack, Javik … as discussed, you're heading up into the upper levels. Your whole job is to cause the biggest diversion possible, and take as many of the Suns out as you can … start a gang war if at all possible. We need to cut their numbers down as much as we can before we get across that bridge. Archangel's people have got to be exhausted. They've been fighting and watching their friends die for a day already. Let's make sure this ends in the next couple of hours."

Shepard dug into the duffel and pulled out her armour. She needed to suit up. Action time. A glance to the side revealed Jack doing the same despite grumbling about the armour.

Vincent set down another large, canvas bag. "Okay, so we got the chips you needed." He withdrew a small bag and set it down. "There are three hundred in there. I said I bought a pile of secondhand irrigation mechs." He pulled out a spool of wire. "One of the little surprises … Det cord … a lot of it. We could bring down a big chunk of property."
Shepard grinned as she stepped into her underlayer. "It should come in handy."

A wicked grin spread across the ex-Marine's face, accompanying the reveal of four fair-sized crates. "These are full of odds and ends. Just metal scrap from some sort of demo. We pack these things with explosives, deliver them into the middle of a staging area. We could take out a couple hundred in a single blow."

Liara winced and stepped forward. Her eyes shone dark with tightly reined in tears. "A bomb like that … ." She made a sad little sound in her throat.

Shepard shrugged the underlayer onto her shoulders then met the asari's horrified stare and nodded. "Yes, it is a brutal way to do this, Liara, but for the next few hours, we have to be brutal. There are six of us and thousands of them." She held the blue gaze with firm compassion. "Do you have friends in that building?" When the asari nodded, Shepard mirrored it. "Yeah, and they're so very tired right about now. They're hopped up on stims and hungry ... thirsty. They're standing over the bodies of their friends, knowing that they don't have very long before they can't fight back." She reached out and squeezed Liara's shoulder. "They might not know it, but they are counting on us to get them through."

Liara opened her mouth to talk, but Shepard cut her off. "There are six of us, Liara. That means we have to use every dirty trick we can." She stared at the asari, eyebrows raised.

"Good speech," someone said from the empty, front corner. "Very moving. Who are you?"

Shepard's heart jumped into her throat, wrapping strangling tentacles around everything it could grab hold of. Damn! Infiltrator! She snatched her pistol from the duffel. A chorus of whirs and clicks accompanied six pistols training on their invisible interloper.

"Whoa! So jumpy. Relax, I'm on your side," the voice said, sounding more cocky than nervous.

Shepard closed her eyes, listening to follow the woman's movement around the room, her heart loosening its grip and starting to slide back down into place. "That remains to be seen. Who are you?"

"My name's not important. I'm Archangel's thief in residence, and for the last day, saboteur in residence."

Shepard grinned and lowered her pistol a little. "The Suns' gunships? Nice."

The voice chuckled. "Yes. Thank you. Always nice to have my work appreciated. The boss said, go blow up their gunships, so I did. Shame about those last three, but at least I grounded them for a while." A faint shimmer appeared, passing before the faint light at the window. "So, how can I help? You need to get some explosives into enemy territory?"

Instead of answering, Shepard held out her hand. "Captain Jane Shepard."

"I figured it was you." An invisible hand took hers in a strong, very tingly, and reassuring grip. "Kasumi Goto. Pleased to finally meet you, Captain. I've heard a lot about you." The hand released her. "Of course, most of that centered around you being dead."

Shepard chuckled, a thrill of excitement and joy adding strength to every breath, every thump of her heart. They'd spoken about her ... all the people she'd left. "Yeah, that happened." She turned her head to show the massive scar along the base of her skull. "I got better." Setting her pistol down, she began sealing her armour into place. "You out here alone, Miss Goto?"
"No, the bosses would never allow that. My partner is keeping watch." Shepard heard her move to the window. "What's the plan?"

Miranda cleared her throat, but Shepard didn't acknowledge the reminder. She really didn't need the operative to tell her to be suspicious. Invisible people showing up with offers to help automatically went straight to the top of her suspicion list. Still, beggars couldn't really be choosers.

"How did you recognize me?" Shepard asked, sealing her girdle into place. Something told her that she could trust the thief, but still, Miranda's subtlety had the right of it, and the answer to her question might just settle the issue.

"Both of the big bossmen have your picture next to their beds," the thief said, laughing as the rest of the squad either chortled or choked. "And I saw you on Freedom's Progress. You were a little busy pulling our asses out of the fire, but it was you ... and the rest of you, too. Well, except the one over there. Smart move covering that head. What is he, anyway?"

Shepard nodded, holding up a hand to forestall any commentary from her people. "Okay, Miss Goto, I'm going to put my faith in you." She glanced over at Vincent. "Prep the bombs. Did you grab timers?" When he held them up, she winked. "I knew I could count on you." She took a deep breath. The bombs and the extra two, invisible bodies were a gift. She needed to use them well. "Do you know where these will do the most damage?" she asked, glancing toward the sound of quiet steps whispering through the dust.

"There are staging areas for both Blue Suns approaches," the thief replied. "And I'd like to take out the Blood Packs varren cages. Those things are tearing our people up. There's just too many and they soak up bullets like dog treats. Wrex's krogan have been charging them, but with the way the Blood Pack regenerate, it's a meat grinder down in those tunnels."

The genuine grief and concern in Goto's voice settled the last of Shepard's misgivings, the rumble in the captain's guts going quiet. She finished putting on her armour, then passed Jack the duffel. "Put all our little christmas presents in there. I don't feel good about them being stuffed in with the rocket launchers." She grinned when the biotic muttered something about not being completely hopeless or uncoordinated.

Picking up the bag of control chips, Shepard shoved them into her belt pouch with the ones she'd taken out of half the toys. She watched Javik helping pack explosives into the crates. Damn, with the amount they shoved in there, the shrapnel would take heads clean off.

"Come on, folks, we have ..." She checked her chrono. "... just over an hour to be ready to move out with the vanguard. It's our ticket in there, and those mechs need to be hacked before we go." She paced, the dark, filthy room closing around her, the smell of the place working its way so deep into her sinuses that it began picking out drapes and measuring for carpets. Pungent ... holy blessed Enkindlers, it was pungent enough to trigger her gag reflex if she thought about it long enough. It also triggered a strong sense of safety ... which made no sense. But definitely safety, and connection. Yeah, the most wonderful feeling of connection.

"Done here, Shepard," Vincent announced, sealing the last crate. After zipping up the duffel, he turned to face ... nothing. "This explosive is stable, so you don't have to worry about bumping it and blowing yourself up. Just set the crates down, activate the timer and walk away."

"I understand." The bag lifted from his hand, looking completely ridiculous for a moment before turning on its end and disappearing. "It's not going to be easy moving around with this thing, but ... ." Boots thumped softly on the other side of the window. "Good luck. See you on the other side."
"And to you as well, Miss Goto." Shepard focused on her people. "Well, let's hope that makes everything a little easier." She held her hand out for the datapad. "We all wrapped up, here? You guys ready?"

Jack hefted the duffel of toys, her armour back in place. "Are you fucking kidding me? This is going to be hella fun." Coffee-brown eyes snapped and sparked with fierce joy as she cackled. "Blowing shit up … here I come."

Vincent and Javik settled their burdens over their shoulders, the former Marine stepping toward the exit as he said, "We'll get it done and meet you at the staging area in just under an hour, Shepard. Don't worry about us." He opened his omnitool and brought up the map of the area, focusing in on the building. He gave her an Alliance salute, and headed out.

"Okay ladies," Shepard sighed once the other three had headed out. "Let's go sabotage some mechs."

They made their way through the ranks of the Eclipse without anyone paying them the slightest bit of notice. It calmed some of Shepard's lingering nerves to see that they were just three more hunks of meat amidst the hundreds. If they weren't dressed in yellow, custom armour, they might as well be rocks. Thank the sweet baby Jesus, because they really needed to be rocks.

Shepard paused at a broken gate that had been dragged back out of the way. Something about it tweaked her memory, again. That and the place being full of troops. The last time she stood there, she'd dreamed about retreating to Omega, setting up shop, and preparing for the Reapers. They'd talked about it. That filled her with warmth. He—C-Sec—had taken up her dream, just as she'd suspected. And he was out there … a hundred metres or so away, fighting for his life.

"Shepard?" Miranda's hiss pulled Shepard back.

Focus for pity's sake, Janey. You can turn into a fourteen year old with her first crush once the mercs are all dead. Otherwise, you'll be reuniting with his corpse.

Nodding, she ducked through the smashed gate and then into cover between the warehouse where the mechs were stored and another building. She glanced at her chrono, then pulled the rocket launcher off her back. Hopefully the other team started—

Thunder boomed from the other end of the block. A million volts of exhilaration spiked straight down through Shepard, her hands and feet vibrating as the other team's handiwork set the street beneath her trembling. She raised the rocket launcher to her shoulder and sighted her target as carefully as if she wielded Ingrid, setting her up for a gold medal shot. Squeezing the trigger, three quick twitches, she sent a volley of rockets tearing through one of the command tents set up between buildings.
The fireball and resulting blast threw her on her ass, then concrete, poly sheeting, metal, and scrap pelted down like hail from hell.

"Pull back," she hissed, shoving the other two behind her as she retreated back to where the buildings clocked the worst of the debris. Hanging the rocket launcher back up, she watched chaos and fury erupt amidst the Blue Suns, a combination of satisfaction and regret fighting for dominance. The second team certainly held up their end of the plan as explosion after explosion rocked the ground, and the air filled with a truly choking amount of dust and smoke.

"Helmets on," she whispered, not taking her own advice as she crept back up toward the corner of the warehouse. Fires ripped through the Blue Suns camp, the fire suppression systems just adding to the chaos. Gun fire. She nodded. Good for them, the twitchy, suspicious bastards. "That's right, shoot the living crap out of one another, glory hallelujah and praise the great glowing asses of the Enkindlers," she whispered.

The large doors on the front of the warehouse cracked open, two salarians and an asari stepping out, looking around like voles popping their heads out of the ground for the first time. A squad of Blue Suns spotted them, and raced into the street shouting, blaming them for the explosion, regardless of their complete lack of weaponry. A moment and a few shots later, the three of them lay strewn in their own blood.

Shepard waved to Miranda and Liara, preparing to move as soon as the Blue Suns backed off. One of their commanders, a huge batarian, ran out of the far building, roaring at the top of his lungs, calling his scattered troops back into order.

As soon as backs were turned, Shepard sucked in a big breath and ran, slipping through the narrow opening in the door, then spinning around to push it closed. Liara and Miranda helped, then stepped back as Shepard locked the door. She didn't dare scramble the codes or anything that would raise suspicion.

Once it was secured, she turned to her squad. "Go do a quick sweep and check out the warehouse. Make sure no one is left. If someone is, take care of it." She pointed up. "The office is directly above us."

As the two women crept into the ranks of robots, Shepard took a deep, shaking breath and wished for Kasumi Goto's cloak. Infiltration … flying under the radar … had never exactly been her forte. She went in full bore, mowed them over with boisterous flare and sexuality and cocky swagger. Challenge them, piss them off, make them slip up. That was her MO. All flash and misdirection. Sneaking … she sucked at sneaking.

Closing her eyes, she lifted a hand to turn up the ambient on her aural implants, listening for footsteps, voices … any sign. She took deep, slow breaths, focusing on keeping her heartbeat slow and steady while she flexed her hands. A vid played in the office above her, and Liara and Miranda tiptoed across the top of the room … but no one moved out on the floor. Three guards for a nearly a billion credits worth of mechs? Did it stem from supreme overconfidence? Maybe when one had the enemy trapped behind a thousand troops and five hundred mechs, maybe someone sneaking in to sabotage them ceased to be a concern.

Until today.

Shepard nodded, and headed toward the neat lines of mechs. Most of the YMIRs crouched in antigrav lifts, ready to be dropped at the head of the second wave. Without hesitating, Shepard activated her omnitool and cracked open the control panel. It took only a few seconds to remove the original remote command chip and install her own. She popped the panel back on, then paused, listening.

Gunfire resounded everywhere. She could hear voices shouting amidst the chaos, trying to restore order, but then another series of explosions rattled the warehouse windows, chaos winning over reason for at least a few more moments. She moved on to the lift.

"The warehouse is clear, Shepard," Miranda reported as they returned.

"Good. Watch me do this one, then you two can finish the rest while I sabotage the smaller mechs." Sealing the nervous energy trying to make her hands shake behind a wall of professional pride, Shepard showed the other two how to replace the chips in the mechs and their lifts. Once she watched them replace one on their own, she headed to the back of the warehouse.

She didn't have enough chips to mess up the IFF on all the smaller mechs, but three hundred running rampant through the Suns' and Eclipse camps could do a lot of damage. She crouched next to her first target and popped the cover.

Focusing on the work to the exclusion of all else, Shepard moved quickly down the line of FENRIS then LOKI mechs.

"Done, Shepard," Liara called softly from across the floor.
"Excellent. Go listen at the door and let me know when the fighting dies down enough to move out." The explosions had stopped, hopefully because Vincent's team had run out of toys and headed for the staging area, rather than because they'd been caught or killed. Giving that fear a hard shove, she concentrated back on her work. By the time she finished, she could hear that the fighting had died down to a low roar. The voices of reason, berating both sides, asserted control.

"We need to move, Shepard," Miranda called. "It should be safe, and we've got minutes to report in."

Letting out a long, slow sigh, Shepard straightened and jogged across the floor, weaving between the powered down robots. Hopefully the mechs gave them enough of an advantage. If they didn't … . She shook her head and packed that fear down with the rest of them. No, she needed to believe in the plan. It would work.

Pushing between Liara and Miranda, she unlocked the door, then nodded for them to pull it open a crack. She peered out into an entirely new district. Smoke and dust rolled down the street and billowed up to gather against the ceiling high above. Debris ranging in size from skycars to gravel lay everywhere, and amidst it all … bodies.

Holy blessed sweet baby Jesus … the bodies. She squeezed her shoulder into the crack and shoved until she could wriggle through. Despite the speech she'd given Liara, and believing it completely, the horror of that street … . It shook her to the marrow in her bones.

"Dear God," Miranda whispered, the words a faint hiss between clenched teeth. "We struck the match in a hell of a powder keg."

Shepard just nodded and struck out for the far end of the street, sticking close to the side of the building. The thick, choking air should help hide them, at least. Digging into her belt pouch, she pulled out a handkerchief and held it over her nose and mouth rather than putting on her helmet. She hated the damned thing, felt blind and deaf wearing it, and for the next while, she needed to be able to see and hear.

A cool breeze of relief rippled through the smoke and coaxed a smile onto her face when she saw her people standing amidst the nervous, milling gathering of recruits. When they spotted her, they hurried over, taking up positions behind her.

"How many do you think?" she asked Vincent, the nausea and sorrow swirling around in her guts adding a phlegmy, nasal thickness to the inquiry. If the number came in under five or six hundred, she'd be shocked.

He shrugged, a tight pop of his shoulders followed by a long sigh. "Don't know, but rumours say as few as three hundred Eclipse and as many as seven hundred Suns, so the truth is probably in the middle somewhere."

Shepard stumbled, her guts lurching hard enough that for a second, she clamped a hand over her mouth. Been a long time since she'd had to massacre a couple thousand people, the callouses had peeled off.

"Hey! Meat! Over here before you lose your guts," a human male called. The man raised a hand, waving them over, his fingers crooking toward his palm. "Don't throw up on me, little one," he said, his voice grinding like tracks over gravel, and took the datapad from her hand. He read it, then looked them over. "I'm Captain Burgess, your CO for this mission. You lot look fairly competent, you'll cover the heavy mech drop." He jerked a head off to his right. "Go stand out of the way, check your weapons. We'll be heading out once the CO's figure out this fucking cock up."
He jutted his chin toward the carnage.

"Yes, sir. Thank you, sir." Shepard herded her ducklings off to one side and into a small custer. "Okay, we seem to be set." She closed her eyes and rolled her neck, as much impatience as relief greeting the end of their preparations. Forcing herself to face the consequences of her plan, she looked up at that rocket-riddled building across the street, and wondered how Kasumi Goto fared. None of the explosions had been big enough to have been caused by the crate bombs.

"Listen up!" a salarian called from the end of the street. "The second wave goes ahead. Mech support team form up at the gate. Stay behind the barricade, and keep your heads down. Archangel's snipers are taking off any head that shows up in their sights." He looked past them to the human and nodded.

"All right, meat, move it out." Burgess hopped down off the crate he'd been using as a podium and strode past them. A single finger beckoned to Shepard as he passed her. "Short stack, you and your people with me."

Shepard bit back a chuckle, but then caught a glimpse at the expressions on Vincent and Jack and shook her head. They'd get their chance to do all sorts of clobbering soon enough. She reached behind her shoulder to grab her Mattock, settling it easily in her hand. It still wasn't Roger, but it would put bullets in the enemy with satisfying efficiency.

They passed through the broken gate, crouching as they pushed forward through the smoke. If Archangel had thermal scopes, and she'd put a great deal of money on that, they needed to stay low. Then the barricade loomed ahead of them, three times as tall as she was and built to be hard to climb. They'd all be lucky to make it over the top without bullets through their skulls.

Excitement began to override the fear. Her life awaited her … her old life … Anderson, Sparky … the Normandy … and him … them … whatever. It all sat so very close … almost within her grasp. White hot coals of longing burned in her chest, the ache spreading to warm her all the way to her toes.

Climbing the barricade, she picked her way up high enough to peek over. A bridge spanned a long drop into more bridges and then other blocks of buildings lower down. Ahead of her, Archangel had turned the bridge into an obstacle course designed to slow down the mechs. She looked past, straining to see through the smoke. A small cluster of buildings stood on the other side, one ahead of the others, centered with its front door at the bridge.

"Wait a second," she muttered, a slow scowl furrowing her brow, drawing it down low over her eyes. "I … ." She stared up at the buildings for a second, then popped up, forgetting completely about keeping behind cover. "What the fuck? I own those buildings!"

(End A-N: So close. Monday, I hope. I really want to get back to Monday and Thursday updates. I think you can see why this one was a day late. LOL So much to this siege versus the game. Anyway, thanks as always to those who read and to those who check in and say hi. hugs Onward and upward!)
Chapter Summary

Omega is hell.

Petri - Petrin plural. Female turian under the age of 15

Buratrum - The realm of the spirits of dishonourable association.

Ungentira - A large warm blooded, cat-like predator native to the high mountains of Palaven. It is neither mammal or reptile, but has aspects of both, featuring a heavy, plated hide along its back, and a rich, luxurious pelt along their underside. They are ferocious predators.

Moruvesin - Winged insect analogues native to Palaven that grow to approximately 2 cms in length. Covered in articulated armour, they are very difficult to kill and have a sting that might not kill you, but it will make you wish it had.

Siligur - A grain grown and harvested on many dextro worlds. It has a high protein count and is used as a primary ingredient in dextro meal bars. Ground more finely, it is used as baking flour.

Vastator - The turian version of the bogeyman. In ancient mythology, the vastator crept through sleeping armies, threatening or tempting the soldiers to see who would turn their back on honour and their brothers/sisters. Anyone who gave in to the Vastator was immediately consumed.

Morumplacus - Restless spirit, undead, ghoul. From ancient turian folklore. The souls of those slain by dishonourable means were believed to wander after death to exact justice. They were believed to torment the living by taking the form of whatever the victim feared most.

Praela(s) - The name for ancient warrior spirits who were believed to ride great beasts (or forces of nature) into war at the head of their tribe's legions. Spirits of great bravery, tenacity, and a fearsome beauty.

26 Days ASR

Muted thumps echoed around his head, and for a moment, as they tossed him back and forth, he almost barked at his assailant to stop treating his head like a drum kit. Almost, but he didn't possess the energy to force the words from his throat. Then the seal on his helmet clicked and he realized that his mugger moved with purpose. Someone hit the retractor button, and lifted it free. He gagged at the stench that rolled in, replacing the air conditioned pleasantness with hot and fetid air, heavy with the reek of excrement, urine, charred flesh, decay, and burned out heat sinks.

"Give me back my helmet," he muttered, blindly groping for it. His talons bumped off his armour and the table beside him, numb and clumsy. "Can't breathe."

A blurry, white shape moved in front of him and gave him a gentle push toward a chair. "Sit, you're far too tall, and you'll crush me if you fall over on me."

He did as he was told, his limbs numb and wooden, folding like rusty hinges until his ass hit the seat of the chair. A slow gurgle of agony trickled out through his second larynx when his calf muscles and the ones along the inside of his thighs seized solid as stone the moment his weight released them. He needed to make it stop. Pushing through the fog, he tried to puzzle out how to do that.

"You've been wielding a firearm like this?" A foul curse and rummaging sounds followed. "Are you experiencing muscle spasms?" Chakwas shoved her face into his line of sight. He nodded, his focus lazy as it slid over to meet her concern. She didn't wait for an answer before she gave him a shot. "This will help with that."

He winced back and threw a hand up to ward off the sun she shone straight into his eyes. "Spirits, Doc. I can't fight blind." Tears rolled out of his seared and branded eyeballs as she shoved his hand out of the way.

"Stay focused on the end of my nose." Blinding him once again, she flicked it up and down, then left and right. At no point did he see even the slightest sign of her nose. A soft sigh-grunt preceded her next order. "Now, follow it."

He did his best to follow the light up and down then side to side, but his eyes kept drifting closed, shield doors dropping to ward off the laser-sharp brilliance.

"You're blind because your pupils are reacting too sluggishly. You need to sleep for at least a couple of hours." She took him by the shoulders and shook him. "General! Eyes front, soldier. You're exhausted to the point of collapse. I'm ordering you to lie down."

It took mental crowbars to force his eyelids open, but her face slowly drew into focus before him. "I just need stims, Doc. I'm fine." He smacked his mouth a couple of times, not sure if she'd understood any of the slur that had tangling around his teeth and tongue on its way out. Spirits, did he ever. He'd been up longer, fought harder, surely. How long had it been since he last slept? Surely not more than twenty-four hours. "How long has it been since the attack started?"

Chakwas stepped back, leaning on one hip, her arms crossed in her patented concern pose. "Twenty-eight hours." A slight shake of her head closed his mouth, although he couldn't recall what he intended to say. She leaned forward a little. "I have a reliable source that says you haven't left your post that entire time except to run to provide support on the ground floor. Step back for a few minutes, Garrus." Chakwas laid a hand on his shoulder. "You're dangerously dehydrated, you haven't eaten in over a day, and you've taken too many stims. If I give you another, you're going to start hallucinating, maybe even have seizures."

The general tried to form an argument, but after twenty-eight hours of fighting, and being up hours ahead of that going over reports, he conceded the doctor her point. Turning to the interior of the room, he hollered, "Need replacement on sniper blind."

The young drell in the repainted Suns' armour ran up, a shiny new Mantis in his hands. "Cadet Krios reporting for duty, sir." His sea-blue skin flushed pink at all the lighter spots, his entire body trembling. Some combination of nerves and eagerness, Garrus felt certain. Spirits, had any of them ever been that young?

"You're a sniper?" Garrus cocked a brow plate at the kid. The old, familiar claws sank into his gut. No. The kid was too young, too eager. He'd just get himself killed.

"Yes, sir, General." He gestured toward his armour. "Good enough that when I got here from the Citadel, the Suns recruited me." Excitement transmogrified into fury and disgust in a heartbeat. "Then Tarak said that when we got in here, we were supposed to kill everyone, even the civilians. and the families … kids … mothers." His jaw set and his eyes flashed as he nodded. "First chance, I sneaked across the bridge. I want to help, General, and I can shoot."

"Thank you," Chakwas said, her voice soft. "You'll do fine, young man, just stay behind cover." The doc gave Garrus another injection. "This one is electrolytes, absorption enhancers, and a mild, short-acting sedative. By the time you eat, it'll start hitting you hard, so move." She backed up a step, then shook her head.

"What?" Glancing around nervously, trying to place the reason for her sudden misgivings.

"If I send you downstairs, you're going to end up sleeping next to Nihlus and Zaeed at the dinner table. Marcie has been trying to wake them up and move them to beds for two hours." She stepped up and started popping seals on his armour.

The general bristled and reached up to push her hands away. He could sleep in armour, he'd done it plenty of times before. If the gangs attacked, he needed to be able to react instantly. The doctor just brushed aside his pathetic attempts and continued.

"I'm just removing your pauldrons and yoke. You'll sleep better without them." She set the offending bits of armour under the table, then slid a hand under his arm. "Come on." Despite her words and posture, she didn't lift, but looked away, her gaze scanning the busy room. "I need a courier here!" she bellowed, then turned back and helped him stand.

His legs felt as though they belonged to someone else as she guided him to a cot and sat him down. "Shouldn't you be helping the wounded instead of nurse maiding me?" he asked, pulling loose of her grip. He sorted himself, mostly just out of pique.

She let out an almost turian chuff. "General Victus called me. He said you were doing your best to make sure you died somewhere close to the head of the line during this siege. I'm not going to stand before Jane Shepard in the afterlife and explain how I allowed that to happen. So shut up, eat your food, and get three hours of sleep. No less." She glared into his eyes, the very model of stubborn self righteousness, until he nodded, relenting.

"Courier, Dr. Chakwas?" a young petri called, running over.

"Get the general some hot food and a big glass of that wretched juice he likes," the doctor ordered without turning away. "And quickly, before he falls asleep." She laid a hand on the top of Garrus's head. "Make sure you eat before you sleep. Your body needs to spend that time rebuilding, not eating itself alive."

When he nodded, too weary to argue, she turned and hurried from the room, her hand lifting to her radio … no doubt getting a call to help with someone who really needed medical attention. Garrus groaned as he settled back a little further on the cot. He must be getting old.

When the courier brought him his meal, he smiled thanks at the youngster, taking note of the dull cast to her eyes. "How long have you been running?" he asked.

"Ten hours or so, sir," she gave him a wide, proud grin. "I'm good for another couple. My mari always says I have too much energy for my own good."

His stomach growled as he inhaled the glorious scent of whatever she'd given him … some sort of spicy stew by the look of it … then nodded. "My filiam always did too. What's your name?" Spirits, she reminded him of Sol … the bright spark of life, the body in constant motion … the sweetness.

"Neetara." She looked down, her mandibles spreading a little in a bashful smile. "My mari works in the gardens, and my pari is down below with the others. They said we needed to help you protect everyone." She bobbed her head a little. "Thank you, sir."

He held up his bowl and smiled. "Thank you, Neetara." After eating a ladleful, he nodded toward the balcony. "You stay safe and keep back from the windows."

Grin widening, she nodded again and backed away a few steps. "I will, sir. You stay safe too." She stared into his eyes for a moment, then turned, hurrying off toward another call for a courier.

After the first couple of bites, Garrus's body clicked over into starving ungentira mode, and he finished off the rest of the stew so quickly that he barely tasted it. Belly full, he drank down his juice then fell over onto the cot, the doctor's 'mild' sedative hitting him like a runaway freighter. He sorted himself then fell into a deep, dreamless sleep.

Chaos dragged Garrus from sleep and into a heavy, blurred fog. For a moment, he laid there, his entire body fighting to return down the dark tunnel into sleep. Just another hour and—

Shouts, screaming, explosions, gunfire.

He leapt off the cot and ran over, sliding the last few metres across the floor to take cover next to Nihlus. "What's going on? Are they attacking again?" Easing himself up off the floor, he peered over the balcony. Other than a few mercs at the top of the barricade milling around, shouting back and forth, he saw no sign of attack.

Then explosions … three more, flames erupting from the far end of the street. Gun fire broke out, people screaming in fear and pain … CO's bellowing. What in the name of buratrum …?

"It's an attack all right," Nihlus said, a faint chuckle chasing the words out. "But they're attacking one another." His head bobbed. "Looks like they couldn't stand being in such close quarters."

Garrus nodded and rolled over, crawling over to his armour. Once away from the open expanse of balcony, he stood and retrieved his armour from under his blind. Once he had it all sealed in place, helmet back on, cool air flowing over his face once more, he lifted his gun from the rack next to the table and looked up at the drell youngster.

"Cadet Krios, you are relieved. Go get yourself a drink and some food." Garrus stepped back to give the kid room to hop down.

"Thank you, sir, I was getting a little hungry." Krios stood, and turned, a weary grin on his face.

"No! Kid, stay behind the—" Garrus lunged forward and grabbed the drell's armour to drag him down, but before he could, the all too familiar report of a sniper rifle cracked across the deserted bridge.

Blood bloomed red and bright, an obscene display of colour against the white paint covering the front of the blue armour. Krios tumbled forward, but Garrus caught him on his way to the floor. Dark eyes latched onto the general, wide and terrified, seeking solace and hope, searching for a face behind the blank faceplate of Garrus's helmet.

"How bad is it?" the drell gasped, his heavily flanged voice thick and wet. He coughed, spraying a mist of red speckles across the blue-greens of his face.

Unable to force either the truth or a lie to answer the question, Garrus crouched and laid the youth down, using his thigh as a backrest. "Let's get a medic over here," he said, wishing a smile showed through the faceplate to make up for exhaustion and shock draining all the inflection from his voice. "Medic!"

The geth hurried over to crouch next to them and ran a scanner over the drell. A single shake of its head told Garrus what he already knew. Still, the general hit the kid's medigel control, it would provide pain relief if nothing else. When it dinged, he hit it again.

The kid laughed, just a harsh cough that sprayed more blood. "That bad, huh?" Garrus tried to get up. He needed to get the young sniper moved upstairs. Who knew, maybe the docs could save him. "Transport! I need transport for wounded here!" He slid his leg out from behind the kid's back, preparing to lift him into a cradle carry.

"Please … " The drell coughed again, his slender form trembling hard from shock and pain. "... don't leave me?" One slender hand gripped the cowl of Garrus's armour, a grip weak with blood loss—the general could lift it away without the slightest effort—but its tenacity … the sheer will to live behind it, made it impossible to budge.

Garrus glanced toward the balcony. Things seemed to have calmed, the attack inside the merc camps diverting their attention for the time being. His people slumped against the wall, taking the chance to rest. Kitchen crew proved their ingenuity, rolling through the room, lying face down on their antigrav lifts, pushing coolers of water and food ahead of them. The young drell just had the bad luck to be the last casualty of the first wave. "How are we doing up there?" he called, finding his fratrin still standing guard behind the opposite blind.

Nihlus glanced over and shrugged. "No one near the bridge or barrier, the last of them took off after their command tents exploded."

The general nodded and reached up to remove his helmet. He set it up on the table and glanced around. All the transports had wounded or bodies on them already, their bearers pushing them toward the stairs. Regret surged through Garrus's veins, his heart slowing a beat for every body being dragged up to the makeshift morgues. Soon, this … child's would join them, his name just one of hundreds. Garrus crouched and slid his arms under the wounded child. "What's your name, Cadet Krios?"

"Kolyat Krios."

Garrus lifted him off the floor, wincing at the lad's bellow of pain. "Come on, Kolyat, let's get you up to the hospital." As he walked to the door, Garrus looked back over to see Nihlus watching him. "I'll be back down in a few minutes. Call me if anything changes."

The Spectre just nodded, his expression inscrutable behind the tinted faceplate, but his entire posture screaming exhaustion and sorrow. Careful of his burden, Garrus pushed through the flow of bodies coming and going, just managing to squeeze into the elevator before the doors closed.

"Hospital, sir?" a voice asked out of the crush. Garrus just nodded. Where else would he be going?

Kolyat curled into Garrus, his head resting between the general's upper arm and chest. "I wish I'd had a chance to see my father again," he whispered. He opened his mouth to speak again, but only thick, blood-soaked coughs escaped. When they eased around the tenth floor, he sighed. "He left me after my mother died." Those black, fathomless eyes latched onto Garrus's again. "I tried to to find him. Found out he was some sort of assassin."

Garrus just took a deep breath and nodded. "He wanted to protect you from his life," he replied. "Didn't want you to follow his path. He'd be proud you came here to defend innocent lives." The numbers on the control passed slowly … too slowly.
"Why didn't he love me, General?" the kid whispered, his focus drifting toward the ceiling. His breaths slowed, blood whispering from the corner of his lips and bubbling from the wound. Damn it, they were moving too slowly.

Garrus forced the frustration aside and leaned close, his voice a harsh whisper. "He did, Kolyat. He does. I know he does."

"How?" The black eyes drifted closed, tears smearing the blood into pale rivers across the child's face.

The control for the hospital level lit up. Finally. "Did you stop loving him?" the general asked, shifting toward the doors. Open! Spirits, why were they taking so long?

Kolyat tugged weakly at Garrus's cowl. "Never. I adored him. Wanted to be just like him."

Garrus answered that with a decisive nod. "There you go. No matter how far apart and how angry we get, fathers and sons … we still always love one another." The doors opened to a hallway jammed with people and transports, beds, and chairs, all full of wounded. "Hold on, kid, we're almost there."

Garrus shoved his way out less carefully than he'd pushed into the carriage. "Make way!" he shouted, pushing his way into the throng. "Come on, make a path, people."

"Kalahira ... mistress of inscrutable depths ... I ask forgiveness," the kid whispered then laughed, a faint, sorrowful panting sound. "Sorry, Dad ... that's all I ... remember." He let out a short, soft exhale, and Garrus knew he didn't need to hurry.

Letting his head sag, Garrus slowed, weaving through the press rather than pushing. He nodded, beckoning to the first free transport bearer, laying out the kid's body on the stretcher. "Sorry about that, kid." Laying a hand on the scaled brow, he bowed his head. "I hope your mother is waiting."

"Garrus," Nihlus called, dragging Garrus from his half-formed prayer, "they're starting to mass behind the barrier for the second wave."

"On my way," Garrus answered and straightened, turning his back on the child he'd barely known, but who had somehow managed to gut him in five minutes flat. Maybe it was the father issues … maybe … maybe it was such a senseless, stupid death coming after not nearly enough sleep. He stepped into the elevator and leaned against the railing, the trip down seeming to take a quarter of the time it took to go up.

"Did the lad make it?" Adrien asked, meeting Garrus halfway across the floor of what had been the upstairs lounge, but looked more like an abattoir.

Fury and sick, helpless frustration snapped and snarled, lunging at the end of its leash. Garrus just shook his head, not trusting that his hostility wouldn't break free and attack the other general.

Victus laid a hand on his shoulder, the weight supportive but pressure-free. "Did you know him?"

Garrus twisted away, his words coming out snarling, his sub-vocals heavy with a volatile combination of sorrow, fury, and betrayal as he replied, "No, but it doesn't matter, does it? They're all the same. Too young, too inexperienced, too innocent to even realize why they're dying." He swept furious talons toward the balcony. "They lured away all the fighters, left us here with the rawest." Spinning a slow circle, Garrus looked around, his gaze slipping over the smeared and puddled blood, the wounds bleeding so many colours on so many faces … the empty places where friends should be … friends now lined up under tarpas.
"Everyone left here is either an old friend," he snapped, "or kids too young to realize that the fucking universe doesn't give a shit about any of this." Turning his back on his people, he stumbled over to pick up his helmet.

Victus grabbed him by the shoulders and spun him around, pressing his face in tight against Garrus's. "Yes, it hurts every time, and yes, let it make you good and damned angry, but don't let it strip the heart out of you. Never let them get that far in, Garrus." He reached up, his hand wrapping around the back of Garrus's neck, just below the fringe. "Never let them that far in. You keep your heart locked up for this part, so that when it's over, you unlock it and still remember how to live."

"How many have died in your arms, crying for their fathers?" Garrus demanded, both hands gripping Victus's cowl.

The other general let out a soft, low keen. "Too damned many. Too many, General. But I'm still here, twenty cycles later, and I'll still be here twenty cycles from now, because I know how hard I fight for every one of them." Victus pressed his brow to Garrus's. "I don't trust anyone else to fight as hard or to care as much. Do you?"

Sucking in a long and shaky, but bracing, breath, Garrus pulled back. He shook his head, clearing away the last of the rage with another long breath. He patted the cowl of Adrien's armour then released him. "No, I don't. Thank you."

The torin nodded, his mandibles flicking in a quick smile. "That's why I'm here," he replied, keeping his voice low and mostly sub-vocals to keep the words between the two of them. "This is the shit, and the guts, and the grind of command that no one tells you about." He slapped his hand against the armour over Garrus's heart. "Lock it up for the fight, and the second you put the guns down, open it back up. Don't let it get hard. That doesn't honour anyone."

The general patted the back of Garrus's neck a couple of times. "I'm going to go grab some food. If they're getting ready for another wave, it's going to be a while before I get another chance." He turned toward the door to the stairs. "Want anything?"

"No. Thanks." Garrus walked over to the puddle of Kolyat Krios's blood and lifted Ingrid off the floor. "Clean up by the west blind!" he called, then hopped up onto the table.

Garrus lifted Ingrid into the slit at the top of the blind and settled her stock into the space between armour sections. Taking a couple of deep breaths, he settled himself, letting all thought and worry drift out of his head. He needed calm, he needed emptiness, to become a creature of action and reaction, pure skill-driven reflex.

Chaos still ruled in the Blue Suns and Eclipse camps. Humans, asari, batarians, salarians, and turians milled about, the fighting over, but the smoke and dust choked air still crackled with hostility. Behind the barricade, he spotted movement: mercs slinking into position to start the second wave. Garrus pulled a long breath of cold, clean air in through his nostrils. At least they culled their own numbers before the attack. The gangs had come at them fairly easy the first time, mostly testing defenses, getting a read on where they could strike hardest. The second wave would most likely sweep Archangel right off Omega.

Garrus alerted to movement at his end of the barricade. Someone peeking over the top, doing a little recon. He scowled, watching them … no, her. Definitely a her as she popped up, head and shoulders above the top of the barricade, her posture almost comical, like a _preteril_ popping out of its burrow to stand on its hind legs.

He reached up to tweak the focus—damn Shepard and her insistence on manual focus—the side of the human woman's head appearing sharp and distinct in the crosshairs as she looked down, speaking to someone. His talon tightened on the trigger. She turned to look up at the balcony, then dropped down, disappearing behind the barricade.

Ingrid sank slowly from his shoulder, his brain frozen on the image of that face. He closed his eyes and took a deep breath. Too little sleep. Taking a long, ragged breath, he realized that he'd been holding it. Spirits. She looked just like … . An ancient, poisoned dagger slipped between his plates, the edge so sharp it barely hurt as it pierced his heart … at least until he tried to take another breath.

A keen erupted from his throat, so piercing that every eye on the floor turned to look at him and so loud that it echoed out into Omega's eternal twilight.

"Why now?" he whispered. Thoughts spun, tumbling over one another, trying to find an explanation that didn't include losing his mind.

Hallucinations … Dr. Chakwas said something about stims giving him hallucinations. Grabbing onto that simple explanation—and his sanity—with both hands, he closed his eyes and took another breath. He wasn't seeing Shepard. His Kahri was dead, and he knew that to be true. That face amounted to nothing more than the stims messing with his mind.

"Here they come. Big mechs rolling in," Nihlus called. "Everyone to the lines. Repeat, all guns to the lines. Support crews and second line, stand by."

Garrus glanced toward his fratrin, wondering what Nihlus had seen and why he hadn't taken the shot. The woman had been standing in plain view … an easy shot. Why hadn't Nihlus taken it?

He lifted Ingrid to his shoulder, clenched his teeth, and steeled himself. The next time that head appeared in his scope, it dropped.

Droning like a swarm of huge moruvesin, the merc's antigrav lifts soared over the barricade, dropping their deadly burdens on the bridge. Three … six … nine … twelve … fifteen. Spirits. As his heart stopped in recognition of their imminent deaths, he glanced toward Nihlus only to see his fratrin staring back at him.

Nihlus took a deep breath and nodded. Garrus replied in kind, a grim sort of smile passing between them as the Spectre reached for his helmet and put it on, sealing it in place. If it was their time, it was their time. They'd done what they could, put together a force that really could have given the Reapers a fight had they been given a little longer to prepare. A little more support couldn't have hurt either.

He faced front and brought Ingrid to his shoulder, settling her comfortably … an old friend … a last connection to his reason for being there in the first place. Cold, grim smile softening a little, he cracked his neck and sighted down the scope, ready to give them hell. Dying wasn't the worst outcome for the day. Kahri would be there waiting. He grinned, a soft keen rolling through his subvocals. Maybe that was what he'd seen … his love coming to escort him home. Spirits, he hoped that was what he'd seen.

The YMIRs unfolded, their arms locking into firing positions. Garrus put two bullets in the head of one of the lead ones before the Eclipse began to leap over the barricade. No, not Eclipse … none of them wore uniforms. Meat sent to soak up bullets and keep Archangel pinned down so the mechs could move in. Innocent blood still wetting the front of his armour, Garrus focused his fire on the mechs, taking down one of the lead rank and the three unfortunate freelancers who happened to be running into cover next to it as it exploded.
"The mechs aren't firing," someone yelled. "Why aren't they firing?"

"How did I miss that?" he whispered. And then he saw her. Draped over the top of the barricade, several others at her side, she worked away on her omnitool. She lifted her head, a wide grin spreading across her face. Before he could even wonder about it, the mechs all turned, their guns lifting, but facing toward the barricade.

A stunned sort of silence dropped over the bridge as the freelancers suddenly faced five lines of twin mass accelerator cannons. For one second, they froze, then the YMIRs opened fire, shredding the mercs hirelings like a thresher harvesting siligur.

"Oh shit!" The woman's yelp carried even over the mech fire, drawing his scope back to her. She was leaping down from the barricade, a small squad on her six, the lot of them diving for cover. The woman's head popped up, looking around, then she shoved one of her people out, sending them to the next cover forward. Eclipse behind her, pouring over the barricade in force ... the mechs and Archangel in front of her, she raced from cover to cover. She dashed behind a tall crate, then leaned out, the N7 patch on her armour as clear as day.

Short, red hair flashing in the light ... the sharp, pixie face with its busted up nose ... it was Shepard's face. But how? Clone? Doppelganger created through surgery?

Then the connection clicked inside Garrus's head and all expression drained from his face. Ice crackling through his heart, he finally put together the pieces. Dammit. Anderson and Nihlus ... the silences ... the hesitations in their communications ... . She was the reason.

Garrus lifted Ingrid out of the slot in the sniper blind and spun. Still crouched, he dropped down off the table and stormed across the balcony. Although aware of the bullets hitting his shields, he didn't let them get in the way of his anger as he bulled in behind Nihlus's blind.

Garrus shoved Ingrid into the Spectre's hands. "Explain this to me, Nihlus." He waited, a brow plate raised. Rage and terror and horror all launched weapons of mass destruction at one another as that tiny impossibility raced to new cover, dodging a rocket from one of the mechs. He grabbed Nihlus by the yoke and spun him around to face the phantom working her way closer and closer to base.

The Spectre just handed the rifle back. "She saved us on Freedom's Progress," he replied, simply. He took a deep breath that exaggerated his exhaustion rather than lifting it. "She's the reason Ashley called me after the Collectors attacked the Cerberus base. The chief saw her evacuating a group of people."

Fury won the initial salvo, and Garrus lunged toward his fratrin. "And no one thought to tell me that Cerberus had created this fake Shepard before she showed up at my door?" His throat closed as the sound of her voice echoed up from below as she called to her people, moving them in on the base. "What is she?"

Nihlus stepped into him, gripping his shoulders. His mandibles dropped and spread, his subvocals thrumming comfort and understanding. "Would you have thanked me for telling you about her while you were on Tuchanka? Or while you were on your way back here?" Ignoring the rigid spines that Garrus threw between them, Nihlus leaned in to rest the brow of his helmet against his fratrin's. "I don't know who or what she is, but ..." He pulled away and gestured toward the devastated camps ... the mechs cutting down Eclipse and Blue Suns faster than they could run. "... she's saving us again, Garrus."

Horror launched a second sortie, beating the others to the punch and Garrus reeled back. "You don't believe it's Shepard." Forgetting he was wearing it, he lifted his hand, raking his talons along his helmet. "You know she's dead, Nihlus." He stumbled back another couple of steps, stopping when his thigh hit the table he'd been sitting on moments before. "You know that Shepard … our Shepard is dead."

Nihlus nodded and turned to stand against the wall at the end of the balcony, peering out around the cover. "I know, but Garrus … she called Alenko by his nickname without the slightest hesitation, and she was hailing the Enkindlers and spouting sweet baby Jesus … ." Nihlus leaned out a little. "And look at her. The way she moves … the decisions she makes." He glanced Garrus's way, his expression unreadable through the heavily tinted faceplate. "She insisted on getting us clear before taking on the mechs, even though the dark-haired woman was yelling at her to leave us."

Garrus glanced out past his cover. The pretender had almost all of her people behind the closest cover. True, she looked like Shepard, and she moved like Shepard … the aura and flavour of her command was Shepard … . No. It amounted to the worst sort of madness: him lying to himself, tricking himself. He shook his head hard enough that pain flared behind his eyes and made him feel as though his nose bled. No, he wouldn't let himself get sucked into Nihlus's delusion. He held Kahri as she died. He held her hand for three days. Dead was dead.

The enemy had more than proven their dedication to destroying Archangel over the past week, this woman merely the next shot in a battle that wouldn't end until either the Reapers or Archangel lie in ruins. It was a strange ploy, unless she was some sort of sleeper agent … an assassin or some sort of bomb meant to take them out. He lifted Ingrid to his shoulder and sighted down the tiny, redhead doppelganger. She activated her omnitool, and he zoomed in to see the interface. Mech controls.

She'd bought their reprieve, and more than likely turned the gangs on one another as well. Okay, so she wasn't working for the council. He couldn't see them unleashing a sleeper agent who obliterated most of their attack force. Cerberus, then … trying to get back inside Archangel, but to take control of it. That would not happen. He'd burn the whole thing down and throw himself into the pits of buratrum first.

The fake Shepard alerted to something on the other side of the barricade the moment before he registered the sudden quiet. The mechs and Eclipse had stopped firing at one another. He watched her, frantically tapping away at the interface glowing on her forearm.

"What is it, Shepard?" a dark-haired human woman shouted from the next cover. He glanced her way as her shout carried. "We need to keep moving in!"

"They're going to blow the barricade," the fake Shepard hollered back. "Damn it. I don't think Miss Goto made it through. Her presents should have gone off already. I've got to trigger the mechs in the camp and get these bastards into a holding line."

As she spoke, the remaining YMIRs stomped down the bridge, shoving aside the obstacles in their path. They lined up shoulder to shoulder across the center of the bridge. She—the redhead commander gave the darkhaired woman a wave, ordering her and a second individual in strange-looking armour into the last piece of cover a few metres in front of the building.

"They're blowing the barricade," the fake Shepard hollered, looking up. After searching for a moment, she locked onto Garrus's sniper blind. "I've sabotaged about half their LOKI and FENRIS mechs, but they're probably covering for a heavy Blood Pack push in the tunnels." She glanced behind her as the barricade at the far end of the bridge exploded, tearing a huge hole through the center. She launched herself over her cover and took up a firing position, her Mattock aimed toward the breach.

"One of your people, a Kasumi Goto took four pretty massive bombs into enemy territory, but I don't know if she got through," she called, glancing back toward the balcony again. "She was going to try to take out their varren."

Garrus lifted a leg up onto the table and turned his back to lean against the wall, unable to look at her any more. Whoever … whatever that was … it was an insult … an abomination. He took a deep breath, clenched his teeth and reached up to his radio. "East balcony, sitrep."

"We're holding over here, General. Getting a chance to take a fucking breather," Zaeed barked back, his voice even more coarse than usual from shouting orders. "Goddamn mechs are keeping the Suns back, and now there … are … . Just a goddamned second." Garrus heard banging and then running footsteps. "What the bloody hell is that?" Muffled shouts reported back. Zaeed sniffed, deep enough to have sucked his brain out through his sinuses, hawked, and spat. Garrus winced, but then the merc was shouting in his ear again.

"Hundreds of the little mechs marching through the Suns' camp, shooting the shit out of them. The merc bastards are massing in the small park space at the end of the bridge, forming a line to hold them off. What the hell is going on out there, General? Did our fucking ships make it back? Is it our people?" He hawked again. "Keep the line solid. Don't let the fucking mechs do all the work, goddammit. Keep an eye on those Suns … they're starting to push in on the bridge!"

Garrus nearly choked on his desire to just say Shepard's name … to shout from the roof of the building that his love had come back to save them all. Instead he swallowed hard, managing to force words past the morass of betrayal and disgust. "Small outside squad. Looks like Cerberus. Keep your eyes open. Vakarian out."

He glanced over at Nihlus, unable to make himself look out. "What's going on?"

The Spectre didn't look away from the scene below. "The YMIRs and her squad are holding back the Eclipse and the unfriendly mechs." He chuckled as a sniper rifle cracked the air, the echo snapping back and forth off the buildings. "She sure shoots like Shepard."

"It's not Shepard. For fuck's sake, Nihlus." He opened a channel to the west balcony, where Butler reported the same situation. The big mechs protecting the building, Blue Suns setting up lines just beyond the end of the bridge to hold off the hundreds of renegade mechs.

"Martin, sitrep," he called, changing channels and doing his best to ignore the consistent bark of the sniper rifle below … and the running commentary from one of the members of the forgery's squad.

"All right, this time you're definitely going to fucking miss," the young woman crowed. "No way anyone gets that many fucking headshots in a row."

Garrus closed his eyes and focused on blocking it out. The channel opened, quick, ragged breaths blowing hard. Footsteps. Underneath that, the constant chatter and cough of rifles.

"Martin? Weaver, do you read me? Respond."

inhalation.

Finally … . "We're holding, General. Mostly by our fingernails, but we're holding. Just drove back another wave of vorcha and varren." He lapsed into a choking fit. "They have flame throwers, set fire to … fucking everything. Then sent the varren in." He coughed for a good thirty seconds, then took another drink. "How are things up there? Can you spare anyone?"

"We've caught a reprieve up here. Someone coming in from the outside. Small squad … six people, but they hacked some of the Eclipse mechs." Garrus didn't have to focus on blocking out the outside, the pain and exhaustion in every one of Martin's breaths latched meathooks into his guts, pulling him down into that burning hell. "I'll send you who I can. The Blood Pack might be making a heavy push here in a few minutes. Can you hold for a half hour or so until we see if the lull up here is going to take?"

Martin grunted. Scrambling and metal scraping against metal, the ceramic ring of armour accompanied the kid shoving himself back to his feet. He started coughing again. "Where's the fucking medic?" he called. "I need stims and something for my lungs." More scuffling. "Yeah, General, we can hold that long, but we could sure use a few miracles. Wrex's krogan are down to half. The ornery old bastard is still up, but both Mierin and Grundan are dead. We all would be if that crazy bastard of a salarian didn't run those explosives down the tunnel." More choking.

Then. "Where the hell have you been? We've got dozens of smoke inhalation cases in the tunnel. Get down there … give them shots, and tell them to get their fucking helmets on."

Garrus heard the kid's breathing smooth out a little, a little banging and clattering as he put his helmet on. It sealed. Garrus cleared his throat. "If anything changes, let me know immediately," he ordered. "And kid … take care of yourself."

"Yes, sir. Weaver, out."

A sharp ache stabbed through Garrus's teeth as the channel closed. Forcing his jaw open, he stretched out the muscles. His people were dying down there, he couldn't just sit around with his mouth hanging open while waiting to see what that fake Shepard had in store.

"Friendlies incoming!" that voice bellowed from below. "Please, hold your fire."

Garrus's radio signaled an incoming transmission on the command channel. "General? Nihlus? Either of you there?" Nyreen called. "We've got someone saying she's Jane Shepard at the front door asking permission to come in." She paused. "Do you want me to shoot whoever the hell this is?"

For long seconds, the order rattled around between his front teeth and the tip of his tongue. One bullet to the head, and he wouldn't have to deal with her. He'd never have to look into her eyes and see someone else looking back from the face … . He swallowed and slammed his talons into his helmet again trying to rake his fringe.

Spirits, the universe just never seemed to run out of sadistic ways to play with him. One bullet and that sick joke would end before it got a chance to tear his guts out and strew them across Omega. He opened his mouth to give the order, but no sound came out.

"She saved us, Garrus," Nihlus said, cutting into the channel, his voice soft and expressionless, even his subvocals dead and flat. "More than once. She doesn't deserve to just be gunned down regardless of who she is.”
Garrus grunted and jerked his head in a single nod, but couldn't grind the order past his teeth. He could no more just let her in than he could give the order to execute her in cold blood.

"Let them in, Instructor Kandros," Nihlus replied. "Escort them up here, please." The Spectre looked back out over the bridge, his rifle couched securely into his shoulder. "Bridge is still clear. The big mechs are holding them back."

Turning toward the stairs, Garrus stumbled backward until his thighs ran into the edge of his blind. It wasn't Shepard. He could face down this golem, get some answers, and then . . . . He chuffed. And then what? Send her on her way? Shoot her? What did he do with her?

He heard her speaking to her people, warning one of them to leave his gun on his back and reassuring another that everything would be fine.

"We're here to find allies, Jack, if not friends, and shockwavering the lot of them probably not going to help with that process," she was saying as she appeared over the interior balcony's low wall, climbing the stairs.

Garrus lifted Ingrid to get a close up look at the woman . . . no not a woman . . . she was a thing . . . a vastator sent to tempt and consume him. She turned his way for a half second, his gut clenching when he saw the web of deep wounds, her flesh cracked like mud flats in a drought. What in the pits of buratrum . . . ? Try as he might to keep a wall of ice erected between them, those wounds . . .

Agony must hunt her like a pack of deranged klixen. He focused in on the glow that escaped through the horrible fissures in her flesh. Cybernetics. She wasn't a VI. Too much independent thought and action. Maybe an AI? But the body . . . ? Liquid nitrogen flushed through his veins. Dear spirits, please not that. Damn the human navy and their burial at sea. His beautiful, fierce little praela being twisted into some sort of morumplacus . . . . He'd kill them all.

At least, if they constructed a monster, the cybernetics and lack of true brain function would preclude the vastator feeling the pain of the wounds that covered her face and neck. However, as he watched her move, he saw a careful edge to the casual swagger . . . the minute winces that she tried to hide when she turned or bent. No, not some undead robot. Torment was that woman's closest and most constant companion.

"Trust me," the tiny redhead doppelganger said as the small part entered the lounge. She turned to look behind her. "I own these buildings. Aria gave them to me . . . " She turned to face front, her words dropping off as she scanned the room. "... when I saved . . ."

Garrus kept Ingrid held tight to his shoulder even as he moved his eye away from the scope as the vastator's gaze landed on him and froze. Mouth hanging slack, she just gawked at him for long seconds before finishing her sentence.

"... her daughter."

How did she know about that? Garrus's head reeled, his heart racing so quickly that he swayed, dizziness hitting him hard and fast. Damn it! Giving his neck a vicious crack to pull himself back together, he focused . . . the reason for the impostor's apparent memories bringing up the rear of the small group. For a second, his finger twitched next to the trigger as the traitorous blue face stared into his scope, going pale with recognition. His finger twitched again, and in his mind's eye, Garrus saw the bullet leave Ingrid's muzzle, the crack as she fired, glorious and final . . . then violet blood erupted out the back of the asari's head, splattering the walls. The body dropped.
Garrus slammed his eyes shut against the vision, horror sending a surge of vomit rolling up his throat. Swallowing hard, he managed to keep it down, the burn shaming him as he reopened his eyes.

You're not a cold-blooded murderer. You've been down the road that ends in rage and blood, and you swore you'd never go back.

Liara opened her mouth, no sound came out, but she shook her head, her expression pleading with him not to make any hasty decisions.

"Sweet baby Jesus," the vastator gasped, taking a step toward him.

Garrus snapped Ingrid around so her crosshairs rested between the forger's eyes. Instead of showing fear at having a gun trained on her brow, the fake Shepard grinned, her face lighting up with an expression of almost painfully intense joy.

"Blessed Enkindlers, there you are!" She lunged forward a step. "I never thought I'd see you again." She laughed, high and bright, a sound of sheer delight, and she rushed toward him. "I've been so worried about you."

For a half second, Garrus slipped his talon over the trigger, but then the rifle disappeared from his hands. He stumbled back, his armour scraping along the edge of the table, as she cradled the weapon in her arms.

"Ingrid! Oh man, I've been so worried about you. But … where's the old man?" The fake Shepard looked up at him, her eyes filled with hope. Those eyes. His heart contracted around the dagger as she asked, "Do you have Roger too?" Without waiting for an answer, she turned a slow circle, looking over the room, the joy fading from her brutalized face, melting into suspicion and uncertainty.

"You have my gun," she whispered, backing away from him a step, one hand drawing an arc around her to indicate the room. "You've built my dream in the buildings I own … ." She turned another slow circle, stopping when she spotted Nihlus standing behind the sniper blind. Moving toward him a couple of steps, she cocked her head. "You were on Freedom's Progress," she said, her tone hard and commanding. "Are you the one in charge?"

"He's not," Garrus replied, finding his voice at last. Taking a deep breath, he took Adrien's advice, locking away his emotions the best he could. It wasn't Shepard. He'd foiled the rest of the enemy's plans to take him out. The vastator in front of him was no different. "I am, and since we aren't the ones wearing a dead woman's face, we aren't the ones who owe anyone an explanation."

She spun around, stumbling backwards as she faced him, the soles of her boots grinding through the thick layer of grit that covered the tiles. One hand floated up to press against her temple, her expressions flipping through emotions so quickly that he scarcely recognized one before another pushed it aside. "Wha … ?"

She pressed her eyes closed, her entire face seeming to collapse around them. Ingrid slipped from her hand to clatter on the floor. "Why can't I drive you away?" she whispered, the words coming out slowly, each seeming to hesitate inside her mouth, as if she needed to taste them, to verify their authenticity.

Opening her eyes, the fake Shepard reached out a hand, her fingers trembling so hard that it took all his rage and horror to keep his hands at his side. Those impossibly tiny, nimble little hands. Sliding one foot a hand's span toward him, she searched the blank faceplate of his helmet. "Garrus?" A palsy even worse than the one in her hand rattled through her voice.

"Shepard … ," the black-haired woman called, stepping up behind the forgery, her omnitool glowing on her arm. "... you need to calm down. Getting upset will just make it more painful."

The doppelganger spun on the woman, her voice still shrill, the words travelling on the scream as she cried, "You said we were coming here to get help. You knew didn't you? I come in here … and I own these damned buildings." She lunged forward, grabbed Ingrid off the floor. Staggering to her feet, she threw the rifle into the woman's face hard enough to clip her in the chin. "My gun! You knew all along what I'd find here, didn't you? How much more have you lied to me about?"

Garrus stepped forward, closing in on the two women. "What the hell is going on? Who are you?" He directed the last at the black-haired woman. "Are you responsible for … this … " He stabbed a talon at the forgery. His gorge rose, and for a second, as he stared at the abomination … the living insult to the bright center of his universe, it took his entire will to keep from vomiting. "... this … thing?"

Shepard spun to face him. "Thing?" Her face contorting with agony, she stumbled backwards, going down on one knee, another scream cutting its way out between clenched teeth. Hands clutching at the sides of her head, she curled into a ball.

"My name is Miranda Lawson, General." The black-haired woman tossed the words at him as if she did him a favour even acknowledging them. Leaping forward, she crouched, reaching out to help the fake Shepard, who rewarded her with a shove hard enough to stagger her. "Shepard! Calm yourself." The omnitool flared to life again, the woman's fingers flying over the interface.

"What is this?" Garrus tore off his helmet and threw it onto the nearby couch. Releasing his grip on the storm, he let it roar, feeling as though lightning sizzled along the inside of his armour and thunder rumbled through his bones. "Is this your sleeper programming kicking in? Is she going to explode? Try to kill me?" Talons shaking with deadly promise, he grabbed Lawson's wrist as she tried to escape backward. Shoving his face into hers, he snarled through his second larynx, his demand barely verbal. "Why have you created this … profanity?"

"General?"

Garrus's heart stopped at the soft call. Releasing the Cerberus operative, he spun around to see the forgery unfold, her hands dropping away from her head … the rictus fading from her face. After a second, she clambered to her feet, clutching one of the planters. Meeting his eyes, she smiled, a soft, almost wistful smile. "General Garrus Vakarian." Pressing her lips together, she nodded. "I like it." A long sigh accompanied a faint head shake. "But, I'm not a weapon."

"They're retreating onto the bridge!" Nihlus called, interrupting. "I could use a little less theatre and a lot more help on the—"

A massive explosion rocked the building. Next to Garrus, fake-Shepard whooped and pushed past him, running to the balcony. She laughed, high and a little maniacal, then hollered, "Oh, Kasumi Goto, you beauty! Yes!" A fist punched the air as she laughed.

Garrus hit the wall at her side, able to see nothing beyond where the barricade once stood except for a massive wall of churning smoke and dust roaring toward the building. "Blast shields down!" Even before he called, he knew it was too late. "Helmets on! Get down! Everyone in cover!" He ducked down and covered his head, glancing under his arm at the helmet half a room away as the blast wave washed over them.
When he looked up, his vastator had Nihlus by the cowl, her brow resting against his. He could hear them speaking, but just the tone, not words. She pulled back and slapped the Spectre's shoulder companionably.

Garrus opened his mouth, but then the world pitched hard once more, and then again before he could regain his balance from the first. Clawing at the low wall, he kept himself on his talons, but just barely. A fourth explosion followed a few seconds later, that one not as close … probably several levels down in the Blood Pack's camp.

Fake-Shepard stood, grinning ear to ear as she faced him. "That's some infiltration team you've got there, General. She waited until they were packed together. If we have a hundred Eclipse and Blue Suns to take out I'll be surprised." The fake Shepard alerted, looking out into the impossibly thick cloud that choked the air. "Gunships. They must have repaired the ones Miss Goto didn't destroy." She yanked a kerchief up over her nose and mouth, then turned and ran for his helmet.

Garrus just watched her, stunned. They'd completely programmed her to believe she was Jane Shepard. The whine of gunship thrusters pulled him away from her. Between the dust and the echo off the buildings, he couldn't place them. "Thermal scopes!" he called. "Everyone behind cover, use your scopes. Everyone else, wait for them to—"

A flash drew his eye. He spun and threw himself backward, knowing even before he did, it was too late. The impact threw him back, lifting his feet right off the floor as the world exploded into a supernova of fire and thunder.
Chapter Summary

Shepard deals with the reality of being recently undead.

Haksaya kubenar - A term of endearment, literally translates as 'my strong, true heart'.

Cikabeknai - The reciprocal term of endearment for the above. Literally translates to 'brave love'.

26 Days ASR

General Garrus Vakarian.

Damn, Janey … just look at him. Isn't he magnificent?

Magnificent he was. Strong, in complete command, and although it didn't look as though it sat easily, that command suited him. What was it Anderson always told her? The best leaders were the ones who found it most painful?

The heartache and confusion in Garrus's eyes tore into her with unrelenting claws, but she forced herself to keep a distance that stripped her to the bone. He needed time. Even more than the things he said, his body language made that agonizingly clear.

He's mourned you for two years, Janey. That assassin tore his heart out. Give him time.

She nodded. She could do that. She could suffer a little while after everything Garrus had been through. Oh, but she wanted to slip her arms around him and feel his strength envelope her, his love wash over her with its gentle, patient passion … to wrap herself in the aura of safety that emanated from him like warmth and light streamed from the sun. As she looked around, seeing the way the people—his people—looked at him and reacted to him, she knew they all lived and thrived under that sun as well.

An explosion dragged her out of her thoughts kicking and screaming, and threw her toward the open balcony. Yes! She hooted as Kasumi's packages went off. The thief had made it through, and in glorious form. Then the wall of dust and smoke sent them all diving into cover, and she found herself face to face with Nihlus.

"It really is you, isn't it?" the Spectre whispered, pressing his helmet against her brow.

She didn't get a chance to do anything more than nod before three more explosions rocked the building and sent her reeling. Turning around to peer up into nothing but a wall of dust, she caught Garrus staring at her and tried a smile. A soft sigh squeezed through the bars when he deflected it and moved away.

Using the low, balcony wall, Shepard heaved herself to her feet and turned to look at the torin who had danced along the edge of her memory for a month, and through her dreams for years before that. Heart thumping hard and fast against the inside of her breast, she just drank in the rugged, beautiful lines of his face; the sweep of his neck; the long fringe that he constantly raked with his talons when he got upset or stressed. Memories swarmed her like moths around a light, their touch soft as they flitted past. All the love she'd felt for him poured back into her, filling her until it pounded in her temples and throat along with her pulse … until she felt as though it should blow her into tiny pieces. She pressed her hand against the chest of her armour, suddenly sure if she didn't hold it in, her heart would leap straight out.

Why didn't you let yourself feel all this before? You really can be a complete idiot, Janey Shepard.

And there he was, standing a metre away … close enough to touch, but yet an impossible distance stared at her from those eyes, the razor edge of his voice cutting to the bone with every word. His body language threw up walls and bulwarks, locking her on the other side of a hundred-foot-tall, electrified fence.

"That's some infiltration team you've got there, General," she said, fighting to keep her tone light … not reactive. She just needed to give him time and space to see the truth once his fear and shock began to fade.

Shepard took a step toward Garrus, stopping when he flinched away from her. Her hand lifted a little, aching to skate along his mandible, to press against his cheek and feel his heat. It dropped back to her rifle. Trying to ignore the fist that hammered her in the gut, she pushed forward, focusing on Kasumi and her bombs. "She waited until they were packed together. If we have a hundred Eclipse and Blue Suns to take out I'll be surprised."

She opened her mouth to continue, but then sucked in a quick breath and held it as the telltale whine of engines and thrusters cut through the background roar of debris, fire, and screaming wounded. "Gunships. They must have repaired the ones Miss Goto didn't destroy." Yanking her kerchief up over her nose and mouth, she stared at Garrus for a fraction of a second. Where was his helmet? She caught a glimpse of blue on the couch and ran to grab it for him.

"Thermal scopes!" Garrus shouted, spurring his troops into action. "Everyone behind cover, use your scopes. Everyone else, wait for them to—"

A detonation launched Shepard forward into the couch, her ribs letting out a muffled yowl of pain as she slammed into the frame. Gasping, blind, and deaf, she flailed through a heavy fog of confusion. Why has the entire world dissolved into madness around her?

"Garrus!" Nihlus's cry fear and horror.

A blur of blue flew past her, landing hard and sliding, leaving a metre long streak of indigo across the floor before it stopped. She stared, fractions of a second seeming to stretch into days as she struggled to process what she saw. The smoke and dust cleared, revealing torn and smoking armour and blood.

Oh sweet baby Jesus … so much blood.

"Garrus." Horror ripped her off her knees and threw her across the metres to his side. Hitting the floor on her knees, she slid the last metres, grabbing his arm even before she stopped. Shaking hands fumbled along his armour, finally finding and hitting his medigel. No. No. No no no no. Not like that. The universe did not get to snatch him from her like that. She hit the medigel again then dove into his belt pouch, rummaging for anything she could use, tossing everything she couldn't.

Topical medigel packs! A strangled cry of victory greeted the find, and she tore three of them open at once, dousing the areas that seemed to be bleeding the most. Helpless terror wrapped hands around her throat. Everywhere seemed to be bleeding the most.
"Medics!" she screamed, her voice cracking as the hands tightened their grip. "Where are the medics?"

"Blue Suns are repelling in on the ground and first floors." Nihlus's voice called, buffeting the edges of her perception. "Vicus, Thompson, Geranc, Powell, and Treela cover the main floor from the interior balcony."

Barely aware of the bodies running around her, Shepard ripped open her belt pouch, pulling out her topical medigel, bandages, and extra kerchiefs. The dry ice of panic built up behind the stranglehold on her throat and crawled just under her skull like ants. "Come on! Medic!" she screamed again, refusing to look at the remains of Garrus's face other than to spread medigel over the worst spots.

"Heavies!" Nihlus bellowed. "Where are the damned heavies for those gunships?"

"None of the rocket launchers have thermal scopes, sir," a young woman answered.

"For fuck's sake, use your damned ears," Shepard shouted over the din. She caressed Garrus's intact mandible as if to apologize for her outburst. "You're okay. Hang in there, big guy," Shepard whispered, leaning over him as she packed bandages over top of the medigel, applying pressure the best she could. "Just hang in there. I've got you."

"Shepard! The fight is still going on," Miranda shouted over rest of the din.

Shepard's hands just kept working, packing anything she could find against the wounds, trying to stop the bleeding. "If he dies, there is no damn fight. Not for me." She glanced up. "I need more medigel here!" A handful of ampules hit the floor next to her leg. Snatching them up, she tore them open.

The operative grabbed her shoulder, reefing her back away from Garrus. "Priorities, Shepard. And you wonder why I kept you away from those memories."

The captain whirled on the operative. Grabbing Miranda by the collar, Shepard shook her like a feral dog throttling its prey. "He dies, that's it. Do you understand me? You can take your fucking fight and stuff it up … ." Miranda's omnitool flared next to Shepard's head, the orange light burning into the captain's eyes. Flinging herself back, she spun and bent to kiss Garrus's temple. "Hang in there, Cailor. We'll get you looked after in just a minute."

Standing, she strode across the room to snatch a rocket launcher away from a young woman whose hands shook too hard to hang onto the thermal scope let alone attach it. "Step back a bit, sweetie. We don't need anyone else getting their head shot off today." Shepard settled the thing on her shoulder and closed her eyes, listening for the distinctive whine of the gunships. "How many rockets left in here?" she demanded without opening her eyes.

"Ten, ma'am," the girl squeaked.

"Say it like you mean it soldier, and get the hell over to that balcony. Keep them from getting up the stairs." Taking slow, deep breaths, she counted slowly as she listened. In … two … three … four … five.

"Ten, ma'am," the girl hollered, "and yes ma'am, Captain Shepard, ma'am."

"Better, but stop with the ma'am." A grim smile slammed her lips down tight as she homed in on the first gunship. "Shoot my torin? You want to blow people up with rockets, you bring that shit to me." She opened her eyes when the vehicle's engines lowered in pitch, preparing to hover and drop more troops. Her finger twitched on the trigger as the vehicle appeared, faint through the billowing clouds of dust. The first rocket impacted just below the nose. The second took off a thruster and the A-61 spiraled down into the guts of the superstructure, taking all four troops along with it.

The second ship dropped down fast behind her. She spun, a fierce, angry smile contorting her face. The gunship fired first, but she dove behind a couch, praying some steel, leather and foam could deflect a rocket. The couch erupted into the air, bursting into flame as it flipped over her head. She heard it tumble away, but she'd already sent three rockets straight for the wing-mounted rocket launchers. The pilot sneered at her, taking aim.

She pushed herself up off her knees, sending two more after the first just in case, but before they cleared the window, the gunship had been reduced to chunks of burning debris. She listened, but didn't hear a third. Perhaps they hadn't been able to get the last one flying. After waiting another second, Shepard spun toward Miranda.

Storming over to the operative, Shepard shoved the rocket launcher into Miranda's chest with enough force to throw the woman back, sitting her down hard on a planter. Shepard snarled in the woman's face. "Over enough for you now?"

Turning back toward Garrus, the captain cast a glance toward Nihlus. "All clear out there, old man?" When the helmeted head nodded, she returned it and ran the last few steps to Garrus's side.

Two familiar forms hunched over Garrus when Shepard hit the floor across from them. Relief flickered through her, bright and cool, the sun shining through leaves, and a smile broke across her face, so wide it hurt like hell. "Doc. Mordin. Sweet Jesus, I've never been happier to see two people in my life," she said, her words breathy. "How is he?"

Chakwas stared at Shepard, mouth hanging open for less than a heartbeat before continuing on, unrattled. "It's difficult to say right now, but we need to get him stabilized. We'll take him up to the twenty-fourth floor." She waved forward two orderlies and a gurney.

Shepard scrambled back out of the way, then helped lift him onto the zero-g stretcher. Clutching Garrus's talons in a desperate, terrified grip, she ran beside the stretcher all the way into the elevator.

"Bring him back to me, Doc," she whispered, her voice burrowing down into that place inside her that still believed wishes spoken out loud didn't come true. She backed toward the door, her fingers refusing to let go of Garrus's talons. What if it was the last time she ever held them? Finally, his glove slipped from between her fingertips, his hand hitting the surface with a faint thump.

"We'll do our best ... " The doctor hesitated for a second, her voice coming out hard and confused when she continued. "... Shepard." As she spoke the doctor's expression remained so grave that Shepard threw herself back through the elevator doors and brushed the uninjured side of Garrus's mouth with the gentlest of kisses.

"I love you," she whispered against his mouth, the first sour-acid tears leaking from the corners of her eyes. "Don't leave me."

"Shepard, must hurry," Mordin called. His voice, higher pitched and more rushed than usual, betrayed just how close death hovered over that stretcher. His hand held the door open, waiting for her.

She nodded, but had to drag herself away, her stare clinging to Garrus's face, his features blurry through the tears. "Please … ." The door closed, leaving her staring at blank metal, her heart trapped on the other side. She swallowed the cancerous tumour that spread tendrils of panic through her throat and down into her gut.

_Sweet baby Jesus, if you hear any prayer, hear this one … please. Just … please._

The tumour spread into her sinuses, the pressure building until it burned in her nose and leaked salty tears over her cheeks. Not him. Not just … not before he even knew she'd come back to him.

"Shepard, there is still an entire base to secure," Miranda called, striding up to her from the lounge. "Now that General Vakarian is receiving treatment, we need to send out—"

Whipping around, Shepard stormed over, shoving her face so close to Miranda's that her nose bounced off the operative's cheek. When Miranda pulled back, Shepard just pressed in harder, trapping the woman in the corner by the door. "Is he one of the reasons you said I'd be grateful that you brought me back?" she asked, her voice a feral roar originating low in her chest. She pinned Miranda with a forearm at the operative's throat while the other hand stabbed a finger toward where Nihlus stood, still keeping watch on the bridge. "Is he as well?"

Miranda drew herself up as if she wasn't a half centimetre away from being turned into human paste. "Yes. You see, Shepard? I told you that you would thank—"

Shepard backed off two steps, then drew her arm back and let loose with all of her freakish strength, slamming her fist into Miranda's face. She felt the woman's jaw crack, but just clenched her teeth and leaned back in. "How dare you keep them from me?" she demanded, her voice lowering even further until it resonated from her gut.

Miranda wobbled for a second, then crumpled, leaning against the wall, her legs folded under her. After thirty seconds or so, Shepard reached down, slipping a hand under her arm and helped her back onto her feet. Miranda pressed a hand to her jaw, that and her slurred speech her only concession to the injury.

"Same reason couldn't contact Anderson. Memory overload—"

"Bullshit!" Shepard leaned in, forcing her hand down to her side. They might need Miranda to be able to fight, and she wouldn't be fit for duty if Shepard smashed her jaw completely. "You kept those memories from me because you knew that if I remembered him … if I remembered them, there was no way in hell you could have maintained any sort of control over me." She laughed, cold and hard as ice and backed up. "And you were right. I'd have sneaked off that station of horrors in a garbage bin if it meant getting back to Garrus."

Hearing footsteps behind her, she reached for her Mattock, and twisted, shooting a Blue Sun who managed to reach the top of the stairs. Once the merc fell, Shepard turned back at Miranda. "You lie to me again, Lawson …. You hold anything back from me again, and I will leave." She held up her arms in a mocking shrug. "Don't know if you noticed, but my boyfriend has an army and a navy all his own."

Walking away, she heard Miranda tapping away at her omnitool and called back, "Day 26, Jane Shepard hit and punched and hurt my face on Day 26." Let her. Fuck it. Let her report back whatever the fuck she wanted. Shepard had a fight to finish. "Go get your jaw looked at. Twenty-fourth floor."

Just ahead of her, Nihlus hopped down from his blind, a hand lifting to remove his helmet once he hit the floor. "General Victus, keep an eye on the bridge for a second, please?" he called, glancing over his shoulder at another turian. He set the helmet down on the table, stared at Shepard for a moment, and then his mandibles spread, a wide smile that trembled a little. "Haksaya kubenar."

Shepard took a long breath, seeing nothing in those bright green eyes but acceptance and love. She shook her head as Tashac began to hum … a lilting celebration of reconnection.

Down girl.

"Cikabeknai," she replied, a grin spreading as the endearment just rolled off her tongue. She sighed. Nihlus looked as though he'd been threaded through the mangler a few times, but good … functional if fragile … a mug dropped on the floor but glued back together.

Sort of like someone else, huh?

Yeah, she knew all about that particular brand of broken. Damn, but she'd missed him. "Hey there, old man," she said, her lips trembling. Pressing them tight, she strode toward him with purpose, wrapping her arms around his waist.

Nihlus hugged her against him, his grip strong and comforting. He pressed his mouth to the top of her head. "Hey there, yourself." A long sigh whistled from his nose as he squeezed her tight. "You broke a lot of hearts, you know."

She clung to him, trying to ignore the gunfire in the background. "Yeah, sorry about that. I'll try not to do it again." Pulling away a little, she pressed a kiss against his mandible. "It's good to see you." Grinning, she popped a shrug. "Even better to remember you." A rough sigh greeted the sound of increased fighting, and she pressed a hand to the side of his face. "Guess we should get to work." She glanced around, letting her hand drop as she took a deep breath, settling back into Captain Shepard.

Nihlus nodded, his mandibles flicking low and tight. "The worst fighting is still down in the lowest sublevel. We've got Blood Pack flamers down there wreaking havoc." He reached back for his helmet and tucked it under his arm. When he looked down at her, his eyes shone with warmth. "You taking over, Spectre?"

She held out her hands and shook her head, incredulous. "This is your circus, but with your permission, I'll take a team downstairs to clear them out, work our way around and up through the camps." She stepped away and pulled her Mattock off her back. When he nodded, she continued, "Gather up twenty-five or so of your best and freshest, make sure they have backpacks full of heatsinks, food, water … whatever they need. We'll be gone a while."

Taking a deep breath, she steeled herself and nodded. She could clear away the rest of the trash, help the fighters below finish off the Blood Pack and then clean out the camps, make sure nothing remained but prisoners and ashes. At least that way, she'd be able to forget about her heart, clinging to life twenty-three floors above her head.

She sent Nihlus her radio frequency and then Vincent's just in case. Grinning as she imagined her XO's pique at Shepard going out without her, she said, "When Miranda comes down, put her to work. Don't let her give you her haughtier than thou crap." She reached out and squeezed his hand. "I'll see——"

Nihlus's talon sliced the air, cutting her off as the other lifted to his radio. After a second, he chuffed a little and nodded to no one. "I'll let her know. Nihlus out." Both hands dropped, his mandibles as well. "Garrus is refusing to go into surgery until he talks to you." A strong, heavy hand pressed down on her shoulder. "He's in bad shape, so you should head up now."
Shepard spun and bolted for the elevator. "I'll meet the team downstairs. Let my people know to pack me a kit." When she pressed the door control, she turned back. "Let Liara know her attendance is optional." She smiled when he nodded, gratitude warming her from her toes up. "Thank you."

He nodded and smiled, but again, she saw his mandibles tremble. As soon as the fighting ended, she just needed to sit down with him, talk … connect. Hopefully start helping him heal the hole she felt gaping at his center. Their eyes locked for another moment, but then his pain disappeared beneath his helmet, sealed in.

The door opened, Shepard stepping aside to let the full carriage of people out before she leaped in and hit the control for the twenty-fourth floor. Hope sparked bright and clear at her heart. Garrus demanding to see her … that had to be a good thing. It just did. Surely, he'd come to see that it was her, not something programmed to believe it was. He just had to. How … could she even make it through without him at her side? What would be the point in even trying?

Miranda might have a point about your priorities.

Shepard shrugged off the faint sliver of guilt. Things would work out, but first, he needed to come through his surgery. She nodded stoutly, and stood at parade rest, nose practically pressed into the doors, bouncing a little on the balls of her feet. Twenty-three floors later, the elevator opened, releasing her into complete chaos. She weaved her way through wounded lying on beds and gurneys, sitting on chairs ... even on the floor ... wherever they managed to squeeze into an open spot. Her heart ached as she pushed on, smiling to those who called out, but unable to stop … to provide any sort of comfort. Once the fighting ended, she promised herself. Once the base was safe, she'd do her best to help.

At the end of the hall, a wide door opened, the familiar professional, compassionate face of Karin Chakwas appearing above the crowd. The doc looked around for a few seconds and then, spotting Shepard, raised a beckoning hand. "This way."

The fact that the doc didn't even call her by name … the sheer strength of the doubt and disbelief, the hard edge to the doctor's tone, slammed into Shepard like a tidal wave, leaving her reeling. Beneath the wave, an undertow of isolation and loneliness grabbed hold of her, tumbling her along the bottom until drowning seemed imminent. Was she going to end up alone, cut off from everyone but Nihlus?

Then Chakwas stood before her, blue eyes cold and distant. She gave Shepard a curt nod, then hit the door control, stepping aside to allow Shepard to go ahead. "The general needs to go into surgery immediately, but he's demanding to see you before he'll let us do anything," the doctor said. "Be quick."

Once they entered the softly lit, almost silent space, the doctor stepped up to walk at Shepard's side. "What are you?" she asked. "A clone?"

Shepard slumped, the question stabbing a knife under her ribs.

Better get used to that question, Janey. It's going to get asked a lot.

"They say they salvaged my body and spent two years rebuilding me." She reached up and tapped the back of her head. "I have a shiny, new cybernetic brain stem and nanites running rampant through my body cloning and replacing cells. At least, they've stopped implanting me with new tech every couple of days." A long, low sigh spooled out, feeling like the endless handkerchief from a magician's act. "I'm pretty sure I'm me."
Chakwas stopped at a door on the left wall and held out a hand. "Be quick, and don't upset him." When Shepard looked into that familiar, welcome face, she saw no welcome there for her. She nodded and hurried past, barely holding in an apology, even though she had no idea why she needed to apologize.

Antiseptic burrowed into her sinuses, randomly jabbing the sensitive lining with pins, and her footsteps rang through the silence as she crossed the tile floor to stop next to his shoulder. She stared down at him, the air freezing solid in her lungs, her ribs threatening to explode with the pain of it. The corners of her eyes burned as she fought to hold back her tears, refusing to allow them to escape. He didn't need to see her blubbery over him as if he'd already died. Leaning down a little, she brushed the backs of her fingers over the exposed ball of his shoulder. How had she forgotten him? How could she have ever forgotten him? Then to lose him just as ... A million lost, stiletto-sharp moments sliced through her, leaving behind shallow, thin cuts that stung like brands as they leaked laughter and tears, kisses and angry words.

Stop it. Damn it, Janey, you never truly forgot him. And if you don't want to lose him, he needs surgery sooner rather than later.

Right. Shepard took a deep breath and forced a smile onto her face. "Garrus?"

His good eye opened, the other hidden under a blood-stained towel. For a long moment, he stared up at her without recognition, but then the blurriness disappeared, replaced by all the anger, hurt, and betrayal she'd seen downstairs. "You're still here," he said, his voice low and rough, slurred as he spoke without moving his jaw.

"Yeah, of course. I'm not going anywhere," she whispered, and sniffed, wiping away a tear before it dripped from the end of her nose. Damning her traitorous eyes, she let all her joy and love radiate through her smile. She leaned down to brush a feather-light kiss to the end of his nose then shrugged a little as his eyes fixed on her. "Well ... " She looked down to follow the trail of her fingertips as they caressed the curve of his uninjured shoulder. "... I had to return a few things you gave me." She leaned down, her breath warm and soft against his cheek. "You're going to need them."

His hand lifted, batting ineffectually at the blanket. "What things?" His eye closed, his chest deflating with his breath.

Shepard slipped her hands under the blanket, grasping his talons between them. His grip was weak but calloused and warm. She smiled, just a thin press of her lips. "It's okay, Garrus. I came back. I'm really here." Nodding, she ordered him to lie back on pillows he hadn't left. "Get some sleep. I'm going to go help things get settled downstairs, and when Dr. Chakwas and Mordin are done putting you back together, I'll be here. I imagine that the docs are going to want to run about a million tests on me." She pressed her lips to the back of his hand.

"Shepard, must begin," Mordin called in a hoarse whisper from the door. He stepped around Shepard to inject meds into Garrus's IV. "Risking the general to wait."

Shepard started to pull away, but Garrus tightened his grip on her hand, holding her close.

"What is it?" she asked, bending down to hear him.

"What are you?" Garrus whispered into her ear.

Shepard jerked away from him, her brow furrowed, her eyes burning so fiercely that when the tears fell, she expected them to come out blood. A hiccough of pain erupted as she breathed out, but she clamped her jaw closed on it. Her chest refused to cooperate, however, spasming with stillborn sobs.

He blinked slowly, staring into her eyes. "I held my Kahri as she died. I sat beside her body for three days before we buried her." His eyes closed, and his voice faded as the drugs sucked him down into oblivion. His last words drifted out on a shallow breath, "Don't come back."

A ragged, open-mouthed gasp escaped before Shepard bit down on her lip and cut it off. Steeling her jaw and locking everything down tight, she managed to inhale and exhale without screaming as she placed his hand back under the covers. Joints rigid, she spun toward the door just to find Chakwas watching her. Suspicion screamed at her from the tight lines around the doctor's eyes and tightly pressed lips. Letting out a soft, resigned sigh, Shepard nodded. It didn't matter; their saving Garrus did. "Take care of him, Doc," she whispered between clenched teeth.

Just as Shepard stepped past the doctor, Chakwas reached up and gripped her shoulder. After staring into the captain's eyes for a moment, the doctor lifted gentle fingers to brush the tears from Shepard's cheek. "When you're done cleaning up the mess downstairs, come back. We'll run tests, check the age of your DNA and retinal tissue … ." A firm nod met the warm bud of hope that blossomed in Shepard's chest, thawing everything enough for her to breathe without breaking down. Chakwas nodded toward the door out of the ward. "If you are Jane Shepard, we'll find a way to prove it. Go on, get to work."

Shepard pressed out a flat grimace that tried for a smile. Giving the doctor a quick, grateful nod, she headed for the door, her stride resolute. With Chakwas and Mordin on her side … there was no way everyone could doubt her. No way she could doubt herself. They'd find irrefutable proof that she was still Jane Gwendolyn Shepard.

Pushing back through the throng blocking the path to the elevator, Shepard walled up all the emotional sludge sloshing around in her brain. For the next day or so, she could allow herself one focus: clearing out the bad guys and bringing her people home. She pressed the control for the lowest sublevel, a slight smile greeting the fact it was called the garden. What hadn't he done with those few deserted buildings and some cash? She had a feeling that his genius would continue to amaze her for weeks, if it ever stopped.

The reek of smoke and charred … everything … invaded the elevator five floors before her destination. She untied her handkerchief and dragged out her water bottle. After drinking her fill, she soaked down the cloth and tied it back over her nose and mouth.

What awaited her on the other side of the doors when the elevator arrived was anything but paradise. Smoke and dust roiled in the air, charred and broken bodies lay thrown in a long pile along the walls. Hundreds of them. The garden had been trampled into a swamp of mud and gore. And everywhere, screaming and gunfire, shouting and the endless roar of flame throwers.

She leaned her head all the way over to the right and cracked her neck then rolled her shoulders and shrugged her Mattock into her hands. Time to clear out the rest of the mercs and let all these good, exhausted people rest. She strode toward the far end of the gigantic space. It had to be ten acres all told. The fighting centered at the far end where three tunnels branched out into the rest of the station.

Halfway across the space, she began to make out forms in the smoke, wounded sitting off against a wall, a couple of people working over them … soldiers popping up over cover to fire down the tunnels and then back down. Some just sat with their back against the cover, legs splayed out in front of them, too tired to move. A couple of young people crawled along the floor, handing out water and sandwiches.
A figure approached her. "Are you the one Nihlus said was coming down to help us clear the tunnels?" The command and strength in the voice almost completely disguised the soft-edged slur on all the words and the slow, careful diction needed to be understood. "Your squad just showed up," he sighed. "We're damned glad of the help."

Shepard stopped, tears springing back into her eyes. "Fuck," she muttered to herself. "Snap out of it! I can't spend the entire fucking day crying." Impatient fingers swiped at her eyes as a soldier strode out of the carnage. Tall, broad as a barn door, and wrapped in some sort of hydraulic armour, a man … blessed Enkindlers … a man walked toward her, helmet visor open, gait loose and confident.

She stopped and leaned back on a cocked hip, her rifle cradled in her crossed arms. "Yeah? So what if I am, kid?"

The man stopped, his entire body expanding as though every bit of him sucked in a huge breath. After three more halting steps, he stopped and just looked at her, the breath whooshing out. His mouth worked for a second, before he said, "You look beautiful today, Shepard," his voice tail-diving into an almost incoherent slur. A choking sort of sob chased the words out.

"You look pretty beautiful too, kid." Shepard just stared for another moment, dragging out the exquisite joy of seeing how spectacular he'd become and the agony of having missed it all. She shook her head and strode forward, her arms spreading wide. "Oh my god, look at you! Holy shit, Martin. You went and became all amazing on me."

"And you died on me." The last came out tangled in harsh sobs and then his arms wrapped around her, gentle despite the massive armour. Kisses covered the side of her head. "How? What the hell, Shepard? How … ? You died." Strong arms lifted her off the ground, and then he tore his helmet off, his tears cool and wet against her ear.

After a long minute, when he set her down and held her at arm's length, Shepard shook her head. "I can't say quite how, other than to blame some combination of mad science and miracle." She took his face between her hands. "I'm damned glad to see you, and I can't wait to just sit down and fill in all the blanks, but how about we kick these bastards in the ass first?"

Grinning, he pressed his face into her touch for a moment before turning to plant a soft kiss into the palm of her hand. "Sounds good." He bent to retrieve his helmet, hesitating for a moment before he straightened and looked into her eyes. "I'm not dead, right?"

A soft smile answered his question as she reached out and wrapped her fingers around his. "We're both very much alive, so come on, let's get this done."

Word spread that the archangel herself had joined the fight, and although the realization of where Garrus had come up with the name made her uncomfortable, Shepard couldn't deny the rallying effect her presence created amongst the beleaguered fighters. Within an hour, they'd cleared the warehouse and right hand tunnel, sealing it up at the far end. After three, only one route out into the rest of Omega remained open.

Shepard sat on a low crate, a cold bottle of water held between her soot-covered hands, and looked over the exhausted troops. A glance over at Vincent, and her people from the brave ship, Nameless, revealed exhaustion, but they looked daisy fresh compared to the Archangel personnel. She finished the bottle, ate the last bite of a really fine tuna salad sandwich, and then took a deep breath. "So, who's coming with me to clear out the stragglers?"
A bright, clear laugh greeted the massive show of hands. "Anyone who has family in the base … you need to stay, take care of your loved ones." That dropped about half the hands. "Anyone who has any medical training, shower and head up to the twenty-fourth floor, they could use you." Another dozen dropped their hands. "Okay, the rest of you, if you're uninjured and think you have another day of walking and fighting left in you, pack enough food, water, and heat sinks. We'll meet here in—"

"Does someone want to tell me why I just had to hang some pyjak up by his ankles for lying to me?" a deep krogan roar bellowed from the end of the cleared tunnel. A minute later a wall of red armour charged into the room, shoulders forward, head set down into the yoke. "Who do I need to shoot for shitting on Shepard's memory?" Carmine eyes flashed with rage as they seared the crowd under a laser-intense glare.

Shepard sighed and pushed herself up off her crate. "I was comfortable there, Wrex," she grumbled. She stalked over to meet him halfway, her shoulders hunched, hands on her hips, stare focused on the floor. When the wall of armour filled her vision, she looked up … just lifting her eyes. "Please, don't make me headbutt you. I've still got a long day ahead of me."

Wrex narrowed his eyes and leaned in close, his head cocked.

"What? You going blind in your advanced age?" Grinning, she gave him a shove. He looked good, unchanged other than the proud set to his shoulders and jaw, her hopes for him brought to fruition. "Yep, still can't even rock you."

The behemoth leaned back and hung up his shotgun. "You looked like something a varren crapped out, Shepard." His wrecking ball of a fist slammed her shoulder hard enough to punch straight out the other side, sending her stumbling into Martin, who jumped in to catch her.

"Yep," she grunted, rubbing her shoulder, "that still hurts like hell." Rolling her shoulder a little to ease the ache, she cocked an eyebrow and gave him her best, shit-eating grin. She couldn't have asked for anyone better at her back. "Going to come hunting with me or have you gotten too old and lazy?"

"Don't push your luck, Shepard," he muttered, but without any heat. "The void might not spit you back out a second time."

A-N: Still really trying to get back to Monday/Thursday … just failing miserably. Thanks to everyone who reviewed last chapter. Writing is a very solitary thing, and hearing from people … it's a wonderful thing.
Chapter Summary

Some believe, some don't, but Nihlus ... not a single doubt that the universe has granted him his most fervent wish.

Stabata - a long, narrow, nine stringed instrument strummed with both hands. Due to its many resonance chambers, and the movable flanges within, it is capable of intricate sympathetic harmonics similar to turian subvocals.

Drellak - Tall, relatively slender four legged herd animals weighing approximately 300 kilos.

27 Days ASR

Nihlus found very few methods of waking up as obnoxious as his comms chiming in his aural canal. It never failed to intrude upon his dreams in insidious ways, or cause dreams to form around it. In those, he spent an inordinate amount of time searching for the cause of the annoying pinging, just to wake shaking with frustration. They were worse than his dreams about searching for a clean, functional lavatory.

That particular incoming call grabbed him by the fringe and ripped him from a nightmare, heart pounding, sweat prickling along his throat and belly. He answered the call, grateful for its intrusion. Damn nightmares. She'd come back. Why did he still have to watch her die every time he closed his eyes?

"Kryik here." He winced at the blue threads of panic that remained tangled in his subvocals.

"Hey there, sleepyhead," Shepard replied, then yawned, coaxing one out of him.

He rolled over onto his back and stuffed all his pillows under his head. "Hey yourself. How are things going out there?"

Her voice came through dull and slurred with exhaustion but resolute. "Fine. I think we so completely obliterated the Blood Pack that they're going to consider Omega a plague ship for several generations." He closed his eyes, able to see her cheeky grin, slanted with weariness ... the cocked eyebrow. "Krogan ones." She yawned in answer to another from him, then chuckled and said, "Stop that, I'm at least fifteen hours from being able to collapse." She sucked a long breath in through her nose, one of her tells that she was bracing herself. "How are things back there?"

He knew what she meant. "Garrus is still in surgery. They got him mostly stabilized and then took a break to let him gain strength and for them to get some sleep. I went up to check on him, but they kept him out." He sighed and stretched, arms and legs extended to the point his entire body vibrated with it. "When they went back, they scrubbed a couple of geth in to help. Apparently they're going to need to do quite a lot of cybernetic repair."

Shepard just hummed a soft reply.

"He's stable, Jane." Even though he knew he didn't have to, he added, "Just focus on getting back here." He wished he was sitting on the ground next to her, back pressed against a planter or column … somewhere with a good sightlines … a bottle of water in one hand, sandwich in the other. They didn't need to talk, just sit shoulder to shoulder. Well, shoulder to arm, anyway.

Or even better, despite the impossibility, he wished she were there, safe and warm, lying next to him.

The oddly full silence of the open channel answered him for long seconds, her voice barely loud enough to hear when she finally spoke. "He told me not to come back."

Nihlus chuffed, trying for a lightness that belied the sympathetic ache that resonated through his bones, her tone plucking his strings like talons playing a stabata. "He really should know better. The easiest way to ensure Jane Shepard will do something is to tell her not to." He closed his eyes, his head heavy as it sank into his pillows. After just listening to her breathe for a few seconds, he asked, "Jane? Are you sure you're all right? You know he'll come around."

"Yeah, I'm fine, just tired." Another pause. "We're about … I don't know … a third of the way through what used to be the Blue Suns' camp. We should be back in fifteen hours. Depends how many more prisoners we pick up. We're running out of zip ties and water. I might have to send a squad back with our little chain gang."

"Zip ties?" He laughed, the detail surprising him. "Where did you find zip ties?"

"The gardening shed in the basement. Whole bag of them." He heard her head thump against whatever was behind her. She asked, "Is the base secure? Fighting all wrapped up?"

He smiled. Right to business. Always to business when personal got uncomfortable. He closed his eyes, conjuring the feeling of her lips pressed against his mouth, wishing he could kiss her and keep her from throwing up the walls. Instead, he answered the question. "Yes, for hours now. We ran a few quick area recon sweeps, but just found a lot of busted up mechs and dead mercs." He rolled onto his side and leaned up on his elbow, his voice softening to a plea. "Come in, Jane. You all need to rest."

"We will." Her tone softened to caress along his. "I just need to let the Reapers and the council know in no uncertain terms that Jane Shepard is not only alive, she's going to tear them into little chunks and serve them to the krogan on toast."

"Damn it, Shepard," Wrex bellowed in the background, "haven't the krogan suffered enough?"

Nihlus grinned and shook his head. Leave it to Wrex to shatter the moment.

Something heavy hit next to Shepard, then slid, metal screeching against metal. "Say hi to Nihlus for me," Martin said then groaned. "You're going to have to carry me the rest of the way, Shepard. I can't go on."

"Sit up, kid. You're crushing me." Turning her attention back to Nihlus, she said, "We'll be back before … what time is it? We'll be back before supper. Check in if there are any developments with the general." She let out a long, weary breathe. "Go back to sleep, and we'll see you later."

"Okay. Be careful out there." He let out a half sigh, half chuckle at the faint scoffing sound that answered his charge. "I really should know better than to ask that by now. Just get back here in mostly one piece."

"I will. Shepard, out."
Nihlus flopped back onto the mattress, readjusting his pillows to cradle his head. He closed his eyes, letting the broken music of her voice whisper through his head, savouring every word. Checking his chrono, he saw that he'd been asleep just over three hours. Every inch of him assured him that he needed at least a couple more hours. Every part except his head and his heart. They insisted that he not sleep until Shepard slept. His body led a rebellion, forcing his eyes closed and adding weights to his limbs.

The rebellion died after a scant twenty minutes of lying there, visualizing the conditions out in the camps, wondering how badly damaged the base was, and how to dispose of thousands of bodies before they began to really foul the nest. He threw back the covers and swung his legs over the side. A shower would have to do in lieu of sleep.

Marcie and the kitchen staff already had the kitchen and dining areas in order when he made his way to the ground floor. Fantastic smells wove through the stench, coaxing him to eat. Not that his belly required much convincing. The moment it smelled frying strips of drellak roast it began to roar and bark like a pack of varren.

"Good morning, Nihlus," Marcie called, passing him a tray. "Get any sleep?" The plump, motherly human leaned back against the counter and watched him pile up a healthy serving of breakfast.

"Three hours or so." He flicked his mandibles, a bashful sort of smile. After a moment, he stopped and looked at the matron. "Shepard's platoon won't be back for another fifteen hours, but they might be sending in prisoners. Do you think you could make some high energy food for them?" Brow plates pulling down low, he strained through two cycles to recall what it was Shepard had eaten all the time. "Shepard likes … peanuts? No … close, but it's sticky and pasty."

Marcie chuckled. "Peanut butter?" When he answered with a nod, she turned to the cupboards. "I'll make up a big batch of peanut butter cookies, and some of those cookies that cause wars amongst the turians when I make them. We can send those back to help get them through."

"Thank you," Nihlus replied, the weight in his gut easing as he imagined Shepard's reaction to the cookies. She enjoyed her sweets. He reached out to pat Marcie's shoulder, snatching his hand back when she jumped. "Sorry." Normally not one for touching people, he backed away, embarrassed. "I'm sure they'll appreciate that." After an awkward nod, he fled to the closest table and sat to eat.

Between his body thinking he'd tried to starve it to death over the past few days and worrying about the details of how to keep Archangel running while Garrus convalesced, Nihlus finished his breakfast without even really tasting it. One moment, his tray was full; the next, empty. At least the varren pack had gone silent.

He headed up to the lounge, the room empty but for the few snipers on watch. Pushing through the quiet, he felt it cling to him, funerary and cloying. Blood, soot, and death whispered through the silence, insistent and very present despite the room having been scrubbed and tidied. The three guards all leaped up when he began tearing down the median half of his sniper blind. When no attack materialized, they settled back into their positions, looking mortified for having been caught nodding off.

"Go lie down," Nihlus ordered, tossing a careless gesture at the cots set up at the far end of the room. "I've got the wall for now." He tipped his head a little in answer to their thanks, then turned to look out over the remains of Kima District.

Silence continued to whisper through the emptiness, shrouding the base in the uneasy, haunted pall of an ancient ruin. Archangel had lost just over a third of their defenders in the fighting. Of course, that number became disgustingly irrelevant when compared to how many Shepard had saved and how many she'd killed. That burden wouldn't sit easily on her shoulders. No doubt a good portion of her insistence on completely searching out the enemy bases stemmed from guilt. She needed to look at what she'd caused, save who she could, and try to come to peace with the slaughter. That it had been necessary wouldn't be enough to shut up the voice in her head.

A small squad of turian external forces exited the elevator behind him, speaking to each other in the closed dialect. Most of General Victus's people had already returned to their ships to sleep. The general, however, had accepted Nihlus's invitation to remain at the base and was, no doubt, fast asleep in Garrus's bed at the other end of the hall.

The sharp, efficient clip of heels on the tile alerted him to another presence approaching from behind. He didn't turn, already guessing the person's identity.

"Spectre Kryik," the Cerberus operative called out upon crossing the threshold. "My people have informed me that Captain Shepard is away from the base?" Her tone battered at him, strident, clipped, and businesslike.

He nodded, keeping his back to her. "She is clearing out the remaining mercenary forces." Glancing at his chrono, he shrugged. "She checked in about an hour ago, and expects to return in time for the evening meal."

The operative made a sound that clearly expressed how unacceptable she found the entire situation. She strode to the balcony and paced along the low wall, her stare riveted on the other side of the bridge. "She should have waited for me to finish treatment. I told Dr. Chakwas that I didn't need to … ."

His mandibles fluttered a little, a faint expression of amusement as he watched the complete stranger ranting, mostly to herself.

She spun to face him, her feet braced shoulder width apart, arms crossed. "I amuse you?"

He shrugged. "No, but you being able to tell that I was amused surprises me. Cerberus doesn't have a reputation for being able to see beyond humanity." Keeping an eye on her in the periphery of his vision, he returned to his watch.

She gave him a clipped nod. "As Shepard's XO, I knew I would be interacting with turians and other races on an ongoing basis. I like to be prepared." Pivoting on her toe, she resumed her pacing.

Nihlus raised a brow plate, surprised again. "So, is this genuine concern for Shepard's well being?" he asked, letting all his scepticism bleed through his voice. Just because he hadn't been able to guess Cerberus's game, didn't mean they weren't running one.

The woman brushed her hair back off her face, then absently tugged out the tie holding it back, and gathered it all together. He watched, fascinated by her fingers and how they managed to contain all the strands, tying it into a tight tail high on her head. How humans managed five digits and hair baffled him at the best of times. Combine them … forget it. Patting her work, Miranda let out a vague hum of satisfaction and glanced his way. "Of course I am. My organization spent over four billion credits to bring Shepard back from the dead. She's a vital and valuable asset."

Distracted by her hair wrangling, it took Nihlus a moment to even remember what he'd asked. Oh, right … caring about Shepard's welfare. A sharp bark of laughter escaped before the Spectre nailed down his surprise at her answer. "Really? That's how you're going to play it?" He hoisted his armour up his shoulders, settling it a little more comfortably as he shrugged. "If she gets herself really, really dead this time, you'll be out of pocket?" He shook his head and let out a heavy chuff as he looked back out over the bridge.

The operative stepped up beside him, staying a careful distance away, and folded her arms, her hands cupping her elbows. Her jaw clenched and relaxed over a half dozen times, betraying the silent war going on inside her before she asked, "What do you mean?"

Surprise drew his head back and flared his mandibles. Surely they must have had some idea of who they'd brought back. He laughed, cold and hard with a covetous edge that he savoured. The arrogance. They just thought they could resurrect Shepard and dance her around like a puppet. "Do you know anything at all about Jane Shepard?"

The woman bristled. "I have detailed files." Her back arched a little, shoulders rolling back. "I know she can be difficult, but once she realizes that we're working toward the same goals ... ."

Nihlus shook his head and turned away. "She will never realize that you're working toward the same goals, because you aren't." He leaned against the table beside him and crossed his arms, his sniper rifle cradled against his keel. "She refused to let me leave the Normandy alone our first mission. Felt I endangered her squad, and she was prepared to get the crap beaten out of her to make her point."

He glanced her way, dropping his brow plates low over his eyes, putting up a clear barrier of loved friend versus hostile stranger between them. He saw it register and allowed himself a small grin. Miranda Lawson might be owed some thanks for bringing Shepard back to them, but he wouldn't allow her any claim to ownership. He raised a brow plate to emphasize his point before continuing, "After Saren shot me, Shepard just kept hammering at me ... antagonizing me until I almost hauled off and dropped her."

Another harsh chuff greeted the memory of that day. "Spirits, she truly can be the most impossible, annoying being in the galaxy." He shifted a little, rocking on his talons. "Took me nearly a week to realize what she was doing, and it really had nothing to do with getting a rise out of me. She was keeping me out of my head ... distracting me. In her own, aggravating way, she was taking care of me. The important thing to know about Shepard is that she is a protector ... a caretaker."

Miranda scoffed. "I assure you, she harbours no urge whatsoever to take care of me." She dropped her arms for a second, then slammed them right back over her chest—gates locking down tight.

Nihlus nodded toward the large black mark on her face, just managing to hold back his smirk. "That might be true. She hit you good and damned hard, but ... she didn't shoot you. If you pulled that crap on me, I'd have shot you." He settled his rifle under one arm and opened his omnitool. "I'm sending you a list of people. I need you to have a look at their departments and skills, and assign them into teams to assess the damage to the base. I need them to submit reports on the actual damage and the cost to repair. I also need cleanup crews organized and supervised. That includes body disposal, but before the Archangel personnel are disposed of, we need their belongings collected and catalogued for their next of kin."

Miranda Lawson spun to face him, hip cocked, her right thumb hooking into her low slung belt. "Excuse me? I'm not a recruit." Try as she might to keep her face cool and expressionless, the haughtier-than-thou that Shepard warned him about kept peeking through the cracks.

He nodded. "And you're free to return to you ship. But if you stay here, we could use the help of someone with organization skills, and Shepard assured me you'd be eager to help." Brow plates raised, he stared her square in the eye, challenging her.

Without relaxing even one hair, she opened her omnitool and sent him her information. "Forward the files." When the chime announced their receipt, she headed for the door. "I'll have a preliminary report for you within the hour."

Nihlus watched her cross the room, but when she reached the door, he called after her, "Operative Lawson." She stopped but didn't turn. Amusement tweaked his mandibles again. Damn, Lawson was strung so tight that Shepard must have far too much fun torturing her. "Your mistake was not making her family." He nodded when she glanced back. "That's what she does … what she did on the Normandy … what she's done with the rest of your people." He turned back toward the bridge, his eyes searching the rubble on the far side for that familiar face. "She's back with her family now. Don't expect her to stay with you."

A few seconds passed before he heard her heels clipping down the hall and then the stairs. He alerted to the sound of gunfire, but it remained distant … a couple of blocks away, at least. He glanced at his chrono. Shepard didn't expect to be back for another thirteen hours at least. Spirits, had it only been two since he awoke?

A soft chuff rolled from his throat. He'd never been very good at waiting.

"Nihlus?" Dr. Chakwas called on his comms.

His pulse sped up, thumping against the front of his cowl. Finally. "Go ahead, Doctor."

"We moved Garrus to recovery five minutes ago," the doctor reported, her voice betraying both her exhaustion and her relief. "He's been removed from all life support equipment, and is holding his own very well. He should regain consciousness in the next hour or two."

"And his recovery? Will he be … ?" How did he ask if his fratri had be returned to them whole or if he wouldn't be the torin he was? Even thinking the question made him feel like a bastard.

"I believe he will recover fully. We were able to keep the cranial swelling to a minimum, and all his scans and tests look promising." She paused. "As to the matter of Captain Shepard … when she returns to the base, have her report to me."

"You can prove she's not a clone or some sort of AI puppet programmed to believe it's Shepard?" Spirits, he hoped she could. He didn't need it—Tashac had answered without hesitation—but the rest of the galaxy would demand proof.

"Eliminating cloning is easy. There are some cells in the body that age along with us, the cells in the lens of our eyes, female oocytes, and the cerebral cortex for example. I doubt her brain will be a good candidate, since a great deal of it will be cloned and regrown tissue, but the rest … should all be her calendar age. A clone's cells would be as old as they are. The rest … well, let's run the tests and see." She paused. "Do you believe it's her?"

Nihlus grinned as he heard a small, frantic firefight break out a block or so away. "I know it's her, Doctor. Thank you for the update."

"I'll have the nurses let you know when the general wakes. Chakwas, out."

Nihlus closed the channel then lifted his eyes to Kima District, listening to the music of battle. Her music. Of course he knew it was Shepard, Tashac or no. He'd known the moment she refused to leave his people before they were safe on the other side of that gate on Freedom's Progress. And now … could anyone else have wreaked such complete havoc when outnumbered a thousand to one? No. A slow smile spread across his face as he closed his eyes, able to feel her out there. Somehow the universe had answered all his drunken pleas and sweat-soaked, shaking prayers. The darkness must have heard him when he woke from the nightmares of watching her die yet again.

"Omega merc extermination services to Archangel base. Incoming prison bus," Shepard's voice called in his aural canal, alerting him to the fact that the gunfire had stopped. "We're overloaded here, so I'm sending Wrex and the worn out members of the platoon back with the prisoners. ETA ten minutes or so. They'll be coming straight down the street, so maybe keep some sniper rifles on them."

Nihlus opened the channel and lifted his sniper rifle to his shoulder, using the scope to see down the street. "Roger that. It sounded like you found a pocket of fighters."

"Pft," she scoffed. "Pocket of pansies hiding from the fighting. Apparently they took refuge in this penthouse when the mechs started their little VI insurrection. They thought the AI armageddon had begun." She laughed, but damn, it sounded as if she'd just spent half her remaining energy to get it out. "We've got two more buildings to clear over here, then the Eclipse base and then bed. All the bed."

'Understood. Dr. Chakwas just let me know that Garrus is out of surgery and doing well. She wants you to report to her as soon as you come in."

"Roger that. As long as it involves a shower and the all you can sleep buffet, I'm in." She let out a long, heavy sigh, and when she continued, her voice came through soft and hesitant. "You'll keep an eye on the big guy for me?"

"I will. Just get back here. You sound like you're ready to fall over." He waited a moment for her to reply. "Jane?"

A softer, lighter sigh answered him. "I wish I could sit down for fifteen minutes and just listen to you." She chuckled, a gentle throaty sound that warmed him through. "It's strange to realize how much you missed something you didn't even remember." She cleared her throat before he could answer. "Okay, keep an eye out for our prisoners. They should be hitting the street about now, and the guards accompanying them are falling down tired."

"Will do. I'll be in touch when they arrive. Kryik, out." He closed the channel and watched the street. The prisoners all looked pretty subdued with Wrex looming over them, and shuffled along without giving their escort any trouble. Lowering his rifle a little, Nihlus called for guards to meet Wrex at the front door and escort the prisoners to the makeshift holding cells.

Ten minutes later, the krogan stomped into the lounge, collapsing onto the half-destroyed couch. "Can you get together a fresh squad?" he asked without any sort of preamble or pleasantries. "They're all tired as hell out there. Some fresh blood to do most of the leg work would help."

Nihlus nodded. "You'll have them. The matron downstairs is baking them some sweets that you can take back with you." He studied the clan chief. Wrex's exhaustion showed, but Nihlus couldn't remember seeing the battlemaster ever look happier. "How's she doing?" he asked, hating the way that Wrex closed off at the question.

"She's a fighter, as tough and smart as she ever was." Wrex bristled, leaning forward, his shoulders expanding defensively. "You think she's a fake, too?" He pushed up off the couch.

Nihlus shook his head. "I have no doubts about her at all. Just concerned. They brought her back from the dead, and she looks like hell, Wrex." He turned back toward the street, hoping to catch a glimpse of her. "I just … well, just take care of her out there."
"Ha!" Wrex thumped him on the shoulder. "Still sweet on her." The behemoth chuckled and shook his head. "I'll watch out for her." He sniffed the air. "I smell cookies. See you later." He lumbered from the room a lot faster than he entered. "Hey! Marcie, are those cookies ready?"

Twenty minutes later, Wrex, Butler, twenty fresh Archangel recruits, and a large container of cookies headed out to meet up with Shepard. Judging by the sporadic gunfire, she'd moved on to clearing another building.

The day passed quickly once the rest of the base dragged themselves out of bed. Operative Lawson proved her organizational skills: damage reports flowed in by noon, and clean up crews set to work shortly thereafter. By mid-afternoon the body disposal teams rolled in to start disposing of the merc corpses, the entire base thrumming with positive energy. The ugly part over, the mourning not truly begun, they all threw themselves into putting their lives back in order the best they could.

Nihlus remained on watch at the balcony, catching sight of Shepard and her teams sporadically as they fanned out through the remaining Blue Suns' camp and then crossed the street to sweep down through the Eclipse buildings. No matter how thorough her search, Shepard couldn't hope to track down all the mercs. A few would escape, but he knew she counted on the stragglers to spread the word of how brutal and inventive the resurrected Captain Jane Shepard had been in destroying Archangel's enemies. It wouldn't stop the council and the Collectors from trying again, but hopefully it bought them a little time to find a way to take out those Collector ships.

At last, just when the scent of cooking began to drift over the inner balcony, Shepard emerged from the building closest to the bridge and looked up at him. She waved, then opened a channel over the comms.

"We're on our way in. Just going to—" She stiffened and turned to her right. After searching around for a couple of seconds, she knelt next to a huge chunk of fallen building.

The sound of rubble being tossed aside rumbled and crackled in Nihlus's head before he heard a male voice, faint and heavy with pain, "Guess I know who our inside man was, hey Short Stack?"

"Yeah," Shepard replied, "sorry about that, sir, but I couldn't let you take out the good guys." More thumping and banging. "This doesn't look good, but we can't just leave you under that thing. Do you have feeling anywhere?"

"That leg has been pretty dead for hours, the rest seems not too bad."

He saw Shepard pop up. "Wrex! I could use you and your krogan over here for a second." She disappeared again. "These guys will get you out of here." A little more scuffling, then she addressed Nihlus again. "Nihlus, we're coming in. Looks like we could use a stretcher at the front door."

"Roger that. Kryik out." He messaged the hospital, then got up and headed downstairs. As he strode through the lobby, he called, "Wimak, keep an eye on the bridge. East sniper perch."

The batarian jumped up off the couch and ran up the stairs as if demons were chasing him. Nihlus chuckled and shook his head. Recruits.

Picking his way across the rubble-strewn bridge, Nihlus realized that they'd have to get the body disposal crews in immediately, the stink of death and all its associated indignities already beginning to reach a nauseating level. He steeled himself against the all too familiar stench and waded in. He found Shepard still crouched behind the fallen corner column.
"Need a hand?" he asked, chuckling a little as she jumped. He hadn't been the least bit quiet in his approach, so he suspected that she'd fallen asleep even crouched as she was.

The smile that answered him grabbed his heart and twisted it. "Yeah. Wrex and his warriors are looking for something to act as a lever, see if we can't lift this enough to slide Captain Burgess here out."

"Shepard!" Wrex called, striding toward them with an metal beam under one arm. "This should work." The krogan nodded at Nihlus then toward Shepard.

Catching the hint, Nihlus slipped a hand under Shepard's arm. "The best thing we can do is get out of the way." Once he helped her stand, he wrapped an arm around her waist and led her off to the side.

Letting out more than a few roars and bellows, the krogan managed to move the chunk of building enough to remove the Eclipse captain. Wrex picked up the human, carrying him like a child, and looked to Shepard. "Can we finally end this endless damned day?"

She chuckled and nodded. "We can, glory hallelujah." Leaning heavily into Nihlus, she looked up into his eyes. "Give a girl a hand, Spectre Kryik?"

When he nodded, she wrapped an arm around him, that gentle pressure setting his heart pounding. He knew what Garrus would say about his belief in Shepard. He'd say that Nihlus just wanted it to be true so badly he was willing to accept anything as evidence. As his entire body sang, revelling in Shepard's presence, he couldn't have said that Garrus was wrong.

He led Shepard up to the lounge, pausing only to grab her a bottle of soda and a couple of cookies. When he moved to help her sit on the unexploded end of the couch, she refused, sitting on the arm instead.

"If I get that far down, you'll have to get Wrex's team in to get me up," she said, groaning softly as she lowered her weight onto the leather. "Oh, yeah. That works." She met his eyes and smiled. "Hi," she said, chuckling softly.

"Hi." He leaned back against the wall of the inner balcony. "Once you eat those, we should run you through a shower and get you upstairs. I don't think we should wait on getting your identity verified." Watching her with eager, starved eyes, he found himself grinning as she bit off half a cookie and washed it down with almost the entire bottle of soda. She wolfed her food down, just as she always had. A habit shared by every human soldier he'd ever met.

"Captain," Miranda Lawson called, striding into the room. "Back in one piece, I see." The operative hurried over and activated her omnitool. "You've worn yourself—"

Shepard slapped the omnitool out of her face. "Miranda, go stand somewhere … else. I just want to eat my cookies, drink my orange soda, and wash the last two days off my skin. You can make yourself useful ensuring that Vincent, Jack, and the others get back to the ship and are well looked after." She upended the bottle of soda, finishing it off in three gulps. A decent burp rolled up afterward. "Excuse me. Anyway, the others have been through hell, and I'd appreciate you seeing that they all got a really great meal and then as much sleep as they need."

Miranda opened her mouth to reply, but the young batarian recruit, Wimak, turned from the window and called, "Spectre Kryik, sir, Captain Anderson just arrived in a shuttle."

"Thank you." Nihlus nodded, but didn't take his eyes off Shepard, who had paled a little, her eyes latching onto his, a spirit in the pits of buratrum catching hold of a beam of light. He met her nerves with a strong, reassuring smile. Surely she didn't have anything to worry about. Anderson loved her, considered himself her father, everything would be okay.

A smile struggled to force itself across her lips, but he could see the toll her reunion with Garrus had taken as the smile trembled then shattered when Anderson's voice echoed up from below. "Where is she?"

Damn. The captain's yell resonated with several things, but none of them were love or acceptance. Nihlus drew closer to Shepard, drawn in by all the pieces missing from her gaze. The woman before him was Jane Shepard, he knew that as surely as he knew anything, but despite restoring Shepard's pulse, breathing, and memories, death had claimed big pieces of the woman he'd known … pieces Cerberus hadn't brought back from the void.

As tough as she remained, Nihlus felt a fragility flickering just beneath, sunlight shrinking between the leaves. He stepped up just behind her right shoulder, his hand brushing the back of her arm just to reassure her that he had her back.

Anderson strode into the room, stopping dead in his tracks as his hard, searching gaze landed on Shepard. Nothing welcoming awaited her there, but neither did Nihlus see anything furious or accusatory. The captain's stare just moved over her as if she were a piece of furniture.

"Anderson!" She jumped up and took two steps. Her boots squeaked to a halt as he jerked back from her, his hands lifting defensively. She extended a hand a couple of inches, her tone soft and pleading when she said, "Anderson?"

The captain edged around her without speaking a word, moving as if he expected that tiny body to erupt into a Reaper. Once clear, he stormed over to face down Miranda. Very real fear ignited behind Nihlus's keel, the threat of violence … the raw pain simmering in Anderson's rage palpable. The Spectre didn't care about Miranda, although he supposed he wouldn't let Anderson kill the woman, but a very real possibility resonated through the room that the captain might just try to put his daughter's doppelganger down.

Nihlus shifted to stand between Shepard and the captain, his talons poised to drop Anderson to the floor if he needed to.

Anderson bulled straight into Miranda's face. "Are you the one responsible for this … this sick joke?" His bellow rang tight with emotion.

For a moment, the captain's clenched fists seemed about to give Lawson a matching black mark on the other side of her face, but then Miranda stepped back, holding herself straight and apparently unintimidated. "It's not a joke, Captain." She nodded toward Shepard as if the entire situation were completely reasonable. "This is Captain Jane Shepard. My organization salvaged her body when it was jettisoned from the Normandy. It took nearly two years … ."

"Two years to do what? Reanimate some puppet?" he roared, his deep voice reverberating off the walls. Nihlus saw that it pummelled Shepard as well, her body jerking as if each echo slammed a fist into her gut. The Spectre opened his mouth to tell Anderson to back off, but the captain's rage erupted again. "Why? What is your angle? What could possibly justify perverting that beautiful child this way?"

Lawson took a deep breath, crossing her arms defensively. "We brought Shepard back because we believe she is our best chance at preparing for and surviving the Reapers, Captain." Nihlus winced as the haughty mask slammed into place. Spirits, Lawson really didn't have a clue how to deal with people.

The Spectre turned a little to keep an eye on Shepard. Her entire body trembled, looking as though even the slightest touch would shatter her completely. He reached out to squeeze her fingers, but she drew away from him, balling her hands into fists.

"Bullshit." Anderson threw his whole body into stabbing another accusatory finger at Shepard. "You didn't even bother to make the copy convincing. Dull, pale … you didn't even bother with her freckles, and you expect us to buy this? She looks like …." The captain stared at Shepard for long seconds, his mouth trying to form words, eventually spitting out, "... a wax work, and a nightmarish one at that!"

Nihlus's gasp of dismay matched the one that sounded as though it had driven all the air out of Shepard's lungs, and she collapsed around the blow. Anderson's words tossed a spark into the fuel, and Nihlus's control exploded. He threw himself between them, sheltering Shepard with his body even though it could do nothing to block the worst blows. "Anderson! Enough! This is Jane, and she's standing right here. Shock is understandable … so is not believing that she's real, but spirits, you don't have to crush her heart."

Anderson spun, his weapon an invisible one, but Nihlus felt its deadliness nonetheless as it came to bear. "You believe this?" the captain demanded. "You believe that these monsters salvaged her frozen corpse and brought it back to life, soul intact?" He stalked a couple of steps closer, moving sideways to see past Nihlus.

Nihlus compensated, keeping Shepard sheltered behind him. "I do. I don't know how they did it, but they brought her back." He raised his hands, trying to placate the captain enough that he'd stop bludgeoning Shepard. She made a soft, mewling sound that reached down inside him and sank claws into his heart. That time, when he reached behind him for her hand, she clutched it with both of hers, stepping forward to press against his arm.

"She has all the beacon memories, and the knowledge that Amalair translated." He held a hand out to keep the captain back, but also hoping to calm him. "This is Jane."

Anderson drew back, his face twisting into an almost vicious scowl. "And how much have you had to drink?"

Nihlus winced, but drew himself taller and threw up his shields. Let Anderson turn all that bile on him. He'd taken worse and could weather it a hell of a lot better than Shepard. "Nothing for two days."

"This is not Jane. Jane is dead." Anderson emphasized every word by stabbing a finger toward Shepard's chest then spun back to face Miranda. "I don't know what Cerberus's plan is, but I've already contacted Alliance command. Admirals are being sent to investigate, so expect to lose your puppet." He backed toward the door a couple of steps. "As for this desecration … if there is the slightest sign of a VI or an AI, I will put it down myself."

Shepard's hands yanked free of Nihlus's, leaping to her chest, clutching one another over her heart as she turned away from them, frantic, terrified eyes searching the room as if hunting for somewhere to hide. A soft moan escaped before she pressed her fists to her mouth and started backing toward the door.

"Come on." Nihlus turned away from the captain and wrapped his arm around Shepard's shoulders, guiding her from the room. There was no point in letting Anderson cudgel her any longer. Even if it didn't break her, he'd piled up enough to regret once her identity was proven. Shepard didn't resist, shock driving her into a protective shell. Once she had a shower and a chance to rest, she'd pull out of it. He led her into the back of the building, to the only place he knew no one would go looking for her.

When he stepped through the door to his small apartment, Shepard looked around the dim space. Her face remained slack as she asked, "Where are we?"

"My place." Nihlus stepped in front of her, his hands wrapping around her upper arms. "Anderson is just in shock, Shepard. He'll figure it out, and be glad for this … " He shrugged, his mandibles flaring. "... miracle?"

She just stood there, staring at him. One trembling hand reached up, tracing his familia notas with her fingertips. "They always seem to glow in the dim light," she whispered, her stare locking onto his eyes. Deep waves of confusion swirled through the green, tearing up everything in their path. Her voice came out in a sigh so soft, it could have been thought. "Why? Why didn't they just leave me dead?"

"No!" Nihlus yanked her into his arms. "No! Never say that." He held her tight, lifting her feet right off the ground, cradling her in his embrace.

"Did I say that out loud?" she asked, cocking her head a little. After a second, desperation latched onto him again. "Am I just some … thing, Nihlus?"

"Okay." Nihlus let out a long sigh that whistled through his nose. "You took care of me on Freedom's Progress. My turn." He released her, sliding his hands down her arms as he stepped back. Taking her hands, he tugged her toward the bed. "Come on. Let's get you into a shower and then upstairs." He pressed his brow to hers, eyes closing as he willed his strength and belief in her to transfer, buoy her up for just a little longer. "You're okay, Shepard. I've got you."

(A-N: Another milestone this week. Thank you all so much for the support. hugs and love for all See you in a few days.)
A brief lull in the storm.

28 Days ASR

Shepard opened the bathroom door to a massive cloud of steam. The humidity created a formidable barrier that solidified around her nostrils and mouth, making each inhalation a chore. Aching, her entire being stripped to the bone and as numb as a foot gone to sleep, she pushed into the rolling billows of steam. She could find the energy to stay on her feet long enough to wash Omega from her skin.

Even before the door closed, she ripped open the collar panel of the skin-tight tunic and pulled it over her head. She reached behind her to undo her bra, but couldn't convince her arms to lift far enough. Not that her smallish B cups prohibited pulling the detestable device straight over her head. She laid her hands over her fabric-covered breasts and sighed. With all the perceived imperfections that Cerberus had eliminated … her scars and freckles … she considered herself lucky they hadn't decided that huge boobs were necessary to save the galaxy.

A bitter laugh crackled over her tongue as she flung her tunic in the corner then stripped out of her trousers and panties, piling them on top of the shirt. Maybe the boob job was scheduled for later in the rebuilding process.

Footsteps approached the door, but she didn't bother to scramble for cover up. "You're steaming up the whole apartment," Nihlus chastised, but his voice just brushed over her, a gentle caress without any heat. "You going to shower with half your clothes still on?" Gentle talons unclasped her bra, then held a bottle over her shoulder. "Here. I stole this from Garrus's bathroom." When she took it, he turned and stepped back over the threshold, the door whispering shut behind him.

Shepard stared at the bottle. Her shampoo. He'd kept it. She popped the top open and inhaled, her eyes drifting closed. There it was. There she was … or part of her at least … as familiar and close as her heartbeat. It seemed that Garrus and Nihlus's voices weren't the only things she'd missed without remembering them.

She set the shampoo on the counter and stuck her hand under the water. Roasting hot, just the way she'd liked it once. Not anymore, not with the crevasses in her flesh carrying the heat all the way to her bones. She turned it down a little and stepped under the stinging spray.

A sharp cry squeezed out between her clenched teeth as a thousand tiny knives carved into her. Breathing through her nose, she counted off … warrior inside and out. She just needed to tough it out for a minute or so. The pain would numb. She knew how to take pain … knew how to muscle through it better than nearly anyone.

"You all right in there?"

A soft smile whispered across her face as she opened her eyes. "Yeah," she replied, the expected lie. Of course she wasn't all right. She'd spent the past couple of days bouncing down the tick marks on the left hand side of zero. So many had passed by that she began to hope the 'all-right scale' bottomed out at some point.

"You didn't even make the copy convincing. Dull, pale ... you didn't even bother with her freckles, and you expect us to buy this? She looks like ... a waxwork, and a nightmarish one at that!"

Shepard reached out, bracing her arms against the wall and let her head hang from her shoulders, chin to her chest. She just wanted to sleep. Who needed to get clean, anyway?

"What are you?"

She flinched as Garrus's words slammed through her head, a firework set loose to ricochet off the inside of her skull. How many times had she asked herself that same question over the past month? Too many, but damn it, she'd hoped to look into his eyes or Anderson's and see that they knew who and what she was. Naive to the point of stupidity, she supposed. They'd been there. They knew she died. Why would they just throw their arms wide and welcome her home?

"I held my Kahri as she died. I sat beside her body for three days before we buried her."

Oh, Garrus. A hiccoughing sob erupted from her throat, collapsing her at the waist, her knees buckling as she folded down. He'd sat by her side, holding her hand for three days. She'd been so stupid, wasting the time they'd had being afraid. She crouched, splayed fingertips braced against the tile above her head, gasping for breath between sobs as a waterfall of hot water poured over her brow.

During their clean-up mission, Martin had brought her up to speed on her missing years. Garrus refused to move on, swearing himself to a dead woman. As much as the depth of his devotion moved her, being the reason he lived half a life ... it ground her heart under its heel.

And Anderson ... .

"As for this desecration ... if there is the slightest sign of a VI or an AI, I will put it down myself."

Sliding sideways, Shepard sat on one hip, her legs folded under her. Once her shoulder and brow pressed against the wall, her hands dropped into her lap. She understood his anger, and in an odd way, his fierce defense of her memory touched her, but ... those words sliced like scalpels, cutting open dark, deep, and hidden parts of her.

"Don't come back."

The tears stopped, the pain sputtering as its engine ran out of fuel and died. Shepard closed her eyes, allowing the corner of the shower to hold her upright as Garrus's words punctured the tank, her will draining out, swirling into the water as it poured down the drain. Limbs heavy and numb, mind unable to form more than half a thought before the thread broke, she simply huddled, too tired ... too done ... to even move.

"Jane?" The worry in Nihlus's voice stroked invisible fingers down the back of her neck. Someone believed in her. Someone had looked into the glowing implants behind her eyes and still knew it was her. His low rubble shivered through the steamy air. "I'm coming in unless you can answer me in some sort of complete, coherent sentence."

What did it matter?

The door opened, and a long, whistling sigh preceded the torin over the threshold. "Yeah, that's about what I thought." Nihlus crouched beside her and ran a hand over her hair. "Been a hell of a couple of days." He twisted around; she could just see his boots rotate on the white floor tile. A moment later, he lowered himself to sit next to her, his fully clothed legs stretched out in front of him.

Another low, almost purring sigh rolled over her. "We spend far too much time on bathroom floors, you and I." He produced her shampoo, popped the cap and squeezed some straight onto her head. "You know, hair seems like a lot of trouble. It's always in the way, gets full of filth, and … it's just weird." His talons massaged her head a little, then he chuffed. "Hm. Feels nice though. Sorta silky, like tussat tassels."

As Nihlus played with her hair, scrubbing here and there, then swirling his talons to make spikes and whorls, she eased around to lean against his side. He felt warm and solid, the only real thing in the entire galaxy.

"All right, being able to sculpt it is fun," he said, finishing a line of spikes down the center of her head. "You look like one of those lizard things I saw in an Earth museum once."

"A dinosaur?" Shepard shifted the rest of the way, hugging her knees to her chest. She looked up into his eyes, soaking up all the confidence and belief she saw there. When he smiled, a flutter of mandibles, she rested her head against the breast of his tunic. "I'm so tired, Nihlus. I've been so very tired for the last month. I think half of me got left behind when they dragged me back."

A knuckle pressed gently under her chin, tilting her head back. "Close your eyes," he said, shielding her eyes even so, the side of his hand pressed against her brow. He rinsed the soap from her hair with gentle talons then bent down to nuzzle the top of her head. "Did you get clean at all?" he asked, gathering her into his arms, his chin resting on the top of her head.

Shepard just shook her head and leaned into him. The pressure of his arms and side helped ease the pain down to a dull ache. She plucked at the soaking material of his heavy tunic with the fingers of her one hand. "Probably going to get cleaner than you under all this," she said, trying for levity.

Nihlus ran the pad of his talon alongside a deep fissure that spiraled around her shoulder, a fractal covering the entire joint and down her shoulder blade. "Does it hurt you to wash?" He lifted his head to look down her back. "Damn, those wounds are everywhere, aren't they." A soft keen threaded through the words. "What are they from?" His thumb talon caressed her arm, sweeping along between two long canyons. "Does this hurt?"

Shepard shook her head and leaned in tighter. "It feels good." She closed her eyes and took a long, slow breath. "As for the wounds … they hurt all the time. Sometimes it's an ache that I can't ease no matter how I sit or lie … no matter what I wear or how I adjust my clothes. Sometimes it's raw and burning." She tilted her face into the water. "Showers mostly, and when I spray them with the antibacterial and sealant. And then, sometimes it feels like being eaten alive by varren." She shrugged. "Miranda says they're because my flesh is as ornery as the rest of me and refuses to grow over the cybernetics."

She slid one arm from between them and wrapped it around his waist. "They had to wake me up six months early … the base was under attack. I refused to let them put me back under, even though sometimes I wish I had."

Nihlus released her and started to get up, but Shepard grabbed his arm. "Not yet, please." When he lowered himself back onto the tile, she stared into his eyes, searching for truth beyond the kindness, even beyond the love she knew he felt. "They should have just left me alone," she whispered, the words drifting like autumn leaves from the hollow place that howled inside her. The moment they hit the air, they turned to ash and dust. "Why didn't they just leave me alone?"
Nihlus's large hands cupped either side of her face. The rasp of his calloused palms burned against her cheeks, but the pain anchored her, cutting through the mess brewing inside her skull. He arched a brow plate. "I'm going to just say this once, so I really want you to listen to me, Jane." He pressed his mouth to her forehead for a moment before pulling back to meet her stare again. "We need you. That's why they did it." He shrugged and shook his head, a helpless, lonely sort of gesture. "The entire galaxy needs you."

Shepard reached up to grip his wrists, her smile sour and slow. "You don't need me, Nihlus. Look at all this. You guys did this without me. All of it." Blowing a quick puff of air out her nose, she leaned into his hand and closed her eyes. "You would be fine."

His grip tightened, the pain startling her and snapping her stare straight back to his eyes. "We'd be dead, Jane." His brow plates jumped toward his fringe. "Are you forgetting what you walked into here? Before your one woman wrecking crew showed up, we had maybe twelve hours left to live, and I'm not exaggerating that. All of us, myself … Garrus … the kid … we'd all be corpses on the floor."

As she looked into those … what had she called them that first day during her schoolgirl crush moment? … piercing green eyes, she saw unfettered, unembellished, unabashed truth. One corner of her mouth tweaked a little. "Okay, so maybe not entirely fine."

Nihlus grinned and nuzzled the end of her nose. "Not at all." He nodded toward the stream of water. "You able to take it from here?"

Slipping from his grip, she shifted around onto her knees and wrapped her arms around his neck. "Yeah, I've reached my pathetic quota for the day." She held him tight, a thin sliver of guilt stabbing into her. "I'm so sorry, Nihlus."

He held her gingerly. "You have nothing to be sorry for, Jane. Nothing." He nuzzled her ear. "Come on, up you get. Scrub the filth off, then let's get upstairs, and you can sleep while the doctor pokes you with her omnitool." He chuffed. "Why does she do that, anyway? It's not like poking us with it makes it work any better."

Shepard chuckled, quiet mirth welling up through the weariness, a bright spark. She drew back and kissed him. "Thank you," she whispered against his mouth before pulling away. Running a hand over his head, she said, "You know … having a fringe just seems weird, and I can't even sculpt it."

A wide grin and resigned head shake answered her teasing. Standing, Nihlus reached down for her hands, and pulled her up. One finger brushed her cheek, softer than an autumn rain but just as sweet and full of regret, then he turned and strode out.

Feeling lighter if not less exhausted, Shepard made quick work of cleaning off the built up grime, patted herself dry and wrapped the towel around herself before heading back out into the main room. She blinked a little, her eyes adjusting to the dimmer, red-tinted illumination. Her armour all sat piled, clean and shining, at the foot of his bed, and a pair of sweats and a t-shirt graced the corner of the mattress. He sat on the couch, feet up on the coffee table, a datapad glowing in his hand.

"Wow, look at all this. Who knew you had a caretaker in there? And a speedy one at that," she teased, bending to find her belt amidst her armour. Retrieving her antibiotic spray and sealant, she held them up. "Give me a hand?"

Nihlus kicked his feet off the table and stood, letting the datapad fall behind him on the couch. "Sure, what can I do?"
Shepard set the towel aside and sprayed the antiseptic down her front. "It needs to be sprayed just on the crevasses." She held out the bottle. "Please?"

He sat on the end of the bed and tugged her over between his knees. "I can probably handle this dangerous and skill taxing assignment." He sprayed her one shoulder, squinting, his mandibles held slightly spread and rigid, his concentration belying his teasing about the task being a simple one. "So, I thought humans were all uptight about being naked in front of ... well, pretty much anyone."

Shepard shrugged. "That doesn't last very long in the military. You change and shower where and when you can." She chuckled. "Although, I did shower in my bra and panties for about the first year."

He hissed softly between his teeth when he moved to the backs of her legs. "How do you wear armour with these wounds?" A soft, distressed rumble rolled through his second larynx. "Spirits, Jane, I could lose a talon in the ones on your thighs." A gentle hand wrapped around her waist just above her hip.

"Painkillers," she said simply. She glanced back when the cool mist stopped hitting her skin. "Done with that one?" She took it, then passed him the sealant. "This one is really important to just get on the wounds, or I end up feeling like a Barbie doll all day."

"A what?" he asked, his brow plates drawing down tight over his eyes.

"Barbie is a plastic human-female-shaped doll made for little girls to dress up."

Drawing his head back, Nihlus chuffed softly. "Somethings are universal." He cleared his throat. "I had a doll as a perir. His name was Aurin Plavidus, a very noble name, I thought. My pari used to make me little sets of armour for him out of scrap ... the most beautiful, intricate ... ." He trailed off, then shrugged. "I still have him, and all his armours, back in storage on Ilium." He sighed. "I should go pick all that up some day. Anyway, I'd dress him up and take him into glorious battle on the back of the excavator while my pari worked."

Shepard grinned. "I turned all my Barbies into pirates and astronauts, cowboys and soldiers. It drove my mother insane. I swear she had Bunny just to raise a girl." A sad smile barely bloomed before it wilted.

"Here," Nihlus said, passing her the sealant. "All done back here." A perplexed frown met her questioning stare. "Although, having seen your ... what do you call it ... your backside? ... several times now ... I have to ask ... ."

Shepard's trap alert began to ping at the base of her skull, and one eyebrow headed for her hairline as she crossed her arms. "Go ahead." The smirk on his face told her that she was walking into it, but still ... .

"Does it come in adult size?" He stared at her, mandibles twitching. She punched him in the shoulder hard enough to lay him back, and his inordinately pleased, teasing laughter lit up the room.

"Har. Har. Go ahead, smart ass, laugh it up." Shepard hid her grin and shook her head. "I knew that was coming." She started spraying her front. "You think you're so clever." Finishing up her treatment as he chortled away to himself, she just let the easy camaraderie flow over and through her. Two years ago, she never could have imagined being so completely at ease with him, but the Spectre had changed ... settled. Garrus had been good for him.
Anderson's words barked through her thoughts as she reached for the blue t-shirt emblazoned with the stylized golden wings on the left shoulder.

"And how much have you had to drink?"

Questions lined up, pushing at the backs of her teeth, but she swallowed them. She could ask Nihlus about that later. She dressed in the t-shirt and sweat pants, then put the first two bottles away and pulled out a third and a mirror.

"What's this now?" he asked, sitting up. He took the bottle from her hand when she held it up and looked at the label. "I don't read human common."

"It's just the sealant. I can't spray it on my face." She chuckled and climbed up to sit cross-legged on the bed. "What if I accidentally sprayed it in my eyes or nostrils?" Bouncing a little, she looked down. "Damn, turian beds are nice. There's got to be forty centimetres of mem-cel here."

He turned around to sit cross-legged facing her. "It's the cowls. We need a lot of depth to get proper spinal alignment." He opened the cap on the sealant and squeezed some out onto the pad of his talon. "Lean in here."

She did as he said, her mind still on the bed. "Blessed Enkindlers, Garrus must have been in agony sleeping on the bed in the captain's quarters on the Normandy. That thing made me ache after a couple of hours."

Nihlus nodded and spread the clear ointment over the rents covering her face. "He started each day with a limp that whole last month chasing Saren."

Sadness clung to that thought. "I never knew," she whispered.

"Of course you didn't." He screwed his face up as he followed the convoluted lines of scarring. "He got up early to work the kinks out so that you wouldn't."

"I don't blame him, you know," she blurted out, her thoughts flipping at light speed. After everything Garrus suffered through, she didn't want Nihlus to think that she harboured any resentment for his rejection. "Same with Anderson." The air burrowed down into her lungs, sneaking out with her words, making them breathy-sounding, as if she'd been running. Her heart fluttered, rather than taking a full beat as he stared into her eyes, his attention almost daunting.

"I mean, it hurts, but how can I blame them for being suspicious?" She shrugged then planted her elbows on her thighs, leaning close and tilting her face up. "Archangel has been under attack for what … a week? Betrayal, traps, and attack coming at you from everywhere. And then, here I come … dead Shepard to the rescue."

His mandibles fluttered as he squeezed more of the sealant onto the pad of his first talon. "Dead Shepard?" His chuckle teased her face into a reluctant smile. "You going to make that official?"

Despite herself, Shepard laughed, the sound letting off a release valve. Rocking forward, she reached out and shoved him. "Might as well. Maybe as my middle name. Jane 'Dead' Shepard."

Pressing her lips into a considering scowl, she nodded. "I like it."

Nihlus shrugged and spread the sealant along the crack under her right cheekbone. "I don't know. I like it as a first name. If you're going to own it … own it." He finished applying the sealant. "All right. You're ready to face the galaxy."

She scoffed. "Ready to face the galaxy." Shepard opened the small mirror and held it up to look at herself. "I don't even recognize myself; how are they supposed to?" She ran a finger across the bridge of her nose and across her cheekbone. "And they're right … no freckles … no scars … I'm just a cheap knock off."

Nihlus snatched the mirror from her hand and snapped it closed. "Losing the scars might just let you move past leaning on that crutch, and as for the freckles … ." He chuffed and swung off the bed onto his feet. "I don't know. I always thought your face was a little busy. How do you concentrate on someone's eyes with all those spots everywhere?" He shuddered. "It's weirder than the hair."

A small, strangled sound … half-sob, half-laugh … clambered past the sudden rockslide in her throat. Damn. Scrambling up onto her feet, she stood on the edge of the bed and wrapped her arms around his neck, hugging him tight.

"Okay, come on," he said, his voice soft and rolling. "Let's go provide the rest of them with proof."
He tossed the tube onto the bed, then picked her up, long arms supporting her backside, and carried her to the door. "I need to document this … the great Captain Shepard being carried without protest." He set her down at the threshold then returned to the bed for her sweatshirt. "Put your boots on. I don't know if you noticed, but this place is a mess right now."

She slipped her bare feet into her boots then shrugged into the hoodie and zipped it up before heading out. Even in the short time they'd been in Nihlus's apartment, the cleaning crews had performed miracles, getting most of the lobby and first floor back to normal, if bullet-riddled walls could be called normal.

Miranda strode up to them as they turned toward the elevator, greeting them with a curt nod. "Captain … Spectre Kryik." She passed Nihlus a datapad. "Half the departments have reported in with their repair estimates. Most of the damage was restricted to the exterior of the base and, of course, the sublevels. Buildings two and three sustained minimal exterior damage. Body disposal crews are working in the sublevels and across the bridge. Three more crews are expected to report in within the next eight hours."

Shepard's eyebrows lifted, her earlier anger replaced by admiration for Miranda's thoroughness and willingness to work so hard for people she didn't even know.

Miranda continued, "The effects of Archangel personnel who perished in the fighting are being boxed up. A list of the deceased is enclosed in my report." She let out a long breath and backed up a step. "Relatives are beginning to call. I assigned half the accounting department to answering calls, but I left issuing official condolences to you or General Vakarian."

"Excellent work, Operative Lawson, thank you." Nihlus stepped back and activated the datapad.

The operative nodded in reply then turned to Shepard. "Captain, the team is aboard the SR2. Dr. Eis signed off their mission-end health reports, citing nothing more serious than bullet grazes and exhaustion. Yeoman Chambers purchased pizza and beer to feed them, which was greeted with far more enthusiasm than my proposed menu of steamed fish, legumes, and salad. Commander Javik refused to comment on his food preferences."

Shepard chuckled and shook her head. "Don't take it personally, Miranda. The team needs comfort more than nutrition at the moment. You can crack down on our eating habits in a couple of days."
When the elevator opened, Shepard gave the operative a weary smile. "And Javik has forty years of paranoia to work through. Just stock precooked fish and fruit—nothing citrus—for him. Frozen or canned will do. Just leave instructions for the can opener and the microwave somewhere he can find them."
Taking note of the dark circles under the operative's eyes and the increasingly colourful mark spreading across her face, Shepard said, "When you wrap up whatever you're doing for Archangel … get some rest. Eat some pizza. Relax a little. It's going to get a lot worse from here."

She followed Nihlus into the carriage. "I'll make it an order if I need to," she said, the doors closing before Miranda could reply.

"Commander Javik?" Nihlus asked when the carriage started to rise. "The one in the unusual armour?"

Shepard grinned. "You're not going to believe me."

Crossing his arms and cocking a hip, he challenged her without saying a word.

"Okay, but you aren't." She stepped up to the door, her eyes on the controls as the numbers climbed. "He's Prothean."

"Prothean?"

She grinned. "I told you—"

"Now, wait!" he protested. "Give me a minute or two to process before you start your gloating dance." He chuffed. "It's a particularly ugly dance." After a second, he stepped up beside her, his entire body vibrating and rigid. "Wait … a … second … Javik? That Javik? The … ?" When Shepard nodded, he rumbled low and threatening. "It's a wonder Tashac didn't insist that you disembowel him. Where did he come from?"

Shepard chuckled. "Who says she didn't? And he came out of a stasis pod excavated from that cave-in on Eden Prime. Cerberus stole him. He was still in stasis when I got aboard the SR2." She cast a quick glance at him out of the corner of her eyes. "I figured we could use the help of a live Prothean."

The elevator doors opened to reveal a much quieter hospital floor. A few patients slept in beds and cots along the sides of the hallway, but for the most part, they'd been moved to rooms. Dr. Chakwas stood in a huddle of nursing personnel going over a very full board of patients. Looking up and seeing Shepard, the doctor gestured toward a room in the corner.

Shepard walked through the door into a small room with a medical bed and full bank of equipment along one wall. She stopped at the side of the bed, staring, daunted by the waist-high surface. Turning around, she held out her arms, and pitched her voice into a high, helpless, childlike plea. "Lift me?"

Nihlus gripped her waist and popped her up onto the table without any effort, but grumbled about not having video evidence yet again. "Lazy." His mandibles snapped, daring her to argue. She didn't. He had the right of it, but her weariness had driven all the 'give a fuck' out of her.

Shepard didn't have time to form a snarky comeback before the doctor strode into the room. "Lie back," Chakwas said, her tone warm despite its usual, brisk efficiency. She raised the head of the bed, then walked over to a metal unit in the corner.

"How did they get you off the Normandy, Doc?" Shepard asked, stretching out, a decadent groan celebrating the glorious state of horizontality.

The doctor unfolded a blanket and spread it over the captain. "I still accompany the Normandy when she ships out on missions, but the labs here allow me to conduct important research." She smiled and raised an eyebrow. "Comfortable?"

Shepard pulled the heated blanket up to her chin and let out a happy moan. "I hurt everywhere, but lying down ... heat ... Sweet baby Jesus, Doc ... just glorious."

"Good." She activated her omnitool and tapped the interface, bringing up a large holographic projection over the bed.

Shepard squirmed a little as she eyeballed the complicated series of screens and readouts. "Ah, Doc ... what is that thing? I don't have any bullets to rip out of me, but I do have a lot of metal these days."

Chakwas chuckled, but remained focused on her omnitool. "It's one of Mordin's creations, and don't worry, it will only be taking scans. No ripping will be involved." She closed the interface and patted Shepard's shoulder. "Just relax and get some sleep. I'm going to take a few tissue samples, and then the scans will take about an hour."

Shepard took a deep breath and let herself relax down into the mattress. "I think I can handle that." She jumped up to lean on one elbow when Nihlus stood. Hammering against the inside of her ribs, her heart threatened a panic attack and tears if the Spectre left her alone. Alone had once been her thing, but right then, right there, alone felt like an endless hole yawning below her. "You're not leaving?"

Nihlus slid his chair over to face the head of the bed and looked up at the doctor. "I won't interfere with the test results if I sit under this thing with her?"

Chakwas just shook her head and closed her omnitool. "I need you to just look straight at the ceiling, Captain. I'm going to use a very fine laser to harvest a few cells from the edge of the lens in your eye."

The smile that Shepard managed to bully onto her face felt strained. "Shooting lasers into my eyes, sure ... that sounds awesome." She let out a shaky breath, her smile loosening a little as Nihlus took her hand between both of his. Her eyes slid closed for a moment as she savoured the rough, hard, warm ... gentle contact. She'd forgotten that as well. The nights that Garrus had held her nestled in against his chest while he read to her, one hand always caressing her, soothing her to sleep.

"Shepard?"

The captain opened her eyes, quickly blinking away the burn of threatened tears. "Sorry, Doc. Laser away."

The procedure took only a second and didn't hurt in the slightest. The second one, to steal one of her oocytes, took a little longer and hurt considerably more, but then it too, ended.

"I'll be back when the scans are complete," Chakwas said. She walked to the door and dimmed the lights. "Get some rest, Captain."

When the door closed behind Chakwas, Shepard looked up at Nihlus. "Thanks."

He just nodded and turned his side into the bed a little. Shepard rested her head in the curve of his shoulder, then stared up into the holographic maelstrom, waiting for some sort of alarm to start screaming. When nothing happened, she closed her eyes and let sleep coax her with its siren melody.
Comfortable and thick, silence settled around them, her sleepy thoughts wandering back through the day. "What did Anderson mean when he asked about how much you'd had to drink?" she whispered, the quiet darkness lending itself to the question. She opened her eyes to find his closed.

"Functional drunk, I believe is the term," he answered, his subvocals rolling heavily despite his voice barely stirring the air. "Just go to sleep, Jane. It will keep. It will all keep."

Shepard started awake, her heart thumping hard and quick. Frowning, she leaned up a little, searching for the cause of her alarm. Darkness and quiet hung heavy and still, the air cool outside the covers. She took a deep breath, Nihlus's familiar desert and spice scent easing her back onto the mattress as it oriented her. The familiar rumble of snoring rolled over her shoulder and long arms wrapped around her, holding her against a turian-shaped heating unit. She lifted her arm to check her chrono. 0938.

How long had she been asleep? Lifting her head, she looked around the room. Nihlus's apartment. Had he carried her back? Damn, she hoped not. That was not an image she wanted imprinted on the Archangel personnel.

What had woken her up? A nightmare? She couldn't recall any images. Slipping a hand under her arm, she checked for sweat … nothing. So, not a nightmare. At least not one of the really terrible ones.

Someone pounded on the door, loud enough that Nihlus let out a couple of snorting breaths and lifted his head off the pillows. "What?" he asked, his voice low and thick with sleep.

"Someone's at the door." She rolled over onto her back and looked up at him. "A Spectre's work is never done."

A muttering grumble, heavy on the subvocals, answered her as he threw the blankets back and rolled over to sit on the side of the bed.

The banging returned, that time accompanied by the telltale sound of someone bypassing the lock. Shepard scowled and sat up. Where the hell had Nihlus put her guns? The door opened, bright light pouring in from the hallway, blinding her as a shadow stepped through.

She scrambled out from under the covers and crawled down the bed. Maybe her guns were with her armour.

"What in stinking pits of buratrum is this?"

Shepard froze at the sound of Garrus's voice. Rage, confusion, and disgust battered against her, the sheer force of it sitting her back on her heels. For breathless seconds, she stared into his eyes, the ice-blue of his glare closed to her. A sharp cough of disgust shattered the frozen silence, then he spun on his talons and stormed out the door.
Garrus up and out of bed with a brain injury. Some things just shouldn't be said or done with a brain injury.

29 Days ASR

Liquid nitrogen poured down Garrus's spinal column. Frozen in place, brittle and fragile, he stared at the two people leaping out of the bed, scattering to put themselves together. Disbelief screamed so loudly that it wiped everything else out of his head. His purpose … everything he'd intended to show Nihlus … everything he'd planned to say to warn his fratrin … Gone.

He said something. Sound came out his larynges, and his tongue and mouth formed it into words, but he didn't hear them through the crashing tide of pain and disgust and disappointment battering the inside of his skull. On the bed, the fake Shepard … of which he now had proof … just stared at him, wide-eyed. Did she know why he'd come to see Nihlus, or was it just guilt in the face of getting caught prying her way into the fold?

He looked over at Nihlus, the Spectre standing next to the bed, his tunic in his hands, and the ice shattered. Pity shoved aside the disgust. Spirits. He knew Nihlus missed Shepard … they all did, but sleeping with this … facsimile … his fratrin must have had a great deal to drink.

Fake-Shepard moved to get off the bed. No. Garrus spun on his talons and walked out the door. He couldn't deal with her. He couldn't look into that face and listen to her lies … or her delusions. He'd talk to Nihlus later … slap some bloody sense into him. Nausea from the storm raging inside his head and neck turned his insides to water, but he pushed through it, making it halfway down the hall before dizziness and pain forced him to stop. Buttressing a hand against the wall, he braced himself against the galaxy spinning around him far too fast for his medicated, concussed self to keep up.

"Garrus!" Nihlus chased him down the hall. "What are you doing?" His fratrin stepped in front of him and pressed a hand against his shoulder. Garrus shrugged it off and nearly fell, Nihlus all that kept him from hitting the floor when he leaped in and grabbed the general under his good arm. "Damn it," the Spectre said, his voice soft rather than upset. "Why are you out of bed? Does Chakwas know you're up and breaking into people's apartments?"

Garrus clenched his jaw, took a long breath and pushed off the wall. "I came to see if you'd checked your incoming messages. However, finding you in bed with her tells me that you haven't." He stepped around Nihlus and continued down to the lobby door. As Garrus hit the door control, he nodded toward the Spectre's wrist. "I suggest you check your messages before you allow that Cerberus weapon to sink her talons in any deeper." He stepped through, then, sharp-edged and bristled, turned back to block Nihlus. "And get dressed. Make sure that Cerberus whore is before she comes out here. The last thing we need is half-dressed drama in front of the cadets."

Nihlus retreated down the hall,shrugging into his tunic as he went. "Spirits, Garrus … you know that I—"
"When you're sober, I know exactly who you are and what you'll do," Garrus interjected, spinning away before Nihlus could protest his sobriety. Bracing himself against the wall as the inside of his head got left behind then whirled to catch up, Garrus closed his eyes. He really should just return to the hospital level and get back into bed. He didn't have the strength to deal with all the insanity.

"Shepard!" Nihlus's exclamation echoed out the still open door.

"Thanks for being there for me, Nihlus. I've got … well, I'll catch up with you later." Garrus heard boots striding down the hall, the steps quick, light, and determined.

He shoved off the wall and hit the elevator control. "Come on," he grumbled, staring at it, willing the damned thing to open and give him enough of a head start to escape, if only for a little while. He pushed through even before the doors opened fully, then hit the control to close them.

Shepard dove between the doors even as they closed, one gauntlet trapped under her arm while she pulled the other one on. Once she tugged both into place, she looked up, studying him with that eerily glowing stare. After a second, she let out a long breath and shook her head. "Garrus, you need to get back to the hospital. You look like hell." Her face drew into a pained grimace that pulled the skin apart over the cybernetics, their glow fierce and red through the raw meat.

Garrus stumbled, his stomach heaving, but caught himself against the railing.

She reached out to help support him, wincing as if he'd struck her when he yanked his arm away. Still, after a second, she stepped toward him again. "Nihlus has Archangel in hand. Give yourself time to heal."

Garrus let out a chuff that felt as though another rocket exploded against the side of his head. A soft grunt escaped between his teeth as he braced himself against the pain and answered her. "Nihlus has spent the last two years at the bottom of a brandy bottle. And after what I just saw, I can't say I place much faith in his decision making." Again, she jerked back as if he'd punched her in the gut. A faint, vicious satisfaction prickled under his plates, but after a second, it began to burn. That torin … that was not the torin Kahri had loved.

Recovering quickly, she came back at him with a very convincing replica of Shepard's stubbornness. "What do you think you saw in there, Garrus?" She cocked her eyebrow and shrugged. "Two clothed people leaping out of a dead sleep because someone was breaking into the room is what you actually saw." She cocked a hip and bulwarked her arms across her chest. "Forget what you think about me and what or who I am. You know, I understand your scepticism. I really do. Occam's razor is not my friend right now." A strangled sort of sigh cut from her throat, and she raked a hand through her hair.

She shrugged, a helpless flap of arms and shoulders, almost violent in its resignation. "So, go ahead, suspect me all you want … that knot will untangle when it does. But, you know Nihlus, and should bloody well know that he'd never hurt you … drunk or sober." She shook her head, her expression tugging at the unreasonably naive part of him that wanted to believe in the impossible. "So, yeah, I get you not trusting me, but the shit I just heard you say to him in that hallway … I hope to hell it's the head trauma talking." She turned to face the door, her hand stabbing back toward Nihlus's apartment. "Because that viciousness was not the torin I loved. And if that's who you've become … you're a bigger stranger to me than I ever could be to you." A choked, thick sob hiccuped through her, he watched it travel up her spine, but she bit it off before it escaped.

He forced his stare to slide over her rather than lingering to run comparisons with the woman in his mind. Had she been that skinny and frail, but sharp and hard like obsidian? The elevator saved him, jerking his attention away from her back as it stopped on the fourteenth floor. Her words added to the shame simmering under his plates, flushing the back of his throat with bile, sour and metallic.

The moral high ground was supposed to be his, but his anger kept turning the rock to mud beneath his feet.

The door opened, letting Martin in. The kid looked good, well rested and recovered. A splinter of envy slid under his plates to join the shame. Martin greeted both Garrus and Shepard with salutes, unable to hide the wide grin that greeted the replica. Spirits, not the kid too?

Still, Martin brushed past Shepard to stand next to Garrus as the doors closed and the carriage began to rise once more. "Should you be up? You look like you got shot in the head by a rocket." He cocked an eyebrow at Garrus when only a soft growl of subvocals answered him. "Right, in a mood. Understood." He sighed and held up a datapad. "To business then. First … Daro'Xen is missing. Her cell door was blown off, and she is nowhere to be found. No idea if she escaped or died." After waiting a few seconds for Garrus to answer, he shrugged and continued, "How many guards do you want assigned to the prisoners?"

Garrus frowned, then winced at the fireworks of pain going off beneath his bandages. Spirits, even blinking felt like someone taking a knife to his face. When he opened his mouth, the words came out with blades of their own. "Why do we still have prisoners?" That time Martin jerked back from the slap. Garrus felt Shepard's eyes on him, but focused on the kid.

"Sir?" Martin shuffled a little, his gaze shifting restlessly between his datapad, Garrus, and Shepard.

"Have they been questioned?" Garrus watched the numbers blink past, moving toward the doors even before they began to open. When they did, he pushed through, hurrying as quickly as he could manage without losing his balance, falling over, and vomiting all down himself.

"Yes, sir," Martin answered, jogging along to keep up as Garrus settled into a lengthy stride.

"Do they know anything?" Stopping, he spun to face the kid, managing to save himself and look fairly casual by slapping his hand against a door frame. He already knew the answer to his question. None of the mercs, not even the officers, would know anything more than that they'd been contracted to take out an enemy of their gang and the council. He glanced at Shepard, who stood back, her arms folded across her chest, her stare neutral. Fury rose up to meet that neutrality. Another weapon poised to take him out standing there like she belonged. The anger rose in his chest, magma bursting from the ground, threatening to blow him to ash and wash him away.

Spirits, how he wished it could wash him away. Then all the body bags lined up … all the friends lost to betrayal … all the waste and uncertainty—he glanced at Shepard again—all the confusion and fear could all just disappear into the undertow.

"No, sir," Martin answered. "They were all just following orders."

Garrus nodded, a sharp jerk of his head that rammed a solid steel spike down his spine. Good, he needed it. He needed to stay solid … strong. "Then empty the cells, Instructor Weaver." Out of the corner of his eye, Garrus caught the tightening around Shepard's mouth, the deepening of the furrows that dug into the skin around her eyes. She closed down and looked away, clearly understanding the order even if Martin didn't.

The kid's forehead furrowed, his heavy brows disappearing behind his prosthetics. "Let them go, sir?" He shifted foot to foot a little, looking as if he wanted nothing more than to turn and run, to pretend he'd never found Garrus, never asked about the prisoners.
A long grumbling sort of groan answered before Garrus opened his mouth. "No, Martin, I didn't mean to let them go." He turned back toward his office, making them chase him if they wanted to keep up. The faint satisfaction returned, penetrating his chest to slither around his heart, ice-cold scales abrasive and shameful. He'd upset her, and he liked it. Damn, he was a bastard.

"But, sir, they're unarmed prisoners," Martin stuttered. "I can't ... ." He looked to Shepard, who just turned away.

Garrus stiffened. Great, demoted in the course of two days from general to the _torin_ standing two paces behind Shepard, and not even the real Shepard.

How much would you have sacrificed for that position even three days ago?

He stomped that thought to dust and glanced at Shepard. Having the real Shepard's back was a privilege. Having his subordinates look to that piece of fakery formed the worst sort of insult. The replica's expression didn't shifted a millimetre.

When Shepard didn't step in, Martin shuffled a little more, then gave Garrus a stiff salute. "Yes, sir." Dropping his hand, he turned and wandered back toward the elevator, looking lost ... no, looking as though he wished he were lost.

Garrus slammed back his office door with enough fury that Vortash didn't even look up. The batarian wore bandages on his face and neck, and what pale yellow skin showed between was mottled a terrible black and green.

"Good morning, Instructor Vortash," Fake-Shepard said as she followed Garrus through the door. "You're looking better."

The batarian nodded. "Captain Shepard. Thanks for pulling me out of that bloody tunnel."

Garrus glanced back as she pressed her lips tight into a sad sort of smile. "Thank the fact that you all wear identical armour. Only reason I stopped was I saw one set of recognizable boots amidst the mercs."

Storming past the desk, Garrus slapped the control into his office. Even his most loyal people were accepting her without question. When the door shut behind Shepard, he turned and, leaning back against the desk to steady himself, faced her.

"You didn't say anything about the order to execute the prisoners." Had he been hoping she would? No, the prisoners couldn't just be set loose. They endangered Archangel. Still, a tiny voice in the back of his head prodded him for the truth. Was he so desperate to rail against her that he was setting her up?

Fake-Shepard just shook her head and walked over to the miniature galaxy map. "It's not my place to question your orders," she replied, staring into the slowly turning display of stars and coloured dots.

The simple statement opened a valve, releasing the pressure that was keeping him upright. A hissing sigh escaped as he sagged down to sit on the edge of the desk. "But you don't like it?"

Her shoulders popped in a small shrug as she turned to face him, her face a careful, still-neutral mask. "Of course I don't like it, but I'm a soldier. I've heard a lot of orders I didn't like in my time. I've obeyed more than I'm comfortable with, and given more than I can hope to be forgiven for." She hooked her thumbs in her utility belt and drew her shoulders up around her ears in a bristling, defensive posture.
She sighed and shrugged, dropping her shoulders. "But, if it's what you feel you need to do to protect Archangel, that's your call. This is all you." Her stare held his for at least a minute before she walked over and lifted a hand to press against his keel, the first contact she'd made with him since before the surgery.

And whose fault is that? She kissed you … held your hand … told you that she loved you, and you told her to go away and not to come back.

She held his stare, those green eyes making his heart ache worse than his head. "But if you break that beautiful boy's spirit because you're angry and distrustful of me … . By the glowing asses of the Enkindlers, I'll kick you so hard that you'll spend the rest of your life feeling like my foot is still rammed up your ass."

"I have other people who will be more than happy to finish off those merc bastards." He stared at her hand, unable to feel the light contact through the thick tunic.

Her hand fell away, and she nodded, her lips set in an expression that clearly asked him if those were the sort of people he wanted to have his back. He looked past her, allowing the message that had awaited him in his morning mail to play through his mind. He couldn't let his love for Shepard draw him into this replica's game. Swallowing hard, he braced himself, shoring up all the softening edges. Yes, he wanted to believe it, but he needed to hold himself to a higher standard of vigilance, for the sake of everyone … even her.

"You expect me to believe that you don't intend to have any say in Archangel business?" he asked, enough of an edge in his subvocals to make it a demand.

She backed away from him. "I didn't say that. As pieces of the bigger war, I expect the troops and the fleet to be at the war council's disposal. But other than that? Of course not." Holding her hands out away from her side, she turned a little one way then the other. "None of this is me, General. This … this is all you."

Damn her. Garrus let his eyes sag closed for a moment, then lifted his hand to his aural canal. "Weaver. One guard for every three prisoners. Make sure the kitchen knows how many extra mouths they need to feed, and that there is a two person escort per prisoner to the head. Strip them, search them, get them in basic gear. Confiscate all amps and omnitools, and process their belongings."

"Yes, sir, General Vakarian!" The kid's relief practically jumped through the radio and hugged him. "I'll have a report for you by the end of the day."

Garrus closed the channel and met Fake-Shepard's grin with a scowl. After holding her stare for a few seconds, he pushed off his desk and retreated around to his chair. "As for you," he said, taking a deep breath and steeling himself to administer the blow. "You are not welcome here. I told you not to come back, and that was a one time warning. If you set foot inside this base again, you'll be processed and locked up with the prisoners."

Looking down at the datapads covering his desk, he swallowed hard, a frozen fist reaching down into his throat to wrap around his gullet. "If you interfere with our operations against the Collectors or the Reapers, I won't hesitate to shoot you."

Fake-Shepard stepped up to his desk, her fingertips pressing against the top. "Why can't you see that it's me, Garrus? All that time we spent … the long hours we looked after one another on Feros … eating junk and watching the Maltese Falcon after Donovan Hock … the nights you held me and read to me … . Why can Martin and Nihlus see me, but you can't?"

The tears in her voice … the crystalline token of sorrow that bloomed as it hit his desk … lifted a reedy keen from his throat, but he choked it down. Without looking up, he activated his omnitool, pulled up the message that he'd received overnight. Guts churning, he looked away. He couldn't watch it again. Thank the spirits, it didn't have sound. If he had to listen to it … if he had to hear the sounds gasping from her open mouth ... he didn't think he could keep himself from throwing up.

Shepard let out a faint hiss of what sounded like anger or disgust as the vid began to play, but he didn't look up … couldn't look up. The … thing … standing before him had taken the person he loved … the gift he'd never thought he'd receive and turned her into … his traumatized brain struggled to find the words and failed.

"Garrus … ." Fake-Shepard sighed. "That was a fake … a ruse to protect Al—Specimen Alpha—from Miranda and her bosses. I hoped that if they thought they could use him to control me, that they wouldn't just shoot him in the back of the head while we were escaping." She muttered under her breath. "We were faking it for the cameras. That wasn't real."

He deactivated his omnitool. "Don't come back. I imagine this vid will have lessened Nihlus's sympathy for you."

"Garrus, please. We can talk about this. Don't just send me away."

He saw her shift, but didn't look up. His pulse pounded in his head like a timer counting toward detonation, the pressure building until he began to retch. "I have a lot of paperwork to catch up on," he managed to say, his voice a thin rasp.

He knew the sound of a heart breaking. The sharp, resonating crack of his own remained ingrained in his bones and etched into his soul … something he could never hope to erase. As Shepard stepped back from his desk, a tiny sound crept from her throat, a soft mewl that he knew heralded his blow striking true. The pain woven through that sound tore at his resolve, insisting that he look up … that he at least acknowledge the damage.

Instead, he took a deep breath and flushed his veins with ice water. Picking up one of the pads, he activated it, staring at the information there without seeing it. Her footsteps crossed the floor, and the door opened.

"I love you, Garrus." The whisper tumbled to the floor, breaking into pieces on the tile, and then she was gone.

Garrus dropped the datapad on his desk. Acidic, oily tears burned the corners of his eyes as a long keen broke free of his control. Damn Cerberus. He'd smash the entire organization … bring it down around their ears for dredging up all the old agony … for what Nihlus and Martin would go through losing her again … even for the pain that the poor, programmed fake was going through.
They'd pay for all of it. Starting with Operative Lawson.

He lifted a hand to his aural canal. "Vortash, make sure the outer guards know that I want the Cerberus operative, Miranda Lawson arrested the moment she sets foot in this base. The same goes for everyone else on that crew, including Shepard if she returns."

"Sir?" Vortash's gravelly voice rolled with confusion. "Those people saved us. Captain Shepard pulled me out from under a half ton of rubble herself."
"That's the only reason she's being allowed to leave. I'm turning off my comms, route any calls through my omnitool. Vakarian out." He closed the channel and forced himself to focus on the reports. He had a base to rebuild, outposts to secure, refugees to bring home. Enough time and pain had been wasted on Cerberus. As long as they stayed away from him, he'd return the favour.

Three hours passed in a heartbeat, his wounds straining his concentration to the breaking point, but he muscled through. As long as he didn't move or yawn or cough … or breathe, the pain remained bearable. His omnitool chimed incoming messages throughout the morning, but he left them. Anything truly important would end up with someone pounding on his door.

The first intrusion appeared not as a pounding, but a command override on his lock. Dr. Chakwas appeared in the open portal, one hand on her hip, the other holding a medical bag. "You're supposed to be semi-horizontal up on the twenty-fourth floor," she said, striding across the threshold. Without so much as allowing him a chance to protest or explain, she circled his desk and activated her omnitool to run her scans. "But since the mountain refuses to come to Muhammad, Muhammad will come to the mountain."

"That makes no sense," he groused, wincing away from the brilliant orange light. "And I'm fit enough to sit at a desk and read reports."

"You have a closed skull fracture and a severe concussion. That leaves you fit for drooling into a pillow, and that's it. By all rights, I should tranq you and drag you back upstairs by the foot." She tapped at the interface. "And if I could drag you, I'd do just that. Your intercranial pressure isn't subsiding the way it should."

She opened her bag, withdrawing several syringes. "I'm going to give you some painkillers, but they won't completely eliminate the pain. I want you to be able to tell if the pain is getting significantly worse. If it does, come upstairs. That's an order."

"Fine." When she shut down her omnitool, he looked up at her. "You ran tests to verify that Shepard isn't a clone or a VI driving her body?"

Chakwas stepped back and leaned a hip against the edge of his desk. "I did, but … " She held a hand up when he opened his mouth to ask her about the results. "I'm not going to break her confidentiality. I sent you a message an hour ago saying the tests had all come back. If she's comfortable with you being there when I give her the results, then you're welcome to accompany her."

"I ordered her to stay away from this base," Garrus said, fighting to keep his voice even.

She straightened and picked up her bag. "That would explain why I've tried several times to reach her, but to no avail. No doubt, she's turned off her comms. I contacted her ship, but her yeoman hasn't heard from her since yesterday." She strode to the door. "I've always considered it a good policy to not make major life decisions for myself or others while under the influence of a brain injury. You might want to consider making that one of your guidelines as well, General." She palmed the control.

"If and when I hear from the captain, I'll send a message that you will, no doubt, ignore."

About an hour after Chakwas departed his office, Garrus leaned back, intending only to rest his eyes … his sudden weariness probably due to medication-induced sabotage. He awoke a considerable time later, startling awake from a nightmare. Heart pounding, head and neck alternately slamming him with stabbing and throbbing pains at random intervals, he scrambled to keep from falling backwards out of his chair.
Damn. He braced his elbows against the top of the desk and lowered his head gingerly into his hands. Although the dream images had already begun to dissipate, he recalled the general theme. Trapped back on Haestrom, wounded and in agony, he'd wandered the ruins screaming for Shepard, but she never answered.

Of course not, you sent her away.

He focused back on his work, ignoring the pain, ignoring the growling in his belly … blocking out everything other than budgets, repair schedules, and the hundred details needed to open the third building to house the refugees from their outer bases.

Chakwas returned to give him medication and thump a large container of liquid meal replacement down in front of him, but other than growling something about no one having heard from Shepard, she remained silent.

After a few more hours of work and another neck-breaking nap, Garrus awoke to someone pounding on his office door. He blinked, and activated his chrono. Damn. More than twelve hours had passed since he shut himself away.

"Open up, Garrus, or I'll bypass it," Nihlus called from the other side.

"Go away, Nihlus." He had no desire to see his fratrin. Nihlus had no doubt been drinking and would want to either discuss the vid or Garrus sending Shepard away.

Why wasn't Nihlus the slightest bit suspicious? He'd just climbed into bed with her. That level of trust … without proof … it just didn't make any sense.

Damn it. He wasn't jealous, was he? Yes, he didn't believe it was Shepard. He knew better. Dead was dead. But the anger that morning … the viciousness … had that all been pure pique because while he was lying in post-op, his fratrin had been curled up in bed with Shepard.

"I've sent you messages every half hour since just before noon. You've ignored them all, so now, I'm coming in whether you like it or not." A second or two passed and then the telltale bypass music of the Spectre's omnitool began. Thirty seconds after that, the door opened and Nihlus stepped through.

"You really can be a completely stubborn ass, you know that?" the Spectre said, his voice just shy of shouting. "You were all too quick to leap on that vid as proof that Jane was a fake, but when people try to contact you, to talk to you about it, you lock them out and shut them down." He activated his omnitool.

"Nihlus, I'm tired and in pain. Don't dance around … what do you want?" He dropped his arms to the desktop and stared up at his fratrin with undisguised annoyance.

"About two hours after I opened the file we were sent, another message came in addressed to both of us and Operative Lawson." Nihlus brought up a vid file and pressed play. "I'm going to assume from your continuing foul demeanour that you haven't bothered to look at your messages."

"I don't want to … ;" Garrus started to say, but then Shepard's face appeared on screen, a sincere expression of concern knitting the skin between her brows into a frown.

Taking a slow, deep breath, Shepard whispered, "Right now, you are etched in stone under the liabilities column on Miranda's ledger." She stared just past the camera. "She is working very hard to keep me from forming attachments to anyone who doesn't work for this organization. When the fighting breaks out, and it will, she'll have every gun under her command aimed at you."
A hand lifted into frame, skating the backs of talons along her jaw. "And you think this will shift me over to leverage? If Miranda believes she can control you through your attachment to me … ."

Garrus watched the vid playing on Nihlus's omnitool, the audio and different angle shattering the illusion. Shepard cackled helplessly over some strange human joke or pun, while Specimen Alpha muttered grumpily. Miranda and the others showed up, and the sounds of fake orgasms overwhelmed the laughter for a moment. The vid ended, but Nihlus didn't move.

Even as his gut sank, his ugly words lodging like stones in his gullet, Garrus looked up at his fratrin, questioning. What else was there to see?

Movement on the screen drew his attention. "She has nightmares every time she falls asleep," Alpha's voice said, the darkened recesses of a hood appearing in frame. "She screams and calls out … thrashes like she's fighting off the forces of buratrum." The turian shook his head, revealing the pale shine of his eyes for a moment. "The things she says … bone-chilling. I've never mentioned them to her. She doesn't seem to recall them at all when she wakes up, and I'm loathe to dredge any of that up if being awake gives her peace from it."

Garrus glanced at Nihlus. "Last night … ?" Guilt, slick and oily, slithered under his plates, its scales rasping like a promise … an itch too deep to scratch. He'd sent her … .

His fratrin just nodded without making eye contact.

"Apparently the blocks that Operative Lawson and her goons placed in Shepard's mind only apply when she's conscious, because she calls for Nihlus and someone called Garrus as well as Anderson, and her family." Alpha took a deep breath. "I know I can't convince you that she is Jane Shepard. However, having been resurrected by the same people, I know she is, because I am still me."

Alpha sucked in a deep breath and shook his head again. "She doesn't deserve what Lawson will do to her if you let her get away with this. Shepard doesn't deserve to be isolated and enslaved to this war. And trust me, that is why the vid of our little pantomime was sent to you. Cerberus wants her all to themselves. They want … no need … to control her completely." After another second of looking into the recording, Alpha shrugged, and the vid ended.

"She's a mess, Garrus," Nihlus said, his voice soft and nasal. "She's trying to act like she isn't, and while she's awake, I think she even convinces herself that she's same old Shepard. But if you'd seen her sleep, you'd know that she's just patches and ribbons." He blinked a few times. "I've done my best to help her deal, but the two people she loves the most think she's some … monster."

Garrus stared at his desk, Nihlus's words slicing through his plates to hit bone. The abrasive, icy scales of shame wrapped around his heart, strangling it until he could barely draw breath. Spirits … he'd let the combination of pain and … yes … jealousy … strike her far too hard and far too deep.

Nihlus closed his omnitool and turned to face Garrus head on. "Forget that you thought I would do that to you … that you think so little of me, you just assumed I'd have sex with her." The Spectre sucked in a long, ragged sounding breath. He laughed, but it came out all bitter nettles and thorns. "She was just trying to save his life, and you called her a whore. Guess I'm not the only jealous idiot around."

"How do you know it's her?" Garrus demanded but without any heat or malice. Standing, he walked over to stare into Nihlus's eyes. "You know Shepard died. We buried her three days after she was shot in the head." His pulse roared inside his skull, making it feel as if the entire room pulsed along with it. Lightning flashed, following the lines of his skull as the pressure built, throbbing behind his eyes. Spirits, what if it was true? Did miracles that huge even happen?
Nihlus laid his hand on Garrus's shoulder, the contact breaking through the pain. "You've looked into her eyes. Why don't you just know?" The Spectre smiled, but the pain running beneath it squeezed Garrus's heart tighter in the icy vice. "The universe has given you a miracle, Garrus, and you're spitting in its face."

All the strength in Garrus's muscles fled, and he sagged back, only the edge of his desk keeping him from hitting the floor. He stared into Nihlus's eyes, light-headed and reeling. For long moments he struggled against an ache in his chest so strong and so crushing that he reached for a waste basket, sure that he'd throw up.

When he managed to speak, it came out as a soft gasp. "It can't be her, Nihlus. It just can't." His stare drifted down to the floor, his voice burrowing down under a low, wavering keen. "I promised I'd never hurt her … that I would be the one person who never hurt her." Salt-laden tears seared his eyes before escaping, pooling above his cheekbones for a moment before falling.

Nihlus stepped forward, to grip him gently by both shoulders. "Welcome to the club, Garrus." He shrugged a little. "That day she brutalized her hands … all I needed to do was be kind. I knew she was just looking for a way in." He stepped back, and turned to pace to the door. "And now … even Anderson is treating her like she's some sort of bomb sent to take him out. She tried to board the Normandy to see Kaidan and Joker, and he chased her off."

That image hit like a grenade. Anderson? Damn, that would have broken her heart right in two. No wonder no one had heard from her. Where would she go?

"We've all let her down at some point." Pivoting on his talons, Nihlus turned back. "The true test is what we do once we have." The Spectre's mandibles dropped, sweeping in and out with his distress. "She's been missing almost twelve hours, Garrus. I've got to go look for her. I hope you'll come with me. The kid is already waiting down in the lobby."

Garrus nodded, his fear so huge, so overwhelming that it paralysed him, trapping the air in his lungs. What if it wasn't her? What if he let himself believe it? What if he loved her, and it turned out that she was a clone or some sort of trap? What if it was his Kahri … and she left him again?

"Garrus?" Nihlus stepped up beside him and turned, wrapping a leading arm around his waist. "Come on. Chakwas has the results. We'll contact Miranda, see if she can help us find Jane, and we'll get this all sorted. Trust me … trust Merol … we know it's Jane."

Garrus nodded, a sliver of hope cutting the shame away from his heart as he allowed Nihlus to guide him to the door. "Okay." Even if there was the slightest chance … didn't he have to take it?
Mass Effect - Future Complex Chapter Forty Five

Chapter Summary

Bonus Chapter!!! Garrus and Nihlus go looking for Shepard. What will they find?

30 Days ASR

"Spirits, why would Shepard come down here of all places?" Nihlus grumbled, shoving a very drunk vorcha out of his way.

Garrus stopped, leaning against a planter for a minute, panting weakly as he struggled to catch his breath. Once he recovered a little, he shoved himself upright and lifted a leg up to sit on the low wall. "I don't know. Maybe she just started walking, and this is where she ended up." He pulled his water bottle from his hip pack and sipped at it. He didn't dare to drink too much for fear of throwing up. His head felt as though it intended to explode off his neck, the throbbing overwhelming everything but the need to rinse the oily slime of Omega from his throat.

Breathing through his mouth had kept him from throwing up … mostly … but it allowed a thick layer of scummy pirate outpost to build up on the back of his tongue.

"What's even down here other than illegal pit fighting, gambling, and prostitution?" Nihlus froze, turning a horrified stare to lock onto Garrus. "You don't think she came down here to fight, do you? She'll be ground into varren chow in the pits."

Despite believing that Shepard may well have gone down there to fight, Garrus shook his head. "The information from Lawson's tracker suggests Shepard's just been wandering." That possibility worried him more than the fighting. At least if she was looking for a good pit fight, she'd have her guard up.

"Shepard would kick ass in the pits, even down here," Martin grumbled. He strode past Garrus. "She's not some helpless waif. She's Captain Jane fucking Shepard."

Garrus chuckled and took another couple of sips of water. "Either way, we need to find her now. I've got maybe ten minutes left before I'm ground into varren chow." He capped the bottle and pushed up off the planter. "Let's move."

Two batarians pushed past Martin, wobbling as they helped one another along, both drunk and looking beaten half to death.

"What happened to you?" Martin asked. "You look like you've been mugged."

One stopped to look at him, weaving unsteadily. "What? Mugged?" He hawked and spat a gob of blood onto the floor. "You could say that." He retched for a second. "Bloody red-headed she demon in the pit stole my last fifty credits."

"Red-headed … ." Martin glanced back at Garrus and took off, running in the direction they'd come from. "Come on. We've got to get her out of there."

Garrus pushed off, limping after the kid at a much more reasonable pace. "What happened to Captain Jane fucking Shepard?"

Five minutes later, Garrus faced the front door of one of the filthiest, ugliest buildings he’d ever seen, complete with the filthiest, ugliest krogan bouncer he’d ever seen.

"What happened to you?" the massive door guard grumbled, nodding toward the side of Garrus's face.

"Stopped a A-61’s rocket with my face on a dare. Seemed like a good idea at the time." Leaning heavily on one hip, he stared the behemoth down. Spirits, he hoped the krogan just let them in. He didn't have a brawl in him.

The krogan laughed and stepped aside. "Yeah, that's stupid enough to get you admission. Enjoy your night."

Inside, Garrus pushed his way through the throng, the combination of sour sweat, fourteen different kinds of cigarette and cigar smoke, five different kinds of blood, booze, and vomit slamming against the inside of his nose like a battering ram. "I should have brought my helmet," he shouted to Nihlus, regretting the volume as quickly as the words came out. Still, the pain couldn't hold a candle to the reek that kept tweaking his gag reflex. As if it needed encouragement.

Before they'd left the base, Chakwas had cornered him yet again to change the bandage on his head and dose him once again. He thought for sure the doctor would try to talk him out of their rescue mission. Instead, she'd handed him three high energy meal replacement drinks and just walked away.

"I don't see her," Nihlus replied, shoving a massive krogan out of the way. Luckily, the behemoth was so drunk that he just laughed and flopped over onto his side amidst the filth.

Glancing toward the fighting at the center of the crowd, Garrus shook his head. "Why would she come here?" he asked, without expecting an answer. If he hadn't had Nihlus and the kid … and his promise to Shepard … where would he have gone the moment he arrived on the station? Somewhere he could unleash all the rage he felt toward the galaxy without anyone batting an eye at it. Somewhere just like that place.

Spirits, he hoped they didn't find her body thrown in a corner somewhere. He met Nihlus's eyes and motioned for the Spectre to circle around the other side of the fighting pit. They'd drifted too far apart for Nihlus to have a hope of hearing him.

He stepped over a vorcha lying in a puddle of its own blood, the resilient flesh knitting together even as Garrus watched. In a half hour, the fighter would wake up and be ready to throw itself back into the meat grinder. Bodies pressed close, stomping on the fallen drunks and losers even as they lay there. Garrus bent down, grabbed the vorcha's arm and dragged him over against the wall. Martin appeared at the general's side, grabbing the fallen combatant's other arm, and helped drag him up the stepped levels at the perimeter of the room, out of harm's way.

The kid glanced over at the pit, their view a lot less obstructed from a couple of levels up. A wide grin lit up his face, disappearing into a wince and then a grimace as one of the fighters landed a particularly hard blow. "Is it weird that I want to climb in there and give it a go?" Martin yelled over Garrus's shoulder, surprising the general who suddenly felt like a parent who'd somehow managed to raise one of those daredevils who jumps from orbit in wingsuits or surfs plasma eruptions. The kid flexed his armour. "I could take them all, make enough to quit, buy a nice planet."
Garrus let out a bitter laugh and shook his head, regretting the action the second he did it. Still, he let out a hearty chuff. "Pit fighting on Omega won't buy you a planet, kid. Might rent you an apartment in a better part of the station, but you'd had to fight every day to keep it." He shoved aside two humans. "Besides … look at them. No armour. They have to fight in their shorts so they can't hide weapons." He stabbed a hand toward a huge krogan on the sidelines and shouted, "As a bonus, if you fight naked, you can avoid having that guy shove his hand down your ass crack and into your sheath to check for blades."

"Ouch! Damn." Martin stopped to watch the human and batarian circling one another in the ring. "Guess the batarian decided he didn't want the krogan hand job." He winced and threw a hand up in front of his ocular implants. "I can't blame him, but damn, I didn't need to see that."

Garrus glanced back at the mostly naked fighters, his gut coiling tighter as his mind exchanged the batarian for Shepard, crouched, bare except for her underwear, blood streaking her skin. Skeletal fingers scraped down the back of his neck, sinking into the soft meat at the edge of his cowl. Why had she come to that hole? Dread pressed his eyes to the floor, gelid and implacable, insisting that he watch for a tiny, mostly naked body tossed away along with the empty bottles, food wrappers, and smoke butts.

Nihlus appeared halfway up the bleachers on the far side of the pit, one hand raised to catch Garrus's attention. When the general nodded, the Spectre pointed to a small door tucked in behind the stands. For some reason, that small, dark hole warmed the dank chill. Thank the spirits … maybe Shepard hadn't come there to fight. Maybe she just needed to meet a contact.

Or maybe, she's already been beaten to death and dragged out into the alley for the vorcha.

His eyes refused to give up their search of the floor in between, although Martin loped ahead. Far too much enthusiasm and pure joy celebrated Shepard's return for the kid to contain it. And why not? If it was true … and damn, if Garrus wasn't starting to let himself believe it … they'd been granted a boon worthy of having pleased the ancient gods.

Cool and effervescent, relief washed over his hide as he reached the door, no Shepard. A slow smile crept over his face as he glanced behind him before following Nihlus into the dark passage. Shepard always did know how to get him jammed into the weirdest spots. Forcing them to chase her into the seediest, foulest part of Omega … that was his Kahri.

The dark closed around them, gritty and stinking, as they made their way down the corridor. Two light bulbs hung crookedly from wires, sputtering with a weak, olive light. He stumbled over something, a foul curse slipping from between his teeth as his face threatened to fall off. Bare, five toed feet led to bruised and bloody legs and a torso twisted and slumped down the wall. The empty bottles scattered next to the batarian suggested a victory celebrated a little too well. A rumbling snore alleviated Garrus's concern, and he moved on.

Twenty metres down the hall, the roar from the fighting pit faded enough that Garrus could hear the activities going on behind the doors that broke the walls at three metre intervals. He clenched his teeth, then cursed and took a deep breath. He really needed to remember not to do that.

Places like that pit needed Archangel's cleaning services. Maybe now that the gangs had been all but run out, he could do something about them.

"Shouldn't we be looking in the doors?" Martin whispered. He glanced back, his grimace grisly in the faint light.

"Is that something you really want to see, kid?" Nihlus asked, picking his way forward.
"No, but what if she's … ." Martin sighed and shrugged. "... been drugged or something?"

Garrus patted the young man's shoulder and turned him around. "If we don't find her in the common areas, we'll do a room to room, but I'd like to exhaust the possibilities that won't involve some pissed off, drunken 'client' shooting me in the head first."

Nihlus stopped. A closed door blocked the end of the hall. "Gambling lounge, right?" he asked without looking back.

"Most of the time, yes," Garrus replied. "Nice and close to the back door for those quick getaways, not that you need them on Omega. The cops won't be busting in to this place any time soon."

Nihlus sucked in a deep breath and squared his shoulders. "Fine, but if I open this door to some kinky hanar … ." Garrus silently thanked his fratrin for leaving the rest of that image unspoken. After another moment's hesitation, Nihlus palmed the control and stepped through the door.

"Spirits!" Nihlus exclaimed, stopping so suddenly that Garrus ran up his heels. "What … ?" The question flailed a little through the Spectre's subvocals before dying. "Shepard?"

Garrus gave his fratrin a shove, pushing him far enough through the door that he could step around to see whatever it was that had rendered Nihlus speechless.

Shock slapped him hard in the face … and not the good side. "Spirits." The word whispered from Garrus's mouth as he stared, trying to process what it was he was seeing. Dizziness washed over him, leaving him stumbling to brace himself against the back of a tattered, leather chair.

The doorway opened into a small, dark room. Not two paces away, Shepard lay on her back on a couch. An asari straddled her hips, leaning forward with her forearms braced against Shepard's chest. It took him a full thirty seconds to register the blood coating Shepard's skin … the broken and bruised skin over her knuckles … the swollen, bleeding lip … the thick, black stream of blood flowing from her nose and across her cheek.

It took him another thirty seconds to realize both Shepard and the asari remained fully clothed, and were staring at him and Nihlus, their expressions surprised and amused, but not the slightest bit indignant or guilty. Fifteen seconds after that, he spotted the device in the asari's hand. A tattoo gun? Shepard had gone into the seediest, most violent and filthy part of Omega to get a tattoo?

"The big handsome ones with you, love?" the asari asked, turning back to wipe the blood from under Shepard's nose with a thin cloth. Its astringent alcohol pinched the inside of Garrus's nose. Antiseptic. The tattoo gun began to buzz, the asari returning to work as if they hadn't entered the room.

Shepard let out a long breath and raised a hand to block the gun. "Two of them are, or at least, they were." She nodded toward the door and when the asari shrugged and swung up onto her feet, Shepard sat up, slipping her legs off the couch. "Thanks Tamri, I'm going to need to deal with this. You probably want to get out of range and behind some cover."

Garrus stared at Shepard's face, again not comprehending what he was seeing. Brown dots covered Shepard's cheekbones and across her nose. Some of them looked fairly natural while others clearly hadn't been finished. Clear fluid leaked from her face, making her look as though she'd been sweating. She looked up at Nihlus, pointedly avoiding even glancing Garrus's direction.

"Shepard." The Spectre stepped out of the way of the asari, waited until the door closed, then moved over to sit next to Shepard. "What are you doing here?" he asked, his voice soft. He reached up to touch the pad of a talon against her cheek. "And what is this?" He sighed and wrapped an arm around her. "I told you they were just weird."

She smiled and turned to kiss his cheek. "I was tired of not recognizing the woman in the mirror, Nihlus. I can't do anything about the scars, but the freckles … ." A soft, musical sigh trickled from her swollen, bleeding lips as she curled in against the Spectre. "I'm tired, Nihlus. I just want to go home, but … ."

Martin pushed past Garrus to kneel by the captain's feet, his hands resting on her knee. "Why did you take off, Shepard? We've been worried sick and searching for hours."

"I was told to go," she replied, her voice soft but brittle-sounding. "I didn't want to go back to the SR2 … it's not my home." She shrugged. "I just started walking, ended up here. Beat the shit out a handful of guys, which felt pretty good … won enough cash to pay for a tattoo." Reaching out, she placed a heavy hand on Martin's head. "I'm tired."

"And, ever so slightly drunk?" Martin asked, a heavy scowl creasing his face. He reached up and took her hand in his, holding it between both of his. The tenderness in that contact set Garrus's plates burning again, shame slithering just beneath them. Even if it wasn't Shepard, she believed she was, and his hurting her … .

Suddenly, it took every ounce of his will not to turn and bolt from the room. One of the things he loved most about Shepard was the sweet, sensitive heart under the soldier and all the masks. If the woman sitting in front of him was Shepard … spirits … he deserved so much worse than a rocket to the face.

Shepard shook her head, pulling him out of his stew. "No, haven't had anything other than bottled water to drink. I think I got kicked in the back of the head a little too hard. Must have rattled my cybernetics. That krogan was big."

"A krogan. You were naked wrestling a krogan? Of course you were," Martin said, matter of factly and sighed. "You asked someone to tattoo freckles onto your face, so I'm going to say that's a firm on something being rattled loose." His brows rose, and he grinned as he leaned in. "Although I can actually see the tattooed ones. That's weird. It's like there are glowing bugs on your face."

Shepard chuckled and gave him a shove. "You're nuts, kid. That's probably why I love you."

"Let's go back to base," Nihlus said, looking up at Garrus, who nodded. "Dr. Chakwas has your test results, so we'll run you through a shower to wash the blood off, seal you up, and the doc can convince you of what the kid and I already know. All right?"

Bloodshot green eyes looked up at Garrus for the first time, their gaze watery and unfocused. "I won't be arrested the second I set foot in the base?"

Garrus couldn't force any words out past the rock lodged in his throat, but shook his head and looked down. His silence was probably for the best. He'd said quite enough already. If she was Shepard, the base was as much her home as theirs, and if she wasn't … well, the least he could do was give her somewhere safe to figure things out.

Nihlus stood, pulling her up with him. She let out a strangled sort of moan-gasp combination, that spun the Spectre around. "What?" He lifted her tunic—spirits, it was just soaked in blood—and cursed. "Dear spirits, Shepard. What in the name … ?" He took her hand and led her to the door and through. "We need to get you to Dr. Chakwas. What were you thinking fighting with your skin … ?" The lecture trailed off as if he'd transferred power from comms to the engines, deciding to just get her out of there.

"Hey, tiny!" a voice roared. "You owe me a hundred credits. I don't know how, but you cheated."

A flood of bodies poured into the hallway, pushing Garrus back the way he'd come, the crowd no doubt trying to escape the path of destruction. The old protective instinct kicked in and kicked in hard, driving Garrus through the crowd, his elbows punching him a hole as he fought his way to Shepard. He emerged from the darkness, the spotlights above the pit blinding him.

"Garrus! Jump back and left!" Shepard shouted out of the glare.

The general did as commanded, a krogan flying through the space he'd occupied the moment before, slamming into the bleachers next to him, the fight over before it began. Shepard just stretched her shoulders, rolled her neck and turned back to Nihlus.

Okay, one big tick under the 'real Shepard' column. Garrus's eyes locked on that thin back and the short, red hair that ended just above a massive slash of scar tissue across the bottom third of her skull. One mandible flicked. He'd obeyed her order without a second thought. Did some part of him know it was her? Or had it just been programming? Hear an order, obey it?

They grabbed a cab right out in front of the club, Nihlus guiding Shepard into the back seat. She tucked her feet up on the seat beside her and burrowed in against the Spectre's side. Garrus watched her surreptitiously through the rear mirror, as comforted by Nihlus's caretaking as he'd been disturbed by it before.

The trip back to the base took less than a half hour. Garrus let the other two take Shepard inside, pausing to talk to the cadets and friends in the lobby. He sat on a couch, trying to ignore the drumming pain and nausea for almost an hour before it got the better of him. For a day that should have been spent heavily medicated in a bed, he'd put on a lot of klicks. He excused himself, promising to spend more time catching up with everyone once he'd done a little more healing.
Regardless of how the evidence fell on the Shepard issue, he intended to follow his doctor's advice and spend the next few days in bed.

Garrus walked into his quarters, his talons cutting into the floor with a faint screech as he saw Shepard standing next to his bed, her back to the door. A towel wrapped around her, the thick, blue material revealing what had upset Nihlus at the club. Huge black bands of bruising slashed across her pale, glistening skin, and the wounds from her cybernetics slowly wept blood, even after she'd showered. And she had showered. The smell of her filled the apartment, warm and soft and sweet.
The scent burrowed down into his chest, vivisecting him far more brutally than his abductors had.
He swayed, the dizziness burning through his head until all he could smell was frosted metal.
Lifting a talon to his nose, he brushed away a slow drip, his glove coming away blue.

She didn't turn around. "Nihlus thought you'd feel better if I showered here, where you could keep an eye on us," she said, her voice low and gentle. "He just went to get my belt. I forgot it when I chased you this morning. Once we get all these wounds sealed, we'll head up to see the doc."

Shepard turned just far enough to hold up the stasis cube containing the head of the lily he'd placed on Shepard's coffin. Examining it with a strange, haunted look on her face, she said, "These are my favourite. Nihlus says everyone placed one on my coffin." Looking over her shoulder, she held up the cube. "Not you, I guess."

Garrus sniffed and then cleared his throat, swallowing a mouthful of blood. "I'll leave you to get dressed." He spun and strode for the door, the urge to just throw caution to the wind … the need to hold that body in his arms again so strong that it came dangerously close to bulling aside his common sense. If he stayed there … if he looked into those eyes and had to explain about that lily ….

"Isn't there any part of you that wants me to be for real, Garrus?" she called after him, her voice drifting on that damned scent, softer and sweeter than the perfume of her shampoo.

Despite his best effort, his feet stopped moving just inside the door, two hand widths from escape. "I buried Kahri with the stem from that lily," he replied, his voice equally quiet, but coming out like sandpaper to her silk, "so that someday, I could give her the rest when death reunited us." Allowing his heart to reach back just for a second, he said, "There isn't a cell in my body that doesn't want you to be my Shepard."

He cleared the gravel from his throat and wiped his nose again. "That's why I've got to keep the walls in place. I can't afford to let you trick me." The pain … the empty aching hole that had awaited him each morning when he woke from his dreams of her, rose up … dark and terrible and hungry, a black hole desperate to drag him in. A sharp, ragged breath pushed it back far enough for him to say, "I wouldn't survive it."

Her bare feet padded across the floor, quick and light as they approached him. Slamming the walls back in place, he leaped through the door and rushed to the elevator. When the doors closed behind him, he sagged against the railing, quiet tears accompanying the keen that spooled from his second larynx … intractable and unrelenting. What was he supposed to do if it turned out to be a lie? Damn it all.

A sharp angry scream tore straight from his gut. Why? Hadn't losing her the first time torn enough of him apart? Gripping the rail with both hands, he slammed his foot into the wall. The pain, the longing, the fear all crystallized in the action as he kicked it over and over until he stumbled, nearly going down … spent.

The door opened on the twenty-fourth floor, revealing his father standing halfway down the corridor. Herros turned, no doubt alerted by the elevator chime, and bolted toward him, sliding the last metre before hopping the door track. He wrapped an arm around Garrus, truly the only thing that kept the general on his feet as his knees buckled.

"Pari." Garrus wrapped both arms around his father's neck. "I can't lose her again."

Herros nodded and touched his brow to Garrus's. "I know. Come on, Betru, I've got you. Let's get you back into bed." His father held Garrus up until the general's legs steadied enough to move, and then, still bearing most of his son's weight, helped Garrus down the hall to his room. Dr. Chakwas met them halfway and took the other side, saying nothing despite her disapproving glare.

Numb, cold, and exhausted, Garrus collapsed into the chair next to his bed, just staring up at his pari and the doctor as they worked, stripping off his armour and dressing him in a warm, light tunic and trousers.

"You've set yourself back days, General," the doctor said, her voice firm but not unkind. She ran her scans, tutting softly under her breath, and then gave him what felt like every injection available in the galaxy. Numb and placid, he just sat there, feeling heavier and weaker than he could ever remember feeling.

Rallying the last of his energy, Garrus reached up and snagged her hand. "I need to be there when you tell her." He didn't have the energy to argue. "Please, just help me stand there when you tell her."
Chakwas looked over his head at Herros, and suddenly Garrus felt nine cycles old again, the adults deciding his fate without consulting him. But then Herros nodded and Chakwas let out a long sigh.

"Very well, but as soon as Shepard has her results, you get right back into bed." She strode to the door. "I'll get you a mild booster, but with your concussion, I can't be giving you any stims, so stay put and rest until we're ready." Grumbling under her breath about having listened to her father and become a pediatrician, she palmed the door control and headed off down the corridor.

"Where have you been, Garrus?" Herros sat on the side of the bed. "The last time I saw you, you had just come out of surgery. Then you just disappeared, and didn't answer your messages. I've been worried stiff." The general's pari reached out and stroked his fringe and down the back of his neck, the touch soothing.

"I got a vid message … ." Garrus shook his head, just a slight, and gloriously pain-free, tremor to either side. " Doesn't matter. I have spent my day being a miserable ass to people who don't deserve it, and then trying to make up for the damage."

"And when did Captain Shepard show up?" The question came out carefully, as if Garrus's father expected it to provoke him, but it didn't. He'd fought through a very long day since that rage.

"She rode in with five people, completely obliterated the mercs. Sabotaged their mechs, turned them on each other … just … ." He leaned back and closed his eyes, letting out a long, weary breath. "She saved us all, and then I accused her of being a fake or a clone … and then I took a rocket to the face."

"So, a full couple of days."

His pari's tone tweaked him, provoking a low, rumbling laugh. "Yeah, I guess you could say that." He spotted Nihlus, the torin standing a head and neck above everyone else, and sat up. Shepard walked … well, limped, really … at the Spectre's side, leaning close against him. A soft smile greeted the sight, and once again, gratitude poured through him like hot amarceru on a cold day. Nihlus had really come through … for Shepard … for all of them, the voice of reason and compassion when all Garrus had been able to do was react.

Chakwas led them into the room across the hall, ushering Shepard up onto a bed, the ever present omnitool sparking to life. Whatever it showed the doctor, Garrus could read Chakwas's displeasure on her face. After more than ten minutes, both Chakwas and Nihlus walked out, leaving Shepard alone, sitting hunched over and looking very small on the bed.

"General." Dr. Chakwas's voice startled him. She nodded. "Come on. Anderson will be here in a moment as well." She looked up at Herros. "He'll need a hand."

Garrus looked up and slung an arm around his father's shoulders, more than willing to accept the help. Once up, though, whatever the doctor had given him helped, his legs a lot more stable as he walked across the hallway and entered Shepard's room. Circling around behind the bed, he stood near the foot, out of the way. His father backed away to stand in the corner.

For her part, Shepard stared down between her feet, eyes refusing to leave the floor. Garrus's stare followed hers, not sure what to say or do. He knew that the woman sitting in front of him believed she was Shepard. Whatever or whoever else she was, she believed it with every particle of her being. The anguish in her eyes when they'd found her at that dive assured him of that without anyone saying a single word.

And of course, Nihlus believed. The Spectre sensed the other half of the beacon memories, and that was all the proof he needed. Garrus glanced up at her red, marked up face, mandibles flailing a little as he saw the tears rolling over the inflamed skin. He slid one foot a hand's width toward her, but stopped when she flinched away from him.

Chakwas walked in the door, Anderson close behind her. Nihlus followed them to the threshold, but then stopped in the open door. The Spectre smiled when Shepard looked up, then nodded toward the others as if asking her to give them another shot. Garrus's heart contracted, feeling as though a singularity pulled the muscle in on itself.

He was one of them … one of the others … the doubters. The ungrateful bastards who looked the miracle in the face and then spat on it. His stare slid back to the floor. Over the past two cycles had he fallen more in love with the memory … the idea of Shepard … than he'd been in love with the woman? A soft keen escaped his control, a mixture of sorrow and gentle laughter. She'd been so very restful, his dead love. Shepard … well, Shepard was anything but restful. She was impossible, and fierce … so fierce and so scared … but damn it, hadn't he loved her hard enough in those few months to pull him through two years?

This … he looked up at her face, red and weeping clear fluid …. Getting her freckles tattooed back on … that was so painfully his Kahri …. He reached out, bracing himself against the bed as the singularity released his heart, and it fell into his gut. Suddenly he felt as though he floated about three feet above and behind his body, watching himself through a haze of racing pulse and sweating hide. Chakwas didn't need to tell him what the tests said, not really. Only Shepard would go and torture herself to put her freckles back because he … .

Anderson walked straight over to Shepard, taking her face gently between his hands, and shook his head. "Nihlus and Martin told me where they found you." He looked her over, wincing at each wound and swelling. "Pit fighting? Have you lost your mind? What have you done to yourself, you crazy girl?"

She sniffed and shrugged. "Even you … ." She shrugged again, a helpless sort of gesture as she struggled to form words. "No one believed it was me." A careless hand flicked at the tears on her cheeks, and she winced away from the pain. "Hell, I don't even know if it's me. I was tired of seeing a stranger in the mirror, Anderson. So tired."

Anderson stepped into her, still holding her face between gentle hands. Garrus arched his neck, surprised as the stoic captain kissed Shepard's brow, aiming for the only place spared the needle. "It was shock, child. That's all. Someone gives you a gift this big … it just takes a bit to accept that it's real."

Shepard drew back, a mask of comical surprise greeting her mentor … her father's uncharacteristic display of affection, but it lasted only a second and then she threw her arms around him. Tucking her face in against the captain's shoulder, one of the toughest soldiers Garrus had ever met clung to Anderson like a frightened child and cried.

Anderson rubbed her back and whispered soft apologies and words of comfort into her ear. "I never meant for the things I said to hurt you." He pulled back a little and sniffed, cracking his neck as his throat worked, the stiff upper lip fighting against his tears.

"I kept asking them to let me contact you," she whispered. "I'm sorry, Anderson. I'm so sorry."

The captain shook his head and pulled her back in, one hand rubbing her back. "You've got nothing to be sorry for, child. Nothing at all." He let out a long breath. "I'm the one … . Martin stormed aboard the Normandy … read me the Riot Act, but he shouldn't have had to. I'm sorry, Shepard. I was just … ." He pulled away, taking her face between his hands again. "It was shock. All those prayers answered … ." He looked down and cleared his throat. "It was just shock."

Garrus's eyes never left Shepard as, again, the purity of the woman's reaction pulled at him, insisting that he believe. He'd only seen Kahri cry once, but it had been the same, bared-to-the-soul deluge of emotion.

Chakwas stepped forward, her ever-present omnitool glowing on her forearm. "Well, I can assure you all that this is the original Jane Shepard."

Anderson stepped back, his hand sliding down Shepard's arm to grip her hand. Garrus took a deep breath, torn between the fear and the part of him that wanted to shove Anderson out of the way, scoop her tiny form into his arms and bury his face in her neck. The need to just breathe her in, to confirm through every sense other than his eyes that she was real, and there … . He clenched his teeth and stared into the doctor's steely eyes.

Chakwas glared right back, meeting his gaze with undisguised anger and accusation. He faced it without blinking. He deserved it. He'd told Shepard to get out of his base and let him do his paperwork.

"A great deal of her tissue has been replaced and regrown," the doctor continued, "but her DNA is all thirty-one years old, as are the cells of the inner lens of her eye and the oocyte I tested. There is intense cybernetic infiltration and cell replication going on, but her mitochondria are also an exact match to our Jane Shepard." She smiled and reached up to squeeze Shepard's shoulder. "Welcome back, Captain, you were sorely missed."

Shepard laid her hand over the doctor's. "Thanks, Doc. It's good to have someone I trust tell me that I'm not some sort of replicant." She glanced at Nihlus, who still watched through the window, the smile that warmed her face … the only word Garrus could think of was loving.

Why shouldn't it be? Nihlus and Martin were the only two who just accepted her. Nihlus had held her through the night while Garrus and Anderson were too busy worrying about what sort of security risk she posed to consider the person they loved most was metres away and in pain. He let out a long, deep sigh that came out a lot noisier than he intended.

Anderson drew back a little. "I expect you over on the Normandy for dinner. There are people eager to see you." A gentle, almost reverent hand caressed her cheek, careful of those horrible, glowing fissures in her skin. A quick glance over the captain's shoulder just brushed Garrus. "And if by then, you're plus one or two or three, bring them along." He kissed Shepard's brow again. "Use medigel. Get rid of the freckles."

She sniffed and nodded. "Yeah. Thanks …" A teasing grin broke through the tears to curl one corner of her mouth. "… Dad."

A smile brighter and wider than Garrus had ever seen on any man accompanied Anderson's sigh and a long-suffering head shake. "Forget the test results … now, I know it's you." He squeezed Shepard's hand. "I'll see you at 1800." Anderson looked back at Garrus, holding the general's gaze for long seconds before nodding and heading to the door.

Garrus nodded and let out a long breath. Yeah, they'd been frightened fools together, but now they both had their greatest love back in their lives … and neither of them deserved her.

Dr. Chakwas followed Anderson to the door, but kept her stare on Shepard. "I'll be admitting you as soon as you're finished here, and tomorrow we're running a full battery on those implants. I don't want to have to rely on that woman for my information." The glanced back when she reached the threshold, sending her fiery glare straight past Shepard to Garrus. He bowed his head a little and nodded. Shepard had nothing more to fear from his disbelief.

The door closed, then the privacy curtains closed. Subtle. It drew a nervous sort of chuckle from Shepard, but she didn't move off the table.

Garrus frowned, his brain very suddenly and very completely blank.

"So, you're okay with me, now? You won't be second guessing my intentions and orders?" She slid down off the bed but remained facing straight ahead, holding herself stiff and crooked with pain. After a moment, she nodded. "I'll take your silence for assent. We can arrange a meeting in a couple of days to organize things. I think Nihlus will want to come with me aboard the SR2 for a while, but … ."

Before he even knew he was going to move, Garrus hit the floor on his knees in front of her. He raised his hands, a silent entreaty to keep her from leaving when she staggered back a step. One hand reached forward, just pressing against her stomach as if testing to see if she remained solid. Damn, did he still doubt?

When he looked up, he realized that their eyes were at a level. Had he truly forgotten how tiny she was? So impossibly tiny and so impossibly strong. What could he have done? What could any of them have possibly done to earn such a huge miracle? The fist closed around his throat again.

Five fingers closed around his talons where they pressed against her warm, soft flesh. "I'm real," she said, her voice barely stirring the air. "I don't know how or why … well, I know what Miranda says about why—"

"Shepard … " Forcing his voice past the choke hold, he broke through what sounded as though it was winding up into a lengthy, rambling explanation. "... Kahri, I don't care." He shook his head to stall any reply, and then she pressed his hand over her heart, and every single thing he wanted to say fled once more.

"It still belongs to you."

And then his arms were full of her and the soft music of her chuckle was everywhere. Gentle hands cradled his jaw, but he pushed in, tucking his face into her neck, half lifting her. She still weighed nothing. His other hand pressed against the site of the massive wound that had stolen her from him. For those moments, so much joy and love and terror roared through him that he felt sure he'd burn with it.

He took a deep breath, filling his entire being with her scent. It had faded from her pillow and belongings so long ago, and he welcomed it in. Muscles that tied in knots the moment she died, relaxed, and aches uneased in almost two years drifted away. That sweet, slightly spicy jasmine scent. Yes, the hot carbon scent of her cybernetics and the bite of medigel and sealant wormed their way through, but it was her.

Then her arms wrapped around his head and neck, careful of his wounds as she held him to her breast, and those soft, impossible lips pressed to his brow. "I love you, Garrus Vakarian," she said, the words strong and ringing, a declaration that dared the universe to deny it. "And I'm so very sorry I waited to tell you that in a stupid vid message."
The calm between storms.

Maribellu - Beautiful female … undercurrents of radiance and within a close relationship (wife, mother, grandmother, daughter, etc.)

30 Days ASR

Shepard pressed her lips to Garrus's brow and closed her eyes. The malaise and pain of the past few days disappeared into the texture of the tough plate, the subtle scent of his sweat and cleanser beneath the smell of hospital. She smiled, soaking in the warmth and strength of his long arms as they slipped around her and pulled her in tight against the side of his chest. Completely content to stay that way, she lay her cheek against him, not even the ache of her wounds enough to prompt her to pull away.

A soft breath from the corner of the room reminded her that they weren't alone. Without opening her eyes or moving a millimetre, she smiled and said, "Hello, sir. It's nice to see you again."

Herros chuffed softly and chuckled. "And you, Captain. And you."

Shepard kissed the top of Garrus's head. "How you feeling, big guy? We should probably get you into bed."

Garrus just shook his head and gripped her tighter.

Herros stepped forward. "Come, Betru. You need to get up off the floor before you're too stiff and tired to help me lift you. I'm getting too old to carry you around." He laid a hand on his son's head, then ran gentle talons over Shepard's hair. "Welcome back, maribellu."

Shepard pulled back and looked up at the older torin, remembering when they'd met. She'd trusted him instantly, the solid feel of his energy so much like his son's. Or the other way around. "Thank you, sir." She smiled and reached out to squeeze his hand, then placed a knuckle under Garrus's chin, tilting his face up to meet hers.

"Your father is right, Garrus, bed is where you need to be. I'm not going anywhere, and I'd much rather be laying down as well. As good as fighting was for my brain, it wreaked havoc on my poor old body." She bent and pressed a chaste kiss against his mouth. As his mouth nuzzled hers, a fiery blossom of happiness exploded like Armistice Day fireworks in her chest. Since that first moment she heard his voice whisper through her thoughts back on the Cerberus base, a huge part of her had been aching for that sweet connection.

She drew back and caressed her fingertips along his undamaged mandible. "Come on, up you get." Stepping off to the side, she bent and slipped a hand under Garrus's arm. Even with both Shepard and Herros helping, it took a bit to get Garrus up onto his feet, and she was glad they hadn't waited, allowing his muscles to chill and stiffen further.
The ridged plate along Garrus's forearm felt as though it might actually be stripping the flesh off her shoulder, but Shepard just breathed into it and let it burn. Sometimes life meant pain, and sometimes … like that moment … pain meant life. Her love's arm slung over her shoulder, accepting her care … yes, some things were just worth every twinge and stab.

All three of them paused when they stepped through the door into Garrus's room and saw two of everything had been moved into the room, the two beds pushed together at the center.

"Move it along," Chakwas said, her voice managing stern amusement. "The faster we get you two into bed, the faster you'll be out there getting yourselves blown to bits again." She pushed past them, then turned to meet their curious and amused stares, finally shrugging. "What?" She sighed and shook her head as if she'd been caught doing something wrong. "Okay, yes, I'm breaking my 'no two problem patients in the same room' policy, but when I weighed the odds of you staying in your rooms … ." She held out her arms as if that explained everything. Which, of course, it did.

Shepard grinned and gripped the doctor's hand on the way past. "Thanks, Doc. It's much appreciated," she said, leading Garrus to the free side of his bed. "I've spent far too long away from the big guy." She helped Garrus up onto the deep mattress and pulled the blankets over him. Leaning down to stare into his eyes, she frowned, his passivity worrying her. "You doing okay?" she asked, her voice soft enough to stay just between them.

"Yeah, I'm fine." His good mandible fluttered a little. "Just wondering if maybe that rocket didn't take me out after all." Extricating one hand from his blankets, he pressed his palm against her cheek. "When I saw you on the bridge, I thought you'd come to take me with you, and we'd lie together in the sunshine … and you'd call me Callor." The weariness and confusion in his eyes pulled at her, prompting an answering tightness in her throat.

"No. We're both here. At least, if we aren't and your idea of heaven is fighting Reapers and Collectors … we need to have a chat." She turned her face into his hand and kissed his palm. "Now, since you're comfy … I'm going to fall over next to you, and we can get some sleep." Truly, her entire body felt like a giant abscessed tooth, short, thin blades stabbing into her in time with the throbbing. Garrus wasn't the only one she'd been separated from for way too long, her painkillers calling her home to the temporary but welcome peace of their embrace.

The mattress felt like thirty shades of heaven and about twenty fives shades of hell when she stripped down into a t-shirt and shorts and climbed under the blankets. After submitting to Dr. Chakwas's scans she rolled over onto her side to find Garrus fighting off sleep, his eyes riveted to her. He reached out a hand, exhausted talons clumsy as they caressed her jaw and neck.

She took his hand and pulled it in tight, hugging it against her breast. "Go to sleep, love. Once you're rested and healed, we can worry about what comes next."

"I don't want to wait," he whispered, his eyes fluttering shut.

"For what?" Shepard let out a long breath. The cool air and dim light coaxed her toward sleep, the room disappearing into liminal mist around the edges as she drifted.

"Anything." His voice slurred. "To be together. For the war to be over. For our lives."

Her turn to caress his face. "We won't. No more waiting."

Shepard heard long, lengthy strides approaching down the corridor and managed to lift her head just far enough to see Nihlus stop outside the door. She smiled and held out a hand to wave him in.
"Hey there," she whispered over the steady rumble from Garrus's bed. Ten different emotions surged through her at the uncertain way he hesitated at the door, as if he didn't have the right to enter … as if he felt it wasn't his place.

"You're supposed to be sleeping," the Spectre replied. He finally crossed the threshold and lifted a hip to sit on the side of her bed. "How are you feeling? The doc get all those wounds to stop bleeding?" He cradled her fingers in his talons, the pad of his thumb stroking her hand.

"Yeah. Medigel … you're my hero." She chuckled. "As for sleep, I'm going to be in just a couple of seconds." Letting her eyes close, she squeezed his talons. "You okay?"

A soft chuff answered her as he stood and laid her hand on her hip. "I'm fine. Don't worry about me."

"I can't help it." The words strayed from her lips as sleep pulled her down, her last thoughts indeed ones of worry for the Spectre and the sweet, biting scent of alcohol on his breath. "I love you."

33 Days ASR

"So no one has heard from Liara since the siege?" Shepard strode down the SR2's CIC, a small herd of crew at her heels, all waiting for a chance to put forward their issues. Nihlus walked just behind her, on her right, a silent wall of supportive strength. He'd woken her that morning with the message from Liara saying that her contact, Dr. Gerret Bryson, had uncovered a lead in their research, and she was off to Thessia; would Shepard and Nihlus join her as soon as possible?

Miranda shook her head without breaking stride or looking up from the datapad in her hands. "The ship logged her return while you were still clearing out the mercs, then EDI had her logged onto the computer in the lounge but she managed to bypass our tracer programs and security."

Shepard paused and cleared her throat as she fought to keep the faint glow of pride off her face. Liara might just have a future in espionage if she managed to slip past EDI and all of Cerberus's spyware. "Right, so we don't know what she was up to." As had become her habit, Shepard found herself looking up as she spoke to the AI. "Or do we, EDI?"

The slightest hint of humour ... or maybe it was embarrassment that warmed the edges of the AI's response. "I would not have expected an archaeologist to circumnavigate my security protocols with such ease. Dr. T'Soni did not bother to mask her correspondence with Dr. Bryson, or the initial few vid-calls with a Matriarch Aethyta. After her second call with the matriarch, she eluded my ability to track her signal outside Armali on Thessia."

Shepard waggled her head a little. The information didn't offer anything unknown, but at least it confirmed their destination. "Which is where she wants us to go, anyway." She opened her omnitool and sent a message to Anderson and Garrus. Maybe, Liara sent more details to someone she knew she could trust with them. She shrugged and cracked her neck as if shaking off that problem. "Okay, we'll depart for Armali at 0800. Next."

Two hours later, she completed her walk-through debriefing and tour of the ship. Kelly reported that Jack and Javik were going ever so slightly stir crazy on the ship, so Shepard assigned them to escort the ship's alpha shift engineers to find a used replacement part, and to dig up some groceries with the cook, Sgt. Gardner. The refits she'd asked for, including a more useful shuttle bay, were well underway, Archangel's engineers polishing off her few requests in excellent time, despite Miranda's constant and strident insistence that only Cerberus personnel should be working on a Cerberus ship.
In the corridor outside of engineering, Shepard stopped and signed off on Miranda's datapad of details. Giving them a curt nod, she said, "Lots to do before 0800, people. Dismissed."

"So," Nihlus said, once the Cerberus employees boarded the elevator and headed back to work. He leaned back against the port overlooking the shuttle bay. "We're headed for Thessia?" He grinned, the 'itching to get back into action' grin of a torin well used to life on the move.

Shepard nodded and leaned forward, bracing her hands against the ledge. "Yeah. Anderson received a message last night from Liara. It asked him to forward a file to me. I told him to send it to Garrus's computer in his office. Figured that was the most secure place to look at it." She looked around. "I've got this amazing, albeit nameless, ship, and I feel like it's hostile territory. I'll be glad to have you along, although you're going to have to work with Javik." She grinned at the face he made.

The Spectre elbowed her. "It'll be fine. It wasn't my life … and really, it wasn't this Javik either. He's a long way from that gasin. Must be a hell of a shock waking up fifty thousand years later to an entirely different galaxy." He pushed away from the window. "You really should name this thing before we take off. It's bad luck."

Shepard chuckled and nodded. "Like it matters with us. We find all the bad luck there is anyway." Still, there really wasn't any point in inviting bad luck in. She hit the elevator control and stared at the wall, possibilities flicking through, most of them discarded as quickly as they appeared. "So, I started on the Normandy, which was named after a famous front in World War II on Earth." A thoughtful scowl pinched the skin between her brows and tugged at the wounds around her eyes. "What's the name of Garrus's ship? It's got a world war tie, as well."

"Passchendaele," Nihlus answered. "Try wrapping a mouth without lips around that one. It got shortened to Passch in the first minute."

She grinned. "A bunch of my ancestors fought there in World War I. So, we have world wars, my relatives … and I'd like to stick with the Alliance naming scheme despite the fact that I'm pretty sure I'm not Alliance anymore." Stringing the lines together, one name came to mind. "Okay, another World War II front where Shepard relations fought … and it's a pretty name. Ypres."

"Eepress?" Nihlus frowned, his mandibles spreading a little crooked. "You sure about that? It doesn't sound like a war ship."

A wide grin met his skepticism. "No doubt you think it should be called the 'Bloody Cudgel of Death' or something." Shepard elbowed him and stepped into the elevator as the doors opened. "Yes, I'm sure. It's the Ypres. I'll spell it for you later."

"Don't bother, you know I don't read human common." He stepped to the back of the carriage and faced the front. "And I think you should call it Cruentan Mirtus."

Even though she knew she was walking into it, Shepard cocked an eyebrow and looked up into his far too pleased, green stare. "And that means?"

"Bloody, terrible death." He laughed, then let out a pained grunted when she punched him. "Ow. Cerberus really jacked up the kilos per square centimetre behind your punches." He rubbed his belly through his armour. "So, what now, Captain Shepard?"

"Back to base, check what needed Liara's immediate attention, and ours." When the elevator opened onto the CIC, she led the way out, bypassing Kelly and the galaxy map, heading back to decon. "Then spend a quiet evening with the general before shipping out tomorrow." She trotted up the stairs halfway across the deck and let out a faint, sad sigh. "It's going to be strange leaving him behind so much." She shrugged. "To me, it feels like a month ago we were the musketeers."

Nihlus led the way into the decon area and shrugged, his mandibles flicking with a teasing smile. "You still have me."

Shepard wrapped her arm around his waist and gave him a squeeze. "I do at that."

They grabbed a cab at the end of the docking bay, only to get stalled in a massive exodus of shuttles and vehicles.

"Looks like the fleet is starting to arrive home," Nihlus said, nodding toward the private bay where Archangel docked its ships.

Shepard just shook her head. "I can't believe what you all built. It's amazing." Thinking about it a second, she shrugged. "Come to think of it, I guess I can believe it. I knew he could do it. He always had that spark."

Nihlus let out a long breath, something in it drawing Shepard's undivided attention. "Despite all the pain he was in after you died, he saved me … gave me a purpose … something to hold onto when I was drowning." His eyes met and held hers, his expression one of mixed wonder and love … and sadness. "He's my fratrin … my brother, and he's the gravity that holds all of this together."

Shepard reached out to press her palm against his mandible. "Yeah, he is that." She let out a long breath and let the hand fall to the Spectre's shoulder. "All of this … I see how much it weighs on him, and you've helped him carry it."

Her hand returned to caress his cheek. "He loves you too, you know. That's why he freaked out when he saw we'd slept together. It wasn't jealousy." She tipped her head in a half shrug. "Well, mostly it wasn't. He was just worried that you were going to get hurt again, and he wanted to spare you that."

Nihlus glanced at her then turned back to his driving without replying.

They landed right outside the front door, stepping out of the cab into complete mayhem. Nyreen Kandros, Vortash, Butler, and Martin all stood out front trying to sort refugees and get them sent to the correct building. Shepard just winked and gave Martin a kiss on the cheek as she passed.

"Meet you back down here at 0530?" Nihlus asked, at the elevator.

Shepard palmed the control. "Sure thing." She grinned, her eagerness to get back into action and her old life escaping. "It's going to be nice to get back in the saddle again, at least one of the old cowpokes riding next to me."

He cocked a brow plate at her and shook his head. "Sometimes I don't understand a single word that comes out of your mouth."

"I know," she said, stepping into the elevator, "it's brilliant." Lifting one hand in a small, teasing wave, Shepard hit the door control and headed up to the twenty-first floor.

Other than the geth and their technician assistants, the research level sat almost deserted. She checked the time, then realized that the dinner hour had long gone by. "2004, geez louise." Looking down, she thumped a hand against her belly as it growled at her. "Yeah, yeah, I hear you." She let herself into Garrus's office. As soon as they broke free of Dr. Chakwas's custody, he'd given her back her omnitool, which was already keyed to all the locks, computers, and comm terminals. Despite her joy at seeing Ingrid again, Shepard just might have been slightly happier to see her omnitool. Maybe. A tiny bit.

She heard the faint murmur of Garrus's voice behind the door to his comm room, so just sat at his desk and woke up the computer. He'd already set Liara's message aside for her, so she just clicked the link. What was their lovely asari researcher up to?

Liara's face appeared on the screen, earnest and excited. "Shepard, Dr. Bryson and I have discovered some very exciting pieces of information. His daughter, Dr. Ann Bryson, has been running decryption on my mother's files … apparently the encryption she used is based on a very ancient asari code." The researcher shook her head. "My apologies. As fascinating as it is, it's a matter for another time. She has uncovered something both remarkable and terrible. I don't want to say anything in a message, no matter how well I think my tracks are covered, but I need you and Nihlus to come to Thessia as soon as possible. It's about two very old friends and the work they left behind." After another second, she nodded again, and the channel closed.

Two very old friends. Shepard grinned. Way to try for subtle and fail there, but still … .

Shepard had intended to go to Thessia and see if she could find where Tashac and Merol lived. Somewhere on that mountain, they'd built a refuge. She had no idea what they'd stored or housed in that cave, but the possibilities were encouraging and exciting.

"So you and Nihlus are headed for Thessia?"

A wide grin spread across Shepard's face at the warm voice, its subvocals rich and rumbling. She turned to face Garrus, leaning back casually in his chair. "Hope you don't mind that I made myself at home."

His mandibles fluttered in a gentle smile. "I built all this for you … to be our home, not just mine." He walked over and sat on the edge of the desk. "So, what's going on with Liara?"

She laid her hands on his knees. "I don't know exactly, but she's uncovered something to do with what Tashac and Merol left on Thessia." Standing, she stepped between his thighs and leaned in to wrap her arms around his waist. "I hate leaving so soon. We haven't even spent any time alone together outside that damned hospital room."

His arms slipped around her. "Well, we'll change that tonight." A long sigh rumbled from his throat. "Besides, Anderson and I have business in batarian space. We'll be gone for about a week." He leaned down to touch his brow to hers, and a long sigh drifted between them. "I admit, I don't like the idea that we're going to be going separate ways so often. I got used to having your six."

Nuzzling her hair, he whispered. "I could always quit, rejoin your crew."

Looking up into his eyes, Shepard nodded. "Yeah, you could, but they'd miss you around here." Standing on her tiptoes, she kissed him. "Besides, I sort of like being able to say, my boyfriend, the general." She grinned. "It's sexy."

A wide grin and throaty rumble answered that. "Well, then, in that case." He pulled back as her belly rumbled again. "Are varren eating you from the inside out?"

Shepard clapped her hands over her belly and grinned. "I think so." She nodded toward the door, the most wonderful feeling of peace greeting the simple normalcy of the moment. "Come on, General Boyfriend, let's go get some supper."
(A-N: So sorry this is so short and sorta just in between stuff. I had more planned, but I am moving tomorrow and our internet is going down soon, so I wanted to get something up. I may be a few days before posting again, so please bear with me. I promise it will be worth the wait. whispers One word … Thane. :D Thanks so much, and see you when I am moved.)
Chapter Summary

All the air and gravity on that floor collapsed into a singularity that hovered between Garrus and the assassin, sealing the three of them into a tremulous, fragile pocket universe. Shepard forced every cell in her body to radiate the promise that if the barrier shattered, hell would pour through the breech.

Aligarim Dau - Giant four winged bird from ancient turian mythology which was said to have stolen the seed of life from the Creator of All Things.

33 Days ASR

Shepard slipped her hand into Garrus's, the strength of the grip that encircled hers tugging a smile onto her lips. That grip anchored her; a lifeline and a promise stretching out into all their tomorrows. Like everything else in their relationship, physical and otherwise, his hand holding hers felt singular—different, unusual even—but perfect.

She'd never wanted to be touched. Hundreds of hands had traced her skin over the years. Merging into one, slightly repellant memory, they sent her into retreat as soon as touching loomed on the horizon. But Garrus and Nihlus had never provoked that ingrained response; their touch different enough to allow her to form new intimacy pathways through the terrified mess that was her head. Nihlus had scared her, but only due to his intensity, never because she associated his touch with her history.

That's not the reason you're with the big guy, though? You actually love him?

Shepard looked up only to find him staring down at her, those pale, beautiful eyes—alight with joy and love—setting her heart racing until she could feel the blood rushing beneath her skin. No, she wasn't with Garrus because he didn't trigger her. She'd fallen for him in a thousand tiny ways, starting the night he stood outside her cabin door and said he'd try to squeeze himself into that uptight asari's dress. She loved him because he was the best person and the kindest, most caring and patient friend who'd ever walked into her life.

Her father had believed in fate. Garrus ... and Nihlus ... took her as close to being a believer as someone like her could ever get.

"What?" he asked, his mandibles fluttering ever so slightly.

Shepard slipped her arms around him and laid her head against his chest. "I was just thinking how much I love the way your hand feels holding mine."

Pulling away just far enough to nuzzle the top of her head, he said, "I was thinking just about the exact same thing." He nodded toward the door. "Come on, let's feed the monster living in your stomach, then go relax somewhere Chakwas can't track us down."

Shepard took his hand again and let him lead her toward the door. "I don't have to hide from her; I'm free and clear." Laughing at the look he shot her, Shepard shrugged. "What? I'm not the one with the closed head injury."

"No, you're the zombie," he flung back. "And if Joker's movies are true ... I just want you to know I have a very gamey, grisly, not at all tasty sort of brain."

After a moment of staring at him, ten different smart ass remarks flipping through her head, Shepard just closed her mouth and turned away. "Nope, I can't do it." Grinning, she shook her head. "You made every single comeback I can think of just way too easy. I can't go there. It doesn't feel fair." A gentle shove sent her stumbling through the door. "Besides, if I was going to do the whole undead thing, I'd go with vampire. Yeah, definitely vampire. Graceful, ethereal, stealthy ... elegant."

Garrus opened the door, letting her exit the office first. "Now you're making it too easy."

Gasping, Shepard spun to face him, her face drawn in horror as she clapped a hand over her heart. "Are you saying I'm none of those things? Why, General Vakarian ... so cruel."

"Requisitions totalling twenty-five hundred ampules of medigel during our tenure on the Normandy." His shoulders rolled in an innocent, but assured wave. "That's all I'm saying."

Shepard grinned and tugged on his hand. "Come on, I'm starving, and I think I can smell your brain through the hole the rocket punched in your skull. Doesn't smell gamey at all." Her stomach chose that precise moment for another hearty rumble. Clapping a hand over her belly, Shepard cackled. "Sweet baby Jesus ... run, Garrus! It's coming for you."

He just pulled her in close to his side as he opened the outer door. "You're insane."

Shepard pressed tight against her love, not worrying about appearances when they stepped out into the corridor, hand in hand. During their convalescence, Dr. Chakwas's hawk-like scrutiny and refusal to allow them out of bed left Shepard and the general a great deal of time to decide several things about their relationship. The first of those being that life was far too short to hide how they felt for one another. Despite needing to maintain discipline and the respect of their people, they decided that hand holding and casual affection posed no threat to either. Perhaps even the opposite ... that it might help bond their subordinates much like a family with strong, loving parents.

As Shepard stepped over the threshold, an eerie, funerary silence pulled her from her cocoon of safety and warmth into vacuum. Although the entire building had been in mourning for days, at that moment, the pain felt fresh, cutting with a sharp, serrated edge. The alarm at the base of her skull let out a pointed shriek as rolling clouds of agony poured down the corridor, thick, fetid, and strong enough to stagger her. Slamming her hard in the chest, the sheer power of it left her gasping. What the hell?

Her alarm upped the shriek to a shrill wail, stabbing long pins into her spine. The air pressed heavier, a tight wrap of plastic clinging to her face, trying to suffocate her. She tensed and began to turn back, every nerve in her body screaming that everything—even the air—just felt wrong.

Then Garrus's hand tore free of hers, the thump of his boots on the floor quick, unsteady, and off balance. Whirling to face him, it took Shepard a handful of seconds to realize what she was seeing. Garrus stumbled, arched back and to the side, both hands scrabbling at the garrote cutting into his throat. The strangling bond twisted and bent the general backwards to make up for his assailant's lack of height. She tore her stare from the panic and pain in her love's blue eyes to the pair of large black ones that challenged her from behind the big guy's back. A drell?
Shepard stepped forward, the drell reeling back hard on the rope and cutting off Garrus's air in response. The next second, he jammed a pistol into the general's side. Shepard glanced at the gun, the angle and placement instantly thrusting home that the drell was a professional killer, and that Garrus had seconds to live.

Without thinking, her mind still whirling and screaming, trying to catch up, Shepard leaped forward, her hands held out. "No!" She stepped sideways far enough to stare straight into the assassin's eyes. "Not him."

Those fathomless eyes stared right back into hers, the agony she'd felt earlier rolled from the assassin in waves so heavy they bordered on insanity. "Why do the wicked live and become old, yes, become mighty in power?" The voice, deep and heavily flanged, didn't come across mad or even angry as it quoted the Old Testament, but rather resigned ... almost calm.

It took her a second to realize what he'd said. "Garrus is not wicked," she replied, a beseeching hand stretching out. Why wasn't the general fighting back? She shook that thought aside as it latched around her neck, squeezing tight. She needed to stay calm. What had the drell said? It was a quote from the bible ... Job. Thank goodness for her father's lectures on patience; he quoted Job frequently. "The general is not the sort of person Job was asking God about, but the very best of us."

Footsteps shattered Shepard's train of thought before it even managed to leave the station, boots pounding out a rumbling beat against the tile. As they stopped, a chorus of guns unfurling announced the arrival of Archangel security. The drell braced, keeping Garrus between him and unfriendly fire.

"I'm prepared to die here," the drell called, his voice calm.

"No guns," Garrus croaked, barely able to rake that much sound past the snare wrapped around his throat. "Grieving ... father."

"Get back," Shepard said, pushing the personnel down the hallway. She needed time ... just a few seconds to think. Why hadn't the assassin already killed Garrus? If it was just a hit, or vengeance, there was no reason to drag it out. Not if the drell didn't care about getting out alive. He wanted something. No. He needed something first. "Let him breathe, and we can sort this out." She lifted a hand to her ear. "This is Captain Jane Shepard. Stand down all security responding to Floor Twenty-one."

Muttering, the personnel backed down the hall, not putting their guns away until they reached the elevator and back exit. Once doors closed behind them, Shepard moved forward again.

"Okay, it's just the three of us." She held those eyes with a frank, businesslike stare. Pleading or showing weakness could well get Garrus killed. "You came here about your child?"

"I received word from a trusted contact that my son had joined a military cult run by a turian the citadel council has designated a traitor and a terrorist. One they wish to eliminate before he throws the galaxy into chaos," the drell replied, moving half a step out from behind Garrus. "I got here too late."

Shepard glanced at Garrus's eyes, not missing the sorrow and regret that flashed through them, nor the slump that relaxed his body. She shook her head, warning him not to broadcast any guilt. That road ended with his death, and no one was dying in that damned hallway.
Focusing back on the drell like a laser sight, she shook her head. "I wasn't here, so I don't have any answers." One finger stabbed at Garrus. "That torin right there is your best, and at this point, probably only shot at finding out what happened."

"Suns ... ." Garrus rasped, the word sounding like a dagger in his throat. "Kolyat ... defected."

The drell stiffened, his posture and expression almost gloating, as if Garrus had confirmed the assassin's every belief. "My son wished to escape your madness by defecting to the Blue Suns, and so you had him killed." He rumbled deep in his throat, an ugly sound full of fury and scorn. "Did you have some other terrified child do it? Threaten the masses to keep them in line?"

Rage overrode Shepard's caution, and she stormed to within a metre of them. "No! How dare you? You break into his home, threaten the safety and peace of his people, and then would condemn him by twisting his words when he offers you answers?" The blade of her hand sliced the air with every point. She pitched her head to one side, allowing the threat in her stance to manifest wholly through the stare hooked into his. "If you don't loosen that rope and listen to what he has to say, I promise you that, death-wish or no, I'll make you regret this moment fifteen ways before you die."

When the drell simply stared at her, she closed another step, hands and jaw clenching tight. "Let. Him. Speak." All the air and gravity on that floor collapsed into a singularity that hovered between Garrus and the assassin, sealing the three of them into a tremulous, fragile pocket universe. Shepard forced every cell in her body to radiate the promise that if the barrier shattered, hell would pour through the breech.

Garrus straightened a little, sucking in hoarse, whooping draughts of air between raw and scraping bouts of coughing. Each torment pierced Shepard through, a lance and brand worthy of inquisition. "Kolyat," Garrus gasped, "joined Blue Suns ... arrived on Omega." He slipped his talons beneath the rope, loosening it a little further, but made no attempt to escape. "CO ordered complete massacre ... civilians ... children."

Despite knowing that the drell needed to hear what happened from Garrus, the sheer effort and pain it caused the general to speak tore into Shepard, demanding that she minimize his suffering. For a half second, she nearly dropped the walls holding all her terror and horror in check. She slapped them back up as the emotion in the assassin's glare drained away, leaving his eyes cold, almost reptilian. Weeping wouldn't save Garrus; she saw that mirrored clearly in the black depths. She needed to be the north wind, frozen and intractable.

But, she could help Garrus get the story out. "Kolyat deserted the Suns when his CO ordered them to kill Archangel's civilians and children?" she asked, feeling as though someone should shout, 'leading the witness'.

Garrus's nod provoked a sharp yank on the rope, but at least his talons buffered the blow. "Crossed bridge ... Archangel outnumbered ... certain death, but brave."

The rope loosened a little, the drell demanding clarification that time. "Kolyat crossed to your side to protect the children?" The whisper of pride and love in the drell's words expanded their universe by a couple of heartbeats. The singularity relaxed, allowing the breath trapped in Shepard's bronchi to escape, a nebulous hiss ... pale and shivering in the dark.

"Yes." The single word dissolved into a choking fit, but the drell allowed the general to bend, bracing himself on his knee with one hand until it passed. Garrus's voice came out a bit stronger when he straightened. "He volunteered ... sniper ... covered my blind ... doctor ordered me to rest." He rumbled low in his throat, clearing it. The sound rolled down the corridor, echoing like the deep, earthy resonance of an earthquake.
It thrummed over Shepard's skin, hope made manifest. The singularity weakened further, light trembling around the edges, allowing for a tease of transparency.

"How did he die?" An elastic band pulled to the breaking point, the drell's tone snapped the boundaries tight once more—a guard sensing imminent escape.

"Lull in the fighting." Garrus straightened, shoving himself upright. When he tried to face the drell, to look into the assassin's eyes, the rope snatched at his air, greedy and strict. "He stood, turned ... out of cover ... second. I grabbed ... pull him down. Too late."

The drell tightened up on the rope again, the gun never wavering as it aimed upward from under the lowest plate ... a trajectory designed to pierce liver, gullet, lungs, and heart.

"What's your name?" Shepard demanded, whittling the question down to a pointed demand. She lunged into the assassin's space without making any move to rescue Garrus or snatch away the gun. Hand to hand, she might win, but Garrus would lose long before she even managed to pry the pistol from the drell's fingers.

Garrus's assailant just stared, startled by the question, as she'd hoped.

She pressed. "If you're going to attack and kill the best person I've ever known ... one of the only hopes this entire galaxy has to fight back against the Reapers ... I'll look you in the eye and know your name." She turned her back and strode three steps down the hall, eyes closed, praying the whole way that she didn't hear a shot. When she turned around, the drell stared at her as if she'd just peeled back her face to reveal a drell one beneath it.

"Did my son speak before he died?" he asked instead of answering, his tone losing most of its edge. Shepard sucked in a long breath. Thank god she'd been right about the reason Garrus remained alive. The drell wanted ... needed to reconnect with his child too strongly to kill outright.

Garrus let out a couple of harsh roaring barks, then cleared his throat again. "He asked me not to leave him. I picked him up and carried him to the hospital floor."

Sentences coming out whole sparked Shepard's hope even brighter. Somehow she'd get Garrus through. She'd accept no other result.

"In the elevator," Garrus continued, his croak barely audible, "we spoke of fathers and sons. He asked why you hadn't loved him and stayed with him after his mother died." He tried to turn again, this time making it around far enough to look down at his would-be murderer. "I told him that I knew you still loved him."

"How?" the grieving father asked, his voice like boulders tumbling downhill. Even with Garrus looking at him, the drell's stare remained fixed on Shepard. "Perhaps I couldn't wait to cut him loose in favour of freedom."

Shepard thanked every power in the universe that wasn't true. If it had been, she'd be on the floor, holding Garrus's body; the universe darker and uglier than anything she wanted to endure.

"He asked that as well," Garrus replied. "I answered by asking him if he'd stopped loving you. He said he hadn't ... that he had always adored you ... even wanted to be just like you one day."

The silence hovered, tipping back and forth on a delicate edge for a moment. "Thane Krios," the drell said, replying to Shepard's earlier question. "My name is Thane Krios." He backed up a step. "Did my son know what I was when he died?"
The short rope forced Garrus to stumble backwards a step as well. "Yes. I explained your absence as sheltering him from your work." Turning once more, the general said, "In his last few seconds, your son recited a prayer for forgiveness then apologized to you for not remembering more of it."

Escaping Thane Krios's suddenly slack hands, the rope slithered from Garrus's neck. Shepard's mesmerized gaze followed the weapon to the floor, where it pooled, its deadliness jumbled into impotence. The assassin collapsed sideways, catching himself on the sill of the window looking into the main research lab. His gun rattled against the wall then dropped to lie unnoticed at his feet.

"Kolyat prayed?" The raw pain in those words ... the years of regret and lost time never to be retrieved, shattered the singularity, allowing light and sound and life to pour in around them.

"Before I left, he was already old enough to call my beliefs old fashioned and dull." The research lab lights shone brilliant enough to make Shepard's eyes tear as she followed him.

"The council and your contact misled you, Sere Krios," Shepard said, keeping a tight grip on the upper hand. "Your son did not fall under the sway of some charismatic, wicked cult leader. Kolyat fought to protect the innocent and died in compassionate arms. He died fighting alongside people who are trying to shield the galaxy from a terrible, oncoming storm."

Garrus staggered toward Shepard, his hand reaching out, talons fumbling for her fingers, then wrapping like vices around them. Keeping her eyes on the drell, she moved in against her torin, helping support him as she quickly checked his throat. Tar black, a thick band curled around his neck, disappearing beneath the bandage covering the side of his head. She opened her mouth to tell him to head up to see Chakwas, but then shut it, knowing that she'd just be wasting her breath.

Instead, she settled him onto one of the benches outside his office door, and followed the drell. "I'm very sorry for your loss, Sere Krios. Please, allow Garrus to give you Kolyat's belongings, and let us explain why the general carries a price on his head."

"All cadets are required to keep a personal log," Garrus said, stepping up behind Shepard as he shifted the conversation back to the dead boy. "Your son was not here long, but he was here during a high stress time. Perhaps what he wrote will ease your fears."

The seconds ticked by, their passage marked by the roar of Shepard's pulse in her ears. The drell stiffened.

"He clings to me, tiny hands wadding up fistfuls of my jacket. 'Please, don't leave me here. Why can't I come?' Tears wash his face. His eyes flash, the last glint of the sun before it sets. So strong. So like his mother. I lift him up. His cheeks are wet beneath my lips. He smells of soil ... the sandwiches we ate together ... and his mother. Setting him down, I pry his fingers from the leather. They tremble, fall's last leaves, within my grasp. I brush the tears from his cheeks with my thumb and look to his aunt. She takes hold of him so he doesn't chase me. He cries out as I turn away. 'Father, please don't go.' I step into the blinding winter rain." The drell lifted his head, shaking it slightly.

Shepard stepped forward. "Sere?" A hesitant hand reached out to touch his shoulder. "Are you all right?"

The drell nodded and jerked himself straight and stiff despite the tears tracing pale tracks down his cheeks. "Apologies. I slip into memories too easily, lately." He looked to Garrus, but gestured toward the geth working in their lab. "If I have been ill informed ... if I have been misled ... what is this place? What is Archangel?"

Garrus looked to Shepard, but she backed away, keeping herself within leaping range of Thane...
Krios, but distancing herself from the conversation. Archangel was Garrus's to explain, and the trust that needed to be built lie between them. A gentle voice whispered in the back of Shepard's mind as her alarm fell silent. Anything that she needed to prove to the assassin had already been settled.

Sere Krios's reaction to his son reciting the prayer before dying put her defences on stand down. A moral man of strong beliefs stood before her, but also one of intelligence and reason. Given all the information, she felt sure that he'd not only stand down, but become a fierce ally. She didn't sense any of the cold ruthlessness she'd experienced with other assassins ... none of the contempt for life. However Thane Krios had survived life as a killer for hire, it hadn't been by selling his soul.

Although her eyes never left the pair as they spoke ... well, Garrus spoke and Thane stared into the lab ... she allowed the conversation to wash over her without paying it any attention. It wasn't until Garrus began to explain how the organization came by its name that she focused in on the words, a faint, exasperated flush crawling up her neck. She glowered at the general as he turned to look at her, the expression carrying no heat despite how badly the name embarrassed her.

"I knew that even dead, Shepard would be watching over us ... protecting us." He smiled, a soft, sad sort of smile. "And then she returned to save her namesake ... just ... in a more literal way that I imagined." The smile warmed, a teasing spark igniting in his gaze.

Shepard sighed and shook her head.

Sere Krios turned from the glass to stare into Shepard's eyes. "Siha," he said, the word invoking a sort of reverent hush that pricked the hairs along Shepard's arms. "The word for such a being in my beliefs is siha ... warrior angel."

The sudden softness in the drell's expression set off an altogether different alarm ... that one in Shepard's gut. No. No no no. People believing she was the archangel balanced far more weight on her shoulders than she cared to bear. She shook her head. "Mere mortal here, Sere Krios, definitely nothing divine." Holding an hand out toward the elevator to divert the conversation, she said, "Please, allow the general to escort you to your son's belongings, then we'd be honoured if you would join us for the evening meal. We'd be happy to answer as many of your questions as we can."

Thane nodded once and followed her to the lift. He remained silent as they led him to the quartermaster's office, where they left him alone with the box that contained Kolyat's belongings.

Shepard sat Garrus down on a bench and crouched between his knees, her fingertips lifting to check the bruise around his neck. "Damn. You need to go up and let Chakwas look at that."

He shook his head even though his talons lifted to rub at it. "I'm fine. He never pulled it tight enough to crush anything." His hand left his throat to caress her face. "Good thing he wanted to know about his son. Otherwise ... ."

Shepard leaned into him and wrapped her arms around him. "Yeah." After several minutes, the gravity behind the door to the quartermaster's office began to tug at her, and she pulled away. "I hope he's all right in there." A wince chased that idiocy as it escaped her mouth. "Well, he's not going to be all right."

Garrus nodded, then looked up as the door opened, Thane Krios stepping out, the small crate under one arm. Shepard and Garrus stood, turning to stand at attention, Kolyat Krios's honour guard.

"Kolyat wrote of you and this place with great respect." Thane held up a datapad. "He speaks of many things I'd like to know more about, if you'd indulge my curiosity." Shaking his head, he looked at the text on the device. "These Reapers … the council declared Sovereign a geth dreadnought. It was a sentient machine … ." Looking up, he held Shepard's stare for a moment before turning to Garrus. "These things are what my son was preparing to fight?"

The general answered by holding his arm out toward the elevator. "Please, come join us for the evening meal. The kitchen will be deserted by now, the cadets up in their dorms. We can talk."

The dining hall stood empty, dim, and silent, Marcie and a few staff the only people still walking the main floor. After setting trays of food in front of the trio, even the staff retired, leaving them alone.

For three hours, Sere Krios posed thoughtful, intelligent questions, giving the answers his full attention. Shepard watched him, able to see him setting pieces into the puzzle, weaving threads together to create a whole deeper than even they gave him. As she watched, she hoped that the drell assassin would conclude that their cause was one worthy of his assistance. He'd make a fine addition to her little gang of misfits aboard the Ypres.

"And despite their treachery, you saved the council?" he asked, even though his expression told Shepard he already knew why.

She nodded, staring down at her tray as she drew patterns in the spaghetti sauce with the tines of her fork. "They're a known quantity. Besides, any replacements would end up indoctrinated as soon as they were appointed. Best to just leave things as they are, preserve the status quo as long as we can. Panic, market crashes … none of that would serve the cause." One hand covered a yawn, and she slipped a little lower in her chair as the hour closed in on midnight.

Across the table, Thane bristled. "Stealing people's souls, corrupting them silently as they go about their lives … as they sleep." He shook his head as if he couldn't comprehend that level of evil, or perhaps because he could. After a moment of silence, he spoke again, his words startling her.

"In his log, Kolyat mentioned a story I told him when he was a child. He asked for it over and over again." The drell shoved himself away from the table, leaping up from his chair to pace to the threshold of the lobby. "When I was a child, I begged my father to tell me the same tale every night. It wasn't a tale well-suited to settling children to sleep, so Irikah, my wife, protested as my mother had." A discomfited grumble rolled from his throat. "It is a hanar legend about a beast of shadow that creeps up on children as they sleep, wrapping itself over their nose and mouth, stealing their souls through their breath. In the hanar tale, they wrapped around the child's gills, but the idea remained the same."

Stopping a few metres away, the assassin stared into Shepard's eyes, the black gaze exhausted and haunted. "In the hanar version, a great hero descends from the stars to chase them back into the abyss." He looked down at his hands, folding them as if to pray. "In my father's and my own, Arashu sends her siha to defeat them. Kolyat believed the Reapers—their indoctrination and turning people into monsters—to be the origin of that story."

Shepard sucked in a long breath through a throat tight with both revelation and horror. "My father told me a similar tale when I was a child. I used to sleep with the cat next to my pillow to defend me against the monsters. The way I remember it, the old wives' tale was that cats stole children's breath, but my father assured me that the cats actually protected people … that the monsters were huge and dark … oily shadows longing for life and breath … stealing souls in an attempt to fill their own emptiness."

She shuddered, tucking herself in against Garrus's side. The general wrapped his arm around her as if sensing that terror suddenly drained the heat from her blood, leaving her craving warmth and comfort. "Sweet baby Jesus ... the Collectors and Reapers ... they've been the monsters under all our beds since we huddled around fires at night."

Garrus nuzzled Shepard's ear, then rested his brow against her temple. "My father told a story as well. Shadows that clung beneath the wings of giant, nocturnal raptors, dropping down to drain unwary children of life, stealing the spirits tied to them. He said the famactylus were the shards of evil created by the Aligarrim Dau's greed."

Shepard shook her head as possibilities unspooled in her head. Yes, the Reapers might be the galactic bogeymen, but maybe they were for a reason. "No one has ever thought to ask about real monsters hiding behind the myths … well, except for Dr. Bryson. But what if they were put there … if the stories were woven into our cultural memory for a reason and with purpose? Not just the figments of our ancestors trying to process a power they couldn't comprehend?"

Garrus shifted so he could look down at her. "You mean there may be some useful information in them?" He nodded, a thoughtful scowl pulling his brow plates and mandibles in tight. "It makes sense from what you've said about Tashac and Merol ... the Protheans' attempts to prepare us for the next cycle."

She sat up a little, resting her forearms on the edge of the table, her fingers threaded in a loose tangle, and met the black stare pinning her from across the table. "The whole idea of these aliens being seeded into our cultures as the bogeyman is terrifying, but … " She grinned. "... I've got to admit it's exciting too. We may well have been given another weapon in this war."

Garrus sighed, his breathing still sounding as though the air had to fight its way out. He shifted forward, reentering Shepard's peripherals. "It certainly places a lot of importance on the work that Liara and the Brysons are doing. Everyone laughed at Joker's idea, but they won't be laughing if, in the end, the stories turn out to be more valuable than guns and ships."

Thane returned to his chair, his entire body held rigid, practically vibrating with tension. He didn't speak, however, just watched them.

Shepard stretched and chuckled, trilling a little in the back of her throat as she reached the apex of her stretch. "I'm suddenly a lot more excited to see what Liara has in store for us on Thessia. She seemed really excited about what Ann Bryson was able to decode, and said it was related to Tashac and Merol."

"The protheans the beacon downloaded into your head?" the assassin asked. "You're travelling to Thessia to investigate the truth behind these legends?"

A loose shrug rolled across Shepard's shoulders, and she pulled herself up in her chair. "I'm not exactly sure what we're going to investigate, but I'd really like to take some time to look for where they lived. I know they built something into that mountain." She turned to face Garrus. "I'm starting to fade fast, and I need to meet Nihlus down here at 0530." Shifting her gaze to the assassin, she asked, "I hate to lay all this on you and run. Can we help you in some way? Do you have somewhere you need to be? Is there anything else we can do for you?"

Thane stared down at his hands, resting between his thighs, fingertips pressed together. For long moments, he didn't move, and when he looked up to meet Shepard's stare again, he moved so quickly it startled her. "I'm dying," he said, simply and without any trace of melodrama … just a statement of fact. "I sought to reconnect with my son, because I have only months to live." A soft breath struck a poignant, but peaceful-feeling pause. "That goal will now have to wait until I join him and his mother across the sea."
Shepard watched him, studying the carefully controlled movements and expressions, trying to read his intentions. Although she didn't believe him a threat any longer, he remained an unknown, and sweet baby Jesus, she hated those. As they sat there, a question burgeoned in the air between them, swelling until she began to fear it was headed toward becoming a thunderstorm.

"Kolyat believed this cause worth his dedication and his life." His dark, intense stare burrowed through Shepard's as if following it to find and examine her soul. Uncomfortable, she blinked and shifted her gaze to her hands for a second. He cleared his throat, a soft sound that came off as an apology. "Would you allow me to fulfill his promise … to take up his oath to help defeat the Reapers?"

He laughed, soft and bitter. "I took the contract to assassinate you," he said, looking to Garrus, "because I seek to balance the scales of my life … to make the galaxy a brighter place before I die."

The chuckle died, but a much more genuine smile replaced it. "Perhaps Amonkira answered my prayers, and by leading me astray, the council guided me to my true purpose."

Shepard looked to Garrus as well, trying to judge how he felt about the offer. She didn't doubt its voracity, but the electric tingle that walked up her spine every time the drell looked at her told her that he didn't intend to stay on Omega with Garrus. He could be a hell of an asset, but the whole idea of him seeing her as some sort of angelic deliverance wriggled like maggots in the back of her throat.

She watched him sit there, a panther coiled upon a branch, waiting for the chance to pounce. Dying or not, uncomfortably weighted stare or not, Thane Krios was a living weapon … one that could deal a fuck-ton of damage against the Collectors.

And she had a team of five, one of whom didn't want to fight if he could help it, and another who'd be off on his own missions a lot of the time. She reached up and opened a channel to Miranda. The sleepy slur through the operative's greeting gave Shepard a twisted ping of joy.

"Operative Lawson, I'm sending you another member for the team. His name is Thane Krios. Please see to it that he is given accommodations that suit his needs and that he checks in with Dr. Eis for his combat fitness exam before we reach Thessia. Thank you. Goodnight." She closed the channel before Miranda could reply. The hour was far too late to argue.

Instead, she activated her omnitool and brought up the Ypres's berth information. "Satisfactory?" she asked, a half-teasing smile tugging at the corner of her mouth.

"Quite." He grabbed the information, then gave them both a stiff, half-bow. "Thank you, Captain … General … for this opportunity." His eyes shifted back to Garrus. "And for being a voice of kindness and care in my son's last moments."

Garrus stood, a starched nod preceding his offered hand. "Welcome aboard, Sere Krios."

Shepard stood, but didn't offer her hand. Then again Thane didn't seem to expect it. He merely turned on his heel and walked out the front door. When he disappeared from sight, she wrapped her arm around Garrus's waist. "Well, that ended not too badly at all."

He chuckled, the sound painful. "Let me grab something to drink, and then we'll head up?"

"Sure." She walked over to one of the refrigerators. "Think the horde left any good soda?" She pulled the door open, a small hoot of victory greeting a couple bottles of orange. "Glory hallelujah, an honest to god, praise Jesus miracle."
"Glad to see your priorities are intact," he grumbled.

Shepard stuck her tongue out at him and snatched up both bottles. Strutting ever so slightly, she headed for the stairs, waiting for him to join her before climbing to his door.

Garrus palmed the door, but allowed her to precede him into the cool, dim space. He entered, moving through the near dark to turn on a lamp by the bed … the light dim and golden. She watched him walk to his wardrobe, sensing something … hesitation or fear, maybe?

"Garrus?" She took a step toward him, but then hesitated. A wry smile greeted that. For all their talk of not waiting for anything, but rather grabbing hold of their life together and running with it … there they stood, both suddenly unsure and shy.

"I dreamed about you the whole time while you were … " He hesitated long enough that she knew he warred with using the most honest word. "... gone. We were always somewhere beautiful." She watched him swallow, his throat convulsing a little, the black band striking and horrific in the light. His words came out thin and stretched, mostly from emotion, although a salty sort of rasp spoke to the damage he'd taken earlier. "You were so happy … so free of all the weight and pain."

Shepard took another single step forward, but then he closed the rest of the gap. He reached out a trembling hand to touch her cheek. "Did they pull you out of paradise, Shepard?" Tears welling along his lower lid, he blinked. She saw his throat convulse as he tried to swallow a soft keen before it could escape. He turned away, his shoulders slumping as if something he'd seen in her eyes weighed on him.

Following him, heart beating slow but strong, she reached out, aching to take that burden back. "Garrus?"

"How could they?" he said, his voice a low grate of fury. "How dare they? I would have died a hundred deaths before I brought you back to this nightmare of Reapers and disappearing colonies … the endless struggle." He walked away another half dozen steps. "No matter how badly I missed you. No matter how badly I ached to touch you, to just … be with you like this." He turned, his hand lifting toward her. It hovered for a moment, then started to fall.

Shepard jumped forward and caught it, her fingers cradling his tough, calloused ones, then lacing into them. "I don't remember," she whispered, only putting enough strength behind the words for them to reach him. "I don't really remember anything after you fools cheering for my being made a Spectre." She stepped into him, slipping an arm around his waist. "And there were a couple weeks where I wished they hadn't bothered. I suppose if I'd been left to heal completely the way I was supposed to, things would've been different." Lifting his hand to her lips, she kissed each talon. "But I'm here now. I can keep fighting, help find out what is happening to our colonies. I'm content being back … with you."

He looked down at her and pressed his mouth to her brow. He nuzzled her, the sensation so tender that tears gathered in her throat. Closing her eyes, she savoured the contact as he whispered, "I wouldn't have asked you to give up peace for that." He kissed her then rested his cheek against her hair. "I'm so sorry, Kahri."

She pulled away, wriggling loose of his arms. Taking his hands, she laced every bit of love into the stare that met his. It ached deep in her bones that he thought her return hurt her, that somehow sorrow stared back at him instead of the sweet, warmth that shored her up, making every pain so very worth experiencing.

"I'm not," she said, the gentle rain of tears escaping to trickle over her cheeks. "I don't care if I was there in those dreams, Garrus. As perfect as they may have been, this is better. Above and beyond everything else … all the other reasons I could be grateful to get another shot . . . there's you." She squeezed his hands, the warmth of them … the slight pulse under her thumbs … so alive. He formed such a huge piece of her heart. How had she made it through the month without it? "Would you ask me to give up peace to be with you?"

Garrus winced, one hand breaking free to erase the tears, his thumb avoiding the splits in her flesh. She knew by the gentle, but stubborn set to his expression that he couldn't tell her anything but the truth. He took a shallow breath. "I wouldn't ask you to give up anything for me, Kahrì, but I'd have walked away from even the most perfect paradise to be with you right now." He tried to pull her into his arms, but she resisted, backing toward the bed.

"This one looks a whole lot more comfortable than the last one." A tiny smile broke through the rain. "Garrus Vakarian, will you make love to me?" She stopped, standing next to the bed and looked up at him, feeling so very small right then, but strong beyond limit, ageless and wise. How had she survived the month without him?

He hesitated, cupping her cheek in his hand. "Shepard … ."

"You said it yourself, Garrus. No more waiting. I didn't come back from the dead to spend my life in fear." That time her hands escaped his grip and reached up to undo the fasteners down the front of his tunic. "Neither one of us is in any shape for gymnastics, but I miss you making love to me."

A confused frown dropped his brow plates and mandibles. "I've … we've never … ."

Shepard cocked an eyebrow at him. "Haven't we? I recall one night where we made love sitting on my bed and watching a movie. Another several where you held me in your arms and read to me."

She brushed the backs of her fingers along the smooth blade of his mandible. "You've always made love to me, Garrus … even before we kissed."

Halfway down his tunic, she stopped, able to feel his heart pounding against the backs of her fingers when they pressed against his chest. He was afraid. After a second, she dropped her hands and backed away a step, suspecting the nature of the problem. Her eyes staring straight at his chest to remove some of the pressure, she asked, "Did we make love in your dreams?"

He sighed and closed his eyes as he nodded. "We did, but we never … ."

"We never went all the way," she said, her voice soft. "You woke up." Her hands pressed against his chest to either side of his keel. "Garrus, open your eyes." When he did, she looked up, a soft smile encouraging him. "Are you afraid the real thing won't live up to the dream or is it something else?" Shaking her head, she caressed his face again. "I'm really here, Garrus." She smiled, just a thin, tight press of her lips. "I'm here."

He bent down, pressing his mouth to her lips, his tongue flicking ever so slightly against the sensitive skin. "You won't vanish on me?" he whispered, pulling back a tiny bit.

"No. I'm not going anywhere." She unfastened the front panel, her hands slipping inside before she laid it open. He tensed, but she just closed her eyes and smiled. "Mmm, so warm, just like I remembered. My turian-shaped heating unit."

Following the line of his chest plates, she spread his tunic open, freezing as her fingers nudged into something hard and raised … and metal.

_What the hell?_
"Garrus?" Gently, but urgently, she pushed the material off his shoulders, exposing the damage. Holy shit … he looked as though he'd been torn apart. Horror, stark and excruciating, sucked all the air from her lungs and stole her tears before they could escape. Incisions circled his entire chest, thin metal slabs and pins holding his keel and plates together. Long, raised lines of scar tissue in his hide betrayed where he'd been cut open.

"Oh, my sweet baby Jesus," she said, her voice barely louder than her breath. Her heart contracted; a pair of pale, milky eyes flashed through her mind, the remembered stench of flesh decaying off a body still alive bit deep into her nose, and the soft moans of a suffering beyond imagining echoed inside her skull. "What happened to you, Garrus?" Shaking her head, she ran gentle fingertips over the damage, knowing all too well what had happened to him. "Oh my … holy … ." The only words left amounted to a string of profanity, so she just bit them off.

She left him to dispose of his tunic, her fingers fumbling with the fasteners on his leggings, frantic to see everything those bastards had done to him. "Is that the extent of it?"

He reached behind his back and pulled the sleeves off his hands, tossing the garment in the general direction of the couch. "Shepard, I'm fine." He tried to capture her hands, but she slipped them from his grasp, slapping his talons away, and crouched to free his spur.

"Like hell you are. It looks as though someone took you apart and some mechanic threw you back together in his wrecking yard." Her voice snapped with lightning ready to strike, but it stemmed from fear rather than anger and wasn't aimed at him.

Why? Why had they taken him apart? And how? When?

He sighed and straightened, letting her finish her taking his leggings off. "We never get this right, do we?" he asked, the soft humour in his words breaking through the frozen wall of her horror, letting the sorrow pour through.

Instead of replying, she fell back, leaning against the bed. She stared at the damage, tears raining thick and fast down her face.

"Oh my god, Garrus. Why didn't you tell me?" she whispered, reaching out a hand to touch the long scar down his thigh. Fingers as gentle as kisses caressed his hide, her face wincing a little every time she encountered a deviation.

"I'm sorry, Kahri. I … ." He paused, long enough that she knew he was searching … trying to figure out how or why it had slipped his mind. "Weeks back, Nihlus and I disappeared for ten days. We don't remember what happened to us, we just woke up like this. Dr. Chakwas fixed us up. I'm okay. We're both okay."

She knelt and wrapped herself around him, her arms raised to press her hands into the small of his back. Resting her cheek against his stomach, she just squeezed him tight. "I'm so sorry, Garrus. I'm so very sorry."

He bent down and slid his hands under her arms, gently lifting her onto her feet. As soon as she stood, she wrapped herself around him again.

"Why are you sorry?" he asked.

She just breathed him in for long moments, calming the frantic stilettos that stabbed into her heart with every beat. She knew she wasn't responsible, but pressure, like a hand, latched onto the back of her head, naming her responsible … as if she should have been able to do something to stop the Cerberus bastards.

"Al … Specimen Alpha … the turian in that vid … ." Pulling away, she pressed her hands on either side of Garrus's keel. "They were trying to turn him into some sort of command unit or super soldier to fight the Reapers. They'd implant him with cybernetics … I think they were based on tech salvaged from Sovereign, then they'd make him fight … ." She shook her head, her fingertips tracing his injuries. "They tortured him for two years."

"And then tested their results on Nihlus and I?" he asked. She looked up, searching his expression when she heard no anger in his voice, not even a rumble. Well, maybe a rumble.

Garrus nodded. "Yeah, I've guessed most of that already, Shepard, and it's not anything you've got to be sorry about. You had just woken up, didn't know anything was going on." He kissed her. "I was supposed to be making love to you, not making you cry." Brushing the backs of his talons along her jaw, he nuzzled her lips. "I'd much rather get back to the first."

Shepard's breath left her in a muttered, barely-audible grumble about the impossible nature of all turians.

Garrus chuckled as his hands slid down her sides, moving to the waist of her leggings. "You can't possibly have met every turian." Pausing with his thumbs hooked into the elastic, he looked down at her. "You okay?"

"Nervous, but okay," she replied, slipping her hands down his arms, then back up, balancing with her hands on his shoulders as he pushed them down to her feet, and she stepped out of them.

"Oh, Kahri," he whispered, crouching in front of her. "They're everywhere."

She nodded and reached out to tip his face up to look at her. "You're supposed to be making love to me, not making yourself cry, either." Grinning, she leaned in to kiss him. "We're not going to be doing a lot of jumping up and down on one another for a while, but I want us to get as close as we can manage."

Garrus stood and drew her to the bed. He sat and drew her in to stand between his thighs. "Okay." Leaning in, he nuzzled her neck, the touch pouring warmth down her entire nervous system. As quickly and roughly as Shepard had removed his clothing, Garrus took his time, revealing her slowly, one fastener at a time, spreading the wide panel down the front open a little more as his talon tips slid over the heavy fabric. Those same talons barely kissed the skin, tracing just beside the deep rents carved into her flesh, his expression clearly displaying the war going on within him, battalions of sorrow and anger putting up a brave defense against the bright light shone by the forces of love and gratitude.

When he finally reached the last fastener, he laid her tunic wide, easing it just off the balls of her shoulders. Slightly narrowed eyes and gentle talons moved over her as if trying to learn her landscape. He'd barely known the old one, and this new one . . . . The pad of a talon followed a particularly long, ugly split down over her right breast. She looked down at the intense, unexpected combination of pleasure and pain, and then pulled away from him. God, her entire body was just so damned hideous, it seemed indecent for it to react with that flood of yearning, tingling warmth. Clambering up onto the mattress, she sat against the head of the bed, tucking her arms around the knees she pulled up to her chest.

Damn it, Janey. Would you like to pull and push him a little more? If you work at it, you can probably come up with some even more mixed signals to send him.
The general … her general … sat on the bed, the outside of his thigh pressed against her feet. He draped one large hand over her knee, and stared into her eyes, waiting for her to find the courage to look up and meet the intensity … the laser sight focused on her. A soft smile brushed over her lips, and she reached one hand up to caress the plate over his right eye, careful to avoid the damage.

"I'm sorry. I'm still a complete basket case, but I do want this, Garrus." Her fingers wandered over his face and down his neck. "I just … how could you look at this mess and feel any sort of desire?" Misery, heavy and thick, packed onto her, fetid clay weighing her down. "How am I supposed to feel about this mess reacting with desire?" She sighed.

He just smiled. "We're quite the pair, aren't we?" The warmth in his voice lodged in her throat, a strangling ball of emotion that launched an uncomfortable heat and pressure up through her sinuses to burn in the corners of her eyes. Leaning ever so gently on her knee, he bent down to touch his brow to hers. "You never worried about me seeing the old scars or touching them," he said, his voice just soft rumbling tones and warm breath on her face. "Why the new ones?"

She felt the soft mewing sound that squeaked from her throat more than heard it. "The old scars were my armour, Garrus. They protected me. They'd grown into a part of me." One hand flapped at the damage tearing across her face. "Cerberus did this to me. They pulled my corpse out of its coffin and … ." Her stare dropped to the pulse beating against the front of his cowl. "They turned me into a monster, Garrus. How could anyone ever want to make love to a monster?"

When he tried to speak, she pressed her fingers over his mouth. Her brows drew together, the skin between pinching uncomfortably as the coals trapped in her tear ducts formed themselves into molten pins. "The worst part about you turning me away because you didn't know what I was … I don't know what I am. Not really." A small shrug pushed her tunic back up over her shoulders. "I feel." She pressed her fingers against the top plate of his mouth, latching her stare onto that contact. "I feel all these things. This love and connection. I remember … not everything, but enough to believe that it could have been my life."

His eyes drifted closed, and he nuzzled her fingers. "I desire you, Kahri. You. And I know exactly what you are. I did before Chakwas told us it was you." His tone imparted an understanding that tore at her defences. "I knew it was you. Nihlus was right, it only took one look into your eyes, and I knew. But … if I let myself believe it, if I let you wake up that part of me again, and I lost you … ." He shook his head and then grasped her wrist. "It was just easier to convince myself you were something else."

Lifting her hand, he pressed her palm against his chest just over his heart. "Does the fact my chest is covered by plates—and now metal plates and screws—does it make me undesirable to you?"

She let her hand slide down his belly to rest on the taut, hard length of his thigh. The smile returned to warm her face again, pushing back the gorgon-cursed-chill that spread from all those fissures as if the silicate and carbon of her cybernetics infiltrated her flesh, slowly turning her to stone. "Not in the least." A slightly wicked gleam sparked deep in her belly, travelling along her muscles to escape through her smile. "I want to learn every centimetre of you … every place that makes you do that rumble in your chest."

"Then trust that I feel the same, even if I'll need to be careful for a while." Garrus stood, and sliding one arm under her knees, the other slipping around her back, he lifted her from the mattress to cradle her in his arms. He chuckled as she resisted. "You've always trusted me, and even though I understand why that trust might not come as easily after the way I behaved, please … Kahri." His voice lifted to frame a question even as the tone lowered, laced with an oh so familiar, comforting rumble.
She relaxed into him, reaching up with the hand not trapped against his lower chest to caress his mouth plates and chin with her fingertips. "Of course I trust you, Garrus. Always." She gripped the front of his cowl as he sat her down on the edge of the bed, holding onto him as he tried to pull away. "Where are you going?"

He bent down to kiss her, mouth moving softly against her lips, his tongue remaining firmly behind his teeth as his hands gently pushed her tunic off her shoulders and slid it down her arms. She kissed him back, parted lips damp, clinging to his hide, caressing as she lifted into him. She tugged at the sleeves that caught on her hands, suddenly wanting that last damned barrier gone. When she was free, her hands slipped around his neck, pulling him closer, deepening the kiss.

After a moment, he pulled back a little and answered her question. "I'm only going as far as the wardrobe." Chuckling, he kissed her again, then straightened and turned away.

Watching him as he crossed the floor, Shepard let a wide smile beat back the last of the earlier chill. As long as she had him, she could believe that she'd come back, that she was alive … not whole … no, not by a long shot, but alive.

He closed the wardrobe and turned, holding out a simple, emerald garment made of shimmering material. Shepard's grin widened until it sent stabbing pains through her cheeks.

"Holy crap … you saved it." She stood and lifted her arms over her head as he gathered the material between his hands.

"Of course I did." Slipping it over her arms, he released the silk to slither and caress its way down her body. His expression fell a little as he ran a talon along the underside of the neckline, his knuckle just brushing her skin. "You left it in my drawer … waiting for the next time you came to stay. I just couldn't throw it away."

She stepped into him, wrapping her arms around his waist. "Let's get into bed. I need to be up in a couple of hours, and I want to squeeze out every last second I can of being tucked into your arms."

He nodded, but held onto her when she tried to pull away. "Do something for me?" he asked, his stare suddenly serious and hard.

"Of course." She leaned back against his arms to better meet his eyes. The worry she saw there started her heart pounding rabbit quick. "What is it?"

"I don't trust Cerberus. Keep Nihlus with you at all times." His head shook when she opened her mouth to speak, silencing her. "During the day, you don't leave his sight. At night, I want him in the same cabin … in the same bed, close enough to know if you hiccup. They don't get any chances to continue their experiments on you."

"Garrus … ." Fifteen different arguments formed to protest his request, but after giving them all their say, she let them go unvoiced. Her sleeping in the same bed posed no threat to her relationship with Garrus. She knew it, Nihlus knew it, and Garrus trusted it. "Okay." She nodded toward the bed. "Come on, I really have missed falling asleep in your arms."

(A-N: I'm settled! For a month or so, at least. Yay for that. I can get back on schedule. This is a long one, but I really loved the flow of it, so kept it as a piece. Yay Thane! I love that drell and can't wait to bring him into the crazy Sassy mix. He might strangle her. :D

Thanks to all my readers and my reviewers. I hope that everyone continues to love the story. Hugs to all who like the hugs.)
The medbay door opened, the space filled by armoured turian. "You're not quoting Henry the Fifth again, are you?"

Shepard made a face. "Shakespeare can never be quoted too often. Besides, I have to. Apparently, I've come down with a bad case of happy." The words came out tasting like parsnips … no … more bitter than putrid … brussel sprouts. "I need to cure it. Quick." She grinned and jerked her head toward the door. "Come on, let's go find some disaster."

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

35 Days ASR

Shepard woke wrapped in strong arms, feeling very warm and very safe. Her mother's voice, so very immediate and real the moment before, dissolved into half-remembered images, the rare and happy dream fading. Keeping her eyes closed, Shepard stayed still and listened. A wide grin spread across her face at the deep, rattling throat-roar coming from behind her. Nihlus remained in his deep-sleep snore; she could move without waking him. Actually, she could have brought in a heavy metal band and held a party for fifteen krogan friends without waking him.

Garrus may have rethought her nighttime safety arrangements if he knew his brother slept like the dead. A good, noisy abduction might have stirred the Spectre, but she didn't have the heart to start kicking and screaming to see.

She turned over inside the circle of his arms, prompting no more than a couple of mouth smacks and a mumble before he burrowed in and resettled, his face smooshed into his pillows. Warmth spread through her as she watched him. He'd punch her for saying it but he was damned cute when he slept.

Guilt slithered in behind the warmth, forcing her to call her feelings what they were. She loved him. When they met, she had a stupid schoolgirl sort of crush thing going. Sweet Jesus on a cracker, she hated admitting that. But she had. It started at some insipid council function. She'd caught sight of Nihlus guarding Sparatus and sort of sidled up to him at the bar. She couldn't remember if he actually managed to stutter out a word or two, but it didn't matter … she was lost. The combination of bad ass operative and adorably awkward, it proved to be her catnip.

Then, of course, during their sparring match that first week, he'd shredded her heart when he intimated that she'd whored herself out. Yes, she'd pushed him, kept him pissed off and slightly off balance … and yes, she couldn't really expect him to know why, but still, after days of taking care of him, those words had cut straight through her. Then they'd begun to mend and before she died, they'd danced around one another and the fact that she'd chosen Garrus. If only choosing Garrus had changed the way she felt about Nihlus. She tried to keep it bottled up, tried to downgrade it to friendship, because it was wrong. Loving two people at the same time was wrong, and it was selfish.
Her parents raised her with a certain set of guiding principles; cut and dried rules for what was right and what was wrong. For all she railed against her mother's strict ideas of who Jane Shepard needed to be and how she needed to behave, those principles formed the very core of her, and she'd never questioned them. Never.

Although not at the top of the list, monogamy had definitely been something that always just was. People pair bonded unless they wanted to be considered outside the norm. One male or female could only truly love one male or female. The rest amounted to aberration. It was never considered closed-minded or old-fashioned, or even a human-centric norm ... it was just truth.

As she watched him, seeing the first signs of rousing, her dream filtered back through. Her family had been sitting around watching some ridiculous program about this highly convoluted family all based around a human man with eight wives of different races: Galactic Family or something equally sophomoric. Despite being just about the most inane hour of programming in the entire galaxy, sometimes either channel turning inertia or the inability to look away from a shuttle crash led to them spending an hour listening to her mother rant about the selfishness and weakness of sapient life.

Apparently, Shepard's subconscious had a bone to pick with her. She sighed.

"I can't believe they have the nerve to call this family entertainment," her mother groused. She bounced Bunny on her lap, cooing to her in baby talk. "Can you, little Beatrix? No, of course you can't." Her voice hardened as her eyes shifted back and forth between her husband and the vid screen. "How can he possibly love all of those ... women?" She gesticulated at the screen and shifted into her 'I can't believe I'm debasing myself even talking about this debauchery' pose. "And those poor children. What are they going to grow up to believe?"

"The kids seem pretty happy. Well, except for having so many chores." Twelve-year-old Shepard shrugged and hunched down next to her father.

"Everyone has to pull their weight in this galaxy, young lady," her mother muttered, her neck still flushed from their row over the proper way to dry dishes. As far as Shepard was concerned, air drying was a completely legitimate option.

"Let it go, you two. It's done," Jane's father said, his voice soft. Jane turned to look up into her father's warm smile, returning it as she snuggled in tighter against his side. He winked at her. "What do you think, Janey? Could we handle two or three more of your mother?"

Tucked safely into her sanctuary, Janey looked over to meet the maternal glaring eye of doom, laughed, and shook her head. "Nope."

Her father chortled, bright green eyes sparkling as a conspiratorial elbow nudged Janey. "I don't know. She's pretty remarkable. If another woman like that came along ... ."

"You wouldn't dare, Franklin Xavier Shepard!" her mother gasped. "Turn me into some mare in a stable? The Blessed Lord as my witness, I would end you."

"Who are you staring at?" a sleepy mumble asked, pulling her out of her half-doze. She'd missed the almost awake stuttering-purr-snore phase.

"My night guard." She grinned and leaned up on an elbow. "Or I was. Now he's been replaced by my day guard." Sighing, she shook her head. "You two look so much alike, I can't keep you straight."
Nihlus released her and rolled over onto this back, stretching out until his talons scraped the bulkhead. "Mmmm," he said and sighed, relaxing back into the mattress, "true." Looking up at her, eyes glinting mischief, he flashed her a cheeky grin. "Although, the way you snore, anyone trying to sneak up on you would think I was sleeping next to some sort of wild animal and run for their lives."

Her laugh came out harsh and mocking. "I snore? There are people in the Andromeda galaxy who are kept awake all night by your racket." Flopping onto her back, she stretched long, languid, and delicious, pushing her muscles almost to the point of gimbal-lock before slumping.

"We're due to arrive in Armali in three hours," she said, throwing the covers back and swinging her legs out to sit on the side of the bed. "Want to squeeze in a workout before we land?" Glancing back in answer to Nihlus's disgruntled groan, she shook her head. "Didn't you used to be a Spectre? Army of one? All go, no quit? Bad ass? I move faster on my own little human?"

He chuffed. "Then working with you aged me eighty cycles." A wide yawn emphasized his statement. "I plan to squeeze in another hour of sleep, then a long shower." Stretching again, he raked his talons against the metal, the metallic scream sending a shudder up Shepard's spine. "Ahhhh," he said, sighing. "That's better. Where was I? Oh, right, then I intend to eat as much breakfast as I can squeeze into my gullet before heading into the starboard observation lounge. The view of Thessia from orbit is breathtaking."

Letting out a long, noisy sigh of disgust, Shepard reached back, clipping his raised knee with a sharp smack. "You're pathetic."

"Gloriously pathetic," he agreed. "I'm going to rest up just in case the second we make planet-fall, everything falls straight into the pits." He sat up in a sloppy pigeon pose, his hands dangling between his thighs. "The way our luck runs, we'll spend half the day crouching behind cover and the other half running our asses off."

She shoved him back onto the mattress. "Blessed Enkindlers, don't jinx us before we even get started." Pushing off her knees, Shepard stood and headed up to the bathroom. The combination of her mother's strident assertion that only selfish deviants loved two people at once and Nihlus's paranoia tangled in her gut, until it sloshed and gurgled, complaining against the cramps.

The bathroom door closed behind her, blocking out the joyful, badly out-of-tune humming that started on the other side. Sweet baby Jesus, Nihlus couldn't be more tone deaf if he worked at it. Bracing the heels of her hands against the edge of the counter, Shepard breathed, taking long breaths to quiet the ache in her chest. The last few days, living their half life together made him so damned happy, and it was a lie. The worst part … it made her happy, and not because of Tashac, either. Surprisingly, the prothean remained silent in her head, a state that just added to Shepard's unease.

Looking up at herself in the mirror, Shepard sighed. "You just need to get back to Garrus. You'll take a couple of missions with him, and this other infatuation will fade away." Another long sigh hissed from a tight throat. "Yeah, that'll work."

"Captain?" EDI's brisk voice cut through Shepard's mental brambles with a welcome scythe. "The Armali Transit Authority just sent our clearances. The _Ypres_ has been given Alpha Priority, which will subtract an hour off our arrival time."

Shepard turned on the tap. So much for the gym and Nihlus's parade of laziness. "Thank you, EDI."
"And Dr. Eis asked me to remind you of your appointment with her at 0700."

"How could I forget?" Shepard let her head hang from her shoulders. "Thank you, EDI. Is that all?"
She glanced up at the intercom without raising her head.

"Yes, Captain. Do you need anything?"

The AI's tone forced a grin onto Shepard's face despite her mood. EDI truly was impossible not to like. "Could you let Sgt. Gardner know that Nihlus and I will be down for breakfast in twenty? I'd like a fried egg and bacon sandwich, please."

"I'll ask Spectre Kryik what he would like. Anything else, Captain?"

"No, thank you, EDI." Shepard cupped her hands under the water and splashed it over her face. Twenty minutes didn't leave time for self-incrimination and its accompanying personal morality debate.

"Logging you out."

Nihlus was already dressed and shifting foot to foot outside the bathroom door when she emerged. "Were you building another face in there?" he muttered, squeezing past her.

"Yep, and it's identical to the old one. Hope you don't mind that I kept you waiting to do that." She grinned and walked over to sit at her computer. "I ordered our breakfast for twenty minutes from now. Liara got us priority clearance to dock." After opening her messages, she glanced back over her shoulder at the closed door. "Guess she really is the queen of the asari."

She looked up at the clear glass of the display case above her computer as she waited for her messages to load, and after cocking her head one way then the other, shrugged. "Do you think this case means that Cerberus is trying to tell me to get a hobby?"

The door opened. "Do you have time for a hobby?" Nihlus walked up beside her and gestured toward the empty fish tank. "Or fish?" He trotted down the few stairs, heading over to put on his armour, which sat piled in the corner of the L-shaped sofa.

"Fish maybe." Her eyes drooped partially closed as she slowed her words. "I hear they can be very sooooothing." A grin replied to his snort. "I'll ask Kelly to feed them, or get one of those tank VI's that keeps everything at optimal." She opened the first of three messages from Garrus. He, Martin, and Anderson were headed off to batarian space to do some joint mission with C-Sec that he couldn't talk about until it was over. Top secret made her twitchy, especially when she was on the doesn't need to know list, and apparently, so was Nihlus. The message went on to say that Garrus loved her and missed her and hoped her arrival on Thessia went well. The other two read pretty much the same, just a few hours more advanced.

Liara messaged to say that she'd be at the dock to pick them up at 0815 precisely, and she couldn't wait to share what she'd found. Shepard replied to both Garrus and Liara, promising the former that she loved him and she'd reply in more detail when they returned to the Ypres, and acknowledging the latter.

"You ready?" Nihlus climbed the stairs, settling his armour onto his shoulders.

Shepard put her computer to sleep. "Let's get this party started."

Less than an hour later, Shepard stared at the Ypres's doctor, her mouth hanging ever so slightly. "So, my healing has sped up by five percent in three days?" She pulled her head back, cocking it a little. "Can't complain about that."

Dr. Eis nodded and closed her omnitool. "Seven percent as of this morning. Dr. Chakwas and I are collaborating to figure out why, but …" The doctor hesitated, looking uncomfortable. "... I have a theory." She shuffled a little, looking far less confident than Shepard had become used to.

After waiting for a second, Shepard chuckled and shrugged, her hands doing a little enquiring flip at the end. "Well? What is it, Doc?"

Eis sighed and backed toward her desk. "You're going to roll your eyes at me."

"Well, glory hallelujah. I've only rolled my eyes once so far today, and I've been itching for another chance." The captain grinned, trying to ease the doctor's discomfort. "It can't be that bad." She pulled her shoulders up to her ears. "It's not like you're going to tell me that my aura is aligning with the ley lines of galactic power." Her shoulders slumped when the doctor winced. "No, really, you aren't, right?"

"Of course not." Dr. Eis paced to her desk and back. "But, it feels like I am." She let out a long sigh and shrugged as if deciding, what the hell. "Only one thing has changed in the past week. All your tests come back exactly the same except for the accelerated healing."

Shepard braced her hands against the metal edge of the bed and leaned forward. "Okay?"

"You're happy." The doctor winced, but then shrugged as if denying responsibility for the truth. "Since reuniting with General Vakarian and particularly since boarding the Ypres with Spectre Kryik, your mental outlook has brightened considerably."

Swinging her feet a little, Shepard thought about it. It was true that being back aboard a ship, heading up a crew—most of whom had proven enthusiastic about her leadership—felt good. So yes, being back at work and moving forward against the Reapers made her happy.

"Okay, I can see a positive outlook helping speed healing. All those happy chemicals swirling around in the blood." Shrugging, Shepard said, "As long as it's not because my repair nanites have lost their little mechanical minds, I won't complain. I'm ready to stop feeling like I've been stabbed every time I move."

She slipped off the table. "So, how is your research with the chiastyllia going?" The cuff lay out on a padded tray. Walking over, she reached out and touched it, able to feel the aliens' joy through the contact.

"They requested to accompany you to Thessia," the doctor replied, sitting on the edge of her chair. She leaned forward and stroked her fingertips along the length of the cuff, the touch looking uncomfortably like a caress. "They can sense many of their people on the surface, and would like to make contact if possible."

Shepard nodded, watching the doc with narrowed eyes. The little buggers could throw out a hell of an emotional whammy. It might be a good idea to remove the chiastyllia from the doctor's presence for a day or so. "Sure, I'll take them up and they can snap over my armour." Shepard picked up the tray, took a deep breath and squared her shoulders. "Once more unto the breach, dear friends."

The medbay door opened, the space filled by armoured turian. "You're not quoting Henry the Fifth again, are you?"

Shepard made a face. "Shakespeare can never be quoted too often. Besides, I have to. Apparently, I've come down with a bad case of happy." The words came out tasting like parsnips … no … more bitter than putrid … brussel sprouts. "I need to cure it. Quick." She grinned and jerked her head toward the door. "Come on, let's go find some disaster."

The Spectre stepped off to the side. "Now who's jinxing us?" He fell in behind her, walking just behind her left arm.

Shepard just flashed a grin over her shoulder, the narrow space between them soothing and comfortable, with just the slightest hint of electric tingle. "No comment. Besides, first to jinx takes the blame when it comes time to start throwing it around. It's tradition." At the elevator, Shepard palmed the control. "I'll meet you at the airlock in twenty?"

Nihlus shook his head. "I'll come with you. I know the seals on the back of your armour give you trouble with the wounds." He followed her in the carriage and stood, staring down at her with his arms crossed, apparently trying to make himself look immovable.

"I've got Vincent," she muttered, but without any heat. She didn't feel like fighting a battle she'd never win, and of course, she never would have asked Vincent anyway.

Fifteen minutes later, they walked into decon to find the rest of their ground team waiting for them. Thane stood apart from the rest, his back to the corner as if expecting attack, the rest of them almost looking like a unit, standing along the other side, not talking but keeping an eye on the new guy.

Shepard chuckled. Nothing brought people together like a good case of 'who the hell is he?'. "Come on, people, let's go see what Thessia has in store for us."

Liara stood at the end of the docking arm, Shiala and Aethyta posing on either side, a tremendously unsubtle commando detachment ranged behind them, looking as menacing as asari could manage.

The second that Shepard stepped clear of the Ypres's hatch, the entire planet closed in around her. Even the gleaming blue-violet sky and puffy clouds pressed down, a giant, oppressive hand crushing the back of her neck.

"It's going to be one of those days," Nihlus grumbled, his armour a solid bulwark against the back of Shepard's arm.

She nodded, her stomach dropping into her boots. "So much for subtlety. Nothing says slipping beneath the radar like a platoon of commandos in full leathers and a motorcade that looks like Don Corleone just arrived." Blowing a noisy breath out her nose, she shrugged. "At least the commandos don't all have their guns drawn."

"Don Corleone?"

She glanced up, meeting his narrowed, emerald scrutiny. Too much … that stare asked too much, and she turned away, throwing up heavy barriers. Damn it, one of them needed to keep some distance, and apparently he was leaving it to her. "I'll educate you on the way home, Fredo."

Nihlus sighed. "Not a single word that comes out of your mouth. Not one."

Flipping a hand toward the commandos, she said, "So when do they betray Liara and try to take us out?" Oh good, gallows humour. Always a strong option.

The Spectre shoved her shoulder hard enough to stagger her, but she didn't smile as he grumbled,
"At the rate you're jinxing us, I'm refusing to take the blame when they shoot our cars out of the sky."

Liara hurried forward, a bright, fresh breeze to push back the storm as she wrapped Shepard in a tight, rushed hug. "Sorry for all the cloak and dagger," she said as she pulled away and nodded to Nihlus, "but I knew you'd want to move on this right away, so I rushed back."

Holding herself rigid despite returning the young asari's embrace, Shepard nodded toward the guard contingent. "What's with the commandos? Are we expecting an invasion?"

Liara flushed a brilliant violet across her nose and cheeks. "My aunt and the captain of my security insisted since we're going out into the Thessian Wastes," she replied as if it explained everything. "I have a lot to tell you on the way." She turned, leading the group toward the cars, the commandos forming a ring around the entire group. "Your team can ride in the second car. Aethyta is driving it. They'll be subjected to a little vulgarity, but nothing truly disturbing or life threatening." The maiden chuckled as the matriarch tweaked her on the way past.

Although pleased to see the warmth between Liara and her father, it didn't comfort or spread through Shepard as it should have. Something felt out of place, the air heavy, a storm looming on the horizon. She rolled her shoulders and cracked her neck, trying to shake the tension pulling her tighter with every second.

Glancing over at Nihlus, she saw him scanning the parking area, mandibles twitching, gaze in constant motion. Finding no comfort in his instincts backing hers up, she kept her senses on alert, reaching out. She'd never been to Thessia before, so she could be reacting to different air pressure, the presence of so much eezo within the planet itself … any number of things.

However, none of that explained Nihlus's reaction. He had been to Thessia before.

"Shepard?" Miranda called, her tone one of supportive inquiry, no doubt seeing Shepard's unease. The operative stepped up behind the captain, her palm resting against her sidearm. Thane moved up as well, earning a raised eyebrow from the Cerberus operative.

"It's fine, Miranda," the captain replied, despite feeling that the situation was anything but fine. Nothing presented itself to any of her senses, and her inner alarm remained silent despite feeling like a ladar installation scanning for the enemy. "Go ahead in the other car. We're all going to end up in the same place."

Yeah, in flames at the bottom of a canyon in the wastes.

Liara led them to a line of expensive air cars, all gleaming black, reflecting the sky like mirrors. Yep, the Don was in town for a family meeting … or she'd been elected President of the Galaxy and no one told her. "Sweet baby Jesus," Shepard grumbled under her breath. She needed to teach Liara a few things about not drawing attention.

Opening the second car, Liara stepped aside, waiting for Shiala to climb into the back seat. Shepard and Nihlus circled around to the other side. Once all four of them were settled and buckled in, Liara waited until the first car in line took off, then followed it out of the lot.

"Okay," Shepard said, once they were sailing along in traffic, "you've sequestered us for a reason, so out with it. Where are we going, and what are we doing?"

The asari scientist stared out the windscreen, for a moment before she glanced over at Shepard and let out a long sigh. "I've dedicated my life to a narrow, fascinating field of study, not realizing until very recently how blind I made myself. By focusing in on the Prothean extinction, I missed so much that could have enhanced my studies." A soft, sad laugh tumbled from her lips, her eyes never leaving Shepard. "My mother tried to tell me many times that I was limiting myself, and hindering my work, but I refused to listen."

"We all have to rebel at some point and in our own way," Shepard replied, then threw herself back, climbing backwards up the seat, a muffled scream and a flailing hand directing Liara back to the oncoming traffic, now actually oncoming. "Traffic! Cars! Death!"

She shot a death-ray glare behind her as Nihlus chuckled, low and merry. He shrugged. "That was very eloquent."

Liara just shrugged and swerved around a public transit vehicle then back into her lane, the speedometer registering slightly lower than ludicrous speed. "While I was a student of a narrow field of study, my mother called herself a student of sapience." A soft, sad smile followed. "I thought her obsession with the mechanics of sapient nature to be high-minded nonsense." The expression evaporated. "Then I inherited her estate. Her most important files were encrypted using a key that I could barely scratch the surface of, at least, until I started working with the Brysons."

Shepard bolted her eyes on the view of Armali streaking past her side window, trying to avoid looking ahead as Liara talked. If death came for her again, she prefered to be surprised. Still, she listened to the archaeologist's words and managed to squeeze out the odd half-squeal, half-humming noise as encouragement.

Horns blared and a siren started wailing somewhere far too close. Shepard closed her eyes and waited for the inevitable. When the cacophony passed without Shepard being slammed, bent, spindled, or crushed, she opened one eye and looked over at Liara. The asari stared at her, brow furrowed in consternation. Damn, Shepard had missed something.

"What?" she grumbled, shrugging. "I was expecting to die. Just keep going. So, Ann Bryson helped you figure out the encryption like you said in the message you sent me?"

Liara sighed and shook her head, looking poised on the cusp of telling Shepard off, but then just nodded. "One day, while I was working on the files at their lab on the Citadel, Ann looked over my shoulder and whistled, saying that my mother must have been a fan of obscure asari mythology and religion." The asari shrugged. "The encryption key is actually based on an ancient asari religious order that is contemporary with the beginnings of our worship of the goddess Athame. They were called the Order of the Shrouded."

A deep frown wrinkled Shepard's brow. "I've never heard of them." She glanced back at Nihlus, but he shook his head, doing his best to keep his laughter under control. Scrunching up her face in a narrow-eyed scowl, she did her best to glare a hole through his armour.

"Not surprising," Liara replied. "Only a handful of asari know who they were, because ten thousand years after the prothean extinction, the priestesses of Athame led a party of huntresses into the valley where the People of the Shrouded lived. They slaughtered the villagers to a one, claiming their doctrine heretical." She turned to look at Shepard, her brow lifted, eyes wide as if waiting to see how long it took Shepard to put it together. "They claimed that their Shrouded were not of this world."

"The Order of the Shrouded were based on Tashac and Merol?" the captain asked, putting the pieces together. Excitement flooded her veins … well, at least it seemed more like excitement than sheer panic. A real connection to the two protheans, even without any information … it was worth getting excited. "Makes sense, they wore hoods over their faces whenever they interacted with the ancient asari."

"Although, sometimes one of the villagers would catch a glimpse of them under those hoods," Liara chuckled, her eyes sparkling as they focused on Shepard rather than the traffic. "They believed Tasac and Merol to be messengers of the gods." The car began to drift a little to the right, then a lot to the right.

"Eyes on your driving, sweet Jesus!" Shepard bleated, then closed her eyes and sent out a random prayer to every god and power and religious figure she could think of. Another horn blasted and the car swerved back into its proper lane. Swallowing hard, the captain managed to croak out. "So your mother put this together somehow?" Shepard shook her head, her voice rising as she spoke, the eagerness bleeding through to overcome the terror for the second. "I mean, how? Is there information on them somewhere that managed to survive?"

Liara chuckled and shook her head. "I don't know what information she has yet, we just began to scrape the surface of her encryption, but I did bring you here for a reason. Thousands of years later, after a religious reformation, the priestesses of Athame acknowledged what their predecessors had done to the Order." She looked around, head whipping from side to side, then pulled the car into a sharp swerve to enter another lane of traffic, that one heading out of the city center. "They built a shrine dedicated to the Shrouded on the spot where their village had stood.

"Program the car, Liara," Shepard wheezed, slumping down in her seat. "For the love of God, program the car. I'm going to throw up or have a heart attack."

The asari let out a derisive mutter and blasted the horn before sending the car into a sharp climb. "I can't program the car to our destination. It's inside a no-fly zone. Besides, I've never been in an accident."

"What about the cars around you? They ever seem to just smash into each other?" Shepard ducked down into her seat until the restraint dug in under her jaw. Maybe, just maybe, shrinking into the bulk of the car's body would save her. She covered her eyes, not missing Nihlus's cackle-laced remarks from the backseat about dramatics.

"Now you know what we went through in the Mako," he whispered.

"Anyway," Liara continued, cutting the air with the word, "the shrine was eventually turned into a protected landmark, and then a cultural center."

Shepard shoved herself back up. "You mean, there's something there? They know where Tashac and Merol lived?" Excitement … yes, definitely excitement roared through Shepard's veins; their destination suddenly well worth the almost certain death required to get there.

Liara grinned. "Nearly twelve centuries ago, a group of archeologists uncovered evidence of a dwelling a couple of kilometres up the mountain from the cultural center. Hidden within the site, they found caches of technology far in advance of anything the asari of that time were using. It was cited as an elaborate hoax for a long time, but eventually, Serrice University excavated and confirmed the site as a prothean dwelling."

Shiala let out a bitter laugh, the first sound she'd made, drawing Shepard's attention to the fact that she hadn't even greeted the other asari. "According to a few very biting notes from Matriarch Benezia, the asari owe several sudden technological advancements to finding that home."

Liara nodded. "Mother did not support the asari covering up the find."
Nihlus spoke up, a petulant grumble. "Hiding prothean tech would explain why the asari have maintained a position of dominance in the galaxy." He chuffed. "You've got to love the hypocrisy. Asari, upstanding peacemakers and lawfully just guardians of all that's good. Unless you look beneath the surface, of course."

Shepard let the debate about the asari keeping prothean tech to themselves wash past her. She cared more about the fact that Benezia had pieced so much together. Where did she get her information? Another beacon? Why had she teamed up with Saren? Sure, the whole guide him onto a better path, save the galaxy thing, but … this new information, the sheer amount of intel that Benezia possessed, hinted at another, deeper reason. Maybe she'd hoped to gain further intel, to discover what lay behind the Reapers?

A decided lack of swerving and horns drew Shepard's gaze out the window to note the sudden lack of tens of thousands of other cars in the sky. "Hold on, where did everyone go?" she asked, turning to look through the back window. "Did your driving scare them off?" In the distance, solid lines of traffic flowed, not one vehicle leaving to follow their path. Lifting up as far as the restraint allowed, Shepard peered down at the ground below. It looked like pleasantly rolling grasslands, but she didn't see any farms or other signs of habitation.

"Welcome to the Thessian Wastelands," Shiala called from over Shepard's left shoulder. "It's a no fly zone unless you have a permit, and almost no one ever seeks a permit." She grinned and nodded when Shepard turned to frown at her. "Since we started keeping records on such things, so about five thousand cycles, nearly a million people have disappeared in this hundred thousand square kilometre area. No trace of them or their vehicles are ever found."

Liara shrugged it off as if it didn't bother her in the least to be flying into the Thessian Bermuda Triangle. Still, her voice wavered ever so slightly as she said, "The mountain where they found Tashac and Merol's home lies at the very center."

"That's not a coincidence," Nihlus said, a deep undercurrent moving through his subvocals that Shepard recognized as worry. The hair on the back of her neck prickled like icy thorns as it stood on end inside her collar. That rumble said trap.

The next second, the alarm at the base of her skull agreed with it. The cuff around her wrist began to vibrate and her omnitool sparked to life.

People called? Indoctrination? Shepard turned slightly when she felt Nihlus's breath on her neck.

"This is the crying snow? The crystallized carbon lifeforms?" he asked, peering at the cuff. "I thought I was losing my mind or hallucinating." He reached out and touched it. "It's really warm."

"They want us to find their people first. They say that their people know what has been happening to the missing people." She turned in her seat a little, meeting his eyes. "Tashac has been completely silent in my head since I got Liara's message. How about Merol?"

He shrugged. "What little I get from Tashac has also disappeared, but Merol … ." Shaking his head, he shifted in his seat. "I think the warning just now was from him … his memory of that place, but he's not talking. It's just emotion." His mandibles dropped and swept wide, distressed. "It feels like shame, Shepard."

She nodded. "He's never really spoken to me, but I definitely got a warning vibe just now." Holding his stare for long seconds, she weighed their options, then looked down at the cuff. "Do you know "Where your people are?"

"Mountain."

A sharp sigh cut between Shepard's lips. She needed to find more of the chia just so that they could develop their speaking skills. "Handy but inspecific. Can you locate them?"

"Closer. We call," the chia replied.

Shepard snorted a laugh as the shortened name appeared in her head. A second later an image of a clay animal covered in sprouts popped up on the cuff.

"What is Chia Pet?" they asked.

"Chee-ah pet versus Kiah," she explained, swallowing the laughter. "Don't worry about it." She pointedly ignored Nihlus's exasperated glare burning a hole in the side of her head and focused on the cuff. "So, you can direct us to where your people are when we get closer?"

"Yes."

Shepard looked up at Liara. "Do you need to alert your army to our intended course changes so they don't shoot us down?"

Liara rolled her eyes. "They wouldn't shoot us down. They work for me; I'm not their prisoner." She hesitated for a moment before moving to her radio. When Shepard laughed the asari flushed violet again. "I still have to let them know what's going on."

Shepard shook her head and settled back in her seat. "You rolled your eyes at me. I can't believe it. Whatever happened to that sweet, innocent … ?"

Liara let out a disgusted snort, flushing even darker as Shepard reached over and squeezed her shoulder.

"Don't get me wrong, T'Soni … I like it." She chortled and looked back at the cuff, but it had gone silent. She listened to Liara discussing the complications of changing their course in a permit zone, her grin widening as Liara told her captain to just take care of it. The asari had grown a spine over the two years. It suited her.

"Shepard?" Nihlus called over the seat, his long arm appearing next to her head, pointing straight ahead. "What is that?"

"Oh fuck," Shepard groaned, her eyes following the gesture to the mountain, still fairly distant. White and massive, the sun glimmering off its reflective surface, a funnel cloud rose from the mountain peak, swirling into a monstrous cyclone. It lifted upward until it stretched nearly half the height of the mountain. When it stopped growing, it began to roll, a thunder head or an avalanche roaring down the mountain, flattening trees and laying waste to everything in its path.

"They can sense many of their people on the surface? No shit!" Shepard muttered, remembering the pain of the Chia storm shredding her on Freedom's Progress. "Sweet baby Jesus, that was a handful compared this. If it doesn't stop, it's going to destroy the cars … and it's coming this way." Looking down at the cuff, she asked, "Is this your people?"

A blythe, innocent joy flowed through her. "We called! They come!"

"Tell them to slow down! They don't need to beat us to death to talk to us," Shepard cried, her words raking through a clenched jaw. "Liara! Raise the blast shields, and get this car on the ground, now! We need to protect the cars!" Turning to look at Nihlus, she growled. "This is all your fault!"

(A-N: Once more unto the breach, dear friends. Once more unto the breach! Hugs and love to all of you. You keep me going, and that is all I have to say about that. ) )

Chapter End Notes

I need to speak to the nature of the conflict going on with Shepard, even though it is a bit of a spoiler ... although pretty sure people see the writing on the wall. :D Plainly, she is a woman raised with certain values who finds herself in a situation at odds with those values. She loves two torins. I do not intend to challenge the general validity of those values, because quite frankly, it's not my place to tell anyone how to love other people. Except to say, with all your heart. I am one writer with one situation and a set of characters who want to explore their possibilities. Some of the other characters will support their choices, some will not. Some might eventually change their minds, some won't. They are people. People have differing opinions, I hear.

I do hope this exploration won't cause readers to leave, but at the same time, I'm a realist and understand that not everyone will be comfortable with where these characters go. However, that said, this exploration isn't about kink. It really isn't, and both Garrus and Nihlus make a face when it is suggested and say ... but he's my brother. What? Nope. It is not going to the threesome sex place, so I know that too will disappoint people. Anyway, I hope I do a good job of honouring the honesty of her relationships, romantic and otherwise, with both Garrus and Nihlus ... and do so in a realistic way. Please do let me know if I fail. :D hugs

And if you want to discuss it, please feel free to leave a comment. I'd love to hear from you.
"Shepard," Nihlus said, the deep rumble she knew meant danger rolled under the words, sending the sharp skitter of giant beetles up her spine.

Plucking Ingrid from her back, she spun to face the darkness even as she lifted the rifle to her shoulder and looked down the sight. "Great fuck, the entire tunnel looks like it's moving." The beetles sank their needle-like feet into her skin, burrowing for the meat. For a moment, she jerked the scope here and there, following every perceived movement, but then slammed a lid on the fear. She'd been through a hell of a lot worse than being trapped somewhere and outnumbered.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Targismar (short form: Targis) - The most vile curse in the turian language. Has its origins in turian prehistoric rituals involving the disgracing and execution of enemies.

35 Days ASR

Shepard grasped Liara behind the neck and shoved her head down below the dash. "Brace yourselves!" The way the chia had taken down trees, she held no doubt that they could toss the cars like leaves, even with the vehicles parked solidly on the ground. She cursed as she ducked down and covered her head with her arm.

There was no way to protect the cars, she just needed to pray that everyone was buckled in and the flurry of diamond-hard hail she'd felt pelting her skin didn't rip the vehicles to shreds. Their shields wouldn't be enough, and all she could do was wait it out. She closed her eyes, her memory latching onto an image of Garrus giving her one of his 'don't worry, I've got you' smiles, his arms strong and so very warm around her.

The storm hit, but instead of ripping the car from the ground and tossing it, the vehicle merely rocked a little. Outside, a sound akin to a hard rainfall rang against their metal and polymer skin for less than a minute before stopping. Shepard lifted her head a little, a soft hum rolling around in her throat. A scowl creased her brow. Being hit by millions—if not more—of the little beings came off with less of an impact than the flurry on Freedom's Progress? Tentative, prepared to dive back into cover, she sat up.

"Liara, open the blast shields, please?" Shepard's voice sounded tiny and distant to her ears, a mouse squeak against the roaring silence.

"Do you think it's over?" Shiala asked, her voice crawling up from between the seats. "Maybe that was just a first few … scouts or something." Wide eyes stared up from the dim space behind the driver's seat.

Shepard turned a little further, meeting Nihlus's stare right behind her shoulder. He looked as though he'd been prepared to throw himself over her. Damned overprotective turians. "I think that was it," she said, directing her words to Shiala even though she held Nihlus with a pitchfork and barbed wire laden stare. 'Keep your distance,' it demanded.

Liara finally seemed to process the request to lower the shields over the windows and reached up to press the control. She pulled her head back and scowled. "Are we buried in a chiastasyllia avalanche?"

Shepard looked out the side window, unable to see more than an artist-palette blur of colour. "I think we are. I can't even distinguish the ground from the sky." The moment the words appeared in her head … even before they rattled loose of her lips, a shimmer passed through the chia outside her window: an alignment? Whatever it was, the view clarified. Not just a little better either, the tiny beings aligned themselves to provide a scalpel-sharp view of the deep, blue-green grass, the weeds in a myriad of hues … the mountains in all their violet-silver majesty, crowned in white.

"What the … ?" She looked down at the cuff. "What happened?" she demanded. "Why are your people encasing the car?"

"Will demanded protection," they replied. "They protected."

A frown sharpened the angles of Shepard's face. "Will demanded?" Reflex and confusion formed a denial, but before she shoved it up through her larynx, her brain interfered. She'd wished for a way to protect the cars from the chia. "Sweet baby Jesus," she grumbled and then sighed. "Well, that's one solution."

The mutter provoked a hearty chuff from the back seat. "And how do we escape our protection?" Nihlus demanded.

"We need to get back on course before gunships are sent to ensure we do," Liara said. The tightness in her voice wrapped the alarm at the base of Shepard's skull in thorns. Sharp and tenacious, they demanded action and quickly. For the first time since they'd landed, Liara looked over at Shepard, fear glistening, blue waterglass, in her eyes. "Who knows what they'll do if they arrive out here to find us like this?"

Shepard held the young asari's stare for a few seconds, trying to ease Liara's fear through the contact. "We've been in tougher spots, T'Soni. We'll be okay. We just need to work the problem." When she coaxed a nod from the pretty blue head, she looked down at the chia wrapped around her arm. "Okay, let's think this through. Your people came because you called and then formed a shell around the cars to protect them? Even though they were the perceived threat?"

"Will shouted 'protect, must protect'," the cuff replied, glowing orange letters appearing in the crystal. "We protected."

"Why is my will the one you listen to?" Shepard asked. "I don't want the chia to be my slaves." The thought curdled between her synapses and deep in her guts, and for a moment she thought her stomach on the verge of introducing the floor to her fried egg and bacon sandwich.

"Not your will," the cuff declared, sending out a wave of emotion with a taste and tremor that she knew all too well.

Nihlus's overprotectiveness brought the chia down on them, causing their encasement. At least it was good to know that they didn't just mindlessly obey her every order. The rest of figuring out the chia's issue with their easily subverted will could wait until the whole party wasn't on the cusp of being bombed as an alien threat.
"We need to move the cars," she said. "We need to get to the mountain." She sighed as the cuff remained silent, the sigh belying the slow turn of dread working its way through her. "Right. I want your people to release the cars."

"Must wait." A number showed on her wrist. Eighteen … seventeen.

"What does this mean?" Shepard demanded, fear pricking her spine hot nettles. Nihlus loomed over her shoulder again, no doubt alerting to the sudden sliver of alarm in her voice. Why had she done as they wanted and brought them along? She didn't know or understand the chia well enough to have done so. Damn her impulse. Who else would follow up being attacked and basically taken hostage by a completely alien lifeform by bringing them aboard her ship and then just letting them do whatever they wanted?

An image of Amalair nested in the corner of the Normandy's cargo bay flashed through her mind followed by one of Legion fixing his armour next to Kaidan's station.

Yeah, you have a history of glaringly naive stupidity, Janey. Luckily, it's all worked out before now.

"A countdown?" the Spectre asked. He cocked his head. "To what? What are you doing?"

The cuff didn't respond, the countdown passing ten, then five. Shepard's mind raced. What could it possibly mean? And why wasn't it responding to her? It had never just ignored her before. Never, in all of the three times she'd spoken to them. Damn, she really was an idiot. Why had she imagined that their trip to Thessia wouldn't involve almost certain odds of death? Nothing they'd ever done had been easy. Hell, a shopping trip on the presidium had nearly ripped her brain out of her skull.

"We really need to … ," Liara said, cutting through Shepard's bewildered internal diatribe.

Then Shiala cut through Liara. "Um." The asari's voice wavered between alarm and wonder. "Where are we?"

Shepard looked up, the countdown running out. Her brow creased, her heart knocking against the inside of her ribs. Even before she looked out the side window, she could see that they'd moved, and no small distance. A solid wall of violet-steel rose up before them, filling the forward view. Looking out the side confirmed that in those twenty five seconds or so, they'd completed the journey to the mountains.

"Where are we?" she asked the chia.

"Mountain."

Shepard grumbled. "We need to get enough of you in one place to ease the communication barrier." Glancing down, she asked, "Are we going to be able to get out now?"

Her answer came in the form of a flurry of movement, then the sudden clearing of the windscreen. The car in front of them appeared through the haze, completely cleared. The top opened, five very stunned-looking commandos rushing out, guns drawn. Shepard didn't need to look behind her to know that the entire platoon had followed their lead. She let out a long, weary sigh.

"Note for your next briefing when bringing the commandos on an op with me," Shepard said, annoyance lashing out before she could get it under control, "don't leave out the part with the 'freaky shit always happens around Shepard' warning." She shot a glare over her shoulder at Liara, even though it wasn't really the asari she was pissed off at.

The entire mission felt completely out of control, and had since she stepped off the Ypres. Nothing made her crazier than feeling as if she'd been caught up in a tornado, events flinging her ahead of them, then dragging her behind. She hit the door control and swung out, her body tight, every movement locked down and controlled.

The second she straightened and stepped away from the car, a small flurry of the chia attacked, much less violently than before, swirling around her arm. The cuff expanded, intricately designed cogs appeared, meshing into one another … some no larger than a speck of dust, some a centimetre or so across. It built up her forearm, a lattice of chia creating who knew what. Her annoyance bled away, transforming into wonder. She felt Nihlus step up beside her.

"Wha … ?" he whispered, his voice seeming to ask if she wanted him to smash it off her arm despite the obvious wonder. Must have been the layer of subvocals that preceded and followed the partial word.

The construction ended, the flurry of sparkling lifeforms vanishing in favour of a holographic interface and screen. "Enhanced communication interface and intelligence upgrades completed," a feminine voice said. "We apologize for moving the vehicles without alerting you prior," it continued. "We sensed military vehicles closing on our previous location. Spectre Kryik's previous command to protect you and thus removing you from the threat, seemed to take precedence over providing an explanation."

Shepard looked at Nihlus, a wry grin greeting the embarrassed flutter of his mandibles. "Well, thank you." Turning away from the Spectre, Shepard's eyes travelled down the line of cars, her squad moving toward her, their attention divided between the commandos and the wall of chia that climbed the cliff face. Beyond the cars, the long shoulder of the mountain swept down toward the shadowed valley. Long, dark blue-green grass flashed silver as it blew in waves. Small flowers of a cyan so brilliant it appeared to glow crowned the center of each plant.

"Blessed Enkindlers," she whispered, her chest and throat aching as awe seized hold, "it's breathtaking here. No wonder they chose this spot for their retirement." Taking a deep breath that teased her nostrils with the spicy-honey-and-pepper scent of the grass and the whisper of ice carried along the back of the spring wind, Shepard let out a long sigh. Maybe she could get permission to take a vacation there. She could call it Spectre business … investigating the disappearances.

Enraptured, Shepard wandered down the slope, the entire place feeling eerily familiar. A couple hundred metres below her, a herd of small, wooly-looking animals grazed across the grounds of a house that she knew all too well. A soft keen of sorrow and longing shivered through her mind. Shepard nodded in mute understanding. "Nihlus … how did they know to rebuild it exactly … ?"

The question evaporated as the Spectre stepped up behind her arm, and Tashac let out another thin wail of pain.

"What did you do here that hurts so badly?" Shepard whispered to the silent presence in her head, not expecting or getting an answer. Something told her not to rush too quickly for answers, because their reveal—coming up hard and fast—would change everything. So, she took a long breath and looked back toward the mountain, her lips pulling into a wry smile as she saw the cascade of chia flowing down the cliff, looking like a frozen waterfall despite the heat of the season precluding its existence. The chia needed to learn a thing or two about subtlety as well. As the thought formed, the chia began to move: one moment ice, the next water that flowed but didn't pool. She just shook her head.

Nihlus turned along with her. She saw his mandibles give a bewildered flutter as he asked, "Do you ever think that we all died at some point along the way, and this is some bizarre afterlife?"
Shepard snorted in the back of her throat, and turned her attention to the crystallized gauntlet that now covered her arm from wrist to elbow. "Do the chia retain the ability to reform even after they've become something … like this gauntlet?" she asked, lifting it, wonder tinting her examination of its inner workings. "This is amazing. Completely mechanical."

"We retain some malleability for a time, but once we set to our purpose, our form locks. The form can be added to, and if parts are destroyed, it can be repaired, but the form cannot be reduced. Will assigns, but function maintains our form. Form is purpose."

Turning her back on the house below, Shepard walked toward the cliff. "How long have your people been hiding here?"

"The snows have come millions of times. Multitudes of our kind were destroyed as slaves of the suzerain. The rest fled our homeworld. Most formed the Cynosure. Others hid on distant planets, such as this one. We keep watch for the return of the suzerain or their servants."

Shepard wandered closer to the cliff as she listened to that voice, the midmorning sun warming her back. "What is the Cynosure? Are you in contact with it? Do your people share awareness?"

"The Cynosure is the center, the great intelligence of the chiastyllia. It contains decillions of chiastyllia, all hiding. So ancient, so clever that it shrouds itself, hiding in plain sight, yet so powerful that the suzerain dare not approach or be destroyed." The voice paused. "Yes, all chiastyllia can share thoughts, sensory stimuli, and pain across any distance. The only chia who are lost to the whole are those corrupted by the darkness. Many have been over the millennia. So many lost, their voices silenced."

Shepard stopped, catching sight of what appeared to be a road curving around the mountain slope. Touching Nihlus's hand to alert him, she set out, jogging to where it curled around the great shoulder of rock, leading down to the house below.

A thrill of excitement, electric and smelling of ozone, seared through her. They'd found it. She recognized the view from the opposite angle, having seen Tashac standing on the porch below, looking up at that very spot. Shepard spun back toward the mountainside, eyes narrowed and searching the rock for any sign of entry.

When she reached the wall of rock, she turned to her people. "Search the cliff face. Look for any sort of entry mechanism or lock … anything that makes you think there might be a door." She looked back to the rock. "However, no pressing what you find. Call me. We have good reason to believe whatever lies inside the mountain is dangerous."

The commandos remained facing outward, watching for incoming threats as the team did as Shepard asked while giving the chia a wide berth. Liara and Shiala joined in while Aethyta stayed with the commandos, the matriarch appearing very much in command.

"Here," Nihlus called, his voice pitched low. "I've found it." He leaned in, talons scraping away at thousands of years of built up dust and muck. After a second, he activated his omnitool, fabricating a heated chisel.

Hope, excitement, dread, and fear all waged war, their battle twisting the knots in Shepard's gut tighter and tighter as she watched both the future and the past chipped from under the stone. The edges of her vision darkened, the spiders skittering like tar trickling through the grooves and fissures in her mind. Closing her eyes, she concentrated on driving them back … at least until she felt the faint pressure of something pressing against the injection port in her armour.
Cracking one eyelid as the icy, sour relief of Dr. Chakwas's indoctrination serum flowed through her veins, Shepard looked up at Nihlus. "Do you feel it?" she asked.

He nodded, the effects clear in the haunted shadows flickering through the green stare and the tight, distressed set to his mandibles. "They're here, somewhere." After giving himself a shot, he turned back to his work. "I almost bolted last time, Shepard. They went straight for Tashac. She panicked."

"Do you have enough mojo juice?" Shepard asked, not missing that his talons moved to one of his belt pouches even as he nodded. Tucking that information away just in case, she forced herself to take long, even breaths, driving back the darkness. She needed to keep herself under control. Nihlus would need her if Tashac could throw him like that.

She swallowed what felt like a mouthful of chalk. "They don't feel like they're trying to take over like they've done before." Choking on a dusty laugh, she popped her shoulders in an embarrassed shrug. "It feels like they're afraid of what's inside." Stepping up beside Nihlus as he paused in his work, she laid a hand over his. "Whatever the hell is in here that has them all terrified … we'll face it. Right?" Pressing her lips into a thin smile, she nodded in answer to her own question despite the rapid thudding of her heart, the adrenaline that hummed through her bloodstream.

Nihlus's mandibles fluttered a little as he glanced back over his arm. "We've faced down Reapers. We can handle this." He rubbed the heel of his hand against the door interface, scraping away the residual film. "There's still power to this door."

Shepard shook her head. "Protheans built things to last." A terrible, and unfortunately likely, alternative whispered in the back of her head. "Or, this place has caretakers."

Taking a deep breath, she forced her attention to focus on one thing … what waited on the other side of that door. Whatever it was, letting superstition take hold wouldn't help her face it. Nihlus's failed attempts to override the lock shattered what fragile calm she managed to achieve. "What's going on?" she asked, the fear mutating into frustration and impatience.

He stepped back after another couple of seconds. "I can't bypass it or hack it." Holding out his hands as if to usher her in, he said, "I think Tashac has to do it. She locked it against Merol, and you know how their tech is."

Shepard just nodded and stepped around him to look at the interface. As she reached up to touch it, pain raked down her spine, spiking out when it hit her shoulders, someone stabbing a skeletal branch beneath her skin. Shoving it down the length of her body, they drove it into the ground through the soles of her feet, pinning her there.

"You cannot take the dark ones inside!" The wail slammed through her mind, smashing against the inside of Shepard's skull.

Shepard braced a hand against the wall of stone as a comet tore through her, the ice flaring into explosions … geyser of steam as it neared the sun. "I have to know how to fight them," she said, growling the words too low for it to carry past Nihlus.

A flurry of images, not unlike the beacon message burst through the fog of panic boiling inside her skull. Weapons, those images said, not understanding. Forcing them aside, fortifying the wall holding Tashac at bay, Shepard set back to working on getting the door open. No matter what the prothean commander's panic insisted, the protheans had possessed weapons far more numerous and powerful wielded by a greater number of more advanced races, and they'd all proven utterly useless. With far less advanced science, smaller numbers … understanding was Shepard's only
A sharp vibration resonated through the ground under Shepard's feet and the wall at her fingertips. She paused to ensure that Tashac remained walled up, closing her eyes to reinforce the seals before she allowed herself to wonder if she'd managed to open the door. Damn, she could use the prothean's help, but Tashac couldn't be allowed to distract Shepard the entire way through. As much sympathy as she felt for the commander, Tashac's screaming and grief would prove fatal.

"Ah, Shepard?"

She spun around, the quiet, 'I don't want to worry you' alarm in Nihlus's voice grabbing her by the scruff of the neck. Where'd he go?

"Nihlus? Where are you?" she asked, walking toward the cliff where he'd been standing.

"Shepard, those gunships are just pulling up," Liara called, the agitation in her voice completely undisguised.

"Handle it, Liara," Shepard snapped, glancing back over her shoulder. "You're the voice of authority on Thessia, not me. I'm a dead Spectre, and I've lost our live one." She took another step, losing her balance a little as she swung back around. She reached out to steady herself against the cliff, but instead of her fingertips pressing against violet-silver rock, they passed straight through.

Nihlus grabbed her as she stumbled into what had to be a hologram. "Well, you found me, but now you're in here with me," he grumbled, pushing her upright. "Since I can't seem to get back out, that's somewhat inconvenient."

Shepard staggered a little. Once balanced on both feet again, she turned a full circle. In front of her stretched a wide, dark tunnel leading down and into the mountain. Behind her, there appeared to be nothing … an opening to the plateau as tall and wide as the tunnel, but when she tried to walk through it, she ran into an invisible barrier.

"Damn it. We can get in, but not out?" A thin cry echoed through the thick layers of cement holding Tashac at bay, sending Shepard's heart racing jackrabbit-quick against her ribs. Shepard sidestepped until she could see Liara approaching a gunship. Two others hovered in the air behind and above it. "No one's noticed we're missing," she grumbled. "I wonder if they can get in, or if we just got through thanks to the beacon?"

Lifting her hand to her radio, she opened a channel to Miranda. "Operative Lawson, Nihlus and I appear to have a problem," she said.

"Shepard?" Miranda looked around, suddenly and quite comically alarmed. She spun in place, then ran to look down the slope. "Where are you?"

_The best and worst game of hide and seek ever._

"Inside the mountain. Nihlus and I appear to be trapped in here. I need you to see if you can get to us." She stepped right up to the barrier and pressed a hand against it, as if that could help. "Walk toward the cliff," she instructed. Behind her, something moved in the darkness, and for the barest of moments she managed to tell herself the sound lived in her head. Then Nihlus pulled his shotgun and turned to face it.

"Just keep talking her over," he said, the words lashing her ever so slightly, as if transferring his default blame over to her. "I've got your back."
Shepard snorted softly and looked back. Miranda stood face to face with the cliff, walking her hands over the rock. "A metre or so to your right." She pressed her face against the barrier—the surface of it cold and either resonating too high or too low for her to feel a vibration from it—to better see the Cerberus operative. "Yeah, a little more."

Miranda's hands brushed across the surface to press directly in front of Shepard's face, and the captain stepped back. "Well, if that isn't a great, glowing hemorrhoid on an Enkindler's ass."

She heard Nihlus's talons scuffle against the dust-covered stone as he drifted a few paces down the tunnel. "A what?" he asked, distracted.

"A sore on the … ." Shepard sighed. "An ass sore, let's just leave it at that." She crouched, feeling along the barrier for any sign of an opening. "You're right in the center of where I came through, Miranda. The tunnel extends about a metre on either side of you, down to ground level, and about two metres above your head." Thane and Jack alerted to Miranda's behaviour and moved in. The three spoke, then the other two joined the search for a way in.

Shepard opened the mission channel, so that they'd all hear her. "I'll back up," she said. "See if biotics have any sort of effect on it."

"Shepard," Nihlus said, the deep rumble she knew meant danger rolled under the words, sending the sharp skitter of giant beetles up her spine.

Plucking Ingrid from her back, she spun to face the darkness even as she lifted the rifle to her shoulder and looked down the sight. "Great fuck, the entire tunnel looks like it's moving." The beetles sank their needle-like feet into her skin, burrowing for the meat. For a moment, she jerked the scope here and there, following every perceived movement, but then slammed a lid on the fear. She'd been through a hell of a lot worse than being trapped somewhere and outnumbered. Garrus was just usually to blame for her entrapment rather than Nihlus.

"There's no cover," Nihlus called, pulling her back. She heard no fear in his voice, his tone merely listing their disadvantages. "We've got our backs to the light. We're preteril with our burrows covered." He moved toward the wall, stealing a little of their advantage, but it wouldn't be enough.

She followed suit and moved out of silhouette, glancing back as she heard the dull whomps of her squad's biotics impacting the barrier. A few seconds later, she heard an overload sizzle over the surface that the biotic attacks left undamaged.

"Shepard, are you standing clear?" Miranda called.

"As clear as we can be," she replied, sparing their efforts another glance. "Don't go crazy with bullets or grenades, though."

Turning back to the dark, Shepard squinted, trying to see through the shifting shadows. The shuffle and scrape of feet echoed off the walls, warping and multiplying until the sounds pummeled her ears. A drum beat pounded inside her head, the sound of it mocking the cadence of her warrior breathing. The black beckoned, a vacuum drawing her in to fill its void. As she had outside the cave, she got no sense of the spiders trying to infiltrate her thoughts or pull forward her memories. Unlike outside, however, she felt curiosity more than fear.

"Whoever is behind the orbs has decided they're glad we're stuck in here," she said.

"They want to know what's here," Nihlus said, his voice no more than a whisper. "They've been trying to get past that barrier for a long time."
Shepard reeled, Tashac slamming against the barriers in her mind. They cannot get in. They cannot be allowed in. "Wait a second," she said, glancing toward Nihlus. "Is she screaming about not letting the ones behind the orbs into this place? But that would mean … what?"

The torin reached up, pressing the heel of his hand into his right eye socket. "I think so. Like I said, Shepard, she doesn't talk to me any more than Merol talks to you. It's just impressions." He dropped his hand back to his shotgun and gave his head a stiff shake. "It doesn't matter. We're here, and by the sound of it, we're about to get hit by—"

A pale shriek ripped up through the mountain, the shrill of a damned soul screaming in rage, the very stone trembling at its passage. Shepard's gut froze into a tangle of acidic ice then cracked as another cry answered the first. "Oh, sweet baby Jesus, what the hell was that?" She backed toward the opening, the sound of gunfire pounding at the barrier far more welcome than those terrible cries.

Another scream ripped through the dark, everything about it so very wrong that the sound frayed the edges of Shepard's sanity, tugging at loose threads. She swallowed the panic and turned her back to the sounds. The sun, grass, the sights and sounds of life helped tie some of those threads back together. "Miranda? Any luck? We either need to get you guys in here or get us out and fast."

"Sorry, Shepard. Nothing we've tried has even disturbed it." The operative's omnitool streamed data as she tapped away at the interface. "We need stronger scanners. Maybe the Ypres could find a way to break through the barrier, or locate another access."

Shepard nodded and added Liara and Nihlus. "Okay, Nihlus and I are going to be in deep in a couple of seconds. We need you all trying to get in or find us a way out. Nihlus, send Liara your Spectre authorizations … anything she needs to get the Ypres above this mountain. We need deep, detailed scans." She paused, swallowing a lump of want … need. "I wish we had Tali and Garrus here working the tech angle." A sudden grin accompanied her hand lifting to add EDI to the call.

"EDI, if you're not busy plotting a way to kill us all, we could use your help down here," she called. "I am not currently formulating any homicidal plans that cannot keep, Shepard," the AI replied. "How many I be of assistance?"

"Miranda, send EDI everything you've got on that barrier." Why hadn't she thought of EDI before? The AI's entire reason for being was situational analysis and problem solving, not to mention ground team support. Shepard really needed to get some missions under her belt with the ship and crew … figure out how all her new pieces slotted into place.

Nihlus backed into her peripherals, his omnitool open. "Authorizations sent," he said simply.

"Good. Get the Ypres down here, Liara." Shepard barked the command, able to see the asari's mouth open and working on reasons it couldn't happen. Then Aethyta strode up, dismissed the asari from the gunship, and walked Liara away. She turned her attention to Miranda. "XO, EDI … find us a way out."

Miranda nodded. "Understood, Captain."

"Acknowledged, Captain," EDI replied.

The terrible shrieks continued, sounding closer with each scream. Shepard glanced over her shoulder, but nothing showed itself. The monsters could be a half klick distant the way the tunnel echoed. She turned back to her team. "I'll keep this channel open."
After a couple of breaths, she turned to face the darkness, sparing just a glance for Nihlus. "You're right, we're sitting ducks here. As much as I really hate suggesting this, we might find better cover further in, and we're almost definitely going to need it. Maybe, in the meantime, the squad can find their way in, have our backs to check this place out."

Nihlus nodded. "We don't stand a chance out here, not if they come at us in strength." Letting out a long, rumbling sigh, he cracked his neck, then hefted his gun, couching it against his shoulder in high ready. "I'll take point, five metres on the left."

Shepard nodded. "Miranda, we're moving down the tunnel to find cover," she said over the radio. Reaching down, she snagged two trackers, sticking one to Nihlus and one to herself. "I'm sending you our tracker frequencies now. Don't forget we're in here and go clubbing." A cracked laugh tumbled from her lips as Shepard opened her omnitool and scanned both trackers to ensure they were working, then sent their frequencies to Miranda. "I know how much you like to shake it."

"Ready?" Nihlus asked, glancing over at her, his gaze sealed off and hardened: one hundred percent veteran Spectre on mission. That steel settled along her spine and around her heart, slowing and deepening the fickle organ's beat for the first time since she fell through the cliff.

Shepard nodded and moved to the right hand wall, allowing him to get ahead far enough that she could cover him. "Glory hallelujah, Brother Nihlus. Glory hallelujah."

Chapter End Notes

(A-N: I'm going to be taking a short, two week hiatus from posting. I am deep in the unfolding war now, and need to spend a couple of weeks brainstorming and writing out of order to make sure the seeds all get sewn where they should, etc. I may post during this time, but as far as I know, Aug 24th will be my next 'for sure' posting date.

As always thanks so much for reading and reviewing. hugs for all)
"Your language has gotten a lot … saltier since you came back," Nihlus said between panting breaths when they stopped twenty minutes later. "I think I preferred the constant glorification of the Enkindlers." He chuckled, harsh and breathless, and sagged against the wall. "Never thought I'd say that."

Shepard heaved his weight up higher on her shoulder. "Shut up, Kryik. Save your air for escaping." She glanced behind them, the sound of pursuit closing fast.

35 Days ASR

"So, this could be going better." Nihlus pulled himself across the floor to lean back against the door frame. A sharp hiss and groan accompanied the movement, his face twisting with pain as he stretched out his leg.

"Shut up, idiot." Shepard hit the floor between his feet, taking cover behind his thigh as she finished off the third of the shambling, screaming things. Once sure the tunnel was clear, she launched Droney to warn them of approaching enemies and turned her attention to Nihlus's leg. "Where'd she get you?"

"Right hip," he gasped, listing to the other side. Pain cracked through his subvocals, the ice too thin to hold its weight. "It's okay, the damned knives on her hands glanced off the bone. Just hit my medigel, and I'm back in it." Despite his words, he made no attempt to get up, just leaning propped up between the wall and his elbow.

Shepard hit his medigel twice and turned up his heater, then tackled the seals on the armour covering that quarter of him, setting the pieces aside, except for the girdle, which she just cracked open and pulled out of the way. The sheer amount of blood squeezing out through the weave of his under armour called him a liar. "I believe my words were, shut up, idiot," she said. Growling a little, she pulled her knife and cut a long slit down the hip of his underlayer.

Blood poured over her fingers. Oh fuck. "Damn it, Kryik. I can't take you anywhere." Rooting through her hip pack, she pulled out a couple of bandages. Wadding them into a thick pad, she pressed the handful against the three long, jagged tears through his hide. One or more of them had bisected a vein. The medigel would seal it as long as they stemmed the flow long enough for the miraculous goo to work.

One of these days, you're going to take that field medic course you keep saying you want to take.

"Sure," she muttered under her breath, "I have nothing but spare time." Still, she missed Sparky's expertise. The amount of blood sticking up her gloves and puddling on the floor meant a major vein. He could lose his damned leg if she didn't get them the hell out of there.

The familiar pop-sizzle of Droney firing off a rocket slapped Shepard back to the floor. Leaning over Nihlus's leg, she peered up the long slope. More Collectors. At least they died a hell of a lot easier than the fucked up masquerade of asari zombies. She grasped Nihlus's hand and pressed it over the bandages.

"Hold this," she said, her words a hiss between clenched teeth. "As much pressure as you can apply." Picking Ingrid up off the floor, she used the Spectre to steady her shot as she sighted down the odd, insectile face in the center of the massive head. Two shots took it down with some help from Droney's rockets. Three more followed, the time it took to kill them pressing her into the floor until she heard her ribs popping from the weight.

They needed to get somewhere they could set up some sort of damned defense. Not that cover would do anything against the asari abominations that could charge biotically. That last one had closed in a half second, just appearing right on top of them. A giant of a thing, it had picked Nihlus up by the neck like he weighed as much as a freaking Shih Tzu. He only still drew breath thanks to her massively overclocked overload. While the creature stood, stunned, she snatched the Spectre's shotgun out of his hand and shoved the muzzle right in the damned thing's spine. At that range, the gun ripped the monster right in half.

"How are you doing?" she asked, casting a quick look over her rifle before focusing on taking down the last couple. Droney finished off one. Thank the ever-bleeding fluffy baby Jesus.

"Feeling tired. We need to find somewhere defensible, Jane." His voice told her more than his words. He'd lost enough blood to slow him down. They needed somewhere he could rest, drink, and eat.

She took down the last Collector, waited a few seconds to be sure that wave had stopped, then relaunched Droney. Scrambling onto her knees once again, she focused back on the wound. Lifting the bandages, she peered beneath. The bleeding had slowed to where she could use topical medigel to hold the wounds together. Setting the bandages aside, she looked to the pile of discarded armour, searching through for Nihlus's belt.

"Here." He dragged one end of the belt out of the pile, holding it out in a hand that dipped and swayed with weakness.

She snatched it from him. "Just lie there and rest. I'm not carrying your fragile bod out of here, you hear me?" She popped open all the pouches and dumped their contents. Shaking fingers rooted through until she found his topical medigel. "I'd better call Eis before I do anything."

Lifting her hand to her radio, Shepard opened a channel to the Ypres. "Doc, Kryik got himself clawed by a mutated asari. I estimate he's lost about a half litre of blood." She listened for a second. "I gave him two shots of medigel and applied pressure." After another second, she shook her head. "I don't have a medical scanning program on this tool."

"You do," the chia spoke up, activating the scanner. "Installed by General Garrus Vakarian four hundred twenty eight days ago.

"Well excellent." Shepard ran the scanner over Nihlus, then sent the data to the doc. A moment later, Eis came back rattling off instructions. "Wait … slow down. Stims to get his blood pressure up? Okay, yeah, we have those." She dug back into the stuff she'd dumped out of his belt. "Two? Okay." A short cry of victory accompanied the discovery of two ampules, which she administered through his armour port.

"Okay, Doc. That's done." She started shoving things back into his belt pouches. "Water?" She could have slapped herself in the head for that one. "Right." She twisted the cap off a bottle and held it out. "Drink, as much as you can guzzle down." Turning her attention back to Eis, she scowled. "I'll do the best I can to get him up there, but we're trapped down here. There have been a hell of a lot of bad guys, and I don't think we're done yet. He needs to be able to move."

She eyeballed the bandages. "Okay, so the internal medigel should have sealed the tears in the vein while still letting some blood flow through?" Looking up at Nihlus, she asked. "Does that leg feel tingly at all? Like it's asleep?" When he shook his head, she let out a sigh and reported that back to the doc. "Okay, so bandage it, stim every hour, as much water as he can drink, and food as soon as possible." Taking a deep breath, she nodded. She could handle that. All she needed was a plan.

"Thanks, Doc. Shepard, out." She grinned when she saw Nihlus had half the bottle of water down. "Feeling any better?"

He pushed himself up a little straighter. "Yeah, the stimms helped push back the fog. Let's get moving." The Spectre reached for his armour. "You owe me a new underlayer."

She clenched her fists a couple of times to stop their shaking then packed the bandage back into place after checking to be sure the bleeding had stopped completely. Using wet wipes to clear away some the blood from around the wound, she swallowed a huge stone of sudden terror. A little more bad luck or a couple of more minutes would have seen her stuck down there alone in the dark.

"How's it coming, Miranda?" she called as she bandaged the Spectre's hip.

"Half the team are still working on bringing the barrier down, Shepard. The rest of us are following the asari commandos down the mountain, hoping that they'll lead us to another entrance." The operative paused. "Spectre Kryik is stable?"

"He is," Nihlus spoke up. He checked his bandages, then began putting his armour back on. "Just get us the hell out of here before we have to fight our way through this entire mountain."

"You heard the torin," Shepard said, a thin chuckle running beneath the words. "Keep this channel open. Shepard, over."

She gathered and stowed all the casualties to her scavenging and got up, checking the tunnel before offering Nihlus a hand. "Up you get, Spectre. Let's find somewhere defensible." Slipping an arm around his waist, she supported him until he found his feet and his gait leveled out.

A shrill, gut-freezing wail shrieked down from above. "Oh fuck me," Shepard said, a sigh sliding out of her, dirt rolling into a fresh grave. "You okay on your own?" she asked, fighting back the chill that froze her in place as she looked up into Nihlus's eyes. 'Get yourself into the tunnel on the far side of the chamber and stay in cover the best you can."

He nodded and pulled his rifle. "I'll cover your back."

"Okay." She clenched Ingrid in gelid hands. "As soon as she's in range, I'll launch Droney behind her and try to keep her away from you." Couching the rifle tight against her shoulder, Shepard took cover at the door. "If she gets in the room, I'll try to lead her back out."

A flash of blue against the black set Shepard's jaw. "She's a closer." A spiked grin yanked one corner of her mouth back as Nihlus cursed. Yeah, that about said it. After priming Droney, she lifted Ingrid to her eye, lining up the asari zombie's head. Each of the monsters coming at them had been different, almost as if the Collectors were sending their trial runs, saving the better versions until all the weaker ones had been destroyed.

The current banshee—for lack of a better way to describe their cries—stood over seven feet judging by the amount of room she took up in the tunnel. Lights glowed along the heinous mockery of everything feminine that formed her body. Shepard waited for the thing to charge, then fired.

More of it appeared in her flashlight beam. Nude, skin black and dessicated, her huge pregnant-looking belly and large breasts sagged and swayed as she moved. Shepard fired. Fuck that whole 'about to give birth and suckle hell at my breast' shit. Even the creature's hands and feet—elegant and long—moved like a dancer's, beckoning victims into her embrace. Shepard waited for the next charge then fired again. The thing teleported in Droney-range. Shepard launched him behind it, grinning a wild, fierce grin as it turned to engage the little guy.

As Shepard lined up her next shot, she caught sight of the monster's fingernails gleaming black and slick in the light. Sweet baby Jesus, this one's were twice the length of the one that nearly gutted Nihlus. They'd slice right through someone. After squeezing the trigger, she primed the heaviest overload she could manage without burning it out, then waited.

"Come on, you ugly bitch," she said, her voice a low, guttural growl. "I've got my partner at my back, my best girl in my hands … bring your worst."

_Do you pray to the darkness that new battles fought against your old enemies will strip the taste of grave dust from your breath, Shepard? As long as you are surrounded by enough of the old faces and use the old weapons, can you believe that you are alive?_

The voice roared like thunder, stopping Shepard's heart for the barest of seconds. She glanced over her shoulder toward the tunnel that led further into the mountain. Nihlus stood against the wall, ready to fire once the banshee entered his sights. A slight mandibular tremor betrayed that he'd heard the voice, but he remained solid.

Another unearthly shriek ripped through the room, shredding the air and clawing into Shepard's head through her ears as it pulled her back to her target. The monstrosity closed another ten metres, her horrific body wreathed in blue lightning, then flung a warp. Shepard triggered her overload, then ducked and rolled clear. When she got back to her cover, the banshee had charged out of reliable sniper range.

"Fuck," Shepard cursed as Droney went down. She hesitated for the barest of second to choose between relaunching him or cuing up another overload. Shepard opted for the extra firepower, and the little ball of light blinked into existence behind the banshee. Using the monster's slight hesitation as it adjusted to two assailants, Shepard switched out for her assault rifle and then emptied the heat sink into the creature's head.

"Keep right," Nihlus called. When she nodded, his sniper rifle let out a sharp bark, staggering the monster just as she set to charge, buying Shepard time to replace her heat sink.

Shepard backed away from the door as the banshee closed on her position, keeping the thing's empty, milky stare riveted on her. Amazing how a constant barrage of rounds pelting something in the face kept its attention. Whenever she paused to change heat sinks, Nihlus hit it from the flank, but it just kept coming.

"Fucking die, already!" she screamed, edging her way around the perimeter of the chamber. How the hell was it soaking up the rounds? She'd seen its barrier come down back in the tunnel. Circling around the side, she saw the holes Droney's rockets had torn in its back and legs. Then, she gulped in a breath so sharp that it formed a soft bleat that echoed, bouncing around her as she stared, watching the creature's dessicated flesh rebuilding itself.

"Shepard!" Nihlus shouted, the sharp crack of sound startling her into action. His shotgun fired, its roar huge in the cavern … and close. Very close. Too close.
The banshee stood closer still. It turned and with a rubbery, thunderous thwomp that compressed the air in front of it, the thing charged, stopping less than a metre away.

"Nihlus, keep back," Shepard shouted, even as she launched Droney right in the thing's face to buy her some getaway time. Spinning, she aimed for the tunnel back to the surface and bolted. Before she reached the opening, she heard the buzz-crack of Droney dying then the smaller biotic whomp of a warp. When she felt all the hairs on her back stand on end, Shepard threw herself into a roll and prayed.

Nihlus's shotgun blasts roared closer and closer, each emphasized by the drag and then quick step of his limp. Damn him for not listening. She flipped onto her back in time to see the warp sail over her head. Bringing up her Mattock, she opened fire on the creature's head.

"It's regenerating! We have to do a lot of fast, catastrophic damage." She launched Droney between her and the closing banshee. "Shotgun point blank, Droney's rockets, and I'll hit her in the head with Ingrid."

The Spectre grunted his reply, moving sideways to get directly behind the monster. Shepard scrambled backwards, trading guns while Droney kept the banshee busy.

"As soon as she starts to arm her charge," Shepard hollered, priming her overload. At the level she set it, it would take half an hour or so to cool down, but she needed to flambe every circuit moving that corpse across the floor.

Shepard waited until the aura crackled around the thing and it began to shimmer, ready to teleport itself, then hollered, "Now!" as she unleashed her overload. The energy arced and sizzled along every centimetre of the banshee, even between its teeth as Shepard brought Ingrid up, aiming for the zombie's right eye.

Ingrid's recoil slammed into Shepard's shoulder, her round tearing half the dessicated head away, at the exact moment Nihlus began pumping shotgun blasts into the banshee's spine. It wavered for a second, then crumpled. The Spectre moved in, tearing it apart with round after round. One last shot tore what remained of its head from its neck and the body crumbled into dust.

Allowing herself a half second of relief, Shepard collapsed against the left hand wall, Ingrid sagging to rest muzzle-down on the dusty stone. She met Nihlus's mandible flick with a nod and a weary grin, then pushed off and limp-shuffled down the tunnel to his side.

"Nice shooting, Tex," she said and wrapped an arm around his waist. "Let's get moving while the coast is clear." As they hobbled toward the chamber's exit, she dug an ampule of painkillers from her pound and injected it.

The Spectre sagged against her a little, his arm heavy around her shoulders. "It can't be much further, can it?"

"No. I don't imagine it can, even if our entrance was the back way—" Scuttling, shuffling sounds cut her off. Damn it. "Okay." She settled herself against him more securely, gripped his belt in her fist, and started for the far tunnel entrance. "We're going to have to make some time. You all right?"

Nihlus lifted into a rough, shambling jog alongside her, leaning even more heavily, but he nodded.
She applauded his choice to save his breath for the run. Despite her assurance, she didn't possess the first clue how much further they had to go. And a set of teeth gnawing away at her guts warned that wherever they were headed … the monsters were herding them there.
"Your language has gotten a lot … saltier since you came back," Nihlus said between panting breaths when they stopped twenty minutes later. "I think I preferred the constant glorification of the Enkindlers." He chuckled, harsh and breathless, and sagged against the wall. "Never thought I'd say that."

Shepard heaved his weight up higher on her shoulder. "Shut up, Kryik. Save your air for escaping." She glanced behind them, the sound of pursuit closing fast. How long could the fucking tunnel go before it gave them a room … somewhere she could put up a defense? She pulled a bottle of water from her belt and drank a quarter of it before she passed it to him.

While he drank, she dove into her belt pack for a stim ampule. It might not have been an hour, but Nihlus was weakening too fast. She couldn't carry him, and—her heart let out a sharp, stabbing pain as her brain spat out a vision of her back running away from his prone form—she couldn't just leave him behind. Keeping him on his feet was her only option. She shoved the meds into the port in his armour.

"Here," he said, his voice hoarse and flat, "I can't drink any more."

Accepting the bottle, Shepard drained it, tossing the container. "You ready?"

After a couple of heavy breaths, he pushed off the wall. "Yeah." He wrapped his arm around her, then bent and nuzzled her hair. "For luck," he whispered.

Shepard listened to their pursuit, trying to judge how close they were. Close, but at least she didn't hear any of the banshee screams. She dug her shoulder into his side, hefting his weight. "We're going to need it. Come on, partner."

A guillotine blade hanging from a strand of spider silk, the feeling of being herded loomed overhead, the air vibrating with tension: strange music that whistled along the pitted ceiling. They ate the ground at a decent clip, Nihlus pushing himself hard enough that Shepard knew she'd have a crisis on her hands once they did manage to stop. No rose coloured lenses tinted the reality that from then on, she'd be fighting alone. Thank the Enkindlers' glowing hemorrhoidal asses for Droney.

Note to self: when you get back to Omega, get the turret upgrade.

At last the tunnel opened into another small chamber, that one lined with what looked like cramped cells made out of thin sheets of amber. More importantly, a door control gleamed on the wall next to the entrance.

"Here, brace yourself for a second, I'm going to try to scramble this lock, buy us some time." She guided Nihlus to the wall and waited for him to nod that he was stable before pulling away.

The door closed at a touch, but then Shepard hesitated. They needed to be able to get people through there. She and Nihlus might need to get out. Fuck. She scrubbed at a sudden itch at the base of her skull. What she needed was some sort of lockdown code. Something the Collectors or whoever operated the facility—and the spotless holding cells confirmed that it remained operational—wouldn't know.

"Come on, Tashac," she whispered, closing her eyes. "Tell me enough of you remained to embed something. Or Merol. Something … please."

Silence answered her pleas. Absolute silence, not even a wail or a mutter. Shepard let out a shrill hiss of frustration, scratching at the spot on her head again. "Damn it, you were the strongest commander in the prothean military. You fought off indoctrination for half a lifetime. You can find the courage to help us get through here."

"Haksaya kubenar," Nihlus whispered, his voice listless and flat. "Prothean characters."

Shepard glanced back, eyebrows raised in query. Nihlus just let out a long breath and nodded. Turning back to the panel, she entered the endearment, praying that Merol came through for them when his mate couldn't.

The panel flashed blue once then the controls began to blink. She let out a long sigh of relief, then turned to scoot back under Nihlus's arm, bearing as much of his weight as she could.

Pressing a quick kiss against his mandible, she said, "That one's for Merol."

Nihlus's breathy, wet-sounding chuckle killed her relief. He teetered on the edge of collapse. "How about we move a bit slower," he said, trying to make it sound like a joke.

Shepard hesitated with her hand on her belt pouch. Did she dare give him another stim? Too many would end up causing a crash in his vitals when they wore off. A slow, diffuse pounding began to resonate inside her skull like a vast, deep-bass drum beat … or a heartbeat, but slow … so slow.

"Yeah," she said. "The door should keep the ones behind us at bay for a bit." She let him set the pace, helping him more and more as he began to falter.

He stumbled, going down on one knee. Forearm leaning across his thigh, he panted, fighting for breath. Shepard could feel him shivering and reached down to turn his heater up a little more. She stripped off a glove and pressed her palm against his throat and inside his collar at the back of his neck, wincing at the clamminess of his hide. Shock was setting in hard and fast. She needed to find a place to let him rest for longer than five minutes.

"Here," she said, stepped in close. "Lean on me. I need my hands for a second." She braced herself against his weight then reached up to open a channel to the Ypres. "Hey, Doc. I need to send you another set of scans. He's starting to crash on me." Even as she spoke, the medical scanner popped up on her arm. After sending the readings, she dug into her pouch for another ampule of painkillers.

"You okay?" Nihlus asked, nodding toward the shot. "That's your second in less than an hour."

She injected it. "Yeah. Oddly enough, rolling around on the rock isn't good for the canyons of open flesh. Strange, I know, but true." The doctor came back, drawing Shepard's attention back to keeping Nihlus alive. "Okay, but … my supplies are limited." She opened the pack. "What have I got? Ummm … salt tabs, an analgesic, medigel—both kinds, antibacterial spray."

Rooting through her pouches in order, she listed off their contents. "Feminine hygiene products, water purifier, sugar tabs … ." She stopped as the doc called out. "They're my sugar tabs, Doc." Her eyebrows rose. "Really … sugar is dextro? How didn't I know that?" She cracked open the metal tube and passed two of the large, minty tabs to Nihlus. "Here, chomp on those."

She stuffed the tube into the front pouch. "Okay. So a salt tab and keep pelting the sugar into him, and then food, rest, and warmth. Okay, thanks, Doc. Shepard, out." She changed back to the open squad channel, the distant chatter comforting as she held out her hand. "Come on, old guy, up you get."

It took a bit of heaving to haul him onto his feet and get him sorted. They moved slower than a team of slugs in a tractor pull, but he'd used up his every resource getting that far, so all she could do was pray that the door lockdown held. At least if the enemy had to take a different route or batter the door down, it bought her time to find somewhere she could build some solid cover, maybe even force them into a bottleneck.

"Captain," EDI called over the radio, "the Ypres has taken a stationary position above the facility. Beginning scans. I have located your position. A large chamber is located fifty metres ahead of you. Energy signatures present, but no life signs. There are three exits, all sealable with emergency blast doors."

A long, grumbling sigh greeted that news. "Glory hallelujah, EDI. Thanks." Shepard smiled at Nihlus and nodded forward. "Not much farther."

Shepard felt the air currents shift as they reached a fairly steep down-grade, the floor dropping away at enough of an angle that she had to lean back, keeping her weight on her back leg in order to counterbalance Nihlus. Halfway down, they stopped to let the Spectre regain his breath. Shepard tested the air, the quality definitely changed, a cooler draft curled along the floor. It smelled less musty and dank, but carried the scents of hot carbon and polymers ... and something else. She couldn't put a name to the odour, but it crawled inside her, wrapping old, dry tentacles around her heart and lungs.

Through the arm wrapped around her shoulders and the hip pressed into hers, she felt Nihlus's trembling worsen. "Okay, partner, time to move," she said, forcing her voice to fake a cheeriness she most definitely did not feel. The entire mountain felt as though it housed a virulent cancer just waiting to find a way to spread. She shook that off, forcing herself to fight her own good sense as it tried to pull her back up the way they'd come, begging her to run until nothing but open sky hung above her and sunlight warmed her shoulders.

But no, that route led to nothing but death. As counterintuitive as it might be, salvation lie in pushing into the darkness. She needed to get them to the next chamber before Nihlus went down and couldn't get back up. As strong as Cerberus had built her, weariness and pain had begun to weigh heavily enough that she knew she couldn't drag him very far.

Light seeped into the gloom, making the rock shine, black and slick where it curved toward their destination. With every step Shepard took, the tentacles of doom wrapped tighter and tighter until they began to strangle her from the inside out.

"How far, EDI?" she asked, guessing their position no more than a dozen or so metres from a sharp corner into the chamber. "Any change in the energy signatures in there?"

"Negative on changes to the energy emissions. No life signs. You are currently fourteen point six metres from the door on the eastern wall."

"Thank you." Shepard glanced up at her partner. "A few metres out, I'm going to leave you behind. Don't fall over; I'm too tired to drag your asslessness even a few metres." She counted the steps, pausing when she figured them less than five metres from possible sanctuary. Please, sweet baby Jesus, let it be sanctuary. "Okay, once I make sure the chamber is clear and lock up those other two doors, I'll be back." She helped him turn so that his back pressed against the wall, then handed him the container of sugar tablets and a bottle of water.

"Five minutes," she said, backing away from him, a stern finger pointed at his nose. "Stay on your feet for five more minutes."

Nihlus merely nodded and opened the sugar, slipping a tablet into his mouth.
Shepard held his stare for another breath before tearing herself away. Covering the last few paces at a shuffling jog, she closed in on the doorway. She took cover then launched Drony into the space, giving him a count of twenty to find enemies before she stuck her head out to do her own survey.

What awaited her dragged a long, shuddering exhalation through a paralyzed throat and slack jaw as her eyes travelled up the monstrosity at the center of the chamber. "Oh … fuck … me."

The tentacles gloated, shortling happily to themselves as they finished crushing her pulse and breath into dust. Frost painted its way up her spine; her implants digging painful claws into her back muscles as they froze solid.

"What the hell are you?" she asked, not realizing she'd even spoken until her words echoed back at her.

Fifteen metres away, a massive computer erupted from the cavern floor, all oil-slick black and sinuous as if hell had spat it out rather than someone assembling it. Surrounding the computer, equally huge and undulous stalagmites and stalactites of the amber substance wove through the hardware, creating a Lovecraftian horror that filled her with an ancient, primitive terror. "Is there anything these bastards can't corrupt?"

Tearing her eyes away from the machine, she searched the rest of the room for any sign of Collectors. Something told her the banshees didn't excel at being covert. Drony floated around the perimeter, blithely blipping to himself, so she entered, sidestepping along the wall toward the door on the south wall. Other than the machine and a few medical beds, the room sat silent and empty. She closed the door, using Merol's override to lock it down, then ran across to do the same thing to the west door.

Nihlus had slid about a half metre down the wall by the time she got back to him, but remained on his feet. Sweat beaded along his throat, but when she touched him, he felt ice cold.

"Come on, there's a horizontal surface in there with your name on it." She wrapped her arm around him, shaking him a little when he was slow to respond. "Hey." Reaching up with her free arm, she patted his cheek. "We're both getting out of here, so come on … buck up and lets move."

He nodded and took a deep breath, pushing off the wall. "I'm with you, Shepard." Leaning heavily on her shoulders, he hobbled beside her, taking slow, painful steps.

"I think I may have underestimated how much blood you lost," Shepard said, trying to keep her voice light. "Even if I aged you eighty cycles, for you to accept help without bitching … damn. You must have lost at least three quarters of your volume."

He chuffed, but straightened a little and their pace picked up a touch.

"What in the pits of buratrum … ?" Nihlus staggered, pulling Shepard to a stop in the door.

Chuckling, she tugged on him. "Yeah, that was just about my exact reaction." She waggled her head a little. "Except saltier." She led him toward one of the impeccably clean medical beds. "This won't be overly comfortable, I imagine, but up you go.

Nihlus pretty much just lifted a leg up and rolled onto the surface, sinking in far more than Shepard would have expected. She pressed down into the gel … her heart suddenly thumping hard and fast. It was soft and deep. Crouching, she read the manufacturer. Elkoss-Combine Medical. Shit! Someone was bringing new medical equipment in there. Why? Keeping the place functional and clean over time was one thing … updating it meant they had current plans for the nightmare in the center of the chamber.

"The door, Jane." Nihlus's armour clattered against the solid parts of the bed as he settled himself.

"Yeah," the word came out as much breath as sound, and she pushed up. "Yeah, the door." Plenty of time to worry about modern equipment showing up inside a fifty thousand year old house of horror. Still, her eyes darted around the space, searching out the traps she felt everywhere, jaws open and ready to spring.

_The Collectors don’t exactly hide, Janey. It's not unreasonable to assume they have agents all over the galaxy._

She shut and overrode the door. It was true. Although certainly not ones to attract notice, the Collectors remained active, trading tech for all sorts of the strange and unusual. Once the room was secured, Shepard let out a small sigh. She were safe-ish for the moment, and she had a partner to tend to. She went into her pack, pulling out her thermal sheet and a bottle of water.

She ran a hand over Nihlus's fringe. "Okay, old guy, let's get you sorted." It took nearly ten minutes of prodding to get a high nutrition bar and a half litre of water into him, but then she covered him in both of their thermal sheets and let him sleep.

Stepping back from the bed once she got Nihlus settled and reassured herself that he was stable, Shepard let her gaze return to Computer Cthulhu, her brain refusing to follow any one line from beginning to end, eyes sliding off in the same way they had when she faced the Conduit. Although she didn't see any sign of an indoctrination field like the one around the Conduit, she reached into her pouch and took another shot of the counteragent.

"What are you for?" she asked, edging around the machine. "Help me out here, Tashac," she whispered. "You had to have had a hand in this. Is this your terrible secret?" An interface jutted out from the main body of the thing, but she continued to circle, using every bit of engineering knowledge and creative talent she possessed to try to figure out its purpose.

On the far side, a wide gap between two large of the amber constructs led into the heart of the beast. She activated her omnitool to scan the amber, but the chia interface activated.

"They are chia corrupted by the suzerain's servants," the chia gauntlet said. "They emit nothing for your scans to detect. In this state, they are drained of everything that defines our people. They possess no intelligence, their purpose subverted to that of the machine. This is why we fled, took refuge in inertia or within the Cynosure. This death of slavery is the worst fate the chiastylia can imagine."

Shepard stepped closer, careful not to even brush against the amber. The technology involved definitely looked Reaper. How would Tashac have known how to construct anything that complex?
She'd been a soldier through and through. Merol was the scientist. Of course, Merol hadn't looked into the vast, empty darkness. Perhaps the Reapers had just used her, a puppet to perform their will.

The circle completed, Shepard stepped toward the interface. She'd never learn anything without being a little bit brave and really, really stupid. "EDI, monitor this thing carefully. Don't interface with it at all, just in case its purpose is to hijack electronic defense intelligences. Just let me know if it looks like something is about to enslave my mind or chop me into varren kibble."

"Understood, Captain. Do you intend to access the machine's logs?" the AI asked, her voice taking a curious upturn at the end.
"That is my very great hope. Preferably without the brain enslavement or aforementioned kibble tragedy." Shepard eased toward the console and reached out a single finger. "If I get disintegrated or launched into space or eaten by sharks, tell Nihlus he's still to blame." Wincing, she closed her eyes, and pulled her head back. When she felt her finger make contact with the console, Shepard opened one eye. The interface was turned on.

Slowly, she eased back around. "No sharks. Okay then." She looked up, then gave her head a shake. "EDI, anything from the machine?"

"The computer core has power, but no processes are running at this time."

Heart pounding hard against her ribs, she nodded. "Keep an eye on it, I'm going in." After clenching her hands into fists a couple of times, Shepard started searching for some form of log to tell her what the computer did, and how long ago it had last been used. Maybe even why the place was being continually maintained and upgraded.

"Your armour's onboard scanners are displaying elevated heart rate and respiration, Captain," the AI stated. "These readings indicate a state of considerable stress."

Shepard laughed, a harsh, mirthless cough that startled her as it echoed back. "Yeah, well, that might be because I'm currently under considerable stress, EDI. Thanks for the update."

"If it helps relieve your state of mind, I calculate that your odds of being eaten by sharks are one in one hundred billion and twenty seven given your current distance from the nearest ocean."

A bright, genuine laugh greeted that fact. "Excellent, you're right, EDI, I feel so much better now." And in truth, she did. Between the interface proving thus far benign and the joking AI, Shepard's pulse settled a little and her breathing slowed.

"Okay, right, soldier mind on hold," she whispered, allowing the cypher to feed her the prothean characters and commands, "scientist mind in gear. Let's find out what you are, you ugly, mother-fu … " She glanced over at the sleeping Spectre. "... frickin' nightmare."

Once she set her mind to the task, time passed without meaning. After a half hour, Shepard's legs began to tremble with fatigue, so she paused to eat and drink, then dragged a crate out from under one of the medical beds and sat on it. As she worked, she uncovered just a mind-boggling amount of data: genetic analysis of the asari over the entire fifty thousand years, results of experiments done to analyze how the asari developed their innate biotic talent, chemical and cellular breakdowns for millions of subjects … it would take an entire university of analysts and researchers to break down what all of it meant. However, even with her limited knowledge, an anomaly stuck out. Every once in a while the sample—she shuddered to think that the sample very likely was a terrified, screaming asari trying to claw her way out of bonds—ended up contaminated in some way, and it appeared to be those contaminated trials that interested the Collectors the most.

Rustling and then ceramic banging off metal pulled her attention away from her work. "Anyone trying to get in, EDI?" Shepard blinked rapidly, trying to sort her vision. "Damn, I've been staring at the screen too long … can't see anything more than a half metre away."

"There are no life signs in your area at this time," EDI answered. "However, Spectre Kryik's onboard scans report that he has regained consciousness."

"Oh good." Shepard leaned back and stretched. "How are you feeling?" She peered around the computer, still seeing nothing but shadows and fog, then rubbed her eyes. A low purring sound accompanied the glorious pain as she dug the heels of her hands into her eye sockets. "Oh yeah, that's the stuff."

"Better," Nihlus replied. A heavy thump echoed around the cavern as he slid down off the table. "Hungry." He limped toward her, pausing to look into the gap in the side of the machine. "How long have I been out?"

Chuckling, Shepard shook her head. "No clue. EDI?"

"Three point six four hours."

Shepard shrugged. "There you have it." She stretched again, her muscles all humming happily as she cracked her neck and then pulled both arms across her chest to snap her shoulders. "I guess I was right about the Collectors herding us here. Doesn't make sense that they'd chase us halfway through the mountain and then just leave us alone." She pushed herself up onto her feet, groaning as her body complained. "It gives us time to figure this thing out, though."

Looking up, she saw Nihlus slip through the amber, entering the gap. "No … wait … we don't know if that's safe." She ran around the console, reaching through with one hand. He stood, half turned back as if he'd meant to leave, his face looking down and completely, horribly blank.

"Nihlus? You okay?" She glanced up into his eyes then lunged for his hand to pull it away from the tech. "Didn't the beacon teach you anything about touching unknown tech?" She pulled, his arm not just resisting, but rigid, unmoving in even the slightest degree. "Nihlus? Oh fuck, come on, old guy … you don't get to do this—" The words continued to appear inside her head, but her vocal chords and mouth stopped giving them form. She tried to release his hand, but her fingers refused her commands.

Annoyance exploded into terror. Fuck! He'd landed them both in a trap once again. That one far more deadly than the beacon if the computer logs could be believed. Heart racing, she tried to move anything … even blink her eyes, but nothing. Around them, the amber chia began to form, encasing her and Nihlus in a thick tube. Fighting, struggling with everything she had, Shepard hammered at the inside of her internal prison.

Move … anything at all, just move!

Not even her eyes twitched, her stare not wavering from Nihlus's by even a millimetre. Terror sloshed through her veins, setting her entire body on fire, every cell burning to escape, building up an explosion inside a prison strong enough to contain it. Diaphragm and lungs succumbing to whatever held her captive, Shepard's breathing slowed and then stopped. When her heart followed—a wind up toy with a slack spring—Shepard waited for the black. Seconds passed.

One Mississippi. Two Mississippi. Three Mississippi … .

Nothing. No darkness fell over her vision. No peaceful nighttime to cradle the fear inside her body, wrapping it tight in her flesh until the sun broke through to warm her, dismissing all the monsters conjured within the void.

They struggle, they scream and rail as their insignificant lives end, but they amount to no more than bacteria. Your worlds become our laboratories, and then they fall. So it has been for millions of your years, Shepard. The harvest cannot be stopped, you have already failed.

Had Shepard been able to move, she would have cowered as that thunderous voice hammered at her again.

I am the Harbinger of your ascension. Face your annihilation.

Shepard faintly heard the radio chatter from the other side of whatever barrier had been thrown up between her mind and her body. She stared into the blank emerald of Nihlus's eyes, only one thought roaring through her mind as the paralytic took hold, his hand warm inside her grip.

Save Nihlus.

$$$

… "What are they doing?"

… "I don't know. It looks like they've found a way in."

… "It's a door. It looks like a main door into the mountain. What we found up above must have been the back way in."

… "No! Stop! We don't know what's on the other side of that door."

(A-N: Surprise! This chapter flowed out really nicely, so I posted it. And yes, I'm still officially on hiatus, and the 24th is still the next chapter posting date. :D Thanks as always, love as always, and ... yep, hugs as always.)
Their memories danced, swirling and weaving into one another. Shepard resolved to remain in the shadows and not to intrude upon Nihlus's privacy. However, watching that beautiful child starve to death for want of comfort—even a scrap of contact—proved too much for her heart and she stepped out of the shadows. Once she'd looked deeply into those sad, green eyes, she had little choice but to keep her hand wrapped tightly around his through the cycles.

An unusual trip down memory lane.

Caman - Refers to both the central hearth of the domin and the kitchen area.

Buratrum - Turian equivalent of hell

Tarc - Vulgar expletive equivalent to shit

Perir - Turian equivalent of boy

Pahir - Son

Merillien - Tiny, scaled bird analogues prized for their intelligence and the beautiful scaled harmonies they sing.

Regil - Greeting friends or family outside the domin

Trigger Warning: Verbal child abuse, mention of physical child abuse, parental death.

36 Days ASR

Stripping her down past nudity, past skin, past muscle and sinew and bone, even past identity and self, the machine laid her bare. It tore away every comfortable hiding place and disguise … every lie and truth and belief until she stood naked, her essence vulnerable and open to the machine's scrutiny. Terror gnawed at what remained, for she knew herself trapped.

"You will provide data to answer the question." Emotionless and without the roaring malevolence of the previous voice—the one that called itself Harbinger—the machine's statement amounted to an examiner telling a class to pick up their number two pencils and begin.

What is the question?

I'm afraid.

Then she felt him there with her; his being as shorn and exposed as hers. Unable to distinguish his borders, she didn't know if she'd expressed the fear, or if it belonged to him. Perhaps it originated with both. The sensation of duality, of feeling his emotions and hearing his thoughts without the delineation … there were no words to describe the intimacy.

I'm sorry.

That thought belonged to him. Regret and guilt, his dearest companions, seeped through every moment of his life, his entire purpose aimed toward making up for his existence, as if his birth had tallied some debt he needed to repay.

For what could have been the barest fraction of a second or days, they waited, her being moving over and through his, silent and expectant. Then, as if someone poked a hole in the container that held them, they began to flow, oil and water dancing together. The stream carried them backwards, a river flowing uphill away from the ocean to its source.

…

A sliver of light under his door sliced across his talons as they peeked out from under his nightrobe. Huddling against the portal, he pressed his aural canal to the thin metal. The chill of midwinter crackled around him, sharp and damp, making it hard to keep still. He pulled the robe's collar tighter around his neck and wrapped his arms around his belly to hold in his meager heat.

He froze as the domin's front door opened, his mari's voice rising to drown out the door's closure. Too many rooms away to make out her words, he knew the tone all too well, shrill and filled with enraged accusation.

He pressed his eyes closed, straining to hear his pari's voice, one small comfort before he tried to sleep. His hand drifted up to touch the tender bruise that darkened his eye and ached under the plates surrounding it.

"... dealing with your son." The rant moved to the caman. "Don't make a mess in here, I already came home to broken glass everywhere."

Nihlus gulped back tears. He hadn't meant to break the plate. After he finished his schoolwork, he thought he'd surprise his mother by cleaning up the dishes. It just slipped from soapy talons. When those same talons touched his sore eye again, they came away wet. He just wanted to help.

"He's six. He's going to break things now and again."

"I work hard enough all day. I don't need to come home to his messes. You've got to get me off this filthy pit of a rock, Terrus!" His mari's voice ripped through the entire domin, its talons shredding everything it touched. He winced away from those knives even as they sliced into the soft center of him. "Everyday, I tell you that I'm going mad trapped here, and I beg you to get me out of buratrum, and every day, all you give me is excuses. What happened to the proud warrior I bonded? That torin would never have dragged his mate to the end of the galaxy to die in some festering hole."

"Mallea," his pari's soft, resigned sigh cut deeper than his mari's raging, "you know I'd make half as much on Palaven. If we're prudent, by the time Nihlus is fifteen, we'll have enough set by to return so he can enter the academy."

"That mewling spawn of yours is the reason we don't even have enough to turn this tarc-riddled hovel into a decent domin." Venom dripped from every word, turning the air so toxic that Nihlus choked on it.
He jumped as something smashed into his door, crying out with the tiny, doomed squeal of a preteril in maraquil talons. He glanced toward the window, his flight response insisting that he run ... get as far away as he could. All his carefully contained tears bullied their way out into the dark, rolling thick and heavy down his face. Curling in on himself, he knew he'd never run; he had nowhere to go. Besides, he couldn't leave his pari. Maybe if he became very small, she might forget he existed. Maybe then she wouldn't be so angry and mean.

"Nihlus is not to blame for your malcontent, Mallea. He's a good perir, and he's ours, not mine."

"Your golus forcing him into me and his forcing his way out does not make him my pahir."

His mari's words yanked out a whimpered keen. The sound echoed, too loud, and the angry words on the other side of the door stalled. Footsteps approached. He jumped up, ran two steps, and leaped onto the mattress, the stuffing of dry vetri pods crackling beneath his weight. Lying with his back to the door, he burrowed into his blankets.

That was when he saw it, a silver form standing next to his window. He sat up, ready to run for his pari, but then he stopped. Something about the being seeming very familiar, like a rock or tree that you walk by every day, but never really look at. Then, one day you look and can't remember if is new or been there the whole time. The light from the moons glowed off the being's skin, pale and glistening like the scales of his pet merillien, Itia. In the corner, the tiny avian trilled a welcome as the door opened and his pari stepped through.

"What are you still doing awake, Nihlus?" His pari crossed the floor, the torin's tread slow and uneven. "You should have been asleep hours ago."

When his pari stopped next to the bed, Nihlus turned and looked up. "I can't sleep." His mandibles flicked in a hopeful smile. "Will you stay with me?"

"I can't, you know how your mari is." Gentle talons touched his brow, easing him down onto his pillows. "Just close your eyes; you'll drift off before you know it." His pari smiled and straightened. "I'll see you in the morning. We have a big day tomorrow. Derrios said he'd pay you for every nugget you find, remember?"

He nodded and watched after his pari, slow tears still rolling down his face. He knew his pari loved him, but in the gloom behind the closed door, the old longing grew. He waited a few seconds to be sure the door was staying shut then sat up and looked toward the window. The silver being remained, unmoving and oddly comforting. Hope and awe ... and a little fear wriggled through him, all fighting to be the first in line.

"Regil?" He winced at the way his whispered greeting seemed to explode through the silence. Disobedience would summon his mari, and where his pari touched, his mari hit.

As if summoned, his mari began to shout again. He held his breath, waiting, but she remained on the other side of the door. That threat vanishing, he fixed his attention on the wondrous being. It stood next to the shelving unit that held his meager but much-loved collection of toys, staying so still that it looked like a large doll.

Then it spoke, shattering the illusion. "Hello." The being's lips curled, and it showed its teeth, contradicting the gentleness of its voice. It stepped toward him, hands reaching out when he winced away from it, his fear winning. "It's all right. I'm a friend. I won't hurt you."

He frowned a little. The being's voice sounded flat and feminine, like the asari he'd seen in vids. Also like an asari, its hand had five talons but small and blunt. "What are you?" he asked, curiosity pushing its way into the fray.

It showed its teeth again, but that time, the display didn't worry him. It … she smiled like the asari as well. She took another step, the smile widening. "Hello, Nihlus."

He straightened, but frowned. How did she know his name? "Can you hear thoughts?" That idea made his belly flop. What if she did? Could she see the terrible ugliness that made him so unlovable? Surely someone so beautiful would find him ugly and hateful.

Instead, she shook her head. "No." She walked over to the side of his bed and bent down, gentle fingers touching his cheek. "Your pari called you by name." Gesturing toward his bed, she asked, "May I sit?"

Heat crept up his neck, making him grateful for the darkness as he nodded, his heart pounding against his keel. Now, she'd think him stupid. Of course she'd just heard his name. His mari was right. He was a stupid little perir.

"Thank you." Another smile flashed her teeth. "You're a very brave young fellow. I don't think I'd be as brave as you if a strange-looking alien just showed up in my bedroom in the middle of the night." She reached out a hand to touch his shoulder, the contact gentle. "Now, to answer your question, I'm a female human. You won't see any more of my people for a few cycles yet. We're just starting to explore space."

"Are you real?" The moment he blurted out the question, he longed to pull it back in. If she didn't think him a stupid baby before, asking things like that would change her mind.

"As real as you," she said, her voice reassuring. She looked toward the door as the shouting grew more shrill and something else crashed. "That's quite the fuss."

He nodded, his stare leaving her face, falling to his blankets. "It's because of me." A soft keen drifted beneath his words, the tears starting again. "I ruin everything."

"Now, how could someone so small and so brave ruin anything at all?" Her finger lifted his chin until he looked into her eyes once more. "I don't believe it. In fact, you know what? I think, one day, you're going to do great things." She gripped his shoulders in her hands. "May I give you a hug?"

Brow plates pulling down low, he frowned at her. "Hug?" he asked, drawing back a little. "Will it hurt?"

Her strange, soft face smiled at him again. "No, it won't hurt at all. It's how my people comfort one another and show friendship and affection."

The old longing sang, a brilliant cascade of joy and hope and colour. Normally, he avoided strangers, but something about this spirit told him she wasn't a stranger … as if she'd been by his side his entire life. And so he nodded and cleared his throat, making sure none of his excitement escaped. "Okay."

She pulled him in close against her body and wrapped gentle arms around him. "There, see. Doesn't hurt at all." She rocked him a little. "Shush now. No more tears."

For a second, he froze, unsure about the closeness of the contact or the tightness of her grip on him. Then her warmth began to soak through his nightclothes and into his plates. Tentative, he reciprocated the embrace, slipping his arms around her and relaxing into her softness. The tears dried from his face as he rested his cheek against her arm.
"She hates me," he whispered, trying not to let the tears start again. If he cried, she might pull away. The old longing had finally discovered a name and satisfaction, and he didn't want to lose it so soon.

Her grip on him tightened a little, allowing him to snuggle in closer. "She doesn't hate you, sweetie." Her sigh brushed over his fringe. "Have you ever been so unhappy that you just needed to blame something for it, even if it wasn't actually to blame?"

He thought about that for a second, then shook his head. "I'm six."

She chuckled, the sound as bright as sunshine as it warmed him all the way through. His mandibles fluttered in an eager, astonished smile; how had someone so … his vocabulary failed him … how had someone like her found him?

She rubbed his back. "You're very cheeky for someone so small. I like it."

He giggled, wriggling a little as she tickled his side.

Letting out a long breath, she hugged him tight. "Your mari is just unhappy, Nihlus, and it doesn't really have anything to do with you or your pari." He relaxed into her, a new and precious seed sprouting inside him. As her hand rubbed gentle circles on his cowl, he felt the sprout start to grow … pretty, but too new to name. Her cheek pressed to the top of his head, tussat-soft. "Just try to remember that under all that unhappiness, she loves you. She just doesn't know how to show it."

Her hands slipped to his shoulders and eased him away until their eyes met in the dark. "Okay?"

"Okay." He snatched for her hand as she stood. No! She couldn't leave. It was too soon. Too soon for her to take away her soft comfort and gentle hands. "Please. Will you stay with me until I fall asleep?"

She smiled and sank back. He grinned as his bed shifted, the stuffing crackling under her weight. Settling in, she said, "Okay. Lie down, get all tucked in." Humming softly, she nodded for him to pull his blankets up to his chin. "Close your eyes."

Doing as she said, he snuggled down into the warmth of his bed, mandibles fluttering happily as he gripped her hand tight and listened to the strange, pretty sound of her voice. "What's your name?"

"I'm Jane." Her other hand brushed his cheek, her voice lilting, not at all stern as she said, "Now go to sleep."

Nihlus opened one eye. "Will I see you again?"

She nodded and leaned down, pressing her mouth to his brow. "We're going to be great friends." Laughing, she tapped the end of his nose with a fingertip. "Sleep! You heard your pari … big day tomorrow."

He smiled, certain that he'd never be able to fall asleep. Not with so many questions left to ask. Would he truly see her the next day? Dare he wish that they'd be friends, he and this gentle, alien spirit?

…

Their memories danced, swirling and weaving into one another. Shepard resolved to remain in the shadows and not to intrude upon Nihlus's privacy. However, watching that beautiful child starve to death for want of comfort—even a scrap of contact—proved too much for her heart and she stepped out of the shadows. Once she'd looked deeply into those sad, green eyes, she had little choice but to keep her hand wrapped tightly around his through the cycles.

"Anomaly detected. Data corrupted. Partition and upload to primary mainframe for further study."

The machine's voice shattered whatever kept the analytical part of their minds locked down. Freed, the entity that was Shepard and Nihlus's combined minds set to the task of finding a way out. The only thing they could think of was finding an answer to the question. Of course, that necessitated finding out what the damned question was. Perhaps the only way to discover the question was to extrapolate it from the answers … the data.

The data! Data was corrupted. Of course it was corrupted. They doubted that the machine had been programmed to deal with more than one subject at a time. It was the beacon all over again.

In case of capture and pending disintegration, break glass. Go, Nihlus, you sledgehammer.

But the machine held hundreds of thousands of entries on asari subjects, but never any other race. What could the machine possibly gain from analyzing the two of them? Unless of course, the question was broader rather than species specific, and the data related to that lie elsewhere … in this primary mainframe.

Their thoughts raced. At the speed the machine was going through their memories, they could have mere seconds before the process moved on to their cognitive selves, or turning their bodies into paste.

Think, dammit, think. Two heads are supposed to be better than one.

...

Rain pissed down so thick Nihlus could barely see the entrance to the mine thirty metres away. The downpour had soaked him to the hide three steps from the school door, drenching him in freezing cold misery … the soul of that damned rock made manifest. As if he needed a more visceral reminder than the grim, drawn ugliness of his mother's rage, unabated day in and day out over the cycles.

And now …

Yanking him from his schoolwork as the mine's siren blared, panic had thrown him across the settlement at a dead sprint. When he arrived and tried to enter—he needed to get in there, needed to help—the mine foreman and his pari's best friend had wrestled him to the ground, trying to explain what happened to ears deafened by pain.

And now, the chill, desolate rain flowed in rivers between his plates and cut canyons through the mud squelching between his talons. Some small, sensical part of his brain told him to get under shelter, but the rage and agony roared so much louder, drowning out every thought but one. He stared down the slope of dank, greasy sludge without blinking. His eyes burned, blind to everything but the flapping tail of the emergency tape, brilliant crimson against the grey.

Why him? Why the only person who has ever loved me?

She approached. Of course she did.

One of the two people who have ever loved me.

Over the cycles, she'd never failed him. Too bad that devotion hadn't extended to his pari. Would it have broken some immutable law of the tarc-infested universe for her to have warned Terrus Kryik that he was about to leave his pahir alone?

Feeling her walking up behind him, he closed his eyes and walled up his anger. Someone deserved to feel its lash, but not her. She moved silently, but after nearly ten cycles of her presence, he always knew when she drew near, her energy as familiar to him as his own.

"They're trying to dig my pari out," he said, keeping his voice too soft to be heard over the rain.
Nonetheless, he knew she heard him. A keen of combined rage and sorrow spooled in his throat, a ball of razor wire threatening to explode and rip him to shreds. "His machine malfunctioned and brought down a support." He turned to look into her eyes, seeing an echo of his grief mirrored in her red, glistening gaze. Tears traced shining paths over her pale skin. He looked back at the entrance to the mine. "At least, that's what the foreman said."

Her hand slipped into his, dry and warm, the rain not touching her. For a moment, his anger struck out again. Why didn't anything touch her? Why did she get to sail above the horror and ugliness of life while it swallowed him whole?

She spoke, the love resonating through her voice tempering his resentment. "I'm so sorry, Nihlus. I know how much you loved him, and I know that you were his whole world." She squeezed his fingers, then released him and held out her arms.

Shaking his head, he backed away, talons slipping in the greasy mud. Shame and guilt ripped through him at her words, their truth the cruelest wound. "I treated him like such tarc this last cycle," he shouted, spewing a massive abscess that dripped agony like pus. His keen escaped, riding his self-loathing to freedom. "I was embarrassed of my crippled pari … didn't speak to him any more." He swallowed, another keen breaking loose. "I pretended not to know him in public." Slamming a fist into his keel, he spun away from her. "So lautus and arrogant."

She wrapped her arms around him, tugging him into her embrace. "You're fourteen and trying to figure out who you are. Don't be too hard on yourself, Nihlus. Your pari understood, and he knew you loved him. He did." When he tried to pull away, she just gripped him tighter.

Unlike when she'd held him even a cycle before, he towered more than a head taller and had to bend down to return the embrace. "I did," he whispered, turning his face into the curve of her neck.
"I do." He gripped her tight. "Please tell me they'll get him out."

She just kissed his cheek. "You'll be okay, no matter what. You're strong, and you'll be okay."

Silent tears soaked her shoulder. Strange how his tears touched her where the rain and mud didn't.
The fact that they did and that he felt her tears cool and wet against his hide helped ease the pain enough that he pulled away. Sucking in deep breaths, her arm tight and warm around his waist, he waited, shoring himself up against the inevitable. She wouldn't leave him. No matter what came, he knew that she'd stick with him and somehow, with her arms around him, he'd pull through.

Before the foreman even made it up the hill, the mud rose up to smack Nihlus in the knees, the look on the torin's face telling the horrible truth. Jane knelt next to him, her arms wrapped around his neck as the foreman explained that he'd never get a chance to right all the wrongs he'd committed against the torin who'd given him life.

"Come and get dry," Jane said, her voice soft. She pressed her cheek against his. "They said it will be hours yet." When he just shook his head and wrapped his arms around her, she sighed. "Stop punishing yourself for things that aren't your fault, Nihlus."
He pulled away, but she grasped his face between her hands and forced him to meet her gaze. "Would your pari want this? Would he want you out here sitting in the freezing cold mud ripping yourself to shreds?"

Letting out a long sigh, he slumped and shook his head. "That's not fair."

"Yeah." She shrugged. "But not much about love is." She gathered him back into her arms. "Remember the love, Nihlus, and let the rest go. That is what will truly honour the torin he was. He wanted the best for you. Now it's up to you to make sure he gets what he wants." She released him and stood, reaching a hand down to help him up. "Come on. As soon as you're dry and warm, we'll come back and wait in the crew house."

When he took her hand, Nihlus pressed her palm against his mandible. "Thank you," he said, layering everything she meant to him through his subvocals.

As he knew she would, Jane stayed pressed to his side when the miners pulled his father out of the rubble, at the funeral, and through the terrible days and weeks that followed. His mother withdrew him from classes, and he took his father's shift in the mine, but digging by hand. Jane stayed with him even there, and he thanked the universe for that tiny, brilliant diamond of a miracle shining amidst the tarc.

…

Shepard and Nihlus lunged up out of the young torin's grief like drowning swimmers clawing at the surface, inhaling as much water as air. As they struggled to break free, to apply reason through the deluge of emotion, the dim light of a pattern began to glimmer.

The machine hadn't started breaking them down physically, and the fact the logical cognitive processes had been locked down suggested that they didn't hold immediate interest. Instead, the machine had gone straight for their memories. Why their memories? The day to day, even the gruesome, exhilarating and tragic events were just moments in time. Unless they weren't after the memories for their own sake, but rather for their emotional content.

_You never truly know someone until you've walked a mile in their shoes?_

… or a lifetime. Suddenly, what the Reapers may have needed from Tashac became clearer: the prothean ability to impart their entire self through touch and to read others the same way. The Collectors on Ilos had also hooked into Vigil. Perhaps they'd been seeking more than a way to transmit the Conduit's location.

And Saren gathering up the beacons perhaps as much for what they contained as for clues to the Conduit. He'd also needed the Thorian to get the cipher, but what if there was more to melding with the Thorian than that? It was a sapient plant … a completely unique life form as far as they knew. Had the indoctrinated Spectre also been trying to solve this question?

_Okay, rein it in … we're getting overexcited and ahead of ourselves._

Right, so what did the machine want to see in their pasts? She'd witnessed Nihlus's first six years in a quick flash of perception, but the machine didn't pause to examine anything until the night he huddled next to his bedroom door, listening to his mother blame him for her misery. Something in that child and his loneliness, his fear and guilt, his aching for connection called to the computer's programming just as it had called to her.

And then, the machine had paused on the death of Nihlus's father, his only tie to love, his anchor.
As his loneliness had, his grief … the horrible grief and emptiness, darker even than the vacuum between stars, called to Shepard, insisting that she remain at his side as he moved from perir to torin.

Secondary data recorded. File: Compassion. Filter appropriately. Send data directly to primary mainframe.

...

Jane swiped the rain and tears from her eyes and looked up at the sky. The clouds darkened toward black, the weight of the huge, angry sky pressing down to squash her the way Bradley Buckler crushed ants under rocks. Sniffling back a head full of snot, she bullied her frightened tears into submission, hoisted her small backpack a little higher, and pressed on. She'd just turned seven, far too big to snivel like a baby just because she was lost. Instead of crying, she needed to find somewhere out of the rain and wait for her parents to come looking for her.

"Go to the woods. There are some big pine trees just at the edge."

Spinning around, Jane searched for the source of the familiar voice, not surprised when she didn't see anyone. Her friend didn't always show himself, blending into the shadows or the rain like a ghost. He wasn't a ghost, though. Even though he looked a little strange, mostly invisible most of the time, and when he wasn't, he looked like the aliens in the vids, he wasn't scary at all. In fact, she knew the baby Jesus had sent him to look after her like in the bible stories her mother read to her. He even had wings, although his were painted not feathers, and on his face rather than on his back like regular angels.

"Where are you?" Clutching her jacket tight around her, Jane obeyed the voice. She couldn't stop shivering, and her teeth sounded like the wind up ones in the cartoons. That meant she needed to get dry and keep warm. Daddy had taught her that when they went camping. Hippo … term … something.

"I'm right here," her friend said, his voice close, but muffled by the rain pounding off the hood of her jacket. "And the forest is just at the top of the hill."

Jane dug back into the climb, the slope so steep and slick that she needed to scramble up on all fours. As she climbed, her backpack slipped around to smack her in the head, first one side then the other. Finally, panting for breath and covered in mud, she reached the top of the hill and turned to look over the valley.

Once she realized that she was lost, she decided to climb the biggest hill she could find hoping to see the castle where she'd lost her parents. It had taken her too long to climb, though, and it was so dark that she couldn't even see the sheep grazing along the slope.

"Go on, get to the forest. It's too dark to find your way back now. It was a smart plan, though. Good thinking. You paid attention to all those lessons your father taught you."

She nodded. "Daddy's lessons are fun." As much as she trusted her invisible friend, when she turned to look at the black mass of trees, her guts gave out. It would be so dark and scary in there, and all she had was the little keychain flashlight hanging from her jacket zipper. She'd never been to Earth before; what if ferocious animals lurked in the trees? Scratching her backside—stupid wet, itchy underwear—she backed away a few steps. Despite being too old to believe in fairy tales and monsters, she'd heard an old man at the last castle telling stories about all sorts of monsters and strange creatures that haunted places like that. He sounded like he knew what he was talking about, and he said people went in and never came out.
"I don't want to go in there, it's too dark," she whispered, her heart fluttering like the wings of the hummingbird who ate from the feeder in her window. "I want Daddy. Please help me find my daddy." Tears sprang into her eyes again, and that time, she let them fall. No one could see them in the rain. "I want to go home."

"I know you're scared, Janey, and I promise that I'll get you back to your daddy, but for now, we need to get you dry and warm." A big, warm hand closed around hers.

Jane's heart leaped into her throat, forcing out a bleat of fear. Scrambling backwards, she looked up … so far up. When she recognized the face with its white wings, she let out a growl of combined terror and embarrassment. "Nihlus! You scared me!" She punched his leg. "Big dummy."

When he chuckled and crouched down, she let out a jittery sigh and smiled, a slow grin of relief. She'd be okay now. Nihlus would look after her. He always had, all the way back to when he sat beside her crib, rubbing her back and telling her stories when she was sick. She didn't remember what the stories were about, but she remembered how safe she'd felt.

He reached up to brush her cheek with a knuckle, then offered his arms for a hug, his body solidifying next to her. "I'm sorry, I forgot I'm hard to see in the rain." He smiled as she stepped into his embrace and wrapped her arms around his neck. "That's better. Don't worry, I'll stay with you, and once you've stopped shivering, we'll get you back to your parents." His arms held her tight, strong and warm.

Pushing her back, he held her at arm's length, his smile as warm as his hug. "You've been very brave and doing all the right things. Your daddy will be very proud. Can you be brave for a little while longer?"

Jane swallowed her tears and nodded. She was very brave. Daddy told her that all the time. Too brave, he teased when she got herself into trouble.

"Good." Nihlus took her hand again, her fingers so very small engulfed in his long talons. "Your parents and about half the county are searching for you, but you're too cold to walk that far."

Straightening, he turned toward the forest, tugging gently on her hand.

"Daddy's going to be mad. He told me not to wander off." As her imagination formed the image of her mother's anger, she let out a long sigh. She probably wouldn't be allowed to leave her room for the rest of forever. "I'll never be bad again."

Looking down at her, Nihlus grinned, his mandibles flicking hard. "I sure hope that's not true." He tugged her in close and wrapped his arm around her, his hand almost as wide as her back. She leaned in close; he was so warm! "You didn't mean to get lost, did you?"

Jane shook her head, eyes wide as she stared up at him. He had to believe her. She really hadn't meant to be bad at all. "I didn't, honest. I went to look at the sheep. The lambs were so cute and wanted to play tag. I only played with them for a few minutes, and then I heard Daddy calling me, but I couldn't find my way back. It sounded like his voice was everywhere."

He nodded and shrugged. "Then, there's nothing to be sorry for, is there? Your parents will understand."

"Mother will be mad. She said that I've been nothing but trouble since we got here." She sighed and slumped along beside him. New tears fell in anticipation of her mother's scolding. "She said I'm an … ungrateful wretch, and a good girl would stand still and pay attention. But I can't help it. I try, but all we do is stand and stare at paintings while Mother talks about them."
Nihlus chuckled, lowering his voice to a secret whisper as he said, "I was falling asleep standing up ten minutes after we got to the first gallery." He squeezed her a little closer. "And you did an excellent dramatic reenactment of a starving child dying in the hallway on the way to breakfast this morning."

Jane wailed a little as she exclaimed, "Yesterday, my eggs were covered in slime and stared at me. And the peanut butter is all gritty and has oil on the top. Gross." She wiped her face again and sniffed. "You don't think I'm bad?"

"Oh, you're definitely bad, but almost all the really interesting people I know are at least a little bad some of the time." He stopped, and Jane looked up at the biggest pine tree she'd ever seen.

"This would make the most beautiful Christmas tree," she whispered, awe squeezing the words as they came out of her throat. When Nihlus pulled aside some of the branches, she ducked down and crawled into the dry little fort around the trunk. For a moment, she just clicked on her flashlight and sat there, savouring the respite from the rain, but then Nihlus crawled under, and she moved aside, making room.

"Okay," he said once he got settled, sitting cross-legged in the soft carpet of needles, "Let's get you out of as many wet layers as we can." He helped her wriggle out of her backpack, then with the tie and zipper on her jacket. He looked inside the jacket. "Soaked through." He hung it from a branch then nodded toward her backpack. "Let's see if your mother was her usual, thorough self when she packed that bag of yours."

Jane wrestled with the buckles for a moment, but her hands were frozen stiff. Nihlus took them between both of his and held them to his mouth, blowing on them until they warmed up. "Thank you," she squeaked and then opened the buckles and zipper. A sweater sat on top, then jeans, and a shirt, then two pairs of underwear and socks on the bottom along with a couple of fruit filled snack bars and a bottle of water.

"When you get back to your mother, you are going to give her a hug and thank her for taking such good care of you." He held up her jacket to act as a curtain while she wriggled out of her wet clothes and replaced them with the dry ones. When she was done, he held out his arms, inviting her onto his lap. "Best way to get warm is to snuggle."

Jane grinned and curled up in his arms, her tiny flashlight illuminating their snug little shelter. He draped her sweater over her like a blanket, then wrapped his arms around her, holding her tight. As her guardian angel's heat began to seep through her clothing, she sighed and closed her eyes. "Will you tell me a story like you used to when I was little?"

Nihlus gave her a squeeze. "To me, you're still little. I can fit all of you in my arms. But ... " His chuckle brightened the shelter more than her light and made it feel both safe and cozy. "... I will tell you a story. Do you remember the story of Callor the Wise?"

"Nope." Jane curled in tight, her head cradled inside his cowl as she tucked it under his jaw. She snuggled into him, completely content and safe. "Thank you for finding me," she whispered, a huge yawn following the words.

Nihlus nuzzled the top of her head, his strange version of a kiss making her giggle. "I'll always find you, and I'll always protect you the very best I can," he promised in a soft whisper. "It doesn't matter how lost you get or how big a fight you face, I'll never leave your side, haksaya kubenar."

Jane looked up through slitted eyes, giving him a sleepy smile. "That's pretty. What does it mean?"
"It means, 'my strong, true heart'." He nuzzled her again. "Close your eyes. Stories are always better with your eyes closed. When you wake up, your parents will be here."

Even as Jane began to drift off, she whispered, "I love you, Nihlus. I'm glad the baby Jesus sent you to be my guardian angel."

A rough cheek brushed her hair. "I love you, too. Now, do you want this story or not?"

...

Compassion as secondary data. That seemed to confirm their theory.

But why had the machine flagged Shepard's memory of being lost? Certainly, Shepard had been afraid, but her father had taught her well, and her mother always packed her backpack with emergency supplies. Jane had climbed the hill, crawled under the tree, changed and buried herself in a thick pile of needles to keep warm. She'd suffered through more frightening moments even as a young child.

So why that memory? Maybe it wasn't about Shepard. They were both caught in the machine, both being dismantled from the soul out, their memories and emotions as tangled as their thoughts. Perhaps the machine wanted to test something else. But that meant … the computer and machine weren't just about data collection. An intelligence lay behind it capable of running experiments on its specimens and changing the conditions.

And if that was the case, their captor had chosen that memory to test Nihlus's reaction.

As if answering the question, the computer intoned, "Altering input parameters to test viability: dual subjects. Accepting new data. Hypothesis uploaded to primary mainframe for analysis."

Fear exploded from them both, flaring bright and needle sharp for a second before cooling into anger and solidifying into resolve.

We aren't lab rats, you bastards. You'll discover that soon enough.

We're baaaack. This was originally a much longer chapter, but I figured 12K was pushing the long chapter thing, so the second half will post on Thursday. Thanks so much for your patience while I took some time to make sure I had my ducks in a row. They are still running everywhere, but I have a better handle on them now. Thanks as always for reading. hugs to all

A few people have asked if there is some way to support my writing efforts, so reluctantly, because I really don't want people to feel they must … here is a link to my Patreon account. I use the pledges to commission art for the story. :D

https://www.patreon.com/user?u=893907&ty=h&u=893907
Nihlus sucked in a quick breath, the air razor sharp, slicing its way down. Damn. Batarians. So soon? His heart dropped as he ran the math, and it threw his denial back in his face. Jane was just about to turn sixteen. He stepped forward out of the shadows. Despite knowing it was a memory and unchangeable, there had to be something he could do. Or maybe … maybe he should just … .

Chapter Notes

Trigger Warning: Although I don't mention any details, this chapter deals with Shepard's experience on Mindoir, so warning for implied rape and torture in the section after the first ... to the second ... The rest of the chapter is trigger free.

Nais - (pronounced nah-ees) Asari above the age of majority (75 cycles)

36 Days ASR

Logic and reason became harder and harder for them to keep hold of as Jane sensed the years passing, drawing them closer to the event the machine wouldn't just flag, but devour like a shark in a feeding frenzy. No! The denial came from them both. Whoever hid behind the tar-black spiders and the orbs had tortured her with those hours and years more than enough. They tried to withdraw, to take refuge from it, but the machine left no place to hide … no solace in any of her usual retreats. Odd how people always called flesh weak when it provided so much cushion, so much strength.

And yet, he surrounded and intertwined with her, providing a thin barrier to keep the pain at bay. Thin, yes, but perhaps thick enough that she could face it … just one more time.

If ever there was a time for a guardian angel, it's now.

...

The darkness shrouded Nihlus, disguising his constant presence. A chill breeze blew through the open window, but just as the rain didn't touch Shepard in his memories, the cold didn't penetrate. He sat in the corner of Jane's room, his arms wrapped around his legs, head back, eyes closed. Pulling in a deep breath, he savoured the sweet scents of spring and the soft sounds of the young woman settling to sleep a couple of metres away.

Where he'd grown up surrounded by mud and rock and soot, she'd grown up amidst forest and grass and the meadow flowers that she wore woven through the fierce red of her hair. Feeling no envy or bitterness, he simply revelled in the wildness of her … and sympathized a little with her mother. For all her bluster, the woman shone love from every pore, and Jane truly had been born to test the patience of everyone who loved her.
Unlike Shepard's broken oath to remain distant, Nihlus had insinuated himself into her memories practically from the moment she'd entered the world, screaming and purple, her head already covered with a renegade shock of bright red. He cherished every moment as a gift, a chance to be a part—albeit an invisible one—of a loving, beautiful family.

The sound of bare feet padding over the hardwood pulled him from his thoughts. He grinned as they hesitated for a moment at the threshold of Jane's room. He suspected that Bunny had been the universe's attempt to give Jane a mild dose of her own medicine.

"Janey?" When the child didn't get an answer, the footsteps continued across the metre of floor, stopping at the edge of the bed. "Janey?"

Moonlight glinted in one half-open eye, then Jane sighed. "Your dolls aren't staring at you, Bunny, and I'm not going into your room to check. Those things freak the crap out of me, you know they do." Nihlus's smile widened as Jane glared at the adorably earnest face staring at her from less than a hand's width away. The teenager grumbled, finally giving in to lean up and face her sister. "Maybe, if you didn't rescue every creepy, broken doll in the known universe to nurse it back to health, you wouldn't have this problem."

"I was asleep, honest," the child insisted. "But there's a monster in the house. I saw it downstairs. It has four eyes."

Nihlus sucked in a quick breath, the air razor sharp, slicing its way down. Damn. Batarians. So soon? His heart dropped as he ran the math, and it threw his denial back in his face. Jane was just about to turn sixteen. He stepped forward out of the shadows. Despite knowing it was a memory and unchangeable, there had to be something he could do. Or maybe … maybe he should just … .

Damn it, knowing that she'd suffered it was bad enough. To watch her go through it … .

No! Even if it was memory and he couldn't change what happened, this time she wouldn't suffer through it alone. He could endure it for her.

"There's no such thing as—" A crash from the main floor stopped Jane's protest. She sat up, covers clutched to her chest, and called out, "Mom? Dad?" The words drifted pale and helpless into the darkness, the brash teen returning to childhood from one breath to the next.

A shriek of mingled pain and rage—Lucy—ripped through the darkness. Jane let out an answering cry, fragile and helpless. She threw back her covers and scrambled off the bed, snatching Bunny's hand in a grip so tight, her knuckles shone white in the moonlight.

For a moment, they stood frozen, terrified into place as they watched the door. Despite his gut knowing better, Nihlus found himself watching, hoping that Franklin would appear at the top of the stairs with some sort of rational, non-batarian slaver explanation.

Then Jane whirled around to face him. "Nihlus, what do I do?" she asked, looking to him with the same trust and love as she always had.

He took a quick, deep breath and nodded. All right. He'd promised to protect her, and while he might not be able to save her, he could fucking well try. "You need to run!" he said, keeping his voice strong and commanding, its subvocals warm.

"Janey?" Bunny squealed, so shrill and loud that the intruders below couldn't help but hear it. They needed to get out! The squeal upgraded to a scream. "'Where's Daddy? I want Mommy!"

"They'll know you're here." Nihlus ran to the window, but his hands passed through the screen. A rough growl of frustration rolling from his throat, he spun back, waving her over. "You'll have to do it. Come! Quickly! Your parents are buying you time to get out!"

Instead of moving toward him, Jane stopped, turning to face the thunder of running feet on the stairs. Nihlus leaped to grab her hand and drag her to the window, but then her father raced down the hall and in the door. Both Jane and Bunny let out soft bleats of relief that wrapped a sorrowful garrotte around Nihlus's throat. If only Franklin possessed the power to protect them the way they believed. If only hell wasn't roaring up the stairs behind him, just two heartbeats away.

"Daddy?" Jane's bare foot slid forward a single step, all her usual vivacious energy folding into wide-eyed docility.

Her father slammed the bedroom door and locked it. "Get to the window," he shouted, his voice hitting a hard enough blow that she stumbled away from it. Franklin grabbed the chair from under Jane's desk and jammed it under the doorknob. It would buy them only seconds, but … maybe …. He jerked his head toward the window. "Hurry!"

Finally doing as she was told, Jane ran over and yanked the screen out. Nihlus steadied her as she lifted Bunny through onto the roof, then gripped her elbow to help lift her out. Pounding fists rattled the door on it's hinges.

Her father's hand grabbed her other arm, and between them they practically threw Jane through the portal onto the shingles. Nihlus clambered through on her heels, taking advantage of being able to just walk through everything but Jane.

Behind him, Franklin whispered, "Run to the woods. Head for the big rock across the creek. Hide.
We'll come for you when we can." Nihlus heard the door start to give. "Move fast and keep to the shadows," their father called over his shoulder. "We'll come for you."

Jane hesitated, looking on the verge of turning back. "Dad? Daddy . . . why . . . what's going on?"
Nihlus grabbed her hand, pulling her the other way. Why wouldn't she just do as she was told?

Inside the room, the door gave way with a crash. "Run!" her father bellowed, the single word lost as Bunny began screaming. Nihlus didn't wait to see what happened inside. Jane could figure things out as he dragged her across the settlement. He allowed her to pause long enough to snap Bunny's hand, then they both hauled the wailing child to the eaves.

"Run and don't—" A muffled crunching sound accompanied a thick, wet scream ... a broken sound Nihlus knew all too well. Franklin's fight was behind him until he regained consciousness, maybe not even then, depending on the severity of his broken jaw. Behind him, Jane vomited down the front of her pyjamas, but Nihlus didn't let her stop. She'd face a lot worse if he didn't get them out of there.

It took about ten seconds for one of the batarians to climb out the window. Nihlus didn't look back, but the struggle and cursing told the tale of large male trying to squeeze through small space. Jane yelped, the sound as furious as it was startled, and when Nihlus looked back, she'd latched her teeth into the batarian's hand. Blood stained her nightshirt where the slaver had grabbed her, sharp talons piercing her skin, but a hell of a lot more blood poured down her chin.

"Let him go, Jane," Nihlus snapped, proud that her fight had kicked in, but losing patience with the endless stream of delays. It hadn't been more than four or five minutes since Bunny said there were monsters, but it felt like a half hour had dragged past. "The two of us can't fight every slaver on Mindoir."
The command in his voice snapped her back, and she nodded, running the last few steps to the edge of the roof. Across the street, a woman raced out her front door, screaming bloody hell while three batarians tore the nightdress off her back and dragged her into the dark.

Nihlus shoved aside the ten different emotions threatening to rip him into varren bait and dropped face down onto the shingles. "I'll lower you," he called, waving Jane over. The batarian was still holding his nearly severed thumb and howling, but he wouldn't be for long.

The teenager gulped a couple of times and spat a huge gob of blood out onto the slate as she crouched, dropping her legs over the side before rolling over and grabbing his hands. Below and behind her, gunfire pounded out a brutal beat that kept people marching down the street, their heads bowed, cowed and passive before their captors.

Jane left her hands raised when her feet touched down. "Come on, Bunny. Jump. I'll catch you."

"Come on, little one, you can do it. That's a girl," Nihlus whispered as Bunny lowered herself, little feet kicking as she wriggled over the edge.

"Good girl, that's the way," Jane called in a hoarse whisper, encouraging her. "Okay, you're only a few centimetres away from my hands, just let go." Nihlus spun when Jane whined a little under her breath, and he heard the slaver working his way down the roof. Damn it. He clenched his fists and placed himself between the slaver and the child despite knowing it was pointless. He was useless.

"Come on, baby, you know I won't let you fall," Jane pleaded.

Bunny let go, landing heavy and awkward. Finally! Nihlus leaped down, landing nimbly next to Jane, his energy taut, alert, and frustrated. He wrapped an arm around her, leading them into the shadows as soon as Bunny's feet touched grass. The moment Jane caught her balance, she took off, racing between houses, as quick and silent as she could manage dragging her baby sister along.

Nihlus sprinted ahead and behind, reporting slaver patrols back then dashing off in another direction. If it came to a fight, he couldn't help … hell, he couldn't even scoop Bunny up and carry her. Being helpless to save them from the horrors coming for them filled him with a panic he'd never experienced. A fear that insisted that he run, spare himself what was to come. Jane had already suffered the reality and lived with the memory since. His avoiding it would change nothing.

Except … he'd never be able to look her in the eye again. He'd never be able to look himself in the eye again. How could he claim to love her if he abandoned her? So he raced back and forth, leading them along the clearest path through the settlement. Once they broke free of the houses, they left the streetlights and screaming behind. The ground was soft and wet along the trail, and the prints of two barefoot girls wouldn't be a challenge to track, but leaving the path would slow them to a—

Bunny stumbled and fell face down in a bawling heap. "Slow down," the child wailed, tiny fists pounding at the mud. "Where's Mommy and Daddy?" Holding up a heavily bleeding hand, she screamed, "Janey, I want Mommy!"

Nihlus paced as Jane bent to lift the child onto her feet. "They'll meet us at the rock." She kissed the cut across the child's palm. "Come on, we're just about to the creek."

Nihlus listened for Jane's breathing as she spoke. Her breaths came quick and deep, but not exhausted; she still had lots of run left in her. They just needed to keep Bunny moving.
"You can do it. Just keep running." Jane and Nihlus spun in unison, her eyes holding his for a second before they both drew in a long breath and dug in.

"Look what we've got here."

Nihlus's heart stopped as a shadow unfolded from the darkness shrouding the path ahead. Damn it! Where had the bastard come from? Nihlus threw himself between slaver and the two girls, cries of impotent rage lashing out alongside equally useless talons.

The large male laughed and lunged at the girls. "Thought you could outrun us, did you?"

Jane flung herself backwards and slipped, dragging Bunny to the ground along with her. Nihlus leaped after them. At least he could grab Jane, but her pyjama sleeves slipped through his talons. For the second time that night, the sickening crunch of breaking bone split the air. Bunny let out a squawk of pain, but just wrapped her arm around her belly and pressed close, seeking shelter in her big sister's side.

Two more batarians ran out onto the path, gasping and wheezing for air. Another one stepped out behind the first, all four of them moving in to circle their prey.

"He's going to take Bunny first," Nihlus said, crouching at Jane's side. His eyes darted, searching for an escape route. "You—" He clamped his teeth shut on the rest as the batarian reached down, lifting the five-year-old by the collar. What advice could he give? Leave Bunny and run? Fight back? What could Jane do against a squad of armed men?

"There's nothing you … ." Again Nihlus stopped himself. Had he really been about to tell her not to fight back, to just submit and maybe spare herself a couple of blows? That was rich fucking advice coming from the Spectre who couldn't do anything but stand by and watch it happen.

The leader looked Bunny over with an appraising eye. "Take this back to the cages for their street. I might keep her for myself" He shoved the five-year-old toward one of his compatriots. Then, cocking his head a little, he leered at Jane. Nihlus's talons twitched, begging to tear those eyes right out of the bastard's face.

"Come on, damn it! Think! There has to be something you can do. Anything."

But no. Fuck! Why did he keep forgetting that the horrendous things about to happen had already happened? And an amazing, powerful woman had grown out of them. It had already happened, and she'd pulled through. She'd made it. His vision blurred, and when he reached up to rub his eyes, his talons came away wet. He stared at them for a moment. Tears?

The batarian circled her, a pathetic scavenger sussing out whether its prey still possessed any fight. "Going to take a little time with this one." Sharp-taloned fingers stabbed into the tussled length of Jane's hair and yanked her off the ground. He shoved his face into hers, and gestured to the bastard holding Bunny, the slaver's free hand wrapped in a rag and clutched to his chest. "Like to bite, do you?" He bared his sharp, needle teeth. "Oh yeah, we've caught us a tasty looking piece of young meat here."

The one holding Bunny stepped forward, his expression an almost laughable combination of petulance and anger. "You sure you don't want me to stay, Remit? She looks like a fighter." He stalked Jane in a wide circle, his face twisting into an ugly sort of begging. "And I deserve a little payback." If Nihlus had been holding a gun, he'd have given him some payback … right between the eyes.
Nihlus winced as Remit's laugh rang, deep and vicious, off the thick forest surrounding the muddy trail. Try as he might to believe that it would be over and done quickly, that laugh said otherwise. The batarian spat in Jane's face, his dark stare looking past her. "You just want to stuff yours into whatever's left over. Ha! I guess you could call that payback."

Nihlus leaped forward again, fury roaring through his veins, molten magma that demanded action as the batarian forced Shepard's head back until she had no choice but to look into those soulless eyes. Rough fingers shoved themselves past her lips and into her throat. Nihlus's gorge heaved in empathy, his eyes stinging, salty and bitter. Jane convulsed, choking and gagging, her whole body heaving.

For a moment, she sagged, teetering on the edge of unconsciousness, but then Nihlus saw her fight kick in. Her jaw bulged as she clamped down on those fingers, biting down until Remit howled, beating on her head with the hand that still clutched her hair. Slamming her hand down on the slaver's knuckles, Jane broke his hold on her hair and twisted hard to the side. Sweeping out with her leg, she dumped Remit onto his ass then kicked straight out, catching him under the chin with her heel. He yelled, but fell back, stunned.

Nihlus reached out to grab Jane's hand. She spat a huge gob of blood in Remit's face, then launched herself toward Bunny. Nihlus's instincts threw him between Jane and the slaver, shielding her. Before Jane wrestled her baby sister free, Remit's hand punched straight through Nihlus's chest to bury itself in her hair.

Jane flew backwards, slamming into Nihlus's right side and sending him reeling onto one knee. Remit spun her, shaking her hard enough that Nihlus heard her teeth clacking together. As the slaver's open hand crashed into the side of Jane's head, Nihlus knew her brave but doomed rebellion had ended. Despite what the vids showed, hitting people over the back of the head wasn't the best way to disable them. A hard slap to the ear and side of the head worked much better to stun and disorient.

Jane dropped like a stone, puddling on the ground. Then, his heart feeling as though it would burst straight out through his keel, Nihlus saw her clawing at the ground, fighting to stand, her unfocused eyes searching for Bunny. Spirits, she was magnificent. She'd been born braver than any three other people combined, and even as he fought to hold back a keen of sheer, impotent agony, beneath it his subvocals thrummed with awe at the beauty and fury of her.

"Look, meat," Remit said, his rolling growl pulling Nihlus's attention back to him, "if you fight me, I'll tie you to that tree over there and make you watch as I do every single twisted, agonizing thing I plan to do to you, 'cept on that little one over there." He yanked her onto her feet, his bleeding and torn fingers digging into her jaw as he forced her to look over at Bunny.

He snapped her head back around and leaned in, close but not too close. His wariness of her teeth pulled a fierce grin onto Nihlus's face. Damn right he should be worried. Unfortunately, frightened cowards just became more vicious.

Remit sneered. "So, what's it going to be? You going to pucker up and bend over like a good little whore, or do I tear your baby … sister? niece? cousin? to shreds?"

Nihlus winced as Jane spat blood into the slaver's face. If she got the batarian any more angry, she'd end up dead. But then she turned looked over her shoulder at Bunny, and her head tipped once. As her entire body slumped, defeated, Nihlus stepped up behind her, talons reaching out to grip her shoulder, needing to let her know that she'd make it through.

The next second, she doubled up, spewing blood and stink over Remit's boots. Nihlus rubbed her back as she retched and retched, her gut determined to turn her inside out. Finally, she stilled under his hand.

Gasping, she called out, "Look away, Bunny. Don't watch."

"Who knows … " Remit said. The batarian wrapped his fingers around Jane's neck and laughed. The sound pierced Nihlus's hide, saturating his entire being with poison, black and corrosive. The slaver snapped his teeth. "... you might just like it." He sniffed then made a face. "This meat stinks like it's six days dead." He spun, dragging Jane further into the forest. When he reached the steep bank of the creek, he tore her pyjamas off and heaved her down into the frozen, mucky water. "Wash the stink off, whore."

Panic threw Nihlus down the steep bank after her; time was fast running out. Sliding down the last of it on his hip, he landed feet first in the frigid water and crouched next to her. "They won't hurt Bunny," he said. "She's too valuable. Run. You know this forest, you could lose them in seconds … disappear."

Above, the batarians threw handfuls of filth at her, jeering like teenage bullies.

Ignoring them, Jane shook her head, wincing as globs of mud slapped against her skin. "I can't chance it. She's five. If they rape her … ." Jane swallowed and shook her head, scooping the icy water over her skin, scrubbing off the sick and the blood. "I promised Daddy that I'd look after her." She splashed more water down her front, scrubbing off the blood and vomit. "I'll be okay. They can't touch me, not really, not if I don't let them."

Nihlus nodded. He'd known she wouldn't run. He scraped the mud from her back. "I can't do anything." Half a keen escaped before he swallowed it. "I want to, Jane. Dear spirits, I want to rip out their throats, but … ."

She nodded and turned to meet his eyes. "I know." She pressed her lips together, sucking a deep breath in through her nose. "You've always been my guardian angel." Reaching out, she gripped his talons. "Thank you for trying."

"What can I do?" he blurted. "There must be something." He lifted her hand to his mouth and nuzzled the backs of her fingers. "I can't just stand there."

She took another deep, noisy breath, then squared her shoulders and clenched her jaw, pulling herself together even as his resolve began to crumble. "Hold my hand. Don't look, but hold my hand and don't let go, no matter what." Her eyes looked past him to the gang of slavers standing along the top of the bank. "I'll be okay. My parents didn't raise a porcelain doll; they raised a fighter."

Nihlus nodded and pressed his hand against her cheek. "I know you'll be fine. You're the bravest, toughest pain in the ass I've ever met."

That drew a startled chuckle that died the second it hit the air.

"Don't make me come down there, meat!" Remit hollered. "You don't want me to get bored up here with the little one."

"I won't let go," Nihlus promised, packing down all the explosives threatening to blow him apart. Damn it, for her sake, he could hold himself together half as bravely as she did. Still, when she stood and he felt her shaking through their joined hands, his other hand slapped his thigh, looking for a flask that wasn't there.

They clambered up the bank, hand in hand, neither one loosening their grip. When Remit grabbed Jane, dragging her away from the bank, Nihlus ran to keep up. No matter what, he wouldn't let go. When they stopped, he turned his back. As much as the batarians would take from her, he could leave her that last shred of dignity.

"And talk to me," she whispered, her hand yanking against his. Her voice tightened down to a shrill sort of pant. "Your voice … it's always made me feel safe."

Nihlus's brain went suddenly and completely blank. What in the pits of buratrum could he talk about? Nice weather we're having? Are you ready for next week's calculus exam? That stew your mother made last night sure smelled rank. What was that girl's problem at school on Thursday?

His eyes slammed closed as a harsh cry shredded its way from her lips. Her hand clamped down, grinding the bones in his talons together.

"Going to … make me do all the work?" she gasped. Another ten seconds of his brain spitting nonsense passed before she said, "Okay, storyteller … got any good stories?"

Realization dawned, bright and clear. What he said didn't matter. His function was to be a lifeline, an anchor to her sanity. Keeping his eyes closed, he took a deep breath and started talking. After all, he was her guardian angel.

"A guardian angel … that's close to what my people believe in, but our spirits are more representative of qualities and ideals. They don't intercede in our lives, they just watch on, I suppose." He let out a bitter chuff. "My father used to tell me stories, fanciful things passed down from when turians hunted and lived in clans, and they believed in great spirits that governed everything from the seasons to the weather and animals … even war and love had their spirit champions."

Her hand yanked from his grip, and he spun, gripping her wrist with his other hand as he fought to keep hold of her. Opening his eyes for a second, he saw her lying face down in the mud, blood covering her face. He crouched, gathering both of her hands in his. Jane showed no response, her eyes dazed and staring. He took her pulse, a rough sigh of relief greeting the strong thump against his talons.

Another batarian reached down. Nihlus slammed his eyes shut and held onto both of her hands. "My favourite … ." The story of the praela known as Raeil spilled out of him, taking him away from the mud and blood and the stink. He prayed to Jane's God that she journeyed with him, leaving her body behind in favour of wandering a realm where mortals could win the favour of the gods and the love of a magical being.

Finally, what seemed like hours later, when Remit threw Jane's battered body over his shoulder to carry her back to the settlement, Nihlus let out a long, tremulous keen of relief. Of course, it wasn't over, not by a long measure. He steeled himself. Still clasping her slack, frozen fingers in his, he reached up with his other hand to caress her cheek, deftly wiping away the tear-streaked blood. She opened her eyes, meeting his anguished stare with a shocky, distant one.

"You didn't let go," she whispered.

Nihlus tried to answer her, but every time he opened his mouth to speak, a gut-deep scream tried to bully its way out, to drench her in horror and pain so deep he felt as if it would drown them both. He swallowed it and clamped his jaw tight. She needed her anchor, her guardian angel.

"Of course I didn't. What sort of guardian angel would I be if I let you go?" He gave her a shaky smile and caressed her cheek again. "I won't leave. No matter what."
And he didn't. When they staked her out in the middle of the gravel road, he stretched out with her, both of her hands grasped in his, his face pressed against the hood they put over her head. When they hurt her, he told her every tale he could think of. In the few moments they allowed her to rest, he simply stroked her wrist or the back of her hand. At first he thought it might just be a comfort to him, while she would prefer to be left well enough alone. However, when he stopped, she murmured, growing restless even while unconscious, stilling only once he resumed his caresses.

At the end of the twenty-seven hours, she'd faded into the small kindness of unconsciousness. Without letting go of her hand, he dragged himself up to sit by her side. One knee drawn up, his free arm wrapped around it, Nihlus dropped his head until his brow impacted his patella.

It was over. Praise the spirits, thank God or the sweet baby Jesus or the fucking Enkindlers … whichever … it was over. Harsh, ugly sobs tore from his throat, tears and snot and short, moaning keens pouring out of him in an unchecked deluge. Twenty-seven hours of being completely helpless to save one of the only people he'd ever truly loved … flayed to the bone didn't even begin to cover it. All that remained was bone and a tangle of raw nerve endings bleeding into a puddle of guts.

And yet, she'd endured so much more … his beautiful, brave Jane. He checked her pulse as he'd done compulsively every time she went still … every time she lost consciousness.

Sometimes he remembered that she survived that day to grow into the amazing, fierce woman who had saved Elysium from meeting Mindoir's fate.

Most of the time he checked her pulse.

…

"Hypothesis confirmed. Writing secondary protocols. Allowing for multiple data streams. Preparing to save to multiple files. Opening multiple feeds."

As the tide of memory drew back, a shift resonated through the computer as its brain opened itself to new parameters. Fabricated synapses fired, adapting to compensate for two subjects. Somewhere —no doubt far from Thessia—the mind behind the experiments … the reason the facility remained up to date and maintained … changed the experiment, its hypothesis confirmed.

Nihlus's presence, his suffering through her memories of Mindoir, had changed everything.

"Adjusting primary input parameters. Dual input allowance verified. Potential to harvest significant data due to interaction, sixty-three point eight percent."

They shuddered at the word harvest, their mind spitting out images of Reapers cutting swaths through their brains with a scythe. Still, the computer seeing value in Nihlus's empathy and suffering gave them another clue. Being interested in emotion made sense if the Reapers' question had something to do with what made organic life tick. Empathy, remorse, guilt … none of them were anything that they'd seen demonstrated, even by Legion.

Logical processes dictated taking action and getting a result. If the result was not the one intended, then move on to another action and another result. Even the geth, for all their benevolent intent, did not regret the deaths of the quarians. They had not desired them either, but the fact remained. The death of their creators was an unfortunate outcome of reasoned, logical action.

Still, nothing that they'd seen from Sovereign suggested that the Reapers wanted to feel regret or remorse. She doubted their question was, "Why don't we feel bad about wiping out billions of
It went so much deeper than that. It had to. Hundreds of thousands of years and trillions of lives spent searching for an answer necessitated it being a vast and important question … something to shake foundations and remake galaxies.

Didn't it?

...

Trying to look nonchalant as she searched the crowd, Shepard threw a vague smile and nod at the asari diplomat. Sweet baby Jesus, how long could anyone talk about trade agreements for prefab staircases? Second by second, resisting the urge to grab the nais and shake her until gumballs fell out grew more difficult. Restrained only by the knowledge that Udina would break her nose again if she caused a diplomatic incident at his big coming out party, Shepard resisted. Barely.

She shifted a little, wriggling inside her very beautiful, very uncomfortable dress. Just after three, her hotel doorman had called to let her know that she had a party on the way up. Unlike the more interesting sorts of parties, that one consisted of wardrobe, hair, and makeup. Three hours later, they'd plastered a face over her real one, she couldn't breathe or walk, going to the bathroom seemed a dubious, multiperson exercise, and her hair … well, actually, her hair looked fantastic.

Her heart gave an altogether too school-girlish flutter as she spotted him halfway across the hall. Not that doing so had proven all that difficult once Councillor Sparatus arrived. The bodyguard who preceded the turian councillor in the door threw off tidal waves of disgust and disdain that could scuttle a dreadnought and very effectively cut a swath through the crowd. At one point, she'd seen Sparatus tell the Spectre to back off, no doubt because everyone was too terrified to approach.

The wide clearing around the turian councillor had made it easy to keep track of the reason she'd let Udina talk her into attending his schmooze-fest. Unlike his compatriot, Council Spectre Nihlus Kryik simply stood back, a grin of what Shepard figured was sarcastic amusement on his face.

She did her best not to stare, but she couldn't help it. Something had happened about a year before when she saw him on the news: he'd just brought down a small time slaving operation, but the scumbag slaver had blown the place, killing all his slaves but for one child. Of course, Kryik killed the bastard, but when the Spectre walked out of the flames and smoke holding that little girl, she could see in his eyes that his victory felt like anything but. She knew how that felt.

Shepard realized that she'd been staring about the same time she realized that the Spectre was looking right back, and then someone sucked all the air out of the banquet hall. Blessed Enkindlers, had her dress gotten a lot tighter all of a sudden? She reached out a hand to steady herself against a planter. Yeah, it had to be the dress. Damn dress. Who wore corsets in the twenty second century?

"Are you all right, dear?" The asari slid a hand up Shepard's arm far too personally.

Shepard drew back as her skin slithered under the unwanted touch. Damn, she hated crowds ... anything public really. Far too many people liked to touch. Except salarians. They seemed to abhor being touched as much as she did. Forcing a polite smile onto her face, she replied, "Fine, thank you. I think my wardrobe person just pulled my stays a little too tight. Excuse me, please." Pretending not to see the glare that Udina shot at her, she turned and headed for the bar.

Udina reached out and snagged her wrist in his hand. "Don't get drunk. You're representing humanity here tonight, Jane."
She tried to snatch her arm back, but he held on. "I don't drink, Ambassador." She laid heavy emphasis on the man's brand new title. Glancing down at his hand shackling her arm, she raised her eyebrows. "Do you want to start a brawl right here, right now? I've got my Ka-BarTM, I can slit the ties on this corset-from-hell and be on you like a rabid tick in under ten seconds."

Udina's answering sigh came out more like a growl, but he released her.

"Thank you, Ambassador." She moved to step past him, then paused. "And the name is Shepard." As she walked away, she glanced over her right shoulder at the august figure of the Spectre. Just before she looked away, he turned and caught her gaze. "Damn, damn, damn." Spinning back toward her destination, she winced at the heat rising up her mostly uncovered chest and neck.

"Button it down, Shepard," she muttered to herself. "You're not fourteen and giggling about the cute boy in class." Smiling and nodding, she made her way through the massive crowd of complete strangers. She wished Anderson had been able to be her plus one, but no, he had to chase bad guys in the traverse. Right then, she'd give just about anything to be out there with him. Pirates raiding colonies were her wheelhouse, not too-tight dresses and polite bullshit traded with strangers.

She pressed between an asari loading up a massive tray of alcohol and a sallow faced salarian who looked three sheets to the wind. "Orange soda, please?"

Someone stepped in next to her when the asari left. "Turian brandy, double, neat, please. No, wait, make that two."

Looking up, Shepard felt all the air abandon her again and snapped her eyes back to her drink. After thirty seconds, as the Spectre shifted to lean a hip against the bar, Shepard let out a soft growl. The perfect opportunity couldn't knock much harder without giving her a concussion, and she just stood there like a moron.

You are such a coward, Janey. I thought you came to this stupid party to meet him. Now he's standing right beside you and you're hiding. Woman up. Gird your loins, and talk to him!

Right. Plastering on her best diplomatic smile, she turned and looked up. "Hello. Spectre Nihlus Kryik, right?" She held out her hand. When the turian just nodded, Shepard gave him what felt like a hugely dopey grin and said, "Lt. Commander Jane Shepard, pleased to meet you." She waited a second for him to grasp her wrist, then shrugged and let it drop.

Nodding over at the Spectre glowering behind Sparatus, she tried again, saying, "I'm glad to see the council spending the galaxy's credits so well."

"P-politicians," the Spectre replied, his shoulders popping in a small shrug. He stared for another second, then looked away as the bartender placed the drinks in front of him.

"Shepard!"

She turned toward the call, an embarrassed wince greeting Udina's beckoning hand flick. Well, at least he called her Shepard. She was surprised he didn't snap his fingers and point to his heel. Walkies! Heel. Now sit. Good girl. That's right, whoosa good girl. Shepard's a good girl. Yes, she is. Yes, she is.

She glanced up, not wanting to see the same, disdainful sort of amusement in his eyes for her as she said, "It was a pleasure meeting you, Spectre Kryik. Enjoy the rest of the party." Disappointment reached down and pulled a sigh from deep in her gut. Damn, she'd been looking forward to coaxing more than a word out of the Spectre, having a drink, maybe even asking him to dance. Giving him a thin-lipped smile, she turned to walk away. Of course, she would develop the galaxy's most ridiculous crush on the galaxy's least talkative Spectre.

Then again, it might not have been awkwardness holding his tongue. He might not care for humans. Maybe he'd been focusing on not letting her see how grossed out she made him. That wasn't his reputation, but of course, reputations were mostly bullshit. Hers being a case in point.

She groaned when she saw Udina talking to Din Korlak. That volus spent every conversation begging to be the first de-suited volus drop kicked into orbit. Oh ... to hell with Udina, she'd spent two hours kissing every ass he pointed to. Time to cut her losses and get out of the silk torture device. Maybe she'd even take her heels off and walk back to her hotel, enjoy the presidium a little. She checked her chrono. It was only eight, she could visit Martin, take the kid out for dessert or something.

But not before loosening the corset, right ... Janey?

Hell no. The corset was a goner as soon as she found a bathroom.

"Lt. Commander?" Talons brushed her shoulder, yanking her out of her self-pity with a start.

She spun. "Spectre Kryik." A nervous smile crept across her face as her skin flushed hot. "Hello again."

"Hello." He cleared his throat. "And, please, call me Nihlus." His mandibles fluttered, spreading ever so slightly: a pleased smile if she remembered her xenopology courses correctly. "Would you like to ..." He cleared his throat and shuffled from foot to foot a little as if uncertain whether to stay or return to Sparatus. "I mean, I have to take the councillor his drink, but then ... um ... would you care to dance?"

Her nervous smile spread, claiming her entire mouth as its territory. Thank god her ensemble d'torture included platform heels. She'd yet to find a way to dance face to chest with someone without looking like an idiot. After a couple more heartbeats of smiling at him like a mindless doorknob, she nodded, a slightly spastic jerk of her head.

"I'd like that," she managed to squeak. A couple more seconds of staring at one another passed before she nodded to the glass in his hand. "I'll be here."

Heart pounding, dress squeezing her diaphragm hard enough to make her dizzy, Shepard watched him cross the hall and pass Sparatus his drink. They spoke a few words, then the other Spectre looked as though someone had shoved a stick of dynamite up his ass and lit the fuse, and Sparatus started making decidedly negative head gestures. Her grin widened as Nihlus gave the turian councillor a sharp nod and turned back toward her.

"Well, how about that?" she whispered, suddenly aware that she was staring again, this time with a massively stupid grin on her face.

Nihlus returned and held an arm out, ushering her toward the dance floor. Shepard walked ahead of him, all of her senses peaked and focused on the torin walking behind her. Her mind and heart raced, adding to the out-of-body experience. She must be insane. What was she thinking having a stupid, schoolgirl crush on a turian Spectre? And not just any turian Spectre, one of the council's top operatives. At the very best, he was just being nice to a pathetic fangirl ... one of thousands.

Then he stepped in front of her, one hand slipping around her waist as he held the other out, waiting for her to take it. When she placed her fingers in his, his other hand slipped further around to rest in the small of her back.

After taking two steps, his face lowered into a perplexed scowl. "Are you expecting trouble tonight, Lt. Commander?" he asked, bending down to whisper.

Shepard laughed, her nerves disappearing like mist beneath a rising sun. "Always, Spectre Kryik. Always." Looking up at him, she tilted her head a little. "And I may have to cut my way out of this dress."

His talons traced the shape of the scabbard. "Talon?" He cocked a brow plate.

"Close, the Alliance Marines' version of it. It's a Ka-BarTM." She grinned. "I could pull it out and show you, but I'm not liking the idea of your scary-looking friend over there throwing me to the floor and stomping me to bits."

The Spectre looked thoughtful for a second, then nodded. "Saren would probably just shoot you if he had an open shot."

She watched his face, waiting for any sign that he was joking. None showed themselves. Damn.

He guided her expertly across the floor for a few moments, then bent down. "Have you figured it out yet?" he asked, his breath hot against her ear as he whispered.

Shepard frowned and pulled back a little. "I'm not sure what you're talking about."

"Lt. Commander Shepard!" Udina appeared in her face, his voice hushed, but as sharp as the blade hidden in the small of her back. "I brought you here to sell confidence in the Alliance's colonial affairs, not to hit on turian Spectres."

Shepard opened her mouth, but before she could say anything, the turian Spectre did.

"I believe the Lt. Commander is an N3 operative and an officer in the Alliance Navy, not a salesperson," Kryik said, equally hushed and just as sharp. "And to clear things up for you, the turian Spectre is hitting on her. Have a wonderful night, Ambassador."

Udina stuttered for a moment, then turned and walked away.

Shepard let out a shocked laugh. "I can't believe you said that to him." As the shock faded, realization hit and she pulled back a little even as she looked up into Nihlus's eyes. "You know who I am?"

The Spectre smiled and nodded. "I took notice after Elysium."

Shepard winced. Sweet baby Jesus, not Elysium. And things looked so promising.

"I know how a holding action like that can grind you down," he said, his eyes dark and shuttered. "Civilians panicking and dying." He shook his head. "Then they drag you out of that hell and stick you in front of cameras and slap you on the back like you're supposed to forget about all the innocent corpses behind you."

She squeezed the hand gripping hers. Of course he knew the hell that had followed her off of Elysium. He lived it, unlike the crowd of fancy suits and tight hairdos. Wasn't that what had attracted her to him in the first place?

"Yeah, pretty much. Those kids … ." She shook her head and stepped in a touch closer, liking the energy that came off him. It had a fierce sort of heat.

"I heard that you got the Alliance to pay their medical bills and for prosthetics." As he spoke, the music changed, but he just continued dancing, changing the cadence to match the new rhythm.

She frowned. "You spying on me, Spectre Kryik?" Her heart kept skipping beats, and then racing, then slowing down. Taking notice of her for Elysium was one thing, but keeping tabs close enough to know where she'd sent Martin and the others … that was quite another."

He chuckled and shook his head, meeting her eyes with an open gaze. "No, nothing so sinister. You captured my attention … " He bobbed his head a little, looking sheepish. "... and held it."

"Oh." The blush began to burn up from her bodice again. "I … ." Her words disappeared, her mind going completely blank as he eased her a little closer. Who would have thought that the Spectre she'd been crushing on had been crushing on her?

They danced for a couple of hours, staying past when people began to trickle out. Sparatus called him over, no doubt to set a time for his official dressing down, then left. Finally, the Spectre stepped back and held out his arm.

"May I escort you home?" he asked, his mandibles giving a hard, quick flick.

She grinned and, using his arm as balance, slipped off her shoes. "You're not thinking that you're going to get lucky, are you, Spectre Kryik?" She chuckled at his expression of mock horror. "I'm not some Spectre groupie."

He sighed and shook his head. "Most of those come at me using my given name, and I can't seem to convince you to use it, Lt. Commander." Once she had her shoes in hand, he led her toward the exit and the elevator leading down the tower to the presidium.

"Says the torin who has called me Lt. Commander all night." She grinned and let out a long breath. "Sweet baby Jesus … fine, Nihlus." She stepped into the elevator, ignoring the humans giving her strange looks for walking on the arm of a turian. Or … maybe, they were all just jealous.

The presidium had been sent into night cycle, the pristine streets and park areas in a sort of perpetual twilight, and she chuckled. One couldn't have asked for a more peaceful or romantic setting, at least on the Citadel. They walked in silence for nearly a block before he stopped next to one of the huge fountains jetting out of the lake and turned to face her.

"Do you remember how this night actually went?" he asked, taking her hands.

Shepard frowned. "How it actually went?" The question set off a small charge of explosives in her gut, her stomach dropping in a sick, airless swoop. Maybe it was just the dress making her feel so lightheaded and nauseous. Maybe. But no. Recognition burst through the walls separating the different parts of her. She could feel her body, frozen in a pod of the amber chia. She knew she was standing in a memory, but … one that … .

Shaking her head, she tried to back away from Nihlus, but he held tight to her hands, drawing her back in. Her scowl deepened. "This isn't the way that night went." She looked up into his eyes. "You didn't talk to me, and Udina called, and I saw he was with Din Korlak, so I ditched the party and took Martin out for ice cream."

Nihlus nodded, his mandibles sweeping in and out ever so slightly. "Yes, and I went back to stand behind Sparatus for another two hours, kicking myself the whole time for not being brave enough to go after you." Stepping into her, he lifted a hand to cradle her jaw. "Whatever the computer's operator did, it allowed us to change the memory. We're in the same memory together. Us, not some remembered image of us." Smiling he bent to touch his brow to hers.

"But why?" She closed her eyes, her mind racing, trying to solve the damned riddle of the machine, and why Nihlus would change the past.

Nihlus finished drinking from her offered water bottle, nodded, and grunted a pissy sort of thank you at her as he passed it back. She placed it on top of the pile of mats and turned to face him. He wasn't finished yet, she could see that plain as day. The Spectre took a breath. "I have no idea what to think, Shepard. All you do is run that damned mouth too fast for me to know what's real."

Shepard rolled onto the balls of her feet, putting up her guard as he stepped back in, throwing hard, fast blows. Try as she might to keep up, he pressed her on her weak side enough to throw her off. Trying for distraction, she quipped, "You got something better for me to do with my mouth?"

He laughed and leaped into the opening. "Is this your turn to double dog dare me into having sex with you, Shepard?" Grabbing her right arm he tossed her over his hip, flipping her onto her ass. He dropped to one knee, his elbows on either side of her chest, keel pressed into her ribs. "I think you should stop in and see Dr. Chakwas before we leave the ship. That shoulder and knee are still giving you trouble."

Shepard leaned up as far as she could, wedging her elbows underneath her. "What are you doing, Nihlus?" A tight lipped smile pulled her mouth taut as she stared into his eyes. "This isn't the way this happened."

He nodded and lifted his weight off her chest. Sitting with one leg raised, he rested his elbow on his knee. His other leg sat alongside her thigh, the contact almost electric, like static building up as she reached out to touch something.

A long sigh marched out, his subvocals strong enough to lift the hair on the back of her neck. "I had a chance that day to be kind … to be the torin I always hoped I'd be when we finally had a chance to know one another. You'd spent days taking care of me, keeping me from imploding, and I let jealousy win. I was unconscionably cruel to you, Jane, and I hate that I said those things." He helped her sit up, his hands resting heavily on her shoulders. "If this machine is going to turn us into paste like the processing plants in Merol's memories … what does it hurt to make up these moments … to both of us?"

Shepard reached up and slid her hand around the back of his neck. "Because we don't need to make this up, Nihlus. No matter if it took us a little longer to get to where we are now, we're here, and we both grew up a little along the way." Her thin smile broadened as it warmed. "And … because of this moment, Garrus came into my room and doctored my hands after Therum, and sewed the most beautiful seed in my heart. I can't regret that, and I wouldn't change it for anything."

Smiling, she leaned in and touched her brow to his, her love for him wrapping around them both. "Life is too short for regret, Nihlus. We're good, aren't we? Finally working on being friends and partners?" Closing her eyes, she relaxed into him. "If we'd started something this day, it would have blown up in our faces the moment you wanted to get intimate. Yes, I was crushing on you, but I wasn't ready for anything reciprocated." She kissed his brow, then pulled away. "It worked out for the best."

He nodded, but despite the machine loosening its hold on them, she could still feel everything he felt ... how much he hoped for their relationship: forever and family.

... (A-N: The moral of the story is … never let these two near tech at the same time. Ever. Thanks as always to those who read and those who check in to say howdy. Writers are a strange bunch, generally. There are exceptions of course, but mostly we are an easily discouraged bunch, myself in particular. Soooo hearing from people really does help keep me going. And I luv yah for it. ALL the hugs, even if you're all NOOOOOO! Not the hugs! See yah Monday.)
Garrus sat quietly, rereading through the few messages Shepard had sent before the Ypres reached Thessia. He'd expected to hear something from her or Nihlus by then, but he trusted them to keep one another alive. He let out a soft chuff. Yeah, they'd look out for one another right after discovering all sorts of things to need being saved from.

He closed his eyes and walled away the sick twist and yank in his gut. A day out of touch was nothing, and he needed all his attention on the mission at hand. When Shepard returned from Thessia, he hoped to welcome her with the best homecoming gift of all time. His heart thumped hard and quick against his keel as reality washed over him again. Shepard was coming home to him. She wasn't gone, not a prisoner in his dreams, but away on a mission, and at the end, she'd come back and wrap her arms around him, lips warm and soft against his mouth.

Hyalus - A particular type of spun glass used to make beautiful figures. It is always the natural blue/grey of the sand from which it is fired, although threads of precious metals are frequently spun and worked into the glass.

Numas - Ancient turian coin that was the base unit of their monetary system before they adopted the galactic currency of credits.

Buratrum - The realm of the spirits of dishonourable association.

Morumplacus - Restless spirit, undead, ghoul.

Hideth Turram - Popular sport of turian origin. (full explanation at end)

37 Days ASR

"Thanks for helping talk the hierarchy into assisting with this mission, Adrien." Try as he might to hide his amusement, Garrus's mandibles couldn't help but flick, betraying him. Primarch Fedorian had spent the entire QEC conference glaring at the two generals. Near as Garrus could figure, the primarch had alternated between trying to figure out how badly an alliance between Victus and Garrus would throw the galactic political balance off-kilter and attempting to fill them both with lead using the power of his mind.

As the conference went on, Garrus's gut had tied itself in a tighter and tighter knot. He didn't dare strip Omega so bare so soon after the attack, but the intel he'd received on Krellid's operation listed a defense force of hundreds. If they wanted to avoid civilian casualties, they needed company strength strike teams.

Just when he thought Fedorian was going to tell them where to shove their request, Garrus's father stepped in. Fedorian and Herros had been friends for decades, having served together during their youth. When Herros confirmed the intel, stressing all the same points Garrus had, the primarch had stopped looking petulant, exchanging it for thoughtful. At least he trusted and respected Herros's word. End result, distrustful as he might be of Victus and Garrus, Fedorian agreed to lend two turian strike teams to taking down the slaver holding Lucille Shepard.

"Don't thank me. Thank my hyalus tongue," Adrien joked, "it glitters with platinum filaments and riches can't help but pour from it." He chuckled and gave Garrus a jaunty sort of salute. "Did you see the way Fedorian was looking at us? Every single disaster he imagined we could create working together appeared on his face as they occurred to him. I'm not sure if I'm glad Hierarch Vakarian was able to talk him around or not. I detest crawling around dark, filthy mining tunnels." The general's smile faded as he leaned forward, talons hovering over the disconnect control. "Time to go. Good luck, General. We'll see you on the other side."

"Good hunting, Adrien." Garrus returned the salute, grateful to the council for that one great thing that had grown out of their treachery on Tuchanka. "Vakarian, out." He closed the channel, then checked the chrono on the console. An hour until drop, and he and Martin still needed to shuttle over to the Normandy. Taking a page from Shepard's book, Garrus intended to land the frigate right on the slaver's front step. Nothing like a couple of ship-mounted mass accelerator cannons aimed at your door to make an impression.

As he left the comm room, headed for the elevator, his plans cycled through his mind on a constant loop. Five strike teams attacking five targets all timed to the second … it had taken a hell of a lot of planning, and any tiny thing could throw it off.

To his mind, the weakest link in the plan was Kandros and the third strike team. He hadn't had enough time to get to know her or her competence as a leader, but when faced with taking out the slaver's compound that included a public sales venue, brothel, and gambling facility, she'd come up with an inspired plan. It was a complex area filled with innocent civilians and slaves, and though her plan to set up a barrier and blanket gas the entire block needed a solid tactical infiltration team and split second timing, it was their best shot to avoid collateral casualties or escaping slavers.

He, Anderson, Martin, and a team including Normandy and Archangel personnel were taking down the slaver's headquarters while the other, much larger, Archangel team secured the breeding facility. Garrus's C-Sec contact claimed that this single bastard was responsible for the birth and subsequent sale of over eight hundred slaves a cycle. Some of them were raised and sent to his mines or brothels as soon as they were big enough to work. Most were sold at auction on Khar'Shan.

Leir'Darak Krellid's eighteen cycle career included no fewer than twenty-three raids on human colonies, thirteen on turian colonies, the murder of fourteen C-Sec officers, and two Spectres. Time had come to end it, and end it they would thanks to Lucille's intel.

"General Vakarian?"

He stopped and looked up, realizing that he'd passed through the computer room to the guest compartments. A quick smile and nod greeted the young reporter. "Miss Wong." With deft talons, he fixed the bad seals on her armour. "Ready to do your first combat reporting?" He nodded for her to fall in.

"Yes, sir. I'm probably going to throw up in my helmet, though." She jogged next to him to keep up. "I was really happy with our previous arrangement. You went into the scary places with bullets and brought me back a story and a souvenir."

Garrus chuckled, but it faded as he nodded. "This bastard and his network have been plaguing human and turian colonies for eighteen cycles. There isn't a clean politician in either government who isn't going to be grateful he's gone." He clenched his teeth hard enough that his jaw protested. "Not to mention all the families who have lost loved ones."
"And might get them back?" Her eyes shone up at him, so earnest that it made his jaw ache.

"We can hope so, but let's not get ahead of ourselves." The fear in Lucille Shepard's eyes when they'd met burned in a pool of hot, churning acid in his gut. Nineteen days had passed since he let her return to face punishment and imprisonment. "Either way, I want the galaxy see Archangel, the hierarchy, and the Alliance working together to take him down."

Wong nodded and opened her omnitool, setting it to record through the cameras on her helmet and armour. "General Vakarian, you've orchestrated an intricate plan to bring down an entire slaving empire in a single strike, how do you like your chances? Will today see the end of an organization that has terrorized humanity's colonies for well over a decade?"

He stopped and looked into the camera. "Today, I hope to offer everyone who has suffered at the hands of Leir'Darak Krellid's organization some small measure of closure. In an act of unprecedented cooperation, the turian hierarchy and Systems Alliance have joined Archangel in executing today's raid. It's my sincere hope that it's a sign of things to come as the galaxy moves toward facing the Reaper threat."

She grinned and turned off the camera. "Can't miss any chance to beat the old Reaper drum, eh, sir?" Stuffing her helmet under her arm, she started running alongside again, puffing a little when he stopped at the elevator, no doubt due to the extra weight of her armour.

"Have you given any thought to running the PR and fundraising on my Sanctuary project?" he asked, feeling a combination of admiration and affection as he watched the young woman decide how to answer his question. Two cycles earlier, she'd been inexperienced, eager, and far too reckless, but passionate about making Shepard's senseless death count for something. In the intervening cycles, she'd lost the inexperience thanks to Archangel's guiding hands, her reckless passion tempered a little.

Emily shrugged. "It would be a huge undertaking, General. There have to be people better suited to the task."

Garrus studied her for a moment. Although he might be reading her wrong, she seemed excited, but intimidated, and for that, he couldn't blame her. It would be cycles of hard work and organization. The elevator arrived and opened. "You've as experienced a staff as we could find for you, but like it or not, Miss Wong, you have become the credible face of the Reaper threat." He chuckled. "The rest of us are considered lunatics bent on bringing down galactic civilization."

Once he sent the elevator to the shuttle bay, Garrus turned to face the reporter head on. "The Illusive Man was right the day he told me that we're going to have a huge upsurge in recruits as soon as the Reaper threat manifests." He shrugged and forced all the logistics of that to the back of his mind. "Their price for service is going to be the safety of their families, so we're going to need somewhere to keep thousands of people as out of the way of the war as possible."

She took a deep breath and shook her head. "I just ... ."

Gripping her shoulder, he gave her an encouraging smile. "I believe you're perfect for the job, but if you decide it's not for you, fair enough." He stepped back as the carriage stopped on the crew deck, the door opening to let Martin on. The young man was carrying on a thousand klick an hour discussion with Emily Johnson. The moment the young engineer saw Garrus, she grinned and turned bright pink.

"Hello, Engineer Johnson," the general said, smiling. "Glad to see you made it back from Tuchanka in good form."
She nodded, as bashful as she was animated the moment before. "Yes, sir. Thanks to you and Instructors Weaver and Kandros."

"Thanks to you as well, Engineer," he corrected. He glanced over at Martin. "That sounded like an ardent discussion."

The kid grinned and gave his head an enthusiastic shake. "Em is a genius with robotics. We were discussing ways to improve the battle frames. If turned loose on the armour, she'd turn us into tanks with nearly equivalent fire power."

Garrus's brow plates lifted. "Then, by all means, turn her loose. It certainly wouldn't hurt to have different classes of the frame armour. Some soldiers will want to stick to the lighter version, but others, like Martin, can never get enough firepower."

The elevator stopped on the engineering deck. As the doors opened, Johnson gave them all a bright smile, ending with Martin. "I'll talk to you when you get back. Good luck, Martin … General."

The rest of the ride down to the shuttle passed silently. Garrus could see Martin clicking over from techie to soldier, not that the one existed to the exclusion of other. Emily Wong busied herself all the way over to the Normandy sending messages, setting up all the last minute details for the live feed once they made planet fall.

Garrus sat quietly, rereading through the few messages Shepard had sent before the Ypres reached Thessia. He'd expected to hear something from her or Nihlus by then, but he trusted them to keep one another alive. He let out a soft chuff. Yeah, they'd look out for one another right after discovering all sorts of things to need being saved from.

He closed his eyes and walled away the sick twist and yank in his gut. A day out of touch was nothing, and he needed all his attention on the mission at hand. When Shepard returned from Thessia, he hoped to welcome her with the best homecoming gift of all time. His heart thumped hard and quick against his keel as reality washed over him again. Shepard was coming home to him. She wasn't gone, not a prisoner in his dreams, but away on a mission, and at the end, she'd come back and wrap her arms around him, lips warm and soft against his mouth.

A pleasant, but altogether inappropriate heat settled in behind his plates. Clearing his throat, he shifted in his seat and closed his omnitool, unable to curb the gratitude that set his mandibles fluttering and balled up in his throat. He'd been given his future back … a future filled with warm kisses and making love and curling up with her arms around him, her breath caressing his neck.

"Oh, stop it," Martin grumbled, a wide grin belying his tone. "Wipe that smug, stupid, 'I got my girlfriend back' smile off your face." He kicked Garrus's shin. "Show some respect for those of us who haven't found one yet and focus on the mission."

Despite muttering a few choice words under his breath, Garrus kept the smile. Landing on Lorek would wipe it away soon enough. When the shuttle set down on the Normandy's deck, he jumped up and strode to the hatch, pushing it open, his mind focusing on the business at hand.

" Haven't heard from Kandros," he muttered under his breath as Martin stepped up beside him. "The port authorities in Jalnor could be giving her a hard time." Running a mission on a hegemony controlled world constituted a major, almost unacceptable, risk. The batarians refused to admit slaving was a huge source of revenue for their flailing empire, and they really weren't prepared to lose that income. To keep their businesses operating and the eyes of the law turned the other way, slavers like Krellid paid millions in kickbacks to local and hegemony politicians.
However, the batarian government's denial of sapient trafficking and its offshoots—prostitution, illegal gambling, and smuggling—would also allow Garrus to bring the bastard down; no official protests or reports filed with the authorities. They'd quietly and dangerously hunker down and wait for a chance to exact retribution.

"Nyreen is smooth," Martin answered. "She'll get them in there, General. Now whether or not she manages to get a barrier up over that block, deploys the gas, and takes out the slavers without the authorities closing in … ." He shrugged. "But we've always known that hers was the trickiest leg of this op."

Garrus's omnitool pinged, but when he opened his messages it was Adrien letting him know that both of the turian teams were in shuttles, on their way to their separate mining operations. The teams had started a friendly war over which one attacked the island closer to the sunward hot-polar region and which attacked the island at the terminator into the dark cold-polar region. Adrien resorted to flipping a numas in order to settle it, then promptly assigned himself to the hot-polar team.

"It's good to be the general," Martin said when Garrus showed him the message. The kid laughed and headed over to talk to Kaidan and the other Marines.

Garrus nodded. Being the general did have its moments and its perks. He looked up when the elevator pinged, then strode across the cargo bay to meet Anderson as the captain stepped out.

"Been awhile since I strapped on the old armour," Anderson groused, wriggling a little. "I don't remember it being this heavy ... or this tight." A warm grin belied the complaints, and he held out a hand to grip Garrus's elbow in greeting.

The step up in familiarity from wrist to elbow threw the general off stride for a moment, but he supposed that with Shepard back, Anderson saw the writing on the wall. He liked it, he decided, and gripped the captain's elbow in return.

"Must be the armour," Garrus deadpanned. "You know how it shrinks in storage."

Anderson chuckled and slapped his shoulder. "Been sitting at desks too long," he announced. "It'll be good to stretch my legs."

Garrus nodded, falling in beside the captain, a sudden feeling of profound connection spreading through him like warm water under his plates. He'd listened to Shepard talk about the feeling as a golden web that tied her to people, but he'd never understood until that moment. He loved his people ... even Martin, spirits save him ... but the new feeling ... it felt as if they'd moved in to live just under his hide. He shook his head, pulling himself back. Mission, no word from Kandros, getting the slaves out alive, that was where he needed to focus his attention.

Nyreen reported in ten minutes later. It took a little bribery but she got her team on the ground and they were moving in to place the emitters. Every ten minutes, the teams reported in, green across the board. Then the Normandy began her descent, the shuttles containing the second team ready and waiting in her hold.

Garrus headed up to stand behind Joker, watching space give way to a rolling torrent of sky and seemingly endless ocean below. A rare jewel—a garden world in orbit of a red dwarf star—Lorek came with its share of issues including being tidally locked to Fathar, and a geography that allowed for a great deal of underworld activity. The whole habitable surface being a widespread mass of islands made policing nearly impossible. But, it was a beautiful world.
Joker brought them down quick and steep then skimmed the ocean surface, handling the frigate expertly through the turbulence, another of Lorek's quirks. Being a tidally locked ocean world made for ferocious thunderstorms along the terminus from hot to cold.

"We'll be on top of them before they see us in this soup," Joker called over his shoulder. "One second our slaver will be sitting at dinner twirling his moustache and saying, 'Oh ho! What a fine life of villainy I lead,' the next he'll be screaming and running."

"Do batarians even grow mustaches?" Garrus laughed then patted the pilot's shoulder. "Good work, Joker."

"Better get down there, General." The pilot grinned. "Don't want to miss the screaming and running."

"True. And when you put it that way, I think Shepard just might be pissed off she missed it." He turned and strode the length of the CIC.

Garrus stepped down off the Normandy's ramp into chaos. Thunder crashed, the weather twisting through the weapon fire, and the rain drove at them sideways, lashed by a wind that gusted over eighty kilometres an hour. No, Shepard definitely wouldn't be angry for missing out; she refused to wear a helmet in survivable conditions and hated rain running down into her armour.

"Let me guess," Martin hollered over the wind, "you didn't check the weather report?" The kid's omnitool glowed as he lowered his armour's center of gravity and mass effect field. Once anchored a little better, he sent a handful of rockets sizzling through the weather toward one of eight guard towers. Two hit, the others impacting the tall, solid concrete wall.

Movement through the thick canopy of trees alerted Garrus to the second team's shuttled landing on the other side of the wall. C-Sec drone recon sweeps had shown the wall was far too well guarded and solid to breach quickly. While they bashed at the two metre thick concrete, Krellid's guards could be killing every slave in the breeding compound, so they'd decided right from the start to land a second team inside the wall.

"It said eighty percent chance of hurricanes; I decided to play the odds," Garrus shouted back as he dug in, pushing against the wind toward a garden planter. He needed to get into cover and help take out those towers. Wind that strong played bloody havoc with rockets. Of course, gusts that strong didn't make for ideal sniper conditions either. Throwing himself toward the leeward side of the planter, he rolled up, his back shoved against the concrete. Two quick breaths, he spun, taking a knee and using the edge of the box to steady his rifle.

Five shots brought down the two guards in the closest tower, buying the team a slight reprieve as they floundered, trying to find cover from both the wind and bullets. Garrus pulled his rifle in, wiped both ends of the scope to clear away the fog, and shifted to line up the second tower. Further away, the wind gusts threw off his aim a little, not because it pushed the rounds—they were far too small and moved far too quickly—but because it shoved both him and his rifle.

Seven shots to clear the tower that time, and meanwhile Martin and the others had cleared two more.

Anderson hit the planter next to Garrus, huffing a little. "Definitely too much time behind a desk."

"Need to move inside," Garrus called, reaching up to his radio. "Weaver, beta squad … finish clearing the towers. Alpha squad, front door with me. Charlie, rear door with Anderson." He spun out of cover, and leaning at a nearly forty degree angle, pushed toward the front door. Luckily, the mansion had a fancy porch structure that effectively blocked both wind and bullets, allowing him to bypass the door lock in relative peace.

Kaidan took cover on the other side of the door, nodding his readiness. As soon as the door opened, he ducked out, his Vindicator sweeping the entry before he stepped through. Garrus pulled his sidearm, lifting the Phalanx into high ready, opting for ease of movement over rapid firepower.

Two guards swung out and opened fire from behind a pair of krogan statues on either side of the corridor, falling before they even corrected their aim enough to do damage. Garrus winced as stray bullets dug into the statues; Lucille was going to kick their asses for damaging the art.

And priceless art and furnishings littered the entire home, filling shelves and covering tables. Larger pieces stood in corners, along hallways, and flanked windows. The squad made their way through a marble-floored parlour and a dining room replete with enough gold trim to tip the decor from rich to gaudy. Between the two rooms, the contents could fund opening Archangel's third building on their own.

"You could fund a small colony," Kaidan said, voice twisting with disgust.

Every empty room and token pair of guards hammered another six inch spike straight into Garrus's spine until a frustrated scream climbed up to dangle from the back of his tongue. Damn their luck. Did every mission have to end up being a trap?

He took cover next to a door, and nodded to Kaidan. The door opened, revealing a very large, serviceable kitchen, the room deserted. Kaidan sidestepped toward a stove and peered under a lid. Steam billowed, releasing the scent of roasting meat. The appliances had all been turned off, but moments before.

He returned to his position at Garrus's ten. "He's pulled all the household staff back to use them as hostages."

Garrus nodded, but the snapping eels slithering through his guts said something else, something a lot worse than that. He raised a hand to his ear. "All teams report in. Anderson? Martin?"

Martin's voice came back, his voice muffled and distorted by heavy interference. "Towers cleared. Hear heavy fire from inside the breeding compound. Moving toward your position through the side door. Over."

Garrus paced a little, half his attention on puzzling out the reason for the eels chomping at his guts. "Anderson?"

"On our way to you now. Met a little resistance … not enough," the captain said, suspicion treading heavily through the words. "Something's off. Feels like there's a piano hanging over our heads."

Garrus scowled, that image making no sense, but then pushed it aside. "Roger that. We'll wait here until—"

"Emergency transmission from Strike Team Challir. Team ambushed. Unknown enemy." The comm officer's voice came through as badly distorted as Martin's, but even through the static and broken comms, Garrus could hear the fear in the young officer's subvocals.

"Dear spirits, what are these things?" Another voice, just as young and just as terrified.

"General Victus is down. Retreat back to the last cross tunnel."
"Whatever these things are, they're spit straight from the pits of buratrum!"

"There's hundreds of them."

Calls for help and general chatter swelled for a moment, then Victus's voice broke through the rest. "Enough! Squad leaders get control of your people! Essential comms only! Pull back to the last cross tunnel. Set up portable cover." He paused, a soft grunt making it over the interference, and the eels started to gnaw their way out as Garrus heard the pain resonating through his friend's voice. "Garrus, if you're reading this, ambush two hundred and fifty meters into the mine. Unknown aliens. Bipedal … insectile … huge hea—"

The channel died, but the silence lasted only a second.

"General Vakarian, how good of you to visit." Garrus spun toward the voice, his Phalanx bullseyeing an intercom. Damn. The batarian chuckled. "I have some friends who are very eager to meet you. Do come in, but please try not to shoot up too much of my home. Lucille has spent so many cycles dedicated to my collections. It would break her heart to see so much history riddled with bullet holes."

Garrus reached up to his radio even before the bastard stopped talking. "Joker, do you read?"

"Barely," the pilot's voice came through. "Someone's doing a hell of a job messing with comms."

"Ambush. Lock the Normandy down and get her off the ground, and then I need scans of this house and the breeding facility, as detailed as you can get them." He barked the orders as quickly as he could, not trusting the comms to last. "Try to contact the other teams. Warn them that Collectors are waiting for them."

"Understood. I'll get back to you. Joker, out."

Kaidan moved in to stand with his back to Garrus's eight, his assault rifle pointed at the side door. "So, a trap. Any ideas so far?"

Garrus shook his head, but let out the breath he'd been holding, appreciating the Lt. Commander's levity. "Nothing yet, but I'll keep you up to date." He nodded to the rest of the squad then opened his omnitool. "Keep an eye on the exits. Don't shoot our incoming squads."

Sucking in a long breath, he forced himself to focus. Work the problem, just like every other problem. The other teams had experienced leaders who could take care of their own people. Their job hadn't changed, just gotten a little more complicated. He brought up the partial floor plan of the house and overlaid a heat signature scan. As he suspected, the house jammed scans. No slaver worth his shock collars would leave his properties open to scanning, but sometimes inside the building, scans could pick up short range.

Sure enough, when he pulled the scan radius in to twenty metres, faint heat signatures showed Anderson's team heading their way as well as three large masses of heat. He bumped Kaidan with his elbow, pointing to the second of the three … the one he suspected indicated most of their Collector welcoming committee.

"Their fielders." He pointed to a mass of heat in the basement. "The hide." Then the one upstairs at the back of the house, behind what he was sure amounted to at least a platoon of Collector troops. "And what they think is the hide. We need to muddy the field," he whispered. "Right now, they've got the hide at their tower. We need to kick with the spur, bring down their wall."

"Remind me to get a hideth turram manual, so I know what the hell you're talking about." Kaidan sighed, but then gave a single nod. Whispering so low that Garrus only caught eighty percent of it, he said, "Martin's on his way in. Between us we can probably get into the network, make a mess, maybe get a decent set of blueprints."

"We need to play the slow game, move their fielders into position. Muddy the field enough to capture the hide and get it down field before they know they've lost it." He wished Martin was there. The kid had become fluent in hideth turram strategy as code. Still, from the way Kaidan looked at the scans, Garrus believed he'd captured the shape of the plan if not the specifics.

First goal, take away their advantages by killing the power to the entire place. No power, no jamming.

The side door knocked twice, then three times, then once and cracked open. "Lucky charms," whispered through the crack.

"They're magically delicious," Garrus replied, letting out a small sigh of relief as the wind blew Martin's squad in the door, minus three.

"Collectors for sure, boss," Martin said. "Two injured. The third got them onto the Normandy before Joker pulled out." He turned to headcount his team, then stepped to the door, scrambling the codes. "Locking this down to my code in case we need an exit."

The kitchen door knocked in the same two, three, one pattern and, "Hey, diddle diddle, the cat and the fiddle," came through in Anderson's grumpiest grumble.

Martin cackled, then replied, "The cow jumped over the moon." He returned to stand next to Garrus, head craned trying to see the general's omnitool.

"I'm getting you a proper recog, ident, and signal protocol manual," Anderson said as he entered.

Martin shrugged. "Save your credits, Captain. The boss gave me one a year ago. Haven't cracked the cover." When Anderson stepped up beside Garrus, the kid nodded to the omnitool readout. "So, we've got at least two hides on the field, and it's pouring down rain."

Garrus nodded, checking to see if Anderson had understood.

"I've seen enough turram to follow," the captain replied. "Might not be fielders here," he continued, pointing to the center group.

Garrus nodded. "Weaver ... Alenko, muddy the field and get a tarp up to cover the team." He turned to Anderson. "The close quarters gives us the ability to spread ourselves thin," he whispered. "Take a team down into the basement. Hopefully there won't be too many guards. Get those slaves out, call in Joker."

"It'll be slow going," Anderson said, his scowl deepening as Garrus saw him starting to work the numbers. "I doubt he's just going to let us walk in." He nodded. "We'll get it done." He turned to his squad, but then stopped and looked back. "He knows who you're here for."

His churning gut not needing that pointed out, Garrus just nodded and swallowed, forcing his gullet back where it belonged. No doubt Lucy would be a shield of last resort, and held either with her master or in a location only the slaving bastard knew. Not bothering to whisper, Garrus turned to face everyone. "We're up against Collectors. We know they have been taking humans and that they work for the Reapers, so expect husks as well as Collector drones and unit commanders. Weaponry unknown, and my intel is fifty thousand cycles old, so err to the side of caution. The protheans had widespread biotic abilities, so expect that possibility."
He shrugged. What else could he say to prepare them? Unknown enemy, sketchy details … all they could do was be careful. "Take your time, keep your eyes open for traps." Darkness fell, deep enough that it took Garrus's eyes a moment to adjust to the dim light coming in the windows. A soft 'who-dee-hoo' from Martin told him that the computers were down, a fact that a quick glance at his omnitool confirmed. The scan still showed signs of interference … probably built right into the materials of the house, but they'd cleared up a little.

"Okay," Martin whispered, letting Garrus know they faced a good chance of continued audio surveillance. "We got a decent floor plan out of the computer." He uploaded it to Garrus's omnitool. Emergency lights flickered on, and the kid shrugged. "Oh, and they've got generators for the power."

Garrus let out a long breath. Of course they did, living in a veritable hurricane zone. He nodded to Anderson, slapping the captain on the shoulder as he moved his people out, heading down to the sublevels. When the kitchen cleared out a little, the general turned to organize his team, stopping dead in his tracks when he saw an unfamiliar face staring back at him. It wasn't until the soldier smiled that he realized it was Emily Wong. With the entire mission tilting dangerously toward the pits of buratrum, he'd completely forgotten about the reporter.

His mandibles flicked as she gave him a jaunty salute. "Don't worry, General. I'm getting it all." She tapped the camera on her helmet. "The live feed died as soon as we entered the house, but all systems are go for recorded footage."

Setting his teeth, Garrus nodded. With Collectors coming after them, Wong's footage would be more important than ever, but spirits, he hated putting her on the firing line. If … when they made it out of there, he was going to insist she take the lead on the Sanctuary project and get some old crusty turian and human ex-military to be their field reporter.

He gestured to Kaidan. "Keep her safe." The Lt. Commander nodded and moved in on Wong's six.

"We're going up to the second floor. Check your fire. I doubt the Collectors will use slaves as shields, but neither will they care about killing them in the crossfire. The bastard behind all this will definitely have shields, and very likely the one closest to him will be Captain Shepard's mother." He sent the floorplan to the entire team's omnitools. "If you get separated, make your way back here. Pair off, five metre spread, keep your eyes open. Alenko, Wong, and Leri'Alek take drag. Weaver, point with me."

Jaw clenched, pistol in low ready, Garrus headed through the door into the rear corridor, his eyes sweeping for traps. He didn't expect anything explosive—Krellid loved his things too much—but a whole lot more than explosives could disable his people. Martin moved lightly and easily despite the weight of his armour, his shotgun up and ready.

Pulse pounding out a warning in his head, Garrus climbed the stairs three at a time, taking cover at the top to check the hallway. Staircases were death traps, giving attackers elevation over an effective bottleneck. Pistol leading, the general leaned out—

Darkness … no … not darkness, just blindness. White … everywhere. No air! Garrus's talons leaped to his throat. No air. He sucked in a ragged, heaving breath, inhaling something thick and viscous that sealed his nostrils and mouth even as he choked, struggling to clear it without any air in his lungs. Vomit surged up his esophagus as his body struggled to rid itself of the suffocating goo and sent him rolling onto his hands and knees. Still throwing up, he lunged up off the floor, desperate for air. Frantic talons clawed at his face, trying to clear whatever was blocking his airways and vision.
His hands came away thick with white foam. Foam?

He threw it aside, still sucking in lungfuls of air that did nothing to ease his body's demands for oxygen. Black spots flashing across his vision, he shoved himself up off the floor, climbing the wall hand over hand. Once most of the way up, the air began supplying oxygen again. Gasping in huge gulps of air, he regained enough of his vision to really see his surroundings.

Fire suppressant foam clung to every surface, explaining the lack of oxygen at floor level. Under the rapidly dissolving foam, fire damage blackened the walls, spreading out from hunks of shrapnel buried in the panelling. He spat, cleared his throat and spat again, then snorted, clearing one nostril and then the other.

Dear spirits. So much for his heroic rescue mission. Where the fuck was his team?

"Martin?" One hand buttressed against the scorched wall, not trusting his trembling legs, Garrus picked his way down the hallway. "Weaver? Do you read me? Anyone?" No reply. But neither did he see any bodies along the hallway, so there might yet be hope they managed to pull back before whatever took him out. What had happened?

He paused, talons lifting to press against the pounding behind his brow plate, trying to remember. Pain distracted him, forcing him into a quick inventory. Body parts all at least semi-functional, every one of them aching and letting out intermittent, stabbing cries. The stench of burned polymer and ceramic curled from his armour in thin, smoky tendrils that stabbed down into his sinuses.

But what happened?

He and Martin called clear on the hallway and moved up. Then … his memory fogged over. A sharp pain drew his attention to the side of his head, distracting him for a second. Seeking talons discovered a chunk of metal and circuitry embedded in his neck just behind his aural canal. A sharp yank ripped it from his hide, and he held it up, face complaining as he scowled at the scorched hardware.

Husks. He remembered husks. And … and … a huge energy weapon? He closed his eyes, trying to draw the memory forward. Yes, a massive, powerful energy weapon, but whatever was behind it … he either hadn't seen it or couldn't remember it.

He went back to the husks. When had they appeared? Second floor? Five or six husks had lurched out of a door no more than eight metres in front of them, but then … they caught fire? They glowed red as if combusting from the inside, then flame wreathed their bodies like morumplacus. They moved like husks, taking as long to orient and manage a straight line as their counterparts. He took the head off the first one six metres out, then it exploded, spraying the hallway with burning shrapnel.

As the rest of the flaming husks closed, Garrus ordered his team back, but each successive explosion grew nearer, the fires in the hall finally triggering the fire suppression system. The last of the exploding abominations … .

Blood running down the side of his head and into his collar reminded him of his injuries, and he hit his medigel. As the cool relief of the medigel sent pain to the bottom of his priority list, he shook his head, trying to clear away the lingering fog of oxygen deprivation. The last husk … it exploded in his face, and then … Collector foot soldiers with assault rifles and a few command units with devastating beam weapons attacked—

He reached up to his radio. "Weaver. Anderson, report in." Static. "Do you read me?" He waited a second, then opened the main channel. "This is Vakarian. Anyone receiving this signal, please respond."

"I'm afraid none of your people can hear you, General," a voice spoke over the intercom, clearly disguised, but just as clearly not the batarian.

Garrus shoved himself away from the wall, a searching stare dropping to the floor when his hand slapped his hip and found nothing. His pistol … he must have dropped it. Damn it, where were his people? If he needed to take the entire facility down alone, one fucking Collector at a time to find his teams, that's what he'd do.

His head laughed at that idea, but then he spotted his pistol five metres away, and he laughed back. He'd been in worse shape on Haestrom, and he'd still got Nihlus out of that hell. He ran the three steps and bent to scoop it up, the entire hallway swooping around him in a heavy wave of dizziness that just about threw his assless over his head.

"You are hard to kill, aren't you? They warned me you would be."

Garrus snatched up his gun and spun to face the new voice, that one young, female, and definitely not batarian. He stumbled backwards a couple of steps, unsure if he was hallucinating. Near the end of the hall, a woman stood, aiming a shotgun at him. Tall and willowy even in armour, she walked with the natural swing common to beautiful females galaxy wide, her long red hair twisted into a plait over her left shoulder.

He sagged against the wall—the entire fifth flotilla firing Thanix cannons inside his head at once—barely managing to keep his pistol trained on her as his hand migrated back to his brow. "Bunny?" He shook his head a little, regretting the action as it drove a wedge between the two halves of his skull. Squinting, he managed to get her to stop floating around his field of vision. "Are you Beatrix Shepard?"

"My name is Qua'tien Krellid. Bunny Shepard died nearly fifteen years ago." She stalked toward him, loose-limbed and confident. "You don't need to introduce yourself. General Garrus Vakarian." She stopped and cocked her head. "Funny, you don't look nearly frightening enough to warrant all of this." A quick flick of her shotgun's muzzle indicated the destruction.

"Where are my people?" he demanded, his head settling back to a tolerable level; enough that he pushed away from the wall, fairly solid on his feet. He took a step toward her, his pistol steady between the sea green eyes. Pain and doubt crystallized into determination. "What happened?"

She shrugged, but he saw the way her jaw tightened, making a lie of her nonchalance. "Your … um… Anderson is aboard your ship as far as I know. The rest of them grabbed the surviving slaves and evacuated when the entire second floor went up in flames, then collapsed." Another shrug. "Well, except for the smart mouthed kid. He insisted you were still alive. He's either dead or still down there searching for you."

"Beatrix … or Qua'tien … whatever your name is … what happened? I was on the second floor." He took another step.

She nodded. "The Collectors attacked with their flambe husks, but you fought your way through those pretty well and the troopers. The floor was on fire. You ordered the team to push on, then you saw me and charged. Walked right into their trap." She nodded over her right shoulder. "Come on, the fire's out, but the house is coming down. Their giant beetle monster thing cut it to ribbons with it particle beams … while trying to kill you, actually."
Turning away, she picked her way through his vomit and the remains of the foam. "Disgusting. Turians are such pukers. Whack them in the head and they just spew chunks everywhere."

"Stop! Wait! Where are the slaves?" he demanded, not moving. He couldn't keep his gun steady and move at the same time without his head trying to dump him on his ass. He swallowed a sour mouthful of vomit as the pain spiked. He'd be deep in the pits before he proved her right. "We came here to find your mother. She is the one who told us how to find him."

The teenager stopped and nodded. "Yeah, I know. You walked into that one too. Good thing your people are such good fighters. You were all supposed to die. Instead, my father's empire lies in ruins, the Collectors betrayed him … never trust bugs who promise the universe … and he's upstairs with half his head missing." She let out a long breath. "Once again, my bitch sister pulls my entire life down around my neck." Another nod. "Let's get going before we end up buried under all his expensive junk."

"Where's your mother?" He followed, keeping a good distance between them. "I'm not leaving without her."

"Father sent her to the shed as soon as she got back from baiting your hook. She's dead by now. They never last more than a week in the shed." He opened his mouth to demand that she take him there, but she slapped a hand up to stop him before he got a single word out. "Don't bother, not even I know the codes to get you in. Even daughters get sent to the shed once in a while. Can't have them able to let themselves out."

"I don't care." His feet felt like someone had coated the soles of his boots with grease, forcing him to pick his way carefully down the hall. Luckily, a large scrap of smoldering rug graced the marble floor in the next room. "Hold up," he said, layering an impatient grumble under the words that sent pain shooting through his head. Spirits … he couldn't function like that. He slapped his medigel twice, then scrubbed the soles of his boots clean.

Arms crossed, hip cocked, Bunny stood a few metres away, watching him with an appraising stare. "Is it true that you and Captain Shepard are a thing?"

He jerked his head toward the exit. "I want to see your master's body and his office. Take me there."

She rolled her eyes and let out a long sigh. "Fine. You always this suspicious when you win a battle?" Another sigh punctuated an eye roll before she spun and headed out.

"I haven't won anything until you, your mother, and all my people are safely back at Archangel." Keeping the pistol aimed at her spine, he followed. "How did your master die? You said half his head is missing?"

"Father, not master. He saved me from the cages, raised me … trained me to be the captain of his personal guard. And, yeah, he's missing the half I shot off." She made a sound like a vocal missile slicing through the air. "He forgot the one lesson he drilled into me the hardest … making people family just lets them get close enough to shank you."

As deserving as the bastard had been of a grisly death, her explanation didn't sit easy. He raised his gun, the spikes the mission had hammered into his spine bristling and digging into the meat. The day was a long way from being done screwing with him. "Why? Why did you kill him?"

Armoured shoulders popped in a careless shrug. "He made promises, but when he brought in the Collectors, started trading slaves for some bullshit promise of immortality and a return to glory for the batarian empire ... ." A harsh, derisive cough cut from her throat. "When he fell for their bullshit, he broke the only promise that meant a damn ... that one day, I'd get to stand toe to toe with the bitch who betrayed me, betrayed my mother ... let them kill our father, all to save her own damned skin." Bunny stopped and turned to face him. "He promised that one day, I'd get my chance to kill Jane Gwendolyn Shepard. Now, you're going to make sure it happens."

___

(A-N: Thursday, we hop back to Sassy and Nihlus, then Monday back to Garrus. These Collectors really are a pain in the butt. Thanks as always. All the love.)

___

Hideth Turram - A game played by two teams of fifteen players. A drellak hide is hung on a six metre tall pole in the center of a field that measures one hundred and fifty metres long by thirty metres wide. A twenty-four metre tall scaffolding tower stands at either end of the field. The field, which begins as turf, is soaked to provide a further obstacle, one that becomes only more and more difficult to surmount as it gets churned to mud.

The object is simple, although the execution is anything but. Teams compete to take possession of the hide and move it down the field to their tower, climbing to hang it from the pole at the apex of the tower. There are few rules regarding what means may be used to take possession of the hide from another player, and center on conduct once another player has hit the ground. They may not be struck once any body part above the hips touches the ground. Games are not considered to be good sport without "Blood hitting the mud".

Players: Both males and females play on equal footing and there are no rules governing how many of each should make up a team. What females lose in brute strength, they make up for in speed and agility, often being the teams 'advancing' players, although many are very effective in blocking roles as well. The game is played wearing little clothing as it proves to be both a liability and easily shredded. Light, skin tight leggings are the norm. Bare talons-hands and feet- give the player better purchase. Players of non-taloned races use heavily cleated boots.

The turian saying "Kick with the spur" refers to a move in the sport where one player disables their opponent by hooking the opponent's spur with their own and dragging them to the ground. This move is extremely painful for both involved, and usually results in torn ligaments in the opponent. Although the saying remains popular, the move has become less so.

Origins: Clan gatherings during the turian "dilacul venatiar" or early hunter period, where dominance amongst the clans of a given area was decided by the outcome of a hunting competition. A drellak was marked and the clan that brought it in had first choice over hunting territory, resources, and mates. The elder of the dominant clan also had final say in matters of law as the head of the elder council.

Trivia:

One game between regiments of the External Forces lasted for three days (86.4 Earth Standard Hours), the players falling asleep on the field in shifts.

The first game played against an all asari team lasted 7 minutes, the asari coming out victorious. (Use of biotics and bare breasts have since been ruled illegal)

No fewer than 6 Primarchs have been killed participating in the sport.

No fewer than 13 Primarchs and 68 other members of Hierarchies have been assassinated at games.
The oldest player to ever plant the hide was General Aldus Pallian at the age of 93
"I'm not just going to let you kill Shepard," he said at last, voice heavy and rumbling with subvocals of both warning and a wry sort of pissed off amusement. The kid was a piece of work, but considering her genes and upbringing, that didn't surprise him all that much. He doubted that dragged through the pits of buratrum even began to cover the last fifteen cycles of Bunny's life.

She nodded. "Of course you won't." She picked through the smashed remains of furniture and strewn chunks of plaster and wood. Dead Collectors stuck out of the rest, so thick that Garrus couldn't help but grin, fierce and proud. His people had picked up and fought on brilliantly.

Trigger warning for brief conversational mentions of abuse and torture. No details are given.

Garrus stared at the young woman, eye narrowed, his gut twisting into empathetic knots as he studied her, looking for signs of deception or mental disorder. His visor told him nothing useful. Heart rate, respiration, body temp all elevated, which the circumstances warranted anyway. As useful as it would be, his visor didn't include a mind reading app.

"I'm not just going to let you kill Shepard," he said at last, voice heavy and rumbling with subvocals of both warning and a wry sort of pissed off amusement. The kid was a piece of work, but considering her genes and upbringing, that didn't surprise him all that much. He doubted that dragged through the pits of buratrum even began to cover the last fifteen cycles of Bunny's life.

She nodded. "Of course you won't." She picked through the smashed remains of furniture and strewn chunks of plaster and wood. Dead Collectors stuck out of the rest, so thick that Garrus couldn't help but grin, fierce and proud. His people had picked up and fought on brilliantly.

Bunny sniffed then spat a thick gob of dusty, smoky snot into the rubble. "You'll tell yourself the same optimistic lies that my sister and mother will. Qua'tien can be rehabilitated. It will take time and patience, but we'll get our Bunny back. Then you'll let me out of my cell, and we'll be one great, big happy family." She glanced back over her shoulder, giving her braid a cocky flip. "That's when I'll kill her."

The eels renewed their attack on his guts, dread slithering through all the tender, sympathetic bits. He believed her. Growing up, brainwashed by that bastard, trusted and tortured, twisted a million different ways ... Qua'tien would never truly disappear. They'd never be able to trust her.
Of course, Shepard would. It would take time, but eventually Shepard would believe her sister had been reclaimed, and she'd let her guard down. His gut wrenched into a knot, sending a surge of bitter acid up his throat. He choked it down.

No.

He'd just gotten Shepard back, he wouldn't let her empathy … her kind heart … snatch her away again. Pushing up behind Bunny a little, gun lifting a hand's width higher, he said, "I could just put you down here and now, save everyone the worry. I can just tell them that tragically, Bunny died in the attack."

She laughed, bright and eerily merry. He shuddered, the sound more disturbing than her threat or even the fact that she'd killed the man she called her father. Popping her shoulders in a far too familiar shrug, she said, "Yeah, you could put a bullet through my brain, lie about having found me, but you won't." Sparks arced around her as she hopped over a fallen light fixture. "You're good people. Good people are so easy." She stopped at a shut door. "You'll always be susceptible to those of us who have no rules."

She turned her back to the door, and met his eyes with a stare so dead and frozen that he couldn't tell if she'd told the truth. Damn, she was good. Not many people could keep him guessing, but Bunny Shepard was leading his powers of perception on what Martin called a 'feral goose chase'. A careless shrug rippled across the narrow shoulders. "If you do really love that bitch, do it. The only way to stop an assassin willing to trade their life for the target is to take them out first." Holding her arms out, she sighed. "So do it. It's the only way to save your girlfriend."

He shook his head, lining his heart and guts with steel to fortify himself against her taunts. She knew he was no murderer, and suddenly he wished that Nihlus stood in his place. If the Spectre thought Bunny posed even the smallest threat to Shepard, he'd put a single shot of lead through her brow. The Spectre would hate himself for it, but he'd do it anyway.

Garrus cracked his neck and cleared his throat, hating the picture that formed in his mind … that young, pretty face ... a tiny entrance wound dead center in her brow, a single trickle of blood marring the pale, freckled skin. He jerked his chin toward the door. "Is that Krellid's office?" he asked, turning the conversation back to getting everyone the hell out of there. When she nodded, he stabbed his pistol toward it. "Open it."

"It's not going to do you any good," she said, turning and keying in a code to open it. "He's dead, and dead men tell no tales."

Garrus stared at her, almost expecting the word, "copper" to come out of her mouth in Shepard's hard-boiled detective voice. His brow plates started creeping down toward his nose, but then he caught himself and schooled his expression, keeping it a flat and reflective … a still pond. The moment his talons stepped into the mansion, he'd known something was off. Somehow, he always knew. He might walk into a trap, but he always knew it was a trap … only the slaver's lair hadn't just felt like a trap. Too much out of place, none of the right vibes … the lack of slaves near the firefights … not a single sapient shield had been thrown at them. And then he awoke, almost killed fighting a Collector monster he couldn't remember, but his people and the slaves had all been evaced?

No, nothing added up, yet. He nodded for Bunny to open the door and go in ahead of him.

Crossing the threshold, he kept himself in partial cover as he cleared the room. Five batarians, two humans, and a turian lay sprawled over various chairs. He nodded to Bunny to stay where he could see her and sidestepped over to the bodies. Tracing their order of death by the neatness and number of wounds, he saw that they'd been picked off in order from left to right. No doubt they'd been sitting in their chairs, listening to the battle going on outside their little fortress. He checked the walls to confirm his theory, and chuffed. No damage to the walls other than single shots fired inside the room.

A panic room.

So they sat in their impenetrable little fortress and waited. Then someone had opened fire. He examined the wounds. Pistol shots. He nodded Bunny over. "Show me your weapons."

"No." She jerked away from him, placing the desk between them, her shotgun held low, below the edge. Even so, he could see she didn't have a pistol on her.

Garrus circled the desk to look at the corpse slumped over a computer spattered with blood and brains. The corpse was definitely batarian. Grabbing the dead man's shoulder, he pulled Krellid up off the desk, leaning him back in the deep chair. Face blown off, but not by a shotgun. Pistol again, back of the head … five shots.

Spinning to face Bunny, he said, "Is this Krellid?"

She snorted, then spat. "Of course it is." Nodding toward the others, she continued, "That's the inner circle … all his most trusted lieutenants. Pure bastards, the lot of them." Another gob of spit followed the first as she edged toward a wide bookshelf on the right hand side of the room. "All right, you've seen the dead slaver. Now, let's get out of here before the entire house comes down on our heads."

"Where's the gun?" He looked over the desk and the floor around it, then in the chair. No gun.

"What do you mean where's the gun? It's right … ." She slapped her hip. "It's gone." She spun one way then the other, as if she must have dropped it.

She was lying. Not about the gun, the surprise on her face when she found it missing was genuine, but Beatrix Shepard was lying up a storm about something else. "Who killed Krellid?" he asked, watching her as she glanced his way before resuming her search.

"I told you, I did." She made a disgusted sound in her throat. "He was a bastard, and you're worried about the fact he's dead?"

"No, I'm worried about why you're lying to me about being the one who did it." Garrus gave the chair and the dead slaver a shove, rolling it away from the desk, then bent over, activating the computer. No doubt a man like Krellid made sure that his panic room had generator backup for all his toys. Sure enough, the computer woke, bringing up an interface for the security systems. So, Krellid hadn't been casually sitting back, waiting for his Collector partners to clean up his problems. He'd been afraid, checking his … .

A thoughtful scowl pulled Garrus's browplates low. No, he hadn't been checking his security. Garrus scrolled through the open windows. Krellid had been searching for a hole in his security. He stopped on a screen that showed a maze of tunnels below the house, at least thirty or so metres deeper than the basement. A series of blinking tick marks showed where someone had tripped silent security alarms.

Bunny raised an eyebrow. "You're calling me a liar? That's rich."

Garrus straightened and pointed to each of the dead men. "Pistol shot. Pistol shot. Two pistol shots." He stabbed his thumb toward Krellid. "Five pistol shots." Brow plates lifting toward his crest, he shrugged. "How did you manage that without a pistol?"

She scoffed. "I lost it after I killed them. Seriously? If you're going to try to pull a Sherlock Holmes, think of the obvious." Her stare travelled back to the bookcase, then jerked away, returning to indifferent scorn.

"C-Sec senior investigator, kid. When I asked about your pistol, you went into your memory, trying to track where you lost it. You put it on this morning and hadn't touched it since." He leaned on one hip and crossed his arms. "Then, you got a look on your face that was both realization and fear. You know who took it and did this, and now you're afraid for them." He cocked his head. "How did I do?"

She just let out a derisive cough and continued staring the other way.

"Yeah, that's what I thought." He returned to the computer, searching for a way to restore comms. He found it amongst the controls for the security grid. Raising a hand to his radio, he called, "This is Vakarian, anyone reading me?"

"Boss!" Martin's voice exploded through Garrus's head like a missile. "We've been searching for nearly an hour. Where are you?"

"In Krellid's panic room with Beatrix Shepard." He returned to the desk, searching through the datapads and papers on its surface, looking for anything that would help him find Lucille. He found a great deal of evidence of Krellid's dealings with the Collectors, but nothing indicating the location of the shed. "We're making our way down the back way to avoid the second floor collapse."

"Huh?" Martin paused. "The second floor is fine, boss. Those exploding husks burned things up a little, but the fire system took care of it. The big beetle thing carved up the walls, but all our scans say it should hold together." He coughed. "How are you? Where are you? Do you need backup? And did you say Beatrix? You mean you found Bunny?"

"I did." Garrus looked over at the girl, noting the sudden stiffness in her posture, the way she had turned her back to him. "I'll let you know on the backup. What's the sitrep? How long have I been missing?"

"Just over ninety minutes. We kicked the Collectors in the ass, grabbed the slaves and ran, but ... ." Martin stopped, the pause going on long enough that Garrus wondered if the comms had been taken down again.

"What is it, kid? I haven't got a week to stand here while you build suspense." Garrus shoved everything he found into his belt pouches. Sorting through the treasures could wait until everyone was aboard ship and on their way home.

"It's like the slaves had been moved out of harm's way. We expected them to be used as shields, but both groups had been locked into rooms with reinforced walls. If I didn't know better, I'd say that someone had been trying to protect them."

"Yeah, roger that, Weaver," Garrus replied, his gaze returning to Bunny. "It's not the only strange thing going on here. Have you heard from the other teams?" He held his breath, waiting, although he felt fairly certain that if disaster had befallen the others, Martin wouldn't have buried the lead.

"They all report moderate losses and heavy casualties, mostly during the initial ambush, but mission success across the board. Ironically, Nyreen's team came through without a loss." The kid scoffed. "Because they were behind schedule, she got our warning about the ambush in time to prepare."

"Anything about Adrien?" he asked, dread beginning to erect walls just in case.

"He was badly wounded while covering his team's retreat: took a couple of blasts from an arm cannon on a giant husk. He's back aboard his ship and being treated. Last I heard, their doc expects him to pull through. Apparently he went into surgery shouting at them to save the data from his armour so they could develop shields to block that weapon."

Garrus chuckled, that information doing more to ease his concerns for his friend than anything else. Leaving the desk, he made his way over to the bookcase, eyes on the floor. "Okay. My informant here says that Lucille was being held somewhere called the shed. Does that sound familiar?"

Martin hummed. "No, but … ." The channel blipped. "Anderson? Do any of the slaves know where the shed is? Garrus says Lucille was being held there."

"He's alive?" The captain's deep, gruff voice came through heavy with both relief and aggravation. "Glad someone let me know. Hold on, I'll ask about the shed." Garrus heard him talking in the background. Less than a minute later, he came back. "It's called the shed, but it's a dungeon under the house in a sublevel."

"Thanks, Anderson. Did you get that, General?" Martin asked.

Garrus knew just the tunnels they meant. "Thank you, Anderson … Weaver. I'll stay in contact." Finding what he suspected in front of the bookcase, he turned back to face Bunny. "Vakarian, out."

"Good news," he said, "the second floor is perfectly intact, we can leave that way to find the shed and your mother." He strode to the door, but didn't even make it to the threshold before a hand snagged his vambrace.

"I told you, there's no point in going to the shed. Even if she was still alive, we can't get in." She stabbed her chin back the way they'd entered. "And we can't go that way. We'd have to pick our way back through all that crap and the foam slime. It'll take us an hour to get downstairs. A sharp, mocking laugh sliced through her words. "You'd end up slipping, hitting your head, and barfing all over me."

Tilting a nod toward the bookcase, she continued, "This is the fastest route." She headed that way, her manner completely at ease. "I know this house inside out. The back elevator is the quickest way down. Five minutes and we can be on our way."

"Okay, kid, I've put up with enough tarc from you. How much of what you've told me has been complete stulti?"
What had been done to Bunny was no less monstrous than what had been done to Kahri or their mother, that certainty held his frustration in check. Layering as much threat and no-nonsense cop tone into his voice as he could—the old suit fit surprisingly well—he said, "Take me to the shed. I'll find a way in."

When Qua'tien Krellid stared back, not even bothering to shrug, he let out an impatient hiss. As much as he understood that the child had been brainwashed and tortured into the person before him, Lucille's disappearance didn't allow for patience. Spirits, what had he caused with his carelessness? He closed his eyes for a half second, taking a deep breath to calm the storm battering at the inside of his keel.

Leaning down, he set his jaw, his expression steel and granite as he met the young woman's eyes at a level. "She's your mother, Beatrix. She's been held captive here every bit as long as you have, only she was forced to bear seven children and turn them over to the bastard who killed your father and very nearly killed your sister."

Layering in subvocals so thick and menacing that he saw the hair on her neck stand on end, he said, "I'm not leaving here without her, and as good a person as you think I might be, I'm also dangerous. Particularly to people blocking me from completing my mission, and today my mission is bringing back my girlfriend's mother."

Bunny spat in his face. "I'm not letting that traitorous bitch anywhere near Lucille."

Garrus wiped his mandible. "Charming, but now that I know your mother isn't lying dead in some shed—"

A gunshot echoed up through the house, then another. Garrus reached up to find out who was shooting, but then Bunny wrenched her arm loose and bolted. "Dammit, Bunny!" Opening the channel, he took off after her, racing through the dimly lit corridors. "Weaver, that shot come from any of our people?"

"No, sir. I didn't even hear a shot. We're all either on the Normandy or in the breeding compound."

"Roger that, situation rapidly heading for FUBAR. Vakarian, out." He paused at the top of a long series of staircases, looking down the center of them, his stomach wondering how long it would take vomit to hit the bottom. He swallowed it and turned on the flashlight attached to his pistol then started down, leaping down as quickly as he could manage given his equilibrium. Bunny managed the descent with much greater speed, so when he hit the end of twelve staircases, she had disappeared from sight.

Luckily, the corridor offered only two options, and one direction showed no disruption to the dust layer. Running, one hand trailing along the wall to keep his balance in the near dark, he followed the dust trail. Sloppy, if Bunny had been hiding someone down there. She should have laid false trails. Although, he supposed it didn't pay to train your captive daughter/captain of your guard to be too cagey.

A scream of pure rage and agony echoed toward him. Bunny! Throwing caution and sense to the wind, he pushed off the wall and raced down the tunnel. He found her outside a small, cell-like room, pacing like a maniac.

"What is it?" Leaning against the wall and a knee, he panted, sucking in long draughts of air. "What happened?"

The girl threw herself at him, but stopped short of beating him with the fist she raised over her head. "You happened." Bunny let out a shrill screech of fury and spun to slam her fist into the wall. "Your stupid rescue mission screwed up the perfect escape plan, you moron! Now … ." She paced the width of the tiny, dark room. "Now, he's got her!" Letting out another ferocious scream, she kicked a small stool, smashing it against the far wall.

Garrus let out his first full breath since he'd woken up suffocating on the floor. "Okay, give me the story, kid." Without waiting for her to start, he checked the room over for clues. Thick dust clung to the corners, brushed away from the center of the room by constant movement. Someone had done a lot of pacing in the tiny cell.

"When Lucille got back from the Citadel, Krellid hung her in the damned courtyard, pulled out all the slaves, lined them up to watch her whipped bloody for betraying him." Bunny paced a couple of steps one way then the other and slammed her fist against the wall. "Of course, he set her up to betray him. That was the whole point: lure you here. He knew who you were … knew she wouldn't resist an opportunity to bring him down."

A tiny corner of bright colour peeking out from under the pallet of blankets on the floor caught Garrus's attention. He glanced over at Bunny, then walked over and crouched, pulling the blankets aside. Mandibles fluttering in a sad sort of smile, he picked up the book on human painters. "Beautiful History: The 200 Most Influential Human Painters," he read out loud. Still crouched, he twisted to look up at Bunny. "Let me guess … you broke your mother out of the shed and hid her in here?" Brow plates raised, he stood and leaned toward her. "Did you tell him she was dead?"

"She just about was." Bunny's gaze slid over the book on its way to study the floor. "He just left her there. The bastard never intended to get her out … after everything … all the fucking money she made him over the years. Her back was covered in maggots … what could I do?" She spat without even a hiccough in her pacing. "I took her to the Mother House, and they started her healing. Then I brought her here, where I could take care of her."

"Guess he wasn't quite right about family, was he?" Garrus reached for her shoulder, but she ducked out from under her hand. He nodded. "Okay, let's find her." Turning toward the door, he studied the floor as he left the cell and entered the tunnel. Tracks cut through the thick layer of dust. He crouched again, trying to sort the different layers and movement patterns. "How much of the scuffling through the dust out here is from you and Lucille?"

The kid stepped around him and crouched down. She pointed to a boot print with a distinct heel. "That's me. The drag marks though … there." Standing, she took off. "He's got her. The bare feet, the sideways marks … that's her."

Garrus saw it and bolted after her. Definitely someone being pulled along in a tight grip. "Who's the dead man upstairs?"

"Marl, Krellid's right hand. Lucille should have just waited for me." Bunny cursed and stopped in the center of a junction between two tunnels. "She was supposed to wait. I was going to take out the lieutenants and Krellid in the panic room, then come and smuggle her out while you kept the Collectors off our backs." After a second, she bolted down the tunnel to the left. "He's taking her toward the hangar!"

Garrus didn't need her to tell him that they had to catch up to the slaver before he reached his means of escape. Needing all their air for the run, they simply raced side by side, stopping to check the trail at intersections. As fit as he'd been before getting blasted upstairs, Garrus felt all the weak spots in his patched together body by the time they came to an open door that led out into the storm.
Bunny didn't even slow, apparently forgetting that the shots they'd heard meant that Krellid was armed. Garrus, however, had been bent, broken, and spindled more than enough for one day and slowed down, moving forward with at least partial cover as much as possible. One hand protecting his eyes from the blinding downpour, splashing through water sometimes as deep as his mid-calf, Garrus picked his way forward.

They found Krellid wrestling with Lucille about halfway across a wide, landscaped lawn that looked more like a lake … two pale ghosts amidst the miniature whitecaps pushed along by the gale. A shot whined past Garrus's head, close enough to hear over the wind and thunder, and sent him dodging toward cover behind a large palm tree.

"Krellid!" Bunny shouted. Garrus gut tied itself into a nice, tight double knot when she raised her shotgun. "Let her go. I did what you said." The kid was going to get herself killed.

"Spirits, Kahri, the things I do since I met you." Muttering under his breath, Garrus stepped out of cover, moving toward Bunny. He needed to be close enough to get her down and behind him if bullets started flying. No way was he going back to Omega to tell Shepard that he'd gotten her mother and sister killed. Krellid stopped, slipping in the deep water and grass as Lucille jerked him back and forth, the woman's whole body writhing as she fought to get free.

"What a grand day for you, General," the slaver said, his voice disappearing into the thunder. "Vengeance for the woman you love … Archangel saves thousands of slaves and returns them to their families … a victory over the Collectors."

"Bunny, back away from him," Garrus called, letting Krellid's taunts slide right off. "Don't let him goad you. He wants you to do something to get yourself and your mother killed." Holding his breath, he inched forward, one arm holding his pistol on Krellid, the other reaching out to snag the teenager's armour.

Bunny lunged forward. "Krellid, you bastard, I got him here!" She got three steps before the gun turned on her, and she slid to a stop, arms pinwheeling to keep her balance. "Let her go!"

Garrus stepped up beside her, glancing back and forth between the slaver, Lucille, and Bunny. "So this was a set up? Trade one dead general for your mother?" Taking the chance that between his struggling prisoner, the storm, and the combination of adrenaline and fear, Krellid's hands would be shaking too hard to wing him let alone get a head shot, Garrus turned to face Bunny. "It never occurred to you that I'd be willing to make that trade without being lied to? All you had to do was tell me the truth, and I could have helped."

The kid cursed, shooting him with a fifty calibre glare. "Doesn't matter now, does it?" She took another step toward Krellid, her hands held out. "You're a lying bastard. You were never going to let her go, were you?"

The slaver wrenched at Lucille's neck as the woman stomped on his foot and twisted, almost breaking free. He slammed the pistol into her cheek, and she slumped, hanging from his arm.

"Mom!" Bunny leaped forward, as Krellid staggered a little at the sudden weight.

Recovering, the bastard swung the pistol back to Bunny. "And reward your betrayal, Qua'tien?" Garrus saw the slaver's vicious laughter slice Bunny to the bone. "Did you think I wouldn't know who took your mother out of the shed, little girl?" Krellid bared his teeth. "Oh yes, my beloved, doting daughter, I've always known about all your hideouts and your little secrets." The mocking smile melted from his face, sliding off with the rain. "After all I've done for you … after all the trust … this is how you repay me?" He jabbed the pistol into Lucille's temple.
"You tortured me, beating me unconscious when I didn't learn fast enough or show enough respect!" Bunny lunged forward, then danced sideways a step. "Then you'd beat me and lock me in the dark for a week with nothing but my piss to drink and my filth to lie in, you son of a bitch! How is that care or trust? You used my mother as a weapon against me for fifteen years."

Seeing that she was trying to distract the slaver, draw him around so Krellid's back was to him, Garrus remained as still and unassuming as possible.

Krellid yanked Lucille's limp body around, keeping her between him and Garrus. "Oh no, you don't." The pistol lunged toward each of them. "Stay where you are, or I start shooting."

"You can't shoot Lucille," Garrus said, fighting the steady, pounding drumbeat of the rain. "You need her to get out of here."

"I'm a dead man!" Krellid screamed back, his voice manic, hysterical laughter bubbling through. "We both know that, General. But if I'm going to die, I'm going to take these two bitches with me. I'll die as Tir'Lak Remit, with Shepard blood pouring over my hands."

The batarian staggered, his stare going dead, his features slack. Done stalling his own death, Krellid swung the pistol toward Bunny. Garrus sprinted toward the teenager, throwing himself between her and the gun, but Lucille moved faster. Krellid let out a strangled squawk as his limp victim sprang to sudden and vicious life.

Spinning in his arms, Lucy slammed her knee into his groin. So quick that Garrus didn't have time to react even if he'd had the inclination, the woman punched the slaver in the ribs five or six times. Krellid dropped to his knees, his face suddenly slack, black eyes sightless. Lucille threw a long, bloody piece of broken glass in his face even as he slumped into the mud.

"That's for my girls, and for Franklin, you bastard," she screamed then spat on him. She turned to face them, her face a dull mask of shock. Garrus spun mid-stride, lunging to catch her, but before he got there, her legs gave out. She sank to her knees, splashing as she hit the grass, harsh, screaming sobs tearing from her mouth. Bloody fists clutched at her shift, working their way up the filthy material as they migrated to her mouth, pressing against her open, gasping lips.

"Mom!" Bunny raced across the churned up lawn, hydroplaning the last eight metres on her armoured knees. "Are you okay? He didn't hurt you, did he?" The teenager's frantic hands searched her mother for wounds, then wrapped around Lucille's neck, holding her tight. "I'm sorry. I'm so sorry. The general knew. He figured it out."

Garrus crouched a couple of metres away, giving them their space. They'd been through quite enough that day without him adding any more stress. "Are you all right?" Relief washed through him, leaving him warmer, but shaking and suddenly very, very tired. He reached out, gently examining the bruised lump on Lucille's cheek. It didn't look as though Krellid had managed a solid enough blow to break the bone. "How are your hands?"

Lucy nodded, then buried her face in the tangled, soaking tendrils of her daughter's hair. "I'm fine, General." A pallid smile drifted across her face. "In fact, I don't think I've been better in a very, very long time." She kissed Bunny's cheek. "Come on, let's get out of this storm. I want to get dry and warm." She kissed her daughter again, then let out a deep, throaty moan of longing. "And I'd give just about anything for a cup of sweet, milky tea."

Garrus stood and wrapped an arm around her, lifting her from the water. "I think we can take care of that for you. "He held out an arm toward the door. "We'll head straight through to the Normandy, and Dr. Chakwas can look at that cheek while you drink your tea." Once Lucille seemed stable on her feet, he offered a hand to Bunny, raising a brow plate in a mild challenge.

"Fine." The kid took it and pulled herself up. "You do-gooders … you're all the same. Massive pains in the ass."

"Yeah, well, you'd only know because you're an even bigger pain in the ass." He jutted his chin toward the mansion. "Come on, kid, let's get out of this storm. I feel like crap."

"Yeah, well, just don't puke on me. Damned turians." She swaggered away a few steps and then turned back. Something in her expression curdled in his gut, and for a second throwing up became a real possibility once more. Pure hatred flickered behind the young-old eyes that had seen far too much. "And don't think all this …" She circled her index finger to indicate the three of them. "... means I lied about killing my ex-sister. That bitch fed us to the fucking lions." Before he could say anything, she turned back and marched ahead, calling back over her shoulder. "She'll get hers, I promise."

Garrus sighed and offered Lucille a supportive arm that she leaned into gratefully, walking slowly but with a strength in keeping with the mother of the two most stubborn human females in existence, and the slave who'd freed herself using a broken chunk of glass.

"She doesn't remember." Garrus looked down as the woman spoke. "She was so young, so scared and brutalized that she locked all those memories away. And, of course, Krellid brainwashed her." Lucille pitched her voice to stay between them. "He told her that Janey had sold us for her freedom, and that the only way to ensure my life was to be a good slave and earn freedom for us both." Eyes dark with sorrow and suffering looked up into his, and for a moment, she leaned even heavier on his arm. "She'll come around once we get her away from here, and she has time to learn what really happened to her sister."

Garrus nodded. "Did she tell you that Jane is alive?" He winced a little, hoping that Bunny had mentioned it when he just threw it out there like that. Sometimes he made krogan look like the masters of tact.

Lucille nodded, but stared up at him with a shocky sort of blank expression. "It seems a miracle." Her brow furrowed. "She truly died?"

Garrus nodded. "In my arms." He smiled and gave her arm a gentle squeeze. "And it is a miracle. She's struggling, trying to find her feet, but it's Jane."

She clung to his arm. "I look forward to getting to know her again." They walked several strides in silence before she asked, "Is she still impossible?"

Garrus chuckled. "Completely." Just before they reached the door into the house, he stopped. "I'm going to have to keep Bunny under guard until we find a way to bring her around. I can't risk Shepard. I hope you understand."

Lucille turned a little to face him, her free hand gripping his. "I understand, General. Janey is very lucky to have someone who cares so much and watches over her so well. I trust you to do your best for my youngest." She patted his hand then turned to the door, shivering a little. "Come, let's escape this wretched place."

"Yes, ma'am." Garrus palmed the door control, then stepped back to allow her to enter first. Relief, and gratitude, and amazement, and joy … absolute joy resonated a four part harmony through him as he followed the two women into the house and through.
"Oh no." Lucille stopped at the door to the front sitting room. When Garrus peered over her shoulder, he saw that part of the ceiling had collapsed. The woman's hands gave a helpless, distressed flutter. "Some of the articles in this room were quite literally priceless."

Garrus cleared his throat to thwart a laugh. Shepard women really were damned near indestructible.

Lucille spun to face him. "Please tell me that we're going to salvage all this art … the books. We can't just abandon them, or leave them to be pillaged by other criminals." She drew herself up tall and straight, all nettles and thorns. "Once I take a shower and get in some clean, warm clothes, I can bring your people in here … show them what to save. There are crates … ."

Garrus just watched her go, both admiring her spirit and fearing her reaction to what he'd do with most of her treasures. When she ground to a halt, he nodded. "On two conditions. First, whatever doesn't need to be sent to a museum, is sold to help fund Archangel and Sanctuary." He pulled his mandibles in tight, clenching them against the grin that wanted to answer her comically suspicious glare.

"And the second?" Her words came out slow and loaded.

"That you scan the rooms structurally before going in, listen to my people if they tell you to get out if it becomes unsafe, and that it's all wrapped up in the next twenty four hours."

"That sounded like three conditions, but I agree to all of them." She turned and marched with vigor toward the door.

Garrus turned to Bunny who was sorting through the rubble looking for something. "Are you going to help her?"

The kid shrugged but didn't stop. "Don't I need to go directly to a cell and start the head shrinking?"

The bastard child of a sigh and a grumble rolled from his throat. "I trust you to not hurt any of my people. Will you disappoint me?"

She set her back to a huge chunk of plaster. "Help me out, here?" When he didn't move, waiting for her to answer his question, she shrugged. "Okay, yes, I'm not going to hurt your lackeys. Why would I? They've never done anything to me." Jerking her head toward the piece of ceiling, she said, "Well, lend a hand!"

Garrus strode over and wedged a shoulder under the rubble, helping her lift it and push it aside. He watched her search for a few minutes, not sure if he should say anything or not. The kid probably wouldn't hear him, but maybe that didn't matter. Maybe she needed him to say his piece anyway. Or, maybe he just needed to say it.

"Look, kid, I know you're going to just chalk what I have to say up to a bunch of stulti, but I'm going to say it, anyway. I'm also just going to say it once." He took a deep breath. "I love your sister. I have for a couple of years now, so I know her about as well as anyone can. I've seen her scars … the whip marks that covered her from her neck all the way down over the soles of her feet, back and front … the bite marks from where they set their varren on her and where Remit and one of the other slavers took their revenge for when she bit them trying to get you to safety."

He backed up a couple of steps as she pushed in on him, continuing her search without showing any sign of listening to him. He pressed on anyway. "I've held her when she woke screaming from nightmares. I've been unable to make love to her, because every touch awakens the ghosts of them raping her for twenty seven hours straight." He swallowed hard and took a couple of long, slow breaths to wrestle his emotions in line. "Your sister was left staked to the ground when the slavers pulled out. They thought she was dead. So did the Alliance medic who found her. So while your sister has spent the last fifteen cycles out in the galaxy, believe me … she's been anything but free."

"Ah ha! There you are." Bunny dove into the rubble, cackling a little as she dug. Straightening, she held up an old, battered tin mug. She kissed it and clipped it to her belt, grinning up at him in victory. "I was sitting in that chair, drinking my coffee and watching the news when you lot flew in. Thought I might have lost the old girl. Morning cup just wouldn't be the same without her."

Garrus nodded and turned toward the door out, his gaze landing on Lucille, standing just the other side of the threshold. She held his stare for a moment, slow tears rolling through the dampness left by the rain, but then, after a couple of breaths, she nodded and turned, drifting toward the front door.

"Yeah." Garrus sighed and followed. His welcome home gift would prove to be even greater than he'd planned, but far more complicated than he'd hoped. Still, he'd come in to bring down the bastard who'd hurt his … his mate and find her mother. Mission accomplished, even if his victory festered in his gut, a grenade buried in a stone. The day had birthed so many more questions than it laid to rest.

First and foremost amongst those … the Collectors and their arsenal of monsters. Where did they come from? How many of them were there? And how were they going to defeat them?

(A-N: Okay, so I lied. Turns out Garrus and Bunny wanted to be first. I might not be posting twice a week for a while. I think everyone can understand how posting nearly 20K words a week can wear, but most importantly, it doesn't give me mulling time. We're getting deep into the struggle now, so I need to give the characters time to give me their full awesomeness. I need time to plot ahead. I loved this chapter. Writing it made me just insanely happy, and I'd like that to be the experience for as many chapters as possible. :D Thanks for reading. So much, and thanks for being awesome. Hugs!)
Chapter Summary

He looked up, meeting her eyes. "I think I know what the question is," Nihlus said. He gathered his feet under him and shoved himself up off the stone floor, a crooked grin greeting the creaking and popping of his joints. Up and balanced, he stared into Shepard's eyes, his mandibles betraying the war between elation and terror raging in his gut. "They aren't asking if they have a soul like the geth did."

Her nod told him that she'd already considered that possibility.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Jennic: (Jennix plural): Tree dwelling, heavily fur-covered marsupial analogues native to Thessia. They are solitary creatures that travel hundreds of kilometres to mate, finding one another through loud, eerie howls. In asari lore, the howls were long believed to belong to the souls of deceased lovers calling out to one another from beyond the Veil of Tears.

Ceraya: The folds of skin and tissue that protect prothean female's four small, independent uteri located in the mid to lower back, about a hand's width to either side of the spine. (Yes, TMI)

37 Days ASR

Neither of them knew who came up with the idea to willfully separate their memories and pull forward some from Tashac and Merol as well; flood the computer with as much data as they could. As soon as the plan appeared, just as they turned their attention to the walls they'd created to keep the prothean imprints at bay, the current swept their feet out from under them.

Shepard turned away from Anderson, letting out a tiny sigh as the elevator door to the wards access opened. Of course the computer would flag her death. Taking a deep breath, she nodded. It worked to their advantage if the computer really was having difficulty processing their data. She could let it play out. She didn't consciously remember most of it, anyway, and seeing it might just allow her to recognize the next attempt.

Outside the elevator, Garrus leaned against the alley wall as if he'd been waiting there forever rather than a few seconds. Damn, he looked good, and she grinned as a delicious, truly unsubtle heat blossomed deep in her belly. Her eyes locked onto his mouth, remembering the passion with which he'd kissed her, always so tempered by his patience, but there and strong.

He pushed off the wall and held up a liquor store bag, showing it off like a game show assistant. "I got the good stuff for Tali. So filtered, it doesn't even know if it's alcohol any more."

Still wearing a smile far too wide to look anything but idiotic, she stepped out and slipped her arm through his offered elbow. "Excellent. Now we have the makings of a first rate party." He tugged his arm free to wrap it around her, pulling her in tight against him.
Shepard glanced up as the elevator at the end of the hallway opened, a few civilians stepping out. Her heart began to beat hard and fast at the base of her throat, but she simply leaned into her boyfriend's side and eased her arm around his waist. Boyfriend … damn, she liked the sound of that. She gave his thigh an affectionate little bump with her hip. "Relax, Brother C-Sec. I've got you."

His mandibles fluttered a little. "Yeah, I guess you do." He bent to nuzzle her temple. "You okay?"

Her smile turned sad, but she forced her lips to do their best to reassure him. "Yeah, I am now." Consoling herself a little with the sound of his voice, she let herself enjoy that warmth fluttering in her belly. Her heart belonged to him, and just as he'd said it would, her body ached to follow. "You know, Garrus, something just occurred to me," she said, lowering her voice to a husky whisper.

His brow plates arched, and he pulled her tighter against his side. Leaning down, he whispered back, "What's that?"

She hesitated and glanced behind them to see Nihlus watching her even as he and Anderson discussed whether Udina should be assigned bodyguards. She shook her head to warn him to separate himself from the memory. Trying to overload the system offered them only a slim chance, but better a slim chance than just letting the machine turn them into thoroughly analyzed paste.

As she looked back into Garrus's eyes, her smile returned, still sad but radiating love. "After today, you aren't really on my crew any more." She purred a little, deep in her throat, letting herself feel that promise … what would have happened if they'd made it back to the Normandy. The sweet anticipation of his gentle hands and breath-stealing passion. "You know what that means, don't you?"

He made a show of thinking about it, his mandibles and brow plates working comically. "Um . . . I never have to suffer through you driving the Mako again?"

Delight coloured her startled laugh. "You're such a poop!" She nudged him with her elbow. "Okay, I'll give you that one, but it also exempts you from my 'never with my crew' rule."

His response came out only as a rumble in his throat that cut straight through her, making her skin lift in gooseflesh. A shy smile brought her eyes back up to the civilians. Most of them passed her by without any notice. One man looked at her … no, nothing so innocent. He was a missile locked onto a target.

She turned in her torin's arm to look up into his eyes. "Garrus … " No. No, it was too soon. So many things had gone unsaid because she'd buried herself in too much fear to trust his great spirit. Heart pounding, each beat wringing it out like an old sponge, she spun to face him. Reaching up with one hand, she pressed it against his cheek. It might not be real, but maybe, somehow, he might feel her right the wrong she'd done him if she could just say it. "... I love you. I want you to know that." Tears burst free, pooling along her lashes as fear rolled in, intractable and heavy. "You're going to be okay."

The man bumped into her, his arm inside her sling—

"I'm so sorry." She held her breath, clinging tight to her boyfriend's bewildered stare, wishing those eyes to be the last thing she saw.

…(concurrent)...

The endless dance twirled above her, a billion candles amongst the black shining light and warmth down on the children of the new cycle. Tashac sat on the top step, her toes cool and wet in the soft grass, wood hewn by Merol's talented hands still warm under her backside despite the sun long having abandoned them. She folded down, bracing her elbows on her knees, then resting her kepala in her hands.

My beautiful children, I miss you more with every passing day. I miss the sound of never-to-be grandchildren and mates filling the house. Sometimes, I can hear you all as if you are a room away, and my heart breaks anew as I recall lying you out and releasing you. Antecessors, if you heed only one plea from this old, broken soldier, allow me the chance to rest in their light once the darkness of this life is finished with me.

All the children and mates, mothers and fathers yet to be born, forgive me.

The Voice broke through her prayer, dragging her toward the mountain until it took all her remaining energy to resist that call. Not even meditation pushed the darkness back any longer. As endless as the movement of the stars, the chorus of the Reapers' conflux chanted, a constant echo in the back of her mind, drowning out memory and joy and love.

It spoke of endless things, its multitudes of minds all talking, answering, debating, and somehow always finding consensus. It discussed breaking free of the Masters' Calling, of preparing for the next Harvest, and always … always the mad obsession with the Question. They never spoke it, but she knew it traced its origin all the way back to Harbinger. That sterile, pitiless intelligence had been the first created, the first to ask, even before it broke free, building a body for its massive mind. It had thought a body might answer the question, but harvesting the race of its masters and creators had provided only form, not substance.

Sometimes, she wondered if Harbinger even remembered the question. Other times it seemed as though insanity sang, shrill and harsh through the conflux, thousands of giant, complex minds all driven mad by the question. She suspected the latter to be true, to have searched so long, repeating the same pattern over and over without ever discovering what it wanted to know. That would drive anyone … or anything mad.

And now, her entire galaxy had been swallowed by that madness. Her children … bitter tears fell as their faces appeared. Seven beautiful, strong lives wasted before they even learned the joy of mates and babies, of lives spent fulfilling passions rather than wallowing in blood and despair.

Merol's slow footsteps on the terrace reached out to pull her back from the abyss. She traced his progress as he crossed the planks and stepped down the three stairs to sit by her side. He didn't touch her as he would have five cycles before. Back before the darkness made her anxious and afraid, he would have sat down and wrapped her tight in against his side. Oh, how she mourned for those days. He remained her heart, the good cool air in her lungs, but sometimes it wasn't her that responded to his presence, but rather the infestation at her center.

One night, he tried to wake her from a nightmare, but it hadn't been her who woke. When she surfaced, she'd found him slumped against the nest, bleeding and unconscious. The memory coaxed a moan, low and desolate, from her throat, as if she answered the lonely howls of the jennie echoing up from the forest below. That day, her beautiful mate stopped touching her before ensuring that he faced the mother of his last children rather than the monster.

"What are you doing within the mountain, haksaya kubenar?" Merol asked, his voice pitched low and soothing.
Tashac let out a soft sigh. The same question every night, and every night she possessed no answer to satisfy him. The monster worked within the mountain, granting her only momentary glimpses of freedom when it needed the chiasticilia ordered about. For all their strength to subjugate minds and enslave souls … for all the cataclysmic power of their will, the Reapers possessed no ability to command the tiny beings they'd corrupted. She found that irony delicious and sweet, ripe with the smallest of justices.

Every night, she tried to tell her mate what little she knew, but Sovereign never allowed it.

Instead, she leaned against his side. "I am so very weary, my heart." She rested her head on his shoulder and wrapped her arms around him. "So very ready for an end." Rubbing the edge of her kepala along his, she let out a long breath. "I remain sure of so little, but you hold me fast."

A soft, musical sigh wrapped around them. "I'm no longer certain if that is a good thing." Merol pulled free of her arms, stood, and climbed the stairs.

"Cikabeknai? Please do not leave me." Tashac turned, a soft whimper of relief dragging from her throat when she saw her beloved was simply moving to sit on the step behind her. Letting out a ragged, desolate sigh, she closed her eyes, trying to calm the sudden, frantic terror. Of course he hadn't walked away. The father of her last children, her mate of more than sixty cycles, would never just walk away.

"Do you know what I hold onto, my love?" Merol whispered, his arms so very tight and warm around her. Tashac merely leaned back into him and tipped her head. No.

It shamed her, but no, she no longer knew her love's soul the way she once had. As that realization blossomed within her, it pushed back the darkness ever so slightly. Her eyes … all this time, her eyes had been focused in the wrong direction, seeking to fight the darkness by looking within. Oh, such a fool. Had there ever been a greater fool? Of course, the darkness grew, feasting upon her selfishness.

"What do you hold onto, Merol?" She twisted to look up into the glittering gold of his eyes.

Brushing her kepala with his own, he smiled and said, "I remember Giran's birth. Do you remember that?" He chuckled and pressed his cheek against her neck. "I believe it angered her that I helped ease Attit into the air before her. The birth-matrons had never seen the like of those little hands pushing from you, Giran pulling herself free from your folds." He sighed and nuzzled the sensitive spot along the edge of her kepala where it plunged down toward her neck. "You always said, protheans were born fighting."

His eyes glistened. "I have spent more than sixty cycles at your side, the only place I can imagine finding happiness. I eased five lives from the care of your body into this galaxy, watched Lulyak deliver two more. Raised seven, beautiful children … loved them all as my own. Each one of them grew up fighting and died fighting, but because of you, they knew more than battle. They knew hope and how to cherish joy wherever they could find it. You taught them to fight for a better life, not just to kill the enemy."

"I have forgotten … allowed the darkness to steal far too much from my mind and heart." Tashac let out a soft sigh, her entire being relaxing into his hands as he stroked her neck and shoulders, thumbs dragging along the ridge of ligaments tying her shoulder into her neck and back. "I have always hated those antecessor-cursed statues on Ilos, their heads cast down, spines dragging so low. An entire race's defeat carved into stone … how my spirit railed against them. And now my spirit bears that same shape."
Merol's hands slipped lower, following the line of her spine. "I know that the Vanguard eats away at you, beautiful mother of my last children. Does it hurt you to fight it? Have you truly reached the end of your strength?" He hesitated, caressing just above her proximal ceraya.

Tashac leaned forward, rounding her back, encouraging the contact. She tipped her head a little as her muscles began to relax, her mate's touch prompting an instinct as old as her people. "That is what you meant?" she asked, seeing his heart as clearly as her own. He worried that he truly was all that kept her going, her heart defeated.

… (concurrent)...

Nihlus rubbed Shepard's back as she choked, his mandibles giving a hard flick as he said, "Actually, Captain, I'm not her boyfriend, I'm just in love with her. Well, and we were bond-mates in prothean memories that the beacons stuffed into our heads … had two kids … spent a lifetime together."

Anderson's continually morphing expression gave Nihlus a strange satisfaction. Sort of the way he imagined it must feel to show up at the parent's domin after sneaking off to bond in secret. Anderson pulled a handkerchief from his pocket and passed it to Shepard, his laser drill stare boring straight into Nihlus. The intensity just increased Nihlus's amusement.

"Prothean bond-mates? Had two kids?" The captain shook his head. "That one is going to take a little explaining."

Shepard drew Nihlus's attention, wheezing a little before blowing her nose. Giving him a scowl that hit harder than a guided missile, she stomped on his foot. Blithely ignoring the threat in her stare, and the pounding ache in his foot, Nihlus just patted her back while she leaned on her knee, trying to catch her breath.

"No," Shepard said, the word a sharp bark aimed at Anderson. Nihlus grinned as he watched the teasing war of wills playing out around him. "Get those thoughts out of your head, sir. You don't get to pull your, 'Son, come help me decide which shotgun to take on this mission' stunts anymore. I'm not an eighteen year old cadet."

The elevator ground to a halt, the door letting out a sharp ding as they arrived at the alley to the wards. Nihlus's heart crashed as reality registered, all his amusement dying in a landslide of dread. How many times had he watched those exact minutes play over and over on his omnitool? How many times had he watched his moment come and go, Shepard's blood splashing across Garrus's face, painting the other torin's silhouette on the wall?

Anderson's warm laugh buffeted the Spectre's cocoon of misery, the laugh of a father proud to have protected his daughter so well. "You've got to admit, having the suitors help me choose my weapons got you a lot of extra study time."

Shepard stepped from the carriage, her entire posture changing the moment she saw Garrus. Nihlus let out a long breath composed of yearning, regret, and a gentle sort of gladness. He'd messed up … messed up … yeah, if that wasn't the understatement of all time … and Garrus had been there to support her, to be her partner and shoulder to lean on, the way Nihlus should have been. He envied the other torin the way Shepard began to glow the moment she entered Garrus's gravity. Despite her saying that they were fine … that she didn't regret their hard beginning, Nihlus feared he'd never bring that instant, easy smile to her face.

Shepard slipped in against Garrus's side and the pair led the way down the corridor.
Nihlus looked down the deserted alley, his emotions ripping him apart like two preteril fighting over a soluvermus. He chuffed softly, earning a raised eyebrow from Anderson, but didn't look toward the captain. Any second the door at the other end of the alley would open and five people would get out. All of them would seem harmless. He'd watch them without really paying any attention, his concentration on Anderson's continued disbelief that Shepard chose Udina to become humanity's council member. Halfway down the alley, the completely unremarkable human would appear to stumble and then catch himself on Shepard's bad arm.

Hand reaching for his shotgun even before he saw the man's weapon, Nihlus would open his mouth to call out a warning. And then the moment would be gone, taking Shepard with it.

The Spectre clench his teeth and pulled his neck back, setting his shoulders. "Not this time." Anderson turned to look at Nihlus, the captain's hand moving to his sidearm without a second's hesitation.

The door opened, the civilians stepped out. A fierce, indignant sort of rage greeted the human as he appeared. How dare he steal Shepard from the galaxy? Did he even really know who he was murdering? Did he care?

Fury pulled Nihlus's mandibles back, locking them in a sneer. It didn't matter. At last he had a chance to do what he'd dreamed so many times. The man lingered behind the others, letting them get ahead three then four metres, enough to have them clear, but not enough to draw attention to himself. Heart freezing solid, everything disappearing into smoke but his anger and a sharp laser focus, Nihlus let the man close.

"Not her. Not this time." It might not give him or his fratrin the last two cycles back. It might not change the reality of Shepard having to find herself back in a body and a life two years dead. It might not stop the nightmares and it might not close the hole in his gut that howled endlessly.

But it couldn't hurt to try.

He watched Shepard jump a little and laugh at something Garrus said. He'd always wondered what his fratrin had teased her about, but respected Garrus's grief too much to prod him for the details.

Fifteen metres. Ten. The world slowed down around him, allowing a clarity of sight that even watching the vid hadn't allowed. He could see it all … the way the human hesitated, looking interested in something on the floor to allow the other pedestrians to gain more clearance … the subtle movements and signals that told him unspoken promises had been made between Shepard and Garrus … the way Anderson moved in sync with him, demonstrating the veteran captain's absolute trust in a fellow soldier's instincts.

Nihlus's heart dropped back into place, its rhythm calming to just slower than normal, blood carrying resolution to steady his hands and power his legs. His breathing slowed and deepened. Spectre Kryik present, accounted for, and locked on target. Opting for the accuracy of his sidearm instead of his previous choice of shotgun, he drew in a long breath and shouted, "Garrus! Cover Shepard!"

Garrus reacted instantly, grabbing Shepard and curling around her, spinning to put his body between the civilians and his girlfriend. Bearing her to the floor, he shoved her in against the wall, as Nihlus and Anderson strode forward, guns lifting and opening fire. The assassin went for his weapon, but too late, his head disintegrating into a spatter of blood, and bone, and hair.

Nihlus staggered to a stop, the muzzle of his gun dropping toward the floor. For a split second, his pulse pounded in his ears, but then he let out a long, harsh cry of tangled victory and mourning.
He'd done it. Finally. He sank to his knees on the floor, all the anger and self-incrimination and even sorrow draining away. He'd done it. He'd saved her, and more importantly, he'd seen that without foreknowledge, she could never have been saved.

"Nihlus?" Shepard crouched next to him, her arm draped around his neck. Lowering herself to kneel, knees pressed against his thigh, she let out a long sigh. "Did you see it?" She leaned in to rest her brow against the side of his head.

Nodding, he whispered, his voice scarcely louder than her breath, "It always had to happen."

"Yeah." She pressed her lips against his hide. "And it really is okay. Not perfect. Not the direction I would have wished for my life, but okay."

… (concurrent) …

Merol rejoiced at the light and hope that burst through his mate. He truly had feared her finished, and he stood such a very long distance from being ready to lose her. Even though he might be an old prothean, and as such, having been gifted so very much more than all his contemporaries … . Well, no one remained to call him selfish for holding onto a few extra cycles with his love.

Sliding his hands down her spine, he let his thumbs caress her ceraya, smiling as she relaxed, and opened her mind and heart to him. Most of their adult lives, they'd just had to brush fingers to know everything the other felt. No secrets. Nothing hidden between them. Sovereign hid so much of her away that he no longer even dared touch her before speaking. Ah, the irony of being the indoctrination-free mate when he toyed with Reaper technology his entire adult life, and Tashac destroyed it.

How bitter that draught spread across his tongue and through his soul. Even as his mate opened to him, allowing her entire being to show, he could see the darkness, a singularity at her center. It consumed her in tiny bites, nibbling away at everything strong, at the beauty that had stolen his heart the moment he laid eyes on her.

Nearly sixty-five cycles lie between the dusk that streaked the sky above him and the bright, golden morning when the manager of the military science facility escorted the new head of security into Merol's lab. Mouth hanging open, he'd stared, never having seen anyone to equal the sheer presence of Junior Captain Tashac Jacar. As was proper and respectful, Tashac had bowed her head to him when the facility manager introduced them.

For his part, he could only blame some intrinsic force of the universe for his fingers reaching out to skate along her arm. Surely, without the interference of universal-level forces, he would never initiate such familiar and disrespectful contact, especially with someone who could kill him fifteen ways using just one hand. No, powerful cosmic forces—the same that coaxed the stars to dance—had whispered in his aural receptors, enthralling him with the notion of finding out if what lie at Tashac's heart matched the magnificence of her surface.

"Were you disappointed?" Tashac asked, teasing a little as she wriggled further onto her stair. She leaned into him, her back brushing his belly with every movement. Silken thoughts caressed his, cool and diaphanous but also gaining strength, resilient. Sweet and rich, but piquant with spice, her emotions swelled to defy the darkness, calling to him with that same music that had ensorcelled his fingers all those cycles before.

"Not a single moment," he replied, even knowing he didn't need to. Looking up at the brilliantly painted sky, he let out a long sigh of contentment and held his mate in the circle of his arms. The whispered song of the wind pushed the eerie silence of the mountain up the slope, allowing peace
"No," Tashac said at last. She turned to look into his eyes. The brilliant violet glinted with some of her old joy and spirit. "No, it doesn't hurt, my love. Fighting their darkness is fuel, not defeat. As are you, and the memory of my children." Jutting her chin out a little, she smiled and said, "Make room for me on the top stair?"

Merol returned her smile, his body warming to the heat in her thoughts. He slid back, watching as she stood and slipped off her robe. She hung it over the railing and climbed up, sitting between his thighs. Twisting to face him, she caressed the ridge of his kepala with her own, eyes closing as their love and ardor fed into one another, mingling and growing.

When she turned her back to him and curled down over her knees, he folded around her, feeling truly connected to his mate for the first time in cycles.

Later, when they retired to their nest, and she slept, he resolved to find a way into the mountain. During their joining, he'd caught glimpses of the work going on within those tunnels and caves. The Vanguard would never allow Tashac to destroy what they built, but he … he could be sure that they never fulfilled their purpose.

And in her sleep, Tashac screamed.

...

The world inside their heads shifted, a boot stuck in mud wriggling ever so slightly to create a thin pocket of air around it. The computer remained silent, but Nihlus felt the claws digging into him loosen. If changing their dreams to add emotions missing from the real experience and events loosened its hold, what would the machine do with hope? Did he have enough freedom under their microscope to bring in wishes for the future … dreams rather than memories?

… (nearly concurrent) …

"Mmmm, that was lovely." Shepard let out a long, happy-sounding sigh, her expression one of languid contentment. She grinned as she stretched, a trill of pleasure rolling deep in her throat.

Nihlus waited, a slow smile spreading his mandibles as the silence dragged on from seconds to a minute. Watching her out of the corner of his eye, he saw blank slate of satiation and pleasure overwritten, replaced by concerns that slowly piled up until she rolled over to face him.

"I'm up early to take that band of newbies on live fire maneuvers and then home late-ish tomorrow night." Shepard winced when he laughed, then sighed and chuckled. Sliding her leg over his, she curled in tight against his side. "Ugh, I didn't even last five minutes, did I? I thought you were supposed to smack me if I started doing the whole human day-planner thing within an hour of orgasm." She lifted herself up on her elbow and kissed him. "Sorry."

"Spanking is more foreplay than punishment, isn't it?" He grinned and relaxed down into his pillows, savouring the weight of the arm thrown over his keel, her heat warming his side. "Go ahead, plan our days, I don't mind. I know you're just freaking out because both Izzy and Terrus are heading to school in the morning." Opening one eye at the soft, almost keening sound she made at the mention of their youngest going out into the big galaxy of growing up, he grinned and lifted his head to nuzzle her lips. "You'll be fine. They're both still your babies. And to answer what you haven't asked, I'm home tomorrow, so I can get the kids off to school and pick them up."

She kissed him again and draped over him, her head on his shoulder. "Garrus is heading to the Citadel. He's staying overnight, but he doesn't leave for the spaceport until nearly midday." She lifted up just high enough to look down into his eyes. "How about we all get up a half hour early so we can have breakfast together? I'll bring home supper, and afterward, you and I can take the kids down to the park and run them around. Then we can just curl up in bed and watch a vid or something once they pass out."

He nuzzled her lips and leaned in to touch brows. "Sounds perfect. However, the day after tomorrow, you and Garrus are going to have to organize yourselves because I've actually got to go do some work … take out some bad guys … enforce galactic justice, etc."

Shepard looked down at him, her expression loving, but serious and thoughtful. "You know, Garrus and I don't always express it the way we should, but we couldn't make this whole thing work without you. Thank you for sticking close to home. I know you could be out taking a lot more missions."

A long breath trickled from Nihlus's throat as he shook his head. "I don't want that life anymore, Jane." He rolled, over, pressing her back into the mattress, and leaned over her. "I don't feel like I'm missing out." He kissed her. "Quite the opposite. You, me, Garrus, our kids … this is what I want. This is what we fought the damned Reapers to have." Nuzzling his face into her neck, he stroked her side with his other hand, then smacked her hip. "Now, go take a shower and get to bed."

Shepard sighed and flopped. "I don't want to. It's warm here, and the caman will have burned down."

He chuckled softly and nuzzled her lips. "I heard Garrus banking it a few minutes ago. The domin will be warm. Get yourself to bed, mother of both my children, otherwise you aren't going to be up in time for my pancakes."

Shepard closed her eyes and let out a soft, decadent moan. "I do love your pancakes." She moved beneath him, her smile telling him that she was just savouring the sensation of her skin sliding against his plates and hide.

He watched her, his entire body resonating with a love that deepened and grew richer with time. Snagging her wrist in his talons, he lifted it to his mouth, nuzzling the delicate skin and the two opalescent chains wrapped around it. His bond-mate, mother of his children … more than a decade of good times and bad lie between them and wrapped them in the comfort of all the promises they'd made … and mostly kept.

He felt her watching him and smiled, nuzzling the tokens of their bonding.

"Do you ever regret it?" she asked, her voice a bare whisper.

"Regret what, haksaya kubenar?" He lifted off her when she tried to sit up. Legs tangled, bare skin pressed against hide, hands intertwined, they sat facing one another. Eyes tracing every feature, he waited for her to answer.

"All of it? Any of it?" She reached up and caressed his face. "You used to regret so much."

Nodding, he let out a soft sigh. "Not any more. You were right. Life's too short, and I like where I am … who I am. Without all the stupidity and the fights and the awkward bits, we … I … might never have found my way here." It was true. Somewhere along the line, he'd just let go of the past and its baggage in favour of living.

She pulled against his hands, lifting up to kneel between his thighs. "I love who you are. Always have, but this torin …" Kissing him, she whispered against his mouth. "... he just keeps getting better. I love you, Spectre Nihlus Kryik." Chuckling, she swung over his leg and off the bed. "And I need to have a shower. Sleep well, cikabeknai."

Nihlus flopped over onto his pillows and pulled the blankets up to his chest. Closing his eyes, he listened to the sound of the shower, his mate splashing as she bathed, then the soft murmur of conversation from the other room. No, he regretted noth—

For the barest of moments, not long enough for his heart to beat or his lungs to take a breath, Nihlus knew his mind was free. Then something slammed into him. A skybus? A small frigate, maybe? The tube of amber chia shattered, the world exploding into pain, motion, sound, and blinding light.

He'd been blown up enough to recognize the sensations, as well as the impact of floor meeting bone and plate even through his armour. Taking the worst of the hit, his pelvis was the first to cozy up to the complaints desk and start the paperwork. Tumbling around him a little, the world drifted back into focus, vision and comprehension reasserting themselves.

They were free, but how?

Groaning, he shoved himself up off the cavern floor and took in the dead, black chunks of chia strewn everywhere; the machine encased in a glistening, diamond shell; and the smoking remains of the cylinder that had held them trapped. "Shepard?" His voice came out cracked and barely audible. Pushing up until he could sit without being buttressed by an arm, he lifted a hand to his head. "Jane? Are you okay?"

A long groan answered him, then a soft curse. A handful of metres across the room, Shepard rolled over onto her side and dug an elbow into the floor, using it to wedge herself into a semi-upright position. "Yeah, I'll live," she answered at last. "Nice thinking there, Spectre." Lifting her head to meet his gaze, she gave him a weary grin. "How are you doing?"

A slow smile spread his mandibles. "I'm okay." And he was. Yes, he still felt weak, and he hurt nearly everywhere, but inside him, in that place he never allowed himself to examine too closely, the hole didn't yawn so deep or so hungry. He shifted around so he was sitting cross-legged. "I suppose this is when the Collectors beat down the door and attack." He glanced toward the doors, checking to make sure they were all shut. They were … and still locked down. But … uncorrupted chia encased the machine. How had they gotten in?

Shepard rolled over onto all fours and crawled over to sit on her heels in front of him. "Yeah, this is definitely the part of the adventure when the Collectors swarm in, and we have to shoot our way out, but first … ." She lifted up onto her knees and wrapped her arms around his neck. "First, I get to hug the ever-living-crap out of you." She kissed his cheek. "Thank you."

Wrapping his arms around her, he whispered, "And you." He chuckled then nuzzled her ear, the skin like velvet against his plates. "It's strange, but both sets of memories feel real. I prefer the new set."

Leaning back a little, she stared into his eyes, her expression an odd mixture of joy and sadness, love and regret. "So do I. Thank you, Nihlus. Thank you for taking such good care of me." She kissed him softly, but he felt every emotion, the depth of the gratitude and love that underpinned it.

Shepard knew him as well as he knew himself now, and instead of being horrified and disgusted by all the weak places, all the dark spots and self-destructive anger, she offered only acceptance. He'd always thought that if someone saw the real Nihlus that they'd detest him for how truly ugly a picture it was. Then along came that bright, beautiful light. She saw into every corner, and all he'd felt from her was love, even after the darkness had lashed out and hurt her so badly.

The kiss ended far too soon. His mouth followed her lips as she sniffed and swiped at her face, pulling away from his embrace. "Okay, enough of the mushy stuff." She caressed his cheek. "Come on, old guy, we're still buried under a Reaper and Collector infested mountain, trapped in with a machine built to answer a question that only the Reapers seem to know." She heaved herself up off the floor and stretched, her joints popping loud enough to make him wince.

Nihlus chuckled. "You sound like the old guy with all the creaking and popping." When she offered a hand to help him up, he took it but didn't move to stand. "The machine has been taking people apart for at least fifty thousand cycles, but from the sound of it, for a lot longer than that in different forms." He stared at their joined hands without really seeing them, his thoughts holding his complete attention as they raced. "Although I'm sure they need the biological and cognitive data for some nefarious purpose, like turning the asari into those creatures, the question is wrapped up in the rest of the data."

He looked up, meeting her eyes. "I think I know what the question is," Nihlus said. He gathered his feet under him and shoved himself up off the stone floor, a crooked grin greeting the creaking and popping of his joints. Up and balanced, he stared into Shepard's eyes, his mandibles betraying the war between elation and terror raging in his gut. "They aren't asking if they have a soul like the geth did."

Her nod told him that she'd already considered that possibility.

As he turned to face the machine, gravity took hold, reminding him of his damaged places, and he slumped a little, his whole body leaning toward his bad hip. "No, they've been taking us apart for millions of cycles, dissecting the one part of us they can't comprehend, because they're trying to find their missing piece. Harbinger's question was ... why was I created incomplete? Why don't I have a soul?"

He blinked and swallowed, dread swelling within his heart until it felt as though it took up his entire chest cavity, pressing out against his ribs and threatening to explode out through his keel. If his guess was right, the implications were quite literally unimaginable. Could such a question ever be answered? And how much would the Reapers destroy and consume in their madness?

"And I think Tashac was right," he continued, needing to get it all out, for Shepard to hear it and dismiss it as impossible. "After millions of cycles, trying to answer Harbinger's question has driven them insane."

Chapter End Notes

And now back to our regularly scheduled Shepard and Nihlus. :D These two just ... . Yeah. When it got to the Nihlus dreaming about the future, I just said ... whatever, dude, the sky's the limit. Bring it. And the big dream was family. And it included Garrus. He kills me. He just kills me.

As for the Reapers, the whole we created an AI to kill all organics and synthetics to stop organics and synthetics from killing one another thing just didn't work for me, so I've created my own lore as to their reasons and their relationship to the Leviathans ... and I hope it at least makes sense in the end. Got a ways to go before that though. Lots to reveal and discover as they move on. And then again, maybe Nihlus is just plain wrong. Hahahahahaha.

Thanks as always. :D glomping hugs of doooom
Chapter Summary

Bracing his hands against the wall, he let his head hang between his arms, and closed his eyes. All he wanted to do was go home, wrap his arms around Kahri and breathe her in. No, what he really wanted to do was sweep her up and carry her off some place warm and beautiful. No more impossible war and terrifying enemies, just long, slow days spent next to an ocean, surrounded by the people who mattered.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

37 Days ASR

Martin and Kaidan met them just inside the front door looking very pleased with themselves, at least for the first second or two. The kid laughed and held up a rain poncho. "Well, these seemed like a good idea before seeing that you've all been … swimming?"

Bunny snatched the rain gear from Martin's hand and put it on. "No point in adding to it." She punched him in the shoulder. "Thanks, kid."

Garrus just shook his head when Martin turned to face the general, his mouth hanging comically agape. "Go ahead," he said. "Get the Shepards aboard and up to medbay." He nodded to Kaidan to assist Lucille with the poncho. The Normandy stood a hundred metres or so away from the house. Couldn't hurt to block the rain as much as possible. The ladies had suffered enough.

Garrus followed Kaidan and Lucille out the door, Martin and Bunny already just watercolour figures disappearing into the misty downpour. He ducked his head, leaning forward a little to keep the cowl of his armour from filling up. Drains kept him from drowning in his armour, but rain was still damned annoying, although not nearly so aggravating as snow.

Something the size of a fighter slammed into the ground in front of him, stopping his heart as a wave of blue-white energy blasted him back through the door into the house. He crashed into the wall, rebounding to land face first on the marble floor, his entire body letting out a huge, unanimous bellow of pain, the jolt restarting his battered organs.

"The beetle thing's back!" The shout came from Bunny, her tone not terror or anger, but rather something that set Garrus's gut to curdling again. He shoved her reaction aside to examine after he'd survived the next couple of minutes.

Giving him a 'heads up, the monster's still out there' amounted to inexcusable cooperation, Garrus decided as he crawled away from the open door. It couldn't get through, but that probably wouldn't stop it from cutting itself a bigger hole.

Once clear, he scrambled up, talons raking the floor, running before his feet even made it under him. He opened his comms. "Get the Shepards aboard!" He ducked below a window in the next room, some sort of hall or reception room, and peeked up over the sill of the large, picture windows. The thing floated his way, no doubt tracking him through heat. Two beam weapons fired out of the beetle's eyes, sending him rolling down the wall. Luckily, the weapon shot in a straight line rather than tracking him. He rolled again, leading it toward the far end of the room from the door and the Normandy. He needed to buy time to get Bunny and Lucille onto the ship.

"Joker, will the GARDIANs fire with the Normandy on the ground?" he called, rolling away from those beams as they sliced through the front of the house, showering him with glass. A couple more hits and the windows would collapse enough to let it in, and then he'd be screwed.

"Yes," the pilot replied as Garrus set up a concussive shot. "Painting the ugly beetle monster red. Firing."

The GARDIAN lasers hit, taking down the thing's barrier enough that Garrus's concussive shot stripped away the last of it. He got off a few shots, but then the monstrosity slammed into the ground just on the other side of the wall and released the energy blast again, throwing him out of cover.

Garrus bolted, some sort of horrible screeching noise accompanying another attack, but instead of a blast, that one felt as though it reached into his cells to rip all the energy right out of him. He fell out the door, gasping, his entire body suddenly so weak that he could barely stay on his feet. Stumbling into the rain, he took cover behind a large planter.

"We're aboard, General." The professional calm in Kaidan's voice gave Garrus complete confidence in the Normandy's side of the fight. "Returning with more firepower."

"Stay back and attack at range," Garrus ordered. "This thing has short range energy attacks. One will knock you out of cover, but the other … I think it can kill you instantly if you're too close."

"Roger that, sir."

The chatter of a squad's worth of Mattocks filled the air, but didn't distract the Collector monster. Whatever else the Collectors had been there to do, it became glaringly obvious that his death or capture ranked right near the top of their list. He ducked around his cover, hitting it with a concussive shot. Damn thing had restored its shields.

"Keep up the fire, Joker. It restores shields," he called into the radio. "We need to keep it distracted and try to take it down fast once the shields fall." He glanced around as the thing floated up, completely negating his cover. Time to find cover somewhere it couldn't flank him from above.

"GARDIANs are going to start heating up and becoming less accurate," Joker told him needlessly.

Lingering weakness from the last attack tossed 'finding good cover' and 'breathing room' to the top of his priorities. He needed time and a forgiving environment in which to recover. A small stand of trees and bushes grabbed his attention. It would do, as long as the beetle didn't last long enough to cut it all down.

As if to emphasize the point, the Normandy shot the beetle as it slammed into the ground just on the other side of his cover. Garrus threw himself backwards into nearly a quarter metre of mud and water as the lasers skipped off the thing's barriers, searing into the planter less than an arm's length from his head.

Heavy limbs dragging, Garrus scrambled up and ran, ducking into the thick foliage, every breath coming hard and ragged. Damned fire suppressant foam. Once he made it a few metres in, he paused to glance back. No doubt, the husk beetle could still see him, but at least he could out maneuver it until it burned down enough trees to follow. "Joker, not hitting me with the GARDIANs would be appreciated."

Joker crowed. "Don't worry, General. I used to bullseye womp rats in my T-16 back home. I've got this."

Garrus ran a handful of metres further in and ducked down behind a large tangle of shrubbery. Despite his annoyance, a faint chuckle eased back the tension wiring his jaw shut. "That made no sense." He glanced out and brought up his assault rifle. He needed to get that thing's shields down. The geth-installed high frequency GARDIANs would need a few shots to cut that thing down, and they heated up quickly. "Martin and Kaidan, did the Normandy get any of those heavy arc weapons that Shepard brought with her?"

"With all due respect, sir, you're getting old and slow," the kid replied. "We're already on our way with them. Just keep out of range of the arc, or we'll be taking your bar-b-q'd smoky bits back to Omega. That's not news I'm giving Shepard ... Kaidan can do it."

Garrus glanced around the bush as Kaidan sputtered in his ear, and emptied his heat sink into the thing. "With no due respect, I'm out here with it glued to my ass. Just shoot it." Sixteen shots barely scratched the damned shields. He hit it with a concussive shot, then rolled into a crouched run, moving around to flank it, hopefully out of bar-b-q range. Electricity ripped through the dim, misty downpour, wreathing the beetle in blue-white lightning. Taking cover on high ground, Garrus emptied two more heat sinks into it.

When the Collector's shields crashed, he saw the deep scars gouged into its armour. At least that didn't regenerate. "Take it out, Joker."

The Normandy fired, ripping one leg clean off the body, a second shot scorching a long gash along the metal hide. Legs lifting, the beetle thing prepared to slam itself into the ground and restore its barrier.

"Again, Joker! Quickly." The GARDIANs and arc projectors tore into the monstrous thing as it opened its maw. Garrus's gut flipped. The damned thing was filled with husk heads ... functional ... their eyes lit, their mouths gaping as they screamed. Dear spirits. Would the Reapers' well of horror ever reach a bottom? Colonists turned into—

The Normandy fired again just as the thing descended toward the soaking ground, Alenko and Weaver attacking in concert. Lightning crackled along its shell, lancing into the soil. Flame exploded from its maw, the husks all letting out a heinous scream as they went up in flames. The beetle listed to starboard then the fire spread, consuming the machine in seconds. Ash floated on the drowned lawn, blowing ahead of the howling wind.

Garrus slumped into a crouch, half-leaning against a tree, arms resting on his thighs. Well, if that bastard coming back didn't stir the field from mud to slop. He looked up at the sound of large armour crashing through thick foliage. Bunny had known about the monster. He'd bet his mandibles that she did.

He watched Martin and Kaidan approach without really seeing them. Not a single moment or event of the mission added up. Not unless the Collectors hadn't made a deal with Krellid at all, or at least, not just with Krellid.

"General! You alive?" Martin called, stopping to search.

Garrus stood, letting out a long breath before he spoke. "Yeah, kid, still alive."
"You are hard to kill, aren't you? They warned me you would be."

She'd said they, not he. They warned Bunny that Garrus would be hard to kill. He nodded toward the ship. "Come on, let's get aboard. I'm tired of this storm." Leading the way, angled at thirty degrees to avoid getting blown over, Garrus dug in, the going slow and slippery. He let out a long, moaning sigh of relief once he passed through the Normandy's barrier.

"Thank the spirits." He turned to the other two. "Get showered, dry, and warm, then the two of you can lead the art reclamation effort." He popped the seals on his vambraces and stripped them off. "Lucille wants to save whatever she can. I gave her a twenty-four hour limit, so make sure that everyone digs in." Striding to his armour trunk, he called back, "And make sure both she and Bunny sleep at some point."

When the two men reached the elevator, Garrus stopped and turned. "Martin, call the operations department back home and get them working on carriers to transport the total number of slaves. They'll also need to prepare to house them on Omega until we can locate their families or take them elsewhere. Have them contact Barla Von with budgets and requisitions." Gaze turning to Kaidan, he continued, "Contact the other teams. Find out what sort of numbers we're looking at." His mandibles flicked. "Please."

Both men gave a hearty 'Yes, sir', and headed off.

Once he stripped out of his armour, Garrus headed up to the shower. Hopefully a few minutes of scalding hot water would stop the shivering, an intractable chill that settled just beneath his plates. Exhaustion hung heavily about his cowl as he stepped under the hot water. Whether caused by injury, the beetle thing's life-draining attack, or just the stress of the day … right then, he didn't care. He turned off his comms and let out a long breath. Silence for just a few moments. It wasn't too much to ask, was it?

Bracing his hands against the wall, he let his head hang between his arms, and closed his eyes. All he wanted to do was go home, wrap his arms around Kahri and breathe her in. No, what he really wanted to do was sweep her up and carry her off some place warm and beautiful. No more impossible war and terrifying enemies, just long, slow days spent next to an ocean, surrounded by the people who mattered.

"Do turians get pruny?" Joker called over the intercom. "You've been in there for forty-five minutes. We're going to have to put out rain barrels if you use any more water."

Garrus shut off the water. "Are you spying on me? That's more than a little creepy, Joker." Without moving the curtain, he reached through the gap and grabbed his towel. Surely the Alliance hadn't changed the regs to allow cameras in the heads.

"I can't actually spy on you, and believe it or not, it's not my burning desire to poke my nose into your showers, but you've been in there thirty-two years." The pilot grumbled a little under his breath. "Dr. Chakwas keeps calling me because your radio is turned off. She thinks you're avoiding her and is threatening to dispatch a squad to bring you in if you don't report to medbay."

Garrus clutched the towel against his belly, fully aware that it was ridiculous. Anderson would never betray his people's trust by putting in cameras, and he didn't have anything on display to worry about. Still, going from being alone with his thoughts to having Joker hanging over his shoulder proved slightly violating and off putting to say the least.

Of course, he'd been radio silent for much longer than he intended, so he supposed he couldn't blame the pilot. "I'm on my way there as soon as I get dressed. Now, stop spying on me and keep an eye out for Collectors." He dressed quickly and headed out to the galley to make a large mug of amarceru before he crossed to medbay.

"I was wondering when you'd make it in here," Chakwas scolded. She nodded toward the back table. "Up you get. Heard you tried breathing fire suppressant foam."

He shrugged, but the burning in his airways didn't leave room for argument. "It doesn't work as well as you might think." Sitting, hands braced against the edge of bed, he watched her gather her supplies. "Have you had a chance to look over Lucille and Beatrix?"

The doctor nodded and rolled a table over next to his bed. "They are both healthy enough to work on clearing out the art. Lucille will need to be treated for malnutrition and to finish healing up her wounds. Beatrix will be a far more complicated matter." She nodded toward the pillows. "Make yourself comfortable, you're going to be here for a while. Your lungs and trachea need to be treated for chemical burns." She activated her scanner. "Not to mention the rest of your injuries."

Garrus grumbled and took a long, scalding sip of his drink. "May I finish this first? I just made it."

She chuckled and nodded. "Fine. I have to spackle up a few holes first, anyway." She finished scanning. "You and Shepard share a talent for getting yourselves filled with holes."

Chuckling, he nodded and took another drink. "Comes with the territory, Doc. If you'd seen the things we were fighting, you'd understand."

She frowned and began treating the wound behind his aural canal. "Strange, everyone else came back in relatively good shape." A crooked half-smile betrayed her teasing, so he left the barb unchallenged.

The combination of being warm and dry, the hot drink, and the gentle touch soothing the pain of his wounds left Garrus ready to lie back and allow the doctor to hook him up with a mask when it came time. He closed his eyes, letting the medication's cool mist to work its magic on his scorched airways. Muscles sinking into the mattress, cramping a little before going soft and slack, Garrus moaned, the relief both welcome and painful.

"Get some sleep," the doctor coaxed, lowering the lights. She set up privacy blinds and lowered the shades. "By the time the treatment is complete, you'll be ready to head back out and get shot full of more holes."

Garrus chuckled, but was already drifting off. When she spread a heated blanket over him, he just curled into it a little and fell fast asleep.

"General?" A warm hand touched his shoulder. "Garrus?"

Blinking against the bright lights, Garrus woke, one hand rising to cover his eyes while his pupils adjusted. He turned his head to look at the doctor.

"We're ready to lift off, General. I thought you might want to be up to lock everything down." She removed all the equipment attached to him.

He stared at her for a few more seconds, then ran his tongue over the roof of his mouth. Dry and pasty. How long had he been out? Brushing back the blanket, he sat up. "Preparing to lift off? How long have I been asleep?" A numb hand rubbed at the side of his head. Numb? A vague, embarrassed sort of alarm set in. Losing feeling in his limbs would take extended hours lying on the too-thin mattress. "Really, how long? My arms are numb."

She nodded, a soft, kind chuckle greeting his alarm. "These beds aren't made for turians. You've been asleep eighteen hours. It didn't take as long to pack up the art as they thought."

Martin walked in, stared at Garrus for a few seconds and then threw up his hands. "He lives!"

"Eighteen hours? Why did you people let me sleep for eighteen hours?" He slid down off the bed and stretched out his limbs, shaking them to restore some circulation, mind racing. He should have been up hours ago. "There are a hundred things I need to do before we leave."

Martin preened a little. "Well, I have been both busy and amazing. Barla Von found a research institute that wants the rachni statue. Asari … and willing to pay an amount of money I can't even comprehend, not to mention that they are willing to share all their research with us. But that is a statement of Von's awesomeness, not my own. Kaidan gave me the numbers, I gave them to Von and Operations, and carriers and Archangel personnel and supplies to care for the slaves are already underway. I also have arranged for the rest of Building Three to be opened, and Von cleared the funds for the extra sundries that will be required."

Sighing and shrugging as if his brilliance exceeded even what he could imagine, he continued, "The art is already crated and packed in our hold. The slaves here are organized and ready to evac when the carrier and its heavily armed escort arrives. You can go back to sleep if you want to. General Weaver has it all under control."

Garrus chuffed and straightened his clothing. "How long until the carrier gets here? What is the status of the other teams?"

Martin slumped a little as if wounded by the lack of appreciation then let out a dramatic, long-suffering sigh. "Just under fifty-three hours. The turian teams are remaining to provide security for the slaves at the mining operations. Victus is apparently recovered enough to be running the show from his hospital bed. He ordered his people to move the slaves into the most secure caverns in the mines and has patrols in place to watch for Collectors. Nyreen only reported sixty-three slaves. She's shuttling them over here to hitch a ride back to Omega."

Garrus activated his omnitool, opening his messages as Martin reported. Nothing from Shepard or Nihlus, but several from Archangel and Barla Von.

"The Passch transported down the crates of supplies we brought, but there wasn't enough to go around, so we raided the house for blankets and warm clothes." Martin ran down the list glowing on his omnitool. "We also set up the kitchen with power and the kitchen staff are back in there cooking up hot food and drinks. So, everyone should be okay until their transport arrives." He looked up, his eyes sad and exhausted. "There are a lot of people wanting to call family. I assured them that they'll be able to once we get them to Omega, and we'll make sure they get wherever they need to go."

"Good work." Feeling as though he'd slept for a half century, Garrus leaned back against the bed and took a second to collect himself. "Spirits, fifty-three hours?" It made sense, it was straight system to system FTL, and the carriers weren't nearly as fast as the Normandy, but he didn't want to remain on Lorek for another fifty-some hours. He needed to get back to Omega and prepare for another influx of people, get the Shepards settled in … and find out what was happening on Thessia.
First things first.

"Dr. Chakwas, I want Beatrix Shepard kept under guard in the back lab. We'll have to move her to house arrest once we get back to Archangel, but I'll leave her care and treatment in your hands. Call in whatever resources you need." He raised his brow plates, giving her an opening to bring up concerns or questions, but she just nodded.

"Where are they now?" he asked, looking to Martin.

"Bunny is with the slaves. Mystery solved as to why they were locked away." The kid shrugged. "She knew we were coming and knew the Collectors were going to be shooting up the place so once Krellid locked himself in his panic room, she locked the slaves up to keep them safe." The careful, suspicious expression on the kid's face reminded Garrus of his earlier theory that Bunny might well have made some sort of deal with the Collectors.

"And Lucille?" Gripping the doctor's shoulder in his talons, he nodded. "Thank you, Doctor." Gesturing for Martin to fall in, he strode from medbay.

"Lucille is down making sure that all the art and books are secured properly." He snorted a little. "She smacked me in the back of the head when I packed a vase in the wrong crate." He stiffened and wagged his index finger. "That's Earth Qing dynasty porcelain, young man. It doesn't go in with the batarian Dar'letk period earthenware."

Garrus did his best to hide his grin, but the kid saw it and sighed. "What? Everyone is always smacking me in the head, and I think it's starting to jar things loose. I've got broken neurons in there just floating around, I know it."

That time the general let the smile loose. "You make it too easy, kid. Way too easy." Garrus ran through the list of things he'd wanted to do before the Normandy returned to Omega. Martin had covered most of it. "But you did good getting everything arranged." He slapped the young man's shoulder. "Now, let's go tie up the last few threads and get home."

Leaving Passch and most of the first and second teams behind under Kaidan's command, Garrus and the Normandy returned to the stars, headed home. It didn't even seem strange to think of the filthy station as home any longer. He took pride in how much it had changed over the cycles. Crime rates had plunged, Kima District wasn't an abandoned mire of violence and gang activity, people didn't run through the docks with their heads down and their noses covered any more, and they'd even created acres of paradise in the lower levels. Of course, the gardens needed a great deal of repair and replanting, but in at least their district, Omega had become a place to consider home.

Garrus spent most of his day and a half aboard standing at the QEC, arranging to house more than three thousand freed slaves, no small task, but luckily with having so recently absorbed the Talons and the refugees from Archangel's outer facilities, most of the work was underway. What was another three thousand bodies?

Three thousand more souls relying on his leadership, at least for a time. Dear spirits. When had such things become nothing more than part of his day to day? Three cycles before, that hothead cop yelling at the executor couldn't have even dreamed the way his life would change.

"General?" Joker's voice swooped into the vacuum of an ended conference with Von and the heads of Archangel's operations and accounting departments.

Garrus stretched and raked his talons over his fringe. "Go ahead, Joker." He winced as his spine popped all the way down, the muscles threatening to cramp.
"We're two hours out from Omega. The captain thought you'd like to know."

"Thanks, Joker," Garrus closed the myriad of files he had open, stuffed all his datapads into his attache case, then headed down to medbay. He wanted to have a chance to speak with Bunny before they arrived. The last thing the place needed was Shepard's little sister running through the corridors calling her sister a bitch and threatening to kill her. So soon after Shepard had saved all their asses … the kid would be lucky to end up with a simple beat down.

The younger Shepard looked up and let out a long, annoyed-sounding sigh when Garrus stepped through the door. "Let me guess," she said. "We're just about back to your superhero lair, and you've come to lay down the law." She bolted up to sit on the edge of her cot, her spine straight and rigid, her head pulled back, her shoulders and arms held wide. She swung stiff arms back and forth a little as she mocked him. "Now look here, little lady, I need you to behave yourself. Your sister loves you and … blah blah blah."

"Beatrix May Shepard!" Lucille scolded, moving over to sit next to her daughter. "That's no way to speak to the general who just freed us all."

Garrus just shook his head and waved off the insult. "Had I come to say that, I wouldn't be saying it now. I can't compete with that impersonation. You do a better me than I do." His mandibles flicked slightly under the heat of Bunny's glare, the surprise on her face very satisfying. Sitting on one of the crates facing her cot, he continued, "But, we are about to enter the heart of the army your sister started. Archangel was built out of love of her, and a lot of the people rallied to our cause because in some form or another, Shepard saved their lives."

"Like the kid claims that she saved him?" Bunny scoffed. "He looks about as saved as I was thanks to her." She yanked away from her mother as Lucille tried to put an arm around her. "Don't. You can believe all the lies you want, doesn't mean I have to.

"Anyway," Garrus continued, breaking up the family drama, "Shepard just saved most of Archangel from being obliterated by a massive merc army, so for your own good, I'm advising you to keep your opinions to yourself. They won't be popular." Raising his brow plates, he fixed her with an earnest stare, hoping she'd see the sense in his words.

"So no more lectures on how my sister suffered? Just a warning to keep my mouth shut?" She returned his stare with a glare.

"That's it. I told you, I'd only say the other once. I don't know enough to have the right to say anything else."

The door opened to reveal Anderson standing at the threshold. "But, I do." The captain looked over at Garrus. "I had Dr. Chakwas let me know when you came down to do this." He stepped inside far enough for the door to close, and looked over at Lucille and Bunny. "I was the one who found Jane on Mindoir. I was a lieutenant in the Alliance military, and on shore leave a couple of clusters away when we got word about what had happened on Mindoir. I caught the first ride I could and volunteered for one of the search parties."

Stomach clenched, Garrus watched the captain walk over to one of the computer terminals then looked back to the doctor standing in the doorway to make sure she was okay with Lucille and Bunny seeing it. "Are you sure?" he asked, his voice flat. "They're two days out from being ground through hell."

"No!" Bunny jumped up, aimed at Garrus. "I want to see it." She turned to Anderson. "Go ahead, do your worst."
"This isn't about trying to hurt you," the captain said. "It's about the truth of what I found that day. I recorded the entire mission. The Alliance wanted evidence to take before the Council." He started the vid and then looked up. "If you'll excuse me, I'll return after it's finished playing. Living through it once was more than enough."

Garrus looked to Lucille, clenching his teeth hard enough to send a vague ache rumbling through his jaw and up into his head. "You've already lived through this once as well," he said, trying to delay the inevitable. The icy dread crackling along his veins formed as much for himself as Lucy.

Grinding to a halt, he realized that as long as Bunny remained, Mother Shepard wouldn't leave her side. Damn Bunny's stubbornness. For all the girl's posturing and Lucy's hard shell, he felt the fragility that lay beneath the surface of both Shepards. He didn't believe either one in any state to be reminded of what happened on Mindoir, and the child's determination to prove them all wrong could end up harming both.

"I'll stay, General, thank you." Lucille sat beside her daughter and tried to wrap an arm around Bunny's shoulders. "You don't need to do this. Take some time, recover from—"

Bunny jerked from away from her mother. "Don't try playing mommy now. You're fifteen years too late." Turning her back on her mother's tight-lipped pain, she looked up at Anderson, challenging either him or herself. "Go ahead."

"If either of you wants to stop it," Chakwas spoke up, "we'll turn it off immediately." She stepped out of the doorway, moving over to sit on a crate near Lucille.

"Stop, all of you." The teenager whirled to glare at them. "Damn, I'm not some porcelain doll. I've seen a hell of a lot worse than dead people in the last fifteen years." She sliced an index finger at Anderson. "Since you seem to be the only person willing to treat me like a functional adult, turn the damn thing on and go."

A curt nod answered her demand, then Anderson looked over at Garrus. The captain's expression clearly told the general that he didn't want to see what the vid had to show. Sighing, Garrus nodded. Every muscle in his body tightened to the point of spasm as he stretched between staying to provide the Shepards with what little support he could and sparing himself. However, as much as he didn't want to witness the darkest moments his _Light_ had ever faced, he needed to.

He and Kahri needed to move past what the vid showed and what it meant. Maybe the only way to do that was for him to face it, see the reality, and then, let it go. As long as Mindoir remained some sort of taboo mystery, it held too much power over them both.

"April 2, 2170. Mindoir colony. 0600 hours. Lovell settlement. Lieutenant David Anderson recording for S&R Team Theta."

Garrus looked over at the vid screen without turning to face it. A younger, worn-out looking Anderson stared into his helmet camera as he spoke. Then the picture swivelled, panning the troop compartment of a Grizzly as Anderson seated the helmet on his head. "We're approaching the settlement from the east along the main road from the capital."

Garrus squinted as light exploded across the screen, the aching brilliance transforming into a blur of dizzying movement that solidified into grass and a dirt road. In the distance, across wide fields of smoking char, a cluster of about thirty homes stood vigil. The Alliance troops fanned out to cross the burned out field, searching for survivors. Seconds into their search, the condition of the bodies littering the ground spoke to the futility of their effort.
As he watched, the general’s gut tied itself into a tighter and tighter knot. So many bodies. No doubt, they represented everyone too old to be considered useful.

"We were a small settlement," Lucille said, her voice a bare whisper laden with so much regret and pain that each word cut like a scalpel. "Our family was one of the exceptions amidst retired folk. They moved to spend their dotage away from the capital." Her entire body heaved, her hand clapping against her mouth as the wave rolled up her torso. "Most weren’t even given the mercy of a bullet. After they finished with them, the batarians simply herded them into the field and burned them alive when they torched the crops."

Garrus let out a long breath, heart aching. He wished he knew Lucille well enough to feel comfortable sitting next to her and taking her hand. Her daughter should be comforting her, but Bunny occupied herself trying to look tough and unaffected.

As the Marines closed in on the settlement, Lucille paled, the skin around her lips growing so white that Garrus threw caution aside. Sitting next to her, he reached up to grip her shoulder, deciding that left enough personal space between them. She looked up at him, a wan smile dying stillborn on her lips.

The other Marines hollered and ran forward, Anderson chasing after them, but before he arrived, shouts of hope turned to anger. Two of them ran past Anderson, and the sound of retching drifted in from off camera.

"Bastards," someone muttered, pushing past. Judging by the patch on the man's uniform, he was the unit medic. "Just a fucking kid."

The camera pushed forward, moving up the gravel road into the rows of houses. Garrus closed his eyes as Anderson stopped, no doubt trying to figure out what he was looking at.

Herros had taken Garrus drellak hunting in his youth. The days spent together in the forest and stalking herds across the grasslands of Palaven remained some of the general's best memories. However, killing the beast and then dressing it provided some of the worst. Neither those memories nor anything he'd ever seen in C-Sec came close to what appeared in Anderson's camera.

A soft mewling sound rattled from Lucille's throat, smashing any barriers of propriety, the knot in Garrus's gut insisting that he wrap his arm around the woman's shoulders. She leaned into his side as if grateful not to have to hold herself upright when Anderson bent down next to one bloody, ragged arm and took its pulse.

The lieutenant hollered—a wordless shout of discovery—and rolled the dead man off Shepard's back.

"Dad," Bunny said, matter-of-fact. She glanced over her shoulder at Garrus. "You're going to tell me that piece of meat there is Jane?"

Too sick, in both stomach and heart, to reply, Garrus simply nodded toward the vid screen. She'd see for herself soon enough.

Gentle hands untied the hood over her head, then removed it, followed by the blindfold. A face looked up at the camera, red hair tangled around everything, soaked to her skin with sweat and blood. Despite a nose broken so badly that it sat bent to the side, blood, bruises, and smashed bones, the face undeniably resembled those in the room with him. Green eyes, brilliant against the black skin around them despite being bloodshot, stared up at Anderson for a moment before the scream Garrus had only imagined until that moment, broke free.
Bunny staggered backwards a little as the girl on the vid screen shrieked then collapsed onto the gravel. Jane lay limp and still as many hands rushed to save her ... none stronger or more urgent than Anderson's. The lieutenant ripped the stakes from the ground, then unfolded a thermal blanket and covered her with it. The soldiers around the bloody spot on the ground celebrated. Jane's survival seemed such a small miracle, but he supposed amidst all that death, even one survivor amounted to victory.

"Anderson carried her through the shuttle ride to their ship," Garrus said, hoping to ease the pain etched on Lucille's face. "He visited her in the hospital and again when they put her in a psychiatric ward. Eventually, he broke her out and took her home."

"It's a mercy Franklin died," Lucille said, her voice still burrowed down into her throat. "He would never have been able to live with what he did that day ... what he forced Jane to endure." She straightened and pulled away from Garrus. "I sat as close as I could to her, talking to her through the long hours. I don't know if she heard me ... the pain must have been—"

Dr. Chakwas jumped up and strode over, crouching to grip the woman by both shoulders. "Jane grew up to be one of the most remarkable women I've had the privilege of knowing. She's okay." The doctor smiled. "I'm tempted to say that I don't know how she survived, but I've treated her, and she's also the toughest, most ornery person I've ever known. Her strength got her through it and just kept growing."

Lucille drew in a deep breath and nodded, her momentary despair turning resolute once more. Her strength helped unravel the knots in Garrus's belly.

Garrus looked past the women to where Bunny stood, staring at the screen. Pushing off the cot, he walked over to stand behind her. "You okay, kid?"

Bunny shrugged and reached out to turn off the vid. "Why wouldn't I be?" She jerked her chin toward the door. "Get out of my cell, General." She returned to her bunk and flopped down on her back, legs crossed at the ankle, her hands behind her head. "And take the do-gooder corps with you. You all have work to do."

"I'll be back once we're docked." Garrus took the hand that Lucille held out to him, squeezing her fingers. "We'll get you settled in."

Chapter End Notes

(A-N: Sooo sad, true story. My internet died last Friday, so no posting on Monday because no internet. I did nearly die during the detox process. It was horrible, but now I am back and you have a chapter. Should have one for Monday, but we will see. It is a huge chapter full of important things. Thanks as always to the readers and the reviewers. Loves and hugs.)
Chapter Summary

Placing her shots carefully, Shepard quickly thinned the herd on the upper balconies. She heard Nihlus and Thane's rifles on two other sides, sharp coughs of sound amidst the chatter of the assault rifles and sub-machine guns.

"Thousands have risen over the cycles, Shepard." Harbinger's voice roared over the gunfire, seeming to come from everywhere. A single Collector stepped out of the inky shadows that clung to the walls at floor level, its carapace cracked open, a fierce magma glow bleeding through. "They have all fallen before us."

38 Days ASR

Shepard's eyebrows headed straight for her hairline, then plunged back down toward her nose. She didn't know if she could buy Nihlus's theory that Harbinger had started all the madness on some quest to figure out why it didn't have a soul. Granted, on one hand, it fit what they'd seen, but, the idea of making the Reapers even the slightest bit sympathetic rankled. She needed to fill them with bullets, and having some pathetic, Tin Man and Cowardly Lion image stuck in her head wouldn't help that process.

"Would an AI even care about that?" she asked, hearing the words before she realized she was going to speak them out loud. She reached out and pressed her fingertips against his chest, a vaguely apologetic gesture, as she continued, "It seems a little … touchy feely for genocidal robots."

Nihlus gestured toward the machine. "Melting billions of people into goo … taking them apart to analyze them, turning them into monstrosities … ." His mandibles dropped. "I don't think we're looking at their search having anything to do with wanting hugs." She watched, admiring the wheels turning beneath the surface as he shrugged and walked over to the machine.

His head cocked a little as he stared at it through the casing of chia. "I think it's more along the line of the geth building their megastructure. You heard Legion … all geth would be united, their intellects combined, their potential unlimited. They could imagine new futures for themselves that they can't even comprehend of now."

Shepard nodded, her lips pressing into a thin line, impressed with Nihlus's line of reasoning. "So, it's about completion of a sort, the ability to grow beyond what they are." Lifting the gauntlet of chia clinging to her wrist, she asked them, "Is it safe to approach the machine with your people encasing it?"

"Yes," the genderless, comfortingly impassive voice replied. "The chia are not in contact with the machine at any point. If they touch it, they may be corrupted."

Shepard stepped around the massive computer, looking down at the blackened, dead chia. What remained of the construct looked like the stuff of bee's nests or termite mounds, a dessicated reminder that they'd been living beings. Not familiar, but people nonetheless. "They're dead?"
"Yes. The kinetic energy released when the chia impacted the machine freed them from corruption."

"The chia freed us?" Shepard turned to look at the door, it remained shut. Of course, the chia in their single state amounted to molecules, so could easily get through cracks.

"Your will commanded the chia to save Nihlus. They did so in the most expedient manner available to them. When the machine transferred power from maintaining the field of corrupted chia, the uncorrupted chia shattered the construct. They surround it to prevent further contact."

Shepard jumped, heavy banging against the south door yanking her attention away from the machine. She took a deep, steadying breath as her heart tried to smash its way out through her sternum. "Here comes the onslaught of certain death." She shrugged her Mattock into her hand before glancing over at Nihlus. "So, do we wait for them to break in, or do we go out guns blazing."

"Shepard? Spectre Kryik?"

"Miranda." Shepard hurried over to the door.

"So … go out with guns blazing then?" Nihlus asked, his expression guileless. He shifted, bracing his bad leg then pulling his shotgun. Thank god for the durability and resilience of turians.

Shepard grinned as she glanced over at him, but called out, "Lawson, is that you?" Hope sparked bright and fierce in her chest. With the addition of the rest of the team, they had a real chance to get down into the mountain and back out alive.

"It is." The tone more than the words reassured the captain. An edge of haughty impatience sliced straight through the metal door, chastising Shepard for being so ridiculous and wasting valuable time. Definitely Miranda.

Shepard unlocked the door, pleased to see Liara's small army. At least, until she saw several of the asari wrestling with their compatriots. Her gut twisted and dropped. Damn, didn't things just keep looking more and more pear shaped?

"Come on, everyone in," she ordered, sealing the door behind them when they complied.

"Shepard." Miranda's intense, blue eyes studied the captain like a bug pinned to a board, the ever-present omnitool scanning even before the operative made it through the door. "Are you all right?"

"I'm fine." She nodded toward the commandos, hoping for any explanation that didn't include them being indoctrinated. Hell, she'd take bitten by feral, rabid Thessian hamsters or zombie apocalypse.

"What's going on there?"

Continuing her scans, Miranda stepped right into Shepard's face as she replied, "They bolted, leading us to an entrance further down the mountain. Once they got there, they couldn't operate the door, and we were able to apprehend them."

So much for hope. Shepard let out a harsh, noisy breath. "No indoctrination serum?" Her exciting mission to investigate something fascinating on Thessia seemed determined to roll right on past pear-shaped to shit-shaped. But ...

"They led you in here?" Nodding, Shepard clenched her jaw and set her spine, refusing to let her queasy gut pull her down. The rest of the team needed to get the hell out alive, and more importantly, they needed to investigate what the Collectors were doing there, and shut it down. The damned mountain amounted to a trap, pulling people in and either killing them or turning them into monsters. Her people were no doubt seriously outnumbered; she needed to use every tool at her disposal, even if it meant being ruthless.

Nodding to herself, she took another deep breath and cracked her neck before shrugging to settle her armour on her shoulders. "I guess Liara won't be joining us on another mission without sufficient indoctrination serum for her people."

And neither will you. You're going to need bigger belt pouches. A backpack, maybe?

"Meanwhile," Shepard continued without pausing, "we can use their indoctrinated radar to get to whatever is emitting the signal." For a second, she almost continued, saying that the asari needed to prepare themselves to leave some of their comrades behind, but she swallowed the words. That could wait until the moment reared its ugly head.

Turning to the group, she said, "We're going to release the indoctrinated and follow them to the heart of the mountain. Those of you who still have indoctrination serum, don't neglect it, and don't share it. We're in for a hell of a fight, and we need gun hands, not semi-cognizant zombies."
Meeting a host of angry stares as evenly as she could, she ploughed through. "We'll do what we can for those already affected, but we can't risk the mission for them."

She pointed to Javik. "You're on point with Nihlus and myself. Miranda, Jack, and Thane, drag. The rest of you, stay frosty." She nodded toward the door and the sound of running feet on stone. "The Collectors we've faced so far haven't used biotics, just assault rifles, but they've been luring asari here for a very long time and turning them into monsters. The mutated asaris' biotics and barriers are strong. They use charge to close, and if they get close enough to grab you, they'll gut you before you can blink."

Shepard strode across the chamber to take cover behind the furthest medical bed, giving her a nice long line of sight for Ingrid. "We're going to be fighting our way out, so take cover." She gestured for Javik to move up to the left side of the door when Nihlus took the right side next to the control panel. "Biotics, keep them bottlenecked in the door." She waited for the rest of the team to get in position, then nodded for Nihlus to open the door, her gut settling as the fight crashed down on them. "Let's give them hell."

A platoon-strength squad of Collectors rushed the doors, but the biotics managed to keep them from getting through while Shepard and the rest of the team mowed them down. Once the bodies began to pile up, the charge slowed, but not enough to make Shepard worry about any great ability to adapt or employ strategy. Numbers without a mind behind them were nothing more than bullet sponges. One small blessing.

When the Collectors stopped coming, Shepard gave the asari holding onto the indoctrinated the nod to release them. Falling in quickly, the team followed, saved from having to climb over the pile of bodies by a shockwave from Jack. The commandos moved quickly, the certainty of their path and their surefootedness down the steep, treacherous tunnel upping the churning in Shepard's from vague nausea to 'Dear god, I'm going to throw up everything I've ever eaten'. Their behaviour spoke to something much larger moving them; empty puppets rather than hypnotized people following a call.

Rage spiked, stabbing all the way down her spine to lodge in her pelvis. Everything about the Reapers consisted of, and formed, abomination. They fouled everything they touched, and then she was supposed to give a flying fuck about their existential angst over having no soul? How about not visiting horror and corruption on every sapient being that evolved over time? That might be a hell of a start toward finding their souls.
Shepard tripped, cursing silently as the sound of her boots echoed off the walls, speeding ahead to let the enemy know their location. Not being indoctrinated and having their perfect knowledge, she needed to stay focused. She didn't have room for sloppy, or for letting her emotions get the best of her. One hundred percent focus and clarity, one hundred percent professional soldier. It hadn't taken concentration before she died. She could ape insanity, torment three people into trying to kill her, flirt with two more and still never lose focus on the mission.

Death messes with everything, I suppose, Janey. It might take some work to get back there.

Letting out a soft, resolute breath, Shepard nodded and concentrated on the mountain looming around and over her. Somewhere a trap waited. Somewhere, a mind watched and calculated … so much older and more clever and diabolical than she could imagine. She needed to stay sharp and ready.

The tunnel curled down through the mountain, offering nothing in the way of cover. As she jogged downhill, trying to keep the asari commandos in sight, the roughly arched ceiling pressed down more heavily with every step, so much more than the weight of the mountain teetering over her head. Millions of years of history, thousands of extinctions, tens of thousands of races all waited to see what she intended to do about the situation.

No pressure, Janey. Well, unless you count the thousands of species and cycles that lay ahead if you blow it.

The gentle spiral downward ended at an abrupt right angle left. Shepard held up a hand to bring team to a halt, then signaled for them to spread out and take cover against the walls while she moved forward alone. Pressing against the inside corner, she leaned out a little at a time, peering into a dimly lit space. Someone moved in the dark—one of the commandos, no doubt—and the sound echoed high and with a long space between bounce backs. So, a huge, dark space. Not exactly ideal conditions.

Lights flared to life around the cavern, a strident brilliance from many metres up searing into Shepard's eyes, blinding her while leaving the floor in shadow.

Right, conditions devolving from not exactly ideal to complete crap.

"Shepard, you've become an annoyance." The deep, mechanical voice from earlier—Harbinger—boomed through the cavern, echoing off a forest of shadows. She reached up to rub her eyes. What were they? Stasis pods?

The voice continued, "Do you fear death even now? Is that why you fight against inevitability: dust struggling against cosmic winds."

Shepard shored up her walls as the voice chipped away at them, and glanced back at her people. "Huge chamber, four gallery tiers on all sides, lots of cover on the floor, but the lights are in our eyes." She signalled them into position. "Stay together, square formation." She felt rather than saw the rest of the team form up.

While they took their places, Shepard switched to Ingrid and changed scopes. "Okay, double time people. Keep sharp, there are a lot more of them than us." She raced into the room, Javik at her elbow, moving into the forest of stasis pods a few rows before taking cover. Raising Ingrid, she leaned out around a pod and took aim. Placing her shots carefully, Shepard quickly thinned the herd on the upper balconies. She heard Nihlus and Thane's rifles on two other sides, sharp coughs of sound amidst the chatter of the assault rifles and submachine guns.
"Thousands have risen over the cycles, Shepard." Harbinger's voice roared over the gunfire, seeming to come from everywhere. A single Collector stepped out of the inky shadows that clung to the walls at floor level, its carapace cracked open, a fierce magma glow bleeding through. "They have all fallen before us. You are less than nothing; not even truly alive ... an animated puppet"

Shepard shot the Harbinger-Collector in the head, but it barely flinched, still moving straight for her at a leisurely pace. It lifted its hand, flinging something at her. She ducked into cover, but then something that felt like a massive fist punched her out of cover, staggering her. Another attack flew at her, but that one glowed like a ball of fire, revealing itself, and she threw herself out of range.

"Where one falls, four more rise to take its place. Behold the futility of your resistance." Lights turned on all around the chamber, illuminating the room in detail.

Shepard winced back a little, her eyes taking a moment to adjust before she lined up another shot. As Ingrid kicked against her shoulder, one of the banshees appeared less than an arm's length away. She reeled back, heart practically punching out her chest and running screaming back the way they'd come before she realized that the asari husk stood immobile inside the pod.

"Sweet baby Jesus," she said, gasping as her heart calmed. Stasis. Thank the blessed Enkindlers. Of course ... whatever slept could be woken. They needed to take out all the Collectors before Harbinger decided to call in screaming banshee backup.

"Your civilizations will fall as millions rise to sweep you from your planets," Harbinger continued. "Your military and governments will be laid waste before you realize the harvest has come."

"Shepard," Liara called, "the talking one is closing on you."

Throwing herself back against the pod, Shepard raised Ingrid, sending another shot through the glowing eyes. That time, she saw it stagger.

"They're flying down from the galleries and closing," Nihlus said, his voice strong and determined. She didn't need the heads up, clearly able to see dozens of Collectors flying down from the upper levels to close on her tiny group.

"Everyone, use your cover, take your time and stay safe. Biotics, keep them back the best you can, and Jack, shockwave the shit out of them." Shepard fired on Harbinger again, that one shutting the bastard up as the host body incinerated.

"Glad I signed up, Shepard," Jack said, hooting with a manic sort of glee as a shockwave thundered across the chamber, tossing Collectors like bowling pins.

Another cracked-magma glow appeared above, the possessed Collector flying down to land on the first level. "You will not leave this place alive, Shepard. Surrender to the inevitable."

Shit, he just kept coming. The Collector fired off a ball of black energy—no doubt the attack that had thrown her out of cover—a fireball following right on its heels. She flipped to the other side of the pod, but it wasn't enough distance. The black one hit, sending her staggering, but then arms closed around her, yanking her out of the path of the fireball.

"If he wakes even half a dozen of these banshees, we're screwed," Nihlus's voice whispered next to her ear. He set her back on her feet.

Shepard didn't respond. What could she say? The situation had only one positive solution, and that one meant taking out all the Collectors before the situation fell further into the crap. As if to mock the possibilities of avoiding the crap pile, Shiala went down, screaming in agony.
"Shiala!" Liara cried from Shepard's right and spun to go to her, but Shepard grabbed her arm and yanked her back.

"Stay on the line, or we're all dead. We can get to the wounded once the bullets stop." For a moment, she thought Liara intended to rebel, and kept a tight grip on the asari's arm. "How are you doing, Shiala?" she called over her shoulder.

"I'll live," the asari answered.

"Hey, Princess Blue!" Jack hollered. "I could use a singularity here, so quit fucking dancing and get back in the fight." A shockwave rumbled across the room, but carrying noticeably less punch than even two minutes earlier.

Shepard switched guns, going for her assault rifle as the Collectors on the floor took advantage of the momentary distraction and swarmed toward her position. Calm, all ruthlessly efficiency and deadly aim, she moved from ugly bug-head to ugly bug-head, three bullets per customer, very little waiting.

Two more asari went down and Shepard could hear Nihlus wheezing with every breath before a singularity, a heavy throw from Thane, and another shockwave threw the Collectors back far enough for her to finish them off. Legs and arms shaking, she leaned against the stasis pod, sucking in long draughts of air. Ten seconds. When she reached the count of twenty, she ducked back out, dealing lead sixteen shots at a time.

Shepard felt the pulse first as a tingle in the soles of her feet, but with every beat it gained strength until it pounded through her entire body and throbbed through the air. It's rhythm resembled a heartbeat, but off, as if the heart had an extra chamber. The fire from outside the circle let up, giving her hope that the number of Collectors actually was finite. Then, it stopped, and everything fell to silence but for the throbbing thump-thu-thump.

"I know that sound," Nihlus said. He gestured to Jack and Javik to take the remaining commandos and secure the room.

"It's a prothean heartbeat," Javik said as he passed Shepard, three sullen asari trailing behind him.

She watched after him for a few seconds, then turned to see to the wounded. Miranda, Liara, and Aethyta were already cutting leathers away from wounds, so she left them to it, moving out into the dense forest of stasis pods. When she reached the inside edge, she turned back and looked up, her gaze travelling up the lit galleries. Stasis pods, who knew how many deep, stood in rows up there as well.

"Sweet baby Jesus," she whispered, her mind counting the rows and columns she could see. Tens of thousands of pods. At least.

"The Collectors have spent the last fifty thousand cycles preparing for the Reapers' return," Nihlus said, raising his voice to be heard over the throbbing pulse. "Given another couple of cycles, how many of these things will they release across Thessia?" He lifted a hand to press against the wall, sagging a little.

Shepard nodded. "Harbinger said that their numbers will sweep our homeworlds before we can even mount a defence. That means there is somewhere like this on Earth and Palaven … who knows how many other planets." She winced as the throbbing grew even louder. "What the hell is that?"
"The way our luck is running, we'd better go find out now." The Spectre held out an arm. "Give an old torin a hand?"

Shepard considered arguing with him and leaving him to rest, but he was right. The luck couldn't get much worse; she might need him. Giving him a weary smile, Shepard slipped under his arm, bracing her shoulder in against his side. "I can't wait to see what new nightmare awaits."

Nihlus sighed. "I was going to bark at you for jinxing us, but … who cares?"

Shepard just raised her eyebrows and nodded. They'd actually reached a point where it just didn't matter.

The cavern walls formed an almost perfect cylinder, but the five-metre-tall stasis units negated whatever line of sight might have been allowed by the shape of the room. Shepard's first hint as to the depth of her mistake in believing them unjinxable came when Nihlus's entire body stiffened as if bracing to take a heavy blow. The next hint crawled up the wall, interwoven tentacles of tech and corrupted chia that looked like a grisly bloom of squid or man-eating vines from a horror vid.

When they cleared the stasis units and the entire construct appeared, Shepard took a long, shuddering breath, her mind struggling to comprehend what stood beneath the brilliant lights. Five of the indoctrinated asari commandos stood within tubes of corrupted chia, their bodies still, their expressions impassive … blank canvases waiting to be painted. Behind their tubes, a machine crawled up out of the floor like some sort of living nightmare, sinuous veins of corrupted chia woven over and around the blocky, recognizable prothean tech.

"Dear spirits," Nihlus whispered. He released her, limping forward, his eyes riveted on the heart of the machine. A clear amber panel stretched flat and transparent over … something.

Shepard followed the Spectre, angling to see what lie beneath the window of chia without getting too close. The last thing she needed was to add, 'walked into a trap for the second time today' to her log entry. Reflections from the lights obscured her view even when she faced it head on, so she crept closer, straining … her mind racing, trying to piece together the puzzle of visuals.

Tubes, wires, and tech of all sorts encapsulated something. She squinted against the glare. Was that an arm? Faint teal-blue skin, but two fingers and a thumb at the end. Blessed Enkindlers, was that a person in there?

Nihlus let out a strangled moan. "No." His voice dropped to a dessicated whisper. "Spirits, no."

Tearing her eyes from the machine, Shepard looked to her partner. The Spectre wobbled precariously, his knees buckling. She ran up, slipping an arm around him to help keep him on his feet.

"What is it?" she asked, worried stare searching his. "Is it your wound?"

"Tashac." He inclined his head toward the machine. "The heartbeat." Closing his eyes, he lowered his brow to rest on the top of her head. "It's hers."

Shepard eased out of his grip, taking one step toward the machine before stalling. Her heart fluttered a couple of times, then stuttered to a near-stop even as the booming beat of the prothean's grew stronger. "I never saw her," she whispered. "I was always on the inside looking out." One hand crept up as if to touch the clear, amber casing but stopped well clear. "Dear baby Jesus, what did they do to her?"

The weighted hand, that old companion, pushed down heavier and heavier, crushing Shepard into the floor. Panic … pure white, blinding panic sliced through her, freezing her to the spot even as it screamed at her legs to run. It demanded that she run until her heart and lungs gave out. She could run that far, her heart already fluttered, its beats uneven and rabbit-quick. She could run from that place and die somewhere under Thessia's velvet-blue sky … just stop as she'd been meant to all those months ago. She and her Callor could lie under a warm sun, his arm cradling her head, and he could read to her. They could … . She backed up a step. They could make love and just let it all go. Maybe the cycle and the Reapers … maybe it was all meant to happen. Maybe it had to happen.

"I'm so proud of you," her father whispered, his face pressed against the hood, his breath heating the coarse material. "I've never been more proud … no, not proud … in awe of anyone or anything in my life, my beautiful girl." She felt a kiss, a soft blessing high on her cheekbone. "No matter what, you have to survive this, Janey. Something big, and probably terrible, is waiting for you, but I know that you'll face it. I know that you'll beat it, kiddo."

No! Shepard stumbled backwards another step. He couldn't have known how huge and black and monstrous it was. It was all too immense. All of it. She turned to look over the thousands, the tens of thousands of stasis pods, each containing one of the banshees. That many monsters … so many more on every homeworld … . What army could even hold against it, let alone defeat it?

"Millions suffer, thousands rebel, hundreds lead, but it only takes one … the right single heart to beat them. You are that heart, my beautiful girl. You are that heart."

No. Not her. Thousands of others braver and stronger than her had stood in almost that exact same spot. Tashac … Tashac was the last. And look at what the Reapers had done to her. Shepard spun back around to stare up at the ruined face of her future. The bravest of the prothean people, turned into a nightmare, the beating heart of Thessia's destruction.

In the end, the Reapers had denied Tashac everything, eating her from the inside out, then encasing her in a living hell, stealing away even the peace of death. Shepard reeled back. No! No, they did not get to … . She wouldn't … couldn't spend the next fifty thousand years trapped in a barely-living hell, being used against the races yet to come. And they would. The Reapers' tentacles already crept through her mind, dark and insidious. How long before they strapped her into a stasis pod, indoctrinated, stripped of her soul, unable to see even the bleakest light through their corruption?

Eyes riveted to the ancient rictus of agony on Tashac's face, Shepard backed toward the cavern entrance, her legs picking up speed with every step. No. Harbinger had one thing right: she was nothing, a corpse dragged back across the void. How in the name of the holy fucking Enkindlers could she hope to weather the coming storm?

A large hand impacted between her shoulder blades, that one very real as it held her up rather than crushing her into ash. Nihlus. He didn't speak, stepping up to grip her tight against his side, his hand slipping around her shoulders. She looked up to find him staring at the prothean. A soft keen trilled through his subvocals before he turned to her, meeting her eyes with very familiar storm clouds of fear and sorrow rolling across his expression.

"She prayed for one thing," the Spectre said, his voice soft and laced with another keen of grief. "All she wished for was the arms of her mate and children when her time came." The clouds parted, rage flashing through. "We don't let them get away with this, Shepard. We can't."

She opened her mouth, but the beasts rampaging through her thoughts scattered them too quickly for her to put anything together.

"We all get these moments, Jane." He pulled her in tight against him. "It's all too massive and terrifying, and every once in awhile, it flattens me like a dreadnought. When that happens, Garrus drags me off the floor, sends me to Chakwas to sober up, and then carries me until I find my feet again."

Shepard pulled free of his arms, taking a hesitant step toward the machine. "They'd turn me into that, Nihlus." She threw a hand at the Prothean. "They'd turn me black as sin and chain me to their will, using me against everyone I love. They'd leave me like that." A huge, gulping breath tore its way into her lungs, smashing its way down her airway.

He recaptured her, hugging her against his side. "I'll never let that happen, Jane. Garrus will never let that happen. The three of us ... Anderson ... the kid ... hell, all of Archangel will never let that happen. You aren't alone." Holding her shoulders, he pulled away far enough to bend down, meeting her eyes on a level. "You're not alone. The weight isn't only yours to bear."

Anchoring herself in his stare, Shepard drew a long, slow breath. She wasn't alone. She hadn't been since Eden Prime. Another breath and her heart began to take full beats, easing into a steady rhythm. Even after she woke up on the Cerberus station, they'd been there with her. All of them, even Liara.

Her family.

Lifting a hand to brush Nihlus's mandible, Shepard nodded, a quick bounce of her head as her thoughts finally settled. "We start by blowing this whole place to hell." She backed out of his arms and lifted the gauntlet of chia. "Can your people take the information off the computer on the upper level?"

"Affirmative, however, chia may be corrupted in the process," they responded.

She swallowed hard and squared her shoulders, sliding a solid steel blade down through her spine.
"If that information assisted us in ending the Reapers and the threat of corruption forever, would they consider that a worthy sacrifice?" She stared down at the device, trying to keep her will neutral. If she had to command it, she would, but that needed to be a last resort.

"EDI," she called into the open channel. "Find me a way to blow this machine and all these stasis pods to hell."

"Aye, Captain. Analyzing."

"Blow the stasis pods?" one of the commandos demanded, striding ahead as Javik's squad approached them. "There are a hundred thousand of my people in these things."

Shepard nodded and raised her Mattock, turning on the flashlight. Shining it into the closest pod, focusing the light on the banshee's face, she glanced back at the commando. "You recognize her?"

The small slice of cruelty slid down her throat, bitter and slick, but helped pull her back, centering her. Softening her voice, she said, "These aren't your people any more. Mourn them, but don't delude yourself about being able to save them."

She turned off the light and looked to Nihlus. "We should police up whatever we can find to help accomplish the whole blowing this place to hell maneuver."

A quick nod answered her, and he started calling out orders, rallying everyone over to the passage back to the surface.

Javik approached the machine, his lips drawn back to bare his teeth. He walked right up to the chia and stared up at the prothean encased within. After a moment, Shepard saw his shoulders rise and fall in a deep breath. "She was once the most stunning and remarkable of takune." His head tilted a little to one side. "I have often wondered what our offspring looked like, whether they favoured me or her."

A bitter chuckle cut the silence between them. "I hoped her genetic code dominated." One hand reached up. Shepard moved to stop him from touching it, but she didn't need to.

Another long breath and his shoulders dropped further. "She was once the most impressive of takune." Turning from the case, he met Shepard's stare with one formed of fire and ice. "She must be released, Shepard. Allow her to join her mate and children."

"Oh, yeah," Shepard said, her voice low and furious. "I will. I don't care if the entire mountain explodes because of it, I'm shutting this whole damned place down." She approached the case and looked up into Tashac's face. "It may have taken fifty thousand years too long, but you'll be free. I hope your family is waiting."

Swallowing the tears that balled in her throat and flooded her sinuses, Shepard spun away. "Come on, EDI, the pounding is getting louder. I'd bet an entire bag of peanut butter cookies that it's powering up to do something."

"It is currently channeling power to the pods holding the indoctrinated commandos. The machine has begun the transformation process. I believe I can utilize my cyber warfare suite to overload both computers. As their power source is nuclear, the resulting explosion will destroy everything within the chambers and collapse a considerable portion of the peak. You will need to evacuate to the Ypres prior to detonation."

Shepard looked to the pods with the captive asari, a pathetic sort of hope sinking clammy fingers into her guts. "Is there any way you can free the prisoners?"

"The machine has progressed too far into the process. I am sorry, but the prisoners are deceased, Shepard." Even knowing that she tended to anthropomorphize the AI, Shepard swore she heard genuine remorse in EDI's voice.

"Chia, have you finished downloading the computer data?" she asked, turning her attention to the gauntlet.

"We have not reached a consensus on whether the data contained within the computer core is worth the potential risk to millions of chia."

"Any chance of reaching a decision within the next minute?" Anger simmered, slowly rising to a boil. Planet ending threats didn't leave room for debate.

"The likelihood is negligible."

"Then do it. Retrieve the data. I'll take responsibility for their lives." Shepard lowered her arm. "Javik, the rest of you, come on, let's get the wounded to safety before this place blows." As she ducked between stasis pods, Shepard turned her attention back to bringing down the mountain.

"EDI, give me some good news, here. I want this place melted into slag in less than …. ." She glanced over at Javik. "How long did it take you to get from the entrance to the chamber where you found us?"

Before the prothean could answer, EDI responded. "According to my scans, the ground party should be able to evacuate in under twenty-four minutes, given that several members are wounded. I will time and coordinate my attack to allow sufficient time for evacuation."
Shepard stomped down hard on the flare of hope that went off in her chest, sizzling up into her brain. Way too much could still go wrong. Way, way too much.

"Captain Shepard," EDI continued, "analysis of the pulse coming from the machine suggests a beacon or transmitter powering up a signal. I hypothesize that the machine was designed to indoctrinate anyone within range in order to defend the Collector base."

"Captain," Steve cut in, "what she isn't getting around to saying is that the signal is gaining strength with every cycle. In fifteen, twenty minutes, your indoctrination serum might as well be chicken soup for all the good it will do you."

The flare died. Always too good to be true. "Thanks, LT. EDI, get to work. This place goes up, even if we're still in it. We can't risk it. We're on our way out." She sped up, racing toward the wounded. "Miranda! Get these people up and headed out."

The operative looked up. "We have more commandos succumbing to the signal, Shepard. Two more just disappeared, and another three are experiencing hallucinations." She finished securing a bandage on Shiala's chest.

Shepard nodded, her gut clenched so tight it hung like ozmium in her belly. "Yeah, it's the pulse. It's an indoctrination signal and it's getting stronger. We need to get out now, or it'll get us all." She held out a hand to Shiala. "You ready to run?"

(A-N: October 1st, I have been writing Future Imperfect for two years. I posted that quick, uppity chapter within hours of getting the idea for a Nihlus LI, smartass Shepard story that would be a nice little break from the heavy drama of writing The Internal Machinations of Exploding Stars. HA! Now look where we are.

I have commissioned art to commemorate the momentous occasion, and have something pretty special planned, storywise. So, I will be putting out chapters this week aiming toward getting my big day all set up. As always, I so appreciate you readers … whether you've been here from the first day like Vulpixer, or just started reading a couple of weeks ago. You're unbelievably kind and supportive, and I love you for it.

A quick shout out to the people who have helped make this story what it is: theherocomplex, LilVy, Lachdannen, and Sinistra-sama ... thanks so much for beating up my sad words and making them shiny.)
"Do you think I haven't had my moments of despair today? I've had more than I'm comfortable admitting to, Liara, but here I am." She shrugged, throwing her arms out to the side. "Still here. Still fighting." She pointed to Nihlus. "He's why. You're why." Her hand swept to encompass the entire team. "They're why. Understand? We don't have the selfish luxury of despair."

Nais: (pronounced Nahees) Plural: Naisa (pronounced Naheesah) An asari over the age of emancipation. Equivalent of woman/women.

38 Days ASR

Shiala's vice-like grip on Shepard's hand reassured her of the injured asari's ability to make the long run to the surface. "Yes, ma'am. More than ready." She pulled herself up, but held herself gingerly, canted to her injured side.

"Excellent." Shepard steadied the nais until Shiala pulled away, then turned to the rest of the team. "Javik, help Shiala." Shepard waited until the prothean stepped up, then moved on, her movements quick and efficient as she got them all up and supported by at least one other member of the team. Pride replaced worry as the unindoctrinated moved calmly and with purpose, gathering up their fellows.

"Shepard," Miranda called, gesturing for the captain to step away from the others. "I sent Liara ahead to the entrance with Aethyta. The matriarch gave all her serum away to the commandos." The operative paused, looking both exhausted and vaguely nauseated. She brushed her forehead with the back of her hand, an uncharacteristic tell. "The matriarch has begun to hallucinate. Liara found her staring into one of the pods talking to Matriarch Benezia."

"Shit." Shepard nodded. "Okay, go ahead. Start getting these people out of here. We don't have much time before this place blows, and even less time before the signal becomes so strong that we all end up drooling." She watched the operative, searching for further signs of wear. "You holding up all right?" she asked, knowing the answer she'd get regardless of the truth. Still, she needed to ask.

"I'm fine, Shepard." Miranda turned away and began moving people out. "I've been keeping up with my serum."

"Good." Shepard glanced back to find Thane a few metres behind her. "Shadowing me?" She smiled and tipped her head toward the way out. "Give me a hand with Aethyta?" When he nodded, she lifted into a jog, leading him to where Liara struggled with the matriarch.

Tears ran down the frantic asari's face as she tried to keep her father present and anchored. "She thinks she's talking to my mother, Shepard. I don't know what to do."

"Thane will help you get her to the surface." She squeezed the young nais's shoulder. "Stay calm. Getting upset will only make her more agitated."
Chaos ruled their evacuation. She needed to do something, or they would never get out in time. A memory flashed through her head. A movie … maybe?

"Blindfold them," she shouted over the pounding. "Wrap their eyes with bandages and quickly."

Nihlus cocked a brow plate at her. "Blindfolds?"

Shepard shrugged and butted her shoulder in against his side. "Horses will panic and refuse to leave a burning barn. The only way you can get them out is to take away their orientation. Hopefully, it will make our indoctrinated a little easier to guide." She started up the tunnel. "Meanwhile, a blindfold won't move you along any faster, so let's get going." She glanced over to see her people either giving themselves a boost of the serum or obeying her order.

Miranda and four of the commandos arrived, completing their party. Blessed Enkindlers, they'd lost a lot of people.

"We're starting ahead, Miranda," she called. "Bring them along." Two steps down the hall, she stopped Nihlus and turned back. "But take another dose of serum first."

"As you say, Captain." The operative dug into her hip pack.

"Captain Shepard," EDI called over the team channel, "I have begun the attack on the Collector computers. My firewalls are holding against their counterattack, although their computer is proving extremely powerful and adaptable. You have twenty-five minutes before the base reaches critical."

"Understood, EDI. Please give us five minute updates." Shepard turned back. "Okay, old guy, we're going to have to push." A shudder rolled up her spine, clammy fingers stabbing out from her implants as they gripped the base of her skull, pulsing in time with Tashac's heartbeat. She felt the tar-slick spiders writhing, slithering out along her neurons, but not trying to take control. If the idea didn't amount to complete and utter madness, she would have thought them trying to protect her from the Reaper signal.

Shaking off the crazy, she let out a pained grunt and pushed through the cramps locking up her spine. Letting Nihlus set the pace, she merely kept up with his flat-footed jog, trying not to hinder him. She didn't hold much hope for him being able to maintain the pace for long, but where the Spectre was concerned, she couldn't discount the bulwarking effect of sheer stubborn pride.

Nihlus held the pace better than she thought, and they made it all the way to the twelve minute mark and the first chamber before he slowed to a laboured limp. The rest of the group had caught up with them after only a few minutes, the indoctrinated proving fairly biddable once blindfolded.

Shepard took advantage of the slowed pace to lift the gauntlet to address the chia. "Have your people recovered the data from the computer?" she asked, bracing for their reply.

"Affirmative. Three million chia were corrupted in the process." Even with that news, the voice remained completely emotionless. She wondered briefly if the gauntlet's owed its stoicism to her omnitool possessing no emotion, because the emotion steeped through everything the chia did.

"I'm sorry, but that data may help save a lot more of your people in the long run." Shepard clenched her teeth, took a deep breath, and pushed on. The time had come. For all she thought about and spoke of the necessity of sacrifice and loss during the fight against Saren, she'd been able to throw herself in front of most of the danger, minimizing the loss. However, the Collectors had upped the ante to the point where the best she could do was make the inevitable losses count.

"Apology unnecessary. The data is important to continued resistance," they replied, surprising her.
Given their initial reluctance, she'd expected accusation.

No matter. "If your people want to evacuate Thessia, get them to the Ypres. They can hitch a ride with us in the cargo bay as long as they don't try to influence anyone on the sh—"

She stopped, a fuss up ahead pulled her attention away from the cuff. Scowling, she leaned around Javik and Shiala to see a bright flash of blue throw Thane and Liara across the tunnel.

"Aethyta!"

Shepard spun as Liara scrambled up and sprinted off into the dark. "Damn it." Thane started to go after them, but she released Nihlus and threw herself in front of him. "No, Thane, help Nihlus. Keep him moving."

Nihlus grabbed her arm. "Shepard, you can't go after them."

She gripped his hand, squeezing his talons as she removed it. "We're five minutes from the surface," she called back as she started running down the ramp. "If I don't catch them in under a minute, I'll turn around."

"Take more serum!" he hollered.

That wasn't a bad idea. She gave herself a shot even as she ran. "We need to have a chat about how much you allow to go wrong on my damned missions," she muttered to the air, tossing the ampule to the side and speeding up. "This is ridiculous, even for my luck."

She caught sight of Liara a good minute into the run, the asari sprawled on the ground struggling with the matriarch. Biotics flew, slamming off the walls and ceiling.

"Hey, stop throwing powers around," she called, slowing. "I don't want to end up trapped in a singularity or stasis." She went into her pack for her emergency kit. Half of it had been turned inside out while trying to find things to help Nihlus, but luckily, she hadn't dug out the sedatives.

"Hold her down," She knelt next to them, then threw herself over the matriarch, pinning her enough to get a good jab. It took only a few seconds for the asari to stop fighting.

Shepard groaned as she pushed off the drugged asari. "Oh man, I am way too old and deceased to be doing this crap."

Scrambling up, she waved to Liara. "Help me get her into a fireman's carry. We have seven or eight minutes to get to the surface." Between them they wrapped Aethyta over Shepard's shoulders. After bouncing the matriarch's body into balance, she took off, trying to ignore the ticking clock in her head and how much uphill slope lay ahead. "Liara, come on! Move! Ahead of me."

Liara ran ahead, the pair of them making good time to the first cavern, but then the asari slowed so suddenly that Shepard almost ran her down. Two commandos scurried past them, blindly racing back the way they'd come. The prothean researcher let out a squawk and spun around to follow them.

"No!" Shepard shouted. "If you go after them, I'm leaving you, and you'll die down there." She kept running for the surface. "It's either live and look after Aethyta or die down there. Your choice, Liara."

"But, Shepard … ." Liara's infuriated wail echoed up the tunnel, but then Shepard heard running feet gaining on her from behind.
Shepard’s legs shook so hard the last hundred metres or so that she expected them to give out. Each next step surprised her as the reinforced muscles held, pistons driving her forward and up.

Thank you, Cerberus. For this, at least.

As soon as they emerged into the sun, Shepard stumbled, falling as gracefully as she could manage, hoping to spare Aethyta injury. Hands grabbed hold of her and her burden, helping her up onto her knees. Once steady there, she waved them off, needing a second before getting back up onto her feet.

Her pulse fading inside her head, Shepard swung around, looking for Miranda. Despite the sun whispering for them to forget the dark tunnels and horrors, they needed to get their asses to a safe distance. "Is the Ypres on its way?" she demanded of the operative.

"Less than a minute out, Shepard." Miranda's tone came across as dull and flat as Shepard felt.

"Get it here faster." She pushed up off the ground, taking a few, stumbling steps out onto the ledge. "What the hell, Lieutenant, you knew the deadline, you were supposed to be here waiting."

"We still have a couple of minutes," Liara insisted. "We could go back and get the rest of the commandos." She raced over to grab Shepard's arms. "We've got time. Some of them were only at the first level."

Shepard pulled free and shook her head. "Nobody goes back in there." Nodding toward Aethyta and Thane, she clenched her jaw and said, "Look to your father. You need to get her back to Omega for treatment." Shepard turned toward the cliff twenty metres down the trail. "Let's move. I want to be ready to just jump on the—"

The young asari grabbed Shepard and spun her around. "Those are my people! You can't just leave them."

"Does it hurt?" Shepard slapped Liara's hands away. "Does it burn?" The captain leaned in, her voice burrowing down into her chest when the asari tilted her head in a reluctant nod. "Good. Learn from it. Next time, don't bring people without preparing them. You are in charge, not them."

Looking past Liara to meet Nihlus's eyes, Shepard ground her teeth for a second, the pressure driving back the unkind words that leaped into her mouth. "I've killed a lot of innocent beings today, and I'm about to finish off another hundred thousand. So, let's just agree that we've both learned a brutal lesson about the shape of this war. Drive it home, and move on."

"Shepard!" When the captain looked toward the call, Miranda pointed to the approaching Ypres.

Shepard nodded, but then turned back to Liara. "Do you think I haven't had my moments of despair today? I've had more than I'm comfortable admitting to, Liara, but here I am." She shrugged, throwing her arms out to the side. "Still here. Still fighting." She pointed to Nihlus. "He's why. You're why." Her hand swept to encompass the entire team. "They're why. Understand? We don't have the selfish luxury of despair. Whether we asked for it or want it, we're leaders. That means doing better. It means rising out of the pathetic, weak, base stuff that makes up who we are and striving for stronger and wiser."

Pulling Liara into a rough, one-armed hug, Shepard lowered her voice to something kinder as she said, "Go, see to Aethyta. She needs you." Once the pale, shaking nais turned and walked away, Shepard strode to Nihlus's side. "Come on, old guy, let's get you aboard."

He leaned into her as she wrapped her arm around his waist. "I feel old." His elbow dug into her shoulder as he limped, the way his talons dragged through the grass making an eloquent argument for his weariness.

"Well, you look like absolute crap, so … ." She let out a soft chortle as he elbowed her. As she approached the edge of the escarpment, she stopped and turned to look at him. "Hey … guess what?"

The Spectre's chuckle came out dry and laced with pain. "We made it?" Still, under the filth and the exhaustion, his eyes sparkled brilliant and green. Battered, but not bested.

Shepard nodded. "We made it." She looked up when the Ypres's thrusters kicked down to counter gravity as Lt. Cortez brought her in. Never had a lowering ramp ever seemed so damned welcome. She tightened her grip on Nihlus and led him toward the edge then onto the deck plating.

"Dr. Eis is on her way to meet us," Miranda said, helping Shiala up the steep angle. "I'll head directly to medbay to assist."

"I will as well," Liara called from behind Shepard.

"Good. We're heading straight back to Omega." Shepard glanced next to her at Nihlus. "How far will your Spectre clearances go to keeping this from becoming a government shit storm?"

"I think our suit recordings will go a lot further." The Spectre stopped at the top of the ramp, his mandibles giving a quick flutter. "I know a few people who can ensure the recordings make it to the matriarchs who need to see them rather than just vanishing."

At the far end of the shuttle bay, the elevator doors opened, Dr. Eis, Kelly, and Vincent stepping out, gurneys floating ahead of them on antigrav fields. When the two groups met, the doctor pointed Nihlus toward one of the beds, Shiala, and one of the commandos to the other two.

"No arguments, Spectre," the doctor said, forestalling Nihlus's inevitable protest that he could walk up. She looked to Liara. "I have cots set up for the indoctrinated. We need to get their treatment started as quickly as possible." For a moment, it looked like she was going to ask about the missing numbers, but then just closed her mouth and set to work.

Shepard helped Nihlus onto the gurney. "I've got to get to the bridge, but I'll see you up in medbay once all the unpleasantness is done."

He held out his hand even as Vincent started pushing him toward the elevator. "Loan me the chia?"

Shepard thought the request, and the gauntlet opened. She passed it over then squeezed into one corner of the elevator and hit the controls. "How long do we have, EDI?"

"Fifty-three seconds."

"Returning to orbit, Captain," Cortez added.

Shepard willed the elevator to go faster. "Bring up a visual of the mountain in the briefing room, and record the explosion." The doors opened on the crew deck, the rest of the elevator's occupants hurrying off. She held Nihlus's stare until the doors closed.

"Aye, Captain," the pair replied in unison.

Shepard jumped out as the doors opened onto the CIC and ran around through the lab to the briefing room. She could have just as easily witnessed the Collector base's destruction from the
Your first strike against the Collectors, Janey. You did it.

The table already projected the hologram when she arrived with less than a second to spare. The mountain shuddered, starting about two thirds of the way up and travelling toward the peak. With remarkably few theatrics, the peak collapsed, losing about a quarter of its height before clouds of dust and smoke broke through the shattered crust, billowing up into the atmosphere. Compared to the massive bulk of the entire mountain, it amounted to a small puff of smoke, barely enough to rattle windows in nearby Armali. On a galactic scale, the consequences should have shredded the planet.

Shepard closed her eyes and leaned into the table, her arms braced against her sides. "Rest well, Tashac. Rest well."

Cortez broke through her moment of silence on her private comms. "Captain, there is a Matriarch Tanallia requesting to speak with you or Spectre Kryik."

"Tell the matriarch and anyone else who calls that Archangel will contact them as soon as possible to arrange a meeting with our representatives. Express that we understand and share their concern over the incident as what we found within that mountain represents a grave threat to the asari republics." She debated sending along visuals of the Collectors, but decided to wait. Before they showed their hand, they needed more intel on which of the matriarchs to approach and how.

She shut down the hologram, the picture reduced to a cloud of settling dust. Time to check up on her crew and make sure that even the ones who didn't appear to be showing any effects got treated. But first … credit needed to be given where credit was due.

Shepard greeted the crew with smiles and short words of thanks as they congratulated her on the decisive victory. With every step toward the bridge, the events on the surface registered more and more as just that. Their losses paled in light of what they'd discovered, and the fact that the Reapers' massive army of banshees had been reduced to slag under millions of tons of rock.

And now we know there are other bases on the other homeworlds, we can do the same to them.

"Well, if it isn't the Captain Shepard! And on my bridge!" Lt. Cortez said, a wide grin brightening his handsome face. "Guess they weren't just making it all up when they briefed us on why they invested so much to bring you back."

Shepard shook her head, her face easing into a smile to answer his. "A big chunk of bringing down that base and pulling us out goes to EDI and to you. Good work." She turned to the AI's hologram, cocking her head a little at the sideways sort of mouth thing that flashed when the AI spoke. "Thank you, EDI. You pulled out a big win and bought Thessia some time."

"I am pleased to be of assistance, Captain." The flashing stopped for a pause Shepard just knew was for dramatic effect. "Working with you has encouraged me to indefinitely postpone my plans to subjugate all organic life in the galaxy."

Shepard grinned, the AI's humour sloughing away the last of her mental and emotional armour. "Glad to hear it." Turning to Cortez, she asked, "How are the two of you getting along?"

"I admit, it's been a little strange, but EDI's easy to work with: efficient and courteous," the lieutenant answered. "Although, I'm pretty sure EDI and Lt. Baswar, the beta shift pilot, have an unholy prank conspiracy going. Today, someone deleted my entire playlist, substituting elcor opera."

Eyebrows heading for her hairline, Shepard winced. "Do I want to know?"

Cortez shook his head. "Writhing in the throes of internal agony: you do not."

Chuckling, she gave his shoulder a gentle slap. "Didn't your mother teach you that they only pick on you if they like you?"

He scoffed low and throaty. "That shines a whole different light on Big Eddy Chelnik in fourth grade."

Shepard laughed, but after a second, her grin fell from her face. "Oh, dear god, and my entire history with Ambassador Udina. Ew." She backed toward the door. "I've got to go check on my ground team, but excellent work today, EDI ... LT. Excellent work."

The Ypres's crew had settled back into their routines as she made her way back down the CIC to the elevator, acknowledging her with sharp, respectful nods. She couldn't have imagined ever commanding a Cerberus crew, but the place was starting to feel a little more like hers. It certainly didn't hurt that the Ypres echoed the Normandy in almost every line: a lady every bit as gorgeous, graceful, and deadly as her predecessor.

Nihlus sat on the side of one of the beds when Shepard arrived in medbay. He turned to face her and opened his mouth, but didn't get a chance to speak before the doctor interrupted.

"Spectre Kryik is ready to go." Eis turned away from working on Shiala. "He needs to rest for a couple of days, starting immediately after eating at least eight hundred calories," she said.

"I can see to that." Shepard tilted her head, meeting Nihlus's stare with a teasing challenge before she bulldozed on. "Are all the members of the ground team being scanned for signs of indoctrination, doctor? Even the ones who aren't showing symptoms?"

"They are." Eis waved a hand at Nihlus's bed. "So, hop up there, Miranda can run the scans."

Shepard squashed a grin at Miranda's stiff-backed reaction to being volunteered. Thank goodness for another doctor who ruled her medbay with an iron fist. Eis's willingness to stand up to Miranda settled Shepard's trust in the doctor a little deeper. Very few people proved more important to the ultimate success of a crew or held as much power as the ship's doctor. She'd thought Chakwas a singularity, but she began to believe Eis cut from the same cloth.

Sitting up beside Nihlus, Shepard bumped him with her shoulder. "How are you feeling?"

He listed against her a little as he looked down into her eyes. "I really need a long nap. And maybe some chocolate."

She grinned and nodded. "Yeah, I hear you there. A whole damned lot of chocolate." Closing her eyes against the glow of Miranda's omnitool, Shepard let herself drift as the last of the adrenaline wore off, leaving her sinking slowly into the mattress.

"Dr. Eis?" The tone in Miranda's voice pried Shepard's eyelids open. "Can you take a look at this data, please?"

Shepard tried reading the scan results backwards, but they didn't make any sense.
"Huh," Eis grunted, leaning in. After a moment, she turned her omnitool on Shepard, then Miranda and Nihlus in turn. "This has to be significant, but hell if I know what it means."

Shepard waited for a full minute before she cleared her throat. "Since I seem to be the cause of some concern, maybe bring me in on the discussion?" Although both women appeared perplexed, neither one seemed alarmed, which was a pleasant deviation from the norm.

"You're showing negligible signs of being exposed to the Reaper indoctrination signal," Eis explained. She brought up a side by side comparison of Shepard's neural activity compared to five of the others. Even Shepard could see that hers followed a much different curve, even allowing for differences between species.

"When the pulse started getting strong at the end, I felt the … " She winced at describing the sensation and images, aware that she was making a horror vid out of it, but rolled her eyes and pushed on. " … the spiders … the manifestation of the indoctrination from the orbs … swarming around through my head, but they didn't try to co-opt my senses like they did before." Heat crept up her neck. "I thought they might be forming a barrier."

Miranda showed her weariness as a thoughtful frown creased her usual, porcelain calm. "Two different indoctrination signals?" Shepard didn't have to dig to find the operative's skepticism, she laid it all out on the surface as she continued, "That would imply two factions of Reapers."

"Remember when we were trying to find a way into the mountain," Nihlus said, "you said that the spiders felt as though they were afraid of what was inside."

Shepard nodded, the memory reasserting itself. "Yeah, and Tashac said that I couldn't take the dark ones inside. I thought she meant the Reapers, but maybe the Reapers didn't want whomever is behind the spiders getting in." Letting out a short, heavy breath, she slumped. "Two factions of Reapers? Because things weren't complicated enough already."

Seeing Miranda and Dr. Eis gearing up for the full works, Shepard threw up her hands. "Nope. We've just finished the day from hell. Debriefing at 0800 in the briefing room for everyone who was on the ground who is capable of attending. You two can send your data and anything EDI recorded of the indoctrination pulse back to Archangel for Dr. Chakwas and Mordin to have a look at, but I am too tired to play lab rat."

She slid down off the bed and held her arm out to Nihlus. "The old guy and I are going to try to eat something and get some sleep." Cutting off their protests with a sharp shake of her head, Shepard just ushered Nihlus out of medbay ahead of her. "Goodnight, ladies. Don't contact me unless someone or something is on fire."

Once the medbay door closed behind them, she patted Nihlus on the arm. "Go ahead," she told him. "I'll ask Sgt. Gardner to send something up. Feel like anything in particular?"

The Spectre shrugged, the gesture so exhausted that she wondered if she shouldn't accompany him up and just call for food once she got him settled. "Couple of protein bars is fine. The faster I can get it down, the better." He shuffled toward the elevator. "Remember when my plan was to be as lazy as possible?" His sharp chuff and dry chuckle rolled with subvocals she didn't need to be turian to understand.

"Go, get into bed, you big baby." She turned toward the galley, determined to get Nihlus something better than protein bars. After the day he'd been through, he deserved something hot. Did turians even have comfort food?
As it turned out, Sgt. Gardner was five klicks ahead of her, preparing a thick turian soup that she hadn't even known was Nihlus's favourite.

"Heard you and the Spectre got the crap kicked out of you pulling our people's asses out of the fire down there," the cook said, shrugging. "Thought he could use some decent food." He cleared his throat, as if the idea of being generous embarrassed him. "Made you a thermos of tomato, ma'am."

She picked up the two containers. "You're now officially my hero, Sergeant. If I wasn't so tired, I'd hop over the counter and kiss you." Shepard grinned as he flushed and turned to wipe the counter, grumbling under his breath. "Thank you for this. It's a very kind and welcome gesture."

When she arrived up in her cabin, she found Nihlus sitting at her desk watching the door. Stopping just over the threshold, she met his gaze for a moment then held out his container of soup. "A present from Sgt. Gardner." When his expression didn't change, she let out a soft sigh. Damn. Well, it wasn't as if she hadn't known the conversation was going to happen.

Letting out another sigh, she walked over and set his soup down in front of him. "Eat, you need to replace all that blood." She turned and started toward the stairs down to the couches.

"It was beautiful, wasn't it?" Nihlus snagged Shepard's hand, refusing to let her walk away. "The three of us … that future … it was beautiful."

She turned to look at him. The earnest pleading in his eyes tore at her heart, but she set her jaw as she blew a ragged breath out through her nose. "Yes, Nihlus, it was beautiful, but it was a dream. It wasn't reality." She broke from his hold and paced over to the fishtank, staring in at the caustics reflecting through the empty water.

Swallowing hard, trying to force the lump in her throat down far enough that she could keep talking, she bulwarked her shoulders to repel him. "Reality is Garrus pacing outside the room wondering why he isn't enough to make me happy, and then the same happening with you when I am with him. The reality is constantly feeling guilty for one of you being on the outside." Finally building the wall solid enough to face him, she turned back. "The reality is everything tearing apart and leaving all three of us broken."

He smiled and shook his head. "No, Jane. No." He stepped forward, hands raised, but then let them drop when she pulled away from him. Shrugging, he turned to pace to the desk and back a couple of times. "I don't want to have this talk without Garrus, because I know you're going to need to hear him say a great deal, but I want you to shake all that fear and moral judgement crap out of your head, and think about one thing."

"And that is?" She turned and leaned back, the curved glass cold across her hips and shoulders.

He sat in the chair, leaning forward with his forearms braced on his thighs. "I know you're in love with Garrus. The second you see him, your entire body changes. Your shoulders drop, you smile more easily, you can't help but glow. And I know he loves you." A faint shrug rippled across his shoulders. "You are his Kahri. He loved you enough to stay committed to a dead woman for two years. He went to bed at 2100 every night because you were waiting there in his dreams."

Wincing a little as that hit home again, Shepard shook her head. "And you're okay with what … ? Taking the back seat?" She scoffed. "That would last two days. When we met, you called me a whore for flirting to get information."

Head bobbing a little, he leaned back in the chair. "I know, and a lot has changed since then. I've changed since then." Slumping a little, he flipped his hands, a small, affable gesture. "I love Garrus, not romantically, but that doesn't diminish the strength of what I feel. He's more important to me than anyone except you. I want him to be happy. You making him happy doesn't set loose a basket of snakes in my gut. I don't watch you together and wish it was me instead." He smiled and pushed out of his chair. "I see you together and wish it was me as well."

Heart racing, Shepard pulled away as he closed on her. Dammit, why did he have to make it all so much harder? "I'm sorry, Nihlus, but it just can't work in the real world."

He stopped, the sudden lack of pressure pulling a small, gasping puff of air from her lips. The intensity of his stare didn't let up, however. "I love you, Jane, and I know you love me." A talon cut the air back and forth between them. "And you know this pull between us has nothing to do with Tashac and Merol." He took half a step back, allowing her to relax down off the fish tank glass. "If I hadn't been such a coward at Udina's party, where would we be today?"

She shrugged, despite the flash of images that raced through her head. What good would come out of allowing herself to imagine them together? She needed to do the opposite. "Who knows, Nihlus. I wasn't ready for a relationship back then. We'd probably have ended in some horrific screaming match the first time you tried to touch me with any sort of intimacy."

Throwing up both hands, one still holding her thermos, she backed toward the door. "Enough, Nihlus. Really. Please … just … enough." She hit the door control. "It would be best if you slept on the couch tonight. The pillows and blankets are in the drawers under my closet."

"Jane … ." He took two quick steps after her, but she bolted into the elevator and hit the door control to close it behind her.

Not having a clue where to go, she hit the control for the crew deck. Surely there'd be somewhere down there she could drink her soup in peace. Maybe by the time she headed back up, he'd be asleep. Fat chance, but pretending to be asleep would be good enough.

On the crew deck, she stepped out of the elevator and looked around, still not sure where she intended to go. She just needed a few moments of peace and silence. Between Miranda, Kelly, Vincent, and Al, and then everything that had happened since the Cerberus base … silence had been in short supply … time to think and figure anything out almost nonexistent.

The doors of the observation lounge closed behind her, the vast black of space spread in front of her before she realized she'd chosen her destination. She sat on one of the long couches and took a sip of her soup before setting it aside, her hands moving automatically to her hip pack for an ampule of pain killers. She'd stuck it into the port on her armour before she realized she hadn't changed.

Shepard glanced over at the observation lounge door as it opened, and stuffed the empty ampule back into the pack. She forced a smile as Thane stepped through the door. "Hello." A faint sigh escaped as the painkillers poured through her bloodstream. "Were you looking for me? Is there something I can do for you?" Tossing him a shrug, she gestured toward the large port. "Or are you just here for the view?"

The assassin entered the room, eerily silent as he crossed to look out at the stars. Shepard watched him, but didn't move out of her seat. The silence stretched on, not uncomfortable exactly, just anticipatory. So, he'd come looking for her, which meant he had something to say. Letting out a thin hiss of relief as the pain and crazy backed off a bit, she decided that she could wait.

After a moment, his shoulders relaxed a little and he clasped his hands behind his back. "Do the injections help?"
Surprised by the directness of the question, she stammered a little before managing to reply. "Sure, yeah, of course. My entire body is a massive, open wound. After days like today, they're lifesavers."

Spinning to face her, Thane nodded. "Yes, I imagine your wounds are painful, but that wasn't what I referred to. He walked over and sat down beside her, his eyes staring out at the view. "You made some painful decisions today."

"The entire war is going to be painful decisions and leaving people to die." Shepard snorted softly, a rumble at the back of her throat. "That's just brutal reality, but what has me sitting here stewing is stomping all over the heart of one of my best friends." She shook her head and raised her hands in a vague, open-palmed gesture of apology. "Sorry, too much information. Forget I said anything." She picked up her thermos and took a long draught of steaming hot soup, savouring the burn as it slid down her throat.

"You and Spectre Kryik are not together?" he asked, his tone trying for neutral, but still carrying an edge of surprise.

She frowned and glanced over at him. "You know the general and I are committed to one another."

He tucked his feet under him on the couch, taking a meditative pose. "I apologize for assuming that the three of you had some other sort of arrangement." That time he managed a completely impassive tone.

Shepard let out a long breath and turned back to the view. "Yeah, well … they have an arrangement, but I'm not involved in it."

"Karifratrus," he said, his nod heavily weighted with gravitas. "It is an honorable and important bond. There is none more sacred to a turian outside of bond-mates and offspring." He took a long breath, his chest expanding as he filled his lungs. He held it for a few seconds, then let it out. "They swear only 'until and beyond death', and yet it means everything. Their entire lives shared. There can be no question of jealousy within the bond, what belongs to one belongs to both, which is why I assumed. My apologies."

Shepard took another drink, using the motion to buy herself a little time and space before turning back to stare at him once more. "You really think it could work?" He seemed to have some sort of close-hand experience with the whole mess.

A graceful shrug rolled across his shoulders, but otherwise he remained completely still. "I know it can, and it has throughout the ages. As with all relationships, it depends on the temperaments and commitment of the people involved." He opened his eyes and turned to look at her. "Humans pair bond for the most part, but it is not the norm for all other races. Those who pair bond amongst salarians and krogan are the outliers, most mating is through contracts with the one and with whomever seems most likely to create viable offspring with the other. Asari relationships are very fluid, the hanar often form large blooms or family groups that remain together through several generations, and vorcha rarely see their mating partners again."

Shepard wondered how he'd come to know so much about the mating practices of the different species, but he had a point. She'd been imposing human norms onto other species. "So, you really believe one person can love two mates?"

"Love is not finite." Turning back to the stars, he continued, "Respect and devotion are not finite. If that were the case, as more children were born into a family, or more friends gathered, the well would run dry." The assassin steepled his fingers before his lips. "Love is love, Shepard. It takes many forms, changing for each circumstance. Trying to limit its acceptable forms or insisting that it conform to a set of rules is about control and fear, neither of which has a place in its truest form."

Finishing off her thermos of soup, Shepard stared out at the long expanse of space, her almost-meditation interrupted by a huge yawn.

"I doubt you will discover the answers you seek by falling asleep on this bench," the drell said, his low rumble easing her further toward oblivion. "Do you wish me to escort you to your cabin, Captain?"

A hard head shake and another yawn pushed her weariness back far enough for her to stand. "No, thank you. And thanks for the talk." She walked to the door. "Goodnight, Thane."

"Goodnight, Shepard."

Shepard headed to the armory, stripping out of her armor, the well-worn motions feeding into her continued, almost-meditative, calm. Nihlus was right … the future that he dreamed, the one where love saturated their entire existence, peaceful and complete … the three of them living that reality
… it had been beautiful.

She pushed her locker closed and turned toward the door. Did she want that future? She didn't deserve it, and it was insufferably greedy, but if it was possible—if everything wouldn't just explode in their faces—did she want it?

The lights were dimmed, only the lamp next to her side of the bed illuminating the cabin when she walked in the door. She headed into the bathroom, desperate for a shower, her skin crawling with afterimages of the day's long, waking nightmares. Arms braced against the wall, head hanging, she let her mind drift beneath the scalding spray. One thing kept cycling through her head over and over—leaving the loving arms of one husband to be welcomed into the arms of the other. No jealousy or anger, just a wide smile and warm conversation as she snuggled into Garrus's embrace, safe and adored.

"Damn." She slapped the wall, then spun to turn off the water. Why couldn't anything just be easy?

Maybe the only one making things difficult is you, Janey.

"Shut up, Bunny." Grabbing a towel, Shepard dried herself off. She brushed her teeth, and dressed in her usual shorts and t-shirt before heading out.

Nihlus lay on the couch, facing the backrest, most of his cowl hanging over the edge. She winced when she saw him. It couldn't be comfortable after the day they'd spent. The lack of snoring told her that the Spectre wasn't asleep. She paused by her armchair, mouth opening to speak, but then … what could she say that she hadn't already said? Well, other than that she'd changed her mind, and she certainly couldn't say that.

Heart aching, whispering to her about all the things she needed to do and to balance, Shepard climbed into bed. She plumped her pillows then packed them behind her head, using activity to delay the inevitable, but then she lay there, staring at his back in the pale blue light. If nothing else, he deserved a warm, soft-ish bed and kindness after the day he'd spent.

"Nihlus?"

He stirred but didn't reply.

A wry, sad sort of smile answered his obstinence. "Come on, that couch has to be uncomfortable as hell."

Without a word, he rolled straight up onto his feet. Stepping around the coffee table, he strode to the other side of the bed, pulled back the covers and climbed in. Shepard held herself stiff as he settled in, but then he rolled over to face her, his stare heating the side of her face. They remained like that for nearly five minutes; he wasn't the only one who could play the stubborn card, even though what she really wanted was to curl in against his warmth.

"We'll figure it out, Jane," he said at last, a soft sigh whistling through his nose. "The three of us will figure it out." He slipped one arm under her neck, pulling her tight against him. She didn't resist, and he nuzzled her temple. "It'll all be okay. You'll see."

She rolled over and curled into him, not at all certain that anything would be okay, let alone everything. Still, right then, maybe it wasn't such a bad thing to just give them both a break and have a little faith. What was the worst that could happen?

(A-N: Little behind here. The yard apes (my nephews and niece) brought home the plague, so writing has taken a back seat to drugged stupors and sleep. Still, I am hoping to get a chapter up tomorrow as well.

Thanks for reading, and to those who check in to show their support. It means a lot. hugs)
"Hi, honey, I'm home!" she hollered and stepped through the door, only to lurch to a stop on the other side when she saw someone sitting across from him. "Oh," she said, a fiery flush heating her face, "I'm sorry, I didn't know you were in a meeting."

She started to back out the door, but Garrus jumped up off the couch, initial startlement transforming into a bright smile.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

40 Days ASR

"Now there's a welcome sight." Nihlus yawned, jaws stretching wide in an impressive show of teeth, as he guided the cab in to land in front of Archangel headquarters. "Who would have thought this greasy, filthy pit would become home?"

Shepard grinned, straightening from her flopped against the door position to look out the window. "Home is supposed to be where the heart is, according to the old human proverb. I guess that's Omega, at least for now." As the grimy, but well-kept buildings grew in the windshield, she allowed herself to imagine something better, or at least something different. Maybe some day, if they managed to survive. For the time being, the saying was true … her people … her family lived there, and that made it home.

Unlike the last time they'd flown up to the base, no long lines milled around the front door. Apparently the refugees from the outer bases had all returned and been integrated. She climbed out, stretched, then reached into the back seat for her kit and Ingrid's gun case before she looked over at Nihlus.

"You okay?" she asked, angling her tone to encompass more than the wound he'd taken two days before. He'd been quiet ever since they climbed out of bed that morning. They'd spent the day prior debriefing the ground team and piecing together the best of the hardsuit footage as well as downloading all the raw footage for analysis. After all that was prepared, they met with Liara and her aunt—via the QEC—to discuss how best to approach the matriarchs. Nihlus had remained warm, close, and professional throughout, but that day, he'd hardly spoken a word despite being her steady shadow.

He slung his kit over his shoulder, picked up both of his gun cases in one hand, and nodded. "I'm fine. Looking forward to a good shower and my own bed."

Shepard let out a soft grunt of understanding, allowing him his lie, and led the way into the lobby. "I'll see about getting the mattress changed out while we're here. The thing is only marginally less painful than the one on the Normandy." She realized the implications of what she'd said about ten seconds too late, and turned away, hiding her flush by shuffling her grip on her rifle case.

The lobby stood as empty as the entry when they walked in. Shepard groaned when she saw the dark kitchen. Activating her omnitool, she checked the time on the station. "Wow, no wonder it's all quiet on the home front … it's bedtime." She chuckled. "We really need to coordinate all these different time zones. I was just starting to think about supper."

Nihlus shook his head and herded her toward the stairs. "Don't worry, there are always meals packaged in the refrigerator. Marcie is good that way." A soft, ironic chuff added punctuation as he continued, "There are probably even cookies somewhere with your name, and various threats, written on the packaging." At the top of the stairs, he rested a hand on her shoulder as if unwilling to part ways, even just for a few hours.

Shepard understood. They'd sealed something solid and permanent between them while the Collector machine held them captive. It seemed strange not to share every breath … like her right half stepping away from her left. But the break had to come eventually. They had lives to get on with, lives that couldn't include occupying one another's back pockets.

Even though you're going to start missing him about five seconds after he walks away.

Yeah, well … . Reaching up, she patted his hand. "I'll see you in the morning. Sleep well, and enjoy your shower." Without waiting for him to release his grip on her shoulder, she turned toward Garrus's door and palmed the control. A wide smile greeted the welcoming, soft lighting and the smoky tang of his incense.

"Hi, honey, I'm home!" she hollered and stepped through the door, only to lurch to a stop on the other side when she saw someone sitting across from him. "Oh," she said, a fiery flush heating her face, "I'm sorry, I didn't know you were in a meeting."

She started to back out the door, but Garrus jumped up off the couch, initial startlement transforming into a bright smile.

"Shepard!" He stepped around the table and strode across the room. "You're home early." He wrapped his arms around her, lifting her off the floor as he embraced her. Setting her down, he gripped her shoulders, holding her at arm's length while he looked her over. "Are you okay? You look wiped out."

Stiff and awkward, Shepard nodded, her gaze flitting back and forth between her boyfriend and his guest. All she could see of the person was wavy, graying hair pulled back in a pony tail. "Yeah," she said at last, dragging her attention back to his face, "we hit a lucky lull in the relay and docking queues." She ducked her head back toward the door, uncomfortable, her entire body twitchy, electricity lifting every hair as if a massive high pressure system circled at ceiling height, waiting to unleash a violent storm. She backed up a couple of steps. "Should I come back later?"

Garrus followed her, mandibles still spread in a smile as he wrapped his large hands around the balls of her shoulders. In an alarming contrast, the rest of his manner changed into his 'brace yourself' posture.

Oh, for frig's sake, Janey. What now?

"No, don't leave." He gathered her back into his arms, pressing her against his solid warmth. "But I do need to explain something, Shepard."

Her gut began to twist, knotting in on itself even as she settled her hands on his hips. "I feel like I should be sitting down for this," she whispered, not wanting the other person to hear her, and pulled back just far enough to see his face.
His smile softened a little as he rubbed her back, slowing her racing heart a smidge. He wouldn’t be smiling if it was terrible. "It's a good thing, Kahri, just unexpected." He stepped back again, a fierce sort of set to his features, his shoulders braced. "Remember the promise you asked me to make? To make sure Anderson kept looking for Bunny?"

The room swooped hard to the right, nearly dumping Shepard on her ass even with Garrus gripping her arms. When it settled to rocking back and forth, she looked up, focusing on his eyes and the joy she saw there. "You found her?" she whispered, her voice barely carrying as fear and wonder snatched away her breath. "Is she okay?" The dizziness began to draw back, purpose and excitement bulldozing it aside. "Where is she, Garrus?"

She glanced over at the person who still sat on the couch with their back facing her, but no … that couldn’t be Bunny. Even though clearly female, the curve to the woman’s back and the faint gray streaked through the red hair both said middle age. "Where? We need to go get her. I can be ready to go in an hour."

Her torin chuckled and shook his head, one hand abandoning her shoulder to caress her cheek. "Breathe, Kahri, I'll answer all your questions, but first, let me explain."

Shepard gave him a sheepish grin, but nodded. "Okay, sorry … getting a little carried away." She twisted to set all of her gear on the floor. Taking a long, steadying breath, she turned back. "Right. you've got my complete, absolutely calm attention."

Garrus grinned and captured her hands in his. "A couple weeks back, Martin and I headed to the Citadel to meet an art appraiser who represented someone interested in acquiring some of the pieces from Donovan Hock's estate."

Shepard felt the blood rush from her face, the skin around her nose and mouth suddenly cold and numb. "Art appraiser?" No no no. It couldn’t be … after all that time. Mama? No, Mama died on Mandoir. Pulling her hands free of Garrus's grip, Shepard reeled back a couple of steps. She'd always known that Mama died. Stepping around him, Shepard stared at the woman on the couch. Mama died, just like Daddy.

She clenched her fists, the dull ache of her nails digging into her palms a single anchor as guilt roared, washing over the last fifteen years. After escaping Mandoir, Shepard remained so sure of her mother’s death that she’d never even looked. Sucking in a shaking breath, she took a single step forward.

Oh god, I never even looked for her.

The woman stood and turned to face Shepard. She smiled, and for a moment, Shepard felt sure that she faced a slightly warped mirror; the face so very like her own, but off. "Mama. Oh, gentle, sweet baby Jesus." Her stare flitted from feature to feature, the evidence of each new sin visited upon Lucille Shepard striking deeper and deeper.

And then a gentle smile transformed the downward cast of the mouth that lived in Shepard's memory as owning a perpetual scowl of disapproval, and the woman shook her head. "Taking the Lord's name in vain; that has to be my Janey."

Shepard felt rather than heard the bastard chuckle-gasp that tumbled from her mouth, and then the tile floor leapt up to smack her in the knees. Garrus crouched just behind her, cradling her between his legs. One arm wrapped around her shoulders while his other hand caressed her neck and around her ear. He didn't speak, his touch saying everything.
Leaning back into him, she settled onto her heels, heart racing once more, a leaf trembling in the embrace of a desert zephyr. Stare glued to her mother's face, Shepard waited for the mirage to vanish and leave her hands scrabbling at the sand. Instead, Lucy strode over to stand before her daughter. Reaching down, she grasped Shepard's hands in a tight, dry grip.

"Some things never change," Lucy said, her smile deepening as she drew Shepard back up onto her feet. She let go of one hand, hers lifting to press against Shepard's cheek. "Still so strong and beautiful."

Shepard leaned into her mother's touch, her pulse slowing as reality settled over her. "Mama? But … how?" Burning eyes drank in the face and gaze so changed, yet so very, achingly familiar. "How didn't I know you were alive?" Throwing her arms around the taller woman, Shepard buried her face in her mother's shoulder and took a deep breath. Subtle changes marked the passing of more than a decade, and yet the similarities—the earthy, floral scent that she recalled—turned those years to dust.

"Oh my god," she whispered, then chuckled as a gentle hand clipped her in the back of the head. "Sorry, Mama."

Strong, loving arms wrapped around her, arms so tight and so familiar that they set loose all the tears that shock had held captive. She'd been so wrapped up in her own drama since coming back that she hadn't given much thought to whether Garrus had kept his promise let alone fulfilled it.

Pulling back a little, she turned to her love. After swiping at the joy raining down her face, she held out her arm, inviting Garrus in. When he stepped up, pressing into her side, Shepard lifted a hand, stroking it along the smooth sweep of his undamaged mandible. Slipping the hand around his neck, she pulled him down until their brows touched. Gratitude and love flooded through her, quenching the pain in her body and heart more thoroughly than any painkiller. Damn, wasn't she in love with the most remarkable being in the entire galaxy?

"Thank you," she said, locking away the rest of what she needed to say: treasures waiting for privacy and time.

He simply nodded and relaxed against her, mandibles fluttering in a bashful smile when Lucy touched his wounded cheek.

The gesture started Shepard's tears anew, her mother's acceptance of Garrus just one more blessing. She allowed herself three, blissful moments of standing within their embrace before she pulled back, looking up into Garrus's eyes.

"Bunny?" The name tiptoed from her lips, a singular, fragile hope held in trembling hands.

Garrus nodded. "She's up in the hospital." His hand jumped up to thaw the terror that flash-froze her blood. "She's fine, Shepard. Well, as fine as can be expected." He nodded toward the couches. "Come and sit down. We'll explain everything."

Lucy pulled Shepard close again when Garrus stepped back, her hands cupping her daughter's cheeks. "I never dreamed that I'd get the chance to do this." She smiled, and then soft, maternal kisses pressed against Shepard's brow, nose and cheeks. Loving arms gathered her into a breath-stealing embrace.

Shepard wrapped her arms around her mother, her embrace gentle as she felt the bandages beneath Lucy's clothes. A numb, chilled sadness set in. What must her mother and sister have endured over the years? All those years that she wasted her life and then tore into it like a dog biting out of fear, her family had truly been living in hell. She turned her face into her mother's neck, shame scalding her neck and cheeks.

"I'm so sorry, Mama. So sorry," she whispered, the apology scraping the depths of her bottomless well of self-pity.

Lucy stepped back, a strong grip taking Shepard by the shoulders, that oh, so familiar scowl lining her mother's brow. "For what, Janey?"

Shepard shrugged. How did someone apologize for fifteen years of freedom and life wasted, for not searching harder, for not being more dogged, more determined? "For not protecting Bunny. For Daddy. For not finding you so much sooner." Another shrug sloughed from her shoulders. "I'm just sorry."

The grip on her shoulders tightened, her mother's fingers digging into the crevasses in her flesh. "No!" The barked refusal startled Shepard from her guilt. "Don't you dare take all of that bastard's sins on yourself, Jane Gwendolyn Shepard." Lucy shook Shepard hard enough that her teeth clacked together. "He's standing before his maker, and his measure is being taken. He'll pay for what he's done."

Shepard barely recovered from her throttling before Lucy yanked her into another, almost ferocious hug. Her mother pressed her mouth next to Shepard's ear, her breath as heated as her words were passionate. "Stop paying for his crimes, Janey. It's a debt you don't owe." Lucy's kiss was rough, but loving. "You have done us all so very proud."

Throat too tight to speak, Shepard just nodded, giving her mother a tight-lipped smile when she pulled away. Letting Lucy take her by the hand, Shepard followed her mother to the couch and sat to listen to the story of how Garrus had found and rescued her family. As they told her of their chance meeting, which turned out to not be chance at all, and the huge operation that Garrus mounted to free them and the other slaves, Shepard watched her torin, in awe of what he'd accomplished.

An hour later, it was taking all of Shepard's self-control to keep from twitching, every cell in her body trying to levitate up through the floors to the hospital. After so many prayers and dreams about finding her baby sister, Bunny was in the same building. All she wanted to do was run to the elevator, and go see the woman her annoying little doll rescuer had become.

Lucy gave Shepard's hand a squeeze, smiling when the captain turned to look into her eyes. "I think we've tortured you long enough," her mother said and chucklecld. "But, Janey, you have to know just how angry Bunny is. She was raised to believe lies, tortured and trained to focus all her hatred on you." Shaking her head, Lucy shifted, the leather creaking as she turned to face Shepard. "I don't know why he did it, but she's a danger to you as long as she's like this."

Shepard heart sank a little as she glanced over at Garrus, the depth of the worry in his eyes far more eloquent than any words. She nodded, more to assuage her mother's worry than out of any commitment to be careful around her sister. If that bastard had tortured Bunny and made her into a weapon, Shepard would damned well heal her and bring her back. If that took a little risk, then it did.

"Well, I'll head up and see how she's doing," Lucy said, breaking through Shepard's thoughts. She released Shepard's hand and stood. "I'll give you two a chance to catch your breath, and see you up there." Her finger brushed her daughter's cheek before she shuffled between the table and couch.

"Mama?" Shepard jumped up, two jogging steps catching her mother. When Lucy turned, the captain wrapped her in a careful hug. "I love you."

"And I love you, my impossible girl." Lucy squeezed her tight, then kissed her brow. "See you in a few minutes."

Shepard watched her mother until the door closed behind her, then turned to face Garrus. The general stood between the couch and coffee table. She shook her head when he started to walk over to her. "Sit down, General."

His mandibles flicked. "Is that an order, Captain?" he asked, emphasizing her rank.

"Damned straight it is." She closed a couple of steps toward him. "Now, sit your asslessness down."

When he did as he was told, she walked over, kneeling on the couch beside him for a moment before swinging one leg over his to straddle his lap. She settled in, pressed as tightly against him as she could manage then draped her arms around his neck, hands clasped loosely behind him.

"Whatever am I going to do with you?" she asked, leaning in to brush his mouth with hers as she spoke.

A mandible brushed her face as he grinned. "I have several ideas about what you can do with me. None of them can be accomplished in the few minutes before we need to be upstairs, however."

She kissed him, all of her joy and love pouring out through the moist caresses of her lips and tongue. A deep, throaty chortle answered her fervour, and then his arms pulled her in hard against his left side, nipping lightly with his mouth plates, his tongue teasing hers. Passionate and eager, all of the old hesitancy gone, Shepard deepened the kiss, lips moving over his with a real and urgent hunger.

When they broke apart, breathless, Garrus leaned down to press his brow to hers. "On a scale of one to ten, that thank you just rocketed straight past a hundred." A sigh whispered between them, feather soft.

She tilted her head to kiss him, just a chaste brush of lips against his rough hide. "Oh, General, it's nothing compared to the thank you that you're going to get a little later." She kissed him again, then swung off his lap and held out her hand. "Come on, let's go up and see just how much my baby sister hates me."

Garrus tugged on her hand, stopping her. "Kahri, wait." He pulled her close enough to take both of her hands in his. "She is a threat. Please, don't underestimate that."

Shepard backed toward the door, pulling him along with her. "She's my sister, Garrus. It's my job to love and protect her however I can, no matter what." She smiled, a soft, loving smile as that truth rang through every cell. "And you knew that would be my answer, because if there's something you understand, it's the need to protect."
His brow plates canted as his mandibles dropped and spread. "So you'll understand if I need to protect you from her?"

Nodding, she released one of his hands and reached up to press her palm against his keel. "As long as you obey one very important rule … and you know it's important because it's from Wonder Woman." She pressed her lips tight, her mouth tugging to one side at his bemused expression. "Wonder Woman?"

"Yep, and here it is: Don't kill if you can wound, don't wound if you can subdue, don't subdue if you can pacify, and don't raise your hand at all until you've extended it." She raised her eyebrows. "Can you live with that?"

The general chuffed and struck out for the door. "That's remarkably wise coming from someone called Wonder Woman." He palmed the control and led her out, heading for the elevator.

Shepard shrugged and wrapped her arm around him. "What can I say, she was my hero when I was a kid."

The ride up to the twenty-fourth floor passed in silence, Shepard glad to be able to melt into Garrus's strength and relax. It felt as though it had been a hundred years since she just breathed and let all her muscles go slack. Something so simple shouldn't be so impossible to achieve. Maybe she'd ask Thane about teaching her to meditate. He certainly seemed to have the whole relaxation and peaceful heart thing figured out.

As the elevator door opened, her heart began to thump hard and quick, banging against her ribs harder with every step until it threatened to shatter ribs under its onslaught. Pressing her eyes closed, Shepard trusted Garrus to guide her while she wrangled her stampeding emotions back into line. "Here." Garrus stopped and when she looked up, he nodded toward the door directly across from the nurse's station.

Shepard stepped up to the door, her heart flipping into reverse and flopping into her belly as she watched the young woman within pace between the two beds. Sweet baby Jesus, could that lovely, fierce amazon actually be her Bunny? "Look at her." Awe and love—worn but still aureate—tinted her whisper as she leaned into Garrus, borrowing his strength. "She's beautiful."

All the missing years wrapped around Shepard's chest, constricting until her pulse and breath tangled up with unshed tears to form a massive, choking ball in her throat. Her fingers dug at her neck, fighting to either claw it out or swallow it all down. "My little Bunny."

"And deadly," Bunny said without looking their way. "Don't forget that part." She stopped midway through her pacing cycle, her glare sharp-edged and scalding. "And I'm not your little anything." Shepard staggered a little, the words leaving welts as they slashed past. Damn, Garrus hadn't been wrong about the vehemence of the girl's hatred.

"I know who you are, oh late, great Captain Shepard." A sneer marred the beautiful face as Bunny laughed, a missile of frozen acid. "The universe fucking hates me. That's the only explanation for your big, hunky boyfriend screwing up my escape and dragging me back here to the Holy Cult of Jane fucking Shepard." A vicious shrug sliced across her shoulders. "So, what's it to be, big sister?" Bunny stalked two steps closer to the door. "Only warning: if you want to live, best put a slug right between my eyes."
Burying that idea under two metres of hell no, Shepard pulled her sidearm from her hip and held it out to Garrus.

"I'm right here," the general said as he took the gun from Shepard's fingers.

She nodded, his presence helping her wall up all the weak, terrified, wailing guilt, sealing it away where Bunny couldn't use it as a weapon. She could face anything with him at her side.

Opening the door a crack, Shepard squeezed through, unsure if Bunny would make a break for it given a big enough opening. Despite her resolve to avoid showing any emotion, a smile crept across her face when she looked over at her mother. "Mama, it's probably best if you wait outside."

For a moment, Shepard thought her mother intended to argue, but then Lucy nodded and stood. "Behave yourselves," she said, her hand warm and comforting as she gripped Shepard's shoulder on the way past. Shepard waited until Garrus stepped forward to close the door before she moved toward her sister. The laser drill of pure rage and hatred ramped up with every step that narrowed the distance between them. Shepard didn't blame her baby sister: four was too young to understand anything that had happened to them. Still, despite the gelid guilt worming its way through her guts, she slapped the guilt out of her body language before it exacerbated the issue.

"Have you had a good life?" Bunny asked, stalking to the far corner of the room. She spun once she got there. "Has your freedom been worth giving me to the slavers? Worth getting Daddy killed?"

Each word slammed an iron fist straight into Shepard's guts, but she clenched her jaw and breathed through it, doing her best to avoid reacting. She just closed in on Bunny, staying loose and ready, letting the love she'd felt for that little bundle of annoying cheeriness bleed through. Damn, but hadn't she adored the broken-doll-adopting, read-me-another-story-begging, big-sister's-stuff-breaking little pain in the ass?

More than anything. So much that you let those bastards … .

Stomping on the scalding tears before they appeared, Shepard cleared her throat. Emotion would only register as manipulation and shove her sister further away.

"Don't." Bunny backed up a little more, then tried to squeeze past, escaping into the front of the room. When Shepard blocked her, she backed up. "Say something, damn it. You're creeping me out." Charging, she bulldozed past, hitting Shepard hard enough to spin her around. "If you're going to kill me, then do it. I don't want your love, your excuses, or your bullshit apologies."

Shepard closed, approaching her sister like a grappling opponent. She both knew and regretted that their reunion would turn into a wrestling match before it became anything more productive. Bunny always had matched her sister blow for blow in the stubbornness department. A slight smile tugged at Shepard's lips as she let that fact seep through her, reinforcing her resolve. They were sisters, joined in a way that could never truly be broken. She'd find a way to get her hug monster back.

"Seriously," Bunny said, the word a sharp bark, "back off before I start swinging." Tensed to spring, the teen circled, an ambush predator forced into a direct attack against prey it knew would fight back.

Shepard spread her arms, inviting the attack. It might just save a lot of time. "Then start swinging, because I'm not going anywhere." She took another step and another, upping the pressure until she could see Bunny shaking, the fury blazing fierce and hot across the teenager's face a new sort of hell.
Damn, and I thought I'd visited them all.

She threw that pain behind the wall with the rest and beckoned to Bunny. "Come on, sweetheart, show me how much you hate me. Turn it all loose."

Something flashed across the younger Shepard's face, something surprised and vulnerable and so very, very young that it set off a grenade in Shepard's chest, nearly taking out the wall. Bunny's body might be nineteen years old, but a huge part of her remained four and trapped in a nightmare she couldn't wake up from. Shepard knew that nightmare; after fifteen years, they remained old, hostile companions.

Screaming all bloody fury, Bunny launched herself at Shepard, fists aimed for the captain's solar plexus and throat. Shepard swept Bunny's lower hand aside, a feint to distract her sister from the hand that swung out and around to grip Bunny's wrist. Spinning the girl around, Shepard held her from behind.

Curses that should have melted their pious mother's ears ripped from Bunny's mouth at the gentle strength of Shepard's grip. Stabbing back with an elbow, Bunny twisted, wrenching herself free. As soon as she broke the hold, the teenager ducked her shoulder and drove it into Shepard's gut, ramming the captain into the bed. Grinning fierce and cold, she sneered at Shepard's gasp of pain. Despite the bed frame tearing into the backs of her thighs, ripping open her wounds, Shepard merely spun away when Bunny backed up a step. Taking advantage of Bunny's thrown balance, Shepard gave herself room to react. Actually getting hurt didn't factor into her plans.

"Nice job. That is blood running down your legs."

"Fight back," Bunny said, her voice a vicious growl. "Are you some sort of pacifist bitch?"

Shepard choked back a heavy wave of sympathy and love, opening her arms again, that time holding her hand out to her baby sister.

"Come on, baby, reach out. Just a little."

"You're fucking amazing." Bunny backed up a step, then circled. "You think I'm going to take that hand after what you did?" She stopped suddenly and looked down at her arm. After a second, she flexed her fingers, a thoughtful scowl swapping places with the rage. "You broke my arm." As she looked up, the rage returned. "You broke my fucking arm."

Shepard nodded, owning it. "We were running, trying to get to the rock across the creek." She withdrew her hand, but kept her arms open, welcoming the next attack. Some abscesses needed to be lanced with a scalpel. "The batarian, Remit, jumped out of the trees ahead of us. I slipped and we fell in a pile. I heard a snap." A thin smile cracked through her porcelain control to betray the love roaring through her veins. "You barely made a squawk. So brave."

"Fuck off. Seriously?" Bunny rushed her, barrelling into Shepard's embrace and slamming her back against the door. Her fist crashed into Shepard's belly, a small wrecking ball driving the wind out of her in a pained gasp. "This isn't some Sunday drive down memory lane." She threw another punch, but that one Shepard blocked, throwing it wide.

Spinning away, Shepard retreated to the back of the room and held her arms wide again. "It'll never be that, Bunny. Never that." That time, she braced subtly. Injury and pain nibbled away at her calm. Time to move in for the kill.

When Bunny came at her again, Shepard grabbed hold of her sister's arm and spun her, pulling the arm across Bunny's stomach. Catching the other arm as it flailed, Shepard dragged the young woman down into the corner. Crouched, legs spread wide to stabilize her, Shepard held Bunny in kind, but implacably strong arms.

"Fuck off, Captain Shepard," Bunny spat, bitter emphasis drawing out Shepard's rank. She flailed, trying to get out of the hold. "I don't want your pity. You can shove your memories and love up your ass, bitch."

Shepard just hugged her, carefully keeping her face out of headbutt range. "Come on, Bunny," she whispered. "Jump. I'll catch you." She paused as her sister stopped fighting, freezing rigid in her arms. Good, maybe enough of the true memory remained to break through the batarian bastard's programming. Keeping a solid hold on the teenager, Shepard continued, "Good girl. You're only a few centimetres away from my hands. Let go. Come on, baby, you know I won't let you fall."

"Stop it," Bunny said, but it came out more like a mewl of pain than anger. She wriggled a little, trying to break free, but without her earlier force. "Just shut your face. You left me to that bastard."

"You fell in the mud and cut your palm," Shepard continued, determined to bull through even as her body trembled and her heart keened from the strain. "You threw a tantrum, beating up the mud and screaming for Mama and Daddy." She blew a short, sharp sigh out her nose and shifted a little, settling her back against the wall. "I lifted you out of the muck and kissed the cut on your hand, then told you that they'd meet us at the big rock."

When Bunny didn't take advantage of the change in position, Shepard lowered them both all the way to the floor so that her sister sat sideways, still restrained but cradled in her arms. "You were tired, but doing your best when Remit stepped out onto the path. I tried to stop, but slipped." Shepard scowled as the memories played out behind her eyes. Unlike the other times she'd set them loose, the memories didn't attack with meathooks and carving knives. Instead, Nihlus tangled through every one of them, his presence and comfort buffering the pain. A soft, relieved sigh drifted out as her muscles relaxed, still holding her sister, but loosely. "Remit picked you up by the collar of your pj's and said he was going to keep you for himself."

Bunny pulled away a little, twisting to look Shepard in the eye. The fire remained, but something lie beneath it, a slight crack that sent a flood of warmth pouring through to bulwark Shepard's weariness. Scowling and thoughtful, Bunny said, "He threw me at Kiral."

"Yeah, and then he grabbed me by the hair and pulled me up. He said he was going to take his time with me … that I was a tasty looking piece of meat." Shepard's shoulders popped a little, surprised that she could dismiss the horror. But, the protection of her guardian angel remained between her and the terror and revulsion, stalwart and comforting. "He shoved his fingers down my throat, so I did the only thing open to me."

"You bit him." Bunny withdrew a little further, her gaze dropping to the floor. "Just about bit right through his fingers … the farm's doctor had to do more than one surgery. The scars never faded."

"Good, I wish they'd rotted off, gone septic." A sharp, ferocious grimace slashed across Shepard's face. "I broke free and charged the one holding you, but Remit grabbed me again before I could wrestle you loose." Deciding the time had come for a show of trust, Shepard released her hold on her sister. When Bunny scrambled away to crouch just out of arm's reach, Shepard just adjusted her position, easing the pain gnawing at the backs of her thighs.

"You bit Kiral, too." The words came out with the same edge, but a thoughtfulness hid behind them.
Shepard let out a long breath, but kept her smile in check. Glory hallelujah. "Yeah, I attacked him on the roof after Daddy helped us get out my window. The batarian grabbed my shoulder, so I tried to take his thumb off."

Bunny stood and paced to the door, staring out at their audience for a moment before she turned. "Why would Remit try to turn me against you? If you were trying to protect me … if you didn't sell us out, why?" Bunny braced, so defensive and sharp that Shepard knew the teen would rebuff whatever she said. Still, as her father had always said, 'nothing ventured, nothing gained'.

"How better to make you a loyal slave?" Shepard pushed up onto her feet, wincing a little as the damage Bunny had inflicted began to howl. "Make him less the villain, turn you against anyone you might cling to emotionally." She shrugged and held out her hand. "But all I can do is guess. I can never know what he was thinking."

Rejecting Shepard's hand, Bunny jerked her head toward the door. "Get out."

"Okay." Unsurprised, but pleased with the progress she'd made, Shepard let her hand fall to her side. "But I'll be back in the morning. You aren't the only one who inherited Mama's stubbornness, so prepare yourself for that." When her sister didn't reply, the captain moved to the door. Looking back, she finally let the wall crumble, a gentle smile and slow tears meeting Bunny's spikes and claw traps. "I love you, kid. I never stopped looking for you."

"Yeah, bloody lot of good that did me." The teenager crossed her arms, the gate dropping, locking Shepard out.

Even though a deep, frantic ache insisted that Shepard push until she brought her baby sister all the way back from her personal hell, Shepard pressed the door control. Bunny had taken enough.

Garrus stepped up the second Shepard passed through the door, earning a slightly crooked smile. Ever the protector.

"I'm fine," she said, holding back the rest until she closed the door. Looking to her mother, Shepard said simply, "She'll need you."

Lucy nodded, drawing Shepard into a hug. "Thank you for being so kind with her. I'll see you in the morning." She pulled back, still gripping her daughter's shoulders. "You look worn out. Go get some sleep."

Shepard hugged her mother tight again, unable to put voice to the storm of gratitude and love and relief and joy that roared inside her. After a few moments, she managed to wrestle the lump in her throat down far enough to say, "Goodnight, Mama. I love you."

"And I love you. Goodnight." Lucy turned and entered Bunny's room, moving to sit on one of the beds. Instead of talking, she turned on the vid screen.

"You should go get checked over," Garrus said, his voice too soft to be heard through the door. "You're bleeding." He stepped into her, one hand pressed between her shoulder blades.

Turning to face him, Shepard nodded and looked up into his eyes. "Yeah, I'll take care of that now. Go ahead down. I won't be very long." Her stomach let out a ferocious growl. Laughing, she pressed a hand against it. "I think it can smell your brain again."

"I'll find it something better." He leaned down to nuzzle her lips, his subvocals rumbling when she returned the kiss, her tongue teasing his. "Don't be long."
"I won't." She kissed him again, then gave him a gentle push. "Go on, we're making out in front of my mother." Laughing at the bashful flick of his mandibles, she winked, then turned to look for Dr. Chakwas.

Chapter End Notes

(A-N: Yes, I am still sick. So sorry for it taking so long. Combining sick Kim with the chapter that grew to 12K words, well … here we are. The second half will post tomorrow unless my trip to the ER for antibiotics goes horribly wrong and they take me captive. If so … send rescue. So, without further ado, the first part of the second anniversary duo of chapters … Reunions.

Oh, and PS: I love you. Especially you hardy souls who have been reading for all two years. And the rest of you too. You all rock.)

Chapters 123 and 124 were written to:

Contact Redux (feat Meredith Hagan). It just suits the people and situations so very, very well.

Love Me Like You Do performed by Grace Kelly. Just a fantastic version.

The Doomsday Theme from Doctor Who. Cried so hard during the goodbye to Rose. sob

A Thousand Years by Christina Perri … because it is Garrus and Sassy's theme.

And Baba Yetu by Christopher Tin, just because it's freakin brilliant.
Chapter Summary

(Warning: NSFW. Consensual, committed couple enjoying one another. That's right, sex ... finally.)

He chuckled as he nuzzled his way under the sweep of her ribcage, lingering in all the places that drew whimpered curses and loving whispers in equal number. "This was always the time you'd ask for a story," he whispered, then froze and looked up, his expression a strange combination of fear and guilt.

Shepard smiled and ran a loving hand over his fringe. "In your dreams of sunlight and soft grass?" When he nodded, she leaned in to kiss him. "All sweet breezes and lying safe in your arms." She gently raked the underside of his fringe with her fingernails. "Beautiful dreams."

40 Days ASR

Despite Shepard's promise not to take long, by the time Dr. Chakwas treated and sealed her wounds and they made plans to get the brain trust together the next day to discuss the possibility of two indoctrination signals, a half hour had rolled by.

She palmed the control to Garrus's door, stepping through into the dimly lit space when it opened. He was standing behind the far couch, but turned, a wide grin greeting her as she entered. Gripped by a fierce joy, Shepard let the flood surge over the levees. Three running steps carried her across the floor, then two leaps cleared the couch, launching herself at him. He staggered back a step, grabbing her out of reflex as she latched her arms around his neck, her legs curling around his waist.

She kissed him, lips fervent and hungry against his mouth, tongue teasing, trying to coax him out from behind his teeth. Instead, he pulled away, a low rumble resonating in his throat. "What?" she asked, before kissing her way up his mandible to nibble at its wing.

He cleared his throat. "Kahri, my pari is here."

A low susurrus of amusement rumbled from the direction of the other couch.

"Hello, sir," she said, pausing just as she began kissing her way down the groove of Garrus's throat. Instead, she met her boyfriend's eyes, her gaze crackling with gentle teasing. "Sorry, I was too eager to leap on your pahir to see you when I came in."

Herros chuckled, and she heard the leather groan as he stood. "That's quite all right. I'll leave you to your reunion and see you both in the morning."

Garrus let out an embarrassed mutter when the door closed behind his father. "That's two parents we've made out in front of today. Would you like to fly to Palaven so my mari can catch the show?"
She grinned and leaned back, one hand gripping the back of his neck, the other stroking the underside of his fringe. "Sure, we wouldn't want her to miss out." Chuckling, she hugged him tight. "All right, I promise to check that no parents are in attendance before I fling myself on you. Fair enough?" She pressed her lips against his mouth and whispered, "Will you kiss me back now?"

Strong arms pulled her in so tight that her body let out a few muted yelps as his mouth opened to claim hers. Despite the pain, she lifted into him, desperate to get closer. Damn, hadn't he been so very right? As soon as her heart made the leap, her body couldn't help but follow.

She leaned back a little to get at the fasteners down the front of Garrus's tunic, the action throwing off his balance enough that he stumbled.

Chuckling, he said, "Okay, this needs to continue somewhere a lot more stable." He skirted the couch and collapsed into the soft cushions, settling her on his lap. His stare warmed her face as she finished with his tunic, her hands laying it wide to search along the damaged plates.

"Oh, damn … Garrus, I forgot about … ." Worried hands flitted over his keel, checking all the little metal bars for blood or plate damage. "Did I hurt you?"

"I'm fine. Stop worrying." He stilled her fussing with a kiss. "No damage."

"Mmm," she murmured, kissing him back. Soft and slow, her lips moved over his mouth with no less passion but with growing patience. All her frantic eagerness from the moment before quieted and softened. There really was no need to hurry; bright, sunlit warm replaced the racing wind as her heartbeat calmed a little. Time to stop and cherish the gift she'd been given.

"You're so warm. I think I'm just going to move in right here." She let out a long, contented moan and slipped inside the flaps of his tunic to wrap her arms around him. "I missed you this week. Can we avoid doing anything crazy for the next few days and just spend some time together?"

Garrus nodded and nuzzled the top of her head. "We can." He let out a half breath, half sigh. "I missed you, too. The bed is far too empty and the days far too long when you're not with me."

Smiling, sentimental tears burning along her lashes, she looked up into his eyes. "I love you. Remind me to keep telling you that."

They kissed, long and slow and sweet, soft lips and rigid mouth plates moving against one another with ardor, tongues making silent promises of hours, days, and years to come.

"You should eat something." Garrus chuckled when her stomach let out a hearty bellow. "We're not in any hurry, and it'll destroy the mood if you pass out from hunger partway through." Shuddering, heavy and exaggerated, he pushed her away. "Or you try to eat my brain."

"Hey, I'm not a completely barbaric zombie," Shepard protested, crossing her arms and turning away, nose in the air. "There is a time and place for brain eating." The wolf pack in her belly howled again. "Buuuuut, then again, maybe we shouldn't push our luck."

Garrus's grin faded as he reached up to cradle her face between his hands. His thumb talons traced her cheekbones then brushed the permanent frown lines from her brow. "I don't know what I did to deserve this," he said, his voice tight with all the emotion that sang through his subvocals.

She didn't understand them the way another turian would, but she felt the intention behind them deep in her gut. "Most people would say that it must have been pretty terrible. I'm not much of a prize." Her eyes locked onto his. "You, on the other hand, you have been the solid, amazing, brilliant—"
"Sexy? Stunningly virile? Rakishly good-looking?" he asked, mandibles fluttering as his eyes sparkled, teasing.

Shepard sighed, but then gave a resigned shrug and nodded. "Sure, why not? I can be charitable."

Laughter bubbled up then erupted, bright and effervescent as he pulled her in and nipped her neck. "Okay, okay! You're one incredibly sexy, virile, rakishly good-looking cookie."

"I'd be insulted if I didn't know how much you love cookies." He nipped her again, then loosened his grip. "Come on, eat something, and then we can climb into bed." He lifted Shepard with all the usual, careless ease, and turned her so she was sitting across his thighs, cradled between his arm and side.

Wriggling forward until she could reach the plate, Shepard grabbed it off the table and removed the lid. "Ooo, meatloaf. Nice."

Shepard relaxed back in Garrus's arms, his body deliciously warm against hers, and let out a long sigh. She picked at her food, her mind rolling back through everything Garrus and her mother had told her. From the sound of it, Archangel had received a generous influx of funds thanks to Remit, the slaving bastard.

She glanced up between mouthfuls. "So, Remit had billions invested in art and books like Hock? Billions that you just looted like a big ol' turian pirate." A crooked grin tugged at her lips as she raised her brows, looking at him from the corner of her eye. "Remember that first day in Fist's office? You were so scandalized by my suggesting that we strip his office for saleable goods."

He nuzzled the top of her head. "Yes, well, you were right. We're on the run and we need every credit we can get our hands on." Chuckling, he shrugged. "I think your mother was scandalized by my mercenary agenda for her collection."

Shepard turned back to her dinner, eating a couple of mouthfuls that might as well have been paste for all she tasted them, her mind racing along ten different paths before latching onto what he'd said. "I think that collection kept her sane," she said. "As much as she loved our family and life on Mindoir, her whole life up until she met my father had been training to curate for a museum or gallery."

He sighed, the sound laden with disgusted, furious tremors. "So, having that little piece of what she had always wanted helped keep her sane?" A slight nod answered that. "Yeah, I can see that. Any rope to cling to, right?"

The room hung dark and silent around the two torins. "How do you do it, Vakarian?" Nihlus asked, his voice a slurred whisper from the couch.

*She crept closer as Garrus sat on the edge of the coffee table. "How do I do what, Nihlus?"

"Keep breathing."

Garrus let out a huff of breath, deflating a little. "I do what she wanted me to do, Nihlus." He shook his head and shrugged a little. "Sometimes when I'm planning or working, I'll swear that she's right beside me, pointing something out that I've missed or whispering suggestions to me. And when that happens, I feel peace. It's not much, but it's better than nothing."

Shepard shook her head. Too little sleep and too many of Nihlus's memories crammed into her head. Yeah. She shook off the breathless melancholy of the dark room and glanced up at Garrus. "Yeah, any rope to cling to." She shovelled in another mouthful, but then set the plate aside, suddenly not the slightest bit hungry. Leaning up further, she kissed him. "Come on, let's get into bed, General Boyfriend." She clambered up off the couch and held out a hand.

"Your supper?" he asked, resisting. "You hardly ate anything."

A loving touch whispered along his mandible as she grasped his hand and pulled him up. "I'm far more hungry for turian boyfriend than meatloaf right now." She tipped her head toward the bed. "Come on."

Garrus trailed after her, far enough back that she had to extend her arm. Giving her room to change her mind, no doubt. But no, that night wasn't about playing it cautious or giving into fear. They'd waited long enough.

When they reached the bed, she kept hold of him with one hand while tugging off her boot with the other, trading hands to get them both. She stepped up onto the mattress, grinning when she actually came out a little taller than him. Beckoning to him with a slight pressure on his hand and a teasing nod, she drew him into her arms, wrapping them around his neck.

"I am the single, luckiest woman breathing," she said, voice low and throaty. Pressing her brow to his, she closed her eyes, inhaling long, deep breaths of him, his earthy myrrh and cloves scent settling something deep inside her. "Promise me something," she said, surprising herself as desire and adoration overwhelmed her usual caution.

"Anything," he said, tilting his chin to nuzzle her lips. His hands untucked her t-shirt and slipped beneath to circle her hips, the touch warm, rough, and perfect.

Feather-soft kisses brushed his mouth and mandibles, punctuating her words as she said, "We got a second chance, Garrus. Out of all the people in this crazy universe who deserve one … who pray for one … the powers that be chose us." She pressed her lips to his mouth, sucking gently as she pulled away. "I don't want to waste a second of it to fear or doubt." Drawing him in a little tighter, she tucked her head under his jaw, loving the way his cowl cradled it. "Let's just decide right here, right now, that no matter what, we don't walk away. We figure it out, fight it out, wrestle if we have to, but we never walk away."

Letting out a low rumble, the love and devotion woven through it so thick and heavy that it raised the hair on the back of her neck, Garrus held her tight, his large hands covering most of her back. Sweet Jesus, but those hands made her feel so safe … so cherished. That she could wrap herself up in that touch, that she make him feel just as safe and loved, that was all that mattered. Everything else would either sort itself out or fall away.

"All right," he said after a second. "No matter what. We never walk away." His mandible fluttered against her hair as he smiled, his grip pressing her against him. "You know what this means, don't you?"

Shepard pulled away to meet his gaze, but then shook her head. "Not now," she said, the words carrying no sting, just the desire for the moment to come in its proper time.

"Yeah." He nuzzled her brow, those beautiful eyes closing as the rumble from his second larynx gained strength. "But so you know it's coming, Kahri."

"It had better." Shepard slipped her hands inside the panels of his tunic, helping him ease his arms free of the heavy material, then carefully guided it over his head, giving his mandibles and damaged face plenty of clearance. She threw it over the back of the couch, then sat, deft, nimble fingers making short work of the many fasteners down his leggings. Finally freeing his spur, she guided the waist over the sharp points of his hips and slid them down. Grinning as he steadied himself with a hand on her shoulder, she helped him step out of them then tossed them after his tunic.

"That's a big improvement." She slid her hands up the tight bands of muscle along the inside of his calves. "So," she said, fingertips brushing along the base of his spur, "I've heard a rumour that your spur is just loaded with nerve endings."

Garrus chuckled, talons playing through her hair. "When we slept together on the Normandy, you sent me into retreat at least once a night when you accidentally brushed it. I didn't think you wanted to get poked awake."

The flush of desire and heat that image sent tearing along her nerves startled her and set the muscles in her groin rolling like waves on a heavy sea. "That would have been a surprise." She skirted the base, teasing just until he started to rumble, then moved on, her palms flat and firm up the backs of his thighs.

"Mmm," she murmured, looking up into his eyes again as she rested her hands on his hips. "You're so beautiful." Leaning in, she pressed her cheek against the soft hide along his stomach. His warmth poured into her, travelling along her nerves to settle low in her belly. It gathered there, a light pulse that tugged at the muscles through her center, adding to the gentle waves of pleasure and need rolling up through her hips and down her thighs.

She kissed his stomach, her eyes closing as she savoured the texture of his hide, the intoxicating scent of him, the way his muscles trembled under her lips. "You know, I've come really close to doing this a few times over the years." More kisses painted a moist trail down the center of his stomach, stopping just above his plates. She brushed her bottom lip along their edge, smiling as they moved. "I didn't care about any of the men; it seemed easier that way. I told myself that I was letting the past cripple me, that I needed to push through it and get it over with."

An angry rumble answered that, and she nodded. The fact that he loved her, that he wanted her and waited so long for her to be ready … damn, but wasn't it the most remarkable thing? Wasn't he? She looked up, the depth of everything she felt burning through her stare; the flush that crept up her chest; her shallow, rapid breaths.

"I never thought I'd be so grateful that I waited." Her palms glided along the sweep of his chest plates to wrap around his waist.

His talons combed through her hair, then cupped her face. The pad of one thumb brushed her lips, his touch almost reverent. "I've never wanted anyone like this, Kahri … never dared to hope that I'd find someone so … that I … ." Stepping back, he slipped his hands over her shoulders and down her arms on the way to taking her hands in his, drawing her up onto her feet. He placed her hands on the rim of his cowl and then lifted her, holding her tight against him. Turning his face into her neck, he nipped the sensitive skin, his tongue hot and teasing along the line of her jaw.

Shepard tilted her head, opening her neck to him while her fingertips wandered along the small plates that dotted his neck. She chuckled at the lusty growl that accompanied her exploration of the border between hide and cowl. "Hmm, I'll have to remember that for later." Leaning back, trusting his arms to hold her, she reached down, grabbed the hem of her t-shirt, and swept it over her head. After tossing it on the pile, she unclasped her bra and shrugged out of it.

Garrus leaned down to draw a long, slow trail along her collarbone with the tip of his tongue, grinning wide as her skin lifted into gooseflesh and a long, sultry moan drifted from her throat.
"Damn ... that tongue." She intercepted his mouth and arched into him, her breasts brushing against his plates as their tongues tangled and teased.

"Dear spirits," he said, breaking the kiss. A heavy moan chased the oath from his mouth, and he stumbled a little as if his legs suddenly wouldn't hold them. Turning, he sank on the side of the bed, his chest heaving.

Shepard jumped up, frantic hands darting to touch him everywhere. He looked as though he'd seen a ghost. "What? Are you okay? Is it—"

Garrus pressed a talon pad to her lips, the gesture quieting her panic as well as her words. "I'm fine, Kahri. It's just … that night before you … after Sovereign, you curled in next to me, and your breast pressed against my chest like that. Every time you moved, it brushed against me, this soft, beautiful embodiment of trust." He pulled her in close, his hands circling her ribs. "After everything we'd been through … . I didn't sleep for hours, content to lie there, holding you, your breath warm on my neck."

He looked down, his thumbs sweeping along the lower swell of both breasts. "Just now … it hit me, I guess."

She stepped between his legs, caressing his mandibles with the backs of her fingers. "What hit you?"

His stare locked onto hers, the old laser-sight intensity comforting. Not everything changed. "That absolutely nothing in the last two years has felt as real as those moments." He leaned in to nuzzle the hollow between her collarbones. "Well, except for my dreams. Maybe that's just crazy."

Shepard backed out from between his thighs, her hands moving to the buckles on her belt. Quickly, but not rushed, she stripped off her trousers and tossed them. "It's not crazy, Garrus."

"Spirits," he said, the word barely more than a sigh. "You're so soft. How can you be so soft and so damned tough at the same time?"

She grinned and stepped in a little closer. "I'm one hundred percent pure magic."

A soft chuckle greeted that. "Yeah, I suppose you are." He tugged her in closer before he let her go, but just long enough to tuck his thumbs in the waist of her panties.

Shepard's elcor gymnastics troupe kicked the wolves out of her belly and began to warm up, but their antics amounted to one hell of a clumsy cheerleading squad, all encouraging Garrus on rather than insisting she back him off. Her hands slipped over his fringe as he leaned in, his thumbs slowly dragging the panties over her skin.

"Oh, dear lord." A soft, musical moan spirited from her lips as the tips of his talons pressed into her flesh, leaving searing hot, blissfully intense trails down the outside of her thighs. Clinging to his cowl with trembling hands, Shepard closed her eyes, every nerve in her body focused on those two luscious points of contact. Then his mouth plates nuzzled into the hollow at the base of her sternum, and her knees nearly gave out, her moan building into a soft ululation of need.

He chuckled as he nuzzled his way under the sweep of her ribcage, lingering in all the places that drew whimpered curses and loving whispers in equal number. "This was always the time you'd ask for a story," he whispered, then froze and looked up, his expression a strange combination of fear and guilt.

Shepard smiled and ran a loving hand over his fringe. "In your dreams of sunlight and soft grass?"
When he nodded, she leaned in to kiss him. "All sweet breezes and lying safe in your arms." She gently raked the underside of his fringe with her fingernails. "Beautiful dreams." His soft purr of agreement sent vibrations tearing through her belly, all of them migrating straight to the fiery need at her center.

_The sun shone down, warm and bright, gleaming off Garrus's bare shoulders, bringing out the steel in his colouring. "Do you trust me, Shepard?" he asked._

_She frowned a little as she looked into his eyes, seeing so much in that gaze. Respect, longing, contentment, and love. A smile blossomed, eclipsing the frown. Of course she trusted him._

"With everything," she whispered.

"Kahri?" Garrus cocked a brow plate. "You okay?"

Opening her eyes, she nodded, reassuring him with a smile. She stepped out of her panties as they hit the floor then kicked them toward the couch. Moving into Garrus's arms, she pressed along his torso. "I'm perfect, and it looks as though we're both completely naked, General." She met his heated gaze with one that smoldered just as hot. "Whatever will we do?"

Garrus stood, sweeping her up in his arms. "I've got a few ideas." His brow plates rose, teasing her.
"And now, we've got all the time in the galaxy."

Garrus knelt on the bed, leaning down to lay Shepard out on the mattress, but then he straightened, one knee still lifted onto the thick memcell. For long moments, he studied her naked form under a gaze as intense and torrid as Trebia's rays, his mandibles sweeping in and out. Something in that stare kept her from turtling up, from trying to hide herself … something that defied her usual need to throw up barriers and defenses. Tears misted along her lashes and pooled in the outer corners of her eyes, answering the beautiful, ferocious ache in her chest.

His stare was all heat and life and devotion … and love. Dear, sweet baby Jesus, a love so deep that she could drown in it. A love that laid him open and vulnerable, as vulnerable as she felt. Her beautiful, strong general. In that stare she saw the reason she'd never bullied herself into sex with anyone else … she'd been waiting for someone to look at her with everything layered in his gaze.

Of course, someone else looked at her in almost the exact same way.

She pushed that aside. It might well be true, and it might well have its time, but that was definitely not it. No, that night belonged to the torin who'd stolen her heart the moment he fastened her seatbelt in the Mako because he'd noticed how badly she'd hurt her hands.

As they gazed into one another, something new appeared in his ice-blue stare: a question. Was she sure? Was she truly ready, because if she turned him away … she saw how deep the blade would strike. By way of answering, she lifted her arms, beckoning for him to join her, but more than that, to join with her, to finally break down that last wall.

He lowered himself onto the mattress, his body all rough angles and sharp edges and perfection against hers. Holding himself up on an elbow, he kissed her, his incredibly talented tongue both stealing the air from her lungs and stopping time so she didn't need to breathe. He lifted into her, the edges of his plates and the blade of his keel dragging across her breast.
She moaned deep in her throat, lust and a little pain, but definitely not enough to want him to stop. Still, Garrus pulled away, concern flashing across his face, cloudy and dark.

Taking his hand in both of hers, Shepard pressed it against her belly, smiling to wipe away his worry. "That was a good sort of moan," she said, one hand lifting to caress his face. "It was an "I want to feel your hands and mouth all over me' moan."

Leaning down, he claimed her mouth again, his hand sliding up over her ribs until the web between his thumb and first talon cradled her breast. "I think I can help you with that," he said against her lips, subvocals almost drowning out his words. The power of the hunger behind that resonance arced along her skin, an electric sting so strong that she expected to see the fern-like fractals of a lightning strike painted between her wounds.

"Damn, I love that your voice can turn me into a twitching ball of raw, hungry nerve endings." The lusty rasp of her own voice surprised her. It lifted into another soft moan when his thumb dragged across her breast, the talon teasing the taut center.

His mouth abandoned hers, prompting a disappointed groan, but then he ran his teeth along her collarbone. She melted into him, her entire body weak and trembling, as she let the fire burning in her belly flare, roaring through her. If she wasn't careful, that fire would consume her.

She grinned. "Then let it consume me." Tears burned in her eyes, misting over her vision. It … no, he … was almost enough to give a girl back her faith.

Making love to him with her fingertips, Shepard's touch glided over his neck, caressing the sensitive border between scale and hide, trickling around the little patches of scale. Each touch a tiny, reverent prayer of devotion and passion, she tried to tell him everything her voice would probably never find the words to say.

Responding to his subtle encouragements, her fingers teased, kneaded, and stroked their way up to his crest. She dragged her knuckles along the underside of his fringe, pausing to roll them in slow circles or rake her nails over the skin when his breathing hitched or the underlying growl-purr coming from his subvocals changed in pitch.

He nuzzled her breasts, teasing them with tooth and tongue until she clung to him, dizzy and gasping, her body surrendering to his touch with an urgency both startled and reassured her. Gentle talons raked her skin, pressing just hard enough to furrow without scratching, his path careful to avoid the rents and fissures in her flesh. She gasped, her whole body undulating as the keen-edged sensation reminded her of the deadly potential behind those loving talons.

"Dear lord, ease up a bit," she said between breaths, her hands clinging to the rim of his cowl. "I'm going to have a heart attack."

"Not sure I can." He chuckled and lifted his head to capture her mouth, kissing her softly. "I don't think I'll ever get enough of touching you."

Eyes closed, Shepard returned his kisses, moving beneath him, savouring the delicious friction of plate and hide against her skin. "You'd better not."

Seemingly determined to prove the ardor of his oath, Garrus's hand pressed against her belly just below her navel, talons sweeping around it. As if testing the waters, his talons circled a couple of times before caressing over it, the pad dipping gently into the divot. Stiffening a little, Garrus pulled back.
Shepard opened her eyes and lifted her head. "Garrus?" A slightly confused smile greeted his searching stare, and the bewildered flutter of his mandibles as he looked down at her belly button.

"That can't be right," he said, letting out a bleak, embarrassed chuckle. "It's umm … ." He pressed the pad of a talon against it. "... far too … " His mandibles twitched, his entire face as awkward and miserable-looking as she'd ever seen. " … umm." Letting out a long, grumbling breath, he let his head drop, hanging from his shoulders.

"What, Garrus?" She pressed her hand against his face, turning him to look into her eyes. "Talk to me. What's wrong?"

"I never thought that I'd have to … ." Another wretched sigh tumbled out as his whole body slumped. "I didn't do any research, Kahri. Didn't think I'd ever need it. I don't know how we'll … " He cleared his throat. "... fit."

Empathy and love begged her to put him out of his misery, the embarrassment in his eyes squeezing her heart in a tight fist. Shepard leaned up to kiss him even as she reached down to lace her fingers with his. "Let me guess. Female turians have their bits right about there?" She smiled against his lips. "Ours are just a touch lower." She slid his hand down her stomach to rest on the inside of her thigh, his knuckles brushing her faint smattering of hair.

Leaning back, she stared into his eyes, her breath coming quick and shallow as she slid her hand up his arm to his face, tracing the lines of his brow, cheekbone, and mandible. She released him and twisted to pile the pillows behind her back, then laid her hand over his again.

Giving in to the gorgeous, heady brew of desire and nerves bubbling in her stomach, Shepard kissed him, drawing his hand close enough to feel her heat, the dampness inside her thigh. "Do you want a guided tour, or would you like to just take your expedition afield and chart the unknown?" A loving smile bloomed in the face of his hesitancy to take her up on either option. "Hey. There be no dragons here." She caressed his cheek with her other hand. "It's okay, I'm nervous, but not afraid. I'm not going through the motions to indulge you, or any of that sort of nonsense. I love you, and I want you all over me in the worst way."

Her smile slanted into something a whole lot amorous as she met his stare, then leaned in to kiss him. "I intend to put in field time worthy of a doctoral thesis to learn every single millimetre of you." When he still hesitated, she cocked her head a little. "What is it, love?"

He leaned in, his breath panting low and quick against her skin. "I don't know … something … familiar, maybe? Here there be dragons … ." Brushing her brow with his, he shook his head. "Nothing to worry about."

"So that means you want the guided tour?" She laughed, feeling the sun pouring through her, it's brilliance saturating her with the most glorious feeling of contentment.

"Spirits," his oath came out breathy, an almost prayer. "I love you." His mouth pressed to hers, urgent, breathless, and hungry.

Increasingly thrilled with her wanton fearlessness, Shepard drew up her far knee, shivers of desire pulsing through her as her leg relaxed, opening her to him. She pressed his hand against her belly just above her pelvis. "Feel that?" she asked as the muscles pulsed hard and insistent.

He nodded, then kissed her. "Yes."

"That's my body basically shouting, get that torin inside me already." She grinned and rubbed the end of her nose against his when his mandibles did the bashful flutter. "But, it's just going to have to wait, we've got some exploring to do." She slid his hand down to brush over her, her hips lifting into his touch when his talons played with the light dusting of hair. "You turians and your fixation with hair. I swear it's jealousy." Her chuckle transformed into a delighted squeal when he tucked his face into her neck, sharp teeth pinching the skin under her ear. "Oh! That's how it's going to be?"

She laughed and gave him her best innocent smile. "Would now be a bad time to ask for a story?"

By way of answer, he nipped his way down her neck and across her shoulder, his teeth pinching with enough force to make her jump each time.

"So," she said, slipping her hand up his, laying her index finger along his first talon, "was that supposed to shut me up, or encourage me?"

He chuckled and nuzzled the center of the fractal wound over her shoulder. "When we get all of these healed up, you'll find out." Pulling back a little he lifted a talon, caressing around her shoulder. "They're looking better."

"According to Dr. Eis, I'm happy, and it's speeding my healing." She massaged his hand, kneading his talons into the dampness of her inner thigh. "So, I guess this is going to be very good for me."
Leaning in close to his aural canal, she grinned and whispered. "So, how about that tour?"

Garrus's chuckle reverberated straight through her. "Leave me your number, and I'll give you a call if I get lost."

"I don't know, I might be busy." And then he touched her, the teasing falling away. Eyes closing and legs drifting further apart, her body softened under his talons, and suddenly she understood. All those years that she'd used her sexuality as a weapon and a tool, she'd been murdering a part of her soul, a twisted sort of self-loathing continuing what the batarian had started. That moment, the torin she loved wrapped around her, that had always been its purpose.

"Never again," she whispered, drawing a sideways look from her general. She shook her head and leaned in to pepper kisses along his mandible, drawing in long breaths of him. The spiced, metallic, and increasingly male scent of him burrowed in deep, playing both her body and her heart like a virtuoso.

Garrus lifted from his explorations and nibbled her lips before sliding down the bed. Mandibles held high and away, his brow plates low, he took over, opening her, touching and stroking. Every time she let out a sigh, a whine, or a moan, he looked up as if cataloguing her reactions, his mandibles twitching with a decidedly delighted expression.

"You're so slippery." Clearing his throat, he moved to do a closer inspection, but then stopped, looking up for her okay.

"Of course, love." She shifted a little so she could caress his face. "And yes, the slippery is a good thing." Chuckling, she brushed her thumb along his mandible. "So that's what sexually aroused fascination looks like on that face."

Leaning over her, Garrus nuzzled the inside of her thigh, circling as if checking the lay of the land before committing to moving deeper into foreign territory. She squashed the image of him wearing a pith helmet and khaki knee shorts before it could turn into laughter.

Then, letting out a sharp yelp of surprise, Shepard lunged right up off the bed as his tongue flicked, just an experimental little flutter that hit right on the bullseye. He jumped back, but she just took a gulping breath and shook her head. "Oh, no you don't, Callor, there's no doing that once and then running off."

(A-N: So the long, tragic tale of Chapter 123, which turned into 123, 124, and 125. Yes, that's right, 125. I will be posting it tonight as well. It was just when 124 reached 12K words … yeah, I had to break it up. So … look for the continuation … just go potty, make a tea, get a plate of cookies first. :D

These two … these chapters … I both love them and am terrified, because of course, we're breaking new ground for this story, and I am still really sick which messes with my perception.
(Just ask poor LilVy who dealt with my tears and despair last night while I threatened to just throw the whole story away. Sorry Vy.)

Anyway, I really hope you enjoy the ride. Onward to 125. hugs and love)
(Warning: NSFW. Garrus and Shepard continue their first time.)

He nuzzled her fingers, then turned his attention to her thigh, caressing and kneading gently where her flesh was whole. "Your whole body is so damned soft," he muttered as his talons reached the inside of her upper thigh, "but right here ... it's worthy of a sweet baby Jesus."

Chapter Notes

I originally split to a new volume here, but having lost a lot ... hundreds of people ... decided to just keep posting on this original volume. Sorry for any confusion.

40 Days ASR

"What did I do?" He chuckled, looking down at her as if he'd accidentally solved some intricate puzzle and needed to figure out how to do it again.

Shepard slid her hand between them. "See that little—" He beat her to the button, quite literally, and the explanation turned into a throaty moan as he rolled a talon pad over it. Swallowing hard, she cleared her throat. "Yeah, that right there is the make Shepard sing in fifteen octaves button."

He nestled back in, his subvocals rolling. "Fifteen? Hmmm, that sounds like a challenge." Looking back, he shot her a sly grin and raised brow plate that made her fingers and toes tingle then go numb.

"Oh sweet baby Jesus," she whispered, her stomach muscles tightening in either anticipation or dread, she didn't quite know. "Go easy on me, I'm a beginner."

He nodded, a thoughtful scowl lowering over his features. "In order to approach this challenge scientifically, I need a much better angle," he announced, pushing up off the mattress. After pausing to kiss her, he moved around to the foot of the bed and settled between her legs. Then, through the teasing, his concern returned, warm and loving. Resting his chin on the inside of her thigh, he looked up into her eyes, not moving until she reached out to stroke his brow, drawing a line down his nose and mouth plate.

He nuzzled her fingers, then turned his attention to her thigh, caressing and kneading gently where her flesh was whole. "Your whole body is so damned soft," he muttered as his talons reached the inside of her upper thigh, "but right here ... it's worthy of a sweet baby Jesus." He leaned in, his tongue flicking experimentally to see if he could get the same result. A sultry chuckle greeted the way her body spasmed, getting wetter and wetter. "You keep going like this, you're going to need to keep a bottle of water next to the bed."
She set her face, completely prepared to glare at him. But when he looked up, his entire posture screamed a teasing sort of cocky pleasure at being able to turn her into a mewling, soaking wet mess of want, and the glare evaporated into a cheeky grin. "Hey, Vakarian, I thought you were supposed to be … oooooooo." Arching hard off the mattress, Shepard threw back her head, fists balling up the sheets as his hard, pointed tongue moved deeper. "Oh wow, let's hear it for explorat … oooooooh, damn. That tongue." Every inch of her skin lifted into tiny, shivery peaks of pleasure.

Garrus chuckled, his hand caressing her belly, drawing soft little circles. "I love when your skin does that."

"It's definitely showing its appreciation for your spirit of discovery." She chuckled, taking the opportunity to catch her breath a little. "That's a whole different National Geographic Society, right there." She collapsed only to feel a talon gently caressing her length, then, finding her entrance, it slipped inside a little and the sheets wadded up in her fists once more.

"This spot seems much more accommodating." He looked up to watch her eyes as he pressed deeper. "This is my spot, here?" He grinned as she let out a tremulous mewl, meeting his stare for a second before her head drew back, her hips lifting into him. "Right," he said, shortling a little, "definitely my spot."

Shepard's eyes squeezed closed, hands pulling the sheets right off the mattress as Garrus grew bolder, his talon stroking in and out slowly, pushing a little deeper with each thrust. Each movement he made—even the weight of his head resting on her thigh and his breath as it tickled through her hair—stoked the fire until her muscles leaped and convulsed with even the slightest provocation.

"Garrus … ." She gasped, his name the only coherent thought that managed to escape the tangled mess of love and desire. Need and passion ... and just raw, painfully intense sensation tossed her back and forth between them, keeping her in the air, spinning about and helpless. And at her center, the slow smoldering fire caught the faint breeze of his breath and roared to life.

A strong hand caressed her side, his voice carving its way through the fucking amazing madness to anchor her. "It's okay, Kahri. I've got you."

One half-gasp, half-sob escaped her lips, and then that tongue ... that tongue flicked and the world dissolved into crashing waves of pleasure, ice cold flipping to magma hot and back again. She cried out, at first just a vocal outpouring of release—fervent and hedonistic—but as the waves began to recede to a slow, pulsing tide, thought returned and his name tumbled out, tangled into various words of love.

Garrus watched her face, his smile pleased, adoring … and a little surprised. "Did I just make you orgasm?" he asked, not a trace of teasing in his tone or expression. He withdrew his talon, his smile widening as her entire body seized again.

"God, yes," she said, a soft chortle managing to muscle in between the gasps. "Either that, or you tried to kill me using my giblets as the murder weapon." She reached out for his hand, lacing her fingers with his, their joined hands resting on her trembling stomach. "Wow," she said once she started catching her breath. "That was … " Pausing, she shrugged and shook her head, at a loss for words. "... that was … dear lord, Garrus, I think my heart's going to explode." She scowled and raised her head, looking down between her legs. "And quite possibly most of my giblets as well."

"Giblets?" Garrus's brow plates peaked as he rested his cheek back on her thigh, his breath warm against her skin. "I don't know that one." His other hand caressed its way up her side, gliding over A soft, joyful laugh answered that. "My very religious mama couldn't bring herself to use proper names for things, so she just warned me not to let the boys play with my giblets, and to certainly never let them put their giblets inside me." She squeezed his talons. "Considering what giblets actually are—I'll tell you some time when it won't destroy the mood—I was more than glad to obey her wishes."

"But, you're making an exception for me?" He nuzzled along the inside of her thigh to her center.

Her body answered for her as her knees dropped to the outside and her pelvis lifted into the soft kiss. "I think that's a pretty resounding yes," she added, just in case he needed the clarification.

Garrus let out a long, contented sigh as he settled back between her thighs, his mouth plates brushing her skin. She smiled, knowing that he was simply savouring the softness.

Then, eyes closed, he drew in a deep breath through his mouth as if he was tasting the air. A low, rumbling moan followed. "Dear spirits, Kahri, you smell … ." A soft, mewling sound trembled in the air for a second before he fell silent, returning to his nuzzling.

Shepard waited for a moment, then chuckled, low and kind, hoping to loosen the blockage cutting off his words. "Hmmm, yeah, in grade three, Bobby Trelle went out of his way to tell me that I was smelly a couple of times a day." Try as she might to keep the smartass out of her grin, she failed, and held her breath, hoping she hadn't shut him down.

A fleeting smile whispered across his face, but then he smacked her hip hard enough to sting. She jumped, a soft whimper of need escaping as all the muscles through her core clenched tight, a spasm of pleasure jerking her off the mattress. When she settled, his grin came both easily and heated as he echoed her. "Got to remember that one." Smile fading to something serious and beautiful, he shook his head. "But, no, that wasn't what I was trying to say, Kahri." A grumbling sigh rolled from him as he searched for words and failed. "It's what you said earlier about not walking away. You … ."

Heart unable to watch him fumble, looking more miserable by the minute, Shepard sat up and took his chin in her hand. "Don't worry about how it sounds, Garrus. You know you can't scare me off." Her other hand closed around his, and she leaned down to kiss his talons. "Just tell me the best way you can."

He nodded. "My pari said that he knew the moment he walked past my mari on a crowded street that he'd just passed his mate." Garrus turned his face into her palm, his eyes closing. "He spun and raced after her because he hadn't seen her … he'd just caught the perfect scent … the one person in all of the galaxy who'd been meant for him. Their love has never faltered."

Shepard pressed her lips together to stop them trembling, but the tears that gathered along her lashes would not be denied, breaking free to trickle around the curve of her nose. The soft layer of awe and longing running beneath his words reached down into her, evoking new emotions; deep, reaching down into the roots sorts of feelings that she'd honestly never expected to feel. Her heart sped up, fear peeking out of hiding but then excitement and joy wrestled it down while hope tied it up and gagged it. She caressed her love's face, soft touches encouraging him to continue.

"I've known it from the moment we met," he said, his eyes gleaming as he looked up into hers, "but just now, I realized that this face is what I'm supposed to see first thing every morning and last thing every night." He leaned up and pressed his palm against her chest. "This heart is the one that has been entrusted into my care for the rest of my days. And … " He lowered his head to nuzzle heir belly. "... genetic impossibilities aside, this body is the one meant to bear my children. Your scent, it's the scent of the one person in all of the galaxy meant for me."

He sniffed, thick and throaty, then ducked his head, mandibles giving an embarrassed little flick. "How does that rate on the scaring you off scale?"

Oh for frig's sake. Shepard blinked hard, almost furiously, to clear away her tears and choked down the lump trying to strangle her. She couldn't just dissolve into a giant, hormonal puddle of tears immediately following her first orgasm. That mixed message could well go off like a grenade inside his head.

Tugging gently on his chin, she coaxed him up. "Come here."

"But your wounds," he protested, pulling back.

A soft smile and a raised eyebrow addressed his stubbornness. "I don't care." Releasing him, she laid back against the bank of pillows. "Come here."

Lifting onto his hands and knees, he crawled up the bed until his cheek pressed against hers, as if he was afraid to look her in the eyes. "Okay, I'm here," he said, holding himself rigid and clear of her body.

"Closer," she said, ironically pushing him back until she could focus on his face. "I want your body on mine when I say this." She interrupted his protests before they made it out of his mouth. "No arguments, General, just do it."

"Aye, aye, Captain." He shook his head but he lowered himself gingerly until all but his keel pressed along her left side, deliciously warm and solid. When she tilted her head, beckoning him closer, he let out an aggravated sigh and turned a little so that the side of his chest rested against her rather than the sharp blade down its center.

"Better." She wrapped an arm around his neck and drew his brow down to rest against hers. "Much better." Tilting her head, she kissed him, just a soft, chaste peck, then pulled him down, adjusting for his cowl until he could tuck his face in against her neck. She let out a long breath, her hand stroking his fringe, a motion that comforted her as well. It seemed that the earlier, unspoken question couldn't be completely avoided. Too much time and longing and heartache lay between them.

"We haven't had any time to decompress, have we?" she asked. "Everything seems like an emergency, even us, and we haven't stopped running since I came back." Pressing her lips to the top of his head, she let out a long sigh. "You know the answer will be yes, Garrus. You're right … I've felt it since the beginning, as much as it terrified me. We might not be the same species, but the powers that be most definitely decided that we belonged together."

She pulled back and lifted his chin so their eyes met again, knowing everything she felt for her remarkable torin poured into that stare. "As for the when and the how of the official stuff, the time will appear. I'm not going to disappear on you again, love. The rain can't just erase me out here."

He lifted onto an elbow and leaned in to kiss her, his free hand wandering along her skin, his entire body trembling with passion as he moved against her. Then he balked, his body stiffening, eyes shuttering, his words measured as he spoke, "The rain can't erase you?"

Mouth open, lips moist, panting, she pressed into his hand as it cupped her breast, his thumb talon tracing her nipple. "I just mean that I'm not going anywhere. You're stuck with me." Her body undulated in slow waves as he relaxed back into her, her thighs falling open, relaxed, almost begging him to stop teasing and to climb between them. Of course, her wounds would never stand the pressure of his full weight, but still.

Kissing the sensitive hide just under his jaw, Shepard did her best to give as good as she got, sucking and nipping, her tongue teasing. Getting bolder as he rumbled with pleasure, Shepard's hand slipped down his belly to run her thumb along the top edge of the plates protecting his groin.

"So," she whispered between kisses, "how does the whole plate thing work?" She blushed as he lifted his weight off her, leaning back on his elbow. Running her lower lip through her teeth, she raised her eyebrows and caressed her hand over both plates. "Do I have to do anything to help the process along?"

A long, heavy moan ground from Garrus's throat, startling her. "Spirits, no. You've more than helped the process along, I'm staying sheathed deliberately." Her hand rested on the seam, featherlight, drawing an almost whimper from him. "It's not easy, and it's definitely not comfortable, but once it comes out, it'll start to swell, and I didn't want to scare you or … ." Another miserable sort of grumble followed, but he shrugged. "It's different with tarins, Shepard. We'd rub our plates together, stroke one another, and I'd unsheath straight between her plates, seating there until it was over."

Shepard nodded, her fingertips stroking his face and neck, a soft, loving massage aimed at easing his discomfort. "Right. Well, human males get erect and then thrust into that much more accommodating spot until they are stimulated to an orgasm." She slipped her fingertips along the seam, both curiosity and desire wishing that he'd relax his rigid control and let her see him.

After a second, she looked up once more. "I don't think Shepard on the bottom is a good plan," she said. "And, I'd like to see your face when we do this, so that leaves lying on our sides or Garrus on his back." She gave him a teasing push. "Which is it, big guy?"

He sat up and adjusted the pillows behind him, his stare bright and eager again. She kissed him, her tongue dancing along his reassuring him that it would all work out just fine.

"That is the best choice, I think," she agreed. When he stopped adjusting the pillows, Shepard threw a leg over his hips, watching his face for any sign of discomfort as she settled her weight onto him a little. "This okay?"

He lifted himself further up the bed and reached out to drag his thumb across her bottom lip. She kissed it, noting that his hands smelled of her, their combined scents dumping an entire truckload of fuel on her fire. His mandibles flicked, warning her before his teasing even escaped his mouth. "Other than the fact that you're sitting a dozen centimetres too far down, you mean?"

"Shep, no, other than that. It hasn't been very long since those bastards took you apart, Garrus."

"Other than the fact that you're sitting a dozen centimetres too far down, you mean?"

She kissed him, her eyes slip closed, she delighted in the slightly rough texture of his tongue and the delicious sensation of his pelvis brushing against hers.

"You weigh three kilos, trust me, I'll be fine."

He returned her kiss, hips moving under her, a slow roll back and forth that transferred her slick, hot, wetness to his hide. Closing his eyes, Garrus sighed, loud and full as their surfaces glided over one another. "You weigh three kilos, trust me, I'll be fine."

Shepard sat back, trailing her hands down his body, teasing as she went. When she reached his plates, she stroked them apart with her thumbs. "Time to let go, Garrus," she whispered. "Time to trust me."

His eyes latched onto hers, his breathing quick and erratic. "Shepard, I just don't want to scare you or hurt you."

She nodded. She couldn't blame him for being worried after the fierce push-pull of their relationship. The only way to ease his fear was to prove it wrong. "Right now," she said, dropping her voice down low and husky, "I want you inside me badly enough to go in after it, so make your choice, Vakarian: fumbling, inexperienced fingers groping inside your sheath, or just trust me and let go. I've fought naked asari monstrosities, I'm not going to shatter at the sight of a turian erection."

Despite giving her a truly rock-crushing scowl, he nodded. "Fine ... impossible woman." Then, letting out a groan of such profound relief that it made her heart ache, he relaxed and slipped free of his plates.

Leaning forward, she slapped his arm. "Damn it, Garrus. Next time talk to me rather than suffering to try to protect me. That had to be hurting like hell." When she straightened, she caressed the velvet soft skin with gentle fingertips, biting her lip to hide a grin when his hips lifted into her touch. "Oh, and look, you were worried for nothing, because it's just like the rest of you." She glared at him without any real heat and closed her hand around him when his pelvis rocked again. "Different, but perfect."

And it was both very different and perfect. Her palm slid up his length, her turn to be enraptured by the softness of his skin. As she indulged her fascination, she watched his face, relishing every mandible flick of delight and the wanton way his head tipped back, mouth open, chest heaving as he tried to keep from thrusting up into her hand. And failed.

Pressing her lips tight, she lifted her eyebrows, peering down at him with sharp-edged, smart ass curiosity. "Oh, does that feel better than caging it for the last hour or so?"

Growling, a heavy rumble of subvocals that set all her hair on end, he reached down, wrapping his talons around her arms. "Get up here."

"How could a girl possibly not obey such a tantalizing order?" She crawled up his body, low enough her breasts pressed against him and his erection trailed along her belly.

"Wait. Stop, Kahri," he said when he slipped between her legs. Garrus grabbed her waist, the sharpness in his voice and movements freezing her in place.

Holding herself as still as she could, she searched his face for the problem, worry slicing through her, cold and sharp. "What? Are you okay? Damn it, I damaged something, didn't I?"

Garrus shook his head, one hand pressing against her cheek. "No, I'm fine. Just give me a second." He gasped, his voice a reed floating on a river of subvocals, his breath hot and sweet against her face. "It's just … a lot of, um … . Spirits … " He leaned in to rest his brow against hers, his whole body jumping as his erection moved within the slick heat between her legs. Another almost pained grunt bullied its way out between his clenched teeth. "It's just a lot more stimulation than I'm used to." He nipped at her chin, teeth grazing her. "Damn, woman, you feel amazing … no, not amazing … different, but perfect."

Shepard grinned and kissed him. "And you're not even in your spot, yet. What's going to happen when you are?" Despite her teasing, she held herself as still as she could, letting him shift beneath her, exploring and adjusting. Her eyes closed as she savoured the new, intoxicating sensation of her
"Where are you?" he asked. He rolled his hips front to back, sending a thousand tiny jolts of electric bliss zipping along her nerves. When they reached the end of the line, they exploded, leaving her trembling, fine beads of sweat glistening along her brow, lip, and between her breasts.

Once again, the sun burst through the dim lighting of that room on Omega, its hot rays beating down on her skin and and glowing bright against her eyelids. She opened her eyes, catching one side of her lower lip between her teeth as she shook her head. "Mmm … I'm right here with you." She moved against him a little, pressing down into the ridge along his underside. Back arching with pleasure, she let her mouth drop open, a rich moan tumbling out. And then his open mouth pressed to hers, his breath sultry on her tongue, teeth sharp against her lips.

"Dear spirits, is that the fifteen octaves button?" He yelped, thrusting up against her as Shepard rubbed it against his tip.

"Yes, it is, and that thing you're doing there—" She let out a soft grunt as a wave of hot, wet pleasure poured through her and over him. As Garrus responded to the wash of her lust by grinding up into her, Shepard's grunt grew into a whine of sheer, wanton desire, the sound reaching a pitch and volume she'd thought impossible. "Oh god, yeah … that, right there. Holy … blessed … Enkindlers."

She planted soft, yearning kisses along his mandible as her hands caressed and kneaded, trying to ease the need growing both stronger and harder to reach every second … the need to somehow mould their two aching, striving bodies into a single being, sated and complete.

"Hey, know anyplace around here where an explorer can hire a guide?" he whispered, the tremulous thread of control woven through his subvocals betraying the raw voracity beneath his teasing.

She grinned and brushed the end of her nose against his. "I know one, but she's pricey as hell and a real pain in the ass. You might just want to—"

"I like a challenge." His arm clamped around her, an intractable steel band pinning her against his chest, while the other grasped her jaw, pulling her into a kiss so deep and wide that it set her heart thrashing against her ribs.

His need … good lord, his need roared over her, a forest fire leaping across an open area to wash against new, virgin ground. For two years, all he'd wanted was for the two of them to be together, and for two years, her fear and then her death had held that simple desire out of his grasp. No longer. He deserved so much better.

Deepening the kiss, she threw herself into the fire and let it burn.

As the inferno swept her up, she slipped a hand between them, guiding him into place. A low susurrus of pleasure drifted between them as she lowered herself slowly, wanting to savour every second and sensation. They'd only ever get one first time. Afterwards, the rest of their lives lay before them, days, months, and years to layer in all the nuances that came with love shared over time.

But that time, their first time, was for closing her eyes, clinging to her love, and discovering the sweet friction of him sliding into her depths. It was for finally feeling the barrier that kept Jane Shepard isolated and alone shatter as Garrus filled her. For gasping at the rake of his talons across her skin and the sharp, aching pressure of his keel between her breasts.
The memory of antiseptic bit deeply through the dim, blue light.

"Officer Vak—" Dr. Chakwas sighed, a thin, tight sound. "Garrus, you need to eat something. It's been two days."

In front of her, her beautiful torin clung to someone's hand, the person obscured by a stasis field. Garrus shook his head, and when he opened his mouth, a reedy sort of keen bled beneath his words. "I can't. She's afraid of the dark."

"I love you." His oath pulled her out of her head, out of the wash of sensations—of memories?—and back into the tight, almost desperate grip of Garrus's arms.

A soft, adoring smile answered him, and she reached up, her fingertips just grazing his nose and mouth, thumb sweeping over his cheekbone and mandible. Then, closing her eyes once more, she slipped her hands over the arch of his neck, caressing under his crest and along the border between hide and plate, each touch promising an end to his waiting.

"And I love you." Her words came out in a soft cry as he thrust, and the inferno burst through her skin, searing along her nerves to burn bright and fierce in her belly. She stiffened, the brilliant light revealing all the small, dark frozen corners hidden within her heart. Clinging to her love, feeling no fear as his arms held her … so tight and so strong … she reached out to touch the next dark place.

Garrus stepped away from the circle of people and leaned down to press his talons against the box at their center. She started to follow, but then he caressed the smooth, gray metal, and suddenly she felt like an intruder. "Shepard was brave. Loyal to a fault. Infuriating. Terrified. Honourable. Strong … so much stronger than she believed. Perfect in her flaws … and I loved … love her."

He swallowed, the rigid, violent movement painful to watch, and closed his eyes. Unable to bear his isolation for another second, she stepped to his side, slipping her hand into his.

The moment flashed like lightning between one gasp and the next. She lifted into Garrus's embrace, her arms wrapping around his neck, her mouth open and pressed against his mandible. She ran the flats of her teeth down the edge … how did she know that he loved it when she did that? How did she know that her flat, impotent teeth could pull a cry of bliss from him that they'd hear down at Afterlife?

His much more impressive teeth nicked the skin under her ear. The slight pain just tossed her higher, and her lover remained too caught up in the dance between their bodies to respond with his usual concern.

His thrusts deepened, his body apparently deciding it liked the human method of intercourse. Her muscles rolled with his every movement, her body gripping him tight as he withdrew, then spreading open to draw him back. Oh dear lord, the delicious friction … each stroke more intense than the last until she cried out with every one. The fire roared higher, daring her to reach for the next patch of shaded truth.

Garrus set the book down at one end of the cushions and laid down. He spread a couple of blankets over himself, then tucked a pillow between his head and his cowl. Closing his eyes, he breathed in, the expression of twisted pain and love on his face telling her whose pillow it was.

She curled in against him, her back pressed into his front, trying to feel his warmth.

"I had so many plans for us," he whispered to the air. "I didn't want to scare you by laying out everything I saw for us, but I never intended to let you get further than an arm's length away." She rolled over to face him, still tucked in as tightly as she could manage. His laboured breaths passed through her as he continued, "If we died in flames, fighting Reapers, we'd die together, wearing one another's coillasi. If we survived, and ever saw the end of war, I thought maybe we'd live somewhere quiet, put down the guns, and who knows ... maybe even have a family." The soft keen broke the air again and he curled around the pillow, pulling it in against him.

Garrus thrust into her hard and fast, her whole body rocking with the force of his passion, each movement promising a release that drew so close ... so painfully close. He stiffened against her, his subvocals keening, matching her cry for cry.

"Garrus." His name tumbled from her, begging for him to end the frantic climb, to punch through the glass holding completion so tauntingly out of reach. "Please."

"Kahri," he rumbled, his mouth pressing against the hollow under her jaw where her jugular groove began. "I ... spirits ... I'm just about ... ." His words disappeared into a deep cry of needful bliss. Then it was her turn to moan as his tongue traced a long, slow path down her throat. Damn, that bloody amazing tongue.

Garrus followed Anderson down the aisle, straight and proud as he parted the presidium crowd. Shepard strode beside him, her hand tight in his. After a quick glance around her memorial, wondering who the council thought they were burying, nothing she saw had the slightest bit to do with her, she focused on her torins. Poor Nihlus, wounded so deeply his soul bled out, and Garrus ... so strong, so beautiful even in his grief.

"You can do this," she whispered to him. "You can lead these people and win this war. I know you can. Take care of my people ... your people, General Vakarian."

Garrus pulled in a deep breath and nodded. He stopped at the entrance to the park and turned back to look at her hologram. "Spirits, you would have hated this memorial, Kahri." He laughed and took a deep breath, his shoulders settling. "I thought I'd lost you," he whispered, staring at her image, "but you're right here. You'll always be right here." He backed up, following Anderson. "Let's show them."

As she crashed closer and closer to orgasm, the images sped up, flickering past so fast they barely registered before disappearing.

"I'm going to ... ." Garrus gasped, his breath hot on her cheek and lips as his mouth returned to hers. "I'm so close, Kahri." He kissed her, and then his one hand slipped down between them, the pad of his thumb brushing over her. "Yes?" he asked, pulling back to look into her eyes.

"Ohhh, yes," she said, the word a heaving sigh. "Except, more: harder, faster ... whatever, just more."

"Okay," he whispered, his mouth still brushing hers, bringing with his touch the brilliant sun, sweet breeze, and the sighing grass.

Her torin stretched out along her side and curled his arm under her neck. Shepard burrowed in against his side, smiling, completely content and happy in a way she could never remember feeling.

He shook his head and nuzzled his way down her jaw. "You and your stories," he whispered against her neck.

She sighed and closed eyes, pressing into his solid warmth. One day it would end, and her world would crash down around her, but maybe ... just maybe ... not that day.
Her body responded and not subtly, the fire bursting forth like a star going nova. She mewled, shriek, breathless, the sound building to a cry that bordered on a scream. Her heart thundered as her body arched hard, muscles tying themselves into knots of pure bliss.

Lightheaded and reeling, she pressed her brow against the sweating hide of his neck and clung to him, one hand around his neck, the other clamped over the hand still rubbing in slow, light circles. In return he wrapped himself around her, her truest, safest place in the galaxy.

"And they had to live as refugees in Callor and Katrana's lands?" Shepard laughed. "Smart cookie. I imagine that Katrana found him completely irresistible after that." She pulled back, reaching up to trace the lines of his face with tender fingers. "I would have. Love a torin who uses what's between his ears." She leaned up and looked at both sides of his head. "Or in the case of turians, I suppose ... ummm ... aural canals? Tympanic membranes?"

He dragged her back down and rolled over to pin her down as he kissed her. Passion and joy roared through her. The taste of his mouth, the solid weight of his body laying over hers, and the way his talons caressed her all combined into a heady, intoxicating brew. Too bad he'd find it all empty one day and never return.

She shoved that aside. "Did they end up joining their states and finding their happily ever after?" Shepard whispered, nibbling along his mandible between words.

Breathing like she'd just run fifteen klicks in full gear, Shepard began to ease down from the full rigor of breaking orgasm, her body rippling with slow, deep waves of pleasure. Her body helped coax him to his release, and then he called out, his voice rich and rumbling with layers of love, devotion, and euphoria.

His subvocals rolled through her with enough force that aftershocks sent her arching into him again as he spelled into her. She gripped him tight as he collapsed back, pulling her in to nestle against his chest. Limbs tangled, she lay draped over him, his swollen member deep inside her, pulsing softly. He buried his face in the curve of her neck, breathing hard and ragged against her skin.

"Dear spirits, woman," he whispered, letting out a long, decadent groan, "I think you may have killed me." One hand stroked up her side to cup her breast, caressing it with the gentlest of touches as he moved within her.

Leaning forward, she kissed him, long and slow and sweet, the most wonderful, comforting sense of connection setting in, roots anchoring her in that new, off-kilter-feeling life. "I discovered why I don't recall any sort of afterlife." She drew back just far enough to look into his eyes, her heart thumping hard as she watched him sort through what she'd said.

Garrus's grip on her loosened and fell away, his body freezing under her. "Kahri?" he whispered, her nickname sounding very much like a prayer.

She grasped his hands, the fear in his voice demanding that she comfort it, to wrap him in the same wonderful peace that she'd discovered. Drawing his talons to her lips, she said, "It's because I never once left your side, love. I stayed with you through it all."

(A-N: Not much to say here, except ... Yeah, it was long, but it was important to them. Sorry if you hate love scenes. I do try to keep them romantic rather than smutty. Thanks as always. hugs theherocomplex is someone I truly cherish as a friend and fellow-writer-guide. She is writing a fantastic story called Ghost, Ghost, I know you live within me. I highly recommend reading it if you aren't already. Although her story also has Shepard sticking around as a spirit, that is where the similarities end. I have no desire nor intention to tread upon her toes. The stories are very different stories, our Shepards are nearly polar opposites, and this is the extent of my Shepard's dead archives. I am examining questions of the soul, what makes people what they are, naturally the idea of spirits or ghosts is going to come into it because Shepard had to go somewhere, or did she? I received a guest review on FFN saying I plagiarized hero's story because of these last few lines. It's sort of surprising considering how different our stories are, but I wanted to address it, because I have no intention to do any such thing. She is my favourite writer in the known galaxy, my friend, and one of the people who beats this story into shape.)

The grin widened as she raked a hand through her hair, a ghost of that touch skating along his stomach and thighs. Calling the night before well worth the wait amounted to the understatement of all time. She never stopped amazing him. When they'd made love, well, he'd never imagined feeling so much at once. The few times he'd blown off steam with different tarins had been great, but Shepard had turned him inside out, rearranged him, and then put him back together a little more content, a little more sure, a little more the torin he wanted to be.

And of course, even more helplessly in love.

Garrus’s eyes never left Shepard as she paced the parameter of the senior staff’s briefing room. She’d probably punch him for having noticed and catalogued the fact that she paced in fourteen distinct ways depending on her mood or the problem at hand, but he had. She’d call it creepy. He called it attentive.

Anyway, she thought better on her feet, movement syphoning away any energy that might interfere with that razor-sharp mind. Right then, she marched, spine rigid, shoulders braced, eyes studying the floor without seeing it: her 'I don't see how this changes anything, but I'm trying' pace. He let a tiny smile flutter along his mandibles. She might not believe that two factions of Reapers changed anything, but that didn't mean she wouldn't try to find a way to use it.

The grin widened as she raked a hand through her hair, a ghost of that touch skating along his stomach and thighs. Calling the night before well worth the wait amounted to the understatement of all time. She never stopped amazing him. When they'd made love, well, he'd never imagined feeling so much at once. The few times he'd blown off steam with different tarins had been great, but Shepard had turned him inside out, rearranged him, and then put him back together a little more content, a little more sure, a little more the torin he wanted to be.

And of course, even more helplessly in love.

He realized he was staring at her when Nihlus jabbed him with an elbow, drawing his attention back to the packed briefing room. Heat flushed up Garrus's neck as his fratrin chuckled under his breath and patted his shoulder. Nihlus had pulled Garrus and Shepard out of bed early in order to prepare them for a great deal of whispering and to advise that the general get his room soundproofed.

Garrus grinned. After the traumas of Shepard’s past, he hadn't known if they'd ever make love. Last night, his beautiful Kahri turned her passion loose in a way he'd never dared hope. After her allowing it to carry her away the way she had, he'd soundproof the entire base twice so she felt free to fly.

Of course, despite Nihlus's warning, everyone just seemed really pleased for them. No one was crass enough to mention anything except Butler, who just shook his head and said, “We always knew you were married, General. Just didn't figure it was to the angel herself." He walked away a few strides, then turned back. "Judging by what the second floor is saying, you're going to have most of the females around here asking you to give their men lessons." A bellowing laugh echoed through the lobby and that was the end of it.

"As fascinating as two factions of Reapers is," Shepard said, breaking her silence and pulling Garrus back to the present, "it doesn't really change all that much."

A flash of orange on the other side of the room drew both Garrus and Shepard's attention. Miranda Lawson's fingers skipped across her omnitool's interface, then the glow died.

Scowling, Garrus looked back to Shepard just in time to see a blade-edged shudder roll up her spine, lodging at the base of her skull. A heavy scowl dropped Garrus's brow plates and mandibles as Shepard cracked her neck, the heel of her right hand lifting to press against her temple. A headache?

Shepard shook it off and forced her hand down, the movement rusted and tense. Her jaw tightened as if it hurt her to speak. "Trust me, the ones behind the orbs are just as busy ripping my brain to shreds as the Sovereign ones. They're not potential allies, just enemies coming at us from a different angle."

Lawson's arm glowed for another couple of seconds, but then Nihlus cleared his throat.

"You won't get an argument from anyone who went aboard the Haestrom shipyard," he agreed. "There was nothing benevolent going on there." When Shepard looked over at the Spectre, she gave him a thin, tired-looking smile.

"However," Dr. Chakwas said cutting through the wave of murmuring that followed Nihlus's statement, "it's something else to work with in our treatment of indoctrination. I've already pulled the scans I did on Han'Gerrel, Lady Benezia, and the Feros colonists." She stood and the rest of the conversations died. "We know that Lady Benezia and Shiala were indoctrinated by Sovereign." She twisted to face Shepard, turning to follow the Captain's progress back to the center of the room. "Comparing their scans and yours to Han'Gerrel's, I can confirm he was indoctrinated by Sovereign."

Mordin cleared his throat and straightened in his chair. "Fact that one form of indoctrination—orbs ... Sovereign ... Thorian—disrupts other kinds very useful. Also need to continue work with Mr. Weaver. Implants reason orbs did not affect him. Filtering technology possible."

Garrus met Shepard's eyes and nodded, a crooked grin following to her chair. Clearing his throat, he calmed the renewed wave of discussion. "We need to continue our research, but I agree that we're just facing two enemies, not any sort of potential ally. The enemy of my enemy is still my enemy if he's shooting at me or tearing apart my brain." He watched Shepard sit, her head falling into her hand for a moment before she took a deep breath and straightened. Cerberus had bought her some more time with their rebuild of her brain, but it hadn't driven the dark spiders out of her. Who knew how much time she had without a proper cure?

Stomping on his fear and tearing his eyes from his mate, he returned to Chakwas and Mordin. "Use whatever resources you need to continue your research. Bring in any personnel you need. Just cc me on large requisitions and salary offers." He pushed up out of his chair, smiling at the doctor as she returned to hers. "I signed the deal on the rachni statue yesterday and am setting those funds aside for the R&D department."

He strode to the end of the room where the QEC pads all stood empty and turned back. "The fight is here, but so far it's against shadows, and we possess only scattered clues as to its shape. To combat that, we need to expand the research and development department." An indulgent nod greeted a small, excited outburst from Mordin about their funding nearing the levels of the STG. "I'm clearing the accounting and operations departments out of floors fifteen through twenty. They'll move to building three, and we'll renovate the five floors here to suit. We'll begin that process when I return midweek."

His gaze travelled over everyone assembled there, resting on Nyreen Kandros and Martin. "When do the people from Lorek arrive?"

The tarin leaned forward in her chair. "Later today. The four day lead time gave us a chance to get enough rooms in building three prepared for them." She activated her omnitool. "We've had our people going through the ships, taking down information so that we can try to reunite family members if they so choose." Scrolling down the list, she nodded and then turned to Martin.

The kid shrugged. "We've done our best to prepare for the extranet use. Each room has access. And, along with family information, we've been asking people where they might want to be taken." The kid's face told Garrus everything before he spoke. "Not surprising, a lot of them just have no clue. They were born and raised there." He glanced over at Shepard. "A lot of families died either in the raids or since."

"I got damned lucky," Shepard said, her voice low and rough.

"Shepard … ." Martin said, flailing a little.

She just shook her head, a watered down smile trying to reassure the kid. Damn, she looked as though someone had turned her inside out then shaken her half to death. "Don't worry, kid. I wasn't putting anything out there other than the facts. My family has somewhere to go. A lot of other ones might need to find that for themselves." Looking up at Garrus, she raised her eyebrows. "Any ideas, General?"

He smiled and nodded. "Yes, I have one in fact. Thank you, Captain." Letting out a long breath, he turned to meet each set of eyes in the room before speaking. "You all know about the Illusive Man's security breach a month ago." When the chorus of agreement and the nasty glares being tossed at Miranda died down, he continued, "TIM, as we've all come to call him, said something to me that day that was a cold splash of reality. He said that when the Reapers arrive, we would have a rush of recruitment, people of all sorts running to sign up. The condition of their service would be safety for their families."

He walked over to Emily Wong and rested a hand on her shoulder. "I've asked Miss Wong to oversee the Sanctuary project, and she's agreed after much charm and persuasion."

The reporter brushed his hand from her shoulder. "You're not as charming as you believe, General," she said, haughty but teasing.

"Of course, I am." He grinned at the laughter and moved back to the QEC console. "Sanctuary will be a large, civilian refuge located in a tucked away corner of the galaxy. All of its development and placement details will be kept as top secret as we can manage, but if any of you have suggestions for locations, feel free to let me know." Shepard shifted in her chair, the movement drawing his gaze back to her. He stared for a second, the circles under her eyes worrying him. They hadn't been there that morning.

"I'm going to be heading to Palaven for a few days," he continued. "That will give you research heads time to dream up a million ideas for your new space. It will also give the Lorek resettlers time to move in and get oriented." He spun on his talons to lock onto Vortash and Butler. "If any of them want to become recruits, take them through an extended orientation and screening. They're more than welcome, but let's ensure that they're making the best decision for them rather than grasping for the only rope they can see."

"Understood, General," Butler agreed. "We'll see to them." He raised his eyebrows, a huge smile displaying all his broken and missing teeth. "So, you're heading to Palaven?"

Garrus shook his head at the unspoken context. "Adrien Victus contacted me this morning. All he'd say is that I needed to see something, so we'll give the Hierarch a ride home." He glanced over at his pari.

When Martin lunged forward in his chair, Garrus chuckled. "Sorry, kid. You're needed here. In addition to playing lab rat for Dr. Solus, you're in charge of making sure that the Shepards have everything they need."

Martin grinned and settled back. "Yeah, I can do that." He looked over at Shepard. "Don't worry, they'll be treated like queens."

Garrus looked around the room. "Any other business?"

After twenty minutes of dealing with small in-house matters, Garrus adjourned the briefing and walked over to Nihlus. "Stay behind?" he asked, moving on to Shepard when the Spectre agreed.

"Palaven?" Shepard smiled wearily and stood. "Way to give a captain notice there, General."

He gripped her shoulders. "Adrien called just before I came in." Bending down to look into her eyes, he frowned, a frozen hand shoving itself between his plates. "Are you okay? You looked like a headache settled in while you were up there."

"Yeah, a pretty decent one. Don't worry, I'll head up to get checked out before we leave." The smile she gave him came off forced. "When do we ship out?"

"Three hours." He stroked a hand over her hair then turned to stop Dr. Chakwas as the doctor walked past. "Doc, Shepard needs your services."

The doctor gripped Shepard's chin for a moment, then nodded. "Come up as soon as you're done here, and I'll take a look." She frowned. "It's not the indoctrination?"

Shepard held her head as if balancing something incredibly fragile on top of her neck. "No spiders, Doc, just a sudden, brain splitting pain."

"Come right up, I'll wait." When Shepard nodded, the doctor headed out.

Garrus pulled his mate in close, tucking her in against his side. Would there come a single day when he didn't worry about her? He chuffed, knowing the answer, especially since she'd always been right about him worrying even when he didn't need to. He nuzzled the top of her head. "Go take care of your head and then meet me downstairs in thirty?"

Despite nodding her agreement, Shepard wrapped her arms around his waist and pressed close. He checked her heart rate with his visor, but didn't need to. He could feel her heart racing against his side. "I'll get Ma—"

"General Vakarian," Miranda Lawson called, pushing through the crowd to get to them. "Am I to assume that since I've heard nothing about this trip to Palaven that the captain will not be travelling
"Shepard," the operative continued, "I can't overstress my objection. After Thessia, the Collectors are going to be a serious security concern."

